Have there been any Assassin sightings and/or Assassin level assassinations since then? I don't recall any.

Forrest

They've hinted previously that Assassin isn't that easy to keep dead. (Like the vision trap Akua put Cat through, in the hero one they had to keep offing Assassin over and over but he always came back. It was the tolltaker one that killed him by trapping him in a warehouse of goblinfire)

oldschoolvillain

I believe that Assassin's response to Akua's ordering Cat to kill . . . It, was "A hundred times before, a hundred times more.". That's not the response of a person who STAYS dead.

RanVor

Except the hostage has been given (allegedly) as a sign of goodwill. If she argued, they might have used it against her.

Draconius Sinister

Cool, they've accepted Cat as the 'she's an asshole, but she's OUR asshole!' In the group! Things are looking good for Cat being a part of the Anti-Dead King band, or maybe making her own with the Woewhile the Good guys run theirs into the dirt. Excited for more!

Rook

As graceful of a killing stroke that was on the part of the pilgrim, I can't bring myself to be particularly worried.

Sure she has a knife to her neck now, but when has she ever not? Every major pivot, every major turning point, the situation as been the same and so has the answer. Whether it was being offered a villainous name, or becoming a true successor to Black, or having the Winter Mantle knocking on the door.

A knife is at your neck and your goal is ahead. All you have to do is keeping moving forward, and lean into the knife. Self mutilation is an old friend by now.

Imtiaz Ayon

This is completely similar to cat's story in book 2. She gets over her head and gets crippled. Then gets trapped in a redemption story but refuses redemption.

And in book 3, she accepts the mantle and it opens her old wound when she was crippled. So, it's like a crippling. Now she gets trapped in a redemption story. But for a redemption story to work you have to actually repent.

At the end of book 2 her injuries healed and she refused redemption.

Similarly, at the end of this story, something will happen to her mantle and she will refuse redemption

Highwayman

Who else thinks there's still a plot twist from the 'grey' part of the Grey Pilgrim coming?

And wasn't Amadis the one who had a death flag show up a couple of chapters back? Something about a letter to his family or a painting.

Cicero

Letter to his wife. Reminiscing about how they met. Recalling how she was a love match that nearly cost him his throne, showing that despite all the ambition and greed, that he does truly love his wife.

All after having "a bad feeling" about the upcoming battle.

Not sure how much more prominent a death flag you can get.

Yotz

Well, he always might have had that reminiscence just to decide that this is his last Crusade, and he will be retiring as soon as he returns home...

Metrux

You know, now that I think about it, this could very well be a death flag for his wife, instead of him... Like, the loss is his in the narrative, but who dies is her, he "loses everything" so that something something can happen to him.

RanVor

I love the moment when Cat pointed out the similarities between the crusade and the Praesi invasion.

*Trikki*

I don't understand. Why does taking hostages mean it's going to be a redemption story? I feel that (not for the first time) Cat is jumping into conclusions.

Sure, it can become a redemption story if Cat isn't careful... but there are so many other possible outcomes! I don't understand why she came to this conclusion right away, though it sure as hell made this chapter more dramatic than it had to be.

Rook

Context.

Cat painted the story as a misunderstanding between allies to avoid a 'evil turns on evil' narrative, by using her status as Queen to pull Callow into the role of a lone-swordsman type of gritty/misunderstood hero.

By declaring a royal hostage within himself as the overseer acting as a guarantee for the negotiated deal, he puts himself right next to Cat so that he can be in a prime position to try enforcing Cat's own play into a true Heroic redemption story, rather than one only in name that she's using to avoid the 'evil turns on evil' narrative.

The attack is placing himself safely within range of influence of Cat's camp, with the skeleton of a heroic narrative in place that she herself opened up. Not the hostage being given to the army of Callow.

James, Mostly Harmless

I have a feeling that it will be Akua who is redeemed and ends up sacrificing herself. There were signs of her already being on this path when she was running Kat's body ...

MetruX

Once again, please stop saying Kat... Also, this wouldn't work, because Akua can't exist without Cat right now, and thus the only way for her to be turned is if Cat turns together... Which just nullifies the reason for this ploy.

JJR

Masego, is that you?

I guess we should have expected that artifact from Akua to be able to reach the comment section.

Yotz

It has nothing to do with hostages – hostages are purely mundane measure between signatories of the treaty. It is morally grey area at most.

The GP's play was to support Cat's motion. Since every his move ought to be to remove her from the position of Villain ruler, she obviously felt something is wrong with this sudden burst of support. From his perspective it was as if she said "I want to hang myself", on which his response was "Here, have this nice rope".

Byzantine

I think you and Cat may be giving his thoughts a bit more malice than they have. Pilgrim really doesn't care if she dies in the story, just that she stop being a Villain.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Eh, I assume it'll make more sense as the plan gets fleshed out more over the next few chapters.

Trikki

Yeah, I hope so.

Thanks for your comments Rook and Yotz, though I'm still not convinced. I see how this CAN become a redemption story, but the way I see it, Cat can easily prevent that happening. At the moment I just can't imagine any good reason why she was so concerned about Pilgrim's plan being successful. We all know that Cat is pretty good at breaking stories; there was no need to overdramatize the situation (especially since whatever story this is, it's still in its crib).

Daemion

Cat needs to go along with the treaty, she needs it badly or everything falls apart. To do so means she locks herself into the redemption story and the narrative gets stronger the longer this goes on. The truce is supposed to last a year or so.

Last time she broke out of a redemption story she killed the Lone Swordsman. Killing the Grey Pilgrim wouldn't be enough this time as there are other heroes in play and it would ruin everything she wants.

What's she doing now is taking a large gamble, while the 'reformed villain' dies in most redemption stories doesn't mean she can't arrange her survival somehow (perhaps due to being mostly Fae). And even if she doesn't, she'd be content if her death allowed Callow to break out of its role as the continent's field of war and punching bag.

Of course, maybe getting a new name might raise her importance for the narrative enough to keep her alive despite all the death flags she allowed the Grey Pilgrim to raise for her.

Bob Johnson

The thing I think Cat is missing is the fact that she IS fey, and not Named. She is bound to the story differently, I think. There has to be more than one story of a Lord or Lady of Winter leading a band of heroes to their demise.

Yotz

I'd wager, her unease was nurtured by a combination of factors: firstly, she lost – with a single move GP put her in the situation where every her choice leads her to a stalemate at best – a classic death funnel; secondly, her understanding that he is a proactive player in the game where all her previous opponents were mostly reactive, if not openly passive; and last, but by all means not least – his style of playing: more specifically, his ability to seamlessly shift between several gameboards, playing proverbial 4D-shatranj. Last factor means that she can not even undertake her favourite maneuver – for now, at least – if she is to steal the gameboard to hit him with it, he will simply shifts to another one, and then'll use her actions to achieve his own goals, all while depriving her of any significant gains.

Personally, I see her reaction as something akin to feeling that you get then after long and exhausting game you finally win only to remember that this was a quarterfinal – a brief respite, and you will be in the grinder again – this time, against even more dangerous opponent. In other words, she has a firm grip on the tiger's scrotum, all that's left – is to ride the bloody thing.

Yotz

To clarify – her previous opponents were actively playing their own games, but were mostly reactive in regards to her actions, thus allowing her to meddle with the outcomes. GP plays his game specifically against her. Each time she previously won a direct confrontation was due to some ace in the sleeve, or outright cheating. Now she is forced into a direct confrontation against the opponent who not only can see any attempt in subterfuge as a lie it is, but can force her into reactive position seemingly on a whim.

Can't wait to see precisely how she will inevitably turn that on him.

werafdsaew

I think it's due to the GP being around. There's no reason to do that unless he'll try something, and him being a heroic mentor means that can catalyses a redemption arc.

Edrey

i am thinking in black instead, he is cornered now. sure he can beat one side but now he is now with two armies in each side of vales. so now a story of a villain cornered and cat and black know it so they can use it the problem here ia the bard has jet to appear

MetruX

He... Is not, though? As mentioned in the chapter itself, they can't go through Callow to attack him, they need to go back from where they came, and take the long way around. When they get to the Vales Black's battle will be long gone, so it doesn't really matter.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

I see... everything is going to accord.

Anony

But she's like 95% Fae. You can't tell me no one has considered that they are functionally immortal.

Erfling

And utterly bound by the oaths they make

Morgenstern

... to *request* admission. Which should get denied. Even if it doesn't, requesting says nothing about actually accepting or not withdrawing. *tongueincheek

Morgenstern

At least the emphasis on wording is usually a fav with such entities as fae, demons, etc.

MetruX

It would be possible... If she didn't have a super lie detector of incredible experience around, especially one that trains and "save" new heroes in a redemption story that would make her a new heroine... No, he won't let something like that.

Shawn Panzegraf

First,

To look at the Chapter properly, one has to grasp that Cat really sent GP's strategy flying with her Faux Heel Turn narrative. This is what he could cobble together from that. Not really some utter master stroke. Also remember, just because we read Cat THINK a thing, doesn't necessarily mean it is so. Cat's (rightly) very wary of GP's vast wealth of experience, so even Cat is likely to give his "success" more weight than may actually be there. Her thinking is obviously flawed, in considering the whole Hostage/GP-as-Overseer a master-stroke of a plan meant to death-flag her. That would've required the GP to FORESEE Cat's "Intend to Become Grand Alliance Signatory" stratagem, and he didn't.

Second,

I don't really believe the GP is out for Cat's blood the way Saint is. He 100% believes the whole If a Villain Rules, a Nation Grows More Evil thing...but as things began and proceeded, eliminating Cat was the only route to stop Callow from going down that road. He may genuinely be trying to get her redeemed, because he really wasn't thrilled with killing a girl in her early twenties to begin with. Especially since Procer and everyone else sat on their asses through the Conquest, necessitating Cat doing as she's done to avoid Praesi dominance of her homeland.

Third,

The GP has exactly ZERO practical experience, prior to Cat, with Practical Evil Villains. Villains like the Tyrant have been pretty much all there was to Villainy for the duration of the GP's time as a Hero. As much experience as the GP has in using Narrative to his Heroic advantage, he has zero experience in combating Villains trained to sidestep narrative pitfalls as their Prime Modus Operandi. He may well, PROBABLY IS, under the impression that Cat, especially at her tender age, doesn't understand narrative weight enough to really grasp what he's trying. Unless the Heavens have given the GP literally 100%-see-the-future precognition (and that kind of Agency-Denial wouldn't fit the Guideverse AT ALL) there's no frigging way the GP can anticipate that from here on out, Cat will be working at every step to avoid the narrative turning out his way.

Fourth,

Cat may THINK she's OK with dying to relieve Callow of its Eternally Conquered Mantle...but if she takes a really hard look around, she's going to see that the environment that's been fostered in Callow (by her, no less) has made certain there are ZERO viable successors to the throne. By splitting the political weight-lifters into two separate and fundamentally ideologically-opposing factions, Talbot and Kendall's factions will kick off a civil war the instant Cat is no longer around to hold their leashes. Then BAM, in steps either Procer or Praes, again.

Finally, Cat's been essentially Nameless since the Weapon-Black Queen Pivot got DESTROY'd by Black. I don't think it's a coincidence that the Name-limbo thing has continued this long...and the "Big" kind of Story the GP is trying to kick off with this Narrative Maneuver has Pivot written ALL OVER IT!

mindsword2

It could be a bit worse...

Where will they keep a royal prisoner? In the capital, there is the Songbird's Cage where you can keep royals under guard ("In later years, it had become where Callowan royalty held prisoners that weren't officially prisoners"). It was directly mentioned this “prison” was used for the king’s mistress so he could keep her out of the way of his queen and then under lock and key to keep his queen away from her.

The story has a queen with a heart of ice with no suitable consort. Her land is oppressed by evil, which she wishes to destroy. In comes a royal prince she takes hostage from those who would help her. Where can she put this prince? In a safe secure place fit for royalty... which also is where the secret lover of the ruler is stored. I wonder if Prince Amadis is possibly going to make a play to be King and secure Callow for himself. Especially with the Grey Pilgrim attending Cat’s court. Merlin was an adviser to Arthur after all. And Cat pulled a sword from a stone.

Worse, we have seen in interludes that one of Cat’s big weaknesses at home is the lack of royal blood. Black and Malicia killed off anyone with even a drop of royal blood to prevent a return of the nobility. This could be a solution. Could also have Anne Kendal marry him, assume the throne with a royal consort.

narcoduck

lol Amadis is already happily married.

Rook

It should be exceedingly clear by now that Amadis and his personal plots really just do not matter much. He’s one part ambition and two parts mundane political intrigue, the only relevance he has is as far as what the big players – Hasenbach, Pilgrim, Black, Cat, Malicia – use him for in playing the bigger game.

The line of succession isn’t an actual pivot point right now and even if it were, the point of Royal Blood is historical callowan precedent for historical callowan rule. It’s not that nobles from any old corner of the world naturally have golden magic water flowing through their veins, the local context is what really matters.

If anything the old history between callow and procer/Praes means foreign royal bloodlines mean less than nothing in callow. Callowans would likely rather accept a stray dog as ruler than proceran royalty.

As far as the old royal bloodlines in callow goes, that essentially ended with the fall of house Fairfax. Unless a hidden heir gets unveiled by plot twist, all the emphasis now in terms of Callowan succession is on Cat/eventually Kendall, not the consort.

Idiom Idiot \(@AintItK\)

I think both players in this game of sacrifice chess are forgetting an important element.

Orphan she may be, but Foundling still has a father, of sorts.

And one of the classics of the redemption narrative is the redeeming sacrifice of a parent for a child. The child must go on, bearing the burden of two redemptions; to build a *better world.*

And I'll bet you, if nobody else, Black's definitely weighing that option.

Cicero

We already know Black is willing to accept death to see Cat succeed (in fulfilling his plans).

Black very well could accept this. Especially now that the Captain died. Ranger and Scribe might object though.

RanVor

And Warlock. Don't forget about Warlock.

Argentorum

Remember though, "Wekesa would eat every child in Callow if it let him pursue his experiments." As long as Cat doesn't kill Black, and Warlock and Heirophant have a nice little conservatory to play magic in, he probably won't care enough. And that's only assuming the Witch doesn't kill him, or else that they don't mutually explode.

Scribe and Ranger are the problems, and Ranger... well, she's a walking death flag, which is kinda the point, I gather.

RanVor

Wekesa would gladly eviscerate Cat if he believed she had *anything* to do with Black's death, up to and including being in general vicinity when it happened.

Walter

I feel like Cat is playing ten dimensional chess and the Pilgrim is legit not playing. Like, she reads correctly that he wants her to be redeemed. Then she extrapolates this whole sinister "redemption = sacrifice ergo he is getting Callow despite their defeat ergo let the story do the heavy lifting, well played my magnificent opponent", and he is just like "man I hope she can stop murdering so many people and become a worthy queen for the poor people of Callow".

Rook

I think the opposite, the Pilgrim is the one plotting much more deeply than anyone else in the battle can cope with.

You don't get to be completely undefeated for decades against the most dangerous monsters the Gods Below can throw at you – with a Name that isn't even combat oriented – by being a simpleton with a pure heart. Remember that the kindly old man here has the genuine respect of a Named as brutal as the Saint, and is the kind of big name player that the Black Knight of all people was trying to avoid fighting when he destroyed the hellgate.

What he lacks in youth, stamina, or reality-warping physical abilities, he makes up for with experience and cunning. There's no way he could've even survived this long otherwise, let alone with such a scary track record.

crescentsickle

Called it last chapter. The conflict of threes was a Rising Action on Cat's part, where she was framing the story as a hero. The Pilgrim's third play, the most important play, after two losses, was to lose especially hard. Give Cat exactly what she wants, and make it all the more potent for it, and lock her in to her narrative. Lose the battle, win the war.

ALazyMonster

I really want to see Cat's accords succeed just because I want to know the full details. Also it would be interesting if they led to a new name like Arbiter or something since her goal is to have someone to enforce the peace she is trying to make.

stevenneiman

I'm really excited to hear what exactly the Liesse Accords are. We know that they're something Cat considers to be worth everything she's done, but that the Pilgrim would consider unacceptable. We also know that Cat considers it possible to ram it down the Grand Alliance's throat if she has the upper hand, and that it involves Evil to a degree that it won't work without an enforcer on the side of Evil.

I'm sure somebody's here has guessed what they are by now, but I'm stumped.

Oshi

I imagine them akin the Unseelie Accords from the Dresden Files. A set of rules pertaining to conduct between the powers (including heroes.villains)

stevenneiman

Possibly, but that begs the question of why the Grey Pilgrim would be opposed to such a thing. He's already agreed to (and in fact seemed to approve of) Cat's rules of engagement, yet Cat seems certain that something about the Accords would stick in his craw. I wouldn't be surprised if trying to expand the rules of engagement beyond the trial run here was part of the Accords, but I feel like there's gotta be more to it than that if she expect it to be a hard sell for the Pilgrim specifically. For all that the mortals claim to be calling the shots, I'm 95% sure that if Cat and Tariq both demanded something they would get it, and I suspect that he would support to RoEs on a broader field given the horror and loss of life it would prevent. I suppose he might object to the combined Good and Evil nature of the regulating body that would be required to enforce it.

mavant

I'm still worried about the Demon of Absence. What happened to it?! Demons of Absence don't just go AWOL!

Rook

Isn't it fitting for the demon of absence to be absent?

stevenneiman

I recall someone commenting about a few inconsistencies that seem to indicate that it might have had some kind of effect on the proceedings. Personally, I can't think of any way that such a thing could cause a problem in a way that wouldn't be super narratively unsatisfying. Also, Pilgrim said he'd deal with it and I think he will. He might be a slave of the heavens willing to do morally ambiguous things in the name of making his side win even when they're in the wrong, but I don't think that extends to not dealing with the threat posed by Demons, especially when that could be construed as a violation of the rules of engagement.

CrysJaL

So I'm really seeing a narrative comparison here.

The angels represent Order, being singular and constant in both power and number. Whereas Demons and Devils are chaotic, constantly changing and fluctuating.

Heroes and Villains follow this theme aswell. Heroes fight for the status quo, keeping things the same. Whereas Villains like Cat and Black become villains because they want that change to occur. They attempt to force their change on reality whereas Heroes fight to prevent it.

But I have an observation to make with redemption stories. Some people here seem to think the redemption story could be used to convert Cat to a heroic name. However, from everything I recall in the story so far it's implied that a redemption story can only end with the villain's death (the villain dying doing the right thing trope because they're good now and suddenly it's a tragic death).

On a side note. Let's assume that Cat is redeemed through this redemption story (and survives somehow). Wouldn't that turn her into a Summer Fae? Summer has nobody holding any mantles either right now. So could that plausibly happen if Cat switched sides somehow? Thoughts?

Tohron

I'm not sure that the Order vs Chaos is a perfect fit. There are Demons of Order, and there have been two chapters titled "Order" which were about villains imposing their will (first Black, then Catherine). I think a more apt comparison would be that Good is about adhering to a single, unified standard, and Evil is about coming up with your own standard and trying to make others follow it.

Cthulhu

Um... Proctor violates Truce. Asshole hostage dies. No redemption arc.

And if Proctor can be tricked into violating truce by someone .... such as Black .... then Mr Pilgrim can report that justice was served. Cat avoids redemption and takes the stuffing out of Proctor moral superiority. The crusade ends.

Long live the Queen.

Max Scherer

Meh i hope she doesn't will be too long gone from Callow, because i hate something like this. Now Malicia could shit... The last time she wasn't in Callow it got to shit and i hope it will not happen again.

vuthuha912

Cat is playing the GP like how she played the Hashmallim. For a beneficial deal to stay, Cat needs to be alive to enforce it so GP will have to save her in case the entire thing falls apart. If the deal in the future was as good as she thinks then of course the GP will save her.

Did... Cat just has a dig at Black for his ways of sacrificing his life for his dream? Black hates Martyrdom but he is martyring himself to give Cat his position and force a Cat&Malicia alliance. He didn't have success but it was close.

---

Interlude: Red The Flowers

*"Red the flowers, red the crown
Red this day of bleak renown
How soon they forgot Eleanor Along every oath they swore*

*Red the flowers, red the wreath
Red the sword that left the sheath
Now a king lies dead on the grass
Taught the vows of princes pass*

*Red the flowers, red the grave
Red the biers of knights so brave
They who thrice rode and died
Under banners of olden pride*

*Red the flowers, red the right
Red the fires this day will light
For every slight there is a price
Ours will be long and paid twice."*

- 'Red The Flowers', a Callowan rebel song written in the wake of the Proceran occupation of Callow

It had been some time since Amadeus had last inhaled the scent of carnage. The dawn of the third day brought with it strong winds and burning sun: the corpses were rotting in the heat, the smell of them carried to the third line of fortifications in the southern valley. The Iron Prince had ordered a halt to the offensive with nightfall, the crusaders setting camp among the ruined walls and bastion they'd spent the day taking at such great cost. Papenheim was not fresh to the art of war: he knew better than to engage a Praesi army under cover of dark. Especially one that'd had most a year to raise siege engines goblins would field and aim perfectly when the crusaders stumbled along blindly with torches and holy flames. Grem stood by his side atop the tower known as the southern half of the Bloody Twins, the unusually slender orc towering two feet above him. Marshal Grem One-Eye spat over the wall, staring at the enemy stirring in the distance.

"They're not wasting time," the orc said. "Papenheim wants to bludgeon through as quick as possible, looks like. You were right about that much."

Amadeus remained silent, for the moment. Grem had been of the opinion that there'd be probing attacks to weather but no serious offensive until the armies of Levant arrived to reinforce the Iron Prince's sixty thousand Procerans. The initial span of the war had lent credence to the orc's prediction, but after the crusaders up north passed through the Stairway the old Lycaonese had begun his march in earnest. There were political considerations at work, the Black Knight suspected. Cordelia Hasenbach had called this crusade and assembled the alliance, but mistrust still reigned between Procer and its temporary allies. Even just the impression that she intended to bleed Levant instead of her own armies would raise the spectre of suspicion within the Grand Alliance. The old fear of Proceran expansionism haunted her regime still. Amadeus could sympathize. Past Dread Emperors had burned all the Empire's diplomatic bridges so thoroughly most ruins were still actively smouldering. It had taken Alaya more than two decades to craft a rapprochement with Ashur, and it'd still all gone up in flames after only a few months of diplomatic correspondence between Hasenbach and Magon Hadast.

"I'm not so certain he's fully committed," Amadeus finally replied. "The First Prince needs blood on the floor to show her allies, but Papenheim has not been careless in his advance. He's willing to trade but not outright sacrifice."

"Thinning our numbers is the best way for them to win this," Grem conceded. "They've certainly got the levies to throw away."

The legions garrisoning the Red Flower Vales numbered six. Twenty-four thousand men in full. The First under Grem was holding the southern passage along with Mok's Third and Sacker's Ninth. Marshal Ranker and her Fourth were leading the defence of the northern valleys, commanding the freshly-rebuilt Twelfth and Nekheb's Tenth. That last legion they'd had to employ sparingly. General Catastrophe, as they were fondly called by their living soldiers, fielded a legion of undead captained by necromancers. But even alone the dragon was a force to reckon with. Combined with foot soldiers they could torch along the enemy at no great loss? Nekheb could turn around a battle, if well deployed. They were also, unfortunately, very vulnerable to heroes. Dragonslaying was an old heroic staple, and there was at least one hero on the opposite side with an archery-related Name. Wanton use would only result in the death of one of their primary assets.

"We've been light on losses so far," Amadeus noted. "And we still hold three of the five defensive lines in both passes. It cost them at least seven thousand to get this far in."

"Less," Grem replied. "If our effectiveness estimates on their priests is solid, anyway. We'll need to start deploying our contingencies today to blunt their momentum."

Amadeus looked at the glittering wall of steel forming in the distance, brow creasing.

"You hold command," he said. "I am here in an advisory role."

The orc barked out a laugh.

"Meddling's in your blood, Amadeus," he said. "You can't help it."

"And yet my role remains advisory," the Black Knight mildly replied. "I would caution you that sending Warlock onto the field before the enemy revealed their own Named casters will have consequences, but the the choice is ultimately yours."

Marshal Grem One-Eye half-squinted at the enemy, then cracked his neck. When they'd been young, the orc had done it purely for the satisfaction. Now his bones creaked and bent with age, the one enemy neither of them could defeat on the field.

"We've got a few tricks to deploy before ol' Red Skies gets off his arse," Grem decided. "Let's see how they like the taste of those."

Amadeus inhaled the scent of it again. Blood and rotting flesh, shit and steel and a hundred other small things drowned out by them. It was still thin, for now.

It would grow stronger before the day was done.

—

Klaus had been raised to the old military dictum of never assaulting a fortress unless you had three times the enemy's number. Back in the Empire the first Terribilis had noted in his Ars Tactica that twice the number was sufficient if you had spellcaster superiority, but that was a worthless piece of advice for anyone but the Praesi. You couldn't go up against the Dread Empire and expect your spellslingers to be up to snuff. Much, as he had discovered over the last two days, like you couldn't expect dwarven siege weapons to be a match for goblin engineering. The first day had been opened by an artillery duel and his host had not come out the better for it. The Empire's trebuchets and ballistas fired further and swifter than the catapults and trebuchets bought from the Kingdom Under, and the knock-off scorpions brought by the Arlesites had been about useful as tits on a sparrow. Not a single one of the them had survived long enough to come into firing range. If the old general had twice as many men he could have swept through one line of defence after another, taking the losses as he went. But as things stood? If he went it half-cocked, less than a third of his army would emerge from the meat grinder to set foot in Callow.

The outer walls in both valleys were old Proceran fortifications taken by the Kingdom of Callow the last time the border principalities botched an invasion of the Vales, later repurposed to serve as defensive lines facing the other way. They were, essentially, piles of stone twenty feet high with steeply sloped hills behind them the Praesi had set their engines on. No bastions, no towers, nothing more elaborate than stones piled up high with mortar holding them together. One-Eye and the Carrion Lord had defended it with a bare few hundred, regulars and sappers, so he'd launched an escalade under cover of the artillery duel. Within the first half-hour of the offensive he'd lost over two thousand soldiers. Sappers lobbed their munitions onto the ladders, killing as many with the fall as the explosions, while crossbow volleys fired straight into tightly-packed ranks earned swaths of dead. They'd taken the damned walls, of course. Fortifications that bare couldn't be held against his numbers, and he'd half-expected the enemy would let him have them uncontested. Instead the Praesi had defended for less than an hour, taken maybe three dozen casualties and retreated with all their engines intact. That'd set the tone for the second day.

Another four thousand gone to take the kind of defences you saw in your average Lycaonese border town. Low walls and towers, a single central bastion. He'd sent the heroes in with the first wave, with massed mage support, and run into a godsdamned wall. The fortifications were warded so thoroughly nothing he had could crack them in the slightest, and the grounds fifty feet from the foot of the walls were seeded what Praesi called lily fields. Hidden pits with spikes at the bottom. The assault's momentum shattered, Legion mages began torching everything in sight and the entire attack would have collapsed if not for a Chosen called the Fortunate Fool. Klaus had considered the man essentially useless, considering he had truck with more herbs than your average alchemist, but the hero had stumbled his way onto a safe path through the lily field by sheer happenstance. The other Chosen rallied the levies and led an assault on the walls in the southern valley. None of the Damned had come out to meet them, at least, something he'd been assured was a consequence of the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods refraining from entering the fray.

It'd taken most of the day to force the Praesi back in both valleys. He'd called a halt after that, well aware his men did not have the stomach to march into whatever nastiness the Carrion Lord had awaiting. Or the ability to match goblin nightsight: all torches and priestly glows would accomplish was mark targets for the enemy siege. Now the third dawn had come, and steel would be bared again. The defensive line ahead would be the beginning of the real fight, he knew. On both sides, though at different lengths from a bird's eye view, the valleys narrowed into passes flanked by cliffs. Those natural defences had been the seat of Callowan fortresses for centuries, the rock Proceran offensives broke on. The Bloody Twins, Alamans called them. Massive towers forty feet high sitting atop slopes at an angle of almost sixty degrees. There were dirt paths leading up, but they were not wide. Forcing the Twins was going to be ugly business, but it had to be done. They were the high point of both valleys, the terrain going down towards Callow after them. Claiming the high ground would allow Klaus' fucking engines to finally start being more than expensive targets, and with the fortresses still awaiting ahead he'd need every advantage he could get.

Klaus swatted Ratbiter absent-mindedly to keep him from chewing away at the red marigolds that grew everywhere in the valleys, and were allegedly responsible for their name. They were said to have been gold, once upon a time, but had since grown red from all the blood spilled on these grounds over the centuries.

"De Guison," he called out, and the mageling snapped to attention. "Contact the northern front. We're beginning our attacks."

The man made a three-act play out of obeying a simple order, but the old general's attention had already left him. He gestured for his personal hornblower to sound the offensive and eyed the grounds he needed to take before getting to the southern Twin. Almost four hundred yards of more or less flat grounds, before getting at the foot of the slope. Then another half hundred, marching up one of the continent's most viciously designed natural fortresses. He was going to lose thousands just on the approach, and that'd be if the Praesi had no surprised awaiting. He knew better than to expect that. There was a reason he'd ordered for the Fortunate Fool to run ahead of the first ranks, the silly-looking idiot in silks taking point so good soldiers need not die. His instincts had been correct, he discovered shortly.

The Chosen walked over innocuous-looking grounds and was blown high into the sky by an explosion about a hundred yards from the bottom of the slope, landing on his back a dozen feet forward. Where he blew up again. Under Klaus' sceptical gaze, five explosions were chained in a row until the man arrived halfway through the evidently mined field. He got up, looking a little charred, and patted himself in panic to put out the flames on his chest. The Prince of Hannover was familiar with the effects of Praesi demolition charges, and he silently reassessed how bloody difficult this Chosen would be to actually put down. A few streaks of lightning shot down from atop the Twin but the Fortunate Fool ducked them by a series of very coincidental trips and falls, before waddling back to the Proceran lines and loudly claiming victory. Klaus now had a basic notion of enemy mage range and the concentration of buried charges. The assault proper could begin.

"Priests forward," he ordered his standard-bearer. "Sweep for the munitions."

The robed brothers and sisters of the House of Light strode forward as ordered, and it was but a few moments before streaks of light began hammering at the ground in an advancing wave. The growing narrowness of the valley here ran to their advantage, for once. Less territory to cover. Munitions detonated in plumes of earth and smoke one after another, destroying the traps at the unfortunate cost of breaking up the terrain. Advance would be even more difficult. The enemy waited patiently for them to finish, silhouettes atop the tower unmoving. The murder holes and larger openings for scorpions were bristling with steel, a promise of death yet to come.

"Mages and engines, forward," Klaus told his standard-bearer. "Our vanguard is to prepare for advance on my signal."

Never get into a siege with Praesi, he'd once told his niece. He still believed it, though he had no other choice. The Legions of Terror as forged by the Reforms were one of the finest war machines on the continent, and in this series of valleys he couldn't even use the major advantage his people had over the Empire. Cavalry. Instead he was forced to play to the enemy's strengths, to his distaste, and because of it this was not so much war as a slugging match of piled corpses. Dragged forward, the catapults were set down and panes of opaque yellow light formed to protect them.

The third battle for the Vales began.

—

"We are witnessing," Grem gravely said, "the birth of a Proceran combined arms doctrine."

Amadeus hummed in agreement.

"It was only a matter of time," he said. "We showed the effectiveness of it during the Conquest. The Principate was too preoccupied with the civil war to catch up, but they've had time to breathe since Hasenbach took power. She gave her uncle free hand to reform the Principate's war doctrine, and Papenheim is no fool. Catherine faced much the same tactics up north."

The old orc grunted unhappily.

"If she'd listened to Istrid's daughter and gone ahead with Bonfire, she wouldn't have had to," he said. "It was a solid plan. Would have taken Procer out of the war, and without the Principate the crusade collapses."

It was a natural consequence of his former apprentice having folded two legions into her Army of Callow that Amadeus had gained plethora eyes and ears among her officer corps. The Duni had mostly used these to keep abreast of her war strategy and arrange his own accordingly. Scribe's agents in her army, on the other hand, had been waging a war with Alaya's own spies in the ranks. He'd preferred passing information to her amusingly-named Jacks rather than carrying out the killings through his own proxies, though on occasion more direct intervention had been needed. He was quite pleased, in fact, with how quickly and solidly her network of spies and assassins had grown. The Thief was proving skilled at the art, though it would be years before the Jacks were in the same league as Alaya's agents or Eudokia's. Penetration in depth was difficult to achieve with such limited time and coin.

"It would have painted a target on her neck for every single hero on the continent," Amadeus replied. "The choice was correct."

"They're already out for her blood, Amadeus," Grem grunted. "It's a crusade, not a petty border dispute."

"The difference is in being a target or the target," the green-eyed man said. "No villain can survive the amount of heroic focus Bonfire would have brought. The initial stages would have been a success, but within a few months a band of heroes specifically geared towards killing her would have been grown or assembled."

"A few months would have been enough to cleave Procer in half," Grem said.

"Perhaps," Amadeus shrugged. "But it would have signed her death warrant. She is cleverer than that."

The hint of pride in his voice at that, he did not suppress. His old friend caught it easily enough.

"She stabbed you, Black," he growled. "Don't wave that away as youthful enthusiasm, because we certainly haven't."

Eudokia, to his occasional headache, had made that abundantly clear. He'd had to outright order her not to take revenge.

"One who rears a tiger should not complain of stripes," Amadeus quoted in Mtethwa.

"Your tiger put on a crown and raised an army after stealing three legions," Grem growled in Kharsum. "We're past stripes."

"My tiger beat back an army twice the size of hers strengthened by the two most famous living heroes on Calernia," the dark-haired man laughed. "Three legions, one of which was always hers, is a paltry price to pay for that."

"She's going to turn on the Empire, Black," the Marshal warned. "We all know it."

Amadeus leaned against the crenelation as ballistas fired around them, hammering at the shields protecting the Proceran engines. The stones those were lobbing at the tower bounced off harmlessly or shattered. Wekesa had found it an amusing irony that the warding scheme he'd used here was a variation of a Callowan work. The very same that had once protected the walls of Liesse, dispersal of impact across the entire structure. The crusaders could fire at the Twin for months without making a dent, if they did not focus their fire.

"Is the Empire as it currently stands so worthy of survival?" the Black Knight murmured. "I think not. If it cannot adapt, then let it perish. Out of the ashes we will raise something other than a snake devouring its own tail, shattering the world with its throes as it seeks to sate empty hunger."

"Dangerous words," Grem said.

"Yet here you stand," Amadeus said. "Without ever having obeyed your summons back to Ater."

"It's illegal to order a Marshal back from an active war front without evidence of treason," the orc said.

The Duni turned green eyes to his old friend, brow quirking. The orc looked away.

"She won her games," Grem One-Eye finally said. "But she still played them."

They left it at that, eyes returning to the unfolding battle. Papenheim had learned over the last two days the price of an infantry advance on Legion-held fortifications, even with dwarven engines providing cover, but he had little other choice than to repeat the previous performance. He could not starve out the defenders, nor did he have another path than the Vales to march through. The old bottleneck that had kept Procer at bay for centuries was bleeding it once more. Grem ordered for mage fire to be held as the crusader vanguard advanced, passing the engines and charging towards the slope. A handful of heroes were at the front, but Amadeus saw no need to intervene. They'd likely be able to shatter the tower gates if they made it there, but there was the rub. If. The orc that was the highest-ranked officer in the Legions of Terror waited until the enemy was fully committed before ordering the mages to send the signal. Up on the mountaintops, faraway, there was an explosion. Months of work by sappers, all for this single moment. Amadeus counted seventy-nine heartbeats before the water began pouring down from the very discreet channel carved into the mountainside.

There was a deep mountain lake, far out of sight. Digging a tunnel through hard rock and corking it with a dike had been a wonder of goblin engineering. He'd been quite amused, hearing that Catherine had dropped a fae lake atop her enemies up north. What the sappers had devised was not so different. The stream of water, quickened by the slopes, hit the outer edge of the Proceran lines. A few were killed by the sheer weight and momentum, but the real damage came from the spread of water sweeping away everything it touched. And continuing, at that same steady pace. Mages moved their shields to contain the situation, struggling to find the location the water was pouring from – it was hidden by an illusory ward. All they achieved, in the end, was to contain the flood until the pressure grew beyond the ability of their hodgepodge spell formulas to weather. Priests intervened as well, weaving fences of light, but they were not sufficiently organized to form a comprehensive wall. The water went around it. Surprise, Amadeus mused, was the most dangerous weapon in any army's arsenal. Still, it would not be long before heroes intervened now. There was a flare of Light from Papenheim's camp moments later, and the illusory ward broke. The fences and shields immediately shifted to block off the opening.

"Send the second signal," Grem ordered their signal mage.

A streak of red light splashed across the sky, and twenty heartbeats later another explosion sounded. A chunk of the mountainside broke open and water began pouring again. A plan with a single point of failure, after all, was no plan at all.

"The bouquets?" Amadeus asked.

"As soon as they shift," Grem replied, eyeing the battlefield. "Lukran, tell the sappers I don't want a single Proceran engine on the field to survive this engagement. They're naked as babes in the woods."

Left shieldless, the dwarven machinery was methodically broken down by the goblin-manned ballistas as the Proceran mages and priests refocused their efforts towards the more immediate threat of water. They split, much as Grem had predicted when the general staff had planned this. The mages shielded one entrance, the priests the other. Amadeus personally would have focused on swiftness instead of optimal impact, with heroic intervention being in the cards, but he trusted the orc's instincts.

"Bouquets," Grem ordered with a feral smile.

Sorcery flared as the mages lines wove tendrils of air, each hooked to a heavy wooden barrel. Within moments a hundred of them snaked through the sky, coming to rest above the mages and priests. The spells petered out and the barrels fell. Hasty tongues of holy flame and sundry spells shot up to intercept them, but there were too many targets to handle. Many of them were duds filled with rocks, regardless. Others simple munitions. Of the hundred barrels, sixty-three fell with impact by Amadeus' count. Twenty-one of those were a mixture of smokers and sharpers, and exploded with billowing poisonous smoke. Twelve were filled with goblinfire, and the battlefield turned into a hellish green landscape in the blink of an eye. The mages and the priests broke, no longer able to hold back the waters, and the streams began to pour out again. Prince Klaus Papenheim had sent eight thousand levies and fantassins as his vanguard, with fourteen mixed catapults and trebuchets to cover them. No engine survived. Fewer than two thousand infantry did.

When night fell over the Vales, it was to the flickering of green flames on still water.

—

"Report," Klaus ordered, exhaustion bare in his voice as he sat slumped in his seat.

Princess Mathilda of Neustria was pushing forty these days. It never surprised him to see it. He remembered Mati as the rambunctious child that had been close as kin with his sister, a mischievous devil in mail skirts that never laughed as brightly as when she was shattering rattling skulls with that monster of a mace she wielded. Neustrians as a rule kept a closer eye on the happenings down south and had been known to twine their lines with those of Brus and Lyonis on occasion – unlike most Lycaonese royalty, who'd sneer at such thinning of the blood – but Mati had never been one to have an interest in courtly games. It was an old compact of the Four Houses that soldiers from the the southernmost Lycaonese principalities would reinforce the walls and fortresses at the border when the thaw came and warbands went on the march, but Mathilda had never been one for half-measures. Every year since her crowning, she'd taken all soldiers not garrisoning the border with Brus to fight the Plague as soon as spring arrived. Klaus did not consider her an exceptional tactician or strategist, but her the sight of her distinctive green armour on the front had a way of lighting a fire in men's bellies. Lycaonese had a well-worn love for royalty that led from the front. The princess' face was streaked with dirt and her short red locks pressed with sweat against her face.

"They dropped the mountain on us, Klaus," the Princess of Neustria told him in Reitz. "The fucking mountain."

Klaus leaned forward.

"The Warlock took the field?"

She shook her head.

"We think it was munitions," Mathilda said. "Wasn't sorcery, the mages say, and there were explosions. They must have mined the side through tunnels. I sent in my vanguard and the entire cliffside toppled down on it like some titan's flyswatter."

"Gods Above," the Iron Prince croaked out.

"That bloody dragon made a pass right after, blew fire straight through my priests," she said, passing a tired hand over her face. "The Silver Huntress put a magic arrow in one of its wings, but it's the only wound it took. It'll be back tomorrow."

"Casualties?" Klaus asked.

"Maybe two thousand dead, twice as many wounded," the princess sighed. "What's left of my priests is getting the wounded back on their feet."

"They went straight after our priests and casters," the Prince of Hannover said. "They're trying to cripple those before a decisive engagement."

"They're doing well at it, too," Mathilda said. "And I don't need to tell you morale went down the drain. There'll be no volunteers for the vanguard tomorrow, I can tell you that much. Doesn't help that our two alleged heavyweights have been sitting pretty this whole time."

"Chosen logic," Klaus said. "They say the Sovereign of Red Skies and the the Carrion Lord will remain out of the battle so long as they do the same."

"The other Chosen are bloody useless," the Princess of Neustria bluntly replied. "Oh, they're a pretty sight leading the charge. That Levantine girl, the Champion? She's been at the front of every offensive. But we're swinging at mist, Klaus. They can be as good at killing Praesi as they want, we're not fighting Praesi. We're fighting falling mountains, and the Champion's no use there. We need the Witch and the Heavens' hatchet man."

The Lycaonese balked at the notion of needing Chosen to win his battles for him, but there was also truth in this so he held his tongue. Outside, in the distance, water still burned green. Seven days and seven nights, that was said to be the lifespan of goblinfire. Unless he was willing to send his soldiers wading hip-deep in a lake topped by a hell of alchemy, there would be no more offensives in the southern valley. The Praesi would shift their forces accordingly, reinforcing the northern Twin, and there would be no chance breaking through there against the full muster of the Empire's finest.

"Then we will have them," Prince Klaus Papenheim. "Even if I must drag them to the front myself."

—

Hanno had died twenty-one times since morning.

He'd used his aspect in a similar manner before, but those had been shallow readings. The seeking of similarity so he could draw on the experience of his predecessors to make up for his own shortcomings. Never before had he sought lives and memories purely to learn how to kill a man. His enemy had made it difficult, nonetheless. Heroes rarely survived their first encounter with the Black Knight, and those that did were usually engaged by other Calamities on the second meeting. He'd found a single instance, the Rebel Knight, who'd bared her sword at the man twice. Three years after the Conquest, a hidden bastard child of a branch line of House Fairfax who'd inherited the same Name as Eleanor Fairfax herself. Flight after the first engagement had bought her an hour before the Black Knight caught up and slew her in her wounded exhaustion. Some other lives had taught him near nothing of use, like the Merry Brawler — the knife through the back of the neck that'd killed him only served as a reminder that the Carrion Lord preferred to kill without any struggle if he could. The Unconquered Champion had yielded the greatest amount of information. The Levantine hero had trapped his foe in his domain and teased out more tricks than any other before or after him, in large part because five mortal wounds had been needed before the man died.

Memory by memory, death by death, Hanno had woven together a whole. Sitting with his eyes closed in a tent muted from all noise by Antigone, his sword in his lap, he had studied the many murders of the Black Knight. The man had limitations. Hanno had almost thought otherwise, after their duel in Nicae, but he now saw his mistake. When recalling the skills of his predecessors his plunge had been too shallow. Mere versatility was not sufficient to kill the Carrion Lord, not when he only brought to the fore part of the skills called on. That was, the White Knight now understood, playing the villain's own preferred game. The Black Knight was himself a jack-of-all-trades, facing him with a similar approach would only lead to the victory of the older man's greater experience. The method had been incorrect, and so he had adjusted. Studied the swordsmanship the villain had learned from the Lady of the Lake, the weaknesses of that tutelage. And, upon finding them, Hanno had spent hours seeking the right combination of lives that would allow him to capitalize on those weaknesses. Three would be required: the Flawless Fencer, the Lance of Light and the Barehanded Pugilist.

The sequence was adaptable to the villain's own approach, but the result would ultimately be the same. He'd sought a handful of other lives to draw on as contingencies, should tactics he'd seen employed through other eyes be employed again, and another pair as escape and disengaging sets. Night had fallen, when he emerged from the trance, and he remained seated. Tired down to his bones and struggling to master the lingering echoes of the lives he'd dug so deep into. He would need rest before he was ready to fight. The tent's flap parted and a masked of painted stone topped by long dark tresses stared at him. Antigone, still wearing the face the Gigantes had bestowed upon her. Hanno suspected that of all the host around him, only he understood the significance of that. The favour of the Titans was not lightly earned, and no less terrible than their wrath.

"Hanno," the Witch of the Woods said, her words from no language known to man and yet perfectly understood. "The Champion wishes to speak with you."

The Gift of Tongues never ceased to invoke wonder in him when so displayed. No man or creature that could understand the spoken word would ever fail to understand his friend.

"I am done," the White Knight said, voice rough with disuse. "Come in, both of you."

The inside of his tent was bare save for a bed of straw and his armour, and so he had no earthly comforts to offer either women as they entered. Neither seemed to mind. Antigone disdained any life but that of the wilds, and Rafaella's cheer had already proved undaunted in the face of greater discomforts. The Witch's long cloak-tunic pooled around her as she sat gracefully, surrounding herself in coarse green cloth that revealed only sandal-clad feet. Rafaella, on the other hand, slumped down in a cacophony of shuddering armour. The Valiant's Champion snarling badger helm was dropped into the dirt as she shook free the long braid going halfway down her back, her tanned face split in a grin. She was not wearing, for once, the wolf fur cloak she'd claimed from someone that was no wolf at all.

"Have good day, yes?" the Champion said.

Hanno inclined his head.

"I am ready," he said.

"Good," Rafaella hummed. "My day, up and down. Easterners drop mountain on me. Tried to fight it, went not so good."

Hanno glanced at Antigone, her green eyes finding his own through the mask.

"The Legions detonated a cliffside onto the Proceran advance," she said.

The White Knight's fingers clenched. His work had been necessary, but he grieved that it had allowed the Carrion Lord to weave the deaths of so many through his inaction.

"Then dragon came," the Champion continued, sounding noticeably more pleased. "Went on dwarf machine, told soldier: 'Bald Procer man, I stand on machine. Throw me at dragon.'"

Hanno's brow rose.

"I take it he did not," he half-asked.

Rafaella sighed.

"He said 'no, stupid savage, if I do this it kill you'. I say 'maybe if I feeble Procer soldier like you, but am glorious champion of Levant'."

The tanned woman scratched her chin thoughtfully.

"Bald Procer man not happy about that," she mused. "Left and did not reply. Think he complain to tall red princess about it."

The Ashuran snorted. Proceran royalty had avoided him like the plague after the first time he'd been called upon to render judgement in a dispute and a cousin of the the Prince of Orense had been judged as unfit for continued existence by the Seraphim. Oddly enough it had warmed some of the Lycaonese to his presence, though the true gain of the affair had been the end of the insistent invitations to share cups of wine by the rest. He doubted any of what Rafaella had mentioned would be brought to him as a dispute to arbitrate.

"The Warlock still waits," Antigone said. "The Carrion Lord with him. None of our companions ever reached them."

"They were not all meant for this war," Hanno quietly replied. "For many it is beyond the scope of their Fate, bound as they are elsewhere to other works. They must be careful, lest sudden death find them. The Grey Pilgrim is not with us to forgive such mistakes."

Rafaella discreetly traced a sign on her leg at the mention of the Peregrine, expression sobering. To see her act bashful when they'd first met the man had been an almost frightening experience.

"You ready now, yes?" the Champion asked. "Time for fight."

"At dawn," Hanno replied calmly. "The fourth day is the beginning."

"Finally," the Witch of the Woods murmured.

Hanno of Arwad breathed out slowly. The sentence had already been given.

It must now be carried out, at last.

---

asherino

Thanks for the black chapter, erratic!
More black chapters pls. Maybe as patreon rewards for higher tiers? doesnt matter if they're only for flavor.

Antoninjohn

Giants wroth is bad, Giants really hate Procer, Witch of the Wilds is helping Procer. Looks like the Giants are going to intervene on Procer's ambitions

Highwayman

Well, it isn't the goblin fire party I was expecting, but nowadays I take whatever I can get.

And the Champion's wolfskin cloak from something that was not an wolf...
Someone's gonna get hurt real bad real soon, methinks.

Darkening

I actually got angry when I read the bit about the cloak. That is less than Captain deserved, however bad she may have been.

Someguy

I envision the following:-

At the dawn of the fifth day Black's battle standard hung a new talisman which had been added to their demonic paraphernalia.

There, suspended in the breeze, hung the remains of the Valiant Champion.

Her skin, rather. Flayed from her body by the orcs, sewn into sacks which bellied in the breeze, and smeared with the excrement of goblins. The skin-sack had been cleverly designed so that it channeled the wind into a wail of horror. The skin hung suspended by the hair of one who had once filled them in life. The Blackguards took great care to hold it in such a manner that the crusaders and remaining heroes could see her face.

hoyboy

Nah, Champion's coming for Black's skin next.

Yotz

Pools of blood glisten so brightly. Death cries echo so harmoniously. We drink deeply of fear and pain. Only thus we can soothe our fiery hearts.

On that vein of thoughts we may as well repurpose old Rusty Prince's fucking engines into the literal copulation machines. And chain them into a train, for good measure. Well, Bad measure. Without brakes, of course – for there ain't no brakes on that bloody thing...

ALazyMonster

I feel like this description came from a relic from one of the item guides for exalted. Probably one of the Infernals or Abyssals items.

David

Nicely stolen from Drake and Flint's Bellisarius series.

daegone823

It like that comic Invincible a sign of respect to the enemy. I mean the Champion claimed that they had songs about the Captain, she respected her as an opponent. Lets face it the captain had it coming she is a villain and has murdered countless people in fits of rage her damage has been so widespread, she spawned many heroes to counter her.

Without the Black knight maneuvering the Calamities they would have died long ago. Still Champion is similar to Chat who wove the banner's of her enemies. I like a little equality in my stories when you die your number is up good or evil. So make the best of your story while you can.

Daemion

Who is Chat?

JJR

She was the hero who sacrificed herself to strike the final blow against the demon of absence, remember?

RanVor

If skinning your enemies and making clothes out of their hides is so evil, why the Hells are **they** allowed to do it?

Yotz

Pro'bly 'cause of Monsters forfeiting the right to not being skinned upon becoming a Monster. If she'd were killed in her human form, she'd retain her skin intact.

RanVor

It's still fucked up.

Yotz

But that only if you count Monsters as people. Which is definitely not the statement Above will ever accept.

RanVor

I don't care what Above accept or not, they themselves are more fucked up than anything else in APGtE.

Highwayman

Same here, but its not entirely without precedent though (Cat's Cloak of Woe).

Metrux

Well, except for a single soul, the cloack is made of CLOTH, like any other cloack... The distinction is from where this cloth came from. So, not using parts of dead things.

RanVor

But a soul **is** a part of a dead **person**. The actual difference is that Cat isn't supposed to be above this kind of thing.

Insanenoodlyguy

To be fair, Champion might consider this the greatest respect she could give a fallen foe.

sengachi

Straight up blocking both valleys with goblinfire or trying to detonate massive caches of goblinfire under the crusade's entire army is just begging for heroic intervention to turn the goblinfire back on you in the worst possible way. This is probably the smartest possible use they could have made of it.

Gods, heroes do take the fun out of everything. They make all the really big, grand tactics nonviable.

Argentorum

"She won her games, but she still played them."

Facts.

Also the heck does Malecia think she's doing, recalling her marshal during the middle of an invasion? Does she **want** to lose this war? If Klaus gets through the Vales with too many men, there's no way Callow holds, bound by truce or not.

Someguy

Recalling a Marshal in the middle of a war...Is she asking to follow in the footsteps of Emperor Gaozong?

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yue\_Fei#Death

Yotz

There is a possibility. Though, that was probably the "attic promotion" move to weaken Black. Then again, now that Marshal had shewn his colours, that possibility becomes frighteningly inevitable.

sengachi

Nah. Malicia isn't that stupid, she knows she needs the best she's got to defend the Vale. Rather, I'd guess this is part of a long strategy. She **knows** Grem would refuse the recall order (on legitimate grounds, yes) but she'll finagle that into Grem's removal after the worst of the immediate threats is dealt with anyway.

Outright removing Grem One-Eye is a no-go, but if you start setting up the pieces a year or two in advance and get Grem to voluntarily bow out of the political process you're assembling against him, well, that might be doable.

Oshi

If nothing else it's a way to make sure Black gives something up to keep Grem where he is. No matter the path Malicia prospers.

vuthuha912

It is such a shitty move. When you are fighting for your country, the last thing you want to know is your Empress is prepared to fuck you over once the fighting is done. I mean this is the tamer version of Zhao King and Li Mu during the Spring and Autumn period. Worse, if the story evolves to the Yi Sun Sin Version or the Yue Fei Version then I don't even know what to say. Please Gods Below, don't let Black become the next Han Xin.

Jonnnney

I think she is less worriedly about heroes toppling the tower than she is about Catherine climbing it.

JC

Aww I hope the next few chapters aren't about Black and Warlock getting absolutely creamed by these heroes, but I'm pretty sure it will be that.

RanVor

Actually, I think this is the shittiest moment possible for Black to die, narratively speaking. Not long ago he witnessed his lifelong best friend betray everything he believed in. If he died now, before taking any action to deal with the consequences of what was undoubtedly the turning point of his life, this entire plotline would amount to nothing.

He's probably still going to die before it ends, but not now. It would be a total waste of an excellent plot thread.

PotatoMan

So Hangnail attacks next interlude? Dope

nerferf

The whiteknight still doesn't know that that fight before with black was all about bard vs black vs tyrant and only included him as the tool

Ya figured bard giving black a victory monologue after black went down should have tipped him off

Poor bastard is a dead man walking, gonna be funny though

Darkening

Pretty sure Hanno was pretty out of it when Bard showed up and gave that speech to Black, he got caught in the backlash along with Black.

Mr. Nobody

Are you sure about that? Don't forget the possibility of Black being in a pattern of three with Hanno. Black always tries to avoid those, but last time Hanno was pretty much trashed by Black and survived; I can already see the story taking shape. Although Black is no fool to engage him in a fair fight, I expect Hanno to have a few tricks up his sleeve to make Black confront him again.

**Sigh**

Champion really managed to bring my hate for the Heroes on this story to a new level.

Really, it's frustrating to see her being alive for so long. Even Akua was more likable.

nerferf

Nah, too obvious that bard took the spotlight and overshadowed whiteknight and took the main role for the gods above in that story and made the heroes into the support cast given she sacrifice them to kill captain at the same time

I think that happening there allowed Hierarch to banish her when she tried to strong-arm him since she couldn't use her bystander/ ignore me to just manipulate things given it may only work as long as the story sees her as a side cast

MetruX

The thing is, that as a very experienced Named, Black can recognize when there is a pattern. He said himself that no pattern arised between him and White, which just means, in his book, that he will soon die and the White is predestined to confront ANOTHER Black Knights, who he thinks Catherine will be.

nerferf

Yeah, he said that before cat lost her name after that clusterfuck at liesse

And given that at this point its more likely cat would get a ruler name if she ever can given her fae nature that belief is void

If anything from that story i would say black started a pattern of three with bard given he beat her in that showdown of the callow rebels, lost to her in the free cites clusterfuck and they still havent had the 3rd confontation

Metalshop

Love the poem at the beginning. I could stand to read a whole chapter of nothing but Callowan songs and folk sayings.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Ugh, I could not. Please do not do this

goliath1303

I wish EE had don't something like this. I didn't make it much past here on my last read through, but considering the story is over and I've never heard of a chapter like that I'm guessing it didn't happen. One of the nice things about reading a story is that, if you don't like a part of it/the whole story, you don't have to read it. So if such a chapter was written, people who like the songs and poems, like Metalshop and myself, could enjoy said chapter. While we were enjoying it you'd be totally free to be on some other website complaining about the free media you were enjoying, other people's opinions, or whatever had the dubious luck of catching your attention that day. It's actually a win-win for people like us, we get to read some awesome songs and poems AND we get to do so knowing there's a good chance you won't be around! Of course that chance is only good in a relative sense and in actuality the fact that you would dislike it would actually make you more likely to read and comment on it.

Someguy

I'd prefer the full Play-script for "The Many Deaths of Dread Emperor Traitorous".

Not\_a\_robot

I would pay a far from insignificant portion of my meagre earnings to read that.

Agent J

I'll pay double to watch it.

superkeaton

Ah, we finally get to see Black and Grem! And they did not disappoint. Grem's as clever as Black's made him sound and I always love to hear Black doting on Cat.

That Hanno though... The boy really was specifically made to kill Black, wasn't he? We'll see if his LEGO strategy works. I'm also immensely curious about what makes the Giant-taught mage so dangerous to the Warlock.

It does hurt a bit to find out that the Champion skinned Captain. I hope her husband never finds out...

daegone823

Hano was made to counter Chat his whole being is to counter her style of fighting along with her role. His healing actually damages anything nearby hurting Chat who is close ranged fighter. His aspects of ride will counter her use of un-dead horses. His other aspect of recall gives him an experience leverage being able to adapt to enemies and having a large wealth of knowledge at his fingerprints. This counters chat who relies on others for experience and is not a battle tested as other names.

Black tried to end the white knight several times but was unable to because he was not "his" enemy. He tried to initiate a rule of three battle sequence but was unable to. His role afterward was to be an evil obi wan for Chat making the ultimate sacrifice so that Chat could reform creation. The Malicia ruined it all with her death ray mega weapon.

S00000 Chat vs White Knight is final fight most likely.

Mr. Nobody

Chat...? B B

Yotz

Cheshire Cat.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

IT'S SPELLED KAT I THINK PLZ UPDATE

Daemion

Seriously, please stop using "Chat" as name. It's just annoying. Thanks.

CrysJaL

I disagree. His kit is built around beating Black. He has the memories and skills of all the heroes Black killed and through that can adapt to Black's skillset whilst also learning how to counter everything. His entire power revolves around being better at Black's own game. He knows Black's tricks, he is also unpredictable for Black due ti his variable skillset and as a result Black can't plan for him as he otherwise would.

Decius

Black knows exactly how to handle a hero that is built especially to kill him.

Have him fight Warlock.

goliath1303

C-A-T Cat. It's 3 letters and is literally probably the most common go-to example of an "easy word". Pre-preschool age children are able to master it. It appears multiple times in almost every fucking chapter of this story. It's not funny, cute, endearing, or anything but annoying. It's even worse than Kat.

vuthuha912

Maybe it is the spellcheck. My spellcheck always underlines Cat's name when I type it in. I don't like typing Catherine as it is too serious and formal.

Darkening

As I recall she mostly just has a whole lot of raw power, since the point that was made is that she'd beat Warlock out in a slugging match. I'm sure she's fairly talented, but a slugging match is the last thing Warlock would get into if he could avoid it. Hedge mostly gave him trouble because she had a counter for every one of his tricks. I expect he'll find some ways to attack from unexpected directions.

Oshi

Not the last one

Argentorum

Where do baby villains come from, I wonder.

Above acts like it has the monopoly on righteous vengeance, but if Champion doesn't die here (this tying off her arc under Black's own revenge), it wouldn't surprise me to see one or more of Captain's kids getting a name. Hell, maybe even all together.

Mother who tried to keep them from the dark realities of the world killed and skinned by a hero? Said hero literally wearing their mother like a scarf? Yeah, this is the stuff revenge stories are born from.

RanVor

Above **do** have a monopoly on righteous vengeance. Any kind of vengeance against them or their servants is non-righteous by default because they get to define the righteousness. But that just means their righteousness isn't worth a shit.

CrysJaL

But as we have seen with Cat, they don't have a monopoly on the "heroic" stories. Riteous vengeance, fighting to kill the monster that slew your parent is certainly a heroic story. But also, villains can fight villains. Who is to say that heroes cannot do the same thing. Within narratives it often turns out that "they were good all along" but it wouldn't stop the riteous hero from delivering the final blow before the revelation.

Type

You know, I think I hate the Champion now.

Aaron Wagner

Someone please write the fanfiction where Captain's children (her curse I believe was on her bloodline after all) exterminate the entire champion bloodline.

hoyboy

Wait a minute! Strike that, reverse it. Thank you.

Yotz

Oh, you mean The Curse befalling the Champion's bloodline, so they will hunt, torture, and skin alive their brothers and sisters until the entire bloodline will cease to be in a cacophonical crescendo of glorious self-annihilation...
Naughty, naughty boy!

hoyboy

Literally what the poster above was advocating.

Forrest

I'm pretty sure they said for Captain's children to kill of Champion's line, but hey.

RandomFan

The poster above was advocating that Captain's children and further descendants would kill off the Champion's line. If you reverse it, Champion's line gets the curse, but that wouldn't take away Captain's line's curse, and so you have a glorious conflict of cursed vs. cursed, even while Champion has to deal with her spawn being the same type of monster she's killed so many times. Cursed is probably an evil name by default, too.

That'd be a fun story, especially since Champion is the type of person who wears the skin of thinking creatures as a boast.

esryok

In fairness, Catherine smokes narcotics using the carved bones of thinking creatures. And our friendly neighborhood orcs consume thinking creatures. I'm down for being mad at Champion for taking trophies from a well-liked character, but I give her a pass on the "and also she was sapient!" part.

Actually, I'm pulling a Masego here and going with "eh, Champions gonna Champion." I'm enjoying seeing such an archetypical murderhobo wandering around an otherwise serious fantasy world, and haven't got enough room in my brain to be mad and delighted at the same time. Delight wins!

hoyboy

OMG OMG OMG I LOVE CHAMPION SO MUCH.

Hope she uses Black's skin as a cloak too.

RanVor

This comment section is in dire need of a "dislike" button.

hoyboy

I'm very sorry that WordPress does not allow you to suppress dissenting opinions by committee like you can on reddit lol.

Also, hope Wekesa gets a mandala enema,

RanVor

And I hope I'll never see you comment here again, but hey, you don't always get what you want.

Allafterme

Sadly

Mr. Nobody

I don't even know why he's still reading this despite his dislike for the mc and her companions. But who cares?

There's a lot of masochists out there, and I won't condemn their twisted tastes and terrible use of time.

Jonnnney

Trolling is a thing

lennymaster

Everything has its limits. Especially trolling.

TeK

You are new here, ain't ya?

vuthuha912

It is a little bloodthirsty and unnecessarily cruel. And Black is quite short and his skin is ... not really magical or useful. It will also be too ... villainous for a Hero.

blitzxsblitzxs

I don't like this. In a narrative sense Black is setting his side up for a big loss. In stories, the villain's armies usually have the upperhand initially before the heroes rally the tired survivors into a big comeback victory.

Oshi

Except they don't. Papenhiem has a host of 50k. He lost a fifth of it and still has twice the number the legions field. The story is 300. Black might die but they will lose the war. The bard will interfere to stop this and change. It should be fun to see how.

IDKWhoitis

If White Knight gets KO'd somehow, the offensive will fail, with or without Black. Grem can hold this line if there are no Named on either side. Also, Bard may not be allowed to intervene, since the main plotline of the war may be Cat's play to be Chaotic "Good". The Bard doesn't get to pick where she shows up, and she may not be able to interfere.

SpeckofStardust

eh without the white knight and the Witch they wouldn't be able to break though until the reinforcements from the Levant got here.

They got stopped on the third defensive line.

Considering each line got progressively harder to break, and that they failed to break the third one today...

Darkening

I kinda read it as this being the toughest part, since it's the height of the slope of the pass and it's downhill from here, that'd make it easier on the people assaulting the later walls without having to contend with the ridiculous elevated hill. And given that natural benefit, you'd probably invest most of your effort into fortifying that natural choke point. I'm sure the later walls aren't pushovers, but the Bloody Twins are probably the high point of the defenses in a lot of ways.

Rook

It's not about how hard your swing is, it's about whether your swing hits correct target, and in the way you need it to. The overall narrative flow of the battle right now is less important than the initiative he gains in being able to make the first strike in the Named struggle against the White Knight & co.

Especially since the WK is a reoccurring opponent (warning signs, that nearly never happens against Black), with nearly the perfect skillset to counter Black. Drawing experience from every Hero he's has ever killed removes the issue of being impossible to adapt to Black due to being brutally murdered on the first or second confrontation. On top of that it gives Hanno every skillset he could ever ask for to try taking him down.

This comes on the back of a greater context in Black having several death flags to begin with – no rule of three triggering, Captain falling, a successor in place and independent enough to rise on their own, and having predicted/planned for a very likely death around this exact time. He's currently more vulnerable than he has been in an extremely long time. He needs to play this fight like he's a titan skating across a thawing lake in order to ensure winning or even surviving this battle.

Forcing the Heroes into making the opening move against the Legions is 100% the correct move here.

Euodiachloris

This is what I love about the set-up: Hanno is currently built to counter the old Black Knight – this Amadeus, however, is the doting daddy who loves and supports his stab-happy daughter. He's not quite the same old Black Knight supporting his Dread Empress. 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

That's why I'm thinking that Warlock is going to blow Hanno away, while a confused Witch gets stabbed repeatedly by shadows.

Jonnnney

That story involves the villain being on the attack. Not too many stories about the villain dying while defending the outer reaches of the territory he conquered 20 years prior.

---

> The First under Grem was holding the southern passage along with Mok's Third and Sacker's Ninth. Marshal Ranker and her Fourth were leading the defence of the northern valleys, commanding the freshly-rebuilt Twelfth and Nekheb's Tenth.

Is Mok the vampire general, or that was the Eleventh and the legions were shuffled around?

Brent Chance

Mok is an ogre general I believe.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Yes, ogre. The name gives it away, ogres have simple monosyllabic names like goblin names all end in -er

werafdsaew

The hostility between Black and Malicia's camp surprises me; I thought they patched things up after their talk in the Epilogue of the previous book. And wasn't Malicia the one who said that their differences would be settled privately?

Yotz

Guess that's as private as it can get – official handshakes and proclamations of unity, and Polichinelo's secret of undercarpet moves against one another.

ahd

That wasn't patching things up. That was Black implying that the Foundling Queen's plan to make a better world was a better bet than the Dread Empress' plan to loose every horror she could find to save her skin.

And the Dread Empress either not listening or not caring about her Black Knight's opinion of the strategic situation. I'd be thinking with my feelings, too, if I'd just lost the magic fortress that I'd put years of work and used up entire provinces of resources to have built.

Jonnnney

Their differences between each other will be settled privately. Their differences involving how to deal with Catherine and Callow aren't private

TeK

Nah, they don't have hostilities. Merely a friendly disagreement about whether or not Cat should be brutally murdered. Ya know, in Praes, assassination is a mere sign of respect, and poison is used as a gods damned flavoring. What supprises you?

RanVor

Red the flowers, red the crown, vote for Guide 'til Ward is down!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What's your problem with Ward? It's an awesome story as well.

RanVor

I don't have anything against Ward specifically. I just want Guide to be on the top again.

lennymaster

I do have a problem with Ward, or rather Worm. I think it has dominated the Top Web Fiction List -undeservedly- for far too long. I do not consider it to be bad, merly mediocre. The thought it might, or rather already has, inspire other authors to cover up weaknesses in their writing with pure gruesomeness fills me with dread. It is a fact after all, that there are alwayes trendsetters influencing others to follow their lead.

Like Harry Dresden caused a slew of run-down, more or less dark and tragic hero mages, being physically and emotionally abused into one halfhearted finale after another.

Or twilight the creation of half baked vampires, that were just about as bad as the original, but were so dark and gritty, or completly overpowered, because they did not sparkle and HAD to drink blood.

Or the countles OTHER versions of magic schools after Harry Potter.

It is a fact that medicore works, like Harry Potter, or Worm for that matter, fill market niches and thus become trendsetters. I do not claim that all of those books are bad, hell some even achieve greatness, but most following such trensetters are worse then the originals.

There are always exceptions, like Aleron Kong's Chaos Seeds, who, riding the epidemic of terrible LitRPGs, created an amazing series. But that is what they are, exceptions. That is why the adulations for Worm/Ward on sites like these, going even so far as to immediately challenge even a harmless call to vote for Guide and beat Ward.

I know, many people familiar with my posts consider me annoying, constantly harping on about Worm whenever somebody mentions it, but I love reading Guide, I love reading the discussions about it afterwards, but every time I see Worm/Ward mentioned, it soures my enjoyment.

Matthew

Worm is amazing. Also, as a pure accomplishment, it is unmatched. Three War and Peaces worth of words in two years.

Daemion

I think the Wandering Inn might beat that. There's also a story about a deceptive chest that gets large updates quite often.

Worm was cool and funny, all the other Wildbow stories afterwards were basically the same setup with different themes and were missing the humour of it. Ward is still interesting but also not very exciting. It doesn't draw me in at all.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

@Matthew

Sounds like you'd like Jack Kerouac's On the Road. It's much, much shorter, but the book was written in a single mad typing session over two or three days.

Like Wildbow, Kerouac had done lots and lots of work on different aspects of their stories in the months and years prior to writing, and I think that's the real key. Do your foundational work first before that transcendent creational flurry is possible.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You thought Worm covered up weaknesses in its writing with pure gruesomeness? What weaknesses, exactly?

I think Worm is among the very best sci-fi ever written. It's what George R.R. Martin aspires to: an epic sized story that's coherent throughout and that has a satisfying ending that lives up to the massive scale of the story; the ending is what really sets Worm apart for me. There are a lot of writers who know how to build up an epic world, but don't know how to craft an ending that answers all the important questions believably, without some deus ex machina to fudge things (ahem, Peter F. Hamilton).

I have faith Brandon Sanderson will achieve this kind of ending for Stormlight.

the verbiage ecstatic

Worm is fantastic, a super-fun read, and a tremendous accomplishment in terms of how well it sticks the landing after so much escalation and build up. But best sci fi ever written, really? I don't think it (or Practical Guide, which is also really enjoyable) is anywhere near in the same league as:

Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep?

The Martian Chronicles

Dune

The Fafherd and Grey Mouser stories

His Dark Materials

Starship Troopers

Cryptonomicon

A Wrinkle in Time (and sequels)

... to name the ones I can think of off the top of my head

I think the web serial genre is great and I love the disruption of traditional publishing, but people have been writing really good books, many of them in the sci fi and fantasy genres, for a LONG time.

Sanderson's books (which I haven't read yet and am sure are great) are pretty much the only traditionally-published novels I see called out in threads like these... there's a LOT more to the world of amazing sci fi and fantasy writing than that!!

Naoru

Worm is really good, but Ward falls behind. So far is... something. All the good parts come from wanting to know what had happened to characters that were in worm, and the rest is rather bland. Abuses of infodumps in the beginning, has a lot of chapters that go nowhere and it just not as good as worm. Only now it has started to warm up after arcs, which is A LOT. I read it just fine, and is not a horrible story by any means, but it doesnt deserve top one, and I think is there for all the worm fans that just vote blindly for ward. The guide and The wandering inn are so, so much better, both of them.

Leonard Inkret

The song is beautiful

taovkool

The song was nice. Black's 'proud dad' moment was cool. And dragons are apparently very weak against heroes? Makes sense, I suppose.

Darkening

Especially archers sounds like. Since a smart dragon could just stay flying and breath fire and avoid the epic confrontation with a knight or whatever. (Though I'm sure champion launching herself out of a catapult would be suitably epic enough a moment to give her a fighting chance at reaching it and killing it.)

sengachi

Dragons are the ultimate hero bait. Any hero narrative a dragon gets even remotely tangled up in is going to end with a dead dragon.

blitzxsblitzxs

Heh. I just noticed something. White is pretty much tailor made to fight Catherine, right? But what about Akua? She fights way differently compared than Catherine. Where Catherine is a melee-focused fighter where she will surely get trounced by White's many methods, Akua tends to trap and confuse her enemies before bombarding them with spells. I can nearly see the fight happen. White dominating the fight and Cat on the backfoot before she suddenly switches with Akua who throws White offguard. White switches to style designed to fight Caster type opponents then Catherine comes back in with a brutal melee throwdown. The two of them switching back and forth to match White's switching. It's ironic that it's similar to White's Recall Aspect.

MetruX

If this trully happen I'll only laugh, because diferently from Cat, White can't reutilize the same powerset. So, each time they trade and make him trade in turn, he loses another option, until he wins by being a hero on his last legs, or he has nothing else to throw in the fray.

sutortyrannus

"Killing heroes, in Amadeus' eyes, was much like peeling an onion.

Layer by layer it went, until all that remained was the weeping."

RanVor

Unfortunately, I don't think the construction of chapters allows for this kind of POV switching.

Mr. Nobody

Maybe it will not be in a single chapter, but I can see how massive of a cliff hanger it would be if deployed.

Cat's chapter >>> Akua and Hanno's interlude >>> Cat's chapter wrapping up the fight

Greg

That would be an interesting twist, that she has to switch between practical and monster evil just to confuse the White Knight.

But honestly? At this point Hanno actually seems like his tricks would lose handily against Cat as she is now. He is a good counter to Black, who is supremely skilled but constantly stated to be weaker and more vulnerable once you can actually hit him. So was Squire; she just made accepting mutilation for victory into her shtick. But Winter Queen Cat? She has ridiculous regenerative abilities, necromancy that seems not weak to Light, and unlike Black, is apparently able to tank an Angel's intervention long enough to finish off a hero.

Which is a sign, I think, that Cat truly is succeeding in forging her own, unforeseen path, because the nemesis the Gods Above seemingly made to end her is not particularly suited to her new form. Saint and Pilgrim seem to be Heaven's greatest BS heroes right now, and they were sent not after the decades-proven hero-killers, but against Cat and her band of slightly less competent killers. I think that says something, and it's not about striking the weakest link with overwhelming force.

Sol Invictus

This*

Cat has a Rivals Team Up story in her pocket. That's an unbeatable story whenever it's first used.

Also I would like to point out that Akua said that the only reason that she was able to control Cat's body is because she found a stray piece of Winter and made it her own. This is after Saint cut the winter mantle. Odds are the stray piece that Akua found was the one Saint cut off.

Antony444

I can't help but find it a bit amusing that the Procerans' hopes are now based on two more heroes taking the field. The Crusaders began with an advantage of two and a half against one, it's now two against one.

Plus no matter what they say, it's not the last fortification they have to deal with. There are two more behind this one. And the siege engines of the Crusade becoming once more useful is not really realistic given the rate they're losing them.

At least it validates completely Cordelia 'Stairway' strategy. If they had not opened up a passage in the mountains, it would have been Black and Cat waiting for them with near fifty thousand troops. The Black Knight and One-Eye in command with five more villains to make the passes a hell on earth. Pilgrim and Saint aside, it would have been an even more crueller massacre than the one we see occurring right now.

Heroes against heroes aside, the fate of the battle is definitely not in Procer's favour. The Legions are unbloodied and morale must be excellent for them. The Crusade must attack on a narrow front, the Black Knight and the Warlock are fresh and rested. Praes troops have gotten used to slay heroes. Cavalry is impossible to use here. Judging that Catherine lost roughly ten thousand to slay twenty thousand when she was on open-terrain and overwhelmed by heroes, the Army of Papenheim is going to crumble under the corpses soon. Unless the Witch of the Woods is an army-killer and managed to take down Warlock in one round, it is going to take more than three dead men for each egionary they kill. Given that they are already down to less than fifty thousand...of course reinforcements are coming from behind, but Procer is soon not going to have this problem of excess mercenaries and war veterans. Between Cat and Black, already thirty thousand have died...but the real threats have not come out of the shadows.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I think I have insight about what the Grey Pilgrim might do! I have a Russian blue kitty, and if you know about cats then you know that she's just as grey as anything.

So if she were in the story, she'd stalk Catherine mostly ineffectually, then run away the moment everything isn't going perfectly. If the Grey Pilgrim is anything like my Grey Cat, Catherine can probably find him hiding in the closet or underneath the bed afterward. Oh, he'll lash out with his claws probably, but he won't really put up a fight, and once she's stroking his back hairs he'll be purring in no time.

Incredible plot twist if true!

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Dropping mountains on soldiers, that's one new way of getting stoned.

SMHF

I have a feeling the end result for Black is going to mirror Cat's... the battle ending with him retreating from the Vales but leaving the Crusaders utterly devastated and unable to advance. Which I'm totally fine with, as long as he gets to kill Champion... bitch really pissed me off with that whole skin thing .>:\

Letouriste

Same:/ I like her and I know this is hypocritical when cat bound akua to her mantle but knowing captain, the feeling of her being skinned is horrible:(

Thea

But Akua actually enjoys being Cat's...

oldschoolvillain

I think that the cloak was an actual cloak that Captain wore, not a mantle made from her carcass. Hanno has been much more traditionally heroic, as opposed to the vainglorious assholes who have composed the bands facing Catherine. He considered the claiming of sword tips as gruesome back in his interludes – I don't think he'd casually note an ally of his wearing a skinned enemy, no matter how Villainous.

blitzxs

"And, upon finding them, Hanno had spent hours seeking the right combination of lives that would allow him to capitalize on those weaknesses. Three would be required: the Flawless Fencer, the Lance of Light and the Barehanded Pugilist."

So White's aiming for precision attacks to get through Black's defenses? All three of these Heroes emphasizes quick and accurate thrust attacks to overcome opposition instead of the heavy swings and brute force most Heroes tend to utilize. Makes sense, I guess. Black's always fighting in the assumption that the Heroes he faces will always be stronger than him in raw power so he tends to avoid direct clashes and instead waits for opportunity before striking with quick and accurate strikes kinda like his spar with Captain where he avoids getting into a melee contest where he will certainly lose and instead waits for an opening before ending the match with a single attack. White's aiming to overcome Black in his own game.

Morgenstern

The Lance was the one who could call a horse for quick attack, if Black tries to retreat, if I remember correctly. The Fencer is about being able to counter his incredible melee skills (one on one), I guess, if not being about a weapon he is not really comfortable with. And the Pugilist is about a fighting style much different from a sword fighter's, when going in close, for the additional surprise and/or avoiding easy countering (like Cat who surprises enemies by fighting like a brawler instead of a normal sword fighter), I'd guess.

Author Unknown

Did anyone notice? Where the hell is Bard?

Euodiachloris

We theorise that she is currently stuck between Creation and Nowhere due to how her tactics got called out and her banishment by the Hierarch. In short: she's not finished with Time Out. It's put a ginormous wrench in a number of things for the Gods Above.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I thought being stuck between Creation and Nowhere was kind of normal for the WB. Like, I assumed that's where she always goes between her appearances in Creation. She's definitely not in Creation contiguously, right? So now she just can't make it to her scheduled appearances for a time, is the theory?

Euodiachloris

Bingo. That, or her schedule has become messed up thanks to Cat, Anaxares and to some extent the Calamaties not sticking to the Stupid Evil tropes while nicking off with scuffed heroic ones they clocked over the head in some dark alley. Well, I'm doing Anaxares a disservice: he genuinely is refusing to pick any broad category beyond Blue And Orange Democracy.

Oshi

I still don't really understand that. Her sudden disappearance was because the Hierach refused to be manipulated? How is that even possible?

Euodiachloris

She poofed in a very surprised puff of logic – since the guy had a logical and valid point (on top of his Name having been created by her in the first place).

Matthew

I miss Black. Again, he and cat should kiss and make up.

Euodiachloris

They're both stubborn and downplay their emotional needs. Soooooo, it's liable to be a while. And, when they do meet again, it'll result in a competition of who can downplay their enthusiasm to make it up the most.

My money is on Black, by the way. He'll swing around to so downplayed, it amounts to a whopping big trench in the ground the size of a canyon. 😊

tbarim

Theory on the weakness of joke characters.

Comic relief characters (Bumbling Conjuror, Hedge Mage, Fortunate Fool, Dread Emperor Traiterous) nullify attempts to harm them through annoyance, thereby lightening more serious stories or fights.

Conversely, my guess as their weakness is the moment when the story turns back to serious. The more sudden the switch, the better.

Zoolimar

Yeah, that seems to be the case. But we still haven't seen one of them having a "Serious Side" switch. When a normally light-hearted, smiling and happy-go-lucky character actually stops smiling and takes the challenge before him seriously. Such archetypes are capable of completely wrecking the opposition and frequently sport overwhelming power that they normally don't use for different personal or story related reasons.

And a Name capable of flipping from, for example, Fortunate Fool to Brutal Gentlemen (say they share the Switch aspect and have 2 unique aspects each) would be just the kind of unfair advantage that Gods Above like to use.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Would irony work?

Not a 1:1 comparison, but in the classic movie Seven Samurai, one character is introduced as someone with the personality to keep everyone's spirits and morale up in the dark and trying times to come; it turns out he's the very first to die.

sivarajan

The dragon was called Nehebkau, wasn't it?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You know it is 😏

JJR

So, when is Black gonna light the hidden caches of Goblin Fire that were hidden deep underground in this valley ever since the conclusion of the Conquest?

I can't imagine he doesn't have any. Until the stairway this was the only land path into Callow, and while dropping the mountain/lake was impressive, it wasn't a kill-the-entire-invading-force level of impressive. Then again, maybe heroes would mess it up somehow, they tend to do that.

The other option would be to use a Demon of Absence to make everyone forget that the valley even existed in the first place. Of course, for all we know the empire already did that to a few other valleys, and left the one open to encourage future crusades to be forced to use it. Absence is somewhat interesting in that regard, it's hard to say that anything concerning it hasn't actually been done. I have to wonder how the hell containing the demons was even discovered in the first place. Probably started as a hypothetical hell that seemed to be missing from the numbering scheme and gave anyone who thought about it a headache.

TeK

Because absolutely fail-save villanous plan bound to fail every time. So no, such obvious and absolute solutions as Bonfire, droppng an actual mountain at the Vales, to shut them up for good, just burn it all in goblinfire, or use demons would backfie SPECTACULARLY. Ever wonder why Black covered in goblinfire only one of two passes? Or more importantly, used goblinfire only when there was another route for enemy? Because if there's no exit, Heores will make one, it'll accidentally lead straight to your only weakness/source of your power.

sengachi

You know, if I'd heard that Cat had killed some noble cousin and was relieved at how it cut down on asinine dinner invites, I'd laugh. Because her, her I'd trust to only kill someone because they legitimately deserved it (or at least if she thought they did). And her relief would be tinged by the recognition and understanding of how fucked up it is that she's taking petty relief in someone's death. I could trust her to course-correct if she'd made the wrong decision, and so it's easier to laugh along without guilt.

But Hanno? Hearing he did the same is fucked up. Because I *know* he didn't actually give any thought to why the noble died. He just did as commanded by the Seraphim. And I do not trust the Seraphim's definition of judgement, not when what we've seen of angels so far has basically been defined by 'absolutely zero fucking chill'. But the worst part? It's how he takes his relief so casually, with no tinge of guilt or remorse, because he is *certain* that he is right. He has no doubts, or qualms about the fact that he just murdered someone. And sure, maybe he was right to do so. Maybe she did something truly unforgivable. (Given Procer's nobles I give it 50:50 odds).

But maybe she didn't, and Hanno would still be joking to himself about not getting dinner invites without a shred of self-reflection. And that horrifies me.

RanVor

For me, Hanno is one of the most repulsive and tragic characters in Guide, simultaneously.

He is repulsive because all he does is walking around and putting people to death with impunity, and he doesn't even accept any responsibility for what he does. He's basically a glorified executioner. His conscience is always squeaky clean because he lets someone else make all the hard decisions for him. "The Heavens' hatchet man" is the most accurate description of him I've seen so far. It fits any Hero, really, but none to the same extent as Hanno. He basically gave up his free will to become a walking, talking weapon of the Seraphim, utterly incapable of any independent thought.

He is tragic because all he really wanted was to help people who got wronged by an unfair justice system, but he realized he was incapable of doing so. He had no way of determining the guilty party and the appropriate severity of a punishment without a shade of doubt. Anything less, and he wouldn't be any better than the earthly justice systems he despised so much. This led him to be easily manipulated by the Seraphim into submitting to their will.

Basically, he wanted justice but got Justice instead.

TeK

Second that. If to choose between a repentant murderer and the one who thinks he actually did a good thing, I would choose the repentant one hands down. Then again, they are both still murderers, and both to some degree are forced to do those things by their life's circumstances. They both took it upon themselves to do terrible things, because those things are right. Just as Cat kills regardless of her grief at the loss of life, Hanno does so too. But the fact of the matter is, to be able to do what they do, and still retain some humanity, they need that illusion of rightness. If Hanno didn't believe that Serafim always right, would he be able to kill so casually? Would he be able to sleep at night? Without that ironclad certainly that all Heroes share, most would broke, unable to protect innocents. And their place would be took by those, who are already monsters and kill without shred of regret. And monsters protecting you from other monsters is a really bad idea. This is why at war propaganda dehumanises the enemy. This is why the rate of actual shot that kill is so low. Most people kill accidentally, because noone, noone with healthy psyche wants to be the kind of person that kills living, breathing human just like him.

What I meant to say is not that he didn't do nothing, but that, from Hanno's perspective, he was dissapointed by humanity so utterly, he clings to Heavens word, because if they can be wrong too, how the hell he supposed to live? He may just as well kill himself.

ironvale

Hm. Wasn't the Champion mentioned to be one of those old class heroes? Not the Good or good kind, just the ones mentioned in epics?

So, I'm not surprised if she considers Captain fur cloak as the highest kind of respect.

Also, here be dragons, aka hero food. Villains beware.

Captain Amazing

The White Knight's tendency to find insights in other heroes will be interesting when he examines Cat. He'll see that she repeatedly goes out of her way to beg them not to attack her, even at the expense of strategic losses. Maybe he will be the one to turn back.

TotesOlive

I really really want the Valliant Champion to die in a completely pointless and non heroic manner, and in a painful way. Maybe backstabbed by the procerans, or getting buried in a hole.

burguulkodar

I like how Black has no pity on the Proceran host, unlike Cat that didn't want a massacre, it is everything Black wishes for.

I never like binding your hands because of a "story". Cat should have annihilated everyone in the Procer army, and then dealt with the results afterwards.

I also hate the saint of the swords and the grey pilgrim. They are too OP, much cheats.

Plus WTF Hakram wasn't in the war??? We still do not have a single hint of a GOOD answer for that, and just because he needed to accompany Kegan's army is moot.

A +1 named would have made a difference in Cat's fights. Maybe killed more heroes. Heroes are in dire need of dying over there.

vuthuha912

Well. Black certainly has no pity for the Proceran host because they are trying to kill his friends, his sort of daughter, his countrymen, etc.

I am sure that most soldiers or generals adopt the same mentality as Black in order to do their job. When you don't see the other sides as people, it is easier to kill them.

But, Cat is trying to go for peace here so she needs to consider the position of the other sides for her peaceful solution to work.

Black and Cat should totally cooperate in this. The other side won't come to the table unless their war was unwinnable so Black needed to hit them hard enough through war. After Black did his job, Cat can do her diplomacy with the Procer on a more equal footing and actually make it work instead of relying on the goodwill of the other side as she did with Cordelia at the beginning. I think this was the original arrangement between Malicia and Black but Malicia just abandoned the team.

---

Interlude: Sing We Of Rage

*"Sing we of rage,
In Tower and field
Of this dying age
That will not yield*

*Sing we of steel,
Forged in the east
As turns the wheel
And carrion feast*

*Sing we of empire,
For which we bled
Of flickering fire
Now all but dead*

*Sing we of foe,
Of victories won
And that first woe Tyranny of the sun*

*Sing we of ruin,
As again we tread
West, ever pursuing Fate writ in dread."*

– ‘The Tyranny of the Sun’, a Praesi song written in the latter stages of the Sixty Years War. Banned by decree of Dread Emperor Nihilis.

Wekesa eyed the sculpted mancala board with a frown, sipping at a chilled Aksum red. The handful of stone seeds in his hand rustled as he flicked his wrist, counting those already sown on the board. Dark eyes moved to Eudokia, whose calm visage betrayed nothing.

"There's two missing," he noted.

Scribe's face displayed only wounded indignation.

"I am insulted, Wekesa, that you would resort to such implications simply because you are afraid to lose," she gravely told him.

"This is senet all over again," he sighed.

In all fairness, he'd been the one to start enchanting dice. Though in his defence, Amadeus had never once played without trying to sneak in a loaded pair and Eudokia had a knack for making pieces disappear when no one was looking no matter what they played. Hye had tended to 'accidentally' flip the board when it became clear she was losing – even when he spelled them stuck to the table, which rather eliminated plausible deniability for the half-elf. The only one of them who'd ever actually followed the rules had been Sabah, and... Wekesa's face darkened. The passing months had done little to bury the grief of that. A friendship four decades long could not be so easily let go of. Not when her killer still breathed.

"Calm, Wekesa," Scribe quietly said. "Nothing was forgot. Nothing was forgiven."

The dark-skinned man waved his hand in dismissal. He was not Amadeus, to sink into himself at the first sight of anything that would disrupt his composure. He would mourn his old friend properly, and no part of that involved forcing his grief into a box to be addressed only when convenient. He drank deeply from his cup of wine, setting it down. The shiver down his spine that came from someone crossing the wards informed him of Black's arrival before the man strode in sight. Amadeus' eyes studied the board, then crinkled in amusement. Ignoring the Warlock's languid invitation to sit, he leant over it and snorted, a finger flicking at the latest seed Wekesa had sown.

"Someone's in trouble," the pale man lightly said.

Warlock inspected the board again, and unsurprisingly found one of the empty houses now held a seed. That smug bastard.

"You're not even playing," the mage complained.

"It's sad how sore of a loser he is, isn't?" Amadeus told Eudokia with a saddened sigh.

"Hardly becoming of the famous Sovereign of Red Skies," Scribe agreed solemnly.

"You won't get away with this, you perfidious dwarves," Wekesa said. "There will be retribution."

The allegedly dignified Black Knight smothered a grin and finally sat down at their side while Warlock began to put away the stone seeds before he could be conned any further. Eudokia's protests that they had a bottle riding on this and the act was a clear concession went superbly ignored. He wasn't letting those two cheat him out of another prize piece from his cellar. 'Loshe would have his hide if they grabbed another bottle from Kahtan, the current High Lady was curtailing the sales to better hike up the prices. The two savages didn't even enjoy the vintages, anyway, they just loved robbing him blind. He'd nearly cursed Amadeus to lose all taste when he'd seen the man drink a forty-year-old Okoro red with cabbage and mutton. In the first Sanguinia's day that would have been a hanging offence, and was a little cannibalism from the Tower really such a high price to pay for proper stewardship of taste? Good and loyal friend that he was, unfortunately, Wekesa still offered Amadeus a cup. The green-eyed man declined, as he usually did when there was a battle on the horizon. Warlock had always considered that a peculiar habit, considering the effects of alcohol could easily be burnt out of the body by any competent Named.

"Onto the sordid business of war, I take it," Wekesa sighed.

"Dawn is an hour away," Amadeus replied. "It has been long enough, and yesterday was a severe defeat for the crusade. The real threats will come out today."

"Your request has been ready for near a month," the sorcerer shrugged. "The array as well. I foresee no trouble there."

"I have no worry of that," his old friend said. "I came to speak of the Witch of the Woods."

"Of which we know precious little," Wekesa pointed out, though his gaze flicked to Scribe.

She shook her head.

"As far as we know she has spent most her life in the Foloi forest, which is beyond our reach," she said. "Attempting to gather intelligence in Gigantes territory is an exercise in futility. They kill everything that crosses the border without warning. All the Eyes have been able to gather is second-hand, overheard conversations. And even these are rare, save for the unreliable."

The Warlock sipped at his wine, unmoved. It would not be the first time they faced a heroine whose history was essentially a blank slate. It did make the killing more troublesome, but not overwhelmingly so.

"If she was truly taught by Gigantes spellsingers, she will be using Ligurian formulas," Wekesa said. "I'll concede that for greater workings they are without match, but they lack the flexibility and breadth of Trismegistan sorcery."

"Those greater workings are my exact worry," Amadeus said. "I remember my histories, Wekesa. The last time spellsingers fought with a Named Praesi sorcerer, plains large as half of Callow were turned into the Titan's Pond."

"I am hardly Triumphant," Warlock chuckled. "And the Witch is no true spellsinger. She has not spent a few hundred years accumulating power and perfecting her craft. There will be collateral damage, to be sure, but I did not toil for months on our warding schemes to protect your armies from dwarven toys."

Black inclined his head in concession, but his eyes were not in agreement.

"I would not bind your hands on your first encounter with an unknown quantity," he said.

"Yet," Wekesa said.

"We cannot afford the losses that large escalation might entail," Amadeus said. "I won't bar you from using sorcery falling under Red Skies protocol, but I'd ask that you keep in mind the possible consequences of it."

The dark-skinned mage finished his cup, rather irked that such good vintage must be treated in so cavalier a manner. War truly was hell, he mused. Setting down the silver, he offered his friends a mild smile.

"I will attempt coddling, then," Wekesa conceded. "Let us see how long that lasts. And what will you be doing while I get my hands dirty?"

"Settling a philosophical question, in a manner of speaking," he said.

Warlock raised an eyebrow.

"And what would that question be?"

Amadeus smiled that old smile of the damned, the one that had been the ruin of realms and the death of armies. A madman's smile.

"Can a man cheat providence at dice?"

—

The army had risen in hushed silence, but Hanno could feel the thrum of excitement going through the soldiers. Yesterday's defeat had put fear in the hearts, yes, but also thirst for retribution. The vicious schemes of the Praesi had given birth to the old wroth that was always the fall of Evil, that burning determination that came from witnessing the senseless destruction sown by the Enemy. Yet they are not so senseless, these monsters, the White Knight thought. That they were abominations could not be denied, the paramount fiends of this era, but Hanno had studied the Carrion Lord. The man's actions followed his own barren sense of integrity, though no one sane would truly apply that word to the works of the Black Knight. It made him dangerous in a way that few villains the White Knight had witnessed could be. No less mad than the Emperors of old, perhaps, but there was cold method to the madness. Hanno had learned the hard way that underestimating the Calamities on the field would only lead to death. He thought of the sisters he would never hear again, snatched out of Creation before they had truly lived. We give you nothing, the Seraphim had promised as they anointed him. We take everything. As in all things, they had spoken truth.

Antigone stood crouched on the ground, watching the burning waters. Pyres of green flames that were birthed beneath the surface and spread from there, unheeding of the laws that bound true fire. There was nothing in the world, they said, that goblinfire could not burn. Some priests in Procer had called the substance the distillation of unholy hunger, the sins of the East made into liquid flame. The impossibly massive wolf that the Witch's mount and mother both was lying on the ground, her muzzle resting on her paws as she warily watched the heroine she had raised weave sorcery. Lykaia, her name was. Hanno had expected the Champion to started eyeing her as pelt and trophy the moment they first met, but to his surprise Rafaella had swiftly taken to the wolf-mother. The opposite was also true, Antigone assured him, though it could be hard to tell. Lykaia's notion of mothering occasionally involved being batted around by massive paws, though in all honesty the Champion seemed to rather enjoy that. Perhaps he should have anticipated that Rafaella would be utterly delighted at the opportunity of wrestling with a she-wolf larger than most houses. Antigone sliced across her palm with a stone knife and pressed the blood into the earth. Hanno felt the shiver of power scatter around them, massive and then gone.

Lykaia whined until Antigone sighed and presented her bleeding hand for the she-wolf to lick, almost nudging the Witch off her feet with an affectionate nuzzle he suspected was a reminder to take better care of herself. Wiping away the slobber covering not only her hand but most her arm – though, Hanno noted, the wound already seemed to be closing – the Witch of the Woods bowed her head to him by the slightest fraction. She did not move like a human. She was a beast of the forest, at times, but at others he could only see the Gigantes in her. Chin tucked in, if hidden by the mask, crown of the head made slightly lower than his.

Respect-deference-accomplishment. The giants could express broader nuances of relation and hierarchy in a single gesture that the land of his birth could with millennia of tiered citizenship. Hanno kept his back straight and tilted his face slightly to the left without moving his neck. Praise-gratitude-companionship. He was careful not to move too far left, lest he imply subordination on his part. By the mores of the Gigantes, what he had offered was already intimate warmth. Antigone's head straightened into neutrality, though slowly enough the implication lay she was pleased with his response.

"It is done," the Witch said. "When you are ready."

Hanno breathed out, watching the spread of burning green before him. He unsheathed the sword at his hip, mere steel forged at the hands of men. The lance strapped on his back would remain there until it was needed.

"Now," the White Knight said.

Antigone stomped her feet on the ground, where her blood still lingered, and Creation howled. She did not control it, not the way a spellsinger would have. The Witch had not spent centuries permeating her body with the light of moons and stars, woven a second soul out of sunlight or aligned herself with the celestial spheres. She could not sing hymns to the world and make it dance to her will. Instead the power of her aspect flared, and for a moment she was one with the fabric of Creation. A single cord sounded where she had spilled blood, and the vibration reverberated beyond mortal understanding. The winds stirred the burning lake and quickened until a whirlwind of water and fire was birthed, emptying the grounds where so many had died yesterday. The Praesi's own murderous alchemy, turned against them as it went howling towards the tower men called the Bloody Twin. Hanno of Arward began his advance, endless ranks of crusaders behind him, as sorcery bloomed ahead.

—

"Okeanos Risen," Wekesa said, reluctantly impressed. "Using an unseemly shortcut, but still nothing to sneer at."

Especially on freshwater. He'd never heard of Gigantes using this particular working away from the sea. Ashurans, when they'd still been Baalites in more than name, had learned the hard way that attempting to invade the Titanomachy from the water only resulted in the sharks growing fat. There was no audience atop the tower for him to expound at, as Amadeus had ordered room be cleared for him to work undisturbed, but speaking his thoughts aloud did tend to bring a sense of satisfaction to his work. He'd gotten into the habit when teaching Masego, as it helped his son understand his conclusions if he was privy to the thoughts that led to them. It was unfortunate that Masego still lingered at Foundling's side, though Wekesa had made his peace with it. Much of his enmity for the girl had ebbed since she'd thrown away her apprenticeship to Amadeus and ceased being a dagger at his throat simply by existing. Eudokia was furious that process had involved their old friend being stabbed, but Warlock was not particular bothered. Not since he'd noticed that Black's agelessness had taken a tint of youth in the aftermath. She'd offered his first and oldest friend a second lease on life by her actions, and he considered that to settle the balance of the threat she'd once posed.

She'd still have to die, of course. Alaya would insist on it as soon as the politics of the act became acceptable. It would make a bit of a mess, but those two would bind their wounds and entwine their fates anew after enough time had passed. They always did, no matter what shallow wounds they managed to inflict on the other's pride. Perhaps it was in order that he suggest Amadeus spend a few years in Refuge, after the dust settled. It would do wonders for both his mood and Hye's — Wekesa was of the opinion she'd cease gallivanting around the continent picking fights with gods for a bit if she found her lover returned to her bed. Alaya would be miffed at losing her right hand to a 'vapidly murderous vagrant', as she'd once described Ranger to him, but Wekesa was rather miffed at her himself. This whole Liesse affair had been gauche in many ways, including the implied insult to him. That she'd never approached him about building such a doomsday device implied she'd believed he would refuse her and go straight to Amadeus. It was a disregard of the trust he'd thought there was between them. He was not inflicted with Eudokia's blindness, to believe Black should be crowned. Alaya was better fit to rule Praes, and more apt to deliver the peace and quiet that was his preferred state of affairs.

Warlock had no intention of spending the next two decades of his life breaking millennia-old wards, banishing demons and immolating every practitioner in the Wasteland with a modicum of talent for theoretical research. Which was the very likely consequence of a reform-inclined Duni climbing the Tower. That killing one of his few friends as a prerequisite only made the notion more unpalatable, as did his suspicion that Amadeus crowned would find everything admirable about him devoured by the demands of the throne. Shaking the thought, Wekesa waited for the whirlwind to properly and come within the preferred action range of his prepared answers. The addition of goblinfire to the assault was a clever improvisation on the part of the enemy, and did indeed complicate matters of containment. The alchemical flames would begin devouring any solid ward upon contact, and a working of this strength could not be easily be contained with a flawed warding scheme. That was not to say, of course, that there was nothing he could do. Screens of sorcery bloomed before him as he observed the strings of power that had initiated and now maintained the whirlwind. Examining the formula directly was not a real possibility at this range, but he could glean from understanding of it from the observable phenomenon.

The central element was clearly a Creational cascade, the signature element of Ligurian sorcery. A controlled release of power into the world that accumulated ever-deeper orders of effect. The main difference with records of Gigantes sorcery was that there seemed to be no guiding element at play, no 'song' – though that was merely a mundane and narrow term for what was in reality an exquisitely complicated verbal control technique. Interesting. Ligurian sorcery required the caster to have a deep understanding of Creation's workings that Praesi would call High Arcana, though the way Gigantes understood the world in a fundamentally different manner meant there was little overlap with Praesi High Arcana and the Titanomachy's preceding equivalent. The implication here being that the Witch of the Woods, though taught by the Gigantes, did not share their inherent understanding. Aspect-based bridging, most likely, relying on her Name to expand the capacity of her mind. Aspects did tend to be passing, however, and that would explain the lack of so-called song: the Witch had glimpsed the web when calling on her power, but had not kept that understanding afterwards. Once loosed, her control on her spells was either thin or non-existent.

"How kind of you, my dear," Warlock murmured, "to gift me a whirlwind."

Runes formed around his wrists as he set boundaries in the area the winds were about to enter, weaving the forces that would attempt to modify rather than disperse. A hundred feet from the tower, the working fell into his ward and without a word Wekesa activated it. The first part was elementary: he stretched the spinning upwards, thinning the board whirlwind into a much taller pillar-like structure. From there, effect was easier. The forces were dispersed where they had once been concentrated. He flattened the pillar into a sphere and tossed back the burning water and winds in the direction of the advancing enemy army.

"Do try to make this interesting, child," Warlock said.

Power flared, and this time he was able to watch the cascade unfolding. It was beautiful, he thought, in the way only the very highest of sorcery could be. A single mind touching a facet of the godhead through will and knowledge. The burning sphere shivered and winked out, leaving nothing behind. His eyes narrowed. Matter could not simply vanish, and there had been absolutely nothing left behind – not even air, as the absence had drawn it in. The cascade had not been a physical effect, which meant...

"The Riddle of Kreios," he said softly. "Now that is a memory I will have to extract and study."

The Witch of the Woods had inflicted the passing of time inside boundaries, which was masterfully absurd. One of the great riddles of sorcery was that there was no such thing as time – it was a sapient construct, a recognition of entropy – yet there was a force that could only be called this that could be manipulated by magic. The Witch had enveloped the sphere inside folded time until the goblinfire devoured everything within, a beautiful parry. Had she called on Kronia's Sickle instead the alchemy would have attempted to devour the time actively quelling it but Kreios relied in the conceptual passing of time, not destruction through it. An important distinction, one that had crafted an envelope instead of an attack: she'd let the goblinfire itself do the work, an elegant solution. And one made possible only by his actions. If he'd not gathered the goblinfire together and she'd employed the Riddle, entire parts of this mountain range would have vanished – and likely parts of her army with it. No mere spell-slinging savage, this one.

"Let us test the depths of your knowledge, then," the Sovereign of Red Skies grinned, and runes burned around his wrists.

—

Hanno led the assault without looking at the sorcerer's duel echoing across the valleys. He would trust in Antigone, that she was the match of the Warlock and would allow no harm to come to them. He'd acted to ensure that much, by sending all other heroes to the northern valley. With only he and the Witch present, Creation's grooves would not be filled with a plethora different stories that all weakened each other by allowing none to be come into the fullness of being. The Witch of the Woods would fight the Warlock. The White Knight would fight the Black Knight. The clarity of this would be as dangerous a blade as the one in his hand. In the Twin above engines and crossbows spewed death at the advancing crusaders, checked only by the shields of mages and the fences of priests. Praesi sorceries lashed at them both, tearing holes that were filled with steel and stone with eerie coordination. It did not matter. With him at their head, the crusaders roared and advanced. Sword bright with the Light, the White Knight pushed through storms of fire and clouds of poison. They dispersed like mist under the sun. Darkness fell in a rain of needles, men they pierced convulsing in violent throes, but Hanno screamed his challenge and they shattered like glass.

"Carrion Lord," he yelled as in the sky above lightning fought spinning lights. "I summon you, Black Knight."

His words rang like a thunderclap across the valley. A gauntlet thrown, and not easily refused. Not without consequences greater than whispers of cowardice. A duel of champions for Above and Below was an ancient thing, and not disdained without earning the same disdain from the Gods. The gates of barded steel and iron at the foot of the tower slowly opened. Out came a silhouette riding a dead horse. His plate was simple and worn, his lance a thing of blackened steel and the sword at his hip goblin-wrought steel. As he rode a dark cloak streamed behind him. The helm, as always, hid his face save for eerie green eyes and hints of pallid skin. Bringing up his shield, the Black Knight moved as the gates closed in his wake. Hanno felt it, the cold thing behind the flesh. The cogs of steel ever-turning. His power was faint, even fainter than on their last encounter, but the taste of it had not changed. The presence of two aspects wreathed the man like two ravens on his shoulders, urging the villain to Lead and to Conquer. An old monster drenched in blood, come at his summons.

"It ends today," the White Knight said.

The monster cocked his head to the side.

"Uninspired," he replied, and the lance descended.

Lives flooded through Hanno's mind and he chose the first he had prepared: the Lance of Light. His Name took his reflexes, his training, and replaced them with another man's. The Knight went deeper still, until his eyes no longer felt as his own, and only then did the Light boil out of him. The radiant mount pawed at the grounds, scorching them, and his lance rose to match the abominations. Hanno was no jousting but Felix Caen, Duke of Liesse, had been the glory of Callow's knighthood long before he led the doomed charge in the East that earned him his Name. The stance came easy to him as breathing and he watched the Black Knight lead his mount to face him. There should have been a hush over the battlefield, but no quarter was offered or given. The Legions still spewed death from the tower, though their crossbows and engines were alien to him. No less, he thought, should be expected from Praesi. There was no honour to the Wasteland, nothing but barren hatred to be found past the Blessed Isle.

"Come, slave of the Tower," the Lance of Light laughed. "Breaker of heroes. Come and die."

The mounts charged, death flying around them, and it was all wrong. It should have been an olive-skinned southerner, a vicious lady of the Hungering Sands with lips like fresh blood, not this pale leech before him. He would crush the thing anyway. Already the Lance could see the sequence, the alignment of men and horse, the way the tip of his lance would go through the throat. Then the man's shield went down, hand hidden, and the Lance of Light spurred his horse. Death, death was offered to him and he would deliver it in the name of House Alban. Then the Praesi threw himself off his horse at the last moment.

A heartbeat later, as the Lance passed by it, it exploded.

Hanno landed on his back, breath stolen from him and smouldering. He hastily rose to his feet and found the Black Knight awaiting him with the flat of his sword resting on his shoulder.

"That remains a surprisingly effective trick," the monster mused. "I really should send her a thank you note."

The White Knight frowned. He was talking. Bantering, instead of pressing advantage. Pale green eyes flicked to him.

"Shall we get on with it?" the Carrion Lord drawled. "There is a war on, in case you hadn't noticed."

"You," Hanno said. "What have you done?"

"Blown up a rather expensive horse," the Black Knight said. "With the dark and wicked spell of wick and cheap matches. My coffers aren't what they used to be. Tremble, White Knight, for my power is truly boundless within reasonable limits."

The White Knight bared his sword, and let the Flawless Fencer flow into him. His stance changed. Sofia of Nicae had always been heavyset, nothing like the slender girls whose beauty was praised by the men, but she did not mind. Her only true love was the blade. This one was well-fitter to her hand, the weight of it perfect for her craft, and she closed the distance with anticipation thrumming in her veins. Praesi, this man, but she'd killed that ilk before. Bands of them had kept roving the Free Cities for years after the Dread Empress was unceremoniously thrown back into the sea by the coalition. It was not as satisfying to slay those as Ashurans, but it would keep her sated until supper. The foe was a sword-and-board man, and not half-bad. He danced properly when she struck, his parry technically perfect and riposte appropriately vicious. She elegantly turned it downwards, then struck across the throat. Ah, just a little too slow. She was off her form today. She circled around him, letting the slope weaken his stance, and offered a feint towards the eye. The shield went up, she closed the distance even as he struck and spun with him as he adjusted. Elbow to the back of the head, then she dropped under his answering swing and hit his helm with the pommel of her blade.

The man worked through the pain, but his stance was broken. She drew blood at the juncture of his elbow, slid around the shield bash and hacked down on the extended fingers of his blade hand. She hummed approvingly when he decided he'd rather lose two fingers than the grip on his sword, then rewarded his courage by kicking his knee and forcing him down. He swung where she would have been, were she an idiot, but instead she kicked dirt into his face. Then, as he struggled with that, she kicked his chin and laid him down hard. Time to end this, then. The Flawless Fencer vanished back into the flood and the White Knight clasped his sword.

"You are not him," Hanno said.

"A question almost theological in nature," the thing noted. "Nefarious did have a certain knack for blasphemy."

"This is a trick," the White Knight hissed. "You shy from judgement."

"Shall I give you a lesson, child?" the abomination said. "I so rarely get to monologue, but this is fortunate happenstance. You see, whatever I tell you will not matter. Not in the slightest. You are, by your nature, incapable of learning what I would teach. If you did it would destroy what a more poetic man might call your soul."

Hanno grabbed him by the throat, raised him up. The thing laughed.

"What have you done?"

"Agency, boy," the abomination said, sounding amused. "You have discarded yours like a petty bauble and never once considered the cost. Blind faith is such tempting notion, isn't it? Being able to believe in an answer, in a force, without ever questioning it. Certainty and blindness. I have always wondered at the difference."

"Where are you?"

"Ah, already better," the thing said approvingly. "But your true question is – why did you ever think I was here? And so the circle closes, and we return to the matter of faith."

He could have squeezed, snapped the neck, but he needed to know. To understand the trap so he could break it.

"The answer, of course, is providence," the abomination said. "You are here because that elusive golden luck of heroes told you I would be here to face you. And I am, in a sense. That is the rub, you see, when one relies on something one does not fully understand. If you do not know the rules, you do not know how they can be cheated."

"You cannot cheat the Heavens," Hanno snarled.

"Ah, but providence is a different matter," the villain said. "It is a force, you see, not an intelligence. It cannot reason. If the greater part of what is me is here before you, well, that is the guidance it will provide. Never warning you that a mind and a body are very different things until it is much, much too late."

And just like that it fell into place.

"You are in the other valley," the White Knight said.

"Praesi, Hanno, have so many flaws," the abomination mused. "Sometimes it seems as if it is all we have. Yet there is one among them that I always believed to be a virtue, in its own way. All it takes is the faintest hope we will get away with it, and we will sit across even the Gods, smile and lie."

"There is nowhere I will not reach you," Hanno replied quietly.

He dropped the abomination, and it did not even attempt to rise. Its lips quirked into a smile, thin and narrow and vicious. A blade-smile.

"Do enjoy your victory, White Knight," he said.

When Hanno's blade cut through his neck, the body already had empty eyes.

—

Amadeus of the Green Stretch breathed out. After a moment he rose to his feet. The sounds of battle could be heard at the bottom of the northern Twin, heroes and crusaders having reached the gate and struggling to break it. Ranker was behind him, looking to the back of the tower, and without a word he went to join her. Both of them stared down.

"Is it done?" the old goblin asked.

"They are both committed," the green-eyed man replied. "My death was the agreed-on signal. Warlock will cover the retreat."

"Then now is our part," the Marshal of Praes said.

"So it is," the Black Knight agreed.

They looked down at the two legions that had moved to the northern passage overnight, swelling the ranks of the three already under Ranker's command. Amadeus bared his sword, raising it high. The responding clamour drowned out the world.

"Well, old friend," he murmured. "I think it's about time we went on the offensive, don't you think?"

---

SMHF

There is only one sin, defeat!

There is only one grace, victory!

Lets vote Guide back into the first spot

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

nerferf

Thank you for writing

Awesome, that's the black we know and love

SpeckofStardust

Well they (the crusaders) would have been better off on attacking via only 1 path old monsters are everywhere after all the fact that only 2 are named is irrelevant.

.

stevenneiman

Remember Irritant's Law? Heroes can't win if they have a large enough numerical advantage, at least not against a foe with enough skill at plotcrafting, which Black has in spades. Also, the reason they attacked as they did was because they expected to have the element of surprise by going through what was a sodden hellscape of green flame five minutes ago. They just didn't count on Black's incredible powers of contingency planning.

Rook

They attacked that way because they had no choice after the losses they initially suffered. I don't think any of the crusaders thought that mopping up a goblinfire lake with a tornado would catch the calamities by surprise.

They're some of the most notorious living villains on calernia; well known for routinely murdering Heroes like chickens, as well as having a walking natural disaster of a caster named the Warlock in their number.

stevenneiman

I suppose. I guess it was only the fact that Black managed to weasel his way out of a meaningful killing blow that really seemed to take them by surprise.

SpeckofStardust

Considering that White was destined a win here, it also means that none of the other heroes can kill him in this war, only white. As I already stated there are too many monsters in this fight.

And when dealing with monsters You don't split up the goddam party otherwise your in horror trope land.

Euodiachloris

Reasons why Bloodborne works so well as horror: all the fun and games of Shadowfell. Just little old you to try running though it.

Liliet

It's not a party is the problem.

A band of 5 is a single story-entity, much stronger when together, and splitting it up is inadvisable.

Multiple heroes who aren't part of a band, or are parts of multiple bands, are subject to Inverse Ninja Law instead, and are MUCH better off acting independently/separately.

the Manton Effect

It's odd that you say he wins by virtue of story, even if it fits so well with what's happened. In a recent chapter Catherine observes that he makes such a good villain largely because he's so good at avoiding the narrative. His whole schtick is being against the grain, and winning because of it. "win despite the rules...", he says. But is he really so against the grain?

tynam

Winning despite the rules isn't the same thing as being able to ignore them. Black understand that the rules are going to apply to him no matter what he does, and so his whole life is about disrupting the narrative and rules-lawyering the loopholes, avoiding the situations where the rules can defeat him.

Black's most impressive power is the ability to walk away when the table is rigged – as we see him do in the free cities.

Antoninjohn

Now those heroes die and Procer losses all their Chosen but the White Knight, Witch of the Wilds and Champion. Without the Heroes, Procer's army is no match for the Legions of Terror

Someguy

Without the army the remaining heroes are just attempting Illegal Immigration. Scribe should just send a lawyer with a set of Writs and criminal charges to Hanno. Since he likes to defer personal responsibility so much, lets see how Judgement will enforce or break Praesi law.

Gunslinger

His judgment is that of the Gods and they don't care about Preasi laws

Yotz

Yeah, well, Imperial Bureau of Legal Immigration and Sundae cares not for their "freedom of faith" or whatever! They still need to fill out declaration 13b-17/11 in triplicate – to begin with.

James, Mostly Harmless

Hierarch could make this work, but Callow does not have enough government to do so.

stevenneiman

Maybe, but you gotta admit it would be funny to flip his own schtick back on him just to see how he responds. Especially if you make it obvious that you're being no more arbitrary than his own masters.

Someguy

Judgement eating it's own tail due to earthly realities makes for a better Story. Hanno's Role is perfect for such a Praesi tale, his half-Praesi blood creates such a wonderful opening!

Adam G Pugh

Separate the Procerans from their children and lock them in cages!

... too soon?

therealgridlock

Well if a third of illegal immigrants to praes were unrelated to the children they brought with them, it would actually make praes the hero to return those children to their rightful guardians in the country they were stolen from.

Child trafficking is no joke.

therealgridlock

Oh yeah, post script here, but since slavery is super illegal in most of calernia anyway, except in like, stygia and mercantis (if you're rich) they would be even MORE strict on illegal immigration, coyotes, and child trafficking.

Though it's also a world where vampire pedos in pizza basements would make sense, so maybe that's not a good thing to be comparing our world to.

Rook

They might actually lose Champion. She's not with Hanno and the Witch right now, meaning she's cut off from the other heavyweights and further weakened by the overlapping stories of the many green Heroes involved.

I'm almost wondering if that wasn't half the point of Black's play. I wouldn't doubt that beneath the steel and gears he's far, far more upset about what she did to Captain than even the other calamities. She was basically to him as Hakram is to Cat, for longer than either of the latter two have even been alive

RanVor

Well, Black is very good at suppressing his emotions, and though it looks similar from the outside, it's not the same as being emotionless. He's still very much upset about Captain, he just forces himself to ignore it, lest it clouds his judgement and gets him killed, which isn't what Captain would want at all.

Stable

I see it as more likely that Champion will kill again. She's (apparently) stupid, never gives up, always cheerful and hits very hard: perfect villain-killer while they are all left wondering how she does it.

In other words: she's an anime hero. The horror!

Letouriste

She has talking problems in the hero language so no, not an anime protagonist;) this is funny enough to be a side character though

Jonnnney

I have a feeling they are going to lose more than Chosen. The first prince might be losing her favorite uncle

taovkool

And once again, Black showed why he was not one to be fucked with. Cheating the story with Assassin. First round on him, even with Hanno winning the duel.

Yet, after all this, there's still no sign of the Bard, and Hanno's dialogue showed that she's not with his band. Not fighting against Kat either. So where the hell is she then? Dealing with the Tyrant? The Thassalocracy? One of the major player not shown on the board is a major concern.

danh3107

It wasn't Assassin, it was a body puppet like the Empress uses. I think anyway

beleester

I think you're right. Assassin is his own person, he wouldn't describe himself as "Black's mind is here, but the body is elsewhere." He also hints that it was one of Nefarious's spells.

The description of him as a thing rather than a person does sound rather like Assassin, but it's not quite the same.

nerferf

Still banished probably, we still really into the beginning of this uncivil war's after all, once the tyrant, goblins and dead king and/or triumphant enter the arena then she may pop up to escalate the mess

Byzantine

As Pilgrim and Saint noted bard only shows up at the grimmest moment. She is very likely nowhere right now, awaiting the next moment she is needed.

Raved Thrad

Nah, if Bard isn't at the scene, then she's off somewhere either drinking or regenerating her liver and waiting for her next Story Teleport.

Metrux

Except she was genuinely beaten and banished? It might take a while until she can come back to existing.

Raved Thrad

The worst possible implication of this is that Bard is actually Mxyzptlk, interfering in this dimension for fun.

Mental Mouse

Or, as she said, she's... nowhere. Back in the dicebox until she becomes relevant again.

soonnanandnaanssoon

I don't think he cheated with Assassin actually. I think he possessed a body using Necromancy.

RoflCat

Possibly trying to 'unfix' what Hierarch has done.

After all, that was her last known location, and it sure as hell did NOT go the way she wanted.

Jonnnney

Her story may have been bound be in conflict with the Hierarch due to his lawful condemnation of her actions. There is after all a third front to this war a pair of crazy Named, one of the old breed and another something new, attacking principalities via the waning woods. There is also the fourth front to consider. Someone needs to be keep the recently awakened Dead King in check.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Excuse me but it's spelled Chat

soonnanandnaanssoon

Tremble, White Knight, for my power is truly boundless*

*Terms & conditions apply

Highwayman

I love it that he actually outright admits it.

stevenneiman

I think his secondary objective in this was to basically let the air out of Hanno. On one hand he gave Hanno an “epic” “final” “battle” “against” him, but then made every effort to not only render Hanno’s victory meaningless but turn the entire thing into a joke at his expense, to rob his very serious character of narrative weight. Notice how Black also gave a villainous monologue but it focused on Hanno being a bland and uninteresting character.

It’s just like what Cat did to the Saint of Swords. Remember how she used to be so badass, then Cat made her out to be a second-rate bully and the next time we see her she starts doing her impression of a pincushion? Same principle at work here.

Someguy

I agree with what you say and want to add to it. There is another principle working against Hanno, he is half-Praesi.

If Black “was his father” (heh) the Narrative momentum (Force :P) would be with him. But he isn’t so the usual results of victories for Praesi “heroes”(?) has greater momentum. Remember: “Victory, most fickle of friends.” – Taghreb saying.

Rook

Pretty sure they have deflating dramatic flairs refined into a regular engagement doctrine. He handled Ubua the exact same way as Hanno, and even used the same ‘uninspired’ response to their final dramatic line

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Who the fuck is Ubua, is that how we’re all agreeing to spell Akua now? Why even have consistent names? My two favorite characters are Gertuiop and Nolp, obviously

JJR

Ubua comes from one of Masego’s interludes (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/12/31/prodigy/>) where he meets Akua but only remembers about 75% of her name.

Metrux

Ubua is the "ofccicial" other Name of Akua. I completely agree we shouldn't change the characters names, like Cat's, but this is a special case since it's canon :B

daegone823

In a flashback apprentice has a long conversation with Akua. Father Warlock is proud of his son for talking to people, Aunt Sabah asked does he have any idea who he was talking to. He remarks Ubua after using all his powers to remember her name

Euodiachloris

More than that: you could argue that both Black and Warlock haven't so much gone for outright ridicule and embarrassment, but the kind of (viciously pranky) avuncular training experience they would hand any young pups who come at them while just a little too full of themselves.

By framing the engagement that way, they aren't going for mentor positions, but stressing that they are masters who don't really want to fight these brash beginners, but the hot headed fools just won't let it go. So, the (accidentally/on purpose fatal) slap-down they get is for their benefit... (Evil, remember – training is supposed to carry a risk of death.)

No, really. xD

stevenneiman

I guess that's another way of looking at it too. He didn't play up the personal sympathy as much as Cat did with her "I didn't seize the throne to kill kids" speech, but he definitely gave the sense of a tired old man wishing he didn't have to deal with this. And the fact that he's borrowing just a little from the stories of deadly sink-or-swim mentors certainly helps keep Hanno on the back foot even if it isn't likely to be what brings him down.

Metrux

Another interesting point to keep in mind is that this is the first time he borrowed one of Cat's tricks, just in the first battle after been given a "second chance at life" from her. In a way, this can change the relationship of their Roles, from Mentor and Student to equals, or even make her the Mentor, like in "The best student surpass the master". I don't think this is what it'll be, since Erraticerrata does love to make us confused, but I'm pretty sure this signifies a change in their relation.

stevenneiman

That might actually help protect both of them. Black can drop his old mentor position, and meanwhile it seems to argue that, having arguably surpassed her mentor, Cat's story is over. On the other hand, that might not be it because he's borrowing something from her that she developed when her journey was only just beginning, so it can't really be a sign of her conclusion.

I think it might be trying to shift the tone of the mentor story, from "mentor passes the torch to the next generation", which is usually lethal, to "taking an apprentice breathes new life and joy into the mentor", which is an oddly twee story for the likes of Amadeus but he's not choosy if it lets him survive without sacrificing his objectives.

Euodiachloris

Wekesa, for one, is all for embracing the twee-est twee that ever twee-ed, as long as it puts a naughty-boy smile on Amadeus' face and adds zip to his pranks.

... He and 'Loshe make a ton of sense as a couple.

Bonesawer

We should be very, very scared that this encounter resulted in a draw by the Heavens' standards. Neither one of the Named inflicted grievous damage on the other, and we already know that losing armies counts for little in terms of victory or not to the Heavens.

If this encounter counts as the second of a pattern of three, we have to rely on outside intervention to save Black in his third. With his narrative weight, there's no way he can lose and come back having rebuilt his power for a recurring nemesis.

The options as I see them are that this didn't count as the second since they never truly engaged (I doubt this since it had serious consequences), one or more of the Calamities is going to have to sacrifice themselves to save Black from dying in encounter #3 (not sure about the groove made by Assassin during Liesse, could go either way) which isn't preferable, Cat's going to have to save him from Hanno possibly at the cost of some of her remaining morals/goals (this is the ideal goal as her goals, while gray, are pretty insignificant and/or stupid and could improve with replacement, especially as a result of a reforming of the bond with her smarter teacher-father), or Black dies and everyone is sad (the least desirable outcome for obvious reasons).

MetruX

We already know they have no pattern of three, especially since this is NOT their second battle. Remember, they already battled twice and there was even an interlude in which Black remarked how strange it is a pattern didn't arise. At the time he thought it was because he would never live enough to complete it, but this was shown as not true, so there must be another reason why no pattern appeared, which we don't know yet.

daegone823

Black already remarked how in the first fight the heaven's had built a hero to counter Chat. The heaven's planned on Black dying since by a squire merely existing the Black Knight will eventually die. Then Chat taking his name Would face the White Knight who hard countered her with his various abilities, OP summon every white knight hero to counter her, shiny horse to kill any undead minion she summoned. That was the plan until Black destroyed the array and the Squire severed ties with the Black Knight.

Mental Mouse

Heh heh heh...

Dainpdf

*while supplies last.

daegone823

Ok so I get the fencer but who was the lancer trying to kill?

It seems that the deeper the white knight sinks the more he forgets himself and objective mudled. Dipping to deep into aspects which he has been doing can turn back onto him. He could loose his own identity if the heavens deem him unworthy and loan out his body.

Also Witch of the Wilds and wolf mother already to cool for me another amazing named IMO has been introduced and she is coupled with my other favorite hero the Champion to cool!!!

wyaldriddler

Also of note is during the bit with the Flawless Fencer, where “she” thought she was off her game. Hanno’s aspect makes him think he is those he chooses, but *they* are not *him*. Their bodies do not *match*.

stevenneiman

Transgender people exist even in the real world, despite having to spend a lot more than a minute or two trapped in a body that doesn’t match how they identify. What really strikes me are the way that the Lancer was annoyed at not having his actual nemesis to kill and the Fencer took note of things that Hanno already knew. Both of those much more strongly imply to me that heroes Hanno Recalls get dropped into the situation clueless.

Mental Mouse

Hanno is still surprisingly green – he has a lot to learn about making best use of that Aspect.

beleester

Lancer was there to fight Black on horseback. However, as it turned out, Black was *planning* to be unhorsed, so it didn’t matter.

We didn’t see the Barehanded Pugilist, but I imagine it’s a similar idea – if Black realizes that he can’t win a sword fight, he’s likely to go for a grapple, where the Pugilist would have an advantage. (Catherine does the same thing – if she’s fighting a “proper fencer” she tends to drag the fight down into the mud and mix it up with her fists.) Hanno planned to overwhelm Black in a specific area of skill rather than try to be a jack of all trades, which is Black’s strength.

Someguy

There is no need to win every battle when losing results in Enemy strategic overreach. When you know you are going to lose anyway, just set things up for your General to win.

daegone823

Every time I see warlock fighting I always get the feeling he is so OP that creation will fuck him.

- Fight with lone swordsman under dog, death flag
- underdog fight again against the hedge wizard avenging her sister double death flag
- Now he is all alone vs a Knight hell bent on killing him an evil ruler and a witch who has sided with nature against a guy who literally makes pig/dragon abominations.

Peta and US marshall vs Mad scientist

oldschoolvillain

That's the area of all Named casters. Warlock is only so powerful because of his specific approach to wizardry and how much knowledge he has to apply.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

But Warlock earned his power through time, study, hard work, and cleverness. He's even more legit than Hye

MetruX

Yeah, he didn't even use his Name powers here. He would, arguably, have this same power under himself without a Name, as long as he had the same time and resources to study. This is why he is so OP: he has no need for god given powers, he steals the powers for himself.

Dainpdf

If the heroes always win, you just have to hand them enough Pyrrhic victories...

RanVor

Surely you mean Terribilic victories, don't you?

Dainpdf

Nah. I'm not actually from Calernia. Where I'm from, we say "Pyrrhic". Long story.

sengachi

Or get them to burn their ordained victories on valueless kills.

Jesse Coombs

"... had learned the hard way that attempting to invade the Titanomachy from the water only resulted in the sharks growing fat."

That is an EXCELLENT line. XD

Highwayman

Wolf-mother... Loki in drag???

Yotz

Given that Mother to Sleipnir demonstrably have no preconceptions against motherhood, can we call it "in drag" really?

thegreatfeed

Wow. You have really mastered how to tell a battle from both sides. These are becoming my favorite kind of chapter.

Gunslinger

Holy shit, this was so worth staying up for. Black is fucking awesome.

I wonder if the implications of calling him Amadeus of the Green Stretch means he lost his Name?

I also wonder if the body double was Assassin again, though the line about Nefarious suggests it was a spell to possess.

Gunslinger

>So it is," the Black Knight agreed.

Well I guess he still has his name. It's mighty fun to see goody two shows Hanno get toyed with.

Yotz

About "of the Green Stretch" thing – it may be a narrative tool to underline miniscule personality shifts – as in, the Black Knight murders people, Carrion Lord leads the Legions, and Amadeus of the Green Stretch just quietly enjoys every moment of his life after recent unexpected metaphysical rebirth.

Probably not, though – just name-cycling to lower the repetitiveness of text.

Dainpdf

His mind was there, which is why Hanno's providence misled him. That wouldn't have been the case with Assassin.

beleester

To be fair, Assassin can also copy plot powers to some extent. Black was able to get himself captured in a sacrifice play to help Catherine, even though Black was never in danger and Assassin doesn't die when he's killed. (I don't think it was Assassin this time, though. Assassin is described differently when he's revealed.)

Dainpdf

That was against a villain, who didn't have "providence" guiding them. Plus the whole "I summon you, black knight" thing.

Liliet

Ah, but the crux of that story was Catherine's tragedy, it did not directly concern Amadeus, only Cat's perception of him – which Assassin was fully capable of substituting.

This story is very much about Amadeus himself getting judged.

Ein

I honestly think Assassin is in the body of the hostage prince, either to kill Cat or to kill Pilgrim (causing peace talks to break down). Cat will probably gib Assassin in the process Warlock is probably going to die though. Black's death will probably be at the end after all the others are dead, solidifying the accords via martyrdom.

RanVor

That makes no sense. Why would he do that? It would fuck over everyone Assassin is supposed not to fuck over, *especially* Black and Malicia.

MetruX

Technically those talks, and even Cat alive, could be seen as bad to either Black and/or Malicia, so... It is possible Assassin would move against her or against those negotiations. The thing is, we don't know how loyal and crazy assassin is, if he is more alike the Warlock he will never get in between this unless specifically asked to by Black, but if he is closer to the Scribe... Then yeah, she could be assassinated any day now.

Insanenoodlyguy

Then there's the theory that Assassin is Scribe all along. Though I have an alternative take: Scribe is Assassin. By which I mean Eudokia operates openly with her true Name and pretends to be the named Assassin. It just so happens the same powers that make you a wonderful background administrator also make you great at stealth kills and cheating death.

1queenofblades1

"Do enjoy your victory, White Knight."

...Black what are you doing? Black no. Black stop. Don't try and game a pattern of three. You aren't Catherine. That's her shtick. Stop stealing her shtick.

oldschoolvillain

He TAUGHT Catherine her schtick.

shieldredblog

I don't think pattern of three has anything to do with it. He's simply trading victories. Allowing the White Knight to "win" while winning himself at the other tower. He's simply betting his own victory against the miscellaneous Heroes will be greater than the WK's, as the Warlock will be minimizing his losses.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Yup, Above has explicitly allowed only Cat to initiate pattern with Hanno, last time Black did not get it either.

Byzantine

That was actually a mistake by Black. Cat is not squire, nor will she transition to Black Knight now. So who knows why Above did not let a pattern of three form between them.

Wolfkit

But that was back when Catherine was still Black's successor. It's not impossible that what went down at Akua's Folly changed things enough to allow a pattern of three between Amadeus and Hanno.

Jonnnney

I don't believe the above nor the below is capable of forbidding a pattern from emerging. It is the story that drives creation it what allows patterns to emerge.

Regardless Black has no reason to want to start a pattern of three with Hanno or any heroes for that matter. The only reason he would want one would be to extend his life, but he doesn't put much value on his life. Besides it is much harder to game the system when the rules are so concrete.

stevenneiman

I don't think that was a pattern of three, though it was similar. When Hanno pronounces judgement, he gets something similar to the last part of a pattern of three, where he is fated to win. When black tried to win the fight Fate and the Heavens threw a hissy fit about him interrupting, which was why there was the backlash that nearly killed him anyways. This time, he's just allowing Hanno to safely dissipate the free victory in a harmless manner. Cat's trick was slightly different, playing two patterns of three against each other. The first one let William kill her but she had to be allowed to come back for the second, and the Akua was dumb enough to make her contingencies clash and give away that second pattern before she could cash it in. Also, having inviolate schticks is stupid, and neither Black nor Cat tolerate stupid, unless they can use it to get someone else killed.

Yotz

He really ought to send her a 'Thank you' card.

Euodiachloris

And a plain sorry one. But, the thank you card should have a mobile illusion of the horse blowing up in White's face. Because. 😊

Shoddi

As the Chief Vice Sub-Assistant Understudy Intern mage in the Praesi Department of Research, Development & Reanimation, I may have a solution for you.

We have developed a process by which we painstakingly engrave elegantly coded runes onto a thin card of silver. The runes produce a Ligurian sorcery-inspired envelope of the concept of folded time. Via a process of (mostly) non-destructive memory extraction and transfer, a brief 5-7 second moving image can be inserted into the time envelope and infinitely looped. When the user activates the card, the small 2-dimensional replay of the image will begin.

The current designation for this creation is the Gravure-Imbued-Filigree. GIF, for short.

Yotz

Bah! Gravure Imbued Filigree is a yesterdays news! If you want to use something closer to the cutting edge of modern arcanotechnics – use Animated Paratemporal Necromnemonic Gravures.

Dainpdf

This felt more like his schtick than Cat's. Catherine has a tendency to juggle multiple narratives and pull the rug from under people, while Black goes more with a judo style where he lets people get exactly what they want, but in a way that kills them. He refuses to engage the narrative, as Cat said a few chapters ago.

sengachi

Narrative judo. I love it.

Raved Thrad

Or, as one of my friends would call it, Psychological Jujitsu.

TheAtomicOption

IIRC he tried to initiate a pattern of three with this white knight before *and it didn't take*—indicating that he's not really Hanno's heaven-intended target.

sengachi

I think he's intentionally hamming it up, while also being as over the top faux dramatic as possible, as a tactic to get Hanno to burn through his allotted heroic drama.

You can only pack so much heroic drama into a story before it gets stale and another narrative needs to take over after all.

stevenneiman

Hanno is a serious hero who stars in a serious story as the victorious protagonist. Take away the seriousness and the victory will follow, at least when it actually counts. It's just like what Cat did to the Saint of Swords. Laurence the mighty champion of Good is unstoppable on the field, but the Archer can take on Laurence the second-rate bully with semi-accurate delusions of grandeur.

Raved Thrad

I just pictured this entire story as a campaign, with the GM telling Hanno's player, "Well, you just lost several Plot Points there. If you're not careful, you'll run out of Plot Points and a mere goblin is going to kill you."

MetruX

Why did this make me laugh so much? Man...

Euodiachloris

Meanwhile, Amadeus can freely indulge his sardonically dramatic streak: 1) the official skull ring means bowing in drama-comedy's direction at every chance is expected, 2) he genuinely doesn't view Hanno as his One True Enemy™ and moral antithesis (that's WB – and, he has evidence of this), 3) he's refusing to frame this confrontation as a grand clash between Good and Evil – it's a spat; an intense session at the gym, really.

shieldredblog

A paragon of Villainy.
No rule unchallenged.
No law unsullied.

taovkool

That sounds a lot more awesome than it has any right to be.
Mind if I steal it?

TeK

Fascinating. I want to learn more about Assassin with each passing moment.

As I understand though, Warlock would not survive this battle. I do wonder about Black. I doubt that he would die, given that Cat essentially gave him a second chance, which is noted by Warlock. This chance is not so easily thrown away. Heavens might be stacking the deck in their favor, but their whole shtick is playing by the rules. They cannot not play by them, and so Heroes can't too, and there lays their greatest weakness. By rules of narrative causality, Black has to live, otherwise there was no meaning in Cat's sparing him. Wekesa played his role, what he has to do now is go up in flames. And so now he stands, all alone against two Heavens finest. His fate is pretty much sealed.

Black though? He has to at least kill the Champion. I don't know how the fuck Heroes missed out on the fact that revenge will be at least attempted, and attempted in full. Champion is bound to get what's coming for her, what with her wearing Captain on her shoulders only solidifying further her fate. And other Heroes are even more vulnerable. It's been mentioned that their Fate is not one of Crusades, that their being there already puts them at risk. Plus the fact that Heroes are the more vulnerable the more they are plentiful, and this is not a good story for them.

Also, I found it funny that Black story now is one of some kind of redemption. He is (allegedly) a father who betrayed his daughter, and now stands protecting her and his country against invading hordes. Wekesa, much the same, protect his family too. And I lost my thought.

I do wonder, exactly how Assassin masquerades as Black, why Heavens can't catch up on that, and why they didn't use this earlier.

Gunslinger

I don't think it was Assassin. The line about Nefarious suggests it was a body double sorcery like the one the Empress uses.

TeK

If it isn't Assassin, then it wasn't Assassin back when he played the exact same trick at Ubua?

Forrest

No, I do believe that was Assassin. The difference is that back then, Assassin looked like black even out of his armor, whereas here the fake was just covered in armor.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Ubua Ubua

Sorry but I don't put much stock in anything you have to say. How do you misspell a name you JUST FUCKING READ

Raved Thrad

JFC what are you on? Either you're on some seriously fucked-up drugs (in which case, keep them away from me) or you have absolutely zero ability at reading comprehension.

Morgenstern

It was just explained AGAIN on this very comment page just a few comments above, how "Ubua" is an IN-STORY joke mis-use via fault by Masego that Captain onyl strengthened instead of weeding it out...

... while a thing like "Chat" is NOT in-story at all. What the heck are you raving about "Ubua"; while you yourself were calling for "Chat"? Was the "Chat" thing meant as irony? o0

Morgenstern

And yes, I know the "Chat" thing is meant for Cheshire Cat, I've followed the comments. It's an out-of-story nickname by posters. While "Ubua" is IN-story and thus has much greater credit to be used... so why are people still railing on about "Ubua", while accepting "Chat"? It just doesn't make sense...

stevenneiman

I agree with Gunslinger on the fact that I don't think this was Assassin, albeit for slightly different reasons. Black essentially said that the trick worked because a majority of him was there, and my guess is that because he is a mastermind having his mind there was enough. He was controlling the double through some kind of presumably magical link, and it was his scheme that put it there. In a sense Hanno was fighting against Amadeus, but in a way that Amadeus could let him blow his free win on to no real gain.

Also, I have an unlikely but awesome thought about how he might avenge Sabah. Praesi have a history of commanding the dead, Sabah had an Aspect related to taking orders, and I doubt the Champion is expecting an attack from her own trophy cloak.

soonnanandnaanssoon

That actually makes some Narrative sense as well. If he does this, he stacks "Avenging a fallen comrade", "Heroes artifact/weapon fails/turns against them", "Coming back from the dead for One Last Stand" and "Villain commander uses Undead Weapon" against the Champion.

James, Mostly Harmless

It also makes sense from a world mechanics perspective. When Ranger invaded the Dead King's domain, the three undead heros that she faced retained their abilities and memories. The same is probably true of Evil named, but there are fewer of them around because Evil tends to burn their dead.

thegreatfeed

Also fits with her aspect.

MetruX

Well, for one, Warlock is as much experienced as Black, has more power and is, arguably, harder to defeat, one of the reasons he is sent as their secret (not so secret) weapon. So no, he shouldn't even be in danger from those two upstarts. If it was Grey Pilgrim and the Saint, or one of the two with the Witch that should be his counter? Then yeah, lot's of chances for death raining today. The way it is it's more like they robbed the heroes of their victory here to get it elsewhere.

Also, that is absolutely not Assassin. 1. He said the bigger part of him was there, while Assassin just fakes it, as noted in how Cat could see something strange in him; 2. He was in a Story about the duel of them, he couldn't let someone else do it; 3. When they last employed assassin, Black did his own things while assassin posed as him, but here he was clearly in some kind of coma to control this other double; 4. He himself says this came from a previous emperor... And I very much doubt other emperor would have done the same thing with his own Assassin, even if he did have the same capabilities.

All in all, I think you're not meta enough :V Go play some munchkin -qqq

Metrux

P.S. The last part is a joke, don't take it seriously.

Idiom Idiot (@AintItK)

At a place that could be referred to as the Two Towers, the Legions of Evil are about to charge the forces of Good, downhill, and since they're attacking westward in the morning, with the Sun behind them. <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mE3280hF-VA>

Raved Thrad

I really can't wait for White Idiot to get his comeuppance. I admire how he's trying to manipulate the story, just like Black, but he's so damn lazy that he doesn't deserve to win. After the setup, which includes his past life research, all he really does is go with the flow and expect things to work out for him. Well, that and scream "cheater!" when things don't go his way. As someone once said, if you're not cheating, you're not trying hard enough.

It's a shame White Idiot can't appreciate how Black just shafted him:

"I'm going to use the rules to punish you."

"Okay."

"Wait, what are you doing?"

"Not following the rules."

"But you're supposed to follow the rules so I can punish you."

"Tough. Anyway, your friends are all going to die now. Later!"

"Raaaaaaaaaargh!"

On another note, this story is really making me hate the "good" (or is that Good?) guys the way Skyrim made me hate (high) elves. Bravo. You know the writing is good when your emotions get involved.

stevenneiman

Good does have to be capitalized if you're referring to the cosmic faction. I'm not sure if the lower-case version can be used for something like saying that eating vegetables is good for you. And yeah, a lot of the heroes are very unsympathetic. I do have to admit that I quite like some of them, like Champion. I know she killed off another sympathetic character, but she's just so funny, and I like the way she doesn't act self-righteous (like how she told the Tyrant she wanted to try and impress lovers with his skull rather than droning on about how much of a bad person he was).

Hanno is probably the one I hate most, given that he basically gives the "just following orders" defense for murder except that he placidly continues following those orders after doing so. I don't think he's exactly lazy, so much is fanatically inflexible in his thinking. He'd have to be, since it's the only way not to go an ineffectual kind of insane from the guilt of his actions or the fact that the beings he works for are basically eldritch horrors with no more regard for human well-being than Cthulhu.

Dainpdf

Do remember that, as someone who met the angels, he's a victim of mind rape. Even Cat almost gave in to it, and she is *Cat*.

stevenneiman

True as that might be, I don't think it gives him much excuse given that he chose to be mind-raped rather than have to make his own choices. He's not like William, he actively sought out and seemed to be hoping for exactly what he got.

Dainpdf

He was looking for an ideal of justice after looking earthly justice in the eye and finding it wanting. He had faith in the system; when his naivete was shattered, instead of embracing that he sought to recapture the ideal. Well, he did find it in the hands of the angels... or at least that's what they told him. He wasn't searching for the angels. He was searching for an ideal, and he grabbed the first one he got.

Agent J

That's... depressingly pathetic. When his blind faith in the system was proven stupid and his naivete shattered he... pieced it right back together and threw that same blind faith at the first substitute he could find? Hanno sucks...

Dainpdf

You ever hear of cognitive dissonance? It's not so much depressingly pathetic as depressingly human.

beleester

No, after being failed by mortal justice, he decided to only trust divine justice instead. He doesn't trust the system or anyone else, because they're fallible humans. Even Hanno himself is a fallible human, so he doesn't trust himself either.

(Yeah, he's got better morals than the Ashuran committees, but that's not a high bar to clear.)

But the Seraphim aren't human. When they claim to have divine knowledge of good and evil, beyond what any human can possibly know, they might **actually be right.**

The belief that all humans are irretrievably sinful, or that true Goodness is so far above us that we could barely recognize it as human, isn't that strange or even that obviously wrong. John Calvin thought up something similar 500 years ago, and he didn't have an angel speaking directly to him to help things along.

Euodiachloris

Problem is: in this setting, humans were specifically designed to not meet Seraphim approved standards as part of the wager/war/question. That's... judging the program for the network designer's decisions using upper management's blue sky ideas of how the system should work, not the network as it works on the ground, with all its tweaks, both logged and misplaced.

In short: seriously, angels – quit throwing a fit every time the modem goes wobbly and the game lags. You installed both the modem and an always online MMO.

Dainpdf

"Was also thought by some christian guy centuries ago" is not exactly a ringing endorsement of sanity or reasonableness.

Raved Thrad

I'm hoping Black or Cat, depending on who puts him down, sends him off with the words "you've been judged and found wanting." These "heroes" deserve a big dose of irony, preferably served with a side order of death.

As for the gods being eldritch horrors with no regard for human well-being, that's to be expected of gods. It's when "Good" humans lack all empathy that they themselves have no regard for the well-being and suffering of other humans, because "deus lo vult," that they become monsters. There's nothing wrong with eldritch horrors acting like monsters, whether they be Above or Below – it's in their nature. It's how Good subverts the nature of their followers that the true horror lies.

Each time a hero, and other people on the side of "Good," have had leisure to reflect on the human cost of the war, it's always been "How dare they perform such acts of villainy! So many men dead, from horrors we've not seen before! All we want to do is kill them, and in turn they unleash terrors unimaginable on us and these poor men following a righteous cause!" Each time I read something like that, it serves to underscore that these people truly are monstrous. They may, indeed, be fighting monsters, but they themselves are no less monstrous, and the fact that they cannot see that is equally monstrous.

Jonnnney

"Judged and found wanting" would be a good epithet, but I'm hoping for "Justice only matters to the Just" and stabby stabby in front of the seraphim. Spitting directly into the eye of an angelic choir is more Cats style anyways.

DroughtBringer

Hmm... that line might be why a pattern of 3 did not form between Black and White.

The line, and the meaning behind it parallel with Hanno so well, it might be a final challenge for Cat.

stevenneiman

I agree with what you're saying about the Gods being arguably blameless for their nature. The real difference between Good and Evil is, I don't recall anyone being mentioned who actually regards themselves as servants of the Gods Below. They might be business associates of the Gods Below, or people who take inspiration from the Gods Below, or even minions of the affiliates of the Gods Below, but no servants. Whereas at least 30% of heroes, and quite possibly a lot more, do regard themselves as servants of the Gods Above, and even more than that take self-righteous pride in that fact.

But my original point wasn't that the Gods Above are reprehensible. Moral judgements are pointless against anyone who is so far beyond the potential for punishment. It was that Hanno had to sacrifice his capacity for critical thinking in order to allow the Heavens to subsume his will so thoroughly when they have such different goals than he does.

Raved Thrad

It's not just a lack of critical thinking, IMO, but a critical lack of empathy: not only can he not put himself in the other guy's shoes, but he (and just about all the other heroes we've seen so far) seem to have no concept of collateral damage, as inflicted by them, when it comes to furthering their goals. Three thousand dead soldiers? That's just a stepping stone to killing the Black Queen. The only time they stop to count the casualties is when it's inflicted on them. "ZOMG seven thousand dead! How dare she kill so many! It's like she doesn't want us to kill her!"

The gods can't feel empathy for mortals because they themselves are not mortal. It can be argued that they cannot understand the trials and travails of mortals because they will never face similar problems. That Hanno himself has suffered through some of the worst things that can happen to a human and still dismiss the suffering he and his fellows cause is what makes him a monster.

hoyboy

Literally all of this moralistic whining can easily be levied at "Practical" evil, Cat included.

TeK

It comes to the exact cognitive dissonance we've been talking about. With Cat, we expect here to have flaws. We see her as a Villain, but more importantly, as humans. While our perspective on heroes is tainted by all these modern media, comicbooks included, that we really can stomach them having flaws. I mean come on, they are heroes, why the hell they are not all perfect immortal Supermans with impeccable ethics?

It's easy to hate Good until you realize that most of the time they're fighting against people like Akua and Wekesa. You know, the ones who respectively deployed and invented Still Waters. And if you find no concern for human life and/or rights a problem, boy do I have some bad news about Amadeus for you...

RanVor

On the flip side, it's hard to like the good guys when they're D&D-style murderhobos who just slaughter everything that gets in their way and only get away with it because they happen to be pointed in the right direction.

Dainpdf

Uh... They're not.

A murderhobo just kills any NPC without asking who or what because they want loot and XP. That's not what the heroes do.

If you must find a comparison, they're like DnD paladins who err on the side of "exterminate evil".

James, Mostly Harmless

Good, as embodied by White, would think that it makes perfect sense to say "Kill them all, Good will know their own".

Dainpdf

We haven't had any indication of wanton murder from White. He's Knight Templar, perhaps a Well Intentioned Extremist... But he's not a murderhobo.

shieldredblog

He's not a murderhobo. He is however a religious nutcase so extreme that he believes all humans shouldn't be allowed choice or reason. He believes that the Gods are so above humanity that all human opinions and ideas are damned and pointless. Essentially he wishes for slavery so deep that its basically a rejection of sentience itself.

Dainpdf

I think you mean sapience. But yeah, Hanno is a nutcase. He's just the nutcase that doesn't let an entire city of noncombatants be turned into zombies so he might have a superweapon afterwards. One which summons demons. The things that damage reality itself. And, again, he's angel addled.

MetruX

I do think most heroes ARE murderhobos, since the classic murderhobo don't kill everyone, only the ones he can get away with. A good murderhobo will never kill the weapons shopkeeper, unless he can grab everything in the shop afterwards and not be hunted for it. In the same vein, most Heroes do like to go from a fight and a party to another, killing Villains and common people alike for their own reasons. Sometimes those people are not even on the side of Evil.

Hanno is not a murderhobo, though, I have to agree. Sure, he makes no actual choices and leaves it all for the angels to decide, but he also doesn't judge every single person that comes in front, neither does he grab stuff from the dead.

Champion, though? Saint? Hells, even Bard could be considered a murderhobo, if a meta one instead of robbing valuables...

Dainpdf

Common people? When have we seen Champion kill those? The only one we've ever seen put commoners at risk was William, and even in that case it was not guaranteed they would die.

And we've never. Never. Never seen a hero kill people for loot. Saint is violent, trigger happy even, but you will notice that for all that she actually protected people from the Watergate. As for the Bard, I'd call her Magnificent Bastard, really.

shieldredblog

Hanno has straight up murdered people, he reminisced about it last chapter. He settled a dispute between Crusaders by murdering one of them and presumably damning his soul to the Hells. He gets away with it though because being an instrument of Judgment makes him immune to consequences in countries that worship the Gods Above.

Also it's been said that Angels of Judgment are more dangerous and damaging than Contrition. If he starts losing and an Angel tells him to wipe out a city, he wouldn't hesitate for a second.

stevenneiman

The thing about Good is that it doesn't fight Evil because it does harm, it fights Evil because it's Evil. In one of her interludes, Cordelia Hasenbach noted that Malicia was improving the standard of living in Callow, but she noted that only as an advantage to her enemy, and not even one she could appropriate for her own use. The other thing is that Evil, in the rare but vivid cases where it does lash out, it does so out of frustration and desperate futility, created by the fear that inciting disasters of the most spectacular sort is the only thing they can do that the forces of Good won't undo, without regard for whether they helped or harmed actual people.

A good way to think about it in my opinion is to imagine a world where 1% of black people become serial killers. A sensible person would try to figure out why in order to prevent them from becoming serial killers, and if that failed find better ways to identify those serial killers, but the approach of Good is to exterminate all black people. The one place this metaphor breaks down is that it's completely hopeless to try and exterminate Evil because there's an artificially imposed balance because all of the stories require the existence of both factions.

Dainpdf

If you pay attention to what the Pilgrim said, you'll notice that Evil rulers are apparently a hazard upon the morality of the people. Just by ruling the country tends towards becoming like Praes or Helike.

And while living conditions may be improving, do recall how much they worsened first. Think of Mazus and co.

Also, gotta remember that the people of Liesse aren't exactly enjoying improved HDI right now. You could say Malicia greenlit the project due to being afraid of invasion, but Procer has been under pressure from the Chain of Hunger and the Kingdom of the Dead for ages and they haven't resorted to massacres of civilians or demons.

MetruX

You're only seeing it from Praes point of view. There is, actually, much more comendable places ruled by Evil, since in all this continent Praes is known as the land of horrors and destructive super magics. Take Helike, for instance. One of the strongest in the league fo free cities, more foten than not ruled by Villains, with a nice quality of life.

Also, it's been noted before that this is the "small" continent, as in, only small powers dwell here, both for Good and for Evil, so there are many greater powers.

About Procer not resorting to massacres and demons? Well, they did resort to massacres. And conquering wars. And wars amongst themselves. Even mind rape by angels. The only reason they didn't employ demons is because they can't, unless you want to suddenly find your friends, family and everyone nearby trying to kill you... So Procer is as bad as Praes, no matter what is said. The thing is, as I noted before, there are bigger and better powers for both sides, none of those two can be considered the common, they are the lower echellons. For exemple, we know the elves of this continent are only here because they are racist assholes and the rest of the trully Good elves banished them. Do you think a culture of semi-imortals who do something like that will get in petty wars like Procer? Of course not.

Thus, I disagree with the Pilgrim, Evil rulers can be good for their nations, as much as Good rulers can be bad. Because, as ever, Good is not good and Evil is not evil.

Dainpdf

Wait, what? Name one such massacre. Anything we can put on the scale against Liesse.

Procer is imperialistic and expansionist, and that's bad. Their nobility is corrupt and decadent. But they are not the High Lords.

You say they don't summon demons only because of the repercussions from neighbors. I want a citation on that. Cat won't deal in demons either, and that's part of the reason she can swing heroic roles every now and then. Also, attacking people who use demons is part of it. It's the right thing to do. It's exactly what they don't do in Praes. Or Helike, FYI.

If you want proof, note how Pilgrim basically offered to clear out that demon Cat pointed out in their first meeting. Because whether you see it or not, they do care. It's just they put Good above what nations rule the land. And if some people end up sacrificed in the process, that's unfortunate, and they'll try to avoid it, but at the end of the day it's worth it.

shieldredblog

"Name one such massacre. Anything we can put on the scale against Liesse."

That time an angry Proceran hero Contritioned a city because they weren't fanatical enough? What do you thinks happens to the old, sick and young when the rest of the city becomes living attack zombies?

Humbling of the Titans. No way they fought the Gigantes up front and won. Even centuries later, they still kill any Procerans they see, even diplomats.

Dainpdf

The Gigantes are said to hold grudges; plus, they apparently kill almost anything that comes over their borders.

And yeah, you can keep bringing up that one example with William back up, but while that is still pretty bad it's not a demon based hell weapon, and it was not (as far as we know) secretly stimulated by Cordelia.

Also, he was Proceran? I didn't remember that.

shieldredblog

Not William's failed attempt. During an Interlude chapter William reminisces about other Angels of Contrition that have been called down. Including once when Procer was going to sell their peasants to the Dead King to prevent him from invading. A Hero was not cool with that so she mind controlled one of their cities and sent them against him as a suicide army that never even reached Keter.

Jason Ipswitch

What leaves me wondering with Hanno is what his ultimate role in the story will be. I mean, he's a net character (for an inflexible Good Hero), but where is he going narratively? It worries me, because it ultimately makes sense for him to challenge Cat, but for that to happen, he really needs to beat Black first. And I don't want to see Black lose to such a hidebound moron.

nimelennar

The existence of the Coin of Judgment McGuffin implies that at some point, it's going to return an unexpected result.

So Hanno exists to either grant legitimacy to Cat's redemption story, or to realize, Wanted-style, that the heroes "deserve" death just as much as their targets and switch sides.

beleester

Yeah, for a while now, I've had my bet on Hanno's coin returning "Don't kill her" when he reaches Cat.

sengachi

Hanno spent an entire day living the lives of twenty one heroes who fought Black ... and that wasn't enough to prompt him to question the "force Black to obey the narrative" step of the plan.

Well I was worried about Hanno as a threat before now I'm sure not. The man's an idiot. Who the fuck goes twenty one (+1) rounds with Black and comes out of it thinking "alrighty then, what I need to beat Black is the right set of combat skills, which I will apply to his face as he meets me in single combat before our respective armies".

Good gods. I know Akua was derisive of the intellects of Heaven's swords, but this is a new low. Hanno thinks they're playing checkers but really they're playing "the pieces are coated with contact poison and also there's a car bomb under your seat", and he doesn't realize this after watching *twenty one* fucking people sit down at the checkers board only to turn people and explode.

nerferf

There was a reason Bard was leading this guy around, it cause hes pretty much an idiot that needs someone else to do his thinking for him

Darkening

To be fair, Black did already go toe to toe with him twice before. With tricks and ambushes and fire support, yes, but he actually showed up and gave him a fight.

Oshi

That dind't clue him in to the fact that it wasn't going to go his way....really?

stevenneiman

I really do wonder what exactly he did to pull that off. It would be child's play to make something that looks like Black, talks like Black, and to a certain degree even fights like Black so long as he controls it, but I have no idea what he was doing to make it so that providence thought of him as basically being there when he clearly wasn't there enough to be inconvenienced much by dying there.

I also wonder whether there was any particular reason for the exploding horse, or if that was just for a cheap laugh. I suppose it might be that the more up close and personal the kill, the more it would use up the judgement rendered upon him. That would also explain the monologue, making Hanno's "victory" as classic and perfect as possible.

shieldredblog

It was a Nefarious style soul puppet, like the Empress used to talk to Cat.

I think the monologuing was either him strategically wasting time or just rolling with it.

Dainpdf

Increasing the relevance of the battle. Cat mentioned a couple of chapters back (I think just before Watergate) that monologuing increases narrative weight and thus the importance of every blow.

Euodiachloris

Black had pretty much worked White's whole "be dead Heroes" shtick out before the fight. Which means blowing the horse up forced Hanno to switch "faces" right off the bat, thus losing access to a big (and ultra-dangerous) one and forcing him to adapt (which he isn't that good at).

Amadeus'd also use it to work out if Hanno can repeat the ghosts he goes for. Or not.

Also – pranking is a way of life, not just for April Fool's! xD

Morgenstern

Remember that bit about the eyes already being dead when the killing stroke actually hit? Black was NOT there during the actual kill. He was just there to get Hanno invested so much he couldn't draw back anymore

Morgenstern

So, no saying how much it would do to him if he *actually* would have to "live through the kill" of the meat puppet.

beleester

"Actually a Doombot" is a fairly common Villain trope, so presumably the narrative allows it even though it makes "providence" look kind of dumb. The hero has to fall for it, for the same reason that you can never thwart a villain at Step 1 of their plan.

nick012000

Calling it now: the Black Knight beats Hanno by calling him out while he's deep inside the life of a Callowan Hero, and getting them to realize they're fighting on the wrong side, and *attacking* the Red Flower Vales.

sengachi

Ooohhhhh, I like this.

Allafterme

The lancer was a Caen, the family that was Dukes of Liesse & the liege lord of the Vales. I don't think it will work

Jason Ipswitch

Ah, but that was with a very obvious Praesi Black Knight sitting right in front of him.

Put him between, say, the Order of the Broken Bells and an obvious invading Proceran force and he may make a different choice.

Byzantine

It does seem to be setup for that, now that you mention it. The deeper he goes into a past Hero the more he loses himself – and he is clearly losing himself utterly to fight Black.

CaptainSemantics

Or perhaps Cat, as Queen of Callow, does something similar to him

---

Or, alternatively, if he gets to fight Cat and tries the same way to rifle through the souls of the heroes she killed, the only one significant enough would be the Lone Swordsman. William is a truth-teller and generally opposed to any kind of Proceran occupation, so if she catches on, she may well turn him unto the other heroes (especially if Akua does succeed in redeeming herself and gets out to join the ultimate band of heroes in Witch's stead).

Evgeny Permyakov

>"That remains a surprisingly effective trick," the monster mused. "I really should send her a thank you note."

Awww, so cute! Black actually has a heart! In a sense. I wonder, what wicked thing it would produce.

Yotz

Of course he has a heart! Several of them, actually. He keeps them in the padded box at the back of the broom closet.

jordanarc

The White Knight spent almost the entirety of this conflict sat in his tent going through heroic lives with the explicit intent of learning about the Black Knight and coming up with an effective way of dealing with him. The end result is a stock-standard heroic challenge to a duel and expecting a conventional response from the Black Knight.

Our boy White is an imbecile. Truly.

*daegone823*

He thought the Black Knight as in previous struggles would want a duel.

He thought he had a rule of three battle sequence

1. Black retreated at their first confrontation
2. Won their second confrontation
3. The white Knight felt this was his time to shine...

What he does not know is that Black was setting up Cathrine for a revenge storyline and he planned on dying. As Warlock stated Chat gave Black a second chance in life thus a new story has surfaced. One in which Black is back to his happier days. She gave the rusted gears in his head some grease. Thus Black has no need to face Hanno again in face to face combat.

Jonnnney

Remember step two of a pattern of three is a draw. And step three guarantees victory to the one who lost the first step.

Hanno is under no delusions about a pattern of three, his fault was in his goal. He was focused on defeating the Black Knight when he should have been trying to kill the Black Knight.

werafdsaew

To be fair, Black did try hard to kill the White Knight in his previous two engagements. The White Knight does not know the reason, and so does not know that the reason no longer applies.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

The Ultimate 5 Tips to Surviving as a Villain

1. Amuse the Gods of Above and Below with wit.
2. Read 1
3. Read 2
4. Read 3
5. Read 4

*MurkyTruths*

Can I frame this?

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

ye bby

Silverking

So that's the weakness of Hanno's power: strength and experience but no context of current events. They cannot keep up with the times, and they will fall for newer tricks. It's almost funny how accepting the other Names are of their situation. "Where am I? Wait, evil to kill, never mind." To paraphrase Akua, the singlemindedness of heroes is a feature, not a bug.

Dainpdf

Hanno had learned all of Black's tricks, or so he thought... But, as Wekesa said, Cat hit F5 on him with that knife.

stevenneiman

I hadn't thought of that, but it would actually make a disturbing amount of sense if heroes could just be counted on the try and kill a villain whenever Hanno dredged them up, even if they have no clue what's going on. I wonder if his power screens for ones who would take fives seconds off to think first and finds him someone else, or if heroes are really that predictable.

Dainpdf

I love this. It was so weird reading the fight. I kept thinking something was off, but never guessed the actual reason. Masterful!

Also, can we have a spin-off with the Calamities once this is done? They're too great not to. Love me some Maddy. Honestly tho, Cat still lacks the experience Black has. Compare what Black did last chapter to Cat's Watergate, for example, or how he completely subverted Hanno's narrative with great elegance while she at best gave the Pilgrim pause. Granted, the Pilgrim is probably a better hand at it than Hanno. Then again, the White Knight had so much narrative momentum behind him I'm surprised he didn't snap his neck falling off his high horse like he did. Finally; dammit, Black! You're supposed to use a goat, not a horse!

Yotz

"Is that the Carrion Lord?"

"It seems so. Although..."

"What?"

"Is he riding a goat?..."

MetruX

Man, laughed too hard xD

Darkening

I mean, making a lot of assumptions there that the calamities will survive the story in any meaningful fashion. The previous generation counterparts to the main cast typically don't make it out of stories very well.

Dainpdf

I meant with their past adventures. Can't have them without Sabah.

Darkening

I suppose seeing them negotiating with dragons and overthrowing cities while drunk would be a fun time.

Morgenstern

Absolutely. Can't see why the author thinks it wouldn't.
*shrugs

Morgenstern

Maybe something about it never being as good dragged out into a full story compared to the short glimpses giving us all kinds of ideas, somehow akin to jokes? Hmm...

Shoddi

I think they are better as Noodle Incidents.

superkeaton

Oh Black, you clever monster. And I fucking love that he used Cat's exploding animal zombie move.

Warlock, don't die, you have a husband and son to love.

Rook

I thought it was already pretty nuts when the saint parried darkness

This motherfucker just parried divine providence

Euodiachloris

Nah, he didn't parry it. What he did was bait and ambush it with a sneak attack. 😊

sengachi

He didn't parry it. He danced with it, slipped it a kiss with tongue, and then slipped out the back of the club when it went to get drinks.

Jonnnney

More of a deflection than a parry. Hanno used divine providence to gain a victory when he should have been using it to get a kill. He didn't even do his coin shtick. He really is lost without Bard to guide him

werafdsaew

Who is "her"?

RanVor

Catherine Foundling, obviously.

Someguy

Black "stole" Cat's Undead Explosive Steed trick.

crysjal

Cat is known for using explosives in Nexromantic constructs, in particular exploding goats.

Forrest

I know you meant Necromantic, but I am now passively considering who Nex would be, and why their constructs are so romantic. I personally think it's quite the fun mental image, of some Necromancer named Nex dressing up some zombies in a swamp for some quiet tea.

Shoddi

Thank you, Forrest, for that mental image. Now you've got actively considering... things.

1. In her Name dreams, Catherine has a swamp in her mind/soul.
2. This swamp is filled with zombies.
3. Cat's "evil" side, whom she named "Lady Backstab", also lives in the swamp and has control over the zombies.

Therefore, Lady Backstab is "Nex", and she will have the zombies dress up and serve tea. Also, she will invite Condescension Queen over, to apologize for that one time she knocked Queenie out and buried her alive.

stevenneiman

Maybe, but only because she know's Queenie is gullible enough she can knock her out and bury her again.

Novice

"Tremble, White Knight, for my power is truly boundless within reasonable limits." Fucking hilarious. Though this is something I've come to expect from Cats mouth not Black's.

Novice

*Cat's not Cats. Darn it

Antony444

Brilliant, absolutely brilliant.

The Calamities are terrifying monsters, but damn it is so much fun to listen to them compared to these boring inspid and heroes!

The White Knight is truly the hatchet's man of the Heavens. For a man who was giving plenty of knowledge about Black's methods, he was really too quick to forget about the dagger in the dark. The Black Knight will never fight fair. The Calamities have not survived for so long without developing a frightening amount of contingencies. But the worst part is ignoring the strategic picture. Hanno sent the other heroes to the other pass without an afterthought. The army of Procer was once more divided in two thanks to him and the Witch of the Woods.

The irony is painful it almostt hurt. If the heroes had chosen to attack on a single pass and let the goblinfire block the other path, they would have been five heroes against two villains. The other legions would have been there, but the numerical superiority would have been theirs.

Instead the most dangerous heroes are on the wrong battlefield, with only Wekesa and a Legion to make a fighting retreat. On the other side, the heroes are going to face the Black Knight and two more Legions than they expected. This is going to be a slaughter... the Carrion Lord is going to add to his killing list several heroes I think.

Sorry Hanno. The Black Knight is in another valley.

Your greatest mistake was to underestimate the power of explosive horses.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

When it comes to narrative in general and Named in particular, a numerical advantage makes defeat likelier. This very chapter mentions this explicitly: most of the Named involved would just end up with mere side-plots for the duration of a mass engagement, and that makes them much more vulnerable.

Also, it seems to me that Hanno wasn't able to use his understanding of Black's ways because he drew too deep and forgot who Black even was, being more concerned with the battles his borrowed skills' true owners expected to find themselves in. He was not Hanno at the time, and those bygone heroes weren't in on his plans beyond remembering whom to switch to.

daegone823

What happened to the Hanno who along with his band of heroes fell from a tower. He had such faith that they would survive because it was so likely they would not. I had such hope for him he seemed like a good hero who was willing to get dirty.

He had the champion hero who clearly enjoyed killing for sport collecting blood trophies. The ashen priest who healed you although it hurt like a bitch.

It seems his defeat and encountering of the black knight has caused him tunnel vision. If he was smart he would have traded places with the grey pilgrim and saint of swords. That would have pitted him against Chat his arch nemesis. Then it would have pitted Black against two old heroes making it people who understand how to weave stories. By pursuing the "Black Knight" he is missing the true enemy the abomination that is Foundling.

Oshi

Bard is not there but really I expect the next interlude will end with Black's defeat or Warlock's death,

MetruX

I don't even see how this could be possible. Are you simply assuming that because things are going nicely they need to fall down? This is Cat's thing, Black has been full on victories for most of his life.

stevenneiman

No, I don't think he ever could have beaten Black. The insane ideology he has adopted pretty much requires him to swear off critical thinking in order to work, and Black can choose not to be an opponent so much as the ultimate test of critical thinking. Dumping the fight on people who didn't even know who they were up against certainly didn't help, of course.

ericwinter

You know, I quite like this chapter for the sole reason that it comes closest to something I noticed from the very first. Black talks about the lack of agency; how Heroes are bound to always follow orders and obey the Gods Above, while Villains go off and do their own shit with only minimal interference from Below. Now remember the very, very beginning of the story, when we were told how Creation came to be. "The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made.

So, we are told, were born Good and Evil." What, I wonder, is wrong with this picture?

Jonnnney

Remember what was quoted at the very beginning was the book of all things. A book written by mortal men to spread faith in the gods above. Very little of that book is what one would call "truth"

stevenneiman

Technically, it doesn't specify which was which.

blitzxsblitzxs

So Champions is wearing Captain's skin on her head right? Her head and arms? And it is basically just a corpse. And dear Catherine is a necromancer. The implications are interesting to say the least.

sengachi

Oh fuck Black is going to kill the Champion with his friend's own pseudo-raised undead skin.

Yotz

More poetic way would be to make that skin her own. It even falls into Heroic narratives under the Tortured Hero archetype, "One who hunts Monsters" clause.

stevenneiman

I think you mean black is a necromancer. Also, we know from those guys Hye killed in Keter that undead Named can retain their Aspects, and I one of Sabah's relates to taking orders.

Metrux

Actually it was noted as really impressive and the first time she saw a Named undead retain Aspects, though we know dead ones do. Though simply relying on the ordering could give a boost, even though it wouldn't come as a permanent aspect in this new unlife.

burdi

the map for upcoming war between Cat and Malicia

1. All The Woe side with cat
2. Black side with Cat
3. Scribe side with Black
4. Matron side with Cat (maybe)
5. Most Praes army officer side with Black
6. Ranger side with Black (if she join in)
6. Wekesa side with Malicia

Malicia position seems very weak, i wonder how the war will unfold

Maybe she even join Catherine since she has story to join The Grand Alliance, instead against her and face destruction

RanVor

I doubt Wekesa would choose Malicia over his own son. He might be an awful person otherwise, but he loves the boy dearly. I don't think he would bear fighting against him.

That would leave Malicia with only the high lords to ally with. Sure, they hate her, but they hate Black even more. They'd probably provide their support in exchange for revoking the reforms, and she'd have no choice but to agree. That would ultimately make her just another Tyrant madly grasping at power, sealing her defeat with the power of the narrative.

Yotz

Of course Wekesa would never turn upon his son. Though, he might try to "save" him from that goody-two-shoes no-bad good-doer Catherine Foundling, and consequently send him to his pocket dimension without supper.

sengachi

Malicia planted commands in the minds of all Legion officers, remember? #5 is not the advantage it may appear to be.

frolamiz

She way be able to invite the dead king to the party. It's not 100% certain since we where only shown a scene with him receiving a call right after Malicia said she would have to take drastic measures, but since we know the Tower has a hotlink to him it's the logical conclusion.

But again it would not be the first red herring of the story.

JJR

Perhaps it's just going to turn out that his hot pocket was done microwaving. (it only took like 100 years)

Weroxx

I would just like to leave my future pleasure when Hanno faces Cat and discovers that the heavens can indeed be cheated. She did it twice already.

Yotz

>With the dark and wicked spell of wick and cheap matches.

That's a thing of a kind lying far beyond the boundaries of the slipperiest of slopes of the foulest villainy! Troubling is that Black stooped to such a degree, for if he continue to tread this despicable road, next time he may even use the forbidden art of Black Metallurgy!

Yotz

PS: on more serious note, it suddenly dawned on me that using Black Metallurgy may be a really, really, really bad idea. Praes already got their first two Red Letters.

James Adam Lenox

Did they ever get Captain's body back? Because if they haven't I think the wolf skin is a red herring to distract us from the fact that there just so happens to be a wolf about the size Captain was when she disappeared from the story.

CaptainSemantics

I doubt that the wolf is actually Sabah, but the parallel could definitely have narrative significance somewhere along the line

oldschoolvillain

They held a funeral for her in After – I think that the cloak that the Champion took was an actual cloak, rather than Sabah's skin.

wyaldriddler

Its called out explicitly as Sabah's Beast skin in the previous interlude.

James Adam Lenox

"She was not wearing, for once, the wolf fur cloak she'd claimed from someone that was no wolf at all."

There is a lot of wiggle room in this sentence actually. Saying it's a cloak claimed rather than made from someone, also calling it a wolf fur cloak but then say that she was no wolf at all. Then again, Good is known for sanitizing and poetic language.

wyaldriddler

Really, **really** good. It's not remotely ambiguous to me. Sabah only has a wolf fur of any kind as the Beast. And you can totally say that you "claimed" a beast's hide, and have it be accurate word use.

Like, Champion has been established as a blood happy murder lady. She would **totally** skin a werewolf in its wolf form. Because it's a monster instead of a person in her head.

Aston W

I'm still waiting for the Gnomes in their space ships to appear and drop atomic bombs on the whole continent when the balance is broken.

Literally, the only reason for stunting technological development is to develop your own.

Reminds me of a certain Webcomic.

That they only appear when a letter is given remains the silent high point of the story.

Cat can fight and struggle. But not against neutron bombs.

CaptainSemantics

Reading this I realized that Black emulates Cat even better than Akua did back in the last series of interludes.

Which leads me to one inevitable conclusion: when Robber gets bored of running scorpion fights he should put on a Cat impersonation contest.

Jonnnney

Hanno went for the win when he should have gone for the kill a poor use of providence. These folks are stronger than the children who faced Cat, but they are still children. Looks like the most important win in the last book was Hierarch's banishment of Bard. Hanno is fucking up pretty badly without her guidance. He didn't even do his coin shtick.

Gotta say I'm surprised so many people are focusing so much on the pattern of three. It was prevalent early on in the story, but it is only one pattern and given that it requires a loss then a draw I don't think any main hero or villain on the field is gonna aim for it.

My biggest take from this chapter is, looking at the Gigantes, quite a few races of good are fucking OP but just too damn lazy to fight evil unless it is knocking on their doorstep. That is two Good races that live for hundreds of years and can wipe the floor with all but the most powerful villains, but they just can't be bothered. Looking at this combined actions of the Saint of Swords it seems that the greatest weakness of those that follow the gods above is time.

shieldredblog

He was talking about the Titan vs Triumphant fight. That fight ended so badly for the Gigantes that their ruler Name, the Titan, is still stuck in a cannibalistic time loop.

oldschoolvillain

Arguably worse – he and his wife were cursed – one with endless hunger, one with endless healing. Triumphant was a special sort of monster, but one that I prefer to leave in the annals of History than have return.

MetruX

I think he can't use the coin again on Black? I mean, you can't pass judgement twice on the same issue.

And yes, I do agree people are putting too much stock into the pattern of three, it is not the only pattern we have seen before!

About the Gigantes, weren't they almost wiped out, and that the reason why they don't leave their place?

Edrey

great, one question, if providence is a force then it can be stolen right? or usurper somewhat right?

Aston W

Red Letter gonna be the great equaliser.

Any technological development and boom.

Great way to wipe out Nations. Am I the only one who remembers that?

Bunch of flying ships wiped out a kingdom. Black said that.

JJR

Without knowing why the Gnomes do what they do trying to manipulate them would be excessively dangerous. Sure, it seems like Procer could win this war by sending some spys into the Principate to start doing physics research, "On behalf of the First Price, we swear." But, we don't know how the Gnomes even know about the state of research on the planet. They might see right though the ploy. And if they get pissed off by the attempt at deception, it may be Procer that gets the apocalypse. Hell, if even if the attempt goes perfectly, they might be in the habit of destroying whole continents, not just the country the research took place in to make sure none of the knowledge gets out.

With only one incident of attacking and a handful of red letters to go on there just isn't enough information to be able to manipulate them.

Aston W

It would be better than Good winning though.

Let's see if Cat becomes a hero.

I can see Black planning it for a murder-death-kill event.

Destroy the World instead.

Dainsleif

"You cannot cheat the heavens"

White Knight i think you and Catherine need to talk. You'll think that she loves jokes.

werafdsaew

If a duel is a thing that cannot be avoided without cost, why didn't the Sword Saint just duel Catherine?

---

Interlude: Lest Dawn Fail

*"The moon rose, midnight eye
Serenaded by the owl's cry
In Hannover the arrows fly*

Hold the wall, lest dawn fail

*No southern song for your ear
No pretty lass or merry cheer
For you only night and spear*

Hold the wall, lest dawn fail

*Come rats and king of dead
Legions dark, and darkly led
What is a grave if not a bed?*

Hold the wall, lest dawn fail

*Quell the tremor in your hand
Keep to no fear of the damned
They came ere, and yet we stand*

So we'll hold the wall, Lest dawn fail."

– Lycaonese folk song, origins unknown, dated before annexation by the Principate

"Walk me through it," Marshal Ranker of the Hungry Dog tribe said.

She still thought of herself by that name, though her tribe was decades dead. She'd slain it with her own two hands, conscripting every male of fighting fit and taking them up north to throw her lot with the rebels of the civil war that enthroned Malicia. The matron-attendants, women and children had been split among other tribes according to ties of kinship, the ancient records of the Hungry Dogs sent down into the dark beneath the Eyries to add to the ever-swelling chronicles of the fallen and the failures. The Black Knight flicked those eerie green eyes at her, unreadable.

"You were briefed on the plan before we followed it," he reminded her. "You saw it unfold."

He spoke Lower Miezian with that slight burr to his voice that was the mark of Callowans and Duni both, one of the thousand reasons Wastelands used to look down on the pale-skinned westerners.

"I know the plan as it was told us," the old goblin said. "That is the surface. Tell me the underpinnings, how it was woven together."

It was a guilty pleasure of hers, to tease out the inner workings of her old friend's mind. The cold method in it was like poppy to her kind, cunning viciousness put to murderous purpose. Had he been born of her people, Ranker would have killed anyone with the slightest claim on him and made the man her consort. There were still matrons in the Eyries that whispered he was utterly wasted on humans, a species whose idea of thought was laughable at the best of times. Broad-teeth monkeys who stumbled through Creation blindly, never a moment of their lives aware of how fragile and vulnerable they were until the Gobbler swallowed them whole. Amadeus, though? Oh, he ever slept with one eye open. A frail creature surrounded by a sprawling world of hostile demigods, he was the closest that misbegotten species would ever get to whelping one of her people.

"Is there a point?" the dark-haired man mused. "Already it has ended."

"There is always a point," she said, and bared her yellow teeth at him. "I learn, you learn. All rise."

His own words, these last few, thrown back into his lap. One of their very first conversations, years before she sacrificed her reign to earn yet greater victory. The glint in his eyes turned amused. That would not have been enough to ply him, in the old days, but Captain was lost and Scribe currently set to other purpose. He would speak. The urge was there for all villains, and she was providing him a culvert that did not endanger him or his designs. The threats had passed with the coming of night, though dawn would bring them anew.

"There were three forces to reckon with, in this scheme of mine," the Black Knight said. "The first was the heroes in the northern valley."

Nine slayers sworn under the Heavens, leading the assault of the crusaders. The Legions had protocols to face these, but not in so great a number. Though far from invincible, they were a mighty force.

"Great power on the march," Ranker said.

"At the time, significant only as an accumulation of strength," the green-eyed man noted. "By gathering together without a single unifying story, they stripped themselves of Above's protection. They made themselves fallible."

"But remained a significant force," she probed.

"That is so," he agreed. "And they would have become truly dangerous if they were allowed to turn into the rear guard for the retreating army of Procer. Nine heroes, facing the horde? Most would have perished, but at the cost of thousands on our part. Therefore, they had to be dispersed."

"Costly to achieve through force of arms," Ranker commented.

"Ah, but this was no heroic band," the Black Knight said. "Simply an assembly of heroes. And so, in the absence of a clearly dominant Named or a unifying threat, they developed a point of failure: lack of chain of command. Without central authority giving orders, the heroes had to rely on their personal judgement when presented with a choice. Judgement that was shaped by wildly different origins and cultures. There would be no unified response. To disperse the cluster of heroes, then, we needed only present them with a decision."

"The Tenth," Ranker smiled.

—

"O Great Destroyer," Legate Obasi said, kneeling at his general's feet. "The time has come to strike."

The ancient creature known as Nekheb let out a sigh, nearly sending him tumbling down the slope. Scales like midnight and eyes of gold that stood tall as a horse, the dragon was one of the living wonders of Creation. Magic made flesh, holiest of all the children of the Gods.

"I was just getting comfortable," General Catastrophe said, wiggling in its nest of melted stone. "It can wait until tomorrow."

Obasi had learned to understand the mood of his draconic master and winced at the tone. In court such a visible betrayal of his thoughts would have been disgraceful, but Holy Nekheb had never bothered to learn to read the faces of men. It was beneath them, admittedly. The dark-skinned legate still panicked at the idea that his general might decide to slumber then and there. It might be for mere hours, but there was no guarantee. After the Conquest the ancient creature had slumbered for seven months on the Blessed Isles and eaten anyone trying to wake it. The Soninke's predecessor had been stuck in the very uncomfortable position of needing to explain that to the Tower.

"The scheme of the Carrion Lord is in need of your greatness, O Peerless Ancient," Obasi tried. "Without your grace, the might of the Empire can only fail today."

The massive dragon clicked its teeth unhappily.

"This is true," they conceded. "You are all idiot hatchlings."

Legate Obasi prostrated himself, sincerely hoping no rivulet of liquid rock would make it down to him while he did.

"Your discernment is without rival, O Mighty One," he said. "Yet have the men of Procer not defied your greatness? Only yesterday, did one of their own not attempt to slay you?"

The dragon's nostrils flared.

"An archer," it rumbled. "I hate archers. They're worse than sea snakes, though not nearly as clever. You speak true, minion-thing. I name you one of my heralds for the worth of your advice."

This made it the third instance this year the legate was granted this boon. Holy Nekheb had some difficulty telling apart humans, he had come to suspect. Or simply did not care enough to try. Obasi stayed prostrated as long as he could, though he had to hastily crawl away when the dragon rose to its feet and spread its wings. The master took flight without further deigning to engage in conversation and the legate hurried towards the rest of the officer cabal. The other necromancers looked as exhausted as he did, even though they'd inhaled one strengthening concoction after another during the night on the march. The Carrion Lord had sent the Tenth Legion into mountains that separated the valleys north and south, and only a mere bell ago had they reached their destination. Beneath the cliff they stood atop fortifications could be glimpsed, walls and towers and some peasant bastion. No living host could have taken the hard paths through ravines and harsh slopes the Tenth Legion had marched through in the dark, but theirs was not the strength of the living. Only a mere three hundred of their legion drew breath, and they'd been the ones to trail behind as the undead advanced silently. Obasi gestured for one of the corpses to bend and sat on its armoured back, catching his breath.

"The Great Master takes the field," he said.

"They were in a mood?" Legate Kalaman asked.

"Settling down for a nap," Obasi sighed.

They shared a grimace.

"Well, the crusaders will know we're here soon enough," Kalaman said, brushing back her dark tresses. "Best we get the dead moving before they send the rear guard after us."

The sorcerers huddled together and wove their magic, taking the reins of the army spread across the mountains. Silently, inexorably, Legion X Horribilis began to climb down the cliffs.

Towards the lightly-guarded enemy camp.

—

"Some would stay," the Black Knight said. "But few. Undead and a dragon would be by the lure of promised victory. The Procerans would shortly panic, realizing they had lost their camp and risked encirclement."

Ranker sucked at her teeth, pleased at the cunning involved. That part had unfolded exactly as he said. Of the nine heroes leading the host, only four had remained when Nekheb appeared behind the crusaders and displayed his wrath. The rest had hurried back to kill the draconic general before it could slaughter the entire rear guard. The gates of the Twin had opened when they were too far to easily return, and out had poured the Legions of Terror. The sortie had run straight into the four heroes and been stopped cold as the four Named scythed through legionaries like ripe wheat. Impressive, but ultimately doomed. It took five mage lines assembled for ritual to drive them back, but back they were driven. From there, the steel wrote the song. Veteran legions under Grem's personal command hammered through the levies at the front until they broke and fled, collapsing the lines of fantassins behind them. The actual casualties the Procerans took, by Ranker's reckoning, were fairly light for a rout. Two, maybe three thousand. It was the enemy commander that salvaged the mess, riding down with her Neustrian cavalry to put iron in southern spines. The moment the front was stable she ordered a full retreat, the Legions in close pursuit.

The rest of the morning was spent breaking a sequence of holding actions by the Procerans as the crusaders tossed away men trying to slow the Legions. Heroes swelled those ranks more often than not, but they were offered the greatest of all insults: irrelevance. They stood proud and powerful, unbroken by the steel of the Legions. Yet the men died around them as they did, and they could not hold back an army by themselves. It was unfortunate that heroic presence meant the trade of lives involved always sharply in favour of the Procerans, but it was the trade of casualties for a tactical advantage and so had remained acceptable in Ranker's eyes. More so because, all the while, the Tenth Legion had been forming at their back. Nekheb allowed itself to be chased away when the heroes arrived spoiling for a fight, but by then nearly three thousand undead were on the ground. The heroes engaged as reinforcements continued to climb down, preventing further advance but little else. They were still fighting when the first ranks of the Proceran retreat arrived shortly after Noon Bell.

"Winning the battle was not the objective," Ranker said.

"Not at that juncture," Amadeus agreed. "There was a temptation, I will not deny. With the Tenth in the camp, there was no real chance for the crusaders to man the fortifications. Which were built to face the opposite direction of our advance, regardless. If I'd taken the field myself and we'd pressed the advantage, we would have slain a great many of them."

"You didn't," Ranker said.

"Because it would have been committing too early," Black said. "The second force to reckon with had not yet been neutralized. It would have left us exposed if we'd acted without considering her."

"The Witch of the Woods," the old goblin said.

—

The tower had cracked, like wet clay left too long under the sun. Wekesa still felt dismay at the memory. It had been purely kinetic force, that much he'd ascertained, but there had been no record of such a working in the Tower's scrolls and his study of the creational cascade had failed to divine anything useful. He'd tied the tower's protective wards into the the flanking mountains after the first blow, but all that had achieved was the powdering of at least half a ton of stone when the Witch struck again. There'd been few legionaries left inside, by then, but those that remained were instantly pulped by the impact. Warlock had been wary enough he'd moved out of the tower towards the mountains, and it was the only reason he wasn't dead. The Procerans had swarmed the broken tower, afterwards, but most of the legion that'd defended it had already retreated. It was all he'd promised Amadeus, and he gave it no more thought after that. That pair of spells had heralded the escalation of the duel into a higher realm of arcana, and the failure of his defence had forced him to go on the offensive.

More than an hour had passed since then, Wekesa thought, and he idly adjusted the bubble of force around him to dampen sound as the peak to his left exploded.

Illusions were allowing him to keep one step ahead. The girl had a working that allowed her to see through them – Dion's Gaze, he recognized – but she had to abandon her offensive to find him every time she used it. She'd followed him into the mountains, and now they could fight without concern for their surroundings. A storm brewed in the sky above them, this one not of his making. He could feel it strengthening, the lightning concentrating in a killing stroke she would cast down when she found him. Her casual shattering of mountaintops was an attempt to flush him out, though an unsuccessful one so far. Wekesa had been biding his time thinning boundaries to place his own killing blow, allowing her the run of the range. There was advantage in making her act in the open, as he now intended to demonstrate. With the storm now nearing its peak, the conditions had become acceptable.

"Imbricate," he said.

Seven-hundredth and twenty-second Hell. A hellscape of unending sprawling tempests, bereft of all devils save those who crawled beneath the earth. His thoughts burned as he oversaw the alignment, blood thrumming with sorcery, until Hell and Creation snapped into place. It had been wise precaution to mute sound, Warlock decided, for the howl of wind was deafening. Lightning thundered down, hundreds of strands, and flashing lights danced across the peaks. The roar of avalanches by the dozens devoured the rest of the song and he laughed, runes shining around his wrists as he wove the lightning into spears and struck at the Witch. The murderous child took it in stride, force spinning around her and making a wheel of the power he sent at her. She released it when his strikes ebbed, released a ring of pure lightning that shattered another two peaks. As he rode the storm, so did she. Discarding any notion of digging him out of his hole, she called on the Helian Sun and parted the storm with dawn's coming. Scorching light burned all in sight, but destruction was an old friend to Wekesa. He knew it better than her.

"Reflect," he hissed.

His mind spun, sights in the thousands flooding it, until he found the realm he'd sought. The most beautiful of his tricks, the one truest to the essence of sorcery. A lie told Creation: that its lay was as that of the Hell he had sought, as if they were perfect reflection. No great toil of alignment here, only the barest of efforts as he matched the realms. The sky went crimson, great shapes forming in depths that did not exist within Creation, and hellfire began to rain. The Witch would learn today why men had named him Sovereign of Red Skies.

—

"The landslides cost us more than them," Ranker said.

Amadeus conceded the point with an inclination of the head. As well he should. The last word from the Ninth was that Sacker had lost over seven hundred to an avalanche. While a mile away from the duel of the mages. Her entire rear guard swallowed by rocks, along with more than a few engines. In the northern valley, the costs had been no less steep. The mage officers of the Tenth had still been in the mountains when the two Named had begun slinging their spells, and half of them had been lost making their escape even as the battle around the Proceran camp erupted. The matron had forgot quite how terrifying Warlock could be, when let loose, but for all that terror the Witch had been every bit his match. And in their struggle, they had wrecked the Vales beyond recognition. The southern Twin was buried in stone along with most the valley before it, while a stray lance of lightning had hit the peak above the northern one, making half the mountain collapse atop it. That alone would not have cut retreat entirely for the Legions, but then Warlock had begun throwing down mountains to replace those he'd broken and it had gotten much, much worse. Half a city's worth of brimstone had tumbled down the slope of the northern valley after being batted aside contemptuously by the Witch of the Woods, and there was no going around that.

Even now they could not be certain of how much of the Vales had been wrecked by what was already being called the Waltz of Wroth. Both passes were now closed, that much was certain, but scrying across the broken mountain range had proved impossible and so no fresh report could be had from General Sacker. Assuming she was still alive.

"Only the third force remained in play, after that," Black noted. "It was always going to be the most difficult to predict, as its nature was bound to be reactive. In a sense, Wekesa's enthusiasm was a boon. It created an obvious opening, and the Heavens never can resist a spectacular entrance."

"Militarily speaking, the entire notion was absurd," Ranker said. "If one of my staff officers suggested such a thing, I would have them demoted back to the ranks."

"That there would be intervention was a given," Amadeus said. "We were, at that point, winning. The Tenth weakened when we lost the officers, but Nekheb was still looming and we had them bottled up."

The Princess of Neustria had exerted herself all morning in the prevention of a rout, but when the battle around the camps unfolded she'd plunged back into the deeps. It was a simple question of room. There were only two gates allowing entry into the fortifications where the Procerans had placed their camp, and limited space within. It'd been impossible for her to get a significant portion of her host through before the Legions under Grem hit her back, and from there the beginnings of a massacre had taken place. The crusaders had trampled each other trying to flee Legion blades, and though heroes had attempted to hold the back Nekheb had kept them on the backfoot by making the occasional pass. Squeezed by the Praesi shield wall, drowning in crossbow fire and munitions, the Procerans had died in droves.

"The Champion was holding the line," Amadeus mused. "Ah, the pretty bait that was. If I'd gone to kill her, before the hour was done I would have died."

The third force had been the White Knight, riding through the broken mountains with every single horseman under Prince Kaus Papenheim charge the flank of the Legions at the darkest hour.

—

Grem heard them long before he saw them. His people knew that sound better than any other on Creation, the thunder of hooves. The doom of horde and clan, the mounted killers from the West. That these had sworn oaths to the First Prince instead of the King of Callow made little difference. The odds of there being a usable pass after Wekesa and the Witch smashed apart the mountains were infinitesimal, he knew, but the Heavens had worked with lesser numbers. He'd been warned, that there would be a hidden knife near the end. His warlord's instincts had not dimmed with age. The Marshal of Praes glanced at the signal mage that had been his shadow all day.

"All mage lines for the Third," he said, "are to send fireballs and echoes in the pass, try to collapse it. And get Mok started on contingency Misfortune."

For any cavalry not led by a hero, this would have been an imbecile's suicide. The source of the charge was a narrow break in the mountainside atop a rocky hill at an almost ninety degree angle, all of it leading straight into a dark upright crevasse. With the White Knight at the tip of the charge, all these damning details would mean was mild inconvenience. Sorcery flared and the opening was drowned in flame and booming sounds, but no avalanche took. It had been worth making sure. Grem One-Eye watched grimly as the flank of Mok's legion pivoted to meet the coming enemy. Sappers ran ahead to sow the fields with caltrops as the two cohorts of trained pikemen formed in ranks. The ogre general's men were no Ironsides, but they were a heavy infantry legion nonetheless. Regulars dragged to the fore spikes of iron or wood and hammered them in a line three deep according to the standard pattern, angling them so they would be aimed at the belly of the horses.

As a welcoming gift, a pair of sappers with munitions-loaded crossbows shot clay balls at the narrow opening and green flames took to the rock. Thin was the hope that this would stop the enemy, but all eventualities should be covered if the cost was appropriate and two spheres was cheap enough. Mages, crossbowmen and sappers formed up behind the pikemen in good order, ranks of regulars serving as shield. Ranker's Fourth and the Twelfth had the front, so he could put his entire attention into this. The battle for the Vales would be won or lost here, and as Wekesa had so kindly deigned to drop a mountain down their only path of retreat there was no room left for mistakes. You have to let them win, Amadeus had said. The Heavens need their due, before we steal it, else another path will be taken. It might be his old friend was right, but Grem would not send men to die without doing his utmost to keep them alive.

The enemy appeared in a flash of blinding Light, evaporating the goblinfire-touched stone as the White Knight charged through. Behind him followed the mounted strength of Procer, pouring out like a stream of steel-clad death. He did not need to give orders in the matter of answer. Balls of flame bloomed across the ranks of the Third and hit the charging enemy, but Light burned and dispersed them like wisps of smoke. Crossbows fired in a perfect volley, and these drew some blood, but none touched the White Knight or the men behind him – as if the hand of some god steered away harm. The horsemen charged down the slope with unnatural grace, not a one stumbling over the harsh incline or jagged stones, and so they entered the killing field. The caltrops lasted a single heartbeat before the hero raised his blade high and a searing flame swept before him, clearing a path. The sappers fired their opening salvo, sharpeners and brightsticks. It was like throwing an egg at a wall. Explosions that should have shredded men and horses instead merely singed them, the light that should have seared eyes into blindness was laughed off.

Horns sounded, deep and promising ruing. The horsemen took three volleys, before reaching Mok's pikemen. Arrows and fire, the billowing poisonous clouds of smokers and the hard bark of sharpeners killing less than thirty. This, Grem thought, was the face of the enemy. Of the Heavens putting their hand to the scale, making mockery of the strivings of men. For a single moment, as the pikemen clashed against the cavalry, it seemed like the legionaries would hold. It passed, pikes glancing off armour as the entire first rank of the cohorts were brutally trampled. In that first heartbeat, Grem One-Eye lost at least two hundred men. The relentless brutality of the carnage almost awed him. Horsemen continued to pour out of the passage and slowly the Third Legion began to bend. Like a man with a knife slid into the belly, groaning in pain. Now, Black, he thought. Now, damn you.

A roar older than even the coming of knights cowed the battlefield, and the orc grinned with all teeth bared. Orcs had never quite forgot that sound, even though the dragons that had once ruled the Steppes were long gone. Above, wreathed in the noonday sun, a madman was riding a dragon. And in the claws of that great beast was a massive chunk of stone, still dripping melted rock where it had been burned out. A silver arrow punched through the dragon's wing, and as it screamed another buried into its flank, but still the glorious bastards flew and down went the stone. Dropped in front of the very opening from which horsemen poured, sealing it shut.

"First Legion," Grem One-Eye roared. "Forward!"

Invicta was the cognomen bestowed upon his men by the Tower. Undefeated. They would not fail that name today.

—

"They managed to retreat anyway," Ranker said.

The heroes, even after it all, had held long enough for a retreat. Only two of the nine had perished, the White Knight joining his fellows to escape. The horseman he had brought were not so lucky. Amadeus shrugged.

"There was only so much victory to be had," he replied.
"Papenheim came to us with sixty thousand men. He should now have slightly under forty."

The Legions had bled as well, she thought. Twenty-four thousand had garrisoned the Red Flower Vales, when the Iron Prince came calling. Sixteenth thousand now camped on the western side of the passage the battle had been fought over. Sacker's legion should still have the better part of it intact, but even so the losses had not been negligible. At least, she decided, five thousand in full. Against an army of mortals, the Vales could have been held against two hundred thousand until the end of time with the numbers they'd had. How starkly heroes turned the tide, even when checked by stratagem. Ranker shook her head, the two of them standing under a moonless night as exhausted legionaries slumbered in the distance. Too tired to even make cooking fires for what few rations they had.

"Has Warlock made contact?" she asked.

The Black Knight shook his head.

"He might be dead, Amadeus," she said as gently as her people knew how.

The pale-skinned man shook his head again.

"I would know," Amadeus simply said.

She left it at that, the two of them standing in silence. Grem's tent, she saw even from so far away, was still lit. The orc did not know the meaning of rest, even in his old age.

"We have lost the Vales," Ranker finally said.

Black laughed.

"There are no more Vales to be had," he replied. "It will take months for the crusaders to dig through the collapse, even with sorcery. Not unless the Witch intervenes and if she does..."

"Warlock strikes," Ranker murmured.

If he was still alive, of which there was no proof.

"If Hasenbach could so easily employ the Stairway ritual," Black said, "she would not have stopped at a single passage through the Whitecaps. Multiple points of entry into Callow would have been a much greater strategic threat."

That was true enough. The Black Queen's army was strong and well-trained, but it also had limited numbers. She would have been forced to allow one of the invading armies free hand in Callow while she dealt with the other, which would have been disastrous on many levels.

"True as that might be, we're still on the wrong side of the pass," Ranker reminded him. "Our supply lines are cut, the full muster of Papenheim's reunited army is less than a day away and our only paths for retreat involve months of marching through enemy territory."

If they succeeded at giving the Iron Prince the slip, she thought, smashing the Proceran border army in the south and retreating through the lands of the League of Free Cities might be feasible. The alternative was heading for the Stairway, which was much less appealing even though the march would be much shorter. An army under Princess Rozala Malanza was retreating towards the pass, as of the last reports. The old goblin was not eager at the notion of forcing a narrow passage filled with hero-led Procerans.

"Are we?" the dark-haired man asked.

Ranker's large eyes blinked.

"You see us as stranded, old friend," Amadeus said. "I see us as freed. Callow is safeguarded for some time yet. No longer in need of our vigil."

The goblin licked her lips.

"And we're at the gate of the Principate's heartlands," she murmured.

"Come, Ranker," the Black Knight grinned. "Let's have a drink with Grem, and discuss our invasion of the Principate of Procer."

---

erraticerrata

A little later than anticipated, but here it is.

Dainpdf

Hope you have smited that stomach bug for its audacity.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Frozen cold in its tracks.

RoflCat

And its soul kept buried, for the day it might be used on another who shows as much audacity it did.

doominator10

Why freeze and bury when you could condemn the souls to one of the hells? Much harder to get back then.

Yotz

To use its frozen burning soul as a sconce, of course. Comfort is paramount.

Euodiachloris

Worth it. 😊 Gang canny for the rest if the week, mind.
[Geordie dialect]

Barthumphries

I don't get it. Geordi La Forge didn't have a dialect.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Enterprising attempt

Euodiachloris

Google is your friend. See also the Magpies vs Black Cats (NUFC vs SAFC – Tyne-Wear derby). Geordie is technically Tyneside, but it's sort of cone to mean "the dialect spoken in the North East of England that still scans shockingly well when translating Bede's poetry into it).

Jeffery Wells

Whooooosh!

JC

Great chapter. Hope you're feeling better.

octopusfluff

Well that is proper glorious, it is.

Redlaw

This showed the great difference between black and cat. She fought to death and only obtained a bitter victory while he basically didn't even fight and obtained a crushing victory + a chance to counter them. Still she by herself fought against a large group of heroes while he would have surely died if he fought the same way. Lol I really like how their power level make them think and act in such different way. And I am really happy to see how much she grown. At least in term of mass destruction she isn't inferior to warlock. And that despite her not being willing to use all the power of winter

jonnney

Can't discount the importance of fortifications and having months to prepare the field of battle. They both killed about the same number of enemies and lost roughly the same number of allies. The main difference was their overarching goals. Black wanted to kill many Procerans and get a chance to strike at their nation while Catherine was trying to only kill enough to force a negotiated retreat.

In terms of individual power I'd say Catherine has Black beaten, but Black and company beat the power, strategy, and experience of Cat and company.

Dainpdf

That's the difference in styles. As Black told Grem, he lets the Heavens have their dues, while Cat tried to subvert them. Black's strategy let him win without fighting because not fighting **was** his strategy (well, the main component).

Someguy

Callow is a breadbasket. If Cat goes full power with Winter, the farmlands will be decimated and everyone starves. Her problem is having too much power and keeping it in check.

Cpt. Obvious

Winter is dangerous that way, and if I understand things correctly the fay winter isn't just abscons of heat and the land hibernating until spring comes. Instead it suck the life out of the land so when spring comes everything is dead and not even the grass will grow.

Summer may seem more benevolent, at first glance at least. It brings the warmth of the sun. It brings growth and bountiful harvests. Problem is that it doesn't stop. A tree can grow from a seed to old age in weeks if not days or hours. The wheat will be ready for harvest faster than it can be harvested, and the cycle will be repeated over and over again. But this depleat the nourishment in the soil and what was rich fields will turn into deserts, and the summer sun will bake these mercilessly evaporating any source of water.

The fey are not of Creation and both Winter and Summer are pure incarnations of their stories. The do not compromise or use moderation. Winter is cold and hunger while Summer is the warmth of the sun and unbridled grovt.

soonnanandnaanssoon

I think the narrative structure of the Heroes present is another factor to consider. Cat was fighting a band of heroes, whose Narrative was tied together under the unifying figures of the Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords. Black was fighting a general assembly of heroes with lack of ties and hence no unified Narrative. Arguably, this made the Narrative edge of Black's Heroes weaker as a pivot as compared to Cat's. With her goals in mind (not slaughtering or conquering the enemy), the military and tactical options available and how the Heavens had stacked the deck against her, I think Cat did pretty damn good here.

Also, consider the Narrative implications of Black's true aim of conquering Procer. Today's chapter showed that instead of 'Defensive, Protecting Ruler', Black was aiming for and is currently playing the Role of a 'Conquering Evil Warlord', which not only bolsters his Aspect, but is a better Narrative for Evil. Imo, this would have given him some boosts from the Gods Below a la plot armor.

naturalnuke

Evil on defense gets a last laugh, Evil on the offense is a force to be feared.

stevenneiman

I disagree. What I would say is that Evil has a hard time getting anything done without spreading ruin. Black just decimated a huge portion of his own land in exchange for a playground where he considers devastation to be a bonus, and He's certain he did it while retaining someone who is probably in the top ten for people in Calernia able to wreak havoc if let off the leash.

I really wonder whether his actions are going to help or hinder Cat. On the plus side, he's the sword next to Cat's cheap wine, and he puts a time limit on the Procerans rather than Cat, but on the minus side he's not under her command so she might not be able to offer him standing down no matter how desperately the other side wants it. And it would complicate matters if her mentor was ravaging the Proceran countryside while she was trying to talk peace.

Matthew

This story is good for Cat.

She cannot make Black stand down, but she can help defeat him in Procer. This changes the victory condition for the crusaders from "Invade through Callow and topple the tower" to "Stop the Praesi invasion of Procer."

The Gods above can wrest out the second victory which allows Cat and Black to win their actual victory which is Callow free and trading with Praes.

MetruX

Well, in a way, the certainty that she can't make him stop makes an alliance with her even better an offer, especially if given in a time limited fashion. For you see, if they don't give up war with her, suddenly they have two fronts to fight, two in which they already lost once. Doesn't sound like a good situation, now does it?

James, Mostly Harmless

Actually, at least three fronts: Cat in North Callow, Black in East Procer, and Tyrant in South Procer. And then there is the Dead King ...

JackbeThimble

Destroying the Vales doesn't really count as devastating Land. RFV is basically the equivalent of the Korean DMZ, it isn't economically productive it's essentially a massive armed camp. It arguably serves it protective function better now than it did before.

Quite Possibly A Cat

This is good for bitcoin! I mean good for Cat. Right now the crusaders need to withdraw from Callow and stomp all over Black's forces. That's good for Cat. Then the crusaders need to somehow march on the Empire which funny story, would much, much easier if they could bring supplies through Callow and buy supplies from Callow.

So the Crusaders are leaving and then Cat gets a really, really nice bargaining position with them.

Mike Porter

It's even easier if they can move through Arcadia instead of Callow...

stevenneiman

Remember, their objectives were radically different. Amadeus sees everything he can as a battlefield, so his goal was to stymie the enemy advance and then go for a gut-punch that would force them to break off the offensive. The only peace he seeks is the kind where all his enemies are defeated beyond any hope of recovery. Cat, on the other hand, wants to push through the Liesse Accords, whatever they are, so she needs to have an enemy frustrated and trapped enough that they can't refuse diplomacy but also not so utterly alienated that they would fight to the last when facing destruction. As a result, Cat couldn't go for the kind of tactics Black so gleefully uses. Heck, I suspect that Operation Bonfire was a much more elegant and fancy version of exactly what Black is about to do the old fashioned way.

Matthew

Black has a good idea of Cat's objectives and probably shares them.

If he does Bonfire, which he is doing now, then Cat gains more strategic advantage while not having to actually kill any Procerans.

Before she was trying to do a "Good cop, Bad cop" thing but as one person with one army. Now, Black is fully the bad cop.

He is doing this on purpose.

MetruX

The main difference is exactly the way in which it is done, the most important part in any story. If you think of a fallen hero story, but you end the tale before the fall... Isn't he just another hero? Now, think of the battle we just glimpsed: If the deaths of procerans had come before they started winning, how do you think this would've ended? The same applies to his invasion and Bonfire, the way Bonfire was to be done would've left a mark on Cat and made destiny itself act against, so the results should differ alot. Though, in a sense, he is much more vulnerable in a common invasion, since there isn't as much mobility involved.

Euodiachloris

Nope: he fought for a highly Pyrrhic victory for the Good guys, hence a technical loss for Team Practical Evil, not a win.

In practice, though, Procer just got itself a proctal exam in its diary.

and proud

Damn, Black's pulling a 5 armies and 1. He was never planning to do something as foolish as *defend* a pass. He was invading through it!

Allafterme

And just like that, the Carrion Lord removes Red Flower Vales as a geographical entity & turns a holy assault into an invasion of the Principate. I feel ashamed for doubting Black...

Dainpdf

As you well should. Now let's see how long Hasenbach can keep this invasion going with a fire in her tail and a Cat at her side.

Oshi

There is also the Free Cities to consider. Black on the offensive means Hasenbach will have to continue the Crusade while pulling her people from it's borders to hunt down Blacks army. Can anyone else say Opening for an invasion?

Dainpdf

They'll probably have to split the crusader army and/or use the detachment retreating from Callow. Cordelia would never unman the borders. She's lycaonese, and the lycaonese hold the wall.

---

I'm kind of surprised that the Tyrant hasn't attached yet. The deterring force of twenty thousand in Tenerife is the only thing holding him back now: everyone else is either committed, too far away or both. If he waits too long, he'll have to deal with the armies of Levant marching to the Vales.

MetruX

For one, he couldn't care less. The Tyrant of Hellike is exactly the old kind of villains that can destroy an army by himself, and he acts the part, so if there is ten man or ten thousand is not something he considers. In second place, he is not a military leader, to begin with. Ruler? Yes. Warrior? Yes. Mage? Yes. General? No. So, coupled with the first reason, it's possible that he wouldn't even consider it... Of course, it's a different matter for the rest of the free cities, but who will tell him he is wrong and when to attack?

Dragnor425

Wonderful

tpdbooks

Thanks for the chapter Erratic, greatly appreciated as always. Although I'm sure others would agree that if your health isn't great then more rest is preferable to quicker chapter releases.

thegreatfeed

And Procer just fucked itself.

taliesinskye

It's not over yet. The Crusaders do still have forty five thousand troops in Black's way, outnumbering Black's forces by more than two to one. Papenheim is more than capable of mounting a solid defense with that along with his hero backup.

Decius

Heroes on a crusade make a poor defense.

Dylan Tullos

taliesinskye:

Don't forget that the armies of the Levant are already in Procer and marching towards the Vales.

stevenneiman

You forgot something. Black is now on terrain belonging to his enemies. Before it was a carefully calculated decision to make a mess in one limited battlefield. Now he can let Warlock off the leash on any size area for any reason, so long as enough of his own troops survive to remain an effective force, and even that much could be sacrificed if he's within reach of something worth sacrificing his threat for.

Oshi

Assuming Warlock survives. He has however successfully neutered the Crusades overwhelming attempt to invade Praes. Now there are in effect three fronts. The coastline with the Thallacrossy, Cat's gambit and his presence in Procur. A fourth will likely open when the Free Cities strike. It is a complex game to say the least and if the speculation about the Dead King is right there will be a 5th front.

Someguy

Papenheim is on the other side of the mountains. While Black is in Procer. He now has a choice, charge into Praes through a desert filled with "things" to assault the Tower without a supply line or march back to Procer through Callow and down the Stairway before Black burns it to the ground.

I hope he chooses to march back through Callow so Cat can charge his army tolls to fill up her coffers.

Nima

Ha! Once heaven taste a win. They abandon it.

SpeckofStardust

Ya, that went about as well as I expected it to, that being said he's only going to ravage 2 cities before the narrative stops him.

Hope he chooses well.

Someguy

Cities...peh! Cities are just useless phallic symbols.

The critical targets would be the scorching farmlands (after foraging to resupply the legions) & the mines (after looting to pay off the dragon). Destroying the lifeblood of the Proceran economy.

Arthur Hansen

I'm pretty sure the dragon is actually an officer of the army. Yeah, might have to work around it's draconic existence, but it's actually the head of its own Legion, IIRC. Think about the nightmare that would be from his second in command (that is effectively the one to get him and his legion fighting correctly).

stevenneiman

We already saw how unpleasant it is. I get the sense that when General Catastrophe gets in a mood it's not a guarantee that her handler can get her out of it without being eaten or incinerated.

Yotz

The fine and upstanding officer he may be, it seems he sees his Legion as his first, and Legion – as distant n-teenth, if not n-tieth; if he is regularly reminded of the “Legion” part, that is. And spoils of mines and treasuries in question would be wrote out as officer's salary for the good General. With his second in command left to explain the excessive amount of said “salary” to Marshal Grem and Imperial tax collectors...

Euodiachloris

I believe “dragons will be dragons” is explanation enough for most bean counters. 🤪

sengachi

Do *you* want to ask the dragon to take a pay cut? No? Yeah that's what I thought. How about you keep the gold coming and I don't mention to my boss the dragon that we had this conversation?

blitzxs

So it will be up to Cat and her army to defeat the Tenth Crusade and all of its heroes. The Woe vs The Five.

jonnnney

The 10th crusade won't have a path to even enter Callow for several months. While they break through the rock slide formerly known as the Vales they will have to contend with two professional armies sacking their cities, each of which is led by a Villain.

Dylan Tullos

jonnnney:

The Tenth Crusade isn't going to sit around a pile of rocks while Black burns Procer. They're going to surround Black, overwhelm his Legions, and kill him.

For some reason, people seem to think that "Crusade" means "we can't stop going forward for any reason". It does not work that way.

"Free Callow from Evil" is one of the Crusade's main objectives. "Kill Black" is another main objective. Black has made it temporarily impossible to get to Callow, and very easy to get to Black. So they'll take a rain check on Callow and kill Black.

Matthew

What Black is probably trying to do is change the victory condition for crusade to "Kill Black and stop the invasion of Procer."

The Heavens can give this victory to the Crusaders and it will keep Callow and Praes protected.

Oshi

A couple of things. Black will expect this and has at every tturn made it his business never to give a fight when he doesn't have to. What do you want to bet they will spend months chasing him while he does nothing but runs around making people scared. Every month they waste on a chase for Black is a month that Malicia blunts he Thallocrosy and Cat has to recover/make her gambit. We've also been told multiple times that one fo the biggest strategies for Black is to sow a as much chaos as possible. By doing so he can shape the narrative to force it into paths that help him instead. This is a brilliant bit of self immolation on Blacks part.

Metruux

Why does people keep saying there is no path to invade Callow? The Stairway still exist. Sure, Cat has a plan, it's not a surprise anymore, and they got kind of a treaty... But that has nothing to do with the paths to enter Callow. Also, Procer is not the only one in this Crusade, I'm pretty sure more fronts will be opened as the war deepends, and the sea is a good bet of where more troops and heroes could come from.

Argentorum

The stairway is no longer protected Narratively, however. Which means that it is an incredibly vulnerable choke point. Even leaving aside the possibly of dropping a mountain or (yet another) lake on it during the crossing, Cat can have an army there before the first foot steps onto Callowan soil. And then you're just feeding more men into a meat grinder.

Invading through the free cities is also out, due to Hierarch and Tyrant. If a sea invasion was feasible and sustainable, I expect the Baalites would have already launched it. Remember that they're on the other side of the continent, so without a land army to keep the legions tied up in Callow, the Empire can just slaughter the sailors as the come ashore.

Jane

So, the Black Knight is attempting a poor person's Bonfire, eh? I don't know... Hearing about a raiding army striking behind enemy lines like this sounds like it's just begging for the White Knight to intervene when it becomes most inconvenient. Not to mention that he can replenish food and arms as he takes a couple of cities, but he has no way of replenishing the munitions that are so important to Legionary doctrine.

Well, if he can give the enemy the slip after a couple of high-profile targets, it should still inflict heavy damage to the First Prince's political base, and compel the recall of a Proceran army to oppose him, but... The army sent to Callow is already on the way back, and the army sent through the Vales is already stuck as a result of the Waltz of Wrath, so I'm uncertain as to the tactical advantage there.

Shutting down the Vales as a viable pass is of great strategic value, and doing something while Procer is lightly guarded is certainly better than just slinking away, of course; I'm just not really seeing how this is a great opportunity for them unless they're, like, planning on taking the capital and compelling Procer to withdraw from the Crusade at swordpoint, or something like that. If they're not able to hold ground, and it doesn't sound like they're in a position to do so, it seems to me like any advantage they can secure while in Procer will be limited, while putting themselves at great risk.

Of course, given that they have a couple of the finest military minds of their generation with them, I quite imagine that they'll find something important to accomplish while in Procer.

Incidentally, it rather sounds like both Cat and Black's armies have been quite thoroughly thrashed at this point; how many Legions were left with Malicia? If they don't get a bit of time to rebuild (which they likely just accomplished here, admittedly), the Empire may have been pushed near the breaking point after losses this severe. Well, there's a reason that they were desperate to avoid a Crusade... It's not exactly easy to fight an international coalition while you have no allies. Having bought a year's breathing room from any attack from the South is a pretty big win.

I wonder who benefits most from a delay, though.... Just from a general strategic perspective, not a Narrative perspective. On the one hand, nations only loosely committed to the Crusade are more likely to drop out if progress stalls and focus on more local issues, especially since logistics are such a huge pain in a pre-industrial society... But on the other hand, those nations that do stay not only get more time to attract and arm recruits, but also improve their coordination with other nations involved in the Crusade, something that they were generally miserable at. Of course, Malicia is quite adept at the espionage and diplomacy games, and I imagine giving her a year to work on the tensions inherent to the Crusades could cause the whole thing to fall apart just from her efforts alone – or at least winnow off a couple of the most important nations.

I guess it's rather moot, since there's no way that anyone involved is actually going to get a year of relative downtime in this novel, but it's interesting to think of how this could have played out if it wasn't being guided by both Narrative and narrative.

Dainpdf

The thing is Black is already in Cordelia's territory, which he can sack, burn, pillage etc, while she's still in Callow. The White Knight could certainly double back to try to foil Black, but the latter would probably just weave around him and the Crusade would be that much weaker for it. Going by how this went, there was no holding that pass. The best they could do was blunt the invaders' power and light a fire in their pants.

Jane

Yeah, like I said, it's better than doing nothing against Procer when the opportunity is handed to them on a silver platter like this, and I don't know that there was any other way of handling the Vales (if for no other reason than there's no realistic way to get the Witch and their Warlock to fight elsewhere, and they both seem to love collateral damage).

It's just that the Black Knight seems to see this as a great opportunity, and... Well, I don't, until they reveal some more significant underlying objective or a way of receiving supplies and reinforcements. It gives them some nice targets of opportunity before heading back, but if they commit too much to raiding Procer, that puts them in a horrible Narrative.

Dainpdf

Do remember Procer is projected to have a hard harvest this year, and they still have to deal with the Chain of Hunger and the Kingdom of the Dead (which **we** know is stirring, so Black might know, too).

Burning their fields may make keeping up the war effort untenable, especially with those forty thousand dead, a portion of whom we're peasant levies.

Jane

True, but... "The Hero Stops the Pillaging Bandits" is a super classic story, and strong enough that it can allow even a farm boy to defeat seasoned warriors. If he's just aiming for general pillaging, not only is that not really an "invasion" of any sort, it raises so many death flags for him. I don't know that he could actually accomplish enough damage before he'd be caught.

Generally speaking, aiming for extensive destruction, even in a military context, firmly sets the Narrative against a Villain.

Dainpdf

But can Hanno get into that story when he's already committed to the Crusade narrative? Plus, as Black had stated (and done), there are ways to get around turning the destruction of a place into a narrative about the destruction of said place.

Jane

It wouldn't surprise me... I don't know if subplots are a "thing" in the Narrative of the setting, but rescuing peasants from marauders is a common element in a larger story. Even if they aren't, though, we know a lot of the heroes associated with the Crusade aren't really properly tuned in to the story of the Crusade, and could adopt the role. Or an entirely new hero could spring up to confront him – it's a really common origin story. Even if I doubt a freshly minted hero could kill him, they could slow his army down enough for the White Knight's army to catch up.

As for turning it into a story about destruction... I just don't think Procer's farmland has enough narrative weight to make that work. I would think it would need to be a decently sized city for that to work, or some sort of landmark – like a famous cathedral, or the building the Assembly meets in. I guess maybe razing some prized vineyards for a famous wine, but... That would be stretching it, and also wouldn't really help with the rest of the farmland they'd need to wreck.

Well, the Warlock could probably make it all spectacular enough to work, despite the lack of narrative weight, but he's needed to ensure that mages can't clear the pass.

Dainpdf

I meant he can destroy the countryside without falling into a story about him destroying the countryside and which would allow a hero to get him. If he sidesteps the story, no heroic intervention... Which is how he has operated all these decades.

Jane

Ah, my mistake. I don't know, though... It'd be difficult enough to raze the countryside while pursued by multiple armies in their home territory. To do so while tricking the Narrative on top of that... It sounds difficult, to me.

Dainpdf

Well, I don't think the levantines will go too far out of their way to solve Procer's problems, and I've argued the main Crusader army can't turn back without repercussions. So he'd mostly be chased by the low morale, still-crossing Malanza army, plus maybe some detachments from Papenheim

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

Will you stop saying that the Levantines are just going to look away while Black burns Procer? They joined the Crusade, and the Grey Pilgrim obviously wants them to fight Evil. Black is Evil, he's in Procer, and they're going to do their job.

I don't know where you got the idea that Levant needs to love Procer to hate Evil, or that there's some kind of rule in Crusades that you have to go straight to the Tower without pausing to, say, fight the Evil army directly in your path.

Euodiachloris:

It may not be banditry, but it's still an Evil army robbing farmers after invading a Good nation. This is not a Narrative that ends well for Villains.

Euodiachloris

Can you really call banditry when it is a military action in an official, ongoing war and performed by known enemy battalions who have been cut off from an obvious route back to base (purely as a result of collateral battle damage, guv), though? Nor is it kicking the locals specifically to nick their stuff with a for-profit motive.

Getting back Home may give plenty of excuses to get from A to a port that will allow them to get to H without getting accidentally dead along the way.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

Pappenheim's army is right next to Black, and the armies of the Levant are moving into southern Procer.

Even if Black manages to get around Pappenheim, he'll be caught between the Prince's forces and the Levantines. With Rozala's forces returning through the Stairway, the Crusaders will have him completely outnumbered and surrounded.

When invading another country, it helps to have an advantage in numbers or mobility. The Legions are notoriously weak on cavalry, so they can't simply race through Procer and burn everything in their path. They're already outnumbered by Pappenheim, and he can expect reinforcements, while the Praesi just wrecked the only possible path of retreat.

I can't see any way for this to work out well. "Taking the fight to the enemy" sounds good until you realize that Black was abandoning a strong defensive position to fight in the open field against an enemy that vastly outnumbers him and has more and better cavalry. That's just a bad idea, no matter how you try to explain it.

Bookworm

As Cat and company discussed, the armies of Procer are SLOW. They will have to use their cavalry to harry the legions, because the Procer infantry would never be able to keep up if the Praesi are allowed to march at will. Black is going to evade the armies, bait the heroes, and generally lay waste to the countryside.

While this would be detrimental to him and his army as he will eventually be cornered, it plays right into supporting (1) Cat by making her seem more reasonable and (2) Black's ultimate goal of twisting the Story (which again goes back to (1) and supporting Cat). Don't forget that he views himself as just another tool; while he would probably like to preserve himself for utility's sake, he would not be above sacrificing everyone including himself if it helped him achieve his goal.

Of course, there is still the possibility of finding a way for him and his army to survive as long as his part in the story remains relevant. However, I have this feeling that he is going to use himself and his colleagues to clear the way for his protege.

Dainpdf

Pappenheim can't really pursue Black without giving up on having the Crusade at all, which would be a PR nightmare for Cordelia. No, they're committed there. They could send detachments, but turning around and just going after Black on a merry chase would already be defeat.

As for the "strong defensive position, it's been replaced by an impassable pile of rocks. In a way, it's Creation's way of telling Cordelia she can't have two entries into Callow. Open another and the first gets closed.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

Black IS the Crusade. They're not fighting over rocks or fields; the objective of the Tenth Crusade is to cast down the Dread Empire. Killing Black is infinitely more central to that goal than taking a mountain pass or a few fields in the north of Callow.

Everyone seems to be obsessed with the idea that the Crusade can't possibly "retreat", but they're not retreating. Black is invading the Principate, and they're going after him. In what world is pursuing your greatest enemy a "retreat"?

The Levantine Crusaders are already in southern Procer, so they can move south to attack Black while Pappenheim approaches from behind.

Dainpdf

They're going after the Empire because Malicia surprised them with a doomsday weapon (both Still Water and the hellgate thing), to ensure that it is destroyed and others of its kind won't be deployed. Killing Black doesn't accomplish much in that regard; hell, the Warlock is a higher priority target in this regard.

Turning back now would betray what actually brought the coalition together. Levante doesn't care that much about Black invading Procer; they care about undetectable alchemical zombification, insta hellgates on their capital, and whatever else is in the dark skies protocols.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

Killing Black isn't vital because he's the one making superweapons; killing Black is essential because he's the one guarding the people who make superweapons.

Trying to rush at the squishy wizards doesn't do you any good if there's a big man in plate mail who keeps getting in your way. Sometimes you have to kill the tanks before you can take out the casters. Black has been very successful at keeping the Crusaders out of the Dread Empire; at some point, it's more effective to kill him and then invade rather than constantly letting him thwart your invasions.

Dainpdf

He got in their way *once*, and now he's not in the way anymore. You talk like they've been beaten back again and again and again.

By the way, "go for the wizards" is exactly what you do when you can. The tanks are built to take it and the wizards will rain fire (or worse) on you if not taken out.

Also, once again, I'm pretty sure Levante is not down with having lakes dropped in their people to chase down the tank.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

There's a giant pile of rocks in their way now. They could sit around the rocks while Black burns Procer, or they could hunt him down and kill his army.

I agree that targeting the wizards directly is a better approach. As long as the Legions are in the way, it isn't possible. Kill the Legions, and it becomes possible to actually get at the Tower.

Black and the Calamities are the hero-killers who kept Callow from rising. Black build the Legions that conquered Callow, and he held the Vales against the Crusade. By killing him, they take away the Dread Empire's warlord, their great military reformer, and the leader of a legendary band of hero killers. He is the most dangerous Villain in Praes, and his death will seriously wound the Dread Empire.

Every Levantine we've seen views the Grey Pilgrim with reverence and adoration. He's telling them that they need to fight this Crusade, and that Evil will triumph if they do nothing. If he tells the Levantine armies to fight through hellfire, they'll do it.

MetruX

Well, when you come back to it, he is now a dragon rider and one of his Aspects is Conquer... Yes, I can very much see it going better than the defence, since any story about a dragon, or his rider, defeated, is when they are attacked. There is no story about a dragon rider defeated while attacking. Yes, the common sense says "Fuck, Black is gonna die" but even his allies see this as an opportunity, not a bane... Don't you think they got something in their minds? 😊

Euodiachloris

A Crusade that keeps having to change its goals on the fly while crossing it's fingers behind its back is a Crusade that will get very dark jokes made about it by historians, thanks to its abysmal failure to meet any of them by any measure whatsoever. *points at the Fourth Crusade as the preeminent example of a decidedly unholy, political mess on badly grilled toast*

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

The Crusade's goals haven't changed. Their military plans are changing.

This is common sense. The leaders of the Crusade are not forced to advance in a straight line, ignoring the giant pile of rocks in their way. Black has come out to fight them in Procer, so they'll fight him in Procer. What kind of general doesn't amend their strategy when their enemy does something unexpected?

The Fourth Crusade was a disaster because of Proceran backstabbing. So far, Procer has been utterly dedicated to the Crusade and loyal to their allies. They've taken the lion's share of the casualties, and everyone else knows it.

"Destroying the enemy army" is definitely a strategic goal of the Crusades. That enemy army is now coming towards them. That's an advantage, not a problem.

Euodiachloris

I don't think the Crusade was called simply "to kick Praesi arse, drink beer and be back by dinner", though. As I recall, it was "free Callow of the usurper Black Queen, destroy the Calamities and kill the Empress before she destroys us using a superweapon".

No superweapon; the Black Queen turns out to have Callowan support and is willing to join the Alliance and the Calamaties are happy playing tag in Procer and other places, while the Crusade isn't even pointing itself at the Tower at the moment...

Um...

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

"Destroy the Calamities" is one of their main objectives, and look! The leader of the Calamities just marched into Procer with an army behind him. Seems like that one should go to the top of the list.

Your whole idea is that the Crusade is a "failure" if it can't accomplish all of its objectives at the same time, but there's no reason they can't kill Black and then go after the Tower. If the Villains come out to meet you, there's no reason not to oblige them.

The Calamities will be less happy when the Crusade converges on Black and his army. They've already lost a third of the five legions they started with, and Papeheim is right next to them.

The problem with "playing tag" is that sooner or later, you get caught.

Euodiachloris

You misread me: the goal was to defeat the Calamities in Praes as stepping stones to take the Empress down. That was the narrative.

But, chasing them all over the continent, gradually whittling them down? This isn't the glorious battlefield of intent. Because anything could happen, anywhere. It's turning into chasing the shaggy underdog on the Crusaders. In those situations, even the goal of "destroy the Calamities" is likely to change on them as the chase across Procer precedes. And, they still aren't taking the Empress in the Tower on, let alone destroying the keys to the supposed weapon that could kill them all... if it was in one piece (which it isn't).

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

I agree that the original plan was to defeat the Calamities in Praes (or the Vales) on the way to the Empress.

But no plan survives contact with the enemy. Black changed the game, and now the Crusaders have to adapt. It isn't neat or pretty, but they have a substantial advantage now that they aren't fighting in a fortified mountain pass.

Ashur will continue to raid the Wasteland and apply political pressure to Malicia. The rest of the Crusade will have to kill Black and his Legions before they can resume the march on the Tower. Things aren't going according to script, but wars usually don't. Fortunately, the Crusade doesn't depend on a perfect, inflexible plan; they rely on having more armies, more Heroes, and the Bard on their side.

esryok

Think 'Chloris meant the real-world Fourth Crusade, in which the crusader army went to war for Muslim-occupied Jerusalem but after... events... ended up sacking the Christian city of Constantinople instead.

Euodiachloris

Yup. Worst. Crusade. Ever. (Even tallying the Northern Crusades up.) ;P

Someguy

You forget Scribe is out on a mission. Me, I think she's been sent to Delos to go Puppeteer Parasite on their Secretariat. Her Name and capabilities would be perfect for it.

Dainpdf

Is there much sense in influencing any of the free cities with a Hierarch in place?

Someguy

Language and specific legalese is important as shown during Cat's "negotiations" for truce.

Even if Scribe doesn't Kilgrave the Secretariat's Writs in Delos, she can be sent as an Attorney for Black's interests to Hierarch to counter Kairos' Stupid Evil influence.

Dainpdf

He's more Chaotic Evil mixed with Beware the Silly Ones. And people have tried to influence Hierarch, if you've missed it.

Someguy

If anyone is familiar with Bellerophon laws it would be Scribe. Influencing Hierarch with bribes/benefits like the other idiots is just stupid. Interacting with Hierarch like Delos 'functioning' on Bellerophon laws will be the closest thing to actual communication and co-operation.

Dainpdf

If neither Malicia nor the Bard had any luck getting anything one him, I don't see Eudokia succeeding. Who knows, though. You may be right.

burdi

i think its because black never truly intent to invade the principate in the 2 chapter before he said that he act accordingly to catherine war strategy, so i think he just want to give them (crusade+army of callow) a reason to band together, as we are know that catherine aiming to join The Grand Alliance of Procer, this attack may give procer a push to accept cat's proposal.

of course after a story about callow join with procer to fight evil warlord has a foundation, The Black Knight will retreat, thus strengthen catherine position in The Grand Alliance and after cat winning againts malicia, the empire will need to stabilize its situation and what better than join callow, became one with it, after all its already a kingdom of villain, same with praes

And who know, maybe this is The Black Knight ploy to make new empire that is not devouring its own tail

Jane

Yeah, that's the sort of thing that would make a more prolonged stay in Procer worth it. I don't know that it will be that, exactly, but it's the kind of deeper objective that I'm expecting from him.

taliesinskye

Black does have one flying asset that could carry a whole lotta weight and be used to resupply over the mountains, but I'm not sure if even Black could convince an ancient dragon to be a goblin munitions pack mule. For one, it's beneath his dignity, and for two, carrying a huge load of very explosive goblin munitions is the sort of thing you don't do if you're wise enough to become ancient in the first place.

Jane

Hmm... Resupply, no, but an ancient dragon would make for a heck of a diversionary force, properly used. I'd just be terrified of accidentally wasting such a rare and valuable asset, given how vulnerable they are to heroes...

But, well, unlike Black, I'm the sort of person who hoards her consumables and spells in video games. I imagine Black will actually be able to use the dragon without being paranoid about the likely limited danger involved. There's no point in bringing along the Infinity +1 Sword and not using it.

taliesinskye

I don't think a delay would help the Crusader military as much as Black and Catherine's. The Crusaders mostly use levies (who aren't professional troops being constantly accumulated and trained, they have to be released when they're not in use) and fantassins (who generally bum around making a mess of things when they aren't in use, which is a major pain) neither of which really grow in strength over a delay.

In contrast the professional legion armies slowly gather strength and constantly improve the training of those bodies for however much time they're given between campaigns.

Jane

But announcing a Crusade does give more time for the faithful to answer the call, when otherwise they simply wouldn't have time to muster, and more time to better equip those levies – I have little doubt that many of them are poorly equipped, given how much larger a Crusade is compared to the wars they're used to fighting. The Crusade wasn't a hasty affair, but my understanding was that there was relatively little time between the declaration of the Crusade and sending the armies to march.

A holy war like this would seem to be a bit of a different affair from a normal levied army, insofar as it attracts considerably more volunteers than a "normal" war – but only if the volunteers can actually reach an army before they set off, and can be given a weapon to use.

Setting aside the other advantages that more time would give either side, of course.

Argentorum

The thing is, the Crusade will always outnumber the legions. The thing that matters is if there are enough legionaries for their superiority to outlast those numbers. Having more bodies benefits the legions more, because they are better at preventing casualties. For instance, in the battle of the Camps, tribune Fae killer (forget her name) held the line with four thousand against a vastly superior force at the cost of a few lines, simply by staging a series of orderly retreats. Given enough men, the disparity in quality becomes enough to attrite the crusades vast numerical advantage because of this.

As for Blacks goal. Marching on the highest assembly is an end all to itself. If Hasenbach uses the Crusade to defend Procer, she loses credibility. Levant, for instance, will be quick to balk at being used for Procer's direct gain. That's why Papenheim had to make a play for the Vales before they could arrive. On the other hand, if Hasenbach pulls back Proceran forces, she's not clearing the pass as quickly and this Black has slowed the invasion even longer.

Black can't take the Highest Assembly, and he knows it. So his goal will something that can be accomplished in the act of taking it.

In other news, Black has been judged and his sentence has been delivered. The White Knight can't be played.

Dylan Tullos

Argentorum:

The whole point of the Crusade is to defend Good nations against Praes. Why would Levant object to fighting the Black Knight in Procer instead of Callow? They're doing this because Praes poses an unacceptable threat to Good, and Black only makes that threat worse by invading the Principate.

"Slowing the invasion" means nothing if the Crusading armies are free to converge on Black's Legions. The Red Flower Vales were only meaningful as a means of attacking Praes, and now the Dread Empire's armies are out in the open, where everyone can get at them easily.

Argentorum

The whole point of the Crusade is to pull the tower down. Yes, killing Black is an important step towards that goal, but the "how" matters just as much. And not only because this is narrative land. First, if Hasenbach can't stop Black on her own, her credibility and her Right to Rule take a hit, especially given her precarious position in the Assembly. And if Hasenbach gets undercut (remember Amadis was planning on convening the Highest Assembly in Callow and effectively turn her into a figure head) the Crusade will probably sputter out into a morass of different nations looking after themselves first, and the Good not at all.

In addition to this, remember that Levant, as a political entity, doesn't particularly want to be in the Crusade. Hasenbach had to threaten them with an invasion backed by Ashur in order to get them to table in the first place. Yes, she can use them to fight Black, but if the Levantines step in front of the Legions and get massacred buying Papenheim time to flank(which they will, vs Black and Grem and Ranker), then the public perception is that Hasenbach is bleeding Levant for Procer's gain. Levant will not be okay with this, and may even drop out of the Crusade, especially if Black escapes, perhaps via Fae portal?

Finally, as for stalling. The Dread Empire has more legions. They have more legions on the *other side of the Vales*. This is not the full strength of the Empire, merely enough to be a knife pointed at Procer's heart. In addition, buying times does matter when your men are professional soldiers and you need to get through more recruitment cycles. Furthermore, the longer this Crusade drags on, the worse it is for Hasenbach. The levies aren't farming, and thus far the Crusade has been nothing but a string of defeats in the face of certain victory. If she doesn't start turning the tide soon, there is a very good chance the Crusade could stall out and die (and then Cat can step in to 'Save it'). Killing Black and his legions would be a victory, if they can do it, but that's assuming Cat won't come and bail them out at the 11th hour using a portal. Evil is, after all, supremely good at running away after an ignoble defeat. And if they win a battle but even half the strength of these legions (or hell, even the Command Structure) retreats intact, then it's just another Pyrrhic Victory to get tossed on the pile.

Tldr:

On paper, the Levantines should be fine fighting Black wherever, but remember that this Crusade isn't a unified front. Hasenbach had to browbeat several members into joining, and these early defeats could splinter this alliance before it has a chance to fully form. Each setback also buys the Empire more time to get its shit together after the *civil wars* it just experienced in both .

Dylan Tullos

Argentorum:

Procer has already suffered immense casualties during the Crusade. No one is going to accuse them of slacking.

Hassenbach threatened an invasion to get the Levantines to stop raiding one of her border princedoms. They joined the Crusade because they didn't want to see the Dread Empire with a Hellgate.

The Grey Pilgrim wholeheartedly supports the Crusade. All of the Levantine Heroes support the Crusade. Opposing the Crusade isn't normal politics; it's blasphemy against the Heavens. Levantines won't fight and die for Procer, but they will fight in a Holy Crusade led by their Grey Pilgrim, the rightful heir to the Grey Pilgrim who founded their country.

This isn't just about secular politics. These are Crusading armies, and the soldiers are inspired by the presence of Heroes who bring the Blessing of the Heavens. You say that they've been defeated, but the truth is that they can replace their losses more easily than Black and Catherine, and a war of attrition favors the larger alliance. The only way for the Crusaders to lose is to give up and lose their unity; if they persist, then they'll inevitably grind down the Praesi Legions.

Jane

While it is true that, person for person, a fanatic won't match a Legionnaire, enough fanatics will still overwhelm a Legion eventually – how many Legionnaires can Praes train in a year, compared to how many fanatics will have the time to arm themselves and muster in that time? And how many does the Crusade need, before numbers can overcome equipment and discipline? Four to one? Ten to one? Twenty to one? The Crusade has a deep population base to draw from, especially if they start actively recruiting instead of relying on the nobles to provide the armies – I doubt that twenty to one would be plausible, but we know that they had twice as many people pretty much just lying around already. And greater numbers also provide them with strategic flexibility, like how Rolanza was able to detach a portion of her cavalry to threaten Black's supply lines without leaving the rest of her force vulnerable – they could use a substantial army to pin legions in place strategically while shying away from open engagement, while simultaneously sending smaller armies to attack less well defended targets. Even if the soldiers themselves are pretty much trash, they can still take a lightly defended city with enough numbers – or just places of economic interest, like mines and granaries.

Of course, it's also questionable as to how many of these volunteers the Crusade would actually be able to arm – knives and pitchforks don't really make for a proper army, and I doubt that they have a ton of proper weapons just lying around unused. But that becomes considerably less of an issue with more time to prepare – even if they're just given half-decent swords, that's enough to take them from a useless mob to a near-useless militia capable of occupying a site.

Of course, it would be difficult to feed such a force, but... Well, Callow is pretty devastated at the moment, you know, and Praes is highly reliant on trade to avoid starvation if they can't get their food from Callow. With the Crusade having decisive naval superiority, can Praes survive such a blockade? I don't know how many soldiers the Crusade could realistically support, but it might well be realistic for the Crusade to simply starve Praes into a collapse without needing to engage them at all.

As regard Black marching on the assembly... Eh... How many people really need to work on clearing a pass at any one time? I can't imagine more than a few hundred before they start tripping over each other. It would be easy to leave a detachment behind to continue work, while the body of the force pursues black – I don't think it would be an effective delay. Especially since I can't imagine Black leading such a diversion for more than a couple of months before he's maneuvered into an actual confrontation – he needs time to forage, while the White Knight does not. Finding and hitting farms still takes more time than a proper supply line, usually.

MetruX

Well, WOULD take more time, hadn't they had in their employ a dragon and a madman (AKA Warlock). Also, Warlock can probably bring them basic food and water. But that is not the point, trully, since I disagree with you on the famine problem.

You see, the Legions are only as big as they can be, they force no one on it and never have more soldiers than they can supply. That is not true for Procer, they MAKE their farmers take weapons and go to war, remember that in the civil war they almost starved, while in the Praes civil war food was never trully a problem. So, if they do try to starve Praes, they'll actually be the loosing end, especially since, as you yourself pointed out, the Crusade is supposed to bring in more people than those other wars.

MetruX

I actually believe that, for Procer, the Crusade is not bigger than the wars they already face. The true difference is that it isn't an all out with twenty diferent players, it's a single unified front, which makes the numbers seem bigger because they aren't counted separetely.

Matthew

Black is playing narratively.

Heaven guarantees victory to the Crusade.

But what does that victory mean?

When it started, it meant "Free Callow!" and "Cast down the Dread empire!"

His invasion of the Principate means it's now. "Defeat Black and stop the invasion!"

He wants Procer to cash their heavenly guaranteed victory defeating him on Proceran soil. He trusts Malicia and Cat to be able to defeat the Crusaders once the "Win a victory for free" card is played.

Jane

Hm... I think it would take more than a desperate, doomed advance into Proceran territory to make it work, but I do like the shape of the idea.

Quite Possibly A Cat

They can still "free Callow". They can free Callow from the influence of the Evil Dread Empress. Which killing Black and slaughtering his Legions would go a long way towards doing.

stevenneiman

I think his plan is less for a total military victory than to turn public opinion against the Crusade. For all that she might have figured it out, Cordelia doesn't have enough evidence to convince people that Malicia used the Pravus Bank to strike against Proceran interests, so all they'll see is disappointing non-victories on both fronts while Praes goes on an expensive counterattack, and the princes are going to start asking why Procer went to war with two nations which were passive and uninterested in war until then, and they're not going to care much whether the First Prince has an answer because they'll be looking for scapegoats rather than solutions. Also, he might or might not know it but there's a good chance that he'll be playing the bad cop in a way that makes the Liesse Accords a lot more palatable, especially if those accords seem like they would protect Procer from another disaster like this seems. It's sort of like a man trying to pull a blackberry without tools or gloves. The man can do it without serious injury and the blackberry can't make him unable to, but it's going to be unpleasant, and when he feels the thorns he's going to start caring about nebulous ideas of invasive species a whole lot less than he did at the start.

Dylan Tullos

stevenneiman:

This isn't about the Pravus Bank. It's about the Hellgate that opened in Callow and the entire city that died and rose as zombies.

Procer went to war with the Dread Empire because a faction within the empire used magical WMDs to zombify an entire city and summon legions of devils. That makes them a threat to the rest of Calernia, and the Good nations weren't going to sit around and wait for Praes to build another Hellgate.

jonnney

40,000 soldiers dead and all Procer has to show for it is two failed assaults, a prince held hostage, the inability to even enter callow for months, and another army behind their lines? The 10th crusade is being ground into a halt before it even really starts.

Someguy

Cat killed it politically and Black ended it strategically.

Dainpdf

Well, but the white knight got to do a really cool charge at Grem! And defeat an Ersatz villain! He's winning so much he might get tired of winning...

pyrohawk21

Once again, Amadeus proves himself an absolutely magnificent, and glorious, bastard...

He really does seem to always have at least three plans about how to deal with things. Each of those plans having separate, and often contradictory, end goals...

Someguy

>Crossbows fired in a perfect volley, and these drew some blood, but none touched the White Knight or the men behind him – as if the hand of some god steered away him from harm.

Godsdamn enforced Stormtrooper Marksmanship!

Dainpdf

I love how Black keeps handing the Heavens the wrong victories. You want to kill the Black Knight? Sure, have this cheap knock-off.

You want to win a battle? Okay. Why don't you have this one charge and force my army to retreat... Into your territory. Oh, and close the pass in the process.

You want to have a Good League? Great. Sign my number one disciple for it while you're at it.

I mean, the last one wasn't him, but that was one of the Blackest moments Cat has ever had.

Novice

"Sign my number one disciple for it while you're at it."

He only had one so you're technically correct. Which is the best kind.

danh3107

Now, I did like this chapter, but it's another in a long series of hyping an event up and then cutting straight to the aftermath. It was okay the first couple of times, but as the story has progressed you've been relying more on it Erratic.

Sure it was neat hearing about this stuff, but SEEING it would've been more interesting in my opinion.

taliesinskye

We saw it just fine, we just saw it in flashback through a framing device.

stevenneiman

I think it was because EE wanted to get through the battle and explain why things were the way they were afterward, but he didn't want to do a whole battle worth of interlude chapters while we're all waiting on the Cat storyline, which is the main focus of the Guide narrative. I think the clip show was his attempt to compromise between a completely unsatisfying recap and a time-consuming blow-by-blow, and the troll battle with Hanno got a whole chapter because in some ways it was more important than the tactical side. I wasn't super happy with the way the chapter turned out, but I don't see how EE could have done better without spending a lot more time on what amounts to a secondary plot thread. Besides, to my mind that conclusion and the ensuing "oh shit" moment were awesome enough to forgive a lot.

Ca$hMoney

Frankly, it times like this where Black cares far more about making himself look clever and winning fights than about being "practical".

Like, he just cut off Procer from Callow entirely save for one very inconvenient entry point. He could have just done that and he'd be golden.

Oh... oh... you want to invade Procer? You want to leave your defensive position and invade a gigantic fucking country with a limited army, a far larger army right in your face, no avenue for retreat or method of resupply, while your boss is probably very seriously considering firing you like you got caught doing meth in the bathroom?

Like, Bonfire might have worked out because Catherine can portal anywhere she wants and minimize her casualties. You can't. You have to fight an enemy on their home turf and very likely get whittled down by attrition, assuming you don't just get beaten in a battle. Then your country will be out a couple legions, a couple named, and very possibly their only dragon.

I'm sure it makes sense from the perspective of Black's personal dick measuring contest with the Heavens. But this isn't exactly good for Praes, you know? Malicia was right to want to drop his ass.

taliesinskye

In any conventional analysis I absolutely agree, cutting off your own avenue of retreat is a boneheaded move.

But remember, we're in narrative land. What's the inevitable story of an army whose only avenue of retreat as just been cut off and who is up against a superior invading force?

Yeah, the Procerans won't find this an easy fight.

Ca$hMoney

That is not what this is. They're not a desperate force grimly marching through enemy territory to survive. They're an invading force of marauders come to burn and pillage and smugly pat eachother on the backs about how cool they are while doing it. That is not a story that ends happily for the bogans doing the invading.

taliesinskye

You're forgetting that the Crusaders are the original invaders, they started the war. That makes Black's army the plucky underdogs taking the fight to the evil expansionist empire.

Someguy

They are the Good Empire taking the fight to the Evil Expansionist Hegemon. Remember the Battle of Amritsar Starzone and it's political consequences!

https://gineipedia.com/wiki/Battle\_of\_Amritsar

Sparsebeard

Except that Black doesn't need to pander to the local populace since he's not trying to liberate proceans on the long term so he won't distribute his supplies.

Also, Procer hasn't had time to institute the scorched earth policy Lohengramm did.

And I'd be very surprised if Black splits his forces the way the FPA did.

Finally, Procer is taken by surprise while Lohengramm PLANNED to be invaded and his troops were ready to react.

Also, in the battle of Armistar it was the democratic "good guys" invading the space nazis' empire...

Someguy

I meant Black playing Reinhard to counter Hasenbach playing Andrew Falk.

burdi

But its has another story isnt, not about The Black Knight invading principate but more like he just want to retreat back but doesnt have another route.

"Our supply lines are cut, the full muster of Papenheim's reunited army is less than a day away and our only paths for retreat involve months of marching through enemy territory."

So the story maybe more about "retreat through enemy territory" than "invading the enemy" and a story is the lay of creation so its not full villain, just doesnt have another way to retreat, its fundamentally different with bonfire

Zoolimar

Is he going for Anabasis?

Jane

While I agree with the rest of your comment to a degree (it's a terrible strategy, until he reveals some undisclosed advantage or hidden aim... But we know he must have one, because he's not a big enough idiot to consider this otherwise), I do have to say that this would be unlikely to work.

If they collapsed the passes early, the Gods Above would just find a way to blast through the ruins anyway, and leave them without some really strong fortifications. They cheat like that. By "disguising" it as the collateral damage of a Narratively Important battle, however, it has enough "weight" that the Gods can't just handwave it away as easily – if the Crusade just happened to stumble upon a mage who was just coincidentally researching a new pass clearing spell, for instance, it would cheapen the earthshattering nature of the Witch/Warlock fight.

Besides, if Procer wasn't mustering an army strong enough to crack through the Vales, they'd send them after weaker targets – like supporting the army sent after the Stairway, or using their ally's fleets to start landing forces on the coast of Callow. This was one of the few places that they could hope to fight such a large army, with so many Heroes, and not be annihilated for it. Even then, it really wasn't a win – but it was enough to blunt the threat they represent, at least a little, and slow the Crusade's momentum. Which might not sound that significant, but once Crusades start to stall, people start pulling out.

All in all, it was a good place to make a stand, before breaking it once things started to look lost. Waste the enemy's time and manpower where and when you can, as best you can. Even if it's not exactly a good trade, maybe the pressure will give you an opening later.

Dylan Tullos

Jane:

The Crusade's momentum hasn't slowed. Black has invaded a Good nation with his Legions of Terror, and now the Crusaders get to fight him in the open field, rather than trying to grind their way through the Vales.

If he'd simply wrecked the passes and retreated into Callow, their momentum would be lost, and they'd have to struggle to make a new plan. As it is, their greatest enemy has come out to fight, and their strategy has been simplified to "everyone swarm Black".

Jane

I am, admittedly, assuming that Black does have some idea as to how to withdraw after accomplishing... Whatever it is he's trying to accomplish here. Either way, though, the Crusade went quite quickly from "Glorious unstoppable advance" to "The advance is decisively cut off, and now we're being raided" – that's a pretty big stall, in my opinion, unless they capitalize on their naval advantages.

Besides, given that they could barely stop Warlock from inadvertently crushing the Legions outright, I don't really know that they could have ensured that they were on the right side of the destruction – especially since if they had that kind of control over how things would go, they would no doubt have preferred to split the Crusader army in two in the process, and destroy the half stuck with them.

Dylan Tullos

Jane:

I also have no idea what Black is trying to accomplish.

However, I do know what the Crusaders are trying to accomplish. They're trying to kill the Dread Empire's leaders, destroy their armies, and ensure that Praes can't threaten to rest of Calernia.

The whole point of advancing was to attack those leaders and armies. If Black is going to march into Procer with the Legions of Terror, then there's no point in grinding their way through the Red Flower Vales; the Carrion Lord has chosen to fight on his enemy's home ground, with no method of retreat, and no access to reinforcements.

Victory isn't measured purely in terms of ground taken or lost. A third of Black's army is already dead, Pappenheim is right next to him, and the armies of the Levant are available to reinforce the Principate. By coming out into the open, Black has gambled everything, and the Crusaders aren't going to give up and go home when they finally see a chance to destroy the Carrion Lord and his Legions of Terror.

Jane

As I've said elsewhere in this comment section, I consider Black's proposal, as presented, patently foolish – I just think that means that we're not being shown the full picture, and that Black has something up his sleeve that the readers aren't being shown yet. For things to be otherwise would contradict Black's portrayal as a brilliant leader in a way that the readers would find implausible without proper foreshadowing.

I mean, even if he wasn't a high-profile target, he's in no position to invade anything.

taliesinskye

> As I've said elsewhere in this comment section, I consider Black's proposal, as presented, patently foolish – I just think that means that we're not being shown the full picture, and that Black has something up his sleeve that the readers aren't being shown yet. For things to be otherwise would contradict Black's portrayal as a brilliant leader in a way that the readers would find implausible without proper foreshadowing.

> I mean, even if he wasn't a high-profile target, he's in no position to invade anything.

I suppose it's possible there isn't a sufficiently clever card up Black's sleeve and what's going on here from the author is a narrative maneuver to get Black out of the way so that Cat is on her own.

Jane

Eh, in that case, I'd expect a grim-faced Black talking about how their strategic position is untenable after they ended up on the wrong side of the destroyed pass, and discussing how they can do as much damage as possible to the Crusade on their way out.

It'd accomplish the same result without making Black look like an idiot.

Euodiachloris

Procer has its own breadbaskets... and, even if Black doesn't have Warlock, he has a dragon.

In a way, this is actually The War of the Breadbaskets, and always has been. For him, at least. Making Procer panic over the vulnerable state of its own renewable resources, for once, is a valuable goal for him.

Making Callow too damned hard to fight over, yet too important to ruin to the bedrock means the power of the politics has a chance to shift the narrative from the age old tug of war between Good and Evil Empires to something else that can ultimately benefit not just Callow, Procer and Praes, but the whole region.

At a cost.

Matthew

Black doesn't mind if they kill him.

What he wants is for Callow to survive as a trading partner with Praes, and for Praes under Malicia to survive.

He is more than willing to trade his own death to protect these two institutions.

This is what he's doing.

He is dragging the Crusader narrative away from attacking Callow and Praes to "defeat the Black Knight."

That's his objective. He wants the Crusaders to burn their heavenly victory card defeating him on Proceran soil.

Remember Praes isn't a threat to the rest of Calernia, even the Liesse thing was a fundamentally defensive gambit by Malicia.

taliesinskye

You might be right that this is another sacrifice play by Black. The problem is that Black is supposed to think rationally, and he's too valuable a card to Praes for him to accept sacrificing himself unless there's no other option with any hope of success.

Matthew

I don't think he sees his own death as a necessity.

He could be "foiled" and live and this would count as a crusader victory.

I just think he sees this attack not strategically but narratively.

The problem for Praes is that they've been winning too long so they always knew that a Crusade was going to have a lot of narrative weight behind it.

Black wants to bleed the Crusade of its narrative force. Part of that is allowing it victories, but Black is trying to give them meaningful narrative victories that preserve his strategic goals.

He doesn't care if Callow breaks free under the Liesse accords as long as it still feeds Praes. He doesn't care if Malicia survives as long as Praes of Institutions does.

MetruX

You seem to put contradictory words to your own ideas. You yourself says that victory isn't measured in terms of ground taken or lost, but fail to notice Black is NOT one of main targets. Oh, surely he is A target, but the only reason he is a target, differently from, let's say, the Tyrant of Hellike or the Dead King, is because he is defendind Callow and Praes. It may be a very strategically win to defeat him now, while he fights inside Procer, but this is not a strong narrative win, since the true targets are Cat, Malicia and the Tower itself, because they must stop them from raising and any other super weapons they may have or come to possess.

As I mentioned in other comments before, I don't think Procer will be able to trully win against Black anyway, but even a win wouldn't be that good for them, since this is a loss of time, dealing with a non-liked countries internal problems instead of going after their targets, just after two major losses that will already stall the advances. So, yes, this is considered stalling even if one minor objective is to kill Black.

Forrest

and "everyone swarm Black!" is a terrible idea in this Narrative driven world. As Ranker said, their only escape has been cut off, their only way back is to fight their way through Procer, and try for one of really only two ways out. One of which is likely taking a bit of a large scale sail, which is unlikely to happen in a subtle fashion. The other is to go to Stairway, which will be a long trek fraught with lots of resistance and potentially a returning army to greet them on the way out.

Then Black pointed out they were "Free." Free how? He says from defending Callow, but what else? Free from under Malicia's thumb for a little while? Remember, he didn't want this, and she brought it on their heads, and has been extremely antagonistic towards him and Cat ever since it came to light what she had done. Being Free from that, and being stuck in a hostile land while out numbered and out powered... What sort of Story does that form? Sounds like some new and fresh opportunities are opening up for someone who was once stuck in a static and rigid role before to me.

Narrative holds too much importance to write it off so casually.

stevenneiman

He's not trying to win. He's trying to make the Princes throw a tantrum and demand that Cordelia sue for peace no matter how large her tactical advantage really is. Sure, her badass uncle might understand that these setbacks are temporary, but all the Assembly sees is that not only are they not getting the quick, easy victory they expected, but one of those non-victories is turning into something that's trashing their precious cities that they aren't used to seeing trashed, and probably doing it with goblinfire because Black does not mess around. This after decades of peace aside from one thing Cordelia knows but cannot prove was a Praesi attempt to mess with them. It doesn't matter how overwhelming the Proceran tactical advantage is if Cordelia's support base backs out because they see nothing but her kicking the hornet nest and them getting stung. And considering Black's usual "disaster drumbeat" technique, I wouldn't be surprised if he's set up to give at least one more painful sting even when his forces are boxed in and hopeless, and make it look like he can keep going.

MetruX

1. Black didn't originally plan to have the pass blocked, it may seem like this because of his wording (exactly what he wants, to seem like it was all according to plan), but he is actually making the best of a difficult situation, and may very well be a better option than trying to retreat through to pass or making another way back, which would give the Crusade another way in.
2. Malicia didn't try to "drop his ass", he dropped her because she did something entirely stupid and STARTED THIS CRUSADE. I really can't see why you can side with her in this. I mean, both of them were wrong, but she was clearly the worst of the two.
3. He is not a Hero, a Villain doesn't get to defend his lands and get the last laugh. But, we do see many stories that begin with "And thus this land X was conquered by the Villain Y, making life hell for Z generations, until our hero was born". As such it's completely comprehensible why he has a Conquer Aspect, no?

Now, for last and most important than any of the other points: Please trust the writer. You're already judging something that didn't even happen, from a writer that continuously breaks our suspicions in inventive and delightfull ways. Have some trust and simply enjoy the story, please :3

Euodiachloris

Thing is, Black kind of is defending his land. And, always has been. Amadeus (farmboy of the Green Folds) is trying to ease the over-farming (even with blood sacrifices, there's a limit) while giving breadbaskets of the whole region enough power and independence to sell to those with both the coin and need over those who simply place boot to throat in the gods' game of checkers.

Even the farmers in Procer's breadbaskets would benefit..... in the longer term.

John Laing

If the Legions of Terror are no longer occupying the Red Flower Vales (or what's left of them), Catherine might be able rebuild some fortifications at her end and thereby claim that key defensive choke point is now part of "the territory under the rule of the Queen in Callow" and thus covered by the truce deal.

Alegio

Black you magnificent bastard!

The attack on procer will either work only for a little while or work only when Cat needs him the most, whatever is most important for the plot at the moment.

Hope you get better Errati! Lots of liquids and some chicken soup work best in my experience. 😊

Gunslinger

Bravo this chapter was fucking brilliant. Black's going to get that conquest he's always wanted

HardcoreHeathen

I'm glad you're feeling well enough to update!

However, I can't help but notice that this chapter feels like part of a trend. More and more, lately, I've noticed that battles and other dramatic events are told to the readers, instead of shown. Getting the dramatic event as an after-the-fact conversation robs it of drama – I already know Black lives, I already know he wins, because if he hadn't, then the conversation wouldn't be going the way it did.

Metrux

It's because those are not THE important bits, I think. The books are only growing bigger, and, as an author, he has to take into consideration how much effort he can put into each part of the story. Sure, he could transform this into ten books instead of five... But would it trully be better, because we can see very single part of it? No, it would probably get tiring, because the plot can't move forward. Actually, there already is people claiming the plot is moving too slowly. I don't mind, and by your reply, you don't aswell, but this is not a story writen for the two of us, is it? :3

So, while he shows us all of Cat's confrontations, most of what happens on the side needs to be curtly shown, if shown at all.

HardcoreHeathen

I agree with the comment about pacing. However, my point is this: you shouldn't hype up an event and then not show the event. We spent just as many words **talking** about what happened here as would have been spent **showing** what happened. And while there was some effort to do a "flashback perspective," like with the Legate bowing and scraping to the dragon, doing that is inherently not as interesting as showing the event "live."

Dylan Tullos

This is actually the worst idea I've ever heard of.

Pappenheim's army is still waiting for Black, and they outnumber the Legions under his command two to one. The armies of the Levant are moving through southern Procer, so they're in position to attack Black as he advances. The Crusaders will be operating in friendly territory, with full access to reinforcements and supplies, while Black will be fighting on hostile ground that his opponents know better than he does. If the Crusaders lose, they're free to retreat and regroup; if Black loses, the Crusader cavalry will run down and slaughter his entire army.

Black is supposed to be a genius, but this is incredibly, unbelievably dumb.

Ca$hMoney

Black is supposed to be a genius, especially to Black and everyone around him. Even people who are legitimately smart can succumb to groupthink and the Dunning-Kruger effect and just blindly bumblefuck their way into disaster based on their self-assurance that they'll work everything out somehow.

I mean, just look at how Black is acting, him Grem and Ranker just putting eachother on the backs and smirking over how clever they are like this is just some zany scheme. I imagine the people who organized Fire Festival had this same sort of brazen, booze soaked arrogance to them.

I think this is a good time to point out that I don't recall if we've ever seen Black in a situation where he hasn't had a significant advantage over his opponent on a tactical or strategic level, or has had superior brute force or some "You're already dead" trick up his sleeve. Aside from the narrative being a pain in his ass, he's always been the one with the power.

I can see why someone like that might think this is a good idea. He's gotten so used to beating people that the fact that he's putting himself at an enormous disadvantage on every level occurs to him.

Alegio

Now in any other world that would be true but being completely outnumbered by a force that's trying to conquer your country and have it attack you when you are at your worst is just the kind of thing that gives an easy win here.

Remember that Black is the one that taught Cat about how to use a story for your advantage.

Ca$hMoney

I don't recall him teaching her to be so monomaniacally obsessed with the story on every level that you completely ignore the actual material reality of your situation. Relying entirely on gaming the system instead of succeeding on your actual merit and competence is the exact opposite of practical.

Something has to give, the story can't be the one single all important factor that literally everything in the story hinges on. Armies and logistics and strategy need to come into play at some point. Or else all of those things are completely pointless anyway.

Someguy

Actually, Black didn't teach Cat anything regarding the Narrative. He just threw her into the deep end and have her find her own way to minimise intellectual blindspots. Gaming the system is what Cat learned on her own against Lone Swordsman and Contrition. She then built her tactics based on that.

MetruX

I think you're misunderstanding? Black is only recently a truly strong force, for most of his life he was actually the underdog. He is weak in his personal powers, he had less troops and support during the Praes civil war, and had several disadvantages when invading Callow. That is, actually, WHY he is considered a genius. Not because he has clever ideas or he is the better commander (he himself admits Grem is smarter), but because he can win even through fire and flames, he trods through rough battlefields and pays the cost for all victories. That is also a way in which Cat is his student, even though she pays herself, he pays in man and resources.

Now, it may be true that real smart people do things like that, but this is not reality. It's very far from reality, actually. Since this is a narrative world, the more is said a person is smart, the better his plans will go, even when they don't make sense, because the narrative is on his side. Besides the simple point that in any story something clearly mental and unenthusiastic such as this would be boring. So, I'm pretty sure they aren't having this kind of problem.

Matthew

Black wants to be defeated.

He is forcing the Crusaders to employ their heavenly victory card defeating him on Proceran soil.

This keeps Callow and Praes proper safe.

His end goal is something like Praes being the Kingdom of the dead. Exists, acknowledged as evil, but no one tries to invade it anymore.

Lampshade

Black has two aspects that can be turned to strategic purpose, now that he is on the invading side. Even 100k against 16, he could run circles around them, without factoring that he might know about the Tyrant's troops and about whatever Malicia is cooking up with the Dead King or how she will play the fallout of stairway in the assembly.

Finally, I would be careful about pulling the superior mobility card against a dragon, even if he didn't just murder most of their horse.

Antoninjohn

Cat has portals and can give Black a lift out of Pocer after he has damaged it

Jane

Eh... The relationship between them is rather... Strained, though. I mean, she did stab him the last time she saw him.

I mean, she'd totally rescue him if it came to that? But I don't think Black would count on it, nor Cat consider it a given.

Euodiachloris

To be fair, he stabbed her, too. Just as literally – and, she also gained for it, just as he has. They have that kind of father-daughter reciprocal relationship: no pain, no gain.

When either truly needs the other, you can practically bet on them helping out. Regardless of the cost.

Euodiachloris

PS: The help is also likely to look really weird to outside observers.

Someguy

One thing no one has mentioned is poor Legate Obasi and the rest of the 10th Legion. Who the fuck did they piss off to be stuck on dragon wrangling duty?

Euodiachloris

Hey, it might well beat millennia-long doorknob duty. Or “screaming face fixture”. Don't ignore the positives, here!

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

I bet Legate Obasi wishes he'd chosen to be a doorknob by now.

narcoduck

General Catastrophe is great. Wasn't there supposed to be a legion lead by a vampire stationed at the Vales too?

Draconius Sinister

I found a few parts of this chapter hard to follow, but that ending line, damn.

Rook

I really hope this isn't what I think it is. This had better just be a Black Crusade, and not a Black Bonfire.

stevenneiman

I've said this in a couple of other places, but I'm pretty sure that what Black is doing is trying to scare the Highest Assembly into demanding peace. If they do, Cordelia won't be able to force them into line without recalling her armies, so either way Procer is out of the war if he can convince them the war is going worse than it is, and I'm pretty sure that every other force is only there because Procer promised to do the heavy lifting, so if Procer surrenders the whole Crusade should fall apart.

Which is to say, I'm pretty sure this is closer to Bonfire than a counter-invasion.

Rook

What puts me on edge is that Black claimed no villain could survive the kind of heroic focus a plan like bonfire would bring. No exceptions made or ifs made there, not even for himself or monsters like Ranger.

The trouble with Black isn't that he isn't capable of indefinitely surviving, it's that it's not his highest priority. He treats everyone including himself like a piece on the board in his pissing contest against the Heavens, and if sacrificing his own piece let's him put out one of Heaven's eyes? He'll likely walk into certain death without hesitation.

Argentorum

This isn't Bonfire though. Bonfire was an "Evil Invasion of Ultimate Evilness and killing the poor defenseless farmers and avoiding Just Retribution how Evil!" level plan. What Black is doing here instead seems more like it's going to be Sherman's March to the Sea. That is, a clear attack that can be met with conventional forces that the Gods Above already have on hand. Bonfire is dangerous to Cat because it's using a trump card right from the start, and there are no tools on hand to address it, meaning that the Gods Above will make tool to end the threat of Bonfire specifically, and in doing so deprive Cat of several advantages she would need to win the fight, because they are also necessary to do Bonfire in the first place.

stevenneiman

I meant that it's like Bonfire in terms of causing damage enough to intimidate the Highest Assembly. The reason why the actual Bonfire plan wouldn't have worked is because it relies on a villainous keystone in the form of Cat creating the fairy gates. Here black gets the benefit of leading, conquering and destroying but he isn't personally indispensable and therefore isn't as profoundly vulnerable as Cat would be in a similar case.

Raved Thrad

I loved watching Black play chess with the Heavens (the Procerans are just proxies) and get them so riled up they basically tried to flip the board. And when the preceding move was played out, suddenly we see Black checking the king or, rather, in this case, the Prince.

Seeing as how Black's three Aspects are Lead, Conquer, and Destroy, and we've seen him lead and conquer here, what is his Name driving him to destroy? If not Procer itself (I doubt he has the numbers), then I can think of only two targets that make this all worthwhile: Hasenbach herself, or the one hero we know stayed behind in Procer: the Augur.

It may seem contrived, but Black might consider blinding the Proceran side, by removing the Augur, well worth whatever casualties might be inflicted on his pet Legions.

As I was reading the descriptions of the destruction of the Vales, though, I couldn't help but feel for Cat. Where's her Vale Summer wine going to come from now? The price of the stuff is going to skyrocket.

Then again, if she has enough of a stockpile, she could sell the stuff off and make a killing. That is, if she's willing to deny herself her biggest remaining vice.

stevenneiman

Now that you mention the Augur I'm wondering what Hasenbach is doing here. She has the Augur so I don't think the way this side of the battle would play out could actually be a surprise to her, and yet I can't imagine it not being a disaster for her politically when word gets out that not only was the Proceran army held back for months by a force half its size, the remains of that force are now free to pillage the Proceran countryside and scare her allies.

TeK

There are Red Vales (a now devastated narrow mountain pass) and Vale, home to the passing joke of a drink Callowans gulp instead of proper Okoro vintage.

Raved Thrad

Ok, thanks to that comment, now I want to see Catherine and Wekesa duke it out over their tastes in wine. Who would you get to referee it, though? According to Wekesa, Black is similarly pedestrian in his tastes.

RanVor

I'm pretty sure the wine comes from the city of Vale, not from the Red Flower Vales themselves.

Raved Thrad

Blargh. You have now sussed out that I am geographically challenged. Fact: I once got lost on the way to the toilet while staying over at a friend's house.

Duke

"Ranker shook her head, the two of them standing under a *moonless night* as..."

At least somebody is watching out for them!

ALazyMonster

Anyone else want the next interlude to be from the Tyrant of Helike's perspective and be how he is setting the southern half of Procer on fire (maybe?). I just want to see each of the fronts of the war really. The insane little shit is one of my favorite minor characters.

Metrux

I agree, though it seems he didn't enter the war yet, I very much want to see him in battle, with all his crazy and classic villainy xD

stevenneiman

I don't think we should have it from his perspective, as it would somewhat ruin the fun of trying to guess what by all the Hells is actually going on in his head. I quite like the way EE's been doing it so far, with chapters from Anaxares' perspective, trying desperately to return to something he understands when the only order he respects is that he's not allowed to be what he thinks of himself as. I like how Anaxares' chapters have that strange blend of the surreality of his own perspective coupled with being just as baffled as us readers at what Kairos is doing.

Someguy

I thought some of his men have been spotted sneaking in south of Callow?

ALazyMonster

He was reported walking through the forest that refuge is in which supposedly means it's likely that he is heading for Procer.

KingWillisIV

So, anyone else curious about the "madman riding a dragon"? Was that meant to be metaphorical or was someone actually riding Nekheb?

Antony444

Oh dear, the Crusade is really going to enter a new phase now...and still no sign of the Bard, thus the worst remains to be seen...

The Heavens have really a way to screw the odds and shatter reality, aren't they? But this time, they played with someone who really, really like to cheat.

Overall, it is a major defeat for the Tenth Crusade. It is now an open question which action will take more time: getting rid of these mountains who got shattered by the magical duel or the cease-fire Catherine negotiated.

It also raises a question which makes me shiver: how much powerful exactly was Dread Empress Triumphant?

The Witch of the Woods is half-trained and no Gigantes. The Dread Empress (may she never returns) went to war against their whole nation and their Named. Warlock didn't manage to get rid of the Witch for now, and he went really at full power.

Triumphant must really have been something else compared to the other Masters of the Tower...

Overall, there are going to be screams at the Highest Assembly.

Two more heroes and 8 000+ dead in a single day, the Vales utterly wrecked and no enemy General killed is really not something you can sell to your public as a victory. Especially when the largest Prasi raiding force is coming your way...

Hanno tried his great cavalry ride into the sunset. He failed and he caused the deaths of many, many men, even with all the Heaven advantages he was granted. The White Knight is definitely inferior to the Black Knight in every way which matters.

Now the Empire has stopped playing on the defensive. It is well-known, after the first turn... the Empire strikes back!

me.me.here

We know exactly where the Bard is going to show up next, actually. She's going to appear at her trial. It's a foreshadowed event in the Free Cities, and is likely to be the catalyst for what the Free Cities are going to do under Hierarchy. We know that the previous interaction between Anaxares and Bard was something that prompted some form of character development on his part, so the next step is to show us what that development is. The trial is a good stage for that, as well as an opportunity for Bard to start talking and promoting her viewpoint to the populace at large, which is what the Heavens' best move is now that they've been sucked into the Free Cities/Bellerophon narrative of doing as the people will.

Highwayman

That last line right there... I applaud absolute genius when I see it.

1queenofblades1

Everyone talking about how Black going behind enemy lines is a mistake, no one talking about how Cat has the Observatory and can come riding in with the Hunt and Knights to the rescue when he needs it most.

beleester

I don't see how Black can go on the offensive here. He has 16,000 troops to Papenheim's 40,000, less than a day's march away. You can *defend* against superior numbers, but taking the offensive is suicidal. He might be able to raid around for a while, but the moment Papenheim forces him to give battle, he's done for.

Argentorum

Remember, the first step always works. If Black has a "Plan", then the first step only has to be "Steal a March on Papenheim" which fits neatly with the composition of his forces (professional soldiers vs levies and mercenaries). On top of this, Hanno road a great deal of Klaus's cavalry to death in his "victorious" counter attack.

So, he'll avoid battle long enough to make one move, maybe two. The important part is making sure the execution of those moves gives him what he needs.

edrey

let me see this for a second, one host in callow months away of procer, levant host is in the south with a lake between them and procer heartlands, the final and closest host just its cavaldry and they levies are slow as cat had noted the legions will invade procer and there is not true defender to stop them , on the other hand cat will have a talk with cordelia and make contact with the prince of cantal the only thing missing is the third country defeat,

RanVor

Ok, that's what I would do if I was Black:

An army of sixteen thousand in the middle of enemy territory without a route to retreat has an average life expectancy of a fly. But this is true only if the army is a coherent fighting force fit to fight an all-out battle. Therefore I would split the Legions into a large number of marauding parties strong enough to overwhelm patrol forces and village defences, but small enough to avoid large enemy forces, and order them to disperse over a large area.

Marauding parties are much quicker and more mobile than armies, so they'd be able to escape the initial pursuit quite easily. I'd make sure that every party has at least one mage, to ensure that coordination is maintained by the means of scrying, and a few goblins for scouting purposes. I'd order them to take as much of the supplies they come across as they can and raze everything else to the ground, and task a few larger groups with harassing the supply lines, just to troll Papenheim with scorched earth tactics on his own home turf. The army the size of Iron Prince's is a powerful but incredibly unwieldy tool. Before he gets his forces organized into effective hunting detachments, half of the Principate is going to be on fire, and when that happens, I'd use my superior coordination through scrying to consolidate all the parties in the region into an interception force to cripple the hunting detachment, and then disperse again.

I would continue with this plan until one of two things happens:

1. The Assembly tears Hasenbach a new one for instigating this epic fail called the Tenth Crusade, or
2. Papenheim's forces get too effective in hunting my own, at which point I'd order the full retreat of all the parties and try to sneak away through the border with Helike while concentrating all the efforts on not getting caught.

I'm not a great strategist like Black or Grem, but I think those two would come up with a way for this to work.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Cavalry would kill everyone.

Infantry can stand up to cavalry charges in large, tightly packed groups. By definition, marauding parties are small, and they're scattered too widely to support each other. Cavalry is faster than infantry, and they're operating in friendly territory.

What would actually happen is option #3:

Black splits his army into raiding companies. Pappenheim splits his cavalry into companies. Procer's cavalry slaughters the scattered legionaries.

Pappenheim's forces would be instantly effective if Black split his army into tiny pieces that the cavalry could murder piecemeal. A raiding strategy depends on superior mobility, and that belongs to the side with superior cavalry.

taliesinskye

I thought cavalry didn't actually cover more ground than foot over long distances because of all the logistical concerns associated with having that many horses?

edrey

you forgot the augur, a attack no fast enough would fail and the heroes would tear any plan down so the best is burn down salia and scape to arcadia

Vheod

Need a link in the archives to previous entry and from previous to this one.

Psychotic_Bat

Really enjoyed watching the Helms Deep cavalry charge from the wrong side.

---

Chapter 23: Recoup

"Take no comfort in that, hero. For though dawn ever comes, night ever does precede it."

– Dread Empress Regalia II

"Well, this is a fine fucking mess," I frowned.

The reports had been unfortunately delayed, mostly by the fact that the Red Flower Vales were apparently now the Red Flower Mountains. Only with brimstone instead of granite, because why would Warlock just make it a little bit worse when he could make thoroughly worse? If those things cracked open and devils started pouring out, I was going to be cross. That the current location of Masego's father was still unknown did not improve the situation in the slightest, since it meant I had no idea whether he was still guarding the region or not.

"The passes are closed," Hakram said. "Strategically, that is a victory. The only way into Callow is the northern passage, and it will be barred for at least six months."

I flicked a glance at the tall orc, still basking in the satisfaction of having him by my side again. It never seemed quite as bad, when Adjutant was with me. He'd arrived only a few days after the peace conference, and remained with us as the Army of Callow escorted the crusaders back up north. It'd been a month since the Battle of the Camps now, since I'd snatched a peace from the butchery and put ink to what might quite possibly be my own death warrant. I shook my head and reached for the small silver thimble at my side, knocking back the brandy in a single swallow.

"I don't mean that," I said. "I mean whatever the Hells he's up to."

I touched the bottom of the thimble to the unfolded map occupying much of the desk we were sharing. The map itself was ours, but nothing else in this room was. This was the private solar of the Baroness of Harrow, who'd insisted we use it while we stayed in her keep. The liberation of her ancestral lands had apparently put me in her good books. That, or seeing me drop a lake on an army had made her reconsider her stance on royal taxation even though the Pilgrim had knocked me the fuck out after barely ten heartbeats. The silver thimble was touching the edge of the Principality of Bayeux, where news now a fortnight old had Black and his legions sacking towns for supplies on their march west.

"Well, at a glance," Hakram drily said, "invading Procer."

"With fifteen thousand men?" I sceptically said. "We're not even sure he has siege with him. Even if he somehow starts taking cities without engines he can't hold them."

While on the surface the Tenth Crusade had tried to enter Callow and twice found the door shut on its fingers, the situation was a lot less promising than it appeared at first glance. The map held a handful of figurines standing for armies and their last reported locations, and the picture they painted was not pleasant. The three Proceran hosts we knew well: one down south in Tenerife guarding the border with the League, one marching out of northern Callow according to truce terms and the last, unfortunately, still camped in front of the Vales. Digging through the wreckage to reopen the pass. That alone would be bad, since the Jacks told me Papenheim should have between forty to fifty thousand soldiers under his command.

What was making it much, much worse was the Dominion of Levant was joining the fray. Half a year ago, Thief had passed me a report estimating they'd send an army about thirty thousand men. She'd been right, in a way. There was an army of that size marching to reinforce Papenheim. Unfortunately, there was also a second one by the shore of Lake Louvant – the massive lake in the centre of the Procer – currently preparing to embark on barges. Its destination was, allegedly, Salia. The seat of the First Prince, the capital of the Principate. And where Black would be headed if he continued to march in a straight line. At a guess, every single garrison in central Procer would be pulled together into a ramshackle army then swelled by the Levantines before they threw all of that at Black's fifteen thousand. The result seemed fairly obvious, veteran legions or not.

"It is an unusual gamble, by my understanding of the man," Adjutant conceded. "If those legions are lost, the Empire is crippled."

"That's a pretty way to put it," I grunted. "More honest is that without those men on the field, Praes is left so bare even we could feasibly invade it."

Odds weren't good for a reverse of the Conquest, I'd admit. I was pretty sure I could break Malicia's own legions on the field and seize most the countryside, but taking Praesi cities would be impossible without breaking my army. What I could do might still be enough for her reign to collapse, though, and that made it slightly tempting. Or would have, anyway, if there wasn't a decent chance that by the time Papenheim's army was done digging I'd be facing a host of eighty thousand men invading my kingdom. There was, to be blunt, no way the Army of Callow could beat them if they had heroes on their side, which they most certainly would. Not after the losses we'd taken at the Battle of the Camps.

"It may be safe to assume, then, that he does not intend to lose those men," Hakram said.

"If he'd at least gotten Papenheim to chase him I'd sleep better at night, but the man stayed," I sighed. "I mean, Gods, I see the strategic sense in it. The damage Black can actually do is limited, and if Callow falls the crusade is half-won. It's still a damned cold call to make, though, basically writing off the heartlands of his own country."

"We do not have a monopoly on ruthlessness," the orc reminded me.

"It'd be a simpler war if we did," I said. "But we have to face the facts, I suppose. Let's be conservative and say it takes them four months to make a passage through the wreck. By that time, the Levantines will have reinforced them. They'll invade together."

The orc leaned over and filled my thimble for the second time this evening – he'd quietly claimed control of the bottle, perhaps for the best – before tending to his own.

"The Army of Callow will have largely recovered by then," he said. "And Duchess Kegan has reinforced us."

"The Deoraithe need to hold the northern passage, otherwise there's a decent chance our truce gets shredded and the princes turn back," I bluntly said. "It's one thing to trust them with a sword in hand, another if the passage is left empty. No, down south we'll be on our own."

Hakram raised his sliver thimble.

"Dust and misfortune," he said in Mthethwa.

I clinked mine against his.

"Doom pass you twice," I replied, finishing the old Soninke toast and tossing back the brandy.

The harsh burn – Gods, this was rough stuff even by my standards – went down my throat pleasurably. I set the silver down.

"We're not winning that battle," I admitted. "Not against those numbers."

"Then we seek an alternative," Adjutant serenely said.

Not a hint of doubt there to be found. It felt like spring water for my soul. I snorted, and got to my feet.

"Not tonight," I said. "It can wait until tomorrow. Get the others, I need to spend a few hours looking at something that's not a godsdamned report in Vivienne's chickenscratch."

"By your command, Your Majesty," Hakram drily replied.

He'd mouthed off, I noted, but took the bottle without my needing to tell him. Truly a prince among men, my Adjutant.

—

"You're mad," Archer said. "I knew you'd be mad. See, Zeze, it's just like I told you."

Hierophant frowned, smoothing his robes.

"You did not," he noted. "You said, to be exact: 'Trust me, Masego, she'll love it. This will have no consequences whatsoever.'"

I eyed the dark-skinned mage with chagrin.

"And you believed her?" I asked.

"Trust is the foundation of a healthy friendship," he told me. "I've acquired a book on the subject. Very informative."

Hakram smothered a laugh by faking a coughing fit. Naturally, I elbowed him in the stomach. Questioningly. Considering how often I did that to him, he'd learned to tell apart the nuances.

"It's actually a religious text from one of those love cults in southern Ashur," the orc whispered, leaning towards me. "You know, the Face of Love folks? The real payoff is when he'll get to those illustrated parts in the middle. Most lurid thing I've ever seen."

"If he starts talking about sex rituals, you'll be the one to clean up that mess," I hissed back in a low voice. "I'll use a royal decree if I have to."

"It's too far from Harrow to Baroness Ainsley's personal property," Vivienne considered out loud. "A household knight's, maybe?"

"Hey, for all we know they're already dead," Indrani offered. "So no harm done, right?"

What had once been a lovely garden with stone benches and tasteful statues continued to burn down. A firepit with an entire stag roasting on a spit – another crime right there, I mused, we didn't have hunting rights in the barony – had been dug in the heart of what'd previously been an elegant bed of flowers. I raised a finger, then put it down.

"All right, before I crack the whip I have to know," I said. "I get why the pit is on fire, although Masego using hellfame seems like both horrible overkill and a good way to spoil the meat. But why are the trees on fire?"

"Zeze and I had a philosophical argument," Indrani explained. "He's a terribly sore loser."

My gaze turned to Hierophant, who looked vaguely embarrassed.

"She dropped a branch on me," he admitted. "And she's quite good at avoiding fireballs."

My brow rose.

"That's seven trees, Masego," I patiently said.

"I am the best at dodging," Archer boasted without an ounce of shame in her body.

I closed my eyes and counted to five, then opened them.

"All right," I said. "First, after we're done here the two of you are going to rebuild this."

"That's fair," Indrani said.

She had the look in her eyes of a woman fully prepared to lounge with a drink in hand while Masego did all the work.

"By hand," I added. "Not a drop of magic involved."

"Vivi, how would you like to be Queen of Callow?" Archer said without missing a beat. "I have ever been a sworn enemy of tyranny in all its forms."

"Please," Thief drawled. "Who'd be fool enough to want to rule this mess?"

Thank you, Vivienne, I thought, for your unflinching loyalty and support. Really warms the cockles of my heart in these trying times.

"You can't be serious," Masego said, glaring at me. "Manual labour?"

He spoke those words, I mused, in much the same tone other people spoke about raising the dead or your average black-hearted betrayal.

"You have hands, Zeze," I said. "What do you think they're for?"

"Oh, that was a mistake," Hakram muttered.

Hierophant's back straightened.

"According to the writings of Seljan Banu-" he began.

"According to the writings of Catherine Foundling, you're doing it," I interrupted flatly. "And the material costs are coming out of both your pay, split equally."

"You don't even pay us!" Archer protested.

I blinked in surprise.

"Of course I do," I said. "All of you have been gathering general's pay since Second Liesse. Indrani, you have a vault in Laure. I handed you the key myself, remember?"

"Yeah, but it was empty," Archer said. "I thought you were just yanking my chain."

"Fadila assures me I've been paid punctually," Masego contributed hesitantly.

Indrani cast him a discrete look at the mention of his assistant.

"Mine was full, last I saw," Hakram agreed.

Slowly, I turned to Thief. Who looked the very picture of maidenly innocence. I've seen you stab people, Dartwick, I thought. Pretty incompetently, but still. Try harder.

"Vivienne," I said very mildly. "Have you been secretly robbing one of your beloved comrades for almost a year now?"

The dark-haired woman batted her eyes in lovely confusion.

"Masego's book said that earthly possessions only distract from the holy principle of eternal love," she said. "How could I let them burden such a dear friend?"

Archer let out a delighted cackle that would likely terrified any birds around into flight if the fire had not already done so. At first I was pleased they weren't brawling in a garden they'd already set on fire, but then I frowned.

"Wait, Indrani, how have you been paying for your tavern crawls all this time?" I asked.

"I haven't," she cheerfully replied.

"They send the bills directly to the palace," Hakram told me. "It's under 'sundry expenses' in the treasury books."

"I thought that was, like, bribes and stuff," I faintly said.

The orc hummed.

"Well, I mean, from a certain point of view..."

I snatched the bottle out of his hands, a tithe for his perfidious treachery.

"All right, you incompetent gaggle of vandals," I said. "Someone put out those trees. And get me a skewer of that stag, I want to find out how it tastes when you use hellfire to roast it."

As it turned out, genuinely awful. By that time, though, we were too drunk to mind.

—

I found myself glaring blearily at the moon.

I'd rested my eyes for some time but never actually fallen asleep. Most the others had, though. Masego was seated on the ground, lying against a toppled stone bench. He was snoring very daintily, which brought the shadow of a smile to my face.

Indrani's feet were on his lap, occasionally kicking his legs as she moved in her sleep. She'd made a pillow out of her cloak, indifferent to the chill of the night. Vivienne was draped in actual sheets, which appeared to be mine and from the palace to boot by the cloth of gold bordering them and the embroidered heraldry. She was utterly still in her sleep, and unlike the others I could feel she was only a sudden movement away from waking. I'd not brought cloak of my own, since the one I usually wore did have the soul of a foe inconveniently attached to it. Besides, I hardly minded the cold these days. I'd remained close to Hakram, but instead of a comfort the warmth that emanated from him had me feeling restless.

"Awake?" Adjutant said, moving slightly aside.

Ugh, he'd been a comfortable mattress even if he was way too warm. How dare he.

"Wasn't quite asleep," I said. "Just not thinking. Closest I get to slumber, some nights."

"You should try anyway," he said. "You're always better, afterwards. More human."

"Since when do you think so well of humans?" I snorted.

"They've grown on me over the years," he gravelled.

"The opposite, for me," I admitted, more honestly than I'd meant to.

"Not them you were glaring at," Hakram pointed out.

I hummed.

"I still feel like destroying the moon, whenever I look at it too long," I said. "I know it's irrational, but it's like having a stone in my boot. The boot in this terrible metaphor being my soul, probably? Let's be honest, it's not the worse thing that tattered old mess has been compared to."

"Who knows?" he said. "It might be for the best if you do. There's an old Praesi story about Dread Emperor Sorcerous having bound his soul to it, that he's still scheming his final escape from death."

"There's a distressing amount of Tyrants with stories like that," I noted. "We're going to have to get around to cleaning up all those loose ends some day."

"Probably just a story," Hakram shrugged. "He was one of the better ones, anyway. Made a place for the shamans at his court, treated them with respect."

I raised an eyebrow.

"Didn't he also try the sentient tiger army?"

"The Tower's tried worse over the centuries," he mused. "If he'd gotten the tigers to pay taxes afterwards, it might even have counted as a gain."

That surprised a laugh out of me.

"Imagine having all that power," I said. "And using it for a godsdamned tiger army. The more Praesi histories I read the less I understand the Empire."

"Funny thing, power," Adjutant gravelled. "Never quite as straightforward as you'd think."

"Preaching to the choir there," I said. "Used to think that if I could blow up a fortress with a snap of my fingers it would all be so much simpler. Now I can, and so very few of my problems can be solved by that."

The orc shuffled against the bench.

"The Clans have few written histories," he said. "Oral tradition is how we pass it all down."

"Miezans did a number on your people, yeah," I said. "I remember. They had that nasty habit when conquering places."

"There was a great repository of scrolls in the lands of the Broken Antlers Horde, or so I was taught as a child," Hakram murmured. "They put it to the torch. I suppose they had reason to, from where they stood."

"The reasons of conquerors tend to be acceptable only to them," I said.

In this, I spoke as Callowan.

"Not that," Hakram said. "The scrolls, most of them were parchment. Human skin."

I blinked in surprise.

"Your ancestors were certainly a charming bunch," I said.

"They were what they were," Adjutant said. "The tragedy, I think, is that we only remember the worst of them. The excesses. We were more, in the dawn of days. And when they ripped out the heart of us they made it so that we could never be that again."

"It's getting better, though, isn't it?" I said. "I remember when I first joined the College. Seeing orcs read and write and talk, like..."

I hesitated.

"Like we were a people whole, and not the hissing shade of our heyday," Hakram finished gently. "There is something taking shape, Catherine, that is true enough. But it is not what we once were. No more than Callow under your rule is the Callow of the old Alban kings."

"That's an old refrain, Hakram," I said. "The same the Trueblood sang, and the rebels in Liesse. We only remember the golden parts of the good old days. They had their failings too. You can't look at our own failures and match them to barely remembered victories. The comparison is false."

"Oh, we were a terrible enough people in those days," the orc murmured. "Glorious too, at times, but terrible always. But I was speaking of old stories. There is one I remember, that the old raiders past their prime would tell us when the snows kept us in our tents. It is a conversation, between the Warlord Gazog and her son. One of many, though few are remembered. We call it the Riddle of Power, learned from an ancient stele."

I closed my eyes, leaning back against the stone.

"Tell me," I said.

He remained silent for a moment, gathering his memories, and when he spoke it was in Kharsum cadenced.

"After her spear had broken and she had grown fat and grey from the tributes of mankind's kings, Old Gazog took her young son to the great gathering of the thaw, where many clans assembled to trade and prepare the making of war," he said. "With cups of blood-brew they sat beneath their banner in silence until the sun had passed. Under the dark sky, Old Gazog spoke this: my son, you have witnessed the multitude of our people before you. Young and old, warrior and chieftain, lorekeeper and bronzesmith. I ask you now, where lies power among them?"

Hakram's voice lightened, as if he were a young boy of his kind.

"Honoured Mother, her son said. This is no riddle, for the answers has always been thus: it lies with chieftain and warlord, for their power is command over all. Old Gazog laughed, her teeth grown soft from many victories. Foolish son, she said. If their power comes from command, then how can their command come from power? How mighty is a chieftain, without obedience given?"

Adjutant clicked his fangs, and his were not soft at all.

"Old Gazog's son pondered this, and saw her wisdom. In this he was enlightened, and so answered once more. Honoured Mother, he said, power then lies with the lorekeepers. For they hold much wisdom and learning, cunning and law, and in teaching it does their power manifest. Foolish son, she said. What is wisdom, without hand to carry it? Was it a word, without ear to hear it? But wind, and wind is no mother of glory."

The orc's voice grew rough.

"Honoured Mother you speak true, her son said," Hakram said. "The birth of empire is bronze, and so power lies with the bronzesmiths for they alone know the secrets of fire and forge. They hold in their palm the source of war, and only in war can glory be found. Foolish son, said Old Gazog. You learn nothing. The whelping of fire is as wisdom, worthless without hand to wield it. Would a hoard of a thousand axe-blades bear the name of empire?"

He paused and I heard him lick his lips.

"Old Gazog's son grew wroth, for he did not know of his foolishness. Hateful Mother, he said. You speak many words, yet deny all save the hand. Is this your wisdom, that an empire is naught but swing of blade? All the peoples of the world know this, and there can be no further learning of it. Foolish son, she said. Be silent if you cannot be wise. There is terrible truth beneath the riddle of power, and it I will reveal it to you now."

Hakram went silent. I did not open my eyes.

"And?" I asked. "What did she say?"

The orc laughed harshly.

"No one knows," he told me. "You see, the Miezans broke the stele."

I heard him look up at the sky.

"Sometimes," Hakram Deadhand said softly, "I think that a truer answer than what was written."

---

Idiom Idiot \(@AintItK\)

Goddamnit you had to do it didn't you.

You had to make the Riddle of Stele.

Raved Thrad

Unfortunately, it looks like "crush your enemies, see them fly before you, and hear the lamentation of their women" doesn't seem to cut it for Catherine. Nauk, though, would probably nod his head and go, "Yes, that is what is good in life."

Rook

I think it's supposed to be 'see them driven before you'. Seeing them fly before you might be less Conan the barbarian and more Conan the cat scaring a flock of birds

Raved Thrad

I just checked IMDB and you're right. Sigh. I need to watch that movie again, it's been too damn long.

Unorginal

Forget the movie, that's a quote from Genghis Khan, Conan's got nothing on the man who carved out the largest continuous land empire in history and waged wars with death counts that (together) matched the world wars in an age before industrialized warfare.

Yotz
caimthehero

CROM!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

Someguy

Riddle of Steel or Stele?

http://conan.wikia.com/wiki/The\_Riddle\_of\_Steel

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Cat, Chat, Steel, Stele, what's the difference here? This page has the shittiest spelling. It might supposed be the fucking Riddle of Little Pee-pee for all the fucks you'll find here

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You know, since orcs are said to have little pee-pees? You probably didn't even think about that.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Orc men HAVE to have small units. Think about if they didn't for a second: Chloe would be mentioning orc junk being up in her face ALL THE TIME. And since Chloe doesn't mention that, it means Hakim isn't as hung as his frame would normally imply.

Jeffery Wells

There is no misspelling here, it's a play on words, a bit of an Easter egg if you will.

A stele is a large slab with carvings in the surface, erected as a memorial. Many cultures used them to pass stories or wisdom, either in written or pictorial form, to future generations. Chinese fantasy novels love to use them to pass secret knowledge, where a student sits and studies a stele for long periods of time to gain enlightenment.

The Miezans broke the stele, so the rest of the Orc's story is missing. There is nothing to break if it is steel and not stele.

The Easter egg, of course, is that 'the riddle of stele' is pronounced the same as 'the riddle of steel' from Conan the Barbarian. Orcs are a great parallel to barbarians, and the contents of the riddle of stele are roughly the same as the riddle of steel.

Idiom Idiot \(@AintItK\)

It's the Riddle of Steel written on a Stele. Come on, by this far in you should be better at spotting puns.

Sylfa

Punny reference or not, I think the answer is fairly clear. Orcs are very loyal to their families and clans, and the strength of a clan would thus be: The clan.

helpmeimscared

Hm. Nice riddle, especially the ending.

It's the warriors, isn't it? She said it right at the beginning. Guess Orcs might have been on the cusp of democracy before the Miezans came along.

Rook

I'd say the answer didn't change after the stele was broken. There is no deeper meaning or basis of what power is, power lies where you believe it is, or in another sense it doesn't innately lie within anything at all.

Between a warrior with a sword, or a scholar with a book, a rich man with a coin or a plain man with nothing with a title, who has power over the others? Simply whoever is believed to have power. It's the exact reason why a frail and useless king can have absolute power over the strongest army to ever exist, but at the same time the greatest king that ever lived could be at the mercy of a bandit that doesn't recognize his authority or title.

Ironically enough, none of his answers were wrong; power can lie in every one of his guesses. At the same time, he was as wrong as he possibly could be, because power isn't an innate quality. It simply lies where it's placed.

Cicero

The answer is that flesh grows weak and steel grows brittle. Power comes from the will.

It's Nietzsche,

The will to power is makes some men more powerful than others.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Will\_to\_power

beleester

It's not that either, according to Gazog's son – "Is this your wisdom, that an empire is naught but swing of blade? All the peoples of the world know this." Force of arms is an obvious form of power, but it's not the whole story. If I were Gazog, I might say "Do the forgemasters only work when you put a knife to their throat? Do the warriors only obey their chieftain out of fear?"

My answer would be that no single person or group is powerful. Power lies in the force that binds the nation together, the institutions and culture that make all these disparate pieces act as one.

Since the Miezans broke the stele, perhaps the lesson is that even that has no true power – there will always be situations where your power is useless.

*Euodiachloris*

The greatest power in the world: enlightened self-interest. It can even find a way when beset by blind, short-termist stupidity (although idiots do do wonders as indiscriminate wrecking balls to their own and others' survival).

Sylfa

Foolish son, she said. If their power comes from their strength of armaments, then how can their armaments come from power? How mighty is a warrior, without armaments given?

Just my guess, but Orcs are very loyal to clan and family.
Where lies the strength in a clan? The clan.

Charles

A charming chapter, with an ending that leaves me with a lead weight in my belly. I wish the Woe well, for the trials ahead.

Antoninjohn

Winter joining their former enemy is not a story that works out well for the enemy, Cat is fea however and can be bound by oath so they might let her in if she promised to stand against Callow being part the country responsible for the Hell Gate and Still Water and not give them any support and to see those part of that county brought to justice ( death), the look on their faces after she swears it and revels that instead of it being a redemption story where she gives herself to the the judgement of the White Knight to bring Callow into the Grand Good Group it turns out that it was Procer all along as excuse to expand and steal more land once more from Callow

Gunslinger

These slice of life chapters are always great fun but the introspective moments among them are the highlight. I love the riddle and the language used in it. Quite poetic.

As for the answer not really sure but I guess it's no one. It's the collective story that people tell, and which arises organically, that defines who holds the power and what form that is.

Dainpdf

That is more true of authority than of power. If you hold a lever, your power to lift things is multiplied. Power is a thing unto itself. It is more cause than caused. One might as well ask where time comes from, or thought.

Jane

Hm. A traditional Human answer would be that power lay in the tribe as a whole (or its people, depending on how you want to parse it); that orders only matter when people listen to them, that wisdom and tools only matter when there are people to use them, and that people can only accomplish great works when they are well-lead and given the tools to carry them out. That the young can only thrive when they have the lessons of the old, and the old can only survive when there are young to carry on the next generation. It is a mistake to speak of the power of an individual, when the contributions of everyone are necessary to accomplish anything truly great; that is nothing more than empty vanity.

But this is a very Human way of thinking of things. An Orc? They seem quite fixated on bonds of family, and so I think would likely give a similar answer, but I am no Orc; I could not say if they would think of things differently. Of course, the author isn't either, but that's beside the point.

I do hope burning some nice gardens on a drunken lark doesn't diminish Ainsely's recent change of heart regarding her Queen. I mean, there's about a 0% chance of that after having seen the Battle of Camps, but still – rude. At least wait a year until her unquestioned loyalty has time to settle in!

Always nice to see the Woe get together for some quiet (?) fun together, but... Vivienne, exactly how long were you going to let this go on before revealing the punchline!? That's kind of a long time to be drawing out a prank for! ...And Indrani, I know you're not exactly in it for the money, but, uh, did you really never think it might be nice to have a real salary?... ...Or that that was really Cat's sense of humor? My goodness, she's almost as gullible as Masego...

Dainpdf

Interesting. In a way, it does make sense – power exists with the individual, on a micro level...

I'd like to think this riddle builds up to the idea of a modern state, a la Leviathan. Power lies with the State, the sum of its people, culture, possessions, as represented, in the Orcs' case, by the clan.

Someguy

Power is Power.

<http://www.giantitp.com/comics/oots0657.html>

Xykon already answered it. It's doesn't' matter what form power takes.

Dainpdf

Dammit, got ninja'd. And with a relevant quote, no less.

Dainpdf

I like this chapter's quote. It echoes the ideas Tarquin expresses in OOTS and which I brought up a few chapters ago. As for power... It doesn't really come from a single source. Power is a thing in itself and it has many forms. Power is the ability to choose and impose one's will upon reality.

What I find more interesting is authority, power legitimized. That one is quite a paradoxical thing.

lennymaster

What stands OOTS for?

Raved Thrad

Order of the Stick.

<http://www.giantitp.com/comics/oots0001.html>

Dainpdf

Order of the Stick. It's a webcomic. Someone linked it in another comment on this chapter (with another relevant moment).

Raved Thrad

A lot of the humor in OOTS derives from the metagame of D&D version 3.0/3.5, so if you're not familiar with that a lot of it may fall flat.

Cicero

Eh, I'm not a big D&D fellow but I enjoyed the humor. D&D is so influential on generic fantasy tropes that I got most of the jokes, and even the more D&D specific ones I had some insight into do to nerd knowledge osmosis.

Raved Thrad

Is that a feat or a class ability? 🤔

*Euodiachloris*

Skill with a circumstance check and an Int modifier. 😊

Dainpdf

<http://www.giantitp.com/comics/oots0763.html>

This is the specific strip I was referencing.

Raved Thrad

Looking at how chummy they've all become, even to passing off Vivienne robbing one of them blind as a joke, I couldn't help but wonder if Catherine and Vivienne have braided each other's hair yet. 🤔

Dainpdf

Don't feed the shippers!

Raved Thrad

How do you know I'm not one of them?

Dainpdf

If you are one of us, then don't feed yourself either.

Raved Thrad

Dammit, does this 'ship make me look fat?

Jane

Nope, too late, we've been fed after midnight, and now there are ten thousand fanfics about VivAndri, VivAt, and VivAm. Just be happy we didn't come up with strange Name-related puns for them all!

Raved Thrad

Did you purposely refrain from mentioning the other ten thousand fics that are all about the Catram friendShip? 🤔

Jane

...I might have had a particular character on my mind, perhaps.

Look, it was work enough mentioning that ships outside of Cat/Vivienne exist <_<;; .

Raved Thrad

You mean like Masendrani? That's got "furtive confused fumbling" written all over it. 🤔

Jane

Oh, the Blind Shot has so much comedic potential, it practically writes itself 😊! They have great chemistry together, too, even if neither of them really have a concept of "romance".

But, well, this whole thing started out by mentioning Cat and Vivienne, so my first thoughts were around those two 🤔.

Dainpdf

Cat Thief.

Jane

My first thought was Thieving Cat, actually, but... Well, that's only half a name pun 😬. I can't really think of a complimentary way to phrase a thieving squire or duchess, though...

Raved Thrad

Queen + Thief =? Queef?

*runs for cover*

Jessica Day

Boo! Lol

Garnet

Add me to the Cat Thief fan club! Vivcat? Cattiene?
Also wondering didn't Cat take a vow to like not drink?
How did she get around that in this chapter?

Big Brother

Cat vowed to not drink unless Hakram was with her.

Rey d`Tutto

The Path forbade drinking on Campaign, until Adjutant & Cat reconnected.

Hakram is back, and he was managing Cat's intake.

nimelennar

Cat burglar?

Dylan Tullos

What is Pappenheim doing?

Don't mess around in the Vales. Follow Black as closely as possible, send your cavalry to keep track of his position and harass him constantly, and hit him from behind at the same time the Levantines attack from the front.

Right now, the forces of the Dread Empire and Callow are spread out over a huge area. The Crusading armies are mostly concentrated in southern Procer. Pappenheim can use that concentration of force to destroy one enemy utterly, then clear the Vales and turn the entire force on Callow.

If you have an opportunity to fight part of the enemy's army with your entire army, you take it.

Dainpdf

And give the Empress (or Cat) more time to plan and strategize? Give their allied armies more time to reconsider their commitment? Keep their levies and fantassins on the field longer, further damaging their harvest for later in the year *and* increasing the costs of mercenaries and the logistics of the army? Bad idea, especially since they want to invade Callow/Praes and Black does not look to be in a position to stop them. That, plus they have another army to catch him (which was outside my expectations – never thought Levante would defend Procer, but I guess that's the Good guys for you).

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

There's a limit to how much good planning and strategizing will do when you've just lost your biggest remaining army, your most experienced field commanders, and your greatest Named all at the same time.

If the cost of utterly surrounding and destroying Black's Legions is a bad harvest and a large sum of money, that's dirt cheap compared to the possible cost of fighting Black with anything less than every possible soldier available. Instead of taking chances or trying to be clever, the Crusaders should just bring everyone they have and utterly destroy Black's army.

Once he and his legions are dead, invading Callow/Praes will be a great deal easier.

You seem to have missed the part where Levante signed up for the Crusade and committed themselves to defeating the Dread Empire. Also, the Grey Pilgrim is the spiritual leader of the entire country, and he's not going to let old national hatreds stand in the way of defeating evil. Good does not have to be Dumb.

Someguy

I'm thinking Realpolitik and secret deals will come into play like in World War 1.

All these armies from countries wary of Proceran ambitions in Procer or moving to Procer, the bulk of the Proceran army tied down or decimated and Named heroes in the front. Smells like opportunity.

Dylan Tullos

Someguy:

Grey Pilgrim and his good friend the Saint of Swords would have lots of things to say to any leader who decided that their secular rivalry was more important than holy war.

Well, Grey Pilgrim would have lots of things to say. The Saint's nickname is "Regicide", and she doesn't bother using words on rulers who think they can defy the Heavens' writ.

Someguy

Ah but what will she do when it's Pilgrim's countrymen invading her homeland then and the shots already fired, blood spilled and villages razed?

Nationalism and national interests coming to the fore to split Story momentum? I think it's time for the heroes to find out who they are when Light shatters

Dylan Tullos

Someguy:

None of this has happened, we have no reason to believe it would happen, and the Grey Pilgrim would personally depose any rulers who tried to backstab a Crusade for secular ambitions.

Right now the Levante is marching in support of a Good nation against the forces of Evil. Any Levantine ruler who deviates from that script will have a talk with the Pilgrim if they're lucky and the Saint if they're not.

MetruX

You talk just like so many of those naive young Heroes. The Pilgrim can't depose anyone, he has no secular powers and neither want any, and the Saint has never killed nobles or important people outside the principate, as much as she travelled outside. They are powerfull and wise old Named, not super powers unto themselves. Also, Good is not good and they all hate Procer, as has been shown several times before. How could they not? Procer invaded them more than any Evil nation tried.

Dainpdf

You forget Malicia is in possession of Still Waters and worse and is confirmed to have agents in Procer. The cost would be greater than "a bad harvest". Speaking of which, bad harvests tend to lead to famine, and with coffers dry that can lead to the collapse of the country.

As for Levante, yes, the Pilgrim is a spiritual leader, but they still have great distrust for Procer and that they'd put it aside not just to invade Praes but also to defend Procer's heartland does them credit.

Also? The longer they take, the more time Cat guess to recruit, fortify etc... while chasing Black around accomplishes... nothing? He's already out of position, as far as they know. I mean, I guess they could chase him just due to his reputation, but then how do they know that's not his plan anyways?

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

Chasing Black around accomplishes killing Black. If Black's plan is to be surrounded and utterly destroyed by several enemy armies, I am happy to go along with that plan.

The use of Still Waters would cause immense damage to Procer and utterly destroy Praes. If Malicia uses the methods of Traditional Evil, she signs up for the inevitable fate of old-school Villains.

Dainpdf

First, that won't be any consolation if you're... You know, Procer. Which is who Pappenheim represents. Second, mortals don't generally think in terms of narrative and stories. Hell, Black showed us that overreliance on narratives is poison. Third, Malicia is clearly okay with using superweapons. Remember the whole Akua thing? It's been a while, but not that long.

And fourth, the Tyrant has shown us that traditional evil **can** be worked into a weapon. You may recall he has succeeded so far and even outwitted the Bard. Plus, you know, Kingdom of the Dead. Unconquered evil.

MetruX

Okay, to start... Overcommitting can be as hazardous as undercommitting. If you need exactly twenty thousand of your soldiers to defeat one enemy with minimal casualties, and you got another front to battle, you use twenty thousand. Not more and not less. That is the true vein of commanding, even more than making strategies themselves: How much can I use? How much should I use? How much can I sacrifice?

The army going for black has defence, Named and double the numbers, besides the narrative on their sides. Really, unless a miracle happens Black won't win this battle. On the other hand, the pass won't be opened easier or faster after they deal with the internal menace, so the truth is he made a choice of prices: lives and farmland over time and loyalty. Also, do you think the first of the ally armies will stop advancing on Callow just because he will be delayed? This will only make more of his allies die, because of harder fights, simply for fear of numerous advantages not being enough.

About making it faster, absolutely foolishness. If Black is not there, if the fullness of this armies following him, it is the same deal easier and faster to invade, no matter if he is dead or away. Just do the maths, 4-1 is 3, no matter if the one was eaten or locked away.

Defeating Black is not defeating the Dread Empire, and none of those pledgings mean full commitment. They could, very well, just delay their marches a couple of months and then clean up once Procer is broken. Would even be better for them, since they hate Procer (as has been shown in interludes books before). It is an absolutely understandable surprise for a enemy turned temporary ally to come to your help in a moment of need.

Now, for the Pilgrim. He is not there, if you trully do not remember, I'll just remind you he stayed behing, together with the prince oficially leading the army, because of the signed treaty. So even if he could comand the Levantines (which he neither can or would do, given what we saw so far) he is not in a position to do so. Also, just to make clear: heroes came for the Pilgrim and the Saint, armies came because of the First Prince's machinations. It was shown to us how hard she had to fight, on several diplomatic fronts, to make a Crusade possible, even with the doom weapon. It's not merely a fight for Good, each has their own reasons for entering the Crusade.

Jason Ipswitch

"And then forces of Good, with their numerical superiority and logistical advantages of operating in their home territory, dealt a crushing defeat to the Legions of Terror with no more casualties or property damage than might reasonably be expected, before turning around an engaging in some more diplomacy," went no Story ever.

I don't know if it won't happen because the Powers Above and Below won't allow it, or because the forces of Good are story-savvy enough to know that plan never works, but it was never going to go that way.

Dylan Tullos

Jason Ipswitch:

I know, I know, the Narrative insists that Heroes aren't allowed to just assemble overwhelming force and win a simple, straightforward victory. I just become upset when obvious, sane solutions are automatically eliminated because they aren't dramatic enough.

Oshi

It's the cost of living and committing to a story driven world.

Novice

Welcome to a world ruled by narrativium. I wonder how you managed to survive three books.

MetruX

And still be naive enough to think things would go smoothly if the "sane" common sense method was used. I mean, how many times have we seen people do supposedly sane and sensible things and get killed or mangled for that?

JJR

When you frame it like that sure, it can't work. But part of being in a narrative driven world is finagling the right narrative out what you are doing, In this case it would be the 'villain's hubris leads to their downfall' narrative. Even better if they can get the Waltz of Wroth considered Black's Phase One by the world, that way his Hells mandated victory is used up just as he managed to use Hanno's Heaven mandated one.

Of course Black will be busy finagling the Narrative too. Which brings us to who survived the duel. I think it's literally up in the air at this point. Traditionally such a massive magic duel with an ambiguous outcome would be a set up for the Hero spellslinger to show up at the last moment to save their friends at the last moment. But with all the narrative awareness going on, and Black's ability to change or sidestep narratives he might trick the world into making Warlock the person who takes the role of the last second rescuer. Hell, Warlock might have decided to not contact anyone after the duel just to be able to set up such a plot in the future. In order for this to have any chance though, Black has to put himself in a position where he is outmatched and under siege, say by invading Procer despite the fact that he is massively outnumbered and cut off from retreat.

Of course being unable to retreat is it's own sort of story that is as old as the first dawn. As Sun Tzu puts it, "Throw your soldiers into positions whence there is no escape, and they will prefer death to flight. If they will face death, there is nothing they may not achieve." (<https://suntzusaid.com/book/11/23>)

Jane

Perhaps he's concerned that Black is attempting to lure him into another trap, and believes that the other forces won't have to worry about such a thing?

Alternately, maybe he's concerned that Black would send a skirmishing force against those left to work on clearing the pass, and is unwilling to split his forces for fear of Black making use of a cunning plan.

Or it could just be that Papenheim's forces are in greater disarray than we were lead to believe, and simply can't pursue without more time to reorganize – at least not without unreasonably high casualties.

If both of the remaining two armies are large enough to defeat him and close enough to engage within a reasonable timespan, it's not an unreasonably bad move to leave the matter to them. Not what I would choose to do, but it's not necessarily the wrong call. Well, I mean, it will be a mistake, given what the readers know, but the logic would be sound if we hadn't been told he was up to something.

Dylan Tullos

Jane:

If Pappenheim is worried about a trap, he can send scouts and Heroes out to check for danger as he advances. If he's worried about enemy skirmishers, he can leave two or three thousand soldiers to build a fortified camp at the Vales to protect his engineers.

And if his forces are disorganized, he can send his cavalry to harass Black while he gets his army in order.

Black is ALWAYS up to something, and he has to know the odds are against him. If he's advancing anyway, it's because he has a plan. The solution is not bring an army that's "large enough", but an army that's so unreasonably huge that even the most cunning tactics imaginable won't make a difference.

There may be Story reasons not to do this, but I see no strategic reason to use forty-five thousand men to sit around a pile of rocks while mages and priests slowly clear away rubble.

Jane

On the other hand, though... Scouts didn't help much with the traps Black has sprung so far, either being too quickly triggered to react to, or making use of premises so outlandish that nothing could be noticed; similarly, they might be concerned that too small a guard would be pointless, but too large a guard would diminish their war potential too severely.

As for just sending the cavalry... Well, this is a pre-modern army. Procer sounds like it still operates on the old style of organization, where forces are loyal to their nobles first, and a real chain of command second. After the heavy losses they've sustained, and the utter confusion that being in the middle of a mountain range blowing up must bring... Something as sophisticated as "Find me Lord xyz and have him send us his knights" might just plain be beyond them for the next few days, especially when he starts getting refusals from nobles who balk at losing even more valued retainers when they "know" Lady qrs's knights are still relatively fresh.

Factor internal political considerations into it, since all of this will be remembered long after the Crusade is over... It probably isn't worth the trouble, unless you expect to lose if you don't pursue him now.

As I said before, I do think this is a mistake on Papenheim's part, unless he's up to something as well... Just one that I consider a reasonable one. Sending a force of disorganized levies tired from a week of heavy fighting to pursue a brilliant leader known for unconventional strategies, relying on nothing but superior numbers and the presence of the Chosen to bolster them, sounds like a recipe for heavy casualties – waiting for fresh troops instead is what a cautious commander ought do.

It's just that, well, caution isn't always the safer option, as we'll soon find out.

Morgenstern

Might also add in the morale of Papenheim's troops, which has to be shockingly low after the last very few days and such heavy losses for no real gain...

RanVor

There is only one possible reason to use forty-five thousand men to sit around a pile of rocks while mages and priests slowly clear away rubble: to resume the invasion IMMEDIATELY when the passage is cleared, instead of wasting months on marching back to the Vales and leaving the way to Callow open for a counter-strike.

I'm not saying it's strategically sound, but it's an explanation.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

That makes sense.

MetruX

Who says the mages and priests will be the only ones working? They can't work 24/7, and even small excavations on their down times will grow with time. You seem to think the bigger weapon always win, and dozens of both real and fantasy tales can be shown to say that is not true. There has never been an army undefeated by sheer numbers, and there will never be. If, for nothing else, because logistics get's harder and loyalty lesser the bigger the host. You know, it's onw of the reason why there is so much hierarchy in the military...

Walter

Bad guys have a slave who can teleport armies. If you chase Black's host you will be weeks out of position when Cat or Larat swoops down and scoops him into Arcadia.

Oshi

I wonder if the Pilgrim is watching them now and what it means.

Jane

"Those crazy kids"?

I can't help but think of how similar it seems to the shenanigans we've seen from the other Hero parties we followed. Well, except the Lone Swordsman's. He was kind of too grim and gritty for fun – no doubt part of the reason Cat could swipe Thief after the fact.

Raved Thrad

Well, it's always possible that Vivienne was all "That's such a pretty black cloak, I wonder what it would be like to take it off her."

And then we'd see Vivienne blushing and insisting to herself
"To steal it! I'd take it off her to steal it!"

Jane

Hey, hey, I was making a serious point, not adding shipping fuel 😊 !

I just meant that the Lone Swordsman's party never really came together in the way we saw the White Knight's or that one paladin guy from the prologue. As such, it was a heck of a lot easier for Thief to work with their killers after the fact, whereas if the converse were to happen... Well, it's a lot harder to forgive the death of a friend than that of (essentially) a coworker.

Raved Thrad

Well, if I remember right, it was Thief herself who pointed out that he was the Lone Swordsman, which is why he sucked at being in a group and, consequently, his group sucked at being one, too.

pyrohawk21

The power comes from the multitude of people, for it is by their will that all the others are given power over the rest.

TheCount

i do have my guess what's the answer, but i like this ending too.
makes you think. 😊

Jane

Oh, sure, go and leave your guess unstated so that you can never be proven wrong, unlike the rest of us saps 😊 ...

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

The Woe: Haha! Fix the house! Haha! I shall use you as a footstool! besties for life!

Black: "RAPE THE CITIES AND BURN THE WOMEN!"
*Uncharacteristically Evil Cackling*

Raved Thrad

You win an Internet for the Three Amigos reference. 😊

Novice

The Legions prohibit rape. On one of the earlier chapters, it is said that Black dealt with rapists harshly after the Conquest.

RanVor

The Legions prohibit raping *people*. I doubt the doctrine has anything to say about raping cities.

Raved Thrad

If you think about it, raping cities is a great way to beef up the Legions of Terror. Rape a couple of cities, and in a few years baby cities will spring up, allowing you to temper your new, green recruits in battle against the cities' guardians. Once all opposition is dead, rape the city, and the cycle continues.

TeK

Maybe you can even tame little cities and turn them into battle mounts.

Euodiachloris

You need to train them up from when they're still villages. It takes a while, and some of the poor, little things just don't make it due to geographical limitations and/or fading syndrome leading to them never forming a proper, self-sustaining CBD with solid trade links. It's quite sad, really.

Yotz

I'll just refer you to this thing.

Antony444

Situation is not looking good seen from the grand point of view. I knew the Crusade was virtually all the good nations of Calernia save the Gigantes, but damn that's a huge amount of men...

It's true I really don't see now how Cat can triumph against nine heroes (including the White Knight) and over 80 000 soldiers. The same is true for Black. Oh, the Princes of Bayeux and Aisne are going to scream bloody murder because Papenheim has abandoned their lands to Praes, but the Legions of Terror are so hideously outnumbered...

There are too many heroes for the villains to survive as the situation stands. The Army of the Stairwell began with fourteen and the Army of the Vales with eleven. Now they have respectively ten and nine, but we don't how many are waiting in the wings. It's sad to say, but Callow really need the Dead King, the Tyrant and/or Triumphant to intervene before four months because else the Crusade is going to enter Callow and crush all opposition.

I liked very much the bantering between the Woe, they're becoming more like the Calamities in every way...

Someguy

Seven Heroes. Two died after the Dragon dropped burning rock on them and Grem had his men mop them up:-

>The heroes, even after it all, had held long enough for a retreat. Only two of the nine had perished, the White Knight joining his fellows to escape. The horseman he had brought were not so lucky.

Walter

The armies aren't relevant. Cat can drop mountains on them anytime she feels like it.

The lesser heroes aren't relevant. Cat kicked the crap out of a squad of them with the Saint helping out.

Hanno would be the person in that army that mattered, if Cat ended up fighting Pappenheim's army.

My biggest question is whether Cat's alliance field will work on Pilgrim. If he joins the Woe she can probably dictate the Accords directly.

MetruX

Commonly, you would be right. But with those numbers they can just ignore her and take her land, while she is occupied by lesser heroes and her armies die all around. Also, her power is not endless, as great as it is. You must remember Black's techings, like when he spoke of his more powerfull precedents, like his directly one, who died to a common soldier. With those numbers, they can take her down, simply by never stopping the attacks and giving no time to rest.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

One of the earlier chapter quotes was about how, if you've got too many heroes after the same villain(s), "certain doom" becomes "mere doom," as the heroic stories dilute each other by proximity. Even for non-Named, it's well-established that overwhelming, obvious numerical superiority just makes stories which save the underdogs more likely to pop up.

Of course, a numerical advantage is still really helpful in battle, it's just that being an underdog is REALLY HELPFUL in battle.

nick012000

So, Sorcerous's soul is in the moon? Hey, Cat, I have an idea on how to get rid of the moon. I call it Plan: Fuck The World.

Step 1: Seize the Tower.

Step 2: Perform a giant magical ritual that sacrifices every person in Ater other than the magicians performing it, using their blood and souls to fuel the spell. Don't worry about the Due, everyone in Creation is going to die if you succeed anyway.

Step 3: Use a connection between the Tower and the soul of one of the Dread Emperors who ruled it to drag the moon out of orbit onto the Tower.

Step 4: Flee into Arcadia before the moon hits Creation and everyone there dies.

Forrest

I mean, unless dragging the moon down becomes one of those scales of which no one can screw with, I'm pretty sure heroic intervention would occur. Granted, we already know both Ranger and the Dead King fit on that scale, so the moon being brought down a la a certain mask like game would seem to fit... but then it would likely have to be Cat doing it, not the mages around her if she wanted it to be considered on that scale. Even then...

JJR

Did someone say, "massive sacrificial ritual to drag the moon out of the sky?"

(Ok, it was more to drag a God out of the sky though the moon, but the principle should be similar enough.)

Yotz

Speaking of >cleaning up all those loose ends some day. It suddenly dawned on me recently (yeah, second thought in less than six months; yeah, I don't believe it either), that the Liesse Machine is still mostly functional – bar the control circuits and the power source. Which can be substituted by Zeze and Winter respectively, probably with small tweakings here and there which would allow to replicate Absolute Positioning trick on the industrial scale. Or – I don't know – open an Arcadia portal inside the Greater Breach just for the hell of it...

SpeckofStardust

Considering that the power source went critical in the rest of the it. I think your underestimating how much of it is still there. That said the creator of it is still alive so it could just be rebuilt.

Yotz

Also, since the Riddle of Stele encouraged the quotemini, it seems – here's another pointless one of dubious origin.

““The distance between civilization and savagery is cake.” – Princess Celestia (apocryphal)”

It may sound absurd at first, but if the reader will bear out the line of reasoning, he or she will see beneath the frosting to a fundamental underpinning of Equestrian society.

To construct a proper cake, or indeed most any kind of frosted pastry, a civilization must be capable of milling flour, collecting eggs, harvesting and refining sugar, acquiring and storing milk, churning butter, and writing down recipes. A cake-producing civilization must also have the infrastructure necessary to bring these ingredients into one place, and an oven in which to combine and bake them. To do all this requires a certain level of agricultural capacity, livestock management skills, technological advancement, education, skilled labor, and social cohesion that hunter-gatherers and wandering monster packs lack, no matter how smart or articulate the individuals may be.

The similar approach may be applied to the concept of power, as it was many times already noted in this chapter's comment section. I mean, you don't just rip one chip from the board and call it “the root of all”...

Jessica Day

LMAO 😂 Masego got a book on friendship.

Raved Thrad

Indrani's just softening him up. “Hey, Zeze, wanna get _real_ friendly?” 😊

Oshi

God...hes going to go and get a damn kid...

Raved Thrad

Poor kid. Dad is trying to unravel reality so he can hack the source code, mom is a murderous amoral adrenaline junkie, one grandfather is a murderous, insanely powerful wizard, and the other grandfather is a demon. Oh, and grandma-by-courtesy is a murderous adrenaline junkie who hunts gods for sport.

Can you say pressure to perform?

Naeddyr

"MOM IT'S NOT A PHASE! I am a Priestess of Light and Unicorns, sent here to cuddle evil with my heart until it EXPLODES"

Raved Thrad

Indrani: "Our daughter has a Name."

Masego: "Yes."

Indrani: "And her Name is Unicorn Priestess."

Masego: "Yes."

Indrani: "I can't live down this... this horror!"

Masego: "Don't worry, it's a transitional Name."

Indrani: "What other name can she possibly transition to?"

Masego: "Unicorn Priestess of DEATH!!"

Indrani: "You hacked her Name?"

Masego: "I hacked her Name."

Raved Thrad

On reconsideration, especially considering who the kid's grandfathers are, it's probably more likely to play out like this:

Indrani: "Our son has a Name."

Masego: "Yes."

Indrani: "And his Name is Unicorn Priestess."

Masego: "Yes."

Indrani: "I can't live down this... this horror!"

Masego: "Don't worry, it's a transitional Name."

Indrani: "What other Name can he possibly transition to?"

Masego: "Unicorn Priestess of DEATH!!"

Indrani: "You hacked her Name?"

Masego: "I hacked her Name."

Indrani: "Well, at least there's some death in there."

Masego: "Not death. DEATH!! Capitalization and punctuation are important."

Skycom

As much as I like watching the woe family shenanigans, I think I would preferred the interlude to be longer and watched black kicks some more ass, instead of that partial summary we got in part three.

Alivaril

Eeh. I'm not too bothered by how that interlude turned out, especially since EE was sick; I'd rather have this sort of thing. Battles are OK, but chapters such as this one are what gives the story life and makes it worth reading.

Everything Narrator, Penning Gentle Lies

Focault said that power is everywhere because power comes from everywhere. The true strength of one man is merely the reach of his blade, but when a whole people thinks one man should be king, he becomes one.

superkeaton

A comfortable little cooldown chapter.

---

Typo:

> "Barika assures me I've been paid punctually," Masego contributed hesitantly.

Should be Fadila, Barika was killed and buried in sanctified grounds back in Book II.

Joshua Sills

What an interesting comparison to the Riddle of Fault the White Knight was given and answered before his major power boost. Pretty sure Cat coming up with an answer will be the transition to her new name for symmetry sake.

MetruX

That... Oh well, it might very well be true o.o How perceptive, of you. I hope it isn't, but the symmetry is there, and still no bindings between Black and White...

*jfantasybooks*

Hi, is there a way to get in contact with you?

*erraticerrata*

My email's on the home page.

*jfantasybooks*

Ok! I sent an email. Thanks.

*sengachi*

<https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>

Hey if you can you should go support errata on Patreon. They write a *ton* for us, and the Guide is just an amazing story, but they don't make all that much on Patreon for all the work they do. So seriously, if you can, go donate. The Guide is an amazing, amazing story and the least we can do is help take care of errata for gifting it to us.

Metrux

Humm... Why you call him they? Erraticerrata is a single person, no?

sengachi

I didn't know his gender so I just went with they, as the single-person gender-ambiguous pronoun.

Arthur Hansen

"...though the Pilgrim had knocked me the fuck out after barely ten heartbeats. "

Think you meant to have a "later" after heartbeats.

Metalshop

How is it that every chapter that focuses on Hakram is the best out of any of the other chapters? That math shouldn't work out, but it does.

The interplay between his absolute loyalty/ trust and Cat's doubt/uncertainty is fantastic, as good a character interaction as I've ever read, including traditionally published fiction.

I just wanted to take a moment to tell you that directly, because that's no small thing you've managed.

Metalshop

Since I can't edit: I just realized that this last chunk of the story, which has focused so much on Cat feeling uncertain, is the longest chunk we've seen of her operating without Hakram nearby. I'm real keen to see how his arrival changes the whole dynamic.

Further thought: Seeing the way the Woe are behaving here and recalling the sections where the Heroes comment on how Catherine is following a heroic narrative arc rather than a traditional villainous one, I have a wild-ass theory. Cat (and her followers) are an attempt by the gods Below to treat a villain a bit more like how the Heavens treat heroes. Not in the sense that their behavior is steered (since Evil is all about Free Will to Power) but in the sense of direct intervention to let a villain benefit a bit from the evil version of divine providence.

Metrux

Well, is there a Evil version to divine power? For all we know all Gods are equal, save for the point of view, which is why Good and Evil started existing after the Creation, not before.

Pilgrim the White

They are behaving almost exactly as Calamities do/did. I almost expect Cat to conquer somewhere while drunk.

Pilgrim the White

Dunno if this has been discussed before, why didn't the bird obsessed oracle warn the invaders of Blacks intent to invade them or his trap with the mountains etc.

Why didn't she warn them about Cat intending to drop a lake on em.

Why didn't she warn anyone that Cat was gonna raid the camp and intended to steal their supplies.

I think i don't like oracles if they work deus ex machina style though i might be missing something here.

Mindsword

I think it has to do with intent. They got some information past her because it was a spur of the moment thing. In this case, if Black wasn't planning on invading and is merely adapting, then she would have had no warning. As for Cat... these are Coredella's political rivals. Let them suffer.

Pilgrim the White

Because Black is such a spur of the moment guy amirite?
Yea it was the plan all along for the army invading Cat to lose but i dunno, seems too farfetched.

308924810a

So I'm pretty sure the riddle was going to answer that true power lies with the warrior, because the only power you can trust is that achieved through struggle and hardship, and the practice of the warrior is the practice of learning to fight for what you want.

But the stele being broken is still a truer answer, because power achieved through martial force can always be broken by superior force.

I think that modern Orcs differ from their ancestors in that they acknowledge that power comes from institutions allowing groups to surpass the limits of individuals, instead of originating from individual struggle, hence why the first Orc Named in centuries is meant to act as part of an organization in support of another.

crowlute

1) Adorable Woe cuddle pile 😊

2) a ruler commands because others choose to obey. When civil wars erupt, the majority in strength usually ends up controlling in the end. Might makes.

---

Chapter 24: Invitation (Redux)

"The enemy of my enemy is second on the list."
– Dread Empress Vindictive III

"Is it contained?"

I didn't bother with greetings, knowing the manners would be lost on Masego anyway. The dark-skinned mage nodded, not even noticing the abruptness of my tone.

"It did not struggle against imprisonment," Hierophant said. "Nor has it sought to escape binding since."

The two of us walked towards the sparse woods where the creature had been trapped inside wards without wasting time. Night had just fallen, which was a small mercy. It meant there'd be fewer witnesses. Already the scout line who'd found it approaching Harrow had been sworn to secrecy, but there was no telling if anyone else had come across it. As the exact path it'd taken to get here was still a mystery. More worryingly, the Observatory hadn't seen it and it was meant to pick up on exactly this kind of stuff. I was not great student of sorcery, but even to me the implications were visible. Whoever had sent the thing was a mage of very great skill, and there were only a few of those around. And even fewer among those who'd lower themselves to raising the dead, much less this... particular kind.

"You're sure it wasn't an attack?" I asked for the third time.

Masego's brow creased.

"Certainty of unknown intent is, by definition, impossible," he said peevishly. "My current theory, based on initial observation, is that this was not an attack. It is not armed, and was not crafted with combat in mind – or at least no form of combat I can recognize.”

“It doesn’t need to swing blades to be dangerous, Masego,” I said. “It just needs to carry a magic plague and take a dip in the water reservoirs.”

“Don’t be obtuse, Catherine,” he sighed. “Plague-bearing was one of the first threats I assessed it for. There is no trace. It has, if anything, been stripped out of everything but the barest necessities for functionality. It does carry an enchanted object, but that object has no harmful properties.”

I frowned.

“Is that how it slipped the Observatory’s sight?” I asked.

“I do not believe so,” Hierophant said. “I’ve made preliminary studies, and found that its presence in Creation seems dimmed, somehow. Like a shadow under sorcerous sight. It was not invisible to the Observatory so much as exceedingly difficult to find if not specifically looked for.”

“We need to fix that weakness,” I flatly said. “If this could be done once, it can be done again. We’re relying on the Observatory to keep one step ahead of threats, and I’m not pleased someone already found a way to fool it. You told me it’d be years before someone found a counter.”

“I told you it would be three to five years before the Empire found a counter, barring my father’s sustained intervention,” the blind man corrected. “This is not Imperial work.”

We were going to have a longer conversation about this down the line, but I allowed silence to take hold as we finally got deep enough in the woods that the creature was in sight. Surrounded by layers on layers of translucent force with glowing runes inscribed, the undead creature was utterly still. Hakram, in full armour with his axe in hand, was keeping an eye on it. Indrani was out in the field to make sure there wasn’t another wandering the countryside, and Vivienne combing the keep for infiltration we might have missed. It wasn’t a person I was looking at, though it might once have been. The upper body and face was of a pale-skinned man’s, but that was where the normality ended. There was a pair of segment, almost insect-like arms coming out of the creature’s back, with hooks at the tip. Made for climbing, I thought. Had it crossed the Whitecaps without taking a pass? The body parts beneath the torso were harder to make out. The entire creature had been covered in a ragged cloak when the goblins first saw it, though it had fallen off the upper body since, and what I could glimpse through the cloth was eight spider-like legs of bone and necrotized flesh folded close to the torso. It was, I grimaced, the kind of abomination you’d expect to be dumped out in the Wasteland after an Emperor climbed the Tower and cleared out the basement of their predecessor's experiments. There were no visible weapons save for the claws, not that it needed any.

"You're sure this isn't of your father's making?" I said.

"I could perhaps reproduce the design in two months, he in one," Masego noted. "The material parts of it anyway. What makes it truly fascinating work is the guiding intelligence, since there is barely any. Every ounce of metaphorical fat has been trimmed. It is, I will admit, one of the most magnificently efficient necromantic constructs I have ever seen."

I cursed.

"All right, so either a high-tier necromancer has just come out of the woodworks," I said. "Or we're dealing with something much, much worse."

The Dead King. Fucking Hells. It wasn't like the situation had been going so well the Heavens needed to drop another dead cat in my lap. Assuming this was their work, anyway, and not a play by the Pricks Below.

"Catherine," Hakram said suddenly, breaking me out of my thoughts before a proper rant could take hold. "It's moving."

My eyes flicked at the creature, which had risen on two bone appendages and was peering at me from the edge of the wards.

"Well," I muttered. "That's pretty lively for a dead cat."

Masego glanced at me and opened his mouth but I silenced him with a raised hand. I felt him twitch, the mutter something under his breath about there being no feline components. The undead stared at me for a solid twenty heartbeats before opening its mouth.

"I offer greetings to the Black Queen of Callow," the creature said. "Your renown has been heard far and wide, bringing the attention that is your due. I bear invitation from the King of the Dead, who offers safe passage to Keter. In the face of Above's wrath, the champions of Below must either face demise alone or overturn the wheel of fate in coming striving."

I waited just in case it had anything to add and in a manner of speaking it did. The jaws unhinged and a serpent-like black tongue came out, offering up what looked like a circular seal of pure obsidian.

"The enchanted object it was carrying," Masego said. "It holds... instructions. A sliver of knowledge accessible through touch."

I stared at the obsidian seal and decided it was too early in the year to start making decisions that blatantly terrible. I wasn't getting anywhere near that until Masego had spent a few days checking it out, and even then I wasn't touching it if it could be at all avoided.

"I hear the King of the Dead's invitation," I said. "But seek clarification on the nature of it."

The tongue snapped back in. The undead began speaking again, but it was just repeating the exact same message. Masego's glass eyes were staring at it, his head cocked to the side.

"Hierophant?" I probed.

"The trigger for the actions was your presence," he said. "The message is not spoken consciously so much as woven into what passes for the construct's mind. It cannot reason or reply, only repeat."

"My presence," I repeated slowly.

"Winter, more specifically," he said. "I'll need a closer look to find out the decision threshold, but I suspect Larat would not have been able to fool it into speaking."

Hakram had come to stand at my side while we spoke, warily eyeing the undead.

"Cat," he gravelled. "If the Dead King knew enough to bespell for that..."

"He has a much better idea of what's going on outside his kingdom than we thought," I finished grimly. "Shit."

Masego cleared his throat.

"Why are we displeased?" he said. "My interest in diplomacy is inexistent, but this seems to me like an offer of alliance. Are we not under siege by the crusaders?"

"We are," I said.

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"But there's a saying back home about Praesi bearing gifts, and I think it might just apply here," I said.

Hakram loomed tall at my side, baring his fangs at the creature.

"I'll get the others," he said. "The solar?"

I nodded and stood silently as he left, watching the creature as it began to speak the message again.

"You have an hour to study it," I finally told Masego. "Don't break it, we don't know if there'd be consequences. After the hour's done, I want you in the solar with everyone else."

An eager smile split Hierophant's face in two.

"Thank you, Catherine," he murmured. "This will be most interesting."

I walked away without a word, pretty sure I didn't want to see what would follow.

—

There were six of us in Baroness Ainsley's solar, enough that it felt full without being outright cramped. The piles of parchment that followed Adjutant like a curse had been dumped unceremoniously on the ground so that the only thing on the table was a detailed map of Calernia — along with a handful of goblets. Mine was still half-filled with aragh, but I'd refrained from downing it whole after Hakram sent me a quelling look. Fine, be that way, I thought mulishly. It's not like I was just essentially offered an alliance by the oldest and most dangerous abomination in Calernian history. If there was ever a godsdamned reason to drink... Masego was already looking bored and we hadn't even begun. He'd hinted his time could be better spent studying the envoy the very moment he'd walked into the solar, and had been sulking ever since I'd told him it would have to wait. It would have been kind of cute, if he wasn't essentially pouting because I'd told him he couldn't go elbows-deep in dead flesh. Archer was keeping him attentive — and twitching — by idly tearing up the pages of a book I was pretty sure she'd gotten for this very purpose. Vivienne and Juniper had pointedly sat as far as each other from possible, to my irritation. I was not unaware they were less than fond of each other, but until now they'd been a lot subtler about it. Something must have happened while I was taking my lovely Winter nap, but neither of them was talking. Hakram was, as usual, an oasis of calm competence in the middle of the mess that was our lives. He'd transcribed the Dead King's message from memory and provided it for the others to read. I cleared my throat.

"All right," I said. "Let's get this started. Before we get to unpacking anything else, Thief can provide a reminder of how fucked we're looking at the moment."

Vivienne shot me an amused look before leaning over the table.

"As most of you are aware," she said, "there is a knife at Callow's throat."

She tapped the map right at the feet of the sculpted spearman figurine on the western side of the former Red Flower Vales.

"Prince Klaus Papenheim, the First Prince's foremost general, is digging his way through the wrecked passes as we speak," Thief said. "He has between forty and fifty thousand men under his command, and we estimate that within four months he will be reinforced by an army of thirty thousand Levantines."

"With the way Cat's looking like she's sucking on a lemon that personally murdered her father, I'm guessing he's preparing an invasion," Indrani commented.

She sounded at best mildly interested, but I'd take what I could get.

"By the time the Levantines arrive, we believe they'll have dug out a usable passage," Thief said. "Which is to say, in about four months we'll be facing an offensive of at least seventy thousand soldiers led by several heroic bands."

"That's bad," Archer mused. "Zeze, doesn't that sound bad?"

"I suppose," Hierophant shrugged. "Can't we make a truce with those as well?"

"I'm not opposed to the notion," I admitted. "But we don't have the men to force another draw, and we're not dealing with Amadis Milenan here. Papenheim is the First Prince's uncle and the most decorated general in Procer, he's not going to flinch if we bloody him a bit. He'll stick it out until only one of us is left standing, and the odds aren't looking great for that being us."

"A truce in the Vales might lead to the political collapse of the Tenth Crusade," Hakram said. "And likely the end of his niece's reign with it. Negotiation is not a plausible option as things stand."

"I could kill the First Prince," Indrani suggested.

"The Tower's been trying to do that for over twenty years," I told her. "She has a future-telling Named, the Augur, watching for attempts. If Black is to be believed the Augur protects Papenheim as well, so removing him isn't on the table either."

"Ugh, seers," Archer complained. "They take all the fun out of it."

Juniper growled, cutting through the whining.

"Tactics won't get us out of this," she said. "We need strategic leverage. Either reinforcements that make holding the Vales feasible, or someone to put pressure on the Principate so it can't afford to leave those seventy thousand men at the border."

The orc marshal drummed her thick fingers against the map.

"The Army of Callow will be, barely, in fighting fit if our timeline for the invasion holds," she said. "But another major battle will take us right back out of the war, won or lost, and this time for much longer. We're bleeding veterans and irreplaceables. To be blunt, if we want fight again then we need a force to split casualties with. Much better would be not fighting at all."

"So, now we take a hard look at our options," I said. "The name of the game tonight being: is there literally any other option that the Dead King?"

"I could go to Refuge," Archer offered. "Most pupils will be gone, especially the heroes – last I heard Silver signed up with the White Knight – but there's bound to be one or two left I can beat into joining. Lady Ranger probably won't care enough to get involved."

I worried my lip with my teeth.

"Even by gate, it'd take most entire preparation time to get there and back," I finally said. "I wouldn't sneer at more Named, but I doubt they'll be enough to turn the tide unless some real powerhouses have been keeping quiet."

"They probably wouldn't be frontline material," Indrani admitted. "Beastmaster might qualify with the right mount, but he's not a pushover I can bully and he doesn't really give a shit about anything going on outside the Waning Woods. Also tends to disappear for months at a time, so he might not be there at all. Concocter's the only one I can be sure will be there, but her thing is potions and she uses ingredients from the woods for most her brews."

"We'll table that for now, then," I said. "Anyone else?"

"Mercenaries," Juniper said. "Diabolist hired men through Mercantis twice. I know the treasury's tight but better some debt than the kingdom lost."

"That well's run dry," Vivienne said, shaking her head. "All the larger companies are already under contract in the League, and even if we snap up all the smaller ones that'd be at most two or three thousand soldiers. Extremely unreliable ones. All the reputable mercenaries are already in someone's pay."

"Speaking of the League," I said, raising an eyebrow at Thief.

"The Hierarch's still not willing to sit at the table," Vivienne replied. "The only saving grace is that Procer is also apparently full of wicked foreign oligarchs so they're equally out of luck there. The Tyrant of Helike is willing in theory, but he also says he loves Hierarch 'like the father he had and then murdered' so he won't cut a deal behind his leader's back. Not sure we should even if he agrees, to be honest. Aside from how astonishingly prone to backstabbing the man is, poaching a member of the League might get the rest of it coming after us in retaliation."

Masego cleared his throat, and I glanced at him in surprise. I'd not actually expected him to contribute to this part of the council.

"Is there a reason we cannot simply contact Uncle Amadeus?" he asked. "He has legions with him, as I understand it, and we could spirit them away through gates."

I felt Juniper's eyes on me. She agreed with the notion, I knew. She'd already made that very clear in private.

"I'm not willing to do that until I know what game he's playing, and he hasn't been forthcoming," I said. "For all I know the moment we come to pick him up we'll be heading into a pitched battle with half of Procer. I won't consider him an enemy right now – Hells, he pretty much scrapped a legion's worth of men to defend my borders – but it's a long walk from that to trusting him."

Masego's glass eyes turned to gaze at me, the power of Summer within burning.

"We will come to his aid if he is cornered," Hierophant said, and it wasn't a question. "I do not ask you to fight a battle for his sake, but he at least should be rescued."

I clenched my fingers under the table.

"If he's in danger of death," I said. "I didn't force him to take his army in the heartlands of Procer, Masego. And I doubt he would have done it without a plan, which we know nothing about."

There was a tense moment, then the Soninke nodded.

"He rarely does anything without one," Hierophant conceded.

Indrani tore another page from the book on her lap and he twitched in irritation. Smiling broadly, Archer looked at me.

"The Empress' supposed to be in charge, right?" she said. "Seems like we could drop this whole mess into her lap."

"We can't," Vivienne and I simultaneously said.

I snorted, then gesture for her to continue.

"It would break the terms of our truce with the northern crusaders to do so," Thief said. "Praes is already under siege by the Thalassocracy, regardless. It has no legions to spare."

"Deoraithe aren't our solution either, before anyone mentions them," I added. "Kegan's army will be holding the passage. Even if we had another way to keep that closed, she's been pretty blunt in telling me she's not taking her army into a meat grinder down in the Vales. She's willing to help, but there's limits."

There was a long moment of silence around the table, the stares of most going to the map and the last few forces unaccounted for.

"The Chain of Hunger," Juniper said, enumerating them. "The Kingdom of the Dead. The Everdark."

Well, at least they were taking this seriously enough no one had brought the elves. Not that there were even in Creation at the moment. There were still tucked away in some inaccessible corner of Arcadia according to the few Imperial reports Malicia still sent our way.

"The Grey Pilgrim is highly influential in Levant," Vivienne said. "There might be an angle there as well."

"Pilgrim's running his own game," I quietly replied. "Nothing we have to offer is better than the irons he already has in the fire."

She fixed me with a long searching look before nodding. We were, I suspected, going to have a conversation about that.

"The ratlings do not seem like a promising avenue," Hakram said. "Imperial chronicles imply they have no understanding of diplomacy."

He'd been rather quiet so far, but then he tended to be in councils like these. He'd always preferred to let others do the talking, to work behind the stage so things got done after decisions had emerged.

"It has been theorized only the youngest among them and a very small number of the truly old," Masego noted. "It is, at least, a matter of record that even after Triumphant slaughtered over nine tenths of their population they offered no surrender. She withdrew after burning everything down and salting the ashes, as I recall."

Only Hakram and Juniper pressed their knuckle to their forehead at the mention of the name, I noticed, though they both managed not to speak the words.

"Shame," Indrani said. "The Lady says their Ancient Ones are just large brutes, but the Horned Lords are supposed to be hard fuckers. We could use a few of those."

"If we assault Lycaonese territories and lay waste to border defences, it might be possible to bait an attack from the Chain even without prior negotiation," Vivienne said. "They send warbands south every spring, there should already be many on the march."

"At least half the armies of Rhenia and Hannover are still up there manning the walls," Juniper said. "It won't be a milk run, I can promise you that. Lycaonese die hard. Losses are guaranteed, and I'm not hearing any certainty they'll have to deal with worse than a few warbands after."

"We need a stronger foundation going forward," Hakram calmly agreed. "That plan would rely on too many unknowns."

"The drow?" Vivienne said, sounding less than enthusiastic.

"We don't know a lot about them," I said. "Archer?"

"Lady Ranger tried to hunt the Priestess of Night, a century back I think? They messed with the tunnels so she couldn't find a way to their cities," Indrani shrugged. "Haven't got much else on them."

"We know they have no unified central rule," Adjutant said. "That would make them difficult to treat with, much less mobilize. And there are records sixty years old that speak of a drow raiding party wielding weapons of iron instead of steel."

"I don't care if they're using bones," I grunted. "As long as there's enough of them to worry Hasenbach."

"Even assuming they can be assembled and gated within a sennight of your arrival, the Vales would be too far to return in time," Juniper said. "That means an offensive in Procer, then, and we'd need of a functional army for that to have any degree of success. Nothing we've heard leads me to believe they have one."

"Might be one of the few places susceptible to the Foundling charm though," Archer said.

I raised an eyebrow.

"The Foundling charm?" I warily asked.

The ochre-skinned woman grinned.

"You know, killing the people in charge until someone willing to listen gets promoted," she said. "The Tenets of Night are all about stabbing to get on top, you'd blend right in."

It was an effort not to sigh.

"Might take a lot of killing to get anywhere, though," Archer mused. "Better to take me to Refuge instead."

I grimaced and passed a hand through my tangled hair.

"Well," I said. "I suppose we're going to have to talk about the Dead King, then."

---

Aeon

Yes! An alliance between the Dead Kings and Cat? This will be glorious. Or catastrophic. Or gloriously catastrophic. Fun either way.

Rook

Can't spell catastrophe without Cat, after all

RoflCat

And a lot of factions are seeing Cat As Trophy to aim for.

Good want her dead for being basically the symbol of the new Evil.

Evil want her rolled into their side proper because she's been very successful with her schticks.

And Ranger is yandere for Black so I'm sure somewhere inside she want to stab Cat very much.

wyaldriddler

Welp. I think her plan to sign on with the Alliance just went up in smoke.

Spinner335

Well maybe the Good alliance, but hey, this looks like the start of The Alliance of Evil Nations, making Evil one big murderous family just like The First Prince fears.

Euodiachloris

And, it wouldn't have happened without her...

Arthur Hansen

That only had a chance if she could be a big enough threat to block their armies from walking in and annexing Callow for Procor. And with 80,000 soldiers, it would be about a pimp-slap of effort for them.

Rook

Do note that her wording was to **seek** signatory status, not commit to receiving it.

She can apply for signatory status on behalf of Callow, abdicate in a show of 'goodwill', have the pilgrim help push it along afterwards to flip Callow back to good, and escape the narrative tether of that promise by fulfilling it as a representative of Callow rather than as the individual Catherine Foundling.

Then she can screw off to meet the dead king and figure out if that glow orb from triumphant lighting up was actually about her, or if she's about to walk into another safe, fun-filled Foundling Adventure.

TeK

She can also, ya know, seek this status?

Rook

She could seek it personally too but there's nothing but disadvantages to that

One it further pushes along the suicidal redemption story

Two it breaks the narrative strength of the villainous background she's built up over the years

Three if she leaves after making Callow break pact with the Tower and leaving them in hot water, she can bind the pilgrim to Callow and pit him against Malicia, rather than her.

He's already admitted that procer is flawed and he's in this for the sake of a whole nation going to ruin under a villainous ruler (see: campfire chat). If he doesn't help the now-abandoned Callow to weather the storm, it implies he's prioritizing killing one villain over an entire nation and going back on his word. Either it forces him to stay and draws him into a conflict with Malicia – taking both threats temporarily off her back – or he breaks word and becomes narratively crippled – at least taking one threat off her back.

No real reason to seek signatory status as herself rather than as a rep for the nation imo

TeK

A person can really seek signatory status in the alliance of. NATIONS, can it? Obviously she spoke as a rep for Callow, being countrys Queen and all...

Gibborim

That is a weak semantic argument at best. She is the entire Winter Court, something that could easily be a signatory of such an alliance. Same for her position as the Queen of the Hunt. It wouldn't even be unreasonable to admit her as a warlord without an official nation.

Even if we changed her statement to "To answer your question, I give my oath to seek signatory status with the Grand Alliance within the year.", she would not be bound by oath to seek signatory status for Callow since a major premise of the negotiations was not recognizing her as representing the nation of Callow, only herself.

PotatoMan

Why not both?

Rook

True, wouldn't be a Foundling Adventure if it doesn't irreversibly link her to a world-shatteringly dangerous monster or two.

Raved Thrad

Interesting epigraph. I prefer the Klingon version: "The enemy of my enemy is the enemy I'll kill last." 😊

Someguy

Maxim 29: The enemy of my enemy is my enemy's enemy. No more. No less. -The Seventy Maxims of Maximally Effective Mercenaries

Yotz

A shame he was forced to retcon "The Habits" to the, "The Maxims", though...
Oh well – now with added annoying alliteration appeal!

Adra

I'm sure this will turn out just fine with no negative consequences at all! Glad you're feeling better EE.

Gunslinger

Welp he entered the picture a lot faster than I anticipated... And certainly not in this manner.

Also I wonder how the story of a Cat willing to reform would work when she's making deals with the bloody Dead King. That's the sort of stuff Pilgrim would love to spill.

Also vote for the guide on <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

And if you can do contribute to EE's patreon patreon.com/user?u=3523924

TeK

She's trying to reform him! Sith the power of stabbing/ friendship (a goblin word, as far as you concerned).

Antoninjohn

Cat needs to kill the Auger or at least rip out her eyes, after all without the Named Procer counts on to win their battles the Dread Empress shall smash them with political chaos from her agents. The First Prince is just matching and that is knowing every action that happens before it happens a year before hand

daegone823

The Augur has such a great amount of weight in the story while she may not be a combat oriented hero. Her close bond with creation itself puts her in a similar role as the bard or the hierarch and her very words can cause dramatic events to take place (real helpful for the heroes). Evil has too many doomsday weapons for good to not have a few and she does not depend on her power enough for them to turn on her she only uses it for the first prince and the uncle. So she does not abuse it like the White Knight. Basically she an oracle of Delphi placed here by the gods to send there messages and therefore diplomatic immunity to all except maybe the Hierarch

Antoninjohn

Doomsday weapons that fall apart every time you try to use them does not match knowing all your opponents move before them in intrigue battles

Rook

The augur is a Heroic Omniscient Spyglass though. Those never ever fail barring a Great Stroke of Luck (heroic), Clever Master Plan (villainous), or Prelude to a Great Disaster (neutral) putting up a totally bullshit blind spot

Snowfire1224

If she ripped her eyes out couldn't she just become a Blind Seer? Probably best to kill her when given the chance.

Jonnnney

Personally I think Cat should just start dropping frozen lakes in people. Maybe turn the Red Flower Mountains into the Red Flowers Cliffs overlooking the great lake of Procer

TeK

And great pond of Callow, given how gravity works.

superkeaton

I was wondering when that old horror would make a play.

It was nice to get more backstory on the Everdark and the Chain of Hunger, though. D&D Drow and Warhammer Fantasy Skaven, by the sounds of them.

PotatoMan

Except the Ratlings get more dangerous as they get older, don't they? Which the Skaven don't, afaik. The Ratlings are almost like some versions of demons, or the Infestation from Warframe, where they get gnarlier the older they are, and more vicious

Yotz

'Older is more dangerous' is the essence of Skaven. In their "society" you are either grow exponentially more dangerous with each passing year, or you are dead. Not to mention all the boons of the Great Horned Rat you can only get with passage of time, selective – preferably – warpstone mutations, alliances of convenience you bully someone into (which takes time), and so on.

They are completely unable to understand that "trust" thing, though – in fact, they use one word for "trust", "stupidity", and "suicide", I think. The one and only nation they was in regular diplomatic relations was Naggaroth – and their "interspecial diplomacy" boiled down to a chain of neverending betrayals and backstabbing, each one more drastic and elaborate than previous. Given that both societies deem betrayal as a holiest of virtues, it was a match made in Elysium. Or in Tartarus, since that seems more appropriate.

TeK

Say, Cat, is saving Amadeus really is worse than allying with the Dead King? Honestly?

Matthew

Not even saving him. Just sending him a "what up?"

Yotz

"I don't talk with you anymore. And now I'll explain why."

NZPIEFACE

Personally, I think she's not thinking very clearly when it comes to him, so she hasn't really thought about if interacting with him will affect either of their stories much. Black is her mentor and father figure.

She's on a 'path to redemption'.

Now we get Star Wars.

Matthew

The "no contact with Black" seems damn petulant right now.

Deal with the Dead King who is capital EEEEEEEEEEEEEEEvil and sure to make the story kill you?

Or..

Send a message to your mentor, who though you are still mad at him, just did you a strategic solid and has a devoted the past 3 decades to defeating the Story's Kobayahi Maru tests.

It's called the "Rational Guide to Evil." Not the "Cat picks up the idiot ball guide to Evil."

You may not trust Black... but you trust the Dead King less and you're willing to talk to him. By her own reasoning, there is no reason not to contact Black.

werafdsaew

As scrying breaks up over the mountains, there's currently no easy way to contact Black.

Matthew

Gate in a guy with an enchanted pigeon on top of Black's location. Easy.

onedollargum

I know it breaks up under the earth, but over the mountains?

Doesn't Cat have that secret scrying chamber that she used to contact First Prince (who had to cut through a mountain range to attack?)

Death Knight

To be fair she never said she didn't contact him. She merely said "he wasn't forthcoming with his plan". Which actually implies she did contact him but the encounter didn't yield actionable information. But Masego having to ask the question pretty much shoots the implication in the head since I'm reasonably sure he'd be involved in any scrying attempts to high profile personnel. So yeah, at the very least hear the Knight out. Maybe he has some perspective on the situation.

NZPIEFACE

That was because Thief gave the First Prince a trinket with Winter in it, so Cat could channel her powers through it.

Ca$hMoney

The title of the story has always been kind of a lie though.

Morgenstern

It's "practical", not "rational"...

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Yes, in case you didn't know the name of the story you're reading, it's The Rational Evil Guide starting Chloe, Hakim, Matthew, and the other two!

---

> "I'm not willing to do that until I know what game he's playing, and he hasn't been forthcoming," I said. "For all I know the moment we come to pick him up we'll be heading into a pitched battle with half of Procer. I won't consider him an enemy right now – Hells, he pretty much scrapped a legion's worth of men to defend my borders – but it's a long walk from that to trusting him."

By the looks of it, Black is the one who refuses to pick up the phone right now. Does anybody know what kind of story may require for Cat to stay ignorant of his plans?

warriormonk19

He hasn't been forthcoming, but it doesn't sound like Cat is trying all too hard either.

JJR

It's called The Practical Guide to Evil, not rational guide.

And absent any easy way to get in contact with Black, Cat does not want to stumble into a situation where she has no idea what's going on. Black has a plan, Cat is more likely to hinder it than help going on blind.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

So at least six people still don't know what the title of the story is. How unsurprising

MetruX

I think half the reason is actually not taking the idiot ball. Just think for a while: what is Black's plan? And how does this plan change if she connects or directly gates him? Last chapter some people thought his plan might be to give himself to the heavens as a way to destroy the Crusade's fate bound victory. I don't agree with them, but to do that he needs to be specifically not tied down to any of the other two sides (AKA Cat and Malicia). So if they calmly discuss what's happening it actually destroys the chance for this plan to work. There are so many things he can actually be going after, and we, Cat included, have no clues as to what it is. So, can you really fault her for not running around to help?

TeK

As far as we concerned, his plan may include her calling him. Or not. Or to think about and then call. Or call not. Given no information, no reason to conjure possibilities, and act in the way which yields the best outcome for you. And I see no reason to prefer the unknown plan of Dead King to unknown plan of Black. Aside from personal reasons. Ya know, impractical ones.

nimelennar

Not only that, but, if she doesn't know what the plan is, it stands a reasonable chance of rescuing her (assuming that's the intent, which, with Black, isn't too outlandish an assumption).

As soon as she learns the plan, it hits the Unspoken Plan Guarantee, and the chance of it succeeding drops to near-zero.

Ed

The question to me is,
Is the Dead King really that EEEEEEEEEEEEEEEvil he seems to be a bit of a homebody uninterested in conquest (unlike the bloodthirsty 'good' side) and only raises the heroes who attack him unless I misread it. Sure you may not agree with an entire nation of the risen dead but that is just your living bias....

Gunslinger

Did

Gunslinger

Didn't he at one point want Procer to hand a large number of babies over to him as protection dues?

Dude's as Evil as they get

Dylan Tullos

Ed:

The Dead King's neighbors build a giant wall and manned it with most of their fighting age population to hold back undead incursions.

NZPIEFACE

Deontology. You're evil if you are.

limlimrevolution

I'm fairly certain that he was the source of some pretty major invasions and conquests before he went dormant. We don't have a super clear idea of how bad people had it while he was active, but I can't imagine that opening a permanent hellgate and creating an undead nation (in what was presumably land settled with actual living people) was a very pleasant experience to live through.

That being said, he HAS been dormant and keeping to his borders for years (decades?) without any antagonistic actions towards any of his neighbors, so I would imagine most nations regard him as lowercase evil since they have capital Evil to worry about right now in the form of Praes. It's easy to forget about the big bad villain that isn't making waves and get distracted by the ones making a big mess of things. Plus, he's successfully broken multiple crusades if I remember correctly, so the good guys aren't exactly eager to tangle with him again.

TeK

Also, why exactly Archer couldn't've beat some poor weaklings into submission prior to invasion? They had like a year, which Archer, alledgedly, spent drinking and trying to get into Masego's pants.

---

They have no truce with Papenheim, who is four months away from a pass through the Red Flower Vales and a fresh batch of reinforcements.

Dylan Tullos

TeK:

I think you just answered your own question.

Walter

She didn't get told to. Like, Archer just does what she feels like. Planning doesn't enter into it. If Cat dies she'll just wander off.

Draconius Sinister

Alright, hear me out.

Marriage alliance.

Cat has shown more than aptitude for necromancy, she has an instinctive grasp of it, grown from her days as Squire to now, Duchess of Moonless Nights/(Queen? Leader?) Of Winter. She can raise thousands at a time by herself, and they begin to develop intelligence and personalities after a while. Someone like that must be interesting to someone whose whole world is Necromancy. To have a functioning society with individuals again, rather than mindless automatons must be pretty great, and that's likely what the Dead King sees in Cat.

TeK

Not happening, Triumphant will get jealous.

Rook

Maybe the plot twist will be that she's Triumphant's soul reborn

Followed by her turning into the most brutally vicious runaway bride ever to exist

Mr. Nobody

Triumphant is busy burning things and salting the ashes in the afterlife, she can't reign her husband in right now. ^^

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Whatdoes Triumphant have to do with literally anything here?

TeK

The Death King has a boner for Dead Empress Triumphant 😊

Walter

I don't think so.

I think the Dead King is canonically obsessed with Triumphant, right? It doesn't seem like he'd be willing to pursue another.

My real reason, though, is that the Arcadia -> Calernia mirroring would point to Cat marrying someone who embodied Summer, and that's pretty much the opposite of the Dead King.

Death Knight

I think that reflection is larger than Cat. Marrying Winter and Summer would imply that Good and Evil could conceivably reconcile their differences (or forcibly unite) if the right kind of pressure could be applied.

Now I wonder though if the red orb that glowed was not because Malica contacted the Dead King, but because Catherine was crowned. Since Catherine is an orphan what are the odds she's a direct descendent of Triumphant herself?

RanVor

It has already been proven to be possible. There is an empire overseas ruled by a duo of a Hero and a Villain. And it works.

Why can't it be done in Calernia? Why?

Fuck you, that's why.

MetruX

Because Calernia is a backwash place full of people way behind in several areas that can never seem to do anything right, if compared to the Big places :V

Death Knight

I imagine that's Above's response to a Evil calling a truce.

SpeckofStardust

If the Dead king went to Cat first out of everyone, well I like he waited until after the first stage of the Crusade was dealt with, shows that he only works with people who he respects.

We almost know nothing about him after all.

---

We know that Malicia may have contacted him before the mobilization for the Crusade started, and that he may or may not be bound to his hell unless summoned.

Argentorum

Did he go to cat first though? In the epilogue of the last book we saw him getting a message from *someone*. The identity of that person remains unknown, but odds are Triumphant or Malecia already touched base, so to speak.

On top of that, has anyone commented on how saying "Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return" every time anyone so much as obliquely mentions her name is all but guaranteeing her return? Like, I get it, she's the memetic greatest evil that ever lived, but, do you really have to send her an engraved invitation?

Metrux

Well, she's the greatest IN CALERNIA... Also, not really an invitation. It rises her "legend", but doesn't give her power, neither a narrative that makes she returns. If that was the case she would be bound to come back exactly a thousand years after her first death, by the Hero that will put her down without a chance of return.

Dylan Tullos

This is insane.

The Dead King is, in Black's words, "the original abomination". He murdered his entire nation to ascend to godhood.

The worst the Crusaders can do is conquer Callow; if the Dead King gets loose, he could murder every Callowan and raise them as part of his undead army. Cat tries to choose the "lesser evil", and the Dead King is the greatest evil on the face of Calernia.

Considering his offer is a mistake. Not killing his emissary on sight was a mistake. Catherine should send a message to the First Prince immediately, letting her know that the Dead King is trying to make alliances with Evil rulers. The living need to stand against the dead, regardless of their political or religious conflicts.

The Tenth Crusade is not an existential threat to every living Callowan. The Dead King is. It would be better to surrender now than to even consider alliance with an evil that could wipe out life on the continent.

Antoninjohn

Actually the Dead King still has living subjects inside his hell with farms and everything he just doesn't have on his kingdom in creation as Good killed the ones that stayed and then destroyed the land so no life could grow

Walter

They are a zombie farm. He tolerates them because undead don't reproduce.

Yotz

They still need to be healthy, happy, well fed, and well bred. If only because quality materiel for your constructs is hard to come by. And happy slaves are complacent slaves, who can self-regulate themselves by some representative form of government where all the members of society are eligible for ruling. It's just that with age comes aptitude, and in truly meritocratic society overwhelming majority of the key positions would be held by the high-functioning living dead, while most of the menial work would be done by the y'm-bhi. Which leaves most of the living to life of "do whatever you want" with only debt to society being "Be fertile and have increase".

Dylan Tullos

Antoninjohn:

It was the Dead King who poisoned Keter's air so that nothing could live there.

Also, the Dead King murdered everyone in his kingdom to fuel the ritual that made him a god. He's essentially Akua Sahelian's role model.

---

The lich is known to keep to his borders though. The most advance he made past them was raiding the shores of Cleves and Hainaut.

I agree that they need a way to keep him in check, just by the virtue of him being a staggeringly old villain. Maybe they can use Diabolist for that, she was planning to rule all of Calernia, she may know more about him than anyone except the Tower, and his armies notably include devils and demons (not to mention he may be barred from entering Creation on his own).

Ca$hMoney

It's called "murdering the motherfucker".

---

How? He can just hole up in his hell and spam demons. He's inventive enough that no crusade actually reached his portal, and the only person who ever did is, to our knowledge, Ranger, who is out of pretty much anyone's league and also made him shore up the weaknesses she abused. "Leave him be" is the only strategy that ever worked against the Dead King so far, which means it's the one that Cat's gonna use as a default one.

Ca$hMoney

Throw the entire continent at him until he dies.

Yes yes yes. That's an extreme measure that would cost countless lives. But the entire reason why he's such a threat in the first place is because of people whining that it's too hard and dangerous. The thing is that the longer you leave a threat to fester the worse it will be to deal with down the line, and if the Dead King gets his way then that is very likely it for any life on the entire continent. It's better for the people of Calernia in the long run if they get rid of him as soon as they can no matter the cost. Every time you choose to make things easier for people in the present you risk making things harder for people in the future. The Dead King is essentially a big metaphor for climate change in this regard.

Or alternatively, have everyone put all their thinking caps on and figure out an actual way they can get the better of him. That's the entire conceit of this entire work of fiction right?

And leaving him alone isn't the strategy they chose because it's the only one that works, they do it because it's the easiest to accept and most obvious path to take. Which is right up Cat's alley I guess.

RanVor

The problem is, his armies are literally infinite. Throwing the entire continent at him would result in the entire continent dead.

Death Knight

Not just dead. Every living soldier that dies comes back as one of the dead. Remember, he also has dead heroic champions in his service, two of which the Ranger herself deemed worthy to hunt. Now if the Ranger considers you worthy to be hunted you're immediately promoted to badass second class. Defeating the Dead King through conventional means is a fools errand.

RanVor

Actually, I meant the devils, but that's also true.

TeK

>throw entire continent

They tried. Like, five times. Also, I'm really confused, how to quote here? Do BB codes work?

Yotz

I used HTML tags. blockquote works, q – so-so; i, b, u, s, a – works. Haven't tried img, afair it needs tinkering with wordpress to work properly – but someone here already embedded a clip, so...

Or you can just italicize text and denote it with an empty line to emphasize a quote, if nothing other.

Yotz

>implying works fine too, methinks.

ahd

But.

If they said to Pilgrim, "the choices are an alliance with the Crusaders or an alliance with the Dead King, because you won't leave Callow in peace as a neutral", he would instantly and with no hesitation seek out every prospect of Callow to be a neutral or an ally, and stab those prospects to death with every weapon he can reach.

The crusaders, all of them, literally cannot conceive of a world where stabbing the Black Queen is not the best and only course of action. If she abdicates, they pause briefly to burn, rape, loot and partition Callow, and then return to their obsession with stabbing Catherine Foundling.

The Callowan living are good with standing together against the dead, sure. At this point I'm not even sure Augur directly telling the First Prince to stand down the crusade because worse is incoming would get the Crusaders on board.

Ca$hMoney

Probably because she's given them no actual reasons why they shouldn't stab her, aside from her own rhetoric that is constantly undermined by the over the top violence of her actions.

If she goes ahead with this alliance... we'll they'll have every rational reason to want to go "You know what? Fuck Callow too!" and turn the country into the worlds first extra chunky blood bank.

Walter

I dunno why you think the Crusaders are unwilling to deal with Cat. I mean, they just did that two chapters ago, right? Like, there was a whole scene where everyone got together and negotiated, and they have since stuck by the treaty that got signed.

JJR

They had to be forced to the negotiating table through overwhelming force. This does not speak to an inherent willingness to negotiate. And given that the force under Papenheim is going to have the advantage in power, it's unlikely that Cat and Woe can force negotiations again.

Ca$hMoney

Noooo they didn't. The moment they caved was when Cat was bumbling around avoiding getting her ass kicked by the heroes as her army was slowly but inevitably losing. Rozala decided to cut things off because she realized that to keep fighting was to both hurt her position and kill too many people to be worth it and be a mistake in the long run.

JJR

When I said overwhelming force I was thinking about the first day when Cat dropped a lake on them. Without the casualties and change in landscape that caused it's unlikely that The Army of Callow could have gone on to force a draw.

As for who was winning. That would be The Army of Callow.

"The moment the front holding back the dead collapsed the battle was good as won, barring heroic intervention, but at the current pace that might take hours."

Naturally heroic intervention at the most desperate hour would be a given, and Juniper wouldn't have anything to stop them from swinging the outcome back to victory. But then Cat sicked the Wild Hunt on the Procean lines with specific instructions to make them collapse. And we then get a nice exchange between Cat and Saint.

““The battle is lost,” I said. “Your lines by the shore are collapsing as we speak. Even if you force me to flee, none of that changes.”

“Armies are armies,” the Saint shrugged. “Named are Named. More than one way to win a war.””

That and the crusaders were done, logistically, even if they managed to beat the army of Callow in front of them the lack of food was forcing them to the negotiating table.

Dylan Tullos

ahd:

Anyone who would even consider an alliance with the Dead King is an enemy of life and deserves to be utterly destroyed.

If Catherine allies with the Dead King, she will have proven that everything the Crusaders say is right.

ahd

You must be one of the Chosen.

“Lie down and die or you deserve to be killed.”

Dylan Tullos

ahd:

You must be one of the Damned.

“If I die, I’m taking everyone with me!”

Malevolent narcissism is not a desirable trait in leaders. If the Crusaders win, Callow will still be alive. If the Dead King wins...well, we saw what he did to his own people.

Rook

I don’t see where you’re getting ‘I’m taking everyone down with me’ from the character that just spent the entire arc trying to take as few people down as possible including the invading army trying to kill her.

She still won’t even touch the little entrance invitation he sent her and is considering having a chat with him out of desperation, she’s not rushing there to swear fealty and extend his domains to the end of the earth. Lets not be dramatic here.

ahd

If the Crusaders win, Callow will be used up.

Basically the only thing holding Cat on that throne (instead of abdicating and wandering off with the Woe to do something more fun and less risky for Callow) is the certainty that the Crusade will trample straight over the top of the looted, burnt, and *used* remains of Callow because that feels good and yields profit to the princes of Procer.

It didn't have to be that way, but Pilgrim and his crew like it that way. They *want* it that way, and as soon as they find an excuse that doesn't gut their narrative strengths, they'll try for it again. They could have gone around Callow; taken the offer of a portal and gone straight for the throat of the Dread Empress, who apparently is liking these ideas of allying with things like the Dead King and building floating fortresses full of superweapons powered by stolen souls and a cityful of blood.

They. Didn't. Accept. This. Offer.

They. Wanted. Stabbing. Cat. More. Than. Winning. The. Crusade. Promptly.

That. Is. On. Them.

You are right, malevolent narcissism is a bad thing to have in your leadership.

Apart from mouthing "Evil!" a lot, you're not really making a case for *Cat* being the narcissist.

I *could* provide chapter citations for every statement I made above, but: I'm not seeing you listening to anything other than the voices inside your head. That's as much time as I want to waste on you.

Go read something that doesn't require so much nuanced thought from you, will you? You'll be happier and so will everyone else here.

SpeckofStardust

On the other side of the coin if she could get the dead king to agree with the accords....

Well that would be interesting.

After all when was the last time the Dead king did something outside of his starting nation? Cause if he hasn't he might not want to. And thus could be reasonable to deal with. After all that we don't know of anything he did other than his ascension to godhood other than wiping out everyone that has tried to remove him (and that in one of his negotiations he asked for little kids every year).

Dylan Tullos

SpeckofStardust:

The Dead King constantly seeks to invade the northern principalities of Procer. They built a giant wall to keep out undead incursions.

He killed everyone in his country to make himself a god, and he demands children as tribute. These are not the actions of a ruler who is going to be interested in the Accords, especially since he ascended using a ritual that the Accords would specifically forbid.

JJR

What would he care for the fact that the accords would forbid the ritual he used to ascend? He already did it, promising to not do it again is no great sacrifice. And preventing another from usurping his place as Calernia's undead God King would probably be a plus.

TeK

>living need to stand against dead
No that's just racist. Vitalist?

Yotz

Clearly an irrational prejudice of some sort or other. What happened to "venerate your elders"?! Younglings thouse days... Truly, a grim and dismal times are upon us.

knockoffnikolai

There is truly a staggering amount of prejudice against the differently alive.

Death Knight

As champion of the Dead Army I take grievous offence at the predjudice displayed here. Zombies have feelings too!

Yotz

That's "grave offence", mere "grievous" is for alternatively dead.

Death Knight

I stand corrected.

SHARKS

I don't think the Dead King is as simple as his reputation leads us to believe. He became an undead god, claimed a level of hell for himself and then...nothing. He just sat there, waiting. Cat's actions have opened up the chance for *something* that he seems to have been waiting a long, long time for.

Right now, my bet is that he's another villain that intends to fuck with the whole "Good vs Evil" narrative, like Cat and Black.

Think about it. He became something as, or more powerful than any dread emperor, but then immediately turned around, attacked another evil faction and put himself out of reach of Good Heroes. Unless there's a personal vendetta involved, it's *really* hard to put together a storyline of a hero defeating a mostly passive undead king in hell. Doubly so considering the other, more aggressive threats around on the continent will take priority.

Now, Cat shows up. She manipulates, defies, and eventually breaks her own Name. The Woe, though they have been fighting heroes all this time, act *nothing* like stereotypical villains. Thief switched sides, but she's still basically acting the same as when she was a hero. Masego is a pure academic who wants to break out of the "cage" of the world. Deadhand is an administrator and a beacon of hope to his downtrodden people as their first Named. Archer, like her mentor, is straight up a neutral-aligned ass kicker.

And then there's Cat. She's busted onto the stage as a "villain" that managed to end a war as old as time between the fae, distanced herself from the Tower, and acted in the interest of her oppressed people. And now, at her most powerful point to date, she *doesn't have a name*. Even her fae powers, which are supposed to be give her even stronger ties to a predefined narrative are doing *nothing*. And those powers are *bound to her damn soul*.

All of her party go against traditional narratives and upset the whole good vs evil thing in ways the Calamities never did. If his goal is to break or sidestep the good/evil thing, Cat and the Woe are something truly unique, and would explain why the Dead King chose now of all times to make a move.

*Fuodiachloris*

Disintegrating his business card/ invite if an accredited monster unheard would also be a Very Bad Move. Nothing says "politically tone deaf and unstable young pup" more clearly.

That cat was a minimalist construct for reasons beyond getting under various scrying radars. Which do you take seriously: the embossed, colourful and busily designed leaflet of a resume with the "unique" font... or the single sheet of A4 which has all the pertinent info you're looking for on it with only hints of more being available upon request at the interview, in a clearly laid out and highly legible format with, perhaps, a dab of colour in the corner?

I also know which kind of letter format is the biggest implicit threat, too... They come in simple, brown envelopes that don't look like much unless you're aware of the importance of windowed little brown envelopes. Red ink need not necessarily apply, but certainly increases the heart rate beyond "standard brown bad news".

Metrux

You seem to forget the Dead King never invaded another country. NEVER. He came from one of the hells, which he conquered, and used his power to kill and raise the whole of a country. Then he sat tight and only did his own things, making better undeads, getting invaded by Crusades and Ranger, studying magic... Some even think he is Dread Emperor Sorcerous from Praes, and yet he never came back for the Tower...

Yes, he is an abomination and a great Evil and evil, but he is not that much of a threat, since he never treathens anyone. Besides, he's the only known guy to have defeated a Crusade, so... Isn't he the expert she needs?

Dylan Tullos

Metrux:

That is incorrect. There are entire principalities dedicated to holding back incursions from the Kingdom of the Dead, as he constantly seeks to break out of his island and invade his neighbors.

Agent J

Killing the emissaries of a great and powerful ruler did not go particulalrly well for the Kwarezm. If you think allying with the oldest evil in Calernia is a mistake, fine. It's not like you're wrong. But do be wise and don't bait the man into war with you either. That will not be pleasant.

Also, running off to go tell Mama Cordelia about the big bag man with the scary van wouldn't be an enjoyable story to read.

warriormonk19

I thought the Kingdom of the Dead was an accident. The Dead King, a great mage while he was living, failed to predict the Keter's Price for opening the hellgate. His people and kingdom paid the price for his mistake.

Allafterme

Now that would make an excellent plot twist.

TeK

And he demand tribute consisting of live children exactly why?

Rey d`Tutto

Well, Dead children can't help him re-populate Keter...

Thaumaturge

I'm almost certain Cat isn't shooting for the 'lesser' evil at this point.

She's trying to break the perpetual cycle of Callow's misuse and exploitation, eventual reclamation, and then retaking and exploitation once more. She seems to be willing to do just about everything to ensure that Callow is detached from that cycle by the time she's dead and (potentially) rotting in the dirt.

blitzxs

I wonder if the other villains like Malicia or Tyrant received a similar message? If the invitation is for Cat alone, then that is ridiculously impressive that she and she alone out of all the great villains in Calernia was invited by the Dead King.

Oshi

More like horrifically terrifying...One of the great ld evils of Calernia decided Cat is worth his time. He wants something and it ain't gonna be pretty.

Metrux

Think of the wording in his message, he basically says that Evil must stand together. I'm pretty sure he spoke to others, though I also think Praes was not invited...

Euodiachloris

I'm certain Malicia sat on hers for over two decades before finally replying. And Cat was the reason she did that.

It's not for nothing the construct was once... a cat.

TeK

Say, Black is going more or less to Salia now, ain't he? Can Cat come to Salia as well, ya know, to officially seek signatory status? And bring a little entourage with her, say an Army of Callow? Oh and look, totally a coincidence, but isn't Black besieging the same exact province? Who would've thought! Of course, should her plea be declined, it can be said, that she was pushed to side with dastardly Dlack Knight out of pure desperation. Oh my!

Oh and you can also drop a hint that Necromancer666 send you a friend invite. It will also go with the letter and spirit of Cat's diplomacy: drink this cheap wine, or get stabbed with the goblet.

Death Knight

Huh, why would the Dead King approach Catherine now, when she's at her weakest if he had planned for an Alliance? Why not a couple of months prior to her scuffle with Malanza? The Dead King likely knows that she's not militarily strong at the moment so recruiting her for her army wouldn't be the main reason. Is it merely a moment of opportunity? Offer Alliance when he knows Cat has few other options?

Could be. He could conceivably bolster Cat's forces with rank and file undead. Maybe even gift a couple of dead heroes. But thematically its doomed to fail. Such an alliance would undoubtedly be the catalyst for the forming of the ultimate 5 that the Pilgrim alluded to. The failure to grasp this point is probably a good indicator of the Dead King's unchanging nature and might be the reason why he's so powerful. He probably can't do anything other than what his Role demands which strengthens him greatly power wise but all but ensures his doom Story wise.

...what are you gonna do, Cat?

SpeckofStardust

Well a Reason why he would approach now would be if he was waiting to see if Cat was worth allying with. After all Black lovingly pointed out Cat did amazingly well in a tight spot against the crusader army.

He's and old and powerful enough evil that he could legit be doing this for shits and giggles and that Cat has proven to be 'worthy' of his interest, after all the last time he apparently showed interest in the outside world was when Triumphant was kicking around.

Or he sent this message at the start of the war and it took this long to reach her.

Mr. Nobody

Cat said it's already one month since the Battle of the Camps and the undead don't tire, nor do they need rest. I guess the Dead King saw the first "wave" of the Crusade against Catherine as a test for her to prove her worth in the alliance.

I wouldn't be surprised if even the Tyrant of Helike was invited too. Just imagine how amusing it would be a gathering of the "Big Bad Villains".

TeK

If it was really the gathering of BBV, then you'd also need Malicia, Black, Hierarch. They group up to play some Dragon Poker, but Dead King starts hitting on Malicia, and then Triumphant returns from her vacation, and starts beating Dead King with a broom, while everyone laughs and Seinfeld theme plays on background.

MetruX

Except Black is only seem as a lapdog by the big bad, and Malicia is not seen as trustworthy to anyone. Not even to Black, anymore. For Hierarch, he is not a Villain. Cue in Bard appearing to him and trying to get him to move, which means he's neutral or maybe even a Hero. So maybe we'll see somethng like free Villains and a Drow Named appearing at the meeting, but certainly not those three...

TeK

She wanted him to take a side, not be a Hero. Black is as much a lapdog to Malicia as Tyrant is to Hierarch. And trustworthiness of a Villain is an everpressing concern.

But yeah, balls to seeing them here, albeit due to different reasons.

MetruX

You might want to reconsider. The Dead King already killed two Crusades into his territory, and according to Ranger's interlude his army has only grown in power since then. Also, especially because of this high power, mundane armies mean nothing to him. It's more probable that he saw in her something interesting or that he likes in some fashion, and thus made her enough to be called. We can also see by the wording that he isn't calling her only, so this could potentially be the first time in the story of Calernia that his army marches out of his country. If you may remember, it's been noted that people gave up on attacking him, especially because he and his undead never leave the nation. Now, then, things seem to be changing, after hundreds of years...

benthelynx

It definitely has something to do with the gem from the interlude. So possibly Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return.

HorrorPls!

I'd really like to see him be a real horror. Even the parts about what Akua did weren't graphic enough to really instill the horror movie levels of creepiness the actions deserved. Whether before a deal is struck with the King of the Dead or when he's fighting with Kat I'd like to see him inflict true graphic Evil. Same thing with Warlock and his experiments, or even Black in his quest for victory through civilian heartlands. Torturing civilians for shock value to force Papenheim to turn his way for example. Basically these r all of Kat's allies, who are nominally evil. We keep being told that they are monsters, but it is never shown, they're evil actions are told in a sterile macro manner, disregarding the micro effects it has on the small people that get trampled underfoot.

JJR

The problem with that is that such gratuitous evil tends to make Heroes crawl out of the woodwork. He needs to avoid that, now more than ever.

doominator10

Welp, time to make a deal with the closest thing Creation has to a literal devil short of one brought up from the hells.

Cicero

I don't get this Cat.

Dead King is a bad choice period.

Black is a better ally, hands down.

Also a better alternative, apply for alliance with the Crusade, ride that redemption story as far as you need to before jumping off. Avoiding the Dead King seems to me like a pretty good reason to try to push that option further.

I just don't get it.

JJR

Then again, maybe if she gets a treaty with the Dead King and then petitions to join the Grand Alliance she can foist the Redemption narrative off on the lich. Like a game of hot potato but with more fatal consequences.

Probably not though, the undead have been said to be less able to change. The accumulated years behind his evil undead lich act would be hard to overcome. Redeeming all of Praes (with promises of grain for good behavior) might be an easier challenge.

---

Black doesn't have enough soldiers and isn't replying to calls, so that's way up in the air. Also, one does not simply jump off a redemption story, a refusal do become a better person is death, one way or another.

Cicero

First of all, Cat already successfully jumped off one redemption story already.

Second, of course she can survive jumping off a redemption story. As long as she times it right. Like say, right after the big bad enemy (The Tower) is assured of defeat, but before she has to compromise her own position.

And then she takes the slot of that dubiously immoral some-time ally of good who engages in small bouts of villainy, but can be called upon by the forces of good to unite against the greater evils (like the Dead King).

You know, basically the same position the Thief had back when she was a heroine.

There are quite a few stories like that. Especially if the villain/anti-hero is female.

Basically, Cat should try to become Catwoman to the Heroes Batman.

JJR

One thing Cat needs to be very aware of in regards to the Dead Kong's diplomatic envoy.

"I bear invitation from the King of the Dead, who offers safe passage to Keter."

She is only offered safe passage TO Keter, not TO AND FROM Keter. A very important distinction, one that means if she does respond to it she might have to chew through her tongue again to avoid getting on the Dead King's bad side. That or fight her way out of an entire nation of undead.

Dantalian

Kinda obvious seeing who she's going to negotiate with. ^^

You don't go to an evil nation like the Kingdom the Dead expecting to disagree with their ruler and coming back unscathed.

It should also be noted that the way it was phrased the invitation placed Keter in quite a vulnerable position if the Dead King is also including himself when saying "In the face of Above's wrath, the champions of Below must either face demise alone or overturn the wheel of fate in coming striving". It shows he's at least a little desperate, saying that doom is certain and all that stuff.

Fern

all hail the dead kong

you may invade procer

once

MetruX

Well, shouldn't this only be expected when visiting another Villain? I mean, think of Praes poison wine, and of the Tyrant dealing with the Calamities... You must always wait for a try on your life 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"Dead Kong"

Like this? <http://zombieportraits.com/zombie-art-donkey-kong-zombie/>

TeK

Anyway, Cat seem to have already once established parenting relationship with a big E Villain, may be Dead king would be kinda like a grandpa.

1queenofblades1

I have a theory. This is an extract from the very first quote of the Guide, in the Prologue, said to be from the first page of the Book of All Things:

"In their infinite wisdom they brought into existence Creation, but with Creation came discord. The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made.

So, we are told, were born Good and Evil."

Now I'm sure most people will believe that the ones that think their children should be guided to greater things are the Gods Above.

But while re-reading my favorite parts of the Guide, I came to realize that it's the Gods Above that demand absolute obedience. The Choirs are all based around stripping mortals of their free will. They set down rules and demand absolute obedience and blind faith and give nothing in return. (Realized this in Cat's conversation with the sister in the House of Light). Meanwhile, the Gods Below are never seen, and while they do help, they're very hands-off and provide the tools but not the means to win, unlike the Gods Above which results in Good always winning in the long term. So, what if, what the story thinks of as 'Good' actually represent the Gods that believe they must rule over the creatures they made in Creation, while Gods Below are the ones that think their children must be guided to greater things? I don't know how this would tie in with Cat's role in the story if true, but it's an intriguing theory and I haven't seen anyone else put it forward in the comments.

Havak

This literally just made me stare blankly at my ceiling for a good 20 minutes.

RanVor

I think most people have come to this conclusion ages ago.

TeK

I don't mean no disrespect, but maybe you didn't see this theory cause it was already on everyones mind and so nobody thought to put it forward? It was my understanding as far as book 2, that the whole dispute between Above and Below, was pretty much “give fish” vs “teach how to fish”, also, the idea of teaching how to fish to Gods Below includes dropping you in the middle of the ocean, and then throwing at you, in that exact order, a net, a spear, and a boat.

Euodiachloris

Also a heavy duty shock rod: supply own batteries, no instruction manual, implicit backlash if you use it incorrectly in salt water.

MetruX

I actually have... Since the last book, though I thought of it since the beginning of the second one... I wouldn't remember in what chapter I put it down, but if you would look for a while you can probably find it. It tends to have lot's of comments each chapter, so... Maybe use ctrl+f? Also, yes, the theory is very sound, nothing seems to be against it.

Author Unknown

The Dead King definitely wants him some of those blue-eyed undead that aren't vulnerable to holy magic.

Fern

Oh jeez, I was not expecting this one

I think I'm going to really love the next few chapters. The Dead King and the Elves have been the two important unknowns so far in the story. The Elves are irrelevant, now that we know that whatever coming story will be too strong to handle. That it's about to involve the Dead King means that it must be big enough to threaten his position (which is fucking /fascinating/, by the way. That's canon confirmation that what we're building up to is going to be a Triumphant-scale shitshow as far as The Story is concerned).

The Dead King is nooooooot a good ally to have though. An alliance would mean a bonfire level of attention being put on Cat, though she might be powerful enough at that point to whether it. It's worth keeping in mind, however, that said situation is definitely just going to lead to a big counterattack by the heavens, and they definitely won't be pulling punches. Breaking the game means allying with Good polities, not eliminating them in the short term.

MetruX

Actually, do they have more to throw her way? I mean, whatever they didn't throw with the Crusade already is probably tied down somewhere else or not really going to do a difference... She already has a Crusade, and allying with him won't paint a heavenly target for fate to destroy her, in the same way Bonfire would've, so from the narrative it's not bad. I absolutely think the Dead King will try to betray her at some point, but that is only to be expected from Villains.

Someguy

I don't think the heroes will treat her as an A-level threat if she allies with the Dead King, they'd probably downgrade her threat level due to expecting a set up for "Evil turns on Evil". Dealing with potential fallout would be Hasenbach's problem while they pile on useless platitudes.

RanVor

The alliance with the Dead King would fundamentally fuck up everything Cat strives to achieve, but the time is running short and there aren't any other real options present (save for Black, but he has a plan and Cat knows better than to fuck it up). Well played, Pricks Below.

Although I'd be highly amused if he turned out to be into the Accords.

Antony444

Well the big bad is finally coming out of the shadows...that promises to be interesting, all right.

Even saving Black and his entire army wouldn't solve anything given the ugly situation right now. If the Legions of Terror join forces with the Army of Callow after being reinforced, they should have 40 000 soldiers. Papenheim will be able to throw the double of that, the Vales defensive position are gone and he will still have an army or two of 30 000+ to throw at them. Plus the Army of the Stairwell is still withdrawing.

It is abhorrent yes, but the Dead King is the last option left right now IF his conditions are somewhat acceptable. It is the only villain after all to routinely defeat heroes and Crusades. The air above Keter kingdom is so poisoned no non-Named can attack it with any chance of victory.

The question is who else has been 'invited'. There are not many villains in Calernia deserving the 'honour':

Dread Empress Malicia

the Black Knight Amadeus

The Tyrant of Helike

Cat

maybe the Priestess of the Night?

When you think the Heavens have launched over twenty heroes at their throats and had also the power to send 'adventurers' in Callow, they are quite massively outnumbered... The 'Grand Alliance of Evil' imagined by Hasenbach may come (or not) into existence in the enxt chapters...

TeK

1. The Legions of Terror proved to be able to pull a win over thrice their number. 40k is nothing to sneer at.
2. While defenses of Vales are gone, it still leaves a narrow passage of Stairway (which they will fortify, and which protected by Deoraithe anyway) and whatever pass Papenheim would manage to dig up. Which won't be exactly enough to pour the whole host at once and use their advantage in numbers.
3. And whether he will manage to dig up anything is up to debate, because some Amadeus fellow is of opinion that some Wekesa fellow wouldn't let them.
4. While Crusaders dig themselves a pass, a Marchford tribe and sappers (Sacker is on the Callow side of Vales, 'member?) can fortify it pretty decently.
5. Cat can drop a lake on to the Vales.
6. Vales are not the only fortification Callow has.

MetruX

You really don't know war, do you? They needed BOTH the narrow valley and the fortifications to pull what they did, while dividind the enemy in two and not fighting the whole of the army. And with all of that, they had similar losses to the enemy, with a narrative win. So no, without the advantages of before, facing bigger numbers they can't win.

1. Already explained above.
2. They won't use the stairway, and they don't need to, since the "small pass" you seem to think they'll make is not someplace Cat can just camp her army and wait to defend. It's the end of the mountains, alot more open and easier to traverse than the high pass at the Valley, so if she stays close, it's actually a open terrain battle, the worst againt bigger numbers.
3. It was explicitly noted that he shouldn't let THE WITCH help with that, he won't interfere with mortal diggers.
4. No they can't, it's not a place with natural resources already being exploited, neither places with enough resources nearby, much less something they can build in two months.

Because until the materials start trickling by and the necessary people get there, a lot of time would've passed. And we don't even know if it would really be a defensible place, since it's the end of the mountains, and not the high pass, as stated above.

5. She's been stopped by heroes while doing that before, and this time they'll have even more heroes. Not a viable plan in any measure or way.

6. Yes, they're not. And this point goes against everything else you said, except for 1 in part, so it's actually strange you pointing that out. But, we must also remember, half those fortifications have been destroyed and never rebuilt, while the others are mostly not enough to stop a true army, with the exception of the border with Praes and the Duchess that is already defending the stairway. None of those defences will make much of a difference to a true army with war engines and Named.

Dylan Tullos

Antony444:

The Dead King is not an option at all.

Catherine would be better off following the Redeemed Villain story, dying, and restoring the status quo that existed before Black conquered Callow. She would be better off fighting Pappenheim, dying, and having Callow overrun by Crusaders. Anything would be preferable to working with the "original abomination".

The Dead King defeated a Crusade by turning Keter's air into poison gas. Even if he sincerely intends to ally with Cat, which I don't believe for a second, he would "help" by turning Callow into a barren wasteland filled with the living dead.

A "Grand Alliance of Evil" would include Tyrant, who is absurdly enthusiastic about Classic Evil backstabbing, the Chain of Hunger, who just want to eat everyone, and the drow, who are an entire society of people who behave like Classic Villains all the time.

If they actually got together in one place, the Crusade wouldn't be necessary, because they would wipe each other out.

Evgeny Permyakov

>"You know, killing the people in charge until someone willing to listen gets promoted," she said. "The Tenets of Night are all about stabbing to get on top, you'd blend right in."

The fact that Cat only sighed to that is worrying me. Because, you know, it might be true.

mavant

Ask the Hierarch for help setting up Callowan instances of the institutions required for democracy. Commit to holding elections for your replacement as soon as possible, and no later than $X years. He'd be all over it, and it meshes well with the general "build institutions that don't rely on personal charisma of their leaders" thing that Black and Malicia have been pushing for so long, as well as giving Callow a chance to pull out of the constant battle between above and below.

Also, Cat's ability to make credible precommitments – and maybe to extract them? – as the bearer of a fae mantle seems underutilized. Much of diplomacy could be radically simplified by making promises unbreakable.

Jane

Um. Have you seen Ballerephon's institutions before?... I don't think anyone else generally considers them a good idea...

Also, I don't think they can reasonably scale up to a country-sized government. If nothing else, there are too many lots to draw, and the psychic police will have a devil of a time keeping an eye on all the scattered farmers.

frolamiz

Thanks for the chapter!

I am surprised that no one has commented about the possibility of the Dead King being interested in Akua. Even if she is only a soul, it would not be a problem for her to come back if freed, much less with the help of the Dead King.

Her superweapon is basically an improvement of his work with the greater breach, and even Warlock was marveling at it. It would not surprise me that the Dead King would want her or be at least interested in her.

And he probably didn't approach Cat before because he knew she would not want to treat with him unless totally desperate.

Of course, I doubt he only approached for that reason, there is probably more, but it's still interesting to know, because what better chances Akua will ever have to escape Cat control?

limlimrevolution

I think that the Akua angle is definitely something to consider. Mass necromancy on that scale is not exactly common and impressing Warlock definitely shows that this is something worth Akua putting on her resume. Maybe the Dead King is hiring.

He also probably realizes that Cat has every incentive to ignore his invitation and would only do so if she had no other choice. This is really perfect timing for this overture.

Jane

You know who this invitation really messes over? Amadis. Now on top of being broken and humiliated on the field, it makes it seem as though they were tricked into withdrawing on top of it all. "We lost a terrible number of soldiers for no good reason, but... At least we got Callow to seek admission to the Grand Alliance! ... Wait, what do you mean she announced a formal treaty with Keter yesterday? ...Wait, since when does Keter do alliances!?". In a different sort of story, this sort of accidental casual abuse leads to a previously minor figure becoming the mastermind behind some grand plan to seek revenge on the main character...

Incidentally, this also means that the only real prayer Amadis has of retaining any face is to quietly sabotage the Crusade. If it fails decisively, then his own failure was just to be expected, instead of making him look like a massive fool – it was all the First Prince's fault for putting them in a hopeless situation. Of course, if the Dead King is involved, then he can't sabotage the Crusade without, you know. Potentially dooming all life on the continent, worst case scenario. Aren't you glad you're not Amadis right now?

On a different note... I wonder what Cat's stance on expansion will be? She's never really fought for anything but the independence (quasi or otherwise) of Callow before, but now that she has it (more or less)... Well, let's say that Procer are huge jerks about this; not only do they continue the Crusade against her after this new threat is tossed in, but they view her as the weak link and throw everything they have (plus anything they can scrounge up in desperation) at her so that they can take her out of the war as quickly as possible. Miraculously, she wins, Procer lies broken, and the Crusade disbands with a bit of an embarrassed scent around it all.

Does Cat demand anything but peace (and maybe reparations) at the negotiating table? Procer will have demonstrated itself as an implacable enemy who will surely start a new war in a few years or decades, and this would be a golden opportunity to break their power once and for all – and the people of Callow certainly wouldn't mind reversing their positions for once. After a hard-fought war, they might even grumble if Cat didn't demand territorial concessions.

Of course, occupations are a headache. It would take a lot of Legions to keep the peace, periodic Hero pruning, and a heck of a lot of organization – all things that Callow are still dealing with themselves. All to trade one ancient enemy (plus, you know, all the material gains) for a set of new enemies; even if most of the rest of the world were to turn a blind eye to an Evil kingdom taking Procer (not a given), at the very least she'd have to worry about the new countries on her border. Of course, complete annexation isn't the only possibility either; she could just take a few juicy Principalities that she thinks she has the resources to manage, and trust that leaves the rest of the country weakened enough that they'll be less of a danger.

And, of course, it's not as though she'll only be the only country at the table. What, if anything, would the Dead King (and any other allies he adds) demand? Surely they're not doing this out of the goodness of their heart; does their possible demands change anything in her eyes?

Throughout the course of the Guide, Cat's always been enough of an underdog that just surviving the trials before her has been an unexpected victory. Sure, she's gotten a perk or two along the way, but simple survival has generally been the aim. If she has the Dead King's backing in this war, however, that gives her the option of demanding more; does that hold any appeal for her?

Apropos of nothing, I wonder what Vivienne's opinion on working with the Dead King will be. Normally, I'd think this a "I'm breaking up with you if you even think about doing this" type of thing, given her possession of a moral compass, but she seems surprisingly calm about the topic so far, despite the conversation obviously going in a "We don't have any other options" direction.

I'd also wonder if the proposal might be worth calling on Akua's insight, but, well. I don't think her presence at a council meeting would be appreciated...

Dylan Tullos

Jane:

Expansion is impossible. Procer couldn't occupy Callow, and it's much bigger than Callow. Why would Callow have any more luck occupying a larger country?

As you point out, the Dead King is a threat to all life on the continent. If Catherine breaks Procer completely, the Kingdom of the Dead and the Chain of Hunger will be able to escape. The consequences will be apocalyptic.

RanVor

The Dead King has always had the resources and manpower to effortlessly steamroll the entire continent, and yet he never tried. I doubt leaving him unchecked for a time being would be as disastrous as you believe. The Chain of Hunger would be a problem, though.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

I agree that something weird is going on with the Dead King, something that prevents him from just overrunning everyone. But there's a reason his neighbors built a giant wall and turned their nations into an armed camp; even if he's somehow prevented from bringing all of his resources, he's definitely a threat.

The only limit to the Chain of Hunger's growth appears to be food. As long as they're stuck in the far north, with little access to resources, they'll eat each other and made poorly organized attacks on heavily fortified principalities.

If they get out into rich, undefended lands, they'll finally have the food they need to increase their numbers. That would get bad fast, and it would be next to impossible to get rid of them once they get out of their current trap.

RanVor

Has anyone ever wondered if the reason the ratlings are so barbaric and aggressive is that they are forced to turn to cannibalism just to survive?

Euodiachloris

Something tells me that that has never been his actual goal. Though, I'm not sure how he wants to change either the board or the game Calernia has been stuck playing for millennia.

Jane

Callow occupying Procer would normally be impossible, but if Procer is devastated following the war, while Callow only suffers limited losses... Well, I still wouldn't give them good odds, but it wouldn't be impossible. It's not hard to keep rebels down, so long as you can stop them from arming and organizing – if Thief's spies are good enough, then all Catherine needs to do is maintain enough of a Legion presence to be visible, and keep domestic affairs in the “we want to rebuild after these horrors, and we're not being too oppressed” range until she can properly rebuild the military. Procer would need to be fairly well broken for it to even be conceivable, though, I agree; the sheer population disparity is a huge problem, and historically speaking, tends to end strangely at best, terribly at worst.

That said, claiming several principalities or partitioning the country between herself and another of Procer's neighbors is another matter; integrating a couple of juicy principalities wouldn't represent nearly as much of a strain on Callow's resources, and if it can tilt the balance of power in Callow's favor, there's a good strategic argument to be made that the added short-term difficulty would end a long-term threat to Callow's independence – as well as end their dependence on the Tower for their security.

That said, I'm less interested in the viability of such a scenario than what Catherine's response would be. Let's say a wizard gave her a magic wand that made occupation effortless; would she take the opportunity, be it for Callow or herself, or would she decide that anything past Callow's traditional borders is none of her concern? I could see arguments either way.

Jane

Ah, and as regards the dangers that Procer keeps in check... The Chain of Hunger, certainly, though it sounds like it's mostly one principality keeping them in check – surely something could be done until a long-term solution could be put in place. It doesn't sound like they're much of a danger until an opening let's them start snowballing.

The Kingdom of the Dead, on the other hand... Honestly, it doesn't sound like they're doing anything to keep them in check at all. It's pretty much the Dead King slouching upon his throne, and waiting for something to happen. It's not that Procer's some terrible barrier to him, so much as he's not actually trying to do anything – yet.

Besides, if this alliance goes through, nobody betrays anyone, and Catherine doesn't manipulate the situation to destroy both... The Kingdom of the Dead is free anyway. Catherine's occupation policy doesn't matter in any scenario where Procer's army is broken enough for her to claim territory. If anything, being an "ally" of the Kingdom of the Dead might make any place taken under her protection safer.

Agent J

If Cat goes a-conquering, I'd much rather see her take the Golden Bloom. Cuz fuck racist elves and I love Kegan. The Deoarithe would be ecstatic about getting their stolen home back and Cat would have a vassal with unshakeable loyalty. The forest itself doesn't like the elves which is why their likely low fertility rate was shot to zero when they stole it. It would be far less likely that any of the other Good nations would march out to defend the elves unlike Procer. That it's stolen land to begin with, and from Callowans no less (though they weren't Callowan when it was taken) would keep the narrative weight from stacking too heavily in Good's favour. It would be far easier to hold (and populate) the Golden Bloom than Procer.

Besides, it is also easier for Praes to hold Callow than for Callow to hold Procer, yet even still Black and Malicia had a hard time of it. Constantly keeping watch not just for heroes but for circumstances in which heroes arise, funding the continuation of a massive civil war in a neighbouring country so that said country doesn't rally to the conquered's aid (thereby created their most dangerous and difficult opponent to date). It was actually Cat that made holding Callow long term feasible. She who warred with her Good counterpart for the soul of her nation and won (much to Pilgrim's chagrin). It's the reason why the only heroes trying to kill her are foreigners instead of Callowan born. She would have to do much the same things Black did but by an order of magnitude just to hold Procer half as long, and then miraculously find a Proceran Cat to take under her wing so her gains actually stick in a world divinely ordained to maintain the status quo.

Yea... it's a monumental task under the best of circumstances. Better to solidify her gains, properly integrate both Callow and Praes into a unified neutral nation, and if the mood to conquer strikes then strike northward rather than west.

jonnnney

Wroth means angry or wrathful, it is an adjective not a noun. "The Above's wroth." is a sentence that makes zero sense. You can possess anger or wrath, you can't possess angry or wrathful.

CaptainSemantics

I've been thinking about the long term effects of Callow being ruled by the embodiment of Fae Winter. Specifically, I remembered how in Arcadia the entire population is essentially bound to narratives. I wonder if something similar could happen to Callow due to Cat ruling and shaping it.

Of course it wouldn't be exactly like Arcadia. It's still part of Creation obviously. Moreover, we've seen how Cat and Winter are integrating. Cat's becoming more Winter, but Winter is potentially also being influenced by Cat. At any rate, I imagine that this could lead to a Callow in which there's a broad increase in the power of Narrative, but that the people of Callow also learn how to USE the Narrative to their own advantage. So in a generation or two we get a wave of Callowan Names who revolutionize how that game is played.

(Of course all that is assuming a world in which Cat is somehow able and willing to remain in charge of Callow indefinitely.)

Agent J

If Cat goes a-conquering, I'd much rather see her take the Golden Bloom. Cuz fuck racist elves and I love Kegan. The Deoarithe would be ecstatic about getting their stolen home back and Cat would have a vassal with unshakeable loyalty. The forest itself doesn't like the elves which is why their likely low fertility rate was shot to zero when they stole it. It would be far less likely that any of the other Good nations would march out to defend the elves unlike Procer. That it's stolen land to begin with, and from Callowans no less (though they weren't Callowan when it was taken) would keep the narrative weight from stacking too heavily in Good's favour. It would be far easier to hold (and populate) the Golden Bloom than Procer.

Besides, it is also easier for Praes to hold Callow than for Callow to hold Procer, yet even still Black and Malicia had a hard time of it. Constantly keeping watch not just for heroes but for circumstances in which heroes arise, funding the continuation of a massive civil war in a neighbouring country so that said country doesn't rally to the conquered's aid (thereby created their most dangerous and difficult opponent to date). It was actually Cat that made holding Callow long term feasible. She who warred with her Good counterpart for the soul of her nation and won (much to Pilgrim's chagrin). It's the reason why the only heroes trying to kill her are foreigners instead of Callowan born. She would have to do much the same things Black did but by an order of magnitude just to hold Procer half as long, and then miraculously find a Proceran Cat to take under her wing so her gains actually stick in a world divinely ordained to maintain the status quo.

Yea... it's a monumental task under the best of circumstances. Better to solidify her gains, properly integrate both Callow and Praes into a unified neutral nation, and if the mood to conquer strikes then strike northward rather than west.

Agent J

Oh, would you look at that. No delete button. Peachy.

sengachi

<https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>

Hey if you can you should go support errata on Patreon. He writes a *ton* for us, and the Guide is just an amazing story, but he doesn't make all that much on Patreon for all the work he does. Voting to help get the story more exposure is a nice gesture, but seriously, if you can, go donate. The Guide is an amazing, amazing story and the least we can do is help take care of errata for gifting it to us.

CaptainSemantics

Hmm just had a thought. Since Cat is currently in Name-limbo, I wonder if she could potentially snatch up the Name of Dead Queen. After all, she's always been found of her necromantic tricks, and she's arguably not particularly alive anymore herself...

Letouriste

What about the dwarfs?

Also, an alliance with the dead king should be problematic for cat plans, no? I don't get it...

CaptainSemantics

Darn I keep thinking of more things to comment on. Anyway, it took me a while to realize that the chapter title is a reference to Chapter 2: Invitation, all the way back in Book 1. In which Black explains some of the complexities of ruling a conquered territory, and then invites Cat to come along to Mazus' banquet. Where she ends up on the path to becoming Squire.

I wonder if there are parallels to be drawn beyond the title. Is the Dead King acting like Black here, as a terrifying mentor figure ushering Cat into new levels of villainy/a new Role? Or is he going to end up like Mazus, the party's host that ended up summarily killed?

Come to think of it, the Arcadia story arc back in Book 3 is actually quite similar. It was all a machination on the part of the Winter King to entice Cat into Arcadia and go to that party where she had to challenge the Fae Duke to a duel and kill him. So that the King could in turn make Cat part of his Court, setting her on a new path as a Villain, transitioning away from being Squire and towards being Black Queen and embodiment of Winter.

Tldr: parties are how important to Cat's character shifts

Cthulhu

I am in the camp that thinks Cat is insane not to hook up with Black and go on the offensive.

She has six months of cover before her homeland can get invaded. SIX MONTHS. She can use her Arcadia connection and launch attacks on her enemy and bleed the enemy white while suffering no losses.

Begin by seizing something dear to the enemy and then he will be amenable to your will. Cat wants to forestall the invasion? Strike at the enemy's heartland and use this to stop the invasion.

Cthulhu

This is how Scipio ended the Punic war.

Forrest

That also sounds much like Bonfire, which has already been established to be a terrible idea. Gating in and attacking key strategic locations and gating out before they can retaliate repeatedly, in this setting, draws in heroes heaven designed to kill you.

Aehriman

I'm still rather interested in the Lance of Light. Apparently, you can get, or make your own famed nickname, a Name posthumously. That's very interesting. Both because people can become so famous as to create a new Name for themselves which is passed on, and because Queen of Blades may not be entirely off the table.

Known Callowan Names:

- * The Good King/Queen- (well, that ain't Cat)
- * The Wizard of the West
- * The Rebel Princess- Callow has been occupied and reclaimed by a hidden heir before, Black killed off the latest version.
- * The Lance of Light- a knight par excellence.

I suspect Thief and Lone Swordsman are too generic to be Callowan-specific. But these names do give a little more glimpse into the history of Callow, their old champions and the stories they told about themselves.

mrevildoom

I absolutely love this web serial, Erraticerrata, and I've been voting for it every week, along with pimping it to my circle of friends. Can I suggest that you put the previous/next chapter links at the top of the story as well as the bottom? I mostly read it on mobile, and that would help me navigatr through chapters much faster when I'm trying to find my place.

MagicDusty

N0000000000 I've reached the end... now i have to wait like everyone else...
Truly, the world is cruel.

Scholar of Time

I read the entire series this week.

More.

---

Chapter 25: Edge

"My dear Betrayer, I resent this accusation of selling you out to the heroes. No coin changed hands, it was really more of a bartering."

– Dread Emperor Traitorous

"I shouldn't need to bring up the grave consequences that would of dealing with that entity in any way," Vivienne noted calmly.

Maybe a little too calmly, I thought. She wasn't angry – I'd learned to read that in her – but she was... weary, maybe. Like she was seeing the same lay of the land I did, and was horrified at what might come of it.

"Heh," Indrani said. "Grave consequences. You know, because he's the Dead –"

"Masego," I interrupted. "Would you please smack her?"

"Do I get to pick where?" Archer leered.

There was a pause.

"No," Hierophant replied pensively, and tried to slap the back of her head.

He ended up caught in a wristlock instead, and the two of them toppled to the floor when he called on sorcery to try to toss her away. The two of them fell wriggling as Indrani tried to get on top – no surprise there, I mused – and the council was forced off the road until Hakram rose to his feet, grabbed a water pitcher with a sigh and upended it on them both. Archer yelped, Masego looked peeved and I turned the droplets freezing cold out of petty spite.

"Back in your seats," I ordered.

I looked away even as Masego evaporated the water on his robes, pretending deafness when Archer asked him to to the same for her. Juniper growled, which got both their attentions. Both of you could kill her with barely any effort, I thought amusedly. But all she needs to do is growl a bit, and you straighten your backs.

"Militarily speaking, cooperation with the Kingdom of the Dead would be both boon and threat," the Hellhound said. "Its armies have been strong enough to weather five crusades: there's no way the Proceran borders can hold if he comes out in force."

"Which would leave us with a fresh liability," Hakram said calmly, seated again. "Namely, that the Dead King would be out in force."

"Forget armies," Thief said flatly. "If it becomes known we struck a pact with the Hidden Horror there is not a nation on Calernia that will be willing to treat with us. The cost of that absurdly dangerous alliance would be that we are made pariahs forevermore. I cannot stress this enough: even the summoning of demons would go over better. The only person to have ever struck alliance with the Dead King was Dread Empress Triumphant at the peak of her power. That will be the precedent everyone sees us through, from that point on."

"We're already fucking pariahs, Thief," Juniper grunted. "I won't pretend working with the Horror would be pastries and flower crowns, but let's be honest: what would we actually lose?"

"Any semblance of legitimacy, for one," Vivienne hissed.

"I do not speak in endorsement," Hakram said mildly, cutting through before it could escalate. "But Juniper is not incorrect. We are in varying states of hostility with the Empire, the Principate, the Dominion and the Thalassocracy. The League has already refused to negotiate with us, twice. It may be that situation will change in the future, but it has not yet. As it stands the costs of this decision would not be a direct loss, only the denial of possible change."

"Eh, no need to trumpet it around anyway. We could just be secret allies," Archer said. "Doesn't the old guard love that kind of stuff? He'd probably go for it."

I sipped at my aragh, leaning back into my chair. Indrani wasn't wrong.

"There's more than a few steps between alignment – however temporary – and alliance," I finally said. "Ideally, we would use the King as a distraction with full deniability. I don't think anyone in this room wants him to actually win in any measurable manner. If he can launch a failed invasion that takes the pressure off Callow, though, that might be a notion worth entertaining."

"If the dead cross the lakes into northern Procer, it will be butchery," Vivienne said coldly. "Hannoven might be able to resist, heavily fortified as it is, but Cleves and Hainaut? They'll break, Catherine. You know this. Hundreds of thousands murdered and made into abominations. Akua's Folly, forged anew half a dozen times."

"It would be," I said slowly. "If they were taken by surprise."

There was a long moment of silence in the room.

"Are you proposing," Juniper gravelled, "that we double-cross the Dead King?"

"I mean," I hedged, "I wouldn't put it exactly like that."

"That means yes," Masego helpfully informed Archer in a whisper. "It's the Callowan uprising. She doesn't like to admit to betrayal."

The Hellhound opened her mouth then closed it, licking her lips. Solemnly, she reached for the bottle of aragh and poured until her cup was nearly overflowing.

"If you would elaborate, please," Thief said quietly.

"So we have a nice chat with Trismegistus," I said. "Shake hands, kiss his dead babies – let's not kid ourselves, he's bound to have a few of those – and plan an offensive. We leak the plan to Procer at least a month ahead, enough time so they can evacuate everything. We time it correctly and Malanza's army will be in a position to march north to fight a delaying action until the rest of the crusaders can reinforce her."

Juniper choked on her drink.

"Hasenbach would have to send most her armies to hold the north," Hakram said quietly. "And suddenly we gain a great deal of leverage. The Army of Callow could easily strike her back and collapse her supply lines. Or, if she makes peace with us, ferry her armies through Arcadia before either Cleves or Hainaut is entirely overrun."

"There would still be a great many deaths," Vivienne said, but she was hesitating.

"No civilians, though," I said. "Soldiers. Loss of property as well, but I'm less than sympathetic to the monetary plight of princes trying to invade my homeland. We can limit the terms of engagement for the Dead King as part of our deal."

"That will no longer hold the moment we betray him," Thief reminded me.

"We can delay that until Procer's in a position to give a good fight," I said.

"It should be remembered," Hakram said. "That if it ever comes out we were involved in the matter, we'll be discarding every scrap of goodwill we have so far accumulated through our restraint."

"We'll deny it. Not like they'll have proof, so it'll be the Hidden Horror's word against ours if he even bothers to say anything. And, to be blunt, Juniper's not wrong. Goodwill hasn't cut it so far," I admitted. "And I think we could get a lot of it back by throwing in with the crusade against the Kingdom of the Dead, even if it comes to that. If it takes leverage to get things done, Hakram, I'm willing to go that far."

"I don't like it," Vivienne said. "This... scheme is not as bad as I first thought it would be, but playing with fire doesn't do the danger of it justice."

"Neither do I," I said. "And I think we can all agree this is a last ditch plan, not the first arrow out of the quiver. I'd much rather cut a deal with Hasenbach herself or the Pilgrim if I can, and I intend to try that as soon as this council is done. But if they're not game, then I think we have to seriously consider this."

I met her eyes unflinchingly, and saw the war taking place behind them. Between the patriot and the decent woman. Better than anyone else in this room, she knew how dangerous the army standing on the other side of the Vales would be to Callow. Thief had always been lukewarm about making treaties with Procer, reminding me there was a reason Red The Flowers was a popular song in the country to this day. On the other hand, she was not a killer. She had killed, to be sure, and arranged the death of others. But it was not in her nature, and unlike me she'd never grown used to it. Making common cause with something like the Dead King, no matter how false the premises, ran against the grain for her. There was a reason it was to her I'd handed the means to kill me. Of all the Woe, she was the only one I could trust to pull the trigger if it came down to it. Her moral compass wasn't exactly pristine. I knew that. She was, after all, a thief. And capable of dark things to keep Callow whole. But she'd yet to lose that spark of decency that none of my other friends could truly claim to have. Not even Hakram, for all that I loved him more than any other. The moment passed, and I did not need to wait to know which part of her had won. The repugnance on her face made it clear enough.

"Before this plan is seriously entertained, there is a great deal to address," Thief said.

Your people becoming warped by your presence, the Grey Pilgrim had said. Old traits grown more vicious and acute. Was I slowly breaking down my own contingency? I shivered in a way that had nothing to do with cold.

"Agreed," Hakram said. "Namely, why the invitation at all?"

Juniper set down her cup and it rang empty against the table. She wiped her mouth.

"That's had me wondering," the Hellhound said. "It doesn't seem like he'd need us, at first glance. Out of all his possible allies the gates make us arguably the most immediately useful for an offensive in Procer, but our strategic value is limited."

I glanced at the two bickerers in the back, since this part of the conversation was exactly why they were here. Masego as our expert in all things arcane, one who'd had access to Tower archives to boot, and Archer as the pupil of one of the few people who was known to have entered the Kingdom of the Dead and returned.

"I can tell you a few things about how Keter is run, and the lay of the city," Indrani said. "But not much more than that. The Lady speaks fondly of him, but that's not surprising – he's probably one of the few entities kicking around she can't kill."

Less than useful. I glanced at Hierophant, who was frowning.

"The only precedent I can think of for the Dead King making alliance is Dread Empress Triumphant," he said. "He was not her equal, but neither was he her vassal. During none of the crusades directed at his realm did he seek Praesi assistance."

"He's launched offensives into Procer before," Juniper said. "We have records of the battles. But they always seemed more like large-scale raids to me. Cities were sacked more to grab people than to grab territory, and I can't recall an instance he went deeper south than northern Brabant."

"Three Hundred Years Against the Dark, Amalia Holtzen," Hakram murmured. "I have read the volumes as well, and always found the mentions of his presence with the armies to be somewhat dubious. Nowhere as powerful as a necromancer of his purported strength should be. Chronicles are the crusades are hard to get by, for us, but in those he's said to have fought heroes. There can be no comparison between the power displayed there and in Holtzen's volumes."

"He can raise Named with some of their power still attached," Archer said suddenly. "The Lady's fought a few."

I blinked at Indrani. Was she implying that Ranger took walks into a poisonous undead-infested wasteland just so she could scrap with – I forced myself not to think about that too deeply. Ranger was fucking insane, trying to figure her out would lead me nowhere.

"You're implying he hasn't led his armies in person since Triumphant," I said, eyeing the others.

"Father has long suspected he cannot easily leave the Hell he rules," Masego noted. "Though the scarcity of solid information on the entity prevents this from being proper theory. The Tower has suppressed most writings ascribed to Trismesgitus since Dread Emperor Revenant was overthrown."

His brow creased, after that, but he said nothing.

"Hierophant?" I pressed.

"It would-" he began, then stopped and sighed. "There have been always been rumours of some High Lords having records of the Secret Wars that Dread Empress Maleficent the Second never managed to erase."

"The what?" Indrani said, leaning forward.

"Bunch of Emperors tried to invade the Dead King's personal hellscape through hell," I told her. "Malicia mentioned them to me once. It went about as well as you'd expect. Maleficent the Second loosed a bunch of demons to erase the whole mess, since it was bad enough Ater itself was about to be invaded."

"That would have been..." Thief said slowly. "Well, I doubt there's a word harsh enough for it."

"Yeah, there's a reason Imperial histories aren't bedside reading," I said. "Unless you enjoy vivid nightmares, anyway. I think I get what you're trying to avoid saying, Masego. If any Praesi city has those records, it'll be Wolof."

The dark-skinned mage inclined his head in agreement.

"It has always been the heart of sorcery in the Wasteland," he said.

I thumbed the collar of my cloak. Where the soul of the former heiress to Wolof was currently kept in captivity.

"Diabolist might know more, then," I sighed.

"She doesn't deserve to get out again," Vivienne said darkly.

"It' be a simpler world," I said, "if people always got what they deserved."

I breathed out slowly.

"I grant you leash," I said. "I grant you eyes and ears, tongue and feet, at my sufferance."

Akua Sahelian made her entrance with the languid grace of a cat at play. My eyes narrowed immediately. There should have been hole in her chest where I'd ripped out her heart with my bare hands, but she stood intact before me. More than that. No dress of red and gold clung to her form: she wore instead a long gown of trailing darkness, jewels of pure frost glittering around her neck.

"Your Dread Majesty," Diabolist bowed, smiling pleasingly.

"Huh," Archer said. "Even dead she's still a looker."

I blinked, eyes turning to Indrani.

"You can see her?" I hissed.

Masego inhaled sharply.

"Anchor," he said, sounding reluctantly impressed. "You made your own prison into an anchor. That is impressive."

"A compliment from a practitioner of your skill is worth hearing," Akua said, inclining her head in respect.

"Yes, Cat," Archer contributed helpfully. "We can see her."

I glanced at Vivienne, whose fists had tightened so harshly the knuckles were turning white. Still and silent, she was glaring at Diabolist.

"Akua," I said flatly. "Explain."

"She devoured part of the mantle, I would say, and wove herself into its very fabric," Masego said before she could reply.

"An accurate assumption," Diabolist agreed.

"And so now you're... healed?" I guessed.

"Bandaged might be more accurate a term," she suggested.

"With Winter," I murmured. "Interesting."

I drummed my fingers against the table and exerted my will. Her hand rose, her eyes widened in surprise and she began choking herself.

"That seems unnecessary," Masego said as the sound of rough strangulation filled the room.

"I wouldn't have been able to do that before," I replied without looking at him.

My eyes were still on Akua.

"Nothing without a price, eh Diabolist?" I said calmly. "You've given me a much deeper hold, with that little trick."

"She cannot die through this," Hierophant sighed. "Only feel pain, which a caster of her calibre would have long learned to ignore."

I released my hold and her hand fell as she weakly caught her breath.

"I've not grown any fonder of surprises, Akua," I noted. "You're rapidly heading towards a place where your occasional usefulness is inferior to the risk you pose. I shouldn't need to tell you the consequences of that, should it come to pass."

Diabolist bowed deeply.

"Your chastisement has been heard," she said.

"Might want to do that again, just to be sure," Thief said, smiling viciously.

"If you want to tear out butterfly wings, do it on your own time," Juniper grunted. "Sahelian, do you have knowledge of the Dead King?"

"I have made study of him as a worthy example," Akua replied. "The horrors he has wrought are second to none."

"What does he want?" Hakram asked plainly. "As an entity, what is he after?"

The dark-skinned beauty – Archer, much as it pained me to admit it, wasn't wrong about that part – cocked her head to the side. Thief's fingers clenched even tighter.

"I am bereft of context," Diabolist said. "And so cannot make accurate assessment. A creature whose existence has covered the span of millennia cannot be summarized in a single sentence."

Eyes went to me. No one was going to release information to the shade without my say so.

"He's invited Cat to Keter to discuss an alliance or something like that," Indrani said, picking at her fingernails.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. Of course she would. Archer wasn't one to keep her mouth shut around a pretty anything, much less about things she barely cared about.

"How interesting," Akua Sahelian drawled, and there was a glimmer of something wicked in her eyes. "I suspect that what Trismegistus seeks is a return of the favour. An invitation."

I exerted my will and she slapped herself across the face.

"Once more," I said, "only without the smug cryptic boasting."

"You used to have a better sense of humour," Diabolist sighed.

I raised an eyebrow and eyed her hand. She got on with it.

"This is supposition, I must warn," Akua said. "In matters Trismegistan, certainty is scarce luxury. It is known to my bloodline that the Dead King took the field to lead his armies during the Secret Wars. An event without reflection in his many petty wars with the Principate."

I studied her.

"You're implying there's conditions to him being able to leave his personal hell," I finally said.

"Indeed," Akua agreed. "When crusades laid siege to his realm he took the field to humble the Heavens, yet never when he sought to break Procer. If, indeed, he ever sought such a thing at all. This absence might have been taken a weakness of contentment with what he has already achieved, if he had not also fought the Legions across a dozen hellscape in person. I believe that asymmetry in action to be indicative of a... restraint. A leash, if you would."

There was a spark of humour in her dark eyes when she spoke that last sentence looking at me.

"He was allied with Triumphant, during her conquest of the continent," Hakram said quietly. "Histories have always seen that as Evil standing with Evil. But considering this..."

"It might have been a condition," I finished. "To let him out at all."

"That sounds," Indrani grinned, "like leverage."

---

Stormblessed

I love the conceit of back stabbing the Dead King. Because he probably also knows they want to backstab him. He is a villain after all.

I do hope we get to see Akua's reaction to Cat's plan of betrayal and just loves Cat even more for it.

Argentorum

Honestly, I would rip Akua out of my soul now and be done with it.

NZPIEFACE

Kinda late.

onedollargum

Akua's part of Cat's Winter pseudo-aspect. Apprentice cut out an aspect before to lance the corruption in her, and the results were crippling. At this point she can't afford to lose winter or even damage it. The stakes are high and they'll keep getting higher so i think we're stuck with Akua for now.

MetruX

I disagree, actually. While the cut before was crippling, there was much difference: to start with, this is not part of her soul, but bound to it, which seems like only different words for the same effect, yet when dealing with sorcery anything is a difference. Masego wasn't as good as he is now, and fae powers enter into his Name powers this time. There was a invading power consuming and turning, he had to cut indiscriminately and in a timely fashion, it could hardly be considered his best work. The story and narrative itself point to Winter either (1) bending under her control, or (2) being separated from her, since she has no Name whatsoever for now, and both Named and unNamed paths need one of those to be true.

So, while it isn't something that can be done whenever they want to, it is still possible, if at a price...And we all know how Cat is about paying prices...

Dragrath

While Masego has grown stronger Winter is also at the core of Cat right now given she is the Queen of Winter. Severing the embodiment of Winter from itself is a whole other level from cutting out an aspect it would be far closer to severing a Angel from its aspect.

Switch

She's still the Squire, she's said multiple times that she still feels the bare bones of the Name there, but it's broken to the point she can't really claim it anymore. So you can't really say she's completely unNamed.

Sanityfaerie

Also... Well, Akua has made *herself* a creature of Winter at this point (it fits her pretty well) and the fact is that the hosts of Winter ever scheme against their masters. Cat, too, has grown more Winter-like, and with it more in tune with the flows of such things.

If anything, I almost see this ending with Akua as the new Winter Queen, once Cat discards the mantle for better things.

nerferf

Knew it

He is a controlled tool for whenever the plot gets boring and needs a big bad to spice up the story of the continent if any of the other usual villains get boring to watch or just too weak

Whats the point of keeping heroes around if there aint a big bad to throw them at after all

SpeckofStardust

Not good enough leverage, If cat can enable it so can others.

BroadAxe

It isn't even leverage, malicia contacted the dead king at the end of book 3. So this is only percieved leverage, he probabbly already has 1 aliance :3

lqueenofblades1

No she didn't. That was Triumphant contacting him from the Hell she went to.

Shoddi

*Presses knuckle to forehead *
May(be) she never return.

stevenneiman

We know that a magical indicator indicated something. For all we know it was that Cat had become the first suitable ally to summon him since the days of Dread Empress Triumphant (may she never return). Even if her backyard is on fire, Malicia almost certainly understands how ill-advised trying to use the Dead King is, even aside from her doing fine when the Dead King saw the indicator. Besides, if there was a red telephone from the tower to Keter some crazy Emperor would have used it since then. That leave Malicia contacting the Dead King with magic if she did at all, and her best mage answers to Black, who would definitely not be willing to work with the Dead King.

Sanityfaerie

Malicia is a pretty decent mage herself. You don't need the best for a scrying, if you know which scrying to do. Also, we know that she was planning on doing **something** horrible to deal with the current situation – she outright said as much to the Black Knight when they had their confrontation over Akua's terror weapon.

MetruX

I honestly believe this theory about Malicia flawed in so many ways... But even if it wasn't, we don't know how or why Cat is needed. If there is a smidgeon of truth that he is contacting on hopes of leaving, then he has no other deal yet, since there would be simply no reason to deal with Cat at all. What this implies is that, at the worse possible, he is dealing with other villains, and at best, that he is limited in who he can deal with. I'm leaning more on the second, because firstly he would've done it with others if he had the chance, and secondly because of the red light. What if that is not communications? We we're never shown it to be, but this theory has taken root into many people's head. It could very well be a magical instrument to see when someone he can deal with has appeared. He has means of seeing a whole lot more than we know of outside, and of countering Masego's "auto" tracking magic, which implies he has what is needed for such a complex magical detection.

Thus, my theory is this: Cat is the first one, or one of the few, that he can use to leave his territory after Tirumphant.

CaptainSemantics

And the plot thickens. I can't wait to see this doublecross play out and (inevitably) fail horribly somehow.

Theoretically, the doublecross sounds feasible. But if Cat has to let the Dead King out of his realm... Procer is well and truly f***ed.

Big Brother

Oh, it's getting one step closer to Cat and Akua being able to fight at the same time. The Immortal Brawler and the Eternal Diabolist, two sides of a bloody coin that can determine the fate of nations from a single flip.

DroughtBringer

That is very interesting...
Both Akua and the Dead King, cant wait for next week.

Havak

I don't buy it. If leverage over The Dead King was that simple, Akua's mother should have known about it too. The fact that she didn't use it implies that there is probably more going on.

....

I would guess that not everyone has the ability to invite the dead king out. Cat as Queen can invite people into her domain in a way that a more normal person can't

NZPIEFACE

I think an important bit is that you have to be a Named sovereign governing a kingdom.

stevenneiman

It's like a favorite food which is so hard to cook that a good enough chef might or might not exist in any given century. Yeah, you might be able to win favor or leverage if you are or have control over that one chef, but it's not super useful information otherwise. Until we know the proper conditions required to summon him, we won't know much more. I'm guessing that the glowing stone was actually telling him that a suitable summoner (or possibly a suitable host) exists, and there's a good chance the Truebloods couldn't have deliberately created the same conditions even if they knew what they were.

Alex

Reminder to everyone that there's an extra chapter, Court III, this week.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

How do you get there? It's not in the TOC

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Oh fucking christ. You have to go find a line labeled Extra Chapters, down below the comments. That is literally the only way. I didn't even know such a link existed, it's so hidden. Why bother writing chapters if you're going to hide them?

Sieral

It was released before this chapter. You could just keep scrolling down from the main page to get to it...

stevenneiman

Uh, the "next chapter" button at the bottom of each page will take you through all the special chapters. I didn't even realize there were situations where they could be hard to find until I read comments related to it.

superkeaton

Well now. Evil reveals all around. Deadhead's "condition", Akua's wardrobe change, all very interesting.

Someguy

So for all his proficiency in Magic the Dead King still needs Story momentum to allow him out of the Hells... He turned himself into a plot flag?

nerferf

Yep, he became too powerful and victory is boring after-all
Stories are at their best with conflict and an invincible character is just too boring to let go free
And a boring story means no audience and that's a death sentence given the nature of creation and how the gods abandon Arcadia to boring repeats of the same stories

Rook

I'd bet money he fucked up his connection with greater creation and is in a similar situation to the Fae. The permanent hellgate and whatever power he stole from the Hell he took over came at the cost of being treated similarly to the natives of the hell – an outsider to creation proper.

Which brings up a very plausible reason that he'd care about a (currently minor) character like Cat, the one thing she has in common with Triumphant. She recently laid down precedent for giving outsiders a permanent foothold into greater creation – The Hunt by accepting them into her newly minted Earthly Winter Court.

Akua is probably right in that sense. What he wants from her is an invitation. An invitation into Creation through Cat's winter court

nerferf

Dont think he fucked up to be honest,

I think he was "encouraged" and had "help" by the bard or narrative to become a controlled big bad for the gods above to send heroes at and also provide a hold the wall scenes for the gods to enjoy watching mortals holding the wall against undead hordes like in a tower defense game dude should have been careful about what he wished for

goliath1303

When Black learned about who/what Bard truly is it was theorized that in order for the Gods Above to have been allowed such a powerful agent, the Gods Below would have been entitled to someone/thing equally as powerful and the assumption was that the Dead King was their answer to WB(or vice versa).

Dantalian

What a wonderful chapter.

Few authors of Web fictions are able to write a chapter composed entirely of dialogue(in a single discussion with some introspection in-between), and still make the plot progress so much.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Making deals with the dead?

What a Thriller.

James, Mostly Harmless

Just as lon as he doesn't start dancing!

Jane

...You know, I bet his castle still has a ballroom. Now I kind of want to see the Dead King and his court hosting one of those eerie silent waltzs...

Eternal life with no one (who matters, at least coughRangercough) to talk to must be rather dull... He must have at least tried this sort of mimicry of life, no? You leave a bunch of dolls on the table, and pretty much everyone is at least going to arrange them into a proper scene, no? What's the point of having a bunch of undead just standing around if you aren't going to use them for anything, no?

Cicero

Uhh....

Let me summarize the plan so far:

Step 0: Pretend to be a loyal vassal to Praes so as to delay war with them. Despite independence from Praes being the ultimate goal.

Step 1: Promise to ally the Crusade in order to convince the northern Procer army to agree to a truce. Implies betraying Praes.

Step 2: Ally the Dead King, inviting him into creation to attack Procer. Thus betraying Procer.

Step 3: Betray the Dead King. Use his invasion as leverage to join the Crusade.

Step 3.5: Assume the Crusade can defeat the Dead King.

Step 4: Finally betray Praes for real, and break free to become independent. Using the Crusade as your muscle to make it happen. All while not actually following a redemption story, (which implies betraying the Heavens, who are the nominal backers of said Crusade).

So basically betray everyone in sequence, and rely upon Callow's position as the fulcrum of the balance of power to make everyone still try to be your ally despite all the betrayals. Callow is England parallels intensify.

Well... I have to admit that kind of plan is probably not consistent with a redemption story. But Cat... I think you might have become infected with chronic backstabbing disorder.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Do note that Malicia has contacted him since the end of the previous book so I don't think Cat is the only one to cut a deal with him.

oldschoolvillain

Everyone assumes it was Malicia, but another important event in that epilogue was Cat's coronation. The glowy red stone of doom might just be an indicator to let the Dead King know that someone has come onto the stage who can unleash him. If only specific people can let you off of the leash, would you not have a notification for when they appear?

WuseMajor

I figured it was a signal that Triumphant's Return was imminent.

Euodiachloris

Or, at least, tear up the bonds and let him go home. Technically, his slice of the Hells is his actual place of abode, not Creation. He might be suffering from being continually "summoned" in some way.

The individual he'd probably like a few words with about what she pulled on him is also in the Hells, somewhere. With her Legions. He can't have a good argument with her yoke still around his neck. 😞 she's actually doing what she did in the melee in vol1, but on a continental scale.

Gian

limlimrevolution

I do love that's she pulling her classic "flip the board and beat everyone with it while shoving the pieces down their throats" gambit.

Thea

We must keep in mind that her gambit in Book 1 didn't play out as planned. She salvaged it, but it was rough. Also, the "basis" for Foundling's MO was said to be the Battle of Three Armies and One, not the Melee.

TideofKhatanga

The battle plan at Five Armies and One: con the Deoraithe into joining your campaign, play Ranker and Kegan against each other, lie to every general on your side, lie to the Winter Host, taunt Summer for fun, use the cavalry that you betrayed an Empress for and deceive the Princess of High Noon as a closing act.

It's not as backstab-happy as the Melee but it compensates by sheer amount of lies, dishonesty and creative wording.

Jane

Really, if Cat hadn't been transitioning into the Black Queen, she would have transitioned into some trickster name. For as much as everyone jokes about how she deals with all of her problems by stabbing them, I can't think of many problems she hasn't dealt with through misdirection, trickery, creatively reinterpreting how her powers are "supposed" to work, and outright lies (before stabbing her problems to death, of course).

That, setting aside how manipulating fate itself is kind of her thing.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Right, because you know that Cat is transitioning to a "Name" that was made-up here in the comments. Very likely.

Jane

Um... I just wrote up a nice long explanation of what I meant? But then when I hit backspace, well... My hand had drifted across the touchpad without my notice, clicking on the page outside of the box, so it kind of took me to the last page instead of deleting my typo. Which "deleted" my entire post instead. So to quickly summarize what I had wrote, because I have to get to work...

Trickster archetypes are common across the mythology of nearly every culture that I can think of; almost every society has famous figures celebrated or reviled for their reliance on cleverness and deception to build their legend. Cat herself, relatedly, has mostly relied on cleverness and manipulation of the story to achieve her ends; while she's been in her fair share of scraps, the more important aspect of her victories is usually related to some dramatic turn she set up beforehand (becoming undead to rob the Lone Swordsman of his win, faking a story to kill a god, tricking two other gods out of Creation, her current plan which involves betraying darned near everyone to keep Callow free and herself alive). If we take the ruler archetype out of consideration, as she has indicated that she has no long-term interest in ruling, then in my opinion, that really only leaves warrior and trickster archetypes as possibilities for her, and I think trickster would be a more natural fit than warrior. She has more in common with Odysseus than she does Beowulf.

Of course, trickster names might not be in the Guideverse at all, but as I said – they're present in nearly all of human mythology. If they are actually outright absent from Guideverse (as opposed to my current presumption, that no holder of a trickster name has been relevant to the story yet), then I would suspect that to be some form of foreshadowing – that neither the Gods Above or Below favor human cleverness for some reason, and would prefer to discourage it by rewarding other virtues. But at this point, I see little reason to believe that they don't exist.

Jane

Ah, shoot, left out a point in my summary –

Of course, as Duchess of the Moonless Night, she's not eligible for a Name, and if she should lose that mantle, her new name is almost certainly going to be related to the dramatic circumstances under which she lost her mantle. What I've written isn't especially relevant to that, so far as I know.

Hinkel

I think it is not by chance that the quote at the start of the chapter is by Dread Emperor Traitorous. If you have read the chapter with Thief, there are even more parallels with Cat leading her own opposition.

Katreu

Reminds me of Cat's book 1 adventures in the war games in the legion academy... Wasn't that just a series of spectacular betrayals in succession?

Who knew that training would come in handy? 😊

Letouriste

Well, that failed spectacularly at the end. She lost to Juniper because she underestimated the bond between Juniper and Aisha. She learned from it to never do complicated plans with several critical points... so I'm a little surprised she is willing to do that now

Novice

To say that Cat "failed spectacularly at the end" is an exaggeration. It was a draw and she ultimately got Juniper as her general. A badass general that's currently kicking everyone's ass. I'd even call it a win, all things considered.

Decius

Cat WON the round that was decided by that battle, by not losing the battle but having it declared a draw.

Someguy

The lessons taught by Dread Emperor Traitorous are still applicable today. *Sob!* Brings tears to my eyes.

nick012000

>But Cat... I think you might have become infected with chronic backstabbing disorder.

It's basically the war games from the War College all over again...

Jane

When you lay it all out like that, it kind of makes the Tyrant look like a stand-up, dependable guy, doesn't it? At least his betrayals are straightforward and spectacular, after all.

Jane

We thought she was building up to be Triumphant Reborn, being the undefeated champion who could take on an entire continent without any hoping to match her. Instead... She's become Traitorous Reborn, selling out pawn after pawn just because she can.

Antoninjohn

This is only the first part of my plan, Step One would work for Cat

Decius

Cat has narrowly avoided dying from the Praesian Chronic Backstabbing Disorder several times.

Anon

Why the hell is Akua still allowed to be given form at this point?

Yes, she's 'suborned' herself under the yoke of Cat's control over the mantle of winter, but she's also been shown to clearly be able to subvert that control at the opportune moment.

The gods below', as long as Cat keeps trying to straddle the fence, will end up pushing for Akua to take the reins.

She's outlived her usefulness by FAR at this point, and Vivienne should be screaming bloody murder.

haihappen

That may even be used as an exit-strategy for Cat at some point: Akua takes Winter -> Cat is free of Winter, free to take on a True Name -> defeat Akua -> happiness all around...

Too bad ripping out Winter would probably kill Cathrine at this point. ... Unless someone with mighty resurrection powers is close by, convinced that Cat is one of the good guys under the influence of a bad one (Akua), ... damn, could that be one of the irons the Pilgrim has in the fire? Can he SEE Akua? The man is not omniscient, but really perceptive. And he may not need Akua specifically, most of the rest of the Woe could be chalked up as "Bad influence" too. He jsut needs to craft a story that sticks...

Damn. So. Many. Angles.

RanVor

To paraphrase Cat, it'd be a simpler world if people always did the smart thing.

Someguy

Unfortunately with Akua, it's predictable that she would cunningly do the elaborate, expensive, wasteful stupid thing.

Berder

This feels like a horrible mistake. But didn't the Dead King have another message for Catherine, carried on a black seal? Seems so much planning is premature without hearing that first.

One option Catherine has failed to consider is surrendering. Which is worse: the Dead King let loose, or Procer divvying up Callow more or less peacefully? But perhaps she's sunk too deep into villainy to allow this option.

Oshi

The seal was instructions for the meeting. The message was the thing the undead repeated.

Berder

That's an unwarranted assumption. The seal contains information of an unknown character, as it has not yet been read.

Berder

Another point is that Akua needs to die ASAP. She's already shown, when she battled Catherine in Arcadia, that her devotion to traditional tropes grants her greater control over Winter than Catherine herself had. And now she has a shred of mantle that lets Catherine control her. I'd wager that connection goes both ways and is a question of attunement to Winter. How long until that shred of mantle combined with Akua's greater affinity for it, lets Akua control Catherine?

burdi

And that is what make it all more interesting ever changing situation, plot after plot, revelation after revelation that catherine has to keep improve, dance after dance because all thing fuck up and not according to the plan even her oath to made akua folly tremble of men for thousand years not much succeeded because the situation always changing and she has to improve

burdi

its in this chapter

"She doesn't deserve to get out again," Vivienne said darkly.

"It' be a simpler world," I said, "if people always got what they deserved."

that the world not so simple, compromise has to be made

Berder

Akua's value is extremely dubious. She hasn't given much if any useful advice. The best thing she did was fight the heroes for a while, only possible because she took over Catherine's body. Does Catherine view Akua's ability to take over her body as a positive? She shouldn't.

I wonder what the Dead King's source of intelligence on the Observatory and Catherine in general is. I would not be surprised if his communion with the dead extends to Akua, who is the spy feeding him information.

Fern

I don't think Akua's going to try for a betrayal until she has enough story flags to make it worthwhile. Cat may have survived her use of "monster betrays its Evil master," but that's mostly because she had a tremendous amount of leverage beyond that; there's no guarantee Akua will survive her use of the same flag. If Akua's going to try for a betrayal, it'll be when she'll be able to both survive the use of that story and not get beaten to death by the multiple cudgels arranged against her.

I think as long as Cat keeps using her competently, there won't be a betrayal for the rest of the book.

Micke

It's been heavily implied Akua wants Cat to usurp the Tower, and that it was never her own, only her mother's, goal to have her become Dread Empress; Akua being far more interested in unleashing interesting horrors like a proper villain than in the boring minutiae of ruling nation.

Antoninjohn

Pattern of three in the stories, One: Dead King Two: Praes Three: Callow, the Dead King might need all the three groups working together to get out

SMHF

Cat had her fair share of terrible ideas so far, but double-crossing the Dead King is up there... just above backstabbing Traitorous and below catfishing Cthulhu! -_-

Btw dont forget to vote for guide guys! We've been falling behind lately!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Euodiachloris

So, if Cat needs credibility (with any side) and alliances of any kind can only be minefields of various kinds of disaster...

Exactly how many points would she rack up closing the Dead King's gate into creation? With everybody? (Including, maybe, him.)

RanVor

That would be a pretty good idea if we didn't know that closing the greater breach is impossible.

Euodiachloris

Well, it is said to be impossible. By people who think they know all the factors involved. I bet they don't, though. 😏

Antony444

I agree with the Thief the plan looks far more sane than it was implied last chapter. Unfortunately, there's still a big problem lurking around the corner.

Can Procer, who has just lost around 40 000+ men, muster enough strength to stop the Dead King from overwhelming them?

Malanza is not bad for a general, I admit. But she was defeated soundly by Juniper and Catherine, at a moment where she had absolute hero-superiority and a large advantage in numbers. Her army's morale must not be brilliant, the officers ranks have taken crippling losses. The Dead King has literally centuries of experience and emerged victorious against total crusades where he was the sole opponent.

Procer, on the other hand, has not had the time to erase all the problems their long civil war has caused. Their armies, as Klaus Papenheim put it, were brittle and weak.

There are still twenty heroes around for the Crusade and 110 000+ men available...more if they can get rid of Black sacking their cities right and left. But they have taken a lot of losses recently, and though they have fought the Black Queen and the Warlock, they really are unprepared for the 'original abomination'.

I am afraid the Dead King has already anticipated betrayal...and we still don't know if he has contacted other villains. The Tyrant for one would not be exactly shy to use evil to cause more and more massacres...the Tyrant seeks to end Procer after all.

haihappen

The Tyrant would invite the Dead King to tea if it meant to be able to try to betray him/it. The Tyrant is, after all, mad.

Th invitation said "the champions of Below must either face demise alone or overturn the wheel of fate in coming striving", that does NOT exclude any of the others.

Malicia could be there, and the Tyrant, or even the Hierarch (doubt that one, but telling off the Dead King would certainly be something I would like to see him do). Any capital E evil leader could be there.

In this case, it is probably someone's *cough* Malicia *cough* idea to forge an "evil" counterweight to Hasenbach's "Grand Alliance": The "Alliance of Dread", or "Unholy Congregation", or "Covenant of Lies/Betrayal" (last one would be a favorite of the Tyrant I am sure)

so much possibilities

CaptainSemantics

Plot Twist: the Hierarch defeats the Dead King by bringing democracy to the undead

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Double twist: the dead all waste their votes on third party candidates and accidentally elect Tyrant

Highwayman

You know, the opening statement made a lot more sense after I read the entire thing.

Daemion

Is no one going to comment on this?

"Your Dread Majesty," Diabolist bowed, smiling pleasingly.

The Woe didn't even react to Cat being addressed as if she was the Dread Empress herself.

Euodiachloris

They all know about Akua's tendency towards overegging omelettes. 😋

Death Knight

"I stared into the Abyss and found the Abyss... wanting."
-Dead King

The betrayal plan seems sound except for one teeny tiny point of failure:

Notifying the cities a month beforehand.

The Dead King was shown to be aware of what happens outside of his borders and he managed to create a necromantic construct that eluded the eyes of the Observatory. It is extremely unlikely that they could keep such an endeavour under wraps-too many moving parts.

Given that the Dead King is also an otherworldly entity and knows the rules of the Fae, to subvert any potential betrayal, have Catherine swear on her Mantle and/or the Gods Below.

... This plan is dangerously stupid and full of holes and highly likely to blow up in the Woes face

jhhhu

Damn, these last two chapters make me so sad for Vivienne. The whole of the woe is a sorry bunch, but Vivienne's relative innocence makes it more heart wrenching.

They feel like they have no other choice than to go deeper, and it feels like with every win, they lose more.

TeK

So, Cat's now holds a leashto the biggest Big Bad on Calernia. As a deterrent, this is so much more than some fortress of doom.

TeK

Also, on the complete side note, I have a question. EE, if you indulge me, I'd be glad. Back in the epilogue to the book 1 it has been mentioned that no nation on Calernia can muster even one tenth of what dwarves could. Procer had mustered about 130k soldiers. Does that mean that Dwarves can gather almost one and a half million soldiers?

Tide of Khatanga

Most likely, yes. What we know of the dwarves: 1/ their underground kingdom spans about two-thirds of Calernia, 2/ the mercenary company that got hired for the Liesse Rebellion was numbering in the two thousands, which is like twenty times the size of a human mercenary company, 3/ their industrial base is solid enough that they can sell enough surplus to arm the majority of Calernian militaries and 4/ they have enough manpower to consider sinking kingdoms into the ground a reasonable plan A.

So yeah, the Kingdom Under is massive compared to the surface nations of Calernia.

Jane

This... Really isn't a good plan, is it. But, well, what other choices do they have, really?

1) Lose. I mean, yeah, theoretically that's an option? But I'm kind of under the impression that it goes against the core of being Named. How many stories can you think of, outside of maybe a couple of the less popular Grimm tales, where the Hero or Villain just... Gave up. It's not generally considered a satisfying story. Unless there's a Heroic Speech on the floor, of course the Villain is going to reach for the doomsday weapon when their back is to the wall. There's too much at stake not to.

2) Hope for an eleventh hour miracle. Okay, sure, they look doomed on paper, but... Maybe if Archer visits home, Ranger will be willing to come back! Or maybe there will be some unexpected conjunction of the spheres, and Winter gets supercharged! Or maybe the magical duel had side effects that will boil anyone in the Vales in six months! ...Yeah, okay, literally none of that is plausible. If she was a Hero, yeah, maybe the Gods Above would pull that kind of a rabbit out of a hat for her, but she's on the wrong side to just be handed a win for no discernable reason.

3a) Ally with the Dead King. So... Being a vassal to the guy whose entire shtick appears to be making the world undead, and who has his own hell portal. How can that possibly go wrong? I mean, yeah, maybe he'd hold to any bargain they struck, and leave Callow alone. You're still going to watch the rest of the continent (at best) become rather unlivable, and go down in history as one of the bigger monsters. More likely, you'll end up having to offer regular tribute – and I don't mean in the form of gold. And worst case scenario? He just takes Callow when the whim takes him, and he has no more use for you.

3b) Ally with the Dead King. Okay, so... You have some cunning plan to put the Dead King back in his bottle, or maybe he just wasn't actually interested in staying out to begin with. But, uh, everyone kind of knows you're the one who took him out of it. That kind of spectacular display of power and folly kind of gets you noticed. Does said cunning plan also give you the raw power of Triumphant Reborn? Because if you're not capable of taking on the entire continent alone yet, you're going to need to get it fast. Because I'm pretty sure the Grand Alliance is going to refocus on you as a bigger threat than the tower. And Malicia is probably going to help after a stunt like that if she doesn't think the alliance can take you on themselves.

So... "Secretly ally with the Dead King, and sell him out to as many people as you can" has so many ways it can go catastrophically wrong, especially since they don't know how he knows what happens on the continent, but... Well, they did just spend a chapter looking for alternatives, and the only ones they came up with somehow managed to be worse.

I mean, they didn't look at all the alternatives, true. They could try finding the Demon of Absence, and siccing it on the Vales – if they remembered it existed, which, well, the entire point of them is that they can't. Or they could revisit Bonfire – a gamble, but with less points of failure than the current plan. Or they could use Akua to steal all of Wolof's ancient abominations and treasures to defend the Vales with.

Ah, or they could embrace Winter's power to its fullest, and make the Vales a deathtrap beyond compare – the Witch and the Warlock could have destroyed either army by accident, and Cat isn't actually weaker than them; she's merely denying her power. If she were to gate in to difficult to reach places in the Vales, using the Hunt as her retinue to protect her (and possibly start handing out titles, if she were to take the plan to its logical conclusion by empowering others to assist her), and start doing things like freezing and releasing the water in the mountains to cause avalanches (if she wanted to be careful), or drop a few more pieces of Arcadia onto the army (if she didn't care about the consequences), she could do considerable damage to the army without risking anyone but herself. If nothing else, it would be disastrous for enemy morale, to take such blows without being able to make any visible progress. Of course, it'd make her a hero beacon that would kill her within a year, surely.

But, well, all of those would probably get them killed sooner rather than later. They're not good alternatives either, and also leave an axe of "We ignored an ancient abomination's request for a meeting, think he remembers?" hanging over their heads. He doesn't strike me as the sort of person you want to ignore. Not that betraying him is any better, I suppose, but at least you get the satisfaction of having beaten him once that way?

That said, I wonder how badly this will go for them. Think the rest of the world will find out that they're the ones who loosed the Dead King on the world? It sounds like the kind of thing that would make a good book... And he does pretty much have to find out that Cat sold him out, right? Sealing the Dead King away again sounds like the kind of plotline that she has to end up personally involved.

Jane

Ah... I just thought of one way this could all go hideously wrong for Cat, though I doubt it will happen.

What if... Procer doesn't believe her? She tells them that the Dead King is preparing to attack, and they just think it's a trick on her part, and do nothing. And then, after the Dead King does strike, realize that she knew because she was in on it. She's then forced to play the entire thing straight because, well, it's not like anyone decent is ever going to work with her again after that, right?

She took Liesse badly, and she really had fairly little to do with that. How much worse would she take the destruction of multiple cities through her own machinations? The others could shrug that off with little problem (well, except Thief), but it seems like the kind of thing that would break Cat for a while.

Argentorum

That's why Cat said she's going to **leak** the plan to Procer. She's not gonna stroll up to Klaus Papenheim and say "Oi, you lot best get north. The dead king is climbing into your windows and snatching yo people up."

As amusing as such a scene would be. Then, she uses the need for her fairy gates as leverage to join the alliance, not any "good will" from informing them about the attack.

Jane

Sure, but there's no guarantee that Procer will believe the leaked information. I mean, what's more likely – that Cat somehow knows that the Dead King is preparing to attack, or that Cat has figured out who Procer's agents are, and are feeding them misleading information in hopes of getting some breathing room?

Jane

Ah, though, like I said – I don't think that's where the story is going anyway. I'm just pointing out that her plan is strongly reliant on something that's not actually a given, and which would cause a disaster if it were to go wrong.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

They have the Augur. I don't see this as a risk

Novice

The Augur is overrated. After all, she didn't predict the Absence Demon nor Black launching a counter invasion.

Novice

Well this is awkward. For clarification, I didn't mean the Demon and Black invading together.

Walter

I think Cat is presuming a lot when she figures Dead King *needs* a month. I imagine that if she agrees he'll be like "Ok, let's do this, fae gate to Procer's capital, please."

Thea

Nobody commenting on how Akua is lacing Winter into her soul? Cat-laced Winter? That has some interesting options. Their souls could meld. Akua could try to come out on top with superior sorcerous skill (remember that usurpation thing). Akua might be screwed because Cat has so much more of Winter to her... soul. The Oath of Akua's Folly might trigger and hand Cat the win. They might learn to work together.

On that note: Akua is becoming to the Woe what Scribe is to the Calamities: The unofficial sixth member that few people know about, but those that do are scared. Very, very scared.

Walter

Akua's face turn would be imperiled by working with DK.

Thea

How so?

Speaking of Akua face-turning: It would make her a Dark Magical Girl? Requiring time and effort to be befriended and always a bit edgier? Bonus points for being dark-skinned.

Speaking of Akua's Folly: The oath ends in "when they speak of Akua's Folly and the woe that came from it". Woe for whom? In the original context, it's clear, but... you know. Also: The woe that came from it... member of the Woe? Okay, this is stretching it, but... you know.

Walter

Well, the 'face turn' I was speaking of would be her recent notion of taking up heroism. You can't do that on the Dead King's team.

Jane

If that were to happen... You could write an entire book about how Vivienne and Akua came to an understanding with each other. Those are the kind of character dynamics that can really drive a narrative.

Not that there isn't an interesting dynamic between Cat and Akua, but Cat can snuff Akua out any time she wishes, and is a lot less... Rigid about the implications of keeping Akua around than Thief is.

nipi

And Akua is copying Cat with all that my hearth has been replaced by Winter thing. Anyone else suspect that at some point she is going to be so entwined with the Winter mantel that Cat cant or cant afford to get rid of her any more?

Someguy

Nah. Akua gets sacrificed along with Winter (as it's eternal prisoner) packed into Zombie as a cryogenic explosive (implosive?) to bomb Saint & Pilgrim.

Zarkloyd

Damn. What a time to finally catch up. Excited to be following the story live now.

Novice

So now that Akua "wove herself into its[Winter] very fabric", and Cat's soul is practically Winter itself: does that make them soulmates ?

Jane

You know, Akua got more Cat-like when she drew upon Winter while she was let out... Does this intertwining now mean that Akua is now permanently slightly more Cat-like? I mean, it's just a shred, so it shouldn't have much effect either way, but the implications are... Interesting.

CaptainSemantics

Imagine a Winter Court in which everyone is just a little bit (or a lot, take your pick) Cat-like...

Jane

...This is starting to sound an awful lot like some kind of twinning thing.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

If Akua becomes a literal copy-Cat I'm leaving

werafdsaew

I think Cat isn't leveraging her Winter powers enough. She should be creating a lake at her side of the Vale so that the crusaders would have a hard time getting into Callow even after clearing the debris.

Matthew

The Grey Pilgrim and Augur would entirely undo Cat's plan to keep her plan secret.

Either one could find out instantly that she worked with the Dead King. Cat can't preserve plausible deniability. Both of their powers allow them to ask, "Did Cat work with the Dead King?" "Yes" Burn the witch!

Jane

Eh, the Augur doesn't seem reliable enough for that. Warning that something really dangerous is about to attack, sure – if she can recognize that's a warning she should pass on. "Cat was in on it", though? That sounds like the sort of detail that's beyond her. I mean, we've seen the sort of things she tells the First Prince, and they're kind of... Muddled.

The Grey Pilgrim could probably finagle the truth out of her, but only if she was willing to talk with him at length on a related topic – and since she doesn't "really" plan on working with him, just siccing him on Procer and helping stop him, she might still be able to squirm out of such a conversation altogether.

Maginot's Wall

And it turns out this was all an elaborate plot to tell dead baby jokes!

Great plot twist with a long and delicious wind-up.

Thank you, also, for the detour to see the Black Knight. That was much appreciated in the rich ensemble cast you've assembled and tamed. Will we see more of the Hierarch soon? We all wait with baited breath.

erraticerrata

Hierarch has a major role to play in this book, but I won't spoil exactly when it comes into the main thread.

rewars

Is it bad that I sort of ship Akua and Cat?

---

Chapter 26: Plunge

"If war is to be understood as the pursuit of statecraft through violence, then the Principate is a failure as a nation: the Highest Assembly has proved chronically incapable of either agreeing on or seeing through a single ambition through the undertaking of warfare."

– Extract from 'The Ruin of Empire, or, A Call to Reform of the Highest Assembly' by Princess Eliza of Salamans

It would have to be Cordelia Hasenbach first. The odds were not in my favour – but when had they last been, truth be told? – yet if this could be settled without the involvement of the Pilgrim it would be infinitely preferable. Now more than ever, every interaction with the Peregrine would carry dangers beyond the obvious. A single careless conversation could see me stripped of power or afflicted with opinions just slightly to the side of my own. For all that the Gods Below were the ones with the reputation for manipulation, I'd come to suspect the reason Above wasn't saddled with the same was just that they were better at it. Evil tended to drop the bottom of how far you were willing to compromise and allow you to dig ever deeper on your own when the consequences came calling. Even the most deluded villain, I thought, must have had one glimmer of cold clarity when they realized they'd brought it all on themselves by crossing that one line they wouldn't have before. Above, though? It dealt in the guise of conscience. A whisper urging you to be the person you could be, if you were just a little better. It didn't seem so terrible a thing, until you found that first choice seamlessly leading you into the next and the next and the one after that. Pilgrim had called Evil the edge of the cliff, once, but if that was true then Good was the tired metaphor of the slippery slope. Once you started going down, you had no more control over where you were headed than a cart rolling down a hill.

The revulsion that welled in me at that notion was an old friend, and not one I was willing to part from. Black had gotten to me young enough that the thought of having my choice taken away from me brought only bone-deep disgust, even for the worst of them.

The cool darkness of my domain soothed the sharpness of the emotions as it filled the room. There would be no shade whispering advice in my ear tonight. Akua already knew too much of my plans for comfort, and though Masego assured me it was possible to learn to make her invisible to the sight of others again it would take me days to properly master the trick. Days I could not afford: an entire month would go by before my opportunity to speak with the First Prince came again. Hasenbach came out of the dark glowing with the weight of miracles in the dozens, her dark blue dress touched by long golden curls. The understated circlet of pale gold on her brow found no match on my side: I wore no regalia tonight, nothing but the worn tunic and boots of a soldier on campaign. It was a truer glimpse of who I was than jewels and gold, though it did lack the expected formality. The First Prince took a moment to gather her bearings, though it was noticeably shorter than the last time. She was getting used to it, or at least getting better at faking situational awareness. I didn't bother with the usual duel of silence that tended to precede our conversations.

"Your Most Serene Highness," I greeted her.

"Your Grace," Cordelia Hasenbach replied.

I hesitated, and in that heartbeat she took the lead.

"It has been some time since we last conversed," the First Prince said.

"I saw no need to waste either our evenings by engaging before there was resolution to the battle," I replied. "There has been, and now here I am."

"It would have been courteous to notify me of this intent," Hasenbach chided me.

"War is the graveyard of courtesies," I said in Chantant, quoting one of her predecessors.

"Julienne Merovins never truly spoke those words," she noted in Lower Miezán, sounding somewhat amused. "It was a courtier under the reign of her successor, and the bon mot was only attributed to her fifty years after her death by a family historian."

"It always feels snappier when it comes from someone who wore a crown," I shrugged. "Harder to tell with Dread Emperors, though, since so many of them really were that insane."

"Praes does tend to straddle the line between laughable and appalling," the First Prince said. "A tragedy for us all, that these last few decades have seen it settle firmly on the latter."

"Lots of tragedies going around, these days," I smiled thinly. "One might argue we're both in the business of making those."

Cool eyes considered me in silence.

"Shall we empty the proverbial bag before speaking with purpose then, Your Grace?" Hasenbach said. "I suppose you must have recriminations to utter, if only for your personal satisfaction."

"I left personal at the door," I replied. "It has no place in this conversation. Looking backwards just means stepping blind. I'm here, First Prince, because I want to cut a deal. The rest is noise."

"You have shown fondness for that measure, of late," the blonde said mildly. "Your bargain with my subjects was a particularly vicious breed of mercy."

I frowned.

"I spared lives," I said. "Thousands of them. Your own people's lives, it is worth remembering."

"You removed from the campaign for several months a force that would have been too costly to destroy by violence," the First Prince said. "It was cleverly done, and I can respect the achievement, but let us not pretend you meant to save men you attempted to drown mere days earlier."

"That working would have been limited, and only inflicted enough casualties to force a retreat," I said.

She did not quirk a brow, though I got the impression she very much wanted to.

"An easy assurance to make, after the attempt was foiled," she said.

I forced my fingers to unclench and breathed out slowly. Temper, Catherine, temper.

"I have taken great pains, Your Highness, to display moderation in how I've waged this war," I said flatly. "At no small cost of my own. There is a point where doubt becomes denial."

"It has not gone unnoticed," Hasenbach conceded, to my surprise. "You must understand, however, that you are a villain. Deception is the trade of your kind. There is a chance, however slight, that you are genuine in your intentions. Yet precedent remains a stone around your neck, as it has been around mine."

"I've wrecked a third of my army to prove goodwill," I said bluntly. "Against the advice of most my generals, it should be said. I have to ask, in your eyes what would actually prove I mean what I say?"

"Abdication," the First Prince replied without hesitation.

"That," I said flatly, "is the kind of demand you get to make if you're winning. You are not. I'm offering a treaty, not serving you Callow on a silver platter."

"Your 'offer' has made its way to Salia," Hasenbach said. "Bringing our hosts to Ater through Arcadia, if I am not mistaken. A process that assumes you will not merely strand those armies in a realm of hostile fae."

"I'm willing to swear oaths I won't," I told her.

"Which would yet leave the Tenth Crusade almost completely dependent on you for supplies, while its hosts bleed their strength against Praesi cities," the First Prince said. "Assuming the occupation of the Empire can be successful under those circumstances, the war still ends with you in a fine position to massacre the weakened armies of Procer and Levant after you spent several years raising armies in peace."

"A possibility that can be warded off," I said calmly, "if I am a signatory of the Grand Alliance. You should have received the scroll by now."

The Warden of the West studied me expressionlessly.

"A well-penned request, observing every requirement as set out by the current treaties," Hasenbach said. "My compliments to Vivienne Dartwick."

It'd actually been Black that sent us a horrifyingly thorough transcript, but I saw no need to disabuse her of the assumption.

"In case you were wondering, it's genuine," I said.

"I assumed as much," the First Prince smiled. "It would, after all, involve suspension of all military action between members and subject any matters of conflict to neutral arbitration."

"And also involve a declaration of war on the Dread Empire," I pointed out. "Which means Callow won't be preparing to backstab you, it'll be on the front with your own armies. I'm even willing to take the Blessed Isle from Malicia and hold it while your soldiers make their way east as a sign of goodwill."

"You are being deliberately obtuse," Hasenbach said. "I have already informed you that a villain ruling Callow is not an acceptable outcome for this crusade."

"I've been told more than once it's bad form in a negotiation for your starting position to be your only position," I said. "A bargain does tend to involve actual bargaining, Your Highness."

The other woman's eyes went cold.

"You are a warlord, Catherine Foundling," she said, pronunciation excruciatingly precise. "Your reign was built on catastrophe and butchery, and has been maintained by the same. You are not the Queen of Callow, or even the Queen in Callow. The only claim for rule you have is that of steel, and with every passing month that claim weakens. You believe I am being undiplomatic, evidently."

She paused and her lips thinned.

"That I must even pretend you have the right to speak for the souls under your yoke is a concession greater than any you have right to ask of me," the First Prince said. "Even a usurper would be more palatable: you have merely ridden from one field of corpses to another, waiting and swelling in might from the deaths of your own people until none were left to gainsay your crowning. Well, here we are now. Consider yourself gainsaid, Black Queen."

Calm, I thought, as Winter raged. Calm. Insults don't matter, if you get what you want.

"And is that the stance of every signatory of the Grand Alliance?" I asked with forced politeness.

"There is not a ruler among us who will tolerate your remaining on the throne," Hasenbach coldly said.

I breathed out. Calm. Yelling is for children.

"Abdication within ten years of the signature," I replied instead of screaming. "With the understanding that other nations will have no say in the succession, in exchange for which I will give assurance it won't be another villain."

I saw her visibly master her anger and that had me frowning. A diplomat that practiced, having a fit? It irked me I couldn't read her heartbeat, because I was beginning to realize I might just have been played. The scathing rant had felt genuine, but that didn't mean it hadn't been used as a way to pressure me. Pressure me into giving something I'd been willing to give, sure, but what I'd intended to use as a bargaining chip for further concessions had just been put on the table just to keep negotiations going. Fuck. Horrid as the thought was, I wished I'd had Akua along for the ride.

"Abdication immediately following the end of the crusade," Hasenbach said. "And binding oaths on both it and the matter of succession."

"Five years, regardless of the crusade ending or not," I countered. "I'll need time to settle matters so the succession is stable. Agreed on the oaths."

There was a beat of silence.

"An accommodation might be possible," the First Prince finally said.

I kept my face blank even as relief welled up. Of thank the fucking Gods. I had not been looking forward to trying my hand with the Dead King. Ignoring an invitation from the Hidden Horror would likely have consequences, but I was an old hand at lesser evils.

"A truce until it's reached, then," I said. "Including your uncle ending digging operations in the Vales."

"A passage there will be necessary to the prosecution of the war," Hasenbach said.

"In can gate his entire army across the Vales in less than a week, if you don't trust me to get them all the way to Praes," I replied flatly. "Keeping him pointed at my belly can't be considered anything but coercion."

"You are being coerced," the First Prince frankly replied. "That is the very reason we are having this conversation."

I watched her, the strongly-cast face and the patience painted upon it.

"There is a very real chance," I said slowly so she knew I wasn't being flippant, "that agreeing to what you just said will lead to civil war in Callow. It will be seen as annexation, or at the very least effective vassalage. You badly underestimate how hated your people are in the kingdom."

"You have asked me to consider you as the ruler of Callow," Hasenbach said. "Rule, then. Exert your authority to prevent the unrest."

Gods, she was serious.

"No," I said. "I've made significant concessions. You want the pass open? Give me more than your word to work with. Withdraw the army, make the truce public. I'll have Hierophant work on a ritual to clear the wreckage, to be used when the treaties have been signed. Otherwise, this is starting to look a lot like I'm baring my neck for the knife."

"I am the First Prince of Procer, not a petty tyrant," Hasenbach replied tightly. "I do not go back on my word once given."

"And I am Callowan," I snapped. "We have more than few songs about the worth of Proceran promises. You're asking me to extend a lot of trust. Do the same damned thing."

"You are overestimating the strength of your bargaining position," she warned me.

"So are you," I barked. "You sent two armies after me, and they both got whipped out of Callow. You have Black in your heartlands with four legions and you'd rather argue with me about not putting a knife at my throat than deal with it?"

"I have near every hero on the continent and thrice his number containing him," Hasenbach said. "His survival is a matter of months, if not weeks."

"So this is what it looks like," I said quietly. "An intelligent woman making a very grave mistake."

"Oh, spare me the heaps of praise for the murderer," she said. "He is a skilled general and an effective killer. He is not invincible."

"You are about to get mauled," I said, appalled. "I don't even know what he's up to, but I know that. Sure as day. Gods Below, what about how this crusade has been unfolding could possibly make you this arrogant?"

"Posturing will yield nothing," the First Prince said.

"I know what you're trying to do, Cordelia," I said. "You think than in a month we'll be speaking again and I'll have to bend my neck a little lower. Brinksmanship. I need you to believe me, because I'm begging here, that it's not what's going to happen. I cannot gamble this entire kingdom's fate, start a civil war, on grounds so thin. I'm already cornered. This is as low as I go."

"Six months ago," she said softly, "you might have said the same. And yet here we are."

I closed my eyes. Should I? Give her even that small assurance I was holding out for? It'd be seen as a capitulation because, to be honest, it was. There'd be riots, and at least half the Army of Callow would desert. Thief might actually kill me. She trusted Procer even less than me. Hells, she might be right to if it came to that. There were good reasons I had those contingencies in place. I opened my eyes.

"One last time," I said. "Don't do this. We could avoid so much death – beyond the politics and the interests and the schemes, that has to count for something."

"Appeals to emotion," she said, not unkindly, "are the last resort of one without argument."

I stared at her for a long time.

"I think," I said quietly, "that this conversation is going to haunt the both of us, in years to come."

She hesitated for a moment.

"I am not without sympathy," she said. "But there is more at stake than you know."

It wasn't an opening. Gods, I wished it was, but there was no invitation to negotiate again in the way she was looking at me.

"Woe to us both, then, Cordelia Hasenbach," I said.

I ripped away the darkness and rose to my feet. One last try, before I went into the devil's lair.

—

There were guards around the Pilgrim's tent, a full line. I dismissed them as gently as my mood allowed, which by the way the Taghreb lieutenant paled wasn't very. A few months ago, I thought, I would probably have been frosting everything around me. The old man was awake, even this late at night, and seated at a writing desk with a mage lamp atop it. He was penning something, I saw, on a scroll. That had me curious, however reluctantly. He wasn't allowed letters even as an observer, so what was he writing?

"Pilgrim," I said, lingering at the entrance of the tent. "May I?"

"Catherine," he replied with a kindly smile. "By all means."

I strode into the tent and moved a folding chair from his bedside to face him across the writing desk. He saw my glance at the scroll and chuckled.

"Your Marshal asked me to provide my recollections of the Battle of the Camps," he said. "As much as can be revealed in my position. I believe she may be penning a history of the last few years."

Juniper's 'Commentaries', inspired by the second Terribilis'. I'd known about that, and that Aisha apparently kept memoirs of her own though she was very noncommittal about ever showing them to me. I supposed someone should be keeping records, since I sure as Hells wasn't.

"I'm surprised you're willing to contribute," I admitted.

"I have always thought it a great disservice to all, that histories are so often written by the victors," the hero said. "Much could be avoided by having a broader perspective. If an old man's recollections can be of any help I am glad to provide it."

That was the trouble with the Pilgrim, I thought. He would say those wise, beautiful things and seem to genuinely believe them. But then I'd find him on the battlefield, wielding miracles like a knife for a cause that was as empty as it got. There might be a good man, somewhere in there. I wanted to believe that. But that man answered to the Heavens before anything else. And if I could hold it against Black that he could love me but still set it aside, then I could hold it against this stranger that his pretty ideals only mattered as long as the Heavens agreed they were convenient. They weren't really principles if they were always discarded at the first frown from Above, were they?

"You seem in a pensive mood, tonight," the Pilgrim said.

I weighed the risks, for a moment, then took the plunge.

"I've just had a very exhausting conversation with the First Prince," I said. "So I'd like to be blunt, if you don't mind, because I don't have a lot of coyness left in me."

He didn't seem surprised by the revelation that I had a way to talk directly with Hasenbach, but that meant less than nothing. The Peregrine wasn't someone I'd want to play cards against.

"You attempted to make peace," he said.

I smiled thinly.

"I very nearly did," I said. "But then she pushed just a little further than I can go. And I know, Gods I know, that maybe she wasn't out to screw me and everyone in this kingdom. That the other choices I can make are so much worse they're indefensible."

I met his eyes.

"I'm willing to take leaps of faith with people, Pilgrim," I said honestly. "I have before, and I will again. But not with the Heavens. Because you don't negotiate with Above, you obey. And I don't think Cordelia Hasenbach holds the reins of what she unleashed nearly as tightly as she thought she would."

"And so now you come to me," the old man said. "With a request."

"Do something," I asked quietly. "Intervene. Offer to arbitrate. Thief tells me you could be king of Levant with a snap of your fingers, if you felt like it. You have influence to wield."

"Seljun," he said calmly. "We do not have kings, in Levant. And there is a reason I do not sit the Tattered Throne, Catherine."

Your Good Kings have done well by Callow, but the Dominion... It is a different land. It would end the honour duels, the forays into the wilds, but it would be a call. To the kind of war best left in the past."

"I'm not saying usurp your ruler," I said. "But Gods, you're not nobody. If you make a truce with me Levant will fall in line. That'll force Hasenbach to reconsider."

"It would break the Tenth Crusade," he gently said.

"So do it behind closed doors," I said, frustration mounting. "You're trying to shove redemption down my throat, and don't bother denying it. Fine. I'll fucking lean in, even if it'll probably get me killed. Just act. I'll kiss the hem, quote the Book. All you need to speak up and thousands don't have to die."

"It would smother in the crib," the Grey Pilgrim said sadly, "what is perhaps the last chance for peace in our time."

"I'm offering peace," I hissed.

"Peace on your terms would unseat the First Prince," he said. "She has spent years forging an alliance with Levant, fighting her Assembly tooth and nail every step of the way. For that same ally to twist her arm into making a pact with one of the most famous villains alive would see her removed within the month. And everything she seeks to accomplish vanish with her."

A long moment passed and the only sound in the tent was his steady heartbeat.

"You can't be serious," I said. "If you'd said the Heavens were using their veto, I would have been furious. I won't pretend otherwise. But at least I wouldn't be disappointed."

He opened his mouth but Winter flared like half a world howling for blood and he closed it.

"No, disappointed is too mild a word," I said, voice barren of any speck of warmth. "This, Pilgrim, is worthy of contempt."

"The treaties she has made and would deepen will end wars in the west," the old man said. "Callow restored and Praes humbled will allow Calernia to finally turn towards the true face of the Enemy. The King of the Dead. The Chain of Hunger."

"It's funny," I said, smiling mirthlessly. "How it's never the lot of you that have to make the sacrifices. Us, this entire fucking kingdom since the dawn of time? Well, that's just how things have to be. Someone needs to take care of Praes so the rest of the continent can kill itself in peace. But then someone else has to do the bleeding, for once, and suddenly there's all these considerations."

"This is not fair," the old man said. "Nor it is just. I will not pretend otherwise, child. But I will not offer you succour at the price of Cordelia Hasenbach's dream. It is too great a good to be slain in this manner."

"So we burn again, for the greater good of everyone else," I laughed harshly.

I rose to my feet.

"You know, when I make decisions like that, they call me a monster," I said, meeting his eyes without smothering a single ember of the fury I felt. "So why do you get a pass?"

"I will suffer the price of this, in time," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Service is no absolution."

He looked old and tired and sad. But so did a lot of people, and they didn't sign death warrants for dozens of thousands. I was out of sympathy to offer for the likes of him. I had no pithy comment to offer, no cutting parting remark. I left the tent before I could talk myself into murdering him in cold blood. I needed to talk to Hierophant.

We were, after all, going to Keter.

---

sivarajan

Happy Independence Day!

Jane

I thought the entire point of this conversation with Hasenbach was that Callow wouldn't be declaring independence for another six months 😊?

PotatoMan

Independance from Proceran occupation and freedom for America!
Freedom all around!

NZPIEFACE

>Proceran occupation
Uh... what about Praes?

Agent J

They're already independent from them in all but name.

Jeffery Wells

Would have been in name too if Cordelia weren't such a dick.

Jeremy

God damn it, Cordelia....

But so excited!! Keter awaits!

SpeckofStardust

"It'd actually been Black that sent us a horrifyingly thorough transcript, but I saw no need to disabuse her of the assumption." Well interesting.

"The treaties she has made and would deepen will end wars in the west," the old man said. "Callow restored and Praes humbled will allow Calernia to finally turn towards the true face of Enemy. The King of the Dead. " . No they will be facing the king of dead now all because they want total victory.

Jane

Actually... I think that the First Prince refused because anything but a clear-cut victory would destroy her political position, and the Grand Alliance with it.

It doesn't look like it from our perspective, but we've seen that Procer has been digging more deeply into their reserves than first expected (such as fielding levies, and not just disposing of spare fantassin); similarly, while we've seen desperate defenses that accomplish little but delay inevitable destruction, Procer's princes have seen a string of humiliating failures with unclear gains.

We already know that the First Prince has had to make some unpopular calls, and that Amadis thought that a thorough enough victory on his part could unseat her; perhaps things have gone badly enough in the eyes of the Assembly that anything less than an obvious victory over Callow on her part might be the final straw?

I might be misreading things, of course – but the final condition that she refused seems a small enough thing that it seems like the appearance of victory is more important to her than the victory itself, something that doesn't make sense unless there are political considerations. Unless she really was planning to betray her agreement with Cat, of course.

SpeckofStardust

And Procer is about to burn because of it, as the quote above has already stated the "Principate is a failure as a nation" If the first prince needed everything to go perfectly in order to pull off this crusade then she should have not done the crusade at all. A plan that "cannot possibly go wrong" is a plan that will never work in a universe ran by narrative.

Rook

The First Prince didn't need the crusade to go perfectly, she just needed a Crusade, period. Her goal is not as simple as trampling over Evil, as obtuse as she may **act** during negotiations. You have to keep in mind that this is a schemer that can already dance with Malicia.

She's not an idiot, she's the total opposite – she's an absolutely horrifying monster of an intellect. The same kind of prodigy of intrigue that the Hellhound is of warfare.

Honestly I think the long game that Hasenbach is playing – whether she ends up regretting it or not in the end – isn't something that's even been revealed yet.

Antoninjohn

Can dance with Malicia as long as she has the Auger, and Procer says they don't rely on Named to win their battles for them, what a joke

werafdsaew

If there's anything more to the First Prince, the text does not show it.

I think it's simple inexperience; she actually doesn't have any experience fighting against a Villain, except against Malicia, and Malicia fought with intrigue and statecraft, which is the same area Cordelia's strongest in.

As a result Cordelia has a habit of underestimating martial inclined Villains. She underestimates Cat and Black by overestimating the impact of the rebellion, underestimates the Tyrant of Helike by thinking that the Good members of Free Cities would be able to keep him in line, and now she's underestimating Black again. It's a pattern. Heck the first time we see her in the prologue of Book 2, she underestimates Black by thinking that Malicia is the real danger.

She would be much more wary of backing Cat into a corner if she knew that Bonfire is a thing. Cat's ability to gate isn't a secret, and so she should be thinking about possibilities like Cat gating an army right into the middle of Salia, but doesn't because she thinks Cat is a dumb brute. Heck, she's underestimating the Dead King, in a way, by not thinking about the possibility that he'll go on the offensive while her armies are tied down by the Crusade.

David K. Storrs

Bonfire, as I understand it, involves Cat leading an army through Arcadia into the heart of Procer and then sacking cities, killing people, etc.

You know what would be worse? Cat and Thief, by themselves. Two Named on a flying horse can move far faster than an army, and it seems like Thief can carry as much stuff as she wants in her pocket dimension. Fine. Load her up with every scrap of goblinfire they can lay hands on. Gate to Procer, fly over each city in turn from a height where you can't be attacked. Drop enough goblinfire to burn everything to the ground, then gate to the next one. Tell the Crusade that this is happening and that taking Callow won't do a damn bit of good as to stopping it. Don't say anything about "I'll stop if you leave", just tell them the facts so that they don't feel challenged. You'll have soldiers wanting to go home to check on loved ones and help contain the fires. Given enough unrest, you could break the army's morale and eliminate them as a functional force. (For that matter, the Woe should try some fifth-column attacks now.)

People should REALLY stop backing Cat into a corner.

Death Knight

Congratulations that results in Cat being promoted to THE Villain as opposed to a Villain all but ensuring her head on a pike in three or four years. Maybe even sooner.

Matthew

This won't work more than twice. The story will make sure that a named hero with a perfect counter will arrive.

therealgridlock

You were on the cusp of greatness, with your two chicks vs the principate story, but what they should do instead is fly to every city in the principate, steal every sword and spear and shield and bow and arrow, half their gold, kill their leader, make a deal with the second in command, and then move to the next city.

Imagine it, a hundred cities, all without weapons, robbed of half their royal wealth, their charismatic leader dead and the second in command tied by oath to catherine.

It would take weeks to do... But by the end she could fly to the capital, and tell cordelia that their kingdom is now owned by *cat* instead, with every bit of land firmly sworn to her, and no weapons to fight a war with, so either swear undying allegiance with cat now, or else, instead of killing her and making a deal with her subordinate, worse she leaves her alive to witness being attacked from *every direction* as every other country in calernia want a piece of the now completely defenceless principate.

Oh, but if you swear undying allegiance now... I'll give you half your money and weapons back, and join you in battle against any enemy you pick.

I mean think of the masterstroke that would be.

Rook

Isn't it the exact same type of arrogance to assume there's nothing more to Hasenbach than a petty ignorant schemer, as it is for the Crusade to assume Catherine is a simple bloody brute? She's no Amadis, this is a character who has weight not only through heavy character exposition and foreshadowing within the story, but also by being the mastermind of the current major conflict the story arc is centered around. Note that the entire strategy of the last battle has been for the express purpose of negotiating with said big bad.

I mean, time will tell, but I'd never, ever, underestimate any character where the story almost explicitly states that they should be taken seriously via main character reactions to them. This is the same opponent that made Cat repeatedly take Akua off the leash for just to chat together, and the one that a major player like the Pilgrim is taking seriously enough that he'd willingly walk into the storm he sees coming than risk hindering her Master Plan.

werafdsaew

The difference is that we, as the reader, gets to see everything that happens. The author is not a shit author who does things without proper foreshadowing, so if Cordelia has a grand plan that we don't know about yet, it would already have been properly foreshadowed. The fact the it hasn't yet means that it's either a minor thing, or nothing is there at all.

Rook

But it has been foreshadowed. The Pilgrim straight up admitted to it in this very chapter on why he's still refusing to intervene even though he doesn't disagree with Cat about how unfair it is for Callow. He doesn't attribute the possible Greater Good to his own plan or some heavenly works, but specifically to Hasenbach's plans.

She's had several perspective side-chapters alluding to said long term plans, and was frequently mentioned even in Malanza and Malicia's POV excerpts as to the extent of her ability in that sense. If her own dedicated chapters, having mention of her schemes from every character that would plausibly have direct experience with her, and having the biggest baddest Heroic antagonist to date admit to it in no uncertain terms isn't foreshadowing, I'm not sure what is.

She's irritating without a doubt, and likability is highly debatable, but in Catherine's own words there is a point where doubt becomes denial.

MetruX

Actually people, just look closer. It's no secret scheme, she's been plainly stating this since her first apparition: Hasenbach wants to unite the Good nations. It's that, plain and simple. No need to complicate the objective, the ways to get there are hard enough. And also, she may very well be the reason The Dead King is coming out, because the forces balance each other, and since Good are uniting... Evil has to aswell.

Azure

Pilgrim thinks that somehow her plans are going to lead to a shit at the Dead King, and that's why he's going along with it. Unfortunately for him, it's going to be a case of biting of more than he can chew with the Woe's hand being forced. And I'm sure someone will be returning triumphantly at some stage to join the party.

Michael

AFAIK Pilgrim doesn't know anything about that plan. And he might not find out, because Augur sees the future through birds. There are no birds in the Kingdom of the Dead, so she might just miss it!

lennymaster

God damn werafdsaew!

You just managed to put into words every thought about Cordelia that has been coagulating at the back of my head without my being able to put my finger on it.

Black has only on active aspect, the others are Conquer and Lead. Him stranded in Procer is like Rorschach (Watchmen) being locked up in prison.

"I'm not locked up with you, you are locked up wit ME!"

Miles

Or her big game is to consolidate power during the crusade and is just stalling because some pieces still need to be moved before going after praes, which will require her full attention

Yotz

"Pilgrim responded: "Child, you don't know Principate's internal situation. To avert a revolution, we need a small victorious war.""

Cicero

Yup. Basically it's the same problem Cat has. Cat can't make any more concessions. Her people won't tolerate the appearance of a Procer victory over Callow.

But Procer also can't make a concession either, as their princes will not tolerate anything other than the appearance of victory over Callow.

Often nowadays the thought is that diplomacy should always succeed, and that a failure always involves at least one of the parties being unreasonable. In truth however, often war is inevitable because the various interests of the nations involved make war preferable to both nations – even if that risks defeat in war.

MetruX

Well, this has been a common theme in the Guide, no? We know for a fact that Dread Emperor's couldn't stop Praes from going to war with Callow, because this would result in their deaths. So it stands to reason most wars, in this scenario, HAVE to be waged, because Heavens is bullshit and can't be argued with.

Michael

I am thinking Cat's story will shift again. Pilgrim put her on the redemption wagon, but right now she's acting in a way that means the redemption will be refused. She already had a shot at redemption (she was technically on that path when she spared The Lone Swordsman), but she spat in that one's face. Refusing redemption twice makes you irredeemable and what she is about to do (ally with the Dead King) will make her irredeemable in fact and not just in story. I love it!

Highwayman

Yes! We might finally be reading about how the whole thing about Keter's Due came about!

Death Knight

Keter's due is merely the most pronounced example of the second law of thermodynamics, informally stated as "You can't break even." We already know how it came to be, namely that the Dead King used a ritual to claim a hell and the bleed turned an entire kingdom into an undead mess.

This is why Akua's array in Liesse was so worthwhile. In our world its rare that we can create any kind of engine that is greater than 60% efficiency. That's 40% of the energy wasted. What Akua did was design an "engine" that approached 85% efficiency at a conservative estimate. To put it another way, she fell 15% short of being able to create a perpetual motion machine.

... Yes, Diabolist teaming up with Hierophant and Warlock with the Dead King at the lead would be a greater threat than Triumphant ever was.

haihappen

- 1) Akua, Demons
- 2) The Dead King, UnDead
- 3) Warlock, Sorcery
- 4) Hierophant, "Vision"/"Architect"

There is something missing. A source of wonder, of light, of Miracle

5) The Pilgrim, Miracles

Apart from being impossible, these two could probably create their own Creation.

Death Knight

What I actually meant was that Dead King brings forth a ritual. Warlock is in charge of finding a suitable Hell to power the thing, Akua modifies the working to minimize (or directs) the bleed and Hierophant is there to look for any non-obvious weakpoints in the working.

Those four working on a ritual is a continent shattering affair.

Sanityfaerie

Heirophant brings the Miracles. It's what he does.

NZPIEFACE

Wasn't Keter's Due something along the lines of 90% efficiency? And even that destroyed a whole country permanently.

Death Knight

Could be (no hard numbers were given to my knowledge so I just guessed) which is why a sorceror of Diabolist's caliber is such an asset whatever's Thief's misgivings. Too bad Diabolist overstepped. She was way more useful when nobody but Cat could see or hear her.

NZPIEFACE

Personally, I love how Akua does shit like this. It's the side-effects of her Name, amplifying the most dramatic parts of her character.

And the thing that makes her tick? Theatrics. She sticks to ideals so closely I think she's a romantic.

Metrux

Actually wasn't the BIG deal that he used the leaking instead of channeling it? I mean, he was ever a necromancer, when he came back he found the dead better than the living... So his ritual made everyone die. He was considered a genius then and there, but... Didn't he have hundreds if not thousands of years to grow, both in power, experience and knowledge? If so, I actually don't think Akua's skills can come to help with his workings. If she even has anything to teach him, it's probably so far and between that it'd be easier to have her as an assistant than actually working together.

Decius

He's had thousands of years, but the dead do not grow.

Highwayman

I know the law, man. What I want to know is the story behind the ritual, but thank you for the reminder, anyway.

RoflCat

...Has Catherine EVER showed Liese Accords to anyone on Good?

Yeah it'd reveal her hand, but Pilgrim is supporting Cordelia in this because he seem to have seen her final goal and agreed with it.

I don't think he's seen Cath's.

Then again, they might just use other excuses...

Death Knight

This chapter proved they'd still move the goalposts. The Dead King is right, these Crusader motherfuckers need to be humbled a bit. After all, one never treats from a position of weakness.

Snowfire1224

But if you think of it story wise, any plan that is revealed too soon is bound to fail

Death Knight

Unless you're Black and is counting on the enemy to know your plan so they may change their plans to suit your REAL Plan.

Snowfire1224

Unrelated but what you just said reminded me of this quote from Hellsing Ultimate Abridged:

"Ahh~, Herr Doctor~, but that is the plan. Now zat zey know our plan, zey will plan around our plan, and so ve shall in turn plan around ze plan that zey are planning around our plan!"

Death Knight

Haha well spotted! That was a damn good series

Rook

I don't think it'd do any good. As much of this is on the heads of the previous dread emperors and empresses as it is on the crusade. The same way that Procer'd history makes their word worth pig shit in callow, Praes history makes any serious villain's words equally worthless. Tens of madmen throughout history have had a similar effect to tens of conquests disguised as a holy war.

There is worth in the accords and in what she has to say, don't get me wrong. But no heroic ruler in their right mind would believe Black's conquest was a war for *food* or that Catherine is genuinely attempting decent ends through awful means, the same way no Callowan would ever believe Proceran influence on Callow would be anything more than a leech and bleeding of their people.

The bridges have been too thoroughly burned, dissected, flayed, and disintegrated with holy light for this short timespan of interaction to end in anything else. A cooperation isn't impossible, but it'd take years and years to build even the smallest amount of trust. Catherine doesn't have the time or the patience, currently, and Cordelia doesn't have the motivation to.

Death Knight

True on all accounts. All that's left now is for the "victor" to stand atop a mountain of corpses.

Oshi

Except that is bukllshit. They have two Miracle wielding truth speaking Heros (Augur and Pilgrim) who KNOW that is why they did it. Not know in a exsentential sense but literally know thanks to heavens gits. It's bullshit to say you can't know evils motivations when you fucking do.

Rook

Didn't we just have an entire chapter about Black completely fooling heavenly providence?

Decius

How do you convince someone with divine lie detectors that you don't have a secret technique to fool their lie detectors?

RanVor

She actually revealed the general idea to the Pilgrim. He said no one's ever going to agree on this.

Jane

And this is why brinksmanship is never a good idea – both sides think they have a secret edge that will let them push further than they otherwise could, and when both of those secrets are revealed, the entire continent will bleed. If they'd both just been reasonable, so much suffering (and, you know, most of the plot of this book) could have been avoided. Of course... If either of them were willing to leave coin on the table, neither would be a ruler now. Hasenbach would have sat out the battle that ruined her rivals, and Cat would never have met Black at all.

Incidentally... It probably doesn't speak well for her contingency's moral compass that she has to worry more about being stabbed in her sleep if she makes a bad peace with Procer than if she treats with the Dead King.

(Joking, mostly; it was already established that Thief wasn't exactly happy about the Dead King plan, and that her loyalty is to Callow first and foremost.)

Someguy

Cat was never going to get what she wants by treating with Hasenbach as a Sovereign equal. The entire point of the Invasion (lets not kid ourselves calling it a crusade here) is so that Hasenbach gets to ride political rodeo to get what she wants, the welfare of Callow never entered the picture in the first place.

Cat can just gate to the Vale (it's a valley bowl now right?) have her sappers dig a goblin-sized hole and flood it, setting loose those fire-breathing lizards Hirophant wanted for his original moat later. The Stairway can be used as Callow's garbage dump to make the pollution Procer's problem. Time to revise Bonfire to create ecological and economic disasters for Procer!

Death Knight

I agree. We need to go scorched earth on these bitches. But the problem we have is the narrative. Now lets ask ourselves what kind of narrative could we use and/or exploit that would favour the deaths of these hypocritical invaders?

Someguy

Twisted Mirror. The same thing that happened to the God Emperor in WH40K. Aim to corrupt the Alliance Member's heirs by encouraging their vices with sycophants and let human nature do the rest.

Death Knight

Splendid idea. Corruption is already there, all it needs is a push here and there. However Malicia and Black had already tried that tactic for the last 20 or so years through the Pravus bank and that plan came back to bite them in the ass in this current Crusade. So we need to go a little further.

Metrux

Well, it's more that they tried keeping the war ongoing... They never trully tried full on corruption. If so, the plan can still be done, you only need to disconsider short term advantages, because on the short term it will be pure costs without gains. Though, if successfull, Procer will needs several generations to plunge the leak, so to speak, if they can at all. Though, with Heavens and Narrative it's probable a Hero will raise to occasion...

David K. Storrs

"If they'd both just been reasonable,"

Both? In what way was Cat not reasonable?

Jane

Choosing to unleash Gods-know-what on the continent by working with the Dead King, instead of surrendering Callow to an unpleasant, but within the boundaries of normal human vice, foreign occupier.

I mean, I'd have made the same call, but let's be honest – she doesn't know what the Dead King wants, but knows it's probably Capital E Evil, and that the Dead King operates on a ridiculous scale compared to everyone else. It's a horrifyingly dangerous gamble that, in the absolute worst case scenario, ends in the (un)death of the entire continent. Is such a risk really better than surrendering to your ancestral enemy?

Few people would have agreed to her terms, especially after Hasenbach insulted her to her face so many times. But looking at the implications of refusal... Yes, folding here still would have been more reasonable than opening Pandora's box.

*ahd*

It's a game theory thing.

If everybody knows that you will fold rather than choose Alternative X, then they will set things up so that Alternative X is the only other choice to letting them eat you alive. Nom, nom, nom.

So, you should act in such a way as to ensure that people know Alternative X is on the table if things get extreme enough; and so your peers do the math, everybody backs away from pushing each other towards their own personal Alternative X, and nobody takes goblinfire baths via portal.

(It is possible to have people who aren't exploitative predators as neighbours. This is in fact the normal case; glance up from the web browser and look around you. But... Callow doesn't seem to have any of those. Black's been cloning the Idiot Ball again and sending Assassin to plant copies on the Good rulers of all the human nations. Tyrant giggled and added his to his collection.)

So, "of course Cat must fold" is not a reasonable position to expect a responsible ruler of Callow to hold. Especially not when "here, we'll join the Grand Alliance, after the victory, I will stabilise Callow and then retire to do something less painful as far out of your way as I can get" is the alternative position literally on the table, complete with hideously thorough membership application, on a scroll yet.

Jane

The thing is, "Ally with the Dead King" shouldn't be an alternative at all for a reasonable ruler – the dangers are such that it ought be well outside the bounds of consideration. Callow's neighbors shouldn't consider it a risk, because it shouldn't be a risk.

As an example, another deterrent that Cat could have prepared was to instruct Heirophant to design an elegant command implant spell that, when she gave the order, would cause every resident of Callow to salt their fields and then commit suicide. It would make any invasion of the country functionally worthless. But would that be a reasonable thing for Cat to have planned, or to seriously consider implementing if she was badly losing a war? I would think the obvious answer would be no – nobody loses more from it than her, and it fundamentally betrays her most deeply held motivation, that of protecting Callow.

Similarly, unleashing the Dead King risks Callow losing everything. Even if Callow itself is spared (not a given), they risk losing all of their trading partners, cultural imports, and pretty much all the other benefits of having living neighbors. Is that really better than becoming a Callowan-flavoured piece of Procer?

Countries should only consider the possibilities on the table, true. But what's on the table shouldn't do more harm to yourself than what your partners are proposing – suicide (or grievous self-harm) gambits are unreasonable unless you care more about pride than the good of your country.

(Of course, short-term sacrifices can be reasonable in pursuit of a long-term advantage, but something on this scale risks ending the game long before the long-term comes into play.)

Vortex

Uhhh, the Dead King wants to fuck Procer and does not share a border with Callow. Literally the alternatives are between allowing Procer to murder its way back into Callow and use her countrymen as a cannon fodder to fight Praes (which was the status quo for hundreds of years) or ally with the Dead King who is nasty business but will fuck my enemies harder than he will fuck me. I would pick nasty business pretty much every time in this situation.

Jane

The Dead King wants to destroy Procer now. Will that really be the end of his ambitions, though? Or is it just the first step of an awakened Dead King? Cat has no way of knowing before she speaks to him, but Named don't tend to dream small.

Not to mention the presumption that the Dead King will be killing the entire population of the regions he conquers. Is it really worth the possible genocide of Procer (and other nations involved in the Crusade) to ensure the political independence of Callow? Honestly, it sounds a monstrous trade to my ears. If Procer wins, a new set of nobles rule over the peasants, and a few laws change for the worse. If the Dead King wins, millions die. How is that a reasonable response?

Now, we know it won't come to that unless the book takes a dramatically darker turn. But Cat believes she is taking a gamble with massive stakes, where a mistake will make her the second greatest monster in the history of the continent. And honestly, it's also a pretty reckless one on her part; why does she think the Dead King can be put back in his bottle so readily? His earlier raids were presumably small-scale activity from his perspective, and he was hampered by his inability to be personally involved. If he's seriously unleashed, how can she be so certain the Grand Alliance will prevail? We know that she'll win (unless, again, the book decides it wants a dramatically darker tone), but she appears to be making this call on some pretty thin information.

Now, in her shoes, I'd probably make the same decision. But let's be clear; it is very much the wrong call, made for the wrong reasons. Risking millions of deaths over the independence of Callow just isn't worth it. Heck, this alliance is worse than what most of the Dread Empresses have done.

(Incidentally, it's entirely possible that the Dead King isn't actually some genocidal maniac, and his designs on the continent are no more horrid than your average warmongering dictator. But again; Cat has no way of knowing that, and thinks she's making a deal with an appalling dangerous genocidal maniac.)

Metrux

This is the call to talk to him. She isn't such a newbie anymore that she will unleash him simply by speaking without meaning it. She can always just do the same she did right now: Talk and leave. The problem being that the talk itself can be dangerous, but hey, that is why she tried every other avenue before speaking with him.

Jane

The problem is, if she refuses him at this point, she has no options; she can't go back to the First Prince and accept the previous terms anymore. They can only speak once a month, and in a month's time, the situation will have changed enough that Cat can't even get these terms again.

And even if she could... Well, the Dead King has about as much leverage over her as the First Prince. Unless he presents something outrageous like "Release me from my prison and I shall make a bonfire of this world!" and refuses to tone it down at all, what's Cat going to do? Say "No, please don't save Callow in our hour of need"? Especially since she's planning on double-crossing him anyway, and thinks they can pull it off. True, the Dead King needs her in order to get out, but... Him not getting out is a death sentence for Callow.

And besides... Why does the Dead King have to be honest with her at all? He's an ancient abomination who is vastly more knowledgeable and powerful than her – for all Cat knows, unless the Dead King needs her to consciously maintain a stable connection outside of Keter or something, the moment he's out, he can say, "Thanks, sucker!" and rampage across the continent if he's so inclined. It's not like he has any real need that we know of to hold to any bargains they make.

In refusing Hasenbach's terms, she's already committed herself to this path – she just doesn't know what the costs of it will be yet. It's true that they're unlikely to be too odious, but she has no way of knowing that – and does know that the Dead King has an appallingly horrible reputation.

Decius

Cat cares about Callowans. Cat does not care about Procerans.

If anyone opposing her cared about the little people at all, they would be on her side.

Jane

Oh, certainly, that's why I'm not calling her an idiot or anything 😊. I might feel that her choice her can be described as appalling, but it's a choice that is well supported within her framework of beliefs – Callow above all.

MetruX

Really, I get astounded by how much fear the Dead King has inspired in some readers. Yes, he is a monstrous abomination who could never be stopped before... Except on the only time he left to conquer. And we already saw he can send undeads made especially to be ignored by Masego's new toy, so he has alot of information on outside and alot of power not shown, so... Why hasn't he done anything with that yet? It may be that he doesn't want to. Sure, he is a Villain, but anyone who lived for so long, and fought so much Crusades, can't be a simple powerhouse, he needs to have some trope conscience, the same way the big heroes need to. As such, just think for a moment, what are the chances he NEEDS an ally (maybe Cat especificaly) to be able to leave his lands? What are the chances he WANTS to conquer the whole continent? What are the chances that he WOULD try something like that, fully knowing that this time he would be the one defeated in the end, even if he succeeds?

No, after considering it all, the risk is really minimal. The chance that he betrays her is already lower than Hasenbach's, and we don't even know what he truly wants or what are his limitations, as such, dealing with him is a lot more reasonable than you people seem to assume.

Jane

My issue isn't so much with what will happen so much as what Cat reasonably believes might happen, and her willingness to go along with it anyway. She fully believes the Dead King to be a complete monster, with enough power to be a continent-wide threat, and is willing to unleash him anyways... All over who gets to rule Callow. She believes she's risking, essentially, multiple Liesses over a matter of crowns and flags.

The Cat at the start of the story likely would have considered this a line too far to cross.

Forrest

Except she already tried multiple times to go with every other alternative. Also, the issue is not just a matter of crowns and flags- it would be dooming Callow to the continuation of its cannon fodder state forever more. Under the people who had also conquered it once, and refused to help free them in the twenty years of prior occupation they just got out of. (twenty-two? three? Counting the time she was working as the Squire?)

That's not even bringing up how poorly Procer treats its people, or the fact that Callow citizens would likely be treated far worse by Procer than their own.

Cat is in this to bring some measure of peace to Callow. She's trying to make the best of a bad situation, and she's used to having to choose the best of many awful and terrible choices. She feels like there is at least a chance with the Dead King she is not getting with the others. My guess is? She's going to come out of this with some measure of drive to make Creation give her better options.

Jane

She's tried every alternative but the one she knows will end the conflict – surrender. She doesn't have to continue this fight, even if it means giving up something precious. And you know what? That would also end Callow's status as a cannon fodder state.

The Grand Alliance can handle Praes alone if Callow stands down, and there will be no more need for Callow to stand on a constant war footing.

It's true that Callow's people will likely be treated more poorly than they are now, but if she misplays this gambit, at best multiple cities will have their people slaughtered and made undead. What she's unleashing goes far beyond a normal war – it's a series of atrocities of a sort that make Akua's crimes pale by comparison. Does it really make anything better that they'll be happening to Procer's civilians instead of her own?

It's not that I don't understand why she's chosen the course she has, or that I wish she'd chosen differently (since that would, you know, end the story, and not in a satisfying way) – but it is not a reasonable escalation of the conflict in my eyes. It is the desperate act of a Villain who has been told she is about to lose if she doesn't pull the lever on her doomsday device. The only mitigating factor is that she's telling herself that it might not result in massive collateral damage because they can stop him before he does any real harm.

This came out rather harsher than I feel, but I do think this is an important moment for her character that we shouldn't downplay – this wasn't a freshly minted Villain starting a rebellion so that she could win accolades in putting it down. This was on par with unleashing demons across the entire continent to destroy her foes. If this goes even slightly wrong, it will be a black mark on her record worse than most of the Dread Empresses that precede her.

And I won't judge her for that, to be clear – but I think it's important that we recognize how grave a crime she's willing to commit in order to get her way. This was clear Villain work on her part, not the Hero On The Wrong Side sort of thing we usually see from her.

Agent J

Surrendering would end the conflict, yes. It would not, however, end Callowan suffering. Firstly, Callow would erupt in civil war. All sides bleed and all sides are Callowan.

Secondly, and much more importantly, what Hasenbach wants? It's been done. Callow has been annexed by Procer. Praes was littered with Crusader states. Hell, the Dread Empire was founded on the rebellion against that.

And would you look at that. Here we are again. Fighting the same old war for the umpteenth time. It's not this conflict alone Cat is trying to end, but the entire story. The one etched into reality itself and has designated her people as sacrificial lambs.

Hasenbach is sowing no new seeds and will reap no new crops. A Grand Alliance of Good is all well and good, but her only answer to Evil is slaughter, subjugate, and exterminate. Ignoring the fact that there are real people on both sides just trying to make it through their daily grind and in no way deserve such a fate, the more pressing matter is that, in this narrative driven world such a thing is doomed to failure. Even if it succeeds, it will be a transient victory. A new Maleficent will rise, a new Priestess of Night, a new Callowan Villain just trying to save her people from all who seek to prey on them.

Hasenbach is playing within the Gods paradigm and the Gods thrive on conflict, serve them and you perpetuate their engineered conflict.

Cat is the only player at the table trying to step outside their paradigm and put an end to all the senseless Good v. Evil bullshit. Don't slaughter the hungry Praesi, fucking feed them and eliminate their need to piss in everyone's Cheerios each morning. Step one in eliminating conflicts on the world stage is to address people's concerns. Cordelia has no intention of doing that.

In short, surrendering to the First Prince will only perpetuate the same status quo that has already condemned Callow to endless warfare.

Abrakadabra

Yes alternative x should never be thrown away completely. At a question by some reporter aimed At Putin (which went like in a hypothetical scenario where nuclear missiles heading for Russia would he not use his own in the hopes of mankind survival) he said that there is no need for a future where Russia does not exist. Which is really terrible and justifiable at the same time.

MetruX

Well, that is exactly the thing, she DOESN'T know what the Dead King wants, but she does know that Hasenbach would make Callow bleed with civil wars, and that it would probably end with her dead anyway. Really, the slight chance that the Dead King who never invaded anyone except together with THE great invader, might turn the continent to undeath... Honestly, I don't think this Villain even wants that. So I'd say her choice is much more reasonable, especially since, if things are too bad with the King, she can just table it until Black shows his (we all know it'll be) winning hand, and she can negotiate with the First Prince on better terms. Sure, those better terms will make Hasenbach and her dreams disappear, which will make lots of important people try to murder Cat, but it's a much better outcome than this negotiation right now being accepted.

papermache7

It's so easy to hate Good from Cath perspective, they're so certain of their victory they're completely blind to how they're bringing about their own doom.

Death Knight

And if you think about it, isn't that the exact same insanity that usually plagues Dread Emperors?

NZPIEFACE

She's not certain of her victory. She either has this victory, or her country is fucked. That's why she's forcing it so hard.

Too bad for her, Procer has always been fucked.

Eduardo

I Wonder what the dead king wants

Death Knight

The Heroes broken and the Heavens humbled.

PotatoMan

Guess we'll find out 😊

Speare

What exactly is Cordelia trying to/has already unleashed? Has this been covered?

Oshi

She has built a concerted and likely permanent end to all the wars between the kingdoms of good. Which means that all the Kingdoms of the west are aligned and sticking with each other. Politically it eliminates the biggest internal threats letting all of them focus on external ones.

Short answer she got every sword pointed somewhere else.

Jane

The Grand Alliance, when it's not being used as a Crusade vehicle, has terms which forbid military conflict amongst signatories, and outlines a process for disputes to be settled diplomatically under the oversight of a neutral third party. It's essentially a simplified fantasy UN, and would likely end most war on the continent – along with ending the remaining Evil powers, since they're as happy to use it as a sword as they are a shield.

Of course, that will only happen if their first venture isn't a dismal failure, so... Either Callow gets subjugated, or the continent falls back into violent bickering. Heck of a choice, isn't it?

I kind of got the impression that she also has another card up her sleeve, but looking back over things, I think I was just reading too much into things.

Yavandir

I think that Hasenbach unleashed Dead King he is a tool for the guys below to beat good guys when they are going to make something like permanent alliance against evil thingy.

Aeon

So glorious. Pilgrim's own actions are forcing Cat to ally with the Dead King that he claims to be the true enemy. I can't wait to see him realize that this was the tipping point. Also, really can't wait to see Cat put Cordelia to the sword.

Death Knight

Yes, her head is in dire need of removal.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Hmm what does the Augur say about the odds of Cat flipping the table to DK?

oldschoolvillain

It seems like she can only foresee plans when they are an immediate threat to Procer, and especially only when it's actually a PLAN, rather than just an opportunity being taken. I don't think she can see Cat's intention to ally with the Dead King – if Cordelia had gone into that negotiation knowing that Cat would ally with The Original Abomination if she didn't reach peace . . . I suspect peace would have been reached.

Death Knight

Not necessarily. If Cat was forthcoming with her intention of allying with the Dead King Cordelia would take that as all the confirmation she needs to decry Cat as a true Villain, to be stomped out like Praes. Confirmation Bias all but ensures that's how Cordelia would perceive it since she and Pilgrim already view her as a Villain.

"When faced with the prospect of changing their minds or proving that's unnecessary almost everyone gets started on the proof."

Morgenstern

Or it gave reason to not want a peace with this person EVER. Because someone who is willing to ally with THE DEAD KING...

Morgenstern

Oops. ^^ That post did not get shown before. Sorry for the kind-of-double post, then 😊

Dantalian

Hierarch probably already knows about it.

Yotz

The thing with precogs – they are insultingly easy to kill, really. Well, unless they have read the script, in which case we are in Marysuetopia, with all consequences attached. The trick is to overwhelm them with so much possible dangers that they can not be able to react adequately. Don't send a singular assassin – send a team of thugs, several snipers, a keg of munition-happy maniacs, several magic users of random specializations, a rabid dog, and a herd of sabertooth gerbils trained to chomp people's toes. If precog won't go out with aneurysm, add blanket release of malaria-carrying mosquitoes to the plan.

Same reasoning can be applied to, say, clouding precogs ability to see long-time threats with constant buzz of more immediate ones. Like, say, invading the heartlands of precogs country with several rogue legions to create a massive pattern of imminent threats that will smother and drown any possible relatively reliable precognition results under the avalanche of impossibilities...

Death Knight

Hahahahaha oh that's brilliant. And I believe that's exactly what Black will do: sensory overload.

Someguy

He would realise it and rationalize it away as the Will of the Heavens with a Villain ruling Callow, the normal set up for Evil siding with Evil. After all, the price for peace in the West is the sacrifice of Callowan blood in the East , it's not his home that's burning.

Rook

I don't see why the Pilgrim is getting flak for it honestly. He's making the exact same choice that Cat is, from the other side of the fence, and being received in the same way.

Cat is a natural born hero, going against her personal wishes and resorting villainous means for the practicality of saving Callow. Even so, it makes little difference because her status as a Villain affords her little trust in the eyes of the Cordelia and the Crusade.

The Pilgrim is both reasonable and even personally agrees with Cat on many points, but is going against his personal feelings and sense of right and wrong for the practicality of the Greater Good. Even so, it makes little difference because his status as a servant of the Gods Above affords him little trust in the eyes of Catherine and the Woe.

I think, at the end of it all, the conclusion between the Pilgrim and Cat is going to be a quiet and bitter one, rather than any sort of vicious satisfaction. There's too much similarity between them.

Yotz

There are no more bitter rivals than people striving for the nearly same goal. Especially, if said goal is idealistic in nature. Just lightly off. Like the word in ancient manuscript that can mean either "god" – if dot above certain letter is in the middle, "man" – if said dot is to the left of the letter, or "cinnamon roll" – if there is no dot, and all the kerfuffle was because of a piece of fly excrement that was mistaken for a diacritical mark by some ancient scribe.

Snowfire1224

Is that a discworld reference? I remember something about that with the Klatchians.

Jane

If I'm not mistaken, it's from Thud!, but... I could be wrong. It's been a very long time since I last read a Discworld book.

Oshi

Except from Cats view it is ALWAYS Callow that sacrifices. She is right that the continent in general has no intention of ever granting Callow peace. It exists in their minds a the whipping boy so they never have to deal with sacrificing their own. It's just another in a long line of someone has to pay its best that if its Callow and not us. He literally admitted that the Crusade and Callows fall is the fault of the West but still they do it again sacrificing Callow for their own peace. He has the gall to quote the greater good when it has systemically failed to produce anything but suffering in hundreds of years. It is always a possible peace in the west means more Callowan deaths. This is Cat's perspective in any case. It is not wrong.

Jago

I have no problem with Cordelia position. She is playing a political game and thinks that Cat position will be even worse in a month. So, for her, it is not a problem stalling and pushing for more.

My problem is with Pilgrim position. He is not trying to get peace, he is trying to get an absolute victory. But almost absolute victory is something that will empower Evil, while an absolute victory means the end of the world, as the question/bet that was at the basis of the world creation would be resolved and there would not be any reason for the gods to keep it running.

Essentially he is going "all in" with a bet that will almost certainly go against him. And he is a trope savvy character, so he should know it. He is suffering from Good God blindness.

Death Knight

Well, Tariq and Cordelia asked for it.

And so the entire Calernia will know fear once more...

IDKWhoitis

Someone correct me if Im wrong, but is there a distinct possibility that Cat will be able to pick up Black on her way to Keter? Because bringing Black along for the ride, while a good idea for practical reasons, will be absolutely hilarious.

Or alternatively she can pick up on the way back, but that way lies less Dead King / Black conversations.

Jane

I don't think Cat is likely to go anywhere near Black without knowing what he's up to. After all, for all she knows, doing so could blow up his plans and get him killed.

Amoonymous

Definitely agree with this. She's certain that Black knows what he's doing and is going to fuck Procer's shit up, so she'll stay away to minimize introducing unforeseen variables.

And honestly I agree with her. Black is almost certainly going to take Cordelia's complacency and find some way to absolutely fuck Procer over.

Unfortunately, she doesn't have a ton of time and needs something to help her defend before whatever Black is up to pays out.

Fella

I think I actually have an idea about what Black's doing. He makes his plans based off of a narrative set of mind.
Scene: The hero's friend and confidante is brutally killed, as a result of an evil empire meddling where they have no business. What's the hero's response?
Generally, the hero goes into a full revenge arc, against all the odds in the world, to slaughter the rulers of the evil kingdom and topple its influence.

Black's flipping that to the Evil side. Captain was murdered because of direct involvement by Procer. Upon them then attempting to invade with overwhelming numbers, Black is fighting against all odds to topple the bastards who killed his friend.

How do these arcs end?

Generally, the protagonist wins with serious consequences in terms of morals/remaining friends, or wins but dies in the last brutal struggle. To Black, this is an insanely good set up to, in his mind, clear out the Old Guard for Catherine, while also butchering Procer as a nation. And the best part in his mind is probably that he'll get to kill the intended antagonist for Cat—The White Knight—right before he completes his finishing stroke on Cordelia, bleeding out all the while. He's planning to go out in a burst of fire large enough to burn the entire Heroic army and nation to ash, because the second best part about these schemes is that the worse the odds get, the better the chance he'll actually have of completing his objective. Because a thousand to one odds is statistical improbability, but a million to one odds just might work. And there so happens to be an entire Crusade of heroes behind him.

Decius

All of the heroes are going to be focused on Black. How will they respond to the entrance of the Dead King?

superkeaton

Oh Cat, it must be frustrating to so desperately try to avoid making the Wrong Choice while everyone else does the same and seems so happy to do so.

Cordelia disappoints me, I was hoping for more from her. Pilgrim being a dead end was a given, the man's too old and tired and he's placed too much of his faith in Cordelia and her works to gainsay them.

Time to treat with a Monster, Black Queen.

Death Knight

If Malicia had the narrative weight to bestow the Name of Black Queen onto Cat then the Dead King most certainly has the same should he offer marriage to Cat.

Someguy

Nah. Black Queen isn't a Name, it's just what she's called like how Warlock is called "Sovereign of Red Skies". Her Name was stripped when Black used his Aspect on Lisse.

Her current Winter powers is a Fey Mantle based on the former Winter King's fudgery titling her Duchess of Moonless Nights (Fey Title, King still has her mortal heart). Being technically the last Noble of the Winter Court it got her title upgraded to Winter Queen.

I suspect her not being Fey or Fey-blooded is what currently keeps her Mantle a mantle, if it turns from mantle to Crown of Winter (from tapping on too much Winter power) Callow will be fucked into a frozen wasteland since Cat is Queen of both Callow & Winter and Winter Kings/Queens are Fisher Kings.

Yotz

But that possibility can also lead to citizens of Callow becoming new Winter fae, that would be able to live more or less comfortably in that frozen wasteland.

Death Knight

True Black Queen isn't a Name at this juncture but was very near to becoming one had Black not destroyed the Gestalt. Cat says this herself in her monologue prior to riding with the wildhunt and when she was looking at the ruins of Liesse in the aftermath of Akua's folly.

That why I said that should she allign with the Dead King and he weds her, Cat being of royal fey "blood", she would transition into that Name. But story wise I don't think that's going to happen. Allying with the Dead King is one thing, marrying him is another though people in that era did have the tendency to cement alliances with marriage so who knows?

Metrux

Well, I think it's more that she CAN'T have a name like that anymore. She was, at that time, transitioning from a warlike Name to a Ruler one, both in fact and in the Narrative: she was dealing with the state and learning alot, making herself her own political power. Now, though? She has gone past the Ruler, and she herself said she felt like this Name can never be hers again. So, yes, it will go to another direction, but I think even she herself couldn't force a Black Queen Name.

Ironbread

Well, can't say she didn't try and warn them

DroughtBringer

The first invitation chapter was chapter 2 of Book I, and in it Cat was set towards the area where she got her Name, or the beginnings of it.

The Invitation this time (from chapter 24) could be much the same, only for her new Name...

Go vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Dainpdf

Do tempting to lay all the blame for this at the Good side's feet, but the Pilgrim makes a good point. Hasenbach *can't* lay down arms, not without losing everything she has achieved and more.

The game is rigged, after all.

werafdsaew

What Pilgrim said is that he cannot move against Cordelia without collapsing the entire alliance. Cordelia's political opponents lost their portion of the Crusade, so if she wants political cover for dealing with Cat she can just discuss the proposal openly with the other 2 members of the alliance. They're likely to agree since they're not the ones who's going to carve up Callow.

Dainpdf

The whole alliance rests on the Crusade. She does this and her dream dies. That's part of why Cordelia won't treat with Cat. Plus, those two are not her only opponents inside Procer.

PotatoMan

So between Adjutant, Archer, Hierophant, and Akua, we have four out of the five of the band that Cat would have faced if she hadn't stolen Akua's spot. Who would have been the fifth member? Surely not Thief?

Death Knight

It would have been assassin's analogue.

Darkening

I rather doubt Adjutant would have ever formed a name with Akua, she has too much disdain for greenskins to ever rely on one enough for him to acquire that much weight. Archer maybe, she'd obviously be attracted to Akua and would be interested in seeing what happened. Heirophant she could probably sway, he wouldn't fight his father, but I'm not sure how Warlock would react to the Empress getting murdered and replaced by Akua. Probably poorly since she seems to be one of the few people he likes, but then, he's not exactly fond of Cat either, so who knows if Masego would still be willing to run with her.

Death Knight

Hakram maybe not but one of Akua's retainers definitely. The reason Hakram became Named was because at that point in the story, Cat was living out the succession of Black and the Calamities' story and since Cat was slated to become the Black Knight at that juncture, the story needed someone to be "The Captain" in the anlogue since Masego was slated to be "The Warlock" and Archer "The Ranger" and lastly, Thief the "Assassin".

If Akua was to be the successor of Black the story would have her recruit her own analogues to the Calamities. Might not necessarily be the Adjutant but definitely a similar Name to "The Captain".

Yotz

Ah, yes – the much renowned Moppet...

Euodiachloris

Could be worse. Could be Footstool's Understudy. xD

werafdsaew

Cat would be facing the Calamities, and Akua wouldn't be in a band of anything; she too classical Evil for that.

Oshi

None of them. Akua is old style villain. She has servants and monsters not friends/allies or a band of any damn kind.

Jonnnney

Akua wouldn't have a band of 5 at most she would have a chancellor and a knight. Evil don't normally combine to a group of 5. It's generally 5 heroes vs 1 madman. Their ability to work together is what gives so much strength to the calamities and the woe.

WuseMajor

I honestly want to see this chapter from Cordelia's point of view very, very badly. Knowing why she got so angry and why she rejected everything would explain much, especially given Kat's track record for metaphorically lopping off her own arm and using it to club her opponent to death.

I have to wonder if Auger has given her any advice on whether or not to agree to any of Kat's proposals or any warnings about what Kat might unleash. I also wonder if Auger's visions are provided directly by the Heavens or is they're just powered by divine energy, because, if it's the first one, then Auger might be telling Cordy that treating with Kat will cause great Woe, when there will be plenty of Woe to go around if she doesn't.

Death Knight

I think it was mentioned that the Augur can only foresee precommitted actions. Anything less than that likely merely manifests as a feeling of unease. I don't think Cat has precommitted to the alliance with the Dead King yet, she's just hearing him out at this moment so its unlikely that the Augur has foreseen that precisely.

This weakness however is the reason I believe Black is the right person to kill the Augur. Sure she can foresee his intent to kill her, what she can't foresee likely is which of the myriad of methods he has at his disposal (and he definitely will have at least 60) he will use to do the job.

Gunslinger

It's said in the chapter that Cordelia's chapter was a diplomatic ruse. A way to apply pressure on Cat to get her to fold.

Gunslinger

Cordelia's anger I mean

Thea

Augur did tell Cordelia "fortune may come unexpected" or so just before Thief showed up in her study, carrying Cat's a Winter-domain-amulet-thing they use to communicate now. In other words, Augur told Cordelia treating with Cat can/will be good for her. I wonder if Cordelia forgot that, or why she discarded that... warning, really.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Piece of pie, piece of pizza, why don't you bastards have a peace of my mind.

Darkening

Honestly, while I expect there to be some kind of tragedy on the way with this path, I reeeeeeally look forward to Cat going, "Welp, I tried to give these fuckers a chance, time to let loose everything Winter can really do," And breaking out the artifacts and things she's made from all the dead heroes. Hey, maybe the Dead King would be willing to gift her a couple to make some more out of as part of their agreement! Can't wait to see what the conditions of him leaving hell are, I fully expect WB to show up the moment he's in play since she's his counter, and as much as I loathe her she's hilarious to read about.

oldschoolvillain

I suspect the first words out of her mouth next time she gets out of Nowhere will be "Oh Fuck."

Antony444

And I fear you're right. She will get one look at the script and promptly teleport to the greatest concentration of heroes to inform them they're going to experience first-hand what war is when you go against people on the level of Dread Empress Triumphant...

Also have a new name for Catherine: Betrayer.

Euodiachloris

Or... the Betraying Betrayed. Catherine could have been the Hero Classic, but so much omnidirectional backstabbing occurred before she was born, during her formation and after she got Named that it's a minor miracle she isn't shaped like a buckler-and-foil.

Nobody is allowed to be surprised: she is what all active parties in Calerna formed her to be. And, on their own heads be it.

MetruX

You know, this makes a lot of sense and partly foreshadows the ending. She IS what Calernia shaped her to be...

sengachi

<https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>

Go support Erratica on Patreon if you can! He does so much amazing work for us and he absolutely deserves to make *at least* a living wage off of his work on this story.

Seriously, if you'd pay $20 for one of Erratica's books, then you can chip in at least two bucks a month. He gives a book a year already, that's a fine exchange. (Holy crap you give us a book of this a year how the fuck do you manage that?)

Death Knight

Par for the course for a Named writer.

Allafterme

The Author

Lee

Dead King, here comes the skeletons

and proud

Doot Doot

Ilphros

I think... that Fate/Providence may have the rule, "The side that is right is more likely to win" – because the world was made by the Gods, supposedly, in order to settle a question of who was right. And they built a world capable of helping them answer that question – more than one world, perhaps, given Arcadia.

And the Gods Above have spent a long, long time trying to present themselves as Good and Right. But their presenting it is finally falling apart – they have built up too much arrogance, left Catherine too much ammunition for when she declares that they are **not** right.

Berder

Consider Hasenbach's comment about "there is more at stake than you know," and the Pilgrim's decision to back Hasenbach instead of peace, and the Pilgrim's mention of finally fighting the true threat, the dead king, after the crusade is done and Praes is humbled.

My guess is, Augur has predicted a massive attack from the Dead King, but Procer misread the timing of it; they think there will be time after the crusade to fight him, and Hasenbach has a plan to do so. Ironical if this prediction leads them to refuse peace with Callow, which itself causes the Dead King's attack.

NZPIEFACE

Ironic? This is one of the most common and ancient stories linked to seers or oracles. Self-fulfilling prophecies. The more you try to avert it, the harder it comes to bite you in the ass.

NZPIEFACE

So, one thing Cordelia fails to understand is that Catherine is a Queen.

Not Queen in Callow, not Queen of Callow.

She's the Queen of Winter. She usurped a god.

I have no idea why Cordelia is treating her as if she had a diplomatic Name, like she was the Hierach or the Dread Empress. Pretty fucking dumb when you think about it. It's not as if dropping a lake was her only trick.

MetruX

Cordelia is, in a sense, in a BIG disadvantage here. Her side (not the Crusade, HER) has only a single Named, who don't understand much but can see the future. Her side has poor magical theories and small amount of magic wielders. Her side never dealt with Fae, the way Callow has. Thus, as much as it is painfully clear for us, and for a lot of people inside the story, that Cat has a special connection never seen before with Winter, it is not something visible to Hasenbach. She has not the means to see it, which means she's blinded without even realizing it.

NZPIEFACE

Not just that. Praes has been the heart of magic on the continent for ages. Cordelia's not really prepared.

Jago

And Procer, with all its "we are a Good country" bluster, has delegated the war to Praes to Callow for centuries. They know what Praes army can do and what a Named can do only from tales coming from other countries. Cordelia thinks in political terms, not about tales and roles.

A reasonable stance if Good and Evil weren't there to twist the law of causality.

Antony444

Well, the Pilgrim main argument is that the true enemies they will face once Praes and Callow are dealt with are the Chain of Hunger, the Everdark and the Dead King. I suppose it's somewhat fitting to unleash the dead legions. Let them prove them this reputation is grounded into reality...

For all their talk about being the shield of civilisation, Procer has mostly held all their existence against the rats and the Dead King was unable to enter the fray. Now everything is going to turn around...

Congratulations, Cordelia Hasenbach. You're going to see Calernia burn. I wonder how the future generations are going to see your reign...

Seriously, Black first part of the plan is already working as we speak. He told it when he was in the Free Cities. He's ravaging the heartlands of Procer, incinerating farms and everything edible while requisitioning (by force) the rest.

Amadeus is ruining the logistics of the Tenth Crusade. In several months, Procer will have gigantic armies to feed in the middle of winter and Praes armies destroyed or not, you will have to feed these soldiers. And underestimating the guy who engineered your entire civil war with Malicia is sheer folly. It's far better to overestimate him and realise all the preparing was not necessary than what she's doing...

Cordelia conditions were a mix of the Mouth of Sauron combined with Good rhetoric. She has nothing on the ground right now to justify such harsh conditions, she doesn't realise or don't care how her people are hated on the other side of the mountains and she is an hypocrite.

Seriously, her rise to power followed the same conditions...and the only reason she didn't kill her opposition was because she couldn't. It was said clearly in the extra chapters the armies of the North had to return quickly to guard their walls before the ratlings took advantage of their southern campaign.

With so many of the big villains still in the game and the first part of the Crusade already a fiasco, I would like to say I would have been a bit prudent. Either the First Prince is not a good politician, or Catherine is right: the Crusade is already escaping her hands to become its own force, subjected only to the will of the Heavens...

Oh well. It's time for the Big Bad to appear on the battlefield...

NZPIEFACE

Yes, Cordelia is a tyrant and a despot as much as Catherine is. Except she's like, 45% more Praes than Cat.

A knife in the back might as well be a shiv from the front.

werafdsaew

I think Cordelia is an excellent politician, but a shitty general, and has a habit of underestimating martial inclined Villains, due not having any experience in fighting against Villains other than Malicia. Her tendency to underestimate Villains stretches back to the first time she came on screen in the prologue of Book 2 and continues to this chapter by underestimating Black.

NZPIEFACE

"We have him outnumbered and he has no supplies, we're going to beat him in a few months, tops."

Yeah, looks like she hasn't been paying too much attention to recent history, has she?

Matthew

The Gods above must be so pissed she said that.

Before,. "If she's afraid of the Black Knight, we can give Procer a plucky underdog tag and defeat him with a half formed peasant army."

Now, "Black Knight was already near invincible when he was working against the narrative. Now, it's in his favor? Fuuuuuuuuck."

Jago

Unrelated, but I find fun that Amadeus mean Love God. So the Black Knight "Love God". Seesh.

Tek

Have to quote Edward Alban here: "Kingdoms don't die on battlefields. They die in dark, quiet rooms where deals are made between those who should know better."

Two women just signed death warrant for hundreds thousands people. Why? Arrogance, fear, mutual distrust and ignorance, no less mutual, to name a few.

Cat won't trust Cordelia because she's Proceran, and Procer is known to be prone to warmongering. Despite the fact that Cordelia been mending bridges and genually averting Proceran ambitions for the sake of peace.

Cordelia won't trust Cat because she's (allegedly) a Villain, and Villains are known to be prone to backstabbing and lies. Despite the fact that Cat's been trying to mend the same bridges and genually shooting herself in the foot for the sake of peace.

Both want peace, both want to talk, but both don't trust each other one bit, while expecting the other one to trust you unconditionally. Here's the fucking idea for ya: don't. Be so stupid that is. Both women are (allegedly) smart, yet incapable of putting themselves in each others shoes.

You can invite trust (if you want it fast, any way) only one way, by making a leap of faith. Taking the first step, and doing, instead of talking. One may argue that Cat done a lot, but what of it is actually known to Prince? All she saw was that: a Villain slaughtered thousands of Crusaders and driven them off by the threat of starvation. Is this not how any other Villain would do? Gods, if you want to be treated differently, then act differently. Cat's staying her hand looks the same as here being simply to weak to actually wipe out the whole army.

What can she do then? Aside from abdication and all that jazz? Well, crazy thought – talk. Just tell Cordelia about, oh I don't know, a Dead King inviting you to talk, presumably about an alliance? A Liesse Accords, just a hint if you really can't do more? Tell her about Bonfire, about so many more Dark Day protocols hidden in the Tower. Remind her that a story about hubris and stubbornness bringing ruin is a story too. Explain your position, make her understand that you are cornered and desperate, that one more push and you will start making literal deals with devils.

Can it backfire? Sure. Spectacularly. But you can't make a huge gain without taking a huge risks, and mending a trust, broken from the days immemorial is a huge gain. At least that way there won't be no "conversation haunting them for years to come".

But what would I know?

NZPIEFACE

Eh, you summed it up quite well.

Sadly, neither of them think they can actually afford to be stabbed in the back.

Well, they're not wrong, but how they're doing this is a definite path to doom.

werafdsaew

I agree that the lack of trust is the issue, but it's not really the lack of trust between Cat and Cordelia that is the problem, as that can be solved by an oath, since Cat is a fae. The problem is that the people of Callow don't trust Procer, and the rest of Calernia don't trust Praes, and thus by extension its nominal ally Cat.

NZPIEFACE

Nah, even with an oath, Cordelia would barely try and take the risk of trusting Cat. Who takes a deal that's too good to be true?

Also, how many times has Cat fucked Akua over because of loopholes in oaths?

Death Knight

Ah, gotta love prisoner's dilemmas. They come in so many delicious flavors.

werafdsaew

That's why you need to lawyer the shit out the oaths.

Forrest

I would argue Cat was not being that distrusting, and that she came into this making concessions. The First Prince, also, has not been shown to be story savvy. Literally considering how much she relies on the Augur to save her and her plans/allies. Despite being such a 'master' negotiator, she seems to fail to do just that time and again, let alone being able to read the situation and say 'This person seems to genuinely think I'm putting myself into a bad position, huh. Why would that be?'

Meanwhile, Cat was not only offering to shorten her time to abdication but clear the pass, help in the war with Praes, spirit the Crusade to the seat of Malicia, and was willing to give way more ground than Cordellia. Let's be honest, Cordellia here was being stiff. This story has already discussed the nature of those rigid versus those more fluid in the narrative. The chapter had Cat realize that Cordellia's anger was a front to get her to concede, but that is the only bit of negotiating the other side did other than bargain her down to five years.

Cat even went to the Pilgrim and offered to let herself die for the sake of letting her country find peace. In other words, she offered him her life. And he turned her down because he didn't want to see Cordellia's position take such a huge hit, and he felt that good ending the wars with themselves was somehow better than ending the constant Good v Evil narratives that claims countless lives throughout time.

And that is exactly what was being offered, and he somehow did not realize that ending Good v Evil, at least here, in this place, should be far more important to him. You might say 'well, if she's being redeemed she wouldn't be a villain anymore.' Except it was the villain making this offer, knowing of the redemption story, for the sake of their country and people.

And honestly, the pilgrim should have been at least a little more hesitant to turn the offer of her life for peace down. You know, since he is supposed to be story savvy enough to realize what picture that's painting for her, and that it does not end well for his side.

Forrest

Also, forgot to mention that telling Cordellia of the Dead King would have been a dumb move, and caused all negotiation to break down. Wasn't even negotiating in bad faith, as that was a measure she was desperately trying to avoid at all costs. The Liesse Accords would have been an issue as well as those are the agreement to get everything to work smoothly for the future, pushing them through now would cause significant problems.

coloursofdespair

The problem here is that Callow **is** going to be fucked over if she agrees with Cordelia. Civil wars would plague the country, it's already been established that the country is I'm dire needs of eldersmen (eg. Scholars and learned people) to run the country AND there is no assurance of help from Cordelia's side – mainly because Callow, as a country, won't trust her.

Also, as someone said before; if Cat explains all the things she could have done, especially the deal from the Dead King, Cordelia's confirmation bias would lead her to a faulty conclusion

Thea

Agreed, if Cordelia's internal position is so weak she can't make peace with Cat... She can't stop her princes from screwing Callow over in the aftermath, once the crusade is over Cat out of the picture. Letting them do it would take political pressure off her, so she can push more "worthwhile" endeavours.

Jason Ipswitch

But Cat isn't doing what any other narrative tied Villain would do. "Here's a tough but fair deal, now go home," is NOT supremely villainous. The traditional Evil moves would have been to laugh while they starve, and either harry their retreat turning it into an epic bloodbath, or to crush them utterly. The attempt to crush them utterly would lead either to an Evil victory (sending the Princes heads back in baskets), or an Evil loss, as the forces of Good triumph against impossible odds.

Cordelia does seem out of her depth here, on the Good vs. Evil battlefield of narrative. I don't think she, or even Pilgrim, really grasp Black's whole approach of carefully subverting the narrative. Hasenbach is practically blind to story, and the Pilgrim can see the patterns and work with them, and within them, but I don't think he has any deep grasp of how Cat has been reframing her own story ever since Book I.

Jago

Cat offered:

- binding oaths;
- test by truth-telling Pilgrim.

Cordelia refused both as she aims for more and doesn't want to give any guaranteed.

Hard to give trust when the other party refuse to give or accept any guaranteed beside total and immediate capitulation.

Fern

ugh, this really is terrible. Maybe Hasenbach really does just want to make sure the framework she's trying to build will last, but she's still overplaying her hand out of some belief that Cat is a small fish.

Cat's the underdog in this story, and while that's not an instant win it's going to give her a big push. The Procerans won't know what hit em

shieldredblog

Cordalia seems to be aiming for nothing short of perfection, she set it up so that she needs a perfect win to meet her goals and build a stable Calernia.

The ways in which that is stupid are too many too count. But il try a few.

1) Dwarves: Thee most powerful Calernian nation are probably not cool with a united surface world. It would take little effort on their part to break the Grand Alliance.

2) Conquering Callow does not magically revert it back to a Good country. After the Crusade, the citizen's of Callow might not be so inclined towards the House of Light. We've seen it from multiple perspectives now that they don't have the moral authority they used too. I imagine Heavenly Human slaughter Pens didn't help that.

3) What is even up with unified Arcadia? I doubt they are going to just chill in Arcadia forever.

4) Malicia has not even done anything yet. She may be a diplomat Villain but no Empress is going out with a whimper. In fact her Diplomatic focus just means a huge diplomatic loss for Procer is coming.

5) Where the Villains at? Like forty heroes showed up for the Crusade. Did their villainous counterparts all go on vacation? New local Villains should still be appearing and running around unopposed. That can't be great for political stability.

Oshi

The only one of these I had never considered i the one with Villians. Where are they? It does seem odd that there aren't more.

Forrest

It's likely that the ones that are already there are the ones that are getting pulled into the story. Especially since all the 'old monsters' of Good are here, well now the 'old abomination' of Evil is getting involved. Also, I'd point out that this reactionary nature is much more in line with a heroic story than a villainous one. I mean, how often does a story go: 'And once the heroes came a pillaging, the great and terrible evil overlord rose up to commit foul deeds upon their faces. But lo! They did strike down the villain for impeding their path!'

shieldredblog

Even if not part of the Crusade story, easily a few dozen Villains going unopposed across Calernia should be worth mentioning.

Usurpers, Bandit Lords, Cultists, Mad Sorcerers and the like should be burning Crusader Nations from the inside. Both their heroes and their armies are gone.

Metrux

Well, this brings a question about the difference of this universe and our own. In our universe, who is villain and who is hero is, most of the time, dependent on where you start and finish the story. Let us take a very simple example: There is this people living here, and they expand their cities through territories already claimed as their own. Suddenly, this other people start attacking them, and they retaliate, after a long war, they won the right for their own lands. Now, let's see the other side: We lived in those lands for uncountable generations, and now people from outside have taken to living here. They come and expand, pushing us farther and farther away... But now we won't stand for it, we fight, for our lands, for our way of being.

Now, this is how a part of the conflict between americans and indians went down, a very small part of it. One started after, and ended after. The other started before and ended before. Both show what could be seen as heroic stories... But neither trully are. In the world of the Guide people are CLEARLY Heroes and Villains, so there must be a difference here, no?

Forrest

Although I would point out not many people consider what happened to the native americans in a very positive light, and some even condemn those early americans for what they did. Regardless, while the world does work quite differently than real life in that people are labeled as heroes and villains before they even really get started, it does work similarly in other areas. Not including, of course, the magic and the hell portals and the fey, but all of that goes without saying.

NZPIEFACE

The thing about villains... think of it as the Heaven's are using zerg tactics.

And hey, classic villain lesson number 1. If a plan must succeed at every step, it is doomed to fail. Wait, that's a life lesson in general.

Jane

As an idle thought... I wonder what Cat's reaction would be if she were to hear that worship of the Gods Below was becoming more common in Callow? Would she thin her lips, thinking of how things were changing, or would she not care – it's not as though she's cared much about theology in the past? Would she idly think of how this might complicate her domestic political situation, or would she brood about how her being a Villain Queen is twisting Callow?

There hasn't been much reason for Callow to change its traditions up until this point, but, as you note... I imagine those soldiers aren't going to be as inclined to offer praise to the Gods Above in the future, after the Gods tried to kill them. And once the stories spread, I imagine their families will share in the sentiment. And if you need to ask someone for a little luck in a pinch... Well, the Gods Below are next in line, aren't they? And they actually answer their prayers, for the right price.

This Crusade was called in part because Callow was at a tipping point in its alignment, but I have to imagine a failed Crusade will hasten things along... Whether Cat abdicates or not. It'll take a generation's worth of work to make Callow Good again, most likely, instead of its current darkening grey.

NZPIEFACE

It would be a major impact if that happened. Callow is basically the knight kingdom of the continent. It's basically fantasy medieval fantasy Britain, with King Arthur and shit.

ahd

Two epiphanies just now:

Augur has told the First Prince that staying on this path means defeat for the Dead King.

erraticerrata has the Name of Author.

Three questions:

What are his aspects?

Is this a transitional Name or has he assumed his final form?

Hero, Villain, or Ranger?

IDKWhoitis

Augur might not understand, care, or get the full picture about what "defeat" entails. I think this might be a similar "End" to the Dead King like there was an "End" to Summer and Winter. Cat may catalyze a change in the Dead King, or push through the Liesse Accords that will “End” the threat of the Dead King.

Alivaril

I think Cat might be underestimating the Dead King. Undead-infested gate to in the middle of Procer, anyone? I can't see the Dead King just overlooking that possibility.

Actually, for that matter, she also overestimates her own gates. IIRC, her agreement with Arcadia Unified was for safe passage for herself and those under her command, not her allies. She might've ended up “betraying” the crusade by complete accident had they accepted.

Jane

An easy enough loophole to abuse. “You're under my command so long as we're gating through Arcadia”.

The Fae are legalistic enough to accept that – though I wouldn't be surprised if that also gave her more control of “her” army than would normally be expected of such a ruse. Arcadia seems like the kind of place that would enforce that sort of thing.

shieldredblog

Not to mention the giant Hellgate Warlock bandaged at Liesse. All the Dead King has to do is redirect it to one of his Hells and he's out.

N/A

I am reminded of Cat's negotiations with Pilgrim back in Ch.8. What was it she said about summoning demons? “We can't prevent escalation if your bargaining position is that we fold but you don't.”

Can't say she didn't warn them...

N/A

... Actually, come to think, given that she has Pilgrim forbidden letters, one wonders if telling him wouldn't be a solution. “Right now, my last resort is to go to the table with the Dead Fucking King. I really, really, really, REALLY don't want to do that, but I am *running out of alternatives.*”

N/A

Wait, no, nevermind, that just leads to Catherine Foundling Must Die, starring Grey Pilgrim.

Metrux

Yeah, I think the end to that would be he attacks her then and there, and one of the two end up dead, or Plot ensues.

Vin

If good won't extend the olive branch, how can it complain when evil does what evil does?

shieldredblog

What are the chances that Black uses his aspects of Conquer and Lead to start a uprising in Procer? Get a city to join him. Murder the prancing princes and ask the peasants how they feel about being pawns in Cordelia's games. it's not like anyone likes the rulers of Procer. For decades now, they have been treated like replaceable animals by their rulers, forced to kill each other and now spent on foreign soil for political convenience.

stevenneiman

Shit, I hadn't thought of that. It would be pretty crazy, but I can see the supporting narratives.

The First Prince is a madwoman, convinced that everything wrong with her dystopian homeland is caused by the Empress' schemes (which is partly true, but whatever). She didn't so much earn the right to rule as conquer her own homeland, and now she is forcing them to take part in an unprovoked war of aggression, coupled with a smear campaign where she claims that Cat is the one who rules by force.

Queen Catherine holds off the invading Proceran hordes through both the courage of her soldiers and clever diplomatic action while the Black Knight blocks the other assault before making a desperate attempt to liberate the Proceran homeland from First Prince Hasenbach's cruel reign.

Of course, the problem is that it will conflict with Cat's own crafted narrative of the ultimate feat of statecraft. Cat's desired story is of a bargain between two of the three most powerful women in Calernia to bring peace and end the constant stream of disasters which has marked the interaction of Good and Evil since the end of the Miezian occupation.

Termite

The bargain never needed to be with Hasenbach rather she just needs the first prince to cooperate, if a new and more reasonable first prince is chosen due to the actions of someone she can't control, fine.

Sanityfaerie

So... one thing that just happened... Pilgrim's attempt to turn Cat just crashed and burned *hard*. Also, he's stuck as the retainer to a hostage, which means he's not going to be at any battlefields between now and the time the truce breaks down. That's... potentially a big deal. For a guy who leans into the narrative so hard, it seems almost *odd* that he'd be willing to say "yes, I'm willing to set your little country on fire for that other person's political ambitions/The Greater Good". That's especially after he schemed this hard to put himself into a position to play kindly advisor. Did he not see this coming?

stevenneiman

I'm not seeing it. He's a mentor to heroes and potential heroes, and he's telling a particularly troubled semi-redeemed villain not to return to the temptations of Evil. She'll do something drastic rather than listen to his wise advice, and he'll be there to help her control the damage when it goes wrong and help her understand her mistake. Basically, he's going to try and turn summoning the Dead King into the animated mops scene from Sorcerer's Apprentice.

It's all total bullshit of course, but it's what I expect that Fate will think is going on. I'm not seeing any mistakes on his point, and in fact it works out tidily enough that I'm not even sure he's completely ignorant of the Dead King's involvement.

ahd

He's telling a particularly troubled semi-villain who is willing to turn away from her ambitions to save her country and her people: no, I don't want you redeemed, I want you to die and your country vivisected so the First Prince can look good and self-actualise.

"This is not fair. Nor is it just."

stevenneiman

The behavior of Procer reminds me of Thor from the Iron Druid Chronicles. They recognize that they have a vital duty that everyone depends on them for (holding off the ratlings and defeating Loki respectively), and their response to that knowledge is to act like assholes to everyone, believing they can get away with it.

Jessica Day

I expected Hasenbach to be this arrogant, she's a blue blood through and through. A self righteous royal with holy cause and considered one of the most cunning rulers around. So she makes a lot of poor assumptions here which will lead her to woe in the end...

But I didn't expect the Grey Pilgrim to be that arrogant. He actually thinks that he and Cordelia are about to succeed in a crusade, already off to a bad start, where all others have failed in the past? He really thinks that the Gods Above, with his help, will win a war between deities which has been fought since literally forever? A chance to accomplish great good, save lives, redeem a villain, all on a silver platter, and he turns it down because he thinks he can do better than any hero who has gone before?

I think I see the shape of his and the First Prince's story now: Tragedy. And hubris is their tragic flaw. Just look at their antagonist, someone fighting for a noble ideal greater than herself- defense of her Homeland. Someone who continuously humbles herself, offers to GIVE UP A THRONE, offers up her very life... I can't wait for the graveyard of princes.

Oshi

Nope but he certainly thinks that even if they fail peace will survive in the West so what is there to lose? A few hundred thousand people and Callow?

Cloudlight

Herbey I reached the end.

Max Scherer

This chapter just shows that the Good side is the dumbest shit ever and actually in my opinion the more 'evil' side. Sure they preach of the good stuff and all that and try to stop evil, but that isn't true. Now is it? They only want to kill evil no matter what and when there is a reasonable villain, they corner her so much that this villain just doesn't hold back anymore and will unleash whatever they have hidden...

AbraKadabra

What Hasenbach did is basically the same thing What the US did with Japan before Pearl Harbour. Which is again the same thing that Russia did with Japan before Port Arthur. Offering unacceptable terms, and waiting for the other side to knuckle under without a fight.

Nicholas Koenig

I think I saw the God's Below at work in this chapter. We have seen villains complaining about the God's Above interfering but here I'm pretty sure I saw the God's Below at work.

The Gray Pilgrim has put Catherine on the path to redemption with a skilled use story. Now she comes to him and begs him to protect her people. She asks nothing for herself and offers to lean into the redemption story knowing that it ends with her pulling the tower down and Malicia and herself. All she asks is the protection of her people. From here the story goes two ways:

1) The Gray Pilgrim welcomes her into the fold, agrees to protect her people and they go on to destroy evil and good rises behind them.

2) The Gray Pilgrim rejects her offer, says her people mean nothing to him. She turns deeper into evil and makes a bargain with something that should not be bargained with and evil rises stronger than before.

He should have seen this, he has been doing this for decades, he knows these stories, yet he rejected her. The Gods Above give power to work miracles, the Gods Below blind. I think we see their hand in the Gray Pilgrims actions here.

---

Chapter 27: Into Dusk

"The existence of death is the first lie we are taught. There is little difference between a corpse and a man, save the journey of the soul. They who learn to slip this noose find the threshold of apotheosis, for in the denial of passing they have taken themselves beyond the yoke of fate."

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

I'd almost expected an army to be waiting on the other side when I opened the gate into Arcadia, but it seemed my bag of unwelcome complications was full at the moment. And to think, it'd only taken war with half the continent and every hero the Heavens could put together before we'd reached that point! Sadly, I was not unaware that the moment I started believing we'd reached the bottom of the barrel some Choir would pop in, yell surprise in a monotone and reveal there was a false bottom below leading into another barrel entirely.

"What's the word they have in the Free Cities, for the snake that eats its own tail?" I asked Hakram.

"Ouroboros," he replied, hairless brow cocking.

There it was. In summary, my life was a veritable ouroboros of bad decisions feeding into increasingly horrible messes. I had to own up to at least that much, headed as we were towards what might just be the worst decision yet.

"You're brooding," Adjutant said.

"I don't brood," I replied without missing a beat.

He rolled his eyes.

"You are looking thoughtfully into the distance, a melancholy air on your face," he said.

"I'm a complicated woman, Hakram," I said. "You can't begin to grasp the depths of my ponderings."

Archer snorted ahead of us. Unkindly so, I decided.

"Like you can talk, Indrani," I sneered. "You're about as complex as a rock."

"Geology is a broad and complicated field of study, actually," Masego said.

Archer preened.

"See?" she said. "Even Zeze agrees I'm a woman of many facets. Unlike some others that won't be mentioned."

She turned to grin at me.

"Oh, things are going badly," she mocked in a high-pitched voice. "Better stab my way out of it. But stabbing is bad, for some inexplicable reason. What a difficult dilemma."

I flipped her off.

"Don't expect silver at the end of the trip, wench," I said. "Mouthy guides don't get handouts."

"That'd be very inconsiderate of you, Catherine," Vivienne mused. "She's been such a peach so far. I'll hold onto the coin for her, if you'd like."

"You've already robbed the treasury once, Thief," I replied flatly. "Try something fresh, for Below's sake."

It was pretty inevitable that a journey this, well, boring would see us turn to bickering to pass the time. Hierophant had been rather miffed that we'd kept the supplies to a bare minimum, since it meant he couldn't spell himself atop a horse and crack open a book while we guided his mount. It'd taken three days before he stopped dropping hints this was all very uncivilized.

The Woe's only tagalong was my trusty Zombie the Third, and she at least wasn't complaining about carrying most our supplies in her saddle-bags. It was a dark day indeed when the dead flying unicorn was the most trustworthy of my companions. I glanced up and sighed when I saw the sun was only beginning to reach afternoon height. We had hours left before making camp.

"We'll reach the outskirts of Winter by nightfall," Indrani suddenly said. "I know this place."

I followed her gaze and found a mound of earth covered in dead grass, maybe half a mile away. We hadn't seen any structures in days, not since we'd passed the demesne of the Count of False Blooming. Three weeks since we'd left Callow, and only now was the throb in the back of my mind that indicated the location of our path out beginning to feel measurably closer.

"I don't think this is really Winter anymore," I said quietly.

Hierophant, who'd been trailing behind and repeatedly weaving cooling spells around himself so he wouldn't sweat for the exercise, put a spring to his step so he could catch up.

"You perceive our surroundings as different, even though they do not appear to be," he said.

I chewed over that for a while before speaking.

"Before I could feel..." I grasped for the word. "Currents, in this place. Skade felt much different from the Summer territories we campaigned on. Archer says we're supposed to be in Winter, but it doesn't feel anything like that to me."

"The wedding of the king and queen of Arcadia might have affected the very nature of this realm, then," Masego murmured.

"Interesting. If the effect is permanent, centuries of research on the fae might become useless."

"The less anyone has to do with fae, the better," I said, not unaware of the irony involved.

"Unfortunate that we do not have the time to study the phenomenon in depth," Hierophant said. "Your word alone is not enough. You are ignorant and possibly under influence."

Archer smothered a laugh and Hakram went suspiciously still, like he was trying not to smile. I looked at Masego for a long beat. It'd been said so mildly I knew it wasn't actually an insult, but sometimes I did hope someone would eventually manage to badger some tact into him.

"That was insulting, Masego," Vivienne called out from Zombie's other side.

"Was it?" Hierophant said, glass eyes flicking to the side. "But it was all true."

I patted his shoulder gently.

"We don't call people ignorant, Masego," I told him.

"But the overwhelming majority of them are," he said, aghast.

"And I could spit in your morning tea, but I don't," I said. "Because refraining from doing that makes interacting more agreeable."

He looked less than convinced.

"If they are never informed of their ignorance, how will they be made aware of the need to remedy it?" he pointed out, evidently believing this was reasonable.

"Remember our heroic battle cry, Zeze," Indrani called out.

His expression cleared.

"Ah," he mused. "Lies and violence. I understand."

He turned to me and offered a beaming smile.

"You are well-read and conversant in magical theory, Catherine," he said. "Well done."

Hakram let out a sound that aimed to be a giggle but came out like a dozen angry cats being ground between millstones. I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"Thank you, Masego," I said, reaching for calm.

He nodded, pleased, and trotted ahead to speak with Archer.

"I am well-read," I complained at Hakram in a low voice.

"Compared to him?" the orc chuckled. "There's libraries that would feel inadequate."

Yeah, fair enough. It wasn't like there weren't gaps in Masego's knowledge, but it was hard to beat personal tutoring by an incubus that preceded the Empire and a sorcerer that cut open Creation to find out how it worked.

"I find it interesting, though," Hakram murmured. "What you said, about it feeling different."

I glanced at him, silently inviting the orc to elaborate.

"Have you noticed?" Adjutant said. "The further we stray from 'Winter' territory, the less... alive the landscape become."

"Winter's never exactly been a field of flowers," I pointed out.

He conceded that with an inclination of the head, but did not further agree.

"The mound Indrani used as a marker," he said. "There was dead grass upon it."

"And?"

"Does it look to you like it was killed by snow?" he said.

Frowning, I took a closer look. When snows in Callow melted, the grass below came out yellow or green. From what little I'd seen anyway, I didn't usually campaign in winter and I'd been raised in the city until nearly seventeen. The grass above the mound, though was... grey. I did not feel dead of natural causes. My fingers drummed against my side absent-mindedly.

"Warlock once told Malicia that Arcadia has a degree of symmetry with Creation," I said.

"So you've told me," Adjutant agreed.

"That doesn't make any sense, Hakram," I said quietly. "I mean, fitting journeys through Arcadia with a bird's eye view of Calernia is pretty much impossible but we shouldn't be anywhere close to the Kingdom of the Dead. Maybe halfway through the Proceran leg of the trip."

"There is much we do not understand about the Dead King," the orc said. "It is known he ruled a great kingdom, once but there is hardly any mention of it in the histories."

"Because it was ancient," I said sceptically. "And it's not that unusual. No one knows what Ater's original name was, or even the name of the kingdom centred around it. That's what happens when people fuck around with demons."

I'd been taught at the orphanage the reason for the existence of the 'Nameless Kingdom' was likely a demon of Absence, or that the Miezens had used a Censure after facing entrenched resistance. The latter theory wasn't all that popular, since they were known to have used that only a handful of times across the entire lifespan of their empire.

"There are Callowan and Praesi oral histories contemporary to what would have been the Dead King's predecessors," Hakram said. "Yet no mention of a great power in the north."

Which didn't mean all that much, since back in those days most current nations didn't even exist and those that had were pretty much unrecognizable when compared to what they now were. But he did have a point, kind of.

"So you think that he, what?" I said. "Shunted off parts of the kingdom into Arcadia?"

"The elves have done the same with the Golden Bloom twice now," Adjutant said. "It is not impossible. A sorcerer capable of conquering a hell would certainly be capable of achieving as much."

"If he was active outside his kingdom and his hell, someone would have heard of it by now," I said. "I doubt he could gain a foothold in Arcadia without going to war with the courts, anyway. And that would have made waves."

"It would now, certainly," Hakram said. "Sorcery has been refined for centuries, states capable of sparing attention outside their borders and immediate threats have emerged. When most the continent wielded stone axes, however? A different story."

Shit. That might actually be true. If it had all turned into myth millennia ago, whatever stories would have existed about it might have grown so different and twisted they were useless as a cornerstone.

"Lots of ifs," I finally said.

"We will find out soon enough," Hakram said. "But there are few entities in existence we should be warier of underestimating than the Hidden Horror."

And on that cheerful note, we joined the others.

—

"So," I said. "Anyone else have a bad feeling about this?"

"Yes," Hakram bluntly said.

"Haven't had a good one in years," Vivienne admitted.

The other two minions ignored me. Indrani's eyes were bright and excited, her stance coiled like she could barely keep herself from running forward. Masego, on the other hand, had gone eerily still aside from his hands and eyes. Which all moved from rune to rune traced in the air, as he let out little noises of surprise or delight whenever one of the colours or shapes changed.

I decided to leave him at it a little longer, eyes turning back to the eerie sight displayed before me. It was a kingdom. Or, at least, the shattered remnants of one. I had not chosen that word lightly: it was not a whole but a collection broken shards left wherever they fell, dropped by the hand of some unknowable god. Some shards seemed like they fit together – for half a mile a lake's shoreline could be seen, with fishermen dragging their boats out under the noon sun – but others were almost painfully disparate. I saw a city street lead into a dark forest, a river flow out of a crowded fair and those were the least of it. In the distance I glimpsed warriors fighting in the pitch black darkness of a plain, next to the almost idyllic view of the sun rising over a peaceful farm.

"Indrani?" I said.

"No fucking idea, Catherine," she said with relish. "I don't even think the Lady has seen this before. She would have mentioned it for sure."

Less than reassuring. Either this place was hidden a lot better than it seemed, or even the likes of Ranger preferred to avoid it.

"I'll get the obvious out first," I said. "This looks like the Kingdom of the Dead. Before, well, the last part of that."

"It could be ancient Procer," Hakram noted. "It too has large lakes. So does Callow, for that matter."

"No it isn't," Vivienne quietly said. "Look as far as out as you can see, slightly to the left of the centre."

I squinted before seeing what she was speaking of. It was city. Much too small to be Ater, but it begged for the comparison anyway because at the heart of it jutted a tall spire of dark stone. Atop it was a smaller globe, hovering in the air, and I'd seen that illustration before in books.

"Keter," I said. "Crown of the Dead."

"Inaccurate," Hierophant said. "This is, for lack of a better term, an echo."

His lips were twitching into a delighted smile, as if he couldn't believe his luck.

"And what does that mean exactly?" I asked.

"Reverberation," he said, sounding awed. "An event touched Creation that was so great and momentous it forced reflection within Arcadia. This has fascinating implications, Catherine. There have been few rituals so powerful in Calernian history, but the Diabolist's working at Second Liesse could be considered in the same league. There might very well be an echo of that battle somewhere in this realm."

My fists clenched. So there was a repeat of one of the darkest failures to my name to be found somewhere around? Charming.

"Can it hurt us?" I asked.

"I cannot speak with certainty," Hierophant said.

"Guess," I flatly ordered him.

He looked irritated.

"I can theorize," he stressed pointedly, "that we are in such misalignment with the echo we cannot physically interact with it. With the proper spells perhaps sound could be obtained, but touch or smell are much more difficult. It would take weeks of rituals."

"Which we won't be doing," I said.

"Cat," Archer complained. "Think about it. There's bound to be heroes and villains there. We could fight people that had been dead for millennia!"

"Maybe on the way back," I lied.

She pouted.

"Masego, how is this possible at all?" Hakram asked. "I was under the impression that Arcadia spanned the whole of Creation as a mirror of sorts. Was the Dead King so powerful all the world shook from his transgression?"

Hierophant clicked his tongue.

"That is a misunderstanding," he said. "Consider Arcadia as a single object being looked upon by an infinity of perspectives. To every one, it is a different realm. Across the Tyrian Sea, it likely has completely different name and seems inhabited by completely different entities. Even the marriage of Winter and Summer is contained within the span of our gaze only, unlikely to have tremors beyond. It is so with this echo as well. Something that was momentous on our understanding of the world is not necessarily so elsewhere."

"And so Triumphant wept, for she ruled but a fraction of the world and knew it to be vast beyond her reckoning," Vivienne quoted softly. "We are not so important as we like to believe."

"We can debate the philosophical implications of this later," I said. "I'm fairly certain our gate out is in not-Keter. Masego, you're sure that if we walk through a battlefield we won't get stabbed?"

"From our perspective, all of this is akin to light painting smoke," Hierophant said. "We will pass through as if they were ghosts."

He paused.

"Some ghosts," he clarified. "There is actually a very broad spectrum of--"

"And forward we go," I interrupted cheerfully. "I'm not sure I trust my ice to get us through the water parts, so we're talking the long way around through--"

I paused, glancing to the right.

"A town burning plague victims," I finished with a sigh. "Charming. Let's get a move on, I'm not spending any more nights in this place than I have to."

That didn't turn out to be a problem, as it happened. Arcadia had a night and day, though sometimes they weren't matches everywhere, but this place obeyed different rules entirely. Every shard seemed to have a lifespan before it returned to the beginning, and most that took place during day or night remained so. There seemed to be no rule or reason to the few shards that lasted longer. We marched through an entirely empty green field for three days and nights as if it were entirely natural, then pushed through a similarly empty mountain pass where the same bird began to swoop down in the same manner every quarter hour. Hierophant found a way to allow us earshot after half a week, though the sounds came muted. Unsurprisingly, Indrani pushed for us to pass through as many battlefields as possible. We took a break to the side of a pitched battle between a few hundred soldiers decked in iron screaming as they charged down a hill and half as many soldiers wearing obsidian and copper breastplates. The howlers were winning even though the opposition had a handful of mages. Those to be seen were a joke compared to even Legion mages: it took clusters of four or five chanting for a while to toss around the kind of lightning bolts my senior mage officers sent down without breaking a sweat. I sat down and watched the killing as the other ate.

"I recognize some of what they're saying," Hakram told me, standing by my side with the remains of his jerky in hand.

"The obsidian guys?" I said.

He shook his head.

"The iron men," he replied. "Some of what they're screaming has common roots with Reitz."

The Lycaonese tongue, spoken only in the mountainous northwestern stretch of Procer.

"That's four times we run into them fighting the others," I noted. "And they win more often than not."

"An invasion?" Adjutant said.

"Maybe," I frowned. "We haven't seen them hit anything larger than a village yet, so raids are more likely."

We ran into our first real city shard two days later. Masego had been getting progressively more irritated by his inability to explain why we could pass through buildings and people but not mountains or hills, but we stumbled unto something that perked him up. Inside a towering house of bricks we found a circle of twelve men and women standing by a wide basin of granite and spilling blood inside from their arms. The oldest among them, a withered old crone, chanted incantations in a language none of us knew that were repeated by the rest. I allowed a half hour break, if only to get him in a better mood. Hierophant in a mood was pleasant for no one.

"Early scrying," he told us, kneeling by the ghostly ritual. "It is Trismegistan in nature, that much can be known by the cadence, but they use no runic stabilizers at all. It is primitive, I'll grant you, but the sheer skill involved... Even Father could not use so complicated a formula purely by voice."

We moved on before long. We were all getting restless, the eerie scenes beginning to take a toll, but none more so than Archer. The longer it went on, the more often she started taking walks after we set camp. It was a bad idea, in my eyes. We knew too little about the dangers of this place to wander aimlessly. But more than any of us Indrani had the wanderlust, and I could see how remaining within the dotted lines was getting her temper closer to the surface. I extracted a promise for her not to leave for too long, and left it at that. I'd expected that if any trouble found us it would be through her, but I ended up choking on my words. It was Masego that wandered away without a word, face pale. It surprised me, considering the shard we were travelling through was a battle. One with precious little sorcery involved. The iron men were fighting the soldiers of obsidian again, by far the largest engagement we'd seen. At least two thousand on each side, and the obsidian soldiers were taking a beating. In large part, I saw, because of the empty circle at the heart of the field. Two silhouettes were duelling there. A middle-aged woman with a crown of iron, wielding a heavy mace of stone. Against her fought a man in a tunic of shimmering copper, wearing a circlet of gold-linked rubies. His iron sword was broken in a parry, and then the iron-crowned queen pulped his skull on the grass.

It was there I found Masego. He wasn't looking at the fighting, at the circle of screaming soldiers from both sides surrounding the duel. No, he stood slightly beyond that. His form dispersing a soldier. He was looking at pale-skinned man in furs, chest mostly bare and his neck covered with necklaces of iron and silver. The stranger Hierophant was staring at was beautiful, I decided. One of the most striking men I'd ever seen. It was like someone had ripped out the fantasy of a warrior consort and given it flesh.

"Masego?" I called out.

He did not answer. I hurried to his side, laying my hand on his shoulder.

"Are you in danger?" I asked.

Mutely Hierophant shook his head. After a long moment he spoke.

"That," he said, pointing at the man, "is my father."

---

sengachi

<https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>

Go support Erratica on Patreon if you can! He does so much amazing work for us and he absolutely deserves to make *at least* a living wage off of his work on this story.

Seriously, if you'd pay $20 for one of Erratica's books, then you can chip in at least two bucks a month. He gives a book a year already, that's a fine exchange. (Holy crap you give us a book of this a year how the fuck do you manage that?)

Aston W

I'm not sure how more isn't being donated considering the quality of this story.

The Inn makes 3700 a month through Patreon.

But the ranking is not the same.

Hope this story gets more donations.

LM

He doesn't market as successfully as he could. There are several promotional strategies left on the table. I would also take a few days and put together a swag shop with stickers and tshirts. Oh and find a niche printer that would craft well made, physical copies of the books. Hard covers preferably.

But if he just wants to focus on his writing, well, I'm not going to complain!

Aston W

As long as it's financially viable and the story continues.

The Inn doesn't sell except for 1 chapter ahead preview.

You pay to see a chapter in advance.

I'll look at Practical Guides Patreon again.

Aston W

It makes me wonder how old his father actually is...

Big Brother

His Incubus father, I'm assuming. This could be interesting.

Dainpdf

Catherine would have recognized the man if he'd looked like the Warlock. Plus the whole "alive for millenia" thing.

nipi

He has 2 fathers. And an incubus looks like whatever its contractor finds most visually pleasing.

Dainpdf

That it was the Incubus was exactly what I was arguing for...

shieldredblog

Interesting. I was hoping we would learn some of the lost histories of the Keter.

We already have the Tyrant of Helike to fill the classic villain niche.

The Dead King had to fill a more complicated role than that. I'm guessing he was a much more sympathetic villain than official Proceran histories preach.

Which isn't to say hes not a monster.

Dainpdf

He could also be another sort of classical villain. Akua was also one, and there was so very little overlap between her and Kairos.

From what we've seen of him, he seems to be the mastermind type, whereas the Tyrant just likes to make messes.

nerferf

He may not have been a villain at all back then,

Lots of stories of a ruler of a losing side making a deal to save their kingdom from invaders but they either didnt read the fine print or were tricked about what end form there kingdom would be usually its a warning about deals with certain things with the kingdom completely gone with some scholar talking about the history, instead the king and their kingdom didnt stay inactive/gone and kept active as a major player to current times

nerferf

Which now that i think about it has big implications for the current situation and exactly why the dead king may have survived to this day

If he was forced to do his ritual because there nation was losing to the forebears of the Lycaonese in that era, he may have been able to keep going as the manifestation of his people vengeance at what was done to them by the Lycaonese, and it was noted that procer had gained a tendency to make there own enemies very easy

And also cat is now being thinking of making a deal because her people are underseige and face destruction

Rook

Along those lines, the Arcadian projection of old Keter might be the key to it all.

Since Keter currently exists in both creation and Arcadia as a mirror of creation, I wouldn't be surprised if a caster of his caliber was able to reverse the normal effect and project himself into creation through Arcadia instead. Something that a very (comparatively) weak character like Cat definitely would be able to help with, considering her rather deep roots in both planes.

TeK

Why exactly can't he be a pure big E Evil like Sauron? God knows, for a story working on the power of narrative, there is a distinct lack of clear cut characters.

nerferf

Cause the world wasn't even close to being organized or developed enough for him to be a world wide big bad back then

His story would be limited to just his local area back in those days and unlike sauron he wasn't a god who was part of the creation of the world, he was just another tribal ruler

TeK

I meant the unsympathetic Evil monster, who does Evil just because it's his nature. Though yes, I'm aware that Sauron has a tragic backstory. But I am little annoyed with the whole obsession over making sympathetic Villains. Now whom do I hate? Whom do I root for? It's so complex. My brain hurts.

nerferf

Cause there boring and only good for a couple of seasons and we already had aku for that,

In a story about manipulating tropes and the nature of narrative no character can just be clearcut as it wrecks the whole point about a story about narratives and there meaning

I mean the dead king is the first time we get to really glimpse at how much the narrative, stories and nations have changed from when the dead king first emerged to the present day and not using that story hook would be a waste

Thea

But I like Akua...

That being said, clear-cut/simple Dead King would be boring and probably dead-dead, I agree.

burguulkodar

"You must see with eyes unclouded by hate. See that which is good in evil and that which is evil in good. Pledge yourself to neither side, but to the balance between them"

~ quote from "Princess Mononoke"

TeK

I would say that I am not a weeaboo, but, alas, I am.

nerferf

Which makes him even more amazing as he something survived all this time and still be actually relevant even while all the stories around him kept on changing

Staying relevant as a unchanging character while all the stories around keep changing as nations change and disappear calls into question if he was actually a unchanging char to begin with and how many roles he taken on over the thousands of years

MetruX

Well, we already know his power, or at least knowledge, is growing, because Ranger saw for the first time undeads with Named power. So it isn't a stretch to think he is actually changing and growing through each generation...

SHARKS

I'm betting he's another anti-narrative villain. He specifically responded to Cat and the Woe's rise. The only thing really different about them is that they don't act like traditional villains at all, and Mesago and Cat in particular have a vested interest in breaking free of the "cage" of narratives. Triumphant was the other one that caught his notice, and her thing was rule-breaking demons.

The dead King, despite all his power fought some other villains in hell (which doesn't trigger the same kind of storylines that invading a good nation would do) ward off a few crusades and has laid low for millennia. I'm guessing he has a plan here, and it's a lot more than just wanting some fae gates for a zombie attack.

Greywalker

I doubt he is much of an anti-narrative villain. He only reached out to Cat and the Woe AFTER the Bard got the Hierarch off his butt. The gem in the Dead King's possession activated/lit up signifying something, and an old demon roused. He may only be reaching out because something is in play that will benefit him. One of the more enduring narratives here is that everyone, Good or Evil, are doing things either for themselves, or what they feel is "right" or "necessary". Except the Tyrant, who is doing everything for gits and shiggles and just having fun being Evil.

Gerionar

I agree. My guess: The Dead Kingdom is something ancient Procer created by backing their victims into a corner. The same thing they are doing with Cat now. There is also the point that Mesago doesn't get tired to remind people that necromancy isn't per se Evil.

Dainpdf

So I guess the Incubus might shed some light on the Dead King's history. One wonders why he has not. Fear of the consequences, perhaps. The man did conquer a Hell.

sengachi

Or, if the Incubus was fighting here because he was bound by the (pre)Dead King, that could imply the Dead King still has some level of control over him. That would be a pretty good reason to freak out.

grzecho2222

From Red Skies

"I was first called into being when the witch-queen of what you would now call the northern Principate became dissatisfied with her husbands. I was no longer young when the Miezens first came upon the shores of this continent, blown by a storm."

nerferf

Ah so incubus was part of the army attacking the dead king's people then, so that brings to questions just what side the gods above/below were on in this conflict back then

spencer

Weren't the Miezens before the dead king's greater working?

Death Knight

No, it is said somewhere in the Books that he predates the Miezen Occupation.

Metrux

And even then couldn't purge him out. What kind of powers does he trully wield?

Death Knight

He weilds the ultimate power "plot armor". He can only be beaten by THE hero, not a Hero since he is THE Villain, the Hidden Horror, Progenitor of Praes Sorcery, Everlasting Monarch of the Dead yadda yadda.

Hest become imminently more mortal once Cat entered the Story though.

Someguy

Hooray for family photo albums!

CaptainSemantics

I love this glimpse into both the history of Keter and the nature of Arcadia. I can't wait for more!

grzecho2222

So if Dead King seems to be shaping more and more like Cat (with doing Evil to protect his people) does this mean that May-She-Never-Return will also turn out to be someone who fought for their people? Both are painted as the worst of the worst, both are scowling all the time and we know who also does that

Thea

It wouldn't be the first time.

Even the weather-stealer had legitimate concerns. As did a number of other considered-mad emperors and empresses.

But it isn't necessarily the case as obviously there are villains like Akua as well. We'll just have to sit back, wait and enjoy where this is going, instead of clamoring "worst idea ever" or "best idea ever" before knowing... any details really.

grzecho2222

I ment it in "What if it doesn't have to be powerful villain to summon Dead King, but someone who is similar to him enough in story sense" way more than that

Death Knight

Given how the most powerful magical workings we've been shown require symmetry between its components (Warlock summoning a hell wrought with storms only when the storm the Witch of the Wilds conjured up in Creation reached its apex) that is an entirely reasonable hypothesis.

Rebar

Did we just get our first glimpse of Triumphant the woman in the iron crown? I thought villains didn't age though?

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Mist-tifying.

danh3107

Oh holy shit, we're probably seeing the Witch Queen that Tikoloshe (hope I spelled that right) mentioned who first summoned him. That's super interesting

Metrux

Actually he never said he was summoned by her, but in the time when she grew dissatisfied with her husbands, so... He could be on wither side, or even outside of the conflict... Though, he appears here as a soldier on the side against her.

edrey

so, the incubus (and probably all the ancient devils) could be a spy for the death king to the evil side the death king being the ancient version of cat has low chance of being true.

there are a lot of holes, in the extra chapter there was an ancient legionary, how he end there?, before triumphant procer were just a bunch of petty kingdoms, how could not be unite against that great danger, and the other borders are not that great, rats, people inside mountains and the golden bloom. a intervention of the gods below doing nothing? demons cant be the answer to that right?

well, on the other hand, there is not need to worry if liese is destroyed, you can go there and copy the ritual.

those mirages are probably the story how the death king ended like that. if cat do something similar, the ilusion would start with black and the knife

MetruX

You're taking this too literally, people are saying he is like her in the sense that he does "villainy" for good reasons, though I don't agree with the theory, it has it's merits, and you shouldn't simply disregard it. Think clearly, what are the many holes you see? The story is pretty complicated, but for all we know he was a betrayed ruler who resorted to dying and coming back, studying all this tiem to bring true life back to his undeads, so he can "revive" his kingdom. Yes, it's not likely, but for all we know it's possible.

Snowfire1224

Just something interesting that I thought I'd mention now that Tikoloshe is being mentioned again, but apparently a Tikoloshe is a water sprite in Zulu mythology. They can become invisible by drinking water and are called on by people to cause trouble for others.

stormcaller

Can become invisible?
Causes trouble for others?
around forever?

out there idea then: is there any chance Tikoloshe is the pre-Name of WB?

Death Knight

As a native South African I can back up this legend. Though Tokoloshes here are viewed more akin to michievous goblins as opposed to "spirits".

Euodiachloris

Um. Yes-no. Tockoloshes (as in the water entities) are from the Cape and predate Bantu incursions, much like Mantis tales do. And, for the same reason: Khoekoe/ Griqua. Tok-tok, qwagga, gogga, eina and tokoloshe – older than you think, but all repurposed.

Tokoloshes have changed over time, though. But... trickery, shackles, water and their abiding love of children (in their own way) has always been their bag, whatever else about their tales change. 😊

Tokoloshes (as in made things/ forbidden things/ artificial things/ dire secrets/ Frankenstein monsters) – that's more Xhosa-bleeding-into-Zulu-and-beyond.

I'm from the Eastern Cape. I grew up with tokoloshe tales of all stripes and tragedies.

Death Knight

Hahaha awe my bru, greetings from the Northern Cape. I can see you've done your research on this so I'll concede the points. I only know of them from tales told to me by my parents and grand parents and since cultures have differing spins on the same stories differences are bound to come up with the same entities. So yeah

Euodiachloris

Tso, ja. I don't ever knock the Northern Cape – mainly because you guys know how to fight dirty with frozen Bar Ones and can argue Free State into the ground. XD

And, you have your own repurposed Nama and trek tales busy getting horribly warped in cities all across the region.

I will always be biased, though: give me any tokoloshe tale of horror, comedy, wits, a little questionable love, revenge and bundles of tragedy over a mawkishly shallow homesick/ lovesick/ ghost song concerned with travelling yesterday-today-tomorrow in the Platteland. 😊

grzecho2222

So Dead King took over Hell to hide his people in it from this female Conan? Also how old was he when he done that, could it be that Creepy Child Act is not an act?

superkeaton

The Dead King can most likely "wear" corpses. Remember, he's been on the field before for lesser engagements without truly entering creation, so he can probably work through or possess the dead he commands.

He probably just wanted to be a dead child to be a creepy asshole.

Death Knight

Ranger confirmed the "body hopping" ability in the chapter Regard. She specifically stated that the Dead King can easily assume direct command of the rank and file undead so that is likely the case.

grzecho2222

That doesn't mean that Kid isn't his true body, I have a feeling that this may be some plot twist, like "If you kill him, you get stuck as the New Dead King, while he is free to do something or is finally free from his kinda sad life"

shieldredblog

He's probably a classic lich.

As the greatest necromancer to exist, he simply has such a mastery of souls that bodies mean very little to him. Even Akua tried to set up a second chance with a newborn body and bound her soul to an object.

Probably a reason he can't leave the hell's easily is that he bound his soul to something there, maybe this "Crown of the Dead".

grzecho2222

Or he could be like Kościej (who is older than classic lich) given that Sorcerous is evil version of Twardowski and it would fit with Wizard of the West being Merlin.

superkeaton

Oh neat, demon dad lore.

Death Knight

Tikoloshe isn't a demon, rather he's a variant of a devil.

MetruX

Okay Masego, be nice to other kids. They can say things wrongly if it isn't a serious discussion 😊

Nafram

It could also be Masego's biological father, but I agree that the incubus is the more likely choice

spencer

I'm confused by who the copper people are. This seems like a strong victory for the Lycaonese witch-queen over the copper king, which would suggest he is not the dead king. Maybe an Alamanian king, to fit with Cat's sense of how far they've come? However, this doesn't fit with the glimpse of Keter in the distance and the supposition that the echos should be related to the greater breach that made the Kingdom of the Dead. Wouldn't we expect the echos to be limited to the battle where the breach was made?

nerferf

Probably the dead king's father, and these are the events that led to the dead king doing what he did

The making of the breach would not be the start of the dead king's story; it would be the highpoint in it, that means Cat is watching the prologue and is seeing how the story of the dead king began from the start

MetruX

I disagree, this could very well be the Dead King. There is a reason he is not called Undying King; instead, he died before. He conquered a hell FROM THE INSIDE. Maybe he died in this battle, that is how his story truly began.

lennymaster

He did not conquer a Hell from the INSIDE. It was repeatedly stated that he INVADED it.

The theory of the Copper King being the then not yet Dead King's father seems pretty substantial to me.

He could have inherited the throne from his in battle slain father and saw no other way to protect his people by conquering a new home, committing atrocities to make it possible.

Much like Cat is willing to negotiate with him to protect Callow.

TeK

Actually, what about Dead King being said Witch Queen? I mean, what if Dead King is just a front, not a Name, like the Black Queen is not a Name as well?

Yotz

He also might have reanimated himself through sheer power of hatred once he was slain by her – hence the “dead” part; or – as an option – it's the analogue of the “First Prince” title situation, where female-gendered form of "King" simply had not existed yet at the time, therefore it literally was not possible to properly name the wearer of Iron Crown.

Although, as a speculation most curious – what if the Dead King is actually dead, and was preserved as a reliquiae in the Mausoleum of Keter, from which he is risen in the moments of need by the Central Committee of the Sorcerous Party of the Nameless Kingdom? It surely explains why he is not seen beyond the certain radius – apparatchiks are not very keen on leaving safety and comfort of Keter's Shadow behind...

grzecho2222

Pharaohs and Kings of Poland were also sometimes women, but I don't think that this is the case since he seems to be too much of a depressed overlord who is lonely

Yotz

Hm. So, Animated Paratemporal Necromnemonic Gravures is a thing, I guess...

Gunslinger

Damn they haven't reached the gates of Keter yet but they look into Arcadia and the ghost of Keter past is fascinating. We also finally get the answer to the question of how Arcadia looks in other continents

MetruX

Which is so completely different it gets unimaginable.

Yotz

Why, one can imagine Arbuda and Raurava quite clearly, I think. Or Dikte, or Svartalfheim, or Iriy – though half of those technically are hells and heavens, but. So are the Courts of Fair Folk, from a certain point of view. And after all, who knows what lies beyond the edge of dromos...

Raved Thrad

Wait, what?

Did Catherine just take all of The Woe with her into Arcadia on a trip with no definite duration, leaving the Pilgrim in the middle of her camp / army with no Named to oppose him?

This strikes me as just a little irresponsible.

Based on her conversation with him in the last chapter, it's clear that the Pilgrim is trying to subvert the Black Queen. He also states clearly that thousands dying unfairly and unjustly is not a consideration for anything because, y'know, he's okay with that. After all, he's going to suffer for something at some unknown future time, so whatever suffering he causes between now and then, whether by action or inaction, is perfectly fine.

So why does she suddenly think he's going to keep his word? It's been demonstrated time and again that those on the side of Good do what is expedient, not what is necessarily right.

What's to prevent someone named The Peregrine from swooping to attack the way a hawk of that name would? What better way to subvert the Black Queen than to destroy her army?

This cannot possibly end well, above and beyond whatever else happens in Keter.

MetruX

Time shenanigans, my friend. They could very well have went only fifteen minutes inside, especially since it is known that the gates go through when most dramatic, if the Heroes decide to destroy her whole army she will probably come back at the exact right time to counter them.

---

This seems like a good time to address a question that has been bothering me for a while: how deliberate was the chain of events that led to the rise of the Dead King? See, Akua mentions in interlude Chiaroscuro that he opened his Greater Breach to spread undeath across what had been his kingdom, but even she implies that Keter turning into what it did was not a planned occurrence. What if the whole "undead" business was more of an improvisation than previously assumed?

We know from the order of magnitude of the energy wasted in the course of opening the gate that Trismegistus opened it by himself and not through a group ritual, converting the biggest possible amount of power an individual can. The scrying ritual in this chapter implies that the early Trismegistian sorcery in general relied on skill of individual casters rather than on elements like runes/devils/enchanted items. Thing is, the witch-queen is on the side of Lycaonese here, fighting in close quarters with the other Named, they have the technological advantage and the other side uses rituals to throw lightning bolts. I get that the numbers and iron weapons are on the invaders' side but is magic that ineffective in comparison? Most importantly, this is the fifth battle the Woe are coming by. How come we saw no combat diabolists yet?

Diabolism is, judging by the tidbits we saw so far, the discipline that relies on the individual casters the most. They have practices that prevent mental bleedover from stronger devils, the binding is done by the mages themselves (even to the inanimate objects), and the bindings themselves are called contracts for a reason. We know the mages of Keter knew enough about lesser hells for Trismegistus to open a permanent portal there, and even with the cost, summoning some akalibsa through a temporary one could potentially have at least evened the numbers.

Could they have afforded the cost, though? A sole mage has only so much power in him; even if they have some primitive rituals, the defenders of Keter would need to sacrifice something to call on the devils. The iron queen is evidently a diabolist herself, and her only summon is what, a young succubus? Even for a Named, the kind of power required to summon a devil is not something that just lies around. So where did Trismegistus get it? All battles so far are part of the same campaign, and while the lesser gods like the one in Greywood, the one that Sabah killed to become the Captain and the cranes of Stygia don't necessarily interact with mortals on regular basis, they wouldn't have caused no effect whatsoever either.

We didn't see any equivalent of Watch or berserkers on either side of the conflict so far, and while the effects of Trismegistus being in the possession of a source of power massive enough to poke a hole in reality may yet show themselves, there are only three unlikely candidates for that role so far: the scrying, the lightning rituals and the plague. Skip the next part if you want, I'm making a lot of assumptions about magic there.

I included the magical rituals here because, well, the only time we saw someone invent what looked like an actual spell was Masego imitating the sun of Summer:

"Glint on glass, stolen yet earned," he murmured. "Passing jewel, foe's crown: dawn."

Now, the imitation of a miracle may be Masego's thing (especially the "glint on glass" part), but we know for a fact that there are things like the crown of Tyrant of Helike or the Stairway ritual that are modeled after miracles, so it's a legitimate way to model spells. With that in mind, let's look at the lightning spell as used by Kilian during the melee in book one:

"I am the root and the crown, the source and the flow, the storm and the calm," she murmured. "Power is purpose, purpose is will. Gods of my mother, take this offering and grant me the wrath of Heaven."

It's eerily similar to Masego's spell in the sense of how there's clearly some kind of context missing. Still, we can glean some information even from what we see. Both include a mention of usurpation of the power by the caster; the offering mentioned in the second is clearly the smudge of blood she made on her cheek, tough it's not likely to be a sacrifice to the Gods Below: Kilian's spell straight up calls the lightning "the wrath of Heaven", but the "the storm and the calm" suggests that it may be an attribute of a storm-related lesser god, and lightning is "Divine Wrath 101". Besides, it's not like magic can be evil in and of itself: the incantation for creating fire snakes says that their origin comes from "nameless eidolons, thieves of Heaven's grace", but Hedge Wizard calls them a fancy knockout-punch used by mages in interlude Appellant, not some kind of diabolical construct.

Similarly, visions and omens are another potential gift granted by a god, and even their use as a simple spell is associated with (potentially) divine beings: fae, especially the Wild Hunt, can use them to effectively teleport, and that's before you take into the consideration those of them that are, essentially, lesser gods. Scrying easily could have originated as a prayer to a deity for a divination, and while its spell versions use workarounds such as air-based magical links and pebbles to ground them, a chant and an offering may well have been enough for the divine version.

Finally, plague is another traditional way for a god to express their displeasure. This is less straightforward than the other options, since the plague was killing Trismegistus' own subjects, but there are several possibilities here:

The deity causing the plague was hostile and/or not native to the kingdom of Keter. Remember, if Trismegistus had indeed planned the ritual from the very start, sacrificing an entire god that was benevolent to him (or at least that he could control enough to sacrifice it in the first place) would be dumb. Given that all the shards so far show the same invasion, we can guess that it happened around the same time as the gate was opened, so we may well be looking at another Akua's Folly, only the god in question wasn't artificial and so had more will to actively struggle against its bindings.

Another possibility (the one I was leading to all this time) is that the future Dead King had the god curse his own subjects. The man's endgame was turning all his subject into undead, and zombie plagues are a thing, so it's not outside the realm of the impossible. Besides, while Catherine didn't mention any zombies in the shards she saw, she didn't mention any details about the plagued city either. The deity could well have punished the invaders once they moved to occupy the city, though I'm going to explain why I don't find this possibility to be likely either.

Most of the magic- and god-related speculation ends here. Tl;dr: if there are any traces of the kind of entity that Trismegistus would have to sacrifice to open a Greater Breach, Catherine hasn't encountered any traces of it so far. Now, back to the power issue.

My theory is that the plague is no coincidence, but very much a means to an end. The ruler of Keter had to face an invasion of a numerically superior and better armed force with only an insufficient advantage in magic without power to achieve something truly great with it, so he leaned into that advantage as far as he could. This is my first guess: that the Dead King didn't open a portal to hell to turn all his subjects into undead – he killed all his subjects to open the portal to hell.

Remember, while he's a skilled enough diabolist (enough to bind demons and to know that there are undeath-related lesser hells, at least), this chapter's epigraph and quotes from his (only?) published book in general heavily hint that his speciality during his life was undeath, which led into his current Name. Despite that, we've seen no zombie troops deployed yet, even though that would lower the casualties of his own soldiers. There's no way he would fight another practitioner Named and not rely on his speciality – the one that would later make him a legend – especially if no other weapon at his disposal could turn the tide.

Regardless, if he indeed had to use some sort of improvised human sacrifice – be it an unleashed plague or simply all the people slain over the course of the war – to power his ritual, then my second guess is that the opening of the Greater Breach and the subsequent invasion of a hell are a measure of desperation, not his preferred outcome. Akua stated that it took him ten hours to open the portal, while the invasion would take months. Given that those would have to happen in short order, and are simply to massive twists of Fate to be unrelated, I'm assuming that the hellgate was opened at the conclusion of the campaign. Like, say, when he was finally out of army, the enemy was at the gates of Keter, and he had nothing to pit against the forces that were about to stomp all over his face.

Granted, the result may have been entirely acceptable for him, but my point is that even if he planned the ending to this invasion to happen as it did, but my point is that this kind of escalation would be the only way for him to turn the tide, magically superior lich or not. The invasion of a hell also makes very little sense unless he botched its making in some way, since all the devils that would come into Creation would also be bound to his will, which leaves no functional difference between owning the gate (which he did as of moment he finished the ritual) and owning the hell (which cost him untold amounts of troops, resources, and crippled both his ability to come into Creation and his cognition).

My third guess is that the whole “trapped in hell forever” deal isn’t an accident either, nor is it an acceptable consequence which he foresaw. Normally the kind of event that took place here would see a band of heroes rushing in to prevent it. Unless it was an entirely accidental “how do i into hell” by some bumbling comic relief, which Trismegistus wasn’t, the Heavens would send a champion at least to the final confrontation. Akua’s Folly is a notable exception, since a) while Fate had provided a conflict fitting an event such as an opening of a hellgate, it was entirely between villains (like here, because a diabolst that changes husbands like gloves doesn’t look particularly Good to me), and b) because it was a Bard’s plot all along, down to stopping the Good elves from preventing the whole thing.

But here’s the rub – what if Gods Above, despite not stopping the Greater Breach from happening, got to intervene afterwards? Due to the nature of hells, a portal into one effectively means infinite armies for its owner – a disturbance in the balance like none before. Unless, of course, the villain in question is in a position that doesn’t allow for such usage of it. For example, if he himself, baited by a heroine, crossed the boundary and is now trapped inside at the cost of her life – and the Fate would help her, too! This is my theory on how Bard was created: she was reborn in her current form after tricking or banishing the Dead King, and serves as an opposite of his. She, too, cannot intervene directly by the nature of her Role, but has a form of immortality and an ability to change appearances between incarnations. That also would imply that the Dead King’s influence stretches further than seems at the first glance, but as to how I have no clue.

grzecho2222

We don’t a lot about Dead King motivations or plans, it is also possible that his plan was to find safe place for his people and “he got his wish granted, but not in a way he wanted” by rising all the people that died in the war as his army to Defend His Lands And People Forever and keeping Him And His People Safe From Enemies by locking them in some weak Hell (if there is endless number of them, some will be weak). We also know that he kidnaps people (children), but why? He has his own people in Hell, the safest place that we know of. It looks like he is slowly evacuating people from Creation to his Hell more that trying to conquer anything

Metrux

I’m sorry, when has he ever kidnaped children? I don’t remember this being ever shown or said.

grzecho2222

Some Hero (I think White Knight) mentioned that in past Dead King offered peace in exchange for some number of children yearly to some ruler of Procer

Raved Thrad

Here's a thought: what if he needs to feed off the life-forces (or maybe even the actual souls) of children to sustain his existence? From the interlude with Ranger invading Keter for fun, it's clear that he (or his servants / slaves / automatons – same thing) have the ability to cook wholesome, nutritious food. How far-fetched is it, then, that he might actually have living subjects who breed children for him to leech his lichdom off of?

grzecho2222

He has living people in hell already and as Villain he already is immortal, so why he needs so many children and why he has them living in villages instead of some prison camp?

Raved Thrad

It's the only reason I could think of why he'd want children as tribute.

nick012000

>Why haven't we seen any combat diabolists yet?

I think it might be because proto-Keter was on the side of Good, and was being invaded by an Evil Empire.

Metrux

I will admit this is the first comment in a long while I didn't read fully. Though, for a fount of energy he could very well have used devils, since it's been noted he created the Breach from inside the hell, he had plenty of tasty sacrifices to use...

---

Where was it said that he opened the Breach from the inside? I always took Akua's descriptions of the process as it needs to be done from Creation, sacrificing some (gigantic) amount of power that is already there, which the devils were not.

lennymaster

One, Masegos father stated that he was first summoned AT THE TIME the Witch Queen became dissatisfied with her husbands. He could have been the then not yet Dead King's spy. There is no proof the Witch Queen was a Villian or a diabolist.

Two, it was in the last battle so far that Cat and co witnessed in wich the obvious leader of the copper people died, most likely slain by the Witch Queen. My theory is that that was the yet to be Dead Kings father and predecessor.

Three, I do agree that Wandering Bard might have originated there, I wanted to argue on the scale in wich she was involved, but the more I think about it the more likely it seems that she already played a major role.

Four, the plagues existence might be coincidental, or it could have meaning, though I doubt that it spread the undead rather than beeing the sacrifice to power the invasion of the hell.

NZPIEFACE

Wouldn't be surprised if this trip was only 12 hours real time.

grzecho2222

Kingdom of the Dead and Deoraithe used to be next to each other and both of them are masters of necromancy? Or are they the same people? Because that could have hilarious implications, if there are living descendants of Dead King.

Lemon

Neat that we are seeing the story of Keter unfold. I am guessing Procer was winning, and had used a magical plague. The Dead King might be a Fetohep-type character. And maybe even not the original king, if that First Prince killed the real one. Would be neat if he took up dominion of Hell in order to change his people's story, like Black wants.

---

Chapter 28: Archaic

"An offer to 'kneel or die' would be insincere, Matrons. Deny me and your corpses will be made to kneel anyway, as I have a chorus of your children scream a cheerful tune."

– Dread Emperor Nihilis I, the Tanner, negotiating the end of the Fourth Goblin Rebellion

I had a mildly amusing comment about Warlock's unexpected longevity and lack of tan on the tip of my tongue, but I smothered it without missing a beat. Masego, looking at what most likely his second father – the incubus known to me as Tikoloshe – had cast to his face I'd never seen before. He looked betrayed. I squeezed his shoulder comfortingly, even though I didn't know the reason for his grief, and did not bother to ask whether or not he was certain of the incubus' identity. Hierophant was not in the habit of make assertions unless he was certain of them.

"Why?" Masego murmured. "He knows I've been trying to piece it all together for years. Gods, what practitioner from the Wasteland hasn't? He was there. He saw it with his own eyes."

He hadn't raised his voice, and in a way that worried me more. Anger I knew well, and how to soothe it. Whatever... this was, I was poorly equipped to handle it.

"He might have been trying to protect you," I ventured.

His hand whipped out and a streak of flame tore through half a dozen soldiers, burning bright blue.

"I am not a child, Catherine," he hissed, "I do not need to be coddled. Refusal I could forgive, but to force ignorance upon me? As if I was some meddling hedge mage about to blow his fingers off. As if I was incapable of grasping my own limits."

I heard Hakram stepping lightly behind us, having finally caught up, but without turning I raised my hand and signalled for him to withdraw. More people would only be adding oil to an already volatile brew.

"We don't know for sure he saw whatever ritual wrecked Keter," I said. "He could have been dispersed before that."

"Don't try to appease me," he said, turning to me with a burning glare whose radiance singed the eye cloth over it. "Papa has never been dispersed. His consciousness has been uninterrupted for millennia without a single return to the original shapelessness. His contract ended or he succeeded at slipping the leash."

"Either of which could have happened before the ritual," I pointed out.

"He wouldn't have just left, even then," Masego yelled, to my honest surprise. "He's a deterministic being, Catherine. It would have gone against his nature to flee for a position of influence. Devils like being in Creation. It is the only place they can truly learn."

My knowledge of theology had never been all that deep and what I did remember was a little rusty, but I was fairly sure determinism was more or less another word for predestination. Which wasn't all that popular a teaching, in Callow, though it had some adherents in the southern parts of it. Mostly priests.

"You mean he wouldn't have been able to choose otherwise," I slowly said.

Normally even half an admission of ignorance would have been enough to bait him into a lecture. It was telling that he didn't even attempt one, only frowning in irritation instead.

"You don't understand," he said.

I kept my face and voice calm.

"If he didn't have a choice then," I said carefully, "he might not have had a choice in not telling you either."

"You don't understand, you fool," Masego sharply repeated. "I have desired to know the answers here for years. It is in Papa's nature to satisfy desires, and his binding should allow him to do so for our entire family within limits. That contract is one of the single most complex pieces of sorcery in existence, Catherine, Father spent decades crafting the closest to the ability to make choices a devil can possibly have. Which means either Father forbade him to speak to me, or..."

"He doesn't see you as family," I quietly said.

"I'm not sure which would be worse," the blind man weakly said. "That Father would bend his will against everything he taught me just to keep me in the dark, or that Papa never once thought of me as-"

His voice broke. I winced, sliding an arm around his shoulders and tugging him close. It was awkward hugging him, since he was noticeable taller than me and just stood there like a dead fish.

"Come on," I murmured. "There's a lot we still don't know, Masego. Don't come to conclusions too early."

Slowly, he came to rest his forehead on my shoulder. Gods, the angle must have been Hells on his neck.

"He might have been faking this entire time," he muttered into my tunic. "Since the moment I was adopted. My first memories. Just playing the role, for Father's pleasure."

I'd always thought that Warlock and Tikoloshe had done a decent job of raising Masego, for Praesi anyway. He'd had a golden childhood that taught him to love learning, no real difficulties to face and if he hadn't come out of it with the sharpest moral compass in the world, well – there was only so much you could expect from Wastelanders. It was hard for me to understand something like having your entire childhood put to the question. The orphanage had not encouraged sentimentality. But I could understand, just a little bit, having your trust put on the chopping block. He wasn't the only one with a complicated relationship with a Calamity. Masego withdrew eventually, tiring of my hands rubbing his back soothingly. His face was dry, of course. The day that saw him gain Summer eyes had cauterized his tear ducts as well.

"It doesn't matter," he said through gritted teeth, smoothing his robes. "They can hide secrets from me, but they cannot prevent me from learning on my own."

"You want to continue looking at his," I guessed, eyes turning to the battle still unfolding around us.

Now that the ruby-crowned king was dead, it had turned into a rout for the obsidian soldiers I assumed were ancient Keterans.

"Yes," Masego said with forced calm. "Tell Indrani the duel here is between two Named. That should hold her interest enough she does not chomp at the bit."

I grimaced. Fair enough. I didn't really want to spend any longer here than we had to, but if it got his head in order I'd compromise. There was a part of me, that whispering voice that never really went away, that noted this was perhaps the best occasion I would ever get to turn Hierophant against Warlock. To get him firmly on my side before the day of reckoning I knew deep in my bones was over the horizon came upon us. All I had to do was ruthlessly exploit the grief of one of my closest friends in the world. It would be for his own good, too. When the dust settled at the end of the Tenth Crusade, there was a real chance that close ties to Praes and the Calamities might get Masego killed. After Akua's Folly there would be wariness about powerful sorcerer Named, but if he had a war record of fighting against the Empire... I clenched my fingers and snapped that voice's neck before burying it in a shallow grave. I was not above manipulating Masego. I would own up to that. But if I did, it would only ever be to help him. Not to rip away all his ties but those that kept him at my side.

"I'll speak to the others," I said quietly. "Don't do anything dangerous. I'll be back as soon as possible."

He did not answer, light already blooming around his fingers as his face hardened and he began tracing runes. I took that for the dismissal it was.

—

"He's been at it for at least twelve hours straight," Hakram said.

The worry in his tone was subtle enough a stranger wouldn't have caught it. It was plain as day to me. The two of us stood at the edge of our makeshift camp – raised far enough from the main engagement that at the peak of the battle the war cries wouldn't wake us – and watched Masego's lone silhouette. He'd not eaten since he began. Indrani had tried to bring him bread and water, but she'd run into a transparent pane of power she'd not been able to break through. Her screaming had gone unnoticed as well. He'd killed the sound from outside the boundary, was my guess.

"He hasn't even sat down once," I grimaced. "And he's been using sorcery the entire time. Named or not, he should be about to collapse."

"We'll pick him up when he does," the orc sighed. "Put him in Zombie and get away from here while he's unconscious. This is unhealthy."

"He's always been prone to obsession," I admitted. "We all are, but he's further down that slope than any of us."

"This is different, Cat," Hakram said. "If he begins a trance when studying spellcraft, we can ease him out of it after a few hours. Even Thief knows how, and she's known him the shortest. But putting up wards to keep us out? He's never gone that deep before."

"Family fucks you up," I said. "So I've heard, anyway."

"We're what he has," the orc told me. "His fathers let him loose after he joined us, and you've heard the same stories I have. They were always highly permissive, even when he was a child. If we don't keep him at an even keel, there's no one else."

I passed a hand through my hair tiredly.

"You know comfort's not my strong point," I admitted.

"He doesn't need a friend," Hakram replied. "He needs someone to tell him it's enough. A figure of authority."

I glanced at the tall orc uncomfortably.

"That's not really how I've run the Woe," I said.

"And you were right to do so," Adjutant said. "A heavier hand would have alienated Archer and Thief before they joined us. But Hierophant is Praesi. He was raised by the Calamities, Catherine. He understands, instinctively, that in a band of Named there is someone who gives orders. That is you."

"It's one thing to give orders on a battlefield, Hakram," I said sharply. "It's another to pull strings off of it, in private matters. I won't pretend we're equals in all things, but I try not to tell any of you how to live your lives unless I can't avoid it."

The orc's dark eyes flicked at Masego's lonely silhouette.

"And does he look to you," he said calmly, "like he benefits from this restraint?"

I grit my teeth.

"You're not tools, Hakram," I said. "I won't shape all of you into something more useful to me. That's not a road I'll wander down, ever."

"There is a difference between intervening for our sakes and self-serving manipulation," he gravelled. "You pretend not to know this, because asserting the authority you were given of us makes you uncomfortable. That is one of the most selfish, disparaging things I've ever seen you do. Do you think we swore oaths and made pacts because we were swindled? That you tricked us into putting faith in you? Are you the only one of us that can extend trust?"

"That's not what I said," I replied.

"Words are nothing," the orc said. "Actions speak louder, and the decision not to act is an act of itself."

My fingers clenched and I glared at Adjutant.

"And my judgement's always worked out so well, has it?" I hissed. "I carry an entire funeral procession of blunders behind me, Hakram. One of the most recent got a hundred thousand people kill, and we're heading towards a place where I might just top that."

"We all sat there, in the room," the orc said. "We heard the same arguments. We know the same truths, and the plan they spawned. Yet here we all are, travelling with you. Did you somehow enslave us without my noticing? All of us chose to be one of the Woe, Catherine, knowing full well what that meant. Our hands have not been forced."

I always hated arguing with Hakram. He was so infuriatingly calm and reasonable.

"Fine," I said. "I'll tell him to cut it out."

Adjutant raised his hand to stop me.

"Do not bury this," he said. "Pretend it was the argument of a single instance and move forward as before. I care nothing for your crown, Warlord. Or whose apprentice you were. I put my trust in you, as did the others. You do all disservice by acting as if it was a mistake to do so."

My lips thinned and I met his eyes. He'd only ever called me by the old orc title when it was a matter of utter seriousness we spoke of. Which meant he'd been sitting on this for a while, waiting for the right moment to bring it up. Reluctantly, I nodded. His hand went down, and I strode for Masego's one-mage lightshow. I felt the wards even though I couldn't see them. My fingers trailed across their surface, transparent sorcery forming wherever my hand touched. I rapped my knuckles once, but it was like hitting a solid wall. I heard Indrani turn towards me in the distance, but did not look. Breaking the wards might hurt Masego, so I'd have to show a little moderation. I seized Winter, wove its power into a maul of ice tall as I was and grasped the handle. I squared my footing more out of habit than true need: the construct was light as a feather to me. I smashed it into the ward once, twice, thrice before Hierophant finally stopped tracing runes long enough to look at me. Dropping the maul, I gestured for him to end the ward. He shook his head.

"Now," I said flatly.

He flinched. He tapped a sequence among the runes hovering around him and a door opened before me, made visible by the transparent power that formed the cadre of it. I walked in, dismissing the maul with a flick of the wrist.

"Catherine," he said. "I'm not hungry. There's no need to--"

"You've been at this for twelve hours, Masego," I said. "It's done. You rest, you eat, and then we discuss our next move."

"Not now," Hierophant said, "Not when I'm so close."

"To what?" I replied, eyebrow rising.

"Walking the true span of the echo," he told me. "Not true interaction, no, but the full witnessing of it. As if I were truly there."

I glanced sceptically at the ghostly battle.

"And?" I said. "What does this gain you?"

"This isn't an illusion, Catherine," he said. "It's a reflection of the state of Creation at specific points in time. The echo of an individual includes all that individual knew then. If I can carve out that knowledge and translate it into a form I can understand--"

"You'll learn a lot," I interrupted. "That's fine. You want to work on that project? I've got no objection. But you do it right. You sleep, you eat, you talk with the people who love you. And you do it at a rate that doesn't make a wreck out of you. There'll be more interesting shards deeper in anyway."

"It would only be a few more hours," he said.

"Then it won't matter where those are spent, will it?" I patiently said. "Or is there something specific to this shard that makes it easier to work with?"

He looked away. So there wasn't. I took him by the arm and dragged him until he began walking on his own.

"Come on," I said. "And while you're at it, you're apologizing to Indrani."

He frowned at me.

"What for?" he asked.

"That, for one," I grimly said.

Godsdamnit Hakram. It'd be easier to be angry at him if he wasn't right so often.

—

We moved forward, to everyone but Masego's relief. The five of us had taken to talking as we passed through the landscapes, trying to piece together the story unfolding. It was made more difficult by our inability to tell the sequence the shards took place in, which even Hierophant admitted he was unable to discern. That spawned the game of 'tell me how Keter fell', which allowed us to whittle away the hours as we walked. We tried, one at a time, to piece together what we'd seen into a coherent sequence.

"All right, bear with me on this one," Indrani announced.

I sighed at the sight of the silver flask in her hand. It was barely noon – probably – but I was less appalled by the drinking than by the fact that she seemed to have an endless supply of booze. Where the Hells was she keeping it all? If Thief had been holding the liquor, she wouldn't offer it up nearly that often.

"Do we have a choice?" Vivienne drily asked.

"Don't you drag theology into this, Dartwick," Archer drawled. "Anyway, this is how Keter fell. So there was a witch queen with a nice big mace, but she was a woman with needs. So she hit up the King of Keter and she made the bedroom eyes, but he was weird about it. You know, have her the brush off. So then—"

"No," I said.

"No," Hakram agreed.

"Gods no," Vivienne muttered.

"Seems unlikely," Masego conceded.

"You're all joyless," Indrani complained. "Mine had everything. A lovers' spat, sex and violence and revenge. It was going to be worthy of song."

"For mouthing off after your turn was ended, you get skipped next go around," Vivienne noted.

Archer muttered something sounding pretty insulting under her breath, though I didn't recognize the language.

"Hakram?" I said.

"This is how Keter fell," Adjutant gravelled. "There was a plague in the borderlands of the kingdom that took a great toll. The queen of the iron men saw weakness and struck with raids, only to find the soldiers of Keter weak. She assembled more men and invaded the kingdom, forcing battle and slaying the king on the field."

We'd seen more and more plague shards over the last two days, so he might actually be right. Only towns and villages so far, though, we'd found no city being afflicted. The battles were becoming more frequent as well, though few were as large as the one where Masego had found his father. After a few days passed Hierophant was forced to admit that a mere few hours before his breakthrough had been an optimistic assessment. He still spent most of his downtime working on his 'witnessing', but we'd all gotten used to hearing he was going to finish it any moment now. We saw our first Keteran victories, most of them won through sorcery. The sorcerers gathered in small cabals and struck with rituals, the brutality of them increasing the farther we went in. Lightning and fire were traded for spells that boiled blood or broke minds, and once or twice we even saw the Keterans fielding devils of their own.

Small numbers, and not particularly impressive specimens. Closer to imps than the Wasteland's favoured meat shields the akalibsa and walin-falme. Hierophant dismissed those we saw as being from some of the easiest Hells to reach, and noted that diabolism as a branch of sorcery was one of the magical disciplines that benefitted the most from the passing of years. It had taken centuries for the Praesi to accumulate names to call on and to learn the secrets of the most useful Hells, the line of every High Lord building on the knowledge earned by the previous generation. His assessment was that diabolism had not been a favoured sorcery of the Keterans, but that in their desperation they were turning to cheap solutions to turn the tide – like barely sentient devils that could be bound through simple shedding of blood.

"His successor, Trismegistus, found his kingdom on the verge of breaking as the iron men pushed further in," Hakram continued. "Rather than face defeat, he unleashed devils and turned the remainder of his people into undead to bring revenge unto the invaders."

He got a vote of agreement from everyone save a pouting Indrani, which was just enough to bar him from getting a swig of the bottle of aragh Thief had pulled out. Archer was a sore loser. Adjutant's story was the most believable so far, though the rest of us moved around the mosaic tiles again and again in order to see if something else fit better. We realized the underlying mistake the day after, when we encountered the most striking shard yet. We'd assumed we had all the necessary tiles to tell the story, you see. We were disabused of that notion when we found the first landscape out of Keter itself. It was the funeral of the king we'd watch die, his body tastefully covered by a shroud so the pulped head could not be seen by those attending. Among those present in the great crypt where the entombment took place was the young man I was fairly sure became the Dead King. Not because of anything he did, but because of who was talking to him. The face I didn't recognize, I'd admit. But the shoddy lute and the flask? Those I'd recognize anywhere.

They belonged to the Wandering Bard.

---

PingleBerry

The plot thickens

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

like the congealed blood gripping to the King's pulped head.

Delicious and nutritious.

stevenneiman

This is how Keter fell: The Bard decided she wanted an antagonist for her story, and she succeeded a little too well.

NerfContessa

Hahaha, you're not... Entirely wrong.

goliath1303

This story would objectively be better if you didn't comment. I have never ever, not even once heard somebody ask for, be happy about, or regret not having gotten spoilers. Nobody has ever even mentioned something as tenuous as their cousin's sister's boyfriend's mom's personal trainer's second grade teacher saying that their third-cousin knew a guy whose best friend dated a girl that worked for a lady whose hairdresser hired a babysitter that used to work for a family who adopted a kid that liked the occasional minor spoiler. So why do it? It's weird, but your half assed "Here's a spoiler, but not really! It's more of a vague hint that gives away juuuuuust barely enough to piss you of. Go fuck yourself. :)" replies are almost wise than just outright saying what you're referring to.

ruduen

I'll admit. I was wondering when the Bard would peek their head in.

I didn't expect it to be here. This is... going to take a whole lot to reconcile into a whole. We don't know enough about sentient undead to have anything more than wild theories so far, so things are going to be crazy for a bit.

RoflCat

No, this is basically showing that the Bard had hands in the ascension of Dead King.

Y'know, an 'Evil' being cornered by 'Good', so time to pull out the Dooms Day Button.

And...well...Akua's sudden interests in redemption was...well, sudden, after all that she said about how she accepts being Evil.

A part of me hope I'm wrong and Akua is planning to double-cross Bard when she can and return to Cath's side just to 'redeem' herself in the eyes of her Empress, because just like how Fallen Heroes can relearn to be Good, Redeemed Villains can also go back to Evil.

Byzantine

Uh... What are you talking about?

Dainpdf

Uh, I don't think Akua is working with the Bard for a start.

RanVor

Well, not directly.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I can see that, Akua getting the Zuko from Airbender arc. It might be a stretch, but only a small one.

Letouriste

...what? Akua and the Bard didn't have contact since long before her death so I don't understand where you coming from:/ there is no link at all between them now

Yotz

What I'd like to know, is if WB are able to maintain a conversation with someone few hundred years away from and after her current point of incarnation. Entities who can step sideways from the curve have a tendency to show nasty surprises like that – though being able to oracle through possible futures helps in being able to converse with someone from down the stream.

nerferf

Yep, seems this was a set up

Bard must have needed a long term villain for the gods above to throw shit at and decided to take advantage of a gullible desperate new ruler to encourage down this path

Its becoming obvious the bard isn't on any side really but to keep the games in creation running to please the entertainment needs of the gods above and below

Death Knight

You might be onto something. Huh, maybe we've pegged her wrong then? She's not a Hero or a Villain; she's the weaver of tales. Some might go far enough to say she's EE's avatar in the story. Her Role is not to ensure the Heroes win, but rather to ensure there is always stories to be told. Almost all stories thrive on conflict. This means she's Catherine's True Enemy. Her Role makes her opposed to any and all notions of a long term peace between Good and Evil since a story bereft of conflict is no Story at all. Though this explanation still feels.."forced".

nerferf

Not really forced at all, we been getting tips told to us through out the book

We seen her arrange things to make the story exciting by giving boons to name on both sides at times, such as she had willy free the slaves instead of stopping aku getting that demon just so both can have advantage against cat, heck she even led willy to doing that ritual and helped aku to achieve that ritual by stopping those elves from killing her

And when she was forcing Hierarch to choose a side it seemed she was more annoyed that he was being boring and wanted him to actually start being entertaining for her audience than anything else

And look how he started his banishment of her in that same talk

"No," Anaxares said. "I know you, old thing. You are the sound of the lash, the deal in the dark. You are the servant of stillness. I deny all you peddle."

Seems she has a big hand in keeping the status quo,

I think black was just plain wrong about the nature of the bard as he does not know what we know and was trying to make sense of her with his limited view of things

Just This Guy, Ya Know

Some might go far enough to say she's EE's avatar in the story.

Given that the term weaver of tales might be considered an author and that EE's Name is Author, you just might be on to something.

Dainpdf

I think this is more along the lines of her fucking up a manipulation like she did with the Free Cities, or Black's theory is true and the Dead King is the counterpart Below got when Above got her.

Jonnnney

That's what I'm thinking. I'd guess she either pushed him towards his evil path thinking he would fail or she tried to turn his genius to the side of The Above and ended up pushing him the other way.

Insanenoodlyguy

Heirch called her "stillness". I think that's accurate at this point. She works all the angles to keep everything in nice, predictable patterns.

Part of my wonders if she was originally a gnome, and her defeat will trigger a full Gnomish invasion or some-such.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Really? I see the Bard as Above's most cheatingest agent of cheating, first among all those being abused as tools by the choirs.

Unorginal

Shit, suddenly I'm feeling parallels between Indrani and she with a thousand faces (the bard.) I dearly hope I'm wrong.

Unorginal

Mind you the timing is all wrong for her to be Indrani unless the bard can do fuckery on an as of yet unforeseen level and basically mas the win button but the point still stands.

Matthew

You are. Indrani has the Archer powers. Bard has powers but they are explicitly story/genre savvy powers and her ability to stay drunk.

We know the bard can disappear. We know the bard changes faces (though not at will, seems that she just reboots periodically). We know the bard has the Cliff's notes to the story, (see her pointing out that the glass was poisoned by Assassin).

She can't fake combat powers.

Unorginal

Its heavily hinted at that Bard replaces people who fit the bill for her name, proof enough that you don't want character traits associated with her. but I'm not saying nor have said that Bard is Indrani, rather that I was stuck with a sudden sense of dread when I realize they shared character traits.

(honestly, I'm worried about her dying as a direct result of this.)

It could very well amount to nothing but since when has Archer had any aspects of name-related ways to store alcohol in large amounts and stay smashed?

Matthew

All Named can drink tons of alcohol without effect if they want to. It was established early that burning off poisons is a trick that all Named have.

Unorginal

Where is she storing it (the alcohol)? Burning out poisons is old-hat and has been noted before. There was the bottomless bag artifact/s that was mentioned by William the lone swordsman as a way someone could store a truly ridiculous amount of alcohol but to my knowledge, Indrani doesn't have one.

haihappen

Indrani does indeed behave strangely: conjuring drink from anywhere and talking about composing songs. The Bard may or may not have Archer highjacked as a way to get into the meeting of the capital E support group. In this case she can probably be "exorcised" or will leave by herself when the damage is done. Not "If", "When".

Coincidence

Have we ever seen Archer and the Wandering Bard together?
Are we sure this is really Archer and not Wandering Bard imitating her atm?

Death Knight

She likely has a bag of holding. This was alluded to in book 3 when she and Masego were trying to kidnap a titled Summer fae.

Morgenstern

Or maybe she got her hands on the "Endless Flask" of WB herself after Willy's group was disbanded / somehow got it from Thief? Who knows...

And yes, I had those same vibes. Especially after she is now telling shitty style-stories, as if she weren't even trying (or trying rather slyly to be seen as "trying, but failing"); even though the theme and maybe even the shitty style do still fit Archer. There are some bad parallels. But really, that exact same thought of "oh shite, can WB hijack *anyone's* mind / wear *anyone's* guise after all?" entered my mind after that first paragraph noting how Archer seems to suddenly have an endless supply of alcohol, BEFORE I read further on. At least now I know it wasn't only me. ^^

---

"I sighed at the sight of the silver flask in her hand. It was barely noon – probably – but I was less appalled by the drinking than by the fact that she seemed to have an endless supply of booze. Where the Hells was she keeping it all? If Thief had been holding the liquor, she wouldn't offer it up nearly that often."

Morgenstern

On a more logical than emotional note, this really CAN'T be the same flask – or Cat has a majory illogical blind spot, noting she'd know that flask anywhere only a few paragraphs later, but NOT recognizing it if that were really what Indrani was taking a swig from seemingly only minutes before...

Death Knight

Or more mundanely, she simply has a vat of alcohol somewhere that's always kept full by people she pays. Then she hired a mage to create a syphon at the bottom that is tied to her flask always allowing it to be filled. Warlock did something similar when he and Black were stomping down the baronesses who backed William. He placed a syphon at the bottom of Black's glass that emptied it into his own so this is definitely not impossible. The only snag might be the distance required to maintain the connection.

DigitalCaesar

Description of Wandering Bard at her last appearance in he Hierarch portion of the Epilogue:

"The stranger drank loudly from a **silver flask** before turning to him, and when he saw her face he recognized her. Aoede of Nicae. The Wandering Bard."

From this chapter, Archaic:

"I sighed at the sight of the **silver flask* in her hand. It was barely noon – probably – but I was less appalled by the drinking than by the fact that she seemed to have an endless supply of booze. Where the Hells was she keeping it all?"

Relieved I'm not the only one worried. But it is weird that she recognized the flask from past-Bard, so if it is the same flask with Archer she should notice. Maybe just a slip up on EE's part with the description, but it's def weird.

Jonnnney

They both fill roughly the same out of combat role in a 5 man Named band. The Comic relief/obnoxious lecherous drunks rarely dies first. The main difference is the bard is doing it on purpose while Archer is just having fun.

Matthew

Further proof that this is a bad idea.

The proper end game is for Black, Cat, and the Heirarch to work against the story.

Dainpdf

Black is more the sort to sidestep the story then work actively against it, and Hierarch does not play well with foreign despots.

MetruX

Hierarch is a tool and Black has so many death flags that he will end up unNamed if he can survive the end of the story. Both seem unlikely as allies for her, besides, great leaders make their followers greater, so I'd rather guess Cat will bring most, if not all, of her Woe to greater lengths. I mean, Adjutant doesn't trully need to grow in power, but he should grow in technique, while Masego is already the most powerfull of the band, after the Name transition. Both Thief and Archer can be seen as intermediary Names, and thus can grow, or simply grow without changing Names, like Assassin and Captain, and probably Adjutant. Thus, although they still seem like underdogs, when compared to the big guys, if you look al the way they came... And all the potential they still have... The Woe will serve her better than uniting with big figures.

d_o_l

Oh excellent, I was hoping she'd show up in this arc.

Shawn Panzegraf

TOLD YOU the Bard was talking about the Dead King when she talked to the Hiearch about "not minding layabouts on the board, so long as she placed them there!"

Aeon

Baaaaaaaard! I want to see her get forced into an actual fight. So, did she kickstart the Dead King so all of Good would have a true enemy? How many crusades have there been aimed directly at Keter again?

Javvies

The last 4, IIRC, after 2 failed Crusades against the same Dread Emperor.

Unorginal

More than just that I think, with it being hinted that some crusades were eaten by demons and forgotten (or were so minor that it was natural to skip over naming them.)

---

The author has all but confirmed that about the ninth one:
https://old.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/8d2n8g/mysterious\_9th\_crusade/dyl5fyi/

Javvies

Oh. Oh man.

The Wandering Bard had a hand in creating the Dead King?

That's huge.

I mean, I had thought that the Bard was what Good created in answer to the Dead King, but to find that the Bard is connected to his origin?

Matthew

Maybe its to anchor the evil pole of the continuum.... Like people are people and in shades of gray, By creating the Dead King, it means there is a true capital E evil that the rest can be measured against.

RoflCat

She seem be an agent of Above, sent to basically ensure this cycle of Good vs Evil (and that Good win in the end) keep going.

Basically Above want this rigged pissing match to keep on going and sent a Story Police to ensure it never ends (it'd be why Bard seem to focus so much on the Practical Evils, because they're trying to break the cycle, and why she seem shocked by Hierarch's refusal of the call)

Cicero

Or... it's possible that this was the very first iteration of the Wandering Bard, and she had not yet become a Name, but her interaction in the drama that created the Dead King also resulted in the Heavens deciding they needed their own Immortal Named to combat him, and who better than the poor wandering bard heroine who got tragically caught up in whole mess.

Somehow I feel the Wandering Bard did not get a vote..

Dainpdf

See Black theorizing that the only two things great enough that Below could have gotten in exchange for the Bard were the Dead King and Triumphant, and the latter wasn't likely. This all but confirms it was the former.

Cicero

Yes, but Black was assuming that the Heavens got the Bard first. Who is to say that it wasn't the other way around? I mean, it does tend to be the villains who attempt the super weapon, gain ultimate power, etc followed by the heroes getting a counter to that.

Dainpdf

Eh. We'll know whether the chicken or the egg came first soon.

Metrux

It isn't uncommon for major enemies to be active in each others "birth" of "growth". It's a much used trope in video game rpgs, for exemple, and in both Harry Potter and Eragon, in books, so... It comes as no surprise for me that she was there when he became what he is.

Jane

Aw, how cute, Cat pretending to have a conscience ♥ !

Joking aside (yes, I acknowledge Cat really does have a conscience, that's pretty much the entire point of the series), now we have firm confirmation that the Wandering Bard is a truly ancient monster who is intimately involved with the story of the Dead King. It's been a theory banded around for a long time, but now we have firm proof.

Jane

Oh, hm, I didn't realize that brought up an actual graphical heart. That's... A totally different tone than the textual heart offers.

Metrux

How did you make this heart? o.o

Jane

A < and a 3 shmooshed together.

Quite Possibly A Cat

BAAARRRDDDD!!!!!! What did you mess up this time Bard?

Someguy

Ah, no wonder he was bound as a Plot Flag. Any Alliance with him will be an opening for Wandering Bard to come in and muck things up. That's a major reason not to ally with him.

Metrux

The Bard is already against her, and if they trully are equivalent it's a reason TO ALLY with him, since it's simply using a counter. When you fight against fire, you want water to your side, and vice versa.

Barthumphries

Typo thread

Masego, looking at what most likely his second father – the incubus known to me as Tikoloshe – had cast to his face I'd never seen before.

Add "a" before "cast"

Hierophant was not in the habit of make assertions unless he was certain of them.

Change make to making

And there was another typo but I'm just a volunteer and on mobile tonight so it was difficult to copy/paste multiple things.

Morgenstern

Masego, looking at what most likely his second father

This sentence also lacks a verb... e.g. " ... what WAS most likely ... "

nimelennar

"That should hold her interest enough she does not chomp at the bit."

Should be "champ at the bit."

Gunslinger

Well looks like the people on the guide reddit speculating that the dead king was the bard's play were right indeed.

Ohh and don't let Masego down again. Go vote for the guide on <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Byzantine

Masego did miss one possibility: His father was bound from ever talking about it long before they ever met. Perhaps as a result of the backlash from Keter's due.

John Smith

Triumphant fucking wept, Bard, what did you do?

Did you make a Dark Lord and his Mordor just to add flagor to the setting?

That fantastically horrifying.

edrey

both sides use devils so both must be evil, but after that great ritual those ancient lycaonses turned good because they needed the miracles to survive for one the bard make a plan and backfire or is her first time, but that its odd because to manipulate both she first need to travel and shouldnt be that powerfull at the time then its the first choice, so since when she is playing? and what is the plan of the gods to taker her down?

Yotz

Possibly not evil per se, just desperate enough to try "for the Greater Good" approach – "end justifies the means" and all that nonsense. Which inevitably led one side to the ultimate downfall, and the other to the eternity of atonement for the transgressions past.

Metrux

Uhh... The side of the queen has never used Devils. Only Keter has. So this theory is simply moot.

Euodiachloris

Nope. 'Loshe was summoned by a witch queen of the people who later became Cordelia's ancestors. Probably even the very one with the impressively big mace.

Which means this was either Evil vs Evil... Or just Blue vs Orange vs a spectrum of Greys... before somebody (glances at the Bard) brought out the charcoal and whitewash.

Metrux

He explicitly says he was first summoned in the period in which a Witch Queen grew dissatisfied with her husbands. It was never even mentioned if he was involved in such confrontation, and as we see him in the episode he is fighting at the side of Keter.

Euodiachloris

It's not clear which side he's on. And, I'd put money on his contract/bonds being passed amongst a specific clan of Witch Queens, even if he got memory wiped/ smashed to bits by resummon/ horrendous abuse of the shackles each time.

Mainly because I know my tokoloshe tales, and that's one of the most common of the sex slave type. 😞

Euodiachloris

Reasons why I suspect a standard shape to the tale: 'Loshe slipped the leash and was able to grow (the standard "good", bittersweet ending for a freed, blood-bound tokoloshe – note "bittersweet", and "good" – even a happy end where the tokoloshe doesn't wind up rendered down for muti and the kids are saved will hold loss and tragedy for the tokoloshe), the love of deserts (salt is anathema to a tokoloshe; they are also often described as gluttonous if not controlled properly), lemons = bittersweet, happy daddy (tokoloshes love kids, even if they love them in a way that isn't human caring), troll (having Wekesa be a prankster is a massive plus for 'Loshe). Betcha 'Loshe has little love of heights, hates chains, avoids ochre/clay and despises being forced to stay unwashed, untidy or dirty. Probably is fine with electricity, though. Storms are an old friend and thunderbirds partners in some kinds of crime.

Euodiachloris

Another PS – 'Loshe also happens to be my guess for who Assassin actually is. Shapeshifting, nasty sense of pranking, ironic "artwork" when killing, invisibility (whether through use of the classic under-the-tongue/ stomach stone or not), preferring to hide/stay in the dark and able to get anywhere? Hello...

Euodiachloris

Another PS: you can slice, shoot and try to burn or freeze a tokoloshe, but it won't work. They will still come at you Terminator-style. But, one way to stop them is: smash their limbs. It's how they are controlled/ made in the first place, and it's the one kind of torture they are sensitized to. Say, by using... a very big stick/ mace.

Hmmmm..... Witch + stick + tokoloshe + very large, tragic event involving a lot of death that may not be what it appears to be on the surface... We have maximum TT!

Dainpdf

So I guess this confirms that the Bard and the Dead King became who they are at about the same time, as counterbalance to each other. Black was right (big surprise)!

CaptainSemantics

I'm now envisioning this conversation with the dead king:

Cat: So what exactly DID happen to Keter?

Dead King: Well there was a witch queen with a nice big mace, but she was a woman with needs. So she hit up the King of Keter and she made the bedroom eyes, but he was weird about it –

The entire Woe: Noooooooooo

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I really hope that's the truth. EE would certainly be up to the task of coming up with an even better canon explanation, but I truly hope that this is the foreshadowing you're saying it is.

Nethermore

Hmm, a number of possibilities there.

The Dead King was mentioned as Evil's counterweight to good's OP Bard, so the Bard might have known that such a thing was incoming and helped it happen in a convenient, relatively isolated location and with a central Named who wouldn't try to conquer the world. Without interference, maybe a super-Villain would have risen in a Good nation, turned it, and become a problem demanding more resources and attention than the Kingdom of the Dead.

Bard might also have just fucked up, lol. Seems likely that she's still relatively young here, because if the Dead King is her counterweight then Evil would have tried to develop it ASAP after the Bard appeared.

Also, even if Bard hadn't been aware of the need for an Evil counterweight, creating the Kingdom of the Dead might still have looked like a reasonable calculation:

- the kingdom was already evil-aligned (devil summoning), so nothing lost there
- the horror and threat would likely stabilize Good-alignment of what would later become the bordering proceran principalities.
- consider how many crusades were launched against the Kingdom of the Dead. Obviously its creation allowed for unprecedented unity of purpose in the Good-aligned nations. That none of those crusades were wins might have been Bard's miscalculation, or just part of the long con.

RanVor

It looked to me like they only started to summon devils in order to combat the iron men (presumably the Lycaonese).

WuseMajor

Honestly, what worries me most here is that Masego might actually succeed at his working and end up being "possessed" by the Bard. Possibly as a result of Cat's orders to find out what she knows.

RanVor

Does anyone else find it not surprising that almost every time a horrific atrocity happens somewhere in Calernia the Bard is somehow connected to it?

Fuodiachloris

Totally not surprised. It's like she's been playing both sides against each other, or something. 😊

I think there's a reason Karios is being *very* indirect in trying to evade/spike/killll her, while still being very careful to stay under her radar by looking so very much like the Classic Evil™ she can easily manipulate. It's quite easy to keep her focused on Team Practical Evil if they look like the bigger threat to her shell game, and he like the biggest chump who ever cackled while twirling a moustache.

It's a pincer manoeuvre by whatever Is in that crypt that's plugged into whichever side of the Gods or Creation.

Antony444

Well, it looks like Black's theory has been validated. The Wandering is indeed at least as old if not older than the Dread King. So Triumphant wasn't the intervention of the Gods Below.

The shape of the ancient story is fascinating, especially given the symmetry of the present. We have a Lycaoenese on Procer's throne, waging war against Evil nations. Granted Cordelia is not a witch-king or any kind of sorceress, but she is an opportunist, striking her enemies once they have been weakened.

No wonder the Dread King wouldn't hesitate much about striking the Crusaders...

Next time Tikoloshe, Wekesa and Masego are in the same room, the conversation is definitely awkward and unpleasant...

NZPIEFACE

ffs bard, you're actually evil, right?

Chaotic Evil.

Jonnney

There is no good and evil, just above and below.

NZPIEFACE

Let's take a step back from this series and look at it from a DnD perspective. This shit is definitely Chaotic Evil.

>Stopping elves that want to kill someone instigating the deaths of hundreds of thousands of people.

>Starting the legacy of the Dead King.

Yotz

More like a True Neutral – an active agent of Balance. She knows exactly the measure of Good and Evil in the world and never hesitates to add more to even the scales.

Which leads to a possibility of WB being not from Above or Below, but of Creation itself – for Creation strives to be, but will inevitably cease if one of the Players will ever achieve a formal victory. Definitely explains utterly inhumane nature of WB's name – result of a blind idiot god trying to influence things it would never consciously comprehend through an agent who feels nothing but contempt towards the master.

Oh, hai there, Nyarly!

---

A couple of comments:

First, I find it strange that the attributes like the lute and the flask persist even though those objects were bound to evolve with the progress of technology on Calernia, slow as it is.

Second, there's something I missed writing my latest wall of text (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/07/06/chapter-27-into-dusk/#comment-18383>): Masego acts as if he didn't know about the very possibility of such a reflection happening, and confirms in this chapter that he wasn't told anything about it. Yet in book III, interlude Calamity I Warlock states:
> even millennia past that man's apotheosis mages still sifted through the remains of his reign to advance their craft.
What are the chances that this whole landscape was what he has talking about? What would push Wekesa to conceal an entire field of research from his son?

Third, if the entirety of the fallout of this conflict (the Evil kingdom of Keter turned into a Wasteland, the Dead King becoming a major enough villain to empower the Bard by symmetry but getting trapped in his hell, the Lycaonese turning to Gods Above for protection after their Evil witch-queen was slain along with most troops loyal to her) was a plot of the Bard, what are the odds that she decided to write Keter off because it bordered three “irredeemably” Evil nations (Chain of Hunger, Everdark and the Deoraithe who used stuff like necromancy and more underhanded strategies, only turning Good similarly to the Lycaonese after being driven into territory where they bordered the Miezans (or the Empire), and so could keep them fighting each other instead of the Good nations?

NZPIEFACE

We already know that Echos reflect Calernia at specific points in time, but what if the nature of a name is timeless? Wandering Bard could just be what they perceive her to be, from a more modern perspective of her persona. Just like how Arcadia changes based on who is viewing it, what if WB adapts like that too, and is one of the reasons why she’s never the same and is always existing in the world.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

This isn’t consistent, I’m pretty sure the Bard’s facial features change along with her name, therefore how do they recognize her?

NZPIEFACE

Shitty lute and sack of alcohol. Somethings stick to the name.

Morgenstern

According to what the author presents as Cat’s view/“certainty”: THAT flask and lute that Cat (thinks she) would recognize anywhere.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Ah, thanks, my brain went “haha, we got him” and I couldn’t think about anything else.

HappyNap

Fun fact – in chapter 8, Catherine said she would regret stabbing a bard. Lols.

“I didn’t know if I had it in me to stab a Bard, honestly. The were always charmingly ineffective in the stories, it would have been like kicking a puppy.”

A vote for the Guide is a vote to stab a Bard

HappyNap

On a more serious note, I've been thinking about how to kill the Wandering Bard, since I've started re-reading the series two days ago.

I haven't gotten to that part yet, but there is a moment where William and Vivienne talks, and they discuss how the Bumbling Conjuror died and not the Bard, where one of them points out that the Bard makes her presence more "known" to the story.

That could be the Bards weakness – being pushed out of the story, so she doesn't have any narrative presence to save her – and thus her "disappearance" aspect doesn't kick in, and Cat can finally stab her, repeatedly, through the eyes.

Or I'm just a madman who's raving. Who knows

MetruX

Well, isn't this kind of what happened when the Hierarch denied her? My theory is that he unwittingly banished her, in a temporary fashion, and that is why she's not present at this time in the Story. That becomes even more certain as you think on a writer's perspective: all you show must be relevant, since you have limits to time and effort to put into a book. And both Hierarch and the Tyrant of Hellike are the only two shown that have no connection to Cat, even the White Knight is the enemy of her tutor and his actions shaped Cat's fight with Black, while all that was shown of the Tyrant was specifically to make the Hierarch. I don't think this coincidence... He has a special place in the Plot.

---

Vivienne also mentioned her never taking a wound she wasn't directly responsible for. Hierarch took advantage of this, along with the fact that she was his subject at the moment, and that the Tyrant conned her into playing a Role of a mastermind (as opposed to Kairos himself on the side of the League of Free Cities and traditional Evil, and Black on the side of the Empire and practical Evil).

They need to find someone whose course of action she changed directly (like the two Emerald Swords, or maybe have Hanno Recall William in full so they can convince him to call her out on leading him, Bumbling Conjuror and Exiled Prince to their deaths), something that would allow to actually exert authority/power on her (like Hanno's judgement coin, or give Larat the crown of whatever place her new body will come from), and lock her into a Role that ends differently from "and then the narrator closed the book and wished everyone good night".

Dakota

Everybody wondering if the wb had a hand in creating the dead king should ask what if it's the other way around what if the same cataclysm that created the king and limits his interaction with the world also threw the bard into her current state

chris S

Inb4 the Bard addresses Cat and the Woe in this echo.

Either directly or through good old fashioned "I'm having a conversation with you but the words are actually for the person watching this hundreds of years from now"

Death Knight

Desmond.

Booksie

Oh gosh. I'm really hoping Archer's drinking habit doesn't mean that she's the Wandering Bard.

I've started seeing patterns that I hope aren't there. She's talking about songs, infinite booze, no one has seen the bard. Ugh.

burguulkodar

Very interesting, I'm thoroughly enjoying this excursion to Keter's past (and so many of the World's truth subtly besides).

I always wondered how Keter can win against crusades over and over. People like the Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords seem like they would wreck the whole place by themselves. We also know if you have like 5 heroes, no amount of undead hordes can kill them off. So why isn't the Dead King gone by now?

It can be just a narrative thing, since a King of the Dead is something very strongly needed in every horror story, as a Big Bad, but there's the Everdark and Praes has been a more constant (and alive) big bad than Keter... I can only assume there's much we are not aware.

Poetically Psychotic

Well then. That pretty much nixes the idea that Triumphant was the Wandering Bard's counterpart, not that that was the more likely of the choices regardless.

I wonder if she was granted her heavenly immortality as a reward for her actions here, or as a punishment?

---

Chapter 29: Sixth

"Don't be absurd, Black Knight. It would have been called treason if I'd lost – this is merely succession."

– Dread Emperor Vile the First

It was a striking scene.

The crypt itself was the part worthiest of awe, I decided. The arched ceiling was covered in silver set with glittering jewels where stars would have been on the night sky. There was no light within save for their shine and a ring of bound sprites serving as magelights. The fallen king was being set down in a tomb with his likeness sculpted atop the lid, men and women wearing copper circlets on their brows lowering him gently. There were low whispers in a smattering of tongues I did not know, but the funeral was a hushed affair. I did not linger to watch when the orations began after the lid was shut, instead approaching the sight that had set my blood running cold. The Wandering Bard looked prettier than I'd ever seen her. Tanned and full of life, she wore red and silver robes instead of the usual stained leathers. The lute was set across her lap in the shadowed alcove where she sat, and she pulled at her flask between exchanges with the young man standing next to her. Him I took my time studying. How often did one get to have a glimpse of the Dead King before he earned that Name?

I'd expected him to be darkly handsome or strikingly ugly, but he was nothing of the sort. Pale, even compared to the other Keterans, but not near corpse-like the way Black was. More like a scholar who did not see much of the sun. He had bushy eyebrows and full lips set on an unremarkable face, the only striking part of him the light brown eyes that looked almost golden in the magelight glow. He looked like a scholar, I thought. One only an inch taller than me, though few of the Keterans were tall. No real muscle to his frame, though his hands were surprisingly calloused. The copper circle on his brow was even more slender than those I'd seen on the other royals. A mark of status? Perhaps. The others had looked older, they might be higher in the line of succession. Or he might have been from another branch of the royal family. Hard to tell when I knew nothing about how the kingdom was ruled. Even without understanding the words he spoke, I found his voice compelling. Calm and deep, it felt almost soothing. It was hard to tell much about intonation in a foreign language – everything spoken in Kharsum sounded like a threat, for example – but he did not seem worried or surprised by the Bard's presence.

Had he known her? Had she been involved in the fall of Keter from the beginning?

"You're sure it's her?" Hakram quietly asked.

I'd been so lost in contemplation I hadn't even heard the orc approaching. I nodded without a word.

"The lute and the flask," I said. "It's her."

"They both look different than at Summerholm," Adjutant said.

I blinked and glanced back at the Bard. He was right, I realized with a start. The flask was still of that same strange curved shape, but instead of old scuffed iron it was freshly-polished copper. The lute was not of the same wood, this one paler, and the strings looked different. Animal tendons of some sort.

"The substance changed," I murmured. "But the shape hasn't. There's something to that."

"Named tend to have symbols and artefacts associated to them," Hakram noted. "Save for the Carrion Lord, though the loss seems to have been made up in epithets. The lute and flask could be hers."

"Malicia warned me they'd moved the Bard to the Empire's official kill list, after the war in the Free Cities," I said. "I thought Black was talking her up too much because she pulled one over him but I'm starting to see his point, if she's had her fingers plucking strings this far back."

"We don't know for certain her consciousness has been uninterrupted all this time," Adjutant cautioned.

"You read the transcripts Black sent us," I grunted. "Hells, I've had you lug around the threat assessment he had delivered to the palace – half a book's worth of scrolls, in records and theories. She made references to events long before she popped out of the woodworks as Aoede of Nicae. That's at least two or three incarnations. It's an assumption to say she's been at it this whole time, sure, but it's not a bad one."

"Yes," Hakram agreed quietly. "And the voluntary sharing of that secret worries me, Cat. It would have been a sharp blade, if kept hidden. Why did she not keep the knife in the dark?"

Yeah, there was that. If there was a meddling face-changing immortal wandering around the continent, why had no one ever written anything about it? Names tended to grow stronger – if also more restrictive – the more stories were associated with them. She would have had thousands of years to build herself up into something pretty much untouchable. And even if she wanted to keep quiet and stay behind the curtains, it struck me as dubious that every single hero she'd helped had kept quiet about. Over the years, there was bound to have at least one blabbermouth that fucked up. Unless Above ordered them to keep quiet, I frowned. That was... plausible. Didn't explain why no Dread Emperor had ever tried to get out the word there was an opponent on the field of that calibre, after being beaten or figuring it out. I was smelling a rat her.

"That," I slowly said, "is a very good question. If she's been underfoot this whole time and no one was onto her, why did she let that out of the bag now? What changed?"

The tall orc by my side considered the two legends speaking before us and clicked his teeth in discomfort.

"I suspect," Hakram said, "that knowledge of their words would bring more questions than answers."

"This is too big to walk past," I told him. "Masego will have his hours. Tell the others we're setting camp."

I stayed there a while longer, watching the Wandering Bard laugh at something Calernia's incipient greatest monster had said. I shivered at the sight. I felt like they were sharing a joke that no one else could understand.

I was really coming to hate that feeling.

—

"We cannot linger for too long, Catherine," Vivienne said. "I understand the draw of learning such a secret, but it will not help Callow withstand invasion."

I drank from the skin. Tough our supplies were beginning to run thin, at least there was no need to worry about going without water. I could fill the skin with ice with only a thought, then leave it to melt as the hours passed. Indrani had badgered me until I used the eldritch and fearsome powers of Winter to cool her wine, to no one's surprise. The indignity was somewhat alleviated by the fact that the first thing Juniper had ever told me after I claimed my mantle was that my ability to freeze things would ease strain on supplies for the Fifteenth. No one but Masego seemed to treat my usurpation of a demigod's power as anything but a source of free ice and entertainment unless I was actively killing people with it.

"We're putting all our bets on the Dead King, Vivienne," I disagreed. "An entity we know next to nothing about. We're carrying the finest offer our diplomats were able to put together, but we're still going into this blind."

"Whatever he might have been while living, millennia have passed," the dark-haired woman replied. "Any understanding gained would be highly dated."

"Undead can't change nearly as much as the living," I pointed out. "I'm guessing a lot will still apply."

"We trade guesswork for hours, then," Thief said flatly. "This is a gamble, let us not pretend otherwise. The decision was made on the assumption we would know little about our interlocutor. We might be able to change that, if Masego pulls through. To an extent. But we all agreed on the initial premise for a reason. Time is our most dangerous enemy, at the moment."

"I'm not saying we should spend a sennight here," I said. "But a few days? The payoff is worth the delay."

"If there is one," Vivienne sighed.

I looked at her closely. Of all the Woe she was probably the one who'd dealt with the restlessness of our journey the best. Even Hakram, island of calm that he was, happened to have a vague look of chagrin on his face now and then – like he was expecting to have work to do and was kind of irked he didn't. Thief had been quiet, so far, almost subdued. But she'd refrained from pulling my metaphorical pigtailed Archer did and kept her eye on the horizon unlike Hierophant. The irritation now coming across clear had me wondering if she'd just been hiding it better than the others. She was certainly the hardest to read of the Woe. For others that crown might have belonged to Adjutant, but I knew him like I knew my own limbs.

"You're worried," I said.

She sent me a look that implied less than complimentary things about my intellect.

"Not just the usual stuff," I dismissed. "This is about all of us leaving."

"The Grey Pilgrim is unsupervised," she said.

"The Pilgrim is under house arrest, allowed to speak only with goblins and Prince Amadis," I replied bluntly. "If he can turn Robber to Good, I'd argue he actually deserves to win this war."

"It feels like negligence not to keep a closer eye on them," Vivienne sighed.

Most of the time, with Thief, the trick to understand her was not to listen to what she said. It might have been because of her Name, but she tended to go obliquely at matters. The only way to get a good read on what she had cooking behind the forehead, if she wasn't willing to outright state it, was to figuring out the reasons behind what she said. In this case, she was speaking of Callow but I suspected Callow itself wasn't the point.

"You've been cut off from the Jacks," I said suddenly.

She looked away. Ah. There it was. Possibly beyond even me, Vivienne Dartwick was the individual in the Kingdom of Callow with the most information at her fingertips. Hakram was the one piecing together the reports from her Jacks, the Dark Guilds under Ratface and Aisha's web of relatives to send up the most important reports to me, but that was more administrative than a matter of authority. I just didn't have the time to read it all and see to my other duties as well, not even now that I no longer slept. But Thief had access to all of it as well, and as the head of my net of informants she wielded the power to send agents to unearth any secrets she wanted. It must have been like an itch she couldn't scratch, being removed from the centre of the web to go traipsing around Arcadia.

"I understand the necessity of committing to this," Vivienne said. "And the risks that bringing any but Named into Keter would have carried, along the vulnerability of leaving only one of us behind. But we are blind to all the happenings in Creation until the matter is dealt with."

It'd be exceedingly difficult to scry back home from Keter, admittedly. Unlike Malicia and Black I didn't have decades' worth of mages trained in scrying to create relays all over the continent that delivered reports within hours. My limited number had to be placed very strategically, and had largely focused on Praes and Procer. Moving it all around so we could get in touch with the Observatory around the natural barriers surrounding Callow wouldn't be impossible, but it would screw up our eyes abroad for months. Months where we could hardly afford to be blind to movements within the borders of our most dangerous neighbours. Not something to use except in case of dire emergency.

"It's not a gamble if we're in control the whole time," I told her gently.

"I know," she said, passing a frustrated hand through her short hair.

I'd thought the cut a little too rough, when we first met, but it had grown on me since. Long hair on Vivienne would have felt odd now.

"We are taking so many risks, Catherine," she said quietly. "And every one of them seems reasonable when the decision is made, but I look back and wonder if what we have built is a house of cards."

"It does feel like everyone is out for our blood, doesn't it?" I chuckled bitterly. "Gods, we know we're at the end of the rope when the Hidden Horror is the best ally on the table."

"That is a too great a decision for us to really understand the scope of its consequences quite yet, I think," Vivienne said. "It is the small things that worry me."

The glanced she flicked at the collar of my cloak was all she needed to say. I did not immediately reply. The two of us sat on the granite tomb of some dead queen and watched Hierophant weave his runes in the distance. He'd been at it for half a bell, now, and the breakthrough he'd been speculating about was nowhere in sight.

"She could accelerate his work," I said, keeping my eyes on Hierophant. "Masego tells me that the doomsday fortress had similarities to the Greater Breach at Keter. There's not a lot of more knowledgeable mages to be found, either."

I did not need to speak the name of the woman in question. We both knew who I was speaking of.

"She," Vivienne said with admirable evenness, "has not been punished."

My brow rose.

"I ripped out her heart and bound her soul to the cloak," I replied. "I'll admit it hasn't exactly turned out to be eternal screaming torment, but at the very least it's imprisonment with a dab of torture."

"Yet now she plies her powers in your service," Thief said. "Safeguarded from all her former enemies. She has made herself useful, and so the leash loosens. How long, Catherine, before practicality pries open the door entirely?"

"I haven't forgotten Liesse," I said coldly.

"Peace," the other woman said, hand rising. "I helped you draft the Accords, Catherine. I've seen that look in your eyes when you think yourself alone and you remember the breadth of the massacre. I know the failure shames you still. I've seen your fury at the architect of the massacre."

"I'm not sure what you're saying," I admitted.

Aside from effectively admitting she sometimes spied on me unseen, but I'd honestly considered that to be a given. The notion of privacy was something I'd resigned myself to having lost even before an invisible sneak thief joined the Woe.

"I told you once, that Akua Sahelian treading Creation again was a line," Vivienne said. "One desperate hour after another, we have walked past it."

I grimaced. I could have made an argument that back then we'd been speaking about the soul she put in the infant as her resurgence plan, or even that all I'd ever allowed to pull at the leash was a soul, but it would have been dishonest. I had allowed Diabolist a foothold back in Creation, like it or not.

"You want me to destroy the soul," I guessed.

Vivienne laughed, something vicious glinting in her blue-grey eyes. It was a little fucked up, I admitted to myself, that it made her look more attractive to me. Not that I expected anything to ever come of it. Thief was so painfully straight I could have used her as a ruler.

"I have learned," she said, "the uses of pragmatism. No, let her continue to exist. Let her out, even. She has uses, and the hour has only grown more desperate. Another face will even make Indrani less of a pest for a while."

"But," I said.

"For small slights, long prices," Vivienne Dartwick said harshly. "Let Akua Sahelian see the light and taste freedom. Let her believe she has slipped the noose, so long as she remains of use."

Thief's fingers clenched.

"But there will be a day where the world we made no longer has place for her," Vivienne said. "When we have faced all the horrors before us. And on that day, when she has glimpsed victory?"

Vivienne met my eyes and there was something in them that gave even Winter pause.

"Snuff her out, Catherine," she said. "Slowly. Painfully. Excruciatingly aware of what is being taken from her."

I shivered, both out of respect at the viciousness of what she was proposing and a little bit of arousal. Gods, it was a tragedy she only rode stallion. I pushed that guilty thought aside and gave the moment the seriousness it was due. Should I hesitate at effectively letting our Akua with the intent to murder how down the line? Gods, that I even had to ask. I would have seen no nuance there to be had, when I'd been seventeen. But I hadn't had a kingdom on my shoulders, back then. And I hadn't looked Akua Sahelian in the eyes as she told me nonchalantly she was going to slaughter a hundred thousand innocents to use as fodder for her ambition. Putting a knife in her back wasn't somehow made moral by Diabolist being a mass murderer, but it was the kind of petty evil I had made my tools of trade. Fair dealing and mercy were no longer things that applied to people willing to butcher an entire city for their purposes.

"It could be years," I warned her. "Before we're out of opponents. We could die before that, too."

"I know," Vivienne said. "Let her follow us in death, if that is our lot. Otherwise my words stand."

I spat in my palm and offered it up. Thief was not the kind of maidenly flower who balked at spit, aristocrat or not, so she did the same without hesitation.

"Bargain struck," I said, and we clasped hands.

"Bargain struck," she echoed.

We rose. I spoke the words, and Akua Sahelian walked the world again.

—

I had two of the finest mages of our generation working on a solution, and yet half a day later here I was: standing with a scowl on my face, being told nothing I wanted to hear. Hierophant at least had the decency to look as frustrated as I felt. Akua's lips were just slightly quirked, not enough for it to qualify as a smile but enough to reveal how pleased she was to be out of the box and talking magic with one of the few people in existence she'd consider a peer.

"The issue has been the same since you interrupted me," Masego said, a touch accusingly. "I have yet to succeed in accounting for the disparity in alignment."

"We can hear what they say now," I pointed out. "You managed touch for a little bit yesterday."

"The formula was a dead end," Diabolist said. "The runes involved would have disrupted further addition. Consider them an ore that spoiled the alloy."

It kind of pissed me off that my dead rival was better at explaining sorcery to me without sounding condescending than one of my closest friends.

"But you were aligned," I pressed.

"Not in the right manner," Masego irritably said.

"The difference was not unlike reading of a river on parchment while seeking to swim in one," Akua smiled. "Result was achieved, but along a different path than desired."

Yeah, still pissing me off. I suspected that was going to happen a lot.

"It might be that this is impossible to achieve within the bounds of Trismegistan sorcery," Hierophant said. "We've been speaking of different perspectives, but most of them are so glaringly fallible or unusable by humans my studies of the subject have been shallow."

"We only have so much time to spend here," I reluctantly admitted.

"You demand the miraculous on the schedule of the shoddy," Masego muttered, then paused.

His saw his glass eyes turn to peer behind him while the rest of his body remained still.

"Could it be that simple?" he said.

"You've dealt with miracles before," I encouraged.

"I've vivisected and employed parts of them," he corrected absent-mindedly. "But the gap is one of understanding, and I have a mechanism at hand to correct that failing."

I felt him gather power without ever chanting or drawing a rune. Not shaping it for a spell, I thought. Drawing it into himself. I opened my mouth to ask, but Akua discretely shook her head.

"A mystery," Hierophant muttered to himself. "In the technical sense. Foolish, foolish. I saw, when in transitioned. Quantification is anathema to higher sorceries."

His hand shot out and he clasped my wrist.

"Yes," he grinned. "They will not deny me, be they Gods or fathers. I will Witness."

A ripple passed across the world, and what it left behind was no longer an echo.

Oh.

Oh wow. What if they wind up interacting with more than just an echo of the past?

They are in Arcadia, where time flows differently, after all.

---

Hierophant said that extracting the knowledge from reflection's soul may be enough to convert the information into something he can understand. Depending on how "real" this is, they may be able to take something from this shard. Worst case, the Bard escapes; the most likely case, Cat uses her soul-serarching to communicate with Trismegistus while Masego rifles through Bard's mind (since I doubt the ending of the chapter means that they'll just look into their heads for some cryptic glimpses and go to the negotiations); best case, the limited interaction would allow Catherine to take some Aspects or artifacts outside the shard.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

*blink*

shit, dude.

sengachi

Maybe if the aspect was Interact, but this was Witness. That has different connotations to me.

Anon

"Thief was so painfully straight I could have used her as a ruler."

I feel as though this is a direct comment in regards to the shipping that sometimes goes on in the comments...but I can't figure out if it's teasing on Catherine not being the most observant, or just bait to keep the shippers hopelessly waiting.

Otherwise, a bit surprised it took Masego so long to use one of his Aspects to come up with a better way to study things.

Good on Thief for finally confronting Catherine about using Akua more and more, though I personally am now a little worried that since she and Cat have 'committed' to an evil fate for Akua, it gives Akua more of an opening to try and escape.

daegone823

Aspects sometimes manifest naturally due to a name other times they are a result of growth or conflict. In this case Masego had spent days trying to figure out a problem using conventional sorcery and analyzing the past events of Keter but he realizes that he is the heirophant and therefore will not be denied knowledge. Thus this could possibly be his first aspect that he has manifested as a result of not being challenged thus far.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah but he's had this Aspect forever now.

NZPIEFACE

I think? Or did he has Glimpse before?

Yotz

Glimpse was an aspect of the Apprentice.
And, since my memory is full of eels – can it be that Masego finally gained his third Aspect here, at that point of time?

NZPIEFACE

Except he's not the Apprentice anymore, so all his Aspects reset. Uh, firsts one then.

Euodiachloris

Technically, this was a challenge. A profoundly intellectual (cough the the data up in a format I can use, dammit!) and emotional one (when you find out Popa had a very complex life you knew nothing about which is currently directly related to your own issues, it gets emotional). 😊

Dainpdf

Yeah, I thought that was quite a jab at the shipping community, especially with her repeating it shortly after in other words. But hey, maybe Vivienne just hadn't met the right woman yet.

---

I'm kind of disappointed that Vivienne didn't tell Cat about Akea's remark about redemption, since, due to Pilgrim refusing to help Cat when she was willing to compromise, I now suspect he saw Akua possessing her and now is aiming to redeem the Diabolist into a Good mage Name (or at least to keep her as an option if Cat doesn't fold).

Cold Cyberia

I think this is foreshadowing that Thief will become the Queen – she'll be a ruler of Callow once the whole mess is cleaned up.

NZPIEFACE

Queen of Knives would be a great mirror to the Queen of Blades.

Jonnnney

Google is not conclusive, but I believe that is a brand new aspect for hierophant.

Mental Mouse

Eh, plenty of shippers don't let mere canon get in the way. The more interesting reference is that Cat **has** used her as a "straightedge", as the holder of the fae oaths "keeping her in line".

Antoninjohn

A Witness, someone who seeing crimes committed. Well that's a big hint to what we are going to see

TeK

Hey, maybe this Aspect will play a role on the theorised trial Hierarch's going to put Bard through.

haihappen

ooooooooohhhhhh. Courtroom shows would be so much better if the people involved were fantasy characters...

"hear hear. As Hierarch of the Free Cities I call this congregation of foreign despots and malcontents to Order. I hereby open the case of Evil vs. Good. The defendant, known among a countless number of blasphemous names, is 'The Wandering Bard'. The Charges consist, among others, 'Crimes Against Humanity', manslaughter, murder, drunken misconduct, willful negligence resulting in gross bodily harm... that will do for now. The Prosecution may begin, Mr. Black, your opening statement?"

1shot4living

I would watch that. I would most definitely watch that.

Yotz

" Foul Servant Of A Foreign Tyrant mr. Black, you may proceed with your opening statement"

ethericsentinel

Now I want a Phoenix Wright-style game set in the Guideverse.

---

Catherine saw Masego pull workings straight out of his memory instead of recreating them. given whee we are now, this Aspect may be a culmination of that. If Akua's hellgate did indeed leave a similar set of shards around Liesse, they may even end up using them to investigate Istrid's death and/or summon expendable "reflections" of legionaries to fight the crusaders with: both Liesse and the remains of the Greater Breach can plausibly be used to bring them through.

Gerionar

Wait, wasn't that *Glimpse* before? Did he really just change his Aspect?!

Then again, why am I even surprised?

Jabes

I think he just found his Third Aspect, not reusing an old one ( I may be wrong in this, but I thought he only had two so far).

Rogos

"Glimpse" was one of Masego's Aspects back when he was the Apprentice. When he transitioned into his new Name, he lost access to his old Aspects and so now he has to build a new set. It's the same for all transitional Names : for example, Black didn't have Lead, Conquest and Destroy back when he was the Squire, he had other ones (presumably including Learn).

MetruX

Wasn't Glimpse Apprentice's Aspect? He changed Names, and this changes Aspects aswell.

Aehriman

It can also mean to observe. Or even to observe and recount to others. As Hierophant I'm thinkin this is closer to a religious than legal interpretation o the word.

Jane

Ooooh, Witness sounds about as much as a hax Aspect as Learn! Maybe it's more limited than first blush would imply, but if it can truly reveal the origin of events... There's a heck of a lot that could be used for. Though, I guess Masego wouldn't really have interest in most of the practical applications not related to theoretical magic...

I know how Vivienne feels. It's basically internet withdrawal – take a person away from an ocean of information once they're accustomed to swimming in it, and you suddenly feel naked from all the things you can't confirm with a glance at a parchment. No wonder she spends most of her time away from the Woe.

Hm. A bit odd how Cat's interest has shifted from lightly implied to explicitly confirmed, this chapter. I wonder where that's going.

So, Thief has made her peace with Akua, such as it is. Use her up as you wish, so long as you discard her – pretty much the closest the two will ever come to accord, without working together for a couple of years, I imagine. I wonder if that means we'll get to see her out of the box more often – not that Cat likes to use her, but I'd be surprised if her compass telling her that it was okay to use Akua didn't have any effect.

Gunslinger

Sadly that ship isn't sailing anytime soon.

TeK

Am I the only one who gets really uncomfortable at what exactly the reason to Cat's arousal is? Gods but that's unsettling.

Jane

Eh... She's lonely. Between being Queen, being Named, and becoming a goddess, there are very few people she can be close to. To say nothing of how she recently had to break up with her girlfriend over her rising status.

Vivienne is someone she finds attractive, has a shred of conscience, and is someone she feels comfortable talking to – both in regards to the kingdom, and in regards to her own worries. It's a pretty good ground for a relationship, honestly, if incompatible orientations weren't a problem.

And now that they're stuck in Arcadia for an indeterminate period of time with nothing to do but sit around and talk... Well, restlessness takes many forms. Cat's a young woman, it's not that strange that her thoughts would go in that direction.

There could be more to it than this, of course, but at first glance, nothing really strikes me as out of the ordinary.

TeK

I do no doubt your words. Yet they have little to do with mine. She could've been aroused at any number of things Vivi did or said. The fact that it was the suggestion to coldhearted emotional torture and murder speaks volumes about Cat's current mental status.

Jane

...Oh, right ^^;; ...

Honestly, between being caught in the flow of the conversation before that (where Cat was mostly trying to understand Vivienne), considering the implications of Vivienne approving of Akua being allowed out more often, and this being the downtime of a party of Villains... I just, um, kind of tuned that out ^^;; ...

That probably doesn't speak well of me, in retrospect, being able to overlook such a thing...

Metrux

You're falling into Evil. Take this rope. Tie around yourself. There, now the weight will pull you down much faster 😊

LightDawn

Why and how do you have that kind of rope? And where can I get it?

Agent J

Scary badass chicks are hot and Thief was looking particularly scary today. It's simple science.

Jane

Well, taking off shipping goggles for a moment...

It has been previously introduced and now confirmed that Cat has a physical interest in Vivienne; this chapter also explicitly states that Cat does not believe that Vivienne reciprocates her feelings.

From a metaperspective, there must have been a reason to introduce this story element; it may be a subplot that will affect their relationship dynamics in the future (perhaps a "Vivienne tries to let Cat down gently" or "Vivienne tells Cat she was mistaken" type of things, to cite the most obvious), or it may just be a bit of detail to make their relationship dynamic feel more "real". It may also be a combination of the two, wherein it's later used to explained some action of Cat's in the future that wouldn't make sense without context like this.

It seems odd to me at the moment, because it feels like a subplot that's been building, but which doesn't yet have an obvious direction – no doubt we'll have more to go on in a few chapters.

(Of course, it could also be the author's way of saying, "I just wanted to establish that Cat thought Vivienne was attractive, but the readers took it too far; let's let them down firmly here before this gets out of hand", but... If this wasn't going to be related to a future plot point, I would think taking a moment for Cat to remember that Vivienne was straight would be enough; reinforcing Cat's attraction to Vivienne would be counterproductive.)

Anon

It's actually mildly interesting, as Cat's bisexuality has come up (aside from Vivienne) multiple times in this book – in flirting with Princess Mazala, to Akua and the twice-bloomed comment, and now the more explicit interest in Vivienne...yet she's had next-to-zero interest since Keegan.

If it's only meant to be a 'calm down shippers' moment, it feels like it lingers too long on Cat's feelings for that – as you say, a simple acceptance of Vivienne's preferences would have been sufficient.

This feels like something else, but it doesn't (necessarily) feel like 'Cat is getting lonely' moment either – I dunno what'll come of this in any specific way though, unless Thief somehow (either on purpose or accidentally) betrays Cat down the line, and in so doing uses Cat's feelings for her?

But that doesn't make a whole lot of sense either, given that she's got MORE than enough opportunity to break Cat with her having the fae vows to call upon if Cat ever 'lost herself in Winter'.

(idly, it's also somewhat interesting to note that Indrani, while a hedonist, appears to have actual interest (likely not really reciprocated) in Masego, and Juniper has that thing with....Aisha, I think?

But I don't recall ever having any specific insight into Thief's being explicitly into dudes that I can recall off-hand, though I do have a vague recollection of...something? Bah, it must be pretty far off)

Jane

Well, my first thoughts were that a darker plotline that could arise from this would be a "Cat, blinded by her feelings for Vivienne, doesn't realize how far Vivienne has turned towards Villainy, and trusts her to stop Cat from doing something monstrous; Vivienne, believing that Cat's actions are justified for the protection Callow, fails to do so." scenario. There have been enough elements introduced to justify such a scenario, and it's a conflict that would fit well with the themes of the series.

Now, I don't think that's actually going to happen, as there hasn't been nearly enough foreshadowing to suggest such a thing – but if the story does go there in a few chapters, the outline was present, between Cat having reaffirmed her trust of Vivienne several times, and Vivienne having crossed several lines she would have once balked at while Cat frets that she's a bad influence on Thief. And of course, that's only one example of how this could be used in a more dramatic fashion.

More likely, though, I'd expect we have a lighter subplot where Indrani takes Cat aside and says that she should really stop mooning over Vivienne, and instead offers to set her up with someone who's actually interested in her. Or Cat finding out that Vivienne really is into women as well, but if that was where this was going, I'd expect fewer confirmations that Vivienne was straight – even if it's easy enough to say "Well, Cat was wrong," authors usually leave more wiggle room than that.

Anon

Maybe, but unless it's another named who has sufficient power to not be used as a pawn piece, they'd quickly get lost in the shuffle – which was a large part of why Cat dropped Killian (in addition to her distaste with the blood sacrifice to activate Killian's true magic potential)

And on that note, there's not a lot of prospects whom Cat would be kosher with – between being the Queen of the remaining Winter Fae, Queen of Callow, trying to thread the needle of 'making lasting peace while not getting trapped in a heroic-face-turn story', and the 'cementing' of the Woe as a band of named with a fixed number, I don't see another 'new' person really being able to insert themselves so easily this 'late' into the overall story progression.

The only way I see Vivienne betraying Cat at this point is if Cat somehow REALLY slips up and inadvertently is about to doom Callow – in giving Vivienne the keys to basically banish/control her, that's about as high of a trust level that Cat could ever give, unless she is separated from Winter.

....If anything, I would almost moreso expect Cat to be the one to 'ditch' Vivienne, if she ever gets 'confirmation' that by being an agent of the gods below (and being a reaper, like the grey pilgrim once mentioned) has turned thief into an agent of evil.

But she seems intent on breaking that connection over almost anything else, so we'll have to wait and see.

Jane

Ah, well... It's Indrani. I hadn't meant to suggest that her proposal would actually work – rather, that she'd suggest Cat join her on some tavern crawls to “get it out of her system” or something like that. Of course, that might sound rather superfluous, but it would allow the author to reference Cat's isolation as a theme in the story in a way that still seems fresh.

As for betrayal... Well, a twist such as the one I described would be a “betrayal” of Vivienne's role as a morality pet, but from Vivienne's perspective, she would just be furthering Cat's agenda. I think Cat would be deeply hurt by that, but would understand that Vivienne had still done what she believed was best for Cat and for Callow, and could forgive such a thing in time – after a whole lot of self-flagellating about how she was the one who led Vivienne down this path.

Of course, that also depends a lot on what, exactly, happened; I was thinking something like, “Cat overdoses on Winter to stop the Proceran army, trusting Vivienne to restrain her if she's going too far; Vivienne decides it's better that the army is slaughtered to the last soldier here, and declines to do so”. Something like a second Llesse, perpetrated (somehow) by Vivienne, would be harder to work past.

As for Cat walking away... Well, she might really want to, but could she really? She needs Thief, both as a member of the Woe, and as Callow's spymaster. There's no one else that can fill those roles, and even if it's toxic for Thief... Asking her to leave would cripple the kingdom, and the damage would already have been done anyway. Even if it's for someone she cared about, could she really risk making all of her previous crimes meaningless?

Joking suggestion to conclude this comment: You know, between establishing that Cat would like a new girlfriend, and that Vivienne is willing to forgive Akua being out of the box... Maybe this is leading into a way to make Cat/Akua possible 😊.

Yotz

Speaking of decadence and debauchery as an opium of the suffering masses – although technically not a stallion, but since body is a construct of mind, futanari is a thing...

Jane

...I, uh, don't think that's likely to be a practical solution outside of a doujin of the series.

I mean, yeah, Cat can remake her body, but I don't imagine she'd be comfortable doing so like this, or Vivienne being reminded of that fact... Plus, that's kind of a heavy thing to bring up when they're not even dating, and Vivienne hasn't shown any interest in doing so.

...Okay, okay, so I'm taking a joke too seriously, just... Channeling Masego for a moment as I think of all the ways that would be uncomfortable for everyone involved. Be glad I stopped here.

Yotz

>^ _____ ^<
0 ye, of little faith...      ● ~ ●

---

Vivienne mentioned in her interlude that "she did find a few corners with boys she liked, but they sure as Hells weren't tradesmen and there were no wedding bells around the corner".

Azure

Catherine's relationship with Vivienne is almost arm's length because in Catherine's mind, she is the keeper of her keys, her last resort to stop her from going over the edge. So she has assumed an emotional distance present from Vivienne's end as her 'jailor', but still allows herself physical attraction since she thinks it's safe, since it won't go anywhere. I wonder how much of a flawed narrator she is though, thinking that Vivienne is actually capable of that distance, because to me there are signs that she isn't. Vivienne's hate of Akua is visceral and some of it was due to her wearing Catherine's smile. Now that is not a sign of someone who is just a jailer and can pull the trigger at any time with no conflict.

IDKWhoitis

Witness, in conjugation with the Observatory, Sahaleian Scrying artifacts, and unlimited access to Arcadia (Cat) will probably be on of the most productive methods of information warfare. Like if Masego can reproduce the type of watching the Augur did at the end of Book 4, Cat will never be on the back foot on the information front for the foreseeable future, regardless of which dimension she may be in.

Jane

Well, the problem there is... It's Masego she has to rely on, and like his father, he's interested first and foremost in his own affairs, and only loosely attached to the greater world. He'll help out when it's something big, and apparently can run the Observatory without cutting too much into his own time, but I imagine the bulk of this will go to Heiropphant unravelling the secrets of Creation.

Which will have benefits of its own, obviously, but not really of the type that would immediately leap to the minds of the more practical sort.

Of course... Even if it's only occasionally that this Aspect will be used for more worldly matters, that's still a pretty big advantage in a pinch.

Mental Mouse

Cat's not particularly interested in Viv, but the thing is, she's something of a letch. Look at her descriptions of various NPCs... she knows perfectly well she's not going to be bumping uglies with them, but she's got no problem looking, and sometimes critiquing their appearance like a high-schooler. IIRC Vivienne actually complains at some point that even when somebody attractive is trying to kill them, Cat takes time to ogle!

Gunslinger

Witness is a fantastic aspect. Karsa Orlong would approve.

By the way if you can do contribute to EE's patreon (<https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>). That's the reason why we can get 3 chapters of the Guide every week

TeK

I've just began reading the House of Chains, how unlikely is that?

IDKWhoitis

Odds on Bard and Dead King discussing something completely innocuous? Like gardening or the invasion? Because it seems like the bastards below are being a bit too helpful. Im fully expecting fate to show a massive middle finger here, and make this whole witnessing almost a waste of time (outside of Masego gaining another Aspect).

TeK

Or flirting. And then going into an empty room and enjoying wild sex. Nine months later, the baby is born, but subsequentalliy lost in time-warp during the Ritual of Keter, and later adopted into Imperial Orphanage and named Cat.

Javvies

As hilarious as that would be, Cat is at least half Daoine(sp?)? Deoraithe? Don't remember which is the non derogatory term for "Wallerspawn". Her parentage is probably a question that will remain unanswered. Though, there probably aren't that many Deoraithe who would have been in the vicinity of Laure in the right time frame, so Duchess Kegan might have been able to find out eventually, with enough digging, but as of the last time she was on screen (circa Akua's Folly), Kegan didn't know, and might not have even been looking.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Deoraithe is the correct term. Daoine is where the Deoraithe live.

Jane

Even if the contents of the conversation themselves are meaningless, what it reveals about the relationship between the Dead King and Bard will be significant; polite distance, light dueling, a bit of camaraderie... Just having a vague outline as to how they once treated each other sheds a great deal of insight on a previously unknown, but very important, relationship.

It's true that their relationship could have (and likely did) change after this conversation, or that this particular conversation might have been out of character for them, but... Just having an idea as to whether they're looking at some kind of ancient betrayal, or a rival outplayed, will give them a great deal of insight on two figures that may as well be mythical, but for the fact that Cat has to treat with them.

Yotz

"So, what should we talk about?"

"Let's just tell a series of increasingly lewd anecdotes to embarrass those foolish children who will try to eavesdrop on our conversation in a few hundred years!"

TeK

Is this his first Aspect? Gods, but it's been a while.

Just a potato

Is the title of this chapter referring to Akua as the sixth member of the woe or am I missing something more obvious?

NZPIEFACE

Yes, that's it.

wyaldriddler

[Insert Witness Me Meme]

TeK

My eyes are glass! My blood is gasoline!

Someguy

I have been wondering, why haven't they wrung arcane textbooks and backup libraries out of Akua? She should have some knowledge/ownership of secret caches of magical knowledge outside of Wolof set up by herself & her predecessors to fall back on should Tyrants successfully seize their House Seat right?

With those in hand Cat can 1-up Black by establishing a Mage Academy with better mage doctrine that Black could not talk Warlock into doing.

TeK

If Tyrants manage to seize their Home Seat, chances are, they would not need those caches. Chamber pots don't have eyes and all that.

Hakurei06

Well, Hierophant forming an aspect after the betrayal of a parent is certainly not going to be significant at all.

magasbe

Without knowing the other side of the story, we can't be sure how much of a betrayal this actually was. I mean, Masego certainly views it as such, but it might be somewhat justified from an objective point of view. We just don't know yet.

But I suspect that's not your point.

Jane

I wonder what sort of limitations are on Witness?
Traditionally, similar abilities (presuming it does what I assume it does) require being at the site of the event in question, or possessing a related item – but that doesn't necessarily hold in this setting.

Could Heirophant just desire to see a conversation where his fathers discussed keeping this knowledge from him, and allow it work that way? That seems overpowered, so probably not, but... How much preparation would he require, to learn the truth of why neither of his fathers told him? Assuming that there were conversations or other circumstances to be Witnessed.

Quite possibly a cat

It seems like it's making stuff show up so it can be witnessed. Best/worst case it's forcing stuff into reality.

It's probably super useful against Elves or Thief or certain demons. He might even be able to save hero 13 and 14! You could probably force Bard to show up or at least not leave.

Mental Mouse

> How much preparation would he require, to learn the truth of why neither of his fathers told him?

Or he could go ask them... nah, who does that? 😊

RoflCat

....Is nobody going to mention that the chapter's title + Thief's approval (albeit with added 'don't forget to kill the whore' for future plan of action), Akua is now the Sixth of the Woes?

TeK

You do. It was theorised as far as Book 2. Glad I've managed to guess something right about this novels turn of events.

Argentorum

I'm not gonna lie. I was a little aroused as well...

Masago was holding Cat's hand! :V

d\_o\_l

omg so lewd

Yotz

Indeed! He didn't even ask for consent, making it unconsensual hand holding! Oh, how deep they plunge into the abyss of Ebil!..

Metrux

Before I thought he had no interests, but now I see the Truth...

thegreatfeed

We have witnessed it

d_o_l

Something just occurred to me. Witness could potentially counteract the influence of Absence, since we all know that subplot's coming back at some point.

Nafram

Remind me of the specifics of that subplot and how Witness would serve as a counter? I forget

Helirous

There is a still Demon of Absence Egg somewhere in Callow

Quite possibly a cat

I think that's a rather optimistic theory. 2 heroes got zapped and everyone has forgotten them. I don't think it's an egg anymore.

TeK

Well obviously, he's talking about near theorised to be a.
It's hinted throughout a chapters that loose and two are allegedly. It's unknown whether they manage to or it just, in process. So we wait until this particular Chekov's gun fires. Any questions?

sengachi

*squints at post* I see what you did there.

Yotz

Congrats to Hierophant on going analog in lieu of digital-only.

Cimer

He didn't go analog in lieu of digital, he went quantum in lieu of classical.

That sounds like quantum mechanic's measurement problems. If you try to measure something too precisely, you lose something else.

sengachi

As a quantum computation researcher, I would just like to say that is a very common misconception, but actually the polar **opposite** of the truth. Quantum mechanics is entirely about how **everything** can be quantized. That's where the term "quantum" comes from.

Measurement 'uncertainty' actually has very little to do with uncertainty unless you're constructing a very specific experiment and you're not sure what's going on under the hood (like Heisenberg was). The way you've probably heard of it before, it's really just more of a descriptor of ... okay I just realized I have absolutely no idea how to explain what it actually means without going into Clifford algebra territory. Fuck. Uhhhh, you know what, I think I understand why the incorrect notion of what the Heisenberg Uncertainty Principle means, on a physical level, is so prevalent. Because I can't possibly imagine how to explain what's **actually** going on to a layperson. Or even most physicists.

Uhhhh ... I guess the moral of the story is that quantum is complicated and that sane people shouldn't touch it with a ten foot Mach Zehnder.

Euodiachloris

Multifactors, feedback loops and all the headaches that going micro gives intellects stuck in macro... Remember when you next want to scream and bang the wall, you chose your own hell. **discretely hides own cognitive science and neurology textbooks** **whistles "innocently"*

At least we didn't go into metabolomics. The interactions of the Krebs cycle are hell on toast with a side of torture. Or, there's always law to shudder at.

sengachi

I remind myself of that every day.

That said ... you do neurology? Hahahaha. Oh friend you've got it so much worse than me. At least quantum mechanics can be broken down into simple truths, even if those truths are hell to parse. You're stuck with the complexity of your systems and there's nothing you can do about it.

... you know what, yes. We can agree on that. At least neither of us went into microbiology. Or law. Neither of those have any respect for sanity.

stevenneiman

Well, I'm glad to hear that I chose the right major to avoid dealing with all those sane people. In the (early) physics classes I've taken so far, I kept on wondering why people were so confused until I realized how hard it was to try and explain some of it to them even when I'm pretty sure I do understand it, and given that that was a physics student to slightly more confused physics student I can see how much worse it would be for anyone who works with quantum mechanics to laypeople.

sengachi

Hahaha. Yeah physics requires a special kind of crazy. It has a stupid-high dropout rate, but that's not because it's capital-H Hard or because you have to be extra special smart to hack it. Most of the physics 'dropouts' go on to have perfectly successful careers in some form of engineering.

Nah physics just needs that special little dash of crazy and a deep, deep love of puzzles. The dash of crazy is so you can let go of familiar reality and accept 'weird' stuff as perfectly ordinary, and the love of puzzles is so that you don't burn out on hour 3 of trying to figure out how to **start** solving a problem. (Or hour 10 or 50 or 100).

And hey, welcome to the ranks! I hope you find it a happy and fulfilling field of study!

stevenneiman

Physics sounds sort of like Dark Souls. The almost meditative process of beating your head against a wall for hours followed by the burning triumph when it breaks before you do.

Letouriste

So Akua is now the 6th member of the crew? I have mixed feelings about that^^ suit the narrative of this story though. That's still weird because that create redundancy (akua is mage and demonologist like masego, tactician like cat, skilled in politics like cat, vivienne and hakram...albeit better at that. ), I don't think that was necessary for their crew(make things easier for sure)...BUT that could be what cat need to survive pilgrim plot to redemption. The pilgrim could not predict this afterall and having a dead mass murderer monster without real remorse in your crew is hardly heroic no matter what you do

Yotz

The ultimate party piece would be a possibility of Ubua proving the truthfulness of her redemption to V, so in the end V will try to break the deal with the Winter and accepting consequences of such a deed.

werafdsaew

Akua is good at politics, especially wasteland politics, which is a necessity if Cat were to ever take the tower, and I think she will.

stevenneiman

I think she actually might not be as unrepentant as you think. I'm not certain of it by any stretch, but she might be the very bizarre offspring of "Iron sharpens iron" and "good guys always win". She still thinks in terms of attaining more power, but she might very well have realized that acting like a horrible person is a path to defeat and forgetting.

John Smith

Well fuck.

tloul5

I come back from 5 week of holiday catch up... and land on a f***ing cliffhanger of doom

Euodiachloris

It's not that bad. It's, like, only a little way up the Tower. We don't even need spells to breathe at this altitude. Just... ignore the screams. 😊

stevenneiman

This is something that's been bugging me for a while, every time it comes up. "Discrete" means in specific parts. Bricks are discrete while clay is not. "Discreet" means caring about privacy or secrecy. This isn't an alternate spelling from a different part of the world the way that legionaries vs. legionnaires is, it's a pair of similar but completely distinct and unrelated English words. Sorry if I'm going a bit Masego on you here, but it's been bugging me for a very long time.

---

Chapter 30: Witness

"There is only one lesson to be learned from shatranj: no matter who wins the game, the pieces return to the same box."

– Dread Emperor Benevolent the First

I'd never been in crypt before but it smelled about what I'd expected. Cool, wet stone and a little like dust. The scent was heavy and cloying, but it wasn't the reason I felt rattled. I almost withdrew my wrist from Masego's grasp before realizing that might get me expelled from... whatever this was and froze instead. Splendidly uncaring of my wariness, Hierophant let my wrist go the moment after. I looked around. Still here. I'd say that was good to know, but I understood next to nothing about what was going on. That was an unpleasantly familiar feeling, truth be told.

"Masego," I whispered. "Can they see us?"

We were on the outskirts of the crowd but there were a few attendants close by near a sculpted ramp leading upwards. If they could see us, we'd stick out like sore thumbs. Neither of us could pass Keteran by skin tone alone, much less if clothes were brought into it. Hierophant shook his head.

"We can only subtract from this, not add," he mused.

That loosened some of the tension in my shoulders, so I allowed myself to take a slower look around. We were at the beginning of the shard, by my reckoning. Most of the grieverers were still filing in, and it'd be about half an hour before they king's corpse was brought in. Less than that before the Bard walked in from a place not within the shard and sat down next to Trismegistus, though. Two of the attendants a little higher up, veiled young women, spoke in a low voice. I frowned.

"They're still speaking Keteran," I said.

Masego turned to me, lips curving in a sharp smile.

"Subtraction, Catherine," he said, "does not preclude acquisition."

My brow rose.

"You can ransack their brains," I said.

"Don't be absurd," he replied. "The actual brain matter is long gone. I can appropriate an echo of their consciousness, including working knowledge of their language."

I blinked in surprise.

"Wait, that's something you can do?" I said. "You can dig out an entire dialect from someone's head and put it in someone else's?"

That would have been damned useful to know. Wouldn't have had to spend so many evenings trying to learn Chantant if there was a shortcut like that. Without Learn to help me along, I'd come to the realization that my talent for languages was average at best and that the most widespread language in Procer was a horrid chore to learn. So many fucking exceptions and whoever had decided that plurals for masculine and feminine names – or even that there should be any of those – deserved to be drawn and quartered. If it'd been a possibility to lift that knowledge out of the heads of criminals, with consent and a reduced sentence dangled in exchange, I would have taken it.

"Theoretically speaking," Masego agreed. "Of course a living mind is much more complex to excise information from than what can be found in this imprint. Likely the extraction would break the source entirely, what would be obtained would be contaminated with connected gibberish and the bestowal itself drive the recipient mad. Human minds were not meant to process that much knowledge instantly."

I grimaced. Yeah, it figured. Should have known that if this was a feasible shortcut, Warlock would have cut open a few 'expendables' and the Calamities would be fluent in every single Calernian language.

"But you can do it here safely," I pressed.

He eyed me amusedly, which was a pretty ghastly sight considering his glass eyes.

"For myself, I can rely on my aspect to handle the worst of the backlash," he noted. "I will have severe migraines for weeks or months before it has all been processed, but I have herbs to alleviate this."

"And me?" I said, already expecting the worst.

"Human minds were not meant to process that much knowledge instantly," he reminded me gently. "You have regularly employed powers beyond human capacity to understand, and indicted by the principle alienation that ensued. It will be no more unpleasant than when we employed absolute alignment together."

So a bunch of spikes through the forehead. Lovely.

"I'll cope," I sighed. "Work your magic, magic man."

"Must you call me that?" he asked.

"Be grateful Indrani's not here, or she'd start hinting about magic fingers," I replied without missing a beat.

She wouldn't even be wrong, to be honest. My time with Kilian had taught me that the jokes about mages having clever fingers were well founded.

"Silver lining," he muttered. "The attendants will do for our purposes, I suppose."

I glanced at the two young women.

"A question," I said. "Can you extract from the Trismegistus and the Bard?"

He nodded slowly.

"Broader, more complex minds will be more difficult to work with," he warned. "But in principle, yes. I must caution, however, that what is taken will be removed from the echo permanently. After the extraction, the actors will be... impaired, for lack of a better term."

"We'd be fucking with the imprint," I summarized.

"Fucking is not a term that applies to this subject," he sighed.

"It's a term with surprisingly broad applications, Zeze," I said righteously. "You should expand your horizons."

Huh, so he could glare with glass eyes without resorting to a light show. Nice to know. The work took too long. We were only halfway through the span of the shard, but the Bard was long gone and Trismegistus remained far from the other griever for the rest of it. We used the time to get more comfortable with our sudden knowledge of Keteran. Or, as it was actually called, Ashkaran. After he broke the first attendant – a chunk of her face was now missing, like it'd been vaporized – and shoved a blue bubble into my forehead, I'd felt a rush. Like my mind was a cup being filled beyond capacity, until the cup shattered and Winter flooded my veins. It'd been... strangely pleasant. Like cracking your neck after a long day's work. Hierophant's own acquisition had seen him go still for a solid thirty heartbeats, and his face had been twitching in and out of a wince ever since. He admitted in a low voice that the aspect had not warded off backlash as much as he'd anticipated.

I would have spared him some sympathy but I was still busy wrestling with the fact that I had servant gossip a few millennia out of date rattling around the back of my mind. I was less interested in who had been sleeping with who in the royal kitchens, or the speculation that the... head household servant for halls and commoner rooms – there was no Lower Miezian word that carried the same breadth of implications – had been getting cheaper candles and pocketing the savings.

“You know,” I said out loud, “for all those rumours about chambermaids being saucy this is surprisingly tame stuff. You hear filthier in taverns.”

“Maybe the sort you frequent,” Masego muttered. “There’s a reason I refuse to go drinking with you and Archer. Last time I saw a rat.”

I snorted. Yeah, maybe Dockside had been a bit much for Hierophant. He liked things clean, and that part of Laure was anything but. We split to see if there was anything interesting to dig up, and to my surprise there was. A surprising amount of information could be obtained from overhearing idle conversation, if there was enough of it. For one, I confirmed that the people with the copper circlets were royalty. Sons and daughters of the dead king, whose name had been Iakim. The oldest child was the heir to the kingship of Sephirah, which I assumed to be the name of the ancient Keteran kingdom. The title of that heir, Zekiah, wasn’t prince. Not exactly. The term was more like lesser king, and by the sound of it Zekiah had shared rule of the kingdom with his father for years now. Of Trismegistus, or whatever his true name was, I heard nothing. The nobles, or at least the man and women bearing titles I assumed to be something like nobility, among the crowd did not speak of him. Apart from the entombment, the favourite subject appeared to be the war with the ‘People of the Wolf’.

Aside from the usual accusations of savagery and wickedness that always sprouted on both sides of any war, the rumour of cannibalism was often repeated. That and transforming into giant man-eating wolves, but I had my doubts about that one. I’d seen no hint of a power like it when passing through the battle shards. No one seems particularly worried about the war, though, not even after King Iakim’s death. The People of the Wolf were apparently no match for walls of stone, and the ‘Conclave’ had finally agreed to enter the war. From context, those seemed to be mages. Had the lack of effectiveness of mages we’d seen so far come from the fact they were just amateurs? Could be. It wasn’t what I’d come here to find out, though, so when the shard began again I found Masego and headed towards the upper alcoves where I knew the Dead King and the Bard would come to talk.

“Heard anything interesting?” I asked.

“Some blame the plague for the war,” he told me, though he didn’t sound all that interested. “They say it was the deaths in the outlying villages that attracted the wolfmen.”

I cocked my head to the side. I’d chalk that one up for Hakram’s tale of the fall of Keter.

"Is wolfmen how you'd translate it?" I said. "It struck me more as-"

"Ah, capitalized," he breathed out. "I see. Formal address, which would be spoken 'People of the Wolf'. Difficult to know which of us is correct without seeing the term written, of course."

"I can't read it," I told him. "The girl was illiterate."

"I have some semblance of the knowledge," Masego frowned, then winced as his headache flared. "I cut too narrowly, it seems. I cannot quite remember it."

I patted his shoulder.

"Don't get a migraine," I ordered. "I need you sharp for the important part."

We were both standing, when Trismegistus strode up the ramp and came to rest by a pillar. He looked calm, in the magelight, and did not visibly react when the Wandering Bard slipped through the darkness and plopped herself down in the alcove to his side. She put down the lute on her lap and chuckled.

"There's nothing quite like looking down at one's work, is there?" she said.

Her Ashkaran was flawless and without accent, as if she was a native speaker. Trismegistus did not look at her.

"Intercessor," he said. "I wondered if you would come."

"Intercessor," the Bard repeated amusedly. "Not the worst thing I've been called. Heard a thing or two, have you?"

The young man glanced at her, mildly curious, before returning his gaze to the ceremony unfolding below.

"You were companion to Nasseh the Great, when he fought for the submission of the twelve cities," Trismegistus idly said. "You were at Queen Sadassa's side as well, during the worst of the Wars of the Rat. Fortune and misfortune both draw you like carrion."

"And which do you think you are, I wonder?" the Bard mused. "So few of them even remember you exist, Neshamah. How horrified they would be, to learn what the prodigal son has wrought."

Neshamah, I thought, fingers clenching. I finally had a name.

"You come in the service of Those Above, then," the man said, and he sounded almost bored. "Tedious."

"Below has already blessed you quite enough, my friend," the Bard shrugged. "You don't need the nudge. But I'm not here to put sticks in your wheels, if that is your worry. Too late for that. Maybe if I'd had a few years to shape your opposition, but you played it well enough I had no openings. And I already burned my fingers tossing those bones with odds like this with the giants."

Neshamah finally turned to face her.

"You have my attention," he said. "If not intervention, what is your purpose here?"

"I suppose you could call it curiosity," she said. "I'm starting to understand how little I understand, you see. So I seek knowledge. About how they make people like you. I won't solve the riddle with the tools they gave me, so it seems I must learn craftsmanship of my own. Which takes me to you. You're not impossible, my friend, but you are unlikely. Your father did not look Below when he earned his Blessing. But you did, at an age where most children worry about the nature of supper. Was it your mother's death? Ugly affair all around, I've been told."

The man smiled.

"You think it kindness to offer me an excuse," Neshamah said. "But it is an insult, Intercessor. There is nothing in what I have wrought that deserves excusing."

"The plague alone killed hundreds," the Bard said. "That will grow to thousands, when the cities begin to be touched."

"And?" he patiently asked.

"Your people bleed for power," the Bard said. "But only ever themselves. You would break cities in the name a plan that will not bloom for years yet."

"I destroy flesh that will destroy itself in time," he said. "There is no theft in this, Intercessor. It is mere movement of the soul as was ordained, only now given proper purpose."

The Bard hummed, then pulled at her flask.

"The drow didn't teach you this," she decided. "The Twilight Sages consider death the only sin, they would be appalled by what you speak of. Most tribes beyond the lakes can barely even use sorcery and their allegiances change with the seasons. Was it the Chitterers? I genuinely believe the Gods made them out of whatever was left after the rest of Creation was done. Shoddy craftsmanship, that lot."

"And still you believe I must have been taught," Neshamah said. "As if my actions were not the only lucid answer to the truth of this world. There are none closer in any lands to the Gods, Intercessor, so tell me this – why must we die at all? Why were we shaped with such inherent imperfection?”

“Because the Garden was a failure,” the Bard easily replied. “Immortals always fall into closed circles. There are no answers to be had from them.”

“You grasp too little and too much,” the man said. “The Splendid are bound to repetition because they are feared, Intercessor. Because with the span of eternity before them, they might learn beyond what they were meant to learn were they not so tightly constrained. And so mortality is the answer to the deeper question: how do they loosen the bindings without birthing their own usurpers?”

Neshamah smiled, his golden brown eyes aglow.

“Why, by cursing their work with decay,” he chuckled. “By ensuring the banner can only be carried for so long by any one soul before it is recalled at their feet.”

“Below’s favour comes with the end of aging,” the Bard said.

“Blessing from it also calls the blessed to strife in all things,” the man dismissed. “It is a curse of unmaking as certain as that of age.”

“Yet you took a Blessing as well,” she said. “And you’ve birthed no small amount of strife. The People of the Wolf, the southern cities, even your father – all dancing to your tune, every death another stone for your tower.”

“Is this judgement I discern?” Neshamah drawled. “You must have been human once, Intercessor. Do you not recall the urgings of one’s blood? I forced nothing. They do as they will, by their own choosing. All the forces of this war precede me. My forbear slew that of the Witch Queen, and so enmity was birthed between our peoples. Blessings of opposite bent set her against my father to the death, leading to the night of his passing. And war? Ah, war is but the accumulation of a thousand choices. Beyond the guiding hand of any single man. All I have done, Intercessor, was hitch my chariot to a falling star.”

“Oh, I won’t ever forget my first face,” the Bard murmured. “Or the first few after that, when I evened the scales of the debt. I leave judgement to the Tribunal, my friend. To every force its purpose, and that is not mine.”

“We must seem like golems to you,” the man said wonderingly. “Our incantations written by the hands of Gods instead of men, yet not so different peering down from your perch. Eyeless things toiling for purpose we cannot understand.”

"One day, maybe," she said. "When I will have grown used to dying. Until then I still weep for what we do to ourselves, without needing a single nudge."

"I have pondered, since I first learned of you," Neshamah said. "Whether or not your service is willing."

"They make us better, when we listen," the Bard said. "Even yours. It is a terrible thing you will do, but no less great for it."

"Yet you seek to escape your purpose," the man said.

"I have," she said lightly, "always loved a good story."

"What a clever jest," Neshamah mused. "That there are none to seek intercession for the Intercessor."

The Wandering Bard laughed. Like he was her friend, and not a monster who was scheming to destroy a kingdom and a half for his ambition. I shivered at the sight of it, for the second time. For reasons darker and deeper than the first.

"Pity, from you?" she said. "People never do cease to surprise me. I look forward to your ending, King of Death."

"O ye of little faith," the man who would be the Dead King smiled.

The Bard pulled at the flask again, saluting him jauntily, and sashayed away without another word. I did not follow her. She'd disappear, stepping into an alcove and vanishing into thin air. I stood there in silence for a very long time, watching the man that would become the Dead King look down at his father's burial. Masego, for once, sensed there was no place for conversation.

"Take us out," I said quietly.

"I have not extracted from either of them," Hierophant said hesitatingly.

"Tomorrow," I said. "We're done for the day."

"Catherine?" he asked, but it was more worry than question.

"Take us out, Masego," I said. "It looks like I need to prepare to fight an entirely different kind of war."

This is before names were NAMES. Weeping heavens how old is this man.

Baggy0z

Isn't Named just the Callowan/Praes term for them? Procer uses Blessed/Damned and I think the Levant uses something similar.

Someguy

Chosen/Damned was the Proceran term. Levant uses blood Lineages or something.

Argentorum

The way they talk about blessings makes me feel like they might not be as...set in stone as names are. Specifically "you looked below for your blessing. The delineation between the two sides isn't as clear, because they're both blessings, which makes me think that the powers might also be more fluid. Or I'm reading too much into it.

SlumberryStorm

I think it is more that the "Storys" the "Names" come from are not as set in stone.

Euodiachloris

It looks suspiciously like something, or somebody, codified Roles and Names in Calernia into the shapes we currently know them... all for the liking of a Good Story™. Bard's been a very busy bunny for quite a long time. And, has shaped a whole continent of conflict.

I think she's wrecked a few things in the process of streamlining the tools and board the Gods' chosen actors get to play with and on. <_<

Euodiachloris

PS – Should have said, "Bard's been a very busy bunny for quite a long time, most of it against her will."

She's borked what she could, when possible and while using plausible deniability. But, has forgotten that the pieces are people in the process.

Tsura

Didn't the Wandering Bard say something like "I was there when your Name was made"?

She herself may be the one who did the codeifying

Sylfa

Have to agree, in particular the line "Below has already blessed you quite enough, my friend. You don't need the nudge." when he complained about Those Above being boring.

That implies rather heavily that people could receive blessings from both Above and Below at the same time, at least in these early days if not in Catherine's time.

We also learned that Arcadia was the gods first attempt to solve their dispute and that Wandering Bard has: been around presumably from the very beginning of Creation, that she's actually neutral, and is supposed to Intercede to keep some balance. Amazing amount of information in an amazing chapter!

And poor Bard/Intercessor that can't even admit she's not very happy about her position, she's been at it for millennia by now, being teleported about without a say in the matter...

Snowfire1224

How old is bard? She implies she has already died and come back a few times already.

NZPIEFACE

Probably one of the first names to ever be had.

Yotz

The First Moderator of /r/Creation.

Kagedviper

Moar liek: The first editor of Shakespeare

Miles

I guess there's a kind of implication in the name: bards wrote stories

stevenneiman

Weirdly the Book of All Things calls them Names, but that almost seems like a newer term from the way it's used in some places but not others.

Snowfire1224

Perhaps there is more than one translation for the book of all things and the version we saw was the callowan version.

Aeon

Fascinating. So Bard isn't necessarily a hero. I'm seeing some parallels with Black, based on some of the things Neshamah said. And she's been around for a very long time.

ruduen

Even back then, the Wandering Bard likes to watch.

Now, it's just a question of what Catherine can take from it all.

(Also, if she'll get to snatch any other languages on her way out.)

Argentorum

She's already found the most important thing. She's a piece on a very old board. The Dead King and the Intercessor have been playing for longer than Callow has been a kingdom.

I'd also be...rather upset.

Byzantine

But I think this conversation just showed they aren't playing. Bard wants to die, or escape from her torment of keeping the balance. But in order to do so she must learn, and the Gods keep her constrained so she cannot.

And Bard does not work for either side, exactly. She works to ensure the balance is maintained the game does not end. And that puts her in an entirely different position than Cat had assumed. And Cat just learned why the Dead King is so interested in her – she is an unconstrained being with the power of Winter in its entirety. She is exactly what he was hoping to make himself into. And she is something that can defeat the Gods themselves.

SHARKS

I don't think it's winter, specifically. I think it's cat & Co's ability to fuck with the "narratives" made by the gods.

The summer/winter fae thing was the prototype for the "good" and "evil" narrative. It was supposed to loop endlessly, but cat BROKE that loop. My bet is that is the part that piqued his interest. She already broke the prototype, so now he might be able to finally break the real game.

Byzantine

Yes, but in breaking the prototype she stole half its power. That means she both has an impossible innate ability – to break patterns – and the unbound power required to do so. The Dead King has the power, but he is bound in such a way that he cannot accomplish his real goal.

The Bard has been trying to Create something impossible, which would allow her to break her bindings and escape her role. All while still being forced to play it.

Catherine had the ability to break patterns, previously, but not the power to go up against patterns woven directly by the gods themselves. Now she has that power and that ability. This is the real reason Bard ensured Akua was successful – she needed Catherine to reach her current state, where she is no longer mortal, and unbound by pattern.

The Dead King likely noticed what Cat has done... and if they talk freely will likely immediately see the bard's play. The question is what happens next?

Morgenstern

Funny thing that it wasn't exactly Cat who had the idea how to break the fae cycle, but rather Malicia. I wonder how the Dead King will take *that* revelation. Or that it was Black who engineered other victories.. etc.

Byzantine

It will make him very, very happy. Because he has the idea. He's just been lacking a tool capable of carrying it out. Catherine is that tool – where she goes the story begin to shatter.

MetruX

Err... None of the above. The one who made the plan was the King of Winter, but he needed Cat to do it, since he was naturally unable. And yes, Black engineered other victories, but all he does is with the same final objective, and that objective, much like the king's one, needs Cat to do it, because he is naturally unable... Do you see a pattern emerging?

HandyCapped

A quarter of that power. Roughly(?). There is also Spring and Autumn.

Byzantine

Spring and Autumn do not exist when Winter and Summer do. I believe that they are merely a reshaping of the same power.

Euodiachloris

People are hung up on that... No. The cycle is now borked. There were ever only two sides which cycled between four seasons. While any one cycle was in play, there could only ever two seasons – the other two were part of a different skin applied to a whole setting. Only upon a reset and reshuffle could the seasons change.

So, Cat got the half of what was playing out at the time, and she won't get Autumn (assuming Autumn was the "Evil" mirror), because that skin hadn't been applied to the cycle in play.

In addition, she now has the Wild Hunt, where once that was Spring or Autumn (in mythology, there's just the Seelie –roughly associated with both Spring and Summer simultaneously– and Unseelie –roughly Autumn and Winter– and the border between both rather fluid).

Because things Arcadia is now borked, the nature of the Hunt would have been in question. One solution: shove unhappy dissidents into it, affiliate it with Cat on the premise that Creation is now her backyard and Arcadia needs her permission to play in it. The Hunt needs to play in Creation: it's part of its function. Now, its playing to bork Creation to mirror Arcadia.

Notsteve

I think this is also why Bard made sure Black broke Akua's device. Cat was about to get a new Name if it had survived, which would have bound her to the same old system. As discussed here, villains are just as doomed as heroes to die before learning enough to break the system. But since Cat didn't become the Black Queen, she barely has a Name at all anymore. Which might mean she has the power to change the system but is no longer subject to its rules.

wyaldriddler

That was interesting. Not really sure what to make of all of it but it is some interesting set up.

Byzantine

So Bard was the Gods solution to something that tried to break the game. Both Above and Below cooperated to create her. That explains how she is so... absurd.

And she has wanted to die for a very, very, very long time. Then the game she is playing right now is not to balance the scales, or let heaven win. She noticed the same thing the Winter King did: that Catherine can break unbreakable patterns.

And we just learned something very special: Catherine has the power of Winter, but is not constrained to fall into a circle. She is the unmaking of the Gods themselves. Damn.

Novice

I completely agree especially with your last paragraph. But what would that mean with the Calernian Fae? Because they too have escaped the bindings of Summer and Winter.

Byzantine

I suspect they escaped one pattern for another that has yet to emerge. The Fae are too bound by stories to truly stop being part of one. The nature of the story has simply changed.

Dainpdf

They have probably just traded one cycle for another.

Antoninjohn

Just the Gods Above not both

Dainpdf

Doesn't Trimegistus saying she comes "for the Above" sort of imply she could have come for the other side?

Byzantine

He implied she works for both – "You come in the service of Those Above, then" is not something he would say if she always worked for Above, because he was far more aware of her than anyone had a right to be.

Morgenstern

Her title here is an indication, too. She's a go-between for the Gods Below and Above, their mediator (which would make it more clear than Intercessor, but who knows, maybe she's been trying for intercession for the humans and/or played that role in the human world, so got that title there?).

Morgenstern

Put that in “probably” / “most likely” speech, but yeah.

Dainpdf

Catherine is also not eternal and immortal, which was the issue with the Fae. She does not pose a threat in the way they would if unbound.

Byzantine

She is immortal.

If she is eternal... well, that really depends on just how Winter and her are linked. The Fae can die, but they always come back when the cycle repeats. If Catherine dies, the question is what would trigger Winter to reset, now that the cycle in Arcadia is broken?

I suspect that it is, ironically, Catherine's death that resets the cycle. If so, then she is very much eternal. And that's the kind of thing we only find out in the endgame.

Dainpdf

Pretty sure Cat doesn't get to slip the leash that easily. She's very likely still mortal, if unaging. Otherwise one would expect the Heavens would have advised either the Pilgrim or Hasenbach's oracle that trying to kill her is futile.

Also, I think Cat doesn't reset, precisely because she's not truly Fae.

Yotz

That's one of the base problems with digital immortality – quantum matrix on which your consciousness is imprinted may be reasonably considered eternal, but the fine structures of your consciousness are not. And since said matrix must be by definition mutable, it will degrade with the degradation of 'you'. It's just like the Gardener in the dark principle, only stretched from decades to millennia of _subjective_ time. Basically – everything rots.

This is why any depiction of deep immortal are inherently flawed – our consciousness evolved to inhabit relatively short-lived mortal coil, and so we are unable neither to fully comprehend deep time as a concept, nor any being actually able to comprehend it. To grok the eternity one must be eternal. Cat only recently became one – and with a caveat the size of Vredefort Dome: the moment she succumbs to the mental entropy, her body will deform and disintegrate, solving the problem. And if she would be able to change enough to overcome degradation, she is bound to become one of the Old Monsters – completely inhumane, deeply alien, incomprehensible creature, bound to the Grand Cycle of her own creation. Which solves her as a problem for the Players in deep time.

Similar can be added to the Below Gift – beyond in-package megalomania as a form synthetic telomere – as it was shown with Black. He felt old inside, and so he aged visibly – he felt invigorated after the Knife Incident, and so he became young again. Even if you'll manage somehow to retain King of the Hill's Crown, you will crumble eventually, for the Names of godslayers are Ennui and Oversatiation.

/streamofconsciousness.end

Dainpdf

That is true. Even villainous Named tend to fall into patterns. Perhaps that is part of why the Dead King seldom moves. We'll see.

Oh, and Cat dodges way too much for someone who is truly immortal, so we know that she at least thinks her body being destroyed would cause her very great inconvenience.

Novice

I think Cat is already an immortal. When talking about handing out Winter titles, Larat has this to say: "Ah, but there are such benefits to bestowal," Larat smiled. "Freedom from the chains of entropy among them. How many of those you love are you willing to lose to age, before bending your neck?" – Chapter 10:Allegro

Dainpdf

She's unaging, has been since she became a villain. That is nowhere even close to being immortal.

Novice

Catherine's soul is practically Winter itself. So long as there's a shard of Winter somewhere, like say via handing out Winter titles, Catherine can and will return thus making her an immortal imo.

Dainpdf

Eh... That's a stretch. Might be Winter as a fae entity will end as soon as Cat dies. Her soul leaves/is destroyed/does whatever souls do when their owners die, and Winter goes with it. Or maybe she does endure as a metaphysical entity, but can now only be briefly summoned with interrupted consciousness, like the devils. We have no way of knowing, as of yet.

MetruX

You're assuming, and with the guide assuming is almost always a bad thing. For all we know the fae cicle was broken BECAUSE of her existance in separation, which means the cicle will come anew after her death. For all we know the cicle was broken UNRELATED to her existance in Winter, which means she's the last of Winter and it will disappear with her. For all we know fae powers and tendencies don't follow our common logic, and we may very well not understand what happens. I mean, maybe she is eternal as of now, but when she dies she only resets herself, now as Fae, and can't change anything forever again. Maybe she'll even reset inside the united fae kingdoms, which could be even worse...

Antoninjohn

Well at least Cat knows his name, she gets power from that as a fea

Dainpdf

It wasn't freely given, though, so she doesn't get that much. And if anyone knows how to block that sort of thing it'd be the Dead King.

Hakurei06

A name learned but not given also has a power.

Dainpdf

Never claimed otherwise.

Jane

I wonder how many more Echoes they could find... If they were to go to other great sites, and loot the knowledge therein, how much could Cat learn? The languages would be useful, but could she also learn great sorceries or famous swordplay?

I mean, the Gigantes *have* to have done *something* that echoes into Arcadia, right? Just imagine being able to lift their sorcerous secrets without decades of study or having to talk her way into a country that would prefer her dead...

Then again, I wonder if there would be side effects they're unaware of. I can't imagine that what she has become has been thoroughly studied.

The Dead King sounds like an interesting man, who plays a game far more dangerous than any had thought. I'm reminded of how Heiropant's ultimate ambition could break Creation itself, only the Dead King has presumably gone much further along his path than Masego has... If the Dead King thinks to outplay the Gods themselves, just how much danger is there in accepting his assistance?

Dainpdf

So the League precedes the Dead King, and so does the Bard. Interesting. And his musings about decay and strife seem to indicate Creation is something like Douglas Adams's Earth: a gigantic computer, which uses among other things life itself to derive knowledge.

Novice

The League does not precede the Dead King. The League of Free Cities was founded in response to Procer's aggressive expansion. And the Principate of Procer was formed after the fall of Triumphant.

Dainpdf

Hm. I assumed one of the things Trimegistus mentioned was the formation of the League, but I guess I was mistaken.

Gunslinger

The 12 cities exist but I don't think they are the league as they are now.

Dainpdf

Small issue:

"So many fucking exceptions and whoever had decided that plurals for masculine and feminine names (...) deserved to be drawn and quartered."

Missing a piece. "(...) that plurals for masculine and feminine names [should work differently]", perhaps?

Yotz

Ellipsis at least – as in, she is so frustrated with said plurals, she can't even finish

noname

Or replace that for the as so;
So many fucking exceptions and whoever had decided the plurals for masculine and feminine names – or even that there should be any of those – deserved to be drawn and quartered.

Jonnnney

So Arcadia was indeed a creation of the gods. The garden of immortals who didn't change enough to settle the debate between above and below. Interesting, this has very significant implications about the power gains of the fae who escape their leash.

Byzantine

And I think makes things interesting in another way – the Bard intentionally set things up so that Catherine would gain her Mantle... and so that she would stop restricting it. At the time these seemed like steps to taking down Team Practical Evil, but I'm wondering if Bard is running a shell game: She is, theoretically, fighting against Team Practical Evil in her role of keeping the balance, but her real goal is the creation of something that surpasses the Dead King. Something Impossible that will allow her to break her own leash.

...Like, say, the unbound holder of Winter, who has an impossible gift for breaking stories...

Someguy

"There is only one lesson to be learned from shatranj: no matter who wins the game, the pieces return to the same box."
– Dread Emperor Benevolent the First

Break the box and stab the shards into the eyes of the players.

sengachi

-Catherine, Queen of Callow

Cold Cyberia

"What Foundling does isn't thinking outside the box so much as stealing the box and hitting her opponents with it until they stop moving."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Moon Clan, Book 1 Chapter 27

Euodiachloris

Be the pigeon!

Someguy

Neshamah is like proto-Black, only much much more experienced and powerful. Fortunately they are not playing the same game.

TheCount

Now, Cat has got another blade for the Bard, and seen a bit of the Death King's nature... Things will be interesting. 😊

sengachi

<https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>

Go support Erratica on Patreon if you can! He does so much amazing work for us and he absolutely deserves to make *at least* a living wage off of his work on this story.

Seriously, if you'd pay $20 for one of Erratica's books, then you can chip in at least two bucks a month. He gives a book a year already, that's a fine exchange. (Holy crap you give us a book of this a year how the fuck do you manage that?)

Novice

Hmmm... So if immortality is such a threat to the Gods, then what about the Elves? Surely in their long lives, one of them has already amassed enough power to threaten the Gods. Or are they so into the Good side that they are effectively shackled? Or maybe it's only the Elves of the Golden Bloom.

Why even bestow power to Creation in the first place if there's a chance the Gods could be usurped? So many questions.

I'm so excited for the next set of worldbuilding chapters.

sengachi

I think that was the Dead King's comment about immortals being bound. The elves are just as bound as the fae in their own way, unable to grow beyond a heavily constrained set of mental and behavioral limitations.

TeK

It's said that elves grew a narrative weight as they get older. I imagine this boon comes with drawbacks, not unlike how all Villains want to monologue.

MetruX

It also comes to mind that we only know the "lesser" elves from the golden bloom, since the "greater" ones never appeared so far. We know for a fact the ones in the golden bloom are limited, since the bard could stop them with words only.

sengachi

Catherine can bestow the power of Winter on people, and in doing so free them from senescence. She can make the Gods' nightmare scenario -a race of unbound immortals- come true. We've known up to this point that Cat was a threat to the Gods' game, but only in the context of 'Cat breaks rules, she really doesn't like the Gods' rules, she's the protagonist, the natural conclusion of her story is more directly challenging the Gods rules'. Now we have an in-universe reason to believe that she is a capital-T Threat to the Gods.

Fuck, in that context I'm frankly surprised the Gods Above *only* threw the Grey Pilgrim, the Saint of Swords, and fourteen (ahem, sorry, twelve) holy bludgeons at her.

Also ... this implies that the Gods Below might not like her much either. Now I'm wondering ... *is* she still backed by the Gods Below? Her necromancy is confirmed to no longer be of infernal origin, she doesn't truck with devils or demons, her shadow power is definitely now an extension of the whole Moonless Nights thing, and all the rest of her powers are clearly Winter in origin. Heck she doesn't even actually have a proper Name anymore, nor a clear Role. I ... oh my gods did the Gods Below actually forsake her?! Is she not actually a Villain anymore?!

... Wait a minute. The Woe are: an explicitly non-divine miracle worker (Masego), an explicitly neutral Named who just seeks conflict (Indrani), an ex-Hero Named who's definitely not a proper Villain (Vivienne), Hakram, and "I'm trying to squirrel my way into the most half-assed redemption arc ever but no really I'm not a Villain any longer" Ubua. *None* of them are properly Evil (except Ubua and she doesn't count, although maybe she's a ploy by the Gods to pull Catherine and her Mantle back into the fold?). I ... I think Catherine might not actually be aligned with the Gods Below. Everyone kind of assumes she is but ... maybe she's not.

Oh fuck this would even match up with the whole Grey Pilgrim's thing about "so long as you've signed on with Below your people will follow" and Catherine's worry about that. The perfect ending to that conflict would be Catherine finding out that she's not actually aligned with Below and throwing that wrench into the Pilgrim's moral compass. Force him to *actually* judge Catherine by her moral merits and push Catherine into actually evaluating her own actions without the default assumption that some amount of Evil comes with the territory.

wyaldriddler

"Catherine can bestow the power of Winter on people, and in doing so free them from senescence. She can make the Gods' nightmare scenario -a race of unbound immortals- come true.

We've known up to this point that Cat was a threat to the Gods' game, but only in the context of 'Cat breaks rules, she really doesn't like the Gods' rules, she's the protagonist, the natural conclusion of her story is more directly challenging the Gods rules'. Now we have an in-universe reason to believe that she is a capital-T Threat to the Gods."

Eh, I'd have issues with this course, mostly because a power climb is not a very complicated story and it does not engage it's readers in the same way Practical Guide has up to this point. Which has usually been through political drama, magic, high fantasy and war. Since Practical Guide's whole thing is wrapped around messing with the conventionally expected Hero Vs Villain then it'd be in poor form from a perspective looking at the writing of it if this happened.

You **can** make it work(see Kill Six Billion Demons for an example), and you can get working stories out of it, but Prac Guide hasn't set itself up to do that.

John doe

I disagree. I think much like TTGL and Worm it could escalate in quite a satisfying way. We've had hints there's a much larger game in the works since the first book. We've seen Cat pick fights above her weight level routinely and slowly build up her strength to pick bigger and bigger fights. This is her logically endgame. The only way to have lasting peace is to break the cycle that forces conflict. It fits her motives too well for her to ignore.

sengachi

Also I feel like this wouldn't necessarily culminate in Catherine duking it out with the gods. She doesn't have to do that to fight them. She 'just' has to break their narrative in a sufficiently thorough way and divorce the world's trajectory from the Gods' question of Good vs. Evil.

wyaldriddler

TTGL was meant to escalate the way it did because that was the premise of Spiral Energy in the first place. Probably one of the better anime out there for how it did what it did and the awesome it could pack into a show. Though it's ending was a bit sadder than I think it needed to be.

Worm also escalated, but that unfortunately made it worse **points at S9, Tagg and Alexandria**. It had nice fights, but post-Leviathan things get suspect.

In this case there's not too much thematic difference between Xianxia and Practical Guide if it decides to go with the idea of Cat fighting the Gods. Aside from that it also entails discarding one of the central precepts of the books, which is that mortal non-Named can actually action change via warfare. What's a bunch of mortals going to do with the Gods? Nothing, they're mortals and thus not important in a fight against Gods. This flies in the face of what the Guide seems to be about.

Power climbs work in certain settings, as previously established in TTGL where it went with it wholesale. Other times where the setting is set up for that to be a proper thing. But rebellion against the Gods in their fortresses is a trope that's been done before in fantasy and it holds no interest for me. Fucking over the God's plan by pushing through the Accords? That would be very Guide like and I'd appreciate that ending.

Clmineith

It seems to me like if she was creating a Neutral side.

The catch here will be if, after years of fighting for creating a side free from both Good and Evil, she eventually realized that she has just created a new side to trap people into

crescentsickle

Except that neutral side doesn't have gods associated with it. Creation, or at least Calernia, is a board game for the Gods Above and Gods Below to figure out who wins. There are two distinct sides that are heavily maintained to see which one wins.

A third faction existing is one in which mortal representatives say "fuck your game" and attempt to ruin the whole point of what's going on. It is the worst possible scenario for the Gods, because the mere existence of that side breaks the game. "Good" and "Evil" no longer weigh just against each other, and so whatever portion weighs against Neutral may offer bonuses or penalties for or against the two sides that matter.

What is revealed to us is that the hearsay about Creation being a wager between the Gods is legit, and it's so legit they cooperated to make sure the wager is honest. Immortals are bound to prevent their interference, and that makes them unsuited for the wager. Mortals aren't bound in the same way, but they get expiration dates so they can't ever amass enough power to break the wager. Just in case any of that fails, they created failsafes: agents charged with policing the game board. That's Wandering Bard.

It sounds like Calernia used to be just people versus people, and those people either followed the Gods Above or Gods Below and received blessings of power, ability, etc. Since the time that the Dead King yet lived, however, Calernia has been plunged deeply into exacting lines. More and more agents for either side, with more powerful and more specific abilities. With more weight. Not pawns on the board with different colors and subtly different ways to move and act, but specific pieces in defined roles with well-defined rules. Not just "One with a Blessing from the Gods Below", but "Black Knight", or "Dread Empress".

One thing of special concern is that we already have some neutrals, and the especially important one is Ranger. I think, like Squire, there are some pieces on the board that can be played by one side or the other. Different stories, but very similar powers. Ranger as a Name sounds like one. So what happens when an Immortal, supposedly bound, happens into a Name that can be played for either side, and then plays neither?

Either Hye is the product of gaming the system by the hands of the Wandering Bard's caliber, or Hye is an agent like the Bard. Calling it now, because she doesn't fit into the new reality based on what we understand so far.

Azure

Ranger is the ultimate killer, so yeah she's definitely an agent. She threw down with the Summer Queen so that tells you she's on equal footing with pretty much the most powerful immortals in play. She's definitely a fail safe to end anyone who threatens the balance. The Bard just nudges things, Ranger is the hammer that smashes if needed. I'd say Catherine may have to face her at some stage if she really comes close to breaking the game.

MetruX

Hye is as bound as the elves, remember when she met Cat and said she practically couldn't stop herself from killing her. It's in her nature to be bound, only in a different way than we are accustomed.

Also, you may be confusing something, Cat is very much a lesser god right now. Masego has implied innumerous times she's not human anymore, she had even fewer consequences to this learning than the miracle worker with an Aspect to help that did the job itself. If she does rise a new side, she will rise with it, and finally we get another God on the game board. What this implies, we know too little to even begin imagining.

IDKWhoitis

Anyone else think how weirdly convenient this echo was in range? Like is this just fate throwing Cat a bone, or a higher tier manipulation?

Novice

Some would call it Providence.

Euodiachloris

I call it “both the Dead King and Bard knew what the fuck they were doing and made arrangements”. 🤪 just so you know, Neshamah is Soul in Hebrew. Which have interesting implication, as Keter is Crown in Hebrew, as well as the source of divine power in the cosmos in Kabbalah. Is Ashkaran a Hebrew inspired language? Zekiah sounds vaguely like N X , which means “winning” or “gaining [something]”, but maybe I’m digging too much into this.

TheTime

sengachi

*gasp* This is why Masego’s incu-dad couldn’t tell him about the Dead King’s rise. Incubus is a bound immortal. And the Dead King’s power grab is the ultimate expression of an attempt to become an unbound mortal. I’ll bet you there’s some kind of interdiction the gods laid down to prevent immortals from conveying information about how he did what he did.

Byzantine

The fact it remains a mystery after this long despite pieces literally being present in Arcadia means something was done to make sure no one was ever aware of what happened. I suspect it may be possible to figure it out, but impossible to convey by any means. That restrains the problem to individuals, and those are easily dealt with.

It also explains why his father said nothing – he can’t. He can’t even say he knew what happened, because even that is conveying information about it.

---

Yeah, looks like he’d have conceal any possible way of disrupting the God’ wager. From interlude Liesse IV:

Wekesa had long suspected that the reason for the existence of angels and devils was that the Gods could not intervene directly in Creation or any of its adjacent realms. Not, like the Book of All Things stated, because a wager forbade it – but because the Gods were Creation. That their power had been made into the world all mortals inhabited and could not be withdrawn without unravelling the entire edifice. Hence the establishment of catspaws defined as opposite, but ultimately serving the same purpose: advancing the experiment.

NZPIEFACE

“O ye of little faith.”

The perfect way to describe Bard, I’d say.

Neuromute

From google research Neshamah is Hebrew for “breath”, referring to the spirit or soul. So even before he was the Dead King his name was Spirit or Soul. Combined with the comments about not being remembered or even perceivable by his family I think Trismegistus is already some kind of ghost/lich or a being of pure soul. He’s already shed his mortal form.

Anony

I don’t get it.

Why is “Human minds were not meant to process that much knowledge instantly.” a reason not to do this? Just do it over a couple hours, or days or w/e.

On top of that, Cat isn’t even human anyway.

A praesi caring what human minds were “meant” to be doing feels just a tad ooc lol.

sengachi

I mean, Masego did end up doing it to himself despite serious personal agony. That’s pretty Praesi.

Also, while doing really dangerous things with magic is very Praesi, so is the dumb getting killed early because they did *stupidly* dangerous things with magic. Masego may have made it his life goal to eventually transgress all the bounds the gods placed on magic, but he’s also Praesi mage who’s practiced for decades and is still alive and that means he has a healthy awareness of and begrudging respect for those bounds.

MetruX

It is a reason because of what was said in the chapter, and also, you don’t know how it works, why do you assume you CAN do it over time? And yes, Cat isn’t human anymore, the reason why he didn’t hesitate for a second to do it for her.

Praesi die early and consistently because they disregard this kinds of things, Masego is not really Praesi in his ways. He inherited a little from his father, but the man himself was already a little of an outcast, and this boy was born with difficulties for social, while being taught by an incubus. It feels very right to me, the way he acts, because it's consistent with what was shown of HIM, not of some stereotype.

SpeckofStardust

1. Bard didn't make the dead king.
2. She predates him.
3. She was made by those below and above to deal with a problem that wasn't working by the rules, aka the first practical evil/good cause they would win the argument but not by letting either side of the argument win.
4. Which is why when bard went against black she could actively/openly work with both a hero and a villain, because he qualified for that level of getting his ass kicked.
5. Just because at one point she wanted to escape doesn't mean she still wants to do so.
6. She's definitively not dead. After all she has to be there when the Dead king kicks is :<

PotatoMan

Maybe in the beginning, Bard was helping create conflict between Good and Evil. When talking to the Dead King, Bard mentions that Trismegistus "already has enough Blessings and doesn't 'need' the nudge", which implies that Bard can and has in the past, before that conversation took place, given such 'nudges'. A nudge in this metaphor being a Blessing of Above or Below. Why would the Bard give powers out to people, both Good and Bad? Trismegistus also mentioned that both "fortune and misfortune draw {The Bard} like carrion", and lists a few Kings and Queens, assumedly in times of great strife, as known associates. The Bard, in the beginning, was stirring up action to create great Stories. The Bard hints at this with her light jest: "I have," she said lightly, "always loved a good story." If the Bard (with Blessings form both Above and Below) is the Intercessor that both makes stories and also ensures that they stay on track, her OP powers and previously unclear motivations make much more sense.

I think that Bard was gifted powers by both Above and Below as an instrument that can interfere in the earthly plane to create and maintain stories for the "argument".

PotatoMan

Oh drat I thought of something else. The Dead King implies that immortality in the Guideverse has built-in shackles to prevent the Gods' usurpation, and that the Fae are bound by such. He also says that mortals are allowed to learn and grow, but that they are bound from usurpation by, ya know, dying. Initially, The Bard had to give out Blessings to foster conflict in the world, but what if there was a way to gain the power of someone else's narrative achievements if after they were gone, you took their title and declared that you would be acting in the same manner? Such a method would bypass your limited earthly time to build a narrative, allowing you (from your perspective) to gain power. However, Names are bound by the same shackles that immortals are, forcing you to increasingly fall into tropes and stifling growth. One thing we have seen in The Practical Guide is that once you take a Name, you are bound by its' precepts and begin acting in a manner according to it's nature, or suffer power loss and Name disassociation. From this perspective, names are little more than shackles, binding you to the will of the story and the fate of that Name. Villainous names are slated to lose, Heroic to win, Villainous to grasp, Heroic to defend. Such a continuity between Names, and the fact that by taking them you act in accordance with the Gods' plan, could be why the elves of the Golden Bloom only consider talking with Heroes as people, as Heroes have the narrative weight of those before them giving them, in the Elves' eyes, substance. It should be noted that the Golden Elves consider Villains people too, but that because they support the Gods Below, the Golden Elves consider it their rightful duty to murder them.

As a side note, everyone in the comment section seems to hate Hanno for being denying responsibility and being a slave of the Heavens. But Akua, had she climbed the Tower, would have embraced her villainy and been no less a slave to it than Hanno to his Choir. Names on both sides are little more than elaborate traps, enticing people to take up Names to gain power and then stopping their wielders from changing.

Notsteve

Which also explains why Bard sabotaged the hellgate generator by messing with Black. Names are a trap, and the sabotage kept Cat from ascending to a new Name. Instead she may not have a Name at all at this point, and be a completely free actor with the power of a Name but none of the restrictions.

sengachi

Oh jeez, do you think she might have been *helping* Cat by doing that? On purpose?

Gunslinger

It's cool to see The dead king was always a piece of shit. Fascinating but evil proper. I'd have been disappointed if he was good but forced to do this to save his kingdom or something like that.

We also get confirmation that the Bard's role is keep the story running and not something altruistic. Though I'm curious why only heroes know about her role and not villains in the current age.

Could be Triumphant was such a strong play from Below that she's been working from the heroes side since to balance the scales?

Also for all his attempts to break the cycle his undead nature means that he doesn't grow or learn. He's still yet to achieve his goal but he's given himself plenty of time for someone to help him so we have an inclination of what the dead king wants from Cat. Scary that.

MetruX

I don't think it could be Triumphant, unless she is like Cat in nature, because the whole idea is that one side has to win the argument, and if triumphant was a play by Below that worked, there is nothing for the mediator to interfere.

frolamiz

Thanks for the chapter, here are some nice theories:

The Dead King indeed managed to attain immortality, but still got shackled by being an undead that has difficulties to learn. If his objective is to get rid of these shackles, it is probably the best opportunity he has ever had. Catherine, as an unbound Fae, is (probably) free of the shackles. Since undeath is one of Winter's aspects, and more importantly we already know that the undeads raised with its power can learn, it make The Dead King very compatible with it and should appear extremely enticing to him. We also know that Catherine can bestow Fae titles, so she could easily (with the right pivot, of course) make him a Winter Fae and free him from his shackles.

But it seem unlikely for him to become her de facto servant (even if with Winter, treacherous subordinates are a given), so I can see him try to either usurp her title (which would probably be difficult without the right tools) or... Marry her.

Arranged marriages are a great way to make political ties and alliances between nations, something she is in dire need (even if she would prefer that no one ever hear of this alliance, but who believe that is going to happen?), and whatever help he would provide her is probably expandable. It also place them as equal instead of subject and sovereign, is a perfect pivot for him to free himself and irrevocably tie him to her narratively (not taking into account that it is a goldmine for the story).

It would also explain why he didn't reach out to her before, since he knew she would never treat with him unless cornered, and he needed her sufficiently cornered to agree to this kind of offer.

And maybe the glowing orb from book three's epilogue wasn't Malicia contacting The Dead King like we all assumed, but some sort of artefact made to detect the existence of an unbound immortal, since it happen just after Second Liesse, when Catherine embraced her Mantle. And maybe it didn't glow since Triumphant's days because she was the last one to qualify.

sengachi

Ohhhhhhh, yeah there's a thought, Cat's undead's ability to learn being coveted by the Dead King. I like it!

Barthumphries

Typo thread

No one seems particularly worried about the war
Change seems to seemed

She'd disappear
Change disappear to disappeared

Barthumphries

Multiple people are saying, "Cat has the power of Winter and she breaks stories..." and "She's totally free from influence..."

No, no she's not.

We've seen that the more she uses Winter, the more it binds her. She has to specifically stop using it to "clear her mind of its influence", etc. She is not a free Winter-user, she's a "I'm only using a bit here and there and not even coming close to using the full might of Winter because I don't want to be bound like that" Winter-user.

And she explicitly won that Winter power by finding a story (with a little forgery) that supported her Story.

We've clearly seen that the more power people like her get, the more they're bound into their Roles.

Barthumphries

It occurs to me that Juniper might be the only truly free person in Cat's inner circle. And maybe Robber, although he seems pretty one-dimensional.

Barthumphries

This is why Ranger is so neutral. Ranger gets to exist, and gets to continue amassing power, as long as she remains neutral and doesn't get involved. She's either trapped in her role and now can't escape, or she's hoping to quietly gain enough experience to make it matter.

Byzantine

Range is bound by her Nature, rather than her name, or any story.

Azure

No Ranger is the Gods (both above and below) Enforcer. She's there to keep everyone in line by force, if they are attempting to break the story. Look at the whole taking the Winter King's eye. We know that Winter was discontent with the repeating story, and wow look at that Ranger takes his eye. He was clearly plotting shenanigans and had to be pulled back in line. You can't kill an immortal, but you can diminish them, and that's what Ranger did. And the Summer Queen was likely very close to breaking out of Arcadia, when Ranger stepped in and stopped her, inadvertently saving Catherine in the process. And we know Ranger prowls the lands of the Dead King, hoping for a shot at him. He's clearly broken the rules of the story and she needs to take him out, but he's obviously planned for this and has made it difficult for her. Ranger is Enforcer Supreme and is tasked with keeping all the pieces in line. If anything I'd say she's going to be the biggest problem for Catherine at some stage, and also sets up an angsty confrontation with Black and Ranger, if he steps in to save his protege.

Metrux

She's ver much bound, like I said previously in the comments of this chapter, think of her reaction when she first met Cat. She said she was almost unable to control herself and stop from killing Cat.

Luis

I think people are making a misunderstanding about cats body and think winter has granted her some kind of fae "immortality". That is not the case. She is as mortal as any Named on the side of Below, the most striking difference is that she earned a boat load of power and doesn't have a fixed physical form anymore. Her form changing while she was unconscious kinda backs my point up.

She's like clay in a sense. She can mold her shape when she is conscious about it, but it isn't something she is aware of now or desires to do.

Her current form is a psychological representation of how she sees herself.

Kind of what being named does to people, but only more so.

The reason why she she hasn't changed much appearance wise is that she was totally human until just recently and still thinks like a full Normie, and she does not think about herself physically all that much.

The immortality thing is off I think too. She usurped a title, and some power. Which changed her physical form and has influenced her, but I don't think it has granted her fae "immortality".

Fae are creatures stuck in a kind of temporal loop. They have always and will forever cycle through the same shape of stories. It seems like something had changed from our perspective with the unification of winter and summer, but that is a blink of an eye change of events in an immortal view point and only seen through one lens out of I don't know how many.. few chapters ago it was explained that the winter and summer we see is not all the winters and summers that exists in what I assume is a proto reality created by the gods before creation was formed.

MetruX

Well, I agree with Cat's part but not with the fae part. This is a change big enough to be the main plan of one of those incomparably ancient immortals, so it has to be something new and at least make a pronounced change in the big eternity that he knows. Which, in the end, means that for at least the fae involved, things have TRULLY changed.

Euodiachloris

She didn't usurp. She was legitimately bestowed with Winter as a reward/blessing/curse by the one entity who could hand Winter titles out at the time – before Winter ceased to function normally in Acadia, even. The Winter King had played things so that a chunk of Winter was tied to Cat, come what may, the second he took her heart and shoved a construct in its place.

Cat didn't ask for that boon/bane. She got given.

sengachi

Hey, uh, I couldn't help but notice that neither the Bard nor the to-be Dead King mentioned undead or necromancy in this chapter. And that the Dead King seems suspiciously unconcerned by the fact that undead are limited and have diminished capacity to grow, something I'd really, really think he'd be concerned about or at least thinking about.

... how sure are we that necromancy existed before the Dead King?

---

I wonder if she did the same thing she'd done for Exiled Prince and Lone Swordsman, reframing the narrative to set up a pivot she can't intervene with by presenting the Named in question with the information that has an implied choice in it. See, she calls him King of Death, and while it may be a side effect of the translation from Ashkaran not fully settling in Cat's head, I wonder whether "Dead King" sounds the same in that language. That would allow her to get the last laugh, since if Keter's Due warping the city and killing him was unforeseen, then she just framed this situation in a way that would turn one of her most cunning opponents stagnant. All because of a single conversation where, after realizing he didn't see death as anything significant she turned that against him, by destroying his seat of power through a backlash he knew nothing about, trapping him in a hell and crippling his ability to learn.

aw3

What is going to be interesting is why the Dead King is bound to his kingdom and why he is essentially powerless to interfere with the world outside specific criteria. Intercessor is a little more clear in her purpose, although the question of whether she, as a person, aims to maintain or destroy the cycle she is forced to maintain is in question. The reason that the Dead King is bound as he is and why both he and Intercessor are in conflict is perhaps the most insightful answer to the many questions this whole situation raises. The conflict between the two implies different goals. It seems possible that Intercessor would fight against the balance she maintains, but how does one reconcile a goal irreconcilable with one's role whilst maintaining that role? Both She and the Dead King must be then bound to their nature and are unable to separate their Id from their role.

Can we assume the role of Intercessor/Wandering Bard/whatever is neutral? Her whole role is to maintain balance, or perhaps more correctly to maintain the patterns of repetition (which the Gods use to ensure the entropy of creation and to prevent their own usurpation. Which in turn, also begs the question of why the need to create names/roles/blessed. Supposedly, this allows them more agency from their own nature, but why do they want/need agency?). The name Intercessor itself implies she acts as a mediator between above and below and that is neutral with and of itself. Is it possible to obtain a neutral role, given that doing so would break with the patterns of repetition? One would suppose that her role must be especially created for her, perhaps being the first role? Is she even mortal in origin?

MetruX

She said herself she is mortal in original, so we shouldn't put that in doubt, she never lied, only made you see things differently from her words. But you seem to think the objective here is this world's existence. It is not. The objective is to learn or prove something, which needs the mortals changeable ways to do, thus she is not someone who works "for the balance", she is someone who works "for the rules", much like a judge in a football game, he won't press for both teams to be equal, but for both to follow the rules.

Banananon

Just noting the likely connection between Captain/Cursed/Sabah and the People of the Wolf

ericwinter

So how bad would it be if I mentioned that I literally saw all of this coming from at least halfway through book two, if not earlier? Because honestly, it was the only way the story could have gone. In a world where every great tale has already been told time and again by a never-ending cycle, the only story worth telling is escaping that cycle. The only question is whether Cat allies with Bard to do so, or makes her own way entirely. On the subject of Winter and Cat's immortality, the way I read it is this: As the only titled member of Winter, since all the others kind of fucked off into Arcadia generic, she ascended to Queen and became tied to its existence, and it to hers. At the moment, that means if she dies, it dies. Giving out another title, however, would turn Winter into a fully present concept again, possibly start Summer as well to match, and begin a whole new cycle of birth and rebirth with her as Queen of Winter, thereby making her immortal. So at the moment, yes, she is mortal, but at any point that could change if she started handing out titles. Then again, this is all just my understanding, which could be utterly wrong. Take it as you will.

caoimhinh

This was an awesome chapter with very interesting references and points worth of analysis.

1) The ancient kingdom (Sephirah) is based on the Jewish people, in the Kabbalah Sephiroth are the 10 emanations of God, from which the first is Keter (the crown).

2) The name of the Dead King, Neshamah, means "soul" in Hebrew.

3) "The Garden was a failure" references the Garden of Eden.

4) The Splendid, immortals bound to repetition, the Fae, who remained bound to the stories until just recently when the Winter King managed to use Catherine to break the pattern and cycle of the war between the 2 sides of Arcadia.

5) there is one thing most people have been saying in the comments, that the Wandering Bard wants to die, but I actually think it's the opposite, she wants to live. Remember that she goes to "nowhere" when she is not influencing the stories, it was shown in that the reason she drinks so much is to feel alive. But that doesn't mean she is necessarily plotting to make

Catherine into the want to break her free of it, keep in mind that she is a prisoner of her duty as Intercessor of the Gods into Creation, ensuring the Game continues, that's why she is actively trying to kill Black, Malicia and Catherine, because that legacy of Practical Evil is a game changer, even a game breaker in Catherine's case.

I personally believe that the Bard is trapped between those 2 urges: the desire to witness a great story developing as it's always been in the cycle created by the Gods, and the desire to once again be free to live as a human. She is a complex character, let's see what we will find out later on.

DeliciousLemonyFate

Holy shit. I ...

I just realized the character over read about who's most similar to the Wandering Bard.

It's the Cthaeh

The fucking CTHAEH

The creature at least as old as existence, who knows the shape of creation better than anyone else could ever dream of. Who USES that knowledge, to shape stories until they can subtly weave events closer towards the greatest destruction.

The only difference is that the Cthaeh's stated goal is explicitly destruction and misfortune. The Wandering Bard's goals are less clear, but they seem to involve perpetuating/BUILDING stories. And we've seen how utterly destructive typical stories are, how they grind people to destruction and remove choice.

I've just got to admire how cleverly this all was written. How Wandering Bard has gone from funny nuisance, to threat, to creation(/continent?) level FATE MONSTER

---

Chapter 31: Spectation

"You're a masterful schemer, it's true. Let's see if that helps any in the alligator pit.."

– Dread Empress Malignant I, holding court

They all knew me well enough to leave me alone with my thoughts as I tried to get a handle on what I'd learned. Well, maybe not Diabolist, but she was better at picking up on those things than any of the others. I occupied my hands with mindless work, taking a whetstone to my sword even though it was quite sharp enough already. In the grander scheme of things, Catherine, I'm the petty warlord of a backwater kingdom. Black had told me that once, a long time ago. We'd been speaking about the gnomes, and he'd been putting in perspective the truth that a second-rate power in Calernia would be considered less than dust in the greater world beyond this continent. I was learning now that we were all pieces in a greater game even here. There was no other real way to understand the conversation between the two abominations, one still learning and the other emergent. The Bard had been considered old even in the days of Sephirah's fall. Gods, how long had she been around?

I did not consider myself all that inclined to fear my enemies, admittedly sometimes even when I should have. But as the whetstone slid against the edge, I admitted to myself that for the first time in ages I was genuinely afraid of an opponent. Heroes, even those who could tread all over me, I could cope with. There were ways around power, around the laws of the Heavens. They could be tricked and twisted. But something like the Wandering Bard? She might have set in motion the sequence of events that would lead to my death decades before I was even born. If Black was to be believed, she could not be killed and even if she somehow was anyway she'd only return with a different face. There was no telling what she knew or how she knew it. There was no telling where she was and what she was up to. How could an entity like that be beaten? The sharp song of stone on steel held no answers, soothing as it was.

I'd believed that I understood the game unfolding across Calernia. That I could guess, if not know, the motives and intents of the other players. The Tenth Crusade, the Empire and the League: the three powers on the board, as far as the nations of mankind went. My attempts at seeing through the Dead King were now revealed to have been little more than presumption, but light had been shed on more than that mistake alone. There was more going on behind the crusade than faith and ambition. Hasenbach might have refused my terms because of political considerations, as I'd previously believed, or she might have been moved by a whisper in her ear years ago that only now clicked into place. I could no longer trust any of the actors to act according to the rules I'd believed they obeyed, because I'd been blind to half the war even as I fought it. Which now took me to the very place I'd been struggling to avoid since I took the crown: I had to take measures to insure the survival of Callow while in the dark about the objectives of all the other forces in play.

Fuck, for all I knew the Bard was interceding in my favour. I'd had strokes of bad luck, sure, but exceedingly good one as well. I wasn't unaware that Black had been arranging things quietly in the background so that opportunities would land in my lap ever since I became his apprentice, but there were things beyond his ability to arrange. The Bard had been in the thick of it, at Liesse, when I gained back the aspect I lost and snatched a resurrection out of angelic hands. Had she been beaten there, or had that restoration been the purpose all along? Hells, had she pulled strings for me to win just so I'd fuck up with Akua the following year and Second Liesse got the Tenth Crusade going? I could go mad, trying to find the hand of the Wandering Bard behind every turning point of the last few years. But then could I really afford not to look for it? If I kept my eyes closed, I'd lose. Or whatever else she had in mind for me.

She'd admitted to the Dead King that he'd been too clever in his scheme for her to be able to crush him, but that'd been centuries and centuries ago. When she was still learning her Role. I had to face the possibility that even if I made all the right choices I might still end up broken because the Bard had shaped the choices I'd be able to make so she couldn't possibly lose. I felt shards of stone pass through my fingers, and noticed with a sigh that I'd crushed the whetstone without even meaning to. That was my only one, too, I'd have to borrow Hakram's from now on. I picked up my scabbard with a sigh and sheathed the longsword. So much for any of this calming me. There were no easy answers to be had. No plan to form out of thin air. Should we even finish the journey to Keter? I had a better notion of what I'd be letting out, now, and it was so much worse than I'd expected.

I would not have flinched at making a deal with a cunning undead Dread Emperor with a little more foresight, but Neshamah was something else. He'd been arranging the death of realms at a time where most the continent could barely use sorcery – and he'd had millennia to plot his next moves. I very much doubted that the man I'd seen would call it quits after breaking the Kingdom of Sephirah and conquering his hell. There would be more. And I had been sent an envoy, I thought, because he had deemed I could be useful for that purpose. My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched. I'd get nowhere, stewing in my own thoughts like this. The pot had been freshly steered, and I was too close to the matter regardless. I'd speak with the others after my head was cleared. Besides, for once under the restlessness I felt the call of exhaustion. Not physical, though. The boon of knowledge from Masego seemed to have tired me out mentally.

I dragged myself back to camp, waved away the concern of the others and crawled under the covers by the fireside. I'd still be just as fucked tomorrow, so forcing myself to go through the song and dance now did not appeal.

Sleep found me swiftly.

—

I woke to the sound of soft voice, after too short a rest. The orations and murmurs of the shard could not be heard, which meant our 'night' was in full swing. My mind still felt sluggish but at least I was no longer wandering from one idle thought to the next, treading the same hopeless circle. I kept my eyes closed and my breathing even, at first out of laziness but the reason was swift to change: the people speaking were Thief and Diabolist. Neither seemed aware I was now awake.

"- no longer need to sleep," Akua said. "You need not burden yourself, I can keep watch alone."

Thief chuckled.

"And you believe you're trusted enough for that, Sahelian?" she said. "I never took you for such a hopeful soul."

"To keep quiet in the face of danger would be utterly mindless treachery," Diabolist said. "I am, after all, dependent on Catherine to walk the world."

"Unless someone else takes the cloak," Vivienne said.

"I have use to the Woe," Akua said. "Use enough I was allowed this larger cage. There is no guarantee another bearer would have such purpose for me. A poor gamble to make."

"You seem to think you can talk your way into a semblance of trust, Wastelander," Thief snorted. "Best you discard that notion early. It will be less irritating for all involved."

"Fascinating," Diabolist murmured. "Your distaste of me has not ebbed in the slightest, and still here I am. Yet you've been charged with the duty of being Catherine's conscience, which means she would not have eased the leash without your permission."

"Her Majesty, to you," Thief bit out. "Sweet nothings and Praesi titles won't get you anywhere with us, Sahelian. We all remember what you are."

"Liesse," Akua mused. "The sum of all I am, in your eyes. You might not be wrong to think so. It was the pivot to who I am today."

"The greatest butcher of our time," Vivienne said.

"From a highborn, that would have been a compliment," Akua said, a smile in her voice. "Not so here, of course. I imagine that is how you've made peace with the nature of the demand I be brutally snuffed out when my usefulness ends."

It was an effort not to stiffen. Named senses would have given me away to Vivienne for sure, though I wasn't sure how Diabolist functioned in that way.

"Not my call to make, that," Thief shrugged. "I'm the spymistress, not the queen."

"A poor parry," Diabolist chided. "You already know I suspect the inner workings of the Woe and your role within them. It would have been more effective to feign conflict between you and Catherine over the matter, allowing her to position herself as my salvation while you bayed for blood."

There was a long moment of silence.

"You're so caught up in your Praesi games you don't even see your blinders," Vivienne sighed, and she sounded fairly convincing to me. "Must be the old madness. You certainly don't sound like a woman who thinks she has a sword hanging over her head."

Akua laughed softly.

"My dear Thief," she said. "If I cannot carve a path to survival with such early forewarning, I deserve to be destroyed. That is the measure by which I am to be weighed. I've always found it amusing to hear your people speak of the Wasteland's ways as 'blinders', truth be told. As if bereft of them we would then see Creation as you do. Do you truly believe Callowans to be the only lucid people in the world?"

"My tutors taught me that's called a false equivalence," Vivienne said conversationally. "The pretence that the obvious failings in the customs of a people that slaughter each other and their neighbours for sport every other decade are somehow the same as the flaws in the customs of Callow. We're not perfect, of course. But I'd rather deal with the fucking elves than you and your fellows, Sahelian. The long-ears might be murderous assholes, but at least they stay in their forest. Your people make your problems everyone else's problems too."

"So they did teach you rhetoric," Akua said. "Good, this would have been quite boring otherwise. You would have served as poor moral compass, were you unable to argue."

"There's that most sacred of villainous traditions at work," Thief said cuttingly. "Cutting one's losses and bailing from the fight."

"You speak as if you were not a villain yourself," Diabolist said.

"I am what I am," Vivienne shrugged. "Do you expect anguish and conflict out of me? I believe in the decisions that led me here. I would make them again. If all it takes to be estranged from the Heavens is refusing annihilation and submission, then I have no use for the Gods Above."

"You would be surprised," Akua said, "at the number of Empresses that spoke those very same words."

"You're trying to draw parallels," Thief said, growing irritated. "I don't know why, and frankly I don't care. Might be some old eastern monster was just like me, though I very much doubt it. So what? There's no angle there for you to get mercy from me, Sahelian. Your little talk about redemption is absurd: there is nothing redeemable about what you did and what you are. Your execution has been stayed. That is as much of a victory as you will ever win, Diabolist. Look that truth in the eyes. Wallow in it. That fear is the least of what you are owed."

"The true nature of a woman," Akua said amusedly, "is only ever revealed after she has been prodded. It is an interesting circle, the Woe. Your role in it has been the hardest to grasp."

"Has it?" Vivienne said. "And to think they said you were clever. Lost a few feathers up there along with your heart, I see."

"Oh, you are the spymistress of the Kingdom of Callow," Diabolist dismissed. "It is no secret. But that is a function, not a role."

"Am I in for a story about how Praesi understand namelore so well?" Thief drawled. "Clearly, we should all take advice from the people who have been one stabbing away from brutal civil war from the moment their empire was first spawned. Please, magical wise spirit, share the secrets about continent-burning instability with me. I have so much to learn from you."

"Since you insist," Diabolist agreed with pleasure so perfect-sounding it just had to be fake. "The Deadhand is the least complicated. His people have been carefully pruned by the Tower into being a soldier caste for the Empire over a hundred reigns, and as the culmination of that edifice he serves as the right hand of a powerful warlord."

"Hakram is the least complicated of us," Vivienne said slowly. "Hakram. Your insights are truly far-reaching, Diabolist. Reaching in the wrong direction, sure, but that can't possibly be a first for you."

"I cast no aspersions on the man himself," Akua noted. "I merely state that his Name and Role are no deep secret. Hierophant, however, was an unexpected variable. Apprentices have transitioned into Names other than Warlock before, but usually when both are living simultaneously a succession through murder is the outcome."

"An awkward but kind and sweet man with no interest in power did not end up murdering his relatively loving father for said power," Thief said. "However will we solve this confounding mystery, Sahelian? I just don't know."

"There is no known precedent to his Name," Akua continued without missing a beat, and I was reluctantly impressed by her ability to just plow through that level of scathing sarcasm. "Consequently the core tenet of it had to be understood from the man himself. Fascinating as his upbringing was to study, the pivot seems to have occurred after he met Catherine. It was the calibre of the opposition that forged him, you see. Choirs and demigods. There was need for one who could understand and oppose those entities, and so the Hierophant came to be."

"You're forgetting demons and a highborn murderous witch with delusions of grandeur," Thief helpfully provided. "Admittedly the witch only ever seemed good at killing innocents and spending her subordinates like copper at a fair, so she might not qualify as true opposition."

"The Archer did seem like an odd fit, at first," Diabolist mused. "No real fetters to Catherine's ideals or expectation of comradeship as shared inheritors to the legacy of the Calamities. Ranger, infamously, left the Calamities on the eve of the Conquest. And pupils of the Lady of Lake have a reputation for being incapable of playing nice with others, be they heroes or villains. It could not merely be the fighting that drew her – there is no lack of foes near Refuge."

"It's almost entertaining how much thought you're giving to the actions of a woman whose notion of a plan is dumping all her rations in a well and filling her bag with identical cheap booze flasks so she won't run dry," Vivienne said. "But by all means, tell me everything about the intricate considerations that are behind Indrani joining a band of people that allow her to drink, fight and sleep around as much as she wants. It ought to be enlightening."

Wait, was that why Archer never seemed to run out? Fucking Hells, I'd been wondering why she was being such a magpie about taking food from Masego's plate recently.

"Peers not in direct competition," Akua said. "That was what the Archer found. A luxury previously beyond her reach. And from her addition the Woe gained both an executioner and a field Named capable of independent action for long stretches, which they sorely needed. Hers is the thinnest bond by far, and I do not expect it to keep her bound past the end of the crusade."

"And that leaves me," Vivienne lightly said, though there was an edge beneath. "Don't disappoint now, sagely collar genie. What has your profound discernment taught you of my hidden nature? I'll go first: deep down, I always wanted to be a shoemaker. Shoes are the foundation on which rests civilization, Diabolist. We are literally barefoot without them. You ever think about that, in between ruminations about how you tried to conquer the world and got your heart ripped out instead? Food for thought."

"You were a late addition," the shade said. "And in some ways the most interesting. You were, after all, previously a heroine. I should have realized which the wind was blowing when she succeeding at turning one of Above's own, in retrospective. The weight on the scales had grown too uneven, for all my labours. But we were speaking of you, Vivienne Dartwick."

"Thief," the Callowan hissed. "There's only a few people that get to use that name. Don't ever count on being one of them."

"Thief indeed," Akua said. "Not, for all your skills, an assassin. That was what first drew my interest. Archer filled that purpose, to some extent, but you seemed a more apt candidate. Yet your knives did not grow bloody after your turning, nor your Name change to reflect it."

I heard Vivienne go still as stone. Diabolist had touched something there, though I didn't know what.

"Looking back, the void you filled seems more obvious," the shade mused. "You are Callowan. The only one of the Woe who shares Catherine's ideals to any deep extent, as Adjutant would likely adapt without true challenge to a change in her priorities. After she seized Winter's mantle in full, you became the measuring stick. It was simplification to call you a moral compass, I will confess. You are not a particularly moral woman, Thief. But you do love your homeland, and have kept some of the qualms you were taught as a child. You are a restraint, and through your function as spymistress a provider of choices. In some ways, one might argue your perspective is the crucible through which Catherine remakes herself every time she is confronted with greater strife."

"You know," Vivienne said, "I used to wonder why you were playing the tamed hound nowadays. Oh, you're bound. That's part of it. But you have to know that all the playacting and sweet whispers you've been up to are not strictly necessary. Being useful and not actively offensive to everything we stand for would have gotten you this far anyway. But that last tirade of yours? It says a lot more about you than me. Because it's about Catherine more than me or the Woe. And it has to be, doesn't it Akua? Because you ended up in the box, and there has to be a reason for that. She has to be special in some way to have beaten you, otherwise you just couldn't stand it."

"I lost, my dear Thief, because I prepared for a battle against my rival and faced instead her power wielded by the Black Knight," Akua said softly. "The mistake in this was mine, and I do not deny it. And still, at the height of my wrath, I fought to a standstill a coalition of all Callowan arms of note and every Imperial army west of the Blessed Isle. Led by three Calamities and the full muster of the Woe. My fall was just, for every fall is just. But it would be a mistake to think Liesse is the origin of the laurels on her brow. That victory was hers alone in that she was the last woman standing."

"So you're trying to make her the Empress," Vivienne mused. "Because it's fine to have lost, if she was fated to climb the Tower all along. You were a necessary part of the story. You mattered. And who knows, maybe you'll manage to be Chancellor if you play the game well enough."

"She will climb the Tower, Thief," Diabolist said with iron certainty. "She cannot stomach any of the remaining claimants and will not suffer to leave Praes to its own devices. You speak of fate as some invisible force, but it is a simpler thing: fate is character. And it is in hers to cut deep into her bones for her ambitions."

Thief laughed.

"She's not in charge because she's been chosen, Sahelian," Vivienne said. "Gods, certainly not because she's chosen either. Or even because she has power, for that matter."

"Is it the power of love, then?" Akua said, a touch drily.

"There's plenty of people who care about Callow," Thief said. "And if I learned anything from the Woe, it's that caring doesn't fill granaries or run a court. She's certainly in the right place at the right time with the right amount of power to get things moving, but that's not really what matters. See, the thing is that she acts. Sometimes those actions are mistake, like going after the fae and leaving you to plot under your rock in Liesse. But, most of the time, she improves things. Just by a little bit. And she draws other people who act with her. You think that's some unearthly trait, like she's some force of nature, but that's Wasteland talk. The Tower's the centre of the world for you, and the most important person in the world is the one that climbs it."

The other Callowan paused.

"Except she's not," Vivienne said. "The exemplar of whatever fucked up Praesi virtues you want to sing about, that is. She's kind of petty, her temper's foul and if Hakram hadn't stepped in she'd probably be a drunk. She ogles every pretty face that shows up even if they're our enemies, and she cannot for the life of her shut the Hells up even when she really needs to. She's not unique or irreplaceable, but even if you think otherwise that doesn't really matter – because she's part of something greater than her. She's just the rock that started the avalanche, Sahelian, and she did that by doing the most Callowan thing there is: after the invasion is done, you get up and get back to work. Others will come to help you, because a kingdom's people and not banners."

None of this was exactly singing my praises, but then that wasn't Vivienne's wheelhouse. She'd gotten the part that mattered, anyway. That we weren't supposed to stay in charge forever, that we were just a stopgap until Callow could handle itself on its own. The purpose wasn't to rule, it was to hammer away at Calernia until it was in a place where there was no need for someone like me.

"You think that'll make her Empress," she laughed. "You're thinking of her like some sort of tormented saint that'll take up the burden of keeping the lot of you in line for the greater good. You want to know what Praes is, for us? Another mess to clean up. Like the Tenth Crusade and the Dead King and the heroes. You're not owed anything. You're not different or unique, just another line on a long list. And that's your fate, Diabolist. That's your fucking character."

Akua stayed silent for a long time.

"It is a pretty world you speak of," she finally said. "We will see, in time, which one of us is right."

The silence spread again, and though I could not hear the shade move I suspected she was looking away.

"Good performance," Thief suddenly said. "But, Diabolist, if this is all of it I'm honestly disappointed. Was that really the whole ploy? I mean, Merciful Gods, you've used this one before. If this were a fairgrounds play I'd catcall and ask for my coppers back."

"Pardon me?" Akua said, voice painted with genuine surprise.

"Trust," Vivienne mused. "That's what fucks you every time. Like, for example, believing I'd be so ashamed about ordering you to rip your eye out repeatedly I'd never mention it to anyone. I did, Sahelian. And you know what she told me? That it makes no difference, if the same thing reforms repeatedly. Pain doesn't increase in the slightest."

"I don't follow," Diabolist said.

"You panted and you screamed," Thief said. "You pretended it hurt, because it made me feel like I'd accomplished something while you were actually getting your way. You 'lost' so I'd lower my guard. Like you did just now. Getting into an argument then throwing it, just so you'd be less of a threat in my eyes. Chastened little Akua, reconsidering her choices. Gods, you really are a snake."

"If I had done such a thing," Diabolist said, tone even. "What purpose would telling me you are aware serve?"

"I'm surprised you don't know," Vivienne Dartwick lightly said. "I get to see you pretend you're not furious. Sweet dreams, Sahelian. Our little chat's over until the next time you need your chain yanked."

---

SpeckofStardust

And thief is the personal representation of Callow in the group.

The truest example of "you stole an apple from a Callowion so three generations later a Callowen punches you in the face to and take 3 back".

RoflCat

Punch your great grandson (3 generations)*

Dainpdf

Could still be you if you're a villain.

Jane

Ah, so that's how Callow ended up on the side of Good. Easier to take revenge on people who are still alive than trying to track down their descendants!

letouriste

you sire, deserve a cookie

kelioez

That's a big award, u really think the comment's that good?

IDKWhoitis

So what are the current odds about either Thief or Akua dying by this Book's end?

If they both represent the paths that Cat can advance, one will probably be closed off forcefully.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

*Author Rolls a D20*

"Cat climbs the tower!"

Yotz

*Author rolls a single D20*

*Author gets 21*

"..."

"Cat builds the tower!"

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

*rolls D20 to attack Hakram*

*gently caresses his deadhand*

Forrest

"What's that? You're oh so proud of your tower of authority and power Malicia? Well I raise you my own, even taller tower! Beat that."

grzecho2222

Tower measuring contest

JJR

"I'll build my own tower, with blackjack and hookers!"

therealgridlock

With Black, Jacks, and hookers.

Jessica Day

If either dies now, I expect it to be at the climax when her choice is made. Until then I suspect Thief and Diabolist will be wearing plot armor.

Jessica Day

PS, I use the word "dies" loosely in Akua's case of course.

daegone823

I feel like Akua is attempting to take thief's place in the woe.

Similar to how the bard was able to survive the Warlock's rampage in Book 1. The character with the greater weight usually ends up surviving the death of the "minor" characters. Akua facing off against seven heroes and having a redemption story. Her constant arguing with thief could set up a rule of three stand off between them.

She might somehow use a loophole to slay here jailer to save Chat in some weird manner allowing her to take the place of a fallen "friend". Her new name could be something like the Chained, Bound Chancellor, or Mad Servant. Hinting at her subservience that the old form of evil will serve the new. a new order for Praes.

I do not think any of the woe are even close to Vivienne and each I believe is willing to accept Akua if Chat approves. Chat the villain who rides with her enemies if they share the same goal.

So far Akua and thief have had two battles of wits
They eye gouging tent where she is let out
I don't know if this one counts?
The third might come when Chat must trust Vivienne judgement or Akua's to lift the restraints, wherein Vivienne tries to kill Vivienne.

Stormblessed

I liked what you said, although I think Jane said it better farther down. The main issue with how you present Akua's positioning of herself in the story is that I don't think "rule of three" is ever going to appear in this story again. There are so many tropes and cliches and story telling devices that reusing another one here is impossible by how the world is set up. In addition, rule of three seems like a main character's story arc and not for someone with the name of Thief.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Ninety-nine hells that sounds awesome. So far Thief has been a bit boring, besides being a moral compass and representing Callow's interests, there's not much to her. Akua's history with Cat goes deeper than Viv's.

Dainpdf

Did you miss the part where she yanked the Summer sun? And the one where she stole the treasury?

Yotz

Eternal fate of characters of more moderate appearances. People, for some inscrutable reason, seem to sing praises to the Image of Lion as symbolic representation of Nobility – despite an unseemly eating habits, demonstrable inability to defend the food from hyenas due to cowardness, and revolting penchant for rolling in fresh elephant feces while moaning in delight. ...Or, maybe, because of that – which certainly explains common disposition towards aristocracy, come to think of it...

Regardless, Lion as a symbol of inherent Nobility is just as stupid as a Dove as symbol of high moral standards and/or peace. No one, literally no one who studied doves with more surface glance would draw parallels between insufferably stupid mindlessly aggressive flying – ...calling them 'rats' would be a grave insult to rats – things and moral standards of any kind, much less peace, give a fresh canvas. And don't get me started on swan """"Loyalty"""" and """"purity of spirit"""". Feel free to add quotation marks as you please.

What they all have in common, however, is inherently skewed human perception. They all are flashy, in one way or another. Demonstrative in their projection. Unlike some other creatures of which I can not name a great deal on the fly – for they usually are modest in their style, unimposing, and generally mind their own business. No one sings praises to spiders and snakes – not anymore. Though Anansi still holds sway in some lands. We'll see how it holds.

... and I'm ranting again.
Well, off to sleep I go, then.

Euodiachloris

Swans: murder feather dusters with very stabby, pointed parts. Also, evil glares. And, gluttonous thugs.

grzecho2222

In old slavic tales snakes are often good guys, but then came christianity

Dainpdf

Uh... That was something. As for symbols, they're generally divorced from the real thing precisely because real things often aren't that pure in meaning.

Metrux

I think his meaning is that actually they have no degree of purity in the meaning. Quite the opposite, most of those symbols, all he named for reference, have gotten nothing to do with what they represent. For the lion, the only "noble" thing about him is having an harem that serves him, hunts for him, and fighting other males for territory. Thus you get to think: why do people think of lions as symbols for noblesse? So, what I myself mean is that he wasn't talking about how symbols are not like they should, but how people take symbols out of nowhere, simply because they are more flashy, the same drawing a parallel with Akua, whose actions are not trully greater than Thief, but certainly flashier, thus it appears as a more "important" symbol.

Dainpdf

That's because symbols are distilled meaning, while real things are not. Especially when we use animals as symbols for human characteristics. The lion is intimidating, noisy, and dangerous.

SpaceDorf

And this is the most fitting description of nobility that has ever graced these pages.

grzecho2222

Cloakbound Prankster?

Danus

I can't wait to see the Dead King and Akua interact. Excellent chapter; thank you!

Novice

Getting both an inside AND outside perspective of the Woe and Catherine specifically? Feels like Christmas. Another great chapter.

Raved Thrad

I just love how ultimately unforgiving Callowans really are. It's like they should all be wearing shirts that read "I hate everyone and you're next." They're almost as vindictive as the Fremen from Dune, and that almost is only because, for some strange reason, they've historically been on the side of Good. And yet, despite all this simmering hatred, they're hardly a bunch of surly curmudgeons, as one might expect. As the introductory chapter to this book showed, they're generally chatty and good-natured. Except they're all also ticking hate-filled time bombs, and given the right justification can see the death of heroes as a good thing.

And now, if the Pilgrim is right, under Catherine's leadership they're all slowly turning evil. What does that mean in the long run? Is that hatred going to erupt in a war of subjugation (as with the Fremen) that will set Calernia on fire?

I need to stock up on popcorn.

Dainpdf

They're not necessarily full of hate, just empty of forgiveness and possessed of long memories.

*Euodiachloris*

Something tells me Pilgrim is not as right as he thinks. Cat may not, actually, be Evil. She's certainly "definitely not happy with the Heavens", but there's no evidence whatsoever that she's pleasing the Hells much, either. She kicks their tools in the teeth just as much.

And, it's not like the Heavens are helping themselves with the average Callowan. Sending waves of murderhobos to kill them by the dozen as incidental collateral is... unlikely to win hearts and minds. Especially for a group of people who have "Fuck You and the Horse You Rode In On" running through them as a cultural theme.

In short – it's not having a Villain on the throne that's insidiously corrupting the nation. It's being constantly harassed for having a Villain on the throne that is. 😏

grzecho2222

I would say that this may be more because of the fact that Callow has been "Bulwark against Terror" for ages and not only they don't get anything for it, but they are mocked and attacked by their "Good" neighbours. Just look at Lone Swordsman with his "Kill all Legions, kill all Wastelanders, and if Procer attacks, kill them all too" and how Exiled Prince acted. Cat is not a cause, she is symptom of bigger problem. She is just next logical step "If your side treats you like shit, is it really your side?" born from the fact that Black's Faction is treating them far better than Good ever did. Callow is already changing its pattern with Broken Bell turning into dark knightly order and the fact that cat is out of bag with Daoine using necromancy to empower their soldiers and nobody seems to care about it (funny that they and Keter used to be very close). It is hard to tell what they will become in end, but change is already in motion. Funny enough I think is the fact that the biggest problem for Good that Cat could make is to have a heir (biological or adopted or some long lost second cousin), because then the moment she dies Callow is basically forced to go Revenge Rampage under leadership of child (bonus point for irony, if kid would get the Name of Heir/Heirness).

Raved Thrad

Cat is definitely not evil, at least not by modern standards. Ruthless, yes, and cynical, and even iconoclastic, but someone whose overriding goal and motivation is to "leave the world a better place than it was when I found it" is definitely not evil. Not necessarily heroic, either – she's more of an antihero. Good and Evil, however, aren't good and evil. Good and Evil as set down by the powers above and below are a specific checklist of allegiances and behaviors that identify you as siding with one or the other. It's why Pilgrim can be Good and still be unrepentant about the evil he causes by letting thousands of people die unjustly through his inaction.

MetruX

You must remember good != Good. For teh Heavens there is no "good for you", there is only "obey and be Good". From their perspective, those people aren't obeying, no matter the circumstances.

Euodiachloris

Well, duh... At no point did I say that Good = bestest morality evvar and Evil = seriously horrible bad-bad peoples and never shall the twain mix it up.

In fact, I was outright saying that Pilgrim is as wrong about what is going on as the High Lords of Praes are.

I meant "not right" as in "has made a big mistake", not as in "oops, did a morally wrong thing which a Good person isn't meant do".

In short: yeah, I know, already – don't need telling that I must remember. 😊

Jane

Hm... I think Vivienne might be underestimating Akua here.

Even if this ploy didn't work, by interacting with Akua, it still reinforces her presence in the party, and creates a relationship between the two of them – if there was a stony silence between them, there would never be an opportunity for a relationship to change or grow, but by engaging with her, it creates openings for things between them to improve. It's like how Hakram helped solidify Thief's presence in their group by first threatening her – it wasn't a good way to get the ball rolling, but it was necessary, and helped draw her into interacting with others. It also mirrors in a less murderous way how the Wandering Bard pushed the Bumbling Conjuror out of the party by shoving him into the narrative background – being out there and interacting with others creates narrative weight that makes her a real person and not just a fashion accessory, and thus harder to snuff out afterwards.

And as for the two of them specifically... Well, "Two party members who fight like cats and dogs but have each other's backs in the end" is a really classic narrative, you know? If they keep having "friendly but important conversations that everyone else thinks will end with a blade drawn by the end" talks like this, it'd be really easy for her to fall into that pattern without realizing it.

In short... I think Vivienne might have seen one angle Akua was aiming for, while overlooking her real aim with this talk.

Not that I know that she should be concerned by this. I mean, it makes it harder for her to murder Akua at the end, but would it be the worst thing in the world for them to be friends? I mean, setting aside the hundreds of thousands of dead that she's privately sworn to avenge? It's not like she has a lot of people she's close to, and Akua can be a really good friend.

Someguy

...Akua can be a really good friend.

What have you been smoking and can I have some?

Jane

Well... The "Hey, why not make friends with the woman who mass murdered a city full of the countrymen you value above almost everything else?" thing was somewhat tongue in cheek, but...

Truthfully, Akua is a pretty good friend if you can trust her. She's charming, well-read, and was pretty much raised to make high society revolve around her. She's Praesi to the core, but if she could ever learn to turn it down a bit... Well, manipulating someone and knowing what to say to make a conversation go smoothly aren't that different. Especially for someone like Thief, who closes herself off to everyone around her, I think she'd be a good friend if she wasn't scheming something.

And from a more practical perspective, she's one of the finest mages of her generation, can't be killed though normal means (probably) and has a touch of Winter to her. Most of us don't choose our friends based on their combat capabilities, but for someone who routinely gets into life and death conflicts... Well, it'd be nice to know that that kind of power has your back, you know?

Dainpdf

Any affirmation that includes "if you can trust Akua" is vacuous, because that included a single man and Black got rid of him.

Jane

Well, she won't just betray her allies capriciously – only if it's to her long-term benefit, and crippling a member of the Woe is not to her long-term benefit. At the moment,

I believe her devotion to Cat is sincere, and that makes her close allies safe by extension, until such a time as Cat really goes crashing down.

At the very least, though, I expect we're going to get a couple of "Akua as Cat's Loyal Pet" arcs, if for no other reason than Akua causing problems every book will start making people ask why Cat doesn't just leave her dead.

Dainpdf

Oh, no, I don't think she'll be a Starscream. That would be way too stupid. She's just certain to backstab Cat *eventually*.

MetruX

Not only do I agree she will stab Cat sometime, the only doubt being when, but also that she is exactly the type of ally you never want to have. You see, if the situation is such that her help can make a win, she will never act to help you, because without her you've lost and she stands with the winning faction. And if the situation is good enough you don't need her, so... Why have someone you don't like and can't trust as ally? They have her now as a bound slave, and that is why she can never grow to be part of the team, because she wouldn't be able to be part of ANY team.

Death Knight

The practicalities of it prevents that from happening.

She's bound to the Cloak of Woe, which means in order for her to betray Cat in that manner she would need:

- a) An enemy faction with the capabilities of unbounding her from the cloak (I do not think she would agree to switch sides but STILL be bounded to an object)
- b) Trust that this faction would not betray her and kill her after they have won
- c) The means to actually communicate with said enemy faction covertly in order to set up this betrayal.

If it takes at least three things for a plan to succeed then that is no plan at all; it's wishful thinking.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Lul all the shipping bells just got tripped here, by all accounts our Cat is not exactly a beauty queen yet how many people are interested in her now?

Jane

And to think, I had just been joking the other day about how Vivienne/Akua could become a thing...

/joking

Raved Thrad

Well, seeing as how Kilian seems to have been excised from the story... Vivicat! Vivicat forever!! 😊

---

You know, I don't think that Akua is trying to establish herself as a part of the Woe. After Pilgrim's refusal to help Catherine in chapter 26, I suspect he saw Akua in Catherine's body and was aiming for her to join the party from the very start. If she's bound by the same oaths as Cat when she's possessing her, then the story may be applied to her while she, say, is let out to fight against the crusaders in Callow's hour of need again.

I mean, this was before the negotiations where Catherine turned the tables (though, given how Grey Pilgrim didn't need to signal the intermediary or prince Amadis, the redemption narrative might not have been an improvisation), but all four sentences said by the Pilgrim to Diabolist on her throne in Kaleidoscope VI can be viewed both as ones said to Cat and to Akua:

> "Child," he said, tone appalled. "What have you done to yourself?"

> "Surrender," the Great Elder said. "Abdicate. It is not too late."

> "You would argue this, after slaying thousands?" the Pilgrim asked.

> "And you think your reign a better alternative?" the Grey Pilgrim asked calmly.

The first one is obvious reference to removing her soul and making it a tool, since "Catherine" hadn't done anything during this round of the battle he hadn't seen her do before. Note that the second one is a response to "I see you've been tossing around resurrections like they're godsdamned solstice treats, too. Charming. Not going to have any long-term ramifications at all." The third one is a bit of hypocritical nonsequitur if applied to Catherine's actions during the Battle of Camps, but we've been past that. As a reaction to finding out that Diabolist is still out and about, however, it sounds far more reasonable (especially as a response to "This doesn't need to turn into a Named pissing contest."). The double-layered dialogue is followed by Akua musing about becoming a hero and throwing around seemingly powerful punches that fail to leave a lasting wound on any of the heroes.

In that context, refusing to help Catherine was raising the pressure that made her either fold (in which case the redemption is applied straightforwardly, since she now has to fight everyone that previously backed her to "amend her sins"), or resort to the drastic measures he no doubt saw her considering, which gives the next batch of heroes narrative advantage and makes her let Akua out more frequently, who either backstabs her (which brings us back to Evil turns on Evil) or behaves like a decent person until she has a chance to contact the Pilgrim again (which, aside from story of an artifact backfiring on its owner, would allow him more control over her "character development", or at least trick the villains to their doom).

I really hope for Catherine figuring out a way of this trap, now that she heard the word "redemption" and can think about how exactly Akua is planning to get out.

JJR

And now I'm hoping one of the chapter headers is going to be something like. "For your aid in keeping the others in line while I planned our escape. For holding off the royal guards as I murdered my predecessor. You have earned your place as my Chancellor."

-Dread Emperor Schemer, speaking to the largest alligator

grzecho2222

Horse Incitatus was real life Roman Consul so...

ruduen

Out of the Woe, I think Thief is the most cautious of Akua, potentially tying with Catherine. She knows what Akua can do with a bit of information, and given her spymistress position, she knows the danger of leaking unnecessary information. After learning about Akua's little scheme, she'd likely be more on guard for the same, and she likely knows it's better to keep that close to her chest.

While it's gratifying to make Akua squirm, I don't think that'd be enough of a reason for Thief to leak that valuable information – it would be better to keep it hidden and be on guard, so you could catch Akua with it later.

So, is there another reason for bringing it up? Is she just attempting to make her own position against Akua look weaker than it is? Or is there something we're not seeing yet?

Euodiachloris

Like, knowing Cat is there and listening? 😊

Azure

No she's actually strengthening her position with Akua, letting her know she's on to her. Akua is Praesi and Vivienne just played her at her own game and then pulled the rug out from under her. Everything they discussed was incredibly obvious and superficial in terms of the Woe and their characteristics. Vivienne seems to be trying to make Akua jump focus to someone more powerful or unique like oh say the Dead King. Aka did rattle her when she mentioned her Name not changing. Perhaps it has been and Thief hasn't revealed that yet. So does this mean Thief can transition to another name? Chancellor?

werafdsaew

So why is Thief having this talk? Just to rub it in?

George Maddux

Sadism and knowing her enemy

Cold Cyberia

The Character is Fate goes back to Heraclitus... It's fairly ominous considering Cat has a fairly obvious fatal flaw. My guess would be that Akua is trying to spin this into a tragedy.

Antony444

Good chapter, the more we see on this travel, the more I can't wait about the big meeting with the Dead King...

Someguy

Cat really needs to find ex-Winter King and get her Mortal Heart back. The longer it stays with him in Arcadia the more likely it becomes a Macguffin for Heroes to retrieve-destroy in a Death of Koschei the Deathless Plot.

NZPIEFACE

Very likely it won't mean shit to her anymore.

Probably will only work to empower her.

---

He did put it back, it's discussed in chapter 46 of the previous book:

"Neither your soul nor your body could support the title without the metaphysical stabilizer the king replaced your heart by," the blind man said. "Your power began destroying your body the moment he removed it, and the edges of your soul were fracturing."

Someguy

Ah. Shit. She's going to be stuck in a Snow Queen plot and be defeated by useless nonsense like "The Power of Love" & Prayer isn't she?

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/The\_Snow\_Queen

Forrest

Yeah, She had gotten her heart back already. That was the entire reason she became what she was.

Legit

Is it wrong that I like the backstabbing mass murdering hot looking shade more than I like Viv?

MetruX

Wrong? No. Worried? Totally. There is nothing wrong with feeling attraction to anyone or anything... Acting on that is another issue altogether. But her only qualities as a person are her calmness and manipulation, so... Yes, you should worry :B

crescentsickle

Yep, called Akua's plot. Cat as Empress, her as Chancellor. It's been a few chapters, but I've been talking about it since at least Kaleidoscope IV.

I think the fact that Akua has come out and said it, though, may in fact ruin her chances of success. Then again, there's always the reveal later that Akua knew Cat was awake and was telegraphing her intentions for some future purpose.

*Euodiachloris*

It occurs to me that Cat actual has something that might well get Akua really on board for something more than "be the Chancellor behind the Dread Empress".

Everything Akua has ever done was to bash the gilded cage she found herself in. The problem was, the cage she thought she was in was just one of them, and the tools she thought so appropriate to break herself out of it... only could ever result in finding the cage the first cage was in.

Cat has evidence of the shell game all those cages are merely cups for. Nobody Akua has ever met has more tools to wreck the game that imprisoned her her whole life and undeath than Cat and the Woe.

Climbing the Tower? It's a trap. And, Cat has proof.

Euodiachloris

I guess what I'm saying is: Akua is going to have to face the fact that the world is a lot bigger than Praes, or even Calernia. And, that Praesi customs may well have been designed to confine anybody trying to break out of the cage. Just as Procer seems to have confining customs of its own.

The culture shock has yet to hit. 😞

Márton Koltai

I hope Catherine makes a deal with the Dead King. He is the most reasonable ruler on this continent.

Joshua Sills

Honestly? Ever since Masego told Cat that he permanently damaged her name after the demon of corruption, I fully expected the arc to turn towards an elimination of names from the world by butchering the current bearer of that names soul. Hate the gods influence like Black? They can't act without names. Want peace between radically different people? Remove the corrupting influence of Names from society.

Seems like the only solution that can get Cat what she wants, she has the tools to do it, but it just hasn't ever occurred to anyone. Hell, the story would be incredible. A final show off between Cat and Bard where Cat is trying to outplay the storyteller to remove her name, and Bard who wants her name removed so she can finally end it, but has to play the role of the Gods servant.

Doesnt seem like this will ever come up though.

JJR

The plan is an interesting one in theory, but corrupting names like that requires the use of a demon of corruption. It just seems like a really bad idea in practice. The crippling wasn;t even permanent, as Cat got her name restored after the short game of name hot potato with undead Chider.

Márton Koltai

That's not how it worked. It was not the name Squire itself that got damaged, but Catherine's Name. It remained damaged until she had it. Which was not very long since she temporarily lost it in Liesse. She even tells Akua how much she messed up by accidentally restoring her name to full.

Names are like stories or concepts. You can destroy them, but not through the Named. That's what the Miezans did to the orcs. They destroyed their culture so completely, that there were no orc Named until Hakram.

Of course, you can weaken enemy Named with this method, but it would only affect that person and not the Name itself. Though I seriously doubt that it could be used without very special circumstances. The only reason it happened to Cat was that she tried to claim her 3rd aspect early, and with a demon of corruption nearby.

Snowfire1224

You just got me thinking. As I recall chider was able to steal Catherine's name through a ritual Akua set up. What would happen if someone stole the bard's name. Would they become her?

Euodiachloris

Now, there's a thought horrific enough to keep a body up for 72 hours straight. *shudders*

Klingon Promotion... Backfire (aka "Blessed With Suck"). With all the trimmings.

Snowfire1224

It gets worse the more i think about it. For example what would happen to the person that was bard before the name is stolen? Would they go back to who they were or would they remember everything the bard remembers?...

I think I need to to stop thinking about these things.

burdi

Hakram threatening Thief when she first join Catherine now Thief threatening Akua when she first join Catherine

sengachi

I'm looking forward to these revelations about the Bard trickling down to Akua, Akua realizing she's been operating within the Gods' cage this whole time, having some real come-to-self moments about what that means, finally making some genuine character growth steps which might take her in the direction of actual remorse and...

And then being killed as soon as she finishes polishing up her redemption arc, because choosing to murder 100,000 people for personal gain and there being the slightest possibility of you doing so again puts you on a permanent "To Evil To Let Live" list.

burguulkodar

I don't like thief at all. I do like all the rest of the Woe more, even Juniper. Catherine is kinda the second I like least. Masego>Archer>Hakram are the best characters, followed by Juniper on the callowan side.

---

Chapter 32: Kernel

"Match the smile but watch the knife."

– Soninke saying

The precarious balance the Woe had struck travelling through the echoes together was gone. Within an hour of Masego going into the imprint and harvesting what he could from the Bard and the Dead King that much had been made plain. Thief kept close to Akua's shade, always in earshot, but had fallen into a sullen silence. Archer stabbed our most recent addition through the throat the very moment she attempted to strike conversation, laughing delightedly when the body reformed like mist after she withdrew the blade. I denied her suggestion that Diabolist be made to run ahead of the rest of us and used as target practice, though I was honestly tempted after what I'd overheard last night. There was no point in coddling a snake, true, but mistreating a dangerous and bound entity led to a particular kind of story and not one that ended well for any of us. Hierophant was still feeling the aftermath of stealing an entire language from Arcadia so he walked on his own regularly drinking from some herbal mixture he'd put together. Archer, thankfully, was leaving him alone. She had a talent for discerning between being a pest and being genuinely unpleasant.

That left only silence or Adjutant and I, for Diabolist to make conversation, and I got the impression that after so long in the box Akua was actually quite eager to talk with people. Which led to my finding out something quite interesting: Hakram made Diabolist uncomfortable. Not so much that it showed on her face, but I'd been looking at her closely and when conversing with my right hand she was just slightly off. There was no trace of the easy grace she'd used to run circles around Thief to be found, and while she didn't blunder either I suspected it was because she was being exceedingly careful. I was slightly amused by that, but mostly curious. She could have been faking, of course. That was always a possibility with Akua Sahelian, the footnote added to her every single action and behaviour. But I was pretty sure she wasn't, and that had me thinking about the reasons she'd feel that way. Was she racist? It'd been my impression that by Trueblood standards she was actually pretty tolerant. Which translated to looking down on everyone not a Trueblood more or less equally, with maybe a dash of additional contempt added because greenskins were just so uncivilized.

Assuming it wasn't simply the spectacle of an orc being articulate and calm that had her on the back foot, there might be an angle there. Vivienne had her number in some ways and Archer was usually too willful to influence meaningfully, but Masego enjoyed talking magic with peers enough it could become an issue if left unchecked. It'd already led him to argue for the sparing of the woman who now ran the Observatory for him, and though I doubted he'd go on a similar limb for Diabolist of all people I couldn't dismiss the possibility he'd grow somewhat fond of her over time. There were similarities to the way they'd been raised. His only objections about mass murder tended to be either on a professional basis – human sacrifice was an amateur's crutch, he'd always argued – or because it would displease me. Considerate of him, but not exactly a solid foundation either way. It was a load off my shoulders that Adjutant looked like he'd be able to handle her. I'd long grown to rely on Hakram tidying it all up behind me, a pair of eyes that picked up on all the details I missed. It was fitting that it him who brought up the matter when we paused for a meal around noon.

"We'll need to change her appearance," Adjutant said, head inclining towards Diabolist. "A few people will see through it regardless, but it can't be openly known she is now in our employ."

"That would not be unwise," Akua agreed. "Your subjects have reason to be less than fond of me, and my presence would not help your reputation abroad."

Understatement of the decade, that. It would have been unproductive to make her choke herself again, I reminded myself.

"I'm not sure how well glamour would work without something physical to be anchored on," I frowned. "I can weave illusions without one, but I do need to concentrate. It's not a long-term solution or even a reliable one."

"I have become part of your mantle, dear heart," Akua said with a pleasant smile. "Changing my looks through it should not be all that difficult."

I mulled on that. It was true that she was no longer just bound to the Mantle of Woe. I'd known that the moment I summoned her before beginning our journey. My influence over her shade had grown stronger, broader in scope than simple hold and release. I breathed out and focused, Winter slithering through my veins like whispering smoke. I looked her into the eyes, those brown orbs so dark they were nearly black, and... withdrew what made them. Or at least the thinnest surface of it. Akua blinked, eyes now completely white and without either iris or pupil. I swallowed a flinch. That'd been a little more than I was aiming for. Thief made her way to us, cocking her head to the side.

"Fae," she said. "Give her the appearance of a fae. You're known to have dealings with them, it's the most plausible story we have."

"And not," Akua mused, "entirely untrue. As all the finest lies are."

I was unsettled by the idea of moulding another person – even if their soul was all that was left – like clay, but I pushed that down. Diabolist was already almost inhumanly beautiful, the result of centuries of Wasteland highborn breeding, so twisting her into something fae-like was not as much effort as I'd thought. Larger eyes, the way most fae had, and coloured a vivid scarlet like the dresses she used to wear. Long dark hair, the tresses going down her back, and her already high cheekbones were shaped into a face that was just a little too long and finely boned to be human. I would have made her shorter, if only for the novelty of having someone not towering over me around, but I'd never met a fae that was short. Instead I elongated her, for lack of a better term.

"Fewer curves," Thief said, fixing me with a steady look.

I sneered back. I didn't ogle all my enemies. And despicable person or not, it would have been a deplorable waste to make Diabolist stick-thin. I did adjust her to her taller height, but left it at that.

"Pointed ears," Hakram suggested.

Difficult to mould, but not impossible. It still took longer than the rest of her face put together. I watched Diabolist as I did, for even a hint she was uncomfortable at what was taking place. People with good looks tended to be attached to them, in my experience, and more than that for Named most of all appearances mattered. There was a reason Black still looked in his early twenties and my hair had remained the same length since I became the Squire. Our perceptions of ourselves made us fixed points, to an extent, in one of the subtler rebellions against Above a villain was made of. But she remained indifferent. Like her face was no real importance. It might actually be, I finally decided. Akua was Praesi to the bone, and the highborn of the Wasteland saw everything as a tool – even their own appearances.

"I don't feel like I'm working with a set amount of clay here," I admitted uneasily after finishing. "I could make her tall as an ogre without trouble, and she certainly wasn't that large to begin with. Isn't there an original law about that? 'Something cannot be made of nothing'."

"It would not apply," Diabolist lightly said. "You draw on Winter as the substance of my being. One does not dry an ocean by removing a droplet from it."

That was less than reassuring, though her tone had seemingly been aiming for that. Thief assessed her with a frank gaze, the most practiced of us as disguising herself.

"It would pass muster, for most," she said. "The voice has to go, though. It's too recognizable."

"I'm not sure how to do that," I admitted. "She's a shade, so is she really speaking with her throat and chords?"

"It is a mere property, now," Akua said. "No different than colouring or height. Twisting it only requires the appropriate exertion of will."

Well that was just helpful of her, I thought drily. Unfortunately none of this had come with a manual so I spent almost half an hour struggling in vain before calling for Masego. He was irked at being called away from his almost-nap with a cool cloth on his forehead, but what was being done interested him enough the mood passed quickly. He held my metaphorical hand through the process and we'd made Diabolist's voice lower and throatier within moments. It would do, for now. I could have tinkered more, but the simple fact that I could tinker with someone's appearance was raising the hair on the back of my neck. That level of control was... No one should have that. Certainly not me. We got moving again afterwards: the centre of the shattered kingdom was close now, we could all feel it.

I doubted I would enjoy what I'd find there.

—

Shard by shard, the fall of Sephirah was coming together. We spent most of a day journeying through plague-ridden cities and losing battles, watching desperation grown on the Sephiran side. I could understand why the nobles at the funeral had been dismissive of the chances of the People of the Wolf: though decked out in iron, their warriors were helpless before tall walls as most Sephiran cities boasted. They seemed more like a pack of raiding tribes than a true army, without siege weapons or any notion of supplies. If they could not ransack granaries, they went hungry. There'd been a mention of an organization of mages at the funeral, the Conclave, and Hierophant grew excited when he finally saw them in action. They were certainly a notch above the early practitioners we'd seen: the few Sephiran victories we saw had them playing a central role. Rituals seemed to be their specialty, nothing like the fireballs and lightning bolts that were the bread and butter of the Legions.

The boiled the ground under enemy soldiers, snatched the air out of their lungs and even drew storms towards the invading host. It was not, unfortunately, nearly enough. They were too few, less than two hundred, and not unmatched besides. The People of the Wolf were led by their Named queen, and she broke their rituals whenever she took the field. She had mages of her own, if few and seemingly all from the same tribe, and though they used little offensive sorcery they seemed to have a knack for calming and dispersing rituals. The sacking of a great city – for the times, anyway, it was barely the size of Dormer – was the turning point. There were piles of burning plague victims outside the walls, and when the invaders arrived they scaled the walls in the dark of night and slaughtered the beleaguered defenders. It got vicious after that, on both sides. The People of the Wolf began having a semblance of a baggage train from the sheer amount of plunder they were dragging along, which slowed them down, but their numbers kept swelling.

Repeated and richly rewarded victory had drawn more tribes to the war. That was my guess, anyway, because the warriors no longer all spoke the language that Hakram had told me shared root with Reitz. The dead king's eldest son wore the crown for some time, with one of his sisters as the lesser queen sharing his reign, but we watched the Witch Queen feed him to wolves after she broke his army beneath city walls and captured him. That was when Neshamah began appearing along with the Conclave. Not often, but whenever he did the Sephiran mages always won the day. And their rituals were always a little more vicious every time. One battle where the defenders were particularly outnumbered led to the first use of necromancy we'd seen, the dead rising to make up the odds. It was far from the last instance we came across.

"Their manner of rule is not without merits," Akua said as we watched yet another coronation in the royal hall unfold beneath us from a balcony. "Though it would never function as intended in Praes."

The entire story was unfolding over what had to be at least a decade, I'd come to realize. Possibly more. The royals I'd first seen at the entombment were all growing older my more than a few years.

"It's not just primogeniture," I said. "The lesser king beneath the ruling one isn't always the next oldest in the family."

"They are the favourite or closest ally of the ruler, I suspect," Diabolist said. "The purpose behind the practice is quite clear regardless. The successor is allowed to entrench themselves in the court and kingdom so that any war of succession would result in their crushing victory. A cunning enough method to keep such matters stable in an era where they were anything but."

"We haven't seen them fighting each other yet," I agreed. "But they're going through kings like a basket of pastries. Not much entrenchment going on there."

"The Dead King is positioning himself," she smiled. "He is the youngest, yes? And was long gone from the kingdom. He must earn enough acclaim to be seen as the worthiest candidate for the lesser crown even though his ties to the others are weak. Once the succession reaches a sibling without sufficient support, they will inevitably appoint him beneath them to benefit from his repute."

I didn't reply immediately, eyeing my companion in silence instead. It was still jarring to hear the different voice and see the difference appearance, but that was a passing thing. No, what had been uncomfortable was how easy talking with Akua was. She was, well, surprisingly pleasant company. I could have done without the occasional endearments, but the more I spoke with her the more it became clear she wasn't a raving lunatic. I'd known that, of course. That she was just twisted in a way that couldn't be undone, not actively mad. But living with that truth in front of me was different than knowing it in this abstract. If she were not responsible for the single greatest loss of Callowan life since Dread Empress Triumphant, I might actually have caught myself liking her once in a while. It was made worse by her usefulness. Thief had been tutored as a noble's child, even if her father had lost his title after the Conquest, but like me she'd always felt more comfortable in the streets than sitting down at a writing desk. Diabolist had been raised as heiress to Wolof, and though she was mother to half a dozen atrocities I could not deny she understood the halls of power in a way none of the Woe did.

Her words to Thief still echoed in my mind, sometimes. That she'd fought the better part of the armies of two nations to a standstill, led by eight Named. Her methods had been disgusting, and I would not forgive or forget them. But she had done it regardless, and cornered as I was by the Empress and the First Prince I could not deny there were things I could learn from the monster on my leash.

"He succeeded," I finally said. "We know that. But I'm not certain how. He's forging a reputation as the savior of the kingdom, but at some point he must have gotten the lesser crown or even the one above. If Sephirah kept losing even then, as it must have if they got desperate enough to resort to a Greater Breach, how did he remain king? A reputation like that has to be maintained or they'll turn on your twice as hard."

As it happened, I knew a thing or two about that. The Black Queen would only reign so long as she was not seen to bleed.

"You still think like a Callowan, dearest," Akua said. "Even before the Conquest, the kingdom of your birth had been a single entity with largely static borders for centuries. The loss of even outer provinces would have been felt a slight by all the rest. These Sephirans, however, are less than a century from the days of their unification. The royal army fights for the realm entire, certainly, but we have seen that the armies of their twelve cities are not willing to bleed for their sisters."

I frowned, following down the path she'd set out for me.

"It's all expendable," I finally said. "Except for Keter itself. That one city's all he really needs. The rest is willingly on the chopping block, because it allows him to accumulate power for his ritual without damaging his powerbase enough it unseats him. Merciless Gods. That's brutal even by Wasteland standards."

"Many usurpations of the Tower has been executed through Callowan swords," Akua said. "It is an old trick. Evidently older than I had believed. I will confess surprise, however, as to the Dead King's chosen method of ascension."

I flicked a glance at her.

"He's building up to a massive ritual by bleeding everyone else," I said. "That's the classic Praesi play, Akua. You can't crack open a history of the Empire without finding an instance."

She dismissed that with a graceful movement of the wrist.

"It matters, my dear, that his path to that ritual is so indirect," Diabolist said. "He did not usurp the crown, though opportunities must have abounded. The fullness of his influence seems to be his unspoken prominence among this Conclave and his popularity with the masses. He is not wielding his own might to seize authority, but instead relying on outside pressures to propel him to that desired summit."

I considered that. On one hand, he was using others as tools to place himself in power. On the other, those people weren't true accomplices. There was no plotting cabal backing him that we'd seen, and even his influence with the Conclave was odd. He was teaching them sorcery, that much was clear, and leading them to slowly dip their toe in darker waters. But he wasn't turning them into his own personal circle of sorcerers. Hierophant had been the one to first say the way necromancy was being introduced was odd, but Diabolist had agreed. Neshamah knew a lot more than he was teaching them, and what he did teach them didn't seem like he was offering a true education. Even within the purview of necromancy there is a great deal of latitude in structure and variance, Masego had said. Some of those rituals are near completely unrelated. I'd had a growing suspicion for a while that winning victories wasn't the point of the corpse-raising at all. And if the ends were unimportant, it was the means that mattered. And it could not be forgotten that beyond necromancy, there was another set of means at play – the scheme he was using to rise. Most notable in that it put a crown on his brow without conflict. Without breaking the mores of the Sephirans.

"He's not after the quickest or most effective way to rise," I said.

Akua's scarlet eyes turned to me.

"Then what is he after?" she asked.

"The one that leaves no openings," I grimly replied.

I ended our conversation there, without gracing her with an explanation. Akua Sahelian was not someone I ever intended on telling of what Masego and I had witnessed.

—

The centre of the maze was the birth of apocalypse. I'd known it was coming, but nothing could have prepared me for the sight of Keter's final hours. It was, I had to admit, a great city. Almost as large as Laure, which was astounding for a people that could not even forge iron. Tall walls of blocks of stone without mortar hid away most of the insides, though Indrani told us they were a pittance compared to the walls now encircling Keter. The capital of the Kingdom of Sephirah stood on a low plateau that formed a dais of sorts over the surrounding plains. There were abandoned mining pits scattered across it, and cobbled stone roads leading to four great gates of bronze facing the four directions. Copper shone in the dying afternoon last, covering the roofs of the great houses surrounding the central great tower looking down on the city, but none of us spared much thought for the beauty of it. The horror of the unfolding battle saw to that.

How many invaders were there? Easily over ten thousand, and not all of them from the People of the Wolf. Banners decorated with animal skulls and skins formed a sea beneath the walls, the host of what must have been half of what would become Procer assembled to take the last of the twelve cities of Sephirah. The invaders were dying in droves, but the city was slowly edging towards a loss. Sorcery crackled, weaving storms and raising the dead, but the tribal mages tore through the spells and bestowed enchantments upon the assaulting warriors that allowed them to climb the walls without thought to their weight. We were witnessing the death of a nation, and in the sky above twilight was growing crimson.

We headed deeper in. That was where the gate out would be, I knew instinctively. Indrani threw a grappling hook over the walls and eagerly began to climb, but I drew on Winter instead and formed a narrow set of stairs that the others took even as she catcalled. Ghostly warriors of both sides dying around us, we ascended into the city. Fear hung in the streets, thick and lingering. Doors were barred, prayers and weeping sounding everywhere we tread.

"The Hall of the Dead," Archer said, pointing to the tall tower ahead after catching up. "What it's called now, anyway."

The city around the tower was deserted. All those beautiful mansions, and not a soul in sight. It was inside we found our ending. The chanting could be heard as we walked through the labyrinthine corridors, only growing louder as we got closer to the royal hall where we'd seen so many get crowned. Files of kneeling mages spread out from that centre like tentacles, each singing the same incantation in unison. There would be consequences to missing a step, we learned. One young girl mispronounced a syllable and let out a blood-curdling scream as her body withered, leaving a husk of a corpse behind.

"Fucking Hells," Indrani murmured.

"Workings this powerful leave little room for mistakes," Hierophant noted, eyeing the corpse with interest.

We reached the hall as the ritual neared its end, the chanting growing quicker. We'd seen this place before, many a time. A throne room richly decorated with banners of the twelve cities and statues of copper. There was no throne here today, nothing save for a tall sculpted arc of obsidian and the man standing before it. Neshamah was no longer young. He was closely-shaven and his hair was messy, and even now there was no trace of great Evil in him. No sunken eyes and horrid sneer: only calm, patient expectation. We advanced in silence until we could hear our own footsteps echo. Not a whisper to be heard. Then the Dead King spoke, and the shard ended. In the blank emptiness that enveloped us, we heard a woman's soft laughter.

My hand rose, the gate opened where the arc of obsidian had once stood and into Keter we went.

A long plan with a sharp drop.
And in the end he failed. He further chained himself up instead of his intended 'freedom'.

NZPIEFACE

Yep. Guess he failed what Malicia is doing now.

MetruX

Uhh... Malicia? No. He failed what Black is doing now. Malicia doesn't care for the freedom, she is, in a way, only fighting for herself. But in another way, she is fighting for a united Praes. The Story behind and being free from Fate has never trully interested her.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, I kinda get the goals of the two mixed up sometimes. Malicia and Black both want a Praes that withstands both Above and Below. For Malicia, it's something more of a duty for the country she rules; for Black, it is to break the cycle that "Villains always lose".

werafdsaew

Black wants to win while Malicia wants to stay in power. And she wants to stay in power because she, as Tikoloshe puts it, "craves control the way a starving man craves a meal."

Jane

It's not a failure until he dies. Bottled up in a hell dimension for centuries? Zombified his entire kingdom? Routinely harassed by Ranger as a worthy opponent? Anything, to avoid the Big Fire below.

After all, his goal is immortality to usurp the Gods. So long as that path isn't broken, he hasn't failed – just taken a detour. What are the passing of centuries to one immortal, after all? Now, he's had plenty of time to hone his technique and watch the magics of the outside world grow into more suitable tools for his use.

usernamesbco

At this point idk if we can say if he failed or succeeded, but is anyone going to point out the parallels with Cat?

They both wanted a crown, so they started a war so they could rise in the chaos? She incited a civil war via William, DK set off a plague to invite an invasion.

Eliminating other claimants? He got them killed via the war, she killed them more directly.

Bending social mores just enough they'd accept a villain on the throne? Granted, after 20 years of villainous occupation and Callow's "gtfo invaders, she's OUR monster" attitude Cat didn't have as far to go.

She's taking a stab at him things she did herself.

stevenneiman

I'm not so sure. He seems to have ossified, as is the curse of any eternal being. But maybe he really just has plans that stretch for thousands of boring years and he hasn't wanted to attract undue attention? He has more or less an eternity to wait for favorable conditions, and those conditions almost certainly include people thinking the Kingdom of the Dead more or less contained.

Argentorum

But those century long plans are the ones with no openings.

MetruX

And as we've seen he has since the beginning worked for no mistakes, instead of easy paths.

Sylfa

Who's word do we really have that he has stagnated? Isn't that the observation made from others about him? Assuming he'd behave like the immortal Fae and/or Elves?

My point being, if he has been expanding on his magical powers all the while and gathering strength for his usurpation of the gods, then why would he let anyone know about that when he can just pretend to be stuck whenever someone can observe him?

SpaceDorf

Rangers visit to Keter is actually a pretty decent description of how the Dead King can still adapt to her and therefore evolve. Keter is ever changing

JD

Those poor fools. They have no idea that this entire war is a sacrifice for one man. And because no one knows, no story can arise to defeat the plan.

PotatoMan

Hmm. So Cat is suspicious of Akua but accepts her as a friend because she is hot. Truly, Catherine is the embodiment of the comment section.

Someguy

Cat's weakness isn't that she can't keep her mouth shut, it's that she can't keep it in her pants.

Jane

Hey, hey, I'm not interested in her that way, I just like classical villains with a flair for drama and clever plans 😞 ! She has some great lines, when she's not about to make a terrible mistake.

Jane

Ah, I forgot to append, this comment is intended in jest, not in petulance.

Soronel Haetir

Into the valley of Death rode the Woe.
Theirs but to do and fuck things over.

Gunslinger

Woot we finally reach Keter. And is that jolly laugh at the end our friend The Bard? Quite a delightful hero that one.

Finally do vote for the guide on <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Byzantine

She seems to be laughing at the Dead King's foolishness. He ended up failing his true goal and made himself more bound than ever.

ruduen

And so ends their information gathering trip.

Based on well knowledgable in story and magic he appears to be, the Dead King probably knew what they would learn if they entered via that path. So, I'm curious as to why he would intend for them to learn it.

IDKWhoitis

There is the small chance that the Dead king may not have been able to study Arcadia much, and may NOT know what lies yonder.

Theres also a chance that Bard may have fiddled with the path instead.

Jane

It might be that he just doesn't care as much about the risks or possibilities it presents as he does the fact that it's the fastest, most secretive way to arrange the meeting. They don't have much time to prepare for an assault on Procer, and it would be a significant advantage to catch their enemies unaware. Meanwhile, realistically speaking, why should the Dead King fear what Cat has learned? There were no glaring weaknesses exposed that we know of – and the only thing that may have been a risk was when they plundered a shard with Witness, something that could hardly be anticipated.

Mind you, it was a great way for the Dead King to showcase how the Wandering Bard is their real threat, should that have been his aim; I'm just suggesting that there were a ton of advantages to travelling this way without any secret agenda involved.

dood

Oh fuck man, the Dead King is after Winter! I think all this intrigue is off base, he just wants the power to raise cheap smart undead and oppose the gods above and below.

burdi

there are possibility that catherine will ask the dead king to teach her how to beat wandering bard after all, maybe he is the only man ever beat her

IDKWhoitis

Dead King seems to have pulled the whole "Only way to win, is to not play gambit" when 'beating' bard. He also did this when Bard was learning. Trying to exploit the same tactics would get Cat nowhere, as Bard has gotten better, and Cat is too pivotal a player in the Meta Story of Calernia.

Novice

Did he really beat the Bard though? The soft laughter of a woman at the end of the shard implies it's all according to plan.

Euodiachloris

I suspect Bard is the one who arranges for the construction of cages when anybody seeks true freedom and grabs at a Name to do it.

Note: she's also in a vicious cage of her own, when normal travelling ministerial are supposed to be primarily about their freedoms from many settled norms and practices – with all the advantages and disadvantages those affords them socially. But, WB's lot is a dark, unending parody of bardic life.

Euodiachloris

/minstrels – apparently, one minstrel is fine, but two minstrels requires me whacking the autocorrect to stop them becoming ministers or ministerial. 🙄

Antoninjohn

Harvest the knowledge of the ritual from the shard and suddenly Cat had a fallback plan of making a new kingdom of the Dead, she will probably invade and take over part of Arcadia instead of one of the Hells to store her living subjects

NZPIEFACE

ye but she controls winter where nothing grows

HandyCapped

Why would she make callow into a kingdom of the dead, if her motive is to keep the kingdom alive?

IDKWhoitis

Ok, so its either Ranger visiting an old friend again, before going to pull Black's ass out of Procer, or its Bard.

Im really hoping for Ranger.

Euodiachloris

You've probably jinxed yourself, mate. 🙄

Jane

Ditching her appearance and voice... Clever. It helps break the reflexive hatred her companions have of her, by tricking their subconscious into thinking of her as someone "different". Then, she only needs to be her pleasant, conniving self to overcome their conscious hatred of her, so that there would be some resistance to the notion of sacrificing her without a second thought.

Big mistake in not asking for wings while she was at it, though. Who doesn't want to be able to fly? Sure, sure, she has magic that can pretty much accomplish that anyways, but it never hurts to have a second option.

Joking aside, though, assuming they can't get Aisha a Name and add her to the Woe, they really do need Akua, as this chapter demonstrates. Having someone who can instinctively read the flow of politics and manipulate them would save them so much trouble. Thief is decent at that as well, but it doesn't seem to come to her as naturally, nor do negotiations with nobles. For that matter, it also helps to have a magic specialist who knows how to deal with normal people...

Unfortunate that whole, you know, mass murderer thing, though. And the years spent trying to undermine and kill them. Kind of puts a bit of a damper on everything.

Jane

Ah, one more thought...

She should totally take this opportunity to change her name to Ubua, as well. I mean, she needs an alias, does she not?

letouriste

hum...no, that's the kind of joke losing strenght quickly.

Jane

But it was the first time I found a good opportunity to use it 😞 ...

/joking

Novice

The appearance change is worrying not only because of the subtle deception but also because of the possibility that Akua could become a real fae. She has: a sliver of Winter inside her, bound to the only titled Winter fae; the appearance of a fae; and presumably still has the Name of Diabolist – the Name that is focused in dominating, controlling and usurping entities and forces from outside Creation.

If Cat can bluff and stab her way to faehood, why can't Akua?

Jane

Hm, the chapter did just reiterate how a Villain's appearance is tied to their Name, their self-image anchoring themselves to their place in the world in defiance of the Gods Above...

Even if it's unrelated, though, I can see how Cat, a Fae monarch, leaning on Akua, a living fragment of Fae wrapped around a soul, could end up with Akua becoming a Fae in truth. With how much Winter power she runs through Akua, and just leaves lying around, it wouldn't be that surprising if Akua was collecting some of the detritus, deliberately or accidentally. It's not as though she has a body to anchor herself to Creation proper anymore, after all, and she's with Cat literally all the time.

I wonder, though... If she ever becomes a real girl again, how does the whole soul-ectomy thing work? She's removed her soul in the past, so we know she can function without it, but for how long? And what are the side effects? And can Cat still threaten her with it?

Ruh roh

Also Catherine literally just used her mantle and Winter to turn Akua into a fey. I think that's going to have a narrative weight that she hasn't taken into account. Let's hope Akua hasn't got access to Winter...

Nguyen Hong Hai

Anyone got Dark Souls vibe from the Keter section here? The painting needs the fire to draw over again.

Euodiachloris

Except, I actually prefer Neshamah to Gwyn. I'm not sure why: maybe it's because he doesn't come across as a temperamental firebrand with ego issues. And, also doesn't seem to make friends with incredibly weird, genocidal dragons with fragile senses of identity. Still zero morals and questionable ethics, though. 😊

Novice

So I've been thinking, what are the odds that the namesake wolf of the People of the Wolf and the wolf companion of the current Witch of the Forest are one and the same, or at the very least related? I mean the Named leading the People of the Wolf is called the Witch Queen. Perhaps the current Name of Witch of the Forest is a cultural evolution of the Witch Queen Name?

saiman92

Is the dead king thing a Name? Because I think he beat the bard in the sense that the only way to win is not to play. Kinda like Cat actually. People call her the Black Queen, but all she has is the Winter mantle and a few wisps of the squire. His necromancy gets him immortality and he seems powerful enough. it would also explain why he is rarely active outside his domain so that he doesn't become embroiled in the game.

Azure

Did Catherine just do the equivalent of character creation in a game, and put the boob size slider to max? Haha Thief was certainly not impressed. Jealous

Nguyen Hong Hai

Gods below Cat, no playing dress up with Akua!

Antony444

Hmm...well, I'm sure the besieging army had a really, really nasty surprise when the ritual was completed. They expected a sack in due form, they got an immortal lich and an army of undead with really no way to disperse them...I suspect things went really ugly and the enmity between Keter and the future kingdom of Procer was born on that day.

Now I'm sure we are going to have an unbearable cliffhanger on Friday, for the Woe are at last entering the capital of the Dead King...

Jane

That's rather optimistic of you, thinking there were survivors.

Argentorum

Procer came from somewhere. I just can't wait for when Car gets to call Hasenbach and her forefathers evil barbarians and sackers of good cities. And not be lying.

Dylan Tullos

Argentorum:

If you go back far enough, everyone's got some Evil in their family tree. And Northern Procer has certainly suffered for the sins of their ancestors over the last few millennia.

It's interesting to learn that an aggressive confederation that attacked fortified cities is now a defensive confederation that defends great walls. They're some of the most dedicated Good people in Calernia, and they're committed to fighting Evil rather than squabbling with their neighbors.

Euodiachloris

We now need to find out how what is now Praes was once on the side of the angels...

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Oh god don't get everyone calling her Car now. That kind of thing can push a man right into the arms of the Gods Above goddamjt, and nobody wants that

Jane

How about Truck, then? Because of how she makes all of her enemies reincarnate? Or Bus! Can we call her bus, for how she pushes other people out of the plot? Maybe Train?

You have to let me call her some kind of vehicle D: !

/joking

Hardric62

Yup. Lycaon was a guy Zeus changed into a wolf for his crimes. Wolf People. Great-ohmygodshowmuch-Greatmother Witch Queen really ducked up things for her descendants... How much would you bet if she's remembered in any way in modern Procer, it's as a heroine?

Marcustitus10

Is it just me or are the Hero's really screwed if they actually kill Black. Because Ranger is going to go to town on anyone even remotely near his death. So go get him GP and SwordS you hypocritical douches!!;) Also WhiteK because f&$k you to!!

Ps. Don't really Black K forever!!!!!!

Marcustitus10

Also did Akau 100% kill Assassin? Or is the jury still out on that?

termite

Pretty sure he will die again lots of times intil getting down for good

Isi Arnott-Campbell

When Grey Pilgrim looked at that one Proceran lord no-one likes during his interlude, he saw some terrible darkness in him. I suspect that this means Assassin survived and did a kill-and-replace maneuver. It's only a theory, however; that lord could just be that much of an asshole by himself.

Also, in the bit where Akua made Cat go through several alternate continuities, it was mentioned that Assassin was permanently killed in one of the continuities; I don't remember the phrasing and am too lazy to check, but got the impression that the perma-killing took many temporary killings to achieve.

In short, I at least am deeply unconvinced of Assassin's death. Besides, if a Calamity had truly fallen, there'd be grief among the survivors as with Captain's death; we've seen and heard nothing to suggest that they're fussed about it this time.

NZPIEFACE

Assassin died by two means during Cat's reruns.

- 1) Tolltaker used a fuck ton of goblinfire.
- 2) Implied that Above used some fuckery through White Knight.

Byzantine

Assassin was fine, as far as we know. Whatever it is can't be killed by simply destroying its body.

Berder

With her makeover, performed in Arcadia no less, Akua seems poised to become a different being. This may free her from the oath to kill her at the end of her service, because that oath referred to the old Akua. If Akua becomes truly fae, then that is also another step in the direction of stealing the mantle of Winter from Cat.

Why was Akua nervous around Hakram? Hakram was the one who suggested changing Akua's appearance. That's a move that plays into Akua's hands. I speculate, therefore, that Akua was counting on Hakram specifically making that suggestion, and was nervous that he wouldn't. I wonder if Akua and Hakram had a conversation they didn't mention to Cat.

Euodiachloris

Akua doesn't know how to interact with orcs on a face-to-face level, beyond "order them about" and "screw them over" – it's mostly racism, but also the fact that she's never had to think of them as individuals before, let alone had a relationship with one that's lasted more than two hours a "session", tops. Worse, he messes with her idea about how the world works, as he is actually Named.

She's got no template on how to act to follow.

Berder

I don't believe that's enough to explain it. Cat considers your hypothesis but says Akua is a more tolerant example of Praesi nobility, and then says "Assuming it wasn't simply the spectacle of an orc being articulate and calm that had her on the back foot, there might be an angle there." So, that speaks for some hidden reason Akua would be nervous, and not racism.

PotatoMan

I think it is that Adjutant is forcing Akua indirectly to face some of her deeply-held beliefs. I think that Akua always thought that she could do whatever Cat did, but Akua didn't because she chose not to. More specifically, Akua has always and still does believe her methods superior to Cat's. This is why Akua thought she lost to The Black Knight, not Catherine. But what about Catherine's right-hand orc? Hakram as he is is something Akua never could have created. Not would not, as she was assuming before she met him, but could not. Akua is notably tolerant for a High Lord, not actively hating orcs but simply viewing them as subhuman race. Catherine does not view Orcs this way, but Akua does, and Hakram represents an investment Akua simply would not even have thought to make. In Akua's world, Orcs don't get names other than maaaaaaybe Warlord.

Akua bases herself upon bedrock-firm premises about the way the world works, and Orcs being able to exist mentally above the level of cannon fodder or mere brutes is one of those beliefs. Hakram probably simultaneously flummoxes and kind of weirds her out. It'd be like if one of your friends brought over a four-foot tall talking toadstool to your high-society luncheon, acting like it's perfectly normal. No, it's not normal, Carol, and what do you even talk to a sentient mushroom about? Gods woman, for a college graduate sometimes you act like a complete nonce.

benthelynx

So they missed their chance to appropriate knowledge from the proto Wandering Bard or Dead King.

Booksie

Dang, should've grabbed wandering bard brain. That opportunity will never come again.

---

Chapter 33: Keter

"And so Triumphant said: 'Tremble, for I am not yet content.'"
– Extract from the Scroll of Dominion, twenty-fourth of the Secret Histories of Praes

My boots scuffed the stone and a poisonously warm breeze caressed my face. I strode forward, leaving room for the others to pass behind me, and resisted the urge to drop my hand to my sword. Gods, this place was a nightmare. Though it was in the royal hall we had crossed, we'd evidently emerged outside the bounds of Keter. More precisely, on one of the four stone ramps leading into the city across the gaping maws of a chasm. It was dark for miles, down there, before flickering flames cast a light deep in the depths. The sound of the wind against the man-made cliffs was eerily akin to a dirge. I turned my eyes ahead instead of peering into the madness, but found only more of the same. Indrani had warned me that the walls of the Crown of the Dead were absurdly tall, but even then I had not expected the likes of what I saw. Jutting out of the sharp drop at the edge of the cliffs, the ramparts must have been at least a thirty yards high at the lowest point. No part of the city behind could be seen from out here, save for the spire of dark stone stretching out into the sky – and the orb of hellfire that hovered atop it, an indistinct silhouette shifting within.

This was not a city made for the living.

"Godsdamn," Archer said, letting out a whistle. "I know he's just a pile of scheming Evil bones, but you've got to respect his style. That's as doom-like as a fortress of doom gets."

"Drawbridges would have been more tactically sound," Adjutant said.

I glanced at him and found Hakram was unmoved by the sight of millennia of darkness and arrogance made into a city. In some undefinable way, it was so very much like him to take his first look at the Crown of the Dead and immediately start criticising its defensive layout. Any moment now he would mention that the artillery firing lanes could be improved by further overlap, or that the barbican was overly crenellated.

"I would wager that, to the likes of the Dead King, every bridge is a drawbridge if given sufficient attention," Diabolist spoke amusedly.

Ugh, Akua. She was not supposed to actually be kind of funny.

"Are we not meant to be honoured guests?" Hierophant said. "Making us stand outside his gates is poor manners."

Like he was one to talk about those. Still, as if magically summoned by Masego's complaining, our 'hosts' came out of the woodworks. From beyond the gate chilling howls were heard, and then the flap of great wings. Dozens of... not dragons, but perhaps the bastard child of them, took flight. Wyverns, though made of bone and leather with radiant red eyes. Each one as large as a house.

"Thief," I said. "The seal."

Vivienne flourished her wrist, palm becoming filled with the obsidian circle that had come along the Dead King's message. She tossed it at me, and though I snatched it out of the air without trouble I gave her a hard look. What if I hadn't been paying attention, and it'd tumbled off the edge of the bridge? How fucked would we have been, this deep in the Kingdom of the Dead without our proof of invitation? Regardless, the wyverns passed over us without trouble as I raised the seal above my head. The flock parted in both directions, diving below the stone bridge and passing under. With perfect timing, they came back up and landed simultaneously on the edge of both sides. The leathery wings folded back, and ahead of us the tall gates of steel began to open.

"An honour guard," Akua said. "How mannerly of him."

A show of force as well, though I didn't need for her to remind of that to be aware. Though I knew, objectively speaking, that the Dead King would not have invited us for the sole purpose of murdering strangers I could not quite manage indifference as we passed in front of the perfectly still wyverns. Their eyes, I felt, followed us wherever we went. It was a pittance compared to the welcome that awaited us beyond the gates. The closer we came, the greater the chill going up my spine. Indrani had told me everything Ranger had taught her about Keter, in particular the kinds of undead that dwelled within. There were, she'd said, three kinds. The Bones, the Binds and the Revenants. The Bones were undead as I knew them, raised corpses little more intelligent than dogs when left to their own purposes. Most were ancient enough they were nothing but skeletons wearing armour. The Dead King, Archer told me, could seize control of those at any time. The Binds were corpses with souls bound to them, as sapient as humans. They were the captains and servants of the Kingdom of the Dead. The third kind, the Revenants, were a breed apart. Named stolen from the grave, keeping a shadow of the power they'd once wielded while living.

The Dead King was a kind of his own, she'd added. Without equivalent or easy description.

What awaited us beyond the gates was an honour guard beyond the ability of mortals to assemble. The avenues of Keter were filled to the brim with silent dead, bearing arms and armour spanning centuries. Bronze helms in the ancient Baalite style, iron breastplates as were long borne by the Lycaonese and more than a few longswords of the distinctive Vale make of Callow. Banners from half the continent were stirred by the warm breeze, though none stood as tall as that of the Kingdom of the Dead: ten silver stars, set in a perfect circle around a pale crown. By the regal crown you will know him, the old verse went. His horse is the death of men, his voice the fall of night and he strives doom unto all the world. Villains drew epithets, myself among them, but none quite as many as the Dead King. We advanced, six of us surrounded by silence and blasphemy. The very instant was passed the threshold, thousands of dead kneeled in unison. I shivered. There had been a single mind at work behind it. In the avenue ahead of us, the dead parted to allow a pale man followed by six palanquins to pass through. I could hear his heartbeat and my eyes lingered on his approaching silhouette before my fingers clenched at the sight of the first palanquin.

Four dead carried it, but it was the drapery falling down the side that drew my attention. Black silk, embroidered with heraldry. A set of silver scales, balancing a crown and a sword. The sword weighed heavier. The words embroidered beneath I did not need to read. He is not blind, I thought. He was never blind. Whether the Dead King had imprisoned himself into his personal hell or not, he knew of the affairs of Calernia outside it. And in much greater depth than my worst predictions had anticipated. The pale-skinned man was the only living soul in sight, and memorable for reasons more than that. Raven tresses went down his back, his body perfectly proportioned as if he were more sculpture than man. He had, I thought as he came closer, warm and kind eyes. Given the surroundings, that only added to the horror of it. The stranger came before us and slowly knelt.

"In the name of the Crown, I greet you," he said in flawless Lower Miezian. "Black Queen, Tyrant of Callow, the King of Death extends his hospitality to your august presence and that of our attendants."

There was a slight accent to his voice, but not one I recognized.

"We accept this hospitality with the gratitude it is due," I replied. "Rise."

"I cannot, for my purpose is not yet discharged," the man said, pressing his head to the stone. "As gift of welcoming, the Crown bestows my existence upon you."

My lips thinned. Had I just been handed a slave? No, now was not the time to make a mess. If the Dead King knew enough of Calernian affairs to know the motto on my banner, he had to know how repulsive a Callowan would find slavery. Was this a test?

"The gift is accepted in the spirit it was given," I said. "Rise, now."

The man did so, gracefully.

"My face name is Athal, Great Majesty," he said. "I have been instructed to serve as your host for the duration of your stay."

"We have a guest-gift to offer the Dead King," I said calmly. "Though that can wait until audience is granted. Until then, we would see our quarters. It has been a long journey."

"The Silent Palace has been prepared for your pleasure," Athal said, bowing low. "If you would deign to enter the palanquins, honoured ones?"

"Very civilized, not making us walk," Masego noted approvingly. "We should see about obtaining those in Laure."

I deigned, or at least began to. I paused when I finally took a closer look at the dead bearing my litter. No mere skeletons in armour, these. Their flesh was dead but well-preserved, their faces still human and their finery fit for royalty. Which they very well might be: crowns had been nailed to each of their heads.

"If it please you, Great Majesty," Athal said, coming at my side. "As a sign of respect, the Crown had put worthy souls to your service. You look upon—"

"Princes," I interrupted quietly, "Princes and princesses of Procer."

"That is so," the man agreed. "Prince Mateo Osuna of Aequitan and his twin sister Princess Nicoleda. Princess Clemente Milenan of Iserre. Prince Friedrich Hasenbach of Rhenia. Their tongues have been sown as penance, and crowns put to their brow as a reminder of the follies of arrogance."

They all came from principalities that had been pivotal in the war against Callow one way or another. At a guess Rozala Malanza's own bloodline was too young to the throne of Aequitan to have a representative, so they'd drawn from the one that ruled before it. Merciless Gods. The statement here was more alarming than the show of force surrounding us, in some ways. That Neshamah had hordes of dead was well known, but this was both a reminder that he'd broken more than a few princes in his time and that he knew exactly who my opponents were. The Dead King was making a point. I got on the palanquin in silence, and allowed dead royalty to carry me to the Silent Palace.

—

The accommodations lived up to the name. We'd gone through the streets of Keter, passing a multitude of dead of all stripes, until we neared the infamous Hall of the Dead. I'd seen this district before, in the echoes. It had been where the powerful of Sephirah once lived in their copper-roofed mansions. Those were long gone, replaced instead by a circle of sprawling palaces surrounding the demon-tipped central tower. The Silent Palace was a strange wonder of architecture, six interlocked rings of different heights in marble black and white. Zombie had followed us with our affairs, though our personal packs had been taken by unsmiling dead, and the moment we entered the first hall white-robed servants knelt gracefully before seeing to all our bags. Every single one of them was alive, and no older than twenty. Athal followed me like a shadow, as I as watched the servants divest Zombie of her saddlebags I half-turned towards him.

"I did not think there would be so many living in Keter," I said.

The man had been both talkative and helpful, so far, and apparently genuinely believed I owned him now. Though the thought was repellent and there was trap written all over this 'gif't, I could at least hit him up for some low understanding of this place.

"We are none of us from Keter, Great Majesty," Athal said, bowing low. "All of us chose to become Hosts upon our coming of age, learning the trade of that choice. It is a rare thing for our service to be called upon, and a great honour."

My eyes narrowed.

"You were born in Hell," I said.

"A strange thing to call the Serenity, honoured one," the man murmured. "It is the world beyond our guardians that is most deserving of that ugly term."

"You've been outside the Kingdom of the Dead?" I asked, surprised.

"I have not. Yet we are not ignorant of the nightmare called Calernia, Great Majesty," Athal gently said. "The Journeymen return with the tales of their time in your brutish world every season, sacrificing their first life so that we may learn through them. It is a most noble duty. If not for my facility with languages, I may very well have chosen to serve as one of their number."

Hosts. Journeymen. The Dead King is breeding people in his Hell for chosen tasks, I realized with fresh horror. There'd always been rumours that he had human farms to swell his numbers with fresh dead somewhere in his hellscape, but I'd assumed it would be through regular reappings. No, I thought. He has taught them it is an honour. Everything they know passes through his hands – by the time he's raised them up to the age of culling, they must actually volunteer. I should have known better. The kind of man who'd plot the death of a kingdom and a half to obtain immortality with the Bard after his hide the whole time would not have made so elementary a mistake. He didn't treat his cattle like they were that. No, he'd tend to them lovingly and reap the benefits of that kindness again and again over the span of centuries. He must have shaped all their customs from the cradle, I thought. An entire realm turned to the sole purpose of strengthening him without forging heroes in the process.

"And these Journeymen," I said slowly. "They've told you of how the rest of the continent sees the Kingdom of the Dead?"

Athal seemed amused.

"Are we to put faith in the words of those that slaughter each other for sport?" he asked. "There is no war in the Serenity, Great Majesty. No murder or sickness or any of the brutalities outsiders inflict on each other. We are born and raised to the loving embrace of the Crown, and repay that kindness when our first lives have passed. It is the least of that which is due."

"And the devils?" I asked.

"Beasts of burden," Athal said, sounding surprised. "Save for those of the Writhing Palace, were none trespass."

That, I decided, did not sound like a place I ever wanted to visit.

"You're aware the Kingdom of the Dead has attacked other nations before," I tried.

"The Procerans," the dark-haired man agreed. "A warlike folk that have attempted to destroy the Serenity many a time, assembling coalitions of blind hatred. Are you not yourself come to Keter to seek help against their depredations, Great Majesty?"

Well, he had me there. I was also fully intending to throw the Dead King under the cart at the first opportunity, after carefully ensuring his leash was loosened but not loose, but that was best kept quiet. Assuming Neshama had not already deduced as much, which was looking increasingly likely. And still he had invited me. Why? I needed to figure out his game before meeting him, or I might just come out of that conversation having birthed an atrocity greater than Akua's Folly.

"So why is this place called the Silent Palace, anyway?" I said, changing the subject with all my usual elegance.

"It is so named for it had remained closed and untouched since its last and only guest," Athal explained. "You would know her as the Dread Empress Triumphant."

No 'may she never return', huh? I supposed this particular crowd had different ideas about the kind of person she'd been. I was a little unsettled at the very real possibility that the last person to sleep in the bed I'd end up in tonight was the worst monster to ever come out of Praes. Hopefully they'd changed the sheets since, because I wouldn't dismiss out of hand the possibility she'd gotten demon all over them during her stay.

"Any notion of when we'll be granted audience?" I asked him.

"If it please you, it has been said that tomorrow's dusk would be auspicious time," Athal replied.

"It pleases me," I said, a tad drily.

I regretted it immediately. It was unkind, to mock a man so obviously twisted even if the manner of it was fairly gentle. It sometimes occurred to me that I wouldn't like myself very much, if I met me as a stranger. That I'd ended up stabbing one of the doppelgangers in my soul seemed less and less a coincidence as I grew older.

"Then it shall be so, Great Majesty," the man bowed.

Zombie had been divested of her saddlebags and I allowed her to be guided away by a white-robed servant without protest. Odds were there was a stable in here somewhere, and it wasn't like I'd ever have a hard time finding her. The rest of the Woe had been led to their own chambers, save for Akua who'd denied her servant. She made her way towards me instead and my brow rose. I supposed she didn't really need rooms of her own, now that I thought about it, but she was in for a hard awakening if she thought she could haunt my own. Athal flinched when she approached and knelt at her feet.

"There's no need for that," I said slowly, crouching to help him back up.

"I mean no slight, Great Majesty," he said, still looking down. "It is simply that I have never hosted one of the Splendid before. I was not taught the proper manners."

"Splendid, am I?" Akua drawled. "Well, I've often thought so myself."

That might have amused me, if the man wasn't so obviously frightened.

"She's just an attendant," I reassured him. "No need to worry about her."

Diabolist's scarlet eyes flicked to the man and her face softened.

"You gave no offence, Host," she said. "And your manners, though not lacking, offered honours underserved. Treat me as any of the others and you will find your actions faultless."

Customary annotation: she was, of course, likely faking this. It was good to remind myself of that, lest my impression of her improve. Praesi highborn were not usually kind to servants, whenever they remembered their existence, and Akua Sahelia had sent people dearer to her than a stranger to their deaths without batting an eye.

"I heed your words, honoured one," Athal murmured.

"You needed something?" I asked flatly.

She folded her hand into her sleeves.

"Mere assurance over minor matters," she said, smiling at Athal. "I was told that our movements within Keter would not be restricted, save for the Hall of the Dead. Did the servant err in telling me this?"

"It is not so, Splendid," the dark-haired man said.

I eyed Akua curiously.

"The Lord Hierophant has expressed interest in sightseeing such a glorious city," she said.

Ah. Well, it wasn't like I'd brought Masego with the expectation that he'd be useful in the negotiations. He was here to ease our way through Arcadia, and as one of my larger cudgels in case things went south.

"Have Archer go with him," I ordered Akua. "And tell them to be back before nightfall."

I should not have to impose a curfew on a grown man and woman, but I most definitely did have to when it came to that pair. Indrani wasn't someone I'd usually consider or employ as a restraining influence, but she knew the dangers of the Keter better than any of us. She'd pull him away if his nose led him somewhere they shouldn't go. If wandering around kept them occupied while I prepared for tomorrow with the others, I'd count it a victory.

It was all about the standards, really.

"By your will, Black Queen," Diabolist smiled, bowing.

Lower than what Praesi court etiquette dictated, even if she considered me a ruling Dread Empress. She was being careful about maintaining the illusion of her change of appearance, which I couldn't help but approve of.

"All right, Athal," I sighed as she walked away. "Take me to my rooms."

"By your will, Great Majesty," he said, bowing as well.

I detected a hint of amusement in his voice. I could grow fond of that one, I decided. I allowed him to lead me deeper into the palace before clearing my throat.

"So, about those sheets," I began.

---

Aeon

Everything I just read is awesome. I know Cat doesn't plan for this to last, but I'd love it if she was forced to keep this alliance. This whole empire seems fascinating, and I can't wait to see more.

Amoonymous

Agreed. Maybe my opinion will change in the future, but Neshamah doesn't seem like TOO bad of a guy (currently, that is – what he did in the past was pretty damn bad).

Now though, if his living citizens are basically living in a paradise (yet again, from what we know – it might turn out that what they think is paradise is pretty terrible), it would make sense that they'd willingly sign up for an unlife after life.

Seems like a good deal for his people and himself. They live perfectly safe and satisfying lives, he gets stronger with time.

Also, it does seem like Procer was the first to attack them, so it makes the Crusades and Dead Raids seem more like extremely extended warfare than anything else.

Cicero

Cat... Cat...

Everything, EVERYTHING, is screaming, SCREAMING, that this a HUGE MISTAKE!

Please think very carefully about what you are doing.

Big Brother

How is it a mistake?

sheer_falacy

For one thing, he's more powerful than her, incredibly dangerous, and she knows basically nothing about him or his motives.

For another, this is a bad story for her no matter what. Either it's a story about allying with a monster or it's a story about trying to betray a monster by setting it free, and neither of those ends well.

We'll see how things go but frankly going to Keter in the first place seems like a terrible idea.

Euodiachloris

He may be a monster, but technically, so is Cat (monster in battle, necromancy, dark magic, glamour, mind altering speech, fae...). We, and she, don't know why he's done all this, exactly. Or, how well it's working in subverting the Gods' program.

Until we do know more, I'm suspending judgement.

Besides which: he may not view the living as actual cattle in the way Cat supposes him to. Don't forget, she's thinking of him using Callow as her filter. This, however, is not Callow. Nor is it Praes, nor is it Procer.

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

He murdered everyone in Keter to ascend to godhood.

When you use your entire city as a blood sacrifice for your own exaltation, you view people as cattle.

Euodiachloris

He quite obviously didn't, though. Inside his own skull, as he discussed with the Bard, he was helping his nation break from the stuck-record cycle in a way most wouldn't choose beforehand due to lack of education, using an "illness" that just so happened to be necromantic in nature.

Before all necromancy was a thing deemed totally E-evil (and, it got that way primarily after what he did).

From a certain point of view, organ donation and defibrillators are necromancy and, therefore, evil. Some people truly believe that any modern medical intervention, particularly surgical intervention, is BAD and morally questionable.

I'd argue that the evil ones are those who refuse to e.g. give kids the shots, cleft palate surgery, antibiotics, artificial limbs, cochlear implants or antipsychotic medication that they actually need. But, those who fight to withhold things like this (and abortion) are convinced they are doing good, sound, moral work. Just as those who believe wholeheartedly in cryogenic preservation of their remains think they're not being conned.

So, yeah. Imma gonna wait and see where this is going.

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

The Dead King killed everyone in his kingdom. Then he brought them back as undead controlled by his will, forced to obey his every command and unable to do anything he didn't want them to do.

I'm not opposed to necromancy because it's icky. I'm against it because it involves murdering people then turning them into meat puppets.

It's a crime to perform a medical procedure without a patient's consent. Why would it be less unethical to kill someone and bring them back as a slave who has to obey the necromancer's orders?

Euodiachloris

I'm not saying that everything he's done is highly moral. But, it's no more nor less moral than attacking a sovereign nation that's done nothing to you for decades/ centuries on the grounds that "the Heavens told me to do it" or "he might invade us" or "he's damned scary and undead". Or, brainwashing an entire population at once (rather than the brainwashing in increments that seems to happen to heroic Names on an individual level) to attack said nation (all kamikaze-style, to boot) for that matter.

They're on a par. When both sides are using equally hideous measures, neither has the moral high ground. So, you get people trying to buck the system. This "undead population = fuck you, inherently unfair program" is one way to try, however selfish part of the means. Not necessarily the best way, mind.

Cat, too, has a body count of innocents under her belt trying to gain power enough to fix things. And, has a soul enslaved for her use. She's got ethics, though, which she tries not to break. That I can applaud, at least – mainly because I know more of her motives.

I suspect the Dead King to have ethics, too. Even if I would find issue with the morals behind them. However, reasoned ethics can prove moral in ways that are not immediately apparent, which is why I always pause before condemning them. I just don't have enough data to draw conclusions about his motives. Yes, he slaughtered a lot of people to get ahead. So has Cordelia. So has every head of government, save one very reluctant one (and he's condemning people through inaction).

I'm not sure the Heavens have reasoned ethics. Unless "always act as if mortal opinions or wills are bugs to be patched or deleted" is an ethical standard worth applauding. 😊

And, I really don't have a clue what the Hells are up to. <_<

Noscopy

Do you mean like the Christian God that makes us suffer and die on Earth so that only then if we put all of our faith and literally our soul in his hands can we go to a place of perfect peace called Keter, I mean Heaven?

Abrakadabra

How the Hell abortion comes even close to the things you previously listed? I personally think the Dead King is all for abortion, only he aborts people when he reached adulthood, not in the womb.

stevenneiman

Yeah, I'm seeing this as a variant of the classic "summon and bind the god of evil" plot. He might not technically be a god even with the lower case "g", but he definitely serves the purpose and I wouldn't put divinity past him considering that he has a whole minor civilization that basically worships him. The idea is that a villain believes that they can trick a mighty being into accepting a summons to the outside world in a situation where the villain believes that they can force their will on that being. And to my knowledge, that always ends one of two ways.

Either the heroes manage to kill the villains before they complete the summoning, or the summoned being turns on the villain because their control wasn't as strong as they thought, and then the heroes have to clean up the mess of the now free and rampaging god or whatever.

Metrux

There are several reasons why this could be a bad idea, but this story isn't one of them. For starters, he isn't being summoned, but freed, and there is distinction in those stories (when Heroes summon Evil, they end up having to kill them, but when they free Evil most of the time the enemy ends up an ally, for example). What breaks it even more is that she doesn't treat him as a monster, god, or called being. She treats him as a ruler to ally, and then betray. Sure, not the best of stories, but not one inherently Evil in the books, and sometimes it even works. There is also the thing that she, herself, can be considered a god with minor g, and we all know that stories are different for those in that scale.

stevenneiman

She is very definitely not a god. She is a beloved ruler and the last noble of Winter. The Dead King might be a god but if he is it's basically secondary. And even if she's not quite magically binding him like the classic version, she's totally thinking that she can bring a horror with power beyond comprehension into the world and then control it well enough to benefit from its actions.

Of course, it's made even worse because she's just realized that he's way more knowledgeable about her than she realized.

Myatt

On the outside he may seem to be a monster but he seems to have an entire people that view him as savior and protector loyal citizens who don't see him as a monster at all I think that his country of the living isn't just for breeding soldiers but for some manipulation of stories if a crusade would have made it to his personal hell they are no longer fighting the armies of the dead but the savior of the people seems like it would derail a lot of attempts to get to him

Dylan Tullos

Big Brother:

The Dead King knows all about Cat, while she knows almost nothing about him. He's almost certainly aware that she plans to backstab him, and he's happy to negotiate with her anyway.

Imagine playing cards against someone who can see your entire hand, while you have no idea what they're holding. That's Catherine's position right now.

Big Brother

That's been Cat's position since before she became the Squire. Black's networks had a full dossier on her as a potential Hero recommending her death.

Akua was always more prepared and knowledgeable about what she could and couldn't get away with until Akua's Folly.

In matters of statecraft, Malicia has ALWAYS been more well informed, and used that knowledge to apply pressure so Cat couldn't leave Praes alone.

The Dead King is only the latest in the chain, and so doesn't really stand out to me as a risk from your point of view.

WuseMajor

The main difference is that everyone you just listed are pieces in the chess game being played between the Dead King and the Bard. From everything we've seen, he's really the only one old enough to actually have a shot at challenging her.

MetruX

That statement is wrong in several magnitudes... Yes, he's greater than they all, but he didn't influence any of those "pieces", and the bard only started to influence after Cat was the sole Squire, starting slow and only doing more later on. Yes, calernia is a strange game of chess, and they are all pieces, but for the gods, not for the bard and the dead king. The Bard influenced alot, but not everything.

d0m1n1c

"That's Catherine's position right now."

That's the position she believes herself in; we don't know that the Dead King isn't genuinely looking for an alliance. From what we know, it appears that both he and Triumphant benefited from their alliance; diplomacy doesn't need to be a zero sum game.

taliesinskye

I think whether an alliance with the Dead King can be genuine will come down to what the Dead King wants. If it's something Catherine can live with him having, then there's no need to stab him in the back. If he wants to do something that's a threat to everyone like conquering all of Procer or something, that's a big problem.

Ca$hMoney

What's wrong with Reverse Redlining? By golly, where do I sign?!

In this example the lender is Keter, low income neighbourhood being target is Callow, and the arbitrarily higher interest rates are "Do what I tell you to do or I will let Procer righteously murder you".

Dylan Tullos

Ca$hMoney:

Being righteously murdered by Procer is sounding better and better all the time.

Most of Callow will survive, which is not a likely outcome if the Dead King does manage to slip his leash and overrun Calernia.

Cicero

I reminds me of the old joke about why Mormons side with the evangelicals who hate them and would probably murder them if they could. (This is a historical fact, in the American South Mormons were often hunted and murdered by the KKK).

When asked why he sides with the evangelicals the Mormon answered:

"Well, on one side I got people who would like to murder me and all my family. On the other side I got people who want to teach my children to love sin more than God and thereby damn their souls to Hell for all eternity.

"On the one hand: death, on other: eternal damnation for my children. It's not a hard choice, I guess I'm gonna team up with the people who want to murder me."

RanVor

Except there's no such thing as righteous murder. There is only murder.

No matter their intentions, Procer attacked another country without provocation, and by doing so, opened the door to the horrors of war. It was a conscious decision of Cordelia Hasenbach, and all the blood is at least partially on her hands. There won't be a single atrocity inflicted on Procer they haven't brought on themselves.

Jane

Does she really have a choice? The Dead King really didn't leave her any openings. If she refused to come, it was pretty much certain that Callow would be crushed. Now that she has come, the Dead King can squish her like a bug if she tries to back out – or just leave Callow to die, it's not as though her circumstances are changed.

Her only choices at this point are "give up", which fundamentally goes against the nature of Named, or to shake the hand of an unfathomably dangerous creature who really, really, seems to want to make her his friend.

Big Brother

Hm. The Dead King actually runs a Necromantic Empire in a similar manner to how I'd described making one to my friends. I'm not sure if that speaks well or ill of my mind.

Euodiachloris

It's so far no worse than organ donation. I suspect those who volunteer get more perks than those who turn up trying to wreck the place.

taliesinskye

I'd almost be OK with him animating donated bodies into his Bones. Binding souls to them for all eternity sounds pretty evil though, even with volunteers.

Brian Heward

How is binding a willing soul to their own body evil? You are giving them a choice, extending their effective life, and not hurting anyone. The only difference is they get an after-life that's the same as their normal life instead of moving on to wherever souls go in this universe. (For some people that would be preferable, but it's hard to judge without knowing for sure what the alternative is.)

Do we know what happens to normal people who die on Calrnia?

ArkhCthuul

Indeed, and potentially even a more powerful modification of preexistent stories.

Just about everything in this chapter was as close to perfectly done as I can imagine.

Simply wow.

JJR

We still don't know enough about how things in the Dead Kingdom work at this point, For all we know Binds who wish to stop existing can petition the Dead King to unbind their souls, leaving their bodies as simple Bones.

The Revenants seem a bit more Evil in this regard. The Souls of Dead Heros forced to serve against their will, but they were trying to destroy the Dead King so it does seem less bad.

Soronel Haetir

It must be nice to have centuries or millennia to learn how to slap a nice coat of paint over the horrors. The Dread Emperors simply have never had enough time to discover that truth.

WuseMajor

This is a Kingdom that has traded freedom for the security of a despot. And, in the process, not ended up with several of the usual problems that come with that, because their despot is immortal, ferociously intelligent, and, apparently, not cruel.

Granted, based on what he's done before, it wouldn't surprise me at all if he murdered every living member of his kingdom if he decided to open another hell gate, but I don't think he'd do something capriciously.

There's also the question of whether you definitely get to have a second "life" as a Bind or if that's only for high ranking people. There's also the quality of that "life."

One assumes he arranges aptitude tests and things, so that people are placed where they are best suited because that's efficient and another way to control his populace. I really get the impression that this guy has read the evil overlord list. In some ways, he sounds like he could be what Black or Malicia would become, given another few hundred years to work. Which is scary on several levels.

Abrakadabra

Yup. The heavens are great at it tough. Good in Calernia has fantastic PR.

Someguy

There are no openings. Every move he makes ensures that there are no openings against him by Bard. But his existence and sovereignty as a backdrop, Bard can use that. This is more dangerous for Callow than I thought.

MetruX

Actually against Fate, not Bard itself. The thing with Bard is that she can't do anything herself, all she does is manipulate, lie and tell truths, so that other people do what must be done. Yes, she is scary because of her experience and the span of what she has influenced, and you should be wary of her... But she isn't the main enemy, and never will be. It's not in her Fate, because Fate is the main enemy. It's no mistake that we say he didn't leave openings, because she can't appear where she wants and do what she wants, thus if there isn't already a story forming, she can't do a thing. Also, like Cat mentioned, there is no fear of Heroes appearing in his kingdom, and that by itself makes it much easier, since even without the Bard having Heroes born could topple him.

PotatoMan

I have a deep distaste for the Dead King. He truly is a monster, good luck Cat!

Evgeny Permyakov

I dunno, he is probably one of the most successful rulers on Calrnia and his people are actually OK with him.

Dylan Tullos

Evgeny Permyakov:

The people he didn't murder are OK with him. Keep in mind that the Dead King used his own city as ritual fodder for his ascension.

Evgeny Permyakov

Please. How is it any different from what First Prince is doing now ?

Unorginal

Well, the current First Prince truly believes in a United People of Procer, an end to the internal strife and the advancement of good across the entire continent with a grand alliance. So very, very different in methods and drives. The Dead King just wants to de-seat true immortals and gods/join them and everything else feeds into that.

grzecho2222

Well there was a guy who believed in United People of his nation and wanted to end their troubles with grand alliance and he hated other nations and attacked east and wanted to get rid of a few nations and conquer others and talked about greater good and...

PotatoMan

The single person whom we have met whose job is literally to represent the country is ok with the Dead King. Hanno has access to memories of heroes from the Kingdom of the Dead, meaning that there has definitely been dissent inside in The Kingdom at some point. Taking our view of the Kingdom from an appointed interpreter is like taking our view of North Korea, a similarly ruled and isolated Kingdom, from it's own appointed interpreters.

The Dead King is also historically a master at crushing dissent and enslaving his own people, as well as tricking them into killing themselves. Literally everything he has done has been in an effort to increase his personal power, at any cost. I don't think giving the Dead King more power will lead to other Calernian nations being "successfully ruled" as it were.

All this means is that I am worried for Cat, for we have literally no idea why either The Bard or the Dead King want her there.

Evgeny Permyakov

>Hanno has access to memories of heroes from the Kingdom of the Dead, meaning that there has definitely been dissent inside in The Kingdom at some point.

A small amount of dissent is an inevitable consequence of free will.

>The single person whom we have met whose job is literally to represent the country is ok with the Dead King.

True, we have to get more. But it is a pretty strong initial indication.

>The Dead King is also historically a master at crushing dissent and enslaving his own people, as well as tricking them into killing themselves.

Just like what Hasenbah is attempting to emulate. And pretty every competent ruler wants to have.

=====

All in all, I see DK as a competent ruler and as such a person I would like to have on Cat's side. Of course, the only way to achieve it is a mutual co-dependence and this in turn might turn pretty ugly, so the consequences should be weighted carefully.

I also consider plot to betray DK a very dangerous thing as it might force Cat into Evil vs Evil plot, which would inevitably benefit Procer.

Anon

Why, oh why, oh why, would you leave Akua out of the box.

Giving her more credence as a story piece, when you have zero idea of what the dead king will be able to twist the story into, has next to zero positive benefits when compared to the risks at this point in time.

Hell, Cat's already admitted that the Dead King is on another level even compared to Black when it comes to setting up foolproof stories (save for having the Dead Kingdom be locked away until it's time for him to come out and rampage).

Dylan Tullos

Anon:

Akua is an expert in necromantic rituals and Hellgates. She can provide unique insight into the Dead King's magical accomplishments, and she's extraordinarily experienced in Villainous backstabbing.

Adjutant doesn't have much experience in diplomacy, Thief isn't particularly good at intrigue, Hierophant would get distracted by the Dead King's magical accomplishments, and Archer is, well, Archer. The only person who can possibly help Cat is Akua.

The sad fact is that Cat is very good at stabbing and terrible at negotiation. She needs help, and Akua is the only person with the knowledge and mindset to provide useful guidance.

MetruX

I think you're not reading the same story as me. Adjutant is almost a master diplomat, if only in mortal levels, and thief is the one responsible for all the intrigue in Cat's reign. Yes, Hierophant and Archer are useless to the negotiations, unless magic is involved, but Akua is not nearly the only person who can help her here.

Dylan Tullos

MetruX:

As you point out, Adjutant is used to working with mortal powers, not the powers of Hell. Diabolist is the expert on entities that exist outside of Creation. Thief is a capable schemer by Callowan standards, but Praesi are universally acknowledged as the leading experts in backstabbing and generally sneakiness, and Akua is nothing if not a paragon of Praesi Classic Evil.

Cat is dealing with an ancient sorcerer who specializes in necromancy and devil summoning. Akua is probably the greatest living expert in those two fields.

Rey d`Tutto

Not that Akua is technically alive...

Argentorum

The only good answer to Akua was to crush her phylactery and shred her soul immediately after her death. Anything else plays into her role in the story. Either she's changed up in the cloak as "the monster" which is dangerous for it's own reasons (and doubly so because she tried to make Cat *her* chained monster), or she's out and equally dangerous as a member of the woe.

So really, there's no stopping it, and Cat's backed into a corner so she can't even try to discard her out of hand. Really, it all comes down to how genuine Akua's feels about Cat (that we saw when she puppeted Cat's body vs the heroes) are. Because when Akua thought she had won, said that she was going to make Cat love her, so there's a chance, however small, that the same fate gets imposed upon Akua by reflection, and she becomes the devilish if subservient follower that she is pretending to be.

Or she breaks loose and kills all of their guys, but that's what Commander Shepard is for, I guess.

Javvies

I wonder – is reincarnation a thing in the Guideverse?
If so, might Cat be the reincarnation of Triumphant?

So many questions.

Also, Cat, it's been long enough that the sheets from Triumphant's day would have disintegrated, probably. Besides, it's a palace. No way they're going to reuse old sheets. For that matter, they might actually only use sheets once (at least for the dignitaries).

Agent J

And given how often they're graced by dignitaries – all of twice in untold millenia – even a niggardly king could stomach splurging on new sheets.

Argentorum

Even without Reincarnation, Cat's an orphan. Her being a bastard descendant of Triumphant how ever many generations down the line? Just impossible enough to be completely possible.

grzecho2222

Whole situation with Cats family is weird. We know that both Brandon and Kegan tried to look up her family and both came up with nothing which kinda creeped out Kegan somehow. We also know that there are magics that allow to check people family which were kinda established out of blue and never used again. And given how strong are Long Lost Family and Lost Legacy and Lost Heir as tropes that come hand in hand with Orphan Out of Nowhere it would be weird if hadn't become relevant at some point.

Yotz

'Bastard' as in 'out of wedlock'?
So, what if the dreaded Writhing Palace is just a temple, where Triumphant and Dead King exchanged their vows, and nine months later a child was born. Or several centuries later – time in Serenity wiggles around a bit. The Prodigal Child, true successor of both monarchies, who was deliberately lost in the mist of time to ward off the inevitable Intercession... Come to think of it, Dread King Robber has a nice ring to it, n'est-ce pas? The One Ring, that is...

Highwayman

Black sheets for the Black Queen; silk, not satin, and a hot water bottle between them to warm her feet

Gunslinger

Soooo she wants to betray this guy? Yeah that's not going to happen as planned

Yotz

It may just going to happen exactly as planned.
As planned by the Dead King, that is.

"Your sudden but inevitable betrayal folds nicely into the final stages of my master-plan. Your chaotic incursions aimed to disrupt my planning finally allowed me to push most stubborn of the gamepieces on their designated places, and all the players have now accepted their roles and dance to my tune. Thank you for rebelling against the system in exactly a way I have foreseen."

*ahd*

Is there a material difference between Akua being a loyal, useful and devoted minion for the rest of her time in Creation; and Akua always and everywhere acting exactly the same as she thinks a loyal, useful and devoted minion would act?

Because I just reread the Sixth Ranger entry in TV Tropes.

Jane

Slightly, mostly applying to things like what she's capable of doing under mind control and what is revealed by truth spells.

Practically, though... Kind of. If she's faking, she won't be insulted by how everyone else distrusts her, and they'll feel justified in doing so. If it's genuine, that would actually be hurtful, and make the rest of the Woe almost jerks (only almost, though, since they're perfectly entitled to dislike her after all she's done). It could affect the nature of any narratives unfolding around them.

Outside of that, though, personally, I don't think her reasons matter much so long as the "always and everywhere" part holds true. Which it will, if she's smart, as we know she is. But if some really, truly tempting bait were dangled in front of her... Then yeah, her reasons suddenly become very important.

*ahd*

All very true.

True resurrection into a body with the Gift, maybe?

Darkening

They could maybe stuff her into a zombie body, but remember, Resurrection is only for Heroes. Villains just get to cheat death, and Akua is happily doing that right now. Cat stealing an angel's power is the kind of thing that was supposed to be impossible, and was heavily dependent on both the scenario and her coming into her aspect of Take. Just like heroes pulling tricks out of the box with a new aspect at the perfect time, that first dramatic use of an aspect has benefits for villains, too. That would be incredibly difficult to reproduce, not least because they don't have access to an angel feather.

ahd

Heroes. True.

Redemption story! (:

Akua Sahelian, Wizard of the West?

shieldredblog

She could however rip a resurrection Aspect out of a hero and use it. That's a thing she can do.

burdi

it really looks like when Black offering her to become his apprentice, awe and surprise of how much he know about her. then come the explanation that very logic and convincing just like what Black did back then and the offer that impossible to reject because sound so good. The Dead King is truly beyond The Black Knight league, so it is impossible that he will threatening catherine because its stupid, useless and do disservice to alliance that he proposed whatever proposal that he cooked it will be very good that cat will have no reason to not accept it

Metrux

She is already backed in a situation where she accepts him or defeat, and he seems like the smart kind who leaves no openings whatsoever, so... This will probably not only be good for her, but something she desperately needs, or that he thinks she needs, anyway.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

The creatures that are wreathed in doom and despair, that gnaw on the bones of the dead and alive alike, and reap the souls of man, must now carry my luggage.

Yotz

"Oh, hi there, Neshamah!"

"Athal."

"Whatever you say, Athal, whatever you say..."

Decius

The Dead King is dissatisfied with his title; wishes to upgrade to Dead Emperor, ruling over the Black King of Praes and the Black Queen of Callow, and in unsteady trading neutrality with the Dread Empress. Also, he is willing to give Callow and Praes all of the autonomy they want.

Tek

Wow. So, I'm a little confused, does he grant second life to everyone, or only to volunteers? Or they should deserve such a privilege?

Honestly, I don't see him as Villain. For all I care, granting immortality, even in exchange for some mere centuries of service is a great deal. He gives protection, peace, stability and an immortal life. It's like an utopic dictatorship (and yes, I am aware of irony here). Clearly, the Hells and demons, and undead abominations take some getting used to, but isn't the same with orcs, and goblins, and we already know they are not that bad, some occasional cases of cannibalism and backstabbing aside. He might as well genuinely believe that undeath is better than death, and benevolently trying to save mortals from their nature and Gods cruel designs.

And his "invasions"? He demanded some thousands of newborns a year, back in time, but wasn't that a mercy? An attempt to save them from live full of sorrow, and false promises, and untimely end? He was a Good guy all along!

Back in time I remember my own concept of semiutopic undead country, in which all citizens are undead, while retaining their consciousness. Because undeath is such a superior state of being. You are immortal, presumably can even survive a destruction of your body (as a ghost, after which you can occupy another body, which, with a little reshaping, illusions, and maybe plastic surgery would be just like your old one), or if you don't like your looks (or even your body's gender), you can switch onto another! And if you're feeling experimental, you can haunt a body of an animal or an object, if you are into that kind of stuff.

You don't need to breathe, eat, drink, pee, poop, or sleep, which gives you so much needed free time, and frees you from spending so many resources on ultimately doomed task – keeping your body alive. All the while, with a little bit of magic tinkering, you can retain a sense of smell and taste, a pleasure from sexual intercourse, or even acquire a brand new set of completely original senses. If you always wanted to have echolocation – wait no more.

The only downside of being differently alive is inability for child birth – but nobody pushing you! You can become immortal by the age of sixty, really, like a very good pension plan, that actually does not hope that you will die before getting it! And by that point you can't carry a child either way. But if you are male – some innovative cooperation with a Black Queen allowed us to freeze your sperm, so that you can still impregnate your living concubine, while being in your six hundreds!

I actually really want Dead King to turn up being genuinely enamoured with the concept of undeath, and just wishing that he, and his citizens (who are at least still conscious), to be recognized as legitimate nation, and not monsters, and peacefully promote the method of eternal life to each and everyone wanting. And once everyone become aware of just how much fun is being undead, there will be no shortage of volunteers! Honestly, I'm a little disappointed that I've yet to see a necromancer spreading the undeath by promoting it as an universal cure and an elixir of immortality, which it is! Put a positive spin on things, and people would beg you to turn them into alternatively alive.

So why wait to become your true self – your undead self? Join our swelling ranks today, for an eternity of happiness! Furthermore, if you will contact your nearby official branch of Guild of Necromancy in the next twelve hours, you can get a standard pact of undeath plus a bonus for ten first conscripted for a whopping 1.99 ducats! Be undead today, or be dead tomorrow, with a help of Abominable Sorceries Ltd.

burdi

it will not look so promised when you realised that being undead mean giving complete control of you to whoever make you the undead. whenever they want to take control over you

TeK

Oh yeah, fair point, and you are also very weak to all that is holy. On the other hand, you can't be stabbed, feel pain, get illness, and with a little soul tinkering you can be controlled even while being alive by a good mage and to top it off you probably still going to die!

An alive human is a slave to so many things, death, illnesses, nobles, money, public opinion. Your actions are not really your own. Yes, you may be enslaved as an undead. But you can also be enslaved while being alive! The risk is certainly there, but a risk of temporary enslavement (a couple of centuries, not much) is outpaced by a virtual certainty of encountering almost uninterrupted chain of astonishing suffering, which you usually call life. And yes, you can ignore all unpleasant things and live in willful ignorance, as most do, but you can do the same as an undead, and you still will be better off!

TeK

You are saying that somehow you trade your freedom for the undeath, as if you have said freedom. But you do not! Undeath is what sets you free, from so many shackles placed upon you by a cruel twists of fate, from pain, from suffering, from death, indeed.

I'm not saying you should trade your life for an unlfe right away. Give it time. Get old. Suffer from pain, weakness, start to lose parts of who you are to a merciless grip of time, get to the point where you'll wish for deaths sweet release. And if then presented at the option of abandoning pain, crippelness, you would not balk at it. Or, in the prime of life, get hit by a cart, or your arms and legs chopped of at the battlefield to which you got herded like a cattle, because some silkpants princeling payed big men with swords to make you go. Suffer a mortal illness, md then, when presented with this option, you will not hesitate.

A notion of abandoning your freedom is absurd, if you care to look past you prejudices and think.

Metrux

Freedom is not the part that gets me, here, it is the why and how. No one, NO ONE, would give immortality to everyone without side benefits for him, especially because there are many scenarios in which his ending is bad, more so in a world like that of the Guide, where Fate itself molds stories. There is the uprising, the coming of a new master, the religious conquering, the lying despot, the descending of divinity... Really, there is simply no way for this undeath to exist for more than a couple generations as a utopia. Which is why the Dead King didn't create a Utopia.

Yotz

Given that Hells give while not a infinite but still very large space for expansion, the immortality may be granted to very large chunk of the currently living population – that, and if it is seen as a blessing, than only most devoted, loyal, and gently bred people get to be fully sentient after the Second Birth – it's a privilege, not a right. All other will be used as spare parts and sustenance – just like we do with hospitals for the former, and graveyards for the latter. Yes, we prefer to beautify the process, but the bare bones of it remains the same – a nutrient cycle is a nutrient cycle, however you cut it. With the y'm-bhi caste freeing the living from the manual labor, the Dead guarding them from the outside threats, and the living solely devoting their lives to science and culture, it as close to Utopia as it can get. Or, rather, to the City of Sun, with patriotism engineering and mandatory eugenic program dressed as a religious practices and all. Not that it would be bad, necessary. Au contraire, this will create a very stable, healthy, and blooming society, functionaly indistinguishable from proverbial Malkuth haShamayim. Which is the main benefit for the King, of course, for in this case he'll remain to be the King for the very long time indeed. Probably to the Age of Iron Stars, and mayhaps longer – to the point of entering The New Loom as an in-built Adversary, or even pulling a Nagash and creating a new world by himself (with a little help from the Triumphant, the Black Queen, the Intercessor, and some others).

Being constrained by the nature of World's Story is another thing, though, I'll grant you that. This may be the reason for them to stay in ~~K'n-yan~~Serenity, outside of Creation main Loom, only showing their hand when the Story allows them to without drastic repercussions. As in – the Great Patriotic War against foreign vandals from Procer, uniting all the people under the Kind, and affirming their unbreakable bonds once again.

Yotz

...typos, my worst enemy – we meet again...
>:{

TeK

When it comes to the subject of motivation – pride is a thing. Building an Utopia is an enourmous achievement in and on itself, and some prideful beings will be inclined to pursue a subject (and someone THAT blasphemous have to be prideful). I long waited to segue into recommending Overlord as a stark example of “basically Dead King” building an utopia, just cause he wants to.

As for a failsafe measures – some backdoors will have to be established. And Names come from cultural background. Orks had been broken, and so, don't produce Named anymore (well, not technically anymore), it's plausible to create a society that does not create Named, because it does not need Named (there are no stories and conflinct, given the existence of Deus Ex Machina).

Yotz

Overlord...

Well, Momon certainly wants to build an Utopia, but the semblance is superficial at best, imo. For one, Dead King has no need to keep his underlings in “killing humans is wasteful” mindset, while titular Overlord acts as mere puppet of circumstances. He often is forced to sacrifice innocent people not to further the cause of building an Utopia – of which goal Momon has no idea until he was forced into it by the Jaldabaoth – but because he fears the possibility of his minions going haywire otherwise. Dungeon Keeper Ami have actually worked with that premise in far more deep and thoughtful way despite being a step away from crack-fiction, imo. Also, I'm inclined to say that DKA done it first, but both DKA and Overlord have started sometime during 2010, afaik, and I can't place the dates exactly – add to that that there probably was much more works in that stead written long before both of them, so...

Secondly, Neshamah portrayed as a ruthless genius strategist, while Momon is forced to play pretend one because even in Yggdrasil he was a lame no-skill scrub. He literally bought his way into successes – and same can be said about all former members of Ainz Ooal Gown. His only saving grace is that miserable microscopic bit of compassion he has, which regularly gets overruled by his fear. Speaking of which – so far I'm getting the vibes of “I'm the one things that scare things-that-go-bump-in-the-night are terrified of” from the ruler of Keter.

And last, but by far not least – main reason that denies me even a possibility of drawing parallels between Overlord and anything at all, is Overlord being of brainless marysuetopian harem lit-RPG breed. And buck that shite, smite it with Hammer That Smashes Suns, and banish it to Tartarus for Eternity and beyond! Where is the Shadow Of The Black Horse gads about when you need him?!

In conclusion, Overlord is overrated, and I deeply despise that detestable heap of degenerocity.

Cicero

Overlord is blatant wish fulfillment fantasy. For wish fulfillment fantasy its actually pretty good, but it's still blatant wish fulfillment fantasy, which tends to mean it's not very good when compared to more general fiction.

As for the more general “hero forced to pretend to be a villain” trope like in DKA, I'm sure there are earlier examples, but of the top of my head Snape is the only one that comes to mind. I'm sure there must be older than dirt examples though... does Hamlet count?

RanVor

The wish fulfilment aspect is inherent to the isekai genre and, to some extent, to fantasy in general. I'm not really sure how does that invalidate anything.

Cicero

Actually, wish fulfillment is not inherent to the isekai genre, which is actually a much much older genre (referred to as "Voyage and Return" in the list of 7 basic plots). Alice in Wonderland is essentially an isekai genre, yet it is not wish fulfillment in the way Overlord, or many of the modern Japanese isekai stories are. (There are also some stories in the modern Japanese isekai genre that are not wish fulfillment – such as Re:Zero).

Nor is fantasy in general wish fulfillment – I mean, is Lord of the Rings wish fulfillment?

No, Overlord is wish fulfillment because it's protagonist is so very very powerful that there is no real external conflict worth writing about. He's powerful, able to do whatever cool thing he wants to do. Additionally, he's a villain protagonist, and not in the tormented pragmatically trying to save her people way like Cat is. He slaughters thousands of people and turns them into an undead army. Instead of being punished for his evil actions he instead is rewarded. He is a horror and terrifying to any right thinking human.

The reason it's well written compared to most wish fulfillment is that at least there is quite a bit of internal conflict in Overlord, as he tries to decide what to do and how to do it. Still, the fact that he ends up taking the easier route of mass slaughter instead of peaceful co-existence is ultimately disappointing, and makes the story pure wish fulfillment.

Euodiachloris

Yup. Prime example: The Odyssey. There's wish-fulfilment going on in that whole epic travelogue with fantastical elements, but also a massive helping of "be careful what you wish for". As well as "don't piss gods off".

Heck, go back a bit further: Gilgamesh. Includes the classic trip to the underworld, being offered the love of the cosmos' most attractive female denizen who can and will grant the mortal man who loves her great power (beware that, by the way) and everything Campbell holds dear.

Isekai has its place in the world, but me... I go Ancient School. Give me the shaggy dog, the subverted, the bittersweet, the downright “that’ll learn ya” yarn. You know... One Punch Man. 😊

RanVor

On the contrary, the wish fulfilment is the truest core of fantasy, which itself is nothing else than a manifestation of humanity’s longing for things that are not true. Everything else is just an icing on the cake. In this light, yes, the Lord of the Rings, Re:Zero and a Practical Guide to Evil are all built around wish fulfilment. I could expand this reasoning to all fiction, but it’s too much of a bother.

I do not regard Overlord as a pinnacle of good writing, but in my opinion, it is written well enough for its primary purpose, which is to entertain.

grzecho2222

Heroes of Might and Magic 4 from 2002 had Gauldoth Half-Dead as necromancer that tries to create good nercomantic nation and whole thing is genius.

Not\_a\_robot

Cat was undead for a while, back before she stole her resurrection. It sucked. She couldn’t feel a thing, she felt her mind ossify, and there wasn’t anything that made (un)life worth (un)living anymore. Mortality is exactly what makes life worth it imho.

TeK

To be fair, she had her undeath crafted by, while a skilled mage, not an expert necromancer. When skillfull plumber fucked up fixing a roof, who’s to blame? Plus, her undeath was a haphazard solution, and the possibility of giving her senses and feelings was not on the table, since the plan from the start was to resurrect her, not make her undeath comfortable. Plus, many of mages efforts were directed at others, more pressing matters, such as containings an army of devils and a Demon.

So yeah, not really an argument. She didn’t gave an undeath a fair try. But you can! Sign up today. Our necromancers are top-notch and we provide a reason to exist free of charge!

TeK

Also, saying that mortality is what amles live worth living is like saying that carcraash is a reason to get a car.

MetruX

This is a logical fallacy, but I can't be bothered to remember which one. Just see for this: mortality is not the end, death is the end, mortality is a state, thus your logic is flawed.

TeK

Nope, my choice of words was incorrect. I meant "the possibility of getting into a carcraash". Now, you may argue that possibility is not a state, but at this point I just ran into the limit of my English speaking abilities. So if you still don't get what I'm getting onto, feel free to say so.

Yotz

Mortality is a sin.

MetruX

Well, we already know he isn't like that, from the past we've seen. But more than that, someone with those ideas would have to be delusional, and this kind of madness doesn't survive for long when Heroes are around, so I can't see him being anywhere near that.

TeK

Now, I did not argue is like that, I said that I want him to be like that. And your turn of phrase "someone with those ideas would have to be delusional, and this kind of madness" is plainly insulting. I hope you will retain your good manners in the future, while conversing with anyone else. Clearly, I somehow managed to hit a painful subject.

TeK

Scratch that, I clearly overreacted. And I'm sorry.

werafdsaew

In a world where heaven exists (because Angels exists), immortality isn't as useful, especially if it comes with side effects.

TeK

Nope. Afterlife is theorised, not established. I will quote EE himself on the matter:

"As for the Heavens/Hells that's a more complicated issue. Technically the Hells is where the devils are and the Heavens is where the angels are, in a physical sense. Good and Evil cultures believe that their souls go to their respective Gods after they die, unless angels/devils have a claim to them, but no one has ever passed on to the other side and remembered what was there so there's still a degree of uncertainty. Faith would be a pretty meaningless concept if the afterlife was a physical certainty."

Yotz

Hear, hear!

On the sidenote – even if Afterlife exists, there is no way be sure that you will become there, or describe it in mortal terms. What if Heaven's endgame is just an endless ocean of Light which absorbs and dissolves everything that was you, while its counterpart is just weeping and gnashing of teeth in the lone endless darkness? Are you ready to accept one or another just because you are afraid to bend Fate to your liking?

grzecho2222

Gauldoth Half-Dead would finally have some to relate to. Good Guys necromancers are very rare.

TeK

Yeah, prejudice is a frightening thing.

Yotz

That's a name you won't hear often...
Though I wouldn't be so sure to declare the Dead King even Ambiguously Good. Comparison with Sandro seems far more apt in this case.

grzecho2222

Well he is not running around with any OP pls nerf artifacts and annoying everybody.

Dakem

Maybe the Dread King is one of the first practical evils in the world and build an undead utopia away from the meddling hands of above and below... Which the Bard countered by 1000 years of bad PR to unseat him or at least isolate him from allies. This in turn would also explain why the Bard works so hard against Cat and Black. In that light, may she never return is a perfect branding to destroy your opponents reputation e.g. Trumps crooked Hilary campaign.

Dylan Tullos

Dakem:

The Dead King murdered his people to become a god. That's the source of his "bad PR".

I don't understand why people keep thinking that "evil" is somehow a good idea. The Dead King is practical, certainly, but he's also willing to kill huge numbers of people so that he can be immortal. That's not the action of someone who views other lives as valuable or important.

TeK

Funny, how killing for greater good is really only legitimate when the Good Guys do it. It's not like killing few to save many is not a trope in and on itself... But, all pretence aside, it's quite obvious that Dead King is not a secretly benevolent being. But it would be really cool if he was.

Cicero

Except the Dead King did not kill a few to save the many, he killed many to save himself, the one.

I mean... dude, I know the "Good Guys" in this story are more morally grey than in most fiction, but it's pretty clear to me that I'd much rather be buds with the Grey Pilgrim than the Dead King. Dead King is much, much more likely to be willing to kill me to serve his own greater purposes than the Grey Pilgrim, no matter how close of friends we are.

NZPIEFACE

Now that I think about it, doesn't Cat have the potential to have an infinite army of undead that's completely sapient?

Tohron

Not infinite – it's been stated several times that larger numbers place greater strain on her mind, especially if she tries to direct them to any significant extent.

Yotz

Just wait till she invents Object-Oriented Necromancy and Hierophant starts to work on the Abominable Intelligence project...

JJR

Those both sound like they'd get a paddling from the Gnomes.

Agent J

Not at all. It's been stated rather definitively that the gnomes give zero fucks about what you do with magic. It's scientific advancement that they're genocidally serious about preventing.

JJR

No one really knows what the Gnomes are on about. We see this in the chapter where Warlock gets a look at Pickler's repeating scorpions. He isn't sure if they'll draw attention and has very little idea as to what the criteria for drawing attention is.

Also, Object Oriented Necromancy, if it's anything like object oriented programming is probably too close to technology to let slide. A computer made out of undead is still a computer after all.

Agent J

I'd still be pressed to disagree. Praes has gotten two tickets. One for gunpowder and the other for fiddling with chemicals. They're against the proliferation of scientific understanding.

Warlock's ponderings were about how much science was too much science. Pickler is a hypercompetent engineer. She's at the frontier of siege machines, meaning there's no precedent for her creations. Very dangerous territory to be in. If she crosses the undefined line, the next letter is the final one.

As for whether a computer out of undead would a problem, we just have to look at Cat's favourite tool to find precedent. Goblin fire is basically napalm made from devils. If they got a letter for gunpowder, one would assume napalm would also get them lettered. Not so, apparently, as long as it's made through alchemical means rather than chemistry.

I say that to say this; we do know what the gnomes are on about. We don't know why or what the parameters are, but we do know what. The enforced limitation of scientific understanding.

grzecho2222

I think that pig-dragons mixed with Winter Necromancy have bigger chance of becoming relevant, because with how often they pop up it would be strange if they did not have some kind of conclusion

Euodiachloris

Flying munitions.... When you need a kamikaze run with a side of guided missile/ drone. May include both dragon-, demon- and icefire along with ops. Might blow up before reaching target. Ask your nearest Monstrous Abomination™ for further details. Do not ask for refunds or compensation.

NZPIEFACE

Don't her zombies improve automatically by themselves though?

Antony444

Well...I think it is best for the Woe to assume the Dead King knows EVERYTHING before going to the audience.

I would have said before the 'invitation' he was not aware how Cat is Winter but this was disproved. These 'Journeyman' must really be good, for neither Black nor Malicia and certainly not Cornelia noticed them. I know they aren't looking like the agents of an undead abomination (since they're alive) but it's still an intelligence triumph.

Now we see the fate of the Procerans who fell in the different Crusades against the Dead King. Enslaved for all eternity by their enemy, I believe they really wish they had not gone against him. And the Lone Swordsman may have not glorified the White Knight of the Seventh Crusade so much if he was made aware of the fate of all those commanders and Named who are unable to challenge the orders of the King of Death.

The Dead King has style, I am forced to grant him that. Use the ancestor of Cordelia Hasenbach as a carrier for the palanquin, mute and with a crown on his head...no doubt he will wish to increase his 'collection' in the war to come.

As said by Ranger in her interlude, you can't enter Keter by Arcadia. This is really a bastion I see no easy way to conquer. The land is dead, the air is poisoned, the only accesses are the bridges and you will be under bombardment by the wyverns. There are probably more undead soldiers in this city than there are inhabitants of Callow. The walls are too tall, there will be undead heroes and as long as the King is intact and Hell not invaded, he can replenish his losses faster than you, because after all for his people he's the Good Guy.

And now Cat is offered the same Palace as Triumphant...this promises more epic chapters next week, for sure.

Darkening

I suppose the dwarves would be the best option for conquering the place if they were willing to give it a concerted effort and tunnel into the city rather than sealing it all off with molten iron. We know they're pretty militarily powerful, though we don't know how magically adept they are. They seem pretty self interested though, and they don't really have a reason to see the dead king as a threat as long as procer keeps him contained and they have his region of the underdark sealed off.

Metruux

That made me wonder something that never came into questioning before: are the dwarves Good? And the Gnomes? The Elves we know are, both versions of them, but we never heard of the dwarves, especially since we know Praes is the only nation that doesn't uses the dwarvish war machines, which means other Evil nations use them aswell.

erraticerrata

The Gnomes don't sit down for Q&A sessions, so that's an unknown. The dwarves, as the major power of the continent, ran into the same problem most large nations on other continents have – when you get a large enough kingdom, it's inevitable that both villains and heroes are going to pop up regularly. Their long-standing difficulties in making that work are one of the major reasons they're not very involved with surface affairs.

Euodiachloris

Something to keep in mind: he may or at not have deliberately shaped his kingdom's culture and views over millennia with carefully applied propaganda and tales.

Also, the Bard may or may not have shaped the rest of the continent's cultures and views against the Kingdom of the Dead (bet they don't call themselves that) over millennia with carefully shaped propaganda and tales. Even in Praes.

Cicero

Actually I think the greater danger is assuming the Dead King knows things he does not, and thus inadvertently revealing them to him.

He knows more than he ought to, be he's not omniscient.

Evgeny Permyakov

>"It is so named for it had remained closed and untouched since its last and only guest," Athal explained. "You would know her as the Dread Empress Triumphant."

Wait-wait-wait. For real? I mean, is Dead King actually trying to force Triumphant's story upon Cat ? That... has potential. Both good and ugly.

RanVor

The Dead King becomes scarier by the chapter.

Remember to vote for Guide:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Euodiachloris

Cat is pretty damned scary, as well. Never forget: she turned herself into an undead-wielding construct with mega ice powers and telespam abilities who has a hefty body count of her own. And, she's only recently started playing this game.

By Bantu-tales standards, she's a kind of Tokoloshe Queen of Darkness and Cold – who made herself that way. That ain't good; being within spitting distance of the Demon Queen of Tokolshes is... a bit morally iffy (as in, 'working to end the very nature of reality' kinds of iffy).

grzecho2222

I would say that she shapes up to Morvena/Marzanna Queen/Goddess of Winter and Death since she is horrifying but neutral and won't do anything to you as long as you don't bother her and mostly sits and does nothing outside of bringing and taking away winter. That would also have interesting implications since Sorcerous and Dead King seem like Evil takes on Twardowski and Kosciel and would suggest that there might be Weles in some form in story.

Euodiachloris

Cat and the Demon Queen have one big thing in common: wanting to stick two fingers up at the established hierarchy (the Gods Below and Above) and to break the existing world order. This is almost the African-style Order/Tradition/Law vs Chaos/Anarchy/Oblivion. Except, in this tale... Order may not be good, and Chaos may not necessarily mean complete oblivion with its changes. 😊

grzecho2222

In slavic myths it even wierder since in them humans, dragons, shapeshifters and hybrids of them are the forces of Chaos since all of them are children/creations of god Weles who is kind of mix of Loki, Hades and Athena and kinda jerk and troll to the most of other gods, but is always on side of his children/creations. The Big Conflict is more of Orderly, Stagnant World Vs Endless Progress.

Morvena is in this whole debacle neutral and mostly wants other gods to leave her and her people alone.

frolamiz

Yeah, the more we learn about The Dead King, the more it become apparent everyone is greatly underestimating him despite being seen as the biggest threat of the continent. Except for The Wandering Bard, but she herself is the expert at being underestimated.

It's also interesting that according to the Host, there are no other guests. I was half expecting Malicia to have already sent a body double.

WuseMajor

If Malicia had any idea this was going down, she'd probably be plotting with Hasenbach to stop it.

tweid

Man, the Dead King runs a tight ship. You gotta admire the man's diligence. Then again, he's had, what, hundreds? thousands? of years to set it up, so there's that.

Hopefully he's not interested in crushing Catherine under his heel, at least not immediately. I think it's safe to say that's a fight she couldn't win right now.

crescentsickle

In b4 the Dead King is all like "Hey Cat. Kudos on breaking fate and all that. Breaking, re-forging, and then divesting a transitory Name was a nice touch. Bonus points for it being a neutral Name.

"Now, I know you think you're here because of Procer's Crusade, and we'll get to that, but I need you to break the entire system the Gods have going on, and I'm going to take care of some of your problems so you can focus on that."

Dylan Tullos

crescentsickle:

The last people who accepted the Dead King's "help" served as ritual fodder for his ascension to godhood.

shieldredblog

Last person he helped that we know of is actually Triumphant. As far as we know, there was no betrayal there.

Also, I think the whole point of his philosophy is that he is not a classical villain at all. He didn't betray his people, Didn't start the war or aid the enemy. The only things he was guilty of during his rise to power were, not committing completely to his country's defenses.

If he'd turned traitor or tried to trick them, he would have been showing the kind of plot weakness that the Bard exists to exploit. All he did was offer just the amount of help that inevitably led to them growing desperate and dependent enough on him that they'd agree by to the Ritual.

---

> He didn't betray his people, Didn't start the war or aid the enemy.

Except, if I'm understanding the dialogue between him and Bard correctly, he started the plague in the first place to build up sacrificial weight, bait the people of the wolf into attacking and later control the course of the campaign by increasing the amount of victims in the invaded areas. Add to that the fact that the defensive nature of the campaign (i. e. walls being the only thing that could hold back the invaders) meant that the ashkarans' performance depended heavily on the magical support (for which the rituals were provided by none other than Neshamah himself) and "not committing completely to his country's defenses" becomes just one of the many strings that ensured he had full control over the situation – and that he bears the brunt of responsibility for it.

Frankly, I'm not sure how exactly starting a magical plague for an elaborate mass-sacrifice left the Intercessor no openings that would allow to expose him. The anti-Bard measures we've seen so far include culturally enforced voluntary acceptance of undeath (which doesn't exactly stop heroes from popping up now and then, as evidenced by Hanno having memories of the kingdom's practices), making her misread the situation (which is what their whole dialogue was about, but that wouldn't prevent her from taking any action at all) or playing out this part of the story between the characters other than the ones she's currently attached to (but it's not universal, since she still was able to hop around Marchford when Akua and Catherine had their struggle).

Speck of Stardust

due note that the bard only showed up after he did most of the heavy work, as she herself stated if she had gotten involved sooner she could have pull shit on him but all in all she didn't have an opening by the time she got involved.

shieldredblog

Huh, forgot about the plague thing.

I guess it a unpredictable Evil opening move followed by careful decade long management of the situation.

Got to wonder why the Bard didn't try to out him. Perhaps it just wouldn't have made any difference. His people were dead without him at that point anyway.

Helirous

It has been noted that he always let someone else take the lead role until the end. I guess that limited the possible interventionpoints for the bard.

Sol Invictus

"Save for those of the Writhing Palace, were none trespass."

That, I decided, did not sound like a place I ever wanted to visit.

—

yup where definitely going to see the inside now

superkeaton

The more I learn about DK, the more fond I grow of him.

I might steal this entire location for a D&D game.

Euodiachloris

Carving a home in Shawdowfell. Or... hello, Mists. Wouldn't it be funny if he weren't the Darklord, but everybody thinks for ages that he is (and most of the play goes ahead with that in mind)? However, a certain fallen Paladin (not a cut-mod-and-paste Elena Faith-hold, Darklord of Nidala, honest), who happens to aid the party on and off/ shoves them at fetch quests that look significant, is still convinced she is fighting the Good fight against the Undead Lich King... except, dude just wanted peace and quiet and is maintaining True Neutral like its going out of style (even juggling that setting's messed-up karma meter with aplomb) , despite being stuck two doors over and across the block (plus change) from Castle Ravenloft... Heck, you have the option of adding some refugee Shadow Fae in the mix! Could make one hell of a game while the party tries to figure out what the bleeding heck is going on (and how to survive it) after being served plenty of the snark hunt with herring sauce special. 😊

Myatt

About akua anyone else think that cat has basically bestowed a winter title on her in every way but giving her an actual title?

Javvies

It's possible. Also, at this point Akua is probably closer to being one of the Fae than human – her physical body can be destroyed or maimed, but I'm pretty sure that Cat could just reform Akua's body back to spec more or less whenever she (Cat) felt like it.

It's also worth noting that Winter titles/empowerment could potentially be used as an alternative to Above/Below granted Named/Blessed.

If the only way to win is not to play ... a third option for getting Named- level power could be very useful.

Nada

Ok really Catherine there is a time for joking around and a time to be serious. Why is she still acting like a dumb frat boy at a party? Her thoughts were so frivolous that I have to wonder if she's being mentally effected by something? Is she going to be all like 'bruh nice fortress, send out the laaddies and the dooods'' when she meets the Dead King? I have to admit to being put off with her levity in this chapter.

eatenbypie

Honestly this is all kinda silly to debate, there have been more than enough hints given that his interest is Akua not Cat, and the recent focus on her development only supports that. His motives are fairly clear, the question is will Cat be able to accept Akua becoming his queen in exchange for support.

Quin

If it comes to a question between games of fate and games of dice there are two things in common. The task of knowing the odds are against you and are probably rigged... And trying to cheat back.

For Cat the odds are set with a nation of 'heroes' out for her blood not for goodwill or righteous intention... But to treat her as English excuse for invasion. she can fight until enough bodies pull up where she bleeds both her nation and the others dry until some band of heroes from to kill the black queen who slaughtered so many innocents (because soldiers who died fighting against evil count as innocent)

The tower is using her nation as a shield and may betray them if it suits them while the heroes are there to chop up her land and make them servants while sending the oldest as present levies to be slaughtered by higher threats.

Oddly enough the undead king seems to be the nicest one around as he is also the only one not gunning for her head of her land. she knows the horrors that he can bring forth... But that's just it in the end.

At his worst he will slaughter thousands, kill millions, and leave a burning hope within the crusade... But he will not attack them because he NEEDS them. Slaughter well be horrible... But they will not be dead.

Also anyone else find it funny that Cat is getting near five years? Five like the greatest threat that ruled them all because she fought for her nation and was considered abnormal by their own standard?

The tower celebrates every villain and have loved every crime done by them, but not the one that actually won? How big was the big bad?

Aston

Three things.

One: The Dead King is not actually Evil or Named. People just assume that.

He's beyond that.

Two: Athal is actually the Dead King.

Three: Thank you so much for not having any this world was made through science stuff.

You're a brilliant author.

Mirvra Wynter

Huh... Zombie is an undead alicorn that's persevered where her kin did not... And she's growing sassy o.o

I guess Cat will at least have Blackjack when she builds her own tower XD She'll have to find some hookers somewhere though...

burguulkodar

I'm quite enjoying this tour through Keter. There should be a lot to see and to learn in there. Magnificent sights, even beyond Ater's Tower.

The Dead King (for what I've seen of him) seems an educated, interesting fellow, though perhaps a bit too dry, although maybe that was only towards the Bard. I'm waiting to see. And I can't but respect the way he organized his kingdom, making his followers accept and even seek the bestowal of undeath.

Levi Kalden

The kingdom of the dead greatly reminds me of MATRIX. It has a similar moral conundrum.

---

Chapter 34: Abyss

"You could gather the stuff of all the Hells and still find less Evil within than lies in the soul of a single man. The worst monsters are always those that chose to be."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

"So," I said, "before we get into it. What are the odds that Athal is our good friend the Hidden Horror wearing someone's face?"

I couldn't exactly say I suspected that because it was what I'd do – though if Masego was to be believed, I was technically wearing a people cloak courtesy of Winter at all times – but come on. Of course the friendly servant 'gifted' to me was going to be a trap. Sure, it was possible Neshamah considered himself above those kind of shell games. People who murdered kingdoms for power did tend to have very particular notions about their importance and what they would lower themselves to do. On the other hand, it was becoming painfully clear that we had no fucking idea what the Dead King was really up to.

"I find it unlikely," Akua said.

The Woe and the murderer – the one not part of the Woe, I supposed it was necessary to clarify – weren't nearly enough to fill out the absurdly large bedchamber that had been given to me. It was larger than the entire Rat's Nest had been, and furnished so richly if Robber had been around I might have considered looking away while he got sticky fingers. Pawning the stuff in Mercantis could have probably earned me enough to equip a few hundred legionaries.

"Possession would be difficult, if not outright impossible," Masego conceded. "Bespelling the man for control is a different matter. It is not impossible anything his senses come across will be extracted and sifted through afterwards."

"I hear one for mind control and soul cutting," I said, putting a jaunty tone to my rising horror. "Anyone else feeling like putting their silver at work?"

"I bet he put some kind of fucked up devil bug in the man's brain," Archer mused. "You know, one he can look through?"

"One reason I'm glad I don't really sleep anymore, straight into the pot," I added, openly sickened. "I'm waiting on the rest of the gallery for counteroffers."

"I'd be surprised if there weren't enchantments everywhere taking our conversations straight to the Dead King," Vivienne noted. "Athal himself might simply be a red herring."

My eyes flicked to Hierophant, who shrugged.

"There are no active wards I recognize, save those surrounding the city and the Hall of the Dead," he said. "Though everything in Keter seems touched by sorcery to an extent. The protections I set around us should be sufficient to prevent eavesdropping, or at least very difficult to breach without my awareness."

"Reasonable paranoia, making three," I sighed. "Hakram?"

"Negotiations in good faith," Adjutant said calmly.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"Playing the long odds, I see," Akua said amusedly.

The orc's hand rose to still the incoming tide of responses.

"We assume it a matter of course the Dead King is intent on crossing us," he said. "I would ask you this, however: does he truly need to?"

"From an objective perspective?" I said. "Probably not. He can get what he wants out of us fair and square. That said, he's a villain. 'Need' takes a different shade when it comes to those."

"Yet we are not dealing with Diabolist, it's true," Vivienne slowly said.

I looked at Akua from the corner of my eye. She did not seem offended in the slightest. She might not even have been listening, scarlet eyes still thoughtfully considering Hakram.

"I do not advocate for blind trust, or even trust at all," Adjutant said. "But let us not dismiss the possibility of forthright dealings from the onset, either. Salting the grounds prematurely is not to our advantage."

"He'd bleed us all in a heartbeat, if it got him anything useful," I pointed out.

"Is this not a recurrent trait in all our allies?" Masego asked, bemused.

It was a little depressing that I couldn't really deny that.

"Point taken," I conceded, passing a hand through my hair. "Which neatly takes us to our next point of order. Today's lecture: what we want from the Dead King, why, and what we're willing to give in exchange."

Hierophant raised his hand. I eyed him darkly. Had he even ever sat in classroom?

"Yes, Masego," I said.

"Is this a mandatory lecture?" he politely asked.

Archer smothered her convulsive laughter into Hakram's shoulder, the wretch.

"Yes," I patiently said. "Yes it is."

The blind sorcerer looked a little miffed, but I pressed on before he could get it into his head to argue.

"For those of you who forgot, or weren't paying attention," I said, glancing pointedly at Indrani whose lips were still twitching, "Callow is about to have around eighty thousand Proceran and Levantines soldiers led by heroes invading through the Red Flower Vales. We need them, very badly, to be headed elsewhere instead."

"Arguable," Diabolist noted.

"Akua Sahelian, arguing that slaughter is the solution," I said. "We are all blindsided by this turn of events."

I bit my tongue afterwards then forced myself to look at the others in turn. We'd begun light-heartedly, and it was my own fault.

"I know levity is how we've kept our heads on straight," I quietly said. "As much as Named can have those, anyway. But this is serious. We're at a crossroads, and ahead are dead ends all around. The crusaders are in it to the hilt, and there's no compromise to be had with them. Callow's on the chopping block for the coming world order and we're out of allies and alternatives – except for the Dead King. This is the deep end. So please, let's act like the situation is as grim as it is."

That sobered the room. I didn't particularly enjoy doing it – it kept the pressure off my shoulders to treat it as laughable, even when we were all deadly serious. But I could not stomach making it a game even on the surface when things had gotten this undeniably bad.

"The Dead King is our counterweight," Adjutant said, breaking the silence and continuing my thoughts. "If he breaches Proceran borders up north, the armies at our gate will be either thinned or entirely recalled to deal with him."

I nodded my thanks to him.

"That said, we don't want him to actually take Procer," I said. "Aside from the horrifying loss of life that would entail, we'd be trading the hound at our door for a much larger tiger. So we need him to be enough of a threat the Tenth Crusade turns north, but not so strong the First Prince can't win. I believe that's possible to accomplish, for two reasons."

"The heroes," Akua said.

I nodded in agreement.

"The Heavens have already assembled their footsoldiers," I said. "They're on the field and spoiling for a fight. Crusades have reached Keter before, so we know the Dead King's not invincible when there's enough Named thrown at him. Baited out of the Kingdom of the Dead, he might be vulnerable in a way he isn't while in his seat of power. That'll draw them like carrion does flies. It's an objectively better victory for Above to get rid of Neshamah than to topple us – the folks upstairs will push for it."

"And our leverage," Vivienne finished.

"To our understanding, the Dead King is stuck in his 'Serenity' unless he's either attacked or invited out," I said, inclining my head towards her. "Our current working assumption is that we've been called here because we can provide that invitation and we've been judged sufficiently desperate to actually go through with it."

Which, in all fairness, we were. The only person in the room not already in on the plan to a full extent studied me intently before speaking up.

"You intend to add clauses to that invitation," Akua said, eyes hooded. "Not obvious ones from an outside perspective, lest the First Prince find them out and consider herself to have options other than war against the dead. Limitation of strength? No, without a full assessment of his forces that would be too risky. Ah. Territorial boundaries."

My fingers clenched. I knew there were few people out there who were both clever enough and knew me well enough to get to the conclusion so easily. It still worried me how little time it had taken Diabolist to see through me.

"Three principalities," I said. "Hannoven, Cleves and Hainaut. That would be the enforced limit of his invasion. Hannoven is fortified enough it will be hard to take, and as Klaus Papenheim's own territory it will strike bone with both the First Prince and her foremost general if it comes under siege. The other two principalities would give the Dead King foothold across the lakes, and so rally every Alamans of high birth in the Principate to the war. He's dangerous enough a neighbour with natural boundaries in the way."

"Preferably, we would want those principalities empty of civilians when the Kingdom of the Dead advances," Hakram said. "Their armies retreating as well, to strike back in strength when reinforced by the crusader hosts. Once war erupts up north, the balance of power of the Tenth Crusade shifts enough we have room to manoeuvre."

"Sounds like a clever piece of diplomacy," Indrani shrugged. "But you're not dealing with some prick of a prince, Cat. You sure the Hidden Horror is going to be willing to put ink to that deal? To put oath to it?"

"Our game's crooked," I admitted frankly. "But as far as we know, it's also the only game in town. He'd make appreciable gains through this deal, even if he went in expecting us to betray him. It's not the finest offer he'll ever get, but it's the one on the table. And if he wanted to stay behind his walls, well, he wouldn't have sent an envoy in the first place."

Akua stirred.

"A warning, if you would," she said.

I glanced at her and nodded.

"All of this rests on uncertain foundations," Diabolist said. "Namely, that invitation his needed for him to escape his Hell. This is speculation, not established fact."

"I'm aware," I bluntly said.

"Then follow the thought to its logical conclusion," Akua said. "If no invitation is needed and he still sent an envoy to you, what is the Dead King truly after?"

"We're going into guesswork," I noted. "And blind guesswork, at that."

"If you try to ascertain objectives purely from his perspective, yes," Diabolist said. "But that is not the full sum of the information we have. He sent for you, specifically. You are not the first cornered villain, Catherine. Yet you warranted an envoy where others did not. We can garner some knowledge from studying what sets you apart from other villains."

I met her gaze, unblinking.

"And what would that be?" I said.

"Two facts seem most important," Akua said. "First, you are now the crowned and recognized head of a traditionally Good kingdom. Ensuring you remain in power might represent a chance to tip the scales of the Game of the Gods on Calernia."

There was a cheerful thought. The Pilgrim had bought into the notion, anyway, so there might be something there. We had no indication that the Dead King's game relied on the balance of power, however, so the grounds were shaky.

"And second?" I asked.

"You are Queen of Winter in all but name," Diabolist said. "Fae are sworn to you. You are capable of granting titles and assembling a court."

Adjutant's brow creased.

"Titles," Hakram gravelled. "It's about the titles, if Winter is relevant at all. If you start handing them out, our potential strength escalates faster than anyone else can match. All the heroes capable of fighting are already out there, and the crusade still hasn't broken through. The Heavens are currently winning, but not by wide enough a margin to hold up. They would have to put a full hand to the scales to compensate, and if they do..."

"Below gets to do the same," Vivienne quietly said. "It'd start a vicious circle. The Heavens push again, Below matches, and all the while the fire spreads. Winter's the match to tinder. If Arcadia really was the sketch for Creation, then bringing Winter into this is like stealing the pieces of an earlier match to play in the most recent game."

"I haven't been granting anyone titles," I flatly said.

"Precisely to avoid this kind of complication."

"If you did, however," Akua said. "What entity is arguably the most powerful on the side of Evil?"

We all knew the answer to that. An argument might have been made for Praes, back in Triumphant's day, but that era had passed.

"So if it all goes up in flames, he's likely to be involved when Below makes its play," I completed grimly. "He'd want to put his finger to the pulse before it comes to that, and have assurances in place for when the arrows start flying."

"Indeed," Diabolist smiled pleasantly. "Which is quite the interesting development, don't you think? Whatever the truth of his intent, we have something that is desired. What we succeed at making of that is all that matters."

Gods forgive me but in that moment, even after all she'd done, I was glad she was out of the box.

—

The white-robed servants came to help us prepare for the audience several hours before twilight, but I dismissed mine. Hakram was quite enough for me. It was soothing, to have him help me into my armour. A ritual just for the two of us. The carapace of steel grew steadily around me, until all that was left to add was the cloak around my shoulders and the crowned helmet that had already needed reforging several times. I only put them on after the others were readied, the Woe in the fullness of their regalia. There was sense of solemnity to it. Archer's ceremonial garments were not significantly different from her usual, merely trading her usual leathers and silver mail for ones we'd had tailored for her in Laure, but it was oddly nostalgic to see her with the face covered by a hood and scarf again. Hierophant was all flowing black robes and silken eye cloth, somehow turning the simplicity of it into a statement of might. Adjutant and I were steel from head to toe, a frank admission of the nature of what we wrought. It was Thief that was barely recognizable. Her short hair had been styled and coiffed, going from haphazard to carefully arranged, and her prowling leathers were traded for Callowan court garb: a dark green overcoat bordered in brocade, over a long high-necked white tunic going to her knees. Soft and well-polished boots went up to her calves, with only a simple sheathed knife at her hip serving as a reminder of her Name. Diabolist remained as I had made her, somehow wearing her ghostly garments as if she'd been born to them.

Athal was our guide to the Hall of the Dead, along with several others Hosts. The pale man was subdued today. Not cowed, but well aware of the gravity of his duties. It was not often one was granted audience with the Hidden Horror. The inside of the spire was not as I remembered from the shards, everything within having shifted. Dimly, I could trace the pattern of our journey in my head. It all revolved around the royal hall now. The heart of the tower, where the portal and the man who'd made it awaited us. The antechamber to that hallowed place seemed filled with statues, at first glance, but a second revealed otherwise. The fifty silhouettes standing still were not stone or the remembrance of kings.

"Revenants," Archer said, and none of us replied.

Heroes, I thought. Dead heroes, and perhaps villains as well. Ripped out of whatever ancient age they had fallen, still garbed in the armaments of their defeat. Men and women of every stripes, knights and sages and wizards. An honour guard that none but the Dead King could boast. We passed them by in uneasy silence. Athal bowed low as we stood before the bronze gates of the hall.

"We part ways here, Great Majesty," he said. "What lies within is not for the likes of me. May you find all that you seek, and leave a friend to the Serenity."

I nodded at him, then took a deep breath. A memory flicked back to the front of my mind, quick and silver-bright. Too clear for a mortal mind. A thumb running up my cheek as the lesser god smiled

"You are in need of a reminder, Catherine Foundling, of the difference between bravery and ignorance," I murmured to myself, with a bitter smile.

Another king, that one, that I had only ever beaten on his own terms. Something to keep in mind when facing the king ahead.

The bronze gates opened, and we went forward to meet with the King of Death.

"Her Majesty Queen Catherine Foundling, Tyrant of Callow, Sovereign of Moonless Night, the Black Queen."

The announcement rang loud and clear in the hall as I advanced, coming from a dead man's throat. The others were announced behind me. Lord Hierophant, Lord Adjutant, Lady Archer, Lady Thief. The Shade of Splendour. The words washed over me, made faraway by what I witnessed. No portal there, not today. A tall dais with a throne of bones, with a long table set before it. From the tall rafters hung banners from all the great hosts of Calernia. Old and faded. Some still keeking of blood long turned to dust. Yet the greatest of all banners hung behind the throne, the deep purple of the Kingdom of the Dead's heraldry set with crown and stars. None of it mattered, compared to the thing that sat the throne. It was a man, or perhaps just the mockery of one. Not living yet not dead, so thin bones could be made out through the parchment-thin skin. Pale locks of hair tumbled down messily, reaching down to the elaborate purple robes decorated with gold chains and riotous jewels that together twice earned a mortal king's ransom. The thing was sprawled lazily, the ancient crown of Sephirah on its brow, watching us with sunken yellow eyes. A curtain of power hung between us and it, unseen but thick against the roof of my mouth. Illusion. The Dead King was not within the hall. It was not Neshamah's body I was seeing, either. Not his first one anyway.

"I greet you, Black Queen," the abomination said in a rippling voice. "And confirm by my own tongue extension of hospitality to you and yours."

I bowed my head.

"We are duly grateful of the offered courtesy, Your Majesty," I replied. "And offer guest-gift as a sign of our own."

Hakram strode forward, face serene. It had been trouble, finding something that was a worthy gift yet easy to carry through Arcadia. So many of the things that would have pleased the monster would have been dangerous to us. In the end, it'd been Ratface that came through. He knew people that know some people in Mercantis, and for a cost that made me wince they'd nabbed something of worth from an auction. Adjutant removed the silken veil from the cushion he carried, revealing a small shard of black stone.

"A piece of the Tower as it once stood, before twice being cast down," Hakram announced.

A white-robed attendant, this one without a heartbeat, came forward to take the cushion from his hands. It was offered to the Dead King, who took it in hand and studied it with a thin-lipped smile.

"A sliver of greatness," he said. "And a reminder of frailty. A worthy gift, Black Queen."

I bowed my head in silence. He set the stone back down on the cushion, and it was spirited away by the servant as he returned those wicked yellow eyes to us.

"Sit," the Dead King invited. "You are my guests, after all. It would not do for you to remain standing. Would you partake of my table?"

"We would be honoured to do so," I lied.

"I am pleased to hear it," the thing that had once been Neshamah said. "We have much to speak of, and it would make me uneasy to do so while your throats are dry."

I forced a smile.

"I confess," I said, "that your invitation roused great curiosity in me. Talk is much welcome."

"And yet you wonder, what are we to speak of?" the abomination chuckled. "Allow me to shed light."

Yellow eyes met mine.

"We must speak of that most ancient trade of kings, Black Queen," the Dead King said. "War."

---

PotatoMan

I think I'm ready for the next chapter. Why isn't it Wednesday already.

JJR

No demons of time to speed the process along I'm afraid.

*TeK*

Leave it to us to unrepairably damage the fabric of reality because we are too impationed to wait a couple of days. Guys, ya all will make great Villains, and I love you for that.

Jane

Let's be honest here, little of value would be lost by tearing apart the fabric of this reality.

...Well, I suppose I would regret losing the Guide... But not much else. Bring out the demons, I say!

lqueenofblades1

Sadly. Oh what I could do with Diabolist's powers at my command...

Yotz

Eh, a gallon of vodka will suffice.
In the "skipping a day" and "irreparable damage to reality" departments both, I suppose.

PartMan

Guys I used a demon of time to go four years in the future
I lost all my college years, but got to read the whole thing.
I regret nothing.

*sengachi*

I just had a thought. I bet the Warlock is inside Serenity. We know he navigates Hells. He probably escaped from the Witch of the West. But he hasn't come back, and his return is likely to be narratively relevant.

So I'll bet he got waylaid in Serenity.

JJR

I'm betting that he won the fight and is now waiting for Black to be in his most desperate straights before he shows up to pull off a last minute rescue.

Jessica Day

I'm imagining that the fight still rages on, the two of them caught together within their own spells and the winner tbd by the side who needs a save... If Black "accidentally" gets himself too deep into enemy territory, cut off from all allies...

wyaldriddler

>The Shade of Splendour

Oh hoh hello. What is this? How interesting, and some foreshadowing I think that means Akua's plans may not go exactly how she expects.

Someguy

It just calls her what she is, desiccated leftovers from the Age of Wonders.

d_o_l

IIRC The Dead King's culture refer to the Fae as the Splendid. He's basically just calling her what she is; i.e. a shade animated by the power of Winter.

Someguy

I don't think the Dead King can be easily fooled by a soul shapeshifting, the farce was mostly for the benefit of any Callowan or crusader watching as they travel.

Danus

I agree that the Dead King wouldn't be fooled by a simple cosmetic change – but Akua is literally animated by the Mantle of Winter. This episode devotes significant time to develop the importance of mantles in BQ's powers, so I read it as foreshadowing.

I wonder if Killian could eventually bear the mantle of Summer.

Dantalian

Now that her soul is kind of tied to Winter she's more Fae than human. Seeing how they refer to Fae as the Splendid, sounds like they see her as a shade created by the same thing Fae are made of.

Morgenstern

Or, mistakenly so (? #), the shade of a Fae. *shrugs

(#) I mean, she could have gotten changed by being infused with Winter, already... 😊

Agent J

What plans? How does she expect them to go? In what way does "Shade of Splendour" foreshadow her undoing?

NZPIEFACE

When even the best necromancer to ever exists now denies the fact that you're a Named...

Euodiachloris

He's being polite enough to acknowledge the fiction of this "anonymous plus one fae ghost" that has been presented to him in a way that is, incidentally, open to interpretation the next time the Woe make a trip to the fridge. 😊

George Maddux

This is so hype!

Someguy

>"If you did, however," Akua said. "What entity is arguably the most powerful on the side of Evil?"

Robber & Pickler to fuck with the Goblin Matriarchs and maybe creating a new lineage of goblins with extended lifespans. Nauk as a test to see if the Winter Title can counter his mental wounds from Summer 's flames and restore him fully. Maybe Hune to pull the Ogres influence. Bringing the Greenskins/non-humans under Cat will allow her to undercut Malicia and widen her talent-pool to draw manpower.

Jane

...Allying with the Goblins sounds a lot like allying with Akua crossed with the Dead King, though. Ridiculously treacherous, and possessed of reckless power that could blow up on her just as readily as her enemies.

Working with goblins in the legions is one thing, but working with the Matriarchs is... Something else altogether.

Someguy

Not working with the Matriarchs, FUCKING them over by granting Robber power and extended lifespan. They kicked him out for shitting on their authority by not fighting remember?

Danus

Robber with a Title would be absolutely brilliant. I wonder how Summer is going to become relevant to the plot again, because it constitutes another "leftover" piece from the "previous game."

Someguy

Summer invaded Callow when someone pissed them off right? Winter had no idea why they were pulling that shit and there was no follow up.

Death Knight

That would be grounds for all out war between the goblins and the Callowans. Remember their entire culture is based around male subservience. For Catherine to bestow a title on Robber, an outcast male? If the matriarch's do not do something about that then it will weaken their perceived position in their own tribes and may initiate a culture change. A titled Pickler would be a manageable diplomatic situation, seeing as she is (or was) of matriarch lineage. But Robber? Not unless Cat wants to smite the Grey Eyries.

MetruX

But if she do grant him a title that has nothing to do with any other goblins, a title that is also held by other people of other races... Yes, it will piss off alot the matriarchs, but they won't have a clear reason to enter war, thus they can only act indirectly, and with nothing that can be tied back to them. Dangerous, but not as much.

Agent J

There's optimism and then there's that. No, Cat herself pondered the consequences of bestowing a title on Robber when Larat first mentioned the possibility. The consequence was war with the Matrons. No amount of legalism or clever politicking will get them to stomach it.

That being said, I'm all for an all out war with the Matrons. Let the goblins and the highborn back Malicia. They make themselves all the easier to clean up.

Tohron

"Duke of Howling Wolves"

me.me.here

Yeah, the Lesser Lesser Footrest of Winter will be a sight to see.

Decius

Anyone capable of generating a Red Letter from the Gnomes can mobilize forces greater than everything on the scales so far.

But they can't WIN that way, so they don't.

Yotz

Cats.

Most powerful entity on the side of Evil are indubitably cats. And soon all the Good bases will belong to them.

RanVor

All their base will be belong to them.

Snowfire1224

And so we finally meet the dead king, or at least an illusion of him. Gods above and below, Wednesday can't come soon enough.

Jane

You know... It occurs to me that, no matter how much one trusts Heiropant's talents, it probably would have been better to have had this conversation in Arcadia, before they passed into Keter proper. I mean, the Dead King has had how many centuries to perfect some sort of eavesdropping spell cast across his entire domain? Much better to go over things one last time before returning to Creation, and just have a quick "Did anything we learn once we were here change anything?" session that repeat everything to prying ears.

I'm not saying that the Dead King was listening in, necessarily, but wasn't that kind of reckless?

Also, interesting (though not surprising, really) that Akua agrees that they could probably win the war if Cat were to start utilizing Winter to greater effect. I don't think the Narrative would work like that, but it's nice to hear that it's sound on paper – even if it would trigger the Guide-verse equivalent to World War Three. Akua once again proves herself the most useful cloak, providing a perspective none of the rest of them considered.

Azure

Yup this conversation should definitely have happened earlier, after Catherine had her epiphany after the vision with the Bard and Dead King. Yes the Woe's banter is part of their charm, and treating this like a road trip worked to an extent, but the serious parts need to be dealt with with the appropriate weight as well. I'm glad Catherine addressed the levity and it's timing, but maybe if Erraticerrata ever gets around to editing some parts of this, then perhaps he would move this conversation to an earlier chapter, perhaps to just after Catherine overhearing Thief and Akua conversing.

Trickster315

So I have a pretty crazy theory. what if instead of an alliance the Dead King is looking for something more impact full in terms of breaking the story. What if he is looking for a marriage to change the status quo, similar to the Winter King? We've seen that he acted against the Wandering Bard who was supposed to keep the game going and the status quo the same.

Snowfire1224

Going along with your theory then I propose the person that is most likely the "Summer Queen" to his "winter king" is Cordelia. She may not be named but she is the ruler of the big Good nation. I thought of bard too, but that wouldn't last because bard could just die and become someone knew again. The Dead King can only marry the person, not the Name or so I would suspect Bard would argue of that situation happened.

Brian Heward

Cordelia has a Name, "First Prince"

Simurgh

WOG is that "First Prince" is not and has never been a Name.

OmniscientQ

"First Prince" is her title, but it is not a Name.

Dantalian

If the Dead King is really thinking about marriage then he should be more aware of how unprepared he is trying to charm his "future bride" using a sack of bones as a body. After all, Catherine is well known for ogling attractive people (even her enemies).

Berder

They shouldn't have talked about their plans for betrayal while in Keter. The Dead King certainly has the power to spy on them here with a necromantic construct or some other trick. I suspect the Dead King is three steps ahead anyway.

Akua's hypothesis: granted fae titles lead to more Good playing pieces which lead to more Evil playing pieces which leads to the Dead King being put into play. But this supposes the Dead King needs to be put into play by the Gods Below, and can't do it himself.

Suppose the Dead King can put himself into play, and doesn't need any permission from the Gods Below or from Cat. And yet, apparently he only has exited his realm when attacked. (or "invited" – do we know if he was ever invited out to wage unprovoked war before? or is this just wishful thinking by Cat.) This paints a picture of a fundamentally peaceful, defensive monarch who doesn't care about conquering the continent, but who is attacked by Procer just because he's Evil. That sounds a lot like Cat. Is it possible that the Dead King sees Cat as a kindred spirit and genuinely wants to help her?

Daemion

He's constantly at Procer's borders and would invade them if they didn't defend themselves. So, not really peaceful or defensive.

Agent J

Athal seems to be of the opinion that those were punitive expeditions in response to Procer's "coalitions of hate".

Dantalian

Can't really take Athal's opinions seriously. The guy's been brainwashed pretty hard.

shieldredblog

Hes showing bias, not brainwashing. Nothing he said was actually wrong. If one takes the forgotten histories of Keter and Procer into account, than its a pretty legitimate point of view.

Depending on what the Dead King is actually like anyway.

Decius

According to Procer.

And not all of Procer, really. Only the people who have the most to gain politically from claiming so.

Novice

That was not according to Procer, that was according to Akua and by extension Praes.

Euodiachloris

Praes and Procer have been shaping each other for a while under the beady eyes of the Bard... I don't think either of them have the definitive word on what's gone down, somehow.

Decius

The information directly from Procerean interludes is more reliable than the information that filtered through more levels. Akua might have accurate information about the Keter/Procer situation, but her information isn't more reliable than the least reliable element in its source.

In particular, if the Dead King doesn't need a treaty to invade, and has the power to, it must be because he doesn't want to.

MetruX

He did small attacks, though none that were trully treatening, except for one time: He marched himself besides Triumphant. People have been drawing parallels between Cat and triumphant for several reasons, but if she is the second one to have him accompany her in war... Wouldn't you say this paints a pretty powerfull picture? The last one conquered the continent, for as small a duration as it was.

Death Knight

Of course it ends there, where else would it?

TeK

Homestly, it's already better than:

““And yet you wonder, what are we to speak of?” the abomination chuckled. “Allow me to shed light.”

Yellow eyes met mine.

And then the Dead King spoke.”

Jane

Pardon me, I do believe I have a few pitchforks and torches to prepare over that very suggestion.

Novice

I think I just gained a claim to the Rebel Knight Name at the mere thought of it.

Death Knight

I feel like that’s like telling me “We’re gonna kill you by shooting you in the head whereas we could have burned you alive.”

Rook

The war Neshamah is talking about is most likely not cut from the same cloth as the one that Cat is currently involved in. The tenth crusade is a big deal for small time players, but it isn’t worth fireflies for someone that’s playing the game on the scale that the Dead King is. I suspect he’s talking about the oldest war in the book: Good vs Evil

Which is a bit worrying considering that there’s been considerable foreshadowing that this trip is where Cat really starts going off the deep end, alignment-wise. All that talk of Evil being a steep cliff vs Good being a slippery slope, followed by a decision to go to Keter out of desperation in a chapter titled **Plunge**, followed by ‘into dusk’ and ‘abyss’

Similar to how capital-G Good was shown to be so far removed from the traditional casual idea of good to be totally alien, this might be where capital-E Evil gets the same sort of reveal and starts to drag her in, even with her personal ideals remaining mostly intact.

Most likely scenario? He gives her a picture perfect solution to the threat of the Crusade on a silver platter. No strings attached in any tangible or magical way shape or form, with no visible benefit to himself. In ‘return’, I wouldn’t be surprised if he influences her in the process to really start going down a bad road, just one little nudge changing the direction of the course. No direct benefit, nearly no direct involvement, and no direct target – an airtight move with no gaps.

It would fit his style of operation, just like his ascension by having external threats indirectly propel him to power, and his messenger avoiding the eyes of creation via indirectly getting to the Woe via preprogrammed commands coincidentally in the right direction instead of a going to a target.

In this case he could indirectly secure an ally far in the future by making use of external (Proceran) pressure in the present.

1queenofblades1

Is it just me or did anyone else start shipping Cat/Neshamah this chapter?

Decius

Akua/Neshamah?

mindsword2

Yeah, so this is my worst case scenario.

"Black Queen, thank you for coming. I want to discuss war."
Turns to Akua. "Good work on turning 10,000 zombies and opening a permanent portal to the hells. Lets talk."

MetruX

This is actually ridiculous. Akua was never called Black Queen, and the title doesn't go well with her in any way or form, she didn't even wear anything of black. Sure, imagining this is terrifying, but has 0 chances of happening.

Insanenoodlyguy

no no no, he's saying "Thank you for coming Black Queen, now I can talk to Akua since you brought her here." In this worst case he doesn't think Akua is the Black Queen, he's just aware of her nature enough that he knew to get her to him he needed to invite Foundling.

mindsword2

This was what I was implying. Also, a mistake on my part; 100,000 zombies.

But seriously, Akua's ambition killed 100,000 people, turning them into undead under her control and opening a permanent portal to Hell. His ambition caused his kingdom to be turned into undead and opened a permanent portal to hell. Sure they were for entirely different reasons, but all of this could have been for Akua, not Cat. And that is the worst case scenario I can think of.

Dainpdf

The difference being he did it in a way that didn't bring everything and the kitchen sink down on his head.

frolamiz

Well, I have been thinking that a political marriage may happen for a while, but only because it would be an interesting move with many possibilities. Nothing to do with shipping.

TeK

You guys will ship an undead ship and Forever King, given a chance.

Death Knight

I really am surprised I haven't seen the fandom try to ship Cat and a bottle of Aragh given how much Cat loves to go down on that.."bottle."

Dainpdf

And then it turns out that all he really wanted was to swap notes on necromancy, because Cat's Winter undead are really cool. And would Akua mind talking about Still Waters, because of course he knows how it's done, but he'd appreciate some commentary on her personal experience with it.

Berder

The big question on everyone's mind is, "What does the dead king want?" The chapter Witness seems to have cryptic answers to this.

(By the way – at the end of Witness, Cat tells Hierophant to extract memories from the Wandering Bard and Neshamah. Did this happen, and what did Hierophant learn?)

In Witness, Neshamah describes his belief that people should not die, and nor should they be trapped in a cycle of repetition. He says the Splendid are trapped in a cycle of repetition despite their immortality, to prevent them from learning too much. In the chapter Keter, we find out that Akua is an example of a Splendid. But what, exactly, is a Splendid?

Neshamah says this in Witness: "The Splendid are bound to repetition because they are feared, Intercessor. Because with the span of eternity before them, they might learn beyond what they were meant to learn were they not so tightly constrained. And so mortality is the answer to the deeper question: how do they loosen the bindings without birthing their own usurpers?"

And he answers his own question: "Why, by cursing their work with decay," he chuckled. "By ensuring the banner can only be carried for so long by any one soul before it is recalled at their feet."

Then the Bard counters: "Below's favour comes with the end of aging." To which Neshamah counters that those with Below's favor are cursed to die from strife.

To tell the story more plainly: the Splendid are bound to repetition by something that fears them, so they create work cursed with decay to help the Splendid escape the cycle of repetition, and Below's favor is an example of this work cursed with decay. That implies the Splendid are the Gods. (And so is Akua – so Splendid seems to simply mean any kind of immortal spirit. Perhaps the Gods were not always so powerful, and were once like Akua.) It also implies there was some other entity, perhaps above the Gods, that feared the Gods and was able to bind them with repetition.

Neshamah's highest objective, therefore, seems to be to escape both death and repetition, and usurp the Gods. Conquering Procer is not what he really cares about. He would like Catherine's help in usurping the Gods, given her unique situation with Winter.

And after that... they would have to contend with whatever originally bound the Gods with repetition.

Euodiachloris

I read "the Splendid" to be the fae who reside in Arcadia. Who were/are, of course, a prototype for what Names would be in Creation.

Yotz

There is no god but Azathoth, and Nyarlathotep is His Messenger.

MetruX

You... Seem to interpret things in a very strange way. We were never shown anything of the Gods, only their agents, so we can't really know if they dabble in repetition. No, the most clear definition is that the Splendid is how he called Fae, and that they could grow in power, if not for the cycle of repetition between the courts, enough to be a threat to the Gods. While mortals, and Named alike, will die, thus they can't grow enough. Yes, he does want to surpass the Gods, or so it seems, but this is a desire thousands of years old, before he made his kingdom and his true claim. We can't completely know what he wants of Cat, because too much changed, and we don't even know if he can change. There isn't anything after the Gods, because the Gods created everything.

Berder

If he was talking only about Fae in that passage, how is mortality the answer to the question of how to “loosen their bindings without birthing their own usurpers”? Are you suggesting the Fae created mortality?

Neshamah said: “Why, by cursing their work with decay,” he chuckled. “By ensuring the banner can only be carried for so long by any one soul before it is recalled at their feet.”

How does this make sense in regard to the Fae? What banner? It makes sense in regard to the Gods: the banner is the blessing of Gods Above and Below, creating Named. And if it was about Fae why would the Bard then counter that “Below’s favour comes with the end of aging”? The whole passage makes no sense if it was about Fae.

Now, the Gods might be some relative of Fae. We have been shown a couple beings that Cat called gods: Fae royalty, the King of Winter and Queen of Summer. This might be exaggeration by Cat, or there may be a true link.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

“We must speak of that most ancient trade of kings, Black Queen,” the Dead King said. “Having the chance to have a sane conversation with a sane person.”

Burnsy

He picked the wrong guests entirely for that. I think, between them, you could maybe fashion a single fully functional person. Or at least a lunatic capable of adequately faking it.

Maesgo could probably put it together out of some sort of flesh golem if you give him a lab and some privacy for a week.

Novice

A girl that willingly mutilated her own soul for power cannot be considered sane.

Burnsy

“Akua Sahelian, arguing that slaughter is the solution,” I said. “We are all blindsided by this turn of events.”

I have to admit, even though keeping her around is a decision that is inevitably going to blow up in everyone’s faces, it’s almost worth it for the banter.

However...

'She might not even have been listening, scarlet eyes still thoughtfully considering Hakram.'

*Sighs*

Akua. Honey. I get that whatever scheme you're running relies at least partly on you faking your way through a redemption narrative. Personally, I think that you're angling for one of those resurrections that only the good guys can dish out, but that's neither here nor there.

But. This thing you're going for here? The slow realisation that orcs are fully capable of being rational, intelligent and insightful beings? The whole 'Akua learns a lesson' you're building to? We can see you doing it. Vivienne can probably see you doing it. And Hakram can definitely see you doing it.

Which means the second you try to have a heart to heart bonding moment he is gonna throw it back in your face and, frankly, embarrass you sweetie. Because you're still faking it, and you're still underestimating him.

Euodiachloris

Shhhhhh – it'll be funny. If you spill the beans early, I know that Larat, for one, would be happy to wear your guts for garters for ruining the punchbag... I mean... punchline. 😊

Someguy

Belkar Bitterleaf is better at faking redemption.

Agent J

I read that completely differently. It was mentioned earlier that Hakram makes her uncomfortable. I think this plays into that. Rather than wide-eyed shock that orcs are fully sapient beings, I think her uneasiness around him is a show of extreme caution. Around him more than anyone else, Vivienne included, she makes absolutely certain to keep on her toes. He's the most dangerous to her. His eyes are sharper than goblin steel and his loyalty to Cat is unmatched by anyone, Nauk included. Worst yet is his disposition. The man is an unmoving stone amidst raging rapids. Nothing shakes him or clouds his judgement.

I liked what Cat said of her, Akua's uncharacteristically open-minded for one of her breeding. Everyone is equally beneath her. It's not a smart orc that worries her, it's Hakram specifically. Whatever scheme she's cooking, if there's anyone in Cat's camp that can spot it and shred it, it's the Lord Deadhand. And she fucking knows it.

In short, her underestimating Hakram is the absolute last thing she'll do.

Yotz

So, riddle me this:

A Girl Lost, her Beast Tamed, a Keeper of Corn, a Knight of Tin, a Trembling King, and a Ghost of the East enter the chambers of the Beryllium Magus...

Jessica Day

I find myself wondering if the worst fate that could befall Akua would be if she was **truly** redeemed...

Like, any Buffy fans out there remember what it was like for Angelus to get a soul and become Angel?

What if she had to truly understand the full extent of her crimes and accept responsibility for them?

Yotz

A guilt of such magnitude can be a powerful drive behind The Redeemed actions, but given Akua's history and attitude, her path to redemption will be a story in itself, and any attempt to tell it would force Author either to gloss over nuances, making a disservice to all involved, or shift focus of current story specifically to her. Though telling that story aparallel, or as a possible sequel – a-la Angel to Buffy – would make for a splendid tale. Especially, if she'll try to earn the redemption while retaining the title of Diabolist...

Agent J

A redeemed Diabolist? Only if she becomes a horrible drunkard, dyes her hair blonde, and miraculously develops an English accent.

Euodiachloris

There should be bad poetry in there, somewhere... 😊

John Smith

Yeah, uh, I'm gonna need it to be Wednesday, like, right now? Thanks.

Antony444

Fifty Named...the Dead King has more Revenants guarding him than there are heroes in the Tenth Crusade at the moment and it is AFTER four visits of Ranger. Forget Black and Assassin, the undead abomination is the true leader in the contest of killing heroes...

The negotiations are going to be explosive and fascinating, but I wonder how Cordelia Hasenbach would react from a position of 'forcing Catherine to abdicate as Queen' to 'we have lost three provinces to the Dead King'. Losing three Prince territories out of twenty-four would be the greatest defeat of Procer in its entire existence since it was born after the defeat of Triumphant.

And of course there's the classic cliffhanger...well done.

Yotz

Also, piece with the shard of the First Tower was magnificent. Thank you.

crescentsickle

Adjutant is a brand new transitional name for Chancellor~

Akua's got her knickers in a twist because he's her prime competition~

She doesn't know what else it could transition to because Orc Names are brand new, so she can't force him to be anyone different unless she tries to do so blind~

nimelennar

I thought we've been told, again and again, that greenskin Names used to exist, even if they haven't for a long time. This is why Catherine will never get the Name Warlord: it's a greenskin Name, and she isn't part of a greenskin Story.

Adjutant being a new Name, though, comes out to about the same thing.

crescentsickle

Yes, we've been told that again and again. I'm not sure what the point of saying so was? I don't think Adjutant has been confirmed as an old Orc Name. My hypothesis is that it's not even an Orc name. It's possibly a Praesi Name, or perhaps just a Practical!Evil name.

The point of my prior post was that I believe Akua's current fascination with Hakram is because his existence jeopardizes her plot to become Chancellor, because if Cat magically became Empress today he would be the only one in the running to become Chancellor.

More than that, Adjutant is basically Chancellor in role itself, if on a military skew, which has been repeatedly emphasized with everything about Catherine (armor in this audience, flag of scales where the sword is heavier, etc.). Given that, Akua is probably thinking Cat would be less inclined to outlaw Chancellor like Malicia did.

crescentsickle

Ah, disregard the bit about not knowing why you mentioned Orc Names. I forgot I had that specific bit at the end worded like that.

Didn't mean new as in Actually New (TM) but that they're an unknown quantity suddenly relevant again.

PotatoMan

Orc names as a !New Old thing are only relevant again because the orcs have experienced under Black and Cat a culture shift, eg. being allowed to have a culture at all. I thought that Akua was having racism issues with Hakram, but it could be that she is realizing how Cat gains power by investing in and lifting up her subordinates and allies, as opposed to spending her followers' lives on throwaway actions all the time. IDK though. Guess we'll see.

Someguy

Adjutants are generally a junior captains or senior first lieutenants in the US Army on the Battalion managing administrative functions so it may be a Transitional Name to [Captain] now that the Name is empty without repeating history with the next [Cursed].

oracleindex

I'm growing fonder and fonder of Edmund Inkhand.

Bart

Looks like nobody has said this yet...

Territorial considerations don't mean much when two people mean different things when they say the same territory. I bet it'll turn out that one of those territory names was actually the continent name when the Dead King was alive, or something like that.

JJR

Ehh, as long as they specify that the treaty refers to the current boundaries of said territories they are safe from that sort of rules lawyering.

Barthumphries

The current boundaries as specified by whom? The boundaries as the Dead King has known them for the past three millennia or the boundaries as per the current upstart country that has usurped those names? 😊

Soronel Haetir

I've been thinking some about the theory that Cat is triumphant reborn. I can think of few things that would piss her off more than if that turned out to actually be the case.

It would mean she really is nothing more than a pawn in the game between the gods above and below and that it doesn't matter a stinking crap what she does, the show must go on and all that.

RedoneAgain

You know, I'm seeing a lot of overlap between what is going on now and the summer and winter thing. Summer seems to be in many ways a mirror of callow, and cat is the queen. The Dead King is a king stuck in a cycle he hates and wishes to escape. He also rules over a kingdom of darkness. The winter summer conflict ended with the winter king marrying the summer queen by making marrying him the only option besides giving up her central tenets. Are we going to see cat marring the dead king?

Euodiachloris

Technically, Procer is more the Kingdom's designated opposite than Callow is. Well, Cordelia's single... 😊

But, I doubt wedding bells of any kind are in the offing. There is more than one way to gain a merger.

CorpseMoney

I'm a real life villain, I love this story. But my reality is dark fam

Aston

When does Practical Guide to Evil update?

Wry Warudo

Would bestowing a title onto Kilian eliminate the need for the human sacrifice procedure she was going to go through?

---

Chapter 35: Stroll

"Seventeen: always agree when offered to share in the rule of the world by a villain. The three to four heartbeats of sheer surprise that will earn you are a golden opportunity to kill them before it comes to a monologue."

– 'Two Hundred Heroic Axioms', author unknown

The Dead King kept a good table, for a corpse.

It was a little surreal that after that last bit of dramatics we were expected to have a meal, but wasn't that diplomacy? Vivid theatre, followed by long stretches of tediousness. There were half a dozen kind of spiced meats on the table I didn't recognize but tasted delicious, with the only dark mark on the affair that it was apparently expected that undead attendants would cut my meal for me. I dug in with reluctant enthusiasm, since it was unlikely I'd get to eat this fine a meal for months yet. The cooks at the palace had been weaned off the more complicated fare they'd learned from Mazus and the Fairfaxes and gently guided into making the simpler fare I liked better – if it used to squawk and had since been roasted, odds were I'd enjoy it – but they seemed to have taken that as a challenge to put all their efforts into dessert. Which, well, I had not found it in myself to deny. Masego had a sweet tooth as well, and blueberry tarts were one of the few plates that were never at risk of coming back full when sent into the Observatory. I laid off the wine, though out of politeness I took a few sips. It still tasted like ash to me, as all lesser spirits had since I fully claimed my mantle. Setting down the silvers, I politely dabbed away the bit of sauce on my lips with the provided cloth and leaned back into my seat. Meal time with the Woe tended to be a riotous affair, but not today.

Trading barbs with the Dead King as audience would have been a little too much even for Archer. The abomination sitting the throne waited patiently, by all appearances pleased with how quick we'd been to dig in. I caught his eye, purely by happenstance, and when I faced those yellow orbs the throne room went dark. Sighing, I put down the cloth.

It'd been about time for something to go wrong, hadn't it?

A quick look around told me I was no longer sitting in the throne room. This was the pitch black of nothingness, not deep shadow. The cloth had disappeared into the dark the moment it left my fingers, and the table had followed suit the moment I took my eyes off of it. The only visible thing around was a standing man, and my brow rose when I took him in. The throne-sitting corpse had not been the Neshamah of millennia ago. This, however, was. Pale and mess-haired, with those thick eyebrows and calloused hands. Closely-shaven as he had been when I'd last glimpsed him, a heartbeat before he wrought the doom of Keter.

"There is no need for alarm," the Dead King spoke in Ashkaran.

I forced a frown in my face.

"I'm afraid you've lost me," I said.

No amusement bloomed on his face. He did not strike me as offended by the lie, either – if he even knew it was one. What had been spoken was simply put away behind those golden-brown eyes, to be studied at his leisure.

"My apologies, then," he replied in Lower Miezan. "Would you walk with me, Black Queen?"

I rose to my feet, swallowing a snort when the greatest abomination ever born to Calernia chivalrously offered me his arm. In for a copper, I mused. I looped my arm into his and allowed him to lead me through the nothingness.

"I judged a private conversation to be in order, before negotiations began," the Dead King said. "As reparations for the imposition, the least I can offer is an interesting sight to accompany it."

The darkness bled out. It was like watching a painting in reverse, I thought. Instead of splashed of colour being put to canvas, strokes of black were removed and bared the sights beneath. He'd not lied, at least, about it being interesting. The two of us stood dozens of miles in the air, watching the slaughter that took place below. It was a siege, or at least an assault part of one. Surrounding a Keter near identical to the one I'd seen in Creation, hundreds of thousands gathered beneath colourful banners to take a run at the walls. My eyes lingered on the few heraldries I recognized. Most of them Proceran, but a few Callowan ones as well. The bells of House Fairfax startled a finger clenching out of me. That banner had not flown in the wind since the Conquest.

"Sixth or Seventh?" I asked.

There could be no doubt, after all, that it was a crusade beneath me.

"Sixth," Neshamah replied. "The depths of that failure led to the birth of the Seventh, in many ways. The Choir of Contrition is hard of learning."

"My own encounters have left me less than fond," I said. "The first hero I fought was sworn to them."

"The Lone Swordsman," the Dead King drawled. "Ah, those pesky Hashmallim. All those centuries and they still believe the right sword in the right hands can accomplish anything. Their string of failures had made them increasingly heavy-handed. Mercy is the the Choir to watch, for subtlety."

"And Judgement?" I probed.

"That sword only ever clears the scabbard when something needs to die," the abomination smiled. "No coincidence, that the current White Knight is one of theirs. The Heavens have pressing need of blood on the ground, and the man will serve to herd the others towards the fated abattoir."

"They can be beaten," I said, watching a wooden ramp collapse under stone thrown from the walls.

Hundreds fell to their screaming deaths in the pit below.

"In a manner of speaking," the Dead King said. "Praesi have slain and tricked them into falling, as have I. Yet the Choirs stand, for their existence is fixed. A dead angel does not detract from the whole. It remains as it ever was."

"They have to play by the rules," I said.

"Oh yes," Neshamah murmured. "And they will pay for that, in time. That delightful child in Helike wove a trap for them right under the Intercessor's nose. I expect the end of that play to be nothing less than magnificent."

The Tyrant, he meant. I forced myself not to stiffen. I'd expected him to take a swing soon, either a Procer or whatever nation was limping heaviest at the time. This was a hint there was another game afoot, though. And I doubted it had been offered lightly.

"He's offered me eternal friendship," I said, hoping to shake a little more loose.

The abomination grinned.

"To me as well," he said. "And the rats, though they ate his envoy. I confess I quite enjoy his sense of humour."

The Tyrant of Helike was mad, this was well-known. I was starting to wonder if it was perhaps too well-known. Behaviour could seem erratic without actually being so, when you failed to grasp what someone was truly after.

"But I digress," the Dead King dismissed. "We did not take this stroll to speak of the League of Free Cities. It appears we have a common foe, Black Queen."

"Procer," I said. "I would have preferred not to fight them at all, but Hasenbach left me little choice."

"She is an interesting one, their First Prince," Neshamah said. "A shame that her understanding of what a crusade is was so lacking, but it is too late to leave the saddle once the lion is ridden. She must follow through or break the Principate for a few generations."

"A matter of some interest to you, I imagine," I said.

"Come now, my young friend," the Dead King laughed. "Do you take me for such a fool I would want the Principate to fall?"

"Without Procer there's little left to contain you," I pointed out. "The Dominion and the League might manage to salvage parts of the south and Callow would hold the passes to the east, but you'd be trading a single mighty opponent for several weaker ones."

"I could bring ruin to them," the Dead King mildly said. "Drown the Lycaonese in death, devour every field and city from the Tomb to Salia. I could have done this when they were grown fragile from their war of succession, and none would have been able to stand against me. Yet I did not."

"Because it'd have hung a sword over your head," I said.

"Not immediately," Neshamah mused. "They would have allowed me to glory in it for some time. Lovingly tended to my legend, my thousands years of darkness – or, more likely, my few centuries. They would have been willing to pay that price twice over, to have me bare my neck."

"And yet here I am," I said. "Invited to speak of war. Because there'd be two heads but only one sword. It's how you survived Triumphant, isn't it?"

"She was a great woman," the Dead King fondly said. "There was a clarity to her that I'd never seen the likes of. But you misunderstand my intent. I do not seek to use you. My war on stillness will not be waged in so half-hearted a manner. This is merely a welcome, Catherine Foundling."

"To what?" I asked.

"That most rarefied of societies," he laughed. "We few immortals."

"I can die," I flatly said.

"So can I," the Dead King said. "So can she. And there have been others before, who came close yet passed in the end. But I have great hopes for you, Black Queen. You have crawled through the cracks in a most fascinating way – never before have I seen anyone reach apotheosis by accident."

I bit my tongue before I could deny him. He was wrong. Had to be. I'd carved away at myself piece by piece and put a mantle over the remains, but I was hardly a god. Even a lesser one. If that delusion made him civil and open to negotiation, however, he could keep it.

"She," I said instead. "The Wandering Bard."

"The Name changes," he said. "The faces as well, swift as seasons. The Role has not. Intercessor she was and will remain."

"She's got her hands all over this war," I said. "She was in Callow, before it all went to shit. In the League too, before the shockwaves of that rippled across the continent. I know better than to believe she won't pop out again."

"She encountered a nasty little setback in the south," Neshamah said. "And has remained... discreet, since. But do not believe her absent because she is not before your eyes. She has as many irons as there are fires."

I bit my lip. Should I? It was a risk. But when would I ever have an occasion like this again to speak with one of the few entities that might have a decent grasp of her? The Wandering Bard was a shadow cast on everything I had been trying to accomplish.

"What is she after?" I asked. "I used to think it was destroying what was made of Praes, but this is too much. Too large. She didn't need a crusade to accomplish that."

"I thought I understood her, once," the Dead King pensively said. "Then she ruined me with a smile on her lips. A dozen times again did the two of us dance that dance, and yet even now she remains inscrutable in her intent. Know her to be your foe, and that in this game of ours there is nothing more dangerous than allowing the others to grasp your heart's desire."

"But I should trust you," I said. "Because Evil is one big happy family, give or take the occasional knife in the back."

He laughed.

"Never trust me," he advised. "Or anyone else. Those are the last remnants of who you once were seeking to shackle you. You will betray me, if we make bargain. Or I will betray you. That is the nature of things."

His arm left mine and he smiled gently.

"I need you to understand, Catherine, that none of it should be taken a slight," Neshamah told me. "That even if you wound me most grievously, there is nothing to bar you from seeking me out for alliance in centuries to come. That if rip out the heart of you, it is not a declaration of war: it is simply a single tide in a very old sea, and in time it will pass. All things do, in the end. Save for us."

"You do not sound like a man who wants to make an alliance," I said.

"Yet I will listen to your offers, and accept them should they suit," the Dead King said. "I am in no hurry. Neither are you, though you have yet to grasp that truth."

He patted my hands affectionately.

"You are about to begin a journey, Catherine Foundling. They will hound you," Neshamah said, "to the ends of Creation. No matter where you flee, no matter how you plead and bargain and reason. They will scour the impurities from you until all that is left is the devil they feared all along. And when you rise from that grave of ash, crawling through blood and smoke?"

He smiled.

"I will be waiting on the other side."

I swallowed, though my mouth was dry.

"The day is yet young," the Hidden Horror said, looking down at the slaughter that once took place beneath his walls. "Let us return, and speak of earthly treaties."

A drop of darkness touched the world, and like ink in water is spread. It was mere moments, before I sat before the table again. The meat on my plate was still warm.

My hands were trembling, and I could not bring myself to believe it was not warranted.

—

I watched moonlight wash over the Crown of the Dead in silence. We'd spoken with the Dead King for more than an hour after the meal was finished, but I'd been unable to concentrate as much as I should. Hakram had done most of the talking, presenting our offer and terms of alliance. Nothing I hadn't known before. I'd provide the invitation out of his Hell, in exchange for limits on how much he could swallow. No promises of assistance in the defence of Callow required, none offered in his battles against the Tenth Crusade – though I'd left the door open for further dealings there. I did not intend to ever cross that threshold, but the pretence that I might should be enticement in its own way. Neshamah was, after all, preying on my desperation. He would suck that teat try if he could. No accord had been reached. The Hidden Horror told us the offer was worth considering, and that he would do so with due diligence. We were to meet again tomorrow at twilight, for further discussion of the proposed treaties. It was not a refusal, at least. I suspected that if the Dead King had been uninterested in the terms he would have made that clear without stringing us along, but that was just a feeling. As Akua had pointed out afterwards, the longer we remained in Keter the better his bargaining position became.

If we stayed here long enough, there'd be no time for further preparation of Callow.

That should have weighed on me. The possibility that this dark gambit would come to nothing, and I'd walk from Keter with nothing to show for it. But it wasn't what my mind was lingering on. To him, all the treaties in the world were nothing but play-acting. I'd gotten a glimpse of what Neshamah believed Creation was, and it was nothing that a makeshift bargain could truly change. The kingdoms, the armies, the borders – they were just ink on maps. The Pilgrim was willing to let Callow burn if it meant the Grand Alliance turned its swords to the Kingdom of the Dead, but the abomination had never once been worried about that. Gods, he didn't even need to fight them did he? He could just wait them out. Let the petty feuds of mortals tear apart that ambitious edifice. A century or two of keeping to his borders meant nothing to a creature like that. As long as the Serenity kept churning out soldiers, kept growing within the hellscape, he would pull further ahead. Because his realm doesn't fight itself, while Calernia is a tinder box no matter the era. And that was the entity I meant to use for my purposes. It scared me, that he'd outright said he wouldn't much care if I did. Because it meant that all of this was a passing distraction to him. Nothing that really mattered.

The flare of the match drove back the dark, for a moment, until I flicked it away. The wakeleaf in my pipe brought a sharp taste to my mouth when I inhaled, pouring away when I spat out a stream of smoke. The highest ring of the Silent Palace offered a beautiful view of the madness below. Wyverns passed the skies, silent save for the batting of wings, while in quiet streets the dead marched in blind patrols. Athal had brought me to the balcony when I'd asked for a view, and I'd remained here ever since. My hands itched for a bottle, but I'd forced myself to indulge other vices. I could think of few things more foolish than getting drunk in Keter, much as it would have relieved me. Hakram had already come and gone, getting me to eat from a plate when I did not truly need to and then sitting in silence. Offering wordlessly to listen, if I wanted to talk. I had not taken him up on it, for once. Neither Indrani nor Masego had come up. They tended to avoid me, when I was in a mood. Vivienne had passed to discuss the treaties for a half hour, and left when she realized my mind was only halfway there. It was time, I supposed, for the sixth to make an appearance.

Akua Sahelian was a sight, under moonlight, and how I'd shaped her had little to do with it. She'd had a touch of the eerie even before the changes, that too-perfect look Praesi highborn had bred into their lines. Soninke more than Taghreb, true, but the difference was less than you'd think. Aisha was from a family long past its glory, and she was still worth more than a passing look. Diabolist's gown of silver and blue bunched up around her body as she leant against the balustrade by my side. I drew from the pipe and blew the mouthful of smoke out.

"And here you are," I said. "The proverbial devil on my shoulder."

"Is that to be my purpose?" Akua mused. "Let us spin wicked weaves, then. You lack not for enemies to entrap."

"You've got games afoot," I said. "I knew you would when I let you out. But I am not in the mood for them tonight, Sahelian."

"No," she said softly. "Evidently not. You spoke with the Dead King, without our knowledge."

My fingers tightened against the dragonbone shaft. I forced them to loosen.

"I did," I admitted.

"Such a creature can foster madness with but a sentence, when speaking to the weak-minded," she told me. "I would not put stock in what it peddled."

"An interesting thought," I said. "Since a lot of what it peddled sounded like Praesi rhetoric."

"We have our exalted," Akua said. "Triumphant, Traitorous. The Maleficents and the Terribilises. Yet there is reason we do not hallow Trismegistus' name so. Terror and awe are not treasured bedfellow among my kind. Our favourite gods are those that bleed."

"God, huh," I mused. "I keep hearing people throw that word around. Been guilty of that as well. But to this day I'm not sure what it means."

"There are those that would say the term is a mere recognition of power," the shade said.

I inhaled the smoke, filling my lungs before releasing.

"And you?"

"A fulcrum, perhaps," Akua said. "Nothing more or less than the point on which levers pivot. The weight of it is to be respected, but not held sacred."

"Except for the ones that get capitalized," I said.

"Oh," Diabolist said quietly, "not even those. When Below taught us of holy betrayal, it did not hold itself separate. It might be the single truest form of worship, to betray even our patrons."

There was a deep and abiding madness to the Wasteland, I thought. It had sunk into the bones of that land, mottled the souls of the people that dwelled within it. And still, part of me sung to hear the words. The unrelenting defiance in the face of even the Gods. Praes had shaped Callow as much as the other way around. In that tight embrace of need and hatred, we had each served as the crucible of the other. Diabolist would betray even the Gods, if she rose from that betrayal, and she was in so many ways the personification of the worst and the best of her homeland. I thought of John Farrier and his hard eyes, long lost to Summer's fire. Of Brandon Talbot, who would ride for Callow under any banner he could. Even of William, that tragedy of good intentions. Would you hold a grudge against even the Gods? I knew the answer to that, sure as my own heartbeat. To small slights, long prices.

There were none in this world or any that stood exempt from my people's rancour.

"You put up a fight," I suddenly said.

Scarlet eyes turned to me.

"What you did, Akua, it's not something I'll ever forgive," I murmured. "You showed me that, you know? That even as heroine I would have had no truck with absolution."

"It should not be forgiven," Diabolist said. "What are you, if you were wrong in this? That hatred should be stoked and kept burning, lest you forget the lessons it taught you."

I smiled ruefully.

"But you put up a fight," I said. "Against odds I'd flinch at. Against people that scare me still, for all the power I've gained. If there is any part of you that I can respect, it's that you might have been a monster but you were never once a coward."

"One of my ancestor once said that the spurs to greatness are never gentle," Akua said, sounding almost whimsical. "Mother often repeated that to me, when I balked at my sharper lessons."

"Did you really?" I asked. "Balk. Even once."

"I had a cradle-sister," Diabolist said. "One who shared my wet nurse. She was also charged with taking my canings until I reached an age where healing sorcery would not hamper my growth, but that was a rare enough occurrence. Her name was Zain. Common as dirt. I loved her, I suppose, in a way that children love those who so thoughtlessly love them back."

It was horrifying, deep down, that nothing of what had been spoken came as a surprise to me.

"When I was eight years old, Mother took me to the deepest chamber of the old labyrinths and put a stone knife in my hand," Akua said. "Zain lay prone on the altar, mind clouded by potions. Yet she was aware enough to know my face and reach out to me. She was scared, you see. Shivering like a doe. She was right to."

"You killed her," I said.

"My affection made her a valuable offering," the shade replied. "I had to be slapped twice before I cut her throat, and even then my reluctance made the wound a shallow one."

Akua laughed softly.

"That was the part I regretted most, in later years," she said. "She would have bled out twice as quickly, had my hand been steady. That was my mother's lesson, dear heart. Hesitation is never a virtue: faltering is only ever the mother of agony."

"Your mother was a monster," I quietly said.

"Mother was a failure," Akua said amusedly. "A far greater sin, in her eyes and mine."

I pulled at pipe again, standing silent under the insolent radiance of the moon.

"How much of that was a lie?" I finally asked.

"Not a word," Diabolist said. "Why bother, when the truth serves my purposes?"

"It doesn't change anything," I said. "You still are who you are. You still made the choices that you did."

"Oh, that was not my intent," Diabolist said. "The most important part of this tale is the moral, as your people are so fond of having."

The shade smiled.

"Do not hesitate, dearest Catherine," Akua Sahelian said. "If you are to cut the world, it is best to have a steady hand."

---

Big Brother

And this is why I love Akua as a character.

TeK

Also, she got really weighty tits.

danh3107

God Bless

NerfContessa

Interestingly enough, Zain in the bwsiqn dialect means to wait....

Insanenoodlyguy

For a sec there I really thought Cat was gonna kiss her. Oh she'd know it was incredibly stupid, I just thought she was in a place where stupid was more possible.

ArkhCthuul

The third near perfect chapter in a row.

I am in awe.

And agreed, Akua is growing on us. Like a radioactive, parasitic, mind afflicting fungus. :p

Rey d`Tutto

Toxoplasmosis Gondii has got nothing on Ubua.

Vhostym

Terrifying. But not very surprising. I wasn't completely sure what the Dead King's deal was with his restraint, but him being bound in a literal sense to his Serenity was unlikely, and this seems like a fairly good display of why. I'm still confused as to why Cat didn't absorb the Bard's memories from the echo with her and Neshamah, but it seems like even larger of a loss now.

TeK

I think she did. And it's not mentioned only because EE is a tease. Also, I think he is bound, but not in the way she thought. It's not that he can't leave Serenity per se, it's that he can't leave it without repercussions (of Evil). Invitation provides for him a fixed role, as a weapon of sorts. He is just a side story, and so does not risk destruction. Cat lets demon out of the box, and Heroes get him back in the box. He loses nothing.

Exrot

I feel like Cat would probably end up the same if she played the long game. Hand out a few titles, let good drive her back into Arcadia and make sure they know she's staying out of Creation, only leave once every few decades when called upon but let her titled companions join villainous groups at their leisure and hand out lesser titles to notables occasionally.

stevenneiman

He's almost like an evil Choir. Sure, he's less interventionist than they are, but just like them he needs the fig leaf of being called on by a villain before he's allowed to come out to play without consequences.

Javvies

They might try that on the way back from Keter.

Metalshop

Woof. That was a heavy one. The quality of this serial is always consistently good, but every once in a while we get one like this, where the skin of a character is peeled back we get to see some real artistry.

Well done.

matesbe

I can't help but like this Akua, despite myself. And that like from Cat... "If there is any part of you that I can respect, it's that you might have been a monster but you were never once a coward."

A great chapter.

And the Dead King... he is every bit the Eldrich abomination that he seemed. Except when Ranger is around. That was somewhat anti-climactic.

stevenneiman

I wonder if he considers her to be among the eternal. She's almost as hard to kill as he is in her own very direct way, and as a result she's one of the very few villains who actually gets much use out of the theoretically infinite lifespan. I don't think she could actually take on the Kingdom of the Dead if she was trying to do more than have a bit of fun with some undead super soldiers and annoy the Dead King, but I'm not so sure he could kill her either.

Javvies

Probably not – Ranger is a half-Elf (IIRC), and Named, but there's a difference between Ranger's having functional immortality as a Named and having a Mantle of Power like Winter, or what the Dead King probably got through his ascension ritual.

Ranger is "just" a Named. Cat is the Queen of Winter and a Named(technically, she's still the Squire, if barely).

narcoduck

On the other hand, she leveled up enough to think she can take on the Summer Queen. Her aspects, after all, are Learn, Perfect, and Transcend. Perhaps she transcended into her own lesser godhood.

Komploding

I don't think Cat is Named anymore, something about her not having enough of a soul left to hold one, that's how she escaped killing Black no?

Kartik Chawla

The Aspects mentioned are of Ranger, he isn't talking about Cat.

Komploding

Ops mb

stevenneiman

I'm not so sure. Remember that the Bard has basically no direct power of any sort from any source. All she has is what I assume to be Name memories taken to such an extreme that they take over the Name's host completely. Also, the Dead King himself has admitted that he could be killed in the right circumstances, so I feel like all that really leaves as a criteria is that someone must have a realistic shot at living indefinitely. Most villains don't because being a villain usually attracts heroes able to kill them. Cat is on the verge of being powerful enough to become a fixture of the world rather than a threatened player, and I think Ranger passed that threshold long ago considering that she goes out looking for the greatest challenges in the world, including beings like the Queen of Summer, just to assuage her boredom.

MetruX

The Queen of Summer and the King of The Dead aswell. But remember she never fought this guy directly, and neither finished her fight with the Queen, she retreated, even hurt. So yes, she is a whole league above the Calamities, but still under those of the most powerfull "small" figures. Call it small here because all of them are still part of the Gods game.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Counter-interpretation: Ranger chooses not to kill the worthy prey because then she couldn't hunt them again. She's also apparently had a history with the Saint of Swords, and from Saint and the Queen of Summer's survival of this and Ranger's repeated eye-gouging of Larat, I've begun to suspect that Ranger's hunting MO (Dead King notwithstanding) is "track down, beat down, wander off without killing whoever was important."

frolamiz

Did you not notice the "her" when he spoke of their little immortal club?

I believe it could only refer to The Wandering Bard, Triumphant or Ranger. There may be a good reason for him to put up with her whims.

Morgenstern

Context of what follows would point slightly more to him meaning the Intercessor in her various names/Names and ever-the-same Role, though.

Morgenstern

And he seemed to talk about Triumphant being one who *got close* – but then *lost* before actually ascending.

stevenneiman

One small thing: Didn't Hakram make Cat swear a binding oath never to drink while at war? I ask because she's definitely still at war but it mentioned her drinking a bit of wine to be polite.

Death Knight

The oath was only in effect until Hakram rejoined Cat.

Javvies

It was while she was on campaign. And/or when he wasn't around.

He's around, and they're not on campaign at the moment, but on a diplomatic mission.

RoflCat

When he's not around I believe.

Hakurei06

a binding oath not to do so while in the job, either in the court or on the field, so long as he isn't with her.

Hakram was away then, but isn't now.

Stormblessed

Apotheosis Hun?

Akua's backstory bun?

The Wandering Bard's apotheosis???

Aeon

This was just fantastic. It's one of my favorites in a long while. The greeting between immortals was great, and I liked Akua's little chat. She's not to be trusted, but there's a part of me that just wants to see her stay loyal, if only because it's so interesting to see the juxtaposition between her and Cat and the Woe.

ayon96

It won't be Akua if she doesn't stab in the back at the first chance she gets!

Someguy

If you find yourself liking Akua, it's a trap and she's playing you.

Decius

If you find yourself disliking Akua, she's playing you and it's a trap.

Byzantine

It's interesting how Cat assumes the Dead King is wrong about her. She really has yet to come to terms with what she is, now. Akua showed how her Mantle can really be used, but even she was barely dipping her toe into it. She is the Queen of Winter in all but name. And I suspect she can fix that by simply... letting it happen.

Also interesting that the Dead King doesn't actually care about current events at all. He is ever patient, and he is waiting. He simply... wanted an introduction to a new god, one that he has a feeling will be important.

Novice

There is a danger to becoming the Queen of Winter in full that's worse than Principle Alienation or being stuck in a cycle or even the possibility of having a Summer counterpart in Creation: Catherine's loss of her tactical acumen. As we've seen whenever she dips into Winter, she completely loses everything that she has learned so far, a regression of character development which is a no-no in a meta-narrative sense.

Byzantine

Yes, and so it is a question of how she will maintain her sense of self as she draws deeper on Winter. I suspect as Winter becomes more her the effect will be less pronounced. The question is how long that will take, and if Cat will find a way to cheat to skip the waiting.

MetruX

One of my endgame theories is just this, a way to bind Winter to her without most of the bad repercussions, in the form of a brand new Name. Something specifically "tailored" for that.

Piotr Tokarski

Still Akua managed to overcome most of these issues when controlling Cat, which makes me think that this could be mitigated (especially with Hierophant support).

Byzantine

Nah, Akua was better than Cat, but she had nowhere near the power of the Queen of Summer. And that is the level of power Cat really has, now. She just never realized she was only calling on a fraction of Winter, for the mantle was simply too deep.

daegone823

I love the dead king is like where immortals so dont worry if you kill my armies or I kill yours we still cool at the end of the day.

Kind of explains why he is OK with rangers tactics. Chat is now considered maybe not his equal but a peer to him. They wills till play game/roles but since he is going to be sharing his time with her in the coming millennia he just wanted to welcome her, how sweet

Chat has a new father figure/mentor/enemy/horrifying nightmare

stevenneiman

I don't think the Dead King is so much OK with Ranger's behavior as powerless to stop it without wasting a lot more resources than she ruins and taking a lot of risks he can't afford to take with the Heavens gunning for him.

BryceWilliam

Ranger is to him what white caps are to large companies. they find holes in their security and point them out in a harmless way and the company pays them a nice sum. The Dead King gets exploitable holes pointed out and Ranger gets her favorite wine and a good fight.

Rook

Except instead of a white hat you hire she's more of an unwelcome one that keeps changing your screensaver to lemonparty, and you really wish she'd cut it out

Euodiachloris

Eh. The light trolling is still worth fewer bugs in the security framework. *shrugs* Besides, there's worth in dangling the dislike her pranks cause out where she can see: it keeps her coming back without explicitly inviting her to.

Because the minute Ranger feels as if she's completely welcome, she'll quit harassing the guards and him. That way, everybody loses out on training opportunities.

stevenneiman

I hadn't thought of that, but now that you mention it I could see it just being the Dead King playing off Ranger's natural defiance. If he ever stopped giving her the disapproval she craves I imagine she would either lose interest and stop providing valuable security checks, or else step up her behavior to a level that would cause him actual trouble.

On the other hand, Ranger is defined by her ability to do what others consider impossible, so if there's anyone who could actually exasperate him it would be her.

Metrux

The act comes even more into play when you consider the faces he used to deal with her, and how it is ever different for her, while still having the same wine she likes.

Novice

Is Cat becoming Chat a meme now? I see this way more often nowadays.

Allafterme

Suppose to mean Cheshire Cat. The metaphor still feels like going against the grain though.

Agent J

I've never understood that explanation. What exactly is it about Catherine that brings to mind a Cheshire Cat? It certainly isn't her personality, powers, or position in the story.

I think Novice's understanding makes the most sense.

Yotz

>What exactly is it about Catherine that brings to mind a Cheshire Cat

Probably a response to question about usage of "Chat" explaining the "Chat" thing as a "Cheshire Cat" abbreviation after the chapter where Cat is described smiling from ear to ear with distinctly inhuman smile, and some speculation about abnormal amount of teeth said inhuman smile shows in the comment section of the stated chapter.

Also, the grammar of the person constantly using the designation in question for the protagonist allows to suspect usage of skewed autocorrect algorithms in said person's mobile device, constantly replacing "Cat" with "Chat" because of gigoformatted autofill functions.

Or Novice is right, of course.

Byzantine

No, it's always that same guy who makes that mistake.

Novice

Ah, a troll then.

SpeckofStardust

oh, I know what he wants, he doesn't want her to be a dead set enemy.

After all if they fight its one thing, but if she comes to think that he must fall, well the effort to deal with her would give an opening to the other parties in existence. That would see them both dead.

Benztaubensaeure

Damn that was a great chapter. The best thing, besides the characters, is that i still have no idea what is going to happen. This chapter widens roads that were not as prominent before (immortality, more Akua etc.), resulting in even more possible events and outcomes. After the whole Cat basically sets up her own death agreement, possibly even before i would have said this entire thing ends with her dying (still my most valid theory), but now other outcomes seem realistic. Just fantastic.

Death Knight

"Hesssitation is alwayss eassy. Rarely usseful."

Andrew Mitchell

*nods*

daegone823

Just wondering is this how the fae made peace. Two extremely powerful being Summer queen and WInrwe king made peace and were like look lets continually send are forces against each other that way we can never truly be wiped out. You take summer and I will take winter so its symbolic.

The way The Dead king phrased it with a dont take anything personal between immortals was sort of how I saw the relationship between the big bads of the fae world.

stevenneiman

Actually, the way that Summer and Winter existed for so long was because each was renewed with the turning of the seasons. Every year one of them achieved victory and wiped the other out completely and enjoyed their triumph for a time before wiping themselves out and clearing the stage for the coming of Autumn and Spring, which in turn give way to Summer and Winter again. They only ever escaped the cycle because the Winter King grew more hostile to the cycle than he was towards Summer and arranged for Cat to force the marriage.

Katreu

I presume this is a mechanical mistake but what an amazing (accidental?) quote by Akua here.

>> "A fulcrum, perhaps," Akua said. "Nothing more or less than the point on which levers pivot. The weight of tit is to be respected, but not held sacred."

The weight of tit indeed.

Novice

Robert Baratheon approves.

John Smith

First Black, now Dead King. Catherine you attract the oddest mentors.

TeK

Nah, as long as it's not Tyrant or Hierarch, they are not really oddest.

stevenneiman

I agree with TeK. Black and the Dead King might be mysterious, but they aren't peculiar the way that some of the characters are. Both of them seem to actually have the same simple and reasonable objective, of out-cheating the Heavens.

And speaking of our dear Tyrant, I'm dying (and possibly returning in service to the Dead King) to see what that trick is that he managed to get past the Heavens.

Euodiachloris

Finagling the Hierarch situation in ways Bard didn't see coming to plop Anaxares into the hot seat will not be the only result of what he did, no. That's a given. 😊

Tohron

Well, the Tyrant's thing is wanting people to be able to act according to their own nature, and his big maneuver was putting someone singlemindedly committed to enforcing the will of the people – with no regard to the will of the Gods – in charge of the Free Cities. The story play is that now the Gods Above and the angels have to respect that a sizable region has now removed itself from the usual story constraints.

stevenneiman

That's actually a quite reasonable possibility, especially given that his first act as Heirarch other than trying to refuse his authority as Heirarch was to order the Wandering Bard arrested, and that her Name seemed to respond to that exactly the same way as an immediate threat to her life. Which makes sense because if he could arrange to have her effectively imprisoned it might potentially hamstring the entire side of Good for a potentially unlimited span.

Jane

You know, it's been mentioned multiple times that Cat is now a goddess, but... Hey, someone actually acknowledged it, and it's ramifications. Akua kind of touched on it, but her perspective was rather limited; here's someone frankly acknowledging that she's now above the world in a way that not even the Named are, and can play a greater game than others. No wonder she's rattled, when she feels like she hardly ever has time to plan past the next day. Unless she gets herself killed, it's likely that she'll live long past a time when Callow is still recognizable, unless she decides to find a way to take Callow out of creation the same way that the Dead King did.

Though, hum, that does open a new possibility, doesn't it... I doubt the Guide will go in this direction, but she could literally become the patron goddess of Callow. Hand off her crown to a mortal Queen, and hang around as a goddess called in to protect Callow from her foes, and watch over Callow's winters. Maybe even set up a few churches in her name; it'd be reassuring to the people to have a goddess who actually answers their prayers, even if the priests have to send her a letter.

The Dead King has a pretty fool-proof plan, doesn't he? Just... Sit back, and let the centuries do his work for him. It's not a story that the mortal realm can do much about, since someone who only lives a hundred years will feel a need to do something within that hundred years, rather than work together to give their grandchildren an army that can challenge Keter. In the meantime, he gets to run his realm outside of creation without any tedious interruptions.

It'll be nice for her to have a piece on the board that she can always recognize, though. Whether as an ally or an obstacle, to one who will live millennia, it will be nice to have something that you can recognize throughout the years, and who won't just die off as soon as you look away. It's the kind of thing that is well known (in fiction) to drive a person to insanity after a few lifespans; having someone she can talk to will keep her grounded. Arguably. Kind of. Maybe she should look into making the rest of the Woe gods as well.

Though, uh, I guess she gets to keep Akua for all eternity? The Dead King seems certain the rest of the Woe will die in time, but that doesn't really apply to a soul in a cape, does it? That doesn't really sound like what she was aiming for as Akua's punishment...

Speaking of Akua, though... It doesn't really feel like she properly passed her empathy check here. She was probably the only person who Cat could talk to about this (possibly Masego, but he's not really good with the human side of it), but it doesn't really seem to have helped much. Well, just being able to draw her into a different topic probably helped in its own way, at least.

TeK

You touched on the matter that makes me think: what if we are watching the birth (or rather a rebirth) of pantheon gods? Cat will be patron goddess of Callow and winters, whelp, this world need balance, so soon every nation will get it's own god. Then they will have their cults, their champions, and Good and Evil will simply lose their significance in those fifty shades of grey.

NZPIEFACE

The Whitecaps? A bunch of mountains which are encased in snow all year-round.

MetruX

Not only winters, she'll come out every moonless night, so seven days for each twenty eight 😊 Also, this theory about she becoming a goddess that only comes to help has appeared before, long before, back when she was discussing things with Black and Malicia about the DOOM machine.

Alivaril

The Ranger interlude prepared me for someone entertaining, but this was something else entirely. As in, I think the Dead King is my favorite non-Woe character now. I mean, a few people seem to be saying, "confirmed Eldritch Abomination," but aside from the bit on trust, he might actually be the sanest member of the entire cast. I sincerely hope he isn't called the Hidden Horror because of that being a pretense.

TeK

More likely, he's called Hidden Horror exactly because he is so sane and rational. I mean, what's more terrifying: someone who commits atrocities because of Evulz, or for a cold and rational reason?

donforrester456

Being sane in an insane world is insanity.

Xellso-_^

It is really wrong to ship Cat and Akua together?

Jane

Well, looking at it through that lens, Cat did kind of accidentally marry Akua when she bound her sentient soul to her cloak for all eternity, without considering what eternity meant to one truly immortal...

Unorginal

Even Better, Akua's no longer bound to the cloak anymore but winter itself. She's bound to Cat even closer.

I say 60,000 years will be enough time for wounds to close and an understanding between the two. Then... wedding bells.

More seriously though, I have no idea whether or not Erratica will have Akua literally, figuratively or effectively destroyed before the ending of the story or turned into Cat's 'loyal' and 'trusted' adviser/freind/hatedally/lover for eternity.

Decius

Disloyal and untrusted, but competent and playing the long game. For two immortals, that means "not likely to betray you this century".

Yotz

Even more – evidently deceitful but competent adviser would serve an immortal ruler as a constant energizer, keeping her sharp and purposeful, forcing her to fight the lethargy of the Great Slow Beast, and whipping her to constantly rage against the dying light. ...or dying Night in Cat's case.

frolamiz

Yeah. Everyone is underestimating The Dead King so much. Except the bard of course.

frolamiz

Oh, and The Dead King is REALLY good at knowing things happening out of his kingdom, to the point I suspect an aspect. I mean, he know about the conversation between The Wandering Bard and Hierarch.

TeK

"They will hound you," Neshamah said, "to the ends of Creation. No matter where you flee, no matter how you plead and bargain and reason. They will scour the impurities from you until all that is left is the devil they feared all along. "

Is that the bitterness I hear? #GoodDeadKing ftw.

But on more serious note, now I understand Ubuah more. All Villains are technically immortal, but as Neshamah hinted, some are more immortal than others. And Ubuah's endgame makes so much more sense now. She's going to be the most trusted treacherous underling to the Goddess of Winter.

Also, it's really funny in hindsight that Dead King basically invited Cat because he is so very lonely. He literally said that earthly matters matter not to him.

Rook

I don't think that part was genuine. All the rest of it might have been, but the bit about being hounded was a surgical targeted attack.

It hits every sore spot of Catherine's both short term and long term. Ever since she was the squire (or even before, when she was an orphan) she's been hounded nonstop by enemies or troubles, and she's very visibly showing the fatigue of it. On top of that the factor that brought her to the current breaking point is that all her reasoning and bargaining and pleading with the Crusade is falling on near completely deaf ears.

Amongst all those great truths and honest opinions he slid a well-worded knife into her hopes of ever getting to the light at the end of the tunnel – saying it won't ever change, THEY won't ever change until you force them to.

On top of that Akua just took her chance to twist the knife afterwards. Don't hesitate, no half measures? Near perfect push over the edge when Cat was rattled after the Dead King's stroll. The very moment Catherine voiced that she respected Akua for her fight, that was a turning point. Akua just won a major victory as far as pushing Cat down the Praesi mindset rabbit hole and she damn well knew it the moment she heard the words.

RanVor

The scariest part is that both Neshamah and Akua are absolutely right.

There's no reasoning with the enemy who believes you're a threat to their continued survival. No matter what you say or do, they will never let you live. No price is too high to pay for your destruction, for in their mind, it's you or them. There's no middle ground. Your only choices are to let them kill you, or adopt the same mindset and fight back with everything you have.

Fighting half-heartedly leads only to more bloodshed and suffering. When you strike, you must crush your enemy utterly, lest they come back stronger and more determined than before, until they wear you down. When you defend, you must leave no openings, lest your enemy exploits every one of them, leaving all you've built in ruin. You mustn't grant mercy, for you won't be given mercy in return.

Being Evil is like running from a fire up a tree. You know it's not smart, but you do it anyway because you see no other way. And the higher you are, the more desperate you grow, until you're willing to sacrifice anything to escape the fire.

That's how monsters are born.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Cat is talking with a monster who killed his entire city to rise to godhood. She's planning to unleash the Dead King, the "original abomination".

The Dead King sees the road ahead of her, and he thinks that in time she can become like him. It would be better to turn and go into the fire than to embrace becoming an evil that would turn Callow into the Kingdom of the Dead.

Offset Crank

You say that but his "people" live in peaceful harmony in a hidden dimension protected by the valued ancestors who willingly volunteer to serve on their death.

Its almost Cats dream, her people protected and unassailable by almost any means.

Snowfire1224

Wasn't there a comment early on in the first book when Cat met Black about how the real devils give you exactly what you want and let you find your own way to hell?

RanVor

Out of several replies I thought up for you, I choose this one: do you really think someone who spat in the face of the Angels and usurped Fae for power would consider suicide an option?

MetruX

More than that, I must agree with them both being right in this point. The methods they used to get there are wrong, but the precept is true: When you act it must be with all you have, no half-measures. That's not only for villains either, it's even a real life thing, taught from ancient times, that to be kind to your enemy is to be cruel upon your allies. The plan you choose can and will change, but after you have a plan, no hesitation is allowed, you must go through.

RanVor

That's what I originally wrote, but Dylan Tull's Heavens-mandated perception filter parsed this as "all hail Dead King" or something, which is not what I meant, but I decided to reply anyway.

SpeckofStardust

She offered to die to the Grey Pilgrim to save Callow, so if the terms were right she would without hesitation.

Byzantine

It was all an attack.

But it was also all completely true.

The best monsters have no need to lying. The truth is a far more horrifying weapon.

Azure

Catherine was very stupid to turn away her most trusted advisers Hakram and Vivienne, and instead listen to Akua. She's done this to herself with very poor decision making, which is really frustrating to see.

Ok so yeah The Dead King just told her she's immortal. She can die, but guess what, she gets to come back. Suck it up Catherine, and stop making terrible decisions on some ridiculous teenage angst premise. 'Oh woe is me, I am immortal, the horror!'

And speaking of Woe, Catherine has something the DK and Bard do not, and this is her own band of trusted friends. She doesn't have to be alone on her journey, but if she keeps making dumbass decisions and allow Akua her ear, then that might lead to the Woe falling apart.

Hellspirit

I shiver

Rook

I feel like for all the power that the Winter Mantle gave her, the real apotheosis – the real turning point – just happened here.

The change in mindset, the slight change in perspective from an unfiltered exposure to the hidden horror, with the following moment of weakness being shored up by a shade of one of the most singlemindedly pure Praesi monsters to come along for centuries? That's going to have far greater consequences down the road than any mantle or Name power.

She just stared into the abyss called the Dead King and the abyss grabbed her by the throat rather than bothering to stare back. He poisoned her **perspective**, and I doubt this kind of poison is going to be one that wanes with time.

Gunslinger

This is a really good point

frolamiz

A very good point.

That remind me of one of the quotes attributed to him:

"I stared into the abyss and found what stared back... wanting."

nick012000

Am I the only one who's sort of pitying Akua after that little bit of her backstory there?

I sort of wonder how often Praesi children turn their knives on their parents when they pull that stunt.

Nethermore

I'm guessing the parents know to teach their children to fear them enough first, so that they don't make that mistake.

Byzantine

I'm pretty sure the Praesi would agree if the child can succeed it was not a mistake.

Euodiachloris

No, you're not the only one. Praesi High Lord's are so fixated on "bigger, harder, stronger, better", they've forgotten to let themselves (and their children) be people.

When you view being human as inferior and only something holding you back, you kind of lose sight of the fact that the fae and the gods are supposed to be so much more... But, yet, it's the supposedly flawed mortals they need to have play the game in the first place.

The godly fae with their "sublime" and "splendid" nature's... failed. And, the very creation of the game is a failure, too. Since the minute either (or both) side(s) get an answer they don't like, they'll just try for a best of three, five or seven. 🤪

Yotz

"Do you remember that night, Father?"

"Night when you dared to rise against me? Night when you outwitted me, stabbed me in the back, and forced me to flee from my own manor? Of course I remember that night! It was the happiest night in my life!"

Nethermore

So it seems the Dead King isn't looking to marry... yet.

Also, Akua is great at playing shoulder-devil. Hey, Cat could actually downsize her so she'd fit on her shoulder!

MetruX

My god, I can never see her doing it, but I definitely want to see this xD

Novice

"Our favourite gods are those that bleed." Gods, I love this line so much. Speaks so much of Praesi culture. So good!

burdi

So, Cat came to The Dead King with many plan to use him for their purpose yet, the answer is simple...she being cornered because she hesitate
She already has the power to repel the crusade, she just doesnt have the right mindset

Novice

To add to everything else, I think he is lying, or at the very least misleading, when the Dead King says he doesn't care what goes outside his borders. His "Finally" line at the epilogue of Book III is the biggest proof so far.

frolamiz

Or it could be that the orb only detect the birth of a potential new member for his little club. It was only précised that it had not lit since Triumphant, nothing more, nothing less, and this scene was just a little after Catherine let winter loose.

Event if I am wrong, since he obviously only comment about the orb lighting up, it does not particularly mean that it has anything to do with "earthly matters".

Antoninjohn

Cat does have the big escalation button with the mantles of Winter she can handout, after all Winter has almost Unlimited Power so if Cat wants to escalate she can just make her entire army into Winter Named, thousands of Named into an army requires a lot of force to beat

NZPIEFACE

Those aren't named in a traditional sense. Also, there's only so many people you can give court titles.

Antoninjohn

But the limit is hundreds of thousands at least, Winter is very powerful

Antony444

And so it begins...

The words of the Grey Pilgrim seems more hollow than ever. If the Dead King really wanted to crush the Good-aligned nations he could do so at any moment. There were hundreds of thousands soldiers in the Sixth Crusade, perhaps more in the Seventh...and each generation makes the Dead King more powerful. The Crusades in fact seem to give him more corpses to harvest.

Procer, Levant and Ashur have nearly zero chance to end the King of Death. He will outlast them all and should a Crusade be launched after the Victorious Tenth, he would exterminate the invaders once more.

I liked very much how the Undead Abomination spoke of the Choir of Contrition. They were treated as naughty and ignorant children, not as true opponents.

I can't wait to see what the Wandering Bard and the Tyrant of Helike have planned.

And one word after the next, Catherine begins her descent further into the darkness...

Dylan Tullos

Antony444:

It's true that the Choir of Contrition only seems to have one great victory.

But don't forget that it was Contrition that birthed the first and greatest of all the Crusades, bringing down Triumphant at the height of her power.

MetruX

The true problem with contrition is not power, but the lack of learning, and that is what he implies. They used to be great, and think the same formula will still make them great, but it doesn't, not anymore.

Andrew Mitchell

> "Oh yes," Neshamah murmured. "And they will pay for that, in time. That delightful child in Helike wove a trap for them right under the Intercessor's nose. I expect the end of that play to be nothing less than magnificent."

> The Tyrant, he meant. I forced myself not to stiffen. I'd expected him to take a swing soon, either a Procer or whatever nation was limping heaviest at the time. This was a hint there was another game afoot, though. And I doubted it had been offered lightly.

Any ideas about the trap The Tyrant has in store?

mórrígan

There's no way to know. I don't think we've heard heads nor tails of Tyrant in this book, so we'll probably get it covered in an interlude or something. I admit, I'm curious myself. A trap so well crafted that not only will Bard be caught flat-footed, but (somehow) not well enough that the Dead King can easily recognize it as one. That's quite a slim margin for efficacy, as far as plans go.

Perhaps an excess of Stupid Evil (with no small amount of genre savviness) is the best way to deal with the Intercessor? Catherine should take notes.

NZPIEFACE

John Harrier? Who is that again?

burdi

Captain of the Gallowborne, he was dead when fifteen fought against summer court in dormer

The Warren Peace NFL Report

John Farrior, but yes, burdi is correct

Cold Cyberia

Hi EE, just wanted to let you know that the chapter's not appearing in the Table of Contents (at least not for me).

erraticerrata

Yeah, it seems to not have taken when I put in the link. Should be fixed.

Anonymoose

Did Cat forget to request that Black and his companions be left alone?

Metrux

Why would she ask of that? She has no direct line to them, and also, they must die for both her and Black's plan. Sure, it isn't to be now, and she will mourn his death, but they both agree he will end up dead so... If she has no direct line of fealty and he will die eventually, why ask for their safety?

mindsword2

"You will betray me, if we make bargain. Or I will betray you. That is the nature of things."

His arm left mine and he smiled gently.

"I need you to understand, Catherine, that none of it should be taken a slight," Neshamah told me. "That even if you wound me most grievously, there is nothing to bar you from seeking me out for alliance in centuries to come. That if rip out the heart of you, it is not a declaration of war: it is simply a single tide in a very old sea, and in time it will pass. All things do, in the end. Save for us."

Well, that adds one thing that makes me a bit... interested. In this Society of Immortals, the Wandering Bard is the other one. Does the Dead King view her the same way? Foe she may be, but is she a foe that he can betray and make alliance with again, or is she only a foe?

Also, we hypothesize she made Cat into her current form. She stopped the Elves from killing Akua so that the Gate could be made and Cat come to kill Akua instead. Everything with Black in the Free Cities was to push him to destroy the control, stopping the Name of Black Queen from ever forming. This pushed Cat to lose Squire with no new name to transition into, save for the Queen of Winter.

So while it was by Accident from Cat's actions, the Wandering Bard quite likely arranged all of it. If so, where is this dagger being aimed at? The Gods are what we hypothesize, as we think perhaps the Wandering Bard wants to End herself. But could Cat be aimed at the Dead King? Its rare one needs to make someone into a God after all.

MetruX

What if this is another kind of need? The bard has been shown to suffer alot more than the Dead King, so much that all that accompany her through all the lifes is the instrument and alcohol. Endless alcohol, that she never let's go. What if she, more than him, needed more people to speak with? Even enemies can bring respite to her solitude.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Great chapter! Cat has now had how many villains now try to break her out of her thinking that once an enemy, always an enemy?

But is seriously no one going to comment on the "dozens of miles in the air" thing? I assume it was supposed to be dozens of meters, because miles is ridiculous. This is the kind of thing that shatters my suspension of disbelief.

One dozen miles is 63,000 feet. For comparison, airliners cruise at 35-45,000 feet. This is already a wildly implausible height. Two dozen miles, or 126,000 feet, is beyond the edge of outer space by any definition.

anon

Actually while it is above the height of planes in flight, 2 dozen miles(~38km) is still in the range of the stratosphere(20-50km) where weather balloons fly and space is recognised as being separate from the Earth's atmosphere at the Karman line which is at 100km (~62 miles).

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I stand corrected about the definition of space, I should have looked it up before posting. But my point that this is an absurd height remains.

Yotz

Li, also known as the "Chinese mile", is now standardized as precisely 500 meters or 1640 feet. This makes one dozen miles (12*1640)=19680 feet, or (12*500)=6000 meters. Which in turn places two dozen miles height (12 km) either in the high troposphere or low stratosphere, depending on latitude.

Though I can speculate that Miezian mile would be some multiple of 12, and local units untouched by Miezian cultural legacy would be all over the map, without knowing precisely what kind of "miles" is commonly used in Callow/Calernia nowadays we can not determine exact height of their standing.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Sure, you can retcon it all you want, but there's nothing so far suggesting that a mile is anything other than 1.6 km.

Yotz

Retcon?

""
Since I have neither time nor willingness to comb through each instance of "mile" usage in the text, you have my permission to chalk it up as your victory.

Yotz

Black Queen and Diabolist at Keter.
Catherine, her eyes opened.

burguulkodar

Akua is great. She's up there with Masego as my favorite characters in the novel.

broober broober a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/ym1KyFHTmuLPZiymh6I3k>

---

Chapter 36: Enchère

"I've found that nothing quite sets the tone for council like strangling a courtier with my bare hands just before we begin."

– Dread Emperor Venal

I stared down at the unfurled scroll, a frown creasing my brow. When Athal had shown up along our communal breakfast with a scroll in hand I'd expected him to be bearing the Dead King's counteroffer. Instead, what I'd gotten was a neatly-penned report about how the world had gone on without me while we journeyed to Keter. I popped a blueberry in my mouth. That it most likely came from hell did not make it taste any less sweet. Swallowing, I wiped my fingers on the tablecloth.

"How old is this?" I asked.

The dark-haired man bowed.

"If it please you, Great Majesty, the last of what is written took place eight days ago as of this morning," he replied.

"Well," I said, rubbing the bridge of my nose. "Fuck seems like the most appropriate reaction to that basket of stupid."

"Catherine?" Vivienne said, from her place across the table.

I pushed the scroll across, almost toppling a pitcher of fresh milk over it before Hakram leant over to catch it. I sent him a thankful look.

"Word from Callow?" Indrani asked, half a side of pork making her cheeks bulge.

"Swallow, you godsdamned savage," I said. "And something like that. Can someone tell me what the 'Lanterns' are, exactly? I think I got it from context but I'd rather be sure."

"The Levantine equivalent to the House of Light," Adjutant said.

Archer snorted, then finally swallowed.

"Yeah, sure," she said. "If to become an anointed brother you had to wrestle a basilisk. They don't have abbeys so much as warrior lodges. If they get old enough they go into the Brocelian to fight monsters until one finally beats them."

Across the table, Vivienne flinched.

"Merciless Gods," she said. "What was she thinking?"

"Yeah," I agreed. "Not Hasenbach's greatest moment."

I glanced at Masego, who did not glance back. He turned a page, blindly groping for what he probably believed to be a cup of tea but was actually a pot of cream. Well, he'd notice after drinking. Probably.

"Are we to be kept in suspense?" Akua drily asked.

"I've been declared Arch-heretic of the East," I said. "By a conclave of the House of Light in Procer, the aforementioned Lanterns and a delegation of Speakers from Ashur."

"A worthy achievement," Diabolist praised. "This is the first I hear of the title being granted to one who has not climbed the Tower."

"It's a feudal disaster is what it is," Thief said. "It means that any oaths sworn to her are dissolved by holy writ and that any who follow her are 'estranged from the light of the Heavens'."

"I didn't think the First Prince would go this far just to break my truce with the northern crusade," I admitted. "Or that she had this much influence over the priests, to be honest."

"She should not have," Adjutant said. "The House is highly influential in Proceran politics, and pushes back hard when attempts are made to twist its arm. Several wars were fought over it, if I remember correctly."

"The three Liturgical Wars," Akua said. "One of the rare Proceran squabbles to involve even the Lycaonese. The last member of House Merovins' bloodline was slain during... the second, perhaps? I confess my Principate histories are not as comprehensive as they could be."

"Oh fuck," Vivienne suddenly said.

I'd told her it was the most appropriate reaction, hadn't I?

"Laure?" I asked.

She nodded, slumping into her seat.

"I can't even begin to parse the implications of that," she said.

"This is getting quite tedious," Akua noted.

"You might remember the priests back in Salia declared me an abomination, after First Liesse," I told the shade. "That whole resurrection affair got stuck in their throats."

The dark-skinned monster was not slow on the uptake, for all her other glaring flaws.

"You were crowned by a representative of the House of Light, in Laure," she said.

"I was."

"They've branded heretics all involved in the matter," Diabolist said, and it wasn't a guess.

"If they'd just tarred my name it wouldn't have been too bad," I said. "They tried something similar with Henry Landless after occupying Callow, though without foreigners signing on. But they accused Callowan priesthood of heresy. They really shouldn't have done that."

"We so declare the following," Vivienne read out loud. "That all who took part in the seventy-third conclave of Salia are guilty, of: perverse service to earthly powers, false righteousness for earthly purpose and, declaration of godless sanctions."

"That first one," Archer decided, "will be the title of my memoirs. I feel it really captures the spirit of what I'm about."

We decided in turn, as a family and also Akua, to pretend she had remained silent.

"All three of those are lesser heresies," Hakram gravelled. "That's situation's going to get worse at a brisk pace."

"It did," I grimly added. "The House in Laure also retroactively declared every hero to have tread Callowan grounds to be graceless. That's not so much protesting the verdict as setting fire to the courthouse."

"Graceless," Diabolist mused. "As in 'walk without the grace of the Heavens', I presume?"

I nodded with a grimace. That verse was from the Book of All Things, when speaking of villains who cloaked themselves in righteousness when seeing to their 'dark purposes'. You shall know them from the true children of Above, for they walk without the grace of the Heavens. The House of Light in Laure had essentially just declared over ten heroes to be villains in disguise. And then announced as much at every street corner of the largest city of the kingdom.

"They kept their shit together in Dormer, at least," Vivienne sighed. "They lodged a protest and want to appeal the conclave's decisions."

"Thief, rioters torched the House of Light in Vale when the priests refused to speak out," I said pointedly. "This is not a situation under control. Juniper's going to have to declare martial law, if she hasn't already."

"The House in Summerholm upheld Laure's declaration," Thief said, sounding appalled as her eyes reached the end of the scroll. "Gods. Denier's going to fold as well, Cat, you know that. You're popular with the merchants and the priests that far east hate it even when the crown tells that what to preach. And the only reason Marchford hasn't declared already is that it'll take a while for the news to reach there."

"I have no idea what Hasenbach was thinking," I admitted. "The northern army's in no shape to take the passage from Kegan even if it turns around. She's setting fire to the diplomatic options for no real gain I can see."

"You're assuming she is behind this," Akua said.

"If a clever opponent makes a foolish mistake," Hakram added, "it is either not a mistake or not that opponent's doing."

Grem One-Eye had written that, I recalled. In one of his treatises, when talking about how even a well-led army could blunder when the field officers were poorly trained.

"That would imply she's lost control of the going-ons in her own capital," Vivienne replied skeptically.

A shame that her understanding of what a crusade is was so lacking, but it is too late to leave the saddle once the lion is ridden. That was what the Dead King had said, when we'd spoken of Cordelia Hasenbach.

"They might be right," I said.

Thief turned to me, curious.

"If this was just the House in Procer I'd agree with you, but with the Lanterns and the Speakers?" I said. "No. She can't have that many hooks inside nations that were hostile to Procer until so recently. I think that Hasenbach might be losing her grip on parts of the Grand Alliance."

And wasn't that enough to have me dreading? Because Cordelia Hasenbach had, for all her brutal idealism, a pragmatic streak. The castles she wanted to built were down here, not up in the clouds. But if she was no longer leading the beast by the nose, then who was now in charge? Her refusal to offer even the slightest concession when we'd last spoken was starting to be cast in a different light. Her position was nowhere as assured as I'd believed. I clenched my fingers, then slowly unclenched them. Didn't matter, did it?

The mess was still in my lap, I had to deal with it.

"The Empress is going to throw a banquet, when she hears," Vivienne sighed. "Any possible bridges to the west just went up in smoke."

"Nok did too," I reminded her. "She's not exactly doing great at keeping her head above the water either. Black's wandering the countryside up to Gods know what, Warlock's nowhere to be seen and her coasts are burning. Not a great year for either of us."

A man cleared his throat. With a start, I realized Athal had been standing to the side this entire time. My mind whipped back, going over what we'd said with a fine comb. Had there been anything in there I'd truly hate for the Dead King to know? No, I realized after a moment. 'Bridges to the west' had unfortunate implications, but I doubted Neshamah was unaware I would have cut a deal with Procer instead of coming to him if I could.

"Do you have further use for me, Great Majesty?" he asked.

"I don't," I said. "Offer my thanks to the Dead King for his gift, Athal."

"I will do so promptly, honoured one," and with one last bow he left.

I popped another blueberry into my mouth. There was a clatter, like someone dropped a ceramic pot on the table.

"This is cream," Masego said, highly offended. "Why did none of you say anything?"

Well, I mused, at least the wait until my second talk with the Hidden Horror would not be absent of entertainment.

—

The Hall of the Dead grew no less intimidating with repeat visits. The honour guard of Revenants had the same faces as the last time at least, so it was possible that fifty dead Named was the sum of his forces. On the other hand, it was a little too neat of a number and it wasn't like he'd have fewer than what we'd seen. I kept the thought off my face as we were welcomed into the throne room and Neshamah graciously invited us to be seated once more. No offer of a meal, this time, and it was easy to see why. Neat stacks of parchments awaited us at the table.

"Your proposal was a worthy one, Black Queen," the Dead King said. "Yet it needed... expansion. These are the terms I would offer instead. Take however long is necessary to familiarize yourself, I will take no offence."

I traded a subtle look with Thief. Yeah, he could have sent us those earlier. He'd meant for us to be as little prepared as possible, and to go over them in an unfamiliar place. The throne room of ancient Sepharah was not a location that invited careful reading, though ironically enough I could think of few places where paying attention to the exact wording would be more important. The Woe sat after I did, and with a nod at Neshamah I took a look at his proposal. A single paragraph of beautifully calligraphied Lower Miezani, I was already blinking in surprise. I'd offered him the run of three principalities. Not even halfway into the first sheet of parchment, I was being asked for eight. All existing Lycaonese lands were included, and in addition to Cleves and Hainaut as I'd already put on the table he was also asking for Lyonis and Brus. Which would give him foothold on the opposite shores of the Tomb and the Grave, but also neatly encircle Lake Pavin. More worryingly, if he took all of Lyonis it meant his southern border was Salia. The capital of Procer.

Surprise only continuing to sink in, I thumbed through the other parchments. The alliance would be required to be announced publically. The invitation need be extended to him for at least one hundred years and – well, shit. He wanted me to occupy two principalities myself, Bayeux and Orne. The very principalities facing the two passes out of the Red Flower Vales. Last time that territory had been under Callowan rule was the days of the Queen of Blades, and even then they'd been tributaries more than vassals. Hakram was paying closer attention to the details, I saw, and I left him to it. I turned to the Dead King.

"Your Majesty," I said.

"Black Queen," the yellow-eyed thing replied lightly.

"This is a significant expansion of the terms offered," I said. "Which surprises me, given how amenable you seemed to the initial proposal."

"I was," the Hidden Horror agreed. "But then I was made a better offer."

The world slowed, and all I heard was the quickening of my pulse. A better offer. Who – no, that wasn't even a question worth asking was it?

"Dread Empress Malicia," I said, voice eerily calm.

"Has been an honoured guest of mine for some time," the Dead King said. "She also has an interest in securing an alliance, though I found it unsporting to never give you such a chance. You currently look at a transcript of her latest offer, save for the addition of the occupation of Proceran territory. That is a boon I offer you myself."

It was no such thing, I thought. He wanted me to take a bite out of Procer so their attention would be divided when the day of reckoning came. And to ensure that no deal would be possible to make with Hasenbach or her replacement, since I'd have outright occupied part of their realm. Something that would be difficult for Malicia to achieve, since she'd need to reconquer Callow before getting anywhere near the Principate – and to do all of that while at odds with her finest generals.

"A bidding war," Akua said thoughtfully, the first time she had even spoken in this hall.

"I prefer to think of it as an auction," the Dead King replied. "With the face of Calernia in our time as the prize."

I let out a long breath, forced myself to smile.

"An intriguing offer," I said. "Might we be allowed to discuss it between ourselves before giving you an answer?"

"By all means," Neshamah smiled. "Should you require light to be shed on any point, my Hosts are at your service. They were made aware of my intent."

I rose to my feet, feeling like a dozen pounds of lead were tied to them. I bowed exactly as low as was required. Shooting a quelling look at Archer, who looked about to speak, I gestured for the others to follow me out.

We'd been had, but here was not the place to rage about it.

—

Vivienne slapped down her pile of parchments on the table the moment the wards went up.

"That fucker," she snarled. "So much for 'negotiations in good faith', Hakram."

I spent a moment wondering whether I was responsible for the fact that my closest companions could be so cavalier as to call the likes of the Dead King 'that fucker' while shuffling uneasily under the silent pressure of Masego's sorcery. Being under that had not become any more pleasant with the passing of time. The itch was already under my skin, bringing restlessness with it. Whatever it was I had become, it was not meant to be contained.

My eyes flicked to Ajutant, who had ignored Thief's jibe to bring our finest map of Calernia to the table. He methodically set aside the parchments to spread it completely, then set down iron figurines at the borders the Dead King's last proposal had outlined.

"A lot of land to evacuate, even with forewarning," Archer noted, dragging a chair to the table.

The ugly scraping sound of wood against stone made me want to rip her hair out, but that was an almost daily occurrence with Indrani.

"Around a third of the Principate, in sum," Akua noted. "Though the Lycaonese territories are the poorest and least populated by a wide margin. Archer's warning is somewhat inaccurate, however. Keter's advance will not be immediate or uncontested: it is not impossible for mass displacement to occur before the principalities fall."

"It would mean several million refugees," Hakram said calmly. "Hunger, sickness and weather will slay them by the thousands."

"We'd get two principalities out of the deal, though," Archer said cheerfully. "That's nice of him. Good change of pace from the whole defence thing we've been on about. Would be pleasant to let them worry about us instead the other way around, for once."

"We're in no position to take or hold those lands, Indrani," Vivienne said flatly. "And the moment we announced publically that we're allying with the Kingdom of the Dead, half of Callow turns on us. Malicia has us beat there. The Wasteland might get worried if she announces that, but it won't revolt."

"It should not be impossible to remove that part if we compensate with other coin," Hakram said. "Brabant, or perhaps Arans? The latter would significantly enlarge his border with the Golden Bloom. The elves might not take kindly to that."

"It would also mean direct border with his expanded realm, if we take Bayeux ourselves," Akua said. "Salia itself would be a superior bid. Let him lose a few hordes besieging the heart of Procer."

"Or we could leave," Hierophant said, voice slicing through the conversation.

They all turned to look at him. Slowly I took out my pipe and ripped a satchel to stuff it.

"I've already learned enough from perusing the city to study for decades," Masego shrugged. "And there are more echoes to be harvested while we return. If the terms are not to our satisfaction, why do we not simply go?"

I caught his eye and looked down meaningfully at my pipe. With a sigh, he flicked his wrist and a flash of flame saw to it.

"We need a counterweight, Masego," Vivienne said tiredly. "The crusade rolls through Callow otherwise. I don't like that we're playing his game, but we're low on choices."

"Must we?" Akua said.

My eyes turned to her, and she inclined her head.

"Let Malicia unleash the Hidden Horror," she said. "She is a rival here, yet not necessarily a foe. She would desire the Dead King rampant no more than us. Giving ground here allows us to achieve our purpose – an invasion of Procer by the Kingdom of the Dead – without wounding our reputation the way making that pact ourselves would. On the other hand, a bidding war hurts both our positions. We would need to make greater and greater concessions, with the Dead King the only true victor of that strife."

"We will not," Hakram said calmly.

As he should. Of all of them, he knew me best. I inhaled the wakeleaf and blew it out, earning the odd sight of smoke going through Akua's body.

"We will not," I agreed. "We don't know what terms Malicia would end up giving, but I am quite certain they won't involve anything aimed at limiting casualties."

"She's right about part of it, Cat," Thief said, sounding pained at the admission. "We can't keep escalating our offers. We'll end up selling out half the continent and it won't even come in sight of the Empire's bottom line."

"Go a step deeper, Vivienne," I said. "Look at how Malicia has been behaving since the crusade began. How has she been acting?"

"She hasn't," Hakram said, eyes sharpening.

Akua softly laughed.

"Poisoning the river when owning a well," she mused in Mtethwa. "She does play an exquisite game, doesn't she?"

"She let Callow bleed against the crusaders, but not to weaken the crusade like we thought," I said. "She was weakening us. The same way she let Black bleed his loyalist legions. The point was never to deal with the Tenth Crusade, it was to cripple her internal threats enough she can handle them herself. Because it didn't really matter to her, whether the passage or the Vales fell. It was never going to be the front she fought this war on."

"The Dead King," Thief said quietly. "The Dead King is her army."

"We could bargain for a year and she'd still go deeper," I said. "Because this is her play. This is the force she needs on the field."

"That might be true," Vivienne said. "But it is no solution."

"Our offer doesn't change," I said calmly. "And like so many troubled young souls before us, we will let scripture guide our hands."

"There's stuff in the Book of All Things about this?" Archer said, leaning forward. "Damn. Maybe I should read it."

"It's a Wasteland foe we face," I said. "So it's that most sacred of Wasteland traditions we'll turn to."

I spat out a mouthful of smoke, let it wreath my face as I smiled.

"I speak, of course, of regicide."

---

Jago

It is interesting how the Church of Light, Levantine group included, has thrown the Grey Pilgrim under the bus. They think he is still in the same location as the Woes, so making the treaties null is a death sentence for him and the noble, for what they know. They are hostages. When a treaty is broken the hostages are meant to be executed.

NerfContessa

In retrospect, indeed.

Given his status, that should not have happened... Which means they knew beforehand he would be able and willing to leave.

Also, sorry. Cat, Saint ain't here...

Cpt. Obvious

The problem with having the Grey Pilgrim as a hostage is that he is very hard to kill unless he chose to cooperate. And though I'm sure Robber would love to try I doubt he would be able to do it as he lacks a Name. After all pure nasty, guile and a nightmarishly imaginative gift for backstabbing only goes so far when dealing with Named. Yes he would probably be able to off most Named if he got to them within days of their naming. But against the Grey Pilgrim who's been around for decades if not a centurie I doubt he would stand a chance. Also remember that they are currently running short on munitions in general and are almost totally out of goblin fire with no way of restocking those.

The noble is however a soft target, at least if the Grey Pilgrim doesn't take it on himself to protect him.

However there are some interesting questions regarding the Heroes. If I understood things correctly, which is far from certain, they have been branded as heretics. Now as their power or aspects if you will, were granted by the gods above will being declared heretic change anything? My guess is that it won't as it wasn't mandated from the above. Yet it might weaken the trust in Good for some of the heroes.

The situation also has interesting implications for Cat. So far she's avoided the truly Evil options in order to keep a diplomatic solution on the table. Being declared to be an arch Evil the equal of the Dread Empress or the Dead King that option is no longer available. So now there's one less thing to keep her from using all her options to keep her people alive. If pressed enough she can start handing out titles of Winter, instantly transforming them to the equals of Named. A Robber Barron of the Lesser Footrest of the Queen of Winter is a horrible and wondrous thing to contemplate. And she's got so many good, or evil, people who could make good use of the powers such titles provide. Also I think there's no real limit to how many of these she can bestow other than her imagination in thinking up the titles.

In effect she's potentially a new player in the game of good versus evil, and unlike the gods below she doesn't go about it with a "hands off" policy.

tynam

The Grey Pilgrim isn't at all hard to kill in this situation. If Cat wanted to kill him, the story would be right there. He's the wise old mentor to heroes, who willingly offered himself as a hostage in the hope that evil could be redeemed, to guarantee a great peace treaty... which has now been betrayed for the greater good. The narrative practically demands his death.

(Yes, that was actually a power play on his part to kill Cat with stories, but the stories don't care about that motive, only what he did.)

usernamesbco

Cat needs to cut her losses and run, for a number of reasons.

She's wasting time in Keter when she needs to be at home putting out fires. I think he's doing that on purpose.

Callow has been under Praesi occupation for decades, they've already taken everything of value, she cannot outbid Malicia. Even if the Empress is facing trouble at home she has more resources than Cat. Picking a direct fight with her is more than they can afford.

DK outright stated he's not going to honor any deal he makes, so why even play that game? She'd be better off throwing the alliance against the crusade idea in the trash (where it belongs) and asking him for insight into Intercessor.

I'd almost say she should ask for no concessions at all, invite him to Creation for a year with no restrictions, and run for home. Either tell Procer and blame it on Malicia or let them figure it out on their own.

Unfortunately Cat is bad at politics, intrigue, and being Evil generally, so she won't do any of that.

---

Chapter 37: Offing

"Callowans as a people can be summed up by the fact that, before the Uncivil Wars had even come to a close, it'd become a common boast among the populace that the Black Queen had not even spent a sennight in Keter before having several counts of arson and murder to her name."

– Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara

Follow the food. So went Thief's advice.

That Malicia or a flesh puppet were in the city was a given: Neshamah wouldn't bother to seriously negotiate with a High Lord. It would have been like a man having to keep a serious face while making a pact with mutton chop, in his eyes. I'd personally been of the opinion that it was a near certainty that the puppet would be the one in Keter, since the Empress leaving the Tower unattended for more than a few weeks was a recipe for usurpation. Akua, however, had made it clear that with the right precautions it was possible for Malicia to be here in person while a puppet held the Tower for her. She was not the kind of Empress that had a strong presence outside Ater: apparently even by imperial standards she didn't leave her seat of power often. It made sense, in a way. Malicia wasn't a fighter, and for decades she'd had Black to send after messes sword in hand. Her almost crippling-focused talents were in rule and intrigue, and they were most effectively wielded from the Imperial court. Diabolist noted that the court at the Tower wasn't necessarily the centre of power in a Tyrant's reign – Terribilis II had barely held one and distributed most its traditional authority to Ater's bureaucracy. Malicia, however, had inherited a festering snake pit of a court from her predecessor Nefarious and then promptly encouraged the most murderous leanings of the highborn by rewarding the victorious in those struggles with riches and influence.

That, however, had been decades ago. Before the Conquest or my birth. Now that Malicia had spent years removing the aristocrats from the bureaucracy and Black had unceremoniously drummed them out of the Legions, her hold on Ater and the Tower was extremely hard to shake. She could afford to let the High Lords break their teeth on her power base while she placed most her attention on the negotiations in Keter. Akua even speculated that she might be baiting out would-be usurpers in order to have them out in the open when she returned home with a Keteran alliance. That turnaround was likely to see their own families turn on those ambitious few, neatly decapitating any nascent opposition without her having to lift a finger. It certainly sounded like Malicia, I had to admit. A plan with several ancillary benefits unfolding quietly while her enemies swung at mist. Regardless, it'd been a priority to find out whether we were dealing with the actual Empress or a puppet. From a narrow perspective, it didn't matter which it was if we managed to slaughter them all anyway: the result would still be us with the only bidder at the Dead King's auction. Looking at it more broadly, though, the difference was major. For one, if I killed Malicia in the flesh I'd be gaining a 'legitimate' claim to the Tower.

Kill the Empress, be the Empress: that was the law of the Wasteland. If you managed to scatter all the other carrion birds pecking at the corpse, anyway. Getting involved in the flaming tar pit that was your average Praesi succession was the least of what I needed right now, and pretty high on my list of 'things I would prefer never to have to deal with'. Malicia would have to go if the Liesse Accords were going to be implemented properly and I couldn't deny that the longer she had to scheme the more dangerous she became, but as long as the Empress lived there was a lid on the Wasteland jar of crazy. Much like Cordelia Hasenbach, she wasn't someone I liked facing but she remained very much preferable to whoever would step up if she was removed from power. I wouldn't put it beyond a High Lord trying to climb the Tower to take a swing at me as their foremost 'rival' even while the Empire was being attacked by Ashur. Particularly if their lands were far enough from the sea. There were dozens of examples in the histories to be found of Praesi cheerfully emptying a whole quiver into their foot just like that. On the other hand, taking Malicia prisoner just wasn't feasible. Not in Keter. And for all that Praesi ambition could end up biting me, there was also a decent chance that instead the Empire would collapse into civil war as every prominent highborn tried to claim the Tower. I couldn't even dismiss the possibility that the legions in the Wasteland would try to proclaim Black as Dread Emperor and fill mass graves with whoever objected to that.

I didn't relish the loss of life it would involve, but if Praes was clawing at itself it wasn't looking at Callow. It might be a risk worth taking.

"So I've got a report for you," Archer announced, strolling through the wards.

She had a bottle in hand, I noted. That was definitely not what I had sent her out for.

"If you blew off reconnaissance to get drunk, there will be consequences," I mildly said.

"I would never," Indrani assured me. "I just happened to find a cellar while on my very serious fact-finding mission, and it would have been criminally negligent of me not to investigate."

"Was it locked?" I sighed.

"Is it really a lock if it breaks?" Archer mused. "That's a question for the philosophers, Catherine. We're straying off topic."

So I'd need to offer Athal an apology, then. Hakram's suggestion that we just make a scroll template with blank spaces to fill in with the latest thing she'd done was becoming increasingly tempting.

"This is what we call Atalantian baptismal, Cat," Indrani seriously told me, putting the bottle on the table. "I've heard that if an entire glass is drunk in a single sitting, it will outright kill a man."

"I'm considering killing as well, at the moment," I informed her.

"That would be a grave miscarriage of justice," Indrani told me. "Since I found it inside the only other palace that has servants in it."

My eyes narrowed. I'd asked the Dead King for further time to debate his offer before our next conversation and sent both Archer and Thief out find the tracks of any Imperial presence in the city. Follow the food, Vivienne had said. Malicia's delegation would need to eat, would be offered all the trapping of hospitality as the honoured guests that they were. That left traces, in a city where the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants were walking corpses. I set aside the pile of scrolls that held our now-irrelevant bargaining position and dragged out the rough sketch of the palaces surrounding the Hall of the Dead I'd asked Masego to make. There were five in whole, forming a circle interrupted by the same number of avenues going into the city-fortress. The Silent Palace, our own, was slightly to the left of the gates into the Hall.

"Which one?" I asked.

Indrani jabbed her finger onto the parchment. Slightly to the right, on the opposite side of the black stone spire.

"The Threefold Reflection," I said.

Athal had helpfully provided the names of every existing palace when I'd casually asked as much, feigning idle curiosity. The dark-haired man had also revealed there were old sorceries protecting each of them, though he hadn't gone into detail. Not all that surprising. This whole city was a fortress, not even the guesthouses would be toothless.

"The place is... unsettling," Archer said, grabbing the seat across from me. "The layout is wrong. Hallways lead where they shouldn't: I went through the same threshold twice and ended up in different places both times. I'd call it a maze, but you can map out a maze. There's wizardly bullshit at play here I think might rule that out."

"Did you find out how many people are in the delegation?" I asked.

"I kept out of sight," she said, shaking her head. "Got a look at one of them, though. Tall man in steel plate, silent. Black iron mask over his face."

I nodded.

"I've seen those before," I said. "They're called Sentinels. The personal guard of whoever holds the Tower, though there's enough they count more as a personal army. Supposedly spells and potions keep them unconditionally loyal."

"Might be we have ourselves the real Empress, then," Indrani said.

"They're exactly the kind of guards a puppet would bring as well," I said. "Won't talk, can't betray and they probably have triggers inside their body that'll kill them if someone tries to grab and extract."

"Would they obey a puppet, though?" Archer asked.

"I have no idea," I admitted after a moment. "But I know who we can ask."

I exerted my will and tugged at Akua's leash, gently. There was resistance. I tugged a second time, and when I did not feel her moving towards me I rolled my eyes and simply dragged her here. The shade poured out of the wall about thirty heartbeats later and only then did I loosen my grip. Diabolist was grimacing.

"That," she said, "was exceedingly unpleasant. And I barely had time to bid my farewells."

"Do it again," Indrani grinned.

I ignored her.

"Would Sentinels obey a flesh simulacrum the Empress occasionally takes over?" I asked.

Akua's brow rose.

"If instructed to, certainly," she said. "Authority over them can be even granted by certain court titles, it is not held solely by the Tyrant."

"Not a tie breaker, then," I told Indrani.

"Was that the sum total of your inquiry?" Diabolist asked, sounding a little miffed. "I was having a conversation of some import."

"Tell me about it," I invited, repressing a grin.

Occasionally yanking Akua's chain had lost none of the satisfaction even after the novelty faded.

"We will be expected to meet with the Dead King two days from now, at twilight," Akua said. "Excuses can be stretched no further."

I drummed my fingers against the table as Archer cracked open the bottle from – Atalante, was it? Strange, I remembered reading somewhere they were the religious ones in the League. The House of Light tended to frown on drinking to excess. The Callowan one, anyway, for all I knew it was different down there.

"So that's our window," I said. "Two days. Hopefully Thief has more to add, because we're low on information at the moment and I don't relish the thought of attempting an assassination half blind in Keter of all places."

Whether or not Vivienne had anything to say remained a mystery for several hours after that. Hakram returned before too long, having exhausted the few points I'd sent him to seek clarification on with the Hosts to keep up the pretence of ongoing debate on our part. I went for a walk after that, in part to clear my mind but mostly so I get away from those fucking wards. I knew why we'd had Masego put it up, but it didn't make staying under them any more pleasant. I decided to get something useful done while I was out and about, so I moved towards the highest circles of the Silent Palace to get a look at the terrain between us and this Threefold Reflection the Empress allegedly resided in. The layout of this place was all interlocked circles so getting oriented was easy, but I'd failed to grasp the varying heights. The circle furthest out was one of the lowest, the rooftop almost a terrace. From the flat black marble I could get a good look at the broad open space that separated the palaces from the Hall of the Dead, but little else. There were, I noted, patrols now. There'd been a few of those before that I remembered, but nowhere as large or frequent. Was Neshamah tightening his watch? You told me Malicia was here and that she was at odds with me, I thought. Considering that little talk we had the day before about how betrayal is a passing thing, that was as good as an invitation to kill her.

Evidently, that didn't mean he would make it easy for me. This was a test of sorts, I decided. I doubted that breaching the laws of hospitality would rank in even the worst hundred of the sins to the Dead King's name, but he'd keep the pretence. He might not actively obstruct me, but unless I remained discreet there would be consequences. That didn't bode well. The Woe had many talents, but discretion was not usually counted among them – though that was in large part my own fault, it had to be said. I could barely make out the edge of the Threefold Reflection from the side of the Hall of the Dead, but I'd meant to get a good look and this told me less than nothing. Casting a look at the grounds below, freshly-scrubbed paving stones, I shrugged and leapt. I'd gone without armour for the day, so my knees barely bent when I landed. Cloak fluttering around me, I nodded at the approaching patrol as they turned to me. Archer had told me of the breeds of dead there were to be found in the city, but there were no differences to my senses. They all felt like little balls of will working a corpse, and though some might feel stronger it was not a certain thing. For one, the officers were supposed to be the Binds – those with souls and real intelligence – but the presence for some of the officer-armoured dead were almost entirely faded.

I'd have to rely on sight to tell them apart, and sight could be tricked.

"Just going for a walk," I told them.

A corpse in a lovely sculpted iron breastplate and conical helmet nodded.

"If you require escort, Great Majesty, it can be provided," he offered.

"Won't be necessary," I said. "Though I thank you for the courtesy."

They resumed their patrol without a word, offering polite nods when they passed me by. How long had that one been dead, I wondered? I could be centuries. I'd glimpsed flesh beneath the helm, but that meant nothing. Necromancy could preserve that near indefinitely. Strolling as casually as a girl could with a sword at her hip and a cloak embroidered with the banners of her defeated foes could – not all that casually, I felt safe in assuming – I passed by the palace separating mine from the Threefold Reflection. It was the largest of those I'd seen, and the Silent Palace dwarfed the one in Laure. The Garden of Crowns, Athal had called it. Wasn't seeing a lot of those, but the garden part seemed accurate. Instead of a single massive construction, this one was a display of smaller pavilions lost in a beautiful sprawl of stone and greenery. The beauty was somewhat spoiled by the fact that the trees and grass seemed to sprout directly from granite, but that might just have been me. It was empty, or so I thought. Then I caught sight of a silhouette seated under a shaded living oak arbour, looking down at a crystal-clear pond. Man, not a woman. Creation had not seen fit to have me run into Malicia, then. Torn between moving on towards the Threefold Reflection and having a closer look at this oddity, I eventually went for the oddity. The palace wasn't going anywhere.

I tread softly on the pebble paths that winded through the greenery, keeping an eye on the stranger. Too pale to be Soninke or Taghreb. Either an outside acquisition by the Empress, or entirely unrelated to her. I confirmed the second thought when I came close enough my otherworldly senses picked up on what lied within the man: power. Not a Name, no. That kind of power had a peculiar taste to it, life and weight and something like inevitability. What I felt from him was cousin to that, or perhaps just the remains of it. Like words engraved in stone left unreadable by time and tide you could still barely make out some letters from. Revenant, I thought. Indrani had told me they kept a shade of what they'd once been after their raising. The dead man did not react even when I'd come well within earshot for a mortal, staring silently into the pond. I could make out shapes in the water, fish and water lilies. The way light caught on them allowed me to realize they were not living things but sculpted and painted stone. I put aside the mild discomfort I felt at the sight and studied the man closer. Late forties, or so he'd been before his death. A crown of white hair came in sparse tufts, and the beginnings of beard could be seen on his jaw. His clothes were rich drapery, though the colour had faded with the centuries, and there was a sword on his lap. None of this mattered half as much as the brooch on his chest: a tasteful little twist of silver with two golden ornaments on it.

Bells.

"There is no need to stand there, child," the Revenant said. "It is not my pond, nor my ruinous light that shines down upon it."

I swallowed.

"You're a Fairfax," I blurted out, and immediately cringed.

Catherine Silvertongue struck again. The Revenant turned to study me, pale brown eyes surprised.

"King Edward of Callow," he said. "And you are Deoraithe. A daughter of House Iarsmai?"

It had to be an Edward, didn't it? Callow had those like the Principate had its never-ending gaggle of First Prince Louis – too many to know by rote save for the numbers at the end. Suddenly I was glad I hadn't worn a crown. It would have felt tasteless in front of a Fairfax of the old blood. When he'd spoken that title it had been with that muted ripple of power, the one that said it hadn't merely been a title for him.

"Just a foundling," I replied, shaking my head.

"Named, then," he sagely said, and with a courtly gesture invited me to sit.

I settled into the stone seat by his own, tongue-tied.

"Would that be Edward the Fifth?" I said, desperately trying to remember which of those had gotten themselves killed while crusading.

"The Seventh," the king chided. "You will know my daughter Mary, at least. She was but three when I was claimed, she must be the longest-reigning monarch Callow has ever seen."

Oh shit. He was talking about Mary the Songbird. That entire reign had been a mess: the Marquess of Vale had fought a short but bloody civil war to seize the regency and refused to give it up even after she came of age. He'd kept her imprisoned in the Songbird's Cage until one of her cousins rebelled and overthrew him. She didn't survive the assault on Laure, smothered with a pillow by her captor before the palace could be breached. There were at least half a dozen songs and plays about the tragedy. Her cousin took the crown, after, and all House Lerness of Vale hung save for the children.

"I have heard of her," I diplomatically said. "I'm sorry to tell you that House Fairfax is gone. As far as I know, the last member of it died during a Praesi invasion over twenty years ago."

The man chuckled.

"It was dead long before that, girl," he said. "I share not a drop of blood with the famous Eleonor. My forbear merely kept the name to justify her rule after her husband had the poor taste of dying before getting her with child."

I blinked. Yolanda the Wicked, that. Scholars centuries later still debated or not whether she'd been a villain or just extremely unpopular. Some argued she'd been demonized because of her Proceran origins and that she'd had lawful claim to rule, even though her children did not. The other side tended to point out she'd had the rest of House Fairfax murdered to ensure said children did in fact succeed her. This felt like a history lesson, until I remembered I was sitting next to breathing history. Well, moving anyway.

"Catherine Foundling," I introduced myself, since girl and child were starting to get on my nerves.

"I would welcome you to these grounds, Catherine Foundling, but there is no welcome to be had in this earthly pit of devils," King Edward said.

I nodded my thanks, for lack of a better answer.

"If I may ask, Your Majesty," I said. "You seem..."

"Lucid?" the dead man smile. "The Abomination's little jest. Most of my fellows are of more taciturn bent. You see, when he came for me I told him that even in the face of eternity I would spit on him and all his works."

My fingers clenched. Evidently, Neshamah had decided to test the truth of that.

"Do not look so appalled," the king gently said. "I will yet have the last laugh over that dark creature, even if I must wait until the Last Dusk for it. Though I am bound to serve in this place it is only a passing thing."

"So you're the guardian of this," I probed, hand moving to vaguely encompass our surroundings.

"In a manner of speaking," King Edward said. "This is the Garden of Crowns, young Foundling. None serve here who were not royalty while they drew breath. The power once bestowed on me by Above has merely earned the role of the sword guarding this palace."

My eyes narrowed.

"So there's a former Named guarding all five palaces," I said.

"Indeed," he agreed. "Though the Abomination changes the watchers at a whim. The Bloody Sword once kept vigil over the that unpleasant pyramid beyond the Garden, but has since been replaced. Other than I, the only one who has remained for more than a century is the Thief of Stars."

"Oh?" I said, blood running cold. "And where does he guard?"

"She," he corrected. "The Silent Palace. It amused the Abomination to bind her there, as she attempted to rob it whilst living."

So we'd had a heroine with a talent for discretion breathing down our neck the entire time without a single one of us noticing. Lovely. This assassination plot was already getting off to a great start.

"You display great curiosity as to the nature of this pit," King Edward said calmly. "I will not inquire as to your purpose, as I would be bound to then speak it. But you are born of Callow, are you not?"

"I am," I warily agreed.

"It has been a very long time," he said quietly, "since I have spoken to one of my people. And I have worried, over the years. We warred with the Principate mere decades before they came, beggars at my door, asking for our swords to march north for their sake. Yet I know the gratitude of princes is an ephemeral thing. And to the east, the Enemy ever lurks. You spoke of an invasion?"

The snarl in his voice when he spoke of Procer had a warm feeling in my belly, I wouldn't deny it. I'd run out of patience with them as well, it was reassuring to know I was in good company there. Unfortunately, I had few good tales to tell him.

"We call it the Conquest," I said. "They won at the Fields of Streges and swept over the Callow. Until recently we were under occupation."

"That patch of grass has been watered by more armies than rainstorms," King Edward ruefully said. "It does not matter. The beast swells fat with the meat of us but it ever chokes on our bones. There will be another Eleonor, sooner or later."

I didn't know how to tell him that none had come. That if she'd ever been born, the closest thing I had to a father had cut her throat before her name could be known. That I might the closest thing to her we had, and wasn't that a horrifying thought?

"We're under siege," I said. "The Tenth Crusade marches right through us and attempts at peace have failed. The princes of Procer wants to carve us up and I am unsure how far up that desire runs."

"Procerans are always hungry," King Edwards said darkly. "And when that hunger leads them to the brink, they weep for others to pay the dues in their stead. Hold the Vales, young Foundling. And watch the Blessed Isle for a Wasteland knife."

I bleakly laughed. How could I tell him that the ruling Dread Empress was out for my blood, trying to crush me underfoot, and that she was still the closest thing I had to an ally at the moment? The dead man idly brushed his fingers against his brooch, then spoke up hesitatingly.

"It is unseemly to ask, I know," he said. "Yet, my daughter..."

I thought of pale green eyes, and the kindest lie I'd ever been told. That it wouldn't get easier.

"She is still," I said with a smile, "spoken of in song."

The naked relief on his face only made it worse.

"She would have loved that," he said with a quirk of the lips. "She had a lovely singing voice, my Mary. And she was good, even as a child. Kind. That is a rare thing in a ruler. There is a place for harshness, but kindness is the mother of prosperity."

I nodded slowly. I couldn't stand to stay here any longer, next to the man I'd lied to and his long-dead memories, so slowly I rose to my feet.

"It was a pleasure to meet you, Your Majesty," I said, bowing.

"Don't," he said. "I am not a fool, young Catherine."

He smiled, like we shared a secret.

"The first Albans were seneschals of Laure long before they were kings," he told me. "And Eleonor, for all her virtues, was born a mere knightess. There is no shame in one's birth. We are what we bring into this world, not what brought us into it."

He rose as well, and touched my wrist.

"Stand tall, Queen Catherine," King Edward the Seventh told me. "Stand proud. We have been broken before, humbled and rent asunder. We have crawled through the blood of our kin and suffered the yoke of tyrants. It does not matter. We do not yield, we do not bend even when the sky comes tumbling down on our heads. Keep your grudges close, child, and never forget them. We are Callowans, and for every slight there is a price."

Ours will be long, the song went, and paid twice.

Woe on us all, but if the Gods demanded my home be ashes then the Gods would burn.

---

Soronel Haetir

Callowans do love themselves a grudge.

Stormblessed

Hmmm... another of a these transient chapters where Catherine speaks with someone hiding her truest self. I guess in a sense this chapter is supposed to remind us of the bonds between her and Praes. How she cares and hides from Blacks while hating and working with Malicia.

Cicero

Actually, I read this is emphasizing her connection with Callow, and how that is her true self, not all these alliances and intrigue with Praes.

TameCurtsy

For every slight, a price.

For every chapter, a vote: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Antoninjohn

Acknowledged Queen of Callow by the former King of Callow, well looks like Cat just gained a legitimate claim to the crown

Person2

Kind of. While that is an interesting observation to make, he 1) doesn't know she's a villain and 2) no one else knows she was 'approved' by a dead Callowan Revenant of the Dead King.

I guess this does give her a stronger metaphysical tie to some kind of 'name' if she still had one and probably makes her infinitesimally stronger.

Dantalian

Why wouldn't he know she's a villain?
She's peacefully walking through Keter, even though she's Queen of Callow.

Heroes simply don't make deals with the Dead King, they just throw themselves at him.

Raved Thrad

At this point, I think the Name Catherrine is most likely to inherit is "Local Girl Done Good." 😊

Cold Cyberia

He must at least suspect she's a villain seeing as she's casually strolling through Keter.

I think this is continuing the "sword from the stone" theme. By pulling out the sword she's proven to be worthy of becoming a Queen. Now, she's been legitimized by the past in the only way available to her.

Even though no one will know about this, for the purposes of the story she's even more than a person destined to rule – she's an inheritor of the Callowan legacy.

shieldredblog

Give him a Title and set him loose on the Crusades.
People will hear of it

ArkhCthuul

Haha, 9h yeah, that'd be a laugh.

Still, liked the introspection and the acceptance of at least her core by a former Calloway king.

burguulkodar

That would be interesting enough to be possible, actually. Mayhaps Cat will include his freedom in the bargain she strikes. Who knows.

Viconr

Unless he was controlled by DK all along.

SpeckofStardust

"Callowans as a people can be summed up by the fact that, before the Uncivil Wars had even come to a close, it'd become a common boast among the populace that the Black Queen had not even spent a sennight in Keter before having several counts of arson and murder to her name."

For the metaphysical presentation of winter she does tend to solve problems via fire now doesn't she?

Aaron Wagner

I don't know about you but I burn more fires in winter than in summer

Novice

Oh, that was a great one. Kudos.

danh3107

Callowans are more Dawi than Umgi I think, vengeance for every slight and justice for every grudge beats in their hearts.

Yotz

General Callowan attitude regularly evokes remembrance of Dammaz Kron, yes.

Also, a story of an olden King returning as a Ravebant general at the head of an army of the dead to fight for his former land just because he still have several bones to pick, and is too stubborn to die without setting the score...

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Would you be tried as an arsonist, murderer, or heathen for trying to burn a god?

Aaron Wagner

I think you get deified if you succeed.

sengachi

I remember reading a story once where a god-killer escaped legal consequences because the only relevant crime on the books was *attempted* deicide. No one had ever bothered writing up a legal punishment for successful god murder, on account of no one anticipating anyone actually succeeding at the task.

Byzantine

You are now obligated to find that story, as I want to read it too 😊

sengachi

Tales of MU I think. Warning: it's a very sexually graphic story with a heavy emphasis on BDSM, and last I recall the story was (after several books) put on hiatus and had yet to be returned to last I saw.

It's got some pretty excellent worldbuilding though, I'd recommend it for that alone.

Dainpdf

And yet, doesn't one need to attempt the deed in order to succeed? Unless he managed to do it by accident...

Gydd

Tales of MU had a character mention that particular lacunae.

Only other character else who would/could is Telwyrn from TGaB, and for her, laws happen to other people.

Mike E.

Yep, I'm pretty sure it was Arachne from TGaB. The latest chapter sort of adds to that story in passing.

Yotz

Treason doth never prosper: what's the reason?
Why if it prosper, none dare call it treason.

daegone823

I wonder is thief a transitional name she can perhaps gain a small bit of weight to her name in order to transition into a more noble or villainous name. Maybe the thief of night teaches her that somethings are not worth stealing or sacrificing and she turns on Catherine allowing diabolist to join the woe or the other hero tells her the history of Callow and how diabolist is just like the dead king thus she attempts everything in her power to end the noble.

Anybody else nervous about who or what diabolist was speaking to that had need of her being pulled away. She is always up to something.

Five towers five named sounds like the dead king has formed his revenants into a band of heroes we have a rogue, a noble name, so far only thing missing are mage, healer, barbarian.

Someguy

I think [Thief] is only transitional until they become powerful enough to have Of [Something] as a suffix to their Name.

Erfling

She stole the godsdamned sun, what more do you want

Someguy

But she's not the first or the only one to have stolen [the Sun] or [Fire] before, that was done following the paths of her predecessors. She is bigger than that, she's now in Government, I'm seeing in my mind's eye [Thief of Nations]. Rulers waking up in a world where their borders, holdings and titles are gone, people not having a cultural identity of any relevance or coherence, Black's crushing of the Callowan rebellion in Book 2 on a worldwide scale.

NZPIEFACE

I believe names such as "Thief" are full Names themselves, while the "Something of Something" names are mostly sidegrades or downgrades when a "Something" already exists or that the person is way too specialized in a specific region to just be called "Something".

Dantalian

Thief did steal star, if you count that small sun of Summer.

Hammerman

Thief of Summers Might perhaps

spencer

If she takes a Winter title that could be a good path to a 'Thief of...' Name. Thief of Stars sounds like a good title. Maybe Thief defeats the Revenant and assumes her Name?

Javvies

He thinks Cat's a daughter of House Ismail on first seeing her. I wonder if that is solely because she's a half Deoraithe as part of a delegation in/to Keter, or if she looks like an Ismail.

Also, that opening quote is awesome.

---

By the way, it's also a typo: the name of the ruling line of Daoine is Iarsmai (at least EE fixed it to that the last time I asked him about it).

TeK

It can be not a typo, just a different house. This king is OLD. What gives?

Yotz

"Call me Ishmael..."

Thea

Ismael came up before and it was actually fixed... once, when it was pointed out. I think another case was left as is, because nobody mentioned it. Both times it referred to Kegan.

Snowfire1224

It seems even a long undead king accepts Cathrine as a Queen, even if Procer won't. Even if no one is ever told about this meeting, that has narrative weight to it.

Someguy

It's not like he has any high ground to stand on being of a bastard line thanks to Yolanda, it's what you bring to Callow and strive for that matters.

Shogun no Yari

Probably because Callowans don't really care for outside opinions. Cat is Callowan, that is all that matters.

Death Knight

5 palaces, 5 Named guards. One is the Thief of Stars, counterpart to the Thief of the Woe. The other, Edward VII, former king of Callow, perfect mirror to the Black Queen of the same.

I wonder who Masego, Hakram and Indrani's counterparts in Keter are?

TeK

Especially given a hint that Dead King changes those when it struck his fancy. It would be just like him, to specifically change undead Named guardians of palaces as a jest.

Dantalian

It would be pretty funny if there was a flesh puppet in each Palace. One of them would be getting a bit of help from the Thief of Stars to hide itself in the Silent Palace.

Cold Cyberia

It's possible Hakram's counterpart will be an Orc Warlord. The Dead King predates Miezans so they were still around and seeing a Named Orc at the height of their power would be a nice contrast to what they are now.

nick012000

Now I'm wondering if he's got any Dread Emperors hanging around...

edrey

on the other could thief become the thief of stars, she had stole the sun of summer, at least she could learn a couple of tricks from that one

wyaldriddler

Hah, I was getting some *serious* Dark Souls vibes from this chapter. Stupid Idea, but I would be amused if Edward VII could follow Cat after all the stuff that is coming. I find that I really like him as he's been presented so far.

TeK

Maybe she can ask Dead King of Edward, as a sign of good will for well proceived negotiations.

Yotz

And then Edward would be calling her "young lady" and nagging her about grand-(grand)-children for the rest of eternity...

TeK

He will be like a grandpa that she never knew. It will neatly fall into her current family dynamic. An orc as a brother, a wizard as cousin, Archer as sister, Black as a father, and many murderous Named aunts and uncles.

....

Would be a fun twist to bring him back to Callow. Bad news, I allied with an undead army of doom, good news, it's led by an old Callowan king. I wonder if that would balance out in the eyes of the people

TeK

It would raise morals of any Callowan to a peak. As a sort of blessing from past, an evidence of inheritance. Brandon may even cry a little.

daegone823

Being crowned queen of Callow by a former ruler a Fairfax no less Talbot would cry tears of joy, to see his great, great ... great grandfather? Nobles would not be able to doubt her claim and "good" would be confused to say the least but to be honest no Callowan care what outsiders think of them.

The name she would transition to would probably boost the Broken Bells, they would in memory of their undying former king revenant, and to praise there current named queen/immortal abomination they would be called the Unbroken Bells as soon as they die they would be ressurected by her necromancy becoming the first undead knightly order. A true testament to Chatharine blurring the lines between good and evil.

Shogun no Yari

But you forget that he'll have access to the truth of his daughter's demise...which means someone lied and that equals a full scale Callowan grudge special.

Raved Thrad

"We will never forgive and we will never forget." And with an admonition from a past king of Callow to stand tall and proud and spit in the collective gods' eye, no less. It is a great and terrible thing to be called kin by a king and to be counseled to hang on to your hate.

On an aside, does anyone else think Catherine has some kind of power that makes people underestimate her? It's like the first thing people think when they see her is "girl" or "child." Oh, and "short." She really hates that last, and so, she being a Callowan, the gods will burn.

NZPIEFACE

Power? No. It's an epithet.
She was merely a girl when she came to her Name. Now she'll always be one.

Raved Thrad

Sort of like a vampired turned young?

Raved Thrad

Vampire, rather. Stupid injured arm...

Dainpdf

Not always. So long as that's what she sees herself as.

MetruX

Which is even seen by way of Masego. He was but a small child when he became Named, but he kept growing until he met Cat. For Named it's more a matter of how you see yourself, and are seen by the world.

Yotz

With Black also – he was old and feeling tired of life, and had started to show gray hair consequently, but after Cat stabbed him, breaking the mold of Fate, he is feeling reinvigorated, young and able to wonder once again, and his aging is visibly reversed as a result – to a point where it is seen almost like a second youth.

That could be a thing of Evil Names exclusively, though – Good Names do not remove the Boon of Aging from the bearers as a norm, however young inside said bearers may feel. And Cat is a special case, of course.

Argentorum

Great chapter, my one nitpick (which returns for the first time we heard the rhyme) is that “ours will be long and paid twice” sounds kinda clunky. I’m a fan of:

“Ours will be paid long and twice”

*gets off soapbox*

The world is going to burn at her feat. It’s going to be glorious.

Say, I wonder if she can ask for King Edward back, you know, as a loan. What’s a rental hero between friends right?

NZPIEFACE

For every slight there is a price,
Ours will be long and paid twice.

I feel it rhymes better than your suggestion, as both lines here have 2 parts to them where naturally stop. Your line would be said in a single breath.

Lab Rat

Your version also changes the meaning; “Ours will be long and paid twice” means that’ll we’ll hold our grudge forever and once we catch you , we'll be even worse to you than you were to us. "Ours will be paid long and twice", on the other hand, means that when we get our revenge, we'll make it last a long time.

Jane

Heh. So even a proper Fairfax king puts country before the Heavens, eh? Callowans truly are vengeful to the bone.

Simpli

If he is indeed acting as more than a puppet of our local Hidden Horror, helping to push Catherine along the lines he wants her to go.

Novice

In Ranger's interlude, we saw two former Named have most, if not all, of their personality intact. But you're right, there's always a possibility that this is part of the Dead King's machinations.

RanVor

Ok, it may be prudent to expect skulduggery from the Dead King, but this is seriously starting to sound like a paranoia.

Erfling

It's only paranoia if someone isn't out to get you

RanVor

Only after you've been proven right. Until then, it's paranoia.

Zourath

I don't see him being a puppet, but he is probably also being used. The Hidden Horror strikes me as far too much of a subtle type to leave an obvious opening in the narrative like the king being puppeted, he knows the Bard would exploit it if he did. I think that he had the king guard there on the off chance an interaction like this played out, then just waited for Callowans to be Callowans.

Decius

"I will not inquire as to your purpose, as I would be bound to then speak it. But you are born of Callow, are you not?"

How will the revelation that this Revenant is disloyal to the Dead King but under certain compulsions play out? Surely the Saint of Swords, given the knowledge to do so, could cut the tethers that bind them; the Saint of Swords has cut several other things that aren't even objects.

Dainpdf

The heroine is more likely to cut down the undead completely. A mercy, really. And, after all, it is the Dead King's sorcery animating the undead. It is unknown whether severing his influence without removing what animates them is possible.

Death Knight

It depends on if the necromancy that power(s)ed the revenants is a continuous application of magical energy. If it is then cutting the "strings" of the revenant would most likely cause him to collapse. If not, then cutting the connection to the Dead King would most likely free the revenant from the Dead King's control. Unless the Dead King didn't implant a magical "seed" inside the corpse that automatically restores the link as soon as it is cut. Given his intelligence shown so far, it is quite plausible he would have such a fail safe, at least in all the dead Named he values greatly.

Dainpdf

All necromancy so far has been of the first kind, so it seems likely that this is also that, especially since Cat mentioned the undead all feeling somewhat similar with the exception of the shade of name power she felt.

Decius

The Revenant that wishes not to know something because it would have to report it has ALREADY been freed from control. It makes most of its own decisions and acts independently already.

Maybe cutting the bonds that compel specific actions would directly or indirectly result in the destruction of the undead directly. If so, it's still easier than cutting them directly, since the bodies of Named have plot armor, and the SoS has already been shown to be unable to penetrate plot armor.

*blitzxs*

"Callowans as a people can be summed up by the fact that, before the Uncivil Wars had even come to a close, it'd become a common boast among the populace that the Black Queen had not even spent a sennight in Keter before having several counts of arson and murder to her name.”

– Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara

Heh. Guess that Cat’s fear of Callowons rebelling if word got out that she allied with the Dead King never came to pass. They must REALLY hate the nations of the Tenth Crusade when they wouldn’t mind allying with the the greatest monster in Calernia just to return the slight against them.

Simpli

Keeping in mind that they are having an Evil Ruler and Rulership sets the morality and personality of your territory and people – that might also mean that they are becoming more ruthless and hate-filled, no matter who their target of ire is.

Cold Cyberia

Keep in mind this has only be stated by the Grey Pilgrim who isn’t exactly unbiased. It could easily be that Callowan people are simply getting more desperate and hence more prone to radical action.

RanVor

It kinda surprises me how everyone seems to take GP’s words as a face value just because he is a hero. Even if he doesn’t outright lie, there’s no way he’s objective in what he says.

Dainpdf

It’s not because he’s a hero. It’s because he’s the personification of wise advice, and he’s one of the big hitters.

We also take Akua at her word when she prattles about the treacherous tendencies of wastelanders.

RanVor

He’s already shown he’s not above manipulating Catherine to achieve his goals, and even when he doesn’t, he’s definitely heavily biased. I wouldn’t say he lied to her face or even intentionally hid information from her, but I highly doubt what he told Cat is the full picture of what is actually happening.

Dainpdf

That is true. But it does mean that Cat probably has a palpable influence on her people, even if the part about it bringing damnation is not necessarily true. And I hope people stop talking about Cat like she’s not a villain. She admits she is, and she wanted to keep Akua's evil weapon of doom. She didn't want it made, but she was for keeping it. She's not Akua, but she was willing to bring the Hells into this.

Death Knight

The only reason she is considered a villain is because of the in-story definition of a villain. If you don't swear to do the Heaven's will then you're considered a villain whether you are or not. That is just the perception that the populace of Calernia at large have which is probably why there hasn't been a Hero allied with below before Catherine.

I actually found it suspect that such a hero hasn't presented itself yet. Especially in Callow that are notorious for their grudges.

I could easily conceive of a situation where a Callowan peasant loses his family to a scuffle between a Judgment-sworn hero and a villain. In the aftermath, as he kneeled over the still warm corpses of his family amid the ashes of his home he feels an overwhelming sense of powerlessness. Of weakness that he could not stand up the Gods' favored champions. In that moment he swears death and vengeance to villains and heroes alike and leaves on a quest to seek power (Ironical and/or hypocritical I know). He swears never to stand by helplessly again as the people he cares for get trampled underfoot by a bunch of powertripping assholes. So he sought out the legendary Lady of the Lake to train him in the ways of murder.

Initially she refused, but our would be hero would not be convinced otherwise. He kept asking and asking, repeatedly getting rebuffed and even getting beaten to within an inch of his life by the half elf. Still he would not give up. He knew in his heart he would gain the power to beat the shit out of all those goddamn assholes even if it cost him his life. Their existence is a pain on his life and he cannot abide them living. This conviction would be enough to qualify him for a Name. Maybe Heir or something. His conviction impresses Ranger enough she decides to teach him the ways of the hunt. He practices relentlessly, LEARNING ways to kill everything that walks. PERFECTING the methods his teacher shows him and eventually TRANSCENDING them to deal with those pesky story save bullshit.

Eventually he leaves Refuge and earns the Name The Sword of Vengeance while standing above the still warm corpses of the Hero and the reanimated Villain that put him on the path. As he looks at their dead bodies his resolve strengthens. He decides to become the Sword that will smite all foreign invaders to his land whether they be hypocrites in the west or the lunatics on the east or enemies within. The Sword that protects with the righteous fury of vengeance.

...So I am no EE so forgive the shitty story quality, but shouldn't those turn of events have probably happened in the past? Or similarly?

Dainpdf

Sorry, Tl;Dr. Will read the story later.
But as for Cat only being a Villain because she's not sworn to Above... She is under the Gods Below. As Akua has stated, Praesi will backstab the Gods Below if it serves their interest and that's part of their devotion. In the same way, Cat will burn the Gods Below for Callow... And that's part of her villainy.

RanVor

Whether or not Catherine can be considered a villain is irrelevant to my point which is exactly what I've written in the first comment, namely that people believe Grey Pilgrim unconditionally without any evidence, and I find it weird and a little disappointing.

It depends on how you define a villain, by the way.

Dainpdf

It is not the strongest argument, but he is an authority. The narrative he's trying to set up also works for him teaching Cat things. As a last point, there is some evidence which he himself pointed out in Callow.

RanVor

Not really. The evidence you speak of can be interpreted in a number of ways, and not all of them align with GP's position on the matter. Yet (almost) everyone treats it like it was a proven fact, ignoring the obvious interest Grey Pilgrim has in misleading Catherine and even more obvious bias characterizing pretty much everyone with a strong opinion on any given matter. Note that it doesn't necessarily mean it's not true – just that we shouldn't take everything he says as a face value.

This is especially jarring considering that the Dead King is given a reverse treatment in the comments – everything even remotely related to him is immediately suspected of being a trick meant to manipulate Cat to his sinister ends. Again, it's not necessarily wrong, but it makes the readers look paranoid.

Dainpdf

Uh... You do remember this is the guy who outwitted the Bard, who tricked an entire nation in order to ascend to power, and who Cat keeps saying is untrustworthy? It's only paranoia if they're not out to get you.

On the other hand, the Pilgrim has always been trying to outwit Cat, but in his position as advisor and wise man cherry picked truth is a better tool than outright lies.

RanVor

It's funny how everyone keeps misinterpreting my comments no matter how clear I make myself.

I DID NOT TELL ANYONE TO TRUST THE DEAD KING. I'm merely saying not everything is a deception. Seeing threats where there are none is as dangerous as not seeing the ones that are. I'm pretty sure the Dead King has other things to do BESIDES manipulating Cat.

Dainpdf

You implied people were overreacting when it comes to him and compared him to the Pilgrim. I merely put forward all the reasons we have not to trust him, and some we have to trust the Pilgrim. Now, if many people keep misunderstanding you no matter how much effort you make, it may be that your measure of how clear you are being is flawed, or you are misunderstanding them.

RanVor

Actually, I brought the Dead King up to underline the commenters' inconsistency in being suspicious. Trusting the Dead King is foolish, that much is true. But taking Grey Pilgrim's word on the matter without taking into account the enormous disparity between his worldview and the actual situation Callow and Catherine are in is just as foolish. This, and only this, is what I've trying to say from the very beginning, and any implied meanings are entirely imaginary.

Dainpdf

I believe I put forward sufficient explanation for why the Pilgrim's word can be trusted to be true, if cherry picked, while the Dead King's can't. It's not inconsistency if there is reason.

RanVor

And I believe I put forward sufficient explanation why you're wrong, so I think we're even.

Dainpdf

Did you? You provided no counterargument to the idea that the Pilgrim's narrative role stimulates him to provide true advice, that contrary to Neshamah we have some idea what he wants, and that it is not in his nature to outright lie.

RanVor

How long are we going to continue with this bullshit? It's not worth the effort anymore.

Dainpdf

I considered it spirited debate. I am sorry you feel that way.

RanVor

Please, don't be. You make me feel guilty.

RanVor

As for the Dead King, the general consensus seems to be that everything that happened since Cat first set a foot in Keter has been a part of the evil plot carefully orchestrated by the Dead King in order to trick Cat into doing something. While the existence of such a plot is pretty likely and some of the events that have transpired since Chapter 33 are probably part of it, I very much doubt ALL OF THEM are, and this is one of the less likely instances.

Dainpdf

Well, Neshamah has proven to be a meticulous planner, and he's had a few centuries to plan whatever this is.

Also...we don't know what his plan is, so we best be ready for anything.

Euodiachloris

GP quite likely wholeheartedly believes in the trickle-down corrupting effect of having Team Evil ruling any land. However, Team Good also has rather staggeringly direct mind control techniques they use on both Named and muggles alike with all the subtlety of Trump at an international conference – and, GP has that number on speed-dial, so he couldn't fully spot the hypocrisy for what it is (he gets part of the way, then seems to get shutdown and diverted into killbot mode). But, see, that isn't corruption. Oh, no. That is meet, right and Good... even if it throws an entire city and countryside into, e.g. the maws of the undead who weren't actively doing anything at the time or could wipe a country off the map for four generations just to make a point.

Novice

I don't know about Good rulers using mind control. Callow has been ruled by Kings and Queens of Callow on the side of Good, and yet that didn't stop their nobles from being self-serving assholes. Just ask Mary the Songbird.

Euodiachloris

The rulers themselves don't have to. The Heavens do it off their own bat, often without telling the rulers. This is going by how Cordelia is getting the carpet whipped out from under her. Or how Liesse was going to be "saved" by mindraping the entire population through guilt trips... And, none of the Callowan lords or ladies who supported the rebellion were told about the incoming Angel ahead of time by Team Good, or asked their opinions about it.

My point was: it's not having Evil™ rulers that corrupts a country any more than having Good™ ones blesses it. People aren't that simple, and Good™ acting like compete jerks can still corrupt a nation just fine by sheer knock-on, butterfly effects. While blaming the other side for the results of their own actions, of course. And, that's even without the Heavens stepping in directly.

Dainpdf

Yeah, Good isn't necessarily good... It is very willing to sacrifice the few for the many, as it sees, while Evil a courage the sacrifice of the many for the goals of the few.

Cold Cyberia

The thing is, there's a ton of evidence for Praesi being backstabbing bastards and not so much for villains corrupting the world.

Like, GP is literally the only guy who thinks this. If it was indeed the case, wouldn't the House of Light object more strongly to Cat being crowned? How about Black – he's lived and breathed Namelore for forty years so you'd think he'd give her a heads up. Hell, you'd at least expect a snide remark from Bard or something. But there's nothing.

Though you make a good point with the wise mentor angle.

Dainpdf

For evidence, one might look at Neshamah's rise, and what the Pilgrim pointed out in Callow itself. Black is concerned with Namelore mostly as it relates to breaking Creation into his image. I don't think he'd care much about corruption, but even if he did he wouldn't be likely to tell Cat things that might make her deviate from the path he wanted for her. And the Bard? She's barely talked to Cat yet. And she's more the "manipulate things so evil is defeated" type than the "trade philosophical insights with the villain" one.

Cold Cyberia

Black (or Malicia) would definitely point it out to Cat. Suddenly radicalizing an entire nation would make ruling a lot tougher and they're both concerned with keeping Callow mellow – they would let her know just so she could adjust.

With Bard, I meant more her conversations with William etc. At some point, you'd expect her to bitch about how a villain is objectively going to corrupt the country, but she never does.

Just to clarify, I'm not dismissing the possibility it's true but I am weary of accepting it at face value.

Dainpdf

No one said anything about "radicalize". If anything, increasing the traditionally evil traits in Callow makes them *easier* for both her and Praes to rule. Well, more her than Praes. Regarding the Bard, I believe we never got all her conversations with William. Plus, she didn't really need to give him that – he was already motivated.

Dhael

I get the feeling that Callow is more agnostic towards the gods, as both the God Above and Below have constantly used Callow as a battlefield for their wars for many, many generations.

The Grey Pilgrim may be simply underestimating just how deep Callowian grudges go and how little they actually care which side they're on as long as those grudges are paid in full.

Callow always repays its debts, no matter how long it takes. And Callow has a *lot* of debts to call in.

werafdsaew

I think the religious schism has more to do with it.

RanVor

How can setting Keter on fire be seen as a bad thing?

Insanenoodlyguy

We just saw that even back in the day, callowans were about the grudge. It makes sense, even if GP is wrong. The east invades and serves the gods below, fuck them. But the north invades and says it is the will of the gods above. Well fuck them too! The queen is a villain? She's from Callow, fighting for Callow. And even the priests just said "well fuck the holy decree", good to know they are from Callow too. She went to deal with the dead king? Oh, it was to fuck with Procer? Yeah that sounds like her.

And then they find out she torched the place. That's classic Black Queen. Good ol Cat, best ruler in forever

Cicero

Well, first of all, Callowans just had Procer declare all of them to be heretics, infuriating them.

Second, there is an aspect here of proof of hostility to the Dead King. As in “see, the Black Queen didn’t really ally the Dead King, she was there less than a sennight and she burned down some buildings and murdered the true villain – the Dread Empress. The Black Queen was obviously planning to doublecross the Dead King from the beginning.”

Thus continuing Cat’s pattern of walking the fine line of an anti-hero.

Rook

The threefold reflection is a bit of a scary name for the place. Very similar situation to the threefold crossing. In the home field of an opponent who’s all but invited her to metaphorically cross swords, with it being the blatant major trial in her path.

Not a great situation if there is any connection as far as the nature of the trap, considering Black failed it outright and Cat’s crooked crossing of it ended up with her chained to Akua’s will until she mutilated herself to get out.

Dainpdf

Well, the similarity is in “threefold”, but threes have always been relevant to the story. I don’t put that much stock in this particular coincidence.

Argentorum

Unless I’m misremembering, Akua’s trial was the “fourfold crossing.” Not threefold.

The Four Catherine’s were Canon, White Knight, Smuggler Queen, and Legionary.

Dainpdf

Thanks. I didn’t remember the name and assumed they had it right.

---

To top that off, it was called a Fourfold Crossing: Catherine’s first “fight” with Akua was an illusion too, and here she has enough of smoke and mirrors of her own.

Burnsy

Thief: “So how’d you get a name like that?”

Thief of Stars: "I stole the jewels from the crown of a Dread Empress, said to be as many and as beautiful as the stars themselves."

Thief: "Neat. I stole an actual star once. From a demi-god"

Nethermore

Thief's answer is beyond perfect here. Thanks for making me laugh.

oaclo

Man, am I crazy or has this whole story been setting up Cat for a Fisher King 'story'?

It's been established that the Fae come back in cycles every time they die and she is definitely a Fae at this point. Seeing as there apparently no more Winter Fae on their continent, would it be too crazy for her to revive in the winters when Callow is threatened for eternity?

jacobhollander

As Russia has General Winter so does Callow have Catherine Foundling. Don't invade in winter or prepare for an army of undead suicide goats and excessive usage of goblinfire.

WuseMajor

The king here certainly felt like the Fisher King in a lot of ways, honestly.

Dainpdf

Interesting. I start to wonder if the Dead King's scheme includes the idea of having Cat kill a guest and using the slight to drive her into a (more) unfavorable bargaining position.

lennymaster

Her bargaining position can not get much more undesirable. She is in a bidding war with Malicia for the Dead Kings help, trying to limit casualties while neither of the other two care the least bit about dead civilians.

WuseMajor

At least one of them might well find dead civilians very useful in fact.

Dainpdf

Oh yes. I meant he might have a catch 22 in place. Kill Malicia, you're screwed. Don't kill Malicia, you're screwed.

Death Knight

EE, is the necromancy that powers the Revenants and the undead of the Dead King a sustained endeavor or is it similar to Still Water in that it only required a spark of magic to initiate?

Cold Cyberia

Shouldn't Hakram use Find to, well... find Malicia?

---

She's the main user of Nefarious' certified remotely controlled puppets. Hakram's Find is a nerfed version of Providence as applied to directions, relying on it (especially in that particular situation) is more or less repeating Hanno's mistakes.

Cold Cyberia

Sure, but how is following food any better? Presumably both the puppet and Malicia herself need to eat so it's not as if the current method differentiates between them. Using Find would probably be a lot quicker.

The situation is also quite different than with Hanno. Black knew the White Knight was on the opposite side of the battlefield and had a good idea of when the engagement was going to happen. Malicia likely doesn't know Cat is after her, hell she might not even know Cat's in Keter.

Metrux

His Find is not a perception, but a luck based Aspect. He does not sense where something is, when he Finds something it is where it was, but he simply was at the right place at the right time. So he could wander around and Find her, but... He'd be alone and impossibilitated from doing anything for the moment. Not the best of plans.

Cold Cyberia

Is that right? I don't recall it being stated as luck though I might be missing it.

It does seem to give him a sense of where something is though. Read through the Extra Chapter: Deadhand – the Aspect very clearly nudges him along in a particular directions to find Thief.

Cthulhu

My take FWIW

Cat is badly overmatched here. She should tell the Dead King that she cannot meet his terms because it will lead to the destruction of Callow and further, she has no wish to bid against the arrest Empress, her ally. She should then tell the Dead King she will continue to fight the crusade and hope he will join that fight as an ally and friend. She should then go home due to the religious mess in her Kingdom. Then, she should find out if the Dead King will let her leave.

Run away. Run the fuck far away. Let Malicia cut the deal with the human embodiment of evil. Go home Cat and live to fight another day.

Killing Malicia is INSANE. Foolish. Deluded. You are making it an enemy of the empire and the Dead King.

Oh one last thing: stop letting the Diabolist talk. She cannot be trusted and is manipulating you. Kill her now before she becomes a the client at

RanVor

I think the previous chapter explained pretty well why this is not an option.

Joan

Wasn't Diabolist the one who proposed this? To withdraw from negotiations and let Malicia strike a bargain with the Dead King to fight Procer so Callow doesn't have to?

I agree that is her best move, and attempting to assassinate Malicia makes NO sense at this time.

ahd

The Silvertongue seems like a good Name to transition to. (:

muffinfluffer

STAND PROOOOOOOOOUD!

---

Chapter 38: All According To (Redux)

"It is said that on the eve of the Maddened Fields, the Tyrant Theodosius consulted with the many Delosi soothsayers among his host. He asked them if he would find victory or defeat, should he give battle at dawn as he intended. The Delosi squabbled among themselves for hours, until the eldest among them looked the Tyrant in the eyes and spoke his answer: Yes."

– Extract from 'The Banquet of Follies, or, A Comprehensive History of the First League War' by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

I woke up, which was somewhat worrying considering I did not remember going to sleep. My fingers clasped the knife under my pillow even as my eyes opened, and with all the stunning majesty owed to my rank came flailing out of the sheets half naked with a blade in hand. It was somewhat embarrassing when I found myself completely alone in my palatial bedroom. Making a very dignified cape out of my bedsheets I took a wary look around and found nothing unusual – ah, save for one detail. There was sphere of misty ice on the stone table still strewn with papers we'd been using for planning. That hadn't been there... Shit, what was the last thing I could remember? Walking out of the Garden of Crowns, then I drew a blank. And my head was pounding, had I gotten drunk last night? Hells, could I still have hangovers? It'd be just like Winter to take out half the fun of drinking and leave me with the worst part, but I couldn't think of another time I'd had such a brutal headache. I'd had them once in a blue moon before I became the Squire and the Gods saw fit to relieve me of my monthlies – one of the few things for which I might actually owe thanks to Below for – but even then they'd been rare.

Had I been in a fight, then? I carefully checked my head for wounds and found no obvious ones. I did, however, stumble across what appeared to be granite coming out of the spot where my spine joined my skull. I swore on the fucking Hells, if Archer had gotten me wasted and talked me into some kind of pissing contest, oh Gods no it couldn't be that. The stone didn't wiggle at all when I pressed on it but I could feel it going deep into my head. Some kind of cylinder? Yeah, not even Indrani would have been on board for that. I dropped my nifty cape but kept the knife, because this was still Keter. Padding softly across the floor I neared the frozen sphere and immediately notice this was my own work. For one, it was much colder than ice was supposed to be. And though the surface was misting and weeping, there was no puddle of water around it as there would be if it'd been melting for a few hours. That had fae bullshit written all over it. I leant over and wiped away the surface, eyes narrowing when I found there were objects inside. Cards, by the looks of it. Three of them, over each other with room in between. I couldn't quite make out the one furthest in, so I picked up the globe to turn it over.

It remained stuck to the table, as if nailed to it. Frowning, I tugged harder only to hastily stop when I heard a crack from the stone supports beneath. I checked under and found the base of the table had a sharp little fissure going through it. Shit, I thought, setting down the knife. Maybe if I pretended it'd never happened Athal would be too polite to point it out. I decided not to patch it up with ice, since it'd essentially be admitting I was responsible and the kingdom's coffers were running low even without having to pay for whatever fortune an antique Keteran table was worth. So, the sphere had been made so it couldn't be removed. Presumably, there was another way to get at the cards. I was already started on bad ideas for the days, so I might as well try to shove my hand in and see what happened.

"Gods that's cold," I hissed, as my fingers went straight in.

I fished the top card out and shook out the wetness, which apparently wasn't making the ink on it run. Was that from Indrani's deck? The Page of Cups stared back with his little smirk, but the interesting part was what'd been written on the card. No one else in the Woe had cursive this horrid, so it was clearly my own.

It was you.

So, I'd screwed with my own mind instead of having it done to me. That was... good?

Ask about Isabella's deception. Don't force the cards, you savage.

Ah, Past Catherine had evidently decided to be a smug bitch about this. Fuck her and her cryptic riddles. I flipped the card and found another few words.

Skein. Thief of – that was probably meant to be a star, but I wasn't exactly an artist. Shoddy work, Past Catherine, you could have asked Hakram for help. And, to end it, Spellblade.

Named, evidently. The Thief was supposed to be keeping an eye on this very palace, though if I'd encountered her since King Edward's warning I had no memory of it. I did not even need to know what this plan was to already know it was terrible.

PS, fuck you Future Catherine stars are hard to draw.

I'd have to ask Masego how feasible it was to arrange a ritual so I could go back and deck myself in the face. Who knew, maybe I already had and that was why she was being such a cranky asshole about the whole thing. I got the other two cards out, but they were encased in black ice. Bearing my worst enemy's instructions in mind, I didn't try to force them open. The working seemed to be have been tied off, anyway. The power within the ice was slowly trickling away, though one of them would run out long before the other. I left them on the table and got dressed. I'd helpfully – wait, no, that was too neatly folded so probably Hakram – left clothes atop the dresser last night. A green and silver tunic, with trousers of the same make. My plate was nowhere in sight, but what looked like Indrani's spare set of chain mail was waiting next to my boots. That was... unusual. The time where a full suit of plate had slowed me down had ended around when I'd become strong enough to accidentally break tables. Which I had not in this particular place, for the record. Archer was taking the fall for that if anyone asked. I clasped the Mantle of Woe around my shoulders and idly ran a metaphorical chain that bound Diabolist to it, finding it already taut. She was nowhere close, then, and given the lack of windows in my room following the chain's direction told me nothing about where she'd gone.

I was among the first to wake, but not the first. Vivienne was already glaring down at a cup of tea, a half-finished pastry in her plate. No servants in sight, though the table was bursting with a morning banquet. I touched the cards in the inner pocket of my cloak, right beneath my pipe and wakeleaf stash, and plopped myself down next to her.

"So, I don't know if you're aware," I said, reaching for what looked like fresh bread. "But I think we tried to get clever right last night."

"There was playing card nailed to my bedpost when I woke up," Thief admitted. "It told me to look in my bag when Hakram joins us."

"Can you, uh, remember anything from yesterday afternoon or after?" I asked.

She eyed me cautiously.

"Skein," she said. "Prophecy by spun thread. It's all I was told I could say."

"So there's a seer on the board," I mused.

That did explain why apparently whatever the plan was it had to be kept secret even from us. Maybe they could only predict through conscious decisions? Black had theorized that was the Augur's weakness, in Procer. Also that she didn't always control what she saw, but that tended to be a staple of oracle Names. What the Gods believed was important and what mortals did were not necessarily the same thing.

"If I asked you about Isabella's deception, would it mean anything to you?" I asked.

Vivienne's brow rose.

"Nothing," she said.

Way to be specific, Past Catherine. I'd finished buttering my bread and was struggling to drip honey on it without spilling when Masego joined us. My eyes widened when he came in sight, which was mildly ironic considering the reason they did: one of the glass orbs that served as his own was missing.

"Hierophant," I delicately said. "I don't know if you've noticed, but-"

"I don't want to talk about it," Masego grunted.

He reached for the pot of tea, missing it by half an inch. Huh. I had wondered about his depth perception nowadays. Vivienne kindly poured him a cup and he settled into his seat, casting half a baleful glare at the world.

"So, can you see through the missing-"

He muttered in the arcane tongue and my breakfast caught fire. That twat, I'd just gotten it the way I liked it. I put out the flames with a twist of Winter, but now it was all soggy and disgusting.

"Fine, be that way," I said. "I was just worrying for you."

"I know where you stash your wakeleaf," he warned me.

That was a grave threat, and with the elegance of a tried diplomat I changed the subject.

"I don't suppose anyone knows where Diabolist is," I asked.

"No idea," Vivienne admitted. "Masego?"

"I am going to drink this cup of tea," Hierophant announced. "And greatly savour the accompanying silence. Shatter that dream at your peril."

Vivienne discretely covered her face before I could catch her smiling, wily veteran that she was. Hierophant finished his cup in the quiet, broken only when Hakram finally joined us.

"Isabella's deception," I said as he strolled into the hall. "Ring a bell?"

"Good morning, Catherine," he said amusedly.

"Don't you give me lip," I said. "We can't know who came up with this mess, but we can be sure we wouldn't have gone ahead without your agreement. As far as I'm concerned, this is entirely on you until proven otherwise."

"She's taking to the works of queenship rather well, isn't she?" Vivienne told the orc.

"Give it a few years and my Name will become the Scapegoat," Hakram gravelled. "It does ring a bell, Cat. It refers to Isabella the Mad's scheme when she fought Theodosius as the Maddened Fields."

I finished buttering my second bit of bread, casting a wary eye at Hierophant.

"I'm listening," I said. "Elaborate."

"Theodosius was said to have soothsayers, or more likely a great deal of spies," Adjutant continued, grabbing a seat at my side. "So General Isabella secretly gave her commanders wildly differing plans to carry out during the battle. She turned it into an axiom, when she wrote her book after retirement. 'The heart of warfare is deception. Therefore, the generals who can deceive even themselves are invincible.'"

I sighed. So we were now taking operational advice from a woman whose moniker was the Mad. Lovely. What were the odds that there were actually several plans and most of them were false? Godsdamned me. I glanced at Vivienne, who was hiding away something in her palm with her other hand. Right, she'd been told to take out a card from her 'bag' when Hakram arrived, hadn't she? She crumpled the card.

"Now," she said.

Hierophant rose to his feet without warning, and flared with power as he barked an incantation. There were six doors to the dining hall. Every single one of them closed, glimmering with light.

"Domain, Catherine," he said.

I bit into my bread. Didn't get much out of the taste and even less nourishment, but the texture was nice. Melted in the mouth. Even as I chewed, I opened the floodgates and Winter came out to play. The darkness fell like a curtain over all the world. I felt the small bundles of warmth that were the Woe as everything froze with an ugly snapping sound, and herded the worst of it away from them. They still shivered. Our visitor was granted no such protection. Flesh hardened, bones shattered and the Thief of Stars went still. She spoke not a word, but in the darkness above a constellation of stars was birthed. The King's Crown, I thought. Back home they said it was an auspicious sign for the rulers of Callow. I swallowed and waited. Was it an aspect?

Probably. Or at least the remnants of one. But in the end a thief was a thief, and I was the Sovereign of Moonless Night. I had all the time in the world, here. A dozen eternities passed, and one by one the stars winked out.

Winter devoured everything, given enough time.

When the darkness left, the Revenant was revealed to our sight. Shivering, Masego wove binding sorceries around her through hushed whispers as I eyed the frozen remnants of my breakfast with distaste. So much for that. Within my cloak one of the cards shattered, the casing's unmaking accelerated by the touch of my domain. I took it out, and found my writing spread across the Four of Pentacles.

Do you have the Thief?

There were two bundles of words beneath the question.

Yes, Zeze breaks first rune.

No, find Archer.

I flipped it and found a single word on the other side.

Lark.

Enlightening stuff, Past Catherine. Good work, you riddling bag of crazy. What the hells had I learned about the Skein that made this elaborate a plan seem like a good idea? Everything I'd been taught about scheming screamed that multiple steps were a recipe for failure.

"I woke up with a list of questions on the Six of Swords," Hakram said. "I assume she is the one I need to ask."

I put back the card and frowned. Well, it wasn't like interrogating one of us would help. We'd screwed with our own memories.

"Masego, you need to break the first rune," I said.

Hierophant's lone eye swivelled towards me.

"The artefact in your head," he said. "I had wondered the purpose of it. Everyone else has a spell instead, but I suppose you would not so easily be enchanted."

"We shoved a magic stone into my skull," I said, quite uncomfortable at the notion. "Oh Gods. That won't have any ill-effects, will it?"

"Your brain is mostly decorative," Hierophant assured me.

"Could have told you that," Vivienne murmured.

I was going to start keeping count of her instances of sedition, I decided. Probably not a list, since she'd absolutely steal it, but there had to be a way.

"Just don't blow up my skull, Zeze," I sighed. "I'm not sure it'd grow back."

His lips thinned.

"If you'd just let me—"

"We have a rule, Masego," I said patiently. "What is that rule?"

"We don't vivisect friends," he muttered mulishly. "Even when we could learn the most interesting things from it."

He padded over and without any warning placed his palm against the back of my head.

"Oh," he said. "That is skilfully—"

—

"There's a Revenant overseeing every palace," I told the others. "If my source is to be believed, ours is the Thief of Stars."

"That is a much snappier Name than Vivi's," Indrani noted. "Have we considered trading in? This outfit needs fresh blood. Corpse. Eh, you know what I mean."

I met Hakram's eyes across the table. Idly, he shuffled Archer's deck of cards though the game they'd played before Thief and I returned was long abandoned.

"Nothing we can do about that," I said. "Especially if the Skein really is guiding all of them."

I very carefully did not begin to ponder how we might catch her, even though she would need to be at least temporarily removed from the board if we were to have any chance of success. Chaos was our only best tool here. To cheat an oracle, you had to cheat yourself. We would need a touchstone, but also a way to multiply and scatter the possible trails. And, to tip it all over, a blindfolded blade. I turned to Diabolist.

"Akua," I said. "I never thought I'd say this, but I need you to scheme."

The smile on her lips was less than reassuring.

—

"-Catherine," Vivienne said.

My eyes rolled back into their proper place.

"I'm here," I said, brushing away her hand. "This is... going according to plan, maybe? I think Hakram needs to ask her the questions. She's part of this, one way or another."

"You'll need to unfreeze her mouth first," Adjutant said.

I rolled my shoulder, more out of habit than need, and turned my gaze to the Thief of Stars. Like King Edward she looked almost alive. Quite a bit younger than him, too. Tanned, leathery skin and sun-bleached blond hair in a single tress going down her back. I did not recognize the cut or cloth of her short-sleeved tunic, though admittedly that meant little. Exerting my will, I freed her jaws and tongue without a word.

"You people are the worst," the Thief of Stars said in garbled Chantant.

Ugh, Proceran. Just my luck.

"Still fresh and exciting to us," Vivienne drawled in Lower Miezan. "Hakram?"

Looming over her small form, the orc cleared his throat.

"What does Threefold Reflection mean?" he asked.

"If I were not bound, I would have taken your eyes by now," the Revenant conversationally said. "It's one thing to be bound here, another to suffer your tender attentions twice. I do have my pride."

My eyes narrowed.

"We've done this before," I said.

"I can see why you're the leader," she said. "Your wits are truly peerless."

"Masego," I said. "I'm not sure how to phrase this delicately, but-"

Without replying he traced a pair of runes out of red light and the Thief of Stars hissed.

"You little Wasteland twat," she said.

"Compelling truth is not objectively possible by sorcery," Hierophant said. "But this should compel her to answer and forbid her from consciously speaking something she knows to be false."

"What does Threefold Reflection mean?" Hakram patiently repeated.

"There are three overlain palaces," the Revenant snarled. "The thresholds meld."

"How many Praesi delegates are there?" Adjutant continued.

"Forty-three," she said.

"Where is Archer of the Woe?" he asked.

"I don't know," she said.

Why had he asked that? No, the important part was why that'd been a question. If we'd needed to know where Indrani was right now, it'd be written on a card. So that couldn't be the point. If us having that information wasn't the point, then most likely the question was meant to establish she didn't have that information either. That must matter, to some extent. Did the Skein need that knowledge to predict us? The memory Masego had freed had involved thinking we needed a touchstone. Archer wasn't who I'd pick for something like that, but maybe that was the point. Akua's still missing, I thought. Too many parts were still unknown to have a proper guess.

"Is the Empress currently within the Threefold Reflection?" Hakram asked.

"Yes," the Thief of Stars said. "Gods, you could at least change the questions."

I hummed. So, same questions. We'd meant for us to have the same information we got from her last time. So we'd make the same plan out of them? That was a chancy roll of the dice.

"That was all the questions," Adjutant told us. "It seems unwise to simply leave her here, if we are to act now."

"That one's mine to solve," Thief noted. "No card, mind you, but it's the obvious solution."

She got up and laid a hand on the Revenant's arm. Nothing happened. Vivienne sighed.

"Hold," she said.

While the sight of the undead vanishing was interesting in its own way, it was Hakram's body-wide twitch that took my attention. He winced, and I recognized from the look on his face the signs of a dawning headache.

"Well, I know what we need to do," he said. "We're going to find Athal, and then we're going to start a fire."

---

erraticerrata

First update of the month, and so extra chapter. This one is titled "Fatalism I", from First Prince Cordelia Hasenbach's POV. ( <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/01/fatalism-i/> )

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Thanks for the link to the extra chapter! And also for the chapter 😊

ArkCthuul

Love these types of chapters.
Rediscovering what you did and why you had to do it differently this time, sigh.... 😊

NerfContessa

Restating my older statement.

Love these kind of twisty chapters.

Javvies

Heh.
That last line. Awesome.

Also, if they can dodge the Skein (a precog Name, presumably), they should be able to work around the Augur when the time comes. That's probably going to be useful.

Someguy

Revenants are less powerful than they were in life so this dry run is useful and on the Dead King's expense, all the better for the Callowan treasury.

Euodiachloris

The Dead King also believes in hands-on, practical teaching experiences, it seems. Note to Cat: avoid any room he and Black are in when both feel like throwing you into the deeper end (again). They will be bantering at your expense while thrashing out the shape of both the teaching plan and the scorecard. 😊

Darkening

Well, this isn't where I saw things going after that last chapter. I'm interested to see how it works out though.

Death Knight

Gambit roulette. Nice....

frolamiz

So Malicia copied Hasenbach and found herself a seer. And she is here in person, they will probably never have a better chance to kill her.

And we were informed about the fire last chapter =)

---

Cat said that Skein is guiding the Revenants, not the Sentinels.

I still have no idea how she could have found out about the precog. Was it the Thief? How does one even do that unnoticed?

Snowfire1224

I am so confused and I love it.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

they didn't go into the past, no time travel here. In the last several(?) days they did something/plotted something badly, and if you read the bonus chapter, I think that clues us in on what's going on.

RoflCat

Welp, time to get those arson (and murder) count rolling.

WuseMajor

Well, now we know where the Arson charge comes from. And we already know they're planning regicide, so there's Murder.

Now all we need is Jaywalking.

Do we know who the Skein is?

Gunslinger

Nope looks to be a precog revenant though they must have been a combat one otherwise they wouldn't be at Keter

Amoonymous

They don't necessarily have to be a combat name. Remember Procer only recently started scrying at all and still aren't great at it. On previous Crusades a precognitive Named might have to be at least relatively close to the front or they could risk the predictions arriving too late.

So the Dead King could either form some “non intentional” ambush of wherever the Skein was, or if they were just with the Crusade, once the defenses fall they’re vulnerable.

Though the possibility they are combat based and have an oracular ability is possible.

Daemion

This promises to be a lot of fun.

matesbe

Oh my god, I love it. This is going to be the craziest plan ever since possibly no one has any idea what it is. It’s like you took a puzzle then randomly gave out pieces to 5 people, and then they need to figure out what it looks like. Without actually putting it together again.

TeK

Or showing pieces to each other.

Gunslinger

This was brilliant. I always love it when EE does something structurally different in the story.

Also the humor continues to be on point
>Your brain is mostly decorative,” Hierophant assured me.

Finally if you can do support EE on patreon (<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>) Contributions there are what gets us 3 brilliant chapters a week (and bonus chapters)

Novice

The best part is that, to Hierophant, it’s not an insult. He is just stating a fact.

Zeze is the best straight man Cat could ever have, and this story would become a tragedy if we ever lose him.

Yotz

Then the third card thaws out.

It contains only one word.

Duck

...

And then giant fire-breathing duck starts rampaging through Keter!

Jessica Day

Actually, this makes me think:

- 1) Cat eventually finds herself talking to Malicia.
- 2) Archer is sent to shoot an arrow at CAT.
- 3) Cat reads "duck" and so the arrow intended for her hits Malicia by "accident"

RanVor

Absolutely demented. I love it.

Yotz

This is kind of plot I could get behind.

Hakurei06

So... a string of Plan A B C etc chapters?
Sounds fun.

I wonder if we'll hear another verse...
The second step...

Cicero

Wow... just... wow.

Simpli

Well... now I am getting worried as Malicia is still my favourite Villain here ^^

Rook

You can't foil my master plan if even I don't know what it is

Novice

Good ol' Isabella the Mad. Do we really know if she wasn't a Dread Empress in disguise? Maybe Traitorous in drag?

Novice

So I was having a look-see on the previous chapters for Traitorous shenanigans when I came across this: "... such wanton deviousness had been unseen since the days of Dread Emperor Traitorous, who famously passed for his own Chancellor through cunning use of a wig and a pair of cantaloupes..."

– Extract from “The Most Illustrious Histories of the Inimitable Dread Empire of Praes”, volume IV

Traitorous in drag was meant to be a joke but the madman already did it.

Insanenoodlyguy

From what we know of him, seems more like Irritant in drag, though probably not just drag.

“It’s been prophesied no man can take the Tyrant. Good thing I have a Warlock! Now, let all the records reflect that I am a woman! No really, tell the scribes, change all the records! Also my name is Isabella. ”

I doubt this is accurate but that really seems like something he/she’d do. If they weren’t the same person I feel like Isabella and Irritant would probably get along reasonably well. Though their tea parties would inevitably involve iocane powder.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

(foil) x (plan) = fp x fl ...

Rook

You can’t foil my master plan if even I don’t know what it is

Burnsy

– Dread Emperor Irritant

Barthumphries

I’m just commenting so that I can get all the wonderful comments emailed to me. 😊

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

No.

Bart

Not sure why not – it’s currently working. :p

kinigget

My absolute favorite thing about this chapter, is how it comes right after the chapter of Cordelia reflecting on her meeting with Cat and the achievements laid at the feet of said madwoman

And then we get *this*

I *love* it

Nima

A three palaces combines into one. Not a maze. Man that is dark soulsly

Euodiachloris

Eh. He's had time to really think about level design. And, Ranger helps with her beta testing. 😊

(I still think the entire Undead Burg–Firelink–New Londo intertwine setting up everything else should be taught in design schools as a mandatory unit.)

Yotz

A three palaces converged in one space...

One could say...

That it's,

bigger on the inside

It's bigger on the inside

and once you've felt it inside

I'm sure that you'll agree.

It's bigger on the inside

but don't take it from me...

ask Amy Pond!

once you've felt it inside you will see.

JJR

"How many plots can a man have at a time? At least one more than he knows about, of course."

-Horry Patter and the Philologer's Stone

Burnsy

A memory gambit. Yes. Also it's a :(redux)' of the beginning of what remains to be one of my favourite arcs. This is going to be chaotic, confusing, violent and really really awesome. More so than usual I mean.

Current contenders for the 'x's plan' titles? Cat, obviously, but I'd also say Malicia, Akua, the Dead King, presumably at least one of the Woe is currently running a second gambit that Cat isn't aware of, and who knows who else.

Man, this is gonna be good.

Decius

Does this entire plan hinge on nobody being able to forge the Woe's handwriting enough to fool them? Anyone who would be foiled by the measures the Woe appear to have taken could well be subtle enough to bring about those actions- it would even be easier, if they had the cooperation of the Thief of Stars

Snowfire1224

Well I know with at least cathrine's I doubt anyone else could out cards in ice.

Decius

I'm pretty sure Thief could have swapped out the cards for ones of her choice, either before or after they were frozen. Could the Thief of Stars have done so?

The way the cards seem to operate is that each person takes a very obvious action on a very obvious trigger, but the trigger is what someone else says.

NZPIEFACE

"Am I going to be victorious or suffer defeat?"
"Yes."

Novice

Some say that said elder has the Name of Wildbow.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

do not speak of the elder gods so lightly. The Cosmic Swine is an unspeakable antediluvian horror of the greatest magnitude.

breadknife

So, the Woe's Thief can HOLD a person... or is the Theif of Stars just a thing, like the star and ship she disappeared before? If she can use her aspect on a person would it be akin to a Domain?

Wry Warudo

Could be it only works coz the Thief of Stars is technically not alive

Cold Cyberia

God Past Catherine, stop being such a bitch.

Dantalian

Now that she stole the Thief of Stars can we call her the Thief of Thieves?

Burnsy

Or as she's known by those with too little time for such wordy names Th0T

Novice

Can't wait until she faces Grey Pilgrim.

Yotz

I presume the reaction would be something akin to this

Yotz

Around the 1:16 mark.

Bloody timetags seems to be out of question for embedded tubes...

Jessica Day

This chapter is absolutely amazing! No, seriously, I mean amazing. I loved every moment from start to finish. Keep up the great work EE. Well done.

Azure

Yeah this was a great chapter. Just the right amount of funny and serious. It's also about time we saw aspects back in play. It's been a long time since Catherine has used her domain. One thing I do want to ask though, why does Catherine interchange using the Woe's real names with their 'name' names. People don't usually do that when they're thinking of someone. They would usually stick to one name or the other, but in this chapter Catherine was all over the place for no rhyme or reason. Like I can understand her using Thief when she's being long sufferingingly commenting on Vivienne stealing stuff, but she shouldn't be switching in between so often. Unless it's intentional showing that they are their names? A literal name thing?

TeK

I would need to reread, but my guess is that she calls them by their Names when they actively move plot via their Roles.

nimelennar

It might just be for texture. Using different nouns to refer to the same character breaks up the tedium of repetition. In addition to "Adjutant" and "Hakram," he's also referred to in this chapter as "the orc."

Euodiachloris

The true mark of a pragmatist: looking at the box of clown props, custard pies, villain balls and Heath Robinson blueprints you cannot usually abide and usually keep in a vault with weapons-grade security measures... And breaking it open to use as a confusion-fu, anti-scrying measure...

Why am I also looking at Kairos, all of a sudden?

beleester

Okay, how does not knowing the plan work against a Seer? I can understand how it would work against a mind-reader (can't read your plan if you don't know it), but the future is the future regardless of whether you know it or not.

...are there no actual precogs in the setting, just heroes with mind-reading abilities who don't realize they're hearing plans in the present rather than visions of the future?

This should be testable – get a Seer to predict the result of a die roll or some other event that you can't plan for.

frolamiz

It has been stated before that Hasenbach's seer's weakness is that she is unable to predict unplanned events or choose what she predicts. Probably because she is not predicting the future, but that the gods are directly whispering into her ears what the plan of the villain is because they know it and like to cheat. I like to imagine the gods above as power gamers always trying to cheat with meta and the heroes as their player characters.

Decius

Some of the precogs can read the script. They can be defeated by going off-script.

mavant

This has been my favorite chapter in a while. Hail Eris!

daegone823

Can someone explain what the thief of stars did. She pulled out a crown and it was eaten by winter. I don't know what that had to do with stars or eons or why she pulled it out?

Tohron

It was a constellation called the King's Crown.

Morgenstern

And she seems to have pulled it out in an attempt to battle Cat's "darkness" (Fall). Only, it failed. Again.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

All according to redux.*

*Redux means "brought back; revived."

Oranckers

Erratic uses (Redux) whenever the chapter title is a repeat of a previous one. In this case, the last time "All According To" was used was at the start of the 5-way battle at the end of book 1.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I'm aware, thanks. 😊 I was invoking a meme.

<https://knowyourmeme.com/memes/just-according-to-keikaku>

ericwinter

So, I was just about to go to sleep, when I had an epiphany. We've all been throwing our ideas for what, if any, Name Catherine will form. Many have guessed Queen of winter, Queen of the hunt, and other such things. One thing most seem to have in common is that theme of Queen, which is nice and all, but far too obvious for the exact reasons Black Queen couldn't be allowed. But then I thought, isn't there another word for ruler, one far greater and with several alternate meanings that fit Cat perfectly? One that isn't just about ruling, since that was never what Catherine's story is about, or even a crown, but something more. Someone who keeps others in line, someone who makes laws and upholds them, and someone who can stand before even the gods and demand their obedience. As defined by Merriam Webster "a : one possessing or held to possess supreme political power or sovereignty b : one that exercises supreme authority within a limited sphere c : an acknowledged leader :"

To put it simply, Cat's name, if she gets any, will simply be Sovereign.

Decius

She's also in the running for Dead Empress.

Jason Ipswitch

But... Cat doesn't a look anything like David Bowie!

Euodiachloris

She's a construct: give her two free hours, a VHS player, a matching TV set, electrical compatibility and a copy of Labyrinth. Done and dusted. 😊

The next question is: what/who does she remake Akua into. xD

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I thought I was reading HPMOR for a second at the beginning!

lennymaster

HPMOR?

Barthumphries

<http://www.hpmor.com>

Ben

It's an aggressively terrible Harry Potter fanfiction written by a guy who pretends to be a lot smarter than he is to recruit people into his cult of personality.

Yotz

>Hierophant's lone eye swivelled towards me.

While the other was still focused on the Thief of Stars, I presume.

Zeze finally managed to channel his spirit animal, I see...

Draconic

You might have missed the part where it was mentioned that one of Masego's eyes is missing.

Yotz

Not so missed as completely forgot about the "missing" part by the point of "swiveling". Must be Demon of Absinthe shenanigans.

Thank you for reminding me.

Also, this means that his spirit animal is G'Kar now, since Zeze can probably just leave his eye as a portable camera anywhere he wants. ...or just plainly enchant both eyes to float around as independent surveillance drones...

Brackas

Ok so thoughts on the story. I feel the woe are being typed cast wrong. The world is a very heavy good evil reflections (duh right!) But cat and the woe are all neutral i feel. The squire is a neutral named. Same with hierophant, archer, thief, and adjutant. And this is where issues come into play on a world break scale. They are a third party in a world that doesnt need or want that. Its a reason why the wandering bard didnt want cat to succeed. She read ahead in the narrative to see the issues that were coming. So yes cat does a lot of evil but she does good as well. Hell she gets where and what she is evil and how she is viewed by the many. But she isnt evil no more so than you or me. The heroes cant see this, she wears a black cloak so she is bad and must be killed. Oh she speaks sense it must be well crafted lies meant to manipulate. Good can be evil once you flip the perspective.

Sorry yes the whole group is a neutral force. The hierophant is a new name in the world cause none of the others would have fit zeze. The hierophant has never been a good or evil force in other lores he just is (if im remembering right). The thief is to neutral in concept as well it falls to the person to define it. The name feels like a transition name to me and has many different ways to transition to something else. The archer, the adjutant, the scribe (yes i know not part of the woe) all side with evil but are not evil names. Everyone is so hamfisted into black or white by the powers that control and the wandering bard. That no one can see otherwise. Then in walks cat frick your rules, frick your reasons, frick your morals ill do what i need to get what i want and my country needs. Evil fine ill be called that ill still do what im looking to do.

I wonder how off the mark i am?

SpacyRicochet

I love how Hakram is wildly uncomfortable with something he was targetting with **Find** suddenly vanishing without trace.

Lemon

So, uh ... Vivi just stole the Thief of Stars. Threw them in her Hold aspect. And she's stolen a Sun. If that's not a transition to Thief of Stars herself, I don't know what could.

---

Chapter 39: Hakram's Plan

"My dear prince, why would I settle for merely being on the right side of history when I could be on all sides of it instead?"

– Extract from the minutes of the Conference of the Blessed Isle, between the Shining Prince Harry Alban and Dread Emperor Traitorous

Black had once told me that people could get used to nearly anything, if it happened regularly for long enough. It'd been while we were having one of our evening lessons in Ater, talking of the many reasons why there'd never been a serious attempt by the Tower to forbid diabolism across the Wasteland. It was one of those little truths he enjoyed that seemed vague but ended up relevant surprisingly often. To demonstrate: arson. No matter what rumours Robber kept spreading, I didn't actually enjoy setting things on fire. Sure, it was one of the most frequently used tools in my arsenal even if it did have the nasty tendency of collateral damage. But it wasn't, like, my first resort. There'd even been a time where I'd been somewhat conflicted at the notion of dropping goblinfire on the head of the latest Named, army, entity – I supposed with the Tenth Crusade in full swing I was due to add 'continental coalition' to the list – that was after my head on a pike. Not without reason, either. When you tossed a match onto goblinfire, the closest thing there was to control available was damage control. Sadly, as I helped Vivienne pour oil on a wooden frame, I was forced to admit that I had gotten used to arson. It was just one of those things. I still wasn't an advocate of tactically setting fire to things, mind you, unlike your average sapper. I was, if anything, lukewarm to the notion.

"You look like you're trying to convince yourself of something very hard," Thief noted.

"I'm just saying it's disingenuous to call me a pyromaniac when I have actual pyromaniacs in my employ," I told her. "It trivializes the word to use it like that. Is that really so hard to understand?"

The other woman cocked an eyebrow.

"I'm going to pretend you never said that," she informed me. "And hope Hakram fixes whatever is wrong with your..."

She paused.

"... everything," she finally said. "What's wrong with your everything."

"Just pour the godsdamned oil," I sighed. "I still don't understand why we can't just have Masego wizard it, but let's be generous and assume there's a reason."

Setting fire to a palace that was mostly marble was fairly tricky, but we had it mostly under control. The walls might be stone, but the largest rooms all had crisscrossing wooden beams beneath the rafters to hang tapestries and decorations from. Vivienne had climbed her way up, but I wasn't in the mood for wall-climbing in chain mail so instead I'd reached for Winter and spread a ramp of ice that took me there. Hakram had insisted that there be at least three different sources for the fire, so we'd rinsed and repeated twice before seeing to this particular dining hall. We'd yet to run into a single white-robed servant, which was a little odd. Had we told them to clear out last night? It wasn't like our breakfast table would have appeared out of thin air. Thief emptied the remnants of her jug and wiped her hands on her leathers, disappearing the empty receptacle without a word. I didn't know if there was a limit to how much her 'bag' could hold, but if there was she'd never spoken of it. Considering she'd once dropped a fleet of barges in the way of the Fifteenth, I supposed it would take a truly spectacular amount of knick-knacks to take up all of that space. And that was without even considering that at some point she'd stolen the sun.

"It's done," she said, eyeing her still-wet fingers with irritation.

"We'll still need to actually light them," I noted.

"Athai first, allegedly," she said, and without any ceremony leapt down to the floor.

She managed that landing in perfect silence, to my mild envy. If I did that it'd sound like I was running around with a dozen rings of keys. I slid down the ramp smoothly, though in truth that had more to do with my shaping of the ice than any skill on my part. Hard to fall down the stairs when you controlled where they were. The ramp shattered into shards behind me and I brushed off a few pieces from my shoulder.

"Think Hakram found him yet?" I asked.

"He's got the aspect for it," Vivienne shrugged. "I'm more interested in why we're starting a fire in the first place."

"Smoke will be visible from outside," I said. "Could be to draw the patrols."

"We could have moved quietly instead," the dark-haired thief pointed out.

"Not so sure about that," I mused. "Mind you, we can sort of manage quiet. But against a seer? As long as the patrols are out there, a single message is all it takes for them to be in our way."

"That assumes they're all coming into the palace," Vivienne said. "The Binds, at least, are sapient. It would be an elementary mistake."

"We don't really know how they function, Vivienne," I pointed out. "It might be that the Dead King gave them the order to check on disturbances and they literally can't disobey him regardless of context."

"Guesswork will only take us in circles," she sighed. "Let's find Hakram. One assumes he knows the next step in this cavalcade of merriment."

We ran into Hierophant first, as it happened. He'd been weaving spells at the other two bonfires, just small spurts of flame that'd get the blaze started after long enough had passed. His mood had not improved since breakfast, and he merely grunted at us on his way to the hall we'd just left.

"Nice to see you too, Zeze," I called out as he cleared the corner.

I wasn't a fool. I'd waited until he could no longer aim easily at my wakeleaf. Not even fifteen minutes we found Hakram navigating the corridors with Athal at his side, the dark-haired Host looking rather harried. Had he been sleeping?

"Great Majesty, honoured guest," the man greeted us, bowing low. "I was told you had need of my services?"

"It will wait until Hierophant has joined us," Adjutant gravelled.

I did not gainsay him, since I had no idea where we were going from here.

"I have a question or two for you, until then," I told the pale man. "Did we happen to speak last night?"

He blinked in surprised.

"Indeed, Great Majesty," he said. "You were wondering as to the steps the Crown took to assure your safety within these walls."

Well, that was ominous.

"Anything in, uh, particular?" I probed.

"You were quite curious as to the nature of the measures that would be taken in the face of a natural disaster, such as an earthquake or a fire," Athal told me. "Do you not remember this, honoured one?"

"I've had a lot on my mind," I muttered.

Most of which I did not remember, apparently. So the fire had a payoff beyond just serving as a distraction, probably. Before I could think of a way to delicately ask what, in a pure hypothetical, would happen if the Silent Palace caught fire, Hierophant joined us. Masego took one look at us, hid his hand behind his back, and I felt a small flare of sorcery.

"Lord Hierophant," Athal said, bowing once more.

"The palace caught fire, Host," he said.

The dark-haired servant blinked.

"How?" he asked, aghast. "When?"

I clapped him on the shoulder.

"Listen," I said. "Don't worry about it. Those sound like details above our pay grade."

"Are you not a queen, Great Majesty?" he said in a strangled voice.

"And, as a queen, I'm deciding this is above my pay grade," I sagely said. "Obviously we can't stay in a palace that's on fire. That'd be dangerous. So were are we headed, my good man?"

"There is a passage to outside," Athal said. "I will lead you through it, if it please you."

He sounded a little dazed. Well, I didn't blame him. Lots of that going around today. I checked on the last card in my cloak, but the ice casing had yet to melt. Blindly forward it was, then. The Host led us deeper into the palace until we reached the end of a corridor with two opposite-leading doors. Instead of taking one of them, Athal took out a small knife from his sleeve and cut his palm open before smearing his blood on the wall. Even as runes lit up I rose an eyebrow. Why did people always go for the palm? It made it so much harder to hold things afterwards, and it wasn't like hand blood was better than forearm blood or anything. What had previously appeared to be a wall vanished into nothingness, leaving only the blood-red runes hanging in the air for a few moments before they vanished as well. Masego let out a noise that implied he now felt like sticking around and having a closer look so I discretely kicked him in the shin.

"There was no need for that," he whispered.

"Maybe not," I replied just as low. "But someone screwed with my breakfast this morning so I'm all moody now."

He half-glared at me, which to be frank was more amusing than intimidating.

"If you would follow me, honoured guests," Athal said.

The threshold led into what appeared to be a dark tunnel, though the moment the Host stepped within magelights began to light in sequence. By the look of them, we were headed down. Thief went still at my side.

"I forgot something in my rooms," she announced. "Go ahead, I'll catch up."

I cast her a look but she shook her head. So it'd been nothing she could share.

"Honoured one," the dark-haired man said. "Please do not. The guards will be arriving soon, and smother the flames long before anything within your rooms can be lost."

I blinked and Thief was gone.

"She's hard of hearing," I told Athal. "And not very bright. Also, frequently mutinous. I'm going to start a ledger."

The last part had no bearing on the situation, but I felt like it needed to be said for posterity's sake.

"I must find her," the Host gravely said. "It would be a grave breach of hospitality if-"

"Oh, look," I said. "Adjutant is sick."

There was a heartbeat of silence. Hakram coughed into his fist.

"I am," he loyally said.

"It's the fire," I told Athal. "Orcs are notoriously afraid of it. We have to get him out of here before it gets worse."

I felt Masego twitch and shot him a glare. Now is not the time to be a pedant, Zeze. Do not contradict my blatant lies.

"I feel faint," the orc added dutifully. "Like a dove. A dove that is sick."

Way to sell it, Hakram. Glad to have you on the team.

"We must make haste, then," Athal said.

He looked like he very much wanted to express scepticism but was too polite to do as much. Ah, the joys of diplomacy. We followed him as he briskly led us into the tunnel, and I pretended not to hear Masego mutter no they are not under his breath. The entire passage felt drenched in sorcery to my senses, heavily enough I could barely sense the magelights when I stood next to them. The Host apparently knew the way by rote, as when a crossroads appeared he led us down the left corridor without hesitation. All right, so Thief was going after something. She'd been necessary to the first part of this mess because we'd needed her to put the Thief of Stars into her bag – she'd also given Masego the signal to close the doors, but we could have given that card to anyone. Diabolist and Archer were still out there up to the Gods knew what, and since there'd been no instructions to seek them most likely the next part could be accomplished by Adjutant, Hierophant and myself alone. The Empress was still inside her palace, so that was likely where we should be headed when we emerged from this. Alone? Ah, that might have been the whole point of Thief splitting off: that Athal would have to go after her, leaving us to our own devices after opening the passage.

The thing was, a plan with this many moving parts wasn't going to work. I should have known that last night, but I'd gone ahead with it anyway – which either meant the plan wasn't supposed to work, or that I was missing something. All pithy Imperial quotes about planning aside, there were too many points of failure for even the sections of this I was presuming had worked as intended. What if the Thief of Stars had taken a card, or added a fake one? To play the rebel's advocate, it might be that the Revenant wasn't supposed to meddle in our affairs. Only listen in on our conversations. But that was quite the mighty if, and it was making a lot of assumptions about the agency of all involved. It had to be about the Skein, one way or another. Why else screw with our own memories? Thief had called what they did 'prophecy by spun thread'.

I'd mentally considered the enemy Revenant to be an oracle, but it didn't quite sound right. No seer was omniscient, even those who also bore a Name, and the source of their visions tended to give a hint about their limitations. For example, as a heroine the Augur most likely took her cues from Above. I had a nifty little booklet from Black that was half speculation half observation on the nature of her abilities, which were terrifyingly broad in scope but also as fatally flawed as those of any other Named. The Eyes were convinced her limit was that she could only foresee things that were already in motion – or, as my teacher had put it, initiated decisions chains. It was why the Empire's once-frequent assassination attempts on the First Prince and some of the most key supporters of her regime had always failed. So the Empire had managed to catch diplomatic couriers and even the odd tactical coup by leaving agents in place with no instructions except taking advantage of presented opportunities. Except it wasn't actually that clean-cut, because there'd been an attempt on the First Prince's life that fell under those characteristics two months after Second Llesse and it had failed. Black had amended the theory to note that it was feasible the Augur could make two kinds of prophecies.

The first would be those she got handed by Above, about whatever Above cared at that time. Those were likely to be significantly more detailed, but also significantly rarer. The Heavens couldn't repeatedly put their finger to the scales like that without enabling the opposition to do the same – and more than that, the Augur was only one of many tools. They wouldn't send her a flock of eagles or whatever she read the future through when whatever that prediction was about could be handled just as well by a hero they'd sent in to take care of it. If the likes of Black and Malicia had been handing out prophecies to their people, I had no doubt that trusted underling or not there would have been predictions given anyway. Just to be sure. But heroes were already supposed to win, weren't they? Unless that loss was part of the story, meant to pay off down the line. And the whole point of the wager known as Creation was that the Gods didn't know which of them would win their pissing contest. Black had a whole half-page of scribbles going on about how the Augur could likely read 'Fate' as seen by the Heavens but couldn't go beyond those bounds, making heroes a blind spot of sorts, but in my opinion it was simpler than that: the Augur's Role was that of a coordinator. She got the message out so troops would stand at the right place at the right time, but she wasn't supposed to actually guarantee a victory.

She couldn't, I suspected. If the game was that blatantly rigged, Below would have whelped out an oracle of their own to check her by now. Above had to toe the line.

The second kind of prophecies would be those she sought out herself. It was on record that the Augur had wielded visions to help her cousin the First Prince win that same title on the battlefield against the other contenders in the Proceran civil war. It was dubious the Heavens have much of a shit about Procerans slaughtering each other – if they had, a hero would have popped out to take care of the mess – so the Augur herself had likely sought out those visions. And that was the interesting part, because then she was acting as a person and not a messenger – which meant she was fallible. Odds were that was when the decision chain limit came into play, but that was too low a bar. She couldn't be impossibly hard to interpret, since she was capable of passing coherent military information along to the Iron Prince that was usable for campaigning. That left the oldest of mortal failings: she only had one set of eyes, metaphorical or not. If she had to seek out the vision about something, it followed she couldn't see all things at all times. And that meant she could be fooled, if she was looking at the wrong unfolding plot. It wasn't a flawless solution, as Black had written in his notes.

If the failure was too large in scope, she'd likely receive one of the first kind of visions to make up for it. Coordinator, yes, but perhaps also a safeguard.

Sadly, I did not have one of foremost namelore experts alive and an Empire's worth of informants to help me puzzle out how the Skein's future-telling abilities worked. We had something of an idea, evidently, because Vivienne had given me a hint earlier.

How we'd learned that was impossible to puzzle out at the moment, so I'd set the question aside to pick at later. What I wanted to know, as a stepping stone, was whether the Skein had been a hero or a villain while alive – or even one of those Named that floated somewhere in between, cast into one Role or the other depending on the story they came in touch with. Neutral was the wrong word for it: there could be no such thing as neutrality in the Game of the Gods. Even objecting to the rules was to take a side, in its own way. I was jarred out of my thoughts when we finally reached the end of the passage, Athal smearing blood on solid stone to open it up once more. We emerged into daylight, the four of us blinking until we'd acclimated again.

I glanced around curiously. We weren't on the wide avenues surrounding the Hall of the Dead. No, this was the base of a rampart. The innermost set of it, right before the ring of palaces. Near the outer edge of the Garden of Crowns, though I could see our target from where we stood. The Threefold Reflection, as King Edward had implied, was a pyramid of faded white stone that held so much sorcery it was almost visible to the naked eye.

"Guards will soon come to guide you to a temporary resting place," the dark-haired Host informed us. "I must return to find the Lady Thief, but I implore you to remain here until your escorts arrive."

I smiled and put my hand over my heart.

"On my teacher's honour," I said.

A flicker of amusement passed through the man's eyes. Yeah, I wouldn't have bought that in his place either.

"May your hours be fruitful, Great Majesty," Athal said, and after a bow went back into the dark.

The three of us stood there for a moment, and eventually I cleared my throat.

"Hakram?" I asked.

"My health has improved, thank you," the orc drily said.

I rolled my eyes.

"I assume you remember the plan," I said.

"I do," Adjutant agreed. "I must proceed alone. The pyramid has three gates, leading into three different intertwined palaces. You are to take the western gate, while I take the southern one."

"We're splitting up," I slowly said. "Oh Hells. This just keeps getting better."

"Look on the bright side, Cat," Adjutant grinned, ivory fangs bared. "How can they foil our master plan if even we don't know our master plan?"

I much preferred, I decided, being on the other side of that brand of quips.

---

JD

Poor Hakram. His constitution is just so weak and flimsy.

Novice

I know right? It must have been all that campaigning. Clearly, orcs are not meant for warfare.

Daemion

I'm fairly sure Athal, and through him the Dead King, know exactly what's going on and choose not to act because watching it is so entertaining. Who cares about a Dread Empress anyway? She's not truly immortal like Cat or the Dead King.

Decius

Athal knows exactly what is happening, and is making sure that he continues to not hear anything that he is bound to report.

RanVor

Nay, it's just above his pay grade.

Yotz

My take. Athal hears and reports everything as it is – or, at least, as it seems to be; and he is "paid" enough to mess with anyone who breaks the rules of Keter. And that's the crux of the problem – rules. That "Athal" persona is perfect executor of Dead King's policies, but never an exegete of His divine will. As long as "honored guests" are formally following the pre-designed sets of patterns and rules, Athal has no reason to go beyond analogously pre-determined set of responses – despite being very well versed in bullshit, and understanding that "hypervelocity kinetic penetrators" are more commonly known as "bullets". Just as long as guests wouldn't do something stupid – like breaking the law while he can witness it – they can and will get away pretty much with anything.

Decius

My guess is that the Dead King treats his Ravenents like a stupid person treats a hostile genie, by explicitly protecting against every contingency that he could think of. They are bound to report to him things that meet a certain threshold of “interesting”, but ‘hard-coding’ that level of mandatory reporting is doomed to fail when a free-willed hostile entity knows what rules it must follow.

And every Ravenent is undeniably as hostile to the Dead King as they were in life, adjusted by how much of their living will they carry into undeath. It seems possible that all of the will that they do have is left over from their life.

For all of his training, Athal is inexperienced at dealing with hostile living enemies. He would likely have trouble recognizing that his confusion is the result of deceit, if he has been raised in an environment where deceit is uncommon. And if he’s playing against Akua, he doesn’t stand a chance of seeing the lies.

Javvies

Skein is probably only part of the full Name.

Also, at this point, as a Revenant, I’m not sure it would really matter much if the Skein had been empowered by Above or Below in life.

Miles

It could speak to his personality at least when the dk is letting him be semi autonomous – so so which kind of conversation is more likely to be productive.

Snowfire1224

And it could speak to the kind of visions he/she gets as well, since names influence personality and vice versa

SpeckofStardust

“To demonstrate: arson. No matter what rumours Robber kept spreading, I didn’t actually enjoy setting things on fire.”

”
I think I’m just going to quote someone here.

“You look like you’re trying to convince yourself of something very hard,”

rangamal thenuwara

Speaking of Robber, I'm really missing the amusing little murderous minion. Here's to hoping to see him soon.

Gunslinger

This plan seems to be right out of Dread Emperor Irritant's playbook.

The speculated limitations of the Augur is quite interesting and an answer of sorts as to why the Augur isn't OP.

Euodiachloris

I dunno: we got a Traitorous quote. *shrugs* Maybe a little from Column A and some from Column B and a lot from Column Pyro. 😊

nimelennar

I wouldn't be surprised if "How can they foil our master plan if even we don't know our master plan?" is a historical word-for-word quote of something Irritant said.

Lark

...or perhaps Isabella the Mad.

frolamiz

Actually, I feel there are quite a few similarities between them, except that one was a villain and the other a non Named general.

matesbe

That's a great line from Hakram. I can't wait to see just how all of these actions, put together, work. I hope for their sake this is actually some genius mastermind plot, and not a series of semi-random events happening that they hope will open a gap in Malacia's defenses.

JJR

When a plan like this is in motion is there any way to even distinguish a "master plot" from a "series of semi-random events happening"?

Jonnnney

I've got an odd feeling that all their actions we've seen are an attempt at a distraction.

Sengachi

If the “one set of eyes” limitation applies to Skein, they may just be trying to occupy their attention so Archer can do what she does best and put a murder-arrow between the Empress’ eyes.

Antoninjohn

What is Below going to do to match Above after all the Heroes are going for Cat and she’s Fea not a Named of Below

Javvies

Cat is still technically the Squire, empowered by Below.

Oshi

No she is not. She has no aspects. They are the sign of Squire “empowerment”. I believe its the same for the Dead King. They have both reached a point where power is sourced elsewhere. Cat and Trismegistus are still bound by story but their power is no longer from story if that makes any sense.

Zourath

Cat’s power is that of being the queen and only lord of Winter. If anything her power is story distilled. The fey were the prototype for the game of gods, and if anything were more bound by story than named are.

RanVor

I don’t think her not being Named really makes that much of a difference. She still has a Role, is still connected to Below, etc. The only thing she’s really missing out on are Aspects, but the power of her Mantle easily makes up for those. She’s pretty much functionally Named, even if she doesn’t have an actual Name anymore.

IDKWhoitis

She herself has said that name is dead to her by now. The connection to it was “Destroyed” by Black.

Ongoing debate whether Black Queen is going to win.

Miles

Iirc Black queen is the one that was destroyed by black. Squire was being replaced by black queen.

dalek955

No, she’s not anymore. She doesn’t have a Name at all right now, and hasn’t since Akua’s Folly.

The Quietest

Is Skein maybe one of Malicia's things? We know that she instinctively anticipated plots against her on a name level, so perhaps that's it.

Activ

Did Diabolist come up with a plan that required turning the story into a comedy?

RoflCat

Well, supposedly it's Akua's scheme they're acting out....

Maybe that's the plan, to have so many scheme of so many people piled up to create chaos that no seer Name can see anything. Then have Cath, the master of utilizing chaos, do her own thing to get out of it.

Archer is already chaos, so she's out, Akua knows the plan, so she has to sit out too, otherwise her proximity to the area might cause her to 'know' which of the many possible 'route' she's schemed for Cath's group is going through, which would in turn allow the seer Name to see through it.

Decius

Archer has been granted permission to kill either the Dead King or the Empress or both, and everything else is just chaos to keep the people who should be looking for Archer and/or Ranger busy looking at the monkey.

Metrux

1. Archer has NO CHANCE against the Dead King, especially in his home turf strengthened by millenia and Ranger advances.
2. They are going to attack Malicia's palace, if Archer was to do it, why would they also go for it? Would only make it easier for Archer to be found.

Sengachi

If the Ranger doesn't even bother trying to hunt the Dead King, then I'm pretty sure Archer's not trying to do that.

Gibborim

Ranger hunts the Dead King repeatedly. She's gotten to him every time. It just seems that she chooses not to destroy him when she gets to him.

RanVor

Killing the Dead King at this stage would be counterproductive. Catherine needs allies really badly and murdering the only one eligible for this position isn't going to help in this regard.

Even if Cat was able to take over the Kingdom of the Dead (which is highly doubtful), she wouldn't be able to keep it secret, which would hurt her agenda greatly and require her to split her attention between Callow and Keter, making her more prone to costly mistakes. Leaving the Kingdom in ruin is out of question – if anything, it would paint an even bigger target on her back. When everyone is out for your blood, proving how dangerous you really are is never a good idea, and doubly so when you know you can't win. Hasenbach would be unseated within moments if she as much as considered treating with the Arch-heretic of the East (and possibly executed on the spot if she happened to meet the White Knight), so there's no way to end this peacefully.

Whether she likes it or not, Cat needs the Dead King, and gunning for him now would be suicidally stupid.

Snowfire1224

Well zanny schemes are more likely to succeed in a comedy than in something serious.

Yotz

As if her "I'm sworn protector of People of Callow and their potatoes and in the name of Moonless Night I will punish you or whatever" wasn't a dead giveaway of her current attitude towards such things. Specifically ordering her to scheme is like giving a kid ten pounds of sugar and a Super Soaker.

Death suits her.

*Euodiachloris*

Horrible thought: Akua learning how to be the Joker.

Death Knight

"Look on the bright side, Cat," Adjutant grinned, ivory fangs bared. "How can they foil our master plan if even we don't know our master plan?"

AhahahahahahahaHAHAHA No. Just, no.

Spectator

That line would make a good quote for the start of a chapter.

IDKWhoitis

Im just imagining the Dead King watching this comedy through a spell while eating popcorn, afterall he rarely gets visitors, and less so not annoying ones.

Yotz

That is a very logical and reasonable thing to do.
Also

Welcome to the Running Queen! You know how this works. The game zone is divided into four hundred square blocks, left over from the Big Quake of '97, and I don't think any of us will ever forget that. [audience laughs] Once inside the zone, the Runners have three hours, they've got to go through all four remaining palaces, three hours or less, and they're going to need every second, 'cause you know who's on their tail?

RoflCat

So, on the assumption that this is all Akua's scheme.

What's the chance she'll ask for a Title when this is over?

Afterall it's already been said Cath can definitely give them out if she want to, and Akua's not part of the Wild Hunt so she's eligible to get a title.

NZPIEFACE

probs will, how else would she have power

Euodiachloris

Bound Jester of Frosted Morns. Tada! One Jackass Frost! 🤪

TeK

She will not. It would be really stupid, like a convicted murderer asking a guard for a handgun "Oh, come on, we were getting along so well!"

donforrester456

This scenario is the plot device of many, many movies, books and series. Off the cuff I can think of scifi, horror, western, and buddy-cop examples.... Farscape premiered with this for example.

But yes, it **is** really stupid.

RanVor

I dunno, seems a little too soon for her to declare her agenda that openly. I think she has too much to lose for too slim a chance to try that. It's not like she can force Cat to do anything, and if she tried, she'd most likely just piss her off and get stuffed into the box again.

Elliot

Totally. Besides, being a shade bound to an immortal entity isn't the worst position. You can bide your time for a VERY long time. Playing the slow game is what it's all about here.

WuseMajor

Given that one of the titles she's handed out so far is "Lesser Footrest," I really wouldn't want to ask her for a title while on her bad side. She might name you something you'd really dislike.

I suspect she'd name Akua the "Knight Protector of this particular Oak Tree" or something and require her to stand guard over it 24/7.

Cthulhu

This reads like something written by Donald E Westlake. It reminds me a little of THE SLY IN THE OINTMENT or perhaps THE HOT ROCK. It is awesome

Miles

Did Masego vanish in the tunnels?

fbt

this was awesome, and really funny. Loved it! I thought Cat had the best lines, tho, not Hakram.

NZPIEFACE

I love this comedy.

Athal is a great bro. Hope he's kept around.

Snowfire1224

I never thought I'd hear an orc compare themselves to a dove

Drd

Yeah, his poor constitution!
I'm very glad I didn't have a mouthful of coffee as I read that, my monitor doesn't need another dousing. >_<

Someguy

I'm certain they will next find kinship with fluffy baby bunnies.

Snowfire1224

Ha, probably the Killer Rabbit if anything (Look at the bones)

Although I must admitt your comment made me picture Hakram tenderly stroking a black rabbit while cradling it in his arms.

Euodiachloris

The Black Rabbit of Inlé deserves some pampering, you know. His schedule is always beyond insanely busy, so somebody should step in to enforce some me-time. 😊

Snowfire1224

I'd like your comment if I had an account

Sengachi

I will like it for you.

Cold Cyberia

This kind of reminds me of when Cat was first in Arcadia. The Dead King clearly knows she's bullshitting but he's too entertained too care, and it plays into his evil scheme. Next thing we know and she'll be presenting a clearly fake invitation to the guards to get through.

TeK

First of, I disagree with Cat over one thing: she seems to think that her plan is multisteped plan that have a very high chance of failing, which was referenced over and over along the Guide. But per previous chapter, we see that plan is not set in stone, rather, it's a number of plans, either of which activates when the previous plan either failed or succeeded. Kinda like Xanatos Gambit. Also, there's a bit about seers not being able to predict a plan if they can't imagine to look for the possibility of said plan. What if they actually plan to save Malicia from assasination, which they also planned, and also have a plan to foil their attempts to save her?

And I wonder if they really go after Malicia. She spoke of regicide, why everyone so sure that she plans to kill a royal? Maybe she wants to recruit a Saint of Swords, why everyone is so rush to accuse her of planning a murder? Eh? Eh?

All in all, though, unexpectedly deep chapter, that posts deep metaphysical questions for us. One of which somehow elluded me since I started reading the Guide, mainly:

“Why would Gods care about morality?”

And, bear with me, this is important. Morality is a petty human issue designed to preserve human society from killing itself. Different races would require different morality, and Gods would require none. So either they don't care about morality (and I'll explore this later), or, it makes ask the second question:

“How did Gods come into being?”

To save you my wall of text (well, a larger wall, anyway), I'll say this: either they care about vaguely human morality because they are human, or they don't care about morality at all. And this makes way more sence then I could've thought. It explains why Good vs Evil is more like Grey and Black morality, why Above is so eager to angle the scales, while Below only steps forward in retaliation, and why most Heroes are so improbably dim: it's not a about morality, it's about the stories they like. Gods Above are like teenagers: they like wish-fullfilment power fantasy, and can and will intrevene into the plot if their self-insert got into trouble. They basically writing Mary Sue fanfics on Creational scale. Gods Below though more like Historians: they like to see the story moving forward, written by the agents inside the story. I'd go so far as to wager that Villains appeared as an answer to Gods Above just spamming shonen protagonists en masse. And this is why the Creation is so intertwined with patterns and narratives, it's because it is a story, for a bored Gods, and some of which attempt to write their own stories, while others either nerf Above, or just ignore everything not inconviencing them entirely.

TL;DR Either Gods are human, or bored fanfiction writers.

RanVor

“why everyone is so rush to accuse her of planning a murder?”

That's why:

Arson is done. Time for murder.

TeK

To be fair, it can be a false rumor spread by treacherous elements. Such as drunk Archer, for example.

Dragnor425

Yeaaaah

Nah.

Euodiachloris

Does Archer really have to be drunk for that, though? ;P

TeK

Can Archer really not be drunk? A question for philosophers, that one.

Sengachi

*Several* counts of arson. It may be time for murder, but that doesn't mean we're done with arson yet.

frolamiz

Yeah, I like to think of creation as a tabletop roleplaying game, with above being a group of power gamers that play meta and try to cheat every time they don't like something. As for bellow, they are a group more focused on the story and roleplay that get annoyed by above's mary/gary sue and try to kick them from the game. It would explain why it's the villains's quotes that are usually more interesing to read.

aran

More like arsonal.

TeK

I feel punny today.

Azure

Catherine and Vivienne and their banter while comitting lukewarm arson lol. Hah Thief stole the freaking sun, she's hardly in a position to comment about playing with fire. Can't get enough of those two together.

Sooooo splitting up the party. That's not asking for trouble or anything right? What could possibly go wrong as they wander all alone in the Kingdom of the Dead.

John Smith

I'm rapidly growing very fond of Athal. Sure, he's DK's meat cattle, but he's polite and not an idiot.

Euodiachloris

Also, an excellent straight man to have when you go all Marx Brothers. 😊

Sengachi

"To play the rebel's advocate"

Bwahahahahahahahahaaaaaaa. Oh this was wonderful. I love it when little tidbits like this make their way into a story, small variations on our mundane colored by the world the story is written in.

dalek955

The term I use for not-quite-heroes-not-quite-villains like Ranger is "gray Name".

Shequi

I love the way the title of this Chapter shouts back to book one's Chapters in the grand melee.

If this is Hakram's Plan, which will we see next? I'm hoping for Akua's Plan.

RanVor

My bets are on Catherine's Plan or Akua's Plan next, and the other one is going to be the last. Unless something goes terribly wrong.

Snowfire1224

I would have thought Cathrine's plan would be the last to go with how her plan was last in the previous chapters.

RanVor

Depends on who is the mastermind of this mess.

TeK

Nah. If the structure will be similar (five commanders, five chapters, five plans), and we have five Woe, at least we would have Hieropant and Archer, untill we get to Akua/Cat.

Alex

It will probably be Akua's plan, because she has been absent for the rest of the plans.

MusouMiko

"On my teacher's honour," I said.

A flicker of amusement passed through the man's eyes.

Doing a re-read and I love the foreshadowing.

---

Chapter 40: Vivienne's Plan

"A battle is, in my experience, a handful of hours where one of two generals proceeds to destroy his own army while the other simply happens to be there."

– Prince Fernando of Salamans

For anyone to come up with the underlying principles of the Threefold Reflection and to then decide someone should live in there required an impressive amount of dementia, so in a sense it made sense that Neshamah had built the damned thing. I'd seen drawing of the pyramids that could be found in northern Praes – Wolof, in particular, was known for them – but this one was of a decidedly different bent. Stone instead of mud, for a start, but where the Soninke works tended to be broad and gently sloped this one was tall and unpleasantly angular. I suspected if the monuments were going to have anything in common, it was the amount of bodies buried beneath them. Akua had been vague about the rituals that still took place by the city she'd once been in line to inherit, but Masego had been disturbingly informative about the most infamous atrocities associated with the place. It took a particular kind of people to decide it was a going idea to sacrifice a few thousand people to make something called a 'plague cauldron'. The only reason I was pretty sure Diabolist had never been taken down there to murder puppies as a kid was that after the whole 'murder your childhood friend' party it'd feel like a bit of a let-down.

I pulled the Mantle of Woe closer around my shoulders after running a metaphysical finger down the chain binding Akua. Still pulled taut. Wherever she was, it wasn't anywhere close. After Hakram informed us we were meant to split the group in two to take different doors – the western gate for Masego and I, while it was the southern one for him – we'd wasted no time dawdling around. A trail of smoke going up into the sky of Keter made it plain that our work there had not been discreet, which I assumed to be the point. Hierophant was not in a chatty mood as we passed through the colonnades surrounding the pyramid proper at a brisk pace. Whether it was our piecemeal fiasco of a plan or the loss of an eye that had him in a tiff I didn't know, but either way I couldn't blame him. There was much I despised about what I'd become through Winter, but I would feel... naked without the eldritch senses of my constructed body. I'd come to take what they told me for granted: tasting heat and fear, hearing beyond that even of a Named. That muted sense I had of the intents of others, which straddled the line between sorcerous boon and a flood of details put together I would never have noticed without Winter. All that, and I was only a bastard child of Arcadia.

No wonder the fae had reputation for exquisite machinations, if they had all these senses and more: it was like being the only person in a pitch-black room that could see in the dark.

"Our gate," Hierophant said, breaking our stretch of silence.

I nodded slowly. It'd been too much to hope, I supposed, that it would be wide open for us. Instead the two slabs of sun-drenched stone remained tightly shut, which was admittedly something of a problem.

"I'm guessing hammering through isn't an option," I half-guessed.

"We have no hammer," Masego reminded me gently. "And even should we employ sorcery, it would be loud and difficult to open this through force."

Figured. It wasn't like the Dead King bothered to build on anything but titanic scale.

"Maybe there's a magic word," I suggested.

The dark-skinned man inclined his head in concession.

"Neshamah," he tried.

Nothing. Yeah, I supposed it would be a little like a Callowan wizard using 'revenge' as the key to a magic door. There probably had been at least one that embarrassingly lame in the past, but it wasn't common practice.

"Could you-" I began, but he raised his hand.

"Quiet," he murmured.

His brow creased, and after a moment he traced a rune against his temple. A dot of light came out, and in a streak came before the both of us. It changed into an illusionary card, the Eight of Wands, and on the projection a few words in Old Miezian were written. I winced. I'd never paid as close attention as I should to those lessons – I'd had a deal with another girl where I traded her translations for my history essays – and I was horribly rusty besides.

"Translation?" I asked.

"Sparrow," Masego said. "And I am instructing myself to remove the third rune from your artefact."

"That's skipping one," I noted. "Last time was the first."

"It occurs to me," Hierophant, "that the confusion here might be the purpose instead of a mistake."

Yeah, I'd come to that conclusion myself a while back. I wouldn't work off anything this messy and complex if I had a feasible alternative, which once more took me back to the soothsaying Revenant awaiting us inside: the Skein. I was starting to get the impression we were not playing shatranj with the oracle so much as tossing handfuls of pebbles at the board and hoping one ended up tipping over the king.

"That aside," I said. "Did you engrave a card into your own head?"

"Several," Masego replied. "It seems wiser than keeping them at hand, where they could be witnessed. Aunt Eudokia always told me that treason is the one thing one should leave no paper trail for."

That might be true, but it didn't make him any less of a show-off.

"All right, Zeze," I said. "Magic fingers it is."

With a put-upon sigh he rested his palm against the back of my head and-

—

"The palace isn't a maze," Vivienne said, elbows on the table. "Not in the traditional sense. There's a chamber at the centre with a guiding artefact."

Akua got it before any of us, which did not strike me as odd. Masego might boast a broader base of sorcerous knowledge, but these kind of traps were as milk and honey to Praesi highborn.

"Three palaces, reflections in overlap," she said. "The artefact is able to decide which threshold connects to which across the span entire."

"It looks like three wheels on a stick," the other Callowan said. "With pieces of twine hanging through, tying places together."

The look on Masego's face at the revelation was pure avarice. Godsdamnit. His mild magpie tendencies when it came to artefacts had only increased since we'd technically robbed the Sahelians of their most precious artefact. In our defence, Akua had been in the box and it'd been just lying there. Finders keepers, right?

"You found the room at the centre," Hakram said, cutting at the heart of the matter.

Vivienne nodded.

"More accurately, I was allowed to," she said.

"You ran into the guarding Revenant," I guessed.

"He's called the Skein," the dark-haired woman said. "And before getting deeper into that, I have a few questions for our foreign experts. What can you tell me about ratlings?"

Indrani set down her cup, looking interested for the first time in a while.

"The species?" she said. "Nothing too deep. Lycaonese call them 'the Plague' because they never stop being hungry. Just like a disease, they'll wipe out everything even if it starves them down the line."

"Said hunger has been speculated to be caused by their unusual physiology," Masego added. "They never cease growing. They are birthed as bipedal rodents smaller than humans, and have no theoretical check on how large they can be save for each other. The Chain of Hunger is so named because ratlings will promptly devour each other when there are no other sources of immediate sustenance. Father believes the entire species is a kind of strange Demiurgian phenomenon of unknown purpose."

My eyes turned to Akua, who'd been standing a little outside of the Woe's circle this entire time.

"Wolofite records agree with the Lord Warlock," she said. "There are scrolls dating back to Triumphant's campaign in the region that speak of a time in the life of their kind called the 'metamorphosis', where ratlings will transition from bipedal beings of observed sapience into the animalistic large creatures called the Ancient Ones. The few of those beings that manage to consume enough quickly enough while in that state are speculated to undergo a second metamorphosis into the elusive Horned Lords of lore."

"Those Horned Lords," Vivienne said. "Back on two feet, about sixty feet high, antler-like pairs spouting from the head, capable of human speech?"

"That's how the the Lady described them," Indrani slowly said. "Save for the antlers."

"Well," Vivienne smiled ruefully. "We have something of a problem, then."

—

"- Burning Hells," I exhaled. "Horned Lord, Hierophant. There's one of those with seer powers sitting pretty in the middle of the pyramid just waiting to fuck with us through a maze-making control artefact."

"A ratling?" Masego mused. "Unusual. I suppose the Kingdom of the Dead does have a border with their kind. Do you have the magic word for the gates?"

I sighed.

"Apparently that wasn't judged a high priority," I said. "What had you reaching for the card, anyway? Any help coming from there?"

"I was instructed not to tell," Hierophant replied absent-mindedly. "I suppose attempting to jostle the wards open is in order, lacking alternative."

"That's feasible?" I asked.

"Quickly?" he said. "No. But a few hours of protracted study should do the trick. It won't take more than half a day."

"We're in a bit of a hurry," I said. "... I think."

"This is not the kind of miracle I am proficient with, Catherine," he replied peevishly.

Bickering would have been a nice way to let off the steam, but a notion reached the surface of my mind, quicksilver-swift.

"Sparrow," I spoke at the gate.

The heartbeat of silence that followed echoed with unspoken mockery. Ah, well, it'd been worth a try.

"Sparrow," Masego said as well, only in Ashkaran.

Without a sound, the stone slabs withdrew into the threshold.

"I would have thought of that eventually," I said, not the defensive in the slightest.

"I note you did not give a precise time limit for that statement," the one-eyed mage said.

If I stepped on his foot going into the Threefold Reflection, well, no one could prove it wasn't an accident.

—

I'd considered it a safe assumption that the creepy dimensionally layered murder pyramid would look like a dusty crypt inside, but apparently I'd done the Dead King disservice: it was actually pretty pleasant in here. Sunlight, fresh air, and the decorations were both tasteful and welcoming. The unfortunate part was that 'here' was becoming a vaguer term every time we turned a corner or passed a door.

"Left," Hierophant decided.

"We literally just took a right," I said.

"In another palace, yes," Masego agreed. "This is... not that one."

After spending a solid sixty heartbeats in awe of the fact that it was natural sunlight and not torches or magelights that lit up the entrance hall of the Threefold Reflection – I'd checked out for most of the ensuing mutterings about 'fixed temporal sliver' and 'redistribution arrays' – he'd gotten his shit together and begun to serve as my personal navigator. Since the entire place was a madman's nightmare of wards and thresholds, it was possible for him to follow along the metaphorical dotted lines of the wards and get a bare bones idea of the layout of the palace. Took him a little bit and required concentration, but it was reliable. Unfortunately, it was also useless: the image he got from that trick was only a single layer of the reflection, which meant the moment we left that layer we were lost again. And he couldn't see the whole pyramid with that trick, either, which had bitten us in the ass swiftly. We were probably past the outer reaches of the palace, but the gates we'd come in through were nowhere in sight. Which went some way in explaining why it'd been so easy to get in, I supposed.

It was inside the palace that the Skein would find us easiest to contain. So why had we wandered in blindly? This was Hakram's plan we were following, and as far as I could see it could only end in failure. More than that, we were wasting precious time. Malicia and her minions might already be out of the pyramid for all I knew.

"This isn't getting us anywhere," I said, then winced at the accidental pun.

I looked up at the ceiling.

"Skein, right?" I said. "I'm assuming you're listening, because let's be honest – if I were in your place, I'd want a good look at the people I was screwing with. Don't suppose we could cut out the whole maze thing and have a civilized conversation instead?"

No answer.

"Cat," Masego said quietly.

He was gesturing towards a door we'd passed earlier, and my brow rose. The room behind that threshold – a cosy little antechamber with fainting couches – had gone dark. An invitation? Only one way to find out. I made sure Hierophant was right next to me when I passed the threshold, as I had this entire time. The last thing I wanted was to get separated from my erstwhile navigator. My reflexes were quick, but not quite quick enough not to fall. Winter came eagerly when called and a platform of ice formed beneath my feet, though I almost slid off it when I had to bend over to catch Masego by the scruff of the neck.

"Impressive workmanship," Hierophant noted, lone eye looking down through his own body.

I glanced as well, and forced myself to count up to ten in silence. A spike pit. And actual fucking pit filled with sharp metal spikes. There were even faded skeletons at the bottom, which was really the spine in the wine as far as I was concerned. It wasn't like they hadn't had literal centuries to clean that up, I just knew they'd left them there as a statement.

"A simple no would have sufficed," I complained, looking upwards.

There was solid ground on the other side of the pit, and with a careful flex of my legs I leapt up here. No threshold there, at least. Jumping from pit to pit would have been a bit much even by fucking Keteran standards. I dropped Masego back on his feet fairly awkwardly, given that I was holding him by the neck and he had a few feet on me.

"Quiet bubble," I ordered.

The ward went up, and we tried to position ourselves in a way that would make it difficult to read our lips. Changed to speaking Kharsum as well, it wasn't nearly as well known as Lower Miezan or the other Imperial languages.

"This isn't working," I told Hierophant. "We need a change of tactics. Your source that you can't talk about, can they be any help?"

"I assume they already would have intervened if they could," Masego said.

Was that implying the conversation went only one way, or was I reading too much into it? That was the pain in this plan – well, one of them – I never could be sure whether I was supposed to try to figure out something or not. I shifted on my feet, though not because of what he'd said. His silence ward wasn't the same he'd used when we were inside the Silent Palace, it had no physical component to it. Not that it had helped in the slightest against the Thief of Stars that we knew of. It wasn't a sound so much as a moving of air that I caught, a difference in pressure. My hand snapped out and I caught a wriggling form by throat as I smoothly unsheathed my sword.

"Morning, Catherine," Vivienne said, snapping into sight.

I dropped her with a sigh.

"I could have stabbed you, Thief," I said.

"My aspect is the only reason we managed to run into each other," she said. "He shunts me off at will otherwise. If I remain hidden in his vision of the future, he cannot predict where I am. It is no absolute. The rest of the gambit was presuming you'd irritate the Skein enough for him to send you here eventually."

I raised an eyebrow at both things being implied – first, that Hide could ward her from whatever means the Skein used to see us. Second, that she'd expected us to end up here.

"This was planned," I said.

"Sparrow," she replied in Kharsum. "Owl done, we on my tack now."

Her hold on the language was bare bones, but Hakram had taught her enough we could have a functional conversation. My eyes narrowed. The second card had the word Lark written on the back, without an explanation. I'd taken it to mean an adventure or a bit of fun, because Past Catherine had a terrible sense of humour, but it was also a kind of bird wasn't it? Owl didn't ring a bell in the slightest, but it might be there were at least three plans unfolding. And Vivienne had told us we were now on 'her tack'. Skein. Prophecy by spun thread. One set of eyes. Were we... Gods, that would mean building at least three interconnected towers. The sheer complexity of that – we did have Akua, though. Who was still missing. And the first rune-bound memory had me considering the need for a touchstone, which might very well be her. It was a good thing I almost never got headaches these days, I decided.

"Where do we go from here?" I asked. "Your aspect can't cover all three of us."

"Not need to," Vivienne smiled thinly. "We hunted Malicia presently. Now by, the Skein have her on way out here."

"By now," I corrected.

She rolled her eyes.

"He can still move us between the layers so we never run into her," I said.

"Before answer. Object limits has," she said. "Can not bridge same layer. Can not go nowhere."

"How do you know this?" Masego asked.

"Skein," she said. "Flaw. Single speaker, must. Memory back."

Monologue, I thought. She'd met the ratling before, that much I'd already suspected, but this explained quite a bit. He must have been a villain while alive. Which still begged the question of why the Dead King had put someone in charge of the Threefold Reflection he had to know would give us a solution to the riddle if pressed. He could have put a hero instead, and they might not have been as skilled at using the artefact but they wouldn't have talked either. It felt like he was willingly giving us an opportunity to kill Malicia if we were sharp enough, and while that fit with my suspicions this was a test it also had me wary. Guessing at the Hidden Horror's motives was a dangerous game at the best of times, which these were most definitely not.

"That's useful and all, but how do we find Malicia through the shunts?" I asked.

"No go layer," she smiled. "Centre artefact. I saw."

She tapped Masego's belly.

"Extract," she said.

And she tapped mine.

"Gate," she continued. "No inside. Cold iron protect. Close."

I frowned.

"Then why didn't we gate directly from the Silent Palace?" I asked.

"You can't thread through different pieces of fabric," Masego said. "I would presume that chamber to be removed from Creation. This layer, however, is directly connected."

Then why hadn't we done that the moment we entered the pyramid? Why leave a necessary piece of information, the location of the central chamber, solely in the hand of – I winced at the sudden spike of pain from my forehead.

"Second rune is flaring," Hierophant murmured.

So we hadn't. Masego and I had just never thought of it, and Vivienne being here was a contingency. She must have entered through a place that guaranteed she'd be here to wait for us – evidently she'd found it the first time she came here, she must have moved the exact same way. What if the Skein had never sent us here and we'd never thought of it? Mhm. There might be other contingencies, then. Hakram was now unaccounted for as well as the other two. And I still had a card encased. Fine, then, maybe we'd been surprisingly cautious in our recklessness. I clenched my fingers and reached for Winter.

Time to pay the Skein a visit.

---

IDKWhoitis

What are the ongoing odds that Bard intervenes to save Malica? Like Bard has been quiet, and she gets a peek at the script. To her, Malica being dethroned may interfere with her other plans.

Insanenoodlyguy

i suspect that object that activated at the end of book 3 was the Dead Kings indicator that Bard was out of comission for a while. Something about Hierophant's rejection, or Hierophant himself took her out of the game. Not forever, i'm sure, but long enough that Dead King could make moves safely. I don't think he'd have let all this go down if it'd only be long enough for her to come back at the climax. I feel like she's gonna miss this.

Ethereal

Not Heirophant...

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh for... I meant to say Hierarch there. Not sure what happened.

Nima

Its Hierarchy. Im guessing he sort of put fatwa on bard. Thus make her cannot go to free league area.

ayon96

The object that activated at the end was probably how Melissa contacted with the Dead King

Sylfa

I think the most entertaining path forward would have Malicia being sown into Cat's cloak: that way Malicia can continue ruling Praes through the puppet, but only as Cat allows. Except Malicia would be running circles around Cat's restrictions, but she can't escape Cat. And Cat can't keep her hidden entirely or Praes will go into meltdown while people are trying to climb the tower.

It just seems like the most entertaining path to me, giving her a win here and now and a huuuuuuge headache later.

Argentorum

"If I stepped on his foot going into the Threefold Reflection, well, no one could prove it wasn't an accident."

From small slights, long prices.

Someguy

Anyone else have the same headaches as I am? Using an entire team to make Manchurian Agents of themselves and each other with multiple intertwined plans and contingencies...I need a freaking drink.

Mental Mouse

Definitely a sharp twist in the plot there!

usernamesbco

This is more like falling up a few flights of Penrose stairs than a plot twist.

I second the headache and the drink, and really hope there's an explanation later.

Yotz

/reads epigraph

"Zo, you vant to kill my zoldiers? Two kan play zis game!"

daegone823

Why would rattlings need to see the future.

Why is a name that sees the future considered villanous

Is this the answer to the augur of Procer Ratlings came up with there own future seeing name just to counter

I thought they were mindless how could they develop a culture to support the name of skein

frolamiz

Up until now, we only got informations about them from their enemies (in particular the First Prince) or characters that only have second hand informations about them and not very interested in them.

So given their tendencies to attack by hordes and that they eat people that try to discuss with them, it's not surprising that everyone consider them mindless.

TeK

I concur. That reminds me of my Stellaris run as a fanatic purifier. The fact that I consider any species but my own (and, indeed, sometimes my own) as food is no reason to think I'm mindless. The opposite, if anything. We already developed social darwinism and absolute upward social mobility.

frolamiz

That would be a devouring swarm. The fanatic purifiers are the ones that purge the galaxy to purify it.

Yotz

When your millennia-spanning egalitarian democracy unanimously decides that xenos untermensch have only one inherent universal and inalienable right – to be tasty... It is at this moment all fanatics and devourers of the galaxy understand that only thing they can do – is to nervously smoke on the sideline of history. For soon they will be smoking on skewers.

Someguy

They are sapient until the Hunger comes upon them. Just because they are a kind of strange Demiurgian phenomenon of unknown purpose does not mean they cannot develop as a people and culture. Creation is a test-bed for the theories for the Gods Above & Below after all.

Yotz

No, no – pupae are mindless. Larvas are sentient and sapient, and adult ratlings are extremely intelligent. It just that after the first metamorphosis their body begins to outgrow their mental capabilities, dampening their higher brain functions until hypothetical second metamorphosis forces brain to develop in rapid tempo to would be able to correspond with physical capabilities.

As such, only most cunning and brutal larvas get to become Ancient Ones, and only most prominent of the pupae have chance to reach adulthood. Thus, each Horned Lord must be – by definition – a paragon of cunning, intelligence, and physical capabilities of their race. Think of them as Xenomorph Queens.

Metrux

That is one hell of a disconcerting image.

thesurfer99 not that i think you are wrong but as Metrux said that is a really really scare thought

Mental Mouse

Foresight can be on either side (though Good probably gets more sendings), but they think the ratling's a villain because it monologued.

frolamiz

Great, we are going to get more info about the ratlings. Maybe they can be buddy with Catherine? Their endless hunger remind me of the dream she had when the Winter King took her heart, and "insatiable hunger" is one of Winter's theme.

Someguy

I thought she could devour them to turn their entire species into the physical embodiment of Hunger of Winter. But isn't Autumn the Season of Harvest as animals gorge themselves with as much food as possible to store fat for Winter? That's when they hit Procer for food and Hasenbach's men have to hold the line or the Procerans starve due to too little food and too much men right?

Forrest

Multi layered amnesia plans: Only the best of plans will do.

Yotz

On the off note, also – each time I read 'Hidden Horror', I can't shake a feeling that I must chose and discard a creature card, else I'll be forced to bury him...

ArkhCthuul

Awww, Magic anecdotes, always a classic. :p

What do. You think he does with his hells if not pay his upkeep? ^^

Also this is mindboggingly weird. And great stuff.

Antoninjohn

Now-Now Cat will be fail-eaten by the Great Horned Lord of Skavan along with her fellow man-things and orc-thing

Javvies

Did not see the Skein being a ratling, super ancient or otherwise, coming.

Yes, Cat, the Dead King is testing you. He doesn't particularly care one way or the other about Malicia – she's not particularly distinct from any other Dread Emperor/Empress – and even if the Crusade had nothing but victory against Callow, Praes, Black, and the League/Tyrant of Helike, it'd have little or no lasting impact against Keter. Maybe a few Revenants would get destroyed and a few new ones would be created.

Gian

DIE DIE, MANTHINGS

Nguyen Hong Hai

I see a man of Skaven culture here.

NZPIEFACE

Oh god. It's not that she doesn't know her own plan.

She doesn't know any of anyone's plans.

Argentorum

Kinda funny how it's the exact opposite of the first All According to, isn't it?

TeK

What if their plan is to have to not have a plan, and just bullshit their way through, while pretending to have many plans?

Cold Cyberia

Did Triumphant create the Golden Sea in the Chain of Hunger?

I think it was mentioned at one point she allegedly razed them to the ground and salted the ashes. It would make for an interesting symmetry between the south and the north, given how her battle with the spellslingers created the Titan's Pond. Kinda similar to how Bellerophon has a ton of laws and the Everdark is seemingly completely lawless.

Yotz

That notion has a nice ring to it, and brings interesting possibilities – like, say, gnomes being supersymmetrical counterparts to dwarves. And if dwarves are in control of underground, that explains where are gnomes hiding at. Geostationary orbital habitat, large enough to cause full eclipse in the possible scenario of Global Red Letter Incursion. After all, why fight with the whole world, if you can just freeze it into the stone age... Such disposition, however, would mean that dwarves are incredibly advanced in all things sorcerous, of which we so far have little to no supporting evidence.

Mental Mouse

What we've seen so far is that different species have different views of the world, and in this universe, that's enough to give them very different power-sets. At least a few of those seem to have **more effective** views of the world, in that their perspective gives them power far beyond those of humans and similar species.

Simpli

Thus I am still left hopelessly routing for Malicia – the vain hope that maybe the Dread Empress put up those whole plans for one reason or another ^^

agesbe

Why are you voting for her? You know she's planning the mass deaths of tens of thousands of civilians, right?

ALKATYN

She's an interesting character and a great weaver of plots, so it would be a shame to have her off the board. Maybe the Dead King will keep her around as a revenant

Decius

Maybe Cat will sew her into her clothes.

Yotz

Specifically – into panties...

Gunslinger

This whole Keter plot thread has been fantastic. I expected a battle to break out here but not one of intrigue (and chaos)

Also I'd not expected the Ratlings to have Names for some reason. It makes sense now but then I have to wonder why Procer doesn't have many names considering they're opposed to each other. Maybe only Horned Lords can be Named.

By the way the guide is only 2 votes from the top spot on topwebfiction.com . Let's get it there <http://topwebfiction.com/?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

P.S: Viv's broken Kharsum was hilarious but I first thought it was an EE typo. The small downside of web novels I suppose

Someguy

> It makes sense now but then I have to wonder why Procer doesn't have many names considering they're opposed to each other.

"I don't trust wizards. Every time I levy taxes on them, they try to get my political opponents to pull swords from stones."
—Attributed to Louis Merovins, seventh First Prince of Procer

They rendered their Wizards Guild politically toothless (out of public consciousness aka out of plot) so they cannot pull this shit.

Also as exemplified previously, I think their House of Light in Procer declares any Named who challenges their political power to be "Graceless". Given that the political players act like Praesi with better PR sense, the Robin Hood type Names probably get less momentum. Too bad they aren't one Droit du seigneur away from becoming Bellerophon.

Javvies

I'm not sure the ratlings do have Names anymore – remember, you need a solid cultural basis for (most) Names, and Triumphant broke the Ratlings and their culture a whole lot harder than the Miezens broke the Orcs.
The Skein had to have been acquired by the Dead King somehow, and I think Triumphant's day was the last time the ratlings were a major player – the Skein is a Revenant, and they don't exactly have an expiration date like the living do.

Not\_a\_robot

Would you happen to know where this was mentioned exactly? I remember it, but I can't recall from where and would like to refresh my memory. This particular tidbit seems to be becoming quite important.

Javvies

Second half of Chapter 24: Invitation (Redux).
Where they are discussing alternatives to allying with the Dead King.

According to Masego, Triumphant killed over nine tenths of the Ratlong population, and then withdrew after burning everything down and salting the ashes.

Jessica Day

I'm wondering if all ratlings who reach horned one status are named by default- it sounds nearly impossible for most of them to accomplish and who else would you tell stories about in a culture like that?

Decius

More likely basically all Named ratlings reach horned status.

Jessica Day

Sort of 6 of 1 half a dozen of the other I think.

narcoduck

Wow, they're looking for a rat in a maze.

Notsteve

Hakram's plan: cheese.

mavant

Oh I'm sure the Skein betrays Neshamah every chance it gets, but he must have planned for that.

After all –

despite all its rage

it IS stil just a rat in a cage

mavant

> erraticerrata liked your comment senpai noticed me!!!

aran

Quickly, what's the ancient Keteran word for "enemy"?

Yotz

No, no – the real magic word always was "doorhandle".

BarthHumphries

Typo thread

a handful of hours where one of two general proceeds to destroy his own army while the other simply happens to be there

Change general to generals

---

Chapter 41: Akua's Plan

"Note: though 'fell down the stairs' is common fate for Praesi highborn, further study demonstrate this is not nearly as lethal as the records would imply. It took, on average, five repeats to reliably kill someone in this manner. The tiger pit remains most practical."

– Dread Emperor Malignant II, the Particularly Petty

I honestly wasn't sure this was Arcadia.

It didn't make sense for us to have ended up elsewhere, since it wasn't like a fae mantle was a key to the infinity of dimensions in existence, but this didn't look like Arcadia in the slightest. Or at least no part of it I'd ever seen. There was a sky, though grey and with no obvious source of light hanging, and ground to walk on. Which was where it got unusual, because it wasn't earth our feet were on. Or even stone. It was some sort of hard black material that felt like softer obsidian. I could handle that much, truth be told, but the shifting shapes of the same material around us were where I drew the line.

"Go into Arcadia, she said," I mused. "It'll be a shortcut, she said."

"I never actually said that," Thief muttered back.

Without us ever moving an inch what had been the sky above our heads now seemed perpendicular to where we stood, like we'd moved from the ground to standing glued on the side of a house looking upwards. I closed my eyes and opened them, which got me situated again but also had me gritting my teeth. Because I could have sworn I was now standing on the ground, but the sky was to my left and what had been the ground before was now a massive wall. One that was slowly disassembling into smaller blocks, shifting into staggeringly large structures.

"Creational laws run particularly thin here," Hierophant noted, standing at my side like nothing was wrong. "Arcadia always did have the tendency to work on say-so, but gravity here seems purely a matter of perspective."

"A geometry trap," I complained. "That's just great."

My tutors had said I'd regret not taking those lessons more seriously.

"Shall we proceed?" Masego suggested.

"You're sure this is Arcadia?" I asked.

"I have valid reasons to believe so," he replied. "Do you not feel the nascent gate at the end?"

"I do," I said. "It's far on the other side of the... ground. Wall. You know what I mean."

"Clutter," Vivienne helpfully contributed, pointing there.

Clutter was about right. There were stairs, not all of them making sense at the angle I currently stood on, but also a myriad other structures: columns and bridges, towers and plateaus and things I'd never seen before. Not too far away I could see a spiral of blocks that only made sense if you went up with a certain perspective and down with another.

"I'm guessing that's the way, through," I sighed. "Let's get a move on."

We began our walk through insanity, taking a diagonal bridge across nothingness that put us on... top? Top seemed about right, of things. I leapt down at what was the foundation of a tower going the wrong way, landing smoothly. Vivienne followed a heartbeat later.

"I hesitate to ask," she said. "But what exactly ensures that we don't fall off, Masego?"

He managed a crouch landing, but would have tripped if I didn't catch him by the shoulder.

"Strictly speaking," he said, "nothing."

I would not get vertigo on solid ground, I told myself. Gods, I would not get vertigo on solid ground.

"Reality could be said to function by the fiat of the Gods, in large part," Hierophant continued. "This particular place seems to extend that privilege to anyone within it."

"I should have stolen more grappling hooks," Vivienne muttered under her breath.

We moved on to a vaguely sinister promenade of black columns, which went some way in quieting the instincts in the back of my head screaming I was about to fall and die, but then we took stairs that went down through the ground and the shift of perspective had me under the impression I was hanging from the basement of this nightmare through only my feet.

"Remember when the worst we had to worry about was William stabbing things with an angel feather?" I said. "And Vivienne hilariously failing to knife Hakram."

"Not all of us took so well to killing as you," Thief replied defensively.

I wondered what it said about us as a group that we frequently ragged on Vivienne failing to murder my closest friend in the world. Even Akua got it on it, these days, and for an unrepentant monster she had a scathing way with sarcasm. Masego patted Thief's shoulder.

"It's all right, Vivienne," he consoled her. "No one thinks less of you for it. You're very good at other crimes."

"I – you – thank you, Masego," she finally got out, soundly defeated.

Truly, of all the terrible sorceries at Hierophant's command the most dangerous was his occasional bouts of disarming sincerity. Aside from headaches and the occasional existential crisis, this little detour into the worst of wonderlands did not prove to be a major hindrance. Slowed us down some, but less than I would have expected. The shifting structures were fairly accommodating. It was maybe half an hour before we got in sight of where I knew the still unformed exit gate to be awaiting us. Atop a massive cube of blocks, which meant I had to leap onto the side and think very hard about why I wouldn't slide off the way common sense dictated I would. Masego had absolutely no trouble with it, the fucker. He'd taken to this place like a fish to water. I got off my knees, having learned from our earlier travels to shield my face so it wouldn't stack straight into the new 'ground'.

"Straight across, then we shift plane again," Hierophant said. "This was quite the interesting interlude. Would it be incriminating to thank the Dead King for widening my horizons, do you think?"

"Yes," I replied immediately.

"Very," Vivienne added.

"That's a shame," the one-eyed mage murmured. "Perhaps just a gift, then. I would not want to be an ingrate."

"He's the immemorial undead overlord of a hellscape and a half, Zeze," I said. "I don't think fresh apple bread and decent wine are ever really in order with him."

"Maybe the soul of a minor irritant, bound to an ironically chosen household object," he mused. "I still have a book on Imperial court etiquette somewhere, there are customs to things like this."

"We'll talk about it later," I lied. "For now, let's-"

The ground opened up beneath us. No, it parted. Like waves, hollowing out the thick of what had been a cube and forming an eggshell ceiling above us from the blocks. The broad ramp that emerged led straight to where I could feel the portal awaiting to be born. With the small hitch of there being man sitting on a throne to the right of it, legs crossed.

"And it was going so well," Vivienne said.

I winced.

"We've had talks about saying things like that, Thief," I said.

"Well, he's already there," she said. "How could it-"

I covered her mouth with my hand.

"Don't you dare finish that sentence," I growled. "Hierophant, assume hostile."

"I always do when you're there," he cheerfully replied.

That'd been perhaps a little too honest for comfort, but I couldn't deny the general accuracy of the assessment. I released Vivienne and took point, hand on the pommel of my sword. Thief to the side, Hierophant in the back with room to manoeuvre. Fae eyes meant I did not have to wait for anything as pedestrian as actually being closer before having a better look at the stranger. It was not human. Pale and thin and angular, like it'd been cut out of marble to look like a human with a too-large chisel. Whether it was a man or a woman I could not tell, or even if the label would apply. It wore a long sleeved-shirt of white satin, trousers of the same and had not bothered with boots. Its eyes were narrow and dark, and I found nothing but scorn within when they met my own. It was the ears that gave it away: long and sharp. Almost triangular at the tip.

"Elf," I quietly said.

Vivienne inhaled sharply. Masego did not waste his breath on an answer, immediately beginning to layer protective spells around himself. Was it a Revenant? I had no heartbeat I could hear, but that might be normal with elves for all I knew. If it was this deep in Keter, even through Arcadia, then I'd assume it was undead until proven otherwise. The elf did not move even as we approached. Was negotiation an option?

"Good morning," I said.

It stared at us, completely still. I kind of hoped deep down that it was just an intimidating corpse and we'd have a good chuckle about it afterwards, but I doubted my luck was that good. I could see no weapon in its hand or anywhere near. Close quarters fighter?

"Don't mean to interrupt," I said with a winning smile. "But we're lost, and I was hoping to ask for directions."

The elf rose to its feet, still silent. Its hand snapped out, and before I could get so much as a get word out there was a rip. For a heartbeat I thought it was tearing away at the fabric of this half-world but it wasn't that, not exactly. Like it was ripping away an invisible screen, it tore out the gate I had yet to make. Dropping it on the ground afterwards, it eyed us patiently. I could no longer feel the way out of this place.

Not to be overly dramatic, but that was something of a problem.

"I take it that's a no," I said. "We'll, uh, just be on our way then."

A ring of golden flames formed around the elf's hands and burned with blinding brightness until they... solidified. Formed into a long single-edge sword of what I might have thought to be simple bronze, had I not seen its making.

"Spellblade," I grimaced. "That was a little more literal than I'd expected."

"You may kill yourself now," the Revenant told us in a voice utterly devoid of inflection. "It will spare me the filth."

All heart, this one.

"Would you consider us to 'proper fucked' at the moment?" Thief asked lightly.

"Well, if you want to get all technical about it," I muttered back.

She passed behind me, and after moving my hand pressed what felt like a card into it. There was a thin covering of ice over it, and a sliver of will was all it took to shatter it. Another exertion had three reflective pieces of ice growing on my armour at the proper angles, and I took a look at what was written on it without ever taking my eyes fully off the Spellblade. On the Queen of Wands two bundles of writing awaited.

Skein.

Not the most pressing danger at the moment, but whatever.

Don't. If Hakram is there, Swan. If not, Dove.

Fucking Hells, how many plans did we have?

Spellblade.

That was more like it. Past Catherine better astound me with her wisdom and foresight.

If Masego is there, Buzzard. If not, good luck.

I was officially not astounded by Past Catherine's wisdom and foresight. I flipped the card and found nothing on the back, so I crushed it.

"What was the trigger for that?" I asked Vivienne.

"Your handwriting, 'when proper fucked'," she replied. "Note it was not if."

"Buzzard," I replied. "Zeze?"

"A kind of bird," he kindly supplied. "Although..."

His fingers twitched and the word appeared in red letters in front of him.

The elf swung and in that exact same moment I lost an arm.

It'd been instinct that had me putting my arm in front of Hierophant. A vague sense of danger. The red letters vanished like smoke, four layers of wards on Masego broke like glass and he was violently thrown back even as my sword arm dropped to the ground. I'd formed another blade out of ice before my arm was done reforming and immediately made for the enemy. Thief had disappeared, thank the Gods. She wasn't cut out for brawls like this.

"You should have obeyed," the Revenant said tonelessly.
"Irritating."

They swung again, almost casually, and when the instinct flared I ducked down without hesitation. The slope broke behind me even as my body bent forward while I ran down. Fuck, how had the Revenant done that? There'd been no flare or sorcery or anything, it'd felt like a perfectly normal swing of the sword. It stepped to the side, and impossibly that took it right to my left. Distance warping, maybe? It couldn't be teleportation, the sheer amount of power those spells required was insane. The first swing down towards my torso I followed. My footing shifted, I spun to the side and it was just out of the trajectory. Then the elf moved again, a lateral cut, and that one even my eyes failed to see. I had just enough time to guess at where the hit would land and cover myself in ice before I was blown away by a hundred horses kicking me together. The elf was behind me even while I sailed through the air, having simply stepped there, and I was entirely done with this. Winter howled.

A dozen spears of ice shot out of my back, avoided and parried without fail, but I twisted around and my feet landed on the platform I'd woven. I filled the space beneath me with ice and leapt down into it, passing through it like mist. I felt the edges shatter beneath a blow as I did and wove glamour even as I rolled out of the way. Two doppelganger spun out of me and I left another behind in a crouch as I mimicked the stance of the others. The elf ripped through the last of the ice with a single hand, then simply struck the illusion left behind. Golden flames ate at my mail and I was smashed into the ground, biting my lip so I wouldn't scream. It was above me again a moment later, the entire glamour broken, and with a fluid shift of grip it came down towards the still burning wound on my chest point first.

"Fine," I grunted. "Be like that."

It wasn't like my organs actually mattered anymore. The sword went right through me, puncturing the blocks beneath. My hand clasped the burning spell blade, reforming my fingers as quickly as they turned to ashes, and I opened the floodgates. Ice and shade ate at the bronze-like material, spreading across it lightning-quick, and the elf abandoned the blade. A step had it withdrawing where it had first begun, silver light forming in rings around its hand. Change of weapon, huh? I wasn't allowing that so easily. Ice crept across the ground, encasing my feet, but all it took was a thought and it was dragging me along faster than I could have moved on my own. Two heartbeats and I was on him, just as the light turned into a blade.

"Three truths do I now reveal," Hierophant said.

The elf flicked the blade backwards and I ducked, feeling something powerful scythe through where my upper body had been. I extended forward, every muscle bending, and the pommel of my sword struck its chest. There was a sound like a crack of thunder, but it remained unmoved.

"First, that which I see is the mask worn by void," Hierophant said.

The elf kned me in the belly, but I caught it with my free hand and ate the vicious impact with a grunt. It kicked me upwards into the air, blade already swinging, but I formed a handhold of ice and used it to kick its smug fucking face. It barely even noticed, until ice spikes grew beneath my foot. It angled its head back, just out of range, but with a twist of will I had them shoot out. While it ducked beneath I wove more ice out of the handhold and made it hammer my back so I'd smash into the Revenant. The silver blade flicked towards me, tearing through the ice I set in its path effortlessly, and with gritted teeth I formed a tentacle out of the ice trail behind me and had it drag me out of the way. The elf straightened up even as I landed.

"Second, in a world that is nothing there can be no partition," Hierophant said.

Change of tactics. Slugging it up close wasn't going my way. I stomped down and thick mist billowed forward in a tide. No doubt it could see through that, but so far it hadn't used more than one trick at a time. That should allow me to make a dent, if executed well. If felt the elf move through my working, and in that moment I struck. I opened a gate, right through its torso. If felt its skin shiver, but it was still whole. Countered, but now I've got you. I grasped the mist, sucked into into a spike, and hammered at the silver blade with it. It felt like... light. No, more than that. I felt fury well up in me, unbidden. Moonlight. Mist turned to shade and ate away at the blade like a drop of ink in water. It was trying to burn me out, but I had the fucking power to spare. I brute forced it, Winter coursing through my veins, until the blade shattered.

"Third, if all is one then to master a grain of sand is to master all of Creation," Hierophant said.

"Enough," the elf said.

"Agreed," I smiled, and filled its goddamn mouth with ice.

It stiffened for a moment, and before it could finish cheating its way out of that I was on the Revenant. My sword carved into its side, shattering its way through the spine. There was a shiver of power, and if I'd been half a second slower I'd be dead. I stumbled back onto the ice, unseeing. The forward half of my body was just... gone. Winter was sluggish to react, as if shocked by the depth of what it had to reform. My eyes came back just in time to see a silver blade about to punch right through my forehead.

"Mine," Thief said, and snatched death and moonlight both.

She was gone the moment the word was finished. The elf grabbed me by the throat, but my mind was elsewhere. If half my body could just be formed out of Winter, what was I really? Lies and mirrors and the stubborn belief I was still a person. Maybe it was time to leave that delusion behind. I was a construct, and what had been made could be unmade. My flesh turned to mist around its fingers and I slipped out of its grasp before it could crush my windpipe. I heard Masego begin to speak and backed away.

"And so I act," Hierophant spoke conversationally, "wielding a blade of absence for higher purpose."

The ground shifted. Blocks collided against the Revenant, ripped out of the floor, and within that ever-growing cage it was forced into the air. There was another shiver, the shell disappearing as if by writ of some ancient god, but more filled the gap. That was as good an opening as I'd get. My instinct was to strike, but I'd not come here for a brawl. This was just a distraction. I remembered where the gate had first been ripped out, and with a steady exhaled made another one.

It opened into nothing.

"This is not great," I admitted.

I closed it with a flick of the wrist. Masego made his way to my side, panting, as the elf kept wrecking his ritual above us. That wasn't going to last much longer, it was going through blocks quicker than they gathered now that most the surface was gone.

"I think I lost the thread," I told Masego. "What can you do?"

He grimaced.

"I don't know," he admitted. "We've never-"

The gate opened again. Thief appeared at my side.

"Catherine?" she asked, sounding surprised.

"That wasn't me," I said.

A head popped through the opening.

"Do hurry," Akua Sahelian said with a pleasant smile.

---

magesbe

First like and first comment? Unless someone commented while I was reading.

And man is this something. That Elf was strong as fuck, and Catherine is finally honest about her own body and it's lack of... bodyness. Does this mean she would survive decapitation?

This plan is so fucked up. I still don't know what Past Catherine was trying to say.

taliesinskye

Now we know what the Dead King meant by Catherine being truly immortal. No doubt there are ways she could be killed, but not by mere injury anymore.

Andrei

Theres a few ways so far. The first one is the bullshittery The Saint does where she just flatout cuts winter. A more "Mundane" way seems to be moonlight and having a hero receive a sword soaked in moonlight sounds like a story to me. A third way would be goblin fire.

Metrux

Goblin fire being made from the stuff of Bellow, we can assume both Angels and Demons can kill her, though I'm not sure about devils.

letouriste

magic can probably trap her forever too. she can lose her form but if she is trapped formless in a prison...she probably can't do anything to free herself...

tyizor

A sealed villain sounds like a story leading to eventual escape when the world thinks they're safe from her grasp. Sounds like a bad idea for the heros.

Rey d`Tutto

Evil in a Can, TVTropes.

Jeremy

Well... damn. It's one thing for your protagonist to become an Eldritch Abomination, and quite another to show it in such beautiful detail.

Great work, EE!

Tai

Always show, not tell.

The most basic premise of good writing, yet so often forgotten in the scheme of things.

EE does not, however. At least, not often.

ArkxCthuul

Absolutely agree. She finally admits to what she is.

Now let's see where this leads, shall we?

On a sidenote, that elf... Ouch.

soonnandnaanssoon

I'm pretty sure now that this whole thing is just a team bonding event and skills workshop the Dead King planned for Cat and her friends.

He's like that Uncle who believes in tough love but is secretly a softie inside.

Gunslinger

The dead king saw every anime training sequence where the protagonist is thrown into the pits and decided to improvise

usernamesbco

Almost all of Cat's plans can be summed up as "throw a bunch of crap at them and see what sticks." This is just learning to do that on purpose to fool seers (and possibly the Intercessor).

With a side of applied body horror.

I still hate this plan, slogging through it calls for vodka to kill the headache.

Quite Possibly A Cat

So Elves are cheat characters.

Wait are Drow like the elves in terms of powering up over time?

Yotz

Drow have no time to power up properly – they are too busy murdering each other.

Such situation is what led to creating The Rule of Two among the Sith. To prevent weak gang-up the stronger ones, thus diluting the Divinity of Strength. If there are only two of them at any given time, then testimony of strength would be true. Madness, if you ask me, madness and utter stupidity – but then again, both Sith and Jedi always were shewn incomprehensibly stupid in depictions of their supposed "wisdom"...

Back to Underdark – elves manage to gain such weight in the Creation in no small part thanks to their incredibly long lives. Spend a millennium or two in constant meditation and training, multiply that by the inherent aptitude for perfection among knife-eared pests – and voila!

Drow, on the other hand, are deprived of such luxury – as soon as one of them would rise among the others, their weaker congeners will immediately crowd-source the final solution to nascent problem, amputating all supernumerary appendages of person in question.

Starting with head, of course.

TeK

Not exactly. It was stated that elves imcreased their narrative weight with time, creating something akin to dominion inside. Also, they can choose one creational rule that does not apply to them at any given moment. So, it's really not so much about immortality or perfectionism.

Also, your theory, while interesting, is not mandatory. Drow might as well be Praesi with pointy ears, who follow the strong with iron clad loyalty – as long as they are strong, that is.

That being said, I rather enjoy your take on Guideverse, so please keep spouting theories ^_ ^

Yotz

//bowing, with outstretched lower lip
Thank you, thank you!

As for my theory – I presumed that said increase in narrative weight is a result of them mastering different aspects in different areas. I very well may be wrong on that point and elves grow over time in spirit just like ratlings do in body. Though even so, to imagine someone with ego of that size setting down for anything less than perfect, is a herculean labor in itself. And you need to kill time somehow – a century of training will suffice, I suppose... Immortality is only a road in that case – I presume the mere centurian elf would be naught but prey for the Woe, but a master with several hundred centuries of narrative weight under the belt – other matter entirely. Also, if that one is of the Golden elves, he/she/it must be at least as old as their hold on the Bloom. Afair, there was no child born among the elves after they took Deoraithe land.

>Drow

It may be some imp of the perverse – or some perturbing glitch in quantum lattice of my memory, but I seem to remember that local Drow deem betrayal as a highest virtue... Feel free to correct me on this one – I need to know. Even so – so long as leader strong enough indeed. Weaker henchelves will flock to the strong leader, and if the flock – or, rather, the pack – will be growing faster than the leader can increase their personal power... We all know that happens to weak Praesi leaders, are we not? >^ ^<
Add to that constant state of anarchy among them, and the resulting picture would be of constant turmoil, backstabbing, coups and juntas. Drow simply have no time to grow into power; though if – if – one of them'll manage to survive long enough... Well, if they are elves of alternatively light origin, in that hypothetical case we will have local Eldritch Monstrosity of Demonic scale near the borders of Callow. And that would be the case where "another continent" falls under the "near the borders" thing...

daegone823

I remember a while back that the reason drow suffered was because of breeding. Centuries of inbreeding has caused them to lose the ability to build numbers or was it that they somehow broke a rule in creation where they had their breeding stunted don't remember but it was around book 2 in the beginning I believe

---

That was about the ogres, though. Nothing was said about the drow save for the Everdark being burned down by the arriving elves and Tenets of the Night being about murdering one's way to the top.

Cold Cyberia

Where was it mentioned that the elves burned down the Everdark?

Alex

They burned the ships they sailed across the ocean on after arriving in the Everdark I believe. It's from the chapter where the Bard scares the Emerald Swords away from killing Akua during a conversation outside Liesse.

Cold Cyberia

I don't think the elves and the drow are related. Basically all elves are OP – Cordelia believed that a handful of young elves could slaughter a company of soldiers without a problem. Meanwhile Akua hired a thousand drow mercenaries (back in book 2) and no special remarks were made regarding their capability. If they had any elf-like abilities, I think it would have been mentioned.

---

The number "thousand" referred to the helikean mercenaries, the drow were a mercenary company of its own, without numbers stated, and Cat captured only seven of them.

Cold Cyberia

Huh, I guess you're right. Doesn't change the fact no one remarked or raised an issue with the drow being employed on the battlefield. If they were as effective as the youngest elves they would have slaughtered half of an army.

1shot4living

Wait, what? Elves can choose to ignore a creational rule? I must have missed a chapter somewhere.... pleasure sir, may I have some sauce?

Novice

"The elves did not appear, because appearing had the implication they had not been previously there. They had been, they'd just decided that Creation would not be able to see them. That was the way with the older elves: they decided what rules applied to them. They could not ignore more than one, but that was usually enough." – Epilogue, Book II

Ishot4living

Huh, I completely forgot about that, thank you kindly dearest stranger.

George Maddux

Fun! Turns out there are more beings the equal of a lesser god than we realized! Honestly this reminds me somewhat of Xianxia, with a new cast (and caste) of opponents now that she's an Immortal.

WuseMajor

Eh, Cat has tons more power than she's actually willing to use, because of the whole "Fae Mindset" side effects. Also, the local Elves are all jerks.

What worries me is that Akua can apparently open Arcadian portals now. And that this was her plan, instead of Masego's plan.

Rook

The interesting thing about this is that since Catherine's body apparently no longer has anything to do with her being and her own soul is woven into the winter mantle, the argument can be made that she essentially is winter and winter is her, there is no difference, or at least the partition is becoming exceedingly thin.

Akua having influence or a grasp of winter can likely end up in one of two ways, depending on the direction the narrative heads and the details. The obvious one would be a struggle for control, which while isn't exactly risk free is also fairly routine by now.

The more interesting, far messier, and far more dangerous one is if Akua's manages to shift her creational identity into the piece of the mantle she got a hold of, which might drag in both her soul and the cloak it's bound to. It has the potential to create a Frankenstein amalgam of Catherine, Akua, and a Named artifact. All the brutality and practicality of Catherine, the scheming and arcane knowledge of Akua, wrapped up in a demigod's mantle which is near immune to lesser sorceries and grows in narrative weight with every defeated banner added to the collection. Literally turning every major defeated enemy for into narrative experience points.

The next step in Catherine's self-mutilating, accidental transformation into an ever-scarier abomination.

mavant

OT3.

burdi

i think its happen because cat not yet master her power, not because they are equal in power and she actually not even thirty year old when her opponent has all the time in the world already

TeK

At least there's no rumble that splits the heavens and shatters the earth.

And about lesser gods – I thought they were not that strong, or rare. As per Warlocks explanation, there is a difference between Gods and gods.

mavant

Well, now I want to go watch Labyrinth again.

Yotz

May I suggest Dark City by one Alex Proyas?

A film much more deserving praise than Matrix ever was, imho, and nicely depicting some aspects of Labyrinth's maddening topographical worldsponge-shifting. It is truly sad that after a promising start and long drought Proyas ended up with despicable "Gods of Egypt" to his name..

mavant

I've seen it. Good film! Labyrinth has a special place in my heart, though. And a condescending elfin being.

Antoninjohn

The plan Cat needs to do is Step 1: Shatter the moon
Step 2: Use the pieces as astroid artillery to crush her enemies
Step 3: Profit
First step always works

WuseMajor

I'm pretty sure that, unlike in a video game, the moon here doesn't regenerate regularly so you can drop it on people. Though, it might I guess?

Regardless, it's safer to just open a portal to whichever hell has rains of burning stone regularly. Similar result and you can do it as many times as you want.

Yotz

Regular Moon stays shattered, I presume. Arcadian reflection of the Moon – another story entirely. It may regenerate, or it may not – the jury is out on that case. Also, in the world where symbols matter that much, shattering the Moon and using its lightless husk as a weapon against the adversaries would be much more preferable to Duchess of Moonless Nights than colony-dropping random pieces of Hellish geography on quite suspecting enemies like some boorish Sovereign. Twofoldly so if she dives into the Faerie mindset.

TeK

She's the duchess of Moonless Nights, we both know she and a moon are not on speaking terms right now. But the Cat's dominion is, per her name, moonless, so if she drew enough power to drop the moon, there will be no moon to speak of.

Of course, that's not taking all that shady "astronomy" thing, but come on, gravity fizzles out when presented with a classical element of the void, and space is a void, therefore there is no gravity in space.

Yotz

True, true. Even if Moonless Night will come to be through the act of shattering the Moon, it may be a classic case of "win more".

donforrester456

,

donforrester456

*Sovreign* of Moonless Nights, lately. She got an upgrade somewhere on that.

Yotz

Well, "Sovereign" is a generalized term for the ruler of something – so, being Sovereign doesn't necessarily precludes one from being Duchess.

Though, being the only Entitled Winter Fae left, Cat technically holds the right to the Title of Queen of Winter – but even so, one can hold both "The Ice Queen" and "The Duchess of Moonless Nights" titles, along with dozens upon dozens of others.

Exact nuances of feudal chains of inheritance can be more than mind-boggling, and quite a bit obscure, though.

taliesinskye

Something I'm wondering: if Cat started calling herself the Queen of Winter and nobody gainsaid her, would she get all the power of Winter's Monarch?

ALKATYN

I thought previously that elves were the same thing as Fae, but it seems like they're unrelated? Puzzling. So elves are basically another humanoid species like humans, orcs, goblins, etc. but immortal and assholes?

Yotz

Descendants of Assholetep the Insufferable, ruler of the Dikh-Ehd dynasty, without a doubt.

MetruX

It has been said before that elves, TRUE elves, not the golden bloom ones like this one, are one of the major powers of the world, like the gnomes. While Fae deal with all kinds of lower powers. Thus, we can very much assume they are very different things and, more importantly, that you don't want to deal with elves. I mean, the golden bloom ones are the racists and not good ones that got cast out, and this single one is already almost impossible for them to deal with. Imagine if you had to deal with the real deal?

Yotz

If I remember correctly, non-bloom elves are one of primary powers in the world thanks to their humongous empire where they intermingle and interbreed with other races freely. It was one of the points – if not the point of contention between them and Golden elves who saw that practice as a degrading, leading to diminishing of inherent power of elven race through defiling the intrinsic purity of the Chosen by detestable acts of rampant bestiality. So, non-bloom elves may, in fact, be less powerful than rabid racists who spend whole entirety of their lives accumulating and refining individual power.

Euodiachloris

Depends on what kind of power we're talking about. Because the Goldenberks might be more narratively hefty, but they lose in the whole "able to rule a huge state without being cursed with sterility" and "nobody, not even the ground you walk on, can stand you" departments (the two are linked).

Social know-how and being nice are also... powers.

Yotz

Well, best defense is not being where the strike lands, so... Yeah, powerset of Ungold elves may indeed be spread through other disciplines, and be comparable or greater in scale than one of the Gold ones.

frolamiz

Not to mention that the elves that breed with others races don't die of old age. So while they watch their grand-grand-grand...-grand-children living their life, their empire should still have a good chunk on "pures" elves that should be on par with the ones of the golden bloom, but in greater numbers since the golden bloom's ones are supposed to be a minority.

Yotz

Come to think of it – and mind you, this is again purely speculative thing...

What if elven prowess in all things mundane and magical is a result of them, how should I put this, "investing" their souls in the "thing" in question? Exempli gratia, self-absorbed fanatical racial purists invest their souls – and narrative weight – into their own personas, making them literal demi-gods; all while their more open-minded kinselves put their souls into the world itself, growing as a result into something akin to daemons – not demons, mind you – and being rather flimsy in comparison as a result. Not "weak" per se, but only slightly more better than your average "peak physical form" human. That would translate itself into ungold elves, in a matter of speaking, "dissolving" in the some part of the Creation, leaving their mortal coils behind or tracelessly vanishing altogether, thus preventing inevitable overpopulation and making "ancestors will protect us" very literal statement. Just imagine trying to conquer a land where every little thing hates you. Animals, insects, trees, grass, springs – hell, air itself will fight you, all while you blunder pointlessly through ever-shifting labyrinth of improbable landscapes...

But the elves of the land themselves are weak and easily murderizable for any competent opponent – all while their Golden counterparts live in state of constant war with very land they seized and consequently enslaved, and can't stomach even the idea of interacting with anyone beyond very narrow group of directly connected to the Above creatures. Because only Golden elves are persons, obviously.

Quite Possibly A Cat

The average individual non-Bloom is almost certainly weaker than the average Bloom elf. At the very least the Bloom Elves haven't had children in a long time, so are all automatically going to be very old.

However, the non-Bloom elves probably have far more old pure elves in terms of absolute numbers. The Golden Bloom was a small group of outcasts that got kicked out when the hybridizing started happening. So non-Bloom pure elves were almost certainly more numerous than Bloom elves, but they've just added a massive number of hybrids to their ranks.

Worst (Best) of all, natural selection is still a thing. So it's very possible that the non-Bloom elves are going to make hybrids with the best of both worlds. From humans you might get things like not needing approval from the local spirits to have children and freedom from narratives, while the elf part spits out longevity and power. Of course that depends on selection pressures and underlying genetics. If the non-Bloom elves are focused on ramping up their power it's possible they are vastly more powerful. Something stupid like: "The current generation is 60% elf, 20% human, 10% ogre, 10% dwarf, 5% goblin, 15% dragon, 10% djinn, 5% devil, 5% Fae and 3% demon on average. We aren't quite sure how we got over 100%, since the gnomes wrote us an angry letter when we tried to figure it out. Population growth is 7% a year. Most of our food is grown in Arcadia. We're gonna colonize Hell soon!"

ArkCthuul

That post just made my night. Damn funny.

Also the theory of the elves above are quite insightful, let's see if they are true as well.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

I see Cat's found a match made in heaven, an elf willing to choke.

TeK

He was forced to choke her, it was all a set up!

mavant

Is this just general praise for breathplay, or a reference to something further back in the text?

Silverking

So, I know it's been a while, but what exactly was the chapter where Vivienne failed miserably to kill Hakram?

TeK

When she was a heroine. Laure, when Hunter lost his arm and Cat helped him find it. Of course, she sucks at searching, so Thief got angry and tried to stab Hakram, because he lost his arm, just to mock Hunter when he later found it.

RanVor

Book 2, Chapter 9: Rematch.

Javvies

Huh.

Is Spellblade an Elf-associated Name or just a known Elf ability?

Also, Thief can steal moonlight? Is there anything she can't steal?

Interesting. Cat now demonstrated the difference between having unnatural longevity and the kind of Immortality that the Dead King takes an active interest in.

Metrux

Well, we have seen her steal a sun before... That she could steal his blade was not a surprise to me, but that she succeeded at it was. Also, is this trully a revenant? If yes, then the Dead King has SEVERAL hidden cards above what we first believed.

JJR

There is one thing Thief will never be able to steal. Anything that she already owns.

(<https://www.nuklearpower.com/2005/07/28/episode-582-trickery-trickery-trickery/>)

Nima

jesus christ. the dead has all race named.
and all of them like hidden boss or something

Novice

So Catherine just went into full Winter mode and it didn't deprived her of her rational thinking like in the past? She didn't go full villain monologue? Interesting. Very interesting.

I wonder what changed.

Novice

Jesus Christ my grammar skills plummeted. Don't go commenting immediately after getting out of bed, kids.

MetruX

Well, it's time to get to bed for me, so... I'll take your advice? xP

nick012000

Most likely what changed was her imprinting it with her mind/soul, which is why Akua wound up summoning her back when she drew really heavily on Winter while Cat was K0ed.

Gunslinger

Akua's creation can't have changed Principle Alienation so it couldn't be because of that. My guess is there wasn't enough time since the battle started for her to go all Winter Fae on everyone.

Either that or the repeated cutting of her construct kinda damages Winter itself like the time against Saint thus reducing the impact of Winter.

donforrester456

My theory? She's being called Sovereign of Moonless Nights, now. Not "Queen of Callow and Duchess of X"... but sovereign. Given the behavior of a prior sovereign of winter we know about, I'm apt to think that status adds a bit more personality in the mix.

Jane

Well, Cat seems to have gotten over a big stumbling block between her and accepting her new self. Thanks, Elf! Internalizing that her body isn't her anymore can only help her in the future (unless she stops being Winter, somehow). She's been happy enough to sacrifice limbs in the past, when needed, but there's a big difference between knowing you can regrow an arm in a minute, and understanding that your body is just a convenient fiction that you leave unchanged out of habit.

Incidentally, is it just me, or did she throw out a lot more ice than she normally does? I think she mentioned a couple of chapters back that she was taking advice from Akua (a genuinely good idea, incidentally), but I'm a bit surprised that she didn't seem to suffer any ill-effects from it. Was it less Winter-intensive than it seemed, or is she getting a better hold on Winter?

werafdsaew

Probably both? It makes sense narratively that she would keep powering up as long as her opponents are still stronger than her.

Notsteve

It might also be that this is a situation where her state of mind matters less. Before she was fighting heroes, where fighting like a traditional villain would get her killed. So she had to hold herself back and be ready to run at a moment's notice, which was the opposite of what Winter wanted her to do. So she had to carefully control the influence Winter was having on her mind.

Here she's just trying to kill a powerful non-hero. She doesn't have to worry about the narrative. So she can go all-out and doesn't have to worry about her state of mind, so she doesn't have to fight Winter's influence even if it's just as strong.

1queenofblades1

Honestly Cat should just let Masego study her to see if he can help her become more powerful. Something tells me she's going to need it.

"Whether they be Gods or Kings or all the armies in Creation"

Gunslinger

She could let him behead her now even.

Cold Cyberia

So, bets on who will be the fifth member of the Dead King's protection squad?

Personally I'm partial to either a monk-type (to cover Grey Pilgrim) or maybe an orc Warlord (because that's the only way we could see an old Named orc). I would settle for a White Knight too, even though it's not my preferred choice. Let's be honest, the White Knights are kinda vanilla.

TeK

We could see a dwarf, I want a dwarf.

haihappen

This pocket dimension dungeon would make both M.C. Escher and Gygax proud.

Yavandir

Lolz from the chapter when they started their 'master plan' this is how i see it...

ALazyMonster

I'm curious if Cat can make a spellblade now since wasn't it part of her aspects(that just turned into part of winter) that she could take and use other abilities. I know she used winter combined with her aspect to take "call" from Akua and that it was mentioned before the night raid with the wild hunt that she could take powers and turn them into trinkets like that whistle that still hasn't been used.

It would be an interesting way for Cat to inadvertently gain more power in my opinion. Kind of like "oh I devoured a zombie elf's blade that was made out of sunlight(I'm assuming since the first one golden light), so now I can make my own spellblades out of darkness or something(I figure it would shift to fit the mantle's nature)"

NZPIEFACE

I've been thinking. If Akua ever becomes a part of Winter, will Cat get her Aspects?

RandomFan

If Cat ends the book as Heiress I am going to be so mad. /s

RanVor

The Heiress is a transitory Name, so probably no. I would be so insanely ironic, though.

frolamiz

Now that I think about it, Catherine could learn a lot from an old elf.

What they can train/gain with old age, she got naturally with her mantle. She is just not aware that it is possible to do or is unwilling to acknowledge it.

Even if the abilities are not compatibles, I'm sure she could learn a lot of tricks.

TeK

So, an elf, huh. I await that next in the parade of "Previously Unknown Races" will be the undead King Under, which protects Keter underground, through which Cat and Co will make their escape after successful regicide.

Also Cat's being able to reform body on the whim is just super awesome. She can totally turn herself into the blizzard now. Heroes gonna be so dumbfounded, how they're gonna take a swing at something that is not physical? Also, she can really experiment with her looks, like, for example, making herself taller. I hope she thinks about it and does just that out of the pure vanity, making herself just a little bit higher than Hakram and then taunting him. Oh, oh, oh, can she make, like, a thousand little copies of herself? That all will jump at enemy and stab them with their little stabbing blades. And banter, between each other. She can totally go through locked doors now though. Unless they are warded.

And Thief, she can steal any amount of bullshit, it seems. Can she steal herself? Creating a paradox which will restart the Creation. Awesome, I'm so hyped right now.

Gunslinger

>how they're gonna take a swing at something that is not physical?

You don't ask that question of Heroes. Especially Pilgrim.

TeK

Well yeah, untainted radiance or something can evaporate some Cat. But most heroes still prefer brutal swordswinging, or not-swordswinging. The point is, they really like to swing. They're swingers.

Novice

Saint of Swords managed to cut a piece of Cat's Winter mantle, so it's possible depending on a hero's story.

Gunslinger

And also heroes develop counter measures to villainous tricks. Thus any hero with less than 3 aspects would be able to counter mist Cat

Sengachi

Yeah, regenerating is one thing. That way the heroes whale on you and get hits in but you walk it off at the end of the day. When you make it so that the heroes can't touch you though, that's just begging for the Heavens to get creative.

Gunslinger

This battle was so epic. And that elf probably wasn't an Emerald Sword.

I wonder if Masego's spell where he can change creational laws will go stronger now that he's witnessed the elf's ability

Death Knight

Woe to all Villains should they face a Named Heroic Elf.

superkeaton

Oh goody, Cat's finally figured out that if your body is just stuff you control, then it doesn't always have to be a body. This should lead to some fun and horrifying new avenues for fights and adventures.

Someguy

It makes sense. Akua is a Mage Archetype so she uses Winter as a source of power and utilises it like she does spells.

Cat is a Warrior Archetype so utilising Winter in melee as a shapeshifting force of Nature would work best for her.

Euodiachloris

In short: Cat has just fully activated her Winter Pact Bladelock (Unchained) side. 😊

Azure

Also she can now make herself taller than EVERYBODY.

nipi

Guys! Things are really really REALLY bad. Masegos words are grammatically incorrect:

"Third, if all is one then to master a grain of sand is to master of all of Creation," Hierophant said.

nipi

You know be afraid! Be very afraid!

Quite Possibly A Cat

Hey, its not his fault spells can't always follow grammatical rules!

Sengachi

I'm not even sure that was a spell. More like a miracle duct-taped to some high arcana and held together by whatever the opposite of prayer is.

Yavandir

If Arcadia is reflection of Creation then when they went into Arcadia from threefold reflection were they in fourfold reflection?

RanVor

Something just occurred to me: Cat's physical body is a construct of Winter. That means Cat's personality, memories, the entire core of her being must be anchored to something else. As we've seen in Kaleidoscope VI, this "something else" is the very fabric of Winter itself. That makes Winter and Cat one and the same, in a sense.

Now, Akua has intertwined herself with the shard cut off by the Saint of Swords, which is separated, but still a part of Winter as a whole.

The question: does that make Akua something akin to Cat's split personality?

Sengachi

No wonder the Heroes never took Keter. I mean, I'm amazed they've ever even made it to Keter at all. If the Hidden Horror can whip *that* out of the bag, I mean ... holy fuck. That Named(?) elf hit Cat at least as much as the Saint of Swords ever did. Fuck, Cat, Heiropant, and Thief together barely managed a delaying action against it in a space basically custom-made to enable Heiropant's nastiest tricks.

I mean that's probably a top-tier Revenant (I hope, I dearly hope) but *still*.

RoflCat

I mean, Dead King obviously LET them reach Keter after he's confirmed their worth.

How else can he get a new powerful Revanant to add to the collection?

RanVor

Remember that these guys were the Crusade. And they were even more powerful while alive.

Yavandir

Are you sure? I mean Dead King have some guys running around Creation maybe some of them were 'collected' by them.

Roimata

What, no "front fell off" jokes?

Satan

So I'm guessing "First, that which I see is the mask worn by void" means that nothing really exists, it's all an illusion of some kind.

"Second, in a world that is nothing there can be no partition" means that there is nothing inherently separate between the entities of the Universe, like Gods and men; it was earlier hinted that Gods are trying to prevent their creations from surpassing them.

"Third, if all is one then to master a grain of sand is to master all of Creation" seems to reiterate that nothing exists therefore it is all the same, so knowing one thing is knowing everything.

And if everything's the same, then there can be no partition.

"And so I act/ wielding a blade of absence for higher purpose" is a bit more confusing. I think it means that acting for the Gods (higher purpose) is therefore inherently pointless (an empty cause that is usually martial in nature => a blade of absence). I feel like I made enough nonsense that it makes sense.

---

Chapter 42: The Skein's Plan

"Chaos is a ladder, Chancellor. It never goes quite where you need it to, and the rise is always more graceful than the descent."

– Dread Emperor Perfidious

Like proper villains, we put a magic gate between ourselves and the consequences of our actions before silently agreeing to pretend none of it had taken place. The Woe had taken to that part of villainy better than any other, truth be told. Probably didn't help that I was the closest thing Archer had to an authority figure in her life that wasn't Ranger, or that Hierophant had been raised to believe that repercussions were a thing that happened to people who didn't have family dinners involving the full roster of the Calamities. Seriously. I would be dishonest not to acknowledge that having Black cleaning up behind me for year hadn't, uh, encouraged me to display a perhaps disproportional amount of recklessness in my actions. But even at my worst there'd been an amount of calculation involved in those risks. In contrast, Thief had at some point robbed a Legion pay convoy and somehow expected to get away with it, while Diabolist had gone out of her way to personally piss off every single living villain with a higher body count than her. Well, before Liesse anyway. She'd murdered her way to the top of that list quick enough. It was telling that the closest thing we had to a steady hand around was Adjutant, and he'd rather famously gotten into a slugging match with a demon.

Gods, was Juniper the voice of sanity? She ate people, for fuck's sake. Well, corpses anyway, and she hadn't done it in a while that I knew of, but still.

"I have so many questions," I told Akua the moment the gate closed.

"Flammable and inflammable mean the same thing," she replied without missing a beat.

I paused.

"What?" I managed.

"I noticed you've been misusing the latter," Diabolist said with a beaming smile. "The word is actually derived from the Old Miezan verb inflammare, which means 'to set on fire'."

Masego let out a noise of approval, the filthy traitor. Of course of all the Woe's habits the one Akua had to pick up was giving me lip in the middle of delicate life-and-death situations. 'Closing ranks in front of outsiders' had been too much to hope for, I supposed, but Merciless Gods I would have settled for 'prone to collateral damage we can't afford to pay for'. It wasn't like she didn't have a history. I made the decision that choking my only current source of insight on what was happening was unwise, which I thought was very queenly of me.

"Where are we?" I patiently asked.

"Before the gate to the central chamber," Akua said, inviting me to look behind her with an elegant gesture.

If you'd one sinister rune-engraved stone gate, you'd seen them all. This one was ridiculously large, but given the alleged size of the Skein that wasn't a surprise. Besides, this one didn't even have a terrifying face-shaped demon bound inside. Strictly small time compared to the Tower, that somehow-standing pile of horrors. I considered my next question carefully.

"How?" I finally said. "Just..."

I gestured to encompass Creation.

"How?"

"As a part of your mantle, she can draw on Winter to an extent if so allowed," Masego said.

"Yes, yes, we all knew that," I lied. "Not need to state the obvious, Masego. But here precisely?"

"The chain," Akua simply said.

Which bound her to me, or more accurately the Mantle of Woe, and to an extent Winter itself. That explained how she'd been able to open a gate towards my location, anyway. How had she even gotten here in the first place? The whole point of the Threefold Reflection was that it could be turned into an unsolvable maze at the drop of a hat.

"You used Winter, to make your gates," the shade reminded me. "Your works were known to me."

Setting aside the headache-inducing implications of that for later, I frowned. So she'd seen where I was planning to get out of Arcadia and gone there. Which told me why she was here, but not how she'd gotten there in the first place. I eyed her warily, since the question had been implied, but she did not speak again. More secrets. Exactly what we needed, at the moment.

"My eye, if you would," Masego stiffly asked.

Akua sketched a bow and produced the glass orb with a flourish of the wrist. My frown deepened.

"You've been running the ritual this whole time," I said. "He could see through his eye, you through his, and you sent him instructions through it."

"Cards," she agreed. "As I was instructed, though I did not always know the reasons why."

I passed a hand through my hair. Which, as I immediately remembered, had been formed out of Winter smoke and mirrors mere moments ago. There was no sweat matting the strands even after my extortions, which I was almost thankful for. The inhumanity of that was almost comforting, compared to the reminder that any sweat I'd feel would be a lie I told myself and my will enforced.

"We're on Buzzard, I take it," I said.

She nodded. I eyed the stone door.

"So now?" I probed.

"We enter," Diabolist said. "After the sixth rune in your head is disabled."

Skipping a few there, huh. That aside, Vivienne's card had given me the eloquent instructions of 'don't' when it came to the Skein, so it was worth asking her if-

"And Thief is gone," I said. "Please tell me someone else saw her get out of Arcadia."

Masego finished putting back his eye in the appropriate burnt-out socket, yet another reason to be thankful eating was now optional for me, and straightened up.

"I did as well," he said. "Though she disappeared within moments."

"And you didn't think that was worth mentioning?" I asked.

"I assumed there was a reason," he replied.

Yeah, that was today in a sentence wasn't it? Could hardly rake him over coals for that.

"Romance my brain, Zeze," I ordered with a sigh. "Let's get this cart back on the road before it catches fire. Again."

His hand rose, and immediate-

—

"He reads stories," Vivienne said.

"We can as well," Masego pointed out.

I intervened before that could turn into a proper bicker.

"So we come at him with a plan, he'll have seen it from beginning to end," I said.

"Essentially," she said, after flicking an irritated glance at the blind mage. "Though the interesting implication is that he can only 'read' a single story at a time. It is possible to fool him."

"Multiple schemes will be required," Akua mused. "With a degree of bridging between them. It would be ideal to begin on a scheme and move into another before the Skein can arrange for a point of failure."

"That means someone has to know enough of them to lead us to change tacks at critical moment," I noted. "Considering you can't really fight, Diabolist, it'll have to be you."

"She'll need to be fooled as well," Hakram spoke up. "Given more plans than we'll actually use and kept in the dark about which few options are really on the table."

"Go random," Indrani advised. "That always fucks with oracles."

Akua nodded in agreement.

"The rest of you will need to be kept ignorant of large swaths of what is planned," she added after. "Lest the moment you begin a plan the enemy be made aware of it."

"Masego, you can do memory blocks right?" I asked.

He nodded.

"An easy enough enchantment for all save you and Diabolist," he said. "Conditional triggers can be woven in, though no more than one per 'block'. Too high a degree of sophistication risks permanence, the human mind is a complex device."

"I don't like how complicated this is getting," I admitted. "But once you're wet, there's no reason not to swim."

"I don't follow," Masego said, brow creasing.

"We don't leave him to guess between a handful of plans," I said grimly. "We drown him in them."

—

-ly. Rude.

"So this is a stupid plan, but it's stupid on purpose," I said, rubbing my forehead. "That's comforting. You know, except for the part where we fail and die horribly."

"I was hoping we would avoid that," Hierophant gravely said.

"Yeah, well, you know what the Dead King put up on the gates into this place," I replied. "Fine, it's too late to run anyway. Akua, you got anything to add?"

She bowed smoothly.

"I was ordered," she said, "to fight as an extension of you, should it come to swords."

"Well, it's not like today has been a cornucopia of good decisions so far," I mused. "So what the Hells, let's give it a whirl. Zeze, get the door would you?"

With a deep grinding sound, the stone slabs parted.

"This is the part where I praise his efficiency," Akua announced. "Because misunderstandings and incompetent assessments are humorous."

Was it wrong that the one of the most horrifying things about the mass-murdering maddened shade of my former rival was that she was trying to develop a functional sense of humour? If so, Black had shown a lot more foresight than I'd thought back in that alley.

"In we go," I said, warily eyeing the darkness within. "Before I start debating whether it'd have been more reassuring to blow our way through."

Robber was, inarguably, a horrible influence. The ground wasn't stone, I knew that just from the feel of it under my boots. It wasn't even flat. It crunched. Didn't even need to glance down, the sound was easy enough to recognize: bones. Charming. The inside was pitch black save for a single well of light illuminating the artefact Thief had spoken of: three layered wooden wheels on a stick, with pieces of string joining them haphazardly. She'd not mentioned, however, that every wheel was about as broad as I was tall. Hierophant followed behind me, and the grinding sound told me that-

"Yeah, so that's not happening," I noted.

Ice bloomed in the way of the closing stone doors, shattering for the first few inches but eventually forcing them to a halt as I kept pouring power into the working. I was already standing inside a massive dark cavern filled with bones, there was no way I was letting the Skein keep us stuck inside. Speaking of, there was no sign of the Revenant.

"At least he's not waiting on a throne," I mused. "Those fights never seem to go well for us."

There were tall curved rib bones from something definitely not human serving as a sort of antechamber leading to the wheels, but that screamed 'trap' even more than the rest of this room.

"Hierophant?" I prompted.

"We can use them," Masego replied. "I can already glimpse them. Deep, but simple."

Good to know. Still didn't tell me where the Hells the undead rat was.

"Oh what a stroke of luck," I loudly said. "The Skein isn't here. I guess we'll just walk towards those wheels and-"

Sword clearing the scabbard in a heartbeat, I stabbed the bones beneath my feet and poured the howling might of Winter into the mess. Frost crept through the mass of bones, and my eyebrow rose when I realized how deep it actually went under us. At least sixty, seventy feet. Not trace of the Skein though.

"Catherine," Akua said.

I sighed.

"He's above us, isn't he?" I said.

The answer wasn't so much laughter as it was the quiet rumbling of the storm. A massive shape leapt down and bones were sent flying in every direction while I smoothly rose and fell into a guard. Hierophant, prudently, came to stand behind me. Diabolist was at my shoulder now, and all I felt from her was a hunter's patience. Furred body bending over the wheels and cutting through the light, the Skein watched us with a leering grin. He was large as Thief had said, but her short description had not done the Revenant justice. Thick dark fur covered a body that was almost humanoid, save for the long wormlike tail that came from its lower back, but it was the head that was discomfiting to look at. We call their kind rattlings, but looking at that rotting leather it was a snake I thought of. The pale golden eyes with deep red gouges under them only deepened the impression. The two pairs of bone-like antlers ripping through the top of its head were wickedly sharp, even after what must have been centuries. A Horned Lord. Even Ranger considered the likes of that difficult to deal with, and when we'd come across that woman in Arcadia I'd felt like she could murder the lot of us in the span of a single breath. Not an opponent I should take lightly. Not an opponent I should fight at all, if I could help it. Sadly, my mouth disagreed.

"So can we knock off the theatrics?" I asked. "Because, let's be honest here, Akua's probably more Evil than you are and if I told her to fetch my slippers she'd do it."

The creature's dry red tongue licked at fangs half the size of me.

"Take the wheel, lead the Empress to the orc," the Skein said, then cocked his head to the side. "Or. The Empress escapes, yet dies to a blade of stolen moonlight. Two paths."

"Well, I'm glad someone knows the plan," I mused. "Would you care to monologue about how we're going to fail?"

The Revenant laughed.

"Then you strike," he said. "Or. She strikes with you. Or. You flee. Tricky little things, skittering around, but you entered the maze. You did. Surrendered too many paths. No end remaining is fortunate."

I reached for the last card inside my cloak and my fingers came away wet. My hand rose.

"Just give me a moment," I asked.

The ancient abomination stilled. I got the sense he was somewhat taken aback. Last card, huh. I slipped it out and angled it so the light well the Revenant was across would make it clearer. The Queen of Swords.

You have an invisible crossbow.

Written diagonally, across the whole thing. I flipped it. Nothing on the other side. Seriously, Past Catherine? That was the entire message? She might as well have just drawn herself flipping me the bird. What an asshole.

"Catherine?" Masego probed.

"If you were hoping for a solution," I said. "That was not it."

"It was pointless," the Skein said. "Seventeen stories? Pretty little tales, but you always end up here. No matter the path, the destination is the same."

Seventeen. Gods. There wasn't enough alcohol in all of Keter to justify that, and even worse I was pretty sure we'd planned this sober.

"Look," I said. "I'm with you on this one. This whole thing has been a debacle from start to finish, and the person responsible should be buried alive. We're on the same side, here."

The Revenant stilled again. Evidently, this was not unfolding as expected.

"You did this," he tried.

"That can't be, I don't remember it," I immediately denied.

I'd fought enough Praesi to know that sufficiently high station and blatant lies could get you out of nearly anything, if you played your cards right.

"We should look into it together," I told him. "Have you considered we might be getting framed? I'm just saying, this is a horrible plan. I could do better. It just doesn't add up."

"Does this actually ever work?" I heard Akua ask Masego in a whisper.

There was a beat.

"It got us into Skade," he eventually conceded.

"Are you trying to lie to an oracle?" the Skein said, by the sound of it genuinely offended.

"I would never dare lie to you," I lied. "You're obviously a... rat-person of highly discerning judgement. If you just get Malicia in here, I'm sure we can straighten all of this out."

"It's like watching a demon get loose," Akua murmured. "You know you should run, but you just have to look."

"You want me to bring the Empress here," the Revenant said. "The Empress that you are trying to kill."

"That's completely unrelated," I said, proceeding forward with greatly unwarranted assurance. "And hearsay besides. I'm as loyal to the Tower as any Praesi."

Assuming said Praesi was highborn, anyway.

"Did you truly expect this to succeed?" the Skein eventually asked.

"I've rolled the dice on worse odds," I admitted, perhaps a little too honestly.

While that was not a high point by any definition of the term, it definitely went downhill from there.

—

I'd learned several things today. First, elves were bullshit even when they were dead. I wasn't unaware that I didn't have a lot of room to talk when it came to recovering from wounds, but who the Hells just decided they were all right and had Creation agree like a drunker singer? Second, when the Lady of the Lake called a breed of foe 'hard fuckers' she meant 'how would someone even kill that thing if it wasn't already dead?'. I was now on my eighth sword, and beginning to appreciate why heroes always got handed some nifty legendary blade before they were sent into the meat grinder. I might as well have been trying to breach a wall swinging at it with a salmon. And, not, I grimly thought, even a large one. That was, sadly, not even in the top ten of my current problems. The Skein's jaw hung unhinged, gaping wide, and it closed only when the last of the darkness had been swallowed into it. There went my domain.

Which he had eaten, because that was a thing that could be done.

"It comes," Akua whispered into my ear.

Thank you, helpful collar fairy, I acidly thought. If I'd wanted a running fucking commentary, I'd have asked Black for a talking sword. I leapt onto a platform even as the Skein's bare fist collided with the bones beneath where I'd stood, immediately leaping onto another before the swing of his tail could catch me. I'd learned the hard way that I couldn't take a hit from the Revenant without spending precious moments rebuilding whatever passed for my spine these days.

"Burn," Hierophant said.

Ribbons of golden flame streaked across the dark cavern, folding around one of the Skein's limbs, but he turned and casually sucked the fire into his open maw. The breath that spread was putrid, like something left to rot for so long the rot was all that was left. The Horned Lord flicked at glance at Masego, who stood atop a ring of bones surrounded by a pale globe of light, and without warning moved. Fuck. I took a running leap off my platform, then as the fall quickened my momentum called on my domain again. The brushstrokes of night came but twice before the Revenant lazily struck down right through them. The darkness dispersed like smoke and then the backlash hit. My eyes froze in their sockets, then shattered, and with a hoarse scream I dropped out of my controlled fall into a pile of bones.

"Move," Akua said.

I rolled to the side without thinking, and a massive impact close to me had me spinning back in the air. I reached for my face – was that a rib going through my cheek? – and forced the eyes to form quicker. Vision returned just in time to see the massive handful of claws headed my way. Flick of the wrist and ice sprouted on them, forming a long staff I caught by the side, and then the tail smashed me into the wall of this accursed place. There went my spine again. There really was not getting used to that, was there? I heard Masego bark out something in the mage tongue and dropped listlessly to the ground. Diabolist was there, red eyes and pleasant smile, helping me up.

"There was mention of fighting together," I said after spitting out a few of my teeth.

Akua Sahelian offered me her hand.

"Shall we?" she said.

Gods help me, but I took it.

---

Gian

DIE DIE FAIRY THING

ArkhCthuul

Ehmm, who or what?

Akedus

I know this comment is late but that's a reference to the Skaven from Warhammer Fantasy.

16JSundberg4

YES-YES, MURDER KILL COLD-THING!

SpeckofStardust

Akua is learning.
She really does need to die after this.

Rook

I'm not sure if she'll ever go, all recent signs point to her being here to stay for the recent future imo

The first paragraph, when talking about the reckless tendencies of the Woe, Cat unconsciously inserted her right between Thief and Adjutant. That kind of unconscious inclusion is pretty telling about how entrenched her position is becoming even to Cat of all people. Then the last paragraph to end it is taking Akua's offered hand, which is more or less the most blatant possible symbolism for acceptance there is.

Combined with involving her in main character banter, of all things, basically indicates a semi-permanent promotion to recurring evil sidekick

Azure

You are forgetting that Catherine and Vivienne are both Callowan. They will NEVER forget what Akua did in Liesse. This is just a setup to make her think she's winning and when the time comes they will snuff her out.

123355785

You've read the title of the story, right?

Catherine did quite a few things she never thought she would do only a few chapters before.

Azure

Catherine swore an oath with Vivienne about Akua. As the last entity of winter she is bound by that oath. She is fae now and oaths are binding.

Cap'n Smurfy

She's sliding into the role of Treacherous Lieutenant far too well, which does not bode well for Larent. Especially considering he hasn't been playing that right or particularly well.

Miles

That's just Akua manipulating Cat's fae nature. She built a story for Cat to follow and Cat is stuck in that story until Akua wins or another Woe disrupts it somehow.

Miles

That's just Akua manipulating Cat's fae nature. She built a story for Cat to follow and Cat is stuck in that story until Akua wins or another Woe disrupts it somehow.

mavant

Nooooo she's the BEST

Decius

Too late. She died before this, which is how she got into this cloak-and-dagger gig.

Big Brother

And here is what I have been waiting on since Akua fought the heroes using Cat's body. Oh, I can't wait for Monday.

Zarquon

Akua x Catherine best ship.

Shaerick 68

Get out, Masego x Archer forever

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Masego x Magic only true path.

Halinn

Dread Emperor Treacherous x Convuluted plots

mavant

Possible names for this pairing:

Marcher

Arsego

Mindrani

Indego (or Indigo, if we're playing loosely)

Archophant

Hieracher (I vote no on this one, too confusing)

Hierani

Indophant

Personally I vote for Indigo.

RanVor

ArseGo.

Kittora

This is a really good story. I feel like the song bury me face down by grandson really tees up the summary of the book so far.

Coincidance

- _____ -

Yotz

Collar Akua is watching your immoral activities.

stevenneiman

*immortal

superkeaton

This might be the most amusing chapter in the latest book. I appreciate Akua being forced to watch Catherine's abortion of a diplomacy attempt.

Someguy

To be fair, that actually works. Though only when the other party has an interest in playing along due to mutual benefits with themselves having the leonine share.

Rook

It's like watching someone try to castle their opponents king in front of a grandmaster chess player

Delakar

That's the best fucking, god damn line I've heard in a while. The mental image of a grandmaster watching a betted game, where some fool reach over and castles for his opponent thus prolonging the game.

Fucking 200iq, I love it because there are so many reasons why it may happen. But none of them are all that good

Letouriste

« Castle their opponent king »? That's not a move in chess:D And castling is not so hard to do even against a GM

TeK

>that's not the move in chess
Exactly his point.

Yotz

>On the table there was a chessboard with a formation of chess pieces on one side of the board, and a scattering of checkers on the other.

Protip: best way to win a game of Texan hold'em is to hit your opponents with a baseball bat until they stop moving. Though, decapitation with a hockey-stick is an interesting option.

Forrest

I mean, there's a horde of skeletal remains RIGHT under him.

Someguy

I'm surprised those haven't decayed into sponge and mould and slime over the centuries.

Snowfire1224

The gods wouldn't let something so undramatic happen as decomposition

IDKWhoitis

Dead King probably has a dedicated mold removal squad, or a general purpose maintenance crew of undead. He seems to have a firm grasp of organization and logistics.

Like really, Black and DK should get along like best buddies. They both are schemers, and they have a pissing match with the heavens.

Decius

Dead King has had enough time to eradicate all of the mold that would eat his country.

TeK

And then he probably created undead mold.

ahd

Not sure what would be more entertaining.

Skein swarmed under by an instant horde of Winterised undead.

Catherine's expression when the Skein inhales necromancy.

RoflCat

The solution is obviously exploding Winter zombies.

Yotz

...and stuff like this is precisely why I absolutely adore this book...

Snowfire1224

Akua, the evil exposition fairy. Well not exactly but that's what she reminds me of in this chapter.

Euodiachloris

Still nowhere near as exasperating as certain blue-white balls of lemme-strangle-them. 🤪

mavant

Hey listen, that's not a very nice thing to say.

*rimshot*

Someguy

I thought the plan is supposed to be Dove?

"Skein.

Not the most pressing danger at the moment, but whatever.

Don't. If Hakram is there, Swan. If not, Dove."

Snowfire1224

I think they're on dove now that they're actually fighting him. Buzzard was from when they were fighting the elf. The thing is they talked about being on plan buzzard before they ran into the skien in this chapter.

IDKWhoitis

I think the Lie Akua had caught on to was that one. Cat was throwing so much bullshit about, the skein missed the bull charging for his ass.

IDKWhoitis

So was the bolding on "drown", was that an aspect? Or just emphasizing? Because 17 stories does not a drowning make. Unless it was improperly used, and thus had little effect. Because we have seen Cat drown her enemies in Winter before, so that could be a type of power up. Maybe it's like Struggle, but it just lets Cat win harder or snuff out weaker opponents...

Decius

Were you keeping track of all 17 stories these last three chapters?

IDKWhoitis

While I'm not the Skein, I imagine it's like playing tragedy looper with experienced players. We don't have all the info the Skein did, because like the Skein right now, we're are focusing on Cats POV.

I feel like the drown aspect of this, isn't so much 17 storylines being a bit much, it's multiple plot lines being run simultaneously. Archer for example, may be on none of the 17 plotlines, yet. Thief is moving through another one, unseen. And the Skein is too busy trying to kill Cat, that he may not be watching the other plotlines closely enough to maneuver Malica to safety.

Dantalian

Aspects usually start with a capital letter.

IDKWhoitis

EE has made typos before, and it's been a while since we've seen Cat use an Aspect.

Enjou

Maybe it could be a proto-Aspect? She doesn't have a proper Name at the moment, so it could be an indication that she'll get one.

And it would be a suitable aspect, given how she dropped a lake on an invading army.

Perhaps she just needs a third instance where she does something that could be considered an attempt to drown the enemy.

Gunslinger

This was pretty hilarious. The best part is always new members to the Woe being stunned by the general stupidity of Cat's plans.

Finally regarding the Horned Lords all I can wonder is how Procer even manages to fight them off. I suppose even Procer will spawn heroes when these fuckers make an entrance

Gunslinger

Oops accidentally threaded this comment

Aston

You can drown in 5 inches of water.

The stories didn't need to be deep.

Time for Akua + bones + Winter.

Akira style.

Best web serial.

IDKWhoitis

I still believe that the number of plotlines wasn't so important as the number of plot lines simultaneously running. Also, the Skein seems to rely on physical sight to ascertain information, and past actions.

mavant

TETSUO

noblemartel

KANEDAAA

Yotz

>She might as well have just drawn herself flipping me the bird.
...and winked and laughed all the way down the bedroom chamber...

---

I mean, all the plans so far have been named after birds, some kind of clarification is needed.

Javvies

Interesting.

This is definitely a test/accelerated powerup montage type deal where if you fail you die that the Dead King orchestrated for Cat and the Woe, but mostly Cat.

Byzantine

Yep. This is his actual welcome.

As stated before, I don't think he really cares about current events at all. It makes no difference to him what offer he takes. He's just using this to see what the new kid on the block can do – and how quickly she can improve. He knows everything that has been going on, so he knows what the King of Winter saw in her. This is him seeing if she's good enough (or can become good enough) for his purposes.

Decius

Skein can see the stories, and starts the fight off by getting the upper hand and not winning? Haven't they seen enough stories to know where that ends up?

Akua powers Cat up, Antagonist side escalates (probably something to do with all the bones), Zeze does something to regain the upper hand, enter Empress, holding Thief by the throat and demanding surrender. Beat panel. Cat drops her sword. Beat panel. Full surrender stance. Beat panel. Invisible crossbow to the Empress.

I've got the details wrong, partly because this isn't a graphic novel, but that crossbow is going to kill either the Empress or the Dead King.

Byzantine

Dead King is still in his Hell, I doubt he's at any risk. He arranged this whole thing intentionally, he isn't going to go anywhere near Cat with his real body until he's sure she isn't going to try something stupid.

Wry Warudo

'Invisible Crossbow'
...Archer?

Argentorum

If I had a guess. Her or Hakram. Or Hakram throwing archer.

*ahd*

Demon of absence?

mavant

God, if that thing never shows up I'm going to be so mad. Like, foreshadowing a demon that erases things from existence in a story about a world that runs on storybook rules, and then erasing it from the story... Is admittedly a clever subversion or lampshade hang or fourth wall painting or whatever the term is, but GODDAMMIT so don't play with my emotions like that!

Although I guess art is about making the reader / viewer feel something, so I dunno.

Birdeye

The absence demon has shown up, though. Everyone just forgot. In Ch. 4, Thief reports 14 heroes invading. By the time they engage, in Ch 10, there are only 12 heroes, and no one bats an eye at this discrepancy. In fact, Cat even notes that it never occurred to her that the number of heroes was "A tenth and two officers", and she mentions that everyone had been having headaches for the past few days.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Also: In Arcadia, Zeze learned to do a certain thing/ became powerful enough to do said thing. Cat saw it happen for the first time there. She had two subsequent "first" times seeing that trick of his, both of them during the period of time in which the demon was active nearby.

Cap'n Smurfy

And that's not even counting the discrepancy in chapter numbers in the URL around that time and the fact that Catherine and the Woe all had headaches around that time.

mavant

At the time, I think I just assumed this meant 12 other than the Pilgrim and the Saint, but in retrospect your explanation is clearly superior, especially given the detail of the headaches.

Still, I want to know what happened to it.

Rook

Wait, what if she has a literal invisible crossbow? Plain old ensorcelled invisible weapon set to automatically fire whatever doomsday bolt it's loaded with, based on a set of trigger conditions

No one but Catherine knows what the card says, and Catherine herself thinks it means something symbolic because a literal invisible crossbow would be a stupid ass idea. The plan's set in motion but the skein never sees it coming because it's the king of all stupid plans among the pile of stupid plans, where no one knows anything about at all.

Thing goes off at the last moment when there are too many branches in the story closed off for the Skein to do anything about it by the time it fires.

Sol Invictus

Well I can't say this wasn't expected. Mesago was facedown on a pile of bones unmoving, Me feeling the strain of using too much winter, unable to even reform my spine without it becoming a gruesome array of icicles, heck Im not even sure if Akua was still inside her box.

"Stand down Catharine" the Empress said as her knife drew a trickle of blood on an unconscious Vivienne. "You are defeated, yield now"

Like Hells I would. Alright Past Catharine, you better have been good on your word or so help me, i would bend all of creation just to smack you in the face.

I raised my arm, my fist clenched, I extended my thumb to point upward.

Not even the most Preasi of highborns could hide the disbelief and confusion in her face.

And then my pointer finger directly a the Empress throat.

The Empress changed her expression to one of utter disappointment. Well thats one thing we can agree about Malicia.

"Your Mad" the Empress said.

"Yup", and then I pulled the trigger.

Insanenoodlyguy

I feel like it's another case of "Fuck you Past Cat" and it's a lie. She is supposed to think Archer is there somewhere, hidden, possibly by theif, but in fact they are off attacking Empress. But because Cat is going with the plan where Archer is around, that's the one the Skien is countering. Neither side is actually aware the other is doing a different plan (easy name swap, what's written under ones Dove is written under another's swan, etc.) so it becomes harder to read.

RanVor

Congratulations, you've found a way to make this mess of a gambit even more incomprehensible.

Dantalian

Two paths and none of them involving Archer? RIP Empress.

Redlaw

There is something i don't understand. The body of cat is a fakery forged through winter. So doesn't that mean that her current speed ; strength ; reaction time are just limitation she put on herself and that she could easly become even stronger if she wish? After all she doesn't really have muscles or brain in the proper term.

Byzantine

Yes, that is correct. We are seeing her slowly realizing that.

Truth is if she was better at handling Winter she would have simply dropped the need for bones entirely. What does not exist cannot be broken. etc.

mavant

Probably, but she only figured out the body was totally unnecessary like ten minutes ago. Give a girl a break!

Novice

Oh, she already figured it out long ago. She was just in denial and was forced to embrace it last chapter. It's the reason why she was on the verge of being an alcoholic and had to swear an oath to Hakram.

werafdsaew

It's possible, but she's already very strong, and there has to be a limit to how strong she can make her self, so she may be already at that limit.

Decius

Does she think that's air she's breathing?

lqueenofblades1

"Akua 'Sahelia' offered me her hand."

You've misspelled her name....

....It's Ubua

Antoninjohn

Now Cat in order to defeat the Horned Lord you need beat him at his own games, Cat must eat him

Yotz

Cat takes Rat. Checkmate.

RanVor

Seventeen stories? That's a little disappointing. I'd go for thirty-something, at least.

The next chapter is gonna be glorious.

mavant

Perhaps Masego insisted on a prime number for obscure High Arcana reasons.

RanVor

Thirty-one. There you go.

MetruX

You must also remember they had AKUA as the touch stone. If they give too many options, she could very well screw everyone over.

RanVor

Including herself. Akua isn't stupid. She doesn't really hate Cat personally, and certainly wouldn't doom herself to spite her, especially when her very existence is dependent on her. When she betrays, it's going to be for a tangible benefit, not out of spite. I'd rather be worried about her not being able to keep up with that many plots.

Yotz

Maybe seventeen is all what Skein was able to discern. He can't read any story if he doesn't know the story is even here, and there always can be a few more layers of meta. Like, they were planning for him, so he planned for their plans, but they knew that he would plan for their plans, and so they planned around him planning for it, but he... And so we plunge deeply into layered abstraction logic, and after the first layer it's usually not possible to determine desired outcome among the endless meta mirages.

NZPIEFACE

Fitting for a ratling to have an Aspect about eating.

mavant

Akua is rapidly becoming my favorite character. I want her and the Tyrant to be best friends.

mavant

Unrelated to the current chapter, but has anyone mapped out the world here? Does it actually fit onto classical Europe / Mesopotamia / Asia Minor in the way that the names imply?

RanVor

There are links to several maps in the "Art, Maps and Other" section at the top of the page.

Cthulhu

I am too stupid to follow all the plots and counterplots.

At this point I figure Black shows up and reveals that he actually is the Bard and that Cat is actually the long lost daughter of the Empress, and that all Named are aliens.

Sort of a bizzare combination of The Good Place, Highlander II, and Dance in the Vampire Bund. Why the hell not?

And hey – remember when Cat simply had to survive officer training school? That was what – 2 years ago? 3?

Nethermore

ErraticErrata is just torturing us with how the CatXAkua ship started being baited harder than ever immediately after Cat vowed to annihilate Akua.

Greg

Skein seems ridiculously strong, but I guess the whole point of this arc is that the Dead King is far more powerful than even his reputation, so having a minion like this makes sense.

I am a bit surprised none of the Woe ever mention that Cat's diplomacy approach is basically Starlord dancing at the end of GotG – confusion fu designed to make their enemies discomfited and/or angry enough to make a mistake.

Still not a fan of Akua becoming a sixth ranger, as I don't think it fits Cat's (or Vivienne's) character at all, and don't particularly like Akua as a character. Isn't Cat literally oathbound to make Akua suffer in a legendary way? But I will try to suspend judgment until we see what her ultimate arc is.

Euodiachloris

Akua isn't currently wearing her own face. Or height. Sure, she seems to handle it with aplomb... But, she'd never show any discomfort about that kind of thing to anybody, least of all her boss (if only because being Ms Smugness of Smarmyton-upon-Pridesforth is her whole MO).

Being exactly who she is is a major facet to our Akua, no? That rug isn't under her right now. She'll be feeling it on some level, even if she outwardly and inwardly denies it... Which makes it a form of torture, just not of the hot poker variety. Heck, getting her to change any of her original attitude over time through very rough handling, her adopting more of her own acting as core and/or enforced "education" could be said to be torturing her into becoming somebody and something she'd never have chosen to become before. *shrugs*

IDKWhoitis

In a way this could be a different path to "Destorying Akua". Instead of destroying her entire being, she is being replaced bit by bit, until the outside and inside cannot quite be called "Akua".

RanVor

Cat's idea of legendary suffering was having Akua's soul bound to her cloak for all eternity. It backfired.

mavant stevenneiman

Nothing to do with anything that's going on, but I find it interesting that of the five and a half original Calamities, only one and a half aren't at least surrogate parents. Sabah had a husband and several kids, Amadeus has Cat, Hye has her apprentices, and Wekesa has Masego. I kind of doubt that Eudokia or the Assassin (whoever they are) have families, but I wouldn't have expected any of the others except Sabah would if I didn't know about them.

Kai Wingless

Love me some Skaven! GREAT HORNED RAT!

---

Chapter 43: Masego's Plan

"Kings and shepherds fit in the same cook pot."

– Orc saying

It was a difficult to describe. The power was still mine; it just wasn't shaped by my own hands. I could still feel it, span the ebb and flow and cuts, but the will behind was Akua Sahelian's. For the first thirty heartbeats it was horribly distracting, to fight while I had this... second line of thought going on in the back of my head, but soon enough I learned to ignore it. The need for control had always been the lid on the powers I'd stolen from Winter, hadn't it? It was a lesser surrender, the act of allowing Diabolist some manner of rule over it, but it was still a step towards that place I yet shied away from. Neshamah had called it apotheosis, and mused it to be the result of happenstance. I was not so certain, but I knew than if I reached the world I looked back to would be a very different place.

Winter sunk into the sea of bones like a great tree's roots, tainting and binding and made into pattern impossibly perfect by another's will.

My mind had brushed against the flow, and though it kept existing bereft of my attention my gaze no longer gave it clear definition. Like watching without eyes, I thought. It was not the kind of thought a human would understand. That I did, instinctively so, was certain to have a price down the line. I exhaled, sword in hand, and watched the Skein's muscles pull and shift. He was a dead thing, in the end, and Winter knew much of death. The Revenant was not of my own raising, but there was an... affinity there, now that I knew to look for it. Not a door into usurpation – in those eldritch struggles knowledge was always paramount, and compared to the likes of the Dead King I was a babe in the woods – but the ratling was not untouchable. Like me, he was a construct.

Those could always be broken, with the rights tools.

The muscle weaves beneath shoulder contracted, bent and though the Revenant angled his body to hide the tail I felt it shift. In, out. My breath came steady, an illusion imposed on myself for reassurance. Pretty ritual that it was, it served its purpose. The Skein struck with inhuman swiftness, clawed hand shattering the remains like toys as it passed where I had been but moments earlier. No longer. What difference was there, between the ice I shaped and the stuff of my own body? Beneath the surface, absolutely nothing. The twin spider-like limbs that ripped out of the back of my plate and shifted to see me land on the Skein's extended arm made that bitter admission impossible to deny. Muscles shifted beneath me, the sweep of the tail abandoned as the Skein prioritized shaking me off. Lower leg inclined, and it followed that – there it went, the dip, but his very nature made me an oracle's bastard child.

Steel would do nothing against the ratling's eldritch hide and fur, but steel was just one of many tools at my fingertips. I tugged out a string of my domain, shaped it into a hook and carved into the Revenant's flesh even as he made to throw me off. It did all the work itself: the momentum had me swinging around his side, the hook of darkness slicing into his skin as I descended. The Skein let did not let out a sound. Did he even feel pain? No matter. I'd take him apart piece by piece, if that was what it took. I hung from the hook under his belly and hoisted myself up, spider legs born anew to hold me as I began climbing back up the side.

Power reflected into itself, a hall of mirrors containing a conflagration until it came out roaring like the great beasts of the First Dawn. Claws and fangs and wings and most of all eyes that were entirely Akua Sahelian's.

There disconnect between seeing the working unfold through Diabolist and my own body's senses hearing the thousands of bones come together with strings of shade and ice, rising a behemoth of a drake that collided against the Skein with a thunderous crash. Too many ears. Too many eyes. The spider limbs cracked and broke until I grit my teeth and forced them to shape anew.

"The whole world is the altar of the profane, both seeing and unseeing."

Hierophant's words rang loud and clear, though the undertone was made uncomfortably inhuman by the protective globe of ivory-like power protecting him. The Skein ripped through the neck of Diabolist's drake, devouring the power within, but I could feel her laugh and let loose the endless depths of Winter into his maw. I swung myself around with the limbs, landing on his lower back, and wrenched out the hook. A failure in imagination, this particular tool. Limited by my own thinking. I stole away more of my domain, gave it more useful shape. The arc of the bow was smooth, the string indistinguishable from it. The hook changed, shaped by a thought, and I anchored it somewhere hands could not reach. The Skein moved before I could loose. Abandoning the drake, he turned and massive fangs shone in half-light. There'd been the hint of a hint in the way his muscles moved. The ice limbs dug under the punctured hide and folded into themselves then outwards, impossibly lengthened, until I hung high in the air and away from his snapping jaws. With a hard grin, I loosed my arrow.

"Under this theology of disbelief, the scales bear the weight of nothingness and the the sum of all that is, finding them equal and equivalent."

Like a spool unwinding, my domain followed in the arrow's wake. The Skein ducked, impossibly knowing of the trajectory, but a flicker of will was all it took the have the projectile tearing downwards and straight into the crook of his neck. I have you now, Horned Lord. I reached and grabbed the other end of the thread, night-stuff coiling around my fingers, and dismissed the limbs. He would have moved before I dropped onto his back, but the fur glistened with cold and Diabolist emerged from it in glimmering ice.

"You drank too deep," Akua Sahelian chided, smiling in that same fearless way she had when she'd pitted her madness alone against the full might of the East.

Ice formed in restraining shackles around the Skein's limbs, and though he broke through them that moment was all it took for me to land. I shifted, spread my legs and pulled even as the arrowhead became an ugly root of darkness within its flesh. He fought me for a moment, but then the Revenant bent and I crouched to forced the other end of the thread into the flesh of his lower back. It spread without hesitation, forcing the whole creature's body into a warped arc as he failed to break the strength of my domain manifest.

"My hand is the sword of truth, denying the rot of entropy: 'lo and behold, the shade of Ruin falls upon you."

A shiver went through me as sorcery filled the entire cavern. I had felt the likes of this before, once. For a quick, fleeting moment. When Black had spoken a single word and wrecked Liesse like a castle of glass, a madman's will shattering all that displeased his sight. Hierophant had stolen an aspect, or at least an aspect's cast, and now wielded it like a hammer against the Revenant that sought to break us. The Skein screamed, this time. Limbs and flesh smashed, breaking apart from the inside and through the yell the ratling hissed a word.

"Spool."

I frowned, what/

I stood on the bones again, Akua helping me up, but her hand left mine quickly and she turned a burning glare on the Skein. The remnants of her drake were still lying half-broken, reeking of Winter, Masego was back under his Ivory Globe and my domain was whole. So was the Revenant, not a mark on him. All our successes erased in a heartbeat.

"Again," the Skein leered. "Teach me all your tricks, crawling things."

We hadn't even managed to kill it last time. And he'd still unmade it all, easy as waving a hand. Gods, how many times could he call on that aspect? Three, ten? As many times as he wanted?

"Interesting," Hierophant said. "You did not break the march of time so much as sever causality. Prune away events from a sequence that still theoretically exists."

"It doesn't matter," I said. "Let's find out how many lives a rat can have."

"Our minds were left untouched," Diabolist noted. "As was his. In broader Creation such a working would have shattered him upon the wheel, from all the cascade of innumerable events affected. The aspect was bastardized, made contingent to this place."

"It is a good cage," the Skein said. "You will not leave it."

"So we're playing shatranj," I said. "Across possibilities he can 'spool' back at any time."

"Alas," Masego said, tone amused, and the Ivory Globe winked out. "A mistake was made."

"You fail," the Skein told him. "Here? You always fail, again and again."

"You are not the only one who can learn," Hierophant said, and his glass eyes burned bright beneath the cloth. "And all you have earned from this is further Ruin."

I'd seen a lot of aspects over the last few years. Become familiar enough with the gifts of Named that I could be considered a discerning judge. William's Rise had been like a wellspring of harsh light from within, hollowing out his insides but removing every wound inflicted. Black's Destroy was like a bolt fired at Creation, a wilful removal of what my teacher wanted gone. Akua's Bind had been little more than an acknowledgement of her nature, the thirst for control deepened and formalized by the touch of the Gods. This was different. Masego had come into his Name standing defiant in the face of a sun that was not a sun, a godly thing that defied the laws of Creation and human comprehension, and it had shaped what he'd become. Usher of Mysteries, Vivisector of Miracles. Witness had been the outgrowth of the former, perhaps, but now I was seeing the latter and it was a terrible thing to behold.

Aspects were act, not simply a word, because they were an exercise of will. A piece of you made into a blade and turned against Creation. This, then, was intimate part of Masego. Of the man he was turning into, and there was cause for worry in it. To ruin something was no small thing: it was to destroy and devastate it irreparably. The Skein had spoken five letters and wiped away all we had wrought.

Masego replied with four and the world shattered.

The cavern came apart at the seams. Entire chunks of it split from the rest, drifting into black nothingness as unmoored ships, and like spider webs the destruction spread across all the Revenant's realm. Akua and I stood together as the bones beneath us began to spill into nothing, incomprehensibly coming back around to fall from the ceiling in another shard. My will extended into the ice I'd used to keep the gates open, and found they were still there. We were not ruined along the rest of this, then, not necessarily. The Skein moved, and in a myriad other shards did the same. Hierophant stood alone on his pile of bones, wreathed in ribbons of sorcery so thick it was visible to the eye, his smile almost innocently joyful. Wait had, the – my eyes flicked back and with muted horror I watched the platform on which the wheels stood slowly begin to topple into a streak of dark. I would not make it in time. It was not physically possible to... I inhaled and ice bloomed.

"Diabolist," I ordered.

The moment the glimmering silhouette finished taking shape, Akua was within it, having swum there through Winter. She reached down and snatched the edge of the highest wheel. The ice that made her up began to crack under the massive weight and from the corner of my eye I saw the Skein move towards her in a dozen different shards. He couldn't kill her through the shell, so it must be the artefact he was aiming for. I could not allow that, if any part of this was to be salvaged. Diabolist's will was ruling the ice construct, but what was that to me? I seized the reins and let Winter loose: it grew and swelled, a hunched apelike thing that tossed the wheels towards me like they were feather-light. A heartbeat later the Revenant tore through my creation, but I'd already ceased paying attention. A third of the way to me the artefact moved from a shard facing me to one in the far back and I leapt through the void. Flicker. Wrong shard. I was by Masego's side.

"Hierophant," I barked. "Contain the rat."

The dark-skinned man laughed almost drunkenly and brushed back his sleeves. Hands extended, he snapped his wrists together. Two shards collided in a spray of bones that obeyed no sense in where it went and fell, but two Revenant reflections went opposite ways and the undead screamed. It would do. Flicker. I crossed into another shard, almost tripping on a massive half-buried skull, and watched the wheels continue to arc down in the opposite direction. Which meant nothing, but – I made three shells of ice, eyeballing it, yet the artefact still collided entered a fourth. The Skein snatched them before they could bounce, and with a fanged grin leant over the edge of the shard to throw them down into the void. I learned from my mistake, this time. I formed the silhouette directly on the surface of the artefact and broadened it with rough strokes. Akua did not need a reminder to seize it. Or instructions in how to operate the massive wings I had shaped.

That lasted until the Skein opened his maw and wisps of Winter were sucked out of the construct, leaving it no more than ice with a shade within. He could take it out as fast as I could pour it, I was pretty sure, so instead of wasting power I went for an alternative. I leapt into the void, gallantly suppressing the scream boiling out of my throat.

Fragments spread across places and times yet linked, always linked, for Winter was a single entity and the void's touch could be bridged. A thousands hands moved.

Akua had gone for numbers, I thought, and even as I fell into the dark I saw limbs, skeletons and even skulls move under Winter's writ, biting and grasping at the Skein. I found the wheels at last. Hurtling down into the nothing that would lead somewhere else. My body is an illusion, I told myself. I closed my eyes, let distractions fall away.

"My body is an illusion," I insisted.

Just glamour, and anything I had seen I could glamour. Wings or iridescent blue ripped out of my back, long and ephemeral. It was like moving a limb, if that limb had been wounded for months and I was only getting used to it moving again. Angling my fall was easy enough. I collided with the wheels, setting my feet on the middle rung, and tried to convince myself that weight was an illusion as well.

"Sulia never cared about weight," I said. "It does not apply to me."

The wings didn't change. But instead of slowing, my descent stopped. And then slowly, painfully, we started rising.

"Spool," the Skein said.

I screamed in frustration and/

I was back on the shard where I'd begun, damn him.

"Did you think it would always work?" Hierophant laughed. "There is nothing I have seen you can take from me. Witness."

What was he/

I tightened my grip on the wheels, swinging them over the edge of the closest shard with a grunt. The Skein in most shards strangely looked like he'd taken to wearing armour, covered in a sea of remains that fruitlessly bit and clawed at his hide. Diabolist was trying to slow and blind him, with only mixed success. I glanced to the side, dragging the artefact further over the ledge, and froze when I saw myself standing near the gate, utterly furious. And again, in another shard, getting crushed by the Skein's clawed hands as he seized the wheels. Was I even the real one? No, the existential crisis could wait until later. I needed to get this to Masego so we could get out of here and find Malicia. I raised the wheels over my head and legged it. I couldn't even tell where this shard was related to the others, much less when: bones and void weren't exactly trail markers. I leapt across the nearest shard – flicker – and cursed as soon as I landed. The Skein was in this one, fighting... me. And our earlier work had been done anew, with the ratling bound by a string of my domain, forced into that painful stretched. The other Catherine glanced at me, then shrugged and began forming a massive spike of darkness above the Skein's head.

My own domain ebbed in answer.

Was she... Eye on the prize, Catherine. I made my way around the Revenant's desperate death throes and leapt. Flicker. This one was empty, save for aimlessly angry bones animated by Diabolist. My fists tightened around the artefact. I could keep this up for hours and still be lost.

"Hierophant," I called out. "Chart me a path."

A dot of blue light formed ahead of me then peeled off. Good enough. I followed as swiftly as I could, until it crossed into another shard. Flicker. Empty as well, except the Skein suddenly turned around in another shards and passed into this one. The Revenant loomed as tall as ever, though the smaller shard was forcing him to be careful where he stepped.

"I see you," the ratling hissed.

The dot of blue light wheeled to the left and crossed into another shard. Less than helpful, that, since unlike it I had to worry about the giant rat. See me, huh. Akua had seemed able to work through Winter in multiple shards, so theoretically... I sunk into my own mind, forcing myself to consider angles, then bent Winter to my will. Across a dozen shards mirrors formed, reflecting the light from the pit into the Skein's eyes – which he was already covering, aware that with so many mirrors I'd covered near every angle he could look away to. Fucking oracles. It bought me a heartbeat where I ran for it, wheels over my head, but he swung blindly and with his size there was almost no need to aim. I managed a leap on a platform before I was swept away, but then the tail struck and even even tossing half a tower's worth of ice in the way only slowed it down. A repeat would be the end of this unfortunate magical adventure.

Following light like a current, through as many mirrors as there could be, and weaving power into the reflections. A dozen arrows loosed.

Akua used my work to craft her own, abandoning the undead to taint the light coming from the mirrors with concentrated cold. The Skein slowed, until he shook it off, but it was just long enough for me to manage the leap. The tail swung behind me, hitting only air. Flicker. Masego stood ahead of me, tracing runes that resonated like a gong and drove back the Skein when he attempted to cross behind me.

"Take it," I said, and tossed the wheels toward him.

It skidded across bones, and would have toppled him outright if he didn't hastily trace another rune to slow it down to a halt.

"Our entry gate," I said. "Make it lead to Malicia."

He wasted no time on backtalk, ripping away a string and tying it to the central axis as I cast a look around. The rat was trying to sneak through the back, but there would be none of that on my watch. I took the whole of my domain, ripping it away from three other Catherines trying to use it, and shaped it into a bolt that shot right at the Revenant as he leapt. It caught him in the chest, tearing through bone and flesh. Both it and the bolt fell into the void, and only then did I allow the others to play with my –our – domain again. A quick look told me Masego had tied the thread to a place on the lowest wheel, which was our signal to get the Hells out of here.

"Akua, back to me," I said, and yanked her.

I staggered at the impact, which was so much heavier than usual, but then she was at my shoulder again if looking none too pleased at the manhandling. She looked up, and her face fell.

"Catherine," she said, and her hand rose.

She shaped Winter, but it was too little and too late. The Skein fell down from above, shattering the wheels with a massive paw.

"You lose," the Revenant crowed.

The ground broke beneath our feet, and after that there was only the fall.

---

Matthew

How did the dead king ever kill this guy?

Javvies

Presumably there are limitations on Spool. The Dead King doubtlessly exploited them. Ie, if you can break the Skein faster than he can invoke Spool, it doesn't matter.

Yotz

Presumably, using Spool in it's original form in the space beyond localized pocket universe cut from the rest of Creation would either revert everything involved – including memories of participants – to the arbitrary savepoint, forcing the used to depend on supposed non-deterministic nature of the world's weave, or creating stable time-loop otherwise; or would compleately garble the mind of user, in essence putting him in catatonic coma before the Aspect was used.

So, savescumming is not an option beyond the boundaries of DK's virtual machine.

Yotz

Addendum

Just thought of it – the time loop in question may not be stable, but conditional – in case the Spool has a limited number of usages during a day. And I'm going to presume that number being 3, if only for the sake of simplification.

It would be something like that: you a going to do something and suddenly are hit with realization that your Aspect now has one less charge on the counter. Which leads to a conclusion that your next most usual course of actions would lead you to a situation where you was forced to use Spool.

Change to a less obvious thread is in order.

If there are two uses missing, that's a trap, and you should retreat. NOW.

If there are three uses missing – say your prayers, DK is after your arse, and it's time to go out in the blaze of glory!

Nafram

Spool is, as far as Akua can tell, "contingent to that place". Essentially, that means that either the Skein can only use it there, or it comes with a drastic drawback or limitation if used elsewhere. Granted, the aspect could have been stronger when the skein was alive, but even then it probably wasn't as mind numbingly powerful as in these conditions.

Then, there's also the fact that this is Neshamah himself we're talking about. He is likely capable of far more than The Woe can currently bring to bear by himself, and it's likely that he had other revenants ready to help him if need be against Skein. Therefore, the living Skein would've been weaker than he is in this fight, and his opposition far stronger and etter prepared

Lark

"Our minds were left untouched," Diabolist noted. "As was his. In broader Creation such a working would have shattered him upon the wheel, from all the cascade of innumerable events affected. The aspect was bastardized, made contingent to this place."

So presumably the Skein was much more limited in life, and is now limited to affecting the Threefold Palace.

xland44

Spool is apparently much weaker/different in the real world, back when the dead king fought him

stevenneiman

Spool is massively powered up in exchange for only working inside the Threefold Reflection. At least, that's my understanding.

Vortex

The Skein requires a specific environment to bring out his most overpowered aspects, as I understand it.

Miles

He created a scenario in which the skein could not survive no matter what happened.

Probably part of the way he became king as well.

Miles

So no matter how many times the skein used spool, he'd end up in a scenario where he lost.

Also afaict from this chapter he can only spool back a certain amount of time at once.

SadAdder

Spool most likely has a limited amount of uses and the dead king probably just tired the poor guy out by switching out his revenants.

Your power wouldn't really help you anyways if you were attacked by like 5 undead heroes/villains that were ripped from their storylines.

Javvies

The Skein is hax. Even for a Named. Temporal fuckery is problem.

Also, this is definitely the Dead King pushing Cat to embrace apotheosis or die.

Antoninjohn

Cat is getting a lot of experience from this, how many level ups will she get

naturalnuke

Two, one for killing Skien, and one for the time fuckery she has to put up with.

wyaldriddler

And then Masego uses the stolen Spool. :V

TheGamingWyvern

I don't think he used Spool. Rather, spool tried to undo the events that happened, but Masego forced his will to informed creation that wjat he Witnessed actually happened.

onedollargum

What wyaldriddler is suggesting I think is that Masego would somehow steal Spool and use it to undo the shattering of the artifact, thus resolving the cliffhanger.

TeK

Nice to see that bullshit is not a priviulage of Heroes.

Yotz

Why, dear – there's a significant difference between Noble and Righteous Heroic Gifts, and profane dirty haxxs used by abominable heathens!

Cold Cyberia

She's actually a superhero. Haven't you heard of the Spider-Cat?

Spider-Cat!

Spider-Cat!

Does whatever a Spider-Cat does!

Can she kill, a ratling?

No she can't, it's the Skein

Lookout!

She's the Spider-Cat!

---

Please, everybody knows she's Captain Callow, promoted or not.

grzecho2222

When Captain Callow throws her domaiiiiiiiiiiiiiin
Nothing very normal and sane shall remaiiiiiiiiiiiin

Jessica Day

**slow clap**

Miles

Really villains ought to have the best bullshit. That's why the Good Gods get to actively meddle.

Someguy

Now its Archer's Plan to come in play.

Miles

The shattered artifact opens up a path to malicia and archer. Archer loses her arrow. The arrow splits on the border of a portal and the halves kill malicia and the skein in 1 shot.

WuseMajor

I hope she can come out of this with some shreds of her morality and sanity intact. Otherwise, she'll be little more than a monster or another Fae Queen and, if her own nation doesn't rise against her, the Bard will be there with a bunch of heroes to see her destroyed. They'll likely all die in the process, but Cat's best assets in all the things she's managed is that she is quick on the uptake, very clever about thinking outside the box, and stubbornner than a million donkeys.

Becoming the Winter Queen in truth would give her a scary level of power, but it would hobble everything that she used to get herself here. It would ruin everything she wants to achieve. And Heroes know how to deal with powerful villains with hidden weaknesses, so what was left of her would quickly be bound or destroyed.

morrígan

Dammit. These chapters feel way too short.

So I assume that whenever the Woe got too close to Malicia or the Skein, the ratling would just Spool and send them back to square one? I wonder what the limitations are. Why couldn't he just Spool them back to the palace when they started fighting? Or is the aspect usable like that only in this particular part of Keter? Regardless, I'm sure you can chalk this all up to 'stupid seer bullshit.'

The narrative hasn't yet abandoned the Woe (they're far too entertaining), and we see yet another example of the self-balancing scales: the Skein pulls out some nonsense, and Masego pulls a brand spanking new Aspect out of Namespace to fight back. Nothing so blatant as a perfect counter to Spool, of course, because that fuckery is the provenance of Heroes only, but a weapon nonetheless.

And, while having Akua as a sort of 'magical collar Adjutant' is nice, I can't help but feel that Catherine is damning herself more and more with every inch of leeway she offers Diabolist. (Cat deciding to take Akua's hand last chapter was definitely alarming.) She's setting a dangerous prescedent by allowing Akua to draw on Winter like she is in this chapter – and as we all know, Catherine is Winter and Winter is Catherine. Though, I suppose she really should have seen it coming when Cat made the decision to bind her soul to her cloak instead of destroying it ... or at the very least blackboxing her a la Quirrel in Significant Digits if Catherine was really keen on keeping her around.

Regardless, when it finally comes time for Cat to kill Akua as per her binding agreement with Viv – signed in spit – I'd be lying if I didn't say I would feel bad.

Azure

I won't feel bad. Akua is a mass murderer who thrives on manipulation. Her little sob story to Catherine about her mom forcing her to kill her friend, was calculated to press just the right buttons for sympathy. Oh boohoo it's not Akua's fault it's all her mom's and Praesi society forcing her to become who she is. Vivienne pointed out exactly how manipulative she is. Catherine is giving Akua a very long rope, letting her think she's manipulating her way into the Woe's good graces.

DroughtBringer

Great chapter... only Regicide isn't looking the best at the moment.

burdi

the last one will be "Chaterine's Plan"

lqueenofblades1

Catherine*

Why is it so hard to spell it right after 3 and a half books and hundreds of chapters? Cat not Chat. Catherine not freaking Chaterine.

Yotz

Well, as much as I'd like to defend that "Chat" thingamajig, "Chaterine" rules all believable – or probable, even – lines of Devil's advocacy on my part.

And so, I am forced to draw the inevitable conclusion – the "Chat" thing is a bait, and the person using it is a master baiter.

lqueenofblades1

*applauds* I always appreciate a good pun 😊

esryok

My will is broken. Grats, ye wicked trolls:

<https://raw.githubusercontent.com/Esryok/practical-guide/master/catherine-foundling.user.js>

Jessica Day

Honestly, I'm starting to come around to Chat... This may be a losing battle lol

Jane

You know, I'm pretty certain that most people would need a few sessions with a psychologist after a fight like this one. Or just, you know, directly take SAN damage from the nature of reality/identity/self unravelling like this. I'm pretty certain the human mind wasn't designed to cope with something like this, outside of heavy denial. Good thing she's not human anymore, right?

That said, I wonder... Was it her redefining the essence of her construct to become weightless (such as saying, "No, my body is more like air than it is lead"), or was it her negating creational law to become weightless (saying, "Gravity doesn't *really* apply to me")? Either is useful, but the implications diverge rather significantly.

I'd make a joke about how she used her Ruling Authority in conjunction with her Divinity Field to petition the Administrator to create a Skill to deny creational law, but it'd be needlessly impenetrable to anyone who didn't know exactly what I was joking about, and not terribly amusing to begin with.

Incidentally, Ruin seems like the kind of aspect that makes a legend of a Name, even by the standards of the Named... A Story with the kind of Villain who can shatter reality itself is either a farce where everyone is just playing around, or a "The very existence of the world is at stake, and we need all of the biggest heroes holding nothing back to stop them" kind of deal. The Woes weren't exactly minor league before, but this is the kind of scale that puts them at the center of the continent.

daegone823

Still think Hakram's ability to both put down insurgents left and right, handle all the clerical work that no one wants to deal with, and still find time to take care of Chathrine's alcohol trumps this.

Similar to how Black became more vulnerable to the Sacker's probing questions about his plan for Procer without the captain at his side to remind him of who he is, and how scribe allows him to remain informed. I believe Hakram's powers make him a much more scary opponent similar to chancellor even.

I mean warlock does have an epic name and powers that makes him a dangerous entity him, mages have always been glass cannons. Once you take the brunt of there damage or get them monologue in this universe that means a fatal mistake.

Whereas Hakram has proven to be a critical member to the woe who is integral to the general cohesion of the group's success. If they lost Masego a crucial piece on the board would be lost, but if they lost Hakram's I think Chathrine would loose herself and the band would become sidetracked similar to how the loss of Sabah mean the loss of the heart of the Calamities. Without your heart how far can you go.

Jane

Ah, I just meant how such Aspects must affect the Stories that surround them in a more general way – like how you wouldn't normally expect Robin Hood to show up in a story dealing with Cthullu-esque horrors, or a team of Seraphim to be called upon to deal with some basic pickpockets.

The loss of Hakram would cause the administration of Callow to fall to pieces, true, but he and his talents wouldn't normally act as a beacon to the types of Heroes that deal in preserving the fabric of reality. Someone with an aspect like Ruin, though... Well, if the Woe weren't already facing off against Pilgrim and others like him, I would expect Heirophant to be the sort of figure they'd end up entangled with.

All Named are bigger than life, but Ruin seems big even by their standards, assuming I understand its usage correctly.

Leveret

Catherine's heart is an illusion. Sulia never cared about heart. It does not apply to Catherine.

Euodiachloris

What are the odds the clowder of Cats have added a little smoke and mirrors to the clockwork? In short, I think Skein may not be targeting what he thinks he's targeting.

Snowfire1224

While I recognize that clowder is a name for a group of Cats so is a glaring and I feel that might be more fitting.

Big Brother

I learned two new terms today. Thank you both.

Big Brother

New*

Jessica Day

Or is it "mew" 😊

Rook

Now we start to see the real bullshit potential of the winter mantle, potentially being even worse than the elves.

She decided her body was an illusion, she's now a shapeshifter. Decided weight doesn't apply to her, creation immediately folds like a deck of cards. Dimensional shards of alternate realities and timelines? No sweat, all of them simultaneously bridged by default.

In fact I have a sneaking suspicion that the only reason Catherine wasn't able to swat the skein into paste like an insect was her understanding of her own mantle being so shallow.

If she can bridge that many realities with the mantle she shouldn't need to physically run through the shards, realistically there's very little stopping her from existing in all of them at once and shifting through them at will. Even the void between them shouldn't be immune to her influence, cold and darkness aren't anything more than absence, no different from the void.

Honestly the Queen of Moonless Nights falling into the void is almost comical. It's like the ocean falling into a lake. Get your metaphysical shit together, girl.

RanVor

Keep in mind that while gravity might not apply to Cat, it's not true about Masego, and letting the Hierophant fall into a bottomless pit of nothing isn't really an option right now. Therefore, Cat must fall with him, if only to find a way to rescue him somehow.

Rook

If it was a generic pit of spikes I'd be worried for Masego, but a quasi-magical fraying of creation between alternate realities?

I'm more scared for that poor void. I wouldn't be surprised if he managed to dissect it for his research.

RanVor

On a second thought, how does the gravity even exist in there? Isn't it somewhere outside the Creation?

Argentorum

No one else is worried that CAT THOUGHT AKUA WAS HEAVY?

Jokes about a lady's weight aside, Akua should be spun out of stardust and ice, that she has creational weight here is a red flag. Yes it could be just the situation, but given that Cat had no problem working her ice magic across multiple shards then there's no reason that the teathed should function differently. It is, because Akua is probably MORE than a soul now. In fact it wouldn't surprise me to see that the next time Neshamah has her announced her name is "Growing Splendor" or even just flat out "Splendid One."

Beyond the obvious reasons that this is worrying, there is one sinister one lurking in the wings. The Fae trade rolls, sometimes one is the king, another a prince. And Each time Akua's *fought* since losing to Cat, it's been in with Cat's power, if not in her place directly.

In brief...

"All according to plan."

Yotz

Not so worried, as eager...

Adobe

Eh I just thought she was heavy because the Skein has attached himself to her and been dragged through as well.

1queenofblades1

Hey look it's me! Catherine-gravity-doesn't-apply-to-me-Foundling falling into a void under the force of gravity!

Yeah nope, something tells me the three other Cats have something up their sleeve, Masego uses Spool, or Cat does something with Archer. Not sure! Can't wait till Wednesday!

Also you guys realize if Catherine becomes the Dread Empress, she will be the (Dread) God-Empress? Speaking of which, if she's a goddess, what's stopping her from launching her own crusade? The 11th Crusade against the 10th Crusade sounds like an awesome fuck up.

Yotz

I'd like to just quote La Roche again and be with it, but the 11th Crusade – or, indeed, any form of holy war in Cat's name – seems unlikely at best. Even in the case of possible full apotheosis on Cat's part, to initiate such a calamity in the name of new never seen before goddess one will need a full-fledged faithful congregation and functional church to her name. And that even before we get into the legitimacy problems. There are two sets of well known and established gods in the world already, and even if they chose to remain silent, much less to openly condemn the pretender – and her declaration of divinity, which is an essential part of such holy war undertaking, would be met with widespread recognition of her arrogant insanity, and nothing more. More to that, even her own people and – more importantly – soldiers will join on that assumption. And while the Army – most of it – will follow her because she's powerful and successful general, to recruit to her cause someone at least passable as sane person would become an unachievable dream. Not to mention all-out global war with possible intervention of several world and otherworldly superpowers as a side dish of such declaration.

1queenofblades1

I was kidding...

Yotz

♥

Don't sweat it, dear.

Yotz

In case you were wondering, the quote in question wasn't going to be in appropriately mangled form, with Queen of Many Colors and None being replaced with the Black Queen.

It'd serve as a nice refrain to your joke, but alas, I've already used it while commenting on the creation of the Order of the Broken Bells. Such is a fate ;_;

cheeseyme1999

quick reply to this, but there are 2 types of gods in this universe. You have Gods, capital G, who made creation and who are worshiped and who you are thinking of. Then you have gods, lowercase g, whom exist on their own and are merely powerful and near-immortal. We know about 2 different lesser gods who've died in universe(the one Captain ate, and the one whose corpse the tower was built upon), and another 3 have shown up in the story(Winter King, Summer Queen, and Neshamah)

Cat, is coming to realize her status as a lesser god, not a greater God, as such your post doesn't really apply.

Yotz

Except her status as a lesser god would preclude the possibility of holy war in her name. Beside that, theological definitions is a thing of constant contention, and it is expected from a foul villain to declare his or her divinity – no one would bat an eye, but no one will want to join the possible “anti-crusade” out of religious obligations. Money, loot, patriotism – that's another matter completely, but faith... Without a church and cult nearly immortal comparatively very powerful person is just it – a powerful immortal person. Civilization with low level of culture may grant such person a status of “god” or “demigod”, but with average cultural level of Calernia pretender would be seen among general population as just a brazen cheat. Or insane, dangerous or otherwise. Now, in a dozen generations or so, the Story of the Black

Queen would grow enough to allow for creation of a cult, methinks – but that's a matter of a future.

edrey

so i think at this point the only way is that thief stole the artifact, put a copy at the same time and all that fight was part of the plan and cat's plan chapter is she killing malicia

Thea

Malicia won't die here. You don't kill her off in an arc that has nothing to do with her.

edrey

well, her meat puppet, you can read between lines, the point is thief saving the day, and next chapter some talk with malicia, i hope, malicia is a great character

Decius

Theif?

Archer. In the kitchen. With an apple.

MetruX

I do think Malicia is trully dying here. It can be a meat puppet, but... She was never a big player. She made herself to be, with the help of the Calamities, and she played well the game... But she was never the owner of the pieces and never had the power herself to make it work. As the ones who supported her are slowly being ground to dust, so will she fall, and this is the "better" time for her fall, the most dramatic and story heavy time.

grzecho2222

I think that Malicia used to be very good player, but being in the Tower is making her Stupid Evil. She acts way smarter in flashbacks and now she makes mistake after mistake (antagonizing your main potential ally for personal reasons is not very smart) and if you look at the Calamities, all of them avoid the Tower when they can. And Terribilis (who we know was one Emperor that seem normal) is also known as the guy who avoided the Tower

RanVor

The Tower is a trap. It lures Praesi with the hollow promises of power and greatness, keeping them focused on their schemes and unable to recognize the causes of their failures.

RanVor

The chapter quoted was actually Rise, not Fall.

grzecho2222

Well, it was also destroyed twice and given that Fate loves Rule of Three maybe Cat will wreck it for good

RanVor

Except if Malicia doesn't die here, Cat is beyond fucked, so she will. Probably. Possibly. You can never know.

AngryCactus

Spool is five letters. /masego

Yotz

Not in Callowan, Zeze. /Cat

BLH989

Technically it consists of four letters O, L, P, and S /Aoede

Alyxe

So many amazing comments but the phrases that stood out to me?

"The Skein had spoken four letters and wiped away all we had wrought.

Masego replied the same and the world shattered."

...Cat, Cat, Cat. We have GOT to work on your spelling. Spool is FIVE letters. -g-

Piotr Tokarski

So is Rooin!

Nima

Jesus christ. How the fuck the dead king beat this rat things. Skein is like the minority report precogs ten times more powerful with ctrl+z skill

Amoonymous

As others have noted (and it's stated in the story by Akua), in reality it would either have to wipe everyone involved's memories or he would be broken by Creation, the only reason it's so OP here is because of the dimensional space presumably set up by the Dead King (and perhaps by the Skein being undead).

Could have even been other limitations involving the Skein not being undead, that specific dimension instead of just any non-creation dimension, or who knows what else back when the Skein was living.

Aston

She's called Chaterine because she's loves to talk before the violence.

So which Cat fell down the hole?

grzecho2222

So Skein broke controls to the palace. Surely it won't make any mess whatsoever.

Malicia walking down corridor.

-Finally something works out. And soon I won't have to worry about this irritating girl ever again.-

Starts raining Cats from random doors.

Cold Cyberia

Next Chapter: "I've fallen into the abyss... only to realize I am the abyss."

Also, here's the link to vote for the guide: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Aston

I love how Catherine's main power is self-delusion.

Power of a god.

If I pretend I'm really powerful I can beat this guy!

I'm still a normal human girl who's an orphan with great friends.

Winter? Yes, it does get chilly. Close the door.

Yotz

Beware the Jabberwock, o Queen!

The jaws that bite, the claws that catch!

Beware the Jubjub bird, and skleen

The frumious Collarsnatch!

... and that's all I got to say about the chapter in general.

TeK

There is no Spool.

grzecho2222

Spooooooooooooooooool

Dimensional

So – The revnant in the heart of the maze, just destroyed the artifact that holds the whole thing together? I can't see that being super great for anyone in the palace – cause I think this means 3 different palaces suddenly try to exist in the same space.

I predict that this is all according to someone's plan.

Gunslinger

Wow this is a chapter I'm going to have to read multiple times because while Cat can wrap her mind around this abstractness my human one needs more time.

I wonder if Masego's aspect is also that effective because it's being used in a localized space

Phil zu Neide

My shipping of Cat and Akua steadily increases ^^

Exrot

I wonder how long it will take for Akua to steal herself a fae title and become a princess or duchess of winter and start the cycle of titles changinh hands all over again. Heroes would hate it as you either end up with a queen of winter who is a militant nutjob or one who plays everyone like puppets and breaks everything woth magic.

maresther23

This needs to be a netflix series, I want to see the shear eldrichness that is this fight with my own two eyes.

Snowfire1224

When I first started reading the series, it struck me how I could so vividly imagine it being a series, a feeling I never got from anything else not even books that went on to make great shows and movise. Especially with dark fantasy like GOT being popular, I could see it being well recieved.

superkeaton

Good girl, Cat. Mortal limitations are for mortal bodies, and you haven't been human in a very long time.

Moral, limitations, on the other hand... might want to keep an eye on those.

TameCurtsy

"Ruin" doesn't seem to fit Masego well enough. I get the need for an offensive aspect, but Ruin suggests destruction for no purpose.

My idea: "Excarnate".

1) It's a badass word. Just like "hierophant" and "vivisector" (which I learned thanks to PGtE.)

2) It fits the vivisection idea, as the removal of organs, leaving only bones. And it was used to preserve the bones of nobles (like Christopher Columbus) so it can translate over to divine acts pretty easily.

3) In a narrative sense, potentially used similarly/more creatively than Ruin. Like in this chapter, it is less that Zeze Ruined the aspect, and more that he separated it into its elements leaving it weaker, easier for him to study, understand, manipulate, and in the future, replicate.

4) "It was to destroy and devastate irreparably". The aspect is birthed from Black's Destroy, but it sounds just too similar to me. What's the difference?

5) Nice duality with "reincarnate", a high-tier Good power.

6) Warlock has "Imbricate" which is fancy. Zeze should get to be just as fancy.

Having said all that, I fully believe that Ruin could be a puzzle piece that may not feel right at the moment, but looking back I will realize that nothing could fit better. That narrative quality is my favorite aspect of PGtE (too obvious? Couldn't help myself.)

Dainpdf

Well, if the aspect doesn't fit what we know it may be that what we know is incomplete.

Also, to Ruin is not to Destroy. Destroy removes something from the world. Ruin just fucks with them.

TameCurtsy

Thanks for the response! And yeah, I hope it's something that gets filled in later. But if/until then...

The "It was to destroy and devastate irreparably" is from Catherine's internal rumination. So when Black Destroyed the Hellgate-gestalt, presumably it was destroyed and devastated irreparably.

I think the author is setting up Ruin as having the extra power that Destroy lacks, while also introducing more tension/Evil to Masego – both of which I'm down for – but it is not distinct enough of a verb and does not seem to entail the effect that it implies.

My second idea of the substitute aspect: Hack. Dual meanings: one is brutal destruction, the other is slightly anachronistic but complex. And it'd be funny if Masego was the Miracle Hacker.

---

> So when Black Destroyed the Hellgate-gestalt, presumably it was destroyed and devastated irreparably.

Masego was actually the one tasked with gluing it back together.

All things considered, I think this is the case where circumstances shape the Aspect, like with Discern – and like with Discern, while the Aspect is strongest in this specific situation, there's more to it than that.

A good example is Catherine after reclaiming the Name of Squire. Her prize after winning the first battle of Liesse are the Aspects of Take (three times per day allows to usurp magical powers from her opponents, like spells or even other Aspects, awakened by forcing an angel to resurrect her) and Break (once per day allows her to batter down an obstacle in her way, seemingly cannot be used directly on the opponents themselves, awakened by breaking the Pentinent's Sword), which sounds like just powers related to these particular events of the story. However, the story itself is about how she pulled the sword from the stone, and if you remember the epilogue to book two, Black says:

> For at least the first year, Catherine was likely to butcher and coerce her way through anything she perceived as an obstacle. She would do so mercilessly and without hesitation, too, because there was something utterly ruthless at the core of Catherine Foundling. Callowan defiance, perhaps, but married with something brutally pragmatic. Something that would use what it could not break and break what it could not use.

The pivot here wasn't even Catherine rejecting the Hashmallim's offer (killling everyone who trusted her and brainwashing everyone who didn't isn't exactly a fair deal). It wasn't her capitalizing on the symbol of a sword in the stone: William was the one who made it, and Cat already had a plan of making an angel resurrect her by the right of “a kingdom, an enemy and a claim”.

What mattered was that William thought it was a story only about himself, and so killing Catherine was a sensible solution. She, on the other hand, could see the big picture, and to change it she'd need to use what she could not break and break what she could not use. The form of the Aspects was decided by the obstacles she needed to overcome with their help, but she always was going to obtain two of them that would serve a similar purpose.

TameCurtsy

_____, great response! You came at this from a different angle and I like. Also excellent catch on Black's foreshadowing: one of my favorite things in this story is going back to earlier chapters and seeing the hidden depth behind innocent lines.

I finally looked up the definition of Ruin, read one that goes “reduce to ruins; fall into pieces” and realized that settled most of my problems with the word choice. Rereading the section, the Aspect could even be positioned like that.

So my issue is significantly smaller: Catherine, setting herself as as an Aspect authority, describes it as “Black's Destroy but with more horsepower and a different flavor” instead of “Zeze reduces things to pieces.” I agree that the Aspect was going to be destructive and the obstacles decided it was Ruin, but I think that the two definitions have a crucial, significant difference.

This sounds nitpicky even to me, but it's one of the rare times in PGtE where something did not fit and threw me out of the flow... not including the typos :P.

For the record, I don't think Black's Destroy should be the shadow Catherine sees in this: it should be the whole journey of walking through the Dead King's shards. Much more significant to Masego personally, he is surrounded by ruins, it culminates in seeing the most influential Creation-challenging ceremony, and even if he was there for Black's destroy, he would have been upset at the waste.

I would not be surprised however if the author proves me wrong and looking back, I see this section as fitting perfectly.

(Zeze repairs the gestalt, he doesn't repair the Hellgator – which Catherine would've preferred – so Black Destroyed it and devastated it irreparably.)

Cheers!

Dainpdf

Well, I assume if Ruin had been used on the array, instead of the thing being utterly destroyed, it would have been warped and fractured.

Ruin actually reminds me of the demons. It's what they do, more than destroying.

tweid

"It is a good cage," the Skein said. "You will not leave it."

oh my god is he referencing the meme

I think he is glorious

---

What meme? The only cage-related (and maybe fighting-related) joke I can think of at the moment is "three Named enter, a theoretically unlimited amount of identical murderfairies leave!"

Snowfire1224

"Despite all my rage, I'm still just a rat in a cage"

It's from a song.

Havak

Does anybody else think that Akua's master plan is to get Cat to climb the tower? That way she can become the Chancellor to Cat's Dread Empress? And then do the traditional Chancellor betrayal to take the throne herself which was her plan from the very beginning.

RanVor

If Akua really thinks Cat would ever let her be the Chancellor... Honestly, I expected better than this from her.

Havak

Why not? She already has one traitorous lieutenant, plus she would still have a leash on Akua so I can easily imagine Cat thinking something like "Better the devil you know and have total control over" or something.

Phil zu Neide

My idea is that Akua recognizes that Cat is above her in terms of power. While a free Akua would be very strong and might very well become a second Triumphant she would in the end still loose to the good guys. Cat on the other hand might be able to break the dichotomy between Good and Evil and change the rules of the game forever. Akua recognizes this and decides to support her because in the end loyalty to Cat could reward her handsomely.

Dainpdf

Huh. I guess that's it for Catherine. It was a good story... Oh, who am I kidding? This rat is in for a beating.

frolamiz

This combat was pure chaos, a perfect fit for Catherine's fighting style.

Chaos queen would fit her better =)

sengachi

I'm almost certain someone must have posted this in the comments before, but I found this song which is just too perfect for Cat and I have to share it: Tommee Profitt Feat. Svrcina – My Domain

Alegio

Cat is learning how to god, Masego undos realities and Akua gets a lot of winter to play with, while the Skein destroys the thing that keeps that dimensionall fuck up going on ...Nothing wrong can come out of this! 😊

Aston

Nothing bad ever happens in this story because it's all The Gods Playground.

Tohron

Every time a broken bell rings, a bastard-faerie eldritch abomination gets her wings!

Seriously, I've been wondering whether Catherine could grow wings like the other Winter fae could – seems that's just one of her many capabilities. Among other things, it could really speed up travel when she's taking gate-shortcuts by herself.

---

Chapter 44: Catherine's Plan

"From the example of the claimant Desolate we can learn this: no scheme is so perfect that it is invulnerable to the utter idiocy of an opponent."

-Extract from an untitled historical commentary on the War of Thirteen Tyrants and One, by the Imperial Concubine Alaya of the Green Stretch

There was only the void to keep track of now, at least. Wings burst out of my back and with a swift beat had me spinning sideways: I caught Masego by the collar, though he kept wriggling uncomfortably. If this had been freefall back in Creation, the howl of the wind would have forced me to raise my voice. No such troubles plagued our descent into nothingness, a silver lining on a situation I knew to be bad but vaguely suspected was much, much worse.

"Can you get us out of here?" I asked, wings beating behind me to keep us aloft.

Diabolist was nothing more than a shade on my back, kept there by the fact I willed it so. Whatever weight she'd had earlier, it was gone now.

"There is no here," Hierophant replied. "We are in between places that exist, within the contained entity that was the central chamber."

"And can you get us out of that?" I hissed.

"It is an egg, Catherine," he said. "We are within. If you want to leave..."

Crack the shell, I thought. Easier said than done: if that'd been on the table since the beginning, there would have been much less planning needed. Could've burst straight into the Skein's lair, seized the wheels and assassinated Malicia. Of course, we had eventually burst into that lair. It hadn't gone what one might call 'well', or to be honest anywhere near that neighbourhood. After the elven Revenant I'd thought that Neshamah's guardians were dangerous yet not beyond our ability to handle. I'd just been roughly disabused of that notion. Even Masego picking up his second aspect had barely managed to get the situation under control long enough for the rat to screw us over again.

"Where do I hit?" I asked Hierophant.

The heart of our working relationship, laid bare.

"Anywhere," he laughed.

I blew out a cold breath and allowed Winter to slither through my veins. Our exertions fighting the Skein had not tired it. It felt, if anything, even more eager than before. I was beginning to grasp the secret at the heart of the fae, slowly but surely: their power delighted in use, rewarded it. I'd inherited that without the tight constraints of a role in the colourful but uncompromising tapestry that had once governed the entire realm of faerie. Before the King of Winter hoodwinked me into killing and freeing him with the same sentence, anyway. Who knew what the face of Arcadia was, now that its ever-feuding courts had become one? I felt Akua's not-eyed follow the shape of the power I was shaping, but she did not take part. She had not spoken a word since my last summons, I only now noticed.

"Diabolist?" I said.

"I am reaching the limit," the shade murmured through tight lips.

I glanced back, the light of my translucent wings casting her scarlet eyes almost purple to my sight.

"Of what?" I asked.

"How much principle alienation I can take for you," Diabolist said. "My thoughts already grow... stilted. Forced down unproductive paths."

I blinked in surprise. Shit. It was true I'd been tossing around Winter like rarely before and my mind remained mostly my own, but I'd not... There'd been a lot of sweet talk about apotheosis, of late. Foolishly enough, I'd assumed that I'd somehow outgrown my old troubles. Not so, evidently. How had Akua even – ah, the chain. Had to be. This entire time, she'd been taking the plunge so I would remain mostly clear-headed. I could only admire her capacity to master her own thoughts in the face of Winter influence, if her limit was only now reached. My tongue burned with a half a dozen questions but they would have to wait for later. There were no physical markers for me to hit around here, so I didn't bother with anything too precise. Ice and shadow, woven into a spike that spun and elongated into something closer to a massive javelin. I shaped it carefully, and only when I was satisfied with the flawlessness of the working did I let it loose. For a heartbeat, I hit nothing. The javelin kept moving through nothingness unimpeded, its momentum undaunted by the distance.

Then I hit a wall, or something close to it.

Like an arrow hitting stone my working did little more than leave a mark on the surface, but there was an unmistakable notch of damage on the surface of the nothingness in front of us. Winter's span was a difficult thing to measure, for my mantle obeyed no rules but its own and sometimes not even that, but I had put much of myself into the javelin. Enough that, with Akua no longer serving as my filter, I could feel the creep of influence at the edge of my mind. Still indistinct whispers, for now. They would grow louder, I knew, until there was no difference between them and my own thoughts. Hammering through wasn't going to work. I'd come out of here spouting monologues, if not worse, and I wouldn't catch Malicia acting like the very same people she'd arranged the deaths of for decades over a nice cup of wine. I wasn't ready to call this a wash yet, and embracing the fullness of Winter was more or less that.

"Hierophant, I need you to pry that open," I said.

Masego frowned.

"Platform," he said.

Reluctantly, I snatched another wisp of Winter and crafted one beneath him before dropping his collar. He landed on his feet, if not particularly gracefully, but that wasn't what drew my attention. I could smell the sorcery on him. I always could, really, and given the amount of protective enchantments he layered on himself whenever we went into battle this should not be a surprise. But there was something different, this time. The magic was curving beneath his skin, deep into his body. My eyes narrowed and traced the shape of them with my mind, like a blind girl trying to see the face of another with my fingers. Some of that sorcery was going straight into his heart, keeping the blood pumping steadily. More was stiffening muscles, like those of his lower back. Keeping him standing up straight. And there were two little pinpricks, going into smaller glands above his kidneys. Forcing them to keep functioning, for whatever eldritch purpose. My studies of anatomy had largely been aimed towards killing or more recreational affairs, but I could recognize the sight of a man tinkering with his own body to keep it going when it was falling apart. He'd used powerful sorceries, today. Birthed an aspect, and used another. Back when I'd been the Squire and just that, even calling on a single such power would have wiped me out. A long overdue reminder that Masego, like the rest of the Woe, was still very much human. With all the messy, unpleasant parts that involved.

I kept my mouth shut anyway as he began to trace runes.

If I'd been a better friend, a better person, I might have taken the burden off his shoulders. Valiantly declared that we would find another way, that I'd take care of it somehow. But I was just me, and it was too late for last-hour gambits. I needed Malicia dead, and I needed it done soon. I'd have to trust that Masego would not irreparably hurt himself, and let him bleed for my objectives. Isn't it funny? I thought. How the higher you rise, the more power comes into the shape of others suffering for you. I was not smiling. But what was the worth of that, if I still kept silent?

"I can turn a scuffmark into a hole," Hierophant finally said. "That is, I'm afraid, the limit of what I can do. You will have to address the rest of the matter."

I nodded.

"Do it," I ordered.

He attacked the mark I'd left with what looked like twin thin needles of light, but to my senses felt more like a chisel and a hammer. One was heavier than the other, using the weaker one to pry open the wall. Masego's breath quickened, and I felt some of the spells on his body weaken. Like Diabolist, he was nearing his limit. The Woe were powerful, for our age. More than we had any right to. But if we could not hurt our enemy badly in the initial stretch of the fight, as a group we had a tendency to begin slowly losing. Too many shortcuts. Too many advances with weak foundations. We had rushed to power, and it'd made us fragile. I dismissed the thought, and sharpened my will like a blade as Hierophant finished making that final breach. A small one, less than an inch wide. But I could feel Creation behind it, and an opening was all I'd needed. I called on my domain, the night-realm within, and before it could fall over us like a curtain I wove the smallest sliver through the breach. Gave us a path into Creation.

Night followed.

My wings died behind me as I tread soft snow, the starless sky above spreading out forever. Masego stumbled and shivered as he joined me, but I guided away the worst of the cold with a thought and offered him an arm to lean on. I'd already asked too much of him today. Akua did not appear: she'd always been there. I simply had not acknowledged her presence, or so it felt like. And it was not her fae guise she wore, either. In here, I looked upon the same Diabolist I had fought in Liesse. Tall and splendid, all aristocratic arrogance and careless disdain. In here, all we had done to hide her true face fell away. Unlike Hierophant, she was not burdened by the touch of my kingdom of moonless night. She looked up at the pitch-black firmament and smiled, as if I'd taken her to a tea shop with a charming decor instead of the last remaining hold of the Winter Court. She hummed quietly, lips quirking. I knew that song.

Parts of it, anyway.

"The second is the longest, they said

You will walk under the restless dead

The hanged all crooning from the gallows –

To join them and rest in the shadows.”

Her voice was soft, and the pitch of the tune perfect.

“Diabolist,” I sharply said.

She turned to me, still smiling.

“Come, dearest heart,” Akua said, eyes alight with savage glee.
“Let us speak to the Empress of succession.”

My fingers clenched. I still remembered the conversation she’d had with Thief, not so long ago. She’d thrown the argument, as Vivienne had suspected, but the girl who’d once been Heiress never spoke with a single purpose to her words. Had she known I was a wake and listening, even then? Maybe. Or perhaps she was addressing that inscrutable audience that always listened, the unseen hand of fate that always sought to curb us to its purpose. She wanted me to be Empress. She wanted, perhaps, to be my Chancellor. And she thought Malicia’s death would be the birth of that story. Damnably, she might be right. I hoped, against my better judgement, that it was the flesh simulacrum of the Empress that awaited us. I was already in too many knife-fights with fate to pick yet another.

“Follow,” I said, and tugged Masego along.

I left no trace on the snow, and neither did Akua. She had become a creature of this place, by hook and crook. It was Hierophant, sagging and increasingly drenched in cold sweat, that needed the help. I propped him up until the itch in the back of my head had grown too much to ignore. I could feel it, the... depression in this place. As if the supports beneath my domain were uneven and it had sagged. I closed my eyes and withdrew it all. A sea unleashed, slowly siphoned back into my too-small frame, until the touch of the sun was on my face and my eyes fluttered open. We were back in the Threefold Reflection, at last. Green light fell down over us like a shower from a sun pit towering high above, kept functional through all hours of the day by a cunning set of mirrors. This was a salon, by the looks of it, with long resting couches and low tables filling most the place. There were half a dozen doors out of the room, likely meant for servants more than the guests.

“The palace still seems... whole,” I said.

“I would assume the three layers to be completely separate now,” Akua replied. “This felt like Creation to you, yes? Likely this the the original Threefold Reflection that was built before the dimensional overlay was set.”

"So no more shunting," I said. "Good news. Much as I hate to ask, what plan are we on now?"

Diabolist laughed.

"I'm afraid there is none left," she said. "None that I can remember, at least. This particular sequence of events was entirely unforeseen."

Shoddy planning, that. Given how frequently we fucked it all up, not counting that as an option was just bad form on our part.

"You two are done fighting for the day," I finally said.

"I am still conscious," Masego muttered.

"Takes a little more than that to be qualified for a throw down with the Empress' finest," I replied

Assuming we even found them.

"Diabolist, I'm going to find us a way out," I said. "Try to find the others and prepare for the worst."

"I would be of use to you, when facing Malicia," the shade replied.

"You should be more careful about what songs you sing," I replied flatly.

Masego's glass eyes moved from one of us to the other, his face bemused.

"What songs?" he asked.

I met Akua's now-scarlet eyes and found a thread of amusement in there. That song... The Girl Who Climbed The Tower, Black had called it. There were still many things about it I didn't understand. I'd first heard Robber humming it, but when I'd eventually asked him about it years later he'd admitted he recalled singing an entirely different song. It was not for everyone's ears, it seemed.

"Don't worry about it," I told him, then glanced up.

I could roll the dice with trying to find a way out of the pyramid on foot, but that carried risks. There might still be traps, even without the wheels being a factor. This would do. Window was probably warded, but then I still had the traditional Foundling skeleton key of punching things really hard. Wisps of Winter coalesced behind me, translucent wings coming into being, and I shot up quick as an arrow. My fist smashed into the green glass with my full weight behind it, but I let out a yelp when it bounced off harmlessly and I hit the damned thing like a bird hitting a window. Godsdamnit. Down below, I heard Masego cough out a pained laugh. The glass was set in that pale stone I recognized from outside, with discreet carved runes connecting them. Fine, I could work with that. Wings batting behind me unconsciously, I formed my fingers into a wedge and struck at the stone. I'd aimed well beneath the runes, so I ripped my way through without too much trouble. After that it was just a matter of digging around the boundaries, until I tossed down a stone-encircled glass pane and flew up through the opening. I landed under the noon sun of Keter, while in the distance the plume of smoke from the fires we'd set began to disperse. They'd put out the fires, then.

Look down into the pit, I saw the other two awaiting me. Akua could make her own way up, but Masego would need a little help. Another sliver of Winter had a thick rope of shadow slithering down the pit. Hierophant eyed it sceptically, until an exertion of my will had it tying around his waist. I dragged him up, hoist by hoist, careful not to go too quickly and smash him into the walls. My fingers closed around the back of his neck, and with all the gentleness I could manage I took him out and put him down. Gods, it was like trying not to hurt a baby bird. People were so fragile. The three of us stood under true Creation sunlight for the first time in too long, Akua and I pristine but Masego the picture of exhaustion. He'd lost weight, but there was quite a bit of difference between shedding the pounds – unhealthy as his manner of doing it had been – and being in good shape. We were maybe halfway up the southern slope of the pyramid, facing the Garden of Crowns and the edge of the Silent Palace. The gardens and colonnades below showed no sign of Malicia, but then I'd not expected that to be so easy.

"We have an escape route in case this all blows up in our face," I half-stated, half-asked.

My eyes were on Akua, making it clear who was meant to answer.

"That is correct," she replied. "Though it was expected that true disaster would force us to flee through Arcadia."

"Then fall back there," I said. "The others will know the way?"

"By now, all their memory blocks should have ended," she replied.

Good enough, given that I couldn't afford going around fetching everyone. Adjutant I might be able to find, but who the Hells knew where Archer was? Thief was the last out in the wilds, and to be honest there was no chance of me finding her in the city if she didn't want to be found.

"Be safe, you two," I said, and grimaced immediately.

I was painfully aware that the words being spoken in Keter made them even more a platitude than usual. There was no safety here, only the Dead King's whimsical sufferance.

"That seems unlikely," Masego noted. "But I shall attempt it nonetheless."

I squeezed his shoulder before sending him off. It would be slow work for him to descend the pyramid's slope, but hardly impossible. Diabolist could handle herself, and the steady look I gave her before she left made it clear she was supposed to ease his exhaustion as much as possible. All that was left now was to somehow find Malicia, crush her defences and take her life. All without breaching the unspoken rules the Dead King had set about what would constitute breaking his hospitality. I doubted Neshamah would truly mind a spot of murder even in his personal backyard, but that wasn't how this worked: I had to maintain a certain level of deniability. Which wasn't looking great, considering the closest thing I had to a plan at the moment was 'murder in broad daylight'. The Skein and the Spellblade should no longer be a part of this, at least. The Revenants would remain stuck in their little kingdoms. That left the Empress' own personal guard.

The Sentinels hardly scared me, at the end of the day. Well-trained or not, they were only soldiers. But there was a more than decent chance she'd have Wasteland mages with her, and that was a different story entirely. I'd killed more than a few of those, over the last few years, but that'd been before I'd become... this. Wards mattered to me a lot more than they used to, and I wasn't meeting a cluster of casters in the middle of a chaotic battlefield: these sorcerers would likely have been told everything the Empress knew about what I could and couldn't do, including vulnerabilities. Black had made a career out of killing enemies much stronger than him with careful planning and preparation. I did not intend to end up on the wrong side of his teachings. Power clapped in the distance, a quick spike followed by smaller workings. I cocked my head. Northern slope of the pyramid, maybe a little further. A trap? Maybe. Or a distraction. But I couldn't afford not to look, could I?

With gritted teeth, I set out for my little talk with the Dread Empress of Praes.

---

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

letouriste

oh! i forgot to do this! thank you:)

DroughtBringer

This chapter felt much too short, though I can't wait for the end of this arc... which might be next chapter.

Rook

"Catherine's Plan"

A complete lack of one, to absolutely no one's surprise

IDKWhoitis

I'm still betting she says "All according to plan" at the end of this. While Malica and Dead King may see through the bullshit that is, the Bastards Above and Below still love shit like that.

Charles

Punch things hard enough to force a hole into Reality. And really, when has any other sort of plan worked out well for her. Even as it is no longer one of her Aspects Struggle is the line by which she lives her life.

Cicero

Reminds me of the Order of the Stick's old fall back plan: "Run Away."

Of course, in Cat's case it's preach much the complete opposite: "Turn myself into an abomination of a half magical construct allowing myself to continue fighting when I should be dead – then punch things until they break."

Euodiachloris

The short version: "make myself more difficult to deal with, then Falcon Punch something". 😊

Raved Thrad

"FOUNDLING PUNCH!" 🤪

Raved Thrad

What with all the talk further down the page of Catherine Climbing The Tower, I bring you the climactic scene from Foundling Densetsu: The Legend of Black Queen Catherine:

Catherine: (to Vivienne): "Vivienne Dartwick, from today forward, you are the Black Queen." (facing off against Malicia): "Malicia! I'm sending you to hell if I have to drag you there with me!"

Malicia: "No! I won't let my dreams die!"

Catherine: "FOUNDLING PUNCH!!"

Vivienne screams "Catherine!" as Cat's fist hits Malicia's face in a titanic impact; the resulting blast wave levels the palace.

Later, amid the rubble, miraculously undamaged, they find the Mantle of Woe...

Jarthon 1

The Foundling Gambit is the best gambit.

IDKWhoitis

Dead King : "Note to self, ward walls as well as windows. Also, replace window Catherine broke. Hmm, maybe I should consider letting Catherine go rampant for a little while longer to test Anti-Ranger protocols."

imagesbe

I remain somewhat confused about what all their incredibly convoluted planning actually did. I mean, they got through, but did their planning actually have anything to do with that?

And I doubt Cat will kill Malacia here. I suspect that the best she'll accomplish is to drive her out of Keter. Which does accomplish her short-term goals nicely.

IDKWhoitis

All the planning was chaff, to distract the Skein. The skein also seems to only be able to counter act the main plot line, either by programming (since he is a necrotic construct) or by weakness in the Aspect he uses. By throwing so much stuff at once, things slipped through, like Archer. Neither the Skein nor the Thief of Stars was able to see her, or reference her. An elemental part of the 17 plans could be that Archer does literally nothing for 3 hours and 4 minutes, thus remains invisible in the plotline (What we and other meta-actors can see).

Jane

Well, it forced Skein to let them into his chamber? That might not have been possible, if he could have stopped them at an earlier juncture. Showing up without Hakram or Archer might have also made Skein take them more lightly, preventing him from, like, finding a way to shunt them into a pool of lava – directly into it, so that the lava flowed into them, not like that readily escapable trick with the spikes. Plus, we haven't seen Archer – she might have found her way to the Empress already, without the party or Skein knowing.

We don't know how things would have gone without the plans, necessarily, but it all ended up breaking the wheel that kept them from the Empress, albeit not through a means they envisioned.

Jane

She's pushing the side effects of Winter use off onto Akua? That's... A whole lot of different things. Brilliant? Monstrous? Strangely intimate? That's certainly one way to extend the use of her powers, though... I wonder if there are unexpected costs, though, like giving the other side a back door into your mind. And I wonder if she can do that with anyone stuffed in her cloak, or if they have to be a brilliant and willing mage. If there aren't any costs beyond a suitable partner, though, it must be awfully tempting to add a few dozen ghosts to her cape so that she can use Winter freely... ..Though, that sounds like the start of a Story that ends with, "and then she was torn to pieces by her own angry ghosts".

I wonder if Akua was really singing the song (which would suggest that she had heard it as well, which has interesting implications), or if, like Robber, Cat was hearing a song which Akua was not singing, which would seem to suggest that something is telling Cat that she's walking further down a certain tower-scaling path.

Idly, I kind of wonder what Vivienne's response would be to Cat actually becoming Empress, and what thoughts she might have regarding how a Hero ended up serving the Empress, whose predecessor she revolted against to free her homeland, which (presumably) would no longer be breaking away from the Empire.

IDKWhoitis

If there is no Tower at the end of this (because that thing is not surviving Cat's Takeover), I think Thief still counts this as a win.

werafdsaew

Akua made a serious attempt on the Tower and so I'm pretty sure she heard the real thing.

boballab

It goes back to when Cat saw those multiple paths to break the trap Akua set. During that scene only one of the paths led to Cat winning and at the end of it Cat was humming "The Girl That Climbed the Tower" and Akua was watching.

I/General Foundling/the Tolltaker/the White Knight rose, and shoved steel through her throat.

—

Book 3 Chapter 65

In the next Chapter when Cat faces Akua, Akua lets Cat know she knows that she was forewarned and the only way to know that was to have been watching Cat. In this case the spying probably included sound and she heard Cat humming the song.

Yotz

Wings, getting high on power... where did I saw this...
Ah, yes!

Desperado

Godsdammit Masego

Anon

Hmm...odds on Killian being in Malicia's cadre of mages?

I certainly wouldn't put it past the Empress.

Javvies

I thought Killian was still with the Fifteenth.
Do you have a location for Killian leaving?

Stephen M (Ethesis).

I'd love to see Killian as a part of winter's court.

Probably not going to happen, I suspect she has exited the story, but would have been an uptick

Javvies

Interesting.

Cat, murder in broad daylight might not be the best plan, but Archer and Hakram are still in play somewhere. Also, Malicia's mages will be operating with incomplete and out of date information.

Technically, Thief is still around too, but she's incompetent at murder, apparently, so much so that it's a running in joke for the Woe.

Huh.

Maybe it'll be Thief that takes Malicia – Keter's a helluva place for your first time.

Aram

The first step is hardest, they said to her.

You will have to walk through fire.

It will burn away what you once were,

And always devour whole a liar

The second is the longest, they said

You will walk under the restless dead

The hanged all crooning from the gallows –

To join them and rest in the shadows

They say the third step is the cruelest,

Walk when the moon is at her clearest:

Love ends with the kiss of the knife,

Trust is the wager that takes your life

Yotz

...which makes me think. About "when the moon is at her clearest" and the concept of Moonless Night.

Antoninjohn

Cat can always send in a ice (shadow) clone, it will even be linked by Winter with her so she will get it's memory when it dies

TeK

So, Masego out of the game, but they had succesfully destroyed the wheel.I wonder how Cat will go about the next part of the plan, which is "fail horribly and die".

Someguy

They looted the Wheel i think.

Novice

Skein destroyed the wheel at the last second.

burdi

maybe warlock with malicia, who know i don't think malicia not foresee cat approaching the dead king

Snowfire1224

I was wondering why Cat wasn't getting any effects of winter on her mind. That Akua is taking it for her is rather helpful of her.

And yay. The Girl who Climbed the Tower is back. I've been waiting for it to return for a while especially since Cat is trying to kill Malicia.

Rook

What? No. The Queen of Callow did not intend any harm toward the Praesi delegation, the intention of the visit was purely for the sake of peaceful negotiations. It is a deeply unfortunate tragedy for the Dread Empress to have tripped and fallen repeatedly onto the Queen of Callow's sword, and the people of Callow send their heartfelt condolences to those grieving the passing of the late Empress.

Jessica Day

Then she ran into my knife. She ran into my knife 10 times.

Snowfire1224

The fact that I could see that argument being made by praesi in an imperial court doesn't help her case much.

What does help is that that is pretty funny and I'd like your comment if I had an account.

TeK

Dread Empress alive and well, she's just taking a vacation, as a Dead King undead Revenant.

NerfContessa

Hehe he, nyeahwhen I first read this, I 2as really sure the empress. Would Die within at most 2 chapters, and she would have to fight lack and akua to avoid climbing the tower herself.

frolamiz

Now, we can think about the true question. Akua would have been Dread Empress Magnificent, first of her name. What will Catherine be?

And if they usurp the Tower, the best way to keep Thief on board would be to have her steal it. I'm sure she would do it gladly. Maybe after getting rid of the Demon, because we don't know what would happen if she where to store it with her aspect. That would also give her a perfect Pivot for a transition. Maybe Thief of Kingdoms? 😊

Iqueenofblades1

Clearly Cat will be Dread Empress Accidentally. Because that literally describes her story from beginning to now 😊

Yotz

Well, after Cat accidentally the Tower, they really wouldn't have any other choice in this department.

Cold Cyberia

I'm partial to Dread Empress Insolent myself, though I think Dread Empress Victorious has been floating around for a while now.

Euodiachloris

Dread Empress Damnation (I so didn't want this; fuck my life and fuck you guys for making it happen). ;P

Raved Thrad

I think "Dread Empress Fuckitall" makes for a wonderful fit 😊

Jessica Day

Dread Empress Vengencia, first of her name. Because you can take the queen out of Callow but you can't take the Callow out of the queen.

John Laing

Dread Empress Foundling. Political philosophy: "Hey, you kids! Don't make me come down there!" Appoints one of those sapient tigers as regent, to handle all the ridiculous Praesi etiquette involving parties and assassination attempts and whatever, spends a lot of time haranguing Akua and Masego into inventing a more elegant (i.e. no blood sacrifices) method for improving the long-term productivity of farmland, something that any Legion mage could learn.

H.

There's been a few threads in the subreddit speculating about regal names for Cat.

I like Dread Empress Victorious. But Dread Empress Callowan has a certain "fuck you" about it as well. Dread Empress Woeful is available as well, if she wants to reuse the name of her antivillainous band.

TeK

As the fandom lost it's usual ritual of guessing the Name Cat will get, now it slowly getting a new one – guessing the name Cat will get, when she'll become Empress. Given how the Name thing turned out, I'm pretty sure Cat is not the next Empress.

Komploding

Just out of curiosity, do we think that Cat is hearing the song internally and projecting it onto others or are the others unaware they're singing it? The difference this could make would be between the story coming from and being lead by Cat or the story coming from the outside Cats control and Cat being trapped in it.

Jessica Day

I was wondering that very same thing.

burdi

black knew this song, so its not only in cat's head and its looks like aqua know it too so maybe everyone that had the quality to be empress or emperor heard it its more like the tower calling them

Komploding

I agree with that, I think it's known to those that had the opportunity and potential to climb the tower. It's not confirmed that Akua knows the song, it could have been another instance like with Robber, also another reason she couldve known it would be that her soul is bound to winter which is essentially Cat now.

Also is it just a call or could it be a stronger pull, this could be part of the reason why villains backstab the emperor so much if the tower holds such heavy sway over them. That has less basis and is me just running with a thought though.

TeK

So some people are theorising that "Climb the Kidney, loot the Tower" is not uniquely attuned to Cat, but rather something that every claimant hears? What? It's "Girl" who climbed, not man, woman and/or undead abomination. My guess that it's some prophesy bullshit, we are long overdue to that cornerstone of fantasy tropes, in the story about tropes.

mavant

I still think they should have just let malicia win the bidding war.

Yotz

I have a suspicion that main part of Malicia's bid will be a direct threat to, if not just straight invasion of Callow. And DK will be oll klear with it, because from his point of view that would be just another strike on the bar, forging a new future for Cat in the crucible of desperate war.

Agent J

If they did, the Dead King would be marching on Callow as well. Her whole gambit was to sic him on her enemies, both external and internal, and she'd have sold him half of Calernia to see it done. Likely, more. Letting Malicia win the bidding war was a no go.

Nafram

I still can't see Malicia dying here. Her dying for real would, to be honest, have disastrous consequences for Catherine. If she were to now become Dread Empress, she would have to deal with backstabbing from the entire Praesi nobility, the entirety of the crusade, the undivided attention of all Heroes post Dead King intervention and a very pissed Warlock showing up after she personally killed his second best friend in the world. It would also wreck her relationship with Black, and if he is against her, so are the Legions, and the Orc tribes...and probably the Goblins as well.

No matter how powerful she has become, or how many Deus Ex Machina she can pull out of her ass, there is a reason why Cat had to resort to Neshamah of all people, she cannot deal with most of those issues by themselves, let alone all at the same time.

So, this is either going to be a flesh simulacrum (which would explain how the Empress got there so quickly) or Cat is going to end up sparing Malicia.

That's my take on the situation at least

Javvies

Black and Malicia have already broken.

It's most apparent/ irrevocable at Akua's Folly, when Black broke it. However, it goes back to early on book 2, Villainous Interlude: Coullisse. Malicia sided with the High Lords backing Tasia Sahelian, in their push to roll back some of the Reforms, reflecting restrictions on the Tribes and penalties for not answering the Tower's call under Nefarious.

The gears in Amadeus and his Name started turning when he couldn't talk her out of it. Malicia started going back to the old ways that keep failing – Black is basically the embodiment of the new way, he invented the new way and it works. Returning to the old ways is a betrayal of everything Black believes in and his goals.

Also, I suspect Malicia's hand behind the assassinations of Istrid Knightsbane, and the others during the battle outside Akua's Folly.

It may not be provable, but I suspect that Black had his suspicions – Scribe and Assassin probably do too.

Warlock probably isn't going to turn on Cat if she takes out Malicia. He may like Malicia, but Cat basically saved Black from the mentor sacrifice/ avenging arc he was setting himself up for. Warlock might not be exactly happy about Malicia gets taken out/replaced by Cat, but he's probably going to tolerate it.

Especially if Masego is backing Cat. Warlock and Masego are both largely indifferent to politics and Good and Evil, they care about the Magic and the Knowledge.

—

At any rate, if Cat kills a puppet, Malicia is back in Praes and can turn her forces/ the High Lords against Callow long before Cat and company can get back.

If Cat kills Malicia, then Cat can get back before Malicia's loyalists can be turned against Callow, and Praes will be headless, and devolve into a whirlwind of backstabbing as the High Lords try to climb the Tower. They'll be too busy to go after Callow.

Tohron

That's forgetting the third possibility of Cat strong-arming Malicia into some sort of agreement. That could go as far as Cat becoming Empress with Alaya as Chancellor, or just amount to a single set of terms to give the Dead King (to avoid a bidding war) and the cessation of harassment along the Callowan border. A protracted fight would seriously hurt them both, which is an incentive to come to terms.

Javvies

Except Malicia is not a combatant.

In an actual fight, Cat curbstomps Malicia. Malicia is a soft power expert – she's a mastermind/manipulator/influencer type. Cat's nowhere near Malicia at using soft power, but soft power is not Cat's greatest strength – applied hard power is.

When Malicia wants people dead, she gets somebody else to drop the bodies. Cat is going to create the corpses herself.

Oh, sure, there probably are other people with Malicia, plus the Sentinels, but unless there are a bunch of top quality mages or Warlock, they can't do much more than briefly slow Cat down – if they know Cat is there and have the time to act. They wouldn't have had time to get fancy with their ritual prep to deal with Cat, so they'd largely be limited to things they can do without needing a big ritual.

Malicia probably doesn't have all that many people with her – it wouldn't make a difference if the Dead King wanted to kill her, plus bringing too many people could be considered an insult, and the more people Malicia brings, the more widely known it would be that she's left the Tower.

MetruX

People have already spoken to the other points, so let's see to this: there is no guarantee that she becomes the Dread Empress by killing Malicia. It has happened plenty of times before, just like when someone not Squire kills the Black Knight, when someone not the new Tyrant kills the last one. It becomes a vacancy that people kill and die so it get's filled. But, even if it did, there would be no Crusade after Dead King intervention. Crusades are not things that last forever, and all of these Heroes would be either dead or going back to deal in their own stories, so really, those are not true concerns if things go according to plan and she kill the Empress without unforeseen consequences. Obviously things are not going according to plan, but something completely out of the blue needs to happen to change these points.

Satan

Catherine is like an angel of contrition for Akua

---

Chapter 45: Ambush

"As the Bellerophans had not redrawn their war maps in over a century, their expedition against Penthes instead began with the sack of three outlying Delosi towns, one of which was walled and whose watchmen rebuffed the assault of the army. The Republic ultimately withdrew a month later after capturing a Stygian trade caravan carrying a handful Penthesian goods, announcing the unequivocal success of its punitive expedition to the great confusion of the Exarch of Penthes, who was still mustering her army over three hundred miles to the north."

– Extract from 'A Pack of Squabbles, or, A History of Internal League Warfare' by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

If it was a distraction, then it was a good one – not that I'd expected any less from Malicia. Boots scraping against the faded stone, I crouched at the edge of the pyramid's slope and studied the silhouettes below. Twenty-one, all in all. Ten faceless and genderless soldiers in steel with masks of black wrought iron, the Tower's own personal guard. The Sentinels, I'd been taught was their name. I was unsure of how hard a fight they'd be able to give me, but they were not a young Praesi institution. If even half the the hundred Tyrants who'd once commanded them had bothered to teach them a nasty trick or two, they would not be easy meat. The silent guard formed a ring of steel, broad tower shields up as they protected the remaining delegates. Those, I thought, would be the source of the real trouble if there was trouble to be had. Of the eleven remaining strangers only two wore armour and it was clearly ceremonial. Not unlike the colourful scales I'd known Diabolist to wear before she claimed that very Name. Those two were Soninke, men and too flawless to look upon to be anything but Wasteland highborn.

I dismissed them anyway. The warlocks would be the real threat here, not swordsmen no matter their skill. And there were mages among the delegates, I could tell as much at a glance. None of the other Praesi wore a weapon heavier than a long dagger, and though their robes were an ornate riot of vivid silks the colours were not enough to hide the discreet shimmer of runes woven into the fabric. Defensive enchantments, though without Masego around I had no real way to know of their purpose. What I did know was that while silk was one of the fabrics most apt to imbibe magic without spoiling, there was only so much sorcery any fabric could take. Against another sorcerer, defensive enchantments were a significant advantage. Against me, it'd be trying to hold back the sea with a wooden bucket. I'll still have to hit them hard, I thought. Smaller wisps of Winter will just be ignored, if I'm to strike at them it'll have to be by surprise and with overwhelming force. Admittedly my favourite kind of fights, on the rare occasions I managed to have them.

One person stood out from the rest, and the sight of her had me tightening my grip on the pommel of my sword. The woman was Soninke and young. No more than twenty, by the looks of her, and though she was of plain appearance every other delegate around her behaved like sunflowers turning towards the sun. Her dress was tastefully understated, as was the silver jewellery adorning her neck and wrists, but there was no mistaking who that was. I wasn't Malicia in the flesh, or more accurately it was but not her flesh. A simulacrum, then. I felt a sharp edge of relief at the confirmation of what I'd always believed to be the most likely reality. And yet part of me was disappointed as well. There would have been chaos, in slaying the true Malicia, but opportunity as well. If I'd been able to force a war of succession on the Empire without getting embroiled myself... No point in whining about it. It was what it was, and in this case the presence of a mere flesh puppet might be a blessing. Said puppet was awake and alert, I saw, and with good reason.

It had just almost died.

I'd arrived too late to see it happen, but just from the lay of the Praesi I could get an idea of what had taken place. Just as they'd left the Threefold Reflection through the nearest gate and taken the avenue into the tall colonnade they now occupied, someone had taken a shot at the Empress. The shimmering panes of light around the flesh puppet told me exactly why it'd failed, and pointed at the most likely suspect for the attempt: Thief. It couldn't be Archer. She had arrows that'd go right through most sorceries, and even if she'd failed to make a kill at a distance she would have closed in and carved away at the Sentinels. Adjutant had not aspect that would work for a quiet ambush, and I'd just left behind the remaining two. No, it had to be Thief. The Skein had hinted, back in his lair, that she might try to kill Malicia with the same blade of moonlight she'd stolen from the Spellblade. That was my guess: she'd approached under cover of her aspect, placed her shot and immediately retreated when it failed to breach the Empress' protections. I couldn't be sure whether that failure was because the Praesi wards were particularly strong or because the tool employed had not been a good fit, and that was worrying.

They hadn't seen me, at least for now. I'd not woven glamour over myself yet, afraid some of the mages would be sensitive enough to such powers it would effectively announced my presence even if they couldn't see through it. The moment the delegation caught scent of me, my bet was that they'd turtle up behind heavy wards and make enough of a racket that the Dead King's people would have to come and take a look. If that was allowed to happen, the game was done. Pushing any further would break the unspoken boundaries Neshamah had placed on this little lark of ours. Was Thief still around? My guts said yes, but I couldn't count on it. She might still be acting according to a plan I didn't know.

Which was the point of all this, I supposed. We'd filled the Skein's sight with so many of those there'd been no telling where the rest of the Woe were or what they were up to. At the unfortunate cost of my being kept in the dark concerning those matters as well. I set aside the thoughts for now, eyes on the Praesi delegates. They were on the defensive for now, the Sentinels using the cover of the colonnade to form a decent holding position while the mages layered enchantments, but they'd get moving soon.

If I were in Malicia's shoes, right now, I'd be worrying more about Archer than Thief. The longer she remained in the open, the higher the risks she got an unexpected arrow through the throat. If I wanted to have a decent swing at the Empress, I needed to be close by the time they set out. Which left me with the task of moving unseen next to a cluster of highly-trained, professionally paranoid and recently ambushed Wastelanders. While wearing armour. In broad daylight. With no real cover to speak of the moment I left the upper reaches of the pyramid. This was not a recipe for success no matter how you looked at it, but at least I was wearing mail instead of plate. Pretty weak, as far as silver linings went, but I'd take what I could get.

Pulling the Mantle of Woe tight around me, since it was colourful but at least not actively shining under the sun, I began to make my way down. Obliquely, or as close to that as was possible. There were open grounds between the colonnade and the end of the Threefold Reflection proper, and crossing those unseen was a fool's errand. No, the longer I thought about it the more obvious it got I'd have to roll the dice on my ability to predict where the Praesi would be headed and lay my ambush there.

There were only so many places they could go, I mused as I moved from stone to stone. There was another palace up ahead, but I wouldn't put my money on them going for it. There'd be another Revenant inside, certainly, but it didn't look like the most... hospitable of places. The fluid obsidian structures were unpleasant to look at in some primal way, though it was the outlying decorations that would give the Praesi pause. Small channels had been dug into the stone in arcane symbols, lit up by what appeared to be liquid flame. The palace flicked with shifting shadows even under sunlight. If they went through there, I'd kill them all. They'd be forced to take narrow fire-walled paths with plenty of cover for me to ambush from. Unless the Revenant was already in place and ready to intervene, the outlying parts of that palace would be a perfect killing floor for me. Malicia herself wasn't a military tactician of any renown, but she was hardly a fool. It'd be one of the other two paths she took.

The first would be a gambit on her part. The colonnade and almost temple-like promenade surrounding the pyramid did have a path going around towards the open plaza where the Hall of the Dead and a horde of minions would be awaiting. If the Empress made it there safely, she was out of the woods. I couldn't snatch her out of the Dead King's grasp without screwing all of this up. On the other hand, I was rather hoping that was the option she'd take. I was already near to the last third of the pyramid, and all it'd take was dipping out of the sight around the corner for me to slip ahead of her party in the colonnade. I'd already begun angling my descent to be a step ahead if that was the choice she made. Malicia had to know, however, that it was a mostly open space and most the Woe were still on the prowl. Forget Thief, but if Archer came across her there'd be blood on the floor. Quickest path to safety, but arguably the most dangerous.

The second path was a retreat. Not back into the Threefold Reflection – though that was possible, if exceedingly foolish – but towards the lower rungs of Keter. We were all in the highest ring at the moment, surrounded by the same rampart Athal had taken me to earlier through the secret passage. The Empress could head for those walls, and from there either count on the Dead King's soldiers being there and providing protection or journey further down and away from the area she knew the Woe was roaming. I'd had the advantage of height over her earlier, so I already knew there were no undead on the ramparts at the moment. Indeed, their absence was quite glaring. Neshamah was quite pointedly looking away, in a manner of speaking. Malicia wouldn't necessarily know that, though. The Crown of the Dead screwed badly with scrying rituals, so it wasn't like she could have a look through a bowl. If she went with that choice, she was keeping the game afoot. As long as she wasn't surrounded by undead soldiers, she remained a target no matter how far down she fled. I wasn't all that familiar with the rest of the city, though, so we'd both be going into that blind.

I'd reached one of the pyramid's four spines when the Praesi moved out. Peeking around the corner, I grinned nastily as I watched the delegation head towards the central plaza at a brisk pace. She'd bet it all on a quick resolution, then. I could work with that. I picked up the pace as well, dropping down on the ground long before they were in sight of the turn. Fingers drumming against my sheath, I eyed the spot where the ambush would have to take place: right after the turn, with a clear line of sight to the path leading to the plaza. The columns were but a few feet apart and joined by a low wall on the outer half of the colonnade, though the half facing the pyramid was without. The turn was angled too circular for me to be able to hide in the bend, sadly, but there was another detail to this construction: a ceiling. Barded with criss-crossing beams of copper, the angular stone roof was held up by the columns. The ceiling itself was filled, but there was room between the long stretch of stone supported by those same columns and the roof itself. Not much, but then for once my size might come in as actually useful. A few years ago, the notion of hanging from a ceiling like a fucking bat to swoop down on my enemies would have struck me as absurd, especially if I was wearing armour. Now, though? It wasn't like my arms could get tired anymore.

It'd have to be around the turn, otherwise the moment the enemy approached they'd just see me hanging there. That'd turn awkward real quick, leading to questions like 'why did you think that would work?' or even worse, small talk. I wasn't emotionally prepared to make polite conversation with the Empress while murder-hanging from a ceiling. I hoisted myself up the low wall and frowned up at the column. There was distinct lack of good handholds, but using Winter would be tipping my hand and I needed to hurry before the enemy arrived. With all the grace of a one-legged squirrel, I hugged the column and shimmied my way up. It was easier up there: I caught one of the copper beams and left the column, effortlessly dragging my hole body up and spreading my legs to gain more traction from other beams. My free hand went into collection my cloak, which was now hanging like a shitty tapestry, and just kind of bunching it up over my stomach before I pulled myself close to the ceiling. There, that should do. I was kind of hoping Thief wasn't around, because if she saw me I'd never live this down. I heard the footsteps, then their words.

"The Dead King's enchantments make it impossible to use proper sensory spells," a woman's voice sighed in Mtethwa. "My apologies, Your Dread Majesty. My abilities are lacking."

"I hardly expected you to be the Hidden Horror's superior in matters of spellcraft, Lady Olinga," the flesh puppet replied. "Already your wards proved your worth by sparing me the Thief's ambush."

"She may well still be lurking about," a man warned. "And the Adjutant will have found a way out of the illusions by now. We must hurry."

"Any faster will disrupt the wards," Lady Olinga peevishly replied. "It already took me decades to train them to be able to maintain it while moving."

"The Warlock can-"

"I am not the Warlock," the Soninke cut through. "Nor even the Hierophant. Do ask miracles of me, Galadan, when you can barely use High Arcana yourself."

"We will proceed at the current pace," Not-Malicia said, and I could almost hear the soothing smile. "Peace, my friends. This interlude soon comes at an end."

Well, she wasn't wrong about that. More worryingly, I was hearing the Empress and the highborn moving but not a single Sentinel footstep. Spelled gear, had to be. And there was no telling what calibre either. Enchanted artefacts weren't as rare in Praes as they were in Callow, but even in the Wasteland it was the petty stuff that wasn't kept within powerful families. Magic made into enchantment waned over time, so for anything to last for more than a few years it had to be an extremely powerful mage – or ritual – that had first made the artefact. The lesser stuff had to be empowered anew pretty regularly, and most mages saw that kind of repeat labour as beneath them. Which meant finding another practitioner to take care of it, certainly easier in Praes than my homeland, but artefacts only worked perfectly for the mages who'd first made them. After that, every set of hands they passed through made them a little shoddier until they broke down. Of course, then you got the stuff out of myth. Which tended to be either like the Lone Swordsman's, a feather from an angel that'd made intense eye contact with Creational laws until they backed away uncomfortably, or your average legendary stuff. Which had both been crafted by the kind of sorcerer or Named that came around once a century and been made out of materials with inherent magical properties that kept the enchantments going indefinitely. All stuff that was rare, difficult to obtain and horribly, horribly expensive. Archer's longbow was probably worth a pair of large palaces in Procer, if she ever tried to pawn it in Mercantis, and it wasn't even quite up to snuff compared to some of the stuff out there.

Now, if they were from anywhere else, I'd dismiss the thought of the Sentinels having even one piece of such gear out of hand. Personal guards or not, they wouldn't rank that kind of ridiculous expense. They were, unfortunately, from the Dread Empire of Praes. When a nation got a line of three emperors that picked Profligate as a reigning name, terrible monetary decisions were only to be expected. And that was without thinking of the gaggle of practitioner Tyrants that'd held the Tower with just as many Warlocks serving beneath them, few of which had ever held qualms about a little mass murder and assorted bankruptcy if it got in the way of their latest idea. Even then, there couldn't be too many of it. Enough to equip ten guards, though. Would Malicia risk that kind of precious equipment by bringing it to Keter? My guts said yes. She wasn't a mage herself, and like the Calamities she'd never shown a great deal of respect for artefacts that were relevant only on the tactical level. I could easily see her kitting out her handpicked Sentinels in the good stuff both as a show of force for the Dead King and for that little additional sliver of safety abroad.

Which meant I couldn't just ignore the soldiers, as I'd intended to previously. They might have stuff that could hurt fae – no, knowing Malicia they definitely had stuff that hurt fae. Still, the sorcerers remained the greater threat. Fighters, even dangerous ones, I could kill my way through. If I got stuck behind a ward, there was no getting out. I held my breath, lips thinning when I realized my lungs never began to burn. Yet another comforting illusion that would not withstand scrutiny. Eyes wide open I waited for the Praesi to approach. Artefact-bearers or not, the Sentinels still wore those fucking stupid masks. They couldn't easily look up, and their peripheral vision was shit. I'd let them pass me before dropping down and take out as many mages as I could in the first strike. Without a sound a pair of steel-clad soldiers passed under me, and then – shit.

I dropped down before the streak of lightning could tear through my belly. Had that come out of an opal? Did I have to start worrying about the jewellery on people's clothes now? The Sentinels were on me before the others could so much as exclaim in surprise, swords swinging. Sorcery flared behind them, the mages taking action, and I knew without a doubt that if I got stuck in a brawl with the soldiers this was headed downhill. Never give mages time to cast. I breathed out, and ripped away another illusion. I stepped through the sword blows, the mist that was now my torso billowing as their blades went through. One step, two, three and then I was among the mages. Solid, I ordered my body. My blade ripped through a Taghreb's throat and the panes of light around Malicia dimmed, her eyes widening in fear and surprise. I tugged out a string of my domain, shaped it and let it loose with a flick of the wrist. The javelin of night-stuff flew perfectly, puncturing the sorcerous protection and...

Breaking an illusion.

Fuck. A ward closed around me a heartbeat later and I found myself surrounded by very displeased Praesi. With a sigh I rose from my half-crouch, adjusted my cloak and offered the delegation a winning smile. I did not get a single one in response, which might have something to do with the man bleeding out on the ground a mere foot behind me.

"Well," I muttered. "This is a little awkward."

I reached for Winter but found my will couldn't quite make it. That, I mused, was not a promising start to these negotiations.

---

james

Thanks!

Javvies

Falling for an illusion, Cat? You're the Fae. Illusions are supposed to be your thing.

Hmmm. Cat is cut off from Winter somehow.

I think she gets out of this by realizing she doesn't need to reach out and draw Winter/Power to herself from an external source, she needs to reach within herself and pull forth internal power. External Winter/Power is a crutch that lesser beings rely on, but for those capable of Apotheosis, they are their own source of Power.

Sylfa

The illusion was hidden inside a ward, she has trouble with wards so it makes sense to me that she wouldn't be able to sense it's an illusion due to that.

At that point her ability to sense illusions is a downside, she knows she can tell the difference so when she doesn't sense an illusion she's more likely to not even consider it could be an illusion. Well, up until now I suppose. She'll probably be quite wary about what she sees through a ward in the future.

Jane

Well. Malicia might not be a tactical genius, but Cat seems to have forgotten that she does have a knack for understanding her enemies, and prefers deception over a fair fight. If she'd thought about it a bit more, she really should have known that there was a 100% chance that this was a trap.

Incidentally, while recognizing that her body is just a convenient lie is a really useful trick, I can't help but think of how that ended for another character by the name of Sayaka. In most fiction I've seen, that kind of revelation leads to depression and madness. But, well, has Cat ever flinched from the notion of self-destruction in order to achieve her goals?

Dainpdf

Well, in that case it was that plus alienation from friends and family, constantly risking her life (and seeing friends die), and watching her greatest desire crumble to dust. Cat is not dealing with all that. Not on the same level. Plus, she's Callowan. They're made of sterner stuff.

Jane

Not to mention Cat's had more than a month to process everything. She worked through the worst of the "Is all of this worth it?" emotions after Liese and repelling the Crusade, has watched some of people she cared most about be horribly mangled and walked away from others over the last couple of years, and I'm not certain I've ever seen her really care about her own life. She's had time to adapt to the whole “Oh, right, being this important is actually miserable” paradigm.

That said, though, she doesn’t quite have a pet demon to eat the taint from her soul (Akua doesn’t count, she’s more of a battery), using her power is actively destructive to her mind (though it seems to wear off), and already took to drinking for a while to (badly) cope with the changes. She’s really one power overdose away at all times from proclaiming A Goddess Am I, declaring war on the moon, and monologuing at Pilgrim when he shows up to stop her.

If she ends up in a deep enough funk (maybe one of the Woe ends up dead, maybe she has to harshly put down a peasant revolution, etc.), who’s to say she won’t just say, “Fuck it, I’m not a human anyway, let’s see how Wintery I can get” in response to her problems? The desire for self-destruction can be rationalized in many different ways, and Winter is a terrible solution to a lot of problems – if she can convince herself that sacrificing her mind is a worthwhile price to pay to solve whatever her latest problem is, well... It’s like she has a loaded gun pointed at her head at all times. It’d just take reaching deep enough into her power.

I’m not saying that any of this is going to happen, mind you. Just that the shape of the story is there if the author was inclined to go in that direction, not that I notice any signs that they’re inclined to.

Dainpdf

Well argued. I can see it too, now. Fits with her self-sacrifice motif, as well as with how Black got into the downward spiral that almost killed him.

naturalnuke

Once, and then she said ‘fuck it, don’t be a baby’ and ripped the rigging keeping her soul human away.

Jane

...You know, when you put it like that, maybe she is a bit too eager to sacrifice herself for her dream.

Who does that? Okay, someone who isn’t human (any longer). But, like, who does that?

*taliesinskye*

I suppose people are afraid of change, but she’s certainly come off better in the deal. Immortality, fabulous magical powers, new senses, all sorts of perks came out of that.

And in most of the cases where she's engaged in acts of self-mutilation it was either that or die, so it wasn't much of a choice from that perspective.

Daemion

She also lost her sense of taste and is being influenced by foreign emotions. Hating the moon is eccentric, but being filled with a hunger that just wants to crush and destroy is a little more problematic.

Decius

Whether or not the gradual erosion of her self has resulted in death is debatable.

ALKATYN

Interestingly while she's willing to treat her body as a construct in some ways for short periods of time she still hasn't gone all the way into treating it as arbitrary. Making temporary changes like her torso becoming mist is good, but she's still thinking of herself as a human body, just with some adjustments. Even just tapping into the levels of 'normal' fae she could be ridiculously fast and strong, at a larger scale, why even bother having a single conventional human body as the locus of her power. She could summon a dozen Akua style phantoms with a thought,

RanVor

Please, don't. It's been over a year and I still have a trauma after PMMM.

1queenofblades1

First Spider-Cat, now Bat-Cat. For gods sake Catherine, pick either Marvel or DC and stick to it!

Dainpdf

Don't forget Deadpool-Cat, with Rise.

Sol Invictus

She can now go immaterial, Shadow of Mordor style

Tohron

Okay, so stalling for Hakram and Thief to show up is an obvious approach, but I'm wondering if she could also take some of the Principal Alienation back from Akua, leaving the latter free to take the mages by surprise.

darkening

Was half expecting "Malicia's plan"

Dainpdf

Might have been a good title for this, except spoilers.

Dainpdf

Oh my, did Cat fuck up this time. Unless there's some other plan she's unaware of in play, she's done.

Which I guess almost guarantees there is such a plan.

Jane

Eh, the Villains trying to box a god never ends well for the Villains, especially not if it's an evil god. I'm not worried.

Dainpdf

Praesi are pretty good at utilizing Sealed Evil in a Can, actually.

Euodiachloris

Well, for time, yes. But, the can always leaks. Or, in unlucky cases, bursts open.

(I don't trust most of the nasties supposedly locked into the Tower's fabric are as sealed as most people think they are: I suspect more than a few weren't actually forced or trapped in the first place.)

Dainpdf

Those in Wolof seemed pretty okay until used. As did Triumphant's.

Euodiachloris

How sure are you of that? Just having the cans invites 1) attempts to use them (good luck!), 2) attempts to dispose of them (good luck!) or 3) attempts to ignore them until entropy or a rival takes an interest (good luck!). 😊 well one of the demons is still 'absent'.

Yavandir

Jane

While this is true, narratively speaking, there's a difference between "lesser" Sealed Evils, such as devils and demons, and “greater” Sealed Evils, such as gods. While it’s practically expected that a classical villain can effortlessly employ any number of lesser evils with hardly a thought, trying to reach too high always ends up with the villain sitting on top of a ticking time bomb that, half the time, will just kill them outright and be the new problem for the heroes to face, and the other half, end up breaking out a critical moment and ruin all of the villain’s plans.

If Cat were a Good deity, there’d be a chance that she’d be the end goal of some Hero’s quest, and have to wait patiently to be rescued, but as an Evil deity... Well, it’s a Chekov’s Gun issue. You don’t introduce an evil deity as something the Villain has in their pocket, and don’t bring them out – but since an evil god is clearly more important than whatever the villain of the week happens to be, at best it’ll turn out that said deity was secretly manipulating the villain the entire time.

Praes might have all manner of horrors locked up in their fortresses, but something on Cat’s level is well within the “reaching too high” range that ends up backfiring catastrophically.

(Though, I do admit that the scale is somewhat vague. Demons permanently damaging the fabric of reality would normally be the kind of thing that backfires catastrophically as well, for instance, but they’re not that uncommon in Praes – though, uh, I suppose they do backfire pretty often as well. For that matter, given how often being eaten (metaphorically speaking) by a Devil has brought down Dread Emperors, what’s normally a “lesser” Evil seems to have a surprisingly high mortality rate as well...)

Dainpdf

I’d argue demons are more of a major evil than Cat, more due to the evil than due to the major.

Thing is, Praesi have mastered making sure that the collateral damage mostly also damages their enemies.

Metrux

Which can’t be done with Cat, since she is making conscious choices and explicitly their enemy. Yeah, don’t seem like this ends well for them.

DroughtBringer

Enjoyable chapter, thank you!

Rex

Cat has an invisible crossbow.

Decius

And a history of interrupting monologues with crossbow.

Gunslinger

Hey everybody, if you don't already know EE has a patreon (patreon.com/user?u=3523924). Any support there would be awesome

Gunslinger

I wonder if the magicians can attack Cat inside the ward or would it only keep her trapped? Because delaying till the rest of the Woe appear would not be wise.

Grey

I can't imagine attacking a cornered and trapped God could go that well either.

taliesinskye

I'm guessing that someone on the outside doing anything that crosses the border of the ward would break it. That's the usual storybook logic of magical containment circles, anyway.

Antoninjohn

Cat did kill some Mages and the rest of the Woe is probably around the corner so her position isn't that bad

jonnnney

Catherine is pretty fucking stupid here. She assumes that no illusions are being used and she for some reason thinks the obvious person to attack is the person she should attack. She sees fear and surprise in the eyes of the fucking Dread Empress of Praes as assumes it is legitimate?

werafdsaew

Yeah it feels like Cat is holding the idiot ball here. She should have gone after the mages instead since they're the biggest threat.

ALKATYN

Possibly, but she had good reason to believe they couldn't use a lot of normal magical defenses due to the effects of being in the dead king's palace. So this is the best opportunity shes likely to get any time soon.

(Also Winter seems to push her towards direct brute force approaches to problems, so this may be a sign that her attempts to buffer the effects in the last few chapters weren't as effective as she thought. Would be an interesting twist if it turned out shed actually been changing without realizing it)

Micke

She's a pit-fighting thug and every time she has to get involved in making her own plans, she ends up outsmarted and having to slug it out at great cost. Why would it suddenly take Winter influence for her to stick with the only thing she knows?

In fact, Catherine's inability to learn any other approach is this story's greatest weakness. At least she's called herself out on it once or twice.

TeK

People don't change.

Snowfire1224

I thought that she was holding a bit of an idiot ball. The thing is though is that thief attacked first, why didn't she think this was an obvious trick either?

Metrux

More like, why are people thinking Malicia won't be afraid? If this doesn't go well for her, she has lost Praes, not directly, but because all her plans rely on the Dead King being her "army". Also, she is NOT a fighter or mage of any kind, as much influence and intelligence that she has, she is still a governor, and hasn't been attacked by things scarier than death before. I mean, just think what could happen if Cat would reanimate with Winter this fake body that has a connection to the original? Shenanigans ensue.

magesbe

Yes that is a little awkward.

On the bright side, we know she gets out of this somehow. Though not necessarily without consequences.

Dantalian

Maybe this is all her plan to make Malicia gloat while Archer puts an arrow through her head.

edrey

well, who can help here? hakram, idriani or viviana, or her name take shape, use part of her body as a trick or whatever, really awkward here, any idea of how turn around this?

Ashen Shugar

Cat, Cat, Cat. It's not "awkward". It's, "Now that I've got your attention, I need you to take me to Malicia to talk about how she's trying to screw me over again like when she was helping Diabolist wipe out Liese?" ; )

taliesinskye

That would have been a clever idea, but I don't blame her for not thinking of it in the moment.

marillius

I still don't get how it's this easy to beat a monarch of the fey. If it was this easy, why did she let so many of her people die? She had wizards that could do basic wards, right? And Hierophant? How did winter and summer tear apart any mortal army when this is all a mage needs to do to even their strongest?

Seems more like she's letting herself think wards matter to her the same way she's let herself think breathing mattered.

Rook

That went about as well as expected. Cat is about as good at being subtle as Theif is at killing things. The only way Catherine could ever manage stealth is by barreling through in a straight line while being scary enough that everyone looks the other way.

taliesinskye

Erraticerrata – the solution you've come up with here for the apparent contradiction of there can be a fair number of people who know how to make magical items but there aren't lots of magical items everywhere is really very clever. It'd be a great idea for lots of fantasy settings to use. Otherwise you have to make magical items way too difficult to create or have knowledge of them be somehow lost long ago or something, and neither of those solutions are desirable for different reasons.

Alivaril

"There is no surer sign you're being played than believing you've grasped your enemy's intent."

velorien7

That's not a terribly useful statement since it's also exactly what you'll see if you *aren't* being played and have correctly read your opponent.

burdi

high possibility is that cat already know this will happen
If she act like she usually act then malicia beat her is inevitable..i believe she knew that much whatever cat do or plan...malicia can do it better..she plan diabolist's doomsday weapon behind amadeus back....despite he himself is fucking crazy legendary mastermind so it must be chaos, that is her element, it has to be indrani more like "your job wench, is to screw me up, so i will do something that i will never ever think about to do it"

Metrux

I honestly can only sigh every time I see this kind of comment on Malicia. She is not good enough to keep the tower on her own, you know? The only reason she lasted in there for so long is that no one could get a banned Name back, and Black was supporting her. Things have changed now, and thus it's alot easier for her to keep her place, but she is not even half as good as some of the best Dread Emperors/Empress. The fact is, she is great at planning and manipulation, but terrible at anything else, including Namelore, and the only reason Black didn't notice was because he never believed she could do something like this, after all, he knew there were people from Praes sending resources to Ubua.

Really, you all give too much to Malicia.

Someguy

>The shimmering panes of light around the flesh puppet told me exactly why it'd failed, and pointed at the most likely suspect for the attempt: Thief.

It's all right, Vivienne. No one thinks less of you for it. You're very good at other crimes.

Rey d`Tutto

She's got "Attempted Murder" down pat. Now if she can just remember the follow through...

Decius

Her problem is that she's trying to kill her target. She should be trying to steal their life.

ALKATYN

The little back and forth between the Praesi mages gives me a weird bit of sympathy for them. IT must be incredibly annoying to be a non-Named mage in this world, where you work for decades at perfecting your technique then some Named asshole gets a miraculous cheatcode around the problem.

Also interesting bit of worldbuilding when talking about the magical items decaying over time. Reminds me of a discussion on /r/rational a while back about a magic system that allows making artifacts, and why you wouldn't just have mages manufacture them all day instead of using mages in direct combat.

Also, symbolism of this being the first chapter in ages to not be "(names) Plan"? Did the Woe not plan this part? Also potential double meaning of ambusg, maybe Cat was the one ambushed here by Malicia who was prepared for her from the beginning

TeK

To be fair, if they didn't get so much as a claim on the various Names, they must not be very talented.

Panic

I see we are back at "Cat is a drooling retard whose ability to stand upright and open doors baffles reality and whose every action ends in her being fucked."

Jane

Well, I mean. She is coming off an evening of having erased her memories, been dropped in the middle of a seventeen secret plans, nearly been killed goodness knows how many times in the last couple of hours, and is going through a bit of an existential crisis at the moment.

It might not have been the brightest move on her part, but I think it's understandable, no?

superkeaton

An illusion, Cat? Really? You should be better at this. Hell, you usually are. But it's been a long night and we can't all pretend that we were never going to get another one-on-one between Cat and Malicia.

Daemion

Not expecting an illusion was a mistake, she already fell for that before and should know better by now.

The biggest mistake was going melee though. They are mages, with enchanted silk robes that won't withstand a lot of damage. Why not pepper the entire area with several javelins made from shadow and ice? Or at least freeze the floor to find out who's real and who's an illusion?

Seriously Cat, you already dealt with situations like that before, you can do better.

Personally, I would have jumped high into the air, summoned spears of ice and thrown them down at the mages. They were protecting the flesh puppet, not themselves. The Sentinels might save one or two of them, they are certainly fast enough for that but once the first mage dies, their options shrink.

Hit and run, harass them and stay mobile so they can't trap you. Cat can potentially move fast enough that she's barely visible, the Fae managed that too. Don't present a target while you hammer them from a distance and the fight will be decided in seconds. Once the mages are down and the Sentinels have revealed their capabilities it is time to move in close, but not before.

Cat fails twice here. First at the ambush and secondly at being an immortal being of unstoppable power. She got trapped by some random mage, not even by a Named with the support of the Heavens. That's not just awkward, that's embarrassing.

Decius

Half the mages keep blocking the spears, the other half make a ward in the air around her. Sentinels start shooting at the skeet.

MetruX

The chapter itself gives you the answer on why she didn't do this: This would attract attention. If she calls upon the undead guards the game is over, and your plan would absolutely do just that, no matter if she could or not eliminate Malicia before the guards arrived.

revin

I'm still waiting for Sheherazad's prophecy to come up As the Crown of Woe very clearly refers to Catherine.

"Who reigns up high?

A dead man's sigh

What sleeps below?

A crown of woe

That is the Tower:

Learn and cower."

– Extract from 'And So I Dreamt I Was Awake', Sherehazad the Seer

aran

Heh

Dainpdf

I am honestly surprised that no one made the “Batherine” joke.
There, done.
I guess lqueenofblades1 came close with Bat-Cat.

Satan

If the empress had the resources, there’s no reason not to send two simulacrums. Easy bait if this was the depth of Cat’s thought process.

Joan

I may have missed something in an earlier chapter, but I don’t understand the benefit of destroying the Empress’s flesh avatar. I don’t recall reading the Empress would die if the avatar was destroyed. Even if it disrupts the negotiations between Praes and Keter, it seems like a pretty high price to pay; an attack like this is an act of war.

---

Chapter 46: Possibly A Plan

“To declare an assertion of the People untrue is unlawful, even if it was retroactively asserted by vote to be untrue, at which point referring to it as either true or untrue is equally unlawful.”

– Bellerophan formal codex of laws, circa 1321 A.D.

The transparent bubble around me was solid, as I found out with a swift strike of what must have been at least my fifteenth sword of the day. I was pretty sure the one made out of goblin steel was still with the Spellblade, since I’d never actually picked it up. Over the span of a single heartbeat the Praesi delegation’s entire body language had shifted. Where before the illusion had been the centre of their attention, they now all faced the taller of the two men wearing ceremonial armour. I’d expected another illusion to break and Malicia’s flesh puppet to be revealed but then the stranger smiled and I realized I was already looking at it. Shit, she’d never said she was limited to using women as puppets had she?

“Catherine,” the Empress greeted me in a pleasant baritone.
“You’ve made quite the entrance.”

I coughed.

"Would you believe I was just cleaning my sword and my hand slipped?" I tried.

Not so much as a twitch from anyone. Tough crowd.

"Worth a shot," I shrugged.

"So much for the cunning Black Queen," a robe-clad man sneered.

From the voice, it was the one called Galadan. His interlocutor had pointedly not used a noble title when bickering with him, so odds were he was just a talented practitioner snatched young and groomed by one of the powerful houses.

"Galadan, was it?" I said slowly, lips quirking as the name echoed with the taste of Winter. "I'll remember that."

There were days where my reputation was like a stone around my neck, making what should have been the simplest matters a brutal grind where my best intentions were turned to dross no matter what I tried. But there were days, as well, where the balance swung the other way. I was standing alone and surrounded, bound by a ward I'd wager had been crafted specifically to deal with me, and I had nothing left to bare at the man but teeth. Galadan still flinched. Malicia chuckled lightly at the sight.

"One does not lightly taunt a tiger, even caged," she chided her subordinate. "There is no need for uncouthness, Queen in Callow. Threats this early in the conversation strike me as in poor taste."

I should go along with the beat, of course, dance that highborn dance of manners and double-speak and bladed implications. But we'd done that for a year now, the both of us, and the more I learned about what she'd been up to all the while the more I realized how deeply I'd been played. She'd let me bleed my kingdom, my armies, my people against her enemies while she plotted to unleash the Dead King. I would not condemn her for desperation, not when it had driven me to the same madness, but there had been calculation behind her despair. She would let the demon out of the box only when Callow had seen the wilfulness beaten out of it by the Tenth Crusade, and not a moment before. It'd make me a hypocrite to talk about the wickedness of making pacts with the Hidden Horror, but I was not unreasonable in the fury I felt at the knowledge that she'd intended to bleed me out for her advantage.

I spat to the side.

"You know me," I grinned toothily. "Proper savage, I am. That's how they raise us in the provinces."

Malicia sighed.

"There is no need for such antagonism," she said. "You have attempted to murder me, certainly, but that is a small thing. Expected, in many ways. We had a confluence of interests at the last hour of Liesse, and may have one currently as well. It is neither of us that most benefits from this squabble."

"You funded Liesse," I replied calmly. "Enabled it. You were, to use that most damning word, complicit."

"And yet," the Dread Empress of Praes said, "when presented with the finished weapon you agreed with me on the necessity of its existence. Our present situation is not so different."

I had come to regret it, over the months that followed that nightmare, that I had even for a moment agreed with Malicia. That I'd been able to set aside the pile of bodies the doomsday fortress had been raised from for the golden lie of the peace it might be able to force. I'd often thought of pragmatism as the highest of all virtues, since I'd become the Squire. So many time I'd crossed blades with heroes and villains who were so wrapped up in what they might be able to make of the world that they were unwilling to face the reality of what it was. But I'd learned. It was a virtue, when properly used, but to embrace it at the exclusion of all else was to become Black. Cunning, victorious and brutally efficient. Dead inside too, though, more means than man. The kind of person that brought only ruin wherever they went.

"And so the devil complains the other devil is tricking us both," I laughed. "Quite the assertion, when you've already escalated the offer beyond what either of us can afford."

"The Principate is an existential threat to us both," the Empress said. "That is fact, not speculation. So long as Procer is not dismantled, even victory tomorrow would only result in the same war erupting anew in twenty years. You are quite aware of this, or you would not have requested signatory status with the Grand Alliance."

"Hasenbach isn't the one whose ships are burning your coasts," I pointed out. "And Levant's on the march. Bit more to this than the First Prince having a go at the East."

"Ashur will seek separate peace the moment the Grand Alliance collapses," Malicia patiently said. "It will be costly to settle, but the Empire is the wealthiest it has been in several generations. The Dominion is willing to fight under the cross, but to defend Procer? Even if they are cajoled into it and somehow manage victory, they will have no stomach for pressing with another war after turning back the Dead King."

"It's an interesting sell that you're making between the lines," I noted. "Instead of your shield protecting the western flank with the Principate, you're trying to talk me into being the same for your western flank with the Dead King. What a favour you're granting me. I have to praise the audacity, if nothing else."

"Let us not quibble over details," Malicia flatly said. "You meant to release him yourself. If betrayal in the terms is your worry, I am willing to grant you the right to read the final treaties and sit at the signing."

"I meant to loose him only on the northernmost edges of Procer," I sharply replied. "Where the damage inflicted could be kept to a strict minimum and he'd have to defend narrow beachheads against the entire Tenth Crusade. You, on the other hand, are handing him almost a third of the continent's most densely populated farmland on a silver platter. I don't care how good your binding oaths are, if he manages to swallow that big a prize the rest of Calernia is fucked. Including me, including you. You can't possibly be so desperate you can't see that."

"There is quite the difference between recognizing someone's rights to territory and the other party being able to seize it," the Empress said. "Some principalities will fall, I expect. Not enough. And what remains of Procer will be embroiled in permanent bloody warfare to the north, a grind on the resources of both participants."

"See, I would have bought that before I saw Keter with my own eyes," I told her. "Saw the kind of tools the Dead King has at his disposal. I'm telling you, and Gods I would love it if you actually took me to my word for once, he has a fucking legion of monsters to unleash. He's been sitting pretty on this for millennia, Malicia, picking up every strong Named he came across and adding them to his arsenal. Procer can barely handle me, and that's with the hand of the Heavens so far up their asses you can see the fingers wiggling between the teeth. They are not capable of handling what he'll send marching."

"Evil," the Empress replied serenely, "does not win wars. That is a law of nature, true as sunrise or the moving of the tides. You have inherited Amadeus' most dangerous delusion in believing otherwise. He could empty all the Howling Hells and it would not matter one bit. The only way to eke out a victory, Catherine, is not to fight."

"And how's that been working out for you?" I harshly asked.

"My armies are intact," Malicia smiled. "I have avoided loss of any significant industry or resources and maintained my hold on all my core territories. Your need to war with every foe in sight, on the other hand, has broken your only host, brought several outlying regions of Callow to the brink of rebellion and left you exceedingly vulnerable to attack from every single other state on the continent."

"You know," I mused, "we usually get that speech from the west instead of the east. Oh, Callow's on fire but my lands are fine. You must be a bunch of blunderers. Forgetting, of course, that the only reason the princes of Procer aren't bickering over who gets the nicer parts of your fucking capital is that my people bled at the borders to drive them back."

"You expect my sympathy for the costs of defending your own lands?" the Empress said, tone mildly sardonic.

"You know," I said, "that's fair. It really is. It's not like my armies gives a damn about the Wasteland. But then you don't get to parade the success of your masterful 'strategy' either, Malicia, when the only thing that makes it work is that my kingdom's in the way of an invasion. You haven't played everyone like a fiddle. You didn't raise a godsdamned hand even when the Ashurans started sacking your cities. All you did was read a fucking map and take a bet on human nature."

She laughed in my face, an older man's rich and riotous laughter.

"Indeed, I truly am a fool for having achieved all my desired outcomes without any true cost to myself," she said. "However will I live this down?"

"No cost?" I said. "Oh, I wouldn't say that. Your little episode in Liesse cost you quite a bit, didn't it? More than half the Legions. Your finest generals, and probably the person dearest to you in the world. All of Callow, too. How's it feel, Alaya, to join the roster of empresses who pissed away a kingdom out of pride?"

The flesh puppet turned dark eyes on me.

"One of your better attempts," she noted. "Given two or three decades, you might survive a month at court without someone cleaning up behind you. Evidently, you are disinclined to cooperate even when it is to our common advantage. Let us part ways, then."

I went for Winter again. Still just out of the reach of my fingertips. The harder I set my will to it, though, the more I felt like there might be some give. Was the ward pitting willpower against willpower? There were four warlocks keeping this going that I could see, and Wasteland mages were taught from the cradle that Creation was theirs to master. That didn't breed weak wills, though sometimes brittle ones. I might be able to pull that off, given long enough, but it wasn't a certainty. And I'd be up to my neck in Sentinels before then. I shifted my stance, wrist slowly rotating as I flicked the last of the blood off my sword.

"This the part where you have your little toy soldiers try me?" I casually said. "Should be interesting to see if they can kill me."

"You are a skilled swordswoman," a Taghreb mage snorted. "Yet not so skilled as that."

"You mistake me," I smiled. "Even if your pack of silent hounds hacks me to pieces, will I actually die?"

That gave them pause.

"Lost half my face and torso, not even an hour ago," I said. "A Named elf did that with one of the dangerous aspects I've ever seen. You think you can swing harder than that? I'm genuinely curious, what do you have to throw at me that'll keep me down for the count?"

"Cold iron," Galadan hissed.

I snorted.

"That's cute," I said. "My own crown is made of that, you mouthy second-rater. But, Hells, give it a shot. It's not like my way to the throne hasn't been paved by the bodies of Wastelanders who just knew they had my number."

I straightened, gaze sweeping across the Praesi delegation.

"Well, ladies and gentlemen," I said with a savage grin, "which brave soul wants to be the first example I make today?"

Silence was my answer, and when I inhaled the fear that had swelled up under their calm faces I could not be sure whether it was me or Winter that delighted in it. The spell was broken by a slow clap. Malicia's simulacrum was smiling.

"You truly do have a talent for this," she said. "Beyond even what you were taught. Still, you have ever been slow to learn. Did I not tell you, Catherine? To win, it is best not to fight at all."

The puppet glanced at her subordinates.

"The ward anchors will remain here," she said. "The rest of us will proceed to the Hall of the Dead and resume negotiation."

The man's face turned to me, and inclined Malicia inclined his head by a fraction.

"A good day to you, Black Queen," she said. "May you survive the consequences of what you have wrought."

The smiled turned mirthless.

"After all," she finished, "I still have a use for you."

Oooh, that'd been cold. Had to grant her the due for that, and I knew cold better than most. I gathered my will and smashed it against the ward like a hammer, but the give wasn't nearly strong enough. If she managed to get out of here, this was done. And like she'd said, Neshamah would be displeased. Or perhaps disappointed, which seemed like a much more dangerous state of affairs. I couldn't reach my mantle, and the bubble might as well have been stone. Stone before I'd gotten said mantle, anyway, it was a lot less trouble these days. I still had knives up my sleeves, thanks to Pickler's cunning little contraptions, but if my sword couldn't cut it against the bubble neither would they. The Praesi gathered to move out, the Sentinels making a protective ring around the remaining delegates and the Empress. My fingers clenched. I had no weapon, no power that would work until it was too late. Well, except my fucking 'invisible crossbow', thank you Past Catherine. Wait, yes, my invisible crossbow. I didn't physically have one – I'd checked earlier, patted myself down – but it might be a metaphor. Or maybe the sight of me making an ass of myself was a signal for Archer to start shooting, which seemed a lot more likely.

"I wouldn't do that, if I were you," I called out.

The Empress turned.

"And why is that?" she said.

Ah, humouring me. Nearly always a mistake.

"I'll have to kill you with my secret weapon," I replied.

"Is that so?" she said.

"Evidently," I drawled, "you are disinclined to cooperate. Let us part ways, then."

I brought up my invisible crossbow and fired it right into her throat.

At which point nothing happened.

"I was expecting the Archer to ambush us," Malicia said after a moment.

"Wards prepared?" I asked.

"Several," she replied.

"The plan had a few kinks to work out," I admitted.

If I'd been more prone to assigning sentimentality to the Empress, I would have believed her to be somewhat embarrassed on my behalf. Well, it'd make two of us. At least years of Indrani's company had more or less made me immune to shame and public embarrassment. Mercifully, the Dread Empress of Praes set out again without taking a moment out of her day to mock me. All right then, back to forcing my way through the ward and then having a spot of diplomatic murder. I pressed my will against the bubble again, and kept the pressure up. I was gaining ground, inch by inch, but it was taking too godsdamned long.

The arrow took Galadan right in the knee.

The mage fell with a scream as my eyes widened in surprise. Had there been some sort of protective enchantment on him, like there'd been on the Exiled Prince? Why else would Archer aim for the knee? Unless...

"Oh, fucking Hells," I sighed. "She's drunk, isn't she?"

Had she seriously been so wasted she'd missed both the signal and her mark? Gods, I didn't even know Named could get that drunk.

"Fighting retreat," Malicia ordered, tone perfectly even.

"Archer," I yelled. "The mages around me. Ignore the Empress."

I found fear in the eye of the warlock closest to me when I met them, and redoubled my efforts to break through. Except that no other arrow came. Was this a plan of some sort? Befuddlement distracted me long enough I lost a few inches to the mages, and I threw myself back into it with gritted teeth. She and I would have a talk about this, when – the second arrow clipped the shoulder of a mage to the side of the bubble, drawing blood and a scream but nothing else. I gained back the inches I'd lost, but that was all. Gods, how drunk was she? No, she'd have burned it out of her body by now with her Name. Indrani might capricious, but she was also incredibly vain about her marksmanship. After missing her first shot she'd have sobered herself up. I came to the conclusion a heartbeat before the Empress announced it out loud to her escorts. This had never been Archer. This was Thief who'd stolen a bow and arrows at some point, and the shots were missing because no one had ever taught her to use the godsdamned thing properly.

"Thief, just stab the bastards," I yelled angrily.

Her ruse – passing for Archer – had slowed down the Praesi advance some but not nearly enough. She should have gone for the mages since the start, though charitably I'd assume she'd been trying to make time for me to break out of the bubble. I slammed my will against the ward, to no avail. This was infuriating. If I'd still had an aspect I could have ripped through that like wet parchment. But with the mantle's power had come the mantle's weaknesses. Although, I'd learned necromancy when I was still...

No, my tie to Zombie still existed but it was muted. I couldn't control her through it. Neither could I summon the arguably more dangerous dead thing at my beck and call, Akua Sahelian. It was like the bubble was shutting me out of Winter and essentially everything outside of the bubble itself. I was pretty sure I could still manipulate what was in here, but my body couldn't shift without Winter to handle the changes and, and I still had a bit of Winter in here didn't I? I glanced down at my sword. I'd gone through over a dozen of those fighting the Skein, just making another one out of ice every time the last one shattered. It'd become so natural I barely ever thought of it anymore. I grimaced. Didn't really help, though. I could make an ice javelin out of that, but that was no better than a sword and I doubted anything aside from my domain would put a hole in the ward.

Thief flickered into sight, stabbing into the back of the man whose eyes I'd met earlier, but even though she drew blood a streak of lightning caught her in the side and smashed her to the ground. An illusion broke, and a fifth spellcaster flicked her wrist as she whispered in the mage tongue. The lightning kept roiling and Vivienne screamed as she twisted on the ground.

"Flee," I hissed. "Go."

Except she couldn't, and I didn't have the tools to... My fingers clenched. I gathered my will, sent it into my sword and broke it apart. I ripped from the ice the stuff of Winter, and from it wove one of the few things that never left my body. A small dark whistle, pulsing with power not my own. Power I'd stolen from a hated foe. Bringing it to my cold lips, I blew out and the power vanished. It broke into fine powder. Not a sound had been made. It wasn't that kind of whistle. It wasn't that kind of call.

"She's summoning something," the sorceress that still poured lightning into Vivienne called out.

"We need every single one of us," the man who'd been stabbed replied in Mtethwa. "She's a monster."

The blade went through the back of his head, coming out of his mouth in a downpour of blood. Larat clicked his tongue disapprovingly.

"Now now, man-thing," he chided. "That's just no way to speak about your superiors."

The rest of the Wild Hunt tore out of Arcadia behind him, and with a wild scream I finally shattered the ward. Finally.

My turn.

---

Someguy

"To declare an assertion of the People untrue is unlawful, even if it was retroactively asserted by vote to be untrue, at which point referring to it as either true or untrue is equally unlawful."

– Bellerophan formal codex of laws, circa 1321 A.D.

And if you declare the assertion a monumental screw-up?

TeK

Obviously, the only thing that is untrue and true at the same time, is something that does not exist nor ever existed. Therefore, if an assertion of People was later asserted as untrue, such assertion never took place. Honestly, do you need me to spell this out for you?

Decius

Such an assertion is not "untrue and true". It is "not untrue and not true".

Calling it both untrue and true is doubly treason.

TeK

Not untrue is true and not true is untrue. I merely skipped unnessecary letters. Adding additional "not" may come as legit tactic at the first glance, but you forgetting that there may be infinite number of occasions that one issue is asserted by People as true, and untrue, and true again, etc. So to escape situations with "not not not not not not untrue", I left "not" out entirely.

Dainpdf

Eh. The principle of exclusion is debatable.

Faiir

One shall not just ignore the words of the People!

Euodiachloris

The voice of the People is always right! But, it is conceivable that the information the People has was... misleading. If in doubt, blame the data, then tar and feather the journalists and statisticians! ;P

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

This guy bellerophons.

Steve

Acrually, the quote does not make something true or untrue, merely allow you to state whether it is true or untrue.

Jane

I wonder, just how much intervention from the Gods has it taken to keep Bellerophon from collapsing under the weight of its absurdity? Surely it hasn't been human hands keeping it running...

Heck, it's probably been a cooperative venture from the gods both Above and Below, so that they have something to laugh at when they're not busy scheming or arguing.

...Or maybe the Gods Below have wasted all of their power on keeping their clown show going, and that's why Villains always seem like they're at a disadvantage everywhere else in the continent.

TeK

To assert that Glorious Republic of Bellerophon can't exist without metaphysical crutches is both treason and Filthy Lies of Petty Tyrants, which is also treason. Now you may argue that since you are not citizen of Bellerophon and can't possibly commit treason against it. Wrong again!

Besides, Gods Below are citizens of Bellerophon, it's just good and proper to keep their homelajd from collapsing, even if it's completely unnecessary and the other way around besides.

onedollargum

All recorded evidence of non-events go into the memory hole, I imagine, as do all un-persons who reference them.

Jacklyn Yeh

don't be so silly. they would simply make new legislation proving the exact same point, only for the original ruling to be dug up about 2 centuries later to contridict the "new" law.

Miles

You can't declare the assertion at all. Everyone who cast a vote on it is dead anyway. The first group for voting incorrectly and the second group for unlawfully contradicting the first.

Big Brother

Finally, the Wild Hunt rides again.

sengachi

“More means than man” is an absolutely amazing turn of phrase.

Snowfire1224

It reminded me of how obi wan called darth vader, “more machine than man” in New Hope.

Miles

You know it occurs to me that all Vader’s machine parts were crutches against the injuries that Obi-Wan himself had inflicted while trying to kill the boy.

What I’m saying is that Obi-Wan is kind of a dick.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!

soonnanandnaanssoon

And to no one’s surprise Cat’s ‘Possibly-A-Plan’ involves bashing through stuff and stabbing people.

RoflCat

And according to my count she’s only one arson and multiple ‘attempt’ murders only.

Where’s the rest of the flame and dead bodies promised?

Decius

One completed murder so far. Plus one remurder, if Skein stays down.

Amoonymous

I doubt the Skein is permanently gone; he should be trapped in that pocket dimension, but if we’re assuming Neshamah created that dimension in the first place then I wouldn’t be surprised if – with time – he could fix it and retrieve the Skein.

Or even if he can’t fix it, at least pull the Skein out of it.

If he can't do either of those, it'd probably say more about the power of Masego's new aspect than anything else.

Jarthon 1

To repeat my last comment: The Foundling Gambit is the best gambit!

Gunslinger

Now now Man-thing vote for the guide on topwebfiction <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Ohh and toss a few bucks to support the author <https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>

*DroughtBringer*

And the Wild Hunt Returns, this shall be fun

plantsbeans

The wild hunt is *really fun*. I'm very pro-Larat.

*wirelessgrapes*

I love the irony of Malicia talking about the only way to win being not to play, and all about avoiding stories and shit, and she literally surrounded one person in a cage, got into a discussion with her, and then left dramatically declaring that the person in the cage still had use.

Fucking hell that's amazing. You have to genuinely put yourself at a disadvantage to win. You can't win the first round, because then you're just set up to lose the last. And Cat seems to have either embraced the chaos, or hasn't learned and is just bumbling her way through the Stories like that.

*wirelessgrapes*

As Malicia said, "Don't taunt the tiger in the cage"

ATRDCI

Given that the Empire already has had a historical problem with tigers that they caged, taught to be smart and dangerous and then had those tigers break out and betray them, that is literally the worst animal Malicia could have used in that sentence for Story purposes.

Rook

Technically since the wards were suppressing Cat's connection with winter, she just tried to steal the weather from said sentient tiger in the cage.

Yavandir

Tiger with invisible crossbow almost like invisible army XD

werafdsaew

I'm beginning to think that Malicia isn't actually all that good at story-fu. After all it has always been Black who's doing the killing.

Javvies

I fully agree.

Without Black and the Calamities, Malicia would never have been, far less lasted anywhere near as long.

Jason Ipswitch

Yep, that's my take too. Her strengths *story-wise* appear to have been until recently "listening to and working with Black" and, "avoiding the apparent Dread Empress-induced drive to crazytown". She's lost both those relatively recently. Maybe it was her name, maybe the decades of wrangling the metaphorical rabid velociraptors of the Wasteland nobility as acting-Chancellor while living in The Tower, or maybe just the thumb of the Heavens on the scales, but they're gone now.

Black (or even Catherine if motivated and a little lucky) could probably story-fu her back to stability, but she's not going to let them. Instead, she's going to be the consummate devious politician... who pursues flying demon-gate superweapons and makes deals with the Dead King. She's setting herself up for a climactic second act "Haha! All my machinations are working perfectly! Everyone but me is in disarray! Ahahaha!" which only ends one way in this universe.

Rook

That's less of an opinion, more of a fact. She just monologued at a beaten opponent, gloated about her victory, and instead of finishing them off just left them unattended for a daring rescue. It's like watching someone stab herself in the foot with her gun.

beleester

She's also gloating about unleashing a monster while the hero warns her that she doesn't know what she's doing, which is right up there with "consuming an energy field bigger than your head" in terms of villain fails.

MagnaMalusLupus

I mean, calling Cat a hero here is definitely a bit of a stretch; she doesn't have a Story backing her actions (which consist of arson, attempted murder, and arguably jaywalking into another palace against a nominal ally) so that she could make a pact with the lord of undeath. The hero card is very very far behind in this scene.

Yavandir

Well you are right but what catherine said was more like a hero lines and she is more fae than villain it's a difference after all in arcadia she declared herself a hero while fighting one of the fae and it kinda worked (partially but it did).

Euodiachloris

Catherine has something far worse than being a Hero on her side: she's the Underdog.

Yavandir

It honestly piss me off... Whenever she gets a power up there shows something ridiculous like saint of swords or skein I like the stories about the underdog but she shouldn't get any power up or be like a proper villain but nooooo Cat always is the underpowered one she is a fucking queen of winter it;s frustrating.

wirelessgrapes

It's cause she deliberately doesn't go full out on power, similar to how Black doesn't go full out on his Aspects. She knows there's power in being the underdog, and loss of power in maxing power, so she holds back on the Fae powers as much as possible, like she held back on Aspects

Antoninjohn

So Cat even facing her greatest weakness wards matches and slightly surpasses the best group of magic uses in will

Ethereal

I don't see that. I saw that even with Thief's help, she couldn't break out... until she remembered the whistle (which I personally had forgotten she had).

marillius

I still don't see how it makes sense, personally, that Cat, for all of her power, has a weakness to Wards. None of the bloody Fey seemed to have that weakness before or, if they did, none of the mages in Cat's army ever tried using it. More over it seems to be strong enough to CAGE a Fey Monarch. HOW?

---

Well, the whole point of Akua having advantage against the Fae was that diabolists and Praesi mages in general are capable of slapping together a ward on the fly. Compare that to, say, Hedge Wizard, who had knowledge of nearly all branches of magic on the level of an average non-Praesi practitioner and still told Hanno that she didn't want to risk a miscalculation while building a ward. Add to that the fact that Liesse had wards strong enough it took the Princess of High Noon to dent them, that the revolving wards made most fairies (and Cat) get stuck in a loop of hitting them and getting hit back, and you'll see that it's been established pretty well.

marillius

And yet here we are with something stronger than the Princess of High Noon and wards weaker than what the Hedge Wizard has (Named are always better than not, even if their 'story' is that they know a lot of weaker magic) but somehow, though the Winter Queen is something no one has ever seen before, they made wards perfectly suited to stopping her. Whereas the Princess of High Noon was able to take down Liesse's walls which, if I remember correctly (I may actually not, it's been a while since I've reread the story), had pretty ancient and powerful wards in their walls or at the very least wards created by another named and countless other mages (because army) and it only slowed her down in the end, or would have at any rate.

There is a clear disparity in how much the wards are affecting Cat and the question remains that if they were this strong why had the Apprentice, a powerful named mage, never created a ward to deal with them. Even if it was a transitional mage he showed himself to be the equal of Akua at almost every turn, if perhaps lacking in certain secrets her family had (though probably not as many as one would think given Warlocks desire for knowledge). If this is because Cat is still holding back somehow then that's fine, because she's basically limited herself in almost painful ways given she's actually meant to be stronger than any of the Princes or Princesses we've seen before (We have never seen her fight at a level over the Duchess of Moonlight night save for in very specific, massive brute force workings or when Akua was piloting her so that is really the only way this works. Though you'd think fighting wards would be a matter of brute force given how they describe how she does it so even that doesn't work on close scrutiny.)

But if this is a weakness all Fey are supposed to have, even the high and mighty ones, then it's inconsistent with how Cat dealt with them in the war having the Apprentice at her disposal and yes, even how Akua dealt with them, since the supposed specialist of wards did jack all against ranks Princess and up with wards alone (she beat the princess but she didn't do it by trapping her in a ward bubble).

Given how remarkably consistent a lot of this magical world is this seems like a very strange thing to have crop up. By the reasoning the story is now presenting the apprentice could have 'caged' a bunch of tigers. Even if he was doing it to only one or two a battle then he could have still locked down Prince and Duke level fellows, at the very least, and probably the King and Queens too, since you can't tell me the apprentice wasn't a match for four random wasteland cannon fodder mages. But the apprentice, arguably Akua's equal or better in magic, and far superior than these NPC's Cat's facing right now, never even thought of it?

The only other explanation is that Cat believes wards are a bigger deal than they are and is hamstringing herself out of stupidity and a lack of care to ask Hierophant how to fight them and thus learn that she doesn't need to. Because otherwise the Apprentice, who would have totally been on board for dissecting a Fey, never once thought to capture a few of them during battles, particularly not the stronger ones, and Thiefs whole 'steal the sun' gambit wouldn't have even been necessary because apparently you can pop a ward any old place.

werafdsaew

Cat is not as strong as the Princess of High Noon

Byzantine

Cat is stronger in a sense, but can't call on that power freely.

Necronomist

My read was that this ward was made to exploit a weakness unique to Cat. She's still, to some extent, a human mind holding Winter (that is, avoiding Principle Alienation). Normally this isn't a problem because she can just draw on more power, but unlike a normal Fae it means she can be cut off from her Mantle.

Alternately, there are tricks the other Fae have learned such as seeking weak points in wards that Cat simply lacks the magical knowledge to perform.

But my bet is on separating the Mantle being a unique weakness. Once you do that you aren't fighting the whole of Winter, just a relatively easily contained fragment of it.

RanVor

Have you considered that Cat is not the Queen of Winter in the Fae sense? She is the Queen, and she is of Winter, but as far as Fae titles go, she's still "only" Duchess of Moonless Nights. Being the last remaining noble of Winter doesn't automatically make her Hells know how powerful. She's nowhere as strong as Sulia at the height of power.

Necronomist

Didn't Larat address her as the Queen of Air and Darkness?

RanVor

What Larat says is irrelevant. Cat fights on the level of the Duchess of Moonless Nights because she is on the level of Duchess of Moonless Nights. She didn't suddenly become exponentially more powerful upon becoming the last noble of Winter. I'm pretty sure she would know it if she did.

Byzantine

Uh, Ran, that is quite literally **exactly** what happened. It was stated pretty clearly that she did, in fact, become exponentially more powerful when she became the last Noble of Winter – that was why the first attempt to keep her power in check when her heart was returned failed far faster than expected.

RanVor

Ok, so the amount of collective power in Arcadia effectively doubled, because it's only logical for the United Fae Court to be as powerful as Winter and Summer combined, and they couldn't take Winter with them because Winter belongs to Cat. And if they couldn't take Winter, logically they couldn't take Summer as well. That means they had to create an entirely new power from nothing.

Anyway, even if Cat actually is as powerful as the King of Winter and more, the Principle Alienation ensures she can never ever use this power in full, so she's effectively not.

marillius

1. Right, but that means we're talking about a point I covered, ie 'Cat is hamstringing herself to keep her mortal mind'. That is fine. But then how does everyone else KNOW that she's doing it, then? Why would they think someone with her power even capable of being caged by a ward?

2. We know she's stronger by a looooooot compared to what she used to be. She's done much, much harder, much more brutal and much more powerful workings on par with the Princess and even the Queen, at least in terms of raw power. With a little bit of guidance from the Hierophant she killed thousands of soldiers in a single attack. Hierophant did nothing but aim that bad boy, it was her doing it. And while she didn't use something like a Sun to do it she still did it and it took the fricking lazars of light to stop her.

We know she's not tapping into the full breadth of that power because she also explicitly says that. But how does Malicia know Cat survived the process? Or is Malicia under the mistaken belief that Cat is still a Duchess ranked fey, despite having the Wild Hunt at her service? Someone is making a mistake in judgement here for this ward prison to even be possible OR a bunch of someones made mistakes in the past when they never thought to try it.

marillius

Just realized you were being sarcastic. Thought it was strange wording but I had seen stranger so sorry there for not seeing it before.

The fact of the matter is we don't know what happened to the Fey Courts after everything. We haven't been told if they're just as strong as they used to be or not. We can probably assume they are but the fact of the matter is that we do know that Cat has all of Winter (yes, all of it, it has been explicitly stated), and that much like Names on the mortal realm, Winter Means Something (or meant something) and because it Meant Something, the way Names like Black Knight Mean Something, it has power.

We also know that Winter Means Something in a Big Way because of what we've heard them say and what we've seen Cat do. It is explicitly shown that she is much more powerful then she was as a duchess. She didn't simply get the title Queen because she was the last noble left, she also got a looooot of power that comes with the throne. Think of it like a Name. It's not coming from no where, it's coming from a culture that used to Fear Winter for the cold nights that could kill it, still reveries it as an ever immutable fact of the world that can claim lives on a whim, still writes poetry of it for the beauty it holds on quiet moonlit nights and dark stories about monsters shrouded in shadows of moonless nights.

That is Winter. Winter is a Name with so many more Stories then a mortal Name could ever hold that those who gain that Name lose themselves in it more fully and become Something Else. Cat is Winter. Cat is all of those stories. Cat is relentless Blizzards and Cat is the single, perfect snowflake that is the first snowfall of the year. Cat is everything in between the beginning and end of Winter as well. You think there are a lot of stories of Black Knights? There are millions, if not billions, more of Winter, and Winter is hardly constrained to a few nations and cultures the way Knights are. And those stories create power the same way a culture creates power in names.

It is very likely that if the Fey Monarchs are as strong as they were then they are tapping into a new story. Perhaps something about immortal gods, like the Greek Gods, or perhaps something like the Tuatha Dé Danann, immortal sidhe lords. They were already like the latter in a way so it's not so far of a stretch to assume they're going that route. But in the end that means they're tapping into a different vein of power, a different story. Which makes sense since we explicitly know and have been told... Winter is no longer Winter. The Winter King is no longer Winter. Cat is Winter. Which means the Winter King and the Summer Queen are probably something else altogether now, divested of their warring courts and their warring nature's.

RanVor

Well, except as far as we know, Cat didn't receive the title of the Queen of Winter at all, although titles kind of stop mattering when you're the only one eligible. And even if she did get the entirety of Winter at her disposal (which is leagues above the power the King of Winter used to have and would make her able to obliterate half the continent in a heartbeat, at least), this power remains inaccessible to her, and inaccessible power = no power. Also, she didn't actually do anything special at the Battle of the Camps – she just made a big gate and let the gravity do the rest.

Although I must admit, I never thought about Winter the way you described it here. Incidentally, it makes all the clamor in the comments about Cat getting a new Name somewhat ridiculous. Why would she need a new Name when she has something greater than any Name can ever hope to be?

marillius

You are not wrong about the power she has and how little it matters if she can't use it, but at the very least we know one thing. She does have the Authority to name others in Winter's domain dukes and such. We've heard it mentioned before as 'handing out titles', a nuclear option she doesn't want to resort to because it puts a huuuuge target on her back and creates a lot more wheeling and dealing Fey that could challenge her. (That second one is my guess, at least.)

She has ALL of Winter but that doesn't necessarily mean she has access to it all. The king himself never seemed diminished by the lack of the other titles so it's more likely that she can't touch them while representing Winter as Queen, accessing another the stories those titles represent. It still means she's about on par in terms of Raw Power as the King, even if she can't use it all without losing herself. As far as the Gate was concerned you might want to check every Named and their reactions to that. The 'BFG' or 'Big Fricking Gate' as I'd like it called, if I were lucky enough to make such a joke relevant, was something even the Pilgrim had been caught off guard by and he's basically Gandalf. When you surprise Gandalf, you be crazy, and what she did was an extremely powerful working. You mistake how she did it for 'easy' when in truth she was doing something 'smart'. Rather than spend ALL of her power simply conjuring that much water she decided to just get it elsewhere.

(SPOILERS to Wheel of Time)

One of my favorite parts of the Wheel of Time books was when a character with similar magics started opening gates inside volcanos to pour on enemies.

(UNSPOILERS)

Same effect, far less energy required, allowing her to do even more and worse (Such as get up a bit later being piloted by Akua, raise an entire legion of undead and then face down some pretty powerful ass heroes). There's no doubt in my mind she has the Kings power. What she seems to lack is the ability to use it freely and the control and experience he had using it.

One final point. Giving her a new name, at least in my mind, isn't so much about giving her more power. At least for me I kind of want one for her to give her character a bit more direction and distinction. The problem with Winter is not only that it's a power unimaginable unable to be touched and earning her enemies in that weight class... But it's also vague. It's power is infinite but so defuse, spread across so many stories, that Winter Queen is really... It's cool, but squire had more flavor, Black Queen had more personal meaning and another name would allow us to see growth in a more distinct sense. She's learning to use her powers all the time in this clusterfuck of a plan but it feels way less impactful than her earning an Aspect and then learning how to use it in new ways. A title that doesn't have much, or any power, would be interesting for her to have.

RanVor

Just to clarify, I never said nor thought what she did at the Battle of the Camps was "easy". I only said it was an upscaled version of what she's been doing all the time up to that point. It certainly required a far greater power than opening a normal gate, but also far less power than she could have poured into it. That she managed to do something that grand in scale with relatively little energy investment is what makes it so impressive, in my opinion.

Alas, for want of a counterpoint for your argument regarding titles, I am forced to reluctantly withdraw from my position on the matter of Cat being a titular Queen of Winter. You win. Rejoice.

I still don't believe she's as strong as the King of Winter, though.

Aehriman

Don't know how binding it is or how well-informed he'd be, but Neshemah at least called Cat the Sovereign of Moonless Nights.

Death Knight

Though many glossed over this tidbit but EE did imply Malicia is a mage.

In his comment regarding catherine learning magic way back in Book 1 he said that no matter how much Cat calls on a magical aspect she'd never be able to do what Warlock or Malicia could do on an off day.

It's entirely plausible Malicia, being Named, crafted said ward and taught and drilled her personal warlocks how to cast the spell which is why the spell wasn't binding: the pleb mages didn't have the skill and/or power to make Cat truly powerless as Malicia or Warlock would have been able to.

Or, more plausibly, Warlock taught her the ward seeing as he also has no love for Catherine and after their standoff over Nauk's body, I'd bet an aspect he has some really nasty wards in reserve for when he and Cat butt heads again.

Remember few people could derive Einstein's theory of relativity from first principles but a lot of people with a maths and physics background can use said equations so I think its reasonable to assume that the same can be said here.

marillius

This is a fascinating possibility that I actually like quite a bit. Would be exactly like the prick and he is still buddy-buddy with Malicia. A possible third theory! I love it.

grzecho2222

First step of plan always works

MetruX

I think you need to read again. Masego DID put several noble fae in wards, especially durable ones so he could discover from them what summer plans were. And when Thief stole the sun he had just had his ward broken, after making it on the go and STILL holding down the princess, also known for having the highest direct power from all non queen/king fae. Yes, it has been shown to be a massive weakness of this species, so much so that they couldn't bring nobles to attack inside the city when it all began, only the weaker ones could pass through, which seems to imply the stronger you are, the harder this hits. But also you must consider that, when at Arcadia, it wasn't only their own power being used, every titled fae could draw a part of reality itself to his aid, while the queen and the king could draw fully half of creation, becoming gods, if minor ones. Cat can't draw from reality around her, and more than that, there is no more Winter besides her. Even IF she is to be as strong as a Fae Queen, she is still severely limited in her power, besides the fact Winter got separated from her, something that would never happen with a true fae.

marillius

So your logic boils down to the same as the others, a matter of raw power and how much of it Cat has. I agree that it's a possibility but I disagree that Cat doesn't have access to the power of a Fey Monarch. I think it much more likely she does, if she were to relent to winter. It is very possible Cat as of now can only call upon that raw power in controlled circumstances, or with Akua's aid, but we know she can. She killed Thousands in a single stroke with only a little bit of help aiming from the Heirophant and then when Akua was driving her she flash froze a lake.

Neither of those things were possible as a duchess level fey. Even doing something a hundredth or a thousandth that size tired her out. And flash freezing a lake of that size? That takes some serious energy (I mean from a purely scientific point of view. This story doesn't hold to science but it does hold to general idea that magic takes energy and notable magical feats are plenty and regular enough for us to divine Cat is basically a fricking nuclear bomb compared to the bip lighters that are most mages.

That she can't touch it is a possibility, not without relenting to winter or with a lot of help, but the idea that she can be separated from winter doesn't make sense either anymore. She IS winter. She is made of it. If they cut her off from it she would have ceased being. More then likely this is a result of her being split and still carrying around a mortal mind but then that begs the question of how Malicia knows that's a problem of hers and why she'd think she could contain a Monarch level Fey with four NPC mages. The story seems to hint that Malicia doesn't know Cat is the Queen of Winter with one of the idiot NPC's calling her the Black Queen, still, but how stupid does Malicia have to be to not know that given that it's been MONTHS and she's done crazy things like drop Lakes on armies? So how does Malicia know she can't tap into the full breadth of that? Or has the story been pulling one over on us, convincing us that Cat is holding back when she's actually not, and is barely more powerful then before?

The problem with the idea that Cat can be trapped by wards is that, if you are right and it did happen often enough in the story during the war, it still failed against a Princess, something Cat is at least as strong as, and was done by Apprentice, something these NPC mages are not. If she doesn't have that kind of power because she can't tap into it, fine, but how does Malicia know she doesn't and why does she think this ward would work? For all Malicia knows Cat is actually Winter incarnate pretending to be Cat ready to ride high and rip her apart for annoying her, which means this ward was a stupid trap, a desperate gamble that seems out of character for her.

For this to work Cat cannot tap into even a tenth of her true might (to be held by NPC mages instead of someone on Apprentices level), Malicia has to KNOW that Cat can't tap into that power despite evidence to the contrary (thousands dead, lake flash frozen, etc) and Cat is basically doubly crippled for not being able to throw around her power in the weight class she is actually in and also have a severe, unmitigated weakness to wards any two bit no names can throw up. (The story can say they're the Wastelands best all they want but the story also goes into great pains to detail what she's done with the Wastelands best in the past. Remember Liesse? Cat sure seems to forget how she mowed down dozens of mages like this on her search for an entrance to Diabolists lair.)

And this is all possible but we have seen hints to the contrary for several of these things. Cat can't do much in the way of complicated Winter Workings or reality warping but she has been able to, at times, throw a punch like she's a Queen of the Fey, fight someone of a standard near, if not actually at, Ranger's level, and bend reality to her whim (slightly) by realizing there is no spoon and turning into mist for short times. Meanwhile Malicia here was more than happy to out who she was sitting inside like a meat suit before she was certain Cat wasn't really toying with her and pretending to be trapped, suggesting she was confident in the Wards as an option without testing empirically.

This could boil down to Malicia being that green when it comes to actual adventuring (she taunted the tiger, left it alive like a bond villain and is about to pay the price after all), Cat still hamstringing herself (because she can never not be her own worst enemy) and these NPC mages somehow really being good enough to stand up to something far stronger than a duke (she may not be able to match princess while holding back but she's leagues about what she was, all the same) but until the story says it these questions stand. And here is a good opportunity to get that answer. Hierophant should have probably figured it out already but he's oblivious to how ignorant Cat is sometimes where as Larat totally thinks of her as a moron, even if she is better than humans. If he's disgusted by how easily she's trapped by wards we know that it's Cat's fault for holding back and Malicia is a grade A idiot for thinking she could ward trap her without evidence. If he's not, or doesn't say anything at all, then we still have to wonder how Cat, of all the Fey Monarchs, is so easy to put into a bottle like any old pixie.

TeK

Princess of High Noon was kept under wards by unnamed legionaire mages (while it was CRAFTED by Hierophant, the power was not drawn from him) for almost a month. Liesse wards are on the walls, and the ones Diabolist build were impregnable to Summer, until a way was found. So no, I don't believe that Cat, after two fights with bullshit op Named would have trouble breaking through a ward that was crafted for the specific purpose of keeping her in, hold by some of the most powerful Praesi practitioners. And it's not even that. The problem is not breaking through per se, it's breaking through IN TIME to kill Malicia before she runs off. To summarise, no, I don't see a problem.

Javvies

Well, that could have gone better. Could've gone worse, too.

Larat and the Hunt. Did not see that coming.

I wonder where Archer is. And Hakram

Hmmm. It being a fleshpuppet rather than Malicia herself is a problem. Malicia's going to have time to act against Callow/Cat/Black/et al.

I agree with Cat, Malicia's apparent plan is stupid plan. Even "Evil never wins" truly applies to the Dead King, it's unlikely to be in the way Malicia seems to think it will. Remember – Triumphant managed to take all of Calernia and hold onto it for five years. The Dead King has way more to work with than She did, and doesn't have to fight through Callow and the Vales to get at Procer.

Also, I suspect that the Dead King isn't a fan of being used, manipulated, or otherwise played, especially by lesser beings like mortals, even Named ones.

The Dead King is not going to expend anything valuable to help Malicia, certainly not enough to endanger him, even in a worst case scenario. He might make more effort to help Cat, especially since Cat is asking for far less. And, y'know, is a fellow Immortal with the potentiality, if not actuality, of Apothesis.

Byzantine

Frankly I think he sees Cat as something interesting. Her existence is worth putting a little effort in, if only to see what she does. Perhaps he can use it to aid in his real goal. Malicia is only interesting because of the challenge she poses for Cat.

Yotz

Well, since "Evil never wins", this pretty much guarantees Malicia a beneficial outcome. Even if that paradigm will not ensue her safety against the DK – with her being evil and such, she won't need to oppose him directly. She had read the map and made a bet on the nature of Callow and Black Queen. Resulting massacre of callowan forces, civilians, and overall loss of life has no significance to her. She makes a leap of faith, though – by believing that Callow would be able to hold DK long enough for the Karma to hit him fair and square, and – maybe – with gaining a degree of protection from being seen as the much lesser of two evils cause of the "eviler than thou" shtick associated with Hidden Horror.

Also, there is a muddled matter of invitation boundaries. Triumphant managed to take all of Calernia because she had no such limits. Whenever DK physically can't break the limiting conditions, may ignore them at will but will be forced to suffer the consequences, or does not give a flying phuck about such trivialities and only plays along because it alleviates the boredom... remains to be seen.

While I'll agree with you on the matter of DK not being a fan of being a puppet – if he knows that such attempt is being undertaken, I can see him playing along for his own amusement. Also, for classic SEIC gambit, if supposed puppeteer predictably turns out to be not very smart.

While your final point holds, there is a matter of scale and a question of knowledge. More precisely – do Malicia knows about DK's predisposition towards Cat, or does she deems his usual condescending disinterest towards any outsider being in play here? As to scale – a few millions of bone puppets and several lesser Ravenants may be of no value to the DK, but still present a threat of apocalyptic proportions to the rest of Calernia.

Yotz

Well, since "Evil never wins", this pretty much guarantees Malicia a beneficial outcome. Even if that paradigm will not ensue her safety against the DK – with her being evil and such, she won't need to oppose him directly. She had read the map and made a bet on the nature of Callow and Black Queen. Resulting massacre of callowan forces, civilians, and overall loss of life has no significance to her. She makes a leap of faith, though – by believing that Callow would be able to hold DK long enough for the Karma to hit him fair and square, and – maybe – with gaining a degree of protection from being seen as the much lesser of two evils cause of the "eviler than thou" shtick associated with Hidden Horror.

Also, there is a muddled matter of invitation boundaries. Triumphant managed to take all of Calernia because she had no such limits. Whenever DK physically can't break the limiting conditions, may ignore them at will but will be forced to suffer the consequences, or does not give a flying phuck about such trivialities and only plays along because it alleviates the boredom... remains to be seen.

While I'll agree with you on the matter of DK not being a fan of being a puppet – if he knows that such attempt is being undertaken, I can see him playing along for his own amusement. Also, for classic SEIC gambit, if supposed puppeteer predictably turns out to be not very smart.

While your final point holds, there is a matter of scale and a question of knowledge. More precisely – do Malicia knows about DK's predisposition towards Cat, or does she deem his usual condescending disinterest towards any outsider being in play here? As to scale – a few millions of bone puppets and several lesser Ravenants may be of no value to the DK, but still present a threat of apocalyptic proportions to the rest of Calernia.

lennymaster

You are forgetting one of the major linchpins of this story. Preas is rich in valuable gems and metals, but poor in arable land, to the point where every Emperor/ress has miserably failed at managing their massive overpopulation problems with anything other than a big-ass war every few decades.

It is the story of Preas to take and Callow to be taken, at least it was until Black made the impossible happen by conquering it.

For Callow to be overrun by undead monstrosities means to lose the granary of her own Empire. You could say DK would still make and provide her with food, but why should he? All he has to do is wait for Preas to start up the old game again and bleed her of people / gain soldiers every other generation.

Yotz

On the contrary, I do not forget that peculiarity. I simply presumed, that due to Malicia's actions significant loss of Praesi population is in order. So, in fact, significant, that its remaining population of Praes would be able to sustain themselves with the output of the Green Stretch and blood rituals.

After the deal, she will support Callow in their struggle against DK with troops, and will withdraw said support the moment their parity would be under the threat of shifting either way.

In this scenario, Malicia is making two main assumptions, betting on the "Evil will lose" hitting DK, and Callow's stubbornness quagmiring him away from the vital regions of Praes. If – one – Callow will be burned and drained of population, but not despoiled to wasteland condition; and – two – DK would be cast down due to "natural" course of the Story; as a result Malicia will have time to repopulate Praes, and restore and reform Legions as her loyal force. After the inevitable – from Malicia's point of view – defeat of Dead King, Praes will be standing with fresh powerful armies while being again on the verge of famine, and Callow would be completely exsanguinated, and left open for the Praesi reoccupation, or vassalage at worst. And since most of the capable callowans would be by that moment purged from the land, new regime would be mostly accepted, all while Procer would be unable to do anything about that.

All this, naturally, will crash and burn spectacularly – but Malicia simply refuses to accept version of the future where she is wrong on that matter.

Jane

...Well, that went well. I'm having trouble remembering exactly the last time Cat messed things up this badly. Trapped helpless in a cage while her morality pet/best friend/crush is killed in front of her? That's a pretty colossal blunder. She really needs to work out a real way of dealing with wards – burning a rare and precious, nearly irreplaceable artifact every time just isn't sustainable. Not unless she's willing to start up a Hero Farm.

I get her reasoning, but she knows Thief just isn't a killer. Yes, she might have killed some people in the past, but she's not deft enough at it to kill the wizards trapping Cat while they're being guarded by elite soldiers, and Cat should have realized this. Invisibility is a nice cheat, but it's not unstoppable, and Thief is not Assassin.

Malicia's plan isn't terrible, except for one key flaw; it's something of a matter of faith on the continent that Evil can never win, but it's not something that can overrule basic logic. If there's a way for Good to win, then the Gods Above will play any card to make it happen within reason – but that requires a way for Good to win. They can make plenty of tailor-made Heroes to exploit any opening the Dead King gives them, but if the difference in power is great enough, they're still doomed – just like how Praes was able to defeat Callow, and how Triumphant was able to conquer half the continent before she was brought down.

Even if common wisdom were correct, though, and Evil was incapable of winning, that presumes the scale of the story isn't too large – that conquering all of Praes isn't the "backstory" of the Dead King's rise to power, to establish him as the threat the rest of the continent needs to deal with. Or that the "backstory" isn't how a foolish Empress let him conquer the entire continent, and the rest of the world needs to stop him. For most, that wouldn't be a terrible assumption, but she doesn't realize just how powerful the Dead King has become while out of sight.

If the Dead King were just a normal, powerful Villain, it would be a great way to cripple Praes and unravel the alliance. If she were dealing with the Ratlings, or a souped-up Tyrant, it would be a fine plan. But this is the equivalent of setting off a hydrogen bomb when you thought you were using TNT, and the Gods will have no room to intervene.

Though... Whether she's aware of it or not, the Dead King is probably much less of a threat to the Empire than Praes was, so his swift, decisive victory probably still works out to her advantage. The occasional raid and border skirmish is a lot less of an existential threat than the periodic crusades. Nice job fixing it, Malicia?...

As a final, idle thought, I wonder... The last few chapters have dropped several references to how Thief isn't a killer; from Akua's conversation about how Thief's name didn't change alongside her team, to how the team teases her for being bad at murder, to the latest failures at assassination. I wonder, is this just establishing character dynamics that ran into some coincidences with the plot, or is this building up to another plot point in the near future? Normally, I'd just put out of mind, but, well, this is a web serial, so it'll be a couple of weeks before there's enough updates that I can write it off as coincidence.

TeK

Oh, there is one thing you misunderstand, I think. DK is idle against Procer because he's Evil and they are Good. There is nothing, nothing that stops him from attacking other Evil forces. Well, currently Elves and Procer stop him, but you get my point.

Jane

Eh, that's not quite the read I got from his conversation with Cat. If he eats Praes, he eats one of the few countries willing to give him license to act in the world. Much better to wait around until a future Dread Empress pulls him out to take Ashur, or Gigantes.

I mean, he needs "permission" to trick the Narrative into letting him take Good countries, and Evil countries are good tools for that. Why take that possibility off the board, just so that you can get a little bit of land you don't really need a couple of centuries earlier?

TeK

He needs permission to not be the story's main antagonist, but he doesn't have to have an established Evil nation for this, merely a Villain, important enough. After all, DK needs corpses and Praes has overpopulation problems. Can't you see? It's the match made in Hells!

Jane

Yeah, but it's a lot easier to get an established Evil nation to invite the Dead King to go after their foes than it is to hope that a prominent Villain sticks around long enough to give him an opening – and another Evil nation is also more likely to give him sufficient cover, instead of flaking out as a decoy antagonist that leaves him the main villain. And even setting that aside, if nothing else, Praes is guaranteed to possess a villain of appropriate stature to free him at all times; even if they don't take advantage of the opportunity, isn't it better to have another opportunity than not?

The Good nations are the ones that it's narratively difficult to deal with, after all, and so it's best for him to leave as many chances to deal with them as possible. Once the last of them has been conquered, he can deal with all of the Evil nations within a year.

TeK

Really? There is only one Praesi Tyrant that was qualified to let him off the leash. That we know of, sure, but the point stands. Many tried, I guess, but Silent Palace begs to differ.

As for Good nations, you'll be surprised how easy it is to flip Evil Empire to the Good side when alternative is a eternity of slavery.

Jane

Well, most Dread Emperors and Empresses after Triumphant were incompetent, insane, tried to wage war on the Dead King themselves, or were preoccupied with Callow and thought they could handle it themselves – post-Triumphant and pre-Malicia, there was rarely really a reason to bring up the Dead King, even if they were willing. After all, how many of them thought the Dead King could help an them turn themselves into a giant spider, or raise an army of invisible sentient tigers? Meanwhile, asking him to help with Callow would no doubt mean offering up a slice of Callow, and Callow was always just an insect waiting to be crushed (if you asked the average Dread Emperor, just ignore all the times Callow refused to be crushed).

But all of them could have called upon the Dead King if they'd asked. Just the narrative weight of having the largest Evil Empire (on paper) is enough to cement their role in the Narrative, regardless of how flawed they are as a Villain. And if a Dread Empress isn't enough to reliably call on the Dead King, how many Villains who haven't conquered a kingdom of their own could hope to do so? Even if most Dread Empresses haven't called upon him, at least two have – which makes one more than can be said of anyone else on the continent, if we count Cat.

As for Evil going Good out of self-preservation... That's easier said than done. Most Villains we've seen so far are "Rage against the Heavens" types who are perfectly aware that they're destroying themselves, but would rather end with style or to prove a philosophical point than save their own lives. Would Akua have ever flipped, before Cat defeated her? Black? The Tyrant of Hekat? To be Named by the Gods Below seems to demand that you devote yourself to your beliefs no matter the cost.

It's theoretically possible that an Evil nation might flip if they thought it would protect them from the Dead King, but I just can't see any of them doing it. Even Cat, the Villain we've seen who's most willing to entertain the idea, never went through with it. Besides, after a few centuries of (mostly) peaceful co-existence, I have to imagine most of them would end up pretty complacent.

And lastly, the Evil nations of the world consist of, what... Praes, Callow, and a few city-states? It's a reasonable trade – more opportunities to take out any of the dozens of Good nations, in return for having to wait a bit longer for the last two. The city-states don't really count, because they'll probably be taken after war with the League as a whole.

Novice

I think you have written Praes when you've meant Procer several times.

Jane

...Yes, yes I did. I blame having had Malicia on my mind while I was writing.

A pity I can't edit it now...

Antoninjohn

Cat used the Call whistle on one of her Fea to eat her own fingers so she can reform the whistle

Jane

This is the quote I found regarding the whistle and its limitations; while it doesn't explicitly say that the power is gone once the whistle is used, that would seem to me to be a more natural reading of the text. If she could make another after using one, I would think that it would have been mentioned here.

Regarding the Fae eating her fingers –

The reference to the effects of Principle Alienation suggests to me that she simply used the “basic” powers of Winter – I didn’t see anything suggesting that she used Call, or otherwise employed a stolen Aspect to deal with the Fae.

Cold Cyberia

Thief was kind of a dummy in this chapter. Instead of killing the mages she should’ve stolen the ward and let Catherine deal with them. We know her aspect affects magic (Sulia’s Sun, Akua’s binding on Cat) so going for a kill was just a silly move.

---

She already stole the moonlight sword from Spellblade, so given how Steal works, it might have been her only use of that Aspect for the day.

Novice

Have we seen Thief use Yoink (totally the name of her aspect) multiple times in succession?

Azure

It’s setting up the fact that Thief is a double agent and is still working for ‘good’. The invisible knife at Catherine’s throat. Wonder how much Bard is in effect here to get her to do this.

I really don’t want it to play out this way as I’m a big fan of Vivienne and Catherine but all signs are pointing to that. I just hope I’m wrong.

superkeaton

I love everything about this chapter

TeK

“Evil never wins wars”. Welp. It’s funny, but technically, Malicia is Evil and is at war. Also, one thing she does not account for, is the fact that Dead King is not a country, it’s a Hidden Horror. Cordelia had gone through much trouble crafting Crusade against mortal country. Against Dead King? Everyone would fight. They can’t afford not to.

Moreover, she thinks that Dead King will lose, because he’s “Evil and Evil doesn’t win wars”, but, first and foremost, in this story, it’s not Dead King’s war. He is merely a weapon. A demon in the box. And the owner is Malicia, however implausible the word owner is, given the situation. Any war with Dead King is a war against Malicia "The-One-Who-Let-Him-Out". To put it simply, he's a weapon she's using to wage a war. She should lose then, right?

shieldredblog

Also it's just stupid to assume you know more about Evil and war than the First Abomination.
A Evil ruler that has ruled for centuries and beat back a half dozen Crusades.

There may be rules against Evil 'Winning' wars but it seems like even a tie is good enough when your immortal. You can eke out small victories over the long term and still come ahead.

happyhavak

Also didn't evil literally just win a war like 20 years ago? The or does it not count if it's Callow?

Snowfire1224

Yeah and wasn't it her own underling, Black, that conquered callow? I mean I know there might be a demon of absence around but I think she'd remember that.

Dainpdf

She's playing a Fabian strategy where she "loses" but at no real cost.

Dainpdf

Did Malicia just try to get the Callowan to forgive and forget? Masterful.

Jane

Honestly, it feels more to me like she's deliberately provoking Cat into... Something. What, I have no idea, but I think she has a plan that relies on an angry Cat going after her once they're both back in their respective kingdoms. One part of it is probably arranging things such that she can dispose of Cat on her own terms, but I imagine there's a secondary goal as well that we're not aware of. Schemers like that never just have one motive.

Of course, she's going into things on the assumption that she'll have a treaty with the Dead King in place, and she won't, so... We might never see what her "real" plan was, given how her stay in Keter isn't going to end as she intended. I have to imagine that related to her original plan for Cat somehow.

Dainpdf

Might be a catch-22, too. She may have a plan for if Cat defeats her here, too.

Nima

What a cunt. Hope theres backlash when the simalucrum obliterate by cat

Novice

"Now now, man-thing," he chided. "That's just no way to speak about your superiors."

Welp, Larat just rose drastically in my list of favorites even though he's a treacherous lieutenant and kind of a one-sided character. Skaven remains to be my favorite faction in WH Fantasy.

frolamiz

So, it just occurred to me that Callow has an unlinked hellgate. I always assumed it would be used for some sort of invasion force to invade Callow (Triumphant or something similar), but if her alliance with the Dead King survive the Uncivil Wars, it could be used as a short-cut between their kingdoms since they are a little far from each other.

grzecho2222

Hellgate is from one Hell to another now, so most likely can be linked to anywhere.

SpeckofStardust

So.

Plans involving Thief killing people will always fail.

Malicia Is still going to get the smallest amount she needed out of this trip (Dead king moving)

And Cat is now openly going to move west after booting her to hostages out of her kingdom without killing them so that they can send along a message about trouble up north.

Black is about to do something Evil and unexpected

The city states is going to attack someone.

oh... If all deals with cat and 'Good' people are undone then does that mean angels are going to pop up or will that agreement be kept?

And the elves are going to continue to hide like a bunch of little bitches.

And this is the current geopolitical situation in a nutshell.

TeK

Who's Putin in that metaphor? Asking for a friend, he's my KGB curator.

Yotz

'Tis a silly question.
Putin is The Truth, of course.
Also, The Law.

revin

Hold on a second. Everyone is talking about Thief screwing up, but did she know about Cat agreeing to keep the super weapon? If Cat never told her about that, it seems like that kind of thing that could shake Thief's faith in Cat a great deal. The kind of thing that might make thief hesitate to help Cat when she calls for her "secret weapon" perhaps?

Tohron

So, Galadan wouldn't happen to be an adventurer, by any chance?

LeTouriste

"To declare an assertion of the People untrue is unlawful, even if it was retroactively asserted by vote to be untrue, at which point referring to it as either true or untrue is equally unlawful."

makes so much sense...poor belerophon

Jane

Hey, they can always vote to change it if they don't like it.

I mean, they'll be charged with treason, executed, and their vote revoked if they do. But it's still their right to vote.

TeK

Noone can possibly punish you for voting. Unless, of course, you are voting for a wrong thing.

Jonnnney

This is getting pretty stupid. I wonder what the next thing the protagonist is gonna just forget about until the last minute in order to further the plot. She could have called on the wild hunt during the whole fucking conversation, but it just didn't fucking occur to her until after the antagonist couldn't be easily attacked? That's bad writing. Entertaining, but bad.

Faiir

Well I thought Cat didn't call on the Hunt before to limit the mess she makes – we're still not sure how much will the Dead King tolerate, and this would change it into an open battle.

Jane

This really wasn't a critical point for Cat, though, at least as far as she's concerned. If she doesn't stop Malicia now... Well, there's still a chance another member of the Woe can stop her, or that she can break out after a couple more minutes. And if not... Well, then, Malicia wins the bidding war, Procer loses a few territories, and Malicia can proceed to the next stage of her plan – something which is probably bad for Cat, but which probably still has more opportunities for Cat to stop her.

Is it really worth losing a powerful tool over?

Losing Thief, on the other hand... That's another matter. No way is Cat going to let someone she cares about die in front of her, not if she has any reasonable chance of preventing it.

Alivaril

Personally, my only real complaint is how Cat didn't take the "try to kill me" and roll with it, even if only briefly – Cat IS glad it was a puppet and that's honestly an important detail.

As for the storytelling complaint... Are you familiar with the mindset of "I might need it later" for video game consumables? Once you've dismissed something as a desirable solution enough times, it effectively ceases to BE an option. You might not even remember to use it during the final boss fight out of sheer force of habit.

I will be quite unhappy if Thief dies, but that's mostly just because I like her and strongly dislike some of the heavy-handed death flags a handful of chapters ago. Well, that and Cat lapsing back into depression right when she's starting to regain some confidence in her own decisions.

Someguy

Well, Cat's head is only there for decorative purposes so...

TeK

Trying to save a disposable, one use only, irreproducible, powerful tool that would be just as effective "after" all other avenues are explored is unrealistic for you? God, please tell me I'm actually right at this and not turning into a fanboy.

Compass with Hat

So. I'm thinking everyone in Praes, Malicia and even Black missed something.

They were so focused on the Story that they missed something.

Who is the orphaned girl from an oppressed town being brought into the service of a Knight? Who was the girl who was given lead of an Army by a leader to defeat her enemies? Who has been steadily defeating enemies while doing the "Right Thing" and making her city better?

They are so focused on their own Stories they never thought to ask, "who is the overall protagonist?"

Dainsleif

Well Cat your argument is not all that good. She is right, the sole main threat for her has you in between and as a weaker forcer that could give her ground and moral with other nations. By not raising a single hand she has pretty much ensured that the Wastelands are going to prosper under her and furthermore increasing her foothold as the greatest dread empress so far. And because you are literally at the end of your option you have no way of winning against her, i guess this is it huh...

*Larat appears out of thin air with deus ex-machina powers*

...OF COURSE ON THE OTHER HAND!

aran

Well, that's his adventuring days over then. Time to join the city guard.

Max Scherer

So my bet would be that Malicia has two puppets and the other one is with the other half of her people and Archer is killing them, but then she probabaly has a third one who is alone... I really dont want to be right and want that Cat gets her way at least for once...

---

Chapter 47: Culmination

"Do not call a man loyal who still draws breath."

-Dread Emperor Terribilis II

There'd be no replacing the whistle, and I'd long ago resolved to keep it for a particularly black day, but there'd be no replacing Thief either. I stood by my decision. What had once been Akua's aspect had yanked the entirety of the Wild Hunt through Keter's wards and whatever other nasty surprises Neshamah had awaiting people trying to reach his city through otherworldly means, unharmed. I'd address the Wild Hunt in a moment, though. I had a set of scales to even first. The sorceress who'd been breaking Thief apart had hastily ended her spell when the fae came out of nothingness, then panicked when I broke the ward. The remaining three casters that'd been keeping me imprisoned staggered at the backlash, and in that moment I acted. One step, the sorceress raised a hand towards me. Two steps, her lips began to form a syllable in the mage tongue. Three steps, my fingers clasper her wrist and with a sharp squeeze I shattered every bone. Face paling, she mastered the pain and got the first word of her incantation out. Four steps, I pivoted and my elbow ploughed into her throat. The windpipe was crushed instantly, and as she choked and fell I straightened and gently set my hands against her temples.

One simple twist, and the neck broke with a crack.

"Thief, get out of here," I called out calmly. "Hear me now, Rider of the Hunt: no prisoners."

That was the kind of feast the Wild Hunt lived for, and they wasted no time digging in. Larat had hacked through the heads of two of my former jailors within a heartbeat of my finishing the order, grinning nastily, and the rest of them charged with wild hoots as they fell upon Malicia and her men. Vivienne tried to get up but her limbs were shaking too badly. I cursed under my breath – I might be able to walk off mage lightning, these days, but my companions were another story – and strode over to help her up.

"Will you be able to escape on your own?" I softly asked.

"Just give me a moment," she rasped. "I still feel like my skin is on fire."

She was burned badly, skin charred in strange patterns all over her body where the lightning had struck, and for a Named she'd always been on the fragile side of the scale. Not for the first time, I mourned that none of my powers were geared towards healing in the slightest. But Thief was wounded, not crippled, and I trusted she had the will to press on after the worst of it passed. Letting out a laboured breath, she pushed me away.

"Kill the Empress," she said. "I'll live."

She'd do more than that, if I had anything to say about it. The moment Masego had healed her back up to fighting fit, I was going to teach her to hold her own in a fight if it was the last thing I did. For too long I'd waved the matter away, dismissed as largely unimportant since she wouldn't be fighting on the frontlines anyway. That'd been naïve, and in retrospective a very dangerous kind of arrogance. We wouldn't always get to dictate the nature of our fights with our ever-rising count of enemies. Today had been a harsh reminder that Vivienne's lack of skills with arms wasn't just fuel for verbal roughhousing, it was a dangerous liability.

"Keep out of sight," I ordered, keeping the thoughts away from my face.

The entire aside couldn't have taken more than a few moments, yet in that span the skirmish had already turned into a siege in miniature. The last of my surviving jailors was dead, his corpse impaled atop the lance of a dark-skinned fae who carried it along like some sort of gruesome trophy. Yet the Empress' people had responded to the appearance of the fae with the steady hands of veteran killers. Colourful curtains of light had been spawned, overlapping and forming a sort of six-cornered shield over the entire delegation, and still a pair of Malicia's warlocks were casting. The Hunt had not laid idle, of course. It tested the defences, but found blades and spears could not breach it, nor could the fae sorceries at their disposal. I recognized the wards, or part of them at least. Akua had used similar ones, called them 'revolving wards'. A common innovation of her and her father's, crafted to deal with the powerful but terribly direct sorceries of the Summer Court. I was less than surprised Malicia's people had gotten their hands on the ward schematics, or adapted them to her purposes. And yet I was not worried, because one fact stood above all: the Praesi were defending, but they were no longer moving. No matter how tall the walls, fortresses always fell. Larat joined me as I strode towards the front, blade dripping with blood.

"A most pleasant excursion, my queen," he mused. "Shall we give the dead a taste of our mettle as well, after these vagrants have been cleared out?"

"We're not picking a fight with the Dead King," I flatly said. "He makes sport of the kind of people that bled you when we assaulted the Proceran camp. Behave, Hunstman."

"I always do," Larat assured me with a too-wide smile. "My fellow riders are chipping away at this lovely turtle shell, one sliver at a time. Patience will deliver us the promised deaths."

"Let's see if I can quicken that," I replied.

The Empress had holed up behind a fortress, hadn't she? I could batter away at it, sure enough, but Black had always told me that the most dangerous of all siege weapons was a mule carrying gold and a promise. I cast a look at the Empress' people, looking for a weak link. None to be found, sadly. They were all calm confidence incarnate. Didn't matter, though. The masks were pretty enough, but I could smell fear's dark stirrings beneath them. The Wild Hunt parted for me, and standing before the Praesi I cleared my throat.

"The first three to surrender get to keep their lives," I announced. "Excluding Malicia. I'll swear binding oath to it, with an agreed-upon phrasing."

None replied, but I saw eyes narrow. Yeah, that was sounding quite tempting at the moment wasn't it? Praesi loyalty was something of a contradictory term.

"An empty offer," the Empress said. "She cannot breach the wards. Regardless, there would be immediate consequences to such a decision."

The Sentinels stirred to drive the point home. She'd not accused me of lying, because she wasn't a fool: these were mostly practitioners, so they knew I had enough fae in me I couldn't break an oath even if I wanted to. As long as the phrasing held, which was on them, they'd be spared. So instead she was playing on fear and pride. For once, the battlegrounds were familiar to the both of us.

"You thought that about the last set of wards," I said. "Look behind me. There's a few corpses telling you otherwise. Sure, she could turn the Sentinels on you, but the moment the bubble is down she'll have bigger problems than you. Is she really going to attempt an execution when she's up to her neck in the likes of this guy?"

I pointed a thumb at Larat. The fae who'd once been the Prince of Nightfall idly touched the blood on his sword and brought it to his lips, licking it off with relish. As far as I knew he didn't, uh, actually drink blood so that was purely to fuck with their heads. Good show, my treacherous lieutenant.

"This is not my true body," Malicia reminded them.

She did not need elaborate on the possible consequences of betraying a still-living Empress. There was an entire hall of forever-screaming heads in the Tower that served as a constant reminder. And still, the pair of warlocks who'd been casting had stopped. Momentum was on my side.

"Sure, she rules for now," I said. "How long is that going to last? She's yet to win a battle and most her army's deserted to other banners. Spend a year or two in Mercantis, wait it out, and you can come back to the Tower to make nice with her successor able to boast you turned on her. Hells, if you've got issues with Mercantis I'll find you something to do in Callow. I've always a need for mages, and the pay will be generous. I'm sure most of you have respect for Malicia. It's not unearned."

I paused and smiled thinly.

"Are you really willing to die defending that hill, though? Because if I have to breach this ward myself, I'll not be in the mood for easy deaths."

"I would keep a few as playthings, my queen," Larat added cheerfully. "It has been ages, since we've had proper entertainment."

I shrugged, watching the faces of the Praesi.

"My mercy has a time limit, ladies and gentlemen," I said. "Now's not the moment for hesitation."

I met Malicia's eyes calmly. There was no appreciation for what I'd done there to be found, not when it was turned against her. The Empress paid lip service to the treasured Wasteland principle of 'iron sharpens iron', but when it came down to it she never settled for anything less than a victory. No matter how long that victory took to snatch. If it was Callowans I was dealing with, one of them would have cursed and folded. But I was dealing with Praesi, a people that had turned betrayal into art back when most of Calernia still used iron. One of the curtains vanished, and a Soninke in robes ran for it. That first betrayal was the collapse of the dam, no one wanting to be the soul that didn't qualify as one of the first three, and within a heartbeat all the curtains of light save one were gone. A loyalist, how quaint.

"Kill," I ordered the Hunt.

I had no intention of offering any of them safe harbour in Callow, and they really should have extracted the oath before turning on Malicia. They'd feared the Sentinels both too much and not enough. The Empress stood tall and proud in a man's body even as it all went to the Hells around her. I advanced, slowly but surely. The Tower's personal guards held the fae back, long enough that one of the traitors turned her cloak again and began reinforcing the ward, but a silver arrow took her through the throat and that was the end of that. The Sentinels began to break. Their armour held against even fae armaments, and their blades scythed down a handful of fairies, but lances and swords and arrows found weaknesses and exploited them ruthlessly. The fleeing Praesi were ridden down mercilessly, until all that remained standing was the Empress and a single sweating mage. I suspected the Hunt could have torn through that ward easy as turning a hand, but it had been left to me by the twisted fae understanding of respect.

"I wonder," I said, looking Malicia's simulacrum in the eyes, "if I can reach you in Ater through this puppet of flesh. Shall we find out?"

She met my gaze unflinching.

"No," she replied, and the simulacrum dropped.

Ah. Well, that also worked. The last living Praesi turned fearful eyes on me.

"I surrender," she said.

Then the arrow took her in the throat. A perfect arc, one I hadn't seen coming until the last moment and that had sailed right through the last ward unhindered. She was dead before she hit the floor, the light curtain vanished.

"And once again, Archer saves the day," Indrani called out from above.

She was standing on the lower reaches of the pyramid, posing triumphantly bow in hand. Before addressing that – and Gods, was I going to address that – I walked over to Malicia's living but insensate simulacrum. My boot came down, pulping the skull, and then again over the throat since it usually paid to be thorough. I'd have to clean my boots later, I mused, or the stench would be horrible.

"Indrani, get your ass down here," I screamed.

I turned to look around for Thief, but she was nowhere in sight.

"Vivienne," I said. "Still here?"

The other Callowan winked back into sight, still looking half-dead from her hiding place behind a column.

"Good," I said. "Collect all the corpses. I don't want to risk any surprises. And strip away the Sentinel armour, please. It can take fae blades, it must be worth a fortune."

I would have felt worse about looting the dead if Praes hadn't looted Callow for two decades without a care in the world. I'd call it reparations and leave it at that. Thief weakly nodded, and I left her to the grisly work as Archer pranced her way down her perch. She saluted when she approached, using the wrong hand for a legionary's salute and the wrong angle for a Callowan formal greeting.

"Ready to report, Your Queenliness," she announced.

"Where the Hells have you been?" I asked flatly.

"Doing what you told me to," she mused. "Which was, and I quote 'take a walk and do whatever comes naturally'."

I closed my eyes, pained on a metaphysical level. So she'd been the hidden knife I remembered thinking about in one of those unlocked memories. We must have gambled that without an actual plan about her involvement, she couldn't be predicted by the Skein. Which made sense, but had pretty badly failed. Starting the fire was two birds with one stones, I thought. The smoke trail had been bound to get her attention and get her to come running.

"If you spent the entire time drinking and just now shot that woman, I'm docking your pay," I told her as I opened my eyes.

"Hey," she protested. "I did lots of stuff that wasn't drinking. She's my fourth kill of the day. Well, third and a half really."

"Tell me you didn't assault the Dead King's patrol," I asked.

"Nah, they never got close to me," she said. "But while you lot were busy throwing down with the giant rat, the Praesi tried to pull a fast one. At least I think so. Two Sentinels carried out some sleeping woman earlier, so I took care of it."

My brows rose.

"Was it a simulacrum?" I asked. "The woman, I mean."

"Dunno what that is," Archer cheerfully lied. "But if it was, it's double dead. Cut off the head after just to be sure, as is our crew's policy."

Damnably, I could not refute that. The brains and bone shards all over my boot made it impossible.

"I think I'm supposed to congratulate you on a job well done," I said after a moment.

"Oh, it was a labour of love," she dismissed. "But do praise me. Loudly and elaborately."

I did not reply, and allowed the silence to stretch.

"You wench," Archer accused me.

"Namecalling is beneath us," I gravely said.

She flipped me the finger and I smiled.

"You got any idea what we're supposed to do now?" she finally asked.

"I think that –" I paused when I saw movement out of the corner of my eye. "Hey, you. Give Thief that corpse."

The dark-skinned fae I'd seen carrying around a dead Praesi on a lance earlier looked quite displeased at the order.

"He's not dead yet," the Rider replied.

"Then finish him off and hand him over," I patiently said.

"It was my kill," the fae protested.

"If I have to come over there to settle this, I'm going to make you sit on that fucking lance," I grimly replied.

With ill-grace, the fae ripped out the Praesi's throat and dropped him on Vivienne's feet. I'd have to remember to ask Larat the Rider's name later. That kind of discipline case was best nipped in the bud. I turned back to Archer, who looked rather amused.

"Right, so I think we're supposed to gather at our escape route," I said. "That's where Hierophant and Diabolist will be, anyway. Did you run into Adjutant?"

"On my way here," Archer replied. "That was also where he was headed, though I don't know what that location is."

"Neither do I," I admitted. "But Thief should. We'll move out after she's taken all the corpses."

"I love it when you talk dirty to me," Indrani said, waggling eyebrows.

Ugh, the wench.

—

Vivienne was well enough to walk at a decent pace without my support by the time we reached our 'escape route', which turned out to be the front of the Silent Palace. The fires had long been put out, but the place was still crawling with undead. Masego was having a pleasant cup of tea at an iron table, a full service having been put out for Akua and Hakram as well. Athal, to my surprise, was seated at the edge of the table as well though unlike the others he was silent. I heard snippets of conversation from the other side of the plaza, snorting when I realized they were having a very civilized debate about the influence of sorcery on the development of the early Dread Empire. Hakram was actually winning, by the sounds of it, which was just delightful in so many ways. Our advance, three Named surrounded by the honour guard of the entire Wild Hunt, hardly went unnoticed. Neshamah's armies gave us no trouble, which I took to be a good sign. We might have gotten away with murder. Well, murders technically. But it was really the one that mattered. Although, since Archer had killed a puppet as well... I'd never really thought, growing up in Laure, that I would one day have a mental debate about whether you could kill the same person twice. Truly, villainy had expanded my horizons.

"Catherine," Masego greeted me, then glanced at my boots. "You seem to have had an eventful day."

He seemed much better than the last time I'd seen him. The sweat and pallor was gone, though the impression of frailty was not.

"We ran into the Empress," I lightly said. "She'd fallen down some stairs."

Athal's head lowered, hiding his expression.

"What an unfortunate accident," Akua mildly said.

"Indeed," Hakram agreed. "We can only hope the Dead King will be not be too affected by that tragedy to resume negotiations."

I grunted in agreement, dropping into an iron chair on the other side of the table. Vivienne and Indrani followed suit.

"Found Thief for you," I told Athal. "Sorry we didn't stick around for the guards, but I was sure I'd seen her skulking about."

The dark-haired man bowed to me, then offered me a smile.

"It was no trouble, Great Majesty" he said. "I had to interrupt the search myself, as I was given other instructions."

"Oh?" I said. "Anything interesting?"

"Ensuring no bedroom was touched by the flames," he replied. "Though I was told that should you wish for different accommodations this can be arranged."

"We'll be fine," I said.

"He would not participate in our debate," Masego said, almost complaining.

"It's always awkward to enter a conversation after it's already begun," Hakram said, immediately pushing aside the unspoken reprimand.

Unlike Hierophant, he understood the weight of our words towards the servant the Dead King had 'gifted' me. The Wild Hunt settled around us as an honour guard of sorts, valiantly ignoring the pretty salacious jokes Indrani was making about fae flexibility and its many possible applications. I'd been about to reach for a cup of tea myself, when Athal suddenly left his chair to kneel and press his forehead against the floor. I looked to the direction he was facing and my eyes widened. A single undead was approaching, which was unusual in and of itself. But what worried me a lot more was the massive... pressure I could feel coming off what looked like a perfectly normal Keteran foot soldier.

It looked like the Dead King had come to visit.

---

DroughtBringer

Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

stevenneiman

Hey, we're on top again! I think every webnovel worth its salt has that story about the time it topped the latest Wildbow series for a moment, but we've actually managed to hold the spot a couple of times for a decent span.

Gibborim

It helps that Worm2 is a distillation of all Wildbow's worst writing traits.

Gunslinger

I'm curious what you don't like about it?

Personally I think Ward isn't doing as well in topwebfiction.com since discussions moved away from the article comments where the voting link used to be rigorously posted to the reddit threads.

Also I'm not sure how many new readers the ranking site brings anymore. Wandering Inn for example is usually never high up but pirateba has a pretty decent patreon following.

Dainpdf

Pirateaba gets people from RRL though, and there TWI is pretty high up.

In any case, people don't seem to like the more... psychological bent of Ward, or the way the plot goes. I don't really know – I myself like it.

Ben

I'm finding it a rough slog myself. The chapter endings feel disjointed, there doesn't seem to be a lot of plot momentum, and what there is just isn't catching my interest the way that Worm did. These are obviously subjective reactions and more power to you if you feel differently. But I'm finding myself these days skimming the chapters to get information about characters I'm interested in rather than reading them with real excitement.

bowekin

I kind of feel the same way, but I've noticed that it's been improving lately. The last two interludes were really good. I think the best thing for wildbl原因 to do would be to bring Victoria's story to a close in the next few arcs and maybe switch perspectives.

stevenneiman

I think that being #1 specifically might not be a huge deal, but consistently being in the top 10 or so means that people who scroll along when they're voting for their current favorites will see it and wonder if it's any good. I'd estimate that there's probably somewhere between 1000 and 2000 active voters on TWF and there might be a decent number of lurkers who check the rankings without voting. Combined with a flashy banner, an intriguing title and a promising description, there's a very real possibility that eventually someone who's seen it hanging in upper portion of the rankings long enough will check it out, and if it's a good match you'll have another follower and possibly another voter.

Of course, this is all just speculation and a bit of extrapolating from my own experience. I might be completely off-base in any number of interesting ways.

stevenneiman

I'm not really sure what to think about Ward. I quite liked it for the more fleshed-out characters and the interesting where-are-they-now follow-ups, but I also had a lot of trouble motivating myself to continue reading.

It definitely has much more of a character focus and a slow-boil plot compared to Worm. Worm was mostly about setpiece fights and relentlessly rising, very direct stakes, and Ward is much more about subtle things that might have personally significant long-term consequences for a few people who might prove important later. There's also much more of a police style "do this right or our captures will walk" focus where in Worm the combination of justifying stakes and the protagonist being a villain meant that they could get away with a lot more to get what they wanted. It's probably more realistic to have the more consequence-focused mindset of Ward but it's also harder to keep the pacing consistent and the plot exciting.

The only complaint I can really put my finger on is throwing too many plotlines at the reader at once. It was one of the problems I had with Cloud Atlas as well, how it had so much going on and you didn't have enough time to make sense of one timeline before it skipped to another. Worm pretty much just started with Skitter's one, fairly simple backstory, and the Undersiders, who had personalities but not much of a significant backstory. Ward has a larger group of main characters, and each of them brings backstories, and problems to the table which are all given roughly equal billing with the POV character's problems and an overarching plot on top of that.

I think the real challenge Ward is having isn't being bad, it's that it's not what the Worm fans looking for a second helping expected. People who liked Worm are unhappy that it's not Worm, and people who didn't like Worm never realize that there's a difference.

Gunslinger

I'm curious to know if you've read Pact and Twig? The change in styles between Worm to Warm makes sense as you see the way Wildbow's changed styles for each one.

stevenneiman

I read a little bit of Twig but I couldn't really get stuck into it the way did with Worm. I think it was because I was too confused about the setting. Worm was pretty standard world of superheroes stuff with some dark deconstruction thrown in that didn't make the formula harder to understand, whereas Twig (as far as I can remember anyways, I read a few pages a long time ago) was a sort of like biopunk London and I couldn't really figure out how anything works.

And I'm not saying that Wildbow's shift in writing style didn't make sense. Even if their other works hadn't been moving in that direction, I imagine anyone would get burned out on writing something in the style of Worm after writing something as long as Worm.

thecorinthianman

I can understand that, Twig was definitely a culture shock at first. That said, after having read Worm, Pact, Twig, and Ward, I can say with no uncertainty that Twig is my favorite story I have ever read.

I'm not entirely sure why, but something in it resounded beautifully.

Yotz

Duly voted.

SpeckofStardust

This is where the fun begins.

JJR

Cat should trying spinning (a yarn) that's good trick.

Antoninjohn

The thing about having a a culture of traitors is that you get traitors

Lark

' "I think that —" I paused when I saw movement out of the corner of my eye. "Hey, you. Give Thief that corpse."

The dark-skinned fae I'd seen carrying around a dead Praesi on a lance earlier looked quite displeased at the order.

"He's not dead yet," the Rider replied.

"Then finish him off and hand him over," I patiently said.

"It was my kill," the fae protested.

"If I have to come over there to settle this, I'm going to make you sit on that fucking lance," I grimly replied.

With ill-grace, the fae ripped out the Praesi's throat and dropped him on Vivienne's feet. I'd have to remember to ask Larat the Rider's name later. That kind of discipline case was best nipped in the bud.'

Oh dear lord, in the absence of other royalty the remnants of Winter are adapting to fit Catherine.

Big Brother

Haha, I didn't even think of this.
Oh Gods Below, the Woeful Hunt.

Rook

Legends say the riders of the new hunt are as deadly as they are shit at negotiations

stevenneiman

If they're anything like Cat, they'll be great at negotiations. They've got the swords, now all they need is some cheap wine and they'll be set.

Dainpdf

Cat can't drink during negotiations anymore. Hakram got to her.

RanVor

But she can still offer drinks...

Mental Mouse

> "If I have to come over there to settle this, I'm going to make you sit on that fucking lance," I grimly replied.

"Mom voice". 😊

Someguy

Ah, Indrani's Plan :-

1. Step one
2. Step two
3. ????
4. PROFIT!!!

SpeckofStardust

Ya her plan was to be to drunk to plan and then do stuff. It clearly worked.

Novice

Clearly. She just appeared and lo and behold, the battle was quickly finished.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Man how many cups of wine would Black need after reading the after actiob report? Our queen is the epitome of cunning and planning here.

DroughtBringer

Enjoyable chapter, quite excited for the next (as I am always)

edrey

for a second i thought she would pull that eyes trick of larat and the dead king, well next time

Metalshop

Fantastic. Im loving the fact that Catherine's strategy at the geopolitical level is just her earlier method of breaking the table scaled up. She's not the biggest dog on the field, but damn if she can't make that irrelevant.

onedollargum

"I'd never really thought, growing up in Laure, that I would one day have a mental debate about whether you could kill the same person twice. Truly, villainy had expanded my horizons."

Everything in the chapter was great, but this was my favourite.

Cat just cashed in a trump card with that whistle. Does that mean she now has inventory space for an even more powerful artifact?
;D

Yotz

She may already have one – if her experiments with Winter gave other results, that is. One artifact per one Aspect. Maybe, per one foe cast down...

Also, a vile act a day makes you smarter in every way!

---

You'd think the answer would be obvious to the person who was killed and resurrected before, but no. Then again, it's not like many people get second chances with her.

Snowfire1224

Yeah that makes sense that's what they told Archer to do. I mean Archer does whatever she wants anyway– it's what she does best.

Also, Larat and Cat playing good cop bad cop is just awesome. (I was going to make a joke about cheap wine vs getting stabbed, but I couldn't figure out how to work it in there.)

JJR

"Do not call a man loyal who still draws breath."

Not enough paranoia. The undead can also be traitorous.

Snowfire1224

I believe that's why they burn the bodies.

Novice

I believe that's why the War of Thirteen Tyrants and One happened.

Dainpdf

People keep worrying about Triumphant coming back... I worry about Traitorous. Maybe all this time he's just been playing an overlong con.

---

"Three can keep a secret, if two are dead. Unless you're a necromancer, anyway, then the world is your blasphemous undead oyster."

—Dread Emperor Sorcerous

For a man who lost an army of tigers to defection, Sorcerous has a surprisingly clearer view at the problem.

grzecho2222

Given that he seems to be based on Twardowski (diabolist on the moon) being both insightfull and moronic is very much in style for him

John Laing

He's not saying anything one way or another about whether you can trust the dead, only that you definitely can't trust the living.

Rook

Cat's always had the brawn, now she has brains too

All over her boot

Javvies

That went about as well as could be expected.

I wonder who the sleeper that the Sentinels were trying to sneak out was. That seems an important detail. Perhaps that was Malicia for real, though that seems risky. But who else could it have been?

WuseMajor

Probably a second flesh puppet. I mean, why send just one when you can ship a backup (or two) just as easily? Who knows, the Dead King might get mad at you and destroy one of them in a fit of pique.

Dainpdf

If that had been the real Malicia, the puppet wouldn't have lasted as long as it did.

grzecho2222

Unless to puppet them you have to literally move your mind to them temporally

Insanenoodlyguy

It makes sense and is a valid "master planner/magnificent bastard" story. Cat kills the Empress. Empress shows up while she's negotiating with Dead King, taking the pivot and complete control of the situation. If there was a good plan to kill the Empress, that's how it would have went down. Because they were winging it as much as they did, the story let Archer stumble upon her backup plan instead.

Agent J

Damn it, EE, you saucy wench! This is the kind of cliffhanger that makes me want to slam the fastforward button on my whole life. Just make it Friday already!

Silverking

The game's not over yet. Maybe Catherine broke one of the few rules the Dead King has. Maybe the fight with Malicia was all a feint while a representative of hers finalized the agreement for a large scale invasion. Maybe Neshamah is happy to be dealing with the Queen in Callow, and has announced their alliance to all the nations in the continent.

...Maybe Archer makes a bawdy joke at just the wrong time.

tyizor

something something dead king be my bone daddy

mavant

"Hey Skeletor, how many bones do you have in your body? Can I borrow one?"

mavant

"Dear diary: My teen angst bullshit has a body count."

Shequi

"We ran into the Empress," I lightly said. "She'd fallen down some stairs."

Lies and Violence!

ironvale

Oh that's wwhat a drunken Black , a mule,, and a boat story was about.

Jane

Mmm... I don't know that not teaching Thief to fight was arrogance, so much as it was playing to the strengths of an important asset. Most of her work involves not fighting, after all, and her talents are strongly geared to working on her own; teaching her to fight takes a lot of time away from her work, for whom there is no one who can substitute for her, to address circumstances that will rarely arise. If fighting were something that came naturally to her, that would be one thing, or if her work involved a higher chance of ending in a fight, but given her role and character, it's a large investment to address rare problems.

But, that's if she's being treated as an asset, and not a friend. As Thief, Spymistress of Callow, it's not worth the time taken. As Vivienne of the Woe, every time Cat asks her to join them, there's a chance things will go... Well, like this. Thief, Spymistress of Callow, would be a huge headache to replace, but it's possible; Vivienne, not at all. To paraphrase Warlock, members of the Woe aren't gears to be replaced, but hearts that die when you remove them. As such, a hefty investment spent keeping her alive is worth every second, no matter how unlikely fighting is supposed to be... Assuming that she can be taught. Some people just don't have the character for it.

I mean, looked at a different way, the problem here wasn't that Thief didn't know how to fight, but rather that she should have stayed out of sight and waited for a less direct way to intervene. Maybe not have come to Keter at all, but continued to run things back in Callow. But that would also mean, in a narrative sense, not truly being part of the Woe, but instead being a very important supporter of the Woe. Maybe that would be more suited to her talents, but... Well, she shot that arrow without needing to, and without truly being asked. She put herself in danger this time for Cat's sake, and will no doubt do so again in the future.

And, well, she is immortal now. Not by the Dead King's definition, but she doesn't age, and being near a "real" immortal will probably keep her from dying in conflict for a while. Even if she spends years training with Cat, it's time they can afford to spend. Maybe Callow couldn't, but they can always free it again.

Novice

"Well, she shot that arrow without needing to, and without truly being asked."

She was asked to do that by Cat. That was the whole point of Cat's "invisible crossbow".

Jane

Cat asked Archer, who actually knows how to use a bow, could conceivably kill an unaware Malicia, and who could safely get away if it all went pear-shaped. Thief, as we saw, would be near-useless in the role, and quite likely to end up dead.

If Vivienne had stayed hidden, she'd have a perfectly reasonable explanation to give Cat as to why she waited to try to free her.

Novice

No, that was Cat not knowing the full extent of their plan(s). Indrani's plan consists of her taking a walk and literally do whatever she wants. No codes, no signals, nothing except a meeting place after they were done. Notice how Skein never mentions Archer back when they were fighting.

Present-Cat thought the 'invisible crossbow' was Archer when it was really Thief. I suspect they wouldn't call it a crossbow if it was really Archer since Archer does not use a crossbow.

Alivaril

You know, I was initially really worried about a third puppet, but I think Hakram took care of that one just fine. Now I just hope the seeming harshness toward Thief doesn't brew any irritating misunderstandings.

Anyway, that was a fun chapter. Brain bit seemed a little unnecessary gorey, just like the time she crushed Lone Swordsman's skull, but that's about it. Mildly concerned the "lying about surrender" bit will come back to bite her, but that doesn't seem to be as harsh a flag as I'd initially thought it would be. After all, Black is still alive and walking around after murdering Akua's father.

...I'm, uh, not actually sure Cat planned for the possibility of an outright praesi invasion from her rear. Sure, it'd be the height of stupidity right now, but the empress seems to be going full Dumb Villain these days and it'll take weeks to months for Cat to return.

My reaction to the arch-heretic announcement remains "Wellllll, they aren't exactly wrong."

Jane

Eh, Cat just broke an irreplaceable artifact to save her life. That kind of thing speaks louder than words, in their circles.

Personally, I'd be more concerned about Vivienne's feelings of self-worth after this fiasco. "They already joke about how I can't kill anything, my moonlight blade failed to assassinate a fake Malicia, and now I forced Cat to blow a powerful weapon to save my life when I couldn't stand up to an unnamed sorceress." That's the kind of thing that can hurt more than a sustained lightning spell.

It's also the kind of thing that could be used to tarnish a moral compass, but in this story, I'd more expect a plot point like that to end up subverted than played straight.

Insanenoodlyguy

I doubt it will effect much of anything, it wasn't a lie about surrender, it was a "I kept to the letter of our agreement exactly. I am after all a man/woman of my word." while smiling and absolutely violating the spirit of said agreement. The "Exact wording" troupe is a classic villain move and a classic magical creature (fae) move alike, and used against other villains rarely backfires.

Cat was willing to make an oath for safety for those surrendering, but nobody actually took her up on it. It would have been hard for them to do so and survive long enough to get her to keep to it, admittedly, but that was moot since they just dropped the shield instead. Maybe if she hadn't said the second part, and just said "The first three to surrender get to keep their lives", but she's fine with how she did it.

Foxfire710

Suprised cats "plan" didn't blow up in her face with all those moving parts. I'm also wondering why people keep trying to ward her with cold iron and not just straight up stabbing her with it to see if it stops her regeneration. Hopefully this success didn't just burn up all of cats luck.

Tohron

My guess at what Nemeshah has to say: that since Malicia is no longer around to negotiate, he regards her current terms as her final offer, and Catherine still has to figure out a way to beat them.

My guess on that subject is that Cat will echo what she did with the fae with an arrangement to help strong-arm Cordelia into marrying Nemeshah, without giving him any territorial concessions.

Berder

"Nah, they never got close to me," she said. "But while you lot were busy throwing down with the giant rat, the Praesi tried to pull a fast one. At least I think so. Two Sentinels carried out some sleeping woman earlier, so I took care of it."

Without Archer, the plan would have definitely failed. Who could the sleeping woman have been except another simulacrum? I would not be surprised, though, if Empress had a number of simulacra going in different directions and Archers only killed one of them.

But what stops the Dead King from continuing negotiations with Empress via scrying? Aside from the security risk. But if anyone could secure scrying, the Dead King could.

Or the Dead King could simply wait for Empress to send another party. After all the Dead King is in no hurry to sign a deal, a few more months or years are nothing to him. It's only Catherine that has a deadline.

John Laing

The Dead King wants to negotiate in person. Even if he did have a way to scry across all that distance and through mountains, narratively it would bring him dangerously out of the role of "hidden horror," and politically it would mean treating Malicia nearly as an equal instead of a petitioner at his door.

Malicia doesn't have an unlimited supply of sentinels and simulacra. As cat pointed out, that armor can't be cheap. The Woe just showed they're willing and able to murder an entire Praesi diplomatic delegation, and the Dead King probably doesn't care, so what's to stop them from doing it again and again? Hells, if the Dread Empress keeps throwing good money after bad, and the Woe keeps grinding, Cat might even conceivably be able to afford to walk away from Keter without cutting any sort of regrettable deal, simply solve her strategic problems by auctioning off the top-shelf plunder for cash to fix Callow's economy and hire mercenaries.

Malicia doesn't have fae gates for high-speed travel, either, so just getting the next group to Keter will probably take months, during which time the Crusade is, at minimum, continuing to sack her port cities.

Jane

The problem is availability rather than money; all of the mercenary companies are already hired up, and there's probably issues with the Arch-Heretic of the East hiring most companies anyways.

That said... Outfitting an elite company with that kind of gear would also be a pretty neat opportunity. The Narrative means that such companies are doomed to failure at a crucial moment, but they'd be pretty useful until that point, and they're free anyway, so why not? It's almost unfortunate they don't have the time for that kind of game.

(That said, the real issue is that the Dead King really would prefer to deal with Cat, and was just setting this whole "Kill Malicia first" as a test, with a nice consolation bonus for himself if Cat failed. "Oh, gosh, now I, the obscenely powerful master necromancer, can't find a way to negotiate with a fellow expert practitioner of the arts" is just a pretense, after all.)

crysjal

Following comments regarding The Thief of Stars earlier I'm interested to see what this future training might mean for Thief.

Could this result in a transition into a specialisation? Perhaps Thief of Blades. She has already set a precedent by stealing the Revenant Elf's moonlight blade. A character that fights by stealing the opponent's sword and using it against them might be entertaining at least.

Incidentally, That moonlight blade is definitely going to be used on Cat at some point.

Insanenoodlyguy

"So heyyyy, Vivienne I did vow I'd take Akua out someday, but I may need to make out with her a few times in the present?"

*sighhh* "Whelp, can't say I didn't see this coming." *STAB STAB STAB*

daegone823

Okay I finally get it the dead king put Catherine against the Skein or rather had Malicia guarded by the Skein seeing how he could have had her guarded by the knight or thief or any number of other names to expand her mind.

By continually having her face god like enemies(Spell Blade and Skein) that should have been able to destroy other named with ease, he expanded what she thought she was capable of. The Skein's ability unlimited time reversal aspect allowed her a punching bag that was big enough to punch back and survive. Thus she learned how to use winter in more ways that previously thought. She now sees herself for what she truly is, a higher being on a different plane of power. Where she previously limited herself she now is able to grasp how powerful she really is. It seems that she is the last to know as Dead King, Malicia, Black, Masego, and even Akua saw her potential and saw her flaw in limiting herself.

Not only is she a godlike being, but she is crafty enough to almost instinctual manipulate stories in that she is always the underdog ensuring hero like dramatic saves while harboring the immortality of a villain. A villain who has been able to garner the favor of a former kingdom and is slowly influencing it seeping its ideals in the very fiber of the culture. This paired with her godlike power and her now expanded mindset to use those godlike power she is truly a terror to behold and there is no way of stopping her, based on the Dead King's stamp of approval.

The even crazier notion is that this was all planned by the Black Knight who in order to break creation he managed to craft a blunt instrument/weapon that would be a plague to creation itself.

triphthisway

I really wish after the fight finished, that Catherine would have brought Vivienne over for a hug first. I feel like that's exactly what Viv needed, and wasn't completely out of the realm of what Cat might do.

I feel like it would have been the kind of move that Malicia was described as doing way earlier, where she says something, and months later, the person who it was said to finally understands the double meaning. But instead of Viv not getting it right away, it would be Archer and The Hunt who initially would see it as sentimental and weak, but long after would be like "oh shit. She did that because that's exactly what her minion needed right then. It was aimed at both comforting but also ensuring continued longstanding loyalty."

But, I only just read to that part, so idk what happens after.

---

Interlude: Empires

"Spring brings southern weddings and northern burials."
– Lycaonese saying

"I am grieved to hear of your disappointment," Athal said, inclining his head.

The smile on the Black Queen's face was a rueful one, tinted with self-mockery. There were times when the ruler of Callow could be difficult to read, such as when she was in the throes of Winter, but under the noonday sun she was an open book.

"Negotiations can fail," the dark-haired woman replied. "I knew it was one of the possible outcomes even before I learned there'd be opposition."

Athal found dismay, in the cast of her face, yet relief as well. The notion of striking bargain in Keter had never sat well with her, had it? Her defeat also brought solace: the knowledge she had toiled greatly to secure alliance, even though she had come short, and that none of the consequences of this day would be lain at her feet in years to come.

"I am sure accommodations will be reached eventually," the dark-haired man said. "No matter is ever set in stone."

"Now you sound like him," the Black Queen said, rolling her eyes. "I can realize when I've been outbid. Malicia was always going to be willing to go that extra mile I'd balk at. We'll see in a year whether the Dead King feels like riding a different horse."

The Crown had hinted at later arrangements, then. Interesting, considering the depth of the treaties involved. It would have been useful to learn more, but it was not Athal's place to inquire. He was only a servant, after all.

"As you say, Great Majesty," he agreed. "Might I inquire as to when we will depart?"

The Black Queen's brow rose.

"We?" she echoed.

Athal inclined his head again.

"I was gifted to you upon your arrival to the city," he gently reminded her. "It is only natural, as your property, that you would now dispose of my days as you see fit."

She did not quite succeed at hiding the flicker of anger and disgust that crossed her face. The Callowan had a deep and abiding distaste for slavery, as most of Calernia professed to share. It was largely a pretence, of course. Ashurans worked foreign prisoners to death in their mines and fields, having 'bought the span of the sentence' from other nations. Half the Free Cities either practiced slavery openly or through a very thin veil, and across large swaths of Procer the sacred rights of commoners as championed by the House of Light were more aspiration than fact. As for Praes, well, the hatred for the practice learned at Miezana hands had rarely given pause to Tyrants who needed greenskin 'tribute labour' to carry out their grand enterprises. Even the old Kingdom of Callow had not been above occasionally clapping chains on captured legionaries and putting them to work. It was a genuine thing in the Black Queen, however, a charming sort of naiveté for one who had risen to wear a crown.

"I'm freeing you as of right now," the young woman said, and clapped his shoulder gently. "That should be within my rights, I think. And you're certainly welcome to tag along, if you want."

Athal allowed hesitation to touch his face.

"And where would we be headed, Great Majesty?" he asked.

"Callow," she said. "Back home."

That'd been a lie, he thought. The tells were there, though much harder to pick up on than before. There must have been more to her short conversation with the herald of the Crown than a mere dismissal.

"It would be my honour to follow you," Athal said, fear and reluctance trembling artfully.

The Black Queen sighed.

"I'm not going to make you, Athal," she said patiently. "I genuinely think you'll be better off with us, but I can see why you wouldn't want to leave and I'm not going to force you. I meant it, when I said you're free. You can decide for yourself."

The dark-haired man looked away and towards the floor, pose submissive. Following her would be disastrous and he had no intention whatsoever of doing so, yet it would be impolite to outright dismiss her good intentions without the pretence of silent debate. After a few moments, he met her eyes.

"This is my world, Great Majesty," Athal admitted. "I would not leave it."

The dark-haired woman looked saddened but not surprised.

"I guessed that'd be your answer," she said. "You were a kind and pleasant host, Athal. I hope you'll be treated as you deserve here."

The dark-haired man smiled.

"Of this, I have no doubt," he said.

Her answering smile was slightly stiff, for she clearly thought him a slave in all but name.

"Then this is farewell, Athal the Host," Catherine Foundling said, cool dark eyes taking him in. "May we meet as friends, one day."

"Peace be on you, Great Majesty," Athal quietly replied.

She did not linger after that last goodbye, cleanly cutting ties. Not so prone to attachments as she'd once been believed to be, then. Rule of Callow might very well have fostered that in her: once could not meet a hundred different faces a day and remain caring of all of them. Athal was a good host and a polite servant, and so remained standing until she'd mounted her dead horse and began leading her party towards the gates of Keter. A handful of the Splendid cast lingering gazes at his form, yet none acted or spoke a word. The Black Queen had disciplined them into at least the semblance of civility and obedience, though it would only ever be that. The likes of them could not change their nature, sooner or later it would tell. Even after the last of them was gone from sight, Athal remained standing there in silence. Quietly observed by a thousand dead eyes.

Then, calmly, Dread Empress Malicia emerged from the bundle in her mind that was her impersonation of a Keteran servant and became herself again.

"Quite the interesting day," she murmured, adjusting the white robes her simulacrum had been provided.

The Empress had never enjoyed wearing a man's body, nor would she grow used to it. The flesh construct was much less sensitive than a true human would be, of course – Nefarious had discovered early in his research that to build the receptacle otherwise would make the experience quite overwhelming – but the overall sensation was still quite alienating. Malicia usually wore a woman not merely to draw the eye away from the fact that gender was no consideration to the ritual. Shifting from her true body to another several consecutive times had been quite exhausting, but it should not be of dramatic import. The negotiations with the Dead King were at an end, after all, with only formalities remaining. Having come out the victor out of her little tussle with Catherine had proved her to be the worthiest interlocutor for the Hidden Horror. The Empress cast a haughty glance at an approaching undead, allowing it to kneel before her without comment.

"Your Dread Majesty," it said. "The Crown is now ready to receive you."

"That would be agreeable," Malicia said. "You may escort me."

The Dread Empress used the length of the walk to put herself in order. There would be need, over the coming days, to reconsider the events of the day with Ime and her finest practitioners in attendance. Much had been revealed in the way Catherine attempted her assassination, likely more than the younger woman had intended to offer. For one, Malicia now had a much clearer account of the combat capacity of the Woe. The Adjutant was no great threat on his own and the Thief almost laughably easy to handle, yet the Hierophant needed reassessment. In sheer amount of destructive power at his disposal, he was leagues above what Wekesa had been able to unleash at the same age. He was also much less well-rounded than a young Warlock, and quite easier to exhaust. It was useful to know what the young man could likely be captured if it proved necessary even if Wekesa did not deign to intervene. Killing him had never been on the table, as Warlock would never forgive her for it. Enough of Malicia's attention remained on her surroundings that she did not need a reminder to emerge from her thoughts when she neared the throne room of the Hall of the Dead. Acknowledging her escort's introduction with a simple glance, she strode forward.

"Elegantly done," the Dead King said, eschewing greetings for praise.

The Hidden Horror lounged on his throne nonchalantly, radiating power without needing to move a single finger. Malicia had never been cowed by the display: she had lived in the Tower for decades now. She slept a mere handful of floors from centuries of the worst of her people's madness contained by wards and steel.

"I was allowed the opportunity to weave as I would," the Empress replied with a smile.

It had still been too close to her liking. Malicia had not expected for her contingency body to be found as well, Archer of the Woe having been marauding about the city instead of joining her companions in fighting the Dead King's guardians. Still, she'd been granted advantages. A guise that would make her adjacent to her opponent's deepest council, liberty to prepare however she deemed necessary for months before Catherine's arrival. Crafting the personality of 'Athal' had been the work of long hours enabled only by the Hidden Horror's willingness to allow her to interrogate his Hosts.

"She's still young," the Dead King mused. "In need of greater tempering. She should have killed every living soul in the city just to be certain. It will be a good lesson for her."

"As you say," Malicia smiled.

She believed the old monster had not ever meant for Catherine to succeed here. The point of the exercise, she suspected, had been to mould the young woman through conflict. Handpicked opponents in very specific locales to bring about a certain... enlightenment. It had not escaped Malicia's notice that Catherine could not turn to mist as she wished. The capacity had always been there, of course, but the mentality had not. The Black Queen was being guided towards a path. Though the Empress would make alliance with the Dead King today, she knew better than to think it any sort of friendship. It was quite likely that even as they made pact, the Hidden Horror had lit a sharper and tossed back into Callow. Measures would need to be taken, beyond even those she had already set in motion. It was rather worrying that the other woman would not be immediately returning to Callow, as Malicia had predicted she would. The Black Queen still believe she had cards to play.

"Shall we deal with the formalities?" the Dead King offered.

"Let us," the Empress agreed.

Before the day was done, she would have an alliance signed in blood.

—

"By all means," Cordelia Hasenbach said with frigid politeness, "do explain to me how sixteen thousand vagabonds succeeded in sacking the largest cities of Cantal, including the capital. I await what will no doubt be an enlightening answer."

The First Prince knew she should moderate her tone when speaking to the handful of men and women who'd been commanding the defence of the Principate's heartlands. Anger was rarely constructive, only to be used as a demonstration of displeasure when facing a soft position. If anger bared could not change the decision being made, there was no purpose in displaying it. Yet, looking at the five officers before her, the blonde ruler could not bring herself to lessen the ice in her voice. These fools had, while assuring her every step of the way that the legions under the Black Knight were being herded and encircled, somehow allowed a foreign army to burn a swath of destruction through every Cantalese region of logistical import unimpeded.

"Your Most Serene Highness, I will not deny we have failed you," the oldest among the officers admitted.

Diego Altraste, a highly-recommended captain from Valencis she'd granted the command of all available hosts in the heartlands to. Moustachioed, eloquent and boisterous, as Arlesite men so often were, yet he now sat subdued.

"The recognition of that is noted, yet no the reason for this council," Cordelia said, forcing a semblance of clam into her tone. "Cantal has been crippled for a decade, my captains, by a force I was told was quite contained. How did this come to be?"

"We cannot be blamed," a young woman protested. "The easterners are resorting to impious powers, it is not properly conducted warfare."

Captain Lehmer was, to the First Prince's private disappointment, Lycaonese by birth. She should have known better than to expect properly conducted warfare from the Enemy.

"I wonder then, captain," Cordelia replied softly, "where the blame should be laid?"

There was heavy silence at that. Altraste cleared his throat.

"We failed to anticipate the change in their operational tempo," the Valencian said. "Overnight and without warning, they began to cover three day's marching distance in a single night. We'd planned the movement of our forces according to the previous order, and so were caught flat-footed."

"And have we found the reason for this sudden change?" Cordelia asked.

"Nothing concrete," an old man with a heavy Alamans accent said. "We lack eyes within the legions. But I have a theory. The Black Knight ceased participating in fighting engagements after they sped up, so I believe it to be an aspect of his Damnation. Using it this much likely exhausts the man extraordinarily."

Alphonse de Saliverne had been commander of the Salian garrison for over forty years now, and though he was only a passable field commander Cordelia held his learning in great esteem. His words had weight.

"They're also listening in on everything the mages send by scrying," Altraste added reluctantly, as wary of her reaction. "The Order has become something of a liability, Your Highness, even when speaking in coded languages. They've danced too neatly around our delaying forces for it to be coincidence."

The Order of the Red Lion had been Cordelia's own notion, and raised by her own decree. The man was being cautious not to offend even while trying to point out a crippling weakness. She could appreciate his discretion in the matter.

"Keep using them," the First Prince said. "As a red herring. If we must resume instructions sent by horse, so be it. They cannot be allowed to continue their march."

"That will be difficult," Captain Alphonse replied. "As of the last report, they are headed towards Iserre. The southern reinforcements from Levant could be sent to meet them, but if they break cities at the pace they have so far most of northern Iserre will be lost before battle can be given."

"Prince Amadis stripped the principality clean of soldiers and weapons," Altraste added. "There are too few fighting men to raise a proper levy, much less arm it."

"Iserre cannot be allowed to burn," Cordelia said, tone forcefully even.

It would be a disaster, and not only because one of the few principalities left largely untouched by the Proceran civil war would be put to the torch. The Carrion Lord was wielding his army as a political knife, it'd become clear. Bayeux had been spared the kind of destruction visited on Cantal, and she knew very well why. The Black Knight was, for the eyes of all Procer, brutalizing the lands of her opposition in the Highest Assembly. Worse, he was doing so after her own uncle had allowed him to march without pursuit. The ploy was obvious, of course. There were few in the Principate that would truly believe her to be in collusion with the likes of the Carrion Lord. It was, however, a very good excuse for any prince and princess wishing to turn on her to do so. Amadis Milenan had been lionized a martyr for his voluntary exile in Callow, and if his lands were put to the torch in his absence... Cordelia's popularity had reached an apex, after the declaration of the Tenth Crusade, but it was now melting like snow in the sun. That she would be forced to abdicate remained unlikely, but it was no longer a possibility she could outright dismiss. A servant in her line's own livery and not the palace's came to stand behind her, presence announced without a word. The First Prince angled her head towards him in an unspoken invitation.

"The evening is upon us, Your Most Serene Highness," the man murmured.

The Lycaonese's eyes flicked to the tall panes of glass overlooking Salia that led to her council room's balcony. The sun was beginning to set, and she had appointment to keep. The First Prince turned her gaze to her assembled captains.

"I will require that a plan for the defence of Iserre be formulated," she ordered. "A particular eye being cast on the need to preserve as much of the principality as feasible. Do not hesitate to request any manner of men or resources. You will have the full weight of my authority behind you."

It galled her that she might have to trade favours and dent the treasury in the defence of the ancestral holdings of Amadis Milenan, yet beyond the ugly political requirements she had a duty to the Iserrans. They were her subjects, like any other, and not to be held at fault for the plotting of their anointed ruler. The First Prince spent longer than strictly required to take her leave with courtesy, carefully soothing any feathers her earlier anger might have ruffled. Already she regretted the loss of control. Her handmaidens undressed her and then helped her into her formal regalia as she perused the latest word out of Callow. The Black Queen and the Woe had left the kingdom, that much had been confirmed. Where they had headed, however, was still a guessing game. Cordelia had previously suspected that she would join up with the Black Knight and use the man as a way to damage the Principate while preserving her own forces, yet it had not come to pass. Most likely, she had gone to treat with the League of Free Cities. The First Prince could not be certain, as the Tyrant of Helike had thoroughly purged most of her spies and paid informants in the upper rungs of the region, yet there were few other alliances left for her to seek. Agnes had been quite clear that doom was gathering south, and the League's intentions were damnably opaque.

Three hours after sunset, Cordelia sat in the hidden room she'd had arranged for this sole purpose. Behind her seat the trinket sent by the Black Queen awaited the touch of the warlord's eldritch power to take them both into that world of shadows. The First Prince found her centre, allowing calm to take hold of her, and waited until the holy artefacts provided by the House of Light began to burn. Night fell over the room easy as the snap of fingers, suddenly and entirely. It took a moment for the First Prince to reorient herself in this dismaying realm, eyes falling on the Black Queen facing her. The coolness of this place had her glad regal wear in even southern Procer preferred long sleeves. Catherine Foundling was not beautiful, she'd always thought. Some might call her striking, but Cordelia found her features too sharp and sullen for it. It was her eyes that softened her mien, surprisingly expressive brown orbs set in a tanned face. As always, the would-be Queen of Callow disdained the trappings of the title she claimed to wear unremarkable plate.

"Hasenbach," the Black Queen said. "We need to talk."

The First Prince considered her opposite with cool eyes. This lack of courtesy should not go unremarked upon. Though this was an informal conference, Cordelia disliked the pretence of friendship between them that would allow such language.

"Have your courtesies left you entirely?" the First Prince asked.

A smile flickered across the other woman's face, gone in a heartbeat. The Lycaonese had read no fewer than seven assessments of Catherine Foundling gathered from hearsay, observation and old acquaintances. They had been of little use in understanding the Black Queen's personality. The girl she'd been before becoming the Squire had been smothered swiftly by the Black Knight's tutelage, and the callous warlord that'd fought in the Liesse Rebellion and Akua's Folly had never sat across from Cordelia either. The Doom of Liesse had cast a deep shadow on the other woman, Cordelia felt, and changed in sundry ways. Still, some similarities remained. Foundling respected strength above all, like most warlords, though unlike most of those she responded well to confrontation. She enjoyed 'spirit', even in her foes. Her temper was also quite easy to provoke, which had allowed Cordelia to prod her along desired paths in the past.

"I've had a long few days," the Black Queen said. "So let's just pretend I danced the dance and move on, because this is me doing you a favour and I'm done smiling all pretty."

The First Prince forced her face to remain perfectly still. Revealing irritation would serve no purpose, at the moment.

"A favour," she said instead. "You make a strange foe, it must be said."

"You're amused," Foundling shrugged, misreading her entirely. "That's about to go away real quick. Congratulations, First Prince: the Dead King's about to invade."

Cordelia's blood went cold. She studied the Callowan carefully, looking for signs of dishonesty. She found none.

"You have made a pact with the Hidden Horror," the First Prince said, voice cold and cutting.

"Not me," the Black Queen replied. "Malicia."

The Empress? It was possible, Cordelia thought, the Tower was certainly desperate enough, yet-

"Well, I suppose we're done here," Foundling casually said. "We're still at war, after all. Good luck, try not to screw it up for all of us."

The warlord raised her hand, as if to dismiss the darkness, and the blonde woman's fingers tightened against the arms of her chair until they turned white.

"Wait," she said.

The utterance had been much too desperate for her tastes, yet she couldn't simply let Foundling end it there. She needed to know more or thousand would die. The Black Queen eyed her the way a wolf eyes a limping deer.

"You know, I was trying to think of a reason for it earlier," Foundling said. "To give you more than a warning, I mean. Then I realized I genuinely couldn't. I'm not rejoicing at the loss of lives, mind you, but at the end of the day you're trying to fucking invade me even as we speak."

"A victorious Dead King would turn his eyes on you," Cordelia said, regaining her calm.

As long as the conversation continued, she could convince the other woman.

"Your eyes are on me right now, Cordelia," the Black Queen noted. "You expect me to lend a hand to people trying to conquer my homeland? Good night."

Her hand rose again but the First Prince knew that for the tactic it was. Foundling was attempting a bargain, now that there was another enemy on the field.

"Are you truly willing to mother the slaughter of thousands out of petty arrogance?" Cordelia accused.

The other woman's eyes went cold.

"There is more at stake," she replied softly, "than you know."

The irony was sharp, her own word thrown back at her. The Lycaonese drew back in fury, but something in the Black Queen's eyes gave her pause. For all that Catherine Foundling ruled with Wasteland methods, in that moment Cordelia was not looking at the Black Knight's pupil or Malicia's mistake. She was looking at raw Callowan spite, coursing deep and dark. For small slight, long prices.

"He will devour all of us," the First Prince said.

"Aye, maybe he will," the Black Queen said. "So we'll speak again, after your people do some of the bleeding for a change."

"This will not be forgot," Cordelia said coldly.

"I would hope not," Catherine Foundling replied with a hard smile. "A last word of warning, Your Most Serene Highness. If your uncle's army is still digging at the end of the month, there will be consequences. I've yet to run out of lakes to drop."

The darkness went away, and the First Prince of Procer was left with nothing but fury and fear. Doom to the north, Agnes had said.

She was never wrong.

—

Neshamah's foot scuffed the stone.

Such a slight sound, barely more than a whisper. He'd not heard it in a very, very long time. Obsidian hummed behind him as the Dead King tread Creation once more. He inhaled, though this body hardly had need for it. Sorceries millennia old lent him sense of smell, or close enough. The scent of cool stone and dust was a pleasing thing. Hearing had been much easier to reproduce, a staple of undeath even in his lifetime, and his was sharper than a mortal's. The sound of a bottle being uncorked drifted to his ear, and he turned towards it without the slightest hint of surprise. This was more than expected. It had been awaited.

"Going for a walk, old friend?" the Intercessor grinned, toasting him with a bottle.

He paid no heed to her current guise. She had worn many a face, over the centuries. Enough he could no longer remember them all, or the names paired with them. It made no difference. She was as he was, more essence than form.

"It has been too long," he said, voice pensive. "The Serenity remains a lacking imitation. There is a... taste to Creation. A skilled pupil I may be, yet a pupil still."

She drank deep, as had always been her game. He'd caught her, once, back when the upstarts Miezans had still fancied themselves more than guests on the shores. Carved her open, ever careful to avoid even the semblance of fatality, to see what lay inside. She'd mocked him even as the tongs kept open her ribcage and he studied her organs, perplexed by their lifelikeness. He had learned little from the study, never even confirming whether she truly grew drunk. If her body was a construct, it was so perfect one there was no telling the difference.

"You have your games even from your hiding hole," the Intercessor laughed. "Quite the entertainment, this time."

Neshamah strode forward, enjoying the pressure of a word he could not simply shape as he wished. There was resistance here. A will more paramount than his own.

"Were you watching?" he teased.

A little jest, just between the two of them. She was always watching.

"It was oddly nostalgic," the Intercessor mused. "You know, watching you meddle with forces beyond your comprehension. You haven't been that reckless since... your fourth century, I'd say? That delightful scuffle with the rats."

"I was young," Neshamah fondly remembered. "And still believed plagues to be valid method. You were quite severe in chiding me, I recall."

"Lines had to be drawn, we were still establishing the rules," the Intercessor smiled. "Both of us played rougher back then."

"You certainly were not shy in setting the elves after me," Neshamah said. "That was rather unwarranted."

"You were being greedy," the Intercessor said, wagging a finger. "Two Hells? I don't think so. Besides, that was as much about that old mule in the Bloom as it was about you. He needed a sharp lesson about who not to trifle with, and your taking his only son got the point across."

"The Spellblade has been a delightful diversion, admittedly," Neshamah conceded.

"You even set him on dear Cat," she said. "Thoughtful of you."

She drank again, under the Dead King's yellow gaze. Ah, she was miffed. She would be.

"I did look into her," he said. "She's no work of yours, which I found fascinating."

"We don't all work with ponds, Neshamah," the Intercessor said. "There's a lot more moving parts out here than in your little walled garden."

"And yet you have not snuffed her out," he mused. "Oh, you made attempts. Yet I know your work. It was not her throat you truly sought to cut."

"Flipped the story on her several times," she said. "She takes to it like a fish. I'm impressed. She's no great thinker, mind you, but her instincts are sharp. It'd be more trouble than it's worth to rid myself of her. She's the kind you let burn out on their own."

The thing shaped like a woman paused, ever theatrical.

"Or at least so I thought. You're making me reconsider."

"I wonder," Neshamah murmured. "It this meant to tempt me to invest more only to then yank the rug, or is this trickery to make me abandon an opening?"

The Intercessor grinned wide and sharp over the bottle's rim.

"Wanna roll the dice?" she offered. "I promise not to cheat this time."

"You say that every time," the Dead King reminded her laughingly. "No, old friend, you will not goad more out of me. I have allowed her to glimpse the threshold. She will rise or fall of her own merit."

"You've been so wary, since Triumphant," the Intercessor complained.

"And yet here I am," Neshamah replied easily. "Returned to Creation. Let us not pretend you did not nudge that story along."

"What can I say?" she shrugged. "I've been missing your company."

"Such a sentimental creature," the Dead King sighed, then his eyes turned sharp. "S what am I to be this time, Intercessor? The hammer or the anvil?"

She drank deep, throat bobbing as the red wine ran down her chin. She dropped the bottle afterwards, let it bounce off the stone and spill the rest.

"All right," she said cheerfully, "so stop me if you've heard this one before, but there's a joke from Levant I just love. So three princes – one Arlesite, one Alamans and one Lycaonese – and the Dead King walk into a tavern, looking for a hot meal. So the tavern keeper apologizes, says he's out and his last bowl of stew went to the woman in the corner with her baby, maybe they can get it off of her. So the Arlesite prince, he walks up to her, and says 'Good woman, I will duel you for this stew'. She refuses, because really fuck Arlesites. So then the Alamans prince walks up to her and says 'Good woman, as your rightful liege I deserve this stew more than you, hand it over'. She refuses, because she paid her taxes so she doesn't owe shit to no one. So then the Lycaonese prince walks over, looks at the Dead King – that's you! – and goes all grim. He says 'I'm fine with starving, so long as the Dead King doesn't get the stew'. Then the Dead King walks up and says 'You guys can fight over the stew, I'll just-'"

"Eat the baby," Neshamah finished, purely for the pleasure of denying her the climax.

The ancient monster pouted.

"So you do know it," she said. "Should have told me at the start, I got way into it."

"I assume," the Dead King said, "that this atrocity – and I do not use this word lightly, believe me – of a story had a purpose?"

The Intercessor grinned.

"Of course," she said, wine red as blood trickling down her chin. "Eat the baby, King of Death. Just this once, I'll allow it."

---

Charles

Oh dear...

tizzio caio

Eat the baby!

I thought the bard was a foreigner(that maybe lost a war outside of Calernia and came here to play the long con--and for a chapter back there t i though the bard may actually be Akua that in some fucked up magic experiment ended back in time with all those shards of history in Arcadia and just wants to fuck up all the world now)

So basically the bard says to Dead king to massacre the Procer/Lycaones/Heroes and weaken the Calernia continent imho

I am still waiting when the story will actually move from this backyard puddle that is just Callow in this Lore that we had in last 200(?) chapters and see more from all the promised other Continents, and if not them at least Dark Elfs/Dwarfes/Gnomes to make a big entrance int he story as moving plot already

Anon

Kinda guessed Athal would be end up being a bigger player (though I'm not quite sure of the logic of having him be placed among Cat's retinue), but I'm kinda really disappointed in skipping out on Cat's talk with the Dead King. It reeks of the conversation with Black that was purposefully withheld in the last book, and while I get that the Dead King probably just told Catherine she lost, it feels....pretty odd to skip over.

Otherwise, interesting to see that the Bard is giving the Dead King free rein (presumably with which to hang himself), and the bard recognizes that Catherine may be becoming a bigger problem.

Meanwhile, Cordelia is absolutely boned, now. She may get her holy war, but she has now completely lost control of the crusade.

Someguy

But what if the Dead King would prefer starving to letting Bard have the stew? Would Bard eat the baby then?

Dainsleif

I personally dont think the bard is woman in that metaphor, since she herself says that she is letting him "eat the baby" and in the joke theone that says that will eat the baby is the Dead King himself, which strikes me as the bard simply telling the story, shes not the woman with the baby she's the narrator.

I could be wrong on that but my take is that the woman might be actually catherine and the baby is callow. Correct me if im wrong.

boballab

Two things about the Bard at the end there:

1. Notice "She" is letting him eat the baby. Hmm sounds like she is forgetting that she answers to higher powers...almost like a villain in fact.

2. She could also be running a colossal bluff because the last time we saw her, her plans weren't exactly working out her way and she had to make a hasty retreat. It might be the case that the reason "She" is letting the Dead King eat the baby, is because she can't stop him but doesn't want him to know it.

Komploding

I seem to remember it being said that the bard was not truly on the side of Above, and that before Neshamah came along she was balanced for both sides equally, since he came along tho she's had to be on the side of Above to play counterweight to him I think.

ZorbaTHut

*Does* she answer to higher powers?

One recurring theme of this story is that things are always bigger in scale than you think they are. Remember that in this story containing horrible eldritch abominations and literally hundreds of hells and demons ripped from nightmare dimensions, there's also gnomes, who apparently tootle around the stratosphere in invincible airships and straight-up wreck civilizations for laughs. Where Cat is a one-woman army, a single elf requires an entire team to take down, and we don't even know how the elves rank against the gnomes.

So we've been told for the entire story that the Gods Above and Gods Below are at war, but aren't willing to interfere directly. Then comes along the Wandering Bard, who seems absolutely happy to interfere, isn't obviously on either the side of Above or Below, and is herself a horrifying monstrous abomination of a construct that is not and perhaps never has been human.

I am not at all convinced the Wandering Bard fits into the structure of the world that we've been given. She might be entirely separate from the Above/Below dichotomy.

crysjal

It was established earlier that The Bard was once human and became perhaps the first empowered human, to get revenge of some sort. Then she slowly lost her humanity over centuries performing her task.

The task appears to be maintenance of the world for the God's debate/argument regarding free will for humanity. But considering her recent actions she may be operating according to a different agenda entirely.

TeK

What conversation?

greathogo

I think the bard is Conflict personified. She doesn't want Callow to attain peace because as Cat has been saying forever, Callow is where the conflicts take place. This makes sense with why she wanted the Black Knight out of the way and why she supports heroes at the moment. Wouldn't surprise me if she has gotten Villains involved previously when Callow was too peaceful.

I just really enjoy Catherine's story. She is a great protagonist and this entire fiction has gotten me to reconsider parts of the novel I am writing because... Villains are pretty interesting characters too, aren't they?

Styn

Not just the talk with Black. Captains death was similarly left to 'our imaginations'. Whenever ErraticErrata does off screen the story suffers IMO.

MetruX

That is specifically to keep US, the readers, in the dark. It simply makes sense to increase the tension and make us guess while new chapters come out.

Clint

I'm starting to wonder if the author does that because they are confident in writing the scenes.

They have skipped too many at this point

Zopilote 506

Have always hated bard, still hate her. When we will get to see best boi Anaxares?

SpeckofStardust

Eh.

1. Fuck

2. I think Cat knew.

Gunslinger

If she knew she only had to kill Athal and she'd have negotiation rights. Maybe a suspicion but one she wouldn't be able to test without offending the dead king were she wrong

Death Knight

Malicia had too many back ups in place and the Dead King NEVER planned to negotiate with her. The game was over before she even started playing.

Jonnnnz

Or, maybe the talks with the Dead King started with him accepting Malicia's offer, and what he and Cat talked about was what happens after. Malicia thought the trick with Athal worked, but Cat was just playing along, showing her what she wanted to see.

Dainsleif

I like that theory. The dead king has been in this game for too long to be a piece in either Cat's or Malicia's board, so it would make complete sense hes the one running the game instead of them and has planned to use both.

Javvies

Did not see Athal being a flesjpuppet of Malicia coming. And months to prepare? Totally a test on the Dead King's part. Not sure Cat passed with flying colors, but I don't think she failed miserably, either. As far as the Dead King is concerned, I think it's a minor pass on Cat's part. As far as Malicia is concerned, it's a loss for Cat – possibly the start of a Pattern between them.

—

Sucks to be you, Hasenbach. Might actually be kind of a good thing you and Grey Pilgrim overreached and failed in negotiating with Cat – otherwise, everything and everybody would be moving on Praes right now, not mostly in Procer.

Wonder if Cat is going to stop by Black and try to extract him and the Legions with him. Hearing Malicia is making deals with the Dead King might well be the last straw for him.

—

Hmmm. Not sure who or what the baby Bard wants the Dead King is supposed to be. But Bard is apparently seriously pissed at someone or about something someone has done.

And they both have way more than just Names going for them, it seems.

IDKWhoitis

Yeah Liesse being turned into a Flying Fortress broke him.

Dead King negotiation will probably flip him onto Cats Side.

And it makes sense that Catherine is going to go to black, right as Procer starts moving to purge black, he will just just disappear.

Mike E.

Maybe Cat showing up and gating Black's army around is why they suddenly moved so fast? And Black just stayed out of the fight because he wasn't really needed and to make it look like he can't do both at the same time?

Though the whole time passage thing when going through Arcadia sort of nullifies my theory.

Death Knight

Black did not know Malicia was dealing with the Dead King. His goal at the moment is to destroy all of Cordelia's political support. Cordelia is royally screwed because she can't allocate men to deal with Black. She needs those men to man the border with the Dead King now. Meanwhile, Black has free reign to burn her backyard to cinders.

It would have been better if Cat had not warned Cordelia at all. The sudden advance by the Dead King would have caught the Procerans flatfooted. With the bulk of their army digging in another country, and Black already showing he can outmaneuver and wreck an armed Proceran city, there would be no stopping the Dead King and the entire Principate would burn.

Catherine gained nothing by warning Cordelia here and it would have been more spiteful to not warn Cordelia at all.

Cicero

Well, unless Cat (correctly in my opinion) views the Dead King as the more dangerous enemy. In that case warning Procer serves the purpose of blunting the Dead King's attack, while Procer and the Tenth Crusade will still be bled white by the fight.

In other words, better a crippled Procer on her border than sharing a border with the Dead King.

Dainsleif

Theres more to that. Remember her original plan, she never intended to let the Dead King roam free in procer, she also never intended for procer to become a slaughter house. Yes she wants cordelia out of the picture and the tenth crusade over but she doesnt want procer to be massacrated, the civilians of procer were supposed to live the aftermath of the Dead King in her plan, makes sense shes warning Cordelia about it.

Misting

Cat has not gone full-Black just yet; she still has some qualms about mass-slaughtering of the innocent, especially after Second Llesse. Moreover, she doesn't want the Dead King to win either. She wants him to lose after pulling Procereran forces away from Callow. By warning Cordelia, she expedites the later and minimizes the former. You are correct, it would have been more spiteful to not warn her, but it also would have been a worse move for Callow and her remaining conscience.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I think this might be an application of his aspect Lead.

Big Brother

This was great, from beginning to end.

IDKWhoitis

So is Cat the Baby or is Procer?

Also, I want to see how pissed off Grey is going to be.

Novice

Maybe the Hierarch? She was after all, banished from the Free Cities. That's a not insignificant chunk of Calernia that she doesn't get to play with.

Dainsleif

Holy shit i forgot that hahahahaha, she is literally unable to control a BIG part of calernia. It actually makes her actions a lot more sense, shes desperate, she doesnt have more control and so she needs a big move to get control back.

SMHF

Cat's the one running the fuck away while they're arguing; with the baby in one hand, and the stew in the other! :p

Decius

Procer is the soup. Cat is the Lycaonese prince, saying she doesn't want Procer but the Dead King can't have it. The baby is everyone living on the continent.

Someguy

Eh. Cat would be stabbing the innkeeper and burning down the inn.

RanVor

With goblinfire.

Yotz

That depends on attractiveness of the child's mother. Given Cat's preferences, she may opt in favour of eating her, if you catch my flu...

AVR

The baby might just be Praes...

Dainsleif

That is an extremely ugly baby with some family diseases that i dont think even the Dead King wants.

Tutitutitut

You know, the tyrant is destined to die soon i think. The sound at the crypt said something along those lines?

RanVor

According to the thing in the crypt, he should have died years ago. Not the most reliable source of information, if you ask me.

Someguy

Anyone thinks Tyrant may be the Hero of the piece since he managed to shape Hierach under Bard's nose and have her thrown out of the League by proxy?

Vortex

The whole thing that made him the tyrant was when the day of his death came to be and instead of dying, he killed the ruler and took up his name. That is how he ascended, by breaking all the rules and imposing his own will instead.

Dainsleif

Kinda of awesome when you think about it. Black had to make war with his own country and the rest of calernia in order to learn how to defy the gos law. Cat learned through him and gained experience thanks to the Fae and her aquired knoledge on aspects to do tge same. The tyrant stabbed the previous ruler (cat would be proud) and "said fuck you gods i win" at the age of what? 9?

Liliet

12 same thing really ♥

Soronel Haetir

I am somewhat surprised the Bard can show up in Keter, I would have expected the Serenity to be shaped by Neshamah's will enough that she simply couldn't appear. Ranger getting in is an entirely different thing as she overcomes all the obstacles but WB simply ghosts past them.

Anon

The Dead King is noted to be in creation again when he meets the bard – not Keter.

Agent J

There's the Kingdom of the Dead, then there's the capital city of that Kingdom called Keter, then there's Tower with the Demon Eye hovering over it at the center of the city, and then there's the Greater Gate at the deepest level of that Tower, lastly, there's the Hell that gate leads to that is inhabited by the Dead King's living subjects. He calls his corner of Hell Serenity.

Neshamah, to my understanding just stepped through his gate, finally leaving Serenity for the first time and entering Keter, that is, entering Creation. Bard came to greet her old friend in his tower, at the heart of his old city, outside the Hellgate.

She did not, in fact, enter Serenity. More to the point Keter != Serenity.

Amoonymous

For what it's worth, as far as I can tell the Serenity is Neshamah's personal Hell.

Keter itself is still in creation, it just houses the portal to the Serenity.

So Bard met the Dead King in Keter and not the Serenity.

Paollo Passoline

God damn this is like crack, cant wait for the next one. Amazing story and world building. Love it. Trully. Wonder if it will ever be translated to portuguese, so i can parade this book around

RanVor

If the Guide was released in my native language, I'd buy several copies for the sole purpose of forcing people to read it. Currently, I can't, because not a single one of my friends knows English to a sufficient degree. It's incredibly frustrating.

I don't envy whoever would have to translate this book, though.

Zartan229

Same for me, but i really hope that someday i will be able to get a hard copy of this beautifull series.

Eduardo

Well, eu falo português e estou lendo.
Apparently I am not the only speaker of portuguese around.
By the way, brazilian.

Dainsleif

Hello friend, to por aqui tbm, você não esta sosinho.

Anon

So...what does the bard get out of the dead king going ape on Procer?

A sufficiently strong response from the gods above, maybe, but while the gods above may want that, it's still going to depend on if the Dead King really gets hardcore with all his nastiness – of which the presumed Proceran 'hero band' is going to have to go against – only the pilgrim is stuck with Cat for the time being.

And in the greater scheme of things, if Malicia's got an agreement with the Dead King, depending on the terms, the Dead King could be used as a bludgeon against Cat at any later time.

FactualInsanity

Technically, he's not stuck with her.
She got... excommunicated? I forgot the exact term used, but the Crusader part of the House of Light declared all deals with her non-binding. It remains to be seen what the people that made those deals with her (namely Milenan and the Grey Pilgrim) think about that.

Jonnnney

I somehow doubt an oath made by a hero to a Villain/Fae can be broken by something as mundane as interfaith political maneuvering.

Jane

Oh, an oath to a Fae can be broken very easily. Very easily indeed. Why, it's practically expected, in all the old stories.

It's just, that's the kind of thing that usually ends with the oathbreaker dead/dancing in Arcadia for millennia/their children stolen as payment/all of their dreams made ash while the Fae laughs at their misery/etc.

I don't know what kind of influence Fae oaths "really" have in the Guideverse, but from a narrative perspective, there might be no faster way of losing this crusade than ignoring those oaths. As you say, I doubt the Gods Above have the authority to break them.

werafdsaew

They didn't swear an oath; that's why Amadis is staying behind as hostage.

Jago

Technically, their lives are forfeit. They are hostages that guaranteed a truce, the truce was broken, the other side has the right to kill the hostages.

If we accept the Church of Light decree that the truce "never existed" as Cat is an abomination, they are prisoners in the hands of an abomination, so as good as dead.

They are further screwed as they are Heroes that offered themselves to martyrdom to save their men. Those usually die if the other side doesn't break the bargain.

boballab

Or it could be that she can't stop the Dead King and is trying to con him, remember that her plans failed in the Free Cities and she had to flee. She might be trying to make the Dead King think that she can stop him at anytime and thus make him hold back from going all in.

Oshi

Or she is doing exactly what she needs to kill off the board and start over.

Dimensional

I'm assuming She's backing the Grey Pilgrims – Redemption play. If The Dead king is all burning up Procer, How long can Cat stay on the side of Evil and let it go. CAllow may hate Procer, but I imagine that what remains of the house of light will want some response to the invasion. and once she joins with the hero's, the redemption story is one more step along the road to Cat sacrificing herself.

IDKWhoitis

Which can hilariously backfire. Because Cats not so opposed to burning herself at the stake, as long as everyone else is on the same ride. Like no Hero left standing at the end type of thing.

While The Bard may be willing to pay that price, we can't be sure all of the heroes will be willing to pay that price. Especially Grey, since his fight is with the Dead King not Cat. He sees Cat as a side note in a larger conflict. This can turn some Heroes dark.

TideofKhatanga

Cat is the Queen of Winter. She can Let it Go as much as she wants.

Novice

I am actually very glad that the Woe's atrocity of a plan didn't succeed. I would have been disappointed since the story was doing so well in crafting plots and schemes, both political and tactical. I'm also glad Malicia hasn't lost her edge.

Thanks for the chapter!

Matthew

This. Malicia is better at this than cat.

Also, what happens if Black goes against the Dead King?

Like give him Procer's resources gathered for the Crusade and let him eat the Dead King.

If there is one guy who can deal with all of Dead King's overpowered shenanigans... It's Black.

Novice

In this hypothetical scenario, I think Black would have been able to hold his own. But in the end, he will fail since Bard/Intercessor is gunning for him and she's quite content with DK's current situation. Two ancient, scheming immortals against Black wouldn't be a fair fight.

RanVor

Ah, but Black does have one not-so-ancient, not-so-scheming immortal on his side...

IDKWhoitis

I would compare this to Catherine throwing the necrotic goats filled of goblin fire at the Fortress.

And suddenly the moment the goats arrived at The Fortress, the whole thing just disappears into a small Arcadian portal that no one saw coming.

Black planning the moves and Catherine executing anything violently, I think they can hammer out a strategy to take out the DK, Malica, and intercessor.

Anon

I think the most interesting part is that the Bard (seemingly) confirms that Cat isn't a piece of the bard's own creation, and that the Bard has instead 'only' been playing damage control.

Like...that would mean that either Black got insanely lucky with his 'create an anti-story story' narrative for Cat to be shaped into, and/or someone else has been pulling the strings who is just as good as Bard, if not better.

Also kind of interesting in that she thought that Cat would, if given enough time, eventually 'settle down' like the Dead King did, and mellow out – she really misunderstands Callowan ideology if that's the case.

Meanwhile, though, Cat's gonna have her hands full trying to appease the Empress now, in that she 'knows' that Malicia is likely willing to unleash the dead king on her at any moment, for having tried to assassinate her – Cat broke the 'illusion' of cooperation, and if Procer clears out, Malicia has no reason to believe Cat will fall back into any sort of deference.

Jane

Luck isn't that unlikely here, no? I mean, there's been thousands of years for this kind of thing to happen – and there have already been many near-misses like her, who "burned themselves out". All that has to happen is Cat to survive long enough to burn Bard, and the world is her frozen oyster.

werafdsaew

Why is there a need to appease anybody? The Dead King can't reach Callow without going through Procer first, and Cat's army beat Malicia's.

Novice

Does she though? Malicia is still in control of half of the entire Legions of Terror and she has Wolof's sorceries to back it up. Malicia has the forges of Foramen which means better weapons and armor. The only advantages Cat's army has over Malicia's are the Woe and her general. And her general being better than the remaining generals in the Legions is debatable.

Although, you can argue that Cat being the underdog in this universe gives her all the advantages she needs.

matesbe

She doesn't have half the Legions of terror. Cat said earlier that Praes proper was so badly defended at this point that Callow could conceivably invade, though not hold it. Malacia is approaching the Dead King partially because she doesn't have a lot of military cards to play, so she gets someone else to play for her.

Novice

Huh, you're right. For some dumb reason, I have it in my head that the Praes heartlands still has half of the Legions as a substantial garrison.

Welp, Praes is utterly fucked in this crusade. Time to let loose all the horrors locked in the basements, I guess.

werafdsaew

Yes, read chapter 23

John Laing

Cat has knights, whereas the Legions of Terror have never had access to proper heavy cavalry. Playing defensive, she also has favorable terrain, a loyal populace, and the Observatory to counter infiltration.

Novice

Eh, the Knights have been completely defeated before. I'm sure whatever tactics Black has employed in the Fields would have been taught in their war academy/college for the past two decades. And the current Knights are scrapped from the bottom of the barrel, quite unlike before the Conquest. I admit the Observatory would have been effective.

Someguy

If Cat could get the current Knights education expanded to include Legion doctrine (which they still refuse to due to regarding it as "for peasants") Juniper will have in her hands the most seasoned phalanx and finest heavy cavalry on Calernia. The hammer and the anvil able to crush any armed forces short of Named.

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ancient\_Macedonian\_army

Novice

I just got shivers imagining Juniper with all the military toys that she wants. If only the Crusade got delayed for another five years...

Jago

The legions are way more like Roman legions from Caesar time than the phalange.

IDKWhoitis

You do forget that Catherine and the FAE are Major Force multipliers that the previous knights did not have. Also the knights may have learned from their graphic defeat and will know to just kind of avoid direct confrontation like they did previously. Calvary as a force for flanking and force recon that can move quickly are still potent.

Cicero

I don't think it was luck. I think it was very careful and deliberate on the part of Black.

Go back and reread Cat's first meeting with Black. It has all the earmarks of the start of a hero's story, not a villain. Then it takes a swerve towards being an anti-hero, but still typically heroic. Yet despite all the heroic markers Cat ends up a villain.

She got a hero's story but as a villain. And I think that was a deliberate choice on the part of Black. Which then explains why she flips stories so easily.

1queenofblades1

Malicia pisses me off with how good she is 😞

Kill her and take her head Cat

Raved Thrad

That might result in a Dark Quickening, and then we'd have Malicia in Cat's construct-body, with full control of Winter.

mavant

And then in the sequel we find out they're actually alien criminals exiled to this world?

Raved Thrad

Still a better love story than Twishite. 😊

Jane

Well. I have to say, I did not see Malicia being in Athal, because it did not occur to me that the game would be that rigged. Nice training for her, though, and she'll get her diversion either way – assuming she can get around what Malicia has planned.

Though, I wonder what that is, exactly. It's obvious the Empress was lying about her plan, and she's deliberately acted to provoke Cat multiple times – but for what reason? Luring her into a trap of Malicia's making to dispose of her would be the most obvious answer, but the timing's all wrong for it. I suspect she's trying to solve one problem with another, either such that they eradicate each other or create a set of circumstances such that she can bind Cat to herself, but I can't see how launching a missile at herself plays into that. Well, I suppose it's only reasonable that we don't have enough clues for that yet, given the characters involved...

I also wonder what the Dead King told Cat, but I expect that we'll be finding that out next chapter. I'm reasonably certain he told Cat that Athal was Malicia, but there's more to it than that – she seemed to hint that she came to some agreement with the Dead King, which suggests that he's double-crossing her. Either to take up her offer now, while publicly framing Malicia for it, or to turn on Malicia when she uses the Dead King against Cat – I can't see anything else that would be big enough for Cat to call on the Dead King's help again, either this year or the next. Unless she was just trying to making Malicia paranoid.

Something tells me the Black Knight isn't actually using an Aspect to move, but instead some manner of unconventional tactics. Reckless constant use of an Aspect doesn't seem like his style. He has to be using an Aspect for the sieges, though, since he doesn't have any equipment for it, but does have one that can break through walls at will. Nice touch spying on the enemy's scrying, though. I wonder what his escape plan is, however?

Nice to see the Council of Immortals being all schemey and vague as usual, though. I wonder if either of them actually have any plans here, or if they're both just bluffing each other for the heck of it so that they can both claim they planned the whole thing a century from now when it bites one of them. ...Not criticizing the writing, to be clear, they're just both playing out an archetype I enjoy mocking.

Someguy

Black isn't using an Aspect to move the Legions. That's just a modern infantry on a fast march while Procer move their levies like a herd of sheep. The feudal idiots never experienced an actual standing army with modern training before.

Jane

I don't think it's just a difference in quality – the commander said their estimates were based on their observations of Black's previous pace. This suggests that either Black had deliberately been reducing his speed, possibly to concentrate the enemy forces as they attempt to encircle him in order to reduce the chances of an accidental interception later, or that he's suddenly moving more quickly. This could be accomplished by use of an Aspect, as the commander theorized, but innovating new tactics for rapid movement is a pretty common trope in military-focused fiction.

Someguy

That's what I meant, Black and the Legion's previous marching speed was done "conventionally" to lull the Proceran commanders into an intellectual trap. The sudden speed increase is probably only mid-pace. A well trained infantry battallion can outpace a horse in an overnight march and still go into battle afterwards. Black and Grem have not yet shown all their non-magical cards.

werafdsaew

Cordelia do have an effectively spy network; it's hard to think that they don't know what legion marching speed is.

Cicero

Are we sure?

Black does have the Aspect "Command" which might allow him to speed up his army marches.

We do know that all of his Aspects tend to support leading an army instead of individual combat.

Javvies

Black's Aspects are "Lead", "Conquer", and "Destroy". If he's using an Aspect to speed his Legions, it's probably an application of Lead or Conquer.

If he's not using an Aspect, then I see a three basic options – one, stepping up the marching pace, two, extending the time spent marching, or three, some combination of stepping up the pace and extending the time spent marching.

Cicero

Most likely "Lead", that was the one I was thinking of and misremembered as "Command"

Novice

Also: "Neshamah finished, purely for the pleasure of denying her the climax."

I believe someone in the comments called him bone daddy last chapter? (◡ ◡)

DroughtBringer

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also, I'm thinking that, in this case, Cat is the Baby She's new to the game, and so young compared to the others.

Gunslinger

Personally i think its likely she just means Procer. The tale plays on the evils and dangers of the Dead King and the Bard is asking him to go all in

Oshi

She meant Calernia. Everything in the story has been carefully shaped so that a Crusade is called and a threat produced. This is about wiping the slate. The Bard wants her enemies dead, her pieces strengthened and things set the way SHE wants them. As far as I can see this IS her plan.

Antoninjohn

Cat is mentioned to be going to pick up Black if he get in trouble. I wonder what she is doing before going back to Callow is it the Dark elves, the Mighty Skaven Empire or the Golden Bloom

Novice

"Cat is mentioned to be going to pick up Black if he get in trouble." Where was this mentioned?

haihappen

In a discussion inside the Woe, it is discussed if she should Gate to Black and save him before he is captured/killed, but not before, as they do not know what his plans are, because he always has plans. But saving him was insited upon by Masego, and Cat would do it for him.

Novice

She'd do it only because Zeze told her to. Totally not because she still loves the man as a father figure in her frozen, lightless, decorative heart. Yep. Definitely.

Rook

It's wonderful to see that the proceran crusade is starting to become as much of a clusterfuck as the real crusades.

Someguy

Fighting over the spoils of battle before the battle is even fought or won tends to do that.

lqueenofblades1

Nowhere near as much as the real life Fourth Crusade though. Yet. I honestly kinda hope it does lol. I'd love to see Salia sacked and Procer split apart into various successor states with a Latin Empire analogies (similar to what happened to the Byzantine Empire)

Jane

If memory serves, though, Mercantis hasn't had its fleet contracted to take the Crusaders anywhere, so there's little opportunity to suggest looting their hosts in lieu of repayment... Though I guess a variant could still work if someone "forgot" to pay their mercenaries?

Euodiachloris

History: ramming home the most important message again and again – "makes bloody certain to keep your guards/ mercenaries/ army/ contractors/ eunuchs/ tax collectors/ civil servants happy". Nothing but Bad Things™ happen if you don't.

GuidingMoonlight

Umm, did I miss chapter?

Where is the ending of the arc? The climax. Where is Cat realization that she've been played? Or is cat allowed to lose only off screen? I mean really what the hell.

How did Cat figured out that dead king about to invaded, anyway? She walked away before Malicia revealed herself. Or she is faerie-precog now?

Speaking of precogs, Augur continue to be useless. We know squat about her power but black and cat continue to surprise hasenbah time and time again. She didn't even know that Woe to the north was dead fucking king. You know, biggest evil on a continent? Ring any bell?

I adore the setting, but common, you can do better.

lennymaster

Nooo, you did not miss a chapter. Not showing Cat's conversation with the Dead King was a means to build suspense for the reader, as has been done several times in Guide. Like at the end of the last book, in Liese. Were Malicia told Cat to preserve the doomsday weapon, despite Black beeing adamant about destroying it.

That Malicia was gonna make a deal without Cat around to try and outbid her was clear and Cat knowing about having lost was clearly implied in the first few paragraphs.

Augur is just not COMPLETELY overpowered, only mildly so. After all, she is the only reason why Hasenbach has not been ended by a tragic but hilarious accident due to Assassin.

GuidingMoonlight

"...was a means to build suspense for the reader," suspense of what? its like cutting out punchline of a joke skipping straight to crowd laughing. its annoying, to say the least.

"...That Malicia was gonna make a deal without Cat around to try and outbid her was clear and Cat knowing about having lost was clearly implied in the first few paragraphs."

It was not. It said that Malicia suspected that DK hinted about it to Cat. In anyway i rather read negotiations myself, thanks.

"Augur is just not COMPLETELY overpowered,"

If by "Augur not completely overpowered" you mean "hasnt done a thing since the start of crusade" than sure.you are right. Black continue to outmaneuvre everyone because..? He is so random? Last arc showed that Precogs(Skein) dont care about it. And if he somehow knows how to counter Augur. than why he didn't tell this trick to Assassin? As I see it right now Augur only role(heh) in the story is to explain why Assassin didn't kill Hassy 10 years ago.

RanVor

It seems to me you baselessly assume there is only one kind of precogs in this universe.

GuidingMoonlight

It seems to me that Augur practically (heh) pose zero threat to Black despite Black extensive collection of death flags (which in this setting has much more weight) and Augur (clearly overhyped) reputation and backstory...

---

Now I want Amadeus to make a Mantle of Calamity for himself to stitch the avoided death flags on.

Silverking

Why would the Bard give the Dead King permission to go hogwild with Procer (assuming that's the baby in this scenario)? I can think of one or two potential reasons.

1. Paying for Future Victory. I'm reminded of the Bard's scheme to turn the Calamities's murder-by-diverted-trap of the Ashen Priestess to a fatal attack to leave an opening to kill Sabah, and there was some theorizing by Cat about how the Heavens can't create a truly overpowered Hero because that would mean that the Hells would have "permission" to balance things out. I'm thinking that the Bard is predicting that a grave threat to the forces of Good is coming, greater than ANY of the players we've met. So, she's allowing the Dead King to get a bunch of "Evil wins" on the playing field, so that when the time comes the Heavens will have "permission" to put their whole fist on the scales. The main caveat is that the Bard's promising that the axe will be coming down...but not on the Dead King.

2. Punishment for Cordelia. Now, the Heavens love an excuse to kill Evil just as much as the next guy, but this crusade has been disappointing in a few ways. Calling down the righteous fury of the Heavens is not a mere tool for your political games, Cordelia. This is supposed to be building the hype for the forces of Good, but declaring Cat an Archvillain aside, this is barely more noteworthy than a border dispute. Where's the nationwide call to prayer? Where are the zealots who would have fought to the last man rather than accept terms with the Black Queen? Crusades are not footnotes in history, dangit! Well, they're going to remember this one. They will learn the cost of taking the threat of Evil lightly. They will remember that their salvation comes not from petty tactics and schemes, but devotion and submission to Good and Heroes. They will learn for generations to hate Cordelia's name as much as they fear Triumphant's (May she never return). And the next time some smartass First Prince thinks about how to maintain power, they'll think twice about taking the name of the Heavens in vain.

haihappen

The Intercessor's motivation is the real problem here when trying to figure out what it does next.

1) Reestablishment of the status quo? With Praes back into old ways, Callow the field where the conflict of Good/Evil regularly produces graveyards worth of casualties in way to resolve the conflict. With the side goal of undoing the "Grand Alliance" thingy. Eternal Strive so neither Good or Evil Wins (And end the game of Creation). Then the obvious goal would be to break Malaica and Cathrine, and dethrone Hasenbach to end her Grand Alliance scheme.

2) Breaking of the Dead King? Unlikely, but it could be goading the Dead king to venture farther from his "save" hell as possible, for some scheme to take him down, forever. Because that is its END OF THE GAME, YOU WIN moment. And she craves the end?

3) Removal of all pieces on the board that she had no hand in creating. Meaning remove Cathrine from Creation, or being able to control her. This would be a motivation of a control-obsessed psycho-/sociopath. The current state of events may have a not insignificant change of spiraling completely out of Its control, so order, or chaos in this case, must be restored.

4) Prevent Cat to win and thus "flip the table" on the Gods. Lesser variant of (1). The chain of events could lead to an equilibrium of Good and Evil, triggering a Stalemate in the Game of Creation. Or it is the opposite, and unleashing the Dead King may facilitate Cats rise to the Top, then being able to enforce the Accords, building equilibrium over time, ending Creation, and with it, the Intercessor.

A lot of speculation hinges on the unanswered (or unanswerable) question "Does the Intercessor want to end its own existence, or does she enjoy it?".

The tiny bit of the Bard's PoV cannot be used to solve this, I think, as the Bard may as well be an Unreliable Narrator.

My personal speculation grows towards the Bard/Intercessor as a God, self-stripped of most of its powers, nudging stories to stack the deck to its side's favor.

magesbe

I got the feeling that she was once just as mortal as The Dead King was, it would explain her talking about how she now she “knew better” than before. Gods don’t change, they’re eternal; mortals? They learn and evolve.

RanVor

Hot. Damn. That’s about everything I can think of at the moment.

Vagrant

Oh my God. What an amazing chapter!! I’m in awe and gonna read it 2 more times now. Then maybe re-read the whole arc. I sure hope I am a Patreon already cuz it’d feel criminal to not act on the gratitude I’m feeling right now. I wanna write 3 pages of praise, seeing as I am neither particularly precise in observation nor in expressing myself I will not. It’d be a waste of anyones time. Still I couldn’t resist the urge to at least get my intention across. Maybe it makes you smile! 😊

Raved Thrad

Ahh, raw Callowan spite: there is no nectar sweeter to savor. Where is your haughtiness now, Cordelia Hasenbach? I can’t wait to see her have to wade through the blood of her slaughtered people. “...And down here in the mud, oh look! Another dead Proceran!”

Yotz

Two titbits:

First – there is a certain probability that DK made a separate pact with Cat, and – maybe – nudged her to leak his plans for imminent invasion; and second – it seems, Malicia is in dark about the Sixth.

Oh, and one more thing – our dear droog seems to be aiming for a particular brand of ultra-violence – to remind everyone hopped on fancy new stuff like “moral ambivalence” how real Evil looks like.

Or maybe she finally pulled a spring, and just wants to see the world in flames...

---

Didn’t “Athar” see the “Shade of Splendour” discuss politics with the Woe and attend the eeting with the Dead King? I think she just disregards Akua as a tool of hers that had been used to build the murderfortress and then was lost to Catherine, but has no independent influence.

Yotz

That’s the thing, though – “Shade of Splendour” would be “a ghost of faerie” in non-purple. From Malicia’s point of view, Akua – indeed – had outlived her usefulness. That doesn’t mean she wouldn't use her if there'll be an opening, or wouldn't use a fact of Butcher of Liesse being semi-pardoned against Cat.

But, as you mentioned – “Athal” saw a “Shade of Splendour”. And so I'm inclined to make a jump in conclusions – Malicia saw a Shade of a Faerie, and the options for her is to make connections with necromantic fallout of the Liesse Machine, where some Faeries could've been turned to Shades among the others, and now is bound by Winter; or conclude that Hierophant is tinkering with LM to reproduce the effects; and either way that problem would be resolved upon the imminent betrayal of the Splendid.

What Malicia doesn't know, is that the Prisoner of the Mantle is now in active status, willingly serving the Black Queen, and the identity of Shade in question, probably mistaking her for a random Fae.

If this is so, that may be a wildcard for the Cat's straight flush against Malicia's full house.

Cold Cyberia

Ten bucks on Cat saying hello to the drow in Everdark. They worship Tenets of Night and she's got the whole Sovereign of Moonless Nights thing going on. It's a match made in heaven.

kagelupus

Just an FYI, this chapter was not showing up on the side bar list of chapters. Had to go to Ch. 47: Culmination and then click on the next chapter link from there.

NotQuiteHere

I get the feeling we're all about to be blindsided by the Tyrant.

RanVor

Even after all of this, it still strikes me how immensely arrogant the First Prince really is. Even as she stands on the brink, she still has the gall to demand from the person she intended to kill mere minutes ago to save her sorry ass from the mess she has brought on herself. Even when she tries to destroy Callow, she remains convinced that Callowans have a sacred duty to die in defence of Procer. Because obviously Proceran lives are the only ones that matter. Even Malicia isn't as full of herself as this woman.

Cicero

It's not arrogance. It's just a natural human self-centered tribal instinct.

Naturally the leader of Procer is going to view things from the perspective of how they benefit Procer.

Friends of Procer will help her when she is in trouble.

Enemies will attack her when Procer is in trouble.

It's a natural thing, just as Cat is biased to see things from the Callow point of view.

It's just that the First Prince of Procer has to carry the burden of all the sins of every previous First Prince, which tends to make her position look hypocritical. But that really isn't Cordelia's fault, any more than it's Malicia's fault for every evil every Praes Tyrant before her committed.

RanVor

I'm not saying she shouldn't care about Proceran lives or anything like that. But one does not simply demand an unconditional help from the sworn enemy without being more than a little stuck-up. Note that she didn't even imply she intends to stop ravaging Callow in the wake of Dead King's invasion. It's pretty clear she counted on bleeding the Army of Callow out against Neshamah and finishing it off when the threat is over. The entire argumentation she presented to Cat can be summarized as "You must help me because I'm better than you". She basically told Cat Callow doesn't matter; the only one important around is Cordelia Hasenbach and it's everyone's duty to save her from trouble even when it's detrimental to them.

Bonus points for appealing to humanity she doesn't even believe Cat has.

Death Knight

I sincerely hope the Dead King will not take the Bard up on her offer to invade Procer.

That would be stupid.

Sure, he will win alright and the Principate will enter a 1000 years of Darkness (because the culmination of this Story is long overdue) but that would bare his neck. Because the Hero rising up to defeat the Ultimate Evil and break the thousand years of darkness is a story as old as time. He himself mentions this outcome in his conversation with Catherine.

So why would he leave his Hell now, knowing full well it would will not end well for him?

If he needs to send in his armies, why can't he do that from Keter? It is mentioned in the story that while he himself never takes the field that often, there have been skirmishes between his troops and the Procerans manning his border. So it has been proven that he can command his forces at a distance...

So, why leave at all?

RanVor

Maybe his Command Undead ability has a range limit.

superkeaton

Oh Bard, you're delicious. And yes, Malicia, thank you for helping teach Cat a lesson. And thank you, Cat, for teaching Cordelia a lesson.

One big circle of happy learning, this is. With a side of baby eating.

Also, side note, but typos are way funnier when they're Cordelia's line.

ironvale

I guess, this chapter confirms that the gem that glowed in the last book's epilogue was the Emperess contacting the Dead king.

Club

Is it just me, or is Cordelia remarkably self-centered? Seemingly incapable of thinking it's not about her?

crysjal

Everyone is the protagonist of their own story. Cordelia is only now finding out that hers is a tragedy.

Someguy

Cordelia's in the wrong story. Cat's the "Orphan Queen" leading a "ragtag bunch of misfits" to repel the forces of Foreign Invasion. She now has the Role of "Smug Ruler of the Invaders" about to have the rug under her feet yanked.

Shequi

One extremely subtle, but important thing:

'Agnes had been quite clear that doom was gathering south, and the League's intentions were damnably opaque.'

But then later:

'Doom to the north, Agnes had said.

She was never wrong.'

Do the Augur's prophecies rewrite themselves in everyone's mind to ensure retrospectively that she was always right?

grzecho2222

"Woe, Cordelia," the Augur said. "Woe to the north and to the south. Sit and listen, before it is too late."

Goodpie2

Hang on. I'm confused. Which one is the baby, Procer or Callow? Or a third party?

Captain Amazing

I think the Bard is trying to kill herself. Her Name and powerset have changed over the years, and we know that her current abilities are painful to her. If she's not actively doing what she should be then she's shunted out into the void until she's needed again. The gods torture her to ensure she does what they want. I think the Bard's trying to sneak herself into a villain role so she can die.

NZPIEFACE

"The capacity had always been there, of course, but the mentality had not. The Black Queen was being guided towards a path."

Apotheosis. Always, fucking, apotheosis.

NZPIEFACE

A pupil? We know the Dead King is more akin to God than Man, yet he says the Intercessor is similar to him.

Hmmm.

Salty

Ah, yes, bullshit writer intervention. The quality is dropping. 4 books in I really think that pulling a "but she was there and planning all along" is bullshit.

Especially after such a long arc, winning or losing is fine. But this reveal just pushed the last 10 or so chapters into total irrelevance. By pulling this stuff the weight behind them disappears. It's especially grating as this isn't the first time either. It would also be far less grating if the whole running around trying to kill Malicia thing hadn't been the length of a small book.

I love the premise and I think that with some major editing this could be an amazing book or 2, but it quickly going towards the meg pile.

Max Scherer

yeah this story is torture to read. The world and story is sooo intersting, but that Cat doesnt get one fucking important victories is frustrating as fuck...

Jago

This chapter and the one where the WB and DK meet in the shards of the past make me question how much of the "this is story-driven universe" we see is dictated by the gods and how much by the preferences of the WB. In the past the Blessed where freer, while now they are Named and more strictly bound to the shape of the tales.

cowlute

Are there no more spellcheck threads, or did someone miss "clam"?

---

Chapter 48: Shadows

"A passable plan done in a day will nearly always beat an exquisite scheme requiring a month."

– Dread Empress Regalia II

Truth be told, I'd never been enamoured with the thought of travelling. Even if I'd never become Black's apprentice I would have left Laure eventually – I'd has plans to attend the War College, what felt like half a lifetime ago – but unlike some of the other girls at the orphanage my heartbeat had never quickened at the notion of journeying across Calernia. There'd been this girl I'd shared a room with, Gods, what'd been her name? Emily, maybe. Something that sounded like that. She'd found work at a street stall near the market just so she could buy a rough map of the continent and plan her travels when she came of age. She'd stolen the only volume of Anabas the Ashuran's travelogues the orphanage had and read it so often the pages had been worn out. That'd never been for me. Having a gander at the most beautiful parts of southern Callow had been appealing, and I'd had vague plans to visit the Duchy of Daoine for as long as I could remember, but my interest in foreign vistas had always been limited.

And yet here I was now, camping with a few companions by the shore of a lake I doubted any human had seen in centuries. Few Praesi maps gave name to the body of water to the northeast of the Kingdom of the Dead, but the Procerans called it the Chalice. There was likely a story there, but not one I knew. It was beautiful, I had to admit. The poisonous fumes that hung over the Dead King's lands did not reach this far north, leaving me with unimpeded sight of a misty lake with sapphire-blue waters. The beach was pebbles of pale and grey, with the rare splash of colour breaking the mould. The winds were restless, here, and the dawning evening pleasantly cool. Even at noon, when the day was warmest most of the Woe wore cloaks. Unlike me they did not welcome to the touch of the cold. I palmed a stone and sent it skidding across the waters, the final plop surprisingly loud to my ears.

Hakram had dug a fire pit earlier and Indrani was now making some sort of sordid stew out of the fish she'd caught with her bare hands, standing hip-deep in the waters. It felt oddly domestic to watch them bicker around the flames, arguing about how much salt should go in a meal. Vivienne was napping right through it, huddled inside a pile of blankets close enough to the fire to feel the warmth of the flames. The last two had less carefree matters to attend to. I'd asked Masego to reach out to the Observatory the moment my little chat with Cordelia Hasenbach came to an end, but even with Akua as a helper the preparations had taken some time. He'd warned me the ritual had high chances of failure. Though the Whitecaps weren't in the way, up here, the distance was massive. It'd taken three attempts before he succeeded mid-afternoon. Fadila had been there, luckily enough, though what she'd had to tell us had taken the wind right out of me. She only knew so much, though, so I'd ordered the Observatory to serve as a relay for another ritual at dusk. Juniper would know more.

I glanced at the tall tower of ice I'd formed to speak with the First Prince, which now served as the seat of Hierophant's rituals. I could feel the ebb and flow of sorcery within, though it'd not reached that palpable crescendo of active scrying. I tossed another stone and let the sound of Indrani slapping Hakram with a ladle – clearly stolen from the royal kitchens by Vivienne, as it was pure silver and there was a suspicious hole where the Fairfax heraldry would be – until he submitted to her demands of another pinch of salt. It was calming. I was in great need of that, right now. The sun was dipping into the lake with a riot of red and gold, when Akua came for me. She said nothing, scarlet eyes hooded. She'd grown better at reading my moods, when idle talk would grate on my nerves instead of provide appreciated distraction. I passed the others on the way to the ice, waving a hand when Indrani called out, and found Masego crouched on the ground.

"Catherine," he said without turning. "I believe we've stabilized the formula properly. There should be no more troubles."

"Good work," I said.

"They'll be able to feel that as far south as Keter, at least, if they are keeping an eye out," he reminded me.

"Let them," I grunted. "Scry, Masego."

He did not comment any further, tracing a few runes out of light that set the entire array glowing. I ran my fingers across the back of the seat I'd carved myself out of ice before sitting down. A look was enough to dismiss Akua, though Masego remained close. If the ritual had issues, I expected him to intervene. At the centre of the array lay a dark wooden bowl filled with dark waters taken from the Observatory's own pools. A sympathetic connection, I thought, and silently praised myself for remembering the fancy terms. We'd improved somewhat on the usual spell, Hierophant having me weave Winter as he required. When Fadila's face appeared in the bowl, it did in the mirrors surrounding me as well.

"Your Majesty," she said, bowing.

"Mbafeno," I mildly replied. "Any issues on your end?"

"Marshal Juniper awaits you," she replied. "Shall I proceed?"

"By all means," I said.

Her face rippled, then vanished, and a heartbeat later I was facing the Hellhound's tired gaze. Juniper looked like she'd been put through a ringer. If half of what Fadila had said, that might very well be the case.

"Juniper," I said. "Been a while."

"Foundling," she gravelled. "I have a dozen fires to put out, so let's skip the courtesies."

I almost replied with a sardonic lovely to see you too, but if the situation was as serious as I believed it was no time for banter.

"I had a talk with Fadila Mbafeno earlier today," I said. "But she's constrained to the palace, so most of it was hearsay. I'll need a full report."

The orc nodded.

"The Empire just fucked us hard," Juniper bluntly said. "I can't actually prove it's them, but it has that Wasteland reek."

I grimaced. That'd been Fadila's opinion as well, but I'd hoped she might be wrong.

"How bad was it?" I asked.

"Every member of the King's Council is dead," she said. "Around a third of your court officials. It was a godsdamned massacre."

My fingers clenched.

"Ratface?" I quietly asked.

She shook her head mutely.

"Knife to the back of the neck," she said. "He wouldn't have felt a thing."

I closed my eyes. There was a cold, measured part of me that was furious I'd been robbed of a skilled Lord Treasurer for who I had no real replacement. The rest of me grieved the death of a boy I'd known since we were seventeen, children playing war games in the Tower's shadow. Ratface had been with me since the beginning, since Rat Company. He'd been a friend, one of the few I had left. I inhaled, place the tempest of grief and wrath in a box and set it aside. I opened my eyes, calmed.

"Anne Kendall?" I asked.

"First to go," Juniper said. "We think she was one of the primary targets."

And there went the woman I'd considered my most likely successor to the queenship of Callow. I was slightly appalled that my first thought at hearing the death of Baroness Anne confirmed was how it'd complicate the line of succession, but I would not shy away from the facts. Anne Kendall had been a kind soul, a skilled ruler and if not a friend someone I had deep respect for. A patriot, of that rare breed that put the needs of her people above her own. And she'd been, informally, the closest thing to an acceptable successor I had at my court. Malicia – and this was her work, of that I had no doubt, for it'd been a crippling blow to Callow in too many ways not to be – had ordered her killed just to weaken my position. Fury flared, but I mastered myself. Anger is the death of reason. You need a lucid mind to survive, now.

"Merciless Gods," I finally said. "Who holds Laure?"

"The got the legate I sent to command the garrison and all his staff," Juniper said. "The highest-ranking officer in the city was a Senior Tribune by the name of Abigail. At a guess, they missed her because she was on leave. She's been on the rolls since the Arcadian Campaign, fought under Nauk at the Battle of the Camps."

I frowned.

"I know of her," I said. "She used to serve under Hune, has a Summerholm accent. She's got a handle on the situation?"

"People went to the streets after your court declared martial law," Juniper replied. "So she had the palace cellars emptied and every winesink in the city do the same on the crown's coin."

"She got rioters drunk?" I hissed.

"Drunk enough they weren't able to riot," the Hellhound said. "She didn't have the men to enforce the decree, Catherine, and spilling blood would have been like lighting a sharper. She made the best possible decision, even if she overstepped her authority. I'll state that for the record, if I have to."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"Fuck it, as long as it worked," I finally said. "How quick can you have a senior officer in the city?"

"At least a month," Juniper said. "We're camped close to Ankou, at the moment, in talks with General Sacker's legion."

I drummed my fingers pensively.

"Promote her to legate, then," I said. "Field promotion, to be confirmed at a later date. She's in charge of Laure until I can send one of the Woe to take over."

"I'll pass it along," the orc said.

Good. It'd been an unorthodox method, but then that was the kind of thinking the Army of Callow encouraged. If she had the mettle for higher rank, she'd get to keep it. Gods knew I was always in desperate need of fresh talent.

"Did they manage to assassinate within the army?" I asked.

"They tried," Juniper said. "Had agents in the ranks, one made it as high as tribune. The Jacks caught most of them. The rest got knifed before they could do any real damage. Lord Black sends his regards."

I chewed on that, split between relief at my teacher still being on my corner and displeasure as the fact he'd infiltrated the Army of Callow deeply enough his people were comfortable fighting Eyes of the Empire.

"You got his people?" I asked.

"They're under arrest," Juniper said. "None resisted, so I used a light touch. Only soft interrogations."

"Try to get anything they know about Malicia's people," I said. "I'll authorize release back to Black if they work with us."

The orc nodded.

"Ranker has expressed willingness to work with us," she told me.

The first bit of good news today, that.

"Her legion got mauled at the Vales," I said.

"She's got more than half in fighting fit," Juniper replied. "More importantly, she's willing to trade goblin munitions for supplies. Including goblinfire."

"Get your hands on anything you can," I ordered. "Had she said anything about the Empress?"

"Said politics don't concern her, since she's part of an Imperial expedition army under the direct command of the Black Knight," my Marshal grunted. "She'd got no intention of heading east, and she'd publicly turned away messengers from the Tower."

"Malicia's still sending diplomats through Callow?" I frowned.

"Not anymore," Juniper said. "It got bloody, Catherine. When word about Laure got out, fresh off that proclamation from Salia? They butchered any Praesi they could get their hands on. We lost legionaries that were on leave."

Fuck. The last thing I needed was Callowans taking swings at the Army of Callow.

"The Tower hasn't formally declared war, has it?" I asked.

"Not a word from the Empress," she said. "But we're having Praesi troubles anyway."

"The High Lords can't possibly be fools enough to pick a fight now," I said.

"Worse," the orc replied. "We have refugees coming through the Blessed Isle. Ashur's torching the coast and the sack of Nok displaced thousands. The Wasteland's already rationing, so they're moving west where the food is."

"How many?" I grimly asked.

"Two, three thousand for now," the Marshal of Callow said. "Mostly families. There'll Eyes and assassins among them though, that's a certainty. Farmers have been forcing them to remain near the Isle, by force if need be."

So Malicia was dumping her refugee troubles on me. I supposed from her perspective there was no loss to be had. Either I slaughtered them and became even more reviled in Praes, or I allowed them to stay and had to divert time and resources to force order onto the mess.

"We can't allow them to go deeper into Callow," I said.

"If we don't get them out soon, the numbers will keep growing," Juniper said. "And it's only a matter of time until they get hungry and desperate enough to steal from farmers who won't stand for it. When steel comes out it'll get ugly fast."

"Our only host close enough is the Summerholm garrison," I said. "And that's the key to our entire eastern defence. If she's baiting it out to ambush it..."

"I know," the Hellhound growled. "Her belly's unprotected, but so is ours. She's short on legions, but she could order the High Lords of the interior to send their household troops."

The worst part was that I knew exactly what Malicia was doing, but there was no easy solution. She'd shaken Callow just as the Dead King got loose to prevent me from intervening in the war with Procer, and now she was trying to tie down my forces with the least possible effort on her part. If she'd sent an army into Callow, she'd had to feed and fund it. To commit men. Instead she'd mutilated the administration of the kingdom, then dropped a mess at the border on my lap. If I wanted to retaliate, I'd have to venture into the Wasteland. Where every major city was a fortress heavily warded and filled with horrors and it was impossible to live off the land. Hells, she could probably raid my godsdamned supply lines to fill her own granaries. I would have called it utter idiocy to provoke the Kingdom of Callow when she was already fighting a losing war with the Thalassocracy, but I knew my army was in no state for a protracted eastern campaign. I needed it elsewhere, and I needed it to be making up for the losses of the Battle of the Camps. If I acted, I risked incurring a major loss for no real gain. If I did not act, on the other hand, I would keep paying for it.

I was too furious to be admiring.

"Pull back all the people in the Fields to Summerholm," I finally said. "Have them bring every bag of grain and herd of cattle back with them while they do. The refugees won't keep coming if there's nothing to be had."

"And if they head towards Summerholm?" Juniper asked.

"We'll cross that bridge when we get to it," I said. "They're refugees, not a legion marching column. It'll take months."

"That's a stopgap," she said. "Not a fix."

"A stopgap is what we need, right now," I said. "I'll send Thief back to Callow to take control of the situation."

Juniper's broad face grimaced.

"You're not coming back?" she asked.

"We need an army," I said. "The Dead King dealt with Malicia instead, so I'm getting us another."

"The drow," the Hellhound said.

"The drow," I agreed softly. "We're out of alternatives, Juniper. The Principate is about to be hit hard from the north, which at least will buy us time. I need Callow stable, and the army in fighting fit. That falls on you and Thief. I'll return as swiftly as possible with reinforcements."

"There's good news on that front, at least," Juniper announced. "We're drowning in volunteers."

I blinked.

"Even after I was named Arch-heretic of the East?" I said.

"That's what got it started," the orc said. "Half of Ankou's been to our camp to enrol, Catherine. And after the assassinations in Laure it was like a damned fire was lit. There's formed Royal Guard coming from as far as Holden to enrol, and there's entire convoys on the roads coming towards training camps. Half a year, Warlord. Give me half a year and I'll have you an army that'll shake this fucking continent."

I exhaled softly. They'd cornered us, hadn't they? The Procerans and the Praesi. And the harder they struck, the harder my countrymen would dig their heels.

"Good," I said. "I don't care if you have to empty every treasure vault in Callow, Juniper, I want them armed and trained. The fights around the corner are going to be like nothing we've seen before."

The orc grinned toothily.

"It'll be my pleasure," she said. "That would have been pleasant note to end on, but I have two more messes to pass you."

I sighed.

"I'm listening," I said. "Wait, shit, Prince Amadis and the Pilgrim. Are they..."

"No assassin went after them," Juniper said. "But the Pilgrim's a third mess, looked at a certain way. He legged it and left the prince behind. We haven't seen sign of him since the killings."

Shit. Yeah, it made sense. I wasn't there for him to work on, and when we'd last spoken it had been with harsh words. The old man wouldn't sit pretty in Laure while the Dead King was on the move. Even if he was so inclined, the Heavens wouldn't let him.

"That's a breach of our truce terms," I said.

"The Hells can we do about it?" the Hellhound said. "Kill Milenan? It gets us nothing."

Much as it irritated me, she was right. The northern crusaders were out of the passage and they'd likely be headed upwards to delay the Dead King. I did not want to do anything that might affect that decision, not right now anyway.

"Keep him under our thumb," I finally said. "We'll settle accounts with the Peregrine another day. What's the first disaster?"

"Don't know if it's that," Juniper said. "But diplomacy's not my wheelhouse. The Snake Eater Tribe sent volunteers to enrol, but there was an envoy with them. She says she's coming on the behalf of the Council of Matrons."

Well, shit. It wasn't the first time the ruthless old bats made discreet overtures to me. Back before we'd purged the worst of the Regals they matron-attendants that rule the Snake Eater Tribe had interrogated Pickler about what intention I might have for Praes, if I ended up on the winning side of a war with the Empire. There'd been no offer, back then. Malicia had yet to bleed enough the Matrons would consider her easy meat. I suspected that with the Ashurans running rampant across the coast and Black strolling around the Principate with half the Legions of Terror, that'd begun to change.

"What do they want?" I warily asked.

"She wouldn't tell me everything," Juniper replied. "Said she'd deal only with you. But I was given a taste, probably to bring you to the table. The Council of Matrons is offering to begin negotiations over the sale of goblin munitions to the Kingdom of Callow."

My fingers clenched. That was very, very dangerous talk. The Tribes were bound by treaty to sell those only to the Tower, and it wasn't the kind of clause that got a slap on the wrist when broken: it'd be called rebellion, if it got out. Even possession of goblin munitions was illegal in Praes. Highborn would have their entire direct family executed if they were caught with a stash.

"Fuck me," I said quietly. "They're preparing to rebel, aren't they?"

"Who the Hells ever knows, with goblins?" the orc grunted. "Does look like it, though. We both know it's been a long time coming."

"And they won't talk with anyone other than me?" I pressed.

"That's what the envoy told me," Juniper said.

Godsdamnit. I couldn't afford to head to Callow right now, no matter how sweet the prize.

"I'll give Thief full authority to negotiate in my name," I said. "If that's not enough, they'll have to wait."

The orc nodded.

"The second thing," she said. "It's the Warlock."

"He's in Callow?" I said, eyed widening.

"He was," Juniper replied. "Long gone by now. He left a message for Hierophant."

"And what would that be?" I flatly asked.

"To head to Thalassina immediately," the orc said. "There's a situation coming to head, and he wants his son there yesterday."

The string of curses I let out at that was foul enough even the Hellhound winced.

---

Max Scherer

I hope Malicia dies at the end of this story.... She is just worse as Akua. Akua at least knew she was an evil villain and did stuff herself, but MALicia just only seems to plan and scheme and dont really seem to do anything herself. If she at least would lose at some point, but now everything seems to work out for her... I seriously want Amadeus to put the Blade threw her heart just to see her betrayed face.

Misza Mojczysz Schmidt

She was so hyped up as manipulator, that no wonder that she got a big manipulative win. Otherwise it would feel as over-exaggeration.

Joan

Sad that Ratface was killed. But I have to say this is totally on Cat. She attempted to assassinate Malicia; even though she didn't seem to take it personally, she couldn't just let that go without a response.

SolaEclipse75

Ratface 😞

---

Chapter 49: Wrangle

"Forty-two: should a disagreement lead one of the party to leave, you should expect combat within the week as you will either be captured to be rescued by the departed or the opposite. Let it happen, as a common enemy will heal all internal disputes and you can share a good laugh over the corpse of your nemesis' dead lieutenant."

– Two Hundred Heroic Axioms, author unknown

We were pretending it was a spirited debate. It wasn't. These were the bitterest arguments I'd had with the Woe so far, and currently I wasn't winning either of them. Figured. War on two fronts was never a good idea, but it didn't look like I was going to have a choice about it.

"It's a trap, Masego," I said. "You know that as well as I do."

"My father would not harm me," the blind man replied evenly.

"I'm not saying he'll knife you," I said. "I'm saying that if you set foot in the Empire, there's no fucking way Malicia's letting you leave regardless of what Warlock says. Assuming he doesn't agree with her in the first place. He and I aren't exactly bosom friends, Zeze: we came a heartbeat away from drawing on each other last year."

"Were I still the Apprentice, your objection would have merit," Masego said. "That is no longer the case. Nothing short of my father's full wrath would stop me, and he will not go that far even for the Empress."

My fingers clenched. Then my flank got hit while I was still engaged.

"I'm not going," Vivienne flatly said. "You need me here, especially if you're going into the Everdark."

I shot her a glare.

"We'll continue that conversation in a moment," I told her.

"No," she said, shaking her head. "Because you're going to lose your argument with Hierophant, and when you do you'll dig your heels in about this. You hate to lose, Catherine. We settle this now, when you're still reasonable."

"There's nothing to argue about, Thief," I said with forced calm. "It has to be you."

"I am a spymistress," Vivienne replied. "Not a ruler. Send Adjutant instead, it is clearly the appropriate response."

"No," Hakram quietly said, looming tall at my back. "It can't be me. Vivienne, think about this for a moment. Whoever is sent back will need the highest authority possible to settle affairs without trouble. You know what that means."

The dark-haired woman frowned.

"That's irrelevant," she said. "Hakram, I admit without qualms that in matters of rule you are my superior. I will not achieve half as much as you given the same mandate."

"It's not irrelevant," I darkly said. "It's unpleasant to talk about and it's unfair, but it's true anyway: If I appoint an orc regent of Callow in my absence, there will be riots. Maybe even rebellions."

Indrani didn't want anything to do with this mess, thank the Gods, and I wasn't giving Diabolist this close a look into the inner workings of the Woe so I'd sent her to keep Archer entertained. This would have been much, much worse if there'd been an audience.

"Hakram is broadly known to be your second in command," Vivienne said. "And respected by many. His authority would be observed even without the regency. Your court has been butchered, Catherine, it needs to be rebuilt before the chaos spreads any further. That is not my wheelhouse, it's his."

"You know whoever I send needs the fucking title, Thief," I hissed. "Stop being obtuse. I've been away from the kingdom for months, the person taking charge needs the legitimacy behind them or it'll start coming apart at the seams."

"Then appoint him Governor-General," Vivienne said. "It carries enough power that-"

"That would make the highest authorities in matters both civil and military greenskins," Hakram broke in calmly. "We are not dealing with a blank slate or arithmetic empty of emotion. I may be an organizer of some skill, but that is immaterial. The amount of resistance I would face would be much larger than yours. Your argument is only correct if stripped of context."

"I can't handle all the balls you have up in the air, Catherine," Vivienne said, voice rising. "You need the entire kingdom's granaries reorganized, you need to get massive amounts of steel to arm all those soldiers the Hellhound is recruiting, you need someone to steady the treasury and rebuild the King's Council and – Gods, do I need to go on? I can't handle all of this, not while also running the Jacks. Hakram could. His entire Role is about taking care of loose ends."

The thing was, she had a point. I knew she'd been very careful not to use the reason she was being so aggressive about this, of course. She didn't want me around Diabolist without her keeping an eye on it. Not, I suspected, because she thought I would suddenly forgive Akua Sahelian for her sins. She knew me better than that. But she saw Diabolist as a weed, and thought it was her duty to burn out any attempt to grow roots. I forced myself to set that aside, and address what she'd actually been saying. Which, unfortunately, wasn't untrue. I trusted Vivienne to run the Jacks and to undertake some other discreet matters, but it was a fact I'd never dropped so much responsibility in her lap before. She'd had the education of a minor noble as a child, even though her family no longer formally held title, but that would only take her so far. What she did remember, she would be out of practice at. And we don't have forever, I thought.

Procer would be occupied with the Dead King for the foreseeable future, but there was no guarantee part of the crusader host would not try Callowan borders again if it saw weakness. The Dominion still had two armies on the field, and the League's intentions were opaque to me. My instinct had been that the Tyrant of Helike and his madman of a Hierarch would be taking a swing at the Principate, but that'd been while it was still the dominant force on the board. With Keter on the march, the League might be feeling adventurous enough to aim for other territories. And that was without even considering Malicia, who sure as Hells wouldn't let me bind the wounds of Callow in peace. If Warlock was in Thalassina and cooking up something dangerous enough he wanted Masego to lend a hand, then the Ashurans were about to get a very nasty surprise. That left me the only direct threat at the Wasteland's gated: the Empress wasn't going to stop after a few assassinations. She was only getting started. And the only person I trust to lead the Jacks in hampering her plans is Thief.

Vivienne was leagues above Hakram, when it came to shadow games. My second was skilled at sifting through what our informants brought us and digging out the nuggets most important, but he didn't quite have the knack when it came to actually using the Jacks for more than spying. I needed someone to start a knife fight, and Adjutant wasn't the man for the job. But Vivienne wasn't the woman for the rest of it, was she? She wasn't wrong about that. If I forced too many duties upon her, she'd only end up failing at what she was actually good at. Which left me only one way through the mess. I knew what I needed to do was poor tactics, but it still needed to be done.

"You're right," I admitted, and there was a glint of triumph in Vivienne's eyes. "Hakram will go with you. For the sake of appearances you'll still be named Regent."

And there went the glint.

"No," they said, more or less at the same time.

I cast a look at Masego, who seemed mildly irritated our own chat was left unfinished but unwilling to press the matter. He would be. Knowing him, he was probably mentally organizing his arguments without listening to a word of what went on between the rest of us.

"Catherine, you can't go into the Everdark with so weak an escort," Hakram gravelled. "This is madness. The drow are infamously violent and treacherous."

I kept my face blank. He'd never... There was a first time for everything, I told myself. It didn't matter. I had an argument to win and getting emotional about it wasn't going to help.

"I'll have Archer and Diabolist," I said. "It's enough. I'm not going to war with them, I'm going to secure an alliance."

"And who will handle the diplomacy, then?" Vivienne harshly said. "Indrani? You? Or will you allow the butcher of Liesse to speak in Callow's name?"

"Better we dispense with the drow entirely than risk you going into their realm with so light a force," the orc said. "They would be a useful addition, but they are not crucial and results are uncertain. Not worth the dangers."

"It was one thing to put all our coin on the Army of Callow when we had the leash on the Dead King, however laughably feeble that leash was," I replied. "It's another when Malicia's the one who let him out, on unknown terms. There will be battles, Hakram, and there's only so many Callowans of fighting fit. Only so many we can afford to lose. We need someone to share the casualties with, or it won't matter that we have good farmland: there won't be enough people left to till it. If you have another candidate for alliance, I'm all ears."

"You did not answer me," Vivienne said.

"Because what you said was pointless, Thief," I said. "I would prefer Diabolist to serve as an adviser, but if I need to let her do the talking then that's what going to happen. I know you don't like it. I don't either. But there's no point in letting her out of the box if we don't actually use her."

"There's a difference between using and trusting," Thief hissed.

"Enough," I said, voice rippling with power.

Not Speaking, no, I was not that far gone. I hoped I would never be. Vivienne flinched, and Hakram looked chastened for reasons beyond the obvious. He usually brought his objections to me in private, and I thought he might already be regretting this. He should have known it would sting he'd side openly with Thief in an argument, even if he disagreed with me.

"Callow was just crippled," I said. "You can both argue all you want, that is a godsdamned fact. And we all know the Empress is far from done. Now, the two of you can disagree with me heading into the Everdark with only Archer and a mass-murdering spectre for company, but at the end of the day I have to be the one to go and someone needs to fix the mess back home. Vivienne, you argued you couldn't do it alone. You're right. Hakram goes too."

"He could-" Thief began, but I raised my hand.

"No, he can't," I said. "I've heard your issues with this plan. I have answered them and made a decision. Unless you have something new to add, the only question left is whether or not you'll obey when I make this an order."

Hakram stirred uneasily.

"You're the one who gave me the speech about needing to assert authority," I told him. "I just have. I won't deny the risks. But you can't deny that Callow needs the two of you to get back on its feet, either."

The orc licked his chops.

"The drow are a gambit," he said. "Promise me you will treat them as one. Do not carry your anger over the failure in Keter into this, Catherine. We can survive without them. If the situation spins out of control..."

"Hakram," Vivienne cried out, sounding betrayed. "You know she won't listen if it's just me. Gods Above, stick the damned course."

"There is no perfect solution," the orc said, turning to her. "We take the risks we have to. It's not the choice I would have made, but I'm not the one making the choices. Neither are you."

"I won't bet it all on a long shot," I told Adjutant. "There's a limit to how long I'm willing to stay there as well. But I believe it's worth trying."

He nodded, though his discomfort was still plain on his face. I turned to Vivienne, who was worrying her lip.

"I could refuse to go, even if you make it an order," she said.

She could. The Woe were not sworn to me, save for Hakram, and his oath was not one between queen and subject. It was a deeply personal thing, and not one I would sully by equating with simple obedience. There were few things I still considered sacred, but what the two of us had said on that hill beneath moonlight was one of them. No, for all that I was Queen of Callow I would not call Thief my subject. She was, like most the Woe, my companion. When she deferred to me, it was out of trust and respect. Not because a sister from the House of Light had put a chunk of metal on my head and spoken a few dusty words. Forcing her hand here would shatter the fragile trust the two of us had built since we'd made our pact in Laure. I would have to convince her.

"You're making this about me," I said. "That is beneath us both."

"This is about your decision," Vivienne replied, frowning. "Not your character."

"My decision shouldn't matter to you," I told her. "The question you should be asking is this: is it better for Callow if I accompany Catherine or if I return?"

Her eyes narrowed.

"You are the queen of said kingdom, in case you forgot," she said.

"I'm a warlord who got oil smeared on her forehead," I replied bluntly. "I'm useful to the kingdom, it's true. There would be consequences if I died. If I'm not exactly easy to kill these days, Vivienne. And while it's possible my heading into the Everdark without you will end up biting our home in the ass, it's a certainty that if you don't return some of our people will bleed for it. Hakram will have too many duties on his plate, as you pointed out. He won't be able to use the Jacks like you would."

"You can't leverage Callow against me, Catherine," Vivienne said, sounding resentful.

"You didn't join up because you liked the look of me," I said quietly. "There was a reason, and you were quite blunt about it. I'm not using a damned thing, Viv. I'm reminding you what we're actually about. It's easy to forget, in the thick of it. I know that well."

The expression on her face was an ugly one, but she did not contradict me. She spat to the side, after a moment.

"Fine," she said. "Damn you, but fine. I'll go. Don't make me regret it."

I let out a relieved breath. If that hadn't worked, I wouldn't have had anything else to trot out. Tired in a way that was nothing physical, I turned my eyes to Masego.

"You two can leave us," I said without turning.

"Catherine," Hakram tried.

"It's been a while," I mildly said, "since I've had to repeat myself so often."

His fangs clicked together, but he didn't say anything more. Hierophant had been sitting silent this whole time, growing increasingly impatient.

"Quite finished?" he said.

"Yes," I replied without a hint of apology.

I gathered myself together for another verbal brawl.

"I spent most of your squabbling mustering arguments," Masego admitted frankly. "I have several, some grounded in fact others in my personal opinion. It took me some time before I realized it was unnecessary to do so. I do not need your permission to go."

"You need my gate, if you want to get there before the year's over," I replied.

"If necessary I will summon and bind a fae of sufficient rank to serve as a gate-maker," he said without hesitation. "Though I would be disappointed by the pettiness of your choice."

I grimaced. He'd be right to be. It was easy to simply think of the Woe as my companions, my closest friends, and leave it at that. The truth was a little more complex. The ties binding them to me were different for all, and though that'd never brought conflict until now I could admit that'd been mostly luck on my part. It'd been going to happen sooner or later. Masego and Indrani were not invested in my fight the way the other two were. For the latter it was an entertaining enough diversion, and she liked me enough to carouse away the 'boring' parts, but for all that Archer was arguably the least tightly bound to me she also had few other calls on her time. She wanted to travel, one day, but she was in no hurry. Masego had first joined the Fifteenth because he believed it would allow him to witness sights nothing else would, and in this we had delivered. He truly liked us, I was sure of that. Even Vivienne, who'd come late to the band. But his first and paramount love would always be sorcery. After that came family, and though some days I suspected we were half-that in his eyes his fathers had been entrenched in that position for much longer.

If Warlock sent for him, as the man had, Masego would go. Because even after that sting of that betrayal revealed by the echoes of the fall of Keter, he loved the man deeply. I'd almost considered not passing along the message, truth be told. He might not have heard it when I spoke with Juniper, as he'd not been so close. But that would be a betrayal, what was left of my principles had whispered. But he would learn eventually, and it would cost you, a colder part of me had noted.

"I won't withhold a gate no matter your choice," I sighed. "I didn't mean that, and I apologize for implying it."

"Apology accepted," he said, nodding politely. "Though the choice has already been made. This a formality I will entertain until you have made your peace with that."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"For future reference," I said. "When you're humouring people to avoid hurting their feelings, it's best to avoid telling them that."

The dark-skinned man frowned.

"That's rather backwards," he noted. "Would their feelings not be more likely to be hurt if they believed at the start they had a real chance of success?"

"That's – you know what, we can finish that conversation at another time," I sighed. "Masego, I know you have reasons to want to go."

"I do not care in the slightest for the fate of Thalassina," Hierophant said. "Some ritual components of use come from the city, but none irreplaceable. It is my understanding that the Ashurans are your enemy as well, however, so out of politeness I will kill as many as I can before taking my leave."

"And that's appreciated, believe me," I said. "But I need you with me, not on the other side of the continent. If half of what I've heard about the drow is true, your presence would make talks go a lot more smoothly."

Having a mage capable of flattening a mountain in attendance tended to make people a great deal more civil.

"You are quite skilled at terrifying people into obedience," Masego said, and he sounded like he believed it was a compliment. "My presence seems like it would be helpful, but necessary is overstating the case."

"The grand total of what I know about the drow is four pages from Surley's first volume of Realms of Calernia," I told him. "I'd be going in blind, without you."

"There is little I have read on the subject that Diabolist has not," he said. "And much of the reverse that is true."

This wasn't going to work. I needed a different angle.

"You won't be safe in Praes," I said. "I'm essentially at war with the Empress and you're my most dangerous sorcerous asset."

"Malicia cannot lay a hand on me without incurring my father's enmity," Masego said. "Which I do not believe she wishes to happen, as he would kill her brutally."

"She could still--"

"Catherine," Masego said gently. "I know you would prefer I remain at your side. I am not displeased by this. Yet there is nothing down your current path that matters more to me than getting answers from my fathers. We are not debating. I am awaiting your final silence."

And there it was. I wondered if this should feel like a betrayal, because it didn't. Hakram siding with Vivienne had, and it was still a pebble in my metaphorical boot to remember it, but this... It would be like getting angry at a fish for swimming. Masego would always do what he wanted. It was the way he'd been raised: essentially untouchable in a nest of scheming and murder, people bending over backwards to curry his favour or accommodate him. In a way, he was no less highborn than Diabolist. He'd had all the privileges of the old blood with none of the duties, and still the heart of him was pure Wasteland. His desires would always come first, and it was unthinkable to him that they would not. I passed a tired hand through my hair.

---

Antoninjohn

It's a trap! Mango

Metalshop

Well this is an interesting change in the group's emotional character, especially hot off the heels of the Woe's display of unity and strength over the course of the Amneisia Plan.

Also the trio of Akua, Cat, and Indrani is amazing to think about the dynamics of. I don't think we've seen Indrani interact with Akua much.

OutspanFoster

I predict a threesome

Jane

...Well, uh, I suppose both of them have expressed interest in Cat in the past, but...

mavant

It would help with the "Archer has no strong ties to the woe" issue if she were at least getting laid, I suppose.

onedollargum

Conversely, I think it more likely that Archer would lose interest in the chase, once having tagged her quarry. Not much narrative tension left on that string, once the sexual tension has been loosened.

ishner

It would mirror the dalliance between black and ranger. There is narrative weight there.

Cheerless Mirth

The narrative weight of ranger and black knight was the once the black knight finished the conquest, ranger fucked off to her personal abode and frolicking gaggle of named.

Jane

If memory serves, when last we saw them interact, Archer proposed using her as target practice. Not because she was irritated, but just because it seemed like fun.

...I don't think they work on terribly similar wavelengths, and I get the feeling that a full book featuring the two of them forced to work together would end with one of them killing the other out of frustration, followed quickly by the other when they suffered the consequences of whatever was forcing them to work together.

As it stands... I expect a lot of awkwardness, where Cat's the only one really speaking to either of them – complicated by the fact that Cat's much more in the mood to brood, rather than deal with Indrani's Indrani-ness, or Akua's constant scheming. But I may be off my mark.

Someguy

Masego is actually right about this. Just get it over with and pick up temporary companions on the way to the Drow.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Yup compared to the Calmities our party so far has zero experience in solo, whereas Black only gather the companions when there is need of them.

Stormblessed

This chapter feels like it ended a little abruptly. Like in the middle of a scene or something. I'm not expecting another half to show up, but it really does feel there should've been at least Catherine saying some variation of "I'll open you the gate."

Agent J

A lack of closure sometimes illicit the best emotional responses. Besides,

"I am awaiting your final silence."

After a line like that, there's nothing of real value that can be said. Personally, I'd have preferred if she walked away after tiredly brushing her hair, but eh, first point still stands.

Cir_C

I'm glad that there was some personal conflict within Cat's merry band of murderers. Let's see how she does with the Woe fractured in a fairly well realized manner.

Jane

Huh, it's been a long, long time since Cat is going into significant danger (by mortal standards, not Cat standards) without either the Woe or an army at her back. I mean, she does technically have Archer, but that's like having a really sharp sword at your side, compared to the tricks that Hierophant or Thief can offer. Diabolist as well, but that's like having a cursed tome at your hands.

Speaking of Akua, you just know she's already plotting how to make use of being Cat's only confidant for the duration of her trip. No idea as to whether she'll get actually some "roots" in, to reference the chapter, but she's certainly going to try. Well, honestly, I suspect she already has more of an "in" than either Cat or Vivienne realize, though it's still pretty shallow. Though... Her plans might actually benefit more from being with the full Woe than alone with Cat; she already has plenty of alone time with Cat by virtue of being in her cloak, while few of the Woe would be willing to talk to her without cause. Meanwhile, if she suddenly comes back BFFs with Cat, the others are definitely going to talk Cat out of it – if Akua doesn't improve her bonds with the party as a whole at roughly the same pace, it's going to cause deeper tensions than it's worth.

Speaking of Vivienne, she really has had a rough week, hasn't she.

Death Knight

Dissidence in the ranks, the wretched Woe...

1queenofblades1

Well that ended quickly. Was there a mistake in posting the chapter?

nimelennar

I'm sure splitting the party will end well. It usually does.

Alivaril

Well, it doesn't ALWAYS end poorly. There are sometimes story arcs where characters handle themselves just fine. Usually to illustrate that, while they're most dangerous as part of a team, they still shouldn't be underestimated while solo. That being said, the chosen chapter quote makes that rather more unlikely.

(Also, joining the people saying the end of the chapter felt abrupt.)

happyhavak

Heroes survive splitting the ranks. Villains get picked off one by one.

Someguy

For a Dungeon Crawl sure, but this is a kingdom-building campaign like Pathfinder: Kingmaker so it's a matter of Personnel Assignment.

mavant

Nah, it's a Shonen manga. Splitting up for a few months is just what they need to level up!

BroadAxe

Don't you know? You never split the party!
Clerics in the back to keep those fighters hale and hearty,
The wizard in the middle, where he can shed some light,
And you never let that damn thief out of sight

ArkhCthuul

Woefully lacking in unity and support :p

Cicero

Seemed to end rather abruptly. I sort of expect Cat to accede and then ask Masego to deliver a message to Black via Warlock that if he needs a gate all he needs to do is ask.

DroughtBringer

I'm late! Sorry!
Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

maresther23

We are only 500 votes behind of Ward... in the annual rank!

lqueenofblades1

So...Masego gets captured and the Woe rescue him? Or Catherine gets captured and the Woe rescue her? Hmm...

grzecho2222

Time for "Protagonist gets captured and forced to fight in gladiatorial games"

Tohron

... which Catherine eventually reveals to have been part of the plan all along in order to get within striking distance of the Night Priestess.

grzecho2222

Drow probably handle succession that way
Also I'm still waiting for the moment when two fighting villain pull out "Ha ha it was first part of my plan at the same moment", because what even is the result of this

IDKWhoitis

The damned Demon of Absence ate the rest of the chapter.

DroughtBringer

Shorter chapter, yes, but does provide some interesting information.

The Woe have lose threads forming, that are pulling them around, and tying them up, and getting them annoyed with each other. If Akua catches wind of this, which she will, she may be able to Alienate Cat from Thief, and move her closer to the tower.

Silverking

Cat, you keep viewing your party splitting up as a bad thing. Don't you know anything about anime timeskips? When your party has had a rough time with their latest opponents, and then everyone goes in a different direction for a while, they all come back with their next power upgrades! Masego gets sorcery training from Daddy Warlock, Thief works with the Jacks to get the combat training she so desperately needs, Hakram's Adjutant Name evolves to Captain (or possibly the Callow equivalent of Chancellor).

Oh, just had a thought: Catherine's biggest limiter in regards to Winter has not been drawing on enough power, but keeping her mind to going Stupid Evil. This is because this leaves her open against the machinations of Good and Practical Evil (like Malicia and the Dead King)...but what if "Classic Evil" with the power to back it up is exactly how to get the drow to like her?

Javvies

If there's a Callowan equivalent to Chancellor, it's probably something along the lines of Castellan or Steward. At least, for the nominal administrative role/aspects involved; Chancellors often promoted themselves to Dread Emperor/Empress over the corpse of their predecessor, which probably doesn't have an equivalent Name role in Callow. That said, I'm not convinced that there is a Callowan equivalent. Remember, the Callowan crown only came with a Name about half the time, per EE. Sure, some probably got their Names before wearing the crown, and would've had it while being Crown Prince(ss), but ...

Allafterme

I'd like to speculate about the Drow but all we now is they experienced societal collapse somewhere in past & they are backwards to boot...

MetruX

Just a problem: Hakram's Name is not transitional. He is the Adjutant, and this won't change as long as Cat is alive and kicking. Also, Thief should train with him, not the Jack's, because the whole of the Jack's wouldn't stop a single other member of the woe, and she would be fighting people capable of giving them pause 😊

Someguy

I have this image in my head of Masego meeting Warlock and just transmitting a memory packet into his head the Essay "What I learned on my Field Trip to Keter".

Snowfire1224

That's the second time Cat has had to pressure Thief into something, the first being the consideration of the Dead King as an ally. I get the feeling that having to pressure her more than once is going to come back to bite her at some point.

Javvies

Splitting the party for doing things is a classic mistake. On the other hand ... it's not like they've got a decent alternative. Masego going to talk/yell at his fathers is inevitable. Somebody has to pick up the pieces in Callow, and realistically, unless they're aborting the attempt to deal with the Drow altogether and Cat goes to Callow, the best way to do that is the dual team of Hakram and Thief.

That said ... really not sure that the Drow are worth it.

Still not sure why Cat hasn't notified Black that Malicia made a deal to let the Dead King loose. Even if she doesn't want to step on his toes, or base a plan on him and the Legions with him ... giving Black a heads up is the least she can do – she warned Hasenbach, after all. Though warning Hasenbach will probably end up diverting at least some attention from Black.

Wonder where, and how far, Warlock is going to go. And who he'll ultimately side with.

Wait, what happened to the Wild Hunt? Did they just wander off after leaving the city of Keter?
Or did Cat send them somewhere?

mavant

I'm guessing Larat is with Black.

Euodiachloris

That's a reality-warping degree of cynicism for one location to fail at supporting... o.o I really doubt it: Creation still appears to be more or less in one piece. 😊

Ezreon

They are in Arcadia probably, wasting time. She can't scry him over all the distance, mountains and such. Hasenbach has her artefact to establish connection, Black does not

Javvies

Except Black is somewhere in Procer – he just finished dancing everything that mattered in Cantal, and is heading to do the same to Iserre.

Cat and company are, at the moment, on the same side of the mountains as Black, with nothing in the way but distance. And technically the curvature of the planet. They're on the shore of the lake between the Kingdom of the Dead and the Everdark. Depending on positioning, there could well be mountains in the way of scrying the Observatory in Callow.

—

On the other hand, it has just occurred to me that Cat could intentionally (consciously or subconsciously) be leaving Black in the dark/ not contacting him so as to avoid putting him in a position where he'd be forced to choose sides between Cat and Malicia.

mavant

I agree with the above commenters that the ending of this chapter needed, like, one more sentence. It could just be

"Okay."

Or

Final silence it was.

delspai

Don't you know you never split the party? Clerics in the back to keep the fighters hale and hardy? You keep the Warlock in the middle to shed a little light, and you never let that damn Thief out of sight!

ArkCthuul

Love the callback. Kudos.

Whale

I actually like it incredibly that the characters are fleshed out so well that this split, despite not being the best decision for them as a group, felt inevitable.

It really creates a feeling the characters are the one making the story and the author is just here for the ride.

Plus, as someone already said, they need time alone for future character developments and it tends to be put aside when they're with Catherine as she overshadows them with her personality and the scope of her struggles both in their world and in reader's eyes.

Iconochasm

Exactly. There is a price to being the plot-driver in an adventuring party, and that price is that when someone gets snagged by a personal plotline hook, you have to let it happen. Ideally, actively support it.

RanVor

I doubt Masego is in any kind of danger while in Thalassina. Wekesa would never hurt his son, nor would he allow anyone to do so.

Keeping him away and occupied while the Empress deals with Cat, on the other hand...

TeK

Didn't expect to see such hypocrisy in Cat, both in her actions and her thoughts. I'm profoundly dissatisfied. Calling Masego selfish while forcing him to choose between his friends and family just cause he's useful? Feeling betrayed that Hakram had an opinion?

TeK

Twisting Vivienne into accepting something, again, cause she is tired of arguing, and not even trying to mend the fences after that? Fuck, treating friends like tools and subordinates? And she calls Masego selfish?

Also there's stuff from previous chapter with putting grief and anger in the box and whatnot. Cat has made some character growth, but I doubt it's in the good direction. Also, really unexpected, to be fair. Or maybe I'm just thick, but such conflict (as it implied) needs to be properly foreshadowed, otherwise it feels kinda empty. Like forced drama.

Hellspirit

the Author seems to have a tendency to build everything up at the start of their book and then once Catherine is on top; start pulling out the rugs, making the next situation one step worse than the previous one, only to have Cathrine (her side at least) turn all (everything) around at the end in a power trip.

Considering these, it seems we're pretty close of not at "Rock Bottom" for Cat.

Gunslinger

Opening quote is quite a bit of foreshadowing though one has to consider if hero axioms would apply to the Woe.

Wohoo now we get to see the Drow, always up for more sightseeing though I'm not sure how they fit into the overall picture. I suspect Cat will fail there again before having to rely on Black or something.

grzecho2222

All of them are heroes in their own ways,
"Born under cursed stars...You most of all, Catherine Foundling.
The five of you would be woe unto all you behold"
Orphan trying to save her people
Wizard trying to save the reality
Thief trying to steal back what was taken Warrior trying to make things right
Former slave trying to be the most free that she can be

Amoonymous

I mean, it's been a mildly large plot point acknowledged in the story itself that Catherine in particular (and by extension the Woe as a whole) are villains playing heroic roles.

I'm pretty sure we've already seen traditionally heroic tropes used in the Woe's favor, so to me the opening quote is such blatant foreshadowing that it's like being hit by a brick (not that that's a bad thing). My thoughts are the "captured" will be Masego since he's going both solo and in enemy territory; whether the captor will be his father or Malicia to use against his father who knows. It is worth noting Warlock could be considered Malicia's lieutenant in context of the preface quote.

It could also just be a setup to subvert that foreshadowing though, but it feels like that'll be less likely.

grzecho2222

The lieutenants that I think are left are: Iron Prince to Cordelia, Lady Ime to Malicia, this one general to Kairos, Hakram to Cat and Champion to White Knight

RanVor

And Grem One-eye to Black. Gotta remember this one.

grzecho2222

Come to think about it only Hierarch doesn't have lieutenant

Mike E.

""Catherine," Masego said gently. "I know you would prefer I remain at your side. I am not displeased by this. Yet there is nothing down your current path that matters more to me than getting answers from my fathers. We are not debating. I am awaiting your final silence.""

Gods I love Zeze.

Letouriste

That's probably the most interesting way to go with that. Congratz EE, you found it. The impossible trio deep in the dark forest, the duo not completely trusting each other but complementing each other really well and fitting the problem at hand and finally masego stop being there for safety and easy jokes=> forcing you to explore Archer character more and helping the development of cat-akua strange relationship. I just realized this book really developed Thief and Archer as main characters, they were always in the background before. Same for akua somehow. On another note, I start to hope cat will someday visit some hell and find people she know there;)

Azure

I'm with Vivienne here and don't want to see anymore Akua being let off the leash. She's just too good at manipulation and Catherine is just too dumb for her. Splitting the party was necessary here, and yes Catherine had no choice, but she needs to acknowledge that she needs more safeguards against Akua. She needs to put her back in the box and never let her out again, unless either Hakram or Vivienne are around. Catherine cannot handle Akua and will let that leash slip inch by inch. That's the irritating thing about Catherine at the moment. She isn't acknowledging the fact that she isn't capable of handling Akua alone and is instead putting her head into the tiger's mouth.

RanVor

You know, Cat didn't get where she is now by playing safe. If she put avoiding risks over getting the job done, she would never achieve anything. There are currently too many messes needing to be taken care of immediately and only so many people to take care of them. This was bound to happen sooner or later. Sure, depending on Akua is dangerous, but in this situation, not depending on her is a game over. This may not be the smart solution, but it's the only solution.

superkeaton

Don't you know, you never split the party

Isaac Martinez

Do you remember when Cat let free William and went against her Squire Name?

Could it happen to the Adjutant?

Snowfire1224

Theoretically, although I would think for him name damage would occur in a situation where he actively disobeys Cathrine.

Someguy

"And so Subira of the Sahelians slew Maleficent and said: 'Emperor am I now, Sinister of name and deed. Let this be the truth of our empire, that iron ever sharpens iron 'til the last cut is made.'"

—Extract from the Scroll of Thrones, second of the Secret Histories of Praes Someone make Black a sword named "Last Cut".

grzecho2222

Dual blades called Long Prices for Cat?

Euodiachloris

A dagger called "Slights" and a bastard sword called "Prices"...

unLuckerII

EE could you update character list? Possibly put update char. list into spoiler button?

Maginot

I think I have made an error of confusion.

Is Masego going to the Thalassocracy of Ashur (the country/island to the south) or to Thalassinia (the city in Praes)? With the Augurs prophecy of woe to the south, I thought it the country. Masego's reference to killing Ashurans on the way out strengthened that idea. So too did the comment about Warlock cooking up something the Ashurans would regret.

But the concerns about Malicia and no one to protect Masego seem to indicate the City.

Attacking the Country had seemed brilliant. It had seemed like the coming of a great pincer movement. The Helike Tyrant about to attack Ashur while the fleets were far away. And the Woe/Warlock creating their own mischief.

Unless the Ashuran fleets have continued bombardments and move closer in, even to the city, then I cannot decide which is which.

Olisch

Those axioms were written by the bard, weren't they?

---

Chapter 50: Partings

"There is no poison more potent than hatred made silent."

– Arlesite saying

I twisted my boot sharply, feeling fingers breaking under the steel. The fae cried out in pain, though I was less than impressed by how whiny she was being: I got broken fingers all the time, I could tell when someone was being overly dramatic about it.

"So Larat tells me you go by Lughlyn, these days," I conversationally said. "And that you were the Lady of Bright Meadows once. That's Summer, isn't it?"

The thing that was once the Prince of Nightfall was looking at us with a lazy smile, sitting on an overturned stone. The rest of the Wild Hunt was watching us with varying degrees of interest, and more than a few vicious smirks. Just because hey rode together didn't mean they were particularly affectionate.

"It was indeed of Summer, Sovereign," one of the fae called out. "As proud a knight of the Court as there ever was."

Good, they were getting involved. Public torture and humiliation had a way of drawing them in, admittedly, even when it was one of theirs doing the screaming. I'd had more than taking a firm stance with a discipline case in mind when I'd begun this, so their attention was more than welcome. I dug my heel into her palm and there was another sickening snap followed by a hoarse scream.

"So, would anyone care to tell me why Lughlyn is currently on the ground?" I said, opening the proceedings to the gallery.

I glanced at the dark-skinned fae wriggling on the stony shore. She'd come to my attention more than once, of late. First by picking a fight with Vivienne when she'd been on corpse-scavenging duty, and more recently when she'd decided to open her mouth after being given orders.

"She protested her sworn duties," another fae called out.

"That's right," I said, smiling thinly.

"I would never," Lughlyn gasped. "Sovereign, I was merely--"

"Are we now goatherds, to ferry your mortal cattle?" Larat quoted softly. "Ah, Lughlyn. So much pride, so little sense. It was always a guilty pleasure to flay that off of you one layer at a time."

The one-eyed prince of the fae might be first among equals of the Hunt, but he was no caring warden of their welfare. He delighted in pouring oil over the flames whenever he could, and today he'd been handed an opportunity to indulge his darker leanings.

"Now, our good friend is beneath my boot because she happened to be loudest hen in the henhouse," I casually continued. "So she's going to have a bad day, because of that. But we're long overdue another conversation, aren't we?"

Larat laughed, bright and merry and utterly unrepentant.

"Stand tall, Riders of the Hunt," he called out. "We must now be called to account for our many sins. Our queen is a demanding one."

"My fashionably treacherous lieutenant has it right," I said, grinding down on Lughlyn's hand for punctuation. "Any of you remember the Battle of the Camps?"

"We fought under your banner that day, and slew many," one of the fae said.

"So you did," I mused. "When I woke up. Until then you just... watched. As those in my service died."

Keeping the Hunt in line required a very careful mixture of violence and patience, with a sprinkle of unpredictability added to the brew at the last moment. I'd been lax in making them drink it, after the campaign up north began, and my men had ended up paying for that during the parts of the battle where I was dreaming of death. I'd added a little more violence than usual to make it more bitter a draught this time, as they very much deserved it.

"We were given no orders by your Hellhound," one of the fae said.

Ah, finally one whose name I knew.

"Because the lot of you remained out of sight, Seldred," I said. "Now, would any of you care to guess if I'm pleased by that?"

Heel. Lughlyn screamed.

"You would have us shepherd mortals," another fae said, her voice lilting with distaste.

"From now on, in my absence, you will answer to others," I said smilingly. "Thief, first, and if she is not there it will be to Marshal Juniper."

"No oaths bind us to mortal writ," Seldred said, fingers stroking his beard.

I took my boot off the dark-skinned fae's hand.

"Lughlyn, would you care to earn a modicum of mercy?" I said.

"By your will, Sovereign," she croaked out.

"Kill Seldred," I ordered.

The other fae's eyes widened. A heartbeat later and they were already going at each other like rabid hounds. Lughlyn was wounded, but she was also desperate and Seldred had been taken aback by the sudden turn. It evened out. Silver blades sounded against each other in furious fighting, until one of them slumped headless to the ground. Lughlyn stood panting and bloodied, a long wound scarring her torso where the other fae's blade had gone through her mail. I strode up to her, feeling the eyes of every fae on me, and laid a hand on the laceration. Winter flowed through my veins and poured into her, the blood freezing with a snap and the wound slowly closing as my will was ordering to.

"Now, I don't consider this a case of me disciplining you," I told the Hunt. "The dead are dead, and you're useful enough I won't take your heads on a whim. This is a warning, my lovelies. About the dangers of toeing the line with me."

I patted Lughlyn's belly gently.

"You can be on my good side," I said, then jutted a thumb at Seldred's corpse. "Or you can join him. There is no middle ground, and I have no use for defective instruments."

"So spoke the Queen of the Hunt," Larat said, voice carrying without ever rising. "So we shall remember."

I inclined my head towards the one-eyed fae as the others echoes him softly.

"You have your orders," I told Larat.

"They will be obeyed," he promised with a sharp grin, "most carefully."

I cast a last look at the Hunt. A simple public execution would not have cowed them, not in the same way this had. Death they were no stranger to. But being made a spectacle of, so casually? Oh, that would cut pride as well as flesh and those kind of wounds were much more dangerous to fae. They were creatures that feared humiliation more than pain, in many ways.

"Don't look so pleased, One-Eye," I said. "I'm holding you responsible for whatever they get up to, when I'm not there to take a look."

If anything, that broadened his smile.

"You are taking delightfully well to cruelty, my queen," he said. "This lark has been even more entertaining than anticipated."

Well, that was the Larat for you: never more disconcerting than when he doled out praise. I kept my face calm.

"Open the gate," I said. "I have farewells to make."

He rose and bowed with feline grace. It was a short stroll from the beach to the Woe's camp, and I noted with approval that while I'd been sorting out the Hunt the three leaving had finished packing up all their affairs. Indrani was poking at the fire with a piece of driftwood, and shot me a wounded look when I joined them.

"Did you just have a fairy pit fight without me, Cat?" she said. "Because that would be extremely inconsiderate, and I expected better from you."

"I was just making a point," I dismissed, then threw her a bone. "I promise if I ever arrange some kind of sordid Arcadian death tournament you'll get an invitation."

The brown-skinned woman looked thoughtful.

"Maybe next year?" she mused. "I mean, they'll start being more trouble than use at some point and if you have to get rid of them..."

"I'm going to pretend I didn't hear that," I muttered.

The others looked on in amusement, at least most of them. Much as I hated seeing them leave, there was no point in delaying any longer. I reached Hakram first, the tall orc towering over me in his burnt plate.

"Cat," he gravelled. "About yesterday-"

I shook my head.

"Water under the bridge," I said. "I already felt under siege, so I took deeper offence than I should have."

"No," Hakram said, shaking his head. "You were right to be displeased. We debate in private, when we differ. One front."

I clasped his forearm, in the legionary's salute, and after a moment he did the same.

"I won't part with you on bad terms," I told him gently. "Bad enough I won't see you for months. It'd done and buried, let's leave it at that."

He let out a sigh that sounded closer to a kettle's whistle.

"Done and buried," he echoed.

I squeezed his arm.

"I'm leaving you with the roughest work again," I said. "I'm sorry, Hakram. It always seems to end up that way."

He offered a flash of ivory fangs in response.

"At least this way I won't have to decipher that war crime you call cursive before passing instructions along," he teased. "Silver lining, Cat."

I chuckled, already missing him before he'd even left my sight.

"Don't slack on your training," I said. "You won't have Indrani and I to keep you sharp anymore."

"My bones are deeply grateful for it," he snorted, and pulled me into a hug.

My chin still didn't reach his shoulder, but I'd learned where to place my head over the years. The embrace loosened after too short a while. From the corner of my eye I caught Indrani tugging at Masego's robes and messing up his braids, fingers looking for every excuse to linger. Hakram's gaze joined mine, and he let out a thoughtful rumble.

"I didn't think that would last," I admitted quietly.

"She gets bored easily," the orc agreed. "But she was stubborn even before she started rubbing elbows with Callowans."

"Have you..." I said, trailing off.

Talked with either of them about it, I left unspoken.

"Last time I tried she defenestrated me and called it awareness training," he muttered. "That one's all yours, Cat."

Well, it'd been a while since I'd last strolled across a field full of buried munitions. I was due another fool's errand.

"Fair travels, Hakram of the Howling Wolves," I said.

"May victory slight your foes, Catherine Foundling," he replied softly.

We broke away, and Vivienne filled the gap within moments. Her face was hard to read, but her heartbeat was steady. If she was angry still, it was an anger mastered.

"Vivienne," I said, hesitant. "I know you're not happy about this."

For a long moment, she stayed silent.

"I know the end of that story," she finally said, discretely glancing at Akua. "You gave an oath. I worry of the journey there, but I'll make my peace with the path knowing the destination is certain."

"It's going to get better, you know," I said. "Sooner or later we'll reach daylight."

She smiled ruefully.

"Will we?" she said. "It doesn't matter. I can be angry with Catherine Foundling but see the sense in what the Queen of Callow has said. They are different people, in the end."

"I don't want to split with things unspoken," I insisted. "Leaving to fester-"

"Enough, Catherine," the dark-haired woman said. "You got your way. I've spoken my piece, and you heard what I did not speak. Keep it in mind, before threading fingers with the Folly's own architect. Necessity is a fickle mistress, and we've learned the dangers of swift gains that sow far losses."

I bit down on my answer. This was as good as it was going to get, and opening the wound again would only make it worse. It left a bitter taste in the mouth, but what part of ruling didn't?

"Be careful," I told her instead. "And be wary."

"I always am," Vivienne Dartwick smiled. "Try not to slip up in the Everdark, would you? Fighting fire with fire tends to end up burn everything down."

"You know me," I lightly said. "A diplomat without peer, I am."

"Well phrased," she noted, amusement bleeding through. "Until next time, Cat."

I nodded back. Indrani had finally let Masego go free, so I caught him by the arm as Thief and Archer fell into the ritual of insults and petty slights that was their way of saying goodbye.

"Zeze," I said.

"Catherine," he said, sounding bemused. "Please don't touch the braids."

My fingers twitched. It was an almost physical need to screw with them now that he'd told me not to.

"As a sign of my deep and abiding love for you," I said. "This once I won't."

"What a merciful queen you are," he drily said.

"That's what they say," I agreed without missing a beat. "I know I've already told you, but don't forget--"

"Trust no one in Praes," Masego said patiently. "Not even Father. We've had this conversation before."

"I guess we have," I sighed.

Asking him to stay one last time would change nothing and sour the farewell, so I forced down the urge.

"Be careful not to provoke anyone you are not capable of killing," he instructed me gently. "And if you can get your hands on any arcane tomes..."

"I'll see what I can do," I smiled.

"Good," he said, visibly pleased.

He sobered a heartbeat later.

"Take care of Indrani," he said. "I believe she might be upset."

She knows you're heading into the tiger's den, I thought. And without any guarantees, this time, or one of us to watch your back.

"I will," I said, searching his face for any sign that he might suspect...

Well, I wasn't sure what exactly. I wouldn't know until I got her drunk enough to talk. But it was a sharper with a lit fuse, and the lack of awareness I got from him was probably the only thing that'd kept it from blowing so far.

"I'll leave messages with the Observatory as soon as feasible," he promised. "Stay alive, Catherine. I would be cross if you failed in this."

"Well, you've always been a soft touch," I smiled.

When I pulled him close he stayed stiff for only a moment before gingerly putting his hands on my shoulders. Gods, he was so horribly awkward at times. That thought should not be as fond as it was. We withdrew and I left him to pick up his bags, joining the other two where they awaited. All three of them headed towards the Hunt, already mounted, and I met Larat's eyes before he opened the gate. He inclined his head. We had an understanding, he and I, about the kind of ugly things I would do if any of them were hurt on his watch. Indrani sidled up to me and we watched them pass into Arcadia, standing there in silence until the gate closed and the last wisp of power was gone.

"So," Archer said. "What now?"

"We set out tomorrow," I said. "Tonight, though? I distinctly remember you saying something about a drink called Atalantian baptismal you stole a bottle of."

Indrani grinned.

"Now there's exemplary leadership at work," she said.

Duty could wait until tomorrow, for once.

—

I dropped the bowl in the pile of dishes we'd have to wash in the lake later, having scraped off the last of the stew. I tossed the spoon after it.

"I didn't think you'd be this good a cook," I admitted.

Indrani snorted, sprawled against a stone she'd covered with blankets.

"You're such a city girl," she said. "You think I had people to cook for me, back in Refuge? Ranger passed along camp recipes, but she wasn't the one who tended the pots. There was a pecking order."

"I was under the impression it had grown into a respectable settlement," Akua said, sounding mildly surprised.

She was on the other side of the fire, scarlet eyes luminous in the darkness. Diabolist hadn't touched the stew herself: she was capable of touch, nowadays, but she required nothing to eat. Neither did I, but on occasion it was a pleasant distraction.

"Sure, by numbers," Indrani said, pouring herself a drink of the Dead King's finest rotgut. "But it's not a village, Sahelian. It's just a large camp that exists because the Lady killed the beasts that used to live there. We get traders, now and then, and the dwarves peddle things but it's everyone for themselves."

"Yeah, she didn't strike me as the ruling kind of woman," I muttered. "Not a lot of patience there."

"Good thing, too," Indrani said, handing me a cup. "Otherwise who'd cook, you? You're shit with a pot and everyone knows Callowan food is disgusting."

"I've seen you tear into apple bread like it murdered your parents," I drily replied.

"Well, desserts are fine," she conceded. "But your beer is basically dirt water and there's not a single inn in the kingdom that can do mutton right."

"It's true," Akua noted. "Callowans are infamous for being ignorant of spices and drowning their plates in that horrible Laurean sauce."

"I'm not taking culinary trash talk from a drunken vagrant and a woman whose people think poison is actual seasoning," I replied defensively.

"That fucking sauce is basically poison too, let's be honest," Indrani muttered.

Best avoid getting too deep into that fight, I decided. Both of them were much better travelled than me, so they had depth of argument I couldn't match. Not that there was anything wrong with solden sauce, unless you were some kind of fancy noble. Thankfully, it was easy to distract half of my opposition: I raised my cup and with a cheer Indrani met my toast. The baptismal went down like a cup of goblinfire, and that was coming from someone who could barely get drunk anymore. Indrani had to be burning out some of the effects with her Name, no one had that good of a liver.

"Oh, that's the good stuff," Indrani rasped out. "You sure you don't want a cup, Ghost of Bad Decisions?"

"It would not affect me," Akua replied, unruffled by the latest mildly insulting nickname she'd been given. "Truth be told, even before my... current state of affairs, I rarely drank. Enough to prove I'd obtained the correct antidote, but it was never my sin of choice."

"Ugh, nothing worse than a villain that won't drink," Indrani complained. "I thought Praesi were all about living it up. I bet you were all chaste and demure, too."

"Hardly," the shade replied, sounding amused. "I had my own affairs, though given my station they required a degree of discretion."

Indrani topped up my cup and I the way I felt light-headed had nothing to do with the drink. Not yet, anyway. Gods, did she intend to gossip with Akua Sahelian? This was surreal even by my standards, and I'd turned into fucking mist this week.

"Come on," she goaded. "Don't hold out on us now, Murder Bitch. We're just getting to the juicy stuff."

"I actually spent the night with Fasili, not long before the battle at Liesse," Akua shrugged.

"Fasili Mirembe?" I said, brow rising. "Hells, you have terrible taste."

"He was not unskilled, if that is your worry," the shade smirked.

Ugh. He'd had a permanent sneer on his face. Not bad looking, since he'd been highborn and the Wasteland did breed for looks, but the notion of him naked was enough to have me wince. Also, now that I thought of it...

"We killed him, didn't we?" I frowned.

"Robber shot him in the back," Indrani agreed. "He still has the skull. We used it when re-enacting Valerian Betrayed, just before the Battle of the Camps heated up. Sappers make a terrible chorus, for the record. Can't reach a proper low note for the life of them."

Well, if Robber's bunch were badly running plays then at least they weren't running illegal scorpion fights. Probably. I hoped.

"Woe to the defeated, as always," Akua said, tone sardonic.

She didn't seem all that broken up about it, but then this was Diabolist. The only person I'd ever seen her care a whit about was her father, and we'd shot him too. I drank from my cup, and watched as Indrani began working on her fourth. We'd reach drunk waters soon enough, by my reckoning. That stuff hit damnably fast.

"Akua, begin the watch," I said, flicking a glance at her.

Indrani laughed.

"She can stay," she said. "I know what you want to rake me over coals about. Surprised it took you this long, to be honest. Besides, Collar Fairy's part of the crew now isn't she?"

"In a manner of speaking," I said. "We have an understanding."

"A slightly longer leash, as long as I behave and prove of use," Akua said, rather matter-of-fact. "Not an unusual arrangement, by my people's standards."

"You sure?" I pressed Archer.

She waved my objection away carelessly.

"Please, Cat," she said. "Her whole thing is reading people. You think she hasn't figured it out if you picked up on it?"

I sighed. She wasn't wrong about that, I'd concede.

"Your affections for Lord Masego," the shade calmly said. "I did not believe the matter to be a secretive one, I must admit."

"Hey," Indrani said mulishly. "Let's not get all... formal about this. It's just a thing. That is there."

"It's not a crime," I said. "To have, uh, feelings."

"I can't believe the killer ghost is handling this better than you are," she said, sounding amused.

"I don't really get it," I admitted. "But I don't have to. I just don't want you to get hurt trying to get something I'm not sure can be had."

"I know he's not interested in bedplay, Cat," Indrani snorted. "Come on. Last time he saw me shirtless he asked if I needed healing."

I winced. Yeah, that sounded like him all right. Part of it was that had had a hard time reading cues, but I was pretty sure that when he got close enough to people he started just dismissing the possibility of the cue being there at all. He'd been raised in Praes, so he could at least pretend to be better at social things than he was with strangers, but in closed company he tended to drop the pretence and outright admit when he wasn't sure about something. Which was heart warming, in a way, because it meant he trusted us. It also meant he could get a little rough around the edges since he didn't bother to hold back.

"He has no interest in men either, if it is any comfort," Akua said. "I tried to place such agents in his bed after he joined the Fifteenth, to no avail."

I was not surprised in the slightest that she'd tried to honeypot the Woe, to be honest. I was lucky that back then it'd been Masego and Hakram she could go after, and neither was really the seducible type. Well, Hakram was apparently really easy to seduce, but not to get to stick around afterwards. Juniper kept calling him a word in Kharsum I was pretty sure meant 'easy' in a highly unflattering way after she had a few drinks.

"Huh," Indrani mused. "I mean, I assumed, but that's nice to know."

"So you're not unaware that it's not his wheelhouse," I delicately said. "And still?"

"Never really met anyone like him before," she admitted. "Dangerous but without the edges. It's soothing. And he's earnest, Cat. How many people do you know are willing to just be like that? I just..."

Really like him, I completed for her. Yeah, I'd been there once or twice. Usually to my disappointment when I got to know the person in question better, but she'd gone about this the other way around. I put an arm around her, tugged her a little closer. She immediately leaned in and bit my neck, because even while venting she remained a wild animal, and I had to slap her belly several times to get her to stop. She laughed quietly after withdrawing.

"I'm not in love, you tart, so don't get all worried about this," Indrani said. "It won't be trouble. I don't even think he's noticed."

At least a little, he has, I thought. He wouldn't have asked me to take care of her if he hadn't.

"Of course, I'm not the only one who's lusting stupidly," she mused.

"Let's not go there," I said, frowning.

"Come on," Indrani grinned. "I have a running bet with Hakram about how many times a day you'll give Vivi the eye."

Hakram, that gossipy bitch. If I found out there was a betting pool, there would be dire consequences.

"It's just been a while," I said. "Don't read into it."

Indrani leaned back against her stone.

"Right, you've had an empty bed since you called it quits with your redhead," she said. "We'll find you something back in Callow, don't worry about it. Or maybe some drow will fit the bill. Winter Leftovers, what do drow look like?"

"Grey-skinned," Akua said. "Humanoid. Usually of thin frame, even the women, though there is much larger appearance variance between genders than for ogres or elves."

"I honestly couldn't tell whether or not the Spellblade was a man or a woman," I admitted, eager to latch on to the change of subject.

"There is no relation between drow and elves, mind you," the shade noted. "I've read the former take the sobriquet of 'dark elves' quite badly, given that of the two they are the race truly native to Calernia."

Indrani was warm against my side, and pleasant now that she'd stopped biting like a rabid badger. We'd just scratched the surface with our little talk, I was well aware of that. I wasn't the only one who'd been keeping an empty bed for the last year, and it was a much larger change for her than I. But now was not the time to press, so I allowed the chatter about the people I would seek out to wash over me. I was still uncertain of how we'd find the drow in the first place, much less plumb the depths of the Everdark, a niggling worry in the back of my head. We only had so much time to spare. As it happened, it was an empty worry.

It was them who found us.

---

Javvies

So... example made out of mouthy Fae.
Heh. Archer, never change.

I foresee a "Take me to your leader" moment coming up.
Possibly punctuated with violence.

JJR

A half dozen drow emerged from the trees silently. Weapons drawn they considered our little group with what appeared to be weariness.

"Hello!" I offered in as friendly a tone I could manage. "Which of you is in charge?"

For a heartbeat they froze. And then they exploded into violence. Not against us, but each other. It was over before any of us could ready our own weapons. 4 of the Drow lay dead. Of the remaining 2, one was bleeding severely from a head wound and had thrown itself to the ground and was clearly surrendering, even though it spoke a language I did not understand.

The last stood tall and fixed us with a gaze.

"I am the leader of this group."

onedollargum

That is a fantastic concept and I am totally stealing it for the next time I run drow in DND.

Aston W

Yes. That is brilliant. The perfect Cat plan.

poignardazur

You just made my day.

Mike E.

That sir (or maam) was awesome.

Rup

Truly Awesome...would love to see a meme of this..."i-am-the-leader"

Jane

...Archer, Akua, and Cat engaging in girl talk. That... Is not what I was expecting, I have to admit, though I have no complaints.

1queenofblades1

Honestly after this, I don't think the people speculating about a threesome are insane anymore.

Indrani and Cat 'comfort' each other over how unattainable their crushes are, and Akua joins them because why the hell's not? She's already pretty much a part of Cat

Nguyen Hong Hai

OTOH, 1st impression of the Drow on the Callow delegate is 3 drunken lady talking about bed stories, truly diplomats without peer.

RoflCat

Well, if anything I feel that Archer x Masego would end up being a no-sex romance.

As for the idea of threesome....kinda doubt it. (a foursome with Vivi added though...)
Although a more plausible idea is the 3 journeying together after everything's over.

Archer leave because everything's boring now.
Cat goes with her because her job's done, and she leave so people will learn to be independent from her.
Akua goes along because she's part of Cat and because that'd be one way to ensure Akua 'never come back'

Jane

Archer x Masego reminds me of another romance I once read, in The Feelings We All Must Endure... In that case, the author deliberately modeled each of the main character's personalities to emphasize one of the seven deadly sins. The character meant to emphasize Lust was romantically involved with the character designed to emphasize Sloth (names omitted because it's been a while since I read the series)...

It was one of the relationships that didn't survive the series; midway through, the two just... Kind of unofficially broke up, and never got back together again. They liked each other well enough, but Sloth was never really interested in providing what Lust desired, and Lust... Well, she liked Sloth, but wasn't going to let having a girlfriend get in the way of her needs. Maybe the two could have made it work, but they weren't able to communicate well enough to find out.

Of course, communication is unlikely to be an issue for Indrani and Masego – they're both quite able to talk, when they know they need to. They both want fairly different things, though, both out of a relationship, and out of life. I can see the two being involved romantically, but I can't see it lasting, though I imagine the friendship and the feelings could quite well survive the inevitable "This just isn't going to work".

But, well, it's not as though I've read ahead in the story – perhaps I'll be surprised in the future.

Drd

It would be interesting to see masego's reaction to discovering sexuality after being jumped by indrani. Kind of wonder if it would be an eureka moment, although knowing him it would something magical! 😊

Flameburst

Fuck me, he'd discover tantric magic wouldn't he?

Mental Mouse

> knowing him it would be something magical!

"Did the earth move for you too?"

<looks around at wreckage> "I think the earth moved for everybody!" 😊

Azure

Lol it was unexpected but in a good way. And I guess Catherine's lusting after Vivienne must be as obvious as Indrani and Masego. Vivienne is not as oblivious as Masego either, so she's either politely ignoring the elephant in the room, or she just thinks that Catherine lusts after every single pretty face and it means nothing. She did join the Woe after Catherine called it quits with Killian so she hasn't seen Catherine in a relationship.

No hug for Catherine from Vivienne though my poor shipper heart.

Aston W

Viv doesn't actually like girls.

Remember?

Cat is bi.

TheAtomicOption

Cat has been presented as bi, but we've yet to see her do anything with men except call them good looking. From a romantic perspective this has been a very very lesbian only story so far.

Jane

It probably doesn't help that, of the men she's been closest to, one of them is her father figure, one of them seems to be ace, and the last is an orc. The women around her have been a lot more approachable.

Of the men, I could see a relationship with Hakram, but it would give a lot of people pause.

(Of course, she doesn't have to look at people she's close to, but... She's not exactly had a lot of time for something more casual, and anyone she dates is likely to be in a lot of danger, so...)

grzecho2222

"Of the men, I could see a relationship with Hakram, but it would give a lot of people pause."

It would be glorious

Jane

Eh... Hakram might be the kind of boyfriend that I'd prefer, but I think Cat x Vivienne or Cat x Akua would be more interesting to read about.

Hakram's calming and reliable, but Vivienne feels like she's slowly undressing some kind of mystery, while Akua feels like a constant fight – and both Vivienne and Akua have some neat "falling deeper into Evil" undertones to them.

Froggy

That has been something that has bugged me a bit. I mean when she went out of her way to say that she was bisexual that seemed to be setting up her having actual partners of both sexes at some point, like after Kilian the next person would be a guy or something like that. Instead almost every single time has been her being attracted to girls with the occasional mention that "sure. That guy looks good I suppose" or something along those lines. So it is a whole lot of TELLING us a character trait that we never actually see in practice.

crowlute

That's not exactly an uncommon experience with bi women, at least as far as I've heard from the bi women in my life. It's not like bisexuality is a pendulum lol

Azure

That's Catherine's assumption and she has proven herself to be a unreliable narrator before. Until Vivienne flat out rejects her by saying she's not into girls, I think it leaves the door open on Vivienne's sexuality. Also her assumption that Vivienne isn't in to her, also makes it safe on some level for Catherine to lust after her, as she's unattainable. It would be interesting to see what she would actually do if Vivienne reciprocated. I imagine it would involve major panic attacks and running away from having to deal with her own feelings. Falling in love for Catherine is probably more terrifying than facing the DK.

Drd

Good point. And there has been a bit of a barrier between them in the way they've argued the last few chapters, maybe it's been intentional on Thief's part..?

Rup

Archer..Akua..Cat walk into a bar...(let your imagination go wild)

Metalshop

Lots of really good character moments in this chapter. EE has got some real skill with portraying very satisfying and believable moments of domesticity and comfortable familiarity.

Also love the little world building tidbits. Drow not actually being related to elves is an interesting variation and answers some questions I've been posing myself about them ever since we found out how bullshit elves really are.

donforrester456

Partings are such sweet sorrow.

Big Brother

This was the best. How can I get more of the Murderous Trio in my life?

Drd

Get in line!

1queenofblades1

>"Not that there was anything wrong with solden sauce, unless you were some kind of fancy noble."

You ARE a fancy noble Cat....

Jane

Heyheyhey, her crown is made of iron, not gold, so she's not the fancy kind of Queen.

She's the kind who gets called a murderous warlord who's little better than a bandit, and can't really deny it.

1queenofblades1

She's still a Queen ain't she?

Crown of Iron or Crown of Gold,
A Queen is a Queen...

...No matter how lesbian or murderhappy she is

Jane

Hey, I'm just saying, some Queens get swan, other Queens get whatever they "foraged" from farms they passed while on campaign.

1queenofblades1

Fortunately Cat is nether of those. She gets her spoils from the skulls of her foes, the death cries of Callowan enemies, and the Woe she brings to all

Theoreticalhuman

She did stole a comfy chair from arcadia once

Cap'n Smurfy

Drow ≠ Elves

That has been bugging me for so long. Thank God that's been resolved.

Barthumphries

Typo thread

Just because hey rode together
Change hey to they

And many more after that

QTesseract

"About the dangers of toeing the line with me."

Toeing the line is actually a good thing, cat should want them to toe the line. It's from locations like military and many schools, where they expect you to line up for inspection. Toeing the line is when the person obeys instructions and does so.

RanVor

It wouldn't be the first time Cat used a phrase she didn't know the meaning of...

Trebar

It also has a connotation of going right up to the line to see how you can get without crossing it. I imagine Cat is using it similarly to the idea of pushing boundaries to see what they can get away with.

Someguy

I really want to see the Sappers' production of "The Many Deaths of Traitorous" in the style of Gilbert and Sullivan.

WuseMajor

You have my exploding goat.

mavant

AND MY AXE

RanVor

And my vuvuzela.

Euodiachloris

Do NOT hand the samplers vuvuzelas. I shudder to think what they'd do with them... *cough*blunderbuss*cough*

Euodiachloris

...Come off it, autocorrect. "Sapper" is a perfectly cromulent word. *sigh*

RanVor

Great. Now you got me thinking about weaponizing vuvuzelas.

d_o_l

I want to see it performed by an all Elcor cast.

Strin

Heck these cliffhangers

OutspanFoster

I know I joked about a threesome in the previous thread, but this chapter is really leading me on. Heh heh heh 😊😏

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

maresther23

Don't forget to vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

lqueenofblades1

Erraticerrata The Chapters are out of order in the side bar.

It goes:

Chapter 48

Chapter 50

Chapter 49

thecount

curses! i was ninjaed!!!!

JJR

Perhaps it's foreshadowing the release of a Time Demon?

SpeckofStardust

Conversation chapter.

A good one to.

And while a threesome isn't going to happen, I honestly could see a cuddlefest.

thecount

Thanks for the chapter!

its nice, reading about moments like these...

on another note and another typo: in the sidebar i see chapter 50 is between chapter 48 and 49 and not after 49....

WuseMajor

Given that Killian was apparently planning to go off and turn herself into a minor fae, more or less, and Cat turned herself into a bloody Fae Queen, I've always felt like she should pop back up again at some point. If only to help Cat get a better handle on what she is now or become the first vassal of Winter who isn't a rider of the Hunt.

Euodiachloris

Personally, I think clapping a fae title (and domain) on a half-, quarter- or eighth-fae would be a non-blood-sacrifice way to give them their wings. Unfortunately, they would truly be fae at that point, since you'd effectively be sacrificing their human side to do it. However, that is also what they effectively do with the whole blood magic route, anyway. <_<

Drd

I still wonder if killian could have been one of akua's plants.

Yotz

>My fingers twitched. It was an almost physical need to screw with them now that he'd told me not to.

...Oh, how I grok thee, dearest...

RanVor

It's adorable.

The torture, I mean.

RanVor

On a more serious note, seems like Akua is aware how thin is the ice she's walking on. This is both good and bad.

Good, because it greatly reduces the chances of her doing something stupid which would bite the Woe in the ass.

Bad, because it greatly reduces the chances of her doing something stupid which would serve as an excuse to get rid of her.

Also, the Collar Fairy is canon, yay!

mavant

I feel like even your "bad" point there is a good point.

RanVor

That depends on how much you want Akua gone.

mavant

Zero percent. She's the best.

Drd

I'm starting to want her to stick around, at least for a bit. Her character is developing and... not quite softening things, but maybe teaching Cat a lil sophistication, that there are ways to be badass without always headbutting everything.

Of course she can't be trusted even as far as Robber could throw her mind, but she is a very good insight into Preas high born, which Cat will have to face in more detail at some point.

grzecho2222

It's another time that Robber artistic side has been mentioned. Still thinking that artistic duels are one thing that Bard can't escape from.

---

I still hope that Hierarch will challenge her to a rock-off.

Gunslinger

I'm surprised no one has commented yet on Indrani's delicious nicknames for Ubua. Murder Bitch was my favorite. It has elegant simplicity.

Loved the chapter. Fireside alcohol induced gossip chapters are the best chapters. Also Akua and Fasili... Have to agree with Cat, eww

d0m1n1c

"plumb the depths of the Everdark"

Quite the vivid euphemism there, Cat.

David Rosenberg

I was thinking on this recently, does anyone have a list of all the banners Cat has sewn into her cloak?

Related: did she ever get a banner sewn into her cloak from the 10th crusade, or was that considered a draw?

Xinci

I find it strange people are assuming Masengo and Archer could not have a romance. While it might not be conventional I have no doubt they could do wonderful things together that keep their relationship intact(ie.I doubt sex would be the focus but more exploring the various bits of reality to become more). While Masengo may not seem to acknowledge her feelings, far as I can tell he already has. At least partially, just depends on future actions. They both desire to understand and become more than they were in the word. Their goals are similar in truth, just not in origin, so I don't doubt they could travel together on their respective journeys for greatness/understanding. I do suppose though that if it happens it won't happen til later when Indrani goes off to find her limits, Masengo and her going off on adventures into the cosmos/other dimensions/unknown places etc. together makes sense to me as the place where their relationship as it were could flourish. Though that depends on what Cat may make in the end, or if she even succeeds in making anything worthwhile/that will last til the end.

Jane

Personally, my doubts regarding the viability of their relationship is rooted in how they have such different lifestyles; Masengo wants to hole up in a tower for years at a time dissecting reality in precise detail and writing down the results, while Indrani wants to sample the wares of every tavern in the capital, before picking a few fights and wandering off in search of new experiences.

It's not the hardest obstacle to overcome, but it's a pretty big one – and beyond that, they don't really have much tying them together, beyond their common experiences and the fact that they enjoy each other's company.

Of course, Masego isn't exactly dying for companionship, and Indrani would probably like some place she can call something like a home; the relationship could work perfectly well with her disappearing for years at a time before coming back to tell Masego all about her travels, spending a few months together before she sets out again. It can work; I just don't really see them in a "traditional" relationship, and I could just as easily see the two of them deciding it's not really worth it.

*happyhavak*

Another point to consider is that Masego is well versed enough in incubus summoning that I'm sure even Archer wouldn't get bored.

mavant

That feels a bit too much like an Elektra situation.

Drd

You're right I think. But it could work while they're tied together as Woe, especially as the party splits up and comes together again, as they miss each others companionship. Could in a way tie them together more.

Xinci

Neh, I never really thought of their relationship being traditional. Their roles and goals aren't that different in truth, Archer wants to be BIG, in the narrative/existential sense. She is in the role of a explorer, attempting to become more through her journeys, her carousing is just part of that not really the totality of her character, though it has been in more focus recently. Compared to her mentor, who is the hunter of the strongest, Archer is kind of like her mentor in wanting to find the strongest, bestest, flashiest things. To become greater she seeks to understand the world through experiencing all it has to offer. she tries to integrate the experiences into her character in any way that will make her "bigger" in the narrative sense. Thus her plethora of knowledge on various subjects from various cultures, magic, fauna, etc. She will most likely move on to new story structures, cultures, and realities the moment she gets a opportunity to do so.

The thing is Masengo would/will probably do the same thing if they get a opportunity (that won't break their bond with Cat). Masengo wants to understand the world (understanding in this case is to understand, the totality of intricacies, control, mingling, relationships, and becoming, for that part of the world, so he could create a new world/ parts of reality/ realities or bridge parts of that understanding with other parts of creation ). The world in this case is literally everything, his research is not limited to any plane beyond the Woe, his family in the Calamities and perspective/perception gotten from particular spots like the observatory. An example being he only stayed in the observatory because it could let him see across the planes while he was stuck in Callow while Cat was organizing and regulating things. As long as he can find parts of the world to understand, Masengo will go literally anywhere. So I don't doubt Masengo would travel to her if he could learn things in a adventurous other realm with new stories. Archer would go to such places to grow her legend before she dies. There's a fair amount of variables in what kind of stories they would go for together though.
To reiterate, their roles as characters are to become greater in the scales of reality, the timings of their methodologies are different but they often intersect as their goals are the same in many ways.
May be a difference in perspective on what romance would mean for such people. Unsure if sex would be the biggest thing with so many potential options for intimacy in different manners.

mavant

Well, now I really want to know how drow and elves are different / alike. I wish Masengo were around to expound!

superkeaton

Does Cat fucking Akua count as masturbation, or S&M?

Euodiachloris

*shrugs* When it comes to fae and dark eldar, do such distinctions matter?

Aston W

Red Letter and Black Letter the Praesi.

And could the Dark Elves be another failed experiment of storytelling?

Immortal but mortality hits them.

Barrendur

I'm a little dismayed that Cat just visited torture and murder, respectively, on two insubordinate members of the Wild Hunt... and she did it without reservation, consideration or hesitation. Cat seems to have now dispensed with even a token soul-searching; no thoughts of dismay and no revulsion for her acts as she tortures one Fae and has another slain...

Cat had more of a sympathetic/empathetic response when she hanged the corrupt governor of Callow, and *he* had it coming.

Tohron

Admittedly, few militaries are lenient to people who effectively desert in the middle of a battle – in this setting, I expect most of them would have the deserters executed. Her lack of empathy can partly be attributed to them being fae, and thus inclined to torture others for simple amusement. That said, she does seem to be getting more comfortable using some of the nastier tools at her disposal.

BLH989

Fae come back so does it really matter if they die?

Rup

Not sure...but i think they don't if killed outside Arcadia..and even in Arcadia the cycle may have broken as Summer-Winter merged??

Mental Mouse

She treated them according to their own standards, which she understands a lot better since she essentially became one of them.

Kaz Adewuyi

I say Archer and Misago would work quite well. I mean it might not be sex based although considering how much Misago cares about learning stuff and studying I think it be weird if he never had sex eventually especially given his parents. But really they both want similar things. Archer wants to the explore the world and see new things plus gain experiences while spreading her legend. Misago wants to study the rules of magic which kinda means he has to explore to find new magical phenomena and explore realms. And on the intellectual level Archer is the only one who can talk to Misago about magic. Really what the relationship needs to work is Misago being able to have in DnD parlance the Magnificent Mansion so he can move his lab with him. I mean we know you can make pocket dimensions and portals so it should be doable enough. Honestly, I posit Misago is not entirely human his origin story is he doesn't remember anything besides growing up in a pocket dimension so I guess he is half Human and half Demon. The demon side is suppressed and it would explain how he miraculously seems to dodge demonic corruption.

Mental Mouse

I don't think that sort of crossbreeding quite makes sense in the Guide universe, given different orders of Creation. The Wiki says Masego is adopted, but I forget where that's discussed. (Probably back in Book I or II.) On the other hand, I could easily see the fathers giving him a bit of extra protection.

---

Chapter 51: First Impressions

"All serve, by whip or by writ."

– Inscription carved above the entrance to Stygia's Magisterium

The game made no sense, and I definitely wasn't saying that just because I was losing. I fanned my face with my cards, trading hard stares with Indrani and Akua. Sadly, though the former was already drunk she was also drunk enough she misremembered her cards half the time. That made trying to read her an exercise in pointlessness. I'd already lost two laundry chores to her because she'd been under the impression that a set of four cards in the same suit was actually a bad hand. My eyes narrowed as I studied her stupidly grinning face. Unless that was what she wanted me to think. Was she faking being drunker than she was?

"Your values will not grow from staring at Archer," Diabolist mildly said.

I scoffed at her. The wily ass had just tricked me out of two firewood chores after letting Indrani raise the bid through the roof when she had the most horrible hand we'd seen all night. I was beginning to suspect I was being had by the both of them complicitly.

"This is a stupid game," I said. "No wonder it's from the Wasteland."

"Oooh, she's got no trumps then," Indrani drawled. "She only gets that ornery when she knows she's going to lose the round."

I raised my chin haughtily, above the petty squabbles of the lesser folk around me. I would win or lose as a dignified Queen of Callow. Probably lose, I admitted to myself, since I had two Knaves but no same-suit card to match them, making them worth a pittance of ten points even paired. The Three of Cups stared back back at my face mockingly, promising I would be washing the dishes of these traitorous wenches until the end of days.

"No draw," I said, eager to get my beating over with instead of worsening the costs. "Settle."

"Shit," Indrani said, and slapped her five cards down onto the stone.

Two from the suit of Swords, but only a four and six, and no matches which meant I'd so far managed to pull a surprise upset. Diabolist gracefully added her own to the pile. The Knaves of Cups and Coins, with... shit, equivalent values for the rest. This was going to get ugly. I hastily slapped down my own hand then withdrew by half an inch.

"Succession," I said, and tried to slap my fingers back on the pile of cards before anyone else could.

Akua's fingers almost slid under mine in time, but at the last moment she stopped and a wondrous wonderland of no longer having to traipse around this fucking godforsaken countryside for dead wood presented itself to my eyes. Then Indrani's knife went through my hand, technically touching the cards first and winning succession. There was a heartbeat of silence.

"Archer," I said patiently. "Is there a knife through my hand?"

She mused over that, then met my eyes.

"No," she told me. "'tis but an illusion."

Naturally, I decked her in the face. Not full strength, but hard enough she went flying with a deeply satisfying yelp. Sighing, I drew the knife out of my hand and allowed Winter to knit the flesh back together. Holding it by the tip I pointed it accusingly at Diabolist.

"You could have said something," I complained.

"I debated saying 'watch out, she has a knife'," Akua acknowledged. "But really, that could apply to any of us."

I kind of missed the days when the shade of my hated enemy had stuck to creepy intimate endearments instead of outright sassing me. Horrifying as the thought was, the Woe might have been a bad influence on Diabolist.

"That's going to bruise, you know," Archer called out.

"Be grateful I didn't aim for the spire, you wanton savage," I yelled back.

We'd crossed the Chalice, that quiet lake to the northeast of Keter, and yesterday arrived near what could be considered the outskirts of the Everdark. The tall snow-capped peaks shared their name with the realm of the drow, though in truth their kind occupied only parts of it and all of those underground. This was one of the few parts of Calernia where digging too deep wouldn't unleash a sea of angry dwarves, though drow could hardly be considered a better outcome. There were not gates into the Everdark anymore, Indrani had told me. Millennia ago there had been, massive always-open panes of bronze that led into a hollowed out mountain at the heart of drow holdings, but those were long abandoned and Ranger had allegedly found the inside of the mountain collapsed when she'd tried her luck there. We'd have to try our hand with the Warrens instead. A pretty name, that, for what was a much less glorious reality: the Warrens were no great structure, only a sprawling mess of dank tunnels leading underground. Many were collapsed or leading to dead ends, and there were no surface markers indicating their presence. The only people who knew their locations for sure were the drow who still used them, sending roving bands of raiders and slavers to the surface.

Those enterprising souls were not known for having a lot of success in those depredations. Ages ago, before the Golden Bloom had been seized by the elves, the now-broken kingdom of the Deoraithe had occasionally been troubled by them. Now, though? The surface paths led them into three dead ends: the Kingdom of the Dead, the Golden Bloom and the Chain of Hunger. None of these were known to be welcoming locales to outsiders. Once every few decades it was said a cunning and careful warband managed to slip through dwarven tunnels or other secret paths to reach northern Procer – or much more rarely, northern Callow – but even fewer of those who made it there succeeding at returning home. What little was known of the Everdark these days was learned through exiles, which were rare and tended to settle in Mercantis exclusively. Diabolist had hired a few of them as mercenaries, when she'd gone on her mass-murdering spree, and told me since she'd been rather unimpressed by the quality of their soldiery. Regardless, this was now the second day we were on the hunt for any path into the Warrens and we had nothing to show for it. Indrani had been told of a way down by Lady Ranger, and we'd begun there yesterday, but unsurprisingly it'd been brought down.

It was also marked with blood-red runes, that from what Akua could piece together were a warning about 'the Destroyer' having hunted there. Ranger had evidently proved as charming as one would expect. Dusting herself off, Indrani rose to her feet and shook away the bits of stone stuck everywhere in her clothes. She strolled back to the fire easily, maintaining the pretence nothing had happened with an admirable amount of conceit. She plopped herself back down and stretched like a lazing cat.

"Next round, then," she said. "I believe I won the succession, so Cat didn't get shit. Hand me my knife, would you?"

I eyed her sceptically.

"Do you promise not to stab me again?" I said.

"And I as well," Akua smoothly tacked on.

We both ignored her.

"I mean," Indrani hedged. "Define stab."

"Archer," I firmly said.

"It's not like it doesn't grow back," she quibbled. "Also, I know you got all pissy last time, but you know I'm right about the mystery stew. Technically, since anything we cut would grow back, if we used it—"

"We're not going to cut off my fingers and put them into the stew so you don't have to hunt rabbits anymore, Archer," I hissed. "It's not happening."

"Ironical," Akua mused, "that cannibalism only became matter of debate after the Adjutant departed."

"A good queen would be willing to bleed for her people," Indrani solemnly said. "I'm disappointed in you, Catherine."

"I know you're doing this just to rile me up," I said, eyes narrowing. "You know what? Fine. I bet you wouldn't even do it. If I cut off my thumb right now, 'Drani, you going to eat it?"

There was a beat of silence.

"Two firewood chores she doesn't," Diabolist announced.

Those were mine. That utter wretch.

"I'm a little full right now," Archer said.

I let out a mocking humph.

"So let's go with a little finger instead," she finished.

I spun her knife around, catching it by the hilt.

"You wouldn't," I said.

"Hey, use your own," she protested. "I don't want to get fae stuff all over it."

"You just stabbed me, you ass," I yelled.

"I mean, you can't prove that," Indrani mused. "Akua's more or less dead, so in Callow she can't be a witness in a trial. It's your word against mine."

"I'm going to break your knife," I told her bluntly.

"Don't, it has great sentimental value," she objected. "I think I killed a guy for it."

"To clarify," Diabolist said. "Did you kill him because you wanted the knife, or did you kill him and then want the knife?"

Indrani stroked her chin thoughtfully.

"Yes," she replied.

I laid a delicate finger on the tip of the blade, still holding the hilt, and made eye contact with my rebellious minion.

"I will send you back to Laure in chunks," Indrani seriously promised.

"At least they won't be used in stew," I replied just as seriously.

I caught her wrist when she tried to wrestle me down, but she half-leapt at me and we went tumbling into the rocks. I dropped the knife to free my hand, but she slammed her arse into my belly before I could push down her shoulder. I flipped us around, and tumbling towards a slope we went. In between having a faceful of Indrani's clothes in my face, I glimpsed Akua discreetly pawing through the deck of cards. I repressed a sigh. She was stacking it, wasn't she? A hard bump against the ground jostled me out of my despair, and I wiggled so Indrani wouldn't manage to tie my wrists together with her scarf. She was a fair hand at brawling, but then so was I did have the advantage of being able to lift her with a single hand if I needed to. I tugged at her leg and elbowed her in the stomach, climbing on top and forcing her into a bed of pebbles. Rustle, rustle. No footsteps, but grass parting under feet.

"Oh, I get it," Indrani smirked. "Give me a moment."

She tugged down the neckline of her shirt and thrust out her admittedly shapely tits.

"I'm ready," Indrani announced theatrically. "Ravish me, Black Queen. I am powerless before your might."

"Archer, now is-" I began.

"I get it," she winked. "Hey, Shady Business! Go for a walk or something. My legendary charms have finally overwhelmed her."

"That's not what I meant," I said, almost as irritated by the pun as the interruption.

Her brow rose, a salacious grin splitting her face.

"Good news, Fae Maiden," she announced. "You're back in the game. Lose the top first, I've been pretty curious."

"We're about to have company," I spoke in Kharsum, offering Indrani a flirtatious smile to keep up the pretence for watching eyes.

"Yeah we are," Indrani said, wiggling her eyebrows, but the moment I loosened my grip she began reaching for one of the sundry knives always on her.

They were creeping through the stones now. The slope to the left, leading to a narrow ledge skirting the flank of a rock spire. There'd been a stretch of sparse grass beneath it, I remembered. Not much green, though. They have to be more than a few if they made that much noise going sneaking through. I inhaled, yet there was no fear in the wind. I could almost discern heartbeats, but they were too muted to tell apart. Sorcery, or some natural trait? I got up, turning my back to where they were approaching from, and offered a hand to Archer.

"We doing this or what?" she grinned.

"Go easy on me," I said. "My back's still aching."

The sound of a cord being pulled taut was the opening salvo of the dance. I tore away from Archer, blade already half-formed in my hand, and sped forward without missing a beat. I did not need to speak orders to the others. Both Akua and Indrani had been in enough scrapes, either at my side or not, to need no instructions when blades came out. My first drow sighting was little more than a glimpse of silvery eyes set in an angular grey face flanked by strips of obsidian: a heartbeat later the enemy had vanished, pressing itself against the dead angle of the slope. An arrow went flying from above, arced perfectly towards Akua's silhouette by the fire, but when it went through her chest all that happened was the shattering of ice. She was long gone.

"Archer, handle above," I called out. "I want prisoners."

"Spoilsport," she yelled back, landing in a roll that scattered her beddings as she grabbed her longbow.

I'd keep the ones down here busy, trying to limit the damage. I could hear faint heartbeats down the slope, just out of my sight, and they had quickened. They were waiting for me, to spring attacks in that moment where my eyes would be seeking them out and they would have me right in their sights. If I'd still been the Squire, that might have scored them a wound. Now, though? With a flick of the wrist I formed four monoliths of ice in the air above where they should be lying in wait and allowed them to drop. There were murmured sentences in a language I did not know, but it seemed they had no parry. The working flushed them out, seven of them scrambling away from the falling ice. Warriors, one and all, or at least drow in good shape wearing armour. The sight if it was strange to me, after fighting the soldiery of the west. No steel there, no plate or mail: small strips of obsidian fell down to their knees in a thick layer, kept together by barely visible strips of leather. My eyes were sharp enough to find the discreet runes carved onto the pieces, though I knew not their meaning or purpose. There were few differences among them. None looked terribly older than the others – were they human, I would have believed none older than their late twenties – and I could hardly even tell them apart. The helms, though, had some slight variations. All of them were thin incomplete circles of obsidian closely keeping to the frame of their faces, keeping hair out and going all the way down to the beginning of angular chins. From that dark glass, caps of leather descended towards the back of their necks, set with small round stones, save for one drow. The lower part of that one's cap had a line of long dark feathers tickling down to its back.

Well, the one with the fancy hat tended to be the one in charge. It would do.

While I'd been sifting through the sight of them, they'd recovered from the surprise. Before the ice even hit the ground one of them tossed an iron-tipped javelin at me, though from the corner of my eye I caught another danger. The archer had come out and fired another arrow. I could hear Archer pulling at her own bow, though, so I instead I focused my attention on the javelin. It was well-thrown, aimed right at the centre of my chest. It was also laughably slow to my senses after the kind of fights I'd picked of late. I snatched it out of the air by the shaft and pivoted, throwing it back at the same drow twice as fast. To my surprise, it did not duck. Instead its entire body flickered, shadows swallowing it whole, and it fell into a pool of darkness that stretched and slithered across the stony ground only to reform a dozen feet to the side into the same person. Well, that was a new trick.

"Surrender," I called out.

I realized just after that I'd forgotten about the arrow, musing it wouldn't exactly set the right tone if the moment after demanding surrender I got shot. As it happened, Archer pulled through.

"Trick shot," she crowed.

Her own arrow tore through the fletching of the one the drow had fired, sending it spinning away from me, and it continued at a sharp angle upwards. The sound of obsidian shattering and a pained grunt followed. The one with the fancy hat spoke something in drow tongue, and they all scattered into the shadows. Literally. Lines of darkness spread out, too many for me to follow them all. They had not, unfortunately for them, accounted for Diabolist. The scent of blooming ice filled the air as she formed a construct right to the side of a fleeing drow, fingers of frost ripping the warrior out of the shadowy tendril by the throat. To my approval, she'd gone for Fancy Hat.

"We have your leader," I called out. "Drop your weapons or she'll snap his neck."

Fancy Hat tried to flicker away again, but I wasn't having any of that. I flicked my wrist and a band of shadow tightened around its throat, keeping him in Akua's tender embrace as the flicker... failed, for lack of a better word. A javelin punched through the warrior's chest a heartbeat later, tearing at Diabolist's construct behind it. Right, drow. Infamously not the most loyal of companions. If that'd been the only one that could speak Lower Miezan, I was going to be pissed.

"All right, the hard way it is," I grunted.

The kickback from my running start shattered the ground beneath it, and a heartbeat later I was in the midst of them. One pooled into shadows, but an arrow nailed it and it flickered back into drow form with a leg pierced through, hissing in pain. I handled the rest as gently as I could. Spikes of shadow nailed one to the ground, another was sent to think about what he'd done in a bubble of ice and I shaped my sword into a spear for the third, throwing it straight through its foot when it tried to flicker away. There'd been eight in whole, and with one dead and two clipped by Archer that left... two. One was legging it back towards the grass. I let it run – might learn the way into the Warrens from it, assuming that was how they'd all come to the surface. The last stared at me with wide eyes and dropped its curved obsidian blade, slowly kneeling and putting its hands behind its neck.

"Diabolist, containment," I ordered.

An exertion of will had wings coming out of my back and I rose up, following behind the runner. It saw me, and flickered. Clicking my tongue disapprovingly against the roof of my mouth, I went down into a dive. No more running, then. Too much a risk of losing it if it stuck to that form. I wasn't even halfway caught up when the drow emerged from the dark tendril, grey skin gone pale, and began to run away on foot. So it's exhausting to remain like that, I thought. I wasn't surprised. There was no such thing as power without a cost. I swooped down like a hawk, boots landing on its shoulders, and it folded without a fight. A bit too much, actually. Its head hit a stone at a bad angle, and with a sharp breath I knelt by its side to check if it was still alive. My fingers went to the jugular, but there was no heartbeat to found there. Drow were only so similar to humans, then. I formed a flat piece of ice and put it before its mouth, tension leaving my shoulders when the surface fogged. Its forehead was bleeding and its eyes closed, but it wasn't dead yet. I swung the body over my shoulder and walked back to the skirmish field, finding the others had gathered the drow together in my absence. Most were bleeding, though we'd avoided outright lethal wounds. Even a lesser one could kill if you bled long enough, though, so the offer of wounds tended might be leverage we could use. I dropped the unconscious drow to the side of the others.

"All accounted for," Diabolist said.

I nodded. Archer rested her elbow on my shoulder, eyeing our prisoners with a deeply unimpressed look on her face.

"Was that trick really all they had?" she said. "I'm feeling a little shafted, not gonna lie."

"You can't use the kind of opponents we've had recently as measuring stick," I said. "We've been scrapping with some of the scariest people on the continent."

"They could have brought a mage, at least," she complained.

"Night's young," I replied, shrugging her elbow off me. "There could be others."

None of the drow were speaking, or even meeting my eyes. They remained kneeling and looking down, what little I could see of their faces resigned. They think we're going to kill or enslave them, I realized.

"Do any of you understand this language?" I asked in Lower Miezan.

No answer.

"Do you speak Mtethwa?" I tried in the eponymous tongue.

"Why would anyone want to speak that if they didn't have to?" Indrani mused.

I glanced at Diabolist.

"You wouldn't happen to..."

"Speak Crepuscular?" she finished. "I do not. For much the same reason I do not speak cockroach."

"I'm disappointed in your tutors, Akua," I informed her.

"Indeed," Diabolist drily replied. "How dare they fail to teach me a language spoken only by a race that has not been seen in the Empire for centuries, whose influence in the broader continent is so insignificant some scholars do not mention them in the latest histories at all."

"Yes," I agreed without missing a beat. "It was very inconsiderate of all of you."

"Hey, disappointments," Indrani called out in passable Chantant. "Do any of you understand me enough to be shamed by my scorn?"

Three of them stiffened. I grinned, and not pleasantly.

"Would you look at that," I murmured in the same language. "It's finally paid off. All of you who understand me, get up. We're going to have a nice, civilized chat."

Indrani choked on her tongue at that, which did not reassure them in the slightest.

---

erraticerrata

First update of the month, and so Extra Chapter in the corresponding tab. Continuation of the last Cordelia POV, titled Fatalism II.

NZPIEFACE

More Cordelia?

Now we see how bad she fucked up.

Agent J

I'd have preferred to see her reaction in the aftermath rather than her bumbling attempts to prevent what we already know comes to pass.

That said, I'm happy to see she merely failed to stop it. I was under the impression she was blindsided entirely. Cordelia is one of my favourite antagonists thus far.

TeK

It's important, probably because it will reveal the one who planned this affair. I hope to see Cordelia meeting WB for an alledgedly first time.

Drd

The one planned it? The Pilgrim. Can you think of one other reason he left Callow so in time with this? One reason he no longer needs to honour his word, is if all of Callow is now evil, retroactively of course. And what more respected 'Chosen' is there with ties to the house of light?

Javvies

Not Pilgrim.

He left Callow/disappeared only after Malicia's assassinations, which took place after the news about the result of the Conclave broke in Callow.

In addition, the timing, distances, and travel times dictate that the Conclave was being arranged before the Crusade first suffered defeats.

Pilgrim had neither the motive nor the opportunity. Remember, he had been trying to set Cat up for a redemption arc. Her being declared Arch-heretic basically makes that impossible, or, at the very least, a whole lot harder to pull off.

I'm pretty sure that Bard is the one who set the Conclave up.

Javvies

Ah yes, being underwhelmed because random drow mooks aren't up to your standards, Archer.

Rejoice, for those standing before you aren't blatantly overpowered assholes.

Though that Akua was unimpressed by the quality of the Drow she hired as mercenaries is likely a bad sign.

Someguy

I thought this was a "fuck you" to a certain dual-scimitar wielding drow ranger?

Raved Thrad

Dammit, now I want to see an Everdark drow dual-wielding two hand crossbows, with a Kimba-the-White-Lion ripoff as a pet.

Unfortunately, even if Tzzird, above, were a mini-boss Archer would probably spike him and Abmik with two arrows. Or maybe two kills, one arrow, with a trick shot.

Hmm... I wonder if Catherine could then raise them both as undead abominations.

TeK

Eh. Remember how dwarven mercs are usually middling malcontents? I'd imagine any drow exiled from Everdark had just failed their Backstabbing 101.

Naeddyr

But are these exiles or, I think this is probably more likely, guards and scouts? They are just at the door step, there's a uniform thing going on.

grzecho2222

"No Malekith, no you stab with other end... Nooo, no even remotely close!"

FactualInsanity

I don't expect them to showcase elven levels of overpoweredness, but the ones merc-ing it up in Mercantis **are** the castoffs and exiles. Time will ultimately tell, but it's not unreasonable their core troops are decently threatening. After all, they **have** survived as neighbors of the Chain of Hunger without a continent spanning wall.

Forrest

How is she going to go with the typical Foundling diplomacy if she has no cheap wine and only a dagger?

ATRDCI

Eh, if fingers can be stew meat, blood can serve as cheap wine

mavant

Do you want messianic religions? Because that's how you get messianic religions!

---

Oh, yeah, she's basically a prophet of the Tenets of the Night, to them.

Javvies

It was an analogy, not a literal description. Though, to be fair, she might literally do that to somebody at some point. Translated, the essence of Foundling diplomacy is giving you the option between accepting whatever deal she offers you, however poor you think it might be, or violence being applied in your direction, and then pointing out that even a lousy deal is better than being stabbed.
Or something along those lines.

stevenneiman

I think Indrani's jokes and a shard of ice can do the same job.

Big Brother

Man, Indrani is certainly getting bold with her flirtations towards Cat.
But I'm still hoping Cat x Vivienne happens.

medailyfun

yep, actually Cat can easily form the male body parts to fit the straight girl

RanVor

I'm pretty sure Vivienne would find it creepy. I know I would.

Raved Thrad

Well, Cat liking Vivienne is now canon, so ViviCat might just happen. Or maybe IndraViviCat, with Masego commenting from the sidelines.

Metrux

Hell no. No. Just no. He would never study such depravity xD

mavant

I'm pretty sure there will never be Masego / Vivienne, but I propose that we refer to the pairing as ViviSection.

mavant

Ack, no, I should have just said "the only vivi for Hierophant is Vivisection."

Raved Thrad

"If I understand what I'm seeing, then what, exactly, do women need men for?"

Drd

With Mesago and Akua on the sidelines making commentary and comparing notes.

Yotz

And now chapter 49 is placed before chapter 48 in the chapter list...

DroughtBringer

Vote!!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Yotz

CompletelyProbably on the other side thematically, but as a direct consequence of the epigraph.

Gunslinger

And the Archer Cat shipping tease continues...

This was quite a fun chapter though the slow opening after the ending of the last was a bit surprising..

I wonder if the Drow have Names. Would make for interesting battles and potential allies for the Woe.

Darkening

Their culture, such as it is, hasn't been systematically destroyed like the orcs was, so I'd imagine they get the occasional one like everyone else. We'll have to see more of what they're actually like rather than just second or thirdhand rumors before we can really get any ideas on what sorts of names besides, 'probably schemers'.

SpacyRicochet

Spellblade, for one.

....

Spellblade was a gilded vale elf I believe

RanVor

Son of the Forever King. The Bard "gifted" him to the Dead King in order to discourage the Elves from interfering into her plots.

Yotz

And to discourage the Dead King from claiming another Hell as a part of his pocket universe by siccing Forever King on him.

TeK

I wonder, does a stew from Cat taste differently from a regular human soup? Does Named soup taste differently? Very important question, I wonder why Hierophant never brought it up.

Yavandir

I wonder if stew from Cat can even be boiled after all her body is construct made from winter's power.

TeK

She's a construct, she can be whatever she wishes. She could be human, or a mist, or ice. Or ham... Or beef. Or cabbage.

Antoninjohn

Now we will finally see what Cat's power can do, after all it was mentioned that she can hollow people by implanting them with her darkness and break their will to follow her orders.

Novice

I thought she can only do that to the dead?

Miles

That's not really an obstacle.

mavant

It is if you want to fight the Dead King with them.

nick012000

So, given the comments about why enchanted gear isn't common among the people of Praes in the previous chapters, the fact that they're armed with enchanted obsidian armor as standard equipment implies that the Drow have a *shitload* of mages. More mages than Praes does, and Praes is the only other force on Calernia with enough mages to have them join the army as a standard unit.

Naeddyr

Here's my guess: the Drow are not elves, but they might have a similar kind of longevity, so they're few in number but they're really long-lived. Small numbers of people who live long enough to generate a ton of magical gear might explain why they have the stuff.

These might even be elites.

nick012000

I don't think that sort of thing would work, though, since one of the reasons why Praes doesn't equip its soldiers with magical gear is because it requires regular maintenance by mages to remain functional, otherwise it runs out of power and stops working eventually.

Clmineith

Each drow might have some basic mage training. They might enchant their own gear, but not be able of much more.

ALKATYN

Having them all be low level mages would be an interesting change from the other species we've seen so far. Might explain how they could all do that shadow jumping thing, and how they survive underground

Morgenstern

Well, the runes on their armor could just be that. Instead of actual working magical runes...

Micke

Indeed, heraldry was my first thought.

Yotz

Eh, if heraldic crest can two-time as a magical rune, then why not?

Barthumphries

Maybe obsidian retains its magical charge longer. It makes for crap easily shattered stuff on the surface, but if you can melt into shadows whenever you're attacked then the enchantment is the important part, not how easily it might be shattered.

So they have gone gone with armor that's not really good as armor but it's great for caring around enchantments.

lqueenofblades1

My favorite chapter in the entire series without a doubt lol.

If Archer ever achieves Apotheosis, she'll doubtless proclaim herself the Goddess of Tits and Wine. And finger stew.

Yotz

...yearning to add "and Zoidberg" rises...

Nihilant

spelling/grammar suggested corrections:

but then so was I did have the advantage – but then so was I. I did have the advantage

Indrani smirked. "Give a moment." – Indrani smirked. "Give me a moment."

been a stretchof sparse – been a stretch of sparse

sheer_falacy

I really do wonder why Cat is going to the Drow for help. Sure, she needs bodies badly, but she has nothing to offer them (besides I guess fae gates to a source of slaves but she and Callow have been very anti-slave) and they seem like dreadful allies – incredibly traitorous (and she already has Larat and the wild hunt ready to betray her) and kind of pathetic as a military force to the point that people are forgetting they exist. Plus not at all unified so she can't make just one deal, she has to do it over and over.

Plus her amazing diplomatic skill, which I guess at least might work on the Drow.

Euodiachloris

When it comes to left field surprises, they suddenly joining in the merry war above ground would certainly class as one of those.

And, from the sound of it... The drow may need to jump on the opportunity start doing something different: they seem to be lagging behind the rest of the world in a number of areas. 😞

Jason Ipswitch

My guess is that Cat is going to be a sort of Maud'Dib to the drow. She'll somehow click with their cultural psyche, and will offer them an exit from the Everdark. In return, they'll be her fanatics. Heck, maybe she'll just offer them a chunk of Callow somewhere that doesn't really have local Callowans to be angry at them. Recent wars have put a big dent in her population base, and they wouldn't be a bad balance to the goblins she's probably going to be giving a greenlight.,

WuseMajor

I am now accpting bets on the Black Queen becoming the new ruler of the Drow.

Yotz

And accepting her new name "Cacth".

mavant

And then she'll cover herself in a suit made of tiyy drow and transform into a giant monster.

Percula1869

The humor in this chapter was amazing. I was quietly chuckling to myself the whole time. I also love all the badass moves Cat has now, and the mental image of her cracking the ground when she takes off was super impressive.

lennymaster

This chapter gives a whole new meaning to the term "finger food".

RanVor

"All serve, by whip or by writ".

Valar dohaeris?

Raved Thrad

Well, with Cat, they can die first, and then serve. 😊

Satan

I figured they would speak ancient Keteran.

Anatomy-Criticizer

On a re-read now.

Man, EE, I love your writing, but please get your facts straight! Assuming humans on Calernia have the same anatomy as humans on Earth, checking for a pulse on the jugular, which is famously a vein and thus has no pulse, would be known to Cat to be useless.

---

Chapter 52: Finesse

"No, see, you'll profit as well. All you need is to convince five others of contributing coin and when they do you'll get a part of their own contribution. It'll all work out, I promise."

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful, convincing High Lords to invest in the construction of ritual pyramid outside Ater

Even after having done arguably worse things, I'd never warmed to torture. I'd once had an interesting conversation with Black about it, where he'd been somewhat equivocal but overall inclined to agree with me. Torture, he'd noted, tended to be unreliable. Some people folded the moment you pulled out their fingernails, sure, but those with a little more staying power would need a great deal of violence before they started talking. And at that point, how could you tell whether they were saying something because they thought you wanted to hear it or because it was actually true? Some heroes side-stepped the whole issue by having truth-telling abilities, but that was bullshit divine intervention – you couldn't reproduce those results with spells, not with any degree of reliability. I tended to get by on my increased senses, since fae eyes and fae ears were much harder to trick than their human equivalent, as I now suspected the Lone Swordsman once had. William hadn't gotten a pat on the back from Above and glaring lights appearing whenever someone fibbed at him, he'd had to rely on Name senses to read the opposition. He'd been quite good at it, in retrospective.

I'd had to mutilate my own soul to get better at that trick than he was, so for once good ol' Willy had me beat from the grave.

I stared down at the drow kneeling in front me, frowning. There'd been three who'd stiffened when Indrani had spoken in Chantant, and we'd separated those from the rest of the prisoners immediately. I'd then shaped Winter into a thick spire of ice hollow on the inside and ordered the first prisoner brought in. Akua was at my side, as she likely had more experience at this kind of thing than any of us. Indrani had been curious but I wanted someone keeping an eye on the rest of the drow. A flick of the wrist shaped a rough bench of frost and I sat down, eyes never leaving the still-silent prisoner. Diabolist had stripped it of its helmet, revealing bone-white hair cut so short I could almost see the skin beneath. I would have preferred the obsidian armour off as well, but there were no obvious clasps to it: I suspected it was like a mail shirt, put on with another person's help.

"We know you understand us," I said.

The drow did not react. Denial? Possibly. Or resignation.

"Akua, raise its head," I ordered.

Diabolist knelt by the prisoner's side, forcing the chin upwards so the drow would have to meet my eyes. It resisted, but only half-heartedly. The eyes were not as silvery as I'd thought. The sclera was white as a human's would be, though noticeably larger, but it was the iris that caught my attention. It was not entirely silver: there were strands of the colour to be found, more visible than the rest, but the base was a dull brown. Some sort of sorcerous blowback? The black pupil at the centre was uncomfortably shaped, more oval than circle, and I'd yet to see a single drow blink. In a way, it was more troubling to look at their kind than a fae – the fairies were inhuman, with only the barest varnish of similarity, but the drow was close enough to human that the discomfort was felt more steeply.

"What's your name?" I asked.

Silence. There was fear in the air now. I drummed my fingers against my leg, then sighed.

"Answer me," I Spoke.

The prisoner's face twitched into a pained rictus. It was fighting the command, proving to have stronger will than most. It was not enough.

"No one," it hissed, voice dim. "Nothing."

Diabolist rose to her feet and the drow stubbornly went back to looking down.

"Blind it," Akua suggested evenly. "Rip out the eyes and toss it back out bleeding in sight of the others."

"There's no need for that," I said.

This one looked unwilling to provide useful answers even when its arm was being twisted, so we'd try the others before seeing if it was necessary to resume the proceedings a little more sharply. Diabolist wasn't wrong that a dollop of fear would be useful, but she was also proving that even as a shade she had that horrid Wasteland disregard for people. I would not resort to knives without exhausting every other possibility first. I'd gotten an idea of the drow's voice, from that unwilling reply, enough for glamour. Illusions did not come naturally to me, as even now they required more focus than I was typically able to spare when in a fight, but I had the time to weave it properly tonight. A small sphere of shining light formed over my open palm and the drow breathed in sharply when a decent approximation of its voice began screaming hoarsely into the night. I kept the glamour going for thirty heartbeats, then ended it with a harsh snap. Akua's scarlet eyes followed me as I dismissed the sphere and spun glamour again, resting a hand atop the drow's head: a heartbeat later half its face appeared brutally scorched to the naked eye, nose cut off and one eye left a bloody empty socket.

"Sleep," I ordered, and forced a sliver of Winter into its shaken mind.

It dropped without a sound.

"Drag it outside," I ordered Diabolist. "In sight of the others. Then get me another."

"By your will," the shade said, and smoothly bowed.

I flicked my wrist and shaped one last glamour. An eye, this one, though since I'd never actually seen a drow eye out of an eye socket I had to improvise to an extent. Akua came back quicker than I'd expected, the fresh prisoner moving gracefully into the room. I was pretty sure I recognized this one. It'd been the one who actually surrendered when things went to shit for their warband. Still, it wouldn't do to leave the point half-made. I popped the glamoured eye into my mouth and chewed, smiling pleasantly at the new arrival. Its lips thinned, darkening to a deeper bloodless grey.

"That will not be necessary," the drow said in perfect Chantant.

I swallowed. So did the prisoner.

"Well, this is promising," I mused. "Diabolist, make our friend a seat."

Ice bloomed and a block spun into existence. It was, I noted, with mild amusement, closer to the ground than my own seat. Praesi, huh. The drow's silvery eyes lingered on the sorcery before it took a seat. The silver strands were much deeper, in this one. I could see almost nothing of the original green. They were also... less vivid than those of the previous prisoner. Interesting.

"What's your name?" I asked.

"Ivah," it replied. "Of no sigil."

"I'm Catherine Foundling," I said. "Lately Queen of Callow, though I've picked up a few other titles over the years."

"I greet you humbly, Lately Queen," Ivah said.

