

Book 5

Prologue

*"A horse and fall was all it took
For every last to take the hook
Now the kitchen's full of cooks,
And the pot it is boiling*

*Crown of this, crown of that
They all chase after the hat*

*Princess said she has a right
Princess said it'd be a fight
So princesses are all aflight,
And the pot it is boiling*

*Crown of this, crown of that
They all chase after the hat*

*The wheel spins us all around
Up and north, south and down
Ebb or flow, we'll still drown,
And the pot it is boiling*

*Crown of this, crown of that
All of this for a hat,
While the pot it is boiling."*

-"Too Many Cooks", a Proceran folk song written and grown popular during the civil war

The wolves were at the gate.

Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, Prince of Rhenia and Princess of Salia, Warden of the same West that was currently burning to the ground, did not wonder when it had all gone wrong. She was not an unintelligent woman, and so believed she'd already identified the point of failure with accuracy: the moment where she'd assumed Keter would remain quiescent. She hadn't, though, not truly. Cordelia had believed there might be an increase in raids coming from the Kingdom of the Dead, perhaps a tentative incursion into the Alamans lakelands. That was the very reason she'd forced through the Highest Assembly the very unpopular taxes that had funded the restoration of all major fortresses north of Brabant, that she'd taken only a meager portion of the armies of the lakeside Alamans principalities and her Lycaonese kinsmen. There would be burning, she'd thought, there would be bleeding. But the borders would hold until the grim business of pacifying the east was done and full attention could be turned to the evil that lay behind the walls of Keter. In a word, she had assumed the Hidden Horror was a fool.

There was a young man at her Salian court by the name of Gabriel, a commoner who'd had the benefit of an education in letters by the House of Light. He had, several years ago, penned an interesting treatise called Fulcrums of History. A repudiation of sorts to the looming presence of On Rule over Proceran politics at the highest rung. It argued, rather eloquently, that disaster came to empires by an accumulation of smaller factors that drained the life out of them instead of through failures of will or cleverness, as the author of On Rule had argued. It had been, Cordelia felt, an attempt to explain the resounding brutality of the civil war by a scholar who had been born in its aftermath. It had concluded by arguing that the solution to such degradation was 'an injection of fresh vitality', in this case personified by Cordelia herself leading the traditionally aloof Lycaonese south to force an end to the wars. The conclusion was not as well written as the rest, and largely flattery directed at her in hope of an appointment. He had obtained it, though the flattery had not been the reason. Anyone displaying the sharp insight of the earlier chapters could and should be used by her administration.

She thought of that treatise, sometimes. To apply the logic behind it to her current situation, for there had been a clear accumulation of factors over the last few years. Strength and coin spent influencing foreign wars in Callow and the League. Erosion of her authority over the Tenth Crusade, by both Proceran factionalism and the prominent role of the Chosen, followed by the bruising strategic defeats of the Battle of the Camps and the assault on Red Flower Vales. Once the cracks were there, they had only broadened. Tensions within the Great Alliance grew. The Levantines had been less than eager to defend the heartlands of the Principate, even against Wasteland legions. A trail of burnt cities and granaries from Bayeux to Iserre had been the consequence of that, further weakening her standing within the very alliance she had assembled. Further disaster struck at Thalassina, with the Warlock obliterating the better part of the Ashuran war fleets along with the city he'd come to defend. Worse, the Chosen had now decided to buck worldly authority entirely: the Saint of Swords had openly admitted Procer was to be the pyre birthing her better world, and now the Grey Pilgrim had refused her order to immediately slay the Black Knight instead of capturing him.

The heroes could no longer be relied on. They would, from now, oscillate between being useful but uncontrolled battlefield assets and major strategic liabilities. The rulers of Dominion of Levant, her nominal allies and comrades-in-arms, were now attempting to twist her arms for better concessions after a war they were currently losing. Magon Hadast and the Thalassocracy of Ashur, her sole remaining solid ally, had been inflicted two vicious setbacks in a row. The disaster at Thalassina could have been recovered from, but the League of Free Cities had smelled the blood in the air and finally sallied out. The League's fleet – essentially the Nicaean fleet with what few ships the other seaside cities could spare – had torched the last war ships of Ashur and sacked the city behind them. The Thalassocracy had effectively been evicted from the sea, and in a matter of months the blockade around its island would start causing major food shortages. There was a very real possibility that Ashur would have to capitulate within the year, else it would simply wither on the vine. Worse, the Hierarch had sent out armies as well, the full muster of the League. Still, had even a losing battle been given by her southern army down in Tenerife, the situation would have been salvageable.

Instead her entire net of spies in the League had somehow missed that the entire host had gone into the Waning Woods, only managing to warn her the army had disappeared off the surface of Creation a week before it reappeared on the outskirts of the Principality of Iserre. Cordelia did not consider herself to be faint of heart, yet she almost shivered at the notion of taking an army through that murderous patch of trees. How much of their army had they lost, passing through? A tenth, a quarter? Half? There was not a single creature of flower in the Waning Woods that was not violently hostile to the existence of humans on Creation. Regardless of the... practicalities involved there, however, the southern Principate had now turned into a strategic nightmare. The First Prince was no great general but even she could see as much. The twenty-thousand strong army she'd stationed in Tenerife to avoid this very outcome was now marching north in all haste, but the map splayed in front of Cordelia betrayed a stark situation. Were the Alliance forces not staggered, not dispersed, they would have held the advantage. Instead it was bloody chaos.

The surviving Legions of Terror, bereft of the Carrion Lord but still under the command of the infamous Marshal Grem One-Eye, had fled into northern Iserre. Their supply situation, her generals assured her, would soon turn dangerous: they were marching through lands they'd already thoroughly pillaged on their way south. They were still around eighteen thousand hardened veterans, including a dragon, led by one of the finest military officers of the age. Behind them, split in two staggered armies, eighty thousand Levantines were in hot pursuit. If reunited, Cordelia believed they could crush the Praesi. But they were not, with a few weeks of distance between them and no way to join up without allowing the Legions to slip the noose. Behind the armies of the Dominion, the host of the League followed. Reports on their numbers fluctuated with every message: fifty thousand, forty, more than a hundred. A brave Iserran outrider had come close enough to find out some of the 'soldiers' were actually scarecrows held up by gargoyles, which had the reek of the Tyrant's scheming. Far behind all these, her southern army of twenty thousand was exhausting its soldiers to collapse trying to arrive in time. The situation in the region was not impossible to salvage, but the dangers were obvious.

Cordelia was unwilling to gamble the fate of the Principate on such odds, and so she had taken action: she'd ordered general conscription in Salia. The bottom of the barrel was being scraped raw, but she'd put together twenty thousand levies. Had she further enforced the decree, or even broadened it to neighbouring principalities, she could have easily tripled that amount. There was, unfortunately, no point in doing so. There were no armaments for the conscripts to use, and dwarven representatives had flatly refused any further sale without even bothering to explain why. Giving reasons to humans was, presumably, beneath their dignity. This entire debacle had the ugly reek of Catherine Foundling's meddling about it. If there was one saving grace to this entire debacle, it was that the Highest Assembly had finally understood how close to the edge the Principate had come: without even need for her prompting, the personal armies of every single royal not already at war had been sent to reinforce her levies. It would still be a month before the last arrived, but her twenty thousand would swell to forty and gain a bevy of princes and princesses along with badly needed professional officers. Strategic considerations now dictated that the moment this army was readied it was so be sent by ship down to the coast of Iserre, where it could reinforce the Levantines against the Praesi and link up with the others field armies before giving battle to the invading League of Free Cities. Cordelia had that very command drafted on parchment and staring back at her from the surface of her bureau, awaiting only her signature. The fair-haired woman watched her inkwell for a long, silent moment. She did not reach for the quill, instead rising to her feet.

The wolves were at the gate, but not only in war-torn Iserre. Woe, Cordelia. Woe to the north and to the south. Agnes' words were branded into her mind, the constant reminder that if she made even a single mistake the Principate would end. The First Prince of Procer tread softly until she stood by the tall glass panes of her personal solar, a magnificent view of Salia spread out below her. Frost touched the glass, and the city as well. First snow had already come, though it had melted quickly enough under the sun. The next fall would remain a little longer, and so it would continue until a thorough blanket of pale was draped over the capital. Fingers larger than was considered fashionable in a courtier, much less royalty, pressed against the cold glass. A taste of the north, a taste of home. Rhenia would be as much ice as stone, by now, fresh sets of fortifications being made out of a mixture of frost and gravel. The winds at night would be so loud they'd drown out even the howling of the packs roving the mountains. Her lips tightened, her throat closed up. Pressed against her heart, beneath the Rhenian blue dress she wore, was the last letter her kinsman Friedrich Papenheim would ever write her. She'd had to excuse herself, when she first read it. It would not do to weep in front of even her most trusted.

"I should not," she whispered against the window, her breath blooming in fog.

She did it anyway, once more. Trembling fingers claimed the parchment and she looked upon Friedrich's rough scrawl of a calligraphy. He'd never thought much of letters, not that many of her people did, and the words were as rough as the man had been.

The dead are coming.

I sent the young south. We will hold as long we can.

I am sorry. I cannot do more.

Dawn is in your hands, Cordelia.

We will meet again come the last summer.

Her eyes burned with tears she did not allow herself to shed. Hannover had fallen before she ever received the letter, the man who wrote it dead and ash. She'd loved Friedrich, she thought in the same way she still loved her uncle. Trust and comfort and bonds of blood sacred to them both. He could have been the heir to Hannover, had Uncle Klaus not named her that, and a lesser man would have resented her for it. She still remembered when she'd been fourteen, the announcement fresh, and she'd met him for the first time since. He'd smiled, rough hands pressing a bracelet into her palm. Not a single dark glance, not a single harsh word. Only a slip of leather with rattling teeth affixed, all carved with old Lycaonese blessings. For luck, he'd smiled. In the years since then, Cordelia had bought and been gifted some of the finest jewelry in Procer. On all of Calernia, truly speaking. And still, under the dress at her coronation as First Prince of Procer, rattling teeth had dug into her wrist. Gold, gold could be found everywhere in the world. Freely given affection could not. The First Prince of Procer wiped her eyes, grateful she'd already done away with her cosmetics for the day. The letter was slid back against her heart, weighing more than parchment ever should.

Across the rest of Lycaonese lands, cities and towns and villages would empty. The old and the young would flee into the mountains, and the rest of her people would prepare for war. Ploughshares beat into swords, cutlery melted into spears. Tables would be hacked up for wooden shields and lovingly tended-to mail come down from mantles. The Enemy was coming and her people would march to meet it at the passes, as they had unflinchingly since the days the word Lycaonese first meant something. Cordelia fingers curled angrily against the glass. Impotently. They could not stand alone. They were brave and they were strong and they were more than anyone had the right to ask of them, but they could not stand alone against the endless hordes of the Dead King. They needed reinforcements, they needed the south to raise its banners and come stand with them. And it was her duty to see to that, wasn't it? There had never been a First Prince of Lycaonese birth before her, and there might never be again. The Dead King had come to wage full war on the Principate of Procer for the first time since its founding, and only now did while a Hasenbach sat the throne. She owed it to her blood, to her home, to her honour to abandon all this southern madness and march north to stand against the horror that would devour all the world.

"And I am going to fail you," she whispered brokenly.

Because victory south meant taking all that remained of the Grand Alliance to fight the Dead King. Because the Chosen had held Cleves until Princess Malanza's army arrived to reinforce them and the principality still stood. Because Hainaut's coast was swarming with the dead, but she had ordered her uncle to take it back instead of returning to fight for his own home. And mine. She'd met the eyes of man who'd been father to her since she was a girl, and told him that if he disobeyed her orders and marched his soldiers home instead she would have to order him seized for treason. There would be no coming back from that, she knew. She'd seen the lay of it in his face. But in the end, all four principalities of her people could be taken by the Enemy without much greater cost than soldiers and mines. If the Kingdom of the Dead broke into the heartlands of Procer, its already ravaged farmlands, the entire realm would starve through winter. Hunger would kill a hundredfold the work of soldiers. Because even alone, you will stand long enough to save the rest of Procer and the Alamans will not. She was abandoning everything she had ever loved for the sake of people who still called her a savage behind her back. Who mere months ago had been plotting to destroy her.

"Because we must," Cordelia bitterly said.

Using the words of the line whose duty she was failing to justify that very failure. She was damned, just as the hard-eyed warlord in Callow had warned she would be. Let me be damned, then, she thought. The wolves were at the gate, gathering in ravening packs. Summer friends and bitter foes, a procession of the viperous and the apathetic. Heroes who would bring salvation with a torch, villains cloaked in murder and madness. Let them all come, baying for the end of Procer. If she had to war against all the world to save her people, she would. The Warden of the West walked to her desk, dipped the quill and signed the fucking order. Before it even dried she had another scroll unfolded, her feathered quill dancing across. Dredge it out, she wrote. Prepare it. Fire against fire. The Augur had found a path through, narrow as it was, and it began with a corpse that was not a corpse beneath the waters of the lake at the heart of Procer. The Ashurans, it was said, had called on a masked and hallowed presence at the Battle of Thalassina. Cordelia Hasenbach would call on a lot worse if she had to.

Dawn was in her hands, and she would not let it fail.

—

The Empire was dying a slow, messy death.

Alchemical concoctions had allowed Malicia to resist the call of sleep beyond what even her Name would allow, though she knew there would eventually be a price to pay for that. It was still necessary, for rare was the hour that must not be spent dragging her wayward realm back from the suicide it was so utterly intent on committing. It was grim, thankless work, moreso now than ever before: two blows had come in quick succession, and as a result her authority was thinning. Thalassina had, to her still raw grief, been the first. The woman named Alaya had wept over the loss of her old friend, when she'd heard the news. Wekesa had been dear to her in a way that very few people had ever matched or surpassed — only one, if she was to be honest with herself — and to lose him over what should have been such a simple matter... But while the Dread Empress of Praes could afford most luxuries known to Creation, time to mourn was not one of them. Not when Warlock's last blaze of vengeful glory had wiped out a city of nearly one hundred and fifty thousand people, along with her realm's largest and most prosperous sea port.

There were survivors, a meager thirty thousand or so. Whatever Wekesa had used affected them, for within a day of fleeing the city ruins they'd begun to wildly mutate. Eyes and cysts growing over skin, teeth turning to stone, even a case of hair turning into straw. Malicia ordered a quarantine for the refugees, uncertain if the affliction would spread, but it turned out pointless. Every last one of them was dead within a week, seemingly cooked from the inside by the fading remnants of Wekesa's sorcery left inside them.

As far as her agents had been able to determine, there had been only a single survivor to that catastrophe: the Hierophant. Young Masego had been observed to walk out of the wreckage in ash-covered robes, and her attempts to contact the boy had not gone well. The first messengers she'd sent on foot, and once they came within a hundred yards of him their heads had simply caved in. She'd ordered scrying rituals, after that. Of the ten mages she'd used, only one had survived the backlash. Healers managed to stop the screaming before the vocal chords gave, though there would be no salvaging the eyes that had rotten and fallen out from their sockets. That survivor had babbled about a 'sea of death', not coherent enough for a more comprehensive report, and bitten through her tongue before the night was out. Necromancy had revealed the dead woman's soul to be even more damaged than the corpse, which worried Malicia a great deal. Even Warlock at his peak had resorted to rituals and specialized tools to tinker with souls. His son evidently need not, and was shambling his way back to Callow through unknown means: he would frequently disappear for a few days at a time before her agents caught sight of him again, moving too quickly for it to be purely on foot.

There was going to be a reckoning in that, and the best she could hope for was that it would be Ashur that'd bear the cost of it.

Thalassina alone would have been a crisis. High Lord Idriss had been one of her closest political allies for decades, the wealth of his holdings and his remarkable breadth of indebted of great use in keeping the influence of Tasia Sahelian and the Truebloods at bay. Malicia had never counted the man a friend, but she had respected him and made good use of his ambitions. In the wake of the dissolution of the Truebloods and the marginalization of Wolof, whose latest High Lord she had bound to her too deeply for anything but complete subservience, she'd been preparing to set him up as the natural rival to the Moderates led by High Lady Abreha of Aksum. Competition over court appointments would have neatly neutered both of them and kept them busy while Malicia set to laying the groundwork for what the Empire was to become. Instead Idriss was gone, along with most of Thalassina, and Abreha Mirembé was now the second most powerful individual in Praes. The sack of Nok and the destruction of the only other seaport of the Wasteland had dealt crippling blows to Malicia's prestige, which had already been steadily eroding under the constant Ashuran coastal raids.

From Wekesa's death, she had inherited the stuff or rebellion: the Thalassocracy was no longer raiding, which allowed household troops and legions to withdraw, and doubts were now being raised as to her ability to successfully defend Praes. If not for her treaty with the Dead King, there would have been a coup attempt by now. As it was, overwhelming pressure was mounting at court for High Lady Abreha to be named her Chancellor. If she did not swiftly act to suppress dissent, the situation would grow out of control. Her most direct tool in this should have been the Legions of Terror, of course, but as things stood Malicia knew they could not be used. Sitting calmly in her seat at the table where the Dark Council was usually held, the Dread Empress of Praes watched the kneeling Soninke mage before her and idly tapped a finger against the wooden table's surface. Ime stood at her side, her spymistress a shadow silent and still.

"It is confirmed, Your Most Dreadful Majesty," the young man said. "Foramen has fallen."

"Of that much I was aware," Malicia sharply replied. "Elaborate."

"As of two days ago, a goblin army of imprecise size – at least ten thousand, less than fifty – attacked the city after sending a vanguard of infiltrators over what we now believe to be at least a month," the imperial mage hastily said. "They attacked under cover of night, after having slain the watchmen on duty and opening the gates. The city was fully occupied by morning, after which the goblins seized control of the city wards and cut off our ability to scry."

Not a single bit of news that Ime had not already brought her as of the morning the city was occupied. She truly had been too lax on the contingent of messenger mages directly sworn to the Tower, she thought. While their primary duty was to serve as couriers for orders, they'd also been granted funds to acquire and pass on local information from wherever they were posted. A way to keep a finger on the pulse of the Empire without ever leaving Ater. Yet if the best they could offer her was what half of Praes knew two days after Malicia learned of it, perhaps their funding needed to be reassessed.

"Do you have anything else to report?" the Empress mildly added.

The young mage hesitated.

"Rumours have begun to spread in Okoro and Kahtan that these foreign attacks are being used as a veiled knife by Your Most Dreadful Majesty to eliminate the High Lords entirely," he finally said. "Our branch officers in these cities believe the whispers are too widespread to be of natural provenance."

Malicia's eyes narrowed the slightest bit. That was, in fact, fresh news. Perhaps mere discipline would suffice, then.

"You are dismissed," she said.

The Imperial mage rose only to bow, and retreated from the room backwards with his eyes fixed on the floor. The Sentinels quietly closed the door behind him, and the Empress leaned back against her seat.

"Abreha prepares for a serious challenge, it seems," Malicia said after a moment.

Ime finally stirred to movement, sliding into the seat at her left.

"It was inevitable the moment Thalassina happened," the spymistress said. "Foramen just handed her the opportunity on a silver platter."

They both knew why the rumours being spread were much more dangerous than they seemed at first glance. Ime's agents had obtained greater detail of what had taken place in Foramen after it fell. High Lady Amina Banu had been skinned alive along with every other member of her line in the city before being drawn and quartered before the eyes of the entire city. Revenge for Dread Emperor Nihilis fashioning a leather cloak out from the hide of the matrons that refused to surrender when he crushed the Fourth Goblin Rebellion, or so they claimed. As the leaders of every single goblin rebellion in the last six hundred years had committed a variation of the same empty atrocity, Malicia could note that there had been a great deal more revenge taken than injury done. Unfortunately, the Banu of Foramen and the Kebdana of Thalassina had both been effectively ended as a bloodline. Oh, some distant relatives could be rustled up – the Banu in particular had been a tribe before a line, and were famously more a family thicket than tree – but that thorough an extermination would end them as political entities for generations. More than that, for the Kebdana. Foramen could be taken back, but it was dubious that Thalassina could ever be rebuilt given the toxicity of the former city's emplacement.

Two High Lord lines centuries old destroyed in the span of a year. High Lady Abreha would find many willing ears, when she cast Malicia in the role of one trying to exterminate the highest rung of Wasteland aristocracy.

"She needs to die," the Empress said. "And quickly."

"The Eyes are already exploring possible avenues," Ime replied without missing a beat. "Though she was a viciously paranoid old bat before taking a swing at the Tower, so the odds are not in our favour."

Malicia closed her eyes, mind unfolding. Angles, angles, there were always angles. The knife that took the killing blow need not be hers.

"Her agents at court," she said slowly. "Have they been preparing petition?"

"We've confirmed four," Ime said. "I believe the one requesting that she be formally summoned to the Tower to answer for tax irregularities is the one she'll truly back."

Casting herself as being attacked by the throne while ensuring she was in Ater to gather support. Not the most inspired of opening moves, but then Abreha had always preferred boldness to elegance.

"Have our people change the text for one of the red herrings just before presentation," Malicia ordered, opening her eyes. "High Lady Abreha will request a formal mandate and court title, for the sake of stabilizing Praes in the midst of war."

"Overreach would give us an excuse to swat her around," the spymistress reluctantly agreed.

"Swat?" Malicia smiled. "Nothing of the sort, Ime. How does one kill a lion without a spear?"

Her spymistress simply raised an eyebrow.

"Throw a cut of meat," the Dread Empress of Praes said, "halfway between it and a bear."

She drummed her fingers thoughtfully against the table.

"We will grant this petition, for we have great trust in the loyalty of dearest Abreha," she lightly continued. "As the Blessed Isle is still formally an Imperial territory, granting governorship over it is my right. Given the unfortunate refugee situation, it is evident there is great need of a stabilizing influence there."

Ime let out a low whistle.

"That gets her household troops at the Callowan border," she noted. "And nobody else will want to get tangled up there, so support will cool down. The reaction in Laure is the real danger."

"Have the regency informed that its protest over Praesi refugee incursions were duly noted, and I have appointed a governor to remedy the situation," Malicia said. "Of course, High Lady Abreha's mandate ends at the border. Should she provoke the Kingdom of Callow, it is not on the behalf of the Tower and any punishment doled out by the regency would not be taken as an act of war between our realms."

"Should such a provocation be arranged?" Ime asked, raising an eyebrow.

"Prepare one," the Empress said. "I will not pull the trigger unless it is made necessary."

There was a beat of silence.

"My Empress," the spymistress finally said.

"You have doubts," Malicia noted.

"Callow just slapped us across the face," Ime reminded her. "There was a signed royal decree recognizing the independence of the 'Confederation of the Grey Eyries' before the city had even fallen."

With Catherine's own signature, which the Empress suspected had by now been used more often by Hakram Deadhand than the woman herself.

"The Matrons must have reached out to them months ago. And it's only a matter of time until barges carrying munitions and goblin steel start sailing across the Wasaliti to equip the Army of Callow. They're effectively funding a rebellion against the Tower, though Gods only know how they got a loan from the dwarves."

"Given Catherine's continued absence, I imagine an amount of brutal murder was involved," the Empress drily said. "Though that is ultimately irrelevant. The Legions of Terror will move to blockade Foramen. Neither munitions, steel nor gold will flow. The bargain will remain entirely ink."

"We're in no shape to fight against Callow," Ime quietly said. "We are divided, bloodied and beset with a goblin rebellion."

"Callow is in no shape to fight against us," Malicia replied, and raised a hand before her spymistress could object. "Marshal Juniper has raised a significant army, but it cannot move east. If the Black Queen still somehow seeks alignment with the ailing Grand Alliance, it must participate in the campaign against the Dead King. If she seeks to kill Cordelia's grand design instead, it will fall on Salia instead and decapitate the Principate by surprise. Both offensives would be of great scale, and she has neither the manpower nor the resources to engage in war on two fronts."

Silence reigned for a moment after the mild tirade, the other woman refraining from contradicting her. Ime – Lindimi Sahelian, once, before she'd cast that name aside – was aging. No amount of potions, rituals or cosmetics could truly hide it anymore. Her skin was wrinkling, her body losing its spryness. Even a branch Sahelian could expect to live a few decades longer than the average Praesi, but time would catch up eventually. Part of Malicia grieved that. Part of Malicia had to begin considering a replacement. She read hesitation, on Ime's face. No, not hesitation. Reluctance. There were very few subjects where she had not given her spymistress to speak her mind fully and openly. Not even Lindimi's participation in the slaughter of Amadeus' kin when still served the Heir as warded subject, though it was one to be approached with care.

"Say it," Malicia ordered.

Ime's lips thinned.

"You have not spoken to the Black Queen face to face since Akua's Folly," she slowly said. "I do not think you truly grasp the woman we're dealing with anymore."

"A crown will not change her nature," the Empress said.

"What happened in Liesse did," Ime replied. "She reminds me..."

Reluctance again.

"... she reminds me of Nefarious," the spymistress finished quietly. "After the Wizard of the West broke his power. There's a sickness in her, Malicia, and it has little kinship with reason."

It had been many years, since Alaya had last thought of Dread Emperor Nefarious. In a way, that'd been a deeper victory than simply killing the wretched man – she had grown beyond him, the wounds and the fear and the pain. She'd not hidden from remembrance of him, she'd simply let him disappear into utter irrelevance.

"Winter can be predicted," Malicia said. "Rooted as it is in what she once was."

"She's unstable," Ime flatly said. "And I'm afraid of her. We all should be. She threw a bloody lake at the crusaders, and that was her being diplomatic. If that pretence is discarded, what will we be facing? You speak of armies, but I think of a mountain falling from the sky above Ater. Of Okoro drowned by an ocean unleashed. She's not the Carrion Lord's apprentice anymore, Malicia. She'd a vicious, angry thing bearing a fairy court's worth of power and I deeply dislike the risk of us making her feel cornered. She may yet come out with teeth and claw, damning all else."

Where was this fear a year ago? Yet the Empress knew the answer. It had not yet come to fruit, because a year ago Wekesa had still been alive and poorly inclined towards the Black Queen. How quickly slight wounds had turned to mortal ones, Malicia thought. Procer was being smothered by the armies of the dead, Ashur strangled by the fleets of the League and the hosts of Levant were embroiled in the mess that had been made of Iserre, headed for doom or crippling. All three nations sworn to end her, bleeding out in broad daylight. And yet Praes was dying as well, by wounds of its own making. The Matrons to the south, High Lady Abreha to the north. Legions she held only by the barest of leashes, one that could only be tugged by causing mutinous sentiment in the aftermath, and with the coming of winter the Imperial granaries would have to be opened lest there be food riots. The grain would run out, eventually. And to the far west, someone had taken Amadeus from her.

She was alone. There was no one else that would – that could – avoid disaster.

Left to scheme on their own, when the granaries ebbed low the High Lords would begin musing war on Callow to acquire its own reserves. The goblins would not end the border of their rebellion at Foramen unless they were made to. And the moment collapse seemed inevitable, some clans of orcs would begin eyeing the weakened lands to the south of the steppes for plunder as they had under the reign of her predecessor. Some would stay loyal, but all that would accomplish was civil war among the Clans. She had to avoid reaching the tipping point, whatever the cost. For if she succeeded? If she asserted true control once more? Then she had won this war, and all the wars that would follow. The Grand Alliance would break. The League of Free Cities would either collapse into squabbling or by trying to keep the Thalassocracy contained. And Callow would have a choice: uneasy alliance with the Tower, or standing alone against a Kingdom of the Dead that had just devoured most the west. It always came down to survival, didn't it? Outlasting what you could not beat.

"I am," Malicia said, "the ruler of Praes."

"So you are," Ime murmured.

"Let us teach them once more," Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name, "precisely what that means."

The Empire might be dying, but these lands were no stranger the walking dead.

—

Somewhere in eastern Iserre, under a full moon, a flicker of flame parted the night. It died quick enough, leaving behind only the cherry-red end of a lit pipe. The young woman holding it breathed in deep of smoke before blowing out a shoddy ring. Pearly white teeth were bared under moonlight, afterwards.

"Let's try this again, shall we?" Catherine Foundling said.

Behind her, streaming out of an ink-black gate, a sea of raised sigils poured out in utter silence. Obsidian and iron, furs and mail, spears and swords and things stranger still.

For the first time in many years, the Empire Ever Dark was at war with something other than itself.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

New Year, New Chapter, New time to vote/
Go Vote!

DroughtBringer

And, as a reminder, we also have a Discord going: <https://discord.gg/7P4vMkm>

Also, if you enjoy the guide and would like to support ErraticErrata then here is a link to his Patreon! <https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>

James, Mostly Harmless

Thank you everybody who voted, we are back on top of the Weekly, Monthly, and Yearly counts!

erraticerrata

And so Book V sounds off. We're back, folks. As this is the first update in forever, there's also the extra chapter of the month up – Peregrine II, a continuation of last time's Pilgrim POV. As usual, accessible through the Extra Chapters tab on the right.

Dainpdf

Hate to bother you, but was there ever an announcement of the winners of the great popularity contest?

Liliet

Catherine, and Dread Emperor Irritant

Dainpdf

Thanks.

caoimhinh

Yeah, we all love you and are happy for your return, but WHERE. IS. INDRANI?

Lavir

On her to Callow most likely.

Taichi

I imagine they've gotten news of Wekesa, and she's looking for Masego.

Cap'n Smurfy

I assume she's occupying a new role directly under the Queen of Callow. Or maybe on top the Queen.

letouriste

not just indrani. most of the characters pretty much disappeared from book 4. Can't wait to see them again

caoimhinh

Wasn't Ime's real name Sabra Niri, with kinship to the High Lord of Okoro?
Why is it suddenly Lindimi Sahelian, a relative of the ruling line of Wolof?

It was stated as such in Book 4 chapter 5: Interests.

{“Sabra Niri,” I said, tone caressing the words, and she shivered. “I was surprised, to learn of your kinship to the High Lord of Okoro.”
Her name had been learned, not given, and this made difference. It was still a foothold. Fear spread in her mind like a drop of ink in water. Thinned, yes, but contaminating every part of her. I could taste it, even through this thin link of sympathetic sorcery.}

And there was a foothold, so it can't be that it was a wrong name. Otherwise, Catherine's Fae Power wouldn't have taken her. Ime was even shown later on as being stressed over the matter.

kelioez

Ay, well caught, I was wondering about that too

caoimhinh

Welcome Back!!

Skaddix

Good Start as expected things are going poorly for Cordelia and Malicia. Though unless Cat is about to attack Malicia might be able to weather the storm since she mostly directly has to put down a Goblin Revolt. And heck the Goblin Revolt might even help her a bit since I doubt the Goblins know precisely which cities are loyal to Malicia and which oppose her.

IDKWhoitis

I'd give the goblins more credit than that. They might be in cahoots with the new High Lord already.

Euodiachloris

Agreed. I have no doubt whatsoever that the old bats know a lot of what is going down.

Javvies

Nah, at most, they are planning to backstab any High Lord they work with for specific mutual advantage against others – they have a lot of hate for the High Lords.

If the Matriarchs are planning to work with anyone, it'll most likely be Cat – after all, she may be a Callowan half-Wallerspaw, but she's Amadeus's protege, already has the only Goblin Colony outside of the Eyries, actively hates the High Lords, and isn't going to continue High Lord policies as regards the orcs or goblins.

Dainpdf

Cordelia is also getting an unexpected boon, since Cat is bringing a whole empire full of demigods to fight Neshamah. That will probably distract him from destroying her childhood home.

She brought them to Iserre, so she's either extracting Black, or gating whatever army is willing to side with her (hopefully the one from Free Cities) north to fight the undead.

Dainpdf

Good point. Her last interactions with both the Sve Noc and the dwarves seem to indicate she intends to take the fight to the Kingdom of the Dead, but that's not that close to Iserre. Maybe she wants to link up with Black's army (with or without knowing he's no longer with them)?

Vhostym

She wants to take the fight to the Kingdom of the Dead eventually, but first she needs assurance from Cordelia that they will leave the Drow alone there and stop their invasion of Callow. So I think the first thing she'll do is make a display of force. Though actually, she may just be there to pull Black out of Procer like she mentioned she'd do, since I don't think she knows he's been captured yet.

Dainpdf

Maybe. I don't know why Sve Noc would sanction this expedition, but such is the nature of time skips.

Liliet

I suspect Sve Noc delegated the entire thing to Catherine. I mean, the entire reason she agreed to come to the surface was that Catherine gave off the impression of knowing what was going on up there, and also incidentally the impression of being overall fairly trustworthy and genuinely invested in her plan of having the drow cork in the Dead King. And not get massacred by the dwarves. Which is the extent of Sve Noc's own ambitions re: this whole mess.

So, y'know, that.

Dainpdf

Pretty sure not getting drowned in dwarves was a huge factor, as was finding a place for her people.

I just think she'd have some questions about making a stop on the way there to fight some of Cat's surface enemies when Neshamah is already going to be a terrible opponent.

Liliet

I mean, it's not like she doesn't know Cat's got her own interest involved.

And I see Cat's soujourn to Iserre as part of her plan to gather forces against the Dead King, which, y'know, is going to help the drow die less in the process.

Insanenoodlyguy

And really, "they are enemies right now, we need to bloody them so they want to be friends" is going to make more sense to her than "If we help them I'm sure they'll change their minds" anyway

Liliet

the Matrons know EXACTLY who's loyal and who isn't

danh3107

IT'S BACK

IT'S BAAACK

IDKWhoitis

Well, it's been proven that Warlock literally nuked the city.

Also, Cat, you horrifying little creature, how I've missed you.

nick012000

I think you might be more right than you think. Keter's Law, right? Warlock ascended to godhood, and that means that he'd release a bunch of waste magic into the environment. We know that the Dead King nuked a city when he ascended, so it makes sense that Warlock would as well.

Vhostym

He didn't really ascend, just drew on truly inhuman amounts of power, but I think you're right that most of the death and destruction was from the Due. Though I am curious how, or if, Masego was excluded from the damage.

Liliet

It was a specific condition of the command Warlock gave to the power he'd gathered, I imagine, seeing as how it was the point. "Destroy everything except Masego". It went haywire from there, but the core objective was kept to.

werafdsaew

Masego has a Name; those people always get special treatment

sengachi

I mean, Masego killed people with proximity and maimed the souls of those who scried him because of a "sea of death". Who says he actually was unaffected?

Liliet

...also, uh. A good point 🤔

Big I

"A blind boy treading through a dead city, carrying the deaths with him – lash and ladder, into ever deeper darkness."

That's one of Hierarch's visions from the Book 4 epilogue. I think it's about Masego and that he somehow harvested the dead from Thalassina, either their souls, the power from their death, or both.

naturalnuke

Welcome back! This is much more what I expected, bravo 🙌

Euodiachloris

OK – out of Cordelia and Malicia, I don't know which is going to head for the headache pills faster upon discovering the full extent of the souvenirs Cat brought back from her trip abroad.

Amadeus, who I dearly hope is still in the land of the breathing, however... He might bust a rib trying to simply chuckle instead of rolling on the floor in laughter.

Dainpdf

Cordelia and Malicia (or at least Ime) are likely to be relieved, at least to a point.

Cordelia, because Cat is bringing a whole empire of Drow to sucker punch the Dead King. Malicia (or at least Ime), because Cat is no longer a deranged fae, and thus less of a liability.

luminiousblu

Malicia has no real way of not knowing Catherine is no longer a fae. We also don't know what the fuck her new abilities actually entail – she's clearly somehow bought the loyalty of the Drow, so unless the Night has given her the ability to keep the title of Queen of Winter but none of its power (or unless Akua magically counts as "Duchess of Winter" for the tiny shard she still holds), Catherine clearly has a new ability more than equal to Winter if it's still holding her entire court in check.

NZPIEFACE

That, or she just holds the respect of them cause their god said to.

Dainpdf

Pretty sure Cat has the Drow because she bargained with Sve Noc to lead the Drow to a new home in the Kingdom of the Dead.

Plus she seems to be some kind of high priestess of Sve Noc (priestess of the priestess? I guess we need a new name for the gals), which gives her influence over the Drow even if her raw power doesn't make them obey.

RoflCat

No, if anything Malicia should start to get worried.

She wasn't afraid of Cat because Cat was Winter and thus follows a certain pattern as is Fae nature.

However, now that Cat is back to 'gloriously mortal'? Nobody is going to predict her plan so easily anymore, especially not when she's got a whole new Name, or an equivalent to it, to her.

Heck, given that Cat's Goddesses are not exactly a fan of either Above (who shun them, branding them as Evil) or Below (the whole rigged deal), I think there's a lot of room for beating the crap out of both sides (specifically the Heroes on one side, Dead King on the other)

Dainpdf

Pretty sure they're still at least nominally on the side of Below. And yes, I agree, but it does make her both more amenable to negotiation and much more stab-able.

Liliet

That's the fun part of the side of the Below: it's very, very nominal in nature 😊

Dainpdf

Until you are manipulated into a cage fight with a demigod.

Liliet

That's the unfun part.

caoimhinh

They will be scared shitless, the only relieve will come from the fact that they won't face annihilation, but let's not forget that they hate not being in control (Malicia is so obsessed to the point of her paranoia leading her to take measures to get power without relying on Amadeus, yet it was the thing that caused him to get at odds with her, thus beginning her fall).

Accepting that Catherine is the one who can help her save her people is going to be a pill hard to swallow for Cordelia, but she will do it, because she actually loves her people and because an alliance with Cat would assure her a position of dominance in Procer.

And yeah, Amadeus will laugh like a madman proud of his daughter. Or he would probably stare not-smugly at whoever is around in such a way that loops back to being smug.

Now the thing to wait for is Neshamah and Bard's reactions.

SHARKS

There's also the fact the cat is also bringing along the newborn god she helped create. That is probably going to cause a few people some concern.

Cpt. Obvious

Yep, love the Necroposting... Again...

Also remember that Cat was pretty dangerous walking around with the domain of Winter in her. And she was an ordinary mortal just a few years ago.

Now she's the high priest of Sve Noc, a god freshly minted out of the drow composit being that has wielded the domain of night for millenia. Or was that "only" something like five centuries? On one hand the wandering bard and the dead king gave me the impression it's millenia, on the other hand the way the dwarves talked it sounded more like centuries.

Well whatever the case Sve Noc has a lot more experience with how to use the power of a domain. Heck they even have the formal training of both warrior and mystic. And now, freshly ascended to the status of of god they now have both Night and Winter as their domains.

That's way more dangerous than Cat was with the mantle of winter. And now she's the first high priest of Sve Noc and is leading the Drow Empire into the war.

Yep, nothing to worry about here. I mean it's not like the drow is making the goblin matriarchs seem like the golden standard for trust and loyalty or the goblins at large look like pacifists and philanthropists...

Yea let's rejoice in knowing that Catherine Foundling are now once again mortal and have had her claws pulled. This should be a welcome change of pace for both Cordelia and Malicia I'm sure...

luminiousblu

Cordelia has no particular reason to worry immediately since Catherine's ire is pointed towards Praes for now which implies that Catherine sees Procer as less of a threat and also less of an enemy than Praes. Since Catherine has, in the past, actually offered alliance, the implication is that Catherine sees common ground with Procer and despite the fact that things may have changed since then, unless Cordelia sends a missive and is turned down with prejudice, the beleaguered First Prince might still hope for a renegotiated non-aggression pact between her state and Callow.

She won't lose anything anymore, not when the state is decimated by fighting Neshamah; depending on how much damage there is, she might actually be able to claim a diplomatic triumph if she can pull off a peaceful resolution and/or aid from Catherine.

So Malicia, really, is more worried, because Malicia has too many problems to deal with already while Cordelia can at least take comfort in the fact that both attacks are not happening at once.

luminiousblu

Ah, I misread the last part. Somehow I thought "Empire Ever Dark" referred to Praes not being at war with Callow for forty years.

In that case, well, if diplomatic attempts fall through I think Cordelia will probably faint.

Skaddix

Well Cordelia has plenty of reason to worry. Masego's Parents are dead cause Cordelia and her Grand Alliance/Crusade. So is Masego really going to say sure Cat lets sign a Liesse Accords with them? I seriously doubt it. Also there is nothing that keeps Cordelia especially safe.

Malicia has her Deal with the Dead King that no one really knows the details off. So even if the Goblins keep pushing, its doubtful they can go all they way to the Tower and even if they do. The matrons seems smart enough to not want to trigger that clause. Same for the High Lords and Ladies, they want for now a Chancellor, not a new Empress or Emperor for the same reason.

So I say short term Cordelia is in serious trouble. But she is pretty good if she weathers the current crisis. Malicia though is more concerned midterm to longterm. Malicia has basically until the Dead King is dealt with to sure up her position.

Antoninjohn

Dread Empress: "Cat can't attack us she only has one army and she would need two.". Cat: "It's nice to have an extra army of all powerful demigods to attack thing with."

Dainpdf

Poor Neshamah won't know what hit him.

...who am I kidding, he was probably watching the whole adventure and eating popcorn.

byzantine279

Knowing him this whole little war is just a way to gather reading material for the next few millennia before the cork pops.

WuseMajor

The Empress really tends to underestimate Cat. It's a persistent failing, and a very dangerous one.

Admittedly, Bard does too, which is possibly the only thing that might save this situation.

Vhostym

The Bard might be underestimating Cat, but we really have no way of knowing. However, considering she orchestrated the creation of Sve Noc and seems to have lots of ways of knowing things, I wouldn't put planning this out of the realm of possibility. We don't know what her end game is, and we definitely don't know what she knows.

Liliet

The only estimation of Cat Bard has expressed was what she said to Neshamah.

Who, er, might be her friend, but is not exactly her ally.

Bard's a lying liar who lies. We don't have enough data to guess what she /really/ thinks of Catherine and her plan. The consequences of her actions so far have been, on a long-term strategic plane, actually somewhat aligned with Cat's goals: both First Liesse and Second Liesse were horrifying catastrophes (one narrowly averted), but Cat ended up hugely politically profiting from both. And thanks to Bard's meddling in the Free Cities, didn't end up saddled with narrative suicide in the form of keeping Akua's fortress.

I don't think it's an accident, or that Bard is just that incompetent. I think this means that Catherine's successes fit into her plans quite well.

It's, uh.

Confusing.

Haihappen

Seconded! The Bard is a red herring in a bullshit sandwich wrapped in mystery-meat fried fin fibbing oil served with a hefty portion of misdirection fries.

Liliet

...I just realized there's a third army in that mess, and that's the Legions. Sure, they aren't Catherine's SPECIFICALLY, but she's the person who can gate them out of there.....

Death Knight

Should be interesting conversation since both Scribe and Grem hate her for giving their Black Knight "but a flesh wound".

werafdsaew

All would be forgiven if she plays an instrumental role in his rescue.

Liliet

Yep.

I'm looking forward to it a whole lot.

Sparsebeard

We don't know if she can still gate though...

She didn't seem to have gone through Arcadia to march the drows...

byzantine279

They are using a gate, it's just a gate of Night rather than Arcadia. The full implications of that are unknown.

Cap'n Smurfy

Cat obtained the boon of travelling through Arcadia unimpeded from the Monarchs of the Far. Since it was Cat who got this and not the Queen of Winter she can probably still do this but by powering the gates with night.

Liliet

Cat got the boon of traveling through Arcadia unimpeded, but she has to get there first. Her ability to /open/ gates was not part of the deal, it was Winter power.

Agent J

Winter wasn't erased, it was merged with Night. Cat just used an ink black gate to bring her drow forces to eastern Iserre. Why are we having this debate when she literally just used a gate in this very chapter?

Liliet

You think?

There's a bit of a time issue there. The Levantine armies still haven't caught the Legions, and the region through which they're chasing each other is much smaller than the distance from Everdark to Iserre, and she would have started later than that merry chase began.

Admittedly it's possible that between the Night and the underground passages that dwarves opened to them, they managed to go not through Arcadia. That brings us back around to the same point though: if the dwarves were willing to let the drow through their territory to far south from the war they're actually supposed to be fighting (against the Dead King), they might as well let the Legions through, too.

Agent J

When did the dwarves grant Cat military access through their territories? It wasn't mentioned in any of the negotiations far as I'm aware.

tijayarnie

I need to know everyone's reaction to the Drow

Death Knight

Should be interesting seeing as the Drow has traditionally been aligned with Below.

Are the Princes and Priests of Procer against the ropes enough to accept Catherine's aid? She did say she wanted to join the Grand Alliance? Will Hanno and the Pilgrim's band stand side by side with the Army of Darkness or will they pull a Praesi and sharpen their blades while the Enemy is at the gates?

Woo this is gonna be good....

Liliet

Considering Hanno's Free Cities adventures with the Tyrant and also with Bard, but also particularly considering his origins – being unwilling to condemn his mother who literally put a curse of Below on government officials – I'm guessing he's going to stand with Cat fully willingly.

RanVor

Two things:

1. His mother was being lynched for crimes she didn't commit, and
2. Hanno wasn't a hero at the time.

Liliet

She, ah, did commit the crime, though.
She was being marginalized and shunned for no bigger crime then being Praesi, yes, but then she absolutely DID call on Below's debt to her for a lifetime of worship, killing herself and calling down a curse on Ashuran officials. She DID do that.

And Hanno was asked if he would renounce her actions, and he said that he wouldn't, and that's how his journey / started/. That's what /led/ to him being a hero.

RanVor

I think you misread something. She called on Below's debt BECAUSE SHE WAS ABOUT TO BE LYNCHED.

Liliet

I think you are misremembering.

"anno knew his family was not wealthy enough that they would have been able to afford a driftwood funeral for Father, that his body would have never been set on a raft for the eastern tide to take back to the faraway home of all Ashurans, but that it would not even be buried in consecrated grounds wounded him. The Gods Above would know their own, and the soul of a good man would be brought at their side, but for profane earth to be the tomb of his own father was a shameful thing. The priests laid blessing upon the whole mine and spoke the names of the lost, but that was as much to allow work to resume as to honour the dead."

^^^ the actual injury was the lack of grave for Hanno's father.

"Without Father, his mother would be expelled from Barcalid District and sent into quarantined grounds. "

""
"He asked her, then, if she wanted to go home. She told him his father had been home, and that it was now beyond her reach. The morning after, he found her gone when he rose."

It was not lynching that was coming, just being expelled, and she was not focused on that part, Hanno himself was.

"It was instinct that had him find her but it came too late. The same committee that had left his father to mass grave was attending the districts where pensions were due to widows and widowers, and on that day that had come to Barcalid.

"Gods of my ancestors, grant me due," Zoya of Thalassina snarled, throwing the tile at their feet. "Blood for blood, life for life. Let every breath be a torment, every night a terror, every pleasure turn to insipid ash. Let them have no rest or peace until my love lies in the grave he earned. I curse you to this with my last breath."

Bolding mine.

Zoya of Thalassina was pissed at injustice towards her husband, not towards herself.

She turned to Below to remedy that injustice.

And Hanno failed to condemn her for that.

IDKWhoitis

Considering how Catherine's plans normally result in everyone losing (including her), I think she might twist Cordelia's arm (or break it) before she helps her.

I also believe just the mere fact that Cat will gate out the Legions will screw Cordelia over since she just sent several large army groups to NOT the Dead King Front, and now they are functionally hundreds of miles from being useful.

If Catherine goes and knocks out Praes before engaging Dead King, she improves her bargaining position. The Grand Alliance can theoretically take another couple of months slugging it out with the Dead King, and Cat or Callow owes them no favors.

ninegardens

I mean, sure, BUT, you're bargaining position can be improved even further by "You see all these armies of yours that are in the wrong place? Give me treaty and a Black Knight, and I will give you transport."

Liliet

Cat WOULD break Cordelia's arm gladly, I imagine, in the literal personal sense, but I don't think she would take it out on Procer. Not after losing Winter and being utterly horrified by the decisions she'd made while holding it. Under influence or not, I predict that Cat's going to counterbalance her strengthened ties to Below (being a priestess of an Evil goddess and all that) by a renewed dedication to lowercase good.

She'll twist everyone's arm precisely as much as needed so that people she's trying to help would, y'know, stop fighting her, and get the accurate idea that accepting help good and fighting drow bad.

Not any more.

Cap'n Smurfy

Same. An interlude of every ruler's reaction to the news "and Catherine Foundling now has an army of Drow" would be a thing of beauty.

bad nombre

And new, completely unknown powers with a foreboding theme 😊

Javvies

Huzzah. Cat is back.

Malicia has badly misjudged Cat. Ime isn't entirely right (as far as her information goes) but she's not wrong, either. Backing Cat into a corner generally ends badly for everyone involved, unless they're either Ascended or well on the path, ie, the Dead King or Sve Noc ... Malicia is nowhere near that level on a good day. And Malicia is not having a good day, and isn't likely to have one that isn't bad anytime soon.

—

Cat is invading Procer ... how much does she know about what's been going on while she's been underground?

Also ... very interested in what Cat can do these days beyond light her own pipe.

Miles

I guess she wields night now?

Ime's relation to akua seems like it will be important too

Dainpdf

In Malicia's defense, no one was expecting Fakerine to turn back into Cat. Or for her to somehow recruit the effing Drow into something reassembling an army.

Javvies

Cat was never not Cat.

And it's not like even a "Fakerine" being backed into a corner by Malicia is somehow an improvement over backing Cat into a corner.

Remember, as Ime says, Winter Queen Cat dropped a lake on the Proceran Crusaders when she was (a) being “diplomatic” and (b) very carefully trying to limit the damage she did so that a diplomatic resolution would still be viable and (c) trying to work around a dozen Heroes. WQCat doesn’t have those restrictions when she’s dealing with Malicia. And while Cat hates Procerans, it’s not like she is any more fond of Praesi, especially Malicia, especially post-Folly. And, the only reason Cat’s megagate was stopped and messed Cat up in the process? Grey Pilgrim pulled a miracle out of his ass. Malicia isn’t going to get a miracle, and if Cat were to pull another megagate, she’d disconnect from it before it could be broken ... if it can be broken quickly without a Miracle or Mage-Name.

Cat recruiting the Drow to enter the surface is actually kind of a mixed blessing for Malicia – sure, it gives Cat an army she didn’t have, but it also means Cat’s less likely to be in a position where she has to go all out and/or pull a Bonfire-type operation against Praes.

Dainpdf

Well, Cat admitted she wasn’t herself when hollowed out and filled with the stuff of Winter. Plus Warlock thought so, and he was quite knowledgeable about such things.

As for the backing into a corner, Malicia started her career facing powerful, deranged villains. I believe that’s mostly what she was counting on – such villains tend to self destruct eventually.

Of course, she was playing with fire. I agree harrying Fakerine was a dangerous game, and that Cat being back is good news for everyone. It’s just that Malicia’s position was better thought out than you made it out to be.

Oh, and I’m pretty sure Cat does not hate Procerans. She just hates Procer’s tendency to invade neighbors (more specifically, Callow).

IDKWhoitis

To be fair though, All Cat has to do to fuck over Praes is burn the Green Stretch, and retreat to Callow for a defensive war. Malica would be dethroned in a brutal civil war that would eat itself alive.

This is with or without a mega gate that could or not be blocked or broken through spells and magecraft.

bad nombre

My take on this is that the mortal soul and Winter are different substrata. Cat's soul was imprinted onto Winter as a simulation of a mortal soul. But it was an imperfect simulation so she drifted away from how a mortal would think.

Whether or not Cat was herself depends on how one feels about simulations. I'm inclined to say that Winter!Cat was still Cat because she hadn't held her mantle long enough to entirely lose herself. Every day she drifted further into being Winter with some minor affectations and a mortal past.

I think the Dead King knew how to ascend with a perfect simulation of his original soul within his new mantle... and I think Masego will be able to do that too. His mastery of souls and insight into divinity point to this.

luminiousblu

Queen of Winter!Catherine was not "not Catherine". That's the excuse she tries to make for herself but everyone tells her she's full of shit immediately.

Dainpdf

...everyone? Warlock seemed to think so. And he hated her.

Also, that's not what I got from that conversation with Sve Noc. So who are you basing this on?

Euodiachloris

Catherine was "fake" in the same way somebody who is drunk or high is "fake". To put it another way, she was in an altered state, true; but, when they are in a manic or depressive part of their cycle, somebody with bipolar disorder is still themselves, however differently they act.

That definitely was Cat... with her brain on Winter rather than on Squire. Or on what she's on now, which is Night (once removed).

Dainpdf

That is not what Warlock seemed to indicate on the subject. Or what Cat seemed to indicate on the subject. There was some Cat in there, but mostly she was a mold into which wintry goodness was poured as filling.

Euodiachloris

Apparently you've never been near a drug-induced psychosis. 😊 Altered states are tricky and profound things. And, it's not a lie that "the chemicals made me do it", but how what was done was done? Still shaped by the underlying personality, however different others think the outcome.

You're still you, even with a lesion-riddled, dementing brain that can't make even three quarters of the connections it used to. Generally not a you people who knew the whole you enjoy being around, and thus won't consider that you to be still be you, but however much warped and reduced... that crumbling framework is still you.

Just as you are not the kid you were because you've added and lost bits. But, that kid and you? You.

BarthHumphries

How different do you have to be from "you" until you aren't you anymore? Were Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde truly the same person? Physically you're you, and your personality is going to inform your changed persona, but I think a strong argument could be made both ways, that you're no longer you and that you are still you.

luminiousblu

Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde were literally the same person, the entire book repeatedly beats you with the fact over the head. Hyde IS Jekyll, he's the bad side of Jekyll, the side Jekyll tried and failed to get rid of. Jekyll and Hyde is at least partially about how you can't just run away from the bad side of you by pretending it doesn't exist. Just like Catherine was absolutely told that she can't run away from the things she was capable of, the things she's still capable of, by blaming it all on Winter.

In any case, Warlock didn't say Catherine wasn't Catherine, he was quibbling about trivial stuff like whether or not she's human and arguing about souls. Trying to argue that 'w-winter was corrupting you h-haha' is bullshit, it's like saying that the carefree, fun-loving prince who put on the crown isn't the prince anymore because now he has to act with the authority and weight of a king. It IS him. He's changed. We call it growing up in real life.

Catherine is the one who chose to put on the Crown of Winter. She's the one who planned to get the Title from the Duke of Violent Squalls, she's the one who decided to fuck the consequences and let loose the dam. People have always commented on how Catherine is no longer the girl who chased after Black's shadow, even less the girl who was sure that she was in the right, no longer someone that her old self would emphasise with. That doesn't make it 'not her'. In life, there are choices you make that lead you down roads where you are changed utterly – you could argue that every road you could take will do so. Catherine happened to take one where there's outside influence, but unless you want to argue that Black's mentoring made her "fake", and the changes she went through during the war games made her "fake", and Second Llesse made her "fake", Winter Sovereign Catherine is fully Catherine.

In any case, I'm completely unconvinced that Winter, without the alienation from overuse that got shoved onto Akua eventually at any rate, actually affected her logic. Sve Noc actually calls her out on this, you need decades, centuries for that to actually start melting your mind. Cat's had it for maybe a year, it'd be a wonder if she had gain so much as an inclination towards blue clothing. Catherine's responses were generally vicious while she was the Winter Queen. They were also generally reasonable, and the things she's most horrified about are also things that have near-direct parallels in our own history done by great empires and respected leaders.

Euodiachloris

Even decomposed and three thousand years forgotten, your physical remains are... what remains of you. 😊 To cease being you requires a rewrite and reboot of reality by, say, something like a specialist demon that eradicates everything of a thing for a living. Merely a different take on you due to damage or change is still you. However heartbreaking the change to those around you (and even to your own dismay).

Simple as. 😊 Change happens to you as you go along, and it can be fantastic, horrible or both.

Dainpdf

It's more like there was an actress playing Cat than that Cat was drugged out. If a doppelganger studies one superficially, then wears one's skin, is it really the same person? I would say not.

Liliet

That first one was Warlock's opinion.

Masego disagreed, and Masego was proven to be right when ripping away Winter left old Cat behind. She was still there, just... under influence.

Dainpdf

Considering Cat's size relative to Winter, I believe it safe to assume that what was there was mostly Winter taking a Cat-like demeanor.

luminiousblu

Sve Noc, Akua, and Masego all say to varying degrees that Warlock is full of shit. We've been shown that Warlock is neither infallible nor the pinnacle of magic, and considering that Masego has the ability to fuck with souls directly without rituals, Akua used a fae soul as a power source for her flying city and is was merged with Winter, and Sve Noc is a pseudodeific entity with thousands of years of brute-forced knowledge dealing with the collective souls of her entire species, I'd take their opinion over his.

Also, "an actress playing Catherine" doesn't even make sense. What happened to the original one? Do you actually buy the idea that the original one straight up died? Did Sve Noc bring her back to life? Is she just a triple zombie now?

Catherine being influenced or controlled was literally something she made up to excuse herself and it's immediately swatted down by someone who knows way more about how fae mantles work and little reason to lie to her.

Liliet

I think Sve Noc had a much higher bar for 'influence' than Catherine did, not giving a fuck about the little things (like making fae eat their fingers) that left Catherine horrified. That, and the whole 'human vs drow' thing.

Catherine is /tangibly/ different after she accepts the mantle, and it was getting fairly unsettling.

And yeah Catherine did literally die and get remade in the stuff of Winter, during Second Llesse. The question of whether the copy is equivalent to the original is like the existential horror of Star Trek transportalizers excuse me warp pads or whatever they were called. Warlock had one opinion on it, Masego has another, and Masego's is better founded.

Hum, actually Masego had a good reason to consider Wekesa to be full of shit on the matter: remember the little incident during the northern crusade campaign when Saint cut Catherine's mantle and she went temporarily mortal, to the point of resuming normal bodily functions? It was Catherine's /non/-existence, rather than her existence, that was the trick played on Creation. Masego knew that.

Dainpdf

Masego doesn't so much refute warlock as deny him. He accepts Warlock's reasoning and evidence, but denies the conclusion.

Sve Noc was arguing over whether Cat is culpable for her double's actions. Of course, we know in the end she chose not to kill her, which is endorsement that Cat as she is now is not, in fact, very culpable for them.

And Akua... is Akua. She'll say whatever she needs to get ahead. Plus, she's not exactly known for her restraint and wisdom with regards to the consequences of consorting with otherworldly beings and/or removing one's soul from one's body.

As for the original, she was, effectively, dead. Now she's back, as she did once before.

RanVor

Although it is undeniable that Cat was influenced by the Mantle of Winter, I find the notion that she's not responsible for what she did during that time rather insulting. It seems like a cheap cop-out to avoid dealing with issues caused by Cat's descent towards, for the lack of a better word, villainy. It's not an honest change of heart, it's just a reset.

Dainpdf

There was much more Winter in there than Cat.
Plus, Cat did a lot of bad before this.

RanVor

And that's where our views start to differ.

Liliet

I agree with RanVor on this.

"I was drunk" is not a good excuse for hitting someone while driving, because you fucking chose to drink. In fact, drinking and driving is an offense unto itself.

Catherine is responsible for everything she did while after Winter's influence, because killing a Duke of Winter to take his power was /her/ brilliant idea, and every single step she took since then was a fairly informed decision.

On that note though, Cat didn't really fuck that much shit up while under Winter's influence. She took oaths and kept Vivienne close for a reason – she was a very careful drunk driver XD

The influence was there, but because Catherine was aware of that fact – even though she couldn't / feel/ all of it – she kept it at bay.

She was like a drunk driver who refuses to go over 10 kmph because she knows she's drunk and would rather slow to a crawl than hit someone.

Catherine is fully responsible for everything she did while under Winter's influence.

That doesn't mean there isn't a difference between her actions and mindset with or without it.

Malicia's about to learn that Winter!Cat was not the scariest Cat can be 😊

luminiousblu

Making people eat their fingers? Look, to begin with, the fae aren't exactly human. It's debatable whether or not they can't just regrow said fingers and are too terrified of Catherine to do it, since it's meant to send a message.

“Tangibly” different? Howso? Because it looks to me like any other story of the weight of the crown and somesuch. Nothing she does is actually unreasonable, except the idiotic way she refused to learn to use her mantle correctly, and that seemed more like a “and man grew proud” thing, or a reflection of how Catherine knows less than nothing about magic.

“existential horror of Star Trek”

It’s just the Ship question and it’s hardly existential horror. Though philosophy has a lot to say on the matter, what’s agreed upon is the fact that it doesn’t actually matter, it’s mostly an academic point. At what point does the ship become a new ship, well, at what point does the captain actually care, you know? Catherine was clearly in control. You can argue that all of her fae tricks made her more than human but on a mental level she wasn’t somehow being puppeted by Winter. She’s the one who decided to take on Winter and then decided to break the dam, WQ Catherine was as much a “fake” Catherine as Angry Catherine or Horny Catherine are fake.

Liliet

We know Fae can’t regrow body parts because of the precedent of Larat’s eye. He wouldn’t be that pissed at Ranger if he could simply regrow it.

It’s hard to tell the specific examples of Winter influencing Catherine, but IMHO, the entire tone of the story changed in Book 4. Sure, some of that was maturity / weight of the throne, but note how differently she feels once Winter is gone. I’d compare it to depression, to a degree: making things matter /less/, blunting her passion, cooling her fire in every respect except the most dangerous ones.

Her /empathy/ is gone or blunted, the most immediate reason people care about things. Catherine is an empathetic person, counterbalancing the cold reason at the heart of her: she simply feels bad at seeing others suffer, even if she can shut it down. It’s a different thing than caring about someone personally, it’s the immediate feeling when something is /right in front of you/.

As a fae, Catherine kept her /morals/ – the more abstract reasoning of what is right and wrong, and she kept her /attachments/. Empathy though, the thing she used to figure out what her morals were in the first place? She needed fucking Indrani of all people to tell her that she was crossing lines, and Indrani punches empathy in the face every time she meets it.

Catherine reacts less to the world around her, in Book 4. There's a lot more calculation and a lot less emotion to her POV, compared to early Book 3 before she got Winter (which I believe started tangibly influencing her immediately).

She still manages to grow and develop, even through Winter. That's what makes this confusing: Catherine in the last six chapters of Book 4 is not the same Catherine as in the first chapters of Book 3. She's not the same Catherine as in the immediately preceding chapters either, though.

Amoonymous

Well, Cat's whole deal with the dwarves (for the dwarves to allow all the drow to leave) was that they'd be going to fight the only real threat to the dwarves – the Dead King.

She is still invading Procer technically – and first reactions to her host should be rather amusing – but she's almost certainly going to offer to help Cordelia.

Javvies

Cat's going to want Amadeus back in one piece and with his soul properly attached and unaltered, cities are just so breakable, you know.

Death Knight

Hey, it's not like the Principate can bitch about a veritable army of demigods showing up on their doorstep unannounced. After all, this is just an "expeditionary" force.

Liliet

How did Ime not know about Malicia's meeting with Cat in Keter? They absolutely did speak.

C_B

Thus the "face to face" caveat – Malicia was there via flesh puppet.

Liliet

And a scrying link somehow counts as more 'face to face' than a meat puppet?

zenanii

Through a meat puppet. Not face to face.

Liliet

Face to face, not through a meat puppet or a scrying link, Malicia and Catherine hadn't seen each other since Catherine was in Ater at the beginning of Book 2.

Sure, their conversation during Akua's Folly, which Ime refers to, was specifically through a scrying link and not a meat puppet, but I'm not sure what kind of feedback a scrying link has that a meat puppet doesn't. It should be the other way round if anything.

taovkool

It's back!

Now let the madness begins!

Dainpdf

Ooh. Seems promising. Though I wonder whether Cat intends to stay on the campaign in the west instead of returning home to help her beleaguered adjutant and conscience.

Also, I wonder how she'll react when news of what happened to Masego on his family trip. At the very least, Indrani will want to go keep the man company.

...of course, that assumes Masego is actually making his way to Callow as opposed to a beeline for Cat.

Liliet

Well, Callow didn't get set on fire in her absence, so they can't be /that/ beleaguered! They can handle it! It's not like there are interpersonal issues that Catherine blithely ignored between them or any fun news waiting for her about their resolution or anything...

I have no idea where this is going.

byzantine279

To be fair to Catherine there, there wasn't anything she could have done about said interpersonal issues.

Liliet

She could have, like, talked to them more and had them talk to each other before sending them off to fix the country together.

Hindsight is 20/20.

Dainpdf

Right? I wonder how Cat is going to react when she returns to find Hakram has -1 hand. Plus whatever changes Vivienne has been through.

Liliet

Yep.

"You did WHAT?! Admittedly I have little to no room to talk here, but,"

Euodiachloris

"How could you lose a hand?! At least I have a habit of growing back, replacing or jury rigging a cheat to cover what I wind up missing! You've not picked that trick up, yet: don't use it again until you do!"

Liliet

;u;

Antoninjohn

A corpse that is not a corpse in a lake, I think the Bard mentioned that angel in a talk with The Lone Swordsman. I wonder how much night Cat will get when she kills it.

onedollargum

I imagine it's more a demon that went missing.

werafdsaew

No way that's a demon; the Heroes and her own Church would turn on her in a heartbeat if she's trying to use a demon.

Death Knight

I think it might be a sleeping deity, only brought to the field when Procer is in dire straits. Or it could be a legendary Named Wizard, the same Wizard that once fought with Triumphant that resulted in the Titan's Pond being formed.

Lavir

Or the Sve Noc who is now a god.

nick012000

I'm pretty sure it is. Look at her thoughts. "Let me be damned, then." "Fire against fire." Now consider that Procer was playing pretty heavily into the villain role during the invasion of Callow, and I'm pretty sure that Below is angling to get her a Villain Name, most likely that of her distant ancestor who fought against Neshamah prior to his ascension – the Witch Queen.

Liliet

I figure using an angel's corpse as a tool counts as damning to someone as Pure in some respects as Cordelia is

That corpse was in the lake Hengest, the one Liesse was built by. The corpse in the lake Iserre may also be an angel, but that would be repetitive. My money is on something remaining from the Old Iserre, the city that was sunk into the lake by the dwarves.

Antoninjohn

There was the angel that the White Knight summoned in Salia when the First Prince was going to give children as tribute

Liliet

The Rebel Knight, I think, not White.

Shaerick 68

"The first messengers she'd sent on foot, and once they came within a hundred yards of him their heads had simply caved in."

Oh, how I've missed this. Welcome back, EE!

onedollargum

They had eyes on the inside ;D

Euodiachloris

That's what happens when you're too busy doing stuff to realise the frenzy metre is about to end you. xD

oliverwashere

Typo thread:
so be sent-> to be sent

Cordelia fingers -> Cordelia's fingers stuff or rebellion->stuff of rebellion given her spymistress to speak-> given her spymistress leave to speak She'd a vicious -> She's a vicious

Anon

I like the opening, but as one of the people who was not at all a fan of what ended up happening with Catherine and the Drow at the end of the previous book, I really think that long-term it's gonna depend on what Catherine ends up becoming – having her 'revert' to being a priestess/follower indebted to a god directly would be a massive setback, imo.

But I suppose we'll wait and see.

Snowfire1224

Who wants to guess how many chapters/interludes in we'll be when we finally find out what happened to Idrani?

caoimhinh

Catherine should mention her in chapter one, I really don't think she won't at least say what Indrani is doing or whether she is alive or dead.

I really, really hope Indrani is alright.

Liliet

If she wasn't, Catherine wouldn't be so cheerful talking to the dwarves.

Major character deaths have impact in guide. If Indrani was dead we'd already know.

NZPIEFACE

No one. Absolutely no one will see her coming.

sugarrollblog

Not sure what Catherine will do Iserre. Is she going to take the city before the League does? Grem is also heading down there. Iserre is bound to be interesting as too many armies are converging on it.

Grem is heading out of there, actually, and the Levantines may have already passed it in their pursuit. If I had to guess, she couldn't scry from underground and was heading for Black, and is going to gate north the highest bidder.

sugarrollblog

Right, so the Legions under Grem and the Levantines are moving away from Iserre. Catherine brought a fully armed Drow army with her. A little bit of an overkill just to pick up Amadeus I think. She might be there for something else.

byzantine279

I think she's there to pick up Black, his remaining legion, and make a ridiculous public announcement about the drow in front of as many witnesses as physically possible.

Allafterme

I wonder what her reaction will be when she learns dear old Pilgrim has taken Black prisoner...

byzantine279

Meh, Black (probably) escaped. She's probably going to be too busy trying to figure out where Black wandered off to.

Liliet

"Uuuuugh. I take my eyes off him for five minutes and this is what happens. Fine, dear teacher, take care of your own stupid business while I'm busy saving your people from your sideways backfire of a plan. Ta-ta, try to be alive next time we meet"

NZPIEFACE

As many important witnesses as physically possible. How would Tyrant and Hierarch possible miss this?

Euodiachloris

She would need to give Kairos some notice. Refreshments and a comfy chair take time to magic up. 😊

Snowfire1224

If she can't scry underground how does she know where Black even is?

Skaddix

I wonder if this leads credence to my theory that Warlock and his Husband made Masego with magic and that Masego is actually half Devil or Demon Cause Masego is moving in a weird way, at unnatural rates and seems to be passively rekting any human that gets close.

onedollargum

I think it's probably the blow-back of literally tugging a god's hand to slap down their own people.

luminiousblu

"Hierophant" is the equivalent of "Archmage" for Clerics in D&D ("Warlock", in case you're wondering, refers to a type of spellcaster who makes pacts with demons). Trying to scry an archmage without his knowledge or against his will is a poor idea at the best of times.

Also, moving in a weird way sort of implied to me that he was either flying or teleporting.

"But teleporting is impossible!"

Well, Hierophants are known for their miracles...

Atagan

I assumed he is kinda in autopilot using gates to make short jumps and with some kind of automatic/subconscious defence against everything thats not a friend

luminiousblu

Really I wonder how "teleporting" works in this setting. In D&D, teleporting technically takes you through the Astral Plane across an arbitrary distance, but that's because the Astral Plane is the place you go when you're nowhere else, it's the representation of the "place between places". That said, going through Arcadia is, well, it's suspiciously similar. More like ethereal travel but I wouldn't really be surprised if Masego realised the inherent similarities.

Liliet

It's been mentioned that teleporting is impossible, as is generating matter out of nowhere, but since both of them can be emulated in 1000 ways the distinction is largely academic.

Liliet

Oh, and Masego sure did make wooden pillars appear out of nowhere when pulling his binding trick, Catherine actually commented on how utterly terrifying it was that he could do that suddenly.

It's equally possible he's /actually/ teleporting here and not using some kind of extradimensional shortcut...

NerfGlastigUaine

Just finished first week back to college, tired as all hell. Saw this chapter and all my fatigue washed away, replaced with pure, octane-fueled hype. Thank you so much for being back.

Someguy

>How quickly slight wounds had turned to mortal ones, Malicia thought.

Gee. Really Malicia? I'm sure the Allied powers thought the same regarding Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles right when Germany shoved a spiked gauntlet (WW2) up their ass.

Ali Khan

So warlock sacrificed himself and an entire city of over a hundred thousand souls for his sons survival. It's confirmed that hierophant can affect the souls of his targets even through scrying. Didn't dread emperor revenant also sacrifice that many souls for apotheosis? It looks like masego has gotten quite a power up.

byzantine279

Masego witnessed the power of Above and Below. Only a sliver of each, but as someone whose power is to usurp miracles... Well, he's probably almost as strong as WinterCat was. Stronger even, since he knows what to do with it. I suspect he may have let that one mage last long enough to deliver a message.

luminiousblu

Warlock doesn't seem to have "sacrificed" the people who were killed, at least in the magical sense, just included them in the blast radius because he couldn't really give a damn. You know I find it dubious how Akua is largely hated for killing a hundred thousand in Liesse, but Warlock is given a pass despite doing essentially the same thing. It really does matter whose side you're shown.

byzantine279

The reasoning behind it matters a little too. Akua did it because she needed an army. Warlock did it because he had more power than he could control and considered literally everyone except Masego acceptable losses. Including his husband. So it was a cold & calculated decision for power vs a last act to save his son.

Liliet

Akua's slaughter was a calm and calculated plan carried out over a large amount of time.

Wekesa's last act was an act of desperation and self-sacrifice, as well as sacrifice of one of two people he loved most in the world for the sake of the other.

One was an atrocity, the other a tragedy.

That said, Wekesa was also 100% a horrible person, and loving him and crying about him doesn't stop me from knowing that. And Akua being a mass-murderer doesn't stop me from loving her and wishing her all the best.

So, y'know, nuances.

luminiousblu

I dunno man, I would rather know that my murder at least was a step on the path towards greatness than know that it was literally just an accident haha sorry bro. Maybe that's just me though but like, if I have to die anyway I'd like it to at least have been useful.

Ravenfrost

blind boy treading through a dead city, carrying the deaths with him – lash and ladder, into ever deeper darkness.

I think Masego took the 100k souls with him and that's the reason for his power up and soul manipulation.

Oshi

He's looking for his father's soul in all the mess.

byzantine279

So any bets on how the Warden of the West (Is that a Name now? That sentence looks like she's taken a Name.) is going to react to Cat appearing out of nowhere with an army of ridiculously powerful drow, declaring war on the Dead King, and probably asking for a truce until the world stops burning? ...Because I think she may have an aneurysm and die. Because this is ridiculous even by Cat's standards. ...Then again having seen it happen I suppose that makes sense. I have no idea how she pulled this off even having witnessed it.

NZPIEFACE

Nope, never will be a name either.

Liliet

Why do you think so?

haihappen

A Name is a Role. Warden of the West sounds like a Role, but is more of a formal title for the First Prince, which, as repeatedly reinforced, will never be a Name for the reasons that Procerians believe more in the might of many than in the might of One.

These titles simply do not have the cultural groove to become Names.

But getting a Name without realizing that it is happening is reinforced by both Vivienne and the SPOILER for the current Extra Chapter Peregrine II.

Liliet

I think with the degree of disaster currently happening in Procer, Warden of the West might have gone from a ceremonial title to a very real thing in the minds of people, putting it on track to being a Name.

The phrasing in the chapter certainly suggests that.

sugarrollblog

Malicia thinks that a legion blockade will prevent the exchange between the goblins and Callow? Catherine can open portals and she knows this—Ime knows this. I can understand them failing to consider the Drows but this? There is no excuse for the two of them to miss this. They're supposed to be smart.

NZPIEFACE

I sincerely doubt that the goblin Matriarchs will trust a portal anywhere near their caves.

werafdsaew

But they control Foramen now

chawpi_tuta

I wish theres a map so i can see how truly fucked bitch princess is. Also it seems the player start summoning god to the table

sugarrollblog

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/maps/>

Barthumphries

Where is Iserre on this map: <https://practicalguidetoevil.files.wordpress.com/2015/10/continent-map.pdf>

sugarrollblog

Near the center of the continent

Aotrs Commander

Well, nice to see that, for a change, everyone else is getting as much crap as Cat has been.

Though at this rate, the entire continent is likely to be entirely depopulated to the point of collapse whatever happens...

I can't help but feel Praes has been dealt a mortal blow with the permanent loss of it's major port – even if it survives the current crisis, that catastrophe seems like it will spell long-term disaster for the nation that was already dancing on the edge of a starvation cycle. And, of course, desperate people with a penchant for insane sorcery equals what could be a rather nasty final lashing out before the end,

Liliet

They're going to need to rely on Callow!

The Praes/Callow united nation is going to be real... but it won't be the Tower in charge.

Someguy

The Callowan Conquest of Praes.

Liliet

Yep.

Doesn't really matter to Black which way it goes, does it?
As long as it holds, he's fine with the outcome XD

HandyCapped

You know Erratic is back when this story is suddenly number one on top web fiction.

Al

New Book on my birthday? Hell yeah!

Daemion

This is my understanding:

Night and Winter got merged into one and are now either. This provided the necessary power for Sve Noc to ascend to godhood. Cat is no longer a fae noble but a mortal human again. As compensation she's now the (high) priestess of Sve Noc, which gives her nearly full access to their power (what do we call that? Winternight? Nightwinter? Ninter? Wight?^^). Technically she should be able to use it as the Mighty do, which means she hasn't become any weaker and luckily she learned all their skills while she was down there. The primary advantages are that her mind is her own again, usage of more power won't turn her into a cliché villain and she's no longer affected by wards.

That is a major upgrade, even factoring in that her human body is limping again. It's a bit unclear what role Akua plays now. She's a soul bound to Cat's cloak, but has since been empowered by Winter and by Night. She's not alive again... I think. But... what is she now?

Imagine the fun and chaos when someone prepares to take on the Queen of Winter and instead the Black Queen arrives, wrapped in Night and followed by an army of Sigils. This is going to be so epic.

Now she simply has to rescue Black, pick up the marauding legions, secure the goblins and then kick everyone's ass to bring peace to the continent. Should be a piece of cake. 😊

Re-uniting the Woe is next on the agenda. Perhaps Hakram would enjoy a Hand of Night to go with his Deadhand? Perhaps Masego would enjoy being hugged by Cat and Indrani? Perhaps Thief would enjoy giving up all the responsibility of a regent to Cat?

Haihappen

Pretty sure Vivienne is transitioning to a Name Adivor, Regent, Heiress or something in that general direction. The hints where there: How she started changing again (or never stopped), and how she lead a spy network instead of thieving about; and for some time was the direct advisor to the Queen.

She is positioned as a successor to the title, and probably Name. Basically all is missing is the Black Queen's seal.

Hakram may even stay with her, but there I am unsure. Perhaps if Cathrine ordered him to stay as an Adjutant to Queen Vivienne.

Then the new Murder-Squad would be Cathrine, Masego, Indrani, Akua, Hakram/X (because the Five Man Band is a thing)

X -> Black, Ivar, ... no more names that seem plausible.

RanVor

Vivienne ending up with the Name of Heiress would be delightfully ironic, however unlikely it may be...

sugarrollblog

Yeah, Thief will transition to a hero ruler name. Physical changes has already manifested and she is becoming more regal in appearance. Cat will hand over the queenship to her and objections to Callow joining the grand alliance will all but disappear since Callow will now be ruled by hero. Cat will remain as the necessary evil of the nation to deal with the ugly things they are faced with.

sengachi

Fimbulwinter 😊

sengachi

Wait. I'm not sure I'm thinking of the right mythological winter. Is fimbulwinter associated with sunless days or am I thinking of the wrong apocalypse winter?

SlumberryStorm

Thanks for the Birthday gift, and for the great story

Yet another cook

Wait, those aren't the lyrics of Too Many Cooks!

♪ It takes a lot to make a stew,
A pinch of salt and laughter too...

Chapter 1: Visitation

"Even a devil can be merciful once."

– Callowan saying

The night was full of shadows and every last one answered to me.

Fairy gates had never been quite as precise an art as I would have liked, particularly when the needle was threaded half-blind, but these days I had more than Masego or Akua adding up the numbers for me. The sisters understood these matters in a way no mortal ever could, and considering it was their – ours, I supposed – army I was taking through Arcadia they'd not balked at charting the path for me. Well, that wasn't entirely true. Komena had complained about being a goddess, not a cartographer. I'd wholeheartedly agreed: after all, a cartographer would have given me an answer instead of petty whining. You'd think finishing apotheosis would have done something for her sense of humor, but instead I'd been given an indignant silent treatment for a few days. Which was fine by me, really. There was only so much croaking I could take from the damned birds they'd sent with me. The night-feathered crow on my left shoulder stirred in displeasure and I snorted.

"Fine, fake birds," I said. "That better for you?"

Indrani cleared her throat, less dainty scoff and more middle-aged dockworker about to spit.

"Catherine, you're talking to the crows again," she said.

I shrugged.

"It's fine as long as I don't expect to hear them talk back, I think," I noted.

"Caw," the crow on my left shoulder drily said.

The word, not actual cawing, because Andronike had developed a taste for the sardonic since shaving off a sliver of her godhood and sending it off with me.

"Wind's real loud tonight," I said, blithely pretending I hadn't hear anything.

"Well," Archer mused, "it is winter."

And wasn't it just? The heartlands of Procer were pretty as a painting, under moonlight. Open fields of driven snow, sparse trees trickling down icicles and the occasional game wandering through the frost. It said a lot about the drow, I thought, than an army of fifty thousand of them hadn't scared off every beast for four miles around it. There'd been some childlike wonderment at first, when the grey-skinned host had first witnessed the world covered in white. Drow centuries old patting at the snow like they couldn't quite believe their eyes, strangers as they were to a surface winter. I remembered that fondly, the innocence of it. There were some things that even millennia of constant bloodshed could not entirely erase. Tonight, though, there would be no wide-eyed fascination. The warriors I'd sent out had moved out across the snow like ghosts, melting back into the darkness they'd been born to.

Indrani had come to keep me company as I stood, watching the small town in the distance. My friend – we'd shared a bed more than once, by now, but lover ill fit what lay between us – was half a shadow herself, the hooded leather coat she wore over fine mail hiding her face away from the light of the moon. Now and then I could see her hand twitching slightly, the urge to reach for the large bow strapped to her back only barely repressed. Archer had never been one to shy away from a fight, which was the reason I hadn't sent her out with the drow in the first place: corpses weren't what I was after. Not tonight anyway. There were a few long years ahead of us, I knew, and there would be blood spilled before they came to a close. Whose, I thought, is the important question, isn't it?

"What's the place called again?" Indrani asked.

More out of need to fill the silence than true curiosity, I suspected.

"Trousseau," I replied anyway.

Finding a hunter out in the plains had been a lucky stroke, and result in a vague notion of where we were in Procer. Somewhere in eastern Iserre, for one, which was what I'd been aiming for. Unfortunately said hunter had never gone all that far from her hometown, and had little news of what was currently taking place in the Principate. No map, either, but that much I'd expected. Those were damned expensive, and even halfway-accurate ones not usually in the hands of commoners.

"Bit of a shithole, to be honest," Archer said.

Trousseau probably had no more than a thousand souls living in it, most of the time, but these were not that. War and conscription would have thinned the town. I'd decided to charitably attribute how run-down the place was to the removal of so many able hands, though odds were the place was poor enough it looked like this even on a good year. There were as many huts as houses, all huddled around a few streets that were more streaks of cold mud than anything, and what cattle could be seen held in pens around the town was thin and sickly. Though Indrani's gaze had lingered on the ramshackle and no doubt biting cold huts, I'd been more interested in something that wasn't there. Namely, walls. I honestly couldn't think of a single town of a thousand in Callow that wouldn't have at least a palisade up, or tall piles of stones without mortar. For my purpose of the night, however, that defencelessness was not unhelpful.

"If it were worth putting on a map, Black would probably have burnt it on his way south," I said.

She hummed in agreement, and only spoke again a few heartbeats later.

"You think rumours about what's happening to will have trickled into here?" Indrani asked, glancing at me.

"Worth a try," I grimly said.

Archer's footing shifted almost hesitantly, and I blinked in surprise when she put a comforting hand on my shoulder. I could almost feel the warmth of her through the cloak and doublet, and my heart beat a little faster. Not because of attraction, this time, though that was never far. That I could feel warmth at all was still a feeling I could only luxuriate in.

"We don't know he's in trouble," she said.

"He should be back from Thalassina by now," I replied. "And still we can't make contact with the Observatory. Something happened."

"He could be buried up the neck in some hidden library," Indrani smiled. "Only to remember the rest of Creation still exists in a few months."

The smile was slightly forced, I knew her well enough to tell. I wasn't the only one worried about Masego and the resounding silence from Laure.

"Shouldn't it be me comforting you, anyway?" I said.

"He can take care of himself," Archer quietly said, though her eyes flicked east anyway.

I clasped her bare fingers with my gloved ones, squeezing tight, and she shot me an amused look before removing her hand. Where our conversation would have wandered after that would remain a mystery, for I felt a ripple in the Night headed our way. Mighty Rumena – crow-Komena pecked at my shoulder and I rolled my eyes – General Rumena, I mentally corrected, had not ceased in its attempts to sneak up on me even though not a single one had succeeded since I'd become First Under the Night. It was hard to pull a Night-trick on someone who had a finger on the pulse of that very power.

"So, the way you don't leave footprints in the snow," I called out. "Is that an illusion, or are you so feeble and delicate you're light enough not to leave one?"

Grey fingertips appeared out thin air a few feet in front of me, coming down to tear away at a veil of Night and revealing the creased face of the ancient drow. Even stooped the bastard was taller than me, which unfair in so many ways, and ever since it'd been appointed to the command of the southern expedition it'd made a point of looming over me whenever it could.

"Many are the mysteries of the Night," General Rumena vaguely replied.

I eyed him skeptically.

"So where'd we land on whether or not I have power of expulsion from the faith again?" I finally asked crow-Andronike.

"No," she replied.

"Maybe," crow-Komena said at the same time.

The two crow-shaped slivers of Sve Noc turned to glare at each other.

"There can be no-" crow-Andronike began.

"It is necessary that-" her sister interrupted.

I smothered a grin, though not quite well enough. Both turned their glares towards me. That was never going to get old, was it? A heartbeat later I was yelping as a pair of godly crows started flapping around my hair and pecking vengefully at my scalp, though I valiantly managed to shoo them away with only minimal loss of dignity. The two of them flew off, possibly off to torment some poor luckless rabbit. Made of Night as they were they hardly needed to eat, though that certainly hadn't stopped them from toying with the animals they came across. Amusement bled out of me a moment later and I turned my eyes to Rumena.

"Report," I ordered.

It did not bow, not that I'd expected it to.

"The town has been seized," the old drow said.

"Casualties?" I asked.

"Seventeen wounded, no dead," General Rumena mildly said. "Some stubborn souls insisted on resisting confinement."

I chewed on my lip. Too much to hope for this to be entirely bloodless, I supposed. I'd tell Akua to have the wounds healed if she could. And if the people were willing to take healing from the likes of us which was less than certain.

"No priests?" I asked.

"None resided within. There is a moan-haste-ree to the north where servants of the Pale Gods hold court, but they only visit infrequently," the old drow said.

"Monastery," I corrected absent-mindedly. "Good, that would have complicated things."

Priests tended to frown upon dark hordes beholden to eldritch horrors of the night strolling into their backyard, and I'd rather not cut one's throat if I could avoid it.

"Send a sigil up to keep an eye on the monastery road," I finally said. "No blunders tonight, Rumena."

"Ah," the general mildly said. "Will you be absenting yourself, then?"

To my side Indrani shook with a suppressed laugh, the filthy traitor.

"You just wait," I grunted. "One of these days I'll talk the damned crows into letting me write your holy book and there'll be an entire hymn about how much of a prick you are."

I began the trek towards Trousseau immediately, carefully refraining from hearing Rumena's skepticism at my ability to rhyme on purpose even as Archer cheerfully waved him goodbye.

As usual, I was surrounded by insubordinate backtalk and wanton treachery.

—

There were a few houses near the centre of the town made of stone, but this wasn't one of them. I approved, truth be told. From what I'd read, large towns and cities in the Alamans parts of Procer were usually governed by an official appointed by the ruling royal – quite often some toady or relative that could be counted on to keep the coin flowing towards the principality's capital. On occasion, some wealthy landowner ended up in charge instead but given that those occasionally got ideas about who should be the local royalty that was rarer. In smaller towns and villages, though, a degree of freedom emerged. Someone needed to be in charge so the lawmen and the tax collectors would have an arm to twist, but the people were left to their own devices as to who should be picked. Trousseau should be small enough for that to apply, and that the town's mayor was living in a wooden house instead of a stone one implied wealth hadn't been why he was put in charge. Half a dozen drow bearing the mark of the Soln Sigil were keeping a sharp watch on the premise, and if the ripple I was feeling in the Night was any indication my old friend Lord Soln itself wasn't far.

It had amused the Sisters to send what little remained of the army I'd once led against them on the southern expedition. I wasn't complaining: the oaths binding us might have been broken, but they were quicker to obey my orders than most drow. The covenant under Winter had left marks that would not easily be erased. On another night I might have taken the time to flush out Soln from its hiding place and share a few words, but not this one. I had business to finish, and no inclination to delay it. As far as I was concerned, the quicker we moved on from here to undertake our campaign proper the better.

"Want me to come with?" Archer idly said.

I glanced at her, catching a glimpse of her hazelnut eyes under the hood. I read an expectation of boredom there, but still she had offered. I did not fight the flush of affection that brought out in me.

"No need," I said. "Find something to entertain yourself, I'll catch up."

She smirked.

"Bound to be at least one tavern in this dump," she mused.

"We pay for what we take," I reminded her.

"Gods," she muttered under her breath. "Between you and Akua I feel like I've joined the most ironic nunnery in Creation."

I grinned and waved her off.

"Don't get too drunk without me," I said.

She grinned back, and promised not a thing. I watched her saunter away for a moment, coat swaying behind her, but before long my gaze had returned the door in front of me and the good mood drained. The two closest drow were looking at me from the corner of their eyes and I offered a nod.

"Restrict interruption to Peerage and my own people," I spoke in Crepuscular.

"Losara Queen," one murmured back, though both bowed.

I left it at that, and knocked at the door out of habit. There was a long beat of silence, before a male voice hesitantly bid me to enter. Ah, I thought. The last people to come in would not have been so polite. I pushed open the surprisingly well-oiled door and entered. A man was standing by a brazier, my eyes lingering only long enough to note he looked only in his mid-thirties before they pressed on to take in the rest of the house. One bed, shoddy as it was, but four cots. The table was old but well-maintained, and the roughly-hewn chairs struck me as of recent make. Not much else to see, aside from wooden shelves filled with foodstuffs. When my eyes returned to the man, his face had gone ashen. His hands were still above the flames, but now they were trembling. I wiped my snow-sodden boots on the straw by the door before offering a bland smile.

"I am told your name is Leon," I said in Chantant. "And that you are mayor of Trousseau."

The man drew back as if struck. It was almost comical, given that he stood at least two feet taller than me and was built like a sandy-haired ox. Almost.

"You're the Black Queen," Leon shakily said.

"And so introductions have been seen to," I mildly said. "Take a seat."

Something like anger flickered across the man's face. Not someone used to be ordered around in his own home, was he? But even as his jaw squared, his eyes came to rest on the sword at my hip. Caution won out, and slowly he drew back a chair and sat down. Wiping my boots one last time, I limped across the floorboards and sat across from him. I could have drawn on the Night to chase away the pain for a time, but I disliked relying on that measure unless blades were out. I leaned back against the chair, the Mantle of Woe bunching up as I did, and calmly took off my leather gloves.

"I have questions to ask of you," I said.

"I am the mayor of a half-empty town," Leon replied. "What could I possibly know of import to a queen?"

His gaze was steady, I thought, and his back straight. But he'd not quite managed to hide his hands away from me, and I could see how tightly clenched his fingers were. Afraid, but trying not to show it. I wondered if he expected he'd be dead by the end of this conversation. My reputation in Procer had been less than gentle even before the entire fucking priesthood of the west had declared me Arch-heretic of the East.

"More than you think," I said. "Peddlers come through, even in a deserted town. And peddlers carry rumours."

"I put little stock in rumours," the mayor replied. "And so know little of them."

I glanced to the side, already knowing what I would find. The bed was large enough for two. Some of the cots were too small for adults. The man had a wife and children. All of which were currently under the guard of my drow in a previously house. When my gaze returned, Leon's face had grown tight. The steady gaze was gone, replaced by desperate fear.

"No merchant has passed in months," the Proceran said. "We are not a town with coin to spend. Those few of wealth have already left."

I raised an eyebrow.

"For where?" I asked.

"Iserre," he said. "Walls and safety."

I leaned forward.

"Safety from what?" I pressed.

The man grit his teeth. I could see them war on his face, fear and principle. I was, to be honest, admiring his spine. How many of my countrymen would have it in them to even hesitate answering a question, if a villain of my repute was asking it? I'd not sat in conversation with a human other than Indrani in months, and in some ways this felt fresh to me. I could see the tremor in his arm, the beading sweat on his brow. This was not a drow, I thought. I understood the shape of this one's thoughts, the milestones by which he saw the world.

"Heavens preserve me from the Enemy," the mayor of Trousseau shakily said. "Still my tongue and ward my hand, that I may give it no succour nor relief."

I slowly breathed out, studying him. I might have continued, if not for the knock on the door.

"Enter," I said.

The door opened to reveal Akua Sahelian's silhouette, and closed after she fluidly stepped in. I cocked an eyebrow, meeting her golden eyes, and she nodded. Good. She leaned back against the wall without a word and I turned to the mayor.

"Do you see the Heavens in this room, Leon?" I softly asked. "I don't. There's just us, and the consequences of our choices."

"I will not sell out my home, Black Queen," the large man said. "Not an inch, not a league."

The fear had not left, I thought. And yet he'd said it anyway.

"I hold your family," I said.

The tone was casual, as if discussing the weather. I had learned from Black that mildness could be much more disquieting than the most thunderous of wraths. Leon swallowed drily. I had not made threat, and would not need to. My name itself was a threat, these days.

"Even so," he said, tone thick with grief. "Gods, even so."

To do right, even if it cost you everything. That, at least, the Houses of Light on both sides of the border taught just the same. I thought of Amadis Milenan, then, and wondered what such a man had ever done to deserve a subject like this. Nothing. But then that was the whole point, wasn't it? That the underserving so often ruled. That there could be more heroism found in a terrified man sitting across a monster and refusing to answer a question than in an empire's worth of royal lines, or a legion of heroes.

"It's a strange thing, fear, isn't?" I said. "I have known those who rule by it. I have fought those who deny its very existence. And yet I have come no closer to understanding what splits the brave from the mad."

I met his eyes with equanimity.

"But I do know one thing, Leon of Trousseau," I said. "That knot in your stomach, right now? That part of you that keeps your back straight when death meets your gaze?"

I did not blink. Neither did he.

"That is the weight of the choice you made," I said. "Remember it, in the years to come. Learn from it, grow from it. Because one of those days you might find someone else sitting on my side of the table – and unlike me, they might not admire what you chose."

I pushed back the chair and rose to my feet, picking up my gloves and slipping them on. The mayor hesitated.

"That's all?" he said.

I smiled, thin and mirthless.

"Do you know why we praise bravery, Leon?" I said.

He did not reply. Did not dare to, I supposed, when it seemed possible he might survive our little chat after all.

"Because it surpasses our baser nature," Akua spoke from behind me, and I could feel the smile in her voice.

I could see the moment when the man understood, the anger and the sadness and the burning indignation.

"Someone talked," I gently said. "Someone always talks."

I limped back into the cold, and left him to sit in his silence.

Go vote!

We're still low on where we were before! Let's get back up there!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Skaddix

So does Akua have a body now?

Liliet

She is, at the very least, tangible.

That does not necessarily mean she's alive.

Euodiachloris

Being closer to lich than shade is still the nearest she's been to herself for a while.

Akua is well used to being tangible some distance away from that which contains her soul, after all. shrugs

Liliet

True ;u;

Huh, it's entirely plausible her soul per se is still bound to the mantle, isn't it? She had her chance to cut and run if she allowed Cat to perish against Sve Noc and took the cloak for herself, but she didn't do that.

That sounds coherent.

Skaddix

Akua seemingly has a body which I guess makes sense. She even has her eyes back since I don't think making a body and putting a soul in it would be two had for two goddesses. They probably leashed her though.

Oh how wrong they are about Masego. That is going to cause some drama. Though maybe not seems more convenience and lust.

Interesting though that they cannot call the Observatory, there should be other mages there that they can call so that really should be setting off more alarm bells. So either Masego got back and simply passively soul flayed everyone and is not taking calls or some other force decided hey while Cat is missing and Masego is in Thalassina why not attack. I mean we are missing quite a few heroes so its not inconceivable they launched an attack to take down Cat's communication hub and top non named Mages. Cat does have a more powerful army but she is also like Cordelia and Malicia lacking in Intelligence so much so she is trying to interrogate a Mayor of an insignificant town that Black decided wasn't even worth sacking.

Gunslinger

I have to wonder why the sisters cannot do the scrying for Cat. Surely they are powerful enough

IDKWhoitis

It might be that they don't know how. In the tunnels below, Scrying may be absolutely useless as it cannot penetrate the rock (its been noted several times). The Magiological advances on the over world may have never made its way into the Underdark, since Scrying seems to have had difficulty in reaching even Procer.

This is before we get to the components needed, like Sea dredged rock and other materials that aren't found in the Under dark or in Rural Procer.

Or Juniper just conscripted all the mages in the Observatory, since they weren't needed to watch out for Heroes as the cease fire/Dead King has them all busy.

Dainpdf

If technology were the issue, Akua could probably provide any advancements necessary.

Rook

Probably won't even be horrifying, considering how much fun she's currently having with the Hero bandwagon.

In her current state she's likely to pop out a bauble that only works when you hold it to your heart and truly - believe- in your friends or something.

RanVor

Completely useless, then.

Argentorum

Akua is a master of lying to everyone. Especially herself.

I'm sure it would work once before she fell over laughing at the conceit.

RanVor

No, it wouldn't if it required Cat to believe in her..

Skaddix

There is no way Juniper cripples their main scrying center and communication center willingly. Juniper values communication and intelligence gathering which is what the Observatory provides. So I find it hard to believe she left no one at all in the building. Especially since we have seen one standard imperial mage makes very little difference in any fight. Named and Higher Level Mages matter sure but Warlock has made it quite clear you either have or you don't. We saw Cordelia and Malicia so it doesn't seem like they ordered an attack which limits the options to Masego or Hero Action...could be League of Free Cities or Dead King but the last two are more stretches.

IDKWhoitis

I could see Juniper reducing the number of Mages and level of Coverage. Sends maybe 50% of mages for field training and diverts focus from Counter Intelligence in Callow to Active Scrying on the Callow/Praesi border.

Theres also the White Caps, so there no guarantee that a fully staffed Observatory could get coverage over the mountains.

theothin

Could be just that its current levels of staffing aren't enough to reach any place Cat has been recently, with all the stuff in the way.

And we don't know what exactly she's been dealing with back home.

Dainpdf

Might not be a question of raw power; the Observatory used the sympathetic link of Winter water as a medium. Maybe the Night takeover ruined it, but I'm betting something more sinister is afoot.

Andrew Mitchell

That makes a lot of sense.

medailyfun

why do they even need scrying when they can send a messenger by Night gate

Dainpdf

That's a good question. Perhaps a Drow messenger wouldn't work, though. They don't know the geography of Callow and they might get attacked on the way. And Cat is decidedly not sending Indrani away.

magesbe

I was thinking that about the Observatory as well. Unless some property of it makes it so she can't scry it from afar without Masego being at one end, something is up.

IDKWhoitis

White Caps are probably also interfering, as the Observatory was never proven to be able to beat those traditional limitations. Last time, Cat was at least in Keter.

Skaddix

That doesn't make sense since Cat and Indrani don't mention White Cap interference as a reason they cannot call the Observatory. Especially considering they have two goddesses and Akua.

Liliet

They also don't show worry about anyone but Masego, and there's no reason to bring White Caps up if it's obvious to both of them.

White Caps mean they can only call the Observatory from Iserre if Masego is in it. They're worried that they can't because it means he isn't, and that's what they're talking about.

Dainpdf

Might be Light effery. Above has been busy.

Dainpdf

Main question is why would they know of the observatory. I suspect Masego's assistant. Perhaps at the bidding of Malicia.

Skaddix

??? I don't think its grand secret that Masego raised a Mage's Tower. Malicia officially and publicly had to approve it. Its also has protections sure but its not invisible to the naked eye.

Dainpdf

Yes, but what it is used for is a secret. A random mage's tower is not that appealing a target – its likely heavily defended, and operations in it are likely to be both costly and have unpredictable effects.

Liliet

What does Masego's mage tower have to do with this? That's in Marchford. The Observatory is in the palace in Laure. Nowhere near each other.

And yes, this does imply Masego abandoned his highly coveted mage tower in favor of a new shiny bauble the minute Catherine gave it to him. Sounds like him, to me.

Fuodiachloris

I think it is more Massego. It is his, and it's probably tied to him in a number of ways. And... he's gone a little Lovecraftian for now. It's probably left a dent.

danh3107

Rumena and Soln are still alive, that's pretty sweet. I wonder if that Berserker guy is still alive as well.

Also,

Two ravens? Come on hunin and munin you can be a bit more creative

Dainpdf

Who needs creativity when you're a goddess? Also, quick! Someone, put out one of Cat's eyes so she can play at being Odin.

Considering Larat was the prince of Nightfall, I foresee a very specific outcome of his deal with Cat.

ChillyPepper

I was feeling like a madman with no one bringing this up. 😊

Gunslinger

The return of the Guide warms my cold heart. Blessed Indrani alive and sleeping with Cat. Rumena still being the best Sasser.

>Between you and Akua I feel like I've joined the most ironic nunnery in Creation."

And Akua shaping up to be best hero

Dainpdf

But the Grey Pilgrim...

Liliet

But Hanno!

Lavir

But the Saint of Swords,

Argentorum

But Champion!

Liliet

I AMEND MY PREVIOUS OPINION IN FAVOR OF YOURS

RanVor

But Amadeus! 😊

Liliet

he's not one yet. We'll see how he ranks when it happens 😊

RanVor

Well, I know, and I hope it will be never. But I couldn't resist the temptation to spoof this prediction.

Liliet

You're welcome.

Fan

Wooooo making my day, thanks!

magesbe

So much amazing. Catherine is as great as ever, her interactions with Sve Noc is hilarious, and Rumena is still the best Drow around. A little surprised that Ivah hasn't been mentioned. I had thought he'd remain a part of her inner circle, but I guess he's been demoted.

On other news, I'm worried about Masego. I hope he doesn't do something rash.

SilverDargon

Rash, what a fun word. In this case it may be insufficient though. When I imagine Masego's next steps after having seen both the deaths of his parents, an ocean of blood, and the actual face of a god, words like "Unhinged" or "Demented" come to mind.

Suffice to say he is well beyond rash at this point and I just can't wait to see what kind of awesome he unleashes on the world next.

Dainpdf

Give him a little credit. He's not so fragile as to completely break from a couple of deaths (though I will buy scarred).

Dainpdf

Ivah is likely not powerful enough to merit too high a station in the presence of the likes of Rumena.

Skaddix

All I will say is it doesn't really bode well for Cat's Precious Liesse Accords since what got his parents killed the Grand Alliance and Crusade from Cordelia. Now sure Masego might rage against the Gods but Procer is a far easier target to test his powers on and reek bloody vengeance on.

TeK

He's not stupid.

caoimhinh

He is more likely to aim his anger at the Thalassocracy of Ashur, since they were the ones who invaded Thalassina and caused Wekesa's death.

Ashur has long since being hinted to be a hated country as they have forced a monopoly of maritime trade and they have a harsh caste system (the tiers) that treats the people on low levels like trash.

theothin

The easiest target to take vengeance on is Praes for pulling his family into their politics. Which doesn't seem odds with the Accords.

Author Unknown

Rash? Masego would never! The ruin he inflicts upon the world will be meticulously calculated. Granted there might need to be some experimentation, but only for the sake of improving efficiency.

Andrew Mitchell

We don't know if Ivah survived. It seems like most of Catherine's drow army did not.

soonnandnaanssoon

Devil May Cry

Dainpdf

Poor Leon. He picked the socially optimal choice for this Prisoner's Dilemma, but someone else chose the selfish way out.

And yay for mortal Cat again! She didn't break the man's spine. I respect that.

Also, crow-goddess baiting sounds like a great game.

Rook

Honestly it turned out about as well for Leon as it possibly could. Kept his Heroic backbone in front of the current generation of boogeyman and got a lesson in why you don't be brave without being smart; all without his wife and kids tragically perishing. Or even being maimed a little.

Not that there was any real chance Catherine would've followed up on her threat in the first place, considering a senselessly murdered family is about as obvious a setup for a grim avenging Hero as it gets. But hey, it's the thought that counts.

Dainpdf

Good old Machiavelli: "never offend a man you don't intend to kill". Also, Fakerine would have definitely either broken the man or killed his family. She'd have been all grim and sorrowful about it, but she'd have done it.

onedollargum

Fakerine? Isn't she more "real" than she was before though?

Dainpdf

Fakerine was the Sovereign of Moonless Nights. She's gone now.

RanVor

Honestly, I don't think Winter Cat would do it either.

Dainpdf

She planned to enslave an entire people, release the King of the Dead on Procer... I don't know, that sounds to me like someone capable of murder. Also, recall her interaction with Lady Ime over scrying.

RanVor

I think you're misjudging the Sovereign of Moonless Nights pretty badly here. Of course, you arrive to your conclusions by taking things out of context, so it's pretty much expected. It's very much not about being able to do anything. Every single atrocity perpetrated by the Sovereign of Moonless Nights have been out of perceived necessity. She may have been ruthless, but never without reason. Sure, she could kill that man, but there'd be no point. That would be just another senseless casualty, and she did go out of her way to avoid those, as you choose not to remember.

Dainpdf

It is easier to perceive necessity when one has fewer compunctions about the act in question. In any case, I believe Fakerine more likely to prey on the man's fear and break him rather than kill his family as punishment.

However, if the situation arose, she could very well go into thought about the importance of keeping up one's threats, so as to not diminish their value. Cat said what kept her from doing it was admiration of the man's bravery. When did we see something like that from grim Fakerine?

RanVor

Since I disagree with the preexisting assumption you base your entire reasoning on, I refuse to engage into this pointless debate that would inevitably lead us nowhere.

Liliet

I don't agree with the term Fakerine, but I do agree with your estimation of her likely actions. She'd have gone farther with the man with fewer brakes, even though she probably wouldn't have killed his family for real.

Liliet

Leon's stand was kind of stupid to begin with, given Catherine wasn't asking for classified military intelligence or anything like that, just local news. There's no harm in giving them to her for many reasons starting with her being able to obtain them in 1000 other ways.

It wasn't pointless though: it was a question if his personal morals and backbone and bravery, and I think Catherine recognized that.

It was interesting to see.

Dainpdf

One assumes when the villain is asking things, she'll be using them for nefarious purpose.

Also, answering her would have meant giving her news of Black, and withholding such news from her might very well make a difference.

...plus, religion (especially the kind that is sold in Creation) does not often breed nuanced thinking.

Liliet

I'd say it's absolute terror that doesn't breed nuanced thinking.

Raiseth

Aaaaand the purpose of this whole spectacle was what, O Mighty Queen?

Mmm.

To find out what kind of person ran the town, I guess, but I can't see why it'd relevant to her in any case, unless she suddenly decided to permanently occupy the town...

Huh. It looks like instead of meeting the Dead King head on, Catherine is going to march to Salia with "friendly reinforcements, to be deployed at her Princeship's convenience", or else. First Prince is gonna be so glad.

RoflCat

To get information.

She basically split the people likely to have useful information around, then individually interrogate them (Akua being one of them or is in charge of the rest of the interrogations)

The Mayor kept to his belief and kept quiet, but someone else spoke.

Likely his own wife, when presented with the "I have your child" threat, that's why the man went through a lot of emotions upon realizing that.

Author Unknown

I don't see why his wife would be more likely than anyone else. These aren't soldiers; this is a village so safe it doesn't even have walls. And most of the people there probably have very little, if any loyalty to procer. That's assuming the person offering the information even realized the import of what they are saying. To them, the other side of the kingdom may as well be the moon. Moreover, people, or at least ill educated people, from small towns have a rather myopic view of the world.

Sol Invictus

because of drama. this is a world where stories shaped the world.

Liliet

I don't think that applies to individual non-Named.

Liliet

I'd say the primary purpose is to leave behind news of where she is and what she's doing.

Rook

More importantly, it's a layer of protection. Karmic retribution is a pretty scary Above-themed weapon in a world where tropes are life and death. On the flip side, the opposite holds equally true.

The Senseless Killer almost always gets their comeuppance by some side effect of their history.

The Honorable Boogeyman that is surprisingly decent to normal folk though? They tend to find a lot more success. Sometimes even surviving or accomplishing their goal.

The best part is they don't even have to be a decent person. Just by being caricaturized as a total loon but turning out to be polite, respectable, and reasonable (but still evil), you automatically get points just for being so far above the incredibly low bar that was initially set.

Liliet

Good point ;u;

And Cat would be looking to establish this reputation for more immediately political purposes, too.

Politics and narrative have a lot in common: they're both about presentation and PR. The difference is just that one of them doesn't need actual other people to be informed of what is going on.

Rook

That's true as well. Sometimes rumors travel farther than any messenger, and it's a lot harder for leadership to stir up the common people against a villain when said villain is known to avoid harming commoners.

Liliet

Mm!

Liliet

You know what this made me think about? Queen's Gambit, and that one guy faced with the decision to obey his orders or commit treason. I feel like the reputation the Legions have established for not messing with civilians (and the lovely touch of the surrender demand clarifying that even in the even they take the city by force they'll only kill every armed person) that swayed him towards the decision he settled on (even though it didn't end up relevant)

IDKWhoitis

Cat, Crows, and Woe, Oh my.

thisismyName

First Under the Night = FUN!

Pronounceable, and oddly appropriate in comparison to her previous state.

Andrew Mitchell

Well spotted!

randodude

i might have been misreading some parts, but the implications that our little pair of ravens can read cat mind at will is rather horrifying.

twice, one with mighty/genreal Rumena and once with the bird/fake bird

Liliet

I mean, they're goddesses. That seems par for the course.

I love the touches of how Cat got them to fight and then they pecked at her in retaliation when they realized what she did and of Komena complaining and getting sass in response

Cat is Cat ♥

randodude

cat sass is so strong it's affecting her patron goddess's

Euodiachloris

I don't think they really mind underneath all the bickering: they've admitted to having needed this shake-up for centuries. 😊

Liliet

I love how Komena is the one more indignant at Cat's shit, but also the one arguing in favor of her getting more power/authority

caoimhinh

I wanted a longer chapter or one that showed more, but this one was interesting in its own way displaying the new dynamics and power-relations between Cat and the Night. I look forward to her finding out everything that has happened in the half-year of her absence.

Also, Indrani is good and kicking, cool. Shared bed more than once, eh? with Cat being all addicted to mortal's sensory pleasures, that's to be expected, I guess hahaha.

Typos found:

- It's fine as fine as long as I don't expect
- what's happening to will have trickled into here
- which unfair in so many ways
- under the guard of my drow in a previously house

Liliet

Why wouldn't they, really?

And I love the touch of them both being super worried about Masego but Indrani being the one to comfort Cat ♥ his girlfriend and his cousin (who is also his girlfriend's girlfriend)

oliverwashere

Some typos:

I hadn't hear anything.

hear > heard

than an army of fifty thousand than > that and result in a vague notion result > resulted up the neck in some hidden library, up the > up to the out thin air > out of thin air which unfair > which was unfair returned the door > returned to the door as it discussing > as if discussing fear, isn't? > fear, isn't it?

plantsbeans

> You think rumours about what's happening to will have trickled into here?" Indrani asked, glancing at me.

to Masego?

Javvies

Hmmm.

I don't get why the mayor was so opposed to talking to Cat about rumours – there's no way that the rumors he has are sufficiently current or contain high level information or secrets. That is not the hill I'd have thought he would choose to die on – she's basically asking for common information that she could get from literally anyone.

That they can't get in contact with the Observatory is absolutely a bad sign ... though if I understand the timing properly, Masego should have made it back some time ago, relative to Cat returning to the surface with the drow in her wake.

Compy

In regards to the mayor not talking – he has principles. "Im a leader of a town in a capital G Good nation, anything I tell the Black Queen will give her something to use against the people of Procer, therefore no matter the question I must give her nothing, even in the face of death or worse.

luminiousblu

I mean it's not really such an odd stance in the context of the minions of the Big Bad Evil Guy (arguably Catherine IS said BBEG) vs. a Good mayor of a failing town
You could get the information from anyone, and anyone doesn't include men of valour and so on.

Javvies

Eh ... it's the sort of information that someone could pick up after spending some time and money in a local tavern or bar. Common knowledge really isn't the sort of thing you risk much in trying to keep a secret.

Unless you're expecting that the messenger might get killed or something, then you might gamble that keeping your mouth shut is going to be less bad than being the bearer of bad news.

Hell – if Cat had someone capable of subtle social infiltration with her, she literally could have sent them to with some money to a bar to ask about rumors and learned everything she asked the mayor about.

TeK

Unfortunately she only has drow, an Arch-Heretic of the East, a she-ghost, and the worst of them all – Archer.

Euodiachloris

You forgot her long-time companion and friend... sardonic humour. 😊

luminiousblu

It's less about how effective it'd be and more about just not talking to her on principle. Is it absurdly stupid? Yes, but that's where principle gets you...

Liliet

Mm!

There's a reason Catherine didn't just dismiss him as stupid. She understands the value of doing stupid things sometimes, just because you feel like you have to.

crysjal

We confirmed they reproduce, not that they have penises.

RanVor

That's not true. We do know for sure that the Mighty Bogdan had one.

Skaddix

I mean the fact the Black Queen rolled into town with a Drow Army and is asking you questions as the Mayor of small town that wasn't worth her mentor, Black sacking. Tells said Mayor that Cat doesn't actually know anything. If she did know anything about the ley of the land, why would she come to you? He is on the Side of Good, she is on the Side of Evil. Ergo he thinks any information he gives her will be used against Procer and the Grand Alliance and the Crusade.

Cat really probably should gone home first and regrouped I think that is a tactical mistake quite frankly. Especially since she cannot get in contact with the Observatory.

Argentorum

Remember though, she knows that Black is taken captive and I'm pretty sure she either knows or suspects he's going to be in Salia. There's no time to go to Callow, regroup, night gate again, regroup and then save Black.

In the real world, the extra time might not matter. But the price we pay for instantaneous travel in this setting is Narativium.

To top it off, remember, the Drow are marching north to fight the Dead King. That they most certainly have to get to ASAP, and black, of course, still has to be rescued beforehand. Though, I love thinking about the expression on Cordelia's face when she realized that Cat is going to save her home when she could not, would not, do it herself.

Liliet

She doesn't know about Black being captive. The latest news she has is that he was with the Legions.

werafdsaew

It took the Woes about 3 weeks to travel from Northern Callow to Keter. Traveling back to Laure would have probably taken at least a month.

TeK

I think from him it's more akin to Ukrainian village leader telling Nazi officer during WW2 what he knows "about rumors". Chances are, he would rather try to murder him with kitchen axe, then accidentally provide him with crucial information.

Liliet

Mhm!

Not likely to be effective, but makes the difference in making the entire land hostile to them.

Well, except for the collaborators 😊 good thing Catherine isn't actually fantasy Hitler, despite having the reputation of one 😊

😊😊😊

😊😊😊

Liliet

He was too scared of her to think straight.

His response to fear was to dig his heels in and do the exact opposite thing.

Reminds me of Cat staring down Black during their first meeting, just because he was trying to scare her ;u;
(that one was less stupid, but the basic principle is the same)

Aston Whiteman

Cat still remains completely insane even according to gods.

For acting like she's living in a story.

Priest Cat!!

RanVor

So Mighty Sass is General Sass now...

I'm surprised that the Peerage hasn't been dissolved when Cat lost Winter.

TeK

Why would it be dissolved, it just changed hands.

Sugar Roll

In this chapter, Cat doesn't know yet that the League's army is in the area. I reckon she'll find out soon from this village and maybe we'll get to see her having a face to face with the Heirarch and the Tyrant.

TeK

"Moan-haste-ree"

How suprisingly accurate. All three in fact.

Aotrs Commander

See, this is why I don't buy Cat being under the influence of Winter and not her own control. Five minutes in and she's already corrupting two goddesses, what chance would poor, innocent Winter stand against that?

Cap'n Smurfy

Centuries old and Mighty Rumena still has the sassiest sense of humour. They continue to be Best Drow.

Zaver SaintCloud

Just spitballing here; How would a hymn about Mighty Rumena being a prick actually begin?

Yeah

The mighty lord of shadows deep blessed by darkness shags poor sheep.

Oh woe thy land for it is lost to rumena of the permafrost.

crysjal

The Mighty Rumena, was such a prick. Which is odd as his species has no dick.

Liliet

We actually know it does, thanks to Mighty Bogdan.

It just doesn't translate to gender.

Adrian_V

They do have, they are just really asexual or at least not as horny as we humans.....it would be funny if Cat refound appreciation of her sex life makes it seem like she is a seaxual beasts to the drow....then they spread these rumours until they grow and give her a reputation as a virgin killer or something xD

Nimmo0110

There one was a drow from the ever dark
And that he did was ever stark ...

Although I think the ever dark is the dnd term for the under ground drow nation

Liliet

that was Underdark I think

C_B

There once was a Drow named Rumena...

TwilightGlimmer

Cat needs to convert Robber and assign him the hallowed task of penning hymns for the faith

Adrian_V

I love it, its almost cute how Cat marvels at the small things and how appreciative she is of them, is like she realizes she got a second chance is not going to waste it, also so far the whole thing with Sve and the night seems like a good deal, i loved the crows and if later on Cat gets an eyepatch i am naming her She-Odin xD

As for the future i had this impression that Cat will somehow end up saving the Lycanoesse, maybe even move Green's army there, it would be a great move: she proves her intentions, does something good in a real sense not the "good" above interprets, and may even wrest control or the loyalty of those provinces for callow, at least they will probably remember who stood with them in their hour of need instead of leaving them to die as a buffer.

Feel free to ignore this or not even read it, but if you have free time on your hands you could really help me, this <https://freebitco.in/?r=17541850> and this <https://btcclicks.com/?r=c3fc9fc5> are referral links to 2 PTC/faucet for bitcoins, they are completely safe, those 2 are some of the oldest and famous of their like (They are freebitcoins and BTC clicks respectively if you want to google them for more info). They provide a completely free way to earn bitcoins with a simple click. What are referral links? It means that by creating an account with those links provided i get a commission from every click/action you do to earn bitcoins (40%). Why am i posting this? well i live in venezuela, to say the crisis is killing us is too little, for many of you using these is way too slow but for me even a single dolar could be the difference with being able to pay my college and graduate, or even eat 3 meals. So if you create an account and use it even just 1 day, or 1 time per day when you remember you would really help me survive here.

Apologies to Erraticerrata for this but i don't exaggerate when i say i am growing scared and desperate with how things are developing here.

Liliet

Cat being appreciative of small things is something that really drives home the difference Winter made. It's what makes her POV such a joy to read right now, and provides so much contrast to the depressed tone it had before.

The warmth of Indrani's hand, the drow's collective marvel at snow, the return of The Height Indignance (not that this ever really went away ;u;), the admiration of a common person's mundane heroism, the considerations of whether or not she should use Night to quell pain in her leg – all of those things.

And of course, wanton treachery and insubordinate backtalk ;u;

Adrian V

Yeah, what i like more is that Erraticerrata is not being ambiguous at all, those are clearly portrayed as virtues and advantages, mostly her ability to adapt and better comprehend about everything from people to their motivations. Like to really understand things she needs to be able to feel all of that, in fact i can see how the experience with winter helped her since she still remembers how she felt and acted so she can also draw on those experiences.

On another note next time i will try to stay awake and post earlier, hopefully more people see the second part of whatever i comment (and i mean second part, if i don't have anything important related tot he chapter i won't post, that would be insulting to the author, or at least i think so) yeah!

Liliet

♥

Mikasi

I wish I could think of someone to commission to get a picture of First Under Night Cat with crows on her shoulders and a night gate behind her. Because that is an EXCELLENT image in my head.

Liliet

Look on reddit for cool fanartists. There are people!

imagesbe

So is "First Under Night" a Name, or just a title like Black Queen?

AdrianGrey

Just a title. But I expect Cat will be getting a Name by the end of this book. It made sense for her not to have one when she was the not-really-human Sovereign of Moonless Nights, but now that she's mortal again I expect it's high time for her to be re-incorporated into Creation's Story.

Sugar Roll

I think she transitioned to the Black Knight already which is the reason why Amadeus lost it.

TeK

Doubt it. She was not a Squire, and Black is Praesi name. You don't get it by reforming eldritch gods.

Yotz

Indeed. From the exchange between Black and Bard we can gather – under the certain assumptions – that the Name of Black Knight is now free to be claimed. Cat's old claims were devoured by Winter with the remains of her old Name, so in order to become the new Knight she had to make a new claim first. Which would be probable course if she either knew what happened to Black; or was tasting waters, so to speak, by making claims each arbitrary period of time to see if it sticks.

As to possibility of her claiming a Name – this ties closely with the theology behind the New Gods. So far all the Names were Bestowed by either side of the original Players; now we see rise of the new generation – The Undeath, The Instigator, The Night... possibly, The Will of the People.

With current trends charted, Cat have little to no chance to be Bestowed by ye Aulde Gawds; what remains to be seen then, is if the NKOTB would be able to grant a Name – not necessary to Cat, only to Cat, or to Cat first.

Liliet

I don't think Names are bestowed by Gods.

I think they're bestowed by the narrative, which is why Neutral names like Thief exist – neither Above nor Below actually need to approve of a Name being created/claimed. They might have some influence over names that are, like, ABOUT being a servant to Above/Below, and of course there are the Choirs, but I think even those are both restricted to people who've already chosen the path leading them to the Choirs (William fled to the woods to scream before he met the angel), and kind of have to bestow power on those – as evidenced by Cat forcing the resurrection out of them. They tried to push her into claiming another Name. They didn't succeed.

The Above and Below have set up a system, and while they sure can give little nudges here and there, most of their participation in the world is automatic in a way, like priests calling on their power and Below'd debts being called in. They obey their own rules, and they aim for mortals to determine the wager on their own. That's possibly why Intercessor is the way she is: even as a tool of the Gods, she still has her own free will, and not the broken obedient kind, the Named fuck-you-I-do-what-I-want kind.

And I think Cat already has a new Name. She's too much of a Named to not have one, and unlike Amadeus who'd been basically doing nothing since his defeat until we saw him, not laying claim to anything because of not pushing events around in anyw ay, Catherine is an active player. She's already a Named, I don't think one can lose this status so easily. There's a reason Squire sort of stuck around even after being mostly obliterated by the aborted transition into Black Queen: there's inertia to those things.

Catherine has a Name, I'm certain of it.

What it is, though, can be straightforward and logical... like Priestess... or it can be anything but 0.0

Yotz

Well, even if the system is automated to that point – of which I am unsure – Names still do have a source: like Dichromatic Knights being clearly linked with Above/Below, with their own sets of abilities and limitations. That doesn't preclude Bestowed/Whatever-is-the-analogue-term-for-Below-'cause-I-can't-remember-it-for-the-sake-of-Saint-Phuk from having a free will: Black laid a claim, he was granted with a Name, he didn't excel in usual mindless carnage correlated with the Name, ergo his Name became weak. Just as it was with Cat while she was a Squire. So, the jury is in debate on this one.

What I was implying, though, is the consequences of the Apotheosis among the native denizens of the Creation: in essentiality, NPCs of the sandbox evolving into Players... well, in the case of Bard that would be a transition of PC into Player – but regardless.

In becoming the Third Side in the Game they may serve as another, new source of Names, be the process of Bestowal so to say “manual”, or automated. Come to think of it, with the deep automation in place, a new class of Names coming from the new source may come into reality much more easily – simply as a byproduct of the System.

In short, Cat can haz a Naem, of course; but if it is indeed so – in if it is, the Name of what nature... we shall see.

PS: And as in regard to “Players” – I consider only individual entities from Above/Below to bear that status. Even if Creation is a multiplayer openworld sandbox, Players are by definition outside of the Game. That’s the reason of them being so anxious about Neshamah – they didn’t want him to escape from localized server cluster into the big Net.

Liliet

yeah, I think the point is that the mortals are Players, and the Above/Below are the DMs. I think that’s a more accurate description. And apotheosis makes you a more powerful / more permanent player, but never a DM.

Mental Mouse

I agree with Liliet that Names ultimately come from the Narrative, but I’ll strengthen her qualification: Once a Name has been established as specifically Good/Evil (or perhaps more strongly as Holy/Damned), the respective gods can bestow that name.

But we’ve already seen that fae titles closely resemble mortal Names, so I’d assume that Night titles are now also comparable, especially since Night absorbed most of Winter. And Cat is now High Priestess of Night, so that’s her place in the Narrative.

Interestingly, it would seem that the Dead King does not have the power to grant comparable distinctions, or we’d surely have met some of them in Keter. He may not be as much a god as he thinks.

Sugar Roll

My interpretation is that the Squire Name was suppressed by Winter before. When Winter was removed, she was back to the Squire.

The conversation (quoted below) between Catherine and Sve Noc posing as Hakram feels like the moment of transition to me. Together with the fact that Amadeus lost his Name at roughly the same time convinced me of this. Shouldn't be long now until we know for sure.

"I should never have been queen," I said. "At most a temporary regent while looking for a better candidate. There are things I'm good at, but ruling isn't one of them. I should have put my effort to those instead and left the crown to someone suited for it."

"And what it is that you're good at, if not this?" Hakram pressed.

"Breaking things," I said. "Facing the monsters so that the real work can take place behind me."

Yotz

Mebbe, mebbe.

I'd have to re-read some parts to either agree or disagree with you conclusively.

Which would be sometime after I sate my thirst for literary excesses and/or graphomaniac tendencies. Which is to say – not in this century, it seems //sadface.

Either way, you are on the point that will know for sure soon enough.

Lucas

Also don't think so, but it's at least a good reason for Amadeus being nameless.

Although we don't know if he actually lost it, only that he doesn't have it right now. And we also don't know if it was all willing or not

Allafterme

I wish EE introduced Names with both in capital and in bold, so people would finally stop treating every introduced title as a Name.

Andrew Mitchell

It's so, so, SO good to have the Guide back again. 😊

Especially the sas:

> "Caw," the crow on my left shoulder drily said.

>

> The word, not actual cawing, because Andronike had developed a taste for the sardonic since shaving off a sliver of her godhood and sending it off with me.

Yotz

So, the Two-Faced Goddess of Night Everlasting rules over the shadows of any kind.

Akua Sahelian is a shade.

Therefore I hereby pronounce her to be the First among the Seraphs of The Night.

Saktiwijayarahman

Let me take a second to admire Leon of Trosseau balls. Dammit, the balls of steel indeed.

Chapter 2: Stirrings

"Everything happens for a reason, and this time the reason is that I godsdamned said so."

– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

I let Akua trail behind me as we walked through the half-frozen mud.

Archer hadn't been wrong, I thought, to call this place a shithole. But where she likely saw it as sloppiness on their part, a refusal to pull up their sleeves and improve their own lot, to me Trousseau reeked of desperation. Too many hard years, too many taxmen more interested in their tallies than what those cost to the people who made up the numbers. I didn't like it, that she thought that way. I could admit that to myself. There were times where her indifference to the lot of others galled me deeply, because it ran against what I'd been raised to – that when it got dark outside, everyone was in it together. I'd learned, though, to follow that somewhat callous belief to its source. The Ranger. I'd loved the stories about Indrani's mentor as a child, certainly more than those about the Calamities. After all she'd been absent for most the Conquest, and unlike the others she wasn't Praesi. The last specks of that childhood fondness had waned when she'd answered an offer a help by nearly murdering me on a whim. What Black saw in her I didn't know and doubted I would ever understand, but I could make my peace with that. What she'd done to Indrani, though? That was another story.

She'd taught Archer that her fate would only ever be defined by her own hands, and that I could only approve of, but she'd left the lesson half-finished. She'd never told my friend that she was exceptional, that not everybody could be like her. That sometimes people failed and gave up, and that didn't make them unworthy in some way. Just tired and hurt and without an answer as to why they should keep trying. It was an easier way to live, I supposed. Looking a misery and believing it was the miserable solely responsible for it. Never aching at the sight. But I don't think it's a better one, I thought. Maybe it was unfair to blame the Lady of the Lake for passing down beliefs she seemed to genuinely hold to, but I wasn't inclined to fairness when it came to the Ranger. She had her claws too deep in too many people I loved, and I could only think of the marks she'd left behind as wounds.

"I don't suppose we have a destination in mind?" Akua mildly said.

She'd caught up to me while I was deep in thought. I could not help but notice from the corner of my eye that her dress of pale and gold was untouched by the mire we were passing through, or that she left no footprints. Not quite alive, not quite dead. As in so many things, Akua Sahelian was straddling the line.

"There's a knot of drow further down the street," I replied. "And I could only think of one reason so many would gather in one place."

The shade kept to silence for a moment.

"She has been getting more rowdy, not less," Akua finally said.

Even with the wind that had me wishing I'd wheedled a scarf out of the drow before leaving, her voice was perfectly heard. Couldn't be sure whether that was just an oratory skill she'd picked up in Wolof or some kind of sorcerous trick, not that I cared all that much. Convenient was the word that came to mind more than anything else.

"We all cope in our own ways," I replied. "It'll run its course in due time."

Indrani had come very close to dying, in the battle for Great Strycht. Not because of a Mighty, some glorious duel she would now be laughing about. When the Sisters had eviscerated my hold on Winter they'd flooded their city with frost. Archer had been out on the edges, when it happened, picking her targets and stirring up the pot. But she'd still been caught in the mess, and Winter unleashed was not something you just walked off. I suspected that in way the brush with death wasn't what had unsettled her. She'd been riding that horse for years now, and enjoyed every moment of it. It had been that when death came knocking, the bow in her hand and the blades at her side couldn't have done anything to stop it. The realization that sometimes a steady sword-arm wasn't enough, even if you were clever and brave and burning with the need to leave a mark on the world.

"And if it doesn't?" Akua said.

"Then we'll deal with it," I calmly replied. "All of us, together."

The shade sighed.

"I don't suppose that a reminder you've not spoken with our informant would be of any use before we get entangled in yet another drinking binge?" she asked.

I glanced at her amusedly.

"Are we pretending you can't recite every answer they gave you verbatim?" I said.

"I can do the intonations as well," Akua casually boasted.

"Of course you can," I said, rolling my eyes.

I didn't bother to knock when we got to the tavern, or at least what I assumed to be that. It was ratty enough it didn't have a sign hung outside, though I did remember reading somewhere some parts of Procer had put a tax on that. I'd be in a better position to cast judgement on that if some Fairfax who'd seen drinking liquor as sinful and debasing behaviour hadn't put up a bewildering array of punitive taxes on everything alcoholic not even a century ago. Still, I thought, eyeing the bare and windowless wall outside. At least the next king dismissed the measures. For all I knew, some prince out there was still lining his pockets with this sheer stupidity. The door was unlatched and the mangled carpet in front of it suffered the attentions of my boots for a moment before I entered. Calling what lay at the centre of the dirt floor a fire pit would have been overly generous, I thought, considering it wasn't even lined with stone. The place was cramped in some fundamental way, from the narrow walls to the twisty tables. There was a room in the back which I deduced to be the owner's sleeping place as well as the kitchen, insofar as this place could be said to have one of those.

Akua closed the door behind me, and already Indrani was waving us over. She'd shrugged off her coat and somehow divested herself of her mail, leaving her in dark green tunic and trousers whose tightness were quite flattering to her frame. I glanced back up and saw a smirk touching her lips, so she'd definitely caught that. Well, I admitted to myself, it wouldn't be the first time. Or likely the last, honesty compelled me to admit. The return to mortality had left me with all sorts of hungers in need of sating, and I probably would have sought her out if she hadn't done it first. I was only human after all, and even now that thought had a pleasurable ring to it. I shot a look around and found no trace of the tavern-keeper, turning to raise an eyebrow at Indrani.

"It got a little too much for the old man," Archer languidly shrugged. "Got some of our minions to bring him somewhere for a lie-down."

"You didn't do anything, did you?" I asked, frowning even as I took off my gloves.

"Aside from empty a bottle in the short span of time since you've found this place," Akua drily added.

My eyes found the cheap bottle of red she was referring to, along with her four still-full sisters lined up neatly to the side. One was already open. The shade passed me without a sound, sliding herself in a stool across the table Archer had claimed. I unclasped my cloak and followed suit, hesitating for the barest fraction of a moment before sitting on Akua's side. The stool there struck me as marginally less likely to break if I moved around a bit.

"Just a bit too much agitation for him, I think," Indrani told me. "What with the drow walking the surface again and the wicked minions of the Black Queen patronizing his humble establishment."

Akua's own comment got as a response a gesture that would have seen me spanked by the orphanage matron if I'd ever been caught doing it in public.

"Temporary eviction would have been necessary regardless," the shade said. "If we are to discuss business on the premises, that is."

"Aw, shit," Archer complained, eyeing me balefully. "Really, Cat?"

"I'd rather do it in here with a fire and an open bottle than out there in the cold," I shrugged.

"Fine," she waved away. "But I'd like to lodge a formal protest."

"Pass it along to my secretary," I drily said. "Triplicate, standard form."

Indrani turned her gaze to Akua.

"Sadly, as a mere spirit I cannot be handed such forms," the shade blatantly lied. "They'd go right through me."

"I liked you better before we taught you to be an ass," Archer complained.

"No you didn't," Akua said, full lips quirking.

Indrani did not contradict her, and neither did I. After what had taken place in Great Strycht it was... difficult to distrust the Diabolist as much as I once had. I wouldn't be taking my eye off her anytime soon, sure, but it was hard to forget that when we'd all reached the end Akua could have chosen to cut and run, and hadn't. That meant something. Given that she was perhaps the most skilled liar I'd ever met, figuring out exactly what it meant was the trouble.

"So, someone folded," I said, steering us towards safer waters. "How out of date is what they had to tell?"

"She has a relative in the monastery to the north she sees regularly," Akua said. "And the sisters there are part of the general correspondence of the House of Light, regardless of their relative insignificance. The last direct letter is a month old, one could generously assume the news themselves two weeks older than that."

I raised an eyebrow.

"That quick?" I said. "I thought we were in the middle of nowhere."

"Two day's ride away from the minor city of Rochelant, as it happens," Diabolist corrected. "To the west. In a broader sense, we are skirting the eastern edge of the principality of Iserre."

I drummed my fingers around the table, idly noting it kinda looked like someone had digested it for a bit before it'd ended up here.

"Closer to Callow than I thought we'd end up," I said. "That brings up unpleasant questions, in retrospective."

"Could just be that you traded Winter for crows, Cat," Indrani said. "You and Zeze were screwing about with the stuff for everything, back when the Observatory was raised."

"I was not given the opportunity to observe the arrangements in great detail," Akua conceded pre-emptively. "However, I am intimately familiar with the artefact used at the centre of the array. It should not have been affected by our latest alliance and its..."

She paused, golden eyes taking me in.

"Metaphysical repercussions," she settled on.

I snorted. How delicately put of her. I wasn't truly beholden to the Sisters in any way that could be considered vassalage – that would have rather defeated the point of what I was supposed to be to them – but it remained a fact I'd thrown Winter under the horse and been handed a direct tap to what had become of the Night afterwards. The power was a lot more volatile, true, and tended to exhaust me physically in a way my mantle never had. On the other hand I'd stopped going raving mad whenever I reached a little too deep and I could enjoy hot soup again. In a lot of ways, I still believed I'd ended up on the better side of that evening.

"So why aren't we able to reach Juniper, then?" I said.

"She's finally succumbed to Hakram's charms and the bedroom door is locked under pain of death," Indrani suggested.

"Sabotage is a possibility," Akua said, more practically. "The Empress will still have agents in Callow, and might prefer your communications crippled. As for why Sve Noc could not reach out directly-"

"I know, you've already said," I waved away. "Masego warded that thing so ridiculously viciously not even they want to risk putting their fingers in it."

I felt a well of pride at the fact that Hierophant had somehow put up defences around the Observatory so harsh even a pair of living goddesses were wary of attempting to force them, inconvenient as it was at the moment. And he'd done it while remaining within allocated funds, too, which was just another feather in his cap as far as I was concerned.

"Doesn't seem like Malicia's style," I finally said. "If you'd said she was listening in I'd buy it, but breaking it entirely? She prefers appropriation to outright denial when she can swing it."

"There are other possible culprits," Akua said. "More with motive than means, but a few with both. The Dead King. The heroic segment of the Tenth Crusade. The royal court of Arcadia. Perhaps even the Wandering Bard."

"That doesn't really narrow it down, does it?" I grunted. "Still, I'd tend to scratch off the Bard from the list. Black's pretty sure she can only meddle through Named, and those we sent back to Laure would know better than to get involved with her."

"Ugh, you two are yammering on about who could," Indrani said, pouring herself another cup. "But that's just means, and we got a lot of nasty surprises assuming we knew all about those. Maybe wonder about who would, instead? Whose kind of play is this?"

I eyed her cup with a raised eyebrow, and with a put-upon sigh she finally bothered to fill mine. And Akua's, though I was still less than certain if drinking would actually do anything for the shade. I sipped at what turned out to be truly horrid concoction distantly related to wine while actually mulling over what Archer had said. Who would strike like this? The Grey Pilgrim came to mind. He had the brains for it, and the benefits would be obvious. With the Augur still telling Cordelia Hasenbach how the pieces were moving, we'd have lost our eye in the sky while the Tenth Crusade remained largely unaffected. Neshamah had the know-how, but it seemed a little light-handed for him. At the moment he'd have other cats to skin anyway: he should be hip-deep in angry Lycaonese right about now, and that lot didn't know how to die easy. Assuming the Bard wasn't involved, though assumptions were particularly dangerous when it came to that thing, that left the fae. And unless someone had fucked up real bad back home, they shouldn't have a foothold in Creation that'd allow them to pull that kind of thing.

"The main benefit is confusion," I finally said. "We'll be moving blind out here, and unable to organize with Juniper."

"Someone's putting their bet on riding the chaos better than the rest," Akua murmured.

A disquieting thought, considering for once it wasn't me.

"The room's pretty crowded this time," Indrani said. "All it takes is a few punches thrown, and..."

She dropped her palm against the table, the clap ringing loudly in the empty tavern.

"In the spirit of that perspective," Diabolist said, "perhaps one of the rumours I collected needs to be reassessed."

I cocked an eyebrow invitingly while continuing to subject myself to the disaster Archer had obtained as table wine.

"We appear to be entering an all-out brawl between half the continent," Akua said. "The legions Lord Black took into the Principate are currently in this very principality, and being pursued."

My heartbeat quickened. No, I told myself. He'll have a plan. He always does.

"By who?" Indrani asked, sounding surprised. "These are Conquest officers, you're telling me Proceran scraps actually think they could win against them?"

"The armies of the Dominion of Levant," the shade replied. "Though there's been word of conscription in Salia, so they might not be alone."

"That's not half the continent," I pointed out with a frown.

"The League of Free Cities appears to have joined the fray," Diabolist said. "With a significant army, though the numbers put to it vary."

I let out a low whistle.

"Are you telling me Tenerife has fallen?" I asked. "Because that's not good news for us."

The First Prince had sent twenty thousand soldiers to hold that border, and if the army had been slaughtered then that was twenty thousand men gone that'd have been rather useful up north. The drow exodus would strike like a hammer at the Dead King's back when it arrived, but I knew better than to believe the Sisters had any chance of winning that war if the rest of Calernia didn't get its shit together and move against him too.

"I cannot speak as to what happened to the army garrisoned there," Akua said. "But I can tell you, however, that the League's host is said to have emerged out of the Waning Woods without having given battle prior."

I blinked in disbelief. Indrani, on the other hand, fell into a deep belly laugh. Gods, Vivienne had told me last year that the Tyrant of Helike had been sending agents into the region. Still, I'd assumed it was as way to infiltrate the heartlands of the Principate. Not march an army through the place.

"You're actually serious, Shadehelian?" Archer got out, chin still quivering. "Someone was mad enough to take a bunch of soldiers through that?"

"Reportedly," Akua said, unmoved by the hilarity. "One can only wonder at the losses taken. Regardless, the point of interest is that they emerged in Iserre specifically. And they seem intent on giving battle now."

"That's going to get messy," I said, rapping my knuckles against the wood. "Unless Hakram and Vivienne birthed a diplomatic miracle while we were in the Everdark, which I'm not counting on. I really don't want to start a war with the League."

"And it ties in to Indrani's earlier words," Diabolist said. "There is another who prizes chaos as you do."

My lips thinned.

"The Tyrant of Helike," I said.

She nodded slowly.

"While aside from mounting confusion I can ascribe no direct benefit to such a measure being taken-"

"- for an old school madman like him, making everything messier might be benefit enough," I grimly finished. "Shit. I don't like having an army on the field without knowing where we stand with them."

"Kind of the point, isn't it?" Indrani shrugged.

I glanced at her, noticing we were now on the third bottle even though neither I nor Akua had finished our cups.

"The uncertainty, I mean," Archer said. "It's kind of like having a stranger pointing a crossbow at you while you're in a swordfight. Every time they twitch your hackles go up, and the tension will grow until someone does something real stupid to get out of the situation."

Akua's position in her seat shifted by the barest amount. She was, I suspected, actually impressed. Now and then it was good to have a reminder that Indrani was a lot sharper than she liked to let on.

"So whoever's leading that host is fucking with every other commander on the field just by being there," I mused. "That does sound like the Tyrant from the reports. We sure the Hierarch is still alive? He seemed a lot more interested in telling me to hold elections than invading anyone."

"Our informant is simply a relative, and the monastery rather minor," Akua said. "There was only so much to be learned. I suspect the appointed ruler of Rochelant will be better informed."

That still meant at least three days – drow moved fast, but not as fast as horses – of walking around Iserre with no godsdamned idea of what was going on around us. I didn't enjoy the notion, but then I didn't really have a better path to offer. Asking the Sisters to force the wards on the Observatory, assuming I could even talk them into it, was a lot more likely to result in that place collapsing or someone losing a finger than it was in an enlightening conversation.

"Then that's where we're headed," I said. "I'll hash out the details with General Rumena. Indrani, you good to walk?"

"Am I ever not?" she drawled.

"You'd better be," I warned. "Because I'm not staying in this town a moment longer than necessary. We all know what happens to the drow at dawn, I'm not losing moonlight I don't have to."

Archer smirked.

"Would you like to race me just in case, Cat?" she said.

I snorted.

"Please," I said. "You're pretty fast, but you can't outrun a gate."

I pushed back the chair and rose to my feet.

"Catherine," Akua said quietly.

I glanced at her.

"You can come, I suppose," I said. "Though why you'd want to talk with the crabby old bastard is beyond me."

"Catherine," Akua Sahelian gently said. "Sit down."

My eyes narrowed, and I brushed back a lock of hair that somehow fallen free.

"There's more," I said.

"Cat, sit down," Indrani said. "She wouldn't ask without a reason."

I felt a flicker of surprise at Archer's comment, though maybe I shouldn't have. I'd told her everything that had happened in Great Strycht, and the barbs she still traded with Akua had a lot less bite to them than they used to. Gingerly I sat back down, keeping the weight off my bad leg.

"Marshal Grem One-Eye is in command of the retreating Legions," the shade said. "The Black Knight is believed to be dead."

I picked up my gloves, fingers closing around the leather.

"So?" I said. "All that means is that some part of whatever the Hells he's after involves people thinking that."

"Not unless he was willing to sacrifice a full Legion detachment for that purpose," Akua said.

The leather started creaking and I looked back at my hands, finding them squeezing the gloves tight.

"Was a body shown?" I asked.

She shook her head.

"Then he's not dead," I flatly said. "And someone is about to have a very bad day."

"Catherine, the possibility has to be entertained," she slowly said. "It would change the situation significantly."

"It changes nothing. Because he's not fucking dead," I snarled. "I'll take his damned head off for not warning me he'd pull this, but he's not going to get killed by some pissant hero in the middle of nowhere."

The shade opened her mouth again, but Indrani raised a hand.

"Akua," she said. "Best let that one go."

She was humouring me, I realized. It stung that Archer of all people, who besides myself and Masego likely knew the most about my teacher, would so casually write him off. Angrily I pulled on my gloves.

"Finish your drinks," I coldly said. "We'll begin the march for Rochelant within the hour."

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

I'm too lazy to tell you to vote, so just... do what you want with this link I've given you.

Maginot

But the admonition...the stern command reminding us that this in an interactive experience and we owe our part...
I always know its the end of the chapter when I see "Voter, Vote!"

Ravin

0715 UTC we are at 892....get us to a thousand ppl

NerfContessa

Well, 5hat was an interesting chapter, if not an 3xciting 9ne.

Lets see if black actually turns a new leaf... 😊

NZPIEFACE

This is the first time I'm going to be saying this in a while, but thank you so much for releasing these punctually at the same time of the day every release. It's great to sit back and relax at 6 PM while reading a chapter of PGTE, it's a brilliant way to start my evening.

caoimhinh

For me, the chapters are posted exactly at midnight.
I live in Colombia, South America.

Valkyria

Got to say the same really.
But for me, I get them in the morning and that way I can use the time on the bus way better than just sitting around waiting. And it's a really nice start into the day too.

Liliet

5 AM for me, so I just read them when I wake up.

Best way to start the day 10/10

Lucas

I get them at 4am.
Helps me wake up without hitting the snooze button. 😊

matesbe

Someone's going to have a bad day, Cat? I agree. You'll be inflicting that bad day on those who currently hold him captive.

Dainpdf

Last time we saw him, Maddie seemed inclined to cause his captors a bad day himself.

Liliet

Cat knows what's up ♥

Jake111

Oh, truly. Saint and Pilgrim are facing something so much more dangerous than the Black Queen, Harbinger of Woe, First Under the Night, Slayer of Gods and Demons.

They're facing a scared girl desperate to save her father. Now that's a story you don't want to be on the wrong side of.

Gunslinger

So much to love in this Chapter. EE answering most of the questions we had on Wednesday as well as the endless debates after book 4 ended (people who guessed cats not going to be a Sve puppet got it right)

Also touching how bother mentor and mentee both dash out the possibility of the other being dead.

> And he'd done it while remaining within allocated funds, too,
That's the true miracle there

IDKWhoitis

Black is going to slap her for dying stupidly, again.
Cat is going to punch him for trying to pull a final showdown and almost dying, again.

The reunion is going to be great.

Rook

On the other hand, she just traded raw strength for flexibility and judgement, got the entity she traded the strength to working with her anyway, and slapped Below in the face rather than playing their game. On top of that she added an entire ancient empire to her arsenal while conveniently shunting the logistics of managing the army and newfound power pool to far more capable personnel.

He'll be livid on the outside and beside himself with pride on the inside.

Liliet

Yeah, Black's going to approve of what she pulled, even if he's going to have a headache as a result.

(I mean, this frankly doesn't top First Llesse, where dying was an explicit part of the plan from the beginning, and Black was proud as fuck of her for that one)

Catherine's opinion on his antics though? 100% going to be less flattering.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think it does top it. It's one thing when you KNOW you are going to lose and factor your death into being a positive for the plan.

This time she didn't see it coming and still managed to improvise her way into something that still looks like a "Just as keikaku." That is more impressive, really.

Liliet

It tops it in terms of sheer awesome.

Doesn't top it in terms of sheer "yay let's go die", which is my point re: Amadeus getting pissed or not.

Dainpdf

Right? So many answers. So many questions.

CFAR

Did he truly stay within allocated funds, or did he supplement the official appropriation from his own/his father's personal funds?

Liliet

I mean if he's invested his own funds into Callow's infrastructure that's even more impressive ^^

IDKWhoitis

I sense Cat carrying through her promise on some level. Like a knock out blow, or trying to stab him again. But it's going to be really funny, as Black isn't as strong as he used to be, and he's going to be pissed off that Akua is still walking around in a sense.

Dainpdf

He seemed headed for a new Name, last we saw him. The fact that the Bard was egging him on was not ominous at all.

Euodiachloris

Oh, Amadeus might transition. But, just to be a burr in Bard's sock, he won't go in the direction she prepared him for – even if that was reverse psychology she was aiming at.

He'll find a way to bounce down the mountain she didn't think of. And, might take out a goat or two on the way, as well. 😊

Liliet

As much as I personally adore Amadeus on every level that exists, I think Bard's read on him is better than his read on her. And I think he knows this.

He's going to dance, dance, dance on her strings, and the best he can do is make sure he's actually doing something that's in his own interests, and not screwing himself over out of petty spite to her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not sure about that. Bard is not invincible or omnipotent. She's good. She's very good, But she can and has been beaten. I think she really did want him to become Emperor, and her read on him wasn't necessarily wrong. I think if she didn't show up, he probably would have become emperor the way he wanted him to (even if he is Benevolent as some speculate, that doesn't mean he becomes Benevolent at the RIGHT point for her purposes). He'd be playing the game again proper, and be easier to account for and eventually, move past when he went the way of all Emperors. He'd probably do it anyway just to help out his Daughter. The thing is, she's underestimating his willingness to self-mutilate just to succeed, and right now he's success is measured in part on "Fuck you Bard." He's been determined to win as a villain and "win his pissing contest with the heavens." but now I think he'd be more receptive to the Foundling school of "Be whatever works." The benevolent theory would support that, it'd be him both still mocking but also using the Heavens.

I now see a still unlikely but now possible future where Emperor Benevolent rules with Chancellor Sahelian at his side. Everybody flips their shit when a young Prasi she picked up touring the country becomes the Dread Kingdom's first WHITE Knight.

Liliet

Yeah, I don't think she underestimates that willingness, because she counted on him doing what he did at Second Liesse, and he broke his alliance with his best friend and put himself in a coma for two days.

I think Bard's planning for exactly the thing that's going to happen 😊

Nguyen Hong Hai

Also do notice that Bard can still be surprised like with Hierach or White Knight (Bard just full wtf with the guy)

Dainpdf

Well, at least that'll mean he learned from Sabah's death. Fool me once...

Javvies

Awesome starter quote.

And Cat is absolutely right, though likely understating things when she says that someone is about to have a very bad day in connection to Amadeus disappearing after a Legion died.

Tyrant of Helike versus Cat. And he's the one hitting the chaos button, not her. For now, anyways.

Cat and co will likely try to link up with Grem (and Scribe) and his Legions. That'll be interesting to see.

...

I'm seriously confused about the timing of things. Some storylines cover less (or more, depending) time than storylines that they are nominally concurrent with.

Dainpdf

Such as?

About Cat's reaction: yes, she's right, though not completely. She's right that he's alive, but wrong that it was all part of his scheme.

Liliet

I'm guessing she's still shaken after his Second Liesse play. That was not okay on any level, and it's the first thing Cat's mind goes to, after the possibility that he's actually genuinely dead. Which she can dismiss safely enough, because if he'd gotten that last stand he was hoping for, the entire Procer would know for a fact.

Ah, family.

Dainpdf

It's still a thing how she just assumes he couldn't die unintentionally. Also, during Second Liesse she was Fakerine. The emotional bond is much more real now, so she's feeling it way more. Thus the negation.

Liliet

I don't think the difference that Winter made was that strong. It changed her reaction to the trauma (I don't think mortal!Cat would have gone for stabbing, as appropriate as it was narratively lmao), not the trauma itself.

And she's sure he can't be really dead for a reason: a villain of his power and notoriety doesn't just get quietly offscreened. Everyone who knows anything at all about the Praes/Ashur front knows how Warlock went, it's not missable. And if Black had really died, it wouldn't have been a fart-out anticlimax. There's a reason he expected a last stand and called the Below "cheapskates" for being denied it. Cat's looking at larger patterns, and the writing is on the wall: he's not dead.

She's certainly oblivious of all the options in between though 😊

(Admittedly, I'm not certain of the proportion of rational analysis to pure denial in her reaction. She certainly asked if there was a body, so there was some reasoning to it, but that was the point she got stuck on, it seems: that if there's the slightest chance he's not definitely dead, she's going to act like he isn't, and fuck everything else. Ah, family)

Dainpdf

Really, Tariq could very well have killed him at some point there. Maddie lost his Name, so he was mortal enough. Also, he probably wouldn't get a final boom as large as the Warlock, who paid his dues much more faithfully.

Liliet

Yes, Tariq could have killed non-Named Maddie, but for some reason didn't. This is a story-driven universe. If Tariq's plan had been to kill him, he'd have gotten his last stand.

Not as large as Warlock's, true. But large enough that the news wouldn't sound like "well, he disappeared along with a Legion detachment getting slaughtered, so we're assuming he's probbly dead even though there's no body".

Dainpdf

Makes sense-though I am sure if anyone on the side of Good is capable of disposing of a major villain quietly, Tariq is.

Liliet

...True.

If he made that an objective, he probably could.

Insanenoodlyguy

This. Her flaw is assuming that it's all part of his plan, but she's not wrong that he's a high enough tier that no body = no death. somebody would have to have attested to seeing his unmoving soulless corpse, even if it was only his killer who did so in a prolonged dual or the like. Even then you'd have to at least procure his head to be sure.

Though her planning is not bad. By stubbornly insisting he's not dead she's pushing the narrative towards a moment where he's going to show up just when it seems like her faith is about to be broken.

Liliet

It's possible that Cat has reached the level of storycraft where she can intuitively tell impulses that she should follow to push the story in her favor, from impulses she needs to suppress or Bad Things Will Happen.

Because that was definitely an impulsive reaction ^^

Death Knight

Oh no, Amadeus don't die so good.

Skaddix

So the main options for the Observatory are still some Heroes, the Tyrant and Masego himself. I still Heroes are the most likely assuming there is not a massive time jump between Epilogue to Prologue to Chapter 1.

In Epilogue we saw Hierarch swearing revenge but didn't have too much active planned. The Tyrant did have some stuff kicking but the Observatory has plenty of mages and two Named. So unless Tyrant went himself I just don't see the dynamic duo having the firepower (of Named and Mages) to kill most of Cat's Mages and beat Hakram and Thief granted this pair is the weakest in direct combat. Does he really have time to do that and then high tail it back. Maybe these two have gotten some new talent (Named). It does fit the Tyrant MO though that is true.

Masego is on option if he just passively killed everyone due to rage or some sort of uncontrolled power transformation but that requires a massive time jump from Prologue to now cause previously he was making his too Callow but wasn't close according to Malicia. Also you figure the Observatory had to be sacked recently cause otherwise it be in the Prologue since Malicia and Cordelia were mostly about the state of the war. Cordelia might not have great intelligence in Callow but you figure Malicia wouldn't miss a raid on the Observatory especially since its connected to the Palace.

That leaves the Heroes who I still think are the most viable options since we have no idea where Hanno is and the Heirarch vision assuming its recent and not future sight. It did feel real time based on Sve Noc blocking the sight while Cat was presumably meeting with the Dwarves. Could have been Hanno landing on a beach getting ready to lead a raid with his team on the Observatory and Callow's Capital.

SpeckofStardust

In order to mess with the Observatories communications all you really need to do is mess with the communication abilities, for that all you need to do is set up a jamming field, which the Tyrant could have one set up around him which Catherine happens to be in.

Skaddix

They have Akua and two Sve Noc avatars. There is no indication that anyone of their people cannot use magic or miracles. You would think Akua would mention some sort of jamming field while their speculating about matters. I don't see a jamming field being likely. Not to mention Tyrant would have to be stretching that field pretty far.

Gunslinger

The Tyrants Wish aspect seems to act like a miracle anyway. He could wish communication blocked and then it happens.

This is just speculation for despite talking about it twice we still don't know the rules or limitations of it

Allafterme

I dunno, Tyrant is more likely to shunt scrying attempt to a local brothel than outright blocking it...

Javvies

On the other hand, most of the Heroes are, or should be, tied up fighting the Dead or sitting on Amadeus. Might be some getting directed to face the Tyrant of Helike, or hunting Grem and his Legions.

But the main point is ... I really don't think that a surprise Hero raid on the Observatory is likely, between the probable lack of Heroes available to hit it, and the fact that one of the major functions of the Observatory is to spot Heroes coming, and track them once they enter Callow.

Skaddix

Should be maybe but the point is plenty of Heroes are MIA. Whereas unless the Tyrant got some new talent, he have to go himself cause Hierarch not useful in direct combat and we don't know of any other talent that could beat plenty of mages and two Named working with the pair. The Heroes though have the Named for this raid as there are dozens of them with plenty MIA. Whereas the Heirarch and Tyrant are the only named we know the Free Cities have available for any raid. And the Heirach hasn't shown any usefulness in combat.

Its a perfectly viable target its the main communication hub and intelligence gathering center for Callow. Take it out means no more secure magic communications and no more long range scrying. I mean sheesh the ladies discuss why its important in this chapter. Taking it out cripples Callow's ability to coordinate their armies and spy on other players in the War. Just cause its good at tracking heroes doesn't make it unbeatable especially with the top mage in Callow, Masego, not being present.

But you are right it could be Masego got back and killed everyone.

Javvies

I doubt it was Heroes, between the Dead King invading, the need to sit on Black with major firepower, and the Tyrant of Helike doing an end run around the Proceran Border, the Heroes should be busy – too busy to find a way through the border to strike deep into Callow.

Plus – as previously noted, one of the primary reasons behind creating the Observatory in the first place was to have early warning and tracking of Heroic incursions. That should take surprise off the table, and there's no way the Observatory wouldn't be actively defended, and enough regular people can bring down Named.

The only Hero operation that I think would be viable would be a Heroic Thief-type Name that managed to nick the artifact at the center of the Observatory.

Skaddix

Yeah the Tyrant doing it personally make some sense given the prescience of his army. Assuming the Observatory cannot track Villains although you assume it just track Named. Then its not a stretch to assume while his army was walking through the Woods. The Tyrant and an elite strike team used his Gargoyles to fly in undetected and sack the Observatory. Before flying to join his army as they exited the woods on Procer Lands.

Javvies

Ehhhh, I kind of doubt that whatever is going in with the Observatory is because the Tyrant of Helike attacked it – I'm pretty sure his hands would have been full getting his army through the murder woods. Plus, Refuge would've been in his way, and while he's crazy, I don't think he's quite crazy enough to go there and piss off the dwarves at the same time.

Also ... because I have faith that Masego's wards and defenses around the Observatory (in addition to more mundane measures) make attacking the Observatory a decidedly nontrivial endeavor for anyone and everyone.

Unless you take the easy way out, like Malicia and/or a High Lord might have, and have someone toss some goblinfire at it. Although, I'd have to say that would be an astonishingly stupid move for one of them – Masego would lay down an epic smiting and make a gruesome example out of them when he found out who attacked his Observatory.

If where they are would require use of the mage relays, if something happened to them, that could explain things, though I'd expect them to comment that the relays weren't functioning properly.

Rook

I think there is no interference, just a misunderstanding. It might be as simple as the states Masego and Catherine are in at the moment.

Catherine just transformed from some sort of Catherine-shaped snow angel in a mountain of Winter to a mortal with free access to Night II – electric boogaloo. It could be that she isn't wholly cut off from the observatory, but it's just not configured to recognize her new metaphysical outfit. After all, the strongest walls in the world are worth shit if you can't recognize an impostor walking through the gate, and Catherine just swapped out her identification card.

It normally wouldn't be an issue if Masego was in good shape, he'd have ways to recognize it was still her. But he's not. He just watched dad turn himself into an avatar of a literal hell-god and shatter himself against an avatar of a literal heaven-god. The dude is wandering back to callow so out of his shit that anything coming within throwing distance of him implodes in on itself.

Of course Catherine & co think it's external interference, that'd be the natural assumption. How could they ever guess what happened to Masego while they were away? On the other hand, of course Masego hasn't prepared a contingency for this. It isn't exactly common for someone to shed half a Fae realm to create a new god and revive an empire older than the dirt Callow was built on.

Skaddix

Yeah except Akua, who is pretty good mage stated Cat's changes and Sve Noc apotheosis should have no impact on the central mechanism for the communication hub. Now she could be wrong but I read that as our author telling us something is going very wrong or went very wrong at the Observatory.

I argue current Masego kinda falls under outside interference.

Euodiachloris

Masego going through a Man Was Not Meant To Know period of adjustment probably would have knock-on effects on his major artefacts, since they're kind of linked to him.

And, the Observatory is his baby.

theothin

It's not really his artifact, it was taken from Akua. But we know he can fuck up scrying from a distance. He's even doing it right now.

Insanenoodlyguy

I am wondering is she a mage again? Presumably she'd ask for that to be back in her body if it's an option. Either way I'm sure she can do a crazy impressive amount of things with night.

Dainpdf

Could be the Saint – the old woman seemed very keen on fighting Cat. Not really her style to go for intelligence, though. And Tariq has deader fish to fry. The Tyrant, on the other hand, has a history of messing with magic and infiltrating enemies, likes people confused, and is near the Callowan border.

Skaddix

That is good point since its on the way apparently Tyrant could have made a pit stop in Callow before catching up to his army once they exited the Woods.

matesbe

I don't think that's the case? I feel like it would have come up in Malacia's interlude if part of Callow got sacked.

Dresden 67

Not really. Laure is on the opposite side of Callow from the Waning Woods, and is heavily defended by Hakram, Vivienne and the Army of Callow, including hundreds of mages and thousands of magic-resistant knights. I have a hard time believing anything short of an army could get through all that.

Skaddix

You seem to be forgetting Tyrant single handily destroying a whole army. Beyond that Hakram and Thief are when compared to other Named nothing special in a direct fight. Thief is worthless considering Hakram easily defeated her pre Name. Meanwhile Hakram skills also skew more support, he is better then Thief but he aint exactly elite in melee combat by any stretch of the imagination and he just chopped off his hand which will do him no favors.

Liliet

The army he destroyed wasn't the unholy fusion of the Callowan knight orders and post-Black Legions of Terror that is Juniper's Army of Callow. True, the Named would not make much of a difference there, but Juniper would, if not annihilate him, at the very least make it into a prolonged campaign and not a lightning raid.

Mike E.

How can you not consider Hakram elite in melee? We have plenty of onscreen examples of him kicking ass and taking names, and once he waded into an insane combat situation solo simply to prompt the triggering of his 3rd Aspect. On top of being Named, he is a greenskin.

Liliet

Depends on one's definition of "elite". Archer kicks his ass effortlessly to the point of him deliberately looking for excuses to avoid fighting with her. He's a Named with martial abilities, but his Name is not martial-focused.

Skaddix

Pretty much this. Hakram is impressive compared to the average melee fighter. But he is not special compared to Named Melee Fighters (anyone who is not using Miracles or Magic) so Masego and Tyrant would not. I count Cat and Hanno those as Melee focused as while sure they have special abilities they tend to close range to fight. Not just blast from range.

Hakram was never elite before getting Named as a fighter. Beyond that his Powers lean more to fixing Cat's weak points ie Paperwork, Logistics, Management and his primary style before was duel wielding axes and he just cut off his hand. Beyond that Hakram is not a Mage or Priest killer so sure he is more durable against magic but he is not slicing through spells.

As noted Archer kicks his ass and Archer doesn't even stand at the top. Ranger is the best. She is always learning, can instantly master any skill, and can transcend the limits of mastery to go further beyond. On top of that she is a Half Elf so she starts with stat advantages even beyond an orc. Then you got Saint of Swords who is a domain onto herself who can basically cut anything. Then we have Archer who routinely beats the crap out of Hakram. Honestly of the relevant Name we do know much about from Lone Swordsman's Group to Woe to Calamaties to Hanno's Team to Pilgrim's Team. I think one could easily make the case that the only melee combat focused foe Hakram could beat is the Thief. And honestly Thief would probably rank better if we included spellcasters. She can at least steal spells and miracles. Hakram has got to dodge or try to tank.

Liliet

I kind of wonder about Archer vs Saint

Euodiachloris

I'm pretty sure Hakram could have taken Mr Jingles, John the Hunter. The Bumbling Conjuror would entirely depend on the dice roll.

Dresden 67

There's a big difference between the ramshackle army of Atalante, made up of mercenaries, town guards and conscripted peasants, and the Army of Callow, with professional regular and heavy infantry, sappers, mages and magic resistant knights, hardened by battles against fae, wights and Crusaders and led by veteran officers.

RanVor

But do veteran officers really make a difference against thunderbolts raining down from the sky?

Liliet

Yes. They make the difference between people hiding behind heater shields and enduring the assault while mages shield them from the worst of it, and people breaking ranks and running.

caoimhinh

It could be that the Mages at the Observatory died by accident as a consequence of trying to contact Masego in his current state (although I hope it's just Masego closing the connection for now).

It would explain the lack of contact method, as Malicia's own mages died horribly in their attempt, the Mages in Callow might have tried to contact Masego shortly after the destruction of Thalassina and suffer the setback (we still don't know if it's a conscious or unconscious method he is using to kill all who gets in his range, although I personally think it's a conscious decision), we don't know if the field of death around Masego could recognize the intentions or identities of the scrying mages before killing them, so Juniper might have ordered the Observatory closed after an incident, or the Mages might have died and thus the Observatory abandoned.

RoflCat

I think it's Masego.

To be precise, that he basically turned Observatory's full power for his purpose, likely 'searching' for...well, any traces of his parents.

Like, maybe Masego either is in denial that those two are totally dead, or he accept that, and is now searching for where their souls might've gone to.

And so he's looking everywhere, including into Hells or other dimensions, where a soul might go to. Then he'll bring their souls back, and he'll prove to them that someone coming back from beyond is still the same person, not just a fake with all their memories/personalities.

Gunslinger

Ooh I like this. Makes sense for Masego to do such a thing too.

Liliet

I don't think the Observatory is physically damaged or has been physically attacked. It's likely a magical / abstract way of disrupting its communication capabilities. Which Masego will likely easily see through and restore once he gets there, but he hasn't yet.

RanVor

Let's not forget that the League (and, by extension, the Tyrant) has access to Atalantian priests, who are known, among other things, for their ability to block scrying...

Liliet

Oh.

I think we've got bingo.

That's the theory I'm banking on, now. I'd forgotten about League priests!

Yotz

Mobile anti-scrying emitters? Hmmm...

The question is: Atalantians. How do they work?

Are they act as ADW, damping every/some of the attempts to scry in the vicinity; can block address scrying by, say, the identity of something or other; or just shut down whatever they want on the general principle of "ah dun wanna".

Also – from where exactly Cat tried to contact her (?) capital and Observatory. If she did so from the Everdark – well, there is an army of the dead between her and the recipient. With the literal unliving god doing essentially whatever he wants and/or able to screw the general order of things. And, The Crown. And the necromantic Wasteland of Calernia, for war – war never changes.

Also, Golden Bloom. Elves may left this world for the time being, but something surely remained. Not to mention their general attitude towards untermensch and Cat in particular.

If she tried to contact Laure from where she is now, which we can assume from the text – well, I already outlined my standing in the first paragraph: in that case the League is most probable culprit for sure – the question is how they done it.

If she tried to do it from the Arcadia, however, somewhere in between Everdark and her current location; or from several points during the march... Well, all bets are off, then.

I'd speculate that Observatory is a part of Masego, and since he is now, most probably, in the Orrery... If I'd to blatantly misapply some wording templates to it, ahem: every sufficiently powerful scrying device is indistinguishable from Fog-of-War generator. And since Masego doesn't want to be found, Observatory hides with him.

...And Laure – but that's just a side effect.

Daemion

So, what exactly happens to the drow at dawn?

Agent J

Finally, someone's asking the real questions. Maybe they pull a Gargoyles and turn to stone with the sunrise.

Until proven otherwise Rumena is now General Brooklyn.

Daemion

Don't you mean General Hudson? I mean, he is old and cranky...

Rook

Gown turns back into rags, coach and horses turn back into a pumpkin and mice. They can still leave behind their glass shoes though.

Dainpdf

If it's anything like DnD, reduced vision, dizziness and generally reduced combat ability.

Might be they also lose most their access to the Night, or lose consciousness. Or maybe they do turn into stone, who knows.

Daemion

Drow served as mercenaries on the surface before. Granted, those were exiles who had barely any night in them but I don't think people would employ mercs that can't participate in most battles.

Dainpdf

Cat seemed to believe marching in the day was an impossibility. This does, however, reinforce the idea that, whatever this is, it's connected to the Night.

caoimhinh

Not an impossibility, an annoyance. They are a species of people who hadn't been under sunlight for millennia, it's to be expected they experience discomfort, weakness or outright pain when exposed to it.

RanVor

I mean, it's kinda given that the Night only works at night...

Dainpdf

It's likely, though it'd do well to remember Winter worked all year long.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's one of those "drawback to power" things, I'd think. Those drow had barely any night in them, so effects were minimal. the same effects on these ones, who are chock full of the stuff, are much more debilitating, whatever they are. Didn't come up underground because no sun, but now they are exposed to their natural counterpart and Winter isn't thrilled with it either so the power boost's effects on this have ranged from nothing to actually making it worse.

TeK

The notions about Indrani and not being worthless for failing were something I needed to hear, in the depth of my depression. This novel always gives me a push I need. Thank you.

Liliet

Guide is good actually ♥

oliverwashere

Typos:

an offer a help
>an offer of help

Looking a misery
>Looking at misery

caoimhinh

Nice, things are heating up, should be a chapter or two before the armies meet again.
It's going to be a really messy and entertaining battle, I bet. And then operation 'Rescue Mentor' can begin.

Typos found:

- answered an offer a help / offer of help
- I suspected that in way / in a way
- The leather stared creaking / started

Dainpdf

Interesting chapter. Answers all around. A few questions, too:

- will Cat find love again?
- do Drow melt in the sun like popsicles?
- what happened to the observatory?
- will Cat chop Adjutant's arm off for giving Vivi a hand?
- what is Kairos up to (the eternal question)?
- will Cat find good booze again?

caoimhinh

The only one I can answer is the last one: Yes, Cat and Indrani are definitely sacking up the local good booze in the next city they enter. And when she gets back to some order, she will hit the wine again like no tomorrow, until Hakram makes her stop XD

Dainpdf

And now he can't even rely on an oath to keep her from it. Plus she has a liver again to put on the line.

As for finding good booze in the next city, you never know. Maybe they have terrible alcohol.

luminiousblu

'That didn't make them unworthy...'

Arguable, from an existentialist standpoint. What is even Cat's philosophy at this point? I get it's a CoA story so you can't expect true consistency but it feels like a proper mess right now.

luminiousblu

The hell? I didn't hit reply...

Liliet

Cat's philosophy is what she's stated: when times get dark, we're in this together.

The strong should help and support the weak.

Mike E.

I was about to say that as a Named she can burn off the alcohol immediately, but then I remembered that she has not had an actual Name in quite some time (but is she still in a transition point and therefore has some Named abilities...she had some when she was in competition for Squire)

Dainpdf

That, plus considering she (used to?) drinks to get drunk, she'd be unlikely to burn the alcohol.

Liliet

I think she only did that under Winter's influence, before Winter her vice of choice was wakeleaf.

RanVor

I don't think Winter had anything to do with that, actually. The Second Llesse hit her really hard.

matesbe

No it was definitely because it was the only thing that took the bite out of Winter. She said as much earlier.

Liliet

It did, yea, but drinking while Wintered didn't actually get her /drunk/, just less Wintered.

Incidentally, converting her to full Winter was a part of Black's plan that he failed to tell her about.

>_>

caoimhinh

Then she will have to loot from the armies. Procer's princes keep good wine and luxuries even on campaign, and the Tyrant always has quality stuff, although his liquor probably has quite a dose of arsenic to give it a unique taste.

Dainpdf

I hear his arsenic is of superbly high quality. Let's hope Cat can still survive mundane poisons now that she's no longer a glorified Yuki Onna.

lol

>"Was a body shown?" I asked.

>She shook her head.

>"Then he's not dead,"

In a world that runs on story logic, this isn't denial.

Yotz

To quote one old cranky sasser: The report of my death was an exaggeration.

In regards to someone with Black's reputation in our world, it would be prudent not only to see, but to thoroughly examine the body on molecular level. Just to be more-or-less sure...

Liliet

WELP

IT'S INSUFFICIENT INFORMATION TIME of course Cat can't contact the Observatory, that would just smooth the situation over and allow her to make informed decisions -_-

Someguy

Incomplete unverifiable info is a waste of time in a multi-party shit-show like this. Which is why Tyrant just blinded the Observatory.

Liliet

Are you saying that Kairos restricted Cat to incomplete unverifiable info by blinding it, or are you trying to say he did Cat a favor by cutting off her access to one source of such? XD

morroian

Or should could , you know, gate to Laure

Liliet

Gates aren't teleportation. Going to Laure would take up from a month of real world time, and then same to go back. They don't have the luxury of flitting around wherever.

Antoninjohn

Cat will probably kill a lot of the chasing army's after hearing about Black and his trips having a plague shoved on them and not knowing if he is alive

Liliet

No, I don't think so. Catherine cares more about her plan than about him, she's reiterated that multiple times. She's going to be distraught on a personal level, not throwing away her entire strategy (which is to get everyone pointed at the same foe who is incidentally not her).

NZPIEFACE

I'm really not sure how feasible that is. She basically brought out an empire of a traditionally Below race to the forefront of the geo-political landscape and currently no one is sure what she's going to do with it.

They could be as large as a threat as the Dead King.

Liliet

> Catherine Foundling > feasible

I think you're missing a logical step in there somewhere XD

Cat's going to diplomacy them to death, not actually slaughter soldiers she has a use for herself!

NZPIEFACE

That's exactly my point. After the Dead King is over, they're going to try dog piling her.

theothin

The drow are the ones she's sending to be the front line against the Dead King. There is no "after the Dead King is over" where they don't know exactly what she's doing with them.

Liliet

Yeah... we'll see if Cat is so naive as that.

Liliet

my god, rereading comments after the series ends is AMAZING /vaguefutureposting

NZPIEFACE

As someone that's somehow procrastinated reading this for three years, I appreciate you not spoiling it.

Euodiachloris

Frankly, Cat is trying to kid herself.

If faced with him in trouble at a distance close enough to see it, she knows damned well she'd drop every plot she has in hand in the rush to help him. And, thereby screw them both over.

It's why she's keeping away from any known vicinity of his.

Liliet

Yep.

Not going to take revenge, though.

Adrian V

I am intrigued with HOW the Tyrant pulled that off, was it name related, sorcery or good old spy work? (AKA physical sabotage). An now Cat knows about Black, is almost sure that between the next 3 chapters she is going to decide finding out about him, she probably will know more in the city but that still won't be enough so hopefully she will go the army.

What happened to the drow at dawn?

letouriste

well, i'm similar to cat. i still think black is the original main character of this story and can't die without fulfilling his purpose. Purpose not currently filled

NotQuiteHere

Ah the old "protagonist believes something that no one else does that eventually turns out to be true cliché" huh. Exciting! I wonder if this one will be subverted or not?

Liliet

Definitely not.

We know more of Amadeus's arc than Cat does. There's Stuff Building Up. He's not just alive for the sake of her being right, she's just independently correct about him being alive.

Morgenstern

Unless even that was a ploy by the Bard, Black currently has almost infinite Plot Armor – and the most dangerous thing of all: he KNOWS about that now. If anything was a mistake of the Bard's, this should be it... Telling your players as the GM that you (at least currently) need them for the plot, that the Game's Gods are not finished with them (yet)? Baaaad mistake if they're strategic powerplayers out to get you and crap on your plot...

Liliet

I think the biggest problem with this is that Black doesn't know what Bard's plot /is/. Can't foil someone's intentions if you have no clue what they /are/.

RanVor

But you can try, and who knows, maybe you'll happen to guess correctly?

Liliet

Yeah but the best guess to make is that she wants him to do exactly the thing he's thinking is the best idea, and "whatever I decide to do will be what she predicted" is not the kind of game I think Black'll allow himself to be pulled in.

RanVor

Theoretically yes, but if everything he might possibly do or not do might be according to her plan, there's no point in overthinking it – it leads only to paranoia and indecisiveness (which is likely the point). Even if he decided to sit back and do nothing, that too might be what she intended for him. The only reasonable approach is to ignore her and do what needs to be done regardless.

Liliet

Exactly what I'm thinking.

Bard was careful to not drop any information about her own intent and only comment on him and the overall situation. This means the only non-stupid approach is to ignore her intent entirely and go after his own goals, just keeping in mind that there's a wildcard at the table.

Which would make her success or failure wrt him entirely depend on how good she is at reading him and guessing what he wants and how he'll operate to achieve it.

Moginheden

Why isn't Cat just gating to the Observatory? Why is she in Iserre at all?

Winter gates reduced travel time, but distance and direction still mattered. Callow was on the way between the Everdark and Iserre so it would make a LOT of sense to drop in and catch up on current events before moving on to Procer. This wouldn't increase travel time to Iserre more than a day or so under Winter's system and would be an obvious strategic advantage to know what you are getting into.

If Night interfacing with Winter changed how gates work then the travel time might be removed as the Night-based shadow walking was hinted to do. If that's the case though, she should gate back home as soon as she can't scry there to figure out what's going on.

Even if Callow is off-limits for some reason, why is she talking about a 3 day march to the nearest city? If it's 3 days away over land where other armies might intercept them, (what seems to be implied.) Then it's probably less than a day away by gate, and you don't need to worry about the Tyrant while in Arcadia.

Moginheden

Even if she doesn't want anyone knowing she is out, opening a gate a few kilometers away from the city, and sending a single person to sneak in and get a report would make a lot of sense, (not sure who would be more stealthy between Archer and Cat right now. Neither of them favor stealth as a primary tactic, but both have been proven very capable of it when the situation warrants it.)

Yotz

Probably reasons are twofold.

First – she can't gate by her own will anymore, at least – gate on strategic level. Her power is borrowed from the Sisters – and while on average that was a good deal, she lost the ability to surestep navigate through Arcadia. She needed one of the Sisters to chart a course for her and the army to gate in. Which brings us to the part of ability/will – Sisters are either not willing to plot a course for her to gate to Laure neighborhood, or are unable to do so due to Observatoty's wards.

Secondly – the question of time. Tempo of the operation planned may not allow such frivolities as gating to random places at random times. There is not enough data to state/disprove that with a sufficient degree of certainty so far, imho. We shall see soon, I believe.

In any case, contacting Laure by more mundane means was in order, but – now the option is moot, and we have what we have.

Liliet

Callow is not on the way to Iserre, and if I have to guess, the distance/time relationship isn't linear there. Traveling through Arcadia is fast, but also some time is lost just by virtue of entering/exiting it. Even in a straight line making pit stops along the way could extend the journey several times over.

Moginheden

Check the maps linked at the top. The Everdark is in the north east. The straight line from it to Iserre passes through the Golden Bloom and western Callow, (especially since they "are skirting the eastern edge of the principality of Iserre.") now depending on where in the Everdark they were, they might not go straight past the observatory, but a little detour seems like an obvious benefit when Cat has been out of the loop for I'm guessing 3 months now? (although I'm not sure exact timing.)

As for entering and exiting taking huge amounts of time, I've never heard of that before, and it's directly countered by Cat using gates for short range travel on a battlefield occasionally. Arcadia was always much shorter distance than reality, (I think consistently and linearly but I'm not sure on that.) The reason it was hard to predict times was that time itself was weird in Arcadia. 1 hour of in reality might be a day in Arcadia or a second.

RanVor

Funny thing, I checked the maps too and the straight line between the Everdark and Iserre doesn't go anywhere near Laure. In fact, it barely touches the northern border of Callow.

Moginheden

Laure would be a bit of a detour, but not a huge one. Remeber they aren't in the city of Iserre they are at the eastern edge of the province. It does depend on where in the ever dark they started from where exactly the line goes; but even dropping in Harrow or Hedges would let them catch up on current events, (although it might be harder to hide that Cat is returning to the fight, so I would still have detoured a bit to the observatory)

Liliet

I suspect time losses would be proportionate to how many people you're trying to transport with the gate.

Also, imagine a drow army popping out in the middle of Callow. "Hi, it's me, your Queen, now also Priestess of the drow! Do not be alarmed!"

It's... kind of Cat's responsibility to keep her new allies away from her land to prevent tensions there I think 0.0

Moginheden

Nothing like that kind of time loss has been mentioned when using gates. Also Cat does not need to bring the drow out with her in Callow. She opens a large gate in the Everdark, moves to where Callow lines up in Arcadia with her army, opens a small gate and goes through herself leaving behind the drow, gets an update, goes back to the gate's location and opens a new gate, then she will be back with her army in Arcadia and can move on to Iserre.

She has done this before when she dumped the leaders of the first drow city in Arcadia.

Liliet

Hum, maybe you're right.

It's not like erratic to just miss things like that, though. I'm sure an explanation will come up at some point.

Moginheden

Now if Cat had gone to the northern front of Procor vs the dead king, you'd be right that Callow is out of the way. But for some reason she went to the southern front.

clintcleez

I'm wondering the same, she is guessing for no reason when she could just directly find out

Zaver SaintCloud

Speaking from the depths of Chicago Winter right now; do not under any circumstances underestimate the power of hot soup.

indubitably

THANK YOU for writing this story – I found it recently and have just finished bingeing my way up to present day, which makes me both proud and incredibly disappointed because now I have to WAIT for the next chapter, a stunning and absolutely unprecedented inconvenience (woe is me). Oh well, 1000% worth it – the Guide has become one of my favourite works of all time. I'll be here eagerly on upload days from now on. Thanks again.

Andrew Mitchell

Welcome to the club. The Guide has a strong fanbase and there's always lots of positive and interesting discussion in the comments section.

Regarding having to WAIT: One of the great things about the Guide is that EE is incredibly reliable with posting new chapters. There's one EVERY Monday, Wednesday and Friday, plus a bonus chapter each month. I suggest you subscribe to updates via WordPress or the RSS feed so you get your regular dose asap!

EE is able to keep up the fast pace due to the supporter of readers via Patreon. Look for the link on the right of any page to add your support if you can.

Chapter 3: Orison

"My son, I offer you the greatest gift a ruler can give another: a widely reviled predecessor."

– Extract from the infamous 'Sensible Testament' of Basilea Chrysanthé of Nicae

I'd used to love winter in Laure, as a child.

Sure, once in a while charcoal and firewood prices went up so the matron had to cut corners but as a rule I'd gotten to enjoy the snow in the streets while having a warm house awaiting me after. It took mere hours for the blanket of pale to turn to mush or soiled mess, but before time ran out there'd been a lot of fun to be had. We'd made a fort in the steps of the broken old hatcher's house, once, and pitched snowballs at everyone passing for the better part of an afternoon. It'd ended when we'd accidentally caught some Taghreb legion mage instead of a Liessen merchant. Luckily enough the man had been more amused than angered, and instead of chewing us out he'd used sorcery to lift half the damned fort and dump it back on our heads. We'd all fled shrieking into the streets, soaked in snow and red-faced, while he laughed loudly. Gods, how old had I been? Seven, eight? I barely remembered anything from back then, nowadays, but that one memory of the sunny winter afternoon might as well have been seared into my eyes. The matron had remonstrated us pretty roughly for coming back to the orphanage drenched, but I was pretty sure she'd been hiding a smile.

It'd taken me a long time to realized how lucky I'd been, getting a childhood like that. Sure we had lessons and curfews and the occasional lean week, but Callowan orphanages had been funded by the Tower. The coin had kept coming, and we'd been protected in some abstract way. Everyone had known that the orphanages were the Black Knight's own notion, and the shadow cast by my teacher's displeasure had been as a giant's back then. It'd been easier, hadn't it? When it all seemed so large and simple, and all you had to do to change things was climb to the top. Foe and friend, victory and defeat. I'd picked up the knife that night believing myself clever enough to see through the pretence of black and white, but that'd just been scratching the surface. Sometimes things happened that were too complicated, too far-reaching, to be called something as clear-cut as a victory or a defeat. Sometimes you could hate the people you most needed to clasp hands with and love those that would be most dangerous to your heart's desire. My eyes flicked to a tall silhouette in the distance, treading the snow without a trace. She had her back to me, so there would be no glimpse of golden eyes, but there was no mistaking her for anyone else.

Sometimes you could grow fond of someone even if you couldn't forgive them and never would.

I let out a steamy breath, watching the vapour rise up. That had me itching for my pipe, though I was equally reluctant to take off my gloves and reach under my cloak to indulge in my little vice. It was a cold night out, and it would be hours yet before dawn rose. I could have drawn on the Night to warm my bones, or more accurately chase away the cold, but some part of me twistedly enjoyed feeling the bite. Not so long ago it would have been nothing to be but another faded colour, another not-sensation washing up against the thing passing for my body. The moon above us was shrouded by the clouds, but light filtered through. Enough that I saw the crows streak across the darkness, feathered frames of Night batting their wings in utter silence. I dipped a finger into the power the Sisters had opened to me, sharpening my eyesight for a heartbeat, and caught a glimpse of crimson on the talons the pair. They'd killed tonight, then. If all they require for their altar is the occasional rabbit, I can make my peace with that. Their descent was almost a dive, but they failed to make me stumble when they landed on my shoulders. They'd kept back their talons, and made of Night as they were they weighed near nothing unless they particularly wished to. I tightened my cloak around my shoulders and cast a meaningful glance at the bevy of drow escorting me. The warriors bowed low and scattered across the snowy landscape.

"Rochelant," Komena said, a strangely human voice leaving her crow's throat.

"There will be blood," Andronike said.

Wasn't there always? Stainless victories were not in my nature.

"As little as possible," I said. "We come for knowledge, not conquest."

Crow-Komena's laughter sounded like cawing, which we both knew she was doing on purpose.

"So speaks the roving catastrophe," Andronike said.

I could have gone pithy in reply to that, but my mood had gone sour after the conversation in the tavern and the march in the cold had done nothing to improve it. I simply grunted back wordlessly.

"Fickle thing," Komena chided. "Is this tossing of insults not what you told us to practice? Why do you now shy away?"

"I stand by what I said," I replied. "You want to stay grounded? Talk with people in a way that isn't prayer or orders. My friends were my anchor when I was deep in Winter."

"Friendship," Andronike said, sounding somewhat skeptical. "A human concept, not of the Firstborn. Kinship in interests is ever passing."

"Yeah, I'm not exactly holding my breath you two starting to feel all warm and fuzzy inside," I sighed. "This isn't about that."

"Imprecise," Komena noted. "Elaborate."

"Banter's informal," I said. "It puts you on equal footing with the other person, if only for the duration of that exchange. And for you two it's even more important, because to be halfway decent at it there's a lot of things you have to pick up on: the situation, the timing, what lines you can and can't cross. It forces you to think like a person while you do it."

"It will not change what we are," Andronike said.

"None of us can do that," I replied. "What we can do is make sure you still understand what a mortal is. That you don't become so utterly removed from reality you march yourself off the cliff."

There was a long moment of silence broken only by my boots creasing the snow.

"You are being sexually promiscuous with your subordinate, which is humorous for unclear reasons," Komena tried.

I closed my eyes and counted to five. At least she's trying, I told myself.

"We'll, uh, keep working on that," I muttered.

I flicked a glance at crow-Andronike, but she did not have another drow attempt at humour to throw my way. Well, either that my reaction to her sister had scared her off. The crow-shaped sliver of goddess turned towards me in indignation, much to my amusement. Yes, clearly she was beyond such petty feelings. No, I wasn't thinking that just to appease her. I muffled my chuckle with my gloves. The slight ebb upwards in my mood disappeared the moment the distraction ended. I was in the dark, in more ways than one. And some of the things hidden from my view mattered more to me than others. I hesitated, fingers clenching and unclenching.

"Ask," Andronike said.

"Since you ate Winter," I said. "Your... abilities have grown."

"Beyond your understanding," Komena said. "Though that is not a high wall to clear."

That'd actually been pretty decent, I noted. Insults came much easier to her than humour, which really wasn't much of a surprise. I cleared my throat.

"Could you find out if someone is dead or not?" I quietly asked.

"Yes," crow-Andronike said.

Ah, but would they?

"No," crow-Komena said.

"I know there'd be risks," I said.

"Of which you warned us yourself," Andronike said.

"If you start swinging your apotheosis around on the surface, something a lot older and meaner is bound to start swinging back. That story doesn't end well for you," Komena said, pitching her voice in an eerily perfect mimicry of mine.

The leather gloves crinkled as I closed them into a fist.

"There are strategic reasons why the information would be important," I said.

"Not enough to warrant the possibility of provoking an entity our match," crow-Andronike said. "You know this."

"Sentiment is unseemly," crow-Komena said.

"Don't do that," I sharply said.

They stilled for a moment. They were not used, I thought, to being spoken to in this way. And we all knew that the part of their power they had sent with me was enough that they could kill me if they so wished – my best defence against it, after all, had been granted to me by their favour. But I would not hold my tongue. That was the whole point of my being named their herald, the First Under the Night: having someone that hadn't been raised to worship them to argue with them, force them to reconsider what they believed. They might not always agree with me, and frequently did not. But entirely separate from our military alliance and the diplomatic authority they had granted me was the real foundation of our accord. A cat may look at a king, the old Callowan saying went. Though the unfortunate pun had me gritting my teeth, it was a decent way of putting it. It was my damned purpose to disagree with them without sweetening my words.

"There's nothing wrong with feeling things," I said. "You take that out and all you view is skewed. They're not the only thing to take into consideration, often not even the most important, but they do matter. Logic alone leads you to ugly ends because you're dealing with people, not statues. If you remove that element just to feel clear-sighted and superior, you're going to shoot yourself in the foot repeatedly."

"Your tone," Andronike said.

"Is exactly what it should be," I replied, unflinching. "If you are right and correct in your own view, make your argument. If all you can quibble about is my phrasing, maybe you should be thinking instead of trying to chide me."

That didn't please them, but then it wasn't supposed to.

"You provided what you promised," crow-Komena conceded. "Yet the refusal remains. Employ other means."

I would, the moment I could. There was a storm taking shape in Iserre and I suspected Black would have a better idea than most of what it was really about. He was the only person I trusted who'd ever spoken with both the Hierarch and the Tyrant of Helike, strange as the nature of that trust could be. I trust people to act according to their nature, Malicia had once said. A Wasteland way of thinking, but there was truth to it. I remained alone with the crows-that-were-not-crows on the long march, buried in silence until dawn came.

—

"It is a dangerous weakness," Akua said. "Though I suppose inevitable in some ways. Power never comes without a cost."

The sun had begun passing the horizon, and with the light of morning something like a shiver had passed through fifty thousand drow. Tents had been hastily raised and my host hid away under them before dawn even finished. The sentinels forced to remain out in the sun did so after boiling water to make herbal concoctions that would keep the awake through the sudden wave of tiredness. Dawn, I had learned, was when Sve Noc's power ebbed lowest. I would have assumed noon to be it, but Akua had offered a complicated explanation as to why that was not the case I'd failed to understand twice before I got her to simplify it into something comprehensible: dawn was the death of the night. As a metaphysical concept, that had more weight than the rest. For some reason that apparently required me to have read a lot of books I definitely had not before it became sound and evident logic. The tent she was keeping me company under was open at the front, but the thick linen walls did cut away at the worst of the wind nicely. It made the wait tolerable, though I was actually debating taking a nap.

"This is an inconvenient one," I said.

"Surprisingly light," Diabolist retorted. "They are still physically able, after all. Simple temporarily bereft of their access to the Night."

"They'll also be out like a light for a few hours," I grunted. "That's a recipe for a morning attack and you know it."

The transition from night to dawn was taxing on drow bodies in a way that led to exhaustion, and effectively prevented the expeditionary force from being truly fighting fit for at least three to four hours. And they'd be tired for the rest of the day as well as being fragile little mortals if I didn't leave them sleeping a little longer than that, though at least that I could push later in the day. It wasn't like other armies didn't have to sleep, of course. But having a fixed time for that was a liability, and there would be no keeping that under wraps forever. The moment we began operating near other armies, there'd be outriders and scouts on us at all times and much as I liked to insult Proceran royalty they were not above basic pattern recognition.

"Hence why joining forces with the Legions of Terror remains a priority," Akua said. "Fifty thousand warriors led by Mighty able to operate flawless in the dark are nothing to scoff at, and a fortified camp held by legionaries would allow us to exploit that advantage relentlessly."

"Until we have allies, it makes occupation of anything concrete difficult," I reminded her. "Taking something at night will be easy enough. Holding it through the day another story."

"Fortunate, then, that occupation is not our intent," Akua serenely replied.

That and I still had a few cards to play if things got bad, though heroic presence would make the whole matter chancy. They tended to do that, as a rule. At least the Dead King should keep a good chunk of them out of my hair for the foreseeable future. I cast a look back at my bed, which was essentially a pile of covers and inexplicably flat cushions, and finally gave up the notion of a lie-in. Maybe after I worked out some of the tension in my body. I rose with a grunt, curtly refusing Akua offered helping hand, and buckled my sheath back onto my belt.

"Who has the watch again?" I asked the shade.

"Lord Ivah," she replied.

Ivah, huh. It'd been a while since we'd had a proper chat. Unlike some of the Peerage, who seemed discomfited by how easily they still obeyed me and so made themselves scarce, my old guide had remained at hand. Unfortunately it was also a pathfinder of some talent, and so often sent out ahead of the expeditionary army. Might as well take the occasion today, I didn't know how long it would be until the next. Though was I was higher than General Rumena in the pecking order of the Empire Ever Dark, it was in charge of leading the expedition. While I could give orders and dismiss its own, the details of the duty rosters remained at its discretion. I could have intervened, but was reluctant to do as much without a better reason than liking having Ivah around. Akua followed me out of the tent and onto the camp wordlessly. After years of commanding legionaries, the sight of the mess around us had me wincing on the inside. The layout of this place was a bloody maze, all haphazard tents with no real thought given to quick deployment and no chance of a bloody palisade being raised. Rumena wasn't a fool, so it'd been pretty thorough about putting sentinels in place during our vulnerable ours, but it'd admitted to me in private that it could not turn a gaggle of tribal sigils into the kind of army the Empire Ever Dark had once fielded with less than a month before the campaign began.

Assembling a functioning chain of command had been miracle enough, in my opinion, which should count for quite a bit considering I was now the foremost priestess of an entire race.

"Have you considered using a staff?" Akua suddenly asked.

She'd pulled slightly ahead of me, I only then noticed. I could go quicker, in all honesty, but I was in no real hurry and this pace was most comfortable.

"My limp's not that bad," I shrugged.

"It pains you," the shade frowned.

"When it loses its novelty I'll get herbs for that," I replied. "That's what my pipe was for in the first place."

We turned around a cluster of tents, the smallness of the gap rather irritating to my eyes. She resumed the line of conversation afterwards.

"Unnecessary suffering is exactly that," Akua said.

"I'm still fighting fit," I said with irritation. "And if I need a little nimbleness, I'll call on the Night to make it withdraw for a bit. I got the juice directly from Sve Noc, daylight won't stop me."

"It does significantly weaken you," Diabolist retorted.

I rolled my eyes. So the kind of power I could call on went from terrifying to merely appalling after dawn. It was still more than I'd ever had to work with as the Squire by an almost absurd margin.

"Yet that was not my meaning," Akua mildly continued. "I worry more about what embracing this implies of your mindset."

I watched her from the corner of my eye, and she did not meet my gaze. Worry, huh. The words she chose were never an accident.

"Sometimes it's a good thing," I said. "To remember what it feels like for the people who don't make pacts with gods."

"I had thought you estranged with contrition, dearest," she said, tone prickly.

"I won't wallow," I flatly replied. "But I won't lose sight of it twice either. A lot of people are going to bleed before this is over, Akua."

I brought up my fingers to block the sun from my eyes, feeling the shade studying me.

"Now and then it's worth the sting to feel a part of what you're going to dole out," I finished quietly. "It's be a kinder world, if we were all made to remember that."

"Kindness," Diabolist mused.

"Not a Praesi favourite, I know," I drily said.

Not much grounds left to cover before we reached the edge of the camp. Already we were passing drow so wrapped up in cloth the only seen could be seen was their eyes, though those were sharp and peering at the horizon. Ivah should be somewhere within the small thicket of bare trees I could see ahead, by the feel of the presences in the Night. Even when bereft of the power, they still left an impression. I slowed when I realized Akua had stopped. She was looking at me with narrowed eyes. Ah. Irritated her, had I?

"Is that what you think?" she said.

Not irritation, I thought. Disappointment. Fancy that.

"Are you sure, Akua Sahelian," I said softly, "that you want to get in an argument with me about the moral fabric of the Wasteland?"

"I had a great-uncle," she said. "By the name of Thandiwe."

My eyebrow rose.

"Fascinating," I said.

"I found him to be, as a child," Akua casually admitted. "He was, after all, stricken from family records."

"Maybe he used the wrong fork during the cannibalism ritual," I suggested.

Much as I disliked to admit, though, she had my attention.

"My mother would not speak of," she said, "and so naturally I pursued the matter secretly."

A half-smile quirked her lips.

"He was a sorcerer of great promise," she said. "As is custom among our line, as a boy he was brought to the deepest part of the Maze of Kilns. There he was made to sacrifice one dear to him, and for months after remained silent."

So it wasn't just you, I thought. Had Tasia Sahelian been made to do the same by her own mother, I wondered? How far back did the wounding of their own children go, for it to have earned the name of tradition?

"The lesson was believed to have been taught," Akua said. "And it was. One the eve of his sixteenth year, Thandiwe Sahelian stole several tomes and artefacts from the family vaults and fled to Mercantis, where he pawned them for a small fortune he used to make a home further south in Nicae."

I snorted.

"I imagine that went over less than pleasantly in Wolof," I said.

"Rage is an apt description," she mused. "Which only worsened when he began to thrive after entering some sort of merchant consortium and became comfortably wealthy even by Praesi standards. Enough to seek the protection of the Basileus, which the Empire sought favourable trade terms with in those days."

"Clever, then," I said. "Though I'm wondering as to your point. The man sounds decent enough, but he left Praes."

Akua inclined her head.

"And yet he was also a Sahelian," she said, and even now there was an undertone of pride when she spoke the name. "The blood of the original murder, unhallowed from the cradle. I am told that he kept to the Gods Below even on that foreign shore."

"He grew past his roots," I said.

And I'm not so sure you have, I thought. She looked up at the morning sun, her silhouette wreathed in light for a heartbeat, and there was something about her smile that unsettled me.

"You have seen the worst of us," the shade said. "And through that knowing taken our measure. But there is more, Catherine. We are not beyond kindness, not even the highborn. If even a Sahelian can have the taste for peace, there is yet something left to be kindled."

"If you want to be known by more than the ugliest parts of you," I said, "perhaps you should show them to the rest of the world. Maybe the capacity is there, Akua, but we don't judge by capacity. It's the choices you make that matter."

"Ah," she murmured. "And how many of those do we really have, in the end?"

One hundred thousand souls, I thought. That was a choice. It's the weight on the balance by which you will be judged, and what could possibly even the scales? I cleared my throat, uncomfortable the lingering silence.

"Your great-uncle," I said. "What happened to him, after?"

Golden eyes met mine.

"The old Basileus died. His successor refused the Empire's terms outright," she said. "And so my grandfather, a noted alchemist, took to his workshop. If he is so ashamed of his blood, I am told he said, let us relieve him of it."

Neither of us blinked.

"Thandiwe Sahelian sweated out every drop of blood in his body within the year," Akua said.

We finished the rest of the walk in silence.

DroughtBringer

Go Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

And, believe it or not, I actually have something besides voting! Wow! That never happens!

Over on Spacebattles, KnownParadox has started doing a Liveblog of A Practical Guide to Evil.

If you do not know what that is, it is where someone, in this case KnownParadox, reads through a text, in this case (because it wasn't obvious) A Practical Guide to Evil, and reacts to parts as they are reading. It is a fairly cool experience, as it lets you feel kind of like you are reading The Guide again for the first time, and makes for a fun way to re-read The Guide.

If you're interested, then come look at the link below. At the moment the first Three chapters have been posted, and more are forthcoming.

<https://forums.spacebattles.com/threads/where-i-read-a-practical-guide-to-evil.718471/>

konstantinvoncarstein

(About Above and Below): "I imagine the the one who wanted to micromanage their joined Sims account is the evil one while the one who wanted to see what would happen if the Sims were left on there is the good one."

It's so cute! 🤖

Sonder

Isn't it the other way around? Evil let's folk do their own thing and good tries to micromanage them?

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, it is as you say 😊

Skaddix

Feels kinda Filler. I mean unless one of this relatives books or artifacts becomes relevant. We already no Praesi can be kind but don't favor it.

Liliet

And once again someone declares character development / relationships in fiction to be filler.

I am shocked. Truly.

Skaddix

Cause it is the Drow part can be predicted with some knowledge of RPGs. And we already know all Prasei are not monsters with zero companion. Heck Cat's short story at the start tells you that seeing as said mage didn't kill a bunch of kids for a prank. We already had Cat and Akua bonding as well. Lets get to some other characters.

Liliet

The drow part can be predicted with some knowlege of RPGs?

We, uh. Still kind of needed to know for certain.

caoimhinh

To be fair, the whole 'Akua telling a story of an unknown uncle' part was filler indeed.

We didn't learn anything plot-relevant, Akua's character wasn't developed, and it also didn't shed any new light on Praesi culture.

We (and Cat too, for that matter) already know for a fact that Praesi are not incapable of love, companionship, mercy, kindness, and honor; literally every Praesi character (including the members of the 15th legion) are proof of that, though we also know that they look down on displays of affection, the nobility holds in contempt those who can't hide their emotions and consider mercy a weakness.

Akua herself has already shown that she cared about her father (although she thought her father was weak for not being capable of intrigue she still preferred him that way because he was happy like that) and Barika (who Akua considered weak and a bit dumb, but still kept her around because she was loyal; and she was the one loss she actually felt after the battle of Liesse at the end of William's rebellion).

Cat's interaction with Sve Noc, on the other hand, was character development and relevant.

Liliet

I'd say it's important than the conversation took place, and the relevant information is the interaction between Akua and Catherine, itself.

Nobody

Suddenly feeling as if this Sahelian has some connection to Hanno's mother.

Liliet

Ashur and Nicae are rather different places. I doubt they met

Scholar

Let's all remember, dear friends, our dear friends...the previous chapters. How many times has seemingly 'inconsequential' information been foreshadowing we just didn't catch?

Personally, I'd love to see a crimson rain made of blood sweat. 😊

Rook

The point is that maybe the Praesi aren't so different from anyone else. The same moral from the Indrani/ranger story applies to even the villainy of the east.

It's a sweet song to believe people are the way they are solely because of their choices. Because they deserve it, because of the mistakes they made. Maybe it's easier to think that way, but the whole point of the last chapter was criticizing that idea. Because people are weak and sometimes they don't have a choice, sometimes they're not strong or special or great enough to stand up on their own, but that doesn't make them worthless.

It was the same with the drow in the entire last volume. Cannibalistic murderers they may all be, we now know for a fact that none of them could have dragged the empire ever dark out of the pit on their own. How many choices did any of them really get that mattered, in the big picture?

Maybe the Praesi are the same.

Maybe Catherine is the hypocrite here, not Akua, her personal experiences and wounds blinding her from seeing them for what they are.

Not villains that need to be beaten or destroyed, but villains that need to be saved. No different from the poor villagers that gave up, or drow that were made to kill each other, or callow being forced to become a battlefield again and again. That's what Cat needs to do to truly win. To break away from Above and Below's game. Redeem the same people that hurt her, knowing that the real enemy aren't the people being driven by the whip but the one holding it.

Oshi

Oh god Pilgrim succeeded didn't he? Shes gonna be fucking redeemed. That's what all this moral clap trap is about.

Rook

I don't think it's so much redemption in the capital-G Good sense. It's more along the vein of the moral outrage Black has against Above (and to a lesser degree, Below) for giving him so little choice as to the major outcomes of his own fate.

Think of it as a chess game. You're either consigned to being a Black piece or a White one, with no choice in the matter. The whole point of Catherine's choice when fighting Sve Noc was pointing out the real problem – the players. Above and Below. You don't win by beating up the other pieces, you win by getting the pieces to stop fighting long enough to gang up on the players.

Akua's point is that it's incredibly hypocritical of Cat to blame some of the black pieces (the Praesi) as if they were black by choice, just because they might have personally hurt her in the past.

The pilgrim is all about destroying black pieces or converting them to become white. Amadeus is all about being a black piece but winning anyway, even if his own piece is taken. Catherine is about poking both players in the eye, because she's terribly unamused at being a piece in general; but if that's her game then she needs to be consistent.

luminiousblu

But that's the thing, isn't it? They are black by choice. Even her uncle, Akua specifically states that he worshipped Below for the rest of his life, even if he fled.

The problem with Catherine is that she views the world as divided into good and evil, instead of Good and Evil, and thinks that one should imply the other.

Liliet

I don't think Cat's going to switch sides, which is what Pilgrim wanted, but she was never not on the side of lowercase g good, even if she sometimes wasn't perfect at holding to it.

Euodiachloris

Not in the way he'd like, no.

Cat is, fundamentally Callowan – which means she needs bashing over the head with the concept that Praes didn't start out as screwed up as it has become, and that the people inside it are still people.

Above and Below have a lot to answer for, for both have allowed atrocities in the name of their game.

luminiousblu

"Because people are weak and sometimes they don't have a choice, sometimes they're not strong or special or great enough to stand up on their own..."

Bullshit. The entire point of the last chapter is that even when you're weak, you do have a choice. "The only choice that really matters", in fact.

The Mayor had literally nothing. Catherine could've ended him with a word, possibly less than a word. He still refused to talk under pain of getting his family killed. He could do not better but he chose to make the choice he would be proud to make again. Do I agree with his choice? No, I think it was stupid, but that isn't the point, it doesn't matter what I think, it matters what he thinks. He chose a side. He was too weak to serve it in full, but he did what he could and made his peace with the fact that he'd done everything he was capable of.

What do you think being 'strong' or 'special' means, really? You don't need to be 'strong' or 'special' to do something you'd be proud to do again. You might fail, but you tried, and that's good enough if you can do no better. Someone who falters halfway to the finish line and collapses is still better than someone who jogs two thirds and then walks away of his own will because he can't be arsed to keep going, that's what the last chapter was.

"...but that doesn't make them worthless"

If you come from a certain mindset that I disagree with, they might not be "worthless". They are, however, certain "worth less". From a narrative perspective, especially in worlds of Good vs. Evil (instead of Grey-Grey morality), the person who is willing to stick to his guns to the very end is heavier than the person who swaps sides or caves in to threats. Even villains, because there is something to be respected in a villain who genuinely believes in what he's doing whether or not you agree with it.

"How many choices did any of them really get that mattered, in the big picture?"

In a world of Good vs. Evil, the choice that matters is which side you go on. That's more or less it. Akua's episode sounds like it's saying "even Praesi can be Good", but that's not really it. She's saying "even Evil can be good", and note the lowercase. What choice does anyone have that "really matters"? Callow is a crown that will eventually pass. The culture of Praes isn't the same from century to century – hell if nothing else, the whole culture of starvation thing couldn't have predated Sinistra's weather bomb. The Sahelians seem to have risen to prominence only after the Miezens left. Procer didn't even exist for the longest period of time. Names themselves come and go and new ones pop up with seeming regularity, even outside the context of the current story timeline. Hell, apparently slavery was considered Good, capital G, way back when, and it's not anymore; it might be considered Good again in a thousand years. All of these things "don't really matter", not in the end, not even on Neshamah's timescale let alone the Bard's or the game of Above and Below. And of course, neither do the Drow. If you talk about choices that "really matter", then you have to look at personal choices, and you can always make a personal choice that matters – that's what the last chapter was.

"Maybe Catherine is the hypocrite here"

It's not about hypocrisy. Hell even if it is, it doesn't matter. The pot calling the kettle black doesn't mean it turns white.

"Not villains that need to be beaten or destroyed, but villains that need to be saved."

Now, this is high-handed bullshit. Villains that 'need to be saved'? Saved from what? Saved from themselves? From their own dreams or their own goals? Maybe even from their own choices? Do you think everyone in this world is a child incapable of taking responsibility for their own failures?

"To break away from Above and Below's game."

Villains, especially Named, are Nietzsche-style Übermensch (so are Heroes, actually, given a world where God literally isn't dead). To claim you're "saving them" is literally the biggest insult you can offer one of those. These are people who have made their choice, and are convinced that they are the choices that matter. You taking away that choice because 'it's bad for them' means all you're really doing is setting up a second game within the metagame of Above and Below, where you're the only choice. Sure, that solves the problem. You can't chafe against the iron walls of your prison if you build a second, wooden prison inside of your cell.

"Knowing that the real enemy aren't the people being driven by the whip but the one holding it."

There is no whip. People choose what they do for themselves. "Fate" is just narrative consequence, railing against it is as idiotic as railing against entropy, or gravity, or the zeroth law of TD. To live in this world is to live with the fact that stories exist. You can change the stories, but blaming everything on the 'whip' is like attributing the internal combustion engine to laws of compressional heating. The "how" is confused for the "why".

Even Black's railing makes no goddamn sense. Evil always loses, but for Evil to even be in a position to lose, Good has to lose first. That's how stories tend to go – for the rebel to overthrow the tyrant, the tyrant has to seize power; for Robin Hood to save the peasants, the peasants have to be in trouble; for the King to repel the orcs, the orcs need to be invading. The very fact that Praes is consistently an Evil country, with Good countries opposing it, disproves Black's honestly whiny notion that Evil is destined to lose. Terribilis II foiled several Crusades and reconquered his homeland, more or less for good, right after what seemed like the final triumph of Good that cast down Sauron's Towe – I mean, the Tower. From the perspective of Good it could've seemed like nothing but the triumph of Evil: Sauron come again and his Tower is higher than ever.

Liliet

I agree with you that if you take Black's anger at face value it sounds whiny af.

The actual point comes out if you connect it with the context of what he'd just been explaining to Catherine, when he goes into the speech. He's angry that Praes was drawn into the game and doesn't get to quit, and any villains who try to help are only allowed a villainous sort of victory, ie a transient one that doesn't make things better in the long run.

tl;dr Black is angry that Praes is Evil and its inhabitants don't get individual choice about being surrounded by it 😊

Rook

I'm the one speaking high-handed bullshit? Sorry, but I'll have to throw that accusation right back in your face. It's easy to judge people by the sacrifices they didn't make when you're not the one making the sacrifices.

"There is no whip"? Seriously, after an entire volume about an entire race that were given the "choice" to cannibalize each other for millennia by an automagically binding contract with Below made on their behalf, before their ancestors were even born? After just now getting an example of the kind of consequence that comes to Praesi for abandoning Praes and Below, even partially?

The point isn't that there physically aren't choices, the point is that the choices are between bad or worse. Praesi can either play the wasteland game, or bleed all their blood through their skin. The Drow could either kill each other, or have their entire race die anyway. See any meaningful choices there?

The thing you're completely ignoring is that not everyone starts at the same starting line. Not everyone starts with the same advantages or disadvantages. The point of "saving" the praesi isn't excusing them for their crimes so much as giving them that ideal freedom of choice that you like to pretend already exists by burying your head in the sand.

Is it a reality that people are consigned to different circumstances? Yeah. Do you have to live with it? Yeah.

That doesn't make it right. That doesn't mean things should stay the way they are because that's how it's always been.

You want to talk about personal failures? You're right, the greatest personal failure isn't failing, but not trying. And if you see the state of the world with all these flaws and refuse to attempt correcting those problems, using cop-outs like 'everyone makes their own choices' or that people are what they are solely because of 'personal failures'? You're the biggest failure of them all. Because at that point you're so scared of trying that you're pretending there's no need to try at all. Convincing yourself that it's like 'fighting against entropy'

People aren't the way they are just because of what choices they make. You don't choose where and when to be born, and people are often a product of their upbringing more than anything. There is no baby in the world born dreaming of becoming a psychopath or an abuser.

luminiousblu

"It's easy to judge people by the sacrifices they didn't make when you're not the one making the sacrifices." Whataboutery. I'm not saying it's not alright, or not normal, to bend under pressure. That's what True Neutrals do. I am, however, saying that it means you literally matter less – especially in a world where picking a side can straight up grant you plot armour.

"Seriously, after an entire volume about an entire race that were given the "choice" to cannibalize each other for millennia by an automagically binding contract with Below made on their behalf, before their ancestors were even born?"

That is not a "whip". That's like arguing that the Byzantine Empire's situation in the later stages of its life was a "whip". The actions of your predecessors affect the choices available to you today. The actual contents of the choice are completely irrelevant to the fact that the choice exists.

"the point is that the choices are between bad or worse" Irrelevant. You tried pulling the last chapter as an example, but the last chapter gave the mayor a choice between Horrible and Terrible, and he chose the one he believed in. What you're missing is that the choices involved aren't about the material impact, or even spiritual impact. It's about agency. Will you make your choice, or will the choice be made for you? Are you the main character of your own life, or are you a side character even there?

"See any meaningful choices there?"

The choice between Good and Evil. Yes. I do see a choice there. I'm not even religious but if you had any notion of how Abrahamic religions or – before them – Zoroastrianism works you would recognize the pattern. You can choose to be Good, or you can choose to be Evil. Neither is actually invalid, but you must make the choice. Stop thinking of things in terms of empires, timelines, or life and death. This is about personal choice, not about historical pivots.

"The thing you're completely ignoring is that not everyone starts at the same starting line."

I'm not ignoring it. I'm dismissing it as irrelevant. Your choice doesn't need to be successful or long-lasting to be a choice. To choose – that is, in and of itself, the freedom you're given. That is, in fact, the only freedom anyone is ever given in this series. You can't say the Praesi have no choice and then turn around and claim Callow, or Procer, or even people in real life (who aren't bound by a Story) do. You are, as you said, always affected by your background. You can't escape that, you can't even equalize it, it's inherently impossible due to straight up physics. You just have to deal with it and realize that people are defined by the choices they make. They're presented with different choices – a poor man will never be presented with the choice to fund a well for a village out of pocket, and a rich man is unlikely to ever run into the question of whether it's better to work day and night trying to secure your daughter's dowry or to spend time with her while you still can – but they'll always have choices, and we can judge them by those choices. We DO judge them by those choices. That's what happens in real life.

"That doesn't make it right."

There is no right and wrong. It's either true or false. Arguing the Story is right or wrong is like arguing the Fireball spell having a twenty foot radius blast is right or wrong or the fact that if you jump off a tower you take 3d6 damage unless you make a tumble check is right or wrong. You're running into the is-ought problem.

"with all these flaws"

And here's the point where we diverge. I see no flaws. I see things I disagree with and I would get rid of the things I disagree with, but there's no inherent flaws to any of this. You don't have to say something is wrong for you to not like it.

"using cop-outs like 'everyone makes their own choices' or that people are what they are solely because of 'personal failures'?"

These aren't cop-outs. These are the hard truths in a world where you have metaphysical concepts of Good and Evil right there. Good is just as hamstrung by this as Evil, for the most part, but the key is that you can always make the personal choice to stand by what you believe in or to bend to someone else's will. To be a main character, even if your tale is minor and meaningless, or to be a side character in the story of someone who matters more than you, because they were the mover instead of the moved. Read some Nietzsche.

"You don't choose where and when to be born, and people are often a product of their upbringing more than anything. "

And that is completely irrelevant. We judge people by the things they do. If you read Sauron's backstory, he comes off as sort of screwed over by everything, Melkor, Eru, everyone; but when it comes down to brass tacks, it is Sauron who couldn't overcome his paranoia and fear, and turned to darkness when he had a chance to return to the light. Nobody except maybe Gandalf pities him for that, and Gandalf's pity is quite the same as the Grey Pilgrim's (whose name is a reference to him) – "He's a pitiful monster, but a monster to be destroyed nonetheless." You can't shrug off responsibility or agency because you were born in a bad place, not if you want to matter. Again – look at the Mayor, who was put in a bad spot but made the choice he could live with. Hell look at Akua deciding to rebel against an entire empire, look at fucking Catherine in Chapter 1 of Book 1 when she made the choice to fight the guards. You can always make a choice, and it is "the only choice that ever really matters."

Rook

I don't think you're understanding the point of the message, let me try to make it simpler.

The point is that although people can and should be held responsible for their actions, you can't hold them responsible for who they are.

Have you ever considered why places like Praes produce so many Terribilises and Akua Sahelians? Is it just their blood that's foul, is it just random chance? Do all those kids born in Praes get up one day and make a choice to become that kind of person because Praesi genes are just shit? Of course not.

Sure you can and should hang the Akuas of the world. Sure you can and should hold them accountable for what they do. But understand that at some point even Akua Sahelian was born an innocent infant and was a blameless child. That's the real problem, that's the point. Two year old Akua Sahelian never made a choice one morning to grow up to be a psychopath that murders a hundred thousand people. The problem is what caused that kid to become what she is today, and it takes an unbelievable amount of willful ignorance to believe it just happened on its own or that it's because of some sort of failing in personal responsibility.!

It's extremely small-minded to treat the Akua sahelians and the Amadeuses of the world as the 'enemy' or the 'problem. They're not the problem, they're the symptom. The problem is the circumstances that cause them to become broken people, and the enemy is everything that perpetuates those circumstances. EE even made the concept easier to grasp by putting a face and a name to it, in the form of the Bard whose entire goal is to keep those circumstances intact.

Akua has a right to be disappointed in Catherine. She treats the Praesi people like the problem when she of all people should know that – regardless of the fact that many of them aren't forgivable and many of them do need to be held responsible for what they did – the problem isn't the people so much as the circumstances that create them.

Liliet

(I don't think Bard is the problem here)

Rook

We'll have to agree to disagree, I think she's by far the biggest problem here.

Her entire existence revolves around making sure everyone is on one side of the game or the other. Capital G Good or capital E Evil. The Hierarch didn't wound her because he was powerful, he wounded her because he didn't choose Above or Below. The failure to convince or manipulate him into doing so is what really set her back.

I sincerely believe that without the Bard's intercessions, countries like Praes would have had a real shot – over the hundreds of years – of becoming far less awful than they are now.

Liliet

I think that the interpretation that this is what her job is, isn't actually for certain 100% confirmed canon. It's a popular fan theory, somewhat well-founded, but it's not actually a fact yet.

luminiousblu

You 'can't hold them responsible for who they are'? What the fuck does that even mean? What can you hold a man responsible for if not for himself? People make choices. Circumstances shape those choices. That doesn't mean the person doesn't make the damn choice.

"Have you ever considered why places like Praes produce so many Terribilises and Akua Sahelians? Is it just their blood that's foul, is it just random chance? Do all those kids born in Praes get up one day and make a choice to become that kind of person because Praesi genes are just shit? Of course not."

"It's extremely small-minded to treat the Akua sahelians and the Amadeuses of the world as the 'enemy' or the 'problem.'"

See, this here is why I find talking to you incredibly tiring because you're still, even now, making it out as if Evil were somehow inferior to Good. Akua and Black aren't 'the enemy', nor are they 'the problem'. In fact, they're not even 'a' problem. Not by the standards of this world.

"Sure you can and should hang the Akuas of the world" See? It's difficult to talk to you about problems and so on when even as you say "the Akuas and Amadeuses aren't the problem", you evidently think of them as people to be gotten rid of. Even if you think of them as a symptom instead of the disease you still are clearly biased and have made your decision ahead of time that they're somehow wrong and need to be 'treated' – which is why I said it's absolutely insulting. These people are adults who have made their decision. If I came along and told you all of your values were wrong, and therefore I'm going to be taking them away and re-educating you the 'right' way, I think you'd probably be pretty goddamn angry about it. Which is why it's so damn tiring to talk to you about circumstance, blame, and responsibility – you're already convinced that one of the sides is wrong, instead of realising that from the very beginning the entire point of the Named system is that you're not right or wrong; you're someone who's the main character of your story, or you're not.

"Some sort of failing in personal responsibility" Stop trying to attribute blame. It's impossible to have a discussion with you because you think I'm trying to excuse someone, or to defend someone, or to blame someone, or to damn someone. No. You are responsible for making a choice and the choices you make. Your circumstances are not a valid defence. Just because daddy neglected you as a kid and Stephen was a huge jackass to you during school and kept taunting you about how easy your sister was doesn't mean you're not responsible for murdering twenty people in broad daylight with a submachine gun.

"Akua has a right to be disappointed in Catherine." Yeah, for other reasons. Not for disapproving of Praesi culture, which is clearly what she actually disapproves of – Catherine has a right to disapprove of most anything, and Praesi culture hasn't really sat well with her since the very beginning. It's not as if Catherine thinks of every single Praesi as monolithically and cartoonishly evil, or else her characterisation has backslid all the way to Book I.

"Regardless of the fact that many of them aren't forgivable and many of them do need to be held responsible for what they did" I don't agree with any of this moralising, just so you know. Personally I find Catherine's simpering about humanity this and humanity that more unforgivable than anything Black's pulled.

BarthHumphries

> Which is why it's so damn tiring to talk to you

I haven't been part of this conversation, but it's just a meaningless internet argument. If you walk away from the discussion and the other person thinks they "won" because you didn't refute their latest post, it's no big deal.

If you're tired of the conversation, just stop. Hope this helps. 😊

Rook

This isn't a whole new idea that exists in guide verse, it's a very old and very well documented phenomenon.

It's the exact same type of shit as people being born into a poor family being more likely to be poor, people that grew up in the hood being more coarse than people in upper middle class suburbs, and people born many south African countries becoming literal murderers, because that's what happens when your environment has you choose between being conscripted as a child soldier or dying.

People are largely a product of how they are raised, and their character or perspective determined far more by where and when they're born than whatever choices they make growing up. You can hold the individual responsible for their crimes but it's hilariously wrong to try believing the cause is because of personal failings, as if nearly anyone else wouldn't have turned out similarly in the same situation.

You're so enamoured with the idea of pinning blame on a stray dog for choosing to act like a stray dog that you totally reject the notion that it's more important to focus on what keeps causing these dogs to turn stray in the first place. It's ludicrous.

luminiousblu

Me? Pinning BLAME? Have you read anything of what I'm written? I don't think a single thing in this entire story was worthy of blame. Nobody has done anything I think was worthy of blame, there is no blame or fault to be attributed in making decisions that you believe in. You're the one who's arguing from a moral standpoint, not me. I'm simply pointing out that people do have free will, and that's the entire point of the last chapter – that even when all of your choices are shite, you do have a choice.

Do you know anything about what you're even talking about? Do you know what the is-ought problem is? Do you know what an Nietzschean ubermensch refers to? I don't generally like insulting people but at this point it's not even an insult I genuinely need to know if I'm wasting my time talking at someone who can't or won't understand. Because it seems to me you're trying to make this into some sort of political bull about how poor people can be ruined by their upbringing or how bullied kids aren't really at fault or whatever the hell you're trying to communicate because it sure as hell has nothing to do with what I'm saying or the setting this takes place in. It's right there in chapter one, Black says it again in chapter 2, and it's constantly repeated throughout the series, the Wandering Bard says it outright with William (and I know you're about to kneejerk about how evil and unreliable she is, but I don't buy that – the Bard is the most objective character with the fewest crippling blinders we have access to). You always have a choice – to be dragged along or to drag the world along – and that choice that you always have is the one that really matters.

Javvies

Yeah ... that's a huge downside.

On the other hand, they should be able to join up with Grem and his Legions before the Crusaders figure out the weakness of the drow at dawn.

nipi

But would Grem be an ally? And for how long? Remember Cat wants to join the alliance against the Dead King while Praes is allied to him.

Darkening

Depends on what ends up happening with Black I suppose. These legions were the ones that followed Black's lead and basically mutinied against the empire, so they'll follow his lead if he comes back I imagine. I expect Black would be horrified at the idea of letting the Dead King expand beyond the natural barriers that have been keeping him bottled up for millennia and letting him become a potential threat to the empire. Not sure how Malicia would react to them coming back to the fold if they did head back to the empire. I suppose her position is precarious enough that she'd probably welcome the troops, but the troubles with the goblins might raise questions about Sacker's loyalty. I certainly wouldn't expect them to subordinate themselves to her, but an alliance might be doable. At least to get Black back and to get them out of their current mess.

Liliet

““Shit,” he finally said. “You’re sure?”

“We are,” Eudokia said.

"Then the entire north is about to be hip-deep in dead men," Grem bluntly said. "I can't think of another reason for Hasenbach to pull out. The Iron Prince only let us burn our way through the heartlands without lifting a finger because he judged toppling Callow as quick as possible was how the war would be turned around. He wouldn't leave the Vales if he had any another choice, not after committing for so long."

"That is my assessment as well," Amadeus said. "And it means our horizons have just expanded a great deal.""

""I can think of few things more foolish than to underestimate Alaya," he quietly said. "Even now. She's never been one to act without a plan, and that we do not understand her moves should be source of fear and not contempt."

"Odds are she's the one who made a pact with the Dead King," Ranker said.

"It could have been Catherine as well," Amadeus frankly admitted. "She thrives in chaotic situations. It's led her to the bad habit of creating them knowing it improves her chances of victory even if it significantly increases collateral damage as well.""

^^^ Amadeus's reaction to the whole Dead King business.

He's not a fan, but he's not exactly morally outraged lmao.

Either way, I think the Legions are likely to sign on with Cat just out of practicality at this point: it's that or get crushed by the armies converging on them. And Grem and Scribe know Black supported Catherine in this conflict, hell that the conflict was only ever allowed to emerge because of Black's own conflict with Malicia and was a direct result of it. Black didn't just leave, he effectively set Catherine against Alaya when doing so.

They won't be happy at working with her, but I don't think the "going against Malicia" part will be a sticking point.

medailyfun

he had not known the full scope of the pact at the time.

Liliet

True, but he had no reason to assume any limitations either.

I think he just assumed the situation was ultimately handled by the people who had a better grip on it and focused on his own part.

And in the hypothetical where he's with the Legions and Cat's asking him to join the fray of handling it, I think he'd agree, yeah.

Allafterme

At the very least she can offer them to be ferried the legion to the one remained on Callow for temporary alliance within Iserre

Someguy

Praes can be your ally while still engages in sabotaging you.

Barthumphries

Typo thread

It'd taken me a long time to realized how lucky I'd been Change realized to realize

There were others but the author ignores these anyway so...

caoimhinh

Ah, I didn't see your comment, I left a list of the typos I found in another comment below.

Liliet

Nice to have the confirmation that Catherine is indeed going for the obvious correct move: joining with the Legions. That's going to be a fun conversation :3

Also nice to see the details of Catherine's relationship with Sve Noc. I love how Catherine has serious and thought out arguments in favor of banter ♥ ♥ ♥ Guess when one of your subordinates keeps pestering you about how you shouldn't be this informal, you end up refining your understanding of why you keep doing it anyway ♥

(ilu Juniper never change)

I'm looking forward to the talk with Ivah.

And, dang. That sure was a conversation. I'm curious to see where it leads.

nipi

Not sure its that obvious considering he wants to join the Grand Alliance.

Liliet

Amadeus literally helped her out with that, sending her the correct paperwork for the request.

NZPIEFACE

"When it loses its novelty I'll get herbs for that," I replied. "That's what my pipe was for in the first place."
"Unnecessary suffering is exactly that," Akua said.

I wonder if the Grey Pilgrim will come to the same mindset as Cat if he ever gets near apotheosis.

Darkening

Nice chapter, good to see all the screaming people were doing about how OP the drow are has an answer. Power has a price indeed. Still, come nightfall an army of people able to give a fight to named has a ton of potential once they have allies to guard them during the day. On another note, I find the concern about other gods Sve Noc expresses interesting. Makes me wonder just how many there are running around. We've seen the orc god captain killed, warlock's said to have dissected a couple, and then there's Neshamah and our new Night goddesses. Maybe the king of the elves? Not sure whether to count Bard, she's more a conduit for the Gods to act on the world than a bearer of power in her own right. (Also, is she restricted to Calernia? I don't think we've gotten any notion she might be active on other continents, but then the story is pretty limited in scope to this continent for the most part) Anyways, I'm curious how many more old gods are lurking in the background somewhere like that orc was.

Dresden 67

We know there's also a god in the Greywood, the forest in Callow north of the Fields of Streges.

Lavir

It was stated to be more of a nature spirit

caoimhinh

If the Sisters want to learn to banter, they should take lessons from Mighty General Rumena, Lord of Sick Burns and Cool Replies. Also, the moral of Akua's great uncle's story is one we already knew: that Praesi and their highborns have the capacity for kindness, they just are so brutally ruthless that they kill those who display it, and even look with contempt to those that express their genuine feelings (As was seen by Akua's interaction with her father, and her care for Barika).

Typos found:

- it would have been nothing to be / nothing to me
- crimson on the talons the pair / talons of the pair
- holding my breath you two starting / to you two
- to be halfway decent / halfway
- Well, either that my reaction / that or my reaction
- keep the awake / keep them awake
- Simple temporarily bereft / Simply
- the Dead King should keeping a good chunk / should be keeping
- Though was I was higher / Though I was
- It's be a kinder world / It'd be
- One the eve / On the eve

Liliet

The interesting part was not the story Akua told, but the fact she told it and the manner in which she did.

The point she was trying to make, and just in general the tone her conversations with Catherine have.

It's very interesting.

Argentorum

The difference between Akua and her uncle is that she learned her lessons too well.

How many choices do we have? Less than we would hope, but always more than we thought. Acceptance is the choice Akua made. She will not be allowed to shirk the weight of it at the very end, I think.

Agent J

Acceptance is a choice, true. But so is Rejection and her uncle paid dearly for it. The point, I think, of Akua's story is that she's damned if she does and damned if she doesn't.

I don't think she wants to shirk responsibility so much as to be understood. The inciting incident was Catherine's offhanded remark on the Praesi take on Kindness. She wasn't irritated by it, she was disappointed.

Liliet

Exactly.

burdi

still waiting for cat's new Name

caoimhinh

And Amadeus's new Name too. Many are of the opinion he will be Chancellor.

Lavir

He does have a claim for Emperor, as he killed the previous one.

Liliet

No, actually, Alaya poisoned him. Amadeus reminisced at some point about how much he'd have loved to kill him personally in as painful a manner as possible, but Alaya had dibs XD

PhilzuNeide

I think First Under the Dark is her new name.

Liliet

It doesn't really sound like a Name. Names are archetypes, expressions of a concept. Can you imagine First Under the Night to be written in lowercase, while referring to Catherine? Even just a part of it? First is not a Name stem.

Like, you can say: Malicia is the empress of Praes, Amadeus was Malicia's knight, Catherine was Amadeus's squire, Hakram is Catherine's adjutant, Vivienne is/was a thief, Indrani is an archer, Masego was Wekesa's apprentice, etc. While saying "Catherine is a first" or "Catherine is the first" doesn't convey any useful information. It couldn't be given to her as a nickname or used to refer to her in a children's story.

This is the difference between just ceremonial titles and titles that are potential Names. Saying "Cordelia is a warden" or "Cordelia is the warden of the West" sounds pompous but not inaccurate, doesn't it?

Antoninjohn

Well it's not like the God's Above will give Heroes the aspect Dawn which will suddenly weaken any Drow they fight

Oshi

Which will promptly get flattened by the Priests of Night. You can only go so far before the other side gets to do things too.

Dresden 67

Except there already are heroes with light and sun themed aspects. No direct intervention required.

Hell, the Mirror Knight already has an aspect called Dawn.

Lavir

His aspect is a passive not an attacking one.

Javvies

His Dawn Aspect is a passive stacking buff/augmentation. Every Dawn he sees, he gets a little stronger and faster. I'm pretty sure Above planned to send him after Ranger in a few years.

anon

Come to think of it, wasn't there already a hero who had the aspect Dawn which made him slightly stronger every time the sun rose?

Xinci

I have been thinking of all the metaphysical Dawn stories in-story and without and I see already a hero calling the light to their chest and shining the Light. Birthing a Dawn in the darkness, perhaps even a flying one rising to make the weight even higher. Not even mentioning how big the Dawn Knight is now. Good plays a long game indeed, well so does Evil but damn they got em good this time.

Skaddix

Suggest they have matchups against Hanno. Since most of his powers literally have him using and channeling light.

luminiousblu

>Logic alone leads you to ugly ends because you're dealing with people, not statues.

Yeah uh I'm not really sure about this line. All things considered, if "logic alone" leads you to ugly ends, that just means you forgot to take in a few variables. It's not as if you can't logically treat displays of emotion.

James, Mostly Harmless

I believe the point that Cat was trying to make is that thinking strictly logically causes you to think "if A is true, then B is always true." When dealing with emotions, it can be "if A is true, then french onion soup, except that this is my dearest enemy, so SQUIRREL!"

luminiousblu

And my point is that emotion isn't actually illogical, which is a horrendous cliché that needs to snuff it as soon as possible. Emotion is a factor you take into account. It's difficult to pin down, which is why we say it's "illogical", but even someone who's livid and seems to be "not thinking" isn't being illogical – he's just using an entirely different set of values.

Having different values is what we call "mad", yeah, but if there's a method to the madness (and there always is) then you can theoretically figure it out.

Liliet

Agreed strongly.

Emotion is a shortcut to logic, if nothing else, actually. You don't need to ponder deep implications of an action and how it will reflect on the world at large if you know that it pisses you off / makes you happy.

Admittedly it doesn't always hold, but then logic can be fallacious too.

pagesbe

I think Catherine was warning Sve Noc away from using the same kind of logic Malacia did in Liesse. She didn't account for the human factor; she didn't account for the fact that Akua might massacre Callowans by the tens of thousands, and she didn't account for how livid Catherine would be that she let that happen, or that Amadeus might take offense to her doing something that he had spent nearly his whole life trying to reject and prove wrong.

Liliet

Admittedly Malicia seems to have accounted for Catherine quite well. Had Amadeus stayed within the alliance as the stabilizing influence he'd been previously, Catherine would have stayed within the dotted lines. It was the conflict with him that led to the whole balance of power imploding.

But yeah, this.

caoimhinh

A curious thing is that, in fact, the reason for Alaya's current crisis is entirely emotional. She is obsessed with control and became paranoid about Amadeus having more physical and military power over Praes than her, so instead of looking at him as her most loyal companion, she thought of him as a potential threat for her rule despite knowing full well that he had no interest in such.

This led her to support the whole Akua's Folly in order to get her own weapon against the world that didn't rely on Amadeus, yet in doing so she triggered the Crusade, made Catherine further the separation of Callow from Praes (Although Malicia took measures to prevent a full secession), and also drew Amadeus away from her, which in the long run has cost her Wekesa too, since he died due to the Crusade.

Liliet

I don't think this analysis is entirely accurate.

Yes, it stems from Malicia stewing inside her own head, but the worry about Amadeus's power base not being hers was not the only thing there, and even within it, the idea that Amadeus might turn on her was not the only or the biggest thing.

Part of her control issues was questioning his judgement. Amadeus himself has, like, reverse control issues, where he'd Rather Have Someone Else Be In Charge, even if he's like 90% sure he knows better. Like he'd love it if Malicia agreed with him on everything and follow his plan exactly but he's not willing to actually take a stand and insist. Not until it's all gone up in flames already, and even then his next action is to fuck off to the border and pretend nothing is happening. Even in his yelling match with Alaya in the epilogue he ends up being like 😊 @ her suggestion that he come home and agreeing with it while having an entirely different idea of how it's going to happen.

Anyway, Amadeus being like "I think this but I'm not SURE and I think you're better at this than I am" puts Malicia in a rather... stressful position. If he's so sure he doesn't know better, maybe he really doesn't?

According to her internal monologue in Epilogue 4, she worried that Amadeus was being self-destructive. That he was going to start a war that he'd die in, and that it was his at least subconscious intention. We the audience know that Amadeus is better at separating out his personal bullshit from geopolitics than that, but how would Malicia know if he always deferred to her judgement when pressed?

She's not wrong that he's suicidal, and it's not wrong of her to think "holy shit, what happens when he's not there" wrt the power base thing. She strikes up her own relationship with Catherine more or less behind his back, because she doesn't know that he's got a plan there that will work. She sees he plans to die, which she is literally correct about, and she's not a fan. Literally nobody is Amadeus oh my god what the fuckahem.

Anyway, I'm saying Amadeus's issues played a huge role in Malicia Doing A Stupid. She might be better than him at administration and intrigue, but she's not better at geopolitics and storycraft, and that... came as a surprise... to both of them? He never taught her about it, because he just kind of assumed she already knew all of those things, but she didn't?

I see Amadeus's "you will surpass me, Catherine" as a thing of the same caliber as his absolute unquestioning trust in Malicia. Also incidentally as his romance with Hye which still gives me heebie jeebies and never will not, and just... bluh. She's awful??? Amadeus you have shit taste?

Anyway, yeah. Reverse control issues, and Malicia's worry for Amadeus's life.

Liliet

P.S. I think this "I think I'm right but what if someone else knows better" waffling is also the source of the confusing bullshit that was Amadeus's actions in Book 4. He supports Catherine in everything but doesn't actually actively take a stand in a conflict that he... effectively... initiated? He kind of low key rebels against Alaya but not really? He gives Catherine the paperwork for the application to the Grand Alliance but goes ahead with his plan to undermine Cordelia's influence anyway? Which, I mean, maybe he thought it would help but have you tried coordinating Amadeus, and his dialogue with Ranker in Queen's Gambit, Declined. "If the new generation thinks they're wrong let them beat me first" Amadeus that's literally the worst way to decide anything you Praesi dumbassreverse control issues spiraling. Let whatever happens happen, as long as I'm not the person making the decision!

(He recognizes his responsibility for the decisions he's made and their consequences, and considers it cowardice to blame anything on Fate. Doesn't stop him from being fatalistic anyway???? Amadeus please stop)

Liliet

P.P.S. Epilogue 3, not Epilogue 4, geez @ my stupid ass. WordPress pls implement an edit function

NZPIEFACE

I think that line was more supposed to be pointing out her hypocrisy when she's the one talking without thinking it through. She just wants to know if Black is fine or not.

SilentWatcher

No one comments on the best line i have read in a long time?
"Did he use the wrong fork in a cannibal ritual?"

Liliet

The comment below this one was meant to be a reply...

Liliet

Reminds me of another Best Line, from Epilogue 4

"“I make a very good lentil soup,” Amadeus suggested.”

Truly they are father and daughter ;u;

Prince vlad

Its written that there are 30,000 drow but weren't there 50,000 drow in the last chapter did they split or this is a genuine mistake by the author?

Liliet

Where did you see thirty? I paid attention to this when rereading the chapter after seeing your comment, and it says fifty at least twice. I, uh, ~~might have not paid attention to every single word anyway, so it's possible there's a place where it's typo'd into thirty. Knowing erratic that's the exact opposite of surprising~~

Halwar

Hey guys, I started translating PGE for my friends in free time and 'cause I didn't saw translations in russian online I'm not posting it. Do you know, is Erraticerrata against posting? (of course if I will be translating for large audience, I'd like to add a link how they can benefit me in addition to Erraticerrata's) I saw that he didn't want EPUB to circulate, so maybe there is a reason in lack of translations of this masterpiece.

So as not to bother, maybe there is some FQ section where i can look into it?

caoimhinh

There was a comment long ago, where someone asked Erraticerrata for permission to translate PGE to Spanish, but Author refused because he is planning to have the book published.
He might have changed his mind on the subject, but I don't know, your best chance is to write a comment asking about it in a reply to his comment next chapter so he can answer your doubt.

Chrischinbrush

Just popping in to say I, for one, LOVE the idea of the Priestess of Night with a staff.

naturalnuke

'Fate is not a force, it is just a consequence of the choices we were always going to make.'

Ex-reader

Honestly, I am very disappointed with the recent developments. I started reading this story for pragmatism, for practical evil, not practical good. Why did Catherine suddenly decide to change coats NOW? After all these times? And her power is also borrowed, and unlike Winter relies entirely on the goodwill of the Sve Noc, gone with a snap of a finger. I came for progressive fantasy, and so I will take my leave. Thank you for everything, the ride has been fun.

Konstantin von Karstein

The big theme of the story is that practical Evil is basically indistinguishable from practical Good.

Chapter 4: Reconnoiter

"I see how it is. We agree to single combat and of course you can still use your enchanted sword, but I bring a single massive flying fortress and suddenly it's 'treachery' and 'against the spirit of the agreement'."

– Dread Emperor Perfidious

Ivah wore my colours painted on its face, as did the drow around it.

Silver on purple, a tree with twin incomplete circles under the branches. The Lord of Silent Steps – though the power of that title had waned in weight with the devouring of Winter itself – still stood tall and blade-thin, pale grey features split by vivid eyes that split the difference between silver and blue. The long overcoat and scarf it wore was flattering to its frame, though the face still remained so profoundly inhuman in some ways I could not help but find it unsettling. The drow had been made from a fundamentally different mold than humans, for all the superficial similarities. The colours the first member of my Peerage wore were unsettling in a different way, though, a reminder that as far as the Empire Ever Dark was concerned I still remained the ruler of the Losara Sigil and a member in good standing of the Sisters-blessed cabal making up the southern expedition. That I had left Ivah to rule and refrained from exercising that theoretical authority since we'd left the Everdark seemed to matter little in the eyes of the Firstborn. There seemed to be an assumption that as First Under the Night I simply found it beneath me to meddle too deeply in earthly affairs. The drow knelt when Akua and I arrived, conversation having died out before we even entered the thicket of trees.

"Well, you look slightly less pissy than before," Archer announced.

I squinted at my friend in confusion.

"Why are you hanging upside down?" I asked.

Indrani was currently hanging off a branch by the mere edge of her boots, scarf and coat rumpled by the merciless grasp of gravity. None of the drow seemed to think there was anything unusual about this, a sure sign they'd been subjected to her presence for much too long.

"It helps me think," Archer sagely replied.

I flicked a glance at the drow and they rose back to their feet.

"You don't have to pretend she's funny, you know," I told them. "Deep down, she also knows that she isn't."

"It is not my place to comment on the wisdom of Mighty Archer," Ivah replied.

There was a beat.

"Should it be granted to me," the Lord of Silent Steps added.

I smothered a grin. Taking well-deserved potshots at Indrani was the sole common ground between all peoples of Calernia. I'd bet even the Dead King would yank her chain if given the opportunity. Archer let out a strangled noise of protest, trying to swat at the drow's head, but instead got tangled in her own coat and began swinging precariously. We all pretended not to see Akua whisper something under her breath just before the branch Indrani was hanging off of suddenly broke and she fell with a yelp.

"All quiet this morning, I take it?" I asked Ivah.

I kept my eyes on it, though even through this careful precaution I could not help but hear Indrani muttering imprecations in half a dozen different languages. For a heartbeat I missed Masego so vividly my heart twanged. It should have been him, forcing her down the tree after she pulled at his metaphorical pigtailed one time too many. I hid the sudden shift in my mood as best I could, forcing a smile as I faced Ivah.

"We appear to be alone in the region," the drow acknowledged. "No runner left from Trouseau after we departed, and so one might presume our presence is still currently unknown."

With the Sisters swatting aside everything remotely like scrying headed in our direction, it might not be wrong. I wouldn't presume, though. Not with Above having so much skin in this race, and Choirs having grown so loose-lipped over the last few years.

"We'll see," I replied. "It'd be an advantage to remain in the woodworks until we strike, but rumours could have a use as well. It'll depend on where the others' armies are relative to us."

I'd rather avoid a battle in Iserre if I could, given that every corpse made here was a warm body that couldn't be thrown at the Dead King, but given some of the players involved I might not have much of a choice about it. I fully intended on evacuating the Legions of Terror that my teacher had led into Procer, after all. Which I imagined would be a less than popular notion with some people, given that they'd been merrily burning their way through the heartlands of the Principate until recently.

"Cat," Archer said.

I rolled my eyes, continuing to face Ivah.

"You've seen the lay of the land on the way to Rochelant," I said. "Will it be bloody ice and snow all the way?"

"Cat," Archer repeated, and this time her tone commanded my attention.

I pivoted slightly only to realize she wasn't even looking at me. Her eyes were peeled on the horizon, to the south. I couldn't see anything there, but then I was no longer Named. That hardly meant I was without tricks, though. I pulled at the Night, untangling a cool thread and sinking it into my eyes. It took a few blinks to adjust, but after that I could see just as well as Archer. I let out a breath of surprise when I caught sight of what she had. Riders, I thought. Nine of them, on tall grey horses with long manes and tails. The soldiers on them were in light armour, though sets swaddled in thick furs and heavy cloth hats. Those were spears at the side, I noted, not lances. And they had blades but no shields.

"Akua?" I said.

"Levantine," Diabolist replied. "Though without colours visible I cannot not tell you from which region."

"Well now," I murmured. "Isn't that interesting."

The armies of the Dominion of Levant should be making their way through southern and central Iserre right about now, if the rumours were to be believed. Hot on the heels of Marshal Grem's legions. So what were outriders doing this far out to the east of the principality? They were still about a mile and a half out, but these were flat plains so the chance they hadn't seen the massive army of fifty thousand drow encamped was negligible. They were riding closer, though. Most likely trying to get a read on whose camp this was, which would be difficult to make out from that far out.

"I have questions for them," I said.

I felt Indrani's smile without needing to look at her.

"Thought you might," she said.

I cocked my head to the side, still studying them. With the sun out and the imprecisions inherent to a working at that distance, trapping them would carry risks. Best to tinker with the odds a bit first.

"Archer," I said. "Kill the horses."

A good longbow, the kind the Deoraithe used, could have a range of about four hundred yards. Effective killing range should be about half that. Legion-issue crank crossbows, the finest on the continent, could reach three hundred and fifty yards and could be expected to score kills at around one hundred and fifty. I had just casually asked Indrani to kill nine horses in motion at over ten times that distance, and the grin on her face told me she did not doubt for a moment she could do it. I watched with fascination as Archer strung the almost comically large longbow she usually kept on her back. It'd been crafted in the Waning Woods, I knew, from some sort of magical tree. Then additional enchantments had been laid on it. Back in the old days, Nauk had once tried to draw the string back and nearly broken his arm trying. That the most physically powerful mundane orc I'd ever met couldn't even get that string to move an inch told me everything I needed to know about the absurd amount of tension there was to her bow.

The thing was, I thought as I watched her work, was that most of this was Indrani. Oh, I felt the whisper of power than was an aspect invoked. See. But that just allowed Archer to wield the kind of eyesight and foresight the woman who'd taught her to shoot would have by simple virtue of her elven blood. The strength to pull the string came in part from her Name, which up close and personal allowed to be slug it out with the likes of Adjutant and titled fae. But if Hakram, or I for that matter, had been granted the exact same strength and sight we wouldn't have been able to make those shots. The skills, the part that couldn't be replicated? That was all Indrani. Years upon years of nocking and releasing until her fingers bled, until the movements became such a natural part of her there no longer needed to be thought involved. Indrani could and had made a bloody mess of most everything that came up to her when she had her longknives in hand. But it was when she had that bow in her hand that something about her thrummed, that it all came together and I remembered that Archer was more than just a name.

It was Name, and she held it for a reason.

Eyes fixed ahead, she breathed out and like poetry in motion she drew and released. Not a single movement wasted, not a single pause. It was almost hypnotic to watch, like waves on the sea – there was no pause or separation to any of the process. Nine arrows flew, a smirk tugged at her lips and before the projectiles even reached their apex I reached for the Night. My eyes were on the Levantines and I felt talons dig into my shoulders, the Sisters with me even if their crow-forms were not. Whispers sounding in my ear, I held my will into shape and forced the Night to match it. And then waited, watching the riders as the arrows struck home. The first hit between the eyes of the lead horse, sinking straight into the skull and killing it instantly. The ninth arrow went straight through the eye of the horse even as the rider began to realize its companions had been attacked. For every arrow to claim a kill had taken perhaps a single heartbeat, from beginning to end.

Sometimes I forgot how terrifying the people at my side really were.

"And now, for the next trick," I said.

Under the Levantines the ground turned to ink-like darkness, growing from a single small mark to a broad circle. The Sisters held my hand, guiding the needle as I threaded it through the fabric of Creation, and when the gate opened every one of the outriders fell through it. If they'd still been on their horses, alert instead of trying not to be crushed by their own fallen mounts, the process might have been slow enough for them to flee it. Night had won over Winter, in the end, and so dawn had its costs. As it was, though? I let the Sisters guide my hand once more and another gate bloomed in front of our group. Seven heartbeats later, nine riders and their dead horses tumbled through. One was screaming in terror at the fall through the sky of Arcadia he had just escaped, though that ended when he felt an obsidian spear-tip pressing against his throat. He swallowed loudly as my sigil surrounded the lot of them.

"Good morning," I smiled brightly. "I thought we might have a little chat, just you and me and all these heavily armed people surrounding you."

My gaze swept across the soldiers, most of which were still in shock. Some had pulled muscles or broken limbs on arrival, the poor fucker to the rightmost having his horse right over his leg. Yeah, that was shattered for sure. It was only when I saw the uncomprehending gazes taking me in that I realized the slight strategic mistake I had not accounted for. I looked at Indrani and Akua.

"I don't suppose either of you speaks any of the Levantine languages?" I grimaced.

Twin shakes of the head. So no Lunara, Ceseo and what was the third one again? Couldn't remember at the moment. Well, it hardly mattered anyway. I couldn't speak or understand any of them. I'd been meaning to get around to learning some tradertalk, which tended to be understood everywhere in southern Calernia, but I'd had higher priorities as of late.

"What I understand of Lunara is insufficient, but outriders sent to operate in the Principate's heartlands should have at least one individual fluent in a Proceran tongue," Akua pointed out. "If only to speak with the local inhabitants. I have some knowledge of tradertalk that could be of use, in the unlikely event this is not true."

My eyebrow rose. Made sense, and worth a shot regardless.

"Any of you speak Chantant?" I asked in said tongue.

"Who the fuck are you people?" a middle-aged mustachioed man growled back.

It was a very impressive mustache, I mentally conceded. It was refusing to be cowed by the scarf meant to cover it, defiantly peeking out over the edge.

"And there were go," I smiled, shifting to Crepuscular. "Ivah, go wake up General Rumena if it's asleep and bring it back here. We appear to have gotten our hands on fresh intelligence."

"By your will, Losara Queen," my Lord of Silent Steps bowed.

I nodded back fondly, watching it move out swiftly to carry my orders. I turned back to the Levantines.

"Surrender your weapons," I said, back on Chantant. "And remain seated on the ground. You are now joint prisoners of the Empire Ever Dark and the Kingdom of Callow."

That'd been a calculated move. I hadn't truly needed to bring Callow into it, or mention the freshly revived name of the ancient drow empire – which, given that the region was still known as the Everdark, meant didn't take any real brilliance to be able to put together the identity of the grey-skinned warriors surrounding the prisoners. It told me something useful, though: everyone who stilled or went pale could understand the language I was speaking. Out of the nine, four gave a visible reaction. One did not, save for moving back to lean against a tree, but the calculating look in his eyes told me he'd not missed a thing. This one's already thinking of how to get out of this mess, I decided. There were no visible marks of rank on any of them, but I'd guess he was an officer. Clever sorts could be useful, if inclined to talk, but they could also screw up an interrogation pretty badly if allowed to speak up. Best to separate these before we got into it.

"You're the Black Queen," the maybe-officer suddenly said.

In Chantant, too. Interesting.

"In the flesh," I replied, the irony known to few quirking my lips.

The statement had been the offered opening of a conversation, if I was reading this right, but I remained disinclined to allow the prisoners to know what the others had and had not said. People were always more inclined to fold if they believed someone already had.

"Bring them back to camp after taking the weapons," I ordered the drow. "Leave the one who just spoke behind."

I cleared my throat before addressing the Levantines.

"You were told to surrender your weapons," I said. "They will now be collected. Resist and you will be subjected to force. Obey and you will be treated fairly. I will not warn you twice."

They were soldiers, I thought, but also sworn to a crusade. A warning wouldn't be enough for all of them. One of the outriders tried to reach for his scabbard and got a spear through the palm for it, which had another screaming and struggling until one of my warriors decked him in the mouth. Maybe the officer did not resist. I let the drow of my sigil escort the prisoners without a look and gestured at those who remained to step back. It was sunny morning out, the air was crisp and I met the gaze of the Levantine prisoner without blinking.

"Name, rank?" I asked.

"Wasim of Tartessos. I am second in this band," he replied.

Tartessos was... the second northernmost city in Levant, if I remembered correctly, which was for some inexplicable reason built on the edge of the Brocelian Forest. I'd read in some history that the people from there were known to be hardy and ruthless, which considering the boiling cauldron of beasts they lived next to only made sense. I heard Archer unstring her bow before moving to lean against a tree, likely already starting to get bored and paying only the barest necessary attention to this. Diabolist, though, had been studying this Wasim the whole time in silence. I could trust her to pick on anything I'd miss.

"You are an outrider," I said. "In the service of the Dominion?"

"I gave oath to the Lord of Malaga when there was a call to arms," Wasim said. "By the will of the Holy Seljun, he holds command of half the forces of Levant."

"Implying there is no unified command for the armies of the Dominion," Akua noted in Crepuscular. "That could be of use. Levantine nobility rules its lands with only the barest homage paid to their Seljun, so their leaders might chafe at taking orders from anyone else."

I inclined my head in acknowledgement, never taking my eyes off the prisoner.

"Where are the Lord of Malaga and his army, at the moment?" I asked.

How much are you really willing to tell me when I've made no threat?

"Marching for the capital of Iserre," he replied.

"Lying," Diabolist said.

I sighed.

"And we were doing so well, until that," I said. "You struck me as a clever man, Wasim of Tartessos."

I flicked my wrist at Archer. A heartbeat later a longknife was buried up to the hilt into the tree Wasim was lying back against. Less than an inch away from his jugular. I met his eyes squarely.

"Clever men don't make the same mistake twice, do they?" I asked.

The soldier swallowed loudly.

"They do not," he hastily agreed.

"Where are the Lord of Malaga and his army?" I mildly repeated.

"When I was sent out, they were preparing to take a defensive position to the southwest of here," Wasim said. "Near the town of Maleims."

"To defend against who, exactly?" I frowned.

"The League of Free Cities," he said. "They march against the Tenth Crusade, led by the Tyrant of Helike and their madman Hierarch."

My frown deepened. I'd been under the impression the forces of the League were much further south. They were either moving much more quickly than should be possible for a sizable army, or I'd been misinformed.

"Could be a detached force instead of the main host," Archer suggested in Lower Miezani.

She'd regained a semblance of interest in this, it seemed. Probably because she'd gotten to throw a blade at someone.

"They came from the Waning Woods," I said. "That means they don't have a supply train. If they start splitting forces, either they split their limited foodstuffs as well or the detachment starts foraging."

And there wasn't much to live off of in this region. Sure they could start sacking towns and small cities for their reserves but even then the Legions of Terror had pretty much picked clean most of the principality. You couldn't take much food from people already only the verge of starvation. It could just be a bad decision someone up the chain of command had done – either incompetence or lack of information – but that didn't smell right to me. If they were that incompetent and ill-informed, they wouldn't have made it through the Waning Woods in the first place.

"If we assume the League force was sent out with sufficient supplies, then something prompted that investment of resources," I finally said. "Something we don't know about, but the League's generals do."

"Wasim," Akua said. "Was your band of outriders sent out with specific purpose?"

The Levantine man grimaced.

"We were to investigate rumours," he said.

"Of?"

"Skirmishes between two armies," Wasim admitted. "Legionaries and the League."

I traded a look with Akua. There was no way, we both knew, that the legions under Marshal Grem could be this far east. But there was another army on the continent that fielded legionaries.

So what the Hells was the Army of Callow doing out here, and why the Hells was the League of Free Cities fighting it?

Esryok

Hurry hurry hurry, boys and girls, men and women of all ages, step right up step right up. We've got something for everyone, links you can click on, "voting now" buttons you can click on, a long list of fictional marvels you will wonder at! Make your way over to <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> and see for yourself!

(go vote)

Dauntless

Vote!!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Someguy

"I see how it is. We agree to single combat and of course you can still use your enchanted sword, but I bring a single massive flying fortress and suddenly it's 'treachery' and 'against the spirit of the agreement'."

– Dread Emperor Perfidious

I take it that prior to his ascension, Perfidious' given name was Albion?

tmeenaks

I mean, man has a point. He had to lie, scheme, murder, and commit multiple warcrimes just to get his throne while his Callowan equivalent tugs on a sword stuck in a rock and boom. King of Callow. And don't get me started on what those enchanted swords are. The damned lone swordsman got a feather of an angel as his weapon. I think a couple flying fortresses would even the field a little, in more ways than one

Skaddix

I feel blue balled I want them to find them about Masego and the Warlock and the fall of a city. Looks like we are getting there.

Interesting the Tyrant and Hierarch are not where they thought. If I had to guess a fast moving army that is never where you think it is does seem Tyrant like.

Dainpdf

Not just that, but no one knows their numbers, either.

The two might be connected, if we assume that all the previously reported League troops were scarecrows carried by gargoyles.

nipi

That just begs to question. How many gargoyles does he have? And how useful are they in a fight?

Decius

How many scarecrows can one gargoyle carry?

Javvies

The plot thickens.

But seriously ... it's a very good question. At a guess, if it is the Army of Callow, they could have been sent to link up with Grem and company and ensure that they were able to make it back to Callow. Or to cover a withdrawal from an attempt to rescue Amadeus.

Or they could be wrong, and these rumored Legionnaires are actually Grem's.

Dainpdf

Maybe Callow got nervous looking at the Tyrant so close to the border, not actually attacking Procer.

naturalnuke

Maybe this whole thing is just a clever(read:batshit insane) plan by the Tyrant.

Death Knight

Clever and batshit insane are always awarded after the plan succeeds or fails respectively. With the Tyrant, it's 50/50.

Dainpdf

I bet it is. Probably the first step, too.

I still wonder when he's going to provoke Neshamah, though. Seems to be one of the only people in whose eyes he hasn't spit yet. Though I guess Cat nasty count, as well...

Dainpdf

*may

Death Knight

Well Neshamah is the OG Evil. I think Kyros might just gush in his presence.

nick012000

The Dead King isn't OG Evil. He was predated by the Twilight Sages, at the very least. He's just one of the oldest surviving evils.

Jeremy

So. In Iserre alone, there are 18 k Praesi Legionnaires (including Grem One Eye and the dragon Catastrophe), two Levantine armies totaling 80 k men, the League's forces (somewhere between 40 to 100 k, with the Tyrant and Heirarch), 20 k Proceran troops with reinforcements on the way, Cat, Archer, and Akua with their 50 k drow... and now the Army of Callow.

What glorious, utter chaos this is all going to be. Exactly as planned, I suspect.

Randodude

I can hear a faint sound of the Benny hill theme chase scene.

Now that would be a sight to see

Liliet

Yes, that... that sounds like it accurately describes Iserre right now.

Nguyen Hong Hai

"Once again the land is on fire and it's not my fault".
Yours truly.

Dainpdf

Meanwhile, none of these people are fighting the Dead King...

nipi

Wonder if the the Dead King has a secret pact with that "wonderful child"?

Dainpdf

Maybe. The big question is how long until Kairos betrays him.

Also: maybe the ancient monster under Helike is just a means of communication with Neshamah? I wonder.

Yotz

It seems, we are heading into the Ancient Mosters' Land steadily.

I mean – your friendly neighborhood Nyarlathotep, elves, DK, the Dweller Under Helike, the dead yet still alive thing to be dragged out of the lake on Cordelia's order, something on the lower levels of goblin catacombs... When there may be Demons in Hierophant's custody who – perhaps – were released or let loose due to recent events. And the Archer's Best Friend, the Absinthe One, who supposedly was dealt with by the Peregrine and Co... The last Red Letter looming on the horizon, for the sake of all things foul and unholy...

PS: Plot twist – the Thing Under Helike was Bard!!!
111oneoneeleven

Also, I need to cut down on ellipses.

Yotz

Also, that's quite an assumption here – to think that Kairos haven't betrayed Neshamah the moment supposed deal was sealed.

Or, more seriously – DK would be quite an oaf to not include that sudden but inevitable betrayal in his designs and plan around it, just like Tyrant would plan around that planning, and then it just Traitorouses all the way down.

Faiir

It sure does sound like four armies and one!

danh3107

A chapter with some meat, nice nice. I suspect that we're going to be running into some familiar characters here soon. We just may get to seeThief (if her name hasn't changed) and Hakram again.

Raved Thrad

Maybe a ViviCat reunion is in order?

"Hi, Vivienne."

"CAT!" awkward spontaneous hug

"Uh, hey, you missed me? Did things go to shit that badly?"

"Cat, you're... you're warm."

"Er, yeah, about that..."

"So warm..." camera pans away

Gunslinger

Sadly she's as straight as a razors edge

Yotz

Raved Thrad

Breaking out of the group hug, Masego's gaze shifted repeatedly between Viviane and Catherine.

"You're both pregnant."

Hakram, still one-handed, nearly dropped his drink "What?"

"They are both pregnant."

"Er... actually, so is Indrani."

Suddenly, Masego went weak in the knees. "I'm going to be an uncle," he said, dazedly, as he sat on the ground.

Eyes glinting evilly, Catherine smirked. "Just think of it as practice for when you and Indrani decide to hatch one of your own."

Yotz

Well, someone need to be a Loki in that saga – let's just hope that one of the children wouldn't have eight hooves...

Raved Thrad

Who knows what powers the First Under The Night possesses?

Nerfnow

So just to make sure right?

The following forces are currently on the southern front of this world war right

The league army with unkown numbers but we know the tyrant and heariach are with it

The dominion army of 80k split into 2 forces of 40k and under unkown names or leadership

The 20k porcer border army rushing after the league by passed there position

Black legion of 18k under the command of grem and scribe

And at salia there will be 20k conscripts army and there gathering all the remaining nobles armies to bring that up to 40k under control of cordelia and other nobles

And finally we have a heroic band that has Amadeus captured that has saint, pilgrim and the rogue sorc in is heading to saila

Sup

And since we know that the gods above has authorized the destruction of porcer to win whatever they want, only the bard, saint and cordelia know this it means we got a lot of groups with vastly different agendas plotting in this region thag cat has no way to findout before there plots come to fruition

Cordelia – make sure porcer survive and is now unleashing a doomsday weapon to fire, has nominal control of the porcer forces gathering at salia

Gods Above – authorized the destruction of porcer, has an herioc band here and with Pilgrim here thay also give them ability to manipulate the dominion armies at the right time and can also hijack those armies of porcer if they can get a hero to the leadership, and they have Amadeus and are using him to bait others to

Amadeus legions – currently in disarray with him captured, still got Scribe and Grem may be retreating or in pursuit of the heroes to rescue him

The League- Tyrant is a wildcard who may know whats going on but we know Hierarch goal is to bring the choir of judgement to justice and that he been scrying randomly

Out of these groups only the heroes and league know about what cat had done and know about the drow

Liliet

Saint of Swords is not Gods Above.

Dresden 67

^^^ This. I don't know why people assume that the Saint speaks for any Choir other than her own, much less the Gods Above.

Javvies

It's likely related to the fact that Saint appears to have been working with Bard to arrange the downfall of Procer, implying that Above had signed off on it and directed Bard to assist.

Dresden 67

We don't really understand the relationship between the Bard and the Gods. We also know that the Bard works in mysterious ways. What she seems to want out of a situation frequently has nothing to do with her actual goal.

Liliet

^^^ This.

Liliet

She's not even connected to a Choir! Very few heroes are actually!

Dresden 67

She probably doesn't have a Choir, but we don't know for sure. There was a line back in the Kaleidoscope interludes that made me think she might.

Something about how 'Compassion isn't my wheelhouse', implying that something else is.

Liliet

I think we would have known by now.

I think it was said that 'she cut Heaven with her sword' or something else confusing like that about how she became a hero, and Tariq has described her as having spent her life 'blurring the boundary between thought and act'. That speaks to me of someone who very much doesn't have anyone giving her directions from Above, nor empowered by anyone's choice but her own.

But, true, we haven't exactly had explicit confirmation or anything. That I remember, at least.

RanVor

Because let's face it – she would have no way of pulling off the bullshit she intends to pull off if she didn't have Heavens behind her.

Liliet

You're assuming she's estimating her capability to pull it off correctly.

RanVor

Well, I guess she might be that stupid, but if she's not a credible threat, why even bring it up?

Liliet

She found a pivot and yanked on it.

Named are always credible threats, however unlikely the odds. Saint is the definition of lone wolf who doesn't care what anybody else thinks about what she's doing, from what we've seen of her. We SHOULD be scared, even if her plan is bloody stupid.

RanVor

Sure. Except it's bullshit.

Saint's plan is a massive behemoth of a plot that would require at least majority of the heroes manipulating a continent-spanning story to change the balance of power forever. Something like that is not introduced unless it can actually happen.

Liliet

I don't think that's what her plan is.

We'll see.

RanVor

Well, I'm basing my opinion on what she told Cordelia in Fatalism III. I don't think she's cunning enough to lie in that conversation. I might be wrong, of course, but she spelled out her plan pretty clearly.

Liliet

Here's the quote.

““You don't understand what this is, do you?” the Saint smiled. “This is not the War of the Grand Alliance or the second invasion of Callow. It's the Tenth Crusade. You slapped the gauntlet down, girl, and now Below's picking it up. There is no compromise to be had anymore, no subtle manoeuvring. You declared war on the Hellgods, and the sword will not return to the sheath until one side falls.”

“A crusade can be waged intelligently,” the First Prince said. “It must, or it will fail like those before it.”

“That's where you misunderstand,” the Saint amiably said. “You think all of this...”

Her hand moved to encompass their surroundings.

“Is inviolable,” she continued. “It's an understandable weakness. You rule here, after all, and love for your people is no sin. But everything dies, Cordelia Hasenbach. Even empires.”

The blond woman paled.

“This is treason,” she coldly said. “As good as a confession you seek the destruction of the Principate.”

“This whole damned house is rotten to the bone, girl,” the Saint said. “You've toiled and troubled and fought like lion, but it'll die with you. You know that already, deep down. Maybe the Principate was what it should be, ages ago, but it has not been in a very long time. It's greed and power and lies, hungry wars and treachery made into the mortar of palaces. The sickness is all it knows, now.”

"You are mad," Cordelia spoke in a hushed whisper. "Gods Above, your mind has gone and you would take all of us with it."

"Oh, we'll bleed," the Saint mused. "We'll lose badly, at first. And then we'll claw our way back up, inch by inch. Evil always wins at the start, but it's us who owns the conclusion. And from the ruins something better will rise. This empire's already a corpse, but we'll send it off with a pyre glorious enough it'll redeem the old faults."

"I will have you arrested," the First Prince of Procer said. "I will have you killed, if that is what it takes."

"You just worry about getting the armies marching," Laurence de Montfort dismissed. "Odds are I won't survive the scrap, but that's all right. It's a good war to die in. It'll be the crusade that settles it, you see: too many old monsters came crawling out on both sides. Won't be the kind of losses a side can recover from."

"You are not listening to a word I say," Cordelia whispered, aghast.

The Saint of Swords rose to her feet jauntily. The First Prince's muscles clenched, though she managed to flinch when the Chosen approached her. The old woman clapped her shoulder.

"Keep your chin up, girl," she said. "Sacrifice is always ugly business, but we'll come through in the end. To rise from the ashes, there needs to be a fire first."

The Saint of Swords strolled out, boots slapping against the stone, and the sound of the door closing behind her was the death cry of an era."

Oh, and a little before that

"Not merely the conclave," she deduced. "It is your own notion to have the Black Queen named Arch-heretic of the East."

The old woman grinned harshly.

"They were eager enough, truth be told," the Saint said. "Just needed a little push. That I needed to give it at all is what got me in such a meddling mood. You're flinching, Hasenbach. You've been down here too long, the iron's beginning to rust.""

From this, I read the following: Saint has opinions on Procer and how it's run, and her opinion is that it's objectively coming to an end, and the only choice they get to make is how many of the Enemy they take with them. Her conclusion being "all of them if possible". While counting Catherine as Enemy.

She thinks it'll work out this way on its own, if she just gives it a little push. She sees it as inevitable, not a convoluted plan.

RanVor

Well, my interpretation is that she intends to draw all the forces of Evil to Procer, to fuel the narrative momentum of the Crusade with its destruction, with a side benefit of purging a corrupted nation to make place for a pure one. It makes sense, in a rather demented fashion.

Liliet

My interpretation is that she sees all the forces of Evil as already converging on Procer, and the only choice is whether they (cowardly) try to make a truce or fight until the end.

RanVor

So this is it. I think we have to agree to disagree, because I don't see how either of us has any chance to actually convince the other.

Liliet

Agreed.

It's been an interesting discussion though.

Javvies

I think Saint is hoping/expecting/aiming for the forces of Evil to pull something along the lines of another Triumphant – mass conquest by Evil, followed by everything falling apart on them with a new generation of rising Heroes.

Sounds massively complicated, but when you realize that it's predicated on "Heroes and Good always win in the end/eventually, no matter how good a winning streak Evil has had earlier", Saint doesn't actually have to do all that much, though. She just needs to keep the Crusade from being smart about things, ie stopping a truce with Callow to prioritize the Dead King, keep the Crusaders trying to fight in all directions simultaneously. That is, all Saint thinks she needs to do for her "plan" to "work" is ensure that the Crusade/Good-aligned forces, go down fighting Evil, and then the next generation of Heroes who do the liberating and defeat Evil will be in a position to forge a new nation based solely on the principles of Heroism and Above out of the ashes.

Liliet

Heroes don't win on the basis of having a quality power base. They win on the basis of being right. If Laurence believes she is right, she has basis to believe she will win. And she doesn't need other people to confirm her opinions to think she's right

Javvies

Thing is, Saint doesn't actually have to actively do all that much to get her "plan" to work – after all Heroes always win in the end, even if the Villain had a terrifyingly good run in the middle of things. Saint's trying to set up the Dead King to pull a Triumphant – conquer successfully and then collapse with a new generation of rising Heroes.

Liliet

Exactly.

She doesn't need Heavens' explicit support to think it will work, she's just confident that her read on the situation is correct.

RanVor

You're almost right. Almost.

You see, all Saint has to do is to ensure that nobody will question the necessity of having to fight all Evil nations on the continent at once – and for that, she needs majority of heroes on her side, just because they could easily challenge her on that. And the only way to get all those heroes to subscribe to her insanity is to have at least a guarantee of non-interference from the Heavens.

Javvies

I think that it doesn't matter as much to Saint's "plan" whether or not anyone on the Crusader side questions the necessity of fighting everyone else, as long as nobody can actually prevent the Crusade from fighting someone. After all, Saint didn't seem to care about Cordelia questioning the "plan" and calling it stupid.

And she pretty much locked that in already when she got Cat declared Arch-Heretic of the East. Because there's no way to cut a deal with or otherwise avoid fighting the Dead King, the Tyrant of Helike/League, or even Praes (eventually). But Cat and Callow don't really need to fight Procer and the Crusade on offense, and if the Crusaders don't attack Callow because they're busy fighting elsewhere ..

Oh man, there's an explanation for why the Army of Callow might be in Procer – Saint (or someone aligned with her plan) swiped some Crusader troops and raided Callow to provoke a response into Procer.

That said ... I'm pretty sure that while Above may or may not have explicitly ordered Saint to take this course, they certainly aren't objecting to it.

RanVor

Actually, the League can be neutralized laughably easily by killing the Hierarch or otherwise removing him from power. He's the only reason the League even exists as a unified political entity. Once he's gone, their cohesion will collapse almost instantly.

Praes is pretty much crippled by now, and prolonging the conflict is unlikely to help here. Malicia's best option is to withdraw from the war and prepare for seemingly inevitable clash with Callow.

Callow and the Empire Ever Dark are already working against the Dead King. The only reason they aren't allied with Procer yet is that the Good guys are too dumb to realize that.

The only enemy Procer actually has to fight is the Dead King (and the Ratlings, but they haven't attacked yet). All others can be quickly pacified, delayed or even allied with... Unless somebody makes sure they aren't.

Javvies

Ehhhh, killing the Tyrant of Helike would probably require a Heroic Band, or at least a group of Heroes working together, to accomplish. And they'd probably need to get through his army somehow, which makes a sudden decapitation strike decidedly difficult for a pickup group of Heroes without an army in support, at which point you're more or less back to fighting it out.

Anyways, the point is, even if people question the idea if fighting everyone they can simultaneously, unless they have a way to stop fighting some of those opponents, and keep them from attacking at the same time, there isn't really all that much anyone can do to really stop Saint's plan from proceeding at this point.

As an analogy, Puerto Rico and Puerto Rican residents can complain about Federal priorities and Trump as much as they want, but without statehood (or moving to a state and becoming an eligible and registered voter there), they can't do all that much to change things.

Besides, most other Heroes are probably busy dealing with the Dead King, not thinking through what Saint is "planning". After all, most Heroes generally don't actually need to do much thinking ahead and/or planning – they can afford to just charge in blindly and have faith and trust in Above and Providence that things will work out all right (for them/their goal) in the end, because that's the way the world and story tends to work if you're a Hero. That is, even if there are Heroes who would oppose Saint's "plan", most, if not all, of them probably don't even realize that Saint has a "plan".

Gunslinger

Wait why is this? She wouldn't be a hero if she didn't have their approval. Plus Pilgrim seems to have been in on her plan too

Liliet

She had their approval to become a hero. Doesn't mean they whisper in her ear about her every action, only the Choir of Mercy does that. And we have Word of God confirming that it doesn't work like 'fallen paladin' rules: the further you stray from your Role the weaker you get as a Named, and heroes who betray their morals end up broken inside. There's no explicit revocation of the powers granted.

Do we have any kind of indication Pilgrim was in on the Arch-Heretic plan? It goes rather directly against his stated motivation for not allying with Catherine before Keter – he wanted to help keep Cordelia's dream together.

Liliet

Yep.

Brokndremes

Porcer -> Procer*

...sorry.

edrey

this is way too much, only the dead king army miss there, only one thing, i believe akua spoke in lunara in the battle of the camps, three words but still

Dainpdf

Oh, good catch! Gotta check it out, but it may be the beginning (or middle? End?) of some nefarious plan she's brewing.

Liliet

She said she knows /little/ of it, not that she doesn't know it entirely.

Let me pull up the quotes and check.

““Glory in strife,” the beggar screamed out in Lunara.

Did Catherine know any Levantine tongues? Most likely not. Still, a responding battle cry was in order. It was the heroic thing to do. Something about Callow? Akua pondered her understanding of Catherine's temper. I am angry, the sorceress decided, because I am disappointed as I have mystifyingly failed to grasp that the Heavens prefer their pawns powerful yet rather dim. I must now protect the venerable sanctity of farms and countless peasants everywhere, as I am very concerned with their fate even though they are ignorant and full of lice.

"Fuck off and die," Akua called back, tinting her voice with wrath."

...okay this is not the quote I thought this would be.

Also we don't know for sure if she answered in Lunara. She comments that Catherine likely wouldn't even understand it, and she's actually trying to live up to her disguise here. Actually even with the assumption that Akua speaks Lunara I get the impression that "a corresponding battle cry" would make sense as a response to the tone, just Catherine /also/ crying out in this situation even without understanding the words.

And "glory in strife" strikes me as the kind of word combination that, presuming Lunara is at least distantly related to Chantant which Akua knows, could be recognized even with a dim grasp on the language. Hell, even without a relationship like that I remember "glory" being one of the English words I knew at the age of like... 8.

I don't think Akua has anything to gain from being dishonest here.

Paollo passoline

Thank you!

Dainpdf

Damn. Quite the cliff to hang from.

Also, much appreciate all the Archer and Cat (and Akua) time on this chapter. They've become quite a team. Thank you for the chapter!

Darkening

Well that's ominous as hell. Not many reasons I can think for Callow to be around here. I've gotta admit, I'm very curious to see how the League's army performs. They've got the stygian spears with their incredible reputation that we never got to see used back in book 2, the very disciplined Helikean army, the fanatics of Bellerophon that will probably die before breaking and finally have good military leadership, and the standing armies of the others. I'm curious if mercantis got in on this too, hiring up what's left of their mercenaries, or if they left the official cities of the league to fight this on their own. Or maybe it's funding their supply situation. They can certainly afford it. But really, this diverse toolkit of different armies, led by a Tyrant, which is a Name with a well deserved reputation on the battlefield. I can't wait to see what he does with them, with most of the heroes too busy with the dead king to bother him.

Dainpdf

I doubt Mercantis is parting with any money unless they're somehow being given more. Unlike the rest of the League, they have no need to obey the Hierarch (who seems to hate them, given his comments on their envoy way back).

Euodiachloris

I don't think anybody actually likes Mercantis. 😞

Dainpdf

For the right price, though, Mercantis will like you!

Nerfnow

And since we know that the gods above has authorized the destruction of porcer to win whatever they want, only the bard, saint and cordelia know this it means we got a lot of groups with vastly different agendas plotting in this region thag cat has no way to findout before there plots come to fruition

Cordelia – make sure porcer survive and is now unleashing a doomsday weapon to fire, has nominal control of the porcer forces gathering at salia

Gods Above – authorized the destruction of porcer, has an herioc band here and with Pilgrim here thay also give them ability to manipulate the dominion armies at the right time and can also hijack those armies of porcer if they can get a hero to the leadership, and they have Amadeus and are using him to bait others to

Amadeus legions – currently in disarray with him captured, still got Scribe and Grem may be retreating or in pursuit of the heroes to rescue him

The League- Tyrant is a wildcard who may know whats going on but we know Hierarch goal is to bring the choir of judgement to justice and that he been scrying randomly

Out of these groups only the heroes cia the god above and league via Hierarch know about what cat had done with the drow

Skaddix

Not really Saint of Swords flipped the table cause she thinks Procer is too far gone and too corrupt. But she doesn't work for a Choir like Pilgrim or Hanno so there is no proof she did it cause the Gods Above told her.

Liliet

^^^ this. We know Pilgrim wanted to keep Procer intact when he spoke to Cat before the Keter expedition. The Choir of Mercy, at least, certainly didn't have a pre-existing intention to condemn it.

RanVor

If so, then either Tariq doesn't know about the plan (which I find unlikely, considering he's currently disobeying Cordelia), or he's since got on board with it. Assuming the latter is true, that's at least two heroes with the power and authority to make it happen. I imagine that if the Heavens were opposed to the plan, they'd at least let their favorite minions know they're disapprove of what they're doing.

Liliet

Or he low key disagrees with Saint but finds it more productive to rope her into going along with his plan than to argue / oppose her, now that the deed is done.

And the Heavens don't seem very fond of giving their minions their opinions when they disagree. See: the fucking House of Light schism. If they allow two parts of the House of Light to excommunicate each other without weighing in on the disagreement and while still providing Light to both, they aren't going to interfere with mortals settling their wager with Below.

Choirs do – interfere, that is. Saint isn't connected to a Choir, though, and different Choirs seem to have very different opinions on how things should be done.

You're FAR overestimating the cohesion there.

Gunslinger

Hmm this answers my previous question but I'm still torn by it. Dooming Procer to the Dead King is a pretty big thing. Not something Tariq would let by easily. In fact his previous opposition to its destruction could be his personal opinion but if the gods above spoke to him he'd fold

Liliet

Gods Above don't speak to their heroes.

RanVor

Not directly, no. But the Choirs do, so the option is still on the table.

Liliet

True!

Dainpdf

Could be. I'd wait for a more explicit position before I judge him.

Pilgrim is definitely ruthless enough to let a kingdom die if he believes it will serve the greater good. He does not have the same hatred of nobility that Saint does, though.

Dainpdf

Heroes have a clear ability to disagree with the choirs (lethal though it may be, with judgment), perhaps with the exception of Contrition.

We saw that in the latest Tariq interlude, where he could have refused to go and stayed with his not-wife, and with the fact that heroes can fall.

Heck, I'm not sure but I suspect if Saint continues going for maximum butchery of all she deems evil she might fall herself.

Liliet

^^^ this.

The side of heroes has full free will and as much independent autonomy as the side of villains does, just less infighting.

Dainpdf

I wouldn't say "full" considering two of the three choirs whose effects we've seen in detail eff with the head of the recipient, but outside that yes.

Liliet

Depends on how you define "free will".

I don't get the impression that the angels fucked with Willy's head much, he was already contrite before meeting them, they just more or less confirmed what he was already thinking in a grand divine way – which also happens to match the dynamic in all other hero/choir relationships we've seen. Hanno was confused about the concept of justice and rather remained so after meeting Judgement, Tariq more or less summoned the Ophanim to him through the power of thinking the exact same things they do (and they don't talk to him when he's thinking things they don't agree with, see: his family drama in the bonus chapter. I get the impression that Choirs can't fuck with the heads of Named much, I mean fuck Catherine's genuinely prone to being contrite but she still told Contrition to fuck off successfully while seeking resurrection from them. Named are more or less defined by having strong will and conviction that cannot be shaken easily even via supernatural means, and angels don't have a super special backdoor to that, even with their own champions.

Dainpdf

I'm not sure whether Will and Hanno got their Names before speaking to the choirs. Actually, no, I'm pretty sure they didn't. And Cat seemed pretty sure that Contrition can basically browbeat any mortal.

Heck, people were impressed she stood up to the choir. That implies it was not fully expected. Part of that is she's wasn't that contrite back then.

There is more wiggle room with Judgment – see the boatman – but to refuse them will break a mortal – again, see the boatman.

Liliet

Yes, they got their Names in the process of interacting with the Choir, your point? Catherine stood up to Black's Name-pressure before she was Named too. Will isn't a result of being Named, it's a prerequisite.

And Catherine, again, came to them. With a demand, at that.

You do have something of a point, the Choirs are bloody terrifying. I don't think I'll fold on this until I know the boatman's story though

Javvies

The Choirs are bound by the rules of the story/narrative – remember, she rearranged things to be playing a quasi-heroic Role in that moment – she claimed to be the heir to the Throne of Callow, with an enemy, and pulled the Sword from the Stone – that's a "Heroic Moment" that leaves you living – the Narrative mandated that she walk out of that a living person, not undead or a disembodied soul possessing her own corpse.

She demanded that the angels play by the rules of the Narrative and give her the resurrection to which she was Narratively-entitled, and then she popped out a new Aspect of Take on them when they tried to resist.

Liliet

Yeah.

And the story doesn't say "and then the angels overwrote the hero's will to make them their puppet". The story says "the angels empowered and guided the hero".

Dainpdf

Oh, my point was that the Choir didn't appear to Named and then convert them. How that was relevant to what you were saying now eludes me. Apologies.

Liliet

...basically, the tl;dr of my point is that the question is not whether or not the Choirs are capable of subverting the mortals' free will (they are if they try, we know that) but if they do. To their chosen champions, specifically. Named are universally strong-willed enough that merely being near an angel won't overwrite their entire personality the way it happens to an average person – again, that's a prerequisite.

My argument is that they don't. Whether it is because they don't have the capacity to or because they choose not to is not, to me, a meaningless distinction, since I see them as more of an automated system than individuals capable of meaningful choices.

Liliet

* not a meaningful distinction. Fuck. WORDPRESS EDIT FUNCTION PLS

Euodiachloris

The Choirs are more insidious than just reaching into potential heroes' skulls to remake those brains the way they'd like them to be – they find people willing to choose to let them... direct... them, instead.

Which involves... influence. But, consent to hand over the keys to the locks is sought. Always. Good luck evicting the new... perspective... afterwards, though. 😊

Liliet

That's about as far as I can see it going, yeah.

With the clarification that I don't think Choirs have deliberate agency in this: it's a more-or-less automated system, angels aren't moral agents. Antropomorphizing them is a mistake 😊

Yotz

Contrition may stand as an exception not due to Heroes bound to it not having the option to disagree, but due to them being so traumatized by their own acts that they simply unable to chose it.

Also, Saint may be following the footsteps of the last of the Greyhill Paladins, if you are correct.

Dainpdf

Well, if one has the ability to guilt almost anyone into compliance, isn't it essentially taking away their free will?

TBH Justice does a similar thing, except by throwing one's imperfection into one's face until one submits.

Yotz

I'd say that's more akin to a conspiracy of convenience – arguably, last true moment of free will for each Choir-connected comes in the moment of formal request from a mortal; after that, mortal's interests are either in complete alignment with the Choir's (Contrition), or are always of secondary importance and subservient to the supreme moral absolute of the Choir (Judgement).

Elaborating on that – in case of Contrition time may heal the wound, lessening the motivating drive of the original crime, but since the Choir is changeless by its nature, it maintains status quo by constantly reopening wound and reverting mortal to a starting point – until the contrition quota would be met. Which is to say – not in mortal's life, probably.

With Judgement one simply surrenders the morally dubious right to judge to unarguably morally impeccable source – the Choir. In such case all one need is faith – for even if you can't understand why exactly the punishment was meted out in each particular case, you have unerrable, sinless, by definition morally superior Choir to lean on; and simply devout yourself to fulfilling their will. After all, they know better than you, their vision is clear, and their Judgement is not clouded by lies, preconceptions, and sentiments. If you go against their will, you are left to rely on your own sense of just – your faulty, flawed understanding of it. Which goes against your nature that led you to the Choir in first place.

Now, Mercy is an odd one in such perspective. Not long ago, there was a bout of discussion in regards to imprecise nature of suffering measurements and consequences of that imprecision for relation between the Chosen and the Choir.

Given that many – if not all – situations where Mercy is involved can not be solved with clean-cut choice between some suffering and no suffering; but, rather, routinely devolve into a choice between arbitrary non-zero amounts of suffering; the roles of mortal and Choir in that pair may be reversed.

Since the Choir of Mercy can't make a choice that'll lead to increase of the world suffering, but are forced to choose nevertheless – the mortal takes on active role in the union. The weight of choice lies on him, freeing the Choir from Azimov's trap ; of course, the mortal must face the repercussions for increasing the measure of pain, which makes the Chosen a sole exception to the inaction rule – and we see Pilgrim reflecting on how he is damned, but being at peace with it, since by accepting the evil on himself, he spares the others from it and all the pain related.

In essentiality, Chosen of Judgement and Contrition forfeit their right to free will by surrendering the burden of choice for clarity of vision in former case; and seeking redemption – and damn the price! – in latter. Each problematic situation you may find yourself in would be immediately solved up on-high – all you need to do is to follow instructions as precisely as you possibly can.

Chosen of Mercy come as more free-willed simply because it's they who make all the decisions in their union – unlike the strict non-negotiable dictate of two other Choires. Mercy usually simply informs you that there is pain somewhere, and someone ailing. How to resolve situation is up to you in such case. You'll be damned by any choice you'd make – but at least you soothed some pain, and made the world a bit happier. That's why, probably, Mercy doesn't make formal contracts – they just make you feel, and leave actions – or inactions – to you. You seek Justice, you seek Redemption – but Kindness finds you by itself. And its blade cuts deeper than Judgement or Contrition could ever even imagine.
...or could've, if they could imagine things in first place, that is.

Liliet

It's been repeated many times that Hanno is a very atypical hero of Judgement. "I do not judge" is an exception. Normally, Judgement heroes are very much known for meting out their own verdicts.

You can't extrapolate a pattern from what we explicitly know to be an exception.

Yotz

But then again, what are the qualities need to receive a positive answer from Judgement? I mean, if they routinely chose only people of certain mindset, those people would act simply as semi-mindless appendages of the Choir: they'll have enough free will to seek and destroy, but not to act beyond the dogma.

Then again – the pool is too shallow for concrete conclusion, even with Hanno being atypical: we just can't tell what typical is here.

Liliet

Very true.

Dainpdf

Quite the essay.

Yotz

Mea culpa, mea maxima culpa...

Dainpdf

That was a compliment. It was insightful and interesting.

Dainpdf

Oh, and I prefer to think of it as her pulling a Miko Miyazaki.

Yotz

...
And now I need to re-read that too.
Damn you, Sheoldred...

RanVor

So am I the only one who sees obvious ways the Heavens can benefit from Laurence's plan?

Dainpdf

Just because the motives seem to fit doesn't mean it's happening. And I suspect you have a different perspective on the Heavens than I.

But do tell me how it helps their quest of preventing pain and eradicating evil.

RanVor

Oh, I am sure that my perspective on the Heavens is VERY different than yours.

For starters, I do not believe that preventing pain is anywhere near the top of their list of priorities. Sure, there are the Ophanim – but that's only one Choir, and even they care more about smiting Evil than actually sparing people suffering.

In my interpretation, the gods – all gods – are dogmatic. Their first priority is winning the wager. The way they try to achieve it differs between Above and Below, but in both cases, all other concerns are subordinate to that main goal.

Now, the Principate of Procer is obviously faulty as a Good nation. The nobility is corrupt, self-serving and impious. The tenets of the House of Light are perverted to serve earthly pursuits. The common people are oppressed and forced to fight in petty civil wars, giving their lives for greed of the Princes instead of protecting their land from the predations of Evil. It's not hard to understand why the Heavens would be displeased with that. I don't see why wouldn't they consider it expendable enough to sacrifice it to ensure the downfall of their opponents' greatest success, especially considering that when they win, they can build another, better nation on top of it.

You can, of course, disagree with me, but I have neither time nor energy to argue with you right now, so don't expect me to reply.

Dainpdf

It is doubtful whether the Saint's plan will guarantee the downfall of the Dead King, or even Cat or Malicia. I also doubt that Cat counts as the greatest success of the Gods Below, especially now that she slipped the apotheosis trap. Malicia is also floundering, herself. Is the largest good nation in Calernia really worth sacrificing for this? Especially when it is in the middle of fighting the Dead King? This strikes me as throwing the baby out with the bath water.

RanVor

I meant Neshamah, but whatever.

NZPIEFACE

tfw you give your regency to someone on the good side and they join the fight against the baddies but you come back with a baddy army

caoimhinh

Interesting, so the Legions of Callow are also in the region? Time for gathering forces!

Typos found:

- It'd be and advantage / an advantage
- given that ever corpse made here / every corpse
- Will it by bloody ice and snow / Will it be
- I cannot not tell you from which region / I can not tell you
- The thing was, I thought as I watched her work, was that / delete one of the 'was'
- power than was an aspect invoked / that
- allowed to he slug it out / allowed her to slug it out
- people already only the verge of starvation / on the verge

Nerfnow

Seems to me that the that we underestimated the Heroes and there are doing the same thing the dead king did with his plan back in the day,

By taking Amadeus to Salia they taking initiative and forcing a fight there and by giving that breaking speech to Cordelia they got her preparing something no one would have predicted and can be blamed on the villains in the aftermath

And since Cordelia is gathering the rest of the porcer nobles that either werent in the city to begin with or on the frontlines the destruction of Salia will be the effective end of porcer as the the remaining nobles on the frontline will be easy pickings for heros to influnce as they fight by heros side against whatever

And since most will believe that the villains were behind it no one will be left that knows what the heroes are plotting

lqueenofblades1

Why do you keep saying "Porcer" lol. It's "Procer"

Yotz

Probably because of close reminiscence of character traits of Proceran High Society with that of porcines depicted in fables and folk tales.

Rey d`Tutto

To Pork, or not to Prok. Is that the question?
Yes, our Proceran folks are depicted with a distinctly Porcine nobility. The biggest influence (current terrestrial tech here) on whether the Pig you raise grows fast is what & how much you feed it. So our society depicts Pigs as greedy. Proceran has waged war of conquest against every neighbor nation. Greed = Conquest.
That is all

Liliet

I like this idea ;u;

Sugar Roll

Whoa, Cat just said she didn't have a Name anymore. So the Squire and the Black Knight Names are up for grabs.

lqueenofblades1

We don't know if Black has transitioned. Squire is up for grabs, we don't know about Black.

And honestly, I'm hoping that Abigail chick becomes the Squire.

Liliet

We know for certain that Black has lost his Name from the Epilogue. He's not out of the woods as far as being Named and generally tangled in the story, but Black Knight isn't him anymore.

"Ah, already under the spell. He had neither heard nor felt the man cast. Interesting. He truly was bereft of even the smallest trace of his Name."

"“I am,” Amadeus said, “no longer the Black Knight.”

“You don't fit that groove anymore,” Marguerite said. “

Liliet

And I'm hoping Ines does. Abigail seems far too determined to NOT make any more effort than she absolute has to. Blindingly competent non-Named is the path she's walking by choice ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Now that's a VERY interesting idea. Fits with the text nicely:

Andrew Mitchell

"Ring the bell, soldier," the man in plate said.

His eyes were wreathed with light, she saw as she faced him. No, with Light.

"Chosen," she croaked out.

"Go," he said. "Your courage tonight did not go unnoticed."

Liliet

Yes! I made an analysis back then on it being likely, and I still haven't seen a reason why it wouldn't be.

Except for the meta reason of the number of people I expect to get heroic Names now reaching three, so maybe my logic is flawed somewhere.

Or maybe we're going to get a lot of new Heroes real soon

Yotz

The question is: how?

There are not that many reliable pathways between Callow and that part of Procer, to my recollection: Northern Pass near Harrow; Red Flower Vales, utterly devastated by the Warlock and the Witch; and Waning Woods.

...Plus the fourth option, of which below.

First option would imply some sort of deal between Cordelia and Regency – which brings the question: what was promised; while Vales can be reopened by more or less mundane means – in which case, that may be purely Callowan initiative.

Third variant is completely improbable without Wild Hunt cutting a deal with either Regency or Hellhound personally – for neither of them have insanity of that particular hue that is needed to just brute-force your way through that hellscape, paying for passage with lives. Which brings us to the branching path – instead of using Hunt's influence to clear the way through the Waning Woods, whoever cut the deal with them could opt for a Gate option with assistance from certain one-eyed mischief-maker.

Then there is a fourth option.

Once which doesn't rely on the Army of Callow, but comes with its own slew of sub-branches.

When Wekesa rerouted hellgates by creating a stable portal loop, there was a significant contingent of legionaries left in Hell. There is a person who holds dominion over nearby part of the Weave. Forced to survive, legionaries might have made a deal with a certain DK, and now are unleashed on the south of Procer since they, technically, does not belong to him, and therefore are free from the limiting factors of his condition.

Alternatively, they weren't able to survive incessant onslaught by the local denizens, and consequently were revived by the DK with the goal of using them in partisan/provocateur actions behind the enemy lines.

And lastly and very alternatively... Part of the Left Behind or not, but certainly of the Legions – well, remember all those tall-tales about another person who, according to rumours, would've been able to gnaw a part of Hells for herself. May she never return, as they say. Well, there may be an itsy-bitsy mishap with the last part, about never returning...

//wildmassguessing(walloftext).end

Sugar Roll

They could have gated with Larat. Not sure if the wild hunt's oath to Catherine is still stands but if it does, that would have been it.

Yotz

I mentioned that under the Hunt clause – ending with “certain one-eyed mischief-maker”.

But – yes, that’s an option.

On a side note – if Drow are now so susceptible to Night/Day metaphysical cycle, how Devouring of Winter affected the Hunt, both Winter and Summer sides, I wonder?

Antoninjohn

Maybe the troops the Warlock left in hell came back, Cat would be happy with that

Liliet

Omg yes

Mike E.

But how tainted would they be? I recall Zeze purging a group of non-legion soldiers in the middle of one of the Liesse battles because they had been exposed to corruption for a very brief period and he was following legion protocol for exposure. Can’t imagine being trapped in hell coming out any better.

Fayhem

It’s specifically demons that can taint/corrupt mortals, and those are each drawn from a specific hell; the chunk of the 15th that Warlock abandoned was left in one of the hells inhabited by devils, not demons. In other words, profoundly inimical and hostile to mortal life, but not inherently corruptive. Remember, good ol’ Nussy set up a whole civilization in one of the hells and the people who live there appear to be more-or-less normal; or at least, as normal as you can be when you’re living in a society custom-designed by the Dead King. So I’d still call that chunk of the 15th showing up ever again a very long shot, but it’s not intrinsically impossible. Just very, very unlikely.

Yotz

Depends on whenever they come into contact with a Demon of Corruption during their involuntary residency there or not. Per protocol demands Zeze purged anyone who was hit by metaphysical fallout of heavy Demon usage in the area, not just anyone who fought against random devils. And given that corruption is specifically that particular Demon domain... Though, I see how, say, incessant hatred towards anything and everything, being a byproduct of Hatebringer’s influence, can be considered corrupting influence despite not being corruption per se.

But still – all things considered they may come out squeaky clean in essence, if slightly singed in form.

Liliet

Only specific Hells have demons.

Galvador

Which sister will fall to the dead king i wonder.

Liliet

Why

Galvador

Because it would be very tragic and impactful if it happened so it might. Dunno if it counts as rule of cool but something like that.

Liliet

And let's all give a collective prayer of thanks to Erratic for not doing things "because they would be tragic and impactful".

RanVor

I honestly think there's nothing wrong with doing things that are, as Galvador put it, "tragic and impactful", as long as they are not ass-pulls and don't contradict the established facts within the story. Tragic events create tension, and tension is good and necessary.

Liliet

It's a little more complicated than that.

We've had tragic and impactful deaths in the story – and every single one of them served to push character arcs, character relationships and thematic points forward. Nilin, Nauk (sort of), the Gallowborne and personally John Farrier, Sabah, Wekesa&Tikoloshe. Every single one of these events kept echoing for a while after it happened, and the latter two are going to keep echoing yet. They changed the entire setting into 'a place where two of the Calamities have just died'.

If someone dies, it's not just 'impactful' in the 'the readers will be sad' way. It's impactful in the 'the entire setting gets shaken up by the fact that this is a thing that can happen in it' way. That's the kind of scale that major character deaths work on in Guide.

What narrative and thematic benefit would there be to one of the sisters dying? How will it push the story forward? How will it change other characters' actions and attitudes?

Will this change be good for the story?

That's how you fucking write character deaths. That's how Erratic does.

RanVor

Well, of course you have to build upon it. That's how writing works, and that's what I meant by creating tension. Everything has consequences that have to be taken into account. That doesn't mean it shouldn't be done. It just needs to be done well.

Liliet

I didn't mean that "erratic refuses to do things on the basis that they would be tragic and impactful". I meant "erratic does not consider the potential for tragic impact to be sufficient basis for story events to happen".

I meant that just because it would be really sad if something happened, doesn't mean it will, in Guide. It would be really tragic and impactful if Indrani died during the Sve Noc fight, but it would also serve no useful purpose for the narrative, so she didn't. And I called it back then that she wouldn't because it was bloody obvious, and because I've learned to trust Erratic not to pull this kind of shit just for shock value.

Deaths get properly built up to, in Guide.

You can't just say "gee when will a sucky thing happen" and expect that it will.

RanVor

I disagree. Something being tragic and impactful is a valid reason to do something in story, and there's nothing wrong with that. But it needs to be done well, with all consequences taken into account – otherwise it would disrupt the flow of the story, instead of changing its direction.

Liliet

I think we're having a terminology issue about the word "impactful".

My point is that the story needs to demand that specific impact. Not just "an impact."

I don't disagree with you, and I don't think you disagree with me. Do you really think one of the sisters will die before the end of the story? What do you think the impact of that will be, if you do?

RanVor

I don't have an opinion on that. As a general rule, I don't make predictions for the story, because I suck at predicting stuff, and also because I like to concentrate on what has happened, rather than what would happen. I might try to predict immediate consequences of a particular development, but nothing more far-reaching than that.

My point is that if Erratic wants it to happen, it will happen, and it will be brilliantly executed, because that's what Erratic does. I have nothing more to say on the topic, make of that what you will.

Liliet

You're not wrong.

RanVor

Oh, and I should probably clarify that by "impactful" I mean "an unexpected event that changes the direction of the story".

Also, I do not consider either of the Sve Noc sisters dying that tragic and/or impactful.

Liliet

Well, I'm not sure why we were arguing then XD

RanVor

Generally it's because my words keep being misinterpreted, but I'm not sure if this is the case now.

Galvador

Funny thing is tragic and impactful things tend to happen in guide more than you realize. Liesse' fall, warlocks death, cat getting stabbed in the hearth to get her powers instead of her hand, those things didnt have to happen.

This is a story about stories, are you surprised that tragic and impactful choices are common? This story thrives on tropes and this is one of them.

Liliet

?

What are you even arguing with? What do you think is my point?

Because it's not "tragic and impactful things don't happen in guide".

It's "erratic doesn't kill off characters for shock value".

Skaddix

Hmm wonder if this lends credence to my idea that the Hierarch and Tyrant did sack the Observatory. I don't see why else the Army of Callow would come out to clash with the League of Free Cities Armies near the Callow border. Seems a sizable army as well so something had to force the clash. The lack of knowledge on where the Free Cities are probably comes down to the Scarecrows are up to which seems a Tyrant ability combined with Hierarch Farsight spying.

Wonder if Hakram and Viv will make an appearance soon or if we just run into Juniper.

I assume the frequent Masego references are foreshadowing to things changing when he comes back. Which we know but the characters wont, I wonder if it might actually be Tyrant and Hierarch that drops this bombshell.

Dresden 67

I disagreed with your theory originally but I have to admit this does make it more plausible.

Skaddix

Fair enough. Its kinda hard to figure this out without a timeline since we don't know about the time from Epilogue to Prologue to Chapter 1.

Given though that this series has realistic time for troop movements of weeks with Arcadia and months without. Then you figure there has to be some reason for Callow to move a large amount of their forces away from the Praes Border and towards the Procer Borders. Now they could also try to be saving the Legions but I don't see that as an independent move without some deal with Malicia we didn't see and she didn't mention in the Prologue. With Juniper's mother dead and potentially Black, they got no real reason to try to save the Legions and make such a big move without Cat.

So I think it's more likely Tyrant and Hierarch made a move to blind Callow. Especially since Hierarch saw everyone else. Dead King is tying down most of the Crusade, Praes has a Goblin Rebellion, Masego is gone but coming back more powerful/angry, Cat is coming back soon, Hanno is off somewhere, Seer is getting visions. But all in all Callow is sitting fine with no one in a position to attack them. The duo had a narrow window to get in and take out the Observatory before Cat and Masego got back and I think they took it. Plus 4 different armies clashing in the same region sounds full Tyrant chaos strategy.

Yotz

Again, logistics.

Given the protections Masego had there are still functioning, and are powerful enough to scare away the Sisters, hypothetical strike force employed by Tyrant must be at least on the level of Fae or Mighty to strike at the capital of Callow without being noticed by the Observatory and/or mundane means, or numerous enough to disregard being noticed.

Even mobile emitters in faces and assorted bodyparts of Atalantian priesthood wouldn't be able to conceal crucial data – if you see a cataract in your all-seeing-eye, you can bet that in the middle of the blind spot the enemy lurks. And if that spot is moving – an army can intercept whatever is, regardless of knowing precisely what it is.

So, that leaves us with small group of high-powered individuals sneaking in – despite the Burning Eye; infiltrating the place that Fimbulwinter is afraid of; and defeating certain Fadila Mbafero without consequences on tectonic scale – all while leaving enough defense systems intact to scare a pair of Goddesses away afterwards. Seems out of the realm of “improbable” and straight to “impossible” to me.

Now, said that – the Tyrant may have a wunderwaffe of some kind, or lead his whole army to strike at Laure while gargoyles are imitating his presence in the Procer, or something equally insane like that.

But if – if, mind you – he indeed done something to the Observatory, I'm more inclined towards accepting blanket area denial by the Atalantians, than outright sacking of it by direct military incursion of some kind.

Secondly, if he indeed sacked the Observatory, it makes no sense for the Army of Callow to chase him into Proceran land. Left without their all-seeing recon and with dubious provider of gating ability – who shouldn't be trusted by default to boot, they should be focusing on protecting Callow with more mundane applications of military doctrine. Chasing him away from Callow – sure, but chasing an obvious bait into the obvious trap – that's some truly legendary level of incompetence on the part of the military command.

Liliet

^^ this.

The Observatory has to be physically/magically intact, and Juniper is hypercompetent.

We know those facts.

nipi

Might we get a copy of the map with all the current locations of the armies marked on it?

Liliet

Not any earlier than Catherine gets it I imagine ;u;

Aotrs Commander

So. 'Drani fired and killed nine shots at what is something on the order of 4000 yards (2.3 miles, near as dammit) – at sufficient distance Cat had to use magic to enhance her eyesight to see the target.

(While I can't find the source now, a few years ago, for a now-abandoned RPG I wrote, I managed to get some data on human visual acuity and my notes say that you can about see a man at 1 1/3 miles with the naked eye, and excellent eyesight at just over three miles; also worth noting that on level ground, a six-foot human can only see a little over three miles before the Earth's curvature gets in the way.)

The longest-range recorded sniper kill, which comes, remember, from a highly-trained specialist using modern weapons and gear (including telescopic sights) is 3800 yards.

One of the biggest long-range/accuracy issues with bowfire start to come from the arrows themselves, especially if they are not, like, aluminium manufactured, because wood is imperfect. (Modern snipers use special ammunition, even, to much higher spec than your regular assault rifle.)

'Drani just shot nine arrows in (assuming Cat was being a little dramatic with "under a heartbeat") in probably no more than one to three seconds with a 100% accuracy, with a weapon with a significant flight time, at that range, massive error margin.

I am pointing that out here, for you all, because I want everyone to appreciate how FUCKING INCREDIBLY GOOD A SHOT Indrani is.

We are talking "better than Hawkeye and Green Arrow combined" by several orders of magnitude.

RanVor

Well, neither Hawkeye nor Green Arrow are Named.

Liliet

what else is Hawkeye if not Named

RanVor

A superhero?

Liliet

Hawkeye doesn't have superpowers last I remember. He's just awesome through the power of being really fucking awesome. That's the thing in fiction that Names are a reflection of.

RanVor

Batman does not have superpowers either.

Also, unlike Hawkeye, do have superpowers.

RanVor

*Named do have superpowers.

Edit function, please!

Liliet

Oh.

I replied to your comment from the notifications panel so I didn't see the correction.

This makes more sense than what I assumed you meant (that Hawkeye does have superpowers and I'm just marvel ignorant, which tbh I largely am)

Liliet

And Batman's what, non-Named?

Names are, on a meta level, commentary on protagonists getting to pull off unlikely stunts / having the narrative exaggerate their capabilities as far as suspension of disbelief will go. Badass Normal superheroes are food for this. And non-Badass Normal ones are too. Superheroes and supervillains are part of the prototype for the hero/villain framework in guide.

Yotz

Cheap-ass Robin Hood wannabe.

Barthumphries

> a six-foot human can only see a little over three miles before the Earth's curvature gets in the way

Six miles, not three. 😊

Aotrs Commander

All the results I saw on my google search for "how far can you see" said for a six-foot human, on level ground (slash sea level) the horizon was about three miles (5km).

Yotz

Eh, radius versus diameter.

Also, definitions of the "mile" differ.- Chinese mile ("li") is standardized as 500 meters, making your field of vision roughly 10 li – but that's splitting the hair, so we can ignore it.

Yotz

Not to mention that human eye can see up to 45-50 km (30 miles) in more or less decent conditions – far beyond the horizon curve.

theothin

Not 4000 yards. From earlier in that section:

"So what were outriders doing this far out to the east of the principality? They were still about a mile and a half out, but these were flat plains so the chance they hadn't seen the massive army of fifty thousand drow encamped was negligible. They were riding closer, though. Most likely trying to get a read on whose camp this was, which would be difficult to make out from that far out."

A mile and a half is about 2600 yards. So over ten times the killing range of longbows and crossbows, but not ten times the overall range.

Still absolutely ridiculous, of course.

Aotrs Commander

It was a little open to interpretation. Indrani's eyes were "peeled to the horizon" and Cat, assuming she doesn't have vision problems, shouldn't have had any difficulty spotting mounted moving humans at a mere mile and a half (she would have needed Night to magnify for details) – and even a mile and a half is closer to twenty than ten times the 150-yard crossbow kill range.

(Notably, however, even in the modern era, most firearm and even tank engagements are still fought at around the 1500-yard mark because of terrain, so, as you say, it's still quite ludicrously good shooting regardless.)

Mike E.

That paragraph was easily the best of this chapter. Indrani is badass. And I love the description of her bow draw weight. Reminds me of Shadbows from the Stormlight Archive, where only Shadbearers had the augmented strength to draw one.

Allafterme

4 chapters in and it started to look like a fine f*cking mess already. I love it 😊

plantsbeans

I like the admiration for Archer's abilities – I've been missing that.

Chapter 5: Consult

"I inherited not an empire but a house on fire: fall in line, lest we all burn."

– First Princess Éloïse of Aequitan

There were few things as frustrating as looking at something you knew how to do, had done, and yet did not understand in the slightest. The half-page of equations and formulas that I'd gotten Akua to write down for me was exactly that, when it came down to it. A practical, measurable representation of what I did when I 'threaded the needle' through Creation when making a gate. It'd been gibberish, the first time I glanced at it, but at least I'd thought I knew why. To put it bluntly, I lacked the tools to make the tools that'd give me a chance of making the tools that would allow to comprehend what was going on. More than nine tenths of mages were incapable of using High Arcana or even comprehending the principles behind it, after all, so considering I did not have even the slightest trace of the Gift I'd never exactly been in the running. These were numbers, though, so there had to be at least part of them I could grasp. Something that'd allow me to run on more than instinct and power, because neither of those were truly mine when it came down to it and I'd not forgotten my old lessons. Borrowed power always turned on its user.

So I'd buckled down, put away the wine and tried to figure this out from the bottom. The very basics of Trismegistan sorcery, which Diabolist assured unlike most theories of magic out there at least had mostly observable underlying principles. I didn't have a library to ransack, sure, but I had the most viciously distinguished Sahelian in a few centuries around to pick the brains of and two literal goddesses on my shoulders. Both of which had been practitioners of high skill, before they got desperate enough to call on Below. It... wasn't going very well. Not because my tutors were incompetent, they weren't. Much as it pained me to admit it, Akua was better at explaining the magical in mundane terms than Masego had ever been and likely ever would be. As for the Sisters, they could literally show me what they meant. I just didn't have the knack for this. It didn't come naturally to me the way the sword and stories had. Even languages, and Gods knew I'd learned quite a few of those by now, were easier to get a handle on. Not easy at all, sure, but if I put in the work even without the crutch of the first aspect I'd ever earned I could make visible progress.

This, though? I'd finally memorized the classical table of elements and most the relationships involved, but aside from a refresher in all things arithmetic I'd not gotten much out of these new studies. Being able to name the limits of sorcery and a handful of fundamental laws didn't mean I understood them, not truly. I could name past examples of those limits being hit but it was damnably hard to extrapolate as to how other practitioners might hit them in the future. Like having a phrasebook for a foreign tongue, then being asked to write a philosophical essay in it. So much of sorcery was about context, years of learning and studies, and I simply didn't have that. I wasn't sure I ever would, to be blunt, or that trying to obtain it was the best use of my time. Practically speaking, I got more out of a spar with Archer than I did of an hour learning about ritual theory. I passed a hand through my hair – it was unbound, for once – and sighed. The unpleasant truth was that if I'd started these studies years ago, just after becoming the Squire, I might be getting somewhere useful by now. Instead I was stuck depending on the advice and understanding of others.

That wasn't necessarily a bad thing, I thought. Not all the time. But I'd walked into some nasty messes lately by sheer arrogant ignorance, and I couldn't count on my friends to pull me out of them every time. Not with the kind of opposition there was out there. There were some heroes I'd survive blundering against, but that didn't hold for all of them. And the heroes were almost a second thought, compared to the ancient thing that was marching south at the head of undead hordes. I gathered the handful of parchments splayed across my low table and slipped them back into my saddlebag, closing the clasp. I'd been circling the same few paragraphs for the better part of an hour now, there'd be no progress made today. Besides, I'd begun another project. The Everdark had been a wake-up call in a lot of ways: about how I'd been fighting, about who I should be fighting. And there, like in sorcery, ignorance and recklessness had begun to cost me quite a bit. If I was to get involved in the wars scouring the Principate – and I was, it was the only possible way I could see of getting the Liesse Accords signed – then I couldn't just go in like a drunk brawler and swing at everything in sight.

The Dead King was on the march, and that changed everything.

I couldn't keep dropping geographical features on armies when I'd be needing those same armies to take the field against Keter before long. Not only was I weakening the same Grand Alliance I needed to keep from collapsing, there was a very real risk that everyone I killed down here would get up and start fighting for the other side at some point. Burning the dead would greatly limit the spectrum of necromancy that could be used on them, Diabolist had assured me, but not prevent the magic entirely from being used. Even a mass grave filled with ashes could be a threat if the Hidden Horror got his hands on it. Diplomacy would be the preferable option here, but I'd tried that before and my knuckles were starting to bleed from the amount of times the door had been slammed on them. I'd been named Arch-heretic of the East, and while back in Callow that'd been met with indignant riots the title would weigh a lot more in the eyes of the western half of Calernia. That I'd effectively been made the head of the drow religion would only make it worse, and there would be no keeping that under wraps for long. The only way I'd get the other nations to sit at the table was if they no longer believed they could really win against me without losing everything else.

Which meant I was going to have to kill some very powerful people before the year was out.

The Grey Pilgrim couldn't be one, because if I killed him then the Dominion wouldn't stop before either was I buried in pieces or their country was a heap of cinders. I'd made my peace with that. While not someone I'd ever trust, he was someone I could work with. The Saint, though? I'd need her head on a pike before I got anywhere. Considering I had serious doubts even dropping an entire mountain on that old monster would kill her, I needed to prepare something that would. The voice in the back of my head that sounded like my father kept reminding me that relying on an artefact was the kind of foolishness that got villains killed, but that wasn't what I was doing. Not exactly. I was crafting a tool, in the same way a goblin alchemist would craft munitions. My sword and scabbard had been propped up against my table when I took them off my belt, and I leaned over to grasp them now. No goblin steel blade, this, or shard of Winter given shape. I'd made a request of Sve Noc before we left the Everdark, when my strategy had begun to take shape, and it had been fulfilled.

The scabbard was carved obsidian, a tale writ in runes of some fool girl who'd made an accord with sister-goddesses. The characters were twined around something else, a declaration of intent: Losara Queen, First Under the Night. There was power in putting truth to stone, especially when you had been part of the story told. The blade within the sheath had not left it since the first rest, the only visible part being the long handle of onyx and amethyst. I'd learned the uses of those stones well, in the last few months. One to ingest power, the other to facilitate communion and connection to the divine. Closing my fingers around the handle I closed my eyes as well, breathing in deep. The Night slithered through my veins, answering the call, and I felt the weight of the crows on my shoulders. They approved, these quarrelsome goddesses of mine. That was not nearly as reassuring as they believed it to be. I focused, clearing my thoughts and-

-and the folds of my tent were unceremoniously pushed open.

"The Queen of Callow alone in her tent, 'handling her sword'," Archer mused. "There's definitely a joke in there."

I bit back an irritated reply, eyes fluttering open. The Night turned to smoke, leaving me, but there would be time enough later. Every hour I could spare, in fact.

"I assume you came in for a reason?" I said.

"There's word from our scouts on Rochelant, so Rumena wants to see you," she replied.

I grunted in answer, rolling my shoulder questioningly. The pop that eventually ensued served as a reminder that sitting on the ground for a few hours had actual physical consequences these days. I put my hand against the table to push myself up before pausing under Archer's bemused gaze. I chewed on my lip, then called on the Night again. Darkness gathered around the sword and scabbard like flies to honey, for a moment emptying the inside of my tent from every speck of shadow. I heard Komena laughing in my ear, before she leant her hand to the shaping: making power stable and solid was always more difficult than just seizing it. I leaned on the long, crooked staff of ebony now in my hand to drag myself up to me feet. Indrani's hazelnut eyes were studying me curiously.

"Gonna tell me what that was about?" she lightly asked.

"There's no point in having advisors," I said, "if I don't occasionally take their advice."

"Ooh, cryptic," she praised.

"Well, I am a priestess," I drawled back. "You may now guide me to my humble flock, wench."

She grinned.

"You know, in Alamans romances that have very nice illustrations of what Wicked Priestesses of Evil should wear," Archer informed me.

I rolled my eyes and pulled ahead of her. She was still trying to convince to wear clothes that in this weather would get me frostbite in very inconvenient parts when we got to the mouthy old drow's tent, but that was where the easy mood died. Rumena Tomb-Maker had looked unflappable even when throwing gauntlets down simultaneously at the feet of both the Longstride Cabal's most dangerous Mighty and myself at the peak of my mastery over Winter. That it now looked somewhat disturbed while looking at the map of Procer we'd taken from our Levantine prisoners was not a good sign. Akua was already lounging in the back of the tent, which was deserted save the two of them. Less than surprising, given that it was still daylight out and most drow hadn't yet emerged from their dawn-induced slumber. The general barely glanced at the staff I was leaning on, but I felt Diabolist's gaze linger. I did not meet her eyes, instead limping to sit across from the old drow who had greeted me with a mere nod. Archer unceremoniously dropped down at my side, though given the flask that'd mysteriously appeared in her hand I doubted she'd be paying much attention to the proceedings.

"Report," I simply said.

"Lord Ivah has returned from Rochelant," Rumena said. "The city is already under occupation."

My brow rose, and my wariness as well. Humans stepping on other humans wouldn't wrinkle the Tomb-Maker's brow, which meant there was more to this.

"By who?" I asked.

Akua cleared her throat.

"While Lord Ivah was not familiar with the banners being flown, it offered detailed descriptions," the shade said. "Two emblems are being flown: that of the Hierarchy of the League of Free Cities and the personal heraldry of the Theodosians of Helike."

I started in surprise.

"I thought the Hierarchy had refused a banner?" I said.

"He did," Akua amusedly replied. "It is blank cloth, and so even more easily recognizable than heraldry from a distance."

I mulled over that. The Hierarchy's personal banner would be flown regardless of his actual presence, given that he was in theory the supreme commander of the military forces of the League, so that didn't give us much. Neither did the Tyrant's family colours being up there, unfortunately. The villain was essentially a sack full of wet and angry cats made into a person, so schemes were only to be expected. None of this, though, explained why Rumena was feeling unsettled.

"There's more," I stated, and it was not a question.

"As there were no armies encamped outside the walls and no visible watch in place, Lord Ivah infiltrated the city," Rumena said. "The humans within appear to have gone mad."

"Define mad," I said.

Akua stepped in.

"There appears to be a revolt taking place," she said. "Citizens are forming tribunals and killing officials and prominent individuals after public trials, under the supervision of Helikean soldiers."

I blinked.

"Supervision," I repeated slowly. "They're not being forced?"

"Lord Ivah reported feeling the urge to join these 'trials'," General Rumena said. "And that the urge grew stronger the longer it remained within. This is... unusual. Though this took place under the glare of the sun, such influence over our kind has no precedent to my knowledge."

I felt talons digging painfully into my shoulders and winced. The Sisters weren't pleased that someone might be meddling with minds of one of their own, even one who'd chosen to swear itself to my service.

"Aspect, you think?" I asked Akua.

"Hard to tell without taking a closer look," she admitted. "Large-scale manipulation of minds by ritual is not unprecedented – Dread Emperor Imperious once compelled an entire army to suicide – but the Carrion Lord's scuffle with the forces of Helike should have killed a significant portion of their most skilled practitioners. I am not certain they could accomplish such a working anymore. Not directly."

She paused.

"There is, of course, another path possible," Diabolist said. "Binding an entity capable of such influence would require fewer mages, though it would carry significant risks."

I closed my eyes and counted to ten.

"Tell me someone didn't summon a fucking demon in the middle of a continental brawl," I asked.

"Someone didn't summon a fucking demon in the middle of a continental brawl," Indrani eagerly replied, the slightest of slurs to her voice.

I ignored that, for all our sakes.

"Akua?" I pressed.

"In other times I would wager only the full Stygian Magisterium capable of that tier of diabolism," the shade finally said. "But the Tyrant of Helike has proved... surprisingly well-informed. I would not dismiss the possibility out of hand."

I clenched my fingers into a fist until the knuckles paled. Of all the violently idiotic things to do. If a demon got loose with this many armies in the region, the damage could be... Staggering. We could lose the entire centre of Procer in a month, if it went wrong, and by the time the dust settled the final contest over who owned Calernia would be between demon-corrupted puppets and the armies of the dead. Where were the fucking heroes when you actually needed them? A whole warband was willing to show up for the Battle of the Camps but this somehow did not require their attention? I forced myself to calm down. Angry thinking was sloppy thinking. We didn't know for sure it was a demon. It could be an aspect or a ritual, or half a hundred tricks I'd never heard about. We'd plan for the worse, but I wouldn't allow myself to get stuck in the perspective it was necessarily what was taking place.

"All right," I said, letting out a long breath. "Our approach needs to be adjusted."

"How so?" General Rumena asked.

"If this is the Tyrant screwing with Procer with sorcery or his Name, we let it go," I reluctantly said. "I'm not starting a war with the League over this, ugly as that reality is."

"If our assumption is correct and the 'legionaries' the League were seen skirmishing with are truly the Army of Callow, we might already be at war with them," Akua pointed out.

"We don't know for sure," I said. "It fits, and my instinct is that Juniper's out there, but I'm not going to act based on just that. It could be deserters from Marshal Grem's army, or a raiding force he sent out. It could be a scheme, if someone knew we were coming, to bait us into starting that very war. And even if was Juniper, we don't know the context of those skirmishes – and note they were that, skirmishes. Not a field battle."

"You do not believe that, not truly," the shade said.

"My beliefs are irrelevant," I sharply replied. "There's too much at stake here for hasty decisions, and too much we just don't know. Someone out there set up this game, Diabolist, and until we know who that is I'm not picking any fights I don't have to."

Silence reigned after that, and Akua simply inclined her head in deference.

"And if it isn't?" Archer nonchalantly asked. "Magic or an aspect, I mean."

I put a hand on the low table, feeling the cool polished surface against the warmth of my flesh.

"Containment," I softly said. "Observation. Then, if necessary, we purge everyone inside."

I would not allow a demon to run rampant this close to so many armies and Named. I would not allow the Tyrant to wield that dangerous a tool when both those things were so close, as that might even more dangerous. If the city could not be saved, then I would see it burned to the ground. It was the closest thing to mercy I could still offer. The Liesse Accords would ban the summoning of demons any circumstances, I thought with irritation, not that it meant anything until they were signed. Allowable Use of Non-Creational Entities, And Circumstances Therein. There was an entire section of the treaty dedicated to this stuff. Considering what it had to say about angels it wouldn't be all that popular with some people, but then others would be less than pleased about the parts pertaining to devils.

I did not mind beginning to enforce the sheerest common sense onto this continent at swordpoint before signatures had been put to the Accords, if it proved necessary.

"Then you would have us prepare for battle," General Rumena said, tone neutral.

"You have your orders, Tomb-Maker," I said.

There was a whisper of power in the tent, and the phantom weight of the crows on my shoulders. The old drow took in the sight of the Sisters manifest and immediately bowed its head.

"By your will, First Under the Night," it replied. "I will begin preparations immediately."

The weight was gone, quick as it had come, and I let the general leave the tent without further comment. My eyes moved to the map on the table, the small stones that had been placed on it. We were a day's march from Rochelant and whatever awaited us there, now. There'd be answers soon enough.

"If it is not a demon," Akua suddenly said, breaking through the silence. "If the Kingdom of Callow is not at war with the League... Then there might be an opportunity awaiting."

I picked up the black stone representing our army and spun it idly between my fingers. My gaze remained on the inked borders and cities of the Principate of Procer. On the few coloured stones marking the forces we knew about. The two armies of the Dominion, the rumoured Proceran relief force coming from Salia. The most likely current operating theatre of the legions under Marshal Grem. Where we'd believed the armies of the League to be, though that would need reassessment. And far to the south, the duped border army of the First Prince desperately hurrying back towards tactical relevance. The thorough interrogation of the Levantine outriders had wielded more information than anticipated, even if a lot of it was rumours.

"You want to make a deal with the Tyrant of Helike," Indrani guffawed. "Because that's going to end well."

"An alignment between Callow and the League alone would force the Grand Alliance to the peace table," the shade pointed out. "The addition of the Empire Ever Dark further tips the balance. We would be as much of an existential threat as the Dead King, in some aspects. The alignment need not last forever for concessions to be extracted."

There was a pattern somewhere in there, I thought. Oh, it looked like sheer bloody chaos at first glance but I'd fought wars before and something about this was raising my hackles. Someone had helped this storm to brew, and that meant someone would benefit from it. Malicia had once told me that when beginning a scheme, one must first consider the desired outcome. She was a lot better at this game than I'd ever be, but I could derive some use from that lesson: what did the players in Iserre want? The Grand Alliance wanted to crush the invasion as swiftly as possible before sending all its forces north. The Legions of Terror, if their march upwards was any indication, wanted to use the northern passage to retreat towards Callow. The League was the entity hardest to predict. It had two heads, the Hierarch and the Tyrant, and it was unclear who was really holding the reins of the horse. If anyone is at all. If they'd wanted territorial gains, I thought, they would not have come this far north so early. It would have been sounder sense to smash the Proceran border army in Tenerife then quickly move to occupy a few southern principalities while the Principate was forced to deal with other threats in the heartlands. Instead they'd joined the complicated dance taking place in Iserre.

"See, the problem with that is that at some point we're at a table with the Tyrant," Indrani said. "That's basically throwing jugs of oil at a bonfire, Akua. He's gonna fuck someone before that conference is done, and it might just be us."

Remove the League forces from Iserre, and what did you get? Eighteen thousand veterans under Grem, my own southern expedition of fifty thousand and possibly a portion of the Army of Callow. All of which would join up into a single force when faced with external foes. Against that, a relief army from Salia that should be at least thirty thousand to be worth throwing into the mess. Eighty thousand split in two from the Dominion. And maybe, though to be honest the chances weren't great, that army of twenty thousand from Tenerife would make it in time to participate. I doubted anyone from the League would have been able to predict the kind of army I'd come back with, but then they might have just been betting blind on my coming back with some kind of force. East against West, to paint in broad strokes, the Grand Alliance had us beat in numbers. We'd have better soldiery, though, and unless the heroes stepped in we'd have the only Named on the field. If truce couldn't be reached there would be a clash on a massive scale, and one of those coalitions would come out of it shattered. Put back the League onto the field, though, and suddenly the difference was obvious. Like Indrani had mused days ago, neither coalition could commit to that kind of a clash because both ran a risk the Tyrant would come swinging at their back when they were occupied.

This, I decided, couldn't be the Hierarch's game. Unless the man was hiding deep cunning and political acumen behind the rambling letters and had been playing some of the finest minds on the continent – and also me – like fiddles then this wasn't his doing. It would be the Tyrant of Helike, moving through him. No one can make a deal with the League, because the madman ruling it will refuse to make one out of principle, I thought. And the Tyrant, if the Eyes of the Empire were to be believed, had been the one to arrange for the Hierarch to be elected in the first place. That did not feel like a coincidence. I closed my palm over the stone I'd been twirling, then absent-mindedly knocked it against the surface of the table.

"But if you're trying to prevent one side from being crippled," I murmured. "Then why are you stirring the pot?"

If the objective was to keep the East and the West from bloodying each other to the extent that no one would be able to stand against the Dead King, it would run against the grain to keep shoving chaos into Iserre. Which he was absolutely doing, if the situation in Rochelant was what it sounded like. Unless you really don't give a shit about the war, I thought. Because the war is just a way for you to get at something so it doesn't matter who wins it, so long as they don't win it too early. But if that was really the case...

"Catherine?" Akua said.

My head rose. I hadn't realized until now, but silence had fallen over the tent.

"Call Rumena back," I ordered. "There won't be a demon in Rochelant. I'll be heading to the city with a small escort, while the army under it needs to be moving elsewhere. And fast."

"And what will be doing there?" Indrani asked.

It had never even occurred to her, I thought affectionately, that she would not be coming.

"Paying a visit to my eternal friend," I said. "To find out what it is exactly he needs so badly from Cordelia Hasenbach."

Alex

Vote for the guide!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Someguy

Or this could be purely Hierarch's game considering the use of Trials. How Tyrant benefits from this in the long term is a riddle wrapped in an enigma stuffed into a sack full of diseased rats.

wirelessgrapes

Heirarch would be against scheming as a principle. Making schemes is not Following The Will of The People

stevenneiman

Maybe, but the People executing the puppets of Wicked Foreign Oligarchs sounds more like something that he might do with an Aspect than anything else. Possibly without even deliberately using said Aspect.

nipi

You thing the Tyrant wouldnt find masking his actions as such amusing?

Rook

In the Hierarch's eyes, the law is defined as whatever is voted to be lawful by the People

If the People collectively decide to do something that helps the Tyrant, it not only becomes lawful but also retroactively rewrites Bellerophon history so that it has always been lawful and such that the People have never taken any action to the contrary.

In fact even the retroactive rewriting would cease to exist since it has always been that way, and mention of such untrue, unlawful acts would result in immediate execution.

luminiousblu

That's what he likes to say, but the People have voted, and they've voted to, well, "consort with wicked foreign oligarchs". Hierarch doesn't believe in Bellerophon, Hierarch believes in Bellerophon as it was to him.

NerfContessa

Likely the tyrant wants her hand in marriage.

After all, he must be the combined reincarnation of irritant and treacherous :p

Aston Whiteman

He wants Evil to win. Old time Evil.

Percula1869

Black is the one who wants evil to win. The Tyrant wants evil to behave like traditional evil even though it loses.

Liliet

Black wants a victory for Praes.

And also no more starvation, war, pissing off neighbours, flying fortresses, diabolism, blood sacrifices, abusive nobility, oppression of ethnic minorities...

A victory for Evil. Yes. Definitely. And he'll have a detailed explanation on how it definitely is one, with theoretical basis and everything ;u;

RanVor

If the wager works the way it was described in the excerpt from the Book of All Things at the very beginning (which is not the most reliable source, but it's the only one we have so far), technically any successful nation under Below counts as a victory for Evil. Diabolism, etc. is welcome, but not actually a prerequisite.

Liliet

True!

I do strongly question what happened to the drow wrt that though.

RanVor

They fucked up.

Liliet

...Fair.

luminiousblu

Attacking the Dorfs is a poor idea at the best of times. They basically just went the way of Carthage.

luminiousblu

Black doesn't want Evil to win. Black just wants to win, period. Bard and Tyrant were on point when they called him just a collection of gears. Black doesn't have a goal beyond winning but dresses it up in pretty colours, while Tyrant pretends that all he wants is to win but is ironically more principled about it because what's the point of winning if you can't act like a winner?

Liliet

I'd say you're discounting too much of what originally motivated Black's definition of winning. He's not principled, no, but there's the point of what he actually wants to accomplish and why he cared about that in the first place.

The way I read it, he was, yes, increasingly focusing on his plans for the sake of his plans, wanting to win while losing sight of what the point of victory was supposed to be in the first place. Then Bard metaphorically decked him in the face at Free Cities, and he started pulling his head out of his ass a little.

““Is the Empire as it currently stands so worthy of survival?” the Black Knight murmured. “I think not. If it cannot adapt, then let it perish. Out of the ashes we will raise something other than a snake devouring its own tail, shattering the world with its throes as it seeks to sate empty hunger.””

\(Book 4, Interlude: Red the Flowers\)

““A better world,” the Black Knight murmured, looking up at stars that were not those he'd been born under. “Oh, I have wondered. What it might mean, what it would look like.”

“We made one,” Ranker said. “It's on fire now.”

“And who set the flames?” he smiled. “Cordelia Hasenbach. Catherine Foundling. Kairos Theodosian. Children, in our eyes. Yet is it not the right of the younger generation to look at the work of that which came before it and judge it insufficient?””

\(Book 4, Interlude: Queen's Gambit, Declined\)

...

““I still do not believe,” Amadeus of the Green Stretch murmured, “that I am wrong. That our methods, our works, are to be so easily discarded. If these younglings want to prove themselves worthy of shaping the world, well...”

He bared his teeth.

"Let them come," he said. "Let them earn it. If they can surpass us, then the sin is ours."

"And if they can't?" Ranker asked.

"Then they fall into line, or face destruction, and we fight one last great war," he said. "The one that will matter.""

...a little.

We'll see how that one goes.

luminiouslu

That's not my point, though. Black might have nominal goals, but they're ironically not the point of his fighting. Black is so concerned with being victorious that he doesn't care about actually being a victor. It's not that he needs to regain sight of what he's fighting for because he really isn't fighting for anything, not anymore. He puts everything through the fire and is okay with it burning if it's not up to scratch – but is he really?

You're pointing out the fact that he's alright with the Empire burning as a sign he's pulled his head out of his ass but I see it somewhat differently. The thing that sets someone like the Tyrant, Neshamah, or any old school-villain, apart from the likes of Black and Malicia is the inherent understanding of transience and a sort of egotism that puts the self above everything else. The Diabolist wasn't fighting for the greater good, she was the greater good. It's not so unusual to fight for yourself. To people like Diabolist, the concept of 'everything they've ever built crashing down' is irrelevant because the fact that they were built at all is a monument to their ability.

Black clearly isn't this type of person – he doesn't fight for himself. But he's also not an idealist or else he wouldn't be alright with the things he's built being pulled down simply because they're stronger, or else he wouldn't be angry at the Heroes for winning because let's be honest, behind all the hemming and the hawing the facts on the ground are that most Heroes are just goddamn stronger than the villains, and if calling in a Choir is part of their assets then they'd need to be stupid to not use it. So what is he then? I bet he doesn't even know himself. He's not going to go down without a fight, because the only sin is defeat, and defeat is an inherent sin. That's it. When it comes down to it, he just doesn't want to lose, but at the same time doesn't know how to win.

Liliet

I don't think the "things he built being pulled down because they're stronger" means the thing you think it means.

The person who's going to be pulling down things he built is Catherine, who he personally taught and knows that she shares his ideals and is if anything more idealistic than him. It's not a defeat for his ideal for her to take over, he's just torn between "does she know better or do I know better". It's just a question of judgement and competence.

He knows what he wants: peace for Praes. Peace, justice, equality, not fucking starving every other generation. From there, it's just a question of how to achieve it.

He had a very specific plan for a while, and while pursuing it lost sight of drawbacks. He kept compromising, allowing lesser evils in the pursuit of abstract eventual "it will be better later". Then it rapidly dawned on him that his compromises ended up in Liesse and basically just allowed the Empire to backslide. And he wasn't okay with that. If what he built turned out to not work, then let it fucking burn!

I don't think he doesn't know what he wants. He wants lots of things. Malicia's happiness, Catherine's success, Praes being less of a continental embarrassment, orc liberation, to stick it to heroes, Callow's prosperity, to prove that he's right about everything, to maybe not have to kill quite so many people. For his friends to live.

And then he prioritizes, and then it turns out that even the things he's put highest priority on maybe aren't all that compatible, and it's just... hard 😞

luminiousblu

Catherine's ideals have nothing to do with what Black wants, because from beginning to end Catherine's story is about Callow, not about the Empire and the Empire can take a hike and starve if it means Callow stops being invaded every generation. The starvation, that may have been Amadeus' goal once upon a time. It might be his goal again, now that he is no longer the Black Knight, but I'll wait until I get some evidence that's the case.

"To prove he's right about everything"

See that right there? That's the core of him, or was, if he's actually changed. To prove he's right, and in this case he's the same as Catherine was for a while back in Book 2-3. Black doesn't care about the rest of that stuff, they're a means to an end, and that end is that he's the one who's right. That's fitting considering the side he's on, but it also means that – funnily enough, for all his talk about escaping the system – he's the embodiment of the system. Not even as a Well-Intentioned Extremist, because his intent never comes into play.

Liliet

Catherine can't tell the Empire to take a hike. I mean she's going to, for now, but she can't just say "nope none of my beeswax" long-term. Because Aisha. Because Hakram. Because Robber. Because the Legions of Terror that became the Army of Callow have a reason for being there. She's made promises in Book 3, both implicit and explicit. She had to put them off because of the Crusade, but they remain a thing.

Not to mention, as Black pointed out to her once, if Praes goes back to its pattern, Callow is going to keep getting invaded every other generation. Catherine wants peace, true long-term lasting peace, and for that she needs to settle Praes somehow.

I love to call Amadeus an idiot, but he isn't, not in this regard. He didn't just give Catherine power for the hell of it, he deliberately guided her towards this specific position. Her main cause is and will always be Callow, but Praes is a hanger-on that she can't shake off.

And yes, I think "proving he's right" is only one of the many motivations in play, and not one that's going to win. He's admitted to being wrong before, and while he's proud, he's not that proud.

It's going to be a conflict. And I think his better nature (which he has) is going to come out on top.

KageLupus

Black is trying to break the Conservation of Narrative Energy:

Evil can't win. Evil can't even break even. Black is trying to make it so evil (Praes) at least doesn't have to play the game.

luminiousblu

"Evil can't win. Evil can't even break even."

So Black says, but the history of the world doesn't support it. Hell if nothing else the fact that Praes went down once in its history, and was immediately restored stronger than ever, is proof that Evil is constantly breaking even, even in face of massive quantities of supposedly overpowered heroes with supposedly unfair advantages. If the other side is constantly cheating, but your side never really loses, then either you're cheating too or maybe they're not cheating after all.

It's weird how fixated he is on this, really. Back in Book 1, Catherine and Black had a conversation about symmetry where Cat noted that for every Villain with Destroy there was going to be a Hero with Protect. The flipside that he's either never considered or willfully ignores is that for every Hero with Bless, there is a Villain with Desecrate. For Evil to lose against Good, Evil has to win first. For the plucky underdogs to win, they have to, well, be the underdogs. Evil can't win, because neither can Good.

Liliet

The thing is, the interests of Evil that win don't line up with the interests of people who live in the Evil country. Evil leaders win all the time, but only if they aren't trying to better the lot of their people long-term. That kind of victory is what Evil doesn't get, and that's what pisses him off.

I don't think he's raging at the right part of the machine, in the Madman speech. It's not the heroes' fault that the grooves that Dread Tyrants burned in Creation are awful and hard to break out of.

But "maybe Praes should stop being an Evil nation"... is maybe less doable than trying to redefine Evil to include being good to its people. Because culture and religion and tradition all these things that are much harder to break and forge anew than the institution of Legions.

luminiousblu

"Evil leaders win all the time, but only if they aren't trying to better the lot of their people long-term. That kind of victory is what Evil doesn't get, and that's what pisses him off."

Because that is what Evil is. I don't think it's true that they can't better the lot of their people – Terribilis II apparently did just that before he overstepped and tried to break the pattern of half a continent on his own – but the key is that it has to be self-centred. Helping can't be what's at the core of you if you're Evil. You could make a paradise – and really by most standards the Dead King has done just that, assuming Malicia's talk as the servant in Book 4 wasn't just lying out the ass – but it has to be done for yourself, first and foremost. Whether to fulfil your ego, to guarantee your immortality, to reign as king eternal, or just to flip the finger to philosophers and show that yes, it can be done, and you're the one to do it.

"But "maybe Praes should stop being an Evil nation"... is maybe less doable than trying to redefine Evil to include being good to its people. Because culture and religion and tradition all these things that are much harder to break and forge anew than the institution of Legions."

Oh come on. Reread what you just wrote. Are you seriously trying to argue that changing a culture – which is actually rather easy, if rarely entirely controlled – is more difficult than literally supplementing metaphysical laws written over thousands, if not tens of thousands or more, years in a single lifetime using a single nation is anything but bull? With the very idea that he's going to change things he's utterly failed, because his motivation isn't to change things but simply to show that it can be done – that he can be more important than everyone who's come before. And that might be possible, but it would also simply reinforce the real groove he's trying to break out of, without admitting it – that Evil can be something other than only selfish. Which is impossible as far as I'm concerned.

Liliet

Well, he is changing culture. He can't start with changing the cornerstone of it, though, which is worshipping Below. It's the thing that's the hardest to shake.

And we can juggle the definition of the word "selfish" until the end of time. There's a position that nobody can be truly selfless unless they're a literal automaton/computer, because deriving satisfaction from successfully helping others is also selfish.

I don't think Amadeus is as good at this as he thinks he is. You have a point, and he has blinders on – he is also Praesi, he also grew up worshipping Below, and changing that to Above is likely to not just be a solution that occurred to him at any point. People who worship Below aren't going to be majority evil people, just because I believe the majority of people aren't evil, and what they worship has no correlation with their moral character. If all Praesi are formally speaking Evil, but most of them are just regular people, it makes sense to dissociate uppercase E Evil from lowercase e evil.

Harder to keep that up when you're Named, though.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, we have in our own culture several icons of "affable evil", who in political terms would have no problem with keeping their populations content. The most overtly political of them is of course Machiavelli – he and Amadeus would totally love each other.

In more recent times we have the "business advisor" Robert Ringer (Looking Out For #1), and Anton LaVey of Satanic Bible fame – they are all about the self-centered thing, but I'm pretty sure that in political contexts they'd also "get" that pissing off large numbers of people is almost as dangerous to your own welfare as pissing off individual powerful people.

RanVor

The problem is, the argument that "for Good to win, Evil has to win first" is full of shit. This is not about that. It's about the status quo that overwhelmingly favors the Good side. Sure, Good can't eradicate Evil completely, but it doesn't need to. Just upholding the status quo is a victory for Good. A loss of Good is not really a loss as long as it's not permanent, and it never is. They build to last because they don't have to keep starting again from the scratch all the time. Evil can't afford that – whatever they achieve is going to be overturned in short order.

That's what Amadeus was mad about in his speech.

Liliet

It doesn't really hold as a general rule, though. The existence of Evil nations that have survived centuries an millenia proves that. The Tower stands. Stygian Magisterium stands. The Dead King... yeah.

It only really applies to the specific issue of trying to fix Praes's food deficit problem.

Incidentally, that's what Black's fixated on u\((-_-) \

RanVor

Well, nope. The Evil nations continue to exist because Below will not let Above get that ultimate victory so easily. That doesn't mean they don't suffer constant setbacks and collapses in a way the side of Good has never really experienced. They appear to be quite evenly matched at the first glance, but in reality, Good is far ahead of Evil in this race.

Also, the funny thing with the Dead King is that his ascension didn't actually alter the overall balance of power at all. He never actually accomplished anything of significance against the side of Good, and he knows that if he tried, it would be his end.

Liliet

Fair!

Lots of ways to look at this situation, I suppose.

Either way the way for the Evil nations like Praes to actually get ahead is to stop being Evil.

We'll see how the Callow/Praes situation goes :3

luminiousblu

"status quo that overwhelmingly favours the Good side"

What the fuck does that even mean? The status quo is a victory for Good? The Dead King is a final boss level character, he only doesn't kill everyone because it's against his interests to do so and at any point in time he might decide it suddenly is now in his interests – like what happened right now. Just because Sauron can't be arsed to come outside and play doesn't mean Good is winning.

"A loss of Good is not really a loss as long as it's not permanent, and it never is."
Nor is a loss of Evil a loss since it's never permanent. Praes has been around for a thousand fucking years and it's literally just mortals, there's a blip here and there but then again Good has blips too, they came extraordinarily close to straight up losing when Triumphant beat the entire continent like a crippled slave. Hell, if the Dead King is to be believed, there's three divine-class entities in the world – himself, the Wandering Bard, and Sve Noc. Maybe Catherine too, but that depends on the nature of being the first priestess. Just think about that – of four possible pseudo-deities, three are firmly Below and one is beyond the game entirely. Rigged in GOOD'S favour?

Are you going to argue that because Evil never manages to make any headway into Good's territory, it's rigged against them? But look there – neither has Good ever made any real headway against Evil. There's no excuse for that, not when we're constantly told Good is stronger, it cheats, it's all rigged in their favor. If I play dice for thousands of years with loaded dice and am still only breaking even then I have to face the facts – either their dice are rigged too, or mine weren't rigged after all.

"They build to last because they don't have to keep starting again from the scratch all the time."
They build to last because it is in the nature of Good to build for those other than yourself, while Evil is defined by believing that everyone else can eat shit and you -are- righteousness. Not even Black is exempt from that. Good is about the knowledge that you're not the only person in the world; Hanno and the Grey Pilgrim are probably the most overt cases of this, but even William, in the end, thought of what he was doing as the last service of a damned man, the person marked for Hell who could act as a grey guard, doing the dirty work that would've ruined him had he not already been ruined. Catherine is the opposite – she's willing to be damned, as long as she gets to do what she wants.

Remember how I expressed incredulity about it's rigged in Good's favour? Let's return to that. Imagine a country that nukes itself every few years and is constantly on the verge of literally starving to fucking death, and its offices are acquired and kept apparently almost exclusively from poisoning people to death. That would've caused an immediate collapse in any historical country, or even most fantasy countries. Yet Evil chugs on. The hilariously incompetent Bellerophons – emphasis on hilarious, but incompetent all the same – hasn't imploded yet, despite being surrounded by neighbours that – in real life – would've simply partitioned them, like what happened to Poland. The Dead King is apparently completely untouchable because the Crusades never even got close to the Hellgate itself, let alone the man proper. Praes, for all of its bumbling and its joke schemes, is apparently impossible to topple. Stygia, which is basically Sparta if viewed through the lens of the Persians or the most vicious Athenian propaganda, has outlasted its historical peer in relevance by a massive margin.

Fucking hell when Heroes take a dump on villain leaders, it apparently never lasts long enough to make a difference and I won't believe it's for lack of trying. They'd pulled down the Tower twice and it's risen each time, the Chain of Hunger is hasn't been exterminated yet despite being almost entirely mindless and has a way to either violate conservation of energy or can harness an effectively infinite power source (it has to be asked – what the hell are they eating? They can't be only relying on cannibalism because as hilariously morbid as that is, it defies how nutrition actually works – meat might have a higher energy density, but that energy has to come from SOMEWHERE).

If anything, the fact that Evil polities are objectively built like absolute garbage and yet truck on in defiance of economic theory, sociology, political reality and plain common sense is a mark against Evil, because what can you call that but rigging?

“Whatever they achieve is going to be overturned in short order”

Because such is the nature of Evil. It is transient and that isn't a bad thing. It is transient not in the sense of being easily defeated but in the sense of being focused on the self. The entire POINT of Evil is that it always begins, and ends, with you. Black is not exempt from this. The concept of institutional power is nice and all, even modern, but as we've seen with the Saint of Swords it doesn't hold any water in a world where there are main characters who actually matter and then there's the rest who could be replaced with any other faceless fodder for all the actual plot (read: course of history) cares. For all Black's tried to stabilize things, we're constantly shown and told that the way he does things means it all comes tumbling down after his own death.

Liliet

Well, Black's entire goal was to try to figure out how to keep things going after his own death. As an optimist, I believe in his success 😊 I believe that Catherine is it, and that Black himself has already kind of faded into obscurity from Praesi politics, deliberately at that, just to prevent his strength from accidentally destroying the change he wanted to bring. Even if he was conflicted over that decision.

I largely agree with you, though. If you look at Evil's success through the lens of evil/Evil's own philosophy, Evil's actually successful as fuck.

It's just that Amadeus doesn't share that philosophy, and according to Kairos's and Akua's remarks, might or might not be entirely genuinely ignorant that such even exists. He holds the basic viewpoint of a Good ruler: what about my people? How can I best take care of them?

He then proceeds to go about it in a Below-sponsored manner, which isn't as effective as he wishes it was, and that's his entire point in whining about how the system is rigged. He's not playing the game the way it's meant to be played, and to him that's a mark against the game itself. Like, what, are Praesi entirely not allowed to try to better their own lot?

(That's Below's fault, not Above's, I would say. But the blame game is largely pointless, and Below are the ones giving him power – even if it's just a little – while Above are the ones that keep trying to topple his designs, so...)

(And funny thing: Below WERE in fact sponsoring him, if just a little bit. Praesi ARE allowed to better their own lot, they're just not given help in it. The system is flexible if you push hard enough, and Black pushed damn hard)

(And then it started to snap right back on his fingers, but Catherine functions as a doorstopper there, and it might prove effective yet)

(will, IMHO)

Cpt. Obvious

I've read comment after comment Evil this Evil that, and the same about Good. What it seems people are ignoring is the basics of what's behind this conflict.

Creation is a construct the Gods use as a proving ground to settle an argument. The argument being should their people be ruled over or guided to become all they can be?

The Gods above are all about stomping out free will. They feel its perfectly fine for them to put their fingers in the pie whenever they want to. They bestow their heroes with ridiculous powers but not a longer life. They are also pushing the into becoming zealots if they weren't already from the beginning. Both the Lone Swordsman and Hano the White Knight are good examples of this. The Lone Swordsman was guilt tripped into his role, and Hano has relinquished every choice directly to his God by allowing the toss of the coin to determine all choices. For all their willingness to meddle in the lives of their subjects they do not want to promote free will, and thus even their best toys will succumb to the ravages of time. Their most powerful heroes will age and die just like everyone else. This lessen the risk that they will outgrow the control of their Gods and start to question the game. Rebellion against the Gods can not be allowed.

The Gods below however require their "chosen" villains to actively grab their name, sometimes even compete for them, but they doesn't seem to care about subservience. They rather seem to discourage their chosen from depending on divine intervention. You may pray for it but unless you have proven yourself extremely capable they either will ignore you or they'll punish you. Even if you've proved worthy their intervention will come at a terrible cost. Wekesa who was one of their success stories got the intervention he asked for, but even then it came at a terrible price. It cost not just his life and his husband's many millennium of awareness, but also the lives of over a hundred thousand people and the town. And all this so his son would live.

The Gods below doesn't want sniveling subjects. They want their chose to succeed by their own devices. And to aid in that they are granted a life span only limited by their own ability to keep improving.

That one side is called "Good" and the other "Evil" isn't really that important. Nor are the labels "Hero" or "Villain" much to go by. Villains can for villainous reasons do surprisingly much good while Heroes can cause a lot of suffering for heroic reasons. And anything a Hero does, no matter how horrible the consequences, is "For the Greater Good"

While villains do cause death and suffering they don't have the luxury of blaming it on "the greater good". When Praes invade Callows it's to secure access to arable land to avoid starvation. When the armies of Good comes knocking its because "God said so".

When Black and the Legions of Dread came knocking it was with more of a plan than the usual invader. Traditionally the invaders either ranted about how they brought salvation even in death to the people of Callow, or they just told them to hand over the food or they'll be killed.

Callowans being "Angry horse people" didn't respond well to either version. The first guaranteed an uprising fuelled by a desire for revenge that would be treated as a loved family heirloom to be cherished for generations, and the second would add the birth of a shitload of home brewed Heroes to the mix.

Black negated a lot of the blowback by the rules he imposed. The commoners, most of whom never came anywhere close to the fighting, got to pay less taxes than before, got payed better and were actually safer than before the invasion. Even the House of Light remained active with little change being noticeable to the common man. Orphanages operating on the Empire's dime took in and educated the most unfortunate of society, thus removing a large pot that historically had bred a lot of Heroes.

Together with careful culling of those who showed signs of emerging heroism this proved to be a pretty successful strategy. But for "Angry horse people". Callowans are world class when it comes to holding a grudge.

Heroes were dangerous in several ways. The powers granted them was just part of it. Even disregarding any powers the heroes tends to act like catalysts inciting rebellion. The threat of this wasn't really a military issue as the Legions most probably would have had little problem stomping out those. However every rebel killed would mean the outstanding debt of Callowan revenge would go up, increasing the likelihood of yet another uprising and so it would continue to escalate until there were no Callowans left to carry the grudge.

However just killing off the entire nation of Callows were not a practical solution. Not only would it mean the fields would lay untended with no food going to feed the people of Praes, but it would guarantee a deluge of Heroes would descend on Callows and Praes, most likely leading the way for the combined armies of Good.

By improving the quality of life for the concurred and culling those who showed signs of heroism he saved a lot of lives. Though that's not how he looked at it. In his head Black saw it as preserving assets. By keeping a lid on heroism there would be more people working to keep food on the tables in Praes. Keeping the body count low also meant it would take longer before the axis of Light could drum up support for a new war.

In effect evil was doing a lot of good, not in an effort to do good but because it furthered its long-term goals.

At the same time it's interesting to note that in the eyes of the Gods above everything Black achieved, including minimizing suffering and strife was evil simply because it served the interest of the Gods below.

And I have totally forgot why I was writing this. I think it had something to do with the way a lot of the comments seem to miss that in this story world the labels Good and Evil is just that, labels. Good can do evil, and it will still be labeled as being done for the greater Good. Heroes who leads people to rebellion against impossible odds which ends up causing a lot of death and suffering with no gain whatsoever to show for it is lauded for their heroism even when it was blatantly obvious from the beginning that there was never any chance they would win.

From beginning to end it's a competition between gods. One side who is holier-than-thou and the other egging their pawns to break all the rules they can, but also letting them deal with the backlash.

I'm rambling again ain't I?

Now I'm starting to doubt that posting this is such a good (yep, a pun. Deal with it...) idea. But I guess anyone making it far enough to reach this deserves the punishment.

danh3107

So cat's trying to learn calculus while only knowing algebra, rusty algebra. I feel that cat, I really do.

machinetell

Or matrix math.

SpeckofStardust

Oh dear god she's going to get 'elected' in order to be able to deal isn't she?

The madwoman.

BarthHumphries

We can only hope. 😊

caoimhinh

Catherine Foundling, First President Under the Night
My bet is Vivienne is transitioning from Thief to a Queenly title over Callow, so that will work out fine, too.

caoimhinh

Queenly Name*, sorry.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I wonder how Deadhand would react.

"So, I see you're on top of your game. Cutting off that hand was a great..."

"I'm Queen of Callow now."

"...mistake."

Lark

> Citizens are forming tribunals and killing officials and prominent individuals after public trials

Well, well. What aspect has Hierarch found himself, I wonder? And how willingly is he using it, given that it may well be messing with The Will Of The People?

IDKWhoitis

Probably placing entities on Trial. He did it to Bard, Above, and Below. He is truly neutral after all.

lol

Indict.

Andrew Mitchell

A guess: his aspect is Democracy.

Liliet

Aspects are always verbs.

Elect?

Euodiachloris

Vote. 😊

RanVor

That's why I like Anaxares so much ;D

Akuabestgurl

More like Democrazy eh

Skaddix

Well people killing their former oppressors does sound like Hierarch Aspect.

Cat does raise a good question what are the Heroes up to. We know what Saint has a Faction setting a trap with Black. We know what some are fighting the Dead King. We still have no idea what Hanno is doing. The Hierach's Vision had him raising sword on a beach which seems pretty random.

Javvies

Hanno is probably fighting the Dead King's invasion.

d_o_l

Hanno is fighting the Dead King. It was in the epilogue or final interlude of the last book.

Liliet

Interlude: Tryptich. He showed up in the first part, in Ines's POV.

Javvies

At least Cat is using her brain.

Though the situation is decidedly confusing, at least it is confusing on purpose.

caoimhinh

My only question is why Cat didn't even mention or consider the possibility of the Bard acting there.
Cat wouldn't be forgetting the Bard now that she isn't Named, would she?

Liliet

...huh.

That's just creepy enough that I wouldn't discount the possibility.

I think a more mundane explanation, though, is that there is no benefit to considering Bard. It's like including the possibility that a meteorite will fall on your head when planning opening a small business. It might! Does that knowledge help? No!

nipi

The Bard only works through named.

Author Unknown

That theory has been disproved. After all, she talked to Black when he was no longer named.

Liliet

"Powerless you ain't, Maddie". Just because he doesn't hold a Name doesn't mean he's not still entangled in the strings of Fate, and he specifically explicitly has potential for a new one (or several).

Bard doesn't have the literal rules-of-the-game limitation of only being able to appear to Named. She still acts entirely, as far as we know so far, through actions of Named individuals, whether by choice, by convenience or out of inability to be effective otherwise.

Javvies

Ehhhh ... if it's Bard, she's using somebody else to do things via proxy.

There's no real point in considering Bard at this moment. Bard has a decidedly ill defined agenda concealed behind a web of lies, bullshit, and deception.

Whoever is physically involved, they'll be doing it for reasons of their own, in addition to whatever push in this direction Bard gave them. And as such, the only factors that can realistically be judged are their own reasons, ignoring Bard.

Liliet

^^^ Yes, this!

Bard's not a faction of her own. She makes other players less predictable, not makes them move according to her will.

SMHF

I'd love that if it was true... but Black remembered her just fine after losing his name. So once again logic ruins another good theory 😞

Liliet

I mean, he wasn't thinking about her until she literally appears in front of him. It does not disprove the possibility that Bard just has a low key anti-memetic effect on non-Named that only gets disrupted when someone else brings her up / she's literally right there.

darkening

I'm... fairly sure juniper has commented on Bard, but I couldn't say whether that was only after someone else brought her up I suppose

Liliet

Catherine Is A Giant Nerd

Euodiachloris

Tactical geek (with some politics – reluctantly with the politics).

sivarajan

Revolt sounds like a Bellerophonian Aspect.

haihappen

A better Aspect name would probably "Liberate", as the Will People Of The People liberates them from the Wicked Despots and False Leaders

Liliet

Oh, yeah, this is the best one proposed so far I think ♥

sivarajan

Liberate sounds Good. Isn't Bellerophon Evil? A Hero, the Sword of the Free, might have founded the city (hinted but unconfirmed), but I think it is currently sworn to Below.

Javvies

Depends on who is being Liberated and what they're being Liberated from.

If you are being Liberated from mortality, you're probably ending up dead or undead, not getting some form of immortality.

If you're being Liberated from obedience to laws against murder ... that could easily end badly.

Or if you're Liberating murderers and rapists from prison, that's not exactly something that's Good, either.

Whether an Aspect sounds like it leans towards being Evil or Good doesn't matter that much, unless it's related to something that is exclusive to or prohibited to its followers by either Above or Below, though a Hero is probably not going to be in a position where they get an Aspect that has stereotypically Evil implications/connotations, ie a Hero isn't likely to get an Aspect called Torture or something. On the other hand, Evil mostly doesn't care about the implications/connotations of Aspects, though a Villain almost certainly can't get a Resurrection-type Aspect the way a Hero can, Resurrections being the domain of Above, not Below – however, a Villain could probably end up with an Aspect that converts a corpse into higher grades of undead.

Cpt. Obvious

If anything Bellerophon could be said to be under the tyranny of the people. I highly doubt that they have a state religion as any God, above or below, having any more power over the way of the people goes against the governing principles of Bellerophon, most glorious city of the free.

Bellerophon is aligned with Evil not because they swear to the Gods below but because they refuse to bow to the Gods above.

Good or Evil. The Gods above does not recognize anything in between while the ones below couldn't care less.

Cpt. Obvious

Oh how I hate auto correct and writing on a phone...

chris S

How about Judge?

It'd fit perfectly into Bellerophon's mentality, and would work for Hierarch's beliefs.

The citizens driven by his aspect to Judge their rulers as Wicked Despots Ruling With An Iron Fist Who Must Be Overthrown.

SilverDargon

Do mine eyes deceive me or did Cat just directly refer to Black as her father?

"The voice in the back of my head that sounded like my father kept reminding me that relying on an artefact was the kind of foolishness that got villains killed"

If this happened before then I certainly didn't notice it.

Dresden 67

It happened once before, when she was talking to Sve Noc at the end of Book 4.

fbt

good catch, i also think it's never been quite this explicit before, although really not new info otherwise. Her convo w/ archer about her relationship w/ Ranger was pretty darn clear even if their words danced around it.

Liliet

Cat periodically drops the f-word, and it's a jar every time.

Well-written ♥

Roxx

Oh gods, if Cat is Black daughter, and Archer is Ranger daughter(ish), does it mean that Cat is sleeping with her sister?!

Liliet

Well Ranger and Black are a long-distance relationship, not a family unit, so... nah.

I have been ignoring this implication for the last two books and I'm not going to stop now 😊

stevenneiman

Yeah, I noticed that as well.

One thing that's kind of interesting is that of the five and a half calamities, only one and a half aren't confirmed to have at least adopted children. Ranger seemed to consider her apprentices like children (though she was a horrible parent), Black had Cat, Captain had a husband and three kids IIRC, and Masego and Tikoloshe had Masego.

There was no real indication that Eudokia had any real personal connection to anyone except Black, and we don't really know enough about the Assassin to say, considering that they've had exactly one on-screen appearance where they were even identifiable.

Liliet

clearly Eudokia and Assassin are secretly a married couple, with a dozen children growing up safely in... uh... what's the safest place... let's say the Kingdom Under XD

caoimhinh

Well, missions to Assassin are delivered by Amadeus giving a piece of paper with the target's name to Eudokia, so... who knows XD

Liliet

I'll tell you more.

““We both know they will give you nothing of worth,” the Webweaver said, but she was smiling. “Leave them here. The only redeeming aspect of tonight is that I'll get to see Assassin's face when I tell him he botched the job.”

There was something in the woman's eyes that would haunt the Taghreb's dreams for months to come.

“He's going to be in a mood,” she said with delight.”

(though I'm pretty sure Eudokia wasn't consulted for Assassin's participation at Liesse, given how tailored it was to violate Cat's trust in Amadeus and make her mad at him)

OmniscientQ

You know, I'm starting to think that, at the end of the Guide, there's going to be some huge M. Night Shyamalan twist that flips the story around and reveals that Assassin was the main character of the story all along, and then we'll have to go back and re-read the entire thing looking for the hints that were dropped.

Javvies

Eudokia/Scribe isn't actually one of the Calamities. The Calamities are/were Squire/Black, Apprentice/Warlock, Ranger, Cursed/Captain, and Assassin. Scribe and Malicia, while Named associated with Black and the others, are not themselves Calamities.

Liliet

Honestly I think as far as Eudokia goes it's splitting hairs.

Malicia, yes, is separate from the group. But the only reason Scribe isn't known as one of the Calamities is that she's lower-key than most of them and joined after they established themselves as such. She's a full part of the dynamic.

Liliet

The first time she did (sort of) was actually in the first half of Book 3.

““As far as I'm concerned, the closest thing I'll ever have to a father is down south killing fools,” I replied coldly. “And he doesn't have a last name. Born a farmer, you see.”

Then, there's the whole deal in Liesse, which was her and Black at the very least acknowledging what was going on.

““You let me believe she took you prisoner,” I said. “You had the means to warn me you weren't. Why didn't you?”

“In part because I was not certain you would be able to deceive her,” he said. “In part because of the story you used to become Duchess of Moonless Nights. It was my understanding that if you slew Assassin while believing he was me, it would prevent the eventuality of a... repetition of pattern.”

Patricide, he'd danced around saying. Even now neither of us were comfortable with the implications of the word.”

Then, there was the bit at the end of Book 4 which killed me even deader than the previous two somehow.

““I am angry,” I correcting, baring a grin that was all teeth and defiance. “Truth is, Andronike, I've been angry all my life. At the Praesi for owning my people, at my people for being owned. At my father, for being so much less than he could be.”

Catherine does so rarely. But denial's no longer the name of the game ;u;

Liliet

Wait, how could I forget the first and most epic straightforward f-word drop!

Book 3 Chapter 57: Revolve

““Does it get easier?” I asked. “Carving away pieces?”

Pale green eyes met mine.

“Yes,” he said.

It was a lie. We both knew that. But I loved him a little, for saying it anyway.

The last part I remembered of that night was my father’s hands putting a blanket over me.”

caoimhinh

It also happened the night she thoroughly broke up with Killian, she had a discussion about it with Black and cried, that chapter ended with “The last part I remembered of that night was my father’s hands putting a blanket over me.”

She has admitted it to herself quite some a few other times, even in a conversation with Indrani she let it implicit. I look forward to when she finally admits it in front of him.

Liliet

...yeah.

This one 😊

(and they’ve as good as admitted it both of them, in the unsaid patricide discussion after Liesse. But the time when she actually calls him that to his face can’t be anything less than utterly epic)

000matthew000

it is Black. I think it is n note for her change in outlook.

sivarajan

The last sentence of Chapter 57: Revolve, Book 3, from a bit more than a year ago.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I am deeply looking forward to this meeting.

IDKWhoitis

I see Cat getting along with Tyrant, they both exploit chaos for gains. So they may both dance this macabre to the hilariously horrifying end. Everyone watching this is going to lose.

Skaddix

I did speculate Cat would find out about The Rise of Darth Masego, The Divine Death of Warlock and the Grand Doom of Thalassina from the Tyrant and Hierarch and that seems pretty darn likely. So it will be interesting to see how Cat reacts when the duo drops that bombshell on presumably Indrani, Cat and Akua. I assume that is the elite squad that is going in.

I mean I am glad Cat is confident in her sword but I somehow doubt it will bridge the gap between Saint and Cat in a direct fight. Cat might win exploiting stories I suppose. Archer is a much better fighter and got ragdolled by Saint. Of course this does draw a parallel to Hanno, I believe they both have magic swords now.

Drunken Dwarf

Well considering she has never been drawn, I would assume she is going for the classic 'this sword may only be drawn against a true opponent' story. Then again we are talking about the woman who invented the zombie goat tactic, so 50/50 chance the sword actually explodes.

benthelynx

Both? Both.

MagnaMalusLupus

Ah ah ah, zombie _suicide bomber_ goats.

Barthumphries

When the unstoppable force meets the immovable object, we find out which is actually unstoppable/immovable.

WuseMajor

Honestly? I'm betting that the sword is a one use magical explosive and she's planning on tricking the Saint into drawing it.

Nerfnw

Hub, maybe Hierarch is doing a practice by putting the concept of procer to trial before doing it to thr choir

And Cat is still underestimating how much influence the Gods Above have with their heroes and how far they go to win this game

Radivel

The more the Gods Above interfere with Creation, the more the Gods Below can as well.

Cpt. Obvious

Not really their style though. Those below are betting that given time and free will their people will prove to be "better" than those controlled by the above.

Better being largely undefined, but probably they are treating it like a game of last man standing.

Whatever the case it will take more than a little tampering from above before the below enters the fray. And if that happens there's good odds they'll be pretty pissed their villains weren't able to handle the situation themselves.

caoimhinh

So Cat is gathering power to unleash it against the Saint of Swords, Noble Phantasm style?

Cool, I wonder what her Excalibur's name will be. It reminds me of some Xianxia stories where Intent and Qi is accumulated inside a sheathed blade for a long time to be released in a super technique that uses up all the gathered energy but it's a certain-kill move.

It's always nice to see her refer to Amadeus as her father.

Why hasn't Cat thought about the possibility of the Bard being involved? This kind of mess where Cat noticed it seemed like someone had predicted something big would happen seems like the kind of stuff the Bard would do.

Finally, I was re-reading the Guide, and in book 3 Interlude Commanders, there was a mention of "The Princes' Graveyard" in the epigraph by Juniper, we hadn't seen such battle, right? That's some awesome foreshadowing for the incoming battle where according to Cat "important people need to die but the armies must live".

Typos found:

- before either was I buried / I was
- who owned Calernia would between / would be between
- even if was Juniper / even if it was
- that might even more dangerous / might be even more dangerous
- ban the summoning of demons any circumstances / under any circumstances

-what will be doing there? / what will we be doing there?

Liliet

Keep in mind that we know more about what Bard has been doing than Catherine does.

Information Catherine has:

- Bard's semi-involvement in Summerholm that ended with Cat Speaking to her to shut up;
- Bard "getting into William's head at the end", as told by Vivienne;
- Bard's involvement in the Free Cities;
- Bard being possibly involved with the Augur's rise;
- Bard's presence at Liesse;
- Bard's involvement with Neshamah's rise;
- Bard's involvement with the sisters' rise.

Information we have and Catherine doesn't:

- Bard's little talk with Akua when she was letting out the demon (unless Akua has shared that, which she might have but also might have forgotten about / not considered relevant);
- Bard chasing away two Emerald Swords from their mission to kill Akua;
- the hints we have at the heroes' connection with her / knowledge about her (Pilgrim and Saint mentioned her briefly during Kaleidoscope, and the drinking stuff left behind before Cordelia's talk with Saint);
- Bard's conversation with Anaxares that ended her time as Aoede;
- Bard's conversation with Neshamah as he exited the portal;
- Bard's conversation with Amadeus in the Epilogue.

We know Bard has been meddling with the Tenth Crusade and around it actively. Here's what Catherine has got:

"The Bard had been considered old even in the days of Sephirah's fall. Gods, how long had she been around?"

I did not consider myself all that inclined to fear my enemies, admittedly sometimes even when I should have. But as the whetstone slid against the edge, I admitted to myself that for the first time in ages I was genuinely afraid of an opponent. Heroes, even those who could tread all over me, I could cope with. There were ways around power, around the laws of the Heavens. They could be tricked and twisted. But something like the Wandering Bard? She might have set in motion the sequence of events that would lead to my death decades before I was even born. If Black was to be believed, she could not be killed and even if she somehow was anyway she'd only return with a different face. There was no telling what she knew or how she knew it. There was no telling where she was and what she was up to. How could an entity like that be beaten? The sharp song of stone on steel held no answers, soothing as it was.

I'd believed that I understood the game unfolding across Calernia. That I could guess, if not know, the motives and intents of the other players. The Tenth Crusade, the Empire and the League: the three powers on the board, as far as the nations of mankind went. My attempts at seeing through the Dead King were now revealed to have been little more than presumption, but light had been shed on more than that mistake alone. There was more going on behind the crusade than faith and ambition. Hasenbach might have refused my terms because of political considerations, as I'd previously believed, or she might have been moved by a whisper in her ear years ago that only now clicked into place. I could no longer trust any of the actors to act according to the rules I'd believed they obeyed, because I'd been blind to half the war even as I fought it. Which now took me to the very place I'd been struggling to avoid since I took the crown: I had to take measures to insure the survival of Callow while in the dark about the objectives of all the other forces in play.

Fuck, for all I knew the Bard was interceding in my favour. I'd had strokes of bad luck, sure, but exceedingly good one as well. I wasn't unaware that Black had been arranging things quietly in the background so that opportunities would land in my lap ever since I became his apprentice, but there were things beyond his ability to arrange. The Bard had been in the thick of it, at Liesse, when I gained back the aspect I lost and snatched a resurrection out of angelic hands. Had she been beaten there, or had that restoration been the purpose all along? Hells, had she pulled strings for me to win just so I'd fuck up with Akua the following year and Second Liesse got the Tenth Crusade going? I could go mad, trying to find the hand of the Wandering Bard behind every turning point of the last few years. But then could I really afford not to look for it? If I kept my eyes closed, I'd lose. Or whatever else she had in mind for me.

She'd admitted to the Dead King that he'd been too clever in his scheme for her to be able to crush him, but that'd been centuries and centuries ago. When she was still learning her Role. I had to face the possibility that even if I made all the right choices I might still end up broken because the Bard had shaped the choices I'd be able to make so she couldn't possibly lose. I felt shards of stone pass through my fingers, and noticed with a sigh that I'd crushed the whetstone without even meaning to. That was my only one, too, I'd have to borrow Hakram's from now on. I picked up my scabbard with a sigh and sheathed the longsword. So much for any of this calming me.

There were no easy answers to be had. "

It's true that she seems to be forgetting that Bard could be behind every shadow. But is that really a bad thing, when the alternative is madness and paranoia?

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

"The villain was essentially a sack full of wet and angry cats made into a person"
And Hierarch is a weaving machine of political messages -.to his constant desperation.

benthelynx

Sacrificial typo thread:

" "You know, in Alamans romances that have very nice illustrations of what Wicked Priestesses of Evil should wear," Archer informed me."

Looks like two potential sentences both partially came into being here.

"And what will we be doing there?" Indrani asked."

caoimhinh

"In Alamans romances that have"
I would replace that with they so it would be:
"In Alamans romances they have"

I got a few other typos in my comment above, too.

Gazing Rabbit

You know what I want? I want the Tyrant to have a crush on Cat. Trying to awkwardly flirt with her during meetings and such. Cat isn't sure if he's genuine or whether it's a scheme, but then rolls with it because it sounds like fun.

Liliet

He's a teenager. I don't think Cat would go for it.

haihappen

I could picture the Tyrant flirting indirectly but obviously with Akua. Like, VERY obviously. Only to irritate the others and throw them off balance.
Or suggesting a political marriage of Cat with the Hierarch, you know, for funsies.

luminiousblu

Catherine can't be older than like, twenty herself. She was eighteen when she was dealing with Akua. It'd be sort of cradle-robbing but a university sophomore hooking up with a high schooler doesn't sound that weird.

The main issue is that Catherine seems to be mentally unsuited for any sort of actual relationship, and I don't mean unready but unsuited. She thinks of things in terms of victory.

Liliet

Hum, how old was Catherine at the time when it was mentioned that Kairos was sixteen? You're right, there's probably less of an age difference between them than I've been thinking.

Catherine has a lot of 'actual relationships' with people. Primary romantic partnership hasn't worked out for her so well before, yes, partially because she's too busy doing other things for any romantic partnership to be primary.

She's been doing pretty well with Indrani though 😊 what with the relationship not being primary partnership nor trying to be, because that's not actually necessary for anything at all 😊

/irate poly aroace rant over

ninegardens

Poly, Aro, Ace...

Honestly, that is not a combo I expected to see.

If there's no romance, and no sexy, and you have multiple people in the category, I'm trying really hard to tell the difference between "Poly, Aro, Ace" and the power of Friendship.

No intention to judge/criticize, am only try to picture in my head what this would look like, as I am 50% of way down the Ace spectrum, and several friends are Poly and it is... really hard to communicate between those philosophies sometimes.

Or maybe you just meant that there were Poly considerations, or Ace ones, or Aro ones, all of which are valid, but not necessarily assumed to be in play all at the same time

Liliet

No, I meant what I said. Aspects of poly philosophy that I care about line up with aro ace anger about putting too much priority and importance on the idea of “a couple”, in the traditional romantic+sexual way. Relationships can be different, and they all matter. Friendships matter, family relationships matter, and you can have many romantic relationships at the same time that aren’t the least bit cheapened by not fitting the “couple” archetype. It’s easier to be aro and it’s easier to be ace in a world that recognizes that, and it’s easier to be aro ace in a world where people don’t go “but how can someone survive without a primary romantic+sexual relationship”

Liliet

Also, see: Masego. His current positioning in the group is my ideal wish fulfillment scenario, because he gets to have a primary queerplatonic relationship with Indrani that does not require compromise/sacrifice on either side’s part because it’s not monogamous on her part.

That’s my poly aro ace point.

ninegardens

This makes sense to me. Thanks heaps for explaining.

For me, friends who are Poly are often the ones who get stuff least... but I suspect that is just my friends, and I can totally see what you are saying about less emphasis being put on the “Primary relationship” thing, how those philosophies line up in that regard. Also see what you mean about how a poly set up as with Cat/Archer/Masego allows for really close relationship while still allowing things to remain platonic for Masego.

luminiousblu

“Catherine has a lot of ‘actual relationships’ with people.”

Claptrap. Catherine has lovers. She does not have a relationship in the romantic sense of the word. Archer she treats like a family member who’s also good for fingering. There’s a difference between someone you enjoy sleeping with and someone you hold a relationship with.

“partially because she’s too busy doing other things for any romantic partnership to be primary”

Rather because Catherine cannot fathom not being in nominal control. Her closest approximation is goddamn Hakram, who she implicitly trusts if only because Hakram himself has no agenda whatsoever outside of Catherine.

ninegardens

You know... this might be just a matter of word use disagreements.

It sounds like you are using "Actual relationship" to mean a particular type of romantic relationship, while Lilieth might be referring to a much broader category of thing, which includes Such things as Catherine's relationship to Black, Juniper, Masego etc etc etc. "Human relationship" – in the sense of relating to one another.

All these things are important relationships in her life. In many of them (Black, Masego, Archer etc) she is distinctly not in control, and she is okay with that. In some sense, (especially Book 1-2), one of Cat's defining traits was her ability to collect a group of people who were loyal to her, and yeah, there was control, but these people were loyal to her because she met them on their terms. She was a friend first and commander second.

So yeah, if you mean "Balanced monogamous romantic partnership", then I agree, we haven't seen Cat do one of these in the past two years worth of story (or whatever its been). But like... so what? Plenty of people go for 2 years without having that sort of relationship, and there are many REASONS for that... not all of which indicate they are incapable of it.

In terms of the broader def of relationships... I'd say that Cat has indicated some ability at this in the past... but I kind of have to agree that a large number of her relationships with other people are messed up/twisted in one way or another. (honestly, her interaction with Masego seems to be the most balanced one and healthy one)

I'm not sure how much this says about Cat, and how much it says about the situation she finds herself in.

The fact that she apparently has literally no friends from the Orphanage might be a bad sign... or just a sign that the Author wasn't interested in those characters.

luminousblu

The original conversation came about from a hypothetical teenage crush that Tyrant might gain on Catherine and whether or not it'd be weird. It's obviously not a "human" relationship, but a relationship in the sense of a significant other. You don't have a crush on someone you'd like to be friends with.

As far as that sort of relationship, Catherine has basically been said outright to be incapable of handling it. Some of those are just insults which touch on truth (Malicia), some of those are her coming down too hard on herself, and some of them are just plain related to how she sees the world. Catherine does not see compromise and never has. All of her 'compromises' were either forced on her from a position of weakness or not compromises at all, insofar as she still got the things she wanted. That's not how you maintain relationships.

"The fact that she apparently has literally no friends from the Orphanage might be a bad sign... or just a sign that the Author wasn't interested in those characters." It's explicitly said that she had no real friends there. Not enemies, necessarily, but not friends. Because Catherine doesn't particularly like the feeling of being an equal to someone, and likes it even less than the feeling of being inferior. If you're inferior that means you're out of your league. If you're equal to her, and not implicitly taking her orders, that means you're a competitor, and Catherine has never been alright with those.

Javvies

Ehhhh ... as far as the lack of friends from her orphanage days goes, Cat was effectively an outsider in the orphanage, being half(or more) Daoine, plus she wanted to join the Legions, unlike all the other girls.

She had few, if any, interests in common with most, if not all, of the other girls.

Plus, with her latent Name-potential (and quasi-Heroic tendencies), it's unlikely that the staff would have urged her and the other girls to be closer together.

luminiousblu

– Being Daoine has never been shown as some sort of crippling handicap against anyone but the Orcs.

– Joining the Legions wasn't exactly widespread knowledge. Catherine is mutely surprised back in like, chapter 2 when Black (Scribe?) guessed she was saving up money to go to the College.

– That honestly is not an excuse. If anything it makes it worse. How ridiculously narrow-sighted do you have to be if you have nothing in common with anyone around you? Hell you don't even need to be alike to be friends – the futbol team captain who never shut up and the girl who was literally a mute cripple were best friends, because one liked to talk and the other loved listening.

– Plus, with her latent Name-potential (and quasi-Heroic tendencies), it's unlikely that the staff would have urged her and the other girls to be closer together

Oh come on, that's an unfalsifiable statement. You could excuse everything before the rapist guards with "Black's agents were onto her".

Liliet

Actually, I had the thought that the orphanage staff would likely try to discourage other girls from being close to Catherine, too. Regardless of Catherine's own ability to make friends, it makes sense as something they would do, both to hopefully discourage Catherine from her plans by creating the impression that nobody shares her ideas, and to prevent other girls from being dragged to a death sentence with her if it fails. Just, looking at this from the perspective of people who are trying to care for these children while knowing that Black's receiving regular reports on them, it's 100% something that would be done as a standard policy. Hero potential? Isolate them and discourage them. It's literally part of the point of the system Black set up, to tamp down on the heroic inclinations of the younger generation as much as possible.

(And it has worked admirably. Catherine who had friends and support in her 'fix things' inclinations would be a lot worse a candidate for the apprenticeship Black offered, she'd have stronger ties to Callowans and their rebellious moods and less readiness to make friends out of Praesi, which is something Black specifically wanted for her for his plan.)

And that aside, the first problem you see in Catherine's hypothetical potential relationship with Kairos is Catherine's inability to compromise? Really? Like, that's the reason you think it wouldn't work? And if Catherine were just a little softer, her+Kairos would be the perfect couple?

Yes, Catherine isn't soft. She's idealistic and refuses to back down on her principles even if it makes her a hypocrite. She has expectations of the world, demands in fact, and she will not compromise on trying to do what she thinks is right. And she won't accept a romantic partner who doesn't live up to her idea of what her romantic partner should be like.

As this person, she is perfectly likable and has attracted not one but two distinct and partly mixed friendgroups: the 15th officers and the Woe, and I'm looking at Rumena, Ivah and the Sisters and seeing Catherine binding even more people to herself. She's magnetic and charismatic, and she's warm and good to be around, just the way she is. Indrani went on a whole rant about it in the Everdark.

And the Cat/Indrani/Masego poly angle is the cutest ship in existence so I just don't even know 😊

luminiousblu

"And that aside, the first problem you see in Catherine's hypothetical potential relationship with Kairos is Catherine's inability to compromise?"

I wasn't talking about Kairos, but why relationships aren't her angle in general. You can't have a normal relationship if you need to be in control literally all the time with no give.

"Just, looking at this from the perspective of people who are trying to care for these children." And my point is that you can go so far down the rabbit hole that Catherine's own character never comes into play at any point in time before the story. It's an established character flaw that Catherine has tunnel vision, an extraordinary sort of defiance where she'll do things she dislikes just to be contrarian about it and prove she can do it anyway, and has trouble compromising or viewing others as equals, I don't see why it shouldn't go back to before she became the Squire.

Hell if you want to play the "discourage heroism" card, I have one to play too. "Plucky orphan, disliked by everyone around her for dreaming bigger, who has no friends, no family, no roots, but a burning desire to change the world for the better and doesn't mind if she gets hurt doing it". Sound familiar? Sounds like a premade D&D character, doesn't it? Having roots helps you avoid becoming a Hero. William, Hanno, the Grey Pilgrim, Vivienne, Hunter – all of these either lost their roots or discarded them. A plucky young'un who can't find peers because she was too different is a recipe for disaster if you want to avoid Heroes.

"And she won't accept a romantic partner who doesn't live up to her idea of what her romantic partner should be like."

You know how hilariously ridiculous this sounds, right? You're proving my point for me. Catherine doesn't want this, but if some girl told you she was waiting for a prince on a white horse to take her away you could tell her that it's not going to happen. She won't compromise – and so, she is unsuited for relationships with real people. You know, the type with flaws.

Liliet

"You can't have a normal relationship if you need to be in control literally all the time with no give."

The thing is, that's very much not how her close relationships work. She's actually argued with Juniper about this, when Juniper insisted she should enforce the chain of command and Catherine said that wasn't the kind of outfit she was running.

You are specifically 100% entirely inaccurate about this. People around Catherine would if anything prefer if she was a little more confident in herself and was a little less worried about asserting too much control over others.

She gave Vivienne a bloody killswitch. An override command that would force her to obey Vivienne's will. How is that "needing to be in control all the time"?

She was worried as fuck about Masego going to... the heart of the country that's currently her enemy... to help it... and to personally help the person who's repeatedly expressed the desire to see her dead...

and she still ceded to Masego's point about how he didn't need her permission to go. Which, I mean, remains true regardless of what she thinks of it, but it specifically contradicts your point about her relationships: she saw the other person's autonomy and ceded to it.

The only relationship where she needs to be in control all the time is the one with Akua, and even that's been morphing more and more into a trust-based relationship of equals, despite all the practical considerations to the contrary.

And if a girl told me she was holding out for a prince on a white horse and seemed perfectly happy to go without a relationship until one turns up, I would recognize that girl as my younger aro ace self who didn't know what aro ace was, or a lesbian, or just someone who doesn't want a bloody relationship for the sake of a relationship, and I'd be like YO YOU GO FOR IT BUDDY YOU HOLD OUT FOR THAT PRINCE. Higher standards mean lower interest, and that's not wrong in itself. If Catherine was whining about "boohoo why can't I get a girlfriend/boyfriend" you'd have a point, but note how she isn't. She doesn't have something she doesn't want; what a great indicator of her lack of ability!

^^^ in this last paragraph I used the word "relationship" to mean the couple kind, but everything above it uses it in a wider sense. Personal relationships aren't that different whether they are romantic or not. Catherine does have the capacity to connect with people, listen to them and cede control. You can't base your analysis on her on a single disaster teenaged romance (and for that matter Catherine had a bloody good point about Killian and human sacrifice and it's an entirely fair thing to have as a deal-breaker, I can expand on that if you're interested).

You have a point re: heroic stories and few relationships. It was remarked by an agent of Black's that she "doesn't have the traditional heroic capacity for forming strong friendships", so there's something there. Still, that something sure wasn't in play in the War College, was it? Discounting the possibility of outside meddling, I'd say it was a mindset: War College kind of selected for people who have the same basic view of the world, on a level, as Catherine does. She wasn't able to connect well with people who don't have it: note how back in Laure her most cordial relationship seemed to be with Ebele, the legionary who frequented the tavern.

It is, in fact, a thing. It's not control issues, though. The other way round, like I said: Catherine's an anxious bub who tries to arrange as many double checks on herself as possible. Yes, she's authoritative, but it's not the same thing as not knowing how to back down.

Liliet

I didn't mean the romantic sense of the word 😊

Liliet

What Ninegardens said.

Non-romantic relationships don't matter less. You can't just judge Catherine's ability to form healthy bonds with other people based on her one (1) attempt at having a girlfriend that fell apart eventually. Not when she has a whole healthy friendgroup that functions with 0 romantic drama despite the immense potential for it with all the unrequited crushes fluttering around. Catherine's relationship with Indrani being defined as "friends" and not "lovers" is a sign of its health, and a sign of Catherine being actually very good at managing her relationships: she and Indrani figured out a structure they were both comfortable and happy with, instead of trying to fit into an awkward and restrictive and inconvenient traditional framework.

No, Catherine doesn't do primary romantic partnerships. Yes, it's largely because she's too fucking busy being in charge of a large scale attempt to unfuck her region and probably the whole continent. And guess what! It's not obligatory! Catherine doesn't have to have a primary romantic partnership, or space for one in her life, in order to be good at relationships and connecting with other human beings!

luminiouslu

Stop being so defensive, you're on a random tangent ranting about...I honestly don't know. Romantic freedom? I have no goddamn idea what you're on about, you first claim you weren't on about romantic relationships (when the topic at hand is what happens is Kairos wants to bang Catherine, presumably for more than a one night stand), then you come around and say "b-but nothing's wrong with not having one anyway!"

My point is that Catherine's personality is, in fact, not suited for relationships, and it has nothing to do with her being 'busy' as she likes to excuse herself, since that is in fact nothing but an excuse. Tyrants, kings, and warlords throughout history have found time for lovers, and I don't mean rape slaves or political marriages. Someone like her will always find another thing she needs to be in control of. Oh I don't doubt that she can still have relationships and friendships, but treating someone with their own agenda as a life partner is beyond her.

In any case, try to separate your own frankly overwhelming views on what I presume is romantic freedom, nontraditional relationships, and polygamy from the matter at hand. Which has nothing to do with any of that.

Liliet

Alright, let's talk about the matter at hand.

Kairos x Catherine.

He sacrificed several thousand civilians to make flying towers that he didn't even intend to keep for longer than a day.

Like, he killed them.

For what basically amounts to 'the lolz'.

He's hilarious, yes. But any hypothetical crush he can have on Catherine is not going to have any relevance to the fact that he's awful, and she is at best willing to tolerate his existence because she can't afford to antagonize the League.

And you were putting it as though Catherine was "not mature enough" for a relationship and as though her not having space for it in her more busy than most historical rulers life makes her somehow weaker / less capable / less mature than someone who would.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, but Tyrant got his Name at 12 or something. Villains don't age.

luminiousblu

They don't age past whatever they think of themselves as. Catherine has grown taller, check the end of Book 3 – she notes that she's now taller than Black. And in any case, twelve-year-old brats being sexually promiscuous is hardly unheard of in legend. Cú Chulainn made cuckolds out of half of Ulster by the time he was seven years old. Somehow.

NZPIEFACE

I was just trying to argue that it was stealing the baby from the cradle or whatever the metaphor is.

Liliet

Masego got his name before the age of ten. So did Indrani.

Warlock had grey hair. Sabah looked very nearly her real age.

The appearance of Named reflects their image of themselves. I don't think Kairos would picture himself as an eternal 12yo.

...though of all people who would... if anyone would, it's as likely as not to be him. Eh.

ninegardens

I mean, to be fair, this is Tyrant we're dealing with...

I'm not sure if his flirting would be awkward, or just kind of amazing in a Supervillinous magnificent bastard sense. Sure, he's a insane cripple with creepy eyes and possible evil intentions... but I can't imagine him being awkward about it.

Skaddix

I don't know we never seen any proof that Tyrant cares about Sex lol. So far he and Hiearch seem pretty asexual. And I certainly don't see that impacting their decision making at all.

Honestly Tyrant strikes me as more likely to like someone like Akua lol then Cat. Even if his chaos style and mastery of stories is Cat like. Cat has moral limitations that would clash with Tyrant.

Liliet

As a local asexual who craves representation everywhere I can see even a shadow of it, I would like to inform you that not having sexual relationships or potential for them brought up in a politics-and-war-centered narrative where you're a side character antagonist doesn't make one asexual.

Akua's more likely to be aromantic and/or asexual than Kairos is, based on textual evidence, because Akua has actually expressed views on sex and relationships that lines up with aspec stuff, while Kairos has simply not been examined from that angle at all.

The same applies to Anaxares. Sometimes, even allo people are just single 😊

Skaddix

Its harder to judge Tyrant cause he is young still and was busy making moves. Hierarch though is what 30 or 40 so its easier to judge him as probably not much interested in that stuff. I think Akua likes sex just fine at least when she was alive, not a romantic though that is for sure.

Liliet

‘Liking sex’ and ‘being a romantic’ have very little to do as a concept with asexuality/aromanticism. Those are about having attraction to people. Which I couldn’t really explain to you what it is because I’m aromantic and asexual myself, but it exists apparently! And I’ve seen no indication of caring about it or having it or any inkling of what it’s like in Akua’s POV when she talks about how she views sex. “This person is probably good in bed” is not attraction.

It’s likely that Akua’s aroace-ness stems from trauma more than anything, and it’s possible that it will change with time as she recovers.

(Which she clearly has been, despite the whole ‘collar ghost’ status being at Catherine’s side has clearly been healthy for her emotionally)

Sexual orientation is fluid actually, it’s a thing that comes up in the aro ace community, and the conclusion is that we’ll have everyone as long as they share our experiences, whether there’s an external reason or not.

And meanwhile, someone can have attraction and lower libido, too. That’s also a combination that’s possible.

(And Masego meanwhile is a lovely poster child of having all meters stuck solidly on 0 and being perfectly comfortable with it <3)

Antoninjohn

Now Cat will work together with her trusted friend against the mass brainwashing summon of Procer

Liliet

We don't really know that what Cordelia's calling on will be a brainwashing summon, necessarily. I doubt we'll get a literal beat for beat repeat of Liesse.

Skaddix

Also brainwashing didn't work last time though the army did get further against the Dead King than any other. So it might work this time if the quality of Named against the Dead King is better. Wonder if there is a type of Angel that is especially good at beating up undead.

Liliet

The point of the previous Crusade angel summon was to override the political bullshit and get the First Prince's head out of their ass.

Cordelia IS the First Prince. She doesn't need mass brainwashing summons when she already has the political authority and acumen to get people to not be completely awful&stupid about the situation.

McKing

"First Princess"?

Intentional or a mistake? Cordelia, I believe, stresses that the title is First Prince of Procer, regardless of gender.

Dresden 67

Cordelia's title is First Prince because she's Lycaonese, and their titles are the same regardless of gender. Aquitaine is an Arlesite principality.

Liliet

It's Cordelia's personal quirk. Lycaonese principalities did not have female rulers for a lot longer than the rest of Procer, and while Cordelia has I believe herself acknowledged in her narration that it's backwards of them, she still takes pride in her national identity. If she's the Prince of Rhenia, she's also the First Prince of Procer, and nobody gets to pretend she's not Lycaonese.

It's a similar power move to Catherine refusing to change her last name. Yes, it's Foundling. You now have Queen Foundling. You're being ruled by an orphan from an Imperial Orphanage, who had her last name picked by the Praesi administration, and doesn't see the slightest problem with it 😊

Letouriste

Ok...i don't get It.

Only thing I understood is that sword will definitely explode some day

WuseMajor

Oh Cat, you are so very mistaken about how able you are to work with the Pilgrim. Heaven wants a huge fight now, so the "Heroes" are going to oppose any attempt to stop it out of "principle" and the one orchestrating that will be the Pilgrim, using the Saint as his "bad cop" so he can fake being a kind and understanding grandfather.

Who do you think got you named Arch-Heretic in the first place?

Liliet

Saint, actually.

Pilgrim literally refused an alliance with Catherine out of the desire to keep the Grand Alliance together, while Saint's move was to destroy it.

Whether or not Saint has convinced Pilgrim to get aboard the ship now that it's sailing, it wasn't his idea originally, and he only left Callow (abandoning his designs there) after the Arch-Heretic bomb dropped.

RanVor

Quite the opposite, in fact.

RanVor

Saint doesn't intend to destroy the Grand Alliance, but to reforge it into an actual alliance that will hold for centuries. To do so, she needs to eliminate politics as a factor determining the level of cooperation between the Good nations, and Procer in its current state stands in the way.

Liliet

Wait, where did she say that?

RanVor

She didn't state it explicitly, but that's the most logical outcome of her designs. Collapsing the Grand Alliance doesn't make sense from her perspective.

Liliet

It does if she thinks it's the ultimate symbol of political greed and corruption. Which it kind of is, and even Cordelia has been getting frustrated at Levantines and Ashurans being in it for territory grabs and assuming she is, too.

The Grand Alliance is kind of a trainwreck in terms of Good.

RanVor

In its current shape, yes, it is a failure. But the IDEA is good, and that's why it needs to be reforged, not destroyed. Saint doesn't think Cordelia is wrong, just insufficiently fanatical. With Procer on the brink of destruction, Ashur and Levant will have no choice but surrender to the heroes to survive, which will allow Laurence to remake the alliance according to her vision. Cordelia's dream will be preserved, even if the First Prince herself won't be part of it anymore.

Liliet

I think you're projecting your own understanding of the situation on Saint. Just because it sounds like a logical conclusion from her thesis doesn't mean it's the one she would come to.

Liliet

like I'm not saying you're necessarily wrong, just that we don't know that

RanVor

I base my reasoning on the assumption that Saint knows the rough shape of the situation and is at least competent enough to pose a threat. It is possible that I'm wrong and she isn't, or that she has no idea what's going on, but I wouldn't bank on it.

Liliet

I think Saint's worldview wrt governments and alliances might be idiosyncratic enough that she won't come to the same conclusion even with the same base premises and full knowledge of the situation.

Javvies

Problem with that is it's not actually a clean slate.

I'm pretty sure that Saint wants Evil to pull something akin to a Triumphant here – successful conquest followed by everything falling apart latest on in a few years with a new generation of rising Heroes.

And the new generation of Heroes are the unquestioned leaders and founders of a new regime.

When you base things on the premise that Good ultimately wins in the end, no matter how good a run Evil had earlier on, it's harder to reform/alter something in the way you want it to be, than it is to let Evil destroy it utterly and have Above help you replace it from scratch.

WuseMajor

As far as meeting the Tyrant goes, I am not sure what will happen. He can see what people truly want, in their heart of hearts. The real question is what he does with this information.

I could imagine him supporting Cat or opposing her and her (and us) not being able to tell the difference.

I could also imagine his metaphorical scouter exploding if he tried that on Akua.

ninegardens

See, the main issue I see with the Tyrant is his incredibly high quality arsenic, which Cat is no longer immune to (No longer being named)... then again, I guess that is the kind of thing that Night could deal with... so probably fine.

SpacyRicochet

I reread the final lines. I did think Hierarch was a plausible choice. But she's saying 'eternal friend' and 'he'.

Both Tyrant and Hierarch are not eternal. And 'he' rules out Bard. I really think the Dead King could be the one in the city.

ninegardens

Tyrant has sent a number of letters pledging his "Eternal Friendship" to Cat, Cordelia, Malicia, Black, The Kingdom under, The gnomes, the elves, the wandering bard, and Elton John.

Okay, maybe not all of those, but "Eternal friendship" I'm pretty sure was one of Tyrant's phrases, usually accompanied by high quality arsenic.

NZPIEFACE

Friendship till death!

Liliet

Also the ratlings. He sent one of those to the ratlings.

SpacyRicochet

Ah, that makes more sense. Tyrant probably then, who triggered Hierarch's Aspect somehow? Still doesn't sound like Tyrant's Aspect.

burdi

"The only way I'd get the other nations to sit at the table was if they no longer believed they could really win against me without losing everything else."

So in the end catherine came to conclusion just like Malicia with her doom weapon in the end she need power

Dresden 67

Yeah, except Malicia was planning on holding her doom weapon over the rest of Calernia's heads forever. Cat just needs a good enough position in the short term to bring the Grand Alliance to the table.

The doom weapon was obvious hero bait, it would have brought endless waves of them until one succeeded. Cat just needs to beat the Saint and a few others, then leverage her advantage to get the Liesse Accords signed.

ninegardens

So here's a question- what would the story weight have been if Malicia got the doom weapon, and then created a treaty (say, equivalent to the accords), saying that the damn thing was illegal and granting Procer etc liscence to dismantle the damn thing as soon as the treaty was signed. None of this "Hold it over them forever" but instead "Hold it over them for five minutes while asking them to sign a reasonable treaty so that no one (myself included) ever makes one of these again."

What would Story even make of that? Would it still count as hero bait if the heroes had already been offered a reasonable diplomatic route to removing the damn thing?

BarthHumphries

Evil Supervillain is about to create a doomsday device.
Should us heroes go stop that? 😊

Also, agreement through duress doesn't count so i doubt the accords would hold for very long in that case.

Liliet

Yeah, except Catherine's going to threaten to kill heroes and destroy armies, while Malicia's threat would have been to irreparably damage the fabric of Creation and let hordes of devils out into countrysides at will.

One of those is politics and power struggle. The other is "kill it with goblinfire right now no matter the cost".

RanVor

That the differences in personality lead to different practical applications of the conclusion doesn't mean that the logic behind it isn't the same.

Liliet

Sure, it is.

And Catherine had even agreed with Malicia on her plan, back then.

The underlying idea was not what the problem was with Malicia's plan. Execution was.

Zaver SaintCloud

I just want to say that I appreciate the distinction she makes; "The finest minds on the continent... pause ... and me.

Liliet

Catherine's self-burns are highest quality ♥

Zaver SaintCloud

I didn't even fear as a burn, in the traditional sense. Rather a grudging admittance that when it comes to intrigue & grand strategy, she's the small fish struggling to just keep swimming.

Captain Amazing

I predict the insanity in Toulouse is from the kanenas. I think they have enforcement methods other than murder to make people abandon a basic human trait like ambition. Also, I think the Sisters will be declared to be the "Gods Below" as far as Bellerophon is concerned because they have the right to vote in the councils. It's never been done before so there is no prior precedent.

ninegardens

So... possibly a dumb question/theory... but how sure are we that the Bard is on the side of "Good"?

I mean... is she trying to make Good win, or is she literally some kind of spirit of "Keep the game running", smiting down anyone who disturbs the rules... on EITHER side. [I think we can all agree that to the best of appearances she is not actually good in the traditional earth sense] and sure, she's been trying to break Black, but is that because she is "Good" or because he is trying to damage the game?

I mean, she showed up for Sve Noc, apparently offering a deal on behalf of Below...

And if that is the case.... then what the heck is the role of the Dead King?

I mean sure, his actions seem pretty bad... but his timing and attack are COMPLETELY in Cat's favour... and potentially in favour of breaking the game (If Cat get's her treaty etc etc)

Andrew Mitchell

I think you're 100% spot on with "keep the game running". She has appeared to be acting for both Above and Below and she's actively working against Cat and Black who are both trying to break the game. The Deak King's on the side of Below but he's been extremely careful not to give Above any story leverage that would see him undone. Having said that, he recognises that he's currently stuck in a seemingly endless rut so perhaps he sees Cat trying to break the game as an opportunity for him to break out into something new as well?

Rewdy

> The general barely glanced at the staff I was leaning on, but I felt Diabolist's gaze linger.

Diabolist's thoughts : <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5aopMm7UGYA>

Chapter 6: Furor

"The words of one sage are wisdom, the words of a hundred a riot."

– Atalantian saying

What was it with Proceran cities and looking kind of shoddy?

Rochelant at least had bothered to put up walls at some point in its history, which the Callowan in me could not help but approve of, but those miserable piles of mud and stone looked like they hadn't seen a day's maintenance in the last century. I wouldn't need sorcery to knock those over, just a sapper with a few tools and a pile of firewood. On the other hand, I couldn't help but stare at the size of the place – come winter, and we were definitely there, there must have been at least twenty something thousand people living in there. Rochelant was a goblin's dream playground, all wooden thatched houses and narrow alleys, but by Proceran standards this was considered a small city. There would be a handful of those in Iserre alone, with the eponymous capital being significantly larger. Sometimes it boggled the mind how many people actually lived within the borders of the Principate. Sure, these were the heartlands and by far the most densely populated part of the realm, but I wouldn't be surprised if the total population of Procer beat that of Callow and Praes put together. But the behemoth is quarrelsome, and slow to wake, I thought. That'd been the sole saving grace of the Principate's bordering nations since the crowning of the founding First Prince. Yet both those flaws would have to be fixed, if the war up north was to be won.

There was a reason I would have peace as set by the Liesse Accords or no peace at all. Procer resurgent, purged of all its weaknesses, might be almost as dangerous to Calernia as the Dead King himself. Cordelia Hasenbach did not strike me as particularly ambitious when it came to acquiring new territories directly – her game had always been a diplomatic in outcome, when she was the one leading the dance – but there was no guarantee her successor would be so inclined. I wasn't going to bloody Callow and its allies just to enable the latest imperial expansion of the 'Wardens of the West', as the rulers of this realm so arrogantly titled themselves.

"Ivah wasn't making it up," Archer mused. "They really haven't bothered to put up sentries. Bold, I've gotta say."

The walls were only about a dozen feet high and I had doubts they were thick enough to resist even a single good hit from a trebuchet, but the part Indrani had focused on was perhaps the most important: there was not a soul patrolling atop them. Or guarding the city gates, which were as wide open as such a narrow gap allowed. The snowy dirt road leading to them had been use recently, though. There were hoof marks leading into the countryside, so whoever held command in there was fielding at least some patrols. I pulled at the reins of Zombie the Fourth, though the dead horse I'd spared from ending up in a drow cookpot to serve as my undead mount instead showed no reaction to the gesture. Necromancy, insofar as I was truly doing that – and Akua had expressed her doubts on the subject many a time – had gotten a little rougher since I'd traded in Winter for Night. Whatever strange spark of intelligence my good little abomination Zombie the Third still held wherever she was – unnecessarily – grazing at grass was absent from my new mount. The Sisters insisted this was a consequence of my raw handling of Night, but I disagreed. There'd been something to Winter that was missing in the Night, even after the latter had devoured the former. Crow-Andronike stirred on my shoulder, displeased, but did not take up the argument. It was probably for the best that her sister had remained with the southern expedition, because she most definitely would have.

"The smoke means chimneys and fires are still being used," Akua noted from my other side. "In large enough amount it cannot be solely the soldiers of the League doing so. That implies some degree of coherent thought remains to the inhabitants."

"Not a demon, probably, unless it is," Indrani summed up.

Diabolist looked deeply pained at the phrasing, but did not disagree. I smothered a smile and urged Zombie forward with a twist of will. The company of drow around us was heavy on Lords, at General Rumena's insistence, though to be fair I hadn't bothered to argue. Ivah, Soln, Sagas and Vadymir: the majority of my surviving Peerage was trailing the three of us, with around four dozen rylleh of mixed sigils following behind them in turn. As long as the moon was out, the power at my back was the equivalent of fielding a small army. In power, anyway, and that was always tricky business. All that was necessary for them to turn into a mere fifty drow was the right ward or miracle. They'd been predators among predators, down in the Everdark, but where the Firstborn had been shedding their own blood for millennia up here the war had two sides. For all their centuries of fighting and deep wells of Night, I often wondered how well my Peerage would truly stack up against a well-trained hero. We'll have to find out, eventually, I grimly thought. I shook off the thought and turned by attention back to the present.

The closer we got to the city, the more I became convinced there were eyes on us. There was not a soul immediately through the gates, which made that rather interesting. Andronike's sliver of godhood on my shoulder should be quite enough to make a wreck of any attempt to scry us, implying something was actually watching us directly.

"Archer?" I murmured.

Even under the hood and cloth I saw her brow creasing.

"Correct me if I'm wrong," Indrani said. "But I'm guessing if these people can't even put together the coin for decent walls they shouldn't have enough to put up gargoyles on them."

Akua stilled.

"Helikeans are fond of animating stone," the shade said. "Though admittedly they've rarely succeeded at anything larger than a dog."

Now that I knew what to look for, I could make out the small silhouettes that'd wedged themselves into holes and fissures. Imp-like sculptures of rough stone, some with the heads of dogs and others more lizardlike. Many had wings, though not all. I'd missed them at first look, I thought, because none of them were moving even the slightest bit. Not even the eyes.

"No sentries, huh," I said. "Looks like our good friend the Tyrant is a little more careful than he lets on."

Ivah slid up to me, head already bowed, but I waved away the apology before it could be spoken. It'd been the kind of detail someone unused to having to consider what people could and could not afford – in essence, not a drow – might have missed. Living in massive ornate ruins could be a blind spot of sorts, and both Ivah and its scouts had spent their whole lives living in the remnants of their old empire. Interesting, though, that the mistake would fit so well. Had the Tyrant gotten lucky, or was there more to it? Regardless, it seemed that my army's last visit to Rochelant might not have been as discreet as we'd previously thought. The Tyrant of Helike, I suspected, would be waiting for us.

"You'll know next time," I simply told Ivah. "Mistakes are to be expected. It doesn't matter, so long as you learn from them."

"As you say, Losara Queen," the Lord of Silent Steps murmured back.

With a bow it retreated, just in time for us to enter Rochelant in lockstep. The gate above us was arched, and I felt petty satisfaction at noting that my earlier prediction of poor wall depth proved entirely accurate. The muddy road into the city ahead of us was probably the closest thing to an avenue there was to be found in here. Broad enough for a cart to go through, anyway, which had probably been the measure it was built on.

"Akua," I simply said.

Diabolist met my eyes, inclined her head and as we passed in the shade cast by a house she vanished into thin air. She had her instructions already. My arguably finest expert in sorcery would be taking a look at the influence taking hold of Rochelant, though she was to retreat and return to me the moment she started feeling it herself.

"It is here," Andronike spoke from my shoulder. "Like waves lapping at the shore. There is a source further in."

"Not feeling anything," Indrani noted.

"For which we give thanks to the Night," I mildly replied.

I had no intention of walking into a place like this without one of my crow-goddesses serving as a shield.

"My thoughts exactly. Hail the Sisters, all that good stuff," Archer snorted.

She'd never been one to meet a deity and not debate whether to try to stab it, I recognized with a sigh.

"We head for the source," I told the drow. "Andronike?"

"None may hide from me after dusk," the crow claimed.

That might even be true, as I immediately felt a pull in the Night guiding me forward through the streets. Given how narrow they were, the drow had to spread out over rooftops to keep even a semblance of formation. They did so in utter silence, ethereal silhouettes in the moonlight that left no mark and bore no weight. We'd left the main road behind, and with that any semblance of this city not being a nightmarish mess of cramped alleys. Tough sometimes it was so tight that Archer couldn't even stay at my side, our journey through was informative in some ways. There were still people inside the houses, though not nearly as many as there should be this late out. The sounds in the distance told me that Ivah's report of 'tribunals' had not been idle chatter: I could hear shouting in Chantant, the bay of a mob out for a good hanging. The first trial we came across was on the steps of a House of Light, and the sight of a roiling mob of nearly a hundred had me ordering my horse to a halt. The Procerans did not pay us the slightest attention, though the other foreigners did. Watching on passively from a distance, a dozen soldiers in scale armour were standing apart from the crowd. Sword and board men, the lot of them, though the mail beneath the scales going down to their knees was a style of armour known to me. Helikean, though these men-at-arms were missing the javelins their lot was reputed to bear.

The Tyrant's soldiers looked at us, but before long returned their attention to the citizens. So you knew we were coming, I thought. Or your orders are not to care about outsiders coming in. Gaze returning to the Procerans, I tried to parse out the mixed shouts of Chantant and Tolesian they were using interchangeably and found only mixed success. The man they were attempting to hold a tribunal over was obvious, a brother from the House of Light wearing what had once been very nice robes now ripped and dirtied. Accusations bribery and withheld healing were tossed at him, but my interest lay in the fact that there were other priests among the crowd. Shouting with the others, red-faced and thirsty for blood. Whatever was animating these people, even priesthood was no opponent for it.

"They're not resorting to violence yet," I noted out loud.

"That robe didn't rip itself," Archer replied.

Yes, but she was missing the point. For all the anger and fervour stirring up the crowd, they were not simply tearing the accused apart. The process was rough and loud, but accusations were being laid and witnesses called. Some law, I suspected, was being obeyed. But whose? It was certainly not the laws of Iserre, or even those few that held for the entire Principate. We stayed long enough to see the crowd begin voting on the seven among them that would make up the tribunal and pass the sentence, though I did not remain to witness what would be the inevitable conclusion. There were already headless corpses staining the front of the House that told me the nature of it. The Helikean soldiers parted wordlessly for us when I rode past them, Archer at my side. None of them caught sight of the shadows following me by way of the rooftops. Three more of these trials we encountered as I let the Night guide me further into Rochelant, each headed for grim ending.

"There's something in the air here," Indrani grunted as we passed the third.

"Blood," I flatly replied.

I glanced to the side as she pulled back her hood a fraction, revealing troubled hazelnut eyes.

"This almost feels like a domain, Cat," she said. "Only wrong. Winter was cruel, but it was... clear. This has a fever to it, a sickness. Whatever's at the centre of this, it is mad."

I shivered, fingers closing tightly around my ebony staff. I'd heard what she did not say. It was mad, and so it was dangerous – and we were head towards it.

"And still we advance," I said.

Stillness held for a moment.

"Well," Archer said, pulling down her hood. "Not like we ever let good sense get in the way before."

I sent Zombie forward, knowing there was a grain of truth to that. Andronike's talons dug into my shoulder as we made our way out of the alley not long after, a sign we'd reached the source of this bloody dream. The clamour could be heard long before I saw anything with my own eyes, the wave of sound that was hundreds of people talking and screaming and moving. Before us stood what was likely a marketplace, though packed full with citizens as it was that could only remain a guess. Men and women were standing in line in the back, up against a tavern, and I watched as the one in front was dragged to the side and beheaded before the parted corpse was dragged away out of sight. Immediately the tribunal that'd passed the sentence returned to the mob, and voting began on who would make up the next as the second in line in the back was brought to the front. This was it, I thought. Even with the crow goddess on my shoulder shielding me from the worst of this, I could feel something rippling in the air. A steady pulse like a heartbeat. Leaning on the height temporarily granted to me by my horse, I followed the sensation to its source.

There was a table to the side of the proceedings, more a pile of crates than anything else, and at it sat a single man. Tanned in the way of the Free Cities, he was dressed like a beggar in worn robes too loose on his frame. Which was thin, though not the thinness of the heathy. He looked like he'd had too many lean meals, or perhaps like the fire in those grey eyes had eaten away at his body from the inside. The Hierarch of the League of Free Cities, for this could not be anyone else, was middle-aged and balding. His eyebrows were thick and bushy, both they and his sparse beard warring between white streaks and dark brown. One of his boots, I could not help but notice, had been so poorly sown back on the sole was coming off at the front. I looked at him, saw him scribbling on a clay tablet while intently following the proceedings, and felt the slightest bit of fear. He looked like no one, I thought. But coming from his body like an invisible current was some deep and terrible power the touch of which could be felt over all of Rochelant. It was not reaching into my mind, not yet, but it felt as if raising my hand would allow me to feel the unseen ripples.

"That's an aspect," Indrani said, voice hushed. "Gods, how can that be an aspect?"

"Andronike?" I asked.

The crow-goddess did not reply for a long moment, until I turned my head to look at her. If a bird could look uncomfortable, I saw, it would be something like this.

"This is... difficult," Andronike said, voice tight. "The pull is strong."

My fingers clenched.

"You're having a hard time fighting him," I croaked. "What the Hells is this, Andronike? He's Named, not..."

"Faith," the crow got out. "This is faith, Catherine Foundling. Pure unadulterated belief, untainted by doubt or hesitation. It sings, and the world sings back."

"Faith in what?" I asked.

"Nothing," Andronike hissed. "A snake eating its own tail. It is bleak madness screamed by endless throats, and it would stand tribunal over the Gods themselves."

I swallowed. And the Tyrant of Helike was using this man as a pawn?

"We need to leave," Archer said. "We're not ready for this. Not without Masego."

I breathed in, breathed out. Fear was the death of reason. None of the reasons I had come here had changed. If anything, the depths of the man I was still looking at made it more important to get a handle on what the League was after. I allowed my staff to slip my fingers and hit the frozen ground. Calling on a breath's worth of Night, I used to support to get off my horse. Indrani sucked in a breath.

"Cat, this is a trap," she said.

"And still I advance," I ruefully smiled. "Andronike, safeguard them."

The crow left my shoulder, a few flaps of her wings landing her atop the head of the eerily-still Zombie.

"It will sing to you, First Under the Night," the goddess warned.

"Ah, but that's the trick," I told her, baring my teeth. "You can't go mad twice, o goddess of Night."

Limping against my staff, I slipped into the crowd. The sound and power beat at my eardrums like a ram, in some way intertwined, and it took me by surprise hard enough some man almost elbowed me off my feet. I grit my teeth and shoved back with my staff. It should have stung, but the man was too busy screaming his vote in Chantant to notice. Going straight through would see me trampled, I decided, so I made my way to the edge instead and began circling around. The pounding in my ears was relentless. Again and again it came as I stumbled around half-blind, until I could almost make out words. Almost. I caught my breath against a half-fallen stall, and only then gathered enough attention to notice the woman staring at me. She was, it was almost too absurd to think, aggressively nondescript. There was a muted look to her face, as if her thoughts were halfway elsewhere, though as she narrowed her eyes I felt something brush against my mind.

Somewhere very far away, Sve Noc bared their teeth in displeasure.

The stranger paled, eyes turning bloodshot, and clutched her forehead as scarlet began dripping out of her nostrils. Shouldn't have done that, I thought. In there be monsters, my friend. I immediately felt dozens of stares settle on me, but I ignored them and began the journey again. Not far, now, and where the Hierarch was seated a gap had formed in the crowd. I pushed the last woman out of the way, though I froze just after. I could have sworn I'd hear someone whisper in my ear, though the words had been indistinct. My fingers clutched the staff and I drew comfort from the sensation of the Night within, letting out a deep breath and putting myself together. The Named, I saw, had not so much as glanced at me. Neither did he bother when I stepped around the makeshift table until I stood behind him. I glanced down at the words being scribbled on the clay tablet with a stone stylet. That wasn't Chantant, I noted. I didn't recognize the language, although at one of the words was very close to the Mtethwa for 'protest' so it might be tradertalk. The second Maleficent had held the region under her grasp for long enough there'd been some bleed into the local tongue, I'd read.

"Will anyone but you actually be able to read those?" I said in Chantant.

I'd meant to speak lightly, but my voice came out rough instead. The Hierarch finally paused in his writing, turning to look at me. There was something calm, almost resigned, to the stare. As if nothing of Creation could truly ruffle his feathers.

"Irrelevant," the Hierarch replied in the same, tone chiding. "Transcripts must be kept of trials held."

I blinked. Huh. Not the answer I'd expected. The power battering at my mind was weakening, I felt, slowly but surely. Did the aspect require concentration?

"I am-"

"You have the look of a foreign tyrant," the Hierarch accused.

"Back home it's called regular tyranny, though," I replied, and immediately bit my tongue.

I'd really thought I was done with the whole taunting dangerous, powerful madmen thing but apparently old habits died hard. The Hierarch's brow furrowed as he seemed to seriously mull over that. The battering ram slowed even further.

"That seems logical," he muttered. "It should be passed on to the Republic for consideration."

Then he turned those dark eyes back on me.

"You do not deny the charge of tyranny?" he pressed.

"You already laid out your stance in our correspondence," I said.

He seemed vaguely surprised, then thoughtful.

"You are Cordelia Hasenbach," the man stated, half-questioningly.

A moment passed, while I was genuinely at a loss for words. Ah, I thought. So this is why the Tyrant thinks he can make a pawn of you. For a heartbeat I debated actually pretending I was the First Prince just to see if I could make some trouble for her, but discarded the notion just as quick. Best not to roll dice when they had teeth and a noted fondness for biting.

"Catherine Foundling," I replied. "Queen of Callow."

If he felt embarrassed about the mistake, he didn't show it in the slightest.

"There's no such thing," he told me sternly.

"Queens or Catherine Foundling?" I said. "Because one of those debates is a lot more philosophical than I'm equipped to handle."

Behind us the clamour of the crowd had quieted some, but by the sounds of it the trials hadn't stopped. Neither had the aspect, I thought, at least not entirely. But what had been a trumpet earlier was a murmur now, and that I could handle while keeping most of my wits about me.

"Aristocracy Is A Festering Wound Upon The People," Anaxares of Bellerophon gravely informed me. "May Hail Strike It Repeatedly For A Thousand Years."

That seemed a little excessive. There shouldn't be much left to hail on after the first century.

"Preaching to the Choir there," I said. "I've never fought a war against someone who didn't have some sort of title."

"Yet you are a queen," he said, blithely ignoring his previous assertion there was no such thing.

"For the moment," I shrugged. "I intend to abdicate when it's feasible."

"So your kind always claims," the Hierarch said, eyes turning flinty. "Give me the right, they say, give me the laws and the swords. I will keep you safe until the storm has passed. And service becomes rule, rule becomes tyranny until lovingly the yoke is fastened around our necks."

Like the hammer on the anvil, the ram against the gate, the dull pounding of his power began to sound in the distance. Slow. Swelling. Implacable. But I would not be cowed that easily.

"Is this why the League has gone to war?" I asked. "To end crowns?"

There wasn't a single thing that changed about him, I thought. He was still a skeleton of a man in ill-fitting robes, a scarecrow with a scowl. Not a single thing had changed, and yet... If I strained the ear, I could hear the chorus. The howls of the mob. Chains ripped apart, palaces toppled and bones being crushed. Torches starting a fire that would spread across the world. A song of revolt, of rebellion. I could feel it, like warm wine running through my veins. It was harsh and unforgiving, but oh how glorious it was. How easy it would have been to partake of it and let that warmth swallow me whole.

"We are all of us free or we are none of us free," the Hierarch of the League of Free Cities said, voice like steel. "There is no middle ground. And for the lashes struck at our back, all will be called to account – if gallows must be raised for devils and angels alike, so be it."

I almost, out of sheer contrariness, pointed out that devils did not die but only disperse. But would they really, if it was this man passing the sentence? Suddenly I was not so certain. My mistake, I thought, had been trying to think of him as either a terror or a fool. Fear had dogged me, wading through his aspect, but it had retreated as we spoke. As the man proved to be so uninterested in his surrounding as to be lost. I'd allowed the cadenced little phrases, the obvious mistakes and ignorance, to lull me into believing him... adrift. Living in his own world. But Black had warned me about people like this, hadn't he? About Named who did not see Creation as it was but how it should be. Men and women who embraced their vision so deeply they bent the world around them to match it. My mistake, I thought once more, had been to believe he must be only one of the two. He was not.

The Tyrant of Helike had not sharpened this blade so carefully to cut a mortal empire, I decided. There was a broader game unfolding.

"It's a pretty dream," I said. "A pretty speech. But you ended it before you got to the end – the part where you declare war on the rest of the continent for those same pretty things, and it eats you alive. It's not a fight you're going to win, Hierarch."

The man's lips quirked, his face serene save for the scorn.

"War against Calernia," he said amusedly. "As if tearing down masters was the same thing as warring on their slaves. You betray yourself, tyrant. You think I wage war on them?"

The stylus flicked at the crowd of Procerans. The axe went up, the axe went down. Another dead man, dragged into the alley.

"The old faceless thing bade me to choose a side," the Hierarch said. "And at long last, I have."

My eyes narrowed. The old faceless thing. There weren't a lot of entities out there that would fit that epithet. Anaxares of Bellerophon smiled, crooked teeth bared.

"You think us outnumbered?" he said. "How many of us are there, tyrant, and how many of you?"

I could have wounded him, then. Not with a blade – here and now, even if he did not lift a finger, I did not think that would end well for me – but with words. A reminder that he marched with slavers and monsters, that his own League would turn on him in due time. That he should get his own fucking house in order before tossing stones at mine. Or maybe that power would fail him, in the end, and that like the city-state that spawned him his road would end in blood and whimpering. But there would be a place and a time for that, and it was not tonight.

I had seen the sword, and must now see its wielder.

"It's a lovely song," I said instead. "But it's always easier to break than to make."

The Hierarch's gaze returned to the trial, where the accused was being dragged to the fore.

"There will be one for you as well, one day," he said.

"But not tonight," I said.

"Not tonight," he softly agreed.

I left as the man bent back over his tablet, hand moving anew to write words only he could read.

It was past time I had a chat with the other madman in this city.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Wry Warudo

Found the Hierarch

taovkool

For the People!

SpacyRicochet

Yes! Oh Hierarch, ultimate ruler!

nipi

Heresy! I charge this ally of tyranny with treason. No man is above another.

Mental Mouse

Alas, this very forum system revels in placing those who speak first above those who would seek to respond to them.

Skaddix

Hmm Tyrant next chapter that should prove more fruitful.
Cat knows Hiearach has dealt with the Bard.
Another Masego mention so I assume next chapter or whenever Cat meets the Tyrant. The Tyrant will drop that particular bombshell.

I am still confused is the area of effect from the Hierarch Faith? Or is it his Faith enhancing an Aspect to extreme degree. Seems almost like the Ability that Angel of Contrition used to force millions to march against the Dead King. Of course that was a good deal more powerful.

Dainpdf

Black said confidence powers Named. Who could be more confident than a man so deep in the throes of madness?

daegone823

The same way the Saint of Swords has improved her own aspects through meditation in seclusion. The saint probably has an aspect like cut that could make strong slashes, which matured to making slashes that could fire from afar, later on after meditation she could literally cut creation with her blade.

I believe the hierarch has been able to intensify the effects of his domain by increasing the area of effect as well as the power that while weak is able to penetrate all eventually. This power can only be maintained as long as he maintains his purpose(dwarf name). Thus whenever he is distracted or his thoughts wander to anything besides writing laws, judgement, he weakens.

So yes it is an aspect, a domain aspect similar to Champion's and Fall, but he has been able to increase effectiveness through his faith which is believing in the people. He is a name that has been created by the tyrant in order to control a power that can nullify the bard simply because his story allows him to. He is a secret weapon against entities who mainly use story narratives. By leaving everything to a vote the tyrant has harnessed the power of the mob similar to a roman emperor harnessing roman citizens against any other would be power.

Skaddix

Fair seems the weakness of Bard is dealing with mortals with Faith as so far Hanno, Tyrant and Hierarch have all must with Bard by leaning into the Faith and thus being unpredictable because of that. You are right class Black noted that Named are more powerful when they lean into their name. Although that does tend to lead to some degree of tunnel vision.

caoimhinh

I wonder if Cat will convince Kairos of joining her by promising to give him the greatest war against the greatest enemy, the Dead King. That might be a diplomatic way to make a temporal deal between them, of course, Kairos will betray her, but would be sometime in the future instead of now.

Liliet

Why would Kairos need Cat to offer him that? The Dead King is right there. He knows about it. He can go fight him himself if he wants to.

Now, the entertainment of trying to craft an alliance against the Dead King? That might just be right up his "let's elect a Bellerophon Hierarch" alley.

Rook

I honestly think the Tyrant does have a big overall end game and even the dead king is too small fry to be in his sights.

I think he's aiming at Above and Below. The entire idea that there are only two sides, there are only two choices to choose from. The nature of the weapon he crafted tells a story there.

He probably doesn't give a ratting's ass about the people or their democracy, but what the Hierarch stands for is a perfect knife if your goal is to turn a 'true or false' question into a multiple choice one.

Liliet

Yeah.

Catherine's 'fall in line or else' alliance could provide entertainment on the way, though. Oh, he'd betray her obviously, but I think this fits his idea of fun (more so than attacking DK)

luminiousblu

"I am still confused is the area of effect from the Hierarch Faith?"

It's a case of being the god of your own world. A Domain is – outside of the Guide – essentially an area where you reign supreme over all other comers. It can be a physical plot of land or a metaphysical or conceptual one. In the Guide, it seems to be both at once really – you have a conceptual or metaphysical domain, and actually invoking the domain actively forces your surroundings to adhere to it. Hence, when Catherine invoked her Domain, she made her surroundings into a Moonless Night.

Yardaze

dang, Hierarch got scary.

Javvies

Hmmm.

Not entirely sure how I feel about Heirarch now.

Ah, yes, the old "good sense hasn't stopped us before, why should we let it stop us now?"

And unholy fuck – that's a brutal, if perhaps situational, Aspect.

Kairos playing a dangerous game – even by the standards of Evil rulers.

Rook

The thing is, Catherine is the exact same type as the Hierarch. The hilarity of it is that she just had an entire internal monologue about what a scary, dangerous madman this guy is, but the only reason she can casually walk into the eye of his vortex – one a goddess was struggling with – and have a casual conversation, is because they're fundamentally similar types.

"Names who did not see creation as it was but what it should be. Men and women who embraced their vision so deeply they bent the world around them to match it"

Girl, that's literally a description of you. Some know-nothing orphan teenager with shit for talents that – out of sheer stubbornness – managed to beat back the hells, bend a choir over her knee, eat half a faerie realm, bring down a Flying Fortress city, and win a war against a national superpower. Then you walked into an ancient mysterious empire with two and a half people to pick a fight with everyone living inside it; and instead of, y'know, dying, you broke a several millenniums old curse and walked out with a goddess older than your ancestors grandfathers on your shoulder. Also an army that puts most surface nations to shame.

The Hierarch is just weak person that draws in far stronger, far more capable people around him by sheer force of conviction. A complete fool and a madman to anyone outside his pull, but a center of nearly fanatical devotion to people inside of it, despite his ignorance and weaknesses. He's obviously not the smartest person there and half his followers could probably pulp him into a quivering bloody mass if they felt like it, but they all just follow His vision instead. Does that remind you of anyone?

Catherine is just like the Hierarch, except with more sarcasm and proper armor.

Skaddix

I mean they are similar in the sense that they both want to do the best for Normal People who aren't Rich, Named or anyway special. Just vastly different motivations and techniques.

Cold Cyberia

I think they're completely different.

Catherine started out as Hierarch: blind to the currents that drive the world and convinced of her own infallibility. Since then she's gained insight into the geopolitical and economic forces behind the world (Praes vs Callow), learned to use the skewed lens of the narrative and gleaned information on the biggest players such as the Bard and the Dead King. She has lost her extremism and her naive, simplistic view of the world.

The Hierarch is the opposite. He's completely blind to the realities of the world to the point where he thought Cat was Cordelia and the Tyrant is using him as a pawn. He doesn't have any considerations for the people he claims to be championing nor the political reality of what he's trying to do. Will he go around the entire world issuing trials? How will he enforce his political system? How many people will die after the existing leadership is removed? How is he different from any other madman that says "this is how the world should be"?

luminiousblu

You're looking at this the wrong way.

"Realities of the world"

What ARE the realities of the world? There's a saying that goes, "each one of us believes ourselves to be the most sensible people in the world". The Hierarch has faith in what he does, and from the point of view of Name Lore, that's all that matters. Who are you to tell him he's wrong? What if you're just blind? In the face of overwhelming belief in what he's doing, you can't really oppose him. Those realities you're talking about have already been washed away in part – the League of Free Cities has basically folded up behind an uncooperative hobo.

"where he thought Cat was Cordelia"

Because there's no real difference, to him. He doesn't know who is who, but he also doesn't care.

"He doesn't have any considerations for the people he claims to be championing."

The Hierarch is not championing persons, he is championing The People. Two entirely different things. Every single person in the world could die, and you could still, in theory, be saving The People.

"How will he enforce his political system? How many people will die after the existing leadership is removed?"
Irrelevant.

"How is he different from any other madman that says "this is how the world should be"?"

And that's the crux of the matter. How is ANYONE different from any other madman who looks at the world and says, "not the way I like it"? Do you really think he's that different from any of the other Named – or even some of the bigger non-Named? He's more ideological than practical, but in a world driven by stories they're almost the same thing – an actual deity has trouble overcoming his apparently passive mental influence. People who aren't just as mad as he is can't compete with him, and Named in general are mad.

Cold Cyberia

How is maintaining his political system irrelevant? It's his established goal to make sure The People rule. If he has no mechanism to enforce this, someone will come into power either through corruption or inertia.

That's what I mean by the realities of the world – he's not making a sustainable change. Instated, he's having a tantrum like a reality warping baby. Moreover, he's being used as a pawn by the Tyrant, who certainly doesn't give a shit about The People.

342

All hail the communist republic.

Liliet

This is a very good comparison point. Catherine and Hierarch have just enough similarities that contrasting them is effective.

It's a contrast, though. And the contrast is that... in the end, Catherine is right and Anaxares is wrong. Not even in terms of ideology or morality, simply in terms of facts. Catherine has them, and understands them. Anaxares does not, and refuses to. His position is one of stubborn willful ignorance, while Catherine's is that of a quest for knowledge and understanding.

That's what makes the difference between them.

(and before someone starts on "Catherine is an unreliable narrator": she is not the only one we have. There are lots of other POVs in the series, and in terms of basic facts about how the world works, they support Catherine's position... while Anaxares's bullshit is transparently obvious even in his own POV)

Rook

Completely disagree. See, that isn't how arguments or differences in belief work.

Different perspectives don't come from one person being right and the other person being intentionally stupid. They happen in the first place because both people think they're right and they're sensible. Any time any two people have a difference in opinion about anything, you have to go into it realizing this instead of digging in your heels with “one person is right and the other is wrong, how stupid of the – other person – to be so wrong”. At that point you’ve already become part of the problem.

Catherine isn’t right, nor is Anaxares wrong. The opposite isn’t true either. They both have parts they’re correct about and both have blinders that leave their stances less than perfect. If you really wanted to you could frame anyone as right and anyone else as wrong. “Amadis and Cordelia were on a quest for peace with a small sacrifice while Catherine’s is one of pride that saw a hundred thousand people die without changing anything for the better”. See how easy it is?

“Facts” are also a word that gets thrown around a lot in arguments while often being useless, because people often conflate their own opinions with fact and even when you don’t, different contexts often make the ‘facts’ different.

Let’s try an example.

An American says everyone needs a gun to protect themselves, that’s a fact. A Brit says no one needs guns to protect themselves, that’s a fact. They’re both actually correct, and both wrong in a bigger context. Because in the context of America where guns are already prevalent the former really is a fact. In the context of Britain or the general UK where even the police often don’t bother carrying, the latter really is a fact. Both are partially wrong though, because they started off with ‘I’m right and they’re wrong’ instead of both trying to get a handle on why there’s a disagreement in the first place. In a bigger context, they’re the same type person making the same type of argument, the only real difference is the rather trivial one of where their particular perspective is rooted.

Liliet

See, you have a point, normally.

Except wilful ignorance is literally Anaxares’s ideology.

Rook

His ideology is willful denial actually, not ignorance. Very important distinction.

For example, when he says that there is no such thing as a queen, that doesn’t mean he literally has no idea what a queen is. He clearly does know, by the fact that he blatantly talks about said nonexistent concept of queenship five seconds later. I don’t believe that bit of detail in this chapter was just fluff or a joke actually, it's a fairly important nuance that was slipped in.

What he's doing is denying the legitimacy of the concept. No different than the principiate pretending Catherine wasn't the ruler of callow, it's a flat denial out of principle, not that Cordelia is too stupid to wrap her mind around the concept of Catherine being a ruler.

It's not exactly some insane fairytale idea either, even though for theatrical purposes this particular web serial frames it as such. You see it in political conflicts in the real world all the time, for example the way mainland China won't acknowledge Taiwan as an independent country. Or NK leadership claiming there is no greater country than NK.

It isn't ignorance, it's a deliberate political or ideological stance taken for a very specific purpose – protesting the legitimacy of a concept being applied to the real world. It's a stubborn tactic and a questionably ethical one at best, but far from 'stupid'.

Liliet

You do have a point, Anaxares might just be a lot less insane than he comes across as.

He still deliberately ignores most of the information he gets from his Aspect, or he would have recognized that Catherine wasn't Cordelia 0.0

RanVor

I don't think he actually doesn't know how Cordelia Hasenbach looks like. He just doesn't care. A Foreign Tyrant is a Foreign Tyrant, further distinction is meaningless to him.

Liliet

Yeah, I'm seeing the point here.

Zachary

Anaxares even mentions himself in an earlier chapter that he's fully aware of the blinders he wears. He is just strongly committed to the idea that only mass consensus that determine things. And in some ways he's not wrong; his argument in response to Catherine says she plans to abdicate was 100% spot-on and the same argument that can truthfully be used against the wealthy in our own society (that even if they try to make pragmatic excuses for maintaining their hold on ill-gotten wealth, they have no legitimate claim to it to begin with).

At the end of the day, monarchy is obviously bad, even if Anaxares takes direct democracy to an impractical extreme. Catherine can't see it because it's not something she cares much about and still holds the "common sense" beliefs of the society she lives in (that regular people can't be trusted to make decisions about who leads the country).

luminiousblu

Everyone is so sure that they're right, and that everyone else is wrong. Such is the human condition, but not everyone can be right at the same time.

How is Catherine right? Does she have the facts? If there's one thing that's remained constant about Catherine, it's that she has no fucking idea what she's doing. Ever. Her knowledge is constantly patched up by those with greater intelligence and expertise, and when she tries to go at it alone she makes an utter mess of things that she only scrapes out of by being either rescued or via what is essentially plot armour.

"she is not the only one we have"

The Wandering Bard would strongly disagree with how Catherine sees the world, as would the Saint of Swords and the Ranger. All of the narrators we see in any real depth are the ones that happen to see the world the way Catherine does. Black and Malicia see the world the way Catherine does, in large part. Cordelia doesn't see the world the same way at all, but she uses a knockoff realpolitiik which seems reasonable in large part to us, as readers, because it's the way our world works – and hence since Catherine thinks she's reasonable and presents herself as so, we think of Cordelia as somehow thinking the same way because she's also reasonable.

Warlock and Masego see the world through the lens of overlapping rules, which isn't how anyone else sees it. Ranger and to a lesser extent Archer are hedonists, they see the world as their oyster, until someone takes it from them. The Grey Pilgrim is literally Gandalf, and the Saint of Swords sees things in the shade of maximising the advantage of Good over Evil, and True Neutrals can eat it. It's so easy to dismiss them as just wrong, isn't it?

And how does Anaxares see the world 'incorrectly'? There's very few things he's said that are outright wrong. He calls people Wicked Foreign Oligarchs but that's just an opinion of his. He claims that he'll have the gods stand trial, and well, that's what he's aiming for. Where is he actively WRONG?

Liliet

How about the part where he assumed Catherine was Cordelia despite having most definitely seen them both in Receive visions?

How about the part where he preaches Bellerophon doublethink 100% seriously as a great idea? There's a point where trying to be neutral on a question just doesn't work.

Jonnnnz

Welp, Heirarch isn't wrong, but he's not right either. That being said, he seems to be having fun for a change

Dainpdf

He talks about the slippery slope of asking for power... Yet he seems to know nothing about the slippery slope of violent revolution.

He declares war on all tyranny, by acting like a tyrant. Taking away people's ability to think?

What he desires is still autocracy, anyways. Not of one ruler, but of a state that is simultaneously owned by all citizens and yet respects none of them.

Yotz

Because none of us is as cruel as all of us.

Dainpdf

Unless one of us is a goblin.

RoflCat

What if all of us are goblins?

Euodiachloris

Then you have the Matrons to worry about. 😊

Yotz

Ah, yes – the famous Robber Paradox: total sum of cruelty of a carnage of goblins is equal to cruelty of any randomly selected participant of carnage.

(*)carnage – the collective noun for a group of goblins.

grzecho2222

I don't think he takes away their freedom, it seems more like he FREES them to the point they are free of fear of consequences and retribution. ABSOLUTE FREEDOM to the point of madness

Liliet

And they also follow Bellerophan laws on top of that.

Dainpdf

Considering they seem to be following the laws of his home city, which really shouldn't have spontaneously come to them, I'm more inclined towards "rook away their volition".

RanVor

Considering how deeply Bellerophan laws are rooted in the riot mentality, I don't think it's that big of a leap.

Dainpdf

Things like keeping a record? And if they really had come up with an equivalent of bellerophan law on their own, wouldn't they be rejecting the Foreign Despot at the desk?

Liliet

the procedures they're following are too complicated to emerge spontaneously this fast

luminiousblu

What you're saying is irrelevant to the point that when it comes to faith there doesn't need to be such a thing as right or wrong, especially if your faith is so strong as to warp reality. The Hierarch is right, essentially, because he thinks he's right, and he's wrong because others think he is.

And in any case, the Dictatorship of the People is sort of his goal. It's not about the persons involved. We are all of us free, or we are none of us free, doesn't refer to individual people. "All of us" can be treated as a singular noun.

Dainpdf

Faith is of the self. He warps reality with his power, but outside his range (or to those powerful or stubborn enough to resist) he is still logically inconsistent. As most madmen are.

He still speaks as if he brought freedom to tyranny, when he only brings tyranny of a new kind.

Dainpdf

"come winter, and we were definitely there"
Was this a pun? Please tell me it was a pun.

"You can't go mad twice, o goddess of Night."
Wouldn't bet on that.

Damn, Hierarch is scary. Yet the Tyrant is scarier still... for now, at least.

Also, gee. People comment fast.

Liliet

Catherine seems to have been leaning into her role as a priestess, here. Giving thanks to the Night, commenting on Indrani never meeting a deity she didn't consider stabbing – and this quote struck me as a reminder of the fact Catherine is powered by faith, too. Not faith in Sve Noc as a goddess, per se, but faith that drove her to give her power to Sve Noc in a literally self-sacrificial move because she believed that it was the right thing to do.

Catherine is mad in the exact same... dismension as Anaxares is. Their faiths cannot overlap, they directly contest each other. He can't subsume her without breaking her.

caoimhinh

Cat has faith in herself and what she is doing, while also being the receptacle of all her people's faith.

Liliet

It's funny how Cat might have more faith effects going for her than the literal goddesses she's currently a priestess of.

Snowfire1224

She also ha faith in the Leisse Accords, which I've noticed she is mentioning more and more.

Liliet

see: "what she is doing"

Dainpdf

Cat's faith in what she believes to be right is much less fanatical or distorted than Anaxares's. She has confidence and conviction enough to not break in front of a Choir, so she won't break in front of him, but I wouldn't say they are parallel in madness.

WuseMajor

I'll grant less distorted. I'm not sure about less fanatical.

Dainpdf

Considering she has yet to start brainwashing people (okay, Fakerine did that, but Cat said she's sorry and it was wrong) or state that the Gods themselves will stand trial for disagreeing, I'd say she's less fanatical.

Rook

"Justice only matters to the just"

"I would have peace as set by the Liesse Accords or no peace at all. "

Let's be real here, the only reason she doesn't have her sword pointed at Above and Below is because she thinks she can achieve her goals even with them still around. Otherwise, no doubt she'd try to put steel through their necks without a shred of hesitation.

I mean yeah she isn't as rebellious as the guy whose whole world is about rebellion, but completely discarding all notions of fairness or peace not on her own terms isn't exactly a moderate position.

Dainpdf

Those are not equal to brainwashing. Heck, one of the main reasons Thief joined Cat was that Will was not above doing that exact thing.

I find it a signal of less fanaticism that one tried to reconcile one's goals with the fundamental forces of creation as opposed to putting them on trial.

Liliet

They are parallel in conviction and devotion.

Devotion is not the same thing as fanaticism, conviction is not the same thing as madness, though guide seems to use 'madness' to strong for 'strongly motivating conviction overriding common sense'.

Liliet

* to stand for

Antoninjohn

Cat has made a nice new friend, together they will crush those foreign tyrants

caoimhinh

Cat is totally going to bullshit her way through Hierarch's trial and say she is not a despot but an elected leader of the Drow. And he might be insane/stupid enough to believe that if the Drow vote and declare her innocent from the charge of Tyranny.

Then he will be her eternal friend against the rest of foreign despots XD

Liliet

No, in that case he's going to actually get the drow to vote, not just take it on faith / ask him in a regular manner.

I wouldn't be surprised though if Catherine withstood his trial.

Liliet

* ask them. Now THAT is a typo, considering there aren't he/him drow in existence -_-

Yotz

Afair, there are – among the lowest class, breeders. They renounce it to become "it" when they successfully claim the right to be considered Mighty.

Liliet

????

No, all drow use 'it' pronouns, regardless of genitalia.

Yotz

Hm. I was under impression that only the Mighty do so.
Oh well...

Yotz

And I even managed to remember why I was under such impression – the Ivah introspection chapter, the scene with Archer.

When Indrani calls Ivah “boy”, he wonders why she used the “cattle term” before remembering an ancient text, and mistaking her words for a subtle reference.

Since the “cattle”.in this musing most probably refers to the nisi – breeders and workers of the Drow society (since there are no other slaves in the concurrent Everdark), I made a presumption that they still use genders derived from biology – unlike the Mighty.

Liliet

Earlier Ivah said ‘cattle have no gender’ so it’s even more confusing than that.

And the takeaway is that there’s no gender in the end, period.

Yotz

If we are to posit that genders of the Mighty are derived from power level and not from biological sex, this paradox will cease.

In such... conceptuality, let’s call it that, we have the Mighty Ivah speaking about ‘cattle’ that has no ‘genders’ – id est, they are too weak to be considered Mighty and have one, since Mighty’s gender would be directly derived from the level of personal power and nothing more. That doesn’t preclude ‘the cattle’ from having their own set of gender roles specifically derived from biological sex. Misunderstanding stems as such from usage of incompatible meanings behind the word: Ivah was asked about male/female delineations, while it answered about cattle having no individual power worth noticing, much less speak of, while both sides of discussion used the same word for describing entirely different concepts.

If this is the case, then having a ‘cattle gender’ would be downright shameful for any Mighty – id est, for any who can be considered ‘a Drow’ from Mighty’s point of view.

Also, your stated takeaway on this is just plain wrong, my dear. Even if my speculations are just that – empty speculations, Drow have at least one gender: the Mighty.

Liliet

I think you're weaving complexity where none need exist. Why do you insist on there being SOME way for nisi to have gender roles? All drow use the same set of pronouns. Except the Sisters.

I'd say the two genders drow have are "Priestess of Night / everyone else".

Liliet

The only exception are the sisters, who use 'she/her' even after all of these years. They're literally the only drow with a gender.

Gender is not a requirement for having sex and birthing children.

Yotz

So, this is the point where I recall a nickname given to Lev Bronstein in due time.

The Demon of Revolution.

gaminganthology

The Will of the People Will Not Succumb to the Likes of Foreign Tyrants. All Will Be Made to Stand Trial in Front of the People for their Crimes be they Demons, Gods or All of Creation.

342

What about Fae?

Liliet

Nobody cares about the fae.

Or at least Anaxares doesn't, and he knows everything about the Will of the People and what they really care about, right?

Death Knight

The Hierarch's main strength is that he's found a way to weaponize the same mechanics that govern the birth and strength of a Name: Faith of The People.

I sincerely believe this man is the most dangerous person in this setting.

Huh, maybe this was the Bard's play? Anaxares only joined the Tyrant's march after he spoke with the Bard.

So now he's moving North and the Dead King is moving South. They will meet and not even the King of Death will escape the judgment decreed by the People.

That's why Bard told Neshamah he can have free reign, that the Bard won't interfere: She doesn't need to; Hierarch is already on his way!

"The arrow's knocked long before you let the sparrow fly."
"Devils give us what we want and let us find our own way to the Hells with it."

-Catherine Foundling, circa Book 1

IDKWhoitis

Sounds like her.

I wonder if the Dead King truly can be considered a tyrant over the people, as most of his subjects on Calernia are dead.

Halinn

He would certainly be able to have a good debate with Hierarch about it

Death Knight

He rules an entire hell. He fits the bill of a Tyrant to a T.

Sure, the people in his proximity (for the only true rulers of the People are the People themselvds) are (un)dead but do you really believe death absolves you from judgment of the People?

Nay friend, in Bellerphon even the dead shall stand trial and be judged by the Will of the People!

By the Will of the People May a thousand Undead Suicide Goats defecate and blow up upon the gilded delusions of the Tyrants and their Eldritch Masters

By the Will of The People, long live Bellerphon, peerless jewel of Creation! By the Will of The People, long live the Hierarch!

Mental Mouse

Remember, he drove the Bard away, and it wasn't for a while after that, that he came out on the move. I think Heirarch is a spoke in the Bard's wheels as much as for everyone else.

werafdsaew

So are we never going to get an explanation to the strange winter necromancy and it's place in the story? Kind of disappointing if this is all there is.

naturalnuke

I personally suspect it had to do with Winter being a power of narrative and having a will of its own. A bit trickles in, and suddenly the zombies are both no more and no less alive than the fae.

IDKWhoitis

I feel like Winter had a heavier grip on Necromancy, as there is that law of Winter "You own what you kill."

So Cat had a much tighter bond with the strings she seized within the animals she killed to Necromancer when under the influence of Winter.

Absent Winter, Night doesn't confer ownership the same metaphysical way over things you kill. Maybe Cat being Winterized also had a hand in why Akua is so bonded to Cat right now, post death.

This has interesting implications as to Cat and Akua dynamic without Winter, as Akua has shown herself to be more Independent now.

werafdsaew

I'm more bothered by the fact that this Winter zombie plot thread didn't really lead to anything. If you take this part out the story would be unchanged.

Liliet

I think it was less a plot thread and more a worldbuilding thread, a la "here's how fucking weird fae powers are".

But also, Zombie the Third still lives. Un-lives. Sort of. We might get back to that yet.

TheVenomRex

I would suggest a reread, because it doesn't appear dropped at all, from my vantage point.

At first Lisse, Mesago comments on how her own zombification was far easier than it should have been, her name quest in the first few chapters has her soul overrun by zombies.

Cat has been linked to unusual necromantic powers and prowess, from the very beginning of the story. The winter zombies were not a isolated set up, but a reminder that Catherine is linked to undeath.

At least, I think so.

werafdsaew

But there's no punch line. And now that she lost Winter, it's unlikely that it will be relevant again.

Mental Mouse

Also, she might not have killed that horse herself.

IDKWhoitis

When Cat makes Mounts, like the previous horses, or the goats, she mentioned in the first book that it was easier to make those "bonds" if she killed it herself. Black also taught her to kill them herself so she could completely own what she killed.

Ryzen

I miss winter, hope to see it reappear further in the story. The whole Fea arc was to get that power on Calernia and now it's been traded away for Night. Without winter, it's not just the Necromancy plot line, but all the Fea ones that lead to nothing.

Liliet

don't forget the Wild fucking Hunt stil out there

IDKWhoitis

I would love to hear Black, Cat, Hierarch, and Tyrant discuss ethics over some wine. I dont think anything truly productive would result from it, but it would be a meeting for the history books.

"4 Crowned Mad Named on Power".

Liliet

Replace Amadeus with Neshamah and NOW it's a party.

I don't think Amadeus would have much to say, considering he very specifically did not get crowned, rather deliberately. He specifically offloaded this kind of final judgement call on someone else – specifically Alaya – and even after being like ‘nope she’s not competent fuck’ he took himself out of the game instead of taking the reins.

He’d probably just sit there like “I am the wrong person to comment on this” and “what Catherine said”.

Neshamah, Catherine, Kairos and Anaxares, though? Now THAT would be beautiful.

naturalnuke

It’s like revolutionary France found communism half way through.

taovkool

That is actually a surprisingly accurate summation of the situation.

Man, Hierarch is seriously bullshit.

TeK

You just don’t know about Russian Civilian War.

Liliet

It’s a mixture between it and the French revolution. Only worse.

And, thankfully, limited in scope 🤨

TeK

I meant that Great October Revolution WAS the mixture of communism and French revolution.

taovkool

["Catherine Foundling," I replied. "Queen of Callow."

"There’s no such thing," he told me sternly.

"Queens or Catherine Foundling?" I said. "Because one of those debates is a lot more philosophical than I’m equipped to handle."]

Why am I getting the feeling that Hierarch was talking about Catherine as a non existence instead of a Queen?

Lots of bullshit happened to Cat that I wasn’t exactly clear on what her status is right now.

Liliet

> "Yet you are a queen," he said, blithely ignoring his previous assertion there was no such thing.

I mean it's funnier of Hierarch just contradicts himself within two sentences.

But it's scarier if he meant Catherine.

Both? Both.

Allafterme

It skirts dangerously into inclusive or territory. We are talking about a man who correctly deduced Wandering Bard's nature with a single glance...

Liliet

Yepp.

Fun!

luminiousblu

He's objecting to the term "Queen of Callow" as a whole. Queens exist, but they don't have dominion over areas such as Callow, since that would imply they're -supposed- to be in charge. It's the same nominal stuff that got Catherine titled Queen in Callow back at the peace table.

Liliet

you're probably right

Aston Whiteman

And EE showed this many times.

Now the Hierarch shows power.

He's a great character.

I wonder if him and Cat will be good friends.

Cat also has the power of Insanity just on a bigger scale.

Actually, how many characters in the setting realize Cat is truly insane?

Liliet

stares at Amadeus you fucked up a perfectly good hero. Look at her, she's got anxiety

magesbe

At the very least Indrani does, and possibly the entire Woe. Amadeus might. Maybe some of Cat's senior staff.

That's pretty much it. Catherine can fake being 100% sane very well.

Liliet

I think she's a little past that point.

Literally everyone in the setting knows Catherine Founding is insane. What's rare is realizing how sane she is about it.

Aston Whiteman

That's the best comment. The main character fakes being sane 100%.

Snowfire1224

I recall the Duchess of Dethriate... Deotraite... I give up I forgot how to spell it but you know what I'm talking about, but back to my point was that in the interlude, I believe it was called Commanders, during the Fae arc I recall her deciding that Cat was very mad and that whatever black did to train her broke her mind because of how she talked back to the fae princess. I'm imagine she's not the only one who reacts that way when observing Cat.

Liliet

Deoraithe.

And yeah Kegan and Ranker's perspectives during the Battle of the Camps were the best ♥

caoimhinh

Wow, it seems to me that Anaxares is the character with the most character development in the series.

He went from a comical idiot believing in his failed democracy while expecting death, to a stubborn guy refusing to do anything while being sad that his fake democracy ordered him to not die, then he became a badass who desired to fight for humanity against the Gods, now he is an insane hypocrite divorced from reality and forcing everyone to agree with his ideology or die, claiming to fight for the slaves while slaving everyone himself in a blatant way while blissfully deciding he doesn't notice it.

He is still brainwashed and a mad idiot, of course, but there has been quite a lot of development within that spectrum, which is impressive.

A faithful example of the brainwashed eventually becoming the brainwasher.
He is victim and victimizer both.

Typos found:

- had been use recently / this is either 'had been used' or 'had seen use'
- spared form ending up / spared from
- Tough sometimes / though
- though packed full with citizens as it was that could only remain a guess / so if it was that, it could only remain a guess
- and at is sat a single man / at it
- I used to support to get off / used it as support to get off

Xinci

He really does follow the will of Below now. Though there are problems in that the gaps of opportunity to become more may be blocked by the chaotic turning of the Orobosian mob. I am quite glade to see the portions of Mend going about their business.

A lesson to be learned here for Cat especially with her current role, faith, pure and unadulterated has power. Blind and glorious power that needs many to see but still may crush many under its weight without even stopping to know if the are ok. Dark miracles abound when your culture knows well the power of sacrifice. Now if only you could find ways for it to be pure and willing... I suppose we shall see if the Drow can figure out ways to leverage their own culture to adapt against such culture. Would require some cooperative introspection. Hmm adapt a brand of Night to check for such manipulation and grow with it off of sacrificial principals perhaps? Something based on the Night's ever mutating and growing nature.

Feels like a wasted opportunity now that Cat didn't safeguard her following of unread and actually allow them time to change and grow. I do wonder if Zombie the 3'rd may grow further back in Arcadia. Or if she will just move about changing over time in the Everdark.

Someguy

Did Cat accidentally pull an Irritant? She foisted the job of Goddess onto Sve Noct and the 1st Named she meets on the surface is one with the capacity to execute gods.

Liliet

Catherine has been following in Irritant's footsteps ever since First Liesse.

There is a part of their souls that is kin

Antony444

Cordelia Hasenbach is not going to like at all what happens here when she hears of it.

Compared to all other opponents, the Hierarch is causing problems she will need years to solve, if she ever can.

The Dead King? He's leaving a mountain of undead in his wake and you have to burn all of them.

The Black Knight? Destroy his armies and rebuild the lands he had torched.

The same is true for everything Catherine can do.

But the alliance Hierarch-Tyrant? Give them enough time, and what they're doing to Rochelant, they will do to the entire Principate of Procer.

And it will destroy the Princedoms, I have no doubt about it.

This chapter has made clear enough being an aristocrat, a king, a priest or anyone influential/important will not protect you against the glorious madness reigning around the Hierarch.

For any realm like Callow it would have already been bad, but we had many, many examples since the start of this story that the Princes and Princesses of Procer really don't care about the peasants and anyone they have under their boots.

'The Tyrant seeks to end Procer' may very well be about the Helike Tyrant after all...

Panic

So many comments about the mad and insanely cool Anaxares. Yet everyone seem to have repressed the mentioning of the "aggressively nondescript" woman who attempted to mind read Cat.

Now tell me how many people do we know who can go aggressively nondescript? Say a certain Scribe maybe? Or perhaps taking it one more step insane, a certain Assassin?

matesbe

My money is on the Auger.

matesbe

Never mind that's dumb. Yeah possible Assassin.

Dresden 67

That was one of the kanenas, Bellepheron's secret police.

Panic

Why would the Executors of The Law need to hide from The Will of The People of Bellepheron?

Liliet

She was not hiding, she was simply not separating herself from the People, as being a kanena does not make her more important or special.

It's pretty simple, really!

Someguy

Because they are the ones who violate the Will of the People and their Laws most.

Liliet

Word of God says they arent

danh3107

I can't believe people didn't pick that up right away, it's pretty obvious.

RanVor

The Hierarch of the League acknowledges only two gods – the Will of the People and the Procedure.

TeK

I have a distinct suspicion, that Hierarch is a tad crazy.

What is wrong with Tyrants though? Humans are innately predisposed towards vertical hierarchy. We want Tyrnts, we want someone to choose for us, and take responsibility. Someone to blame, someone to follow. Or something. The distinction really blurs when you think about. What's the difference between a slave of a man and a slave of an idea? None, from where I am standing, just for some weird reason, being a slave to the ideal is somehiw preferred.

And the notion of freedom. An illusion, temporary constructs of a feeble human intellect, trying desperately to justify the existence, that is without meaning or purpose. Whatever freedom you have, it's freedom from something. And if you free from something, it is already a relationship, a fetter. And as such, not a true freedom. You can't be free, it is inherently impossible. As long as you exist, you exist in relationship to something, and as such, dependant of that something to qualofy as existing. The same is with freedom, really.

I hope I articulated myself right.

Liliet

This is very fun in theory, right up until the point where the person in charge of you decides to kick you and take all your stuff. Then you suddenly realize how you want to be free to punch them in the face and take your stuff back.

To the revolution!

TeK

Oh, but that's the point: the notion of personal property comes at the cost of the restriction of freedom. As do all benefits of civilization. We are slaves of our own making, a food for enormous grinding jaws of the system – and we are better off like that. Only a blind man cries for freedom. An honest one fights for privilege.

Liliet

No.

grzecho2222

To quote "Freedom by definition is absolute", it is not that you are forced by something to do anything. Take for example eating. It is up to you if eat. Sure you will die if you don't, but you will die, because of YOUR CHOICE. You can always choose, even if it will be the final choice.

In context of the story the conflict between Cat and Hierarch is a bit as Polish–Soviet War of 1919-1920, which was basically Uprising under Dictator versus People Revolution. Country that regained freedom by manipulating its conquerors and making global conspiracy and wanted to govern itself with its dictator retiring when he isn't needed versus People Party that wanted to free whole world. With or without consent. Also there were basically chariots with machine guns involved.

TeK

"Your choice" is self-delusion, the kind I was talking about. Kind of sickening one, personally. It is not up to you to eat. You are conditioned by your biology and your experiences and your environment. You do not choose to eat, you eat because you are hungry. Bet you never starved. Try to stop breathing "on your own choice", see what happens. I bet you will freely decide on your own without outside influence as an individual to start breathing shortly after. The slave blind to his chains is doubly enslaved. Freedom is absolute by definition, and as such, does not exist.

On the historical point – yeah, Bellerophon quite clearly inspired by various anarchist and communist government forms that spawned out of the rotting remains of Russian Empire. Although their war with Poland was far more pragmatic – they tried to help communists in Germany, particularly in Bavaria, if I am not mistaken.

TeK

Also, gotta remember Russian classic: russian rebellion – senseless and merciless.

PurpleHello

This chapter made me realise something funny: this entire series is a (broad strokes) analogy for democracy! Think about it: the voting process is the battles.

Changes/policies/big decisions are made/implemented/justified by whichever side with the bigger turnout or strategies winning. And then the other side(s) who lost immediately complain and kick up a fuss and promise another big battle and then focus on that. None of the sides like each other or want to work together. No side is 100% good or right or whatever – in fact all of them are morally dubious and untrustworthy. Hierarch is somewhat akin to a archcanist-socialist taken to the illogically extreme. It's not a perfect comparison (I have no idea where Wandering Bard would fit in) but this chapter got me going in this direction and it's pretty funny so I thought I'd share.

TeK

By that comparison evolution is democracy too.

taovkool

By the way, I just noticed something weird. At the prologue, Ime (Malicia's spymaster) was called Lindimi Sahelian but back at Book 4 chapter 5: Interest, Cat called her Sabra Niri on a relation with the High Lord of Okoro.

A typo mistake or an intended difference? Clarification would be appreciated @erraticerrata.

taovkool

Forgot this wasn't SB. Ignore that @, if you will

Liliet

I suspect intended is more likely, but it IS odd.

Zaver SaintCloud

I miss Zombie The Third 😞 Even moreso now that I am reminded we will probably never get an explanation for the instances of independence that it showed; sassing Cat after it saved her, munching on grass, etc. Also it gave Cat an excuse to be angry at people if they broke her flying horse.

NZPIEFACE

All of the Winter Zombies have intelligence if they're given enough time.

Liliet

I would argue against the idea that we're not getting an explanation. The topic has been brought up again, I think we're still building up the subplot. And Zombie the Third appears to be still alive (sort of), just not with Cat.

doominator10

" Devils did not die but only disperse. But would they really, if it was this man passing the sentence? "

It is the Will Of The People that all Foreign Entities not abiding Under the Definition Of Life, as is Proper and Collectively Agreed Upon by The People, shall be Henceforth sentenced to Life, And Summarily Executed according to the Writ of the Third Declaration Of The People. By the Will of The People, long live Bellerophon, peerless jewel of Creation!

Liliet

...all I get out of this is crying about Tikoloshe again...

ninegardens

So... Anaraxes is super nutso and all... but also in terms of "Breaking the game" potentially... he seems high powered... not "Part" of the game (Above or Below), and like...super liable to have the power to make a treaty BINDING.
So... right now he is sort of broken and stupid, but in terms of potential for future good (not "Good") he seems way up there.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I like the way you're thinking here. Binding everyone to the Liesse Accords would reduce future conflict. To actually do that he'd need to change and become willing to engage with wicked foreign oligarchs; which may be too much of a barrier to overcome.

Liliet

No, that's not what the barrier is. Kairos is the very definition of a Wicked Foreign Oligarch, Anaxares stands on that position and will stand on it forever, yet he works with him.

The problem is that he has a larger plan in mind, and depending on what exactly the plan is, he might consider

Liesse Accords... redundant, inessential, counterproductive (as they acknowledge the existence of non democratically elected rulers I imagine)

The issue really is just selling him on them.

Anon

En taro Anaxares I guess?

aran

"Aristocracy Is A Festering Wound Upon The People," Anaxares of Bellerophon gravely informed me. "May Hail Strike It Repeatedly For A Thousand Years."

Somehow Anaxares is the character who most seems like he stepped out of a Discworld novel. The one he probably reminds me of most is Vorbis.

Zopilote 506

...aaaaand this is why Anaxares is the best character

Chapter 7: Fellowship

"Fool me once and it'd best be fatal, for my reply certainly will be."

– Dread Emperor Vindictive II

"What the fuck was that?" Archer hissed.

They hadn't fled the marketplace, of course, because big important bird-goddesses like Andronike couldn't possibly flee – I yelped and slapped her away. If the damned Sisters kept pecking at my head like this I was going to go bald at some point. Fine, they had redeployed away from the mob and the madman feeding it. I looked down at the fist bunching up my cloak in the front, which was Indrani's.

"You'll have to be a little more specific," I said.

She scrutinized my face for a moment, before grimacing and releasing me.

"Well, if you can be a heel you probably still own your mind," she said. "That was stupid, Catherine. We weren't even near the crowd and we could still feel it when he got pissed."

"It was necessary," I said, brushing down the folds of my cloak.

"Don't you start with that speech," Archer growled. "If I got a copper for every time you talked about necessity-"

"You still wouldn't be able to afford your drinking habits," I drily interrupted.

The look on her face was thunderous, so I smoothed away the humour from my expression.

"I'm serious," I said. "I needed to take the measure of him. When someone lets a lion loose in the pen, you don't pretend it's not happening – not unless you're ready to lose the whole flock."

"That's what we have Vivi for," Indrani insisted. "The Jacks-"

"Would have been in that crowd, hollering for blood," I flatly replied. "You know that. It was a calculated risk, Archer. Since when do –"

I bit down on my tongue. I knew exactly since when she'd started taking issues with those. I was in no danger of ever forgetting the sight of Indrani half-devoured by frost, only hanging on to life by a thread – and, I had recently learned, the preservative properties of ice according to the classical table of elements.

"Finish," Indrani quietly said.

"Not a conversation we should be having in the middle of an alley in a city under occupation," I evaded.

"Finish," Indrani repeated, coldly.

"Even Akua is worried, Archer," I said. "I know you like to handle things on your own, but it's not getting better."

"I'm fine," she told me forcefully. "Or is disagreeing with you a sign of cowardice now?"

"I didn't say that," I replied.

A year ago we wouldn't have been having this conversation, I thought. But then a year ago there'd been fewer defeats to our name, fewer close calls and wounds that would never quite heal. An emotion I couldn't quite recognize twisted her face, until she winced.

"It doesn't matter if we're in an alley, Catherine," Archer finally said, taking a step back. "Because there's nothing to talk about."

I wondered if she even noticed how her fingers were twitching towards the strap at her side where she usually kept a flask. Probably not, I decided. I knew from personal experience that we tended to be blind to the methods we used to bury our fears until they were pointed out to us. Her way, at least, I was familiar with. Some nights I wondered if I might have disappeared all the way at the bottom of the bottle after Second Liesse, if Hakram hadn't dragged me back. I hesitated under moonlight, a reply on the tip of my tongue. I'd had a talk with Diabolist once, about her mother. About the difference between a person and their title, the way Praesi considered them entirely different entities. I still disagreed with what she'd said, the painful contortion of personhood her people had to put themselves through just to live with what they did to each other, but sometimes I could also see a grain of truth to it. The woman in me wanted to find a quiet place, a safe one, and try to soothe what was eating at one of my closest friends in the world. Even if it meant leaving Rochelant. But the queen knew there was still work to be done tonight, that this business was only half-done, and that what lay within Indrani would keep until morning. The queen won, in the end.

Didn't she always?

"This isn't done," I told Indrani.

"It is for tonight," she replied.

Getting back atop Zombie's saddle had the taste of defeat to it. Wouldn't be the last of those, before this was all done and over with. We pressed on deeper into the city, Named and priestess and a crow-that-wasn't surrounded by a pack of silent killers.

A kinsman of sorts awaited us.

—

The place the Tyrant of Helike chose for his lair served as my first glimpse into the man's mind. There would have been a few places in Rochelant royalty could claim to maintain a semblance of comfort: the official quarters of the appointed ruler of the city, the mansions of the influential and the wealthy, a House of Light to empty and desecrate. Instead, Kairos Theodosian had settled in the shop of a middling money changer. Someone whose very trade was the exchange of one currency for another. The entire city block was crawling with soldiers and much more discreet gargoyles, what must have once been a largely unimportant street turned into the heart of the League's occupation of Rochelant. There was no military sense to the location, I thought. It was poorly placed to deploy troops or send messengers, not to mention surrounded by very flammable shops. No prestige to such a choice, either, as money changing was not a profession of particularly good repute. This was a villain making a jest that quite possibly no one would ever get, in defiance of more practical choices, simply because he could. My teacher's lessons, I decided, would not be of great use here. The Tyrant was one face of the coin he'd spent a lifetime melting down so the metal could be put to better use.

Black did not make deals with people like this, did not negotiate. He killed them as quickly as he could to limit the collateral damage, then ripped out what had spawned them root and stem so he wouldn't have to come back and do it again a decade down the line. That wasn't an option for me, so I'd have to handle the madman a different way. I led Zombie in a canter down the street, rows of men-at-arms armed to the teeth watching me carefully. Idly pretending to brush back my hair, I gestured for the drow following from the rooftops to stay back. I didn't know what kind of the defences the Tyrant would have prepared, to know I was coming with the likes of Andronike perched on my shoulder and still feel comfortable allowing me into Rochelant, but it was best not to test them. Archer and the crow-goddess I kept at my side, until a mounted officer approached us at the very edge of the defensive perimeter. She kept her sword sheathed at her side, though by the look on her face she would have preferred otherwise. I halted my horse without needing to be told, my companions following suit.

"Queen Catherine," she called out in crisp Lower Miezani.

"That would be me," I said. "And you are?"

"General Basilia," she said. "You were expected. Safe passage is granted to you by the writ of the Tyrant of Helike."

Her gaze flicked to Indrani and Andronike.

"To you alone," she meaningfully said.

"Catherine," Archer said under her breath. "This is-"

"He needs me alive and on the field," I mildly replied. "It's not that kind of trap."

"You don't know that for sure," she insisted.

"Certainty is a luxury I can rarely afford," I said. "If it goes south, gloat all you'd like. Andronike?"

"Not beyond my reach," the crow stated, eyeing the changing house.

"Good enough," I grunted.

Zombie resumed his advance and I entered the dragon's lair. General Basilia cast me a dark glance as I passed her. Someone wasn't happy I was being allowed in, evidently. Wasn't sure why she was being so ornery – I'd had the man her Tyrant had usurped the throne from shot back when I was still the Squire. Surely that should earn me some measure of fondness? Apparently not, I drily thought, feeling her gaze remaining on my back as I rode forward. The heavy and layered wards I could feel washing over my skin with a distinct tingle made it clear that distrust truly was the order of the night. The soldiers parted with silent discipline until I reached the steps of the changing house, leaning on my staff to dismount with a muted curse. A man-at-arms came up to take Zombie's reins, but I clicked my tongue in disapproval.

"I wouldn't recommend that," I said. "He bites."

A twist of will had my dead horse baring his teeth. The soldier stepped back, a glimmer of fear in her eyes. I'd spent long enough idling, though, so up I went the worn steps and through the already-open door. The inside was lit up with torches and magelights, which almost surprised me. I'd half-expected some innocent soul to be serving as fuel instead. A sweeping glance was enough to give me an idea of the inside: a large common room for trade to be held, with a counter at the back in front of twin doors leading to backrooms. A few tapestries in the manner of the Free Cities had been hung on the walls – most of them about Theodosius the Unconquered – but the room had been largely stripped bare. It only made the fresh additions more glaring: two rows of twisted little gargoyles, some bearing trumpets, were wiggling around and chattering like vermin. Between them a red carpet had been set, leading up to a throne literally resting on the back of a foursome of pitiful-looking gargoyles.

On it was the Tyrant of Helike, Kairos Theodosian.

So frail, I thought. Curly dark brown hair and olive skin made his ancestry clear, but these were by far the least striking parts of the villain. One of his eyes was deep red, as if blood had seeped into it, and his sickly frame looked like it could be blown over by a stiff breeze. Opulent robes in rich purple, covered in part by a long strip of cloth of gold draped over the front, boasted broad sleeves but not quite broad enough to hide that the arm he kept covered was trembling. No crown was set on his brow, but he was casually toying with an ivory scepter ending in a golden roaring lion's head. I could feel the enchantments wafting off of it even from the other side of the room. The Tyrant took one look at me, good eye widening, and convulsed. For a heartbeat I was worried that the Night had somehow hurt him, but the convulsion erupted into raucous, heartfelt laughter. I blinked, taken aback. I flicked a glance at the nearest gargoyle but it just put out its tongue at me. I discretely kicked it while the Tyrant kept laughing his guts out. Eventually the villain got himself under control, wiping tears out of his eyes with trembling hands.

"Oh, that is a fine jest indeed," he said, then peeked at the floor. "You never disappoint."

I cleared my throat.

"I don't suppose you'd care to share," I said.

The Tyrant smiled at me in the way of man for whom smiles came easy and meant little.

"You are so short," Kairos Theodosian said. "It is quite delightful."

He was a good liar, I decided, but I'd known better. Just by looking at me he'd learned something, and I had no idea what. I set that aside for later consideration.

"Bet I could beat you in a footrace, though," I said.

The smile broadened into a grin and he sprawled unceremoniously across his throne. Which was, I was only now noticing, outrageously gaudy. And I'd been in the Tower, I damn well knew what gaudy looked like.

"A pair of crowned cripples running through the streets," he cheerfully mused. "If we charged for seats we could make a killing."

Suddenly he twitched.

"Ah," he said. "But where are my manners? Courtiers, announce our guest."

To my horrified fascination, the trumpet-bearing gargoyles raised their instrument and began blowing into it. Which had mixed results, since assuming they even had lungs they would be made of stone. And that most didn't have lips. After the musical atrocity ended in a whimper, the Tyrant raised his hand regally.

"Black Queen, I welcome you to my humble court," he announced.

"The honour is mine, Lord Tyrant," I deadpanned.

"Please, take a seat," the villain waved away airily.

A waddling gargoyle carrying a plush cushioned seat above its head made its way across the carpet, setting it at my back and bowing with a chittering sound before running away.

"Much appreciated," I said.

I eyed the seat skeptically. No obvious sorcery to be found. I prodded the cushion with my seat, but it did not seem to be filled with rusty razorblades or poisonous snakes. I glanced back at the Tyrant and found him looking at my staff quite intently. Well, only one way to find out for sure. I settled down and found it a little worn, but otherwise not prone to treacherously turning on me. It was a relief for my bad leg to be seated after this long riding, and I let out a little sigh of comfort.

"I wonder," the Tyrant of Helike nonchalantly said, "if you'd consider telling me who that's meant to kill."

I met his gaze, and wondered if it was just my imagination or the red eye had gotten a little redder.

"No idea what you're talking about," I lied.

He chuckled.

"A staff is a sword is a prayer," the Tyrant grinned. "It's clever little bit of work. More patient than your reputation would imply."

I shrugged, keeping away from my face how wary his too-perceptive eyes were making me.

"Well, I did find religion recently," I said. "I'm told it can be a calming influence."

"You seem well on your way to beating people to death with it," he praised.

"You're one to talk," I smiled. "Your man down the road's a lot more dangerous than Night on a stick. I don't suppose you'd tell me who that's meant to kill?"

The Tyrant pouted.

"That'd take all the fun out of this," he said. "And why even bother, if we're not having a good time?"

"Huh," I said. "Black must have really wanted to kill you."

"There's no need to be so oblique about it," the Tyrant amusedly said. "He's alive and in the hands of the Grey Pilgrim. Somewhere in Iserre, last I heard. The man is of little interest to me."

I had been aiming to wheedle information out of him after broaching the subject, true enough. My eyes narrowed. So why was he offering it to me so freely? Even as I forced myself to remain focused, my pulse quickened. He was alive. Gods, he was alive. I'd known he would be, but it was still a weight off my shoulders. Unless this is cruelty, I thought. Unless he's lying. I kept my voice steady.

"It's a little disquieting, being on the other side of the chaos for once," I said.

"I am but a humble servant of my Lord Hierarch," the Tyrant piously assured me. "And you need not worry, I would not lie to such a close and beloved friend."

"I would never doubt you," I lied. "I think of you as a brother, really."

Did he know I was an orphan? By the way his lips quirked, yes, he most definitely did.

"As your friend," I said. "I wondered if you would answer a question for me."

"Always," the Tyrant swore, hand over heart.

I raised an eyebrow.

"Are we at war?" I asked. "I've been hearing troubling rumours about League soldiers and legionaries."

"Alas, there have been some slight misunderstandings," the Tyrant sighed. "Your Marshal of Callow seems to have mistaken our curiosity for a fully armed battalion trying to assassinate her."

"Mistakes happen," I said, keeping my voice calm.

It took an effort of will not to clutch my staff so hard it creaked. He'd tried to kill Juniper, the smug little monster. Or he's trying to put me off-balance, I thought. The Theodosian had a lazy smile on his face, but his eyes had never left me. I had no control here, no real leverage to use against him. That was the misstep, I decided. Trying to remain in control. There would be no winning that sort of game against the likes of the Tyrant of Helike.

"I see only one solution," I said.

"Do you?" he said, smile expectant.

I smiled back, broad and friendly and just a little bit guileless.

"Would you like to secretly be allies?" I offered.

The smallest flicker of surprise on his face, gone before it could even be fully seen, was the herald of scoring my first blood of the night. His answering grin was gleefully malicious. See? I might have been with only women for the last few years, but I still knew what men liked – you know, shady military alliances that would be discarded at the earliest convenience in favour of wanton betrayal. He twirled his scepter thoughtfully, though that did little to hide the eagerness on his face.

“As your friend,” Kairos Theodosian said. “I feel like I should warn you that rumours have long existed – patently untrue, I assure you – that I am a treacherous blackguard, if you’ll forgive my language.”

I painted surprise over my face.

“You?” I faintly said. “That seems rather unjust. I mean, I had your nephew shot and he seemed like the real villain to me.”

“I did hear about that,” the Tyrant mused. “Wasn’t it under truce banner?”

It hadn’t been, strictly speaking, not that the rumours ever bothered about that.

“In my defence,” I said, “he did call me a witch.”

He seemed amused.

“Oh, Dorian,” the villain fondly said. “You always did have more lungs than wits.”

“I can see why that would make you hesitate, though,” I mused. “So let me reassure you, I have absolutely no intention of sharing our secret treaty with the First Prince to try to force her hand into allying with me and crushing you utterly.”

He let out a loud cackle, arm shaking uncontrollably under his robes.

“Are you lying?” the Tyrant of Helike grinned, revealing a curved stretch of pearly teeth.

I leaned forward.

“I don’t know,” I said. “Am I?”

A heartbeat passed.

“I can’t tell,” he said, sounding deeply pleased.

“A sound foundation for military alliance,” I said.

“The only kind worth making,” the villain cheerfully agreed. “A bargain made, then, Black Queen.”

He gently tapped his scepter against his chin.

"I suppose," the Tyrant said, "that I should ask you who we've allied against."

I leaned back.

"Intercession, you might say," I said.

His brow rose.

"Well now," he murmured. "Someone's been digging up secrets."

"Calernia's full of graves a little more shallow than they should be," I replied. "And I've heard the two of you have scores to settle."

"She has quite the game afoot," the Tyrant told me. "Even I know only part of it."

"I've quite a few glimpses of things she's been up to," I said, "but no bird's eye view, so to speak."

"That sounds," the villain said, "like a trade worth making."

I smiled. Dangerous as it might be to tell this man anything he didn't know, I needed the semblance of a handle on what the Wandering Bard was up to more than words could properly express. Everyone else on the board I could make out at least vague objectives for, but the Intercessor? She was still in many ways an unknown, and one with too many irons in the fire to be left to her own devices. I might not trust the Tyrant of Helike a single drop, but as far as I knew he was the only man alive who'd ever pulled one over the Bard. If anyone could be of use to me, it was him.

"Ah, but before we begin horse-trading," he said. "As my most trusted ally, I have a suggestion to offer you. If I may, Black Queen?"

"Call me Catherine," I said. "And by all means."

"You must call me Kairos, then," the Tyrant said. "Before you leap into the loving embrace of our dear Cordelia Hasenbach, I would have a look at her little scheme down south. You are not the only one robbing graves, in a manner of speaking."

"Curious," I evenly said.

"Something's being dredged out of Lake Artoise," Kairos confided, "that might of interest to you."

"And why would that be?" I asked.

"One does not make war on the same enemy for decades without learning some of their bad habits, Catherine," the Tyrant said.

That was unfortunate, as I could only think of one person the First Prince had crossed blades with for that long. More worryingly, the most recent mistake I could put to Dread Empress Malicia's name was the Doom of Liesse. If Cordelia Hasenbach was intent on going down the same road this war was about to get much, much worse. Not that I'd take Kairos' word for this. Like the fate of my teacher, it was another truth I needed to get my hands on. I fished out my pipe and stuffed it under the Tyrant's disapproving stare, black flame licking at my fingers just long enough to light it. I shook my hand to get rid of the lingering heat, then inhaled deep. The wakeleaf warmed my throat, and I made myself comfortable. I spewed out a stream of acrid smoke as Kairos wrinkled his nose in distaste.

"Now," I smiled. "I believe there was some talk of horse-trading."

When the eye went deeper red, this time, there was no question of whether or not it was my imagination.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
Go vote!

taovkool

The Black Queen and the Tyrant making an alliance.

Not that surprising, to be honest. Loved their sass though.

Dainpdf

I ship it. And by ship it I mean please put Kairos in a box and ship him far away from me and everything I love.

Yet another surprising application of lakeomancy.

Jeffery Wells

It is truly a flexible branch of magic.

danh3107

That was interesting to say the least, although now I imagine erratic is going to cut away from what would most likely be an interesting conversation to show us the aftermath.

Like he's done for most of the major interactions that would've been interesting to see in the entire story, like Cat bargaining with the dead king.

Oh well

Argentorum

This was the interesting part of the conversation though. The rest is going to go like this.

Kairos: "Bard has been trying to do x y and z"

Cat: "Oh that's cool, have you heard what she did to the drow though?"

Kairos: "I hadn't old chump, but that's quite facinating."

Cat: "So was yours, same time never?"

Kairos: "I promise never to stab you in the back, friend."

Cat: "I promise never to do it first, pal!"

And then Cat rides off to go do actually important things. Sure more of Cat and Kairos verbally sparring might be fun, but it would also be ultimately meaningless, because this obviously isn't going to be the final confrontation. And while knowing the x y and z the Bard's been up to would be interesting, there are many more interesting ways to reveal that information.

And if there's one thing Erratic does well, it's letting the characters know things the reader doesn't

TL:DR I really don't see what you're complaining about.

danh3107

You should almost never be in a position where in a first person narrative things are hidden from your perspective. Our perspective is the narrator's, and not knowing what they're talking about is incredibly frustrating as a reader. Sure we can infer what the Liesse accords are, but they're still Cat's primary motivation and we as the reader have no clue what they're about besides random snippets we sometimes get.

It's incredibly frustrating, because we should have that information there's almost no reason not to. It creates dissonance between us as readers and Cat as the primary person who shapes our perspective, which is not a good thing when we're in first person. We have problems relating to and understanding her motivations, which makes it harder to get invested in the story and care about the stakes.

I know I'm not the only person who feels this way, that's why I'm complaining.

Andrew Mitchell

I understand why you (and others) could find it frustrating. I suggest not projecting your feelings onto all readers though. I don't share your concern at all. I dislike novels that spell out every little detail because it slows the pace too much. I also prefer it when I put in the mental effort and am rewarded when I figure out an aspect of the story before it's revealed in text.

Wry Warudo

I dunno, I kind of prefer it when we don't have all the details. For example, moments like when Thief showed up and stole the Sun or Cat's plans at First Liesse wouldn't have the same impact if we knew all her plans ahead of time.

theothin

Yeah, Unspoken Plan Guarantee is a thing for a reason.

Liliet

Seriously yeah.

Hearing a character's long term plans in detail is how you know things aren't going to go according to plan.

luminiousblu

I presume the reason that we're not told what the Liesse Accords are is that it'll never actually come to fruition and just fall apart at the drop of a hat, or else just be completely worthless.

The Liesse Accords is like trying to get the USSR and the USA to sign a wide-ranging treaty, then actually abide by said treaty, and then force all of their vassal and allied states to do the same. It's inherently not feasible and unless EE has a really decent reason why it works this time I'll be sorely disappointed if it doesn't blow up in Cat's face.

RanVor

I kind of get your point that it's not feasible (although I vehemently disagree), but if it's not going to work, that's all the more reason to talk about it in great detail. The failure wouldn't be even half as impactful if it wasn't properly established what was actually lost.

caoimhinh

Not really, it's more along the lines of "This is a legal document that's many pages long, so these are the generalities of what it says and the important bits of its objectives" it would be impossible and unadvisable for EE to actually show us the specific content of the Liesse Accords, given that they are bound to be a long document full of legal terminology.

Besides, the Accords right now are just Catherine's version of them, once negotiation with other leaders starts, there will be some modifications, although Cat has already said that many of the things there are not open to negotiation, like the banning of the use of Demons.

sengachi

It's not third person narration though. It's third person limited omniscient with a primary focus and cutaways to secondary focuses. Like, this is exactly the narration style you use when you want to take advantage of a disconnect in knowledge between the reader and a primary focus character. The goal of a narration style like this is to make the reader think about what's going on inside the head of the primary focus character, to see and be shown their motivations and thoughts rather than be told them.

If that's not what you prefer in your stories that's fine. If you want to complain about that on the grounds that you'd personally prefer the story another way ... well I don't see the point, it's far too late for erratic to change the narration style now, the most effect you can hope to have is demotivating erratic and that's kind of a dick move. Like, you can? I guess? Just don't be surprised when the people who don't share your frustrations are vocal disagree with you.

Mental Mouse

There are quite a number of reasons why a first person narration may not reveal all there is to be seen – indeed, a number of classic author's tricks depend on exactly that. The classic, of course is the Unreliable Narrator, but even "well-meaning" narrators may miss things due to their own bias or perspective.

More generally, such elisions are often key to pacing the plot and avoiding distractions from the story. They can be also be used for more exotic purposes; ISTR that Agatha Christie wrote one mystery where the murderer turned out to be... the narrator.

Zharethzhen

Dude, I could not agree with you more. Keeping secrets in a first person pov is widely considered bad writing (at least as taught in creative writing classes). It is the biggest thing that frustrates me about this story (though obviously I keep coming back because it is otherwise really good).

SpeckofStardust

True, after all I think we the readers already know everything both sides here know about bard, and while it be interesting to watch all the interactions we got the truly important stuff out of the way.

Still this chapter has me honestly be considering Catherine X Kairos Which is the first time I have been considering her showing something close to interest in a guy.

The fact that this.

"See? I might have been with only women for the last few years, but I still knew what men liked"

Is basically a jab at her never showing any interest in men so far in this story has me amused.

That, and the line "He let out a loud cackle, arm shaking uncontrollably under his robes." implies that the interest is mutual.

grzecho2222

I died

Liliet

If you consider that a negative, that's a jab at it; if you consider that a positive, it's just straight up the best joke.

Catherine/Kairos platonically political marriage ftw tho

Skaddix

I mean she really wanted to bang Warlock and they don't like each other at all. So she has shown interest in guys before. Her getting wet for Warlock actually suggest she wouldn't go for Kairos lol.

Liliet

oh ya good point lmao

Death Knight

That is his MO. He does something similar with awesome battles too, such as Ranger vs The Summer Queen or how exactly the Heroes managed to capture Black.

Truthfully it is kind of annoying but I don't write the story so "thems the grapes luv"

Argentorum

I can see missing the Ranger vs Summer Queen fight being annoying. But that serves the purpose of building both characters up. We didn't know how strong either of them really were going into the rest of the Second Liesse arc, which raised tension. In addition, we still don't know how strong Lady Ranger is, which help paves the way for us not knowing how to evaluate her eventual conflict with Cat (because you know it's coming).

As for the heroes vs black... Not really? He was literally nameless at that point, as was confirmed later by the Bard. The fight between him and half a dozen heroes, including the old monsters of Saint and Pilgrim? There's not a fight. Either of those two could have beaten Black as he was on one leg with a wrinkly arm tied behind their back. And was Pilgrim really going to let one of the younger heroes attempt to handle black and risk his own plan either by Black getting himself killed or somehow beating up on a novice hero? Given the amount of care they showed around transporting Black later, I highly doubt it.

So here's how the fight went. Black charges, Pilgrim smacks him once with the stick, they tie him up and cart him away.

Really, I'm confused about the people who are constantly crowing "show this, show that!" when it is almost painfully obvious that nothing of actual importance would have occurred during those scenes. That Erratic is skipping over boring filler scenes, legal jargon, and nothing of value, for the parts that actually do matter.

I, for one, have not missed a single scene that Erratic has 'skipped' and I enjoy greatly the lack of those filler scenes that do nothing to advance the story like we get in so many Fanfics and similar works that never reach the end of book one (let alone book 4) because the authors get bogged down in trying to show every little thing...

Andrew Mitchell

100% agree with this.

Liliet

actually fun fact! we DO know how that fight went, sort of, and you're almost 100% correct

"Unless the Saint of Swords was intent on confessing her deep affections for him – unlikely, since she took great relish in punching him unconscious before enchantments were laid"

Saint's the one who punched him out ;u;

caoimhinh

Agree. But there were 2 scenes of importance that I wanted to see and yet they were skipped:

-Sabah's death, as the last she was shown she had beaten the Valiant Champion to a bloody pulp of broken bones and even exhausted her Aspects before the domain shattered.

-Ratface's death. He was (along a bunch of characters including Anne Kendal) killed off-screen and we found out when Cat walked into the room and received the news of the assassination of key members of Callow's government.

Both would have made very emotional or meaningful scenes.

Mental Mouse

Eh... in both cases, I think the reaction of the survivors was more important. Showing Sabah's death would have been a matter of EE making up power-exchanges that would have been ultimately irrelevant (because she was fundamentally killed by Plot), while Ratface was not a POV character to begin with.

SpeckofStardust

...
This is beautiful.
I have no idea who react worse to this little 'chat' but the interactions here are wonderful.

Javvies

Hmmm.
Kairos probably noticed the lack of Winter and whatever Cat's current Name-related status is. And possibly something to do with noticing her links to Night.

Kairos attempted to kill Juniper? That's not going to be forgotten or forgiven. Be it in Callow or by many of us who like Juniper.

Big I

If you're talking about why he started laughing it's probably because of him using his Wish aspect, which let's him know a person's desires. It is pretty ironic that Catherine is motivated by a sincere desire for peace

Rook

It's also incredibly ironic that Amadeus' successor is turning out to be the exact same type of Villain that he spent his entire life trying to rip out from the face of creation.

You'd expect his spawn to be a sharper collection of gears wrapped in steel, and instead what walked through his door is a priestess madwoman with a mind like goblin munitions being set off inside a cave.

Wolper

I'd say they're not quite the same at all. Him and her have very similar goals – not identical, but similar, and the same sort of.. simultaneous disdain for, but skillful use of, the Narrative. They use it as a tool but try to avoid full-heartedly embracing it like the Tyrant, which leads to great power but also paralyzes you and restricts your options. Their methods are different, sure, but ultimately the thing that matters is Evil is a tool for them, not a goal, and one that they'd gladly throw in the trash if they found something better.

Dainpdf

Cat is quite pragmatic as well. Or, one might also say, practical.

...it has just occurred to me that Black is practical and has been Cat's guide in her journey. He's her Practical Guide to Evil.

Liliet

The joke is that Kairos is as pragmatic as Black is, in his own way. He just chooses different tools for the job.

It's something of a blind spot that Amadeus has, that the tools he disdains as impractical are in fact practical, just for a different purpose. I think if he realized earlier in his career that the reason he's so fundamentally opposed to Kairos's type is because he thinks like a hero and has a hero's goals his mind would legitimately implode lmao. The idea that Evil borrowing Good's methods is only pragmatic if it borrowed Good's goals first is just... so blatantly obvious as to be completely unnoticable.

It's not the madness that Black took issue with, it's the villain aesthetic matching the aesthetic of the Wasteland eating itself. The joke is that his issue with it is that he cares and takes offence.

Catherine being this exact sort of madwoman in thinking, but aimed at the same goals and ideals and principles he shares? Yep, suddenly turns out he approves of the mindset and the results it produces deeply 😊

RanVor

Amadeus himself isn't particularly sane either.

Liliet

see you're getting it ♥

Dainpdf

Good catch.

David Lynch

Yeah, I'd suspect that he's impressed that Cat doesn't have a Name any more. (Which, to be fair, in a conflict with someone like the Bard is probably a fantastic trick to be bringing along...)

Liliet

Also a good point!

Argentorum

This may be the most fun Cat's had since she ripped Akua's heart of her chest and crushed it.

Yotz

Ah, yes – when Cat took Akua's heart and soul for her own... Such a touching story of a budding romance and innocence of youths.

Puts a tear to my eye every time.

caoimhinh

It's the best Shojō manga story ever.

Not sure how well does that mesh with Amadeus and Hanno being more or less harem protagonists.

caoimhinh

They are Seinen and Shonen MC, respectively, of course. XD

Liliet

The most fun anyone's had in this narrative since Akua got to rip Cat's heart out of her chest right back in the name of friendship.

That was admittedly fairly recently and I do love the frequency here

MJ

Well now that they've given each other their hearts, the ship is all but sailed isn't it 😊

Liliet

This joke will never get old for people who genuinely ship it (like me)

Erebus42

The Tyrant is always a treat, and Catherine playing his game is simultaneously concerning and delightful.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

This interaction was everything I ever wanted it to be. This marks the first time Cat has been on the playing field with someone in her weight-class who shares her preference for buckwild out-of-left-field chaos. This whole conflict is going to come down to getting resolved through shenanigans.

Dainpdf

I just want to see how many impossible things they do before the loser's last breakfast.

Liliet

"I triple dog dare you" – this entire conversation

daegone823

Does she even have a name?

I mean she doesn't even have an aspect. To me she appears to be similar to the house of light clerics, who are empowered by their religion allowing them to heal with miracles without knowing what they are doing but through faith. She is just another priest, insult intended. Still she was able to brave the Heirarch's control and trade wits with the tyrant, so maybe having a name is not all it's cracked up to be.

Still linking each aspect to character growth was exciting to say the least. Whenever a character used an aspect it would remind me about the life changing moments that caused the aspect or cause me to question what they went through. Even unknown characters could have there unknown stories through the aspects they used in battle.

I still have hopes for new names, I still look for bold lettering in each chapter to rekindle something that may have been lost.

This post turned into something else.

David Lynch

Two chapters ago she explicitly said (well, thought) that she wasn't Named.

Rook

I think she's at the point of growing beyond a Name by now, it would almost be a few steps backwards to get one. Having a Name makes you strong but also rigid. It defines what you are and intensifies your strengths but also emphasizes your weaknesses. Being rigidly defined means your opposition has your measure from the start; it means they can use that against you and there's not a damn thing you can do about it.

Although I wouldn't put it past her to yell out an aspect-like catchphrase as a distraction before stabbing someone. You might see some bold letters yet.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

To me it feels like she's kind of in the same boat as Black, ironically enough. She doesn't have a name, but the way she lost it was through sacrifice rather than going against it. She lost Squire when she fully embraced Winter, but the Fae are so story focused she didn't lose any narrative momentum (and in fact gained some along with power). Even after giving it up, she's still at the center of things both politically and narratively.

I've been thinking for a while that the fact that certain tropes emerge in the life of a Named, even without being perpetrated by another Name (the way people react to them, their backstories mattering for the purposes of character growth, etc) means that even people without Names can benefit from their stories if they position themselves right to take advantage of the tropes as the form.

Cat's Name is gone but the ripples of her story are still moving outwards and since she's still moving to reinforce them it seems like both prevents her from getting a new Name. She still has the same will to change a broken world, as evidenced by being able to shrug off the big H's trial fever last chapter. And since all her power now is basically stored off-site, she doesn't have any metaphysical barriers to becoming something new, like any other mortal.

I'm rambling a bit now but the TL:DR is that Cat to me feels like she's closer to a new Name than she has been since second Liese and whatever comes next seems like it will have less strings attached, given that it's not being filtered through the tint of weaponized magical depression.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Edit: *nothing prevents her, not both. Derp. :p

medailyfun

a Name is a Role threading on the Reality Grooves, it's quite possible she's threading totally new path thus not falling into any existing Role

Liliet

I don't think she's THAT unique. Like no more than all Named are. Depending on her moves from now on, she is likely to hit a mixture of existing cultural grooves, which as I understand is how new Names are made if you hit them hard enough.

And if anyone has story weight to single-handedly burn an entirely new groove where one wasn't before, it's Cat.

medailyfun

> even people without Names can benefit from their stories if they position themselves right to take advantage of the tropes as the form.

same thing in our reality, bro, that's why the book is important to me

Dragrath

Conceptually I don't see her having a name as that would require ties to above or below. Remember her deal with Sve Noc and the appeal towards the shared element of being pawns for the gods. Cat wants both above and below to loose for having used Callow as a plaything so lacking a name seems symbolic.

Dainpdf

Names don't require allegiance, though some include it. See Names like Squire, Archer, Thief which can be Good or Evil, and transit between the two.

Dainpdf

Pattern of three. She refused a Queen name the first time she was in Liesse, had the possibility of one taken from her by Black the second. Third time she'll get one and it'll stick.

Liliet

I like this idea.

Skaddix

I like but also I think Cat really underestimates the impact of personal charisma and trust. If she wants the Liesse Accords to work and not force signings at the point of the sword she needs the major players to trust her and her leadership. Abdicating and handing over Callow to someone else is not going to work if she is downgrading to not being in Charge of some country. Cause well the players signed the deal with her not with anyone else. So are they really going to trust and/or fear whoever Cat picks as successor somehow I doubt that. I just don't see when its time to sign this treaty various powers being down for her abdicating. I especially don't see Sve Noc signing off on Cat leaving.

Liliet

I mean, Catherine NEEDS to make this treaty not rely on personal charisma, because she intends to make it last more than one generation?

Skaddix

Well sure but she needs it to not fail in the early years she can let someone takeover when she dies.

Liliet

Depends on how long you think "early years" are & how long you think Cat's planning to live.

MJ

She already had her third chance. She could've been Queen of Night and Winter, but she surrendered her title instead.

Dainpdf

One, that was not in Liesse.
Two, pretty sure what was at the end there was not a Name.
Three, it was also not queenhood.

RanVor

I hope there's no such pattern then, because poor Liesse deserves to be left alone.

Dainpdf

And yet, have the people of Calernia shown any predisposition towards leaving things that should be left alone, alone?

Liliet

A Name is just a role in the story assigned according to the kind of awesome that you already are. It comes with some amplification, sure, but as Cat has mused wrt Indrani recently, the key is always the person's own essence.

Cat doesn't have a Name and it makes no bloody difference because she's still her. If anything, there's now no distraction of the Squire story that she bucked so hard it landed in the next country over.

If what she is now coalesces into a coherent story role that fits Calernia's cultural understanding, she'll get a new Name. But at the level she's slugging at, it'll barely make any difference. Just another thread to weave into the tapestry.

I do think we'll see new Names, though. Not everyone is Cat 😊

Euodiachloris

Sure we'll get new Names. New Heroes will hove into view, all freshly-minted, not even with their second or third aspect... And, it will take them several goes at floundering against the fact that Cat simply has no aspects they can counter by growing a brand spanking new one as the plot would like to demand before Above will have to admit it needs to come up with a different tactic. 🙄

Liliet

I was thinking Ines, Cordelia and Amadeus :3

RanVor

Ines, maybe. Cordelia, doubtful. Amadeus, HELL NO.

Liliet

I'm curious what your prediction is actually. Do you think he's going to stay non-Named until the end of the story? Or do you just mean he'll get a pre-existing Name and not a new one? (not what I meant by 'new Names' but maybe that's not clear)

RanVor

Wait, you meant Names in general? If so, change NO to YES.

Liliet

AH

SHOULD HAVE READ THE NEXT COMMENT

you got so used to arguing with my theory you didn't even notice I wasn't talking about it? XD

(btw I actually now think its 50/50 Amadeus isn't getting a new Name at all)

RanVor

Well, yes.

Skaddix

I expect a cutaway since that usually occurs when terms matter. Cat and Dead King didn't get a cut cause Dead King was always taking Malicia's Deal

I am still waiting for the Masego Bomb. And interesting Tyrant did provoke Callow somehow.

IDKWhoitis

Good to see Cat can still get under the skin of even the most tricky of opponents.

Are we going to see a repeat of Book 1? Betray Ally 1 to Ally 2, for Ally 3 to stab 2, then wipe out a weakened big bad?

Liliet

That's what Kairos is wondering, too 😊

Skaddix

Anyway looks like Cordelia is probably trying to raise an Angel interesting how she plans to do that with no Hero besides the Auger. Tyrant wants to steal it since we know he has been laying a trap for an Angel. Could be some sort of lesser god I suppose since Sve Noc has made it clear they don't want to alert any ancient powers to their presence or ascension. So you figure that will come into play eventually.

I keep seeing people thinking it's an angel. Wasn't the Liessen one large enough to have the entire city built on top of it's personal sublayer of Creation. Not something you can actually dredge out.

Dainpdf

Angel corpses seem to be highly metaphorical, since that one had a church as part of it.

Dainpdf

He has? How do we know that?

Dead King is unlikely to lie about that kind of stuff.

Dainpdf

I must have forgotten that point. It's been a bit since that visit. Thanks. Do you happen to remember in what chapter it was that he mentioned it?

Liliet

““In a manner of speaking,” the Dead King said. “Praesi have slain and tricked them into falling, as have I. Yet the Choirs stand, for their existence is fixed. A dead angel does not detract from the whole. It remains as it ever was.”

“They have to play by the rules,” I said.

“Oh yes,” Neshamah murmured. “And they will pay for that, in time. That delightful child in Helike wove a trap for them right under the Intercessor's nose. I expect the end of that play to be nothing less than magnificent.””

Book 4 Chapter 35: Stroll

Dainpdf

Thank you!

Also, Calling Kairos a “delightful child” just comes to show Neshamah is completely nuts.

Liliet

I mean.... I agree with him.

He's the delightfulest.

You just have to tilt your head the right way ;u;

Dainpdf

He's a delightful adult. Body frozen in time or not.

Liliet

I mean... he's Catherine's age or slightly younger.

It's valid to call them both children even from my point of view, and I'm barely older.

For Neshamah? Everyone short of Intercessor is.

Dainpdf

I had thought he was older than that. In any case, being an adult is more about absolute age and frame of mind than relative age.

Liliet

His frame of mind is having a lot of fun as he fucks shit up.

Not quite child, no, but 'adult' does not strike me as an accurate descriptor either.

RanVor

He was sixteen at the point of his introduction. He should be somewhere between eighteen and nineteen by now. That said, he certainly isn't very mature.

Dainpdf

I had this idea somewhere that he was in his thirties. Wonder where I got that from...

Liliet

You might have been thinking of Anaxares, who is.

Or you might have gotten confused by the fact his nephew was older than him.

Mental Mouse

I suspect Hierarch is that trap.

Liliet

Yeah, probably!

nick012000

I don't think it's an angel that she's dredging out of the lake. I think it's more likely that it's a demon, instead.

magesbe

Ironically, I don't think any of the information he gave Catherine was a lie. Funny that.

And the chances of him being behind the Observatory's silence have increased by magnitudes.

Liliet

Why put effort into making up lies when you can just tell the truth and watch the other person confuse themselves?

Kairos prefers energy-efficient methods ;u;

naturalnuke

Sometimes when a sword comes swinging the best thing to do is step in.

Dainpdf

Or ally with the sword.

...I fully expect this conflict to involve flaming flamingos at some point.

Euodiachloris

Do you have something against chocolate fountains, because.....

Novice

Kairos and Catherine in an alliance in the middle of the biggest shitstorm the continent have ever seen? Calernia really can't catch a break huh.

Liliet

TBF at least this way they're not swinging at each other.

Calernia's bloody lucky.

Sylwoos

What's the point of a alliance if not to create opportunity to swing at each other?

Liliet

Well hopefully it's more likely to be knives in the back and not y'know mountains flying around.

Coming closer means you need to swing less wide.

Dainpdf

This was delightful. The people from the League are all great.

caoimhinh

Each city of the League has their own take on insanity.

Atalante is full of emotional people, religious fanatics and also love debates like ancient Athens but never actually convince each other of anything, so they are stubborn in their beliefs.

Helike is a bunch of Tyrant fans who love conquest and war in Hell-like slaughter.

Bellerophon has the brainwashed Communist-like in their fake democracy.

The Secretariat of Delos is bureaucracy gone mad.

The Magisters of Stygia are slavers and think themselves above everyone. thinking that anyone besides the Magisters is mere cattle to be used until death.

Penthes has five idiots fighting over the title of Exarch and until one of them triumphs the city is paralyzed.

I don't know yet what madness Nicae has, but odds are that it has one.

RanVor

"[...] in Hell-like slaughter." I see what you did there. But don't forget Helike is Good half the time.

IDKWhoitis

I think Nicae has to play the straight man. They do have the power to request things of the Hierarch.

However, they do love to fight over Naval shipping lanes like Venice, even if they have failed 4 of the last 5 times. They only won this one time because Warlock nuked the other half of Ashur's ships.

caoimhinh

That seems to be the case.

Unless... does being the only sane person in a group of crazy count as a form of madness?

Dresden 67

Actually Penthes is down to two claimants to the title of Exarch, they apparently managed to murder the others.

caoimhinh

Oh, I didn't remember that...
Well, good for them, they got rid of three idiotic politicians that only were quarrelling instead of doing something for the good of their country. That's progress XD

Dainpdf

Nice has the issue with the duumvirate, but I don't know if that counts.

Antoninjohn

Now Cat can use the true secret power of friendship, having five people to beat up one person at the same time

Skaddix

I wonder if Masego and Indrani will go all Bonnie and Clyde and go off on a killing spree for awhile. Since they both seem to be in very bad moods post Vol 4. Masego cause his parents got killed and Indrani cause Sve Noc almost killed her. Indrani and Cat seem to be having issues and the sex probably didn't help matters. Plus Indrani and Masego are not like Viv and Hakram, they don't really care about the overall mission or the Liesse Accords. They hang with Cat cause she is fun and they get to see new things and learn new things and get new challenges. But mostly they care about getting stronger Ranger in the Martial Arts and Hierophant in the Mystic Arts.

I do wonder what the Tyrant is going to do with an Angel.

Skaddix

Crap I mean Archer but she is Ranger's daughter. She simply worse cause she lacks those Half Elf stats but her Name can eventually compensate the difference. Really need to boost magic resistance, I am guessing Elves have way better Magic Resistance.

magesbe

They hang out with Catherine because she's their friend. I refer you to Indrani's speech to Catherine in Book 4 where she told Catherine that the Woe was loyal to her because of who she was and how she treated them, like family.

That said, even if they see Catherine like family, it's not 100% out of the picture for them to take a hiatus to get their own shit together.

Skaddix

I think Cat is fun follows under the Friend part. But yeah they are friends but their missions are different. Indrani and Masego want to ascend to greatness at their chosen disciplines. Cat wants a better World. Viv wants Callow better which ties into Cat's mission and Hakram at least says he wants to make things better for Orcs. Callow has a broad mission while they have personal missions.

MagicTurtle

CatXKairos ship confirmed

caoimhinh

Curious Kairos and Black Queen Cat, that's a colorful pair.

pagesbe

Is it just me, or is the next chapter a bit late?

caoimhinh

It is late, by almost an hour already.
Let's hope it gets released in the next few minutes, there's also an Extra Chapter, the continuation of Pilgrim story; that might be a reason for the delay.

Hopefully EE is alright and can deliver the chapter soon.

Javvies

Agreed, though, depending on where EE is based (I don't remember) – there are places in the world where the weather has been absolutely terrible the last few days.

caoimhinh

So I heard. Apparently, there was even a tornado in Cuba that killed almost 200 people, too.

Andrew Mitchell

There seem to be more and more weather extremes all around the world. My home town in Australia has just had it's hottest January EVER... We're f*ing the climate up for sure.

Aston Whiteman

Vote?

SMHF

Normaly an hour long delay should be nothing, but EE is probably the most punctual person on Patreon. I just hope he's fine.

caoimhinh

Chapter up!!

Aston Whiteman

Seriously, hope EE is OK.

I just woke up to snow while checking chapter.

dadycoool

Four years later, this conversation is still quite the treat. The eternal friendship between these two tyrants remains the single greatest thing to come out of this story.

Chapter 8: Veracity

"A pleasant lie finds more ears than a sharp truth."

– Proceran saying

"Seriously?" I said. "I mean, I know you're with the old guard about this stuff but this is pretty on the nose."

"The classics became such for a reason," Kairos stiffly replied.

He sounded a little miffed, I noted.

"I bet you even have a speech, don't you?" I mused. "Some tortured extended metaphor about the nature of Creation and our role in it."

The Tyrant of Helike glared at me woefully.

"This rook represents the inherent emptiness of moral philosophy," I suggested. "Maybe mention something about how Good is prone to stagnation and therefore fundamentally inferior."

"Do you even know how to play?" he challenged.

I glanced downwards at the shatranj board a pair of his little twisted gargoyles had brought. I picked up a footman and wiggled it a bit.

"This moves diagonally, right?" I beamed.

His eyes closed, even the red one.

"You pain me, Catherine Foundling," Kairos said. "You pain me deeply."

I hummed thoughtfully, then took advantage of his distraction to turn the board around. The poor gargoyles it was resting atop squeaked in dismay, though they didn't flinch.

"I'll take black," I said.

I discreetly pocketed the footman from the white side of the board I'd not for a moment intended to give back. His eyes opened just a moment too late to catch me red-handed.

"This is most improper," the villain protested.

"They don't call me the White Queen," I pointed out.

"Are you so bound by what others think of you?" Kairos gallantly tried.

"Point for effort," I said. "But I've had better."

I opened the game most illegally by pushing forward a footman.

"I had something for this," the Tyrant muttered. "Give me a moment."

He didn't even bother to comment on my open cheating before moving up a knight. Well, it wasn't like I was going to stop anyway. I was passable at shatranj, but years of being punitively demolished at the game by Vivienne and Hakram had made me aware of my limitations. Vivienne in particular liked to allow me to think I could win before methodically flogging the conceit out of me.

"Weren't we horse-trading?" I reminded him.

I pulled at my pipe and breathed out, letting the cloud of scented smoke waft up. Another footman went up, propping up my centre. The Tyrant let out a little noise of agreement, then snapped his fingers.

"Exactly," he agreed. "Imagine, if you would, that you were a deity."

"Not my cup of tea," I drily replied.

"Evidently," Kairos mused, too-sharp eyes flicking across me. "Yet humour me."

"Done," I said.

He was being a little too slow to move, so I moved again. The Tyrant of Helike raised an eyebrow, and I painted embarrassed surprise over my face. Like I'd thought he'd already taken his turn, which was clearly the only reason I would keep going on. I withdrew the footman with a contrite smile, but only one square of the two it had moved.

"As a deity," the Tyrant said, moving up a footman to contest the centre, "though of unfathomable power you find yourself limited. Unlike the likes of us, who can command – Catherine, why is one of my footmen missing?"

"Desertion is an inevitable part of war," I sagely replied. "So, we can move every piece but the Gods can't. That the gist of it?"

"You're taking all the enjoyment out of this," Kairos complained.

"That is my favourite part," I revealed.

One of my knights went up, my opponent staring with suspicion at the legal movement. That was fine, I wasn't going to nudge it up until he was distracted anyway.

"Consider that perhaps one piece in ten can be moved," the Tyrant said. "Exceptional pieces, to be sure, or at least made to be so. Yet they must be sufficient to both carry out your godly intent and influence the other pieces, which sadly move largely according to their own petty desires."

A few moves in quick succession as we traded footmen in the centre and I moved up my priest under cover of pretending to put away the pieces I'd taken.

"That sounds like you don't believe the House of Light is a faithful servant of the Heavens in this earthly world," I chided. "Which would be heresy, Kairos. For shame."

"Ah, and so you touch upon the second limitation," the Tyrant said. "That these disobedient pieces not only have the gall to not directly answer your desires, but they also dare to influence the pieces that do."

"As a goddess, I am most displeased by this," I blandly said.

"As well you should be," Kairos agreed. "Bloody chaos, not at all the orderly matter you had envisioned. Sadly, direct intervention would be costly in more ways than can be easily understood. A more... elegant solution is required."

"Someone who can dole out the nudges I cannot," I said.

"The proverbial finger on the scales," the Tyrant of Helike smiled. "Of course, such an entity would need to be constrained. It is a tool, after all. It would not do for it to get ideas."

"Bindings," I said.

The left side of the board was turning into something of a debacle for me, I saw. My dear friend was a fair hand at the game, and I was now down a priest. That was fine, since as the defender of all things Evil I could boast of a certain talent at necromancy – a reasonable explanation for why said priest had mysteriously reappeared on the right side of the board. And all it'd taken was kicking a gargoyle so it would yelp and my opponent would look.

"Three things she always keeps," Kairos Theodosian lightly said. "She speaks, she sees and she knows stories."

He eyed my returned priest with a degree of skepticism, forcing me to withdraw it from the board. Time for contingencies, then. My fingers closed around the stolen white footman under my cloak, allowing Night to seep inside drip by drip.

"There's two sides to a coin," I said.

The Tyrant conceded to that with a slight inclination of the head.

"Three things she always flees," he said. "Promised death, direct touch and her heart's desire."

Truth, I decided, though cloaked in vagueness. Some things I'd already known – Black had put her in the face of certain death thrice, during the Liesse Rebellion, and she'd been forced to withdraw for a time – other's I'd only suspected. If 'direct touch' really stood for an inability to directly intervene, anyway. It might go a little further than that, though. Vivienne had once mentioned to me she'd never seen the Bard take a wound she was not directly responsible for receiving. As interesting as the Tyrant's words were was the fact he could speak them at all. Where had he learned all this? Back when I'd still had him on the list of possible invaders of Callow I'd gone through what records the Eyes of the Empire had on him, and Helike as a whole. There'd been persistent rumours that something was kept under that city-state's palace with oracular abilities, but with the rumour came the restriction of only one question possible. I could think of half a dozen ways to get around that, sure, but if Helike had unrestrained access to that potent a tool they wouldn't be one of the powers in the League. They would be the League, their banner flying above every rampart in the region.

"Fleeing her heart's desire," I casually repeated. "You almost make the role sound like a punishment."

The Tyrant smiled.

"I have a theory," he said. "You see, for someone to truly make a mess on this board, they would need certain qualities. Perception, affinity, knowledge. A combination thereof. You understand my meaning, yes?"

"An awareness of patterns," I said.

"Exactly so," Kairos replied. "And, plague as I am by a suspicious nature, it occurred to me that these qualities are as rare as they are useful. That neither Above nor Below are prone to waste in such regards."

My fingers stilled over the rook I'd been about to take in hand. Eyes flicking back up, I studied his face.

"An elegant solution, you called it," I softly said.

Poison made into remedy. A trap inherent to the lay of Creation. It made, I thought, a horrifying amount of sense.

"Were someone qualified to be trouble," he echoed. "They would be most qualified to quell it."

I moved up the rook, took a knight I'd been careful to strip of protection.

"And interesting theory," I said. "Though we strayed from our purpose. Should such an entity exist, what would it want?"

Kairos' eyes came to rest on me, unblinking.

"Horse-trading, Catherine," he said. "Not horse-giving."

My pipe held nothing but ashes, by now, so I leaned back to empty it on the head of one of the gargoyles. I could have garbed what I had to say in vagueness and a touch of the cryptic, but he'd win out if we played that game. No, best to cough up my part in a way that benefitted me as well. There was as much to learn from questions asked as secrets offered.

"She knew the Dead King while he was still mortal," I said, after stowing away my pipe. "And watched his rise with great interest, from as close as she could."

The Tyrant's lips quirked.

"And what was she looking for?" he asked.

Interesting, I thought. Kairos had understood my meaning earlier when I'd mentioned intercession, and the only individual I'd ever heard call the Bard the 'Intercessor' was Neshamah. Considering the Dead King had mentioned the Tyrant had reached out to him when we'd spoken in Keter last year, I'd assumed the information came from there. But it seemed he wasn't fully aware of the history between those two, if that question was any indication. Not that I could reasonably assume I was, but odds were I knew more about than that most. Including even this damnably well-informed man, looked like.

"How villains are made," I said.

He was good, I thought, but that red eye gave it away. The triumph he was feeling, like something he'd suspected for years had just been confirmed. So, my eternal friend had encountered an application of that knowledge at some point. I'd heard that entire conversation, including the parts I hadn't mentioned, so I had a suspicion as to what was important here. I won't solve the riddle with the tools they gave me, so it seems I must learn craftsmanship of my own, the Bard had said. Her methods were her own, no gift from the Gods. Which meant she was capable of making mistakes. I thought of the madman down in the city, silently recording trials, and wondered if I had not just discovered a very important piece. Kairos had arranged the election of the Hierarch. Kairos had dealt a defeat to the Wandering Bard.

That did not feel like a coincidence.

"Your turn," I said.

I was talking about more than the game, as we both knew.

"War is a messy business," the Tyrant of Helike casually said. "Not at all a precise tool. Of course, it is not without its uses. Sometimes when you need something dead, where a dagger will not do a landslide will serve."

Which begged the question, of course, of what exactly the Wandering Bard had failed to see stabbed. This couldn't be about the Calamities, it wouldn't make sense. They might have been a successful outlier in sustained victory for Evil, insofar as my father really cared about waving the banner, but getting rid of them couldn't be the point of this. I didn't doubt for a moment that she'd branded Black in the Free Cities just as harshly as I had branded the Lone Swordsman that fateful night in Summerholm, but there would have been no need for a crusade to hammer that nail fully in. The Doom of Liesse had killed the trust between Black and Malicia, which made it just a matter of time until the partnership keeping Praes together collapsed. She didn't need to start a war, or a Grand Alliance, to send the Dread Empire scuttling back to the old ways.

"A lot of people get killed in landslides," I noted.

"Losses are losses," Kairos waved away. "I suppose it would be more apt to compare it to a fire being lit. One can do quite a bit with a fire, if one can guide where it burns."

My brow furrowed, and I barely paid attention to the move I made on the board. If he was implying the Bard had either started – or, more likely, fed and sped up – a continental war to clean up loose ends, then she'd have a finger on both sides. An argument could be made that by screwing with Black she'd given the East a push, since through him she could get at both Malicia and myself. That sounded horribly risky and requiring an amount of insight and foresight that should be fucking impossible, but we were dealing with an entity that even the Dead King claimed to have never won against. I had to at least consider the possibility. It was where she was guiding the Tenth Crusade through that I was having trouble to understand. The Grey Pilgrim had influence in Levant, sure. But the foremost Ashuran hero was the White Knight, who as far as I knew had no real ties to the ruling class of the Thalassocracy. And arguably the most powerful Proceran hero was the Saint of Swords, someone I very much doubted Cordelia fucking Hasenbach would take political advice from. Which made the whole theory fall apart, since the First Prince was the mortar of the Grand Alliance and by far, even now, the most powerful member. And since we were operating under the assumption the Bard couldn't just walk up to someone not Named and pull the strings, this put all the rest into question.

"Incomplete," I said. "At the very heart."

Kairos smiled, and it twisted his face into something barely human.

"She has a cousin, Catherine," he reminded me.

My fingers clenched. The Augur. Shit, I can't believe I forgot about the Augur. That was a very dangerous angle. It should be hard to manipulate an oracle, but then what we knew about the Augur's power – and the Bard's, for that matter – was limited. Even information about Agnes Hasenbach herself was thin on the ground. It was known, however, that her crowned cousin trusted her a great deal. Why wouldn't she? The Augur had helped her win the civil war that put her on the throne in the first place. Still, it didn't mean that the First Prince was in the Wandering Bard's pocket. Not even close. But it did mean that the Intercessor could get the right words at the right time to end up in Cordelia Hasenbach's ears. I met the Tyrant's eyes and found open amusement in them. He was well aware that even if I went to the First Prince with this she'd just see it as me poisoning the well on one of her most effective advisers. A kinswoman, to boot. And you're pleased, you little shit, because you know that means actually allying with Hasenbach just got a whole lot more risky, I thought.

"Assuming you're right," I said, refraining from voicing 'and not feeding me a well-crafted lie to make this war even more bloody than it already is', "then a lot of effort has been expended. She has been visible in way she can't often have been before."

If she meddled this heavily every few decades, there would be damned records of it. That implied something was forcing her hand here and now, or she was after something worth the risks. The moment word that something like the Wandering Bard was out there pulling strings, a lot of her influence waned. And these weren't the days of the Kingdom of Sephirah anymore: cleaning up all mentions of her wouldn't be as easy as it would have been back then. Not unless she had some divinely-gifted aspect for that specific purpose, but I very much doubted that. Sparse as they were, there were records of her existence. Black had found some, and myself others.

"Indeed," Kairos said. "What makes this age different, I wonder?"

There was no answer following, just me losing my last priest to an unwise trade.

"Yeah yeah, trading and not gifting," I sighed.

I paused, drumming my fingers on the side of the board. What could I get out of him, by telling him this one?

"On at least one instance, she struck a bargain on the behalf of Below," I finally said.

His brow rose, and I got the impression he was distinctly unimpressed.

"The bargain was not struck with Named," I added quietly.

My eyes were on his red one, awaiting a reaction, but I found none. His lips quirked into a smile and I got the distinct impression I'd been played. Had the glint of triumph earlier been a fake out? To hide a lie when I caught it, or to take away my attention this very moment – when something he actually minded me knowing was on the table? Tricky bastard, I thought. Getting a read on him was like trying to paint on smoke. That'd been a risk from the start, though, I conceded. It was the questions that were telling the tale here.

"How was she summoned?" the Tyrant pleasantly asked.

Gotcha, I thought. He hadn't know that was possible, then. Because this wasn't about specifics – we both knew that even if I'd learn the specifics of the ritual the Sisters had used to reach out to Below I wouldn't share them with him – it was about fresh risk introduced to already existing plans. He needed to know if some pious, desperate soul out there could call out to Above and get the Intercessor a foothold instead. Which meant whatever he was up to, the Wandering Bard could still fuck it up if she got an in. So is that why you've been sticking to the Hierarch like a leech? I thought. He's not just your sword, he's your shield as well?

"She was not sent for," I said. "She was sent. Audience was bought and paid: desperation, blood and need."

His good eye narrowed.

"And?" he pressed.

"There was a lot to lose," I said. "You could call it weight."

Somehow I doubted everyone who slaughtered a priesthood in their own seat of power and prayed got a personal visit from the Bard with terms to offer. Below, the Intercessor had as good as admitted, didn't want to lose the entire Everdark to a catastrophic blunder by the Twilight Sages. I tossed him that last part as a bone, a reassurance of sorts. It'd take more than a Proceran prince losing his holdings to get the Bard an angle. Of course, with our good friend Neshamah on the march the stakes for our little scuffle had been raised rather high. The Tyrant wasn't out of the woods yet, and so I smiled pleasantly at him.

"You dropped this, by the way," I suddenly said.

I tossed him back the footman I'd stolen before the game even began. To my surprise he failed to catch it, and it bounced off his chin and down on the floor. He eyed me with displeasure, and while he bent to pick it up I casually switched the places of my last rook and my queen. That ought to stave off kingtip for a few more turns.

"This has been invested with power to explode," Kairos amusedly accused when he straightened again.

Ah, so he could sense that. Good to know. The Night wasn't exactly subtle stuff, but that he could discern the intent I put to it wasn't something I'd been entirely certain of.

"I'm offended you would even say that," I said, hand over heart. "I gave this back to you because of my deep and abiding belief in fair play."

"You really are terrible at this game," the Tyrant of Helike noted. "I can't believe even after so much cheating you're losing this badly."

"It's part of the metaphor," I lied. "Like the whole horse thing."

"Elegantly done," Kairos praised. "I believe we were speculating as to the bounty worth the risks being taken."

I did not reply, half-debating reaching for my pipe again as I watched him.

"There is one element singular to our little war," the Tyrant idly continued. "A common friend, I believe."

The Dead King, was it? Wasn't sure I bought that. Oh, an argument could be made. After the series of disasters that had been the crusades headed into the Kingdom of the Dead, it might have been easier to assemble a coalition of that sort if it was initially headed for Praes instead. But it didn't fit with Neshamah's methods. It wasn't like there'd never before been chaos south of the lakes for him to take advantage of. The Hidden Horror was still kicking around through careful application of the epithet's first part.

"And?" I said, echoing his earlier rejoinder.

"Quite the stage, isn't it?" Kairos said. "A crusade turned to the Tower. The might of the west spent, but not broken. The east eating itself alive, to various degrees. Our friend comes rather late to the banquet."

So that was his story, then. Neshamah had come out to play because he'd been invited, as he had been in the days of Dread Empress Triumphant. The invitation meant he wasn't the Enemy but instead an enemy. This little continental waltz of death was the Intercessor finally tying up her oldest loose end, having set out her finest bait to draw him out. It was neat and tidy notion, so naturally I distrusted it. It wasn't that I would but it beyond the Wandering Bard to have engineered this butchery over several decades – if not more – just to put down the King in Keter. I had no doubts she'd be capable of it, whether morally or in actual capacity. But the story felt wrong to me. The Intercessor striking out after the arguably most prominent champion of Below, Kairos beginning his scheme with the Hierarch to kill or cripple her before she could. Sure, that would end up counted as a win for the old crowd. Procer devoured, the arbiter of the godly pissing contest losing an eye in the grand old tradition of Evil and what Good nations managed to survive the wreck would be eclipsed by the Below-aligned powers remaining on Calernia. That was the thing, though.

This was too simple a game.

Which meant the Tyrant of Helike had fed me secrets, armed me with just enough to interfere, and now intended to loose me into the middle of all these delicate plans being laid down. It also meant he was lying to me, or close enough, but I couldn't find it in me to be offended by that. Might as well blame a fish for swimming.

"Interesting," I said.

Then I shrugged and tipped my king. It was, after all, just a game. And I'd already gotten what I came from. The Tyrant watched me with a smile as I rose to my feet, leaning on my staff.

"I expect I'll be seeing you soon," I said.

"How could I disappoint my closest ally?" Kairos replied.

I only took a few steps before turning, mostly on a whim.

"What would actually happen," I asked, "if you won?"

The Tyrant laughed, the sound of it strangely honest.

"Ah, Catherine, that's the entire point," Kairos Theodosian smiled. "Finding out."

I waited until I'd left the changing house to snap my fingers. Enough Night had been fed to the piece for the entire set to be shattered in the explosion. I supposed that, in a way, it could be considered my rebuttal.

If the game got out of hand, I wasn't above breaking the board.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

erraticerrata

First update of the month, which means extra chapter in the Extra Chapters tab. This is one is a continuation of the last, titled "Peregrine III" and from the POV of the young Grey Pilgrim. For those wondering, there's one last of those left before we end that storyline.

caoimhinh

You know, EE? An international team of avid readers was about to illegally cross a few countries to go on a quest to make sure you were fine.

When the most punctual person in the world is suddenly late, we get worried XD

danh3107

You've never been on a bus in Alaska, those men and women are almost supernaturally on time.

Skaddix

Hanno is the foremost Ashuran Hero? Has he been busy since we last saw him.

Tyrant seems similar to Black.

IDKWhoitis

Tyrant is similar to Black without the worry for what happens in the Aftermath. Both of them want to make the point, but only Black cares if Calernia is still standing in the end. Tyrant might believe the universe will screech into non existence, but doesnt care.

AAvidAnteater

A little more about Black-given our new understanding of the Bard as a role, I believe Bard might be trying to get out of this "trap" by pushing Black into it-first she refers to him as a claimant, and also notes how adept he at understanding stories. I think we'll see this developed more as the story goes on. Finally, I know a couple of other readers referred to Cat calling Black her "father." Its possible Cat is beginning to accept Black as that, but I think stories themselves might be at play. In the same way Cat could gain real advantages against the Duke in the Winter arc by pretending she was his descendant, stories may have begun molding Cat into Black's daughter.

Mental Mouse

Oh my. "I have a job for you... namely, mine!" And the irony is, Amadeus tried and failed to do that to Cat...

theart0fwar

Laughing so hard at that chess game.

> I discreetly pocketed the footman from the white side of the board I'd not for a moment intended to give back.

> I opened the game most illegally by pushing forward a footman.

> Another footman went up, propping up my centre.

> He was being a little too slow to move, so I moved again. The Tyrant of Helike raised an eyebrow, and I painted embarrassed surprise over my face. I withdrew the footman with a contrite smile, but only one square of the two it had moved.

> A few moves in quick succession as we traded footmen in the centre and I moved up my priest under cover of pretending to put away the pieces I'd taken.

> The left side of the board was turning into something of a debacle for me, I saw. My dear friend was a fair hand at the game, and I was now down a priest. That was fine, since as the defender of all things Evil I could boast of a certain talent at necromancy – a reasonable explanation for why said priest had mysteriously reappeared on the right side of the board.

> He eyed my returned priest with a degree of skepticism, forcing me to withdraw it from the board. Time for contingencies, then. My fingers closed around the stolen white footman under my cloak, allowing Night to seep inside drip by drip.

> I moved up the rook, took a knight I'd been careful to strip of protection.

> I tossed him back the footman I'd stolen before the game even began. To my surprise he failed to catch it, and it bounced off his chin and down on the floor. He eyed me with displeasure, and while he bent to pick it up I casually switched the places of my last rook and my queen. That ought to stave off kingtip for a few more turns.

> "This has been invested with power to explode," Kairos amusedly accused when he straightened again.

I have this nagging feeling that this whole game is an extended metaphor for Cat's journey, but I can't quite map it out. Is the beginning her rigging William to blow up in everyone's face?

Vortex

I am not sure it is Kat's Entire journey that was in metaphor, but I figured the rook and queen swapping positions was when she sent back thief and adjutant to run the kingdom while she chased the drop around.

NerfContessa

Absolutely amazing interplay here. Smirked the whole chapter.

Really looking forelward to the next encounter with the tyrant...

Sylwoos

Cat is the footman? She's a piece stolen from good, infused with power outside of her role who's gonna break the board.

eleniaturner

I am late to this party but: Cat is the reason the game got out of hand in the first place.

IDKWhoitis

"Masterful play", by both parties.

The Chess, The Performance, and the Power.

I would enjoy Cat and Tyrant interacting again before they try to brutally murder each other.

doominator10

Why not during and after too? No need to limit ourselves.

Skraeling

curse your sudden but inevitable betrayal!

Skaddix

So Cat still doesn't know about Masego. Darn...

grzecho2222

Half expected him to enter in the middle of the Tyrans sentence saying somethinglike:

"Yes, yes very intresting, but..."

taovkool

Maybe breaking the board was the entire point?

I mean the Wandering Bard sounded like she was up to a lot of game-breaking shenanigans back in her days and got herself stuck in the Intercessor role for it. Now, she wanted out of it, maybe?

Cicero

Yes it seemed clear to me that Cat is a potential replacement for the Wandering Bard, which might be why Above, Below, and even the Wandering Bard have not targeted her for elimination.

Mental Mouse

Wait, Cat? I was thinking Amadeus....

danh3107

Now that's what I'm talking about EE, what a great chapter and it was well worth the wait.

Robert12

Am I reading to much into this or did good somehow re-purpose triumphant and turn her into the bard?

Javvies

Bard way predates Triumphant.

Javvies

The only thing I can think of that's noticeably different now on a Named level is the sustained success of Black's school of Pragmatic Evil.

On the other hand, Bard didn't start moving yesterday – she's all about the long game, so she likely started moving years ago – probably before it was apparent that Black's plan in Callow was quite so successful in having Cat being Callowan Named loyal to him.

Kairos is up to something ... still not much idea of what it could be.

caoimhinh

For me, it's clear that "the thing the Bard failed to stab, so has to bury under a landslide" is Catherine, or more exactly Amadeus' legacy of Practical Evil, that much was shown in the few chapters that have been in Intercessor's POV.

Liliet

There was only one actually, Epilogue II.

You might be confusing it with times when she shared philosophy/explanations with other people.

caoimhinh

Hmm, true.

Still, the point stands. She outright stated that now that Contrition (William the Lone Swordsman) had failed maybe Judgement(Hanno the White Knight) would do the trick.

Liliet

well now I gotta reread

...ok i havent even gotten to Bard's POV but god

"It was an unusually poetic thought for Amadeus, a man not particularly prone to sentiment outside of some very defined boundaries."

AMADEUS OH MY GOD

a natural 1 on self-insight roll ;u;

...ok rereading that is fascinating and made me remember that I like Bard a lot actually 0.-

anyway

"Keeping the bottle, if not the cup, she strode out into the sun. The White Knight was bound to be close, or she wouldn't be there. Contrition, in the end, had not done the trick.

Maybe Judgement would."

she does not specify what exactly the trick was -_- (my suspicion is flipping, not killing. redemption.

contrition tried to force redemption on Cat and it didn't work. there was a potential redemption story for her in Liesse if William had not been that much of an idiot about opposing her while she was doing lowercase good, that's my read)

Considering that Contrition led more than half of the Crusades, I think Bard was indeed angling for a hike to Keter. Not everything has to revolve around the protagonist.

Besides, she knew what the Hierarch was about and still invited Neshamah into Creation. Whatever is going on, she believes her duties will allow her not to enforce the rules he keeps breaking, at least this time.

Liliet

Oh yeah that also.

randodude

i am not so sure anymore, that was the old bard talking to William , while she was bound to what was then a local story, she tailored herself into something the lone swordsman can understand, into a certain narrative.

i don't doubt that the legacy of Practical Evil, is one of the pieces on the board, but i don't think that this is what the bard is aiming at, i think it is more of a consequence of the endgame state of Calernia, or perhaps an enabler of her true goal.

Liliet

^ Agreed.

Over Due

Did anyone else notice that Cat referred to Black as her father?
Did I misread that, or did I miss something in an earlier chapter? Is she being literal or figurative?

Wry Warudo

She's been calling Black her father for a while now; iirc the first mention was when she broke up with Killian

Liliet

I love how it's still "Black" most of the time, so every time she drops the f-word is jarring af.

She's been doing that with increasing frequency. The first was when she was doing a sick burn on Talbot for asking that she pick a different last name ('the closest thing i have to a father'), the second (and the first direct&explicit one) was when she broke up with Killian and came to his tent for comfort, the third (sort of) was the acknowledgement of the fae patricide story involving him between them, the fourth was "angry at my father" when talking to Andronike, and in these latest chapters it's been happening more and more.

Sounds like Cat's coming to terms with it 😊

caoimhinh

She has been referring to him as her father for quite a while now. Each time she is more open about it.

ninegardens

So... possibly stupid, but is it stated whether or not Cat knows if she is being metaphorical or literal on that one.

She's died a whole bunch of times and got mixed up in story juice, and I can see her losing track of such a detail.... and it just seems weird to somehow just start using that term without noticing (heck, I know how long it took me to start applying it to a step-dad, and that was with a whole lot of time, and a marriage, and me making an actual DECISION involved... not just accidentally thinking that way).

I guess what I mean is that the "Mistake" seems off somehow. Like important plot point kind of off.

Liliet

I think Catherine is not being either 'metaphorical' or 'literal' about it. He's her adopted father. That's a fact in her eyes, because he acts like one and she thinks of him as one, and they've both acknowledged that to each other during the post-Liesse discussion. She doesn't think he's her bio father, but that doesn't matter any more than the fact Masego isn't biologically related to either of his fathers, too. Adoption overrides biology.

I actually just found the first time this was brought up in the last numbered chapter of Book 2:

"“I was not criticizing you,” my teacher said, lips twitching. “Quite the contrary.”

I might still have to kill you, one day, I thought as my cheeks warmed. The longer I knew the man, the more complicated my relationship with him grew. I'd thought, when I first became the Squire, that I would have to fight him tooth and nail for every scrap of power. Instead he'd had my back every step of the way, battering down doors I couldn't open on my own. I loved him a little bit for that. For seeing something in me I'd always believed was there, but that no one else had ever acknowledged. I also hated him for it, because I could no longer think of him as the enemy. Warlock had said that one day I would have to make a choice, and I believed him. And when that day came, when the knife was in my hand, I knew that if I killed him I'd miss him. As a teacher, as a mentor, as perhaps the closest thing to a father figure I'd ever had.”

Then in Book 3 in Reunion, the pre-Liesse conversation they had:

"“Oh there's still a few years left in this hide, if I avoid the right mistakes,” he said. “There will be dangers in facing Diabolist, to be sure, but I am aware of the stories I must sidestep.”

Gods but I was glad to hear that. Because there was a picture that could be painted in Liesse, one that involved my mentor and my rival and the bloody succession that had been the way of villains since the First Dawn. I wasn't...

Fuck, I knew Black was a risk. That as long as he lived there would always be limits to how far I could push things with the Tower. But I wasn't ready for him to die. I wasn't sure that I would ever be. It wasn't even just that I felt safer with him, the hazy memory of a warm cloak around my shoulders threaded with the bone-deep certainty there was not a line he wouldn't cross to keep me alive. I worried my lip. It'd been easy to tell Grandmaster Talbot that the monster in front of me was the closest thing I'd ever have to a father, when he was so very far away. It was harder to do it now that he was here with me. It would have been breaking a pane of glass we'd always been careful to keep there, even if sometimes our hands pressed against that divide close enough to feel the other's warmth. The hard girl with a distant father figure, I thought mockingly. When did I become such a hackneyed banality?"

No mistakes were involved.

Cat's made a choice, and she's leaning into it on purpose. Because fuck stuffing affection into a box.

This IS a plot point, in itself.

ninegardens

Yeah, I know she's thought of him as a father figure in the past... but that's the THING, yeah... in all those past cases, she's used the phrase "Father figure", and now she isn't, and there IS a difference.
And yeah, I see the thing with adoption and all that jazz... but... but those too are different situations.

I'm not saying you're wrong here, just... that something has changed, and it's weird, and hasn't been fully explained.

Liliet

Oh, the moment of change was explicit.

Chapter 57: Revolve

> I found my feet taking me back to camp instead of the bonfire, where I knew Hakram would be. I had no taste for the conversation that awaited there, would not for a long time. Instead I found a tent, still lit with magelight even at this hour, and let the wards wash over me as I entered. Black was seated on one of his rickety stools, his thin shirt for only armour as he poured over papers arrayed before him. He took one look at me, then let out a breath that was almost a sigh.

> He leant back to claim a cup from his bedside and filled it with the wine at his table, pressing it into my hands. I could have sat across from him, but instead I went on his bed. I folded my knees against my chest and cradled the cup. I barely remembered what it had felt like, to be a child, but it must have been something like this. He did not speak, but neither did his eyes return to the papers.

> [...]

> The last part I remembered of that night was my father's hands putting a blanket over me.

That's the moment of change and the moment of choice.

Of course, immediately after it got buried under the whole "you did WHAT" of Liesse and of him trying to get her to kill him, Winter numbness freezing that development in place until Cat shook it off.

But the decision, the change, it was already there.

Barthumphries

Maybe she is thinking of him as Father more now because that's his new Name?

Liliet

omg

I mean... he didn't lose the Name of Black Knight until Queen's Gambit, and you can't hold two Names at the same time, but...

hey, Cat was called the Black Queen before she was ready to transition from Squire, too 😊

Barthumphries

Father of the New Evil, just like George Washington (in the United States) is colloquially known as the Father of our Nation.

Liliet

awwwwww

Rook

I think the bard might actually want the same thing as Kairos, despite what she's obligated to attempt accomplishing.

He said it himself, she flees from three things. When she fled from the Hierarch when he refused to pick a side, which one of those was present? I think the only one that can truly apply is the desire of her heart.

Catherine, I believe, is so busy looking elsewhere for the Bard's game that she's missing the clue right under her nose. What if Catherine can't find the the key piece in the Bard's plan because she is the key piece? A piece that cant outplay the bard – no one can – but she can break that board on which she can't lose, no matter how much she wants to.

It would also very neatly wrap up why Amadeus is actually important in the big picture, despite his goals being focused on the mundane smaller picture. "Father" is what she just called him in her little monologue. He's not the billiard ball, he's cue. That's why she nudged him directly, he's the tool to indirectly move the piece that she'd otherwise be obligated to sabotage, this late in the game.

It's why everything she's done points to weakening all sides on the board, not breaking them. So that when the Bard's infantry-piece bomb goes off, everyone is too worn out to stop it.

Rook

*the cue

The other two contextual clues come together as well.

Why some ordinary teenage kid from some backwater town with no extraordinary talents has been toppling ancient powers as old as the continent left and right. How she grew so quickly and gained exactly what she needed at exactly the right times. If she was fed, intentionally grown – just like that infantry piece – by the oldest and scariest monster, it makes perfect sense.

It makes sense what the Bard mentioned before. About how she created the Hierarch, of all things, back before she knew better. Why she created something that goes against everything she is. He's a failed precious attempt. The hands-on direct influence that her fetters forced her to sabotage, that couldn't win against her as a result.

Catherine is just MK II. Or III. Or V. Or however long this has been going on.

Maybe the real reason Kairos has taken such an interest in Catherine is precisely because he can tell what she was created for.

ChillyPepper

`Why some ordinary teenage kid from some backwater town with no extraordinary talents has been toppling ancient powers as old as the continent left and right.`

The parallel realities flashback thingies she has before kneeling before Diabolist indicate that she is anything but ordinary. Just wanted to point this out.

Rook

Sure, not exactly some random pauper, but every parallel was well within traditionally human limits.

Her flashbacks were things like a mob boss, a hero, a general. Achievements at the end of a long life. Impressive beyond a doubt, but not something that boggles the mind when you hear those types of people could have started out from nothing. It doesn't invite disbelief to think that a person could reach those heights mostly on their own merits.

Some of the things she's been doing the last few volumes though, they defy all common sense. Devouring an entire half of creation beta and becoming something akin to a god at the ripe old age of, uh, 19? I don't remember the exact age, we know she barely got out of high school age just recently. Or using that to create a literal deity and reviving a race out of some mangled ruin that predates the history of the nation that spawned her? The scale is a bit off

Sylwoos

And given that the world revolve around story trope, ordinary teenage kids from some backwater town toppling great power is probably the norm. How many Dread Emperor have fallen to such heros?

Fayhem

Bard didn't create this Hierarch; that was Tyrant's play. Bard was referring to creating the Name of Hierarch itself, that in this manifestation of the Name Anaxares wound up assuming through Tyrant's manipulations.

Someguy

>If the game got out of hand, I wasn't above breaking the board.

Neither are the Gods Above Cat.

caoimhinh

I'm re-reading the Guide, and something was brought to my attention. This is what Hakram told Cat just before the Battle of Second Liesse against Akua:

"We're winning," he said. "Just by standing here, we're winning. Because they only rule us only as long as we let them, and the moment that truth bleeds it dies. They can kill every last one of us and it won't matter, because as long as the banner's been raised once someone will rise to carry it again." Baring fangs, he met my eyes.

"They wouldn't let us have a seat at the table, so we broke it," Hakram said, and there was a savage satisfaction to him. "That will not go quietly into the night, no matter what happens today."

And a few paragraphs later he said this:

"That's the thing with eras, Catherine," Adjutant said, hard-eyed and proud. "They come to an end. So let's bury it together, the two of us – this fucking Age of Wonders they built on our backs."

So it's all coming to that, one way or another, a lot of Players are getting closer to the point of contemplating the breaking of the board, and thus the Game is coming to an end.

Liliet

And so, Catherine's favorite metaphor for war is shatranj played improperly.

Pieces that don't obey with Duchess Kegan.

Several boards that people are playing on without knowing they are different with Pilgrim.

And now it comes to a fucking culmination and I love her.

caoimhinh

This was a very interesting and funny chapter, thanks. Some revelations, lots of speculations. Time to start looking for the Legions and plan Amadeus' rescue!

"a successful outlier in sustained victory for Evil, insofar as my father really cared about waving the banner"
Aaaww Cat is so cute calling Amadeus father more frequently.

"what exactly the Wandering Bard had failed to see stabbed"
You, of course, Cat. As the heiress of Practical Evil. Of course, taking down Neshamah might be in the cards, but it's never a single-layered game, there are always multiple objectives and possible paths of action.

Typos found / how it should be:

plague as I am by a suspicious nature / plagued knew more about than that most / about that than most
I would but it beyond the Wandering Bard / put it beyond gotten what I came from / what I came for bookhero123

Thanks for the chapter!

This part of the monologue was the most precise representation of the series,

["You really are terrible at this game," the Tyrant of Helike noted. "I can't believe even after so much cheating you're losing this badly."]

I don't usually comment but this particular part just sums up Cat through the whole series, she has done so much and was ready to sacrifice even more but in the end she lost more than she won. Truly EE is a prodigy among the writers. Thanks you so much for this amazing series.

edrey

the thing the bard failed to stab are practical evils, they are a new kind of evil she doesnt know how to deal, one or two are find but more? i dont thing so, first the hashmalin then the wars, lets not forget that the plan of amadeus was to trascend the pattern of callow and praes, a new evil nation of practical villians

SINISTAR

I don't quite think that's it. While Black and Co's methodology is relatively new, and arguably a threat, keep in mind Cat's concluded the story the Bard is building is contrary to taking out individuals who are much more dangerous. There's some pieces on the board we don't know of yet.

... I suspect at least one of those pieces is Triumphant.

Dot

the whole chess game was a metaphor to the game between Good and Evil with cat as the stolen piece

Screwfloss

Why is Cat calling Black her "father" all of a sudden? Does this make sense to anyone?

werafdsaew

She's been doing that for a while now

Liliet

It's been a subplot for a while, particularly in the Second Llesse arc. Look into the "Reunion" chapter for some of Cat's musings on it.

SINISTAR

It's a subtle, quiet thing, Cat and Black have had this relationship feeling for a while, but they've always suppressed it. However, in losing Winter, Cat has been forced to do some soul searching. Simply, Cat has chosen, on some level, to accept what her feelings for her father figure are, in spite of any other misgivings, where before there was always a fine line in between them.

Liliet

This subplot first culminated at Second Llesse ("neither of us spoke the word patricide"), but that ended with such an unholy mess with Cat so badly traumatized, she kind of put off processing it until Winter fell off.

At which point she apparently rapidly decided that the issue does not deserve any further consideration and fuck the fine line ♥

dgj212

Oh my god, I ship Cat and Kairos so much right now.

Andrew Mitchell

Wow, just... Wow. I am so impressed by this chapter. Humour and subtlety both in abundance.

TBH I didn't get 75% of the subtle interplay between Kairos and Cat. I'm looking forward to reading the existing 30+ comments because I'm sure others will have seen more deeply than me.

Cat's cheating, and Kairos' reaction (or lack of) were the absolute highlight for me.

Loved this chapter so much.

Liliet

Catherine learned how to play board games from the Calamities.

This is the least surprising thing in all of existence.

I love it so much.

Jordan Leighton

I understand less and less of what's happening, but it's still pretty good.

Digitize27

It can't just be me that sees a lot of similarities between the proposed reason that the Bard is as she is (She was uniquely good at fucking up the Gods' plans so was re-purposed to facilitate them) and Catherine herself.

Is Bard grooming a successor? Engineering a situation where she is forced to lose in order to prove that Cat is better at this game than her and is therefore more worthy of her punishment?

Liliet

I'm seeing it too.

Euodiachloris

Or, maybe, Amadeus. If Bard does somehow get herself smashed before the board goes splody, that role and Name are left flapping in the breeze.

And, Amadeus is Mr Story Patterns, not just Cat. 😊

Liliet

That would b so horrifyng, I love it

patrar

Notice it's Amadeus, not Kat that gets all the 'talks' from Bard. Amadeus who's getting more and more isolated. First Captain dies, than Alaya ruins their relationship with her power plays and now Warlock died. The Legionaries who died to the Pilgrim's plague are another facet of this. And of course, Praes is on the way to ruin. The rest of the Calamities are much less important to him emotionally. All that remains is his pupil/daughter Katherine. If the Bard manages to perma-kill her he'll be alone. That's when he disconnected enough from the mortal world to replace Bard. He'll ask for a miracle to get Kat back and instead become 'the intercessor' forever denied his heart's desire.

From Story-lore perspective Kat can't be the Intercessor's replacement or her instrument to destroy the Gods' gameboard. There's not enough personal connections between the two. They met a few times during her clash with the Heiress and Lone Swordsman and she studied the Bard from afar since then but they don't meet and speak. The story is thus too sterile. Sure much of her machinations was geared to destroy Kat and Callow but both are Amadeus fruits of love and labor. They're the obstacles, not the goal.

Aotrs Commander

I love how Cat appears to be the only person that can even get to and exasperate even KAIROS, who has pretty much otherwise spent his whole time being such a easy-going manic.

Sylwoos

Probably because she stole his part. He was the one supposed to blatantly cheat to his opponent exasperation, not the other way around.

Barthumphries

Typo thread:

It wasn't that I would but it beyond the Wandering Bard to have engineered...
Change but to put.

There were others but erratic isn't going to read this typo thread anyway so...

Barthumphries

Typo thread:

It wasn't that I would but it beyond the Wandering Bard to have engineered...
Change but to put.

There were others but erratic isn't going to read this typo thread anyway so...

nipi

Ah yes Cat. Not afraid of breaking the board... over someones head.

WuseMajor

Tyrant, this is what it's like for other people to interact with you. Remember that in the future.

WuseMajor

The qualities he described Bard as having are pretty similar to Cat's strengths. What if the Bard wants to die permanently, but to do that, she needs to find a replacement?

L

How come Cathrine never has name-dreams of black knights other than Amadeus?

patrar

She only wants to emulate Amadeus brand of Practical Evil, not any of his predecessors. Besides, I'm not sure Squires can receive revelations from beyond the grave.

Randelman

Is there anything preventing Catherine from claiming a Name now? I know she couldn't when she was all fae but surely that isn't stopping her anymore.

Sturmii

Cat kind of forgot that 1) apotheosis shouldn't happen that often and 2) she was suddenly declared arch heretic

Chapter 9: Patient Knives

"No man is an island, Chancellor. We've tried the ritual, the result is mostly screams."

– Dread Emperor Malignant III

We were an hour out of Rochelant when Akua returned to my side. The night was still young – I knew that better than most – so we'd not wasted moonlight by lingering on the outskirts of the city until she finished. The sooner we caught up to my drow army the better, as far as I was concerned. Still, after she returned in a whisper of power on frost I called a halt. My Peerage took the following dismissal gracefully, and why wouldn't it? They'd not stood in my deeper councils even when I was still their sole mistress, not even Ivah. It would have been convenient if there'd been a log or rock to sit on as we spoke, but Creation did not seem in an indulging mood tonight. At least getting off the damned horse for a moment was a relief to my calves and arse. I'd forgotten how irksome the cramps coming with long rides could be, when you weren't used to horsemanship. Winter had seen to those, before, and my Name taken off the edge before that. Gods, at least it wasn't as bad as the return of my monthlies. The surprise had been more than slightly unpleasant, when I'd had my first moon blood in years down in the Everdark. That Archer evidently found my discomfort hilarious had been no help at all.

I stretched my legs out carefully, leaning on my staff, and my 'war council' assembled around me. A bird, an archer and the shade of a dead woman. There'd probably been Dread Emperors in the old days that had more reliable-seeming councils than mine, and wasn't that a troubling thought? The shade bowed with exquisite precision, but neither crow-Andronike nor Archer took it upon themselves to add even a semblance of ceremony to the affair. A sad day indeed, when the Doom of Liesse was the best behaved of my companions.

"Lay it on me," I said.

Usually that would have prompted a dirty joke from Indrani – whose occasional evening in my bed had done absolutely nothing to curb the racy comments of, to my mixed amusement and despair – but tonight she kept her mouth shut. I had to force myself not to look at her. This was not the place, now was not the time. The thought felt like a betrayal of sorts, true as it was. The people in the stories threw aside little details like this in the name of friendship all the time, didn't they? It'd been a long time since my story had been that clean or pretty, though, and sometimes I doubted it ever had been.

"There are at least eight thousand Helikean soldiers in Rochelant, though no more than twelve thousand," Diabolist reported. "No soldiery from any other of the Free Cities could be found."

I chewed on that for a moment. Old reports from the civil war in the League had the total muster of Helike at twenty thousand, but that army had sieged three cities since and stormed two of those three. The Tyrant might have recruited since, of course, but green troops wouldn't have the discipline I'd noticed in the soldiers holding Rochelant. And they'd marched through the Waning Woods a few months back, anyway, so further losses were to be expected. Assuming the Tyrant hadn't stripped Helike itself bare, inside that little Proceran city was the majority of the army his city-state could field. Considering Kairos Theodosian was the presumed general of the League's united armies, that held interesting implications. Who was giving out orders, if not him? Whatever reports I'd read about the League's military commanders were likely out of date by now, but unless someone had been hiding a very skilled general under a rock there should be no one of staggering competence. The other reputable professional army in their region was the Stygian slave phalanx, but while the Spears of Stygia had officers their orders ultimately came down from the ruling Magisterium of that city. Powerful warlocks, but not necessarily the most able of generals.

"The League's going to be a fucking mess if it gives battle unless the Tyrant returns," I bluntly said. "Which he shows absolutely no sign of doing right now."

"Good news, then," Archer shrugged. "Either they'll be thrashed or they'll stand back and let us settle the mess."

I frowned, not so sure about that. Kairos wouldn't be crippling his own army this early in the dance, it was his most valuable avenue of pressure on everyone else. If anything, he'd want to preserve its strength while the Grand Alliance and my own hodgepodge coalition bloodied each other for a bit. If he held command of the only mostly intact host on the field, everyone else would have to step carefully around him. On the other hand, if I was reading him right, he couldn't just stay out of the melee either. He had to prove to be some sort of threat, if his way to victory involved both himself and the First Prince at the same negotiation table. The Hierarch was a forest fire in the making, sure, but the man alone wouldn't be enough to have the likes of Cordelia Hasenbach flinching. Unless he stops haunting small cities and stirs up larger pots, I mused. Which would be difficult to implement, since the Hierarch should need to be in whatever city he stirred and the Helikeans didn't have fairy gates to quicken their advance. As far as I knew, anyway.

"We'll see," I finally said. "Akua, you studied the Hierarch's... pull?"

Diabolist nodded, face calm but gaze visibly unsettled.

"I am nearly certain this was an aspect," she said. "And absolutely certain this was not the result of using some entity bound and bargained with."

Archer spat into the snow, and I shared the sentiment.

"No one gets that strong a boon from their Name without a cost," I said. "It's not a city-killer he's wielding, not exactly, but it's almost as bad. William had to put his life on the scales and call down a bloody Choir to attempt something in the same league."

"Contrition's touch was stronger than this, practically speaking," Akua dispassionately noted. "Closer to absolute in its effect, a result of the Choir's own nature. The Hierarch's influence seems to be closer to a nudge than a decree – I would wager it relied on grievances already existing."

"Useful, but not what I'm asking you about," I said.

Diabolist inclined her head in concession, then hesitated.

"This is not fact, only supposition," she warned.

I simply cocked an eyebrow. Her suppositions were usually rather solid, as they should be. Even before I'd ripped out her soul and bound it to Winter, broadening her horizons, she'd had an education in matters eldritch that likely less than a dozen people on Calernia could boast of surpassing. And even then, not in every subject.

"The nature of the aspect might be extremely situational," Akua said. "That is usually the case with more powerful aspects – either that or they are outright uncontrolled."

My lips thinned. Uncontrolled did seem possible, since I doubted Anaxares of Bellerophon had done much experimenting with his abilities. But when I'd spoken with him, the pull had lessened while he engaged with me. Until I'd irked him, anyway. Reaction to emotions, maybe? That was hardly unusual with Named.

"Situational," I repeated, implicitly inviting her to elaborate.

"I saw more of the city than either of you, I believe," Akua said. "It struck me that, aside from the tribunals, there seemed to be no unnaturally-driven actions taking place."

Archer snorted out a laugh.

"So his trick is only good at making trials?" she said. "Takes all sorts, I suppose."

I was a lot less amused. Considering Kairos was the hand behind the Hierarch, I didn't believe for a moment that even an aspect so narrow couldn't be used to birth a hellish mess. There were a lot of important people – important entities, even – that would leave a disaster in their wake if they ended up getting behead by an alleyway tribunal. By now I was nearly certain the First Prince's neck wasn't what the Tyrant was after, but if I entertained the notion that it was for a moment? Using the right pivot, civil war could be sown in the Principate just as the Dead King started making gains up north. There was no need to expand on what kind of a disaster that would be for the rest of the continent.

"Judgement," I said, honing in on what I considered the important kernel. "You think his aspect is bound to the concept. Stronger when he's standing in judgement, or inciting others to do the same."

Akua nodded.

"I am not certain how much you know of Bellerophon," she delicately said.

Unlike Masego, she was usually more diplomatic than to outright call me ignorant to my face.

"They rule by popular vote and appoint officials by drawing lots," I replied. "Terrible at war, though their city-state is too much trouble for anyone to want to seriously attempt annexation. They hate Penthes to the bone and they've got some sort of mage order that suppresses internal rebellions. Like to execute each other a lot, so I can see where the Hierarch gets it from."

I knew more than that, but little relevant to our conversation. It was mostly anecdotes from histories which as a rule tended to take an amused, tolerant and slightly condescending view of the city. Good for a laugh, but not people to take too seriously. The rest of the League seemed content to leave them to their own devices in their dirt-poor holdings, only intervening for a cursory slap on the wrist when they agitated at the borders.

"It was not a city my education covered in great detail," Akua admitted.

Which was pretty damning, since the Sahelians would have gone out of their way to thoroughly brief her on any nation of importance.

"That said, there is one detail to their democracy that my tutors found of interest," Diabolist continued. "While it well-known that all citizens of Bellerophon have the right to cast a vote in the city's popular assembly, not so that the Gods Below have one as well."

I cocked an eyebrow, reluctantly amused.

"One vote," I said. "For the whole lot of them?"

"Indeed," Akua replied, without a speck of humour to her voice. "A droll detail, in most situations, though the Hierarch's abilities change matters. You see, this makes the Gods Below honorary citizens of Bellerophon according to their own laws."

A heartbeat passed.

"You can't be serious," I said. "They think their laws apply to the Gods?"

"Half of them, anyway," Indrani snickered. "Wonder if they ever took the bastards to court?"

"Archer," I hissed. "Think about this. The Hierarch's mad as can be, but he believes in that tripe. Believes it hard enough it ripples across a whole city – and he's under the impression he has a right to put even Gods on trial."

I bit my lip, glancing at Akua.

"If he made an attempt," I said. "What would happen?"

The shade looked dismayed.

"I have no idea," she admitted. "There has never been a precedent as far as I know."

Ah, Catherine, that's the entire point, Kairos Theodosian told me. Finding out. Would he turn on Below like that? He might, I grimly admitted to myself. Akua herself had told me that when the Hellgods had taught the Wasteland about 'sacred betrayal' they hadn't excluded themselves from the chain of treachery. I had no reason to believe their teachings in Helike ran along different lines. And if the man truly bought into Evil, he might not even see it as a betrayal. Or rather, he'd think about betrayal very differently: a holy thing, an act of worship. Which didn't mean in the slightest that the Gods Below wouldn't answer it by making a crater wherever the offence was given. The size of that possible crater, though, was the part worrying me most. A city, a province, a realm? A continent? It was one thing to make a play of the alleged purpose of Creation, as the Liesse Accords were meant to but quite, another to take a swing at the Gods who'd actually created the world. I wasn't opposed to the act in principle, to be honest, but if all it took to end Above and Below was a pair of bold madmen we'd be long rid of them.

"Well, there's a new name on the list," I finally said.

"Which one?" Archer drily asked.

"The one with the people we need a solid plan to kill," I said. "Akua, I want a record of everything you observed of the Hierarch and his abilities. We'll start from there. He might be like Malicia, a Named with little combat weight. That hardly means he'll be easy to kill, but at least he's away from his seat of power. That ought to make it possible, at least."

Unless, I suddenly thought, he's carrying his damned seat of power with him. Did he just need to be near a mob, any mob? Was his aspect really that versatile, for all its apparent narrowness? I set that consideration aside for the moment. We wouldn't get a proper assault plan done standing out here in the cold anyway, and preferably I'd want more than just us contributing to it. It'd be best if the full Woe could be involved, it'd rather broaden the toolbox we could call on to get it done. This was still speculation anyway, I reminded myself. It might be the Tyrant and the Hierarch would settle for some lesser madness behind the headsman's axe they'd be swinging. But expecting the worst was only good sense, at this point, and you could never have too many plans to kill dangerous madmen. Oh Gods, I was starting to sound like Black. Which reminded me...

"I'll see it done," Diabolist replied with a nod.

"Speaking of dangerous madmen," I said. "Black's still alive according to the Tyrant."

My two companions held their tongue, but I caught them sharing a look.

"Yes, he could be lying," I sharply said. "But Kairos also mentioned him to be a prisoner of the Grey Pilgrim, which strikes me more as an attempt to send me after the man than dangled false hope."

"It could be both," Indrani bluntly said.

"We know there's no heroes with the Levantine armies," I pointed out. "Which, if the Pilgrim was in Iserre to intervene in this fight, is where he would attach himself. If he's actually in the principality – and the Tyrant wouldn't send me on wild goose chase when he could send me into actual danger instead – then there's a reason for it. Escorting a dangerous prisoner to Salia would fit. Unless either of you has a better explanation?"

"Speculating with this little information is rather pointless," Akua said. "The Pilgrim's schemes run deep."

I was a little impressed that she, of all people, had the gall to say that about someone else.

"Still not sure why the old man wouldn't just slit the Carrion Lord's throat, to be honest," Indrani said. "Not like he's been shy about that sort of thing until now."

"Bait," Diabolist suggested.

"We're already here," Archer snorted. "We have to be, to get anything done. I guess he could be after the other Calamities, but why borrow a torch when the house is on fire?"

I couldn't disagree, though I really wished it were otherwise. Especially if the Pilgrim was actually headed for Salia, which was the only destination making sense if they were traipsing through Iserre. Sure the Principate's capital was massive and well-defended, but it was also the most populated city on Calernia bar none. Somehow I doubted Warlock would care all that much if he had to incinerate a few hundred thousand people to get my teacher out of a cell, but in principle the Grey Pilgrim was supposed to care. I supposed a funeral pyre of dead innocents by the thousands might set in stone the story of those who'd committed such a massacre being righteously slain by heroes, but that was a damned dark way of going after an end that could be reached through other methods.

"Indrani," I hesitantly asked. "If he was killed, how would the Lady of the Lake react?"

She grimaced under her hood.

"Can't be sure," she said. "Odds are she'd cut whoever wielded the knife, at least, but she's not his keeper. If he sailed his ship into the reefs on his own, and it sounds like he did, she might not see reason to take revenge. She's not a Calamity anymore, Cat. She didn't go after the heroine that killed Captain either."

That might have been because she considered the remaining Calamities to have a better claim to that death, I had privately thought, but if anyone would know the truth of this it was Archer. It irritated me a little that the Ranger could band with people for years and then leave those bonds behind when it suited her, but then she'd not struck me as a woman dripping with tender sentiments.

"Which leaves diplomatic leverage," Akua said. "The Empress' deep fondness for her right hand is no secret. Neither, to be frank, is your own attachment. Hostage-taking to secure the left flank of the Principate while war is waged against the Kingdom of the Dead would be a gamble, but if successful then well worth the costs. And if a single individual could be used for that purpose, it would be the Black Knight."

"He burned through quite a chunk of the Proceran heartlands not a year ago," Indrani whistled, sounding impressed. "If Hasenbach thought up that scheme, she's got ice in the veins and no lack of nerve. Her people are going to be howling for his head."

The First Prince did have both, I silently conceded. And this was the best explanation I'd heard so far, assuming this wasn't actually Black's plan and we were all swinging at mist – which I wasn't quite ready to discard as a possibility yet.

"We'll find out sooner or later," I said. "Regardless, if the Pilgrim is in the region you should know what that means."

Akua's face was the picture of serenity, but she did not speak and that was telling. Indrani had been with me for longer, though, so she followed the thought to the conclusion.

"We'll run into the old man at some point," she mused. "And with blades out, most likely."

"Vivienne figured out one of the quirks to his Name," I said. "We confirmed it at the Battle of the Camps – to put up his stronger stuff, likely to avoid getting killed, he needs to intervene on someone's behalf. Assuming we manage to assemble all our forces in the field before we run into him, the weak link is obvious."

Andronike, still on my shoulders and interested enough in the proceedings not to interrupt so far, stirred with displeasure at the thought yet unexpressed. That made it, I told her silently, no less true.

"The drow," Akua said. "The consequences of dawn are a dangerously exploitable weakness."

"If he knocks out the southern expedition we lose a lot of fighting power," I said. "The Legions have held ground against him before – at a cost, but we held. If he wants to cripple us, he'll be going after the drow."

"That means he'll take the offensive," Archer mused. "Or at least, his soldiers will. That way he has people to save."

And it might just be that the more people in peril there were, the greater the power granted to save them would be. He'd been no pushover at the Battle of the Camps, when he got going. Considering the amount of troops running around Iserre that was not a pleasant notion to entertain.

"He's a tricky sort," I said. "But his arsenal isn't endless and we're not without backing of our own. If he strays too far from his Name we can slap that down. I'll pit Night against Light any day, when we've got our lovely goddesses along on the field."

"Aspects, then," Indrani frowned.

"He's not going to blast an entire drow army into oblivion in a storm of Light," I agreed. "I don't care how much miracle wine the Gods make him drink, no one can stomach that kind of power without burning out. So he'll hit us where it hurts, with something he's personally strong in. And back at the Battle of the Camps, when he got all miraculous on us he was using a very specific kind of light."

"We cannot kill him without ending chances of any diplomatic agreement with Levant," Diabolist reminded me.

"No," I agreed. "So that's not what we'll go after. The opposition isn't the only side with miracles, these days, even though ours need to be bought and paid for."

I met the shade's golden eyes.

"Make me a well, Akua Sahelian," I ordered. "I don't care how many Mighty you have to rope in, get it done and quick."

Diabolist flicked a glance at the silver of godhood on my shoulder, but found nothing there to fear. She wouldn't, I thought. After all, Andronike's crowing laughter was echoing in the back of my head with no sign of ceasing. She would be amused by that, I supposed. There was a degree of irony to my plan being, in essence, the first teaching of the Sisters. I rolled my other shoulder, limbering the muscles in an attempt to distract from the dull of throb of my bad leg. The staff could only help so much.

"All right, that's enough for now," I said. "Let's get moving, I want to cover as much ground as possible before dawn catches us."

If I'm not wrong, we'll be joining General Rumena just in time to kick the hornet's nest."

"That's why good boots are important," Indrani laughed.

I was gladdened her mood had shifted, though I had to wonder how long that'd last.

"Also crushing one's enemies," Akua seriously said, then paused. "For justice, of course."

I rolled my eyes and left them to it, heading back to my horse. I slipped onto the saddle, then waited for the sounds of their bickering to fade as they pulled ahead.

"Andronike," I said. "If I needed you to look south for something..."

"Not until my sister is at my side," the crow said. "Something clouds my sight."

Yet another reason to reunite with the southern expedition as fast as possible, I thought, spurring on Zombie to catch up with the others.

If Cordelia Hasenbach had gone grave-digging, I needed to know what she was digging for.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

I particularly like the opening quote.

As suspected, Hierarch's Aspect he was using on the city is heavily situational.

What if Tyrant's planning on having Hierarch put both Above and Below on trial? Along with Bard and maybe the Dead King.

Gunslinger

Judgement the aspect vs the Choir of Judgement is going to be fascinating.

Also is it me or did Cat jump to the conclusion that Heirarch is mad enough to put the gods on trial too quickly?

HardcoreHeathen

"We are all of us free or we are none of us free," the Hierarch of the League of Free Cities said, voice like steel. "There is no middle ground. And for the lashes struck at our back, all will be called to account – if gallows must be raised for devils and angels alike, so be it."

If he's willing to Judge angels and devils, it's not a big step from them to the Gods.

stevenneiman

There's also the fact that the greatest authority on Above, Below, and the Bard called installing Anaxares a masterstroke that he managed to get past the Bard. But she hardly needs that evidence to figure out that he plans to judge the Gods when he did literally say it almost in so many words.

NerfContessa

Indeed.

The actual Co feontation was all it had promised, and the aftermath might even yet be more....

Euodiachloris

He makes the Had Hatter look both clean and balanced. He's busy being the centre of a mobile revolutionary Reign of Terror. Plus knowing that Keiros has stuck himself to this disaster on legs like glue and has been able to spit in Bard's eye, which means...

Yeah, it's not a leap in the dark.

Euodiachloris

Mad Hatter, even. Dunno how that typo happened. 😊

werafdsaew

But Below are subject to Bellerophon's laws because they're honorary citizens because they have 1 vote. The same is not true of Above.

Javvies

Below is, collectively, considered a citizen of Bellerophon (effectively).

The precedent is thus set that even the Gods are subject to and under the jurisdiction of Bellerophon's laws.

All are subject to the laws of Bellerophon, citizen or otherwise.

The Hierarch's judgy Aspect employs Bellerophon's legal practices, not those of where he is physically located.

stevenneiman

Bellerophon has no treaties or diplomatic immunity agreements with the Heavens. The Gods Above are presumably omnipresent. Ergo, they are committing Bellerophan crimes on Bellerophan soil by claiming to be better than others.

beleester

If you're a citizen of Bellerophon, you are subject to their laws and they can put you on trial. If you're not a citizen, you're a Wicked Foreign Despot and an Enemy of the People, so they'll put you on trial anyway.

2xMachina

No, forgo the trial.

As a non Citizen, you are automatically guilty, please proceed directly to the execution.

Do not pass through the court,
Do not collect $200.

luminiousblu

The key here is equality. NOBODY is higher or lesser than anyone else, titles be damned. Ironically, Hierarch is derived from Hierarchy, which literally means 'ranked system'.

Euodiachloris

He's a walking set of contradictions wrapped in paradoxes packaged as an enigma... all vaguely steered by a very definite troll.

There're a lot of reasons to treat him like a really horrible reality virus that could lock the entire network down until you cough up the Bitcoin and your grandmothers' maiden names. <_<

Wry Warudo

So Cat wants a well now. Is she going to lose an eye to drink from it?

Andrew Mitchell

I don't understand the well reference. I'm hoping someone can explain it.

Javvies

IIRC, in Norse Mythology Odin gave his eye to the Norns (Norse Fates) in order to drink from the Well of Mimir ... can't remember if I've got the name of the Well right. Gave him knowledge or foresight ...

Then Odin hung himself from Yggdrasil for a while for more knowledge/foresight/power.

I'm a bit fuzzier than I thought I was on my Norse mythology.

caoimhinh

I think it was actually Mimir that demanded Odin to sacrifice something if he wanted to drink from the well, and Odin proceeded to take his own eye and throw it into the well, so Mimir let him drink from it and obtain its wisdom. Later on, Odin is said to have found Mimir beheaded, and took his head to Asgard where he would put it next to the throne and use Necromancy to reanimate it and ask advice occasionally.

Javvies

I thought the Norns were in there somewhere ... might have been something about them guarding the Well ...

At least I was in the neighborhood, but damn, I really am past due to have myself a refresher on Norse mythology.

At any rate, I think it's more likely that Cat will try to toss Pilgrim down the well to contain him, rather than try to drink from it to gain wisdom (or anything else other than just a drink of water).

caoimhinh

They "came out" from (or possibly live in) a hall standing at the Well of Urðr or Well of Fate. That's one of the 3 water bodies at the roots of Yggdrasill, the other 2 are the Well of Mimir and the spring Hvergelmir. So your memory isn't that off.

I don't remember what the lesson about wells the Sister gave Cat was about, she mentioned it being the first, but I can't recall.

sengachi

He hung himself for poetry iirc.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

New headcanon: Odin as an edgy teen.

mavant

He hung himself for knowledge (names, runes, charms), half blinded himself for wisdom (via mimir). The poetry thing was from mead brewed by dwarves from the blood of Kvasir, which he just... Stole. Not a perfect pattern of three, there.

caoimhinh

Hey, I was doing a bit of reading on mythology and folklore; and found that traditionally the Leader of the Wild Hunt is associated with Odin. So Larat's lack of one eye has a bit more meaning, and Cat being Queen of the Hunt adds another Odin reference to the list. Hahaha

stevenneiman

Odin also has a pair of pet ravens named Huginn and Muninn, which travel all over the world and report what's going on to Odin, so the Night's ravens add to the joke.

caoimhinh

Now that we are on Odin's references, Cat had a wolf-like companion in her Name, which was a beast, similar to Odin's wolves Geri and Freki (Greedy and Ravenous), she had an undead winged unicorn from the Fae realm, which is the closest thing in the Guide to Odin's eight-legged horse Sleipnir. Now she is building her own Gungnir (which was Odin's spear) in her staff (which is a sword).

We can always find plenty of references if we stretch things enough XD

stevenneiman

I don't recall anything about a wolf on Cat's end, but she does have two ravens who tell her things.

caoimhinh

As I said, her Name was like a wolf, it was said many times by her. At first it was simply a beast with wolf-like grin, but when she met the first demon her name was shown to be like a wolf made of shadows.

werafdsaew

Maybe it's a well of power instead of a water well?

Someguy

>The night was still young – I knew that better than most – so we'd not wasted moonlight by lingering on the outskirts of the city until she finished.

Cat made a pun. First Under the Night and all that.

d0m1n1c

Not a pun; she was just noting that Night gives her power and knowledge over night.

icouldbeusingmytimebetterJoe

You the real way this series ends is the gnomes come out of nowhere and nuke the whole continent 🤔

haihappen

For which the Hierarch would put them on trial for "Gross Disturbance of Public Peace"

Euodiachloris

Given that they're gnomes, there's a chance that public decency would also get a goosing. Depending on which brand of gnome. 🤔

Skaddix

Seems like a good break point to shift to another character. I get the sneaky feeling that the Gods Below are going to use that 1 vote somehow.

luminiousblu

There's an annoying loophole.

- Time is a creational illusion, according to Warlock; past and future aren't really different.
- One vote is one vote, exactly.
- If you kill literally everyone, you have the only vote.
- Time is an illusion, so you can vote to make murder legal retroactively before you do it.

konstantinvoncarstein

It would be funny to see the betrayer "betrayed" by his own laws.

Anyway, it is more realistic than a mortal succeeding in judging Below. The powers of the Named applied only in Creation, and the Gods are by definition outside of it. I'm not sure if they would just ignore the whole thing, or blast the Hierarch to oblivion.

Decius

The gods are omnipresent, and so exist in creation as well as outside of it.

konstantinvoncarstein

So the Hierarch will be exterminatused:)

Andrew Mitchell

Very interesting discussion of the possible reasons/strategies in play for the Grey Pilgrim keeping Amadaus alive. I wonder if they've considered all the options or if there's another purpose at play.

Any ideas?

Aston Whiteman

Cats bad leg.

Liliet

They don't know he's antagonizing Cordelia in the process.

Which only makes this more confusing.

caoimhinh

They are making theories while lacking a lot of information, they don't even know Wekesa is dead yet, so I'm guessing the real discussion about what the Pilgrim is planning will have to wait until they meet with Scribe, which will have more information and allow them to paint a bigger picture of the situation.

IDKWhoitis

Anyone else wondering what Black is doing with all this off screen time?

Is he slowly driving Sword Saint insane? Thinking up witty one liners for when Cat/Ranger/Someone rescues him?

caoimhinh

Probably deciding what his new Name will be XD

Liliet

IKR

I want an interlude from where he is so badly ;u;

Gunslinger

If EE did donation bonuses on his patreon where we could vote for interludes it would be epic

Liliet

tbh revealing information is important to structure & narrative tension, it's not exactly something to leave up to the readers

theothin

Well, he's probably racking up head injuries, for one thing.

IDKWhoitis

I figure Grey may have had to separate Saint from Black after the 2nd incident. Although we can speculate that Black can probably still get under the other heroes' skin too.

Euodiachloris

Amadeus had "winding up the tight clocks" as a superpower even before became Squire. I bet he can get under her skin from ten miles away. XD

chris S

"Judgement," I said, honing in on what I considered the important kernel. "You think his aspect is bound to the concept. Stronger when he's standing in judgement, or inciting others to do the same."

Without trying to sound smug, I totally nailed it back in chapter 5 with my aspect prediction.

Antoninjohn

Maybe it's a typo and she was meant to say wall not well

MagnaMalusLupus

I doubt it. A wall is useful for defense, but a bunch of Mighty gathered together to create a source of power under a mage skilled in high arcana? That's a well of power alright. The question is what she'll do with it.

Gazing Rabbit

Possible Names for the person formerly known as the Black Knight? I would Name him The Arch-Strategos, or maybe The Black Atch-Strategos.

oliverwashere

Could the ritual that Dread Emperor Malignant iii is referring to be one to transform a man into an island?

Gagar

Oh shit

Didn't found next chapter button. I'm finally caught up.
Great story so far, thanks EE!

Adrian V

2 things: who else wants black to drop a "when can i see grandkids" joke to cat? An can someone understand the quote or why is there? i mean what hidden meaning or relation to the chapter this has? And what does a ritual have to do with the saying?

Javvies

"No man is an island" is also a saying used in reference to the human social need to have friends, family, and/or other social connections and interactions.

Bootmoon

It's of my theory that the gods whom created creation may not actually be the gods below and above, and that they too were wrought for it's working. With this assumed my calls for their death, which I have repeatedly from the beginning, now being attemptedly delivered it seems by mr Hierarch, may actually not result in creation ceasing to exist!

Or not, and I'm wrong, and this is the single greatest threat on the board should it even be possible.

I suppose they might, even if they are the true gods, just die and creation keep on spinning (if it in fact spins, I would guess so given it orbits the sun). Hard to say.

One does wonder about if free will in this context was the point or a pretext, given the presented nature of the debate/game, given the god's meddling, and the very notion of entangling all of this in fate driven story contrivance, kind of making it a mildly defunct philosophical exercise in many respects.

And then the question as to if the game is in fact rigged such that Evil always loses, or if it's actually a difference of strategy between above, trying to win every time, and below, biding time and power for only the greatest gambits.

Excited to find out! Or not, either is good.

Chapter 10: Capture

"The key to popular reign is to blame the previous ruler for your every blunder and claim ownership of their every success, while avoiding the opposite. As a sign of my abiding love for you, my son, I have simplified this process by leaving you to inherit only a large amount of blunders."

– Extract from the infamous 'Sensible Testament' of Basilea Chrysanthé of Nicae

We ran into the scouting party about half a bell before noon. Fifteen drow all wrapped up in furs, covering the grounds with admirable speed even though in the light of day they must feel half-blind. We saw them before they saw us, as this was a long way from the Everdark and it was a hard business keeping out of Archer's sight while on open field. I urged Zombie to pull ahead, leaving my Peerage and companions to catch up. I did not call on Night to sharpen my gaze, disinclined to begin exhausting my body when there might very well be trouble ahead. General Rumena was a veteran, though the host it commanded now had little to do with the once-professional armies of the Empire Ever Dark. More importantly, I'd sat on its councils when it tossed duties and responsibilities at sigils like one would toss a bone to a hungry dog. Aside from the weary contempt for the Mighty under its command it did not hide quite well enough, I'd taken note of how it usually disposed its scouts and lookouts.

We weren't close enough to have run into spotters keeping an eye on the back of the southern expedition, and these weren't spread out enough to hold that duty besides. They weren't numerous enough for a full-on scouting party, though, and that was what had me riding hard. Fifteen was plenty enough to have good odds the band wouldn't miss anything moving, and few enough they'd be able to travel fast. No a scouting party, no. But if I had to canvass a fairly broad region for a small group, I'd send one or two dozen of those groups in staggered order to get the job done. General Rumena, it seemed, was looking for us. Hailing the drow confirmed as much. They'd been sent by the Tomb-Maker with the suggestion that my group hurry, since events to our south were unfolding at an even quicker pace than I'd wagered they would. An attempt to infiltrate the camp had been made last night, and prisoners taken.

I bid the scouts – dzulu one and all, by the looks of them, from the Brezlej Sigil – to spread out and recall the other bands, waiting just long enough for the rest of my escort to catch up.

Akua and Indrani were the only ones in my company both curious and willing to ask answers of me. I indulged them willingly enough.

"The hornets are already out of the nest," I told. "Someone tried Rumena's camp. I'll be riding full tilt, I need eyes on this as soon as possible."

"We could gate," Diabolist suggested.

"I'm not lighting up a beacon of our location for everyone looking," I said, shaking my head. "Archer, don't spend your strength too much trying to keep up. If there's trouble I'll want you at the tip of the spear."

She slowly nodded and my gaze moved to Akua.

"My orders for you haven't changed," I said. "It'll have to wait until nightfall, but prepare the necessities."

"It will remove the Mighty of use from the field for days," Diabolist said. "It might be more sensible for me to serve on the field until the situation is less... delicate."

She was useful in a scrap, true enough. I still turned her down without a moment's hesitation.

"Make me a well," I calmly said. "That is your priority, bar none. There's no point in deploying you to wipe out a few companies if a week later we're caught unprepared by heroes and lose a hundred times that number. If you've time on your hands, assemble a schedule for the Mighty who will contribute. Take measurements, give me options. If you've still hours to waste after that, consult with the Sisters. We'll get only one shot at this, Diabolist: if we miss it's going to cost us something fierce."

She didn't argue any further after that. I suspected she rather wanted to, though there was no trace of it on her face, but she knew well enough by now not to push when my heels were fully dug in. Not that she knew why they were dug. I'd shared a lot of my suspicions with my companions, during our journey to catch up to the army, but not all of them. There were some I'd rather keep to myself until I had more information to go on. I rode on after that, straight south as the Brezlej scouts had told me. I kept to a quicker pace than them, on my latest Zombie, though that should be no surprise. I kept to a quicker pace than even riders whose skill made a mockery of mine simply because my horse would never tire. I was willing to damage the corpse a bit, if it got me there faster. It was a little past Afternoon Bell when I found the southern expedition's army. On the way I'd run into another band of scouts, which I sent out with the same duty as the Brezlej, and then three successive screens of lookouts. Rumena had tightened the watch now that we'd entered troubled waters, I noted with approval.

Andronike had flown away in silence long before I got anywhere near here, and I couldn't feel either her or her sister in the labyrinth of tents. There was a pulse I could barely make out further south, though. It sang to me, cool and comforting like a good night's sleep come autumn. I rode into the camp, noting this late most drow had wakened, and ran my gaze along Rumena's layout. It was a lost cause to get the southern expedition of the Empire Ever Dark to behave anything like a proper legion, with a carefully laid out camp and raised palisades before sundown, but since I'd left my general had forced some form of structure onto the chaos. Sigils raised their tents together, by the looks of it, with the larger ones on the edge of the broad circle the entire lot of them formed and the smaller ones filling that outline. Two clear paths, one facing north and the other south, had been cleared out – though I noted while riding down the northern one that it was hardly straight. Wobbly was a generous assessment, but it was already better than the utter lack of arrangements the drow had kept to until now.

Mighty Brezlej met me in advance, introducing itself as the appointed islne-ravce. It meant 'keeper under the glare of the sun', more or less, if I'd understood the emphases correctly. I took that to mean commander of the watch when it was daylight. Broadly muscled, short and a little thick around the waist the Mighty was strikingly unusual for a drow but I had no time to spare on the matter. I was informed that General Rumena was currently at a forward position, preparing a detachment to take the nearby town of Lancevilliers if it proved necessary.

"I was told there was an attempt to enter the camp," I said, staring down from atop my mount.

"That is so, Losara Queen," Mighty Brezlej agreed. "Twelve enemies, nine of which still live. They have been separated and we identified the one we believe to be the leader."

"You've interrogated them?" I asked.

"Though questions were asked, they have refused to answer them," the drow said. "It was spoken under Night that they should not be touched."

Brezlej murmured prayers under its breath after saying the last sentence, under my steady stare. Well, at least Rumena wasn't getting up to the torture of prisoners of war while my back was turned. Still, 'spoken under Night'. That meant one of the Sisters had meddled, which was unusual to say the least. Who'd be important enough for them to speak? Maybe some bold Proceran royal with spirit but little brains to match had decided to gild the family name by taking a look at the foreigners, I mused.

Prince Amadis was a cunning enough intriguer, but the Principate's royal bloodlines tended to be large and many-branched. If a tree bore enough apples, one of them was bound to be inbred enough to try sneaking up on drow at night. I ordered Mighty Brezlej to prepare a full report of the ways the situation had changed in my absence, and to send the Mighty Archer directly to me should she arrive. I would, meanwhile, be having a chat with the officer among our catches of the night.

Drow, sadly, were not used to taking prisoners – it was simply not the way they were used to waging warfare. Night was best harvested from corpses, and when it wasn't the insult was meant to be dealt to a living foe sent back into the wilds as a sign of contempt. That meant they had little experience holding captives, or raising structures to keep them. So far tents had been the makeshift solution, with the isolated prisoners tightly bound inside, but that wouldn't work forever. It was all well and good when we only had a few, but if a few companies laid down their arms we just wouldn't have enough spare tents to keep them. Four Soln dzulu were keeping guard at the corners of the tent where the officer awaited, looking bleary-eyed but attentive, and I met their deep bows with a nod before parting the flap and going in. I froze in surprise. Hanging down from the wooden frame holding up the dome-like tent of leather and linen, a small form was sleeping. I recognized regulation-issue undershirt, the skinny frame it was on and even the cast of the face covered in part by a too-large blindfold. Robber, I almost said, but then stopped. The leather and rope bindings were too loose to really keep someone from a race as flexible as his in place. And given goblin hearing, my entrance should have wakened him. So why was he still pretending to be asleep? A torturer wouldn't-

I rubbed the bridge of my nose and forced down a sigh. It was a good thing I hadn't walked further into the tent. Leaning against my staff, I crouched down to take a better look. Robber did not stir, but I felt him tense. Took me a bit, but I found what I was looking for. A thin, dull metal wire covered by snow leading up to a hook cleverly set into a sharper, barely peeking out from a pile of furs. No doubt the other end of the wire, which I couldn't see, was anchored solidly and the wire itself tensed for a hair-trigger. One step on it and the sharper would blow, then he'd pop out of the bindings while the enemy was stunned. Knife to the throat, and off he went to try his hand at a getaway. Drow clearly needed better schooling in looking for hidden armaments, I decided, if they'd missed both a knife and a sharper trap while stripping him. I pushed myself back to my feet, then carefully picked my angle and positioned my staff. With a quick hand I lobbed the sharper through an opening in the tent flap, calling out scatter in Crepuscular, and turned even as it blew in the muddy snow outside. I was a little impressed he tried to knife me without even taking off the blindfold or fully slipping the bindings, I'd admit. My Special Tribune had been keeping sharp.

Not sharp enough I didn't catch the wrist under the hand holding a slender blade, though.

"The wire's new," I mused. "Won't shine under light like the old stuff would, and something must have been done to make it more sensitive. Pickler's been busy, I see."

I grinned even as Robber went stiff as a board. I took a moment to yell out at the guards not to come in.

"Boss?" he hissed out.

"I'm not seeing a salute, Special Tribune," I mildly said. "Do you really want to find out what's below Lesser Lesser Footrest?"

The knife immediately went over his heart, which was the closest to an actual salute he'd given me in years, and deft green fingers hiked up his blindfold.

"Well I'll be damned," Special Tribune Robber said, large yellow eyes blinking. "It really is you. Wait, you could be an impostor. Tell me something only Catherine Foundling would know: what is my official salary as Lesser Footrest?"

"That I don't let Indrani put ribbons in your hair, you adorable little princess," I drawled.

"I don't even have hair," he complained. "And you know she'd glue on really coarse stuff just to spite me."

For all that he was leaning into the exchange, I did not miss the way his eyes flicked towards my bad leg and then towards my chest. Since I was pretty sure he wasn't looking at my tits – not that there'd been much to look at – that meant he was checking if I breathed.

"Leg's back," I agreeably told him. "So's the more-than-decorative breathing."

"There's actual colour to your cheeks, Boss," Robber bluntly said. "Like being out in the cold did something."

"That's a long story," I said.

"Did you murder another demigod?" he mused. "Does doing that twice, like, cancel it out?"

"Oh, stop hanging like a bloody gargoyle and put that knife away," I sighed.

My eyes narrowed as I remembered Mighty Brezlej's full summary of how he'd ended up here, though. I waited until he'd deftly landed in the snow and taken off the blindfold before pressing the subject.

"You tried to infiltrate the camp with just a tenth," I stated.

His mouth parted to reveal a short flash of hungry, needle-like teeth.

"That what the greyskins told you?" he said. "We only tried the outer perimeter, not the camp. Then it was all sorcery everywhere, and Sergeant Slicker's flesh melted off his bones. Another two of my crew reached for blades and they had holes in the head before they could draw."

I grimaced.

"Gods, Robber, what took you to even try?" I said. "Hakram and Vivienne knew where I was headed – it should have been envoys sent, not scouts."

"We didn't even know it was the drow," Robber admitted. "Just an army and not a small one. And there's been, uh, instructions from up top even if we run into the greys."

"Instructions," I repeated blandly.

He grimaced.

"We couldn't know if you were still alive, Boss," he said. "And if you were, that it'd be you in charge. And even if you looked in charge, that it was really you."

He paused, then squinted at me.

"You are in charge, yeah?" he asked.

"Some," I said. "It's an alliance with limits to it. But I've got the ear of the people running the show, you might say."

"Thank the fucking Gods," Robber muttered. "That you're back more than for the greys, I mean. This campaign is turning into a bastard mess, Boss. It'll be good to have your hand holding the reins again."

"Then you'll have answers," I flatly said. "About what Juniper's doing campaignin here in the first place. I distinctly remember leaving my army on the other side of the Whitecaps."

His lips quirked, sharp and mean.

"Well, Lady-Regent Dartwick got invited by our good friend the Prince of Iserre to 'clear out bandits and foreign agents from his lands', y'see," Robber told me.

My brow rose. I honestly couldn't imagine Vivienne willing to risk the Army of Callow at the say so of a Proceran prince, which likely meant Prince Amadis' arm had been twisted until he gave said invitation. Might not be Thief's notion at all, I decided. Hakram? What would he think we could gain from intervening here?

"What are we using Amadis as a pretence for?" I bluntly asked.

"Taking out the Carrion's Lord legions from here with a semblance of clean, the way I hear it," my Special Tribune said. "They were on the edge of a wipe, and no one wanted that. Plan was to prop him Amadis as a banner to force Procer to give us room, pop in, pick up Ol' One-Eye and his people then then pop out."

"By fairy gate," I slowly said.

Which meant either Masego was back, with a titled fae bound, or the Wild Hunt had not been freed of its oaths when Winter ended up in the Night's belly. That was a relief, to be frank. I was bound by oath to Larat aside from the Hunt's own terms – seven crowns and one, still to be delivered – but I'd not been sure that would be enough. The sooner I could have a good look at the fae the better.

"Yeah, the Hunt's been all darling since you sent them back," Robber said. "Which is suspicious as all Hells, if you ask me, but apparently putting that to verse and having a choir sing it to Marshal Juniper is 'reprehensible' and 'a flagrant breach of regulations'. I mean, it was only the middle of the night."

I smothered the smile, though not quite quickly enough for him to miss it. The humour waned, though, when I remembered what we were speaking about.

"But you're still here," I said, stating the obvious. "What happened?"

"We gated in just fine," the goblin said. "Ran into a League force two days in, but after they missed taking the Hellhound's head they mostly kept their distance. Made contact with Marshal Grem when the scrying block shut down for a bit-"

"The scrying block," I said. "Wait, more important – you can still scry sometimes?"

"It's like rolling dice," Robber said. "Kilian says the block is something massive already using the sky, but once in a while it looks elsewhere – then there's a short window where we can use the old rituals. And I do mean the old ones, Boss. Dunno if you noticed, but the Observatory went the way of an orc with the key to a liquor shop. No one can get it do to anything, and when we left Callow the pools were starting to evaporate."

I clenched my fingers. Shit. Someone had definitely targeted us, then. If it were just Iserre being screwed with I could put that to a ritual or miracle we ended stumbling into, but the Observatory wouldn't get in that bad a way if someone hadn't aimed for it. And just like that, Kairos was back in the running for the prick most likely to be responsible. It seemed very much like his kind of play – he might have planned the ritual in Iserre first, then gone after the Observatory because it'd allow my forces to bypass it. If there was anyone who wanted everyone in this principality blind, right now, it was the Tyrant of Helike.

"Marshal Grem," I said, setting that trail of thought aside for now. "He's also still in Iserre?"

"We tried to pull him out," the goblin told me. "The Levantines were starting to catch up when we arrived, too close to risk it, so the Hellhound had us gate in between their armies to force them to retreat. And it worked fine – the Legions gained a few days of lead while the Dominion got really angry at us being there. But then we tried to gate out, and on the other side was a godsdamned sea of boiling pitch."

My fingers tightened around my staff.

"That doesn't sound like Arcadia," I said.

"Best we can tell, it was one of the Hells," Robber snorted. "No one went in to check, you know, on account of the sea of boiling pitch."

"And it's all been leading there since?" I asked.

"Worse," the goblin said. "It changes. Mostly Hells, so far, but once in a blue moon we get Arcadia again – not that we can travel it, since no one's sure we'd be able to leave after entering. Hakram ordered an end to the attempts after we almost let out a horde of devils into the camp."

"What has Masego said?" I frowned.

"Shit," Robber said, eyeing me warily. "You haven't heard."

My stomach dropped.

"Tell me," I ordered.

"The Lord Warlock blew up Thalassina sky high trying to hold it against Ashur, himself included," the goblin told me. "Place is a graveyard, even those that fled got some sort of magic sickness and cacked it."

"Masego?" I softly asked.

"Word from Praes is the warlock's get made it out," Robber said.

I let out a shaky breath. Thank whatever Gods were listening for that.

"Empress had people looking for him, anyway," he continued. "No one knows where he is though. I know Deadhand and the general staff kept something about him under seal just before we gated for Procer, but I haven't managed to ferret it out yet."

"We'll find him," I grimly said.

His fathers were dead and he'd likely fled through the Wasteland alone with Malicia's agents hounding him every step of the way. He must be a wreck of grief and exhaustion, I thought. I didn't like this talk of magic sickness at all, either, considering he must not have been far from Thalassina when this all happened. I reluctantly forced myself to focus on more immediate concerns. There was little I could do for him right now, much as I hated to admit it.

"Juniper's stuck between the Levantine armies, then," I said. "Is she close? For that matter, is Marshal Grem backing her?"

Robber's wide eyes thinned with sudden alarm.

"I never reported back," he said. "Boss, we have a problem. If Nauk still thinks your greys are a Proceran army, then he won't leave his dug-in positions. Which means you're about to lose a quarter of the Army of Callow."

Well, I darkly thought, it had been that kind of a week so far. Why stop now?

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
Go vote!

Skaddix

So Cat finally finds about Masego.

And the Observatory did get targeted. Callow cannot gate. Meanwhile Scrying blocker has gone up. Wonder who is causing all that seems beyond what the Tyrant and Heirarch should have access and the Dead King is not exactly close by.

Liliet

Observatory might just be in tune enough with Masego and/or Winter to get metaphysical blowback from shit going down.

Jeffery Wells

Akua stated just after the Winter/Night merging that due to the way Winter has been used in the Observatory the transition should not have significantly affected it.

My understanding based on what Masego said while scrying in Thalassina is that Winter simply makes a better material for scrying, not that it supplies any power or other function. If so, the new Night should not be any different, and may even be better.

pagesbe

So in summary: It's a SNAFU.

Euodiachloris

Give it five. It could hit FUBAR.

Javvies

When it rains it pours.

I feel like Kairos is full of hax and bullshit, and he's pulling stuff off that shouldn't be remotely viable.

Skaddix

Yeah this all seems a bit beyond Kairos abilities. I mean taking out the Observatory with Masego gone sure. But a massive scrying block and shunting Gates to the Hells instead of Arcadia. That seems a bit beyond his wheelhouse unless he went out and recruited some new talent. Kairos ain't a spellcaster himself as far as we know and all this seems to require great expertise beyond just spamming his Aspect Wish which otherwise doesn't seem to have any limits at all.

Javvies

Spamming/abusing an Aspect like that is supposed to/should have side effects.

The only thing I can maybe thing of is that he might be using a combination of Aspect-spam and wildly abusing the concept of "first step always works" – and the latter has to have some limits applicable to it, otherwise somebody could have a step one be something like "exterminate the population, normal, Named and other, of Calernia" or "exterminate the dwarves" or "conquer the gnomes" and automatically succeed because it's their step one and step one always works.

Quin

It needs a good on the narrative and if you run into heroes your narrative gets replaced with their narrative. It's a tricky game to play, but if you know how to BS then you'd be surprised at what can be done... Like getting a bunch of people to somehow build and navigate a drill to attack a city from underneath or butchering countless virgins to have a hero slay a monster.

The art of BS is not an art one takes lightly or uses foolishly young soul.

konstantinvoncarstein

I doubt that even Warlock or Hierophant could do something like that.

Taichi22

Kairos is the kind of villain that pays off his debts later, not now.

It's quite possible he's doing all of this, and just telling the Gods Below to put it onto his tab. His credit is certainly good enough.

Miles

I'm pretty sure it was Cat. Night absorbed some of winter and the hell that night is tied to absorbed the part of Arcadia that Cat's slice of winter was tied to.

Similarly the water in the observatory was conjured from Arcadia

The scrying is probably one of Masego's Anti-proceran-scrying measures malfunctioning because of the observatory being messed up.

werafdsaew

I don't think it's him, because if it is there should be some foreshadowing about it.

IDKWhoitis

You don't think Robber is Robber or you don't think Kairos is responsible?

werafdsaew

I don't think Kairos is responsible. Assuming whatever responsible for taking scrying out of commission has been properly foreshadowed before, then the only thing that fits is the Angel Cordelia's dredging up

Decius

I think that both the Dead King and the Empress have enough established resources that they could interfere with static strategic elements of Callow with non-precise timing.

If it was a tactical assault gate that was diverted, or if scrying worked right up until the moment when it was really critical, that would require specific foreshadowing; but a general attack against a known strategic advantage doesn't need to be introduced before it happens.

caoimhinh

Well, Kairos has been pulling off stuff that shouldn't be feasible for him since the very beginning. Rituals of High Arcana, hacking Wekesa's scrying connection with Masego, making Anaxares Hierarch by force, feeling Hierarch's Aspect vision on him, having knowledge about stories matching that of the Bard, building great machines fueled by sorcery, etc. If the Tyrant had some assistant that's also a Named sorcerer like Warlock, that would make sense, but all being on account of the resources of Helike and his cunning, does not justify the things he has done so far.

That said, scrying over the entire sky to the point of blocking all other scrying and hacking the fae gates must be beyond him.

My guess is that it's the Dead King's doing. Despite the distance, Neshamah is one of the greatest sorcerers of all time and also has an army of undead Named both from Good and Evil and from all races which could assist him in any ritual he might perform, so he can pull off massive and absurd things like this.

Liliet

The gates to Arcadia most definitely suffered blowback from the Night/Winter merging.

Observatory likely got taken out either by that or by Masego's meltdown. Or both: one weakened, the other finished off.

The scrying though? That, yeah, is probably either Kairos or Cordy.

...or the heroes deciding to join in on fucking up everyone's day u\((-_-)\u

Fayhem

> The gates to Arcadia most definitely suffered blowback from the Night/Winter merging.

I mean, it's been established that the Wild Hunt can only open gates when Larat is leading them. Let's not rule out treacherous lieutenant getting his treachery on just yet.

Liliet

I don't think he could have opened gates to Hell previously 0.- or this would be a more known fae ability

Euodiachloris

That touch might be a certain lich king with a kind of sense of humour and way too much transdimensional knowledge in his little toe. Who had plenty of time to view (and meddle with) active fae linkages at work in front of him. shrugs

Fayhem

I mean we've never really gotten a breakdown of what all the known fae abilities are, but you're right that it would minimum be new information. Let's be honest though, it would be exactly like Larat to have a major ability that he could have used all along that he just never mentioned because nobody asked. Or heck, it could be a combo; the merger with Night changed what the fae bound to (previously bound to?) Cat could do, and Larat's capitalizing on that for good ol' fashioned treacherizing. Time will tell I imagine.

Liliet

True!

danh3107

Yay Robber's back, yaaaaaaaaaaaaay the whole crew is coming back!

Someguy

Then it turned out Ratface faked his death to ferret out the Eyes and other hostile agents in order to preserve the Callowan Economy from sabotage.

Big Brother

Man, I'm glad to see the little shit that is Robber. Nauk coming back soon is even better.

Darkening

Nauk's a little creepy these days. Good to see Robber though.

Helirous

"block is something massive already using the sky, but once in a while it looks elsewhere " pretty sure this is not kairos. by bet is on a angel of judgment or something else heavenly. i don't think anything else has this kind of presence and would be summoned at this point of time here

caoimhinh

Could be an Angel, since we know that there are at least 2 Choirs involved (Judgement with Hanno and Mercy with Pilgrim), the other option would be the Dead King, since Neshamah is a great sorcerer on his own and has many undead Named under his command that could be used for massive rituals.

The other option (albeit unlikely) would be Masego somehow screwing with the scrying due to his trance after witnessing a sliver of Divinity summoned by the priests and Wekesa's temporal apotheosis in Thalassina. He might be performing some ritual in order to get a read on the Gods or something along those lines.

Decius

Sounds like Creation has an audience. And sometimes it cuts to commercial.

Sylwoos

I would bet on Masego, he could be remotely using the observatory to extend his conscientiousness and disrupt everything in the process.

antoninjohn

Heroes interference behapse

IDKWhoitis

I know the Tyrant is always a possibility, but I like to blame old bastards, I think its Bard. She's pulling some meta story which forces Cat to get too busy to properly intervene.

This may be a delaying action more than anything, and she is likely using manipulation to get the Pilgrim to help out in this somehow. Or Cordelia has all the priests putting up anti-magic fields fearing that Callow's new army is here to kill her. Or the Old Witch of the Forest is blocking stuff.

Regardless of method, I think the intention to screw with Callow's movements, and by proxy Cat's. is the Bard's. Man, I can't wait until Cat fulfills her promise to knife the physical manifestation of Fate.

benthelynx

I'm leaning to the dead king myself.

IDKWhoitis

He seems awfully busy though, does he really have time to screw with Catherine?

Also, since he is more magically advanced, and can intercept (and potentially do worse) messages, the scrying block doesn't seem to make much strategic sense. Especially since Legions and Callow in Procer center will really screw with defenses he plans on overrunning anyways.

Although, if Dead King had a way to parachute corpses, or otherwise cause necromancy fuckery in Salia, he could want the backline to be clear of forces...

benthelynx

It may well not be aimed at Cat at all – there are a number of his enemies in that broad area

IDKWhoitis

There's no way this magic is cheap, especially over a large area at this intensity. I suspect there is a specific target.

Valkyria

Anyone speculating it's Masego who set up that block?

If it's unrelated to the observatory being out of commission of course.

Witnessing a real god and stuff has got to do something to his powers... Maybe he does not realize he's hindering his friends too... or does not care (probably being in an emotional crisis and all). Maybe he singled out someone he thinks is specifically to blame... so he's out for revenge or just generally creating havoc. How could he do that better than in this boiling pot of armies currently running around?

I'm not saying he would go against Cat and their allies, but maybe he thinks of the block as a minor inconvenience...

caoimhinh

Hmm, what if he is trying to scry on the Gods? Like, he witnessed both the descent of divinity and the ascension of his father to godhood for a moment, so Masego might be performing some ritual to get a read on them, which would explain the messed up state of the Observatory since the one with ultimate control of it is Hierophant.

It could also be that something is staring back at whatever Masego is doing. these hypotheses are interesting but my own guess is that it's Neshamah messing with them.

Valkyria

Yes it's most likely that he's responsible for all of that. But since most comments were either discussing him or maybe the tyrant as the culprit, I wanted to point out the wildcard Masego currently is.

Neshamah is more likely of course, since he's old, powerful and we have only the barest ideas of what he's actually capable of.

Also it would make more sense for him, whatever his agenda might be, since Masego never really had an established goal so far. Well except for studying and experimenting with magic.

That might have changed since the recent events though. Even if he's not responsible for the scry block and messing up the gates, that is something to keep in mind. If something changes your view of the world it's witnessing an actual god and ascension.

someguy

his father's ascension ? Wut !!????

Warlock was vaporized and Tikoloshe was dispersed back to hell.

caoimhinh

I don't mean that Wekesa is alive and currently a god. He is dead, yes, but Wekesa's became a god for a moment before his death and used that power for the last strike, which is why the entire fleet was vaporized and the city of Thalassina was destroyed beyond repair.

Remember:

[He reached out for it then, what they'd shown him. The barest glimpse of the godhead, but oh so gloriously full.

"Reflect," he whispered.

For a moment, for an eternity, Wekesa was unto a god.

He snapped his fingers and the world broke.]

From Interlude: Inheritance

muffin

"I never reported back," he said. "Boss, we have a problem. If Nauk still thinks your greys are a Proceran army, then he won't leave his dug-in positions. Which means you're about to lose a quarter of the Army of Callow."

Lose them to what?

Valkyria

„Juniper's stuck between the Levantine armies, then."

Well...probably to a pincer attack of those.

Akim

Thanks for the obvious Fan Service. I missed the little bundle of wickedness.

I also think that the Fairy Gate messup has to do with Warlocks dead since one of his aspects was to overlay something with a matching hell.

Or it is Masego Gate-Scrying all hells to find Tisholoke for which he sucked the Observatorium dry

Andrew Mitchell

"Or it is Masego Gate-Scrying all hells to find Tisholoke for which he sucked the Observatorium dry"

I very much like this idea!

Liliet

Masego knows better than that. I doubt he would be left unaware that 'Loshe died and didn't just flee.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh yes, Masego knows for sure Tokoloshe is dead. And he knows that he will respawn in hell without his binding and memories too. Maybe, just maybe, Masego has some ideas about finding Tokoloshe and restoring his binding and memories.

someguy

Maybe the cataclysm left an echo of Warlock and Tikoloshe in Arcadia.

Digitize27

Quote seemed very similar to the one about "I give you the greatest gift I can give to a new ruler: a universally reviled predecessor." Which was also a Nicae quote from the same source.

Vagrant

After reading through some of the comments I got this idea.

Scrying is impossible "cause something big is already in the air".

The wild hunt gates somehow all lead to hells instead of back to arcadia -> callow.

Maybe the evil equivalent of a choir at play here?

Could rationalize this idea with the symmetrical escalation Good&Evil seem to do a lot. And Cordelia was doing something with an angel corpse, right?

Liliet

Evil equivalents of angels are devils, as unorganized as they are. It's not a perfect symmetry bc the sides are very different.

Vagrant

Hm, maybe though, they gated in before the merge of winter&night and the gates now simply don't connect to arcadia anymore. If Cat, akua and or masego learn to choose the hell, they will be able to attack on the hidden horrors flank! For justice and friendship!

Quite possibly a cat

Something using the sky that looks elsewhere sometimes? Not sure what that could be. Maybe Bard? She would certainly want to keep an eye on the Tyrant. Although that would indicate a new level of blatantly interfering for Bard.

On an unrelated note, isn't there an Absence Demon wandering around? I don't think that's the scrying block, but it could have damaged something important for the Observatory.

The Tyrant might have blasted the Observatory too.

What could be screwing with the Arcadia gates though?

Liliet

The absence demon most definitely got killed by heroes under Grey and Saint's command during the Northern Crusade campaign.

Berder

It hadn't occurred to me until now, but Masego has been through a magical cataclysm, and didn't he still have some little bit of demonic essence contained in his arm? Wonder if he's been corrupted, or if that might even be the "magical sickness" killing Thalassinians.

Javvies

Masego used the Corruption Demon essence/ichor at Second Liesse, against the demons called up by the defenders and their summoners/controllers in the outer defenses.

That should have used all of it, and if his countermeasures against it had failed while he still had it, exposure and the subsequent symptoms likely would not have been subtle enough to hide, certainly not for the years it's been since then.

soma

No one going to mention that vivi became Cat's Callowan Chancellor? Lady-Regent in caps?

Andrew Mitchell

I think it's probably a title (like First Prince) rather than a name (like Black Knight)... But I hope I'm wrong.

Viv transitioning to a new name would be quite an exciting development and a good thing for Callow.

benthelynx

A chancellor name though? Those don't tend to be good for almost anyone involved

Andrew Mitchell

No, almost certainly not IM0. Callow is not Praes

benthelynx

Even so, the names draw from stories (both stories in our world and theirs) and there aren't many on either side that would work with that narrative. Callow also knows many of the praes stories.

someguy

Now I'm hoping Robber joins Night's budding religion to increase his longevity.

Chapter 11: Forced March

"A hundred battles, even victories, will always lose you the war."

– Theodosius the Unconquered, Tyrant of Helike

When I'd been told that General Rumena was at a forward position, in my mind's eye I'd envisioned a Legion outpost: neat palisade with a dry moat in front, raised tower to serve as a better vantage point. Stone for everything instead, if it was meant to be a long-term outpost and funds allowed. I should have known better, by now, to expect more than a pack of tents and heavy screens of scouts.

"Your people are sloppy, Boss," Robber said. "Nettles me a bit they caught my boys at all."

The tone had been casual and the words mild, which was a telltale sign he was considering knifing a few drow to even scales the goblin way – which was to say, inflicting twice as many wounds as you'd received and then rubbing dirt in to make sure infection took. I might have taken it as face value, the posturing and the easy cutting lines, if I hadn't seen him raw after losing people right before the beginning of the Battle of Three Hills. For all that Robber liked to put himself up as a goblin's goblin, much like me he'd never quite learned how to make losses stop bruising. Juniper had always disapproved of that. Soldiers died, and it should not be taken lightly or misused but that was the nature of being a soldier. She'd always had the knack for keeping it distant. There were some people who had that in them, I supposed – Hakram did, and once upon a time Ratface had as well. Akua acted as if she belonged among those, but sometimes I did wonder. Is that who you are, or what you trained yourself to be? I didn't turn around to look at him where he sat side-saddle on my horse, all bunched up behind me, but I pitched my voice to be well understood.

"I'm not happy some of ours got killed, Robber," I said. "But there will be none of that. Like it or not, you came in quiet and ran into a watch that acted exactly as a watch should."

"They don't see so well in the day, though," the goblin mildly said.

"About as well as humans," I said, then dipped my tone towards a warning. "And I could warn you they've got entities behind them the sun doesn't blind but I won't have to, will I? Because I gave you an order."

His teeth clicked softly as his mouth shut. He wasn't happy about this – neither was I, even though I knew the fault did not lie on the side of the drow – but he knew better than to push.

Legionaries baring blades on drow was the very last thing I needed right now. As Special Tribune, the goblin had the standing to sit in on most war councils: he knew better than most how precarious the situation was for the Army of Callow right now. Juniper had done well, in all fairness. Being stuck between two hostile armies that together made up near the double of your forces was no easy mess to squeak out of, if the enemy generals weren't fools. And they were not, in this case. But her carefully laid plans had failed to account for one of the madmen on the stage, and now a crippling blow was coming. If we didn't move fast enough to prevent it, anyway, which was the opposite of my intention. We'd get there in time even if I had to march the drow until they collapsed. I had absolutely no intention of losing ten thousand legionaries and the general that was the finest vanguard in Callow bar none.

There'd been a time where I would have been more effusive in describing Nauk, but the man under assault to the south wasn't the same one I'd shared meals and fires with. If anything, the occasional similarities made the whole situation more disturbing – they put in relief everything that had changed when the Warlock had 'healed' him. I might not have to stay this way, I thought. Hope was always dangerous, but the thought refused to leave me. Warlock, for all his power and learning, had been a mage. Healing was an academic matter to them, a thing of physicality and measured energies. Most of what Summer's fire had taken from Nauk was not anything the Sovereign of the Red Skies could bring back. I was no mage, and the more I learned the more I realized the endless depths of what I did not know. But these days I had goddesses at my back, and miracles in my hands. What sorcery had failed to return might not be beyond the reach of the Night. Winter had been match for Summer, hadn't it? And Winter had been consumed. But hope was dangerous, and so I had kept my own council.

I rode into the camp at a brisk pace, having barely slowed from the gallop that brought me there, and ignored Robber's malicious cackle at the splashes of muddy snow that drenched warriors too slow in getting out of my way. There was no missing where General Rumena itself would be: at the heart of the camp, within a tall pavilion, twin heartbeats of power whispered to me. The Sisters had known of my coming for some time, though conversation was difficult if we strayed too far from each other. They should have felt the urgency of my purpose, though, and Komena at least had served as a high-ranking officer many years ago. Between her and Rumena, I was not beyond hope that the six sigils whose banners I'd spied had prepared for immediate advance upon my arrival. I reined in Zombie with a thought when we arrived in front of the pavilion, sending a shiver of Night down my bad leg to make leaping down into the snow tolerable. It would ache later, I knew, but what patience I had left was better spent on other matters. Special Tribune Robber followed suit in his freshly-cleaned leathers and mail, shortsword at his side and crossbow at his back. The sapper's bag hanging off his other side was still full, the drow not having bothered to paw at the munitions after making sure there were no maps or papers.

The goblin swaggered at my side as I entered the tent, baring his needle-like teeth at every warrior eyeing him. Well, he wasn't one of the candidates I'd had in mind when I'd considered how to establish friendly ties between Callowan forces and the southern expedition. Maybe I should even consider this a good thing, I mused. The sooner the drow learned that trifling with goblins tended to end up in bear traps and mocking laughter the better, and who could get that point across faster than Robber? The war council awaiting me inside had few familiar faces aside from Rumena's, as it turned out. Mighty Jindrich was the only one I knew even remotely – he'd apparently survived the mess in Great Strycht largely on account of being too angry to die – though names were hardly impossible to know considering their sigils spelled them out. Room had been left at the low table of obsidian and granite for me to join them down on the carpet, but instead of moving to do so I cast a look around. In the shadows of the upper pavilion I caught sight of a pair of crows. Their dark eyes rested on me, but they did not speak either in thoughts or words. The Sisters, it seemed, were currently disinclined to meddle. From the corner of my eye I caught Robber looking exactly where I was, though from the way his gaze swept over the goddesses without slowing I suspected he'd not been allowed to glimpse anything.

"General Rumena," I greeted, leaning on my staff. "Many Mighty. At my side stands Special Tribune Robber, an officer in my service. He will be seated with us for this conversation."

A few of the Mighty seemed displeased, but they stowed that away when my stare moved towards them. There was a reluctant bit of shuffling about until room for two was made. The sole goblin present's amused smirk was a nearly physical thing. He might not speak Crepuscular, but he knew how to read a room.

"Losara Queen, First Under the Night," General Rumena pleasantly greeted me in Crepuscular. "And... company. Please, claim seat at this table."

"Our nice drow friends invited you to sit, Robber," I translated in a mild tone. "And you're going to be nice to them in return, aren't you?"

"I will offer them every diplomatic courtesy you've taught me, Boss," he smoothly agreed.

Well, there had to be at least one or two of those. Right? Not willing to take the plunge of thinking too deep about that, I sat myself down at the table and silently declined an offer of rodleva. While a few of the drow were sipping at polished cups of the brownish, warm mixture I'd never taken to it. That it involved butter made from the milk of a creature that looked cousin to a lizard would have put me off even if the liquid didn't smell like cheese sent to the gallows and left for a week under the sun. Given the finer nose of goblins, no doubt Robber was taking it as torture.

"I won't waste time on idle talk, given the situation," I said. "I've had a fresh report from the Special Tribune including the location of an army in my service that it less than a day's march from here. I assume our scouts have already found it?"

Rumena inclined its head.

"That and more," it replied. "There is a force of horse-riders in the area that has been hunting our warriors."

I frowned. If the Dominion already had cavalry this far behind Nauk's back, his situation was worse than I'd been given to understand.

"Levantines?" I said.

"They do not bear the sigils as drawn by the Mighty Shade," Rumena said.

Akua had used charcoal and skins to draw everything she remembered of Levantine heraldry, which was largely the great bloodlines but still much better than the previous nothing we'd had. I flicked at a glance at Robber, who was currently engaged in a staring contest with a very pleased Mighty Jindrich.

"Special Tribune," I said. "When you left, did the Dominion have cavalry at the army's back?"

The goblin let out a whistling breath.

"No," he said. "But it might not be them, Your Majestic Terribleness. The riders, did they have bows?"

I almost translated for Rumena, until I remembered it spoke Lower Miezan just fine. It nodded when I met its eyes.

"Helike cataphracts," I said. "Shit."

I'd had a conversation with Juniper, once, about which Calernian cavalry was the finest. It'd been the knights of Callow in my eyes, of course, and the Hellhound had conceded that on open field and charging that was the case. She'd noted, though, that there was one other mounted force on the continent that would be able to take my countrymen apart. Helikean kataphractoi were more lightly armoured, as a rule, and unlike Callowan horse rarely used lances. They were, however, exceedingly well-trained in the use of curved bows meant to be used while mounted. There'd been no war between the League and Callow that would see the two forces conflict, and Helike as a city-state certainly couldn't afford to field as many cataphracts as there'd been knights in the heyday of Callowan chivalric orders. But with matched numbers, Juniper had been of the opinion that given room to manoeuvre the Helikean horsemen would be able to slowly whittle away at Callowan heavy horse while taking minimal losses. And considering no other army on Calernia fielded mounted archers, there was no mistaking these for anyone else no matter the banner.

"Let me guess," I sighed. "Less than four thousand overall, no infantry with them?"

"That is so," General Rumena agreed.

Well, there was the rest of the Tyrant's army. I'd suspected it wasn't the full muster back in Rochelant, but I'd expected what remained to stay with the the League's armies. Silly me, not anticipating Kairos would send his city's entire cavalry contingent to stir up the pot as much as physically possible.

"All the more reason to link up with General Nauk's forces," I finally said. "If we want to drive them off on foot, we'll need Callowan crossbow companies."

Come night, it was true, a few packs of Mighty could probably tear through the Tyrant's horsemen. But then somehow I doubted they'd risk that. They'd raid during the day, harass the expedition and retreat before a counterattack could be mounted. The drow didn't have proper companies, after all, they had tribes. Some of those had archers and javelinmen, but getting a cohesive volley fired at the cataphracts would take too long – unless we took all the archers out of their sigils and made companies of them, which would be difficult. Not even a year ago most of these people had been at each other's throats, and they weren't used to taking commands from anyone but their own Mighty. Who'd be quite infuriated at having their warriors taken from their command, besides. I could see it done, of course. I had the Sisters at my back and General Rumena commanded respect from all but the most stubborn. But they weren't trained to fight this way, and I was wary of eroding my goddess-given authority by using it too much. It was one thing to follow a high priestess to war against the contemptible surface peoples after the enterprise was blessed by the Night itself, another to remain all nice and supportive when said high priestess started chipping away at your subordinates. Proof, I supposed, that not even open divine favour was enough to get me out of fucking politics.

I needed the Mighty supportive, if I was to get steer this war to the right kind of ending.

"How soon can we set out?" I asked.

"Seven pridnis," Genera Rumena replied without missing a beat. "Though we number only six thousand, Losara Queen. Fighting under pale light will carry risks."

About two hours, I thought. We still had most of the afternoon until the sun set, but we wouldn't get there today so that wasn't what he meant. Our destination was past the town of Lancevilliers to the south. Even accounting for the second wind the drow would get after nightfall, the lethargy coming with dawn meant we wouldn't be able to both arrive at Nauk's position in Sarcella and be in fighting fit before at least Noon Bell. Unless I used a gate, which would get us there in hours but also light up the destination for anyone looking. I wasn't ready for the Saint and the Pilgrim quite yet – if I drew them to that battle, I might just end up losing more than just the ten thousand under Nauk.

"We'll have to regardless," I said. "I ordered Mighty Breznej to send reinforcements our way before leaving, but we can't afford to wait for them. Send back runner with an order to catch up as fast as they can, with a warning about the Helikeans."

In a silent flutter the crows landed on my shoulders, and there was no further talk after that. Open divine favour, I mused, did have its perks.

—

We got to Lancevilliers before nightfall, not that it made much of a difference. The town was half-empty and there was no one in there remotely inclined to get in the way of an army. I would have preferred to avoid Proceran eyes entirely, but even a snowed-in road made for a quicker march than the countryside. I left behind a hundred drow led by Mighty Sudone to – gently, I made very clear – interrogate the locals for anything they might now. The southern expedition itself had standing orders not to lay a hand on anyone but soldiers unless they were attacked, and to refrain from looting. The first one had been a hard sell, though the second surprisingly not. The Firstborn were amusingly skeptical that anything of human make could ever rival the works of their own kind, and centuries of barter economy meant they put little stock in silver and gold. Furniture and furs turned out to be the main temptations: both wood and furred creatures were a rarity underground. I'd leaned on Rumena to allow for supply requests to be lodged with the Mighty when it came to furs, given the weather, but for the furniture I had no sympathy. We weren't going to start dragging around nice Alamans bureaux anytime soon, no matter how nice they looked in tents. I'd also laid down a rule against rape, though that'd mostly been a formality. Drow hardly even slept with their own kind, sexual interest in humans was nonexistent.

Ivah had once informed me that its kind considered the most visible characteristics associated with men and women – beards, breasts – to be somewhat vulgar. It had said that in a tone implying it was paying me a compliment, which when I'd grasped why had achieved something of the opposite effect. Sadly, Archer had yet to tire of talking about it.

Our pace significantly quickened after dusk, even dzulu moving at a pace Robber found impressive. Well he'd compared them to goblins, anyway, which in his eyes probably counted as a compliment. Not many non-goblins would agree, I suspected. Mighty Sudone and its hundred caught up a few hours in, bearing wild rumours but nothing of any real use. I used our time to brief General Rumena and its cadre of sigil-holders on the military happenings of the last few months in Iserre as related to me by Robber. How the Army of Callow had ended up stuck between two hosts of forty thousand Levantines I covered only the broad strokes of, focusing on their current inability to gate out. What had followed was, in essence, my marshal trying to pull the wool over the eyes of the enemy commanders and partially succeeding. The Dominion had moved to crush Juniper, the army to the north throwing a delaying force in the way of Grem's legions before sending the rest of its number after her own forty thousand legionaries. The southern Levantines had not bothered with such subtlety, marching in full battle array towards the Army of Callow. The idea was, by the looks of it, to end the Callowan army before turning against the other forces in the principality: Grem and the League. The Hellhound wasn't that easy to end, though. She'd decisively marched south and forced a minor battle against the lower Levantine army before she could be stuck in a pincer.

Reluctant to risk an all-out battle before the northern reinforcement arrived and their numbers grew overwhelming, the southern Levantines had given ground after the day's battle. My soldiers did have something of a reputation, when it came to facing rough odds – and the Levantines had not boasted that. Juniper had then split the Army of Callow into four columns of ten thousand and fled under cover of night. Two columns had gone eastwards, to slip around the northern Levantines, while the remaining two had gone westwards and made sure they were loud about it. One of those columns was under General Nauk, the other General Bagram. The latter had taken a moment to place – he was an orc, once General Istrid's second-in-command. Until recently he'd been tasked with holding Summerholm, but evidently he was moving up in the world. Nauk had been tasked with baiting the southern Levantines into following him, while General Bagram was to serve as reserve and guard his back in case the northern army wanted to try assaulting the western columns. It was classic Juniper, I thought when Robber first told me about it. Depending on enemy action, she could redeploy and put the hurt to them however she wanted.

If the northern Levantines went after the Hellhound's two columns, she only had to keep them marching until Grem's force could hit them in the back and the pincer manoeuvre became Callow's. If they continued marching to join up with their southern comrades, the four columns would escape the noose and join up with Grem's host. If the southern Levantines went after Nauk and Bagram, they'd be led in a merry chase until Juniper and Grem came down south together to relieve the western columns. If they marched east or north, instead, once again the four columns escaped disaster and linked up in northern Iserre. It'd seemed to work, at first. The last Robber had heard of the eastern columns, they had the northern Levantines after them. The problem had come when Nauk's column was hit from the back even as the southern Levantines came after them. Helikean cavalry had ambushed his rearguard, slowing his advance just long enough for the Levantines to gain grounds and begin their own cavalry raids. Messages from General Bagram had ceased, presumably because cataphracts were killing the messengers, and his column had never come to reinforce Nauk's. What followed was a ragged retreat, eventually tumbling into the minor city of Sarcella which fell to the column without a fight.

Sarcella had no walls, most its people had fled because of the roving armies in the region and the city garrison had apparently 'retreated towards a more defensible position' the moment they saw an enemy host approaching. Knowing he was in a bad position, Nauk had raised field fortifications in Sarcella and held the grounds against a probing attack by a Levantine vanguard of around sixteen thousand – which didn't want to commit to more before the full forty thousand were there. He'd planned to start the retreat once more after forcing an opening, but rumours of a large force marching towards his back had forced him to delay and send scouts lest he blunder into a battle he could not win. Said force was my drow, which was biting irony. Taking reinforcements for foes might very well see a quarter of the Army of Callow slain in the heartlands of Procer.

There were still things unaccounted for. No one knew where the Hells the column under General Bagram was. I doubted even Helike cataphracts could tie down two forces over twice their size, but the Tyrant might have more tricks up his sleeve. I'd been inclined to think that between reports of my drow army – an unknown – and the kataphractoi it might just be that General Bagram had written off Nauk's column as done for and begun full retreat, but Robber had given me the first bit of good news in a while when explaining why that was unlikely. Adjutant was with the column, nominally as an observer but in fact because he was keeping an eye on the two western columns. Tyrant or not, I'd put my faith in Hakram coming through. If he wasn't backing up Nauk there was a good reason for it. That, or he was on his way already. Gods, let it be the second. Even assuming Nauk's forces hadn't been mauled too badly holding Sarcella against a second assault, I was only bringing six thousand drow as reinforcements. And one goblin, I supposed. None of us could be sure whether or not the entire Dominion force of forty thousand had arrived yet, or if it was still only the vanguard, but if it had... Well, under the light of day the Firstborn were disorganized light infantry with poor armour and disparate weaponry. Six thousand of those in addition to what remained of Nauk's army might not be enough to see us through to the night and the accompanying swing of the balance.

Dawn cost us four hours, to my seething impatience, but I used the time to nap and get my hands on a decent steel longsword. I'd fed my sword-within-the-staff throughout the night, but I had no intention of using it yet. I could wield it as a staff, but polearms were hardly my specialty and I was a lot more fragile than I used to be. Best to put the odds on my side in every way. We moved out the moment it was physically possible to, and by Morning Bell we could see Sarcella.

It was hard to miss it, what with the way it was on fire.

DroughtBringer

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

NerfGlastigUaine

Hey so this is completely unrelated to the current chapter, but does anyone know what "Miezan" means? Nearly every significant name in this verse has a significant meaning, but I can't find one for Miezan.

danh3107

The Miezens were not!romans who sailed from another continent and enslaved a good portion of Calerina. Lower Miezan is the primary language of callow and one of the ones Praes uses. The Miezens enslaved all of Praes and brought over Ogres and superior magic.

Javvies

I think the question was more about the real world origin/source of the name "Miezan".
And for that, I've got nothing.

Sean

Given that the sappers of the Malazan Empire were an inspiration for the integration of goblin munitions into the Praes and Callowan armies. I wouldn't be surprised if the "Miezan" were a bit of a nod towards Malazan Book of the Fallen.

Lark

It might be a reference to Mieza [1], where Aristotle taught Alexander the Great.

[1] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mieza,_Macedonia

NZPIEFACE

"Aristotle taught Alexander the Great."

holy shit, what?

caoimhinh

That's a pretty famous bit of history. The king of Macedonia had Aristotle teach young Alexander (who was around 13 at the time) in exchange for rebuilding Aristotle's hometown, until he was 16. It's also said that Aristotle was a big influence on Alexander's future conquering campaigns.

Alexander the Great was awesome in every aspect of his life, apparently XD

Drock

well not at ruling or building a lasting empire

Bhale

Except ruling as far as I recall. He was on a roll for some time, conquering western Asia, but when he was finally defeated by India with its elephants, he fell to drinking, gambling and whoring around (both genders).
When he died, his entire empire was divided among his subordinates who actually ruled the empire, although in regions.

Which reminds me, when are there gonna be elephant riders in PGtE??

caoimhinh

Ehmm... Not really, He didn't lose in India, his own army mutinied because they were tired of the long years of campaign and because he was adopting too many of the Persian customs.

They demanded and convinced him to return to Macedon after a series of victories in India, where he even founded 2 cities (Bucephalus and Nicaea), Alexander died on the way back, after a series of fights and another mutiny turmoil within his own armies.

The account of Alexander spending his last days drinking and fucking is said to be because the death of his best friend (who some modern people think was his possible lover) who fell ill likely to poison and died a few days before Alexander's own poisoning.

Elephants riders are in another continent, I bet, likely used by Indrani's people XD

Javvies

...
Kairos is seriously full of hax and bullshit.
And what the heck is he even after that he's pissing off everybody?

—
—

This bodes poorly.

crysja1

The fact we don't know means it'll be something impressive.

ByVectron!

I thought that Cat and Kairos were pretending to be friendly? Wouldn't she be able to reach out and ask, "Hey, would you mind NOT chasing my Callowan army for a bit?"

theothin

No, see, they have a secret alliance so they have to pretend to NOT be friendly. So this is obviously necessary to sell the ruse.

Taltos Dreamer

I am certain The Tyrant would listen studiously. He would explain this grave error will be rectified immediately! Tgen double the troops chasing her army.

Twigsssss

Like Black, the tyrant wants to fight the gods and the enslavement caused by the stories. But unlike black, who fights the gods with logic and meticulous plans, the tyrant fights with chaos.

We've already seen him do things that appear to be crazy but actually totally make sense if you understand how the shape of stories affect this world. For example the first step of a villains plan always works so he repeatedly would start a new plan, do the first step, and then abandon it for yet another plan.

And recently we just found out one of his major objectives is to defeat the bard. I think for this particular goal he and Cat really are in alignment.

danh3107

Yay the berserker guy lived too!

Also, Ivah calling Cat flat as a compliment is incredibly amusing to me.

Someguy

She's gonna be blamed for the "Burning of Sarcella" as per the usual.

Euodiachloris

Yup. After all, it's quite solidly tangentially related. Ish.

IDKWhoitis

Place your bets ladies and gentlemen, what color will the flames become once Cat starts fighting?

1:6 Stay the same

1:3 Black

2:1 Green

I personally expect Green with flashes of White and Black.

HardcoreHeathen

"Ivah had once informed me that its kind considered the most visible characteristics associated with men and women – beards, breasts – to be somewhat vulgar. It had said that in a tone implying it was paying me a compliment, which when I'd grasped why had achieved something of the opposite effect. Sadly, Archer had yet to tire of talking about it."

Do you understand the importance of this?

Hanno can't defeat her. He serves the Choir of Justice, and Justice will never allow it, because...

FLAT IS JUSTICE

caoimhinh

She is not a Loli, she can't lay claim to that power!

LMAO.

Valkyria

I really want Cat to slam open the metaphorical door and tell them: Guess who's back, b*es!
Followed by slapping the enemies with Night bullshittery so hard they don't know right from left anymore.

The whole informative chapters were pretty cool, dotted with the occasional bit of banter and sarcasm... And also important, showing progress and setting the mood for the current situation... but I do miss the good old days of reckless battles against all odds and the badass moves.

agesbe

It's daytime, so while she does have access to Night, not nearly as much and thus she's unlikely to lead with a massive AoE attack.

Valkyria

I know that. I just said I want her to, not that it's likely. She also does not have as much power to throw around like she had back with winter. So it's not gonna happen anyways. Doesn't change the fact that I would love seeing that.

Sean

I'm not sure insofar as absolute limits go, but on average I would think she should be able to call down more power now that she has Sve Noc to filter the principle alienation.

Valkyria

I think it's less about the alienation than the thing that she's human again. Using that much power takes a toll on her, so she isn't able to utilize as much power as back when she was some sort of winter construct.

It was even mentioned that it now cost her something to call on the power of Night. Meaning she can't use it as reckless anymore and has to think carefully about how to spend her resources.

I think that's also why Akua is supposed to make her "a well" to draw from in which her might pour their Night. It will increase Cat's power without her spending all herself. Only a guess though.

Liliet

I'm not sure how it compares to alienation though. I think Cat can use more now than she could back before she had Akua (and later also the drow) drawing principle alienation away from her.

werafdsaew

No discussions on what is blocking their scrying? Sve Noc must have some idea

Valkyria

I guess the rescue mission is more important right now, since at the moment there's not much they can do about the block, even if they knew who the culprit was. And when they're going to act, more people for the cause is always better than less.

Lavir

Obviously the heroes or a choir, I put my money on the Grey Pilgrim.

Taltos Dreamer

I suspect it's Masego himself...seething with rage and dealing with a glimpse of the true nature of Below. Also possibly either infected with or the source of the "magic plague" we heard about affecting those who were there.

Skaddix

I mean Masego is nowhere close so it makes no sense he be blocking Scrying in Procer when he is still running through Praes.

Taltos Dreamer

I dislike the phrase "makes no sense" because it usually means you just didnt see it from a particular direction...

It said "something is using the sky." That sounds like heavy duty scrying to me. The kind of thing Masego could likely do...use the observatory at a distance.

Which would probably do weird things, like affecting the scrying ability of those he is watching and make the observatory scrying pools, idk, evaporate?

Antoninjohn

The Night is dark and full of terrors

Not a robot

“largely on account of being too angry to die”

So Mighty Jindrich is Doomguy confirmés, right?

RanVor

Not really related to the chapter, but it occurred to me that I'd like to know more about Theodosius the Unconquered. He seems to be an awesome character.

Adrian V

Who else thinks the city on fire will end up being compared to Nauk learning from her? For that matter maybe it has something to do with him thinking “now what would Cat do?” xD

pagesbe

It's just occurred to me that the Drow... aren't nearly as scary as they seem on paper, on their own. They're basically an army of Named, with their leaders being high-tier Named level, but only at night. During the day, they're rather unimpressive, and their lethargy at dawn is an enormous weakness. Any commander worth their salt who knows this about the Drow (and it's easy to figure it out) will only engage during the day, and when it is day, they'll press as hard as they can (like right at Dawn, for example).

That said, when supported by not-Drow, their biggest weaknesses become not quite as big.

RanVor

And it only occurred to you now?...

Viconr

Missed k in last word in

“I left behind a hundred drow led by Mighty Sudone to – gently, I made very clear – interrogate the locals for anything they might now. “

HardcoreHeathen

I love Ciaphas Cain, so I'm happy to keep seeing more of Abigail.

I wonder if we'll get to see a scene of her and Cat interacting in a non-professional manner. I don't really feel like Cat has made any new non-Named friends since the War College.

HardcoreHeathen

Woops; this was supposed to be on the other chapter.

Screwfloss

Why is she feeding her sword-within-the-staff? What was she feeding it? Is it an animal? Has it been mentioned before?

Screwfloss

I remember the staff, just not her feeding it. There are so many typos in this story that it's impossible to guess whether the author really meant to say "fed" or whether it was a typo for something else.

Chapter 12: Relief

"After Isabella the Mad was appointed to the command of the hosts of Procer to turn back the forces of the Tyrant Theodosius, the First Prince asked of her when she expected the war to be brought to a successful conclusion. 'It should take,' she famously replied, 'about a hundred battles.'"

– Extract from 'The Banquet of Follies, or, A Comprehensive History of the First League War' by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

It was around half an hour before Noon Bell that we got close enough to Sarcella to get a decent idea of what was happening inside. Well, aside from the fire. That one had been pretty obvious even from miles away, which in my surprisingly extensive experience of setting fire to things wasn't a good sign for the people in the area. As it turned out the city of Sarcella itself was, well, almost offensively Proceran. How anyone could bother to shell out coin for an elaborate ring of ogre-tall statues and arches around their city but not a proper curtain wall was beyond me. Oh, sure, whoever that tall bald man in furs with a sword was might be nicer to look at on a sunny day, but that was the kind of thinking that got you invaded by the Legions of Terror. The damned things were granite, too, which I vaguely remembered being one of the cheaper stones floating around Principate markets. Bastards hadn't even been able to afford marble or limestone, had they? There was still a tax on granite back from the days of House Fairfax, I was pretty sure, though it wouldn't have been applied in over forty years – trade with Procer had understandably hit something of a low point after the Conquest. I supposed the saving grace of the whole affair was that granite statues would at least take more than a single glancing trebuchet shot before breaking.

Still, for all that at least Sarcella was slightly more defensible than I'd expected. It'd been raised on a few lazily-sloped hills, so there was some incline to work with, and unlike the flammable nightmare maze that had been Rochelant this city had a few paved and relatively straight avenues for troop deployment. Some parts of the outer city had houses of wood and stone clustered so tightly together they were impassable, a wall in fact if not in name. I couldn't quite get a look at the furthest reaches of Sarcella, but it looked like it'd been the same parts of it burning for most of our march: with a little luck, the flames had run into row stone houses or a ditch of some sort. I really hoped it'd been accident, to be honest, because if it wasn't odds were it'd been Nauk giving the order and if that was the case I might be responsible in a broader, metaphysical sense. Well, it was my army, but aside from that I doubted Rat Company officers had been so prone to tactical arson before they'd come under my command. Aside from Robber, anyway, who in these matters did not count since he was both a goblin and a sapper – the moment he'd chosen that career track at the War College he'd grown beyond saving. Regardless, most of the southeastern corner of the city was a hellscape of flames and smoke but it wasn't spreading much further out. Which had done absolutely nothing to prevent the inhabitants of Sarcella from fleeing in a panic.

That was even more obvious than the fire, in a way, because the Procerans were crowding the road out Sarcella like a massive flock of startled birds. There were at least five or six thousand civilians streaming out of the city, with more behind, and they were moving at a slug's pace. Few of them had carts to carry their possessions, and those that did got stuck on the muddy road out more often than not. The overwhelming majority were carrying everything they could of what they owned in bags or tied on their backs, a roiling exodus of people and goods. Some were even dragging furniture, with at least one very nice armoire put on planks and dragged by two middle-aged men. Probably the most expensive thing they owned, I mused. The river of fleeing Procerans filled the road in full, moving forward sluggishly, and as my gaze lingered on the armoire I realized why they'd been allowed to drag even furniture out of the danger. General Rumena caught up to me after I reined in my horse ahead of the first fleeing civilians, our six thousand warriors still further behind.

"This is madness," the old drow said, eyes contemptuous as it watched the civilians. "Why was this allowed to happen?"

"Because Nauk's tactical acumen has improved," I replied. "Watch the city's sides, Tomb-Maker."

He caught what I had quickly enough. Levantine light cavalry out in the snow, at least a thousand on either side. Not massing for an assault, at the moment – if I had to guess, there'd be crossbows and spikes awaiting them at every street large enough for a charge. But if I were the enemy commander, I'd keep them there to force those crossbow companies into remaining there where they weren't shooting at my soldiers. Maybe strengthen the cavalry numbers when things got heated on the main front enough that a simultaneous charge on both sides could serve as the killing blow for the entire Callowan army. Having to watch both sides as well as the city's back, where the avenues were the largest and most open, would have been a waste of soldiers. So I was thinking Nauk had encouraged the Procerans to flee with their possessions, neatly filling that space with scared civilians the Levantines couldn't ride down without starting the kind of major diplomatic incident that'd send cracks going down the Great Alliance. I was honestly impressed with my general. He'd never been a fool, but his cleverness had always been a military one. It now seemed his thinking had expanded to other theatres. Unfortunately, at the moment his clever trick was also preventing us from reinforcing him quickly. I weighed down my options in silence.

I could probably scatter the crowd with some application of Night, but should I? That'd be leaving a hole in Nauk's defensive perimeter, most likely. There'd be enough of a risk I'd have to leave drow behind to hold that territory, and considering the size of those cavalry contingents it would have to be at least two thousand warriors. Light horse or not the Firstborn just weren't used to facing down cavalry charges, and they lacked the bows, pikes and discipline to be naturals at turning them back. Slipping in through one of the flanks would take longer, though. Maybe an hour or so, and I wasn't sure I wanted to take that risk without a better notion of how the fight for the city was going. There was no point in arriving neatly if the delay cost us the battle. And that the fight was going, there was no doubt about that – I could make out the command horns and the faint sound of screams and steel even from where I sat. There was nothing quite as catastrophically loud as a hard battle, was there? Clenching my fingers, I spit to the side.

"Rumena, pick out two thousand warriors," I said.

"Will you be spitting on them as well, First Under the Night?" the old drow drily asked.

"That one's a bit of a stretch," I replied without missing a beat. "Careful with those, you know your back's not what it used to be."

"At least one of us should live to reach old age," Rumena smoothly retorted.

Damn it. Was it really too much to ask to get the last word against it even once? The fact that my bloody goddesses were quite literally crowing in the back of my head at this most recent of defeats only made it worse. My eyes flicked ahead. It wouldn't be long before the first fleeing Procerans arrived in shouting distance, but I'd have the drow at my side before it came to that. I yelled at Rumena to fetch me Robber while it was at it, watching it stroll away to carry out my orders. I looked up at the noon sky, that vast spread of blue without a single cloud to temper the glare of the sun. It was good fighting weather, I thought. Mild for a winter day, and the snow might thaw a bit if it kept up. Twin shadows flickered into sight, gliding down with lazy grace, and I turned my eyes back to the Procerans as the crow-shaped slivers of godhood landed on my shoulders. They ran their metaphysical fingers down the spine of my thoughts, partaking of my intent.

"First time I ever saw Black use the trick, I wasn't sure it was one," I mused. "The second time, though? I promise myself I'd make it my own one day."

"Not a subtle tool," Andronike said.

"Yet versatile," Komana opined.

We left it at that, for now. General Rumena came back holding a wiggling Robber by the scruff of the neck – impressive, considering it was day and my Special Tribune still had his armour on – before offering him up like some kind of furious green cat.

"Get on," I said, cutting in before the goblin could complain. "There's a war on, Tribune. Rumena, tell our warriors to stick close to me and not spread out."

"As in all things your guidance is paramount, Losara Queen," it replied.

I detected the faintest hint of sarcasm in that, due to my unparalleled courtly sentivities.

"Wait, you speak Lower Miezán?" Robber hissed out. "You prick, you pretended you-"

I cleared my throat, and with ill-grace the goblin scampered onto the back of my mount. I patiently watched until my six thousand drow formed into a rough column. The vanguard of the fleeing civilians had finally noticed our presence and distant shouts in Chantant and Tolesian sounded. Some angry, some curious, some afraid. I could have tried to engage, but to be frank I didn't have the time to be gentle about this.

"Follow," I called in Crepuscular.

My staff of ebony rose, and I reached for the Night. The Sisters helped me shape it, refine my intent and cut away the impurities until all that was left was fear. I felt Robber stiffen behind me, then almost defiantly loosen his limbs and grip. Zombie started at a gallop without further ado and the drow followed behind me.

With screams of blind terror, the inhabitants of Sarcella parted like the sea.

It was a simple enough working that maintaining it wasn't too much of a strain, especially with the guidance of the Sisters, but I was noticeably tired by the time we reached the tall arch that was the broadest entrance into the city. There'd been a few incidents making our way down the road, civilians who reacted to even supernatural terror with aggression, but they were beaten down and thrown to the side without any deaths involved. One drow was nicked by a wildly flailing sausage knife and was loudly mocked by the rest of its sigil for the rest of the walk, but that was the closest thing to a casualty we incurred. To my approval, the sight of my army approaching by the largest road into the city was met with hastily assembled palisade and at least half a hundred crossbows. From atop my horse I could even see messengers running further in to ask for reinforcements. I rode up ahead of the drow, allowing the fear to die and my shoulders to loosen. I felt like I'd run a footrace – in a metaphysical instance where both my legs were still in good shape, it should be said – but I was tired and not exhausted. Tired I could work with. It was old hand to me. The Sisters took flight before we were hailed, more interested in taking a look at the killing than staying around for the formalities.

"Close enough, stranger," an officer called out from atop the palisade. "Identify yourself. This city has been seized by the Kingdom of Callow, in the name of Her Majesty Catherine Foundling – are you friend or foe to her?"

I cocked my head to the side. A mop of blond hair could be made out from under the helmet, and that was definitely a Liessen accent tainting the hail spoken in very shaky Chantant.

"Yes, Boss," Robber murmured, sounding utterly delighted. "Are you friend or foe to Her Majesty? I think a case can be made for both. Tough call to make, really."

"You're talking to her, lieutenant," I called back in Lower Miezan. "Split those palisades and take me to General Nauk."

"Come off it," the Liessen laughed. "You're way too short. If you're the bloody Black Queen then I'm Empress of Procer."

Blowing up the palisade was not an acceptable response, I reminded myself. It was my palisade, technically speaking, so it was doubly beneath me to do so. Robber shook convulsively behind me, trying not to cackle out loud. There was some talk coming from out of sight, behind the palisade, then a goblin's head popped over the edge. I squinted. I'd seen that one before, though I couldn't put a name to the face. He was one of Robber's officers.

"Captain Borer," the ingrate gargoyle behind me provided, still snickering.

"Open the way immediately," the goblin ordered. "Your Majesty, welcome back."

I inclined my head in thanks. The Empress of Procer turned white as a sheet. I barked out orders in Crepuscular for the drow to follow me in good order, then put Zombie to a trot as the wooden fortifications were dragged open. Captain Borer, unlike his commanding officer, snapped a textbook-perfect salute when I approached. There were less than a hundred soldiers here, most of them crossbowmen, though I suspected with the runners I'd seen move out earlier that was about to change. I glanced at the still-pale Liessen lieutenant, who'd joined the throng of officers gathering around me, and cocked an eyebrow.

"Your Highness," I drily said. "What a surprise to find you here."

He forced out a shaky laugh, but ended up choking on it for trying to swallow nervously while keeping it up.

"Who's in command here?" I asked.

There were lieutenants and sergeants here, but no one any higher up the ladder. Unusual.

"That would be me, Your Majesty," Captain Borer replied. "I am the sole captain of this front."

Not a good sign, I thought. Not only was the goblin a sapper, he was part of Robber's cohort – which was detached from the usual chain of command, by my personal authority. Sappers were usually passed over in favour of the closest same-rank officer when it came to combined commands, which was hinting at a severe officer shortage.

"You're relieved, Captain," I said. "Behind me are foreign troops from the Empire Ever Dark, to be considered auxiliaries for the duration of this battle. They'll be holding the area in your place. Robber?"

The goblin leapt down with unnatural agility, landing with a flourish.

"Boss?" he asked.

"Gather your full cohort, then join me wherever the general staff has set up," I ordered. "Captain Borer, I'll need you to appoint a liaison to the drow. At their head is General Rumena, who'll be advancing deeper into the city with four thousand infantry. Have it led at a location allowing for easy deployment to the fronts."

"I'll see it done, ma'am," the goblin saluted.

There was a shudder of whispers through the assembled officers, looks were cast at the grey-skinned warriors still advancing towards the arch. The drow in the front ranks were looking back, looking distinctly unimpressed by the first human city most them had encountered.

"Merciful Gods," a tall, dark-haired man with sergeant stripes said. "Drow. I thought they were stories."

"Stories start from something, sergeant," I amusedly said. "And our friends came out from the Everdark to fight on our side. Do pass the word along that they can be rather touchy, though. It'd be best if a little distance was kept."

The stares I got at that made me rather uncomfortable. It was just a handful of officers, I thought, already part of my army anyway. And still I wondered if there'd be as much awe on their faces, if they knew how badly botched and misguided my journey into the Everdark truly had been. I doubted it. All they saw was old stories with strange weapons and eerie eyes come to swell our ranks. Shaking my head, I dismissed the thought.

"I'll need someone to guide me to the general staff," I said. "Is General Nauk holding command from there, or has he gone to the front?"

The awe was gone, whisked away in a heartbeat.

"Ma'am," Captain Borer quietly said. "General Nauk no longer holds command. He was killed last night when the assault began. Legate Abigail is the current commanding officer."

I was in front of my soldiers, I couldn't show weakness. And still I closed my eyes. Breathe in, breathe out. Control. You can grieve when the city's no longer burning, when your people are no longer fighting. He'd not been the same man I had called my friend, but I'd come to hope... Hope is always dangerous, I remembered. My eyes opened and my voice came out calm.

"I will need a guide, regardless," I said. "Let's get to it."

I pulled my hood over my head, then Zombie impatiently stepped into the avenue and away from my officers. Thirty heartbeats later, I had my guide and I rode the city with dried eyes.

Pittance that it was, it was all I could afford to spare.

—

The high command for what I'd been informed was currently being called the 'Third Army' – presumably Juniper's four separate columns each having been granted such a number – was clearly buckling under the weight of its responsibilities. It'd been a mansion, once, though clearly a wealthy merchant's and not a noble's as it was near the heart of Sarcella and not one of the more rarefied quarters. The location had been well-chosen, close to most of the arteries of the city and so easy to get messages to and from. I was ushered through a parade of wide eyes and gasps, until I reached what must have been the war room. It was at the very highest of the mansion, with broad windows overlooking the parts of the city either currently fought over or burning down. My attention, though, lingered on the fact that there were too few people here. A few aides, a few messengers, mages and hornblowers. But the actual officers? Less than ten. There were more tables loaded with scrolls and maps than there were people above the rank of tribune in here, which was stark statement as to the state of the Third Army. The presumed commanders saluted tiredly when I entered, obviously warned in advance, but I noticed the gaze of several brighten at the sight of me. I offered a smile, and turned to the only person in the room wearing a legate's insignia.

Legate Abigail, I realized with a start, was younger than me. Barely twenty, by the looks of her. I'd come across her once or twice before Akua's Folly, and later Juniper mentioned her to me before as the woman who'd drowned the incipient riots in Laure through strategic use of the royal palace's cellars. She'd had a field promotion to legate after that, so she'd have the authority to keep the capital in order, but I was surprised the Hellhound had chosen to confirm the promotion afterwards. At most I'd expected her to move up from senior tribune to commander, after an actual legate relieved her. Were we really that hard up for high-ranking officers? I set aside the worry for now, looking over the younger woman discretely. Her black hair was slightly longer than Legion regulations allowed, but acceptably so for a foreign campaign. Sunburnt cheeks, watery blue eyes and a delicate nose. She had dark rings around her eyes like she hadn't had a good night's sleep in much too long, quite visibly exhausted. She was taller than me, I noted, but then who wasn't?

"Your Majesty," the legate croaked out in that thick Summerholm accent. "Gods, am I glad to see you."

The general staff around her really was absurdly sparse, and what remained was in rough shape. There was a senior mage – Soninke, it'd be years before any Callowan was fit for that command – with a face whose rosiness betrayed recent mage healing and a staff tribune missing her right arm up to the elbow, but that was it. No senior sapper, no kachera or supply tribune. Two commanders, and one large orc tribune, but that was no proper general staff. What the Hells had happened here?

"Legate Abigail," I replied with a nod. "Our drow allies found Special Tribune Robber's tenth, and I hurried a march here with a first wave of six thousand reinforcements. I'm beginning to suspect the situation is worse than what was described to me."

A few mirthless smiles bloomed at that.

"It's a bloody mess, Your Majesty," Legate Abigail said. "General Nauk swatted their first probe on Sarcella and the vanguard drew back, so we figured they were waiting for the rest of the army. But then they attacked last night, completely out of the blue. We think some noble showed up, riled them up for it."

"Are you saying Nauk and the rest of his senior officers were lost on the frontlines?" I frowned.

"Them Dominion priests hit a meeting of the general staff," she replied. "Lanterns, I think they're called. One moment it's night, then it's bloody Light everywhere and most the room is dead. I was looking into a supply discrepancy so they didn't get me and Oakes-"

"Legate Oakes," the orc at her side provided in a gravelling voice.

"-Legate Oakes was walking the perimeter, so he didn't get hit either," Legate Abigail seamlessly adjusted.

I hid my amusement at the interaction, and the habitual ease it had come with.

"You're senior to this Legate Oakes?" I asked.

"By a day, ma'am," the woman ruefully replied. "Marshal Juniper said we were to serve under General Nauk and Legate Jwahir for proper blooding."

She paused.

"I guess we did get that, in the end," she darkly said.

Well, wasn't this a mess. It wasn't like I had another commander to pull out of my sleeve – Rumena was arguably the most veteran, but it had not familiarity with Legion tactics and was needed to keep the drow orderly besides – so she'd have to do. I could take command myself, sure, but if this was as bad as it sounded like I'd be needed in the thick of it.

"Then you've just received a field promotion, General Abigail," I grimly replied. "Congratulations. Now tell me how deep into the dark we are and, while we're at it, why the Hells this city is on fire."

DroughtBringer

Guys the votes are low! Get to voting!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Flobert

Good chapter, glad to see the Cat back with her Army. Nauk dying before cat could be reunited is saddening though.

daegone823

He was ripe for a name, the Burnt Berserk, the Hollow, or here hoping he is revived once more, as in three times alive, Nauk the Undying. There is still a chance at least in this universe.

He would therefore be like Urgot or Sion. My favorite champs.

naturalnuke

Born in blood, and fire, and darkness, made and unmade, Nauk;
The Orc, The Burned, The Undying.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Man, Abigail really got on to the Shounen protagonist promotion track, didn't she.

Someguy

No, this is the Trapped Behind Enemy Lines promotion track. Though it's usually a (Space)Navy trope. So Abigail is stuck an Anabasis (Xenophon) tale.

Argentorum

I'm still waiting for her to turn out to be Malicia's spy or the Bard or something.

You don't bite off a Fae's jugular with your teeth and drink its blood without having something else up your sleeve.

d0m1n1nc

I don't think she's either; we did get a POV from her a while back, remember?

We had one for Athal, too (almost to the very end).

NerfContessa

Ah, Abigail.

Prince John would have loved her.

John the terrible, that is, from empire of man.

sengachi

You're right, that's exactly the narrative poor Abigail is stuck in.

Skaddix

Abigail keeps climbing the ranks. Awfully convenient though that she just happened to be out of range of the attack. Seems odd with scrying down that the Priests would know where the General Council was meeting and be able to strike so effectively. Maybe they got a few Heroes with them and/or maybe we got some spys. Abigail does seem surprisingly competent and I tend to be suspicious of rapid risers.

RIP NAUK. Also appears Cat hasn't told Indrani about Masego yet so that could be a problem.

Allafterme

Abigail is like Ciaphas Cain HERO OF IMPERIUM expy which means two things:

1. Bountiful field promotions, especially when she didn't want them
2. She is to be considered alive, even with contrary evidence.

Hardric62

Eh. Tavi got lucky in Codex Alera too, I didn't complain then, see no reason to complain here either.

Except for the 'Nauk is dead' part and the (again) blatant hypocrisy of Good. But I don't expect this to go unanswered for long.

Skaddix

I don't know an honest to god precision strike to take out the leadership sounds pretty Good as far as these things go. They hit the leadership and nothing else, brilliant decapitation strike. My question are more how they actually knew where to aim.

Allafterme

Providence? There are probably one or two heroes among the Levantine host or Choirs are at the one-upping their bullshittery...

RoflCat

And I'm awaiting the next time they try that shit, there'll be crows cawing their death.

Aotrs Commander

Sounds like absolutely textbook adventurer "scry-and-die" tactics, to me. (More hazy on the "scry" part with stuff being interfered with, but the principle is the same.)

Knobbling the Evil Enemy High Command is exactly the sort of thing I'd expect from the good guys, even actual Good guys and not the substitute that pretends it is from Above. (And the bad guys. And the neutral guys. Any the "has even a modicum to tactical acumen" guys.)

It's just good (in the comparative, not in moral sense) tactics, and, if it works, hopefully forces the other guys to surrender without unnecessary bloodshed, which is beneficial on the moral level (if you're Good and you care about that) and the practical (whether you're good or not).

naturalnuke

Thing is that with their policy of killing greenskins no one is going to just surrender.

Battles of annihilation make people fight to the last because that's the outcome either way and spite is a powerful motivator.

Liliet

Do they have that policy? I don't remember where that came up.

Chrischinbrush

Maybe not specifically stated, but heavily implied. There's multiple mentions by Heroes and people from Good nations about their disgust of greenskins.

Dresden 67

How is it hypocritical? Catherine did the exact same thing back before the Battle of the Camps. You can't really argue that Nauk isn't a legitimate military target and if anything killing the leaders of an 'Evil' army is more morally defensible than slaughtering ordinary soldiers.

Liliet

Yeah, people are seriously looking for every excuse to get out of "Hero Antagonist" uncomfortable zone.

Sorry guys, we're stuck in it 😊

RanVor

What infuriates me the most in the side of Good is that they're somehow okay with using morally dubious methods to win, but when the other side does the same, it's suddenly Blasphemy and Vile Trickery. Come on, guys, either stick to your own principles, or stop shitting at others for not sticking to them.

Liliet

Eh, I mean people who call things that are mostly politicians/propagandists/idiots like Willycakes and Dorian. I have yet to hear anything about vile blasphemous trickery from anyone Levantine.

RanVor

The Lanterns declared Cat the Arch-Heretic. Just saying.

Liliet

Politics, politics, politics 😊

RanVor

Well, the very fact that they engage in politics is a mark against them anyway.

Liliet

You're highly idealistic wrt organized religion.

RanVor

Not at all. It's just that you can't be truly good and engage in shady politics at the same time. So either the information that they're behind the whole Arch-Heretic deal is simple slander, or they aren't as pure as they want people (and, by extension, us) to believe, and I strongly suspect it's the latter.

Liliet

I mean I never expected that the Lanterns are pure white. It doesn't reflect on the ideals of Good, though, just on the people following them with all the hypocrisy and imperfection of y'know people?

RanVor

Then why am I not allowed to be mad at them for being hypocrites?

Liliet

I mean you're allowed whatever.

But we have 0 evidence that the people who made this (rather prudent both tactically and morally) decision intersect in any way with people who made that decision.

The point I'm talking in circles around is that the side of Good is not a hivemind. This is like saying 'why can't women decide on what they want' because one woman loves McDonalds and another hates it and loves sushi. It's not hypocrisy, it's different people having different viewpoints.

Even within the same faction – like the Lanterns – the people making political decisions and the people on the frontlines are... likely to be different people. IMHO.

RanVor

We have zero evidence that they're any different either. But I wasn't talking about them. I was talking about a particular view that seems to be very prevalent on the side of the Heavens, namely "we are allowed to go as far as it takes to win, but when they do that, it's abhorrent".

Liliet

This is the thing: who, exactly, has expressed both parts of that view? Like there are people who say 'the other side does that and is abhorrent' while politely overlooking their own side doing the same and there are people who say 'we go as far as it takes to win' and look at goals and not methods of the opposing side either.

caoimhinh

Well, to be fair, she IS a villain who bullied an Angel into giving her reincarnation and became a Fae-like being with high necromantic powers. So she was pretty close to what any of the heaven fanatics would call an abomination. Now she even made a deal with the Ever Dark, we know her reasons and the inside story, people from the outside wouldn't see her actions as anything good, even leaving behind the obvious politics that were at play in that decision (and Bard's involvement, as she was hinted talking with Saint of Swords at the holy see of Procer's church).

RanVor

To be even fairer, she never did anything to them, or even anyone else they care about. They're targeting her out of simple prejudice and are so full of themselves they won't even let her explain herself, but that's to be expected, considering they're religious fanatics. What shouldn't be expected is them deciding to declare her the Arch-Heretic over obviously more Evil and hostile Malicia for no real reason other than to spite her.

Liliet

I don't think Cat was declared Arch-Heretic by people who understood the situation. Or cared about what it really was, considering Saint of Swords had a hand in that and she's only too well known for violence against authority she doesn't like.

RanVor

It's a simple fucking common sense that the Tyrant in the Tower is the archest of all Arch-Heretics in the East. So common, in fact, that most people didn't even realize it's possible for someone else to be branded the Arch-Heretic. Which means they had to dig up some obscure regulations to even justify holding a conclave over it. Something like that is not done on a whim.

Liliet

I mean, I imagine it's far more common knowledge to actual priests than to secular authorities?

Skaddix

I think Pilgrim stated it best Cat is Arch Heretic because she is shifting the Balance of Power by shifting Callow to the Gods Below. Praes will always be Evil. But Callow switching teams from Good to Evil represents a permanent shift (or multiple century at least) in the Balance of Power that cannot be allowed. So there is something metaphysical about Good and Evil.

Now Saint did it more cause she thinks the whole system is corrupt and wants a New World Order. The Good Nations are not Good Enough for her. And while Named don't tend to rule Good Countries, they can certainly exert a great deal of influence. As both Saint and Pilgrim have taken out Good Leaders with no repercussions. About the only restriction on Heroes seems to be killing other Heroes.

As for Gods Above and Below they don't really exercise as much direct influence people think. As shown Callow Priests and Procer Priests split the religion but the Gods Above didn't take away all healing from Callow. So there are some rules on how directly the Gods on either side can interact. Angels and Demons and Devils have a great deal more Freedom to act on the material plane. Gods need certain conditions to do anything hence why the Bard does most of the work.

konstantinvoncarstein

From their perspective, Callow was ruled by an immortal, evil no-more-human being, who had already bullied an Angel. Personally, I would not want to have that on my continent.

Furthermore, this kind of actions is that of "classical" Evil. And there is no negotiation possible with that.

Unwise

I... kinda ship it?

chris S

Can we get a big F for that off-screen death. Poor Nauk, first he dies, then Warlock resurrects him as a shell of his former personality. and then he gets blown up by a holy-magic powered bomb.

Aotrs Commander

I think that is one criticism that I have of the Guide is I have the impression that ErracticErrata does seem to have a little bit of squeemishness about actually showing protagonist-side characters dying. It's happened basically every time (bar Warlock) – Nilin, Captain, Ratface (and the rest of the council) and now Nauk. One or twice is co-incidence (or made sense in context, given the narrative being from Cat's PoV a lot of the time), but considering the cut-aways from other viewpoints, it has at this point formed a bit of a pattern of tell, not show with these deaths and I think that does those characters a disservice. If die they must (and I am often very vocuallly against gratuitous or unnecessary character death, let it be noted), the emotional impact ought to be properly felt by the reader (as we got with Warlock) – at least some of the time. I don't expect it all the time, of course (doing any one narrative thing to excess is problematic[1]), but, as I say, at this point, we have had a bit of a pattern.

[1]Except Cat's snark, that's impossible to have too much of.

Milpool

Yea, this is starting to get into a bit of a rut for a series that supposed to be all about clever awareness of story tropes. How many other beloved old characters are we going to have die off-screen with little to no explanation and no fanfare? I love the series, but this is starting to get a little frustrating. There's no satisfaction, no closure in it. They're just, whoop, gone one day.

Liliet

Well, it is also a story about war, would be kind of disingenious to write it without anyone Cat cares about getting killed in a horrifyingly random way.

werafdsaew

How are those 2 things you mentioned mutually exclusive with one another?

caoimhinh

Yeah, it's really annoying at this point.

I mean, taking the case of Ratface for an example, we didn't need an epic battle or long narrative making us feel that we'll miss Ratface (And EE has already proven he can do that even with a previously unknown character, like in the case of Cordelia's cousin who died fighting the Dead King).

With half a chapter showing Ratface (and maybe the rest of the council) doing his work, and suddenly being surrounded by assassins and ending at that, it would create anticipation, an emotional built up for when Cat receives the news. Instead what we got is Cat arriving somewhere and someone says "hey, this person is dead." characters being written off in such manner as if they were irrelevant, feels anticlimactic, annoying, and does a disservice to the characters. If characters must die, it should be done in a better way than the "hey, did you know? he died" treatment that so many have received.

Liliet

I would hate having to read through that for no payoff other than 'yep he died'.

James, Mostly Harmless

Please remember that what we are reading is essentially a second draft. e^2 will go back over his work when he readies it for publication, and may add some of those scenes.

caoimhinh

I don't know about that, though I really wish he would add that, but he doesn't even edit chapters here to fix the typos we point out in the comments, so I don't know if he would make such major changes in the printed version.

Liliet

I mean yeah, this is the first draft. He's not editing the first draft, that's pointless.

caoimhinh

I disagree.

It's never pointless to fix typos. If there are mistakes they should be fixed, the very point of a draft is to be edited and errors fixed before publication. Even if what we are reading here now is not what he will publish later on, it's weird to not fix the typos or inconsistencies (Like Cat's bad leg that for some chapters was the right, in others the left, then dropped specifying at all, later said to have been healed by angelic resurrection but brought back by fae transformation and then again said that fae transformation had healed it but Cat giving up Winter brought back her bad leg).

Errors should be fixed as soon as they are found, even if he wants to make a new version for printing, it's still for the best if he takes this (the base material) with as few errors as possible, and it also makes it more pleasurable for future readers of this version too.

Liliet

On one hand, fair.

On the other hand, it's a lot of work to write as much as consistently as erratic is, and I'm not one to say he should be doing more on top of that.

Andrew Mitchell

I've got to agree with you here Liliet.

EE is committed to 13 chapters a month. And of consistently good storytelling too. That's a HUGE output and it's way, way more than most people ever produce. I know I could never do it...

If EE wants to keep up the momentum and save all the typo corrections for publication, then that's absolutely fine by me.

caoimhinh

True, but fixing the typos on a novel isn't "doing more" for an author, and fixing the typos that readers point out is on his benefit in the long run, too.

As for consistency I think there are only 2 inconsistencies that I have noticed: Cat's leg and Ime's name (According to book 4 chapter 5 her name is Sabra Niri, with kinship to the High Lord of Okoro, but book 5's Prologue calls her Lindimi Sahelian).

No one points out typos out of malice, readers just want the errors to be fixed so that the quality improves, but there are comments pointing out typos all the way back to volume 2 which haven't been fixed. There's no real justification for that, since those typos were pointed out the within 2 days of the chapters being released, and editing doesn't take more than a couple of minutes.

Now, if he let dozens of chapters with typos accumulate, and then has to read through all of them to find and fix the typos before publishing a new version? THAT is what will be a lot of work.

I believe everyone who has read this series up until current chapters now loves it and is convinced of the amazing talent of EE, he delivers great chapters at an amazing pace (to the point where if a chapter is late we don't get angry at him, but the comments start filling with people worried for him, since he is always punctual), but ignoring typos pointed out by readers is a bad decision/habit that should be changed, as it's on the best interest of everyone to fix those as soon as possible.

Liliet

"True, but fixing the typos on a novel isn't "doing more" for an author" it literally is on a 'what do I spend my time on' level

Also, you know how the second draft is usually made compared to the first draft? It's rewritten from scratch. You just scrap the first draft and write the entire thing anew. There IS no point to fixing typos.

luminiousblu

Have you noticed that they're ultimately unimportant side characters? Side or tertiary characters (Captain and Nilin were tertiary at best, don't pretend otherwise, and Ratface dangles between tertiary and side leaning tertiary). Captain stopped being relevant in any way past book 1, Nilin was barely present during the half-book he existed, and Ratface is mostly relevant as a background "oh, he did something else again" sort of person.

Killing them off quietly shows that they're not supposed to register.

Wry Warudo

I love how Rumena managed to troll Robber

IDKWhoitis

Oh, just wait for Robber's retaliation.

sengachi

There is probably no person in the story more qualified to meet that challenge than Rumena. They've spent the last millennia sassing demigods, spitting in the face of providence, and surviving a combative hellscape that genuinely outdoes the goblin warrens. Let Robber come. In the Tomb-Maker he has finally met his match.

caoimhinh

Remember Indrani also managed to annoy Robber and get on his nerves.

Chapter 6 of Volume 4 displayed it very well.

sengachi

Indrani was Robber's equal and peer. Rumena may simply be out of Robber's league.

caoimhinh

As I remember it, Indrani had Robber beaten by a huge margin, everyone of his attempts were met with her laughter, while she got on his nerves with every sentence.

Rumena is just too cool in his way of doing things. He's Lord of Sick Burns and Cool Replies XD

Euodiachloris

Those two have the beginnings of a beautiful– um... a pointed? pointy? relationship. 😊

Gunslinger

The next favorites poll is gonna end with Rumena at the top for sure

doominator10

"...why the Hells this city is on fire."

Catherine's thoughts: ' I'm probably going to somehow get blamed for this too.'

Liliet

Catherine's thoughts: "This probably is somehow my fault even without me knowing about it or being around, isn't it"

Raiseth

Catherine probably doesn't realize her forces attract the most pyromaniac arsonists this side of the sea.

Decius

Of course she knows. That's how she found them, by following the pyromaniac attraction.

Shoddi

It is directly her fault, as originator of the "Foundling Gambit". Probably codified in the field manual of the Army of Callow by now.

Someguy

NAAAUUUUKKK! 😞

Javvies

Well, Nauk dying was inevitable.

Abigail has done well for herself, though this is nothing like what she was expecting when she got her promotions.

Huh. I thought it was sort of widely known that Cat was short. I suppose she grows in the telling and looms large in stories about what she's done.

Yeah, there's no way anybody can blame Robber and his pyromanic and kleptomantic ways on you Cat. Not legitimately, anyways. Probably won't stop some people from trying anyways.

Also ... the Lanterns can drop long ranged smites on people? That's ungood. They'll probably be priority targets when night comes.

Dresden 67

I doubt it was long range, the Lanterns are noted as warrior monks who regularly hunt monsters. It makes sense that they're capable of stealth.

In fairness morally speaking it's no different from what Catherine did before the Battle of the Camps. Nauk was undeniably a legitimate target.

Javvies

So you're saying the Lanterns didn't need much range because Nauk and the troops with him are/were totally incompetent?

They nuked a meeting of Nauk's general staff and there was no warning. That sort of thing generally takes place all behind your lines in a secure and guarded area.

To stealth their way in to hit it at short range, the Lanterns would have needed to bypass the Callowan lines, pickets, and patrols, plus get around the guards and patrols around the location where the meeting was taking place. Oh, and that's not counting the magical defenses and alarms that would be around.

Sorry, but I could perhaps buy a Hero or group of Heroes pulling something like that off, but not regular humans. So, IMO, the Lanterns had serious help from somebody/ something (if only in knowing where and when to hit), or ... they have a massively broader skillset of powers granted by Above than we thought they did, and probably broader than anybody on Cat's side thought they did too.

Liliet

Oops, I think I have a theory.

Grey Pilgrim 🤨

grzecho2222

"some noble showed up, riled them up for it"

Liliet

Yep 😊

Javvies

Nah, Pilgrim's probably more or less fixed to wherever he's holding Amadeus. Unless Amadeus has escaped, then Pilgrim is probably trying to recapture him.

Liliet

They were on the road, remember? Moving through countryside

Sylwoos

Aren't they the same guys who melted a mountain?

Like it or not, it seem the Above's priest hold power comparable to the Praesi mage and the not-quite-mighty drow (don't remember their exact name). So far in the story, we've seen many group of human holding comparable power when working together, so nuking a tent isn't exactly a unbelievable feat. We also saw quite a lot of long range attack, like when Diabolist mage put fake-cat in a box from the other side of a battlefield.

Javvies

My concern with the Lanterns successfully nuking the command tent isn't that they could do it at range, it's more the fact that they knew exactly when and where to strike, and we don't have any prior indication that priests normally have scrying capabilities. I'm inclined to think that they probably needed and had some help with targeting, probably Named help, under the presumption that more direct intervention by Angels would have been noticeable, and that Above wouldn't burn direct interference points on something so (relatively) minor.

Decius

A single spy in the Army of Callow?

Javvies

Ehhhh ... I could see a spy for the Praesi (or some faction thereof) being in the Army of Callow, but I don't see all that much likelihood of a spy for Levant or Procer. Remember, the Army of Callow is comprised of Callowans, former Legionaries, and a few straight from Praes recruits (mostly orcs and goblins) that signed on with Cat's armies instead of the Legions.

Besides, again, timing is an issue as well as the communications chain from the theorized spy to the Lanterns.

Far more likely that they had help from some sort of Hero.

luminiousblu

The Lanterns sound like Clerics, and those are almost always presented as the equal of sorcerers or wizards. Their robes just have holy symbols instead of magic circles on them. If the Lanterns brought out say fifteen dozen dudes and fired a laser beam via ritual it seems plausible, especially since scrying is completely blocked off by priests.

caoimhinh

I feel like when Ratface died. It's out of the blue and annoyingly anticlimatic.

It's one thing if they are shown fighting or given a scene to their deaths, instead of being in the back of the story for a few chapters and then suddenly Cat enters a room and someone says "And he's dead"

Although we can be optimistic and think Nauk might be just in a coma again or something, odds are he just got written off from the story just because EE felt like it, same as with Ratface.

Liliet

If we got a death scene for every meaningful death, there'd be far too many death scenes.

And the tone would have shifted to 'gee look how many heroic officers there are' or 'this is how people die' which is not the point of the story.

People aren't forgotten after they die. I find that a far better treatment writing-wise than heroic death scenes.

caoimhinh

Every meaningful death should be shown as they are meaningful, they deserve a scene. They wouldn't be too many scenes, it wouldn't even take a whole chapter to show the last moments of the character. Even Istrid got a last scene showing her death (Unlike Afolabi and Orim who were at the same battle) but Ratface and Kendall got just "hey they got killed" and that's it.

Do you think that if Wekesa's death had been off-screen would it have the same effect on us as readers?

There's a reason meaningful deaths are shown, it because they are MEANINGFUL.

You are right that keeping the memory of a character alive is good and makes them influential beyond their deaths, but that's not happening here, or else name one character that's still actively mentioned or influencing things after they died. At the most is Cat's occasional mention or complaint about how things are harder to do now that Ratface is dead and that has happened no more than four times in the whole volume since he died.

Akua is the only character that had remained influential after her death and that's because she is still walking around as a shade.

Liliet

I think we have different definitions of influential. Sabah, Wekesa, Ratface all stayed in the narrative after being dead; Anne Kendall was an unfortunately minor character even when alive. Nilin actually got more impact after his death, from where I stand. Same for the poor Exiled Prince lmao.

I'd say their deaths get to be plenty meaningful even without having to shoehorn a narrative progression into them. Wekesa's death was epic and had a story in it, so it got shown onscreen; deaths that are just depressing don't need that.

Skaddix

Sabah was offscreen so Bard could screw with Black. But also did we really want the heroine skinning her on page?

Weseka was epic mostly cause you cannot really have a spellcaster go down without going all out and to drive Masego forward for a presumably Darker Arc.

Cat is the Lead, the Woe/Akua are the next level down and the Calamities/Scribe/Malicia are another level down.

But basically the issue is Cat's wars have to have cost and that is shown in her former friends biting it but you cannot just off the Woe. So someone else has to pay since the point of the series is not really to glorify war.

Liliet

I'd say Wekesa's bigger impact was his conversation with Tikoloshe.

We did hear from Sabah right before her death, we just didn't see the moment itself.

And yeah, what you said re: why this is happening.

caoimhinh

I know what you mean, and I partially agree. Nilin's death was used as a minor plot device, simply to show that Akua had lot of influence, though it also had the effect of making the readers have multiple emotions, which was pretty good. But even his death was shown and used better than most, as he was a casualty of a battle that was shown. Sabah's case is weird because we saw everything up until she had practically already won (Champion was beaten to a bloody pulp, broken bones and all Aspects exhausted while Sabah was in full form, with one Aspect left) and then it was "she died" which while narratively coherent in the way Bard expressed it, still makes little sense and was not finished well. If the last of the battle we had seen was Raphaella using her last Aspect, and then Amadeus found out Sabah died as explained by Bard, it would make more sense.

The problem with the way so many deaths have been handled is the off-hand manner of just writing them off as “hey, he died” instead of at least building up to the event, or at least giving them a last scene that showed things. Even Killian who is the Senior Mage in the whole army under Masego, has been written off a bit after breaking off with Cat, despite being said that she is doing important things and even attending most of Cat’s general staff meeting she doesn’t have dialogues anymore, which is weird.

Anyways, as it is now, those kinds of meaningful deaths being done in a meaningless way are a disservice to the characters and done willingly by the author, because we already know for certain that EE can make even a one-chapter-only character be badass and remembered, he could have made a good last scene for Ratface, Kendall, Nauk, etc.

It doesn’t have to be epic, it can be depressing, but it should be shown something, or prepare a built up or anxiety for the uncertainty before the reveal.

Liliet

TBH Sabah had a huge death flag and it made perfect sense to find out later then she died. You might have noticed (or not) that at the start of the battle she comments that Champion’s form is mostly suited to fighting beasts, not humanoid armed opponents, and that’s why she has the advantage.

And then she fucking forgets that and shifts into Beast like SABAH NO

I knew that was a big SABAH NO when we were leaving her POV 😡

Killian is a whole other kettle of fish yeah.

But I’d say that Nauk’s death has been built up to by the very fact that they’re at war, that Nauk was heavily injured once already, and that he’s known as the best vanguard – the guy who is sent to charge into the most dangerous places. It’s the least odd thing in existence that he died at some point, and the point is to remind us of that. It wasn’t dramatic, there wasn’t anything much to see about it. Rocks fall, everyone dies.

Same goes for Ratface and Kendall. We’ve already had Anne Kendall survive one assassination attempt; we’ve heard Ratface talk about how he always assumed he’d die railing at the Tower. Everyone knew what kind of game they were playing; that Cat's manoeuver at Keter backfired that badly behind her back is the entire point. We didn't get to see it because she didn't get to see it; the very fact she didn't, that she wasn't there, that it happened entirely outside her control, hit her hard. That's what the impact was DELIBERATELY MEANT TO BE. And it was conveyed to the readers by having them in the same boat as her – not there for it.

caoimhinh

Yes, but and so it would have made sense if in the battle displayed Raphaella had managed to best Sabah, but she didn't. Champion was beaten to a pulp by Captain, and she used up all her Aspects without anyone to heal her while Sabah still had one Aspect left. If she had defeated Sabah on screen, or if she had still being fighting when the POV changed (like the example I proposed of Champion activating her last Aspect against Sabah as the last scenes from that fight), it would make sense, but Raphaella had already lost when the POV changed, she wasn't just wounded or in battle shape, she was so thoroughly broken that her Aspect broke apart. And yes, Heroes get second wind and Narrative power-ups but that still was a bad way to conclude that match, just the Hero defeated by Villain and then jump to another scene where they are informing the others that the Hero won and that's it. Unsatisfying.

It is true that anyone can die, and it's fine to have Cat unaware of things, but to have us in the dark too, and eliminate a group of characters like blowing off a candle is bad. We could have at least gotten a last scene for them, so that we would get a built-up of emotion and anticipation. Saying "people die at war" is not enough to justify the meaningless deaths, they got offed as they were irrelevant and that is annoying.

Worst is the way it's handled, that indifference "so, they died" and move on, that's not how this entire serial was building up to be, and that's why it's so glaring, because the narrative had led us to see that events are significant and deaths are too, with an author so talented that he can make an entirely new character coming out of nowhere be memorable. So it's frustrating how these characters were just gone as if they didn't matter.

Liliet

Sabah beat Rafaella to pulp and then let the Beast take over. We've had sufficient setup that heroes aren't beaten until they're dead that the mistake was obvious / horrifying to me.

And nope, it is meant to be glaring and frustrating and upsetting. Dramatic death scenes make the whole thing feel more fair, and that's the entire point: it isn't. There isn't a story to tell about how this person died. They just did.

They mattered, and they continue to matter now that they're dead. But their death was random, sudden and out of nowhere, because this is war.

Are you upset with Ashen Priestess not getting a death scene?

Decius

The death scene would be the general staff meeting, followed by "And then everything blew up".

Because someone on the Good side decided to be effective, and that means not giving the enemy good scenes.

caoimhinh

That would have still been preferable than the "ah, he died yesterday".

It doesn't have to be an epic fight, but those characters deserve a last scene.

For example Ratface finishing his work and then being surrounded by Malicia's assassins and going "oh, shit." when noticing them, unsheath a knife and say "come on, fuckers." would leave us wondering what happened and whether he survived, and then we get to know at the same time as Cat that he got killed by the assassins.

Kendall reading a report of the activities in the Kingdom and thinking about its current state and the measures that have to be taken, and then a "she never saw the knife" at the end. Would have been fitting.

Nauk and the officers sitting in the tent, they discuss, analyze their options, worry about Robber's group and finally make a decision of what to do, "and then the room blew up" at the end of the scene.

Much better than just writing them off with a cold treatment as if they were nameless mooks like the ones who die by the hundreds on each battle of the armies.

Aotrs Commander

I (as I commented up-thread) think we should have a bit more of split-difference. As it is, of all the characters who have died, only one of them was on-screen. Much as I dislike character death generally – you may thank Marvel for that, X-Men comics, lookin' at you – I feel that – at least some of the time, we should actually bear witness to it.

By the same token, I can also understand why sometimes it makes more sense not to show it. My personal opinion is just that we have had a shade too much of the latter and not enough of the former.

As fate would have it, the instance in which character death is handled the best in anything I've seen or read is Naruto, actually. Not only are the deaths meaningful, their impact is felt literal decades later in the show – and it ALSO isn't the last time we see the characters, because there are flashbacks (and even raising of the dead!) which obviates my major complaint that after you kill a character off, you can't tell any more stories with them.

caoimhinh

I agree with you. The problem isn't that characters died, is the meaningless way that they did, without even proper built-up, expectancy, uncertainty or a last scene to show us.

Papalamus

I believe that it is NB atural in the EE world that character not protected by narration dies off screen. It is world shaped with stories, and if you just a Cat hound without her protection why should you be immortal? Now, when we have Tyrant, Hierarch Grey Pilgrim, soon-to-be-named-again Black, Drow army generals, Winter/Night goddesses, even Malicia not safe.

caoimhinh

Is not the fact that they died, it's the way it was done. You can't be seriously saying that having characters that have been in the story since Volume 1 get killed off-screen and we find out simply when protagonist enters a room and someone says "hey, they got killed". That's a really bad way to eliminate a character.

luminiousblu

There's a difference between a meaningful character and a meaningful death. Meaningful characters don't inherently have meaningful deaths. Boromir dying was important so it got shown on-screen, the actual circumstances of the death itself conveyed something important about the story and wrapped up the character's development as a genuinely good person who was led astray by the Ring, and added weight to the story where being a good person fighting for a good cause can still die having accomplished nothing (because Merry and Pippin were taken away anyway).

What does Nauk's death add? His character had essentially been burned away, he was suffering from some sort of partial amnesia, so beyond a generic 'oh I remember now' sort of scene it can't add to his character. It wouldn't add weight to the story because people already died both on and off screen. What it actually DOES add is the idea of irrelevance, helplessness, and just-so. Nauk was ultimately irrelevant in the grand scheme of things, named but Nameless, just a king redshirt commanding an army of redshirts. Catherine was underground for apparently months, and knew of nothing happening aboveground, so she had no way of knowing what was happening. And Nauk was in with his army, escaped death once, but this time it caught him, and it was going to happen at some point where someone finally rolled a 13 on his d20 instead of constant natural 2s and 1s. This wasn't ridiculously bad luck or anything coming from Nauk, this was him having his stupidly good luck finally burn out.

Liliet

This.

Meaningful character doesn't necessarily mean meaningful death.

Sparsebeard

I think it might be intentionnal, Named get foreshadowing, death flags and narative deaths.

Mortal, mortals just randomly die...

Liliet

Yep.

There was a whole in-universe point made of this.

Cicero

Poor Abigail, how many more promotions can she get?

lol

Hey, that's Queen Abigail the First, The Accidental, you're talking about!

IDKWhoitis

After General, only really Field Marshal, but I don't think Callow has enough troops/armies to justify that. Unless she gets stuck as a pseudo marshal for the drow. Other than that, Juniper could get killed, and get Aby can take her place.

Or worse yet, Aby might get pegged as Cat's replacement for when Cat wants to retire.

Liliet

Queen Abigail grows increasingly likely the more the running gag of her promotions goes on ♥

caoimhinh

Abigail might even get a Name, General or something like that. Promoted all the way to the top XD

Liliet

Why do people keep inserting Names everywhere? Abigail is determined to be as unmotivated and self-oriented as possible. She is very much not someone who imposes her will on reality, which we know is a requirement for someone to be Named. She's like the definition of 'swept along with the tide'.

Sometimes non-Named get lucky as well.

caoimhinh

I meant it as joke, actually.

She reminds me of Tanya from Youjo Senki, who just wants to live safely and work comfortably behind a desk but keeps being deployed to the front lines because she is Cursed with Awesome.

Liliet

Oh yes, that's Abigail ♥

imagesbe

Well that, and the fact that that anime's interpretation of God was petty and spiteful and determined as hell to get her killed even though he wasn't allowed to do it directly. But yes, it was partly because Cursed with Awesome.

sengachi

I'm pretty sure that accurately describes this world's gods too.

magesbe

This is true, but it's unlikely (thought strangely possible) that the Gods here have a personal grudge with Abigael.

caoimhinh

Being X wants her converted, not dead, actually. The Cursed with Awesome comes from the fact that Tanya was born with A-class capacity for Magic, so there's no way they aren't going to send such young and powerful mage to the frontlines no matter how talented she is as a strategist. hahaha

Liliet

well now I'm going to be looking that up

caoimhinh

It's a series of Japanese Light Novels called Youjo Senki (War chronicles of a little girl) also known as The Saga of Tanya the Evil, It's very good and has a unique protagonist, and also has a very interesting way in their narrative, you can find the english chapters through novelupdates.com It also has a manga and an anime of 12 episodes covering the first volume; there's an animated movie to continue the events of the anime in the makings and planned to be released later this year.

It was my favorite anime released in 2017, it has an amazing OST, with awesome opening and ending songs.

magesbe

Eh. It's true I didn't finish the anime, but from what I got God originally reincarnated her into a fantasy medieval wartorn country to try to force her to become his worshiper, including literally making it so that to fight she needed to pray to him, but Tanya is aggressively atheist and even though she acknowledges that He's a higher power she refuses on principle to view him as God.

Eventually he starts doing things like manipulating generals to put her back on the front lines just when she's about to go off them, or provoking another country to attack hers to force her into danger again. At that point he's really just trying to kill her off, because if she is killed he's going to obliterate her soul, but if Tanya lives to die of old age, she gets to reincarnate naturally, and he's super salty and refuses to lose the bet (to make her become his worshiper or get killed).

caoimhinh

It's not a medieval world, it's a parallel of ours in the 20th Century, they are right at the start of the first World War.

It's also not really so much fantasy as having a boost in abilities, the magic there is closer to low-level ESP used to power-up their weapons (fueling the flying machines, making explosive bullets, having higher range, penetrating power, barriers, etc)

I'd recommend you give it another run and watch it again until the end. It's really good.

luminiousblu

Their depiction of God is actually generally perfect, once you allow for reincarnation. If dying a sinner doesn't send you into the big fire down under then all he's really doing is trying to brute force entrance into Heaven. He's concerned with souls, not lives, and that's actually accurate to the Biblical God. Looking at stuff like what happened to Lot's wife and how Jesus went on and on about "eternal life" as "Heaven", as far as big man G is concerned once you're a rotten apple, you're not an apple at all.

If anything it's really Tanya who's being a complete idiot about this. You don't judge a higher being with lesser standards, it's like trying to directly measure the volume of a sphere by using a ruler. She's also pulling the Discworld atheist thing, because why would you actively spite a being who could snuff you out with a finger just to be a dick about it? She can't win, after all; Being X is actively not interfering as much as he could because he's holding out for a change of heart. Tanya has literally seen the face of God one-to-one, knows that it's God no matter how much she tries to pretend it isn't, and is deciding that she's going to be self-righteous instead of essentially just living a decent life.

I mean, Akua nearly managed to become the Guide's version of Tanya, up to and including "tipped her fedora at god".

luminiousblu

Akua didn't really tip her fedora at Gods Above or Below, as best I can tell. It was mostly Catherine, Black, and Masego doing that.

Decius

Empress, if she remains incautious.

Shoddi

Or maybe the second First Under The Night.

Allafterme

Wait, did she made a reverse-Gandalf?

Liliet

Hm?

Allafterme

Think of Gandalf at the end of Helms Deep siege, riding on a white horse in front of cavalry, blinding the enemy with a brilliant light radiating from his white staff...

Liliet

Ah yea

theart0fwar

Long range smite. Mhh. Wonder what the drawbacks are.

Papalamus

What about drawbacks of lakedropping?

It actually makes sense, that opposite side has its own plans and stays proactive. Though such strike would be impossible if Masego was there. If Good couldn't stay for themselves, there wouldn't be a Good states at all possible

Walter

Rumena is kind of the best.

SpeckofStardust

So Catherine the First under night is up against the religious group called Lanterns.

The worst possible match up and she gets it.

RandomFan

Worst? Lanterns light up night, and are useless in the day. If the name is thematically accurate, it means both are specialized in fighting at night, but- night outlasts any lantern, in the end.

At least, that's my optimistic prediction.

konstantinvoncarstein

Anyway, the most powerful drows are Named in all but name 😊
So I think they can just apply brute force on the Lanterns to kill them

Sparsebeard

Sad thing is, each lantern killed is one less lantern to use against the Dead King.

And somehow I think they would be very usefull against the undead...

konstantinvoncarstein

The entire Tenth Crusade in a nutshell

IDKWhoitis

So, is Cat going to be a bit more smitey or she going back to her roots of killing things hard?

She could also start emulating Black in the middle of an army, lifting them up and pushing them harder than mortally possible.

antoninjohn

Well the Lanterns killed one of Cat's closest friends but it will probably all work out fine it's not like she has a reputation for holding grudges. Oh wait she Callowen.

Liliet

otoh she's palling around with Akua grudges to Cat are like wet soap in the shower

she just can't catch 'em

Javvies

She killed Akua and bound her soul to the collar of her cloak.

Plus, Akua's both actually useful, and inclined to prove herself useful and not start trouble because Cat's all "Evil" and "Needs to be stopped".

Also, Akua considers Cat being declared Arch-heretic of the East something of an honor to be proud of ... the Lanterns will consider that reason to keep trying to kill Cat and everyone on her side and ignore everything she tries to say.

The Lanterns are very much not Akua. Two massively different situations.

Besides, Cat is a good Callowan ... and she was just thinking about possibly being able to cure/fix Nauk with Night. The Lanterns just might be turned into an example.

Liliet

I was just pointing out that Cat is not very good at the Callowan propensity for grudges, emotionally. She cares about people far too much far too easily for that. Example #2: Black, who she specifically said in Book 1 she'd hold a grudge against forever... and then, uh, didn't.

And the Lanterns killed an enemy commander, not a city full of civilians. Cat doesn't operate on Protagonist Centered Morality.

You're not wrong that it'll be harder for Cat to get along with them. It's literally the political aim of the current campaign though.

Dresden 67

Yeah, Cat isn't enough of a hypocrite to hate the Lanterns for assassinating her officers. Turnabout is fair play.

taovkool

Silly Cat, the city is always on fire with you around.

Morgothra

So Cat returns to find the Callowan army is divided and in trouble – could this have been the plan by someone higher up? It's not Junipers style, but one of the others might have had the guts to do this deliberately, as Cats story would practically ensure she showed up just in time.

Liliet

What do you mean? I don't think either Hakram or Vivi do story weaving on that level, and it's not exactly guaranteed to work either way (see: Willie Angels and overreliance on a pattern of three)

Morgothra

You're right that no one has the right MO for this to be that kind of gambit and it probably isn't, but it feels like something that could be done in this world – in a similar vein to the heroes being fairly sure Cat would wake during the battling the camps – her personal story is heroic enough that mysteriously vanishing then turning up with help when her side needs her most could be predicted.

Liliet

The heroes could not count on Cat not waking up, I would say. The shape for the story was there, didn't mean it couldn't fluke out.

Either way, though, that was a much simpler situation with much fewer moving parts. The last time anyone had seen Cat she was going into the Everdark with a treacherous advisor and Ranger's student at her side on a frankly ill-advised diplomatic mission, and it's been several months since then. A lot more unknown variables than a post-battle coma.

The thing with stories in Guide is that they overlap and get disrupted by each other. Your story can be pitch perfect but if there's suddenly a new bigger one rolling into town it can be broken anyway.

You need Bard level information/perception to be able to manipulate things on that kind of scale.

RanVor

Well, so much for Nauk. But honestly, I'm not sure why I'm even surprised, considering this is a universe where Anyone Can Die unless they explicitly can't. This is the prime example of how ridiculously unfair the concept of Names is.

Also, Rumena might very well be the snarkiest character in the entire Guide.

konstantinvoncarstein

He even manage to score a victory on Robber! 😏

NotQuiteHere

What's the Augur doing? Could she have helped them aim?

Liliet

Doesn't seem like her speciality. She's a fortune teller, not a scrier.

Adrian V

Ok how about Cat somehow revives Nauk in a sort of familiae way, somethign like Akua but less bindings and more mutual agreement? She is a priest for a religion now and Nauk already worshipped her, almost at least xD

superkeaton

[Another One Bites the Dust Intensifies]

Still, arson, backtalk, comradery through group mockery, and a generally rough situation, Cat's back where she belongs.

Raved Thrad

"You are in command now, Admiral Piett."

aran

For a very short moment I mixed up Nauk's and Hakram's names, and was like "0_0 Cat about to go full John Wick on someone"

Nauk's death also bites, though.

Letouriste

Bloody hells, I so wanted a cat-nauk talk again.

Q

it seems like Abigail is a bumbler always coming close to dying and being lucky enough to just miss it. She keeps getting promoted and in her pov stories we always see her lamenting how out of her league she is

Interlude: Beheld I

"Necessity's children are sometimes clever but always bloody."
– Queen Yolanda of Callow, the Wicked (known as 'the Stern' in contemporary histories)

Godsdamnit, somehow she'd still ended up stuck in charge.

Legate – no, General now, because clearly someone Above was out to get her – Abigail had counted her blessings when she'd gotten word the Black Queen had come out of nowhere to save the day. The queen could take command, and she could go back to being as far as physically possible from the fighting while also not being expected to make any decisions that actually mattered. That was the trap, Abigail darkly thought. They lured you up the ranks with the promise of better pay and less people shooting arrows at you, until you got dragged so high you had to watch out for the noose instead. And she knew damn well what field promotion meant, thank you very much. It meant 'do the work, Abigail, but we'll only pay you what your last rank offered, and also best not fuck up or the Hellhound will eat your liver'. But she couldn't exactly say any of that out loud, so General Abigail smiled all pretty for the very dangerous woman holding a staff that made people panic if they looked at it too long.

"I'm honoured, Your Majesty," she lied.

Queen Catherine's lips twitched the slightest bit. Abigail hid her flinch well. Could the Black Queen actually read thoughts and look into souls? Surely that was just a rumour. Still, best not to risk it and change the subject. You never knew with Named.

"The fire wasn't our fault," Abigail immediately said. "Wasn't us who started it, either. I swear. The Lanterns ran out of the city after hitting the general staff and our people went after them. The chase ended up going through a grocer's shop and there wasn't no food in there, but there were candles and oil jugs."

The Black Queen arched an eyebrow, saying nothing.

"It wasn't us," Abigail insisted. "I have five official reports showing it was some big Levant woman who broke into the room and tipped over the candles. We can't be blamed for this, we even tried to stop the spread!"

Catherine Foundling's lips twitched once more, and she patted the Abigail's shoulder with open sympathy. She tried not to tremble at the touch. You were always less likely to get your blood frozen solid if you smiled.

"You'd think so, wouldn't you?" the queen mused. "But I've been saying that for years, and no one ever believes me."

The – temporary, if she had anything to say about it – general paled a little at the notion that she could end up getting a reputation like the Black Queen's. Abigail had been in Summerholm when entire quarters burned green because the Squire needed to flush out a hero. Hells, she'd never have been dumb enough to enroll in the Legions if her family home and shop hadn't been part of the cinders. Too late to bail now, though, she admitted to herself. She wasn't sure if even temporary generals were allowed to retire. Maybe she could get herself thrown out, she mused. Might be time to consider getting 'accidentally' pregnant. The queen's amusement passed quick enough, and Abigail straightened her back to look like she hadn't been thinking of what was technically an attempt at desertion.

"How many Lanterns struck?" Her Majesty asked.

"We believe twenty," Abigail said, comforted to be back on practical matters. "Twelve managed to escape the city, most of them killed while running."

Only one of them had died during the attack, though it'd been a Hells of a kill. The Callowan wouldn't forget the sight of Nauk Princekiller's fangs having snapped straight through the neck of a priest anytime soon. Not when Light had melted his plate before he even got moving, drips of molten metal leaving a trail of how he'd leapt for the kill even dying. The general had been a bloodthirsty bastard, no two ways about it, but no one had ever called him a coward. Her thoughts stalled. General Nauk was supposed to be an old friend of the queen's wasn't he? From the War College, and the early Fifteenth. Abigail really hoped the Black Queen didn't ask about the body, since she'd have to admit there was no splitting the corpse from the melted armour and no fire at hand would burn hot enough for both – the matter had been put aside for now, since there were more important things to take care of. It was odd, Abigail thought, that something mattering to her mostly because it'd gotten the three veteran Legates that should be standing in her shoes right now killed could actually be tragic to someone else. Especially to the likes of the Black Queen, who had burned and buried dozens of thousands. Even monsters had friends though, she supposed.

"Is a second strike by them likely?" Her Majesty asked.

The Queen of Callow was staring at the battle map even as she spoke, dark eyes tracing the lay of the cohorts and fortified choke points. Abigail had done what she could. There'd been no keeping the Belles Portes quarter after the disorder of a decapitated general staff had allowed the Dominion to take the bridges and secure a foothold behind them, but she'd had houses collapsed on the outskirts of the quarter and kept them contained in there by her own jesha of two thousand until a better defence could be assembled. The Levantines had since driven the Third Army back to the outskirts of Beaumontant quarter and mounted a push that took Couteau D'Or, pretty much claiming the entire middle-southern and south-western parts of Sarcella. Since then it'd been a nasty slugging match, since the Dominion had run into the raised defences and goblin traps she'd ordered set up at that line.

The two fronts had quieted some, but that was just preparation for a serious assault in Abigail's opinion. And if the next one passed her defensive lines? The Third Army was fucked, to put it bluntly. She'd been forced to send the reserves to the frontlines to slow down the fall of Beaumont until the sappers were done, and with companies still stuck keeping an eye on the cavalry to the city's sides there just weren't enough soldiers left to take back grounds if they were lost to Levant. If the lines broke, it was all downhill from there. Or that'd been the situation an hour ago, anyway, Abigail of Summerholm thought with a hard smile. Now the Black Queen was back, so it was time for lakes to start dropping. It took Krolem clearing his throat to realize she still hadn't answered the question Her Majesty had asked.

"We, uh, don't believe so," Abigail hastily said. "Senior Mage Dastardly has trip wards in place she believes will warn us if they do, but our priests say if they try anything that large again so soon they'll burn out."

The Queen of Callow blinked in surprise and tore her gaze away from the map. It was a pretty human gesture for some immortal evil-fae thing, Abigail decided. With the long, unbound brown hair and the lightly coloured cheeks, Catherine Foundling looked more like a young woman who hadn't slept in a while than the infamous victor of Second Liesse and the Battle of the Camps.

"Our priests," Her Majesty repeated. "We have priests, now?"

It was the temporary general's turn to be surprised. Had she really not heard?

"The House of Light split after it came out what you did in Keter, Your Majesty," Abigail said.

The Black Queen's face went blank as a wax mask. The Summerholm girl pressed on with haste.

"After it was outed you went to the Crown of the Dead to kill the Dread Empress and prevent her making a deal, they called for a Callowan conclave," she said. "They split over whether or not to name the entire Tenth Crusade graceless. About two thirds went against, but the Salian conclave's decrees were declared heresy by unanimous vote. Wasn't enough for some, though: the last third walked out and pronounced the Tenth Crusade to be godless Proceran intrigue. Nowadays they call themselves the 'House Insurgent', Your Majesty. Hundreds enrolled in the army as healers."

For a moment the silence in the room was thick as oil, then the Queen of Callow glanced to the side. There was a half-empty bottle of wine at the edge of the table, leftovers from when Abigail had taken pity on Dastardly's pain at having an entire cheek and eye grown back. It was her last bottle from Callow, too. The Black Queen grabbed it, sniffed at the rim and visibly brightened before taking a long swallow. A little sigh of pleasure followed.

"Oh, that's the stuff," Queen Catherine muttered. "Been way too long."

She shook her head, afterwards, and got back to business. So no one's going to die, Abigail mused. That's nice. Tanners didn't have to worry about things like that, she knew. No, Abigail, she thought, think of the ferret-faced cousins. Stick the course, how long can we really be at war anyway?

"Well," the queen said. "You've had an interesting year, I see. We'll set that aside for now, General Abigail. Your reserves aren't marked on the map, how many have you held back?"

"They, uh, are, Your Majesty," Abigail replied.

She leaned over and tapped her finger near the five cohorts holding the grounds between the fire and the edge of Beaumontant quarter. There was nothing held back because the reserves were on the front. The queen grimaced.

"I was afraid of that," she said. "That's going to get messy. These, are they paved roads or bridges?"

The Black Queen was pointing at the four grey streaks representing the bridges going into Belles Portes, and Abigail told her as much.

"How broad is the river?" Her Majesty asked.

"At the bridges, around twenty five feet," the temporary general said. "It's broader further west, going towards the source. Stays about the same going east, though a mile downriver it'll start splitting and narrowing."

The queen frowned at the map pensively. Abigail cleared her throat.

"If you're thinking of using munitions on it, ma'am, we've already tried," she said. "General Nauk had our sappers take a look, wanted to use that to repulse the first attack. It's frozen too deep, though, took an entire cart of demolition charges and it didn't spread all that far."

"Munitions aren't what I have in mind," the Queen of Callow calmly replied. "General, if we hold until sundown our retreat is assured. Cracking the river will buy us that breathing room, but only if you can push the enemy out of the city first. We need a moat, not an obstruction."

Abigail tried to think of a very polite, professional way of saying that this couldn't be done but it wasn't her fault. While she was considering what would work best, the Black Queen pressed on.

"I'll be taking five hundred drow and Special Tribune Robber's cohort with me," Her Majesty continued in that same even tone, eyes remaining peeled on the parchment. "That grants you three thousand and a half fresh warriors to break the deadlock."

"They're dug in good, ma'am," General Abigail said. "Unless the drow can scale walls barehanded-"

"They can," Catherine Foundling casually said, like it was nothing out of the ordinary. "While light infantry and currently no more physically able than humans, they have extensive training in raiding tactics. I'd suggest you send a number of them here-"

The Queen of Callow's finger tapped the boundary line between Beaumontant and Couteau D'Or, which by Abigail's reckoning was a line of tightly-packed merchant homes facing outwards.

"- to split the Levantines up, then thin your right flank to reinforce your left," she mused. "A hard assault on this 'Couteau D'Or' quarter will have them packed tight in the open when they draw back into Beaumontant, and a few sapper companies can bloody them into retreat from there."

General Abigail squinted down. The right flank had better hard defences, it was true – she'd had a guild house's lower level barred and turned the flat rooftop into a shooting galley for her crossbowmen – and it would hold against attack for a while even if thinned. With the recommended distraction and enough forces moved to bolster an assault on the left flank, this could possibly work. That'd still leave a pack of very angry Levantines with their blood up holding Belles Portes, though, and that quarter was the door to Sarcella. As long as the Dominion had their foothold there they'd keep bringing in troops. If the Levantines mounted a hard counterattack after the Third Army had left its defensive positions, the quarters it had taken might be just as soon taken back – and it wouldn't stop there, Abigail knew. With the kind of losses that the assaults would bring, the Third Army might end up driven out of Sarcella entirely. That'd be the end of them, with the Levantine cavalry hacking them to pieces as they retreated into the plains.

"That's only workable if the river is cracked," General Abigail finally said. "And unless you intend on taking less than a thousand light infantry out onto plains where the Dominion fields at least that much in cavalry, to get to the river you'd need to go through Belles Portes – which we can't take, until the river is cracked."

The Black Queen smiled, thin and sharp and just a little mad.

"There's another way through, as it happens," she said.

Abigail followed where the gloved finger was pointing on the map. She choked.

"That's the part that's on fire, Your Majesty," she said.

"So it is," Catherine Foundling cheerfully said. "Get ready for the offensive, general. I'll want it beginning within an hour."

The Black Queen patted her shoulder once more and limped out of the war room, humming what Abigail was pretty sure was the opening notes of the Lord of the Silver Spears. She was also, the leader of – temporary leader, Abigail corrected – of the Third Army noted, still holding that half-empty bottle of Vale summer wine.

"Tribune Krolem," she whispered. "I need you to looking into something."

The orc leaned forward eagerly.

"Find out who you can lodge a protest to, if the Queen of Callow steals your wine," General Abigail said.

—

The cattle-dwelling reeked.

Everything about the Burning Lands was mad, Mighty Jindrich decided. This land had never truly known order, not even in the days before the Tenets of Night, and while the Firstborn sought enlightenment through sacred strife – the worthy take, the worthy rise – the cattle had grown fat and insolent for that absence. The Mighty bared its teeth at small eyes peeking through a shuttered window, pleased at the squeak that sounded from inside the house. The shutters were wood, Mighty Jindrich saw. Most the house as well. How disgustingly decadent, that these Prokeren could afford to make a city mostly of wood. Even sigils of the Inner Ring were not so wealthy: it had taken an effort not to beat the cattle that had found it fit to burn wood, of all things. The Tomb-Maker had said that the Prokeren owned many forests, and that even if they allowed their wooden houses to rot and break they could afford to make new ones. Madness, waste and madness. Mighty Jindrich might have taken from the cattle what it knew not how to appreciate, had the First Under the Night not forbidden it.

The sigil-holder of the Jindrich let its eyes stray from the cattle-things trembling in their dwellings, instead turning to Losara Queen. Honour had been given, when the First Under the Night had picked Jindrich and many of its sigil to accompany it into battle. More so than could be truly grasped, for Losara Queen was the voice of the Night and so honour given by it was honour given by the Night itself. What more esteemed accolade could there be? The presence of the gobberin marred the situation some, but not so much that it grew beyond enjoyment. The green creatures were not true cattle, having many years ago warred against the nerezim with great fury and viciousness. They were being made to bear strange packs and drag carts, but no beasts of burden they. The leader of the pack, this Robber, it had spirit. If Losara Queen was to have servants from the Burning Lands, worse stock could be drawn from than a being that would mock Mighty at their own table. The pack following the Robber was just as dauntless, and already Losara Queen had ordered warriors of the Jindrich and the Cohort to sheath their blades thrice. This was pleasing, for sharing purpose with the weak and cowardly made for a weak cabal.

Mighty Jindrich threw back its head and hollered when their promised destination was reached, the sharp calls sounding out in defiance of the pale light. Its sigil answered in kind, approaching the heat and smoke of the blaze storming ahead without a speck of fear. The Mighty strode forward, elbowing some gobberin wearing strips on its shoulders and laughingly slapping aside the knife it pulled. The First Under the Night stood first before the blaze, as well it should. Even in the pale light of the sun Losara's silhouette seemed shaded, soot and ash falling at its feet as it watched the flickering flame. Jindrich bowed respectfully before approaching. It had bargained with this holy one when it was still but a strange curiosity, a creature borne by these lands yet capable of slaying Mighty. It'd also intended to betray Losara as soon as the Rumena were dealt with, as was only fitting. Since then, Mighty Jindrich had been taught the extent of its foolishness. What could a Mighty hope to do, against the very herald of Sve Noc? Some ill-made things calling themselves Firstborn still murmured of Losara Queen being human, but this was crass ignorance. What human could possibly bear Sve Noc on its shoulders, speak for the Tenets?

No, Losara Queen was the get of Night itself. It would return the Firstborn to these lands and wrest a realm out of the hands of the Pale Gods, usher the Empire Ever Dark born anew. And Mighty Jindrich would be there to share in that glorious thing, drenched in the blood of those that dared to test the Tenets of Night.

"Losara Queen, we stand ready for war-making," Jindrich said. "We will tread this blaze, should you wish it so."

The holy one smiled, white teeth flashing like ivory in shade.

"Miracles don't come cheap, Jindrich," the First Under the Night said. "And there are only so many I can bear. Fortunately, I have something almost as dangerous to wield."

The Mighty smiled, pleased at the sharing of wisdom.

"What may this be, Losara Queen?"

The holy one's eyes crinkled in amusement, and it inclined its head behind them.

"Madmen, Jindrich," the First Under the Night said. "Never underestimate what a few of those can accomplish when told something is impossible."

Behind them the gobberin had opened begun empty the carts, to work with wood and steel to raising strange wooden structures and nail them solid. Skins reeking of vinegar were taken out from the bags, and boxes of snow prepared. Long staves of metal and wood, some with broom-like endings and others not, were prepared and made wet with a strange concoction kept in bottles.

"Prepare yourself, Mighty Jindrich," Losara Queen said. "We'll pass where the blaze is weakest, but to hesitate is death."

"It was ever thus," it laughed, and raised its fist to the sky.

All is Night, Mighty Jindrich yelled out, and its sigil echoed in kind. For a moment, it thought, that prophecy drowned out even the roar of the fire.

—

"I missed this," Special Tribune Robber admitted.

There'd been some good laughs, since the Boss had gone underground to take over yet another nest of vipers in order to throw it at one of the other nests of vipers. He'd gotten to hunt Imperial agents in the streets like animals with the Guild of Assassins, stuck it to the Matrons while negotiating for munitions in Thief's name and even gotten to see what happened when you sent back a High Lady's threatening envoy by trebuchet. There'd been deaths, too, but no anyone he cared too much about. Well, Hakram had somehow managed to lose another hand but sad at was Robber was looking forward to the truly legendary amount of sarcasm the Boss would inflict him over it so it could be called a draw. Pickler was still both mind-blowingly lovely and completely out of reach, especially when putting shady dwarven gold to nefarious purposes, but that was just the way of life. Robber of the Rock Breaker Tribe, also known as the Lesser Footrest to Her Majesty the Queen of Callow, had started to figure he'd seen it all. He'd been to more places most goblins ever would, killed people in most of them and participate in the strategic arson of not one but several cities. He was no longer young, by his people's standards, and he'd wondered if it might not be time to start thinking about a glorious death.

Then the Boss had come back, and she was as superbly mad as ever.

She'd left as some sort of bastardly immortal fae thing and come back breathing and smelling like a mortal, with an army of bloodthirsty treacherous magical dark elves she'd somehow become a religious figure for if he'd picked up on the chatter right. And she was going to use them to wage war on half the continent, so she could make it sign some sort of treaty then use that to attack the Hidden Horror as a united front. She also had in stand a blackwood staff that felt to his senses like some sort of silent, monstrosly large predator and she was talking shit to some possibly god-like crows that no one but her seemed to be able to look at directly for more than a fraction of a heartbeat at a time. Robber had been close to those things for hours, and even avoiding to look at them he'd since been plagued with some of the most horrifying nightmares of his life. Gods, it was just like coming home. And now she'd decided that the best way to use tactical surprise was to attack through where no one had positioned troops, which had happened because the place in question was on fire. So he'd casually been informed that his cohort was to build several examples of a lighter siege turtle so that she could stuff seven hundred soldiers in them and run through a city fire, in order to crack a frozen river. All the while and enemy army and several larger cavalry contingents were on the prowl.

No one did crazy like the Boss. There was a reason goblins volunteered to enroll in the Army of Callow, and it wasn't the Hellhound's winning personality.

"You know, sometimes I wonder if there's something in the water back in the Grey Eyries," Catherine Foundling drawled. "It'd explain a lot about goblins. Isn't lead supposed to make people go mad? How likely is it that there's some in your wells?"

"I wouldn't know, I've only ever drunk the blood of my enemies," Robber shamelessly lied.

"That sounds rather unsanitary," the Boss said. "Zeze says there's all sort of humours in that."

The inside of the modified siege turtle was stiflingly hot, even with all the preparations. Skins soaked in vinegar and water, boxes of snow to cool the air coming from the slight openings above and poles coming out of the shuttered panels that allowed enterprising drow to push down anything still on fire that came too close. Beneath the bottom rim, still-burning embers could be swept with broom-like poles when they were layered too thickly or skins of water used to put out open flames – though the smoke and vapour from that was wicked, and had already scalded a few unwary goblins. Each of the shells allowed for fifty people to hide under, fourteen brave turtles having tried the blaze. One had been struck by a falling beam barely twenty feet in, and less than ten of those inside had managed to crawl screaming back to the safety of outside the fire. The outer ring was the most dangerous part, though, they'd know that from the start. The fire had begun somewhere deeper in, and spread out more or less in a circle depending on where stone and space obstacles could be found. Past that part there'd been progressively less flame and more smoulder, though that hardly meant there was no danger. More than once the lack of air or the heat of what was left to breathe had made soldiers pass out.

The lucky ones fell inside the shell when there were enough in shape left to carry them. The others were left behind for the fire to take. The Boss had made it clear she couldn't start calling on her tricks without putting the river work at risk, and there was no point in trying this at all if she exhausted herself trying to keep everyone alive. Another turtle was lost when its warriors misjudged what they were stepping on under the ash layer and got themselves over red-hot stone, a chunk of the drow immediately dropping with screams as their thinner boots got torched through and the turtle fell for lack of enough people holding it up. The structure turned into an oven within moments, and the four survivors only lasted long enough to make it out in the open – which wasn't any more survivable than inside. Robber had been blessed enough to share a shell with the Boss herself, and she'd been utterly nonplussed the whole way through. Her face had darkened every time a turtle was lost, but they'd pressed on anyway. Everyone inside was sweating like a pig, including her. Robber watched the Queen of Callow pat down her cloak while hobbling forward and cleared his throat.

"Looking for something?" he asked.

In front of them a pair of drow shifted the panels open, knocking down a wooden wall half-devoured by flames and almost entirely blackened. The panels closed, and the turtle came forward. Soon they'd reach the last crucible, the second part of the outer ring – and after that, out onto the snow.

"Would you happen to have matches on you?" the Boss casually asked.

"Sure," Robber snickered, reaching for his sapper's bag.

Sadly all the munitions delicate in the face of heat had to be removed, but he still had a few goods left to peddle. Including a set of pinewood matches, which he handed to his queen. She let out a noise of appreciation then shoved her staff into the crook of her arm, produced from her cloak an already stuffed pipe and struck the match. Within moments it was lit, filling the turtle with the acrid scent of wakeleaf. She carelessly dropped the match on the ground, where it fell on embers and almost instantly began burning up.

"That is cruel," Robber admiringly said.

And yet when he flicked his eyes, he caught most the drow smothering grins. Gods, they actually enjoyed the Boss being like that didn't they? Kind of an asshole, and utterly indifferent to the fact that they were strolling through a bonfire of a city if it got in the way of her petty pleasures.

"I waited until we were on the last stretch," the Black Queen defended herself.

She added something in the drow tongue afterwards, and the drow roared and sped up. Robber was pretty sure, by the tone, that it was along the lines of 'put your back into it, I haven't got all day'. After that it wasn't long until through the thin openings made into the wood he was able to glimpse the silhouettes of tall granite statues, and a mostly open way to there. Which was for the best, given that some of his minions were starting to slow down and only kept from passing out by biting their lips bloody. There was a sudden crash behind, and the Boss called out in drow tongue: the porters at the back opened the shutters there, revealing a large wooden plank had scythed through the middle of the turtle right behind them. Catherine breathed in sharply at the sight, then cast a look in front. Not out of the woods yet, Robber thought. Another call in drow-tongue. The shutters were shut and the advance resumed. Eleven turtles made it out onto the snow, out of the fourteen who'd set out.

There were some, Robber thought, who'd call that a miracle.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!

Aston

Go Cat with your power of being an ordinary but insane human.

Love the fire walking scene.

Cat is slowly winning as the series winds down to a conclusion.

Hope she has many more mad ideas.

theothin

I don't think we're approaching the conclusion yet. We're pretty early in the fifth book, and from what I understand, Erratic is currently planning on a total of six. Still time for all sorts of things to go wrong!

Javvies

I love Robber POVs. He's awesomely hilarious. I really want to know more about what happened in Callow while Cat was gone now.

Poor Abigail, I'm pretty sure you don't really have anyone who you can complain to when Cat steals your wine. Hakram, maybe, since he wanted Cat to stop drinking so much. But, as Robber noted, Cat's going to have all kinds of fun ripping on Hakram for losing another hand.

Agent J

Trust your instincts. The answer is, indeed, Hakram. Remember Indrani's tavern crawls? When in doubt, send the bill to the Deadhand. You'll be reimbursed promptly.

Rook

He'd probably reimburse her by making the field promotion permanent and doubling her workload

Euodiachloris

But, hey... actual pay. This is what winning looks like, right? 😊

Author Unknown

He should send her some grog as compensation. Let her try to complain about it without insulting Hakram or orcs in general.

stevenneiman

Not his style. I feel like he would totally just add the price of a new bottle onto her pay as a general. Alienating people like that isn't wise even if it is funny, but using it as an opportunity to make her slightly more inescapably stuck being a general would be totally practical. And just as funny.

Liliet

I could 100% see Hakram sending her a new bottle of wine with an apology note along the lines of "I'm sorry for my alcoholic queen and I'll have a stern talking-to with her about it"

...ok probably not but he would 100% think that. While sending her a new bottle of wine and reimbursement for the old one.

Matthew

This is easily one of my favourite chapters to date. Catherine is magnificently mad, and Robber is always a scene stealer 😁

nipi

Yup. Cat broke her promise of not drinking while on campaign.

Argentorum

She broke it, because she is allowed to lie now. Hakram can be angry all he wants.

RanVor

It is in equal parts amusing and aggravating that everybody seems to think the only reason Cat kept her promises as the Sovereign of Moonless Nights was because she was incapable of breaking them. Did it not occur to any of you that she might have thought being honest to her friends is a good idea?

Liliet

IKR.

Sure, it was easier for Cat to stick to her promises when she was physically incapable of breaking them, but there's a reason she made so many of those: she wanted to keep them.

Andrew Mitchell

No, I don't think so. If I recall correctly, that oath was finished when Hakram and Cat were reunited after the battle of the camps (Procer's invasion of northern callow).

stevenneiman

I think my favorite part was either the way that Abigail responds to everything with a mixture of hidden terror at the Black Queen and an inner monologue which bears striking similarities to the way Cat thinks, or the wonderful list from Robber about how awesome Cat is, composed entirely out of things nobody sane would consider good.

Liliet

Yes.

Both of these are so good ;u;

stevenneiman

"Be more careful with those, Hakram! Hands don't grow on trees! Well, except for that one experiment by (insert Dread Emperor here), but even he admitted that was a bad idea."

Shequi

Dread Empress Manipula, I'd wager 😊

Mental Mouse

So that's where the maledendrons in the Wasteland came from!

NerfContessa

Amazingly well done indeed. And robber never disappoints.

rogueofstorms

Jindrich's POV was amaze! "the get of Night" bahahaha. I really hope we get more drow POVs in the interludes because it makes for a really awesome aside.

sengachi

Seeing the perspective of the Mighty is awesome, but at some point I'd really love to see the perspective of some lesser drow for context. I think it would be a fascinating difference.

Liliet

Agreed.

Privilege within drow society is the fucking best topic to potentially explore

HandyCapped

I dunno, privilege is a pretty hard word for something you fairly(unfairly?) murdered yourself repeatedly into.

Liliet

"Privilege" is not a reflection of fairness, only of perspective, in this context.

Mental Mouse

He's not entirely wrong, given Sve Noc created Cat's current body.

danh3107

First we have General Abigail, Hero of Callow

Then Mighty Jindrich, he lusts after huge guts to spill and we end it with the glorious lesser lesser footrest.

What a great chapter

lol

You're saying it wrong, it's General Abigail of Summerholm, HERO OF CALERNIA!

RanVor

Bets on her managing to kill Neshamah by accident?

Gareth Hughes

Bets on her becoming queen of callow after cat?

Liliet

absolutely betting on that maybe not too much but god it's too funny to not entertain as a possibility

Rook

Mighty Jindrich would probably find a way to interpret
Catherine stepping in cow shit as some sort of holy miracle

It's amazing. I hope it lives.

LokeshC2

Well, considering that she's had years of supernatural training to work up her awareness, there must be some divine reason for why she would step into cow dung. And no. I am not stooping so low as to entertain any 'intercessor pushed her' theories.

Owyn Beleforte

Well, Hakram had somehow managed to lose another hand but sad at was Robber was looking forward to the truly legendary amount of sarcasm the Boss would inflict him over it so it could be called a draw.

Also, long live the lesser lesser footrest.

IDKWhoitis

Smoking while walking in a city on fire. Gods damned, Cat knows how to march in style.

This shit is going into the books as the time the Black Queen took a stroll through hell to get to the battle quicker.

caoimhinh

She loves the smell of fire in the morning. It smells like victory XD

I'm a little bit disappointed she didn't just light her pipe from a burning house or something. "The Black Queen burned the town of Sarcella down so she could smoke her weed classy" does have a certain ring to it.

nipi

No no no. She doesnt light it herself. She hands the pipe to one of the drow or goblins who go out to clear a path. "While youre out there be a dear and light it for me."

theothin

Its effect doesn't sound much like weed. I've been reading it as basically being adderall.

Liliet

Does Robber not know it's a painkiller? I just wonder, bc 'walking most of the way without it' sounds like the more badass feat here

sengachi

Oooohhhhhh dang, that's a good catch.

magesbe

At this point I'm kind of expecting her to use Night for the painkiller, but she might be conserving everything to break the river.

Liliet

Yeah.

dominator10

I fully expect Juniper to be reading a report about suitable recompense for when the Black Queen appropriates an acting general's wine when all this is said and done.

...

And summarily ignore it.

Liliet

foist it off on Hakram
Not Her Problem Please And Thank You

Jonnnney

Elves are ageless and made of flesh. Fae from Arcadia are immortal and are made of magic. The fae don't breed they merely come back to life when the seasons change while elves breed via the trees or something(the elves on this continent have no children because they slaughtered the original inhabitants of their forest). Elves can breed with other races the normal way to get half elves.

Jonnnney

Hey now Abigail has shown to be able to use wine to yield strategic success. Taking her booze is like taking Catherine's fire.

Novice

A so-called queen stealing something that is rightfully her general's? Now you see the Oppression inherent in the system. Down with the Foreign Wicked Tyrants!

naturalnuke

Technically where they're from they're just called Wicked Tyrants.

daegone823

I think out of all the races:
Fae, Dwarves, Human, Goblin, Human, Undead, Giants, Demon(?), Angel, Ogre, Orc, Elf(what is the difference between Elf and Fae?)

we can have another popularity contest if needed. Hopefully author see this.

boballab

Traditionally beings like Elves, Nymph's, Hags, Gnomes, Pouka's, Pixies and others I don't recall off the top of my head make up what is called "The Fae". In that context that makes all Elves, Fae but not all Fae are Elves.

matesbe

The difference between an elf and fae is... literally everything. They are completely different species. They are as different as humans and fae are.

Not the least of which is that elves are beings of the normal world while Fae primarily dwell in Arcadia.

daegone823

Any other differences because you mentioned location that is all?

What is the difference Wise Magesbe?

nipi

Fae probably cant be killed permanently

Dresden 67

They're entirely different species.

Fae are creatures of Arcadia, made by the Gods before Creation. They are truly immortal, even when they're killed they eventually reincarnate in a different form.

Elves are a species that were created at the same time as humans, orcs, goblins and everything else in Creation. They actually originate on a different continent, they came to Calernia 3000 plus years ago. They're eternally young and have some unusual abilities but they can be killed permanently.

I really don't understand why you'd assume they're the same.

Jonnnney

Elves are ageless and made of flesh. Fae from Arcadia are immortal and are made of magic. The fae don't breed they merely come back to life when the seasons change while elves breed via the trees or something(the elves on this continent have no children because they slaughtered the original inhabits of their forest). Elves can breed with other races the normal way to get half elves.

matesbe

As others have said in great detail, but I shall bestow upon you my wisdom and list some other differences:

Fae aren't even alive as we know it, they are basically parts of Arcadia personified. They are stuck in a story, especially in Arcadia but even to an extent outside. Elves are (relatively) ordinary living beings. They are born in Creation. When they die, the same thing happens to them as happens to any other living being. When Fae die, they basically respawn for the next round of the story. Don't know if that still happens after the courts united.

Elves get stronger the longer they live, Fae will never change in power unless they're a Prince/Princess that becomes Kind/Queen. Elves can selectively ignore one rule of creation (or at least the stronger ones can), Fae are bound by creations rules as long as they are in it.

You not knowing the difference between Elves and Fae isn't just something to miss because some skimming here or there, it requires actively not paying attention to considerable swaths of the story.

daegone823

I am so glad main character is no longer a far, so I won't have to bother. Confused me in high school with Shakespeare, confused me in dungeons and dragons play through, got worse after reading Dresden files, why would this story fix my affliction/ ignorance.

Thank you though I think with the help of the community I have a better grasp this Killian is a quarter elf not fae.

Liliet

I mean every single story/setting has a different distinction between elves and fae. If you think it's the same everywhere, no wonder you're confused 0.0

Pethrai D'arkos

What? No! Killian isn't a quarter-elf she's a quarter-fey. That's why she can't do higher sorceries, because at those power levels her magic tries to manifest flaming wings which her body is not physically capable of handling.

Mind Ranger is a half-elf.

Darkening

You forgot Devils, they're distinct from Demons, and the Drow are different than elves, and while we haven't seen them in person, Gnomes are confirmed to be in setting, with ridiculous technology.

Euodiachloris

And, the Gnomes could, if we're very unlucky, be... Kender.
Which would, indeed, be a scary, scary thing.

boballab

You know Cat is going to get blamed for that fire now that she used it in a wickedly devious plot.

Decius

She DID drop a lit, used match in the area where the fire started.

naturalnuke

The heroes investigating the scene later will have a field day with this.

daegone823

Also am I the only one who is happy that Nauk actually got a heroes send off. Truly happy that author including something for our finger chewing orc.

I don't know; it looks just the tiniest bit too cool and drawn out, especially right after the previous chapter's lengthly complaints in the comments. At least he didn't gain a Name out of nowhere.

Liliet

I don't think it wasn't pre-planned, I think people were just complaining prematurely.

Faiir

This was glorious!
Another!

Hakurei06 sengachi

Who else is looking forward to whatever the hell it is that happens when drow kill and harvest a Lantern?

Atagan

My bet is that they try but Night and Light are incompatible so they have to harvest everything except the holy things in a priest's corpse. Or maybe they do manage to and we get miracle wielding, night sworn, winter dipped drow.

Dragrath

Moonlight is a thing especially since she is no longer the Duchess of moonless nights promoted Queen of Winter...

Sugar Roll

Word on the street is, the fastest way to become a general in the army of Callow is through arson.

Decius

"you went to the Crown of the Dead to kill the Dread Empress and prevent her making a deal"

"Yes. That's exactly what I went there to do."

sengachi

I mean ... it's not entirely wrong.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's exactly what she can say before Cordelia.

"I went to the Crown of the Dead to kill the Dread Empress and prevent her making a deal with the Dead King. Killed her twice and ruined some of the Dead Kings toys, and set some stuff on fire, though I'm sorry to say I didn't kill her enough times to prevent the alliance."

Then she just looks at Grey Pilgrim cause that ones going to be hard to counter.

Liliet

I don't think she made a secret before Cordelia or anyone else on that level about what she went to Keter to do.

Now, stories spread in general populace always simplify – and in this case, they happened to simplify away the unpleasant and also not-working-out part :3

Not that killing Malicia worked out, but Catherine put a great deal more effort & risk into that part.

I'm still kind of amazed by the fact that that, like... happened. And the entire Woe was like 'sure yeah killing her over the fact she'd sell out half the continent if given the chance to make the deal sounds like a good reason to tangle with the Dead King's powerful servants and potentially piss off the Hidden Horror himself while we're on his territory'.

"This seems rather ill-mannered, as she does not own it" – Masego, being the darling that he is.

Catherine fully 100% deserves the credit she got for this, even if it's also sweeping under the rug an uglier fact.

sengachi

"You know what they say about the Callowan army?"

"What do they say?"

"Goblins volunteer to join."

"... dear Gods preserve us."

antoninjohn

Levant "We have all the ways to attack us blocked off with fortifications and lots of trips or on fire, there is no way they can mount a working counter attack now."

Cat "Look at weak spot in their defence line."

Callow General "Your grace, that's a field of burning buildings"

Cat "The fire not green so let's get going through them"

RanVor

Double miracles!

I'm curious what the priests will tell upon witnessing the Night.

konstantinvoncarstein

"Oh shit", I suppose

Ashen Shugar

lol. Despite now being in the same position, Abigail still thinks Cat started the fire.

nipi

Robber might be inching towards a name seeing as how he can sense power in Cats staff.

Also Cat, dont teach the citizens of murder below that being mad is something they should be desiring.

Euodiachloris

That, or the Sisters Gruesome are messing about by deliberately making the thing so very highly ominous that even Muggles with a half-way decent sense of self-preservation can pick up on it.

shrugs

Wyvern

Since when, exactly, has Robber had a half-way decent sense of self-preservation?

Liliet

I think the staff is just inherently ominous, obvious from a regular mortal's perspective as well. It's miracles after all, not magic, much less precise in its effect.

Mike E.

This was so worth it just for Robber's POV.

"gotten to see what happened when you sent back a High Lady's threatening envoy by trebuchet."

Liliet

The Pickler bit was so cute ♥

nipi

Anyone else thinking that the dwarves dont meddle much in the affairs of the surface dwellers because they have some kind of agreement with the gnomes restricting them to "below the mountain"?

Oshi

Dwarves have a civilization that is so big the surface world would fit in a cup as far as they are concerned. Why would you bother worrying about Alaska when you are setting the continental US?

Jonnnney

The dwarves are larger than the small nations of Calernia, but they still fear the hidden horror and there are nations larger than said continent out there. Calernia as a whole is but a small piece of a much larger world

Jonnnney

The gnomes don't seem to care about any other than keeping their trchnogical superiority. Remember that the continent of Calernia is barely important in the grand scheme of things. The elven empire that the Golden bloom came from is larger than the entire continent. The dwarves aren't someone who can be smaked down easily but they are not on Par with the gnomes.

Sylwoos

Dwarf technologies is definitely stepping on the gnome's toes. It's not a coincidence that the most advanced race of Calernia happen to live underground where no crying work and flying ship aren't a threat.

Liliet

I don't think so. All we've seen is magic – runes, lava elementals – and regular siege engines, just very well-made.

Nowhere near modern tech, and gnomes would be past that by now.

Zaver SaintCloud

Times like this, I really wish the stories had Tags, so I could actually go back and find stuff. For example, I vaguely know General Nauk, but would be nice to reread his screen time from the War College and first battles. Abigail is more familiar, and now I want to read again her fights against the Fae, especially when she infamously earned the reputation for eating them, lol. Seriously though, please please think about Tags. Finding anything specific in prior chapters is effectively impossible.

Liliet

google "site:practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com Nauk" not a replacement for tags but a surprisingly good way to find stuff

Cicero

Abigail is in Kaleidoscope IV

theart0fwar

> and participated in the strategic arson of not one but several cities.

Aaah, goblins.

tbarim

Bets on whether Abigail becomes Queen of Callow?

Liliet

she will

Dresden 67

Nauk is in almost every chapter of the second half of Book 1 and the battle scenes in Book 2 aren't hard to find in the Table of Contents.

We never actually saw Abigail fight the fae, she was introduced in Interlude: Skirmish 1 and 2.

Daniel E

Much obliged! Though I think my original point remains valid. For Abigail, I'm thinking of the conversation she has with some Orc, where she gets complimented on eating the Fae like an Orc would, but in truth it was just a blood spray in her mouth. It was like 1 paragraph, but finding it without Tags would be an arduous process, to say the least. If I could look at every story marked 'Abigail', that would reduce my searching to all of 5 minutes.

Cicero

Kaleidoscope IV is where we hear about Abigal drinking the blood of fae.

Hoeru

Best chapter in ages. LOVED IT!

Adrian V

Now i want more interactions between Abigail and Cat, from both POVs, i almost feel she got promoted so the author had a reason to get them in the same room more often.

Now maybe its a redherring, maybe it is only me wishfully thinking, but am i the only one who thought the description of how Nauk was killed is curious, i mean it sounds like the heat did nothing to him directly, i doubt this is a case of him being alive encased in iron (although...) but maybe they had to "cheat" to kill him, something like banishing his soul from his body even when the body didn't have a wound, anyway maybe the way he was killed left the door open for more hands on intervention.

Of course this all assuming the Lanterns didn't go all stabby once they saw him not burning...

Liliet

I wonder if Abigail is an organically developed running gag, like "hmmm I need a POV here... oh hey Abigail exists" or if her story was pre-planned from the first time she came up.

Exec

TYPOS:

1. she patted the Abigail's shoulder
2. "It was odd, Abigail though," thought*
3. "south-western partss of Sarcella" parts*
4. "I need you to looking into something."
look*? go looking?
5. "had opened begun empty the carts"
6. "but sad at was"
but sad as that was*?
7. "and participate in the strategic" participated*
8. "She also had in stand a"
in hand*?
9. "All the while and enemy"
an enemy*

onedollargum

Fire Walk with Me.

Viconr

Hmm... They could not remove Nauk's body from his armor and couldn't burn/melt it...

I sense some sort of dreadknight or something in the making.

Adrian_V

I nearly forgot!!

Is no one going to comment on how weird it is that some drow could turn into extremist hippies? or maybe hippie isn't the right word...ecologically conscient? mmm anyway i can just picture some of them starting fights so someone doesn't fell a tree or something xD

Mikasi

It's more to the fact that wood is precious in the underground.
Sort of a reverse scarcity situation. They don't understand that, as long as the forests are tended right, there's an almost infinite supply. Thus why Jindrich thinks the idea of someone having access to an entire forest is nothing but lies.

AKA Stone is cheap in the Underdark, but your average wooden desk is a treasure.

werafdsaew

Since Cat is going to be using the Night anyways to unfreeze the river, why not just gate in there directly instead of going through the fire?

Liliet

1) She has a limit on how much Night she can call upon in quick succession before, well, burning out.

2) I think opening a gate to Arcadia lights a much brighter metaphysical flare for anyone who's looking than strictly local effects.

Skaddix

1) Yeah Cat has more control especially with Sve Noc helping her on the more complicated aspects but she has so to speak smaller mana pool and less Stamina. As she is not a Named or Fae Abomination. She is simply Human.

2) Gates to Arcadia are unreliable right now and are currently being shunted to various Hells. The Fae don't know why. Masego is on a bender and cannot be reached. While Sve Noc and Akua haven't really had a chance to study the issue. Not to mention Sve Noc doesn't want make it obvious they recently under went Apotheosis by throwing around too much raw power. So reliable Gates are out for the probably most of this volume at least.

Liliet

There were no issues with Sve Noc using the gate, 'charting' the path for Cat. I suspect it has to do with them calculating it manually, as opposed to fae doing it reflexively

Skaddix

Have we seen them Sve Noc try to gate since they landed? The Army of Callow had no problem gating into the region. Its once they got to the region that they found themselves unable to reliably Gate.

Liliet

Hm, that's one possible mechanism of how it works, good point,

Adrian V

And all of that is harder during the day, if it was night she probably could do it like that. Or at least use some night to protect against the fire somewhat.

Cicero

Good thing Cat only had drow and goblins with her for that trek through fire. Orcs are notoriously afraid of fire you know. Especially Hakram, his delicate constitution would have made hick sick like a dove.

Mlissa

So far away we wait for the day
For the lives all so wasted and gone
We feel the pain of a lifetime lost in a thousand days
Through the fire and the flames we carry on

Vicont

Wait, Abigail said she wasn't there during Lanterns' attack.

"Them Dominion priests hit a meeting of the general staff," she replied. "Lanterns, I think they're called. One moment it's night, then it's bloody Light everywhere and most the room is dead. I was looking into a supply discrepancy so they didn't get me ..."

But then she thinks

"The Callowan wouldn't forget the sight of Nauk Princekiller's fangs having snapped straight through the neck of a priest anytime soon. Not when Light had melted his plate before he even got moving, drips of molten metal leaving a trail of how he'd leapt for the kill even dying."

That's kinda contradictory.

Javvies

Not necessarily.

The "checking into a supply issue" means she wasn't in the primary target zone when the Lanterns struck, not that she wasn't necessarily nearby or able to see what happened.

Besides ... Abigail's statement could just as easily be describing her memories of viewing the aftermath. Nauk killed his target, and the bodies remained where they fell when the surviving Lanterns withdrew.

Vicont

Wasn't in primary zone – maybe, but what – she was checking papers somewhere conveniently in line of sight?... Well, she COULD be checking something not important enough for staff room, but specifically in sight of General to be on his call... Yes, like taking subordinate out of the room into another, but leaving doors open, that's possible.

Viewing the aftermath – no, her memories sound like direct witness to me.

Still think author simply taken two different variants and forgot about it.

Interlude: Beheld II

"A good sword will find a use, or make one."
– Levantine saying

This was to be an iron day, Captain Elvera could feel it in her bones.

Twenty years she'd served as an officer under the Lord of Tartessos, then a further eight under his daughter the Lady Aquiline – and before that she'd been part of a Brocelian band, as both spearwoman and striker. It was the last of those experiences she drew on now, trusting the instincts that had seen her survive iron days ranging from chimeras maddened to an entire flock of ensorcelled drakes. Something nasty was about to come for the army that had been under her command until yesterday's dusk, and they were not prepared. Elvera might be old and slow, these days, but she'd seen more bloodshed than the rest of this army of pups put together. They thought a few honour feuds and sanctioned hunts had them prepared for war, but it had not. The Army of Callow had spent most of a night and day making that viciously clear to anyone with eyes to see. It was just her luck that Razin Tanja, of the Binder's Blood, had been stuck with blindness for want of glory. Just a fucking boy, she thought, not without bitterness. Some eighteen summers youth who saw a way to hallow his already hallowed line in sending soldiers charging to their deaths at Callowan hands.

Bones creaking as they would not have twenty years ago, the captain walked the streets of Beaumontant quarter with her twenty sworn swords at her side. A trail of smoke from the east, the quarter still aflame even now, marred the blue sky like stroke of charcoal. Under it the soldiers of the Dominion of Levant clustered behind thick planks of wood and half-broken houses, never daring to look across the divide for long. Callowan crossbowmen had proved to be mercilessly accurate from their distant perch, the sallow-eyed goblins never hesitating to put a bolt in any soldier out of cover for too long. Elvera saw no need to tempt such a fate by advancing too close, having already taken a good look when she led the assault that failed there that very morning. While red-clad legionaries had slowly retreated under the charge of the armsmen of Malaga and Tartessos, the damnable Callowan sappers had torn down two streets' worth of structures and raised palisades between the houses standing behind – leaving an open killing field of stone and wood trapped with blasphemous munitions and vicious steel traps. Elvera had lost three hundred men trying to force a way through before she called a retreat under crossbow volleys and spellfire.

The Callowans knew war, these days, in a way few soldiers of her homeland did. Captain Elvera was old enough to have fought in the Sepulcher War, when the Barrow Lord rose from the depths of Brocelian Forest and struck out with his host of bespelled beasts, barrow-spirits and Blood traitors. She'd taken a hammer blow to the arm that never quite healed right dragging Lord Romeran away from the onslaught, and for that earned both captain's rank and the suit of plate she still wore – enameled with the colours of the Slayer's Blood, a rare honour. She'd even fought in the thick of it at River's Bent, holding the shore sword in hand until the Bestowed slew the Barrow Lord in honourable combat and the Peregrine freed his soul from its earthly prison. That'd been war, but Levant had not known its like in the many years since. The Kingdom of Callow had and its soldiers carried those hard lessons with them. There'd been rumours, of course, fanciful tales that made it even as far as Tartessos – of fairies riding on wings of flame, of a city aflight and spewing out armies of ravenous dead, of a gate opened into the very Hells that unleashed endless hordes of devils. Elvera had not put much trust in these, knowing how stories grew with telling and miles, but now she wondered.

The captain had breached shield walls, under morning light, and seen under the helms more than just Callowans. Greenskins and Wastelanders standing elbow to elbow with warriors born to the Kingdom of Knights, striving and killing and dying together. Singing those harsh, bitter songs the Callowans were so fond of. Ten thousand of these without a speck of horse, their commanders slain by the Lanterns in the dark of night, had turned what should have been a rout into a bloody and costly stalemate. There was spine in that army, Captain Elvera thought, perhaps more so than in her own. She'd seen too many green boys and girls empty their stomachs in the mud when they came across the butcher's yard in Belles Portes quarter, where the wounded and dying had been brought for what healing could be had. The stink of shit, death and bile had not sickened Elvera's nostrils in many years, but at least she had known it before. The eager young captains and their just as young warriors had not, and it had made them flinch. Not that Razin Tanja, heir to Malaga, had been moved by the wails and spilled entrails. No, the boy was already ordering preparations for another push against Callowan defences.

The Tartessian slowed her walk when she reached the outskirts of Beaumontant, near the streets leading into Couteau D'Or. The Tanja boy would be holding council with captains there, but she was in no mood for exhortations and castigations from some pup of a southern Blood. Instead she spoke with the soldiers she'd led into the jaws of the jackal that very morning, preparing them for what was to come. Those officers had broken their bones on Callowan defences earlier, and so were more willing to listen to an old woman's advice than most. They gathered around her, the sworn swords of captains that were attending to the noble boy who'd taken command from her.

"A simple shield wall will get your people killed," Captain Elvera said. "The sappers prepared the grounds to break up tight formations, and their mages will use fire to batter at what holds."

"It's the traps that have been bleeding us the worst, Red Ella," a middle-aged man with a heavy Malagan accent replied. "They've sown caltrops everywhere and the spikes go straight through leather soles."

Elvera let the use of her old sobriquet pass without comment. She wasn't so long in the tooth as not to slap the insolence out of a soldier's mouth if need be, but these officers had never known the sobriquet as the insult it'd been meant to be – just a name other old soldiers called her by, when the ale was plentiful.

"Better those than the buried explosions," a young girl in heavy scale grunted. "Those'll shred a man up to the waist, and sharp pieces shoot out to carve at those near. I'll call anyone a fool who says we've seen the last of those."

If they had the mages or the war hounds of the Lord of Malaga's host with them, the Callowan killing field could have been taken apart slowly but surely. But the vanguard had been ordered to attack without them, and so soldiers would die instead. Dark as the thought was, there was nothing Elvera could do about this and she would not further darken a dark day by speaking ill of the boy commanding this host. Even if he was a glory-thirsting Blood throwback from the least reputable of the founding lines. Command of the army had already been taken from her, she would not take an axe to morale or risk being sent away from the front by speaking out of turn.

"I'll speak plain," she said. "Whoever you send in front will likely die. We'll have to bridge the gap with corpses before we can get to them with blades. Split in smaller bands with shields above the heads and move fast, that ought to thin the costs. But make no mistake, this will get bloody.”

The talk did not please them, though they had expected no salvation from her. Elvera had made no mystery of it that she thought it foolishness to attack the dug-in Army of Callow inside a city with so slight a numerical advantage. Even without walls. If they’d had a three or four thousand warriors more then encirclement and assault would have been a sound scheme, but they did not.

“We should wait for the Lord’s army,” a voice called out from the back.

There were mutters of agreement. For all that the captains were attending to Razin Tanja, they were not all so certain of his scheme to press the attack and this had bled into the lower ranks. The Malagan captains would follow one of their native Blood through Crown and Tower, but there were Tartessos captains as well – furious still at her removal from command – and those captains who had answered the call of the Holy Seljun, not the Lord of Malaga. The latter of these would not easily throw aside the notion of a patron meant to inherit a title, but neither would they destroy their own companies without concrete promises made. The boy’s initial strokes of brilliance had earned him some renown, it was true. Using Proceran smugglers who knew of secret tunnels into Sarcella to bring a war-party of Lanterns into the city and kill the enemy commanders had been inspired, Elvara would freely admit, and not a risk she would have taken in his place. Lanterns were powerful, but few and precious. Striking at Belles Portes while the Callowans were in disarray had been good sense, and if not for a sudden enemy delaying action might well have won the city.

Pressing now, though, when the enemy was ready and waiting? The heir to Malaga was making his inexperience plain for all the captains to see, and it would win him no friends. And yet this kind of talk would not do at all, for an army without a leader was just a mob bearing arms.

“We have bled the Army of Callow harshly with our attack,” Captain Elvara replied. “Let none gainsay this. That is worthy feat, and with wisdom we may yet accrue greater honours.”

If her plate was not enchanted, she would have died in the heartbeat that followed. The barbed javelin struck at the hollow of her throat, where only a leather collar protected her, but Elvara had years ago paid a binder to make the material strong as iron. The bone tip of the javelin broke, though it still took her breath. Even in her surprise the old captain followed her instincts and ducked behind a fence – just in time to avoid an adeptly thrown sling stone that would have caved in her forehead.

"Attack," she roared out. "Back to your soldiers! Tartessos, follow my lead."

A score of officers were already dead by the time she finished speaking, and a few of her sworn swords with them. More were slain trying to flee, though the clever broke into houses to avoid that fate. Elvera risked a glance over the edge of the fence and caught sight only of grey-skinned silhouettes in furs stalking across rooftops before another javelin had her ducking back down. They were seizing the roofs between Beaumontant and Couteau D'Or, she realized with dismay. That'd be throwing away soldiers unless it was the prelude to a strike on one of those quarters, which meant that in defiance of all common sense the Army of Callow was back on the attack. Cursing under her breath, the old soldier prepared to make a run for it. Someone needed to get the Tanja boy out of the way before he got himself killed and the army's spirits dropped into the pit, and who else save her was there? It was going to be an iron day, she'd felt it hours ago, and now that the iron had been in the fire long enough it'd grown red and burning.

Captain Elvera traced the Mark of Mercy with wrinkled hands, then steeled herself and ran out of cover.

—

Edgar was kicked awake, none too gently, and blearily rolled over.

"I was just resting my eyes, I was," he immediately claimed.

A heartbeat later he remembered he'd been allowed his rest, captain's orders, and his fear turned to resentment. The legionary pushed himself up, leaning against the wall, and began to glare at the source of his pain. Just as quick, resentment turned back to fear.

"Get up," Sergeant Hadda grinned, baring twin rows of fangs. "The war's back on, boy."

Edgar counted himself lucky that after the hard fighting of the night and morning he'd been exhausted enough to pass out in his armour, aches in the back or not. Sergeant Hadda was not the kind of officer you ever wanted to keep waiting when she gave an order. He fumbled for his sword-belt under the orc's amused gaze, and after slipping it back on ended up going through the pile of straw that'd been his bedding in order to find the helmet he could have sworn he'd set down to his left. The old sergeant took pity on him eventually, pointing it out, and Edgar hastily brushed aside the last of the straw inside before slamming it on.

"Thought we were pulled back until Afternoon Bell, sarge," he said, warily eyeing her as he pulled the clasp together.

Depending on the orc's mood, questions would either lead to pretty heavy-handed mockery or a fount of useful information. A sergeant was low as an officer could be, in the Army of Callow, but Hadda been in the Legions of Terror long before she took oath under Queen Catherine so she had all sorts of old friends in places. She tended to know more about what was going on than even Captain Pickering, to the man's frustration.

"Everyone's called back to the fronts," Sergeant Hadda said. "Including us poor, exhausted souls. We're about to teach Dominion meat why you don't pick fights with the Legions."

Like a lot of soldiers who'd been in the legions that were brought into the fold after Second Liesse, Hadda tended to speak of the Legions and the Army of Callow as the same thing. As far as they were concerned, Edgar had been told, the Black Queen was the Carrion Lord's anointed successor so there was no distinction to be drawn. As a proper Laure boy he'd found that to be a mite unpatriotic, but then he supposed greenskins were new to the fold. Hadda had been good to him, anyway, for all the rough edges. She'd looked out for her tenth, taught them the little things like 'don't gamble with goblins', 'not all Soninke are warlocks' and 'if you fight a Taghreb the entire family comes after you'.

"Merciful Gods," Edgar muttered. "Everyone said Legate Abigail was planning a retreat, not an assault."

It'd been a shame the Princekiller got killed by them heretic Dominion priests, but he'd thought it nice that a Callowan was leading the Third Army now. It'd been a point pride, when he'd talked with other Laure enlisted. Sure enough the Legate was from Summerholm, and the folks from the Gate of the East tended to be prickly and proud as cats, but they'd all agreed Summerholm stock was good at warring. And Legate Abigail was a true veteran, he'd heard, from the days of the Fifteenth – she'd fought in the Arcadian Campaign and at Akua's Folly. Heavens willing, she might end up confirmed by Marshal Juniper as the general of the Third Army if they all got out of Sarcella alive. Sergeant Hadda's scarred, leathery face split into a nasty little grin.

"General Abigail, now," the orc said. "But that's not the real treat of the day. Put some spring to your step, legionary – the Black Queen's back, so we're about to turn this fucking battle around."

Edgar let out a low whistle. It was always a mixed bag, hearing about Queen Catherine. She'd filled a lot of graves since she'd appeared during the Liesse Rebellion, and no small amount of them had been Callowan ones. But she'd also smashed to pieces all the scavengers that came after the Kingdom, after she wrested it out of the Tower's hand, and it was hard not to take pride in that. Edgar still remembered the sharp satisfaction he'd felt after hearing them sorcerers who'd done the Doom of Liesse had gotten crucified one and all. The queen might be a bit of tyrant, but the Fairfaxes hadn't been all sweetness and light either. Sometimes you needed a hard hand to get it done, like Jehan the Wise hanging seven princes and one. But all that was back home, and before the fucking Procerans had declared her Arch-heretic of the East. The Principate tried the Vales and it tried the north, and when it got whipped like a dog it pulled the same trick it had in the old days. The Callowan House had called it 'perverse service to earthly powers', and that sounded about right to him.

Aye, there might be a time where the Black Queen got a little too black and Edgar found himself joining the rebel cause. But if the fucking Procerans thought their fucking princes and their fucking priests could unseat an anointed queen of Callow then they were in for a rude awakening. Maybe this time they should hang fourteen princes and two, and then another one too for Old King Selwin they'd done in at the Red Flower Vales. Edgar kept to the Heavens, as all Callowans should, but he kept to the long price as well and this one had been a very long time coming. One of these days they'd get around to evening the scales with the Wasteland too, for the Night of Knives and older slights as well, but that could wait some. The greenskins had been done in by the Tower too, bastards as they could be, and they should get their due along with the rest. Edgar did not mind at all the notion of sharing a fire with someone like Sergeant Hadda where the Tower used to stand. He didn't speak out none of that, of course. He was just a legionary, so he ate his slop with the rest of the tenth and joined up with the rest of the cohort to march up to the outskirts of Couteau D'Or quarter. He'd been worried, when going to sleep, that they might all get caught in the city and killed. Edgar wasn't worried anymore, though.

Say what you would about the Black Queen, she'd never lost a battle.

He clutched that knowledge tight as the cohorts gathered behind the defences, ranks and ranks of legionaries in red. It was all right to be afraid, he knew. On the other side of the killing grounds there would be warriors waiting, and Edgar had seen enough of his fellows die to learn that being clever or good with a sword wasn't always enough to save you. He'd seen better fighters than him die because they'd been a little too slow raising their shield, because they'd slipped in the mud or even just because they'd been on watch when the Helike cataphracts struck. You couldn't own that, you couldn't force it: it was in the hands of the Gods Above. But he wasn't just Edgar of Laure, a boy in armour in the third rank from the front. He was a legionary in the Third Army of the Kingdom of Callow, and in this strange city in this strange land they were going to win. He could feel it, and the others felt it too. It was in the air, the harsh taste of retribution in the making. He could see in the eyes of the orcs, burning red. He could see it in the way the soldiers from Laure and Ankou, from Vale and Summerholm, they were all standing like they wanted to lean forward. And the Wastelanders they had it as well, the Taghreb and the Soninke, with their calm faces and their hard eyes – like they knew how this would end and they were already savouring it.

He didn't know who started singing, but Edgar did not hesitate to join his voice to it. There were times when the old rebel songs, the likes of Here They Come Again and Red The Flowers, they were what needed to be called out. But here, slowly beginning to advance against the soldiers of the Dominion? They'd give the Black Queen her due, just the once, for this song was hers and no one else's. The tune of In Dread Crowned swelled up, as crossbow bolts flew and legionaries raised their shields. Step, step, step: the beat was in his bones, the rhythm of it. They advanced through the flat grounds, arrows and stones harmlessly glancing off. Edgar unsheathed his blade, smelling the scent of magic unleashed.

*"Be they high or resplendent our oaths stand taller still
And in the west do quiet lie graves we have yet to fill-"*

Balls of flame detonated against the enemy, and the Third Army charged into the chaos with a roar.

—

It was madness.

The Callowans were on their last rope and everybody knew it, but they might have held on to some part of the city until nightfall and spared themselves slaughter if they'd remained in their hiding holes instead of sallied out. Razin did not know whether to be delighted or infuriated they had not. He'd had plans in the making to land another crushing blow, and had been talking the most recalcitrant captains around to backing it: another push against Callowan lines accompanied with cavalry raids on the side, all to mask another strike by the Lanterns against the high command of the heretics. There would be no recovering from that, discipline or no. The war leader of the Lanterns had been most willing to send her warrior-priests into the fray, and the heir to Malaga had been slowly squeezing the Tartessos captains into silence when the damned Callowans struck instead. Some few thousand grey-skinned devils had been summoned and sent to disrupt his positions in Beaumontant and Couteau D'Or, though too few to truly be a threat. He'd immediately ordered them chased out from the rooftops they were skulking on, loyal captains heeding his calls and arranging for archers and slingers to disperse the abominations, but no sooner had the exchanges began that the Army of Callow attacked. It had been... grisly.

Razin Tanja was of the Grim Binder's line and inherited her famous poise even if he had not been graced with her equally famed sorceries, so he'd not let the horror of it reach his face. But it would be a long time before he forgot the sight of it: those implacable rows of steel shields advancing in tight formations, heretics of all stripes singing their strange songs as they slew. The way crossbow bolts had fallen like summer rain, punching through all but the finest scale and plate. Foul eastern magics of flame and lightning arcing over ranks to blacken stone and sweep aside men like kindling. All the while whistles were sounded by their calm-faced officers, calling lines of legionaries forward or back like it was a parade ground and not as hellish a fight as this city could stomach. The strange devils had waited until Razin's soldiers were on the backfoot before leaping down the rooftops and fiercely charging into the men of Levant, and that'd tipped the vase over the table's edge. A rout had followed, Razin himself only escaping unscathed because that old dog of the Resafa, the one they called Red Ella, had him seized by her sworn swords before ordering them to slay any warriors impeding their way out.

Beaumontant was no safer, he'd soon learned. The Callowans had begun an offensive there as well, and the streets were packed tight with soldiers whose captains had died in Couteau D'Or or were still struggling to reach their companies. The chaos reached its apex when the Army of Callow reached the outskirts of Beaumontant from the side of Couteau D'Or as well, having wrought great slaughter. Panic spread at the realization that the Dominion's force was now surrounded on three sides: on two of them red-bladed Callowans, and the third the blaze the heretics had started trying to kill the Lanterns during their retreat. Only behind them, in Belles Portes, did the Dominion still hold ground. But many of the wounded had been set there, for lack of an easy way to carry them out of the city after the assaults of the night and morning, and the makeshift infirmaries made it difficult to get reinforcements through. It'd been a disaster in the making even before the Army of Callow began tossing its munitions – and Razin swore would see those declared blasphemy by Lanterns and House if it was the last thing he did – into the disorganized soldiers.

The second rout was even bloodier than the first. The heir to Malaga left the city in haste, passing the duty of holding Belles Portes to the doddering Captain Elvera in his absence, and went to stir up the rest of the army. The Callowans had struck a hard blow, he would give them that, but with that vain gesture they had doomed themselves. Their legionaries would be exhausted, their mages on the edge of burning out and their stocks of munitions running low. This had been a harder-earned victory than Razin would have preferred, but it would be a victory nonetheless. Father would forgive his impetuosity in seizing command of the vanguard without permission if he returned with the destruction of a Callowan army to honour their Blood. The wounded would be brought out onto the plains, to rest in the army's camp, and then he would muster the might of Levant to crush these heretics. There were still seven thousand kept in reserve, and order would be sent to the riders probing the east and west to strike when given the proper signal. Razin was about to send summons to the Lanterns, to offer them the privilege of leading the counterattack at his side, when he was accosted by one of his lesser captains.

"Honoured Son, there is trouble," the old man said after a cursory bow.

His mail was old and the leather lacking luster, which betrayed the nature of his soldiery where lack of an accent failed to provide. One of the captains who had answered the call of the Holy Seljun, not the lords and ladies of Levant. Razin forced himself to be courteous and offer back a nod of respectful acknowledgement. He already knew that after this battle was won the captains from Tartessos would seek to sully his name, and that support from those unsworn would do much to help his reputation. If all but the captains of Lady Aquiline sang his praises, the condemnations of her soldiers would be seen for the base defamation that they were.

"Have our captains of the horse sent word?" he asked.

"No, it was our camp watch," the man said. "An enemy force has emerged from the southeast of the city."

It took a moment for Razin to grasp what was being said, and just as long to fully disbelieve it.

"Through the fire?" he said. "Have the men been drinking?"

"I thought the same, and so sent trusted armsmen of my own to look," the old captain replied, but shook his head. "The Callowans passed through using strange wooden engines covered in skins. There truly is a force of nearly six hundred, goblins and devils. They are led by a human, however."

"A warlock from the East," Razin frowned. "It would explain the appearance of these grey-skinned devils. The mage must be slain, it might make the abominations still in the city turn on the enemy."

The old captain hesitated.

"Honoured Son, this I did not see with my own eyes," he cautioned.

Razin almost gestured impatiently, before remembering himself, and so instead forced a smile.

"Speak, captain," he encouraged.

"Some of my men say the human wore a cloak," the old man said. "One of black cloth, but with strips of many colours."

Razin Tanja of the Binder's Blood paled. There was only one villain known in this age to wear such a strange garment.

"Ashen Gods," the boy croaked. "Gather your men, captain. Gather everyone. We must slay the Black Queen before she pulls her foul tricks."

Fear pulsed in his blood, but as Razin had his servants saddle his horse he found there was excitement buried deep beneath. If he could kill the black-hearted Queen of Callow, it might just break the back of her armies for good and sent the lot of them scuttling back across their borders. What an honour to the Blood that would be. It would not do to be reckless, he reminded himself: he was of the Binder's line, not the Champion's. He gathered two thousand men before setting out, the rest assembling behind with orders to catch up, and horns were sounded for the captains of the horse in the eastern plains to join battle as well. Razin was informed that the Lanterns were already gone to the fight for Sarcella, but messengers would fetch them. Better to share the glory than make a bold corpse. The Black Queen's goblins and abominations had already slain a few brave outriders, by the looks of it, but the march of her warband was otherwise unimpeded. Captains riding at his side, summoned in haste, Razin watched the few hundred fools keep advancing even in the face of his superior force.

"It may be a distraction," one of his officers mused. "Just some Callowan forced into a cloak, meant to delay us reinforcing the city."

"Or she has gone mad in her arrogance, as her ilk often does," Razin idly replied. "Perhaps she thinks her warriors will be enough to defeat us."

"We so sure they won't be?" another captain said. "I mean no disrespect, Honoured Son, but we've all heard the rumours about the Battle of the Camps. The sky falling, the dead rising with blue eyes and fairies riding across water..."

There were calls of cowardice, which Razin tacitly allowed to quiet the naysayer through shame. The heir to Malaga would put no stock in such stories, especially not ones so fanciful. First the tale was that the Black Queen had warred against the fae, now that they warred for her? Powerful necromancer as the villain might be, she could not raise corpses that did not exist. As for this tale of the sky being brought down, it could be no work of hers. Perhaps some Wasteland ritual she simply claimed to be her own effort, the scale of it inflated with every telling.

Procerans always excused their defeats by making giants out of gargoyles, it was well-known. A splatter of laughter spread across the captains, commanding Razin's immediate attention. It was not directed at him or the yellow-bellied naysayer, he saw, but at the Black Queen's foolishness. She'd called a halt and now her warriors were spreading out in a circle around her, taking up defensive positions.

"Mad indeed," one of the captains mocked. "Shall we order a charge, Honoured Son?"

Razin's eyes narrowed at the sight of her. The cloak was well-known, but never before had he heard of the Queen of Callow wielding a crooked black staff. Especially not one so... unsettling to look at. Perhaps she did have a trick left to pull.

"Battle lines," Razin Tanja ordered instead. "Our force will take the centre. Send word to the captains behind us that they are to split and flank the Black Queen's warriors."

He glanced into the distance, where the thousand cavalry he'd sent out at dawn was slowly making its way. Yes, this would do. No matter the dark magic, near seven thousand footsoldiers of Levant followed by a cavalry charge at the back would be enough to end this. Razin would not lead from the front, just in case, and allow one of these eager captains the honour instead. It mattered not who slew the goblins and devils, so long as the heir to Malaga was part of the warriors who slew the villain queen. The soldiers spread out as ordered, battle-prayers on their lips, and the assault promptly began. Razin remained with the second wave of the centre, listening to the hurried march of the rest of the troops behind him. Stride after stride the warriors closed the distance, and he watched victory in the making with bright eyes. The grey-skinned devils tightened their lines in front of the villain, the bloody goblins taking cover behind them, but it was the Black Queen he was staring at. Loose hair unbound and toyed with by the wind, she was staring at his soldiers and leaning against her long staff. Eventually she looked up, and Razin followed her gaze. There were shadows in the sky, two of them. Crows, he realized with a start. Corpses would draw carrion, but these were no such birds and flew with graceful purpose. They dove, and like twin blot of night landed on the Black Queen's shoulders.

There was something surreal about the sight, he thought. The smiling, slim woman whose hair cascaded behind her, the cloak of story around her. Those ink-black and terrible crows on her shoulders, feathered out of shadows. Razin watched the crooked staff rise, then fall with a thunderous crash. Shadows whispered across the snow, until the sound of cracks scuttling across a river drowned out even that.

Razin Tanja of the Binder's Blood had just sent the better part of two thousand men to drown, and in that stroke he had lost the Battle of Sarcella.

NZPIEFACE

"A good sword will find a use, or make one."

huh, i dont really get the "make one" part. Holy swords maybe?

ruduen

I believe it's the even-more-aggressive version of, "When all you have is a hammer, everything looks like a nail."

NZPIEFACE

...Oh.

DarkDweller

Nothing quite like a commander so steeped in arrogance saying their opponent is arrogant.

TotesARealPerson

Or a variation of "For iron by itself can draw a man to use it," one of the reasons Odysseus gives to Telemachus for why they must hide away their weapons in the beginning of book XIX of the Oddysey.

Agent J

Do remember that half the reason Hasenbach needed a war in the East was because there were a great deal of "good swords" lying around Procer. If she did not find a use for them they would have made one of their own, one she may not like.

Dainpdf

They already were. Procer was just about up to its ears in unemployed veterans slowly turning to banditry.

Mike E.

Which is one reason why the Crusades ever happened...Europe had a ton of knights and soldiers sitting around with no wars going on, so to keep them occupied somewhere and not able to stir up trouble locally, they got sent east against a new enemy.

NotQuiteHere

May I know what your source is?

NotQuiteHere

If u don't respond fine...but that doesn't sound true to me.

filtern

It is really true. Most scholars of the Crusade agree.

If you are interested in a comprehensive history of the Crusades I'd suggest The Crusades: A History by Jonathon Riley-Smith

There is also a good collection of primary documents called The Crusades: A Reader edited by S.J. Allen and Emilie Amt

filtern

As for that specific instance, look into the Peace of God in Europe which was 'established' preceding the Crusades. Basically, Rome wanted Christians to stop fighting Christians so they increasingly disapproved of conflict between them. It eventually developed into a policy of pointing armies at nonchristians since that was more effective

Abrakadabra

Nah, that is Just bullshit. The muslims by that time besieged or straight occupied all five of The centrals of christianity, (Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, Rome). Rome was Just attacked a years ago by muslim pirates WHO desacrated the tomb of Peter apostle. And the Emperor of the Eastern Roman Empire was asking for help against the muslims, well he got it.

therealgridlock

You tell em boss.

Don't ever let them forget that islam controlled the Mediterranean for 500+ years before the crusades, and burned down the library of alexandria.

therealgridlock

What? No, the crusades started because the Muslims attacked Spain, after 700 years of terrorizing the Mediterranean and piling heads to block out the sun, they finally reached Spain and tried to take it over, and Isabella and Ferdinand said hell no.

Say what you want about the outcome of the crusades, the reason they started is pretty simple to grasp.

Apropos of nothing, over 200 people have died this year in France from "motive still unknown" attacks yelling God is great in Arabic. And 700 wounded.

Sounds like it hasn't stopped to me.

asazernik

The Muslim conquest of Spain was in the 600s-700s.

The First Crusade started in 1096.

Cayle

Thought it was a reference to the blade itself inspires acts of violence. Paraphrased.

Dainsleif

It is. Well less the blade itself inspires violence and more of since the purpose of the blade is to wage war and draw blood one without purpose will look for it somewhere else.

So Hasenbach might be scared of what purpose a sword such as these would create. And rightfully so.

crescentsickle

I interpreted it along the lines of the quote from Erwin Rommel: "In the absence of orders, go find something and kill it."

The "sword" isn't the object but the soldier, and a good soldier performs his duties to his country whether he has explicit orders to or not.

crescentsickle

On a re-read, though, it doesn't really fit the quote at the top of the chapter. Along a similar interpretation, it seems to say (to me anyway): "A good soldier will find a cause to fight for, or they will make a cause to fight for."

stevenneiman

I'd go a bit more philosophical: capacity for violence encourages violence. This whole Crusade started because Cordelia had reforged Procer into a weapon effective enough that she would have lost control if she hadn't used it.

Liliet

I wouldn't say Cordelia did it, she took over Procer militarized enough already as a result of the civil war that she had to do something with the capacity for violence that already existed.

Miles

It's such a nice blade, be a shame not to use it even if it turns out to be the wrong target in hindsight.

Wry Warudo

Always great to see the Lakeomancer in action

Someguy

As a new School of Magic it is not flashy. As an application of Magical Tactics it is superbly sexy.

Sylwoos

I'm not sure what part of dropping lake on top of army isn't flashy.

Rook

It's more splashy than flashy

Javvies

If there's enough light, dropping a lake is flashy from the reflected light
Plus rainbows are a strong possibility.

And it's definitely the opposite of subtle.

My very own name

We all know Cat's awesome, but the point of view of other people just makes that even clearer, both from those with and against her.

Dainpdf

Dear Catherine does seem to have a thing for weaponizing large bodies of water.

stevenneiman

Not specifically. She just has a thing for weaponizing everything available. Allies. Enemies. Geographic features. Stories. Dead goats.

Dainpdf

You must agree that the drowning v boom goat ratio has been tipping of late, though.

Perhaps she's trying to be rid of her arson reputation.

caoimhinh

I think she leveled up and is now dabbling in Riveromancy. Hahaha

Euodiachloris

When she parts a sea to dump it on her enemies... then she will have reached full hydrothaumatergy. 😊

caoimhinh

That seems like a way to help Zeze retaliate against Ashur, nice.

naturalnuke

Everyone knows Lakeomancy is powered by Friendship™!

sengachi

*friendship with terrible and monstrous gods from the deep darkness

RanVor

But friendship nonetheless.

ruduen

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

This has been your regularly scheduled reminder to go vote.

DroughtBringer

Thank you!

HardcoreHeathen

I love how the Levantines keep hearing tales of Callow and Cat, tales that are honestly toned down, and dismissing them as over-embellished nonsense.

It's like if Audie Murphy was an entire country.

Dainpdf

It helps that villains are rarely as powerful as Cat. And that unblooded nobles are idiots.

daegone823

What I love about our Black Queen is that she makes a believer out of every foe.

Her fuckery knows no bounds

Fayhem

♪ And then I saw her lake! Now I'm a believer! Not a trace!
Of doubt in my mind! ♪

Liliet

It's really nice to have no "so last season" syndrome. Both Marchford and the fae were like "I'm sorry what the fuck" at the time. Catherine adapted, but once we zoom out to the whole of the continent the "I'm sorry what the fuck" is still there :
3

Skraeling

I do appreciate how everyone on the continent shit talks procer. It brings joy to me heart it does.

Dainpdf

Imperialism does not breed friendly neighbors. I mean, Levante had to build a wall that eats people just to get Procer to stop invading.

plantsbeans

Wait what? Was this in the peregrine interludes?

Dainpdf

It's what a combination of the previous Cordelia and Peregrine interludes imply.

danh3107

Cat's getting really good at showing up dramatically and murdering scores upon scores of people isn't she.

Barthumphries

If you only bring a sword to a mage fight... You're going to lose.

NZPIEFACE

But when your sword is your staff...

Someguy

The idiots placed themselves on top of a frozen river when the enemy side is known to have munitions and magic-wielders. They win the Darwin Award.

Death Knight

Not really, no. Abigail mentioned in the previous chapter that they'd tried to blow up the ice before but they didn't succeed since the ice was too thick. The charging army most likely did not think the Callowans had anything powerful enough to break the ice. Though Raizan should have reconsidered the charge when the Black Queen took the field. But he's been shown to have blinders where glory is concerned so maybe they do qualify for a Darwin Award, or as it is known in setting The Dread Emperor award.

Dainpdf

Well, villains rarely get as powerful as Cat. Especially non magic ones, which she was until the whole fae thing.

Skaddix

Granted he probably was blinded since they don't believe the Fae cause Fae Cat could have done that feat. Granted they are probably high on the fact that the Warlock is Dead and Masego is MIA presumed KIA by the Heroic Side. So he looks across doesn't see Callow's Greatest Mage and assumes it good to go. I guess it's possible he could tell Cat looked Human again but I doubt it. So probably arrogance.

stevenneiman

I think that they were hoping that she would go down like Amadeus' predecessor, taking a few hundred or a few thousand with her before being overwhelmed and cut down. What they forgot is that unlike the previous Black Knights Cat isn't an idiot, and she has the story on her side right now.

Author Unknown

I think they won the award when they decided to attack in the first place. "Sure, she battled her way through summer, fought multiple demons, battled an entire city of undead, butchered an army backed by multiple heroes, but we have pointy metal sticks! Charge!"

Skaddix

Eh Cat did her part but that only went her way cause the Winter King was bored and wanted to break the Cycle in the first place. She didn't fight a whole city of unread either. But more importantly for the rest she had the Woe for all those feats. So presumably the other side looks across only sees one Named and don't believe half the stories anyway and think we can win.

stevenneiman

Presumably, hell. They were explicitly stated to have assumed that all of her accomplishments were either taking personal credit for stuff she had her mage corps do or else exaggerations by embarrassed Procerans trying to excuse their own failures.

Author Unknown

Not believing the stories when you hear them in a tavern is understandable. However, when the villain is standing across the battlefield from you with several hundred creatures from myth and legend it is time to reevaluate your belief system. The correct response is certainly not, "Oh look, we have them outnumbered."

Liliet

There is no reason for the Levantines to assume that the grey-skinned creatures around Catherine are anything other than devils, and those are a known quantity. A quantity known to not be undefeatable, nor all that hard to come by when you're Praesi / leading a Praesi army.

Miles

They're still assuming those are devils, which they've had to deal with any time they went to war with Praes.

Liliet

They don't have reliable information on what Catherine did. They have rumors and disbelieve them as embellishments. All they REALLY know is that she separated Callow from Praes and beat the Northern Crusade, and they don't really know what / how few resources she had for that.

Dresden 67

They should know more though.

In the regular soldiers it's understandable but Razin is the heir to one of the rulers of Levant. There's no way he doesn't have access to reports of the Battle of the Camps.

But apparently he just dismissed it all as ass-covering and exaggerations. Even though the Pilgrim and several other Levantine heroes were there.

Razin is an idiot.

Liliet

Reports? Who would report on the Battle of the Camps to a /Levantine heir/, particularly one who wasn't even supposed to be in command of anything?

You're overestimating the coherence of the Crusade side, IMHO.

Skaddix

It's a feature not a bug. Saint wants to tear down the whole system. She probably wants most of these incompetent nobles dying in the Field. If Pilgrim filed a report well Cordelia also wants to cull troublesome nobility so probably neglected to pass out such information to anyone who wasn't vital and competent.

Liliet

I really don't think either Saint or Pilgrim would be filing reports. If there was any formal paperwork involved at all, it was people retelling what they read in correspondence / heard in conversation.

Skaddix

I agree that is my point no way Saint would ever provide useful information to the Crusade in general, I am not sure she would for most Heroes outside Pilgrim and Hanno's Team. Pilgrim does care about life loss though and might have provided useful information but Cordelia has a vested interest in such info not getting to most of her nobles.

Liliet

Good point, Tariq could have gotten information to his countrymen.

A thousand ways it could fail to happen though, in pre-information age.

Dresden 67

That makes it even worse, if the Crusade isn't even organised enough to share reports from a major battle with their main leaders.

And obviously Razin does have enough authority to command 16,000 soldiers, so he should be briefed accordingly.

Liliet

It's cute how you think it was decently organized actually protect Proceran inlands for a while hell hell hell hell hell

Dresden 67

Again, that just makes it worse.

Liliet

Yep.

Forrest

I think you might be overestimating the communicative abilities of people in medieval time, which is exactly what they are when the closest you have to modern day communication is a mage's scrying and only one person in Procer has even a bastardized version of that.

Liliet

^^^ this

Miles

He probably didn't read them. Who has time for that? Reports are for referring back to when shit hits the fan and blame needs assigning.

ByVectron!

But everyone knows those stories of Callowan victories are greatly embellished. It was probably, like, a bar fight or they tried someone into a puddle and now people claim there dropped a lake on them. I mean, come ON!

Miles

Lol there's no battle, not even armies. Cat got hit on in a bar and threw her drink in the guy's face and it all got embellished from there.

IDKWhoitis

Its kinda been her thing for a while now. Its kinda amazing how there are still fools alive willing to bet it was all luck.

Novice

Oh my freaking gods, the teasing about the seven crowns and one continues unabated.

I love it.

caoimhinh

And it will never be dropped until Larat gets his due or Cat cheats him out of it.

Although those two aren't mutually exclusive.

David Lynch

I think, given the Fae in general and Larat-the-trecherous-lieutenant in particular, anything which worked to "cheat" him would still satisfy him. He seems to respect trickery.

Miles

Like not setting a time limit?

Skaddix

Oof that is why inherited leadership sucks. Granted I want prospective from an actual hero. I do wonder if its time for a new prospective after the Interludes end since this war is over. Turns out being descended from the Blood of Heroes confers no special bonuses.

Dainpdf

It gives +2 privilege and +4 wealth.

daegone823

Which hero was he descended from?

Novice

If you're talking about Razin Tanja, he's from the Grim Binder's bloodline.

Dainpdf

The Binder. Probably with some adjective attached, but we weren't given that.

Novice

We were given an adjective:

"Razin Tanja was of the Grim Binder's line and inherited her famous poise even if he had not been graced with her equally famed sorceries, so he'd not let the horror of it reach his face."

Dainpdf

Thank you for catching that.

stevenneiman

Presumably they're a bit more likely to become heroes, but aside from that they're just more likely to be arrogant and/or inbred, just like any other line of noblemen.

Xinci

The whole way of the Blood and bringing glory to it seems to be a system for seeing if traits Heroes posses can propagate more Heroes the stronger they get. Blood seems to be a shared power source of Heroic traits passed down and strengthened by willing sacrifice(sacred Strife=weight and power).It really does seem similar to the Night in its system crafting. Anyway even though you are more likely to get a heroic Named out of it they dont always get the raw combination needed for the best of them(Thus outside ones like Champion are great). But when they do they can get rather dangerous(Peregrine).

Liliet

I think it's less that Blood is a real thing passed down and more that people believe it is, making there be a story groove that makes it harder for non-Blood people to become heroes and self-reinforces the way patterns in Guideverse do.

KageLupus

I actually think it is more of a self fulfilling prophecy kind of deal, Descendants of those first Heroes are considered honored and special, which feeds into the mindset you need to actually achieve a name. There is a weight of expectation that those of the Blood will also gain some version of the same name, and every time it happens those grooves in creation grow a little stronger.

But how much of that expectation is reasonable, and how much is caused by circumstances around it? The heroic bloodlines act as a sort of nobility which means that its members are all given the kind of advantages they need to actually achieve a name. It is a lot easier to go out and hunt monsters in the forest when you don't have to worry about scraping enough money together for food and a roof over your head.

The Champion that is running around with Hanno is also evidence that the system doesn't work as expected. She was explicitly stated to be from some distant offshoot branch of the Champion bloodline, but picked up the fully powered version of that Name. Sure, part of that is Above putting a hand on the scales since that group needed to go up against the Calamities. But the Champion's personality absolutely had to have something to do with it as well and that is just not something you inherent from your nine-times-great-uncle-twice-removed.

crysjal

I believe that the passing on of names in Levant is a cultural thing much the same way other cultures have common names such as Praes with the black knight. The difference here is that Levant seems to have taken what might have been its first band of names to heart. They practically worship those names. As a result of the cultural worship the names become recurring as that's what the culture expects to happen. It's basically a self fulfilling culture born prophecy.

Liliet

Well, you put it really really well.

TeK

Did you just implied that any of those mudfoot peasants have it in them to not be bumbling embarassments to the Creatioon?

IDKWhoitis

Evil is most vulnerable when it thinks its holding all the cards, and I like to think that this "Crusade" is slowly becoming Grey vs Grey. Neither Callowans, nor Procerans, nor Leviatians, nor Praesi really treats this like an actual Holy War. This chapter shows that even those of the Champions' blood are only here for glory and accolades, blinded by pride.

And we know who is very willing to pull the deepest, darkest, horrors to win the coming battles.

Good to see there are still fools in the world willing to underestimate The Black Queen.

Dainpdf

The idea that Procer is not quite Good anymore is precisely the stuff the Saint has been saying. Let's hope she finds no ears for that.

As for this nobility sucking... still better than the high lords.

stevenneiman

It might have been squabbling and backstabbing, but at least there was something the High Lords were actually good at, if not good for.

Dainpdf

Quite a few of the Proceran Princes have proved to be either capable administrators, politicians, or military leaders. And with much fewer human sacrifices or oppressed green greenskins. Not that Procerans would treat greenskins well.

NerfGlastigUaine

That is a bar so low I'm not quite sure what it'd take to limbo under it. It takes a special level of crazy and cruelty to institutionalize murder and backstabbing and summon a freaking eldritch abomination in your own city. Also, they still underestimate Black after twenty freaking years of getting murder-stabbed by him, so their blinders are very, very strong.

Dainpdf

I was just responding to the idea that there is equivalency between Praes and Procer.

RanVor

Below a certain level of shit there's no need for equivalency.

Dainpdf

I would argue that any ethical system which can't differentiate human sacrifice and slavery from not-those-things is useless at best.

RanVor

Well, from ethical standpoint it makes sense to differentiate. From practical standpoint, you wouldn't want to live either in Procer or in Praes, so why bother arguing which shit smells worse?

Dainpdf

It is practical to debate ethics XD
But yes, even a medieval fantasy with insane demigods can do better than Procer.

daegone823

Praes any day of the week at least they are honest about arse drilling Proceran rule is the worst.
Likewise to peeing on you and calling it rain

Dainpdf

You find arrogance worse than human sacrifice, slavery, and literal reality scarring demons.
Can't say I expected that.

Liliet

I mean if I had to pick between living in Procer or Praes, I'd pick Procer.

EE did say at some point that Good nations have on average uniformly higher standard of living than Evil ones. Black raising the standard of living in Callow is a huge exception to the rule. (It's like, the standard of living in Evil nations is x , the standard of living in Good nations is $x + i$, Black managed to institute a standard of living of $x + i + j$ in at least Callow, unsure if the standard in Praes under him was also $x + i + j$ (meaning he managed to raise it by $i + j$) or $x + j$ (meaning he raised it by j everywhere) or some kind of middle, making it still lower in Praes than in Callow but making the difference smaller than normal)
...what. math is fun!

Euodiachloris

The Evil nations tend to get blighted land with a wonky distribution of resources even before their first major Tyrant of Nutso with their land reformation projects, though: it's never been a level playing field.

It's a darned sight easier to produce a decent standard of living if you've got a decent climate, plenty of running water and acres upon schemes of highly fertile fields. The only blood you need to shed in that situation is to defend the lot... Or when trying to collect taxes. 😞

Liliet

Very true!

In the case of Praes there's even a direct cause-effect relationship between the land being blighted and Evil: they needed the field sacrifices.

Dainpdf

Except nations can turn Good or Evil. Being Evil, however, makes it much harder to make gains (look at how Praes actually lost farmland to a few Emperors), especially since any gains in this generation tend to be torn down by the next maddened tyrant who takes over.

Euodiachloris

I'm sure an octopus could manage that limbo. Just.

RanVor

Let's face it, the Good countries are only Good because they have Praes to compare themselves to.

NerfGlastigUaine

Praes, the Chain of Hunger, the Everdark, Bellerophon, Stygia, pretty much every Evil country is worse than the good countries except possibly the Dead King's Serenity. YMMV on that one. The Good countries are basically on the level of some of the worse, though not worst, feudal societies or historical nations IRL while the Evil ones are positively dystopian. What's worse, it's not an evil ruler or group causing the problems, the horror is built into every Evil country in their very foundations and institutions. Good may not always be nice, kind, or even rational, but you can see why most prefer it over Evil in this verse.

RanVor

The Chain of Hunger and the Everdark can hardly be considered countries. I agree on the Bellerophon and Stygia though. Still, it's only Good in comparison to these unrealistically terrible places. I'm not saying I'd rather live in Praes. I'm just pointing out that the fact that the existence of Evil shouldn't be used to excuse all the shit going on on the other side.

Fayhem

Unrealistically terrible? You know about for example the Khmer Rouge, right? Go ahead and scroll down to the "Life in Cambodia under the Khmer Rouge Regime" section at this link, and tell me again about how Bellerophon is just too terrible to be realistic: <http://www.cambodiatribunal.org/history/cambodian-history/khmer-rouge-history/>

That said, you're not wrong that feudalism is not a terribly meritocratic or pleasant system for 99% of the population living under it, so I'll give you that one in a heartbeat. The failings of feudalism (now you see the violence inherent in the system!) are real and shouldn't just be excused with a "yeah, but we're not the other guys and they're worse" shrug. But there is also still a meaningful distinction to be made between "looks like hereditary leadership actually doesn't work great a whole lot of the time" and "human sacrifice is an acceptable party theme".

On the note of hereditary leadership though, as far as the persistence of this shit in Good nations I think it matters a lot that aristocracy/etc is hereditary and being a hero (usually) isn't. I think that matters because most heroes come to it pretty young, and I think most aristocratic bloodlines have built up institutional memory of "here's how to fob them off on some capital-E Evil problems when they start getting on your case about 'oh the peasants are people too' or whatever". And I don't think some teenagers fresh off the farm/out of the orphanage/whatever you get it are typically likely to be a match for the conniving of highborn aristos who have literally centuries of institutional memory of how to not get preferentially targeted by Named/Chosen/whatever you want to call them.

So in other words I don't think the existence of Evil nations should excuse the persistence of bad actors in Good nations, but I think that said bad actors have deliberately cultivated expertise in using the existence/threat of Evil nations to safeguard themselves/their privileges. I do think that's a relevant point to keep in mind.

RanVor

Khmer Rouge ruled for 4 years. Dread Emperors ruled for 1000+ years.

They're unrealistic in a sense that they logically should have collapsed or been conquered and razed to the ground centuries ago. (Also, the Khmer Rouge didn't permanently damage reality.)

Fayhem

And if they didn't have a narrative propping them up, they probably likely would have! Again, I mean; they did get conquered and mostly razed to the ground post-Triumphant. So I guess as far as that goes my counterpoint would be that "unrealistic" should probably hold a different value for a world where reality literally functions differently.

NZPIEFACE

holy shit is that a monty python reference

Fayhem

You're goddamn right it is.

Liliet

Health care in Good nations is better than in modern reality directly thanks to the House of Light and miracles being real in-universe.

So there's that.

Mental Mouse

Well yes. That's part of Amadeus and Cat's basic position, not to mention the author's.

The whole saga is about deconstructing the D&D/High Fantasy trope of essentialist Good and Evil, thus the many affable (and sensible) Evil figures, facing vicious and demented Good types. This is in no way contradicted by the actually-good Good folks and insane Evil villains (even if some of the latter are "crazy like a fox"), the point is that virtue and madness appear on both sides.

RanVor

You know, I can never quite understand the point of comments like yours. Are you arguing with me, lecturing me, or what?

Mental Mouse

I am commenting. In this case, concurring with the general thesis, but also pointing out that it's not particularly novel or controversial (and elaborating on why). That's how things go on a forum; some responses are partial or complete agreement, some are partial or complete disagreement ("... And That's Okay"), some are going off on a tangent. Some are more than one of these.

Bluntly, you'll be a lot happier (not just here, but in life in general), if you stop treating any response besides "oh yes, I agree" as a personal attack. Unless that's how you like to live your life; if so... it's not my problem.

RanVor

Thank you for your answer. I'm not a little bit surprised that it didn't occur to you that I genuinely didn't understand what your comment meant in relation to mine, it happens to me all the time around here.

BarthHumphries

Try adding emoticons.

So you could say something like: "I can't tell if you're arguing with me or what. :P"

And then the other person would know not to take it personally. 😊

RanVor

Sorry, but the only emoticon expressing curiosity and lack of understanding I know is "?". 🤔

TeK

>Bellerophon

>dystopian

Stop casting Petty Lies of Foreign Tyrants (Also Known As Simply Tyrants In Their Own Countries) on the Peerless Jewel Of Freedom, May The Glorious City Of Bellerophon Stand Forever.

Quite Possibly A Cat

"Good may not always be nice, kind, or even rational, but you can see why most prefer it over Evil in this verse."

Well, except that one time those elves committed genocide.

Yavandir

Now that you mention it Serenity is like north Korea with army of undead

Dainpdf

And Helike on its evil phases. And the Kingdom of the Dead. And Bellerophon. And Stygia. Huh. It's almost like I'm citing the evil sides... well, the Golden Bloom is also very, very terrible.

RanVor

As usual, my comment was terribly misinterpreted by pretty much everyone. I used Praes as an example. What I meant to say is that the other side being worse doesn't automatically make Procer and buddies good (which should be pretty clear, and why nobody understood it that way is honestly beyond me).

Dainpdf

If one person doesn't understand you, it may be their interpretation skills. If no one understands you, it may be your expression skills.

RanVor

Then maybe tell me how the fuck I'm supposed to communicate, because I really try to make myself as clear as possible, and it seems to backfire all the time.

Barthumphries

Maybe don't use profanity? Don't know what the conversation was about but profanity rarely makes anything better.

RanVor

People use profanity all the time here and nobody's calling them out, and we don't have an edit function anyway.

Barthumphries

You asked how you could communicate better. I answered. You're free to ignore my suggestion and say that you communicate just fine like everyone else here.

*Shrug" no skin off my back.

RanVor

I asked what to do to avoid being misunderstood.
Your answer proves I was right to ask.

Dainpdf

I'm probably not the best person to ask. I struggle with communication, myself.

Liliet

You're treating "good" as some objective measure. Is modern USA good? Is modern Sweden good? Is modern Ukraine good?

We can only compare what's better or worse. And Good nations are actually marginally better than IRL historical analogues.

RanVor

If there are no standards to adhere to, there's no good at all.

Liliet

What standards are you thinking of?

RanVor

The ones Procer doesn't adhere to, obviously. Like not forcing common people to die in petty civil wars, for example.

I refuse to accept the relativity of good and evil. A lesser evil is only ever that – an evil that is not as great as the other one.

Liliet

"not forcing common people to die in petty civil wars"

That's one, true.

I'm curious about more?

"I refuse to accept the relativity of good and evil. A lesser evil is only ever that – an evil that is not as great as the other one."

You're not wrong.

Politics and nations are always lesser evil, though.

RanVor

Sure. I don't object to them being that. I object to them claiming they are not.

Liliet

Wait, who claims that they are not?

stevenneiman

Yeah. We already saw what Cat was able to do to the Saint with just a few lines undermining the drama and moral authority, now imagine what she could do if she wanted to do that to the Crusade. The whole thing is led by a general-stateswoman who has shown no aptitude for story-fu. The only reason that Cat hasn't already caused a lot more damage is because she knows that she needs to keep everyone intact enough that the Dead King can't just steamroll over everything. And she needs to keep that final battle from getting desperate enough that anyone needs to start summoning their respective eldritch horrors, or she'll have undermined the ideals of the Liesse Accords before they're even signed.

Rook

Wait didn't the Saint kick her ass in every single fight so far?

Round one she cut off a piece of winter and Cat ran away

Round two she cut off her limbs multiple times as Cat ran away

Round three Cat immediately ran away after Akua used enough Winter to pull her back, then avoided fighting her when the Pilgrim decided to negotiate

TeK

She danced circles around Saint, accomplishing all of her objectives in each and every fight, despite being flatly outclassed in the outright battle. I think that was the point he was trying to make.

IDKWhoitis

Are the Levs about to lose all their men in the city? 2k loses in the reserves aren't completely god awful, but now the main force is stuck in panic, encircled without escape, being shelled by Callow. If there are more than 8k Levs by the end of this shitshow, I think the Laterns may have traded themselves for it.

Dainpdf

Well, they're now likely very outnumbered, with Callow very secure behind the river, their leadership was decapitated (well, so was Callow's, but they're better organized), ...and come night they'll have to deal with the Mighty. Yeah, they've lost. It's a question of how many survivors.

NerfGlastigUaine

Yeah, they'll "deal with" the Mighty alright. Unless they're hiding a whole truckload of heroes or another army ten times the size of their current one, it'd be an utter massacre once night falls.

Dainpdf

That's what I was getting at 😊

theothin

Worth bearing in mind that Cat wants to force surrender with minimal deaths.

Dainpdf

Overwhelming force is one way to do that.

Jonnnney

The most important part is due to the river blocking their last Avenue of escape they are stuck in a city with 6000 dark elves with the sun about to set. The elves are on Par with the watch during they day. Come night the levs will be nothing but prey

konstantinvoncarstein

I cannot wait to see Mighties fight a pitch battle in the night! 😊 Particularly Rumena

Javvies

Be realistic now.

The Mighty at night? That's not a pitched battle, that's an utter massacre of anything less than Heroes and already prepared battle mages/priests.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is for that reason I want to see it 😊

Anyway, the Levantins will find that the tales about the Black Queen are, in fact, not tales...

Euodiachloris

True tales are still tales, you know. Even elaborately embroidered or distorted true tales will clobber you over the head with their aesops.

The Tales of the Black Queen have a number of truths. 1) Don't fuck with Catherine Foundling. 2) Don't fuck with Callow. 3) If you think she can't possibly do something, pray that you are merely wrong. Because being right still won't help you when she barrels in from left field.

Dainpdf

Arrogant nobles getting shellacked, reinforcement of the importance of throat protection, fire, and weaponized bodies of water. Good to see we're back to our roots. We're just missing kamikaze zombies and terrible snark.

Nguyen Hong Hai

I miss day of exploding goats...

Dainpdf

Last exploding undead animal we had was from Black fighting Hanno...

Euodiachloris

...and It was awesome. 😊

Dainpdf

He hasn't even had the opportunity to discuss it with her yet!

Sadness abounds.

Javvies

Classic Cat. Do the unexpected, crazy, borderline unthinkable thing, and win.

Also ... the Levantine chain of command is troubled. And, by what the "Red Ella" POV suggests ... most of the Levantines will have little or no experience with real combat, far less magic-heavy combat. That's going to hurt them.

Xinci

Its more that, they are used to sanctioned hunts and chimerical foes. Levantines are quite good against monsters especially good in small numbers. Course they arent facing that kind of foe right now, though they will most likely adapt and learn if they survive.

naturalnuke

I'm surprised Nauk died as easy as he did, after surviving an exchange with the Saint of Swords.

Insanenoodlyguy

They caught him with his pants down and melted a goddamn hole in his chest. He responded to this by tearing one's throat out with his feeth as he was literally DYING.

They got as lucky as they could get and he still died HARD. Fast, but hard.

Valkyria

Gods I missed this.

And it's even better than just outright slapping them with sorcerous bullshit, because they are just better and know more about schemes.

Cat only used her Night on a river, not even touching an enemy soldier herself. Ah. Beautiful.

Would have only been more satisfying if the enemy commander wasn't this little brat but hey.

Madness? Check.

Sorcery? Check.

Dramatic entrance? Check.

Dark mysterious aura? Check.

What more can you want from your favorite Villian?

Author Unknown

6, no, 8 inches in height?

NerfGlastigUaine

Ah, Empress of Procer, how nice to find you here

Liliet

If she gives those away she'll be of height with goblins and that'd be a bit too much

OutspanFoster

"The smiling, slim woman whose hair cascaded behind her, the cloak of story around her"

Sure sounds like plot armor to me. Lol

ALazyMonster

I'm a bit confused. I remember reading that the river was 25ft across which seems a bit small for the 2000 people to all drown at once, since they were stated to be footman and therefore not locked into a charge the same way cavalry would be. Did they stretch out real far even though the other reinforcements were supposed to be surrounding Cat from the sides? Even accounting for the fact they were about triple the numbers of the drow/goblins it feels like some of them would be really far off to the sides for them all to hit the river together. I just feeling like I'm missing details or something, did Cat wait to break the ice until they were like 2 ft away or something? It just feels like the scale of something is off with the river.

Skaddx

Shows Cordelia and Saint are right. Procer and the Good Countries do need a good house cleaning. Incompetent and complacent and corrupt leadership. So far its all going according to plan for both of them, I suppose Cordelia thought the Heroes would show up to take the reigns and clean up One Arm. So that not going totally to plan.

Myradmir

I'm assuming Catherine waited as long as possible, and then let the chargers' momentum do the rest. Alternatively, they were crossing/on the river in multiple points or the 2000 includes soldiers now trapped on the other side of the river at the 'mercy' of Callow.

Insanenoodlyguy

I got the impression the 2000 were lost in that instant..but siit's now its him and a tiny force against the Goddamn Black Queen, he stands to lose a lot more on both ends of this, since the rest of his forces just lost leadership. His best bet is surrender because he really has already lost and his retreat options are "drown" and "burn"

Tolk

Reading Beheld I again, Abigail says that it's 25 feet at the bridges, and that as you go west towards the river source it widens. So I'd guess the location Cathrine broke the ice is at least 50 feet wide if not 80 or 100 feet.

Antony444

I think we can say safely that Razin Tanja, if he survives this disaster, is not going to lead any more armies. Or at least, not if the rest of the Levantine commanders have any sense.

God, he just got monumentally trounced and his soldiers were utterly routed in the battle for the city, and his first reflex was to send all his reserves into the fray. The second was of course to try to kill a Villain when he had no Heroes to present a Named opposition.

I mean, the Procer aristocracy weren't exactly mountains of wisdom and strategic thinking, but this Levant noble is beating them all down in sheer arrogance and stupidity.

At a moment where every man counts (there's still the Dead King coming from the north) he just lost maybe five thousand men in a few hours and the morale beating is going to be even worse.

This was Levant first true military confrontation in the Crusade if you don't count the heroes.

And they gloriously lost it.

NerfGlastigUaine

To be fair, trying to kill Catherine was probably a smart idea if they wanted to take the city – letting the chief villain get up to god knows what is probably a bad idea. On the other hand, the way he charged in half-cocked and head full of glory... yeah, he's an idiot.

RandomFan

I don't think he'll lead any more armies if he doesn't survive this disaster, either.

Ed

With the number of dead walking around... he may just get to, for the other side.

Javvies

Only if by "lead" you mean "be in the front line of an assault formation" or "be the point man in finding a way through a field of caltrops and buried goblin munitions".

Because the Dead King has plenty of people who actually had significant skill and combat experience to lead his armies. And those are just people who attacked him.

He also has the entire population of Serenity to call upon. And there's almost certainly some sort of military training academy/program.

They may or may not have all that much actual live combat experience, but they probably have similar training to what the Legion academy provides, with the probable exception of anything specific to goblin munitions.

And that presumes that the Dead King either doesn't want to or can't run something even more realistic. I wouldn't be surprised to learn that the Dead King were willing and able to run live fire lethal combat exercises to train and blood his people.

Tolk

All the while whistles were sounded by their calm-faced officers, calling lines of legionaries forward or back like it was a parade ground and not as hellish a fight as this city could stomach.

Poor guy thinks the rumours are fake. Unfortunately for him, they are real; once you've successfully fought the legions of hell, the legions of fae, and the legions of necromancers, the legions of rookie warriors aren't anywhere near as hellish.

Liliet

Yep.

"Boy, it sure is nice to be fighting opponents that don't regrow limbs and go down for good when killed!"

TeK

To be fair, that heir guy is pretty smart, if young and a little reckless and inexperienced, which is to be expected. He did not make any major blunders. If not for Cat, that battle was as good as won. Everyone knows that, every side admitted to that. And while ultimately a failure, his way of dealing with Black Queen, The First Under The Night, Queen of Callow, Lady of Marchford, Duchess of the Moonless Nights, High Priestess of the Empire Everdark and The Arch-Heretic of the East was spot on. He didn't go half-cocked, he took everyone he could, which is a smart move – Villains have a tendency to both die to ordinary troops when severely outnumbered (take the Black Knight before Amadeus, yes) and an inclination to be recklessly arrogant and charge into the said overwhelming numbers. 8000 vs less than 600 is not a gamble, even if one side has a Named. And he did not lose his head. He did not order the charge, he did not lead the first wave. He did actually good, so why do you guys are giving him hard time?

NerfGlastigUaine

You know, everything you say makes sense but the catch here is that she's a villain and not just any villain, but one known for beating the odds. He knew that she'd come in with a tiny force, through an inferno, near a frozen river, with unknown devils (drow) and magic. He must have known that she'd expect him to bring his forces to bear on her – it's what anyone would do. He then made the mistake of thinking the battle was already over before it'd begun (foolish) when it's patently obvious she must have some sort of plan (even more foolish) which only makes sense if he was banking on her having gone mad – which means he was relying on the enemy's stupidity to win (extremely foolish). You might expect the enemy to be reckless or arrogant, but relying on it is a mistake. He made the right choice to confront her, but sending in his men in full force, trusting on numbers to beat whatever cards she had hidden, when it was patently obvious she was waiting for an assault? Half-cocked as hell.

Also, people pick on him because no one likes a glory hound.

James, Mostly Harmless

I especially do not like a glory hound who goes in with the second line then plans to claim reflected glory from those who actually went in first!

Mental Mouse

I suspect Cat “stole” the heroic side of the script again, leaving the villainous lines for Ruzan. She's done this before; it was particularly blatant with the fae (where her opponent actually was forced into a monologue), but there have been a few other times when Cat came in acting as a “rescuing hero” or similar, upon which even Good adversaries started showing villainous failure modes.

Liliet

Well, he was willing to trade the lives of his people for personal glory, when a much more assured / less reckless / less bloody option was to wait for the rest of the army to catch up.

You do have a point though.

James, Mostly Harmless

For our amusement, here is the entirety of “In Dread Crowned”, thanks to the wiki (http://abridged-guide-to-evil.wikia.com/wiki/Abridged_Guide_to_Evil_Wikia):

I was born out in the green where their banners flew high
And the boots of the great lords they did tread over us
Oaths we made and service gave, kneeling to the oldest lie
But now the world's turned around and we sing this chorus

(Chorus)
Come forth you old devils,
Bring out your lesser evils
Blight the skies and the land

You'll be met sword in hand
One day your children'll tell
Of the deep and rebel yell,
That on his field so sombre
Conquered host of horror.

On the plain where folk were fair, we stood and greatly slew,
And by the ford a score devils with a great demon too
Prince and page and swordsman proud to our steel they all fell
The world stolen we take back and damn you all to Hell

(Chorus)

Be they high or resplendent our oaths stand taller still
And in the west do quiet lie graves we have yet to fill
Learn ye mighty that from Tower's shade to vales of red
The Fifteenth by call of horn stands ever crowned in dread.

nimelennar

Is it just me, or does calling unblooded soldiers "green" in a world where goblins and orcs exist make little sense?

Myradmir

It makes more sense if you recall that the goblins and orcs are mostly in Praes/Callow and people rarely interact with them, but it is still a bit odd.

Mental Mouse

It's the sort of thing that the soldiers might joke about in-world. But this world also has trees and wood resembling our own, so the original metaphor still makes sense.

RandomFan

It absolutely still makes sense. Before this generation, Orcs were almost always fodder that were used pretty much the same way good nations might use untrained peasants- you could even claim that they originated from there.

Goblins were probably more respectable, but they had their own institutions to advocate for them, and therefore were probably significantly outnumbered by orcs on any given battlefield.

mavant

I was confused by that as well – on first reading of "green boys and girls" I thought wow, this Levantine captain is SUPER progressive about nonhuman equality.

Erebus42

Credit where credit's due, at least Razin wasn't stupid enough to lead the assault himself. He was arrogant enough to get a crazy amount of his men killed but not quite enough to get himself killed.

Jearden

It was amazing to see the moral Cat inspires. The Legionary, Edgar, just suddenly had the will to win. The whole Legion KNEW it was going to win. Numbers be damn, the fight was over. The Black Queen was on the field and now her Army would win.

Also, that was an astonishingly well written POV. The whole chapter was excellent, but those last two large paragraphs were legit.

Liliet

Yeah. It's pretty fucking amazing, and started at Marchford. A lot of credit for this goes to Juniper, for being a brilliant commander winning against any odds so far; a lot of credit for this goes to Catherine, for recognizing Juniper's potential and recruiting her; a lot of credit for this goes also to Catherine, for being a good as hell commander in her own right, if not quite on Juniper's level (see: Four Armies and One).

And then there's the credit that goes to Catherine for being bugfucking nuts as a Named and riding heroic stories so much and so successfully, she's statistically backed by providence.

Mental Mouse

That's called leadership. Doesn't actually need an Aspect, given it's a basic story trope in its own right.

Decius

Editorial note: There should be a scene earlier in the work that establishes the location and width of the river. Previous scenes had set it as a strategic barrier, but in this update it grows to the point that there are 2000 people in loose formation (because of the munitions) too far from the edge to escape after the ice breaks.

Tohron

Assuming the line is 100 wide and 20 deep, and allowing 5 feet between each person (a very loose formation), that would make the river over 100 feet wide – not unreasonable. And remember that it's winter and these people are wearing armor, so you'd have to be very close to the shore to survive the ice breaking.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Only the “better part” of 2k drowned, so not even that much.

Exec

two small TYP0S:

“made did it”

“swore would see”

Mikasi

Can I just say I was pleased at the Callow legionaire who had the thought of ‘ya know, after all the crap they’ve had to put up with? The greenskins deserve their long price too.” Shows the slowly changing opinions of Callow on orcs.

Liliet

And then there’s “he might yet find himself joining the rebellion if the Black Queen gets a little too black”.

Don’t worry Cat, your people have got your back on not allowing Evil to overtake the nation!

Fuodiachloris

See? To impress anybody from Callow, wheel out your grudges. Truly epic, long-standing and healthy ones with much justification to them will get a suitably appreciative ear.

Even if (heck, especially if) some of the grudge is against Callow. Because something that rich, dark and complex doesn’t grow on easily reached trees.

Mental Mouse

And... I’ve now caught up to the forward edge of the story. No more reading through multiple chapters a day, now I have to wait for them to be posted. 😞

Liliet

Welcome to hell!

At least you didn’t catch up at something like Interlude: Inheritance 😊

Mental Mouse

There is that... Though the end of Book IV was almost as bad, wondering what happened to Catherine. I do wonder if she’s actually as mortal as she thinks she is, given she’s on her fourth life and at least her third major Role. (Depending if Squire II and/or Queen counts.) If the Dead King was surprised by her achieving immortality by accident, he must be astonished at her willingly renouncing it.

Liliet

Mortal's a relative term ♥

Chapter 13: Following

"It is fortunate that virtue is its own reward, as it does not tend to accrue others."

– Theodore Langman, Wizard of the West

The world had become as an oil painting and the Night was boiling in my veins.

Goddesses on dark wings claimed my shoulders, insolent shards of darkness refusing the ascendancy of the afternoon sun, and they said nothing. They didn't need to. The expectation bloomed in the back of my mind like a swelling river: I'd offered them faith before they ever named me priestess, but now they required that purpose of me. Night still ran deep in the veins of the drow, however changed its nature, but none of their ancient favourites had been granted my office. First Under the Night, I thought. To others it might speak of supremacy, some perilous boast of standing closer to these quarrelsome goddesses than any other, but I knew better. I was first in that I was charged with the treading of unbroken grounds, as much a scream ringing into a dark tunnel as a priestess bearing their mandate. I was to stumble for them, make the mistakes and pay the costs so that my successors would not. These were still fair terms, by my reckoning. Alliance and the means to carry out my designs, for what I had freely given before they formally claimed it. But if they expected reverence of me, respect more than had been earned, then they would be disappointed.

"I never took well to prayer," I murmured. "Either the secret whispers for help or the worn-down words they taught us to recite in the House. So I won't offer you that."

The sun above was searing, blinding. Fire from above none of us were meant to look in the eye. I breathed out and let the wind thread its fingers through my hair. The power came easy to me. It was holding it that was the trouble, for it was as temperamental as its mistresses: I'd ruled Winter, by the scavenger's virtue of being last to hold sway over it, but the Night was not my domain. If I wanted the crows to smile upon me, I would have to swing them as sweet a song as I had it in me to sing.

"But that's not what we're about, is it?" I said. "The three of us. If you wanted someone who'd know your pretty rituals, you had thousands to raise. If you wanted devotion, or unquestioning faith, there just as plenty. You went through my mind mercilessly, that night, so you know exactly what you picked."

My eyes left the sky and fell to the charging Levantines. Thousands in mail and leather and scales, steel blades and hide shields. Their faces painted with vivid strokes of colour, as true a language as the spoken tongues of their faraway land. They were close now, treading river grounds. I had chosen the broadest bent of the water for this, instead of where my armies had once tried to shatter winter's work with the cleverness of the Grey Eyries. I raised my staff and let the darkness pulse with me.

"Here's my prayer, Goddesses of Night," I savagely smiled. "The three of us, together – let's break something."

Komena's raucous, delighted laughter sounded in my ears even as the bottom of my staff struck the snow-covered ice. The oldest sister might see further, weave and scheme with cold judgement, but the younger one was my kindred in some ways. Even the span of millennia had not entirely faded the remembrance of what it felt like, shattering arrogance and host with the same single stroke. The soldier-goddess leaned into my intent more strongly than her sister, harsh and domineering where Andronike was skillful and subtle. The Night spread with a whisper before sinking its claws in the iced river, rending it mercilessly. Cracks tore open the frozen grounds, cold water sloshed out and hundreds of screams filled the air. Komena roughly withdrew her will from mine, leaving me gasping and leaning on my staff for reasons deeper than a bad leg. My sight swam, the glare of the sun failing to pierce through, and I had just enough presence left to hear Robber hesitantly stepping towards me. I warded him off with a raised hand. Gods, I thought. I felt like throwing up, like my veins were about to boil and melt. I'd never wielded a miracle this large during the light of day, and I wouldn't do it again anytime soon if I had my way.

"Boss?" Robber called out.

"Took a bit out of me, that's all," I croaked out.

Too many breaths passed before I was myself again, but with eyes no longer rebelling I steadied my back spat to the side. The river had become a deep grave, I saw. There were chunks of ice floating in the water, but among them bodies were strewn. Fewer than had died, though that was no mystery: those with weightier armour had sunk straight to the bottom. The floaters had been savaged by broken ice. Some Levantines were still swimming and screaming, but I had little worry of survival. Taking a swim this deep into winter was as sure as death sentence as a swinging sword, unless some priest intervened. My last memories of the charge were vague, almost dreamlike – there were consequences, to calling upon that much Night and the aid of a goddess – but now I could more accurately assess numbers. Around two thousand had sallied out towards my little company, and less than half that died. Their mistake had been going into battle order, I mused. That'd broadened their line, turning the loss of a few hundred into something closer to a thousand. There were still a mass of soldiers mobilizing behind the survivors of the ill-fated assault, almost the full Levantine reserve, but I had no fear of that. They were on the wrong side of the river, after all.

The cavalry in the distance that had been heading for us earlier has slowed, and there seemed to be argument between its officers. They were on our bank, sure, but then they'd just watched me turn around a mile of ice into a deathtrap. And there'd be no reinforcements, if they tried their luck. I suspected they would be disinclined to find out if I had anymore tricks up my sleeves, which was for the best. I might actually fall unconscious, if I attempted to use the Night again, and not necessarily after I'd let loose a miracle. I wouldn't risk it, not when anything capable of hurting the horsemen would be just as capable of ravaging my own soldiers if lashing out uncontrollably.

"That one wants your head on a pike," Robber said, calling my attention back to the footsoldiers.

Or close enough. On the other bank, a rider stood surrounded by panicking captains. A young man, in beautiful plate that must have cost a fortune. He couldn't even be twenty, I thought, though the ferocious-looking facepaint of iron grey and crimson made it hard to determine. He was looking at me with hatred and fear. The enemy's commander?

"Might be able to end him with a volley," my Special Tribune offered. "Best not to let snakes grow longer fangs."

"So young," I quietly said.

"You were younger, when you took your first command," Robber shrugged.

Seventeen, and so sure I was ready to mend my little corner of the world. Gods, how lucky had I been to have the likes of Juniper and Hakram at my side? All of Rat Company, really, and those others handpicked by then then-legate Hellhound as well. But it wasn't luck at all, was it? I suddenly thought. Heroes might have providence to furnish them with the tools of victory, but I'd had something of my own just as valuable. A patient man with green eyes, lending his weight where mine did not suffice and pulling a thousand strings to ease my way forward – so many of them I could not believe I'd found half, even after all these years.

"We learned our lessons quick," I said. "We had to."

Not always the right ones, I knew, but we had learned. We still did. The moment you stopped, Creation buried you.

"He'll remember today, Boss," Robber said. "You can count on that. And next time he comes swinging, he'll be wiser about it."

The warning was clear. It ran against goblin nature, to let a threat escape. And there'd been promise in this one, if he'd really been in command. Going for the general staff was a tactic that would have worked against almost any army on Calernia. He'd run into Grem One-Eye and Black's reforms instead, the forced redundancies shaped by the knowledge that you couldn't count on high command surviving a battle if heroes were on the loose, but the Dominion had never fought the modern Legions of Terror so the mistake was understandable. Pressing the offensive, as he'd obviously meant to, had not been unsound either. It would have been costly, but if General Abigail's defences broken on even one front her army would have collapsed in short order. If he'd been slightly luckier, if I'd arrived a day later, he might very well have broken the Third Army completely. If you'd had maybe another ten years of seasoning, I thought. If you'd been trained better, learned to temper the bold with some patience... He could be a general of some talent, one day. No Juniper, mind you, but thankfully there were very few generals of that skill around. And if I gave him those ten years, one day the hate I saw might be turned on me with a wiser hand to wield it.

"Let him go," I said.

Yellow eyes considered me carefully.

"This isn't a victory, Robber," I sighed, gesturing at the river full of dead. "It's a waste."

"Not like you to weep for the enemy," the goblin said.

"Weep?" I mused. "No, hardly that. But every corpse we make today is a gap in the ranks when we turn to the Dead King."

I sighed, then glanced aside. In the distance, I saw the cavalry had decided to ride around the river and return to the camp. Good.

"Come on," I said. "Time to head back. General Abigail should be wrapping up inside the city."

I began limping back to Sarcella, leaving ice and death behind. The hateful stare of the boy I'd spared followed my back, but what of it?

He wouldn't be the first, or the last.

—

With the enemy riders away, there was no need to risk anything as foolish as trying the blaze a second time. Most the turtles were wrecked beyond use, anyway, and while Belles Portes had been under assault when we moved out I judged my forces too weak for a strike at the back of the Levantines still holding it. We took the long way around, the threat of the horsemen having removed itself, and long was no exaggeration. Though my drow tread snow like stone and goblins could scuttle through anything, I was exhausted beyond words and very much limping. It turned out that victory outpaced us: when we reached the eastern side of Sarcella, we were greeted by rowdy cheers. Word of the river's break had spread faster than I could walk, and more besides. The cohort positioned to hold the eastern streets crowded us to deliver accolades, or at least tried to – I sent Robber ahead to have a quiet word with the captain about not approaching the drow. They looked a little stunned by the welcome, nonetheless, almost like children seeing the sea for the first time. The Everdark did not breed the kind of comradeship that the Legions and my armies used as mortar. Mighty Jindrich was strutting like a peacock and its sigil followed suit, which amused my legionaries to no end.

I left them to it, and took aside the orc captain in command of the cohort. The news were better than I had expected. General Abigail, it seemed, had vigorously prosecuted her offensive and then taken a gamble as well. She'd recalled the two thousand drow I'd left holding the north of the city and sent them to climb the ring of statues and arches around the city, to suddenly drop down at the back of the Levantines in Belles Portes. That'd neatly cut off both the bridges that still allowed a trickle of Dominion reinforcements to come through and the last way out of the force inside Sarcella. The enemy commander, facing annihilation, had been forced to surrender. I suspected the casualty rate for the drow who'd taken the climb and been forced to fight Levantines on both sides was a lot less sunny than the official version implied, but regardless I did not disapprove. Simply by ending the fighting early, General Abigail had likely significantly lowered overall casualties. The wary-eyed Callowan I'd promoted to the head of the Third Army had accepted the surrender as soon as it was offered, and Sarcella was now entirely ours. For now, anyway. There were still Dominion soldiers beyond the bridges, and the losses we'd taken during the offensive must not have been mild.

But it was only a few hours until sundown, now, so I had no fear of what was ahead.

After we advanced deeper into the city I sent Mighty Jindrich and its warriors back to the rest of the drow with a message to General Rumena, ordering it to pull back to the now-unguarded north of the city and away from the rest of the Third Army. It'd cover our bases, just in case, but that was only a side benefit. The longer my army and the Firstborn remained in close quarters, the higher the chances of blood being spilled rose – especially if I wasn't there to supervise. The survivors of Robber's cohort I relieved with my compliments, free to sleep or whatever no-doubt-against-regulations activity they got up to when they weren't on duty. Robber himself wanted to stay at my side, but I had something else in mind and so refused.

"You keeping me away from the Dominion prisoners, Boss?" he pouted.

It was even odds, I mused whether or not he knew that made him look like a particularly horrid gargoyle. The amusement the sight caused was slight, though, and did not linger long. It wasn't amusing at all, what I needed of him.

"No," I softly said. "I need you to find out what happened to Nauk's body. If they've burned it yet, if they had time for a Legion burial."

The pout vanished, leaving behind a grim visage of wrinkled green skin. They'd had a complicated relationship, those two: adversarial and often petty, tainted by their largely one-sided competition for Pickler's attentions, but there'd also been more to it than that. It's been a comfortable kind of dislike, the kind so old and well-worn it had some kinship to friendship. And beyond that, Nauk had been Rat Company. He'd been with us from the start, the War College and those heady first days of the Fifteenth. That mattered, to those who'd been there. There weren't as many of us left as I'd like.

"I'll see to it," Robber said, and for once his voice was completely serious.

"Please," I said. "If the body's still there..."

"I'll arrange something, and send for you," the goblin said.

It wasn't a sweet parting, but this wasn't sweet business. I ran into officers sent by General Abigail on my way to the Third Army's headquarters, and learned the surrendered Levantine captains were being kept in the repurpose goal of Sarcella closer to the north, under heavy guard. The Dominion soldiers themselves had been disarmed, and while under watch had been provided healing by priests of the House Insurgent. I made my way to the headquarters as quick as I could, my leg was aching like someone had shoved an iron spike through. It was an effort not to visibly tremble from exhaustion, now that the miracle's wake had fully settled over my shoulders, but I couldn't show weakness in front of my soldiers. At least my shoulders were bare, now. The crows had left when I began the trek back to Sarcella earlier, presumably to look for fresh amusements. In this city full of corpses and ash I had no doubt they'd find something to their tastes. The merchant's mansion that served as the location of the Third Army's high command was a great deal fuller than the last time I'd swung by. It was surrounded by legionaries, and even inside soldiers were aplenty. The mood was celebratory, but while I offered smiles I did not linger. I was too tired to keep up the pretence of haleness for long, and I still had duties to discharge.

I made my way up to the war council room, finding what remained of Nauk's general staff there and surrounding his successor. The general was the first to notice my arrival, rising up her seat looking like she would very much love to be halfway through a good night's sleep right now. I could sympathize.

"Your Majesty," she greeted me.

Huh, she'd done the salute perfectly even this exhausted. Whoever had drilled her at the recruitment camp must have left quite the impression.

"General," I replied. "And all of you – you should be proud of what you've accomplished today. You went above and beyond my expectations."

I was unsurprised to notice it was the orcs who were most pleased by that, demurely flashing fangs in a signal of humility.

"There will be another war council later, but for now I'll need the room," I calmly said. "I must speak with your general."

Being sent out didn't seem to dent their good mood all that much, and I smiled to take the sting out anyway. It wasn't long before we had the room to ourselves, though I waited until footsteps could no longer be heard. General Abigail, I noted, seemed to be willing to look anywhere in the room except at me. I wondered whether she was always jumpy as a cat, or whether it was the result of days of march under harassment followed by battles and a spectacular assassination of her direct colleagues. She was a cagey one, this Abigail of Summerholm. Her eyes never quite stopped moving, as if always looking for a threat, and I'd yet to see her let her guard down entirely once even this far behind our defence lines. I would have thought her generally inclined to prudence, but the way she'd used the drow in the battle ran against that impression.

I'd been solid thinking, if risky, and raised my opinion of her as a tactician. It would have been safer to stick to a steady push, but overall casualties would have been higher by the time the dust settled. Add that to the clever trick she'd pulled using civilians to guard the back of Sarcella, and I had to admit she was one of the more promising commanders who'd risen over the last few years. Not yet enough to remain a general, maybe, but she had the potential to get there after a bit of blooding. Which Juniper had assigned her under Nauk to get, I remembered with a touch of rue. It seemed the Hellhound and I were sharing an opinion without needing to share a room. I dragged myself to one of the seats at the table and plopped myself down, brutally suppressing a sigh, and invited her to do the same. She did after the barest of hesitations.

"You did well today," I said. "The river trick would have meant nothing if you hadn't pushed them out beforehand."

The black-haired woman forced a smile and a nod while muttering her thanks. I didn't begrudge her that in the slightest. She'd sent quite a few of her soldiers to die, today, legionaries and officers she likely knew quite well. It never quite felt like a victory, when the butcher's bill came in, did it?

"You'll be remaining in command of the Third Army until we join up with the other columns," I told her. "Possibly until we make contact with Marshal Juniper, if there's no suitable replacement for you."

She winced.

"Ma'am, I'm not sure that's a wise decision," Abigail said. "I went up the ranks fast, and I didn't go through the War College. All I got was the officer training in the camps, and it didn't cover a general's duties."

My lips quirked.

"If a few years at the College were enough to make a general, my life would be much easier," I said. "I'll be handling the drow, and a few other forms of trouble as well. I can't run the Third Army as well. You've acquitted yourself well, and you have the instincts for it. It'll have to do."

Her face fell, and once more I was struck with how young she was. I wasn't all that older, truth be told, but it'd been a long time since I'd felt my true age. Gods, were we ever really that young? We must have been, when we fought in the Liesse Rebellion. I wondered if we'd looked as fragile to old generals like Istrid and Sacker back then as Abigail now looked to me.

"A lot of people could die, if I make a mistake," she muttered. "That would be on my head."

Doubt, I thought. She wasn't so difficult to read that I could not pick up on it. And resentment at being thrust into this role. Both things could turn out dangerous, if allowed to fester. A lighter touch would be needed here, or maybe a personal one. There were times when twisting the arm was in order, but not here. An entirely unwilling general was of no use to me, and likely a liability to the soldiers she'd be commanding. Doubt and resentment, huh. I was no stranger to either, and in my experience they tended to have a common source in fear. We'd begin there. Propping up my staff against the table, I leaned back into my seat.

"In my first serious fight, I was beaten within an inch of my life by a procession of strangers and afterwards eviscerated by the Lone Swordsman," I told her quietly. "I still have the scar from where he opened me up. I was close enough to death I managed to use necromancy to get myself moving."

The other woman's eyes widened, with both surprise and disgust. The latter was at necromancy – most of my countrymen still considered the practice disgusting and dangerous – but the former was not. It wasn't common knowledge, how badly William had trounced me during the first part of our encounter. I watched curiosity seep in after the words sunk in, so I pressed on while the iron was hot.

"I ended up kicking him off the ramparts and into the Hwaerte, after catching him by surprise," I said, "but it was a very, very close thing. There are some who'd call it fate, the way it all turned out. I tend to think of it as luck."

"You were Named, even then," General Abigail said.

Like that said it all, explained everything. I supposed it might, to someone who'd never slipped into a Role. It was a lot more eye-catching the way some of us scythed through soldiers like wheat stalks than the way a single story misstep might kill you in truth an entire year before the blade actually opened your throat.

"I was green," I corrected. "Scrappy, good at some parts of what I did, but dangerously arrogant in my approach and I nearly died choking on a floor for it. But it did teach me a valuable lesson."

I smiled mirthlessly.

"You'll get eviscerated too, Abigail," I said, and she didn't quite manage to hide her flinch. "Not literally as I was, but one day you'll make a mistake and it'll be costly. You can't avoid that day, no one can. And it's good that you're afraid of it."

I met her eyes, brown to blue.

"Take that fear and use it," I said. "To make yourself think. About how it could go wrong, what you could do to avoid it or survive it. And from there you plan so that you don't end up in that pit in the first place. You do that well enough, and you'll push back the day some."

I paused, just a heartbeat.

"It'll still come," I frankly said. "It comes for everyone, Abigail. But if you can ward it off for a year or two, you'll still have done better than half the generals on Calernia."

A grimace split the other woman's face.

"I could have been a tanner," General Abigail mournfully said. "No one ever expects anything from those."

"I served drinks in a tavern for years," I told her, reluctantly amused. "And I ended up with a crown on my head. You're getting off light."

She paled, which made her sun-tanned cheeks look rather blotchy, but gathered herself with remarkable alacrity.

"I don't suppose I am dismissed for rest, now," she cautiously ventured.

I snorted.

"There's no rest for the wicked, General Abigail," I said. "Find us a bottle of wine and come back. We'll be going over the orders you've given since you took command of the Third Army, and why you gave them."

The black-haired woman let out a sound that might have been a whimper. I raised an eyebrow and she rose to find us something to drink, while I let out a sigh at the relief that was no longer standing on my bad leg.

Much like her I'd rather be sleeping, but if she was to be the first Callowan general in my army then she needed to be taught.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Aston Whiteman

Maybe?

I prefer to read the story.

Javvies

This bodes well for those desiring more of Abigail. She'll either go far, or go out in a blaze of (reluctant) glory. Holy crap – Abigail is the Callowan Caiphas Cain!!

Ehhhh ... killing him is kind of a wash. He's probably not going to be in command much longer, but the lessons he learns from getting his ass kicked this way might prove to be useful against the Dead King. And that would likely be worth leaving him alive, especially since killing him isn't certain.

IDKWhoitis

Because of how Fate works, I wouldn't be surprised to see him next chapter to discuss a sort of cease fire or something.

Cat really doesn't have the reasons, nor will to fight Humans right now. She needs Black, and everyone is needed on the front with Dead King. For all we know, the Tomb has been broken and the fall of Hannover will shrink the frontline to allow the Dead King to potentially send a "recruitment drive" into the rattlings.

Insanenoodlyguy

If cat was still named, I'd have been screaming she just killed herself, that's literally the sort of thing that makes an origin story for the hero that gets you. But, at least for now, she's not, so it was probably a decent move.

IDKWhoitis

I would choke on laughter if she ends up getting a diplomatic Name out of this shitshow.

All jokes aside, she is practicing realpolitik: Being able to recruit a formerly fallen empire, negotiating with the likes of Dead King, Dwarves, Gods, Good, and Evil. She gives exactly what they deserve and expect, while at the same time furthering the end goals (even if she loses sight of them temporarily.)

Liliet

Yep!

Euodiachloris

It's worth the gamble. Cat may well be tutoring two generals with one throw.

And, as pointed out... potential generals with decent enough instincts don't grow on trees, and Calernia will need every one of them knocked down a few pegs and built back up for some time in the not-too-distant future. 😊

Someguy

Eh. He's only fit to be sword fodder to be marched into the Dead King's meatgrinder.

stevenneiman

Honestly, Abigail reminds me of book 1 Cat more than anything. maybe a bit more hostile to the Call and less mouthy, but she's still got that same mix of resolve and wondering how the hells she got here.

Dainpdf

I see just two issues with these deviations: the first reeks of the Lone Swordsman, who was actually brought up in this chapter. And the second is Cat getting a pupil. As it was often said to Black, that story tends to end with the mentor dead. She must be careful their relationship doesn't turn into that. Maybe by shagging Abigail, now that she's into sleeping with people again.

Rook

The parallel is more of the way Black handled the aftermath of the Conquest, not the Lone Swordsman. It wasn't some emotional need for redemption that she let him go. She let him go because it was a 'waste', and there'd already been enough of that for one day.

It's the same reason Amadeus built Callow back up after the conquest, even though it was a murderously rebellious breeding ground for Heroes, and collectively considered him public enemy number one. As dangerous as it was, it was still more useful alive than dead.

The mentor thing is a legitimate threat, but we have to keep in mind the bigger picture here. Cat has never been about personal survival, she's a mirror to her own mentor in that sense. As much as she's changed she's still the same person who thought it was a damn good bargain to trade in her own life for liesse, if it came down to it; and the stakes she's playing for now are a hell of a lot higher than just one major city. As nice as survival is, it's likely not actually at the top of her list of end-goals.

Liliet

^^^ this.

Skaddix

I mean I don't think mentor getting you killed applies. Cat is not Named currently and Abigail has never had a Name. Not to mention the age difference being what 2-3 years max and the difference in role. Sure Abigail might become Queen of Callow but she is not really in line to succeed Cat as First Under Night. The titles are not connected.

Dainpdf

You'll recall Black still decapitated any rebellious movements and leaders. Letting a general so openly hostile to him live was not Black's style.

Also, Cat did not let the Lone Swordsman live out of emotion, but calculation.

We can only hope this young man does not have the weight to initiate a pattern of three with her, or get a Name out of the deal.

Liliet

Black was conquering Callow. Cat's not conquering Procer, much less Levant. Long-term, she's looking at an alliance, not a low key simmering war of mutual extermination.

Insanenoodlyguy

Normally i'd say either was likely but CAT ISN'T NAMED. At least for now. That saves her.

Dainpdf

She's still got enough weight she might as well be. Probably a bit less bound to stories, but bound enough that it matters a lot.

James, Mostly Harmless

I think Cat is taking the longer view by not killing the "boy". Yes, she risks him becoming a personal enemy by leaving him alive. However, killing him gives her one less officer when it comes time to fight the Dead King. From here on out, she needs to conserve the lives of not only her troops but her enemy's troops because she will need every living soul!

Ninith settler

Hot dang. Cat is a walking airstrike in a medieval setting. She is too op.

I'm glad Abigail is going to end up relevant. Ben rooting for that since she first appeared. RIP Nauk. But TBH the orc was sort of dead inside already.

Ninith settler

Didn't mean to reply, sorry

Levi Kalden

I actually believe she will be the one to become Queen, it would fit and I can just imagine her pitting herself

Aston

I'm sure Cats bad leg remains a secret weapon in her narrative war.

Good writing!

IDKWhoitis

Truely a daughter of Black. His horrifying, well meaning daughter in all the best and worst aspects. She has even inherited his method of dealing with subordinates and mending bridges.

imagesbe

Abigail is luckier than she knows. Cat is one of the better tacticians on Calernia; not Juniper or Grem tier, but just one or two below that. We can probably count the number outright better than her on two hands. Of course, Abigail's also not lucky; she'll mess up eventually, and the consequences will be harsh. But hopefully this will help her get through it.

We're going to see that Levantine officer again, and when we do we'll find out whether it was a good or bad thing he was let go. I have a suspicion it will be a bad thing. Hatred isn't healthy to ones' mindset, and will taint any cooperation in the future.

IDKWhoitis

I see Cat as a good Tactician, but not anywhere near Juniper or Grem tier.

She is great at mind games and unconventional warfare (including heroic and villainous bullshit).

Given equal means and information, I see Juniper trouncing Cat 99/100 times. But that's not how Cat fights, and both times Cat has beaten Juniper, is because she pulled a new weapon system or unknown variable. Cat looks so good because she can steal the initiative, then has to keep up the tempo to prevent a loss. The problem she runs into, is rushing into one disaster then another to maintain that initiative.

I think that a cease fire will be called soon, seeing as Callow now holds both the city wall and several thousand hostages, and Cat has been getting better at diplomacy.

stevenneiman

Cat only actually beat Juniper once. What she did the other time was in its own way even more impressive: She manipulated the story so the "price" she had to pay for victory was something immensely profitable, namely poaching Juniper for her own faction.

Liliet

Juniper's a great tactician, Cat's a great strategist. If Juniper and Cat were on opposing sides of a war, it wouldn't look like the five-way melee, it would look like Juniper being never given battle where she wasn't at a bad enough disadvantage that the best her tactical acumen can do is make the defeat slightly less harsh.

The fact Juniper IS at Cat's side is a function of Cat's skill as a strategist.

wirelessgrapes

She's an A Tier strategist while Juniper and Grem are SS tier. Thankfully, there are very, very few S tier. As few as their are SS tier probably, or even less.

The main difference between Cat and Juniper, to keep the fighting game analogy going, is that Cat is controlled by a player, while Juniper is controlled by a CPU at max level.

stevenneiman

The thing about hardest-difficulty AI vs. player is actually a quite good metaphor.

Someguy

I kind of see Abigail becoming an anti-Named General, her tactics will get her ass kicked by normal armies but will chew up and shit out corpses of Named and other supernatural forces.

Dainpdf

But she just got her start as General by doing well against an army with no Named in it..

Liliet

IDK, so far she's seemed to me like her best skill is adapting to how regular people think.

The anti-riot wine is characteristic.

Someguy

Well, she was good enough to plant the seed of impotence into the heart of the Mirror Knight (aka shiny fucker) in Kaleidoscope IV-VI.

Speaking of which, shiny fucker needs to die fast now that there are Drow in the field given that one of his Aspects is [Dawn] which makes him stronger every morning.

Liliet

I'm not saying Abigail isn't going to be good at handling Named, I'm just predicting that she's not going to be easy meat for mundane generals :3

Liliet

Oops, not what I was trying to reply to.

WRT this, shiny fucker is on the same side. Catherine's going to kick everyone's ass into realizing that this is not a zero-sum game, with as few losses as possible.

RanVor

That's the goal, but I don't think it's actually possible to achieve without large amounts of bloodshed, and the Named are going to resist the hardest, because they have the highest stakes in the game. So the probability of Cat having a big showdown with the heroes that ends with most of them dead somewhere down the line is actually pretty high.

Liliet

True!

I root for as many of them surviving as possible though, as does Catherine :3

Liliet

No, wait, I WAS replying to this. Reading comprehension: 1, me: 0

Sugar Roll

Being a tactician is just her secondary talent. Setting up the narrative for a story and dealing with Named on the other side is what she is really good at—similar to how Amadeus and Grem are running things IMO.

Taichi22

Indeed.

I consider Catherine a tactician second, however. She's thirdly a warrior, secondly a tactician, but first and foremost a storyteller.

Liliet

It's worth noting that storyteller => politician ==> strategist =====> tactician ==> warrior.

These things aren't independent. Each of them requires slightly different skills / knowledge base, but a lot of it flows around interconnectedly. Making things look&sound good is a common skill between storyweaver and politician. Seeing the big picture is a common skill between storyweaver, politician and strategist. Being aware of how other players are motivated and think is a common skill between politician, strategist and tactician. Knowing the actual mechanics&logistics of battles is a common skill between strategist and tactician. Being able to follow the situation as it develops and think quickly&clearly under pressure is a common skill between tactician and warrior. Etc.

And Catherine being good at storyweaving occasionally translates immediately into tactical success. Well, that was mostly against fae, but the point that she knew which skill to lean on too win stands, you know?

Soma

Abigail is going to be Queen. She's pretty much being set up as Catherine's successor, because this sounds somewhat like the beginning of an apprenticeship. Cat really reminds me of black here in a lot of ways with how she's thinking about handling her new charge.

danh3107

It's going to be her or Thief, I'm pretty sure Viv either lost her name or transitioned, so her becoming the next queen isn't out of the picture.

"Petty thieves hang, the great wear crowns."

Mental Mouse

I find myself wondering... if Viv has lost her Name of Thief, what happens to all the loot she's stolen and hidden in her Aspect-linked hideaway? Perhaps one of her new Aspects will be "Gift". 😊

Decius

The next Thief acquires it.
Equivalently, the next person to acquire it becomes the next Thief.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. I don't recall seeing anything about Viv inheriting a stash of treasure and sundry knick-knacks, so I don't think so. The stash does look suspiciously like a personal domain, but we don't really know much about those. The closest thing we've seen are Warlock's and Masiego's private storage dimensions, but those are explicitly created... and we don't know what happens to them either. In fact, that might be an issue – what important items might have been stashed in Warlock's private storage dimension?

Liliet

Oh nice, good point.

Dainpdf

I just worry about that. As Black was told many times, training a successor is quite a death flag.

Ali Khan

So is leaving a young noble alive to plan revenge, something makes me think that cat isn't planning to survive after the battle against the dead king.

Dainpdf

Mayhap. I rather suspect Black squeezed any suicidal tendencies out of her early on the apprenticeship.

Liliet

I'm worried Black might have infected her with suicidal tendencies, as a matter of fact.

>My own fate was ultimately a side note: if I had to go for Callow to finally stop bleeding, then I'd pull that trigger without hesitation. I'd had a good teacher when it came to the lesson of not getting in your own way.

He's tried his best to teach her to be kinder to herself than that.

>"Human," he reminded me. "Villain, but still human. It's all right to want things for yourself, Catherine."

>Do not try to become me," he said. "I was a tool that served a purpose, and that purpose is coming to an end.

...his best kind of sucked.

"Do as I say, not as I do" -_-

Black's taught Cat better than to be accidentally suicidal. Unfortunately, he also taught her the exact method for being that on purpose -_-

Dainpdf

You're right... let's hope the Woe puts a kibosh on any self sacrifice plans, then.

Liliet

Well, the Calamities' approach to that sure as fuck didn't work (and was actually somewhat counterproductive as they antagonized Cat instead of coordinating the common "stop doing this" intervention).

Here's hope the Woe is going to do better.

Indrani's certainly been making a decent sounding board / therapist throughout Book 4, though now it's time for Catherine to play that for her right back.

Can't wait for Catherine to encounter the mirror image of her own bullshit in Hakram No-Hands and realize that it's contagious and that maybe she should stop ;u;

Dainpdf

They could be a circus trio: Hakram No-Hands, Zeze Glass-Eyes and Cat Peg-Leg.

Really, Thief and Archer are the ones missing out. Come on, girls! Time to lose a nose or ear!

shimizubad

Don't forget Akua, the No Body.

Dainpdf

Good catch! Though I'd call her Akua No-Heart.
Feels more pungent like that.

GreatDepression

Akua the Bodyless

Insanenoodlyguy

Dramatically lowered risk now that she's not named.

An evil villian sparing a hero out of finding their death tedious births the one that will kill them.

A mundane (technically) General beating a youngster, teaming up with that youngster, and then getting killed by them?
That is only the kind of story a villian has. Unless he wants to soil his entire family's legacy, he has until the alliance to take care of her.

Liliet

Yup.

The crucial difference is the kind of motivation the (potential) hero has for opposing the (hypothetical) villain. If the insult of defeat is the only sticking point, there's no story there and the defeated youngster just has to suck it up. But if the insult of defeat is only the inciting incident for the hero slowly noticing all the other good reasons to oppose the villain, well, then the narrative gears click into motion.

If Cat isn't a villainous Named, that's that much less good reason to oppose her. If Cat succeeds in her alliance efforts, that's that much less good reason to oppose her.
Depending on how Cat does politically / narrative wise from now on, period, that's going to determine how much story weight the kid's going to have for potentially opposing her.

And something (like her own inner monologue) tells me that Cat's more than willing to accept this kind of check on her future actions.

Liliet

Well, as Amadeus has demonstrated to his own great surprise, Mentor Occupational Hazard is not the only possible outcome, just the most straightforward one.

Leaving like "kthxbye you can handle this without me now I'm off on vacation" is a succession trope, too.

Dainpdf

True, though mentors who do that have a tendency to return at the end of the second act to perform a heroic sacrifice, or turn out to be the big bad.

Liliet

Yep.

On the other hand, there's an expanded version of that trope.

"I'm not explaining myself right," she said. "Just – all right, think about it like this. Hero out on their first lark, meets a mysterious helpful stranger that gives advice and maybe teaches a trick. When's the next time you see them?"

My fingers clenched.

"When that hero's in over their head," I said softly. "When the stranger appears out of nowhere and wipes the floor with the villain, enough that the hero can flee and prepare for the rematch."

"Yeah," Vivienne agreed grimly. "That's the thing, Cat. He doesn't always win, but I couldn't find a single instance of when the Grey Pilgrim got into a fight and lost."

It's a risky story to have. But given its utility for those you want to help, I 100% see Catherine going for it.

50% chance of heroic sacrifice, 50% chance of helping and surviving to do it another time? Cat's snapping that deal up.

Dainpdf

Unsure she gets to be the helpful stranger when she's been the woman's superior for years, but, if anyone can swing that, it's Cat.

Decius

"Turn out to be the Big Bad" is still on the table.

Dainpdf

That case tends to lead to the young hero killing their mentor, tho.

Liliet

With regard to Catherine?

Let's be real.

No ;u;

Ali Khan

Abigail is gonna end up the next queen at this rate, and hate every second of it.

Mental Mouse

And the horrible thing is, she can see it coming!

Skaddix

How is old Cat again? Why is she always like so young she is like 20 or 21 max? She started this story at like 17, I don't remember how many years the story has been going on. But it seems odd she comment that Abigail and this Lord are so young. I guess it suppose to show she feels old.

Still Abigail getting some tutoring and Cat doesn't think the Lord did anything wrong. I suppose his mistake was not believing the rumors from when Cat dropped a Lake. But then again we don't know who told him that information or where they got it from. You could say he was arrogant if he heard it straight from Saint or Pilgrim not that I think they told him. But he doesn't seem to have access to an intelligence so not trusting the source with his information isn't necessarily bad.

Are we getting a funeral? Or do we switch to a new character? Also what is Indrani doing and did Cat tell her about Masego yet.

Oshi

It feels like we are in for a bit of info dump then the classic EE twist of some kind at the end.

Dainpdf

Yeah, he just heard rumors. And those aren't very trustworthy – in the early chapters Cat referred to all sorts of fanciful rumors about Black.

Liliet

And then some of them turned out to be actually true, like the dragon one. And no way to tell which is which.

(Well, the giant's blood one is easy once you've met him...)

Dainpdf

Maybe it was a short giant, okay? XD

Liliet

Catherine is 21, and started at 15 going on 16. It's definitely a trick of perception that her own age peers seem young to her. Catherine's commented on it before. A lot of people have been horrified by how young she is too – I particularly remember Tariq and Brandon Talbot. It's not actually normal to have her level of experience/ptsd at her age. Cat's not wrong to comment on how insanely young Abigail is, it's not weakened by the fact she's young too. Both things can be horrifying at the same time.

And yeah, I don't think Tanja did that bad as a commander either. He didn't have reliable intelligence. Throw away hindsight bias and consider things from his perspective. This is Catherine being bane to rational thinking, not him being irrational.

Indrani's probably with the rest of the drow army that's catching up.

Skaddix

I say its weird in a real world but not in the narrative world ie Heroes and Villains usually start their rise pretty young. I mean Amadeus and Weseka started their rise even younger then Cat and the Woe. Add to fact we have turnover from wars and narrative based conflicts and the fact that Cat broke away from Praes which means most of her team is younger naturally. Young people being at key positions at the start of every major realignment doesn't seem unusual.

Liliet

I'm not even sure it's all that weird in the real world, if we look back through history towards earlier times. Though don't quote me on this ofc I'm not a historian.

Mental Mouse

Uncommon but not weird. Even in America, it was only recently (well into the 20th century) that a 15-year old would really be considered "a child" – that transition followed the spreading demand for schooling beyond basic literacy and arithmetic.

For most of human history, a 15-year-old would likely be married (or at least betrothed), and would certainly be working at adult tasks. They'd still be noted as (probably) being physically weaker, and mentally less mature, than a 20- or 30-year-old (see age requirements

for public office; USA), but they would be sitting at the grownups' table. And yeah, there's a fair number of European kings and queens who took power in their teens.

Mental Mouse

And Names were explicitly noted early on, as a way for surprisingly young people to gain power and achieve mighty things.

Rook

On the other hand, it was Black himself that taught Catherine that mundane numbers could overwhelm Named pretty easily. One of his first lessons was a story about predecessor Black Knights with enough power to make him look like a child, who died to a common soldier's blade after running out of stamina.

10:1 numbers advantage is nothing to scoff at. He was completely right to think he could beat Catherine in a brawl right there, his main mistake was not reading the terrain.

Liliet

Yep.

Mental Mouse

More fundamentally, Razin Tanja did not consider at all the chance that the enemy commander had a magical trick up their sleeve, and this despite her odd behavior, dire reputation, and minions of an unfamiliar species. In a world where such tricks are widespread and well-known (including not just Named, but "ordinary" mages and priests), that's not just failing to be genre-savvy, it's downright ignorant.

Liliet

He did not exactly have a free hour to slowly and thoughtfully deliberate on the situation.

He had to make a snap decision. The Black Queen's right there. Maybe if he waits that's all the time she needs to weave a slower evil spell to destroy all his troops. Maybe she's baiting him and the trick she has will be greatly weakened if he doesn't attack. Maybe she's banking on him thinking that and bluffing a trick where there isn't one. Maybe-

He did not have enough information to make an informed decision, period. Criticizing his guesses is pointless.

If he waited and let her set up – and it was something she needed to set up for – it'd be just as delicious to jump in like 'oooh Cat was underestimated again'.

Hindsight bias.

Mental Mouse

Self-correction: "At all" -> "until much too late".

Mental Mouse

I'm wondering if Nauk might in fact get raised as some sort of undead. Resurrection by Good probably isn't in the cards, but as noted with the zombie horses, a non-aligned power can do better than the usual zombie or wight.

yareyare

Correct me if im wrong but Cat is no longer named right?

wirelessgrapes

She does not have a direct Mantle, but she probably still works within the bounds of Story. She's far more flexible than any of her peers, but she's still directed somewhat.

crescentsickle

My suspicion is that she either has or is developing one of those original "Names" that were seen in the memories in the Fae Realm. The ones that were more like bestowed general powers but lacked definition.

It does make me wonder who the Squire is right now. Wonder if that'll be Abigail, haha!

Liliet

She no longer has a Name, yeah.

Wry Warudo

Cat just let a promising young leader go, while starting to mentor her own.

Oh snap, is she setting up multiple death flags for herself?

Dainpdf

My hope is that the young man doesn't have the narrative weight to actually set up a pattern with her – she's playing the big leagues with th Dead King, Cordelia and Malicia, while he's a small time general. And she didn't commit any atrocities that might justify a rise to Hero status.

On Abigail... I say she needs to take care that they don't have a Mentor-Apprentice relationship. Perhaps by tutoring other people – seems to work for the Pilgrim – or by not involving herself too much... or maybe by changing their relationship. It has been some time since she last took a lover.

Liliet

Patterns of three only apply to rivals.

How in the unholy fuck is Tanyusha McGloryHound a rival for Catherine? They're not in the same dimension. He's not Named, she's not a noble, their goals don't either intersect or contradict each other?

Story thinking overcomplicates this. Catherine just earned herself an enemy. It's one person, and matters the way one person who's got some political weight does.

Dainpdf

A young, talented prince, out on his first campaign, sees his men brutally murdered by the foul magics of the cruel Black Queen (btw, she is a noble) ...and swears revenge for their deaths.

After a long journey, where he accrues friends, allies, and knowledge, he finally faces her on the battlefield, prepared to vanquish the foe that appears in his nightmares to this day.

Tell me that's not a common archetype.

Liliet

I'm sorry but "Queen Foundling" remains a punchline ;u;
(and a deliberate one at that)

And no, it's not common. "Sees his men brutally murdered by the foul magics of the cruel Black Queen" just doesn't quite cut it for the Call.

Dainpdf

Well, nominal roles like that do matter for stories and politics. It's why there was so much debate about what things would be called after the Battle of Camps.

As for the Call, I hope it doesn't count.

Liliet

True!

It's still a punchline, which I appreciated anew once I remembered the word for foundling in Russian and started thinking of Catherine as that. You get used to how it sounds and stop really appreciating what kind of last name it really is ;u;

Dainpdf

Google Translate gave me these: подкидыш, найденыйш
Unsure how either makes it funnier.

Or did you not know what Foundling meant?

Liliet

Катерина Найдёныш, Леди Найдёныш, Её Величество Найдёныш.

It worked for me because over time I got used to thinking of "Foundling" as just a last name, a neutral sequence of syllables. But it's not. In-universe, it's not, because it's the last name given to all orphans. It's a signifier of Catherine being an orphan, of her having no lineage and no known ancestors.

Translating into Russian refreshed my perception of that and made me appreciate the surreality of the situation anew 😊

(And part of the surreality is that instead of taking a new last name or looking for her ancestors, Catherine sticks with the 'orphan' identifier. She's not playing the game where orphans are at the bottom and royalty is at the top, where given a chance you disentangle yourself from being an orphan and clutch at the royalty thing with all you have. Catherine stays loyal to her origins, takes pride in them, and that's really the punchline part)

("The closest thing I have to a father is down south killing fools, and he doesn't have a last name. Born a farmer, you see")

(never fucking forget)

Insanenoodlyguy

Quite possibly, once upon a time, but a few problems now:

1. SHE'S NOT NAMED. If she was a villain, she'd have birthed a new hero. But she's not. Maybe she'll be one again someday, but right now she's just some human with tricks.

2. She's going to be his ally. Or at least an ally of his allies. That's her whole actual goal here. Coming back to defeat the Black Queen who's invading your country? Very common archetype, yes. But by the time you come back... she's the friend of your friend and is attacking your enemy side by side. And the types of people who kill that person... they aren't heroes. And the bratty noble who can't put his own personal need for vengeance aside for the greater good of all, including themselves? The archetype is they die trying to get that vengeance, not succeeding. If Cat's a named again by this point, he's more screwed. If she doesn't have one... then it's a boy who either has become a villain but is doing this against somebody who sees him coming a mile away and can still hit about his weight class... or he's a mundane doing this against somebody who still saw him coming a mile away who can hit even harder above his weight class.

Basically he has till she can get Cordelia to play nice to pull anything off if he wants narrative help, which he absolutely needs, and after that unless she acts wildly out of character he's shit out of luck. At that point at best he can be the background character that helps somebody with better odds get a shot at her.

Dainpdf

1. I addressed this in another comment, but she has enough weight, she should be affected by tropes. If that's not enough, she's bound to two goddesses (and we know apotheosis binds one to patterns) and a band of Named, plus an eldritch fae thing. Not being Named herself is a minor consideration.

2. There are other forces arraying against this maneuver. The Saint, mostly, but she seems to be working with the Bard. And the Bard is suspected to have the ear of the Oracle. It is very possible that the prince becomes their ally or pawn when this all comes to a head.

Liliet

There's hardly more reason to think Bard would want Catherine dead than reason to think Bard would want Catherine alive.

Dainpdf

We know she worked with Saint on the declaration of Cat as arch heretic. So while we don't know the Bard wants her dead, we know the old monster doesn't seem to want the Accords signed.

Liliet

We also know she prevented the elves from killing Akua, doesn't mean she wanted Akua to beat Catherine.

Bard works in indirect ways.

And I think there's good reason to consider that it might be possible that Liesse Accords being successfully signed is exactly what she's after, considering her comments to Anaxares about the League and considering how she engineered Second Liesse and its outcome

Dainpdf

Point. I suspect her thing with Akua was letting evil wreck itself. Akua's plan drove a wedge between Black and the Empress; it provided fodder for the Crusade; it led Cat into delving fully into Winter (ie nerfed her in all the ways that mattered); it, eventually, resulted in the Dead King marching and this ultimate conflict between Good and Evil. So no, I don't think Bard is very favorable towards an international agreement to stop the infighting.

Liliet

You're thinking too short term. My point is that Bard plays the long game. The Dead King sure is looking more and more like the perfect pretext for an alliance between all other forces on the continent, Good or Evil. The Arch-Heretic thing isn't going to seriously stand in the way of Catherine steamrolling her way into an eventual alliance with 50k drow, is my prediction. It could, later, after the Dead King was defeated, but as someone on reddit said, it's like triggering an avalanche deliberately so it's not as bad as if it happened later. Bringing up the Arch-Heretic point when it's frankly stupid defuses the question.

Bard's problem with the League was that it was 'skin deep' and 'none of the forces behind it moved any differently after foundation'.

Cat's trying to make Liesse Accords the foundation for the future, period. To base a new continent-wide status quo on them.

All the immediate conflicts Bard's fanning are petty in the face of the possibility of that.

Dainpdf

I don't see what the arch heretic thing does to help, tho. The drow thing? Sure. Not declaring her arch heretic.

Liliet

Catherine kept looking for an easy way out of things.

Ally with the Crusade, go against Malicia, be forced to make concessions and abandon her grander plan but end the war early.

The Arch-Heretic thing drives her into the corner where she HAS to bend everyone else to her will, there's literally no other way left open in the direction she wants to go.

And at the same time, see the point she brings up in the latest chapter. The thing about being declared Arch-Heretic early in the war is that you completely lack leverage afterwards. If the Crusade is forced to chew and swallow working with the person they've already declared Arch-Heretic, that breaks a big Good vs Evil trope, and that aligns with what I'm guessing Bard's point is here perfectly.

Again, Catherine, when forced between, say, abdicating during a peaceful time and shattering the House of Light in half by being declared Arch-Heretic, would most definitely not choose the latter. Now that the catastrophe already happened in Cat's absence (twice, even), she has no incentive left to back down, now or later.

Dainpdf

Did she really? I'm pretty sure she never once considered giving up on the Accords. Which would have been much easier to get signed without this – Cordelia was almost 100% for signing them when this came along.

Liliet

I'm not sure about this, I admit. This is how I remember things going.

I don't think Cordelia /knew/ about Liesse Accords. She was considering burning her own political capital to demand that Catherine be let into the Grand Alliance, but the Liesse Accords have yet to come up between them, I think.

Dainpdf

I don't think Cat put the entirety of the Accords to her, but they'd been speaking for a while, so she had some idea where Cat was going.

And if she was letting Cat into the Alliance, it was a short walk from there to the Accords. Gotta remember Cordelia is not actually expansionist.

Liliet

Yeah, I do remember that. I just get the impression that Catherine didn't make a whole lot of progress in those talks.

Dainpdf

I merely meant that her being ready to let Cat into the Alliance, knowing some of her ideas, signals some openness to them.

Liliet

I mean yeah, agreed strongly. Cordelia and Catherine are more or less on the same page for a lot of stuff.

Cordelia just doesn't (didn't) have the Named momentum to just go straight for the goal and fuck everyone who's in the way. (And it is in fact a point of pride to her that she actually discussed with Cat – or it was lmao)

Dainpdf

Cordelia doesn't need a Name to get things done. That's the way of Procer – they're one of the strongest countries on Calernia, and they're not led by Named.

What Cordelia has is a strong will and political acumen. Plus the loyal people from her home.

Liliet

I mean, yea. Procer is not led by Named, they're led by something vaguely resembling democracy on the highest level, and Cordelia made a whole point out of defending that system to Catherine.

Named drive right through obstacles to arrive at their desired outcome. Cordelia has to temper her means and ends in accordance to other people's wills.

In these particular circumstances, I suspect this might end up insufficient to carry out her duty :3

Dainpdf

It's an oligarchy.

Liliet

Yeah.

Liliet

It's not helping, no. It's not what Catherine wants. She's not so confident in her Accords project that she'll fight the whole continent for it, given alternative.

Bard isn't trying to help, here, any more than she was helping Hanno in the Free Cities.

Dainpdf

Is she not? She seemed pretty good with it... and really, she wouldn't need to fight nearly as many people if it weren't for this declaration.

Liliet

True.

Bard's irons in the fire might also include Laurence's point about Procer being rotten and needing to be broken and rebuilt. And I would say Bard has very different ideas than Laurence does about how things are going to go and what the result is going to look like.

Dainpdf

That sounded less like it getting rebuilt and more like something else being built on its ashes...

Liliet

Considering it's a metaphor either way and nobody's going to literally turn it into a scorched wasteland (not even the Dead King, he's after the living, not blighting the land), the point is highly abstract.

Either way, the Arch-Heretic thing, while not making anyone involved happy, has proven to be insufficient to stop Catherine. That, to me, means it cannot be used as proof that Bard intended for it to.

This does largely boil down to the question of how competent Bard really is. We know she's told Neshamah that flipping the story on Cat hasn't worked, but I'm not sure that that refers to trying to kill her and not, say, trying to convert her to Good?... Because one of those tasks is much easier&simpler than the other.

Dainpdf

You may recall that Neshamah did blight his land. The lands around the Crown a egg e filled with poison.

In any case, many people are likely to die because of this arch heretic thing. And, well, it hasn't stopped Cat – which makes sense, she only heard about it recently – but it has complicated her ability to conduct diplomacy by a lot.

Liliet

That's Keter's Due, not intentional.

And we'll see how it plays out :3

Dainpdf

Are you telling me you don't think he could have cleaned some of that up over the millennia?

It's advantageous for him. The dead don't need to breathe, and he has all the territory he needs in his Serenity.

Liliet

I mean, yeah. I'm just saying the Dead King is not aiming to blight the Principate too – it'd be to his disadvantage even, he wants living humans right there where he can get them :3

Dainpdf

Why would he? I imagine he has all the people he needs in the Serenity. I suspect that more than anything he wants a larger buffer so the Intercessor has a harder time interfering with his plans.

Liliet

Exactly, why would he burn the land?

Dainpdf

I meant “why would he want those people?”. Burning the land would make it more difficult for both armies and Named to reach Keter to interfere with his stuff, avoid the possibility of rebellion – a possibility since the new territory is not as controlled as the Serenity – discourage attempts to reconquer the land...

Liliet

Yup.

SilentWatcher

is she still in the same league as the big players? just some river cracking nearly floored her and daylight is severely limiting her. Not to mention she has a mortal body again. Comparing to the battle of camps. this battle was a regression of her battle ability. No turning to mist again, no healing after getting cut by the saint of swords.

Mental Mouse

Her personal badass level is a lot lower, but as others have noted (including in-story), that personal power was never her true strength – if anything, it was a distraction from her mastery of narrative and strategic brilliance.

Mental Mouse

Belatedly: Also, the text notes that the goddess powering her “withdrew her power roughly”, which might well warrant a “hey, not cool” in later discussion with them.

Liliet

This is probably a skill thing. Komana isn't exactly practiced in empowering her chosen priestess to perform large scale miracles.

They'll get better at this with time, IMHO.

Mental Mouse

Cat did comment that being "First" was less about being most powerful, than about being the one to clear the path.

Liliet

Yep.

The white mouse 😊

Liliet

On the other hand, her power is now versatile and doesn't come with sanity erosion as a drawback.

And then there's the fact that tricks are ultimately still tricks – it was the army that won this skirmish, the power just helped minimize casualties further.

Political power, the power of who you have at your side, the power of having an army and allies, matters a lot more than what 1 person can do in a 1v1 battle. Or even a 1vArmy battle – even if you destroy anything in your field of vision, your field of vision is still only so much. Named cannot hold territory.

SilentWatcher

How is her Power more versatile? She lost an invulnerable Body, making her body to mist, raising sentient Undead, making potential immortal Fae soldiers, she cannot Gate without Restriction anymore and she is severely limited when the Sun shines. For now the only New use of Night, which she couldn't do with Winter, was her lighting her Pipe.

Her opening a gate at the battle of camps was the deciding factor to even the playing field and you call it a trick...you know what would minimize casualties even further? instead going through flames like a retard use a gate. oh wait doesn't work anymore, because she is tired after gating with night. More Power would help her preserve her army even better, so the odds she wins are better.

Political power matters way less than you think, look how it went for Cordelia and why do you think Cat has now more? she has even less than before, because to reach her Goal of Peace allying with murderous Nightworshipping Drow will just prove them right she is the Archheretic. the only Thing she gained in the Everdark besides snarky Ravens, is an Army. And an Army is per definition NOT Political Power, but Martial Power.

And the as of now End Boss of this arc, The Dead King, has build a Kingdom and an army of Dead, with his own power, which lasted for over a Millenium. And look how long he held his territory. It even expanded under his rule.

When she is fighting the big Names, she NEEDS more power. The gulf of Power which seperates the Dead King from an ordinary Named is even greater than the Power gulf between a Named and a Non Named. Again Quote from the earlier Books, there is a point where Power is so much greater that no amount of tricks can even the playing field. I think people understand something wrong, In the past, when she won unwinnable Battles she tricked the Story, so Creation MADE her more powerful, so she could win. Look how the Encounter went against Akua and William, she suddenly was better. When she outplayed the summer Queen she withstood her might a lot easier than when she first met the Winter King. At second Liesse, the moment she was the unleashed Monster storywise, she tore out Akuas Heart in one Move, where she lost before. This Hints that personal Power is in some way NECESSARY to win in Creation, as its not logical for a absolute weakling to win insurmountable odds.

SilentWatcher

So considering all of the above and Cats Goals (killing Saint, defeating Cordelia, Pilgrim and then the Dead King) It is highly unlikely she wins without some power up. (Masego showing up and working a miracle is my bet).

Liliet

Well, I'm betting she's going to do just fine in her current state.

We'll see who's right!

Liliet

>as its not logical for a absolute weakling to win insurmountable odds

So are you asserring that Catherine isn't going to win, that she's not an absolute weakling, or that Guide is illogical?

SilentWatcher

I am asserting that if a Victory was achieved in Creation, yet the Winner lacks the power to complete the Victory, Creation will make Winner more powerful.

Liliet

Huh.

Okay.

So what you're saying is that it doesn't matter that Cat has given up on Winter, Creation's going to empower her either way as long as she's winning?

SilentWatcher

I am saying if she needs more power than she has now to win. We will see how she gets it

Liliet

I'm not sure what the cause effect chain is that you're thinking of. Cat can't win unless she gets more power? Cat can't not get more power?

Javvies

I think what you're saying is that if the Story/ Narrative says you win, then you're empowered such that you win.

And while there's some truth to that ... there are also limits.

The Narrative boost won't overcome everything. As an analogy, the boost won't enable an unathletic 400 pound couch potato to outspurt Usain Bolt in his prime. It could enable a pro NFL player to do so. It might allow a good collegiate or high school level athlete to compete and not get blown away.

That's how Black pulled off the Conquest – he set things up so that the Narrative boost that Callow got for being Good wasn't enough.

Insanenoodlyguy

Narrative power trumps all other forms of it though. And that's what she always has the most of.

But you underestimate what she can do. Yes, she can "only" collapse a river now, in daytime when it's established she's much weaker. But she is fully sane after using it, just tired. So she's not making dumb mistakes and marching off into a stupider situation because she's oh so strong. Remember winter cat? Yeah, she could shrug off being cut apart. And she was walking into fights with the one woman who could cut her and make it stick!

Sheer named power wins BATTLES. but how many times has the much more powerful villain won battle after battle and then lost the war right at the end? That's every black night before Amadeus. Yeah, they were real great right up till the endgame. Which is exactly what happened to Cat at her most powerful, don't forget. The everdark was her strongest period and she was marching right to her death, saved only by the fact that her power bled out. She won that at her literal weakest, a dying frail mortal.

And that's why having the narrative matters. The Dead King is a master of the narrative, which is how he's lasted this long. But if there's anybody on this playing field who can make him fuck up in the way that leads him to his own destruction, well... your calling her weak and saying she needs more powerups.

SilentWatcher

just tired... did you read how she nearly fell down unconscious? you mean "enslaved" after she gave up her claim on winter. She wasn't saved, she begged for mercy and Sve noc granted it.

So you tell me winter cat was stupid...what would Cripple Cat have done? how would the battle of camps have went with Cat as she is now. how would she have fared in Keter as she is now? she would have been destroyed without a chance.

Power itself and the application of Power are the same. so Amadeus is the most powerful Black knight in history. Why does Amadeus come into the discussion about Cats power? everything he uses to win except power is Cat sorely lacking.

The Dead King is a master of Narrative AND powerful, so Cat stands no Chance, as she is certainly less powerful. Neshama was for over 1000 Years in conflict with the bard, no way he gets outwitted by Cat.

Her battle ability isn't really what got her into the big leagues, anyways. It was her ability to win battles she had no business winning, plus Neshamah's interest in potential apotheosis.

She's in the big leagues because she fights people on the big leagues. I mean, Malicia is not a great fighter, and Cordelia is not even Named!

SilentWatcher

Yet she only won those Battles because she was powerful enough. The Fae got defeated because she joined the Winter Court, she defeated Akua when she embraced Winter fully, Battle of Camps using Gates, The Dead King only invited her for her Power not anything else and she became a threat to Sve Noc BECAUSE of her Power to bind the drow to her. Now she lacks that Power and instead got Night which is half the time useless (Daytime) and she can get offed like any other mortal. what will keep her in the big leagues now that she has less Power?

Dainpdf

Her position? Her team? Her knowledge of narrative, which is actually what defeated the fairies, and the lack of which actually put her in the situation of losing to Akua (and was also what she exploited to make sure ripping out Masego's work killed Akua)?

Really, if anything Fakerine, with her limited thinking and ability to innovate, was inferior to plain old Cat in many respects.

SilentWatcher

Yet she needed the power before she could use the power of narrative. Without being of winter, the winter fairies wouldn't have helped her, she would have never stopped Akua without her gates. Cat thought herself while on campaign it's good she has the power to do stuff and even Akua said she was difficult to take down as the last of winter. And the loss was baited by Black. The win came with embracing winter fully. She was clearly not Fakerine as she held the mantle not long enough. That's what Sve Noc said. Good old Cat got her leg crippled from stupidity and instead of owning the monster she flinches back from power.

Dainpdf

She lost the fight against Akua by outsmarting herself – bringing the fight against Diabolist to Arcadia.

As for power? Look at Black. Great combat power is a red herring. Cat got the fae to help her because of political play and alliances. Her personal power was minimal (and in the end she was being played anyways).

Sve Noc wanted to blame her. And yeah, Fakerine was still built out of Cat. But when you look at what she thought when she became mortal again... it's what she always feared when she looked at the fae: it didn't really care about Cat's ideals. It danced the dance by playing the role of Cat.

SilentWatcher

When you say cat was limited in her thinking and innovation ability, you clearly think lame Cat would have done things differently. What would she have done different? What would she have done better? We don't know, as it is not written. It's just your unreasonable hate of Winter Cat interpreting things which aren't there.

Insanenoodlyguy

We have been told in story at least one dwarf thought she was more dangerous as a mortal. I think that's going to pan out. I think she's going to win in places Winter cat could not have. That she doesn't do it as directly is irrelevant as long as she wins.

Dainpdf

It's not unreasonable hate. It's knowledge that she was a fae version of herself, plus knowledge of how fae are limited.

And while we don't know what Cat would have done, that doesn't mean we can't know she would have done things differently.

NZPIEFACE

That's kinda been her intent since ages ago.

She's wanted to abdicate for ages, but there's never been someone good enough to actually hold the crown after her.

Javvies

She might be going for the ... Dread Emperor Irritant (I think) method of comboing multiple sources of inevitable doom into multiple sources of avoidable doom.

Liliet

Catherine is certainly not prioritizing her own safety here.

I don't think these death flags are that dire, though. They're non-zero, but there's a lot of narrative weight to Cat surviving at this point.

Mental Mouse

Surviving, or outright coming back from the dead... again.

Two ____

I know I'm really jumping the gun here, but the italicized taught at the end seemed almost aspect-ish. Probably just wishful think though.

sengachi

Ohhhhh, now wouldn't that just be a fascinating aspect, especially as a priest?

NZPIEFACE

Nah, it's a callback how to her first Aspect ever, was Learn.

Dainpdf

Good catch. Though those tend to come in bold.

More likely it's just a reference to how rigorous the teaching will be.

Liliet

It's most definitely just emphasis. "I can't just dump responsibility on her, I have to actually teach her if I want this to go well".

Doesn't mean Cat isn't going to get a Name out of it ^^

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't understand why a priest cannot heal Catherine's leg. Are they not supposed to heal anything not congenital?

Dresden 67

Probably because she's got Night running through her veins.

Trying to heal her with Light is more likely to blow her up than heal her.

sengachi

Her leg was initially damaged by necromancy, healed imperfectly, left that way for years, vanished entirely as she ceased having a physical leg, and then got returned specifically because the universe/narrative apparently decided it was an intrinsic part of her mortality. Any one of those seems like it'd be a legit reason that priests couldn't heal it, but all together it means I'd be surprised could be healed at all by anyone, anymore than the Grey Pilgrim gets to have not-grey clothing.

ManuelTheExpunged

The bad leg is so heavily integrated into her story that conventional healing won't work anymore. It part of her, symbolizing her regained mortality.

Mental Mouse

Also, the leg is a story trope in its own right – q.v. the Fisher King motif, though in the original it had other implications. If the Fisher King pattern does apply, Callow cannot be healed until Catherine is either healed by a Higher Power (nope) or replaced by someone without such an intrinsic wound.

That said, the original FK's wound was (probably) a specifically male trope, somewhat bowdlerized in transmission. In direct contrast, Cat was specifically noted as having regained not only her mortality, but also her fertility. And that allows for a number of longer-term tropes....

Dainpdf

Her wound is part of her identity. It was Story Significant. Much like the scar she gave Black, it's here to stay.

She may not be Named, but she's still got enough weight and involvement with Below that she's bound to narrative rules.

Liliet

I think at this point the leg counts as congenital, considering it was involved in Cat's very soul being mutilated.

Skaddix

I wonder if the leg ties into Cat being Suicidal all the time and not really thinking about herself in the longterm. I figure if she does start valuing surviving and not constantly trying to abdicate and foist the Post Llesse Accord world order on to others that the limb would heal.

Liliet

Oof.

Welcome to Akua's Worry Club.

Though I don't think that even if you're right the leg would heal entirely. That'd just be... bland. Hurting much less, only getting in the way of actually fighting / dancing, I can see that though.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's the opposite actually. It will never get in the way of fighting, she will always have some trick to at least put the pain off and fight at her full potential.

But afterwards, it will always remind her how frail and human she is as long as she is indeed a human.

Liliet

I'd say it's going to get in the way of fighting always. A trick she uses to put off the pain is a trick she could have used otherwise. It's a handicap, period.

And I think she'll keep it as such.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, narration hates that. It'd be different if the one who wounded her or their team still lived, then the old injury having mattered might, well, matter, but there's no good story in "then that knee of mine i fucked up years ago flared up so I lost."

Liliet

I mean, nobody writes it like your example. "I dropped to one knee, cursing my bad leg. The sword passed right above my head, cutting off stray hairs,"

There are fun ways to write disability, you're just not thinking of them :3

Dainpdf

Oh my. We might be getting Nauk back! Also, those Abigail POV's are paying up big time. Chekhov's firing squad right there. Not only is she her first Callowan general, she's also Cat's apprentice.

I'm still so excited for Cat to meet up with the rest of the Woe... it's been too long, and EE has been super evil and left us hanging on Vivi and Hakram AND Masego.

werafdsaew

Nauk is super dead. Cat's sending Robber to do a proper funeral for him.

Dainpdf

Doesn't sound like it, with the way she asked. But you may be right.

Novice

Yeah, the way things are shaping up, it's either Indrani or Zeze getting a tragic ending (less on Indrani though, considering she may peace out of the party Ranger-style). Though if the worst comes to pass, I hope we can get a reunion with the whole Woe before that.

Liliet

I really, really, really don't think any of Woe are going to die.

TeK

Until the book 6 at least.

Mental Mouse

Not even then, I think. The Calamities are getting killed off because their successors are on-scene.

Liliet

Agreed.

sengachi

Yeah we're aiming for a big "everyone reunites and everything has changed but really it's all the same in the ways that matter" trope.

fbt

nice bit of story, i really enjoyed Cat's interactions w/ folks.

Antoninjohn

Cat left him alive to fight the Dead King and if he comes for revenge later, well he will be breaking the Accords that she is setting up which will probably end up badly for him both personally and for Levent politically

Liliet

I'm not sure the Accords are going to directly specify alliance / forbiddance of aggression. Now if he were to summon a demon to go after Cat...

RanVor

From what I understood from Cat's little talk with Pilgrim in Chapter 8 of Book 4, the goal of the Accords is to limit the influence of Named (of all kinds) and their ability to acquire resources, basically rendering them incapable of waging ideological wars they're so fond of.

Agent J

Would sidelining Named really bring peace to Calernia? We have none, and are not driven by Narrative shackles or capricious, warring Gods. Yet, we still have our fair share of ideological wars, and every other kind for that matter.

If Cat's Accords are just about removing Named from positions of power, then she lacks a sufficient understanding of human nature. Heroes might be driving the Crusade into the ground, but they are not alone in fault, nor the ones who called for it to begin with.

RanVor

That I do not know. I can't speak of the full extent of the Liesse Accords. That's just what I gathered from that conversation.

Liliet

I don't think Cat's going to filter by absence/presence of Name. Just by actions and their consequences.

Liliet

Something on that scale, yeah.

Mental Mouse

Having reread the chapter: The only direct mention of Named is between the failed bargain and the successful one. Initially:

- 1) Cat offers direct aid against the Tower, abdication, and other concessions, in exchange for Callow not being taken over by Procer's nobles.
- 2) Pilgrim's response is "I do not rule Procer", and says he'd have to actually fight Procer to enforce that.
- 3) Cat points out that yeah, she'd have to fight a civil war to enforce her side too.
- 4) But Pilgrim still isn't buying: "For such a thing to hold, there would be need for trust where none exists".

At that point, Cat comes out with:

> "Every single Named is a highly dangerous weapon, in their own way," I said. "Any unwilling to accept constraints placed on their actions have no business wielding that kind of power in the first place. And before you ask, I do not exclude myself or any ally of mine from that statement."
(Implied: And that goes for you too, Pilgrim.)

And that leads to the agreement Cat does get: No sacking of cities, no abuse of prisoners (including greenskins) and no summoning demons or devils, in exchange for no angels: "We can't prevent escalation if your bargaining position is that we fold but you don't." She even tosses in the location of Callow's last Hell Egg as a show of good faith; that is, she wants that thing gone too, and the forces of Good are better equipped to destroy it (which they do).

TeK

Giving the result of all my previous guesses for where the story will turn next, I can say that Abigail will not be the queen. I am half sure that EE just reads our fan theories and does the exact opposite.

Liliet

There have been correct theories!

Aotrs Commander

Cat is Best Cleric.

eamon DeMarsh

HEY CATHERINE, LOOKS LIKE WE'VE GOT ALL THE SOLDIERS!!!"

"HEY LEVANTINES!! LOOKS LIKE YOU'RE ON THE WRONG SIDE OF THE RIIIIVVEEERRRR"

Liliet

I love you.

Daniel E

Cracking a frozen river would have been next to nothing under Winter. The fact that this relatively minor use of power left Cat so vulnerable makes me think that she is significantly weaker now. If she tried fighting Heroes like at Five Camps, she would be dead several times over. Yes she can enjoy mortal vices again, but the sheer quantity of power she has given up is very significant.

ActionKermit

Her power is more situational now. We don't know yet how strong she is under cover of night – this was using the power of darkness in broad daylight.

Liliet

Her positioning has changed though.

The most cleanly won battle is one you never fight.

Daniel E

That would be fine if she was a once-in-a-generation strategist like Juniper. Cat has good battle sense from experience, but is otherwise above average at best. Her place is a mix of 'big picture' and 'hammer', except now she can't even do the latter.

Liliet

I make a distinction between Catherine and Juniper in that one's a strategist and the other's a tactician.

Note how the five-way melee led to a stalemate between the objectively best company and the objectively worst company (just in degree of the troops' skill), and ended up with Catherine achieving her goal in full.

Juniper's a tactician. Give her a battle, give her resources, and she'll make the best out of what she has.

Cat's a strategist. Give her a war, give her a country, and she'll make sure that all the battles and resources available for them are skewed in her favor.

If the best tactician in the world is running out of supplies, they lose, and the strategist that drove them into that corner wins.

Cat's a strategist. She thinks a meta level higher. See Juniper's own assessment:

"When historians try to pin down Foundling's methods they point to the Battle of the Camps or the Princes' Graveyard, but those came later. After she'd learned her trade. If you want to understand how she operated, look to the Battle of Four Armies and One – from the beginning to the end, she was playing an entirely different game from every other commander on the field."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Shields

From the beginning to end, she was playing an entirely different game than every other commander on the field.

Note how the once-in-a-generation tactician like Juniper – Juniper herself, specifically – is at Cat's side.

Not because providence, not because of Amadeus's help. Well, Amadeus provided the support, but it was Catherine who recognized how valuable Juniper was and saw the value of forging an alliance there / recruiting her. And then successfully recruited her.

Positioning!

werafdsaew

I don't think Winter is well suited to cracking open a frozen river. She probably could have done something else instead though.

Berder

I gotta say, it seems like Cat came out of the Empire Ever Dark with disappointingly weak results.

The part of the Army of Callow that Cat did meet up with, was the "Third Army," one of four of Juniper's columns, and that's only among those that ventured into Procer. Presumably many Callowan troops have remained in Callow. Let's say Abigail was heading perhaps an eighth of Callow's total force, before Cat came to reinforce it.

Now, Cat was supposed to come back with a force that would substantially bolster Callow's forces – say, coming back with a force 50% as strong as the total Army of Callow would be reasonable to hope for. If that were true, her reinforcements would increase the strength of Abigail's army by a factor of FIVE. With the odds changing that much, Procer should have been completely routed by overwhelming force, or immediately forced to surrender! Today's victory was a lot harder won than that, and it shouldn't have been.

The army Cat brought out of the Night is only five thousand light infantry. The devastating weapons of Night we saw in the Empire

Ever Dark, in which plain infantry were mowed like wheat by the powerhouses, were not seen today. No acid fog that melts everyone it touches, for example. It seems that the drow are really just light infantry in daylight. (Remind me, why wasn't this attack conducted at night?)

So, the drow force is severely disappointing.

In personal power: Cat ran her stamina dry just from breaking the ice under two thousand ordinary foot soldiers. That's a much weaker working than dropping a lake on a battlefield as she did before, because it requires the soldiers be perfectly arranged over the ice and can't be done just anywhere. Winter Cat wasn't even drained by dropping the lake, the only reason she went out of action there was because of heroic intervention. Were it not for them, she could have dropped twenty such lakes.

Winter Cat could have also simply scythed through two thousand ordinary foot soldiers herself in melee combat without breaking a sweat or expending any power. Winter Cat was physically invulnerable and capable of tearing armor like paper with her bare hands. In the absence of heroes, priests, or mages, which seemed fairly absent today, nothing could have stopped her.

Night Cat strikes me as substantially weaker and having less stamina than even the stronger drow under her command. None of the Mighty seemed harmed or exhausted by drawing on Night.

Liliet

You are not following.

This is a teeny, tiny vanguard of the army from Everark, this force that Cat has brought to Sarcella right now. The rest of it is catching up.

The size of the southern expedition is fifty thousand.

And that's just the southern expedition, not counting the exodus of the entire population of the drow to the north.

Though this is likely the cream of the crop.

And it's fifty thousand.

That's why Cat isn't worried that the rest of the Levantine army is catching up, too. Time's on her side here.

Javvies

It was said that if Cat didn't get Third Army notified that her drow army were allies, she'd lose roughly a quarter of the Army of Callow.

I assume there's a caveat there about deployed/deployable/nongarrison forces, since when Juniper split up the Army of Callow, I assume they were roughly equally sized, and I doubt that the entire Army of Callow is in Procer – there's no doubt detachments around Summerholm and elsewhere along the Praesi border, and other garrison forces, plus training units.

That said, the six thousand drow that Cat took with her to Sarcella here? They're an advance force, moving faster than the primary drow army in order to get to Third Army in time, and probably mostly consisting of drow that are least affected/best suited to operating in the day.

IIRC, the primary army is somewhere in the 50k range. There are probably follow-on forces, too, since, well, there are a lot of drow, and if they're moving out so the dwarves can move in, they (a) need to go somewhere, and (b) a lot of them are going to have combat skills.

This attack was conducted in the day to push the Levantines back across the river, so that Third Army had a more defensible position that would be much easier/near certain to hold until nightfall.

They were seeking to buy the time to get to night, which would allow Third Army to withdraw/the main drow force to arrive and reinforce Third Army.

Before you can act at night, you need to get to night first ... while being in striking range of your objective.

We've never seen one of the Mighty attempt a significant use of Night in sunlight, either.

Cat has seemed to imply that at night/in the dark her ability to use Night is much stronger than during the day/in sunlight. That's likely an inherent limitation of Night itself, that would apply to all users, including the Mighty, not just Cat herself.

Winter Cat would not have gated to the other side of the flames – gates are acting oddly, and while that may be a side effect of Winter being absorbed by/merged with Night, that's not necessarily true, and that may be related to the problems with scrying.

She could have just frozen a path through the flames, though. Or dropped another lake on things.

That said, it is absolutely true that Winter Cat had the sheer power to muscle through most opponents, and fight a lot of the others on near equal ground.

And thus far, Night Cat hasn't shown anywhere near that level of potential.

On the other hand, Cat and her story had usually been about coming at situations sideways, rather than head on.

On yet another hand ... a helluva lot of the drow arc, plus a fair bit of the Keter arc, was about how Cat could better utilize her abilities, figuring out how to do new things with her Winter/Fae powers, and much of that will have been wasted if Night Cat can't do similar things or otherwise apply what she learned with Winter to Night.

Zaver SaintCloud

The only problem with 'learning to better utilize her powers' is that she's no longer in control of it. She said as much to Dwarf whatshisname; 'She doesn't hold power anymore, only wields it'.

Javvies

That's part of why large parts of the Keter and Everdark arcs are in danger of being a waste.

If she can still use Night to do those sorts of things ... that will still have been useful, even if she isn't using her own power to do them.

Unfortunately, it seems that she'll need prayer to do anything significant, and can't use Night the way the Mighty she was fighting in the Everdark could, and presumably still can.

Liliet

This chapter is not, I think, giving proper weight to what the actual fuck Cat pulled off. Remember, this is something Abigail could not achieve with goblin munitions! This was a hella large miracle, of the scale that would have had Winter Cat diving into principle alienation head on.

Smaller tactical stuff she can achieve with minimal support from Komana and Andronike. She didn't need to pray to them to make her staff, they helped without asking. And the quality of tactical stuff does not depend on its scale, but on its versatility. The Everdark was Catherine figuring out the versatility of her abilities, how they can be used. All of that is still hers, even if there's now +1 second of delay on using it.

Liliet

Holding and wielding is an academic distinction when Komana and Andronike are trusting Cat's judgement. Which they are.

Insanenoodlyguy

Amadeus told us books ago how other black knights were much, much stronger than him. They all still died with much less success to their name because that's not the thing that's dangerous about him and it's the same for cat.

Paula

This chapter was almost poetry in how it started.

Dang you are getting good at this! Its like the story of Cat is now woven about her very being, no longer is she just a mortal or named. She is a figure of myth and legend, a maker and breaker of stories, weaver of tales.

abao

I still find Cat's lack of a Name jarring. Being a priestess of the night or a half fae shouldn't really exclude that from her prospects. She's really breaking the Story, isn't she? Such a powerful figure that for some reason evaded being shackled with a Name.

Liliet

I don't think Names are shackles. They're a coincidental situational bonus that you get if you qualify for it, that tends to stick around and tempt you into getting into more situations that would let you make use of it.

Catherine has finally shaken off the remains of her last situational bonus, and has not yet qualified for a new one. Doesn't mean she won't get it, though it won't matter much at this point. 100d12+10 is just not the same as 2d6+10 :3

caoimhinh

The song "Let there be night" (original by Powerwolf, English cover by Kissin Dynamite) seems to be appropriate for Cat wielding a big miracle of Night.

Ninith settler

Hot dang. Cat is a walking airstrike in a medieval setting. She is too op.

I'm glad Abigail is going to end up relevant. Been rooting for that since she first appeared. RIP Nauk. But TBH the orc was sort of dead inside already.

aran

I will not ship Cat with every single one of her subordinates, I will not ship Cat with every single one of her subordinates, I will not ship Cat with every single one of her subordinates...

Max Scherer

Abigail is one of my favourite Characters. She is just there, but somehow that is enough for her XD obviously like your web site but you have to check the spelling on several of your posts. A number of them are rife with spelling problems and I find it very bothersome to tell the reality nevertheless I'll surely come again again.

Alfred Ballman

Keenan Munion

May I simply say what a relief to discover someone that really understands what they are discussing over the internet. You certainly understand how to bring an issue to light and make it important. More and more people really need to read this and understand this side of your story. I can't believe you aren't more popular given that you most certainly have the gift.

Sturmi

So why does cat have a bad leg, her previous body was a construct, did her soul "safe" her last body ?
Can the drow still collect night from not drow ?

Chapter 14: Expedience

"The art of negotiation is, in essence, convincing the other side of the table that you are very reluctant to part with the house full of rats while they are in dire need of it."

– Prince Louis of Brabant, later eighth First Prince of Procer

I woke up an hour before nightfall.

It was one of the more useful oddities caused by my association with the Sisters, that I could in some eldritch way feel the approach of dawn and dusk. I still had the taste of a passable Harrow red in my mouth from the talks I'd had with Abigail, the same sort of patient decision dissection I'd learned from Black and the War College. She seems willing to learn, at least, I thought as I groaned and forced myself to keep my eyes open. Exhaustion was lingering alongside the wine, and the handful of hours of sleep I'd squeezed in were nowhere enough to get me back on my feet. I drew on the Night a lick, not to wield it but to let the sensation of holding it pass through my frame. Like sticking your hand in a bucket of cool water, it woke me right up. I could probably rustle up some minor miracles now, I decided. It no longer felt like I'd melt myself from the inside if I did. That was instinct talking, but like it or not I'd had more experience drawing on eldritch powers than most people ever cared to go through. My instincts were rather well-informed, when it came to things like this. Getting my bad leg over the edge of the legion cot I'd claimed, I allowed myself the luxury of grimacing at the sensation. No one to put up a front for, right now.

I'd kept a shirt on in deference to the weather, but my fingers found themselves sliding under to find an old friend. The scar the Penitent's Blade had left still naked across my torso, nowadays more pale than pink but never to disappear. A testament to the costs of what had seemed like a victory, that night in Summerholm. The Lone Swordsman spared and branded with purpose, loosed like an arrow to start the rebellion that would see me rise up the ranks. A necessary evil, I'd told myself. What was one more wound on Callow, when it was already bleeding from imperial rule? When that wound would lead to a mending. I could only be grimly amused at how disgusted I'd felt by Black ordering three death row prisoners slain so blood magic could be worked to save my life. In a sense, I'd done the same thing on a much grander scale before he ever gave the order. I withdrew my fingers and tugged down my shirt. It was done, and there was no unmaking it. I was strangely glad for Sve Noc's returning of the scar when they struck me back down to mortal coil. What was I, really, without the reminders on my skin of what my choices had wrought?

I got up with a hiss of pain and hobbled to a chair to have something to lean against when putting my trousers back on. It made me miss Indrani, in a strange way, and Hakram as well. It was different with my lover when she helped me with my clothes, sensual in a way that would be blasphemous to associate with Adjutant, but I wasn't sure I could honestly say there wasn't more intimacy in having Adjutant help me with my armour than in the woman I shared a bed with buttoning up my trousers. The business of dressing myself was finished with only minimal pain, and I grabbed the Mantle of Woe on the way out. It settled on my shoulders comfortably, the worn dark cloth warm against my back even as the outside boasted a riotous mix of colours all speaking of a foe beaten. There was a metaphor in there, I idly thought. Black's sombre gift whole but only out of sight, the visible sown over by all the fields I'd bared my blade on. Amusing as the thought was, I set it aside. Staff in hand, cloak streaming behind me, I got back to work.

The abandoned mansion I'd claimed as my resting place was swarming with drow and legionaries eyeing each other with wariness. I caught sight of a black eye on a young Callowan boy and a carefully cradled wrist for a Miklaya Sigil warrior, which prompted a sigh. The drow had never been taught to play nice with others, and my own people could be... touchy. At least whoever'd drawn up the roster had been farsighted enough not to assign greenskins. Goblins would carry the grudge until it could be answered for more safely, but if someone socked an orc in the face there was going to be blood on the floor before all was said and done. There was a tribune in command and I wasted no time in getting news from her. The city was still quiet and the Dominion hadn't tried an offensive since their last beating. An envoy from the Levantine camp had been sent, but they were being made to wait. General Abigail was 'planning the coming march', which no doubt meant she was sleeping like a log. Special Tribune Robber had come for me, but declined to wake me up when he learned I was out of it. The last I took most notice of, and asked the tribune to send someone to fetch him.

"Will you be here, ma'am?" the Soninke officer politely asked. "Or should I message for him to be sent elsewhere?"

"The Dominion captains are being held separately from their warriors, right?" I frowned.

"As per Leg – as per the Army of Callow's protocol, Your Majesty," she hastily adjusted.

The tribune looked afraid she'd offended by her lapse. Early thirties, at a glance, so odds weren't bad she'd been one of Istrid's or Orim's before Second Liesse. Fresh to my service, after decades in the Legions.

"Calm down, Tribune," I reassured. "I know well how much we've borrowed from the Legions. The Army of Callow as it now stands could not exist without them and all they taught us."

That took the edge off the fear, and she nodded in nervous agreement. I hummed, considering my options.

"I'll be headed to speak with our Levantine prisoners," I said. "I'll need a guide. Have it passed to Robber he should join me there."

It was done with brisk efficiency, and I was provided an escort of legionaries to head out. The drow would have done the same, but a few words in Crepuscular had them headed back to General Rumena instead. I wasn't having the wander around a crowded city full of humans if I could help it. As it turned out the captains of Levant were being held in Sarcella's own gaol, a nice little touch of irony. The tribune in charge of the legionaries keeping an eye on our guests was well-informed of them, and told me what I'd wanted to know: we had, in fact, captured the captain commanding their holding action in Belles Portes earlier. She'd taken a sword to the shoulder while fighting, but accepted healing by the priests of the House Insurgent and was now merely tired.

It would do: after all, so was I. A cell better fit for holding thieves than what had to be one of the highest officers in the enemy vanguard awaited me, cramped and bare save for a rough bench and a chamber pot. Some kind soul have found her a blanket, which seemed for the best considering that she was apparently quite old. Built like an orc and obviously in fighting fit, true, but there was only white left to her hair. One of the legionaries at my side unlocked the cell while the other brought out a folding chair for me to sit on. I sure as Hells wasn't standing any more today unless I had to. The Levantine rose to her feet before the door was even open, and I greeted her with a sharp nod.

"Captain Elvera, I believe," I spoke in Chantant.

Her face tightened. I thanked the orc who'd brought in my chair and eased myself into it before dismissing my pair of escorts. The door remained open, and the Levantine's blue eyes studied the sight before warily returning to me.

"Yes," she replied. "You are the Black Queen."

Her accent was thick enough the words were near unintelligible, and she spoke very slowly. My officers had already established she spoke no Lower Miezian, though, so it was about as clearly as this conversation could be held.

"I am," I agreed. "I am here to discuss the logistics of your surrender."

Her brow creased, and I repeated more slowly after changing 'logistics' for 'details'. She nodded.

"Your general promised no killing of prisoners," Captain Elvera said. "Or torture."

"I will hold to that," I said.

The issue here was that, according to Abigail, we had the better part of three thousand Dominion warriors on our hands. Stripping them of armaments and dispersing them in Sarcella meant they were unlikely to be an immediate problem, but that changed nothing about the long-term noose around our neck they'd be. The Third Army was decently supplied still, but dragging that many prisoners around would eat into the reserves at a harsh rate. And while the southern expedition still had piles of dwarf-provided rations as well as what had been brought from the Everdark, the Herald of the Deeps had made it clear the Kingdom Under would only supply the drow exodus headed towards the Dead King. Any force sent south was on its own. Add on top of it all that the drow had no facilities to hold prisoners, that the Third Army had been bloodied raw by fighting and that we need to move quickly before this turned sour on us? We couldn't keep the Levantines, it was as simple as that. Even if my general hadn't offered them their lives with the terms I would not have countenanced a massacre of prisoners of war, but neither could I just let them loose with a slap on the wrist.

"I cannot simply release you to fight me in a few weeks," I bluntly said.

"Captains will have ransom," Captain Elvera said. "If I am sent out to camp, I will gather coin to buy freedom of as many soldiers as I can. Then return as prisoner. I will give oath."

Even if coin was enough to move me, I could not trust you to deliver it. Your own priesthood had me declared Arch-heretic of the East, I thought. You have a holy justification to consider all oaths made to me as null and void. I had not been well-inclined towards the Lantern because of that, even before some of their own had killed Nauk. I breathed out slowly. I would not stoke the embers of anger I felt at that. He'd been a general, and this was war. I had struck similar enough blows in the past, and would perhaps do it again. But this is the wrong war, not the one we should be fighting, and for that stupidity you killed my friend. What was left of him, anyway. I forcefully pushed the thought aside. I would not add waste to waste, simply to even scales that could not be evened by blood.

"Coin is not what I want," I said. "You have offered me an oath, Captain Elvera. There are some of your people who would say those mean nothing, when offered to me."

The old woman's face darkened.

"I am not Blood," she stiffly said. "But not a dog. Even oath to devil should be kept. I have honour, even if Hells do not."

I studied her closely as she spoke. The indignation was genuine enough, I decided. And those of the Dominion did have a reputation for being straightforward, as concerned with honour and reputation as the Arlesite princes they so often squabbled with. But the reputation ascribed to a people living so far away from mine meant very little, in the end. It was like calling all orcs bloodthirsty savages, or all Callowans obsessed with grudges. Having a warrior's build and displaying valour on the field did not necessarily mean she was not deceitful.

"And you have the authority to speak for all the prisoners currently in my hands?" I pressed.

She nodded after taking some time to parse out my words. I'd spoken a little too fast.

"Then we can bargain for release," I said. "I want an oath from you."

Her wizened face hardened.

"I will not fight against Levant," Captain Elvera said. "Better death."

I shook my head, almost amused. I supposed I did have a reputation for making old enemies fight my fresher ones.

"None of the prisoners are to make war against me or my allies for three months," I said. "I want your oath on this."

The old woman looked wary.

"That is all?" she asked. "No ransom?"

From you, yes, I thought. But I've every intent of selling your freedom twice. I have an envoy from the camp waiting, and concessions you cannot give me. I refrained from smiling, well aware that a villain offering lenient terms with one of those would in all likelihood be taken as a trap.

"That is all," I said.

I'd considered keeping their arms and armour, but what point was there? It would slow us down on the march, and in six months it would be a lot more useful in their hands than filling my army's supply carts. Captain Elvera watched me in silence for a long time.

"Why?" she finally asked.

"You are under the command of the Lord of Malaga," I said.

She made a disgruntled noise.

"I serve Tartessos," the old woman said. "Lady Aquiline fights with him."

Akua had been right in her assessment, I mused. The Dominion's armies were not without internal squabbles. That's what happens when nobles command instead of officers with a clear chain of command.

"Then take this message back to her, and to him," I said, and my eyes hardened. "There is only one war that matters, and it is being fought up north. Not here. I come with an offer of peace for the Grand Alliance."

I paused, waiting to make sure she'd understood me well. She nodded, eyes hooded.

"If you refuse that peace, I will have to fight you," I said. "And I will not have the luxury to be nice about it, because we are running out of time."

I coldly smiled.

"So take my peace," I said. "Or we'll have to do this the hard way."

Silence filled the cell.

"Threat," Captain Elvera said.

"Promise," I corrected.

Leaning on my staff, I rose to my feet.

"You have my terms," I said. "I will leave you to consider them. Tell the guards when you make your decision."

The old woman hesitated.

"Agreed," she said. "I will give oath, and message."

I left Sarcella's gaol not long after, with the first of the two oaths I wanted, and Captain Elvera's cell was locked anew.

—

Robber was waiting for me outside, lounging atop a wrecked street stall and looking oddly vulnerable without his armour. The shadows were lengthening outside, like they were slowly devouring the world, and in the back of my mind I knew we were not long before twilight began in earnest. I limped through the snow, my earlier escort of legionaries resuming their duties before I gestured for them to stay back for this. The goblin nimbly leapt down and I caught sight of a few glints of steel scattered over his body. Hidden knives, I thought, or other murderous accoutrements. He didn't salute, and his yellow eyes were without the usual malicious glee.

"And?" I asked.

"He wasn't burned," Robber replied. "His corpse... It's bad, Catherine. They melted his plate with Light. It's cooled down since, but you'd need to butcher the flesh to get him out. If we're giving him a Legion funeral, we'll need more than just the usual pyre."

My fingers clenched around my staff. Molten steel, Gods. What an agonizing death that must have been. Summer's flames had changed him, and Warlock's sorcery failed to bring back the orc I'd known, but he'd still felt pain. And there'd been enough of the Nauk who'd been my friend left that I felt a clench of rage. The Lanterns had done this. Killing, killing I could stomach. Had to. It was war, and if I ordered deaths I must be able to withstand them as well. But this was... He'd deserved better than that. I closed my eyes, and thought of the night after Three Hills. Green flames taking Nilin, who had been a traitor but beloved by many of us even after that. And now his closest friend was following him. I'd never told Nauk, that his second and good-as-brother had been passing information to Akua. I'd made the decision he was better off not knowing. How presumptuous that felt, now that he was dead.

"The part of the city that's on fire, it's almost out?" I said, eyes still closed.

"Near enough," Robber said. "Took all of the quarter they call Lanterria and some of the outskirts, but the firebreaks contained it and it's dying out."

I let out a misty breath and opened my eyes. The shadows had grown longer still.

"Speak with General Abigail," I said. "We'll be holding a Legion funeral for all our losses in Sarcella tonight. Work out watch rosters so that as many people as possible can attend. I'll speak to the drow myself."

Yellow eyes considered me, though the question went unasked.

"What else can we still give him?" I whispered. "Or any of them. It's a fool war, but they died fighting it. They'll have a pyre and the only kind of farewell we learned."

He inclined his head in approval, then hesitated.

"He went out hard, you know," Robber said. "Fangs red."

I breathed out shakily.

"He was Rat Company," I replied. "How else could he have gone?"

We parted ways, knowing we'd next meet to burn a friend. My legionaries followed me into the city in silence. In the end, all my grief could be was screaming in the dark: a harsh cry, followed by silence ringing of absence.

I had tricks to ply, and duty did not make exceptions for funerals.

—

We'd won the day, or close enough, and that meant I could dictate terms.

To an extent, anyway. Asking for more than I was costing them might see the Levantines write-off their own with cold eyes. They wouldn't know how badly I didn't want to be keeping prisoners, so it would at least look like I was the one with the good cards in hand. Much as I'd prefer not to be fighting the Levantines at all, I wouldn't delude myself into thinking they in any way shared that sentiment. The enemy commander would be out to screw me as badly as he could, while clawing his way back into possession of the troops I'd captured. I could play that game, truly, and win it a lot easier than he could. A word on my part would have the Tomb-Maker leading a party of Mighty to assault the Dominion camp after night fell, and unless the Pilgrim was hiding in a tent in there that would lead to a bloody massacre. But I would not compound waste with yet more of it, not even if my enemy was itching for that very tussle. No, neither corpses nor coin could be my aim here. There was going to be a battle in Iserre, soon enough, and I needed to get all my munitions in place before someone dropped a torch: this would be a part of it, nothing more and nothing less.

The Levantine envoy was a middle-aged man with a fine mustache and stripes of blue and green crisscrossing his face, speaking Lower Miezian with an elegant polish. He got to use it just long enough for me to send him back to camp with an offer for the enemy commander to meet on the bridges in front of Sarcella. He left under protest, which I ignored with the ease of someone who'd been pushing paperwork on Hakram for years, and I gauged how long was reasonable to wait before getting atop Zombie and making for the bridges. The boy would come, if it was still the one I'd seen during the day that was in charge. No one with eyes that raw would pass on an opportunity to confront someone who'd bled them. My escort was tripled in size when I informed the Third Army of what I intended, but I paid it little attention. Belles Portes quarter was entirely ours, now, and it led directly to the bridges going over the river. I'd not specified which one, so on a whim I picked the leftmost one – and ordered my legionaries to remain behind. I wondered what it said about my reputation that none of the officers looked pleased, but none actually argued.

My dead horse's hooves cut against the icy stone, sharp sounds like flint being struck. The day's warmth was fleeing the coming of night, and the wind was picking up. Far in the distance the sun was drowning in a sea of purple and red, tinting the snowy fields with enough blood and ichor for a thousand wars. My mount eased advancing, halfway through the bridge, and my staff struck stone with a dull sound. I could hear crows, in the distance, though there was nothing godly about those. Just beasts, drawn by the day's corpses. I stuffed my pipe carefully, and passed a palm over the wakeleaf with just a hint of Night. Inhale and exhale, and then I watched smoke rise up into the sky as I waited for the boy who wanted my head to come treat with me.

It was not long. Riders came, five hundred armed to the teeth and a few among them who reeked of something anathema to the Night. Lanterns, I assumed. Those I allowed my gaze to linger on, taking in the faces painted in black and white and wondering which one had killed Nauk. If it had been only one, or a working of several. Argument erupted, but in the end youth and pride won out. Razin Tanja, of the Grim Binder's Blood. That was the name our prisoners had given. Soldiers were soldiers, in the end: offer warm food and booze, and there was always one in a company willing to sell out their own mother. The boy rode up, on his beautiful white horse wearing his beautiful red and grey plate. The patterns of paint on his face had changed from earlier, now mere stripes of iron and blood on the cheeks. It revealed handsome enough features, sharp-boned but bearing the kind of edge you wanted to run a hand against. What little I could see of his hair was a dark brown, but most was hidden by a tall helmet bearing red feathers. The sword at his hip, I could not help but note, had a very pretty wrought steel pattern to it. Swirls and vines, in a vaguely arcane pattern. No leather bands over it, though. It would get slippery if he got blood all over it, become an unwieldy ornament – and wasn't that nobility put in a sentence? He reined in his horse at the foot of the bridge, just close enough we could talk without shouting. There was a banner in the colours of his paint, held by a clever wooden contraption on his back, that jutted up above even his plumage.

"You begged audience of me, Black Queen," Razin Tanja announced. "Speak your piece."

I pulled at my pipe and said nothing, only breathing out. The smoke went up and I admired the play of light and shadows on it.

"Is this a riddle?" the boy said through gritted teeth. "Are you making a game of me?"

The anger was out, pouring out of every pore. It could be useful, anger. It'd gotten me through some very bad scraps, and should mine ever go out I figured there wouldn't be much left of me. But there was a trick to it: you had to learn when to keep it sheathed. It was like a sword, if you just swung it around night and day it would grow dull. You would grow dull, and someone who'd learned the trick would cut out your throat. Tanja was letting his anger dull him, right now. I'd let him keep swinging as long as he wanted, because behind that anger there was fear and shame. The longer he swung and hit nothing, the more harshly those would bite.

"Have you become a mute, villain?" the noble sneered. "Or is it fear of my father's army that stills your tongue?"

Another stream of smoke, and then finally I replied.

"It stings, doesn't it?" I mildly said. "Knowing that after all this, all you have to threaten me with is your father's shadow."

His fingers tightened into fists, his face flushed.

"A single battle does not win a war," Razin Tanja said. "Tricks will not save you twice."

I hummed, considering him.

"I'm not going to threaten you," I decided. "There's no point, is there? When you have enough hate, it becomes a kind of courage. Madness, too, but that line's always been thinner than people like to admit."

"I will not be condescended to by a heretic," the boy snarled. "If you have called this meeting only to mock me—"

"You mock yourself," I gently said, "by pretending today did not happen. It did. Learn from it, or die in a ditch somewhere blaming everything but yourself. But that's not my burden to bear, Tanja, and I've no inclination to try. You're here because I hold your people, and you want them back."

"There are treaties pertaining to the treatment of war prisoners," he said. "To break them would—"

"See the Grand Alliance declare war on me?" I drily said. "Perhaps lead your priesthood to declare me something of a heretic, even."

There was a moment of embarrassed silence.

"That's the problem with turning the screws early," I said. "It doesn't leave much room for escalation."

"I will offer the appropriate ransom for the captains," Razin Tanja said.

He was reaching, and knew it. The tinge of desperation in his voice was making that much clear. Ah, I thought. We both know you fucked up today, but it looks like you might actually be held accountable for it. I wondered if it'd be his father, or the other noble Captain Elvera answered to. Are you worrying you'll be the sacrificial lamb to make peace between Malaga and Tartessos after your mess cost everyone steeply? Victory had a thousand fathers and mothers, but defeat did tend to be attributed to a single pair of hands. I wondered if he might actually be killed over this. Levant kept to Good, it was said, but it was rough country. I might have more leverage than anticipated, then.

"I've no interest in coin," I said. "What I want from you is an oath."

"An oath?" he said. "I will not serve Below, villain, in this life or any other."

"I've not asked you to," I said. "You hold command of the vanguard, Razin Tanja. It will stay camped outside Sarcella for three days and three nights – on this I require your oath."

"And you would return the captains, for this?" the boy pressed.

The wakeleaf filled my throat and lungs, burning pleasantly. It left me tingling when it passed my lips.

"I'll return every Levantine soldier captured today, including officers," I replied.

"Agreed," he immediately said.

He had absolutely no intention of keeping his word, did he? I sighed. After dealing with Praesi and fae, the Levantine was almost painfully transparent.

"I'll want the oath made to the Heavens and on the honour of your Blood," I coldly said. "Made in front of every remaining captain in your army."

"You dare question my honour?" he replied, puffing up.

"You test my patience," I calmly said, as if we were discussing the weather. "Do not mistake my restraint for vulnerability. If there is no fair bargain to be made, I will put your fucking head on a pike and use it as a warning for your replacement."

Hate and fear, I mused, watching the war in his eyes. The sun was more dead than dying, by now, and I think that was what settled it – the shadows winning out, the same kind that I'd wielded to drown his soldiers even under afternoon sun.

"You will pay for this, Black Queen," Razin Tanja said. "All of it. The Heavens will see to it that your horrors are given answer."

I grinned around my pipe, face wreathed in smoke.

"They'll take their swing," I said. "Watch. See where it gets them."

Night fell before I got my oath, but I did get it.

Go Vote!!!!!!!!!!

(Please)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

RogueTurnip

Love the series, but I got an extremely toxic add on this chapter while reading on samsung mobile. It took me away from the page and forced me to close my Practical Guide tab for the first time in literally years. Please screen your ads.

erraticerrata

Unfortunately I have no control over what ads run. Using an adblocker shoulder get rid of the problem, however.

stevenneiman

Huh. I read on PC, and I don't get any ads.

Snowfire1224

That sounds like a problem with something else, not the website. I have the same problem, but it's not just this site, it's more something that happens every once in a while regularless of what I'm looking at.

Javvies

Razin's a fucking idiot.

Elvera ... I have hope for her, and possibly her liege. She seems to be relatively reasonable, and have a functioning brain, based on what we've seen of her so far.

Hmmm, I wonder if either Razin or the Lanterns will try and attack during the funeral/memorial. If they do ... I expect Cat will express some serious displeasure.

IDKWhoitis

They might do so, but will be caught by the Drow is my guess. The Drow are experts in raids.

Liliet

Razin's a baby dumbass. I have compassion for him, though... uh... not too much, considering how he'd been treating war as his personal playground.

Still, he's a baby dumbass who hasn't had a chance to learn better, I think.

I love how Cat's just being... patient and understanding with him, right up to the degree that she can afford to.

SO GLAD TO SEE ELVERA TALKING TO CAT and no, Razin has just given OATH that they won't. That's binding, see: First Llesse aftermath.

Novice

Are the oaths given to her at this point still magically binding? She's no longer fae.

Liliet

Oaths can be magically binding on their own, see: First Llesse.

Javvies

Ehhhh ... at First Llesse, Cat was already Duchess of Moonless Nights and the Last Noble of Winter (outside the Wild Hunt, which generally stands somewhat apart from the Courts).

Liliet

You're confusing Second and First Llesse.

Fayhem

That wasn't strictly "on their own" – that was a blood oath at First Llesse, which I think has a lot more metaphysical weight than just spoken words. Given how hard this angry child is balking at even swearing in front of his soldiers I think Cat is wise in not trying to press for a blood oath sworn with a villain from him.

Liliet

Yeah, it was.

...Note how Cat's making him swear on his Blood...

okay, this is just speculation at this point. More likely than not Cat's counting on entirely non-metaphysical considerations to prevent him from breaking oath.

And I think she knows what she's doing.

Fayhem

I agree that she knows what she's doing here; Akua may have outsmarted her back when they were rivals, but in the end Akua got outsmarted by Black and at this point they've both been Cat's Scheming Tutors. If the kid is dumb enough to attack anyway I predict a proper villainous Just As Planned before he gets roflstomped by the Night.

Liliet

And then there's Malicia.

I would point out that Catherine did not stop at the point where he gave a promise he was going to easily break. My interpretation is not that she's aiming to make it more costly for him to inevitably break it, but that she's aiming for him to /actually/ not break it.

Remember, she needs all the armies and generals she can gather against the Dead King. Cat's very much going to be looking out for /his/ best interests here, too.

Big Brother

"See where it gets them."

That line sums up my entire opinion about the Heavens in this story.

mavant

Murder the gods, topple their thrones.

Misterspokes

The path to Royalty is a continuous cut

Mikasi

A Reckoning Will Not Be Indefinitely Postponed.

sutortyrannus

Kill them! Take their stuff!

danh3107

God, can you just picture it? Cat sitting on zombie on a bridge across from that young general?

A shadowy figure only lit by the slight flickering of her pipe, smoke obscuring the parts of her face the shadows don't already conceal. A monster born out of your darkest nightmare, an enemy who casually murders thousands of soldiers without much apparent effort. You see her cape wrapped around her form, black as midnight and striped with the banners of heroes. And she wants to talk with you, parlay with /you/. The arch heretic of the east, tyrant of callow, the Black Queen in the flesh...

DroughtBringer

Beautifully written, and terrifying.

Raved Thrad

"Uh, uh... you're going to hell!"

"Been there. It's a lousy place to visit."

"Wait, what?"

Dainpdf

Well, they may have seen her lean more heavily on her staff after collapsing the river. Not that it really makes much difference.

Liliet

Honestly that just makes it seem more menacing the way I imagine it – because it makes it tangible and real. She just DID that.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. The images of Cat on the wiki all seem to be just "oh hey here's the character". We really need a set of images representing her successive instars: Barmaid/pit fighter, Squire, Squire II/Vicequeen, Black Queen and wearer of the Mantle of Woe, Priestess of Night.

Sanctus Obscurum

And lo! There sat she,
Black Queen all cloaked
In Woe's own mantle!
Wreathed in the blood
Of bloody day's death.
She sat astride dreadful steed
Of necromantic animus.
As the poor youth
Whose armies she had drowned
Rode out all alone to her confront
That he might snatch back
His captured soldiery
From her unhallowed clutches.
There sat she in red light
On foul mount, with manicoloured woe
Draped from her shoulders,
And lit her pipe of dragon's bone
With niether spark nor match,

Clouding her shadowed, red-lit face
In veil of wakeleaf smoke.
With grim mein under bleeding skies
She gazed upon his bluster and pride
And with a few words
She broke it.
Three days and three nights
Such was the oath
That she rested from that young lord
Three days and nights
Would his armies sit
By poor, broken Sarcella.
So did Razin Tanja,
Of Binder's Blood,
Swear to Catherine Foundling:
She of the green flames,
Black Queen Of Callow,
First Under the Night,
Who stole Winter's power,
Who bested Summer's might,
And who even parlayed
With Hidden Horror, and survived.
As she sat astride her foul steed
As Night fell and day's blood
Blackened o'er them both.

My own attempt to capture the mood of the scene there. It could use some working, but I think it turned out alright for a first draft.

Skaddix

Ugh can we move to another character. I rather see what is going on with any other Woe at this point. Also where are Indrani and Akua right now? I get why Akua absent Cat is not revealing she spared her. But Cat acting like Indrani ran off and is not coming back which I guess could make sense but I don't remember Cat telling Indrani about Masego. And their last fight wasn't that bad.

Big Brother

Mate, this is Cat's Story. We'll get the other characters when they're story relevant again. Show some patience.

Skaddix

I have been plenty patient but I could care less about Cat interacting with some douchebag Noble or trouncing him in combat. Or honestly a funeral for Nauk who already died for me when Warlock had to rez him. Thing is Cat in my book didn't really end that last Volume in the most interesting place. Pretty much everyone was in a more interesting position. Now granted Cat meeting Tyrant and Hierarch was great fun but when Heirarch was spying on everyone Cat simply wasn't going to do much that was going to interest me.

Argentorum

Every time Erratic skips one of these conversations, all the moaners come out and say "But we never get to see the *good part," and "why does the good part always get skipped?"

and then we do see the "good" part, and people are complaining that there isn't enough Indrani shooting things and they've been patient enough already.

I think I why Erratic doesn't bother with the comments section anymore...

erraticerrata

I do read the comments. But I don't usually get involved unless I'm asked a direct question.

Daniel E

Wait, is that all it takes? ... Direct questions for @erraticerrata – Pie or cake? Rum or brandy? Ultimate fate of Akua? Any ETA on when we might get story Tags & a proper forum?

erraticerrata

Cake, rum, who knows? Story tags I'll look into, not sure what you mean by proper forum.

Daniel E

Like.. you know, a forum. Where we can post threads for discussion instead of breaking our mouse wheels scrolling a disorganized comments list. You've got a thriving community here, would be nice to have a real space.

Skaddix

Not everyone agrees what the good parts are, shocking. Turns out people have different favorite characters that they want to see more of. Personally I don't much care for Nauk or Abigail so focus on them doesn't really do much for me.

Liliet

I love Abigail, but Nauk just feels to me like one thread in a tapestry. If he did not get the amount of focus that he did something would be amiss, but I don't really care about HIM per se, no. I care about Cat caring about him, though :3

Skaddx

Well as I said above. Part of my issue is Cat didn't end Epilogue or start the Prologue at a very interesting place in my mind. I think Masego and Black/Pilgrim top that list by a lot.

Her meeting Hierarch and Tyrant was great but beyond that she hasn't really been interacting with characters I really care about or find interesting. I don't care about Abigail, Robber is fun but he is like a comic relief character, Nauk he was already dead for me and I doubt this Razin is going to matter all that much. Basically I think the board has enough significant characters and doesn't really have space for many more until some exit in a more permanent way.

Beyond that I kinda feel blueballed that we know characters like Juniper, Hakram and Viv are close by but they still have gotten back with Cat yet.

Agent J

You're making the mistake of lumping all commenters together. People read a story and take different things from it. One person might enjoy the political aspects of the story while another prefers the war. Some may enjoy both while others neither and ready for, perhaps, the interplay between characters.

Unless it is the same person complaining each time, your own complaints don't really make sense.

Dainpdf

EE loves cliffhangers. We're going to be kept in the dark for a while still, I bet.

Liliet

Indrani's with the main chunk of the army, Catherine is waiting for them to catch up. Same with Akua.

Mental Mouse

1) As BB notes, Cat is our protagonist here, and I'll add that she's had a lot of personal development for us to catch up on. She's also laying the path to the fight with the Dead King.

2) Indrani is apparently with the main Drow force. At a guess, so is Akua... and that's an interesting development in its own right. I have to assume that Akua got the same "mystical psychotherapy" as Cat did, or nobody would trust her away from Cat.

Unfortunately for your case, neither of them is a POV character, which IMHO is two good calls by the author: Part of Indrani's role in the plot is that she's opaque; IIRC, Akua was briefly POV when she was approaching her climax (and was the only plausible POV at her location), but since then, the uncertainty about her thoughts and loyalties is very plot-significant.

Liliet

We got Akua's POV during Kaleidoscope, and it was FANTASTICALLY BRILLIANT.

Which just underscores the importance of putting off her next one until it can reach anywhere near that level of beauty ;u;

Aston

I'm still thinking Cats bad leg will be a weapon of sorts. Same as not being Named.

Good ending to the battle.

Rook

I'll bet money it gives out from under her just in time to avoid a surprise attack.

Someguy

It's a set up for Cat to use a Drop Step and charge in for a Dempsey Roll.

Hitogami

Nauk! My beautiful green boy! You will be missed by the more bloodthirsty readers...

Thanks for the chapter, it was good

IDKWhoitis

This was probably the nicest brutal putdowns I've seen Cat do. She understands he's young and way over his head. He all but had to beg for his troops back.

I wonder if he'll continue the pursuit after 3 days or will he just cut his losses? He's already in trouble for the colossal fuck up, but that might embolden him to do a larger one.

Euodiachloris

There's another prize mistake incoming.

He's probably going to try a night raid with a small, dependable band (seeing as I doubt he's going to get all the officers on his side on this one).

Raved Thrad

He sounds like the type to think military aphorisms from tired, old campaigners don't apply to him. "It worked before, so it'll work again. The glory of the death of the Black Queen will be mine!"

Liliet

He can't. Cat's made him give oath.

And in three days, Cat's main army is going to catch up.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh he can. I mean it's about 50/50 at this point, but if he does it it's because he's making the classic mistake of the arrogant Procer noble: assuming he's going to WIN. And if he does, to be fair, breaking Oath to the Arch-Vile is expressly permitted. If he wins, if Cat lies dead at his feet, it's good tactics and justice etc. etc. There'd be grumbling, but killing the villain of the age is going to win out as glory for his blood and erase any means used to achieve it, or previous failures that were now mere setbacks.

But that assumes he wins. When he in fact dies, taking most if not all of the lanterns with him, what we have left is Captain Elvera saying "that fucking moron, that little shit got so many of us killed with his dumb fucking ideas and then she gives us an out with oaths we can actually live with and that dumbass breaks them and gets himself killed. Well I'm sure as fuck not going to be the oath breaker that dies trying to avenge the honorless whelp." And none of the others are going to go against that in anything like the numbers they'd need to think they'd have a chance, so even the ones who want to will stand down with her. And since it would be a doom of his own making, the courts in Procer aren't going to have any good narrative out of this to use against her. Oh i'm sure the boy's father could say something, but it'd be one thing if he rode to die gloriously against her after that river debacle, it's a bit harder to whip up too much fervor over the guy who's captains all talk about how he fucked up, had a way out, and fucked that up too.

Also unlike last chapter, his willingness to break that oath he so easily agreed to pretty much ensures the “hero who avenges things years later” narrative is lost to him.

Liliet

I mean Catherine specifically made him give oath that he couldn't easily break, it was a whole point.

But yeah the narrative swinging in her favor is exactly equal to politics here: Catherine's going for an alliance and Catherine's going for not being the bad guy, they're the same thing :3

Euodiachloris

An oath made on Those Above and given to one declared a heretic by the Light can be argued to be no oath at all, if you are inclined to believe such.

That's the issue, here.

Liliet

That is apparently not what Levantines believe, judging by Elvera.

But more importantly, my impression was that it was going to be a magic oath, like the First Llesse one that Cat was dismayed to find out she couldn't loophole.

Euodiachloris

Cat was, at that point, living the Fae life. Our very angry lordling is young, idealistic, boneheaded, desperate... and, he's not a Hero made of plot and bound so heavily to the Heavens that messing up would cost him an immediate fall. He's also not close enough to forty to know why keeping oaths even with the heretical is the higher road to take.

Liliet

You're confusing First Llesse and Second Llesse, aren't you?

Anyway, she also made him swear by Blood, and that's stronger for a Levantine and utterly irrelevant wrt who you're swearing to.

Euodiachloris

True all points. Except one: Pilgrim has killed family because Blood turned out to be thinner than hoped for. 😞

Most of his chapters underscore that people are people, whatever side, whichever nation. Our lad has yet to learn that. Hope he does, mind. Before, you know, it gets more people killed.

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Daniel E

“Living the Fae life” is my new favorite motto, thank you.

Mental Mouse

There's another issue here which may be a misstep by Cat: Elvera's troops are now bound by a three-month oath, but their commander is only bound for three days – and he doesn't understand honor nearly as well as Elvira does.

Javvies

Elvera and her troops were Cat's prisoners. Razin is a prisoner only of his own stupidity and inexperience.

As a general rule, you get to impose terms more favorable to yourself on people who are your prisoners than those who are not your prisoners and have merely been beaten on and withdrawn from the field of battle.

IDKWhoitis

With the Levs, I wouldn't be surprised if honor codes could actually interfere with orders. Also, it would be amusing to see if Elvira would point this out before a battle. Cat has been nothing but decent to them. So if it comes to battle, I would be curious if Elvira would step aside passively.

She isn't sworn to the boy, but rather a different noble. And if the boy plays his hand too early and breaks his pact to the gods and the army, then she might have a greater excuse to just not listen to his orders.

Insanenoodlyguy

Misstep? Hardly. This is cold cunning. She's giving him rope to hang himself

Euodiachloris

And a lovely rope it is too, to be sure. 😊

mavant

It's a bit of a shame to have lost the "unbreakable promises" Fae spell-like ability.

IDKWhoitis

Hold the fuck up, did he try to lecture Cat on the rules of engagement that she and Pilgrim set up at the beginning of this whole war?

Like man, this chapter just became so much better.

Dainpdf

I think more on basic rules most Good nations keep to. Gotta remember Levant mostly fights Procer.

antoninjohn

I guess when he break his oath to attack he will do it at night for surprise, after all oaths with the Cat are meaningless in the eyes of the heavens by which he swore

FactualInsanity

That's why Cat forced him to make the oath in front of every Levantine that matters left in his army. Some of them might be dismissive of "meaningless" promises, but for the ones that are like Elvera, it will just deepen the cracks already present in the Levantine camp.

Insanenoodlyguy

It'd be the nail in the coffin for the Elvaras in camp. If he wants to attack tonight, they will say "our honor means something boy". If he tries to do it in three days, even worse: "we value our honor even if you only think yours matters, boy"

In three months, she might well be in a working truce with the crusade. The only way he could come out on top, maybe, is to back Cat now and look good in retrospect, and that's something he wouldn't have in him.

Liliet

Depending on how seriously he takes an oath by Blood, he might.

Insanenoodlyguy

Unlikely. Hed never undertake the kind of Gambit Talbot did. Hes both too prideful and not desperate enough.

Someguy

That'd be good for a laugh.

After all, Oaths sworn to Below cannot be broken (Or Else).

Oaths sworn to Above are broken all the time! Oathbreaking is thus Above's balliwick.

Dainpdf

Sorta. They need that veneer of reason to the thing. And I bet they're more likely to hold you to the spirit of the oath than Below.

After all, Above also holds sway over Honor.

Mental Mouse

"Above also holds sway over Honor"

Hmm, I'm not so sure. Certainly our villains are bound by oaths – note that Akua in Cat's Winter body was still bound by Cat's oaths. I suspect that Honor is a Narrative element, which can stand against either Above or Below.

beleester

Akua was bound by Fae oaths, which have actual magical force behind them, so that's kind of a different situation.

You're right that it's a trope for both sides – after all, Villains Never Lie is a trope. But magical bindings seem to be a mainly Evil trope – they're the "deal with the devil" trope where you can't escape your contract even if you realized it was a terrible mistake. Good oaths are about honor – you could break them, but you won't because it would cost you your honor.

Dainpdf

That was more a Fae thing than Good or Evil. As for honor, you'll see in their beliefs – Evil preaches betrayal, and doing whatever it takes to win, while the House of Light does preach honor.

Below enforces oaths to it not because it values honor, but because it knows that without it its followers would break them in a heartbeat.

TheGlyphstone

If he does, he'll cripple any ability to command his army. Elvera wasn't Blood, but she was a captain and she respected oaths no matter who they are given to. What the priests say is one thing, what the troops and officers believe is another, and violating an oath made both to the Heavens and on his own Blood would be devastating to his reputation.

Insanenoodlyguy

And it cripples the retaliation and his use as a symbol. He might well be able to get the lanterns and a few loyal captains to say, raid the funeral and try what worked the first time. And when Cat and her drow at night kill the ever loving fuck out of them, the larger surviving army, led by a woman who's under oath and cares about it anyway, isn't going to charge in to avenge him or go home mourning the loss of a martyr, no. They'll give a very factual report to his father while spreading the word about how "that dumb shit fucked it up, got a bunch of us killed, got the opportunity to walk, and fucked that up to. Manged to kill his honor before he got himself killed even." There's not a lot of rallying behind that sort of death.

Sylwoos

That's not even the worse part.

If he does that, his surprise attack will be utterly annihilated by the Mighty in the most brutal and terrifying manner. Never mind his reputation, his own officer will offer his head to appease Cat after realizing she can massacre all of them here and there.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Fucking badass.

Dainpdf

So, uh... few chapters ago I mentioned how Cat hasn't had the arrogance to basically declare war on the Gods like the Hierarch.

I'd like to retract my statement, please?

RanVor

Didn't she do that way back in Book 2?

Dainpdf

Perhaps. My memory is not perfect. Might also not have been this direct, dunno.

Andrew Mitchell

Permission granted.

Sugar Roll

See, Cat can be diplomatic after all. She's been making good deals after good deals ever since she went to the Everdark. She can be smug to the rest of the Woe next time they come together.

Liliet

Cat's been a diplomancer since the five-way melee. Never forget that mess ;u;

Euodiachloris

Hmmmm, diplomacy. For when plain diplomacy is just not interesting enough and the party has grown stale: add a little diplomacy¹!

¹Terms and conditions apply. May contain trace elements of unbridled chaos and goblin fire. Keep out of reach of small children and Tyrants.

beleester

"Cat's approach to negotiation is to show up with a sword and a bottle of cheap wine, and point out that while the wine tastes terrible, it is still technically better than being stabbed."

She's good at negotiating when she can make it clear that if negotiations fail, she's going to kill everyone.

Daniel E

As the Army of Callow draws closer to reunification; Any thoughts on how Hierophant is going to return? If his casual effects on the Tower's scouts are any indication, he is arguably one of the most powerful Named out there right now. I wouldn't give him odds against Pilgrim (that whole direct line of divine power thing), but I daresay he could hold his own against any of the other legendary Heroes we saw at Five Camps.

werafdsaew

Wouldn' the Drows benefit from having more modern equipment?

Andrew Mitchell

That's a really interesting thought. Maybe normal gear reduces some of their Night powers, like the shadow trick?

IDKWhoitis

Modern gear is heavier, which the Drow may not be accustomed to, and during the day, they are no stronger than normal humans. So that extra weight might exhaust them quicker. Also, the only point of switching from bronze/bones to steel would be added strength and piercing power, but the Drow are probably magically boosting that anyways, or dodging.

Also, the Drow are raiders, they don't really do the shield-wall concept, so heavier armor/shields/shortswords wouldn't really work well with them. Could they hypothetically train to work with those weapons and tactics? Yeah, but it would be a waste of potential and they don't have the time for that on the go. Its the same reason Black and the Legions didn't bother putting Goblins in a shield wall or Catherine put the fae into sapper formations.

Agent J

Could be giving them weapons they are unfamiliar with just wouldn't be worth the benefits of it being of a higher quality.

Liliet

Like AgentG and IDKWhoItIs said, giving drow equipment they aren't trained to use is completely counterproductive.

Euodiachloris

They'd need training in how to use it. Also, how to use it in the formations it was meant to be used in.

Nah: they're better off picking things up and folding the new ideas and knacks into Night on their terms.

luminiousblu

Equipment has an evolutionary process that has close ties to how their users fight. The viking round shield is for foot soldier use, meant to be cheap and durable and cover you from missile fire and blows, because while the Scandinavians had decent armour for their time it was still generally rubbish compared to later chain and plate. You can clearly see the purpose in the design, which is too big for cavalry fighting and a little too big when used alone – it's meant to be deployed en-masse and cover as much of the body as possible, used in a wall. The same goes for the scutum in a more extreme form – it's horrible as a personal shield, far too large to bash effectively and too heavy to be easily manoeuvred.

On the other hand, in the early renaissance shields – except for the buckler – effectively died out, not because they couldn't block gunfire or whatnot, but because armour had become so good that it was literally a waste of metal or wood to hold a shield – except if the enemy was using some sort of hammer or pick, at which point the theory behind buckler's deflecting design becomes clear – it wouldn't work well against swords or even axes, and would be almost completely useless against arrows, but none of those were a threat anymore. The things they were fighting and the doctrine at the time had obsoleted the round shield, but give a viking-period person a buckler and you'll get the same reaction as most modern people – incredulous laughter.

So basically, no. Giving the Drow short swords seems counterproductive when short swords are an extremely specialised and generally complete rubbish weapon. The scutum is the result of a highly specific way of fighting that evolved directly from the phalanx (the early Romans actually used a phalanx, the remains of which survived in the fighting style of the reserve "Triarii" line until the Marian reforms) and doesn't work at all in any other style, riot shields are deployed in a shield wall or mini-fishscale/testudo formation.

Levantine weapons and armour are almost certainly likewise specialised, even for their peasant soldiers – see the point about shields above. Sure, some of them will be wearing the thickest shirt they own, a padded hat, and carrying a billy club or a re-fitted hoe or scythe, and those aren't specialised, but those are also bottom-of-the-barrel weapons and still meant to be used in formation.

Adrian V

Ok new (unless someone already posted it xD) theory/hope: Nauk will rise somehow during the funeral pyre, maybe with a name (Prince Killer sounds cool), now that Hakram opened the path there should be other Orcs following him i think.

luminiousblu

Sort of fucked up how Nauk "deserves better" when by all accounts orcs are essentially a Neutral Evil race for who killing and eating sentient beings is literally part of their blood that can't even be drilled out of them. Even Hakram, who was the orc equivalent of depressed, starts eating things (a hilariously ineffective way of fighting against armoured foes with a range advantage but rule of cool and whatnot and explicitly calls out orc 'culture' (not even that really, since culture can be changed) as raiding, looting, killing, and burning. Probably not raping but that's less because they're above it and more because human women look like shit to them.

Goblins aside, since goblins being insane that seems to be mostly a cultural phenomenon and not literally in the blood, orcs are straight up a Always Neutral Evil race. The only thing that saves them from being Chaotic is the fact that they can clearly function in hierarchies not held up by threat of immediate execution, and some would say Neutral Evil is worse than Chaotic.

Liliet

I wouldn't use "Evil" like that.

You can't just reason that orcs are Evil because their culture is Evil. Is Juniper Evil? Is Hakram Evil? Was Nauk Evil? Sources to their specific evil-ness please

luminiousblu

I can totally reason Practical Guide orcs are Evil, in the sense of the D&D alignment (not the Practical Guide sense), because an urge to kill sentient things solely to kill them is Evil literally by definition. It's one of the few things explicitly mentioned as Evil alongside such things as torture, slavery, and creation of the undead.

>you can't just reason that orcs are Evil because their culture is Evil

Except it's not their culture, it's not Callowans holding their grudges tighter than the Dawi or the Drow being, well, Drow. Goblins might only be what they are because of their culture, but Hakram and Juniper both explicitly mention that all orcs have that inherent violent streak in them, it's just a part of them. Unless they were being poetic – and I don't think they were – they're born Evil. Not necessarily evil, if you don't think of it that way, but definitely Evil.

>was Nauk Evil?

Yes? The dude literally only doesn't eat people alive because it's not allowed. If you pointed at Hakram and Juniper alone you might have more of a leg to stand on, but Nauk is totally out there.

>is Juniper Evil?

Yes, a hundred percent. The woman is a blood knight who likes going to war for the sake of going to war. It's not even the case that she thinks it's simpler to beat the shit out of someone who disagrees with you, but simply that she enjoys killing hordes of people by commanding other hordes of people to do it efficiently. She doesn't like it when reality gets in the way of this either, so it's not like the commandant who takes a shine to war when it's needed but isn't actively looking for it, Juniper gets mad when someone points out she's a goddamn idiot when it comes to anything above the tactical level because her precious war is being ruined by political reality. If you gave her the chance to lead 100k troops wherever she wanted she'd just plow through as much of the world as possible with those troops because she likes being at war. That's Evil, capital-E.

It's also why I can't take all the accolades people throw at her in story seriously because I've never heard of a great general who can't take into account things at the strategic level, if not the grand strategic level. Hell, Hannibal and Napoleon are both remembered more for their overall strategies than for their actual battles among military historians – Cannae became THE battle to emulate, but the war of attrition and the Fabian strategy that was used to counter Hannibal are some of the earliest examples of logistical-level warfare in western history and changed how Rome, and therefore everyone else west of Mesopotamia, fought. Meanwhile Juniper's idea of 'strategy' is to antagonise anyone and everyone and then somehow magically defeat them. She's honestly not fit to be a general since those are also in charge of devising strategic-level attack plans. Put her in charge of armies, and attach someone else to take care of everything that isn't facebashing /rant >is Hakram Evil?

That's a good question. Hakram admits himself that he didn't feel like an 'orc', ever – because he didn't have the urge that other orcs do. Arguably Hakram is not Evil insofar as he's somewhere between depressed and psychopathic as far as orcs are concerned. He doesn't seem to relish fighting or killing, just is perfectly fine with doing it and not bothered in the slightest. Depending how you read the definition that's either Evil or Neutral. I'd lean Neutral, but some would go for Evil.

Liliet

>I can totally reason Practical Guide orcs are Evil, in the sense of the D&D alignment (not the Practical Guide sense), because an urge to kill sentient things solely to kill them is Evil literally by definition. It's one of the few things explicitly mentioned as Evil alongside such things as torture, slavery, and creation of the undead.

Urge != following the urge. If the DnD alignment system as defined somewhere doesn't recognize that, then it's worthless. Intrusive thoughts and instincts don't make people Evil.

>Unless they were being poetic – and I don't think they were – they're born Evil. Not necessarily evil, if you don't think of it that way, but definitely Evil.

Bard would say that all people are born Evil, and then rise from that :3

I do not believe in inherent goodness/badness. Nature contributes to the end result alongside nurture, not determines it.

>Yes, a hundred percent. The woman is a blood knight who likes going to war for the sake of going to war. It's not even the case that she thinks it's simpler to beat the shit out of someone who disagrees with you, but simply that she enjoys killing hordes of people by commanding other hordes of people to do it efficiently. She doesn't like it when reality gets in the way of this either, so it's not like the commandant who takes a shine to war when it's needed but isn't actively looking for it, Juniper gets mad when someone points out she's a goddamn idiot when it comes to anything above the tactical level because her precious war is being ruined by political reality. If you gave her the chance to lead 100k troops wherever she wanted she'd just plow through as much of the world as possible with those troops because she likes being at war. That's Evil, capital-E.

I'd say you're exaggerating this somewhat. Juniper is following the values of her culture, and she's at the limit of her incompetence being a Marshal of a country with a swath of authority over how the country itself is run.

I'll agree with you that she's a fantastic tactician and pretty great at logistics but below zero in strategy. Good thing she's got Catherine at her side!

>Juniper gets mad when someone points out she's a goddamn idiot when it comes to anything above the tactical level because her precious war is being ruined by political reality

?

When did anyone ever say that to her and have her get mad though.

Like... I'm not saying that's not true. But I only recall Juniper disliking Vivienne as far as anything along these lines goes, and that was actually out of moral considerations – those of her culture.

Like... you have a point somewhere in there, but it feels to me like you have to stretch a bit to really fit it. Juniper's in no way Good, but I wouldn't put her outside the bounds of Lawful Neutral.

>Hakram admits himself that he didn't feel like an 'orc', ever – because he didn't have the urge that other orcs do.

Liliet

aaaugh that was an accidental unfinished posting

>Hakram admits himself that he didn't feel like an 'orc', ever – because he didn't have the urge that other orcs do.

It's his narration that had vivid description of mouth watering at the sight of a small child, and meditation on how Carrion Lord gave orcs rules and they were good rules.

He did not have a drive to victory, no. The cannibalistic instincts were still there.

Abao

Reading the comments section had me trying to picture Cat standing atop the bridge, as the day slowly ebbs and night took over.

For some reason, what came to mind was this

Chapter 15: Bereavement

"To two deaths we are born: the first in the flesh, the second in the memories of those left behind."
– Sherehazad the Seer, Taghreb poet

The Lanterlia quarter would burn twice, that'd been my decree.

It was a good thing Sarcella was mostly abandoned by now, or it might have been necessary to expel people from their homes to get our hands on enough lumber for the pyres. As it was, the Third Army's sappers only had to tear down empty homes to raise the night's work: heaps of wood large and tall enough for near six thousand corpses to be consigned to burning on them. Not all the dead bodies would be legionaries – not even most, as the addition of the priests from the House Insurgent had done much to improve the survivability of our wounded – but the soldiers of Levant would share in the farewell. I wasn't leaving a few thousand corpses lying around when the Dead King was on the loose, no matter how far from the battlefield he was supposed to be. I watched in silence, pipe in my mouth, as companies of goblins methodically cleared out a space in the burn-out quarter and filled it with long rectangular piles of wood. They looked almost like giants' graves, I thought, though the bodies would be laid to rest over and not under. There'd been talk of requisitioning oil and charcoal from the locals to help the blaze burn hot enough, but I'd put a stop to that.

There was no need for it, when I had Mighty under my command.

It was already night out when the strange procession began. Carts and stretchers bearing the dead, some covered with the thin bashfulness of a sheet. Some, but not all: there were too many dead, too few sheets of cloth. I'd heard a story once, back in Laure, about the elaborate funeral processions of the Fairfaxes. How the dead kings and queens were taken through the streets of the capital on a bier of bronze and iron as the bells rang in unison, until all the people of Laure had seen the remains with their own eyes. It'd take hours, the heads of the knightly orders and every other Fairfax walking along the cadaver as the people threw red carnations before them. The same flowers that grew in long swaths by the shores of the Silver Lake, though some said it was tradition as a nod to Selwin Fairfax's death in the Red Flower Vales. The procession would end where it had begun, at the palace, and the ruler would be buried in the crypts below. A Fairfax is dead, a Fairfax reigns, the people would say, and the world would go on. No one threw flowers for my dead soldiers in the distance below, nor the Levantines so far away from home. Instead they had ash and embers, and the blackened husk of a district that might have been beautiful before we came to it.

The burial of kings and queens took the coin of a thousand soldiers', and so a thousand soldiers were buried without a sound. That'd always been the way of the world, hadn't it? The small died quiet, the great with theatre and oration – as unequal a bargain in death as it had been in life. It was a morose line of thought, but it paired well with my mood. The drow that had become my second shadows when shadow claimed the sky stood half-hidden and still as statues, not even stirring when the ashen path was stirred by careful footsteps. I'd not summoned General Abigail, though neither was I surprised she'd come to me. The latest arrangements I had made would cause most to cock an eyebrow. I didn't turn to look at her, and repressed my amusement when I heard the Summerholm girl curse under her breath before climbing up. The two story house I'd claimed as my perch was now little more than a twisted up stone floor held up by load-bearing walls that let the wind through, but there was a path to take if you looked properly. I wouldn't have made it up without a smudge of Night to chase away the pain in my leg, but with the coming of darkness miracles had come back to me through the turn of that astral tide.

There was a dull thump and louder cursing as the general of my army slipped halfway up and fell down on her ass, so I took pity on her and called out in Crepuscular. Mighty Miklaya leapt down and picked up the loudly protesting Callowan by the back of her neck before leaping up to my side and dropping her like a sack of cabbage. I nodded my thanks to it, and after a bow it vanished into the dark without a trace.

"They weren't anywhere near that sprightly earlier, the pricks," General Abigail muttered.

I turned to look at her and picked up on exactly when she remembered who she was on her belly in front of, complaining about allies. Abigail blanched and skittered up with the horrified haste of a cat near a goblin cookpot, saluting promptly. I wondered if she was aware that her armour now had tracks of soot all over it.

"General," I said. "Sit."

My pipe had long run out, though I was now officially out of herbs to stuff it with anyway. Robber had more important duties than to find me wakeleaf at the moment, though I'd send him out on the prowl before we left Sarcella. It was either that or actually trying the dried underground lake algae that Ivah had suggested, and I wasn't nearly desperate enough to go for that. I suspected that drow tasted, well, tastes very differently than humans. It was the only reasonable explanation for some of the things they subjected themselves to eating and drinking.

"Your Majesty," General Abigail said. "I'm not sure that's, uh, entirely appropriate."

I glanced at her amusedly. Court etiquette while on campaign? Besides, field promotion or not holding the title of general put her among the ten highest military officers in the kingdom. Technically she even outranked Grandmaster Brandon Talbot, though she wouldn't have the authority to give him orders in most situations.

"I could make it a royal decree, if you'd prefer," I said.

"Please don't," she said, then a heartbeat passed. "... Your Majesty."

Very warily she sat at the edge of the floor as I had, legs dangling. My eyes returned to the procession of corpses, noting it had turned from a flood to a trickle. The preparations would be finished soon enough. I felt her hesitating at my side, but didn't come to the rescue. If she was to continue working closely with me she'd have to find it in her to actually ask me questions without prompting.

"Ma'am, I meant to ask," General Abigail said. "About the redeployments you ordered..."

It was enough of a step forward to deserve reward, I decided.

"You think they leave us vulnerable, now that the prisoners are being returned," I completed.

She cleared her throat.

"I don't mean to impugn the abilities of our allies," she said. "But there's a lot of Dominion grunts out there, and our captures marched back with their weapons. If they hit us by surprise when almost the entire army's at the funeral, three thousand drow won't cut it. They'll catch us with our trousers down."

Not an unwarranted assumption, for someone who didn't know the Firstborn like I did.

"I did extract oaths from both Captain Elvera and the highborn boy that commands the vanguard," I said.

General Abigail began to spit over the edge, before remembering once more that I was there and hastily stopping. I politely pretended not to notice the choke and coughing fit that ensued.

"My Da always said anyone that makes more than you do is probably out to get you," Abigail solemnly said. "Double so for anyone not from Summerholm, triple if they're Wasteland get."

There was another pause, followed by an almost physical spike of fear.

"That wouldn't mean you, Your Majesty," she hurriedly said. "You're a – I mean, everyone knows – he's just an old drunk, didn't mean nothing."

I pondered that. I didn't get a salary from the Tower anymore – Malicia was such a cheapskate, I'd only rebelled and tried to kill her the once – so in a sense I didn't make more than my general. Unless you counted taxes and tariffs, or the kingdom's treasury. I doubted telling her as much would actually help any, though, so I discarded the diversion.

"Razin Tanja might go back on his oath, even after what he swore it on," I agreed. "He could be desperate enough he'd roll the dice on a victory washing his slate clean. Captain Elvera, I'm not so sure. Honour matters a lot more when it's your own on the line instead of someone else's."

"Honour didn't stop them from sneaking in at night and offing our general staff," General Abigail bluntly said. "Beg your pardon, ma'am, but what do some Levant muckabouts know about anything like honour? They were quick enough to roll over for Procer and join up, after all that hard talk about them being deathly foes."

"Akua's Folly scared a lot of people," I mildly said. "And honour doesn't mean abandoning solid tactics."

And they had been that, regardless of the personal cost to me. The other Callowan shuffled uncomfortably.

"Aren't they your enemy, Your Majesty?" she asked.

Your, I thought. Interesting choice of words, and more telling than she probably realized. More so than the unspoken assumption: if they're your enemy, why are you defending them?

"They won't always be our enemy," I said. "And even if they were sworn to stay one, it serves us nothing to lower them in our eyes. The moment you dismiss an opponent outright you stop understanding them. That's dangerous thing, in our position."

I threw her a bone after the lecture, wondering if Black had once done the same for me. If so he'd done it skillfully enough I hadn't noticed.

"Most the three thousand drow are decoration," I told her. "Defending bridges, like they are? I could have sent only two to stand guard with much the same effect. I just decided to temper the temptation for our friend Razin."

General Abigail went still. I was pleased she picked up on the implications of that so quickly.

"Named?" she said. "Or just warlocks?"

"Priests, in a way," I mused. "Though the kind even Lanterns wouldn't want to meet in a dark alley."

The other woman breathed out sharply. I doubted she would be the last, when the scope of what the Might could do became clearer.

"How many of those are there, ma'am?" she croaked out.

"An empire's worth," I said.

And sometimes I fear even that might not be enough, for what's to come, I thought.

"You and I – Callowans – we were taught to fear the monsters on the other side of the river," I mused. "The hordes and the sorceries and the things that go out after dark."

I clapped her shoulder, ignoring the flinch.

"But not this time, Abigail," I said. "Tonight, you see, we're looking at the river from the other side."

I felt my honour guard of drow stir through the Night. People were approaching us, and not a moment too soon. I dragged myself up after reaching for my staff, turning to my shivering general.

"Time to go," I said. "The dead have waited long enough."

—

Once lit, the torches turned the darkened wreckage of Lanteria into a sea of fireflies.

It'd been some time since I last stood for a vigil. There'd been others after the one that followed Three Hills, grim heaps of ash made across Callow wherever my armies fought and died. Marchford, where the grim necessity of killing everyone touched by Corruption had made it even uglier business than usual. Liesse and Arcadia, Dormer and the blood-soaked fields of the Folly. Far north, after the Battle of the Camps. Had there even been a year, since I first gained command, without some of mine being given to the flame? Sometimes it felt like I'd been at war from the moment I had taken up Black's knife, without ever a moment to catch my breath. But this wasn't about me, not really. I owned a part of it, but so did every single of the almost eight thousand legionaries and officers standing in Lanteria. So did the Levantines across the river, though they might not see it that way. We'd bared our blades and wrecked all around us, each convinced that we were right, necessary, that the other side was damned and blind. I almost smiled at the thought. Had anyone ever gone to war believing they were in the wrong? I could not help but wonder at the people who'd once lived in this city, and watched it torn apart by foreign armies engaged in a war first started by a woman far away in Salia. They should not be forgot, even if they were my enemy's people and not mine.

They too tread the same grounds that had my leg throbbing, whispering with every limping step: do not forget, that this was never a game. Do not forget, that you make mistakes. Do not forget, that there must be more than ruin. Do not forget.

These weren't drow, so the crowd below spoke in murmurs that lapped at the platform the sappers had raised. I did not stand alone on it, did not have that gall when I'd come so late to the battle for Sarcella. General Abigail stood at my right side, cheeks reddened by the old Callowan remedy for chilly nights. She cut a good figure, in her polished armour freshly marked with the wings of a general glimmering in the glow of the magelights surrounding us. Bareheaded, her black locks brought out the sharp blue of her eyes. Spreading out from her right, the surviving general staff stood with us as well: the last remaining legate, a heavyset man by the name of Oakes, her Senior Mage and Staff Tribune. At my left I kept Robber and Mighty Jindrich, the latter of which was looking at the proceedings with strangely innocent fascination. Never before, I thought, must it have seen so many torches. The purpose of this had been as strange to it as its fascination was to me: drow did not have funerals the way the people of the surface did, not since the coming of Sve Noc. Corpses were just rotting meat that could not be eaten, nothing to be given any particular attention beyond disposal to avoid diseases. I'd waited long enough, I eventually decided. All the torches that would be lit already were.

I raised my staff, and a single horn was sounded by an officer below. The sound echoed across the district, and left silence in its wake. I'd been offered sorcerous help by the Third Army's mages, but I had no need of it: the Night coiled in my veins, and when I spoke it was in a voice that resounded across all of Lanteria quarter.

"The first time I met Nauk of the Waxing Moons clan," I said, "he called me dead weight and I nearly slugged him in the face."

The officers standing next to me looked appalled, save for Robber who was grinning like a gleeful imp, but a ripple went through the crowd. There were greenskins who'd laughed outright, and many more soldiers who looked like they were feeling guilty about smiling at a funeral.

"It wasn't even half a year after that the Fifteenth Legion was raised," I continued. "And by then it didn't even occur to me he wouldn't be part of it. That was the kind of man he was, long before he put an arrow in a prince and got another name out of it."

Grief and guilt, hand in hand. For the friend I was burying, in a way, for the second time. For what had remained of that friend in my general and I'd cravenly looked away from. Another regret for the list that would never, could never, be expiated. It always seemed like there were more pressing things to see to, didn't it? Until the bells rang and you realized it'd become too late.

"He was brave," I thoughtfully said. "We always say that, about those we bury, but he truly was. Kind, to those he owed kindness to, and always cannier than he let on. But most of all, when I remember him, I remember that the same night we met he marched most of a mile on a broken leg without a word of complaint. It's a small thing, but it stands for more. There was not an ounce of give in him."

My voice turned rueful.

"But then I speak to nothing you don't already know, do I? Everything Nauk Princekiller had to give, you have made a part of you."

My lips quirked, because this was a fool's war but how could I not be proud of how they had fought it?

"The Third Army marched across the span of Iserre, pursued by fourfold its number and ambushed by Helike's finest," I said. "Yet when I found Sarcella, your banner flew. They rode you down, they burned you out, they stormed every single wall you raised – and the Third Army did not break."

The last part rung louder like a rest, almost deserving of echo. There was a sea of faces splayed out below me: old and young, Praesi and Callowans and greenskins. Old Legion veterans come under fresh banner to ply the same harsh trade, youths who'd put on the armour with that burning need to do something that would matter. Some had joined for coin, some for purpose, some for having nowhere else to go. Some had put on the mail for their country, and among those there were hard-eyed Soninke and Taghreb who I thought might yet make that country after they went home with a blade in hand. Once you'd drunk from the cup of defiance the taste was not easily forgot, and they had all drunk deep. How many of them had sung on the march to Dormer, I wondered, joined their voices to that chilling song Nauk had penned? I had taken the armies of the east and told them they were owed better, that they could do better, and they had believed me.

Since that day they had been sharpened on bloody fields every bit the match of the Conquest's, marched victorious through a gauntlet of horrors. And they'd done it without High Lords, without Dukes and Baronesses, without any of the old banners above their heads. One day those soldiers would go home, and those who would be their masters would not find them so easily bent to the old order. I've borrowed the strength of an empire and the godhead behind it, bared it at my foes like a blade, I thought, and some fools will tremble at that alone. But you, all of you. Oh, how they would tremble if they could look at you now. What you are and might yet do. In the golden glow of the torches they all seemed tinted by the same dye, as if they had shared some strange rite that left the same mark on all of them. Maybe they had, this lone column in the snow surrounded by foes. I saw all that and one thing more, a reflection of what I felt in my bones when looking at them: pride.

"I could praise you," I said. "But what could I possibly speak that would ring louder than your record? Instead, I will say there are faces here that I recognize."

It was true. More greenskins and Praesi than Callowans, who had come later to my campaigns, but more than a few of those as well. Legionaries and officers both, some who'd been under Nauk as far back as Three Hills.

"From the two thousand that charged Summer, at Five Armies and One," I said. "From the first into the breach, at Dormer. From those who took the hellgate at the Doom of Liesse. From the Battle of the Camps, holding against three to one and hero's wrath."

I laughed.

"Have you ever fought a battle where you were not meant to lose?"

Laughter answered, harsh and grim and heartbreakingly proud.

"In the crucible of the Conquest," I said, "names were granted to honour the greatest deeds of Legions. Cognomen, they are called. You have gone through crucible harsher still, and so this honour is long overdue."

My voice rose.

"You are the Third Army of the Kingdom of Callow," I proclaimed. "You have been the vanguard of our every victory, never once flinching nor breaking – and for that I name you dauntless."

For a moment there was only silence, and my stomach dropped, but then roar drowned out everything. Thousands of throats screaming out into the night, a chorus of stomping feet and blades striking shields. Dauntless, I thought, letting the sea of noise wash over me. That had been impulse, but I did not regret it. I would see it put to the rolls, and I would see Nauk's name written as the first general to command it. It was the only kind of grave marker he would have cared for, I suspected. The Third Army howled its approval, long and loud, and when the sound thinned General Abigail's own tribune approached me with a torch, passing it to my hand. For the pyre, I knew. It was my right, as Queen of Callow, to throw the first one.

"We'll all put friends to the flame tonight," I said. "And there will be others, on other fields. So weep for the lost, but know that I can promise you this: in the end, they will remember us."

I wanted to throw the torch. For the friend I'd loved, the memories I would still clutch now that he was gone. But this wasn't about me, not really. I owned a part of it, but so did every single one of them. So instead I limped to Abigail and passed her the torch.

"Send them home, General," I said.

Blue eyes met mine, unreadable, and slowly she nodded.

The torch flew, and the sea of fireflies followed.

luminiousblu

"Were are born"?

stevenneiman

From the moment we are born, we are doomed to the twin deaths of life and memory. At least, that's how I interpreted it. It could just as easily have been a mistake, meant to say "borne".

caoimhinh

It's nice to see EE finally fixing the typos we point out, every once in a while XD

NerfContessa

Am I the only one who kind of expected nauk to somehow come back to unlife in a fiery and night driven ritual? :p

therealgridlock

I mean, he should have. This was the exact beat of his story, and as far as ritual goes, the death of his friends and enemies, his burning in two battles, fusion with his own armor, he should have risen from that pyre not immortal, but at least named.

Nauk, flameridden, twice dead, thrice living, princekiller, bone breaker, and terror to those who oppose the black queen.

Touched by summer, winter, sorcery, night, light, heaven, hell, he could and should have been an unholy construct unstoppable by man nor beast, if nothing else.

Abaddon

Waaaaaaaaay too long for a Name

Javvies

A moving moment.
Nicely done, Cat.

Is it bad that I kind of want Razin to succumb to temptation and get turned into even more of an example of what not to do?

Liliet

Well, you're certainly not alone in it.

And it would be tactically and possibly strategically advantageous to Cat.

Still I hope he'll be okay :3

IDKWhoitis

He's totally going to fall for it. But probably at the end of the 3 days. Trying to chase them early is my guess.

Javvies

Eh, starting pursuit earlier really only hurts his standing with those aware of the oaths he took, which might be enough to get him disowned, due to the nature of the oaths/what he swore by. It doesn't really do anything to turn him into an example.

After all – even if he only holds off pursuit by a day or so, contact will be sufficiently broken that he can't really catch up to Third Army.

The only way he really gets turned into an example is if he attacks either tonight or tomorrow, when Third Army is pulling back.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh that's so much worse though. I'd have said even he'd recognize that effectively saying only his honor mattered would go bad, but it now occurs to me he might be so arrogant as to not have asked his captains in the first place.

Big Brother

Finally, the first Callowen Cognomen. DAUNTLESS. Such a wonderful word for one of the toughest and scariest armies I've ever seen in fantasy.

danh3107

These last chapters have been described with the best you can give Erratic. When you can not only see, but feel the world around you as you read, you know you're reading a great story.

Thanks erratic, thanks a lot.

Javvies

Eh, starting pursuit earlier really only hurts his standing with those aware of the oaths he took, which might be enough to get him disowned, due to the nature of the oaths/what he swore by. It doesn't really do anything to turn him into an example. After all – even if he only holds off pursuit by a day or so, contact will be sufficiently broken that he can't really catch up to Third Army.

The only way he really gets turned into an example is if he attacks either tonight or tomorrow, when Third Army is pulling back.

Javvies

Whoops, replied to wrong post.

Adurna

That was powerfull. And cleansing. Thank you.

Skaddx

Nice speech.

Andrew Mitchell

Wow, what a great chapter. It literally brought tears to my eyes. I was not expecting to be moved by a speech about Nauk, but EE made it so much more meaningful than that. Dauntless, indeed.

I wonder what the other Callownian armies will be called once they've earned their names?

And how much MORE are they going to be motivated to earn them now?

Fan

I cried. Lol just felt like sharing.

Mike E.

Yeah, really glad my office mate doesn't come in this early, would have been a bit embarrassing.

plantsbeans

I was tearing up too.

imagesbe

This was quite possibly one of the best speeches in the entire story. It ranks higher than the speeches Black and Akua gave at the "Doom of Liesse," higher than anything I can think of at the top of my head. It has a kind of emotional weight to it. It's not just a grand speech, but a meaningful one.

Liliet

Vote for Guide!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

God this was beautiful.

And... passing the torch, huh.

Euodiachloris

Huh, indeed.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder what names the other armies will get by the end of this.

Decius

"Deadkillers"?

konstantinvoncarstein

Nope, it is always in Lower Miezian/Latin 😊 I think it would be "morticide"

RanVor

Since when Dauntless is in Latin?

konstantinvoncarstein

Ah yes, sorry, I confuse it with the "cognomen" or the Legions of Terror

Rook

Whelp, looks like Abigail is going to end up as, at a minimum, one of Catherine's successors. Foreshadowing doesn't get much more straightforward than a literal passing of the torch.

anon

lol now, I want to see what Mighty Jindrich and the rest of the drow think of about all the precious wood that's being burnt for this funeral.

caoimhinh

I think it'd be something along the lines of:
"They were so respected that the First Under the Night used something so valuable as wood to bid them goodbye. Cattle as they were, they had died for the victory of Losara Queen. So honour has been given by it, and wisdom has been shared."

Liliet

Hopefully at least some of them lmao

Death Knight

Heh, wonder what they'll think once they see the Brocellian and Waning Woods...

Liliet

"NEVER MIND WE CAN GO BACK TO NOT HAVING WOOD PLEASE"

konstantinvoncarstein

It would rather be like this: "Cool, free breakfast after the wood-cutting" 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Or at least "So apparently this isn't what passes for a rich city up here. There's even more wood in some of the other places we are going to conquer! Fancier wood even! It's fine, we aren't lugging this around cause we are gonna get the good stuff later."

and later

"So apparently all these pillar plants have guts made of wood. We just have to kill a few of them and mutilate their corpses to get wood in whatever shape we want Some of these cattle fighters totally know how to cut up the bodies. Seems those short sword blades with teeth we thought were horrible weapons are actually really good for that.

luminiousblu

Find it funny – not sure if Cat herself realises – that even while she's talking about the eight thousand legionaries and dead Levants, she starts her speech by talking about Nauk. It is clearly not about the eight thousand for her.

Jordan Leighton

That's one way of looking at it.

You could also point out that he's the only person they all respected(including her), and that generally armies take great pride in their generals so talking about them is a good way to connect.

And just because she started with Nauk doesn't mean that's all she talked about.

People have to start somewhere, Cat started with the familiar to all of them and then moved it to them which as I understand it is a common speech tactic.

luminiousblu

It's just strange when she spends half the chapter ranting about essentially the nameless soldier and the common man who dies in an unmarked grave, then starts by talking about someone with a name (if not a literal Name).

Decius

Eight thousand of the people who burned had a name. She talked about the one she knew the best.

Liliet

They all actually did have names.

Talking about no-one in particular is talking about no-one.
Talking about them in abstract is talking about no-one.
Talking about a nameless soldier is not talking about a single actual person who really existed.

Liliet

I mean... he's part of those eight thousand. It couldn't be about them and not about him, somehow.

luminiousblu

Debateable. A wheel is round but a car isn't, despite the fact that a car includes wheels.

Liliet

Yet if a car had a tire popped, you can't talk about it without acknowledging the fact that it has wheels. Even if it's not round.

What are we talking about again?

luminiousblu

If the car was totalled you generally don't start by saying the tires are popped. You say the car's been totalled.

"What are we talking about again?"

Just how interesting it is that Catherine spends the better half of a chapter talking about how some lives are presented as more important than others with a mildly disapproving tone, and then proceeds to possibly unwittingly do the same thing. There's a reason that the king gets a huge funeral while normal people don't, and it's not only because he can afford it.

Liliet

Yes, life sure is like that.

I'm not sure what you think this implies about Catherine, though. What do you think she should have said? Do you think it would have been better?

Tohron

The focus of the speech was about how the legionaries – dead and alive – had been shaped by Nauk and by the challenges they faces. You can't give that speech without talking about Nauk.

Jordan Leighton

Beautiful chapter.

Is there a PGTE discord?

Liliet

Yes!

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Dainpdf

Pretty. Impacting. Powerful.

Cayle

Really bothered Catherine isn't using their night. Easy way to teach the drow the soldiers craft and a general power boost.

Seems wasteful, could have just used the enemy soldiers even

Gareth Hughes

Im confused, your comment suggests cattle have access to night. This is untrue, only the firstborn have nught to harvest.

Cayle

Catherine met Ivah when he was raiding the surface to become drow again, they absolutely can harvest night from humans. It was stated outright multiple times.

Liliet

Not only is that not how Night works, even if it could, it would probably be extremely disrespectful to the dead. It's like the cannibalism thing with orcs: they're going to eat the dead they killed on the battlefield, fair enough, but that doesn't mean making the funeral into a feast. Cultural dissonance – you gotta respect it.

Cayle

It is exactly how night works

superkeaton

She's no Bard, but she certainly has a way of making you want to die for her.

Letouriste

I think she had a talk with the wandering bard at some where we mention she wanted to be bard but didn't have the talent. Maybe I mixed up stories tho

Daniel E

Can someone please direct me to the chapter where Nauk earns his title?

C_B

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/03/23/chapter-17-aplomb/>

Daniel E

Much obliged. I love stuff like that, the 'what if Evil was non-crazy and practical' scenes.

Steve

Wow... so... I have to ask...

... how do you pronounce Praes anyway?

I'm writing a truly awful tavern style song and I need to know what to rhyme it with.

Daniel E

I've been saying it with a hard 'a' (la, ta) and a long 's' (ss).

Andrew Mitchell

Me too.

Adurna

Oh good question. I have been thinking "praise" the whole time but there are definitely other options.

Miles

Pr-ay- sc

Sort of like prays but less emphasis on the y

Liliet

I'm mostly pronouncing it like 'press' only with a longer 'eh'.
Mess, bless, sass, dumbass, etc.

RanVor

Same. Must be something with slavic languages.

Liliet

Slavic languages? Why? /suddenly curious

RanVor

I mean, we both speak slavic languages (Polish and Ukrainian) and we both pronounce Praes the same...
Coincidence? Probably, but whatever.

Liliet

Nice.

I wouldn't say two datapoints form a line here necessarily, considering my first instinct is PrUH-ess (Праєс), and I correct it to press as a matter of my Formal Knowledge Of English Spelling ;u;

but it Might Be A Thing :3

RanVor

Guess what, it's the same for me. 😊

Liliet

lmao

so the connection is in the school program XD

Miles

The drow are going to rebell over all this burned wood aren't they?

Sanctus Obscurum

On goblin-built rise stood she,
Black Queen from whose shoulders hang
Her fallen foes colours,
As she gazed over the Third
The living and the dead,
Those upon their pyre
And they who mourned
With torches in hand.
There she stood
And named them Dauntless,
For undaunted by foreign foe
On foreign land fought they.
And undaunted they remained
After loss of their fellows,
Loss of their general,
Loss of their mobility.
Undaunted before Helikean horse
And Levantine Lantern Light,
They stood their ground.

aran

Damn it, stop making Abigail this adorable...

aran

I like how it only took a minute to loosen up from a blanching
"Your Majesty" to "Beg your pardon ma'am". She'll go places. 😊

green

oh wow, this... I am seriously choked up. so, so good.

Letouriste

Beautiful speech, you really thought it threw. Nauk being the first general of such a list would definitely please him a lot. It also fit well abigail given the rumors around her

Chapter 16: Adverse

"Let neither queen nor prince rule over our dominion: for while crowns may devour honour, one's blood is not so easily gainsaid."

-Farah Isbili of the Pilgrim's Blood, second Holy Seljun of Levant

Midnight Bell came and went.

Part of me itched to leave this place, to watch Sarcella disappear in the distance and let Nauk sleep in his tomb of ash. The rest knew that it would be absurd to ask that my beleaguered Third Army begin a night march after a hard day's fighting. Even if I'd been willing to push them that far, logistics would have forbidden it. We had wounded still hovering between life and death, equipment to mend or replace. At least another dozen crucial preparations that must be undertaken before we left, if the advance was to be organized in the slightest instead of a rout in a vaguely appropriate direction. Truth be told I should be sleeping myself, but with the night a second wind had come to me that made it unlikely I'd be able to slumber even if I tried. The drow were the same, nocturnal in a way they would never have truly understood in that sunless ruined empire of theirs. It wasn't anymore, of course. Theirs. My bargain with the Herald of the Deeps had seen to that and more. The lowering of the Gloom and a fallen realm, in exchange for the chance at a fresh one. In practice, supplies for the massive exodus marching on the Dead King's northern borders along with departure unmolested from the old Empire Ever Dark. Unmolested if on reasonable schedule, anyway. The dwarves had made it clear that lingering would be taken as a breach of the terms.

There was slightly more to it, another bargain made with a dying foe to strike together against one at the peak of its unlife, but that would have to wait. The Kingdom Under would not lift a finger until the rest of us had died in drove for its advantage, and not send a single soldier past the line of its interests. It didn't matter, though. If well-timed, our last arrangement could be made into a very effective blow. And be used as highly useful; diplomatic leverage with the First Prince, I admitted to myself. This couldn't be won by slapping everyone in the face until they agreed to my terms, that'd make the Liesse Accords barely worth the parchment they were written on. I had to make it in everyone's interests to sign. There would be nations that'd never even consider it – the Dread Empire, the Kingdom of the Dead – but the one I worried most about was the Dominion of Levant. I was beginning to understand, slowly, exactly how much Names meant to their people. How essential they'd been made to the fabric of their ruling class because of the way they lent legitimacy. I didn't and wouldn't have the kind of clout or justification to uproot that entirely, which would force me to rely on someone I really rather wouldn't: the Grey Pilgrim. Not only could I not kill the old hero, as the consequence of that would be a nearly Callowan degree of spite, I had to get him to back the Accords.

It wasn't impossible. But in all likelihood it was going to come at an unpleasant price.

My legionaries were long gone by now, save for a handful of weary sappers keeping an eye on the pyres to make sure nothing got out of hand. It was no longer mortal flame burning the wood and bodies, which at least allowed them to see something interesting for their trouble. A funeral pyre, after all, wasn't just about burning wood and flesh: it had to see to the bones as well. Save for some specific kinds of sorcerous flame and the much riskier goblinfire, there wasn't much that could do that for human and greenskin ossature. Legion custom was to grind the bones after the rest was ash and spread them on the battlefield, should time allow. It was one of those grim duties that soldiers didn't like to talk about, and usually ended up passed on to sappers or whatever company had last irked the commanding officer. There wouldn't be any need for that tonight, though. From the beginning it'd been clear that we might not even have enough wood to burn all the flesh, not without hacking apart another section of the city entirely, but mundane flame was not my full arsenal. I'd put my restless Mighty to work. Flames icy-blue and pitch-black had lit up the night, spreading through the pyres, and behind those I'd ordered something more discreet. Uses of Night, acidic and corrosive, that would see to it no bones were left come dawn. It would have been horrifying for soldiers, I knew, to wake in daylight and see the gnarled and darkened bones of those they'd fought to the side of strewn across the remains of the pyres. So instead the dead burned black and blue, and a little else too.

It was still watching that eerie spectacle that General Rumena found me. Not that the old drow would have encountered great difficulty in that: I was surrounded by an honour guard of Firstborn that might have been good as invisible to humans but was a glaring sign for those of their kind. Resting on a half-broken bench of stone, back against a soot-slashed oaken door delivered there by my drow, I kept my gaze on the flames even as it came to stand by my side. The ancient creature tread light as a feather, and I could feel a flicker of Night under its skin that would make it nothing but a shadow among shadows to the naked eye.

"They did not attack," General Rumena said.

On my lap a sword of obsidian sat sheathed, and my hand had been tight around it— filling the artefact, slowly, with the purposeful Night I would unleash when the time came — but at that obvious announcement my fingers began drumming against the sheath. It did not reply, tacitly inviting it to elaborate.

"The Dominion leader called for assembly of its captains when those captured were returned," the old drow continued. "They have been at this ever since. Debate is loud and bitter. Blades were drawn at least once, and not sheathed before reddened."

I knew better than to ask how it knew that. After nightfall, with the Sisters flying somewhere above? I was almost surprised I wasn't getting a full transcript of the conversations.

"Not unexpected," I said.

The general said nothing, though I felt its presence pulse in the Night. Surprise, maybe? Hard to tell, drow felt emotions so differently than humans and this strange... sense of mine was highly imprecise anyway. I could measure impact but not grasp its nature, and guessing at the thoughts of the Firstborn was always chancy business.

"You've never been shy before, Tomb-Maker," I said. "Out with it."

"It was my understanding that you meant for the Dominion cattle to try the city," Rumena replied. "So as to slaughter them with pretence of mercy. Is this not a disappointment?"

I leaned against the door that had been made into the back of this makeshift throne of mine, cloak held tight against my frame to ward off the creeping cold. The blue and black flames still danced in the distance, the silhouettes of the few goblins out there lending the sight the appearance of some strange tribal ritual.

"I have a friend who's no stranger to thievery," I said. "She did a lot of learning with unsavoury crowds, in all manners of theft. One of them is called confidence tricks."

"Humans have exceedingly little to be confident about," the Tomb-Maker noted. "What manner of trickery is it?"

"Usually, it's a lie that preys on the greed or credulity of someone to get coin from them," I said. "But Vivienne, she once told me that in her home those tricks were split in two kinds: dapple and pearl. After horse coats, she said."

Rumena's silver-blue stare stayed on me, and it did not speak.

"A dappled horse," I said, "is one that's flecked pale and grey. Those are the tricks that prey on the naïve, Rumena, and her guild frowned if those were used on anyone save nobles and foreigners."

Neither of which, I thought, most Callowans had been inclined to weep over during the decades of Praesi rule.

"The other kind, though, the pearls?" I said. "It's a kind of horse that's pale all over. Those tricks prey on greed, and they were fair game on anyone. The unspoken part of that, Rumena, is that if someone acts wickedly there's no shame in doing them the same turn. A pearl trick doesn't work at all, if the mark acts decent."

"A pearl trick," the old drow repeated. "As you played on the Dominion cattle."

I nodded slowly.

"They gave oaths," I said. "If they keep them, no one bleeds. And they've proved they can learn, that they can be trusted in the war up north. But if they break their oaths..."

"There is no shame," Rumena thoughtfully said, "in doing them a wicked turn."

A strange notion to it, no doubt. The drow did not think it shameful in the slightest to turn on each other over without a reason – or, rather, being stronger than the other was enough of a reason in and of itself. But it wasn't the way things worked, up here, and if they were going to stay among us they needed to learn. It mattered, how you went about things. I'd learned that much too late in my rise, believing what counted was that you got there at all. And the moment I'd begun extending a hand outside the borders of Callow I'd run into one closed door after another. Best they learn from my mistakes, as the Sisters meant them to.

"You are pleased, then," the general said. "That they are holding to their oaths."

Silence stretched. I looked at the flames, and thought of the orc burning among them who I had called my friend.

"Am I?" I murmured, wondering. "Ask me again come morning, Tomb-Maker."

I tightened the Mantle of Woe around me once more, and was still looking at the fire when Rumena left.

—

I slept fitfully, never leaving my seat, and it could not have been more than an hour or two when someone's approach had me immediately awake. A drow – it'd been the ripple in the Night that warned me – though not one of the sigil-holders. By the looks of the paint on its face it was of the Svatuk Sigil, higher than dzulu but low in the pecking order of the Mighty. A messenger, then. The thickly-muscled drow bowed, silver tresses sweeping down as it did, and only straightened when I flicked my wrist in permission. Exhaustion was lingering in my bones, but my mind was mostly awake and that was what mattered.

"Losara Queen," the drow said. "I bring word from the General Rumena."

"Then speak," I said.

"Our reinforcements have arrived, under the command of Lord Ivah," the Firstborn said. "Twelve thousand, now in sight of this cattle-city. A warband came ahead, led by the Mighty Archer."

Indrani had caught up as soon as she could, looked like. Must have tired herself out hurrying regardless of my request that she not – though I supposed my taking the drow vanguard ahead without a word had invalidated that in her eyes. My grip closed around the ebony staff propped up at my side and I dragged myself up, catching the sheathed sword on my lap before it could fall and fastening it on my belt with fingers made clumsy by the cold.

"Is that the whole of the words you carry?" I asked.

"The Tomb-Maker says that the pot of the Dominion no longer seems in risk of tipping," the drow said. "Both pillars still live."

The strife in the camp had come at an end, then. Hard to know whether the blades coming out earlier had been over Razin Tanja's ill-fated offensive and the ensuing losses, or an attempt at oath-breaking that was ended steel in hand. Both he and Captain Elvera were apparently still alive, regardless, so whatever the truth they'd come to a truce. I suspected that the moment the sharper would blow was when the rest of the forty-thousand strong army arrived, including Tanja's lordly father and the lady Captain Elvera answered to. Didn't intend to stick around to watch that from up close, though: I'd already sown the seeds of discord with the oaths, I'd let them either grow into something thornier or die out on their own. Having two of the four most powerful nobles in the Dominion at each other's throats instead of pursuing my armies would be damned useful, but pushing too hard risked them banding against me instead. We'd see if Akua's suspicions about the fragility of the Levantine command structure bore out.

"Good," I said. "Tell it to keep watching until the Third Army is rested enough to relieve the sigils."

"By your will, First Under the Night," the drow replied, bowing again.

I considered sending it after Archer to tell her to meet me, but ultimately discarded the notion and left it slink back to its duties. If Indrani was in Sarcella there was no need to look for her: she'd be finding me soon enough. I should probably be looking for somewhere comfortable to talk instead, since it had occurred to me we had a conversation long overdue. Two, I then thought, considering what Robber had told me about Masego. Claiming the mansion that'd been turned into the Third Army's headquarters for a chat with Indrani struck me as something of an abuse of my authority, when so much of this city was already empty, so instead I hobbled my way towards Beaumontant quarter. Much of the district had seen heavy fighting, but it was only around the edges that it'd gotten brutal enough houses and shops were brought down. Deeper in there was only mud and blood marring the snow, and the fresher tracks of legionaries on sentry duty. There wasn't a soul to be seen in here, not a Proceran one anyway. There were a few drow out there on the rooftops, and my own honour guard of Firstborn was dogging my shadow, but aside from that the streets were eerily empty.

The fighting had long driven out anyone who lived here, which considering the empty plains out there and the roving armies in Iserre likely meant hunger or cold would kill most of the civilians who'd fled and not made it to a city to take refuge in. I forcefully set the thought aside, as there was nothing I could do for them. Even if Black hadn't put the principality's granaries to the torch on his way south, the war would have made it a lean year – after he had, the death warrant of thousands had effectively been signed months before the first snow fell. Twice over, with their ruler being a prisoner in Callow. Winter and starvation would strike much harsher a blow to the heartlands than Legion blades could have, dealing out death in that atrociously efficient way my father had always preferred. I could almost imagine the cogs turning behind his eyes as he measured how best to cripple the Principate with the limited amount of resources at his disposal. The thought was not fond. There were some things that could not be admired, even if skillfully done.

I found a halfway decent tavern and decided to settle myself in there for Indrani to find me. I didn't bother glancing at the sign hung outside before touching the locked door and pressing Night into the lock. It clicked open, and a gesture had my guards staying outside as I entered the cold common room. Closing the door behind me, I set myself to making it somewhat inhabitable. A flicker of power had dark flames roaring in the fireplace, without lumber to feed them, though after digging around for some time I found a bundle of charcoal to toss in there and the flames turned mundane in nature. The place had been mostly stripped clean by the owners when they left, but from the back I rustled up a jug of wine bad enough it'd been used to prop up a shelf and a pair of torches already partially burnt. Those went up on the walls, and the room had warmed enough for me to take off my cloak and try my luck with the wine – no cups left, so straight from the jug – when Indrani arrived. Pulling down her hood and lowering her scarf, she hastily slammed the door shut and turned to me with a raised eyebrow.

"Well, this is oddly domestic," Archer mused.

"I even made your favourite," I drily replied, holding up the jug. "Wine."

"Ah, just like my mother used to make," she breathily said.

It didn't stop her from tossing her cloak at my head before worming into a seat, but by now that was only to be expected. I slapped it aside, then ducked under the gloves that followed with practiced ease. They fell close to me, so in theory I could have picked them up, but she was never going to learn to stop throwing things at me if I did that every time. She wasn't going to learn anyway, I grimly admitted to myself, but that wasn't any more of a reason to do it.

"So," Archer said, deftly stealing the jug from my hand. "I see part of this place burned down."

"It was already on fire when I arrived," I replied, a tad defensively.

She grinned over a mouthful of wine, then passed it back after swallowing.

"It figures that after holding it in so well at Rochelant you'd have to cut loose," she sagely said.

"It was Levantine priests that started it," I insisted.

"Priests that, in your heretical wickedness, you ensorcelled to start the fire on your behalf," Indrani said. "That's twice as bad, Catherine. Heresy and arson. Maybe even heretical arson, we'd have to ask someone about the theology of that."

"No one's going to buy that," I said, sounding a lot more confident than I felt.

"You're right," she conceded. "You'll just get blamed without any of the frills added on."

I drank from the jug and sighed. She might be yanking my chain, but that didn't necessarily mean she was wrong. Best to change the subject before I lost any more feathers.

"Ivah came with you?" I asked.

She smugly smiled at my pivot, the wretch.

"It's about an hour behind," Indrani said. "Sent a few Mighty with me to speak with either you or Rumena about where the sigils can set up to sleep."

Rumena could see to that, I thought. Later I'd need to speak with it and Abigail about lodgings and supplies but it could wait for a few hours still. Odds were the reinforcements would be put up in the northern quarters with the rest of my drow: it wasn't like we'd be running out of room anytime soon.

"Good," I said, handing back the wine.

No two ways about this, so I just went in sword bared.

"There's news about Masego," I said.

The jug stopped halfway to her lips. Something like fear passed through her hazelnut eyes, though it was mastered swiftly.

"You wouldn't be so calm if he was dead," Archer decided.

"Missing or hurt?"

Her voice was even, but the kind of even you could see the strain of maintaining.

"Missing," I said. "Maybe hurt as well. The battle at Thalassina went south, 'Drani. His father blew up most of the city and the aftermath was bad enough even those who fled died from the sorcery he called down. We know Masego survived and left, but not much more than that."

Her face tightened.

"The Empress is after him?" she asked.

"Was," I said. "He made it out of the Wasteland heading west. No one's been able to track him since. Nauk might have known more, apparently the army's high command had a closed council before leaving Callow, but he was dead when I arrived."

This time it was me who kept my voice steady. It came easier now that we'd had the Legion burial. The worst and rawest of the grief I had already voiced, and pangs that'd follow were not so consuming.

"Shit," Indrani softly said. "I hadn't heard, Cat. I'm sorry."

"It's done," I said. "Picking at his grave serves no purpose."

"Don't do that," she said, shaking her head. "I know you hoped that with the Night-"

My fingers clenched.

"It's done," I repeated, harshly.

She met my gaze, not cowed in the slightest.

"You can't lock grief in a trunk and open it back up when you've got the time, Catherine," she said. "That's not how people work."

It's how Black works, I thought. But then so was the way thousands would die starving across Iserre before winter ended, wasn't it? So I bit my tongue, and let a moment pass before replying.

"I just put his body to the flame, Indrani," I finally said, sounding as tired as I felt. "I don't want to talk about it."

To that she nodded, and did not pursue. I passed a hand through my hair watching her drink from the jug belatedly. At this rate we'd run out of wine before we ran out of words.

"There's another army under Hakram that shouldn't be too far," I said, returning to the thrust of the conversation. "Adjutant will know more."

"So we find Hakram first, then make our plans," Archer mused. "It's a start."

I inclined my head in agreement, taking back the jug when offered. She rose to her feet a heartbeat later and stretched out with a groan. Named or not, she'd been on the move for long enough it'd take a toll.

"Well, night's still young," she said. "I hear Robber's in town, and I'd say it's been too long since someone woke him up by throwing him off a roof. Let's see what can be done about that."

I set the jug on the table softly enough it barely made a sound.

"Indrani, sit down," I said.

She eyed me up, then cocked an eyebrow salaciously.

"I guess we've got time to visit one of the rooms first," she said. "There even any sheets left in there? Wait, don't say anything. It'll be a surprise."

"Indrani," I repeated quietly, "sit down."

The amusement slid off her face, just like that. It'd been forced then. She was skilled enough at the pretence I honestly hadn't been certain.

"A friend is dead," she said calmly. "So I was going to hold my tongue. But are you sure you want to do this, Catherine, after you just dropped me and Sahelian to charge into yet another danger?"

"Let's," I said.

Before I was even finished speaking, she punched me in the face.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Caerulea

For the glorius city of Belleraphon, and Evil! Vote now!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

naturalnuke

Down With Wickec Foriegn Tyrants!

Wolfkit

Show of hands, everyone who was surprised by Indrani's response. Hmm? Nobody raised their hand? Good, good.

Compy

I guess I havent been paying attention, why is she pissed again?

Byzantine

Cat keeps taking ridiculous risks, and it... upsets her.

luminiousblu

Archer isn't exactly big on Catherine's whole "for the greater good" mentality, nor is she big on Catherine's Leeroy Jenkins mentality.

caoimhinh

After Indrani almost died due to Winter rampaging, she has been having more issues with taking risks, since she has realized her mortality (and her friends'). So she is more reticent about getting into dangerous situations, which Cat has done twice in a row since they entered Iserre..

The first was when Cat met Hierarch, since Anaxares' Aspect even scared Sve Noc yet she still went alone to speak with him, taking enormous risks.

The second was just now, leaving most of the Drow behind, taking only a few thousand as vanguard with her, and most importantly leaving both Akua and Indrani behind.

It's understandable that Indrani is angry at her for taking such risks, although they were necessary. Catherine will now use this opportunity to address Indrani's recently acquired fear, since Archer can't be having such an attitude in future battles.

luminiousblu

Arguable. While not particularly popular in Western culture, many other cultures understand fear as a virtue, and also understand the rush that Catherine has as a weakness. The concept of defining everything you want as "necessary" is pretty dangerous.

Dainpdf

Fear is only a virtue so far as it counters temerity. Once it starts countering decisiveness, it's a problem.

Liliet

Indrani needs to figure out how to deal with this. That doesn't mean discarding the insight.

KageLupus

My read on the situation is actually that Archer has been struggling with risk aversion and fear of death, since she was brought up to consider both of those things as weak and undesirable. Cat is being a good friend and cares about how she is feeling, but Indrani sees it as coddling.

In that sense it isn't much different from the talk about Nauk that they just had. Those feelings are raw and painful and it is easier to not deal with them or force the subject. The difference is that Indrani has been feeling this stuff since things went pear shaped in the Everdark and has just been letting it fester. Cat needs to have the hard talk with her because time is up and things are going to start getting dangerous again.

Skaddiix

I mean the difference is Cat lacks any self preservation at all. Probably the impact of their mentors to some degree. Ranger is not one to die for some grand goal. Black on the other hand planned to die to get his plan to work. Cat is much the same she is fine with dying for Liesse Accords or at the very least to abdicate power. Indrani though isn't really down for that.

Cat does take crazy risks a lot and sure she has lucked out so far but Sve Noc could have killed her and that gamble only works really cause the Dwarves were strong enough to kill all the Drow and were invading at the right time. Cat has been overreliant on suicidal chaos strategy for awhile. Yeah the Tyrant does the same but he seems to have way more planning on what he does. Whereas Cat seems to mostly hope for the best and being able to talk people over to her side. Which sure has worked in putting together the Woe and Academy Recruitment and Sve Noc but they can read minds. I am not sure it works as great with other major players.

Liliet

And Indrani is finally catching up to the idea that this might actually go badly

Liliet

Fear => anger

RanVor

Anger => suffering

Liliet

I think it's a bit too late to worry about the Dark Side at this point in the story, isn't it? Kind of started out there XD

Aeon

I feel like a major part of it is for Cat taking risks and putting herself in danger, but after re-reading the chapter I noticed something that I sort of glazed over the first time around.

"Must have tired herself out hurrying regardless of my request that she not – though I supposed my taking the drow vanguard ahead without a word had invalidated that in her eyes"

I remembered that Cat told Archer not to rush to catch up to her but I forgot that Cat essentially went ahead to deal with a smaller issue, found Robber, learned about Nauk's situation and set out without telling Archer. Which puts the anger that Archer was holding back in new light for me.

Liliet

Yeeeeeep.

Indrani is being adorably overprotective & I love her.

stevenneiman

Basically, Indrani cares more about Cat than any of the causes Cat believes in, and she doesn't like Cat putting herself in danger. Especially since they both almost died facing off against Sve Noc and she felt unable to do anything about it.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm not too proud to admit it. I was surprised.

stevenneiman

Same. It was the sort of surprise where I take a moment to process and then realize that it was in-character, but I definitely was surprised.

Liliet

It was the sort of surprised where you're immediately like "the part I'm surprised by is that I did not see this coming".

But I did not see this coming.

Javvies

Heh. Indrani, Robber and his goblins, and the drow in one place? It's a good thing they're planning on leaving soon. It might be safer and faster to just (finish) torching the place and rebuilding from the ashes than to clear it of the untripped traps and practical jokes.

Ah, the classic "we need to talk, and then get punched in the face" conversation starter. They need the rest of the Woe around.

Skaddix

Ah well this has been building up. Indrani and Cat are going to having a falling out. Seems Cat should have waited until getting the information about Masego from Hakram before this.

Also don't see how Cat killing Saint is going to help make a deal with the Pilgrim. She be better off hoping the Dead King offs Saint.

ALazyMonster

The plan for killing Saint is because she is arguably the strongest fighter they have so if she is killed they would not have the resources to fight both Cat and the dead king. Especially since Cat can be reasoned with. It's really just a way to strong arm the alliance into an agreement.

konstantinvoncarstein

The other problem with Saint is that she cannot be reasoned with. She absolutely want to kill Catherine.

caoimhinh

I highly doubt they are having a falling out. Indrani is angry that Cat left her behind to take a huge risk, she is not gonna leave Cat behind now. Catherine will in turn use this opportunity to talk to Archer about her new fear of dying, since they can't have one of their strongest fighters hesitating in face of danger in the future battles.

As for killing the Saint of Swords, it's because she can't be reasoned with and Cat knows that. The Pilgrim can be talked into doing things because he can see her intentions, but the Saint is out for blood, so Cat will need to get her out of the way before making the Crusaders ally with her.

medailyfun

I think Pilgrim can rein-in SoS, as he had done when she wanted just to kill Black

Liliet

Still unclear why tf he did that btw. Amadeus has a big fat point there, their plan makes no sense with how much risk of escape there is 0.0

Isopor

Keep in mind the Pilgrim has a head for stories. He could be trying to make a play in that direction.

Liliet

Oh, I'm keeping that in mind 0.0

Liliet

I don't think this is a falling out. This is a conversation, Indrani-style. She cares, therefore she's mad.

Euodiachloris

Yup. It's definitely in the same bracket as a worried mother going off ballistically upon finding her kid safe, but unrepentant, in the clothes section, when tracks were lost in the fruit and veg.

Liliet

Yep.

Dainpdf

I see this as less of a falling out and more an opening of the wound to clean it. No sense in letting it fester.

Novice

Welp, this is, in my opinion, one of the worst cliffhangers in this series. I desperately wanted to read about their heart-to-heart (or in this case fist-to-face) conversation ever since Cat dropped it way back when.

And Zeze still worries me.

caoimhinh

It reminds me of a scene in The Originals, when at the end of chapter 5 of season 3, two of the vampire protagonists (Klaus and Elijah) are angry at each other (due to some actions of Elijah that he did centuries ago in order to protect his family, but endangered Klaus' lover of the time, so Klaus sees it as a betrayal, while Elijah is frustrated and tired of having to cover and take care of his brother for so long) so they start fighting against each other. After showing them start the fight while crashing their house and seemingly deciding to have a definite fall out, the chapter ends right after they decide to fight seriously (and apparently to the death).

Next chapter starts with their sister arriving to the house and noticing the wreckage, and walks deeper into the house to look for them; Klaus and Elijah are then shown sitting together in the middle of the wrecked room while drinking whiskey, with their clothes ripped apart and still showing the wounds over their bodies slowly healing and they just say "we reached an agreement after having a little chat about the past".

Hopefully that won't happen here.

caoimhinh

Just in case you are curious, this is the scene I referred:

The fight starts here (and chapter ends): <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CuPzvY69azw>

Next chapter starts and their sister arrives here: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aI8Ti-_A-6c

I remember being like "come on, you could have shown more fight at least, or taken this more seriously after that cliffhanger!"

daegone823

Been enough abusive relationships to know that this is just foreplay..,maybe?

caoimhinh

Yep, there comes a scene of friends fighting over the need of taking huge risks, then lovers making out after displaying the worries they have for each other. It wouldn't even be the first time members of the Woe come to blows with each other (although usually it's for petty things).

This will help them vent out and then talk things out after they had traded a few blows. Since Indrani is angry at Cat for taking big risks (and leaving her behind to do that) while Cat wants Indrani to stop hesitating and overcome the fear she has been carrying with her since Winter went crazy in the Ever Dark.

Author Unknown

At least no one has cut off their go'am hand. It occurs to me that the Woe really need a better way of dealing with interpersonal relationships.

caoimhinh

That bunch needs therapy. Too bad they might throw the therapist out of the window in the middle of the session XD

Mental Mouse

Now I'm thinking about a possible Named therapist...

Euodiachloris

Barkeep.

konstantinvoncarstein

...if he is lucky

Mental Mouse

The thing is, this isn't really an abusive relationship – it's just a crowd where physical violence is part of negotiations. Hopefully Archer remembered that Cat is more fragile than she used to be...

Liliet

Yeah, this... is also a thought I had.

Indrani, please, please don't accidentally mash Cat's nose into her brain 0.0

Skaddix

I would think this Cat and Indrani falling out paves the way for Indrani to leave chasing off after Masego.

IDKWhoitis

I doubt she leaves before seeing Hakram. After that, all bets are off.

Skaddix

I agree after Hakram she is off.

Liliet

They're not falling out, and I don't think it's going to impact the likelihood of Indrani chasing after Masego.

IDKWhoitis

I still believe that on the last day, Boy Wonder will go back on his word, in an effort to slow down the Callowans.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think so. Not with the drowning reinforcements having arrived. And Cat's army will be leaving tomorrow, which still leaves one or two days of oaths, I think.

Insanenoodlyguy

As far as everybody knew, that night with the funeral was the best time to attack. He's not going to attack later when it's less advantageous and still risk his own honor. Maybe he was never intending to, we don't know how the conversation at that camp went other than he and the Captain are still alive and somebody else isn't. If he's going to do it, he'd do it after 3 days now. but with the reinforcements coming, that seems less likely.

IDKWhoitis

That assumes Levs knew about the funeral, which they have no reasonable way of knowing about. Also, Cat pulled away troops from defensive positions to make it a ceremony, which is atypical.

From the Levs position, if they wait until the 3rd, last day, then they can hold the Callowans while their reinforcements arrive. They don't need to win, just delay the retreat.

JJR

"Beware the Black Queen, her treachery knows no bounds. Behold her latest crime, she set a city on fire so that she could surprise her enemies by forcing her own army to attack through the hottest part of the flames."

Because, stories just do this sometimes.

Raved Thrad

There's something deeply satisfying, in these private moments, at seeing the caring, human side to Archer. Somehow it makes her even more of a badass, knowing that she can shed the fearsome, awe-inspiring part of her that is Named, and just be Indrani.

As to that punch in the end, though, I can't help but wonder: is that therapy or foreplay?

Sugar Roll

It's therapeutic foreplay. Case closed.

Raved Thrad

Like as not the next scene will open with them in bed, engaged in pillow talk. 😊

taliesinskye

Funnily enough, I think the punch is an act of love. She loves Catherine, even if she can't voice it, and that's why she can't deal with Catherine risking herself without Indrani there to protect her.

caoimhinh

It's exactly what it is.

Also a show of her indignation at Cat for leaving her behind to take a big risk twice in a row.

Liliet

At least it's not stabbing this time!

Cat's not quite that far gone...

Raved Thrad

In a very real sense, Archer never really grew up. She's been the biggest bully in the yard for so long that she's forgotten what it's like (or, more likely, blots out the memory with enough drink to kill an army) to be the little frightened kid in awe of everyone else. She herself doesn't believe in Catherine's greater good. But she does believe in, and value, the welfare of her friends, even if she won't or can't say it out loud.

So, suddenly, she's having to do a lot of growing up. She's finding out that she can't control how people react to things, unlike how she can predictably get a rise out of them with her good-natured, if sometimes brutal, teasing. She's well due (if not overdue) for a crisis of sorts. On the plus side, however, she's much better off having an emotional crisis with Catherine and the Woe taking care of her, as opposed to, say, the Lady of the Lake, who would most likely recommend mass quantities of alcohol coupled with mass murder.

Liliet

Yeah.

Hye is the worst mom.

RanVor

Second worse. Tasia Sahelian exists.

Euodiachloris

Existed. Missed only so far as I suspect Akua might want to rez her just to tell her she was a terrible mother, and then kill her again herself for the safety of children everywhere.

RanVor

Or maybe skip the telling part and go straight to killing.

Liliet

Oh.

Right.

...I'm formally excluding her from the distinction period

--

HardcoreHeathen

That's another instance where Cat has referred to Black as her father. And this time it wasn't in a moment of distraction or heightened emotion. It makes me suspicious.

I'm beginning to think that she's crafting a narrative, inside her own head. The orphan, storming the enemy stronghold to rescue their kidnapped parent. Usually that story ends with the orphan finding out that their parent is working with, or is, the bad guy... but the “bad guys” of this narrative are the heroes that Cat wants to work with anyway.

Liliet

She’s just training herself out of denial.

It’s funny that this time she thinks it in context of “well this I’m upset about”. She’s learning to balance these things, isn’t she? “I love him” and “he’s awful” are no longer contradictory in her head.

Raved Thrad

It’s probably closer to “he’s awful, but I love him, and he’s my father.” From there it’s a short step to “...and I will burn this entire continent to the ground as a funeral pyre to him if he comes to any harm.”

Liliet

I don’t think Cat’d make that step, considering she still considers it a potential reality that she might have to kill him herself on the way to her goal.

She cares a lot, but prioritization is a real thing.

Raved Thrad

Catherine’s ability to act rationally is a great sign of her maturity and the power of her will, but she is also a very deeply emotional person, and what she cares about, she cares very strongly about. It’s why the Woe, and her soldiers, love her so. Because she loves them right back. If she didn’t need the Levantines on the other side to help her fight the Dead King, she’d have slaughtered them and mounted whatsisface’s head on a pike, in tribute to her dead friend.

Liliet

There’s a step between feeling emotions and killing people about it.

Catherine is extremely upset, yes. But she’s responsible with the power she wields, and she would not use it for a temper tantrum, regardless of alliance prospects.

She’s not happy. That’s not a euphemism for anything else. She can’t bring herself to feel positive emotions at this development. That’s not the same as not caring about the Levantine soldiers’ lives, too.

Agent J

That just serves to make his point about prioritization. She would do that. She very likely wants to do that. But blindly avenging Nauk would run contrary to her goals. Likewise, the notion of burning Calernia to ash to avenge Black would also be rejected as contrary to her goals.

WuseMajor

I honestly think Cat is deluded when she thinks she can get the Pilgrim to ratify the Accords. Well, ok, not "deluded" so much as "fooled." The Pilgrim is a servant of Heaven and right now, it looks like Heaven wants burn the game board down and start over and, while the Pilgrim makes a show of being a kind of uncle, he's not about to stand up to Heaven and he's as sneaky as they come.

Black and Hasenbach should be able to help Cat wise up a bit here.

Javvies

Pilgrim won't oppose the stated Will of Above ... but Above hasn't stated a position on the Accords yet. As far as we know, anyways.

In the meantime, Pilgrim is not so far gone as to want to let the Dead King win, and can be bargained with towards prioritizing the fight of the Living vs. The Dead, where Cat and Callow and Black and the Legions are counted as allies among the Living.

Pilgrim did, after all, try to set Cat up for redemption play before Saint and Bard blew it up by getting Cat declared Arch-heretic of the East. Fighting against the Dead could be a way to return her to that path.

Liliet

>but Above hasn't stated a position on the Accords yet. As far as we know, anyways.

Seriously.

The House Insurgent is still getting miracles.

Crusade != Above, it's explicitly a bunch of rulers + a bunch of heroes trying to cooperate on achieving entirely different goals.

RanVor

Unless miracles don't work the way we think they do...

Liliet

What's a smaller / simpler / Occam-favored conspiracy theory: that Above gives miracles to everyone who asks because they are not invested in the particulars of this conflict / have deliberately removed themselves from influencing it / have deliberately removed themselves from influencing the game board period*, or that they are invested in the particulars of this conflict and communicated their intent to Saint but cannot regulate who gets miracles?

Particularly given that we're literally seeing how miracles work for Sve Noc, in detail, from the inside. You'd think that denying a miracle to someone who asks is literally the simplest way for a deity to express their opinion on events.

*Yes, yes, I know, Bard. Who is suspected to have been talking to Saint. The famously reliable source and staunch supporter of heroic endeavours, eh?

Someguy

Only way I see Levant signing on is if the forces of the Dead King kills Grey Pilgrim & Levant will need to put their patriotism where their mouth is and throw themselves into the meatgrinder.

Percula1869

We can only hope.

Liliet

Saint != Heaven, and House Insurgent is still getting miracles.

And let's not forget this conversation during the Northern Crusade:

"It doesn't need to be like this," I said. "We're the dogs in the pit, but what does that ever really accomplish? One bleeds, another dies, and then they release another hound. The pit's still there even if one side gets a winning streak."

"Some of those hounds have gone rabid," the Pilgrim said. "I grieve their deaths, but I will not allow them to bite children."

"And those should be put down," I agreed flatly. "But we don't need wars for that. We just need rules that both sides are willing to enforce."

"An agreement," he slowly said. "Such a thing would be without precedent. And there are many who would balk."

"Every single Named is a highly dangerous weapon, in their own way," I said. "Any unwilling to accept constraints placed on their actions have no business wielding that kind of power in the first place. And before you ask, I do not exclude myself or any ally of mine from that statement."

He studied me silently.

"For such a thing to hold, there would be need for trust where none exists," he said.

"Then we begin with something smaller," I said. "Rules of engagement, for your host and mine. Would you be able to enforce these?"

Chapter 17: Cloaks

"Trust in yourself and no other is violence upon all the world. Trust in others and not yourself is violence upon the soul."
– Eudokia the Oft-Abducted, Basilea of Nicae

It'd been a while since someone had decked me in the face and I'd actually felt it. Indrani wasn't an amateur, so instead of landing a glancing blow her knuckles buried themselves into my jaw and I was jarred off my feet. The throb of pain began before I would have hit the ground, if I had – instead my arm snapped out and my staff smacked into my open palm. Years of training in the yard made that enough I was able to turn the tumble into a step back. An agonizing one, as my bad leg was less than pleased by the sudden movement and I'd not numbed it with Night before moving. Straightening my back, I turned back to my friend and casually raised an eyebrow.

"That stung a bit," I admitted. "Are we actually going to talk now, or do I need to tie you up first?"

Indrani's eyes hardened. Not at the threat, though – we used those on each other at least once a day with utter nonchalance. Something about my tone had raised her hackles even further up. Silvery mail glittering in the fire's light, she clenched her fingers into fists before forcing herself to breathe out.

"You don't even realize it, do you?" Archer said. "A year ago, you would have caught that. Snapped my arm twice on the way there if you felt like it."

"We're not a year ago," I said.

I did not bother to inject regret I did not feel into those words. The Night was not panacea to all my ills, but to rid myself of Winter's costs I would have settled for much, much less at my fingertips.

"I know that," Indrani said. "So why the fuck are you acting like you are?"

Fear. Under the anger, the indignation, it was fear lay at the heart of that reaction. I didn't tell her to calm down, I knew better than that. We had too much in common, and nothing had ever excited my anger quite like being told I had no right to it. This was a wound to lance, not hole to patch over. So I'd give her what she needed to get the venom out.

"I took necessary risks," I calmly said. "Not without reason, or out of pride. If I'd waited longer the Third Army might have been lost."

"Then you should have lost it," Archer hissed. "How many of these gambles do you really think you can win, Catherine? Nine out of ten, ninety-nine out of a hundred? At the rate you're taking them we'll find out soon enough."

"I won't leave any of mine to die if I can do something about it," I said. "You've known that since the day we met, 'Drani. Marchford wasn't a battle I was forced to fight. It was one that needed to be fought."

Archer's hand lashed out and the jug of wine flew, shattering against the wall with a wet sound. The last mouthfuls of wine there'd been left spilled down in red rivulets.

"Was walking up to a Named whose aspect scared even Sve Noc needed as well?" Indrani harshly asked. "Or putting yourself at the Tyrant's mercy, not even an hour after? You're still going around like if you lose a limb it'll grow back, but it won't. You can't jump down every pit you find and tell yourself you're strong enough to crawl out after, Catherine. You're not strong enough anymore."

We were having, I thought, a very different conversation from the one she thought we were. If Vivienne was a creature of the unspoken, the unsaid, then Indrani was one of shrouding aggression. You could get a much better read on her fears through what she reproached others than what few crumbs she willingly offered up about herself. I no longer had Winter, and so these days I was a great deal more fragile. That was half of the circle, here, and only that. The other half was Indrani's shivering near-death in a mausoleum of ice that she could have done absolutely nothing to get out of, if she hadn't been helped.

Help, that thing her savage beast of a mother had taught her was always weakness. Thread that with the knowledge that there was nothing she could have done to avoid that position except not being there, not fighting, and you got a rope tight enough for Archer to hang herself with. She could rage and accuse all she wanted: all I saw and hear was my friend choking slowly, now that she'd been stripped of the flawed foundations she'd once stood on.

"It was never a game, love," I gently said. "I'm sorry you had to learn it that way."

She laughed, brittle and sharp.

"No, don't you think that'll work," Indrani said, stepping up to the table. "You don't get to play the sage's role when you just marched a pile of wet kindling through a burning district. You don't get to tell me it's not a game when you still act like it is. Who the fuck do you think you are, Catherine?"

"Tell me," I said.

There was barely a flicker of her Name's power before she put her bare fist through the table. Wood splintered and flew, the entire thing collapsed under the sheer weight of the blow.

"That's your skull, if you run into the Saint on your next lark," she conversationally said. "So don't pretend this is a favour you're doing me, that you're letting me rage on your shoulder until my blood's cooled. Because this is real, Catherine, so you'll give me a godsdamned answer."

She brushed a few splinters off her hand before pointing an accusing finger down at the wreck. None of the prickly pieces, I idly noticed, had broken her skin.

"Who do you think you are?" Indrani repeated, in that same deceptively calm tone. "Some favoured child of Below, somehow exempted from dying when you get in over your head? Because Triumphant thought she was that, had an actual Name still and terrible armies besides, and she still fucking died."

She shrugged.

"Is it the Black Knight's legacy you think make you invincible?" she asked. "Where is he now, Catherine? And let's not pretend you didn't pick and choose what you learned at his knee. If the authentic article got had, what makes you think the bastard get will make it through unscathed?"

I matched her gaze without flinching as she advanced, carelessly kicking aside the broken table between us.

"Or is it just that you alone of all the world were born under a victorious star," Indrani said, distance closing between us. "Fate's got plans for you, eh? Catherine Foundling can bleed, can scar and lose limbs, but she can never fucking die."

She leaned in, ochre-brown face mere inches from mine. I could almost feel her breath against my lips.

"Where was that victorious star down in the Everdark, then?" she asked. "When Sve Noc had your neck in their grip and a little twist was all it would have taken to bring an end to the road? All but for the mercy of goddesses, and you had no right to expect mercy of those two."

Indrani bared her teeth.

"Answer me," she demanded in a snarl.

I caught her wrist when she raised her arm to push me back. The staff I left there, and it stood still as if perfectly balanced.

"I don't have any of those things," I told her quietly. "You know that too. One day I'll be a little too slow, or not clever enough, or it'll just be a... bad day. And I'll die. Just like that. It's always been the end of this story. And there's no guarantee I'll complete my work before that day catches up to me."

Archer ripped her wrist free from my fingers, cradling it with her other hand like my touch had been enough to burn her skin. She took a step back, though I doubted she even realized it.

"You can't expect us to care when you treat your life like Creation's kitchen rag," Indrani said. "I might as well get attached to a mayfly."

"If I was always careful," I said. "If I was all prudence and planning, hiding behind my people and leaving every battle to be fought pass me by – if I did all those things, Indrani, would we even be having this conversation?"

I saw the moment where the part I'd not been cruel enough to speak sunk in. If I was all that, would you even care about me in the first place? She flinched, and it brought me no joy, but to bind a wound it must first be cleaned. And this particular one had been left to fester for much too long already. That, more than all the rest, shamed me. Because I'd known it would hurt more for the waiting, and I'd chosen other needs over it anyway. A queen would not have felt guilt, I thought, for choosing queenship's duties over family. But it wasn't the queen that reached out to Indrani just to have the hand batted away.

"That's not fair," Archer said.

"That doesn't make it any less true," I gently said. "You don't get to define the people you care about."

I thought of green eyes, and of the starving realm around me. No, it was never quite so easy as that, was it? That lesson had been long and harsh in the learning, but I had learned it nonetheless. This time when I reached out she allowed me to take her elbow, and it was like that simple touch had cut the strings out of her. Her legs folded and with a grimace of pain I slowed our fall until we were both slouching on the ground, sitting like children surrounded by the remains of their tantrum. And we were, I thought. Children still, in some many ways. We'd been taught at the knee of Calamities, and those teachings had made us sharper than our years should allow – but for all that, no older than our years. Perhaps even younger than those, truth be told, for the stuff of the women we'd become had been thinned in places so it could be used to strengthen others. With my arms wrapped tight around her, I could not shy away from the truth that for all we had done we were still so very small.

"We can't keep doing this, Cat," Indrani tiredly said, resting her chin against my shoulder. "If we're all born with a single yarn of luck to spin, we used up ours too young. On too many stupid fucking fights that we learned too late we shouldn't have fought. We're bare, now. And the worst monsters still lie ahead."

"It's all right to be afraid," I whispered into her ear.

She tried to pull away, but I kept my grip tight and she understood the unspoken – if she used the strength of her Name, I would use that of the Night. Neither of us, I thought, were quite ready to allow those powers foothold in this moment.

"I used to think my first fight with William was when I really got it," I said. "I know better now. I woke up bleeding out, gutted like a fish, but I became the Squire. It was all still in the game, even that. He had his angel's feather, and providence. But I had instincts, and something better than golden luck."

Indrani breathed out shallowly.

"So when was it?" she whispered.

"The day I woke up, Black hung about fifty people," I whispered back. "Made sure I saw. A lot of what happened that afternoon took me years to really deal with. But I still think of them sometimes, even after all the darker days there's been since. Because I looked them in the eyes, and what looked back was the truth that it was larger than me. That I was just a small part of it, even with all that was already meant for me."

I smiled bleakly, remembering the utter silence in the Court of Swords and twice the sound of necks snapping. Two rows and two drops, dead briskly to the gallows.

"It was never a game to them," I said. "They just died, because... they were caught, I suppose, because they were in the wrong place at the wrong time. But the reasons behind that were years older, and those reasons caused by some even more ancient – links in a chain no one can see more than a few pieces of. So they died not knowing, because of something larger than them."

Indrani chuckled darkly.

"That's your lesson?" she said. "That one day we'll die too, blind and lost and not really understanding why?"

"Everybody else does," I murmured. "Why should we be different? We have powers and clever tricks, but how different does that really make us?"

I let out a breathy laugh.

"That's the thing. The first time a story happens, it's not a story at all. If it comes again we tell ourselves it's become something else, but it hasn't. Not really. People bleed just as red the twelfth time as the first. The tears and the deaths don't become any less real, 'Drani. The courage doesn't matter less because some corpse in a grave made the same stand a hundred years before and won."

She leaned back, still in my embrace, and looked at my face questioningly.

"We're Named," Archer said. "That makes it different."

But it doesn't, I thought. We've seen it, you and I. That when all there is holding up the choice is a story and the prediction of victory, the story fails. Because if all you do is pretend, go through the motions, then you've already lost what could have made it a victory in the first place.

"A choice is a choice," I replied, shaking my head. "Black cloak, white cloak – that's the game, thinking the cloak says it all. That the choices are already made for you."

"It's a pretty thought," Indrani said. "But it won't keep any of us alive."

"Nothing will," I smiled. "But that's the point, isn't it? What do we do with that?"

I met her eyes, once more.

"Be afraid," I said. "I am, Indrani. All the time. Be afraid, then make your choices."

Her fingers balled up against my side, clutching at the cloth.

"And that's who you are, the choices you make," I murmured. "Not your Name. Not your mother. Not where you were born or what they made you do."

"It might not be enough," she softly said. "Just making the choice."

I nodded, because I wouldn't lie to her.

"It might not be," I agreed, just as softly. "And for all that, there's only one thing that matters."

I threaded my fingers into hers, warmth against warmth. Oh, there were few prices I would not have been willing to pay to get that back – and Winter's fade was not one of them.

"Who do you want to be?" I asked.

She did not answer, for a very long time, and when she unthreaded our fingers it felt like failure. There were some things that couldn't be fixed with words, I thought, no matter how earnest. But then she leaned forward and rested her chin against my shoulder again.

"I don't know," Indrani said.

Her hands returned to my sides, fingers digging in too tight. It would have been petty to wince. What I'd done to her tonight had been brutal enough in some ways that even noticing this felt miserly of me.

"I don't know," she repeated after yet more silence. "But not this."

"Then we'll find out," I said. "Together, all of us."

She nodded against me. A pause, as I felt her consider whether to keep speaking or not.

"I think I might hate you a little," Indrani finally said.

My throat tightened but I would not argue or beg. It was fair, and her right. I nodded back against the crook of her neck, staying there and breathing in the scent of leather and steel and warm skin.

"I never learned how to do this gently," I admitted, the apology hanging between us. "Some nights I'm not sure I learned to do it at all."

"That I could forgive," she said, then hesitated.

She sighed.

"Will," she corrected, firmly. "Will forgive."

"Then?"

"You took a part of me," she softly said. "By being who you are, you took it in hand. Claimed it. And I won't get it back even if I try."

I felt her tighten against me, like a bowstring gone taut.

"It's a little like being a prisoner, isn't it?" she said.
"Loving someone."

Indrani laughed, and at my silence the tension in her shoulders loosened.

"Every time we speak raw, I understand the Lady a little better," she said. "Why she left. I wonder if that was what she figured out: that if she lingered, she'd end up never leaving at all."

She wasn't speaking of being in love with me. That would have been... it wasn't who we were, to each other. Skin didn't change that, I knew it for certain since the months we'd taken to that kind of intimacy. Wasn't sure she could be like that, even with how she looked at Masego – though much of what lay there was still veiled to me, it was true. Sometimes I wasn't sure I had it in me either, to be like that. I thought of Kilian and what had been shared there. What hadn't, too. Even now the compromises that would have kept us tied were nothing less than abhorrent to me. Not a brew I would ever be willing to drink. How strange it was that you could care so much for someone and yet find them to be such a stranger in the end. No, it wasn't that kind of love. But for the two of us, I wondered if what she was speaking of wasn't more precious. She'd called the Woe wild animals, once, that I'd let into my home. She'd done it while castigating me for being unable to see past my part of our story – but she'd done the same, in her own way. Assuming that there'd been anything to me but plans before I met them. Like I'd not been just as much of a stray, starved for everything they had to give. Being in love, it was a fickle thing. Fragile. And skin only ever meant what you let it. I'd never felt either of those things in a way I wasn't willing to lose. I closed my eyes, letting Indrani's warmth seep into me.

This, I was not willing to lose. Not with her, not with any of the others.

"Sometimes I think you're trying to die," she said, the words shaking me out of my thoughts. "Second Llesse... well, you're not running from it anymore. But I figure you might be running towards it instead, and that's not much better."

"I wouldn't," I said.

"You won't," Indrani said, and it wasn't a question. "You don't have that right, if you do this to us."

"Drani, I'm not trying to get myself killed," I said. "I —"

"Your leg," she said. "The limp. You telling me Sve Noc couldn't have fixed that?"

I bit back on my first answer. Flippancy was less than this, than either of us, deserved. There were ways, not so different from the ones Black had once offered me. But none of them led to places I wanted to go.

"That's different," I said.

"It's a weakness," Indrani said. "And I don't mean because it slows you down. You think you need the pangs to keep you grounded, I'm guessing."

My fingers clenched.

"Yeah," she sighed. "That sounds about right. There's nothing noble about that, Cat. It's just pain, it has no value."

"I can still fight," I said. "And it forces me to think, Indrani. Before I act, how I'll act. To no longer jump in every pit, trusting I'm strong enough I'll be able to crawl out afterwards."

The echo of her own words had her smiling, I could feel it from the way she shifted against my shoulder.

"If you trusted yourself, you wouldn't need it," she said.

"Maybe I don't," I murmured.

"Is that really," Indrani said, "who you want to be?"

I didn't have an answer to that. She didn't ask for one, either. We stayed there in silence, and for once let the world go on spinning without us.

It wouldn't last, but what did?

Go vote!!!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

caoimhinh

I'm gonna leave the typos here in hopes EE sees them and fixes them, thanks :v

for they stuff of the women/ for the stuff
I kept me grip tight / my grip
He had his angel's father / feather what she speaking of / what she was speaking of

Gunslinger

No action but this was good stuff. I love Indrani so much. #ArCat

My very own name

I don't know what I expected, exactly, but it wasn't this emotional! Their friendship is pretty awesome 😊

Skaddx

So Cat can fix the leg but doesn't cause she thinks its keep her grounded. I am going to say she needs to fix it. Black is right Cat is bad matchup against Hanno and if she can only cast one Miracle and not run that makes it so much worse. I assume her Miracle stamina will get better if she gets a name or practices but not being run effectively especially without a name to compensate is dumb.

Safi

I think that Cat's both enjoying the mortal feeling of the leg and weaving it as a story. There are a lot of times where the Protagonist is about to get hit by rushing into something, and their bad leg/arm/fish-noodle-snake gives out, and they avoid dying because of that.

I'm not actually sure that Hanno's a bad matchup for Cat with her new powers. He's all about out-lasting the opponent and whittling them down until he can drop his Trump card, while she's now about micro movements and a few broad strokes miracles. If Cat's ever trying to run in a fight during the daytime, she's just going to be out-mobilitied no matter what. Hanno has his steed, and any Named can still catch her just by being fast, so far as we know.

Finally, with the endurance, that's just when she does the daytime miracles, like the one with the river. It's been established that she has significantly more stamina at night. On a side note, I really like this fifth book so far. It hasn't been as action-themed as some of the others, but getting more character development and investment is very nice. Bets that one of the Woe dies by the end of the book, though? It feels like things are starting to lean that way. My money's on either Indrani or Vivi, just because Cat will never get anything done without Hakeem, and Masego still has a bunch of recovery character to go through. Odds are that it's the Dead King who does it too, as part of the 'Big Boss Establishment' routine that this world would probably like to run. (See Beating Spock or something like that on TVTropes. I forget the exact name.)

Liliet

None of the Woe will die until the end of the story.

There's a reason why Calamities only started dying when Catherine spread her wings. In this world, it's not actually random, and Catherine's the only one of them non-Named.

They'll be fine.

Fayhem

It's definitely not random, but depending on where the weight is in the story it's definitely still possible. Catherine is very good at gauging where that weight is and how to shift it and if it was just the likes of Hanno against her I wouldn't be too worried, but with Neshamah and the Bard/Intercessor both on the field now there is a genuine risk that one of the Woe could get caught in the gears of the story and ground up by it. Dangerous as he is, even Pilgrim I don't think would take out one of the Woe if it was just the Crusade as the antagonist, but Dead King and the Intercessor both have literally millennia of experience beyond what any other known player in the game has. It shouldn't be understated just how dangerous that is when it's been shown very clearly that your opponent knowing more stories to pull from can be fatal (e.g., Pilgrim taking down Black, or Bard arranging Sabah's death).

All that said, personally I'm rooting for the Woe (plus Amadeus actually) to all make it through because goddamn if Evil doesn't deserve a happily-ever-after just for once. Just one big murder family sitting around the skull-themed dinner table together when all the dust settles. I don't feel like that's too much to ask for.

Rook

Disagree, I think Cat is right with this one. The question of how to win the fight is secondary. Understanding whether the fight needs to be taken at all and why it's being fought is what matters the most.

Getting away from the whole story mechanic thing, that's how you sometimes have to control vices. Willpower can weaken, lessons can be forgotten, moments of carelessness happen. Sometimes you need to put a cast on your broken arm so you can't move it, sometimes you need to throw out all your liquor so you can't go back to it. You can't always trust yourself to do the right thing and it's not wrong to rely on an – pun not intended – external crutch, after recognizing your own weaknesses and failings.

The leg is a reminder of old lessons that can't be ignored precisely because it's so inconvenient. So you don't forget the reason you started all this even in the heat of the moment, so you have that reminder when you need it the most; when you're caught up in what's happening, when the blood rushes to your head, and when you're angry or frustrated or ashamed and the last thing you want to do is take a step back even though you know full well you should.

Skaddx

Its a crutch as Indrani stated, Cat simply doesn't trust herself enough to remember the lessons without said crutch. Plenty of other Named remember their goals without self crippling themselves in combat.

Rook

Yeah, and the point is that there's nothing wrong with said crutch. Catherine is right not to trust herself, it's never reasonable to trust yourself to not make a mistake you always make. Understanding and owning your flaws as just as important as having confidence in your strengths.

Considering the sheer volume of repeated mistakes she's made – which she's spent the last two volumes regularly flaying herself over via inner monologue, yeah she's totally right to rely on a crutch. She's done quite well to own her flaws rather than trying harder with the same methods that have never worked.

There's no shame in leaning on external crutches. If you can't wake up in the morning on your own, get a damn alarm clock, don't just keep trying and failing to wake up on time with the same method.

luminiousblu

In this case it's not relying on an alarm clock in the morning, it's relying on a massively loud alarm clock to wake up at three in the morning when you're attempting to infiltrate a military complex. Crutches are all well and good. A crutch that actively cripples your ability to do the very thing you need a crutch to remember to do?

Honestly if you need that then maybe you simply aren't up to the job.

Liliet

Catherine's job right now isn't melee fighting, it's politics.

Skaddix

I mean there is plenty of work to be done. Yes politics is part of her job but there is whole lot of fighting left to go and weakening yourself when you are going to be headed into combat hot zones is simply a bad idea. Cat needs to find another coping method that doesn't lessen her ability to fight. Not to mention can Cat really expect anyone else to finish the Liesse Accords if she falls at any time between the Final fight against the Dead King or the Bard or whoever the Final Boss is.

If the answer no then Cat needs to exercise some self preservation. Nothing wrong with gambles but as I said Cat relies on gambles with very little actual planning far too often. The Tyrant is way better at the game Cat tries to play as he actually uses both together.

Liliet

Yes, Cat needs to exercise some self-preservation, that's what the bad leg is FOR. To remind her of mortality.

I'm not saying it's a good thing she needs the reminder, and it literally does qualify as self-harm pretty much, never a good thing for one's mental health or a good sign.

But fighting-wise, Catherine's role has changed. She's not a melee fighter anymore.

RanVor

Excuse me, but do you really believe Cat will always have a choice in this matter?

Liliet

I am not 100% certain of it, as I'm not 100% certain of any future developments.

But whether Catherine seeks out or avoids melee fighting is going to hugely impact the number of melee fights she's in.

RanVor

Well, she only needs to be in one to die.

Liliet

Same applies to her being fae and getting into stupid fights with heroes because her brakes broke / because the story insists she's the monster. Just needs to run into someone capable of killing her once.

RanVor

Well, yes. That doesn't mean Catherine intentionally crippling herself doesn't increase the likelihood of that happening.

Liliet

In any given fight, sure.

But the total likelihood of dying is number of battles * probability of dying in each one.

The total probability has decreased. The leg thing prevents more than it hurts, and Cat can always augment it with Night to stop it from hurting. She's got AoE/mobility powers, anyway.

RanVor

That's not the point. She doesn't have to be a cripple to avoid battles.

Liliet

Apparently she thinks she does.

That is what the point is.

RanVor

If she thinks the sky is green, will you believe her? No? Archer doesn't either.

Liliet

What do you mean "doesn't believe her"? That's not what the text indicates. Indrani doesn't like that

Catherine doesn't trust herself, but she doesn't say "no you're wrong you don't do stupid reckless things on impulse"

RanVor

I'm sorry, but I have to agree with luminousblu here. If she's unable to control her own actions to the point of having to make herself physically incapable of doing dumb things, she has no business in running a country.

(Also, Age of Sigmar is an abomination.)

Liliet

There's a sliding scale there and you know it.

Look at Catherine's track record. Callow is independent and mostly safe, to everyone's shock; Catherine herself has died no less than three times. It rather suggests that the balance is specifically "Catherine can take care of a country better than she can take care of herself".

None of this is a new development, Catherine's just figuring out new coping methods. Even if this one is high key a bad idea (self-harm never leads good places), it's still a coping method for an existing problem.

That's all I'm saying.

RanVor

It's a bad method and Catherine is stupid to refuse to find a different one. That's all I'm saying.

Liliet

Well, I'm not disagreeing here.

Considering I've taken to calling the monstrosity of a scheme that Amadeus got wrecked at Second Liesse "The Bad Plan"...

Rook

Except Catherine job isn't being a fighter at this point. She's not Hercules, she's Caesar, and Caesar was never powerful because he crushed all of Rome's enemies with his mighty muscles. That's what his armies were for.

"But Catherine isn't Caesar!"

– Shes literally a queen. With a literal army styled after the legions. They were called the legions for half the story

"But that's not enough!"

– I misspoke, she has TWO armies.

"But this is a fantasy world, Named are what matter!"

– I misspoke again. She has two mundane armies, a small army of named, and a god.

"But she needs to personally tear out the Bards throat with her fighting prowess!"

– She really doesn't.

"It's still making her weaker for no reason"

– There is a reason, and it doesn't make her weaker.

Being Named or fighting named is an occupation where you die in truth a year before the knife ever slits your throat because you fucked up a story. Catherine herself has said this. Power isn't limited to bulking up and punching things very hard.

Catherine's superpower isn't hitting a horses eye with an arrow from four miles away, not is it parrying darkness and cutting the sky. Her real superpower is being practical, rather than stupid evil. That's what separates her from the likes of Akua.

As in she's good at thinking and making the right decisions. That's her superpower. Her brain isn't in her leg.

Skaddix

Those are strawman. Also I am sorry did Cat not just win a battle by using a miracle? She is not Cordelia or Malicia where she is nowhere close to the battlefield. She is on the front and the other side is going to target her cause she is the enemy leader and has zero mobility whatsoever. Yeah she is not leading the charge but she is hardly back in a castle far away from the front either.

Not to mention not all Named are killed due to complex narrative manipulations. Cat started her career by taking out The Exiled Prince by having Nauk shoot an arrow at him. No complex plotting or narrative required. Is not wearing you helmet that much worse then not fixing your leg? Bard set up a story to kill Sabah sure but Sabah would have won that fight against Rafaela if she didn't burn an Aspect just to speed up the fight. Bard didn't force her to make that dumb move, heck Sabah even notes herself that Rafaela is better against monsters than becomes one anyway.

So narrative alone is hardly all that counts. Named tend to get killed in the field and while sure some planning is involved, and narrative skill matters, its not like combat ability has zero impact on who wins.

Also Caesar would not fail to heal a wound that hinders his abilities just to remember a lesson. And one could make the case Cat has not been making great use of her brain of late.

Liliet

Exiled Prince absolutely died because of the narrative and because of his own stupidity.

luminiousblu

The Exiled Prince, if anything, died counter to the narrative. There are stories where a man asking for a duel is shot and killed to show the perfidy of the enemy – this happens. But it's extremely rare compared to the nearly omnipresent "ok we accept your duel" version. The narrative would've actually been on his side, Black says as much when Hanno calls him out by name just as the Exiled Prince did. It would be difficult to simply refuse. Catherine did so anyway.

Liliet

I'm talking about the larger narrative, here. He was a hero of a very, very wrong story. Catherine even commented on how he pretended his mercenaries were knights and how it irked her as a Callowan. It was exactly the thing Catherine comments on in this chapter: a story without substance to it, a story that did not actually match reality.

So he died like an idiot, because he wasn't the heroic savior of Callow that he thought he was.

Mental Mouse

The world of PGtE works differently than ours; Named really are the focus of action. And while Cat may not have a classic Name, her position of First (and only) priestess of Night is certainly a comparable narrative hook.

Liliet

Thank you!

Though calling Catherine evil at this point makes me strongly question what definition you're using lmao

luminiousblu

>her real superpower is being practical, rather than stupid evil

This is why, I suppose, that Akua played nearly the entire Empire and had a good chance of coming out on top had Assassin not participated OR had Winter hadn't invaded OR had Masego not been able to straight up contain three demons OR had Warlock not been able to neutralize a Greater Hellgate. Of those, the last two were possibly forseen but still incredible feats likely without real precedent, the first was calling in a third calamity to essentially dab on her, and the last involved both a fourth calamity and actual, honest-to-god RNG. The deck was supremely stacked against her and she still almost won.

Hell that was First Liesse too, really. With Black breathing down her neck and Catherine's massive library of tricks she still came within inches of winning anyway.

Catherine on the other hand? If Catherine is good at thinking then I'm good at epic magic and Age of Sigmar isn't an abomination to all that's good and holy. Like seriously come on, the last two books could be subtitled "Wherein Catherine Foundling demonstrates the lack of IQ typical of backwater Callowan farmers – an Account by Akua Sahelian the Collar Fairy"

Rook

Ah yeah, collar fairy. The one that lose despite all her overwhelming advantages precisely because she was too busy trying to beat everyone in a fight instead of ever taking a step back to consider if she should be taking the fight at all

Hence why all those people were aligned against her in the first place

The one Catherine beat because she knew when to work with her enemies and make them not her enemies anymore, instead of trying to fight them? Hence why all those people were aligned with her and not against her Collar fairy, as in the one who's currently on team Catherine precisely because Catherine chose to keep her instead of taking revenge and grinding all opposition to dust? The one that bailed her ass out in the everdark when Catherine tried to brawl her way through, so she could have a second chance of making the correct decision to bring them over to her side instead?

Yeah that's definitely a case of awful judgement there. It was definitely Catherine's – power – that solved everything there, right? Hah.

Liliet

I know, right?

Catherine is a diplomat and a politician first, a brilliant strategist and a pretty good tactician second, and a fighter a distant, distant last, mostly achieved just due to storyweaving – which is a skill that encompasses and influences the first four on this list.

luminiousblu

Ah yeah, collar fairy. The one that lose despite all her overwhelming advantages precisely because she was too busy trying to beat everyone in a fight instead of ever taking a step back to consider if she should be taking the fight at all. Did you actually read what I said? The argument you're making is circular. She 'should be taking the fight' because she fought for what she wanted. Literally what's the issue here? She had the same sort of drive that Catherine had, just in a different direction.

I get the feeling you simply like Catherine as a protagonist and can't fathom the idea that maybe she's wrong. Your argument that her keeping Akua was a sign of sound judgement sounds ridiculously hypocritical, when Akua was also going to keep Catherine around. Not burning shit you can use it sort of the point, well, not even Evil. Just not being an idiot, and whether or not Black thinks so, Evil isn't -stupid-, it just has different goals.

Rook

The point is that Akua lost despite overwhelming power because she never compromised, saw everyone as an opponent, and cared only about trying to win the fight instead of making sure it's a fight worth taking in the first place. Exactly what Catherine is trying to avoid doing when she keeps the leg as a reminder. Catherine has lost similarly plenty of times before.

Honestly, I would throw an accusation right back in your face. Every criticism, every argument you seem to make boils down to "she needs to be STRONKER so she can BRAWL with everyone else", which really kind of goes against every major theme of the serial since the first volume.

I get the feeling you're reading the wrong story considering what you seem to want to protagonist to be. Might I suggest some timeless classics instead? Like dragon ball z.

Liliet

I don't think even Akua herself agrees with you.

luminiousblu

How is that any sort of rebuttal? Characters being unaware of their own weaknesses has been basically all four books.

Liliet

I mean, Akua certainly relies on Catherine's judgement these days.

Also your analysis entirely ignores storycraft. None of the things you mentioned were random, even 'actual RNG' does not work like that in guideverse. What the story says, goes, and Catherine's speciality is story advantage. You can't see the cause-effect chain between her actions and decisions and her successes, maybe, but that doesn't mean it's not there.

Having allies to do your work for you IS being smart, when you're a politician. Which Catherine is. Has been since "we do not kneell".

Liliet

This is a kind of funny echo of Catherine giving in to Akua's suggestion and starting to use an actual crutch – well, a staff, to deal with the bad leg.

There's nothing wrong with using a crutch.

It's not even a metaphor.

Liliet

Yeah, and there's nothing wrong with using a crutch is the thing.

luminiousblu

If you can't trust yourself to even manage your own mind correctly why do you think that you'd be able to manage and change the world? Catherine is looking to fix the problems she sees with the world, but she can't even deal with herself.

Liliet

Shit mental health doesn't mean you're incapable of anything.

Much like how losing a hand did not disqualify Hakram from being the best bureaucrat that ever lived (ok second best), having a shot sense of self-preservation hanging on PTSD does not disqualify Catherine from being the alliance maker this continent needs and deserves.

luminiousblu

Shit mental health means you have no right to lead people anywhere, especially when your rallying cry is that you're less deluded than everyone else involved.

And Hakram is different from Catherine. Hakram isn't healing his hand because it would invalidate what he said to Vivienne and cause problems with someone more valuable than him. Catherine isn't healing her leg to make a point to herself. Hakram has lost his hand for visible gains. Catherine has let her leg go for sentiment, and if she needs that sentiment to not be a lunatic then how is she the practical one?

Liliet

"Shit mental health means you have no right to lead people anywhere" Disagree.

Also lmao no Catherine isn't 'practical evil', she's 'clever hero'. Practicality hasn't a word to say to either her or Amadeus at this point: they're good at what they do, but they're certainly not motivated by anything remotely in practicality's direction.

luminiousblu

That's stupid. Plenty of people have remembered why they're fighting for what they're fighting for without keeping a busted arm specifically for that purpose. It's pride speaking, the idea that she thinks she can be noble and still win, and that never ends well for either side. One day she's going to know what she's fighting for but she'll be too fucking weak to actually go and do it.

You speak of willpower failing, but pain is the first thing that fades in the rush of battle. We have an entire biological mechanism specifically dedicated to shutting down pain when you're fighting for your life. Pain is literally all in your head, it has no outside or physical basis, it's - actually- chemicals in your brain that disappear the moment you're actually about to die, and saying the limp is going to be a deterrent is like saying that if you bore a hole in your roof you'll know when it's raining and remember not to go outside.

Rule one of fantasy, science fiction, and real life is that without power literally nothing else matters. You could have it all but some Serbian kid shoots you when your driver takes a wrong turn or someone stabs you in the "sacred" Senate or someone takes a handgun and aims real well at the back of your head while you're watching a play and then what? You could have all the ideals in the world but then someone rolls around with a way bigger army and way more wealth and it turns out the only ideas that live forever are the ones with backing. It's all well and good to 'stay human', but 'humans' don't get to take on the metaphysical structure of the world and win, nor do they get to challenge people who are explicitly more than human. She can't have her cake and eat it too.

Indrani has a point and while I know it's because Catherine is our PoV character that she gets brushed off so easily, it still rankles. Just because the discussion stems from her fear of getting offed doesn't mean Catherine isn't being an idiot and saying that literally everything is "needed". Posturing is a valid tactic, but she's not posturing and this isn't Nixon's madman's gambit, she legitimately thinks of these things as "needed", simply because she wants them. And that's another piece onto the mounting pile of evidence that says Catherine was full of it when she tried to argue that it was all Winter doing it and it made her more inhuman. Remember, she was Sovereign of Winter back when she tried to have the nice discussions with Pilgrim and tried to spare the heroes, but she conveniently forgets all that because Winter is bad and she's good - no matter how she self-flagellates, she thinks of herself as in the right. If she didn't, she'd stop.

There's something worse than taking a step forward when you should've taken a step back, and it's why Catherine took the knife in the first place. It's not being able to step at all because in the last minute you ran out of breath.

SilentWatcher

I agree with luminiousblu

Rook

So wait, let me see if I understand this correctly here

Despite the fact that Catherine has repeatedly proven to be lacklustre in a brawl

Despite the fact that she has an entire roster of borderline tactical nukes whose entire role is brawling. Ranger's greatest student, the two greatest sorcerers of her generation, the greatest general of her generation, a literal god, a small army of mighty that puts most Named to shame, an empire of magic light infantry, and the finest and best equipped mundane army on the surface of the continent barring maybe Praes

Despite the fact that her greatest advantage and power has been her mental clarity and ability to draw people in around her orbit to make up for what she lacks

Despite the fact that we've seen her spend the last four volumes repeat the same mistakes over and over

Despite the fact that the entire last two volumes have been unceremoniously, blatantly hammering in the fact she already has a big hammer and that having a bigger hammer doesn't actually solve any problems

Despite her specifically spelling out at the end of two camps that any victories or solutions won with martial might are more frail than her bad leg, considering it immediately falls apart as soon as she goes

You think it's posturing and pretentiousness to keep a small disability as a reminder of past lessons? You think with all that the most important thing is a healthier leg, because what, Catherine that can run faster is going to be the edge in power that brings continental powerhouses to the table, not the literal army of legends out of a fairytale storybook that listen to her command? The one she only has in the first place because she's a leader archetype protagonist that relies on charisma and mental clarity?

O K

Forrest

Yeah, no, this is quite an accurate summation. Much of book four actually felt like a bit of a let down since things just moved so slowly along and almost nothing got done for so much of it. We had Cat yet again just not manage to measure out against her foes again and again despite being the boogeyman for so many people, that despite being the last of winter and practically being a deity and the boogeyman that so many feared she was almost dying to some random mighty leader (can't remember its name, but man that was frustrating).

Just being super overpowered and having the big hammer did not matter at all the entire last book. Having a slight limp, and the ability to think clearly and maybe be a bit clever again? I'm just hoping this will be a much more enjoyable book than last one.

medailyfun

I guess the point is that despite the leg she just recently rushed alone or with a small force into quite risky situations dropping on the scales not her full arsenal of assets but her very life. So it does not really help as a grounding 😊

Liliet

Those were a different kind of danger. Catherine talking with Anaxares and Kairos was story-fu and politics, her leg did not make a iota of difference in the kind of danger she faced. And this kind of danger is her actual SPECIALITY, the job she's doing right now, the job he's best at.

The river cracking expedition wasn't exactly about melee fighting either. Catherine avoided drawing on Night on the way there, doesn't mean she couldn't have drawn on enough to protect herself from fire / keep the turtle up should the worst have come to worst. From there, the danger was purely in how good her tactical calculations were – and they were.

This is the kind of danger Catherine is best equipped to handle, and the kind of danger she has to brave. The kind that the bad leg doesn't do anything to.

It's rushing off into melee that would have been stupid, and that's exactly what her leg keeps her from doing.

Liliet

Thank you!

luminiousblu

If a leader can't be trusted to keep her fucking cool without literally crippling herself then maybe she has no business leading anything bigger than a chamber pot. If a leader who thinks that almost literally shooting herself in the foot is a good reminder of the fact that getting shot hurts maybe she has no business holding a gun.

>having a bigger hammer doesn't solve problems
Doesn't it, though? Look at literally every problem she's solved save for Winter. When it comes down to it what generally matters is power. When she loses it tends to be because she overestimates her hammer and underestimates the stubbornness of a nail. It's not really said much but the other side of the coin to "when all you have is a hammer" is that if you don't have a hammer then you have no way to deal with a nail. Someone who literally makes a virtue out of hurting herself is nothing if not lacking mental clarity.

There's a difference between willing to be a martyr and actively looking to become one, just as there's a difference between willing to deal with injuries and actively looking to keep them. People applaud symbolic wounds like cutting your hair or leaving a scar. There are also cultures that make a virtue out of dying for something other than the self (your king, honor, religion, etc). To take a grievous injury in the line of duty is also considered, if not a virtue, at least proof of bravery. Very, very few cultures, however, applaud refusing healing when it's available. There is no way for Catherine to logically work that shit out.

"Leader Archetype"

The "fact" is that, for the most part, whatever Catherine thinks about herself tends to be completely wrong by the next book and exposed for her insecurities or fury or inexperience or whatever blinding her.

"Mediocre in a brawl"

Excuse me, what? Winter Catherine for most of the past few books has been shown to repeatedly blow everyone save the very oldest monsters clean out of the water. The only times she loses are, essentially, literal in-world Plot Armor. Just because she can't deal with the Saint of Swords and the Grey Pilgrim head on doesn't mean she's 'mediocre', that's like saying Hannibal was 'mediocre' because eventually he got his shit pushed in by Scipio.

In fact I'd really argue that if Akua was in control against the Saint, there's a good chance she would've won. Best I can tell, the Saint isn't actually stronger than the Queen of Winter, the same way the Queen of Summer fought off the Ranger just fine; Catherine is just bad at using power, and equally bad at dealing with not having any.

>Despite her specifically spelling out at the end of two camps that any victories or solutions won with martial might are more frail than her bad leg, considering it immediately falls apart as soon as she goes Because she's full of shit. Black's Callow was won with martial might. He then tweaked it so his victory stayed a victory, but the reason he had clay to work with was because he pounded everyone else's face in with a mallet until they stayed the fuck down. Martial might has always been what matters when shit hits the fan. Even in the Lord of the Rings there's roughly five different turning points that come down to "the Fellowship had ultra extreme hax in the form of Gandalf to bludgeon their way through problems", and had the Fellowship failed the Maiar would've pulled the plug and nuked half the continent to get rid of Sauron. There's a reason their darkest hour is also the point where they're militarily weakest.

>the most important thing is a healthier leg
It's not the leg, it's what it represents. The fact that she thinks it makes sense to make a cripple of herself because she literally can't trust her own judgement shows she's unfit to be a leader and also shows she's a git if she thinks it'll actually make the difference when push comes to shove. If you can't trust yourself, how can you expect others to trust you? Someone without confidence in their own abilities almost by definition will lose the confidence of others.

>Charisma and mental clarity
I'll be seriously honest. I haven't seen any cleverness from her since her trick at First Llesse. At this point in time, Akua is a more charismatic person (and has always been cleverer, that was apparent since forever) because if nothing else Akua has the gravity and the supreme self-assurance bordering on megalomania that defines country-scale charisma. That's why Catherine used to be charismatic – someone who was so sure of what she was doing she'd look the entire world in the eye and, if it didn't spit out what she wanted how she wanted it, she'd flip it the finger and sock it in the face until it did. Violent? Yeah. Doomed? Maybe – Beowulf is a 'good guy' and he basically does just that for most of the story and ends up fine. But charismatic yes. Right now she's the ultimate waffler and has an air of being a leeroy jenkins about her, which was fine when she had drive but these days her ultimate goal changes so fucking often (and don't give me Liesse Accords we literally don't know what that is or why it should work) that it's hard to side with her and believe she actually believes in anything at all. She doesn't even believe in her own ego, and isn't that a sorry sight?

SilentWatcher

If so i cant wait what she will do to herself, when some important plans fail , or when some one of the woe dies, because of her leg. What will she do to remember that mistake?

Skaddix

Yeah I think Cat hung out with Hakram too much. But the difference when Hakram gives up a limb its for a concrete gain not remember what he is fighting for and not make mistakes. Hakram took off his arm cause he realized keeping Viv around was important. Not to mention its not like his Adjunct power set is tied to combat. Organizing Systems sure but he is not likely to change the face of a battle if he has one arm vs two.

Cat though a slow moving caster and opposition leader is an easy kill. With Miracles she is probably the second most dangerous Woe to an Army. But you going to aim for Masego or Cat first? Masego is way harder to fight and isn't the leader.

Mental Mouse

The Adjunct power-set does link to combat: One of Hakram's aspects is Rampage. But he may well get a prosthetic for the other hand, or something.

luminiousblu

The difference was that Hakram clearly saw no way to actually keep the Thief around without showing him he really meant it. Hakram had essentially been driven into a corner, and him cutting off his hand showed determination and dedication.

Catherine is almost literally the opposite. She doesn't keep her leg busted to show her determination, she keeps it busted to try and make sure she keeps it. That's not admirable, that's just disgusting. If you need a destroyed limb to remind you what you're fighting for do you really actually and honestly believe in your ultimate goal? If you don't believe in it any more, and are doing it just because it's right on an intellectual level, can you face the people who are even now dying for you in the eye?

Liliet

The leg isn't for reminding her what she's fighting for, it's for reminding her that she's not a fucking melee fighter by speciality and should really stop trying to be one.

See: Istrid vs Grem One-Eye argument.

luminiousblu

If she needs a broken leg to remind her she's not a melee fighter then she really should work on getting her head on right.

What you're saying is akin to putting out your eye to remind yourself that there's a better scout on your team and you should rely on them, or cutting off your hand to remind yourself that you're rubbish at duelling.

Liliet

You're not wrong re: work on getting her head on right.

Liliet

As I understand, she could fix it for a price with something like blood magic. It's not just that she arbitrarily chose to have an injury, she just chose not to pay the price for fixing it.

Ali Khan

It was because it was day time. While I agree that that's still quite a set back, if she were to fight him at night the odds would be a bit better.

Mental Mouse

With respect to the leg, we have both Watsonian and Doylist factors in play:

Internal to the story, she's looking for a crutch to remind her to stay the hell out of physical brawls. Note that dealing with Hierarch and Tyrant, was in contrast in her skill-set. She had a powerful magical protector against the Hierarch, and the Tyrant's chaotic ways are meat and drink to her. In both cases, she left with valuable knowledge and having made an impression.

External to Cat's intentions: Oh yeah, she's caught up in the story. She kept the leg because that's part of her narrative, and it's a classic feature for a perpetual-underdog villain. If she figures this out, she can strike another blow against the story by having it healed.

luminiousblu

I mean the thing is the Tyrant, you have to remember, is magically powerful. He's definitely a brawler as well as whatever else he's got. The dude wiped out an army with a single spell, with apparently no real prep time, just to show he could after he marched his own army in front of it. Winter Catherine would've snuffed him like a candle, Priestess Catherine I'm not so sure. Sve Noc, definitely, but they're drow, do you really want to trust your back to one of those?

werafdsaew

Tyrant is the furthest thing from a brawler.

Liliet

Tyrant's a strong mage, but the entire point there was diplomacy. Which Catherine succeeded at. The cleanest won battle is one you never fight.

JillyBean

I'm still wondering if Cat will end up competing for the mantle of Squire. Black is obviously in the running. The general rules of 3 in this story would suggest three contestants for Squire, and this would be Cat's third time. And the third contestant maybe...Akua? Black loses out, Cat kills Hanno and then goes in line for White Knight (!?) and Akua kills Black, heading for his old mantle and getting revenge for her father and maintaining her competition against Cat? Or Cat kills Black because he sets it up, Akua takes the path of light (Squire → White Knight)? Or a new Grey Knight is born that walks the line (and kills Pilgrim because only one Grey is allowed?).

Meh. Hopefully the real story is better.

Liliet

Why would Catherine be in the running for Squire?

She's not even remotely in that league. She was only ever a Squire because of being Black's apprentice, and she outgrew that strongly. She's no longer learning from a Knight, nor trying to become one (and never did, that one).

Akua's also still Named, the Diabolist.

Big Brother

Finally, Cat and Indrani talk things out.

Javvies

Touching moment between Indrani and Cat.
And things that need to be said.

Being strong doesn't have to mean you don't think about things, Cat.

imagesbe

I think she means that every time she's about to go into a situation believing that her strength will pull her out of it (practically every fight in the entirety of the Everdark comes to mind), her bad leg will remind her that now she's only mortal and can't just assume she'll come out on top.

I don't think Cat's reasoning is actually wrong. The problem isn't that reasoning. The problem is, as Indrani points out, that this reasoning is needed at all.

Novice

Yep, this is all I ever wanted out of them. Especially the end with Cat going ever deeper into introspection.

As Sun Tzu once said: "If you know the enemy and know yourself, you need not fear the result of a hundred battles." With the 'know yourself' part being relevant here.

luminiousblu

Sun Tzu's actual line is incredibly often misquoted. What he actually means isn't that you'll win a hundred out of a hundred battles. He means that if you know both sides perfectly then you won't walk into a losing battle or let a winning battle go. It's an inverted form of 'choose your battles', i.e. 'make sure you have the knowledge to be able to choose your battles instead of just running screaming at every single army within a week's march'.

Auxert

"If was all that, would you even care about me"
If I was all that

doominator10

I bet Cat will let Sve fix her leg when she sees Adjutant lost his hand in order to serve a calculated purpose, following some waffling introspection about how she's influencing those around her.

Liliet

Hehe.

caoimhinh

Maybe, maybe not. I wouldn't be the first time Cat's leg has been healed just for the convenience of it even if narration had said otherwise.

She first harmed it against a devil, then resurrected and kept smoking and drinking the herbs to deal with the pain, but when she fully embraced her mantle of Winter she said her leg had been healed by the Angels in her resurrection but restored at that moment, yet the following chapters Cat didn't have any limp and now that she lost Winter she says the Fae power had healed her limp, but now she has it back because reasons.

On the other hand, ever since Cat spoke with Pilgrim, she has been obsessed with his words to the point of haunting her interactions with other people and how she sees herself. She has mentally repeated "Your people becoming warped by your presence, old traits grown more vicious and acute." at least four times in the past volume.

And people wonder how Bard manages to manipulate people, in the Guide World people (especially Named) can become obsessed by even the slightest details and not even realize it themselves I remember it was called "branded" in early chapters.

antoninjohn

I wonder what happened to the aspects she ripped out of heroes with Winter?

Darkening

Yeah, it's been bothering me wondering where all those artifacts she made are. She killed literally dozens of heroes, if we only ever see Akua's aspect used that's going to be a real let down on that foreshadowing.

Mental Mouse

Eh? When she was Squire II, she had a Take aspect, which she used on William's Rise and then another aspect I forget. But once she went over to Winter, she lost Take, and then the remaining power was finite, and in due course got used up.

werafdsaew

She also made artifacts out of the Heroes she killed, like with the Stalwart Paladin.

Mental Mouse

I just went back to look at the fight with the Stalwart Paladin, and I don't see anything about her making an artifact. Facing down more angels, but no souvenirs.

darkening

She mentions at one point that Take got transformed into an ability to make single use artifacts out of people's aspects after she got transformed by winter. She made the whistle she used to summon the Hunt in Keter out of Akua's Call.

GuidingMoonlight

"do you think you are invincible?"

Well, yes. She is the protagonist. Whole setting is build around it. All her plans are build around it.

luminiousblu

From a meta-sense of the word, she's the protagonist, but in-setting she isn't really the protagonist. She's one protagonist of many protagonists running around. More to the point, there's really nothing rare about bad ends.

Liliet

One thing I really, really like about Guide.

GuidingMoonlight

Argh, let's just agree to disagree.

Sean

Well she doesn't know she's the protagonist. In universe she's one of many antagonists and protagonists, each with the power of their own story.

NZPIEFACE

I'm pretty sure Cat will die before this story properly ends. All of this so far feels like massive build up where the climax is Cat dying with the epilogue being the aftermath.

Andrew Mitchell

Now THAT would be a real surprise! It would be the ultimate flip of the standard story tropes. I don't think it's likely but there's definitely a non-negative chance you're right.

medailyfun

the question is how many times she will die, not whether she die or not 😊

Mental Mouse

Again?

Suggestions

I admit, I find my self not liking the author's decision to twist the focus of this story. The thing that makes Guide unique is the meta story elements. The clear shift away has been ongoing throughout the Drow arc, but Catherine verbalized it here. Unfortunately removing that element simply leaves us with a rather generic low fantasy serial. One that is well written, but in no way unique.

matesbe

Firstly, the setting is definitely High Fantasy, though I understand that's missing the point.

Secondly, I like the shift. Don't get me wrong, I loved that it had so much emphasis on stories, but there's an entire theme of the novel: stories SUCK. Stories is what the Gods use for their little game. Stories are how the Bard manipulates the world so the status quo is maintained. If you want to change the world, truly change it and not just who's who, you need to break the story.

Liliet

My favorite story thread in Guide is armies/people/nations.

Drow were an interesting detour, but given how utterly artificial and fantasy-only everything about their society is, I'm glad to be back to Callowans, Praesi, Procerans and Levantines.

In Dread Crowned 😊

Deviant Loader

Plenty of cheesy platitude moments in this chapter, giving me bad flashbacks of some characters arguing with each other over principles and ideals in other stories and animes.

It may be a needed moment from the actions and main story. And while I don't hate it but I don't like it either too.

superkeaton

Eh. I'll own up to not particularly liking Indrani, nor her relationship with Cat, but this was good. Some healing, some recognition, but without concrete resolution. I can't help but wonder if Killian will ever actually be relevant to the story again as a character, rather than as a reference to the past.

Meredith Leu

typo:

It did not reply, tacitly inviting it to elaborate.

I did not reply

Imrix

I am reminded of a small piece of wisdom I once overheard: Trauma doesn't make you mature. It just makes you traumatised.

Bootmoon

Yay platonic love!

Interlude: Congregation I

"Eighty-four: the only sensible solution to a maze is to not enter the maze."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

His son's back was already a raw, bloody wound but Akil Tanja did not allow his arm to slow or weaken. Lady Aquiline was watching with those cold Slayer eyes, and would take even the slightest hint of mercy as an excuse to cast doubt on the validity of the punishment. The five-tailed whip – Blood's Scourge, men called it, one tail for every founding line – no longer ripped wounds when it struck Razin's back. All there was to be ripped open had been, by now: the Lord of Malaga only sent blood spraying, coating his own arms and face. Only three more, now, until the last had sounded. Fifty one in total. Ten for the Pilgrim and ten for the Champion, those who stood closest to dawn. Ten for the Binder and ten for the Slayer, bloody hands joined in prayer. Ten for the Brigand, warring alone, and one more after that to atone.

With each old verse his hand struck again, until at last it was done. Razin remained kneeling in the snow before the eyes of every captain in the host, half-naked and bleeding. Akil's eldest son had not wept nor screamed, and for that the Lord of Malaga felt a twinge of pride. That he'd remained conscious as well spoke well of his mettle, for the lord had seen older and harsher men break under the scourge.

Much had been lost, failing to take the streets of Sarcella waiting on the other side of the river, but perhaps some things gained as well. Razin could learn, if he lived, and through the savagery that'd just ended the Lord of Malaga had ensured he would. He glanced the Lady of Tartessos, standing surrounded by a ring of steel-clad captains, and she inclined her head in concession after matching his gaze. The undeniable harshness of the flogging had ensured she could not further contest the affair, as he'd meant it to. The Lord of Malaga, Akil Tanja of the Grim Binder's Blood, raised the bloodied scourge he'd tormented his heir with to the sky and a hush fell over the assembly.

"Fault was incurred straying from the light of the Heavens, and from that light no succour will be given," he called out. "Through the flow of ancient blood, let this dishonour be washed away."

Shouts of approval came from Akil's own captains, for Razin's grit in suffering the scourge had redeemed him partly in their eyes, but from the officers of Tartessos there came only cold silence. Those captains sworn to Holy Seljun – in practice, to no one at all – offered only sparse cheers. Too many of their fellows had taken hard losses fighting the Army of Callow for them to be willing to lean towards Malaga over Tartessos openly. Akil passed the red-slick whip to his attendant and resisted the urge to wipe his son's blood from his hands. Razin, brave to the end, tried to rise to his feet and walk away on his own terms. But pain and blood loss had robbed him of the strength and he immediately stumbled. The Lord of Malaga quickened forward just in time to catch him, resting his heir's arm on his shoulder and holding him up.

"Father," Razin croaked. "I-"

"Silence," Akil ordered. "Rest."

He passed on his son to his sworn swords, knowing they would lead him away to a tent far from prying eyes. Honour and law dictated that no priest could tend to wounds inflicted by Blood's Scourge, and no doubt Lady Aquiline would keep watch on Razin to see if either was bent to ensure his son lived. In this, at least, she had been outplayed. Akil had in his service a binder who had studied with the mage-healers of Ashur, and there was no dictate concerning the works of sorcery. An invitation would be made for one of Lady Aquiline's own sworn men to observe the proceedings, to ensure she could not even strike through rumours without dishonouring herself. Akil watched his son being carried away and mourned for the fool of a boy. He had other children, some who like him had been born with the Gift and so held true chance to inherit the Bestowal of their honoured ancestor the Grim Binder. Yet he'd named Razin heir over them even if he was blind to sorcery, or rather because of it. His eldest son felt that absence sorely, and it had lit a flame in him to always seek to achieve more. No other of his get shared that fire, no matter their other talents. But the need to prove himself had made the boy exceed both his authority and capacity, in Sarcella. The scars that would mar his back for the rest of his life might be the lesson he'd needed never to do so lightly again.

Or the failure might break him, and the Lord of Malaga would have to look to a new heir.

"He was not without courage."

Lady Aquiline Osená, of the Silent Slayer's Blood, strode past his sworn swords without a second look and stood by Akil's side to cast a cool gaze at the same boy she'd tried to have killed today. The Osená were reputed to be a taciturn lot though Aquiline had the forked tongue of snake when she put it to use, which was often. The cleverness of a serpent as well. Before the assembly of captains she'd feigned mercy and offered for Razin to be punished only by the rod, pretending it mercy when it was either scheme or murder. Three blows by a wooden rod would have been the due of every captain in the host, if Akil had not instead grit his teeth and himself requested the Blood's Scourge. The captains of Tartessos would have beaten him half to death by themselves, regardless of his private entreaties. And the consequence of making those entreaties to his own captains and those sworn only to the Holy Seljun would have been... dangerous. Forbidding his own officers from striking blows would have been the same as saying the lives of Tartessos soldiers were worth more than theirs, and the unaligned captains would have required either heavy bribes or rough intimidation to agree. The choice would have been, in the end, between effectively surrendering command of the army to Lady Aquiline or letting his son be beaten to death in broad daylight.

And now the same woman who'd schemed this would bandy words with him, when Razin's blood still flecked his father's beard.

"My tolerance has limits, Osená," Akil harshly replied.

"As does mine," Lady Aquiline said, tone cold as ice. "Your whelp lost near four thousand soldiers flailing at the Third Army and nearly got my right hand killed after stealing the command from her. Do not pretend this is of my doing, Tanja. The boy should have died for this outrage and the thorny oaths he passed on to us."

In Levant, it was an old story that the enmity between the lines of the Silent Slayer and the Grim Binder found its source in the hatred those two great heroines had held for each other. Some even said that hatred came from their struggle over the affections of the first Grey Pilgrim, though Akil did personally believe that piece of the tale. The truth was that the bad blood came from over a century of fighting over who should own the lucrative orchards and mines in the valley of Lusia, which was located at the edge of the dominions of both Malaga and Tartessos. The last time there'd been longer than a few months without an honour feud being fought over the valley was under Yasa Isbili's reign, and in those days Akil's grandfather had been young. The Lord of Malaga had not been please to know his own soldiery would fight alongside Lady Aquiline's, but there'd been no other choice. The Marave of Alava took orders from no one, those fucking blustering madmen of the Champion's Blood, and the feuds between the Ifriqui of Vaccei and the Osenia of Tartessos made those of his own line look like playful tussles. The Brigand's Blood saw no dishonour in poison or ambush, as Lady Aquiline's two younger brothers had learned the hard way.

"Honour was restored," the Lord of Malaga briskly dismissed. "Why do you seek me out, Aquiline?"

"Trouble," the hard-eyed woman replied. "I have word from further south."

"Then speak it," Akil said.

The Lady of Tartessos gave their surroundings and meaningful glance, and Akil conceded the point with a nod. To his own tent they moved, leaving swords sworn to either idling in the snow. He made certain to formally offer her hospitality and have her accept it, lest honour allow her to use any words spoken here to her advantage.

"There was a battle in southern Iserre," Aquiline said, once the rituals were seen to. "Hasenbach's twenty thousand marching up from Tenerife met the Spears of Stygia on the field."

Ill news and boon ones, all at once. Akil had never counted on Procerans fools enough to be duped by the League to truly be of use in the battles to come, and that the Stygian phalanx was not following his army was pleasing to hear. Slaves they might be, but the Spears of Stygia had a daunting reputation. If the First Prince's southern army had been crushed however, the situation in Iserre was fast worsening

"Whose victory?" he asked.

"Draw," Lady Aquiline said. "The phalanx bloodied the fantassins but Arlesite cavalry routed Stygia's skirmishers and struck at the back of the Spears. They both limped away with losses but in good order."

Akil would have asked her how she knew this, if he considered it even remotely likely she would tell him. The amount of detail offered was impressive, nonetheless.

"Where are they limping to?" the Lord of Malaga said.

"And there is the trouble," she said. "The Procerans are now two weeks' march behind us. They broke through the Stygian defence."

Akil did not believe that any more than she truly did, by her tone. Procerans were not unskilled at war, for all that his people liked to diminish the worth of their blades. Their foot was match for any of Levant's save perhaps heavy armymen led by Blood, and as a rule their cavalry made sport of the Dominion's if not outnumbered. Which Procerans very rarely were. They were hardly helpless babes, even facing Spears of Stygia, but cracking the slave-phalanxes would have been a bloody toil for anyone. If the twenty-thousand had been in shape for an orderly march this soon, either the Heavens had smiled or the Stygians had let them pass.

"The Tyrant," he said, "is about to turn on us."

This was not unexpected, for the Bestowed ruler of Helike was a dangerous lunatic, but the swiftness of that betrayal was inconvenient. The secret missives detailing the movements of the League's armies and the assistance of the Helikean cataphracts in hunting down the Army of Callow had been well worth what was given in return – reports on the situation in Salia and the war against the Dead King – but it now seemed the offered 'secret alliance' was to come to an end. Of the bargain being revealed, Akil had little worry. He would not have accepted it otherwise. The Tyrant of Helike was breaking the most fundamental of the League's laws by treating with foreign powers, as it was the sole prerogative of his Hierarch. His own allies would turn on him like hungry dogs, if it came out: he'd been at war with most of them a year ago, and that kind of slaughter was not easily forgot.

"We had our bargain's worth," Lady Aquiline said. "We've avoided battle with the League and the cataphracts slowed the Callowan columns. If my second had been left to her command, the Third Army would still be contained in Sarcella instead of days away and –"

"Enough," Akil said. "Razin acted dishonourably, and for that was scourged. But if you intend to insist your Captain Elvera would have beaten the Black Queen, we will settle that claim blades in hand."

The Lady of Tartessos smiled sharply.

"Can the Binder's Blood afford another disgrace so soon?" she said, hand falling to the pommel of her blade.

Akil was unimpressed. She might be over a decade younger, but he was no steel-swinger to be made less by such a thing: he was a binder, first and foremost, from the line of greatest practitioner of that art there ever was. Age was power gained, not lost.

"Test me, Slayer whelp," he smiled back, just as sharp. "See what comes of it."

"A poor host, to offer threat," Aquiline mocked.

"A poor guest, to give me cause," he said.

A moment passed, and if not for the laws of hospitality he thought she might have drawn on him. But honour demanded truce, and so truce held.

"We cannot pursue the Callowans," Lady Aquiline stiffly said. "We must first extricate the Procerans, lest the League kill them all."

Neither of them had seen the need to plainly speak what they suspected. If the twenty-thousand soldiers of the Principate had been allowed to pass, it was so that the armies of the League of Free Cities could encircle all the other hosts marching across Iserre. Such a strategy would have been weakened, if the Proceran host remained behind it and able to strike at its back.

"I would not test the Black Queen without Bestowed at my side, regardless," Akil admitted. "The Peregrine himself sent warning of her power."

The Lady of Tartessos discreetly made the Mark of Mercy with her fingers, as he did, for while she might be vicious wretch even she knew the respect due to the living breath of the Pilgrim's Blood. Even out on the outskirts of the Brocelian Forest it was known that the man who should be the Holy Seljun of Levant was not the one sitting the Tattered Throne.

"Then battle is delayed," Lady Aquiline stated. "Lord Marave must contain the remainder of the Callowans up north and join with the reinforcements from Salia. After we've secured our own Procerans we can all of us together force a decisive clash."

In northern Iserre, Akil Tanja of the Binder's Blood thought. It would end in the furthest reaches of the principality, near the border with Cantal.

"Soon," the Lord of Malaga said.

"Soon," the Lady of Tartessos agreed.

—

The sun was setting over the battlefield, and the Army of Callow was once more victorious.

Parts of it, more accurately, Marshal Juniper thought. The First and Second Army had been reunited under her overall command, along with the Order of the Broken Bells, but the other two columns she'd sent off had yet to arrive. Fortunately, the Legions of Terror under Marshal Grem had bolstered her numbers to the extent that the forty-thousand strong of the Lord of Alava would be reluctant to clash with their allied commands. And this Lord Marave had been, at first, which made the last fortnight of continuous skirmishes rather interesting. In the distance, barely visible now that sunlight was dying a slow death, Levantine archers and slingers were withdrawing in good order. So were the companies of crossbows and regulars that the Hellhound had tasked with simply driving them back, knowing by now there was no point in trying to force a larger battle with the Dominion army. One day out of three, over the last two weeks, the Levantines had aggressively initiated a skirmish and refused to withdraw unless either heavy casualties or a large deployment by the Legions and the Army forced them into retreat.

The Levantine cavalry had attempted a few raids, at the start, before Marshal Grem nailed them with a munition-sown field and Juniper wiped out half their exposed skirmishers with a swift charge of the Order of the Broken Bells. Since that blow the Dominion riders had remained to guard the flanks of their skirmishers. Until today. Grandmaster Talbot had sallied out to turn back a charge that very nearly caught Juniper's supply train by surprise — she now suspected the Levantines had used a last night's snow storm to sneak a few hundred horse ahead of her army and hidden it behind low hills until she approached. In practice there'd been little fighting, for the moment the knights of Callow hit the Levantine horse it had scattered without giving much of a fight. But getting the columns in marching order afterwards had taken most of the afternoon, which she suspected was what Lord Marave had been willing to trade around a hundred cavalry for. This was not a strategy of attrition, she'd made the calculations. In both skirmishes and cavalry clashes, her force came out ahead in casualties by a moderate but noticeable margin. Which meant, she thought, that the Dominion was willing to bleed to slow her down.

Interesting, she thought once more.

The orc began the short trek war council tent she'd left to have a look at the battlefield herself, knowing she would be awaited inside. Banners flew above the cloth pavilion, more than there would have been a year ago. Catherine's own, the silver balance on black that soldiers had taken to calling the Crown and Sword. Yet also the cracked bronze bells of the Order, and the gold Miezian numerals set on Fairfax blue of the First and Second Army. Lone among those, like a crow among birds, Lord Black's personal banner flew the wind. Sheer dark, not a speck of anything else. It was telling, Juniper had thought, that alongside their own banners the Legions in Procer flew the Carrion Lord's and not the Tower's. The inside of the pavilion was warmed by braziers and illuminated by magelights, and for now emptied of the usual swarm of officers that would usually buzz around seeing to one task or another. Inside were seated two people, at the long table covered with the map of central Procer, the only other two who could be considered alongside her to have a real say in how this campaign was conducted now that the Deadhand had gone with the Fourth Army.

Marshal Grem One-Eye glanced up at her entrance and inclined his head the slightest bit. No a tooth bared, of course. As Marshal of Callow she was a peer, not an inferior or a superior, and Grem was famously disinclined to the kind of subtle posturing many of her kind fell into when jostling for dominance among assembly of equals. Mother had spent years trying to get a snarl out of him and never got more than a rare disapproving flash of fangs, Juniper remembered, and the pang of sorrow lingered beyond the span she allowed the memory. The other's eyes remained on the map, the Lady-Regent of Callow frowning as she tried to match words on a letter to some marked location in Iserre. Vivienne Dartwick brushed back a long lock of hair and sighed, the royal seal of the Kingdom of Callow that hung from her neck moving as she did. Juniper moved the chair across the table from her and lowered her frame into it, ignoring the moaning creaks of the wood.

"Milenan must be using a different name than the one our own maps use," the Lady-Regent said. "Otherwise it makes no sense."

"Proceran cartography is famously imprecise," Marshal Grem said.

"Particularly on the subject of borders," Dartwick drily commented.

The other orc's lips quirked, though Juniper was less than amused herself. Dartwick might be convinced she could squeeze Prince Amadis Milenan for information as long as the right prize was dangled, but the Hellhound had doubts on how reliable what they got out of him would be.

"I take it the walk cleared your mind," the Lady-Regent suddenly said, looking up.

"It did," the Hellhound grunted. "I don't think this is about our columns anymore."

One-Eye leaned forward with interest, but it wasn't him Juniper needed to sell on this. Vivienne Dartwick was the one with the last word, these days, much as it irked the orc to even think it. The fact that Adjutant had looked to the Callowan for the final word when Juniper had come forward with the proposal for the Proceran campaign had driven that nail in hard and loud – whatever it was that'd lost the Deadhand yet another hand, it had changed things. And not just, the Hellhound thought, that she was nearly certain Dartwick no longer had a Name.

"Then what is it about?" the Lady-Regent asked, eyes considering.

"This isn't attrition," Juniper said. "They're not winning that fight, not at the casualty rates we're trading."

"They're exhausting us," Marshal Grem noted. "The Legions have been on campaign for most a year now, even for veterans morale is fraying. And a lot of your soldiers are green, Marshal Juniper. They won't hold up as well as Levantine foot under that kind of pressure. It might not matter they have less soldiers, if they have more in fighting fit."

"I considered that," she said. "And there is a sense to it – delay giving battle until they've brought us to the brink, and engage only after my other two columns have been dismantled by their other army."

"But," Dartwick said.

"They're taking too many risks," Juniper said. "That strike with the cavalry, today? That was an escalation in recklessness. I believe we'll see the pattern hold up the longer they're in pursuit."

"The only gain from that was slowing us," Marshal Grem calmly said.

There was a pause.

"You believe there's a Proceran army headed our way," One-Eye concluded. "Through Cantal, most likely, descending toward us following the lakes. We're being softened up before they pincer us."

"I believe they want to win the war in Iserre before the Grand Alliance moves north as a whole," Juniper said. "And to do that they need to force a decisive battle, soon."

"The Tyrant of Helike passed information indicating that most of the principality of Hainaut has fallen to the Dead King," Dartwick frowned. "And the Lycaonese are steadily losing ground."

The boy-king of Helike had been willing to cut a deal offering quite a bit of useful information, after failing to kill Juniper. Mostly useful in how to remain out of the path of the League's armies, but the latest reports out of Salia and the war against the Dead King were of some importance. That he'd asked for detailed assessments of the Proceran and Levantine armies in exchange had been judged an acceptable price by Dartwick, and Juniper agreed. Anything making him more inclined to attack the Great Alliance than them was of some benefit.

"Procer can't afford a long war down here," Juniper agreed. "Attrition, defeat in detail – they'll take too much time. If they're not done here within two months, there's a decent they lose the northern Principate. So they need us crushed, quick."

"And large enough an army to intimidate the League into a truce, if not a treaty," the Lady-Regent murmured.

Marshal Grem peered down at the map, and his face tightened.

"Not one decisive battle," he gravelled. "Two. They smash us up north, smash General Bagram and the Princekiller further south and then link up to face the League."

"We can't keep marching north, then," Juniper said. "We're giving them exactly what they want."

"Then what do you suggest?" Dartwick said, head cocking to the side.

Marshal Grem One-Eye grinned.

"We march back south," he said. "And find out who'll blink first, between us and the First Prince."

erraticerrata

Chapter's out early, as the month's extra chapter will be delayed until tomorrow afternoon.

There's also going to be some changes to Patreon as of tomorrow, for those it may concern!

In a nutshell, at three chapters a week (thirteen chapters a month with the extra) I no longer have the time to take contracts on the side, so the goal for three updates a week is going to be raised to reflect that. Not by a large amount, but enough to ensure I can make ends meet relying on it. There'll also be a Paypal link setup for people who want to make a one-time donation instead of the Patreon model.

All of this will be properly explained in a larger post, tomorrow, this is just a heads-up for the those of you who read the comments.

esryok

Joyous day, the chapter comes early! Take that, all you people out there tracking the average chapter release time!

In other news... go vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

Huh. The Levantines are brutal.
Though, Malaga's probably right that Elvera wouldn't have been able to beat Cat, but I doubt that Elvera would have done worse.

The Tyrant of Helike ... I think I'm going to give up trying to figure out what he's up to and just conclude he should get killed asap.

Vivienne is in the field?

The Army of Callow and the Legions are linking back up and regrouping.

That's going to be fun. For us, and maybe some of them, but not for anybody in their way.

IDKWhoitis

Elvera wouldn't have thought up the Decapitation Strike, so that may have made the battle more brutal for both sides. Although she may have decided to just seige them out instead, which might have meant no battle at all...

stevenneiman

It's worth remembering that even without Razin's final screwup, the battle would have been lost in a night without his pushing so aggressively that they almost won before night fell after Cat returned. If Elvera had been careful and methodical she might have defeated an army that didn't have the Empire Ever Dark coming to reinforce, but she would have just ended up losing without even getting a chance to bloody them.

And if Cat hadn't shown up, Razin's tactics would have been plenty effective even if the Legions were more resistant to a decapitating strike than he expected.

IDKWhoitis

While I agree that Elvera wouldn't have beaten Catherine, I don't think her losses would have exceeded 4,000 and she might not have been bound to such tight oaths (she got a heavier oath than Razin did)

Sylwoos

Uncertain, she might have been too competent and forced Catherine to use/unleash the Mighty, which would have been a blood bath. It's important to keep in mind how much Cat tries to keep the casualty low. Pushing her in a situation where she doesn't have the luxury to do that anymore won't have a pretty outcome.

Hardric62

Concerning the Tyrant... I find this adorable that Akil thinks there are no big risks of the revelation of their deal with him. I can't wait to see his reaction when he proves once again how talented he is for spreading chaos... I'm guessing rumors, not something which can be tied to him, but something that will poison the relationship between everyone as they spread.

spencer

So just to make sure I'm following, Cat is to the south now? Can someone summarize what else we know about the relative positions about all the armies?

Liliet

Well there's an odd thing there where Cat was supposed to be in eastern Iserre but then ran into Nauk who was supposed to be to the west of the fighting.

So that's confusing.

But at the very least, Catherine is to the south of Juniper and Grem.

IDKWhoitis

Anyone else expecting Cat to flank the army behind Jupiter? Like right at the moment they are encircled or something.

Although I feel we might see Hakram before we see the actual battle...

Also, Viv doesn't have a name. Is the Woe as a whole slowly transitioning to a Non-Named Band? Trading meta story and abilities for maximum flexibility?

Skaddx

We have to see Viv interact with another Named. But I mean its not like they never call each other by their normal names.

Ali Khan

Not a bad theory, Indrani just had a massive arc where she accepted her own mortality, Viv's hair is growing, We've yet to see Zeze and Hakram yet but they definitely won't be the same either.

stevenneiman

I suspect that, like Amadeus, Vivienne has lost her previous Name but might gain a new one which fits better. Cat traded a Name for something which comes with direct power and which is also liable to grow into a Name as the Drow develop a culture which can actually support Named. Hakram is probably still the Adjutant, and Masego is presumably more Heirophant-y than ever. His Name grows in power by Witnessing things which test the boundaries of reality, and he just got to see an eldritch horror so terrible than its appearance was enough to kill a (little g) god and destroy a city. Considering the last argument with his parents, I suspect that he will also have some useful abilities tuned to help fight the Dead King.

medailyfun

I'm afraid his main goal now is to find the Dead King's secrets, and try something that his fathers feared

Dainpdf

Cat is likely to get a name that reflects New Callow more than the Drow, in my opinion. She's a priestess to the Drow, yes, but her main motivation is Callow.

Lopen

I think it might even be a name that does both. More than anything she's begun to bind large groups into one force to aim at the Dead King.

ruduen

I'm kind of curious what the odds are of her not having a name, or potentially stumbling into an aspect which ends up concealing her name – especially if a transition occurred.

That being said, until Vivienne shows what she's capable of, that's pretty much speculation. I have little doubt that she'll eventually show what she can do now, named or not.

Skaddix

Though I admit if all the Woe start losing Names for good I will be annoyed. Since you know the main idea of this series as it was originally presented was Named manipulating Stories. And I don't like the idea of moving away from that.

Granted Viv having or not having a name probably changes little. As she noted herself, a non Named could have run the Intelligence gathering operations and she personally didn't have a powerset that was great in battle. Though granted her ability to steal anything was useful in delaying tactics.

Liliet

I would say a shift to continental politics is a very fair trade for Names.

That said, Masego would gain precisely nothing out of losing his Name, he's already had a Meaningful Onscreen Transition.

Skaddix

Yeah I think its more core for Hakram, 1st Named Orc in centuries? millennium? I would be annoyed if he lost it. Whereas with Masego and Indrani it mostly manifest as a key part of their powers which is important since they are powers especially Indrani shine more in battle.

Liliet

Hakram might transition methinks, if he goes more from just following Cat to actually actively doing what he thinks right in politics etc.

But yeah, him being non-Named would not be a good move.

IDKWhoitis

It's already been shown that Non Named are still a force to be reckoned with, and I am of the belief that if another of the Woe transitions to non named, they'll all eventually transition out.

I don't think you need to be Named to manipulate stories. After all, the first stories were created by Non Named anyways, and only through repetition do stories gain weight.

Also, in these insane times of change and upheaval, Names may be a liability, as they limit ways of thinking and possible actions. Non Named are nearly infinitely flexible, and if meta aware, may still catch Named in unfavorable stories.

So Catherine and the Woe may truly signal the death of the Age of Wonders, as realpolitik and institutions overcome the Heroes and Villians.

antoninjohn

The Woe is making a new story and as such they will have new roles in that story

Skaddx

So Tyrant did try to take out Juniper. So the linkup should occur soon.

Sanctus Obscurum

Fifty and one, the young fool bore.
Ten for each founder
And still one more.
This the price of his arrogance
And of his pride
To think he could outwit
The first under the night
No soothing light
His wounds to mend
Though through sorcery
His peril may end.
His blood shall wash clean
The stains of dishonour
That on himself he brought.
Such was the price
Called down on him
By his very own sire
And by sire's hand borne out.
That true vengeance might
Not find him that day
By the thrice striking rods
Of those captains he failed.

Someguy

I swear Levantines are more obsessed with blood rituals than Praesi with less results.

> The Marave of Alava took orders from no one, those fucking blustering madmen of the Champion's Blood, and the feuds between the Ifriqui of Vaccei and the Osená of Tartessos made those of his own line look like playful tussles. The Brigand's Blood saw no dishonour in poison or ambush, as Lady Aquiline's two younger brothers had learned the hard way.

I thought lady Itima of Vaccei, from the second book (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/12/28/interlude-precipitation/>) was from Champion's blood?

sutortyrannus

Well spotted – though I think we can just assume a retcon, given the world-building that's been put into establishing Alava as the seat of the Champion's Blood.

And while we're having a typo thread:

> And this Lord Marave had been, at first, which made the last fortnight of continuous skirmishes rather interesting.

There's a word "interesting" missing, I think.

> The orc began the short trek war council tent she'd left to have a look at the battlefield herself, knowing she would be awaited inside.

The orc began the short trek to the war council tent she'd left to have a look at the battlefield herself, knowing she would be awaited inside.

> If they're not done here within two months, there's a decent they lose the northern Principate.

If they're not done here within two months, there's a decent chance they lose the northern Principate.

Tolk

No Name she says? Lady Regent sounds Name enough to me. Like a Good Chancellor.

caoimhinh

The Regent, seems accurate, the only downside would be losing her dimensional bag (it was from her Hold Aspect, after all) now if she actually takes Callow Chancellor style then she would be Thief of Kingdoms, which would be a pretty badass Name and we already saw there was a lady called the Thief of Stars, so these things can happen. And Viv already stole the Fae Sun once the blade of moonlight from the Spellsword, so she has a good record in stealing grand things.

My theory is that Juniper simply hasn't seen Vivienne doing anything grand and hasn't seen her use her Thief Aspects anymore so she thinks Viv lost her Name when in reality she could have Transitioned.

Valkyria

Anyone else got the feeling that you have to permanently doublecheck with a map to get a grasp on what is happening and what they're all talking about? Or am I the only one this bad with names of places and the distances and locations of those places?

Sugar Roll

I look at it from time to time when troop movements are being talked about. I like visualizing the locations of armies, where they're headed, and who they're facing.

Liliet

Oh, this is definitely the kind of thing you need a map for.

If only we HAD said map.

I mean... I'm very confused about how Catherine, coming from eastern Iserre, ran into Nauk first, when he was going west.

But at the very least the continental map that we do have – yes, that's a very necessary thing to check with.

Valkyria

Well I have no idea where the Callowan army had been gating to initially, but if they started even further east than cat and then went west, cat gating behind them and heading west as well it would be possible.

Also, looking at the map of “political borders” helps, even if there's not many cities on it. what also helps, it got a color code defining who is Lyaconese, Alamans, or Arlesite.

Liliet

Catherine has also said “there is no way Grem would be this far east” and Juniper apparently gated between the northern and southern Levantine armies and yea, erratic's original map with borders and everything is what I use

Valkyria

Hm, true.... Directions would be easier if we knew how far east east is or how far south the southern army was or the northern army north.

I guess it all makes sense. But I've never been good with stuff like this since I build the world kinda in my own head, look at the map and get confused because it's not like in my head and I start mixing those two up and together

Liliet

Yeah, that's a thing.

The simplest resolution is to assume a typo and that Nauk went east, not west.

But also yes distances and speeds could make this possible in the current configuration, IF ONLY WE HAD THOSE.

Valkyria

You could try getting the Tyrant to tell you that, he seems pretty well aware of army movement of pretty much every party in the play. The deal would most likely only cost your soul and everything dear to you but hey, you would know stuff!

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

caoimhinh

Fascinating things shown in this chapter. Levant's inner politics, proud nobles who think they or their men wouldn't lose and do better than everybody else (usual stuff there haha), Tyrant betraying everyone as usual and we got to see Juniper, Grem, and Vivienne, which is cool.

So Tyrant traded the movements of the League's armies and the assistance of the Helikean cataphracts in hunting down the Army of Callow for reports on the situation in Salia and the war against the Dead King from the Dominion of Levant, THEN he traded those reports for detailed assessments of the Proceran and Levantine armies from Callow and showed them the paths they would take so they could avoid Helike's armies. Awesome, he truly is playing with all of them. Hahahahaha

It was already speculated by many in the comments that Vivienne was Transitioning to another Name due to her appearance changing, but Juniper thinking she might no longer have a Name is interesting (though it might just be that since she has a different Name she no longer can do the same she did as Thief so Juniper thinks she lost it due to no longer seeing Viv put things in her dimensional bag), let's see what happens.

Little by little, they are all joining up in Iserre.

Typos found:

- had not been please to / pleased
- gave their surroundings and meaningful glance / a meaningful glance
- Slaves they might me / they might be
- began the short trek war council tent / trek to the war council tent
- No a tooth bared / Not a tooth bared

Mental Mouse

Vivienne doesn't seem to be Transitioning in the sense of Squire->Knight, but she's clearly lost her old name. She may well get a new one – at this point, Cat herself would be in position to “award” certain names such as Viceroy or perhaps Princess. (Similar to how Amadeus awarded Squire to Cat, but she's since learned that stabbing the recipient Is Not Necessary.)

Mental Mouse

I still want to see Vivienne explain to Cat what happened to all the loot she Held.

sutortyrannus

So... just a question.

The Gallant Brigand mentioned in this chapter:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/04/09/prologue-4/> has no tie to the Brigand's Blood mentioned above?

caoimhinh

I'm inclined to say no, since she was implied to be from the Free Cities, not from Levant. Still, Iason only said that she had activities (and probably earned her Name) in the Free Cities, not really specified about her origins, so she could be from that bloodline.

caoimhinh

Just read that chapter to check, Larat said The Gallant Brigand was “Amelia of Helike, daughter of Lasarn” so odds of her being of the Brigand's Blood from Levant are unlikely.

Skaddix

The implication I get is that Named are more common amongst the ruling houses of Levant and that them getting the same Name as their ancestors is rare but not uncommon. However, other Named from other countries can get the Name of one of the Founding Heroes which is rare but not uncommon.

Liliet

Also, given that we know multiple Knights with different adjectives can operate simultaneously (and it's in fact an entire Thing for them to), it's possible that multiple Champions/Binders/Brigands/etc can also exist at the same time.

Skaddix

Yeah the second part tends to be the Class in a RPG. The first part tends to work as the archetype for most names and reflect personality traits.

Mental Mouse

Skaddix: Probably a language issue in your comment: Normally in English we would say "uncommon but not rare", meaning: More often than 'rare', not as often as 'common'. The other way around doesn't work.

But each culture has their own traditions, it's not so unreasonable that the different areas would have Heroes and Villains with overlapping keywords. The Levantines have tried to produce hereditary lines (and noble houses, or vice versa) for several heroes with middling success. But after all there's a lot of varied stories about brigands and the like, so the Levant's Brigand can easily coexist with various Names of other people, Possibly Levant's usage could block nearby cultures from having a plain "Brigand" Name, as people would "know who that was".

Aotrs Commander

Remind me again why the Dead King is the thing the continent all wants to gang up on an not Levant? Because it seems to me the more I see the more I'm convinced that everyone is going for the wrong target...

NZPIEFACE

Cause the religious leader and head of state of the Levant is a Hero. Like super capital H hero.

Fayhem

Because the Dead King is the scariest thing on Calernia barring maaaybe the dwarves, and the Levantines don't have the numbers, the political or military unity, or frankly the troop quality (they seem to be in the range of decent-but-not-amazing and are mostly unblooded) to be a threat to even a single other nation by themselves. Much less to all of them at once, which is where good ol' Neshamah ranks on the Threatometer. Being Blood (and blood) obsessed weirdos doesn't really matter for shit against those facts.

Cicero

"Some even said that hatred came from their struggle over the affections of the first Grey Pilgrim, though Akil did personally believe that piece of the tale."

I suspect this is meant to read "Akil did not personally believe" as that flows a lot better.

Daniel E

For some reason, 'Deadhands' plural just lacks the same kind of menace as 'Deadhand' singular. A single skeletal hand on a villain? That's badass, and backstory. Both hands missing? He had an accident with a butcher's cleaver or something. Also, can anyone explain me to what his reasoning was? I reread that chapter, and I'm clearly not understanding why he was questioning Thief's loyalties.

Interlude: Congregation II

"What do you mean, they 'went around the maze'? Do you have any idea how much it cost us to build that?"

– Dread Empress Malignant I

They weren't even halfway through Brabant when Hasenbach's envoys found them. For all that there were rumours of some strange disruption of scrying down south in Iserre, Princess Rozala Malanza noted that the First Prince's clever mages had no such trouble outside of it – they would not have been so swiftly found otherwise. Not that they'd been trying to hide, but what did that matter when hundreds of thousands of desperate refugees were fleeing south from the armies of the Dead King? Reluctant as the Princess of Aquitan had been to strip so much as a single soldier from the defence of Cleves, there'd been no choice but to ride south with an escort of well-armed horsemen. The sea of people forced away by the advance of the dead were starving and terrified, and Rozala knew well that those with nothing to lose might be willing to take a chance on well-dressed and well-fed travellers. It would have been something of a farce for the three royals heading south to survive the horrors of the war in Cleves only to die to some starveling with frostbite and a hoe. Still, dark as the situation was in Brabant – and no mistake, it was nothing less than grim – it was pleasant dream compared to the war to the north.

Or perhaps it was the other way around, Rozala thought, stirring the contents her goblet with a thin copper rod. Perhaps it was the months she had spent fighting in Cleves that were the nightmare. Gritting her teeth, the dark-haired princess forced her hand to cease shaking and drank the full goblet of brandy tinged with poppy tea. It should calm her enough, she thought, that tonight she would not need to resort to a Hannoven drowse to fall asleep – namely, sleeping with her ear to the floor to be assured she would wake in time if the dead and the damned were digging up from below. The Gods were merciful enough that she had time to begin feeling the effects and put away her affairs before her bodyguard announced Louis. The Prince of Creusens looked as bone-tired as she felt, but he offered her a wan smile and sat by the shutters with her when invited. His eyes flicked to the half-open scroll left on the small table between them, too polite to be caught staring.

“So it was you they wanted,” Prince Louis Rohanon said.

There was no mistaking the broken seal of the First Prince, but instead of replying Rozala unfolded the scroll a little further and let her comrade glimpse the seal that went unbroken at the bottom of the text. The Highest Assembly’s. In time of war Cordelia Hasenbach’s word was law, in affairs military, but having her order seconded by a motion of the Assembly meant disobeying it would have Rozala legally committing treason. She’d be stripped of her title as Princess of Aequitan as well as her rights in the Highest Assembly without any recourse, the vote considered as having already been taken through the initial motion seconding the order. Louis’ eyes narrowed, and his shoulder twitched. The Prince of Creusens was not cut from warrior’s cloth: he was both shorter than her and thinly muscled, with delicate hands. Dark-haired and soft-cheeked, he looked more scholar than soldier. Yet he was also clever, of good sense, and perhaps one of few decent men wearing a crown she had met. The tragedy of his life had been inheriting a principality ravaged by the Great War and finding that the only man willing to loan him the coin to heal it was Amadis Milenan.

The scope of the debt was reputed to be massive, and Louis had admitted to her in confidence it was unlikely to be fully repaid in his lifetime. Amadis had offered to write off a part of the sum should Louis lead soldiers in his support during the Tenth Crusade, and once the horse had been hitched to the cart it had seen the Prince of Creusens dragged through horrors all the way up to Cleves. And back, now, but it seemed they were to walk into a different sort of danger. Louis' shoulder twitched again, and he let out a frustrated breath. Giving in, the prince glanced quickly at the door to confirm it was closed and behind him to be certain there was no one between him and the wall. Three heartbeats after looking, his shoulder began twitching again. Rozala could not think less of him for this – she'd not been in the bastion, when the ghouls had slipped through murder holes and begun slaughtering sleeping soldiers. Prince Louis Rohanon had been, and he was as uncomfortable without his back to the wall as she would be without skin touching the floor. It'd been the breach at Sautefort, for her.

No one had grasped until too late that the dead would not care about tunneling under water.

"I have been named to the supreme command of an army being assembled in Cantal," Rozala said. "By the shores of Lake Artoise. Forty thousand soldiers, perhaps more."

Louis's eyes brightened.

"Reinforcements?" he asked.

"Not to Cleves," she replied. "I've been ordered by Her Most Serene Highness to reinforce the Dominion's armies and break the foreign armies in Iserre."

"Praesi," the Prince of Creusens bit out angrily. "Callowans. That's not the war, Rozala."

"The League as well," the Princess of Aquitan reminded him.

"We should be making peace with all of them," Louis said.

"I don't disagree," Rozala admitted. "But the seals are there, Louis."

"Let's see her enforce that, in the middle of the Dead King's wrath," he said. "Madness."

Yet the truth was, Rozala knew, that neither of them were all that popular at the moment. The attempt by Prince Amadis' supporters – among which they both numbered – to force the Klaus Papenheim's armies to chase after the Carrion Lord had been made known to all of Procer. It'd been framed, no doubt by Cordelia Hasenbach herself, as petty intrigue by the lot of them to attack the elected First Prince while she was sending her own kin to fight the Kingdom of the Dead. In the northern half Procer, save for Cleves where many of them had fought, they were not just a figure of mockery but villains outright despised. If they rebelled, and to refuse the First Prince's order was exactly that, they would not find many allies. More than that, Rozala feared what even the smallest stir of civil war might do to the Principate at the juncture.

"I will go," the Princess of Aequitan said. "Gods forgive me, but I will go. Adeline and Prince Gaspard should be able to hold for now."

"Then I go with you," Louis said.

She inclined her head, too thankful to words to properly convey it. Louis had not fought with his blade, in Cleves, but he had been her steward and seneschal. His ink and orders had been a thousand times more valuable than one more blade would have been.

"We ought to tell Arnaud as well," the prince added. "Last I saw he was drinking himself into a stupor across the street, but he has an iron liver. Odds are he's still awake."

Rozala's lips thinned. Prince Arnaud of Cantal was a rapist, perhaps worse, and an arrogant fool. There was no hiding from that. But none who'd been to Cleves, none of those who'd fought that endless tide of dead smashing against icy shores, would ever be the same again. And Arnaud Brogloise might be filth, but he was filth that'd held the fort at Langueroche alone with his retinue for three days and three nights. He'd fought on foot at the gates, and held long enough for a town of three thousand to flee south. Arnaud knew the stakes.

"Would you fetch him?" Rozala asked.

Louis nodded, poorly hiding his relief at no longer sitting with an unknown at his back. She'd have the table moved for when the three of them sat, the dark-haired princess decided, so he would not be afflicted again. She closed her eyes, for a moment, and felt like cursing. Fighting the Army of Callow or the Legions was not why the three of them had come south. Once upon a time they might have ridden south to scheme how to unseat Hasenbach, but since Cleves? No, not that. They'd come to exhaust their treasuries raising every company they could, contracting every fantassin and emptying every smithy in their lands before they rode back north. Rozala's fingers clenched against the chair as she flinched at a sound that was not there. She was weeks away from the onslaught, now, and still she could hear the sounds in every silence.

The desperate screams of the dying as winged abominations spewed out fire and venom. The biting crackle of dark sorceries as they tore through steel and flesh. And that patient, relentless beat: forward, forward, always forward went the armies of the dead. Without pause or respite or the slightest speck of mercy. The levies and fantassins of Prince Gaspard of Cleves had died like flies in the face of the Enemy, even with Chosen holding the line at the capital's port. When Rozala had arrived with the remains of the army salvaged from the Callowan debacle, she'd found the city of Cleves besieged by a sea of shambling darkness. Yet on the wall, a man had stood with a sword like the coming of dawn.

The White Knight had held the line until reinforcements came, defying all odds.

Three months Princess Rozala had shared command of the defence of Cleves with Prince Gaspard. Three months of an endless span of fresh horrors. Swarms of dead rats scuttling up through the sewers to devour wounded soldiers in their beds, rains of poison and acid, great abominations made from the bones of the thousands serving as moving siege towers that spewed out lesser dead over the walls. Three month of burning your comrades lest they rise again and turn on you, of battles that lasted through entire night and day for the dead simply never tired. But oh, they had taught the monsters the mettle of Procer.

They'd fought on rocky slopes and crawled through freezing mud, they'd sallied out in the howling winds and challenged the Dead King for every scrap of stone and snow. The White Knight and the Witch broke an entire fortress driving back a pack of dead Chosen, until their shore of the Tomb flew only the pennants of Procer. Thousands and thousands had perished for that, clawing at the dark in choking despair, but now along the shores of Cleves forts were being raised by the hands of bloodied veterans and smithies burned through the night to forge the swords that would be bared when the next wave came.

And the front in Cleves, Rozala well knew, had been the easiest.

At Twilight's Pass the hosts of the Lycaonese had fought three battles in two days against the horde trying to force its way out of Hannoven. The same evening, soldiers said, had seen the coronation of three of the Reitzenberg: Prince Manfred of Bremen died of a poisoned arrow leading an assault to take back the furthest fortress of the pass, passing his crown to his eldest daughter and telling her to continue the charge unflinching before drenching himself in oil and taking up a torch. She'd passed it to her younger sister after losing half her torso to sorcery, and that sister in turn passed it to now-prince Otto Reitzenberg when she took a spear in the belly scaling the wall and fell thirty feet in armour.

The youngest of Manfred Reitzenberg's children carried the charge to the end with that blood-soaked iron crown on his head, took back the fortress and held it for half a day before a dead Chosen brought down the walls and forced him to retreat further into the pass. This, Princess Rozala had been told, was the closest thing the Lycaonese had seen to a victory since they'd begun the fight. And still their people headed to Twilight's Pass, streams and rivers of soldiers wearing old mail and iron-tipped spears.

Through the ice and the winds they went to make the same old stand in that same old pass, as they had for centuries. The Princess of Aequitan had mocked these people for their brutishness and lack of manners, once upon a time, for their rough linens and bare-bone homes.

The shame of that remembrance burned her like acid.

In Hainaut, Princess Julienne Volignac lost the entire coast to the dead before the Iron Prince arrived to relieve her. Too long a coast, too few men to defend it and the craggy hills of northern Hainaut made it difficult to march large forces – or defend against many small forces, as the Dead King had sent. When Klaus Papenheim took command he fortified the outskirts of the crags and began clawing them back from the Enemy, battle by battle, but with the shores of the Tomb in enemy hands there was no end to the undead that could cross the lake. The city of Hainaut itself fell to a sudden offensive that broke through the defence lines two months in, and the Iron Prince was said to have taken a wound at the battle.

Princess Julienne herself died charging the dead with her personal guard of three thousand horsemen to buy the time for her people to flee the horde. Her sister Beatrice claimed the crown over the dead princess' too-young sons and swore oath before the entire army that as long as single Volignac remained the Dead King would get nothing of Hainaut but ash and steel. The fight had soon turned desperate after the dead reached the flatlands, for they were harder to defend, but Prince Etienne of Brabant bankrupted himself arming every soul of fighting age in his principality and marched them north to ward off the collapse.

The north of the Principate was fighting for its right to exist with every bitter dawn, and she would not fail it. So Princess Rozala Malanza would hurry south and win the war they shouldn't be fighting, so they could have a chance at winning the one they had no choice to fight.

—

If even one other royal requested a private meeting with Princess Rozala Malanza only to reveal they'd been secretly corresponding with the Tyrant of Helike, she was going to send the head of everyone who had back to Salia in a basket. When she'd arrived to the sprawling camp by the shores of Lake Artoise, what the dark-haired princess had found there was enough to make her blood boil. The more than forty thousand soldiers, half levies and the rest principality troops, she much approved of. It was the royalty coming with the finer soldiers that had her furious. The First Prince, evidently, has tossed every single prince and princess she could find at the army in order to accrue the largest host possible.

The result was a labyrinth of intrigue and petty bickering: including Rozala herself and her two princely comrades from Cleves, there were no less than seven anointed rulers assembled in the camp. Hasenbach's orders had preceded her so there was no contest of her command of the army, but what she encountered was much worse: one at a time, three fools sought her out to proudly inform her of their foolishness. Princess Leonor of Valencis, Princess Bertille of Lange, Prince Rodrigo of Orense. All of which had been trading information with Kairos Theodosian of Helike.

That Rodrigo Trastanes would number among them she'd took a personal insult, for the man was a political ally. He too was one of Amadis Milenan's pack of open supporters, having turned on his benefactor the First Prince last year. The three who'd been dropped on the head enough to make a bargain with the Tyrant of Helike and approach her with the secret she'd stripped of command and sent Louis to keep an eye on, as her appointed second in the army. Rozala would not trust anyone who'd thought it clever to trade information on the location of the Dominion armies in exchange for the same on the Army of Callow and the allied Legions. Not with a command, not with a seat at her council, not with a fucking chamber pot.

That still left Princess Sophie of Lyonis, who the First Prince had quite openly sent there to ensure that Rozala did not take the army and march on Salia to depose her. The ruler of Lyonis was the First Prince's creature body and soul, having murdered her own brother at the Battle of Aisne when he'd tried to betray Hasenbach. For that she'd been rewarded with the crown of Lyonis over her three elder siblings, and remained viciously loyal to the First Prince ever since. The sole comfort of this was that the woman was not incompetent, or a stranger to war. Rozala had no true choice about having Princess Sophie in her council, but she was proving of some use as the mouthpiece of Hasenbach and so recipient of the First Prince's answers.

As in, for example, why it had become so difficult to obtain weaponry and armour in Procer these days.

"You're certain the dwarves won't sell even if we triple the standing price?" Princess Rozala pressed.

The fair-haired Princess of Lyonis shook her head.

"They won't entertain any offer, regardless of the contents," Princess Sophie said. "The First Prince has confirmed it. It was made understood to her that further insistence would be not be taken well."

Rozala almost cursed. The unfortunate truth was that, beyond equipping their own personal troops and keeping an armory that'd provide for perhaps the same amount of armed levies, few Proceran royalty bothered to accumulate armaments. What point was there, when it was possible to hire already-armed fantassin companies instead? If the situation was truly dire for a princess, an order of armaments to the Kingdom Under would provide what was needed as promptly as it could be brought by road from the closest dwarven gate. The Great War had lasted decades and seen a prodigious amount of cheap steel floating around the Principate, to be sure, but much of it had ended up in the hands of already-fighting fantassin companies or since been lost on foreign fields – Callow or the Free Cities. Smiths could not work without metal to work with, and it'd gotten bad enough in some parts of the Principate that the Prince of Orense had privately admitted to her he now had more silver than steel left in his principality. The existing mines simply could not keep up with the rising demand.

"We can fight two, maybe three battles before our levies are left to wave sticks and shout imprecations," Princess Rozala grimly said. "Gods, do the dwarves want us to break in front of the Dead King?"

The Princess of Lyonis eyed her thoughtfully from the other side of the table. If it'd been more than the two of them in the tent, Rozala thought, the conversation would have ended there. But it was only them and maps and mostly-untouched cups of wine, so Princess Sophie broke her silence.

"Her Highness believes it might the work of the Black Queen," she said. "To make our war effort unsustainable."

The Princess of Aquitan felt her fingers clench into fists. She breathed out only after a moment, forcing herself to approach it with cold eye.

"She's a monster," Rozala said. "But not one without reason. She'll want us crippled by Keter, not outright devoured."

"That is the First Prince's opinion as well," Princess Sophie agreed. "Yet there is a possibility we must contemplate: that she struck the bargain with the dwarves blindly, and that she may not return from her journey for months yet. If ever."

Rozala winced. That would be disastrous. It wasn't that the Principate wouldn't be able to wean itself from reliance on the dwarves eventually. It was that it would take years for the mines and foundries to be raised to what was needed, as well as cost a fortune. Procer had neither the years nor the coin required for such an ambitious undertaking on hand.

"Then we make truce with Callow," Princess Rozala said. "I've made my peace with fighting the League, Princess Sophie. The Tyrant has been meddling in our affairs so extensively the Free Cities are out to either take most the south or feed us to Keter."

But Callow? We cannot afford that fight, not with the vultures already circling us."

"An offer of truce was extended by the Lady-Regent Dartwick," the other princess said. "Including withdrawal of the Army of Callow through the northern pass."

Rozala leaned forward eagerly.

"And?" she said.

"It comes at the cost of allowing the Legions of Terror to retreat with them," Princess Sophie admitted. "The overture was declined."

"You can't be serious," the Princess of Aquitan hissed. "I don't care if they butchered half of the heartlands, send the bastards out."

"We've confirmed that if the offer is accepted, there will be rebellion within the month," Sophie said. "It is a certainty."

Rozala almost cursed her out for speaking in absolutes where there could be none, but stilled her tongue at the last moment. Hasenbach, for all her flaws, would not lightly abandon her own native Rhenia to the dead – and that was what she was doing, so long as armies remained fighting south. Which meant she was certain, and there was only one way that could be true.

"The Augur?" Rozala asked.

The other princess nodded.

"You are not to speak of this to anyone," she warned.

The ruler of Aquitan almost rolled her eyes. That Sophie had not been meant for the throne of Lyonis was sometimes quite evident. It was quite gauche in such a situation to speak the words. They were simply understood, between well-bred women.

"How bad?" Rozala asked, morbidly curious.

"Most of the eastern principalities beneath Brabant," the Princess of Lyonis said.

Which would collapse half the Principate, the dark-haired princess thought. Those lands were the most-populated and some of the wealthiest in Procer. Or they had been, before the Black Knight led his legionaries to take them to the torch and the sword. If a peasant revolt sparked there the situation would spiral out of control swiftly. Especially if some prince or princess saw an opportunity to seize the throne while any force that could stop them was stuck fighting up north.

"You've never fought the Army of Callow," Rozala finally said. "So you might not understand exactly what it is you're asking of me. I cannot crush their host without massive losses, Sophie. They're hardened disciplined killers that believe in their cause."

"That has been understood," the Princess of Lyonis said. "Which is why your true instructions were not put to writing."

Rozala Malanza leaned back, brows raising, and waited.

"Win a battle, Princess Rozala," the other woman said. "And if the Callowans and the Praesi should manage to escape in good order towards the passage, afterwards? It is unfortunate, but the League's presence would not allow you to pursue."

So, Rozala was to clasp hands with the Dominion to give the enemy a black eye before letting them slink away. It sat ill with her to toss away the lives of soldiers – badly needed soldiers – for a play in the Ebb and the Flow, but if the alternative was rebellion then she'd swallow her tongue and do what needed to be done. However many died there, it would be a drop in the ocean compared to what would take place if the heartlands broke behind the defensive lines to the north. She drained the rest of her cup, and set to the business of getting her soldiers fed and marching.

—

In peace time it would have been against the laws of the Principate for an army to be mustered in the lands of a prince at the orders of the First Prince without the right being first granted by said prince in front of the Highest Assembly, but these were not peaceful times. Besides, it was in Cantal they were camped and the prince of this land was among her commanders. Prince Arnaud did not balk at providing what supplies he could. It was not as much as Rozala would have liked, but that was understandable given the damage done by the Legions of Terror. More surprisingly, he did so without any of the complaining the Princess of Aquitan had expected. Out of gratitude she began extending him invitation to the war councils that had previously been restricted to Princess Sophie and Louis. To her further surprise, aside from the occasional bout of arrogant bragging he proved to be rather useful. The prince knew his own lands well, and did not balk at emptying his own purse or armouries to strengthen the army. Rozala only understood exactly what was taking place when Prince Louis approached her as she rode ahead of the columns, a mere week away from the Iserran border.

"Rozala," he greeted her calmly, dipping his head.

The Princess of Aequitan slowed her horse – he was not as skilled a rider, and might struggle to keep to her pace – and returned the courtesy.

“Louis,” she fondly replied. “I see you’ve settled the fools well enough to be able to afford a speck of freedom.”

“A prince’s labour is never done,” he drily replied.

That glint of amusement in his russet eyes Rozala would admit, if only to herself, made him attractive in a mischievous sort of way. It was not a thought she could allow herself to entertain. He might be a widower, and she unmarried, but the interests of their principalities were often opposed. To dally without any deeper commitment would cause dangerous scandal, and there could be no true privacy in a war camp.

“Ours certainly is not,” the Princess of Aequitan sighed. “I had counted myself fortunate, that we might never fight the Army of Callow again.”

“Ours are not fortunate years,” Louis said, tone dark, but shook his head afterwards. “Still, we do what we can. It to speak of that I have come.”

Rozala cocked her head to the side, silently inviting him to speak. After so many hours shared they had become more than passing familiar with each other’s mannerisms.

“When do you intend to begin inviting the Prince of Orense to the expanded council?” he asked frankly. “Any longer and the slight will grow too deep, he will become much harder to budge.”

Her brow rose.

“I had not meant to invite him at all,” Rozala admitted. “His dealings with the Tyrant make me wary of his judgement and reluctant to hear any advice from his lips.”

“You don’t need to actually take the advice,” Louis patiently said. “When did Amadis ever take ours? It’s simply a matter of binding him to you. You cannot afford to throw Segovia away if you are to cleanly take the reins. The blunder should make him eager to redeem himself, if anything.”

The Princess of Aequitan almost informed him she had no need of Rodrigo of Orense to run a brothel, much less an army, before she grasped what he actually meant. It was not the army she was leading that Louis was speaking of. He was under the impression that, in Amadis Milenan’s absence, she was usurping leadership of the alliance the Prince of Iserre had assembled. Through those eyes, Rozala thought, the sudden solicitude of Prince Arnaud took a much different meaning. He was currying her favour, much as he had once done Milenan's. For a moment she thought of telling Louis this was not her meaning at all, but her tongue did not move. If she was perceived to have faltered halfway through a coup, her 'supporters' would turn on her without hesitation. And had she not only aligned herself with the Prince of Iserre for lack of other allies in the first place? More than that the man had not gone north, fought in Cleves or Hainaut or Twilight's Pass. If the Callowans released him, would he truly understand? And if they don't release him at all, her mind whispered, who would you trust to take the place of primacy in your stead?

"I am not Amadis Milenan," she finally said, meeting Louis' eyes. "I intend to take good advice, when it is given."

"Then invite Prince Rodrigo to council tonight," the Prince of Creusens said. "And I will begin to approach the other two who disgraced themselves."

"Amadis never convinced them to back him," Rozala said.

Leonor of Valencis had been friendly, but firm in her refusal of closer ties. Valencis and her own Aquitan had warred frequently, over the centuries, but just as often struck close alliances. Princess Leonor was, if she remembered correctly, a cousin in the fourth degree of blood. The ruler of Valencis had been a tacit supporter of Rozala's mother when she'd made a bid for the throne during the Great War, though after the defeat at Aisne distance had been made between their courts to avoid incurring Cordelia Hasenbach's ire. Princess Bertille of Lange was dependent on Salia for much of her principality's trade – and therefore at the mercy of the First Prince's displeasure – but she'd never outright entered the fold of the First Prince's loyalists. She had a reputation for being cold-blooded and of mercenary nature even by Alamans standards. Amadis had simply never found a price that moved her, Rozala had often thought.

"But you are not Amadis Milenan," Louis Rohanon replied, lips quirking. "I will see you at council, Princess Rozala."

He dipped his head again, slightly lower than the first time, and left her to her thoughts.

—

Eight days later, headed into Iserre, the army began to hear fanciful rumours from refugees. Most of them about an army of dark ghosts that left no tracks and spoke no words.

Five days after that, the army began to hear rather less fanciful rumours about a clash between the Army of Callow and a Dominion army. The Callowans and the Wasteland allies fled south, refugees said.

Three days after that, Rozala Malanza found forty thousand Levantine camped on the snowy plains and waiting for her. She rode ahead to meet with their commander, the Lord of Alava, and begin planning the shared offensive.

The moment she truly knew it all had gone to the Hells was when she found the Grey Pilgrim waiting alongside him.

Flobert

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

I was less than 5 seconds late, and you beat me to it! That's just rude.

Nicely done, though.

This message has been seconded.

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Flobert

Sorry dude. I just wanted to it for once. You can have your job back for the next chapter.

DroughtBringer

Nah, you're good.

I was making a bit out of nothing.

Nice job beating me, I tend to spend a bit too much time in my life trying to make sure the link gets there.

(If my last message came off annoyed at all, that wasn't the intent. Sorry if it did) draco2306

So their are currently eight princes in this host i think this quote from book two deserve some considering

"I will take the crown of seven mortals rulers and one, to lay them at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall," especially since that seven in the interlude is in italics

caoimhinh

Yeah. I agree. Seems like the opportunity to take the crowns of those eight princes and fulfill Cat's debt to Larat.

I think this coming battle will be the one called "The Princes' Graveyard" that was mentioned in the extract from 'A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars' by Juniper that was used as the Epigraph of 'Interlude: Commanders', said to be one of the key battles that historians will reference when trying to understand Catherine's methods.

Catherine has mentioned that she needs to beat them while keeping as many soldiers as possible to take North against the Dead King; so it would make sense that she target the commanders. The death of eight of the 23 rulers of Procer would be a blow enough to force the Grand Alliance to accept Cat's terms.

Khytaria

she doesn't even need to kill them, i could imagine some of them would rather part with their crown, than their lives...

stevenneiman

I see a scary possibility here. This was supposed to be a political battle to satisfy the Highest Assembly while still not dealing any real damage to either side, but even if Cat wants the exact same outcome I could easily see it turning into a bloodbath if she started by decapitating the leaders who have the secret orders to turn it into a harmless "victory" where Callow retreats like it already wanted to.

MrMaturity

Remind me, what chapter was that said in? I need to go back and have a read.

Liliet

Book 3 Chapter 35: Questions

Shikkarasu

Interlude: Commanders
30 Aug 2017

By coincidence I had recently read it in my re-re-read

Nairne .01

The funny part is that one of the lords of former summer has reproached Cat about this (I don't remember the exact wording nor who it was, one of the princesses or the queen). Now we have the goddess of night, the first under the night priestess, and prince of nightfall. I wonder, coincidence? Not likely...

Cole

Not to mention Catherine's having Akua make an artifact that appears to be a device to turn day into night.

Aston

I will vote. Thanks for the reminder!

Two ____

Well, we finally see why Hasenbach couldn't send every possible soldier north, although I do wonder why she couldn't tell her uncle the exact reason why.

caoimhinh

It was already known why and Klaus knew it. In fact, Klaus IS north right now, but Cordelia sent him to Hainaut, when Klaus wanted to be fighting in Hannover (his home) which was practically abandoned to their own luck. The Lycaonese are fighting without support in Rhenia, Hannover, and Bremen while the rest of the Principality's troops are focused on Cleves and Hainaut. As for why there are still troops south in Iserre, we already knew since Volume 4 that it was due to Black's Legions ravaging the eastern principalities, and in this volume prologue we saw that the League (or rather the Tyrant's) troops crossed the Waning Woods into Procer, so armies needed to be sent there to face them.

You can check the map here: <https://ibb.co/kPLnQa>

It helps a lot to look at it while checking the principalities mentioned, to gain a better view of where the armies are right now.

danh3107

Damnit Tariq your timing is uncanny, it's almost like you have a choir of angels handling your trave-

Shit

magesbe

So... Prince's Graveyard, anyone?

naturalnuke

Catherine is still looking for crowns.

SpacyRicochet

Ho, crap... you're right. And there are seven in that frakkin' army right now. How much crows was her deal with Larat for? "Seven and one?"

Decius

There's always the option of Callow becoming an anarcho-syndicalist state so that the arch-heretic can add the 'and one' to the pile, and she can then tell the crusading hosts that in order to chase her, they're going to have to march at the Dead King.

plantsbeans

The lat crown is... his own I suppose.

My very own name

Wait a minute. Presence of the Pilgrim means he either left Black with the others or took Black with him, both of which create good opportunities for Black, I think.

Furthermore, I hope he ends up mediating the conflict more than inciting battle.

Oshi

```
...L000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000L
```

Mediating the conflict snort

Will

Like Pilgrim would leave before Saint cuts out Black's soul. He isn't an idiot.

Someguy

>“Oh, we’ll bleed,” the Saint mused. “We’ll lose badly, at first. And then we’ll claw our way back up, inch by inch. Evil always wins at the start, but it’s us who owns the conclusion. And from the ruins something better will rise. This empire’s already a corpse, but we’ll send it off with a pyre glorious enough it’ll redeem the old faults.”

The Proceran army is going to be used as sword fodder. Above seeks the destruction of Procer. Inciting battle IS what Grey Boi is here for.

Liliet

People keep thinking Saint speaks for the entire side of Good.

Why?

Insightful

Because she was having a conversation with the bard before she said that, and the bard is pretty goddamn influential

Cicero

And we know that the Bard plays both sides, and probably has ulterior motives as well.

If anything her right to speak for the Heaves is even more suspect.

Liliet

also this ^

Liliet

Bard is not a major player. She's forbidden direct touch. She's a nudger.

She would have prodded Saint along on Saint's own path, in one specific direction that was already amount her options, not introduced a new option entirely.

Mental Mouse

She's indeed, a "nudger"... but she's a very good one, with millennia of experience and her own expertise over story. Just because she's not a combat or magical powerhouse, that does not mean she "is not a major player."

Liliet

Depends on how you mean it, yeah. My point is just that she didn't order Saint around.

RanVor

She didn't order Laurence around, but she may have "accidentally" given her an idea...

Liliet

Yeah, but again, the idea would have to be already along the lines Laurence was thinking of.

Either way, Bard is even more questionable as a source of the 'will of Heavens'. Just ask Irene and William.

RanVor

BECAUSE SHE FUCKING HAS TO IF HER PLAN IS TO HAVE EVEN A SLIGHTEST POSSIBILITY TO SUCCEED. We have discussed it at least once already.

Liliet

Stop assuming everyone is rational agents acting on complete information!

Yes, we discussed this, and you definitely failed to convince me that there's any reason to think Laurence de Montfort doesn't just have her head so far up her ass she's looking out of the bellybutton! We're talking about a person who responded to a comparison to Ranger by promising to cut off the offender's hand, and considers punching in the head strong enough to knock out for being mouthy acceptable treatment of a prisoner. We're talking about someone who unironically uses the phrase "no truce with the Enemy". Laurence is a murderhobo extremist who's convinced her position is so obviously right she doesn't bother to double check.

Also, her plan is as simple as "lose spectacularly, gloriously and honorably, then count on karma to even the scales". She doesn't even need to do anything for it to succeed the way she envisions it, nor does anyone else (beyond what they were already going to do). She just prevented Cordelia from "making truce with the Enemy", because that would turn a perfectly black and white (in her eyes) situation into shades of grey, and we can't have that, can we?

You're seeing a reasonable logical workable plan where I'm seeing a kamikaze attack she expects to draw the entire continent into.

RanVor

Half of the side of Evil is about to turn on the Dead King. That's a fact, and there's no way the Bard doesn't know about it. So that takes care of the "incomplete information" clause. With Callow, the Legions and the Drow at their side, Procer has a real chance to actually stop the armies of the dead, which is very much not what Laurence wants to happen, and what pretty much every non-Named on the side of Good wants to happen. To prevent it from happening, she needs at least the majority of influential heroes adamantly refusing to accept any kind of truce with Catherine.

Liliet

Bard does.

What does Bard's knowledge have to do with it?

What, is she known for guiding heroes well and sharing full information with them?

RanVor

Because her wanting for Laurence's madness to bear fruit can be logically inferred from what she said to Neshamah ("eat the baby"). And if she wants it to succeed, she will obviously reveal as much information as it is necessary for the plan to succeed, including the fact that there is a giant hole in the underlying strategy that needs to be patched ASAP.

Liliet

So you think she has revealed to Neshamah her real plan, expects him to fully succeed, and has put all her eggs in the basket of him doing what she told him to do?

Uh.

RanVor

As I said, this is a BAIT.

Liliet

Here's the thing: Bard wanting Laurence's madness to bear fruit \neq Bard wanting Laurence's madness to succeed.

Laurence makes a great patsy. She thinks little and reacts disproportionally, she's 'a creature of instinct' as Pilgrim calls it. She's not a strategist. She assumed that after Battle of Camps, no hero will possibly agree to negotiate with Catherine, because she's obviously THE INCARNATION OF EVIL. That's the exact place where the flaw in Laurence's thinking is, and it leads both to her plan and to her assumption that everyone else will not ally with Cat either. A single failure point.

RanVor

It's not a single failure point. It's a number of failure points equal to the number of people not named Laurence de Montfort in Procer.

My point is, if all of this is just relatively harmless raving of a maniac, what were we supposed to gather from that conversation? That Saint is delusional? We knew that already. If she's not a credible threat, the entire chapter just doesn't make sense.

Liliet

"It's a number of failure points equal to the number of people not named Laurence de Montfort in Procer."

Nonono, the failure point in her thinking.

"My point is, if all of this is just relatively harmless raving of a maniac, what were we supposed to gather from that conversation? That Saint is delusional? We knew that already. If she's not a credible threat, the entire chapter just doesn't make sense."

Saint is a credible threat because she's a one-woman army who can and has fucked shit up.

The useful information from that chapter is:

- Cordelia trying her best to prevent that bullshit
- Cordelia's relationship with the House of Light
- Cordelia's opinion on heroes and particularly Laurence (she was not afraid to be in her presence because she recognizes that she doesn't just lash out randomly at rulers and there's always a reason)
- showing us Laurence's personal ideology, which is relevant because she's a major player on her own, being an 'old monster' and all
- giving us a hint at Bard's involvement with this bullshit
- explaining where the Arch-Heretic idea did in fact come from.

All good points for a bonus chapter.

RanVor

Except all of that we had known or suspected already.

Liliet

As is characteristic of bonus chapters!

RanVor

So the conclusion is: the chapter is full of shit.

Liliet

I mean... if you insist?

RanVor

Besides, I strongly believe that if this plot thread was as inconsequential as you claim it to be, IT WOULDN'T HAVE BEEN INTRODUCED AT ALL. Erratic writes better than that.

Liliet

It's not even remotely inconsequential. The Arch-Heretic thing resolves some complications and introduces others. It shifts the playing field in a major way.

It's just not on the orders of Gods Above, nor a remotely reasonable idea.

Probably fits right into Bard's plan though. She be like that.

RanVor

Sorry, but the way it was introduced implies something completely different. If it was just about Cat being declared the Arch-Heretic, the the entire conversation between Saint and Cordelia had no bearing on the plot at all. It didn't even have to be there. The Arch-Heretic plot was already introduced at that point. The Bard's role in that play was all but confirmed. The entire scene amounted to nothing. Unless, of course, it offered us a glimpse of things to come... But Saint is stupid, irrational and has no influence, so obviously everybody will just ignore her and none of this will come to pass, right?

Liliet

First of all let's just collectively remember that Fatalism was a series of bonus chapters. Those weren't main plot interludes.

Second, I am not saying Saint has no influence. I see it as a subplot, with Saint's batshit plan being one more thread in a tapestry of bullshit. She can convince some people to join her cause, she can have some people follow her plan until a better plan presents itself...

Though, now that I think about it, a major subplot probably wouldn't be introduced in a bonus chapter, would it?

RanVor

Good point, although I stopped considering them bonus chapters a long time ago.

Except, you see, this is a binary situation. Either all follow her, or might as well none. If even one influential hero makes peace with Catherine, all is lost for Saint of Swords. She's more dangerous than that and Erratic writes better than that.

Now that I think of it, the average reader doesn't actually need to know the exact reasoning behind what's happening. The essence of the plan is for heroes to be as obstructive as possible, which is something they're already doing, but on a larger scale. I don't think this kind of behavior would surprise anyone except you and maybe a few others.

Liliet

"Either all follow her, or might as well none. If even one influential hero makes peace with Catherine, all is lost for Saint of Swords." She thinks 'no truce with the Enemy' is a self-evident point that Cordelia accidentally lost sight of in the course of politics. This IS her blind spot.

quite possibly a cat

Gray Pilgrim is surprisingly terrible at conflict mediation. To wit, an Evil Faerie Queen came to him asking for his help avoiding conflict via redemption. The Pilgrim promptly told the Evil Faerie Queen that he wasn't going to try because of some petty temporal concerns.

Saint would probably be better as a mediator.

Liliet

>some petty temporal concerns

I cannot believe the lack of reading comprehension involved

BartHumphries

I don't remember this happening. Care to bring me up to speed while castigating the person spreading (mis)information? 😊

Liliet

I have no idea what the word "temporal" means here, but presumably this refers to Pilgrim's refusal to exercise more influence in his faction than he safely can, and his insistence that there's only so much he can do. He agreed to enforce rules of engagement they agreed upon as long as Cat did the same, and was amenable to the idea of trying for long-term changes.

But he did not agree to just wind down the whole Crusade, because it's not up to him and if he tried to make it happen there would be Bad Shit.

"And if I abdicate, can you guarantee that Callow will be left untouched?" I asked. "Will you swear on your Gods that if Procer tries to annex it, you will turn your sword on whoever is trying? Or even that you'll stay out of my way and let me take care of them?"

"I do not rule Procer," the Grey Pilgrim softly said. "And if I take the field against them, too many would follow. It would birth a war as dangerous as this one, in many ways."

(Book 4 Chapter 8: Dialogue) and then

"Peace on your terms would unseat the First Prince," he said. "She has spent years forging an alliance with Levant, fighting her Assembly tooth and nail every step of the way. For that same ally to twist her arm into making a pact with one of the most famous villains alive would see her removed within the month. And everything she seeks to accomplish vanish with her."

I have not the faintest idea how "petty temporal concerns" even begins to describe this tbh.

Liliet

Like, tbh? This was how Pilgrim earned my respect.

RanVor

I can't say that he lost my respect this way, because I didn't have much respect for him to begin with, but his stubborn defense of Cordelia's foolish mistake definitely didn't help his case.

Liliet

If you break everything you've built and start anew every time you make a mistake, you'll never get anything done.

Often it's better to accept the mistake and correct for its effects.

RanVor

And go deeper and deeper into the mess as e everything falls apart around you. Yes, that's definitely the way to go.

Liliet

Sometimes it goes badly.

Sometimes it goes well.

Human beings don't possess perfect advance knowledge of consequences of their actions. They possess heuristics which they then apply to try and arrive at the most likely result.

I like Pilgrim's heuristics.

RanVor

So far Pilgrim's and Cordelia's heuristics managed to successfully plunge the entire continent into a bloodbath and successfully shoot down every attempt to stop it. Good job, very praiseworthy.

Liliet

Yep, the situation went to hell.

But if you have insufficient information, being the most rational rationalist in the universe won't help you.

I like their heuristics. I don't like the situation. But looking at the situation from their point of view, I don't see a lot of things it would be reasonable for them to do differently, with the knowledge and priorities they had.

RanVor

If not for their outstandingly erroneous judgement, the entire situation wouldn't have happened in the first place, but that alone isn't enough to condemn them. Everybody makes mistakes, even though mistakes of most people aren't that disastrous.

However, although it quickly became apparent that they're in deep shit and way over their heads, despite having multiple opportunities to quit with relatively little loss along the way, they kept escalating until they hit the point of no return and now they can neither go on nor quit without massive losses that could have been avoided if they weren't stubborn idiots. There's no way in hell I'm going to overlook that.

BTW, I don't understand why crusading is even still seen as a viable option, considering the success to failure ratio.

Liliet

>despite having multiple opportunities to quit with relatively little loss along the way Elaborate?

Also, crusades afaik were usually undertaken as a means of interrupting the rise of Evil – even if you get beaten back, you still win just because they didn't manage to get what they wanted before the Crusade, too.

Which really illustrates what's wrong with this one, narratively -_-

RanVor

Come on. It's the third day of the argument and you suddenly don't know what I'm talking about?

You know, Neshamah wasn't really doing anything while the Crusades kept hitting him. So either the good guys are morons (which is admittedly very likely), or your assessment of what the Crusades are for is wrong.

Also, I can't help to notice that you somehow manage to condemn and defend the Tenth Crusade at the same time. How's that?

Liliet

I recall at least one of the Crusades against Neshamah starting because he wanted a tribute of children. We have no specific information on others.

And yes, even on the third day of the argument I still don't see where Pilgrim and Cordelia had opportunities to back out without losses.

As for my position on the Tenth Crusade, I'm actually really confused what you're not following about it being complicated?

The Tenth Crusade was something that seemed very reasonable from Cordelia's POV. She knew from Augur that "the Tyrant seeks to end Procer" and extrapolating from her previous knowledge about how Praesi Tyrants behave, figured she was on a countdown before Praes gathered enough strength to actually try to destroy her country martially. On top of that she was also trying to stop the infighting on the Good side and create a treaty for lasting peace, which was also most easily achieved by uniting against a common enemy. Oh look, there is one! And of course she had the problem of many unemployed soldiers in the country after the decades-spanning civil war, which incidentally was deliberately started and kept going by Malicia and only ended right at the start of the story, when Cat meets Black.

All the reasons why the Tenth Crusade was actually secretly not right were something Cordelia didn't know. She did not have the narrative savvy to realize that 'they might be doing something soon' is not a good enough reason for a Crusade, or that having a lot of less abstract incentives to offer her allies in it is a bad thing, not a good thing. I say politics are the same thing as the narrative, but in this particular case what's beneficial politically is sharply unfortunate narratively. Cordelia did not know that Black was working on reforming Praes to make it less Evil. Cordelia did not know that Praes already had access to WMD class shit and was not using it because the Tyrant was not in fact mad with power and aggressive the way it sounded like in Augur's prophecy. Cordelia did not know that the Black Knight was already willing to let Callow claim its independence and cultural identity of Good back as long as the trade ties were kept.

And when she knew all of those things? Oh, it was already too late. It's not a sunk cost fallacy thing, it's a 'stopping a moving train with your bare hands' thing.

She did not know what she did not know. Based on the information she had at any given moment, she was making perfectly rational decisions.

Does that explain my position on Cordelia Hasenbach and the Tenth Crusade?

RanVor

No, not really.

I recommend you to reread my comment, because you have obviously misunderstood some things. I will not explain it again because I'm sick of having to do that all the time. (Tip: I try to word my comments as precisely and literally as possible, except the obviously sarcastic parts.)

Liliet

If I keep not getting your point, maybe you should try to explain again. Just because it's literal doesn't mean it's clear.

Or we can just postpone this discussion to see what Pilgrim is doing :3

RanVor

Sure, it's going nowhere anyway. You still haven't managed to convince me of whatever you've been trying to convince me of (I'm not sure what it was), and you still remain stubbornly oblivious to the fact that Tariq and Cordelia are responsible for this shit. Let's agree to disagree.

Liliet

For now, yeah.

Javvies

This is going to go poorly.

Malanza's supposed to provide a victory against the Army of Callow and then not pursue them on their withdrawal back to Callow.

What the hell's is she supposed to do when she can't provide that victory?

Or what does she do if the Levantines don't play along?

And Pilgrim is involved. Shit. I thought he was busy sitting on Amadeus.

IDKWhoitis

I think Grey may be more understanding of the whole "there's only one true war to the north" deal. And if he says so, the Levs will close ranks behind him, full stop.

Jecherio

Remember the talk between the saint and the first prince? it is not as clear cut as one might think

caoimhinh

And that's why Cat wants to kill the Saint of Sword while keeping Pilgrim alive for negotiation. It's the only combination that allows an alliance.

Agent J

Cat doesn't want to keep Pilgrim alive because he's any more reasonable than Saint. She's keeping him alive because killing the old man would have Levant hunker down out of spite and nothing she ever does or says will move them.

caoimhinh

True, but I just meant that the only combination that allows a negotiation is Saint dead and Pilgrim alive, because Saint won't stop until she is dead and Levant won't stop if Pilgrim is dead.

Liliet

He IS more reasonable than Saint though. He's the one whose goal was continental peace, and his problem was just that Cat was not his best bet for achieving that.

Valkyria

Also, does Cat even want to withdraw right now?

Insanenoodlyguy

That's the true irony of it. I could honestly see Pilgrim and Cat's future conversation having that flavor, he might well be for Cordelia's plan

GP: "Okay Black Queen, we've had a skirmish here, now let me be plain. You wanted peace, well all you have to do is 'retreat' here and we can talk later, I'll swear oath to it."

Cat: "... Nah. That was then. Now I intend to go north."

GP: "well shit."

Liliet

Their direction of retreat would be towards Stairwell though, which is also north.

The real question is, are Catherine's own fae portals also disrupted right now?

Mental Mouse

Given reports of portals opening to planes of Hell, I don't fault her for not investigating that just yet. She's got enough on her plate, with trying to re-unify her scattered armies. Once she does that... well, marching home through a Hell might actually be an option. 😊

Liliet

She was also worried about 'sending up a flare' for Pilgrim and co by making a working as major as a portal. (I'll just take her word on the local effects she's been actively using being less of one)

theothin

She doesn't want to be fighting here. She still wants to grab Amadeus before bailing, though.

Cicero

Simple... cut a deal with the Black Queen to be "defeated" allowing her to set up a pattern of three.

Liliet

only applies to Named rivals, doesn't work like that in any other situation

caoimhinh

Can't set up a pattern of three because A) Cat is no longer Named, B) She is not a Named rival of the Grey Pilgrim. So unless Catherine gains the Name Black Pilgrim or something like that (which she actually might, given the nature of her role as First Under the Night, although I doubt she will be getting a Name anytime soon) she won't get in any pattern of three with Tariq.

Decius

Reclaim the city, loudly declare victory by negotiation, and politely ask Cat if she would please let the dwarves sell weapons to the humans getting killed by the Dead King?

I wouldn't be surprised if the dwarves considered giving superior weapons to people fighting the Dead King to be a worthy investment in preventing Dwarfen casualties.

Mental Mouse

Firstly, remember that dwarf weapons are normally the "cheap" option, goblin steel being better. But... can anybody but Praes and Callow actually get goblin steel anymore? (Maybe the Good troops are normally worse-armed?) And why shouldn't the dwarves save their steel for their own use? We've seen they have mechanical and/or magitech weapons, I bet a lot of steel goes into those.

Liliet

I don't think anyone but Praes ever had access to goblin steel, it's only just Callow getting in on it now 😊

Mennolt van Alten

> Firstly, remember that dwarf weapons are normally the "cheap" option

You know, after what we saw in the everdark I have a feeling that this is because they only sell their equivalent of third-rate weapons that couldn't ever be dangerous if turned back on the dwarves. Their second-rate is probably goblin steel, and I'm willing to bet that what they outfit their heavies with is the best metal on Calernia.

Mental Mouse

Also, Cat can offer an easy way for people to buy dwarven weapons again: Stop fighting her, and she'll return the favor.

Aston

The Pilgrim and Cat might both be insane but acting sane.

First Prince and Dead King?

Hmm...

Great writing EED!

IDKWhoitis

Seeing Grey near a battlefield is like seeing a guy in a NBC suit walking around your kid's school. There's no answer you will hear that will put you in a good and relaxed mood after that.

If anything, you will hear of horrible things that make you regret showing up that day.

Novice

Princes' Graveyard HYPE!

Helirous

Looks like the grey pilgrim is there to make sure their plan to get a token win and then move north is not enacted. As Magesbe pointed out with the Princes' Graveyard happening here, it is likely what the chosen aim for considering their plan involves the wholesale destruction of Procer.

Dresden 67

The Saint's plan involves that.

We have no evidence the Pilgrim even knows about that scheme, much less agrees with it.

Someguy

Oh Saint and Pilgrim are in on the plan. They only play Good Cop Bad Cop in front of Muggle rulers.

Liliet

That does not jive with Pilgrim's behavior.

He and Saint don't have to be in full agreement to work together, working together is what heroes DO no matter what. Remember Vivi's opinion on William's Liesse bullshit?

RanVor

There's no evidence he doesn't either.

Dresden 67

There's loads of evidence actually.

We just saw that the Pilgrim was willing to murder his own nephew to prevent a massive war that would inevitably engulf the continent. The Saint's entire plan is all about expanding the Crusade and burning entire nations to the ground in order to rebuild from the ashes. That is the opposite of the Pilgrim's goal of minimising suffering.

We also know that the Pilgrim believes in Cordelia's goal of creating a permanent Grand Alliance between the Good nations, which doesn't fit the Saint's 'let it all burn' attitude.

He still believes the existing status quo can be salvaged, while she wants to uproot the entire thing.

RanVor

And what can prevent more suffering in the long term than vanquishing the Hidden Horror once and for all? Laurence's questionable rethoric probably wouldn't be able to sway him, but honeyed words of the Bard are quite a different matter. Also, believing in the Grand Alliance and believing in Procer aren't the same thing. He might very well believe that the rebuilt Procer will be stronger guardian of peace in the west than current Procer ever could. Besides, the situation has changed significantly since he last spoke of that.

Dresden 67

Except Laurence's plan didn't really have anything to do with ending the Hidden Horror. If that was the goal she would have gladly made peace with Callow and focused all their efforts on the war to the north.

Instead she ensured the war with Callow would continue. Her plan is to destroy the Principate and then remake it, fighting the Dead King is the means not the goal.

I suppose it is possible the Pilgrim is in on it, but I find it hard to believe he would support a plan that involves so much unnecessary suffering for such uncertain and vague gain.

We'll see soon enough which one of us is correct.

RanVor

As I've recently pointed out, Pilgrim's guiding principle is of rather self-contradictory nature. If killing a thousand to save a million is fair game, shouldn't letting millions die to save billions be fair game too? Where the line is?

The thing with Neshamah is that he can't really lose without winning first. He has amassed so much narrative weight the Fate won't let him be destroyed before he obtains at least a symbolic victory. That's why he avoided such victory for so long. The plan, spelled out quite clearly in Fatalism III, is to bait the forces of Evil (of which the Dead King is the most prominent) to go full Triumphant, destroying themselves narratively in the process. Destruction of the Principate is just a useful side effect.

Mental Mouse

Funny thing, but there didn't seem to be all that much suffering on display in Keter, or in the Dead King's domain of Serenity. (Admittedly, he'd surely consider that his guests would not appreciate such a display.) And DK basically wasn't a problem for the outside world until someone let him out.

RanVor

But Pilgrim has never been to Keter, how is he supposed to know?

Adrian V

I share Malanza's impression at the end, maybe adding well placed "fuck". At leasts we should be getting some more info about black soon.

Euodiachloris

Well, she has the experience.

I hope she doesn't get an actual grave or pyre in the Graveyard. Because some have to come out of this alive and knowing exactly how badly the Pilgrim and Saint screw them over. 😞

Liliet

My favorite Cat ship is back on!

...ok maybe not my FAVORITE favorite but the favorite of the ones that weren't already happening 😊

pagesbe

... The only thing that comes to mind is Pilgrim/Cat, which is just WRONG. Which ship are you talking about?

Javvies

Pretty sure it's Cat and Malanza.

Liliet

lmao no

"Are you trying to seduce your way out of this, Black Queen?"

SilverDargon

...Pilgrim/Shallow Grave???

RanVor

I ship it.

Speerodude

clearly Cat x Dead Proceans

Drunken Dwarf

Well this is wrapping up smoothly. Princes' Graveyard. And man would you look at that, seven mortal crowns and one.

apperatus27

See, now that we know that the Augur is compromised, this whole interaction regarding the truces makes a lot more sense.

Daemion

Please remind me, how is she compromised?

Drunken Dwarf

There is the possibility that the Augur is in on the plot of the Saint/Pilgrim to let Procer fall so Good can rise anew. That or Above decided to skew the Augur's stance with visions where they have to fight.

Dresden 67

I doubt she's actually in on the plan, more likely her information is being manipulated by the Bard.

And again, just because the Saint and the Bard have a plan doesn't mean that other heroes and Choirs are in on it. Good is no more a monolith than Evil.

Liliet

Seriously, yeah.

Stormblessed

Please remind me what chapters we saw the Saint/Pilgrim's plan to let Procer fall to build Good anew. I appear to have forgotten this.

Liliet

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/01/nihilism-iii/>

No indication that Pilgrim is in on it.

Shequi

It's entirely possible that when they get towards Iserre the Augur can no longer see them. Something else is using the sky, and her foretelling ability is entirely predicated on the flight of birds...

Tyrant done screwed her over.

Qwormuli

I still think, that the SpaghettiMcMonster Cordelia is busy prodding awake is a likely cause for the recent magical bullshittery and that everybody blaming it on our resident psychopath is just a red herring, as there is zero concrete evidence about his straight involvement. Not to mention, that that seems to be above his paygrade. But on the other hand, so is most of what he has done and if you already can't explain away half of his hi-jinks without some serious asspulls, why not go all in?

Liliet

Both are possibilities!

My favorite version is that it's all Sve Noc's fault, unwittingly, just for the hilarious irony. Not very likely, but hilarious.

Qwormuli

That would be worth it just for the resulting discussion!

Liliet

I K R

Alex

She's being manipulated by the Bard. Epilogue, Book 4: "The Augur sitting alone in a frosted garden, spoken whispers still echoing in her ears like a coiling snake." Who else can vanish so fast their voice still echoes through the air after they're gone?

Skaddx

Did Hanno get a buff or something? He held the line alone for months apparently. Then he and the Witch similiar to the Ranger took out a whole bunch of other Risen Chosen. Insane.

Pilgrim is back. Looks like heroes are ready to reenter the story.

Someguy

Nah, he probably accessed his Library of Plagiarism to copy someone who done it before.

Skaddx

My point is more he ran out of Stamina in his first fight against Black so fighting that long alone should tire him out but apparently he held the line. And we know Named can die from getting tired out so...it was weird. Copying fighting styles probably don't matter all that much against Hordes until his next fight with the Witch where they fought Risen Chosen.

Javvies

He's a Hero fighting an army of undead monstrosities. That's a straightforward situation, and an entirely different one from fighting Black.

Skaddx

You are missing my point the implication is that Hanno held the wall by himself for months. My point is Named can run out of stamina as shown in Hanno vs Black ergo he should have gotten tired and fallen to the horde. Yes Black was more efficient at sapping Hanno's energy but an endless horde should get the same done even without better combat tactics.

Liliet

I don't think it was for months.

Iconochasm

Why are you assuming he fought for 2+ months straight? It seems likely that the meaning of that line is something like "He was the critical element holding things together for those months" rather than "24/7 Sword Fighting!".

Javvies

Hanno may be an asshat, and not the smartest, but he is a Hero fighting an army of undead monstrosities. It really is kind of his wheelhouse, and is not a situation where someone like Black could play him and game the system against him, and the Dead King, who might be able to do something like that – trying to set up a scenario/story where the Hero died but held out long enough for help to arrive or for a victory to be achieved elsewhere by holding the enemy where he was fighting – probably didn't care enough to do so.

theothin

Wait, why do you think he's an asshat?

Liliet

Well, you see, he opposes the protagonist, and belongs to the side which opposes the protagonist! Even worse, he accepts as an authority a Choir of angels which presumably also, like other Choirs of angels that we've seen, opposes the protagonist!

It's really terrible of him, you see.

Oshi

I think hes an asshat because he so sunk into his shtick he can't see anything around him. He would have been able to kill Black if he did.

Liliet

I think you're exaggerating a lot. Yes, he's not a narrative genius the way Amadeus is, and yes, he failed to predict his bullshit. I don't see how this translates into 'not seeing anything around him' or being an asshat.

FactualInsanity

Considering Hanno an asshat, or not largely depends upon whether you consider his two-face coin shtick divinely inspired impartial judgement, or the coping mechanism of, well, an asshat refusing to take moral responsibility for his actions. It's an extention of the "I was just following orders" problem and how infallible you consider the "higher power" giving those orders to be.

(That's Two-Face as the Batman character, not as in Hanno is two faced.)

Liliet

I mean. I'm. Pretty sure the coin is real. What with. The whole thing with Amadeus attempting to interfere with it being knocked on his ass?

The White Knight opened his palm, and there was a silver coin in it. Amadeus let all other distractions fall to the wayside. The coin spun in the air, one side with laurels and the other with crossed swords. It fell back on the palm, swords up.

The point of the sword went through the roof of his mouth. Amadeus withdrew his bloodied blade and put the full strength of his Name behind the swing, but when he touched the neck it bounced off. Something infinitely larger than him swatted him down and he was thrown down onto the pavestones. They collapsed around him, the ground shaking. Seraphim. His plate was ripped open and he was bleeding from the eyes and mouth. The White Knight was collapsed as well, a mere five feet away, but it might as well have been a mile.

There's like. Absolutely no reason to consider the coin anything other than absolutely real and giving Hanno very real will of the Choir of Judgement.

Also, the coin just answers the question of 'should I kill this person'. Hanno still decides when to ask the question, and so far, we've only seen him ask it about actively murderous villains he was already fighting. And that one time the Proceran nobles asked him to judge their disagreement lmao. That's the only thing he ever did that even remotely approached not the absolutely correct and obvious thing to do in the situation. He doesn't even ask the Seraphim unless he's already certain himself / unless he has been explicitly asked to pass judgement. He is, if anything, surprisingly inoffensive for a White Knight of Judgement.

"Brooding is pointless," Hanno said in tradertalk. "If something distresses you, act upon it. Otherwise you surrender all right to complain."

"So speaks the Choir of Judgement," she said. "Though you're fairly moderate for one of theirs. Most would have executed the upper Secretariat and taken command of the siege after our little tower episode."

"I do not judge," he finally said. "That is not my Role."

Seriously, where do people GET any of this 'two face' 'just following orders' shit? Hanno makes his own calls wrt everything, and he makes good ones. Name one thing he did (like, actually onscreen did, or at least was said to do) that rubbed you the wrong way assbattery-wise.

FactualInsanity

The coin is real, the moral authority of a bunch of eldritch abominations is questionable.

When I say coping mechanism, I don't mean he's delusional.

Also, I'm not saying Hanno is an asshat. Just what causes people to consider him one. Personally I neither like, nor dislike him.

Liliet

So let me just stop you right there and remind you that the society Hanno grew up in considers the Choir, eldritch or not, very much relevant moral authority. Hanno has questioned a lot of his upbringing; he hasn't questioned this bit. Has had no reason to.

Our view from out of universe is very different from the view in-universe.

Mental Mouse

The coin was given him by the angels, so yeah, it represents their influence in any case. But consider also that Hanno is something of a trauma case: He was basically cast out of his own society for refusing to condemn his widowed mother, and in that wrecked state the angels grabbed him with an offer: We can make all those moral conflicts go away..

Liliet

He sought them out, more or less.

Because the religious authority he trusted pointed him in that direction.

Why are people getting mad at Hanno for following his religion properly?

Qwormuli

It's not always just about opposing a protagonist and you know it. While I too have to admit, that I kind of like him, it does nothing to lessen the amount of personal responsibility he is blindly shunting off on an unfeeling, eldritch monster. But yes, personally I think of all of the blind followers of the choirs as either idiots or lower case evil by proxy. From what we have gotten, mercy for example would like nothing more, than a dead and sterile sphere of a planet with the flag of the Attic on it, as that would minimize "suffering"(what they "think" of it, at least). The gained good has never really entered the equation for them. That is also the reason why i buy the final speech of the most notorious (living) monster in the story and why in my head canon the Attic and Cellar both have different Victory conditions for the alleged bet.

Liliet

" personal responsibility he is blindly shunting off on an unfeeling, eldritch monster"

Personal responsibility for what?

What exactly has Hanno done wrong on behest of his Choir?

RanVor

You know, Hanno didn't exactly do a lot of anything onscreen.

It's not really about wrong or right, it's that he doesn't take personal responsibility, period. That really rubs many people (including me) the wrong way.

Liliet

You're not wrong, it was bugging me from the beginning that he was talking about being a weapon of the Choir of Judgement, yet making all the calls himself and only ever asking the angels anything when he already made the decision himself. Like, c'mon dude, for someone who doesn't consider himself competent enough to make calls, you sure are making a lot of them, aren't you?

Oh wait, that's the opposite problem to the one you have with him.

Go figure!

Mental Mouse

Against the undead army, I suspect conservation of Ninjitsu comes into play. In any case, Hanno is and was a top-ranked Hero, up with the Saint and the Pilgrim. His fight against Amadeus really was an even fight that either could have won – Hanno's raw power and library of Light powers, against Amadeus' creative and sophisticated use of his own limited Dark powers... plus the latter's strategic control and story-fu.

caoimhinh

Awesome, a lot of plotlines coming together in Iserre for the coming battle, and this is just beginning.

Princes' Graveyard and payment of Larat's Seven Crowns and One, here we go!

I don't really want Rozala and Arnaund to die yet since they are interesting characters in their own ways, but maybe Cat can take their crowns without taking their lives?

Now we got to see more of Rozala, more mentions of the patient schemer that is Arnaund while people still underestimate him yet seeing him as useful tool. That guy is preparing a coup in Procer and few have realized it yet (so far only Pilgrim, Saint and Cat know of his true nature).

Maybe we will find out more about Amadeus' situation, too. And the plot had yet to move fully to the real war that is raging north.

This is going to be a thrill.

Typos found:

theat / that

Three month / months

It to speak of that I have come / It's to speak of it that I have come

Euodiachloris

There's more than one way to bury a Prince. Like, having their principality go poof from under them. 😊

nick012000

>I don't really want Rozala and Arnaund to die yet since they are interesting characters in their own ways, but maybe Cat can take their crowns without taking their lives?

Ahem.

>She'd be stripped of her title as Princess of Aequitan as well as her rights in the Highest Assembly without any recourse, the vote considered as having already been taken through the initial motion seconding the order.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh, good point. Merely convincing them they need to go north instead of fight her would "bury" eight princes without having to kill one. I doubt it will be quite that clean, but the possibility is there and if eight princes are deposed, a name like Prince's Graveyard still tracks.

RanVor

I have a little problem with this theory, namely that it doesn't sound like something Juniper would consider a great military achievement.

Liliet

Well, according to Juniper, it's historians who point at it as an example of what Cat does.

RanVor

According to Juniper writing a book about Cat's military accomplishments.

Liliet

Yeah.

Author Unknown

The crows of snark have been holding back because they fear being detected, but now GP is here... There will be no hiding from him, so no need to hold back. Time to see what Night can do.

mordered

Calling it, Cat will kill 4 princes then take Rozala's, Arnoud's, Louis' crowns by convincing them to march north, which will see them stripped of their principalities.

konstantinvoncarstein

Am I the only one who is disappointed by Neshama's performance? Not that I want him to win, but he is the most powerful force of Evil (if not most powerful ruler) on the continent. I thought that his victories would be a little more spectacular, with whole principalities already lost.

caoimhinh

Well, Hannover and possibly Rhenia are already lost, the Principate's main host is holding back the Army of Keter in Cleves and Hainaut at the cost of thousands of lives and destroying the environment, even with Heroes backing them, while the Lycaonese are desperately defending Bremen. So there has been a lot of destruction, although I'm pretty sure Neshamah is not hitting them with everything he has, he is aware that reaching too far will only make the Heavens' response be more overwhelming.

SITB

The most horrifying thing about all descriptions of the war up north is that this war isn't really anything special to the Dead King.

He didn't bring his the entirety of his power, he views the existential war about the future of Procer as an attack of opportunity and nothing more.

Mennolt van Alten

I haven't seen any replies to this yet but, Oh my God the Lyaconese are going at it. My appreciation for all those lines about 'harr harr my ancestors held the line against the dead for like forever' have gone up so much is this one chapter, and I love how you show the effects the horrible things the armies of Dead have on the leaders of the armies opposing them!

Interlude: Congregation III

*"We sowers of ruin, straight-backed and proud,
Told them arrant, and arrantly kept our vow:
'No bargain is there, between hunter and flock;
No peace between the rabbit and the hawk.'*

*We sowers of ruin, reaped all that was sown,
For as Mieza's sons toppled our waning thrones,
They arrant said: 'no bargain now, o lords of war,
For no peace can be, between spear and boar.'*

*We sowers of ruin, the reapers that were reapt,
Sing the elder song still, for we must not forget:
No bargain is there, between hunter and flock,
No peace can there be, between lash and orc."*

– "Ruin, Sown", a spoken verse in Kharsum attributed to Yngvild Bittertongue, chieftess of the Red Shields

Lord Yannu Marave of the Champion's Blood felt his scalp prickle. The last time the Lord of Alava's instincts had been screaming this loudly, he'd come within a breath of having his crush skulled by a culebron whose scales he'd failed to notice among the leaves of the Brocelian. Yannu had been a young fool, back then, but raised his shield on impulse and so avoided dying to a whip of the tail so strong it put hammer blows to shame. He could not help but wonder if there was not kinship between the dangers of then and now. A fool was once more about to step on the tail a hidden serpent and die for that mistake. That he now stood at the heart of a great army instead of journeying alone into the deeper barrow-woods to bring honourable deeds to his Blood made little difference. As Yannu's station had risen, so had the dangers accompanying it.

"They're camped here," Moro of the Brigand's Blood said, tapping his finger. "On the other shore of the river."

The heir to Vaccei had gained a few fresh scars, fighting at his mother's side against the Marshals. What had already been a hard face on a hard man was now frightful to behold, the red marks left by goblin steel running jagged through the umber-brown and basil-green face paint of his line. The effect was strikingly attractive, though Yannu was careful not to let his gaze linger. He was over a decade older than the other man, after all.

"The river's called the Odelle," Princess Rozala Malanza noted, frowning as she bent over the table to have a closer look. "As I recall, the source is further east and the depth shallow. It'll be frozen over."

The Princess of Aquitan had been a pleasant surprise, the Lord of Alava thought. No Alamans intriguer, that one, but a hardened Arlesite commander who had already fought the greater of their foes on the field not so long ago. Wild rumours still spread about what had taken place at the Battle of the Camps, but not so wild that the Peregrine had not confirmed some of the lot. The Black Queen, if she had truly returned, would be a fearsome enemy. The part of Yannu that belonged to the Champion's Blood was eager at the thought of measuring his prowess against hers. The part that was the Lord of Alava was wary instead, for it had fought against the Marshals for months and learned they had sharp talons indeed.

"If they have ended their march, then they must believe their eastern columns are close to joining them," Yannu said. "We may be facing as many as sixty thousand eastern legionaries, along with however many there are of these grey ghosts."

"Between our hosts, we have eighty thousand," Princess Rozala said. "And if Lord Tanja makes his way as swiftly as promised with Her Highness' southern army, that's another sixty thousand hitting them from the other side of the river."

"Likely double the enemy's numbers, unless the Black Queen is somehow fielding an army that leaves no tracks in the snow," Moro of the Brigand's Blood said.

Word from Sarcella and Akil Tanja put these grey devil-ghosts at less than twenty thousand strong, though it was said some could wield strange sorceries. Yet they were also said to be no stronger than men, blade in hand, and just as mortal. Poorly armed as well, more tribes than companies.

"We should strike at the Hellhound's camp before the rest of her divisions arrive," Princess Malanza said. "Best for all of us we face that army without Catherine Foundling in it."

"There would be great honour in taking the Black Queen's life," Moro told her bluntly.

The look in the younger man's eyes spoke of esteem lowered for shying away from a worthy struggle. Yannu would withhold judgement instead. The Peregrine and the Regicide had promised they would take the field against the Arch-heretic of the East should she bare her blade, but the Lord of Alava still remembered the stories from the rise of the Barrow Lord. The warring of Bestowed was never kind to their lesser, and the Black Queen was said to be one of the greatest living villains. Even in death she might wreak great slaughter.

"The lucky ones died when the lake fell on their heads, at the Camps," Princess Rozala said, tone calm yet not less sharp for it. "Those that drowned, though? It wasn't as quick. They had long enough to realize there would be nothing to save them."

The dark-haired princess smiled pleasantly.

"Which would you prefer to happen when your turn comes, Levantine?" she asked.

The heir to Vaccei twitched, no doubt reaching for one of the many poisoned blades on his person, but the Arlesite's hand was already on the pommel of her sword. It was never very far from it, Yannu had noticed, and she seemed uncomfortable when it was.

"Enough," he said. "Moro, you would bare a blade on an ally when the Peregrine is among us?"

The man's lips pressed together in disquiet, as well they should. The Pilgrim might not be at this council, but the incarnate soul of Levant had made it clear as rain to all of them that his blessing had been given to the Grand Alliance. To dishonour the living inheritor in Blood and Bestowal of the Dominion's father would be... Even should the Peregrine not take Moro's life, the sheer weight of the shame might see the man slice open his own throat.

"There is nothing to be gained from threats, Princess Rozala," Yannu said, eyes then moving to the Proceran. "We are to fight side by side on this field and more to come."

"Apologies, Moro," the dark-haired woman curtly said, dipping her head.

The heir to Vaccei returned the courtesy, just as curtly. It was for the best that Lady Itima had not been the one given slight to, for the Lady of Vaccei would not have left it at that.

"I stand by my words nonetheless," the Princess of Aquitan said. "We must strike now, before they gather."

"I am reluctant to engage without our full might," Yannu admitted. "The armies of the League are marching towards us, Princess. If they are to try our flank while we face the Marshals then I would have all our soldiery arrayed against the enemy."

Rozala had, amusingly enough, inquired if the Tyrant of Helike had sent envoys to make a bargain with Yannu's host not long after she joined her army with the Lord of Alava's. He'd replied that was indeed the case, and that those envoys could easily be found: the corpses, after all, were still hanging from the personal banner of the Lady of Vaccei. Lady Itima's line had faithfully kept to the hatred the Vengeful Brigand had held against foreigners, and not hesitated to slaughter any sworn to the likes of Kairos Theodosian.

"If we get them to retreat from their camp, we can seize it and close ranks with Lord Tanja's force there before the League arrives," Princess Rozala suggested.

"Or their returning columns could find us engaged assaulting a fortified camp and spring an ambush before Tanja is close enough to reinforce," Yannu pointed out with a frown.

Her insistence puzzled him, for she should well know that the Marshals were capable of plying nasty tricks against opponents made sloppy by haste. Had she not fought the Hellhound herself and come out the lesser captain? The Lord of Alava had lost hundreds to a vicious charge of Callowan knights before learning to keep his own horse close to his skirmishers, and would not go after his foe so brashly again.

"If we lose the initiative we risk this entire campaign stretching out for months," the dark-haired princess reminded him, sounding frustrated.

There it is, the Lord of Alava thought. It had been a rare occasion for all the great captains of the allied armies to hold common council, for both Malanza and he were aware that old enmities would see blades bared should close company be kept. Yet on the two occasions it had, Yannu had studied the princes and princess of Procer. Seen the difference, the subtle currents that ran among them. That Princess Rozala was first among equals was clear, beyond even her right of command, and that the Princess of Lyonis was her appointed warden was just as clear. What had been more interesting, to Yannu of the Champion's Blood, was that even within the Princess of Aquitan's faithful there was more subtle division. The princes of Creusens and Cantal were closer in her trust than any other, and both of those men had... telltale marks. Louis of Creusens had pulled a knife without hesitating on a servant when she'd approached him from behind, halfway to her neck before he stopped himself. Arnaud of Cantal spoke loudly and often, but sometimes also fell into long silences where he moved not a finger. As for Rozala Malanza herself, Yannu had noticed when seated she never crossed her legs. She wore leather boots, and always kept their thin soles squarely against the ground. Like she was feeling for tremors.

All three of these, the Lord of Alava had been told, had gone north to the Principality of Cleves to fight against the armies of the Dead King.

"I was told that the lines in Cleves held," Yannu said, watching the Proceran closely.

Princess Rozala's jaw clenched.

"When the sea pulls back before the coming wave crashes, the shore has not held," she replied. "We bought a month, Lord Marave, maybe two. Our defences will break sure as summer's turn if we wait longer than that. You have not..."

Yannu saw her lips moved in a whisper, counting out in Tolesian. Only after reaching twelve did she resume speaking.

"In Callow I fought fae and dead and villain's wroth," the Princess of Aquitan finally said, voice tight. "Believe me when I say that was a child at play. The Dead King comes for us all, Yannu of the Champion's Blood. And every day we waste warring against mortals the Enemy gains a deeper foothold."

Eyes hard, the dark-haired princess matched him gaze for gaze.

"I've had to claw back that shore from the Hidden Horror's clutches once before," she said. "Gods have mercy, but I do not know if there are enough soldiers left in Procer to do so a second time."

It wasn't the determination he saw in those dark eyes that moved the Lord of Alava. He has seen will in others, and smashed it to bloody pieces when it stood in his way. Mortals failed, mortals broke: a moment of resolution was just that, a moment. It always passed, and more often than not pain and steel hurried that passing. Neither was it the fear, for fear was an old friend to him. Yannu's Blood was meant to strive for fearlessness, for the same reckless courage that was the Valiant Champion's mark, but he had never forgot that day in the Brocelian where a splintered shield might have been a splintered skull. Audacity without patience, without watchfulness, was just another way of being frivolous with lives. Fear was the voice that kept your eyes open when bravery became arrogance, and he would not part from his even for a chance at Bestowal. No, it was the heartfelt belief Rozala Malanza had for her own words. She genuinely believed that the bell might toll for the Principate if they lingered here too long in Iserre.

"Then we march to battle," Lord Yannu of the Champion's Blood conceded.

"It'll be ten days to reach the camp," Moro said, stirring from his silence with hooded eyes. "If we hurry."

"Then we hurry," Princess Rozala grimly replied.

—

They had been, Hakram had to admit, shrewdly outmanoeuvred.

Juniper's dispersion scheme had been solid, and it had certainly worked for the initial stretch of the march. The Third Army had baited the Lord Tanja's host towards the east while the Fourth followed along parallel lines further north in Iserre, both keeping lines of communication open and keeping watch for a sudden march south by Lord Marave's army. What messengers the Fourth Army had been able to receive from the Hellhound's own two columns headed westwards had told them that the Levantine army under Lord Marave was pursuing them while leaving Marsha Grem and his legions to gather themselves. Until then, all had proceeded according to Juniper's predictions: all she had to do was join with the Legions of Terror and force the Levantines back with a minor battle, to create a gap. Then the Third and Fourth Army were to shake off their own pursuit by Lord Tanja and hurry through that gap, assembling the entire allied force together. From there they could begin a fighting retreat to the northern passage, where the garrison under Duchess Kegan of Daoine would be awaiting them.

The opinion of the general staff had been that, considering the League of Free cities was invading from the south and the Dead King hitting northern Procer in force, the Legions and the Army of Callow would not even be hounded all the way through the retreat north. After the Grand Alliance saved face by 'driving out the eastern invaders', they'd been predicted to focus their efforts on containing the League of Free Cities while sending everything they could spare north. It would have been a campaign cleverly salvaged from the unexpected blow of losing the fairy gates when already committed deep in Procer, one fought with minimal losses while cleanly getting out the majority of the Legions of Terror under Marsha Grem.

Instead, the Fourth Army suddenly found its ability to send messengers north to coordinate with the Hellhound cut when a detachment of Helike kataphractoi began roving north of it. The messengers south sent to warn Nauk and the Third Army about League interference never made it, and were found with arrows in their corpses by General Bagram's scouts. Adjutant had pushed for the Fourth Army to immediately move south and join with Nauk before marching north together, and the Fourth's general agreed. One day into the march, however, a messenger from Juniper stumbled bloody into the camp with cataphracts in close pursuit. The First and Second Armies, the man said, had been taken by surprise and scattered when the Grey Pilgrim joined with Lord Marave and struck with miracles. The messenger had been an old subordinate's of General Bagram's, and the seals were in order. Gritting his teeth, Hakram had backed the decision to hurry and relieve Juniper – without a cohesive army to gather around, the legionaries of the First and Second would be hunted down like animals by the Levantine cavalry, scattered across the plains and vulnerable.

Seven days in, the messenger began bleeding out of the eyes and choked on his own tongue. The priests from the House Insurgent saw nothing wrong with him besides the obvious, but the ranking Senior Mage did when the corpse was dissected. A small stone inscribed with runes was dislodged from where it'd been ebed at the bottom of the man's spine, and examination under ritual confirmed the magic involved was illusory in nature. One of the few Soninke among the mage cadres eventually noted the runes had patterns in common with Stygian sorcery, and then it all fell together. They'd been had, the messenger was some poor bastard the Tyrant of Helike's men had captured and tinkered with the memories of discretely enough neither priests nor mages had caught it until too late. A few years back, Adjutant thought to himself, the trick wouldn't have worked. But the Army of Callow had expanded wildly beyond its capacity to field experienced mages, and the native Callowan practitioners that'd been brought in to try to remedy that were amateurs compared to Praesi warlocks. And Stygia's Magisterium, as the success of the deception made clear.

Debate raged among the general staff of the Fourth Army, after that, for most of an evening. Some argued that if the purpose of the ruse had been to isolate the Third Army, it likely had been already destroyed by now. A strike by the cataphracts would likely slow down Nauk's ten thousand enough that the Levantines would surround and destroy them utterly. Those same officers argued that marching south now would essentially mean throwing away another quarter of the Army of Callow for Levant and Helike to defeat in detail. Others suggested that it was the Fourth Army itself that was the target, and the ploy's true nature was that the northern Levantines had let the Hellhound go and were instead marching south to pincer the Third and Fourth while Helike kept them all blind. Some even theorized that First and Second Armies truly had been broken, and this was all the Tyrant's trick to lead them to dismiss the notion and hurry south while the rest of the Army of Callow was annihilated. It was bloody chaos, and not for the first time Hakram wondered at how young their highest rung of officers was.

The veterans brought in from the Legions that'd joined after Second Liesse were keeping it all functional, but there were too many officers who'd gone only through rough training camps before taking up their commission. But General Bagram was no greenhorn, and neither was Hakram himself. The debate ended with the decision to link up with the Third before the situation was further assessed, though careful scouting would be necessary in case the Third Army truly was destroyed and it was a Levantine force south of them. The Fourth Army moved out in good order, and a mere three days in ran into a Helike ambush. Somehow they'd avoided three lines of scouts, and that smacked to Adjutant of either sorcery or Named interference, but the result was brutal no matter the means employed. Three hundred dead, twice that many wounded, and the kataphractoi retreated with less than a score casualties on their side. The entire Fourth Army was boiling with fury at the humiliation, but it was only the first of many assaults to come. On its entire march back the way it'd been tricked marching, the army was relentlessly harassed by Helike. Night and day assaults, at irregular intervals, and in the end General Bagram had to order a fortified camp raised every evening or risk losing entire companies.

It was slowing them down even further, forcing them to end the march earlier in the day and exhausting the legionaries for the effort. Hakram suspected that might very well be the point, and by now was halfway convinced Nauk would be either up to his elbow in Levantines or days dead by the time they arrived to reinforce the Third. If any of it was even left. The anger of that stayed with him, and chased away the need for even what little sleep his body still required. His hours he spent either in talks with the general staff or out on watch with the legionaries. It was maybe halfway to Midnight Bell that he saw the glint of armoured riders in the distance, before even goblins caught it, and he immediately sounded the alarm.

"Shit," Captain Mower cursed, peeking over the edge of the palisade, then added a very absent-minded 'sir'.

The old goblin saw the same thing, and did not gainsay Adjutant when he ordered for crossbow companies to be brought to the fore. And half-companies of regulars too. The cataphracts had yet to try a charge, but that did not meant they would refrain if they saw an opportunity.

"So, what's it going to be tonight," Hakram said, teeth clinking softly. "Fire or exhaustion?"

"Bet you it's fire, sir," Captain Mower said. "Been too long since they tried those pitch arrows."

The goblin spoke the word 'pitch' with the kind of utter disdain that would make a High Lord proud. He was a scout officer, not a sapper, but in Hakram's experience that'd never stopped Eyrie get from looking down at the unprofessional savagery of people not using proper goblin munitions for this kind of work.

"They gain more to less risk by forcing us to wake in the middle of the night then hitting us during the day at peak exhaustion," Adjutant said. "The surprise with the scorpions killed a few dozen last time they got close to the palisade."

"They won't fall for that twice," Captain Mower sighed. "Almost makes me miss Akua's Folly, at least the wights weren't mounted."

"I'd even settle for Dormer," Hakram gravelled. "And the bloody fae could fly."

"That's the Black Queen's service for you," the goblin grinned. "It ain't the Army of Callow if we're not fucked a different way every time."

There was a ring of inexplicable cheers from the rest of the line at that, as the captain had raised his voice to carry. Catherine's popularity with goblinkind never ceased to unnerve him. Robber had once told him it was because she was 'the closest thing a human can get to a Matron, but you know the fun kind of Matron not the other kind, and it sort of helps she'd probably murder the other Matrons given a chance, although let's be honest so would the other Matrons'. It'd been surprisingly coherent, given how much drink his friend had in him by that point. Not that Robber ever answered these kinds of questions by anything other than blatant lies unless he'd been plied with liquor and petty crime first. Pickler wasn't any more of a help, as he'd been the one to inform her of the phenomenon in the first place. She'd never noticed.

"Well now, that's new," Captain Mower suddenly said.

Hakram's attention snapped back to the present. Behind him the thin stripe of regulars was already standing at attention while the crossbow companies formed up behind them and checked their gear. That much was to be expected: they'd had a harder teacher than mere drills to get them to do it all quick and clean. What wasn't expected was the way the Helike cataphracts had stopped about a hundred yards away from the palisade. They were – wait, that wasn't a Helikean. There was a rider between the enemy and the camp, alone. Adjutant's heart stirred, but what brought it home was the sudden shouts of surprise coming from deeper into the camp. A wooden post was snapped out of the frozen ground and alarm sounded again as long wings began beating. A frankly chilling whinny sounded into the night and Zombie the Third took flight, the wooden post she'd been tied to swinging under her hanging by the bridle.

"Not new at all, Captain," Hakram Deadhand grinned, all teeth and malice. "She's back."

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

theart0fwar

[Reserved for some witty comment later]

sutortyrannus

... Is it Brigand or Bandit's Blood?

Is this Erractic separating the line in Levant decisively from the Gallant Brigand mentioned in the Prologue of Book IV?

Or is this meant to illustrate narrative drift, given the distance between Alava and Vaccei?

Or, most likely, is it just a mistake?

Also:

Vengeful Bandit/Brigand

Grim Binder

Silent Slayer

Valiant Champion

Grey Pilgrim

Clearly the first three were new tabletop players and still stuck in their "edgy" phase.

Liliet

>Clearly the first three were new tabletop players and still stuck in their "edgy" phase.

Yes.

WRT Brigand/Bandit, I think Amelia was called both, too. It sounds like they're being treated as synonyms Name-wise.

Cap'n Smurfy

It seems to vary depending on whose speaking. Maybe it changes slightly between languages? People are technically speaking different languages even if it's written in English.

Liliet

Also a possibility!

luminiousblu

In my experience, new tabletop players are the ones who think the Paladin is actually a cool class to play.

Curious Corvid

Paladins are a fun class to play, though. Especially in 5e without alignment requirements.

Oshi

You sir get a cookie. Friggin Paladins...

Rynjin

It is...in Pathfinder anyway, where you're not so MAD you need an overly generous point buy or absurd rolled stats to make it worthwhile.

Skaddx

Nice set up..though quite frankly I could have done with just skipping to Cat and Hakram meeting up again. Lets find out about Masego and get to the fight.

joewill5234

Agreed. This seemed like unnecessary filler. Let's hope the next chapter gets back to Catherine and things start happening.

Gunslinger

EE does like to leave the best moments for Fridays. It makes for a fucking end to the week

Gunslinger

This should have been fucking awesome end to the week lol

Someguy

The Crusaders will be fucked into historical humiliation.

Draeysine

Back in black
I hit the sack

I've been too long I'm glad to be back
Yes, I'm let loose
From the noose
That's kept me hanging about
I've been looking at the sky
'Cause it's gettin' me high
Forget the hearse 'cause I never die
I got nine lives
Cat's eyes
Abusin' every one of them and running wild

Argentorum

I never realized how perfect this song is for Cat. Thank you!

Gunslinger

Aww such a faithful horse our Zombie the Third is.

Liliet

Cat is extremely likable.

Even horses notice it.

Gunslinger

Even dead ones

Mental Mouse

IIRC, Z3 was raised with a mix of Winter power and whatever was left of the Squire name by that point. It's interesting that even after Cat had yet another resurrection and change in power-set, she still has her link to Z3.

Liliet

I think this link is just Zombie the Third liking her personally and having the fae senses to detect her presence.

And any necromancer can control any necromantic construct, in theory.

Euodiachloris

Given the company Zombie 3rd keeps, I'd feel sorry for any two-bit necromancer who tries gazumping the control of our undead fairy horsie.

Because... joke's on them. Also, the wind-up and punchline are to die for. 😊

Weyrwoman

I mean, since Winter was eaten by Night....it's possible that z3 also underwent some kind of metamorphosis? Who's to say Z3 isn't tied to Cat by Night now instead of Winter 😊

Javvies

Wait, what?

Godsdamn it, I'm losing track of what's going on.

But, the knowledge that Cat is back is going to be a serious morale booster for the Army of Callow. And the Legions with them.

Malanza's right. Their priority has to be freeing up all available forces to fight the Dead King. Everything else is essentially a sideshow.

stevenneiman

That's been a running theme throughout the story: everything is a compromise between people who actually understand what's going on and have a sensible idea of how to deal with it, and petty intriguers who would rather squabble with each other than avert their own doom.

Liliet

TBF there's also an added factor of "terrified and confused population unsure of what's going on and steadily growing angry".

Cat has had to deal with it in Callow, now it's Cordy&Co's turn in Procer.

Someguy

Thats only if the preservation of the Proceran state is a priority. If they are going to be used as fodder just for Above to prove a principle of "No Truce with the Enemy"....

fbt

i liked this, and am very much looking forward to what comes next! 😊 I'd missed hakram, and i think we really needed this lens into just how screwed they were w/o cat. A matter of showing rather than telling, and all that. GJ.

IDKWhoitis

Good to see that Night and Winter eating each other didn't get rid of Zombie the Third.

This also bodes, somewhat under some definitions, well for the Hunt too.

muffin

Doesn't make much sense. Why did they took Zombie the 3rd to the battle field?

Liliet

What should they have done instead and why is that the better option?

Someguy

IIRC all of Cat's mounts are stuffed with Goblin Munitions, so it's role is Emergency Mobile Explosive Platform.

IDKWhoitis

Mascot? Catherine Detector? Zombie didnt cooperate with detainment without a Woe or Catherine present? It's not like an actual horse that requires food.

PurplePoring

Gods, it never gets old seeing Cat's enemies sh*tting themselves just thinking about her... And her allies, too.
Our girl has come a long way and paid the long price.

Skaddx

I do wonder when Hanno and Cat will cross paths since its seems unlikely he will be around for this war. Everyone might be on the same side by the time they cross paths.

Oshi

I'm expecting some weird situation where the Hierarch is used as a shield so the mortals can come to a binding agreement that shuts out the gods after which they smash the Dead King.

ALazyMonster

I'm expecting Hanno to go for the coin flip thing and Cat will just disintegrate it and tell him to make his own damn decisions for once. This will of course be followed by him giving up and following Cat's lead.

Liliet

l m a o

Mental Mouse

Cat disintegrating that coin would be a bad idea. Remember what happened when Amadeus tried to interrupt Hanno mid-judgement?

RanVor

Well, Cat does have experience in telling angels to fuck off...

Argentorum

It's not Amadeus' wheelhouse like it is Cat's. Plus, she has a goddess of her own to intercede on her behalf, and we all know how much Crows love grabbing shiny things.

Coin goes up, and Crowmena snatches it out of the air anyone? It'll be grand.

Liliet

What annoys me about this scenario is the idea that Hanno is this naive child who listens to the Choir because of the coin and the minute it's taken away he'll just start listening to someone else.

Hanno is a willful person who knows what he thinks of the world and what he thinks of the world is that he wants to be the White Knight of the Choir of Judgement. He venerates the angels of it as his own choice + his culture and if it's challenged head on he'll respond like any religious person does.

Incidentally he's also a good person who hasn't done a single thing I found fault with so far, interprets his religion in a way that makes him really nice to be around and pleasant and good and useful.

RanVor

Wait a sec. Cat doesn't have Zombie the Third anymore, so who is this?

Liliet

What do you mean "doesn't have"? Zombie the Third wasn't with her. Now we know where she was!

RanVor

I mean somebody has come to the Fourth Army's camp riding Zombie the Third and it sure as hell can't be Cat, so who?

Liliet

"but what brought it home was the sudden shouts of surprise coming from deeper into the camp. A wooden post was snapped out of the frozen ground and alarm sounded again as long wings began beating. A frankly chilling whinny sounded into the night and Zombie the Third took flight, the wooden post she'd been tied to swinging under her hanging by the bridle."

Zombie the Third was tied to a post in Hakram's camp. Cat's on Zombie the Fourth.

RanVor

Ah. Misread then. Sorry.

origamiflame

Or you know, could just be that she's riding a live horse?

Liliet

We know about Zombie the Fourth

caoimhinh

Yep, that's an inconsistency.

It seems EE went back and edited the Ever Dark Arc chapters and deleted any mention of Zombie the Third in them. The last mention of Cat's horse is when they are in Keter. Then Zombie was no longer mentioned again.

But in chapter 6 of this book Cat mentioned she was riding Zombie the Fourth I'm pretty certain that there was a scene of Cat complaining about using a living horse and then later about her new undead horse not having the same intelligence as Zombie the Third

caoimhinh

Interesting chapter, although not much happened, we got to see a bit of the leaders of the other army. Hakram's perspective was the one with more information and shows us once again that Tyrant is playing everyone. That last part of Zombie III announcing Cat's return was nicely done. Things will get fun now; and yes, Moro, the Black Queen is fielding an army that leaves no tracks in the snow, doubting it out actually makes it more likely to happen.

Fun fact about Culebrón: that's a colloquial term in Spanish that means "big snake".

Also, EE actually went back and edited Interlude Precipitation and retconned the ruling line of Vaccei from being of the Champion's Blood to being of the Bandit's Blood, interesting. I wonder if he'll do the same with the inconsistency in Ime's name.

Typos found:

- step on the tail a hidden serpent / the tail of a hidden serpent
- taken place as the Battle of the Camps / at the Battle of the Camps
- when you turn comes / your turn
- (this one happened twice) Marsha Grem / Marshall
- messenger from Juniper / from Juniper
- Hakram's experience / Hakram's experience

Thecount

Also crush skulled should be skull crushed

Agent J

Frankly, I much prefer EE's creative interpretation.

Mental Mouse

I hope EE's also working in the corrections from the comments, if not doing an extra proofreading pass of his own.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't.

I hope he's just working on keeping up the 13 new quality chapters per month... And living the rest of his life. He can get to the typos and proofreading when the series is done.

NZPIEFACE

Holy shit they kept the horse around.

DD

I've heard of skulls being crushed, but a crush being skulled is a new one.

NZPIEFACE

uh what

Ekmo

What, you've never knocked heads with your crush when going in for a kiss?

Baella Hey

Nobody said anything about "crush skulled" yet? That one gave me a triple-take.

superkeaton

Short filler, we already knew about the princes and princess' King Given dispositions, could have done more with Hakram and how he's been.

Liliet

Crying filler now, wait until there's suddenly a need to know who the fuck all these people are and what their relationships to each other are.

Politics aren't filler.

Skaddix

I honestly argue the Hakram stuff is the filler. The Princes and Levant Families are new characters who need some characterization. Hakram seemingly had an apparently uneventful time and we basically just learned stuff Juniper already told us. The only new stuff we got from Hakram is Tyrant now has Stygian Sorcerers on the old payroll and is still playing both sides. Granted I agree overall we could have compressed some of this opening to the Volume.

Liliet

We are also learning the exact why Hakram&Bagram have not been heard from by either army.

samshadar

Catherine's popularity with goblinkind never ceased to unnerve him. Robber had once told him it was because she was 'the closest thing a human can get to a Matron, but you know the fun kind of Matron not the other kind, and it sort of helps she'd probably murder the other Matrons given a chance, although let's be honest so would the other Matrons'.

That's why I love these Goblins so much: They know what's important. xD Honestly, since PGtE, I've gained a new appreciation for Goblins.

Aotrs Commander

The more I see of Levant and Procer, the more I (vainly, I know) hope the Dead King wipes them all out and has a nice little treaty with Cat and/or Malicia afterwards.

Today's contemptable idiocy is "I will, even for a moment, consider that violence is an acceptable response for being told that honour does not dictate battle tactics."

Wow, those guys are all assholes.

Liliet

Dont hold the population responsible for the idiocy of hereditary nobility please and thank you

luminiousblu

As it turns out, this was a historically reasonable way of thinking.

Fayhem

Seriously, what Liliet said. Just because the High Lords/Ladies of Praes are collectively a sack of angry venomous badger/snake hybrids where every snakebadger subscribes to its own flavor of overtly racist superiority complex doesn't mean that the entire population of Praes deserves to be wiped out. The same principle should really be applied to Levant and Procer.

Basically, the people in charge wherever are usually 90% assholes. That actually does not make continent-spanning genocide an appropriate response.

caoimhinh

Well, basically every noble shown so far has been like this one way or the other, even those with good intentions aren't above schemes and petty things to outrank their competitors, even when faced with imminent danger.

High Lords of Praes take the crown for being the most bastards and awful in their pettiness, they are even willing to risk rebellions, civil wars, and invasions simply because they aren't getting as much gold as they expected and because others might rise to a station where they are not treated as Nobles of Callow were also constantly scheming to get positions in Cat's council and attempting to bribe Juniper, even when they all knew the country needed to stabilize and prepare for war, they still kept plotting because they wanted to be the ones to do it (an attitude of "this needs to be done or we all die, but I want to be the one to do it, I'm not letting others do it")

The Secretariat is literally not able to move without filling a form about moving, three times over.

People of the lower Citizenship Tiers in Ashur are looked down by those of the upper Tiers.

The Magisters don't see most of the population of Stygia as people, just slaves to be used and sold (and killed when they start to get old)

The Merchant Lords think everyone can be bought and sold, and believe money puts them above every other people.

Drow call other species cattle and see it fit to kill without even the pretense of an excuse, weakness is sin for them (The worthy take, the worthy rise).

There are exceptions, sure, but the majority of the nobility in every single country shown so far is not above doing extremely stupid and dangerous things out of pride or ambition. So while I agree that they are bastards that deserve a really brutal beating, that still doesn't mean their countries should be fucked over and the population slaughtered. Ironically, the only noble guy we have seen getting a brutal punishment was Razin Tanja due to he making a deal with Cat that ended up saving the troops, but his superiors saw it as a dishonorable deal, they might change their mind when Cat beats them up or kills them, though.

kohael

'Today's contemptable idiocy is "I will, even for a moment, consider that violence is an acceptable response for being told that honour does not dictate battle tactics."'

And specifically, knifing an ally with concealed poisoned blades. For honour.

Daniel E

Zombie the Third is back! ^.^ She is literally the only thing akin to a cool magic item that Cat has allowed herself. Yes, magic always turns on Evil at the worst time, but still. If Cat is to have only a single cool villain thing, I'm glad it's a pet/mount. "Who's a good affront to man and nature? You are!" LOL

Weyrwoman

Cat also has the Mantle of Woe, whose powers are unknown but the cloak has a damn name so clearly something is going on there

Andrew Mitchell

We do know that her Mantle gives her some resistance to magic. But I'm hoping it does more than that by the time book 6 is done.

David Lynch

A cool pet/mount is probably safe to have so long as you don't mistreat it. It's the imprisoned and abused monster that inevitably turns on you. (See: Black during Akua's Folly.)

Liliet

...does Akua count as a cool pet? /thoughtfully scratches chin

David Lynch

Well... we can, in a very strange way, say that she's defected to the side of Heroism... 🤔

Liliet

She's defected to the side of Cat and following Cat and being with Cat and it's not like there's anything better she could be doing with her time ♥

oh and Cat is a hero so following her clearly necessitates following a heroic philosophy and Akua is UP to the challenge of reconciling that with her previous philosophy

JRogue

Have you forgotten about her cloak? It provides some magic protection and contains the soul of a dead enemy. Akua may still turn on her, probably... ok, will, she most definitely will, but the Cloak is pretty damn cool.

Daniel E

Good point. I recall now that even Black said something like 'it's an artifact in the making'.

Mental Mouse

Of course, IIRC he was the one who noted that depending on legendary artifacts is a bad idea. Admittedly, it's unclear whether that applies to the person who created the artifact.

Liliet

I think when you're the person whose legendariness has rubbed off / is still rubbing off on the artifact, you're fine XD

Someguy

Well, it depends on what and for whom the artefact was made for. Or it could go to shit and create a myopic fuckup:-

<https://oots.fandom.com/wiki/Redcloak>

Liliet

I think Akua said that.

Max Scherer

I try really really hard to like this story, but in every book it is just a little bit worse than it is good to really enjoy it. I know i am still reading, but that is mostly, because i invested so much time and want to know how it ends and the universe is pretty interesting. Doesnt makes this more enjoyable to read when there is everytime some who fucks Cat (or her Army) up and she just cant get ahead. She seems to be a step behind and doesnt get a CLEAN FUCKIN VICTORY in 4 and some books.... That is just not enjoyable to read....

crowlute

Correction: Marsha Grem -> Marshal Grem

Chapter 18: Fable

"Some acts only have to be committed once to afterwards echo a threat in your every silence."

– Dread Empress Massacre the First

The Tyrant's soldiers were killing my people.

The cataphracts, when I'd caught sight of them from miles away, had been forming up for a night raid. This was war, I reminded myself. Besides, for all my talk of alliances and bargains with Kairos he remained as much a foe as a friend. No doubt some scheme was afoot, one that involved prodding the Fourth Army into moving some way or other for deeper purpose. Skirmishes against the Levantines, maybe, or to make certain the Fourth did not encounter one of the League's forces. The cataphracts were harassing my legionaries, as they had the Third's, not pulling knives and engaging in struggle to the death. This was no different than Malicia testing the eastern borders of Callow with refugees and warbands, like a villainous cat taking its claws to something to see how it reacted. It would be wisest to chide the Helikean cavalry, slap them on the wrist and send them off to trouble someone else. They'd cased their raid when I intervened, hadn't they? Just the sight of a lone rider had put the charge of sundry four thousand kataphractoï to an end, and as I my valiant Zombie the Fourth cantered forward their ranks bent inwards. They were following orders, obeying one of those fearsome madmen Helikeans had idolized for centuries. I told myself all this, as I bid my mount to stop, and it was enough to stay my hand. Then my mind whispered: the Tyrant's soldiers are killing your people.

My fingers clenched, leather gloves creaking. The Mantle of Woe trailing behind me, stirred by the night's breeze, I watched as a pack of officers under Helike's own banner rode to the fore of the host. Five of them, in weather-beaten armour, blades sheathed at their sides. Their conical, crested helms boasted red ceremonial feathers that jutted like a splash of blood, and beneath the rim of the steel cap two curved strips of steel demarcated their eyes. From those a shawl of mail descended to their chests, the lead officer among them unclasping hers to reveal a scarred mouth.

"Black Queen," the Helikean said in accented Lower Miezan, "I-"

"Kneel," I softly interrupted.

In the silence the followed the word rang like a thunderclap. There was a pause, the breeze raking its unseen fingers on the carpet of snow between us. The officers assembled behind her mouthpiece bridled at the order. Their leader raised a hand.

"We serve the Tyrant of Helike," the woman replied. "And bend before none other."

My staff rose, and with a thunderous snap I brought it down against the wintry ground. The order I had not spoken sounded across the Night like rippling decree, and under the crescent moon's smile the veil we had approached under was ripped away. The banner-sigils jutted out like the masts of a ship in the utterly still sea of Firstborn, fluttering in low murmurs. Red and black and blue, crisscrossed by strokes of silver and gold. Among them two stood higher than all the rest. Ochre inlaid with gold, a rainflower in bloom. Rumena. Purple cut by silver, a tree bearing twin circles unfinished. Losara. Twenty thousand drow stood like statues around Helike's riders, grey skin touched with the colours of their sigils. Fear ripped through the steel-clad killers sworn to the Tyrant, like a sudden and brutal shiver.

"Kneel," I softly said, "or Gods be my witness, I'll kill you all."

Shapes slid across my face, two crows far above gliding far above passing between the moon's cast and my silhouette. Casting razor-sharp shadows as the Sisters smiled against my neck, Andronike humming in approval. She had not forgot the nightmare made of Rochelant, and held no love for those what would serve its maniacal architect. I found their leader's pale eyes, circled by steel, and saw fear spread through them like ink in water. The words that followed were hurried out, and beneath my notice, even as the soldiers began to dismount.

Under crescent moon four thousand kataphractoi knelt in the snow.

"You will stay knelt," I said. "Until I tell you to rise."

Zombie heeded my will and turned around, leaving at an unhurried trot. I left them with their knees to the ground, and went to bring my Fourth Army back into the fold.

—

The cheers began sounding from the palisade when I came within ninety yards. Behind the wooden fortifications the Fourth Army's camp had lit up with fire and fervour both, like an anthill boiling over. Torches lit up, and the wall facing me was pulled open. Within seventy yards I could make out the twin rows of soldiers assembling to make an avenue of steel leading deeper into the Fourth's camp. When I reached sixty yards, a winged shape descended from the sky and landed before me in a geyser of snow. And... wood? What was a post doing — Zombie the Third, bright blue eyes shining with glee, whinnied loudly and trotted up to my side. My lips quirked and I ran my gloved hand down her mane.

"Hello, girl," I murmured. "Missed me, did you?"

The winged horse I had... acquired from the Summer Court through technically blasphemous means sauntered around my current mount, turning around the back and coming close to affectionately brush against my good leg.

"You are a good girl," I praised, patting her neck. "Unless you've been eating corpses again, we had a talk about that."

Zombie the Third neighed, I thought, perhaps a little guiltily. Godsdamnit, I'd told Hakram just because it was occasionally appropriate behaviour for orcs didn't meant he could let my horse do it. The look she cast at Zombie the Fourth — who was a pure necromantic construct, and so about as sentient as his saddle — was less than friendly, too. I cocked an eyebrow.

"Come on," I said, patting her one last time for the road. "We're headed to camp. Just let me take care of that."

There'd been a wooden post tied to her bridle, so I leaned forward to unmake the knot and let it drop. Flanked by my own mount, I resumed my advance. The Fourth Army wasn't one of my old commands, not at its source. It had few officers from the original Fifteenth Legion, and while it'd picked up a few spare tribunes from General Afolabi's now-disbanded Twelfth the general staff had actually been from General Istrid's Sixth, the Ironsides — including the general himself, Bagram. But that was officers, I thought as I approached the open gates. The Fourth Army's bones, not the meat. In the rows and rows of faces most I saw were young and Callowan. Recruits joined before the Tenth Crusade began, or in the months I'd spent in the Everdark. Those who'd never known my armies as part of the Empire even in name. Maybe that was why, when I crossed the gates, swords were bared and raised in salute. A steel avenue, that old honour granted to the kings and queens of Callow.

"HAIL!"

The word sounded defiantly into the night as my soldiers welcomed me home. Once upon a time, I thought as the sound washed over me, it would have been only knights allowed to stand among those rows. But the times are changing. Head high, cloak trailing behind me, I rode to the end of the alley under the eyes of thousands. At the end, two orcs awaited. One I knew from the few conversations we'd had during and after he brought the Sixth into the Army of Callow, General Bagram. The other had me smiling: Gods, it felt like a century since I'd last seen Hakram. He was still stupidly tall and large, like the Heavens had given an old oak leave to walk around. His hand of bone went without glove, in winter and summer both, but his other – wait, what? I wasn't sure what baffled me more, that he'd somehow lost yet another hand or that he'd not bothered replacing it. I brought Zombie to a halt, his sister matching him, and met Adjutant's dark eyes with mine before cocking an eyebrow.

"You know, one is understandable," I said. "Happens to the best of us. But two? That's just careless, Hakram. It's not like you have any more spares."

"I suppose my clapping days are over," Adjutant thoughtfully replied. "And I never did take to the theatre."

There was a pause.

"You made the same damned joke the last time you lost a hand, didn't you?" I sighed.

"It's funnier this time," he told me. "You know, because I'm running out of hands to lose."

Something like a sob of hysterical laughter almost ripped out of my throat, but aware of the eyes on us I kept it locked inside. I still burned with the need to actually hug the bastard, who was showing just enough fang from one side of the mouth to be implying either a taunt or mockery. A moment later I cleared my throat and inclined my head at Bagram.

"General," I greeted him.

"Your Majesty," he gravelled back, offering a legionary's salute. "The Fourth Army is yours."

I glanced back and saw the legionaries still standing with their swords raised. I supposed it was. Zombie moved under my will, turning to face them in full, and my staff rose almost of its own accord. Blades began beating against shield, a ruckus to wake even the dead, and cheers sounded with them. I glanced meaningfully at Hakram, and after dismounting I clapped General Bagram's shoulder and leaned close to tell him I needed to confer with Adjutant. I was led not far from there, to what I recognized to be Hakram's old campaign tent. I followed in the orc, limping at a pace. The inside was sparse, as usual, save for the inevitable piles of scrolls that followed Adjutant like a faithful pack of hounds. Still, it was warm and well-lit so it would do. I'd barely passed the folds when I was swept up in arms like tree trunks, hoisted up off my feet. I laughed and hugged the bastard back, though I slapped his shoulder for the indignity inherent to holding me up like I was some little lamb.

"It's good to see you," I admitted, when finally the brute put me down.

"You as well, Catherine," he rumbled out. "It has been much, much too long."

"I hear that," I muttered.

"Unexpected that you would find us, but decidedly not unwelcome," Hakram said. "The apparitions on the field outside, are they who I think they are?"

"Drow," I confirmed. "Though they call themselves the Firstborn – no, don't ask, it's a lot more complex than I feel like getting into."

The orc hacked out a pleased laugh.

"You brought the drow to the surface," Hakram said, grinning. "First time they came up in force in centuries. Gods be sated, you actually did it – and so many. There must be at least fifteen thousand out there."

"Twenty," I corrected. "The entire expedition in Iserre is fifty thousand strong, though they have their issues. They're headed your way, should be there before dawn. The Third Army got caught down in Sarcella by the Dominion, but they made it out after losing some skin. They're with the rest of the drow."

"The Priestess of Night is our ally, then?" Adjutant asked.

"They're called Sve Noc," I said. "And they're, well, goddesses. More or less."

"You made an alliance with goddesses," Hakram said.

"In a manner of speaking," I said. "You're talking to the current high priestess of Night. Alliance was made, with some strings, but the fifty thousand are here to back us."

Hakram's brow rose.

"The high priestess," he repeated. "Of drow religion. A religion of drow. Presumably for drow. Which, unless I am mistaken, you are not."

"That's the one," I lightly replied.

"What happened to the last high priestess?" he asked.

"There wasn't one."

"And you talked goddesses into this how?"

"I asked real nice," I smiled winningly. "The trick was doing it twice."

"Cat, did you pull a knife on goddesses?" Adjutant sighed.

"Of course not," I replied, offended and technically even saying the truth.

The orc stared at me, saying nothing.

"We have an understanding," I said, a tad defensively. "You wouldn't understand, you're not religious."

"I'm not going to touch that without a bottle on the table and half a day to waste," Hakram muttered.

I snorted.

"You're one to talk," I said. "What happened to your hand? Tell me you weren't just struck with a sharp and urgent need for symmetry."

"Necessary sacrifice," Adjutant said. "You'll understand when you meet with Vivienne."

My brow rose.

"Most likely, yes," I said. "But you're going to tell me anyway."

Flash of teeth, which I identified as implying sheepishness.

"It'll be a long conversation," Hakram said.

I studied him closely. I could press further, but it wasn't needed as far as I knew. And if it was, I trusted he would have told me.

"It'll wait for that bottle with half a day, then," I said. "Talk to me about Masego. I know everything Robber knows, but he said you'd have more."

"He knows more than someone of his rank should, though that is nothing new," Adjutant said. "If you're looking for a location, we do not have it. He was seen in the fields west of the Blessed Isle, but we haven't caught sight of him said."

I frowned.

"But?"

"Before we took the gate into Arcadia," Hakram said. "There was a report through the Observatory – the last we ever got. Liesse is gone."

"The ruins?" I said. "They were destroyed?"

"Gone," the orc said. "As in moved. And we don't know how, or where."

My reflex was to reply that was impossible, especially given the ridiculously vicious wards I'd had put around the still very much dangerous ruins, but then I remembered who had put those up specifically.

"You think he took the city somehow," I said.

"I think he's not in his right mind, since Thalassina," Hakram grimaced. "And that he got his hands on the broken shards of the single most dangerous magical weapon this continent has seen since Triumphant's day. For what purpose, I can only guess."

Well, fuck. This was still salvageable, I had Akua around and she'd know how that monstrosity worked better than anyone – she was, after all, its architect. But until we got a read on how Masego was moving around, this was a sword hanging above someone's head. Whose there was no real way to know, if the disaster at Thalassina had affected Hierophant's mind somehow.

"We need to find him," I said. "Quickly. Do you have any idea what happened to the Observatory?"

"Nothing concrete, same as the gates going wild. We've got a dozen running theories, but the mages keep poking holes in each other's," Adjutant admitted. "About a third of them insist it's to do with the way scrying is blocked in Iserre, the rest are in agreement they are entirely different problems with no relation."

It was, I thought, grim irony that the person most likely to give us an answer about what was going on was the one we needed the Observatory to look for.

"I'll see what Akua can figure out, but she'll only have so much time to spare," I said. "I have her working on something else."

He nodded.

"Archer's safe?"

"Working through some things," I said. "It got... bad down there, Hakram. She had a close call."

I could see his chops move as he ran his tongue against his fangs, the cogs in his head turning as he weighed whether or not now was the right time to ask.

"Bottle and half a day," Adjutant finally echoed.

I conceded with a nod.

"We need to talk with General Bagram," I said. "Lay down some ground rules about the drow, prepare for the Third's arrival. I'll want to know about the state of the Fourth, too."

"He'll be waiting," Hakram said.

"Then let's go," I sighed. "We're wasting moonlight."

"You have four thousand surrendered cataphracts outside, Catherine," he reminded me. "The situation needs seeing to."

"Not surrendered," I said. "I neither offered nor asked. They're considering their sins, that's all."

Adjutant's dark eyes scrutinized my face.

"You're thinking of killing them," the orc said.

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"Some," I admitted. "If I let them go today, they're a blade back in the Tyrant's armory tomorrow."

"Are we to break entirely with the League, then?" he asked.

I grimaced.

"No," I admitted. "There are some interests in alignment."

"Then you cannot commit slaughter," Hakram said.

"Unless you have a lot more supplies than the Third, we can't keep them prisoner either," I flatly said. "Four thousand men and four thousand horses. I suppose we could butcher the horses for meat, but the soldiers? Given what's out there, we don't have the manpower for the guards or the food to spare. Not without shaving it much too close for comfort."

"I fought those riders, Catherine," Adjutant said. "So did the Fourth. And I can assure you, there is no love between us. Not even the fondness of respected foes. But we cannot butcher prisoners of war."

"Butchery? Slight and price, Hakram. One for one," I said. "You have lists of dead, lost to their attacks. So did the Third. I will not let this go unanswered."

"I wouldn't ask you to," Hakram said.

The orc let out a long breath.

"I could tell you that this would set a dangerous precedent," Adjutant said. "That we must be taken as law-abiding actors, if the Liesse Accords are to be signed and held. I could even say that a massacre tonight will be matched by the Tyrant when opportunity comes for him, and we both know it will."

"But," I said.

My closest friend in the world looked me in the eye.

"Weren't we better than this, when we started?" Hakram softly asked.

I did not answer him on the way to General Bagram's tent. I still had not, after those talks were done, when I headed back into the snows.

—

They'd stayed kneeling.

A few had tried to run, deciding to die gloriously with a blade in hand, and their pulped flesh had been splattered across the snow by the Mighty among my host. The rest had remained knelt in the cold and the dark, waiting for the judgement that was to fall upon their heads. They shivered and trembled, for the wind had not grown gentler in my absence, but even as their legs had begun to ache and their fingers had grown rigid for the chill the cataphracts of Helike had endured. Some portion admired them for it, but it was not so large that it was not drowned out by the anger still fuming in my bones. And even that admiration was tainted, for valour in the service of the likes of Kairos Theodosian could only be abused. The Firstborn parted for me without a word as I tread across the snows, come to meet the five officers who had meant to bargain with me. They had withstood their wait, I found, and softly five feathery streaks of red still rose and fell with the breath of the soldiers. My staff touched the ground with measured beat as I limped to them, and when I halted I felt their gazes turn to me. It was the leader among them I turned my own eye to, the woman who'd spoken.

"Your name?" I asked.

"Pallas," she said. "I am a general of Helike."

Letting the agony skitter across my leg, I leaned against my staff and knelt to match her height. I glimpsed vivid pale eyes that lingered between grey and blue, set on a tanned face that was younger than I had thought. Not so young she had not lived, I thought, and not so young that she should not have known better.

"Nine hundred and thirty two," I said. "That is how many of my men yours have killed, between the tallies of the Third and the Fourth."

"They fought well," Pallas simply said. "And bravely."

"They died bravely too," I said, tone sharpening.

I saw in her face, then, the expectance of the blow. Of sudden and merciless death.

"I had thought to kill that many of you," I pensively said. "And then another as well, for the remembrance."

"You would take us all instead, then?" Pallas calmly asked. "If that is so, we will not die kneeling. Vainglorious be our pride, Black Queen, we are kataphractoi of Helike. We do not meet slaughter meekly."

Cataphracts of Helike, I thought. Legionaries of Praes, knights of Callow, fantassins of Procer. The names changed, and the lands matched to them, but in the end it wasn't it the same defiant promise? We are people, it said. You can kill us, but you cannot make us less than that. Funny, wasn't it? How you could offer soldiers praise and a title and they'd make of it something to make the world quake. Not the kind of funny that made you smile, but funny nonetheless.

"No," I said. "The man that serves as my better nature waits in camp, and though his kind knows little of mercy he asked it of me all the same."

"Mercy," General Pallas told me, "will not change our oaths."

In that moment I was no longer looking at a woman kneeling in the snow: it was Helike's own grim visage looking back at me, that ancient city-state that had fought Praes and Procer at their peaks and walked away unbowed. And it had done so on the back of men and women just like the one facing me. Iron-wrought souls gathered to a Tyrant's banner, the victors of a hundred fields.

"We serve a Theodosian, Queen of Callow," Pallas of Helike said, "We do not flinch from doom nor grave, under that banner – or anything else."

I could take that certainty from you, I thought, easy as breathing. Of all my teachers the one who knew least of fear cowed all of Callow with it, and I have since witnessed sights that would have him pale. And part of me wanted to, because nine hundred and thirty two legionaries were dead at their hands. And perhaps these cataphracts were brave and skilled and loyal, but they were treating death as a game while dancing to the Tyrant's tune – and even now remained proud of that truth. I wouldn't even need to speak a word in Crepuscular, to see it all done: under the moon's gaze, when it came to weaving power not even the Tomb-Maker was my match in raw strength. A mere four thousand, kneeling? It would be, as I had thought, easy as breathing. And that gave me pause, because my leg stung and I still remembered the sky opening at the Battle of the Camps and sending down death at impotent Procerans. Some nights I wondered if part of the reason my father had refrained from embracing the paths to power that were a villain's due was because he was afraid of what he might do with it. The kind of person it made you, to look at four thousand soldiers and know that your own hand could slay them in the span of a breath. The kind of person it made you, to go through with it. Hadn't it always been the tragedy of Creation that might ever went to the people least deserving of it? That I could not change, not truly. But I could, at least, act like I was not the Dead King incipient. Like I still remembered what it was like, to laugh and breathe and hurt – what it meant, to snuff out those same things.

"There was once a man, to the far east," I quietly told Pallas. "He was a killer among killers, and among that red number there were none more loathsome. So when he claimed the Tower, Foul was the title he took. Third of his name, and last."

I smiled.

"In the Wasteland they remember him a vainglorious failure, for when he led his armies west the Kingdom of Daoine crushed them all and sent his limbless body back to Ater, along with the head of ever highborn in his host," I said. "Of his duel with the Commander of the Watch and the valour that saw the Deoraithe prevail I could tell you much, but what would it mean to you?"

I tapped my fingers against my staff, hearing the steady beat of do not forget along with the pulsing pain of my leg.

"It is the years after I'll tell you a story about," I said. "You see, Foul did not long survive his return. His successor cared nothing for the man, but there were rules to observe. Two bounties were offered. The first for the head of any Commander, only once claimed in the history of Praes. The second, though? It was for two fingers."

I leaned closer, voice almost a whisper.

"The one that came after was titled Vile, and of that epithet proved well-deserving, but for all that he was not without cleverness," I said. "It was longbows on a wall, that broke his predecessor and so he put coin to unmaking the first of these two. For four centuries following, anyone bringing back the severed index and middle fingers of a Deoraithe was rewarded in gold."

Pallas of Helike went very, very still.

"Yeah, I figured you'd understand," I said. "You're an archer yourself. But a snip of the knife and all that skill, all those years... up in smoke. Can't pull back the string without those, can you?"

"And this," General Pallas replied, "is the span of your mercy?"

"I never claimed my kind of tyranny to be deserving of capital letter," I said. "So you'll keep the fingers, Pallas. But they will be broken, by your own hands, and with them I take every fucking thing that allows you to call yourself kataphraktoi."

The woman's eyes widened in surprise and anger.

"You cannot-" she began.

"Be silent," I hissed. "You ride around slaying my soldiers and abetting a madman's madness when the King of Death is sinking his teeth in the world. You do not get to be indignant, Pallas of Helike. You're a worm in the flesh, and if neither you nor your master can be trusted not to act as the ushers of the end times then you will have to be disciplined."

I rose to my feet, leaning on ebony, and glared down.

"You came here as cataphracts," I said. "And here will stay your horses and arms and armour. Not a single one of you will leave this place with as much as a butter knife."

Breathing out, I met pale eyes and let the slightest part of the fury I still felt slip into my gaze.

"Walk back to your Theodosian, General Pallas," I said. "And give him warning from the Black Queen – if he ever pulls anything like this on my people again, there's room for another soul on my cloak."

In the sky far above crows cawed, the sound of it eerily like laughter.

nextgidea

Spin the tale and spread the fable... Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

James, Mostly Harmless

Guide consistently has more votes than the next two stories, we need another 100 to make it more than the next three!

RandomFan

Good on her to not kill anyone. Good on her to take their equipment. Speaking what remains of 4,000- nearly all of them- into breaking their own fingers, or else forcing them on pain of death... That's villainous, but still more merciful than I think they'd conceptually deserve. Cruel Mercy is the only mercy she can afford; Kind Mercy is ever so much more expensive.

Liliet

It's brutal, but it's the right move in the situation.

Good shit.

Shaerick 68

Every time Catherine does these sorts of things, she further solidifies as one of the best protagonists of all time

Liliet

So many best things about her ♥

KageLupus

It is less cruel mercy and more sound tactics. Killing all of those soldiers would lead to a similar retribution from the Tyrant. It also tell every other player in the war that the Black Queen is willing to slaughter prisoners of war, which is not the kind of PR that Cat needs right now.

Leaving the Hellikeans to go free and unpunished is a non option as well. That just means you have an enemy commander with forces behind you, who doesn't have a reason not to attack you with them.

Stripping the cataphracts and breaking their fingers very neatly solves every problem besides revenge. The Army of Callow has a sudden influx of supplies, the PR engine gets a story of the Black Queen being ruthless but not crossing a line (and who is going to cry when it happens to the Tyrant's forces?), the Hellikeys get to keep their lives but not be a threat to Cat's army, and the Tyrant has to figure out what to do with four thousand wounded soldiers. Healing and outfitting them will take time and resources, and even if he does neither he still has to feed them. If he just kills them all then he is out that many warm bodies while on a campaign where getting reinforcements isn't terribly viable.

This kind of compromise between what Cat needs and what she wants is very much in character with her past actions. But the sheer elegance of the solution really speaks to how much she has grown as a tactician.

Liliet

I would say the 'break their fingers' thing covers revenge too, and not by accident – Cat is deliberately cultivating the reputation of someone you don't want to piss off.

Euodiachloris

It's also villainous in its deliberate irony.

"Play silly games with me to win sarcastic prizes that hit your bottom line in the medium and long term and make you look like a jackass."

Liliet

It's also targeted.

"I extract oaths from the forces of Good. I break the fingers of Tyrant's servants."

usernamesbco

The Tyrant can't even say he wasn't warned, Cat did explode the chessboard.

Cpt. Obvious

Will with time regain full use of their hands. Having them break their own fingers is more making a point than an attempt to cripple them or cripple the army of the tyrant.

Cpt. Obvious

Ignore

stevenneiman

She gets a revenge which is almost as cruel as killing (taking away everything the Helikeans pride themselves on and leaving them to explain their failures and then act as a drain on the man they worship), and she does it without having to feel bad, without making her look unfair or like someone you shouldn't surrender to, and without providing the Dead King any bodies when he gets there.

Jonnnney

Breaking their fingers rather than putting them to the sword is mercy. Forcing them to break their own fingers is cruel mercy

AVR

Breaking the fingers of four thousand people doesn't go down in history or legend as mercy.

Cpt. Obvious

Thing is even without magical healing broken bones will mend, and with just a little knowledge most of the cataphracts

Cpt. Obvious

Will with time regain full use of their hands. Having them break their own fingers is more making a point than an attempt to cripple them or cripple the army of the tyrant.

Nafram

You know, if Kairos were to actually turn into another spirit bound to Cat, and therefore appear much more often, i would be very happy

Skaddx

I am going to assume some good aligned Kingdom is about to have a very bad day. I did say Masego was not going to be helping Cat's Liesse Accords by breaking bread with the Good Kingdoms any time soon. After all Masego and Indrani could care less about the Liesse Accords, Friends and Family sure. Being the best spellcaster or fighter in the world sure by achieving greatness in their chosen field. But continent spanning peace treaties hardly. Blood Demands Blood.

caoimhinh

How likely is it that Masego took Liesse to drop some crazy and really nasty stuff on Ashur?

Flameburst

Very, meaning that it almost certainly won't happen. erraticerrata has been very good about avoiding obvious conclusions

RoflCat

If my theory on him going on a soul searching (literal) adventure for his fathers is true, then him taking Liese might not be so much for the super weapon inside, but for all the weakened boundaries of Creation in there, so he can have an easier time breaching into all kind of Hells looking for them.

Fayhem

Interesting idea! Sounds like the kind of thing a grief-stricken psychologically traumatized Masego could potentially think of as a good idea; I'd have to imagine he'd swing by the Observatory to grab the Sahelian artifact first, though ofc with scrying down we don't actually know he hasn't. Although IIRC at least per the presently-existing rules of the setting that would only be even conceptually possible for Warlock and not Tikoloshe though. As I recall it devils don't "die" per se, but their essence or whatever gets dispersed and when it recoalesces zero memories or other developed personality traits get carried over. Functionally the same as death, but without any theoretically-intact "soul" type thing that could hypothetically be retrieved from wherever it might have been sent to (or in Warlock's case possibly sold to).

Twigsssss

Is there any doubt at this point that what the tyrant is trying to do is manipulate the proceran army and the callow army into one big fight where both sides kill each other?

Liliet

I'm standing by my assertion that this is not how it will go.

Prepared to eat crow if I'm wrong.

Andrew Mitchell

"Eating crow" has interesting implications in this particular setting.

Liliet

“
I invoke my right to remain silent

Mental Mouse

Well, the Tyrant (and perhaps the Bard) may be trying to do that, but whether he'll succeed is another question entirely.

Javvies

They should be glad that she's not doing worse. Because she could. And kind of really wants to.

Yeah ... they have a lot of catching up to do.

Masego has stolen Liesse? That's probably not an unambiguously good thing waiting to happen. Might not be all bad, but it's probably not all good, either. Maybe the people who thought he might try to summon up Tikoloshe are right.

That or maybe he's planning on breaking Praes and/or Ashur.

IDKWhoitis

It's also possible that he may be hunting for the Echo Liesse caused in Arcadia, so he can speak with his Father one more time.

caoimhinh

To speak with his Fathers again, that would be the Echo that Thalassina caused in Arcadia, not the one caused by Liesse.

Mental Mouse

You know, this business with Arcadia echoes could get out of hand – they could threaten a bunch of old secrets and other informational balances of power. Masego's own ability to extract information from them depends on his own aspect powers, but those aren't so unique that other mages might not be able to do something in the same vein. On the other hand, without Cat present, IIRC even Masego doesn't have his own safe-conduct pass in Arcadia. Much less any lesser mages trying to copy him!

The question is how much of an echo would form from the two recent events. Liesse and Thalassina both were magic-heavy fights with a whole-lotta gating and city-sized fixed magical arrays – but still probably not a patch on the power or significance of Keter's founding. What I'd really like to see is what shards might be accessible near the Tower of Praes. I'm sure any overarching stories will be scrambled by the sheer number of significant and unreasonably magical events there, but some interesting tales might remain.

IDKWhoitis

I feel like the Echos are like a gun waiting to be used, an equivalent to the wise old man who shares dangerous secrets. And to defeat bard, a Mosaic of moments of history and memories from those present and past will have to be compiled.

The nature of what is considered significant enough to leave an imprint is largely speculative. Masego could be looking for his father's shadow, or for the secrets of the Book of the Dead.

stevenneiman

Here's a terrifying thought: How dangerous would Cat be if she got a memory upload from that echo of the Intercessor? She's already terrifyingly good at manipulating the story, so if receiving a portion of the Intercessor's mind didn't drive her completely mad I bet she would become so good at it that she'd be unstoppable.

RanVor

One can't go mad twice...

stevenneiman

Everything important about Tikoloshe is gone. There exists a devil made from the same... whatever it is devils are made from, but they have none of his memories. If he ever returns to the same intelligence he had before, I doubt it will be with the same personality he has now.

My best guess would be that Masego is planning to cause ruin to either Praes or Ashur, or else that he's on his way to meet up with the Woe as the only real family he still has.

Andrew Mitchell

I think you're right regarding Tikoloshe. At least, right according to what everyone knows is true.

But thinking about Masego, vivisector of miracles, I think there may be a path for him to bring Tikoloshe back:

1. Visit whichever Hell Tikoloshe is in and retrieve him.
2. Visit Arcadia and find the echo of the destruction of Thalassinia.
3. Enter that echo and extract Tikoloshe's whole mind state.
4. Insert the mindstate into the blank Tikoloshe.

None of these seem to be totally impossible. Consider, for example, the way Masego extracted an extinct language from a serving girl (in the echo with the young dead king) and inserted it into Cat's head.

Now that I see all this written down I think there's a better than even chance that this is what Masego is planning to do.

What do you think?

RanVor

It's a little more complicated. Tikoloshe's autonomy was a result of a very complex and highly precise set of oaths and bindings which Masego might not know the full extent of. Without them, he would remain a regular devil even with his old personality inserted.

Liliet

>"I choose this," he said, tone full of wonder, "of my own free will."

I think Tikoloshe did end up having autonomy for real.

Just to use it to die!

RanVor

Well, yeah, you're right. I forgot about that. Still, he lived with the bindings for decades, they've probably influenced him on a deeper level.

Liliet

Mm. I think they're the reason he ended up with real free will, on top of just accumulating sentience xp from long long life.

I don't think artificially grafting echo of personality to blank slate reincarnation is how guide rolls, but it does seem to me like fully recovering personality+memories should about do it.

I don't think Tiko would be happy about that though, considering there's no way to bring back Wekesa =x

Andrew Mitchell

IIRC, and it's not a sure thing that I do recall correctly, I do seem to have a memory of Masego specifically saying that he's studied the bindings in detail.

RanVor

Maybe, I don't remember everything (I've forgotten a lot of stuff actually).

stevenneiman

I know that he at least knew the practical limitations and the theory of how they worked. Considering that the only secret Wekesa and Tikoloshe ever kept from him wasn't explicitly referenced in the bindings, I can't imagine why they wouldn't have let him look them over. Even if they are outside Zeze's areas of interest, I'm sure he would have been interested in studying something that his father regarded as a masterpiece.

stevenneiman

IIRC they ripped apart a whole person echo just to get a language. Considering how much language ties into, I'd say that a generous estimate is that that's maybe 25% of the whole mind, probably a decent bit less. It's possible that there's a nondestructive way to extract that information if he invests a lot more time and effort (worth it to restore one of his fathers), but that's not certain. Even if he could do it, the echo was from before the dead king's time. That means that restore-from-backup Tikoloshe would be less intelligent by the growth he achieved since Sephirah's ascension, and would have no memory of his time with Masego and Wekesa. Which means that he would be getting an incubus which wasn't really family, and if he saw any point in that it would be a hell of a lot easier than going back through Arcadia-Keter to pilfer an echo.

NZPIEFACE

Wasn't there a Dread Emperor whose fall back plan for a flying city, was to have a falling flying city?

theothin

Not quite "plan", but yeah.

"Quite literally not what I was aiming for, but I can work with this."

– Dread Empress Regalia II, as her flying fortress began falling on Laure

From 4.76.

IDKWhoitis

That's one way to effectively nullify 4,000 cavalry permanently without resorting to murder. Unless Kairos is carrying a massive supply chain around, those people are almost entirely useless. No armor or weapons, no horses to spare, broken fingers for weeks.

Also, if the kataphraktoi are heavy cavalry with lots of armor, then her Knights of Callow are about to get a massive boost in supplies and armament. Like even the horses themselves are expensive assets that Callow was limited in at the beginning of the Crusade.

It's also possible that a great Horse meat feast will be held to celebrate the reunion of 3rd, 4th, Cat, and Drow.

Novice

The warhorses are a boon to the Knights, yes. But I don't know about the armor since the Helikeans don't have the same sorcery-defying armor the Knights of Callow have. I wonder if there's a specific type of blacksmith or enchanter or whatever that can convert mundane armor to the Callowan type.

Someguy

The light armour should be more useful for the Drow, though the horses would be less useful for the knights as mounts but more suitable as pack animals given that they are not conditioned to carry Plate Armoured riders.

Liliet

Cataphracts ARE heavy cavalry.

Gunslinger

Aren't archers light cav though?

Liliet

Apparently not these!

Micke

The defining difference is the armour.
Real-world cataphracts were modeled on Iranian noble cavalry; trained to use bow, spear and sword. This was before stirrups vastly improved the efficiency of lance charges.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

Generally, yes, horse archers were light cavalry. However, the Persian and Parthian cataphracts that Helikean kataphraktoi are presumably based on were heavy cavalry, traditionally equipped with scale armor, helmets with metal masks, lances, blades, and bows. They were very expensive to train and equip, but they were also incredibly effective due to the combination of range, mobility, durability, and close-in fighting capabilities.

Liliet

I love people who come here to share facts ♥

luminiousblu

Cataphracts in the real world are extremely heavy hybrid shock cavalry. They'd be armed with a bow, a two-handed lance (this was before the development of the 'couched' lance) and generally also a sword as sidearm. They were prototypical knights, heavily armored noble shock troops with a lifetime's worth of training and wearing more wealth than most villages could pool in a decade.

Derak

A byzantine cataphract's equipment was worth ten pounds of gold. That's not including training, remounts, provisions, etc. At current gold price, 4000 of those would only cost about 620 billion usd.

Rook

There's nothing wrong with light cavalry. Doesn't hold a candle to the knights of callosity, but even unarmored the sheer weight (not story weight, as in physical this-shit-is-heavy weight) of a cavalry charge is pretty brutal against mundane infantry.

mordered

Besides, light horse is excellent for harrying enemy foot and bow units. Even if Cat can't build extra heavy horse than light horse is an excellent alternative. Feeding an additional 4000 horses however might be troublesome.

Cicero

I feel this is a mistake.

Never do do an enemy a slight injury. It will only harden their enmity, without weakening them.

Insanenoodlyguy

This is more than slight. Using a bow puts fingers under a lot of pressure. Broken ones aren't going to heal enough to be used for at least a month and a half. No arms or equipment and no ability to be re-armed makes them a burden, especially in enemy lands. If they are lucky they will be sent home in disgrace. They probably won't be lucky. And whatever their fate, it will be as ignominious failures. As cat notes, they had pride in what they were, and they won't be able to be that any more.

Decius

This setting has magical healing. It will strain the healers, but the War College had students breaking each other's bones pretty casually.

Draeysine

Sure, but Helike doesn't have a crap ton of mages and their healing techniques might not set the fingers back to 100% working order. That's if they don't die walking back without supplies in the middle of the night with injuries on a very cold and windy snowy night. In any case it's extremely demoralizing, and costly. Losing all of that equipment, plus Tyrant's supply chain is questionable considering how he entered through the Big Dangerous Enchanted Forest with his army, means that those are nothing but useless burdens that didn't even succeed at dying for their cause. Something tells me those 4k soldiers aren't going to do anything threatening again.

konstantinvoncarstein

Unless the Tyrant pull a impossible magical from nowhere, like he has the habit to do 🙄

konstantinvoncarstein

*magical trick

Liliet

It's still opportunity cost.

stevenneiman

Considering the mischief Kairos gets up to, a few weeks where he can't spare mages for anything else might be worth more than anything else you could get for 4000 elite mooks. Mages are the next most versatile unit after Named, and Kairos is someone whose tactics rely on having enough options that nobody can figure out what he's going to do. He might be able to Wish it away, but he's implied that he's got a limited supply of those and wasting one might even be more valuable than tying up his mage corps for a few weeks.

Excited

Stygia has shit tons, they'll be fine by tomorrow

stevenneiman

Remember, Cat's goal is not to permanently neutralize threats, its to minimize bloodshed on all sides until the Dead King attacks. What she just did was remove everything that made them a threat and ensure that it can't be recovered for a matter of months. They're basically useless until the Dead King is further along, and if Cat can't bring all sides together into a united front by then, she's already lost and another 4000 assholes who might or might not have new horses will be the least of her worries.

Liliet

Yeah.

This was a very good move.

Andrew Mitchell

Plus... if Helike really does help out with fighting the Dead King then maybe she can give the armour and horses back.

That's a big IF.

Valkyria

Another if is: IF they have not eaten all the horses by then.

Fayhem

I really hope it doesn't come to that. Cat may have mentioned the idea pretty casually, but a good horse is valuable as shit at this tech level and a trained warhorse quite significantly moreso. When armies eat their horses it's an act of desperation. Think of them as walking money that's technically edible but actually much, much harder to replace than currency and you've got an idea of what it means to eat these kind of horses. If Cat can actually hang on to these horses that's not quite a gamechanger but it is a very appreciable boost to Callow, especially since they slaughtered so many of their own best horses to spite the Conquest.

oneeyed

The Legions and Callow's army are low on supplies, from what I remember, and it's winter, so I have my doubts they can keep 4000 horses easily.

Mental Mouse

That said, some of the horses will die in the course of things, and will be a valued addition to the Greenskin Meat Fund.

Razorfloss

Maybe but this is the only thing that she could do. They don't have the supplies to take care of them as prisoners, she can't kill them all else she kills any hope of getting her accords signed and she can't let them go only to be a pain in her ass later. This solves all her problems right now in the most efficient way without killing them plus it sends a message. The Black Queen is back and she is not to be trifled with.

Andrew Mitchell

Wow, what a great chapter. The drow suddenly appearing, Cat's arrival at camp, Hakram and Cat together again, and justice served on Helike's cataphracts. Every step so well done IMO.

Walter

"and not so young that she should not have known better."

Than what? Like, honest question, how does Cat talk with Hakram, and then go talk with someone who is basically just baby Hakram and act so bewildered?

Liliet

I don't think she's bewildered so much as conflicted.

Liliet

Like, this is just her remarking that she's not looking at a confused and scared teenager she would not even consider responsible for their own actions.

Someguy

What a wonderful ally Kairos is, he just provided arms, armour and horses to the Army of Callow right out of his pocket.

Andrew Mitchell

You're absolutely spot on here... and I'm sure Cat will thank him next time they meet.

Mental Mouse

Oh, their next meeting should be even more fun than their last!

danh3107

I don't wanna be nit picky here, but if they have kind of healer breaking two finger bones isn't really a big deal.

Skaddx

Yeah i gotta agree in a World with healing from priest. Breaking some finers aren't really a major setback. The loss of Horses is quite frankly the most significant thing. Armor and weapons. Then any broken fingers. There is basically no way Cat could have played this that helps her really I think she did the best of bad options. Still all this means for enemies here on out is to never surrender.

matesbe

Eh. 4000 people. I'm sure healers can get some of them back on their feet, but all? Probably not in a short time-frame.

Rook

There's nothing stopping her from healing their fingers herself. Improperly.

It's a lot harder to fix a badly healed fracture than to set it properly in the first place. In guideverse, you'd probably need to later re-break the fingers just the right way and then heal them again to have any hope of getting full functionality back.

Decius

If Cat can heal eight thousand broken fingers quickly and improperly enough for that purpose, she needs to start treating her own wounded and dead.

oaclo

Well they sure as hell aren't gonna have priests of the Gods Above to do it and, based on that mention a few chapters ago of someone who studied with the mage-healers of I wanna say Ashur, mages with that capability are rare on Calernia.

RanVor

cough Atalantians cough

konstantinvoncarstein

The Ligue has priests, it will be easy to heal that. She should have cut those fingers

Liliet

There was no need to. She took their stuff, and they have no supply line.

Also, healing 4000 pairs of broken fingers is at the very least a time-costly task.

medailyfun

Just realized... What if... they're all secretly left-handed?

Aotrs Commander

No? It's a hell of a lot of Cure Light Wounds spells to cast, though, (metaphorically)... How many do you think the healers can fix in a day? Ten? A Hundred? Wouldn't have thought your average healer is going to be able to do more than one at a time the level of healing we've seen outside heroes doesn't seem to be massively significant, maybe close to or slightly better in some instances than modern medicine, maybe).

So, with the best will in the world, between organising the set-up time (i.e. the time required to physically get the healer to each person, even if you tried to do it in a field) and the actual healing (which might not be a six-second D&D cast), I wouldn't imagine it would be less than a couple of minutes at best (and could easily be more like ten or fifteen, depending on how effective they are) – so, going with the most generous, that's 30 per hour of invested time that the healers are doing that and not doing anything else. So that's 133 man-hours required of doing nowt but heal broken fingers and this is pretty much the best case scenario. How many healers does the Tyrant have at his disposal? And of that, how many can he spare, at one location (which might mean an opportunity cost itself), to not be able to do anything else but fix fingers? (If he has to send troops off in clumps to the healers, that "two minute per" then has become "hours or days per.")

Whatever, it's going to be a significant investment of logistical effort on top of the healing that's got to be dealt with.

(The only reason it won't take forever to BREAK all the fingers is Cat is making them do it themselves. Because she is awesome.)

Of course, the Tyrant's likely to just execute them all, making the point moot.

Liliet

These are his loyal zealous followers that are the basis of his entire influence politically.

He'd be shooting himself in the foot very badly by mistreating them.

Wzjwjrgwozs

He made it illegal to curse in his entire country, they're pretty much fanatics at this point

Liliet

Not sure how the left side of the proposition is connected to the right, here.

RanVor

A hundred priests capable of healing 30 soldiers per day each would restore combat capability of 4000 soldiers within a little over a day.

Liliet

> assuming Kairos has that many in one place without having them busy with something else specific also I'm not sure if priests CAN heal 30 pairs of broken fingers per day

RanVor

That's an optimistic (for Kairos at least) estimate, true. But I think we can safely assume the entire process wouldn't take more than a few days. It's time-consuming, but not so much to cause a delay that would be significant on a strategic scale.

Liliet

A few days during which the healers can't be doing anything else.

It's opportunity cost if nothing else, and as far as I'm following Cat's going for blitzkrieg here anyway. A few days might be all she needs.

(And even aside from that, there's the issue of re-arming these people and separately the issue of image – Cat has proved that she can do that, that she overpowered and caught Helikeans to the degree of being able to enforce them breaking their own fingers. This one's not a direct loss for Kairos so much as it's a gain for Catherine)

RanVor

To clarify, I was only talking about the problem of healing the cataphracts. Just sending them back to Rochelant on foot with their fingers broken is enough of a delay by itself.

Also, I doubt Cat let them go just to kill them somewhere else.

Liliet

Mm.

Raved Thrad

All they really need is a healer who can cast Mass Cure Light Wounds. 😊

Liliet

...level 4000

Mental Mouse

Indeed, two finger bones “isn’t a big deal”... for each individual soldier. Even without magical healing, most of them would recover eventually. Mages can speed that up to a point, but as others have noted, for 4000 soldiers, two fingers each adds up to a whole lot of healing. Either way though, it’s time and resources.

Combine that with the equipment and horse confiscations, and those soldiers will not be fighting again soon. In fact, they’ll be lucky if they’re recovered and re-equipped in time for the Dead King’s arrival, which could be quite unpleasant for them.

Also, this is a serious and very public bitch-slap that the Black Queen is giving the Tyrant; as the plundered soldiers make their way home, everybody they pass is going to get the story. Between this and her previous engagement, Cat’s reputation will be getting some new polish.

Liliet

^^^ the reputation thing is important too

Kairos has not really been a primary target for anyone so far, everyone’s been ignoring him / low key exchanging info with him. Cat’s the first one to seriously kick him in the rear

stevenneiman

She’s not trying to permanently cripple them, just ensure that it will be expensive and inconvenient to get them back into fighting shape until the point where they’ll have to turn and fight the Dead King's forces. They now need to walk back to a place where Kairos has mages, spend weeks in one place and exhausting Helike's mages (the most versatile tool of a man who relies on unpredictability), and then they'll need to arrange 4000 new high-quality horses and new bows, then get back from wherever they were getting healed to somewhere they can be of use. Sure, they aren't really gone and this would be a bad tactic if Cat was fighting a nation-vs.-nation war with Helike, but as it is, this is absolutely perfect for her needs.

Fayhem

As people have been pointing out healers are a finite resource. To expand on that a bit, if the League has let's say 200 capable healers (could be more could be less, I don't feel we've really gotten a sense of the League's capabilities in this regard) each of them would have to heal 20 people to heal all of those soldiers. And let's be real, after walking back through the snow without supplies frostbite/exposure is going to supply a lot more injuries than just a couple broken fingers. It's also been stated that performing a bunch of healing in a row will wipe somebody out. So either they don't heal them all at once, meaning they've got possibly still thousands of injured soldiers just kind of hanging around draining resources without contributing, or they do heal them all at once (if that's even possible) and then they have to choose between ceasing active operations for probably at least a few days until their healers recover or engaging in combat with potentially not enough functional healers to be able to treat all critical injuries. The first surrenders the strategic initiative to the opposition which tends to be death in a campaign, and the second drastically worsens the fatality to casualty ratio for any engagement and harms morale to boot. Tyrant would probably choose the latter as the lesser evil in his lights, but the point is either choice is harmful, as is just not healing them all.

It's certainly correct that in a world with magical healing these injuries are unlikely to be permanently disabling, but it should be understood that the loss of materiel is not the only significant setback Cat dealt Helike/the League here. This is still a significant strategic complication even setting aside the fact that Tyrant will be faced with replacing the arms and armor of 4,000 elite soldiers when his only possible supply lines would be through 20,000 very angry Proceran soldiers or through the Waning Woods (i.e., he doesn't have a viable supply line). Last note on how this hurts Kairos: these are specifically Helike soldiers, meaning his own personal military strength relative to the rest of the League just took a hit, not to mention any priestly healing (which has been stated to be objectively better and easier than mage healing) would be coming by way of a Good-aligned League city doing Helike a favor. He's secure enough to hang on to effective command anyway I'd imagine, but I wouldn't suppose that to be exactly helpful to him either.

Fayhem

Ayyy way more people have given an expanded version of that analysis already than I realized. That's what I get for commenting without scrolling down further lol.

Liliet

I'm going to refer people to this comment wrt this decision from now on.

Mental Mouse

An excellent analysis; I'll just point out one more layer: Those disarmed and crippled troops are also stranded in foreign territory. I don't know how "unpopular" they'd be locally, but it might not be so trivial for them to "walk back to their Theodosian".

caoimhinh

Cool chapter, Cat's appearance with Night miracles, the "Kneel" command, her honor avenue by her soldiers, the heartwarming moment of her reunion with Hakram, news of Masego and food for our speculations, mention of past Dread Emperor, it was all cool.

I wonder if the battle will start next week since it seems to still require a chapter or two in preparation for it, and the Interludes ended so it's unlikely we'll see Juniper and co's POV before Cat arrives there, although we might need another time skip of a few days.

The mention of past Dread Emperors and their titles made me wonder, in the hypothetical scenario of Cat actually claiming the Tower and becoming Empress (which would unify the three countries Praes, Callow, and Ever Dark), what do you guys think her reigning name and title/epithet would be?

I think something like "Dread Empress Pragmatica, First of Her Name, the Game Breaker" would be an awesome title fitting for her.

Typos found:

- cased their raid / ceased
- and as I my valiant / and as my valiant OR I and my valiant
- two crows far above gliding far above passing / eliminate one of the "far above"
- those what would serve / that would serve
- we haven't caught sight of him said." / delete the "said"

-in the end it wasn't it the same / delete the first "it"
-the head of ever highborn / every

John

I'd say "Dread Empress Persistent, the Blade-Catcher" might be more appropriate. How many times has somebody stabbed her with something and then seen her respond 'That's MY sword now, you're not getting it back,' figuratively or otherwise? There's the original knife (and by extension, the Legions) she accepted from Black, the angel-wing and associated resurrection, walking into the circular firing squad of Drow society and essentially stealing the whole damn thing, this new bit with disarming the cataphracts... and her big long-term legacy goal, the Liesse Accords, seems to be mainly about limitations on strategic weaponry and atrocities, along with diplomatic mechanisms for general de-escalation, effectively snatching the biggest, nastiest "blades" away from everybody.

Liliet

"That's my sword now, you're not getting it back" ♥ ♥ ♥

stevenneiman

She might actually be Dread Empress Benevolent the second. She has a similar specialty in story-fu, and unlike the first one she actually IS benevolent.

Mental Mouse

Yes, that's what makes her so scary. Somebody who's trying to kill, rob, or enslave you is a known quantity, you just fight or run away. But somebody who insists (and believes) they're trying to help you... those can be far more unpredictable and dangerous.

werafdsaew

The author already mentioned that her name would be Victorious

Liliet

Oh? Where?

RanVor

Really? I thought it was just baseless speculation.

werafdsaew

It may have been hearsay. I don't remember the source.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, I think it was all speculation by readers. Here's the earliest comment (August 2018) mentioning Victorious: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/15/chapter-44-catherines-plan/#comment-20589>

And I couldn't see any evidence of EE commenting. But TBF I didn't go through all comments on every chapter.

Trickster315

So did anyone else catch the fact that Cat referred to Black as "my father"? Correct me if I'm wrong but I think she's only ever referred to him as black before, even in her own thoughts.

Oshi

She has referred to black as her father since the beginning of this book. Look over the chapters and you'll find them.

Liliet

Every single time she says that, there's someone in the comments who only just noticed ♥

You're one of today's lucky 10000! (or however many there were)

medailyfun

dude, he's nickname is trickster for a reason 😊

Soronel Haetir

Cruel mercy is actually a major victory for Cat, a wounded enemy is a much bigger liability than a dead one.

IDKWhoitis

Reminds me of the Byzantine Emperor who ordered the blinding of 99 of every 100 POW to cripple Bulgaria.

medailyfun

4000 riders should have much more than 4000 horses with them, there're expendables in the war campaign

Liliet

Are they? I'm not so sure.

RanVor

Horse casualties happen. Besides, horses tire. In a regular war campaign, every cavalry soldier needs at least one spare mount to maintain combat readiness at all times.

Liliet

Makes sense.

Not 'expendable' but need spares sounds about right.

Someguy

The Golden Horde (Mongols) had at least 5 mounts each, which also functioned as baggage train & Emergency Fod Supply.

Not sure about the Greeks & Persians though.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

Being nomads, I believe the Mongols would have had more horses than a typical cavalry force, but I believe two spares was generally typical for a well-equipped cavalry man.

Allafterme

In their camps maybe, you don't bring spares to a light skirmishing.

RanVor

Sure, but you don't go skirmishing far away from your camp...

Javvies

Cavalry can maybe – for short trips – make do with only one mount. The lighter your equipment loadout the further that envelope gets you, but it's a relatively small one at the best of times (light cavalry on good ground/roads).

Realistically, though, you want at least two mounts per mounted combatant, not counting any packhorses and supply train, for any sort of distance. You'd prefer more, though. You can get by with having only one combat trained mount if you primarily ride the other for distance travel, but you don't ride (and thus tire out) your combat trained mounts for very long unless you have additional combat trained mounts you can switch to or you have no other options.

Most likely, Cat has picked up somewhere in the vicinity of ten thousand horses, quite possibly more when all the packhorses are included.

Sure, cataphract warhorse training is different from knight warhorse training, but they're still quality horseflesh.

medailyfun

Cat did not mention Nauk when passing the news to Hakram 😞

Liliet

Oof, yeah =x

Mental Mouse

She needs a bottle and half a day...

theothin

I don't think this falls under that. It's basic casualty reporting, something presently relevant and being publicized throughout the army. Really going through the feelings about his death can wait for then, but not the raw information.

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't assume we've heard every word between the two. (Narrative elision is a thing.) Probably she did tell him in an off-screen listing, but hasn't discussed it yet.

Someguy

Random Thought: Cat's not having Robber supervise this? This is one of the largest act of robbery committed right (sacking cities not counted)?

Liliet

Still doesn't measure up to that one time Cat stole two legions and an entire country.

Someguy

I was under the impression that those were filed under Employment Severance Package?

Liliet

White collar thefts are always the biggest

Mental Mouse

I think you mean black-collar! 😊

Liliet

I said what I said XD

Gunslinger

> Walk back to your Theodosian, General Pallas," I said. "And give him warning from the Black Queen – if he ever pulls anything like this on my people again, there's room for another soul on my cloak."

Shivers, this is the good stuff

Hakram Cat conversation was surprising not just because Hakram has yet to have a second hand attached (dropping yet again the combat effectiveness of the Woe) but also to the fact that Cats mortality wasn't brought up.

Liliet

Woe needs command effectiveness, not combat effectiveness.

They're REALLY not a typical Named band.

Daniel E

I read this as 'Name Brand', and now I'm disappointed that The Woe don't have a product line 😞

Fayhem

Buy Woe™ Brand Stabbing Cream!

"Wait, is that for if you've been stabbed or if you're going to be stabbing someone else?"

"Really either would make sense here but actually it's just goblinfire, we're selling it to our enemies it'll be hilarious."

...I probably should not be imagining Robber as the one doing R&D and marketing for the Woe's product line but let's be honest he'd jump on the opportunity if Cat didn't proactively ban him from it.

Mental Mouse

"Bottle contained goblinfire instead of ointment. 0/5 would not buy again. (Should've learned after the bobcat)."

Mental Mouse

Also I bet they'd love some Stabbing Cream at the stab factory.

Mental Mouse

I'm just wondering what kind of precedents Hakram is establishing for the Name of Adjutant.

theothin

Obviously, the Adjutant is supposed to be the queen's right hand.

shimizubad

well, now he's the queen's no hand

Andrew Mitchell

But his bone hand is quite functional.

Aotrs Commander

Hah! Never change, Cat, never change.

Hitogami

I've missed Cat, I really have. Atta girl

Daniel E

Can someone explain why Hakram felt the need to do away with his other hand? I reread that chapter, and I'm just not getting the uncertainty or whatever else regarding Thief's loyalty.

NZPIEFACE

basically thief doesnt think she belongs there in the friendship sense of it nor the usefulness aspect of it, and shes losing her name, which is what kinda lead her to join them in the first place.

hakram was like "fuck that yo, imma chop off this hand to show you that youre more than just a name."

Daniel E

There has to be more to it than that. Was the whole thing just Thief being mopey/mellow-dramatic, and Hakram couldn't think of a better way to assure her of value as a teammate?

Euodiachloris

You don't lose your Name through a passing depressive episode. She was undergoing a prolonged existential crisis over what her Role was, how her Name related to the duties she was expected to fulfil, her role within the Woe and whether she had ever actually been a Hero or just a Villain with pretensions. And, if she had been a Hero, why did looking back on those days feel like she was a bigger Bad Guy back then than she feels being a scared-as-hell ¿Villain?...?

Also, she was months into a fully justified, PTSD-induced anxiety-depression spiral she was having no luck in breaking out of. Her Name might have helped her... if she were willing to ditch Callow and focus on being the Thief.

Vivian has done many questionable things, but quitting Callow? Fuck, no!

Liliet

^^^

imagesbe

Hakram tried to reassure her. But not only are words cheap, at that period Vivian didn't trust Hakram half as far as she could throw him, which is pretty much not at all. He himself lamented that he was the only one there; the others she trusted enough that words might have been able to help, but she distrusted him too much for that.

He picked the only thing he could see, a way to tell her that he was taking her seriously and not trying to play mind games or manipulate her. Words were not going to cut it, no pun intended.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, for most humans, his solution would simply not have been something to consider. I fear that "Adjutant" is likely to become "that guy who mutilates himself for the group's benefit". Which admittedly does sound like an Evil role.

Liliet

Honestly, I think it's just Cat's influence (Amadeus's influence by proxy) (-glaring @ the idiot-)

NZPIEFACE

Eh, kinda. Her being mopey/mellow-dramatic had big impacts on Callow as a whole and Hakram really couldn't let that shit go.

Liliet

"Mopey/melodramatic" is one way to put it, sure. Eudiachloris has put it in a more precise way.

Hakram couldn't think of a better way to break through her paranoia wrt him. Words are cheap. I do think there MUST have been a better solution, but he felt time pressure, and only something in this category would do the job quickly.

Daniel E

That makes more sense, I appreciate the insight everyone 😊
That said, I was hoping Vivienne would eventually appreciate just how insanely powerful Thief really was; she took an entire fleet of boats and dropped them in the middle of a city, and later proved she could steal an Aspect if it was made physical (the Sun). Hopefully she gets a new Name and isn't just side-lined like Ratface & Killien. Hmm, I wonder if she ever went through with her Fae conversion. Anyways, maybe something close to Thief, but more definitively Evil, like Shade or Shadow.

RanVor

I don't think she's in danger of being sidelined anytime soon. I disagree about the Name, though. If she gets a new one, I very much doubt it's going to be related to thievery.

Mental Mouse

You know what would really put the cat among the pigeons? Viv's new name turns out to be Chancellor. Admittedly unlikely (as it's a Praes name) but can you imagine the reaction from the Tower?

Liliet

I actually don't think Vivienne is going to get anything like an Evil Name, she was and remains a heroine. Her Name crisis was related to her no longer doing thief-y thing and operating as a mastermind instead, not to anything to do with which side she was on. That transition was seamless, she was as on the side of Callow and the right thing to do as she ever was.

Nordvegr

Is Pallas a Wandering Inn reference?

Satan

Seems like she can become a weapons dealer for Procer, especially if she keeps all the Helikean gear.

Chapter 19: Precedent

"The evening before a battle is like an entire nation breathing in. Only morning will tell if what comes out is acclaim or lamentation."

– King Albert Fairfax of Callow, the Thrice-Invaded

"Liability almost seems like too mild a word," Hakram said.

The words were not voiced as blame or complaint, but as a simple statement of fact. Adjutant was assessing a weakness, nothing more. I'd known him for long enough by now to take it was it was, and in truth Indrani probably had as well. It didn't stop her from snatching his handless arm and twisting it behind his back, forcing a heavily muscled orc over a foot taller than her to bend over in pain. The sight of it was rather absurd: Hakram was on the tall side even for his kind, and his shoulders were broader than any human I'd met. Between the set of plate he wore like it was made of feathers, the knife-like fangs and the bone hand Adjutant looked like he should be able to snap her in half. And yet I wasn't even sure he was faking it, when he struggled against Archer's tight and sudden grip.

"I think you meant to say 'Archer, you peerless beauty whose appeal is known even to orcs, thank you for bringing me this nice army and saving my whinging orc ass'," Indrani said.

There was a pause.

"I guess Cat helped," she conceded. "And Akua was there, probably."

"Such lavish praise," Diabolist drawled. "Do cease, Archer, or I will be most terribly embarrassed."

The shade's night-black dress rippled down to her feet, legs crossed elegantly as she ignored the laws of Creation and somehow managed to lounge gracefully in a Legion-issue folding chair. The neckline was low, though not overly revealing of the curves below, and held up only on one shoulder by some sort of cloth strap circling around her neck. The saffron yellow trim along it stretched down casually, bringing attention to the long slit revealing a portion of her leg. Now and then I could feel Akua's amused golden eyes on me, almost daring me to look. Diabolist looked like sin, which I was not unconvinced might be what she was actually metaphysically made of these days. Still, this was a great deal less subtle than usual: she usually only resorted to this kind of jabbing when she was irritated, so clearly being cut out of the happenings in Sarcella so she could concentrate on building my well still had her ticked off. She'd get over it, I decided, and did not look at the smooth dark skin a dainty twitch of her foot was further revealing.

"You're not going to let my arm go unless I repeat it, are you?" Adjutant sighed.

"Guess," Indrani smiled, all batting her eyelashes with a coquettish smile.

Being a merciful woman by nature, I allowed Hakram the dignity of pretending not to hear while he offered his full surrender. I was still looking at the same thing he'd been, the fifty thousand drow outside that dawn had chased back into their tents for exhausted slumber. General Rumena had agreed that we needed to keep at least a tenth of the warriors awake during the daybreak exhaustion, as relying entirely on the Army of Callow for protection would be risky, but the logistics of that were proving tricky. We had to put up full sigils for the duty, as mixing warriors from different ones would cause no end of trouble, but it was seen as a punishment duty. Sigil-holders were duelling each other to make other drow's sigils hold watch instead, and though the Sisters had long backed my order that drow were not to kill each other over Night while in my army 'first blood' was another story. The sigil-holder for the Kuresnik was the weakest of their kind in the southern expedition, and its sigil had been forced to hold watch seven days in a row before the matter was brought to me.

The Kuresnik Sigil had been quite literally falling apart under the strain, the first proof we'd had that keeping drow awake through the early hours repeatedly would have physical consequences. Many of the dzulu had taken sick, becoming extremely sensitive to light, and some of the Mighty had found their powers weakened even after nightfall. Dawn-sickness, the Firstborn were calling it now. Rumena had stepped in to handle the problem, but ending the duelling entirely had proved impossible even for it. Though respected, the Tomb-Maker remained a first among equals and not someone wielding the kind of largely uncontested authority a general would in the Legions or the Army of Callow. I'd eventually lost my patience and told sigil-holders that if they intended on pursuing this, it would be by my rules. Matches were now arranged by random draw between pairs of sigil-holders, and I'd informed them I would personally rip the Night out of anyone who tried to further debate the outcome after it was settled. And of anyone trying to pull this shit over watches when there were enemy within marching distance. Mighty Radenbog had seemed dubious of my ability to enforce this, when I made the announcement, so I left it to spend three days without so much as a speck of Night to call on.

After losing two toes to frostbite it was duly humbled when I returned its power.

"Now that Archer has ceased browbeating the Lord Adjutant, perhaps we could attend to more pressing matters?" Akua suggested in a sweet voice.

"That's Lady Archer to you, Bad Faith Wraith," Indrani replied, tone amused instead of heated.

That detail hadn't escaped Hakram's notice, I saw when I turned back to my informal council. I could almost hear the readjustments taking place behind that calm face, the questions the orc would keep a lid on until it was just the two of us.

"Akua's not wrong," I said. "We have a few hours until the drow can resume march, and at least two of them will have to be spent with the generals of the Third and Fourth getting everything in order. I want us with a clear course of action before that."

Letting the tent's flaps drop, I retreated back into the warmth and claimed a folding chair for myself. My staff remained propped up the cloth wall, its surface seemingly hazy for the closeness with the coal brazier close to hit. I accepted a cup of wine when Akua offered it, pleasantly surprised to find it Vale summer wine at the first sip. I inclined my head at her in thanks and she smirked back, raising her own cup. Indrani preferred plopping herself down atop the table to her folding chair, predictably, and Hakram remained standing. Like an officer giving report, I couldn't help but think.

"We're moving to link up with Juniper's columns," I said. "That much is not up to debate. But I need some context."

I met Hakram's gaze with a raised eyebrow.

"As in, specifically, what the Hells you and Vivienne were thinking marching most the Army of Callow into this mess," I said. "Why not just you and the Hunt, Hakram? You don't need forty thousand legionaries for an extraction."

"We had situations on our hands," Adjutant said. "We were going to have to come for the stranded Legions regardless, but complications grew quickly."

That they'd come for the legionaries Black had led into Procer I had no true issue with, as he'd well know. Aside from the utter waste of lives involved in letting the Dominion and the Principate run down some of the finest soldiers and commanders on Calernia on the eve of all-out war with Keter, there'd been other considerations. Like the fact that the Army of Callow had brought into its fold two of the old school Legions after Second Liesse, and that many of those officers had friends and kin in the stranded army. At the very least, mass discontent and desertions would have come of us doing nothing. Add to that the fact I'd personally given my word to Juniper that I'd intervene if it went bad for them, and it would have potentially made for a very ugly brew if Vivienne and Hakram had left Marshal Grem and his armies to die. On the other hand, there was a difference between putting together a rescue operation and fielding what had to be the majority of the Army of Callow in the middle of Proceran territory.

"Malicia is on the move," Akua softly said, "is she not?"

It did not sound like a guess, but then it never did with her.

"Indirectly," Hakram said. "High Lady Abreha of Aksum has been named the Imperial Governess of the Blessed Isle, and tasked with handling the refugee situation."

I frowned. I'd spoken with this particular highborn once before, after First Liesse. She's offered to back my petition to establish a ruling council over Callow if I killed the other Trueblood hostages I'd taken from then-Heiress Akua, immediately turning on her supposed allies when it became clear I had the upper hand. She'd later become the head of the so-called 'Moderates', after Malicia began methodically dismantling the Truebloods. The old Soninke was treacherous and no doubt just as dangerous as anyone capable of claiming a High Ladyship of Praes but I'd not considered her anything to be truly worried about. The Empress should be stepping on her as hard as she could, and while Aksum would still have mostly untouched household troops the High Lady Abreha did not have a reputation for military talent.

"Thalassina was vaporized, which means the Kebdana are done as a political entity in Praes for at least one generation," Akua mused. "Yet that would not be enough to make Abreha Mirembe a true threat. Which has fallen, Okoro or Foramen?"

There was a slight twitch to Hakram's jaw, the only visible hint coming through that he was impressed. He shouldn't be so surprised, I thought. Diabolist had been raised to drink and breathe Wasteland politics at the very highest level from the moment her monster of a mother had her set down in a cradle. It wasn't something anyone else on our side would be able to ever truly understand, at least not the way she did. Behind the golden eyes there were decades of learning about the tapestry of enmities and alliances that tied together the Dread Empire's aristocracy, pieces of knowledge that no one but those born to that hallowed birth would ever be made privy too. Adjutant would have to face the same truth I had, about Akua Sahelian: damned as she was beyond all redemption, she was terrifyingly useful.

"Foramen," Hakram said, eye on me and not Diabolist. "You tasked me to negotiate access to munitions and goblin steel, Catherine, and I have. The Kingdom of Callow has recognized the sovereignty of the Confederation of the Grey Eyries, including over the formerly Praesi city of Foramen."

I let out a low whistle.

"So the Matrons actually raised the rebel flag," I said. "I thought they'd wait until the very end, hedge their bets."

"We loaned them gold and armaments to incite them," Adjutant admitted. "Vivienne and I believed it was necessary to implement a containment strategy on Praes, after Malicia's wave of assassinations last year."

"The dwarven gold," I said, coming to the obvious conclusion. "So you did get it."

"Accounts were made open to us in Mercantis," he agreed. "We put them to good use. Our loans to the Matrons will be repaid in the good we want from them, namely their steel and munitions."

I nodded. Risky business, but it made a mess for Malicia to handle instead of the other way around for once. Besides, we needed the munitions if the Army of Callow's war doctrine – which took much from the Legions of Terror's own – was to remain fully usable. Without them, my entire sapper corps essentially lost its teeth.

"So why does Foramen falling make High Lady Abreha a problem for us?" I asked, flicking a glance at Akua.

"The goblins will have slaughtered every Banu they could get their hands on, which means two great families of Praes were destroyed in quick succession," Diabolist elaborated. "That will worry the others. Nok was sacked, and that will shake the faith of its High Lord in the Empress' authority. With Wolof in the hands of my dear cousin Sargon, which Malicia should own body and soul – perhaps even literally – and High Lady Takisha of Kahtan now sharing a border with the Matrons... Arguably, High Lady Abreha is now the second most powerful woman in Praes. Her holdings are untouched, her troops fresh, and her influence at its very apex. In olden times, this would be enough to make her the Chancellor."

"So Malicia sent her to the Blessed Isle, hoping she'd be trouble for us instead of her," I frowned.

"I would wager the intent to be cornering High Lady Abreha into acting against Callow and having her killed by our hand," Akua said, then dipped her head at Hakram. "I assume she reached out privately to Lady-Regent Dartwick with assurances that any such actions on Abreha's part would be against her own instructions?"

Hakram bared his fangs.

"And if we kill her, there will be no retribution," the orc said, tacitly agreeing to all she'd said.

I closed my eyes for a moment, putting it together. Then why had the Army of Callow come west instead of east, given that we now had an ambitious and dangerous High Lady at the eastern border? I didn't believe Hakram or Vivienne fools enough to strip Summerholm of its garrison for this, or that Juniper would have agreed to them doing so in the first, so at least the gate into central Callow would hold even if it was attacked by surprise. But what was the long-term solution to this mess that would be found in Iserre? They were coming for Grem One-Eye, after all, and – well, that would do it.

"You want to use the Legions of Terror loyal to Black as a bulwark between us and Malicia," I suddenly said, opening my eyes. "Grem and his legions to be put up on the Blessed Isle, I'm thinking, with a neat supply arrangement the crown would handle the grain part of."

"And more," Hakram said. "I have been speaking with the Clans willing to take my envoys. There are some who still remember the Steppes nearly bucked the Tower's rule, when Nefarious still reigned."

"Ah," Akua breathed out, sounding delighted. "Grem One-Eye, the orc who might have become the first Warlord since the Miezan occupation had he not entered the Carrion's Lord service instead. You mean to encircle the Wasteland with greenskin realms, one of them unified behind the only orc alive that might feasibly be accepted as lord over all the clans."

It wasn't, I decide, that she enjoyed the thought of Praes losing such a significant part of its territory. She simply admired the elegant viciousness of the plan, surrounding a foe with a net of allied nations by calling on ties that Malicia had no claim to supersede.

"Vivienne's notion," Adjutant said. "She's working on Marshal Grem, though unless the Black Knight dies we're unlikely to convince him."

"So we can settle the entire eastern border, if it goes well," I said. "Which leaves us free to rebuild Callow in peace, and strike deals with the Grand Alliance. That's still what puzzles me, Hakram. Why so large a force here?"

"'cause they're twisting Cordelia's arm," Indrani drawled. "That about right, Deadhand?"

Her casual tone cut through the conversation, a sudden reminder that for all that she'd remained quiet and seemingly bored out of her skull until now she'd been paying attention. And as usual, she cut straight at the heart of the matter.

"You were gonna have to send some soldiers through anyway to get the Legions moving," Archer continued, "and would you look at that, it was going to be pretty close to Salia. Enough that she'd have to worry about a gate opening right at her doorstep, if you felt like being hard. So you thought, why not lean on the First Prince a bit?"

I stared at Hakram, who looked rather abashed. Or hungry. It'd been a while since I'd had to decipher the nuances of orc expressions.

"Two birds with a single stone," he conceded in a deep rumble. "It was to be a quick campaign, with perhaps a few skirmishes to blood our fresh recruits. Vivienne would offer a truce to the First Prince, conditional on surrendering the Legions to our custody, and along the implied threat of our presence we'd offer to return Prince Amadis to her. The Grand Alliance's armies would be free to move north unimpeded, and at your return you would find our borders secure and a blooded army ready to fight against the Dead King. We would have a strong position to push for the Liesse Accords in exchange for our assistance."

"And Black?" I asked, tone mild.

"Not in Proceran hands, as far as we know," Adjutant said. "And heroes are not so easily bargained with."

It'd been a neat, tidy plan that resolved most of Callow's issues in a single stroke. Malicia would be forced on the backfoot, the border at the Blessed Isle put in the hands of a famous general personally loyal to my father who'd already once ignored formal summons from the Empress and the Army of Callow's dangerously green soldiers would get a taste of campaigning in preparation for the horror that would be the war against Keter. It'd been even cleverer than they thought, as Cordelia Hasenbach making a truce with Callow would have allowed her to start buying armaments from the dwarves again. The First Prince must be worrying about that, right about now. Given the amount of cheap steel their civil war would have brought to the surface the Proceran armies should be in no danger of running out of armaments anytime soon, but Hasenbach was far-sighted enough she'd realize she could not fight a long-term war against the Dead King without outside forces propping Procer up. She had three choices, broadly speaking: Callow, the League of Free Cities or the Kingdom Under. Given that two of them were barred as long as she was at war with me and the Tyrant was pulling the strings of the third? She'd see the writing on the wall. It'd been a solid plan, I had to give them that.

Only now instead of what they'd planned, the Army of Callow was split in half within Iserre while Proceran and Levantine armies surrounded it, having no way to take a fairy gate out until I got to it. We'd lost soldiers, the Grand Alliance had lost soldiers, and while all this chaos spread the Tyrant of Helike had been orchestrating his own schemes for his still-inscrutable purpose. Somewhere in the countryside my father was in the hands of the Grey Pilgrim, who would be drawn to any decisive battle between my armies and the Alliance's sure as dusk's coming. Add to that the way Masego had gone missing after witnessing sorcery horrifying enough to level most a city and a war fleet, promptly gotten his hands on the ruins of Liesse – quite possibly the most dangerous magical weapon of our age – and that he must be too hurt or confused to reach out to any of the Woe. This, I thought, was going to be a bloody mayhem of sprawling death and treachery. The kind that determined the path a continent was going to take in the years that followed.

"Well," I finally said. "This is going to get a little tricky."

"This is going to get a little tricky," Indrani cheerfully repeated. "Now there's the title of your memoirs, Cat."

"I've always been partial to 'it got worse'," Hakram offered, the filthy traitor.

"Murder ensued," Akua tastefully suggested.

I glared but she just stared back at me, all smirking and insolence.

"You're all useless," I complained.

"Hakram's memoirs," Indrani grinned.

I gestured obscenely at her, which only had her chortling harder. Finally remembering I'd had a cup of wine on the table during this entire conversation, I snatched it and watered my parched throat. Gods, I'd missed actually being able to enjoy things.

"All right, then," I said. "Let's try to make a plan that doesn't end up dooming the entire continent."

"Cheers," Akua Sahelian smiled, raising her glass in answer.

Javvies

Cat is an expert at understatement.
This is going to be a lot tricky.

It wasn't a terrible idea, though.

I fully support the memoir titles debate. And want more of it.

Spencer C Kay

"It wasn't a terrible idea, though"

That's might actually be an even better title than the others.
To me at least.

Speerodude

"i swear i didnt start the fire"

broadaxe

"We didn't start the fire, it was always burning" xD

WuseMajor

I like "Let's try to make a plan that doesn't end up dooming the entire continent" honestly.

stevenneiman

Nah, that'd be either a political treatise or a self-help book.

Liliet

Collective memoirs by Catherine and Amadeus 😊

Raved Thrad

Amadeus, maybe. Catherine's is more likely to be "I Didn't Do It, Nobody Saw Me Do It, It Was Like That When I Got Here." 😊

Liliet

I mean she can have BOTH

pagesbe

Did I actually get first comment? Cool. Anyways, some great interaction between the Woe + Akua (who's an honorary Woe).

Andrew Mitchell

I think the Woe includes Akua now, for all intents and purposes anyway. In every way, except she's not actually been named as part of the Woe, yet.

stevenneiman

She is to the Woe what Scribe is to the Calamities. Or possibly was, I'm not sure if the Calamities are really a thing with at least two members dead and the ringleader stripped of at least his old Name.

Liliet

The chapter in which Akua got added to the party on the Keter journey was called "Sixth", so I'm getting the impression she very much is formally part of the Woe now.

Mental Mouse

Also Ranger off in the forest, with little sign of wanting to get involved (though that might well change when Keter comes knocking).

dodson

Since Masego is preoccupied, the position of OP spellcaster in the Woe's 5-man band will now be filled by Akua. I wonder Erraticerrata will keep her around once Masego is back though.

Someguy

Akua only exists as Emergency Spell Component. The odds for when Masego ends up using her needs to be looked up in Ratface's Books.

Liliet

Well we saw her and Masego working together on the way to Keter and Masego seemed to be very pleased with her assistance.

He's collecting sorcerous castoffs from Praes ;u;

Mental Mouse

How are these folks a five-man-band? I tried to make them match up to the slots, but I couldn't.

Henry Pakkala

Catherine-leader obviously Thief-lancer her job is to serve as the moral foil to the rest of them

Archer-Big guy she it's mostly around for combat

Masango-Smart guy obviously adjutant-heart he's the one who keeps the team functioning behind the scenes and manages most of their interpersonal relationships

Azure

"Keep your grudges close, child, and never forget them. We are Callowans, and for every slight there is a price."

Catherine and Vivienne are Callowan. They will NEVER forget.

ruduen

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!

Also, I'm curious what a full set of memoir titles would be.

Insanenoodlyguy

Ahh, this is that good "everybody sits around and talks" shit I missed with too many of the characters split up.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes!

But I still really missed Juniper and Vivenne's contributions.

Azure

Yes it's been too long. Can't wait for Vivienne to get back into the main story with Catherine. I've missed her.

Liliet

y e s

danh3107

Akua's cheek is in peak form in this chapter, nothing else really to talk about.

Jon schoenthaler

thanks for the Chapter!

IDKWhoitis

There's no way this ends well. For like, anyone.

She really is going to make her Father proud.

Liliet

Hey, Amadeus's signature actually IS going for the happy ending. For everyone.

Like father, like daughter.

sutortyrannus

Am I the only one who suspects that Catherine is nailing together a story in which to trap Amadeus, ensuring that he'll be swept up into it in a direction and manner she wants?

Since gating into Iserre, I'm fairly sure that every POV of hers has included a reference to him as her father, along with some form of reflection on his nature in comparison to her own. Given the limited insight we're sometimes given into Catherine's decisions, I'm willing to believe that it's deliberate.

The story it weaves is that of a child growing up, and learning to see a parent as another human being, reaching the point where their own worldview has developed to the point where they are judging their parents according to their own values.

I can see the arrow of meaning it's creating, but I can't figure out towards what it's pointed.

dodson

I'm also as much interested in this as I am to learn what kind of story-fu Pilgrim is going to pull! Between him and cat, which of their stories will gain more weight?

Mental Mouse

There's a more basic story at play: The student is becoming the master.

Liliet

This.

Liliet

I think that's a human thing, not a story thing.

sutortyrannus

How many things are more human than a story?

Liliet

It's a more immediately human thing, not mediated/filtered/considered through a story.

Liam Boyd

I'm still trying to figure out how you made Akua one of my favorite characters. She went from being an antagonist I genuinely hated, and just wanted to get killed off already....

TO being someone who brings just the biggest smiles to my face when I read her parts.

H0000W?!@?!

Nathan

I'm pretty sure its like what Cat said previously with the Crusade, it doesn't matter if you're a monster, as long as your 'their' monster.

When Akua became part of Cat's side her faults became quirks and the things that made her so infuriating became assets, and so she became our Monster, our dear and oh so terrible monster ^^

Chow Chow

Right?!

Maybe with scenes like here when Akuas pouting is shown to be her trying to seduce or tempt Cat because she was left out of the loop for too long

Liliet

Erratic wrote her as a person.

That's, like, it. That's the secret. We've seen enough of her POV, learned enough about her story, to know her and understand her.

And she's pretty amazing, all things considered.

Skaddix

I wonder when Malicia gets to raise a New Warlock whose first mission will probably be taking back Foramen.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think it's Malicia's choice; Warlock is not a title she bestows, it's a Name. The roles of Apprentice and Warlock are both currently vacant as far as we know. But people will rise to claim those Names sooner or later.

Skaddix

Its not totally her choice but she should be able to influence who gets the title.

Mental Mouse

I don't think so... the titles Warlock and Apprentice are very much about magic, not connected to the Tower or Empress. She might be able to encourage likely candidates, but no more than, say, Amadeus could – and she'd probably have better luck trying a candidate for Apprentice.

Amadeus got to pick a Squire only because that's the lead-in role to his own (old) Name, just as Warlock might well have helped his son achieve the Apprentice name. In both cases, the risk is the same – potentially creating your successor.

JJR

““All right, then,” I said. “Let’s try to make a plan that doesn’t end up dooming the entire continent.””

There goes my “study physics in Keter” plan.

SpeckofStardust

I cant believe they did something so utterly stupid. Like aiming to win all the things with a single brilliant move as a villain is like the number 1 thing you don’t go for.

Argentorum

Remember what Indrani said back in the Everdark, only Cat thinks like that. Even Archer thinks it’s weird that Cat can look at herself like a character in a story, like a piece on a board. For everyone else, this is just there life.

SpeckofStardust

Over reach is a thing, and by all accounts the regent of callow has decided to march with the host of this army, meaning that Callow has no one of importance in charge. And is completely and utterly doomed if this mess goes further south, putting all your eggs in 1 basket and then tossing that basket into a ever growing fire literal requires no special mindset in order to go ‘Ya bad plan’

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, even sending only 20k soldiers would have been enough. It was extremely stupid, even from a strategical and tactical point of view only

Cicero

Ah, but Viv is a hero (a tainted, renegade, cynical hero, but a hero none the less).

Liliet

In this entire thread, I love your point the best.

RanVor

Oh, but is she really?

Raved Thrad

She may not have a Name, but I don't doubt that she is still a hero. 😊

RanVor

That's not quite what I meant...

Zach

I don't know if Callow even counts as a villainous entity at this point. Cat herself doesn't have a name, and neither does Vivienne.

Skaddx

I mean I also don't see why Viv is with the army. She is not a military leader, she was a Named sure but even at the height of her power she was not a combat ace in fact she was the weakest Woe in combat by far, and it leaves Callow with no leadership whatsoever or at least none besides a few nobles of dubious loyalty. I mean they are awfully hopeful that the Goblins and High Lords/Ladies keep Malicia occupied. Quite the gamble especially when Lady Abreha can look across from the Blessed Isles and see no opposition of note.

Skaddx

I mean overall Viv and Hakrams's plan is fine but they massively overreached especially when you consider they had no idea when Cat was coming back and Masego went rogue with a super weapon before this point. So if the Named under Pilgrim weren't doing their own plan, they could have showed up and destroyed the Legions of Callow. Cause again even with a Name Viv is cannon fodder and Hakram is split yeah some Aspects boost his combat power but he is still a hybrid. Especially when you consider the Tyrant crushed a whole army solo.

Novice

What with all the (either attempted or successful) assassinations going around, I'm fairly certain in the middle of the Army is the safest place for the current Callowan regent, especially since Viv no longer has her old Name.

Liliet

My guess is that it was necessary for the political veneer with Amadis.

Someguy

>“All right, then,” I said. “Let’s try to make a plan that doesn’t end up dooming the entire continent.”

Next: Ends up dooming the entire continent.

NZPIEFACE

>“Hakram’s memoirs,” Indrani grinned.

An actual book.

And capital D Diabolist... But not capital T Thief...

Euodiachloris

Thief as a Name is currently AWOL, presumed sulking. 🤨

Decius

Did Akua finally poison Cat here, or is her treachery still in the planning stages?

RanVor

Looks like it’s currently in the “maybe someday” stage.

Nathan

Unless she’s acting under the rule of ‘when you least expect it’.

When/If she turns on them I’m going to be equally disappointed and guess surprised, cause I really wanna believe in ‘For Justice and Friendship Akua’ (and I guess that’s where she gets me -.-)

RanVor

She has already had her chance and decided not to use it. If she really is plotting against Cat at this point, her scheme must be mind-bogglingly complex.

Zachary

The only angle I can potentially see is that she has a better chance hitched to Catherine’s ship and following it until she’s in a good position to betray than attempting to go it alone from within the middle of the Everdark (which I think is what would have happened if she had betrayed her then).

RanVor

She’s a ghost. Physical limitations shouldn’t be a problem.

dodson

'mindbogglingly complex' is pretty on-brand for one of Diabolist's plots.

RanVor

By "mind-bogglingly complex" I meant "Bard-level or higher".

Liliet

Occam's Razor says she's more likely than not genuinely on Cat's side.

There are so many reasons for her to be, and so very little for her outside of Cat's service, considering NOBODY currently alive has any reason to like her...

Jeffrey T Ma

typo at the end "You're not going to let my arm go unless I repeat it, do you?"
are you

Skaddix

Why does Cat think Masego would reach out to Hakram or Viv anyway? Yeah he and Hakram get along fine but he third or fourth at best in the Woe in terms of friend if you count Akua as a member. Its like Cat forgets that her, Indrani and Akua were out of contact. The members who would be most useful for any magical solution and the two with the best chance of talking to him were MIA. Cat had raw power at that point. Indrani and Akua have plenty of magical knowledge. Indrani obviously the closest to him with Cat as second.

Liliet

Masego knows they were out of contact, and Hakram and Vivi are his friends too.

Daniel E

Please tell me Vivienne gets screen time in the next few chapters. I am insanely curious about what's going on in her head right now.

Chapter 20: Bearings

"It is best to count one's fingers after shaking hands with Praesi."

– Queen Rowena Alban of Callow

I'd never gotten the full story behind that scarf. Indrani almost never took it off, with the notable exception of when she was naked and otherwise occupied, and she'd been evasive about it when I'd asked. The weave was unusual, finer and tighter than I'd ever seen of Callowan cloth, but save for that there was nothing exceptional about the grey and green scarf. It was from Mercantis, she'd said, and a gift from the Ranger. The first thing she'd ever owned. Aside from those bare bones Indrani had never spoken a word of the matter and I knew better than to push. I was not without little pieces of my own, stolen moments and memories I would rather not have put under the scrutiny of another no matter how dear to me they were. Worn as the cloth was, it seemed one of the few possessions Archer actually cared for along with her monster of a longbow. That she was a wanderer to the bone was plain enough to see, standing before me with the sum of her earthly belongings as she was. Blades, bow, a leather satchel and the clothes on her back. She neither needed nor particularly wanted more than that. A strange thought, to me. I'd not acquired a taste for luxury even after taking the crown, but having a place of my own – a home – and some comforts in it had always seemed natural. Something everyone would want.

I supposed I'd just have to make those rooms a little larger, for whenever my vagrant of a friend came back.

"Snow's crisp," Indrani said. "Wind's calm. Good night for a stroll."

"I'd tell you to be careful," I said, "but somehow I don't see that happening."

Tugging down her scarf to flash an admittedly roguish smile, Archer winked at me. This was not, I decided, in the least reassuring.

"I'll be the very soul of prudence," she lied.

Leaving me to stand leaning on my staff, she quickly darted across the snow to take Hakram's shoulder in hand. Half a hug, a rough display of affection.

"Keep an eye on them, Hakram," she said, without a hint of irony. "You know how careless they get without me around to chaperone."

Adjutant leaned down to gently knock his forehead against her own. Neck angled a little to the side, I noted, as to allow for Indrani to rip open his throat with her fangs were she an orc. A display of trust and kinship, the kind orcs usually reserved for their close family.

"If you die, I've staked a claim on your bow," he told her.

That startled a laugh out of her, along with jeering about how he was supposed to shoot anything when he kept dropping hands all over the place. Akua was standing a little to the side of them, high-collared dress of pale and gold sweeping down to her feet. For all the apparent slenderness of the cloth, she was unaffected by the chill of the night. Indrani clapped her shoulder amicably, which the shade allowed with a fondly tolerant smile.

"You know, since I'm leaving-" Archer began.

Diabolist sighed.

"Fine," she conceded. "Look your fill."

Indrani's brow rose in surprise, then she grinned eagerly. Did I even want to know? A heartbeat passed, and Akua did not move.

"You're still wearing clothes," Archer pointed out, sounding a little cheated.

"According to certain interpretations of Trismegistan theory, I am in fact naked at all times," the shade drily replied.

"Praesi treachery," Indrani cursed.

Adjutant's silhouette loomed tall at my side, the orc calmly studying the scene. Linger on the smile that came easy to Archer's lips, the almost mellow way Diabolist stood even when so close to her. The last time he'd seen the two of them together, I thought, Indrani had suggested firing arrows at Akua for sport. Before the Everdark, I thought, but that was only part of it. Before Great Strycht, in truth, and the choices made there. Hakram had not been part of those dark hours, and might not understand the ties they had forged. Vivienne, I considered, almost certainly would not. The musings were set aside when Archer finished her usual ritual of taunts and insults with Diabolist, nonchalantly returning to me. She hesitated and I went rifling through my cloak, fingers emerging tightened around a silver flask I tossed at her. Nimbly snatching it out of the air, she cocked an eyebrow at me.

"Iserran brandy," I lied.

It was, in fact, the foulest-tasting belt of drow senna I'd been able to get my hands on. Hopefully she'd choke on the muddy taste of the mushroom-made liquor while expecting a smooth Proceran distillate. That ought to teach her covers were not to be hogged when it was this cold out and your queen was very much mortal again.

"But I didn't get you anything," she pouted, putting away the flask even as she did.

"That's quite-"

I could have struggled and perhaps even blocked her, but when she put a hand on my waist and dipped me backwards I decided to allow Indrani her way. The kiss was rough, though in a way she knew I liked, and the warmth of her was stirring.

"There," she said, after withdrawing.

I coughed to hide my breath was a little uneven.

"There," I very eloquently agreed.

Her hand remained on my shoulder and she met my eyes, this time with serious mien.

"I'll find him, Cat," Indrani said. "Bring him home in one piece."

I nodded, just as serious.

"If one of us can, it's you," I replied. "I'll be expecting the both of you back."

"You've gotten so demanding since they put a crown on your head," Indrani snorted.

This time we parted for good, and with a casual wave of the hand at all of us she began her trek into the snow. Under the last sliver of the warning moon I watched her leave to recover Masego. Hakram and Akua came to stand at my sides, flanking me in shared silence until finally I breathed out.

"Come on," I said. "Adjutant, I want to show you something."

I glanced at Diabolist, who nodded back. Good, it was about time I had a close look at the well I'd charged her to gather.

—

I could feel the slow, constant pulse of the Night even from over fifty feet away.

Akua had put up comprehensive layers of wards around the tent, but that much accumulated power could never be entirely hidden. To me, who stood First Under the Night, it was like feeling a warm whisper of wind against my skin. Diabolist's eyes looked brighter, her body more... tangible the closer we came, but it was Hakram's reaction that interested me. He was the only one of the three of us who truly still bore a Name, after all. I could see in the way he straightened his back and free his hand from encumbrance that he was feeling something, at least. He met my gaze uneasily.

"There's a scent in the air," he gravelled. "Like coolness and dark."

"Sharp nose," Diabolist said, and she ushered us into her workshop.

I'd only been in here once before, at the start, and when the well had barely even taken shape. This was rather more advanced, I thought. Field conditions were no friend to the kind of precision work mages of Akua and Masego's favoured at the exclusion of almost all else, but Diabolist had made do on the road. The ground beneath the tent was bereft of snow and had been glassed by a Mighty's flame to be perfectly level. The shade glared at us when we entered until we rid our boots of the worst of the snow, and she went through a pack to retrieve cloths for us to wipe them entirely clean afterwards. Akua herself almost danced to the side of the artefact she was constructing, steps light and elated like a girl at her first summer fair. Adjutant's eyes remained peeled on the well for a long moment, until he let out a shuddering breath.

"What," he said, "exactly is that?"

"Our answer to the Grey Pilgrim," I said.

In a sardonic bit of humour Akua had actually built it to look like a wishing well, though one held up above the floor by four curved supports of lead. Lead, I had learned from my recent studies, held strong properties of stability and grounding if never touched by fire. Held up by those supports was a disc of polished onyx, and from that bottom rose the shape of a well. Shards of obsidian bound together by thin strands of copper – there was, allegedly, no better metal for bridging – made up a glittering octagon, though several large swaths of the side were still empty. Above the well itself, two slender pillars of amethyst-studded copper held up a quaint little angled roof. The roof itself was made of the same obsidian-and-copper assembly as the well, though compared to the octagon the progress made in filling it was farther along. Unsurprising: every shard from the well contained the full exertion of a Mighty's Night from dusk till dawn, but the roof held only the same by sigil-holders.

"At this pace, the main body will be finished within seven nights," Diabolist said. "The upper receptacles-"

"Roof," I drily said. "She means roof."

"- will take within twenty to thirty nights," she finished, as if I had never spoken. "Though the artefact itself will be functional after the upper receptacles are half-filled, which will be achieved two dawns from now."

"Won't be as strong, though," I said.

"Which would only be an issue if you meant to directly oppose a foe's miracles," Akua said.

Hakram stepped forward hesitantly, boots crisply sounding against the floor. He leaned over the roof, thickly-ridged brow knotting.

"I recognize some of this," he said. "Praesi sorcery."

Diabolist let out a pleased little noise.

"Indeed," she said. "The underlying structure is Trismegistan, of course, though I required some... consultation with Sve Noc before I could properly account for the properties of the Night."

"And what does it do?" Adjutant asked.

I began moving forward, then suddenly stopped. My staff had begun to pulse, the Night I had woven within beckoned by Akua's much more complex creation. Unwilling to risk the power still sleeping inside, I propped it up against the side of the tent and limped forward instead. Hakram extended an arm without a word, and I gratefully leaned on it. Fingers tracing the obsidian of the roof, I drew his attention to three symbols in Crepuscular carved on the frame. They reappeared in the patterns, over and over again.

"Years ago, when we were still kids playing war games in the Tower's shadow, I had a talk with Kilian," I said. "I told her that Juniper was actually predictable, in a way, because if she had all the information she nearly always made the right choice."

I smiled, almost melancholy at the memory of those simpler days.

"Presumptuous of me to say, as she proved in swift order, but I learned to temper the principle," I said. "But for this? Oh, I know how they're going to swing at us. They tipped their hand at the Battle of the Camps, Hakram. They have one tool that could really cripple us, so it's a near-certainty it'll be used."

"And so you prepared an answer," Adjutant said.

I ran my thumb against the three symbols. One did not need to know Crepuscular, to glimpse their meaning, for the written language of the drow could sometimes be of obvious meanings. The sun rampant, the sun halved, the sun veiled.

"So we prepared an answer," I softly agreed.

We left Akua to her toil, after that, filling a well I hoped would not be needed. Yet, as with the sword I had been leaning on in the shape of a staff, I was not certain I would have a choice.

Waste of wastes, but what else could I do?

—

Marching across Iserre with an army of near seventy thousand, even if fifty thousand of those were drow, was not a quick or quiet affair. The Fourth and Third had been put through twin ringers of constant pursuit and assault, and to be frank both had been reaching the end of their rope. Yet I couldn't afford to slacken our march, either, as drow scouts began reporting that the Levantine army we'd fought the vanguard of at Sarcella was on our tail. Still more than a week behind us, but the reason for that delay became clear when reports of banners not of the Dominion emerged: they'd had Principate reinforcements. Either southern levies hastily put together, or more dangerously the border army of twenty-thousand the First Prince had garrisoned in Tenerife to discourage incursion by the League. Which meant Kairos and his allies had let the lot of them through, because they shouldn't have had the strength to push back a determined League force. If it truly was Hasenbach's southern army, that was bad news indeed. Those would be professional soldiers, in majority, that the First Prince had judged would be able to either slow or turn back an invasion by the entire League of Free Cities. They wouldn't be pushovers, or peasants with spears.

The forced halt of several hours every dawn further complicated our advance, as it needed to be compensated for by marching after nightfall if we didn't want to lose almost a third of the day's march. The Firstborn significantly quickened after dusk, of course, but my legionaries most definitely did not. The disjointed peaks made planning awkward, especially as I was wary of simply sending a significant drow force ahead: we were headed into contested grounds, now. A force of five thousand Firstborn caught just after dawn by Levantine or Proceran cavalry would be severely bled, and sending a legionary escort with them would defeat the entire purpose of the exercise. There was no obvious fix to the issue, and none of my three current generals – Abigail, Bagram, Rumena – suggested a feasible alternative. We'd just have to awkwardly force our way forward as fast as we could, hoping we'd get to Juniper before the opposition did.

It was a mere six days after the Fourth was brought back into the fold that we ran into our first enemy outriders.

"Proceran," General Bagram opined. "Alamans, at a guess. The Arlesites tend to carry javelins."

Adjutant grunted in agreement. The Fourth had taken the front, today, so it was them who'd sent for me when riders were seen on the horizon. The two of them were on foot, which given that I was seated atop Zombie meant for once I towered taller than either of them.

"That's at least sixty horsemen," I noted, shielding my eyes from the sun with my hand. "Screening company, you think?"

"Seems likely," Bagram said. "Finally good news, eh?"

I nodded thoughtfully. The riders were to our northwest, and if they'd been sent there to watch for our advance it meant we were getting close to Juniper's position. It also meant, though, that the northern armies of the Dominion and Procer were close enough to the Hellhound that were keeping an eye out for sudden reinforcements to her position. So we're not the only ones at your gate, Juniper, I thought.

"No point in sending foot after them," Adjutant said. "They'd be long gone by the time any legionary got there."

"So we don't send legionaries," I replied. "One of you get a message to General Rumena, I want the Losara Sigil to send a warband in pursuit immediately."

"Even light foot won't catch up to horse," General Bagram told me as delicately as an orc could, which wasn't very.

I forced down the sharp swell of irritation.

"No, General Bagram, during the day it will not," I flatly said. "Should the horsemen rest at night, however, the Firstborn might very well catch them by surprise if they begin pursuing right now."

I must not have hidden my annoyance completely, because Bagram saluted and promptly volunteered to speak with Rumena himself. He wasn't a bad commander, I knew. More experienced than any of my Rat Company officers, he'd been the second of General Istrid for decades and effectively run her general staff while she fought on the frontlines. But he wasn't one of mine: he was one of Black's people, in some deep manner. From Black's crop of soldiers shaped by my teacher's own decades of war. Bagram would not trust my judgement the way Juniper or Nauk would have. I was, in his eyes, still very much the Carrion's Lord apprentice. A promising successor but not my teacher's equal.

"The temper's back, at least," Hakram amusedly said.

I glared at him.

"He might as well have called me an idiot," I retorted.

"He's fresh to your service," Adjutant said. "And a hint of fang will be good for your relationship. Bagram was second to Istrid Knightsbane, a hard look won't offend him."

I grunted, somewhat mollified.

"It's better now," Adjutant pensively said. "When your hackles go up, it's still you. Not Winter hunger with a Foundling shape to it."

I glanced away.

"That was me too, Hakram," I said. "Just with large enough a hammer everything looked like a nail."

"It was you on a dark day that never quite passed," the orc disagreed, head shaking in slight disagreement. "And whispers in your ear. You handled it better than most would have, but the marks were there."

"You never said anything," I frowned.

"You were drinking aragh like water, at the start," Hakram said. "But you got it under control after some prodding. That meant you weren't frozen, just slowed. I was willing to wait."

My fingers clenched.

"Maybe you shouldn't have," I said.

"It didn't make you worse, Catherine," Adjutant said. "Jagged edges, true, but those weren't sunny days. Jagged kept a lot of people breathing."

"Killed just as many," I said.

Adjutant turned to me, the glare of the sun casting shadows like scar across his leathery face. The dark, deep-set eyes were as serene as I'd always known them to be.

"You did what needed doing," Hakram Deadhand said. "It wasn't all pretty, and most won't thank you for it. But you kept Callow standing until it could stand, and even with Winter in your soul it was a peace you strove for."

He bared a thin stripe of ivory fangs, chidingly.

"It's a gentle sort of tyranny, by my reckoning, that you would name the worst of you," he said.

I released the grip on my reins, slowly.

"It's a little uncanny, sometimes," I said. "The way you always know what to say."

His fangs clicked amusedly.

"That is who we are," Adjutant simply said.

I stroked Zombie's mane and spurred her slightly, enough that she danced to the side and my leg grazed his side. We stayed there for a while, watching the riders on the horizon, until he spoke up again.

"So," he said. "Archer?"

I cocked my head to the side.

"I know there's a risk in sending her after Masego when there's heroes on the prowl, to the both of us, but-"

"You are letting her leave to return with a victory," Hakram interrupted in a rumbling voice, "and sending a trusted and powerful Named after what could be a disastrous trouble. I'm well aware, Cat. As you are that I wasn't asking about that at all."

I cleared my throat.

"Surprised you waited this long to ask," I said.

"Wasn't entirely sure until the farewell display," the orc admitted. "You two have always been..."

Yeah, he didn't really need to elaborate on that. For both our sakes, really.

"It's a thing," I said. "That is happening. On occasion."

"But not," Hakram said, "too frequently?"

"We're not involved, if that's what you're asking," I said.

"Ah," he hummed. "Unusual, for you."

He didn't ask the question, only leaving the door open to elaborate if I felt like it. Gods, I'd missed him.

"I'm in the middle of a continent-wide war," I eventually said. "Romance isn't exactly a priority."

"But," Hakram said.

"Might be something I want eventually," I shrugged. "Won't be anytime soon, or with her. We know where we stand, and regardless there's the... Masego situation."

"That's been hard to get a read on," the orc said.

"Like watching denial and obliviousness waltz," I snorted. "Though I have to wonder how much of those there really are, when it comes down to it."

Masego had his habits, but he wasn't exactly blind. Mostly he missed cues, or misread the reasons for things – I suspected his upbringing hadn't helped, both because of the men who'd raised him and the environment they'd raised him in. I could hardly think of a more terrifyingly frustrating place for a boy who'd had difficulty understanding others than Praesi aristocratic circles. When it came to the Woe he tended to catch onto things fairly well, and ask when he thought he was missing something. And he'd asked me to take care of Indrani before leaving for Thalassina, noting her to be upset. As for Indrani, well, what she said and what she thought weren't always the same thing. Especially when it came to what she considered shamefully soft attachments, like admitting she loved people who loved her. Fucking Ranger, I uncharitably thought.

"I don't think it would be an issue if we kept doing this after we're all back together," I finally added.

Hakram bowed his head in agreement.

"Tell me you're not sleeping with the other one, at least," he gravelled.

I choked.

"Akua?" I protested. "Gods no. I mean, don't get me wrong, just look at her-"

"You often do," the orc said. "Though I don't see the appeal, to be honest. She's dangerous, I suppose, but all soft and fleshy."

"Those can, uh, be good things," I muttered. "But she's still Akua, Hakram."

"I am aware," Adjutant said. "But I wonder if that means the same thing it used to, Cat. For you, at least, and perhaps Indrani."

"This the softer predecessor of the crucible Vivienne is going to put me through?" I said, a tad sharply.

The orc shook his head.

"I wasn't down there," he said. "You will have reasons for this, though you haven't shared them. I want to know where we stand with her, that's all."

Silence reigned, for a long moment.

"I am no longer bound by the oath to kill her," I acknowledged.

"But," Hakram said.

"One hundred thousand souls," I said. "There has to be a price for that."

He slowly nodded.

"Until then, she is to be Akua," the orc murmured. "Not the Doom of Liesse."

I did not reply. I did not need to.

—

Before dawn, Ivah came back with four survivors from the Proceran outriders. We were two days' march away from Juniper, which was pleasing.

The enemy had beaten us there, which was not.

theart0fwar

Thanks for the chapter!

Ortsarecool

"Praesi treachery," Indrani cursed.
I'm crying. Just great.

theart0fwar

This line was just great. They're really getting together well, the murderer and... the other murderer. Huh.

Liliet

The mass murderer and the non-mass murderer :3

Sanctus Obscurum

The mass murderer and the sniper.

stevenneiman

"I'm not a CRAZED GUNMAN, dad, I'm an assassin! Well the difference being one of them's a job and the other's a mental sickness!"

Liliet

Yas.

Indrani sure as fuck doesn't act like it, but sniper low key IS her combat speciality.

Decius

The serial murderer and the massively parallel murderer.

Liliet

Only of combatants!

Euodiachloris

Warrior vs War Criminal.

Liliet

^^ ♥

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

theart0fwar

Gotcha by a few seconds!

DroughtBringer

True! Nicely done!

I will have to step up my game,

Evil Laugh

epokkiEpok

Come check the discord also, <https://discord.gg/cr5he0>

Insanenoodlyguy

Well shit. This is now going to be a mild to moderate clusterfuck even if it goes well.

Novice

I love how clusterfucks have sliders now. Could have sworn when people say 'clusterfuck', it's always safe to assume the worst. What's the highest on the scale, by the way?

caoimhinh

I think "Pandemonium" is the highest on the fuckery scale of messy situations, right above "Everything falling apart" and can be close to Nightmare Fuel events.

It can be a world-ending scenario if the protagonist's gay friend makes a pact with an Evil Entity; involving an eclipse is optional XD

Draeysine

An Absolute Clusterfuck.

Cicero

Isn't it FUBAR?

While SNAFU is the lightest?

Military always has acronyms to describe the important scenarios.

Barack Obama

Extra Spicy

danh3107

Hakram just called Akua fat, that's a bit disingenuous....

SHE THICC

Big Brother

He called her soft and fleshy. That doesn't mean fat. I could be called soft and fleshy at 155lbs, if only because I've very little muscle tone with a small gut.
Soft and Fleshy applied to Akua means RAVASHING, curvy in every perfect spot in every perfect way, as she was bred to be.

Skaddx

I mean based on descriptions of living characters Akua is the second hottest chick after Malicia. Though Malicia seems to have an Aspect that works similar to Hierarch in that everyone finds her attractive. It even works on people like Masego who well we don't know now but previously had no interest in Sexual Stuff. Orcs though don't value soft curvy looks. Hakram stated before he finds Humans not attractive someone like Indrani or Captain (RIP) is probably what he views as the most attractive for a Human.

Liliet

I think it's not an Aspect of Alaya's, she just does that via sorcerous effects.

Not that we have hard confirmation of it not being an Aspect, but given the nature of her past trauma, I'd say it's unlikely.

Agent J

It's Name shenanigans, like Cat and Black's shadow manipulation. Not an Aspect and not sorcery.

Fayhem

The canon explanation from earlier chapters, IIRC, is that neither is the case. She was that beautiful before she even had a Name or anyone to work sorcery on her, which is why Dread Emperor Shitlord McGee abducted her from the tavern she was working in for her father for his harem. Her Name has kept her young b/c that's basically the one thing that villains get that heroes don't, and I think it was also mentioned that she has some subtle sorcerous effects in her court gowns that basically serve to foreground it in people's attention to help her keep people (esp men ofc) off balance, but the beauty itself has been stated to be all hers.

Liliet

^^^ yeah, these effects are what I was referring to.

Insanenoodlyguy

Bit of both, as I understood it. She has magical enchantments on her person, but she is breathtakingly hot by default, and her name keeps and enhances that. All emperor/expresses have a "this one is in charge and is to be loved/feared/obeyed" aura, but hers emphasizes the lust/love aspect. Stack it all together and you get Malicia, always the hottest person in the room. As to her past, that helped shape it this way, she knows her looks get her attention but over the years she learned how to weaponize that until it became a literal weapon

Javvies

Hmmm. Targeted, specific countermeasures designed for the biggest known Heroes.

Killing Saint is probably doable, but containing Pilgrim probably won't be sustainable for very long.

They're coming up behind the enemies around Juniper, that's a mixed benefit – it's potentially a hammer and anvil situation, but they can't afford to take too long winning and getting back moving, because they are being pursued, even though they've got a semi-decent lead.

Better than getting there first and getting trapped within Juniper's encampment.

Kairos is Up To Something, as per usual. He really needs to get killed thoroughly, and the sooner the better.

This still be interesting.

Skaddix

I am honestly not sure who kills Kairos but I bet good odds that Hanno takes out Hierarch. If anyone can get Hanno to break the I don't judge rule its the man who runs and worships the city that got his mother killed. Still Kairos cannot go out probably until he tries to trap an Angel that Cordelia is raising.

magesbe

It was Asur that got his mother killed. Hierarch "worships" Bellerophon (I'm sure I mangled the spelling, but you get the idea).

Skaddx

Fair enough I think its still a good clash. Since Hierarch believes in the Laws of Man and White Knight believes in the Mandate of Heaven.

RanVor

You didn't. You did, however, mangle the spelling of Ashur.

werafdsaew

It's not meant to counter Pilgrim; it's meant to counter Pilgrim's counter.

My very own name

That's some blue MtG deck level fuckery.

Fayhem

Ah blue, the deck color that says you feed off the hatred of others because negative attention is still attention.

Argentorum

Ah blue, the color that says you like complex and manifold games, as opposed to running the same flavor of face mashing every time 🤪

Liliet

grabs popcorn do continue

Mental Mouse

Yes, we were all wondering about that upcoming clash. Using heavenly Light to counter the power of Night is a no-brainer for Pilgrim (or the White Knight, for that matter), Apparently Cat's answer is to simply overwhelm their personal miracles with power.

You know, Catherine would have a much easier time persuading everyone else to ban summoning of angels and demons, if she didn't keep allying herself with major independent Powers. 😊

Ultimate_Procrastinator

Power, the element of surprise, and possibly some trickery of Akua's own devising

Dainpdf

Must admit I am a bit worried she has two silver bullets but at least five obstacles/people who Need to Go – the Bard, Kairos, Hierarch, Saint, and Pilgrim. Hopefully the heroes can take down a couple, and she has something secret prepared for the Bard.

Mental Mouse

The Bard is a problem for another day, especially as she's apparently elsewhere. Kairos is a PITA, but as demonstrated at their meeting, he's a PITA that Cat is well-equipped to deal with. Hierarch is unnerving but local; as far as the war goes, he's basically taking his city off the map. I do tend to doubt that his power will affect the Dead King's undead!

Some commenters have theorized that Hierarch is summoning an angel for Kairos to trap, but no way is an Evil Name in an Evil city getting an angel to show up.

Dainpdf

I think you're underestimating the two. Kairos has a plan, and Hierarch is crazy.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, he is putting half the Procer in danger, by distracting everyone of the Dead King. He is also "allied" with the Hierarch, a madman who can spread his (stupid) madness around here. Both of them need to die, and the sooner, the better.

Cicero

I thought obvious that the purpose of the well was not referring to countering a specific hero but a specific event.

Dawn is the obvious counter to the drow, obviously the Gods Above will arrange a way for an unexpected dawn, so create a well that can hide the sun.

Decius

If the Dawn is the miracle, the direct opposition would be to make it dusk. But the way to let the miracle happen and not be affected by it: Create an eclipse. The moon can blot out the sun without ever fighting it.

Skaddx

Oh come now Cat and Hakram like you could stop Indrani from chasing Masego anyway.

I am not sure why Cat is worried about Hakram having issues with Akua, she didn't massacre any Orcs and he is sociopath driven by pragmatism and getting the Liesse Accords done. Masego respects Akua spellcasting and doesn't care about the little people anyway so really Viv is the only likely to be mad about Akua.

Liliet

So many things here that are slightly off from how I'm seeing them, it's actually kinda interesting.

– I don't think Indrani would have left ywithout Cat okaying the idea. She cares about Masego, but she cares about the rest of the Woe too, and she trusts Cat to have a better grasp on the strategic situation, including the storyweaving situation, and what is and isn't a good idea. I mean obviously this was one, but if Cat had tried to stop Indrani from doing it it would have been for a damn good reason and Indrani knows that. Communication and trust!

– Hakram functioned as Cat's conscience / reminder of her principles / moral check TWO CHAPTERS AGO. Don't tell me you already forgot "weren't we better than this, when we started?" :3 I mean I'm not making judgements about Hakram being or not being a sociopath, but he's got a strong grasp on ethics either way, and he DOES challenge Cat's judgements on them.

– Masego doesn't 'not care about the little people'. He cares about people in general abstract when he thinks about it, but has very little ability to put it into practice is the thing. And he usually doesn't think about it. He's oblivious, not amoral. (One of his first converstional exchanges with Cat, in the chapter where he was introduced, was actually an ethics debate, god fucking bless).

More importantly, the 'little' modifier there is insultingly misleading. Masego doesn't discriminate by class, he discriminates by personal relationships and absolutely nothing else. I guarantee you he doesn't consider Praesi nobles to possess more moral relevance than Callowan peasants. If anything, Callowan peasants are people Catherine cares about, and therefore matter slightly more than Praesi nobles, who as far as he's aware nobody he cares about does. Your conclusion that he doesn't give a fuck about Cat's treatment of Akua is absolutely correct (I mean it's canon, we've seen this dynamic on the way to Keter already), but the reasons for that are different than you've listed :3

Skaddix

I mean Indrani was going after Masego eventually so Cat I suppose could have convinced Indrani to wait but in a critical battle would Indrani be at her best while Worrying about Masego that is also a consideration. Yes Indrani trust Cat when it comes to story manipulation and setting the mission for the Woe but when it comes to Masego...I think Cat learned her lesson when she wanted to stop Masego from going to his Fathers.

Hakram does what is best for Cat. So if he needs to act as her conscious then that is what he will do. However, there is nothing to show Hakram cares about the average dead Callowan. He is also pragmatic so he is fine with Akua as long as she is useful and not treasonous but her killing 100,000 doesn't really factor into his calculations. If anything as he noted her being dangerous is something he likes about Akua, doesn't make up for her soft human features. But Orcs respect the ability to Kill.

Masego is similar. Masego doesn't really care that 100,000 Callowans died at all. He killed people who are not under Cat for rather minor insults all things considered and Cat had to make a list so he wouldn't just kill people who annoy him. I agree though that Masego doesn't make a distinction based on Birth Class. His primary rating factor about worth is probably knowledge/ability to do Magic.

So yeah I stand by my claim that Masego, Indrani and Hakram don't really care about a 100,000 Dead Callowans or to expand the "Little People" at all. They care about their circle of Friends and Family anyone not in that circle meh. Hakram and Masego would be fine keeping Akua around because she is useful even without the events in the Underdark. I also do not think they necessarily agree with Cat and presumably Viv that Akua needs a real punishment for all those kills if she doesn't go traitor.

Liliet

"I mean Indrani was going after Masego eventually"

I mean so was Cat?

You can't just postulate a highly hypothetical out of character Cat and then make assertions about Indrani's relationship with her like they apply to her relationship with the actual Cat 😊

They both care about him a whole lot. It's a them thing, not an Indrani thing. If anything, Catherine was his friend first.

~~one's his girlfriend one's his cousin~~

There's no need for Indrani to make it her own personal crusade when in the first chapter of this book she ended up being the one comforting Cat about the uncertainty there.

>Hakram does what is best for Cat. So if he needs to act as her conscience then that is what he will do. However, there is nothing to show Hakram cares about the average dead Callowan.

He certainly cares about the average racism'd orc, if his conversation with Vivienne in Zwischenzug II was any indication. And I take that explanation to be genuine.

Anyway, you asked why Catherine would think Hakram might grill her about Akua. This is why. Because he acts as her conscience when he thinks she needs it. Catherine expected that he might think she needs it in this case. That's the explanation.

>I agree though that Masego doesn't make a distinction based on Birth Class. His primary rating factor about worth is probably knowledge/ability to do Magic.

Something like that, though I don't think it's a moral judgement. He certainly had no problem with lethal wards killing sriers, and Praesi nobility tend to be skilled sorcerers themselves, and he's certainly shown no compunction killing them either. It's more like he cares only when and to the degree that he pays attention, and he's more likely to pay attention when magic is involved. And even then he usually deliberately reserves judgement. So no, he won't challenge Catherine's decisions on this. One way or another. He doesn't care about Akua any more than he counts about said 100 000 dead; he cares about them a little bit more in fact, because Catherine cares and he cares that Catherine cares. The minimum to which he cares about Akua – in an otherwise empty world empty situation he'd prefer her alive – is less than that.

And yes, of course, since he only cares about the situation through the lens of Catherine's judgements and doesn't care to figure out their sources, he'll be onboard with whatever.

Skaddix

Cat is not in a position to leave now even if she wanted. Nor can they both leave. Cat has to lead the Drow and is the main offensive magic user on her side. I am not saying Cat doesn't care about Masego but she hardly is in a position to do anything right now. As for eventually, I meant maybe Cat could convince Indrani to wait until after this upcoming battle. But I don't think Cat making a logical argument would necessarily sway Indrani.

Hakram says he cares about an Orc in the Army that doesn't mean he cares about all Orcs or cares about the average Human Callowan. I didn't ask why Hakram would grill Cat. And I don't necessarily take everything anyone says in this story at face value.

Again I am talking when he killed the two twins for no reason besides them saying some bad things about Cat. He also mentions that Cat made him a check list to not kill people who annoy him. Hakram is debatable I suppose but I think its Quite Clear that Indrani and Masego don't give a crap about anyone outside the circle of friends and family.

As for Akua my point is more the fact that she killed 100,000 Callowans is not going to factor much in Masego or Hakram view on whether she is worth keeping around.

Liliet

No, Cat is not in a position to leave, what does this have to do with anything?

I am saying Catherine would not have needed to make a logical argument to convince Indrani to not go off on a hare-brained quest of a single person catching an invisible flying fortress. In fact, judging from what Cat told Hakram, it might have been Cat's idea in the first place: Indrani does not think in story terms as much, and it might simply not have occurred to her that A can plausibly lead to B here.

>Hakram says he cares about an Orc in the Army that doesn't mean he cares about all Orcs or cares about the average Human Callowan.

It also doesn't mean that he doesn't?

>I didn't ask why Hakram would grill Cat.
>I am not sure why Cat is worried about Hakram having issues with Akua

>And I don't necessarily take everything anyone says in this story at face value.

I don't take everything anyone says at face value either. That doesn't mean everything is absolute chaos and nothing is real. Hakram joined Catherine in the first place because she tugged his emotion of caring about other people and then also his emotion of social justice. Remember that?

>Again I am talking when he killed the two twins for no reason besides them saying some bad things about Cat. He also mentions that Cat made him a check list to not kill people who annoy him.

Yeah. He also commented that it's better when the world works that way, and if it doesn't – well, you just have to make it.

He also informed Catherine that he calls everyone ignorant because if he doesn't, how will they know that they are and know to get better?

And don't forget that Catherine had to institute a rule of "friends don't vivisect friends" with Masego. And that he took a killswitch from her without questioning her motivations and later made fun of her for trying to keep it secret. He simply does not think about ethics the way human people normally do. That doesn't mean he doesn't have any.

>Hakram is debatable I suppose but I think its Quite Clear that Indrani and Masego don't give a crap about anyone outside the circle of friends and family.

Indrani and Masego give much less of a crap about anyone outside the circle of friends and family. It's you talking in absolutes that irks me here. They're both extremely locally focused, though for different reasons: Indrani is essentially traumatized and emotionally stunted by a childhood that went from literal slavery to a parental figure who fails to give half a fuck about anyone outside her own precious person, while Masego was raised by an incarnation of absolute evil and a devil, surrounded by a tight-knit loving friendgroup and the scorpion pit of Praesi aristocracy outside that, and ended up a little bit confused about how humans normally relate to one another period.

>As for Akua my point is more the fact that she killed 100,000 Callowans is not going to factor much in Masego or Hakram view on whether she is worth keeping around.

True. Masego simply does not consider this his business to pass judgement on, and Hakram does not strike me as someone particularly concerned with ideas like justice, retribution and prices to pay – purely future-oriented. He'll worry about what Akua's presence means to Cat going forward, not about what Akua already did.

Mental Mouse

Are you still calling Hakram a sociopath? Are you kidding? This is a guy who cut off his own hand to win someone's confidence, and not to betray her afterwards. Heck, he's a moral standard for others. Hakram is many things, but not a sociopath.

Liliet

I mean I would separate speculation about his mental architecture from judgement of his ethics 🤪

Skaddix

A sociopath can sacrifice things for personal gain and doesn't betray everyone they meet. I am not sure what your point is. I mean at the point in the story what advantage would Hakram gain from stabbing Viv in the back. A sociopath does not have to be a cackling madman.

Mental Mouse

Hakram went way beyond "not stabbing Viv in the back"! The thing is, if you want to use a word as anything other than a handy insult, you need to pay attention to what it actually means. And what's basic to both the popular and formal definitions of sociopathy, is a failure to care about other people. A sociopath's response to a teammate losing it might well be brutal, but not toward themselves. Sociopaths might help others if they feel it serves their interest, but they tend to be fairly specific about what their interests are. Hakram, in contrast, has shown goodwill and consideration consistently, including to strangers.

Someguy

If the Enemy has beaten them there, isn't the Hammer & Anvil the most classical answer?

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hammer_and_anvil

chris S

You know, since I'm leaving-" Archer began.

Diabolist sighed.

Plot twist, the entire series so far has been the set up to a comedic harem anime with Archer as the protagonist.

Liliet

Indrani has commented before that Cat's story is not hers.

THIS is her story.

Aotrs Commander

Is... is it wrong that I would totally read that...?

maresther23

Gods Bellow, yes! Please someone make a fanfic

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Always a pleasure to see Hakram on screen.

Andrew Mitchell

I shed tears during Archer's goodbye scene. Very well done EE, very well done indeed.

Great to see Cat & Hakram together again. I'm looking forward to seeing them discuss more about Hakram's lost hand.

IDKWhoitis

If Cat isn't bound by that oath to kill Akua, is she still bound heavily by the deal with Larat?

Skaddx

Did she make a magical oath with Akua? Making a deal with a Fae is different.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a really good question. I'm going to say probably not. I found the scene where that oath was made and it really could go either way IMO:

"“We swear to your service, Queen of the Hunt,” the fae said.
“Queen of Air and Darkness, Sovereign of Moonless Nights. We swear ‘til the day of last ruin, ‘til all debts are paid. We would ride beneath your banner, in this world and every other.”

The Queen of Callow rose to her feet, as bright and terrible as any of them, and softly laughed.

"What clever foxes you are," she said. "Your oaths I accept, in the spirit they were given."

Her sword hissed as it left the sheath, and she stood before the fae.

"Kneel, and rise in my service."

The Hunt knelt, the Hunt rose, and Brandon Talbot knew he would never forget the sight of this so long as he lived."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/03/07/epilogue-3/>

Dainpdf

Not that deal. The one where she swore to place seven crowns and one before Larat in exchange for his help against the army of the Princess of High Noon.

Liliet

That one was sealed by a separate mechanism, not by Cat's Winter nature. It should still hold.

Dainpdf

My opinion as well. It is also too ominous to just disappear.

Liliet

Also a fun thing about it is that if I understand correctly it's not really... time-specific? Like. It sounds like Cat could just keep putting it off forever. I'm really confused about that part actually

Dainpdf

I assume there is some sort of associated imperative where she must take the crowns if able to. Which I imagine will force her hand at some point when confronted with the Princes of Procer.

Azure

Her oath was to Vivienne as a fae which she no longer is, so she may not be bound to literally have to carry it out anymore. I would argue though her oath as one Woe to another still holds just as strong. I hope she's not deluding herself into thinking Vivienne is going to let this go, and that Catherine just has to argue a little. Her going back on her word to kill Akua has the possibility of forcing Vivienne to change sides back to the heroes. It's going to be that ugly with a very strong possibility of Vivienne getting a heroic name to replace her lost one. Catherine better tread very carefully here. I have to say I'm pretty disappointed in her myself. Akua would know the easiest to fracture the Woe is to get Catherine to renege on her promise, and guess what it seems the first seeds have taken root,

Liliet

She's not going back on her word. What she said was basically "I am no longer magically bound to do this, but I think it's the right thing to do anyway". She just focused on another aspect than the promise to Vivi.

She resorted to making oaths over everything because of Winter fucking up her judgement, anyway. It's no longer THIS important that she do what Vivi says.

gagesbe

I don't think that's what she meant. I think she's currently leaning away from having Akua atone by dying (or be punished by dying depending on your PoV), and more towards Akua atoning (as much as you can atone for that level of crime) but living well and helping bring peace to the continent. She's no longer bound to ensure that Akua meets an untimely end, but that doesn't in any way mean that Akua is just going to get away with her crimes, only that the measure of response is no longer, "and she must die in the end."

Vivienne will not be happy, but I think that as long as Cat doesn't overstep, she'll reluctantly go along with it.

Liliet

That's one possibility yeah.

~~I ship CatAkua too much to allow myself to believe that Catherine really is consciously leaning towards letting Akua stay already~~

Azure

"But there will be a day where the world we made no longer has place for her," Vivienne said. "When we have faced all the horrors before us. And on that day, when she has glimpsed victory?"

Vivienne met my eyes and there was something in them that gave even Winter pause.

"Snuff her out, Catherine," she said. "Slowly. Painfully. Excruciatingly aware of what is being taken from her."

Vivienne will grudgingly accept using Akua to help them, but if Catherine backs off from destroying her at the end, then there is going to be trouble. Catherine better not be dumb enough to lead with "I'm no longer bound to destroy Akua".

Andrew Mitchell

I think Catherine's may lead with "'I'm no longer bound to destroy Akua. But you have my word I will."

Skaddx

Cat plan with the well is to store power and create an Eclipse or Artificial Night to win the battle by boosting herself and the Drow. Interesting plan I suppose she is hoping no one can do what Masego can and create a Miniature Sun or has an aspect that creates Daylight. Significant gamble when facing a bunch of heroes. I wonder if Saint can cut it actually.

Dainpdf

Could also be to eclipse the Pilgrim's star thing. Or a more potent version of Masego's spell to block the Light, though I doubt it.

Insanenoodlyguy

It won't work as a weapon like that, Black would have taught her better. Declaring your weapon will make you unbeatable ensures somebody either has or will get a countermeasure, possibly then and there for the young heroes. Otherwise they take big risks to destroy it just when the pivot let's the army really to defeat evil.

But cats not dumb enough to use it that way. She is specifically using it as a counter. That means she can use it as her pivot, much lower risk there, especially at night, because shes restoring a natural advantage instead of nullifying a disadvantage.

Not to mention it's got to be easier to thwart a named power as opposed to fighting the sun. Even if she still could viv's trick wouldn't work here, both for reasons mentioned above and because itd still be day even if the sign wasn't there anymore.

Skaddix

I would say time of day basically decides this if the fight is during the Day then its advantage Heroes..Cat uses Well for Eclipse, a Hero Counters it back to daylight, Heroes Win.

Or its night time so advantage Cat and Drow, where some tries to use Dawn, and it gets countered.

sengachi

It could be designed as a counter to a Dawn aspect though, or something like that. Heroes pull an artificial dawn out of their butts and Cat shuts it down with more raw power than they can fight, right after they've blown all their narrative momentum on a big climactic moment of the sun rising.

Dainpdf

So, Cat and Hakram say she was still Cat. Guess that's another time I've been wrong, unless there's another twist. It goes against everything I had seen, but this seems to indicate it was misinterpretation on my part.

I like that Cat is preparing again. Having silver bullets and schemes is good. It's the only way they're getting out of this mess with an acceptable outcome.

Skaddx

I think Sve Noc explained it. Its funny though that Hakram explanation reminds me of Order of the Stick and Durkon. I think the Joker also says it though since its a variant of his one bad day. Basically the argument is you are who you are on your worse day. So Winter Cat is Cat on her worse day with a biggest hammer and no real knowledge or wisdom to temper it. Now granted Sve Noc did make it seem that it would not be Cat if Cat was under the influence long enough but that doesn't happen until a long time. Probably at least until Cat had lived longer then a normal human lifespan.

Dainpdf

Durkon was more arguing from continuity of being – that it prevents us from ever putting bad things behind us – while here we have the question of whether something that is Winter plus Cat, molded into a Cat shape, is Cat.

Liliet

Ship of Theseus. If no information is lost, the entity is the same.

Dainpdf

Hm. So if the crew who changed the planks tell no one about it, the ship is not the same?

Also, Cat was mostly replaced all at once, and so was Durkon. This makes them more akin to the “exchange the whole ship” scenario than the “gradual change” one.

Liliet

No, that’s not the meaning of ‘information’ here. Information here is more like the purpose of the plank. If the new plank is a nanotechnological device secretly sending brainwashing waves, you have a case for it not being the same ship, even if the crew was upfront about it. If it’s the same plank as before conceptually, it can be replaced entirely in secret and it’s still the same ship. They can all be replaced entirely in secret overnight, and it’s still the same ship, provided nothing important to its identity as a ship changed. Individual planks aren’t important to it.

What exact moment are you thinking of for Durkon?

Dainpdf

That is odd, because I could secretly exchange all the planks of two ships, or exchange the two ships. Both processes end in the same physical state, yet you claim they produce different outcomes.

I wasn’t thinking of a moment myself so much as arguing about the mentioned moment. It’s this page: <http://www.giantitp.com/comics/oots1007.html>

Liliet

More things about the ship are ‘information’ in this way than just its basic purpose. Basically anything that our abstract Theseus (I don’t remember the story in question) cares about with regard to his ship, like cabin layout or specific furnishings or a quirk in construction – but the identity of specific planks is hardly it. Unless one of them has a carving in it that is entirely central to the attachment Theseus has to the idea of his ship or something, in which case you should replicate the carving or simply not touch that particular plank.

And if two ships are identical to the point that you could simply switch them around and no information would be lost, and the only thing differentiating them is their physical location, then yes you can switch them around like this and the result will be the same as if you switched every plank.

If, however, they are different ships, but the amount/size of planks is them is sufficiently similar that you can switch every single one around to the other ship's configuration – well, the configuration is the difference.

As for that... It's rather worth noting that in the end, vampire Durkon ended up literally turning into regular Durkon when exposed to all his memories. The nature of the difference is very... uh... different, between Durkon/evil!Durkon and Cat/Winter!Cat. And still OotS seems to be making the argument that Durkon and evil!Durkon are the same entity mirrored/replicated/separated, to the degree of merging back together when the external difference is removed. (And yes, I know that's not a counterargument to your point. I was just confused by this comparison to begin with)

Dainpdf

I'd love to debate philosophy in a more appropriate setting, though I will admit I lack formal training. You have an interesting view of identity.

Liliet

Same here wrt formal training, unless you count one semester long class ~~and a whole lot of~~ blogging. You can find me for example on tumblr at lilietblog.tumblr.com :3
(also on reddit as LilietB, and on discord as Liliet – Liliet The Great Nerd on pgte discord...)

And thank you, I like living with this view of it :3

Dainpdf

Maybe I should try that server. But I already have so many, and that one is bound to be busy...

Liliet

It's fun!
J O I N U S

Skaddix

I am trying not to spoil Order of the Stick but since you seem up on it. I meant Vampire Durkon who says basically that "He is Durkon On Durkon's Worst Day" All the time.

Aotrs Commander

Yes, I think that is the interpretation that is fair; it doesn't get Cat off the hook, particularly (if you think there's anything that she should have been ON the hook for, which I personally don't), in the same way you don't get off the hook when you do something in anger; but at the same time, there is the room to metaphorically say "yeah, well, I was pissed, I did things I might not have in cold blood." (Ironically, under circumstances.)

Liliet

Pretty much what I'm thinking.

Complete with the irony ♥ ♥ ♥

Dainpdf

Uh, me too. I was explaining his dialogue.

Mental Mouse

Both "continuity of being" and "putting bad things behind us" are very old challenges of the human condition – indeed, they're still in the headlines of our own world. (Some keywords: #Metoo, Alzheimer's, parole conditions, Gov. Northam's yearbook).

In this story, they seem to remain challenges even of metahuman conditions.

Liliet

Guide is very good 😊

Dainpdf

Personally, I find the argument from continuity of being to be disingenuous, because continuity does not imply constance. Remorse exists for precisely that reason.

Dainpdf

Oh, and if I may: some of your keywords are specific to one culture.

Liliet

No, Catherine did have knowledge and wisdom to temper it, which is exactly Hakram's point here. Temper \neq negate, though.

Liliet

People can act very differently when under influence.

Cat was under influence.

Dainpdf

The question is, however: how much influence can a person take before they're not themselves?

Liliet

I agree with Masego here: as long as continuity moment to moment is preserved (and the ship-of-theseus moment in Liesse left Cat in exactly the same mental state, just made of different stuff), any amount. People change.

Dainpdf

Eh. Did it, though? And coming down from Winter certainly didn't, so did she stop being Cat then?

Liliet

What do you mean "didn't"?

Catherine's being was comprised of the exactly same information as before. Nothing was lost, nothing was added. She simply started getting different information from her senses, and having different tools accessible to process it.

I'll be honest, I'm fairly indifferent to the whole 'but is she ESSENTIALLY the same Catherine' philosophical question. There is no fundamental essence of Catherine-ness, there is only a sum of Catherine's component parts, that changes always and always. The label on it that says "Catherine Foundling" is in the eye of the beholder. The map is not the territory.

As far as I'm concerned, as far as Hakram is concerned, as far as Masego is concerned, the person that exists now matches the membership test for the category "Catherine Foundling". And the person that existed during the Winter arc did so too, if by slightly different metrics / with slightly less confidence.

What would change depending on whether Winter!Cat was "really" Cat or not?

Dainpdf

It is a question of fair attribution, I guess. Can attributes (and actions) of Winter!Cat be applied to Cat without distortion?

Liliet

What do you mean “applied”?

How do you “apply” attributes and actions to someone?

Here’s the thing: I’m coming at this from the perspective of actual real-world questions like “does trauma IRREPARABLY BREAK a person” and “do anti-anxiety meds Change Who You Really Are”. The answer to both being no.

You cannot accurately predict non-winter!Catherine’s actions based on knowledge of what winter!Catherine would do without adjusting for winter’s influence, much like how you can’t predict a sober person’s behavior based on what they did when they were drunk.

Can attributes and actions of 5yo you be applied to present day you without distortion?

Dainpdf

It is an ethics issue. Surely you are culpable for actions undertaken yesterday, even if you were drunk. But are you culpable for what winter-you did last summer?

RanVor

You’re really desperate to prove something here, aren’t you?

Dainpdf

I’m more having fun debating someone.

Liliet

The further away the action is, the less culpable you are for it? Like, that’s even a legal concept: crimes ‘expire’ after a while.

I would say that your responsibility for what you did while under influence depends on:

- what you actually did
- degree of influence
- how responsible you are for being under influence in the first place like if you got drugged without your knowledge, it kicked in while you were driving, you suddenly passed out and your car hit someone, it’s Not Your Fault What The Fuck but if you TOOK a drug that you knew would cause you to pass out later / that you didnt know what it did, and then went driving anyway, then you're culpable AS FUCK for that

Catherine knew she was under influence, and her oaths were her way of giving the car keys to a friend XD

Dainpdf

I like that interpretation.

Mental Mouse

In a world where such transformations are an option, the most important point is essentially political: Can the person's new instar* maintain the social and political business of the old? Notice that in-universe, nobody was questioning whether the Duchess of Night was actually the same person as Squire Catherine, Queen of Callow. She maintained her friendships (and picked up some), continued to act masterfully on the political and military scenes, and so on. Even when Akua briefly took control of Cat's Winter form, nobody outside the Woe (and a few guards, and the readers) even knew about it.

* "Instar" is a term from biology denoting a marked stage of life with distinct transformations. Butterflies have four instars: egg, larva (caterpillar), pupa (chrysalis), and imago (adult butterfly).. Cat has four so far: Foundling/Squire I, Squire II, Duchess of Moonless Nights, Priestess of Winter. I'm inclined not to count her initial Naming as an instar break (because she didn't actually get killed), but it's an arguable point.

Mental Mouse

Self correcting "Priestess of Night". Always an error, sigh.

Liliet

I mean Catherine sure as fuck got stabbed through the chest, with unspecified resolution to that physical fact.

Just saying.

Mental Mouse

And yet we (and she) later learned that the stabbing wasn't actually necessary, just Amadeus being a stagey jerk.

Liliet

(Also, I agree entirely. Fun brainteaser: Vivienne has never actually known alive!Catherine. She'd met her in Summerholm and Liesse, but hardly saw enough of her to really see the difference between winter! Cat and non-winter!Cat. How will this change impact their relationship going forward?)

RanVor

I have an even better question: why are people so desperate for that excuse? Catherine is a villain – a fairly well meaning one, but a villain nonetheless. Is it really so hard to accept?

Dainpdf

It is not. It'd be folly to deny she's a villain after she burned all those people at Three Hills down.

If I am trying to force this interpretation, it's because the narrative of the eldritch being fitting a person-shaped mold appeals to my sense of aesthetics.

RanVor

Oh. No offense, but I personally think it's a terrible narrative. I prefer characters, even eldritch beings, to be accountable for their actions.

Dainpdf

They are, though one's responsibility for the acts of an eldritch being shaped in one's mold is limited.

RanVor

That's why the narrative sucks. Everything we don't like about a character can be explained with them being not really them. A coward's way out, if you ask me.

Liliet

I like the narrative of a person fitting an eldritch being-shaped mold 😊

Dainpdf

Are people that malleable, that one can convincingly perform the eldritch for any period of time without becoming eldritch?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Only one way to find out.

Iä! Iä! Cthulhu fhtagn!

Dainpdf

Hahaha

Liliet

I mean, Cat did become eldritch, that's my entire point. And then bounced back, because it was something external imposed onto her, not an internal change.

That's how I view this :3

Dainpdf

It was a change to her soul. How is that not internal?

Liliet

I swear I replied to this???

tl;dr: if you start taking meds that literally alter your brain chemistry, that's an 'internal' change too, but it sure as fuck doesn't change your identity

Catherine + Winter = Winter!Catherine; Winter!
Catherine – Winter = Catherine clearly the change wasn't fundamental, just an addition

Dainpdf

And yet addition to and subtraction from things can clearly change their identity (consider removing all of a thing). Meds may be too gradual or subtle, but whether Winter was is another question.

Euodiachloris

You never stop being you. Even dementia or a personality shift caused by temporal or frontal lobe damage doesn't suddenly stop a person being themselves.

They change, but we all change. Becoming an adult doesn't stop you being you. Hitting a midlife crisis when you realise change doesn't stop in your 20s. All changes people file under normal, ignoring that they can be shifts that are just as profound as bipolar disorders. Those just speed the change-o-meter up a notch to "blatantly obvious".

Somebody with an addiction? Is themselves... with an addiction. The many facets to their physiology and personality didn't happen overnight, and addiction doesn't negate the whole.

Dainpdf

The change back from winter cat did happen instantly, though.

Euodiachloris

Head trauma happens quickly, but regardless of the outcome, the individual is still them. Your point?

Dainpdf

It also doesn't usually make you do an 180 on almost everything you've been doing in the past several months.

RanVor

No, usually not. But it happens sometimes.

And saying Winter made Catherine go against her own actions and convictions from before acquiring the mantle is a straight up lie. No such thing has taken place. Winter limited Cat's scope of thinking, made her oblivious to certain alternate solutions to her problems that perhaps could have been less costly in terms of moral standing and more detached emotionally, but it was nowhere near as bad as you claim it to be. Her convictions held strong, even if her perspective was skewed.

tl;dr: I find your claim disingenuous and unfair towards the character.

Dainpdf

Uh, no, I meant getting rid of it made her reevaluate everything she'd done in the Everdark, including the slavery and mass murder, and regret a lot of it.

RanVor

A side effect of suddenly having one's scope of thinking expanded.

Also, I'd like to note that, as apparently nobody remembers, she only started doing those things after being convinced by Archer that more radical actions are necessary, and I don't see our dear Indrani receiving any blame for that.

Dainpdf

We all know Archer is at least somewhat amoral. Don't need to point that out.

RanVor

On the contrary. Omitting Indrani's part in the events that took place in the Everdark allows you to put all blame on the Sovereign of the Moonless Nights, which makes the demonization of that entity (which is exactly what you're doing, although I'm not sure whether it's a conscious strategy or a subconscious bias) a great deal easier, which in turn makes it easier to create an impression of dissociation between the Sovereign and Catherine Foundling by exaggerating the differences.

Dainpdf

Am I? I don't think I am demonizing anyone. I haven't even really spoken of the morality of Winter Cat much. All I've been saying is I wasn't sure she could be considered the same person as Cat, given wildly differing behaviors and thoughts... and Cat herself seems to disagree.

Euodiachloris

You might need to do a little more research into frontal lobe lesions. It can be that much of a wrench. Thing is... the personality change is actually still built on what was there. It's just that brain damage shifts the emphasis on what aspects get expressed.

Look into schizoid conditions: they throw up fascinating insights into how many views, instincts, alternate pathways, mind-sets and behaviours most of us never consciously realise we actually contain. People with a heavy dose of schiz get more of a peak at what we all have going on inside, simply because the selective blinkers/ filters most of us take for granted aren't working to spec for them.

Yet, all those options? Are what we are, are part of us and remain so, even if we mostly don't realise it.

Dainpdf

So our current working model for winter is brain damage or mental conditions?

You're right, I'm not schooled in the workings of such things, but I will note that the law will sometimes exonerate people based on them being mentally ill (though I guess that tends to end with them in a mental hospital).

pagesbe

I suspect the well is only partly to be an energy source, I think it's meant to stop Pilgrim from ruining her with his counter-magic feedback.

RanVor

A slower chapter before a big fight, with the best use of Praesi treachery I've ever seen.

Daniel E

All this talk of Winter & Night Oaths got me thinking; Whatever happened to Killian? I wonder if she ever went through with that ritual business and became full-blooded Fae. Also, I'm betting that Friday's chapter will be more buildup, because when have we ever not had a cliffhanger before the weekend?

Mental Mouse

The thing is, if she became full fae, she'd gain at least some of Cat's former powers... but she presumably wouldn't be a member of one of the Fae Courts, so she'd be operating on a much lower power level,

Sven

Just posting a comment to subscribe

Shemetz

"Masego had his habits, but he wasn't exactly blind."

His blindfold is just for show.

Chapter 21: Intervention

"Even madmen can win at dice."

– Callowan saying

General Abigail rode poorly, though that was hardly a surprise. Most of my army was no better. Given that it was in majority Callowan, that was somewhat shameful: my people had once held a reputation for breeding the finest war horses on Calernia and riding them into battle with distinguished record. That'd been before the Conquest, though. A lot of Old Kingdom noble families had preferred butchering their own herds to turning them over to the Tower, and Black famously almost had an uprising on his hands when he moved to obtain horses from the mostly-untouched south of the kingdom. It was one of the few times my teacher had actually backed down. In practice, the old expectation that anyone of means as well as anyone of high birth would be able to ride with a lance had died out under the decades of occupation. A large part of what had birthed that custom in the first place was gone, namely the need for a large pool of trained mounted soldiers to fill the ranks should the Wasteland invade, but in my eyes the real culprit had been the lack of such mounts to be had.

What few war horses had remained were either closely kept by the last of the Callowan aristocracy or by law set aside for the use of the Legions of Terror – in specific the Thirteenth, which had been raised from Callowan bandits and rebels in the first place. Ratface had once told me, years ago, that for the smugglers who could pull it off selling a horse was about as profitable as selling the equivalent weight in spices. Wasteland aristocrats were willing to pay ludicrous sums for a purebred Liesse charger or even a dappled Vale courser. That'd been the thought, anyway, that the old herds and ways were gone. There'd been some satisfaction in the fact the knightly orders might be lost but at least they weren't under Praesi banners, the kind of bittersweet victory that'd been rare after the Conquest and so even more dearly savoured. But then the Order the Broken Bells had crawled out of the chaos of the Arcadian Campaign, and given time it might spread that knowledge again. A pretty, thought, though in the present it wasn't making either mounts or skilled riders appear out of thin air.

"Ghastly beasts, I'll tell no lie," Abigail of Summerholm muttered, eyeing her mount with distrust. "Bit unnatural, if you ask me."

The horses I'd confiscated from the four thousand kataphraktoi numbered more than that. Less than military wisdom would have dictated a field force of cavalry should take with them, but six thousand horses was nothing to sneer at. Hakram had speculated that considering they weren't moving with a remount for every cataphract they might just have a field camp somewhere in Iserre where the rest were being kept, but we'd had no time to look into it. Out of sheer practicality we'd already had to butcher a thousand of those no doubt very expensive mounts, which at least had put the orcs of the Third and Fourth in a rather good mood – fresh meat was a delicacy, out on campaign. But we'd also more than enough left for what might be considered luxury, namely mounting large contingents of messengers and officers. The matter was further complicated by the fact that horses not specifically trained out of it tended to panic around greenskins, but the humans in the general staffs had gained mount at least.

"You get used to it," I said. "Though it's been some time since I last rode a living mount, I'll admit."

I fondly stroked the rough coat of Zombie the Fifth and received a pleased exhale from the Helikean horse in reply. Zombie the Third was currently being punished by dragging a cart, which looked rather absurd for a winged horse and I knew she very much despised doing. The crime she was atoning for was that this morning I'd found someone had caved in the head, ribs and spine of Zombie the Fourth. She'd tried to look innocent, the wretch, but unless there was another hooved creature in my army jealous of my attentions then I had my culprit. Apparently you could take the Winter necromancy out of the fae horse, but actually you couldn't and it would keep that vicious temperament forever.

"If you try to shake me off again I'll have you made into boots," General Abigail whispered, glaring at her horse and apparently under the impression I couldn't hear her. "You know what? That's your name now. Boots. How do you like that, Boots?"

Boots proceeded forward at an indifferent trot and I cleared my throat. The black-haired woman paled, reminded of my presence.

"I, uh, agree Your Majesty," she hastily said.

I sighed. She hadn't listened to what I was said in the slightest, had she?

"Oh, good," I airily replied, offering her a smile. "Then I expect it'll be done within the hour."

I enjoyed the panic that seeped into her eyes a little too much.

"Is that," she tried, "customary?"

Trying to find out what she'd agreed to by context. My long experience of pretending I already knew things while getting Masego to explain them allowed me to see through her admittedly pretty translucent wiles.

"In Ashur, I'd assume," I gravely said.

"Yes," she slowly said. "That is... well-known."

"You can tell Adjutant you're in need of our maritime charts for the Tyrian Sea," I continued. "Gods be with you, Admiral Abigail."

She let out a little whimper, which she tried to pass off as a cough. Then she stilled.

"We don't have a border with the Tyrian Sea," she realized. "Or a fleet."

"Which will lend you the element of surprise," I mused.

"Queens aren't supposed to have people on," General Abigail plaintively said.

I hid my smile by looking away.

"Call it royal prerogative," I replied, then took mercy on her and changed the subject. "What do you think of your new officers?"

"The transfers from the Fourth are all old hands from the Legions," the blue-eyed woman said. "To be entirely honest they didn't need much settling, Your Majesty. And Legate Samid could do my job better than me, if you let him."

Legate Samid served for fifteen years under General Afolabi, a Wasteland aristocrat, and first enrolled in the Legions at the beginning of Black's tenure as the captain of Malicia's armies, I thought. His loyalties are rather more complex than yours, my dear.

"Then learn from him," I said. "And take his advice, when it has good sense."

I'd ignored the implied offer to step down from her generalship and resume her legate duties, as I had the last five times she'd indirectly broached the subject. And would keep doing. Talented Callowan candidates for a general's mantle didn't grow on trees, much less those with no ties to any of the factions in my court. An abdication was a tricky matter even when a dynasty was stable, and considering mine consisted of me and a tumultuous reign of less than five years I hardly qualified. A popular Callowan general with a distinguished war record and no real ambition for power would go a long way in stabilizing what would follow in my wake. I set aside the thought for now. It was too early to tell if Abigail of Summerholm could really be used in that manner, and pushing too hard too fast would only spoil the broth.

"I won't know the first thing about fighting heroes, ma'am," General Abigail said.

"I've killed more than a few and I barely do," I shrugged. "Besides, ideally we won't be killing anyone."

"That's, uh, not the sentiment I expected to hear," the black-haired general said.

"Any corpse we make down here is one less warm body to throw at the Dead King, Abigail," I said. "And heroes, well, we'll need more than a few of those to drive the Hidden Horror back into hiding."

"Into hiding," she slowly said. "Not to kill."

"You ever seen a god die, General Abigail?" I said.

She shivered.

"Can't say I have, ma'am," she replied, lips tight.

"Neither have I," I said, "but I suspect it would be messy business. Best we know our limitations, and not bargain for more than we can deliver."

"I hear that," General Abigail muttered.

About time to segue into more personal matters, I mused. I'd taken to digging into her past, when the opportunity rose, though what I'd learned was as amusing as it was appalling. Inquired about her family had let to 'My Ma brewed, and what Pa didn't drink we sold.' An open-ended question about why she'd enrolled had led to 'Our place in Summerholm burned down, and all respect Your Majesty but have you ever smelled a tannery?' I'd been about to ask about the orc tribune – Krolem, his name was, I'd had Hakram look into him – that she brought with her everywhere when movement caught my attention at the corner of my eye. Enemy outriders? No, I saw as I squinted, some of our own scouts. The Third Army was at the head of the column for the day's march, and with my personal banner being raised along with its own the scout officers were likely to head here for their first report. I'd not expected anything from them for some time, to be honest. Our best guess had Juniper's camp half a day away, further west along the frozen river we were following.

"Unusual," I said.

The general followed my gaze, but said nothing.

"Come on," I decided. "We're headed to the front of the column."

I spurred Zombie the Fifth forward, peeling off from the side of the Third Army and outpacing the marching legionaries. Abigail followed more slowly, hissing curses at her uncooperative mount I pretended not to hear. It wasn't a full scouting line, I saw as I approached. Only a tenth, all goblins, with the line's sergeant among them. Whatever they saw, I thought, it was urgent enough they backtracked. I reined in my horse a dozen feet ahead of the front of my column, slowing him to a trot to remain ahead as the goblins approached. Abigail arrived just before they did, legs so tight against her saddle I winced to think of the cramps she'd have tonight. The sergeant – stringy, small and more yellow than green, the ritual scarring around her lips lending her a grisly touch – came forward and saluted.

"Your Majesty," she said. "Sergeant Hurdler, reporting."

"At ease, sergeant," I replied.

I glanced at Abigail and saw she'd mostly composed herself. Good enough.

"You're back earlier than expected," I said. "Your report?"

"Whatever we got out of the Procerans, it was inaccurate," the goblin said. "The Hellhound's camp is about half a bell ahead, and when Lieutenant Reeler sent us back battle was already being given."

Shit, I thought. There were hills to the west of us, split in the middle by the river our maps called the Odelle. Not all that tall, but enough they'd cut our line of sight. It makes sense, I grimly conceded. Juniper would want hills on one of her flanks if she could, knowing she'd be outnumbered in a battle.

"Battle," I said. "Elaborate, sergeant."

"Marshal Juniper raised a fortified camp on both sides of the river banks," Hurdler said. "An army of Levantines and Procerans was assaulting the northern bank, last I saw."

"Which was?" I pressed.

"A little over an hour," the goblin said. "We could see from the taller hills."

Fuck. I'd bet on Juniper against most generals, and on Grem One-Eye against the few left, but they wouldn't just be fighting mortals. There would be heroes, and if what Hakram had told me about Vivienne was true then Juniper wouldn't have any Named to pit against them. The Pilgrim alone might be driven back by the Wild Hunt, but the Saint? Laurence de Montfort had already proved she could savage the lot of them singlehandedly. Our Proceran prisoners had told us about cavalry skirmishes and ambushes, not a pitched battle over the camp. The enemy had moved quicker than we'd anticipated. My fingers clenched and I leaned back against my saddle, turning my face to the sky. I whistled, loudly.

"Ma'am?" Sergeant Hurdler said.

"Pass your report along to General Bagram and Lord Adjutant immediately," I told her. "Dismissed, sergeant."

She saluted, and left dragging along her exhausted scouts.

"General Abigail," I said.

The blue-eyed Callowan was watching me warily.

"Your Majesty," she replied.

"The Third Army is to march on those hills as quickly as you can make it," I said, the staff in my grasp twirling to point at the slopes to the west. "You're to fly the Third's banner from the tallest hills. Send a messenger to Bagram, and fly the Fourth's as well."

"And General Bagram is to follow?" she asked.

"Pass this along to Hakram: Five Armies and One," I said.

"That's all?" Abigail blinked.

"It's enough," I amusedly replied.

"And you, ma'am?" she asked.

I glanced up, and saw exactly what I'd been waiting for.

"I'll be going ahead," I said.

In a splash of snow, Zombie the Third landed right in front of me. Wings still unfolded, she celebrated her release from punishment with a smug little canter. I gesture for one of the legionaries in the front rank to approach, some beardless boy who looked almost too small for his armour. I passed him my living mount's reins and instructed him to lead it back to our supply train, but paused when I caught the sun glinting off his helm.

"Your name?" I asked.

"Edgar, ma'am," he replied, sounding too young and too awed. "Of Laure."

"Are you?" I smiled, and flicked a glance at Abigail. "Good, it wouldn't do to have the Summerholm folk take all the glory. I'll be needing to borrow your helmet, Edgar."

The boy's eyes widened in surprise, but he fumbled at the clasps and held it up like an offering. I set it under my arm, pulling my loose hair back into a ponytail with the leather tongue I still carried in my cloak. The legionary helmet settled on my head with a comfortingly familiar weight. I winked at Edgar.

"Last time I was on a field and royalty went without one of those, I had them shot," I said.

The boy choked, and I grinned before limping to Zombie's side, waiting until she'd folded her wings to hoist myself atop her. I turned to Abigail.

"See to it he gets another before battle, would you?" I told her, dipping my head towards the kid.

"I will," General Abigail nodded. "Should I be asked your intent, Your Majesty, what should I say?"

I mulled over that as my mount spread her wings.

"I'm going to make a point, General," I said. "Tactfully."

I spurred on my winged mount and she raced ahead, leaping up and rising to the beat of long wings. We rose and rose and rose, high into the sky, until the sun was warming my bones and I judged the height was sufficient. The time for quiet was over, I thought. Night flooded my veins, sluggish under the glare of day, but it was enough to rip open an inky-black gate into Arcadia. Below us, as it happened. We dove through the gate into the realm of the fae. Sunny skies awaited us on the other side, the Summer sun's disapproving light upon us, but what did we care? There was only the endless blue firmament and the descent, Zombie responding to the nudges of my knees and adjusting the angle so we would tumble through the destination I could feel in the back of my mind.

I pressed close against her back, cloak trailing behind me, and squinted against the howling air. My staff of ebony I clutched tightly, until I could feel the point the needle was to emerge from the cloth. Beneath us was spread out a fortress, banners of neither Court I had known raised tall over pale walls, and cries sounded at our approach. The tallest tower, I saw, was our gate out. The very summit. I grimaced. Well, too late to hesitate. Down, down, down, until I could almost make out the faces of the fae jousting in the courtyard below, laden with silks and elaborate armaments. My staff rose and sluggishly the gate out ripped itself open atop the tower. We plunged through narrowly, and in the beat that followed found ourselves diving through fresh skies.

The cool air of Procer whistled around me as the gate closed, and we joined the battle unfolding below.

It was a bloody mess that I witness sprawling out beneath me. I'd been afraid that the northern Levantines and Principate reinforcements had somehow managed to steal a march, but by the looks of it they hadn't. Not exactly. In the distance I could see columns of soldiers heading south, spread out like glittering snakes of steel. This was a vanguard, not the full host. That'd be reassuring, though, if Juniper actually looked to be winning. The Army of Callow and the Legions under Marshal Grem had raised a fortified camp across the two banks of the frozen River Odelle, not only palisades but earthen ramparts and even platforms for their siege engines. The northern part of that camp, however, was a wreck. What must have been flat grounds once was now a disaster of collapsed tunnels, the outskirts of which were being fought over by legionaries and Levantine foot. The Hellhound had dug under her own camp, I thought. It would have taken goblins to do this much damage so swiftly. Odds were she'd meant to bait the enemy into the northern bank and then collapse it on them, possibly with munitions thrown in to make it a crippling blow. Something had gone wrong, though, because among the havoc I saw more of our dead than the enemy's.

Our side was stuck in fighting retreat to the southern bank fortifications, but the legionaries were getting the bad end of that scrap – on uneven grounds, the lightly-armored Levantines were proving much more effective. Many of them carried javelins, I saw, and those were death on even good armour when properly thrown. Even when not, they turned shields useless by sticking in them. It wasn't the kind of fight the reformed Legions of Terror had been built for, and the Army of Callow was daughter to that institution. The Order of Broken Bells was out on the left flank, but too far out: they'd been baited into pursuing lighter Levantine cavalry, by the looks of it. But it was on the right that disaster loomed. Proceran horse, a force at least seven thousand strong and advancing at a trot. I'd put my hand to fire it'd held back until now, and I could see why: if it charged down the Odelle, as it was moving to do, it would neatly cut the retreat of the legionaries fighting their way out of the wreckage. There'd been palisades put over the ice, Juniper wasn't an amateur, but they'd been shattered beyond repair by something and sappers were struggling to raise fresh ones. They wouldn't make it in time, I assessed. Not something solid enough to resist a hard charge by seven thousand hardened Proceran mounted killers.

Someone had hit my side exactly where they needed to for this to turn into a debacle, and I had my suspicions as to who. I wasn't seeing the Pilgrim or the Saint anywhere but that hardly meant they weren't there. Yet this could still be salvaged, I decided. If the legionaries in the wreckage didn't get cut off, most of them should make it to the southern bank and then the siege engines would stop the enemy advance cold. Which meant that seven thousand horse had to be turned back. I worried my lip but pressed my knees against Zombie's side and she angled her glide down to land ahead of the Proceran cavalry. Making the fairy gates hadn't put me out of commission, but I wasn't exactly fresh anymore either. I wouldn't be able to pull a second Sarcella today, of that much I was certain, even if heroes decided not to interfere. Calling on a few vicious Night tricks might slow down the enemy, but I'd burn out long before I could make a real dent in seven thousand horsemen.

Five hundred feet before the enemy, Zombie's hooves skimmed the surface of the cold field and left long spouts of snow like wings as she landed. I watched the Proceran banners trail in the breeze far ahead of me, vivid coloured stripes flying high above rows and rows of steel-clad soldiers. Some of those I had seen on the pages of ancient volumes. The red lion of Valencis, the strange green dragonfly of Lange. Other symbols I did not: a long-haired maiden clutching bow and arrows, a bronze wheel atop a pale column.

Four hundred feet.

One I had seen before with my own eyes, I realized, and not so long ago: a scarlet salamander on flaxen bed, the arms of Aequitan. The detail startled a laugh out of me. An old acquaintance was among them, then. Borrowed helm glinting in the sun, I twirled my staff and leaned forward. No miracle of Night came. Instead, using the length of ebony wood I traced a line in the snow ahead of me.

Three hundred feet.

Watching seven thousand killers ride towards me with no sign of slowing, I did the only reasonable thing left to me and went looking through my cloak. I snapped my wrist, black flame flickered, and I pulled at my pipe. I inhaled the wakeleaf with a little sigh of pleasure and breathed out a long stream of smoke.

Two hundred feet.

I grinned, broad and sharp and just a little mad. Now, the thing was, if it came to a scrap they might just kill me. They knew that. I knew that. Yet here I was, unmoving.

One hundred feet.

Catherine Foundling, out of breath and out of her depth, would be swept aside with a warlike shout. They weren't facing that girl, though, were they? They were facing the Black Queen, the warlord who'd slain fae and bound them to her service. The monster who'd brought down the sky at the Battle of the Camps, faced a band of heroes alone and raised a lake's worth of dead. They were facing every dark rumour I'd ever had put to my name, after watching me dive out of a pitch-black portal on a dead fae horse. And sure, odds were I was mad. Gone the way of the Old Tyrants, drunk on power.

But, a little voice would be whispering, what if I wasn't?

I grinned, and smoked my pipe.

Fifty feet.

They flinched first.

theart0fwar

Gotcha!

theart0fwar

> "Is that," she tried, "customary?"

A valiant effort.

> A popular Callowan general with a distinguished war record and no real ambition for power would go a long way in stabilizing what would follow in my wake.

Oh gods below, imagine Abigail as a queen?

> "Neither have I," I said

Well, but you have more experience in these matters. Like stealing from choirs, eh...

> "I'm going to make a point, General," I said. "Tactfully."

HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA

> They flinched first.

Catherine is just so... so epic.

Can't wait for the next chapter!

Dainpdf

Regarding Abigail queenship: it has been a possibility for a while.

Cicero

Actually, sounded more to me like she was thinking a general loyal to the institution instead of her own ambition and thus not likely to make a grab for power in the instability caused by Cat abdicating/dying and transferring power to someone else.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, that was more my take as well. But the thought of Abigail as Queen is also possible.

Mental Mouse

It's a question of what stories get played out. Abigail getting field-promoted all the way to the crown is an appealing story, but would have to fit into Cat's own story. Clearly Cat has her own plans, though.

NZPIEFACE

I think Cat wants a democracy.

RanVor

She doesn't. She noted on how she dislikes democracy before.

NZPIEFACE

Did she? I thought she disliked the feudal system and the oligarchy that the Tower installed over Callow. If the citizens of Callow voted for their own Prime Minister I think she'd like it.

RanVor

She did. I don't remember when it was exactly, probably somewhere in Book 2 or early Book 3.

Andrew Mitchell

She did. I found the relevant chapter: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/12/04/chapter-49-hearsay/>

"Democracy, it was called. There was a part of that that appealed to me – letting people choose their own way – but I'd never really bought into the notion. People were dumb, broadly speaking, and mobs even dumber. For all that I'd acquired a distaste of nobility, filling a hall with drunk tradesmen and asking the lot of them to make laws was no way to rule a country. Someone had to hold the reins, or all you got was bickering and indecision.

Just because I believe that place shouldn't be inherited didn't mean it should be carved up and handed off to a hundred thousand strangers out in the streets."

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, but that's absolute democracy. I was talking more of the type of democracy real world countries use, not Belerophen.

Navi-Hank

You mean a Republic

Yavandir

There isn't any other democracy it's a lie of foreign oligarchs.

Liliet

I don't think democracy would work in this setting. There just isn't infrastructure for it.

And proto-democracy with just nobles electing who rules them wouldn't exactly be better.

konstantinvoncarstein

Indeed, look at the Holy Roman Empire

Sparsebeard

Which is basically Procer.

Jacob McNeer

Procer is France with HRE government.

Javvies

Ehhhh, it'd probably work out reasonably okay for a city-state, or maybe something a bit bigger (ie, Renaissance Venice).

It's the scaling it up that causes issues in this kind of setting.

Plus, the whole issue of Named.

And the closest example to democracy we have is the clusterfuck known as Bellerophon. Nobody else wants to go anywhere near that kind of governing system for themselves.

On the other hand, Cat doesn't exactly approve of the concept of hereditary nobility much either. It's hard to say what kind of government she'll end up leaving behind or trying to leave behind.

Liliet

Constitutional monarchy? As a guess.

ninegardens

I wonder if the gods below deliberately made Bellerophon as a joke, so as to dissuade other nations from even CONSIDERING the idea of an elected government.

(Or possibly is conspiracy on both sides to keep them heriarchy's which seem to work so well for this whole "Good vs Evil" competition.)

Abrakadabra

Democracy is anathema to Good, because it denies the divine hierarchy.

Euodiachloris

Switzerland might like to point out that what vaguely democratic ball the Ventician Republic dropped, it picked up. And ran with. Stumps have been big in Helvetica going back quite some way.

Even when other European powers stuck their oars in and tried to stop communities, towns and villages from using direct democracy the Alpine way. (Note: it's still highly selective. Do not get me started on who can and cannot vote at whatever form of election.)

Agent J

It's patently obvious Catherine wants some manner of meritocratic system. She believes positions of power should not be in the hands of the unwashed masses. She's as uninterested in an Absolute Democracy as she is in a Republic. One is Rule by Mob while the other is Rule by Popularity. Neither, from my understanding of Cat's views, are sound reasons to hand people power. But she also believes that it shouldn't be handed to silver-spoon brats with more silk than sense either.

What's left is qualified individuals taking key positions of power because of their merit and no other reason. Not blood, not popularity among low information voters, and not by the will of the torch wielding mob.

Cat wants a Rule by Merit system for Callow/Dread Empire and given that this was basically the underlying thesis of the Reforms and the Legions of Terror, I'm surprised this isn't as obvious to everyone as it seems to me.

Liliet

Catherine would probably like a modern-type democracy with elected representatives, but there isn't precedent for that on Calernia and she isn't that kind of social reformist.

Agent J

Representatives elected by way of popularity among low information voters and who's policies don't even line up with the will of said low information voters, but rather of wealthy oligarchs who've bought them out.

No, I'm fairly certain Catherine would rather a political system more in line with the system championed by the revolutionary Legions of Terror and is the building blocks of her Army of Callow. That is, a system in which merit is the only metric by which people are proper to higher positions.

Besides, everyone knows how horribly flawed modern democracies are, but it's cultural wisdom that "while our system is bad, there is no working alternative". That's not exactly a strong selling point to medieval monarch.

Liliet

Soviet Union tried to be a meritocracy. It didn't go well. (Who decides people's merit, in a meritocracy?)

But yeah, I do agree with your basic point / conclusion.

NZPIEFACE

Wouldn't the term for that be oligarchy?

Liliet

yeah, that

Abrakadabra

Oligarchy is what we live in worldwide, it calls itself democracy though.

studentofzelretch

The Black Queen, huh? Seems like a good, solid Name. Let's see if it pans out as such; she's due for one.

Agent J

Did you miss that whole bit at Second Liesse where the Squire was transitioning into the Black Queen, until Black broke the weapon and name alike?

Cuz... Black Queen is dead as a Name, it's corpse devoured by Winter, and then sold to Sve Noc in exchange for an army.

Also, Priestess of Night is way more fun than any Name.

matesbe

Black Queen was dead as a name... but that's because Black closed the door on that interpretation of her rulership at that moment. I'm not saying that Black Queen will become a Name, but I think it's foolish to think that because it was stopped once, that Name can never become one.

RandomFan

I think that if she's offered the name of Queen a third time and loses it, it's a safe bet that she will never hold a Queen name- I'm pretty sure she's already turned down the name of Queen in book 2 and been denied it in book 3.

Liliet

I think the "Black" part referred to her willingness to agree to Malicia's idea for the WMD. Catherine will now never fit that Name because after the opportunity passed, she realized that was wrong.

The world just hasn't yet caught on to the fact she is after Not Being Evil, is all.

Navi-Hank

I'm more fond of the Herald of Night

Epok

Come check out the discord , <https://discord.gg/xWeQPb>

Insanenoodlyguy

Pure high level bluff. Yep, human Cat is back. If shes doing shit like this though, seems shell have a name again soon enough.

Whitestrake

She's literally going to make a Name for herself, pulling these kinds of stunts again.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm pretty sure that's what InsaneNoodlyGuy was trying to say. Except he left it as "name" rather than "Name".

Lord GM

No, Cat will never have a proper Name again. That is my solid conviction. Because to have a Name one must fill a Role and that means obediently playing by the Gods' rules and becoming a playing piece on their divine chess board called Creation. And since Book I we know that Cat hates to play by any rules not her own.

LeTouriste

How about Hierarch then? The Name got forced on him

sengachi

That's not high level bluff so much as it is having earned that advantage on your bluff check.

Liliet

I would say this is an Intimidation check more than it is a Bluff check ;u;

mordered

The need for a Practical Guide to Evil tabletop rpg intensifies.

Taichi

Been thinking about writing one. Perhaps someone would like to collaborate with me?

Liliet

check on Guide discord: <https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Fayhem

I've been considering running a PGtE campaign whenever the campaign I'm already running wraps up. I think that Scion 2e would actually be a good match for a system; a focus on narrative play aligns well with a setting where stories matter so much, it's all about people unlocking demigodtier power already so you'd just have to change the source of that, and the mechanics of it got cleaned up a lot from Scion 1e. It would need a bit of tweaking still, but less than any other system that come to mind.

Randomfan

I would see if I could make a cross Bluff and Intimidate check, rather than either one alone, but I don't know the exact definitions to be certain.

Decius

Which is why I like the combined "Persuasion" skill better than having bluff, intimidate, and diplomacy as three separate things.

Her immediate intention is to scare people, which involves pretending to have capability she lacks, so that she can convince the army to attack the Dead King. That's intimidate, bluff, and diplomacy all in one.

Andrew Mitchell

What sort of check is the DM's choice. I could see both applying equally here.

Mental Mouse

This. "... the other half is actually knowing dark secrets."

danh3107

The Viv teasing is bugging the hell out of me....

Dainpdf

We do know she lost her name. It was mentioned a while back.

danh3107

Right but we don't know if she replaced it, or if poof she's a normal person again. The dissonance is just bugging me, this started out as a series about Named and how interesting they are, and then we even get a group of named to replace the last big evil group and now two are just normal people again.

It's just bugging me, of course this is all dependent on whether or not she actually lost her named status altogether but hey.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm really looking forward to finding out more about what's happened to Vivienne. Not so much her Name, because I think she's lost it and she isn't about to get another one. But more so to find out about how her mindset has changed and how she's been doing her role as Regent while Cat's been away. And, of course, what she thought about Hakram's sacrifice and what difference that made to her.

Cassus

Just a thought, but V does not have quite as clearly defined a character as Catherine did when she lost her name and remained awesome. I think that V will get a new name. And since she is running a country in the Queen's absence and apparently building up a lot of authority and dealing with issues, how about we name her Chancellor?

Liliet

The first Good Chancellor Name in history.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe a new Callowan equivalent of Chancellor: Regent. She already has that title, so maybe she will turn it into a role and Name.

Javvies

Chancellor is a Praesi-specific Name. It's a culturally specific Name, not one that could come from more or less anywhere. And has specific connotations to it that are peculiar to Praes and Praesi culture. Once important such connotation is that it is normal and expected for the Chancellor to at some point betray and become the next Dread Emperor/Empress of Praes. There's a very good reason why Malicia has tried to kill the Name of Chancellor.

The Callowan Role-equivalents, sans the mandatory backstabbing, would likely be something along the lines of Regent, Castellan, and/or Steward.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I hope it's Steward! That would really suit Vivienne.

Liliet

Judging by "Juniper has no Named to counter them", yes Vivi is no longer Named.

I personally think this is an amazing & also hilarious development.

I'm also expecting Cordelia to get a Name and Amadeus to get a new Name, so I don't think Named will drop off the landscape entirely.

But Cat as non-Named out-Naming Named is the BEST plot development. With Vivi at her side.

Javvies

Ehhhh, to be fair, Thief is not a combatant Name, and Viv/Thief was always pretty bad in a fight. And there's no way she could realistically counter a combat Name on a battlefield.

So saying Juniper has no Named to counter Heroes would be true whether Viv is still Thief or not.

Liliet

Vivi is bad in a direct Named vs Named fight, sure, but we have a battle with armies both assisted by Named here, not that.

Remember the river fleet? Remember the stolen supplies? Cat's not exactly dueling enemy heroes here either.

Decius

Thief would not win a straight-up fight with other Named, but if she was there and in full power she could have stolen a march or two, and the battle wouldn't even been there.

Mental Mouse

Viv had lost her name as of Hakram's last report... she could still pull out a new name and first aspect mid-fight. As far as insisting that Cat is non-Named, we already know that fae titles are comparable to Names in terms of granting power. I'd say her First Priestess role is likewise, so there's no real reason to care that she doesn't have a "traditional" name. If anything, she's laying new paths for a future name.

An aside: The mention of Abigail's orc friend makes me think: The appearance of the Name Adjutant implies that what the name represents has become enough of a tradition in 20 years or so that it could support a Name. In this case, that would seem to be: "The orc adjutant who's not just a terror by your side, but a good assistant outside the fight." I'm wondering if Abigail may have picked up one of the un-Named versions.

Liliet

Power isn't the main thing that Names grant, narrative influence is much more key.

And hmm, good question wrt orcs!

Shikkarasu

Cordelia won't get a Name. Both because First Prince isn't, and never has been, a Name and also because she dislikes relying on Named. Exception, of course, for having Auger as a cousin. Also, she is opposing the Saint (who wants to break Procer) and Pilgrim (who refused to kill Black). It's hard to do that without being a Villain; they are too entrenched in their Roles.

Liliet

Not First Prince, Warden Of The West.

Dislike for Names does not exempt you from getting one, see: Tariq and Anaxares.

And as long as she's not trying to kill the two of them but just stays her own course wrt saving her country, she's fully eligible for a heroic Name imho.

Andrew Mitchell

"I'm also expecting Cordelia to get a Name and Amadeus to get a new Name"

It's going to be interesting to see if either of those predictions come true. And even more interested to see how it develops and becomes real. Personally, I don't think it's going to happen with Cordelia. And I'd only give Black even odds.

Liliet

Yeah, same.

Liliet

(wrt: interesting)

Dainpdf

It was said Thief is not Named anymore, so we know she hadn't replaced until at least very recently.

Raved Thrad

Nobody plays the brinkmanship game quite like Catherine Foundling. All this really needs to be another Foundling Gambit is goblinfire. 😊

Dainpdf

Battle's still young. We also need an undead goat, soon.

Raved Thrad

And Robber, with a repeat of his famous line, "Release the goat!" 😊

Euodiachloris

We've already got a jealous, flying, undead kelpie-thing waiting in the wings thanks to being dumped on the naughty step. What more do you want? 😊

Mental Mouse

Z3 got off the naughty step, cat's riding them now.

Euodiachloris

I could swear she is on Zombie 5th. Raised specifically to hammer the naughty step home (and to keep Z3 well outside ground zero, able to swoop in for evac if needed – Z5 is more disposable if things gang agley [translation: go wonky], and could be used as a munitions delivery system at need).

pagesbe

Yes because Zombie the 5th can clearly swoop out of an airborne portal like her current mount did.

Unless you're trying to say you wish she was on Zombie the 5th.

Mental Mouse

She was on Zombie 5 (*not actually a zombie) at the beginning of the chapter; She whistled for Z3 and switched mounts for her "forward action". Not only can Z5 not fly, they maybe wouldn't react too well to gating.

Dainpdf

A kelpie-thing? I hope Zombie the Third can't shapeshift.

Euodiachloris

I wouldn't put anything past the cheeky, large sodfer.
Including a hidden ace. 😊

Eleron Pfoutz

"Going to make a point."
"Tactfully."

I hope there won't be any Goblinfire. Or do I?

Dainpdf

This reminds me of a scene in Worm.

"'You ever seen a god die, General Abigail?' I said.

She shivered.

'Can't say I have, ma'am,' she replied, lips tight.

'Neither have I,' I said"

Bad Cat. You don't have Winter anymore to put your pants out with.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think Cat was implying that she is going to kill a god, she was implying that is something you don't want to see. She even stated that she wanted the Dead King to go back to hiding.

Dainpdf

She was saying she's never seen a god die, which is pretty ludicrous considering how she got the Winter mantle.

Andrew Mitchell

The Duke of Violent Squalls wasn't a god. And neither was the King of Winter or the Queen of Summer. Not quite the same tier as the actual gods of creation IMO.

Dainpdf

Well, yeah, but neither is the Dead King, so that's not relevant for her speech there.

Liliet

DK is higher tier than Duke of Violent Squalls

Dainpdf

Sure. Still not a capital g God, though. Wouldn't know where to rank him against a Fae monarch.

Liliet

They didn't strictly speaking actually die. What happened still left Cat as Last Of Winter though, which might be mess enough for her to back up her point XD

Dainpdf

Well, she did claim that counted as undoing the King of Winter.

Liliet

When has Cat seen a god killed?

konstantinvoncarstein

"Can't say I have, ma'am," she replied, lips tight.

"Neither have I," I said, [...]

Never 😊

Dainpdf

She has often compared the Duke of Violent Squalls to a god; even more so for the King of Winter, and she saw to the end of both.

Liliet

Demigod was what she said. I'm guessing there's a subtle difference in expected fallout.

Dainpdf

The king of winter was described as a full on god, but I guess he didn't really die...

Liliet

Yeah XD

Wry Warudo

R.I.P, Zombie the Fourth. You left us so young, never got your chance to go out in a blaze of green glory. You will be missed.

werafdsaew

Eh? Does the gate work or not? If it is why isn't she transporting her armies by gate

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Because all the gate does is make a hole someone can walk through. If the army tried to retreat through it, they'd get attacked the entire way. Battles like this are decided by who can maintain a coherent line longer and doing that while backing up is really hard. Any army that's doing well enough in the fight to retreat en masse through a single choke point didn't actually need to retreat in the first place.

werafdsaew

Sure, but if the gate is working she should be using it so that the armies can join up a lot quicker.

Solal

I think the point here is that she's already tired after using the gate for a single person. She wouldn't be able to get the whole army through it.

Novice

Yes, but the moment Cat joined the battle is mere seconds away from a cavalry charge destroying Juniper's flank. This is just her prioritizing the most urgent.

Eldrene Ay Ellan

She was marching the army for over a week before this. If travel is possible then why the hell would you not just immediately gate the 3rd and 4th to the region Juniper is in? You don't even have to actually exit the gate if you have any enemies nearby, just close it and open another a couple kilometers over.

Liliet

That's not how it works. Cat doesn't go 'in' and 'out of' Arcadia, she goes 'through' Arcadia. She can't aim from Arcadia back into Creation, all the aiming is done while outside.

Mental Mouse

They're not that sure "the gate is working", given prior reports. Alone on Z5, Cat could improvise if she suddenly found herself in the Hells. An army unexpectedly dumped there would be in trouble.

Liliet

Z3, Z5 is a regular horse :3

Mental Mouse

Right you are. My kingdom for an edit button! 😊

Liliet

IKR

Valkyria

Also there's no way to guess if the way through Arcadia is actually shorter than the normal distance on Calernia. It sure makes sense for long way travels that would take months, but there's no way you can actually know where in Arcadia the exit is, and how far away it is. What if she had just a few miles normally, but like march through half of Arcadia if she chose to gate there...?

Andrew Mitchell

My recollection is that gating through Arcadia is always a shorter path but you don't always know how much shorter.

Liliet

She needs to know the entry and exit point. She can't just say 'to Juniper please'. She needed to actually find her in the mundane way first. She can't even just know where the point is, she has to actually be familiar with it to get precise results.

She can get from anywhere to Callow. But she can't ad-hoc gate to anywhere.

Eldrene Ay Ellan

She doesn't need to land right in Junipers lap, just gate to the general area.

Liliet

hasn't the tower-in-Arcadia episode just now demonstrated how risky blind gating can be?

magesbe

This. This is the kind of mad, gutsy action that I loved Catherine pulling. We haven't seen anything really like this since book 3. Welcome back, Catherine. We're watching you eagerly as you show us just why you were definitively voted the most popular PGtE character.

Daniel E

Not often that we see the Army of Callow get seriously beat up. I wonder how much of the First & Second are left, let alone in fighting shape. Also considering the loss of people from Liesse and near-constant recruitment of the last few years, I feel like Callow should be running out of soldiers at this point.

IDKWhoitis

It's over the course of years, and if anything, the constant disasters are actually feeding more manpower to the army.

In good times, you have low unemployment, and the rate of volunteers may be 1/100, or potentially lower. Callow may have about 1-4 million souls, as it went through a long period of peace, their cities are of moderate size, and grain is plentiful. That's a theoretical manpower pool of 100,000-400,000. Callow historically didn't get much volume from its own people, only after the battle of the Camps. Black didn't butcher most people in the Liesse Rebellion, and most disasters in Callow have been limited to Liesse.

Its now not good times, the economy is focused on war, and unemployment in the South is rising. Theoretically, the ratio of soldiers can actually double, to 1/50 without further economic penalties, as the level of employment wasn't using those people anyways. So now we have a further 100,000 people to throw into the fire.

The 1-4 Million figure comes from the fact that most Callowan cities population number in the hundreds of thousands, but in this time period, the level of urbanization is actually low.

mavant

I fear you've added an extra order of magnitude in there. 1/100 of a million is 10_000 not 100_000.

IDKWhoitis

It does appear that way. Lesson learned: Don't do math at 2 am.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, "unemployment" is something of a modern concept. At Callowan's tech level and with feudal government, the issue is more in the shape of the war driving people off their land and disrupting trade. A farmer whose land has been overrun or a merchant who can't get goods, or their respective adult sons, are all potential soldiers. And given there are Callowan traditions of local defense, an appealing (or appalling) ruler has lots more potential soldiers to recruit or outright draft,

IDKWhoitis

Although unemployment is a modern term, it still is a good term to describe what is happening. There is a surplus amount of people who are available, who may be looking for work or otherwise can't due to their farm burning down or their former clients and vendors being zombified by Liesse.

Javvies

Heh.

I like the Cat and Abigail interactions. Especially Abigail's desire to avoid responsibilities and promotions.

Cat 1. Seven thousand cavalry 0.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Especially our erstwhile Princess on the other side:
"Not this crap again"

IDKWhoitis

Are we about to see a "Take me to your Leader" moment? Or a jumbled mess of confused and terrified squabble between Cat and the Cavalrymen?

Also, how long until heroes are on the scene, cussing Cat out?

konstantinvoncarstein

I think Pilgrim would want to speak first. Furthermore, the goal of the the allies is not to destroy the army, but to "repel" it

My very own name

I don't think even the pilgrim is aware of that decision. It's mostly the two princesses.

Valkyria

„Even madmen can win at dice.“

Or at a game of chicken apparently.

Andrew Mitchell

What a great chapter. I loved the conversation between Abigail and Cat! I'm so glad Cat's now fully herself again without the influence of Winter. What a gutsy move to stand as a mortal in front of that charge!

Someguy

It just occurred to me that the remaining Callowan horse breeders will curse Cat's name with the introduction of "foreign horse blood" into the genepool given that they are now trying to breed the Callowan destriers back into the population.

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Horse_breeding
<https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Destrier>

Liliet

lmao they COULD just breed their own breed separately from these, couldn't they?

Someguy

When mares go in heat, horny stallions will do anything to get some. All it takes is 1 breaking into/out of their pen and the breeding plans go to shit for several generations.

Liliet

assuming they're in nearby pens tho
I'm sure there's a way of handling this situation considering the size of Callow and the small amount of either breed of horses 🤔

Euodiachloris

A little accidental outcrossing is, ultimately, good for the stock book: it's how you discover nice surprises you wouldn't have thought of trying to aim for. 😊

Mares aren't totally daft when they pick who to flick a particularly flirtatious tail at, after all.

Wish more breeders embraced the roulette wheel a bit more gladly when it happens, because you can never quite tell what the grandkids will do until they get born to show you.

Jack

I wish a way could be done to use Z3 a breeding stock. The Order of the Bells will eventually become the Order of the "Flying" Bells ... hmmm, sounds like a name for a trapeze act.

Matthew

This is called the empty fort strategy.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Empty_Fort_Strategy

The most famous and also fictional use of it is in Romance of the Three Kingdoms.. (Which honestly also runs on Name logic) when the famed strategist, Zhuge Liang finds himself trapped behind enemy lines with only a few dozen soldiers.

Before the enemy army comes, he opens up the gates, hides all of his very few soldiers, and goes on the wall in his best clothes with a guqin (chinese guitar) and just plays.

By this point in the story, he has a reputation for impossible victories and clever tricks so the enemy commander sees him alone on the wall with the gates open...

...and leaves.

He's not falling for whatever BS Zhuge Liang has planned, because this is so obviously a trap.

Zhugue Liang escapes and lives.

Gunslinger

It's actually Cao Cao who uses the empty fort strategy though and Romance of the Three Kingdoms attributes it to Zhuge Liang cause the author hated Cao Cao

Raved Thrad

Cao Cao was awesome. Everyone hated him, and he still ended up Emperor.

Of course, there was also the time he ordered himself beheaded, but his advisors managed to talk him down to just a stern warning, so even he wasn't all there.

IDKWhoitis

A man who Cat could get along with it seems.

Gunslinger

This is so perfect I cannot imagine why I didn't think of it yet

Liliet

omg

Raved Thrad

I don't know how to link a video properly, so this'll have to do:

Raved Thrad

Oh, it worked!

Whiteeyes

It also happened during the Sengoku Jidai with Tokugawa. In his case he lit dozens of extra torches, made extra war bonfires, and beat numerous war drums while ordering the gates open in the middle of the night. He had just had shinobi agents attack the enemy camp, starting fires, detonating bombs, and sowing confusion. The enemy commanders, seeing their camp in chaos just as what sounded and looked like a mass of enemy troops were getting ready to attack sounded a retreat rather than get slaughtered in a surprise night attack.

Kilimandaros

Shouldn't sergeant Hurdler be a male goblin? I mean back in Raid (extra chapter) Robber noted that "there wasn't a single female goblin in the Fifteenth that wasn't an officer, since they didn't enrol in the ranks: it was the War College for them or nothing at all". Sergeant isn't an officer – no female goblin should be a sergeant.

TimSEsq

For some reason, sergeant appears to be an officer in the Legions of Terror. The War College was officer training, and some of its graduates became sergeants (including Hakram). That's not how real world military academies tend to work.

Kilimandaros

Hakram was Sergeant when he was enrolled in the War Collage (captain was highest rank there – they didn't have enough troops under their command to have the need for higher ranks). After graduating he become Catherine's adjutant.

pagesbe

Pretty sure Hurdler is an orc.

Kilimandaros

"Only a tenth, all goblins, with the line's sergeant among them."

"the goblin said" twice during her report, so I'm pretty sure that she is a goblin.

tbarim

On the topic of undead animals, whatever became of "stealth goat", the antelope from book 1 ch 28?

superkeaton

I can't believe Cat is grooming poor Abigail to take up the crown after her. That's just... so cruel.

Euodiachloris

Villain! Well, apparently. According to some. 😊 dalek955

I don't think she is. I think Cat's planning to give her actual successor (possibly Vivian) the gift of a competent, apolitical Callowan general.

June

I bet Abigail and Black compete for role of Squire.

JBell

Ooooh, now that's a thought! I'm not sure how likely it is, but boy, if that happened..

James, Mostly Harmless

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

ereshkigala

I just wanted one of those seven thousand people to be a psychopath that didn't feel fear, or a fanatic that didn't care how strong the Arch-Heretic might be... and for them to have a crossbow.

What she did? It was flat-out stupid because statistically speaking, one of the nameless guys present should have taken a potshot – and they wouldn't miss from fifty feet away. She's no longer an incarnation of Winter, she no longer has a Name, so she can't even rely on stories.

Javvies

Yes and no.

She knows she's no longer nigh invincible and overwhelmingly powerful.

They don't.

All they know is what they've picked up from the stories they've heard about her. In those stories, she's terrifying, functionally unkillable, and incredibly powerful. They might even know that their commanders decided to attack now instead of waiting for their own reinforcements because the Black Queen was on her way, and their commanders wanted to fight the battle before the Black Queen could arrive.

And then there's the fact that she deliberately went out on front of all of them all by herself with a flying horse, and she took the time to light her pipe and start smoking. It looks to them like a trap. And they know shooting her is useless, and just might piss her off enough that she stops being subtle and drops a lake on them. Or does something else unpleasant and appallingly violent to them. They know that they don't have heroes immediately available to assist them.

It's also entirely possible that Malanza has issued standing orders for non-Heroes to immediately withdraw and report, instead of engaging, in the event of encountering the Black Queen.

Cat showing up is kind of an excuse for Malanza to pull back from attacking, and to stop expending troops against the Army of Callow. Which Malanza doesn't really want to do anyways.

Liliet

>one of the nameless guys present should have taken a potshot While charging at full speed?

aran

Abigail is my new favorite character

aran

"No plan, no backup, no weapons weapons worth a damn. Oh, and something else I don't have? Anything. To. Lose.

Do the smart thing. Let someone else try first."

Andrew Mitchell

Hahaha! YES, Cat = The Doctor. Love the idea.

aran

Drawing a line on the ground and calmly standing behind it is also literally a scene from the show, I just remembered.

Mental Mouse

Before tomorrows update, I'll note that we're certainly seeing Cat being more human:

> "Queens aren't supposed to have people on," General Abigail plaintively said.

> I hid my smile by looking away.

Clint

Edgar!

This is his second mention, and in this one he's explicitly outfitting the Black Queen with his helmet and taking care of her horse.

And she made explicit reference to the Shining Prince.

Could Edgar be one lucky battle (e.g. surviving a night raid including a few Named) away from being the next Page?

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I hope so! What a lovely idea.

Chapter 22: Standoffs

"One hundred sixty nine: any companion volunteering to stay behind and hold off a superior enemy will be guaranteed success, twice over if having already taken a mortal wound."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

It was like watching the sea split.

Even at the measured pace they'd been keeping fifty feet was too close for them to outright end the charge. There were seven thousand of them, and though they weren't tightly packed those kinds of numbers had weight and momentum – that was what made cavalry charged so dangerous in the first place. No, stopping wasn't in the cards, so instead the Proceran wheeled to the sides. It was beautiful display of horsemanship, the kind of skill I might have applauded were it not the work of soldiers still intent on killing mine. I kept a calm eye on the proceedings to see if any of the riders were crossing the line I'd traced in the snow, but whoever had called them back had pulled the leash in full: as if held back by an invisible wall, the stream of riders spread out on the sides but never crossed. I pulled at my pipe calmly, studying the enemy and running a mental tally of who might be in command. This lot should have been sent south by Hasenbach herself, but with her uncle and most her fellow Lycaonese up north fighting the Dead King she might not have had a competent loyalist to appoint at the head of the army.

Princess Rozala Malanza was a possible candidate, assuming the results of the Battle of the Camps hadn't tarred her reputation as a general in the Principate, but she was one of Amadis Milenan's supporters. If she held command, it meant that the situation up in Salia had gotten rather interesting. No, odds were it was one of the western princes or princesses that held the run of the host. I'd seen the banner for Lange flying, and that was possible, but more likely it'd been the rulers of Brus or Lyonis – both long-standing Hasenbach supporters – that held primacy. I'd find out soon enough, I supposed, because someone had given the order to hold back. I spat out a mouthful of grey smoke and adjusted my helm slightly so that the sun wouldn't shine into my eyes. It was a nice day out, more cool than cold and nearly windless. The many plumes of smoke rising from the wrecked camp where Juniper's trap had failed made the lack of breeze obvious, and I allowed myself a glance in that direction. The bitter fighting retreat of my forces had not ceased in the slightest: if anything, the Levantine foot was going after my soldiers even more aggressively than before.

The enemy ranks parted to let through a heavily-armed party of thirty, and though the faces of the royals coming to were still hidden to my eyes the three banners above them were not. The salamander of Aquitan was there, which meant Malanza herself was part of the delegation, but hers was the only heraldry I knew for certain of the three. The long-haired maiden clutching a bow and arrows I vaguely remembered to be from northern Procer, though which principality I couldn't say. The green eagle perched on a crescent might be the arms of Cantal and therefore another old acquaintance – Prince Arnaud of Cantal had been at the Battle of the Camps – but I was pretty sure there was another principality that had a green hawk clutching a crescent moon for heraldry, and I did not trust myself to tell the difference. The Principate's royal heraldries were a labyrinth at the best of times, and prone to changing along with the branches of the ruling families that held the seat. I got my answer before long, though, when the cavalry escort parted to allow three royals through. Would you look at that, it really is Prince Arnaud, I mused. This was getting rather nostalgic, wasn't it?

Dark-haired and dark-eyed as Arlesites often were, Princess Rozala had little changed since we last met. Physically, anyway, I thought. There was no easy smile on her lips today, and the way she held herself even on the horse... Like there was nowhere that was entirely safe. I'd seen that before, in old soldiers. In Black too, who'd lived his entire life knowing he was one misstep away from death at heroic hands. You weren't like at the peace talks after the Camps, Malanza, I thought. This was fresher, and I could think of only one war that'd leave so deep a mark so quickly. She'd fought up north, then. Prince Arnaud was still an unimpressive middle-aged specimen of Alamans royalty, though he appeared to have added a little muscle to his plump frame since we'd last met. Wouldn't do to dismiss this one, I told myself. He'd stuck out to me as bearing watching during the truce talks, feigning emotions he did not feel very convincingly. The last of three was a woman I'd never seen before, fair-haired and blue-eyed. Older than Rozala but younger than Arnaud, with a soldier's bearing and a narrow but handsome face. No great beauty, unlike Malanza whose curves and long curls would be well worth a second look in a different situation, but emanating a sort of robust health that was pleasing to the eye.

Rather interestingly, it was Princess Rozala that rode ahead of the other two. They reined in their horses a mere ten feet in front of me, riders bearing their banners behind them as the rest of their escort held tight on the sides.

"Black Queen," the Princess of Aequitan said, tone grim. "It really is you."

"In the flesh," I replied. "It's been some time, Malanza. I see you've still keeping Arnaud around, for some godsforsaken reason. Who's the fresh face?"

The Prince of Cantal, who I'd so casually referred to, purpled with anger. I no longer had the senses of a fae to listen to his heartbeat, and calling on the Night might be taken as a hostile act, so I could only wonder if it was yet another piece of theatre on his part.

"Now see here, you filth Damned-" the prince snarled.

"Arnaud," Princess Rozala said, tone sharp.

The man forced himself to calm, and I kept my face blank to hide my interest. Prince Amadis was still in the custody of Callow, last I heard. In his absence had someone else taken up the reins of his little cabal of crowned malcontents?

"I am Princess Sophie Louvroy of Lyonis," the stranger blandly said. "You are, I believe, the self-proclaimed Queen of Callow."

"Ah," I hummed. "So, you're the minder the First Prince set on ol' Rozala. Should I be addressing you for the rest of this conversation, or is she actually allowed to speak for herself?"

"A petty and transparent scheme, as befits your reputation," Princess Sophie coldly replied.

She twitched, though, like she'd wanted to glance at Princess Rozala but caught herself before she could. There were military types – and the Princess of Lyonis seemed too comfortable in armour not to be one of those – that were also subtle diplomats, but it looked like Sophie Louvroy wasn't one of them. Good to know.

"You've refrained from attacking us, Foundling," Princess Rozala said. "The courtesy has been returned. Evidently you want to talk, so talk. I've no time to waste on insults and posturing."

I studied her for a moment, the tanned face visible through the raised visor of her elaborate helm. The fresh pink scar on her cheek, too rough to have been caused by a blade. Her armour was freshly polished, I saw, but it had blemishes now it'd not had at the Camps. She was worn, and the visible signs of it were the shallowest part.

"Withdraw," I said. "And I will not pursue."

"Pursue?" Princess Sophie hissed indignantly. "You are one woman-"

I ignored her, meeting Malanza's eyes instead.

"We've been at this crossroads before, Rozala," I said.

"So we have," the other woman softly agreed. "But this is not Callow, Catherine Foundling. We did not seek this war."

"Then let it end," I said. "Those in my service who brought the sword to Procer, I will chastise appropriately. I don't want to fight this battle, Rozala Malanza. But trust me, neither do you."

"And we're to take your word for this?" Princess Sophie mocked. "You, a-"

"Sophie," I said, tone nonchalant. "If you interrupt this conversation one more time, I may very well lose patience and relieve you of your tongue."

The fair-haired woman blanched, then reddened, and though she opened her mouth I stared at her calmly. In silence. A heartbeat passed, then another. Her mouth closed and I returned my gaze to Malanza.

"The Legions of Terror put half the heartlands to the torch," Princess Rozala said. "That cannot go unanswered, Foundling. Break ties with them and the Army of Callow will be allowed to leave Procer unhindered. On this I give you my word."

"You know I'm not going to give you that," I said. "I offer you this instead: allow them to leave in my charge. They will be, from that moment onwards, my responsibility. I give you my word that should any of them attempt to enter Procer again, save at the invitation of the First Prince, I'll see everyone involved hanged."

"We could kill you right now," Prince Arnaud said, voice grown cool for all the earlier heat. "Do you truly think yourself so powerful you could turn back so many horsemen, Damned? You overestimate your bargaining position."

I cocked my head to the side and looked at the man. Eventually, I tapped the bottom of my staff against the line I'd drawn in the snow.

"Cross it, then," I simply said.

I could see him considering it. It was in the way his legs shifted, like he was preparing to spur his horse forward. His fingers were inching towards the sword at his hip. Teeth worrying the dragonbone shaft of my pipe, I inhaled the wakeleaf and let it burn pleasantly at my throat. I exhaled, and Prince Arnaud grit his teeth but did not try me. It was the calm that was doing it, I dimly realized. Even more than the power they had seen me wield with their own eyes, the more they watched me fail to be cowed the more I could feel them grow unsettled. Thinking I knew something they didn't, that I still had some card up my sleeve. I wondered if this was how Black had felt, making the armies of the Liesse Rebellion melt away like summer snow with nothing but a few tricks and the weight of his reputation.

"Malanza," Princess Sophie whispered, "the longer we wait-"

"I know," Princess Rozala crossly replied.

The longer they waited, the more of my legionaries retreated back to the safety of the southern camp. The more their chance to score a decisive victory slipped away.

"Where did you go, Black Queen?" the Princess of Aquitan suddenly asked. "For nigh a year you were gone."

"I went into the darkness, Rozala," I said. "And what I found there followed me out."

"The Everdark," she said, lips thinning.

"Withdraw," I gently repeated. "And I will not pursue."

"It cannot go unanswered, Foundling," she wearily told me. "There would be... consequences."

I looked up into the sky, at the burning glare of the sun.

"There would be consequences to forcing my hand as well," I said, and returned my gaze to her. "A truce, for today. And tomorrow we will see if for once the costs can be paid with ink and gold instead of blood, for that last currency we can ill-afford."

"It might come to a fight tomorrow regardless," the Princess of Aquitan said. "So why should I hold my blade today, when the advantage lies with us?"

"Did you ever read about the old crusades, Rozala?" I idly asked.

"Prince Gontrand's five volumes of 'Empyrean Wars' were part of my readings as a child," Rozala frowned.

"Never read those," I said. "See, my own education pulled a little to the east. What I got instead was the 'Commentaries on the Campaigns of Terribilis the Second', and there's part that stayed with me. I thought about it, after Akua's Folly. After the Camps too. It's written that in the wake of the victory that broke the Fourth Crusade, on the shores of the Wasaliti, the High Lords sang Terribilis' praises and called him the greatest general Praes had ever seen. He lost his temper with them, and here's what he said-"

I cleared my throat.

"Another such victory and I will rule an empire of ghosts," I recited.

Silence followed in the wake of my words.

"Now," I quietly said, "you might win if we fought. Or maybe I'll end up the victor of the field. But either way, Malanza, we'll both be losing. You should know that, if you've been where I think you have."

"What would you know of ghosts, Catherine Foundling?" the princess hoarsely replied.

"Enough I don't want to fight today," I said.

Her armoured hands closed around her reins as her lips trembled with a heady mixture of fear and rage.

"Princess Sophie, sound the retreat," Rozala said, voice rough.

The Princess of Lyonis drew back as if stung, narrow face filling with surprise and indignation.

"Princess Rozala-"

"Merciful Gods, Louvroy, just sound the fucking retreat," the Princess of Aquitan seethed. "She's a monster and half mad besides, but she's right. How many soldiers are you willing to throw away putting her down? One thousand, two, three? Our entire horse?"

I dipped my head, if not in thanks then in respect.

"Spare me, you carrion thing," Princess Rozala snarled. "This is not the respect of worthy opponents, and do not mistake this for some sort of arrangement. You've merely contrived to make yourself into the least of great evils yet one more time."

Seizing her reins, she turned aside her horse.

"You will be seen to, Black Queen," the Princess of Aquitan called out. "There will be a day where all sins will be called to account."

Might be, I thought. But it won't be today, or by the likes of you. I waited there, atop my horse, until the trumpets sounded. The cavalry was pulling back, almost embarrassedly, but it was to the fighting in the wreckage that my eyes turned. They did not listen, at first. They were Levantines, and this was a Proceran command. But the trumpets sounded again, insistently, and finally the call was heeded. Just like that, the battle came to a close. For now, I thought. The rest of their host was still marching towards this dawning nightmare, and even more were following behind the army I'd led here. This was far from over, and it was with that tired thought that I began the ride to the soldiers I'd just saved.

—

When I'd found the Third Army, I'd been welcomed with relief. When I'd reunited with the Fourth, it had been to a queen's honours. What awaited me at the camp on the southern bank of the Odelle was entirely different, however. Oh, there were cheers. The ramparts of wood and beaten earth were filled with legionaries from the First and the Second, and they greeted my return with a deafening roar. But as I guided Zombie up the ramp that led into the camp proper and the gates were opened, I noticed that the escort awaiting me inside was not among the cheering throng. My eye ran quickly over their number – forty of them, more than should be needed for a mere escort if neither Juniper nor Vivienne were able to come themselves – and then lingered on the number of lightly armoured soldiers among them. Mages, fifteen of them, and I did not think it coincidence that there were five ogres among the remaining soldiers. Robber had mentioned there were instructions in case of my return, I remembered. To make certain I was me, and not some puppet of whatever I'd found below. It was not an unsound precaution, but I still felt my temper rise.

I'd just faced down an army of Proceran cavalry without even a fucking sword at my hip and this was my welcome home? An army we shouldn't even be fighting, I thought with mounting anger, and two of the three people responsible for that particular bout of foolishness had been the ones to send me this escort. My mount slowed as I approached the two lines of soldiers awaiting me, and I raised an eyebrow when I recognized one among them – though she was hardly a soldier, truth be told.

"General Hune," I said. "I see at least one of this army's commanders found it in them to greet me in person."

The thick plate on the ogre made her look more a steel fortress than a person, but she'd not worn her helm – the effect was almost comical, like a tuft of person over a siege engine. Hune Egeldotir's face had not grown any less brutish, at first look, though neither had her eyes lost that look of patient cleverness. She didn't look like she'd aged a day since we'd first met, though given the rumoured lifespan of her kind that should not have surprised me.

"Your Majesty," Hune replied, her voice still surprisingly delicate for her size. "Welcome back."

"Welcome indeed," I flatly said, glancing at the rest of the party.

"Orders, ma'am," the ogre said, though she did not sound apologetic in the slightest.

It would be, I thought, only be sensible to go along with this. To let the finest mages the army had on hand confirm I was not in fact a possessed shell before I was allowed the privilege of speaking to the Lady-Regent of Callow and the Marshal of the same. My fingers twitched. If I protested, I wondered where the legionaries around me would fall. There were a lot of Callowans among them, I thought. More than there would have been a few years ago, though with Vivienne as regent that loyalty might not be as clear-cut as I believed.

"Orders," I repeated, tone pensive. "Funny thing, those."

I hardened my voice.

"General Hune, kneel."

The command rang, though my voice was not raised. It didn't need to be. The ogre stilled, and I could see the shiver go through the rest of the soldiers she'd brought with her. All around us, the cheering began to peter out as legionaries realized something was afoot.

"Your Majesty-" Hune began.

"I have you an order, general," I softly said.

She looked at me, and whatever she found there she knew better than to argue with. Like a tall oak breaking, the ogre knelt in the muddy snow. I glanced at the legionaries that'd come with her, the uneasy mages and tensing soldiers.

"Disperse," I coldly said.

I didn't bother to look if they'd obeyed, though the sound of hasty footsteps told me that had. I pressed my knees against Zombie and she tread forward, until I bid her to stop by Hune's still-kneeling form.

"Get up, Hune," I said. "And the next time one of them tries to give you an order like this, remember who you swore an oath to."

The ogre rose to her feet, and though there was anger glittering in those eyes there was something else as well. I'd been content to leave the reins of the Army of Callow largely in Juniper's hands, so far. Perhaps now and then, though, a reminder of who it was they served might not go amiss.

"I will not forget, Your Majesty," General Hune said.

I glanced at her, almost amused at the boldness.

"Then come along," I said. "I mean to have a frank conversation with the Lady-Regent and the Marshal."

The glint in the ogre's eyes told me that while she might not be all that fond of me, she'd not forgotten who had put her in this situation either. We made our way through the fortified camp, Hune taking the lead as she knew the lay of it, but with legionaries moving out of our way it was not long until we arrived before a tall pavilion. The banners besides it, I saw, included my own. I did not dismount. There was a guard of soldiers around, a full line.

"You are relieved, legionaries," I said.

The lieutenant among them – an orc – glanced at Hune and my irritation spiked.

"If I need to repeat an order one more time," I said, "there will be need a need for gallows today."

"Ma'am," the lieutenant got out in a croak, hastily saluting.

Under my cold stare the rest of them scrambled with him.

"General," I said. "If you would?"

The ogre raised the flaps open for me and I rode in without even needing to lower my head. She looked surprised when I gestured for her to follow me in. The pavilion was still full of officers. Juniper's full general staff was there, along with a few others. An old orc with a black band over an eye and two aides at his side needed no introduction, but Vivienne I almost did not recognize. She'd grown out her hair, and no longer wore leathers. There must have been around twenty people inside the pavilion, when I entered, but a heartbeat later you could have heard a pin drop. Juniper was first to react.

"Hune, what did you-"

"Juniper, if you still want to have a marshal's baton by the end of this conversation you will sit down and shut up," I calmly said.

The orc flinched like I'd struck her.

"This is-"

"On your oath, Hellhound," I snarled in Kharsum, "you will be silent."

She swallowed, loudly. I glanced at Marshal Grem One-Eye, whose face was a study in neutrality.

"A pleasure to meet you, Marshal," I said. "We will speak later."

"Well met, Black Queen," the old orc gravelled.

A dip of the head was offered, respect but not submission, and he took the hint. His aides followed him, so I turned my eyes on the other officers. Those, at least, were mine. Aisha was studying me with a blank face, I saw, and had a hand on Juniper's arm.

"Out," I said, inclining my head.

"Catherine, this is not-"

Vivienne's voice, the tone almost forcefully calming, had me clenching my fingers again. Zombie felt my legs tighten and whinnied angrily.

"Your regency is at an end, Vivienne Dartwick," I said. "Put the seal on the table."

The general staff had left the tent before the seal clattered against wood. Vivienne was looking at me like she'd never seen me before.

"General Hune, take a seat," I said. "Depending on the outcome of this conversation you might in command of the Army of Callow by the end of the day."

"You can't be serious," Vivienne said.

"Nauk is dead," I said. "I've had to personally save the Third Army from encirclement and annihilation. The Fourth was bled savagely by Helike while essentially marching back and forth across the same patch of Iserre. Today, I found you engaged in a pitched battle with a Grand Alliance army – that is, a force that should be three months to the north preventing the fucking Dead King from rolling over Procer."

My voice had risen, but I forced out a breath to calm myself.

"To add insult to injury," I evenly said. "You were losing that battle to the extent that I had to personally step in and settle the matter. Now, I would have preferred to have this conversation with Adjutant there to speak as well and no enemy army within a day's march. Your little stunt outside, however, has officially made me lose patience."

My staff hit the ground beneath us with a hard thump. Both of them drew back.

"Now," I calmly said, "do explain to me why either of you should still be trusted to make decisions about anything other than what you'll have for dinner."

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

theart0fwar

Damn, you got it this time!

stevenneiman

Does anyone else have trouble with TWF giving absurd figures for when they last voted? I pretty reliably vote every time Guide updates, and about half of those it says that my last vote was at least a week ago when I do.

Flameburst

You may be assigned different ip addresses regularly. Some routers do this automatically. I get a similar problem with 4chan where i am told regularly my ip address was banned months or years ago for 30 days.

stevenneiman

I go back and forth between 2 different houses, so that might be the culprit.

KageLupus

Probably just some shenanigans going on with what they think your IP address is. Either your router or one of the relays your ISP uses is changing it, so every once in awhile TWF thinks you are someone else. I have the same thing happen when I vote from my work computer. Sometimes it says I haven't voted in three months when I voted earlier in the week.

theart0fwar

On that comment section I plant my flag. May it stand here above all else, annoyingly.

– Dread Emperor thearofwar, the oddly Irritant.

theart0fwar

For real, though. This new Kat? Definitely badass.

Mental Mouse

TVTropes calls Cat "A Mother to Her Legions"; what we're seeing here is the military version of "I brought you into this world, and I can take you out of it!"

Except she's also gone from "I'm in charge because I can whup any of you", to "I'm in charge because I'm the boss – and The Boss Is Back".

Insanenoodlyguy

Mrs. Foundling, thanks for coming to your performance review.

No problem.

So you're in charge around here, is that fair to say?

Absolutely, I'm the boss.

OK, so take us through a day in the life of "The Boss".

Well the first thing I do is Flash Hakram (like a boss)

Yell at Archer (like a boss)

Lead an army (like a boss)

Remember Liese (like a boss)

Direct Drow (like a boss)

My own footrest (like a boss)

Kill some heroes (like a boss)

Promote Abigal (like a boss)

Hit on Viveine (like a boss)

Get rejected (like a boss)

Chug some senna (like a boss)

Fight some Fairies (like a boss)

Call Cordelia (like a boss)

Fail at peace talks (like a boss) curse out procer (like a boss)

mance some lakes (like a boss)

Eldtrich shift (like a boss)

No dead king deal (like a boss)

Get named arch-vile (like a boss)
Lose humanity (like a boss)
Fight some gods (like a boss)
Gonna eat em (like a boss)
Oh fuck me, this just makes it worse, shit!

Pussy out (like a boss)
Power of friendship (like a boss)
Give up godhood (like a boss) become high priestess (like a boss)
Score some wakeleaf (like a boss)
Legs fucked up (like a boss)
Lust for Akua (like a boss)
Chess with Tyrant (like a boss)

Go to Procer (like a boss)
Army's gone to shit (like a boss)
Archer's got trauma (like a boss)
Still fuck her brains out (like a boss)
Turn into night (like a boss)
Prepare to fight saint (like a boss)
Set it all on fire (like a boss)
I die again (like a boss)

Uh huh. So that's an average day for you then.
No doubt.
You set everything on fire and die.
I come back.
And I think at one point there you said something about lusting after the doom of liese?
Nope.
Actually, I'm pretty sure you did.
Nah, that ain't me.
OK, well I'm not sure you should be in charge of jack shit.
I'm the boss.
Ya, I know, I still want to get mages to make sure you aren't possessed.
I'm the boss.
Seriously Cat, calm down.
I'm the boss!
Yelling doesn't make your words calmer cat!
(like a boss)

Shikkarasu

Look, just take the whole internet. There's not enough points I can give you.

NerfContessa

I agree, take my internet as well. :X

Mental Mouse

The thing is, possessed or not, she's the boss. And remember, the prime risk for possessing her.. now has, if not a body, then some reasonable facsimile thereof, and can operate independently. Of course, for most of the Woe that falls under "now we have two problems". 😊

Daniel E

I am in tears from laughing, thank you.

Dragnor

Though they may oft beat at our territories, to all of ye I pronounce this. Let not the flies disturb the horse.

-Counsel Dragnor the Dismissive

Stormblessed

Wow. That was intense. I hope there is reasonableness all around and no lasting hurt feelings. Kat's going to need juniper at the end of this I feel. Hopefully they understand her anger and reasoning is placed at the situation rather than themselves.

Gunslinger

Juniper is an orc. She'll understand that from her warlord

Skaddix

You would expect Harkam to get more berating considering yeah technically Viv had the job title and Juniper does run the armies but Hakram was the real power.

And Cat still doesn't like Aisha lol.

Kinda anticlimactic though Battle Wise. But I assume someone is going for force a fight.

My very own name

She mentioned that she would like it if Adjutant were available for this conversation as well. I just don't know why she didn't berate him previously.

We might see battle the next day, everything is possible!

magesbe

Probably because seeing the disaster that has been this battle up to this point has sort of been a "last straw" kind of thing. She's furious at the situation, and it taking it out on the people who helped place her army in this mess. I mean, it isn't even mostly their fault; that would be whatever is stopping Gates and the Tyrant. But without them taking their entire army into Callow, this still wouldn't be happening.

That, and she's angry that this battle is even taking place when these forces are needed north.

Mental Mouse

My guess is she ends up gating the survivors back to Abigail's group... who by then is under attack by yet another force wandering the vicinity. Come to think of it, she dashed off without so much as telling Abigail where she was going... hopefully Abigail at least tries to follow the original plan.

Liliet

I mean it's contextually obvious she went to the other army.

SpeckofStardust

Oh he is in deep trouble to, there is a reason why he was sheepish all when Catharine and co were pointily asking what the ever living fuck did this shitshow come about. Further more she stated she had intended to wait until everyone was here before doing this but... Well this very closely looks like a technical coup and Hakram kinda explicitly gave his hand up to make it dam clear Viv was the one in charge while Cat was away.

Liliet

The two of them letting Hakram be the real power, instead of the two of them, is kind of part of the competence question.

And yeah, she wishes he was there too.

boballab

One of the reasons that Adjutant cut his hand off was to show Viv that she was in charge. If you go back and re read that chapter Viv was on the verge of a complete disaster that would have torn the kingdom apart over her mounting paranoia concerning Hakram and Juniper wasn't helping things by treating her like a red headed step child. Cat set this power sharing up in an effort to keep the multiple parts of the kingdom together while the true glue, herself, was gone (The Callowans didn't trust the orcs to run the country, the Old 15th hands didn't trust the Callowans to run the army, both sides only trust Cat). However she was gone too long and we have now seen the consequences. Which brings up the question of what will happen to Callow if she does abdicate? Her plan to abdicate will be a total disaster to Callow unless she finds someone that can be trusted by both sides. Viv was my leading candidate until the chap where she almost started a civil war over her Hakrum fears now coupled with military blunder knocks her from that spot. Now we got a Callowan that saved the Third Army after Nauk and the command staff died which would will go a long way to keeping the civilian and army power factions trust in the crown..,

Skaddx

Did Abigail really save anything? Cat saved the day. Without Cat, our Hero's Blood crosses the river and slaughter the whole army regardless of what Abigail does. Cat saved her by showing up with reinforcements and by wielding Night. Sure Abigail made some choices that kept more troops alive but that wouldn't have made a difference at all.

boballab

Go back and re read Interlude: Beheld I. Without Abigail there would have been no Army to save, they would have been crushed by the night attack. Remember Cat gets there during the day after Abigail stopped their night attack as it is explained in that Interlude. No Abigail and that army is destroyed before Cat ever shows up.

Skaddx

Yes Abigail delayed but without Cat, they die eventually anyway.

boballab

You keep missing the point, without Abigail there is nothing for Cat to save, she would have come along to find a victorious Dominion army and a completely wiped out as in all dead Third Army.

Liliet

Cat and Abigail were both necessary to that equation.

Gunslinger

Cat losing her temper is so much better now than when she froze stuff. It's so much rawer.

daegone823

This "temper" is serving many purposes,

Cat has been gone a year amidst that year sh barely ruled. The people see her as a legend and could easily see her as martyr if she were to fall. Her allies may have considered replacing her based on them being ready to blast her based on possible possession. These concerns are not to far off, if only the knew how close she was to loosing (I believe ranger will keep those stories to herself, maybe Akua won't). Still this is Cat's story and if she does not take the driving wheel then similar to the Black Knight she will be replaced by the god's below.

Hakram already said that Vivienne has been changing, maybe she believes that she does not need Cat anymore. She needs to learn her place in this instance.

By taking agency over her inner council who all but wrote her off, she is taking her destiny in her hand, unlike the prince who by all accounts has lost control. Cat needs her inner circle to come to heel. If not then similar to the many military leaders who were misled by the Tyrant they will fall into disatroys stories that will perpetuate what Cat is trying to overwrite.

The fact that murder has not been put on the table should also be considered as a sign of Cat "educating" her allies on the schemes of the forces that they are dealing with.

haihappen

Viv probably lost her Thief Name because a Thief steals. And she had the opportunity to steal an entire Kingdom and didn't do it... maybe Names are that fickle.

Also possible: A transition is waiting to happen.

Her military blunders... are basically splitting the Army into columns, which got cut off because of fairy gate sabotage, and then this battle. It could be reasoned that this was all Junipers fault. Except Viv should have tried to negotiate peace (,which she may have tried)?

The campaign itself had solid reasoning behind it (see her last talk with Hakram+Akua+Archer). It was just poorly executed, "aided" by sabotage from Tyrant and maybe someone else.

(I have the feeling the Tyrant is not behind the fairy gate sabotage. He would certainly be capable, but it does not feel like his style.)

On a not completely unrelated note:

Wouldn't it be fun if Cat used the I stab you to jump-start a Name technique?

I.e. (unlikely):

Cat: "Hey Viv, do you REALLY want to rule Callow and make it a better place?"

Viv: "Sure?"

Cat: "Not the enthusiasm I hoped for, but it needs to be enough: I name you Heiress to the Queenship of Callow!"
stabs Viv into the heart with a knife "Try not to die"

naturalnuke

Like actual emotion instead of whatever it was, cold irritation perhaps?

There's a heat in her again.

Dainpdf

Real anger, instead of a performative version.

Adrian V

I still found that power incontinency funny, i want her to break something by accident and pretend like it never happened... again because i know that has happened at least once to her....

Oranckers

"It was at that moment, that Vivienne Dartwick realized just how badly she had fucked up"

haihappen

Isn't this Trope somewhere:

- 1) Ally/Friend X leaves Person Y in charge
- 2) Y messes up
- 3) X returns, chews Y up for messing up
- 4) X says "know you know what not to do"/"Know you know what mistakes COST", and promptly gives Y the same job/a job with even MORE responsibility

I feel this should be a trope...

Dameon Cornish

Welp

YOU DONE MESSED UP

Javvies

Cat is displeased. And growing more so.

She has been gone for a while, but still. She's the Black Queen of Callow.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Well this is setting a terrible precedent. Its like she wants Assassin and/or anyone capable of impersonation to take control of her armies.

matesbe

The majority of the people who could truly imitate her could probably also fool a casual magical inspection. For example, if Assassin could be detected by a handful of mages, it wouldn't be as brutally effective as it is.

RoflCat

Reminder: Assassin managed to fool AKUA, of all people, inside her Doom Fortress, after having 'captured' it for a period of time.

IDKWhoitis

I think Cat has a certain weight on the scales, and that relentless fury that she can meter out in a ruthless barrage is a hallmark most people would barely be able to stand up against, or even mimic.

If anything, it's exactly this reaction that should confirm it is Cat, to not go quietly, and to break whatever she can't use, and bend whatever she can't break.

Mental Mouse

Interestingly, we have not seen much use of strategic or tactical impersonation so far in the story – I think Assassin was the only case we the readers have seen. The elves certainly could do that, but IIRC nobody seems to consider the possibility, including them. It may well be that “a strong personality” is its own authentication, leading back to my political answer (last chapter's comments) to “who is the real Cat?”

Oh, and about those magical examinations? Callow sent out a Duchess of Faerie and got back a mortal with ties to an entirely different power that nobody surface-side has ever heard of. Cat was quite sensible to put the kibosh on that testing business up front.

konstantinvoncarstein

How could the elves do this?

IDKWhoitis

Because they cheat, Old Elves just flat out ignore Creational Laws. It wouldn't be too far out of the realm of possibility for them to somehow cheat recognition or alter their presence to fit something else. This is all purely speculative though, as we haven't seen the Elves mobilize much (although by Series end, I think we will have to, to put the Dead King down).

Mental Mouse

They can reshape their bodily material at will. It was noted multiple times that Cat's power was seriously limited by her attachment to her own, humanlike form. But elves are more comfortable with their nature, there's no reason why, instead of turning into mist or fire, they couldn't turn into a different human(oid). In fact, Cat did just that to Akua's wintry form before the Keter trip (Sve Noc reverted her). On the other hand, aside from physical form, maintaining the impersonation would probably be harder for them (it's hard enough for humans).

Liliet

You're confusing elves and fae I think.

Mental Mouse

Aren't elves just of offshoot/rebel branch of the fae?

konstantinvoncarstein

No:) Fae are beings of pure magic, who live in Arcadia, and are older than creation.

The elves are a powerful magical race, but they are material and are born in Creation (but they can send the Golden Bloom to Arcadia). And they are a splinter faction from another elvish kingdom, larger than Calernia

Liliet

No, I'm pretty sure that wasn't implied or hinted at anywhere.

Calernian elves live in Golden Bloom – the forest to the north of Callow, bordering on the Duchy of Daoine, with Everdark further to the north. As distinct from Waning Woods to the south of Callow, separating it from the League of Free Cities, containing Refuge and a gate to Arcadia, broadly associated with fae (srying near Waning Woods = sending invitation to the Wild Hunt).

We know from Bard's POV segment in Epilogue 2 that Golden Bloom elves are a xenophobic offshoot / exiles from a bigger elf kingdom somewhere on another continent. Their slaughter of the previous Golden Bloom inhabitants – of which Deoraithe are survivors/refugees – pissed off the very forest they were aiming to claim for themselves, and ever since they haven't been able to have children. One notable exception is Hye, whose mother was with Golden Bloom elves, but characteristically Hye is a half-elf, in defiance of Golden Bloom attitudes. (So presumably her mom broke ties with Golden Bloom first, and then as a consequence managed to have a kid, with someone who had nothing to do with GB at all).

It's a noted habit of GB elves to somehow transpose their kingdom into Arcadia temporarily when the political situation on Creation near them gets a bit too interesting. Then they come out and resume existing in Creation again.

They are ruled by the Forever King. He had attempted to interfere with Calernian politics by sending two Emerald Swords (warrior caste?) to kill Akua. They were intercepted by Bard.

Elves are technically Good, but GB-ers interpret it rather idiosyncratically and kill everyone approaching their borders unless they're a Hero.

Things elves have in common with fae:

- non-human
- more magical than humans
- can interbreed with humans
- can occasionally be found in Arcadia
- constitute a good reason to not go into the woods on Callowan borders
- kill people a lot
- don't die of old age
- are not normally a noticable entity in Calernian politics.

Differences between elves and fae:

- elves can be Named or non-Named and are a regular mortal race in this regard, while fae are something else entirely
- fae are bound by stories, while elves have regular free will
- elves can selectively disallow Creational laws, while fae are very much bound by those, but often have domains
- fae are native to Arcadia, divided into courts and governed by cycles. Elves just visit, like Cat and her legions
- fae are bound by all oaths. No such limitation applies to elves, as far as we know etc

So yeah, no. Completely different.

konstantinvoncarstein

Are you sure it is not the fae who can do that? I remember elves for their martial prowess and capability to ignore one law of creation at a time, but no more

daegone823

If Vivienne lost her name does that mean the heroic group is broken or.... has it changed. Just saying:

Archer has PTSD from nearly freezing to death

Hakram is handless(hand of the king without hands lol)

Vivienne lost her name... maybe?

Masego stole a doom day weapon and is a walking disaster already.

Cat does not have a name, lost the fae powers that everyone was afraid of(even the dead king respected her), and I think now is nearly mortal.

Just saying the Woe have seen better days, and I am starting loose faith in a victory here. If I know our author he will make me eat my words, so here hoping that logically they can execute a hail Mary pass on this one.

pagesbe

Things have been bad before, really bad. This is a major trial for the Woe, yes, but I believe Archer will find Masego and bring him home, Vivienne will get over this and either get another Name or at least find a place for herself that she can live with. Cat may have lost her immense Winter powers, but she was winning impossible battles long before every getting them, and at night she may even be more destructive than she was with Winter (though still easier to kill; but not much). Remember how much difficulty she had even scratching some of the Drow mooks at Great Strycht?

IDKWhoitis

Sometimes Cat's Victories are less "She Wins" and more "She loses the least out of everyone present".

I think Cat is more dangerous without a Name, as she is totally unbound by rules and stories. Pilgrim's plots and story weights may not be enough to subtly assassinate her.

What is a Story to a Non-Believer? A God to a Atheist? A ward to a Mortal?

The Woe are embodying the change the Calamities started with the Death of the Age of Wonders, Institutions, not Named, deciding the course of Nations and Peoples.

RanVor

Freedom from stories is a double-edged sword. Cat wouldn't have won half of her impossible victories without them.

Argentorum

True, but remember, all the other movers are still bound up in their narratives, and those stories can still be used as a loadstone around the necks of the Saint, the Pilgrim, and the Undead King.

Meanwhile, Cat can't be forced into things because of her name, even as the larger story has narrative weight.

Liliet

>The Woe are embodying the change the Calamities started with the Death of the Age of Wonders, Institutions, not Named, deciding the course of Nations and Peoples.

Oh.

I disagree that stories are so easily made irrelevant (Cat regained freedom of maneuver, not quit the game entirely), but THIS. This is absolutely correct, thank you for putting it in words!

This is what's happening.

medailyfun

Stories do affect Nameless, and Nameless do weave the stories affecting others, it's obvious even in this chapter with her sole stand before the enemy's army. Actually, stories affect people even in real life.

Jonnnney

Hakram has a hand it's just made up of bones, magic, and lies

Fayhem

I don't think the nature of the Woe changing is an accident, or inherently a bad thing. Remember, Catherine is the heart/core of the Woe and it makes sense that consciously or unconsciously they'd reflect her to some extent. That includes reflecting her priorities, I think. And Catherine's whole thing starting from going into the Everdark and very definitely at the end of that sojourn is all about changing the definition of victory until it matches the results she wants it to produce.

Catherine used to solve problems by smashing them into pieces, and tbf that was pretty badass because she was real damn good at it. But what she's found as she's assumed more and more political power is that when you solve a problem by smashing into pieces now what you have is a lot of little problems instead of no problem, and those little problems will all grow back into big problems if you don't go around taking care of them for real. She's at the top of the food chain now and there's nobody to come along behind her and clean up the mess on her behalf; she has to do that herself now, and she's found that it drains time and energy and resources to the extent that it's an obstacle to actually moving forward the way she sees she needs to and Callow needs to.

The Woe used to be oriented into combat strength with Thief providing tactical yoink-based shenanigans. But now that's not what Catherine values most, and almost all the changes in the Woe reflect that. Hakram sawed off his other hand specifically to fix a political problem. Vivienne's name dissipated because it no longer reflects who she is; she's the Lady-Regent now (or she was; it sounds like she's about to get a harsh job interview to get that trust back). Archer has had her faith in the magical power of being the most violent to solve all problems and overcome all obstacles significantly shaken. Cat herself ditched her Winter-powered smashiness for an army, a divine alliance, and what is probably a more diverse powerset (though we haven't seen her show it off really, so that's still speculation for the moment). The only one who doesn't currently fit this mold to at least some extent is Masego, but he's also been off-camera ever since the Great Thalassina Clusterfuck so I want to get eyes on him before reaching any strong conclusions about where he's ultimately going to land.

The Woe is in some respects in a bad way, but I think that it's honestly mostly Masego where it is a straight-up negative (so far as we can currently see). In several cases I think the changes in them do make them weaker in a straight-up combat scenario perhaps (though I'm skeptical that Archer is actually any weaker in a fight just because she's seen that some things you can't fight your way out of and it shook her), but I think that's a reflection of the changes in Catherine's priority structure.

In other words, I don't see them as being less capable of victory so much as reconfiguring to better match Catherine's changing definition of the term.

daegone823

I agree with how Cat has changed her priorities but another problem that she has admitted is that she will never be able to play the game like the first prince, Malicia, or even the Tyrant.

She is not playing to her strengths and she is cannot find anyone to uphold the structure that she put in place.

She lost the one thing that she had going for her, power/fear. She did not stop the charge based on political power but the old wounds that she carved in her enemies.

That staff also seems like a big bazooka with one bullet. I just question the shift. The calamities proved that military might can in fact effect change if held for long periods. Maybe Cat just did not try hard enough to break her enemies. Half-measures and all.

Liliet

I think Cat's showing that she's actually better at playing the game than those three, or at least as good as. She can't intrigue like Malicia, but she doesn't need to if she shuts down intrigue bullshit at the core. She can't spy war like Malicia, but she doesn't need to if she attracts people to her side who can. She can alliance-weave not worse than Cordelia. And she can out-bullshit Kairos.

She can't play by the rules they set as well as they do, but getting to set the rules is part of the game. Cat wins when she sets the rules, and lately, she's been showing that she damn well CAN out-set-the-rules them.

Part of this is narrative mastery: Cat's better at story-weaving than Malicia, who missed the obvious WMD failure point, and than Cordelia who barely knows what the art is. She's about equal to Kairos, or slightly worse, I'll concede that much.

Part of this is actually working for the common good: like Cordelia, and unlike Malicia, Cat attracts the kind of ally who looks at long-term and sees good things for themselves and everyone there.

Part of this is incidental positioning: as Vivienne has put it, Cat is "a part of something greater than herself". She's the crest of the wave, and there's no coincidence in her being backed by Juniper, the best tactician of their generation, AND the return of Callowan knights, AND the strongest Named mage around (though he's currently MIA).

All of this lends Catherine an advantage she just needs to not squander. If she can saddle the tiger and hold on to the reins, she wins.

Fayhem

"The calamities proved that military might can in fact effect change if held for long periods."

I'd disagree. Black didn't change Callow by conquering it, he changed it by ruling it. Cat's shift in priorities is based on recognizing the difference.

As far as Cat's "grand strategy" goes, we haven't seen too much of the specifics of that yet but I personally do not think it's based on trying to play the same game as Malicia, Cordelia, or Kairos. I think she intends to play to her real strength; the thing that's Cat's true comparative advantage isn't being stronger than her opponents, because in actual fact she almost never has been. Akua was able to take her one-on-one when they finally went all-out at Second Liesse, the upper echelons of the Fae Courts (i.e. Prince/Princess and up) outmatched her even after she murdered the Duke of Violent Squalls for his power, Saint "beat her like a rented mule" by Cat's own description at the Battle of the Camps, Neshamah's beefier Revenants smacked her/the Woe as a whole around, and she didn't get very far into the Everdark at all before figuring out that the tougher Mighty were more than match for her as well.

So what's Cat's real strength then, since even as the Sovereign of Moonless Nights she still found herself getting smacked around by a majority of her foes? Her real strength is her ability to change the rules of the game, flip the script on her opposition, and win by playing a different game than everyone else. See: literally pretty much every time Cat has actually won overall on a strategic level. And ditching her Fae title for renewed mortality has improved her capacities in that regard. What's the one thing absolutely everybody identified as a cost of her Fae power? Inflexibility. Go look at the epilogue to Book IV again; in the POV from the dwarven deed-seeker, he specifically comments that Cat no longer feels like she has the overwhelming metaphysical weight she had when he met her as Sovereign of Winter, but she somehow feels more dangerous to him. That wasn't him making a mistake. That was his danger-honed perceptiveness picking up on the fact that Cat just massively improved in the thing that really makes her dangerous: superior mental flexibility that lets her change the rules on people faster than they can keep up. Cat isn't less able to win because she's ditched raw power for flexibility. She's more able, because she's embracing what was always her real greatest strength.

Fayhem

Also, Cat definitely tried to break her enemies. She wasn't holding back against Saint or anyone like that, she just got whapped because as strong as she was when you're fighting old monsters with decades or centuries or millennia (hi, Neshamah) of experience and power-building on you then you're gonna have a bad time. The only thing she held back on was stuff like Bonfire that would have seen the continent converging on her like they did on Triumphant because Cat had enough insight to see that as much as she was being targeted now there was still room for it to get a lot worse. Shifting away from that approach (partially, she's still Cat so there's def still some smashing in the future) to focus on changing the rules of the game so that her opponent's greater strength won't matter is exactly the right response.

Liliet

I agree.

mavant

This was a pointless violation of a perfectly sensible security protocol. Not practical at all.

IDKWhoitis

Through the view point of Power Dynamics, this was very practical, everyone needed a stern reminder who is in charge. If she agreed, she would effectively be confirming that Juniper's and Viv's Orders are highest on the totem pole, and that Cat herself can't/shouldn't be trusted.

She had to give everyone a well deserved pimp slap to remind them who's "The Boss".

caoimhinh

Not really.

They acted like they were supposed to, they didn't make a grasp for power, they simply did their job, which was to make Callow function despite Cat's absence. And the examination protocol is a sensible thing to do, just like examining people who have been around a Demon of Corruption. Besides, Cat was already forewarned about it by Robber so she wouldn't be surprised about the examination, she simply lost her temper at the welcome and joined it to blaming Juniper and Vivienne for all the things that have happened DESPITE already knowing they aren't to blame, Hakram already explained to her the situation and what led them to this, it would have worked fine if not for the unforeseeable change in the Fae gates (that for some reason work when Cat uses them but doesn't when Larat and Wild Hunt do). She even threatened Juniper with losing her rank and humiliated Vivienne in front of the entire officers by harshly taking the Regency position from her.

It is unfair to take her rage at the situation and lash out to Juniper and Vivienne, two of her closest friends who have been desperately doing the best they could.

This tantrum that Cat is throwing now is out of character for her, ungrateful and impractical; not to mention how foolish it is to strip two of her foremost officers from the positions at the eve of a battle when they are surrounded by enemies.

Valkyria

Even so. Cat said that it was a reasonable thing to do herself, what she was angry about was that they did not even come to greet her themselves. I mean, if she really wasn't Cat anymore, a few mages and legionnaires wouldn't be able to hold her off anyways, should she try to harm Juniper and or Vivienne.

She's furious that they sent just "someone" to fetch her like a lowly soldier. She's the queen and even if she's under suspicion should not be treated like that in front of her army, especially if the persons of rank who ordered the entire thing are not even themselves at the scene.

What I think is happening is that Cat's simply getting the impression that they are not simply checking if she was herself, (since she just stopped the enemy singlehandedly that should've been some kind of clue) but making her wait until they are done with their stuff and give her time for an audience.

And as you said they are her closest friends, yet not come to greet her personally.

Sure she's lost her temper. But she just is the f Queen of Callow and that behavior is just the last drop that was missing to make it all spill out.

caoimhinh

Imagine that the President of a Country is about to enter a meeting with congressmen, but information was passed that the President has a bomb on him and his escorts are traitors who are threatening him to do it. So security intercepts them. Should the congressmen be in the vicinity when the President and his escort are examined? Of course not.

Now, in Cat's case, they weren't there because they needed someone who could take the cold decision if it needed to be, hence why they sent Hune.

They suspect that she might be under influence or control of something else or it might be something else disguising as Cat, so it might not be that she had the full extension of her power; that's why the 15 mages ready to form wards and test her are there. Besides, in case of it really being Cat but mind controlled there were still the Fae Oaths she took with Vivienne, though those are useless if it's not Winter Cat and in that case then it's not the full power of Winter what the mages would have to contain. They don't come to her by force because there's the possibility that it's really her, so she should just pass the test and be cleared of suspicions. She might be the fucking Queen but if there's the possibility of her being compromised then they should take measures, same as her being tested if she had come back from fighting a Demon of Corruption, and she knows that.

Then she proceeded to strip Viv from her position and threaten Juniper with the same, then chastised them and blamed them for the whole mess when she knows that they are not at fault, even in her thoughts she called them foolish. Her anger is undeserved and it's ridiculous to blame them after Hakram already explained the situation to her.

Liliet

Stripping Vivi of her position is actually perfectly reasonable, even though it sounded like something else in context. Regent is only needed while the Queen is away; under any other circumstances Vivi would be dropping that seal in Cat's lap at the speed of sound.

And you do have to consider how it looks. President's power in the modern US doesn't rest entirely on impressions made on people present. Politics matter, and in this case, politics are what's keeping Cat's armies together. Don't forget she's commanding an explosive hodgepodge of Callowans and Praesi, with priests and goblins mingling with knights and orcs. She's the nail everything hangs on, and they can't afford her position weakening.

Juniper and Vivi likely just failed to take it into account between everything else Happening All At Once, but making a show of chastising them for it is an entirely reasonable response to the situation.

caoimhinh

Transition is not supposed to be a yell in front of the officers saying "put the seal on the table", the release of the position is either a ceremony or a private affair, much smoother than the humiliation that happened in this chapter.

This wasn't "the Queen is back, so the regency ends" it was "you are fired, get out of here" which is entirely ungrateful for all the effort that Vivienne has invested in keeping Callow together for a whole year. It only looked bad because Cat made it so by conflicting with the soldiers and mages sent to test her. Othersiwe it would have been simply "they are seeing if it's really her" and most of the legionaries didn't even know what was happening. Letting them test her for a few minutes to assure them it was really her would have been no problem and not weaken her authority. It was merely to make sure that the person to whom they are about to give full command and authority over everything is actually who she is supposed to be, there's nothing wrong with that.

From our perspective, we know that neither Viv nor Juniper betrayed Cat, Cat knows that too; most of the legionaries didn't know what the security protocol was about, and Cat was already forewarned about it so she could calmly go through it. The suggestion that "it would look bad and weaken her authority if she obeyed orders from others" that some readers are defending is not applicable because this wasn't an order, it was a security measure.

Now, you said that it is all kept together by Cat, that's not exactly the case anymore. Cat made efforts to make it so Callow would stand even if she was killed, even before leaving everything in the hands of Hakram, Juniper and Vivienne (plus the rest of state officials). Going through with the test to prove it's really her who came is not weakening her position, all she has done now is hurting the reputation and position of Juniper and Vivienne, because now from an outside perspective like the rest of the soldiers, it looks like they were either traitorous or incompetent. We know they are neither. But Cat will still need to rely on them, so this tantrum and pointless show of strength did more damage that their security protocol.

To add insult to injury, she is blaming them for the entire messy situation when she already knows it's not their fault, Hakram already explained the circumstances and story-wise from the moment she went missing for a year the Narrative started to move to put them in distress because she had to return in their hour of need. Just like the Grey Pilgrim had said she would when she fell unconscious during the Battle of the Camps, despite that kind of story not being one for Villains. She can't take her angry on them, it's unfair and thoroughly ungrateful after all the messes they had to clean and handle during her absence.

Liliet

No, the situation was already messy. The chilly reception sent the message to the soldiers seeing it happen that their high command did not trust their Black Queen / expected them to disobey her orders should she give any to the contrary. Cat forced the issue for good reason.

The check was a methodological disaster. The Cat who's returning is not the same Cat who left and they'd detect that. If Cat returning was the same Cat who left but taken over by principle alienation, I'm not sure how they would have been able to tell. And if the mages cried foul, how would the soldiers have reacted, not knowing whether it was Real Cat or Fake Cat in front of them? The command of the army needed to be there to handle the situation REGARDLESS of whether it was Real Cat or Fake Cat. If it was Fake Cat, they'd notice it much easier because of knowing her personally and would make immediate decisions to mitigate whatever the situation with that was. If it was Real Cat, they needed to reaffirm the chain of command and again confirm in everyone's eyes that it was in fact her.

And their private hand-wringing of "Cat you can't leave this to me I can't do it)=" is not something Cat can allow to influence their public image. She has a duty to her people above her duty to her friends. She has to show that no, fucking up on this scale is not something she expects and tolerates in people she left in charge. PUBLICLY. And they forced her hand by making the most immediate political fuckup – the reception – public.

And it was a political fuckup. Oh, I don't think Cat seriously thinks they were going for a coup, but that's what it looks like from the side. Again, forcing the situation makes it clear that it wasn't a coup but a fuckup, and the queen is treating it as such. Something's wrong: HERE's what's wrong.

WRT the narrative fuckup, they made a major one irrespective of Catherine's role. They took the ENTIRE ARMY over for a show of force that they couldn't actually back up, because the portals weren't narratively earned by them, they were Catherine's. Their entire idea of a demonstration for Cordy was hubris, and hubris gets punished. Something was going to go wrong, if not the Winter/Night merger, then something else. Larat could have gotten killed by a hero, and they'd then be just as stranded.

Mental Mouse

Here's the thing: Two of the big selling points for American-style democracy are exactly 1) that even the top dogs face limits to their power, and 2) that even the top dogs can be replaced* on short notice. There are tradeoffs for those features, but they're part of the bargain made when the country was formed.

But Cat isn't a President, and her world is not ours. In her world, power inheres more in people than in institutions, and Cat is inherently one of the most powerful people on the continent. In her last instar, she chose to make arrangements in case of being possessed or suchlike. Clearly, she didn't make such arrangements this time... and it was not Viv's place to take the initiative on that. Let alone the presumptuousness of sending out a bunch of underlings to test her before allowing her into the presence of the generals. And then there's the mess they got her armies into while she was gone – Hakram should be sheepish, they got played for chumps.

* The question of how well they can be replaced is another story; e.g., Lincoln's and Kennedy's deaths both left the country in the hands of much weaker and less visionary leaders, leading to deep trouble in the long run.

caoimhinh

Yes, but even if Cat didn't set those security measures, she already set a precedent with the Winter Oaths she took with Vivienne; so Juniper and Viv sending mages to test if the person who just arrived and looks like Cat is actually the person to whom they are supposed to give full authority and control of the army and kingdom is actually a sensible thing to do. Of course the way it was carried could have been better, but that doesn't justify her response. Unceremoniously stripping Viv of the position of Regent and threatening Juniper with losing the Marshall position are humiliations they didn't deserve, they have been through a bunch of messy situations during the year, and this is how she thanks them? It's extremely ungrateful, to say the least.

The entire mess they are in right now, was out of their control.

Narratively it's the story of Cat returning in the hour of dire need to save her companions, while in a practical sense it all went wrong because the Fae Gates were hacked by some eldritch power while they were in the middle of the rescue operation in Iserre.

This is not their fault, forces out of their control and understanding have made it so they were in this mess, and Cat knows that, so she shouldn't be chastising them, humiliating them in front of other officers nor taking their positions from them. Not after all they had to go through for her and for doing their fucking job on making sure the person they delivered command was actually the one it was supposed to be.

boballab

Yes it is their fault. Cat has over and over told them what her goal was: The Liesse accords. She also had stated to them the reason she needed to go to the Everdark was they needed allies especially since they all needed to come together and fight the Dead King. Now explain how breaking the truce with Procer, then invading it somehow magically helps meet Cat's goals and instructions. As soon as Viv got total control she ignored Cat's instructions and did as she wanted and Juniper went along with it because she thought she would get shiny new Legion of Terror soldiers to play with.

caoimhinh

They were rescuing Black's Legions while getting the approval and official permission from Prince Amadis to cross Iserre unimpeded, so politically they were fine, the Army of Callow hasn't broken the truce with Procer nor invaded it.

Vivienne didn't do what she wanted and Juniper didn't take the new recruits to play, they mounted a rescue operation with a solid strategy, a valid political excuse, and with clear benefits of gaining new and powerful allies, all the while knowing that mounting the operation was something the Catherine would have done. The plan was effective until the Fae Gates were hacked by an unknown power while they were in the middle of Iserre and that's what led to the current mess. That was unforeseeable, and even after happening is still unexplainable, so they can't be blamed by it.

Not to mention that due to 'the Force of the Story' they were condemned to be in a dire situation before Cat returns, this was even foreshadowed by the Grey Pilgrim during the Battle of the Camps.

Ali Khan

If you think cat doing what people expect her to do and meekly agreeing to things like this is in character then you've been reading a different story to me. Look at it from the outside, it straight up looks like a coup d'etat, to the point that if cat were to just submit it'd look even less like she's in charge. The point of her anger is that she told them to stay put and they didn't, plus they took their entire army, plus on top of all that they didn't even have the courtesy to come out and greet her along with the mages.

Your point is that if the fairy gates were still working then they'd made a rational decision. IF. The entire story has hammered into us over and over again to not rely on magic tricks over solid army tactics with multiple redundancies. It was a stupid decision to have their plan hinge on this single point of failure.

It is absolutely in character for cat to be annoyed after all the incompetence she's seeing.

caoimhinh

Cat has many times made Masego analyze her over and over to understand how her body works, to check the influence of Winter in her, and even perform checks on soldiers after encounters with Demons, she also took Oaths with Vivienne (giving her ways to stop her and even kill her) as contingencies to make sure her friends, the army and Callow would be safe if other influences took over her body (that was what saved them when Akua possessed Cat). So Cat knows the value of such protocols and constantly implements them, both on others and on herself.

This isn't about her being meek or accepting orders from others, she already knew about the security protocols (Robber told her), and she knows the precaution is valid, yet she got angry at them for it and didn't accept it, then proceeded to humiliate Juniper and Vivienne in front of the rest of the officers, and what's worse she blames them for the entire situation despite knowing that there are many forces involved and they took a decision with solid army tactics, but an unforeseeable thing happened. THAT is what is out of character.

If Cat's anger had gradually risen after passing the tests or if Juniper and Vivienne had slighted her in some way when making decisions later on (like when planning the next battle) then it would make sense and could be seen as them pushing her out of the control of Callow (although it is her fault, and even was her objective before, that things needed to be made into a way that Callow could function without Cat); but her immediate angry response and the proceeding humiliation of the two top members of her Army while blaming them for something she knows it's not their fault, THAT doesn't make sense.

Morgenstern

*ahem

If she WERE Winter possessing Cat... how the heck would a few dozen mages stop her?
Viv would have been the ONLY ONE with any real chance. Viv not being there in person violates the whole protocol – SHE is the one who has the OATH. Not those mages... I don't see how Cat should not get angry at that failure. It's more than just the personal one. It's a logical failure for the security protocol itself.

RanVor

Wards.

lennymaster

One, Mgis tricks and trinkets always, ALWAYS fail the villain at the worst possible time. The Gates just suddenly not working HAD to be expected, maybe not from Juniper, but definitely from Vivienne, a (former?) Named. Two, she is a MONARCH, and intends to leave some kind of monarchy in place, which means that the MONARCH may not be publicly slighted without consequences.

Three, not even having ONE of the two show up to greet her smacks of rebellion, rebellion in front of the soldiers. Monarchies do not survive letting shit like that go.

Four, sending the ENTIRE army was a stupid fucking move. Why?! To threaten Cordelia as Adjutant said? To what end when she is already busy holding of the Dead King?

Sending something was necessary, risking the entire army was stupid.

No, Viv has been getting to comfortable making decisions in Cats name.

What she did was show the top dogs that THEY are replaceable.

konstantinvoncarstein

I totally agree with each of your points 😊

caoimhinh

I partially agree, but you have to consider other things.

1. The Fae Gates had never failed before, and they were the only way to get in and out of Iserre fast enough to mount this entire rescue operation. Not only it was a valid option, it was THE ONLY option if they wanted to get there in time and be able to evacuate. The reason the Gates are hacked is still unknown and was completely unforeseeable. You say that Narratively they should have expected it, but not only this had never happened before and the scope of it was out of their knowledge, it was also the only available mean to their objective, it was a solid decision. Besides, the only one with a true knack for Story-Fu is Catherine, nobody else in the Woe has that talent.

2. The Monarch wasn't slighted, she was supposed to be tested to make sure it was actually the Queen before handling her the control of the army. The only reason this looked bad was because Cat made it so, she could have cleared any analysis in minutes without a problem (although they would probably be surprised at her lack of Winter).

3. I agree that they not being present and carrying the test out in public was not the best way to do it, but it was still a sensible security measure. They sent someone who would carry on the tests without letting sentiments take the best of her (Hune who was not Cat's friend). Also, most of the soldiers didn't even know about the security protocol, this would have gone without an issue if Cat had gone along with it. NOW, after Cat angrily reacted, unceremoniously stripped Viv of her charge and threatened to do the same to Juniper without saying 'hello' or 'thank you for your hard work', NOW it looks like they tried to pull a Coup but were humiliated by the Queen

4. Hakram already explained why they did it and Cat agreed that it was a valid point. They needed to show strength, needed to rescue Black's Legions, needed to carry supplies for all of them, needed to be able to deal with any unforeseen circumstances that presented in Iserre. If they had sent fewer soldiers that they did, they would all be dead. They are alive right now because they sent enough soldiers for it. So it was the right decision all along.

Vivienne hasn't done whatever she liked, she has done exactly what Cat sent her to do, same as Juniper and Hakram: Making Callow work without Catherine.

Cat reappearing during their time of need was Narratively enforced, but her coming to them angrily for doing a sensible identity check, and the first thing she says to them is that she is about to dishonorably discharge them from their positions and blames them for the whole mess? That's extremely ungrateful after the harsh year they had spent keeping Callow afloat in her absence. Not to mention how out of character it is for her to blame her companions for being at a disadvantage and things being against them, since that has always been the case for her and them.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said. When I read the chapter I almost came here to say that Cat was being way too harsh IMO. Then I read the arguments on the other side of this debate and I think there are some valid points on that side as well. You've explained my view much better than I would have.

Liliet

The monarch was slighted because of Juniper and Vivienne not coming out to greet her in person. It's a bold assumption both that (1) real Cat would tolerate that (she's not supposed to, in the eyes of her people) and (2) fake Cat would submit meekly in their absence (that one's straight out stupid).

Mental Mouse

Regarding the gates, note that from Viv and Juniper's point of view, the gates were strictly "borrowed magic", which is exactly the stuff you'd expect to fail. When Cat was making Winter gates, it was her own power. When Viv and Juniper asked Cat's minion to do so, in her absence, they were trusting in the power (also competence and goodwill) of an elf... who they don't actually have direct control over. That's would probably be foolhardy for a Hero, let alone a couple of Nameless villains.

Liliet

t h i s

Liliet

(not elf tho, fae)

mavant

But that defeats the point of having the security protocol in the first place!

werafdsaew

Security protocol or not, she's still their Queen, and so the top generals all needs to come out and greet her alongside the mages, even if it increases their personal risks.

caoimhinh

Well, yeah. I agree that they should have done the test in private, not immediately. But it's also a sensible thing to do if it could turn out that it was someone else disguising as Cat or that Cat was under external influence. If afterwards it turned out that the person who arrived wasn't Cat, how would they explain it to others without it looking like a Coup? Better do it right away and clear suspicions.

Juniper has always the careful type of person, and Vivienne has witnessed both Assassin's shapeshifting abilities and Akua's possession of Catherine in the past (setting a precedent that Cat can be possessed), they had valid reasons to be careful, and that's without them knowing just how powerful the Night and Sve Noc truly are, if they knew the true extension of that power they would be paranoid. From an outsider's POV Cat being constantly carrying the twin goddesses with her might look to anyone like possession.

matrixm

Agreed

This was frustratingly stupid at the beginning and unjust at the end.

An idea just came to me, perhaps she's being influenced by Stories again, like when she shouted at Black way back at the beginning.

Because otherwise it just looks like erratica fucked up bad or intentionally had Cat fuck up bad.

lennymaster

Unjust? They fucked up! She told them to stay put, not risk her ENTIRE army on what was basicly a political move, to bloody green troops and threaten Cordelia when she is already busy with the Dead King: "Today, I found you engaged in a pitched battle with a Grand Alliance army – that is, a force that should be three months to the north preventing the fucking Dead King from rolling over Procer."

Sending something was just reasonable, but if they considered the portals to be reliable, then a few thousand scouts with some fey to quickly find and pull out Grems army would have been enough. Sending everything forced Cordelia to reroute entire armies from the north and put all of Callows striking power at risk.

You could have just waited for erratic to explain all this in the next few chapters or spend a few minutes to think things through.

lennymaster

*striking not stricking

boballab

If Cat had been possessed what they did would have gotten those 40 troops including the 15 mages killed plus however many others and wouldn't have stopped her. The only one that could have prevented it was Viv as it was explained way back when they talked about the protocol. You don't trick a possessed being that when she left had the power of a demi god by sending 15 mages with an armed troop to drag her in front of the Regent, That isn't a trap that is an arrest and coup attempt. No to trick her you come out and meet her yourself, invite her into the command tent and as walking along use the command phrase. IF she was possessed she is now contained and powerless, If she is not Cat says good job Viv for doing your duty and checking away from the mortal army that is powerless to stop a possessed Demi God.

RanVor

Excuse me, it took one mage of mediocre talent to contain full Winter Cat in Keter, why would fifteen of them be not enough?

thearpox23

1: The mages with Malicia were top mages, if unnamed. Probably better than what Callow has.

2: She had a contingent of them, which was why the containment worked. If you remember, the moment some of them were killed they were no longer able to maintain the wards around her and had to switch to protection Malicia and themselves instead.

3: Cat was notably under-powered as a Winter god due to wielding her power like a sledgehammer. Expecting someone possessing her to be stopped by something like that is exactly the kind of optimism that makes one unfit for command.

Gunslinger

Those contingencies were for Winter Cat. She doesn't need them anymore. Also to have done that right after getting your ass saved can irritate anyone

RanVor

That's absolutely irrelevant. The test was necessary from the point of view of Vivienne and Juniper and Catherine should have known it and refrained from acting like a spoiled child for a few minutes.

IDKWhoitis

I think Cat entering in with the subtly of a battering ram is proof enough that she is Cat. Going meekly into chains would if anything add more doubt.

Also, if it was Cat or Not-Cat, sending 40 mortal soldiers to stop her would only add to a brutal body count that would resume if she really forced it. Everyone with a heartbeat in the Camp is lucky she browbeat them into submission.

boballab

Exactly. All those complaining that Cat screwed up need to go back and reread the entire arc from the time she left for the Everdark up until she losses the battle to the Tomb Maker and Sve Noc. Cat had the entire power of the Winter Court at her disposal, IOW she had the power of the Winter King at his greatest strength and he is considered something between a God and a Demi God. In that battle against Sve Noc she could have won if she let herself become that Goddess because Sve Noc wasn't a Goddess yet. That was the trap that the Gods below set, one way or another a new Goddess was going to come out of there whether it was Winter that had eaten the Night or as we seen Night eating Winter, The trick was on Akuas part that allowed Cat to survive, because the Dark Gods wanted either her or Sve Noc to die at the point the other wins. If Cat had let herself go and pulled on enough Winter to win and become what had been hinted at what she could, that Cat would have killed those Mages and troops for their presumption they could have contained her and from there killed everyone else in that camp including Juniper and Viv before they could have done anything. Even if it was just Akua possessing her do you think Akua would have gone along with that or would she have blasted the entire Army and Viv before she could use the Oath, gone back and told Hakram that Viv rebelled and tried to arrest her after saving them. What is Hakram going to believe at that point? Remember he had to cut his own hand off to stop a completely irrational Viv from starting a Civil War after losing her Name, so he could believe she went off the deep end again at the loss of the regency because it would fit a pattern.

Cthulhu

This is bullshit.

20 minutes earlier Juniper and Viv were fighting a losing battle. They are tired, stressed, and fearful of a magic trick to finish them off – be it named or a choir or god knows what else.

In flies what appears to be their leader, with different magic (Night v Winter). She stops a cavalry charge and then rides up to camp and demands homage.

And now she's mad that Viv and Juniper did not immediately rush out and salute? That they sent what wizards they had to try to understand what the hell just happened?

Sure, take control—but firing people because things didn't go great is stupid and wasteful. This isn't sensible. It's piss poor leadership. It's Akula.

Wanted to have everything go great? Maybe stay fucking in your kingdom and fucking run it. Wanted everyone to follow directions? Maybe leave better instruction.

We hope this improves: right now she seems pissy and petty.

boballab

Horseshit, complete and utter horseshit. She didn't ride up demanding homage, she rode up and expected Juniper and Viv to be there to tell her what is going on but instead gets greeted with an arrest party. Like I said you need to go back and reread that entire arc.

Cthulhu

Read it. Look at the timing. She literally rode from where the calvary was charging – no more than a few hundred yards from the front lines – where a hastily assembled party was waiting for her. In the time it took her to ride from the stopped calvary to her lines, they put together a greeting party to find out what the hell just happened and why the enemy retreated.

So, literally, 10 minutes after a battle, she wants a full report of all her senior commanders? Because she's queen? She wants them meeting her and saluting and is angry they send an Ogre General because it doesn't show enough respect? Imagine this from Juniper's perspective, just for a moment:

"General!," shouted the Lieutenant. "The plan to tie up the enemy has failed – our tunnels collapsed early."

"How bad is it?" Juniper asked. "Send reinforcements to the north wing and tell them to lay down cover fire; sound all horns to call the wings back to the center." We'll hold them here, she thought. After disaster came...more disaster. One of the goblins in the makeshift tower shouted, "Oh shit, General! We've got more than 5,000 cavalry advancing towards our open belly."

Vivan turned to Juniper. There was little she could do other than say "Pull them back. We've got to save what we can." Aiiiiigh! Shouted a dying Callowan infantry soldier. Juniper watched as his friend tried to help him.

"Uh, General," said the Goblin, "I don't know how to tell you this, but a flying hose just landed in the middle of the charge. The cavalry stopped.":

"What?"

"They are sounding retreat. All enemy forces dropping back. Single rider approaching."

Vivian stared. "Is that her?" Juniper looked around. "I sure hope so. otherwise, we are royally fucked."

Vivian swallowed. "What if its...not?"

"What do you mean?" asked Juniper.

"We put together methods to verify if that really is her."

Juniper nodded. "Good point." To a goblin she said, "Get me a line of mages and an escort of 20"

"Better make it 40"

"Fuck it, get me a line of mages, 5 ogres, and a full company of regulars and escort her to us after the mages take their first stab at making sure she's not some kind of trick. Gods below."

And now Cat lands, rides up, the living embodiment of Night, and says, "Fuck you all, you've done a shit job of this, and why aren't you immediately saluting?"

Dude, that is lame-ass shit from Cat. Give them a chance to figure out that they aren't all going to die right away.

stevenneiman

She demanded an explanation for Juniper deciding that it was worthwhile to risk exactly what just happened and what could have happened for the sake of a few legions which aren't even loyal to the same side. And they publicly make an effort to check if she's real, which could lead to paranoia and weaken morale right when the troops need something to reassure them most. They could have done the check in private, though the chances of it actually finding anything if someone was willing to go to the effort to impersonate her are questionable.

Also note how unlike Juniper and Vivienne, she did this in private. That means that she has a chance to spin whatever the results of this conversation, where the two options if Cat had submitted to their magical check are that either the soldiers have their hopes crushed or even their loyalties confused if Cat was an impostor or else there's a suspicion that the next time she leaves something else might come back, which would make the soldiers paranoid about things they can't really deal with. If they'd had the check in private it would have been much harder for Cat to believably refuse, and unless they had to actually kill her they could sweep the whole thing under the rug and not scare the rank and file.

Mental Mouse

Yes, this. Note that the essentialists here in the comments are pretty much claiming that "something else" did come back. Which in some ways is true... but what came back: 1) still answers to both "Cat" and "Black Queen", 2) still is fighting for them, or at least rescuing them from enemy armies, and 3) still has enough personal presence to intimidate an ogre general face-to-face. Not to mention that 4) she is literally acting like a boss, specifically their boss, and a better boss ("praise in public, criticize in private") than lots of mooks get.

Trying to test her bona fides after she just saved their asses, was "looking a gift horse in the mouth" big-time.

Sugar Roll

And then after showing them who's boss, Catherine will be like, "Now that we got that out of the way, let me tell you about my new best friend, Akua."

Hardric62

Quick answer, Cat? You're working on the very wrong assumption everyone taking decisions have brains and logic has a voice to the chapter.

The reality? The Saint of Bitches is trying its damnest to make the mess as bloody and total as possible to create a "'worthy'" nation out of Procer's ashes, most of the Princes would eat ignited goblin munitions rather than stop intriguing, even or rather especially while their homes are burning, the latter are probably used by the former as a club to tie Cordelia's hands, the Grey Hypocrite is looking at it happen without interfering with the Saint of Bitches, the people of Procer have a genuine reason to be angry right now, consequences be damned, and do I even have to talk about the Tyrant and the Hierarch?

Logic has no right to voice any complaints when all these loonies are around. Sorry, but you'll have to prune the stupid out manually. You have to create that Princes' Graveyard somewhere after all.

caoimhinh

Worse still, she is taking out her anger about the situation on two of her closest friends and even blaming them for it, as if she didn't know how many forces were at play. This fit of anger seems out of character to me, and a bit stupid, considering that taking out the head of the chain of command and humiliating them in front of the rest of the top officers is not a wise move when there are enemy armies close and ready.

Hardric62

Yup to that too. They need to remind Cat that circumstances going as planned and everyone taking not even best but reasonable course of action is already an hallucinated pipe-dream for War College newbies.

Then again, I guess intense frustration at this whole mess is a humane thing too, but boundaries will need to be put so they can actually work on getting things somehow back on rails.

Dresden 67

Yes, circumstances change and things rarely go as planned, especially when heroes are involved.

Which is why you don't bring your entire army into enemy territory with no way to resupply or retreat except for a magical method that is highly vulnerable to heroic intervention.

And you certainly don't split your army into four smaller units that are wide open to defeat in detail.

caoimhinh

Read again the part where Hakram explained what led them to take that decision, it was a valid move. They even took measures so they wouldn't be politically affected.

Besides, if they wanted to rescue Black's Legions then THE ONLY way to do that was the Fae Gates, there was simply no other way to get to them in time.

As for the number of soldiers that were taken, it was that what has allowed them to survive so far. So it was the right decision.

Liliet

The number of soldier taken was what made them a target in the first place. And a lesser number of soldiers being defeated would have been a much lesser disaster than what's happening right now / what would have happened had Cat not arrived in the nick of time.

lennymaster

One, Magic tricks and trinkets always, ALWAYS fail the villian at the worst possible time. The Gates just suddenly not working HAD to be expected, maybe not from Juniper, but definitely from Vivienne, a (former?) Named.

Two, she is a MONARCH, and intends to leave some kind of monarchy in place even if she wants to leave eventually, wich means that the MONARCH may not be publicly slighted without consequences.

Three, not even having ONE of the two show up to greet her smacks of rebellion, rebellion in front of the soldiers.

Monarchies do not survive letting shit like that go.No, Viv has been getting to comfortable making major decisions in Cats name. What she did was show the top dogs that THEY are replaceable.

Four, they fucked up! She told them to stay put, not risk her ENTIRE army on what was basicly a political move, to bloody green troops and threaten Cordelia when she is already busy with the Dead King: "Today, I found you engaged in a pitched battle with a Grand Alliance army – that is, a force that should be three months to the north preventing the fucking Dead King from rolling over Procer."

Sending something was just reasonable, but if they considered the portals to be reliable, then a few thousand scouts with some fey to quickly find and pull out Grems army would have been enough. Sending everything forced Cordelia to reroute entire armies from the north and put all of Callows striking power at risk.

Abstract

This has the shape of a debrief, but changed due to the half-assed coup attempt. Awhile back, cat told Thief that she trusted Hakram without question. Meeting Hakram and learning that he isn't the one giving the orders puts her on her toes. Proper protocol for vetting a superior is to do it out of sight of the common troops, doing it out in the open means there's a decent chance that, whether she's clean or not, she'd be called compromised, and thus ambushed by her own troops. There's no reason why you'd check her in front of `her` soldiers unless it's a coup attempt, or to undermine her authority. I'd put money on her originally planning on just debriefing them, and learning why they're in this mess, and catching up on current events, before this debacle.

Liliet

I don't think Cat seriously expects this to be a coup attempt. The problem is, the reason she doesn't are private, and the attempt obviously looking like one is public. So she has to make a scene about it in public, and if they have any issue with that – in private it is. Later. After the political mess is sorted out.

caoimhinh

Cool chapter; Cat displaying authority and taking control of the camp instantly is good and all, but I think she could have done it in a manner less harsh, without being angry at her closest friends and blaming them for the mess they are in, she already knows that the mess was due to the hacking of the Fae Gates (which seem to work fine for Cat and Sve Noc but apparently not for Larat and the Wild Hunt).

Cat's lash of anger towards Juniper and Vivienne, and their humiliation before the rest of the officers seems odd. Although it will enable her to have a firm command over the entire army for the following battle (however we know this wasn't a calculated move, but Cat genuinely getting angry at them).

Seems it will be one chapter of Cat chastizing them, then another chapter of preparation for the battle when Hakram and the rest of the army join them. So the real battle will be next week. Things will be interesting.

P.S: "Rozala's curves and long curls would be well worth a second look", eh? They should get to know each other better (◡◡ ◡◡)

Typos found:

- what made cavalry charged / charge
- It was beautiful display / it was a beautiful display
- You weren't like at the peace talks / You weren't like that at the peace talks

-you've still keeping Arnaud around / you're

-you filth Damned / filthy

-It would be, I thought, only be sensible / delete one of the
'be'

-I have you an order / I gave you an order

-footsteps told me that had / footsteps told me they had

-she tread forward / she trod forwards

-there will be need a need for gallows / eliminate one of the 'need'

edrey

no, harsh it's not the word, vivi should have expected battle with heroes at the third day and even malicia making another slaughter by the second day, Nauk is dead, thousands of soldiers had died, Juniper is losing the battle, and cat saved her. both were incompetent but instead of welcomed her and apologize, risking their heads and asking for the mages to do their job then. but they didn't, they chose to stay in the tent in safety and send mages to act high and mighty against some who had saved them, someone who fought several heroes, or something stronger and thought they would stop her. it's not just stupid, is insulting. moreover this is not about friends, she is the queen of callow, the mages should have asked in their knees and her words should have been absolute, her order should not be doubted not for a second even if the marshall was killed in front of them. their measures are ridiculous and not realistic. that is just the act of the coward and the fool, regardless if they were right or wrong

caoimhinh

I agree with you that Juniper and Vivienne didn't proceed with this on a good way (I think a more private test would have been far better) but I disagree in them being incompetent. They had done their best, the only reason they are in this harsh situation (even disregarding the fact that almost every other major force is at play there) is that the Fae Gates were hacked, which left them stranded in the middle of Iserre, otherwise they would have left already. If Cat had been on the surface she would have led the expedition herself to rescue Black's Legions (and will probably mount the rescue operation for Amadeus), so they haven't done anything wrong, they have simply been outbested. She should know better than to humiliate them in front of the rest of officers.

Cat, the 15th Legion and the Army of Callow have always fought uphill battles, in harsh conditions and strong enemies, this is just another one of such cases (and Story-wise this is the Narrative of her coming back right at the time of need of her friends and loved ones, just like the Pilgrim expected it would be during the Battle of the Camps). So while Cat might be in her rights to be annoyed at the testing, she can't blame them for doing it nor blame them for the mess they are in, the situation was beyond their control.

edrey

the story have reach certain point now. the price for mistakes is too great and Cat is now the queen of callow, she cant allow this kind of mistakes. all sound good in paper but she knows that is how you get killed

lennymaster

They fucked up and deserve getting ripped a new one. Read my comment above if you want to know why.

caoimhinh

Let me ask you this, as you say Cat should have arrived as an absolute and unquestioned Tyrant disregarding all protocol and nobody should question her nor doubt her identity: what if it had been someone else disguising as Cat or if Cat was possessed by an outside influence?

The only reason this is all good and fine is that this is actually the real Catherine. Otherwise, they have just let an unknown entity enter the camp and take command.

I agree with you that they didn't do it in the best way, but the security protocol is a sensible thing to do.

edrey

if she wasnt Cat they would be all dead, you dont act like that with your savior, your friend, much less your Queen, you dont force orders to a superior in a war, that kind of thing is called high treason for usurping the throne, they should have asked personally, even more after been saved, not send mages and ogres to act high and mighty. And to be real, something that could control Cat, like Sve noc wouldnt be detected by mages much less stop her. or have a reason to save the Army of callow

caoimhinh

They were right to be cautious, there was already precedent of Cat being under possession.

It is not high treason to check if the person claiming to be your Queen is actually her or someone else in disguise.

And yes it would be noticed, even in this chapter Cat was even cautious of using Night to enhance her sense because it could be felt by the Procer's delegation and seen as an attack (and none of them were Named nor mages). Robber has nightmares just for staring at Cat's staff-sword, of course a being possessing Cat or a being disguising as Cat would be detected by the mages actually analyzing her.

Juniper is extremely careful and Vivienne outright paranoid (and has seen Assassin shapeshifting and Akua possessing Cat before) so they took measures, they sent someone whose feelings wouldn't cloud cold judgement, Hune.

Verifying her identity and checking for outside influences is not treason at all.

This situation escalated and now looks bad because Cat made it so. Getting all offended and suddenly acting like a Tyrant, when she has all the time made efforts to NOT act that way. Night might be affecting her a bit and making her personality get prouder and acting high and mighty at the first perceived slight.

edrey

mortal mages would be able to detect sve noc just because cat the mortal without the proper learning speculated that the procerans would be able?, the problem here is not the mages looking if she is controled, is how they acted, hune saying orders with a show of force of several ogres behind her, And yes it is treason, if the mages said she is controlled when she isnt, then what would you thing will happen?. happily. it is a mistake of foolishness and not treason

RanVor

Why are you assuming that possessed Cat would be a moron?

magesbe

She can totally blame them. Cat already ragged on Adjutant (though not that harshly) for bringing an army instead of a small contingent of troops to port out with. The army is in this mess because Juniper and Vivi BROUGHT the army into this mess, and counted on a magical trick to get them out of it (which Cat, if she had been there, could definitely have told them to not rely on). Oh it's not 100% their fault, or even mostly their fault, but they have enough fault to go around.

caoimhinh

Hakram already explained why they did it, and Cat agreed. So there's no reason for her to be angry with them now. They needed to rescue Black's Legions, Cat would have personally gone to rescue them if she had been there. How do you think they could rescue them without using the Fae Gates?

That was THE ONLY WAY to arrive in time and the only way to get out safely.

It's not a whim nor relying on a magic trick, it's a strategy that they have been implementing ever since Cat gained the title of Duchess of Moonless Nights and the Gates had never been hacked before.

matesbe

The closest she got to approval was admitting that it was a solid plan. And to me, it sounded like the kind of admittance that is usually followed by, "but you still fucked up." And she herself proposed that it would have been better to only send a minimum force to pick them up. Now, because of Vivi, Hakram, and Juniper deciding to get greedy (basically trying to take everything), almost the entirety of the Army of Callow is at risk of annihilation.

And sure Gates have always worked. Just like I'm sure the Exiled Prince's magic armor always worked. Until it didn't. Getting to them obviously required Gates, but they shouldn't have put themselves in a position where they were utterly screwed if they couldn't Gate out. If there were only a few of them, they could travel more lightly, and for all that Cat wants to help out Black's forces, she doesn't care so much that she's willing to put the Army of Callow onto the brink of ruin.

caoimhinh

Ok, so we agree that the Gates are the only way to get there in time to rescue Black's Legions, then you must also agree that the only way to get out fast and safely is the very same Gates that let them get there. They didn't rely on this out of whim, but out of necessity, and even then, they took measures to ensure that they could deal with unforeseen circumstances, that's why they brought a large army.

Remember that the only reason that they are being in the mess is due to a combination of many factors, beginning with the hacking of the Gates, summed by the Dominion's troops and finishing with the unforeseeable movements of Helike's armies.

Again, if they had sent a small force they would have been wiped out, sending a huge army was the most sensible option and the one that achieved the most objectives while giving them the most safety in case things went wrong.

Not to mention that Narrative twists causality and enforced them to be in peril by the time Cat returned, but that's out of their control.

Liliet

If they had sent a small force the gates would have likely kept working. Narrative bullshit and hubris.

And even if not, Grem's Legions are not worth the entire army.

RanVor

But Cat would still be pissed if they were left to die. Vivienne and Juniper did what they thought Cat would want them to do.

Liliet

Late to answer this, but: as we now know for a fact, guessing what Cat would have wanted was not a part of their thought process

RanVor

And we know that from...?

Liliet

From Juniper explaining what the reasoning was?

They were trying to make good decisions, not "decisions Cat will like". Important distinction there.

RanVor

Why are you assuming this isn't one and the same?

Agent J

Cat and Sve's Gates are Night-based. Larat's and the Hunt's are not. Different power source, so it could be that whatever's fucking with a former Fae Prince's power isn't powerful enough to fuck with a Goddess's power. Or, hell, maybe Larat's Gates are still Winter-based and Winter is no longer a thing.

Regardless, it's perfectly reasonable to chew these two out for their fuck up. Because, yes, they fucked up. Firstly, they shouldn't rely on magical doohickeys. Secondly, they shouldn't have committed their entire army. Thirdly, they shouldn't be distracting the Grand Alliance from the fucking zombie apocalypse that is raging up north.

Cat left her army on the other side of the Whitecaps. She's understandably miffed that someone misplaced it. Her army has been getting shitted on left, right, and center. Her oldest friend is dead, the Third Army was almost annihilated, the Fourth Army was made a fool of and bloodied viciously, and Juniper was on the verge of her first military defeat (and a savage one at that, had that cavalry struck). At every turn, Catherine had to bail out her army from imminent disaster.

And after all that, Juniper and Vivienne send a line of troops (as if she couldn't slaughter them in under a heartbeat if she truly was compromised) to vet her at the door. Even if there's sound logic to that, and she admits there is, Catherine's patience with this whole debacle is understandably taxed. She's pissed, has every right to be pissed, and is channeling that anger at two very appropriate targets, because again, they fucked up.

caoimhinh

That might be the case, it will be interesting to see how Larat and the rest of the Wild Hunt react to Winter being devoured by Night (Larat might even like it, since he was Prince of Nightfall).

Please remember Hakram's explanation of why they sent the army. They aren't relying on magic tricks for fun, the Fae Gates were the only way to get to Iserre in time to rescue Black's Legions, there was simply no other way to do it. The amount of soldiers that were sent were to: A) secure Black's Legions B) protect the new recruits as they had real campaign experience C) deal with any unforeseen situation.

The only reason they are alive right now is that they sent enough soldiers, otherwise they would all be dead. Again, they really can't be blamed for this whole mess, because it has been one unforeseeable circumstance after the other that has been striking them.

Agent J

Whether or not they feel like they have to rely on the magical doodad is an entirely moot point. William would likely have argued that he's not using an angel feather for a damn sword for fun either. That it was the only way he could feasibly wage war against monsters like the Carrion

Lord and the god damn Sovereign of the Red Skies. But the narrative didn't give half an iota of a fuck about the "necessity" of it. He relied on a magical tool and said magical tool fucked him over at the worst possible time, because that is what they do. It set up a "rightful queen" story for his enemy to exploit and was driven into his damn throat to boot.

Vivi and Co. were stupid for relying on a magical gate as the linchpin to their plan and the fact that they "had to" does nothing to alleviate that.

"-there was simply no other way to do it."

Then perhaps they shouldn't have done it.

"The only reason they are alive right now is that they sent enough soldiers-"

False. The only reason they are alive right now is because Catherine bailed their sorry asses out time and time and time again. From the Levantines. From the Helikeans. From the Procerans/Levantines. Hells, it's barely been a week since the poor girl's been topside and already she's had to stare down three cavalry charges to keep her people safe.

If Cat had not arrived when she did, the Third Army would be annihilated. The Fourth Army would have been too far from both the Third and the First/Second Armies to effectively help out either, all while continuing to hemorrhage soldiers day in and day out. And, as we've just seen, Juniper's Armies would have been badly crippled by a well placed, well timed charge of several thousand mounted killers.

It would have been objectively better to lose a small force sent in to rescue Grem One-Eye than to cripple the entire bloody army doing so.

"Again, they really can't be blamed for this whole mess, because it has been one unforeseeable circumstance after the other that has been striking them."

That... doesn't matter in the slightest. It's war. Their enemies aren't expected to telegraph their every movement for the Army of Callow's convenience. Preparing for unforeseen circumstances is literally their job, especially on a campaign they willingly volunteered for. No one twisted their arms into barging over the Whitecaps. They did that of their own volition.

This line of reasoning makes as much sense as the Procerans complaining that the Invasion of Callow was only a failure because there had been unforeseen circumstances. How were they supposed to know a lake would be dropped on their heads. The answer is it doesn't matter. They launched a war against foes they barely understood, were caught flatfooted when things didn't go according to plan, and then they were savagely bled for it. In short, they fucked up.

Much like Juniper and Vivienne.

RanVor

There were two options, use the gates and save the Legions or not use the gates and not save the Legions. There was no safe choice to be taken. Vivienne and Juniper have done literally everything in their power to stack the odds in their favor. It turned out not to be enough, but they didn't half-ass this. They took the information they had and decided the risk was worth the payoff. You must remember that they're no narrative experts. They were given tools to use and they made the best use of them they could. When Cat ordered Larat to listen to Juniper, she didn't do it with the expectation that the Marshall of Callow won't make use of him. Moreover, Cat would be pissed at them anyway if they just left Grem and his forces to die. They miscalculated, sure, but fits of anger are not an appropriate response to that.

Agent J

They made a choice. It blew up in their face and without Divine Catherinic Intervention it would have cost them a quarter and change of their army at the very least. Shake it however you want, but the decision made was a bad one. Losing the Third Army, bleeding the Fourth, and decimating the First/Second combined forces all for Grem's legions is nothing short of a very costly mistake.

Vivi would have lost more soldiers than she saved. She'd also be losing officers loyal to Callow and her Queen in favour of one's loyal to Black. And if Cat herself were ever asked if she would trade Nauk for Grem, she would not take kindly the insult.

"When Cat ordered Larat to listen to Juniper, she didn't do it with the expectation that the Marshall of Callow won't make use of him."

Make use of him, sure. Use him to launch an invasion of Procer while the Dead King rages up north? No. I highly doubt that was her expectation.

"Moreover, Cat would be pissed at them anyway if they just left Grem and his forces to die."

Would she? Would she really? Since when did it become her job to save old men trying to relive their glory days from the consequences of their actions. When Black was with them, she assumed he had a smart plan. Now that Black isn't with them, the only thing that would drive her to save Grem's legions is politics. Former Legionaries in the Army of Callow would be miffed if she left them to die, but that doesn't mean commit the entire army. That particular bout of stupidity was entirely their own decision, made to bloody the troops and put pressure on the First Prince. Two goals that are not necessary, not worth crippling their army over, and not worth anchoring tens of thousands of Alliance troops three months south of the raging apocalypse.

Anger is the only appropriate response to that.

RanVor

SHE FUCKING CAME TO ISERRE TO PULL THE LEGIONS OUT. OF COURSE SHE WOULD.

Agent J

As opposed to, say, Laure to pick up the entirety of her army (that she believed to still be in Callow at the time)? Almost like she thought sending in a rescue team should not jeopardize her kingdom's entire army. Hells, she didn't even commit the entire army of the Empire Everdark. This is just the Southern Expedition.

caoimhinh

It doesn't matter when assessing victory and defeat, but it DOES matter when assigning fault and blame. Being defeated is not the same as blundering with mistakes; they made preparations and did the best they could, it just turned out to not be enough, that doesn't call for Catherine entering the tent chastising them in front of all the officials and unceremoniously stripping them of their positions as if they were a pair of traitorous incompetents.

Every campaign that Cat, the 15th and the current Army of Callow have fought could have been their last battle, they have ALWAYS been at risk of total collapse if they were defeated in the field, this time is no different. And she has NEVER blamed officials for the losses during campaign, not even once, so it is completely out of character for her to start doing it on two of her closest friends, treating them like idiots and half-rebels, it is just not like her at all.

Yes, they are in a grave situation, but they are not to blame for it, now is not the moment to be blaming officials for circumstances out of their control and the movements of 3 enemy armies around them, now is the moment to sit with them and look for a solution, this entire tantrum is a pointless act of "the slighted monarch" that befits petty Tyrants, not the practical fighter that Catherine has always been.

Agent J

Your first paragraph would hold more weight if this war was one Cat had sent them on. It's not. They took it up themselves, in her name. Catherine has referred to it as a "stupid war" even while commending her fallen soldiers for fighting it bravely anyway. The decision to take up this war factors in as well, and colours the string of embarrassing defeats rather starkly.

"Every campaign that Cat, the 15th and the current Army of Callow have fought could have been their last battle-"

True, but there is another common thread as well, all were absolutely necessary. The Liesse Rebellion had to be put down. The Fae Invasions had to be stopped. Akua's Folly had to be answered. The Proceran Invaders had to be checked. Callow survived all four and is a weakened mess. It would be a shattered mess if just one of these were allowed to come to pass, but most likely, one would have snowballed into the next. Callow literally would not survive such a catastrophe.

Callow can survive the death of Grem.

"And she has NEVER blamed officials for the loses during campaign"

Mostly accurate. She's blamed Hune for... Nauk's injuries I think? I'm not gonna chase down the quote, but it was the catalyst for her finally having a frank talk with her and she agreed, when Juniper chewed her out for it, that she was wrong.

But my need for accuracy aside, she's never gotten this pissed at an official before, because she was always the one giving the orders. If, despite their best efforts, her officers failed to achieve the task she gave them then she would accept it or deal with it as best she can.

Catherine has been gone for nigh on a year. She's had no part in the decision making process. This entire campaign is the child of Vivienne, Hakram, and Juniper. Catherine has her eye on the bigger picture and is furious that her army is bogged down and on the brink of destruction for what is, essentially, a needless, extremely costly, and shortsighted passion project.

"Yes, they are in a grave situation, but they are not to blame for it-"

Yes, they are.

"-this entire tantrum is a pointless act of "the slighted monarch" that befits petty Tyrants-"

I see an exasperated mother harshly disciplining her children after they ran out onto the street in rush hour traffic. A little heat is good if you mean for the lesson to stick.

Nauk already died for this pointless exercise of theirs. How many more loved ones would Cat have lost were she still in the Everdark? How many more soldiers? The body count is already well in the thousands and we've yet to receive the First and Second's casualty reports.

What happened at the gate is salt in the wound, it is not the source of her anger.

benthelynx

Interestingly enough, and differently to most I think, I didn't find Cat rang true here. Not that I don't think she'd be angry but it felt too cold and distant an anger for someone as close as Hellhound and trusted as Dartwick. It's closer to the anger she's shown to those she's been forced to deal with.

Dainpdf

Well, we haven't been with unadulterated Cat for a while. Still, while a fae she stabbed her own father and told him to go away or die.

Mental Mouse

To me that seems less a fae thing than a Villain thing. Certainly Amadeus took it in stride.

Dainpdf

Point was that Cat drawing on a friend or family for crossing her lines is not new.

benthelynx

That's more of a hot rage barely controlled though. It felt different.

Mental Mouse

I'm reading this as tightly controlled fury, but very functional. I doubt she's going to start Night-choking people as examples, but in the context of a screwup on this scale, making her displeasure known is very much "part of the story". Her anger is certainly justified, and it's not just Evil armies that punish their own officers for major mistakes. Much less insubordination!

benthelynx

Oh I'm not arguing that she wouldn't be angry, just that this particular type of anger has so far been reserved for characters that she doesn't respect

Liliet

I read this as Cat realizing she can't let her personal relationships interfere with politics.

She likes Juniper and Vivienne. Personally, she understands their fuckup. Politically, a line has been crossed that she needs to throw a public scene about or suffer a blow to her side's cohesion.

Dainpdf

More than the anger (Cat has always had a temper), I find the pride here interesting. Or at least the notion of her position. Cat cites as the last straw not being received with appropriate deference. Seems like her days of waffling are done.

Mental Mouse

I'd say some pride is warranted. But consider also her welcome from the Third and Fourth Legions: "She's back!". And then Cat comes here, and they're like "yeah, check her out before you show her in".

Dainpdf

Still a good idea to check, and Cat admits it... but she's owed their respect, dammit! And she'll demote her friends if she has to. They did blunder.

Liliet

I think the pride was what prompted Catherine to realize she needed to act on this. A queen is not allowed to swallow humiliations.

Dainpdf

Would she have liked it if they had allowed someone in a Cat suit to walk in unquestioned, though? Important questions.

RanVor

Exactly. Cat understood it before, and she suddenly doesn't now? I call bullshit.

Dainpdf

Maybe. Or maybe she... changed.

RanVor

For worse?

Liliet

Allowed to walk in and then checked in private, yes.

Dainpdf

No fair coming back with spoiler

Liliet

...it was obvious and I've been saying the same thing on discord... but it's nice to be confirmed right yes 🤔

RanVor

Damn. Cat got pissy.

I do not approve of her bullshit here.

lennymaster

One, Magic tricks and trinkets always, ALWAYS fail the villian at the worst possible time. The Gates just suddenly not working HAD to be expected, maybe not from Juniper, but definitely from Vivienne, a (former?) Named.

Two, she is a MONARCH, and intends to leave some kind of monarchy in place even if she wants to leave eventually, wich means that the MONARCH may not be publicly slighted without consequences.

Three, not even having ONE of the two show up to greet her smacks of rebellion, rebellion in front of the soldiers.

Monarchies do not survive letting shit like that go.No, Viv has been getting to comfortable making major decisions in Cats name. What she did was show the top dogs that THEY are replaceable.

Four, they fucked up! She told them to stay put, not risk her ENTIRE army on what was basically a political move, to bloody green troops and threaten Cordelia when she is already busy with the Dead King: "Today, I found you engaged in a pitched battle with a Grand Alliance army – that is, a force that should be three months to the north preventing the fucking Dead King from rolling over Procer."

Sending something was just reasonable, but if they considered the portals to be reliable, then a few thousand scouts with some fey to quickly find and pull out Grems army would have been enough. Sending everything forced Cordelia to reroute entire armies from the north and put all of Callows striking power at risk.

RanVor

I judge it an insufficient reason to barge in, ignore every security protocol in existence and threaten to fire everybody. In my opinion Cat acted like a child with a temper tantrum here, and I don't care if you disagree.

caoimhinh

Exactly, it's not like they were there for fun. They were rescuing Black's Legions and the only way to do that was through the Fae Gates and sending a large army that could deal with any dangers that might arise in Iserre.

That unforeseeable circumstances had led them to this mess is not their fault, and is out of character for Cat to blame them for it, she has NEVER done such a thing before.

RanVor

The greatest irony in all of this is that Cat came to Iserre with the exact same objective.

superkeaton

Cat's cracking the whip. She might call them close friends, but there are Responsibilities to be had and Consequences to consider. And, of course, nobody likes seeing the army they fucking built look at them like they're a threat and dance to the tune of a pair of underlings.

Death Knight

Seriously EE, you end it THERE?!

Fuck I'm getting MOL flashbacks here with the accompanying PTSD

Azure

So we know Winter made Catherine cold and inhuman, but it looks like Night has made her prideful and arrogant. She really doesn't like being challenged or not given her due. How many people has she asked to Kneel so far? That's Sve Noc's influence all over her.

Hakram escaped it because he never challenged Catherine. Only just though because she was ready to lash out at him when he questioned her about Akua.

Really not liking how she's treating Vivienne and Juniper. She'd better watch that pride or she's only gonna end up with sycophants and yes men.

boballab

You really need to go back and re read Chapters 48, 49 and 50 of Book 4. Prior to her leaving for the Everdark Viv was all pissy and rebellious to Cats face and just before they split up Hakram stated this for the group:

Did she get haughty and make Hakram kneel, even with being pissed at him for being in Procer? No, she didn't because Hakram went into private and talked to her. So what does the rebellious Vivienne Dartwick who takes a verbal cheap shot at Cat on their parting do? Tries to arrest her.

benthelynx

Oh potentially good point

Liliet

It's a show she needs to put on.

Cat CAN step over her pride and anger, as quick as she is to them. But in this case she shouldn't, because her army is looking to her for confidence and assertiveness. This was a public insult, and however unintended, NOT getting angry would make her look weak in the circumstances where she can least afford it – where her army can least afford it.

Sugar Roll

Malanza and company has been duped in this instance but when they hear of what happened to the Levantine vanguard's cavalry and the Helikean cathapracts, Malanza will be vindicated in her decision to retreat. One just doesn't use a cavalry charge the Black Queen.

Sugar Roll

One just doesn't use a cavalry charge *on the Black Queen

RanVor

One does not simply use a cavalry charge on the Black Queen.

curious

I wonder if Catherine actually is corrupted, by Night. She has been drawing on it regularly to sharpen her staff/sword she leans on constantly, in addition to invocations for miracles. Collar Fairy is knee deep in making a Well of the stuff. Cat might not be a construct anymore but her soul was Corrupted, mutilated, bound up with Winter, and then literally exploded. We have not had Masego around to comment on the current state of her Her-ness.

Comment Thread Consensus is that by being priestess, she is not personally affected by the principle alienation as she was when WinterCat. But remember what "Sve" was? I am far from certain that being the Get of Night, as the drow consider her, comes with zero strings attached.

What would corruption by Night look like? Winter was about hunger, pride, backstabbery, isolation. Night is about terror, yes, but what else? The actual properties of Night have not been explained clearly for us by a narrator. Many of the uses of Night by Mighty were corrosive. I would worry about sinking my soul in that. Other uses, per the Longstriders, involve movement / uncertainty of position of things in the Night.

Cat is notably weaker after the Everdark. It is confounded by not being a construct anymore, but her leg (which she keeps mutilated for irrational reasons) fatigues even more rapidly than it should (I have a chronic knee condition and go to PT, her stamina is really bad) and her body is exhausted after working miracles. Is not part of Night getting sleepy/tired?

I think she isn't a reliable narrator, and would [and should] have failed the mage inspection. But killing her off [correctly] would not work narratively here so she was saved more by plot armor than anything "her". I think when Masego gets back, the state of her soul will become the major plot focus.

Lastly, part of the reason I think she can't get a new Name is she is not a person. Before Winter, the Demon of Corruption took a third of her soul when it claimed her third Aspect. That piece of her soul was sawed off by Masego and replaced by Winter, which then was exploded in Strycht. Then Akua crept into Winter, and Saint sliced up Winter, and we have no idea what that did to Cat's soul.

Bottom line, Cat is physically herself again, albeit a low-stamina, crippled, dragonbone pipe-clenching, extremely impulsive, easily angered version that somewhat superficially resembles, but differs in a lot of important ways, from SquireCat. I don't know how much is Folly PTSD and how much is soul mutilation but her soul was mutilated multiple times in extremely unusual ways.

We need Masego.

RanVor

Interesting. I was recently thinking about how Cat's behavior seems more at odds with who she was at the beginning than when she was the Sovereign of Moonless Nights...

Mental Mouse

"Cat's behavior seems more at odds with who she was at the beginning than when she was the Sovereign of Moonless Nights..."

Yes, she's far more confident and mature now than she was at any previous point – and by her own choice, less violent. Note that she's always been impulsive, right from the beginning, but now she's showing better sense about when and how to do that sort of stuff. (As someone else said, she'd earned that Intimidation bonus. Also, I suspect Night could have provided a quick escape if needed.) As I noted before, she acts more human now than she did as Winter Cat.

Anyone who's worried by her display of anger, or who thinks it's excessive, consider this: She was confronted by a group of her own troops with (insubordinate) orders to detain and test her. None of them died or even got hurt – in fact, Cat simply faced them down. And when facing Viv and Juniper, Cat did not in any way threaten them physically, not even as hyperbole. Instead, she invoked their oaths to her, and her final "threat" in this chapter was the loss of, not simply their positions, but the trust represented by those positions. In short, she's finally acting like a commander and a sovereign, and people are responding accordingly.

This actually raises an interesting point: What do you do when your buddy's possession represents an improvement over their original? I've heard of one similar case in the real world: Dr. Charles (iirc) told the tale of a cranky and obnoxious matriarch who suddenly woke up... nice. Her alarmed family promptly rushed her to the ER, where brain scans revealed a developing tumor. When that was removed, Grandma promptly went back to her nasty old self.

RanVor

Fuck maturity then, I guess, because I liked the old one a lot more.

RanVor

"her own troops with (insubordinate) orders"

Actually that's bullshit. The orders were not only coming from the officers Cat herself appointed, but also totally sensible and I'm really shocked that Cat didn't know better after all she went through. But she decided to throw a hissy fit and punish people for doing what she would expect them to do in any other situation instead. Good job, very mature.

Daniel E

In fairness, we have never seen Juniper miscalculate so badly. I suspect there is a good reason, but this is Cat's first time dealing with a serious display of bad judgement on the part of her crew.

boballab

Actually it isn't. Go back and re read Chapters 49 and 50 of Book 4, where Vivienne Dartwick threatened Cat with disobeying her order to go back with Hakram to rule Callow in her name. This came after Hakram and Viv conspired before discussing things with Cat about who was going into the Everdark with her. That was seriously bad judgement and Hakram realizes it during Chapter 49 and admits it mid way through 50 after watching Cat take her frustrations out on the Hunt for their bad judgement during the Battle of the Camps months earlier and then topping it off by not wanting to Gate Masego, Viv and Hakram. Remember she had one member of the Hunt kill another member after smacking the second one around and literally putting her boot on her neck. This is why I keep telling people saying this isn't Cat need to go back and re read the entire Everdark arc because they sure did miss/forget a lot.

RanVor

I think more than a few people would make a case for the person who went into the Everdark not being Cat either.

Mental Mouse

I suspect Juniper just got overwhelmed by superior force (with no option for retreat), and perhaps by superior story-fu (Pilgrim, DK, and Bard are only the most prominent story-shapers opposing her).

Aotrs Commander

Hahahaha!

Nice,

Yeah, not feeling a lot of sympathy for Juniper and Viv, here. If Cat had not showed up (or was dead) or not when she did and intervened in person, they would have lost all four armies (how much of that is the totality of the armies of Callow?) AND their Callow's remaining best generals AND its regent AND the only Named it had left on its side (including the only greenskin named in centuries).

What would have been left? What would have happened to Callow after that? (Malicia would certainly have had a good laugh, if no-one else did.)

Yeah, their plan was incompetently handled and the decision to even attempt it was poorly-thought out at best. Juniper is supposed to be better than this.

Regardless of why they thought they had to do it – they FRACKED up impossibly badly and were out-maneuvered at every turn. Audacity is rewarded only by success and this was literally one Cat-stride (and they aren't very big, y'see of account of she being short[1]) away from the definition of utter failure.

And then not bothering to even check for themselves it was Cat? (As if, y'know, the enemy suddenly all buggered off was a fricking CLUE.)

Damn straight they get a Proper Bollocking.

[1]Dont kill me! She has a REALLY tall personality, that's clearly where all the mass goes.

stevenneiman

They did check for themselves. The thing is that they did it publicly, which was a public insult and challenge to her authority. And considering that last I heard Juniper was a competent general, I feel like Cat would almost be more justified than Juniper in wondering if the other was an impostor.

Mental Mouse

If anyone got called out as an impostor here, it would be Viv, who's clearly "not herself" these days. Hmm. I wonder if the power of Night can reach into Viv's former domain to retrieve her loot?

Sugar Roll

It could have been a catastrophe no doubt but I give more credit to Malanza's and the Tyrant's abilities rather than the Hellhound's and Vivienne's lack thereof. Malanza is no joke as a military commander and the Tyrant survives and thrives in clusterfuck situations.

Remember, Callow was getting their ass handed to them at the start of the battle of the camps until Catherine dropped a lake onto the battlefield. Then you have the Tyrant who won the war within the League against a side with a hero band with Black (and company) and the Bard looming in the background.

'Ladi Williams

That was badass! I would dearly love to see the guide as a seasonal production.

And watching Cat calmly smoking while being charged by 7 thousand horse with only a line and her reputation between her and them and forcing them to flinch! That would be awesome.

stevenneiman

One kind of little thing I just noticed: Even when she's furious enough to go on a tirade and threaten demotions, she doesn't even consider threatening execution. Horrendously impractical and villainous in the way that gets you killed, even if you are in a foul enough mood to go through with it.

Mental Mouse

She did tell that one orc (and those around him) that if he orders weren't obeyed, gallows were on the table.

Daniel E

The Wild Hunt is still in play. I wonder if the promise of 'Seven crowns plus one' is still valid now that Winter as a unique power has ended. Perhaps said crowns will tie into the Prince's Graveyard somehow.

aran

One might almost get the impression that Catherine is pissed.

Chapter 23: Readjustment

"The price of dominion is the halving of one's grasp, for a ruler may hold a crown or hand but never both."

– Julianne Merovins, tenth First Princess of Procer

I'd dismounted, eventually, mainly because my leg was starting to twinge again. A chair would be easier on it, though it was a great deal harder for me to glare down at people without a horse under me. My anger had cooled some after the initial remonstrations, but it was far from gone – part of me was seething, and though I knew only part of the blame lay with the two women seated across from me they were not exempt from being called to account. Not when, to my knowledge, there was not a single part of this ill-considered western campaign that wasn't a spectacular disaster in some way.

"For my defeats I offer no excuse," Marshal Juniper said, tone rough.

This was the most cowed I'd ever seen her act, and with damned good reason. I trusted the supreme commander of my armies, even now. I did trust her judgement less than I would have a year ago, however. The thing was, what she had done – what Hakram and Vivienne had done with her – it couldn't simply be settled with a calm word and a reminder to be careful. Not when my delaying my return from the Everdark for as little as a month might have seen the Army of Callow either slaughtered or ended as a fighting force. The Third lost, as it likely would have been without my intervention, meant the Fourth was alone and blind to the east. Add onto this that they'd been getting hammered by the mere vanguard of the Grand Alliance host before I arrived today? The decisions taken by my foremost commander had nearly led to the end of the armies she was commanding. For the political aspects of this howling mess I would not hold her to account, but the military ones? They were very much her purview.

"I'm not interested in your falling on your sword, Marshal," I flatly said. "I've already spoken with Adjutant, so I have an understanding of the deployments made and the reasons for them. Splitting the columns was risky, but tactically sound. Before that, gating in between the Dominion forces was an equally sound manoeuvre. If, once more, risky."

My voice hardened at the last word, and though she did not flinch she did stiffen. In all our years together, I'd never once before chewed out the Hellhound like this. We'd had disagreements, the most animated of them over Bonfire and later the conduct of the campaign in northern Callow, but they'd been only that. Disagreements. For the most part I'd allowed her the run of the Fifteenth and later the Army of Callow, usually only intervening for reasons that weren't strictly military in nature. For all the oaths and the fact that I wore the crown, our relationship had been as close to one of equals as circumstances allowed. Right now, though? This was not Catherine talking to Juniper. This was the Black Queen speaking to the Marshal of Callow, and I reasons to be furious.

"A defeat, or several, is not something that needs excusing," I said. "To expect a flawless record would be absurd, especially given the calibre of our opposition. But I am currently looking at a series of tactically solid steps that led towards the greatest strategic disaster of our tenure together, and that needs an explanation."

I tapped my fingers against the table.

"Why is the Army of Callow fighting in Iserre, Marshal?" I asked.

"Your Majesty-"

Vivienne's interruption once again had my temper flaring. I glanced at her, still finding the sight of her milkmaid's braid surprising, and arched an eyebrow. The visible disconnect between the woman I'd left behind and the one I was looking at made it easier to rein in my irritation, though only by so much.

"Do you speak for Marshal Juniper now, Vivienne?" I calmly asked.

Her lips thinned.

"This campaign was not decided by her alone," she said. "I also bear a responsibility."

"You are not Marshal of Callow," I said, calling on my thinning reserves of patience. "A graduate of the War College, a trained strategist or indeed a military officer at all. For the diplomatic aspects of this debacle, the main responsibility lies with you and Hakram. I am well aware of that. This is not the diplomatic aspect."

My eyes flicked back to Juniper.

"Well?" I said. "Should Vivienne be a part of this conversation, Marshal?"

"No, Warlord," Juniper replied, chin rising. "She should not."

I dipped my head in approval. At the very least she was owning the fuckup instead of trying to spread around the responsibility, though whether that was out of persisting dislike for Vivienne or a personal sense of honour I couldn't be sure. My silence was taken as the invitation to speak that it was.

"It was necessary to evacuate the Legions of Terror," Juniper said.

I nodded in acknowledgement.

"They fought at the Vales," I said. "A debt was owed. How did this translate to your finding sense in deploying forty thousand legionaries through magical means of ingress and egress in the single most Name-infested region of this continent?"

"I did not believe any force below twenty thousand would prove a sufficient deterrent," the orc said. "I can't speak to the politics involved, but the size of the force was meant to ensure no battle would actually take place even if heroes spurred armies to move in time."

"Then why forty and not twenty?" I said, frowning.

"Because there was no telling when you would return," Juniper admitted. "And that meant if the northern Principate broke, we might have to occupy the Principality of Arans to prevent the Dead King from holding one side of the northern passage into Callow."

The Stairway, I thought. Which should currently be defended by the army of Duchess Kegan, but only from the Callowan end of the pass. Considering the Principality of Hainaut was all that stood between the armies of the dead and Arans, her worry wasn't unfounded.

"Adjutant didn't mention this," I said.

"The situation was still theoretical," the Hellhound said. "We'd have a gap of at least two months between leaving Callow by Arcadia and arriving in Iserre, possibly more, which effectively killed our capacity to occupy Arans in time if the front in Hainaut broke. Committing twenty thousand soldiers – two divisions – and the Wild Hunt was splitting the forces in a manner that made it impossible to exert our strength correctly."

I breathed out, forced myself to consider the logic in what she was saying.

"Even if you sent the two remaining divisions north before leaving, they'd arrive late and be dependent on Duchess Kegan's army to manage occupation of Arans," I finally said. "Which, without me at the helm, she might not be inclined to give. On the other hand, having the full four divisions with the Hunt meant if the strike proved necessary you could march in force immediately and entrust the Deoraithe with the supply line from the other side."

"That was my reasoning," Juniper agreed.

"And Adjutant was not informed of your theory because?"

"Because he had nothing to contribute to the planning," the Hellhound bluntly said. "And I wanted the plans ready for implementation if things went to shit after he and the Lady-Regent tried to make a truce with Procer."

I let a few heartbeats pass to see if she had anything to add, but she did not.

"General Hune," I said without turning. "Anything to add?"

"Two months before our departure for Iserre, the general staffs for all four divisions were assigned a tactical exercise called Citadel," the ogre evenly said. "While no direct mention of Procer or Arans was made, it involved rapidly occupying a foreign territory with limited forces. Priority was placed on fortifying it against an outside assault even while occupation took place."

Essentially confirming Juniper hadn't woven this entire Arans thing out of thin air, though I'd not been all that inclined to believe that in the first place.

"Noted," I said.

I drummed my fingers against the tabletop, resisting the urge to hum. This was still a massive fuckup, I thought, but at least Juniper had actual reasons for having brought the Army of Callow this far out. Were they sufficient, in my eyes? I wasn't sure, to be honest, and I shouldn't be passing judgement on that until I had all the information at my disposal instead of a simple debrief. The Hellhound's actions as still almost ended the Kingdom of Callow as a military power for at least a decade, and she'd proved to be imprudent repeatedly. On the other hand, every risk she'd taken was at least calculated and overall dictated by what could only be called a desperate fucking times.

"Marshal Juniper, in your own opinion where exactly was the blunder made?" I finally asked.

"When I ordered the army to gate in between the two Dominion forces," she replied without missing a beat. "To be sound, that manoeuvre depended on certain access to gates when leaving. It was a blunder to assume that would be the case."

She wasn't changing her stance as to the necessity of fielding the four divisions of the army, I noted, which meant the Hellhound still believed it'd been the right call given what she'd known at the time. On the other hand, she wasn't trying to excuse herself by saying it would have been impossible to anticipate the gates would start going wild when they did, or that scrying would be made impossible by something still unknown.

"And do you believe Adjutant the Lady-Regent interfered with how you would have planned this campaign otherwise?" I asked.

She mulled over that, for a moment.

"No more than you would have, Warlord," Juniper said.

Fair enough, I thought.

"You're not stripped from command," I finally sighed. "As of now, General Hune is confirmed as the senior among the generals in the Army of Callow."

A warning, essentially, that if she blundered this badly again then the ogre would be handed the marshal's baton.

"When the situation in Iserre is resolved," I continued, "a tribunal of senior officers will be convened to assess whether or not the decisions you took in this campaign warrant charges of incompetence or reckless use of authority. Their verdict will decide whether or not you are demoted back to general."

"Understood," the Marshal of Callow rasped.

"Good," I said. "I'll be perfectly clear: I have no intention of being involved with this tribunal beyond ordering it convened. This is not personal, Juniper. This isn't happening because I am angry with an old friend, or appalled by what your decisions almost led to. But if the Army of Callow is ever to be more than just my personal warband, then its members need to be accountable for what they do."

She nodded, but her face was unreadable. I did not know whether or not she believed me.

"None of this can hold until it's been confirmed you're actually Catherine Foundling," Vivienne said, face resolutely set.

She hadn't reached for a knife, and idly I wondered if she still carried any. Probably. Losing her Name did not mean she'd lost her skills, simply that there wasn't quite as much weight behind them.

"Yes," I said, smile turning hard. "Let's talk about that."

My fingers clenched.

"What the Hells were the two of you thinking?" I hissed out. "A pair of lines, fifteen mages? All of this led by General Hune, who is well-known to be aloof from me? Did you even pause to consider what it looked like?"

I glanced at the ogre in question, inclining my head to convey no offence was meant. She replied with the same, visibly unaffected. It was, after all, nothing but the truth.

"Precautions had to be taken," Vivienne said, though she winced. "You've agreed on those in the past, Your Majesty."

"If I'd actually been a puppet what would have happened?" I harshly asked her. "I would have splattered them across the ground, accused the two of you a fomenting a coup and I'd have your head on pikes within the hour. What could fifteen legion mages have done, Vivienne? Unless you've recruited practitioners capable of High Arcana in the last year, little more than scream before they died."

"They were chosen for their capacity to check on your identity," Juniper said. "A ritual-"

"Could have been done in private, away from the eyes of the troops," I spoke through gritted teeth. "If I was willing to cooperate – and I will be, once this fucking conversation is over – then there was no need to play out what looked like an arrest. If I wasn't, if I was an impostor or a puppet, exactly what difference would forty soldiers have made?"

There was a long moment of silence in the tent.

"I was aware you had no head or liking for politics when I named you Marshal, Juniper," I said. "This, though? You should have grasped this without need for explanation. What would have happened, even if I'd been taken away without fighting and not reappeared? How many legionaries would have believed I was an impostor, after seeing me turn away the Proceran horse?"

I paused, forcing myself to breathe out and calm.

"We're not eighteen anymore," I said. "There's no one to clean up our mistakes for us. You're the highest ranked military officer in the kingdom, when you don't consider the ramifications of your orders there are consequences."

I turned to the other reckless gambler, almost at a loss for words.

"As for you, Vivienne, do I even need to say anything?" I tiredly said.

She looked away. That was answer enough.

"Marshal Juniper, General Hune," I sighed. "You may resume your duties. Within the hour the hills to the west will be occupied by the Third Army, while the Fourth and fifty thousand drow auxiliaries move to the northwest to pressure the Grand Alliance's army."

Assuming Hakram had understood me correctly, whoever held command of the enemy army was going to have a hard choice to make. Either they'd allow an enemy force with numerical superiority and two entrenched positions – this camp and the hills General Abigail was marching on – to begin encircling them before the battle continued, or they'd have to withdraw further north and surrender any advantage they'd gained today. My bet was on the enemy retreating, given that they had reinforcements following behind us, but if Princess Rozala and the Dominion commander wanted to get into a slugging match even after my warning then the Army of Callow and the Legions needed to be readied for the fight. Juniper nodded, and rose to offer a salute. Hune settled for a nod, which given the respective sizes of herself and the pavilion was probably for the best.

"Marshal?" I called out as she began heading out.

"Ma'am?" Juniper gravelled.

"Have the appropriate mages prepare the ritual," I said.

"Discretely. Leave an officer outside this tent to guide me there when I've finished."

"Understood," the Marshal of Callow said, and left without another word.

I wondered, with a pang, if what had been said here today had just ended one of the last few friendships I had. If a relationship it'd taken years to build had just been put to the torch and we would be returning to the distant formality of the first months of the Fifteenth. Perhaps not, I thought. Orcs tended to handle reprimands like these better than humans, and she'd not named me her warlord lightly. But something would change, I knew, and it might not ever entirely return to the way it used to be. And Juniper, of the two I had chewed out, was likely to take this the best. Akua's words about the conflict between the needs of the queen and the woman lingered at the edge of my thoughts, but they were too bitter for me to be willing to acknowledge them.

"I suppose now is to be my turn," Vivienne Dartwick said. "Was it a kindness or a bad omen, that you dismissed the others first?"

I finally allowed myself a good look at her. What had once been short dark hair was now elaborately put together in a milkmaid braid that circle twice atop her bangs, reminiscent of a summer fair crown. The blue-grey eyes had not changed, I thought, but something about the cast of her face had. She seemed... older. Like she had grown in the year I'd seen her. The old leathers had been traded in for a long-sleeved pale blouse, conservative in cut but still baring most of her shoulders. It led into high-waist wine red skirts, though beneath I'd earlier glimpsed more practical leggings and boots. An engraved silver ring on her hand was the only visible adornment she'd bothered with, save for the royal seal of Callow I'd earlier ordered her to set down. Vivienne hadn't grown any more beautiful, since we'd last seen each other – she was still barely taller than I, and of rather similar frame. But there was something subtly matured about the way she carried herself. My eyes flicked to the seal still on the table, and for a moment I regretted ordering her to put her down. Her regency had come to an end the moment I'd returned, truth be told, but the manner of making that clear need not be so humiliating. On the other hand, Vivienne, I thought, what choice did you give me?

"I didn't want it to be like this," I said. "But here we are. I have questions."

"Duchess Kegan is now Governess-General," she said. "And was granted broad if temporary authority in my absence, though I kept the regency title proper until today."

"Adjutant already told me," I said. "Kegan was the best of the choices you had. Baroness Ainsley being Keeper of the Seals stacks the council towards nobles too much for my tastes, but I'll concede there wasn't anyone else with both the pull and the competence."

"The recognition of the Confederation of the Grey Eyries--"

"Was within your authority as Lady-Regent, and something I can stomach," I calmly said. "The Matrons are vicious monsters, but also a thorn in Malicia's side and willing to sell us goods we badly need. The scheme to make a king of Grem One-Eye was overly ambitious, to my eye, but not offensively so. Arranging for him to hold the Blessed Isle with Black's own legions was inspired, and I wholeheartedly approve."

"This is not," Vivienne murmured, "the way I expected this conversation to go."

"I'm not going to ignore the significant achievements to your name because you angered me," I mildly replied. "You did very well with the regency. Until, at least, you decided to allow this atrocious blunder of a campaign. Then you deepened the mistake by accompanying the army personally. So I suppose my questions is this – what, exactly, did you think this mess was going to accomplish?"

She smiled, at tad bitterly.

"And my answer determines whether I remain one of the Woe," she said.

"Don't give me that," I sharply said. "Whimpering in self-pity is beneath the both of us. You were given power and authority, Vivienne. I'm asking you to explain your how you used them, not throwing a tantrum. Given the messes I've had to clean up, this is an exceedingly measured response."

"You didn't deny it," she said.

"You think fucking up means you're not one of us?" I said.

"Doesn't it?" Vivienne replied, eyes unreadable.

"The lot of you didn't cut my throat after the Doom of Liesse," I said. "Why would you think this is any different? We can lose, Vivienne. But we have to learn. We have to own it. And we have to face the fucking consequences, because otherwise we'll just keep doing it. And it's more important than my feelings, or yours, but it doesn't mean they aren't there."

In the lucid, terrifying moment that followed those words I realized this might be how it'd started for Black. Looking at a mess and knowing that loving those responsible was one thing but exempting them from consequence another. Is that how you learned? To put it in a box and only let it out when the necessary callousness was over with.

"So tell me," I said, repeating myself with the sudden taste of ash in my mouth. "What did you think this was going to accomplish?"

She talked, I listened, and with careful patient cruelty I hardened her to avoid making the same mistakes twice. We walked to the ritual together, afterwards, and some part of me was almost disgusted at the glints of gratitude and respect I caught in her gaze when she looked at me. Like I'd not, as lovingly as callously, burned her with shame and bound her with affection so that Vivienne Dartwick would be one step closer to the woman I needed her to be.

I was, in the end, my father's daughter.

Epok

Also, come check out the Discord. <https://discord.gg/MGeezk>

aran

This link does not seem to be working for me.

aran

(Update: Never mind, it seems I was already in the Discord. Or at least a Discord, can't tell if it is the same as the one linked here.)

Zeozo

The links expired 😞

ruduen

Something Something Vote Something!

Something Something <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> Something!

Flobert

Since the other guy hasn't done it.
Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Flobert

It appears someone else has done it. It just didn't load until after I posted my comment

Andrew

Chapter seems to be getting shorter and shorter or is it just me?

Vivid

I really hope that at some point we get to see a meta reference to that one kind of Villain who's super op and terrifying to fight, but then inexplicably get way weaker when they turn to the good side.

Vivid

Wait why isn't this comment on the main thread

matrixm

Only candidate right now is Black. Alia will have her magical prowess either way

crysjal

That's the 6th ranger trope I believe. Or at least a variation on it.

HannaB

Akua. Half her power was political, and most of the other half she's not allowed to even glance in direction of, because it's evil af.

DroughtBringer

ignores the fact that I am late

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

Hmmm.

That last bit about making Viv the woman Cat needs her to be might indicate that the plan for Cat's abdication might be Viv as Queen, and Abigail as her right hand or Marshal.

stevenneiman

I dunno. All that's really established is that Cat still has use for Viv. I wouldn't be surprised if that use includes her being the heir to the throne, but I wouldn't discount it.

Dainpdf

I'll just note how suspicious it is that we did not get to hear what her reasons were, or what Cat said about it, and be on my way.

Dainpdf

Why is this a response dammit wordpress.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, I agree. EE has __got__ to know that we'd be disappointed to miss out on that conversation. And I don't think he'd be disappointing without a good reason.

Dainpdf

Plus he did show us one conversation completely, then had Cat drive everyone out and skipped the next. Suspicious.

Decius

I predict that conversation will be covered in an interlude, from Viv's POV.

haihappen

You spelled "heir" wrong, it should be "Heiress", kick-started by a knife to the chest.
Of course, only if Viv actually WANTS it.

Javvies

Pretty sure that Heiress is a Praesi-specific Name. And that it's also specifically a Villain Name, not a shade of grey Name.

Callow had its own names for the Crown Prince/Princess Role, but they were all relatively straightforward Hero names.

I don't think that there's a shade of gray Transitional Name specific to the Role in question. Certainly there isn't going to be a Callowan one. The only place that might have one, but then it'd be a culturally specific Name, might be Helike, since they seem to wobble back and forth a little, based on the fact that Kairos's nephew was a Hero.

boballab

About the Name Heiress/Heir, as far as I can recall it was never stated directly in text that it was a transitional name to Empress/Emperor. We do know that in the past one of the most successful Names to transition to Empress/Emperor is Chancellor. It was so much so that Malicia outlawed the bestowal of that Name and not to recently she noted that someone might be transitioning into that Role anyway and sent her to a dead end post. Then we also know that the Black Knight is a possible path to Empress/Emperor when Cat had those visions of herself climbing the Tower. Also Akua being Heiress could mean the Heiress to her mother's title in Woloff.

Another point to consider is the ramifications of Hakram's Name, it is a Name that is completely new or it is one so old that it was completely forgotten but it is back now. So the question of why a new Name needs to be answered especially if Viv gets a new Name that has never been seen in Callow before.

Shikkarasu

Further point on the Name Heir(ess), Akua mentioned that the Heiress can inherit anything. I think this means that if the Heiress survives long enough to reansition she becomes a more powerful version of her new name. Like how White/Black Knights are strengthened by having been the Squire for a time, or how Warlock/Heirophant are boosted by their time as apprentice.

The most common goal would be Chancellor/Dread Empress because all Praesi nobility strive to either take the Tower or set up their descendants for it, but that's only because Praesi don't settle for 2nd fiddle. There's nothing to say that an Evil Heir/ess could not aim to inherit the Name "King/Queen of Callow", it would just be a long difficult game of public perception; exactly what the Name Heir(ess) was made for.

boballab

There is an Interlude in Book 3 where Akua talks about the problems the Truebloods are facing and in it she makes a statement that can be argued is what her having the Heiress Name was about: The Heir to old style villainy

Villainous Interlude: Chiaroscuro

That took place just before she became Diabolist

Skaddix

I assume Viv doesn't feel like one of the gang still..she started as a Hero, she switched side. But all the other Woe even Juniper who is probably closest to the Woe (Pre Akua) is exceptional at something. Viv though is the normal former Hero who has never been exceptional and now she is not even Named the one special thing she had. So I figure an inferiority complex drove her here. Also losing Name means with Juniper and Hakram gone. She is any easy assassination target. Since as Cat notes standard Legion Mages are irrelevant outside of Rituals and firing lines. I do wonder when the Tyrant tried to off Juniper if it happened still in Callow that would motivation to come along. Fear.

caoimhinh

Yep, Vivienne is definitely filled with fear and insecurities now that she lost her Name.

Andrew Mitchell

I think one of the main reasons she lost her name was her fears and insecurities. I'm sad to see that the combination of Hakram's sacrifice and the loss of her name hasn't improved her mental health. I was hoping for more character development.

KageLupus

Viv lost her Name because she stopped being the Thief. That might sound like circular reasoning but think about how Names work. You have to embody a concept or role fully enough that you slip into one of the grooves of creation. When she first got the Name, Thief was running around stealing from the rich just to make a point. She wasn't playing Robbin Hood and helping the downtrodden. She was just stealing from nobles because she was so disillusioned with them. In short, she was being a Thief.

Then look at what happened after she joined up with the Woe and Catherine got her crown. Vivienne spent most of her time acting as a spymistress, the sole voice of reason when discussing plans, and eventually picked up a regency. All of her time has been spent on politics in one sense or another. She was no longer doing the kinds of things that you would expect from a Thief, so she ended up outside of that groove.

Vivienne didn't lose her Name because she was afraid and insecure, she felt that way because she had stopped doing the things that made her Thief to begin with.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, you're absolutely right when you say "You have to embody a concept or role fully enough that you slip into one of the grooves of creation." But saying that "she had stopped doing the things that made her Thief to begin with" is only half the story IMO.

As you said, we're talking about "embodying" a role and that's as much about mindset as what you do. Thief was confident, she could get away with stealing anything. She lost her confidence, became fearful and stopped Thieving. Both the mindset and actions were important factors, which is why I said "one of the main reasons" in my post above.

Steve

It's admittedly a delicate balance, but Cat comes off like a piece of shit moreso than not, here.

So easy to be the one looking back with 20-20 vision when you disappear for the greater span of month(s).

Especially after how bad she fucked up the drow campaign and literally got bailed out by a deus ex machina.

imagesbe

Her making mistakes in no way excuses others from doing so. It only pushes her to point them out more so they can learn from those mistakes. Even in this chapter, when Vivienne expressed doubt over her continued welcome in the Woe, Cat all but admitted that any mistake Vivienne made here paled in comparison to the magnitude of the Doom of Liesse.

I felt like this chapter did a very good job separating the "mistake in hindsight" mistakes from "that was just a bad decision" mistakes. Juniper got off mostly because the only mistake she made that really fell into the latter category was the porting between armies mistake, and even then Cat knows that there were arguments for it.

When repeated disasters hit an army that could have been avoided, someone needs to be held accountable, even if it's just stopping and having a tribunal that answers the question, "was it really her fault or not."

Steve

'It only pushes her to point them out more so they can learn from those mistakes.'

Eh...this line seems to not indicate that, at least to me.

"And we have to face the fucking consequences, because otherwise we'll just keep doing it."

Cat literally had a variant of this conversation near the end of the drow campaign with Archer...and then she went on doing the exact same half-cocked thing with next-to-no plan and ended up losing, only to win on a gamble with 'fate'.

Her dressing down Juniper for the maneuvers is warranted – but the way in which the dressing down is portrayed makes it feel more like a visceral/personal rationale behind it, with the 'excuse' of being made about the failure, rather than the other way around.

The bigger problem, perhaps, is that Cat has shown many a time that she's a fuckup, but she's not really been (at least that I can recall) really been 'lambasted' for it, in a way that she does to Juniper and Vivienne here. She's been hard on herself, sure, but Black dressing her down (in the few times it happened) didn't echo this, to me.

And maybe that's the point (in showing Cat's fall down the slippery slope), but it isn't doing Cat any favors as a protagonist.

magesbe

Well, firstly, who's going to dress her down like this? Cat doesn't answer to anyone anymore, and when she did (mostly to Black), he did dress her down a couple of times.

The Woe's way to trying to get through to Cat that she's made some bad decisions isn't to dress her down, but to try and talk to her about it. Sometimes that even works. But they're not in a position to do to her what she did to them here.

Also, Catherine has fucked up in the past (and paid for it, usually), but I wouldn't call her a "fuck-up." Or are you going to ignore the many many successes she's had? Even if she tends to ignore them herself.

She's not telling Viv here that she's a fuckup, in fact she explicitly said otherwise. She's saying that Viv fucked up, this is how, and this is what she should do next time.

But if Cat could go back in time and talk to her past self, you bet she'd rant at her younger self. The person hardest on Cat is Cat herself. Almost to an irritating degree to be honest, though it looks like most of the angst is past.

Skaddx

Yeah Cat is being a bit of hypocrite. I mean Juniper made a plan that works perfectly. She is not the Magic expert or the Intelligence expert so how could she possibly predict someone can shutdown scrying over a province and shunt all the Gates to layers of Hell? Granted with Masego and Akua gone there are no magic scholars on the Callow payroll so once the trap shuts she is screwed. We have seen personal anti scrying protection. And intelligence gathering is Viv and Hakram's Job.

Still on Cat at least Juniper had plans. Cat's plan to get the Drow was nothing when she went then defeat Sve Noc in direct combat...Sve has what millennium of experience with magic and Cat didn't know anything about magic at the time. then her plan was flip one sister against the other right they are going to sell each other out over some random they just met and can kill. Even Cat's army saving move only works if there is no Hero leading the charge who can look across and say hey she is not Named and not a Fae anymore keep going lads. When is the last time Cat actually used a plan? Cat uses Chaos Plan but she just goes full chaos and hopes she ends up on top by improvising. Meanwhile Tyrant mixes actual Chaos, First Move always works amongst other Story expertise and actual strategic/tactical planing with political manipulation. Cat is basically a much worse Tyrant.

pagesbe

Juniper could have predicted that there was a non-zero chance that the largest group of collected Named for decades would be able to fuck with a trick that was reliable yes, but also absolutely critical for not being completely fucked. Juniper well all-or-nothing in a plan that involved numerous individuals that specialize in screwing over foolproof plans.

You seem very fond of leaving context out of Cat's "plans." Cat couldn't plan going to the Drow because no one knew anything about them; they even had more intel on the Dead King. That's why they were literally the last resort. Then she needed to take Sve Noc out. I mean, yeah she doesn't know what Sve Noc would do, but her entire Drow force would mutiny if they learned her true intentions, and even if they didn't they don't know Sve Noc's capabilities either. She had very few options at that point, so all she could do was hopefully stack the deck in her favor as much as possible.

Turning the sisters against each other? First of all, her options at that point were “try something that probably won’t work and probably die, or roll over and DEFINITELY die.” Guess what she tried? Secondly, she was operating under the assumption that the sister’s weren’t a perfectly united front. If you go back to that section, she mentions that she believed that one of the sister’s was publicly Sve Noc, and the other was in a constant state of agony as a “horse” of sorts. Plus, one of the sisters welcomed her to the Everdark, the other cursed at her. She hoped more than figured that enough time spent in this condition would render the “horse” sister amendable to actual negotiation. She was wrong, but honestly her attempts led to what actually worked and thus were infinitely better than getting squashed like a bug.

She used plans at the Battle of the Camps. She used a plan to save the 3rd army. She didn’t exactly use a plan at the Dead King’s place, but to be fair, they figured out that if you actually had a plan it would fail. If Cat has information and time to plan, she totally uses plans. Admittedly usually she has Juniper write them up, but I’m guessing that if Cat had been with them she wouldn’t have let them do this, because of the reasons discussed in this very chapter.

And when she saw 7000 horseman charging at the flank of her army, what was she going to do? “Oh, opposing them would be too risky, I should look for a safer option.” At that point there were no safer options. It was take the chance that she would be able to stalemate them because of her reputation for destruction, or watch them destroy her army. Cat’s biggest gambles are done when she has no other feasible options. In that light, even a plan with laughable odds is better than rolling over and dying, or letting massive amounts of your followers die.

sivarajan

And you’ve left all the context out of Juniper’s plan. That’s because you don’t know it, but still...

magesbe

Actually we know all the context of Juniper’s plan, between this chapter and the one where Hakram told her about why they were there. It even mostly excuses Juniper, which is why she got off with a slap on the wrist.

Skaddix

No one knows why scrying is down or Gates are being shunted. So yes I agree since personal scrying protection exist Juniper should be able to predict one could should it down over a wider area. Gates, I mean I guess Weseka has shown something similar Weseka's Ability aren't public knowledge that Juniper would know she needed to plan. Also we still don't know who is causing the issues its not the Heroes though or at least it doesn't seem likely the Heroes are doing it based on who we know is in the Province. So Hierarch and Tyrant are good picks but again Juniper's Job is not Intelligence Gathering that is Viv's Job. So if Juniper fails cause she didn't know what those two can do well that is on Viv and Hakram to a lesser extent since he is suppose to bridge the gap. Or you could say its cause Callow only has three people with extensive knowledge on Named and Magic. Cat took two of them into the Underdark in Akua and Indrani. While Masego went to his father. So Juniper didn't even have a magic expert and/or a High Arcana level Spellcaster.

My issue is you seem to give Cat a free pass for gambling and lack of knowledge but don't apply that to Juniper. Cat's recent exploits only work cause no one on the other sides know what her abilities are right now. In the first case the young lord didn't believe the Fae Stories. In the second case she is going up against people who do believe the Fae stories. Cat is not getting out situations cause she Planned anything, she is doing it cause unlike Juniper she can rely on a massive amount of personal power when things go wrong.

magesbe

Catherine's hardly the pinnacle of planning and forethought, I wasn't trying to say she was. I'm saying that when she does fly by the seat of her pants, it's usually not because she decided to just randomly fuck planning and do whatever she feels like at the time, like some reviewers seem to be implying. Catherine chews herself out for the mistakes she makes, so I hardly feel the need to do so here; there's any number of chapters featuring her berating herself. Also, having a lot of personal power doesn't mean that knowing how to leverage it somehow makes it cheating or something. It means she knows her reputation and what she can do, and uses that as yet another tool. It's a part of her planning process.

medailyfun

Her plan to visit Dead King was insane from the beginning, and she continued with Everdark in even more desperate way. Why not try with Dwarves first? Talk with Tyrant directly? Reconcile with Malicia? Aren't those more obvious actors? And even without those parties Callow's situation was not that bad, so for me her actions look like driven by the extreme depression and tunnel vision.

As for her recent stand with the horsemen, why she have not prepared any backup variant? She still have her Night power, even if it would leave her exhausted it's better than leaving her dead. All and all, Cat still suffers from taking insane risks and having tunnel vision in situations where it could be avoided.

matesbe

Every one of your questions was answered in the text directly or heavily implied by circumstances, so there's no point in posting rebuttals here. If you don't think those answers are satisfactory, that's on you, because it seems to me most people do.

The question about the recent stand with horseman; surprise gates are a bad idea. She had to go through a literal battleground to reach her destination and it's only because she had a flying horse she could pull it off. When literally every second counts (as it really did), you don't have half an hour to organize a large force, plot a safeish route through Arcadia, bring them through there, and then organize them on the other side. If you have a rebuttal for all these points, tell me.

When going through the Gate she knew they needed help, possibly immediately, and didn't know that her only option would be to run a massive, dangerous bluff. Though she may have been able to escape, seeing as she only commented that she couldn't kill them all.

If she had stopped to gather forces together, it would have been too late.

medailyfun

Of course, there are narrative reasons known only to the author and it's his story, not mine, but I wanted to outline rational variants.

As for the the proceran horse issue, I definitely was not thinking about the gate, actually the author's decision to use a gate to transport Cat to the battlefield puzzled me, since it is common agreement among the readers that gate travel is too unpredictable in duration that's why used sparingly.

Andrew Mitchell

My recollection of how gates work is that you never know how long it's going to take, but you always take less time than you would in creation.

imagesbe

If you didn't mean gating through allies, then I have no idea how you'd expect her to be able to bring in any backup. Also, what Andrew said.

I didn't mean there were hidden reasons for your suggestions being bad ones, I mean there are literally reasons in text. However, I do not care enough to go track down quotes personally so I'll drop it; however, you'll find a few around chapter 23 of book 4, though some are earlier and some are later.

medailyfun

I was thinking in terms of what bare minimum magic stuff Cat can make to affect the cavalry in addition to standing on their way (cause we do need this stand for the nice narrative :)) And I think big plain curtain of night behind her back without any additional effects besides just being black would be more than enough to support her point.

Mental Mouse

Actually, I'm pretty sure if she hadn't had a flying horse, she would have gotten a gate on the ground – probably not inside that fortress, but uncomfortably close. When she makes a gate, her exit point is set at the moment she creates the entrance to Arcadia, and every time so far it has been accessible to the party coming through.

That said, the reappearance of Fae forces and strongholds in her path is probably not a good sign. That could be the switch from Winter to Night, but it could also be that the Winter/Summer court is giving way to the two remaining courts.

Mental Mouse

On the field of war (or politics, or any other blood-stakes arena), “no one could have predicted that” does not pass muster. The unpredictable is a basic part of war, and both Murphy’s and Finagle’s laws become forces of nature on a battlefield.

The business of war planning is exactly to account for not only the resources and tactics you know the opponent has, but also for the unexpected stuff they might pull out of a hat – and for other unexpected developments, that might spoil the plans of either side or both. That is where Juniper and Vivienne ultimately failed – not failing to think ahead, but failing to consider “what happens if our carefully worked-out plan does, somehow, go sour?” And so they put everything they had on their plan, forgetting that, famously, “no plan survives contact with the enemy”.

quite possibly a cat

Cat has been fucking up to an ever increasing degree ever since she became a full on Fae. Relying on the fae gates was always going to blow up in their faces eventually. It culminated in the Underdark where she decided to take on Sve Noc with a comically simple plan made of villain tropes that always backfire.

Why do you think Cat near instantly decided she never wanted to be a Winter Fae ever again as soon as she got her mortality back?

usernamesbco

I’d have called her a piece of shit commander if she DIDN’T do this. Akua has the right of it, there is a huge gulf between being a person and being a position. The first can be a friend, the second can’t allow friendship to enter into the equation.

I’m more miffed about her self flagellation for being “too much like Black,” because that calculating detachment is absolutely necessary for military command. His fault isn’t that he does it, it’s that he never stops.

Mental Mouse

I strongly disagree. This is how things work when you’re playing in the big leagues, with lives and more hanging in the balance. Cat chewed out her subordinates thoroughly, but also listened to them, and did not punish them arbitrarily. I note that the meeting covered the topics we discussed in the last chapter’s comments, including: 1) The point of several apparently-good tactics leading nearly to ruin, specifically because of the failure of return gates – and it was counting on those return gates that was the fatal military mistake. and 2) the gross inappropriateness of the “arrest party”, for all the reasons we noted and one we hadn’t.

Draeysine

Go vote

magesbe

This was brilliant, and almost tailored as a response to those with, admittedly, understandable doubts about Cat’s actions last chapter (though I know better than to believe the chapter was a DIRECT response). Cat knows what she’s doing.

And every time I hear her call Black Father I can’t help but smile. I think Black will be rescued, with the Bard’s latest play with him I don’t think his potential has been played out, but there’s the chance he’d choose death over playing the Bard’s game (and him saying “mistake” in that epilogue was about him saying that now that he knew the Bard wasn’t done with him, he could possibly foil her plans by dying).

caoimhinh

I like that too, it shows that EE reads our comments and take them into consideration.

Do you remember that part a couple of chapters ago when Cat mentioned the number of horses taken by the Helikean Cataphracts as being more than the actual number of riders and how they probably had others in a camp somewhere nearby?

Both things had been mentioned in comments in the previous chapter in a discussion between readers, so EE taking those comments and incorporating that information in the story is pretty nice.

Readers have tons of info that can help a writer improve the story, so it’s awesome when they check it and apply it. I guess that’s one of the greatest advantages of a web serial.

Liliet

Are you sure EE is taking this from the comments and wouldn’t have done the exact same thing without them?

Answering questions raised by the previous chapter in the next one particularly doesn’t need readers’ response to be obvious 😊

Mental Mouse

We do know EE is reading the comments and at least sometimes responding to them, but it’s an open question how much he’s drawing from the comments, versus just getting technical points right, so that the more knowledgeable commenters can spot some things in advance that simply need to happen.

Liliet

Yeah.

I'm pretty sure the 'answer narrative questions that were /just/ discussed in the comments' falls into pre-planned category tho lmao. It's not like EE rolls dice to decide what to cover next, things flow into one another.

The technical things like horses are more plausible, though I still suspect EE knew this already.

caoimhinh

Hmm, true. But it seemed too precise, even the wording was similar to that of the comment talking about the horses and the other talking about the camp. And since those were details never mentioned before (even that logistic of having more horses than riders in the Army of Callow was never mentioned before, despite it being something obvious in hindsight) it seems natural to consider that the information came from the one who mentioned it first, the commenter. It's not like it's something bad, just that it seems that bit of insight came from the readers, using that is perfectly fine and actually recommendable, since it can improve the story giving it consistency and also clearing readers' doubts that ambiguity or passing over the subject would have generated.

It wouldn't even be the first time it happened in this story actually; as early as Volume 1, when Black first gave Cat a lesson in how to 'fight and kill', he showed her how to fight using a legionary's shield, a commenter pointed out that such thing was only viable for troop battles in a formation, not individual combat since the legionaries shield was designed to fight relying on others covering you from the sides, and thus was not the type of fighting style Black was supposedly teaching Cat; a couple of chapters later Cat then mentioned that Black actually used a smaller shield when he fought, that the first lesson was only about how legionaries fought and after that he taught her how to fight using sword and smaller shield which was his fighting style. Nevertheless in Cat's following battles she fought using the "middle-height stance" that Black taught her in the first lesson (which was supposedly only for legion formation), but whatever, she later dropped even that and developed her own style. And also the retconning of rulers of Vaccei (the first characters introduced as being from Champion's Blood) to be from Bandit's Blood, which was first pointed out by readers long before EE went back to fix that.

Point is, there's a chance that EE is answering people's doubts from comments and using information readers provide to improve in the details of the story, nothing bad with that, I think that's a good thing.

An webnovel author that listens and properly answers the readers words is way better than one who doesn't.

Liliet

Yeah, it is, you're very not wrong. I'm just annoyed by the 'ooooh the writer is reading the comments to know where to take the story next!' stance I've seen in more than one fandom -_-

caoimhinh

Ahh, I see, it was a misunderstanding then. Sorry if my initial comment sounded like that, I intended it as praise for taking trivia and comments from readers and incorporating those details to the story, while answering our questions through the chapters, since that enriches the novel.

I agree with you, it would be a huge disrespect to any author to say that they don't know where to take their story.

Liliet

Like, answering questions through the chapters = like erratic didn't first raise those questions through the chapters 😞

I mean I do figure that like once in a blue moon there'd be an adjustment but imho yeah it's disrespectful to have that as your first guess for why the chapter seemed to mirror the comment section.

danh3107

I'm not satisfied by this chapter. My opinion means very little in the end but honestly, it feels like you skipped the actually interesting conversation at the end to make a snappy closing line. Oh and Viv has no name, we don't know if she's getting a new one or not and it doesn't seem like we'll find out any time soon.

So the group of named called the Woe had one and a half books before becoming three named and two normal people. Sure sure "roles are more important than names" yadda yadda, but this series started with the concept of Names and how they worked. Now they're almost entirely irrelevant. I can't lie and say that doesn't bother me.

Maybe you're building up to something, maybe cat and viv are making new names like Masego did but I don't know.

I hope you understand erratic that I really love this story and I'm just putting my thoughts out. Thanks for writing.

magesbe

Cat may not have a Name, but she's hardly a normal person. And I still believe that Viv will transition into a new Name eventually, give it a bit. She's been onscreen all of 2 chapters as a non-Named now.

daegone823

I miss the names too they served to define characters.

My favorite moments were when characters seized names at integral moments or used aspects. Chidur vs Cat was my favorite fight, two characters who were just not fighting to survive but for there dream(there narrative/destiny).

When a named used an aspect it wasn't just a cool power they got or bought. The aspect was a part of there life that they earned. When two names fought it was two stories clashing.

We as the readers can reflect on the epic emboldened letters when Hakram learned Stand or Sabbah learning Obey(epic) wonder how the heroes/villains gained there aspect.

I am selfish in these opinions, I will continue to read and vote but the story has lost a bit of the spark that enthralled me.

Tom

"this series started with the concept of Names and how they worked. Now they're almost entirely irrelevant."

The gods Above and Below bestow Names upon individuals in a back and forth cyclical struggle that perpetuates lots of violence and suffering for all the inhabitants of Calernia. Ending the Arcadian cycle was foreshadowing for ending the cycle of violence perpetuated by the gods via Names... so I wouldn't count on Cat & co coming back into Names.

I actually liked the content post-Name for Cat more, her winter powers were pretty neat. I wouldn't mind seeing her dicking around more with Night though 😊 Actually I really liked the scenes in Keter with the elf and the horned lord... I'm hoping for more fight scenes against reality-warping characters in the future 😊

Oh yeah, the character development is good too. *cough

Zachary

Yeah, the “moving beyond Names” stuff is an important part of the narrative. Names are bestowed by Above/Below, so it stands to reason that the only way to potentially “break the cycle” is for people outside of that framework to act.

daegone823

I would believe that if Cat had not just appointed a new god. Or if her only endgame against the Dead King/hidden horror was to bottle him up. Cat’s goals were always centered in Calow she uses any means necessary for victory.

If the author chose she would employ heroic or even villainous characters to do her bidding.

I’m just saying narrative may have been moving against names that existed as absolute evil or good but maybe new names can rise. Ones that embody the new regime ignoring morality.

Unless of course the goal is a peaceful circle of people holding hands. The only way the gods lose is if there is no conflict. This names will always be bestowed onto either side of a conflict.

Azure

I agree. The conversation with Vivienne not being fleshed out robs us as readers. Like why would so little detail be provided about a conversation between two of the Woe who haven’t seen each other in nearly a year. It feels like Vivienne is no longer important or worth investing in as she’s just glossed over. Honestly I love this story but I’ve been finding it increasingly easy to wait for the next update. The Everdark portion dragged out way too long, and now Catherine is turning into somebody I don’t really like. And the glossing over of conversations with characters that have been missing from the narrative just makes me lose interest. I might take a break and come back in a few months. Maybe saving up to read several chapters at once will help with the frustration of seeing so little information provided in each part.

Andrew Mitchell

I think that’s a viable strategy given your feelings. I’m currently waiting until the end of Mother of Learning before I binge the last major arc.

Personally, I’m disappointed not to see that conversation with Vivienne however, I’m pretty sure EE has a very good reason for not showing us that conversation now and I trust

EE to deliver a bigger payoff later. Maybe seeing it from Vienne's perspective as an Interlude?

Jecherio

I feel that this actually makes the guide even better because it does not limit its characters to named. And if you followed up until now, you know the drawbacks of a name too. I feel this is more an evolution than anything else.

Vortex

Personally I like that they aren't just crutching on name mechanics to win every fight or execute every plan. It gives their decisions, both good and bad, a lot more weight. Catherine single handedly obliterating thousands of enemy soldiers with night goddess shenanigans isn't nearly as cool as her sitting in front of them, alone, bluffing them into stopping the charge.

Liliet

Names can't constitute the meat of the story. They're always a reflection/exaggeration of something real. Getting to see the non-exaggerated version be exactly as awesome is... good storytelling, imho.

Stormblessed

I partially agree with you. I think it would've been nice to have Cat's conversation with Viv out in the open instead of in the margins. Although I'm not sure how necessary it is, but yeah, like 90% on board there.

I disagree about the name stuff however. For one thing Cat basically has a Name even though it isn't a true Name, she's still High Priest of Night and Black Queen besides. It isn't an official one, but it's close enough for government work.

However, Viv's lack of a name is story relevant. For it explores names in the other direction. How does one lose a name? What does losing a name mean for a person? How does a group of ostensibly Named individuals fare when one of their own loses a name? These questions tie directly back to the point of the story being about Named and so Viv losing her name is a good thing there.

Fayhem

> "My opinion means very little in the end but honestly, it feels like you skipped the actually interesting conversation at the end"

I don't think that conversation got elided for the sake of a snappy closing line. I think that it was because Vivienne's full reasoning is based on plot-relevant information that the author isn't ready to divulge yet. I could be wrong ofc, but at present my expectation is the details of the conversation will come forward explicitly once knowing them will no longer undermine whatever EE is building up to. Personally, I'd guess that Viv felt the need to come to Iserre with a major force bc she/the Jacks dug something up about Hierarch since who/what exactly Tyrant is aiming him at seems like the biggest or at least most mysterious Sword of Damocles hanging over everyone's plans right now. And it would make sense EE mightn't want to spoil that mystery for the sake of describing a debriefing conversation. All just guesswork of course, but it hangs together for me at least.

Matt

Hmm....I think Cat comes off as overly prideful, here – at least to some extent.

Yes, Juniper fucked up, and that needed to come out, but this level of dressing down, especially in combination with what happened last chapter, IMO makes Cat look like a jerk than anything else.

Yes, there were valid point to criticize, but it felt less like members of the Woe interacting, and more like the Queen yelling at her retainers – which, while is kind of mentioned as being the point near the end of the chapter, only serves to make Cat less likable, IMO.

The segment with Cat saying 'I worked with her (Vivienne) to help her 'avoid' her mistakes twice' is also somewhat hilariously ironic, given how badly she messed up in the whole situation with procuring the Drow/Sve Noc, and literally gambled all of Callow's future with it. Congrats on turning Viv into a sycophant.

And that's not even taking into consideration the oath she now has no intention of keeping with Vivienne regarding killing Akua.

magesbe

Cat's mistakes and Viv's mistakes were different. Cat is saying here that if she were in Vivienne's place, she wouldn't have made those mistakes. Making your own mistakes doesn't disqualify you from being able to correct others, especially if those mistakes weren't the same (or even if they were but you learned from yours).

Also, even Hakram isn't a sycophant, and there's no member of the Woe who's ever going to be as much of a yes-man as him for Cat.

Death Knight

Not for naught is she called the Black Queen.

I don't know if you can still recall when Black SPOKE to her all the way back in Summerholm? I think many of the readers (myself included) did not like him at all when he was like that. However if the character polls are any indication, a vast majority of the readers have moved on from that. This too shall pass once the Woe is reunited and banter resumes and this chastisement is demoted to a footnote in the story of Catherine Foundling.

Mental Mouse

Note that Cat herself took serious offense to Black's Speaking to her, hardly reduced when she learns to do it herself.

Morgenstern

Actually, it was explicitly said in just the last chapter that Cat DOES still want to keep the oath. She told it to Hakram... Akua will be Akua until the Doom of Liesse has to go – but she STILL will have to go in the end, no two ways about it. Because there is absolutely nothing that can forgive what she did, she HAS to pay. That's exactly what Cat told Hakram she intends to do; him understanding and accepting that smaller change without many big words about it (much smaller in comparison to what you seem to say here, I mean; her going back on that vow – she doesn't, she fully intends to fucking keep it; Akua WILL pay – only she will pay as "Doom of Liesse", the Praesi noble she acted as, while she will be allowed to be the nicer person Akua while she is still useful/necessary, adopting, in some ways, Akua's own thoughts about being two personas – she still has only one existence and will pay with that, so Akua will pay for the noble's mistakes, too – in the end; she just gets some smaller mercy of being allowed some niceties before being killed in the end, as a reward for being nice now.. being allowed to try to balance the scales somewhat before she gets killed... Cat's oath was to kill Akua eventually, but use her beforehand for as much as her uses are worth, anyway, as just another kind of payment,, Cat is just being nicer about using her now, instead of being a sadist slaver...).

Adrian V

I like the callback to what she as a person vs the black queen need/do/feel etc, i think that while in most points they are right that the needs of the queen supercede those of the individual she is also wrong because those feeling and needs dopn't dissapear, they are just bottled up until it explodes and i think part of what happened was that, she didn't allow herself to really grieve for Nauk (ok just before the funeral maybe but the need to put it aside strained her) among other things and so we had this little eruption.

And who says she doesn't carry her own little PTSD?

medailyfun

I don't like floating notion of PTSD in comments, cause in medieval society it was more like a common background in everyone's lives, not something extraordinary that we see today.

Fayhem

I'm very curious what your supporting source is for that. Could you point me to it? It sounds like an interesting read.

medailyfun

It's really interesting topic and I recommend to carefully read at least half of the links at https://www.reddit.com/r/AskHistorians/wiki/faq/militaryhistory#wiki_post_traumatic_stress_disorder

Fayhem

AskHistorians is one of the best subs and honestly now I feel like I should have anticipated they'd have resources on that lol. Thanks for the link!

Fayhem

So I read at least the top 1-2 replies on 6 of the links pertaining to that, focusing specifically on the ones pertaining to ancient/medieval life ofc. And, uh, none of them seem to really support you?

You said that "in medieval society [PTSD] was more like a common background in everyone's lives, not something extraordinary that we see today." But the biggest common thread across the replies is "there isn't enough data to necessarily support drawing a conclusion about the prevalence or existence of PTSD as we would recognize it" which definitely is not the same thing as what you said, and the second biggest commonality was that most of them then followed that with "but here's some indicative examples that suggest PTSD may have been a real thing with serious effects in ancient life, even if they didn't conceptualize it in the same way we do in a modern/Western context". There is repeated reference to the concept that differing cultural standards meant that the commission of violence against others wasn't necessarily traumatic in the way we normally expect it to be nowadays, but that very specific aspect of what can potentially cause PTSD doesn't seem especially relevant to the question of whether it was a real thing in ancient/medieval life regardless of specific cause.

If you disagree with my interpretation of any of those threads that's your prerogative of course, but I would be interested in hearing what you're looking at that makes you see it differently. I would post the links but the last time I did that with a reddit post it plugged the entire post into my comment and idk exactly what you did differently to make that not happen. However I can at least post the titles of the threads for greater ease of reference. They were:

"Was PTSD any more, or any less, prevalent amongst ancient and medieval soldiers than today's soldiers?"

"Are there any indications of combat PTSD in societies like the Spartans, Khan's or Alexander's armies?"

"Did men of the past suffer emotional trauma from war and killing?"

"Did people in ancient/medieval times suffer from PTSD?"

"Are there any examples of PTSD in ancient wars?"

medailyfun

Your summary is sound, it was just bad phrasing on my side, I meant the medieval life in general came with so much stress and violence that things which may cause PTSD in modern environment probably would not make them flinch.

Fayhem

Mm fair enough, desensitization to violence is def a thing and so is not picking the right phrasing (as I can attest from my life as well lol). It's worth noting that is definitely not the only possible source of PTSD however, and at least based on the handful of reddit comments I just read (AKA, not actually all that much lol) it seems like that desensitization applied more to specifically the commission of violence yourself. If Cat would have PTSD about anything, I don't think anyone would argue it's because she has a problem with the violence she's committed; it would be vastly more likely to be because of the parade of horrors she's endured (e.g., the Winter-fueled nightmare marathon she suffered during the Battle of the Camps and won't discuss even with Hakram) and never really addressed in favor of pushing forward because she doesn't think she's allowed to matter to herself too much, or because of the horrors she feels she's failed to prevent (e.g. most notably the Doom of Liesse).

lennymaster

Recent discoveries indicate that PTSD may not merely be a psychological problem, but also a physical one caused by tissue damage and scarring in the brain due to side effects of medication and or vibrations caused by extremely loud noises and explosions. It may be that PTSD is not just something that was unknown until recently but that it actually was less of an issue when guns, grenades and bombs were still unknown.

One medication example would be an anesthetic that was used during the Vietnam War that has by now been proven to cause mental issues when used with loud noises around. It is still used to this day as it works very well for people who react allergically to the more common ones, but only with extreme caution.

Mental Mouse

While we've certainly learned a lot more about the various ways a human mind can be damaged by war, there are reports of similar syndromes running back to mythology. ISTR an article or book with the keywords "... and he looked into her helmet" (which is an Iliad reference).

edrey

you really know how to end the chapter, father and daughter, and they are close to meet too

Quite Possibly A Cat

So how is this ID check thing working? It really feels like it should blow up in her face.

Cat: "I feel like I'm forgetting something really important, so let's hurry."

Random Mage: "Alright, this won't hurt a bit." Stabs Cat in the heart "This was an imposter. There are many things that lead me to this conclusion, but the biggest sign is how she's bleeding and slumped over dead."

Cat's Ghost: "Sve Noc, I need a resurrection over here, stat!"

curious

I think the most important part of this chapter was Vivian saying, 'None of this counts until we confirm it's you.' Then she promptly ignored that and trotted off happy that she wasn't a Woe-reject.

This sentence, and Cat's acceptance of an AMATEUR mage inspection, all but guarantees that she will FAIL in the next chapter and that will be our weekend cliffhanger.

Cat's soul is tied in a complex way to Collar Fairy who is making a Well of Night, and Cat is constantly relying on a Staff of Night. She did not deign to explain to Hakram, Vivian, or Juniper what happened to her. They will be taken by surprise, and then their response will be unpredictable and my wager is that it will inhibit Cat at a pivotal time for the Battle of the Camps.

I wouldn't be surprised if it is Grey Pilgrim who releases her to stop the battle and direct everyone North to fight the Dead King. Or, maybe and I think more likely, she'll be summarily killed and the Drow will have zero reason to cooperate with Callow, we will have a POV shift for a few chapters and/or a Catherine stumbles through the Night nonsense chapter series about "personal development and character growth", and then Masego and/or Pilgrim will resurrect her. My strong odds is on Pilgrim being instrumental in what comes next for her. I also think Juniper and Vivian will take to heart her admonition even though it isn't HER.

Mental Mouse

Which is strange, because of all characters present, it is Viv herself who is acting least "like herself". I don't think I got this point into a prior comment, but if we hadn't had POV from her, it's Viv who I'd be suspecting of being an impostor.

And her Name-loss/breakdown still might be the result of some subtle attack from Malicia and/or Pilgrim.

RanVor

That's not strange at all. Vivienne has been dealing with a situation that was completely new to her for a year off screen. It would be far stranger if she didn't change.

Mental Mouse

It's not her change that's the strange part, it's that everyone's focusing on Cat's identify, when Viv's changes are much more obvious externally.

Cat comes back and basically does the usual – saves her armies through creativity and badassery, demonstrates her usual leadership and care for Callow and the legions, knows just how to talk to everyone (seriously, has Cat ever accidentally offended someone?). Even her flying zombie horse recognizes her immediately.

And having come back, she finds that Viv has lost her Name, left Callow (taking her regency and seal with her) to launch a major military misadventure, dragged in Juniper (who arguably should have known better) on the same, and (despite being raised in the nobility) made a really drastic error of political judgement regarding her Queen. Just on these external points, it's Cat who quite reasonably could ask Viv "yeah, who are you really?" (Indeed she does kinda ask that, if not "that way" and with her own plans in the background.)

quite possibly a cat

Viv is in the process of transitioning to the Queen of Callow. I'm not sure how much of that is intentional, and how much is unconsciously following fate, but it makes for a great story. "HAHA! It was me! I was good all along! I steal the Crown for Good!" Like she's Snape or something. Of course, it is all part of Cat's non-villainous plan, but we won't write that part down.

snark

Chekhov called. He wants his gun back.

Phoenix

The ritual meant to make sure that a foreign force isn't controlling her, not that her soul hasn't changed or that she has the power of winter. Also to call the legion mages amateurs is a bit incorrect. They aren't well versed in High Arcana magics, but rituals are something they can do given the time to learn them. The ritual will likely happen and while the results will be like "Yeah, she's who she says she is but her connection to her power seems filtered now. From the look of it, whatever is filtering her power doesn't control her but I don't know what it is." Which will lead to Cat actually catching everyone (close officers/seniors) up with what happened in the Underdark and what not.

Mental Mouse

You may have undue faith in the sophistication of their ritual, especially when dealing with a new and unknown power. Unfortunately, they likely will be able to determine "oh, she has a mortal body instead of a Winter construct now" – that seems pretty basic.

Mental Mouse

We already had the "character growth in the Night" sequence, so I don't think EE will repeat that. But yeah, Cat's complete change in metaphysical status is a major issue for next chapter.

That said, I'd assume she remembers all the passwords and countersigns, such as the one that tripped up Akua when she tried the possession bit.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately Sve Noc is a Dark power....

Jesse Coombs

I find it odd everyone is saying Viv has no name. Every time we see Lady-Regent, or Lady, it is capitalised. Admittedly so are things like Marshal and Warlord, and Marshal isn't a name. But it could indicate that she has transitioned into a 'ruler' type name. Which is what Cat wants/needs; a replacement for herself as Queen.

matesbe

I mean, it's possible that Viv has a Name and is just sneaking it by everyone... but I don't think it's likely. People with Names can usually tell if someone else has one, unless it's a stealth type name or they're inexperienced.

Jesse Coombs

IIR no named has 'sensed' Scribe.

matesbe

Scribe's Role is an "out of sight, out of mind" thing where she manages affairs behind the scenes. It's actually a pretty stealthy role, just not one that involves actual, personal infiltration.

Mental Mouse

Viv's own psychological condition is the surest tell that she has no replacement Name. Yet, caolimhinh

Interesting chapter.

I still think this campaign was a solid military choice, despite the failures and costs of it (although that was due to unforeseeable factors and probably Narratively enforced by Creation).

I agree that the attempt to escort Cat away to test her was bad idea to do it in front of soldiers, now that is confirmed that the identity verification needs a ritual site to carry instead of a quick inspection. I kinda expected more from those mages (not that they would be anywhere near Masego's level, but at least they could have things ready or an artifact for the test to be done quickly if it was gonna be done in public), they really need better training, no wonder Cat was so angry that they wanted to carry that right away.

Vivienne's self-pity is past the point of annoying, I thought she was over that depression state. Now I understand why she participated in the campaign when she obviously belongs to the city managing the Kingdom of Callow: she wanted to prove she isn't worthless now that she lost her Name, she is afraid that being Nameless she would be thrown out of the Woe. Hopefully, Viv will get over that soon and either gain a new Name or learn to live without it without feeling like trash.

So, next chapter will be the preparation for the battle and end in Cliffhanger when the battle starts? Will be nice to see Pilgrim's reaction when he looks at Cat once again, and hopefully Cat won't let his words affect her again like the 'you affect those around you' that haunt her across Book 4. If she is going to pretend to be mature and thinking of everyone below her age as kids then she better start acting mature and not let that old man brainwash her into doubting everything again.

Typos found:

- when my delaying my return/ me delaying OR the delaying of my return
- I reasons to be furious / I had reasons
- do you believe Adjutant the Lady-Regent interfered / Adjutant or the Lady-Regent
- she had grown in the year I'd seen her / I hadn't seen her
- I regretted ordering her to put her down / put it down
- need not be so humiliating / didn't need to be OR needed not be
- explain your how you used them / explain yourself how you used them OR eliminate the 'your'

Mental Mouse

Another typo: ..."prepare the ritual," I said. "Discretely." / Discreetly.

IDKWhoitis

Admittedly, I would have preferred for Vivs reprimand to be longer or more complete in detail. But within the scope that after donning her Black Queen Mask, and realizing she is the mirror image of Black, it does make sense that her mind would lose a little focus and heat.

I like the confirmation that part of that anger was about the optics of Power within the Army of Callow, and that even with a mailed fist raised and bloodied, Cat is willing to put fear to rest within her friends.

She was mean, she was partly cruel, but ultimately it was necessary to be the Black Queen, not Cat for once.

I wonder if Procer will retreat in full, deciding that fighting Cat really isn't in her best interest. It's one thing to fight the Army of Callow in the fullness of its glory. It's an entirely different thing to try to survive it with Cat at the helm. And we know they fear her.

imagesbe

I think the Princess in charge might want to retreat, but this battle is a dead wringer for being the fight that will one day be called "The Prince's Graveyard." So there's probably going to be a fight.

Andrew Mitchell

They're not going to retreat until they've got at least a little more blood. Remember that Malanza is going to get convicted of treason if she doesn't fight. The First Prince has already had that vote passed in the Highest Assembly.

HardcoreHeathen

I'm confused about why the conversation with Vivienne was skipped over in summary instead of the one with Juniper.

You spent the last five or so chapters building up this meeting. Teasing questions about what Vivienne was up here, what happened to her Name, could she still be trusted, and so on. That's roughly twenty thousand words of expectation-building, the result of which was a somewhat whiny paragraph that completely failed to meet my expectations.

This is not a new issue. Erratic, you have a long-standing habit of hyping up events and then skipping them. It makes it very difficult to follow the emotional thread of the story, because there are quite literally beats that are simply missing. As a result of this chapter – of the conversation between Cat and Viv – I'm no clearer on any of the questions I had when I started the chapter, and I've gained no new information to offset that.

I understand that you don't have unlimited time to devote to every issue, but of the two conversations in that tent, the one with Juniper was clearly the one of lesser importance. To put this into perspective, I'll use another example that most people have read: Harry Potter and the Philosopher's Stone. About twenty thousand words after the concept of Hogwarts Houses is introduced, Harry gets Sorted.

There's emotional weight to the scene. Time was spent building it up. And when the scene arrived, it was used as a vehicle for worldbuilding and character revelation.

You don't get to have your narrative cake and eat it, too – if you hype up an event, you have to spend words on it. Otherwise it's just a confusing misstep that distracts from whatever else you're trying to do.

--==--==--

Alright, with structural criticism out of the way: I really liked Cat's explanation for why she got so mad about the goon squad, and what it would have looked like if she'd gone along with being "arrested." It's neat to see that her perception's grown, though I'm a bit surprised that Vivienne – who has displayed an otherwise excellent political grasp – did not see it.

Andrew Mitchell

Personally, I'm disappointed not to see that conversation with Vivienne however, I'm pretty sure EE has a very good reason for not showing us that conversation now and I trust EE to deliver a bigger payoff later. Maybe seeing it from Vienne's perspective as an Interlude?

Skaddx

I agree also I find it weird Cat is like I don't want to be biased so Juniper is getting a Court Martial by other Generals. Meanwhile Viv here is getting no punishment at all. How does that not look like Cat is either Biased to the Woe or Biased to Humans in general or Callowans specifically. If Juniper had so no I don't want to leave Callow it doesn't matter cause Viv and Hakram can overrule her. So Juniper gets to shoulder all the blame while Viv escapes by making a sad face.

Javvies

Ehhhh ... the tribunal is probably something that's relatively standard procedure for the new-model Legions of Terror that got carried over to the Army of Callow. Though, admittedly, it's probably usually lower ranked officers that go up in front of one, since it is relatively unusual for senior officers to be personally involved in major screwups, whereas junior officers get sent out with smaller detachments and get into trouble way more often than their bosses in the command tents.

It's relatively standard procedure even in the real world – when a military commander is in charge of an operation that goes sideways, it gets put under review to determine whether things going sideways is because they had a bad/unrealistic plan or didn't react appropriately to changing conditions, or because of things beyond their control and/or knowledge.

Viv, on the other hand, is not part of the Legions or Army of Callow. There's no procedural review board for someone in her position.

The only people who could mean such a board are likely Cat, Hakram, Scribe, and Amadeus. And Hakram's disqualified for standing in review of Viv's actions because he was (presumably) deeply involved in the process that led to them being taken.

Amadeus is who knows where, as is Scribe, not that being taken to task for her mistakes by either is something that should go over well with Viv.

Mental Mouse

"The only people who could mean such a board..." Amadeus and Scribe don't belong on that list. They are agents (and movers) of Praes, and are not part of the power structure in Callow.

Mental Mouse

The confrontation with Juniper was more apropos now, for this chapter – precisely because they're on (or fresh off) a battlefield.

However, Viv's Nameloss is about to become much more relevant, when the mage party (and Woe) realize that Cat is no longer a creature of Winter, and indeed has a connection with a whole new power they've never encountered before.

broadaxe

Why are you guys saying cat is a fuck up, or that she makes a lot of mistakes? That's wrong, i mean yes, she does make mistakes, BUT a lot of what she does could look like mistakes but simply isn't. Cat is story savvy and knows she has to loose to win, so a lot of her 'mistakes' are semi on purpose because that is how the story will turn out in her favor :3

fbt

i thought this was brilliant, and Cat earned a lot of respect from me for her adult behavior here. she has, rather often in the past, made apparerently idiotic and impulsive moves, survived by luck, and been..well. She started out plucky, got powerful, and then lost most of both of those attributes imho. Here she convinced me she not only could be a decent ruler (despite her own thoughts on that) but already is one. At times it has been hard to root for her..but not here. go Cat! 😊

Sugar Roll

Agreed. This was an opportunity to teach some hard but necessary lessons and it was done brilliantly IMO. She just came back with fifty thousand Drows and a fat stash of Dwarven gold and she comes home to an impending catastrophe? She had to save each piece of the army of Callow to get out of the mess. She's well within her rights to be angry which she conveyed in a way where Juniper, Hune, and Vivienne can learn from. Feelings were probably hurt but they would be stronger for it and Callow would benefit as a whole.

Valkyria

Well. Interesting chapter.

Cat stopped just being just angry and throwing around her thoughts but calmed herself and acted in a mostly adult way.

I read how some comments say that it is not Juniper's fault the campaign was a blunder and she should not be punished for it. My opinion to this is that, even if it is not her fault and she had good reasons for acting the way she did, somebody has to be held accountable for the blunder it ultimately resulted in. Since she holds the military power of Callow, that naturally is to be her role.

Even in our time and age the one giving out the orders is the one who is responsible if the situation goes haywire and they "fuck up". I think it is entirely reasonable for Cat to be holding that tribunal. Also she said she will not be present or influence it in any way, because it is not personal and only the military facts matter.

I don't believe it is Juniper's fault, although I think there are certain facts that she could have taken into account (the gates not working, etc.) when creating the plan, but, as I said, somebody has to be responsible and since it were her orders and it's her military as long as Cat's gone, she's got to own that.

As to Vivienne... she's still the scared cat she was when we last saw her, and even though Hakram lost a hand she seems as insecure and whiny as ever...

It seems like she gets off with more of a slap on the wrist. But I think Cat acknowledging her success instead of dressing her down like Juniper actually was a good decision. Of course there was a talk that we did not hear (sadly, because I guess we would get a very good glimpse on how Viv's mental state and general behaviour is right now, as well as there being the possibility of development. At the moment it seems to me she didn't change at all), so Cat has probably scolded her as well.

She did a lot of useful stuff during her regency but if she doesn't change that attitude she has right now... I don't think she'll achieve much Name-wise or in general.

Tolk

Love the chapter, it's a well done dressing down. But...

[Quote] some part of me was almost disgusted at the glints of gratitude and respect I caught in her gaze when she looked at me. Like I'd not, as lovingly as callously, burned her with shame and bound her with affection so that Vivienne Dartwick would be one step closer to the woman I needed her to be. [/Quote]

Huh? Cat? Why are you feeling disgusted by scolding poor behaviour and providing constructive criticism? You even praised her good decisions, and entrusted her with that position of power in the first place! What's disgusting about helping your friend improve themselves?

Andrew Mitchell

IMO Cat's disgusted at herself for manipulating Viv (into the woman Cat needs her to be) rather than being as clear and direct with Viv as she (Cat) was with the Hellhound. We haven't seen the conversation yet so I'm not sure, but that's how I interpreted the part you quoted.

Mental Mouse

Because Cat still isn't too sure on her feet for this "command and management" business.

To casual appearance, Viv is acting like a dog who gets kicked, and responds by cringing and trying to lick the master's hand. Despite the smackdown being appropriate and necessary, Cat's still uncomfortable with having to whip people into shape, and especially her friends.

Liliet

Cat is uncomfortable with having as much power/control over Vivienne emotionally as she's been realizing she has. Vivienne values her approval and trusts her a lot more than Cat had realized previously, and that makes her feel off-balance, because she'd planned on Vivi being her double-check, someone like Juniper, unafraid to challenge her and indifferent to her disapproval.

Author Unknown

I think Juniper got off too easy.

"deploying forty thousand legionaries through magical means of ingress and egress in the single most Name-infested region of this continent"

The key part being Name-infested. Not taking into account the effect of Named and Narrative on her deployments was fine when she was still in the War College, but out here in the real world, she has to take such factors into account or end up annihilated. She will never be a great General if she doesn't learn this lesson, and certainly shouldn't be Marshal of Callow until she does. Not unless she had someone like Cat around to advise her on those factors.

Expecting fancy magical means of attacking and retreating to work when you are Evil and attacking Good is a mistake.

Expecting superior numbers to work in the face of Named is a mistake.

Expecting to waltz through the 'most Name-infested region of this continent' when she only has Adjunct, a support character, to help is a mistake.

Mental Mouse

As Cat notes, she doesn't expect political acumen, or story-fu, from Juniper. (But yes, there are limits.) Juniper may be a brilliant commander, but it's Cat herself who brings the game-changing creativity to the fights.

medailyfun

Where is Scribe?

Javvies

Most likely, either in disguise/hiding in Grem's contingent, or detached from the Legions/Army of Callow and trying to figure out how to retrieve/rescue Amadeus.

I find the latter more likely than the former, however.

Aotrs Commander

"Looking at a mess and knowing that loving those responsible was one thing but exempting them from consequence another."

That's called being a leader, Cat.

Also, you can stop beating yourself up over manipulating Viv, because you're kinda blinding yourself to the fact that, yes, Black might have done it that way, but that's because, you know, that's how you be a good leader (or even teacher come to that; or even parent, let's be honest), and that has nothing whatsoever to do with alignment.

Black didn't work like that because it was Evil manipulative pragmatism (though in his case, that was likely an element), he did it because that's actually how you do it properly. Someone under your authority (be they servants, children, students or soldiers) fracks up, you bollock them for it (at the appropriate level), and once the bollocking is over and consequences have been dealt with, you drop it and move on. (See also Grand Admiral Thrawn on the one hand, or I dunno, Captain Picard on the other.)

Neither screaming "I am surrounded by idiots, you have failed me for the last time!" or going "ooh, you shouldn't have done that, oh well, never mind" was the appropriate response; Cat did exactly what she should have done.

Myself? I think Juniper made entirely the wrong call; it wasn't worth risking the entire army of Callow for the remaining legionaries, especially bringing the regent along. By the time they get out of this mess, they'll have lost more troops, I think, that they were to save.

If they had wanted to save the Legions, they would have been better, I think, before Cat went off, so have simply had Masego locate them (if they needed to) and fairy-gated them out quickly and quietly. And if THAT was too much of a risk, then they needed to have been written off, as unfortunate as that was. (Honestly, Black taking them off marauding in the first place I thought was a bit dubious.)

Mental Mouse

"Black didn't work like that because it was Evil manipulative pragmatism [...], he did it because that's actually how you do it properly. "

QFT. But IIRC, Masego was already unavailable (working on that city) before this mess kicked off. Also, Black's taking the legions marauding may have been some complex scheme, perhaps partly to make sure that those legions were not available to Malicia. Unfortunately, that scheme is clearly off the rails, we'll have to see what he comes up with next.

superkeaton

Aw man, I would have actually liked to have heard Viv's reasoning

Fayhem

A fair few people have responded to the complaints about Cat berating Juniper/Vivienne excessively and made some good points. I just wanted to post a comment that I felt would bring those together in one place. To wit:

"Command takes responsibility" is a fundamental principle of leadership. "Nobody could have predicted" doesn't cut it, especially when in reality it's more like "nobody did predict"; when a decision goes wrong then the person or persons furthest up the chain of command who were involved in making the decision need to own that. That is not in ANY way something Cat excuses herself from. Even though she was not in any way directly responsible for it and “couldn’t have predicted” the specifics of how it happened, the Doom of Liesse happened when Cat was in charge and she spent pretty much the whole of Book IV owning that so fully that half the fandom was complaining about her overdoing it. She isn’t being “unfair”, she’s holding Juniper and Vivienne to the exact same standard she holds herself to. The consistent application of the same standards to everyone is if anything the definition of fair.

Liliet

Yep. This is the right way to do it, that you’d need good reason to reject. “It was magic”, “I fucked up worse”, “they are my friends” all aren’t good reasons. And I want to specifically focus on that second one, because this isn’t a game of gotcha or a competition. If Cat and Juniper both fucked up, it doesn’t cancel out.

benthelynx

This chapter was a significant improvement on last in my opinion.

Daniel E

The Wild Hunt is still in play. I wonder if the promise of ‘Seven crowns plus one’ is still valid now that Winter as a unique power has ended. Perhaps said crowns will tie into the Prince’s Graveyard somehow.

Mental Mouse

IIRC that was specifically “seven mortal crowns plus one”, which is remarkably suggestive. That plus-one might well be for the Duke of Nightfall himself.

Mennolt van Alten

How can I follow this story? The Subscribe button brings me to a wall of text page.

Valkyria

You should have a wordpress account, you can just add it to your reader if you do.

Mental Mouse

Just stumbled across this – not directly related to the story, but relevant to the milieu:

a href="https://www.reddit.com/r/AskHistorians/comments/19zi6j/when_did_kingsmembers_of_the_royal_family_stop/c8srqq7/">When did kings/members of the royal family stop leading armies on the battlefield?

Satan

Guve her that Stockholm Syndrome. She may be more human now, but who knows if it's a better human.

Zachary

On a re-read it's a little strange how Catherine actually seems way angrier after losing Winter. Seems like it would be the opposite. Not so much because of this specific incident, but the weirdest one was when she wanted to slaughter the Helike prisoners, which was pretty uncharacteristic (and Hakram even commented on it).

I mention it being a re-read, because the first time around my main take-away was colored by the latter parts of this Book, which generally involve Catherine forming more positive connections to some of the heroes and rescuing Masego.

Zachary

It's also kinda funny in retrospect that the whole point of Catherine's trips to Keter and the Everdark ended up being kinda pointless, since it never ended up being necessary to repel the Crusade. If she had stayed in Callow, she could have navigated all this stuff better and possibly negotiated something in the wake of the Dead King's invasion.

It ended up working out because she gained the drow, but that was largely due to luck (that Sve Noc was actually receptive to an alliance).

Chapter 24: Theft

"Wisdom is a tower built of failure and rue."
– Ashuran saying

It wasn't even an hour before the Third Army's banners hung above the hills that were now to my east instead of west.

"Like kicking an anthill," Vivienne said, eyes gazing far ahead.

She wasn't wrong. We were looking at the same thing, I thought, but my sight was better than hers. A sliver of Night had seen to that. General Abigail had grasped my meaning deeper than I'd thought, it seemed. I'd told her to fly the Fourth Army's banner as well as her own for a reason, namely to imply much greater numbers in the hills than there actually were. The Summerholm girl had gone a step further than what I'd instructed and thinned her lines to an almost reckless extent: from the perspective of the Alliance soldiers in the plains below, it must look like there were at least twenty thousand fresh soldiers anchoring our left flank. Actually fighting with lines so thin would be disastrous, but it was a calculated risk. Even if the enemy suddenly marched on her she should have just enough time to redeploy before the fight began.

"Hakram's force will be revealed soon enough," I said. "That ought to pressure them into a full withdrawal."

"Wouldn't it have been quicker to send the entire host into the hills?" Vivienne asked.

Her tone was curious, not critical, and the expectation in her voice that she would be answered was almost as irritating as it was pleasing. Barely a quarter bell had passed since I'd chewed her out, and already she was back on old footing. I was glad of the confidence, I really was, and well aware it was petty of me to be irked that my displeasure hadn't left deeper marks. But Vivienne had once called me petty when speaking to Akua, unaware I was listening in, and like a lot of what she'd said that night there'd been more than a grain of truth to it.

"It would have," I agreed. "On the other hand, it also risked a standoff. They'd have been left to mass their entire army largely in peace, and we to establish a common line facing them. Two large coalition armies looking at each other over a fence, hands on swords. A lot sharper if I ever saw one. No, I want them to retreat. To give us space."

And the flanking manoeuvre by General Rumena and General Bagram, under the steady hand of Adjutant, should do the trick. When I'd been up in the sky riding Zombie, I'd had a decent look at the enemy forces on the march as well as those already fighting. The western army – the mixed Dominion and Procer force that Princess Rozala was part of – had been marching on Juniper from the north, which had logistical implications. Iserre had been stripped bare of anything edible, which meant Malanza and her allies were running on what supplies they could either carry with them or get flowing from further north. Given the size of the western army, which at a glance I'd put at more than sixty thousand strong, without a steady flow of foodstuffs they'd start burning through their stocks at a prodigious rate. The amount of men might have been manageable, but the horses? I very much doubted they could afford to keep that many war horses for long without fresh supplies coming in. Besides, the northern campaign had taught me much of how Procer handled its supply trains. In a word, badly. It came from the way their armies were put together, in my opinion, more than any inferiority of intellect compared to the architects of the Reforms in Praes.

Instead of a unified army directly under the Tower – or, these days, me – Proceran forces were raised from the personal troops of rulers, hired fantassins and mass levies. The personal troops were trained, equipped and fed by the prince who fielded them, which was a costly thing even in peace time. That meant, as a rule, that princes and princesses of Procer had kept personal armies around the same size as those of the Old Kingdom's nobles while being both significantly richer and ruling lands both larger and more heavily populated. Proceran logistics, as they currently stood, were well-versed in keeping forces that size fed and well-equipped. The rub came when the armies grew larger, which meant bringing in fantassins or levies. The mercenary companies were usually only hired for as long as they were needed then cut loose, meaning there'd never been a need to develop a system to feed larger forces for long. As for the levies, well, like everywhere else in the world they were handed the bare minimum in food and arms before being sent into the grinder. Those larger armies were usually fighting on enemy territory, too, where 'foraging' – a pretty word for armed robbery – could be used to fill up the stocks.

In this particular case though, the western army was stuck in a principality already picked clean and a whole chunk of foreign Levantine troops whose personal supplies had to be running dangerously low after chasing Grem and Juniper for so long. When Hakram appeared further north with a large force, threatening to cut off their supply lines, they'd be forced to either prepare for battle or withdraw. Considering we'd have them both half-encircled and severely outnumbered, battle would not be an attractive choice. Unless heroes were involved, I thought. Which they very well might be. For all the earthly considerations pointing at why fighting us here would be a terrible idea, there was a reason I'd ordered Juniper to prepare for a fight.

"Diplomacy, then," Vivienne said, breaking my long silence.

"In a manner of speaking," I grunted. "Princess Rozala made it clear her side wants the heads of the Legions on spikes. That's not happening, so I'll be removing the issue from the table: come nightfall, if they've withdrawn then our entire coalition is gating out of here."

"Tactical offence, to allow for a strategic defence," she mused.

She half-turned to me, the azure blue cloak she'd donned when leaving the pavilion tight around her shoulders.

"And you're not afraid without the blade at their throat they won't consider bargaining?" Vivienne asked. "The truce offer I extended to Hasenbach was refused even when it looked like we had the advantage in Iserre."

"I think with us reappearing somewhere in Arans, with supplied coming in through the northern passage and a comfortably defensible position, the First Prince will have to consider how far she can afford to push us," I frankly said. "More importantly, with us gone and the two Grand Alliance armies in Iserre within a week's march of each other the League is either going to retreat or take a beating."

"Both would be dangerous to Procer," Vivienne noted. "A retreat means they have to keep armies south to pursue. A victory on the field might prove more costly than the war to the north can afford."

"If Kairos intended to collapse Procer, he would have already done it," I said. "He wouldn't have come through the Waning Woods, either. The League armies would have battered through Hasenbach's border army in Tenerife and begun occupying southern principalities. Feasibly they could have occupied Tenerife and Salamans without getting much more of a fight, then dug in for the long term. After that..."

"All it'd take was raids into the bordering principalities for those royals to try withdrawing their troops from the north and march back to defend their lands," Vivienne softly agreed. "If Hasenbach tried to go after them through the Highest Assembly, it might lead to civil war. If she did nothing, the Dead King would likely eat the north."

"Instead he surprised us all and marched out of the Waning Woods to cut into this dance," I said. "No, he's after something from the mess in Iserre and it's not hammering nails in the Principate's coffin."

"It would not be territorial concessions, or anything monetary," Vivienne frowned. "There would have been better, easier ways to force those."

"He's a villain of the old breed," I said. "Ink on parchment isn't what he's after. I met with him, in Rochelant, and he hinted Hasenbach has been dredging something dangerous out of Lake Artoise."

"He is a liar, as you reminded me rather sharply," she said.

I'd not been pleased to hear she'd been trading information with Kairos, to say the last. It was one thing to do what I had, haggle an alliance of convenience against the Wandering Bard after trading secrets. It was another entirely to pass him detailed assessments of the Dominion's armies, even if the payment was useful word out of Salia and the north. While I'd understood that the Jacks were still too young an organization to have penetrated deep into Procer, and certainly to have a way to pass along regular reports given the mess the Principate was in right now, relying on the Tyrant for anything meant you were getting played. If I had to guess, he'd making little deals like that with everyone he could: offering piece for piece, and ensuring he alone had a bird's eye view of what was taking place in Iserre. I was finding it worrisome Kairos had been interested in details about the Dominion armies, too. It could be another layer of deception, sure, but it might also mean he believed he would be fighting them in the future. Or that he was selling that information to the Dead King, I acknowledged with a grimace. There weren't a lot of things I'd put past Kairos Theodosian.

"Oh, there's something happening there," I said. "That much I don't doubt. But I don't necessarily think it's whatever trouble she's brewing that interests him. Or even her in particular, to be honest – this campaign, the First Prince herself, I think they're means to an end."

"That end being?" Vivienne asked.

"I don't know yet," I admitted. "But if he's willing to launch an entire invasion in the middle of war against Keter just to get leverage on Cordelia Hasenbach, it's not going to be a trifle."

"The man needs to die," Vivienne said. "The Hierarch as well. They're too unpredictable, Catherine. If they start swinging at the wrong moment, the consequences could be... wide-reaching, to say the least."

"I'm sure Cordelia thinks the same thing," I said. "And that's why he's made himself so very costly to remove from the board."

Strategic offence, I thought with rueful amusement, paired with tactical defence. Mad or not, I had to concede that the villain king of Helike was viciously cunning. The more the western and eastern coalitions fought without him being involved, the more reluctant they grew to engage his fresher forces. The only way out of that downwards spiral, as far as I could see, was to withdraw my forces from Iserre and let him face the storm he'd stirred without my standing shield for him. In the distance I could see Malanza's vanguard fully withdrawing from the battlefield. Even the Levantine horse that'd baited the Order of Broken Bells into chasing them all the way to irrelevance had pulled away, and now Grandmaster Talbot's knights were sheepishly riding back to camp. I'd let Juniper handle the reprimand for that, I decided. It had been her battle, even if she'd been losing it. It'd also make it clear to the high officers that she still held command even after my taking her to task.

"You haven't asked," Vivienne suddenly said.

"Asked what?" I replied.

"If I still have a Name," she said.

I glanced at her.

"I know you don't," I said. "Yours had a subtle weight, but even that is gone."

"Then you haven't asked why," she said, then blue-grey eyes narrowed. "Unless Adjutant told you."

"He didn't," I told her. "Or even explain why someone's going to end up calling him Hakram Handless, for that matter."

"And you're not worried in the slightest?" Vivienne asked, tone inscrutable. "Gods, even just curious?"

"It's a strange horse to ride, a Name," I said. "Black said it was willpower that got you on the saddle, and I don't entirely disagree with him, but I think that's only part of it."

I looked into the distance, at the Alliance host retreating into the second part of the trap I'd laid. It was a kindness that was due, not to look at her while speaking this.

"It's a recognition that you're trying to do something," I said. "William wanted to kill his way out of Praesi rule. Akua wanted to bind everyone else. Indrani wants to pass through life unhindered. Whatever it is you're after the Name makes you better at doing it, I won't argue that. But you don't get a Name unless you're already good at it, Vivienne."

I cleared my throat.

"So I'll answer the question you didn't ask: no, you're not getting tossed out on your ass because you can't steal the sun anymore. That's a trick. The important parts came before you were the Thief, and that hasn't gone anywhere."

Vivienne let out a shuddering breath.

"How is it," she quietly said, "that you always know exactly the right thing to say?"

The urge was there to pull away with levity, draw attention to my admittedly chequered diplomatic record, but I didn't follow it. It would have been cheapening the sincerity of the moment, and wouldn't that defeat the point of having it in the first place? So instead I said nothing, for lack of anything to say, and let silence stretch.

"The Empire killed my mother," she murmured. "Did you know that?"

My fingers clenched.

"Not for sure," I said. "But I suspected."

The moment I'd learned her last name was Dartwick, looking into her past had become a great deal easier. Out of courtesy I'd not dug too deep, but I'd had a look anyway. Her father had been a baron before the Conquest, vassal to the Count of Southpool but her family had remained rather obscure in the years that followed. There'd been a bit of interest in her father after he was widowed, before the man made it clear he would not remarry, but it'd died down quick after he did. That'd gotten me curious enough to look into the mother, and my brow had risen when I found out she'd died in a hunting accident not long after the Conquest. It could have been an actual accident, I knew. But in the early days of Praesi occupation, more than a few Imperial governors had arranged 'hunting accidents' when they were inclined to discretely put down rebellious elements.

"I say the Empire, Catherine, because it makes no difference who gave the order," Vivienne admitted. "The decision came from Governor Chuma, though he's long dead. Some might say it was in truth her fault, for joining a rebel cabal. That she knew the risks. Others might argue that whatever hired hand did it was the killer in every sense. But it's never quite that simple, is it?"

I stayed silent. The question had not been meant for me to answer.

"I think I understood that even as a child," Vivienne pensively said. "That is was larger than just my mother and the governor. That it was about Praes, what it was doing to us. The way it was doing it to us. Chuma, you see, he was one of the light-handed governors. Didn't hang whole families, only the rebels themselves. The rest got off with a fine."

Different Imperial governors, I thought, had taught us different lessons. Vivienne had been taught that we were cattle, to be sheared when laden and beaten when unruly. Less than human, in the Empire's eyes, but not to be hurt without reason. Mazus, though, Mazus had not been interested in such a civilized arrangement. He'd been a looter in silk clothes, a noble in nothing but the ugliest ways that word could be meant. From him I'd learned that no one in power would ever be fair unless you made them. Vivienne had tried to claw back some pride with her thefts. I'd tried to murder my way into authority with a sword.

"I started stealing to even the scales, though I knew coin would never be the right measure for that," she said. "I kept stealing because they deserved it. Because every time I took from them they got a taste of loss. Of what they were doing to all of us."

"And then they warned you off," I said.

"Assassin," she acknowledged. "A small cut on my father's throat, and I stayed my hand. But he'd passed when William raised the banner and the anger was still in my stomach."

"And it isn't anymore?" I quietly asked.

"You killed him," Vivienne said, evading the question. "But what did that change? They'd been killing us for years before I was ever born. Truth be told I think it was Laure that did it."

"When we spoke," I said. "In the palace."

"It wasn't the words, Catherine," she said. "You can have a silver tongue, now and then, but I did not trust you an inch back then. It was how tired you were. I'd seen you go from victory to victory, but that night you didn't act like you were winning."

"I wasn't," I frankly said. "And there were greater disasters on the horizon."

"You were fighting for Callow," Vivienne acknowledged. "But that was the detail that took me so long time to understand even after joining. We weren't talking about the same thing when using that word. Because for you it also meant the Fifteenth. It mean the goblin tribe in Marchford. It meant everyone willing to live under the laws, to pay their taxes and stand on the wall when the horn sounds."

"They are Callowans, Vivienne," I said. "I won't ignore what was the best of us, in the old days, but we can't just-"

She raised her hand to interrupt me.

"I know," she said. "I know, Catherine. And that's what killed it. Because I would look at Hakram, at Masego and Ratface and especially the goblins and I would wait for them to be the enemy. Because they'd always been, because that was what the Conquest meant. But then they kept faith, Cat. They died, and they died for you but not just that. Also because they were serving something they believed in. And that scared me, because if they weren't the enemy then what had I been fighting all these years?"

The Tower, I wanted to say. The High Lords. What made all of us this way, heroes and villains and the ever-spreading graveyard between. But this wasn't my moment, it was hers, and so I kept to silence once more.

"My Name was already thinning by then," Vivienne said. "Sometimes it wouldn't work as it used to. Sometimes I couldn't feel it at all. And when my hair began to grow again, I was terrified. Because if I wasn't even the Thief anymore, then what use was I?"

I saw her fingers clench.

"I nearly did some very foolish things," she said. "But Hakram cut off his hand, and if nothing else that stayed mine. And it forced me to see, Catherine, because in the months following that night I did the most good for my homeland I ever have and not a single speck of it involved theft."

She let out a breathless laugh, though it was more mockery of herself than mirth.

"I wasn't angry anymore, Cat," she said. "Or at least, not at the same people or for the same reasons. Mostly I was afraid. And the more I tried to pretend I was still fifteen and collecting my mother's dues from something that no longer existed, the more I missed the point: that I was a child, when I became the Thief, and it was a child's anger I was still heeding."

I watched her and found regret painted on her face, though a soft and thoughtful manner of it.

"But you weren't a child anymore," I said.

"And so I was no longer the Thief," Vivienne softly agreed. "Because I've learned that just taking from the enemy won't change anything. That we'll need more than that, to change the world, and that's what I want to do most of all."

And so the Name had died, I thought, along with the indignation that'd birthed it. It might be that something else would come of that, but she would never again be the Thief. The girl who had become her no longer existed: she'd been outgrown by the woman standing at my side. Vivienne Dartwick's eyes were clear, I saw, and her back straight. In the afternoon's light, cloaked in blue and hair braided like a fair crown, she seemed almost regal. I hoped, truly, that no Name came of this. The Liesse Accords, as written, would bar any and all Named from being rulers. And it was early days yet, I knew that, and it was not a decision to be made in haste.

But Vivienne Dartwick had just talked herself into being the foremost heiress-candidate to the throne of Callow.

matesbe

Well for people who wanted more insight into Vivienne... here you are. Wow.

matesbe

Also, for maybe the first time I actually got first comment. My closest previous attempt landed me being less than a minute too slow.

naturalnuke

I'm, glad, I think. It's a nice change for her, a good change, she's been riding that hate since we first saw her, and it's nice to see those jagged edges break off somewhat.

usernamebco

It makes me dislike her less.

She was kind of a nonentity until she got her POV chapters, occasionally useful but mostly an immature burden. Then we had the chapter that culminated with Hakram cutting off his hand to placate her insecurities and that did her no favors in my eyes. Yes, they had a chat and he threatened to kill her if she was a threat to Cat. She was a boiling mass of barely concealed hostility who took potshots at everything they did without deigning to provide any alternatives besides "crawl in a hole and die, villain."

If she'd been in contact with the criminal element as much as her Name suggested, she'd realize that fighting words will eventually get you into a fight. Either fight back, run away, or stop poking the bear. Don't get all shocked it lost patience with you.

Hopefully she continues to grow out of whatever this is and into a character I don't want to slap sense into.

Skaddx

SMFH...instead of real argument between Cat and ViV in the last chapter we got this...boring.

Lets get to the combat that maybe that can salvage this arc. Tyrant and Hierarch meeting was good but besides that. I have been quite bored.

Oshi

I want to disagree but all I feel is meh.

pagesbe

Wait, you thought that Cat and Viv's off-screen debate last chapter... was an argument? That wasn't an argument. That was a lecture. This was a debate, something I feel is much more interesting, and we got to learn more about Names in the process.

Frankly I found this to be one of the most interesting conversations in book 5.

imagesbe

Slight correction, this wasn't a DEBATE per say, but it was a much more interesting discussion than Cat telling Viv what she did wrong and why.

naturalnuke

We'll get back to people throwing giant beams of energy soon enough don't you worry.

I for one really enjoyed this chapter, nice read while I sit here drinking coffee, time to contemplate it all.

Matthew

This was perfect.

I like that we are going back to the triumph of bureaucracy and good governance.

ReaverOf

It's funny because it's my favorite arc by far. Killing and winning is easy in this world, it's almost cheap, but reading how the characters are living and growing in the aftermath of those bloodbaths is the real challenge that makes me hooked on this story.

I was longing for Vivienne's feelings after the hand moment and this chapter is gold for me.

To each it's own I guess.

Jecherio

I do quite agree with you. I think some readers just want mostly mindless action. The thing is, the mix is what makes the guide so good, the balance of things

Vortex

To each their own I guess. I appreciate character growth and insight more than I do yet another inconclusive battle where zombies and explosions carry the day.

Baron

I, for one, am grateful for the breather.

I know it sort of sucks to be excited for the next big fight, and what you get that week is a bunch of people talking.

Setting aside the fact that "a bunch of people talking" is my jam, what I think a lot of people miss in a serialized format like this is just how fucking fantastic ErraticErrata's pacing is.

Do you remember the first time you read this series, when you were reading at length? For me, there were times when the buildup to a moment was so well executed, I was reduced to tears of awe when the payoff hit. Hakram's first Stand comes to mind.

sengachi

I do not understand the people who comment "booooring, get back to the fighting" every time people talk.

Like, do you not understand the point of this story? The very thing they were talking about in this very chapter, that endless violence alone even in victory does not lead to success? Are you not here for the story, just the spectacle?

And if you are, I mean, okay, you've got just as much right to read and enjoy this story anyone else. But could you maybe extend some consideration to the people who are actually enjoying the story for the story and the characterization within, and let the rest of us enjoy these thoughtful, intimate moments in peace? Sure it's not your preference, but it is many people's preference and the author's preference, so maybe don't leave demotivating comments in response to something that is objectively good writing but just not your thing. That's the respectful thing to do.

Mental Mouse

I find it hilarious that no matter what EE does, there's someone in the comments dissing it. Big battle scene, someone's all "yeah yeah she kicks ass, but where's the character development". Then when he turns to character development, someone else says "booooring, I wanna see'em fight!"

Fortunately, EE does provide quite a variety in different chapters. And he does seem to understand the old truism "you can't please everybody, so you'll just have to please yourself".

Hypo

These chapters are what make this story great imo. I'm not in this for constant fights, i'd go watch a Shonen for that.

Thief of Words

Wow, you just have no decent taste whatsoever. God's below forbid we have ACTUAL CHARACTER GROWTH, instead of hollow spectacle.

Solid breather and growth measurement chapter, EE. Keep up the good work.

Novice

"We hang the petty thieves and appoint the great ones to public office." – widely attributed to Aesop

danh3107

Oh boy something we already suspected is confirmed, amazing. Double OH BOY when we learn ONE provision of the accords we still know nothing about.

Guess I'm waiting for the next chapter.

Javvies

Called it last time. Cat wants Viv to replace her.

And we learned something new about what the Accords contain.

Since this seems like a strong candidate to be the Prince's Graveyard, or whatever it was called, I'm forced to wonder ... if it's a literal graveyard, what possessed them to be quite so stupid to continue fighting ... or is it more of a metaphorical graveyard – Malanza and company deciding not to attack despite the consequences preordained for them for not pressing the attack against the Legions and the Army of Callow by the Assembly.

boballab

The reason there is imo a 80% a fight will break out is the one Cat gave: A Hero. If you will recall when Malanza got to that location where they had a meeting the Pilgrim is there and we know the Pilgrim can close gates. So even if they back off when the Fourth Army appears the plan to gate out at night will fail because of the Pilgrim. Oh and btw technically the Pilgrim is also a Prince and would probably be the +1 in Cats oath. Imagine the shock that would bring to the Bard and that idiot Saint if Cat plants him.

Here is something to consider. Is it a coincidence that the 2 villains that have beat the Bard recently just so happen to be in Procer at the time when the Bard has basically usurped Hasenbach's reign, country and crusade. Remember that the Bard admitted Kairos beat her but hastily skip over the fact she lost to Cat when talking to the Dead King, because you know of course she planned that Cat would deliberately let her head be cutoff just to come back and kill her chosen tool, beat her rival and basically bully the Heavens.

Mental Mouse

Hero or no, at this point gating the whole army away is a chancy proposition besides the prior interference, something or other seems to be brewing in Arcadia.

boballab

The thing with Arcadia is that there is no more Winter and Summer Courts and well worn repeating story since book 3. Everything is new there now and they have to find their new place.

Mental Mouse

But more specifically: IIRC, the first time Cat went through Arcadia, she didn't encounter any fae, let alone opposition. Each successive trip, she found herself closer to fae and their dwellings, until they were starting to block her way. In the course of the deal with King Winter and Queen Summer, she bargained for free passage, after which she stopped running into fae again, she could even take armies through.

Now her latest gate gets an exit right at the peak of an actual castle. Which suggests that something is going awry with her deal. Possibly to do with yes, there's no more Winter and Summer courts... and that's who she made her deals with.

boballab

Actually no her deal isn't with one or even both of the courts, she struck after the courts combined and with the Queen of Arcadia:

"The matter of boons remains," the Queen of Arcadia said, and the eyes she turned on me were burning.
"Promises must be kept."

I stood before two gods and did not kneel. I would not, in this moment, pretend this was anything but my win. That I'd bled thousands on the field, caused the death of men dear to me for anything less but utter victory.

"Upon the granting, you will have discharged your duty to me," the King said. "And so will have earned the return of your heart. What do you request of us, Duchess of Moonless Nights?"

"Of you, I request release from vassalage forevermore," I told the fae.

"I am most saddened to grant this," the dark-skinned king said.

He did not seem surprised. I turned my eyes to the queen. I would have to tread carefully, here. If I fumbled the phrasing, she'd do her best to fuck me over. The temptations lay in the back of my mind, beckoning sweetly. To go back on my deal with the Empress and request that the whole of Arcadia come together to kill Diabolist. But she's not wrong. They'll wreck the entire central plains to do it, and we'd be risking some fae influence remaining. And there was another, young but no less demanding for it. I could ask them to heal Nauk. It would be a trifle, to them. But there might be other means to save my legate. And I would never get this chance again. A heroine, I thought, would have made the right choice. The only justifiable one. But I was not a heroine, and justifications only mattered to the just.

I spoke, and betrayed a man I called my friend.

"Of you I ask permanent right of passage through Arcadia for me and all I command, uncontested and unhindered," I said, voice hollow.

Book 3 Chapter 45: Falling Action

Mental Mouse

So, it's permanent, and it shouldn't matter that Cat's no longer a fae. But the phrasing there... "All I command". Could that be why the gates went wrong while she was away in the Everdark?

Mental Mouse

Waitasec... permanent until Winter+Summer (and what would they call the combined court?) gives way to Fall/Spring, which was my original suspicion.

boballab

Imo...nope. What I think it is. is something more foundational to Arcadia. If we recall back to the beginning of that whole arc there was FOUR courts not just two, however only two were ever in existence at one time. The way it worked was that Summer and Winter would always end up in war and in the end Summer would win. With Summer's victory they would then give way to Autumn and Winter to Spring. This was the story that Cat interrupted having Winter defeat Summer and force those two courts into one. Now the question becomes what happens to the other 2 courts and the Fae that make them up. Remember the Fae do not die like mortals, they come back whole and hearty when their court comes back, hence how every time Winter came around the Prince of Nightfall got a visit from Ranger for an eye (Dude must really have screwed the pooch). So where are the Fae that make up the Autumn and Spring courts? Would they even come back now since the story is broken or does it not matter which side wins they come anyway after a loser? While pondering that remember that barging with Fae usually ends up with you getting screwed. If the Autumn/Spring courts would still come about no matter which side won then Cats agreement with the Queen wouldn't apply because she is not there anymore. With this in mind go back and re read that section and pay attention to the surroundings.

When she plunges through the gate to Arcadia she comments the Summer Sun is beating down, but is it really the Summer Sun? Why should Summer hold sway with the merger? Especially since outside of the Queen herself there was only 1 or 2 Summer nobles still alive and her entire army crushed by Cat. Or would it really be the Sun of early Autumn on a day we call Indian summer?

Hardric62

The answer is simple, the Grey Hypocrite is hovering amongst the Dominion armies like a NKVD Commissar making sure the Frontovikis go to die.

Between ignoring Cordelia's demands that Black be killed ASAP, and his links with the Saint of Bitches, I'd say he's at the very least indifferant or at worst passively agreeing with her notion that Procer needs to burn to the ground so the survivors can rebuild a ""worthy"" nation, free from the rot of old.

Pretty sure Marzala would be elated of knowing that.

And even if Dominions armies don't know that last one, Grey Hypocrite's word will be law to them, and frankly, these hypocrites don't give a rat's ass about Procer themselves. Let them be Dead King fodder while we play our own intrigues while bitching about their own.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, SoS, Bard &c. have made one very large and completely unwarranted assumption: They are presuming that if Procer gets wiped out, they can build a new nation on the ashes, a better one, devoted to the cause of Good. As opposed to, say, a puppet state of Praes, or some new provinces for Callow, or a body farm for the Dead King.

Amadeus(*) and Cat have already won Callow, which was more devoted to Good than Procer. With Callow now on the other side, how many Good nations remain? How many are strong enough to step up and turn around a war that Procer lost?

(*) Given he's apparently lost his Name, we should probably quit referring to him as "Black"

boballab

Imo that whole assumption of Bard's (Saint is a patsy that just thinks she is in charge, just like the Lone Swordsman) doesn't take into account that Cat, who beat her once already is now the one calling the shots against her and was able to cause the complete overhaul of Arcadia which is supposed to be a reflection of how Creation works. Cat in a way is the Bard's nemesis because she is practically Chaos incarnate, you can't plan against her and that is what Bard is a planner. The Bard makes long range plans and against someone like Black, another planner, she wins because of her greater experience. Against Cat the Bard is going to learn, once again, that old Praesi saying:

Dread Empress Maleficent II

Sugar Roll

If this would be the so called Prince's Graveyard, I would bet that it's going to be an assassination of the leaders rather than armies beating armies.

boballab

It's possible because Cat want to save the lives of the fighting men to use against the Dead King and whatever will happen looks like to set at night when the Drow are at their peak. The interesting thing is that Cat in prior chapters has shown more interest in getting Pilgrim to side with her than actually killing him, however this is probably the best chance ever for him getting killed since he has zero knowledge of what the Drow can do.

ATLRoyal

Honestly, Vivienne just redeemed herself in my eyes, as one of the Woe. I've had an image of them, as I read this story, that each and every one was unique, a different approach and a different past to make them more than a number.

When I heard Vivienne lost her name, I was disappointed. After all, she was practically worthless before, with the only proper combat aid she had done being the sun's theft, and without a name, that left her even weaker. And while she was good at politics, it wasn't much when Named rulers were everywhere.

Now I'm just hoping she gets a sliver of the Night, or learns magic, or something so she won't get killed by your everyday foot soldier in close combat.

Javvies

Ehhhh. Viv is not and never has been a combatant. And now she's effectively the political heir-apparent to the Crown of Callow.

As a general rule, if a noncombatant who is also a high ranking political and governmental figure is in combat, something has gone terribly wrong.

Plus, Cat appears to be moving away from what is more or less the status quo based on personal power towards a paradigm based on institutional power.

Miles

Sounds like she was operating without the benefit of the name at that point. App it did was make her hair stop growing.

Andrew Mitchell

You mean, start growing. 😊

Xinci

I do wonder why she doesn't want Named leaders. Though this does go with the vision so far, regulating different cultural bodies and getting fewer answers from their interactions. Still doing so will be truly...messy. Depending on how its dien rulers will be less obvious, Named less important in role, and cultures potentially gutted.

ninegardens

Named leaders are bound by stories. Named leaders are generically beholden to either Good or Evil... and Named leaders have significant PERSONAL power.

If she wants leaders to be a political/diplomatic office, then it makes sense that they are forced to play the game of balancing things, and are not permitted to have the power to push the political/military scales wherever the hells they want.

The main thing here is that she appears to be effectively murdering a large number of names. (Tyrant? Empress? etc), which are defined by their rulership.

... or maybe she is only insisiting that Callow have unNamed leaders, and hence acts as a Neutralish buffer zone between Procer and Praes.

Liliet

Nah, pretty sure this IS her aiming to destroy a whole swath of Names the way Cordelia did Chancellor. People called this before; I didn't believe it, because it seemed too absurdly large a move.

Guess we're doing this, though!

...Cordelia is definitely getting a Name, isn't she...

Liliet

* the first "Cordelia" there was actually Malicia. Ouch

konstantinvoncarstein

Two Named of opposites side would nearly certainly fight. If those two Named are head of state..

konstantinvoncarstein

*heads

pagesbe

No Named rulers? Well, some places won't care, like Procer. Levant hasn't been led by a Named for awhile, I think. Callow used to be led by Named, but they were Named because they ruled, not ruled because they were Named, so not that bad. Praes? Praes will have to do a 180 for that to happen. Cat would have to do to Praes what the people who drove the Name Warlord out of the Orcs did, hopefully less actual slavery involved.

caoimhinh

Yes, it seems too pretentious and even a bit idiotic for Catherine to intend to prohibit Named rulers, considering how many of those actually come into their Name when they are rulers and not the other way around, and there are very few ways to predict the acquisition of a Name (so far only the transitional ones that are disciples of stronger Names like Squire to Knight and Apprentice to Warlock, and the still unexplained way that Kairos forced Anaxares into his Name of Hierarch), there could be rulers who in the middle of their reign acquire a Name and would need to abdicate, while there are countries like Praes where you only rule if you have the ruling Name and only acquire that Name if you rule. So the practicality of its implementation is dubious at best. Well, it's not like the Liesse Accords will actually be accepted and signed without any changes, there must be changed to them, even if Cat doesn't want, otherwise it would not be a real agreement between nations.

konstantinvoncarstein

Kairos made Anaxarès Hierarch by forcing all the cities of the League to elect him.

I understand why Catherine want to forbid Named ruler, but it is impossible in practice, like you say. If one of them begin to be associated with national identity, that he becomes the symbole of the state (like the Kings and Queens of Callow), he will probably become a Name. I an pretty sure that if Vivienne become queen, she will receive a new Name.

caoimhinh

No, he wasn't elected. Anaxares became Hierarch while traveling around with Kairos. Then the delegates from each city came to recognize him and swear to obey him. You can see it in <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/25/villainous-interlude-thunder/> He was forced to be a General of Helikean army, and entered into his Name when the Kanenas refused to execute him for the crimes he had committed according to Bellerophon's laws.

I agree with you on the rest. Cat even said in Book 1 that part of the reason the Fairfaxes has such a long dynasty was because ascending to the throne of Callow usually gave them Names, even when they were Princes it was very common to have that.

konstantinvoncarstein

He became Hierarch after the kanemas judge he was valuable to Bellerophon, and he refuse it. Maybe it was his desire to change this that was the final straw for his transition?

caoimhinh

Yep.

But that doesn't explain the process that came before, how Kairos knew about that, managed to know who would be the guy who would get the name, nor why the Name that Anaxares got was Hierarch since 1) that position wasn't required to change Bellerophon's laws and 2) As far as we have seen even now he hasn't used his power for that.

He wanted to die because that's what the law said, but couldn't because the Kanenas told him to not die, he got his Name and didn't do anything with it, and actually refused the Name and fought against it and the Aspects yet they still came to him, which would strengthen my point that Cat pretending to ban Named rulers is unpractical and almost impossible since Name bestowal is out of their control.

konstantinvoncarstein

Banning Named rulers would indeed be impossible

Fayhem

I didn't understand how Kairos made Anaxares into Hierarch for the longest time either, but then I saw somebody give an explanation in the comments that made total sense to me. I wish I could remember who said it and where so I could just reproduce or link it, but here's my best go at recreating it instead.

Essentially, Kairos leveraged the way that Names are built out of/arise out of stories to make Anaxares the Hierarch by crafting a story and casting Anaxares in the role that becomes Hierarch. You know how people in the story have commented that Kairos could have gotten himself elected Hierarch instead, what with winning the war and all? That's the key. The story Kairos crafted is "villain launches a war of ambition, wins every battle and has the prize of power that he seeks almost within his grasp when at the last moment his most trusted lieutenant seizes the power for himself instead". The prize of power was becoming Hierarch of the League, and he made that be Anaxares by casting him in the role of "most trusted lieutenant" – making him be a general in his army, constantly referring to him as "my friend" (I think notably in front of other Named, since it seems like story-logic pays more attention to what's happening when there are Named in the room), that stuff basically.

Hope that makes sense to you too!

Liliet

I think that's likely to be one aspect of it, but not the key one. The key one was much more mundane politicking, with Kairos convincing City after City that Anaxares would make a GREAT Hierarch, especially seeing how if he were elected, Kairos would stop warring them

Oh, the actual formal election came later. But that was how I understood the scene with kanenas: Kairos managed to convince the People of the Glorious Republic of Bellerophon, long may she reign, that having one of their own be elected Hierarch would be awesome. Anaxares didn't know about those preparations, but they were there, and the minute he displayed will to enforce his idea of what's right upon the world, the Name snapped into place.

Fayhem

Mm, after tracking down the chapter where the Name snapped in I think you're right that the bit with the kanenas was more key than I remembered it as being. But the extra chapter Hierarchy (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/01/31/hierarchy/>) has this bit here from Anaxares' POV:

"The Gods had elected him before men ever spoke their piece, cursing him with a Name regardless of his desires. The Tyrant had been their instrument in this, and for that Anaxares was glad he had seen nothing of him since the night where Nicae fell."

So I don't think the votes per se were what decided it; the politicking of it is at least treated as if it is a foregone conclusion, though tbf Atalante does get noted as giving up its vote to get Helike out of their city so that's clearly Kairos twisting some arms there.

I think it's a combination of Kairos' scheming with the kanenas and his storycrafting; as you said it's when Anaxares "displayed will to enforce his idea of what's right upon the world [that] the Name snapped into place" but it being the specific Name of Hierarch that he gained I think is down more to Kairos' storycrafting than an election that hadn't actually happened yet, with the nice fillip that the kanenas being involved instantly cuts the legs out from under Anaxares just refusing or suiciding his way out of it. For supporting evidence re: the storycrafting angle I'd also quote the section where Kairos, speaking of Bard, says ""She thinks I made you to kill me," Kairos said." Meaning that when Bard looked at Anaxares' nascent Name she saw it coming into being through the "trusted lieutenant's betrayal" aspect of things, or at least that's how I'd take it.

Liliet

> The Gods had elected him before men ever spoke their piece, cursing him with a Name regardless of his desires.

I see what you mean, but I don't think it's accurate / I don't think that's how it works. I mean, we have explicit confirmation in the kanenas scene that Kairos had been scheming behind Anaxares's back about this, and I don't think Names work like that. First you fill the Role, then the Name confirms it. And the Role of Hierarch is not "Kairos's treacherous friend" (which wouldn't have worked like that for another reason which I'll also talk about below), it's "the person all the Free Cities have agreed to put in charge." The Name came before the formal vote, but the unanimous agreement also came before the formal vote, because Kairos knows what he's doing in rigging elections.

> So I don't think the votes per se were what decided it; the politicking of it is at least treated as if it is a foregone conclusion, though tbf Atalante does get noted as giving up its vote to get Helike out of their city so that's clearly Kairos twisting some arms there.

The formally cast votes were a foregone conclusion because agreements were reached in advance, yes.

> but it being the specific Name of Hierarch that he gained I think is down more to Kairos' storycrafting than an election that hadn't actually happened yet

Catherine was ready to claim the Name of Black Queen before being actually crowned, too. Because she was already acting like one in practice, already called that, and ceremony's just that: ceremony. It adds story weight, but doesn't decide it.

The thing about storycrafting is, in my observation, it heavily rests on what is actually happening. Anaxares can't be the treacherous scheming friend without doing any actual scheming or betraying, no matter how hilarious Kairos finds setting him up to look like one. The presentation matters, but the substance has to be there first. Catherine has talked about this recently in Cloaks:

> But it doesn't, I thought. We've seen it, you and I. That when all there is holding up the choice is a story and the prediction of victory, the story fails. Because if all you do is pretend, go through the motions, then you've already lost what could have made it a victory in the first place.

Acting out a story is not about the theatre of it, as Dorian has painfully learned. As William has painfully learned. Theatre-wise, Catherine's play at First Llesse was absurd: she was an undead abomination, killed by a hero and risen, engaged in a three way squabble over the prize. But substance wise, she'd just very literally given her life for her people ("one life for one hundred thousand? that's a steal, by any account"), acting to protect them from destruction, with a very real claim to ruling the land about to be substantiated. Theatre-wise, Black was an evil invader conqueror, holding the land by force of arms on behalf of his Empress; substance-wise, he'd been personally taking care of it for decades, making all the decisions himself and acting as best he could to prevent abuse of what authority he gave over to the Praesi.

Storycrafting is about teasing out the patterns of what is actually going on. It doesn't matter what it looks or sounds like, if you can retell the actual events and decisions in short in a way that fits the narrative, then the story works.

No events or decisions made along the way matched the hypothetical "Anaxares acts behind Kairos's back" story. No matter what the theatre was, it was the other way around.

Fayhem

"Acts behind Kairos's back", no. Actively intends to undermine and sabotage his efforts at every opportunity? Literally confirmed explicitly out loud by Anaxares himself, repeatedly. The fact that Kairos treated that like it was hilarious doesn't change Anaxares' total sincerity in that regard in the slightest.

I think we might be splitting hairs to a certain extent though; as I started off noting, Kairos actually winning the war is the concrete foundation that his storycrafting rests on. If there's no real chance that he can't make whoever he wants Hierarch, then that's at least as solid a basis as actual agreements with everybody. If not in fact much more of a solid basis; who tf would negotiate with the Tyrant of Helike as if it was a good-faith negotiation? When you're dealing with someone like that, you aren't going to give promises that are worth any more than the ones you expect to receive.

In other words, I think we actually mostly agree that to make a story work you need a solid underpinning in reality (or some underpinning at least; Cat's storycrafting in Skade was more about hoodwinking reality than basing anything off it and then making up the difference with murder). I just think that force and fear were the foundation Kairos built off of, not negotiations conducted with people he had just gone way out of his way to showcase himself as a violent bad-faith actor to.

Liliet

Yeah, we very much agree there. Skade was an exception because Arcadia is like that, Catherine herself has noted that storycrafting goes wild in there. She managed to win a fight she'd been hopelessly outclassed in literally -just- by goading her attacker into an evil monologue. Arcadia is not a good example of how story works in Calernia lmao

But yeah, force and fear were absolutely the basis of those negotiations. I'm not saying Anaxares was elected based on anything other than Kairos strongarming everyone into doing whatever he wants; in fact, that's exactly my point. I don't think it made a difference that Anaxares made a principle out of demonstrating his disloyalty to Kairos and that Kairos also played it up as far as it could go without actually doing him any damage. That was bells and whistles, and the engine was Kairos's conquest, no more, no less.

Dresden 67

Yeah, I think this is one point Cat will be forced to compromise on.

Which, as you say, isn't a bad thing. Other nations will need to have their say and feel like their concerns are addressed.

The most important parts of the Accords are the restrictions on Named warfare and demonic or angelic interference.

caoimhinh

Yeah. After all, Cat has mentioned that she doesn't want Callowan culture to be lost, and forbidding Named rulers is exactly that, both for Callow and for other countries. Not to mention it's likely impossible.

Catherine herself almost got a ruling-type Name after ascending to the throne (although to me the explanation of why she didn't is a bit dubious, since having the Artifact of Doom shouldn't be determinant for her Name, but whatever).

Liliet

It wasn't about the artefact per se, but what was connected to it: Cat's willingness to lean into the public perception of her. It was always a bit off from the real Cat, from the first moment she entered the public eye – the goblinfire debacle that's still echoing with Abigail, and for good reason. The Black Queen, as the role is defined by people's perception, is more ruthless, more cold, more detached than the real Cat. She would have started matching it, had she allowed Malicia to draw her into the WMD scheme. But instead her father did something none of them predicted, acting on his bone deep understanding that cold ruthless detachment is a very wrong road to go down (for all that he just had; feels like a sin, doesn't it? thanks, Bard). That not so much shocked Cat out of the mindset as curved the possible roads ahead of her to lead away from it. Our actions determine how we think as much as the other way around.

The artefact was a pivot. No more, no less.

Mental Mouse

Yes.. it also means that the gods (or their Bard, or even a story-fu master) can effectively dethrone any ruler by nudging them into a Name.

Dresden 67

Other way around for Procer and Levant.

Procer has never had a Named ruler and is light on Named in general.

The ruling class of Levant is built around the descendents of Named, and they actually do claim Names at an unusually high rate.

Dresden 67

Never mind, I misread your comment.

boballab

I think you guys haven't thought out the consequences to Creation if the division between the Gods goes away to reflect the lose of division in Arcadia. Remember way back when Masego told Cat about the nature of Arcadia was to be a reflection of Creation where the courts take the place of the Gods Above and Below and they live strictly by story. All that was broken forever when Cat beat the Summer Queen and she was force to marry the Winter King, there is no more courts and there is no more recurring story. Creation has worked the same way, there is an over arching story where in the end Good beats Evil and the Named are their instruments to make the story go on. What Black started was breaking the story and why his aspects were weak comparatively to Black Knights of the past, he wasn't doing what the story villain was suppose to do and the further you get from the story based Role the weaker your name gets. So what happens if Cat succeeds a fulfills Blacks dreams in a way and there is no more Good/Evil (Take a look right now on what the "Good" Gods are attempting to do: Genocide) divide? The story ends and thus the Roles those Names rely on go with it.

Liliet

"There is no more recurring story" is inaccurate. There is a new story that will grow to be recurring from now on, in the subsequent fae cycles.

Good and Evil aren't going anywhere, they're baked into the very foundations of this world. But their struggle will take another form, and that's what both Amadeus and Cat are after

konstantinvoncarstein

Arcadia exist before Creation, and was a "bêta version" of it. The Gods are not influenced by what happen in Creation, Good and Evil will always exist.

Furthermore, Creation does not contain only Calernia. There is many other continents, with their own stories, heroes and villains. The actions of Catherine will not (or barely) influence the world at large.

edrey

its nice, vivi development was due but she need a name or she will end like a very nice secondary caracter, forgotten and all, and to be honest i think there would be only one country in the end of the novel, the republic of calernia, but let see what happen huh, no named leaders? Is that really sustainable? I don't mean that in the sense that you need named leaders for a good nation, but in the sense that if it goes on long enough, being the leader will be enough for a name.

SilverDargon

Could you imagine if 100 years down the line someone takes the throne of Callow and gets a name from it, and is then immediately barred from holding office? Wild.

Gunslinger

There goes our hopes for Queen Abigail the Unwilling. Another reason Queen Vivienne would be a good choice is that she'd appease both the Oldbloods and institute progressive reforms.

Gunslinger

Also if Praes is to be a part of the Liesse Accords it would also be the end of the Amadeus is Dread Emperor Benevolent theory. Unless Praes joined much later

konstantinvoncarstein

The problem with Praes is that it is completely dependent on Named to stand. Without a Dread Emperor, Black Knight, etc, it would disappear in civil war. It would take a massive culling of the nobility, then the rule of a Dread Emperor who would have to mold organize Praes to be capable to stand without him. In short, he would have to change the very soul of Praes.

Dresden 67

In other words, exactly what Black planned to do already.

Death Knight

Well with the aid of the Goblins, Grem and the Army of Callow they can feasibly kill all the nobles that don't want to quit their shit like they've been promising since all the way back from book 2-3.

This type of conquest is feasible for the following reasons:

#1) All of Goblin kind would stand by Black, Grem and Cat in this endeavor.

#2) Both Black and Grem are spoken of with reverence by the Orcs so all the Clans would unite under their banner. Grem may or may not become Warlord at this juncture.

3) Malicia needs to die for what she did to Ratface and the other high ranking staff of Cat so Black has the support of the Army of Callow along with the Drow (at least the Losara Drow) and Cat herself. Not to mention Assassin is still around.

4) If Cat plays her cards right, she might be able to count on the aid of the Pilgrim and even Hanno along with the Witch and the surviving members of Hanno's band. If they make it through the scrap with the Dead King.

Can you imagine that? The Witch of the Forrest, The Hierophant AND The Grey Pilgrim fighting side by side? Yeah, the Tower and the other Noble's wards are in for a ROUGH but short day...

Best part is since this is an Evil nation, there's no Heroic bullshit to worry about. The only worry is that all Villains with significant story weight are due to leave the game by kicking over the board. Triumphant brought the Tower down on her killers' heads and given the narrative weight she had I sincerely doubt many of the Heroes made it out alive from that.

So with her last breath I think Malicia might just nuke Ater and the surrounding wasteland. But since The Pilgrim, Hierophant and The Witch is there they should be able to contain and mitigate the damage.

konstantinvoncarstein

I agree, Malicia will not survive the story. But her last act will be spectacular 😊

I only disagree concerning Ratface. Catherine kind of try to kill her (and would have without the puppets), and she only strike back. But she clearly deserves to die, if only for allowing Liesse.

Liliet

God, the protagonist centered morality with "BUT RATFACE" is so annoying. Assassinating high ranking officials is perfectly in line with Malicia's known methods, and Ratface and Anne Kendall both knew very well what kind of war they were signing on to fight. Malicia crossed a much bigger line allowing Second Liesse to happen. If Cat's going to take anything personally, it's that; god knows half of Malicia's empire already has.

Ratface isn't even a blip on the radar. He was a combatant who willingly chose his side. Remember when Cat came to her officers with "so I just committed treason" in Book 3? She didn't need to convince him.

Malicia is more damned for a random average legionairy who died at Liesse than for personally Hasan Qara.

Mental Mouse

<Snorfle!> for "Queen Abigail the Unwilling". We may get there yet, though.

Gunslinger

It's the name for her in the Guide subreddit. If you haven't been there you should check it out.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately reddit doesn't like me. IIRC from last time I tried signing up, it demanded I respond to a verification E-mail, but couldn't get the E-mail to me.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. Viv does get a name and so just when she thinks she's out, Queen Abigail the unwilling discovers they've pulled her back in.

Someguy

Ah, Names are the shackles of childhood. To outgrow, break or sacrifice it is to seek new opportunities.

imagesbe

Not necessarily. Names are tied to a particular perspective and are no more inherently shackles than any ingrained perspective is.

WuseMajor

I'm starting to suspect that the Accords are about breaking free of Heaven and Hell as much as anything else.

fbt

I loved this! I thought it was brilliant and engaging. Ok, minor editorial issues aside, I wouldn't change a thing here. Great work, loved it!

RanVor

I would have never though that a chapter developing a main character this much could be this boring.

James, Mostly Harmless

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

James, Mostly Harmless

Guide has more votes in the weekly and monthly tallies than the next two stories combined, although it is not quite there in the yearly tally.

origamiflame

Is anyone else getting a ton of pop ups? My browser (chrome mobile) blocked 8, is there something going on?

Gunslinger

I've seen people complain about that on and off and the best solution usually is to use a browser with adblock. Firefox Mobile is one such though personally I prefer Brave for android. It's basically chrome but with a suite of adblocking tools

Keldor

I think the 'no named rulers' thing is to limit the influence of the gods to a minimum just like the ban of pacts with devils, demons AND angels.

Mental Mouse

As I read it, she wasn't trying to ban all pacts with the demons, devils, and angels – that would be impractical anyway. She just wants to ban actually summoning them onto a battlefield.

burguulkodar

Damn, I still want named people in this story. We're getting less and less of them.

Cat is now back to human, and is completely ok with going old and dying. Stupid. Same with Thief, and I thought she would become Regent or Queen or something, but nooo, she has to abandon her name and get old and die too. Fuckers.

At least Indrani and Masego still keep the faith.

Chapter 25: Dead Ends

"And so the First Under the Night came across a portal where great danger might lurk, and upon witnessing it halted and sought the council of Sve Noc. 'O Night,' said the First, 'what wisdom do you offer?' And so the Young Night answered thus: 'Try a foot first.'"

– Extract from the 'Parables of the Lost and Found', disputed Firstborn religious text

Shit, I thought to myself, this is going too well.

"- the Alliance army has effectively withdrawn, and is making camp for the night," the officer continued. "They have recalled everything but scouts, as far as our own can see."

I'd told Vivienne what I wanted out of the manoeuvres, namely forcing the western coalition to give me just enough room that I could gate my armies away from this mess. It was starting to look like I'd be getting exactly that, which was highly suspicious. Reports had begun to come into the pavilion over the afternoon, everything going according to plan. First the opposition drew back, then General Bagram threatened their supply lines further north and they outright retreated. Had any of the crusader commander taken the Fourth Army's distant presence as an immediate threat and charged? No. Had the drow been ambushed by some unforeseen sun-based sorcery kept in store just for this day? No. Had some hero assassinated half the general staff of one of my divisions? No. This was going off without a hitch, which meant it wasn't and the Gods were about to dump a sackful of angry badgers on my plans.

"Your Majesty?"

"It's always badgers, you know," I complained. "It never goes a little badly, its's always 'oh no, there's goblinfire burning the city' or 'oh no, the Praesi summoned a bunch of devils again' or even 'oh no, half the continent thinks a crusade would be just the thing'. Would it really be too much to ask for a mishap instead of a catastrophe once in a while? Like, 'oh no, we're out of the good wine, but that's fine we've got this pretty decent bottle instead we'll just drink that'."

There was a long moment of silence in the pavilion.

"So, double watch and not single," Marshal Juniper said, sounding vaguely embarrassed of me.

"Don't you give me that, Hellhound," I grunted. "You know I'm right. Matter of fact-"

I went looking through my cloak before realizing I was not, in fact, carrying anything that could remotely be used as coin. Arguably the main drow currency was murder – although, given how much obsidian they always seemed to carry around maybe in practice it was that – and it wasn't like anyone had handed me a purse full of golden aurelii since I'd come back to the surface.

"Hakram," I said, extending arm with my palm up.

I didn't even bother to look, nor him to argue. Two heartbeats later I was slapping coins against the table, more specifically –

"- silver?" I said, turning to glare at Adjutant. "You cheapskate. That's old Marchford coinage, too, it's basically worth nothing nowadays."

"Thought we'd get rid of it while in Procer," the orc shamelessly admitted.

"Ugh," I said. "Fine then. Juniper, I'm betting these eight silvers that when you send a rider out on the field they'll run into a scout on the way back with urgent news."

"To clarify, they're silvers only in the nominal sense," Adjutant helpfully added. "Their actual worth is closer to-"

"You believe we're about to be ambushed," Marshal Grem interrupted in a rasp.

The old orc was an interesting sight, I'd admit. The cloth covering the missing eye his epithet promised was nothing out of the ordinary, simple black linen with the First Legion's symbol embroidered in gold. It was the Marshal himself I found interesting: neither as tall as Hakram nor as broad as Nauk had been, the sight of his frame in Legion armour brought to mind an old tree – all dry and corded, but likely to be nasty if pushed. He was, it would not do to forget, more than just one of the finest military officers in the Empire: he was also an old man who'd been born before the Clans were bound so tightly to the reformed Legions of Terror. Back in the days where the orc clans had preferred raiding each other and on occasion the Praesi to taking the Tower's gold and serving in the ranks. For his clan to have been as prominent as it'd reputedly been, he must have seen some brutal fighting. And that was before he joined up with Black, through a civil war and the Conquest, I thought. There was a dangerous man, behind that red-brown eye. Simply because my teacher's latest scheme had backfired on the Legions did not mean the orc was helpless.

"I believe this has proceeded perfectly when we know for a fact there's heroes nearby," I replied. "One way or another, this is about to get ugly."

"Battle?" he asked, tone calm.

There was no doubt in his eyes, like what I had said was a statement of fact. I almost shivered at the sight of it, the old general waiting to dissect my instincts like an augur would a bird. How many times had Black stood in my place, lending his paranoia's edge to a finer commander's plans?

"Not tonight," I said. "We're too close to sundown. But they'll spring a surprise on us, you can count on that."

"Then it might be best to issue the recall for the Fourth Army early," Marshal Grem said. "And allow the 'Firstborn' to handle the defences as our divisions withdraw through Arcadia."

I flicked a glance at Juniper, who after a beat nodded.

"Do it," I said. "Adjutant-"

"I sent one of mine to have a look," Hakram gravelled. "We'll know soon."

I didn't quite manage to set aside the nagging feeling that we were about to get screwed, but we still managed to get some business done in the stretch that followed. We needed to hash out supply arrangements for Marshal Grem's legions beyond this particular Iserran mess, and I had no intention of forever feeding the legionaries unless they proved of some use to me – either garrisoning the Blessed Isle or participating in the war against the Dead King. If they wanted to wait out the war until Black died or returned, it would not be through the grace of Callowan granaries. One-Eye hinted pretty bluntly – still, it was something of a novelty to see an orc hint at all – that private talks between he and I should be held on the subject, and I was wondering whether to push for either Hakram or Vivienne or both to be in the room instead when a legionary stumbled back into the pavilion. He saluted at me first, so he was one of mine and not the Legions, but his eyes flicked at Adjutant after. One of Hakram's helping hand, then.

"Report," I ordered.

"Your Majesty," the legionary replied, saluting once more. "While the enemy's forces have not redeployed, they have sent a party out in the plains towards us."

My fingers clenched.

"How many?" Juniper asked. "Horse or foot?"

"Two or four," I said, tone calm.

The legionary's eyes widened.

"Two, Your Majesty," he agreed.

"And they'll be raising a tent, the smug pricks," I said.

Something like fear passed in the soldier's eyes.

"It is so, Your Majesty," he said.

"Black Queen?" Marshal Grem rasped, tone inquisitive.

"One is the Grey Pilgrim," I said. "I'm guessing the other's the Saint of Swords, though he might have traded in for younger muscle. Well, fuck."

The last word I said feelingly, as it looked like all my preparations had gone up in smoke.

"They raised a tent, soldier?" Adjutant said. "You are certain?"

"Yes sir," the legionary nodded. "One of those Proceran pavilions, the ones they use to receive people."

"We're not gating anywhere, looks like," I cursed. "Let's find out why at least. Adjutant, have a space cleared for an attempt. With contingencies."

My second nodded, and after a few nods of respect spread around left to see my will done.

"An explanation would be appreciated," Juniper growled. "For those of us who aren't Named."

"The Pilgrim is under the impression we'll be talking soon," I said. "Considering I'm very much planning on getting the Hells out of here by Arcadia if it's possible, that means he knows something we don't about why that's not possible. It's his whole thing, Juniper, being wise and and all-knowing. In practice I'd guess he's got some ties to a Choir, maybe some limited foresight. Not that he'd be a fool without, mind you, but he's certainly got an edge. Either way, by putting up that tent he's making a point."

"Posturing," Vivienne said. "That is to say, preparing for negotiations."

"How kind of our friend Tariq to be willing to talk," I said, tone gone sardonic. "Why, he might even be willing to consider peace as a personal favour to us. Entirely unrelated to the fact that he's currently losing, no doubt. It will be our privilege, nay, our blessing to be allowed to make a truce with the side of the Heavens."

"Manifold thanks to the Gods Above," Vivienne agreed without missing a beat. "Who have ever protected and preserved us, praise be. We may have to raise a new cathedral in Laure as an expression of our gratitude."

"I take it," Marshal Grem said, "that you are less than fond of this hero."

"Well, he's only tried to kill me twice so far," I mused. "So I guess that still puts him somewhere between Saint and Malicia, relationship-wise."

"Wait, what's the left extremity of that line?" Vivienne frowned. "It can't be the Saint, we've barely fought her."

"I think it's still William," I mused. "He tried to kill me every single time we met, I'm pretty sure. I mean, so did a few others but mostly 'cause they didn't get to meet me twice."

"That feels underwhelming," she said. "He couldn't even ruin a city without Contrition holding his hand, second rate at best. Really, they shouldn't even make the list if they haven't tried to murder you through use of an astral sphere."

"Eh, I think Pilgrim's star-thing is more like a metaphor," I said. "That'd only leave High Noon Delight and Queen The-Sky-Is-A-Reasonable-Weapon from Summer. Two's not a list. Besides, if we're opening the floor to metaphors then Willy's murder-sword thing kind of looked like moonlight."

"Didn't the Page have a similar trick?" Vivienne asked. "You mentioned it a while back."

"Oh man, I'd almost forgotten about her," I admitted with a hum. "When I think about Three Hills it's always Nauk popping the Exiled Prince in the throat that comes to mind."

Bambambam. Marshal Juniper smashed her sheathed sword against the table one last time, for emphasis, and then cleared her throat with a growl.

"Orders, Your Majesty," she said.

"At the moment?" I said. "Everyone is to remain in a defensive posture, as they've already been ordered to. We won't know more until I've tried a gate, which Hakram is securing grounds for me to do as we speak."

I drummed my fingers against the table.

"I'd recommend for the two of you to prepare a plan of action for the eventuality of being forced to march out of Iserre," I said. "Or being forced to give battle here, either against the current army or the entire Grand Alliance field force."

"You don't intend to participate?" Marshal Grem asked.

"The skeleton I'll leave to the two of you," I shrugged. "I need to see some birds about something, and if that doesn't work I'll have to beat Larat until answers come out. Might take a while, it's mostly lies and arrogance in there."

"Understood," One-Eye said, apparently unruffled.

Merciless Gods, what kind of insanity had my father put this one through that he wouldn't even blink at that? I shot him an assessing look, but let it go for now.

"You coming?" I asked Vivienne.

"The birds," she said. "From underground?"

"Those are the ones," I agreed. "They're perfectly safe."

Vivienne's brow rose.

"Probably safe," I corrected.

The brow stayed up.

"To me," I specified.

"I shall stay and provide a political perspective to these unfolding campaign plans," Vivienne Dartwick serenely said.

"You do that," I snorted, then glanced at the Marshals. "Until later, then."

A dip of the head for me, salutes for them, and on my way I went.

—

It was still the better part of an hour before dusk when the Sisters came to me.

I could have tried the gate before then, of course, and very nearly did — though it would tire me to make the attempt, it was nothing that second wind coming with nightfall wouldn't carry me through. Still, I was... wary. I'd not forgotten what Robber had told me, the tale of gates into Arcadia opening into the Hells instead or simply wildly out of course. Adjutant had done well in arranging for me a wide courtyard now surrounded by basic wards, but if devils started pouring out those wouldn't be enough. I might be, even on my own, but best to exercise a little patience if it lowered the risks. The crow-shaped slivers of godhood sliced into the glare of the sun like knives, their unnaturally graceful flight taking them in twin spirals until they claimed my shoulders in unison. Perfect unison, I'd realized. Not even the fraction of a moment in delay. That kind of precision was unsettling, as no doubt they'd meant it to be.

"I have a problem," I said, leaning on my staff.

"A servant of the Pale Gods," crow-Komena said with relish. "Finally."

"See, I don't believe it's actually him that's the trouble here," I said. "Well, not this particular trouble anyway. He's definitely some other sorts."

"You believe the ways into Arcadia to have been wounded," crow-Andronike said. "Amusing, that you'd believe what frustrated some errant Splendid would be a threat to us."

"Now that," I said, "is the kind of talk that ends up with gods in boxes. Or cut up for parts. Or, you know, made to scamper away in disgrace by a hero. You've been down there for a long time, O Goddesses of Night. Here be monsters, and some of them were born to make sport of those like you."

I could feel their roiling anger, not that it cowed me in the slightest. My very purpose in their service was to pull them back when they were about to make a mistake like this. Twirling the ebony staff lightly, I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth.

"So, let's try this again," I said. "I have a problem. Some hero with friends upstairs believes I won't be able to gate out of here. In your opinion, how dangerous would it be to try opening one right now?"

"The taste of the boundary has not changed," Komena said. "You worry for nothing."

"It would not, if the change were coming from without," Andronike noted.

My brow rose.

"So, if there's a mess it's more likely to be coming from Arcadia?" I asked.

"A more precise explanation would be well beyond your understanding," Komena said.

It was surprising, I mused, how quickly one got used to being condescended to by a bird. I lowered my staff, tip touching nothing at all.

"So, a quick look is in order," I said.

Night flooded my veins, abrupt and eager to answer my call. The gate ripped through Creation easily, to my surprise – and that of the Sisters, I felt. I'd felt this before, in Marchford. When Akua's demon had weakened the fabric of Creation enough that it was made easier for the Winter Court to raid through. It'd not been like that when I gated earlier, I thought.

"This is unusual," Andronike said.

I felt it too, even as the ink-black gate opened before me. Eyes, unfathomably large, gazing at me. The surface of the gate was like liquid obsidian, though without a single ripple, and I hesitated. I held back, leaning on my staff.

"Thoughts?" I said.

