

Book 4

---

Prologue

"If my allies were half as reliable as my enemies, I would have a different moniker."

– King Henry Fairfax, the Landless, upon being told of the Praesi invasion of Principate-occupied Callow

It went against Iason's instincts, but Amelia had been right. She had a knack for these things, it came with her Name. They must keep a low profile, at least for now. The sooner they moved out of Dormer and into the countryside – rumour at the market was that large swaths of the south were still patrolled only irregularly by the Legions – the better, but as long as they stayed in the city they had to be quiet. It'd been most a day now since the three of them had left the river barge they'd stowed away on, and they'd split for the afternoon. Lergo had gone to have a look at what the locals called Summer Hill, the mound of melted stone where they said the Black Queen had tricked the Queen of Summer into returning to Arcadia. The Ashuran had whined like a child about having to abandon his flamboyant crimson clothes for something less attention-grabbing, but he'd given in anyways. And made eyes at Amelia all the while, the pretentious twit. The Red Mage had proved he was a force to reckon with in a fight, but Iason had not grown to like him in the months since their band first assembled. The Gallant Bandit herself had gone to find them accommodations for the night, so he'd been charged with obtaining foodstuffs for the journey ahead.

The marketplace in Dormer was thriving, for a city that'd been emptied and set aflame not even a year ago. It was Callowans running the shops and stalls, but there was a gaggle of foreign merchants as well. Iason found it difficult to tell apart the Taghreb and the men of the Free Cities, for they looked much alike in skin and faces, but the black-skinned Soninke stood out starkly. The hero bargained half-heartedly with a peddler for lentils and dried meat, rather certain he got robbed on the exchange. He was paying with silver fidi from Mercantis, one of the few coins no merchant in Calernia refused, and he was not certain how it compared to Imperial coinage. The merchant's smiling admission he had no scale to compare the weights did little to inspire trust, though the man was unmoved when Iason threatened to seek another peddler. Odd behaviour, from a merchant who could not even afford a stall.

"There," the peddler said, taking pity on him and giving back a few coppers.

Not a mintage he recognized, Iason noted. It could be worthless for all he knew.

"Don't look at me like that, son," the merchant snorted. "That's from the Royal Mint in Marchford, not Harrow trash like everyone else is trying to offload. Call it my kindness of the day."

"Callow has a mint?" Iason said in Lower Miezán, surprised. "I thought it used the Tower's coin."

"The Bastard Lord had one built," the peddler told him approvingly. "That's Taghreb for you. Vicious fuckers one and all, but they've a nose for business. Mind you, everyone still takes Praesi mintage. Have to, with all the gold coming south these days."

"There are a lot of foreigners," the hero agreed, casting a wary look at a nearby Soninke.

The peddler looked amused.

"You don't sound like no Callowan, boy," he said. "Delos?"

"Atalante," he replied. "My father was, anyway. I was raised west."

He'd grown to manhood in the principality of Creusens, but admitting as much in this city would have been the act of a fool.

"We got a lot of Wastelanders around nowadays," the peddler agreed. "Trying to get their hands on grain, you know. Mercantis caught on so the Consortium is gouging them on prices and buying up the reserves in the other cities to drive up the prices. They're used to this country being the greener pasture."

"Few of them are smiling," Iason said, only now noticing.

"That's 'cause the Bastard Lord restricted commerce in foodstuffs," the merchant grinned nastily. "They want more than scraps, they have to get a permit in Laure. The really desperate ones are ruining themselves emptying tavern larders one at a time, but already the court is clamping down on that."

"That seems like a loss of profit for you all," Iason said.

"Worth it, to have the crown's men around when some Wastelanders try to get nasty," the peddler said, spitting to the side. "Not that there's been a lot of those. I'll say this for the Black Queen – since she crucified all those pricks after Second Liesse, Praesi have been stepping real light around here."

The hero was almost nauseated. They said the villain ruling Callow had nailed hundreds to crosses after slaying her rival, made them grisly ornaments along the road. The merchant should have been appalled, but if anything he sounded grudgingly approving. Iason had never been skilled at hiding his thoughts – it went against his Name to be less than Stalwart in anything he did – and the peddler picked up on it. The man spat to the side again, looking warier now.

“You with the House of Light, son?” he probed.

“A lay brother,” Iason said. “Never took the full vows. I don’t have the disposition for it.”

Full-fledged brothers had to vow pacifism, and it was in his nature to meet injustice sword in hand.

“Didn’t know that was a thing,” the peddler said, but he was mollified.

It wasn’t, not in Callow anyway. The House of Light in Procer tended to consider its equivalent in Callow to be a very... provincial cousin. Prone to eccentricities. That the Order of the White Hand, true anointed paladins, had been allowed to hold lands of its own in the old days was spoken of as impious back home. It was just history, now that the Order had been exterminated, but Iason had a personal interest in the matter. His Name had but few previous incarnations, and most of them had come to be in Callow. The hero did not linger after that, already uncomfortable with how much attention he’d drawn. He hoisted the sack over his shoulder and made his way to the quarter by the docks, where Amelia had said she’d find them an inn. He was wondering how to find her, when she found him instead. The Gallant Brigand was almost as tall as he was, lithe and graceful in a way he could not help but stare at. Dark hair kept in a ponytail was usually covered by a highwayman’s hat, though she’d stashed it away for the sake of discretion, and the notched scar on her cheek somehow only added to her beauty.

“There you are,” Amelia smiled. “Fruitful foray?”

Iason cleared his throat uncomfortably. The cloistered life in Aviliars had not taught him how to deal with beautiful women, and he was always on the backfoot around her. At least Lergo wasn’t there. The Red Mage always seemed to make it worse with his glib and cutting japes. As if the sorcerer himself didn’t hang on her every word.

“I have supplies,” Iason stiffly replied. “Have you secured accommodations?”

Amelia snorted and clapped his shoulder.

“Secured accommodations,” she repeated teasingly. “You need to loosen up, Iason. Though I suppose that would be against type.”

I can be fun, the Stalwart Paladin silently insisted. Just because I can't set things on fire with a word doesn't mean I'm a bore. Instead of saying that he ended up chewing on his tongue like a fool, to the woman's visible amusement.

"Come on," she said, withdrawing her hand. "I found us a place. Be warned, though. It was cheap for a reason."

Iason frowned when he first saw the inn, as the warning seemed inaccurate. It was not luxurious palace, but it was spacious and swift perusal of the common room revealed it to be scrupulously clean. Perhaps she'd meant the food would be horrid? It hardly be worse than the cooking they'd inflicted on themselves journeying from the countryside to Atalante after forming their band in Nicae. The Gallant – Iason did not like to think of the other part of her Name, no matter how much he liked her – shot him a toothy grin after he set down the sack, and a moment later a loud screaming match began in the kitchen adjoining the common room. The hero grimaced. Lergo strolled in an hour later, still looking put-out at wearing wool instead of blindingly red silk, and claimed a seat at the table where Iason had been sharing a drink with Amelia and failing miserably at small talk. The Red Mage stole his tankard and drank from it, wrinkling his nose at the taste. The sorcerer had been born to one of the high tiers of citizenship in Ashur, he was likely used to much better fare. Everything about him smacked of arrogant privilege, which had not become any less grating with time.

"Had a look at that hill," Lergo casually said in tradertalk. "That was a serious scrap. If our cousin up north can tangle that hard, we're in for quite a vigorous dance."

The cousin up north, they'd taken to calling her to be discreet. Catherine Foundling, Queen of Callow. The Squire, some said, though others implied she had another Name yet to be revealed. The breadth of the swirl of rumours around the villain that ruled Callow was staggering, for one so young. Undefeated in battle. She murdered a god to steal his mantle and tricked two others into doom without ever unsheathing her blade. She has more lives than a cat, holds sway over dead and fae alike. Her cohorts, the Woe, had been revealed to the wider world through the infamous massacre they called the Doom of Liesse back home. The Hierophant, a cold madman whose strange sorceries tamed demons and stilled miracles. The Thief, a fallen heroine said to have once stolen an entire fleet and even snatched the sun out of the sky. The Archer, the greatest pupil of the Lady of the Lake who had never lost in single combat. And the last, Hakram Deadhand. The Adjutant. They said he was unkillable, that he was large as an ogre and his hand of bones could wrest out your soul. The heirs to the Calamities had made a bloody debut, last year. Iason had paid close attention to the rumours, knowing even the slightest hint could make the difference between life and death.

The three of them had come, after all, to kill the Black Queen.

"That might have been the fae, not her," Amelia whispered in the same language, one of the few they all shared. "Her talent is supposed to be ice, not fire."

"And what a talent fire can be," Lergo said, grinning suggestively at the Gallant. "The element of passion, you know."

Iason's teeth clenched.

"We're still on the outskirts," Amelia said. "We'll hear more when we go deeper into the country. The south looks like very promising grounds to begin our work."

They would, to her. The Gallant Brigand had been vague about her activities before joining their band, but Iason had pieced together that she'd made her mark in the wake of the Tyrant of Helike's armies as they sowed chaos across the Free Cities. The southern parts of Callow were still feeling the aftermath of the last three wars, and so she would be moving on somewhat familiar territory. Robbing the powerful to help the powerless was a worthy cause, even if he disapproved of her methods. Banditry was a sin in the eyes of the Heavens, else why would so many bandit Names be sworn to the Hellgods? They had to delay the conversation after that, for the innkeepers came to offer their service. Callowans both, an old married couple. They offered stew on the house, though the ale was not, and to Iason's mild irritation lingered afterwards to chat with what seemed to be their only current patrons. Some matters were their own explanation.

"Dormer born and raised, the both of us," the old man – Albert, as he insisted on being called – told them proudly. "City's had a rough few years but we'll get back on our feet, you'll see."

"I heard Dormer was part of the Liesse Rebellion," Amelia said smilingly, "but the damage was all from the fae, I am told?"

"Good Anne dragged us into the mess, it's true," the old woman grudgingly admitted. "She cut a deal with the Black Queen after, though, spared us the worse. And she's moved up in the world since, eh? Governess-General. A balm on everyone's soul that."

"Her whelp of a nephew's governor now," Albert said. "He did fine getting people out before Summer came, but too many still died. His aunt he is not."

"That's not on the boy," the old woman sharply said. "That's because a villain is queen. Ma always said that makes you cursed. Just look at the Wasteland."

"Your mother also said a bowl of cream and bread crumbs would keep the fairies happy, Mary," the old man mocked. "How'd that go again?"

The three of them sat awkwardly as the old couple argued loudly, Iason deriving some satisfaction from the fact that Lergo looked as uncomfortable as he felt himself.

"I couldn't help but notice the portraits by the kitchen door," Amelia intervened. "You have children?"

Gods they had they been lucky to run into her, Iason thought. And not only because looking at her when they trekked through the countryside made the journey a great deal more pleasant. Neither he nor the Red Mage had a way with people.

"Only the one now," Mary soberly said. "Our youngest died at First Llesse. Them devils summoned by the Diabolist did it."

"Aye, and the Black Queen killed her dead," Albert grunted. "She's a hard one, make no mistake, but these are bad times. Hard is what we need. Even Jehan the Wise hung himself some princes. Seven and one, like in the song."

"It's ungodly is what it is," the old woman barked. "A villain queen? No good will come of it."

"She was crowned by a Sister all proper, Mary," the old man insisted. "What more can you ask?"

"Everyone knows the House up north went tame," she sniffed.

"We've heard a lot about the queen, down south," Iason said. "Some of it was less than pleasant."

"Never said she was a choir girl," Albert defended. "But Hells, it's still better than Procer ain't it? Kingdom's back and Praes is playing nice. If the rest of the world would just leave us alone we'd muddle on just fine."

"He has to say that," Mary told them. "Lily went and joined the army, the fool girl. Taking orders from an orc calling herself marshal of all things."

"If the orc pays her taxes and fights at the border, I say she's welcome here," the old man said stubbornly. "A whole goblin tribe settled at Marchford and that turned out all right. You have to forgive Mary, she's a country girl. I'm a learned man, me. Went to Laure once when I was a boy."

"Not the Laure story again," the old woman sighed.

Lergo spoke up, sparing them the Laure story, and Iason had never before been so close to feeling fondness for the man.

"We intend on travelling north," the Red Mage said. "Are the roads safe?"

"Sure, if-" Albert began, but he paused.

In the distance, bells were ringing. Four times, Iason counted.

"Again?" the old man said.

"Last one went straight to the Blessed Isle, made it far inland after," Mary said. "Guess that was the last of the clever bunch."

"That's thrice now," Albert complained. "Last time it took all day to clean up the docks after. No wonder we never get clients, with all them foreigners mucking up the city."

He paused, then glanced at the three heroes.

"No offence," he assured them.

"None taken," the Gallant Brigand lied. "We're new to town, so I'm at a bit of a loss. What did the bells mean?"

"Oh, you dears don't need to worry," the old woman said. "Just stay indoors, it was the curfew bells. It'll be foggy out soon anyway."

"Curfew?" Iason said. "What for?"

"Heroes," Albert said. "Some must have come. Streets have to be cleared until that's done with."

The Stalwart Paladin's blood ran cold. Already? How could the Empire possibly have known? It hadn't even been a whole day. The three heroes shared a look and excused themselves to their rooms, telling their hosts of travel weariness, and made council in Iason's own.

"We can't stay here," Amelia began. "We can't risk putting those two in the middle of a fight between Named."

"They must have scried us, it's the only explanation," the Red Mage whispered. "That shouldn't be possible, not with the Paladin bearing Heaven's touch. Unless you screwed up, Iason."

"I don't use the touch, mage," the Paladin coldly replied. "It is there. Always. There is no intent needed."

"I used to hunt for Helike supply caches, back in the day," the Gallant Brigand said quietly. "Easy work, good loot. The way I'd find them was by watching the roads the Tyrant's men used most, then doubling back."

"I don't follow," Iason admitted.

"That is because you're a sword-waving simpleton," the Red Mage drawled, and the Paladin resisted the urge to punch that twinkle out of his eye. "The touch, it blocks actual scrying but the spell would still register failure. They moment it did they must have known we were coming, and they tracked us with the same. That's impressively clever, I'll admit."

"Then they might be able to track us to here," Amelia urgently said. "We need to move now."

Neither of them argued. Iason left silver by his bed to pay for both the night and the trouble, as his companions grabbed their personal affairs. The Mage took longer, and returned decked in red silks.

"We are trying to be discreet," the Paladin hissed, his accent thickening.

"Discreet is over," the man shrugged. "Now is the time for panache."

"Well, I hope you can run in those," the Gallant amusedly said, adjusting her hat. "Out the window, boys."

Heroic work, Iason thought, involved a lot more jumping down windowsills than he'd anticipated. He'd not needed to change, as he'd never taken off the chain mail under his coat and rarely wore a helmet. The Heavens provided armour when he required it. He landed as silently as a man wearing over twenty pounds of steel could, which was not very. The Gallant landed smoothly as a cat, and the Red Mage nearly broke his ankle landing. The Paladin smothered a smile, as it was unkind to take enjoyment from the misfortune of others. However richly deserved.

"Well," Amelia said, lowering the brim of her hat. "There's that fog Mary was talking about."

It'd been late afternoon and the winters in southern Callow were mild this late in the year – spring would not come for months yet but there was no snow in sight – which made the sudden appearance of thick fog rather jarring. There was nothing natural about this.

"Might I suggest we leave the city before a full legion comes after us?" Lergo suggested drily. "Blood doesn't show on these robes but it does smell."

"Keep an eye out," Iason said, for the first since he'd come ashore back in his element. "As an opening move, this only makes sense if only our vision is restricted."

Otherwise the enemy was simply helping them escape. As the moved quietly through the streets, the Paladin wondered how many of the Woe would have come. The full five? That might be more than they could handle. Two or three, he was confident they could deal with. Four they could flee. Five with a sorcerer as reportedly powerful as the Hierophant among them would be too many. Best that they never encounter the enemy at all, and disappear into the countryside where they would be harder to track. Amelia suddenly stopped.

"We're being watched," the Gallant Brigand said.

He did not question her: she has an aspect relating to this, though he knew not the word. Iason could see no one so he sharpened his hearing. Scuttling above, on the rooftops.

"Goblin," he said, and unsheathed his longsword. "Roof to the left."

The Gallant followed suit with her sabre and the Red Mage fell behind them. Eyes watching above, Iason saw a leering green face pop out from thatching. Yellow eyes shone bright in the fog, above a grin of needle-like fangs.

"Don't you think it was a little racist to assume I was a goblin?" the creature mused. "Plenty of people use rooftops, you know. They're like streets that make it easier to murder."

The Stalwart Paladin blinked, then opened his mouth. Had he – but the goblin had just said... He closed his mouth.

"You're quite brave, to seek out three heroes on your own," the Red Mage said.

"Well, we don't live old as a rule," the greenskin said. "But hey, that's why there's a lot of us."

Iason's hearing was still sharpened and that was why he heard them move. Not one but dozens, and they'd all struck at once. He'd expected crossbows but instead what came tumbling down was balls of clay with lit fuses, and without missing a beat he called on the protection of the Heavens. A halo of light wreathed him and his allies as well, but he'd miscalculated. The munitions exploded into blinding brightness with a deafening clap – he had to blink it away and force the Light into his eyes. The Red Mage cursed, and when Iason's vision returned there was no sign of any goblins. All they had left behind was a red trail of burning powder in the sky. They marked our position, he thought. He glanced at the others. Amelia had covered her eyes with the brim of her hat, but by the looks of it the noise had still affected her.

"Run," he said, not sure how loud he was being.

The roar of the munitions was still sounding in his ears. The others understood him well enough to obey, and they headed for the closets gate without even the pretence of discretion. Dormer had turned into a ghost town, every door and window closed. In the fog, he could barely make out the shape of the houses unless he empowered his eyes with his Name. It began clearing out close to the gate. Whoever had done this, he thought, must have relied on the river to provide the water. Lucky them, they'd chosen the gate opposite. Providence. The gate was unguarded, and that was when he began doubting his last thought. No, he mused. Not unguarded. There were two people by the guardhouse. One seated on a bench, the other standing by it. Iason squinted. It was a woman, seated. Tan skin and high cheekbones, long hair in a practical leather binding behind her. Her legs were crossed and she was pulling at a pipe. The man at her side was almost inhumanly slender, a whip of a body in a long black tunic. At his hip was a sheathless sword, and one of his eyes was covered by a dark silken blindfold with silvery lettering. It was the hair that attracted his attention, though. It must have been a trick of the light, but for an instant it had seemed made of crow's feathers.

"Iason," the Gallant Brigand urgently said. "The woman's cloak."

He looked. It must have once been entirely black, he thought, but it was no longer. A patchwork of colourful strips had been woven over it, and even some matter he did not recognized. It looked like rippling wind. The collar, though, what laid woven into it felt like a sin. That made this the Mantle of Woe, and the woman wearing it...

"Catherine Foundling," he said. "The Black Queen."

The woman spewed out a stream of smoke, still sitting. Iason met her eyes. For one of her reputation, he was distinctly unimpressed. There was no pressure there, only a young woman looking vaguely exhausted.

"Afternoon," the Black Queen said. "Welcome to the Kingdom of Callow, folks. Evidently you know who I am, so that saves us some tediousness."

"Your trap will avail you nothing," Iason said harshly.

"This isn't a trap," the villain mused. "Not unless you make it one. If I wanted you dead, Robber wouldn't have tumbled you a warning shot. It would have been goblinfire instead of brightsticks, and already it'd all be over but the screaming."

"How civilized of you," the Gallant Brigand said, her tone slightly mocking. "Since we're all being so friendly, might I venture as to ask what you want from us?"

The Black Queen spewed out a stream of smoke, studying them calmly.

"That's my line," she said. "Setting aside that you passed the border illegally, having three heavily-armed Named wandering the countryside without so much as a by-your-leave just isn't in the cards. What are you here for?"

"Introductions first," the Gallant demurred. "I am-"

"Amelia of Helike, daughter of Lasarn," the one-eyed man at her side smiled, teeth like ivory. "You are known to us."

Amelia blanched. The way he'd spoken that last sentence... Iason was not one to frighten easily, yet it had sent a shiver down his spine.

"That's Larat," the Black Queen cheerfully said. "Or at least that's what I call him. It pisses him off a lot, but why even have a treacherous lieutenant if you're not going to taunt them at every opportunity?"

"We have come to study the aftermath of the fae incursion, Your Majesty," Lergo said. "Purely academic curiosity in my part, I assure you."

The lie sat ill with Iason, but he kept his mouth shut. Informing the woman that they had come to slay her and release Callow from her grasp would lead to a struggle he was not certain they could win. Not yet. The Black Queen pulled at her pipe, then sighed.

"Red Mage, was it?" she said. "A warning for you. Of all the shit decisions you've made today, trying to lie to me is close to the top of the list. Don't do it again. I take it you're here to kill me, then."

It was a little insulting, Iason thought, that she sounded more irritated than threatened by that deduction. Arrogance was ever the downfall of Evil, he reminded himself. She spewed out another mouthful of smoke.

"Then what?" she asked.

"Pardon," Lergo replied, sounding baffled.

"You kill me, glory to the Heavens and all that good stuff," she waved. "Then what?"

"The people of Callow are freed," Iason said. "They rise against the wicked Praesi and-"

"This," the Black Queen sighed as she interrupted, "is why I have to keep killing you people. Look, I understand better than anyone how easy it is to start thinking you can just stab your way out of a mess, but you haven't thought this through. Putting my head on a pike just makes a different sort of mess."

"That's what tyrants always say," the Gallant quietly said. "That they may be a plague, but the world would be worse without them. You have to lance a wound for it to be able heal."

"You're not lancing anything, kid," the villain said. "You're just bleeding the body. And it's been a long time since anyone thought that helped. Look, I'm not barring Callow to heroes. You want to wander the south healing and rebuilding? Fine by me. You get a Legion escort, but they'll stay out of your way. You want to have a swing at Black? Not my problem, but you'll have to get to the Vales through Procer. You want to actually have a look at the fae marks, or even Liesse? I'll need oaths as assurance, but we can deal. This doesn't have to be a fight."

She paused.

"But," she murmured. "Since I know what you're thinking. Larat."

The one-eyed man's grin broadened, and power rippled across the street. The air cooled, and Iason almost summoned his Heavenly Armaments in answer. There was might in that creature's frame, and nothing human about it.

"We've been tracking you since Mercantis," the Queen said. "We've had long enough we could have hit you still in the river. Do you know why you were allowed to make shore?"

"I assume some form of sadism is involved," the Red Made drawled.

"In a manner of speaking," the villain smiled. "See, I learned from a man that would have had you corpses at the bottom of the Hwaerte before you even noticed. But I'm trying, I guess, not to be him. Or worse."

Slowly she rose to her feet, and emptied the pipe before stewing it away in her cloak. The smile and the easy manners went away. Idly she rested her hand on the pommel of her sword, and Iason felt fear. There was iron in that woman's gaze that had not been there before.

"You've seen I'm prepared," Catherine Foundling said. "You've seen I have the muscle to put you down. But I didn't put on the fancy hat to kill kids. So please, I beg you – don't make me."

It sounded genuine enough that the Paladin hesitated. The sentiment that they were kids to her was insulting, but what lay behind it... The wiles of devils are many and varied. Trust not the words of those sworn to Below, for deception is their truest tongue. He would not balk at his duty.

"Go home," the Black Queen said tiredly. "Or Hells, join up if you want to. I'll find something for you to do, this country's still half a wreck and it's not like I don't take in heroes. But if you force this, it only ends one way. And once we start, I might not be able to stop."

"You are a blight upon Creation," the Stalwart Paladin said, almost regretfully. "An instrument of the Hellgods, carrying within the seed of damnation. May the Heavens grant you mercy in the afterlife, but for the sake of Creation you must be removed from this earthly shell."

"What he said," the Gallant Brigand agreed. "Only, you know, less priestly. Fuck you and your offer and your entire evil legions."

"Yes yes, praise the Heavens and much defiance. That aside, out of curiosity," the Red Mage smirked, "has that speech ever actually worked?"

The Black Queen breathed out, and in a moment she went from tired girl only a few years older than them to razor-sharp killer. It was in the eyes, in the way she held herself. She had the poise of someone used to taking lives.

"No," she said. "But I'll try with the next batch anyway. Sixth time's the charm, right?"

The one-eyed creature laughed.

"They never listen," he said, sounding pleased. "I do believe offering mercy might actually make it worse. Fascinating."

Six. Iason felt a trickle of fear go down his spine. How many heroes had she killed? No, it didn't matter. She only needed to fail once. The hero folded into himself, and let his aspect reverberate within his soul. Arm. Plate of pure Light formed around him, a full suit topped by a winged helmet. His sword shone radiantly and as Lergo began to incant he advanced. The villain did not move, eyes still on him, but the Paladin felt the shifting currents of power. To their side a gate opened out of thin air, and as he glanced there Iason saw two things. The first was two score goblins, bright-eyed and eager in their furs as they occupied a frozen wasteland. The second was six scorpion-like contraptions of wood and metal, and as that sunk in they began to fire. The bolt hit him in the chest, then two others, yet it might as well have been children throwing mud at a stone wall. The steel bent, the wood shattered and he barely even felt the impact. He had no moment to spare enjoying the small victory, however. The Red Mage was most endangered by this sort of assault. Though gifted with a particularly strong talent for destruction, Lergo had confessed he was incapable of even the most basic of shieldings. The sorcerer managed to save his own hide by turning to ash the handful of projectiles aimed at him, but he would not be able to keep this up forever.

The Stalwart Paladin moved between his companion and the volleys of steel-tipped bolts, letting them strike impotently at the armaments bestowed upon him by the Heavens. The Gallant had been the most unruffled among them, dancing out of the way and somehow even parrying a projectile with a casual flick of the wrist.

"I'll break the machines," Iason said, and his voice thundered. "Keep the villains busy."

Though the Black Queen had caught them by surprise, she'd been arrogant. With only one creature and mundane soldiers at her disposal, it might be feasible to slay her here and now. To free Callow of tyranny within a day of coming to its shore would be a grand deed, worthy of hymns and remembrance. Yet if the tide turned against them, the Paladin would rather see them defeated before they fled. It would be the beginning of a Pattern of Three, he suspected, and that would greatly enhance the swiftness of their growth. Indeed, they might even encounter another hero after they fled. Providence had a way of rewarding the righteous. To Iason's mild irritation, the goblins manning the siege engines proved passingly clever. Seeing that their bolts had no effect on his armour as he advanced, they turned their fire to his companions. Some sorcery must be behind the machines, he thought, for there could be no other explanation for how swiftly they kept firing. No matter. He was quick enough on his feet that only the odd bolt made it through. Clever as the goblins were, they'd not been quite clever enough to flee his approach.

Iason crossed the gate into the frozen landscape and raised his sword the moment he felt the bite of urgency near his shoulder. It was not quite enough, the angle too awkward. A blade shattered his pauldron of Light and ripped into the chain mail below, though not deep enough to wound, and the Paladin breathed in sharply. A tall orc decked in burnt plate discarded a broken axe and spun out another, face grim. The hand of bare bones gave away the name of the greenskin that had struck him. The orc spat to the side.

"Masego will be pissed," he said. "Half a day's work and it kept for a single blow. At least you're not reforming."

Iason grit his teeth. The Heavenly Armaments did have that weakness – they could only be used once a day, and could not be forged anew while in use.

"You will not land another," the Paladin promised.

The orc's eyes were on his mail, not his blade, and they narrowed. The heraldry, Iason realized. It'd been made visible by the rip.

"Half-House, le Miroir Verdant," the greenskin said in lightly accented Chantant. "Proceran, then. Good, I've been meaning to try one of you out before the big Names come."

"I am the Stalwart Paladin," Iason thundered. "And you will lose more than a hand today, orc."

"I'm the Adjutant," Hakram Deadhand replied, baring his teeth. "I had a light meal this morning."

They both moved with the swiftness of Named, tangling halfway there. Iason managed to hammer down on the orc's wrist, loosening the greenskin's grip on the axe, but the dead hand closed around his throat. The bones blackened as the Light furiously bit into them, but they did not give and Iason struggled in vain before the Adjutant tossed him back out the portal. He landed in a crouch, shifting his weight as his fighting-master had taught him. The orc rolled his shoulders and strolled out of the gate unhurriedly.

"Iason," the Gallant screamed.

It felt like being kicked by a horse. The entire left side of his armaments shattered under the blow and as he flew he felt the Black Queen following with impossible swiftness. She arrived at the end of the arc before he did, snatching his foot and smashing him into the pavement. He saw her change her grip as she stood above him, ready to plunge down the point into his throat even as he tried to rise, but salvation came in time: a streak of red lightning had the villain ducking away in a hurry. The sorcerer had come through, thank the Gods. The Paladin got to his feet and took a swift look around as the Black Queen circled him slowly. Deadhand was now tangling with Amelia, and though he'd yet to land one of his brutal blows she was on the backfoot. Looking for an opening, he decided. It was not a bad match. The other conflict was. Lergo was weaving spells into one another admirably, flame and lightning and hexes flowing into the next seamlessly, but the one-eyed fae was toying with him. There were three cuts on the Red Mage's cheek, perfectly parallel and scabbed black. Iason suspected they might have been killing blows, if the fae wished it so. He needed to lose Foundling soon and come to the sorcerer's aid, or he was going to get run through when the creature bored of the game. This was no time to hold back.

"Smite," the Stalwart Paladin said.

The Black Queen attempted to avoid the aspect, but she was too slow. Light came down from above a perfect a perfect heptagon of seven feet on every stroke. For a moment the shape seemed almost solid, the wrath of the Heavens shattering the paving stones and even the ground beneath. A heartbeat later it was gone, leaving the half-kneeling form of a smoking villain. Her face was a tapestry of burned flesh, her hair gone up in smoke and her bare hands crushed. Her eyes were unseeing, struck blind by righteous retribution. The villain spat out a gob of black blood that steamed and ate away at the earth.

"You have William beat when it comes to impact," the woman noted, her voice a croak yet somehow cold.

She rose, and as she did the air cooled and her flesh knitted back. She shed the burnt skin like a snake, and her pupils broke as fresh ones forced themselves forward.

"As a general rule, striking aspects tend to go one of two ways," the Black Queen said, voice empty of emotion. "Broad but shallow, small but deep. I would not have walked off Swing so easily. A nice trick, but ultimately-"

"Smite," he interrupted.

She was standing again, which meant resuming the fight was not longer unchivalrous. There was a heartbeat between the Light striking and the word being spoken, and it was enough for her to evade.

"Ultimately still a trick," she finished, as the smiting struck the empty pavement.

Only once more could he call on the aspect. He would have to get in close, prevent her from evading and... No, he thought. He was being baited. She was keeping him busy while her minions killed the others. Though it grated, Iason turned and without a word ran for the Red Mage.

"Hakram," the Black Queen said, voice echoing strangely. "Switch."

The orc moved away from Amelia without missing a beat, barrelling towards the Paladin immediately. From the corner of his eye he saw the human villain pass them both in a streak, blade sounding against the Gallant Brigand's own. Lergo cried out in pain, his incantation interrupted, and Iason's fingers clenched around his sword. It was not all lost, he thought. The Adjutant was much slower than his mistress. The axehead came whistling down but Iason's blade shifted angle, the combination of years of training and what he'd learned since coming into his Name. The Heavens-touched steel cut straight through the haft of wood and into the steel pauldron behind it. The orc began to retreat, and then the Paladin spoke.

"Smite."

Light filled his vision, but it was no harm to him. He felt the orc's body flinch but somehow it remained standing. Though the greenskin's footing was shot, so was his, and aside from smoking skin and amour the orc seemed unharmed when the aspect ebbed. And aspect of his own had been used, the Paladin suspected. There was the taste of power in the air. It was not enough. Iason ripped his blade free and smashed the guard in the orc's face, knocking him clear of his feet. His Light-girded boot came down and broke the villain's knee. That should cripple him for the rest of the fight. The greenskin struck out with a knife but Iason fluidly stepped back. Leaf Stirred By Hand, his master had called it, and when the knife withdrew he stepped forward following it. The blade whistled down, the orc bared his fangs and another blade knocked the killing blow away.

"You will not have him," the Black Queen said, something sharp and heavy in her tone.

She frowned, and shook her head. Something in her eyes thawed measurably as she grimaced.

"Ever grasping is the tyrant's lot," Iason replied in Chantant.

"What's he saying?" the woman asked. "My Chantant's shit, and his accent is horrible."

"He called you a tyrant," the orc said.

"Wouldn't be the first," the Black Queen grimly said, parrying his blow and landing a riposte that failed to break through the Armaments.

He was pushed back, to his fury. Years he had trained for this, gruelling hours spent in the cloister's courtyard being worked to exhaustion by his fighting-master. He'd learned the Five Ways and the Verdant Stances, been taught how to dismantle the foremost styles of every nation under the Calernian sun. But the Queen wasn't fighting like a swordswoman. Whatever she had learned, it was no proper swordsmanship. She ignored his feint and pivoted around his back, her elbow hitting his flank and breaking his footing. He pivoted to face her but she'd moved with him and he had to give ground to avoid an oblique blow that would have carved through his throat. Iason gave further ground. Staying close, he would only get caught in her pace. It was then he realized that he could no longer hear the Red Mage fighting. He looked back and saw no sign of Lergo, or of his opponent. The air where they'd been fighting reeked of power and darkness. Gods, this was turning out too much for them. They had not been heroes long enough, none of them even had their full aspects.

"Cut," the Gallant Brigand coldly announced.

She emerged out of thin air behind the Black Queen, aspect howling as her blade carved clean through the villain's abdomen. She'd... done it? Then the woman's silhouette dispersed, and Iason realized they'd been had. Glamour, he realized with a shiver of fear. That was glamour. He rushed forward but it was too late. Amelia almost managed to avoid the blow out of sheer instinct, but goblin steel ripped through her coat and muscles. Her left arm fell down limply, and even as she caught her sabre with the other one the Black Queen caught her by the back of the neck and squeezed. There was a sickening crack, and just like that Amelia was dead. There was not so much as a flicker of emotion on the villain's face, he saw. Not a speck of humanity to be found. Just ice and hatred wearing a body. Her silhouette blurred for what must not even have been a heartbeat, and Iason pushed through the grief. Glamour again, and he could not see through it. He stepped back warily, and the impotence of it burned. Sharpening his ears found nothing, she was stepping lightly and her illusion advancing towards him. He needed to see, he needed to find her, he needed to...

Discern.

Power rippled through the Paladin's frame washing him clear of tiredness and pain and the weakness of the flesh. This was more than mere sight, he knew instinctively. It would tell truth from lies, read the movements of the flesh before they came to fruition. He could see her now, wreathed in mirror-like mist. She was stalking his side, eyes patient.

"Enough," he snarled. "You will not get away with this, butcher."

He caught her by surprise, striking without warning. He glimpsed the parry before it ever rose, flicked his blade to the side and cut into her shoulder. She wove back, her footing swift, but his Light-gauntleted hand struck her across the mouth. He headbutted his winged helmet but came off the loser for it, forehead bleeding as he returned in kind and she rocked back in pain. His fist caught her in the stomach and she gasped. His blade shone radiantly as it scored a deep cut across her upper leg, but somehow the cutting of her muscles was not enough to make her fall. Fingers coated in frost and shadow slugged into his cheek, shattering the Light, and the two of them fell to the ground struggling. Using his weight to come atop her, he caught her wrist and dug his finger into her eye. She bit him, down to the bloody bone, and he snatched his hand back before he could lose the finger. She struggled under him but he was much heavier, and his fist broke her chin before she could wrestle away his arm. He'd felt teeth loosen. Forcing her arm aside his fingers closed around her throat, and suddenly she smiled.

The knife went ripped through the mail as Adjutant struck into his flank. Iason was thrown off the Black Queen by hundreds of pounds of angry orc, as as he hit the ground the world slowed. Light wreathed him, but still soft fingers touched his forehead.

The Stalwart Paladin closed his eyes, and opened them in an endless spread of pale blankness.

You will bleed, a chorus of voices whispered into his ear. You will suffer. You will weep, yet find no relief. Though your soul is young and your weight feeble, you will take on the burden of many. Iason, son of Idrim, We offer you the misery of Endurance. We would embrace you one of our own, to blood and tears and bitter end. Iason Brightsword, Son of Tears, will you withstand horror so that others do not?

"Yes," Iason whispered into the void.

The blankness rippled, and he was no longer alone. Two silhouettes with burning eyes and unspeakable shapes stood before him. And another, between him and them.

"There will be none of that," Catherine Foundling sharply said.

You do not belong here.

The weight of their wrath was crushing, almost enough that Iason fell to his knees and it was not him they gaze upon in anger. Yet the Black Queen stood undaunted, cloaked in ice and shadows. And more. There was a silhouette riding her back, arms laced around her shoulders. A beautiful and dark-skinned woman.

"I already told the Hashmallim to walk it off," she said. "Am I really going to have to revisit this with every fucking Choir?"

Arrogance. Your doom comes.

"Might be," she said. "But not today, and not through this weak instrument. Fuck off, you bottom feeders. This one's been claimed fair and square."

"You can't fight angels," Iason hissed.

"Who said anything about fighting them?" Catherine Foundling said, and then she rammed a knife in his belly.

The blankness fled, Iason's eyes opened and the last thing he ever felt was a spike of frost going through his forehead.

---

erraticerrata

And so Book IV starts!

As this is the first update since I returned, the monthly extra chapter comes out tonight as well. Titled "Prosecution II", it's the continuation of the last.

Mingdao

Hey there!

I love your stories and was wondering if I could help as your editor, helping you clean up any typos or errors after/before you had posted. I would love to be able to hear from you if you're up for such a thing to further discuss the details.

Cheers!

BartHumphries

Typo thread it is then:

they headed for the closets gate
Change closets to closest

Mingdao, I think erraticerrata doesn't care so much about typos – generally post post them in the comments and sometimes they get fixed. *shrug*

There's usually not too many.

Sitxar

Typos:

Yet if the tide turned against them, the Paladin would rather see them defeated before THE fled.

Indeed, THE might even encounter another hero after they fled.

they

they could only be used once_day

once per day

HE headbutted his winged helmet

she

Nairne .01

Thank you.

stevenneiman

I can see why it would get frustrating dealing with this kind of bullshit every other week. On the other hand, I have a definite guess as to what Cat's ultimate plan is. She's made it so that she already has a strong precedent for dealing with Heroes and with making it feel like all that's happening is the Heroes being annoying and irresponsible and inconveniencing everyone. At the same time, she's also trying to make sure that if the Heavens ever throw anyone smart enough to pose a serious threat against her, there's a good chance they'll recognize that she's being more reasonable than their own bosses. I'm curious to see whether it works.

DroughtBringer

Wow. Great opening fight scene, it's interesting to see the Woe's new role. They've really replaced the Calamities

morrogin

dude, u put a paragraph twice....

aside from that, nice to have you back

glassgirlceci

I've been on pins and needles the whole month waiting, and it was certainly worth it! That was FANTASTIC.

Zarquon

YAY!

Naeddyr

Off to a great start!

I wonder what the specter on Catherine's shoulders is. The Empress? Feels unlikely.

Naeddyr

OH SHIT NO IT'S UBUA

soonnanandnaanssoon

I'm guessing it's part of her Role as the Diabolist, to rule over things foreign and to manipulate/cross/break boundaries, allowed her to cross into the dimensional space the Angels were contacting the Hero in due to the fact their intervention brought them close enough to Catherine.

glassgirlceci

Ubuu? Is that a fan nickname for Akua I've never seen? That can't be a typo. 0_o

Hiccup

In an interlude(?) where Masego was the viewpoint, it showed when he was young and at a meeting. He met then immediately mis-remembered Akua's name, much to the delight of the Calamities listening on.

letouriste

you have to read the extra chapters!:) they are so great:) ubua comes from the chapter Prodigy which is my personal farourite to date, this is a story about young masego

sheer_falacy

Ubua was what Masego called Akua in his interlude because he didn't remember her name. It's a pretty great name for her.

Snoogle

I laughed really hard

AVR

Akua's woven into that cloak? Figures.

antonin

Six groups of heroes dead, that's got to be some good XP for the Woe to level up. I like how Catherine's name to be had her arms around her neck its really cute

oldschoolvillain

That wasn't her name, that was Akua's soul

RandomFan

Five, I believe. "Sixth time's the charm, right?" – the sixth speech, cat's hoping, will finally succeed. Unless there's other heroes who haven't gotten the speech?

Nairne .01

She probably started suffering from diminishing returns around the second or third group. A shame.

Zarquon

'Yet the Black Queen stood undaunted, cloaked in ice and shadows.
And more. There was a silhouette riding her back, arms laced around her shoulders. A beautiful and dark-skinned woman.'

I am so confused. Who is that?

oldschoolvillain

That's Akua's soul.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

This ship is sailing to the moon.

taliesinskye

I forget, was the Diabolist dark skinned? I suspect Catherine worked her soul into the collar of her cloak.

danh3107

She was literally Soninke, the dark skinned peoples from the northern part of the empire.

oldschoolvillain

Oh, shit – Catherine can raise the dead and retain their power. Does she have five parties of Heroes raised and held in thrall to her?

RoflCat

Would make sense with the “this one’s been claimed”

Nairne .01

So she will literally become a god and steal creation from under the eternal conflict between good and evil. And she will be worshipped by everyone who wants to make a difference and not just continue the pointless slaughter.

Raved Thrad

“Instead of a Dark Lord, you would have a queen, not dark but beautiful and terrible as the dawn! Tempestuous as the sea, and stronger than the foundations of the earth! All shall love me and despair!” 😊

burguulkodar

haha, it reminded me of Galadriel as well, although she wasn’t really of the freezing aspect.

NerfContessa

Sadly, no.

Though I would have loved that,
A light necromancer queen to the dead king.

Matthew Wells

Don’t post about future events.

Nairne .01

P.S That’s just an unlikely prediction of the future xD

I think the idea of her keeping the Names bound to the heroes that she brings back that way the God's Above slowly run out of Names they can use.

grzecho2222

Given that Cordelia's "Staircase" sound like something to bring army of heroes from heavens and Dead King's crush is coming from hells where are tons of villains that would make great pawns for her, I think accumulating undead heroes and villains to repel them is not a bad plan

letouriste

a shit plan you mean. you forgot cat is a villain right? the same kind of villain which has done things like that in the past and each times that blow up in their face? imagine a crowd of ex-named freeing themselves^^

grzecho2222

Dead King done this and this and somehow he is still kicking around, but also for unknown reason Cordelia is not a hero and Cat is Named and we seen how fights like that end

grzecho2222

Cat has way to drop people into places with gates and after she lets say drops the in Procer cities with order to kill all leaders what it matters if one of two break free. And versus Evil what they gonna do? Not smite it?

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh let's hope not. Seems like exactly the way she gets killed. Some corpse whispering hero "reminds" them what they are and they turn on her at the pivot. Black surely taught her better.

oldschoolvillain

The dead King has been doing it for centuries, and no crusade has even touched his true seat of power.

Quite Possibly A Cat

For every Dead King there is every other villain who tried something zany and promptly failed.

shieldredblog

It's not quite an invisible werewolf army though. Besides that more if villains depend on their schemes too much. Cat is more likely to use them as a carefully deployed shock troop than a hail mary.

BroadAxe

that wouldn't work, when ranger goes to visit the dead king he too has 2 former named under his command, but they are just that former named, that retained small bits of their power but they are not longer named or with the full power of that station, doubt cathrine would be able to do better than the dead king 😊

Aeon

The Black Queen returns! This was an awesome chapter to come back with. Can't wait to see where the story goes from here. I might just reread the whole thing now. Nice work!

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

To your right, you'll see crucified traitors and to your left, we have the graves of every hero that tried to assassinate me.

wirelessgrapes

And behind me are the undead thralls of the heroes who've tried to kill me. She says the Paladin's been *claimed*.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Graves in the symbolic sense.

tyizor

"And occasionally if they're impressive enough, we do mark their graves... with a number."

Nairne .01

If they warrant a rating to be remembered by.

hoyboy

Well, then. Who else wants to see Callow burn now?

The Bard did nothing wrong.

Mr. Nobody

Yep, I guess it's only you. Really funny how you seem to be rooting for the main character to die and the story to end. Well, it's not like there's anyone forcing you to read it, right?

letouriste

the bard promote stillness in this big chessboard...and stillness is the most boring part of any games of chess, any player try to disturb that to their advantage.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Host of Embers destroyed.
"Git gud u scrub!"

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

*points down*

cardboardsuperhero

I like to think that some children sneak out when the bells ring to try and see the battle, and that one of them grabbed Hakrams broken axe that he discarded, then grow up to repair and use it.

thespaceinvader

I'm pretty sure he was still in Arcadia when he discarded the axe, so that would be a trick.

naturalnuke

Kids a changeling obviously 🤪

cardboardsuperhero

I like to think that he threw it out of the portal when discarding it

Draconius Sinister

Exciting read! How do you manage to put in just enough fluff with new information that should mean absolutely nothing to us (Proceran sword-arts that are basically blade kung-fu? Sure!) and use it to make a throwaway character so meaningful?

I hope to see some Heroes being at least vaguely reasonable and take Catherine up on her offer somewhere down the line, or at least in repairing Callow before killing and deposing her. Would be nice to see Stupid Good go the way of the dinosaurs sometime soon.

hoyboy

Overthrowing and killing Catherine outright without attempt at negotiation and driving the occupying Praesi into the sea isn't the stupid good part. It's the not having a massive army at their back while they do it that's the stupid good part.

Rook

I don't think it has to do with the amount of power they're wielding to be honest. It's Stupid Good because they think about as far ahead as an ostrich burying its head in the dirt.

What happens if they win anyway? You killed the monarch of a country that just went through several wars and a genocide, with no clear line of succession as well as being sandwiched between two superpowers on the eve of a crusade. On top of that the remaining leadership is a patchwork blanket only barely held together by ties to said villainous tyrant – the one you just beheaded – and would likely be at each other's necks if left to their own devices. The standing army? You'd be lucky if they aligned with one of the factions sprouting up instead of just turning to banditry or abandoning the place to return to Praes.

So they kill the big bad villain for their hymns and ballads and five minutes of fame, while the newly liberated people of Callow get to starve or be killed by a major power struggle in their newfound 'freedom'.

It's stupid good because they're basically glorified butchers that know how to swing swords and hurl fireballs at whatever target they get pointed at, but as far as actually helping people or changing the big picture for the better they're useless. Sometimes worse than useless. Cordelia makes a better hero than they do and she doesn't even have a Name.

Jago

None of them was Callowan, so they have little reason to care for the nation.
They see Good as superior to the good of Callow.

hoyboy

Is this supposed to be a problem?

Countries being shitholes caught up in politics isn't a problem that can be solved by people. Expecting the heroes to save Callow, change it's diaper and tuck it into bed is setting them up to fail. Whereas Callow becoming a police state led by an inhuman maniac is definitely a problem that can be solved by them. The world is most likely better off with Callow either smashed to pieces or reduced to an impotent client state rather than it being allowed to become the weapon of a Catherine or a Black.

The big picture isn't actually Callow. Callow is already fucked and there's not much that can be done about it, and the best that can be done is making sure that Callow doesn't give rise to the next insane monster tyrant that Cat is blatantly becoming.

It's about bloody time for Practical Good to take the field.

shieldredblog

I would say that the Bard is Practical Good. That's how she's stayed alive so long by spending other heroes' lives like pennies. I imagine if it's even possible for other heroes to be practical she murders them to retain her edge.

And why does everyone forget what a terrible terrible country Procer is? They have like the worst quality of life on the continent and live under squabbling nobles that consider them fodder for the fields and power struggles. For all her civic pride, even Cordelia herself has stated that she considers the average Proceran to be little more than an animal to be exploited to death.

Nairne .01

Spending other heroes' lives like pennies kind of strikes the "good" out of "Practical good".

shieldredblog

Meh, they all just go to heaven anyway. It's what they signed up for.

TeK

>Countries being shitholes caught up in politics isn't a problem that can be solved by people.
Wait, what? So we're screwed then? What's your answer then?
Give yourself to Jesus?

Insanenoodlyguy

Looking back at this, I wonder how you felt when in fact Catherine did at last encounter practical good. Not how you imagined I'm sure.

Nostradamus

"The world is most likely better off with Callow either smashed to pieces or reduced to an impotent client state rather than it being allowed to become the weapon of a Catherine or a Black."

Were I a Callowan, I'd be absolutely livid at this sort of mentality. You don't seem overly concerned about the fate of Callow or her people. Willing to condemn them to a life of endless war and destitution to achieve some "greater good" that you openly admit won't benefit them in the slightest.

Were I a Callowan, I'd say fuck the world and your greater good. Who are you bloody foreigners to invade my country, assassinate my leader, and blight my land with ever more war? For the everyday Callowan, Callow very much is the big picture. And it's because places like Procer share your opinion that they have grown to hate them as much as Praes. More so now that the Black Queen has curbed the bulk of Praesi bullshit.

No one's expecting the heroes to save Callow, change it's diaper, and tuck them into bed. But if they're gonna waltz into land that isn't theirs to stir up shit without giving a damn about the locals whose lives they'll be destroying then they can bugger off back to Procer or Ashur or wherever they bloody came from.

Viva Callow. Viva la Reina Negra.

grzecho2222

All hail Queen of Positivism!

Mr. Nobody

@hoyboy

I find it quite difficult for there to be a "Practical Good" when the Heavens give their names only to idiots. Not impossible, but it's kinda unlikely. Cordelia has much more chance than them and she is apparently having some talks with Catherine through Thief. And I don't think Cat will really play fair with the older heroes like she played with new ones who tried to assassinate her.

Author Unknown

I think the practical part comes from experience. Good seems to have a handicap there, without their colleges trying to kill them. Left with nothing but dogma as guidance they throw themselves at the nearest big bad, and we can all see how that ends.

werafdsaew

I think it has to do with the asymmetry between Good and Evil. Good cares about order and tradition, while Evil cares about freedom. So a Hero, especially one sworn to an angelic choir, have much less freedom to deviate than a Villain. You can see this in this chapter, when the Stalwart Paladin is seriously considering Catherine's words, his Name/choir intervened to set him towards conflict.

Zach

The problem is that the sort of heroes who would show up to kill her in the first place are going to be the ones who became Named due to some set of desires that would lead them to that in the first place. Named generally aren't the types of people who change their minds about things after they've set out to do them.

SMHF

There was a silhouette riding her back, arms laced around her shoulders. A beautiful and dark-skinned woman.

that u Triumphant?

Great to have this story back btw! 😊

Taichi22

No it's Patrick.

As Argentorum said – It's Akua, wrapped in her cloak.

Argentorum

"Seven and one, just like the stories."
Well. I think we know why Nightfall picked that number. Now I just wonder what he plans to do with the significance of those crowns. This entire story is just circles within circles.

Also AkuaxCat 4 lyfe.

---

There's an entire list of ways for Catherine to shortchange him: https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/8ajro7/seven\_crowns\_and\_one/

thespaceinvader

Easy enough: you just name your freshly minted currency Crowns, and give him eight of them.

:V

*boballab*

She doesn't have to short change him, the answer was probably given in the opening to Interlude: Commanders

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/08/30/interlude-commanders/>

Notice the name of the battle is the plural possessive of Prince, that means more than one Prince dies on that battlefield. The Principate is formed of multiple countries each ruled by a prince and each one is it's own crown. If Cat crushes the Principate and that is where the name of the battle comes from, then Cat can pay off real easy since their are enough Princes and their crowns in Procer for it.

---

Problem is that an ordinary fullfilment of the bargain would lead to the outcome that had Sulia so terrified. I meant the kind of options that would leave him with no subjects, nor any lands in Creation belonging to him.

Cayle

She just needs to scalp them.

Snowfire1224

But if he is sworn to her, then she benefits from that? Assuming that gives him a power up. Not sure.

Nairne .01

What if she first kills the Prince of Nightfall and then places his "crown" at his feet? Or better yet his whole head. Viola! We have Fae Dullahan.

shieldredblog

The problem with that plan is that he comes back. He has been dying and being reborn longer than Creation has been a thing.

Even if you SPENT him, like was alluded could actually kill Faerie, I would guess Winter/Arcadia would just create a new Prince of Nighfall. Way too many unknowns for that to be an actual plan.

quite possibly a cat

Giving one of the fae your crown eight times? The crown of your kingdom? I'm sure that won't backfire unpleasantly.

Soronel Haetir

I thought Nightfall's plan went down the drain with the unification of Summer and Winter. Isn't that why all the Fae swore themselves to Cat's banner at the end of the last book?

Metalshop

Welcome back. The new book is off to a great start.

Type

Well Akua is certainly has cat's back now. Just how she wanted it, though the situation may have been turned around a little.

d_o_l

Do we know what Choir that was? We've already done Contrition, and I'm guessing it wasn't Judgement since Hanno is their champion.

Ren

Endurance

---

Bard said that Judgement is the only Choir that follows a "one hero per Choir" rule. That was Endurance (which is supposed to be different from Fortitude? I know those are different virtues, but the attributes look too similar, if Bard mistaking William for a Fortitude hero is any indication).

*boballab*

William was Hero for the Choir of Contrition. that was why they called on Cat to Repent when they offered her the Crown to Callow,

---

And the first typo thread is a go!

> Everything about him smacked of arrogant privilege
Not sure if the word "smack" can be used like that.

> They would, to her.
Maybe better "it would", since the subject in the previous sentence is "the south".

> As the moved quietly through the streets
As they moved quietly through the streets

> Lucky them, they'd chosen the gate opposite.
Maybe the better order would be "Lucky them, they'd chosen the opposite gate."

> For one of her reputation, he was distinctly unimpressed.
The structure of this sentence only barely allows to notice that it's Iason being unimpressed and not Catherine.

> Purely academic curiosity in my part Isn't it "on my part"?

> emptied the pipe before stewing it away in her cloak emptied the pipe before stowing it away in her cloak

> Yes yes, praise the Heavens and much defiance.
Yes, yes, praise the Heavens and much defiance.

>The first was two score goblins
Probably "The first was two score of goblins"

> The Red Mage was most endangered by this sort of assault.
A clearer wording would be "The Red Mage was the one most endangered by this sort of assault"

> Yet if the tide turned against them, the Paladin would rather see them defeated before they fled.
Yet if the tide turned against them, the Paladin would rather see them defeated before they fled.

> Indeed, they might even encounter another hero after they fled.
Indeed, they might even encounter another hero after they fled.

> Some sorcery must be behind the machines Maybe better to use another tense: "Some sorcery must have been behind the machines" > or he was going to get run through when the creature bored of the game

Perhaps "or he was going to get run through when the creature got bored of the game"?

> Light came down from above a perfect a perfect heptagon of seven feet on every stroke Light came down from above, a perfect a perfect heptagon of seven feet on every stroke

> she was stepping lightly and her illusion advancing towards him she was stepping lightly and her illusion was advancing towards him

> He headbutted his winged helmet but came off the loser for it
She headbutted his winged helmet but came off the loser for it

> He glimpsed the parry before it ever rose Did you mean "He glimpsed the parry before it even rose"? English isn't my first language, I'm not sure whether that's a valid use of the word.

> as as he hit the ground the world slowed and as he hit the ground the world slowed > an opened them in an endless spread of pale blankness and opened them in an endless spread of pale blankness

---

I initially misread Akua's description as sitting on Catherine's shoulders to wear the mantle that is too big for either of them alone.

Rook

Misread or not I think it's kind of accurate. Really the mantle of queen isn't one Cat has the skill set to handle anyway. Hierarch wasn't wrong when he described her as ill suited for a throne.

Cat means well and has the right idea – cutting out the rot – but she's always been more of a breaker than a builder. She might become the sharpest scalpel in creation and do her job well, but it isn't enough alone. You need to stitch that wound up and let it heal after the disease is removed, and a scalpel is hardly a needle.

I honestly want to see Cordelia be to Cat what Malicia is to Black. She absolutely needs a counterpart that can navigate peacetime and a political battlefield in the long term, one that has the average people in mind rather than seeing them a sacrificial chaff to be ground up in a millstone between Good and Evil. As practical as the methods might be, none of the old guard are suitable. The Bard, Black, Malicia, all of them have that same flaw. The people are just a footnote for whatever bigger issue they think is the most important.

Nairne .01

Cordelia also sees the common people as little more than sidewalk shit (please excuse the expression).

---

Technically, in interlude Riposte where she said that, she was referring to how the warring princes saw their subjects. It's unclear whether she includes herself into that, or sees herself above such neglect.

Nairne .01

We will hopefully see in this book.

Mr. Nobody

I thought Anne Kendal was the one assigned to this kind of job when Cat made Anne her Governess-General.

Rook

Totally just my opinion on this one but I'm not sure Kendall will be enough considering the power imbalance. Malicia and Black are more or less partners on even footing, whereas Cat chose Kendall because she could be bent to her will if needed.

keldernael

The Lily daughter of the innkeepers must be the same that in the chapter 28 of the Book 2. She was seven years old there, if she recently engaged in the army of Callow, ten to twelve years must have passed. And Cat herself is thirty years old.

Mr. Nobody

"The marketplace in Dormer was thriving, for a city that'd been emptied and set aflame not even a year ago."

I'm pretty sure that the line above implies the time skip is not that long. I don't remember the 7 years old girl you mentioned having a brother.

Cordelia was in a hurry to assemble the rulers to make the Crusade against Praes, so it's hard to believe they waited ten years or more for that.

letouriste

lili is a pretty commun name,that doesn't ring a bell to be

Gunslinger

Seven hells, is this a welcome return. Quite an explosive start there. I kinda hoped the heroes would accept her deal but as the other commenters speculated they might be more amenable dead.

Highlight of the chapter was Cat giving no respect to the Choir.
> I already told the Hashmallim to walk it off," she said. "Am I really going to have to revisit this with every fucking Choir?"

Beautiful

Nairne .01

I love how this chapter shows how brain-dead the heroes are. Simple butchers and glory hounds.

boballab

That is because the fantasy trope has always been to end the Hero's story right after he kills the Villain, unless it's a serial then a new Villain arises to fight, so you basically never see what happens afterwards. Keep in mind the Hero's are nothing but tools to the Gods above to fill a spot in a story and it is never that person's story, it is the NAME's story. It was part of the rant Black had long ago about how some idiot farmer picks up a magic sword and the story lets him defeat a villain that trained for 25 years at swordsmanship (Though in this case Cat turned around on the Paladin, who had all those years of formal instruction where Cat didn't).

Nairne .01

That's why I love it :).

letouriste

of course she is better, the guy looked sheltered while her has been on several warground and is full of experience against other heroes.

in the first place, the pretty dance people call swordsmanship is useless in a real fight. every fighter learn the basics of their style and then use their surrounding and their fists/knees/head/whatever.

beleester

Or, you know, just people who don't take a tyrant at face value when they say that they're a necessary evil.

*Every tyrant a hero has ever toppled* has said that they're working for the greater good, and that they had perfectly good reasons for burning down cities, crucifying the resistance, and binding their enemies' souls into objects. Cat just happens to be correct when she says that.

beleester

Well, the heroes are certainly brain-dead for not getting their full Aspects before they came to pick a fight with the Woe, but I don't think they're wrong simply for disagreeing with Cat when she says she's a necessary evil.

---

I'll have to remind you that figuring out all his aspects and then going to fight Cat was how William limited his story to the rivalry with Cat, which automatically made it a tragedy. What the heroes did wrong was stuff like saying "alright, there's too many of them, we have to lose and flee to start the Pattern of Three", and then immediately charging in.

werafdsaew

Not true. The current Tyrant of Helike certainly won't say that he's a necessary evil.

LM

Hey all! Please remember to vote for A Practical Guide to Evil on topwebfiction so more people can find and read this awesome story! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

nimelennar

Come on, Cat, you need to offer a carrot with the stick.

Something like, "And then, when this country is strong enough to attend on its own again against Procer and Praes, THEN you can come into my house and we can discuss my leadership choices. Violently, if you prefer. Until then, start fixing things and stop trying to break the people who are already doing so."

Mr. Nobody

Well, I guess it's easier to just stab them and make them her Royal Guard.

Shoddi

My question is: How will she name them?

"First Volunteer", "Should Have Ducked", "A Dress Is Not Armour" and "Surprisingly A Bleeder" are descriptive, but kind of a mouthful when you need to quickly order them to do something.

Will she number them, or use a short one-word descriptor? For the Stalwart Paladin, I'd go with "Spike". Since that's the last thing running through his head.

Nairne .01

Smite or Smythe might be some good choices. But Wallie seems like the best bet since he had the choir of Endurance behind him.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Barrendur

Love from a verbose reader

Captain Amazing

After Catherine tries to convince the heroes I think their Names stopped them from listening with the abrupt dogmatic change in thoughts seen from the Paladen.

Nairne .01

I have been wondering about that as well. The hell gods seem like the sort to give free reins to people. The gods above though feel like they would love to enforce their vision through whatever means necessary, as shown with the way the choir of contrition tried to enslave people to a crusade.

grzecho2222

Below seems like "Imma gonna punch you until you punch back" type of people

---

The issue with the Gods Below, on the other hand, is the kind of people they give Names to. The core requirement to be a villain instead of a hero is to be willing to force one's will upon the others instead of supporting them, and that is reinforced later in all aspects of a villain's path, from the claimants' murderfests to the eventual violent demise. Where the Heavens seem to like a more hands-on approach (those thoughts in cursive seemed almost like somebody picking memories from Iason's mind to sway his decision), villains create their doom all by themselves.

shieldredblog

Also seen in Good nations love of rigid hierarchies. Evil nations are all "The crown belongs to he who takes it." Good nations are all "The Crown belongs to he who is divinely mandated, by arbitrary and complex system enforced by laws and blood."

hoyboy

I'll give you three guesses as to what mentality leads to stable civilization, and which does not.

shieldredblog

Stability has its pros and cons. Western civilization is very purposely unstable in some ways. It reduces corruption and abuse of power, It encourages innovation and efficiency.

hoyboy

The reductions of corruption and abuse of power in wester civilization are not the result of instability. Checks and balances on power, social safety nets, and massively more complicated legal systems represent the further cleansing of instability in our systems. If you want to see the results of what you think is healthy instability, look no further than the erosion of political systems by business interests, destruction of the environment and climate through corporate negligence, and ideologies that allow us to ignore massive inequalities in the name of "free markets".

There's no period in human history where people have benefitted from an unstable social order, all the modern things that you call freedom and assume are the result of instability are actually the result of a massive web of laws, systems, and institutions that protect you from being exploited or violated by people like Catherine or Black.

shieldredblog

By instability I meant different political parties working against each other (and theoretically new ones being created.) not lawlessness, which is obviously bad.

Vs China's one party system. Their government is entirely stable and becoming more so as they move closer to a direct dictatorship. Despite their stability they still have massive corruption and environmental problems.

taliesinskye

China's system isn't stable, much of the regime's policy has to be oriented around forestalling revolt. Buying off the public with very high rates of economic growth and organizing the world's largest secret police and censorship apparatus are necessary just to keep their own people from giving them the brutal deaths they so richly deserve. It's only a matter of time until there's a revolution or some sort of coup.

shieldredblog

The Communist Party is doing fine and will continue to do so as long as they can provide a decent life for the majority of their population. Politically there is no credible threat to the Communist party. None. The real danger is economic instability.

taliesinskye

Yes, if the communist party falls it won't be in one of their rigged elections where nobody else is allowed to run, it'll be because they've all been killed.

papapok13

Finally, up to date with the course! It was a long binge reading session, but all seconds worth it. Thrilled to join you for the rest of the journey!

papapok13

"why even have a treacherous lieutenant if you're not going to taunt them at every opportunity?"

I can't believe, this bit wasn't said by a Dread Emperor/Empress. So villainous, it'd easily pass as a chapter opening quote.

grzecho2222

Who said it isn't being said by Empress?

Nairne .01

Actually, I vaguely remember something similar in one of the quotes. My memory might be playing tricks on me though.

Darkening

There's a bit about not offering to make the hero your new lieutenant while your lieutenant is in the room? Not sure about other mentions.

Sieral

Surprising how even newbie heroes can take swings at the big players and hold their own for a time. I was astonished this wasn't a complete curbstomp.

Parker

That's because creation is ALWAYS stacked on the side of good. Nothing major, just that anything that is left to chance tends to swing in favor of "good". That's why Black is so good at killing heroes, he leaves nothing to chance and places them in certain death traps.

Nikith Veluru

Sweet, I guess Cat has a stand now.

rdk

Well, she is a Killer Queen.

『
『

』
』

burdi

still waiting for cat new Name

Raved Thrad

I'm starting to think Catherine's new Name should be "Trap," as in "It's a trap!" It's like everyone who encounters her somehow underestimates her in one way or another. I still remember the Duchess of Daoine thinking of her as a monstrous child – monster, sure, but child still, nonetheless, despite all her accomplishments. Even here, faced with goblins and a fae, the Paladin couldn't stop to think of her as "girl" or "woman just slightly older than me."

I'm really hoping Robber manages to get (or steal or usurp?) a Name for himself. He's one of my favorite characters, and I'd hate for the maniacal little shit to die just because he bit off more than he could chew alone.

Snowfire1224

Yes! It's back. I can't wait for the first chapter

Cap'n Smurfy

I love how arrogant Paladin is in his thoughts without ever realising it. He accuses Catherine of conceit and thinks about how villains are always arrogant, but simultaneously thinks they could take 3 or 4 of the World. None of them even have full aspects and they know at least 4 hero parties have already lost.

Shawn Panzegraf

Been thinking about something, I don't necessarily think that Catherine is "better" in her mechanical modus operandi than Black, simply less experienced. Black's the pragmatic sort. I can absolutely see him doing the "I'd really rather not slaughter your merry band. Why don't you all go do something heroic for the common folks and just let us be?" speech Cat just gave when he'd only been the Black Knight for a eighteen months.

As Nightfall observed "I think offering mercy actually makes things worse. Fascinating." Around about the tenth band of small fry, it's going to occur to Cat (As it likely did to Black long ago) that NO Hero is EVER going to be talked down. It's like trying to talk down a true believer of a suicide bomber. It doesn't work, so your plan needs to be about containing the blast.

I also think that Black having seen what a “Big Name” Hero or band of Heroes can do when they build momentum is a tremendous part of his “Give them absolutely no chance for conflict. Just end their lives with extreme prejudice in whatever manner possible” methodology.

Cat’s going to get there. Then turn around and realize just how much her life forces her to continue being like Black in a LOT of ways. They may have some interesting differences, but the mechanics of their reality will only allow so much deviation.

shieldredblog

Well, she did turn Thief. So it may take awhile before she becomes too callous.

vuthuha912

And Black is a Praesi, giving any highborn mercy means you are expecting a knife in the back at the end of the tunnel. Black can negotiate – like when Captain thinks she can convince him to drop the conflict if the hero goes home. He negotiates with the rebels just fine. He even negotiated with Malicia in regard to Trueblood when they clearly deserve to get their power taken away. Letting them live for another day means they can build their bases, and plot their way to the destruction of both sides. How many times have they fuck the Empress and Black over just for some short-term power grab? See how well sparing them turns out for everybody 40 years later. You can only try so many times before you stop.

DroughtBringer

I mean, Thief was a Hero, and it worked. I hope that Cat never reaches the level where she gives up on it. She can always work with the heroes that show up, or attempt to, and it really doesn’t cost her much (as of yet) so I would like to see Cat keep up with the talking.

Hiccup

Does anyone remember what Larat’s official title is as a Fae Noble? I forgot.

shieldredblog

Prince of Nightfall

Shawn Panzegraf

Prince of Nightfall, AKA Ranger’s Source of Finger Bling.

taliesinskye

I really want to read a letter written by Cat to Ranger asking for her to return her retainer's eye, please, he could really use it back and has probably suffered enough.

Snowfire1224

You know what would be interesting, a chapter, possibly an extra chapter or interlude, from the perspective of Larat. I think seeing something through the eyes of the Fae might be interesting, although I can see where it would be a challenge to pull off too.

SMHF

"I think seeing something through the eyes of the Fae might be interesting"

You spelled eye wrong!

I let myself out!

Snowfire1224

Eye. Of course. That is my mistake.

Antony444

Three heroes are dying from the start...that promises a lot of pain and suffering for the forces of Good in this book 4. Nicely done! If Catherine has not lied (and I see no reason for her to) this was the fifth group of heroes she killed. If on average there has been three heroes per group, it's fifteen heroic figures which have bitten the dust.

It's far less than the record of the Calamities, but it's beginning to leave a bloody mark in the history of Creation...

Otherwise, this prologue was very interesting in that it allowed us to see the big changes the new Queen is implementing thorough Callow. A new money, goblins invited at Marchford, a large military mobilisation and the recovery of Dormer and the rest of the South...looks like the Woe and the Fifteenth Legion are very busy.

And of course, there's always Robber to accuse the heroes of racism...very well done.

I'm in love with this story and I see no reason it is going to change in the months to come...

JackbeThimble

Don't worry, they'll be back.

TeK

"Gods, I've even heard of Choirs stepping in to settle a losing fight. The sheer fucking arrogance of it."

Huh.

Raved Thrad

It was only after reading later chapters (notably, the part with Catherine's conversation with the Grey Pilgrim) that it really crystallized for me what I dislike so much about these heroes: their sheer arrogance, bordering on hubris. This band had absolutely no ties to Callow, no reason to strive and train and cross borders to kill Catherine other than the desire for glory. They throw her attempt to live and let live right back in her teeth, and when she murders them for it the Stalwart Paladin actually has the gall to be angry about it. First he resents her because she's not fighting the way he wants her to fight, and then when the girl he's crushing on is killed he's all hissy-spitty and calling her names, completely overlooking the fact that they basically accepted a red-colored quest to go assassinate someone who hadn't done anything against any of them personally. "How dare you fight back and kill us and not let us win or let us get away to get stronger when all we're doing is trying to murder you! We're the good guys and you're supposed to take this lying down!"

Isa Lumitus

I remember, when I was a kid, I felt the same way about how people got up in arms over criminals killing cops. Now? I'm numb to hypocrisy.

Isa Lumitus

You know, for most of this chapter, I was only planning to type one sentence as a comment, "Let the Befriending begin!" Then the chapter continued...

DENIED.

Aotrs Commander

Well, if the Choirs are getting that desperate, maybe Cat's doing something right.

Frankly, the best thing to happen to creation would be someone assassinating their entire pantheon of Pretend Good and Evil deities...

Satisfying as that would be, though, I suspect we won't see that. But one can dream, right?

Alex Mirabella

“Curfew?” Iason said. “What for?”

“Heroes,”

And immediately I knew they were done for. Chilling. This was literally the perfect way to start this book, I’m ridiculously impressed.

Josh Brooks

Oh yea more dead heroes. At this point I think I’m reading more to celebrate the day Cat dies, for good, then anything else.

---

Interlude: Stairway

“Though official records state that the Principate fought a mere score civil wars, it should be noted that this does not include wars fought between less than five principalities. Should the definition be amended, Procer has on average fought a civil war every decade since the year of its founding. No single nation has ever spilled so much Proceran blood as the Principate itself.”

– Extract from ‘The Labyrinth Empire, or, A Short History of Procer’, by Princess Eliza of Salamans

The trouble with this war, Prince Klaus Papenheim had told his niece since the first day, wasn’t that it wasn’t going to be a war. It was going to be half a dozen of them, fought all across Calernia more or less simultaneously. That was the great danger looming within the Tenth Crusade, that once all the forces had been put in motion there was no adjusting the blows. Cordelia, bless her soul, had taken his warnings seriously. The face of warfare had changed while the Principate clawed itself bloody, and now Procer had to change with it or be left behind. He’d never asked how his niece had gotten her hands on the Praesi. It was for the best, he’d decided. The Prince of Hannover had been raised with death as mother’s milk, but the fight against the Plague was clean in a way the games in the south weren’t. They made sport of men’s lives, down here, and he’d never had the stomach for that. Regardless, the ten Wastelanders had offered up the most precious secret of the East: the rituals of scrying, that old Praesi trick turned into a lethal tool of war by the Carrion Lord. The spells that allowed armies with entire kingdoms between them to move as one, taking apart hosts twice their size with surgical precision.

Gathering wizards to learn them had been costly, he suspected, and it must have been more so to keep the magelings in the Principate's service after. Though in Lycaonese lands spellcasters were prized, for their sorcery was a mighty thing wielded from walls against the rattling hordes, the southerners had a more complicated relationship with spellslingers. Wizards and witches had once owned a seat on the Highest Assembly, in recognition of their great contributions in easing the alliance between Arlesites and Alamans that first founded the Principate. Yet in the centuries since they had fallen out of favour. Their great influence, often second only to the rulers of principalities, had been seen as a threat by the royals of the south. Meddling in an election had turned on them when the candidate they opposed, Louis Merovins, managed a narrow victory. The man had spent most his reign suppressing them after revoking their Assembly seat in retaliation, a struggle finally brought to an end two rulers down the line when the mage association known as L'Oeuil D'Or was forcefully disbanded.

Since then the casters had become tradesmen like any other, offering charms and potions for coin – though never healing, as the House of Light frowned upon any infringing upon their hold in that domain. Some cities in the south still had informal assemblies, he'd been told, but they were toothless things and kept that way by ancient decrees banning the collection of dues while still imposing heavy taxes. Until now. First Prince Cordelia Hasenbach of Procer had, in the wake of her speech announcing the Tenth Crusade, founded the Order of the Red Lion. A congregation of wizards and witches exempted from the old decrees, in exchange for sworn service to the crown. Hundreds of them, who might be passable war casters at best but all knew how to scry with a degree of skill. Klaus had a hard laugh, when he learned the charter binding the Grand Alliance together had specific provisions for such an order without ever naming it. His niece had been moving her pieces into place for near a decade now.

The Prince of Hannover was pleased with the addition of the mages to his war council, though not because of their pleasant personalities. Near all of them were strutting Alamans pups, drunk on the shiny new heraldry and fresh importance. None of them seemed to understand they were not the sudden dawn of wizardly resurgence but instead a glorified pack of messengers. They had no say in where they were deployed, Klaus having decided the arrangements himself after consulting some of his own – much more trustworthy – Lycaonese mages. Dozens had been sent south to the Dominion, to keep the mustering armies of Levant pointed in the right direction, and near a hundred sent in little linked clusters his wizards called 'relays' to make it possible to keep the lines open to the Ashuran fleets even as they sailed. The rest had been spread with measured weighing of priorities, linking first to Salia where his niece ruled but also to the forces that Prince Amadis had schemed his way to leading. The Iserran weasel needed a close eye kept on him, and Klaus would have preferred to lead those armies himself if he could. He knew why he could not, though.

In the Red Flower Vales awaited the two men he considered to be the greatest field commanders of this era: Marshal Grem One-Eye and the Carrion Lord.

Sending the likes of Amadis against them would have been like throwing oil at a fire, and Cordelia had reluctantly told him that the man had intrigued too well to be entirely side-lined from command. The Prince of Iserre, however, had been too clever for his own good. With him were the armies of the remainder of his pack of intriguing malcontents, and every unruly fantassin his niece had been able to scrape together. Nearly fifty thousand in total, a host almost as large as the one Klaus was commanding. But it would be the Queen of Callow that Amadis tangled with, and the Prince of Hannover had heard much about that one of late. He'd once dismissed her as a nobody, during the Liesse Rebellion, but he'd been made to eat that dismissal raw since. She'd gone from victory to victory in the last few years, and if half the rumours about what her pack of villains was doing to heroes making their way into Callow were true... Well, there was one in every generation. Klaus' had borne the Black Knight that awaited him in the Vales, and the great monster of Cordelia's own looked to be the murderous orphan who'd set her throne atop a sea of corpses.

Prince Amadis would win, he suspected. The shit had more than a dozen heroes at his back, and two old forces of nature among them. It'd been a pleasant surprise to find out that Laurence was still alive, old sack of piss and vinegar that she was. The Saint of Swords was an army unto herself, and the Grey Pilgrim that went with her was supposed to be some kind of legend in Levant. No, Amadis would come out ahead. But the villains would bloody him and wreck the armies of his allies – and as the commander of that host, all the blame would fall on his shoulders afterwards. There'd be no more agitating the Highest Assembly for the Prince of Iserre, after that disgrace. Klaus spat to the side in disapproval, alone in his tent with the latest correspondence. It was sinful that good, honest soldiers would die in that mess but that was the nature of war. The Veiled Lady not discern between deserving and not when she claimed the butcher's bill. Enough of Amadis' backers knew their way around a battlefield that a real debacle would be avoided, at least. There was noise outside the prince's tent and he set down the latest supply census – Brabant had cut corners on what they brought, the fucking cheapskates – to rise to his feet.

"What's the racket, men?" he called out.

"Your Grace, I have-"

The voice yelped instead of finishing, preceded by the sound of a spear's butt hitting a foot none too gently. Klaus passed a hand through greying hair and sighed. That was one of his wizards, he was certain. The eager shits were still under the impression that military protocol did not apply to them since they served under the First Prince instead of the army itself.

"Victoria, let him in," the Prince of Hannoven said.

"Bertrand de Guison, officer of the Order of the Red Lion," his guard announced, her tone darkly amused as she parted the tent's folds.

Klaus would need to have a talk with her. Her dislike for southerners was well-earned – her two sons had died on Alamans fields fighting to put Cordelia on the throne – but the magelings were too useful to be roughed up over petty offenses. The wizard entered limping, his heavy robes emblazoned with a rampant red lion on pale. He couldn't have been more than thirty, Klaus thought, and that he believed that to be young suddenly reminded him how old he'd gotten. Even his niece was closer to thirty than twenty, now. A Papenheim hold vigil until death relieves them, his father had always told him, but the Veiled Lady had seen fit to spare Klaus longer than he'd believed possible. So few of his time were left, save for enemies.

"Your Grace," the mage bowed. "I herald news of great import."

He'd called out in Reitz when he was outside the tent, but now the boy was speaking Chantant. The Prince of Hannoven squinted. He'd had lessons as a child and spoke the Alamans tongue well enough, but never quite managed to shed his Lycaonese accent. It made him sound like an ignorant brute, he was well aware. Just for that, the mage got to stand throughout the conversation.

"I'm listening," Klaus said.

"The chapter of the Order assigned to the Rightful Due has contacted us," Bertrand eagerly said. "Admiral Hadast has struck the first blow of the Tenth Crusade."

That would be Magon Hadast's son, Klaus noted, not the Ashuran ruler himself. The head of the Thalassocracy was too old and fragile to campaign himself. The 'Rightful Due' – Gods, the fucking Ashurans and their ship names – was the flagship of the Thalassocracy's first war fleet. It'd set sail more than a month ago, and true to their reputation the Ashuran ships and their wind mages were striking with impossible haste.

"A victory, is it?" Klaus asked.

The mage nodded.

"One for the ages, Your Grace," he said. "The Tideless Isles were seized with but a handful of Ashuran ships sunk, and ten times as many prize hulls seized from the corsairs. What few are not dead or in chains fled for the Wasteland."

And so the first battle of the Tenth Crusade was fought hundreds of miles away from the Empire, Ashur snatching anchorage for its fleets before it began attacking Praes from the coast. It was beginning, Klaus thought. Now the Praesi would have to move troops to protect their coastal cities, denying reinforcements to the western front even as Ashur burned and looted everything within earshot of waves. Now that Hadast was in place, armies could finally begin to march.

"Contact your fellows in the Northern Army," Klaus told the mage. "Pass this message to Prince Amadis: the seal is broken, climb the stairs."

"By your will, Your Grace," the man bowed elaborately.

Gods, Alamans. They turned every conversation into a bloody play.

"That aside," Bertrand continued, "your guard-"

"I didn't see anything," Klaus grunted. "There's a war on, boy. Get moving."

The wizard looked like he'd swallowed a lemon, but learning some humility would do him good. The prince waited until the mage was gone before speaking again.

"Victoria," he called out. "Get yourself relieved and come in to pour yourself a drink."

Prince Klaus Papenheim frowned.

"And find the White Knight and his gaggle too, while you're at it," he said. "I'll want a word with them before we march on the Vales."

—

Prince Amadis Milenan's fingers drummed the table lightly. The sound of it was soothing, and well worth the expense of having brought the furniture from his summer palace in Iserre. Amadis had ruled his principality for more than twenty years now, and steered it unfailingly through troubles and civil war largely because he had a knack for telling which way the wind was blowing. At the peak of the civil war, he'd been considered a key supporter of Princess Aenor of Aquitan while secretly corresponding with both Princess Constance of Aisne and Prince Dagobert of Lange – before the latter's grisly demise at the hands of Hasenbach's northern savages, anyway. No matter who triumphed he had been positioned to become one of the most influential princes in the Highest Assembly. By refraining from pressing his own claim while keeping close ties with neighbouring principalities, he'd ensured that Iserre would come out of the strife wealthy and pristine: from there, it would have been child's play to trade marriages for concessions and arrange for his kin to rule Procer when the time came. Then the Battle of Aisne happened, and Cordelia Hasenbach broke the board.

He'd not been there himself, preferring to send one of his many cousins to command the levies he had sent to aid the coalition. But he'd heard stories. Of entire allied armies turning against princesses he'd considered among the most cunning and dangerous alive halfway through the battle. Of the brutal slaughter the Lycaonese had visited upon the flower of the south's manhood. That defeat sounded across all of Procer, and in the wake of that sound Amadis found his careful plans lay shattered on the ground. Still, he'd come out of the disaster better than any of his former allies and set to work leveraging that sudden prominence. His ties in Orne and Cantal served him well, soon bolstered by generously termed loans to Creusens and wedding his youngest daughter to the heir to Segovia. The aging Princess Luisa has sided with Hasenbach after she broke Prince Dagobert and remained a close ally after, reaping the benefits of her early support, but her son had greater ambitions than being the loyal dog of a northerner First Prince. Princess Aenor's successor, Princess Rozala, eventually joined his alignment as well after she found her mother's old supporters closing their doors to her in an attempt to curry favour with Hasenbach.

Six principalities stood behind him, out of the twenty-three that formed Procer. Twenty-four, counting Salia, but as it was the seat and personal domain of whoever claimed the crown its officials avoided partisanship. It was a greater portion of the realm than it seemed. The four Lycaonese principalities to the north were ardent Hasenbach supporters, but estranged from the courts of the south and forced to spend what little coin they had seeing to their borders with the Chain of Hunger. Cleves and Hainault had turned inwards after their disastrous adventures in the civil war, fearing the Kingdom of the Dead would catch scent of their weakness and begin raiding their shores again. Over a third of the principalities still relevant to rule of Procer stood behind him. Amadis did not have the votes in the Highest Assembly to dismantle Hasenbach's position, not unless she blundered and angered rulers keeping aloft. But he was now widely considered the second most powerful ruler in the Principate, and even the hint of his displeasure gave other princes pause.

Not that the First Prince had been idle all this time. She was, Amadis would concede, a much defter hand at the Ebb and the Flow than any Lycaonese should be. That clever bit of diplomacy with Levant had tied Orense to her with a debt of gratitude, and his own admittedly lacklustre military record meant that Salamans and Tenerife preferred looking for protection against Helike with the First Prince than his own faction. Their support had borne fruit, with twenty thousand men being sent south to guard the border even as the rest of the Principate gathered for war. Yet for all her cleverness, Hasenbach was not beloved. Her heavy-handed reforms of the bureaucracy in Salia had won her no friends among the highborn who had once enjoyed lucrative sinecures close to the heart of Procer's power. The decrees she had passed through the Highest Assembly to disburse funds for the upkeep of fortresses guarding the borders with the Chain of Hunger and the Dead King's realm were similarly unpopular with the impoverished south, though she'd had the votes to force them through regardless.

Still, Amadis had never considered the woman a true threat to his rising ascendance. Watching the massive undertaking she had apparently managed to prepare under his nose without a single soul noticing, however, he was coming to reconsider that assessment.

There must have been at least five hundred mages involved, he thought as he left his tent and came to stand in the field. That meant easily thrice that number in servants and tradesmen supporting them, the sum of it making a sizeable town on its own. And there must have been soldiers, to ward off anyone curious even in this distant stretch of the Principate. The Prince of Arans must have been involved as well, for all this was taking place amidst his lands, and never had Amadis unearthed so much as a hint that the man was one of Hasenbach's. Neither had his people in the treasury found trace of the sizeable amount of coin that must have been allocated in seeing such an undertaking through. Had the gold come through the Lycaonese principalities? Fielding their armies south in the civil war should have nearly beggared them, it should not have been possible. Unless, of course, Hasenbach had falsified the books in Salia. The Prince of Iserre hummed. He could have her censured for that. The measure was mostly symbolic, and required simple majority to pass. Would it be worth it to call in the favours? It would certainly blacken her name, but to make such a play as a crusade unfolded might do the same for his own.

Someone came to stand by his side, and a low whistle was let out.

"She plays a deeper game than we thought," Princess Rozala of Aequitan said.

Barely twenty, Amadis thought, with all her mother's beauty yet none of the grace. Being raised in a time of war had done nothing for her manners, a shame given the past glories of her hallowed line. Iserre and Aequitan had been foes as often as they were allies, over the centuries, a complicated dance of love and hate that saw the lines between rivalry and alliance ever blurred. No one understood better than his people that a skilled enemy could serve as better ally than a friend.

"I discern the Prince of Hannover's hand in this," Amadis said. "It is too... martial a measure to be the First Prince's own thought."

"It certainly explains why she had us getting drunk near the border with Bayeux instead of mustering with the Iron Prince in Orne, anyway," Princess Rozala mused. "And here I thought she merely wanted to keep you from getting your grubby paws all over her allies."

"A mark of weakness, that she would find it needful to do so," Amadis said with a thin smile. "Too many of her backers see the sense in what I say."

"There's no great brilliance in pointing out that Callow is ripe for the taking, Amadis," the Princess of Aquitan snorted. "Anyone with eyes can see it. It's the division of the spoils that's going to set tongues wagging. Assuming we can even wrest the right to dispose of them."

"Enough of the Highest Assembly took command of their armies we can convoke a session in Callow without her," the Prince of Iserre murmured. "With the right promises we could circumvent her entirely."

Neither needed to say that if this took place, Hasenbach's reign would never recover from the blow. It was one thing for a decree to be defeated in the Assembly – not even the most beloved of First Princes had avoided that indignity at least once – but for a ruling First Prince's known intent to be defied that openly? She would barely even qualify as a figurehead, after. The disgrace might be enough for her to abdicate and flee back north with her tail between her legs. There were other ways to chance the face of the Principate's rule than mere warfare. The two of them stood in uneasy silence afterwards, looking at the work of the mages. The ritual had begun with dawn yet was not even half-done by his reckoning. The harsh slopes of the mountains separating Procer from Callow burned away under constant sorcerous fire, leaving behind smoking steps of stone stretching ever further. Now that the Prince of Hannover had given his leave, Amadis had been filled in on the full details of this little scheme of the First Prince's. Though no great commander himself, the Prince of Iserre knew enough of martial endeavours to be aware that the Kingdom of Callow's great advantage in war had always been that the only path of entry from the west was the Red Flower Vales. Narrow passes and valleys, whose fortifications had only grown more expansive since the Wastelanders had annexed Callow.

This was no longer true.

The Stairway, as Hasenbach's lieutenant among the mages called it, was the work of years in ritual preparation and planning: an exhausting labour that would carve a way through the mountains between the principality of Arans and northern Callow at the narrowest point in the mountains. The planned point of emergence was to the north of the city of Harrow – which was, he'd been assured, essentially undefended. Amadis had been ordered to take his host through the Stairway and begin a march south, shattering every army in his path until he took the defences of the Red Flower Vales from behind while the host of Prince Klaus Papenheim assaulted them from the front. He'd also been mandated to establish negotiations with the Duchy of Daoine, though it had been made clear to him treating with Duchess Kegan would be handled by one of the First Prince's personal envoys. In this, he was not worried. Callow was such a lawless place, these days. Envoys could meet with all sorts of accidents as they journeyed. And if they did, well, was it not his duty as a loyal subject of Procer to fill that void? A diplomatic victory with the Deoraithe would do much to solidify his position before he convoked the Highest Assembly within Callow. The higher his fortunes rose, the lower Hasenbach's fell.

"The wizards tell me the ritual will be completed within two days," Prince Amadis of Iserre told his accomplice. "We must swiftly steal a march afterwards."

"Steal a march," Princess Rozala repeated mockingly. "My, how commandingly you speak to me. One would almost believe you to be the leader of this glorious host of ours."

Amadis smiled at her.

"How is your brother these days?" he asked. "I hear his talents as an orator have thawed even the First Prince's disposition."

The woman's face turned dark, and she looked away. Rozala did need the occasional reminder of how flimsy her position in Aquitan truly was, with her younger brother currying favour at court. Hasenbach was unlikely to be so gauche as to directly intervene in a principality's affairs of succession, but she could do a great deal to help the boy's cause without tipping her hand.

"Let us not quarrel, Your Grace," Amadis said. "Can you not feel it? We are going to make history, you and I."

The Prince of Iserre's smile broadened as he watched the Stairway grow. The world, he knew, was on the eve of great changes. And Amadis Milenan would be at the heart of them.

---

DroughtBringer

Great chapter! It is so amazing to be able to read these again.

There's one thing that I've missed the past month, not as much as actually being able to read Practical Guide, but I've missed the little email notifications that I get from this; specifically from when Gunslinger likes my comment.

It seems like such a small thing, and it really is, but it normally puts a smile on my face when it happens. Beyond that Gunslinger has been pushing for Practical Guide to be voted for on Top Web Fiction, and has just generally been an amazing part of the community. Thank you, Gunslinger, for all you do.

There is also the amazing community, reading the comments and the thoughts is what gets me through the days between chapters; thank you all for your thoughts and ideas, as they're always fun to read through.

And... if I'm going to be thanking a member of the community I should also thank the author; Erratic thank you so much for this world that you are sharing with us and letting us go on this amazing adventure. I've missed this the past month, and I'm very happy it is back. As we continue on this adventure know that I really appreciate all you do. Thank you.

As we head into book 4... you guys are just all awesome! Thank you!

Gunslinger

Thanks for your kind words 😊

Speaking of topwebfiction.com the Guide is only 20 votes or so behind Ward. Vote and you can take it to the top (tion.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil)

DroughtBringer

Awesome news right now! Practical Guide to Evil has overtaken Ward! Practical Guide is currently 45 votes ahead! Make it further ahead everyone! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

stevenneiman

Hey, we're actually at #1. It's been so long that I forgot what it looks like to have a non-Wildbow series in first place. Thank you to everyone else who voted to help put us there, especially to Gunslinger for reminding us to vote and putting up the handy links, and thank you to EE for writing such an awesome story. I look forward to reading the last book, and anything you put out afterwards.

---

Isn't Amadis the prince that tried to push for the Principate directly leading the Liesse Rebellion? Looks like Cordelia is dumping political opponents in the first wave.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Could be part of the negotiations between Cordelia & Catherine too. Cat thins out her political opponents, whom she gathers and sends to the Stairway. I suspect Cat & Black have known about this already; that's another reason why Cat talked to Duchess Keagen at the end of Book 3. I think Daoine will be part of the army attacking the Stairway Princes. Let say 25% of them passes through, then Cat ambushes them and split the army apart. The splinter group goes ahead to Daoine thinking they'll get reinforcements where they'll get slaughtered. Cat then defends Callow at the Harrow, where the most of the Princes Graveyard will take place.

Then the Dead King attacks from the North, Ranger comes in for fun with the legendary Heroes, Klaus shifts his direction from the Vales to Harrow to attack Cat from the South, Malicia betrays her and many more things go wrong for Cat because with the exception of Hakram and her Rainbow Cloak, things never really go right for our Queen of the Hunt.

Kazenos

They dont know about the Stairway. Agnes said she didn't foresee it being found before it was used

Nash Equilibrium

I can't find the specific chapter the line is spoken right now, but I'm pretty sure that the augur specified that the empress wouldn't find out. So it's possible that this is backroom dealing with Cat.

Of course, it's also possible that negotiations between Callow and Procer failed, so this could be exactly what it appears to be.

usernamesbco

I think negotiations between Callow and Procer were a nonstarter. Cordy can't afford to call off the crusade, she needs a war. She'll stick with the pretext of "free Callow from the Evil Queen" so they have a pretext to invade.

If Cat loses they get to divide Callow up as spoils of war. If Cat wins, Cory will have gotten rid of her political opponents and weakened Callow enough that the crusade can continue. Either way Cordy bleeds off the troublesome soldiers/bandits left over from her civil war and consolidates her political position under the banner of "Good vs. Evil"

Cat needs to spank Procer hard enough that they'll reconsider.

werafdsaew

I doubt the Black Queen and the First Prince trust each other well enough to have agreed to anything. I think Thief's visit was just to scope each other out and to establish diplomatic relationships for future negotiations.

David Casort

minor correction. "Klaus' had borne the Black Knight that awaited him in the Vales, and the great monster of Cordelia's own looked to be the murderous orphan who'd forged set her throne atop a sea of corpses." I suspect you meant either "forged her throne" or "set her throne" not both. personally I prefer forged.

Darkening

I find it rather amazing that some people are so self-important that they continue to underestimate Catherine. I mean, sure, Klaus is right that a dozen heroes is a rough time for the Woe to contest, but this Amadis fellow doesn't seem to even have the slightest thought that anything might cause him a problem.

ALKATYN

He also thinks he's going to overthrow Cordelia despite all evidence to the contrary.

I don't think he has a long life expectancy.

Matthew

Also, I think that we as readers overestimate how much the heroes know about Black's hero killing methodology. He's been mostly successful so what they have to go on is survivor tales from his least effective methods.

Adra

Especially because of the Name-lore mislead that's inherent in him being the Black Knight: It's part of his name to be a Hero Killer, the name is traditionally the 'Dragon' to the Dread Empress/Emperor. So heroes are prepared for a traditional, hero-killing villain, who'll chase them down, overwhelm them with dark power and start monologuing. Without first hand knowledge of what Black is, it's very easy for heroes to operate under the assumption that they're dealing with a very powerful but traditional Black Knight.

So all the heroes who come for him are prepped for the completely wrong type of engagement, and that's even before Black's actual plans come into play.

---

The heroes who come for him are the ones at the Vales with Papenheim, the White Knight and his band, and they fought him to more or less a stalemate twice. They'll know what to expect, especially with Hanno's ability to google with his brain, and with Raphaella being a monster killer set against a legion of undead with a dragon at its head.

Highwayman

The Stairway... if training in CQB has taught me anything, its that stairwells are a horrible death trap. Might not be as bad here as in a real stairwell, but if there's any time to hit them, it'll be when they're marching half-way through it.

naturalnuke

And then Hierophant dropped a demon on them. The end.

---

Isn't Harrow where Warlock built wards around a standard with a demon of Absence and a company of devils, mentioned in chapter 22 of the second book (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/05/11/chapter-22-rescue/>)?

Gunslinger

This is a really good catch. A Chekov's demon if there ever was one.

Nairne .01

And so the 50k host and the heroes and all of Cordelia's opponents become literally absent. It sounds so funny xD

1shot4living

"You're telling me that an entire army, 12 heroes and an assortment of princes just vanished once the Black Queen dropped the standard and just walked away without looking back?"

"I believe her exact words were 'Oops, it slipped.' "

BarthHumphries

If you read the link, HIEROPHANT actually think it's a demon of corruption, "Given that we remember why we need to have this conversation." I'm betting that the army finds the wards, figures it's Squire or someone hiding to have wards that strong, tears them down, gets corrupted, and then Squire has a corrupted army coming up her backside, spreading corruption wherever they go.

d_o_l

Nah, the demon of corruption was the one that already got released near Marchford. The only one still unaccounted for is the demon of absence.

BarthHumphries

If you read the link, HIEROPHANT actually think it's a demon of corruption, "Given that we remember why we need to have this conversation." I'm betting that the army finds the wards, figures it's Squire or someone hiding to have wards that strong, tears them down, gets corrupted, and then Squire has a corrupted army coming up her backside, spreading corruption wherever they go.

Euodiachloris

Have faith. He'd do something far more creative with portals. Still – The End. xD

grzecho2222

Why not roll giant rock or avalanche on them? They got 12 heroes, not sure if demon can take it

---

Alternatively, if anyone does catch the wind of the ongoing ritual, Cat can call on the mandated host of no less than ten thousand soldiers from Daoine. Maybe even take some of the Watch's garrisons in it, to harass the invaders and scout for heroes while she's gating north.

SpeckofStardust

They will take the city and enter the Callow heartlands, preventing Cat from doing anything else without first beating that army.

HappyNap

Or Cat will be ready for them... I mean, she and Hasenback *did* make a deal

Nairne .01

It would be very nice if Catherine and Cordelia decided that the Crusade is simply a ruse, to eliminate some of the filth that can't be reformed.

Decius

How much thought and strategic planning went into considering that the stairway is also going to be a way to invade Procer? If it isn't useful as a way to invade Procer, it's a great place for a couple of active volcanoes to appear when the army is mostly through.

How effective was the information security intended to keep the Eyes from knowing about a large and labor-intensive ritual?

And is it even remotely possible that the scrying rituals and scrying mages are secure against interception and spoofing?

If Black hasn't already won at least ten percent of the war, he hasn't been doing his job correctly.

SpeckofStardust

The stairway is unknown, it was Stated by a Hero that it would remain so until after it's first use.
So yes the Security of it was top notch.

Nairne .01

Except Catherine made a deal and the wasteland mages had to come from somewhere.

beleester

The wasteland mages were for Cordelia's scrying network, not for this. The Stairway was mentioned to have been years in the making, which means they started planning it before Catherine was in charge of anything.

TeK

The funny thing is, countries borders have to go along natural geographically defended position. The Empire had sea and Hwaerte, the Callow had the Hwaerte to the east, Vales to west, elves to the north (practically a wasteland to any invading army), and to the south dat lake, as well as fae-ridden Refuge. Now, with part of mountains protecting borders between Praes and Procer gone, it is a strategic imperative to hold as big buffer zone between said mountain pass and actual borders of country. As an example take the Wall between Daoine (which is much more like a march, but anyway) and Nortern steppes. Because there were no obstacles along the borders (aside from marches, I suppose), it was a point of constant raids and fighting. The same is here. Procer just ensured constant wars between itself and whoever behind those mountains.

Iris

Wait, didn't literal giants live in those mountains?

The Quietist

Saint of Blades sounds just like something that might attract Ranger...

Nairne .01

When I imagine what she fights like the image that I get is a whirlwind of blades closing on an opponent from all sides.

Nguyen Hong Hai

I immediately think of Unlimited Blade Works here.

Thea

Well, the Saint of Blades does have a domain... though it's questionable whether it's filled with all the swords they've ever seen.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Well Reality Marbles is pretty much personal demesnes like the Champion's Exalt aspect or Cat's Moonless Night.

Rook

Killing the Saint of Blades seems like a good way to make the old Queen of Blades a proper Name, especially with the previous precedent already set

.. which would still catch Ranger's attention, but that conflict seems more or less inevitable anyway, more of a when question than an if question

Baggy0z

I smell multiple traps. What's the bet that Hierophant notices a massive days long ritual powerful enough to melt mountains? And then there's the scrying, no way that secret got loose unintentionally. Either it was deliberately leaked by the Empire or part of any deal between Cat and the Prince. There's no way a back door or flaw was left in the ritual to make sure that communications are insecure.

---

Typo thread:

> wasn't that it wasn't going to be a war was that it wasn't going to be a war

> An congregation of wizards and witches
A congregation of wizards and witches > who'd forged set her throne atop a sea of corpses

Maybe "who'd set her throne atop a sea of corpses"?

> There were other ways to chance the face of the Principate's rule than mere warfare.
There were other ways to change the face of the Principate's rule than mere warfare.

Barthumphries

Some more typos 😊

The Veiled Lady not discern between deserving and not when she claimed the butcher's bill.
Add "did" after "Lady"

The aging Princess Luisa has sided with Hasenbach after Change has to had not unless she blundered and angered rulers keeping aloft

Add "her" after "rulers"

The higher is fortunes rose Change is to his

frolamiz

I don't think we are heading into the graveyard of princes right away, because there seem to only be two of them taking the stairway, but the life expectancy of this prince seem really low. His point of view doesn't even consider Catherine once =)

Euodiachloris

The only question here is: will he actually get time to have Cat loom in his thoughts for nights of dread before he becomes a patch? Or, will it be restricted to after? ;P

oldschoolvillain

Amadis mentioned that there were enough princes available to convene a Highest Assembly once they arrive in Callow. Even if they aren't all there now, who wants to bet that Catherine hits them as they're convening their little coup?

Mr. Nobody

Wow, the time skip was longer than I thought. Well, Catherine must have increased the numbers of the Army of Callow quite a lot.

Something tells me that the downfall of the Principate will be its fragile alliance and constant infighting. Look, this Amadis guy is so focused on Cordelia that he can't even concentrate on the fight to come.

grzecho2222

Funny thing is that they are more Praes than Praes at the moment. Let's see: giant ritual that can easily backfire, attacking Callow with hordes of soldiers, nobles already backstabbing each other and paraphrasing Akua "No one understood better than his people that a skilled enemy could serve as better ally than a friend". Did Black Knight switched their patterns when no one was looking? He talked about transcending them.

Snowfire1224

Interesting idea. I like it.

sengachi

That would be a hell of a gotcha from the Black Knight.

Antonin

Catherine does have one big advantage however, the aspect TAKE can work the Dread Empress's mind control of the Legion of Terror if she knows about it and it just so happens she was checking for mind control when dealing with the Diabolist.

Mr. Nobody

I think Catherine lost Take when she lost her Name. Unless she found a way to keep it.

TheAtomicOption

You have it backwards. Take was the first NEW aspect she got upon regaining her name. The other two new ones are Fall and Break.

The aspects she lost were Seek (removed because of demon corruption), Learn, and Struggle.

ashandlp

Chapter 68: Coda

Even my Name was stripped bare, its power dimmed and dull. I had no aspect left but one, and that one was gone far beyond what an aspect should be. Squire, I thought, but the name rang hollow. Tied to me only by the barest thread. Transition loomed ahead, patiently awaiting the right fulcrum.

Cat lost 2 of her 3 aspects when she broke the scaffold around her title as Duchess, retaining only Fall.

Also from Coda:

"Call," Akua Sahelian said.

A bundle of power inside her unfolded under my patient eye and I flicked my wrist. Ice spread through it, cracks spreading as she flinched. Ah, I thought. Devoured but not gone. The corpse of her aspect I took for my own, let the winds and the snow bury it. It would await my purposes there.

Cat ate Call. She didn't Take it.

JackbeThimble

I think Mr. Nobody is referring to the second time she lost her name after Second Liesse. We don't really know what her name is now but I think it was stated that she isn't the Squire no more and her actual capital N Name probably isn't The Black Queen either, it's currently not clear whether she still has her old aspects.

Nairne .01

She still has "Take". Though it evolved into something a little different when she broke her name and became the incarnation of winter. It might not be an actual aspect but she still can "Take".

I think "Take" was very compatible with Winter on a conceptual level.

Ashen Shugar

I would have thought that the one aspect that remained was "Fall". From the quote in the comment above, her remaining one was far beyond what a normal aspect should be, and Fall was her aspect that had gotten supercharged/corrupted by winter power.

samshadar

Wait what? When did the mind control thing turn up? I totally missed this...

Soronel Haetir

Malicia can embed commands directly in people she speaks to face-to-face, I'm not sure if it works through her flesh puppets or only meeting the real Malicia in person.

And I thought Malicia and Black did know of the stairway, I thought that was the one message they managed to intercept (while the Auger steered most clear of getting caught).

Mr. Nobody

I think he misunderstood the Empress' Speaking. It's powerful, but it's more like suggestion than mind control. Though I don't remember any mention of the Empress using something like that on the Legions. If she had mind control, the High Lords wouldn't have needed to die.

---

Closure (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/04/closure/>) explicitly mentions that it's Aspect-assisted Speaking, and that everyone above the rank of a legate has commands implanted in their heads.

Mr. Nobody

Oh, that's right. I am the one who underestimated her power.

Hmm... Now I'm suspecting the Empress of killing Juniper's mom and the rest of the commanders even more.

Fern

OH FUCK

Man I never even considered the commands when Juniper's mom died. It would have taken almost no effort for her to plant a command with a poison coated dagger on one of the other officers. Even then, I still don't think the Empress had a clear motive to do it; she thought she could rely on Black to trust her until he blew her magic portal nuke to shit, after all. The only reason she would kill Juniper is if she thought Black would try to kill her, and well... I don't think she did, until Black crossed that line.

It'd be different if she assumed that Juniper would use family ties to bring her into the fold, of course, but that's unlikely. Still, a masterstroke of a plan. Personally? I still think one of the goblins did it, either the Legion ones we know about or an Eye of the Matrons.

Shit, but I do love this whole story. Every time i look at it there's a new detail I didn't notice before.

oldschoolvillain

I suspect it was Cordelia, honestly. We know she had agents in the Legions – their presence at the battle of Liesse and their ability to secure a Wight for study is more than enough proof of that. Ranker and Sacker seemed to be unaware of the treachery, even when we were reading from Ranker's PoV. If Ranker had been planning or party to knifing the other Legion commanders, she wouldn't have been getting desperate and bemoaning the damage it did to Legion morale.

Rook

I'm not sure about the whole stealthy massive sorcerous ritual thing to be honest. Aren't the woe using blanket scrying to detect heroes and narrow down where they are? Unless Hierophant is out of commission with an experiment, you'd think one of the greatest sorcerers of the age would probably be able to spot a magical bonfire while scrying for needles in a haystack.

Also pretty interesting that no one in the principiate – not even Cordelia's own right hand – has any minor inkling about her being in contact with the Black Queen.

On top of that, they suddenly got a hold of apparently secret Praesi scrying rituals just in time for the war? The same kind that would be rather useful for two rulers secretly conspiring? Also coincidentally the stairs for the principiate's first strike happen to be hitting harrow. The essentially in defended and foreshadowed to be destitute city that would minimize damage to Callow (last chapter – with the trader calling harrow coin 'trash')

Question would be, is Cat actually hard enough to do what this would imply? Set up Harrow far ahead of time as a sacrificial lamb to avoid suspicion from Praes, and narrowly 'lose' the first battle; shattering most of the host aiming at Callow in the process but being ultimately 'unable' to stop them from opening the red flower Vales. Very conveniently bypasses the biggest principiate-callow conflict as the crusade marches toward heart of Praes, without giving any strong grounds for public suspicion.

---

It's implied that proceran mages mostly couldn't scry before at all, otherwise Klaus would describe it differently. Praesi are likely listening in on the Red Lions' communications, and Cat used a more confidential way of delivering her messages to Cordelia (a stealthy Named messenger).

First Prince can't openly deal with the Black Queen, since she's a certified abomination in the eyes of the Heavens. My bet is that Cat either is going to abuse the deal she set up with Cordelia (destroying her rival princes, with a very broad definition of "destroy", for crusaders concentrating on the Vales) or trick her into unknowingly breaking it, starting a story about a deal with a fairy gone wrong.

Darkening

i believe it's probably not that they couldn't scry at all, but that they didn't have Warlock's Cheap Reliable Long-Range Pebble Scrying, so it wasn't as useful.

Fern

Oh, it's absolutely going that way. Making a deal with the fae is way too rich of a trope for it not to happen. I'd almost be inclined to say Cat may break their deal without even meaning to, what with how her name is starting to rule how she acts after getting all that sweet winter goo.

Rook

I wonder if her name would even let her break the deals/promises/oaths. There was the whole question about whether Cat chose to sew Akua into the cloak or if she simply couldn't break the oath she previously made anymore. She's not even too sure herself, by her own admission.

If anything it would have to be something that screws them in practice while strictly adhering to the technical wording of the deal

nerferf

So does anyone else smell a deal was made by cat and cord? Cord arranges for all her internal enemies armies to go by this plain suicidal route and cat forces will fight them thus giving cat an excuse to not send troops to aid black or empress, keeping callow which is now again a independent kingdom out of the war and the empire's best generals trapped in the vale while the real invasion enters from the coast into the vastly understaffed empire heartland?

I mean cat and cord are obvious going to back-stab each other, cord using these monster heros to try to off cat, and cat can easily attack uncle klaus in the back and trapping him between her and black if she decides to destroy this army in the pass

Oshi

I suppose I see it a little differently. I think the endgame will be the Dead King. Cat will be the fulcrum that turns the Crusade against the Hunger. In the end Callow and Praes both die so that a new empire is born while the Crusade will spend itself to kill/contain the Dead King. It's about the only way the Kingdoms in the South will survive what the Crusades are planning for the next few generations. Good gets to defeat a Greater Evil while the lesser survives and grows to challenge them later. If the pattern holds then that is how it will end.

TeK

I think the narrative has to change, and the change will be to something like "Practical Good and Practical evil cooperate to defeat Greater Evil, while Stupid Good and Stupid Evil die ugly death".

hoyboy

Only if the step immediately after is Practical Evil getting hung from trees.

Big Brother

Hoy, I've only seen your comments on the most recent chapters, and I'm already tired of your 'goody two-shoes' attitude. You seem like part of the Stupid Good category that only sees eliminating Evil as the proper course, never working with it.

hoyboy

First off I don't recall seeing a big sign on the top of the page saying "You must be this deep in the Protagonist bias Kool-Aid to ride" so I suppose you'll just have to deal with it.

Second. Evil blatantly has nothing beneficial to offer the world, even the Practical kind only gets vaguely less dystopic and murderous results on a societal level. Complaining that Good doesn't work with Evil on more than a momentary basis is like complaining that the police don't work with the damn mafia.

Fern

The police did work with the mafia, though. It was a whole thing.

I'm getting ahead of myself. I don't buy into it too much either, but as far as choices Cat's got shit besides Practical Evil. Further than that, it looks like the only real gold end for all these characters is if they flip the middle finger to the Gods and make their own path, which is impossible with the Gods still in the picture.

Practical Evil isn't as bad as you're making it out to be, i think. The only difference between fair government because it's right and fair government as a stable way to keep the masses in line is intent, and we're about to get real Kantian if we stop worrying about that.

Never go full Kant. Down that path lies darkness and semantics.

TeK

Why? As far as I'm concerned, the only real difference between Practical Good and Evil is that former are hypocrites. I hope you are not gonna protect Stupid Good ala "let's mindcontrol hundred thousand civilians, elders, women and children included, into a mindless army of slaughtering everything on it's way", but the biggest move team Practical Good has going for itself is "let's invade a war-ridden country to distract everyone from our inner problems and kill any unstable elements that can potentially cause unrest". Yeah, mighty Good, all of them.

hoyboy

Because the countries ruled by evil are frighteningly dystopic hellholes ruled by insane despots. The good nations, despite massive flaws and inequality, are not.

Oshi

This is not an attack but lets not forget the whole constant civil war and slavery levels of serfdom in the Principate. Not to mention the caste based system that crushes people in Ashur?

lennymaster

It was stated several times, by several different characters, that the standard of living for the commoners (which means pretty much 85 to 95 percent of the population, depending on the efficiency of farming methods in Callow) has risen substantially since Black took over.

Society these days puts such an overinflated stock in morality, that feelings are valued higher than reason or facts, that well meant intent is praised no matter the actual outcome.

Barth Humphries

"Because the countries ruled by evil are frighteningly dystopic hellholes ruled by insane despots. The good nations, despite massive flaws and inequality, are not."

Callow, which has been ruled by the Practical Evil Black Knight has been as decent as any of the Good nations with their constant "civil wars" (or internal conflicts). Praes, although nominally under Empress Malicia, has been under the Truebloods (who were only recently all wiped out) and they were all Really Evil. Some of the Goodish nations, like Bellerephon, are literal 1984 dystopian hell holes with rocks implanted in your head that monitor your thoughts and blow you up if you think the wrong thing.

TeK

Well, you do have a point, living under Traitorous, while hilarious, would be quite taxing. But the whole point is that it's not Practical Evil. Practical Evil is more like Benevolent, you dig?

Barth Humphries

Practical Evil is, "if you kill the goose that laid golden eggs, you don't get any more eggs. So for greatest long-term personal money earning potential, you have to be a benevolent overlord and help your subjects get super rich so that they can afford to pay the higher taxes that you later want to levy on them."

I.e. the Reaganomics approach. 😏

Nguyen Hong Hai

Then by definition, Practical is just what it means, doing the most suitable thing, no need to label Good or Evil on top of it there.

TeK

I would gladly, but we're talking about universe in which Good and Evil are very, very real. I acknowledge the reality by labeling them such. But yes, I would prefer if Practical would be more of the side, than Good or Evil. Let's see.

oldschoolvillain

About a third of the Legions of Terror and at least one Marshall are still stationed in the Wastelands. With the High Lords dealt with, Malicia can absolutely send them to manage the threat from the coastline (and considering the mention of the Legions having a dragon enrolled, possibly wipe out the force on the Tideless Isles). Plus, as Cat mentioned, the Wasteland itself is "death on invaders" what with the lack of useful scrounging available and the eldritch horrors still tucked away behind the walls of their cities. Sure, Ashur can raid the coastline, but the cities are where the wealth is, and attacking one of those with anything less than a band of Heroes is going to end in some serious damage to the attackers.

TeK

Ashur can not just raid the cost, but land an actual army. With actual heroes, why not? To detter and counter that, at least some portion of military need to stay in Wasteland. Plus, nobility, while toothless, is not toothless enough to leave unsupervised.

vuthuha912

Unlikely, landing an army means you are going to commit to the invasion – which means fighting long-term – means they need a supply line. Praesi can't farm for shit and their climate is as hostile as it can get. Any invasion force will need a long supply line that bogged down the army movement and in war, movement is key. Even if they manage to land horses in Praes, the climate and terrain are not favorable conditions to be using horses in. The Praesi force can easily turn this into a Napoleon Invasion of Russia but with sand and they won't even have to wait for general Winter.

Ashur's greatest strength is their navy, why would they want to ditch it for a land invasion. They are more likely to help transport the fighting force of other nations to Praes. How long will the enemy last in Praes is a different question?

And if I think about this correctly, the ship for transporting the invader will likely be massive warships as they carried more people and resources. The English fought this type of fight with the Spanish once. So is The Korean vs Japanese – the one where Yi Sun Sin happened. And Vietnam and the Mongol/Chinese. All of the victors in these conflicts are the ones who are outnumbered and are fighting in their homeland. The story is writing itself with this conflict. Go Praes – the underdog!

I mean they could poison the water supply near the coast, burn the ports down after luring the invader in, evacuate the entire area, etc. We got a load of tactics to deal with war like this irl. I believe in the power of pride and spite. There is no way that the Praesi are going to take it lying down. This is the time for them to pull out all the nasty tricks.

Trupo

Did Malicia just feed Proceans an unsafe comms measure that Warlock and Masego can tap into at will?

Every time someone was scrying in the past, notion of Akua being possibly able to listen was rised, safety discussed, protocols changed. And now, on eve of war, Proceans get access to " the most precious secret of the East", don't seem aware of liabilities of crying and put it in hands of inexperienced mages who won't be able to spot weak points.

Are they going to be broadcasting their positions and plans for everyone to hear, while Cat can move the armies through Arcadia to react?

Also, Klaus seems to thing Amadis is going to fight Cat, while Amadis thinks he's moving to flank the Vales. With Masego tapping into Procean scrying the stairs look like a planned death trap.

Skraeling

Terribly sorry but... when was there contact between catherine and the first prince? I don't recall reading that.

Nif

I believe that was in the epilogue, where theif is sent as a messenger.

Gunslinger

Well RIP Amadis. A clearer sacrificial pawn cannot be found and I'd consider it easy for Cat to demolish them even with the presence of the old heroes. One of the visions she had in Akua's 4 fold crossing trap had the Bumbling Conjuror drop a mountain on Proceran armies to stop them in the Red Vales. The same thing could be easily done here.

Also it's interesting that the White Knight is going to be fighting Black instead of Cat. Aiming for a pattern of 3 there? Or maybe gaining practice until he's ready for his true opponent

---

Catherine is a more likely end opponent for Hanno: the Fate builds her up as an equal to him, just like it did with her and Akua:

"Justifications only matter to the just" vs "I do not judge".

Googling through the dead heroes' memories and absorbing their skills vs literally collecting undead heroes.

Artifact that calls on otherworldly creatures to punish the evildoers vs an evildoer calling on otherworldly creatures, made part of a magical artifact as a punishment.

Time will show whether the Fate will also equalize them in power, like it was with "deals with devils vs deals with fairies", "unlimited Greater Breaches vs unlimited gates to Arcadia" etc.

grzecho2222

I think that the most important detail is that Hanno is driven by absolut of justice and Bard is the entity with the most of blood of innocents on her hands.

werafdsaew

But the White Knight does not judge. He has surrendered his free will to the choir of judgement, so he won't act against the Wandering Bard until the choir judges her.

grzecho2222

That's the point, if White uses his coin on Bard you think absolut of justice will look kindly on everything she had done?

Ashen Shugar

The tricky thing about that though, is that it's heavenly justice, not absolute justice. Going by the riddle that Hanno solved by stating the King was in the wrong for not leaving justice up to the heavens, it's quite possible that anything that gets the Good Gods closer to winning may be seen as "justice" by the Choir. In fact, while humans may see it as Just things are what the Angels do, it may be the other way around and it's whatever the Angels do that is Just. Even if it's killing every single first born in the land that isn't behind a door with splashes of blood on the frame.

BarthHumphries

"Even if it's killing every single first born in the land that isn't behind a door with splashes of blood on the frame."

To be fair, things slowly ramped up. I mean, the very first plague was that an immediate drought happened and that all water turned to blood. Then frogs, lice, and either scorpions/snake or flies. And all of those animals crawling on them and in their homes wasn't enough. And then all of their livestock was stricken with disease, and everyone had boils on their skin (or giant ingrown pimples all over). And then the worst storm happened that Egypt had ever seen – hail falling and damaging buildings while lightning started fires. Then clouds of locusts that devoured every food source that was still left, and then complete darkness for the space of three days so that nobody could even leave what was left of their buildings. And I don't know about you, but after all that other stuff I would have been more afraid of what might have been in the darkness than I would have been of anything else.

And all of that still wasn't enough. So it became personal. We've seen similar things happen in this story – things slowly get ramped up because the smaller measures sometimes just aren't enough to change people's minds.

The way the Koran describes it, things also got really really bad and it still wasn't enough. So it became personal.

Antony444

Wow, Cordelia First Prince of Procer has been very busy the last decade. Armies, mages, the Stairway...it is a very rational and well-executed plan. Too bad those rarely survives contact with the enemy.

The first problem I see with this plan is that at no way she's ready to fight the Dead King now. She has mustered around 120 000 soldiers of Procer, and none can be deployed north to Cleves and Hainault in time if the Kingdom of the Dead invades this way. Should the undead abomination attacks as the first phase is unfolding, her nothern army will be on the other side of the mountains, the Vale army of Hannover will be locked in a death struggle against the Black Knight and the southern one has to fight against the Tyrant of Helike. Sure, Cordelia must have planned for reserves, but when the Dead King attacks, Procer is going to be hurt...

The second problem being of course that apparently they have no idea Catherine can use portals at will now, and transport the armies of Callow in time to stop this offensive.

Still, it is delicious to see even the side of Good is dealing with its betrayals, plots and nasty politics as much as the Evil Side does. The Tenth Crusade is on its way, and the Uncivil Wars are going to be a terrifying bloodbath...

wyaldriddler

My oh my. This is already shaping up to be a massive clusterfuck. I'll just go from the top on what I noticed:

The ten Wastelanders with scrying. Where this even came from is going to be a mystery for some time. Immediate guesses is that this is a play from Cat or Malicia or potentially defectors from Diabolist. However, we already know that Heirophant can send Corruption along demonic control links from another fucking dimension, so sending bad juju along all those convenient scrying links may also be in his bailiwick.

Klaus Papenheim's disregard for the south, his provincialism. It is a hole in his mind, a lack of trust which makes things shaky.

Brabant being cheap skates is probably going to bite them as a Chekov Oops later.

Sending that many heroes through the Stairway to Cat will make Harrow and the Stairway a pivot, by the very Laws of Creation. Whoever wins there, makes truly massive gains in the Tenth Crusade. Cat is good at harnessing pivots, and so is Black. And Prince Amadis is too caught in his own plays to be any kind of good thing for the army. A story of an army led by a foolish conniving prince through a pivot? He will die ignominiously. Conservation of Narrative also indicates that all of these heroes will through some means not be as effective as they should be I'd wager.

The way Ashur is stretching Praes. That isn't going to end well for someone.

Cat and Cordelia's deal, whatever that is. That's going to come out in the worst way, for somebody. Like someone commented, Cat's nature makes it so that any bargain she makes, if broken will *wreck* the other side. There are far too many stories of bargains with the Fey going sideways for something wacky not to happen. And no one knows she's Fey natured yet, or doesn't understand it yet.

Prince Amadis' casual disregard for the Chain of Hunger and Dead King.

The strangeness with the finances, where did that come from? Cat? Or did something else happen? Then there is the convoking of the Highest Assembly planned. The *arrogance* in there means its all going to go to shit, in this narratively driven universe. Put together, something is going to blow up for someone.

Does anyone remember which Hell it is that Demons start showing up in? The Twenty Sixth? For a second I thought Procer had the same number of provinces as the start of the Demon Hells. *shrug*

Harrow also has a Demon of Absence and devil Doom Standard in it(can't remember what they are actually called). That's going to be an unfun surprise for someone.

Black's recent philosophical conundrum is changing what is happening with him, and may well be confirming that he will die as the evil, but in some way redeemed Mentor Figure. Name business is going on there basically.

There are so *many* holes and plots and just *stuff* going on in the background. My God it's glorious. I have no idea who *will* win, but I'd guess it will be Cat.

grzecho2222

I think it was hell number 23, 24 being first with devils also "No," I agreed. "But Ratface's staff now has a representative from the Guild of Assassins attached. Those mages will be heading back to Praes through cities I control."

---

My pet theory is that, as a state forged in the wake of Triumphant's defeat, Principate's pattern is to stay at 23 principalities. Each time they try to add another one, the Fate turns against them.

TeK

On the contrary, I think when formed, Procer included some of Free Cities, as well as some of Levant. They just slowly lost those territories, otherwise those wouldn't be known as "former Proceran principalities".

TeK

"I did not think it a coincidence that the Twenty-Fourth Hell marked the transition from demons to devils."
I do not think it's a coincidence either.

BungieONI

Oh.

WELL.

That has *implications*.

BarthHumphries

I don't see that quote on this page.

TeK

Cause it isn't. It's from book 2 chapter 22, I think, where Masego wants to protect machford from devils.

oldschoolvillain

No, it was from the chapter where Catherine was first introduced to the Imperial Court. The one where Akua trapped her in the wager on the Grand Melee for command of the 15th Legion. She made the thought when she heard that official court sessions are held on the 24th floor.

TeK

Well, dunno about that, I copied it from the chapter 25 of book 2, in which they plan defence of matchford, I was mistaken earlier, drew it from the memory. If you look up the chapter you suggesting, you'll see that there wasn't outright mentioned, exactly why 24 is an important number, other than that it has something to do with demons.

taovkool

Lots of Prince and Princesses involved. The fight this time is gonna be that one about the Prince's Grave wasn't it?

Th3saint

The fact that cat armies can ignore space and have easy logistics due to Cats Arcadia Highways is a complete unknown to the Crusaders, that in the hands of Hellhound is a force multiplier in the order of a couple of Names at least.

Ward

Love from a dumbphone

dusting

well this has been a colossal set up for massive failure if I ever saw one.

Im very sure he's going to make history, just not in the way he expected...

TeK

One thing irking me, is the fact, that all those princes are no better then most imperial governors, yet they get to fight for the good guys, cause they crawled up on the right side of the mountains. And yes, the worst of them going to die, but it wouldn't change the same tendency. Exactly why many Heroes for generations ignore the unjust feudal system, which spares peasant blood like sand is beyond me.

Darkening

Well, it probably doesn't help that the only example of democracy seen in setting is the madness that is bellerophon. Might sour people a bit to the idea to the point where they just figure, "Well, putting someone actually good on the throne will fix everything!" instead of actually trying to change the system.

TeK

Technically, Ashur has some form of democracy, Free Cities are essentially a confederacy, HRE, oops, Procer even has a parlament, and as far as I'm concerned, the only authocratic state in Free League is Helike and maybe Penthes. The Atalante is most likely some take on theocracy, perhaps bishopic, or like a Papal state. Everything else? Some degree of democracy. So it is not like democracy is not existing or misrepresented. The root of the problem lies probably with the whole Named system, and for lesser part, stagnating technological progress. The only ones who can change the system are Named, and they tend to be arrogant and consider themselves better then plebs, or at least more important and suited for ruling. If they see the problem, they don't tend to think, that the problem is with the system, so they take reign, fix the problem, and then everything slowly regresses back.

Still, this is not an excuse for outright ignoring countless victims of everlasting squabbles between Heroes and Villains. No matter who wins, Good or Evil, the ones who pay the corpse price and suffer are simple, Nameless people on both sides. Like seriously, if you are so righteous, don't drag other people in your phylosophical debates on what kind of metaphysical bullshit tastes better. Part of the reason why Anaxares is my favorite character after best girl is that he, finally, represents those who don't have a name.

P.S. It's not that I root for democracy as the best form of goverment, period, but it pisses me off when thousand die on background, sometimes without any mention. It's even worse than what Black said: "One half of world, turn into a prop for the glory of the other half". It's the whole world, turned into a background to glorify butchers and murderers. I mean, let us be fair, did anyone even heard of the names like Architector, Compositor, Artist, Statesman, Farmer, Philosopher, Blacksmith, Woodcutter, Lumberjack? Inherently peacefull Names, I mean? Even Bards and Scribes are turned into the weapons and fighters. It's like the world propagates that the only way to live is to war.

grzecho2222

It's like in real life, everybody is right from their perspective. But if it will go as it went in reality then fact that absolute monarchy (Black) and positivims (Cat) are making waves than feudal nobles don't have much time left.

TeK

Well, what dissappoints is the fact that most of those views are heavily underrepresented. Black's absolutism is derailed curtesy of Malicia, and I think Cat doesn't have enough administrating capability and savviness to implement such reforms. Scrying will tilt the balance if only a little, but unless some really big threat comes and stays, everything will return as it were. Anyway, I'd wager Callow and Praes turned into centralised administrative monarchy not unlike european governments after Renaissance, Procer uniting in face of this and Dead King threat going up to eleven, as well is at loss of most of the princes, with some principalities adding to Free Cities, which turns more united and centralized, Switzerland style. Don't know what to expect from Levant, certainly not an Inquisition.

The biggest problem is timeframe. The meanigful changes implemented and the Crusade fought needs to be done over the course of last two books, which gives us from two to five years of action, and this is practically nothing in the bigger picture. Moreover, the seafaring, warfare and agriculture, as far as I can tell, really lacking for any meaningfull govermental changes. And Names are a wild card too. Still, it's fun to debate politics in a made up fantasyverse.

hoyboy

Black is not an absolute monarch, nor is Cat a... positivist, whatever the hell that means. The ideology they represent is pretty blatantly militant proto-fascism.

d_o_l

Man, why are you even reading this story?

Forrest

Are we even reading the same story? Since when has cat been even remotely fascist?

grzecho2222

Political positivism is at it simplest the idea that when one want to change country for better they should start down and not give a heck about whinning of elites

Ryan DD Durnell

Yeah...I get that most Good can't actually be "good" because that would create a world of absolutes that's essentially unlivable. Still, these jackasses are really pushing the limits. I patiently await severe karmic backlash.

Also, welcome back! Get published, dawg, I'll push some dollars into your pockets!

Letouriste

Making history he say 😊

Pretty sure his defeat will be so total he will really be in history^^

I expect these praesis to be given by cat and that whole « surprise » attack to have been in the negocation.

Cat win will boost moral and defeat several heroes in the process and hasenbach get the removal of an annoying party trying to hurt her.

So funny to read the POV of a fodder in a story so out of his capacities to deal with

Letouriste

What are the odds these scrying spells are actually a huge trap mean to kill the mages involved and removing all communication between armies at critical timing?

boballab

I get the feeling that the Stairway is the backstab to the deal between Cat and Cordelia. Too bad that an invasion route one way can easily turn into one the other way when the incompetent Prince gets his army wiped out. Got 10 Quataloos that he doesn't listen to the Hero's with him.

Ryan DD Durnell

I actually hope Amadis DOESN'T fold like a cheap deck of cards. It would be refreshing to see someone neither Named nor non-human exercise some relevance and present a serious challenge.

The discussion about democracy, the little people, etc is not new to fiction. It's why there are people who say "the Jedi are as bad as the Sith." When really thought over, the average person in almost any system can get by, maybe even prosper and enjoy life, regardless of whether or not they have a vote (and most people don't vote anyway).

That cannot be said for Praes (evil) with its nightmarish idiocy or Procer (good) with its institutionalized backbiting. So they both suck and should die in a fire.

TeK

It's not really about the equality of power, rather an equality of opportunity. The changes of world are reserved solely for Named, which is, given that Named are heavily influenced by their names, turns to chronically stagnating world. Same stories repeat, over and over, just new people die in them. And nothing really changes. Same borders, same Names, same technology, crap, same demographic situation.

oldschoolvillain

Cordelia isn't named, and she's been going round for round against Malicia in a shadow war across the continent since before the story began. She's also been the driving force behind three threats – that we know of – those being this Crusade, William/The Liesse Rebellion, and Tasia Sahelian. And she's had her hands in the war for the Free Cities in which the Hierarch was elected, as well. AND the Epilogue of Book Three revealed that she has agents in the Legions of Terror. She has been involved in literally every major conflict so far, and she doesn't have a Name at all.

TeK

Or does she? Tum-tum-tuuuum.

SMHF

Well it's nice to know the Good side's gonna have its fair share of backstabbing in the crusade!

Also Congrats! The guide's finally first in topwebfiction!

Don't forget to vote guys! that's how I find this story in the first place!

<http://topwebfiction.com/?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

TeK

It's actually fifth.

Adra

Looks like, at least from a stylistic standpoint, Queen of Blades is out of the running for Cat. Wouldn't make sense from an aesthetic standpoint to line Queen of Blades up vs. Saint of Blades, doesn't sound good on paper, er, screen.

oldschoolvillain

It actually sounds like an amazing matchup. Just not sure who would win.

d_o_l

I noticed in chapter 37 of book 3, the name is called "Saint of Swords" instead. Seems like a minor continuity error. Also, Queen of Blades vs Saint of Swords would be a fucking awesome match up.

Shawn Panzegraf

Few things *I* noticed,
If the timeskip is truly as large as it appears, that goblin tribe Cat allowed to settle near Marchford is ENORMOUS by now. The factors we've been told contribute to goblin mortality are nearly ALL absent outside the Gray Eyries. (Competition for resources. Schemes of Matron Vs. Matron. Breaking into Dwarven tunnels accidentally etc.) Any species whose members possess lifespans as short as goblins undoubtedly breed like cockroaches. If twenty is pretty much unreachable without blood magic, FIVE might be sexual maturity!

Heroes don't get the cool no-aging-until-killed that villains do. Meaning if this Saint of Blades and Grey Pilgrim are really all that old, skilled and badass, they are also likely reasonable frail and vulnerable when not actively wielding Named power. They may well be simply on the north side of middle-aged...but I suspect they possess some significant, if fairly well-hidden, weakness rooted in their biology. (I'm still irked by Ranger's half-elven heritage. It makes deciding whether she's a metaphysical Villain or Heroine impossible to confirm. I lean towards the latter, but that's just me. I would not at all put it past her to lie about the fact, and have found a convincing way to lie about it to all Creation)

Cordelia's Crusade is riddled with metaphysical problems. For one, she's called it for reasons I doubt the Heavens would even approve of. She cares more about creating a Good super-state than actually defeating the targeted Evil. Nearly all her internal musings center on building the groundwork for what will become her envisioned super-state generations from now. Quite covetous of her. Not to mention deceitful and treacherous (As she's essentially plotting the dissolution of all the ruling mechanisms of all her allies, to be carried out at a time convenient for her descendants.) For another, she lacks WEIGHT in the way Akua declares Malicia and Black do. She connives, she deceives...she's basically a 2nd-rate Malicia without a Name, who deludes herself into believing she's good. All while considering her own commoners "animals to be exploited." Disposing of "unruly Fantassins?" How Stalinist of you, Cordelia.

Lastly, this Crusade has too many moving parts for even the Providence-heavy Hand of the Heavens to protect from Murphy's Law. There is a REASON Black uses such extreme security measures when utilizing scrying while abroad. Remember him burning out mage-relays? Remember his rule about one message to a given location inside a LARGE area? Remember his unwillingness to even consider using a line of scrying he'd previously utilized? All speak to the fact that hacking a scrying channel is probably actually easier than maintaining a legit scrying channel in the first place.

In fact, I'm almost CERTAIN of that fact. Remember, one of the most fundamental elements of magic in this universe is, according to Warlock "Sorcery is Usurpation." Kinda implies that usurping a scrying attempt is easier than scrying, eh? Would also explain why Black was so rabid about time limits, and circumstances under which he'd utilize it.

Forrest

To be fair about the crusade... since when does the Good of the Heavens actually seem 'good'? The heavens are all for brainwashing normal everyday people into being cannon fodder against evil. Not to mention, a Good empire being created in the long term would probably be all up in that greater good bs.

MetruX

This reminds me of a theory I've had since the second book, now. You see, there is a saying that, in the beginning, the Gods disagreed on what to do about creation: some wanted to set it free, some wanted to control it, and thus Good and Evil were made. They are NOT the supreme good or evil, they are facets of reality embodied, through the vision of those Gods. And my theory is that the one who wanted to control is not the Evil, but the Good side, while the Evil is all about leaving them for themselves. Surely none of the sides are good for us, but even though some parts of this theory make alot of sense, it's hard to imagine that the Evil side is guiding people, which is whate is stated to be the side of Good... Though it could also be that we don't understand how it is guiding or that it was a plain lie, since the books tell that Good is about guiding and Evil about controlling..

wyaldriddler

The whole distinction is supposed to be ambiguous. However, given that the Angels are basically "Yoho! Your brain is mine nao!" in every incarnation of them we've seen, or otherwise basically brainwash you into doing what they want and even more damningly don't try to improve mortal's lots it seems like the "Good" side described in the books is all about control and absolute order.

wyaldriddler

Thinking about it, it's actually plausible Evil and Good share qualities of control and guidance, and the ratio shifts depending on context.

BBM

Getting some serious SMT vibes from this.

NZPIEFACE

Rip this dude. I don't think Duchess Kegan would like to betray Cat.

oldschoolvillain

Nope. Not after whatever deal she made with Catherine. Especially not after Catherine sent Masego to help rework the Gestalt and increase the security on it to prevent another Akua.

Author Unknown

I'm surprised no one asked if they brought any elephants.

JackbeThimble

'Lord Papenheim- Magon Hadast writes to report that his fleet has descended on Praes like, quote 'A wolf on the Fold' endquote. He requests resupply of purple paint for his newly raised cohorts.'
'Excellent Bertrand, send word to the wives of Ashur that they have nothing to worry about and their menfolk should be home by christmas.'

Onos

Ha! Never noticed old Klaus refers to a collective of Heroes the same as Cat! It really is the little things, well played EE.

vuthuha912

The Crusaders are going to lose this or they won't get much from this entire ordeal.

Firstly, Cordelia isn't fighting to win – it is just a secondary goal for her. She wants to unite the Good nations, deal with her political opponents, and maybe stop Black and Malicia. Her fighting force also does not have the strongest will to win, either. In war, one of the crucial elements for victory especially between two closely matched opponents is the will. Obviously, people who fight for survival, for their own country are going to be more willing to fight and push the extra mile. This is why having a superweapon is a huge blow to Praes/Callow – it hampers the feeling of urgency for their fighting forces and it bolsters the fighting will of their opponent. It is simpler to justify a war to destroy a superweapon than a war to ... do whatever ... to your fighting force. Now that Black has destroyed the weapon, and the thing never shot at any Good nation, the morale is weakened. But, with the massive casualty of the Praesi force, their own morale is also weakened. I expect a boost while fighting on home turf for Praes and Callow.

Secondly, Procer is not ready. My dearest Cordelia just drags her country out of a civil war, The population needs time to recover, they need to replenish their granary and prepare the supply for the war. During the war, agriculture production will suffer as the working forces get drafted into the army. That is why you need to prepare for 10 years before you wage war for 1 year – to store enough food, have enough kids, train enough troops, stomp enough political dissidents, make enough propaganda, and build enough shelters. The moment the war drags out, you have a war on two fronts – Chain of Hunger and Praes. Procer economy is fucked regardless. If you can't guarantee a decisive victory, it is not worth fighting at all.

Thirdly, Procer and its allies have different motives. Sure, they are fighting against the same enemies but they are fighting for completely different reasons. Uniting everyone for a common enemy usually work if you are facing an overwhelming enemy and you are fighting for mutual survival. Alliances like this are as likely to fall apart as staying together. Just look at the Coalition vs Dong Zhou or the 5 nations vs Qin. All of these alliances fell apart. The Coalition outnumbered Dong Zhuo, they even have a righteous cause – rescuing the Emperor and the nation. It fell apart the moment they get their first victory. Qin was an overwhelming enemy. Yet, the fight for survival did not stop these countries from infighting, corruption, and backstabbing each other. They handed the Qin half the victory of that conflict. Sure the Allies won against the Axis in WWII but we all remember how shit the Allies did at the beginning of the war. They were too busy burying their head in the sand and only started being serious after it was clear that Germany was not going to stop. Germany fought entire Europe to a standstill.

Praes did stop. It doesn't encroach on Procer and Callow even gains its independence. The Allies betrayed each other the moment the War was over – USSR vs USA. Haizz... Cordelia is working on a beautiful dream but it is just that – a dream.

Finally, the infighting of Procer nobility. There is nothing more detrimental to your odd in war than infighting among the administration. Remember Gaozong and Yue Fei. Remember Joseon court vs Yi Sun Si. Remember Li Mu and King of Zhao. Gaozong killed Yue Fei, his best general due to political conflicts, in a middle of a war. The Joseon court imprisoned Yi Sun Sin twice DURING the Japanese invasion. Li Mu got killed by his King when he was fighting the Qin. The possibility of human stupidity across time and distance is astonishing.

To be fair, Praes is just as likely to fall for this problem as Procer. With Malicia and Black in a cold war right now, it is possible that she will stab him before the Crusaders get to him. However, they obviously love each other so maybe they won't. Callow is still an ally of convenience at the moment. As long as they survive the Crusade, they can talk it out with each other.

---

Chapter 1: Observatory

"Those who withstood the sword, I laid low with ink."

– Words carved into the tomb of Dread Emperor Terribilis I, the Lawgiver

I rarely used the council room these days. Under the Fairfaxes the King's Council had been the greatest organ of power in the realm, closer to the crown than any and wielding influence far beyond that of the titles of the men and women having been appointed to it. I'd retained only parts of it, though, the ones I found useful. I had no need for a Chamberlain to see to the 'royal household', when mine was essentially me and whatever part of the Woe happened to be in Laure at the time. And even then I doubted Thief had slept in her chambers more than twice. She preferred prowling the city when she was there. Masego disdained his rooms as well, though for reasons somewhat more worrying. No, broadening the authority of the palace's seneschal had been quite sufficient. Not that all old roles had been so easily disposed of. With Anne Kendall in the seat of Governess-General, Juniper as my Marshal and Ratface as my Lord Treasurer there'd been only one seat left worth filling: Keeper of the Seals. In the old kingdom, those had been tasked with overseeing courts of law and making sure the decrees of the crown were upheld across Callow.

That seemed a glorified clerk's position, until one remembered the way the kingdom had functioned under the Fairfaxes.

Though laws decreed in Laure held sway across the realm in theory, in practice the hair-raising labyrinth of ancient privileges and prerogatives held by most highborn houses made it a nightmare for any single decree to be uniformly observed. I'd been amused to learn that House Talbot, whose old demesne was now my own, had for several centuries been allowed to trade in lands directly held by the crown without tariffs as part of an old deal that saw a generous loan offered to a king so he could build a summer palace by the Silver Lake. I'd been even more amused to learn that said palace had been wrecked by Praesi within the decade when they attempted to invade the heartlands of Callow through an underwater invasion – orcs with gills, apparently – down the Pening river. One of the Malignants, that'd been, I was pretty sure. A Dread Emperor of the worst mould, incompetent at everything but murderously ensuring his rivals didn't overthrow him. Regardless of historical curiosities, the Empire had actually allowed me to inherit a significantly more centralized realm in many ways. With Baron Darlington of Hedges and Baroness Morley of Harrow the only two remaining landed nobles in Callow, I didn't have nearly as many powerful people barking about privileges and prerogatives.

What I did end up having, however, was my court's first real power struggle. Now that the governors across Callow all answered to the crown through the Governess-General the office of Keeper of the Seals held a lot more direct power than it'd used to, with a lot less pushback to boot. Crown decrees had a lot more teeth, these days, and the Keeper had a great deal of latitude in ensuring they were upheld. Everyone and their sister had gone after the appointment, beginning the charm offensive the moment I was crowned. The only ones who'd stayed out of the fray were the Deoraithe, and I'd almost asked Kegan to send me a competent cousin just for that. Brandon Talbot and his tribe of old aristocrats had been the most ferocious, though the northern baronies had tried to muscle his people out – the fight between the powers in Laure and the distant northern nobles was an old one. A few elders in Laure had actually tried to bribe Ratface into putting in a good word for their candidate, banking on the Taghreb reputation for venality, and instead found themselves fined for the exact same sum and unceremoniously drummed out of office.

I picked a southerner, in the end, after tasking Baroness Kendall to find me a suitable one. After the massacre at Second Liesse, what had once been the duchy of the same name and even the region as a whole had been on the brink of collapse. It'd only been the reparations I obtained from the Empress and Hakram's feverish work that kept the place from eating itself alive, and even now it was the most unstable part of my realm. A major city and over a hundred thousand people were gone from the heart of the south, it wasn't something that could be healed in a year. Or even a decade. Binding whatever powers remained down there to the crown had been necessary, and my Governess-General managed to dig up a candidate that wouldn't fuck up the duties that came with the appointment. Edith Westmore had once been a lady in her own right, before her liege lord took up arms in the Liesse Rebellion, and even after had remained a wealthy landowner. She had the reputation and the connections to be a capable Keeper of Seals, and though I wasn't particularly fond of her as a person neither did she grate my nerves. It was no lifetime appointment, regardless.

Lady Edith was not here in my solar, not this afternoon anyway. I'd had the richly-panelled room furnished more to my tastes – which largely meant removing all the more ostentatious stuff and filling the new liquor cabinet to the brim – and these days I conducted most royal business in here. The comfortable surroundings helped allay the inevitable bouts of tediousness that seemed to accompany the work of making Callow into a halfway-functioning nation. My two companions at the table bathed by afternoon sun were the two members of my council I saw most often: Governess-General Anne Kendall and Lord Treasurer Hasan Qara. Who still insisted on being called Ratface, though he'd come to embrace the sobriquet of Bastard Lord as well. He got a kick out of how much it horrified Praesi envoys.

"We've another petition from Hedges," Anne said, shuffling parchments. "On the subject of tariffs in Laure and Southpool."

The silver-haired woman glanced delicately at my treasurer after speaking. Ratface seemed distinctly unamused, though the irritation was not directed at Kendall.

"They're trying to flood the markets with wool," the Taghreb told me. "They have entire warehouses going to waste, the Jacks confirmed it."

'The Jacks' was a very fancy title for my ever-growing web of thieves, smugglers, spies and sundry informants. It was nowhere as unified and well-organized as the appellation implied, with Aisha's network of kinsmen in Praes, Ratface's guildsmen and Thief's friends being different organizations entirely. Adjutant oversaw the whole mess of disparate reports and pieced it together into a coherent picture before bringing it to me. As for the name, well, it was known in some circles that the Guild of Thieves was now in my pay. Mutterings at my court about lowly knaves entering the crown's service had been frequent in early days, and Vivienne had amused herself by picking a fucking pun she knew I'd despise but still have to use frequently – knave was another name for a jack, in Callowan card decks. Of all my companions, Thief was the one whose sense of humour always ended up screwing me some way or another.

"They would eat at their own profits if they did," Kendall frowned. "Compared to selling to the crown they would be making a loss."

"We're not buying as much anymore," I noted. "South's mostly settled, all the notable tent cities are clothed and fed."

"It's a farsighted ploy," Ratface told us. "They're not after immediate profit here, they're trying to put the local guilds out of business. After they've cornered the market, they can start slowly raising prices. Thalassina tried the same thing with the spice trade under Nefarious, it nearly started a war with Nok."

"If they spent half as much time seeing to their own as they do thinking up ways to fuck with me, the north would be a godsdamned paradise," I said through gritted teeth.

Baroness Kendall cleared her throat.

"Though I cannot speak as to the mercantile effects," she said, "from a diplomatic perspective we have already done much to antagonize Hedges. A concession might be in order."

"I prevented them from fleecing desperate refugees, Anne," I flatly replied. "I didn't exactly piss in their morning porridge."

"All they see is expected gold never reaching their coffers," my Governess-General said. "And I must remind you that our grasp on the region is still feeble. Fear will only get us so far."

Fear was what had gotten us anything at all, I thought. I had no illusions about the loyalty of those two holdout baronies. I doubted they'd truly join the fold within my lifetime. Even confirming nearly all their old privileges – the right to mint their own coin being the largest abolished – and leaving their holdings untouched they still wanted more. Aristocrats. My growing exposure to the lot of them had done nothing to improve my opinion of the breed, save for a few exceptions.

"Quotas," I finally said. "Enough they can get a foothold, not enough they can eat the whole cake. And make it clear to the right people that I expect positions on having observing Legion officers attached to their armies to... change accordingly."

Kendall inclined her head, the touch of the sun on her locks rather fetching as she did. For a woman her age she remained strikingly beautiful.

"I'll have a proposal drafted," Ratface said. "Now, I know we've spoken of this before but..."

I grimaced, fairly sure I knew what was coming.

"There is too much Imperial coinage circulating in Callow, Catherine," he said. "We need to start buying it up."

Were I not Named, I might never have noticed the slight crease on the Governess-General's brow when she heard Ratface refer to me by my given name. She and I had once been more familiar as well, but that had gone up in smoke since my coronation. Anne Kendall was a patriot to the bone: it didn't matter how I'd gotten my crown, now that I wore it I was to be treated as loftily as any Fairfax.

"You're my treasurer," I sighed. "You know damn well we don't have the funds for that. And the Empress might see it as provocation, which we really can't afford at the moment."

A year of regular reports had made it painfully clear to me that while Praesi troops might no longer garrison my cities or Praesi lords rule them, Praesi influence was far from gone. I'd spent so much time paying attentions to borders and armies that I'd never considered the Wasteland would still have a leash in the form of coin and commerce. Trade with Procer had pretty much ended after the Conquest, and trade to Mercantis had been dominated by Imperial governors. The wealth came from the east, these days, and there was precious little I could do about that at the moment. Not when it was the Tower's gold that had rebuilt an entire third of my realm. I'd had to make concessions to ensure that materialized, too. We'd been keeping Callow afloat for the last year by gouging the High Lords scrabbling for grain through trade permits and set prices, but the Tower had been exempted from both. To an extent, anyway. I'd insisted on keeping large reserves in anticipation of the crusade.

"So long as nearly half the coinage in Callow is from the Imperial Mint, the Tower can break the realm's coffers at will," Ratface said. "All the Empress needs to do is devalue her currency and the south goes up in flames. It's a knife at our throat, Catherine. I understand the Hellhound is riding you about funding for the army, but another thousand men will make no difference if we can't pay those soldiers."

"Our own coin is slowly displacing the others," Baroness Kendall pointed out. "Patience might be the wisest answer."

The Taghreb shook his head.

"We're replacing old Callowan coinages," he said. "We barely touched the Wasteland portion. The Carrion Lord spent decades making certain Callow was dependent on Imperial coin for trade, it is not work that can be undone in a few years' span. Not unless we plan and invest."

"There has to be an alternative to just taking the Empress' gold off the streets by emptying our coffers, Ratface," I said.

"That'd be as good as raising a banner in her eyes. There would be immediate retaliation."

The handsome man wrinkled his nose, rather unbecomingly.

"Using Mercantis as a third party, perhaps," he finally said. "It would be slower and costlier, and still have us vulnerable to foreign influence."

I sighed.

"Draft-"

"A proposal, yes," he finished amusedly. "Ah, the joys of queenship."

"Don't you fucking start," I muttered. "Between this and learning all those godsdamned Proceran languages my eyes are going to fall off."

Baroness Kendall delicately cleared her throat.

"Not to add undue burden, but there is one last petition," she said.

"Go on," I grunted. "As long as it's not our man in Vale whining about granary distribution again."

"Officials have presented a formal request that the court return to the use of the Alban calendar," she told me.

I snorted.

"Yeah, that's not happening," I said. "The Legions all use -"

I heard the movement behind the door before the knock sounded. My ears pricked. Man, late thirties, fine health. He smelled of anxiousness, though well short of fear.

"Enter," I called out before he'd finished knocking.

I felt the gaze of the other two on me. Ah. I really needed to stop doing that. It did tend to make people uncomfortable. It was a servant, who I did not recognize though the livery made it clear he was one of the palace staff.

"Your Majesty," he greeted me, bowing low before offering shallower bows to the others.

He'd been slightly reluctant when it came to Ratface's turn, I noted. There'd been a lot of that since the moment I first appointed the Taghreb. I raised an expectant eyebrow at him.

"There is word from, uh, the Observatory," the man said. "Your presence has been requested. The Lord Hierophant allegedly spoke of a 'major phenomenon'."

Translation: Masego had summoned me while, again, forgetting you weren't actually supposed to summon queens. I didn't really mind, but his brutal lack of regard for etiquette did seem to unsettle the servants whenever they came in contact with it. I rose to my feet, pushing my seat back.

"We'll reconvene in an hour to finish this," I told the other two.

"You speak so queenly, these days," Ratface grinned. "I haven't seen you spit on the ground in months."

"Yeah, well, I own all the carpets now," I muttered.

We made our courtesies, some more courteously than others, and then I dismissed the servant who seemed intent on accompanying me. I knew the way to the Observatory: I'd paid for the damned thing to be built out of an uninhabited wing of the palace. I wasn't keeping a mistress, or a husband for that matter, so luxurious rooms reserved for one had been more than a little unnecessary. It wasn't a long walk, but I lengthened my stride out of impatience. Still took the time to greet the servants and officials I came across, though. Actually learning all the names was a daydream given their sheer number, but if I could get at least half right it'd be a start. Better than Archer, anyway, who just called them whatever she felt like at the time. Getting this damned thing built had been strolling right into a series of rows with most my closest advisors, Juniper and Ratface the worst of them. My former Supply Tribune had been appalled at the costs involved, especially since some materials had to be brought directly from the Wasteland, while the Hellhound had bluntly told me that for the same amount of coin we could arm and armour over a thousand men and that'd be a lot more useful in the long run. It was rare enough for the two of them to agree on anything that I'd seriously reconsidered my commitment.

It'd still been built, in the end, and Masego had proved that his work had value beyond gold or steel. Without the Observatory at least three heroes would have slipped into Callow unseen, and the results of that could have been disastrous.

I felt the outer wards long before I arrived at the end of the corridor. As the only way in or out of the Observatory, it was now the most scrupulously protected part of the palace. The full line of legionaries guarding the corridor saluted as I went by, and I nodded back. Hakram's people, these. The amount of soldiers and bureaucrats under Adjutant's direct command had steadily increased along with his responsibilities. My blood was keyed into the outer wards, which were more trap than boundary, and so I got to the bronze gates with only a mild headache to show for it. I rapped my knuckles against the metal, careful to moderate my strength. There was still a dent left from the one time I'd forgotten. The bronze doors opened after a few heartbeats, and behind them stood a dark-skinned woman. She hastily knelt. Fadila Mbafeno had been one of Akua's minions once, before I spared her at Hierophant's request. She'd since served as an assistant in his mage's tower, and now effectively ran the Observatory. On parchment Masego's word was law here, so long as I did not contradict him, but his utter disinterest in the logistics of the place meant all the responsibilities were in the Soninke mage's hands.

I disliked her, though not enough to do anything about it, but I would not deny she was extremely competent. Diabolist had always picked the cream of the crop, when it came to minions. Not that it'd ever stopped her from sacrificing them at the drop of a hat.

"Your Majesty," Fadila said. "I invite you within."

Nothing changed, visibly at least. There was a subtle current of power beneath her words, but even trying to feel it out would disperse it. I knew better than to think that'd been an empty sentence, though. I still vividly remembered the searing pain that had followed trying to pass the threshold without explicit permission.

"Rise," I said, and strode by her.

Passing the threshold was not painful, per se. It was more like being squeezed through a very narrow gap, a temporary constriction of my being. Once inside the room proper there was a sense of relief, but I knew from experience it would be short-lasting. A bigger cage was still a cage. The inner Observatory was warded up something fierce, some of those defences specifically against fae. They were deeply unpleasant for me, but I'd deal with the discomfort if it meant Larat couldn't ever set foot in here. Falida rose as bid, and followed three full steps behind me a little to the left. Wasteland etiquette, I thought sardonically, though in all fairness Callow had its fair share of little quirks as well. What had once been a full wing of the royal palace had been ripped out of even load-bearing walls, discreet arcs instead supporting the weight of the domed ceiling now. It was a single massive room and awake with quiet activity. Circling at the feet of the walls a boardwalk of granite made an outer ring, linked to pebbled paths that made up the spokes of a giant wheel from a bird's eye view. Within those spaces pools of dark water lay still, save for when mages stirred them to life with whispered spells. Scrying pools, particularly powerful ones.

Getting the mages to keep them manned had been difficult, since the Army of Callow was already short on spellcasters, and ultimately I'd had to draft a few competent officers then draw heavily upon the now-disbanded Guild of Hedges. Getting Masego to teach those middling sorcerers how to scry properly had been a rough conversation, but he'd ultimately conceded that an empty Observatory would rather defeat the point of raising it in the first place. The legal status of the sorcerers had been a thorny matter to handle even after they were trained. They could not part of the Army of Callow or the Legions of Terror, as Juniper was still a general in the Empress' employ as well as my marshal and that would give Malicia a degree of influence over them. I'd not wanted to give the court any sway over them either, but placing them under my direct authority would mean the moment Hakram and I went on campaign they fell in a legal morass. I had to be careful about things like that, these days. Taking the crown had brought nearly as many complications as it had solutions. As an awkward compromise they'd been made into a guild, approved by my seal, the head of which was Masego. In his absence it was Fadila who ran things as his appointed second, with just enough independence she could do whatever needed to be done while the fact that the Observatory was the crown's property meant Anne Kendall had enough authority to step in if things got out of hand.

I pushed aside the thoughts as I tread one of the pebbled paths to the centre of the room, where Masego awaited. A second smaller ring of granite had been laid there, but it could hardly be seen. From the dark waters grew a massive alder tree whose roots spread into every pool and whose summit rose to touch the ceiling of painted runes and night sky. There was nothing natural about it, from the overly pale bark to the almost crimson leaves. Growing from the trunk a handful of branches formed a structure halfway between a bed and a seat, and before it a depression in the trunk made room for an item pulsing with power. It didn't look like much to the naked eye, a wide bowl of baked clay whose supports were shaped like men and devils supporting the rim. It'd taken Archer the better part of a month to find it and get it out of the ruins of Liesse, but I'd never seriously considered leaving the scrying artefact of the Sahelians among the wreck no matter the difficulties. Once Akua's discreet trump card, it was now the heart of the Observatory. In the wooden seat before it, Masego was laying down and looking half-asleep. I could see his pupils moving beneath the black eyecloth, but aside from that Hierophant was eerily still.

He'd lost weight again, I saw as I got closer. Even now that Fadila was under strict instructions to make sure he ate he still spent most hours of the days and night in that seat and rarely moved unless he was forced to. I almost hesitated to touch him, for he tended to be confused for a bit when wrenched out of his scrying. The decision was made for me, in the end. The branches above rustled, and someone casually tossed a sloppily sculpted wooden duck at his forehead. He wrenched back to Creation with a yelp as Archer emerged from the foliage dangling upside down.

"Evening, Cat," she grinned. "Congratulations, you're getting invaded."

I considered this, then smiled back.

"Evening, Indrani," I said, and wrenched her down to splash noisily in a pool.

Eyes turning to Masego, who looked only half-here even now, I sighed.

"Tell me everything," I ordered.

---

d_o_l

Damn, another set-up chapter. I'm dying to see Cat's reaction to the Stairway and her plan to deal with it. Guess I'll have to wait until Monday.

Author Unknown

Everyone else, when they invent time travel, wants to go kill Hitler. Me, I'm going to be a whole lot of reading.

letouriste

killing hitler is a bad idea anyway, what he and his crownies did,others would have done too.they set a precedent and humanity got a little better as a result...maybe.

Snowfire1224

Actually I think it isn't as bad idea to kill Hitler as many people make it out to be, although it certainly would change history.

<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Analysis/HitlersTimeTravelExemptionAct>

*boballab*

Bah Hitler was minor league, I say go big or go home: Go after Stalin or Mao people that killed somewhere 6 to 10 times as many people.

N/A

Nah, Stalin didn't actually kill as many people as Hitler. Probably crippled a lot more, but the gulags were legitimately work camps, not death camps.

boballab

Hitler racked up 6-10 million deaths, Stalin killed as many as Hitler did in 1932-33 alone during what is called the Holodomor. He racked up another 30 million minimum between the dissidents, the German prisoners they never returned to Germany after the war and forcing out people of German descent from Eastern European countries. Most credible historians range the total number of deaths under Stalin from between 25 – 60 million placing him as number two on the all time mass murder list only behind Mao.

TeK

Highly offtopic, but Holodomor was a starvation that occurred on most of USSR territory, for legitimate and natural reasons. Also, blaming one person for all of this is stupid. Also also, the count ranges from 8 millions to 61. Also also also, can we all please stop?

therealgridlock

No.

Communism is bad in all its forms. So is socialism. So is fascism. So is every kind of totalitarianism.

To argue otherwise is to spit in the face of hundreds of millions of dead that go before us.

jflb96

Neither communism nor socialism are inherently totalitarian, neither have killed hundreds of millions of people, and neither have killed more than capitalism does every decade. Keep drinking your CIA-approved Kool Aid, though, they'll be very pleased that they've successfully turned you against true democracy and equality.

letouriste

never heard of the hitler paradoxe? you can't kill him or everything is destroyed, the man is too important in our history=> every person in the world right now has been at least a little influenced by him (indirectly).
also, this is not a matter of how many people died^^ but more of why they have been killed and how.
i agree staline was no better though

stevenneiman

Personally, I think it would be a bad idea because I consider it possible that he would be replaced by someone who would harness the anger and frustration of the German people as effectively and then not prove to be such an inept warleader. Not saying it was a guarantee or even super likely, but people like Hitler get ignored or treated in a functional and happy society, and for all that WWII was horrific it only killed about 2% of the world population and the survivors didn't end up ruled by a world-spanning tyranny. Even a small chance of an actual victory for Hitler doesn't seem acceptable to me in exchange for possibly preventing WWII from happening at all. Especially since without the lessons of WWII it's possible that preventing it would still just lead to an even more horrific war a few decades down the line.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

If lots of Jews went back in time to try to kill Hitler (and all failed because of paradoxes and such), then from Hitler's perspective, Jews have been trying to kill him since his birth, and suddenly the Holocaust seems like a pretty reasonable reaction...

Amoonymous

I'd be too afraid to change history to go back in time. I'd save up as much money as I could, throw it in as long term/high interest assets as possible, then jump into the future.

Not to mention, like you said, all the novel updates.

Levi Kalden

Honestly, I had the same thought

SpeckofStardust

welp now the question is how fast she counters this.

Euodiachloris

If it gets her out of the palace? Warp speed may be achieved.
Followed very closely by snail's pace, if only to put off going back . 😊

Stormblessed

I like the kind of quiet chapter this is. Too many explosive intense chapters isn't the best thing.

Bell Towers

Woot. So excited for the 10th Crusade!

wirelessgrapes

I really do get a good sense of desperation from this chapter, and it really builds the atmosphere well. I can't wait to see the crazy plays that Cat's gonna run to buy time.

Rook

Although, half the desperation seems to be patching the country back together while the other half is desperation to get away from the ink and bureaucracy. A problem that's solvable by shoving steel into it until it stops moving is probably a welcome diversion at this point, especially considering most of the time skip was spent trying to forge callow into said sharp piece of steel.

userans22

Which character from the beginning of the series do you think Cat is most similar to now?

Dana Moore

To me. She is still Cat. Her view point has not changed. She just got where she wanted to be decades ahead of where she had planned. And two orders of magnitude more powerful than when she began. But she is still the smart, doing what is necessary, pit fighter from the first.

Highwayman

Good touch with the issue of money, EE; really drives it home that Callow is on shaky ground. All the Tower has to do to wreck them is it print more cash, slowly squeezing Callow with increasing interest rates and inflation. Yay to macroeconomics!
*grumbles*

JackbeThimble

I'm not sure how realistic this is. Prior to the widespread adoption of paper money the value of coinage would mostly have been based on the metal content rather than the backing of a government. I'm not an expert but most of what I've read indicates that medieval traders probably didn't care very much about the provenance of their coinage.

---

The issue is that one side has reserves of gold and precious gems for a rainy day, while the other is already minting coin at its maximum capacity to overtake the markets. If Empress starts changing the amount of gold in her coinage now, she can shake everyone else something fierce.

Decius

If the value of the coin is based on the metal in it, then it shouldn't be catastrophically expensive to melt the coinage down and remint it.

Hombre del Sur

To remint it, you still need to own it. Hence the problem of having to acquire it first, which also costs money that they don't have yet.

BarthHumphries

You could always do what "ancient" England did. All coins have a date stamped on them and are only good for three years. All coins could only be reminted at licensed "minting stations" (I don't remember the name, but I believe they had three gold balls above the door). Out of every 10 coins reminted, 1 was sent on to the king – this was how taxes were collected. If a goldsmith was ever found to be shaving coins or cheating the king, the goldsmith's arm was taken and the license to remint was lost.

Something like this would turn "your coins" into "my coins" by the value of the metal, and if they aren't going by the value of the coin anyway then someone could melt down one set into the other type and make the arbitrage value, so it's best to go by the metal value anyway.

boballab

Except that the Empress would consider that war. While the story is set in sword based combat that evokes the middle ages, the political aspects are not middle age. Remember the Tower has been around for thousands of years something no IRL kingdom or empire ever enjoyed, not even in China. They have learned a thing or two over that span and if just buying up their coin gets the Empress coming down on you, just imagine what happens when just start melting it down and re-minting it. Oh btw yes the country it does come from matter, because a country that is sound will not debase the coin and this was lightly touched on in the Prologue from Monday . If you go back and re-read it where the Stalwart Paladin was buying supplies the cost was based on the which country's coin it was, especially since the merchant didn't have a scale to weight the coins.

He was paying with silver fidi from Mercantis, one of the few coins no merchant in Calernia refused, and he was not certain how it compared to Imperial coinage. The merchant's smiling admission he had no scale to compare the weights did little to inspire trust...

Not a mintage he recognized, Iason noted. It could be worthless for all he knew.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/04/09/prologue-4/>

As can be logically deduced from those paragraphs, debasing currency is not unheard of and in day to day transactions not everyone is going to be running around with scales and carrying their own set of weights to compare with. Never trust the other guys weights they are easy to fake, you have to have your own known good set to compare to his. With that being the case the reputation of the mint it comes from is your only source of how sound the coin is as seen in the quote.

Big Brother

ArcherxHeiropant is still my favorite ship in this story. They work so well together, even if they bicker a lot.

(I'm still hoping for Akua to become Cat's next follower, bound by Masego to some manner of construct designed by Pickler. Maybe something humanoid if she's lucky.)

oldschoolvillain

If you read the last few chapters closely, you will find that Akua has been bound into the collar of Catherine's murder cloak. Now known as the Cloak of Woe. The ramifications and uses of this are so far unclear, but she was at the very least on hand for the most recent "Catherine tells angels to shove it" debacle.

Big Brother

I am aware of this. Cat had Hakram sew Akua's soul into the cloak after the events of Liesse. I'm just sitting here hoping she makes some sort of comeback.

d_o_l

I'm guessing she will, probably as an evil spirit advisor type deal.

---

Well, another commenter already pointed out that she's depicted more or less as a Stand. "In Dread Crowned" grants power over otherworldly entities.

Insanenoodlyguy

Right idea, but we need a proper stand name Since somehow "in Dread Crowned" is not a name of a western band or song that I can find, I'd propose based on her power's sphere of influence we name her Beyond Creation

---

I was using an in-universe song, the one written by Nauk (who we'll hopefully see as Cat assembles her armies).

oldschoolvillain

So this is the way that Cat keeps Heroes out of Callow. Interesting. Does Masego basically have a birds-eye view over all of Callow while he's sitting in that spot? It would certainly explain his lack of eating recently. This Observatory is pretty sweet, though. Forget needing the army of spies – with an artifact capable of peering through dimensions, I'd be shocked if anywhere in Calernia was beyond Hierophant's gaze. I do worry about what that might do to his health, though . . .

Euodiachloris

Somebody had better invent protein shakes to prevent the onset of Angry Dads Syndrome. 😞

Nairne .01

I think he can see more than Callow. It would warrant why he keeps sitting in the chair.

SMHF

After dealing with all this bureaucratic crap for a year, Cat's probably happy, hearing about the invasion! At least now she's in her element.

Remember to vote for the guide in 'topwebfiction.com' guys.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

maresther23

We are number one!

Random anon

Cat has become a supervillain number one

grzecho2222

Black: Are you a real viilain?

Cat: Well technically...

Black: Have you ever killed a Good guy, like a real Hero?

Hakram: "Shakes head"

Black: Have you ever tried a disguise?

Masego: Nah...

Black: O right. I can see that I will have to teach you how to be villains!

Woe: We are Villians!

Hanno: "Does cartwheel in background"

Daemion

I have the feeling the invasion was expected and planned for. Archer wouldn't be quite so happy about it and Cat wouldn't smile otherwise.

---

I theink Catherine smiled because she was about to throw Indrani in a scrying pool, and Archer is understandably happy to finally get some action.

Oshi

Yes they would.

Ishot4living

It is begun.

Snowfire1224

Marching with the 15 can't get Masego to lose weight, but it turns out his own obcession with magic can.

wyaldriddler

To be expected!

Euodiachloris

The way of the Mad Scientist! It's tradition! XD

Antony444

Well, there's some good news for Catherine. The Stairway is directly facing the lands of the two problematic nobles which have given her so much problems lately...a Proceran invasion on their door is a certain way to tell them they should better obey her royal orders. Unfortunately, them not having many men to Legion standards is guaranteed to screw Callow somewhat...

The restored kingdom has big money problems, this is not a surprise. At least the Empress subsidies meant they had the money to rebuild the kingdom...but now they're deeply in the Tower's debt.

I wonder if most of the Procer Princes have considered this little problem. Should they triumph, the Principate will have to invest huge sums of silver in the economy if they want to administer the region...

And of course there's the revelation of the Observatory – aka the anti-hero's device – and the revelation the invasion has begun. We have the confirmation the Dread Empress and Black have certainly now warned the Woe of the onslaught coming this way...now the big question is what forces Callow has which can answer in time.

Cicero

You are running under assumption they care. My feeling is that much of the principate cares about Callow as much as the average wasteland noble.

Rook

Well if the stairway interlude was any indication they care a hell of a lot about looting it at least. That's a pretty major problem when your economy is about as healthy as a skydiver that had their parachute fail

nerferf

So Masego is getting the holy man look now to match his name? Cause named looks are influenced off there internal thoughts about them selves right?

nick012000

Fixing the money problem is easy. Seize the Praesi coin in exchange for issuing government debt, melt down the coins, cast the metal into Callowan coins in her new mint, then use the shiny new Callowan coins to pay off the debt she got buying them in the first place.

Gunslinger

It would work true. Still would piss Malicia off

Highwayman

That would totally work, but what if it was some kind of fiat money though

TeK

Coins should cost more than their metal, should they not? If denarii cost more then you'll be losing whatever difference there is in cost, plus as you seize more coin, the deflation kicks in, and you end up with empty coffers. Or am I missing something? The new coin will be nowhere as reliable as praesi one, given that they got trade only with praesi now, and Tower can easilly flood the markets with now highly valued coin again, putting situation to relatively same position, except you are broke and your coins worth shit. I really don't know economics, so would like a heads up.

burdi

still waiting cat new Name

Nivek

"Those who withstood the sword, I laid low with ink."
Did you mean legislation or drowning? It's kind of an important question with Dread Emperors.

DroughtBringer

Bit of both, probably

Gunslinger

You speak so queenly, these days," >Ratface grinned. "I haven't seen you spit on the ground in months."

"Yeah, well, I own all the carpets now," I muttered

I love this series

naturalnuke

"and followed three full steps behind me a little to the left."

Omg being a minion has proper etiquette, that's villain posse position right there.

Snowfire1224

So when do you think we are going to find out her Name?

letouriste

she didn't use a single aspect in her last fight, maybe she still doesn't have a Name.

Snowfire1224

Yes, but it's possible, and would be smart of her, to not use aspects unless she absolutely needs to, that way no one knows what her aspects are.

letouriste

exept the gods kind of do and so the bard too...probably

DroughtBringer

Never 😊

I agree that she probably doesn't have one, though a23fG6e123

"You speak so queenly, these days," Ratface grinned. "I haven't seen you spit on the ground in months."

"Yeah, well, I own all the carpets now," I muttered.

Priceless. And here I go cleaning my screen again.

Barthumphries

Typo thread:

They could not part of the Army of Callow or the Legions of Terror

Add "be" after "could"

SilentLurker

That is incorrect. Proper grammar requires the addition of "be" after "not", instead of after "could".

In other words it should read, "They could not be part of the Army of Callow or the Legions of Terror".

Barthumphries

You're right. My bad. 😊

BarthHumphries

I don't know what I did right, but I actually got an email notification of this post! 😊

That's never happened before.

Reveen

What the fuck are you doing? STOP!

You've gone from wine and now this... Muthafucka I'm not a teetotaler but you've been drinking two years tops and you're already at the point where people need to keep you isolated from flammable objects.

Like, this had better be a subplot of how bad an idea regular drinking is or the writer is seriously fucking naive.

Digitize27

She's a Named, different standards apply. They basically can't get ill/die via normal means, and villainous Named don't even age. Cat can drink as much as she likes, and as long as it doesn't become narratively relevant (See: Wandering Bard) it will never negatively impact her.

TeK

Actually Named can get drunk, earlier chapters imply as much. I think the truth is burried somewhere along the fact that Cat is not a human.

Metrux

Drunk, yes, but it is alot harder than with common man, and she can burn a little juice to take all the alcohol (and most poisons) out of her body, remember that Black teached that? So, in truth, compulsory drinking will only bring problems to her, or any Named who knows what he is doing, if the let it or if the Story has a place for it.

TeK

Well, it's still shows that she is under much stress with all this governing, she goes further and further into drug abuse. Alcohol, wakeleaf, I shudder to think what next.

Reveen

Negatively impact her? Like spending an entire day getting shitfaced on wine alone in her tent instead of dealing with a bad situation? Because that was her first response to the trashfire at Liesse. Drinking isn't just a matter of health of physical addiction, but of bad habits and self medication. That she responds to stress and bad situations by reaching for a bottle is not a good sign even if it doesn't really effect her because it says bad things about her priorities, her sense of responsibility, and her vulnerability to indulgences.

BartHumphries

Keep her isolated from flammable objects? "Ostentatious" doesn't mean flammable. They removed all the gold-covered and lacy frilly things. They made her room more Spartan. And if that wasn't what you were referring to then you quoted the wrong part.

Anastas

I don't think that was a misinterpretation of the word "ostentatious"; I think it was a hyperbolic joke about Catherine's blood and breath now containing so much alcohol that she's become an enormous fire hazard.

erraticerrata

First strike.

You've been walking the line of flaming and trolling for a while now, and that one was over it. Be civil or don't comment. I'm honestly puzzled as to why you keep reading a story you've been quite vocal about despising, considering there's quite literally hundreds of other free access works out there.

don

I'm most curious about the trip Thief took to meet Cordelia. There has to be a play there – Callow is still being invaded, so what did Cat negotiate for?

Kevin Blandin

Feel like I should point out something, Someone mentioned awhile back that Cat essentially only had Fall as a sort-of Aspect now. Which was claimed to be more about her Fae title/magic than Named stuff.

One, when Ratface called Catherine by name, Cat's PoV stated "If I hadn't been Named, I wouldn't have noticed the slight crease in (Anne Kendell, I forget what part or how she actually used Anne's name) brow." So, Cat herself still at least believes she's Named in some way.

Two, when Cat confronted Akua, her PoV said "I had no Aspect left but one, and that one had gone far beyond what an Aspect should be.” Then Akua used *Call* and the result after Cat responded/countered was:

“A bundle of power inside her unfolded under my patient eye and I flicked my wrist. Ice spread through it, cracks spreading as she flinched. Ah, I thought. Devoured but not gone. The corpse of her aspect I took for my own, let the winds and the snow bury it. It would await my purposes there.”

*Fall* has completely INCORPORATED *Take* into itself. Which makes complete sense, given the nature of Winter and the narrative of Winter. The hunger of Winter always lead them to take, and take roughly from Summer, which had always lead to Summer reacting violently to the taking. As the last true scion of Winter, to Take is basically Cat’s inherent “right” in a story sense.

I think this also relates to what Cat said to the Angels of the Choir of Endurance concerning the Stalwart Paladin. About his having been “CLAIMED fair and square.” Supporting this IMHO is the fact that while Cat drove a knife into his belly, she drove a spike of frost into his skull to kill him. With the knife already in hand, why change to a weapon made of her power for the deathblow when she could as easily have driven a blade through the Paladin’s forehead with her Fae strength?

I believe that something of power was taken from the dying/dead Paladin in that moment. Either, as others have speculated, that Cat is going all Dead King and it’s essentially a powerful “echo” of the Paladin himself in his dead entirety buried beneath the ice and snow to await Cat’s purposes...OR, Cat was essentially doing an upgraded version of what she’d once done to the Lone Swordsman and her Fall-Take essentially scooped out the Aspect she felt like devouring as the Stalwart Paladin’s Name left his dying body.

Ultimately, whatever Cat’s Named-status, Fall and the rest of Cat’s Winter power is at least as varied as the three Aspects of a conventional Hero or Villain.

Personally, I hope Cat snagged the Stalwart Paladin’s *Discern.* It would make such beautiful narrative. The Paladin had only developed Discern moments before falling, due to the pressure he was experiencing. Providence/The Heavens had tried to cheat as they always do with a last-second power-up for the Hero to try and eke out a win for Stupid Good. Only to have the 2.0 version of Practical Evil defile and devour their power-up, and repurpose it to serve Cat’s cause.

As for the Stairway, we’ve finally seen an example of the Augur not being 100% accurate. Wasn’t the Stairway gambit supposed to go undetected according to that Named?

---

I don't think it was as simple as incorporating Take into her Winter powers. The domain, previously activated by Fall, is still here, and changing Names hopefully means that it will evolve (my bet is that it will remain a moonless night, but will gain stars to represent the people she has to protect in her duties as the Queen of Callow).

But the devouring of Call may just be a thing related to her high rank as a Winter fae. Remember, fairies can make objects out of people's souls, like the invitation to Skade in the extra chapter Fletched, or the barrier in the citadel of Dormer. Given that she's now a queen forged of Winter, she may have made the absolute ownership that this Aspect used to grant a part of her authority over her otherworldly subjects.

Blue

Great to see this story back.

Catherine is essentially Fae now and she offered the heroes a deal when they entered her domain. A deal they rejected, which I assume has all sorts of consequences for them related to 'claim'.

I have a feeling anyone entering Callow is going to be subject to consequences given it is now the domain of the Winter Queen.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

SilentLurker

"Were I not Named, I might never have noticed the slight crease on the Governess-General's brow when she heard Ratface refer to me by my given name."

Is this authorial confirmation that Cat has a new Name, Erraticerrata? It was never made clear, and while we have seen people refer to her as Named still, what that is if it exists hasn't been said.

Barthumphries

No, he referred to her as Catherine instead of Your Majesty.

SilentLurker

"Were I not Named, I"

I am referencing this part which is from Cat's perspective. See the capitalization of Named, not just her having a name but a Name.

Jonathan Rodriguez

"Yeah, well, I own all the carpets now," I muttered.

I really did LOL at this. I love how Catherine's sense of humor is written so consistently deadpan and sarcastic.

vuthuha912

You know money and trade are the things that Black wants from this Conquest in the first place. He wants a reliable trading partner and he did it in the only way he knows – and possibly at the time, invading.

Still, messing with your own coinage will likely fuck over Praes economy as much as Callow economy. Now is not the time for these kinds of things people.

---

Chapter 2: Alarm

"In conclusion, the court recognizes the desertion of the sentient tiger army raised by Dread Emperor Sorcerous as sufficient precedent to rule that tapirs can, in fact, commit treason but that lack of sentience bars them from laying claim to the Tower by right of usurpation."

– Official transcript from the Trial of Unexpected Teeth, which resulted in the execution of the man-eating tapirs that devoured Dread Empress Atrocious

The mist had come out of the clay pot and formed a mirror-like surface in front of us without any need for visible prompting. Even as Archer loudly cussed me out and dragged herself out of the pool like a hissing wet cat, my eyes went to the images that had bloomed across solidified mist. Massive was the first word that came to mind. Masego had somehow raised the perspective to high up in the sky, above the still-unfolding ritual, and only vague memories of how large that mountain range stood otherwise allowed to grasp the scale of what was being done. It was deceptively simple, at first look. Some kind of white fire was being used to carve a passage across the Whitecaps from the Principate to Callow. It was difficult to put a finger on the exact size of the passage from this perspective, but I'd gauge as broad enough for two large carriages to pass simultaneously without getting too close. Hierophant had taken the moments I spent looking at his scrying to gather himself. I could tell from the way his breath was steadying and his heartbeat calming.

"I will begin by clarifying this is a ritual and not the making of an artefact," the blind mage said.

"Afternoon, Masego," I said. "How are you doing? I'm doing great myself, thanks for asking."

He cast me a dubious look.

"I would have thought that the obvious precursor to an invasion would spoil your mood," he said.

"She's being sarcastic, Zeze," Archer said.

She got close enough to me before shaking off the wet that my entire left side was made dripping. She was a charmer, our Indrani.

"Ah," Hierophant said. "Is that entirely necessary?"

I sighed, if only to prevent my sharpening worry from showing. A few months ago he would have caught that. Spending his days strapped to the Observatory's central device looked like it might be unmaking years of progress. I needed to keep a closer eye on him, force him to talk with actual people once in a while. I knew Archer broke the wards protecting this place with chagrining regularity to come pester him, but that alone obviously wasn't enough.

"Not an artefact, you said," I said. "I thought those were pretty small by definition."

"Liesse as rebuilt by Diabolist would be considered an artefact under most accepted definitions," he noted. "It certainly served a sorcerous purpose."

Mildly interesting, but not the kind of edification I was currently after.

"Ritual," I repeated. "I was under the impression Procer doesn't usually have the chops for those. You've been pretty dismissive about their mages whenever we discuss threat assessments."

"Eh, the Lady says the same thing," Archer said. "She always told us Proceran wizards are nothing to worry about unless they're Named. Apparently their kind's not real popular with the powers that be in the west."

"The Principate has been consistently at least a generation behind the Empire in matters of sorcery for centuries," Masego said, almost sneering. "No other nation has even half their number of hedge practitioners and even their 'finest' still ascribe to the Jaquinite theory of magic. It tells in their work here, Catherine. It is amateurish in everything but scale."

I wrinkled my nose at the sight of the white flame burning through rock. It hadn't moved in a while, I noted. Was something messing with our scrying?

"I was going to ask you when they'd be done, but they don't seem to be moving," I said.

"Performance issues," Archer suggested. "I mean, if they're going to wave around a big fire dick it's only fitting."

Oh Gods, now that she'd put the image in my head I couldn't unsee it. Fucking Hells, Indrani.

"That is planned," Masego said vaguely. "And the reason is... ah, there we are."

I raised an eyebrow and it kept rising when I saw half a mountain's worth of snow and stone collapse into the flame. Avalanche. They'll only start moving when they're sure the passage won't be clogged, I thought.

"It is not fire," Hierophant suddenly said. "They are... um, the structure seems based on a miracle? Fascinating."

I whistled sharply.

"Focus, Zeze," I said. "We're at war."

"And I have another wooden duck," Archer added cheerfully.

He seemed a lot more concerned by Indrani's announcement than mine, but then she'd been spending a lot of time with him. I doubted it was the first time a shitty wooden carving ended up bouncing off his forehead, knowing them both as I did.

"Dispersal of matter," Hierophant said. "That is the nature of the working employed."

"The passage smokes after they clear it," I pointed out.

"Because they are sloppy," he disdainfully said. "Their spell formula is inexact, thus the dispersal causes the release of heat. Had they done it properly their army could be walking behind the front but they're Jaquinites, Catherine. The man was a priest. I'm pleasantly surprised they didn't just kneel down to pray the passage would happen on its own."

"Let's not even speak about that," I grimaced. "With the amount of heroes they've assembled, I wouldn't call that too much of a stretch to take place."

"Praying," Archer drawled. "By far the least interesting thing that can follow someone getting on their knees."

I shot her a look. Indrani really needed a roll in the hay, didn't she? My court was packed with attractive men and women around my eye these days – and Gods Below, that Talbot thought he was being subtle really was the most insulting part of that – so the fact that she hadn't dragged anyone into her rooms yet was starting to warrant a conversation.

"They've mastered the basics of scrying, at least," Masego conceded. "It's why they're forging a pass instead of a tunnel even if it risks avalanches."

"Wait, I know that one," I said. "Scrying doesn't work underground. Or across tall obstacles."

"An oversimplification on both counts," Hierophant told me. "The Greyfang Range-"

"The Whitecaps," I corrected him.

The glass orbs that were his eyes shifted under the cloth in what was likely the reflex of a blink without the physical ability to do one.

"That is not their name in Imperial atlases," he said.

"The Empire doesn't have a city next to them either," I replied.

"That is not how atlases work, Catherine," he plaintively said.

"I thought they were called the Parish," Archer contributed, because never once in her life had she seen a fire without reaching for a jug of oil.

"That's the Proceran name for them," I grunted. One of them, anyway. "Whitecaps. Moving on."

"There's mushrooms called that," Hierophant mutinously said under his breath.

"But not capitalized," I pointed out.

If there was one thing to love about Masego, it was that he could easily be side tracked by technicalities. I was getting fairly good at that, these days. His expression brightened and he nodded. From the corner of my eye I saw Archer looking at me amusedly.

"The Whitecaps are a too broad a range to penetrate through blindly," Hierophant said, picking up where I'd interrupted.

"Yeah, penetrating blindly never helps," Indrani agreed, voice choked up.

"You're bargaining for another visit to the pond," I whispered at her.

"I'll be good," Archer whispered back, hands raised and her vulpine grin immediately betraying the lie.

"They're adjusting with scrying," Masgeo said, blithely unaware of the background chatter. "The entire array is a backwards mess, however. They likely have to communicate adjustments by voice."

I consciously refrained from asking what the alternative to speaking was.

"Can you tell me when the ritual will be done?" I asked, then winced. "Never mind, don't answer that. Can you tell me when you think the ritual will be done?"

Hierophant's mouth closed over this initial answer, then he took a moment to consider.

"Assuming there are fewer than five avalanches," he said. "And that the pool of accumulated power they're using does not run out... Two days. Going into three. It depends on the amount of practitioners they've gathered. Serving as guide for so large a working will be exhausting. If they've fewer than three hundred mages some will begin to die or birth derangements before nightfall."

I worried my lip. Worst case, two days. Actually crossing the passage would take them longer. A week before the first troops were in Callow? No, shorter if they used cavalry for the vanguard. Which I would, in their place. The Order of Broken Bells had swelled, but it was still just a fraction of the horse the Principate could bring to bear. Imperial spy reports and what the Jacks had managed to compile had the host waiting in Arans around fifty thousand strong. The commanders weren't supposed to be anything too worrying, a Prince Milenan and his allies none of who had notable military achievements under their belt from the civil war. They were the First Prince's primary opposition within Procer, though, so I suspected she would not be shy about spending their lives to damage my position. Even if I pulled together every part of my armies in Callow – which I couldn't, not without leaving my borders with Praes and the Free Cities dangerously bare – the invaders still outnumber me a little less than two to one. I'd have what Juniper called a qualitative edge, considering most my soldiers were professionals while a lot of theirs would be levies, but the core of that army was principality troops. Varying shades of light cavalry and professional heavy infantry. Those would be a hard nut to crack, and that was without even considering the fucking battalion of heroes reports placed in the war camp. It would take me at least two days to have the Army of Callow ready for a march, and that was just the part in the permanent camps near Laure. Taking them through Arcadia was spinning the wheel, but we'd made tests. For that kind of distance, the average was eight days. Going as low as six and high as fifteen.

"I don't suppose you could shut down the ritual?" I asked Masego.

He shook his head.

"They are not using their own sorcery to do this, Catherine," he elaborated. "A receptacle was forged and what must be hundreds of practitioners poured their own magic into for years to create the reservoir they are now employing. It would be like trying to put out a bonfire by spitting on it."

"And if I gave you every mage in Laure to work on a ritual?" I pressed.

He considered it seriously.

"No," he finally said. "If we had caught their ritual before it began in earnest, perhaps, but no longer. Considering the distance it would be insufficient to do anything but slow it a few hours. And even that would come at great cost."

"You're going at this wrong," Archer said. "Let them make their hole. After they're spent, prevent them from using it."

I looked at her suspiciously.

"You're not usually this helpful," I said.

"I'm a woman of many layers," Indrani haughtily replied.

I had a fairly scathing comment to offer involving onions and how she should perhaps bathe more often but the grass was cut under my feet.

"You mean attacking them as they pass," Hierophant said, tone musing. "That is a possibility. Triggering further avalanches from Laure is possible, with sufficient preparations."

"You don't sound enthused," I said.

"While their practitioners are a backwards lot, I do not believe them to be actual imbeciles," Masego said. "At least one of them was clever enough to conceive of this ritual."

I frowned.

"You think they'll have protections," I guessed.

"If they do not disperse the wizards they have massed to carry this out, they have the ability to resist anything I would seriously consider using against them," Hierophant said. "Three hundred blunderers with a heavy club are dangerous even to someone of my proficiency."

Throwing bodies at the problem, huh. Well, the Principate had no lack of those to swear into service. It wasn't an elegant solution, but I was living proof that sometimes hitting things really hard could be enough to pull through.

"They'll have priests, too," Archer said. "The robed rats are everywhere in Procer."

Brothers and Sisters of the House of Light swore oaths that prevented them from taking lives, but there'd always been a lot of wiggling room left to interpret how that should be carried out. Priests were a historical staple of Callowan hosts, to shut down sorceries and heal wounded soldiers. And there were always a few to be found who were willing to make an exception about that whole no killing thing and repent afterwards. Turning miracles against an avalanche sent down by an Evil mage wouldn't even require them to do some rhetorical footwork afterwards. And let's not forget the House of Light in Procer is a different creature than the Callowan one. The Fairfaxes had always kept the House out of the crown's affairs, but in Procer the priests were influential power brokers. It would be safe to assume they'd be involved, and that was the final nail in the coffin of considered magical intervention. If we couldn't head them off at the pass, it'd have to be in the field. And odds were they'd get close to Harrow before I could get my army up north.

"Masego," I said quietly, pitching my voice so none of the guild mages would overhear. "The Hell Egg up north, have you managed to find it?"

"I am still awaiting answer from the Tower about consulting the private histories," the blind man replied.

My lips thinned. The Empress had been quite willing to share reports from the Eyes about the unfolding situation on Procer and beyond, but my people were being given polite brush-offs and non-answers when it came to pretty much everything else. I couldn't tell whether that was pressure she was applying to bring me back under her thumb or that in her eyes I now only counted as something to be tossed at the crusade to blunt its advance. The former gave me room to deal, especially now that the invasion had begun. The latter would mean my situation was even more precarious than I currently believed it to be. Her people would be in touch soon enough, I reflected. Cold as the diplomatic exchanges had become, a Proceran offensive would thaw them a great deal. Especially since I doubted that the northern crusader army would be moving alone. Odds were the host in the south under Prince Papenheim was preparing for a run at the Vales. Black wouldn't be easy meat, especially not with Scribe and Warlock at his side. But he was starkly outnumbered, and he'd be in no position to do anything but hold the valleys for months to come. At the moment, the Empress needed me.

"I thought Ratface was supposed to be some kind of bureaucratic wizard," Archer said, eyeing me sideways.

She was sharper than Masego about these things, regardless of her vocal disinterest in matters of intrigue. I nodded discreetly and she grimaced. Yeah, I wasn't happy either that it was quite possible instructions had come down from Malicia to make it much harder for me to locate the fucking demon that was supposed to be bound somewhere in northern Callow.

"Have you narrowed down what kind of a demon it is?" I tried.

"It cannot be Corruption," Hierophant said. "That was my initial theory, when we last spoke of the subject in Marchford, but that particular entity has since been found and fought. It might very well be Absence, Catherine. That would be..."

"Balls," Archer helpfully provided.

Masego frowned.

"Genitalia has nothing to--"

"Bad, it'd be bad," I interrupted before this could turn into a full-blown squabble.

I clenched my fingers.

"I don't like the shape of it," I admitted. "That many Named, near a threat unaccounted for?"

It wasn't a guarantee that a brawl with heroes would end up letting it loose, but the odds were high enough it couldn't be discounted. But if catching the crusaders before they reached Harrow wasn't an option, then the alternative was ceding most the barony before giving battle. I would much prefer not doing that, and not only because of the military implications of giving the enemy a fortified city to operate from. It wouldn't look good within Callow either. People had been willing to tighten their belts if it was for rebuilding the kingdom and raising armies to defend it. If I was seen to have failed in either regard, there would be consequences. But if the choice is between that and rolling the dice with a demon... I needed to talk with Juniper. Archer and Hierophant were here with me in Laure and the last time I'd spoken with Thief she'd said she should be back within a few days, but Hakram was still in Vale trying to coax the refugees out of the tent cities and back behind stone walls. I might have to leave him behind when marching.

"Tell Fadila to keep a full roster tonight," I told Masego. "I'll need to speak to the baronies up north."

And half a dozen other people, since Adjutant wasn't there to do it for me.

"We getting ready for war, then?" Archer asked, and there was a pleased glint in her eyes.

"I'd prefer not to," I said. "But the choice is out of my hands. Wrap up anything you have going on, Masego. When we go on the offensive you're coming with us."

He pouted. I blamed Indrani for teaching him that, it was surprisingly effective even now that his face had lost most of the baby fat.

"I'm not hearing anything otherwise," I firmly told him. "Look on the bright side, Hierophant. Odds are you'll be taking a close look at that passage soon enough."

"There is that," he conceded, but it was half-hearted.

I cast a look at Archer, who smiled back and wiggled her eyebrows suggestively. It was telling that I barely even noticed when she did that nowadays.

"If you run into Thief, send her my way," I told her.

She waved in a manner that could vaguely be interpreted as agreement. About as good as I could expect. I clapped her on the shoulder, reminded Masego we were nearing supper time and made my exit. I had one last thing to do before mustering for war, after all. Tonight was the night for my little monthly chat with the enemy.

Cordelia Hasenbach had just begun her invasion of Callow, so we should have a few things to talk about.

---

danh3107

It Starts...

ClickPause

Real question here: Has Catherine not thought about, you know, opening a portal and goblinfirebombing the place?

Jonnnney

Nice to see the act between Archer and Heirophant is still in full swing. Looks like Cat's envoy to Procter was more of a baseline level of communication rather than a betrayal of the tower or even an offer to work together. Curious to see what happens when the demon of absence gets released, night before fun to see a thousand year old demon run roughshod over a dozen newbie heroes. It does make sense to have the tower keep the location in the dark though. Might not want to give Masengo another demon bound to a standard.

Amoonymous

Yeah, in before the Hell Egg happens to be right in the path they're cutting through the mountains. "Whoops, our ritual accidentally destroyed the bindings of a thousand year old demon! What a wacky happenstance!"

naturalnuke

Demons. The biggest hammer to any nail you may have.

haihappen

More like a sledgehammer to a rice paper wall.

Or a herd of elephants in a market square for bone china tableware.

wyaldriddler

Ere We Go Ere We Go Ere We Go!

So Thief gave Cordelia a means to scry with Cat. Interesting, and it makes sense too.

Kingbob12

"But not capitalized," I pointed out.

This is adorable and makes me realize just how much I've missed Cat and Masego's friendship

NZPIEFACE

It's like the difference between black and Black.

haza18

Dun dun dah, a demon of absence gives me chills

Decius

Demon of Absence? No, none of those here.
Finding a Demon of Absence must be a matter of looking where it isn't the most.

TeK

What are we talking about, again?

Valkyria

And so it begins. Is this the first real great battle Cat isn't on the offense for once? Up until now she was the one moving and taking cities... let's see where this is going!

---

There were also Three Hills, Marchford and arguably Four Armies and One.

edrey

great, it's starting this is "the prince's tomb" right? looking at the circumstances, the number of troops and time, i think the best is guerrilla warfare through arcadia, masego using new scrying rituals to see the enemy and using demons as baits. but that is just my opinion ps. archer's funny scenes are extra or foreshadowing?

Nguyen Hong Hai

The Prince's Graveyard actually, also no mention about the fae remnant?

letouriste

both i think.

Looks to me Archer is badly attracted to masego (she stopped bedding every pretty boy/girl around) so this is probably foreshadowing of a future relationship.

her being funny is also a good way to survive the next few battles;) (given how loud she is, she gets plot armor and same for masego indirectly).

this is also a good way to boost a chapter^^

Paxton Johnson

masego? i was thinking cat

SMHF

So people on parahumans.net reaaaaaaally didn't like it when Guide got first on topwebfiction and gave all the upvotes Ward! XD

But as a wise and very evil man once said: "The lasting victories are always the quiet ones".

So lets see if we can hit 700 this week! 😊

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

letouriste

already did^^ try 1000 votes

Gunslinger

Cat's right, Archer's currently behaving like a teen who just hit puberty. If this keeps on she'll be going "That's what she said wink wink" to everything.

The doors through Arcadia seem a bit nerfed to me. I thought after letting winter lose and having Larat open them meant they could function like instantaneous portals.

Quite excited to see the first on screen interaction between Cordelia and Cat next chapter.

On a side note I wonder why Harrow needed to be a fortified city if it was isolated and sheltered by the mountains. It's a good thing now, but armies that would March through the Vale would make for Laure rather than that dead end

1shot4living

They may seem nerfed, but instead of taking 3 months to get somewhere it can now only take half a month. Still a huge advantage, just not on the level of a instantly teleporting army.

Rook

Also depends less on the laws of physics and more on the narrative

The actual distance or time you're there seems to make very little actual difference. from what we've seen so far. Larger groups will likely take longer than a few people just because that's how stories tend to go. Lone heroes and small bands in typical stories always travel more swiftly than the lumbering army, even if said band is physically crippled and the army is full of cavalry or elites on a forced march.

If you set up a very standard last minute rescue story, I wouldn't be surprised if Arcadia dropped you back into Creation literally in the nick of time, completely independent of whether you were a mile away or ten thousand miles away.

Dany

Cavalry is pretty slow, though. Faster than infantry tactically but not strategically.

Euodiachloris

Guarding a confluence of mountain passes and vaguely flat farmland (or, you know, carefully terraced, southern-facing mountainside it's taken generations to get right) , I presume. /has lived in Switzerland.

Author Unknown

Did you miss the part where Harrow is the seat of a barony? Not all enemies come from outside ones borders.

nick012000

> I wonder why Harrow needed to be a fortified city if it was isolated and sheltered by the mountains.

Because sometimes you'll get water-breathing orcs swimming up the rivers.

Metrux

The way I see it this is a very old but still maintained fortification, as in older than the kingdom, from the time where each part of Callow fought each other. In this manner it makes sense for a fortification up there, since it was some lord's only fortification and base of power.

shyntar

In the beginning quote with the tapirs, you want 'they lack sapience'. Animals are sentient, people are sapient.

Though admittedly a minor thing since no one seems to remember that and common usage beats everything. =/

Rook

Hitting them at the pass pretty much needs to be done regardless what the deal with Cordelia is. It's such a good way to put pressure on the big league heroes Procer is starting to bring out, force them to act and get a sense of what they can do and how they work so you don't get blindsided. The information means as much as any damage you can actually do to the army.

A Black sort of move would probably be to take the tactical advantage at the pass to whittle down the invaders and safely suffer a loss against the Heroes to start a pattern of three, play the long game so you have an extra card in hand when things get critical. With the right maneuvering it could be a chance to try fully forming her new Name and get the first aspect popped out.

Not sure what Cat will do though, since she isn't always one to operate along the same lines as her mentor.

BaggyOz

I think the whole point of this chapter was that there is no way for Cat alone to head them off at the pass with any significant force.

Rook

That's the point, the tactical advantage of a chokepoint is that you don't need equal numbers to defend it. A thousand men and some scorpions are sufficiently threatening when the opponent is fighting a literal uphill battle through a pass barely wide enough to fit two carts side by side

The best way to punch through that when you can't use your numbers is quality instead of quantity. One of the easiest ways to force their Named to act directly, without committing a massive amount of resources that is versus an army withoutt heroes, they can cut through almost any defence not manned by villains. they are cheaters

Theoretically_human

Shequi

With Heroes in the mix choke points don't necessarily mean as much. Heroes (and Villains) are all about massive personal power at a very small locality.

Fighting in a choke point means that they can deploy all their available lethality against whatever you put in front of them. That would neutralise the Legion's advantage in better quality regular troops. It may be better to let the enemy spread out so as to leverage the Legion's superior quality without simply making them Hero-bait.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Seems like they'll move mountains to get a stab at her.

JackbeThimble

Erratic you know I love your stuff man but you've gotta cut down on the clutter. These last two chapters are easily twice as long as they need to be. I love your Worldbuilding and characters but adding this level of unnecessary detail and cluttered dialogue doesn't just clog up the plot it's actually starting to detract from the texture a bit, character moments that could be better expressed by a single line of dialogue get restated 3 or 4 times and while I get the impression that Callowan monetary policy is going to be relevant to the plot somehow it didn't need to be restated 3 or 4 times in one week. This is half of what made so much of book 3 so hard to get through, it really improved in the last arc but it's showing up again.

DroughtBringer

I've actually enjoyed this...but to each his own.

Blue Dragon

I concur. The chapter was fun, and I like the additional flavor and details.

Sparsebeard

I don't agree with you for what it's worth.

sengachi

I think this was perfect for a book introduction. This is exactly how you want to start off an epic book, slow and steady, with plenty of extraneous detail and reminders to let people get resituated and find their feet again.

Metrux

I think this is less a flaw and more a flavour, as in there are plenty of great books, but it's very rare for cultured people to agree on which they are. It's very much like flavours of food, there is good food and bad food, and then there is food you like and food you don't like, and not everything you dislike is bad, it's just a flavour you don't appreciate. Me and the guys who wrote before do appreciate this flavour of the story, while you don't. Not trully a problem, just remember that different people likes different things ;3

Snowfire1224

I greatly enjoy the fact that even though the story has gotten more serious over time, there's still great bits of humor in there.

I'm curious as to what Cat and Hasenbach talk about. Guess we'll see in the next chapter.

burdi

cat is more queenly i think, she is thinking more than just force her way out or that just because she is not in position of power her body is a construct not a body, made not born, so i think her body cant be hurt but can be damage. not healing but repair, since her body is made so i think she can change it. like when stalwart paladin smite her, she just repair her body and lalala, new body.

so cat like almost immortal, whatever damage her body received it can be repair as long as she have the energy when stalwart paladin cutting deep in her leg, her leg still fuction normaly

i really wonder how much damage cat's body can received before it can't be repaired

burdi

i mean her body is a construct, i think it is made according to cat's image about her own body, if she can change the image about her body in her mind, maybe she can alter her body permanently and that's i think how she repair her body when fighting starwart paladin...by manipulating her body image in her mind and recreated her body

blari

So The Principate is attacking Callow with a large amount of expendable troops lead by corrupt and treacherous nobles, powerful named all enabled due the the use of a huge magical ritual. When is the last time that sort of thing actually worked? I wonder if anyone on the good side has thought though the narrative implications of this attack?

sengachi

Well I mean, this could be a very well thought out (and cold-blooded) political maneuver to get rid of some of Hasenbach's political enemies while simultaneously weakening Callow to make it less of a threat.

Metrux

The heroes are actually not enabled by the ritual, they came from far and wide to help in the crusade. The ritual bit is just the making of the stairway, though the rest is pretty accurate and probably means they will loose, heroes or no heroes xD

DroughtBringer

Monthly chat? I'm curious...

Also great chapter! Thanks for it!

bobthebuilder

with a set up like this a fight at the mouth of the new pass has to happen. really jacked men wearing next to nothing (cus what is armor??) fighting the enemy in slow motion is required. someone must scream a variation of "This is Spartaaaa"

Wolfkit

I'm most of the way through a reread, and I found an interesting line about Archer's father in the Fletched bonus chapter:
>Her father had been sold in Ashur and died in a mine collapse as a 'free' member of its lowest citizenship tier. The questor told her that was a committee's fault, higher tier citizens debating for a week on whether it was worth digging out the people in the collapsed shaft or not.

Now compare that to Prosecution I

Erratic, are Archer and White Knight half siblings?

erraticerrata

Read Prosecution II closely and you'll have a better idea of what happened to Archer's father.

Aaron Wagner

So, Hanno is approximately of an age with Archer's father?

=====

I thought the author referred to the boy in the memory the angels showed him, whose father worked in the mines for foreign prisoners.

savadrin

no, hanno is most likely archer's half brother

MetruX

My guess is that she will be his personal enemy in a way, so maybe he has to defeat her before Cat kills him? Don't know...

Dylan Tullos

Now might be a good time to simply make terms.

Cordelia Hassenbach is a reasonable woman. Procer can't accept a Villain as ruler of Callow, but Baroness Kendall isn't Named.

Appoint her as Catherine's heir, abdicate in Kendall's favor, and offer the Crusading armies safe passage through Callow.

No cities have to burn. No Callowans have to die. Simply backstab the Praesi, open the Vales, and watch the Crusaders fight it out with Malicia and Black.

Catherine has already lost Liesse, and the south of Callow is one big refugee camp. The best way to save the rest of the country is to ensure that the Crusade is fought somewhere else. If the war takes place in Callow, the difference between "winning" and "losing" won't matter much to the common people who pay the price.

Gunslinger

Procer only wants a crusade cause she can get all the unpleasant elements to kill themselves while she stabilizes her home again. The problem is one can only get to Praes through Callow. And Praes is the only legitimate target, nobody's dumb enough to fight all the way to Keter. Which is why things are going to get tricky when the Dead King finally rises again

Dylan Tullos

Gunslinger:

If Catherine lets the Crusade march through Callow unimpeded, there's no reason why they can't go straight into Praes and settle things there. At this stage there's no way to avoid the Crusade; the main issue for Callowans is whether their country is going to be the battlefield.

Callow has a fairly large and well-trained army, and a proper backstab would bring Proceran troops south too fast for Praes to stop them short of the border. The first battles of the Crusade could be fought on Praesi territory, allowing Callow to avoid the worst of the fighting.

The alternative is for Catherine to run around fighting multiple armies, while the forces she isn't able to stop rob the countryside, set fire to towns, and wreck Callow for a generation. Since Ashur is a major naval power, she has absolutely no way of stopping the Crusaders from burning every Callowan port and fishing village. A best-case scenario would be similar to the "Good" option in the Fourfold Crossing, where Callow is reduced to a graveyard with an army, and Foundling stands as queen of the ashes. That's not what Catherine wants.

Catherine worked with the Dread Empire to spare Callow from destruction. That approach has failed. Practical Evil couldn't stop Diabolist from destroying Liesse, and they can't stop the Crusade from wrecking Callow. It's time to seek a new partner, one that can help Callow escape from being caught in the middle of a major war.

The point of Catherine's actions hasn't been to stand up to the Heavens. It's about protecting Callowans. Black can't do that, but maybe Cordelia can.

---

> If Catherine lets the Crusade march through Callow unimpeded, there's no reason why they can't go straight into Praes and settle things there. The first battles of the Crusade could be fought on Praesi territory, allowing Callow to avoid the worst of the fighting.

Not going to work. Unless she takes them through Arcadia, marching through Callow will take months of tension with the locals, spy interference and plummeting morale of the legionaries. Aside from having to work with untrustworthy jerks like Amadis, she'd be heading straight towards Larat calling in his debt, Malicia cutting off any kind of supply for her army and Black unleashing whatever he thinks would stop the crusaders.

> The alternative is for Catherine to run around fighting multiple armies

From where? The main advantage of Callow against Procer is that the Vales allow for a difference despite large difference in numbers (like Black was going to do with his twelve thousand soldiers against Papenheim's fifty), and Stairway is a one-time ritual that carves an even narrower passageway for an army that would have nowhere to go but south. Add to that the fact that Amadis inevitably will fuck up the negotiations with Daoine, and it's the kind of conflict that can end in a well-placed Princes' Graveyard.

> Since Ashur is a major naval power, she has absolutely no way of stopping the Crusaders from burning every Callowan port and fishing village.

Gee, good thing then that Callow is nearly entirely landlocked! While the Free Cities are bound to make some kind of move, Ashur is the problem that Malicia will (and is equipped to) solve by herself.

> It's time to seek a new partner, one that can help Callow escape from being caught in the middle of a major war. The point of Catherine's actions hasn't been to stand up to the Heavens. It's about protecting Callowans. Black can't do that, but maybe Cordelia can.

Then looking for somebody who wants to do that would be a good start. Black wants a granary and a strong buffer state, so he's digging in at the border. Cordelia's main objective is to remove the unruly soldiers and rival princes from the Principate, hence lumping the all into one host and kicking them down the Stairway. Catherine not killing them would actually hinder her.

Remember that Amadis was going to convoke a session of the Highest Assembly while still in Callow, and that Cordelia before meeting Thief had planned for the most of the war to be waged in Praes; in other words, he plans to pull the Crusade from under her as soon as the campaign in Callow makes any kind of headway. He doesn't want to negotiate with Cat, he wants to divide the spoils in Callow between his allies. No way he's going to settle for marching straight to Wasteland.

Dylan Tulllos

_____:

Callow is "landlocked" in the sense that it isn't next to the ocean, but it has navigable rivers. There's nothing stopping Ashur from sailing up the Hwaerte and wrecking everything they find. In fact, that strategy makes more sense than attacking Praes, which has heavily fortified cities but a limited ability to feed its own people. If Ashur is indifferent to human suffering, they can simply sink the grain ships and burn the crops, then sit back to watch their enemies starve.

I agree that moving a Proceran army through Callow would be a mess. However, the alternative is fighting a Proceran army in Callow, which would be considerably worse. It would be simple enough to backstab Black and let Pappenheim through the Vales, and once that happens it's a simple matter of getting them south as fast as possible.

Amadis is an idiot. Cordelia is going to destroy him before his stupidity ruins her Crusade; I suspect that she's set him up to die at Catherine's hand. His foolishness doesn't change the fact that the Crusade controls the seas, allowing them to move forces through Callow's rivers freely. Malicia has no navy, so she can't stop them.

In the long term, Praes was always going to unite most of Calernia against them. They've annexed Callow, and now everyone else has to worry about who's next. That would be troublesome enough if we were talking about a Good nation, rather than an evil Empire that just murdered an entire city so they could raise their people as zombies. That's not good public relations.

Catherine can fight with the big alliance against one nation, or with one nation against the rest of the continent. The Crusade has more Named, more armies, and absolute control of the sea. Which side would you like to be on in a major war?

---

> There's nothing stopping Ashur from sailing up the Hwaerte and wrecking everything they find. Save for the fact that Ashuran fleet is for sea and not for sailing rivers upstream. Seriously, while Free Cities like Atalante could be a problem, have they not been freshly sacked, Ashur isn't going to bother Catherine any time soon.

> It would be simple enough to backstab Black and let Pappenheim through the Vales, and once that happens it's a simple matter of getting them south as fast as possible.

That's a good way to get the Empress to switch to Dark Day protocol. I agree that fighting heroes would be hard, but Catherine has recently seen what happens when you corner Praesi. Do you seriously think she'll just sit and pray that the Heavens send her a miracle to unmake all the devastation that would follow? All her commentary and strategical moves point otherwise so far.

> His foolishness doesn't change the fact that the Crusade controls the seas, allowing them to move forces through Callow's rivers freely.

I'm not sure you understand the logistics of moving fifty thousand people by river.

> Catherine can fight with the big alliance against one nation, or with one nation against the rest of the continent. The Crusade has more Named, more armies, and absolute control of the sea. Which side would you like to be on in a major war?

The side that doesn't want to depose me, divide my country in the fiefs for themselves and plunder it. Praesi provide soldiers, weapons and riches to Callow. What has the Principate to offer?

Dylan Tullos

_____:

Your strategy is to hope that the greatest sea power in all of Calernia will be stopped by a river. The Ashuran strategy is to build ships that can sail on a river, then burn everything within sight of the water. I think their strategy has the advantage.

If your allies are the kind of cold-blooded monsters who develop plans to murder entire cities, that sounds like a good reason to backstab them and burn their empire to the ground. Otherwise, it's just a matter of time before someone less reasonable than Malicia takes over and unleashes the Dark Day protocols for fun.

Ashur doesn't need to move fifty thousand people by river. They can take five thousand marines on ships, sail up the Hwaerte, and start destroying undefended towns. Catherine has no navy, so she can't stop them.

What did the Praesi provide to the people of Liesse? I think you're overlooking the fact that all of Procer's crimes took place a long time ago, while Praesi scheming led to the death of a hundred thousand people in the very recent past.

Procer has occupied Callow once. The Dread Empire invaded Callow once every generation. Which group is really more untrustworthy?

erraticerrata

Ashur can't enter League territorial waters without starting a war with the League, which the crusaders would much prefer avoiding – and could, if it happens, feasibly become a reason for the political collapse of the crusade. Particularly if that decision is made with Proceran and Levantine backing. Aside from that, your assessment of Ashuran sea power is pretty accurate. The only power even remotely in their wheelhouse when it comes to war fleets is Nicae, and it's lost all four wars it fought against the Thalassocracy.

MetruX

Just to remember what happened last time a Proceran army passed through Callow in a Crusade: they tried to annex it. That's what Procer do. They are in a crusade, besides, which means no Villain will be left standing in their way. Cordelia is practical, her allies are not, if she simply let's Cat be the rest of the Crusade will not only go to kill Cat, but to at the very least depose Cordelia as well. Besides what has been said already, you seem to think war is fought with numbers, but that is REALLY not the truth of it, especially when you are defending. If you don't have a good numerical advantage you simply CAN'T take a fortified position, unless heroes, of course, but heroes are here to fight villains, and there are plenty of villains to divide the heroes, both the Woe and the Calamities, Malicia and our twitchy friend on the free cities, also soon enough the Dead King. If you actually account for the other villainous sides, treachery amongst the Good side and the benefits of defense, she is in a BETTER position than Procer. Now, you're asking her to leave an enemy army in her recently bloodied lands, while betraying her only allies, for the chance to be maybe left alone? Even if her position was terrible, this would be a worse idea.

Dylan Tullos

MetruX:

Catherine should abdicate and make Baroness Kendall Queen in her place. Kendall will have a large, powerful army to convince the Crusaders that Callow is not ripe for annexation. Cordelia will accept the deal because it means that her Crusade gets free passage through Callow, giving her an enormous military advantage. Without a Villain in charge of Callow, there is no righteous justification for a coup, and there will be plenty of Callowan soldiers around to convince ambitious princes that they should keep going south.

Numbers mean that you can suffer a serious defeat and come back for another try. If Catherine loses a battle, she can't replenish her losses as easily as the Crusaders can. Since the Crusade has command of the sea, Callow's defensive advantage won't stop them from raiding up and down the Hwaerte.

Malicia stopped being an ally when she let Diabolist build a superweapon in the middle of Liesse. Black stopped being an ally when he ignored Catherine and destroyed the superweapon they could have used to deter an invasion. Catherine stabbed him in the stomach to let him know that their trusting relationship was over. There are no "allies" among Villains, only interests, and Malicia and Black have both shown that they don't have Callow's best interests at heart.

Cordelia is not interested in conquering Callow. Black and Malicia can't stop Villains from murdering Callowans. When Malicia let Liesse happen, and Black failed to stop it, they broke their part of the contract. Why should Catherine feel bound to allies who are unwilling or unable to hold up their end of the deal?

lennymaster

Little problem there. Cat does not believe that Kendal is actually COMPETENT enough to properly lead Callow. That is why she is a Named, because she is inherently convinced that Creation is not as it should be and if nobody is willing and or capable to change that fact, than Cat will do it.

Cat is convinced that she is the only one with the intrest, power AND the necessary ruthlessness to get the job done. Abdicating and letting someone else take her place would, rightfully so, be seen by the Heroes as a way to put a puppet in place, for Cat would never accept anyone taking her place without proving that they are more capable.

vuthuha912

Malicia can seriously fuck Cat up but Black is not destroying the fortress for anything other than to save both of his allies from doom. After what happened to Sabah, you think he would let both his best friend and his heir fall to some story as obvious as the Flying Fortress of Doom. While I agree that Black totally disrespects their opinions, it is still better than letting them die because he was not decisive enough to act for wanting to spare their feelings. Heaven won't be cheated of their due, the moment the Flying Fortress was in some Villain's hand, the death of the Villain is something mandated by Heaven. The Bard can work on less than that. Besides, the Fortress is pretty good at motivating the opponents in trying to invade you harder.

Aside from that, I do think that Praes is a shitty ally and honestly, Black should have washed his hand from them a long time ago. He tried for 40 years and the situation barely changes. His reforms are too fragile. He fails to put the new generation in a secure position and he lets the danger (Trueblood) survive. And the problem is that all the decisions he made are perfectly reasonable. Honestly, he did the best that he could for Praes. Maybe, he should have let the entire country destroy itself with its infighting, crazy schemes, and treacherous behaviors. Like Anaxares said it was easier to just let the current take you away. But, he just can't since his family lived in Praes, they can't go anywhere aside Praes so he just gonna keep fighting until the water drowned him. Praes aren't meant for good things. Half of their problems are self-inflicted. Even when they are handed the tool to get out of their problems, they can still stab themself with it.

Still, I totally disagree with you on your assessment of an Ashur invasion. A powerful Navy will win shit if the condition is against them. Our history books are filled with victories against an overwhelming force, especially on rivers. Our favorite tactic is always to lure them deep enough into a river to limit their maneuverability, pin them down with a wooden spike that was covered by the tide, then use a smaller boat to finish off the opponent. I am from Vietnam btw, we know a thing or two about river battles. Yi Sun Sin of Joseon, who was never trained in naval battle before his appointment to the Navy, got the same idea when facing the Japanese. Guess what, he became the most successful naval commander of his time, successful sweep the floor with an enemy force 10 times his size. And the most famous victory was the British vs Spanish. The underdog can win the conflict through pure military tactics. If Callow can harness the home turf advantage, be willing to play balls, and choose the ground of the conflict then it is completely possible. The conditions in the real-life examples are different from the story but it is close enough. To even think that you have no chance of winning before the war begins is just unacceptable for any sovereigns of our country. Like Sun Tzu said, you have to believe in yourself.

Cat can just save her country by abdicating and letting the Crusaders fight in Praes but the problems would lie in Cordelia. Will Cordelia trust Cat enough to let her be responsible for transporting the entire army and the supply to Praes? Even someone like me sees it as risky. Her own allies are waiting for a chance to backstab her and you expect her to trust the word of a Villainess she never met. It will be nearly impossible for Cordelia to ally with Callow. If you are on the opposite side of Good and Evil then the ability to trust just plummet to near 0. Cat can abdicate but Cordelia has no way of knowing if it is genuine. There is too much trust required so it can only happen if the situation is dried enough that Cordelia has to negotiate.

When I follow the story, I notice how each side keeps to its own. Alliances happened between 2 Evil or 2 Good. No Good ever try to trade with Evil and Evil never try Good before. They can totally betray the alliances but the fact that alliances are only initiated between nations of the same side is quite alarming. Black forced an alliance on Callow with his Conquest – the biggest benefit that came out of the entire ordeal is a reliable trading partner for Praes. If Praes and Procer can ally with each other then it is a game changer isn't it. Praes will not be as dependent on Callow for food and Callows probably appreciate not having to fight Praes every decade. Procer can end the entire conflict and extend its influence on a foreign power like how America gained massive influence in Japan after WWII. But Procer never entertains the idea, Praes never entertain the idea and Callow never entertains the idea so all three get trapped in this cycle of war.

Seriously, I am still bitter that Malicia and Black never consider just putting some old cot or cowardly guys in charge of Procer. Just turn Procer into America at the beginning of WWII. As long as they don't have the will to fight then everything can be negotiated. Cowardly does not mean that they are stupid, it just means that they are less likely to resort to waging war to deal with their political problems. Still, if war is unavoidable as Black said then measures like fanning the civil war will surely ravage the resources Procer have for war, distract them from you and give you a headstart in the conflict. A 1-for-3 kind of deal.

savadrin

you seem to forget how much callow proper absolutely adores Catherine. because at the end of the day, they know with absolute certainty that she's got their back. remember way back in the story... "yesterday, i saw a little girl give an orc a necklace of flowers" for as far back as callow can remember, their lands have been the battlegrounds for crusade after invasion after crusade after invasion, and they likely would not settle for letting Procer, the nation that has invaded them just as often as praes, just tromp through their lands

Dylan Tullos

Savadrin:

Callow's love for Catherine may have taken a hit when she failed to prevent everyone in Liesse from being murdered by Praesi.

Procer has not invaded Callow just as often as the Praesi. The Praesi invade every generation, while Procer is often distracted by its own internal squabbles or problems. Procer and Callow are not friends, but it's not the Procerans sending flying fortresses or "sentient tiger armies" to attack their cities every twenty or thirty years.

Shequi

But then she did the absolutely most Callowan thing of turning Akua's soul into an ornament on her cloak in Revenge. If there's a Callowan trait that villains embody and Callow will respond to, it's Revenge.

Antoninjohn

Yes because Cat will totally not be backstabbed by the country just about to have it's High Assembly dissolve Callow and enslave it to themselves

Dylan Tullos

Antoninjohn:

If Catherine has an intact army, the Procerans are a lot less likely to backstab her. If the Proceran army is weakened from fighting Black's Legions, while her own forces are intact, treachery becomes impractical.

Foundling's abdication would leave Procer without any excuse to annex Callow, and the rest of the Crusaders aren't going to support a land grab by the Principate when they're supposed to be fighting the Dread Empire. Since Cordelia doesn't want to occupy Callow anyway, it would only be a matter of defeating an overambitious group of princes. That's a lot more manageable than fighting the entire Crusade.

It's also worth noting that Catherine's Praesi allies have already backstabbed her; Malicia let Diabolist go forward with her plan, and that ended up killing everyone in Liesse. However untrustworthy they are, the Principate are still a lot nicer than the Dread Empire.

MetruX

Actually the principate has been seen by Callowans through the generations as just as bad as Praes, hated just as much. And before you were talking about how they couldn't stop Diabolist, now you're saying they didn't, so which of those points is wrong?

The principate is KNOWN to backstab and land grab on every opportunity, the reason why it was so hard for Cordelia to get a Crusade going in the first place, and they don't even need to have an excuse, it's a land under the thumb of a villain, what more reason would a crusade need to attack Cat?

If she simply let them enter, they will ignore civilians, sure, but it'll just be making it harder for Cat to defend.

Dylan Tullos

The Dread Empire invades Callow every generation. However little Callowans like the Principate, they're still better than the people who are attacking them constantly.

Also, the Principate has never murdered the entire population of a Callowan city and raised them as zombies. That's a big difference.

Black couldn't stop Diabolist. Malicia didn't try to stop her because she wanted Akua to finish her superweapon. Don't you remember the conversation at the end of the last book where Black revealed that Malicia knew about her plans?

The deal was for Catherine to keep Callow in line, while Black and Malicia prevented the Wasteland's Traditional Evil from getting loose in Callow. Catherine upheld her end of the bargain; Black and Malicia failed to keep theirs. What's the point of having allies who can't do what they promised?

The entire point for Catherine has been defending Callowan citizens. If letting the Procerans in means that Callowan fields won't burn and Callowan cities won't be sacked, then having to abdicate and flee the country is a very small price to pay. Put Baroness Kendall in charge, tell Cordelia that the Crusade gets free passage as long as they don't try any land grabs, and rely on Callow's substantial army and Cordelia's good sense to keep the Crusaders moving south to the Dread Empire.

Ashen Shugar

One point that seems to have been missed, is that there's a **story** rut in reality about Callow being invaded and Praes being an invader. Black pointed it out as what they were trying to get out of in their practical ruling of Callow instead of just looting it for all the food they could carry.

Cat abdicating **might** make it a little bit harder for Procer to justify invading but only a little, and it just drops them right back in the rut of Callow being invaded regularly. If Praes isn't in a condition to do it, then Procer will.

My guess for the best way out of that story, is for Cat to eventually take over rule of Praes as a queen of Callow because that turns the story right over on its head. If Callow is in charge, then it's not going to invade itself. As long as Praes are technically top dog, there's still the chance for that story to start up again the moment a Hero pops up in Callow, feels the call of the heavens and isn't squashed back down quickly enough.

Dylan Tullos

Ashen Shugar:

You make good points. I had forgotten about the story rut.

A Callowan ruler of the Dread Empire would decisively break the current Story, which focuses on Praes invading and Callow being invaded. I'm not sure how the Story would adapt, but it would have to be something different.

Shequi

There's a story rut of Callow being invaded by Procer, too.

Dylan Tullos

Shequi:

The Princes make bad neighbors, but they spend too much time being bad neighbors to each other to invade Callow constantly. Also, the only invasion route Procer used to have was through the Red Flower Vales, where a relatively small army can stop a much larger force of invaders.

A Proceran Prince can't easily invade Callow, so he's more likely to fight his neighbors or attack the Free Cities. The Dread Empire has a land border with Callow, but not any other countries, so the Kingdom is going to be on the receiving end of practically every Praesi invasion.

RanVor

Archer really needs to get laid.

I have a question to you, Erratic: reading the fruit of your tireless labors, I got the impression that you're reading the comments under every chapter as they are posted, and whenever an issue is raised, you address it immediately in the next chapter. Is that what you do? Also, you're amazing and I want to throw money at you, but unfortunately I don't have much to donate right now.

Cheers to everyone from the first-time commenter.

erraticerrata

I do read the comments, but the interval varies for when. I'm usually around for an hour or two after posting a chapter.

I don't usually address what you're calling issues, no. Mostly because I already know what I want to write and I'm not interested in changing what that is, in part because it would be impossible to please everyone who comments (not to mention significantly lower the quality of the books).

letouriste

pretty sure this is the most healthy way to go for a writer;) so many stories lose their edge because the autor listen too much to the fanbase:/ glad you are mature enough for taking care of that.

letouriste

hum...i was concerned about cat mental state after her transformation but she seem to be the same:) the fact she still smoke and drink is pretty telling her winter modified feelings are not permanent and probably only felt when she use her Name actively

Author Unknown

"tapirs can, in fact, commit treason but that lack of sentience bars them from laying claim to the Tower by right of usurpation"

All hail Dread Emperor Meow!

The Warren Peace NFL Report

"we'd made tests. For that kind of distance, the average was eight days. Going as low as six and high as fifteen."

That's an extremely strange distribution. How many trials did they do? Technically four is enough:  $(6+6+6+15) \div 4 = 8.25$ , but obviously that isn't what happened. There would reasonably need to be twice that many at least, and probably a lot more. Obviously Cat can't afford to waste weeks at a time playing little Arcadia games like that. Can she create a portal and send a squadron on through by themselves and trust they'll find the exit, then also return the long, slow way? She must have had dozens of squads/scouts/whatevers going at any given time. How much of her forces are spread out all over the place still?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

When is Malicia going to reveal that she intentionally had mages "defect" to Procer to teach them scrying? Presumably without teaching them that Praes knows how to eavesdrop on their scrying sessions...

Komploding

Is it just me or has Archer stopped sending signals to Masego and is now literally hitting on him? I don't think she's can get much clearer than that

blub01

so would it take too much time to take either thief to steal the stored power or a trebuchet with goblinfire munitions to set the ritual on fire through arcadia, or is there another reason cat isn't doing that?

vuthuha912

Okay, digging a tunnel through a mountain. Can't say I have never seen this before? Would this be like Napoleon crossing the Alps or Hannibal? It is a dangerous thing if the ritual were to succeed but what can we do about this? Should we just blow up the entire thing? Maybe start the evacuation process and just start building fortifications around the area. I wonder if we can just fight them in the Stairway and let them win so that they drain their narrative weights for the fight then drop a mountain on the passages after the fight to stop them from establishing a supply line then finished them off. Without supply they will need to plunder the countryside, evacuating the surroundings well enough and you can probably stop this invasion.

---

Chapter 3: Chat

"I must say, Chancellor, you've become quite the conversationalist."

– Dread Empress Maledicta II

The room had been a gaol, once upon a time. Not one the Fairfaxes ever owned up to having, but the ruling dynasty of Callow had not remained on the throne by being faint-hearted. Unlike the luxurious prison that was the Songbird's Cage, this was a dark and ugly pit. Not the kind of place you sent someone if you ever expected them to come out. The late and unlamented Governor Mazus had apparently used it as dumping grounds for people he believed would cause more terror by being disappeared than known dead, and expanded what had once been a single pair of rooms to a large underground complex of seven. I'd had it sealed off before my coronation, and not a soul was allowed here now. Bare stone walls surrounded me, cleared of manacles, and the only ornament was the seat I'd brought down here myself. I closed the steel door behind me and froze it shut before taking a deep breath. Winter came easy.

It always did.

Ice crept across the walls hungrily, gaping maws of frost that devoured every nook and cranny until all that was left was a hall of glittering mirrors. It'd been as difficult as snapping a finger, and there was a part of me that delighted in using the might of my mantle. But then the world sharpened. Grew jagged. I could feel, with dim horror, everything that I was begin to calcify. To set in immovable stones. That would have been dangerous enough, but I was not merely fae. My title was Winter's and Winter knew nothing as intimately as darkness and hunger. I sat down on the chair and forced myself to think as little as I could. It was almost cowardly, but I'd rather not have to confront the kind of thoughts that would surface if I pondered anything too deeply in this state. Gods, I could use a drink. The alcohol was one of the few things that blunted the edges of this. That made me feel like I was still human. But even if I'd been willing to embrace that crutch right now, I could not. Hakram had, before he left, exacted an oath from me.

Never while on campaign, or attending affairs of state. The oath was to end with our reunion, whenever that may be. Adjutant had expressed... worries to me in private, twice now. I'd been irritated, considering Indrani drank like a fish and no one ever lectured her, but he was right in that Archer wasn't wearing a crown. Unlike me. The sharpness of the ache for a cup in my hand was whispering to me that Hakram might just have been right. He did have that nasty habit, didn't he? I breathed in and out slowly, then reached for the power again. This had been an aspect, once. Fall. Now it was just a part of me, true as hair or toes. When it'd been crystallized into a single word it'd been stronger – no perhaps not that, simply more rigid – but whatever had been lost was more than made up by the breadth of what I could now achieve with this power. Before, I would never have been able to forge this half-world I was now painting over the room with brushstrokes of night. The threshold of my domain, the thought came, forged of instinct and inhuman certainty. I bit my lip, strong enough to draw blood.

Pain, that most human of sensations. It cleared out some of the ice and I let out a relieved breath. I had to see to myself before the First Prince graced me with her presence. That and play the card up my sleeve.

"I grant you leash," I said, voice echoing. "I grant you eyes and ears, tongue and feet, at my sufferance."

With a throaty chuckle Akua Sahelian's shade stepped out of the Mantle of Woe. Even in this half-death, she remained beautiful.

High cheekbones and perfectly styled eyebrows, her dress of red and gold tightly clinging to curves I could only envy. The only thing marring that beauty was the gaping bloody hole in her chest where I'd ripped out her heart.

"Freedom," the Diabolist mused. "Limited, but then is that not true of all freedoms?"

"Now that I've let you out of the lamp," I said, "for the first of my three wishes I would like peace for Calernia."

She cast me a disapproving looks.

"You know very well that djinn do not grant wishes," she said. "That is mere Callowan ignorance."

"You make a terrible genie, Akua," I told her. "I'm going to trade you for a lantern one of these days, you know? They're about as useful and they don't talk back."

"Your insistence on levity is a mark of poor breeding, dearest," she said. "You must overcome it."

I had a few less than polite things to reply to that with, including a reminder that if she was so clever she wouldn't have ended up sown into my collar, but it would have to wait. I could feel my guest arriving. The darkness shivered, and just like that the First Prince sat across from me. I'd not been sure that she'd bite when I sent Thief with the amulet I'd woven strands of my domain into, but to my pleasure she had. She was covered with so many miracles she almost glowed and she was very careful never to leave her seat, but she was here anyway. Hasenbach was not a reckless woman by nature, by my reckoning, but I knew exactly why she'd taken the risk to venture into even the outskirts of my domain: the Augur. How deeply that woman's visions ran was still a subject of much speculation across the whole Empire, but I'd banked on her being able to tell I genuinely had no intention of turning this into a trap. I needed the First Prince too badly to ever consider taking her life, even if it'd been possible. There was a moment of silence, as the Proceran gathered her bearings. I said nothing, patiently waiting.

Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, Prince of Rhenia and Princess of Salia, Warden of the West and Protector of the Realms of Man. Quite a mouthful of titles for a woman who was only twenty-six years old and had become the sovereign ruler of the largest – and arguably most powerful – nation on Calernia before the age of twenty. This was likely as close to meeting in person as we'd ever come, so as always I took a moment to study her. She was impeccably clothed in dark blue I'd been told was part of the heraldry of her home principality Rhenia, the dress rather conservative but still flattering to her frame. It made her shoulders look slimmer, I thought. Hasenbach was best known for her skill as a diplomat, but she'd been born with a warrior's frame. Her long golden hair cascaded down her neck in perfect ringlets, needing no ornament but their own richness, but there was a discreet touch of golden eye shadow that made her blue eyes stand out even more vividly. On her brow was a circlet of white gold, tastefully understated considering the power it represented. I'd seen beautiful women in my day, some hauntingly so, and honestly would not count the First Prince among them. She was not plain, not exactly, but all the most striking parts of her appearance were careful artifice.

That did nothing to detract from her presence, even in this half-realm of mine. Though seated on a mere cushioned and sculpted chair, she radiated that... something. The unspoken pull that surrounded people like Black and Malicia, or even Juniper. That spark that made the weight they bore into something that dragged others into their orbit. No, she was not someone to ever underestimate. The more I learned about her ascension to the throne and the years that had followed, the warier I was becoming of her. The pit of vipers she ruled was as deadly as the Imperial court in many ways, and she'd retained rule of it without having a cudgel like Black to call on. She met my eyes, but did not speak. Akua softly laughed, walking around the First Prince's silhouette with the grace of a cat before leaning her head over the Proceran's shoulder.

"She will never speak first, my heart," the shade of my most hated enemy said. "It would be improper, you see. Her people believe that First Prince is the greatest of all titles, and so she must never be first to offer courtesy."

I inclined my head towards Hasenbach.

"Your Most Serene Highness," I said, voice calm.

"Your Grace," Cordelia Hasenbach replied.

The proper address was 'Your Majesty', though never once had she referred to me as such. The etiquette she employed recognized me as noble, though at best one of equal standing with any of the many princes of the Procer.

"Look at how her lip curls around the words, Catherine," Akua laughed, moving around the unseeing First Prince to better study her. "She would prefer not to grant you them at all, but she must – and how it displeases her. To call you queen would be recognition of your legitimacy, and end to her crusade's own. But to deny you any title at all would make any negotiation between you worthless."

Akua rose, stretching languidly.

"And she needs you to keep speaking to her, my lovely," the monster said silkily. "Oh yes. Even should you never come to terms, to be able to gauge you with her own eyes is priceless advantage."

Diabolist had grown increasingly fond of using endearments with me, since I'd ripped out her heart and stolen her soul. Fucking Praesi. Fucking highborn, really.

"Let's begin with the usual," I said. "Terms?"

"Unchanged," the First Prince replied. "Immediate abdication and disbanding of your armies. Your soldiery to undergo fair trial after the crusade. Yourself and no more than five of your comrades allowed exile without pursuit, under condition of never returning to Callow."

I hummed, and idly reached for my pipe. I used the process of stuffing it with wakeleaf and striking a match as a deferral of answer to allow me to gather my thoughts. I'd half-expected Hasenbach to offer starker terms now that she'd struck the first blow and begun crossing into Callow catching me flat-footed.

"Do you feel that?" Akua murmured. "That is caution, dearest. She does not harden terms of surrender because she fears you. What you might do if cornered. Use that fear, Catherine. It is the sharpest prick of the mantle you claimed."

I puffed at my pipe and let out a stream of smoke, making myself more comfortable in my seat.

"I'll have to decline, for now," I said.

Akua was useful, too useful to shove back into the box right now, but more for her perceptiveness than her advice. The terms remained unacceptable. Abdication would be a relief, to be honest, and something that was going to happen regardless if my plans came to fruition. But not like this. I couldn't trust a crusader tribunal to pass sentence on the Praesi under my command, much less the greenskins. And that the First Prince and her allies would be deciding Callow's fate without a single check on their decisions was the least acceptable part of it all.

"You are calmer than I expected," Hasenbach said. "The dossiers we have of you led me to expect conversation of a harsher tone."

Akua clucked her tongue.

"Do not let her turn this towards you, my heart," she advised. "Any answer at all will be revealing in ways you cannot control. That is too dangerous a woman to be given the lay of your thoughts."

I inclined my head, agreeing with Akua while masquerading it as acquiescence with the First Prince's sentence.

"I've been reading about the Principate, lately," I said. "About how it functions in practice."

The First Prince smiled, as if she were sharing a drink with an old friend.

"Interesting," she said. "And have you come to any conclusions?"

"It doesn't," I bluntly said. "Function, that is. The fault line in Procer's foundation has been made exceedingly clear over the last twenty years."

Not so much as a speck of emotion crossed the First Prince's face. Akua laughed delightedly.

"See how her brow stiffened, Catherine?" she said. "That is anger, my lovely. The recognition that the Empress' game was no great plot. That all her people ever needed to claw each other bloody was means and excuse. Feed that wrath. That is the only way for you to glimpse truth behind the mask."

Praesi diplomacy, I was learning, was more like a pit fight with slightly pulled punches than anything I'd recognize. It was all about testing the other side, making them blink and then capitalizing on that weakness. That Akua could not recognize tussling like that with Cordelia godsdamned Hasenbach was a bad idea was a good reminder that for all her cleverness the Diabolist had heavy blinders. That was the rotten heart that always made the designs of the High Lords collapse: they could not ever conceive that they were sometimes in the inferior bargaining position. Fortunately, I'd learned that lesson early when I grew up with the Tower's boot over my throat. No doubt I have blinders of my own, I thought. But if I knew they'd hardly be blinders, would they?

"Not overly surprising conclusion, given the manner in which you have ruled," the First Prince said. "For all that your throne is in Laure, you have adopted many of the manners of the East."

Ruled, I noted, not reigned. How carefully she always picked her words.

"Don't misunderstand me," I said. "I'm not touting the Tower as an alternative, or even how I've been running things. I just grafted Praesi bureaucracy to the court, and it's a clunky solution. But I've gotten my hands on a history of the League Wars, and it's not a pretty story."

Akua clucked her tongue disapprovingly.

"This is the chorus of the losing side, dearest," she chided me. "Beneath the dignity of one who triumphed over me."

It was a small shift, but I saw Hasenbach's eyes brighten with interest after I spoke. I'd been careful, during our little talks, to try to find common grounds. Something we could discuss and disagree over without it getting personal. So far, what had worked best was Proceran history. I wasn't reading those books solely because I no longer needed to sleep, or even to get an idea of my opponent's weaknesses.

"You refer to the Right of Iron," she said. "I would, in fact, tend to agree with you in this matter. The prerogative of waging war without the agreement of the First Prince has been the source of much trouble over the centuries."

"So why haven't you tried to revoke it?" I asked, genuinely curious. "I know that'd have to go through the Highest Assembly and that means a vote, but just after your civil war people were sick enough of the killing you would have had a decent chance of pushing it through."

"I considered this," the First Prince admitted. "Yet in doing so, I would have created cohesive opposition to any further reform. Many of which are, as you have said, direly needed."

"That opposition you're talking about," I said. "They're the exact same people that spent nearly twenty years ravaging the Principate on Malicia's pay."

"A generalization," Hasenbach said. "One with some shade of accuracy, I will concede, yet there is important difference in having been funded by the Empress and having sought to do her bidding."

I acknowledged the point with a nod. From the corner of my eye I saw Akua meandering away from the First Prince, coming to stand at my back. Even knowing she was powerless, utterly at my mercy, having her behind me was raising the hair on my neck.

"What I'm wondering is – why listen to them at all?" I asked. "I saw the Imperial estimates for the remaining armies after the Battle of Aisne. There wasn't a force in the Principate that could have stood against you, if you'd twisted their arms into backing your reforms. And I don't mean the small ones, I mean everything."

"You were taught," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "by two of the most brutal tyrants in living memory. That is not your fault, though your embrace of their methods remains your sole responsibility. That is why your perspective on the subject is tainted. I did not attempt to make myself an absolute monarch because I believe such a manner of ruling to be dangerously flawed."

"If you count civil wars, Procer's been on the field more often than any other nation on Calernia," I pointed. "That includes Praes, Your Highness."

"You blame this on lack of centralized authority," the First Prince said. "That is not entirely inaccurate, yet you miss the central tenet of the Principate: it is, unlike Praes, a nation built on consensus. The Highest Assembly is prone to squabbles, and inefficient. This I will not deny. That is because it is not an institution meant to empower the office of the First Prince, it is meant to check it. No single man or woman should ever be able to wield the full, unrestricted might of the Principate."

"Now," Akua whispered into my ear. "Now is when you slide the knife."

I smiled pleasantly.

"Then why," I asked, "is the host crossing into Callow made up almost entirely by your opposition in the Assembly?"

The shutters went down on the First Prince's face, even as I pulled at my pipe and allowed smoke to stream out of my nostrils. This, I thought, moments like this. They're why I let you out of the box, Akua. I had much to learn from Diabolist, when it came to this kind of game.

"She did not expect you to understand her intent," Akua said, still at my side. "Watch the eyes, how she reconsiders the kind of threat you pose. She thought you a dull thug, a brute of a child with a stolen crown. Now she wonders if you've taken as much from these talks as she has, and it worries her."

The shade laughed.

"Do not talk," she said. "Let her silence damn her more the longer it stretches."

I spat out another mouthful of smoke, studying the First Prince. When she finally spoke, her tone was perfectly calm.

"I am forced to wonder," Hasenbach said, "what game it is you truly play, Catherine Foundling."

"The only game I've ever ever played," I said. "Keeping my people's head above the waterline."

"Yet you ally with monsters and murderers," the First Prince said. "The very same whose fellows committed the single greatest massacre of Callowans since the days of Dread Empress Triumphant."

"May she never return," Akua murmured.

"I'm also talking with you," I said. "The thing is, Your Highness, that right now the Tower's my only possible bedfellow. I can't take your crusade on my own."

Not entirely true. Juniper was the opinion that if I was willing to let most of Callow burn while I struck deep in crusader territory, I might be able to force a draw by sheer dint of massacre. She'd played out the theory with her general staff. No part of that path was acceptable to me, though. I was not willing to pile up the bodies until no one was able to keep going. If I was ever forced to that, well... Better to abdicate. And to backstab Praes as brutally as I could beforehand, so that the crusade ended quickly and not in Callow.

"A villain ruling over Callow is not an acceptable outcome for this war," the First Prince said.

"People I don't trust in the slightest deciding what happens to Callow isn't either," I frankly replied. "If I have to cut a deal, I'd rather do it with you than Malicia. After Liesse... Well, if this is the best I can expect from the Empire, the Empire's not an entity I can trust to uphold their part of a deal."

"Trust has nothing do with it," Akua dismissed. "You have power enough that the Empress cannot cross you lightly. Treaties are only ever gilding added to the deeper truth of power, dearest. This one does not consider you of sufficient might to treat with."

"Trust," Hasenbach said, her tone almost amused.

"Trust," I echoed.

The First Prince smiled.

"Did you never pause to wonder, Your Grace, why the only powers willing to deal with you are monstrous?" she asked softly.

My jaw clenched.

"Did you never wonder if you belong amongst that number?"

My fingers tightened.

"Careful now," Diabolist warned. "She goads you not by accident."

The urge was there to lash out. To remind that sanctimonious fucking Proceran that her own hands were far from clean. She'd sent out her enemies for me to savage, and her reasons for starting this crusade weren't nearly as squeaky clean as she'd like her allies to believe. She'd played the shadow game with Malicia for over a decade, too, and there's wasn't a person in Creation who'd manage to get through that without some mud on their shoes. Why were her killings less a sin than mine? Because she went to the House of Light for sermons and paid her alms? Because her intentions were some kind of nebulous greater good? Hells, so were mine. Instead I took a deep breath. Slowly, I raised my pipe and pulled at the dragonbone shaft. The wakeleaf no longer brought the sharp focus it once had, but the act itself was soothing.

"I have," I admitted quietly, "utterly failed Callow."

Whatever answer she'd expected, it had not been that. The flicker of surprise in her eyes did not lie. I felt Akua begin to speak, but I no longer had need of her services. All it took was an exertion of will and back into the collar she went. Blind and deaf and furious.

"After First Liesse, when the Ruling Council was formed," I said. "No, even before that. When I did not answer Akua Sahelian being named governess with gathering an army and hanging her from the nearest tree. I betrayed everything I had set out to do the moment I allowed a woman I knew a cold butcher to be the steward of Callowan lives for the sake of political expediency."

I'd had months, now, of sleepless nights. Of going back over everything I'd done. Thinking of the paths I could have taken that didn't result in a hundred thousand of my people dead. And there had been so very many of them, hadn't there?

"I fucked up the Ruling Council," I acknowledged. "I had the leverage to make real changes, the same kind I've been saying I want to achieve since I was a girl, and instead I let a council stacked with High Lord cronies run Callow for me. And then got furious when they acted the same way Praesi always have, the moment I wasn't there to make them afraid. I've been complicit through inaction or ignorance in every catastrophe that struck Callow since the moment I got power and did absolutely nothing with it."

The First Prince watched me in silence, her face unreadable.

"I could make excuses," I said. "That I was ill-prepared for that kind of authority. That I spent so much time and spilled so much blood getting on top I forgot why I wanted to be there in the first place. But that'd be hypocritical, wouldn't it? I was given exactly what I clamoured for, and when I got it a city was turned into a graveyard. Hells, it's on my fucking standard: justifications matter only to the just. I started out with the intention of burying anyone who tossed around sentences like that in a shallow grave, but now I'm the one having them sown on battle flags. Second Liesse made it clear that I've slowly crawled into being the kind of person I swore I was going to remove."

"And yet," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "you still wear the crown and muster your armies for war. Sentiment is only meaningful if followed by action. If your grief at all the woe you have caused changes nothing, it is merely self-pity."

"I know exactly what I have to do, Hasenbach," I said. "And letting you carve up Callow like side of pork isn't part of it. Not when the people doing the carving have no real incentive to care for the realm under the knife."

"Self-pity, then," Hasenbach said. "You still believe you can win this war."

"War," I said, "is the very opposite of what I'm after."

My pipe had finally gone out, I saw.

"We'll talk again," I told her, and the darkness collapsed.

I stayed in my seat for a long time, alone with my thoughts. When does a lesser evil simply become an evil? That was the line I needed to find, the one that could not be crossed. The moment where I became a greater wound than the one I was trying to prevent. I rose as the ice receded around me. It was going to be a long night.

They always were.

---

Joel

Nice to see that she's taken a long, hard look in the mirror.

Dainpdf

I wish we could have gotten some of that look, instead of a time skip and the end result.

danh3107

Everything everything everything Akua did and said this chapter was flawless, beautiful even. I ship it.

Seeing the First Prince out of her own perspective was really interesting, I hope we get the chance again.

RoflCat

I find it interesting that for all that Akua did to try to make Cat into her monster, now Akua is Cat's monster, ever tempting her into going deeper into Evil.

Admittedly Cat's got a VERY tight leash on her monster....
That leash better not be tortoise shell bondage though....

Rook

Bondage might actually be the only effective leash for Akua ghost to be honest, considering her most dangerous weapon is her treacherous gods damned tongue. Nothing short of a permanent gag is really going to make her stop being a double edged sword with a handle made of razors.

d_o_l

( ˘ ˘ )

caoimhinh

( ˘ ˘ )

kelioez

( ˘ ˘ )

Dainpdf

I actually want to see this from the First Prince's perspective. What is this new and... I was going to say improved but that's debatable, Cat like from the outside?

d_o_l

Haha, totally called Akua becoming an evil spirit advisor.

naturalnuke

Abua the Cloak Ghost, truly a fabulous idea.

If only this could be trusted not to backfire...

Rook

It's a Foundling weapon, of course it's going to backfire. She doesn't have a weapon in her entire damned arsenal that doesn't take a chunk out of her own hide for using it.

If Names were granted based on character traits, it would probably be Queen of Mutilating-Herself-Almost-As-Badly-As-Her-Enemies. Doesn't exactly roll off the tongue though.

Naeddyr

The Flagellant.

haihappen

Hmm, the Flagellant could easily be a Name.
An Ascetic Monk like non-priest that does the wrong things for the right reasons, and finds absolution afterwards in self-flagellation. Or he/she could take on the sins of others for absolution?

An entire Name/Character based upon absolution of sins by means of pain suffered willingly. Is a Choir of Absolution Canon? Or does this fit with Mercy?

Alternatively, the sins are not absolved, merely transferred, making the Flagellant a vessel for every sin known to Man. The goal: deny the hells a great deal of souls, at the cost of one live.

nipi

Now, now! She hasn't climbed to the top of The Tower yet.
Give it time.

ALKATYN

The Pyrrhic Queen

sengachi

Oh damn. That's a hell of a name.

Dainpdf

Took the words right out of my mouth.

onedollargum

"Cloak Ghost" is an amazing character title or magic object name.

Gunslinger

Holy cow, this was another fascinating chapter.

The revelation of Cat's alcoholism is both logical and sensible. Those winter powers don't come without any cost sadly. It also makes sense, Named can easily burn away alcohol but Cat wouldn't want to as it reminds her she's human and alive. You know like our friend, the Wandering Bard.

I was dumbfounded when Akua came out and started giving her fantastic diplomatic advice. Quite a whammer of a scene but there's no way that ends well for Cat right? Though it does explain how she could break into the Hashmallim's domain. (Also so much fuel for the shippers)

Once again plenty of great lines but I burst into laughter at this one

> "May she never return," Akua murmured

Not you too Akua.

Finally if you can vote for the Guide on topwebfiction.com

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

You can also support the author via his patreon (<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>)

Donations there make 3 chapters a week possible for all of us

Euodiachloris

I swear, the more people tack "may she never return" on to her name, the more likely they make Triumphant's return.

It's like seeing Taylor and going "eh, I can take her" or Baam and being all "you and what army?".

Narrative Causality, bitches! 😊

Trupo

I half-expected Triumphant coming during Second Llesse, either posessing Ubuu or marching out of Greater Breach with an army.

Not\_a\_robot

Never thought I'd see a ToG reference here on the Guide of all places. Upvote for you Euo.

glassgirlceci

Honestly, I'm glad Cat was called out on the budding alcoholism. Having an alcoholic protagonist brings up a few too many unpleasant childhood memories; it was actually starting to impact my enjoyment of the story 😞

NZPIEFACE

What I like most about EE writing is probably the use of short impactful sentences, such as "They always were." at the end and "It always did." near the start. The ability to send chills down my spine with such short sentences to imply that so much more is something I consider pretty amazing.

Keep it up man, I'm loving this arc.

NZPIEFACE

Aaaaaaand we can't edit messages. Reading it one day later hurts me physically.

mavant

Ship tease!

Stormblessed

Interestingly, the only reason the "shipping" is being advertised is because Akua's gone mad and started referring to Kat affectionately. Otherwise it wouldn't be shipped at all. Of course, without affection there are no romantic relationships in real life.

But I certainly can't see Kat getting romantically involved with Akua Ghost. Yet. Maybe at the end of the book or if she becomes more and more Fae and the story draws her in. (Perhaps by accidentally reciprocating terms once or twice by accident or sarcasm and getting stuck in the story)

danh3107

I can't speak for everyone, but I was joking. I don't see it happening it's just a fun thing to say.

TideofKhatanga

It's a Praesi thing, treating your worst enemy the way you would your dearest lover. "Iron sharpens Iron" and all that shit, the Praesi love no one more than their strongest rival. Malicia did the same thing with Tasia Sahelian and now with Cordelia Hasenbach.

Much like a crocodile's smile only shows teeth, a Highborn's love only shows obsessive hatred.

haihappen

Maybe its just Stockholm's Syndrome.

Another reasonable explanation is that the Praesi mindset dictates that power is something that you need to bring yourself close to, by any means possible, to eventually seize it for yourself.

Akua's soul-ghost probably has a dozen plans in the making to get out of her current predicament and seizing Cat's power for herself. Being a helpful little tool is part of that, since it helps ensure the continued existence of her current ... soullord(?) and potential future vessel. Also, it tempts Cat to rely on Akua, which creates dependence, which is a potential opening later.

I wouldn't put it past Akua to try to (for a lack of a better word) seduce Cat, so Cat is tempted to give Akua a physical body so she can ... indulge. I sense Cat will be craving desperately for anything that can make her feel human again in the future.

Dainpdf

Do you really think that? Two girls, one of them described as hot, the other being the MC, confirmed into girls and quite a badass? Of course people will ship. Especially with Akua's whole "you'll be mine yet" shtick. Shippers care not for logic or the presence of actual chemistry of the fact that one is a cold blooded mass murderer and the other is Akua freaking Sahelian.

Antoninjohn

Well it looks like Cat has a great politics and magic tutor now, and a pet ritualist to make new rituals

Dainpdf

I don't think she's trusting Akua anywhere near magic, any time soon. That's just asking for trouble.

Aeon

Everything about this chapter is awesome. I loved Akua and Cat's sheer honesty was great. The only bad thing about this story is that now I'm stuck waiting for more. Thanks for the great chapter.

letouriste

this is a good thing, little tidbit like that motivate you to see another day.
find enough life stories and fiction stories and you will never stop living:)

Nguyen Hong Hai

To be fair though, from the outset Praes and Principate would always clash with each others simply via beliefs and ways of life, without name and story weight both countries would devolve to ruin with each other long ago.
Also talking about just and fair. Hanno would like to have a word about that.

Dainpdf

Hanno would like to have a sword about that.

Fixed that for you.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Akua's pretty shady.

Yardaze

oh you.

(excellent pun, I approve)

Rook

Pretty slim as well

A real slim shady that one

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

I'd just noticed there's technically two puns here, "pretty" as in, Akua's hot, and "shady" referring to how she might poison Cat's ears and the fact that she's a shade.

Trupo

Interesting... In Praes, nobility is kept in check by promise of one day reaching for the Tower or becoming Chancellor, preventing them from rampaging over "lesser" goals. Thus the Tyrant is a check on nobles power by existing and not being proactive enough to unite them (good work, Malicia!).

In Procer, nobles are supposed to be check on First Prince and it somewhat works – they have anarchy, but no tyranny ;).

What's was the force that kept Callow functional? Being stuck between Procer and Praes, perhaps.

letouriste

true loyauty toward what the kindgom represent maybe. loyauty doesn't seem to exist in praes and procer but that could in callow given how talbot think

Rook

Praes is all about the best coming out on top though, generally no hard feelings at the end of it all. Malicia and Tasia, Cat and Akua, the goblin matrons, etc.... they've got a different sort of incredibly twisted loyalty.

Akua, in typical Praesi fashion, seems to hate Cat much less now that Cat forced Akua to acknowledge her by tearing out her heart and binding her to a cloak. No defeated Callowan enemy would be this proud of you for beating them and wearing their immortal soul as a fashion statement. Definitely wouldn't be this helpful either, treacherous intentions aside.

Dainpdf

Akua was one of the most patriotic characters in the whole story. She saw her country being changed and decided to make a stand for what she believed was the soul of her homeland. Oh, and also if she can't she's bringing everyone down with her.

Naeddyr

> Oh, and also if she can't she's bringing everyone down with her.

*sniff*

I always tear up at the national anthem of Praes.

Dainpdf

I will award one internet to whoever actually composes original lyrics for that. EE, you do not count. I mean, feel free, but I've already awarded you too many internets.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Callow already got "Down in the line" so I think there will a equivalent for Principate and Praes too. Even the Orc got the "To the West"

thespaceinvader

Straight-up feudalism, by the sound of things.

Frommerman

Down here in the mud it's us who hold the line...

beleester

I think it's that, along with the Heroes. Callow's story is always about getting occupied and kicking the occupiers out. They don't have a real "royal dynasty" – any Callowan king probably has a 50-50 chance of getting usurped, exiled, or killed in battle against an invading army. What they have is a series of Heroic leaders who use the throne as a rallying flag.

Callow works because whenever there's an external threat, everyone from the king down to the peasants is willing to pitch in to give the occupiers the boot, and there's always an external threat.

The only times I can think of the ruler causing problems for Callow is when Callow is stable enough to go on the offensive. "The classic Callowan blunder: Never send an army into the Wasteland that you can't handle if it comes back as undead."

ALazyMonster

They mentioned in one of the heroic interludes (riposte I think) that Callow has only been occupied twice, triumphant and the conquest, so I think it was they were just constantly being invaded and defeating the invaders but your point about everyone pitching in seems solid though.

Dainpdf

A point was made, ages ago, that random Callowans would have weapons stashed and would contribute to a revolution against conquerors.

Also, Procer has take Callow before, as well. They were kicked out.

McBob

And by Procer after the Crusades.

Dainpdf

In both (Praes and Procter) cases, there is a sort of idea that there can be as much infighting as necessary, but that there should be some respect to unity.

Partly due to fear, partly due to loyalty, partly due to greed... Callow had a divide between north and south, but fact was that they could only avoid conquer by their neighbors by sticking together.

SMHF

Well Akua's back a lot sooner than I was expecting! 😞

BTW don't forget to vote for Guide on topwebfiction, someone might find the story and write that CatxAkua fanfic u always wanted! :p

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Flameburst

Who is Akua? Is she related to Ubua?

Dainpdf

Where did that meme come from again? I remember there was a chapter when it started, but I don't recall how...

Ezreon

Its from Masego's interlude, where he gloriously REMEMBERED name of the girl he encountered much to Captain's delight.

Dainpdf

Oh, right! That was awesome.

Author Unknown

I think Cordelia is going to make a much more interesting opponent than Akua; she may even survive the experience. The fight with Akua was great and all, but she was way too much of a classical villain to have any hope of victory. Cordelia has all of the benefits of Akua's diplomatic cunning without the downside of being bat shit insane; something EE highlighted in the chapter.

Can't wait to see how it all plays out.

Not a robot

[quote]She may even survive the experience[/quote]
I love this story

TeK

Here's the kicker: centralization is propotionate for bordering threats. England had the leasure of constant civil wars and parlament bickering, because it was nigh impossible to invade. HRE, which pursued similar goverment, was a passing ground for any nearby force, France, Poland, Denmark, you name it. And was roghtfully dismatled in the end. My point is, the Procer can't afford being split, if it is to serve it's purpose as bulwark against Evil. Amazing example is the fate of Kievan Rus, which existed as constant collaboration of bickering princes, with great prince at head no less. It was promptly trampled by mongols, and stayed under it's yoke for centuries, until it was centralized.

On the side note: what is the side of Calernia? I mean, having fice (six) nations covering pretty much the whole surface of comtinent, given their level of technology, streches my suspension of disbelief. It can't be larger than Australia, for one, what with third of continent spanning empires and what not.

grzecho2222

Noble Democratic Republic also went for having checks for goverment and could not do anything outside of throwing armies at outside threats like Russia, HRE or Ottoman Empire. It also had stupid amount of infighting, Too much anarchy forces nations into stagnacy.

TeK

Yeah, forgot about Commonwealth. No wonder they got partitioned by absolutist monarchies. Letting other nations choose your ruler is a bad idea.

grzecho2222

That whole century was full of stupidity. The whole "We attack Poland so we may have better defences against Russia, we fail, we ally with Russia to attack Poland, we win, we got attacked by Russia, we fail" situation happening twice is just sad.

nipi

There is magic. Scrying would do much to alleviate the problem of the nations being too large to manage. Sure armies still take a long time to move but by having an instantaneous communication system reaction times are effectively cut in half.

Its size might be one reason why Procer is so decentralized. They had no scrying and thus maintaining centralized control of all the Principates would have been unfeasible.

Dainpdf

Named make this somewhat easier, since they can move things along more efficiently than any mortal ever could. The Principate can be somewhat disorganized because Named tie it together. Even more so for Praes.

Ward

Great chapter 😊

Antony444

This 'Right of Iron' looks like a fantastic bad idea and is in all likelihood the underlying reason why Procer was such a pariah state before Cordelia entered the stage. By everything which is holy, we have seen how nasty, self-serving and treacherous the Princes can be. And now we learn each and every one can go to war with each other or against foreign entities without the First Prince's approval?

This right is an awful privilege, no matter how centralised or decentralised a state you have to rule.

I will admit it will not made a lot of difference for the Chain of Hunger or the Dead King, the traditional evil entities, but I really wonder how many wars were fought with Levant and the League because an ambitious Prince decided to begin a few skirmishes and forced the rest of the Principate in the flames of war when it got out of control.

Apart from this, a very good conversation between Cordelia and Catherine. Might be the foundation for more, when the Dead King launches his invasion and the Northern forces get their 'Woe time'...

Dainpdf

I'm just waiting for both the League and the Kingdom of the Dead to start stirring and then Cordelia to have to call this whole thing off because two new fronts just opened at her rear.

nipi

Anyone else wondering if the Praesi mages Procer got were "sent" by Malicia? Surely the inferior version can be listened in on, shut down or perhaps even faked by more skilled Tower mages.

I wonder if Procer has created a code book in anticipation of such things? If so then Praesi spies will be trying to copy it.

Malicia might have even known about "The Stairs" ritual and decided to give the First Prince the option to split her armies to invade Callow.

nipi

Im talking about scrying.

nipi

From ch2 we have:

"They've mastered the basics of scrying, at least," Masego conceded. "It's why they're forging a pass instead of a tunnel even if it risks avalanches."

The Stairway could just be a modification to a previous plan. Likely needs less accumulated magic energy and is faster (can be made in one go) than tunneling.

As for the Crusade. Im pretty sure Malicia has been trying to delay/prevent one since she rose to power.

Sure instant communication is huge provided that it works. Id imagine that Praesi mages can pinpoint the communications and shut the very basic version Procer now has down in a rather large area. Maybe even kill the scrying mages. If Procer comes to rely on it (and I think we have already seen a change in military organization due to it), that can be a huge blow. Its also an avenue for intelligence gathering and it certainly could be worth it if communications can be forged. (The last one could be something that might not have been done in surviving history – meaning a complete surprise.)

Also note that the fact that it is inefficient against Praesi but not so much against others would create internal pressures to wage war somewhere else.

As for Procean modifications to it. I think Masegos attitude towards Procean mages applies to the whole of Praes, including the Empress.

Malicia considers a fight with Procer unwinnable. So I can see her making some calculated gambles.

beleester

The Stairway was apparently years in the planning, which makes that unlikely, since nobody knew a Crusade was on the way at the time.

And it would be foolish for Malicia to give away one of Praes's best weapons just for the *chance* to use it against them. Even if you *know* the enemy is listening in, the ability to communicate instantly at long range is huge. For instance, if you send advance warning of a surprise attack, then sure, the enemy knows they were spotted, but you've still stopped the surprise attack.

Also, we've seen Good mages jam and redirect scrying before, so I don't think they're strangers to info-war, they just didn't know the exact details of scrying. Once the ritual is in the hands of Proceran mages, who knows how they'll modify or improve it?

This is a permanent increase in power for the Procerans, while the advantage it gives Malicia is temporary at best.

nipi

From ch2 we have:

"They've mastered the basics of scrying, at least," Masego conceded. "It's why they're forging a pass instead of a tunnel even if it risks avalanches."

The Stairway could just be a modification to a previous plan. Likely needs less accumulated magic energy and is faster (can be made in one go) than tunneling.

As for the Crusade. Im pretty sure Malicia has been trying to delay/prevent one since she rose to power.

Sure instant communication is huge provided that it works. Id imagine that Praesi mages can pinpoint the communications and shut the very basic version Procer now has down in a rather large area. Maybe even kill the scrying mages. If Procer comes to rely on it (and I think we have already seen a change in military organization due to it), that can be a huge blow. Its also an avenue for intelligence gathering and it certainly could be worth it if communications can be forged. (The last one could be something that might not have been done in surviving history – meaning a complete surprise.)

Also note that the fact that it is inefficient against Praesi but not so much against others would create internal pressures to wage war somewhere else.

As for Procean modifications to it. I think Masegos attitude towards Procean mages applies to the whole of Praes, including the Empress.

Malicia considers a fight with Procer unwinnable. So I can see her making some calculated gambles.

grzecho2222

Cat disappeared line of mages that attacked Masego, wonder where they ended up.

letouriste

well my theory was about cat and not malicia but after this chapter i think you are right

nineran

The world is going gray: Good adopting mages and magic more broadly, Evil aping good actions to be successful. I wonder if the clear split between good and evil that exists in the Book of Light is really how the world is? Or if that'll change as times change?

Our friend the Wandering Bard is (very) old, and so perhaps her worldview reflects her earliest crystallized self (because all Named have a moment that forges them) – or maybe it does reflect the world beyond this one?

grzecho2222

It seems more and more that Praes and Procer swapped paterns (fact that in Epilogue there is mention of Black grinning, so there is definitely something going on)

Abrakadabra

That is the official stance of China too actually. Communism and capitalism is in convergence, they set up similar institutions to manage the economy, the Both use more and more machines in the industry and agriculture and so on. Convergence is a thing.

RanVor

Yet another excellent chapter.

But seriously, what was the point of killing Akua and binding her soul to a cloak if she's still around to piss Cat off?

sengachi

She's no longer ravaging Callow and trying to take over the world?

Dainpdf

She's still trying to ravage Callow and take over the world. Vicariously.

sengachi

... huh. Good point.

frolamiz

Okay, Akua is just perfect as an evil adviser.

Kevin Blandin

I yearn for Cordelia's death, Along with most of Procer being swallowed by the Dead King, or something truly apocalyptic. The sanctimonious hypocrisy of Cordelia is all the more cloying after reading the PoVs and dialog of Calamities.

The very fact Cordelia can muster a picosecond's belief that she isn't *at least* as bad as Malicia, and that everything she's doing is monstrous makes her worthy of being added to the Murder Cloak after a long, thorough execution.

grzecho2222

Procer will most likely fall apart by itself after Cordelia demise along with Crusade, so I'm afraid that your bloodlast will go for at least one book.

Dainpdf

Oh, come on. Did you miss the part where Malicia aided and abetted Akua freaking Sahelian just so she could get a neat gun? And she hangs out with Black and GLad0S – I mean, the Warlock.

Forrest

Isn't Cordelia being a little aggressive against Cat for somebody who is a masterful diplomatist/negotiator/politician? Yeah, I get that Akua said she wasn't 'taking her seriously' but even so she seemed closed to trying to leverage Cat towards anything. Especially when she started up with the 'self-pity' talk. Cat literally just made herself more vulnerable to Cordelia, and the masterful negotiator didn't even latch onto that weakness, instead acting disappointed like the other side of the conversation was a kid throwing a fit. This being after she had already been taken aback by Cat being a lot smarter about this than she had anticipated.

Dainpdf

But she is trying to exploit the weakness. She prodded Cat in her insecurities. She just couldn't have done it too openly – manipulating someone tends to not work as well when you're blunt about it, especially with someone as stubborn as Cat.

Dylan Tullos

It's good to know that Catherine is seriously considering the abdication offer I suggested last chapter, and that she's entirely willing to backstab the Dread Empire under the right circumstances.

Cordelia isn't negotiating in good faith because she wants Catherine to murder the worst of the Princes and kill off the horde of mercenary soldiers she sent with them. Since those Princes are also the most enthusiastic about dividing Callow up, they have a shared interest in seeing them dead. If Catherine defeats the would-be conquerors of Callow badly enough, Cordelia will have the political support she needs to offer more agreeable terms.

Catherine wants peace for Callow. Cordelia wants the Crusade to focus on the Dread Empire, not to get sidetracked stealing Callowan lands for Proceran princes. They're never going to be friends, but they have shared interests.

In the long term, Procer is a better negotiating partner than the Dread Empire. They're usually too caught up in their own domestic problems to threaten Callow, while the Empire invades every generation. As Catherine points out, Liesse proved that Practical Evil can't deliver on their end of the social contract, so it's time for Callow to look for alternatives.

MetruX

1. The abdication has been mentioned since half the last book, it's not a new idea that appeared now.
2. Cordelia will never bring in better terms, she may accept better terms if she is obliged to, but it's not that she doesn't hate Evil like Cat, she just thinks being practical at it brings more chance of vanquishing said Evil, mabe even with their help.

3. Procer has no need to be out of internal problems to attack Callow, it did so before, and conquered them before, the Empire only invaded because heavens MADE them, if you remember well everyone who tries to make the empire sustainable dies early, and they have to attack to get food unless they start dying.

All in all I don't want to restart on last chapters discussion about why they can't ally with Procer, but do take notice you are ignoring alot just to push your ideas upfront, and this will make you feel bad when it doesn't happen as you want in the story.

vuthuha912

While I do agree that Procer is subjectively a better partner than Praes, we also have to understand that Praes need to be dealt with permanently. 2 things that will likely deal with Praes: foods and reforms

=> Starving did a lot of things to your mind. When the only options are to invade and survive or stay and die then they are going to invade. Black has constantly emphasized this issue over and over in the story and everyone who closely monitors the Praesi situation knows it. So they need to give Praes a choice other than invade to gain food – reliably so that a new option can be opened. Look at history, every person who tried the third option died before it can be implemented. It almost feels like divine intervention at this point. No wonder Black is bitter toward Heaven, they are pushing his country into making the same self-destructing decision yet and his people just have to take it. Though he does agree that Praes's situation is something of its own making – constant backstabbing means no one is willing to trade with you, and infighting killed arguably more people than any invaders. However, even the backstabbing is sometimes felt like divine intervention. Remember Maleficent I – the gals who united the entire country and got betrayed by a highborn. When Elenor Fairfax united her country, she got to reign and establish a dynasty and when Maleficent did it, she got betrayed by her own countrymen – the people she unified. Worse, the backstabbing got so ingrained into the culture to the point that 2 best friends ultimately betrayed each other, and they both love each other as much as they possibly can. That culture ruins any of its citizen's ability to trust and actually cooperate.

=> Giving them food is not enough because the problem has grown to have a life of its own. Now that the dog eats dog world view has been re-enforced enough time into Creation, it is even harder to escape. Black tried to limit their ability to damage by taking away their privilege, building the army to counter their power, creating a new type of culture through the military, and trying to fill the court with bureaucrats. He tried for 40 years and failed utterly. Akua proves that as much mercy and time as he gives them, they can't ever change to the point that they can stand on their own. Malicia proves that as much as he likes thinks that someone shared his vision for Praes, he is utterly alone in this fight. Cat proves that as much as he plans for a replacement, they need to be a Praesi – someone who actually has the stake in this fight for the soul of Praes.

=> His works are too fragile just like any progress in the real world, changes can always be reversed. Maybe, it is arrogance, that he feels secure enough in the eventuality of the outcome that he stops fighting as hard, stops being vigilant, and lets Akua get that far. He is arrogant when he believes that Malicia will be dealt with the problems and ignore the signs that she is compromised until it is too late. Just like how white supremacy continues to linger and strike back the moment we let our guard down. Changes are fragile and need to be fought for constantly. You think after WWII, people will cut that shit out.

Haizz... Praes is the most difficult case to crack. It is too destructive, too set in stone, and too stubborn for 1 person to make a difference. I really want Black to succeed because I like the idea that as long as someone keeps fighting, eventually, it gonna gets better. He is the only one actually trying and continues to try even when most of his comrades have given up.

Alegio

Yay Akua is back! I may utterly hate her as a person but as a character she is simply and amazingly fabulous. And looking at her working so... happily with Cat is actually pretty fun.

Exec

I see a lot of people joking about shipping Ghost Ubua with Catherine, but I'm just hoping for Cat to pull a "King of Winter" and marry Cordelia!

"A realm cannot be at war with itself."

Jago

Procer just had a 20 years civil war. A realm can be at war with itself very much.

Aotrs Commander

I am, somehow, not surprised Akua is Stockholming Cat, or at least pretending to, just do be a dick.

Cordelia: further proof that no-one is actually the good guys...

caoimhinh

A piece of trivia here:

Dread Empress Maledicta II was the same that in book 1 chapter 3's epigraph was shown to have the tongues of her entire Imperial Court ripped out "to ensure intelligent conversation". So the Chancellor that has "become quite the conversationalist" is actually mute.

Dread Emperors really were Praesi humor at its finest.

Shaequil

I wonder is it weird to have the question of whether or not she can 'get together' with the cloak ghost. I kinda ship that already with all the lovelies and dearest and if they can be together in some semblance of synergy or symbiosis I'd be happy.

Jakku

Missed opportunity for Cat. She could have asked the First Prince who the greater monster is. The one who is always RESPONDING to the actions by people who seek a fight for one reason or another to push 10's if not 100's of thousands of people to their deaths or harms way, in order to achieve a misguided goal? Or the people are actually COMMITTING those actions that the first person has to respond to.

From the onset, Cat has been responding to aggressive actions made by others. A hero trying to drum up rebellion, which would have killed 10's of thousands and not improved quality of life even if they were successful. Corrupt bureaucrats and high born using their authority and power to hovel the commoners in order to increase their own power and wealth. Rivals using their power to thwart her progress and overtures to stabilize the territory she is overseeing and usurp power for their own. And beings outside of Creation being opportunists.

So far, I have yet to see Cat ACTUALLY instigating any of the issues that she is blamed for, for having to deal with it. I can almost taste the frustration and anger she has over how people perceive her, which really shines when she met the young hero party with the Stalwart Paladin.

---

Chapter 4: Warpath

"I'm not saying all your closest friends are shapeshifting devils I sent to spy on you after having the originals murdered, but I'm certainly implying it very heavily."

– Dread Emperor Traitorous, making small talk

"I think I might hate your people," Juniper growled.

The Hellhound was sprawled in her seat instead of sitting ramrod straight, a visible mark of how exhausted her duties had left her. A cup of orcish brew in hand – which I'd been oath-bound to decline when offered – she looked like a particularly grumpy green cat. Normally I'd be alarmed by the highest military officer in the kingdom professing hatred of its inhabitants, but I'd learned to read Juniper in our years together. That was a 'I can't believe I have to deal with this shit' growl, not a 'I won't need supper after I'm done with you' growl.

"Not even a month ago you were praising the quality of the foot you've been drilling," I pointed out.

"The soldiers are fine," the Marshal of Callow said. "Better than fine, even. They're taking to the formations better than I'd hoped, and they've got fire in the belly. But your fucking nobles, Catherine. Now was a bad time to pick to stop answering backtalk with gallows."

"Talbot can't be crawling up your ass," I frowned. "We sent him on manoeuvre out of the city specifically so he wouldn't be able to have his little meetings."

"His Regals are still knocking at my door," the orc said.

"Foundling, if a single more hints at favours in exchange for an officer's commission there's going to be blood on the ground."

Grandmaster Brandon Talbot was more than just the head of the Order of Broken Bells, these days: he was also one of the founders of the tight-knight group of former aristocrats that had formed into one of my court's two major power blocs. They'd called themselves the Patriots, at first, but I'd made an idle comment to Talbot about how that reminded me of the Truebloods and that name had died an early death. Considering the most infamous member of the Truebloods now had her soul sown into my collar, I could see why he'd taken that as a pointed hint. The Queen's Men were the counterweight, centred around Anne Kendall, but they had much fewer connections. A consequence of the fact that were made up mostly of guildsmen and aldermen.

The Regals weren't nearly as much of a nuisance as the people the northern baronies had sent to Laure, but they were also much smarter about how they were going about gaining influence. Instead of naked power grabs through trade they were placing men in the bureaucracy that had grown out of the court centred in Laure. The problem was that, often, their candidate was the most competent to be had. None of the Regals still had noble titles or privileges, Black had seen to that after the Liesse Rebellion, but several were still wealthy landowners. And their kinsmen were educated, which I was coming to prize most of all. Keeping their influence in check while making sure the cogs of the bureaucracy didn't get clogged with incompetence was like walking a tightrope. And it wasn't like I could hand every appointment to Anne's men instead, they were barely more trustworthy and they tended to heavily favour the interests of Laure and the guilds.

"They're still under the impression they can just buy commands?" I asked, surprised.

Juniper bared her teeth savagely.

"Of course not," she mocked. "They're simply recommending candidates for fast-tracked officer training. Every one of them above the cut. Every one of them someone's cousin or aunt."

My frown deepened. That was still overstepping.

"You know you have my full backing in this," I told her. "If there's anyone being too insistent..."

"They don't repeat, Catherine," Juniper sighed. "They always send another envoy, another candidate. And they're just important enough I can't foist them off on Aisha."

I grit my teeth. We were at war, now, the same war Juniper had been trying to prepare the kingdom for since she first got her baton. That she'd had to spend hours fending off ambitious Regals while trying to scrape together enough force to resist Procer was getting on my nerves more than a little bit. A measured expression of displeasure to these fine men and women was in order.

"I'll take care of it," I said. "But you know that's not what I'm here for."

She nodded soberly.

"We'll be ready to march half a day before predicted," the Hellhound said. "All we're waiting on is the Broken Bells. Hakram's provision office delivered the goods smooth as silk."

"Twenty thousand in whole then," I said, leaning back into my seat. "We're still outnumbered raw, Juniper."

Her lips split into a fanged grimace.

"If you'd not spent coin on shit like the Observatory--"

"We'd have heroes in the heartlands," I interrupted flatly.

"Consider it an investment to ensure we didn't have to fight this war on more than one front."

She conceded the argument with an ill-humoured grunt.

"I can't answer for the heroes with the host, we don't have a clear enough assessment of what they can do," Juniper began.

"Thief should be back soon with what the Jacks managed to put together," I said. "But the army?"

"We can take them," the Hellhound said. "Don't get me wrong, it'll be bloody. But our army's in a much better shape than theirs. As long as we can bring them to battle on an open field, I believe we can beat them. Which is why I wish you'd reconsider Harrow. I can't promise anything for two to one and walls."

"Orders already went out," I reminded her. "Baroness Morley is emptying her stores and evacuating towards Hedges."

"The Proceran supply chain will be a nightmare when they've crossed," Juniper noted. "And without granaries and cattle to plunder they can't live off the land. So, all things aside, I agree with you there's a decent chance they'll be forced to continue pushing south or start eating faster than they can bring food. But if they don't everything goes out the window. I don't like that our plan is centred around the enemy doing what we want them to."

"There's too much of a risk involved in fighting them near Harrow, Juniper," I sighed. "Even if we could manage to get there in time, I won't engage when there's a Hell Egg unaccounted for in the region."

The north was one of the few parts of Callow that hadn't been devastated by the latest round of wars to hit the country. Not even a better strategic position was enough to have me take the risk of changing that.

"There's too much politics in this war, Foundling," my Marshal said. "Careful you miss the defeat in front of you for staring at the treaties on the horizon."

"We can't slaughter fifty thousand Procerans," I flatly said. "Aside from the brutal bounding our manpower would take in achieving that, it'd be impossible to make peace with Hasenbach afterwards."

"Hasenbach's invading us," the Hellhound retorted. "The high horse stops being that when you ride it to war. If she doesn't want dead soldiers, she has no business sending them to the field."

I knew that in speaking that she spoke as an orc. She had the bone-deep conviction that no one with a sword in hand had the right of complaining about death. And there was a lot about that way of looking at the world that appealed to me even now. But that was a seductive simplicity that'd become the kind of luxury I could no longer afford. If I offered half a hundred thousand Procerans, the Principate would be fighting this to the bitter end. The First Prince might very well get deposed if she suggested otherwise. I had to defeat the crusaders, force them out of Callow, but it couldn't be a massacre. Assuming I could even deliver one of those, which was quite an assumption given the number of Named on the other side.

"I still think we should have gone ahead with Bonfire," the orc spoke into the silence. "I understand why you refused, but--"

"Juniper," I said quietly. "I love you like a sister. You're one of the smartest women I've ever met. But trust me when I say that Bonfire would have been the end of us."

It'd begun as an exercise for her general staff. How to win against the crusade without Callow ever seeing combat? The answer had been crude, vicious, and horrifyingly popular among my high-ranking officers. Even Callowans. Only greenskins had been more vocal in their approval than my people. It was simple enough: instead of waiting for Procer to muster, I was to take twenty thousand men and a full siege train through Arcadia and emerge on the upper northern edge of Procer's coast. Then I'd burn my way south, city by city, until the Principate mustered an army to force me out. At which point I'd pass through Arcadia again, and emerge on the other side of the Principate. Rinse, repeat. Again and again until Procer collapsed from the inside. The death toll would have been... It didn't bear thinking about. It'd been the support the plan had found that surprised me. Hells, Talbot had spoken in favour. He'd 'mourned the loss of innocent lives, but if losses must be had better Proceran than Callowan.' I'd stomped the notion out of high command and not been gentle about it. Aside from the sickening mass slaughters Bonfire entailed, it would have made Callow the foremost enemy of every Calernian nation. It had not escaped my notice that my ability to take hosts through Arcadia might be seen as as dangerous a weapon as the Diabolist's gate-device, in its own way. I had to use it sparingly and responsibly or we'd all pay for it. The thought came, uneasily, that we might regardless of what I did.

"Your call to make, Warlord," the orc acknowledged.

Silence lingered for a while afterwards, the two of us alone in her tent.

"Finally back at it," the Hellhound finally mused, and there was something like savage glee shining in her eyes.

"We march West, once more," I spoke in Mthethwa.

I was quoting an old verse Nauk loved. He'd spoken it years ago, before we left for the Liesse Rebellion.

"Waging the same old war," Juniper finished, and she met my gaze.

Neither of us finished the verse, though we both knew the words.

Onwards to the fields of Callow,

Swift death and graves shallow.

—

It was past midnight when I finally allowed myself a break. There was only so much time I could spend learning Reitz without wanting to jump off the balcony I was currently leaning against. It was important I learn, though. I'd have interpreters with me on the field, but going to war with the Principate without even understanding their languages was a weakness tailored to cause blunders. Still, I'd never missed my old aspect of Learn more. Hells, it wasn't like I'd been lazy when it came to learning languages. Aside from the Lower Miezian of my childhood I spoke four others well, though my Old Tongue was still admittedly sloppier than the rest. It was enough for tonight, I decided. Back to the histories after that. I'd gotten my hands on an Ashuran chronicle of the Humbling of Titans, the abortive and bloody war between Procer and the Titanomachy that had sown the seeds of hate between the nations that still held to this day. Writings from the Thalassocracy were slightly less inclined to paint Procer in a bad light than those of Praes or the Free Cities, though from what little I'd read there wasn't much defensible about why and how the Principate had waged that war. I looked up at the stars and allowed the wind to stream across my face. It was a cool breeze, not that I'd notice unless I forced myself to.

"Finally," Thief crowed from behind me.

I almost lashed out by reflex, Winter coiling in my veins, but I let out a steamy breath instead.

"That game's gotten a lot more dangerous than it used to be," I told her, voice sounding with just the hint of an echo.

Vivienne leaned against the railing next to me, blowing away an errant strand with a mischievous smile.

"Just like you to say that when I start winning," she said.

"Welcome back, Thief," I sighed, and put an arm around her shoulder in the distant cousin of a hug.

She only squirmed a little. Vivienne had never been a touchy sort but compared to, say, Masego she was neediness incarnate. I released her after a heartbeat, and pretended not to notice the slightly pleased smile on her face.

"So I hear we have a Proceran problem on the march," she said.

"They won't start moving until tomorrow, according to Masego," I replied. "But you might say that, yes. I don't suppose you have anything to tell me that'd make this loom a little shorter?"

"You want a report?" she asked, eyebrow rising.

"Nothing too detailed," I said. "We'll have a proper briefing with everyone at a sane hour. But give me the broad strokes."

She hummed.

"Well, before we touch Procer, I have something from down south," she said.

My gaze sharpened.

"The League?"

She nodded and I grimaced. I'd wanted a garrison in Dormer to keep that front under control, but Juniper had dug in her heels. The city was indefensible, she'd argued, without a fleet. And Callow had neither the gold, the sailors or the know-how to make one. She had a point about Dormer, especially after the fight with Summer had wrecked major parts of its defences that we'd only partly repaired. Coin, coin, coin. More relentless a foe than even Akua. The men had been sent to Vale instead, with only a handful of mages in Dormer to sound the alarm if it came to war. Which it was hard to say if it might. My attempt at diplomatic correspondence with the newly-elected Hierarch had yielded only a neatly-penned letter chastising me for being a foreign despot, which while very politely phrased was less than promising. On the other hand, merchant shipping up the Hwaerte had actually increased over the last few months if Ratface was to be believed. Not the sign of hostilities about to erupt.

"I have reason to believe that the League has no interest in Callow," Thief said.

"And how good is that reason?" I asked.

"The Tyrant of Helike had one of the Jacks taken off the streets and brought to him so he could swear eternal friendship with you," Vivienne bluntly said.

I closed my eyes and rubbed the bridge of my nose, warding off the headache I knew wouldn't come.

"The man," I said slowly, "is notoriously mad. And treacherous. And, not to repeat myself but it bears mentioning, fucking insane."

"Agreed," Thief mildly replied. "He is also, as of last month, very discretely sending people into Waning Woods."

My eyes flew open and I kept my mouth shut as I considered the implications of that. The Waning Woods could lead straight into southern Callow, true. But he didn't need to go through there to make war on us. He had the fleets to just sail up the Hwaerte uncontested without any of the risks strolling through that hellscape of a forest entailed. Which meant he was considering that route to sidestep something else, and there was only one force I knew about that qualified. The Proceran army in the southern principality of Tenerife, sent there specifically to discourage League aggression.

"You're sure?" I quietly pressed.

"There's a decent chance that he allowed my people to see him sending his own in there," Thief admitted. "It could be a plot to get us to lower our guards, but at this point does he really need us to lower our guard?"

No, I thought. Not with fifty thousand crusaders marching into Callow and an even larger host knocking at the front door in the Vales. There wasn't a lot I could immediately do to drive him back if he just decided to invade without all the fanfare.

"That would change things," I murmured. "If he pulls the trigger on that..."

"Looming shorter yet?" Vivienne teased.

"I'd kiss you, if you weren't so painfully indifferent to women," I replied with a smirk.

She coughed awkwardly. I had no intentions there whatsoever, but seeing her get jittery at the lightest of suggestions was always good for a laugh.

"Yes, well, Procer," she muttered. "We've already had some talks about what's waiting in Arans. As far as the Jacks can tell, there's two real ringleaders in that crowd. The Procer part, anyway."

"Prince Amadis Milenan of Iserre," I said. "Princess Rozala Malanza of Aequitan. Milenan's supposed to be the one holding most everyone else's leash."

"Don't discount Malanza," she warned me. "Politically she'd dependent on Milenan – her younger brother's trying to sweet-talk Hasenbach into backing him – but she's the one that'll be leading the armies. Her mother fucked up so catastrophically during the civil war that she's low on allies at the moment, but she's the best commander in that army and they all know it. She'll get a lot more influential in that circle when the swords come out."

"And what do we know about her?" I frowned.

"Not much," Thief reluctantly admitted. "She's stayed off of the stage since taking her coronation. But I have somewhat reliable word that she's one of the hardline expansionists in the Highest Assembly even if she's quiet about it."

"If she's out of favour with Hasenbach, that reinforces the case the First Prince isn't actually out to annex us," I said.

"Hasenbach broke her mother's bid for the throne and made her drink poison afterwards," Thief hedged. "It might just be personal. Regardless, if the First Prince is out for land we both know she can't admit that right now. It'd eat away at the crusade from the inside. Levant's not mustering armies for the Principate to grow larger, and if they get even a hint that's the plan..."

"I think she might genuinely be after only the Empire, Vivienne," I admitted. "And if that's really the case, she has a fucking point. Malicia fanned the civil war in her country for two decades. And there's that other thing too."

Stating out loud that the Empress had essentially given Diabolist free reign to do whatever she wanted so long as by the time the dust settled she had a weapon to frighten off the rest of Calernia would have been... dangerous. I'd already told the rest of the Woe this much, but not anyone else. Whether Hasenbach knew this was the case or she was just using Second Llesse to justify the Tenth Crusade, I could not know for sure. It wasn't like I could ask the woman when we spoke, either, not while I was uncertain of what she knew and did not.

"I'll applaud and toast her health, if she brings down the Tower," Thief said. "But that is not a woman I want deciding what happens to my shit, Catherine. Even if we assume the best about her, she's still got the Highest Assembly to answer to. And we've had long talks about the kind of people that have seats on that."

"I'm not talking surrender," I told Thief. "But you know how much there's riding on Hasenbach being at least halfway reasonable."

"That begs the question of how reasonable she'll be allowed to be," Vivienne replied flatly. "And that brings us back neatly to Amadis Milenan. I've confirmed he was in the know for the Liesse Rebellion."

"We already knew Hasenbach would need a mandate to send that much silver across the border," I said. "He's the most influential man in Procer, it's not really feasible for her to have kept him out of it."

"What we didn't know, at least until now, is that he argued strongly for a Proceran to be in command of the rebel forces," Thief said. "The man likes his wine, and he's not as careful about who might be listening as he should be. That said, there's a two thousand denarii hole in the funds you allocated me."

I stared at her incredulously.

"Two thousand?"

"Yeah, well, even servants in that fucker's palace are rich," Vivienne muttered. "You wouldn't believe how hard they were to bribe."

Aside from a mournful thought about where I'd have to take that coin from to compensate, I came to grasp what she was getting at pretty quick.

"You think he wanted to be personally in command," I said.

"Look, I know the Eyes think his ambition makes him usable to shake up Procer from the inside," the dark-haired woman said. "But that's Wasteland talk, Catherine. He's a fucking snake and now we have precedent."

Precedent for Prince Amadis Milenan to consider war in Callow as way to enable his bid for the throne of the Principate. Shit. That was a problem. I'd been banking on the commanders of the crusader host in the north being rational enough that after a series of minor field defeats they'd cut their losses and retreat back into Procer, if I gave them the space. But Milenan was in command, and if he saw this as his only good chance to dislodge Hasenbach? He might decide to gamble it all anyway, and that would force me to actually break his army. Which would fuck up all my long-term plans, to say the least.

"We'll untangle that particular mess in full at the briefing," I sighed. "What've you got on the heroes? None of this matters if they just splatter us across the countryside at the first scrap."

"Wasn't able to get all the Names," Thief said. "But I do have a number for you: there's fourteen of them."

I let out a long breath. That was... a lot more than I'd hoped for. Given the reputation the Calamities still commanded, I'd thought most Named would be headed there for the offensive. Still fewer than they sent against Triumphant, I mused. So there's that. Black had always told me that too many heroes in the same place might end up turning against them. That Creation would push some stories above others, and that those who ended up behind were much easier to kill. It made villains seem a lot stronger than they were when they killed a few, and incited sloppiness and overconfidence if they survived. The thing was, though, that those villains usually still died. That tended to happen when someone sent a battalion of Heavens-empowered hardened killers after someone's head. I'd refined the Woe, over the last year. Turned them into a group eerily skilled at killing the heroes that came into Callow and refused my terms. But in those fights, we'd had either superior numbers or parity. On picked grounds, with enough time for me to prepare. None of that would apply up north.

"Most of them are green, and from all over Calernia," Thief spoke into the silence. "Levant, the Free Cities, Ashur. Local Named, I guess you could call them. Not the kind you see at the head of an invasion."

"Any from Procer?" I asked.

She nodded.

"Which brings me to the two I think we most need to watch out for," Vivienne said. "The first is the Proceran, an Alamans. Laurence de Montfort, the Saint of Swords."

"I think I've heard of her before," I frowned.

"She got started killing some alchemist villain in western Procer under a transitional Name," Thief said. "Nasty business. He was turning people into monsters. Then she killed the Prince of Valencis when she was in her twenties and no one's quite sure why. She disappeared into the woodworks after that. There's rumours she went up north, but mostly people say she was 'perfecting her craft' in a retreat from the earthly world."

"She hasn't done anything since?" I frowned.

"Dubious source, but I was told she stared down an army into marching around her hometown during the civil war," Vivienne said. "Whatever the truth, she's in her late sixties and she's Hells on legs. Supposedly unbeatable with a sword, and she's been known to cut through spells, wards and even once an actual miracle."

"Well, that promises to be a fun evening," I muttered.

That sounded a lot like Ranger, only with a Choir having her back, and wasn't that stuff nightmares were made of?

"The other big club is Levantine," Thief said. "The Grey Pilgrim, couldn't dig up a name. This one... Well, the more I learn the more he scares me shitless."

Thief wasn't the bravest of my companions, but she wasn't exactly faint of heart either. That she'd go this far was worth alarm.

"Priest Name?" I asked.

"Some kind of wandering monk, as far as I can tell," Vivienne said. "He's not, well, not like you. He's not the one everyone attaches to. He's the stranger in the night, and he's been around for a while."

"Heroes age," I reminded her.

"And I've word of him going back at least sixty years under his current Name," Thief bluntly replied. "Catherine, the man's been everywhere. Every Levantine hero in the last forty years ran into him at some point, and in the Dominion if he said he felt like being king half the country would rise to put him on the throne. As long as he backs the crusade, there's not a single hero from the Dominion that'll flinch."

"Influential and experienced, then," I said, but honestly as far as direct threats went the Saint sounded a lot worse.

It also meant he couldn't be killed if Levant was ever to be brought at the negotiating table. You couldn't kill a people's darling and then expect a nice peace treaty after, but I wasn't sure I'd be given a choice there. Thief passed a hand through her hair, frustrated.

"I'm not explaining myself right," she said. "Just – all right, think about it like this. Hero out on their first lark, meets a mysterious helpful stranger that gives advice and maybe teaches a trick. When's the next time you see them?"

My fingers clenched.

"When that hero's in over their head," I said softly. "When the stranger appears out of nowhere and wipes the floor with the villain, enough that the hero can flee and prepare for the rematch."

"Yeah," Vivienne agreed grimly. "That's the thing, Cat. He doesn't always win, but I couldn't find a single instance of when the Grey Pilgrim got into a fight and lost."

Well. It was a good thing I didn't need to sleep anymore, because that was the kind of thing that would keep a girl up at night.

---

narcoduck

"My attempt at diplomatic correspondence with the newly-elected Hierarchy had yielded only a neatly-penned letter chastising me for being a foreign despot, which while very politely phrased was less than promising."

Hierarchy is great.

naturalnuke

He's fantastic.

PingleBerry

I think it's the literal not giving of fucks he has going.

Letouriste

Well, he pretty much gave the finger to ALL the gods^^

NZPIEFACE

Most importantly, the Wandering Bard too. Black managed to be tricked by her, but Hierarchy?

"BEGONE, THOT." (paraphrasing)

Cloudlight

Pretty sure he is high on the scale of lawfulness. So my kind of guy. I really like him.

Shent

He's Lawful Neutral, and the pinnacle of them to boot. He's Lawful Neutrality distilled and refined into a perfectly imperfect shape. He's a riot and kinda boring, and I love him all the more for it

Gunslinger

Ohh joy, looks like the mooks have some pretty strong bosses. Story savvy ones too.

Numbers wise, Callow's outnumbered in both soldiers and Named (not counting the theorized but as yet unseen/unmentioned wight heroes) and given that neither side will retreat it looks to be a long and bloody campaign. I wonder if hit and run tactics are in order.

Ohh and vote for the guide on topwebfiction if you can <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> , Cat can't cross in-story wards anymore but she can top the Wildbow one

Before we go

> She only squirmed a little. Vivienne had never been a touchy sort but compared to, say, Masego she was neediness incarnate. I released her after a heartbeat, and pretended not to notice the slightly pleased smile on her face.

There's so much shipping fuel here it's unbearable 😊

BroadAxe

Weight heroes is really unlikely tho, that one chapter with the dead king where he had dead heroes that only had fractions of their power left because they'd lost theyre name in death sorta says that can't be the case, doesn't it? :3

ayon96

The chapter was in the perspective of Ranger and she thought it was the hardest fight in a century at least!

Nguyen Hong Hai

Indrani would be so jealous.

Naeddyr

Have we seen any actual heroic Mentors before this? The Wizard of the West etc. probably qualified, but they're all gone, and the Bard... Probably doesn't count.

Thanks for the chapter!

Gunslinger

Technically you'd have to count Ranger as one.

Naeddyr

D'oh!

nerferf

Oh yeah, ranger saved them from the summer queen and allowed the gang to retreat and prepare the rematch

Totally forgot that

Letouriste

Actually I think he meant the way she gather pupils is mentor-like but you are right her « rescue » is a little heroic-like...if she didn't had being threatening to cat too at the same time^^

TeK

Mother knows best.

JackbeThimble

De Montfort? Might be a bad idea letting that one sack one of your cities.

JackbeThimble

I hope one of her aspects is 'Kill them all and let God sort them out.'

NZPIEFACE

I don't get the reference?

grzecho2222

Arnaud Amalric during Albigensian Crusade

TeK

Well I don't get de Monrfort reference. Quick googling answered nothing.

BryceWilliam

hellsing abridged quote. maxwell says it while slaughtering thousands of civilians snowy

I believe it's actually a quote from some Pope/Bishop during the Spanish Inquisitions

nerferf

Welp, so the deus ex machina is coming straight up instead of at least hiding? dang they really want the woe dead

Nguyen Hong Hai

When the GM hates your guts...

JackbeThimble

I feel like Cat's best option here narrative-wise is to turn this into Kingdom of Heaven with Amedis as Reynauld de Chatillon and herself as Saladin. Since she's already been seen on camera offering the heroes mercy and trying to find peace with Hasenbach it shouldn't be too hard to sell herself as the Noble Demon to contrast with Amedis as the rapacious fanatic. Allowing Amedis to take Harrow is probably a good move as well as it gives him a chance to commit some atrocities to make the audience hate him even more. That way when the Northern army and it's heroes get slaughtered it will be the consequences of their own moral failings.

JackbeThimble

To really sell it she needs to make a battle plan that somehow exploits the enemy commanders hubris and selfish goals to draw him into a trap or something, so the audience has no doubt whom to blame.

Rook

Maybe work on her public image in Callow too. Nothing like being the common man's champion to really take the wind out of the holier-than-thou sails that invasions like crusades sail in on.

Frommerman

Her public image is already pretty good, what with personally fighting a Demon, the entirety of Arcadia, and Diabolist one after the other and crushing them all beneath her heel. They might not love her, but they can feel secure under her.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Even better, she somehow tricks their army into a Fae Portal and they wander around, slowly dying of thirst and hunger until they're cut down by Cat.

Letouriste

Not happening, there is a lot of heroes present. You can be sure one of them will find an exit or create one by miracle what I meant was to trick the normal soldiers to get in and leave the heroes without chaff.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

B

Even with normal soldiers I wouldn't chance it. That's just asking for a "At dawn, look to the East." with some hero separating for a bit and returning triumphantly at the heroes' most bleak hour, if not for Amadis's forces then another hero army like the force Black is facing.

haihappen

If Amadis (Cmdr.) commits some ill-advised towards the general populace, then the heroes with him might object to his continued command. That he even does such a thing, or gets found out if he does, is highly unlikely. One doesn't get to be and stay a major political player in Procer by being an idiot.

Finding a hell-egg, realizing what it is, and taking it with him because he cannot resist the temptation of a super-weapon, however, that is something an intelligent man blinded by ambition would do. Screwing everyone over in the process.

There are a lot of tropes to play down the line ones the players and the scenario unfold...

IDKWhoitis

The Grey Pilgrim sounds like one of Bard's chess pieces in this war.

Big Brother

Wasn't the Grey Pilgrim one of the names Gandalf went by in Lord of the Rings?

Letouriste

His first name yes:) he became the white after sarouman fall in corruption and his death/non-death in his fight with the balrog

Rook

So if he ever duels Cat on an underground bridge over a chasm, we can probably expect them to both fall off. Got it.

Big Brother

Mayhaps Cat & the Woe can help the Grey Pilgrim defeat the demon contained in the Hell Egg that keeps getting brought up, helping him ascend to a 'White' form, while becoming the first Hero to join Cat's Callow.

Letouriste

unlikely given the main factor in Gandalf transformation was sarouman not deserving the power of white or something. His near death experience or resurrection is only a fulcrum/pivot in his story.

Here the gray pilgrim would need a white mage falling in disgrace...and not the white one of the white knight party given she is only a newby

Nairne .01

Wasn't the mage from the WK party incinerated by WLock?

Letouriste

Oh right! I Forgot

TeK

YOU SHALL NOT PASS!

naturalnuke

Ooo, spooky mentor heroes, this will be fun.

Naeddyr

Silly prediction: Grey Pilgrim has such strong mentoring instincts he ends up mentoring Cat a bit.

I mean, young (idealistic? yes, i'd say) Queen of a suffering nation facing insurmountable odds and hordes of enemies, who tries to make peace but ultimately fails as the fanatics on the other side break the truce or whatever...

nerferf

Cat already got a mentor before, it was by ranger fending off the summer queen

Letouriste

Ranger doesn't count. She didn't care about cat back then. At most she didn't kill her for black sake...or she just had a better prey to kill before her

beleester

Mentors aren't always nice. They just teach you something. Somehow.

And Ranger didn't just save them, she also named them the Woe. Or well, the Summer Queen named them, but Ranger was the one who heard it and said "You see that, kids? That is your Villain Team Name."

Letouriste

Ranger didn't teach anything to cat though.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

That actually sounds the most interesting. If Grey hears what Cat intends, he might turn cloak and join, he's no longer a young idealistic kid, he's an old dude with super hands.

Monk Man
Super Tan

Morgenstern

"Grey" also is in his very Name ^^ – and the tidbit that he's too old to be a Hero actually seems to imply he might not be a Good Hero after all...

He might be ANOTHER ONE of those mistakes Bard did by creating something between Good and Evil, ending up to be something that CAN bite Good and the Bard in the ass. At least I think something along those lines was implied in the last Hierarch chapter...

Morgenstern

I'm curious about the relationship between Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Blades, though, as we already got mention that those two seem to come up together more often than not. I hope we got some PoVs for them or rather their past.

---

He's likely a hero, what's with being a monk and all, but the heroes from Levant are on average closer to the "murderhobo" variety (see: Valiant Champion).

Nguyen Hong Hai

Levant hero I think is more similar to Ranger's style, being No. 1 meanest asskicker there is.

Gunslinger

It would be cool but when have last seen a hero without a stick up their arse. All of them would be gunning for blood right from the get go.

Letouriste

Well his Name sound more relaxed so who know...

Daemion

Heroes tend to have big personalities and are rather opinionated. I wouldn't be surprised if they were squabbling with each other constantly or even split into two sides over some trivial matter. That's something a clever villain could exploit.

NZPIEFACE

It would be hilarious if this turned into some classroom setting with the Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords being the teachers.

Insanenoodlyguy

That rarely works. How many stores have it start that way, but either a stinging defeat or a overarching threat makes them all work together, and then they are a beautiful clockwork of complimenting strengths? A few might need to die first so they see they need to work together, but they always get there before crunch time. The only time that exploit works is if you can get them all at once.

Nivek

Traitorous is always hilarious isn't he?

Of course the best part is that you don't know if he's implying this before or after he replaced the friends with shapeshifting devils. (The fact that sooner or later he would do so is not in question, naturally)

grzecho2222

I'm half expecting him or Irritant to rise from Hells instead of/with That One Empress

grzecho2222

Saying something like:
"HA, bet you didn't expect this!"

Snowfire1224

If he did, he would have probably set up away to do it before he committed suicide and framed a tone of people for it .
Sounds exactly like something Traitorous would do.

TeK

Funny thing would be telling this to a shapeshifting devil.

Rook

The grey pilgrim sounds like just about the scariest thing next to the bard so far. Fourteen total heroes and most of them green, and you've got a guy in that midst who apparently specializes in mentoring green heroes into a force of nature. Maybe even starting patterns of three to help them grow. The dude is a walking force multiplier.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

I forget *rolls eyes* what happens with mentors?

NZPIEFACE

What happens to mentors who are known to be old as hell? They stick around to be even older.

Gunslinger

Generally though, mentors always die off to let the hero grow. The Grey Pilgrim has survived by skipping stage 3. He's mentored lots of them but never actually become anyone's master

Insanenoodlyguy

He already beat that by doing it with more than one. Now he's not the Obi Wan, he's the Miyagi.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Or ghost people

Oo00oooo

Misterspokes

He's more "Tuxedo Mask" than an actual mentor...

White

You know, it strikes me that if Cat wanted Hierarch on her side, then all she'd need to do is hold a legitimate election. Hell, if she sends Procer packing, she might even *win* a legitimate election.

Rook

Hierarch would probably charge her with treason for holding an unlawful election, unsanctioned by The People of Bellerophon

Asking for a sanction would likely also get you charged with treason, for involving The People in the politics of a Foreign Nation, and simultaneously get whoever you contacted executed on several counts of affiliating with a Wretched Tyrant

Abdicating might help though, since then she'd just be a Wretch

Frommerman

All Hail Bellerophon, greatest of the Free Cities.

TeK

It is above Glorious Republic Of Bellerophon to meddle in other country's politics. Even if she condoned the elctions, it's still one person leading country -> Wretched Tyrant. And if she abdicates? She goes against The Will Of People, because, obviously, she didn't hold public referendum on whether or not she should abdicate. Same for reforming the goverment. Making Callow into democracy is just throwing it to be ripe for the taking for anothere Wretched Tyrant. Not mentioning all those pesky nobles, and landowners, and tavern owners. Truly, noone can reach the Bellerophon, Peerless Jewel Of Freedom.

Gunslinger

What rook said, but also Cat's not a fan of democracy in the least.

Mr. Nobody

The ship is new but it's already sailing at high speeds!!

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

We'll call it... The Titanic 2! But it's not just any regular old water boat.

It's a floating city!

Dainpdf

New? This one has been around ever since their first fireside chat.

Metalshop

Oh hell yes. We finally get to see what the heroic equivalent of the Calamaties is.

TeK

Aparently it's twelve green heroes and two forces of nature. Who knew?

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Seems like things are looking to be fairly drab, down, spooky, and all around grey.

If only Cat had gunpowder and gelatine dynamite with a laserbeam.

Daemion

That would earn her a Red Letter.

savadrin

the gnomes are my only beef with this entire story. it's such a cop-out deus ex machina it gives me indigestion. it would be different if the reader was given any explanation about it, but as it is the entire continent of calernia is eternally under the sword of damocles, and there's no rhyme or reason as to the rules that would trigger it's drop.

Unorginal

@Savadrin.

It's a copout how? the only other reasonable way would to have another deus ex-machina keep the setting from advancing because lets quickly see what was required for a European style renaissance.

Well Developed trade.

A preponderance of wealth.

(relative) stability

Mathematics

patronage of the arts and sciences fueled by the above.

First and foremost Procer is heavily implied to be the state most at war with an internal conflict every decade, and they cover most of the continent and this internal strife is rarely big according to a short history of Procer. This is frankly amazing, they don't even usually sack each other's capitals to boot! The continent may be hopelessly divided and warring by modern standards but compared to the middle ages and the feudal system it inspired/is marked by this is amazingly peaceful. They, in fact, sound like a combination of Renaissance Italy and Holy Roman Empire and the Renaissance kicked off in Italy despite all the brushfire wars during the time period. so stability check.

So do they have the wealth? taking from the fabled wonders of the wasteland and their Venice Expy on crack with added slavery as well as the amount of money and troops the first prince has been throwing around throughout the books yes there is enough freed up wealth to be used to patronize the arts and sciences. So yes checkmark here as well.

Do they have well-developed trade? Callow does healthy business and Ashur has fought multiple trade wars to maintain superiority over the sea-lanes and let's not forget mercantis the Venice expy. So yes, they have a healthy exchange of goods, expertise, and ideas.

Maths? Hells yes, Magic puts them far ahead of anything the middle-east managed while Europe was stuck in the dark ages. Forget dinky algebra and geometry they have trigonometry down and its implied to be old hat in the empire these days.

Patronage of the arts and sciences. See the Empire in regards to magic and the fact that we know there once was a power bloc of mages in Procer who only were disassembled because of politics. Guilds seem strong and healthy and while they have a chilling effect in some regards it does suggest that the conditions to kick off the Renaissance exist.

So why not technical innovations that allow them to move past the opening phases of the Renaissance?

The gnomes make a better answer than any other fantasy series I've read so far with similar conditions. and it's less Deus ex Machina that the D&D explanation which is literally the god of technology saying no.

[RANT OVER]

Welp there went 20 minutes of my life.

TameCurtsy

@Unoriginal Wow. I'm impressed.

@Savedrin My response is that it is hardly a deus ex machina when they haven't impacted the story yet. It's a reminder of the wider world, and the author has been so incredible in maintaining internal consistency that I'm willing to believe there's an explanation behind the gnomes that is impossible to know right now from our current perspective.

And to be clear, it is obvious that the gnomes want to keep the continent in an earlier age. The main hidden explanations are: How did the gnomes reach their current heights? How do they factor in to the good vs evil wager?

agumentic

Come on, it's obvious that gnomes are literal deus ex machina and GM race with a job of keeping the setting from advancing and the status quo intact. Gods want to stop their world from going full industry or magitech.

NZPIEFACE

I kinda wanna know what the heroes on the main continent are like.

Not\_a\_robot

There's also a nifty elven civilisation there preaching tolerance and all that good stuff, which we have been promised would never show up in story at all. I wanna know too, but it's not gonna happen.

grzecho2222

Bet they got invaded all the time

Not\_a\_robot

Dude, have you seen the elves? Those Emerald Blades the Bard met? Nobody in their right mind would even consider the idea, it's the most suicidal thing I can imagine in this world. Also please keep politics out of this.

---

There was that one mention in chapter 22 of book 2 of an elven kingdom getting corrupted by a demon, so that may be the reason that they'll never show up in the story and that the elves of Golden Bloom aren't just racist, but also isolationist.

Not\_a\_robot

There's a big difference between "elven kingdom" and "continent-spanning elven civilisation", I think. The Golden Bloom were kicked out of there exactly because they were a racist and isolationist splinter group.

grzecho2222

How many times Perfect Magic Kingdom get invaded in fantasy? Even in Tolkien by the time of Lord of the Rings is there any elven kingdom that is doing good?

Not\_a\_robot

And this entire story is about subverting classic fantasy tropes. Dwarves a dwindling remnant? No, they're at the height of their power and everyone fears them. Gnomes some bungling inventors? They keep every civilisation locked in medieval stasis because of their massive technological supremacy. Elves on the decline? Nope, they're extremely succesful and nearly untouchable. A classic fantasy story wouldn't be named (heh) a Practical Guide to Evil.

Snoogle

You are right.

Almost every fantasy story ever is about human heroes bumbling around in a mostly human world, where all of the other creatures are basically dying out to the rise of the humans. It's fun to read a story about humans bumbling around in their own little continent while the test if the world is so much bigger than them. You know, for a change.

Antony444

Well on one side we have the Woe, twenty thousand men, orcs, ogres and goblins.
On the other side, fourteen heroes and fifty thousand men.
A demon is somewhere around and will undoubtedly emerge at the worst possible moment.
This is going to be good.

I love the Traitorous quote, as always, predictable and yet so fascinating...
The first flaw in Cordelia Hasenbach's plan is about to begin with the Tyrant of Helike, attacking Tenerife and Procer by surprise.
This continent is going to burn in the flames of war...can't wait to see it!

grzecho2222

He may also attack Refuge and Ranger as first part of plan to add another front

Gunslinger

Surely he's not that mad. She'd chop him into pieces

Dainpdf

He hears that and just says "hold my beer..."
Then you die because the mug is covered in contact poison.

Walter

He is exactly that mad. Dude's whole deal is to always be in the narratively invincible first stage of his plans. He needs constant enemies.

He can't beat 'Ranger', but he has a pattern going with Black after killing Sabah. A fight between the guy who killed your subordinate and your love interest...that happens offscreen? He wins that 10/10.

burdi

The Tyrant of Helike is so unpredictable, no one really know whats his end game or maybe to mess up anyone plan is his only goal

Author Unknown

It must have been fraking terrifying to be a Trueblood during Traitorous' reign. Betrayal is your nature, the foundation of your civilization, but Traitorous is so much better at it.

TeK

Unless you thwart his plans, and betray yourself first. Once again, sweet victory is yours!

TeK

Just kicked in my head, we got Levant crusading. Funny. Crush those pesky infidels.

Gotta say, love Tyrant. I really want him to actually hold to his words and NOT betray Cat. I mean, it's the ultimate betrayal, when someone expects you to betray you, make up all those safety nets and contingencies, and you just don't. Who would've seen this coming?

Dainpdf

And then, after they lower their guard, double cross them and reveal you had actually been stabbing their back all along, from a completely unexpected angle.

TeK

And after that reveal, that you were working for their benefit all along. And THEN, when they're all guilty and confused, you slide in the knife.

OtherPlayers

Sooner or later, all the games turn into Calvinball.

sengachi

Then, as they die, reveal you're going to replace them with a shapeshifting demon that does your bidding and you're going to pretend that they won the backstabbing exchange, but really their side 'winning' will actually be you winning because you'll be puppetting their side.

Cold Cyberia

We march West once more
Waging that same old war

To foreign rivers' banks
Take heart and hold your ranks

Raise arms and lift your voice
In glory we rejoice
With banners bright and tall
Could pride herald a fall?

Step to the drummer's beat
For life is short yet sweet
Lay down on broken shields
Across those foreign fields

We march West once more
Waging that same old war
Onward to the fields of Callow
Swift death and graves shallow.

Someone wrote an extension to the lyrics the last time they appeared and I liked it so much I wrote them down; I thought I would share. Anyway, great chapter, very ominous.

SMHF

There is one story Cat can use against the Grey Pilgrim though... a jealous student killing his teacher.
Now if only Cat knew a manipulative bitch who could talk one of those noob Heroes into it...

Don't forget to vote for Guide guys!
<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Snowfire1224

The thing about old heroes is that they think they know the story, just like Summer Fae.

Dainpdf

Come on, erraticetera. You feed the shippers like this, you know they're going to follow you home. And you don't know where they've been, they're probably covered in Mary Sue from rolling around in the Pit of Voles. Plus, if they smell like author, their mothers won't take them back.

Bonesawer

I wonder what a fast-travel vs prophecy war would look like. Can Cat switch destinations once she's already in Arcadia? "Whoops, looks like there's a Proceran host defending this city, let's just close that gate and go a province over". Can Augur predict far enough ahead to prepare a host in case of fast-travel? Can she predict fallback destinations? It **feels** like a win for fast-travel, but I don't know.

MUCH more importantly, can Arcadia travel facilitate intercontinental trade with reasonable time savings? This would be an absolute game-changer for both Cat herself and Calernia as a whole. If the gnomes didn't object, and the dwarves didn't object, and the dead king didn't object, and the elves didn't object, and the drown didn't object, etc. etc.

Also, every time Tyrant shows up I become more convinced that EE literally rolls dice to determine his actions (presumably with some set events, end goals, or general direction that ensure that Tyrant isn't a joke character or wrench in the story).

TeK

Well, I can safely assure you, that drown can't object. Unless it's the Dead King, who is behind them.

And I highly doubt that Cat's gate will bring any difference to the trade. For one, they need to be stable and multiple, safe (and they can't be, unless SHE leading them), of course, she can trade with Courts, but something tells me that trading with entities who can made up any amount of money on the whim is not a valid economical move. She could make her Wild Hunt open gates, but aside from the fact that it's, well, will require their constant attention, and even then their power is not endless, and even then they are technically not nobles, and only nobles can open up portals.

Of course, maybe, as reigning Queen of Winter she can make up nobles on the whim, and say, grant titles to any merchant, so that they can create their portals, but frankly, it's so OP, GM will probably ban this.

oldschoolvillain

I wouldn't be surprised if that's how good ol' Kairos decides on his next move in-universe.

rygelthe16th

""Heroes age," I reminded her."

Okay so Bad Guys just sorta do the 'I hover indefinitely at my peak until killed' thing, while heroes age. But what about Neutrals such as Archer and Theif where they name isn't Good-Evil aligned? Is there WOG on this?

oldschoolvillain

"Villains are given the means to evade death. Heroes to reach past it."

This or a similar quote was mentioned in one of the earlier books. Yes, Villains have Eternal Youth but not Immortality, whereas Heroes will age and die normally, but if they're Killed, then they can be resurrected. This is why Villains can (theoretically) hold the crown for 1,000 years, but rarely manage longer than a normal lifetime, because Heroes kill them off.

Mr. Nobody

I think Archer and Ranger don't age because they are half-elf.

Author Unknown

Is Archer an half-elf? I thought from her backstory, where she was a slave, she was some form of human?

PingleBerry

Ranger is a half-elf

benthelynx

Ranger is technically a hero name from memory. Just neutral in action. In the same way thief is a hero name.

Kevin Blandin

One thing bothers me about this Crusade, Hasenbach really DOES have ugly, not-Good motives for this Crusade. How does it really serve the Heavens if a mass-murderer on par with a starting Stalin deceives her allies into allowing her descendants to liquefy their nation's seats of rule and absorb them all into Procer? (Which in Cordelia's PoV is pretty much her stated goal.)

A super-state like that makes the Stories really, really clunky. Whenever ANYONE tries to absorb land like that, bad things tend to happen.

Shouldn't these old-head Heroes KNOW that???

MetruX

I don't think they know of her motives, and even if they have a glimpse, the idea of so many troops and heroes uniting to destroy a great evil is too much for man of them to resist. I mean, they couldn't simply stop it even if they wanted, and if they don't participate the results may be even worse, no? So, what choice do they have?

oldschoolvillain

In Cordelia's PoV, she was actually trying to bind them together as a Grand Alliance, like the League of Free Cities or the United Nations. That's what she was setting the groundwork for, not for a bloodless coup. All of the other diplomats were pretty much specifically watching for any clauses or tricks like that, since Procer has a history of expansionism and no one wanted to get colonised again.

sengachi

I mean, I'm sure plenty of old knights and templars were well aware every time the Papacy declared Crusade that there were more political motives than religious ones motivating the fight. But they went anyway.

Voice of Reason

I honestly don't think working with Cordelia is going to work out. She and Cat simply have too many conflicting interests.

Shequi

If Catherine wants educated administrators without political ties to the political factions forming in her court, why hasn't she gone to the same imperial orphanages that raised her? It was repeatedly stressed that the girls were educated well enough to be tutors to nobility; there must be some of them who would be great bureaucrats and the fact that Catherine was one of them will give weight of loyalty to them, at least to begin with.

Author Unknown

Because Akua burned it down...

I guess they could do some kind of ritual and make the dead bureaucrats, but that probably wouldn't go over too well with most of Callow.

Daemion

Akua only threatened to do that, she never actually did it.

Author Unknown

I think she actually did burn it down. If she hadn't followed through on her threat it would undermine all future threats. We didn't see it on screen, but I'm pretty sure it still happened. Perhaps EE can clear it up.

narcoduck

"Did you have time to look into what I asked you to?" I asked after a breath of hesitation.

"The orphanage is untouched," he replied. "Not a soul missing. A good thing you killed the other claimants in such spectacular manners, I doubt Heiress would have taken you seriously otherwise."

"That would have been unfortunate," I murmured. "Because I meant every word."

-Book 1: Chapter 19 Pivot

sengachi

So let me get this straight.

Callow, which stands united under the banner of orphan native who has pulled her country from the ashes to rise anew and face a new era, now faces down an enemy led by backstabbing traitors doing the political bidding of a monarch seeking empire. Callow is outnumbered, out-Named, and is beset by monsters of such power that they have never been lain low, any one of whom could expected to crush Catherine with ease.

Procer is fuuuuuuuuuuucked. Oh it's gonna be a shit show. But they are doooooooooomed.

aran

Typo or atrociously, terribly awesome pun? You decide!

Barthumphries

Speaking of typos:

he was also one of the founders of the tight-knight group
Change knight to knit, tight-knit, as in sewn together, i.e. knitting.

So I think it's a typo. 😊

Aside from the brutal bounding our manpower would take Change bounding to pounding

aran

>

aran

> "I'd kiss you, if you weren't so painfully indifferent to women," I replied with a smirk.

Damn it, that ship hadn't even left drydock yet before you sank it. 😊

Unorginal

To the contrary, her reactions mean that it not only rose from the depths of our broken hearts but sails again resplendent in all its glory and heraldry.

grzecho2222

I wonder when others guns will fire, other then Hell Egg. There are also: missing bell from angel island, bloodline ritual and wierdly similar deaths of White's and Archer's fathers

Unmaker

It seems to me that you could make a person like the Gray Pilgrim. Take an organization with an intelligence network and enough money or special powers to have someone travel regularly. Take an exceptionally competent person in the organization. Then, every time you hear about a hero's creation, send your competent person to assist the hero in a tight spot. It wouldn't take long before the narrative that controls both Good and Evil would just about force the helper into a distant mentor role.

TameCurtsy

MINOR SPOILER-ISH Warning: I doubt anyone is going to read this, when it's so far down the comment list, but haven't seen anyone else bring up this tiny detail from a random earlier chapter about Saint of Swords.

.

...

...

...

One of her aspects creates a domain. Saint of Swords is mentioned when they are discussing Catherine's Fall, as an example of Names known to create domains.

@ERRATICERRATA Can I get a brownie point? 😊

Barthumphries

Link/source? So the Saint of Swords could lure Cat into a cave, create a domain in the doorway, and then Cat couldn't get out because she'd have to go through a domain and she can't do that without an invitation? (Or matching through the fea world through the cave walls.)

TameCurtsy

Super impressed someone actually read my comment. Source is Chapter 37, Book 3.

As for that tactic, it's a nice idea, but I think there are too many problems with that course.

Isa Lumitus

You know, I think Cat's worried a bit too much about damaging her chances at diplomacy with the invaders. I mean, they already hate her so much that they are bankrolling armies to go after her.

Squashing them isn't going to make things worse. Bonfire is a plan that warrants serious consideration.

That said, I had an idea for another way she could force Procer to back off. She could go through Arcadia, and then destroy all the Lycaonese fortresses meant to defend against the Chain of Hunger. That would force Hasanbach to deploy far more forces to that front to compensate, and it wouldn't involve slaughtering as many civilians as Bonfire would.

Truth be told, Cat is reminding me of Empress Mercury from Dungeon Keeper Ami, with her reluctance to win the war. Don't get me wrong, I love DKA, but the main character is a 15 year old goody-twoshoes. Cat just feels a bit out-of-character at the moment.

Maybe she can cut a deal with Armin. Something like he doubles back to "chase the Black Queen" out of Procer, and in exchange his political alliances are left intact to attempt to topple Hasanbach.

vuthuha912

You know what. Cat can't do Bonfire because she wants to negotiate but Black and Malicia can totally do that because they aren't looking for a negotiation. Good and Evil don't negotiate. PERIOD. Cat is still holding a traditionally Good Nation so she has certain leeway with abdication and such but this is fight or dies for Malicia and Black so they will go all in. If Cordelia is not willing to commit then she is going to fail. I am going to repeat this over and over again until the Crusade is over. WAR IS NOT A GAME. Treat it with the same seriousness that you treat your love one's life.

Once you start the fighting, this is a matter of life or death. Expect your opponent to do every dirty trick because this is life or death for them. Cordelia is underprepared for the Crusade. Her carelessness is going to bite her later.

Don't worry about bloodying Procer, Cat. We killed around 100,000 soldiers from the Mongolian Army during their Conquest of us and they were quite happy in receiving our 'compensation' for their losses. Similarly, didn't the US kill more than 3 millions Vietnamese during the Vietnam War? We get over it quick, didn't we? Wait for a few decades and the sentiment will fade. Procer is the one doing the conquering after all. Should they feel justified enough to hold a grudge or will they blame Cordelia for their family dying in a foreign war? The trick is too killed enough and kissed their ass later. It always works.

Please Black, for the love of Praes. Bloody Procer enough so that Cordelia has to negotiate with Cat. Good cop, bad cop essentially. Cat might even solve your problem for you Either by opening a gate straight to Praes's heartland and finish of the highborn, creating a situation perfect for a new system of government or by being volunteering to be a leash to stop Praes from ever threatening Procer again (and open trade with Praes).

---

Chapter 5: Interests

“Ruling is not unlike gardening, if all the weeds were heavily armed and plotting your demise.”

– Dread Empress Prudence the First, the ‘Frequently Vanquished’

After Thief was gone, I lingered in my solar and waited for the scrying I knew would come. Over the silent hours that followed, I found only my thoughts for company and the downwards spiral they so often took of late.

The thing with bad habits was that you rarely realized you had them until they came back to bite you in the ass. I’d had months since Second Liesse to try to map out where and why I’d failed, and as far as I could tell a lot of failures ran from the same source: I tended to react more than prevent. I could even see where that fracture line had been born, the moment I’d effectively been first among equals in Callow yet still went at everything thinking like the Squire. Looking back at that entire year, the picture wasn’t pretty. I’d recognized Diabolist as a threat, but taken only half-measures against her and badly underestimated the kind of damage she could cause if left alive. The moment I’d realized she was preparing a ritual, I should have taken the Fifteenth down south in full strength and crushed her without mercy. I hadn’t seen the fae coming at all, but neither had anyone else so on that particular mark I’d withhold the blame. When it had become clear I was dealing with an Arcadian invasion, though, I’d botched the affair again. I’d pulled it off, in the end, but only with Malicia’s help and after leaving the south in the hands of Summer for months.

I’d gone after armies, the visible threats, but I hadn’t aimed at the roots of the debacle tree until much too late in the campaign. There was an old saying in Callow about failure being the most apt of teachers. Considering how monumental my failures had been, I should have learned quite a bit.

Some conclusions had been evident. The coup by the Praesi elements of the Ruling Council still felt like a footnote in a much larger affair, but it’d brought one truth to the light of day: if I ruled, if I put on a crown, I gained ties I couldn’t neglect. The situation in Laure had only come to a head because I wasn't there to scare them into line, but that was the problem wasn't it? That I had to scare them into line. The Empire worked like that, but the Empire tore itself to pieces with depressing regularity and had antagonized the rest of Calernia badly enough that they'd had four crusades sent their way. Worse, the climbing of the Tower encouraged a sort of pervasive ugly thinking that bloodletting was healthy. A way of thought that Black and Malicia were wrestling with to this day. The thing was, the whole iron sharpens iron philosophy did not actually deliver on what it promised: that the most competent, dangerous and ambitious person would end up claiming the Tower. Praesi history made that much blatantly clear. A lot of the Dread Emperors and Empresses who were now remembered as little more than punchlines had actually been very good at a single thing: killing their rivals frequently and brutally enough that no one overthrew them. For a while, anyway.

It was a skill set, I had to concede that much. But it wasn't one that necessarily translated to competent rule, even before you factored in the kind of infernal pacts those same Tyrants often made to come out on top and their later consequences. No, the more I read the more I was coming to the conclusion that there were two reasons Praes hadn't collapsed onto itself: the High Lords and the other villains. The same families who'd formed the Truebloods under Malicia and caused so much trouble were the same that regularly overthrew Emperors, but they were also families who poured a lot of wealth and influence into keeping Praes together. None of them wanted to rule only part of the Empire, the next time one of their kinsmen claimed the crown. That their way to keep it all together usually involved copious amounts of killing, an assault on Callow or general tightening of the screws on greenskins was horrid from where I stood, but in their closed little circle made perfect sense. It wasn't like anyone in Praes who wasn't highborn mattered, in their eyes. And then there were the villains. Chancellor, Black Knight, Warlock. Those were the most frequent, but every century seemed to bring its own batch of ancillary Named like Captain, Assassin and Scribe. None of them had been, if the histories were to be believed, particularly pleasant people. But as long as black-tempered demigods – for the old breed of villains had been that, for all their many flaws – were watching the Empire, anyone trying to splinter Praes was running the risk of taking their attention from their own petty feuds and turning it to the nail currently standing out. That tended to end poorly for the nail in question.

Callow had none of these structures. The House of Fairfax and the the aristocrats had been the backbone of the kingdom's rule before the Conquest, and they were now either thoroughly exterminated or gutted by a series of brutal wars and the purges that followed. At the moment the Kingdom of Callow had one thing keeping it together: me. And that was a really bad idea, as the Laure coup had made clear. Because if it was all on my shoulders, the moment I went out on campaign or was taken out of the field by a Named scrap for a while, it all began to crumble. I'd spent long nights with Hakram putting together a way to rule this country that would weather my absence without outright turning every office over to the Regals or the Queen's Men. We'd done better than I could reasonably expect. Folding the old Praesi-built bureaucracy into the royal court had centralized power, yes, but more around Laure than myself. Most of it could function without me there to oversee it. And Ratface, Gods bless his cantankerous soul, had worked miracles where he could.

The Royal Mint in Marchford had put enough coin out there that the Tower no longer essentially decided the amount of currency we had to spare. Ratface was alarmed about the fact that the Empress still sat over massive reserves of precious metals accrued over two decades of peace and looting Callow, and that if she ever cut them loose the overflow of gold and silver would break the south and damage the rest of the kingdom. I couldn't dismiss that worry out of hand, but Malicia was at war. I knew better than most the Empress wasn't above putting an arrow in her foot if she thought it would lead to a long-term gain, but as long as she needed Callow functional enough to get in the crusade's way I couldn't see her pulling the trigger. It was still an awkward position: I could not and would not remain under the Tower's thumb, but if I ever got too out of line Malicia would have to react and coin was one of the better ways she had of hurting me. And there were risks, of course, to an unstable and war-torn country starting to mint its own coin. It'd been patriotic sentiment more than trust that saw people embracing the new currency, and sentiment was a dangerous thing to use as foundation.

I was popular enough in Callow that at the moment there was no real chance of uprising, but I would have to be very careful to keep it that way. Thief had made it clear that up north I was considered to have picked up the worst of the Fairfaxes overreaches and the most grating Praesi methods, then made both them my reign's central tenets. I had strong grip in central Callow, where a lot of people still saw me as the woman who'd given the boot to the most hated aspects of Praesi rule and taken the field repeatedly to keep the kingdom safe. In the south, though, it was a mixed bag. Hakram had overseen the feeding and settling of the refugees and that'd raised my reputation by extension, but Laure still loomed tall in everyone's memories. It didn't help that southerners tended to be more religious, as a rule, and that for all that my coronation had been at a Sister's hands I was still very much a villain. Down there, I was backed only so long as every other alternative was measurably worse. At least Procer's known involvement in the Liesse Rebellion had them almost as hated as Praes: the backlash in sentiment had only grown starker when rumours trickled in that the Tenth Crusade would be going through Callow. Conspiracies were being peddled that the First Prince had arranged it all to weaken the country enough it wouldn't be able to fight back, and the way they were not waning but growing in popularity had the Empress' signature all over it.

Her Dread Majesty had been quiet, of late, but it would be a blunder to believe that meant she wasn't setting up the board for her later moves.

I'd begun to work on Callow too late, I knew. Less than a year of seeing to the country, when I had to both double the size of the army and rebuild a third of the realm? That Ratface had managed to find the coin for any of this was a testament to how ridiculously resourceful my former Supply Tribune was. I'd had to resign myself, in the end, to the truth that this was as much good as I could do before the swords came out. And there never really had been a doubt that the swords would come out, which was why I'd poured so much coin into the Jacks even when Juniper was howling in outrage. If I started to fight this war only when the armies began marching, I'd lose. It was as simple as that. Black had once told me that if I didn't start acting instead of reacting I would rack up greater and greater disasters, and I cursed myself still for not having listened to him then. I would not make that mistake again, and that meant going in with both a plan and a notion of what my opponents were up to. I had my plan. It'd taken me months and more people brought in to put it together than I was truly comfortable with, but I had the the skeleton of the Liesse Accords on parchment. Now I just had to make sure everyone else in this mess was ready to sign them, and that was a different beast.

Malicia, I knew, never would agree. That meant Malicia had to go, sooner or later, and that put a particular tone to the fact that her spymistress was contacting me on the eve of my departure for the northern campaign.

The scrying basin lit up and I leaned over, watching my interlocutor closely. Ime looked older than when I'd last seen her. The lines on her face were deeper, and though her hair remained dark I suspected there was dye behind the absence of white locks. She was warier speaking to me than she'd once been, as she should be. Aisha's kinsmen had dug up a few things about her when I asked. She'd been one of the Heir's closest supporters, when Black had still been the Squire, and the only one to survive my teacher's unsurprisingly thorough retribution as he rose to prominence. She'd been inserted at court under Dread Emperor Nefarious as a hidden ally for the then-concubine Malicia, and later served as the Empress' most precious informant in Ater during the civil war. Anyone who could deceive a Chancellor and a panoply of Praesi highborn could not be taken lightly, so I was about as wary as she herself was looking.

"Your Majesty," the spymistress greeted me.

Her face was small, on the stone basin I used for official scrying with the Tower, but remarkably detailed. Masego had done good work with the instrument.

"Lady Ime," I replied, inclining my head.

"I bear word from Her Most Dreadful Majesty," she said. "It has come to the Tower's attention that you will be leaving for campaign with dawn."

"As agreed, the defence of Callow is part of my responsibilities as tributary state of Praes," I said. "Though reinforcing Black at the Vales is no longer feasible, I will be meeting Prince Milenan's army in battle."

"The prompt discharging of your obligation does you honour," Ime said, though we both knew that to be empty words. I wasn't doing any of this for the Empress' sake. "The Tower has, however, instructions in the specifics of that discharge."

Ah, and there we went. I know what you're after this time, you old spider. I was about to be told, I suspected, that Amadis Milenan was to survive his little jaunt through the Whitecaps.

"It will be my pleasure, of course, to listen to such instructions," I mildly replied.

I'd learned to choose my words more carefully, and not just because I had a fancy hat. Ime understood perfectly well the backdoor I'd allowed myself in this, but I'd not given her grounds enough to harden her language. We were still at the part of the game where my deep love and loyalty for the Empress was fantasy we both pretended to be fact.

"It has been decreed in the Tower's interests that certain royals within the crusader host be spared the sword," Ime said.

"Fascinating," I smiled, wide and mirthless. "Shall I guess the names?"

"In deference to the current state of war, that will not be necessary," the spymistress blandly replied. "There are only two: Prince Amadis Milenan of Iserre and Princess Rozala Malanza of Aequitan."

The schemer and the general. Essentially the only two people that mattered in that army, aside from the heroes. I allowed the empty smile to lapse.

"And this... decree," I said. "Does it bear the Tower's seal? Or is it simply an instruction from Her Dread Majesty?"

How far are you willing to push this? Are you going to make it treason to disobey? That, at the moment, was the most important bit to find out. The line the Empress took on this would tell me quite a bit. Like, for example, if ignoring her would be followed by immediate reprisal. The last news from Aisha's relatives had the Ashuran war fleet in the Tideless Isles, an obvious prelude to attacking Praesi shores, so I doubted any of the Legions would be marching west. I had a garrison in place at Summerholm to stop them cold if they did, anyway. But the kind of pressure she was willing to bring down would give me a glimpse of her timetable: when was she going to stop thinking of me as a disposable asset and instead consider me a threat to deal with? She only had two armies in place to ward off Procer, and Black wasn't going anywhere now that Prince Papenheim was on the move. So tell me, Malicia, when is your play inside Procer going to make me irrelevant to the defence of your borders?

"A mere instruction," Ime smiled charmingly. "Her Dread Majesty recognizes the realities of battle may prevent you from carrying out her intent."

At least until the passage is secure, then, I thought. Now show me the knife, Tyrant.

"Of course, failing to achieve this may cast doubts about your ability amongst certain circles," Ime continued. "As we are currently mustering for the defence of the coast, I regret to inform you that Her Dread Majesty lacks the men to enforce the safety of trade routes with Callow."

So, the moneybag. Not unexpected. She wouldn't do anything too overt, no. Wouldn't even let her people be involved. She just needed to whisper in the ears of the right High Lords and the wolves would start going after my granaries and my traders while my army was on the wrong side of Callow to stop them. How typically Praesi that even when I was marching against an army that wanted her head on a pike she'd still threaten to shove sticks in my wheels. My fingers clenched. As always, the Empress toed the line skilfully. Escalation, but not enough it would cripple me or force heavy-handed retaliation on my part. I'd had a tutor in Praesi politics lately, though. One I despised, but Akua Sahelian knew the ways of the Wasteland the way only a monster born to its highest reaches could. Time to put what I'd learned to work. I'd spent months scrabbling for every way I knew to check Winter's influence on my thoughts, well aware of how much of a liability it made me when I swam in the deeper waters, and one of the side-effects of that had been learning exactly how that influence rose when I reached for the mantle. Fear, I instructed myself. Fear but nothing else. I smiled, and let Winter coil through my veins.

Frost tinged the sides of the stone basin as Ime's face went blank.

"Sabra Niri," I said, tone caressing the words, and she shivered. "I was surprised, to learn of your kinship to the High Lord of Okoro."

Her name had been learned, not given, and this made difference. It was still a foothold. Fear spread in her mind like a drop of ink in water. Thinned, yes, but contaminating every part of her. I could taste it, even through this thin link of sympathetic sorcery. I savoured it. I watched the curve of her neck, and considered snapping it. A little reminder to Malicia that threats were not inconsequential. Perhaps too brutal, I mused. Taking simply her sight would be sufficient. I could whisper through this working and shatter those pretty little orbs with a single word. Make bauble of them, perhaps. A bracelet for her to wear as a reminder of the costs of slighting me. Fear. Fear but nothing else. A weak, indecisive design. I balked at it. We would see.

"Have you ever heard the Wild Hunt ride, Sabra Niri?" I asked quietly.

It was a pretty mask of calm she wore, but it was a very thin and feeble one. It would be delightful to rip it off.

"I am not certain what you imply, Queen Catherine," Ime said.

"It comes slowly, triptych unfolding," I told her. "First you hear the horns. Distant, like—"

My voice was halfway other, the crack of glaciers and the stillness of fallen snow.

"— a promise, almost a whisper," I said. "Then you hear the hooves, and that is when you know yourself hunted."

She began to speak, but I clicked my tongue. Her lips closed and she swallowed loudly.

"The last thing you hear, Sabra Niri, is the laughter," I murmured. "It is sport to them, you see. Like a deer that can scream and oh, how they enjoy the screams."

"The Hunt is under your command," Ime said. "To send them after citizens of the Empire would be rebellion."

"Citizens?" I mused. "No. Animals. Animals are what they would pursue."

I turned my gaze on her.

"Wherever they might be," I softly spoke. "Whoever might shield them. They would... disappear. As if by the hand of a god."

I smiled and showed my teeth, knew them sharper than a human's should be. Hunger made fangs wherever it spread.

"Shall we speak of gods, Sabra Niri?" I asked.

"The Wasteland is not without learning in this matter," she replied.

"Then perhaps it should it should pay heed to these old lessons," I said. "I wish you sweet dreams, Sabra Niri. And a kindness, for the one you once offered – running never helps, but it is still better than being caught."

I cut the strings of the the spell, before I could talk myself into claiming her tongue for the arrogance of having threatened me. The sheer gall of that insect – I breathed in and out, slowly. Fear. Fear and nothing else. I'd stayed within the bounds. I spent half an hour alone and unmoving in the solar afterwards, letting the influence of Winter ebb. It was worse than the chats with Hasenbach, because this time I'd leaned in willingly. That made a difference. When I embraced it of my own free will it was always slower to recede. Gods, I wanted a drink. But the way my hand refused to move told me the oath considered me on campaign already. It'd been playing with munitions, letting Winter out, but that was the entire point. So long as Malicia believed me unstable, willing to escalate starkly at the first offence, she would be wary of starting her usual games. Except it's not pretending if I really am that volatile, is it? I clenched my fingers. I couldn't stay queen, not in the long term. Not when I had that lurking thing in the back of my soul and no real solution to leash it. But the only person I could feasibly abdicate to was Anne Kendall, and Thief was sure she didn't currently have the backing to stay on the throne if I put her there. Which I couldn't do, anyway, not without starting a war with the Tower and likely Black as well. For now, I had to stay. Under all the checks I could manage without crippling the kingdom's rebuilding. Fuck, I missed Hakram. It was always easier when he was around, and once more I regretted sending anyone else to Vale would have slowed necessary work by months.

Dawn found me looking through glass panels, an open manuscript on my knees. We'd be moving out soon, to fight a war against unbeatable men in a battle where I had to refrain from spilling my enemy's blood. Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation.

Well, the Heavens were certainly attempting to deliver.

Holy shit Cat, that was scary and awesome and fucking risky. It's a good think she didn't rip the tongue or eyes of Malicia's lover.

P.S If you can do vote for the Guide on topwebfiction <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

We are again past Ward! Whoo!!
(Not that I dislike Ward, tis a great story; this is just better :P)
Keep voting and we'll be able to stay above Ward!

Mr. Nobody

Yeah, Practical Guide to Evil deserves a lot more to be the first. Parahuman Series is not the same without Taylor Hebert.

Matthew

Ward has the problem of no one wanting to kill and the story twisting itself implausibly to avoid having anyone killed.

Like the latest arc, they are saying that they can't kill all of the Fallen. Well, once you kill Mama Mathers and those under compulsion are released, why can't you kill the remainder? The Fallen as a group are way too dangerous to be left alive.

---

That's the kind of decision a politician or a military commander could make, but the people whose shoulders it is now on are too well aware that they have no means to stop that conflict once they start it, that the post-Golden-Morning truce is already barely holding, and that holding back because there are bigger threats on the horizon has never been so urgent before.

Matthew

1. There are no bigger threats than scion and the endbringers and both are gone/inert
- 2 . the vast majority of living parahumans hate masters... Almost as if they all have direct experience of being under their sway.
3. The fallen are militant nihilists and would, by definition, try to sabotage any coalition they were a part of.

therealgridlock

Hey, it me, the future, here to tell you there are much bigger problems than even scion and the endbringers are still going.

Ward is already finished though so I don't feel any problems telling you those things, completely spoiler free, because it wouldn't be a wobblebibble book without infinite escalation.

kelioez

Hey future, Frick u, 3 years back I used to lounge around all day long and now I have to friking study.

DroughtBringer

"to fight a war against unbeatable men in a battle where I had to refrain from spilling my enemy's blood."

Did I miss something? Or is this just referring to the two royalty?

Also, great chapter! It has an amazing insight to the way that Winter is working withing Cat, as well as some nice foreshadowing of what's to come.

Byzantine

I believe she is referring to some of the Heros, like the Grey Pilgrim.

---

She meant the Grey Pilgrim (who is undefeated so far and can't be killed if she ever wants to make a treaty with Levant) and Saint of Swords (who is more or less Ranger with a domain). She also can't kill too many soldiers, or Hasenbach wouldn't treat with her at all.

cozzy215

It is probably referring to the big two Heroes that are in the Proceran camp. More specifically the Grey Pilgrim.

Darkening

She's also referring tot he fact that she can't just butcher the enemy army to the last man in a single decisive victory or the Principate will react by digging in their heels and wanting to retaliate, and she won't be able to push through a treaty.

Aside from that, holy hell the bit with Winter was something. I really, really, really love this turn to things. Probably not going to lead to good things, but I just love how alien her thought processes and behavior turned. Looking forward to seeing her go all out on some heroes.

Jeremy

Well, Catherine's really going down this path. When you start taking lessons from *Diabolist*, you know that things have to be pretty desperate...

Rook

Cat really is the embodiment of the Praesi ideal that way. Becoming better by learning from her enemies, pulling out the knife that you were stabbed with and making it your own. She's surrounded by treachery on every side – Cordelia in the front, Malicia in the back, Larat and Akua under her nose, the Goblin Matrons, Praesi nobles, and the other calamities in the background – and for all that they're grinding her down, she's trying to use it to sharpen herself. An almost literal case of iron sharpens iron, for all that she disparages the notion of it.

ayon96

Author

The summary says the story updates every Monday and Wednesday
You forgot to update it

Mr. Nobody

I really don't know what you are talking about. He's clearly updating the story regularly.

Darkening

it's been updating Fridays too lately.

The Sanity Faerie

Yes, but the summary needs to be updated. The days have changed. (I think?)

Mr. Nobody

Ah, so it was the summary. Sorry, I misinterpreted the comment.

bobthebuilder

monday, wednesday, friday – hasn't missed an update yet.

ayon96

The author wrote in the summary that the story updates on Monday and Wednesday but now it is also updating on Friday. He forgot to change that in the summary. Sorry that my comment is misleading

lpoolfan1

I just started following recently, and I love this serial a lot!

If it's alright with you, erraticerrata, could I possibly incorporate some material from this in a D&D campaign I'm going to start running soon? The concept of Names would really spice up the campaign and let my players really shine. Also, the villains would be spectacular.

If you're not ok with that, that's fine! I get it if you don't want to just let other people copy you.

---

There was a supposedly author-certified RPG, you'd ahve to ask Tragedyofphilosophy on Reddit (https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/8dbvi0/do\_orcs\_have\_hair/dxm9u4e/).

Joel

I so do love all the political parts it this (it's part of what elevates this work so), but I really am itching to get to Catherine running an arrogant Prince or two through.

naturalnuke

I really wonder, if she has no current Name is she more or less effected by The Narrative?

Darkening

Considering she replaced it with Fae magic I'd guess more.

Nairne .01

I'd agree. Though I think the direct influence is still limited to Oaths.

taliesinskye

Unfortunately, Fae are highly vulnerable to narratives, and she dropped her name for Fae power. Fae do have more wiggle room in Creation than in Faerie, at least.

Rook

Note that the knife cuts both ways though. They're not just vulnerable to narratives, but also empowered by them. They're can be on the level of lesser gods if the story supports them enough, or disposable minions if it doesn't.

Euodiachloris

On the plus-side, she isn't restricted to as narrow a field of narrative arcs typical of Named. Sure, she'll operate best in Winter-related areas... But, that covers all kinds of stories. Even ones of cheer-within-harshness, but particularly strongly meta tales.

Winter is when you hunker down and tell or make up tales to get you through the darkest nights. 😊

---

Alright, does anyone understand why Catherine didn't just ask about the location of the demon? Mlaicia has to understand that Cat's not stupid enough to use it, and at this point not knowing about it hinders everyone for the same reasons.

Rook

Malicia already knows more likely than not, and even if her spy network had not given her reason to believe it she'd be able to infer it fairly easily given the situation: Having said that, her assistance in finding it has shown to be noticeably lacking, which when dealing with a schemer of Malicia's caliber can be taken as a blatant refusal to give that card away

Asking her for it not only reveals a measure of your thoughts to her – beyond dangerous when your relationship is less allies and more using each other for the moment – but even if she were to acquiesce, it puts Cat in a weaker bargaining position for the future and is a potential weapon in the field of shifting public opinion considering how prevalent Demons were in Marchford and second Liesse.

So essentially it's a terrible move because you're asking for something that isn't critical, in a way that bares your neck to a potential enemy, while knowing that it's for the moment a wholly futile endeavour

d_o_l

I wonder if Malicia is planning on releasing the demon herself? She's definitely been sliding more towards old school Evil tactics. She might see an opportunity to hurt two of her enemies at once.

Jonnnney

A demon of absence might be exactly the tool Cat needs to slaughter the army without consequences. The Procter can't be too angry about the death of 50,000 soldiers if no one remembers that they ever existed.

She can't ask for the location because she is trying to portray herself as violent, unpredictable, and controlled by her winter urges. Asking for the location is reasonable and suggests that she is acting predictably which allows the Empress many more actions and manipulations.

agumentic

She did, though. Inquiries were politely rebuffed, I think it was mentioned in the Chapter 2.

nipi

Didnt Cat complain a few chapters back that Malicia has been uncooperative on thet front?

MurkyTruths

The rabbit hole stretches deeper..

Jane

You know, it occurs to me that, as harshly as she judges herself, the fact that Thief is willing to work for her is a pretty clear sign that she's actually doing reasonably well; for all that the rest of the world calls Thief a fallen heroine, she's signaled plenty of times that she's only in this so long as Callow is better off with Cat as Queen.

Though, I suppose her judgment DOES have much to do with the fact that she's comparing herself to Black and Malicia, two of the greatest planners and schemers of the age – that would undermine anyone's confidence in their competence. Still, just compare her to pretty much any of the other characters we've heard about, with the exception of Cordelia – even as half-hearted as her efforts at planning have been, pretty much nobody else seems to have even seriously considered the long-term. Given how she's been rushing from one disaster to the next, that she was able to accomplish ANYTHING is still remarkable, even if much of it has more to do with recognizing and employing talented individuals than it does setting in motion decade-spanning projects.

Not that her self-reflection is off – she's been content to react despite being in a position where she's been expected to plan, and the costs for that have been dire. But it's also important to recognize that most others in her position would have lost everything, and that she's come out of this with a country still able to pose a threat to the Crusade is a remarkable accomplishment. Well, more important for the rest of the world to recognize, I suppose – if SHE were to think that, it would risk leading to dangerous complacency.

Slider

Cat should just marry Thief and make her queen of Callow. That would solve all her problems with being forced to abdicate for the greater 'good' due to being compromised by winter.

DD

It seems like there were 3 chapters last week. Has the update schedule changed?

Jonnnnz

It's been three a week for a few now

Matthew

Am I the only one upset by Cat breaking from the Tower?

Malicia and Black are the best.

Black especially as his weaponized genre savvy and use of institutions makes him genuinely new and a threat to the existing order. I imagine Black and the Heirarch actually agree about the supremacy of humanity over stupid meddling gods.

I was always hoping that Black and Malicia could "Ship of Theseus" Praes into a reformed empire which is 'good,' because taxes aren't onerous, everyone is fed, people are treated equally before the law... etc, Watching Cat plot to destroy Praes and, by Extension, Black's goals of using institutions and organization to defy the very gods is sad and anticlimactic.

Now she's just another anti hero fighting within a groove that creation wants her to fight in.

Creation wants this Crusade to go 3 ways.

1. Best Case: Procer knocks out Cat and Praes
2. Second Best Case: Procer fails to knock out Cat or Praes, but Cat then knocks out Praes.
3. Worst case for creation: Cat and Praes cooperate closely and figure out a way to force Procer into a sustainable treaty.

The story is on #2. I'd much rather read #3.

Voice of Reason

Cat only said she was going to get rid of Malicia, who said anything about Black? She may be planning to help him depose Malicia and take her place.

Matthew

This is a possibility, but unlikely.

Black broke Malicia's trust by destroying the array. I don't think he'd dignify her resulting distrust by actively plotting against her. He'd want a way to remove the dread empress through... "constitutional" means.

Decius

Isn't Usurpation considered a valid means of succession?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Yup. I remember because one of the chapter quotes mentions that, while usurpation is a valid means of succession, a group of animals which ate a Dread Empress weren't smart enough to be considered as successors (but were smart enough to be charged with treason in light of the desertion of the tiger army, if you remember that; the quote was from the animals' trial (not the tigers)).

Cold Cyberia

I think that is what Malicia and Black wanted to do originally, but that ship has sailed.

Malicia de facto embraced Stupid Evil by sacrificing a city worth of people of one her allies to get a super weapon and Black no longer believes in half-measures and wants to exterminate the Praesi nobility like the cancer they are.

So... yeah. Cat's idea to jump ship makes sense because the Empire is no longer a reliable ally.

wagnerap

And in this chapter Cat realized the nobility is an important stabilizing and unifying force despite being maggots in the flesh of Praes . . .

Rook

They're a necessary evil contingent on Praesi culture continuing to be self harming to the point of tearing itself apart, is what Cat realized.

Which is the exact same thing Black wanted to change in his argument with Empess, to break that culture and stop being (paraphrased) 'a snake choking on its own tail'. Cat essentially came to the same conclusion he did, which still eventually ends with the high nobles ripped out root and stem.

Ed

Cat has to break from the Tower, the Tower itself is the ultimate symbol of idiotic evil she said it herself in this chapter. The highborn fight to preserve Praes even when they give no shits because *their* family might be next in the Tower.

grzecho2222

There is also:

- Cat taking over Praes
- Black taking over Praes
- Everyone fighting bigger theat

grzecho2222

Also Miss "One day, we will have foreign allies who are not complete imbeciles. By sheer dint of odds, it has to happen eventually." jumped the maneating tapir with Hellgate plan and decided to antagonize said allies because Cat stabbed Black.

d_o_l

Malicia is pretty clearly going off the deep end. Seems like maybe spending so long at the top of the Tower has started to warp her perceptions a bit. Black was 100% right about the flying fortress gambit being a stupid idea, and now she's bringing the Dead King into the mix. What's happening right now is not Cat's fault.

Albatross

I've been thinking with all the 'Winter affects my mind' stuff recently, if the name 'Dread Emperor/Empress' doesn't do the same to the people who hold it. Still I don't think Malicia's gonna hang onto that name once Triumphant comes back

Albatross

Also I reckon the most likely endgame is more: Callow & Praes become one country, Cat abdicates, Malicia is deposed. Heck maybe if the League can pick up enough power their Exarch can impose hideously ineffective democracy on everyone

Albatross

**Hierarch

DD

I love the fact that the utterly democratic nation is aligned with evil. I know that anyone who studied the Ancient Greek city-states knows how terrible and bloody democracy can be, but in modern times it is always depicted as some great good. This is good stuff.

RanVor

For me, they seem more like Bolsheviks than democrats.

grzecho2222

For me they seem more like French revolutionists, Bolsheviks had very organized military (with chariots with machine guns and other stuff), also they fought Mensheviks (who dethroned Tsar and who generally made much more sense) and spent most of their time fighting democratic countries. Also most people among them didn't believe in system and spent a LOT of time fighting for power among themselves

sengachi

Yeah they're not democratic. They're ... something else. Some form of lunacy which is only stable and doesn't immediately get co-opted by some power-hungry (or well-meaning) official on the inside because of mind-reading shenanigans.

Honestly I don't feel like they have a good analogue to any real-world political system, other than being what Pure Marxist Communism would be if Pure Marxist Communism had actually had some mechanism for enforcing distributed rule rather than just hoping that everybody would pick the cooperate button in their political prisoner's dilemma (and if someone then dumped a bucket of pure chaos on the whole thing). Which, of course, means it's nothing like Marx-descended Communism at all because every awful thing that ever happened in the USSR basically begins and ends with: "Marx didn't actually bother figuring out how to incentivize distributed political unity and just believed really hard that the people would make it would happen".

Fern

God, and I forgot about the fuckin Dead King.

Wait, is Malicia gonna go for Bonfire?

I mean, obviously Praes can't directly go for it, not without the portals. But it's the same principle, really: keep the bulk of the crusade hemmed in at the Red Flower Vales then let the Dead King completely ruin the country. It's what I would do, in that situation, especially if Malicia thinks she can get rid of the Dead King afterwards (I mean, that seems pretty unlikely though, what with the whole secret hell wars that everyone forgot about. If it didn't work then I doubt it could work now, unless they bring Ranger into the fold).

mavant

What secret hell wars that everyone forgot about?

Fern

IIRC it got mentioned a while back, in "The Secret Histories of Praes." There were a few wars fought for control over the hell that the Dead King occupied that ended with a horrible loss for Praes. I don't remember if they had to use an absence demon or not but i'm 90% sure they did.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Winter is coming.

As is *with my various phalanges crossed* suicide goats.

baahk to the classics.

Jordan

Oh boy, crossed phalanges.

SMHF

Wow I really love to see The Hunt in action in a Heroic Interlude!

Idk watching them through Cat's eyes, while still awesome, seeing as she's the Queen of The Hunt, would take some of their mystic away...

grzecho2222

I wonder if one of Heroes is Kid Hero/Sidekick, because they are one thing that Creation didn't throw at Cat

shieldredblog

Page

Shoddi

Already done once with Page. See Book 2, Chapter 18: Tinder.
Not to say it can't happen again, though.

grzecho2222

Hmm, how old was Page? I always she was Cat's age. Also, I meant 12 -15 years old, like Artemis Fowl, Will Treaty, Percy Jackson, Robin etc..
Kid – Hero

grzecho2222

*always assumed

Antony444

Seen like this, the demand of Malicia to keep the two Princes alive can only be seen in a very dark light. After all if the Prince of Iserre and the Princess of Aequitan are captured alive, we must assume their army will be beaten by that point (because they didn't strike me as front-line commanders) and the heroes will be in disarray or dead.

With this kind of situation, their influence will be spent and the majority of their elite forces destroyed. The only reason Malicia wants them alive is because the Dead King is going to unleash his armies once the two 50 000+ armies are no longer able to disengage and march north.

Malicia is certainly going to let Keter invade Procer, kills most of the Princes and Princess. Cordelia Hasenback, unable to repulse the greatest Evil invasion of this era, will be the scapegoat. At the last moment, Praes armies will of course gallantly come to the rescue and put Prince Amadis on the throne, with the Princess of Aequitan as his wife.

The Tenth Crusade will be dead without the Principate, most heroes will be dead too, and Callow will have been bled in the process. The Dread Empress will have killed most of her opponents, internal and external.

At least, I consider it a possible scenario. This story has the potential to surprise me at every chapter...though it's definitely a bad sign when the main character considers she can trust herself anymore with a crown.

Ashen Shugar

I don't think Malicia expected Cat to capture the Princes, but rather didn't want them taken out in a decapitation strike to weaken the army as she still wants them around to scheme against Cordelia.

James, Mostly Harmless

Does anybody remember why Ime being related to the High Lord of Okoro is significant to Cat and worthy of the Wild Hunt?

Byzantine

It's Cat saying "I know who you are, and the Hunt are at my beck and call."

RanVor

It's important because Cat knows who she is. She can't hide behind the mask of relative anonymity anymore.

DD

It also Cat saying "I am a fae-like power who knows your full name, and names have power..."

Fern

so, four people she cannot kill: two by decree of the empress, and two by rationality. Clearly, Cat is going to have to decide what wheelhouse she's in on the eve of this campaign; is she going to destabilize Procer for long enough that they're no longer a threat? Or work to ensure that the two Proceran Demigods live to ensure peace. Although – at least to me – it looks like she's trying to go for both. This would be the best scenario, of course. Save the revered Heroes and let the blame for a failed operation fall on the two snakes, keeping Hasenbach and Malicia content enough to beat each other senseless.

Obviously, we've passed the gold end way forever ago, when Black let his failure in the Free Cities influence his actions. Now, we're just desperately scrabbling for the best possible outcome for Callow, and perhaps seeing our darling Catherine come out as a major player in Calernian politics.

Shawn Panzegraf

Me personally,
I'd take my army ALL THE WAY to the north end of Procer if I were Cat, much like Move 1 in Bonfire. Then instead of massacring the population, I'd sweep the defenders against the Chain of Hunger off their walls from behind. With Procer completely undefended in the north for the first time in millennia, the Chain would likely rise as it hasn't in ages.

Faced with the utter annihilation of her nation, Cordelia could either turn her forces for home, or be crucified by her own troops before they hurried home.

Simple. Easy peasy. You can't stab your way to Paradise, but you can always stab your way to better. This diplomatic solution....I don't have a ton of faith in. Kinda feels like Cat is goin a bit soft due to her (justified) fear of her mantle.

Nairne .01

Except the Chain of Hunger is not anyone's ally and where will they turn after they eat through Procer?

Engineer

Either Callow or the Dominion. Maybe both.

That said if they employ that version of bonfire and word ever got out that Catherine was the one indirectly responsible for such a large amount of death, then the reasons she did not want to employ the vanilla bonfire plan will still come to pass.

That's not even touching the fact that all the old monster heroes that would undoubtedly survive such an onslaught on their home country would be turning their eyes to Catherine in particular.

They'd even have the narrative weight to kick her ass.

So no, if you want a long term, peaceful solution you can't go for the kill them all (whether directly or indirectly) approach. Because Reality in the guideverse is far from impartial.

skyguy998

The way I see it, Cat wasn't ordered not to kill the Princes. She was ordered that they "be spared the sword", intentionally or unintentionally giving Cat the same out she gave herself in her "listen to instructions"

On the rest fabulous as always, can't wait to see what happens next, though I can't wait to see what type of name she gets, something like "Queen of Woe" would be awesome. Also would love to see the hunt in action

grzecho2222

Iron Queen:

- iron sharpens iron
- wears iron crown
- rules with iron fist
- Fae hate iron and if something has selfcontradicting n(N)ame its usually Very Bad Sign

sengachi

"The thing was, the whole iron sharpens iron philosophy did not actually deliver on what it promised: that the most competent, dangerous and ambitious person would end up claiming the Tower. Praesi history made that much blatantly clear. A lot of the Dread Emperors and Empresses who were now remembered as little more than punchlines had actually been very good at a single thing:

killing their rivals frequently and brutally enough that no one overthrew them. For a while, anyway."

I feel like this is true for a *lot* of socially Darwinist / competition oriented philosophies.

TeK

Not really, it's just that the set of skills they compete in and the one needed to rule do not coincide.

Jago

But that is a very common occurrence. The skills to run an insurrection, usurpation of power or getting a ruling position through adventuring doesn't coincide and only partially overlap with those needed to make a competent and stable government. Rarely a person has both sets of skills.

ritvik jha

Mr.David Verburg aka erraticerrata I would like to garner your attention through this comment cause I was not able to find any other means of communication to contact you .

I am a law student pursuing a BA LLB and have written some articles in local news papers and magazines as a freelancer.

I have been reading your web fiction a practical guide to evil from quiet some time I just wanted to inform you that i am quiet interested in adding more detail to the lore of your web fictions like i.e the average life of a citizen in pares,life of a noble in callow or details about the administration of Procer.

This would need your approval as you are the owner of the original work as I might be adding details to the original material or creating some new details in the existing.

If approved I would like to guarantee you that the details and additional lore would never move away or obstruct the cannon that you produce this might even lead a few short stories i.e like the accounts of a paresi soldier during the doom of lessie and spin offs.

I am ready to do this free of cost or at a token fee (if u like to give it to me totally upon you) everything I write will be first sent to you for approval first so I will in no way obstruct your work.

please contact me through the email ritvikjha1@gmail.com.

dude

Are you... seriously asking the author to canonize or pay you for fanfiction of his own work?

Shawn Panzegraf

Eh,
I think this Universe has established it doesn't really punish "Evil at a remove" with bunches of Heroes descending. Malicia spawned mass civil war in Procer with indirect action and fifty Heroes didn't descend on Praes.

The "Story" isn't too smart. It's highly reactive, certainly. I will allow that without more details as to what the Ratlings are, it's difficult to say whether unleashing them would screw anything but Procer. It's possible they might simply infest Procer, requiring everyone adjacent country to wall up and defend. Alternatively, they might go all locust as assumed.

Still, Cordelia is hunting an Evil knockout for Empire-building purposes. She's crazier and more power-hungry than Malicia.
Therefore even more untrustworthy.

Jago

I don't see where you guys see that Empire-building purposes in Cordelia. Her aim, as far as we know, is to build something like the NATO/Western Alliance after WWII. Sure Procer will be "primus inter pares" in that alliance, exactly like the USA was in the NATO/Western Alliance against the URSS. Why it is a way to aggrandize Procer it is not empire building.

Hakurei06

Laure, not Liesse?

vuthuha912

I am going to say this again and again. WAR IS NOT A GAME. Stop ordering your generals around Malicia and commit to the fight.
Your country is going to get invaded and all you think about is your little game of politics. Gosh, these people are a bunch of cunts.

Cat makes mistakes but she is not even 20 years old yet. Black has 40 years of experience dealing with Trueblood. He should have known better by now. Yet, he still believes in the excuse Malicia gave him, isn't he? Sure, letting the Trueblood lives, giving them a chance to change their alliances and start working for more than their own ambition, and showing them the method for a way out is great and all. But after 20 years, if they still aren't switching sides then you are better off just killing them.
What is the point of magic power or secret contract or money if they are just using it to shoot yourself and all of your allies in the foot?

I will forever be bitter with those two c*nts on the Ruling Council. They butchered the chance to build unity and cooperation with Callow, bidding them closer to the Tower. They betrayed Callow for personal greed. What they are trying to accomplish, I have no idea. There is no way a coup like that will bring any long-term benefit. They just gutted a goose unnecessary for some eggs. And they are completely Malicia's fault. You have the time to build the bureaucracy up to take over Trueblood. If this is your result then no wonder you get fucked. Praes might as well go with a military dictatorship at this point. At least, the training in the army will make them understand the importance of having a stable rear in a fight. It works quite well for nearly every Chinese dynasty ever. They are all military dictatorships at the beginning of their reign. We can settle the governing body later. A government is formed at gunpoint after all.

---

Chapter 6: Hedges

"Irritant's Law: inevitable doom is a finite resource, and becomes mere doom when split between multiple heroic bands. Nemeses should never simultaneously engage a single villain."
– Extract from 'The Axiom Appendix', multiple contributors

I sat at a table across from Baron Henry Darlington of Hedges and Baroness Ainsley Morley of Harrow, shared a smile with them and wondered which one of them would be the first to try to sell me out to the crusaders.

I knew for a fact that Procer had approached the both of them long before a hole was punched through the Whitecaps. Hasenbach's people were good, but the Observatory was better and no one had any real idea yet of exactly what it could do. You couldn't counter something you didn't know about, as I had learned the hard way. I'd been keeping a close eye on these two, through both the Jacks and sorcerous means, and even though Morley was the one who'd just had to flee her own city my bet was on Darlington being the one to try for a deal. He was the older of the two, in his late forties, and though he'd had a reputation as a knight of some skill in his youth his belly made it clear he'd traded swords for mutton chops a long time ago. Morley, the Jacks had informed me, was in her thirties but had inherited the barony from her father only a year before the Liesse Rebellion. Her lands were larger than Darlington's but her personal holdings smaller and the rest split among vassals who'd been rather unruly after her ascension. If the betrayal came from the Harrow contingent, I'd wager that it would be from one of her sworn lords and not Morley herself. Both of them were being very cordial as we shared a drink – water for me, that tricky little oath – but they were also quite bad at hiding how surprised they were I'd reached Hedges so quickly.

Seven days through Arcadia, and my twenty thousand strong Army of Callow began marching out into the pastures to the south of the city. The Observatory had confirmed that the crusaders were only starting to come out on the Callowan side of the passage through the Whitecaps. Slower than expected, but then our estimates had been based on Legion marching speeds. Revised downwards, of course, but apparently not quite enough. There'd been some alarm when we popped out of the woodworks, but I'd been one of the first out the fairy gate and to be blunt if we'd meant to take Hedges there wasn't shit either of them could have done about it. The city was more of a glorified town, and its defences were laughable. The curtain wall was a short and worn-down compared to almost every other city in Callow, since the north had never really faced the threat of Praesi invasions. Their enemies had been each other, which involved more cattle-theft than sieges even in the old days before unification, and on rare occasion Daoine. The Deoraithe were not prone to expansion, but before they were brought into the fold by Eleanor Fairfax they'd not been above the occasional raid or punitive expedition to express displeasure at the royal family in Laure.

"I'm impressed by how quickly you got your people out, Baroness," I told Morley. "And how thoroughly."

There was a slight tinge of discomfort in their eyes at the reminder that I knew exactly what was going on in their lands and they had no real idea how. Darlington cleared his throat.

"Perhaps prematurely, Your Majesty, if you'll forgive my saying so. It seems to me it might have been possible to contest Harrow."

I took that more as an indication that he'd rather pitched battles not take place at even the outskirts of his lands than sympathy for Morley, but then he'd gotten on my nerves often enough I wasn't inclined to think well of him. I sipped at my cup.

"They've moved slower than anticipated," I conceded. "There are, however, concerns you might not be considering. Do you both know what a Hell Egg is?"

Morley paled but Darlington was unmoved.

"Some Praesi devilry, no doubt," he said.

"It's true then," Baroness Ainsley said quietly. "The Lost Standard, it actually exists?"

"I have it on good authority it's in the lands around Harrow," I told her. "But my attempts to locate it have been fruitless for now."

Darlington was lost, and by the look on his face that was not a state of affairs he was willing to tolerate for long.

"And what Wasteland tale is this?" he said. "I did not take you for a superstitious sort, Your Majesty."

"Considering the Diabolist used one of those very standards against me at Marchford, superstition is perhaps the wrong term," I very mildly said.

It was rather delightful to watch it sink in. It was a well-told tale what I'd faced in the defence of what was now my personal holding.

"There's a demon in the north?" he hissed.

"My father told me that Triumphant left old madness behind her, when I was a child," Morley said. "I thought it a legend, but are these not times where old stories breathe again?"

"I won't fight heroes on grounds where releasing a demon is a risk," I told them frankly. "The moment the crusaders forged a beachhead near Harrow, it became indefensible. I'm sorry for what that puts your people through, Baroness, but--"

The woman shook her head.

"No, Your Majesty," she said. "Nothing was lost but pride and coin. If anything, I must thank you sincerely for your prudence. I would rather see my coffers emptied than my people..."

She trailed off, and I didn't finish that sentence for her. Where demons were concerned, the least said was always the better.

"They're my people too," I said quietly. "I would rather not fight this war at all, but diplomatic resolution has been refused."

"Procer," Morley said feelingly.

And though I suspected Darlington wished me dead at least once a day, even his lip curled in distaste at the mention of the Principate. We did like our grudges, us Callowans, and Procer had earned more than a few. That passing moment of common feeling did nothing to blind me to the very real possibility that one or both of these two would try to sell me down the river before the month was out.

"I would offer my men for the battle, Your Majesty," Morley finally said.

"It'd be a pleasure to fold your horse under the Broken Bells," I told her. "I'll send Grandmaster Talbot your way. But if you mean to send foot as well, I'll need Legion officers overseeing. Marshal Juniper will not agree otherwise."

The latter was a little sketchy, under current Callowan law, but Juniper was the highest officer in the Army of Callow and theoretically had the same broad authority that the Shining Princes and ruling Fairfaxes had once held in war time. This particular request, though, had consistently seen me stonewalled by the same two nobles in front of me. Even after amending the request to having observing Legion officers it had remained a sticking point. Baroness Kendall had argued the matter wasn't worth forcing, given the limited amount of men these two could bring, and she'd had a point. Better not to have them at all than have them only as unreliable addition.

"That will not be an issue," Baroness Ainsley grimly said.

Some of my surprise must have shown on my face, because she offered a rueful smile.

"Morleys have held Harrow for three hundred years, Your Majesty," she said. "I will not surrender my lands to some prancing Proceran shit without a fight."

"We'll be glad to have you," I said.

That'd been... unexpected. And, though I'd like to think better of her, was enough of a change it raised my suspicions. Still, it wouldn't do to look a gift horse in the mouth too openly.

"They sent an envoy," Morley suddenly said.

My eyes sharpened as I studied her. She looked embarrassed but determined.

"The Procerans, they sent an envoy," she said. "To offer terms."

Baron Darlington had gone very, very still. I drank a mouthful of water then calmly set down the cup.

"Good ones, I hope?"

She snorted.

"I would be allowed to keep my lands," she said. "A marriage to one of our bettors would be arranged for one of my children as well. They wanted Henrietta, which was rather telling. They're more interested in us taking their names than the other way around."

"Let me guess," I drawled. "You were to join with the army and pass information. Maybe change sides halfway through a battle?"

"They were slightly more circumspect," the baroness said. "But the implications ran along those lines. They... it was a way to weather the storm, Your Majesty."

I watched her closely. She'd not agreed, no. She wouldn't have spoken up otherwise. But she'd not chased them out either. I'd already known that, but I was surprised she was willing to share. You dislike me, I thought. We both know that. But in the end for all that you see me an evil I am Callowan evil and that still matters, doesn't it?

"Treason," Darlington said thickly. "How horrid. It is mother's milk to the men of Procer, we have always known this."

"I do not hang women for entertaining envoys," I softly said. "And would rather have honest, open opposition than a snake in the grass. Hasenbach will make offers again. She needs to, because she knows it is madness to try to hold Callow by force while warring with the Wasteland. But make no mistake, she needs to hold Callow. And we all know Procer does not easily relinquish lands it takes."

Morley nodded slowly. She was not a handsome woman, and the stark relief on her face did her no favours.

"My duties prevent me from lingering," I told them, and slowly rose to my feet. "Baron Darlington, an officer from the general staff will seek audience to discuss our supply lines."

"They will find me a welcoming host, Your Majesty," the man said, rising to his feet as well.

I nodded at Morley, then paused. I looked into Darlington's eyes.

"A redheaded man," I stated, "with a Liessen accent. He stayed two days."

The man's face went bloodless.

"Always assume I know," I gently said.

I left only utter silence in my wake.

—

I'd decided, when first stumbling upon this particular wall, that it was too low to be meant as a defence. And too far from the city besides, though the low hill overlooking the outskirts of Hedges would have been good grounds to raise a guard tower. Most likely it'd been used to keep cattle penned in, though by the looks of it years had passed since it'd last fulfilled that purpose. With the cool evening breeze and the view, it made a pleasant enough place to sit as I awaited the people I'd sent for. This was my first visit this far up north, and to be honest the entire region seemed rather bare to me. Green and brown fields made muddy by the melting snows spread as far as the eye could see, touched by only sparse thickets of trees and the occasional low slope. Hedges itself was a far cry from the large cities of the south. Larger than Dormer in overall size, perhaps, but most that space was empty and the city itself was visibly poorer. No paved streets, here, only mud tracks. And fewer stone houses than any other Callowan city I'd seen, most of them wooden structures with straw rooftops. Aside from the run-down curtain wall that sloppily circled outer Hedges, there were no real fortifications to speak of. Even the baron's keep was only a glorified hill with towers and a hall.

I puffed at my pipe and blew the smoke into the wind, watching twilight catch up to the Army of Callow encamped behind me. Cooking fires were already lit and the tents raised, a series of palisades preparing the soldiers for an attack unlikely to come this early. Juniper had insisted on full fortifications, though privately she'd told me it was more to drill the men in the raising of them than out of true worry got an enemy strike. A plume of wakeleaf streamed further and further away until it thinned out of existence, and I felt a smile quirk my lips. I'd have to give him this, even if my senses had only grown sharper he was still giving it a worthy effort.

"The mud gives you away," I said. "Should have tried it without boots."

"I have very delicate feet, Your Majestic Queenship," Special Tribune Robber cheerfully lied, rising from his crouched position beneath the hill's angled slope.

I hid the spasm of grief that passed through me when I looked at him. Robber was fifteen, now. Most goblins didn't make it past thirty-five, and past thirty they began to swiftly go decrepit. I'd always known at as a villain, if I didn't get killed, I'd likely outlive most my closest friends in the Fifteenth. Looking at the thickening eyebrow ridges and the fresh wrinkles around his mouth, I was imposed a fresh reminder that the goblins among my companions would be the first to go. Pickler wasn't showing either of those marks, but then she was from a matron line. Those were supposed to be almost a breed apart. I waited until he was plopped at my side, swinging his legs like a greenish murderous child, to reply.

"You know, lying to your monarch is technically treason," I informed him.

"I heard if you commit it enough time it cancels out," Robber mused. "I should probably keep doing it, just to be on the safe side."

"That's the kind of talk that'll get busted back to Lesser Lesser Footrest," I said, eyebrow quirking.

"Oh come on," he whined. "Where am I going to find another sworn enemy's father to murder?"

"Well, if anyone can it's going to be you," I snorted.

I inhaled the smoke as he remained silent, though never still. It was something I'd learned to notice about goblins: they always seemed to be moving, even if only slightly. Like they were afraid they'd drop dead if they stopped.

"We're about to start having informational issues," I finally told him. "Too many priests and heroes with the Procerans, and that'll screw with scrying. Even the Observatory's."

He grinned, wide and vicious.

"Are we still pretending that thing's just a pretty bunch of scrying pools?" he asked. "'cause the Catherine Foundling I know doesn't shell out that much gold for anything she can't swing at an enemy."

I smiled thinly but did not reply. The little discovery Masego had made that he called absolute positioning was potentially one of the nastiest tricks up my sleeve, but it was one I intended to sit on as long as possible. The moment I used it I would grow sharply as a threat in everyone's eyes. I couldn't afford that, not until I had all my pieces in place.

"We can narrow down their positions with the negatives," I said. "But we can't go in with sparse eyes against an army that large. How are the mages we assigned you?"

"They're coming along nicely," Robber said. "They don't even scream anymore when they wake up with a knife to the throat in the middle of the night."

"Don't break my mages, Robber," I sighed. "You know we don't have any to spare."

"You do me grave injustice," he mourned. "I'm teaching them important life lessons, like 'crying never helps' and 'sleeping deep is sleeping dead'."

"You're not getting new ones if you screw these ones up," I warned him. "There's nothing left from the Hedge Guild to draft."

"It's my Gods-given duty to educate tender-hearted Callowans like them," he righteously told me. "Speaking of, I heard this thing about northerners. Is it true they-"

"Every single joke about northerners and sheep has also been made about goblins and goats," I warned him.

"Calumny," he protested. "That hardly ever happens unless the goat is shaved and painted green."

I rolled my eyes.

"All right, if you're comfortable enough fucking around then they won't be an issue," I said. "Juniper will put scouts on the field, but I want a set of eyes deep behind enemy lines. You've just volunteered for that duty."

"I am the most dutiful goblin ever born," Robber agreed, clearly pleased. "Tell me we're not just skulking, though. It's been a while since my people stabbed anything, they're getting restless."

"I'm keeping you as a dagger," I said. "That means low profile until I use you."

He blew his tongue at me, which was mildly unsettling considering it was pitch black.

"Boo," he said. "Boo Catherine boo."

"Have Captain Borer write you up for insolence," I ordered. "The exceedingly well-documented fact that you are a filthy wretch aside, we both know sending you to roam when there's a crew of heroes on the loose is like feeding a wolf meat scraps."

"They can't kill us if they don't fight us," he shrugged.

"I thought you'd say that," I grunted. "But I have worries, and Juniper shares them. So we're assigning you a partner."

"Tell me it's Larat," he begged. "The man is like a goblin that was fed particularly violent rocks."

Wait, could goblins actually eat – no, Catherine, never go down the Robber rabbit hole. There are no answers at the bottom, only headaches and befuddlement.

"No," I replied. "She's actually coming up right now."

Yellow eyes flicked downhill and then I was given the opportunity to delight in the vicious little bastard actually looking uneasy.

"Gods no," he said. "That's sadistic even for you, Queenie."

"Evening Cat," Archer grinned. "And you too, Robert."

"You know that's not my name," the goblin hissed.

"I'm very sorry, Bobber," Indrani said. "I swear."

"You can't send her with us," Robber said. "She bit off Akua's head!"

I blinked.

"She did what now?" I warily asked.

Robber looked shifty, which considering he could skulk in broad daylight without trying was an almost miraculous achievement.

"I'm not saying it happened, but it's possible a betting ring technically illegal under Legions regs just spontaneously emerged," he said.

"Akua was a scorpion," Archer cheerfully informed me.

"Not just a scorpion, you brute, she was a purebred Wasteland Rattler," the goblin insisted. "And her full name was Akua Sahedon't."

"You bit off a scorpion's head," I enunciated slowly, looking at Indrani.

She shrugged.

"The Lady always said it's important to establish the pecking order early in a relationship," she replied. "Wouldn't you agree, Borer?"

"That's someone else," Robber muttered peevishly. "And I had a month's pay riding on Akua killing Willie Angels."

So my sappers were importing no doubt massively oversized Wasteland scorpions, naming them after old opponents of mine and pitting them in death fights. I truly wished I could say that was the worst thing I'd ever caught them doing, but this was a bad time to start lying to myself.

"I'm going to pretend I never heard this," I decided out loud. "Mostly because, well, Hakram's not around and I'm sure as Hells not filing a report about giant scorpions if I can avoid it. As your beloved queen, I order you to pretend to get along when I'm within hearing range. There, I fixed it."

"I love it when she gets all authoritative," Archer told the goblin.

"I hope you also enjoy scorpions in your bedding," he whispered back at her. "Akua had babies, before you callously murdered her."

"See, he's already offering me snacks," Indrani smiled. "Herbert and I are great friends, Catherine. Just the best."

I closed my eyes and wished very hard they would disappear, but when I opened them they were obstinately still there. One of these days, that was going to work and they were all going to be sorry.

"Robber, get your people ready," I ordered. "You're leaving in half a bell. Archer..."

"No need, I've already prepared supplies," Indrani replied, hoisting up what was quite clearly a wineskin full of – by the smell of it – hard liquor.

"Just don't forget your bow," I sighed.

Gods go with them, though hopefully not the ones Above. The kind of work I had in mind for these two would be frowned upon, upstairs.

---

Cap'n Smurfy

Just how big are these giant scorpions? Are we talking cat sized, dog or small horses here?

Rook

I read cat sized as Catherine sized and I'm now having trouble getting the image of a caped scorpion out of my head

sheer_falacy

Archer was able to bite one's head off, which places an upper limit on the size – probably smaller than cat sized unless her Name comes with the ability to unhinge her jaw. Which seems unlikely but not impossible.

TeK

Your estimation hinges on expected size of object Archer can put in her throat, and I think you are doing her a disservice, even if she was out of commition for a year.

Fern

well then, thanks for that image

Cap'n Smurfy

Yeah but scorpions don't have the largest heads relative to their body size. Did she just bite off the front of the head, did it take more than one bite, was named bullshit involved? Given that goblins were able to handle them I suppose they're probably not much bigger than dogs, but they're described as "massively oversized" not just as big arachnids.

Mental Mouse

> probably not much bigger than dogs,

I always wince when someone uses dogs for a size comparison: Dogs range from teacup breeds that can sit on your hand, up to Russian wolfhounds and bear-dogs that are bigger than most humans. (And Guideverse offers wolves big enough to carry orcs on their back.)

Anyway, from a quick glance at WP, the largest scorpion species of our world(*) runs about 9 inches/23 cm long, but only weighs at most 2 ounces (56 grams). But given we're talking about the Wasteland of Praes, the better question might be what size scorpions the goblins can hide from nosy officers. 😊 Also, the goblins themselves stand under four feet, so small enough for them to handle easily.

Something about twice the length of the real-world max, perhaps a foot and a half overall, might be about the bulk of a one-pound lobster with extra tail (but half that weight). That could be kept in a big basket, but maybe a bit too big for discretion. A foot-long would be more easily concealed, and plenty big enough for goblin games.

The "more serious" (not very) issue is that scorpions don't have a separate head, but I'm sure Archer could bite off the front of the cephalothorax, while ignoring the claws pinching her ears. 😊

(*) That's Heterometrus swammerdami, a "giant forest scorpion" from India and thereabouts. It's noted as having relatively weak venom, probably because they're big enough to actually hurt things with their claws.

Joel

On occasion, this is one of the funniest things I read. And this chapter was just glorious.

boballab

When you have Robber, you have a funny chapter.

Theoretically_human

but when you have fan favorite Robber in a snark-off with Archer is extra funny

DroughtBringer

Great chapter, as always!

Thought: it seems like the cities of Callow are more healthy, and rich the more they've been invaded, almost. Up here in the North, there has been little cause for Named to show up, and, thusly, little cause for civilization to spring up around it. The more trials and pains that someone goes through, in this world, end up making you stronger and richer... which is interesting the way it plays out.

Also, go vote everyone! Ward got a chapter released and we stayed on top! Let's keep it that way! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

ALKATYN

I think the causation is the other way round, the north is barren and isolated so no-one invades it

Dainpdf

If you're not deeply involved in the Narrative, the world just forgets you and leaves you behind.

kelioez

That's an interesting take on the issue, that fate even abandons cities and countries, y'know, this might even be y the gnomes do that red letter, so that they remain *relevant* to the gods

Cap'n Smurfy

I think the best thing about this chapter was learning Dread Emperor Irritant's plan of having eight different heroic bands after his head was successful.

narcoduck

It explains First Liesse quite well. Instead of Akua or William having a 100% chance of beating her in the end, they both got 50%. And they both rolled bad lol.

Letouriste

I would not compare akua to a full band of heroes^^

TeK

Why not? Same principle works: the band of heroes always win, which means every hero has about 20% chance of winning. Five hero bands, and now it's only 4%. Then you engage them one by one, always careful not to kill almost everyone, maintaining your opposition plentiful, so to make the story not about whether heroes will win (which they will), but rather about who will do it. Can be turned into perpetual cycle, where you kill a half, they turn mentors, teach new generation, and you got something like horse races, with teams Heart and team Lancer. You can even have a betting pool.

Taichi22

I find this remarkably relevant to the current situation, actually.

Cat's got a lot of people after her head, maybe this is why she's gonna beat them all...

Euodiachloris

Heck, get to know the long-termers well enough, and you can sell action figures. xD

Cap'n Smurfy

That was a rule of three event not two hero bands though. Both William and Akua had a third battle with Catherine and there was three of them involved.

Forrest

I'm pretty sure at that point William's rule of three had already been completed, and Akua's rule of three got diminished due to his and also that other goblin's rules of three coming in just before hers at basically the same time. Since Creation cared little for the repeat.

---

Given the "multiple contributors" mentioned, I'd guess he escaped rather than straight up won.

Shequi

TV Tropes calls it the law of conservation of ninjutsu.

James, Mostly Harmless

<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/ConservationOfNinjutsu>

danh3107

That was some very deserved levity.

Stormblessed

Robber remains the best side supporting character (I meant supporting in a way that the Woe wouldn't be considered here)

More interesting though is Morley. I like her. A lot actually. The fact she understands the importance of 'don't fuck with Demons' raises my estimation of her immediately. Of course, also using a reasoning of her people doesn't hurt either. And she told Catherine the truth about the emissary which is cool.

This just means she's going to stab my heart later either by betraying Catherine or dying.

Taichi22

Literally.

A reasonable lord? No, no way. There's a small chance of her becoming one of Cat's aides, or perhaps stepping up to Anne Kendall's post, but more likely she's a red herring.

ritvik jha

Mr.David Verburg aka erraticerrata I would like to garner your attention through this comment cause I was not able to find any other means of communication to contact you .

I am a law student pursuing a BA LLB and have written some articles in local news papers and magazines as a freelancer.

I have been reading your web fiction a practical guide to evil from quiet some time I just wanted to inform you that i am quiet interested in adding more detail to the lore of your web fictions like i.e the average life of a citizen in pares,life of a noble in callow or details about the administration of Procer.

This would need your approval as you are the owner of the original work as I might be adding details to the original material or creating some new details in the existing.

If approved I would like to guarantee you that the details and additional lore would never move away or obstruct the cannon that you produce this might even lead a few short stories i.e like the accounts of a paresi soldier during the doom of lessie and spin offs.

I am ready to do this free of cost or at a token fee (if u like to give it to me totally upon you) everything I write will be first sent to you for approval first so I will in no way obstruct your work.

please contact me through the email ritvikjha1@gmail.com.

this is for a second time a ues or no will do sir

Bookworm

I hope you take this as constructive criticism instead of an attack. If you were serious in your desire to receive the author's permission to add content under your own pen, one of the things which you should have considered was following the grammatical rules in your request. There are many errors in your writing, and in this context, is the equivalent to going to an interview in sweatpants and an unwashed T-shirt. It is actually worse because your presentation ties directly into the skill set you are trying to highlight for this "job", i.e. you have shown that you cannot write to the proper standard required by your request (which is not a reflection of your ideas which may very well be excellent).

I will not reply to any comments you make to this comment because I was just saying this as constructive criticism, not a way to actually engage. Please take it as such, and I wish you the best of luck in your future endeavors.

Halinn

Given this example of your language skills, I personally would rather you didn't.

Sable

Dude. David verburg is a sprinter, are you stupid? That's obviously not the author. Furthermore if it was why would you address an author gonna by by a moniker with his real name? Are you so daft?

Barthumphries

Not the person you're responding to, just wanted to point out that there's nothing inherently wrong with a sprinter also being an author. 😊

Antoninjohn

Cat can take life energy from victims, could she give it to Robber to grant him some more years

Snowfire1224

So are the gaint scorpions relatives of the gains sewer spiders?

Also I've been thinking about Black and stories. Mentor and student come at odds with each other. Usually student kills mentor or mentor kills student. Because this is Cat lost trust in black, and not the other way around, it would normally be student kills mentor. Except she didn't. Now the story goes in a different direction— either the student kills the mentor later on, or Mentor redeems themselves and dies saving the student and tells them they were right in their final breath. Sounds like a hero thing to do, but I could see it being possible. At this point this is all just speculation.

Seabornia

Herbert! Long live the Queen of Escalation, for she has returned in the deadliest of forms!

Nguyen Hong Hai

No "R" in the middle you filthy heathen!

Seabornia

I thought it was a hidden reference( never knew there was such a name as Herbert

Flameburst

It's originally a german name, but can of course be found with descendants of immigrants or among the populace of typical immigrant nations like the US

John Galt

Last name of main character in Worm, I believe. Also name of pet rock from Heretical Edge.

maresther23

And it was mentioned after a discussion about giant scorpions

Notimpressed

That sounds like a terrible erotic 40k fanfic

James, Mostly Harmless

Herbert Hoover, George Herbert Walker Bush, Herbie the Love Bug, ...

Jonnnney

Seabornia?

Barthumphries

That's also an old LOTRO reference, when the Warden class first came out, one of the first and greatest players wrote up a forum post heralding "Wadens" and it became a meme there that a person would lose their "R" when they became truly great.

Morgenstern

"Herbert" is a perfectly fine German first name 🤔

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

I guess Indrani's bite is worse than her bark.

Drd

Gotta love our favourite lil psychopath... and then there's robber.
:]

Flameburst

Man i wish Herbert knew the Ubua story

Antony444

Robber, Archer, giant scorpions, illegal bets...the poor heroes don't stand a chance, Catherine.

TeK

This is why I'm reading this web novel. While plot and characters are engaging as well, the petty banter between the likes of Parcher and Berber is where practical guide shines most.

nipi

Typo:

"The kind if work"

stevenneiman

"The curtain wall was [a] short and worn-down compared to almost every other city in Callow"

"I heard if you commit it enough {time->times} it cancels out"

Big Brother

Steve, that first sentence was grammatically correct, since it's a comparison of that specific wall compared to others around Callow. No [a] is needed for it.

Barthumphries

Yes, delete the "a" there.

Barthumphries

And to add to this typo chain:

The exceedingly well-documented fact that you are a filthy wretch aside,
Change document to documented

shieldredblog

Anyone got any guesses what Absolute Positioning is?
Just being a way to open Fae Doors anywhere seems under powered.

---

The last time positioning was mentioned in regards to magic was Masego telling in chapter 48 of book three that imprecision would make a ritual backfire, I'd go out on a limb and say that he's now got his own Greenwich meridian and can now cast long-distance rituals in an area he has mapped out. Maybe even use it in conjunction with the distance-diminishing effect of his eyes.

stevenneiman

I'm pretty sure it's either that or the ability to precisely target some other kind of magic that's very hard to target at range otherwise. I would guess that it allows her to punch through scrying guards, but we've already seen that she can't.

BarthHumphries

Well, if you put a big enough magical punch under something, you can launch it into the air. And then once it's falling, it's simply falling. True, a magical shield could block/move/whatever this falling object, but if the falling thing were able to eat magic...

I'm betting they'll have set up a magical "goblin fire launching" system. Precisely deliver burning goblin fire munitions to anywhere they want...

Mental Mouse

Using magic to throw around goblinfire might be a bad idea.
We already know those munitions react to power...

Fang

Gods i hope Robin gets Named and lives forever as Lesser Lesser Lesser Footrest to the Black Queen, it will be a sad day when hes no longer there to laugh maniacally at Cat's mad plans

grzecho2222

But what Name? I'm torn between next Black Knight (if Amadeus will no longer be Black Knight) or Evil bardic Name (he seems to author of XV's songs)

Notimpressed

Lesser Lesser Footrest of course! That Name was bestowed upon him by the Black Queen herself!

RanVor

Irritant having a law of narrative physics named after him was the funniest thing I've recently read.

Or so I thought until I read the scene with Indrani and Herbert. That's his official name from now on, by the way.

Warriormonk

Didn't... what's her name, one of the old goblin matron generals, live to an old old age because Black found a way to keep her alive? Through sorcery/black magic shenanigans or what not.

Perhaps Cat will find a way to keep Robber in her services forever, unfortunately for her.

Adurna

Was that not also in combination with a matron line keeping her vital?

Jordan

Good chapter for my bday. Probably one of the best yet.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Hilarious chapter! "Have Captain Borer write you up for insolence." That's just good management right there: always delegate tasks to subordinates whenever possible.

Russel Pratt

Cat, your friends will never die if you turn them into Fae.

grzecho2222

Or undead monsters, or eldritch horrors, or leaders of global goblin revolution...

Engineer

Well Robert just planted his own death flag. Kudos. Ye will be sorely missed, you skulking little homicidal bastard you 😊

Rey d`Tutto

Nope... He's comedic relief.

lehteyatamug

The part where Robber and his cohorts started a scorpion illegal betting ring, is that a homage to Hedge (malazan book of the fallen)and his squad and their scorpions? (I forgot their names xD)??? OwO Sappers are all crazy!! But FUN!!!

cheerlessmirth

I feel like Cat letting him (and, in all honesty, them) know that she knows about the envoy is a bad idea. You can scare some people into never stepping out of line, but there will be those that keep trying to find ways around it until someone eventually succeeds.

If they didn't know they're spied on, they wouldn't think of extra countermeasures, but now they have the incentive.

vuthuha912

If a Praesi were offered this, they would have agreed already or pretend to agree but trying to play both sides then ultimately sealing their demise with it or getting it to work. Whatever the outcome, everyone is fucked.

It is a miracle Malicia and Black was able to reign these people in for as long as they did.

Cat is treating the situation with the gravity that it deserves, unlike every other person in this conflict aside from maybe ... Black and everyone else who is not directly benefiting from this ordeal.

Whatever the reason, the civil wars were as much Procer fault as Praes's fault. They are not holding your family hostage and forcing you to commit treason. You are doing it on your own. This is Procer's problem right there. Committing treason can be forgiven as long as you are a Prince while doing your patriotic duties gets you killed for being a peasant.

---

Chapter 7: Snares

"Petty thieves hang, the great wear crowns."
– Proceran saying

"We're being baited," Juniper announced.

We'd cut loose the general staff for this particular meeting, at my insistence. The Arcadian Campaign had taught me that while the broader officer councils had their uses they also devoured time and focus that would be better spent on other matters. The Hellhound was my Marshal of Callow now, she had the clout to run those however she liked without my being at the table to back her up. There were advantages to formal rank and not leading an awkward coalition I had only nominal authority over. Only the bare bones of a council were in attendance, the people that would have direct relevance, and that meant three aside from me: Juniper herself, Thief and Grandmaster Talbot. I preferred to cut that latter out of these little evenings when it came to politics, but on campaign was a different beast. I could not have the head of my horse ignorant of the larger realities at work.

"That's the theory, anyway," Thief hedged. "There's a few unprovable assumptions at work."

"May I assume we are speaking of the Proceran vanguard?" Brandon Talbot asked.

"We are," I confirmed. "The report you haven't gotten to read yet states that, as of midmorning, five thousand Proceran horse has invested Harrow."

The Grandmaster's eyes narrowed. We'd given ground to the crusaders knowing they would take or pass through the city on their way south, but Talbot was a clever sort. He'd noticed, as the rest of us had, what the reports didn't mention. Which was anything but a detachment of horse sent far ahead of the still-lumbering Proceran army.

"The Jacks could not get into the city itself, mind you," Vivienne said. "But I had knots of people out in the country and they say the riders came alone. The crusader army is at least two days behind."

Talbot smiled ruefully.

"Five thousand light horse," he said. "We have number parity with the Order, and the strength of the Woe and the Hunt besides. Should we play it carefully, we could wipe out a significant part of their cavalry before it comes to a pitched battle."

"We're being baited," Juniper repeated.

"Too good to be true, isn't?" I agreed darkly. "I think we need to reassess how much of a threat Princess Malanza actually is. I didn't expect that kind of sophistication from a Proceran commander, given the nature of the trap."

The Principate was famous for rarely fielding Named, unlike Praes and Callow who usually had at least a handful on each side when the blades came out. And while it was an assumption, like Thief had reminded us, I was willing to put hand to flame that if we gated into Harrow we'd be walking straight into a carefully arranged heroic kill zone.

"Assuming this is her notion," Talbot frowned.

"It's not Milenan," I said. "We know exactly what he's up to, as it happens."

The Grandmaster raised an inquisitive eyebrow, though he knew better than to request information he might not be cleared to know. I cast a look at Vivienne and nodded.

"Prince Amadis Milenan had a previously unknown agent within Hedges," she said. "We know that now, because this morning the woman attempted to discretely get in touch with Baron Darlington."

Talbot grit his teeth.

"He always did fancy himself ruler of the north," the aristocrat unkindly said.

"We allowed it to happen," Thief said. "While watching, of course, but we wanted to know exactly what he was after."

"Land," I bluntly said. "Land is what he's after, as it turns out. Prince Milenan is already gathering support for the divvying up of Callow, and he seems to believe Darlington is the key to the north."

"The man's making a lot of promises, for someone without a field victory to his name," Juniper growled.

Brandon Talbot, for all that his meddling got on my nerves, was not slow-witted. He understood what we were driving at without need for an explicit statement.

"Darlington's been promised the north as his own principality under the First Prince," he deduced, visibly appalled.

"Mostly right," Vivienne said. "There's a prior change of throne involved in that promise coming true. Amadis is a little more openly ambitious than we'd previously assumed."

And he was gathering allies for his bid. I'd let Talbot into the loop for the Darlington play, but for now there was no need to tell him that Prince Milenan was also sending men towards the Silver Lake as quickly as they could ride. The Observatory had picked them out two days ago, and I agreed with Thief's assessment of their ultimate destination: Daoine. The crusaders were trying to get Duchess Kegan on their side before moving south. I could see why he'd assume there was room to negotiate there: the last time Callow had come under Proceran occupation, the Duchy of Daoine had remained out of the fray in exchange for concessions and effective independence. They'd even fielded armies alongside Procer's, when the Empire began the Sixty Years War by trying to invade occupied Callow. Both Praes and the Old Kingdom had come out of that ruinous war on the brink of collapse, but Daoine had gotten off light. It always did. House Ismail had a well-earned reputation for knowing when to strike its banners and cut its losses. Unfortunately for Milenan, I'd cut a deal there long before he'd thought of opening negotiations.

"Regardless of all that, I think we can safely discard the possibility that the crusaders don't know about the fairy gates and the Hunt," I said. "The trap doesn't work otherwise."

Without cutting through Arcadia, it would take my men weeks to get close enough to Harrow for a battle. Long after the rest of the crusader army caught up to the vanguard.

"And that puts a lot of their behaviour up until now in question," Juniper grunted. "I'm having a hard time reconciling a general clever enough for this kind of snare and one who'd willingly take her army through a bottleneck – especially one she knows we might have been able to seize the end of."

To be frank, trying to hold a narrow pass against a company of heroes would have been godsdamned ugly work. But I had the Named and the trump cards to be able to make a solid try at it, and if we did manage to hold then the entire invasion plan collapsed. Which meant, most likely, that we'd missed something.

"If this trap is not Malanza's own notion," Talbot tried. "Then your estimation of her competence might be..."

"Believe me," I interrupted quietly. "I'd love to have an idiot in charge on the other side. But that's genuinely not feasible, not with Hasenbach running the show in Procer. She doesn't want this army to do too well, but she's still banking on a victory. That means whoever holds the reins of the soldiers knows what they're doing."

"Without alleging incompetence, the information they're using might be imperfect," Thief said. "There's not a lot of reliable witnesses outside our most loyal for how quickly we can move through gates. She might have been under the impression that even by Arcadia you wouldn't be able to arrive in time to hold the pass."

"If we're lucky, that's the case," Juniper said.

"If we're not – and let's be honest, when have we been that lucky? – I think we have to proceed under the assumption that they're sitting on something that would have blown us away at the pass," I said.

"Proceran sorcery is nothing like the Wasteland's," Talbot said.

"Sorcery is the least of our troubles," I said. "This is a crusade. The Choirs aren't shy about stacking the deck even when it's just skirmishes between Named. For something of this magnitude they'll have taken out the good silver."

That saw grim looks bloom across the table, with good reason. No one had forgotten the kind of threat the Lone Swordsman had been able to cause in Liesse with just a few days and a single angelic feather. And Masego tells me Contrition isn't exactly head of the pack when it comes to the Choirs, I thought. If Judgement or Mercy gets involved, this will be a whole lot nastier.

"It goes without saying we have to reassess a lot of our engagement doctrine," Juniper announced bluntly. "Which is why I think we need to dust off Headsman."

"It's not going to look good abroad if we pull the trigger on that," I grimaced.

"I made it clear when we killed the plan that I considered it a measured and reasonable response," Talbot noted. "The Dread Empire has signed no treaties barring the targeting of officers, and while the Principate has they've never enforced the terms unless it suited them."

"If we want a seat at the table by the end of this, people, we can't act like Praes," I reminded them. "There's a reason we didn't spend the last year scrabbling for every destructive artefact and ritual we could get our hands on. We start using shit like the Dark Days protocols and the only peace we're getting is after one side has been pounded into dust."

"No one's dumping alchemy into rivers," the Hellhound said. "We're talking two hundred dead at most, including projected collaterals."

"We made those projections before we knew how many heroes there'd be on the other side," I pointed out. "I'm not refusing out of hand, Juniper, but if we start using assassination campaigns then we get a reputation that might cost us more in the long term than we gain in the short term."

"If you have another way to shake them before battle, I'm listening," she said. "Look, I don't give a damn about the politics of this. I'll own that. But I think the hole we fall in if we lose is a lot deeper than the one we dig with Headsman."

She wasn't wrong about that, even if I didn't like it. Hasenbach would have absolutely no interest in negotiating the kind of peace I was after if she had me on the ropes.

"Talk with Kegan," I finally said. "She was never eager, and it's not a given she'll still be willing. There's risks involved for her people. If she agrees, though, start laying the groundwork. But we're not going through with it until I give the word."

"Chances of success improve significantly if we don't wait," Thief said, tone mild. "Especially given the amount of heroes they've got floating around."

"It also kills every other option than pitched battle to get the crusaders out of Callow," I flatly replied. "I'm not committing to that unless I have no other choice."

"As you say," Vivienne shrugged. "That still leaves our little problem in Harrow."

"I realize we're dealing with a trap," Talbot said. "That said, Your Majesty, if we don't thin their horse soon we're going to have trouble."

I raised an eyebrow at Juniper in silent invitation.

"He's right," she admitted. "If Malanza moves against us with the meat of her host and peels off a few thousand horsemen just before, the only assets we have to check them are assets we're going to need in that battle."

"What kind of damage are we looking at?" I grimaced.

"If Darlington flips, or even just stays out of the way, they've got free rein until Southpool," the Hellhound said. "If they move quick enough, they could possibly hit central Callow before Adjutant manages to force a battle. Our forces just aren't deployed to block raiding parties coming from up north. Even if I pull the garrison from Vale tonight, there's no guarantee it'll get there in time."

"We have watchers on Darlington," I told her. "He's not changing sides anytime soon."

"I understand we are worrying about the devastation the riders could cause in the countryside," Talbot said slowly. "Yet it occurs to me there is another possible target for a detachment. The Red Flower Vales."

I almost dismissed him out of hand. A few thousand horse wasn't going to worry Black in the slightest, considering the kind of forces he had at hand. On the other hand, what if they didn't fight Black?

"The supply lines," I said.

"It would be risky," the Grandmaster said. "Hostile territory, and they'll be within our scrying net – though they might not know about that yet, at least not for certain. But the Carrion Lord is already heavily outnumbered, Your Majesty. Can he afford to detach the men to keep his supply lines clear?"

"He's been stacking food, munitions and steel for almost a year now," I said, but it was half-hearted.

"We lose the Vales, our entire defence collapses," Juniper said. "We have contingencies in case they lose, Catherine, but none of them involved fighting up here at the same time. None of us saw the passage coming."

Shit. I hadn't thought of that. Which was exactly the point of these councils, I supposed.

"Juniper, I know this is a lot to ask but I need..."

"You need me to get close enough that if this is Malanza's intent she will send off the horse, then avoid battle until you've dealt with the threat," the orc said.

"Is it possible?" I asked.

"You did not appoint me Marshal of Callow because I look good in furs," the Hellhound grinned, slow and savage. "You will have the margin you need."

I'd made a few good decisions, over the years, but none that'd paid off quite as much as offering her that draw back at the War College. I smiled gratefully at her, not that she seemed particularly moved by that gratitude.

"There is one last matter to address," Vivienne said.

I nodded.

"Prince Milenan attempted to arrange a meeting with Baron Darlington through his envoy," I said. "That means I'll be away from the army for a while."

"I don't follow," Talbot frowned.

"He wants to talk to a Callowan?" I smiled thinly. "Well, he's going to get his wish. It's about time we had a closer look at the opposition."

—

It took three weeks for the meeting to become feasible. Three weeks where we watched the crusader host slowly move south, camp at Harrow for a few days and then resuming the march when it became clear my own army wouldn't march to meet it. They were still at least a month of march away from Hedges, at their current pace, but we wouldn't be letting them get that deep into Callow unchallenged. The border between the baronies was the battlefield Juniper had picked, and I'd seen no reason to gainsay her on that. We had scouts out on the green to find us the kind of field that would best play up our advantages, but for now the location was still in the air. It'd been tempting to grab and interrogate Prince Milenan's envoy, for a plethora of reasons. The strongest among them that if Milenan hadn't known about the pass – and we were reasonably sure he hadn't – then he'd sent that envoy months ago and trusted her judgement enough she would have been able to negotiate in his name without being in contact afterwards. Plenipotentiary authority was not something Procerans gave lightly, and she would have been a treasure trove of information. But that would have been giving the game too early, so instead Baron Henry Darlington was given strict instructions and arranged the meeting where and when I wanted it.

He wasn't going himself, of course. The envoy had not requested as much, understanding that with my army camped outside his city his absence would not go unnoticed. Instead he'd sent his nephew, an anointed knight who stood fourth in the line of succession for Hedges and was young enough to be unmarried. The other diplomats were people Thief had gauged we had enough leverage over they wouldn't speak up, including a small escort. Of which I was part, riding a still-living horse for the first time in quite a while. The possibility of heroic presence had meant it was necessary for me to take some additional precautions, but those wouldn't come out of the woodworks unless blades left the scabbard. Hopefully it wouldn't come to that. We were fewer than twenty all in all, and dawn found us out in the wet plains waiting for the other side to arrive. The nephew – Julian Darlington – had insisted we get a fire started for cooking before the Procerans came and I'd declined to speak against it.

I sat on a hollow log I'd dragged by the fire, surrounded by men too visibly scared of me to attempt conversation. I didn't particularly mind, since I was in not in a talkative mood myself. Milenan's envoys arrived half a bell later, riding in on tall steeds. I raised an eyebrow at the Darlington nephew and he hurried to raise the truce banner as we all got to our feet. The anointed knight stood behind a pair of guards but positioned himself clearly as the leader for our side while the Procerans approached. I watched them as discretely as I could. The one in the gilded armour seemed in charge, and from the looks of his nose I could guess why. The Jacks had gotten their hands on a few sketches of Amadis Milenan's likeness, and the resemblance was noticeable. A kinsman, then. The Prince of Iserre was taking this seriously. Most the others were soldiers, with only one woman bearing a scrivener's kit over her back. Only one man wore entirely unadorned clothes, a loose grey robe that seemed almost a priest's garment. I kept my face schooled into mild boredom.

If that wasn't the Grey Pilgrim, I'd eat my hand.

Julian Darlington greeted them warily, and was answered by the man who confirmed himself to be highborn – and a Milenan, too. Likely a cousin or a close branch family. Elaborate courtesies were offered by the Proceran side while the Callowans offered stilted greetings in return. It wasn't long before they got to the meat of the meeting, as I suspected neither of them were comfortable speaking in the open like this. The Proceran envoy and Darlington strode off away from the rest, standing side by side and speaking in low voices. No matter. I could hear them well enough from where I was, back sitting on the log as the soldiers all stood down.

"-the duty of all children of the Heavens to deliver their fellows from the tyranny of the Tower's get, of course. Still, there are practical necessities to be addressed."

"May I?"

The Grey Pilgrim stood before me, hand gesturing at the log.

"By all means," I replied.

Did he know? It shouldn't be the case. I was wearing leathers and mail with a Callowan-forged longsword, nothing out of the ordinary for a retainer. And without drawing on Winter or him actively looking for it, he shouldn't be able to tell I bore a mantle. Assuming he didn't have some sort of trick that allowed him to see through those things, anyway. Something I was less certain of by the moment. The old man gingerly sat at my side, warming his hands by the fire. It was my first time seeing a Levantine, and I had to admit they really did look like the cousins of Taghreb. This one was darker in skin, though, his face tanned and leathery. But the limpid blue eyes were sharp, and for someone as old as he allegedly was he displayed surprising vitality. The few tufts of white hair on his head made a makeshift crown, but his face was either hairless or very closely shaved.

"Nothing quite like a fire on a cool morning, is there?" he sighed.

"One of the little pleasures in life," I agreed.

Or it had been, before Second Liesse. Nowadays neither heat nor cold made much of a difference.

"The truce banner," the Grey Pilgrim said mildly. "Is it genuine?"

My fingers clenched. So much for being unnoticed. And he's distracting me from overhearing what his people are saying to mine. I'd have to let that go, irritating as it was. This was the more important conversion of the two.

"It holds," I said.

"There have been rumours you care little for such arrangements," he noted.

I grimaced. Three Hills, when I'd had the Exiled Prince shot.

"I was younger, then," I said. "And no banner was raised."

He hummed, and did not disagree.

"Then your friends in Arcadia will not be joining us?" he politely asked.

Well, shit. So much for that remaining quiet.

"No unless that is made necessary," I replied.

"It won't," the Grey Pilgrim said, with bedrock certainty. "Shall we have a talk then, Catherine Foundling?"

My eyes narrowed.

"We're about due," I agreed.

---

PingleBerry

And here we go.

NerfContessa

Oh and how we are.

Seeing the future....shall we say "trouble" between these 2 this is extra fun.

Onos

Oh joy, I'd forgotten about you.

PUBLIC SERVICE ANNOUNCEMENT FOR NEW READERS: Try to avoid the comments section going forward, this asshat becomes increasingly fond of dropping spoilers from multiple books ahead and is usually amongst the top comments.

Kai Wingless

Thank you! ♥

Anon

thank you for being an asshat detector

JC

B R U H

Renasma

Holy fuck, shit just hit the fan, looking forward to their talk, so much possibility.

Antoninjohn

It's not evil to burn cities to the ground and kill all the people in the country if it is self defense, after all your action to protect against those who would not accept peace

oldschoolvillain

. . . nope. That's textbook evil in the form of Disproportionate Retribution. The nonevil act would be to defend your borders and hit them hard with truce terms that will keep them pretty economically crippled for a few decades when you've driven them back into their own lands.

Decius

It's not evil to starve the residents of the cities through economic damage while leaving the people who made the decisions in power. As a bonus, the cities are intact when your merchants buy them in a generation.

Rook

I feel the line of capital E – Evil for that type of situation is drawn where you punish a populace for the crimes of their leaders. Practicality aside, there is a vast world of difference between acting directly against your opponents – violently or otherwise – versus harming third parties as a tool to indirectly affect your opponents.

Not to mention, there's way way too much parallel with the kind of methodology Heir and Heiress were using previously to be of any comfort. Genocide by zombification or starvation is still genocide, and it's more than a small line to cross to start appropriating tactics that you previously abhorred so much that the last person to do so had their soul sown into your cloak as punishment.

oldschoolvillain

The point of said economically crippling truce terms would be to make sure that they can't shell out the funds to raise another army before you've had a chance to recover and repair your own country. It's NOT to starve the populace, just make money tight enough that it goes towards things like food instead of soldiers. Even the biggest army can't do anything if it can't eat.

Dainpdf

Just like the Treaty of Versailles. That was the one that worked really well, right?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The thing about economies is that they're kind of important to surviving—let alone living well— in a society. Cripple an economy and you have just personally directly wronged every member of the relevant society. The balance you describe striking is a delicate, tenuous one, and I've very little confidence that anyone could do it reliably.

Decius

You have to make there not be enough food to go around before the army can't afford food.
You have to make there not be enough metal or smiths to go around before the army can't afford swords.
Those things cause poor civilians to starve or be unable to afford plows BEFORE they cause the army to be unable to eat or get swords.

The fact that it's a means and not an end matters to those who need justifications.

Abrakadabra

Bullshit.

Decius

When the fight is between nobles over who will claim the crown, it doesn't make sense for the victor to massacre the serfs of the loser.

When the fight is social and not personal, like "Will the wasteland have a secure food supply or will Callow be independent?", the political goal might involve reducing the civilian population.

Vortex

Where do you think the leaders get their army, food, and weapons? Does it magically fit rain down from the sky? Of course not, it comes from their populace. If you want to punish a leader yet you do not control their populace, another threat will pop out in a few years and come at you again.

nipi

Good and Evil are points of view. The gods points of view. Wonder if the gods in this story have disagreements over what is or isn't good/evil?

Fern

From what I can tell about PGE's morality so far:

Stupid Good is all about being right because you're right. See: Shining Prince, (implied) Good King Edward, William, etc. The /morality/ of your choices doesn't matter so much because you're fighting for the Gods Above, and as long as your fighting Evil it doesn't really matter what ethical lines you cross. Naturally, this also means Stupid Good stands for the status quo. After all, if the only people who try to make changes are Evil, why bother rocking the boat? Unless that change is putting a Good polity back into power, of course.

Practical Good is all about actual morality, and using smart methods to make life better for everyone, see my good bitch First Prince Cordelia. She seems to be much more interested in peace than her own nation having power over others (I'm guessing that if Prince going-to-die-in-five-chapters took the throne, he'd be more interested in amassing power to strike down Evil, i.e. getting those pesky rebellious colonies back under the righteous banner of the Principiate.) Practical Good sees looming threats and hordes it's grain, sharpens it's swords, and uses every asset available to them to achieve lasting peace (in a show of Grand Strategy that must be rather uncommon, at least in the late-mideival Calernia.)

Stupid Evil, as has been explained to us in-story, stands for change (you might put this under chaotic evil, but i don't like D&D morality) and complete freedom for the great to do what they want. The logical end point of that great man theory of historiography that was popular for forever. We have a super small sample size for this – just the Dead Kingdom and Praes – but that seems to be the aim overall. Great Men/Women are Great, and therefore everything and everyone besides themselves is an asset to be used. The most successful Stupid Evil villains – Trimegistros, Triumphant, and of course Akua – are a good proof of this. Each of them had a design, and used everything around them as ruthlessly as possible to achieve their aim; whether that was dominion over death, the hells, or all of creation.

Practical Evil is similiar to Practical Good, but they use intelligent methods to achieve their goals, instead of making life better. Of course, Practical Evil is going to make life better (when people like this take the reins of 80% of the continent, the standard of living is going to go up for everyone), but this is mainly a byproduct of them putting their plans into action in the smartest way possible. Black and Malicia, as always, represent this perfectly; Black wants stability in the realm and Mailica wants a legacy, and they both use the most ruthless cunning possible to achieve this.

When you view PGE's morality like this, it's easier to see how Cat might have /started/ as Practical Good, but is now much further down the chart. Her aim at first was simply to put Callowans in control of their own lives, but has now evolved to achieving control over the whole of Callow. She stopped being Practical Good the second she stopped justifying her actions, once she decided that the only way to keep her people safe was to assume complete control.

Of course, this isn't even taking into consideration the Gods Above & Below, and how their machinations change the nature of the game. The Gods make Heroes that much more righteous, and Villians that much more cunning. I imagine it must be infuriating, to be forced into these roles by a literal cosmic force. Pity the characters dancing for our amusement, I guess.

MAN I really like how complicated this shit gets when you think about it, can you tell?

Abtrakadabra

Non evil? Are you out of your mind? Crippling economy means making people poor, possibly starving. Non evil my ass.

nimelennar

... I'm seriously hoping that's satire.

oldschoolvillain

Those last lines sent a chill down my spine. Well, well done. Cannot wait for the next chapter. Also feeling a bit cockblocked, because that was a particularly volatile cliffhanger to end on. As long as Catherine isn't the one to break the truce, though, she should be fine.

Also, Milenan is tipping his hand too soon. You don't send your nuclear deterrent alone with the first wave of talkers. This delegation should have had at least one or two junior heroes with it, not a monster like Guideverse Gandalf.

---

He implied he knew about the forces that followed through Arcadia, so he may have some kind of backup. Besides, if Catherine decides to attack, the Pilgrim will have a leg up, narratively speaking, and his presence was already known to her

Trikki

"You don't send your nuclear deterrent alone with the first wave of talkers. "

Why? Cat went with "the first wave of talkers" too, and if they knew that beforehand (I don't know... maybe through that clairvoyant hero? I forgot her name, sorry) then it's reasonable to "send a deterrent".

oldschoolvillain

Catherine went specifically to talk/get a measure of them, and specifically went incognito. I somehow doubt that Amadis sent the Grey Pilgrim for the same reason. I might be wrong, but he hasn't seemed to be the savviest guy on the field so far.

oldschoolvillain

Also, while the Augur **could** have foreseen Catherine being there, I rather doubt that Amadis was in the know on that. If Cordelia were aware of him arranging this little meeting, I don't think that she would be supporting his attempt at a coup.

Trikki

Yeah, that's true, the Augur (or Cordelia) probably wouldn't have informed him. Well, I still have a feeling that they knew Cat would be there... but maybe it's just some Grey Pilgrim trick that he always knows where he is needed.

Dainpdf

Sounds a lot like him, to be honest. He did spot her immediately.

maresther23

The golden luck of heroes

Decius

A significant portion of the reason for the delegation is to have the Named talk.

oldschoolvillain

From Catherine's perspective, yes. From Amadis' perspective, though? All he cares about is becoming First Prince and usurping Cordelia's position. He didn't send The Grey Pilgrim so he could talk to incognito Queen Catherine.

Rook

Amadis doesn't really matter though. Fairly shrewd noble with more ambition than sense, but that's about all he is. No particular weight in the big scheme of things or wider vision that makes him worth noting.

The Grey Pilgrim isn't a servant or tool of Amadis. The Grey Pilgrim was a legitimate monster while Amadis was still soiling his bedsheets. I'd bet gold to horse dung the Pilgrim has his own agenda and an entirely different set of objectives than Amadis' petty attempt at a power grab.

What makes him dangerous is exactly that. He's an almost completely unknown element, who isn't nearly as predictable as a relatively minor side character following the role of a stereotypical politically-minded antagonist.

d_o_l

Amadis absolutely does matter. He has more potential than anyone else to fuck up the entire crusade. He has the power to turn it from a story about a war against evil to a story about invading Callow as part of a cynical power play. If he does, the heroes are going to get absolutely demolished no matter how powerful they are.

oldschoolvillain

The Grey Pilgrim is a member of the Tenth Crusade in the army led by Prince Amadis. Yes, Amadis is predictable, and yes, his plan at a coup is petty, but he's still absolutely a narratively important character. If he weren't, Catherine would be able to have Archer headshot him from a mile or two away instead of being commanded by Malicia to leave him alive.

While the Grey Pilgrim is absolutely a Hero who can probably be referred to as a force of nature, he's still a Hero. Amadis is a slimy politician, but he's still Good. True, the Heroes may begin ignoring Amadis later, but this early in the book, they'll still be playing nicely and doing what the commander of the army they're a part of says.

Metrux

I completel disagree that they will be hearing him. Heroes, and villains aswell, in this world, are a force upon itself. Unless the Hero actively seeks to follow someone unnamed, only kings and alike can truly order them, and only inside their countries. If the Grey Pilgrim said "I'll be going with your delegation" there is nothing Amadis could do to stop it, unless he stops the delegation itself, and even then the Grey Pilgrim could go by himself. Yes, the heroes won't control the army or go directly against Amadis, but Amadis doesn't have an control over them either, they are WITH the army, not IN the army, and that is a pretty big difference when it comes to Named.

Dainpdf

Have you met Juniper? She can and will order Named around during battle, if they for some reason are her subordinates.

Also, I don't think First Prince is a Name.

The thing is, these Heroes are part of the Crusade, and as such are likely to at least nominally respect the chain of command.

Decius

The goals of the characters are made by fit the Narrative, which acts directly on the Named.

The Narrative has in-universe powers that are acknowledged by the characters.

Trupo

More like Guideverse Obi-Wan...

I suspect it had less to do with Milean sending his best asset and more with Pilgrim co-opting the envoys the same way Catherine did, so two of them can meet her under radar and have a talk. He's a force of his own, and as much talking partner for Cat as First Prince.

Whether he did so because he *knew* that Cat is coming or just made a good guess is interesting. But, being in right place at right time seems like part of his Role.

RoflCat

I'm going with him knowing.

At this point I'm really hoping the Grey (a color mixed of white and black i.e. Good and Evil) part of his name will make him become a mentor to Catherine, the latter being rather 'grey' herself with the makeups of the Woe and other things.

Dainpdf

I think we're past Cat getting more mentors. She just shed two.

ParadoxicalThought

Damn, about time we met The Grey Pilgrim

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

The Practical Guide to Blueballing

A web series.

Bluballed

Watch the next chapter skip past it and only reference the meeting vaguely for a few dozen chapters.

Darkening

Don't even joke about that 😞

Allafterme

Well, it is more or less like that since we got 3 chapters per week. I sometimes wonder if we get 2 chapters worth of story spread among 3 chapters

naturalnuke

Oof, spooky mentors reveal themselves.

darkening

I admit, I look forward to seeing the perspective of a long term, professional hero. With black killing off all the ones around we've only seen amateurs aside from the bard.

Rook

Pretty exciting since this is around the caliber of 'old monster crawling out of the woodworks to end us' that Black was trying to avoid in his argument with Malicia about the hell gate

When the gods damned Black Knight of all people wants to avoid fighting someone, you know they're serious business.

sengachi

If this is the caliber of hero which crawls out for a politically motivated crusade, I don't even want to fucking imagine who would have come out to take out the Hell Gate.

Decius

Expect to see this one killed off shortly, then come back as The White Pilgrim.

Gunslinger

I love the grey Pilgrim already. Great ending that.

d_o_l

Interesting. Next chapter should reveal a lot about how the rest of this book will go. I find it worth noting that the Grey Pilgrim came, and not the Saint of Swords. I think it's very possible that with that many Named in the army, there are a few minor differences of opinion on the correct course of action.

OmniscientQ

No, the next chapter will be an interlude, just to screw with us.

The part about the heroes not being entirely in sync with each other, though? Of course not. There's no way you can get 12 Named to agree on pizza toppings, much less the proper way to execute a crusade. Just think of the three- and four-Named heroic groups we've seen. White Knight, Ash Princess, Champion, and Hedge Wizard would all have given different answers, and they were perhaps the most cohesive group of all. Lone Swordsman's short-lived group was worse. The group from the prologue of this book who didn't even exist long enough for me to remember their Names... Evil is not as monolithic as it appears to outsiders, and neither is Good. So far, these groups only function as groups because the clashing personalities defer to a leader figure.

Huh. Look who Catherine's talking to.

Dainpdf

Makes sense for it to be the pilgrim. As someone else said above, being in the right place at the right time seems to be a part of his Role. Not to the same degree as the Bard, of course, but still.

Byzantine

You know, this is the first time we've seen a Hero actually willing to just... talk.

oldschoolvillain

Yup. Hopefully this means he'll be willing to at least consider Cat's deal. Even if he doesn't accept it himself, he might pass it on to the junior heroes in the army and get them to leave.

Metrux

Well, I'm honestly not surprised. This is the first Hero that we get to see that isn't an amateur or the allucinogenic Bard. He is experienced enough to know that talking is good, even if peace can't be reached.

Jonnnney

Wandering Bard talks plenty and Thief talked to robber in Liesse.

To your point it is the first time that a physical/magically Powerful Hero seemed willing to start with a conversation.

Nairne .01

Will he put a wedge in Cat's resolve? Will he become the teacher of a painful lesson? Or will Cat be able to persuade him to at least step aside? Or will he turn into a disappointment like the other "heroes" i.e. a glorified butcher?

Letouriste

That's the question isn't it?:)
He give a total different feeling from Gandalf so I guess EE made a monster from scratch. That could go plenty of different ways

Jonnnney

I wonder how many of the 14 heroes he has under his wing. I could also see him either sensing the demon or, considering he's been doing this for 60 years, he might rather have a free Callow vs a Strong Procter.

ftaku

Really hoping that he is more of a reasonable experienced hero. I doubt he will agree with Cat but I hope he at least listens and doesn't reject her with bullshit hero logic but just another standpoint instead

IDKWhoitis

I have a feeling we aren't going to see the other half of this conversation, since it might have serious implications for later on. (Think Cat's negotiations with Malica and Winter) I have a feeling that the old mentor is too old to be tricked, but this also means he does know when he's being bullshitted. Therefore,

Cat's deal may actually work on him or at least persuade him that she isn't capital E evil.

Also, I wonder if Grey was befuddled when he saw Cat pretending to be a mere soldier. Like can he detect named using the bullshit Masego pulled? Did he think it was cute like a child wearing a sheep costume (she is naive to think it would work) or was he confused like seeing a grown man wearing one out of nowhere (She is too powerful to pull this bullshit anymore)?

Letouriste

The Wandering Bard was doing that too the first time we met her. And now we know she is one of the strongest around (story-wise). That doesn't matter much, just a exposed part of the Named personality

Drd

It did say that all in Cat's group were to scared to talk around her, group dynamics being what they are, I'll bet an old hat like him would have noticed. Plus she is the last of winter, akin to fae, and her looks or manner probably hint at that, even if unconsciously.

MetruX

Also to note the Wandering Bard is a role that is better kept hidden or away from combat, while also being a Hero, meaning she has heavens help. On the other hand, Cat is a battle Named, even if her new Name hasn't been shown yet, from Evil, trying to hide against one of the most experienced MENTOR Heroes around. There is a clear diference in the narrative, if nothing else.

Barthumphries

Cat is in a state of transition. As we understand it, she doesn't truly have a Name at this particular moment.

And this right here is what the Grey Pilgrim is all about. He meets young Heroes, people who don't really have a good idea of what they want to do, where they want to go, how they plan on doing anything, and gives them some helpful advice, susses out what their future plans are. And Cat could be a Hero. From the moment we heard about what the Grey Pilgrim does, this moment was narratively unavoidable.

She'll either gain an ally, an enemy, or maybe both.

Naeddyr

an ENEMENTOR

no wait that sounds really really

Fern

Enementor

...
shit, I really like how that rolls off the tongue

RoflCat

My vote is on a mentor and an observer.

He'll be intrigued at her actual goal being neither for Good nor Evil, but for the people.
He'll choose to help her out, but at the same time also keeping an eye on her very carefully.
If she ever become the thing she's against for real and not just as a means to the goal, he will be back, and this time there won't be a truce banner.

Basically the actually threatening version of Thief's words when she accepted the deal.

Erfling

Thief stole the sun.

None of the Woe do nonthreatening very well

Morgan

That's a good point, and since Grey Pilgrim has approached Catherine I look forward to seeing what kind of influence he has. So far all the foreshadowing pretty obviously indicated that Catherine would become the Dread Empress (capitalized for being an actual Name instead of a title) but there are a lot of new options in the mix if the Pilgrim winds up being a mentor. Cat has been a leader of both the living and the undead, a queen of mortals and fae, and has a track record of beating down anybody who harms her subjects. If this background is then adds a heroic mentor in addition to her villainous one, Cat may become a truly neutral Name that reflects her grey morality.

As for how Pilgrim knew she was who she was? Not that hard to figure out. Between the group dynamic here and the fact that Cat has a long history of going undercover to achieve her goals (going back to the first book even!), It's reasonable to believe he could infer that the woman sitting by the fire who everyone's avoiding is our favorite queen come to interfere in this meeting.

I'm still kind of hoping that, knowing what we do about a nation's role in the patterns, Cat will take over the Dread Empire and remold it so that it exists as a true empire composed of multiple cultures working toward a common welfare. Instead of being the Dread Empire of Praes, it would be the Dread Empire and escape Praes' pattern of aggressive and untenable expansion as well as Callow's pattern of being passively fighting off invaders. Black tried to break this pattern and had mixed results, but if the Dread Empire's pattern is made separate from Praes' I think there's a real possibility for success.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Cat's not the master of disguise she thinks she is. I bet Gray would tell her how he knew if she asks

beleester

There are a lot of ways. Masego had a spell that detects Names. There's probably a Name trick that does the same. It could have been one of Grey's aspects, some sort of mentor-ish "I can tell your personality from your stance" power. It could have been how Cat reacted (or failed to react) when he showed up. Heck, he might have just recognized Cat's face.

I do like the idea that Catherine should just ask him, though. I get the feeling he'd answer.

Author Unknown

I don't know about everyone else, but the fact that he is called the "Grey Pilgrim" and not the "White Pilgrim" gives me a lot of hope for how this all plays out.

In fact, I think his reason for being there is, in part, to test Cat. Find out which stories are true and which are exaggerated.

MetruX

Since he was mentioned I got this same hope, and things seem to have started on a good foot, even if they end up disagreeing and staying enemies, I doubt they will simply fight each other then and there.

oldschoolvillain

Good point – he did open up with a reference to The Exiled Prince, which is one of Catherine's more infamous moments.

Drd

Dunno about infamous, more like her most opportunistic moment!

Quie Possibly A Cat

I don't know about "Grey vs. White" being a sign that he's more tolerant of "evil". Its easy to imagine he's "gray" because he'll go after the villain instead of putting out the fire the villain just set in the orphanage.

frolamiz

I just noticed, but the Grey Pilgrim has been a mentor figure for a very long time. This mean he has survived the mentor occupational hazard for that long. If we needed proof of how much of a monster he is, I think this is a good one, because even Black barely escaped it with only one disciple, even though he was very wary of it.

Highwayman

Then again Black did make decisions that essentially "betrayed" Cat's trust.

I know its not exactly betrayal but for the love of God I can't think of a better way to describe it right now.

vuthuha912

He ... um ... hard parenting her ? He did make her do something without her opinion and basically force her to do what he want. Exactly like an Asian parent, he is a tiger dad – maybe. It feels like it.

Granted the situation was to her benefit and he did has good reasons – trying to save both her and Malicia and all. That is no reason not to give her a warning about his plan, yet, he did not warn her, probably because to him, it is unnecessary but it means alot to her. And let's not ignore the time he try to goad her into kill him so she can get her inheritance early. She loves him and it might pain her to think that he thinks that she would kill him for something so trivial.

So dysfunctional family dynamic – the one where both loves each other but has problems showing it or communicating properly

aran

Let's hear it, Gandalf.

Naeddyr

Quick random prediction:

A politician in Procer will turn into a Villain in this book. The Schemer? Something like that. Possibly one of our two beloved adversary generals.

Drakshaa

Finally caught up! What a wild ride this has been. Absolutely amazing, blows worm out of the park.

But, what am I to do now. The journey is paused. Is there anything else close to this quality on the internet to read?

lennymaster

First, thank god I am not the only one that considers Worm decent, but not even remotely on the same level as Guide.

On the matter of advise, I am happy to give you some. I rate books by several different aspects: Character development; Worldbuilding and depth; Plot complexity and logic; Tactical and strategic competence; and finally magic and or tech development logic/coherence; if I have nothing to say to any of these points consider them at the very least sufficient, at most satisfactory but not outstanding. If I do mention one of these aspects it is at least better than average. (One glc stands for Guide length chapter.)

Webserials:

The Gods are Bastards author is a reader of both Worm and Guide if I remember correctly and does some very good work on character development as well as worldbuilding. Updates at least one chapter (roughly one glc) a week. Ongoing since 2014.

The Zombie Knight Saga has some amazing fights, magic system inherently sensible and logical. One to three PAGES a day (a fifth glc) occasional holiday extras. Ongoing since 2013.

Mother of Learning has a good concept amazingly well done and excellently founded in the worlds logic. Also decent fights and a solid plot. One Chapter (ca two Guidlengthchapters) every three to four weeks. Ongoing since 2011.

The Legion of Nothing is an exception as it cannot truly boast excellence in any one of these aspects but is better than average in all of them. One chapter (ca a third glc) a week. Ongoing since 2007.

Super Powered finished this year with four books (the last the longest with roughly two thousand pages if I remember correctly). Decent world, good character development, solid plot.

At the moment not free to read on the internet as the author wants to promote them on amazon, they should however be back for free, properly this year. Some of his other work is pretty good, but not as webserial available.

That was it for webserials. oh, there are some other decent ones that I did not mention thanks to various faults (at least to my opinion) that tarnish my otherwise good opinion. Heretical Edge, ENDLESS enemies, none of the big ones get ever killed, villians ALWAYS see through the protags plans / have endless luck / loose but always turn any victory on the good guys side to ash. Main character the total opposite of Cat.

Good nonwebserial books;

Chaos Seeds, Awaken Online and Ascend Online are examples for how good LitRPG can be.

David Webers Honor Harrington is a prime example for fantastic world building, inherently logical cultural and scify tech development as well as outstanding tactical and strategic understanding of modern warfare. Overall the best scify I have ever read.

John Conroe's Demon Accords is always at least decent.

Andrew Seiple is a very decent writer, aside from one botched tech mishap in the first Dire book.

Niall Teasdale works alway satisfy, but rarely amaze.

Demons of Astlan is after Guide one of my absolute favourites.

I could continue eternally as I have collected over a thousand books in my Kindle Library over the last ten years, but I will stop here and now.

In the end I must however say that very, very few of them can measure up to Guide.

benthelynx

Sometimes the serial format plays hell on narrative flow – I imagine reading straight through to the next chapter would be far smoother than the cut off here. But that's not necessarily avoidable.

Fern

Yeah, the cliffhangers between chapters for books like these are always a bitch. It's why i'm glad I read Worm in one go after it was finished, and why I hated when that one story (The Undead Knight? Zombie Knight?) stopped updating like 1700 pages in.

As a rule, though, I really really prefer having three updates a week with short chapters to having one a week (or a month, here's looking at you Origin of Species and Mother of Learning :/) and getting blueballed even harder.

Darkening

I saw a big update to zombie knight pretty recently, Haven't read the new stuff, but I saw it was around again. I do agree that it can be rough reading stories as they update instead of all at once, I know I've stopped reading several in the past just because I couldn't maintain interest in anything going on with the gaps between reading it.

nipi

"Petty thieves hang, the great wear crowns."
– Proceran saying

My people have a similar saying:
"Suured sulid tõllas, väiksed sulid võllas" meaning:
"Big crooks in carriages, small crooks in gallows."

Barrendur

Estonian?

Josh

This quote leads me to believe Thief is being groomed for Queenship of Callow. She is noble after all, and Cat knows she can't stay queen forever.

---

Chapter 8: Dialogue

"That is the secret to a peaceful court, Chancellor. Regularly having the High Lords for dinner."
– Dread Empress Sanguinia I, the Gourmet

"This is quite refreshing," I admitted. "My experience with your side doesn't involve a lot of talking. Or at least none that didn't end with blades drawn."

The Grey Pilgrim didn't seem particularly offended, but then he'd never lost that vaguely serene look since I'd first had glimpse of him. Might be part of his Name. Or just the result of having seen shit that would turn my hair white. No one made profession of kickin villains in the teeth for over six decades without having stumbled over some old horrors.

"There are few interlocutors worth speaking to, on... 'your side', as you so delicately put it," the old man replied. "One cannot bargain with madmen and minions."

"Yet here we are, talking," I said. "Should I take that as a compliment?"

He laughed quietly.

"If you wish," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Though I will not deny that Winter's shadow looming in your soul is cause for worry, you have displayed noticeable restraint. I am not in the habit of seeking conflict when other roads are open."

Couldn't say the same, so I wouldn't. Just because I'd learned that killing often caused as many problems as it solved didn't mean I no longer recognized that there were fights worth picking. I should know, I'd yet to manage a godsdamned year as a Named where I wasn't up to my neck in enemies.

"Funny thing to say, for a man marching with an invading army," I noted. "If envoys were sent to achieve diplomatic resolution, they never made it to Laure."

"And this surprises you?" he asked, seeming genuinely curious. "You have hacked your way through every opposition set before you, and twice now slighted the Heavens through their ordained servants. There are few, mundane or Bestowed, who believe you can be reasoned with."

Bestowed. I raised an eyebrow. Another word for Named, I'd assume, but from the almost reverent way he'd spoken it there might be religious implications. More worrying was the fact that he knew how my little tiff with the Stalwart Paladin had ended. There shouldn't have been any remaining witnesses to that aside those who wore gaudy wings.

"Look at the graves I've left behind," I said. "What do they all have in common?"

The Exiled Prince, Page, the Lone Swordsman and his band, Diabolist. The pattern there was far from a puzzle.

"They were threats to the Kingdom of Callow," the old man said. "Or at least what you perceive that should be."

That last qualifier didn't escape my notice, but I reluctantly let it go. Heroes would be heroes.

"And so that's the question," I said. "What is your merry band of comrades after? Somehow I'm guessing Proceran interests aren't why you signed on with this crusade."

"The Empire crafted a doomsday weapon that would have held all of Calernia hostage to the Tower's whims," he mildly said.

"Weapon's broken," I said calmly. "So's the one who made it. You're still invading."

"The capacity to create another remains," he pointed out.

I hummed.

"All right," I said. "Fine. If that's all then let's get this done. Bring your army south, I'll take the lot of you through Arcadia and bring you out on the outskirts of Ater. You can level the Tower and put to the sword every mage in Praes who has the know-how and inclination to make another Liesse. Hells, ask nicely and I'll lend a hand."

He blinked, and the serenity fractured.

"You are not lying," he said, sounding baffled.

"Pilgrim, you think I approve of any of this shit?" I flatly said. "It's my people who got bled for that weapon. I signed on with Evil to personally put a knife through the eye of anyone intending to pull this kind of play on Callow, among other things. You want to bring down the Tower on Malicia's head? After last year, you can be my guest."

"And your mentor in the Vales?" he pressed.

"Was the one who broke the weapon in the first place," I said. "Someone's going to need to settle Praes after the bloodletting, and if you have a better candidate I'm all ears."

He opened his mouth and I raised my hand to signal he should let me finish.

"I don't mean forever," I said. "But if you approach Black with an offer that gives him say... ten years? A solid decade to make Praes into the kind of nation that'll no longer piss in the continental porridge every generation, before he abdicates, I think you'll be surprised by the answer you'll get. Even if heroic supervision is part of the terms."

His eyes narrowed.

"You genuinely believe this of the Carrion Lord," he said.

It wasn't a question. Chalk one up to the man having a truth-telling ability, I thought.

"With all due respect," I said, "I know him a lot better than you do. If he wanted a crown, he'd be wearing one right now. That's not what he's after. And as long as he gets what he wants, everything else is expendable – including personal power.”

“This is... an unexpected offer,” the Pilgrim admitted.

“It's one I'm willing to swear binding oath over,” I bluntly told him. “The only real question is whether or not you can get Procer to turn around if I do.”

“There are other considerations,” the old man said.

I smiled thinly.

“Like a gaggle of princes wanting to carve Callow into their own little fiefdoms?” I said. “I'm honestly disappointed, Pilgrim. You're willing to kill your way through Callow so that likes of Amadis fucking Milenan gets his way?”

“I have been courteous to you, child,” the Pilgrim spoke curtly. “A grace that should be returned equally. Has it truly escaped your notice how much of a threat you are?”

“Which of us is invading the other's country again?” I asked, then bit my tongue.

Losing my temper here would bring no gain.

“I... apologize,” I said through gritted teeth. “Much of this tries my patience.”

He nodded silently, the serenity back on his face.

“You are Queen of Callow,” he said. “You are also a villain.”

“Fucking Hells, am I tired of hearing that,” I replied, anger immediately flaring again. So much for restraint. “I didn't sign on with the side that tosses around demons out of great sympathy for their philosophy, Pilgrim. I did it because I could not find a single other working alternative. Where was this coalition of yours, twenty years ago? Where were all these upstanding heroes during the Conquest? You don't get to throw it in my face that I'm an evil when Evil was the only game in town. I may have failed spectacularly, but the other choices were either a doomed rebellion or just lying down and taking it. Callow crowned me because it's desperate, and it got this desperate because help never came.”

“Simply by being who you are, you darken Creation,” the Grey Pilgrim replied calmly.

My fingers clenched, but he raised his hand to prevent the harsh reply on the tip of my tongue. Courtesy for courtesy, huh. I didn't like it, but I was willing to bend my neck that far.

"This is not a condemnation, it is a fact," the old man said. "You rule in Callow. Your story is its story. Already, I suspect, you will have seen the effects of this. Your people becoming warped by your presence, old traits grown more vicious or acute. Whether you realize it or not, you are slowly turning your home towards the Gods Below. If you rule long enough, the Kingdom of Callow will sever its allegiance to Above."

But if losses must be had, better Proceran than Callowan, Brandon Talbot had said. Giving his approval to the slaughter of thousands. The chance the hero might have a point cooled my temper, but only so much.

"And that justifies killing people who still pray at the House of Light right now?" I replied. "Even assuming you're right – and I'm taking this with a grain of salt – if all the Heavens have to offer is a slaughter then, honestly, fuck the Heavens."

"Think, Black Queen," the Pilgrim grimly said "Beyond your anger and grudges, think. Of what it really means for all of Calernia if a nation as pivotal as Callow turns to Evil. Already, to be a hero is to be the corpse that will hold the dam in the face of the flood. If the Kingdom turns, the fragile balance of this continent breaks. Procer weakens. The Chain of Hunger and the Dead King will tear into its flesh, and when it dies darkness will spread across the land."

"What I'm getting from this," I coldly replied, "is that that keeping the Principate propped up – no matter what it does – matters more than the lives of innocents. If that's the argument your side is making, then you might just be praying in the wrong direction."

"All of this rests on the fact that it is you who rules," the old man said.

"And if I abdicate, can you guarantee that Callow will be left untouched?" I asked. "Will you swear on your Gods that if Procer tries to annex it, you will turn your sword on whoever is trying? Or even that you'll stay out of my way and let me take care of them?"

"I do not rule Procer," the Grey Pilgrim softly said. "And if I take the field against them, too many would follow. It would birth a war as dangerous as this one, in many ways."

I smiled bitterly.

"The terms I offered you have so many concessions in them I'd probably have to fight a civil war to enforce them," I frankly told him. "If even that isn't enough, then I think we can dispense with the pretence that there was ever anything but conflict on the table."

"And so now we are enemies, confirmed," the Grey Pilgrim said.
"And you may unleash your arsenal of horrors with peace of mind."

I shook my head.

"That isn't the kind of war I'm going to be fighting," I said.
"I've been down that road before. If I escalate, so do you. The thing is, you and I, we get to crawl out of those ruins. 'cause someone Above or Below decided we mattered enough. That courtesy isn't extended to nearly everyone on Calernia though, is it?"

I scoffed.

"Oh, I won't pretend I'm not sitting on some nasty stuff. So are you. But even if I used it, even if I won, what would that accomplish? I bleed Procer into a truce, but that truce doesn't survive me. All that does is kick the next war thirty years down the line. Nothing is solved. I'm tired of seeing Callow turned into the battlefield of Calernia, Pilgrim. So are Callowans."

"Heed an old man's advice, Catherine Foundling," the Pilgrim said tiredly. "The world can only be healed so much."

"I don't believe that," I said. "My teacher dedicated his entire life to breaking this game, but that's a reflection of his flaw – he can't conceive a world where he doesn't win. I'm willing to settle for the lesser prize. What I can't break, I would regulate."

"Some might construe such a boast as blasphemy," the old man said.

"Aren't you tired of killing kids because they're sworn to the wrong side?" I asked quietly. "I know I am, and you've been at this for a lot longer."

"There is not a single life I've taken I have not regretted," the Grey Pilgrim sighed. "No matter the deeds to their name. To inflict death is to end the possibility of redemption, and that is the greatest gift the Gods have granted us."

"It doesn't need to be like this," I said. "We're the dogs in the pit, but what does that ever really accomplish? One bleeds, another dies, and then they release another hound. The pit's still there even if one side gets a winning streak."

"Some of those hounds have gone rabid," the Pilgrim said. "I grieve their deaths, but I will not allow them to bite children."

"And those should be put down," I agreed flatly. "But we don't need wars for that. We just need rules that both sides are willing to enforce."

"An agreement," he slowly said. "Such a thing would be without precedent. And there are many who would balk."

"Every single Named is a highly dangerous weapon, in their own way," I said. "Any unwilling to accept constraints placed on their actions have no business wielding that kind of power in the first place. And before you ask, I do not exclude myself or any ally of mine from that statement."

He studied me silently.

"For such a thing to hold, there would be need for trust where none exists," he said.

"Then we begin with something smaller," I said. "Rules of engagement, for your host and mine. Would you be able to enforce these?"

"Within limits," he said. "I am not without influence and the Saint's reputation has its uses."

"If you don't sack cities, neither will I," I offered.

He nodded.

"Agreed," he said. "Innocents should not be made to suffer. You must refrain from using demons."

"I'll swear to that, if you refrain from calling on angels," I said.

He frowned.

"The nature of those interventions is different," he said. "The Choirs are not a blight, their purpose is to aid in the rectification of wrongs."

"There kind of rectification they would have offered at Liesse when the Lone Swordsman reached for Contrition was a wrong itself," I flatly told him. "It was ugly as the things the Empire pulls. And that's besides the point, anyway: if you use something of that scale, then I have to deploy an equivalent or you're just going to walk right through us."

"The Choirs have been known to extend hand when defeat looms," the Pilgrim told me. "There is difference between call and offer."

"You think your side's the only one afraid of dying?" I said. "Calling demons is probably the single worst thing a person can do, objectively speaking, but it feels a lot more acceptable when the alternative is getting stabbed in the throat. We can't prevent escalation if your bargaining position is that we fold but you don't."

The old man stayed silent for a long while.

"I will concede," he finally said, "if you swear away devils as well."

No great loss for me there. I'd never approved of using those either.

"Done," I grunted. "As a gesture of goodwill, I'll add a warning. There's a demon from Dread Empress Triumphant's day bound somewhere in the vicinity of Harrow. My people believe it might be one of Absence."

"A Hell Egg, after all these years?" he said, brow rising. "I thought none remained within Callow."

"Would that this were true," I ruefully said. "I don't know exactly where it is, or what keeps it bound. Odds are it's an old Legion standard but I can't guarantee it."

He inclined his head in thanks.

"I will discuss this with the others," the Pilgrim said. "If we can slay it, we will."

"So long as you keep the fight contained," I sharply said. "If a chunk of the north suddenly no longer exists, I'll consider that a breach of terms."

"If have fought their like before," the old man said. "It is ugly strife, but there are ways about it."

I didn't like the risks involved in this, but then I wasn't all that happy about that unlit sharper staying buried near Harrow either. If they could kill it without making a mess I wasn't going to complain. If.

"I want prisoners well treated, even Praesi and greenskins," I said. "Neither beaten, tortured nor otherwise harmed. I'll extend the same treatment to anyone I capture. I'm also willing to arrange regular prisoner exchanges when the campaign allows."

"There are evils I have been forced to make peace with," the Pilgrim said with iron in his voice. "Torture is not one of them. You may be certain I will allow no such thing so long as I draw breath. The matter of exchanges, however, will have to be discussed with the Princess of Aequitan. Answer will be given before battle."

I nodded. I wasn't sure Malanza would bite but it was worth a try. Morality aside, I needed my officers much more badly than she did hers. If she cottoned on to that she might just decide to sit on them. On the other hand, the Procerans tended to make officers of their relatives. They might want the assurance of being traded back if they got captured. We'd see.

"No killing of anyone offering surrender," I proposed.

"So long as that surrender is genuine, and no attempt at treachery is made," he countered.

I grimaced but nodded. Fair enough. I'd need to ride my sappers hard about the treachery clause in case they ever got captured. They did like to offer 'surrender' in time for the enemy to walk into a field of buried munitions.

"Those are the terms I have to offer, at the moment," I said. "Unless you have anything to add?"

"No," he said, after a moment. "This will serve."

He sighed.

"You are right, you know," he said quietly.

I had a few pithy responses to offer, but I kept my mouth shut. And to think they said I couldn't do diplomacy.

"It is shameful, that Callow was left under occupation for so long," the Grey Pilgrim said. "That we only ride to relieve in in fear of what your coronation represents."

Limpid blue eyes looked up at the morning sky.

"This does not absolve you," he said. "But there is truth in what you say. We stand burdened with the guilt of inaction. For that alone, I grieve that it must come to blood. You are the sin of our indolence returned to haunt us."

"I don't want to fight you at all," I said. "But I will not bend my neck to the kind of ending you peddle."

He sighed.

"We will try to slay you, on the field," he said. "Even I. Much suffering can be avoided by your death, however tragic that ending."

"Suffering is the nature of human condition," I said. "We are what we do with that. I choose to give it a purpose."

"It does not sound," he gently said, "like I am the one you are trying to convince."

"None of that, now," I said, wagging my finger. "You want to fight for a side that's not exactly driven snow? Fine."

Disappointing, but that's the world we live in. But you don't get to pull the grandfatherly act afterwards."

He smiled sadly.

"Am I not allowed to grieve the sight of a child who mutilated her own soul trying to make a better world?" he asked.

I flinched. That struck closer to home than I would have liked.

"I am my mistakes too," I said. "Not just my victories. And I knew going in that power comes at a cost. No one gets to eat the first course then balk at the bill. Grieve all you want, but someone recently told me that grief without corresponding action is meaningless. That applies to both sides of the fence, I'd think."

"All your plans," he said. "They are dust, if you do not survive to attempt them. All that would be left is the costs."

"Isn't that always how it is?" I tiredly replied. "There's a reason it goes 'change the world or die trying'."

And on that cheerful note my first talk with the opposition concluded.

---

*DroughtBringer*

Great chapter, I'm really looking forward to what this Entails. Also, I think Grey Pilgrim is my favorite Hero so far.

Flameburst

Probably because he and hanno are the only heroes we've met so far that don't have their heads so far up their asses they get stuck in their esophagus

*NZPIEFACE*

Hell, if the Angels let Cat live, then Hanno would happily comply.

Ezreon

Not that it would ever happen.

*greatwyrmgold*

I don't think that's fair. They're just the first like that who we've had the chance to understand. Bumbling Conjurer and Dashing Bandit seemed nice enough.

stevenneiman

I think it's because he does the whole "shame of necessity" thing but manages not to seem clueless or full of shit when he does. Most of the other antagonists so far have either been driven mad by their own guilt or else became convinced that their higher purpose meant that they could do whatever they wanted free of moral or practical repercussions. People like Hanno who decided that he should offload all responsibility for his actions to a group of eldritch horrors, and William who never really had a better reason for wanton destruction, murder and attempted mass mind rape than because he felt bad about taking reasonable action to protect himself.

Plus, there's the fact that for all that he thinks that Catherine's death is necessary, he's the only one so far who's been willing to meet Cat halfway on a matter that seems so basic as preventing warcrimes. The only antagonists who've even been in the same room with Cat without trying to kill her directly were just trying to manipulate her into ruining herself regardless of the consequences, but the Pilgrim actually met in good faith, tried to dissuade Cat from a course of action that he felt would cause unnecessary suffering, and then when he realized he had nothing tactical to gain he still worked with her to help with the reasonable parts of her own vision. That's better than we've seen from anybody else, including Black and Malicia.

Yotz

Reasonable action to protect himself? I guess – from your point of view – William ought to chop his sister to pieces, bake them into pies, and sell said pies to his and his future fiancée's relatives to collect enough money for the wedding for his actions to become unreasonable? Or it would be reasonable still?

There's nothing reasonable about William, that's why Contrition was able to hook him up so easily.

Zachary

The tragedy of William is that he was actually experiencing positive character growth, but was manipulated by the Bard into going all-in and summoning the angel. There was one interlude chapter where he's basically commenting on the fact that maybe Catherine is right and it doesn't matter who's in charge as long as things are better for regular people, but then Bard persuades him otherwise.

Mani

Reading through your comment, I believe I figured out why the Grey Pilgrim survived this long.

It can't be because he takes the role of a "mentor". Mentor more often than not die right before a pivotal change in their apprentice. No, the Grey Pilgrim survives because he is loved. It's even stated a few times that people really like him, and we've just seen why that is. He is so god damn reasonable, almost like the Hero equivalent of Black, which I'm sure is no coincidence. And he is not just loved by the people, he is, more importantly, also loved by the readers, which gives him a similar kind of "meta-game" advantage Black has as the protagonists mentor.

I'm really interested how his story will turn out.

Drd

Interesting comment comparing Pilgrim to Black. They've both been at it for 60yrs, are both highly influential – even loved (Black is loved by the armies he has rebuilt, and by the other Calamities), both reasonable, intelligent, sharp and insightful, and both dislike the senselessness of unnecessary conflict (Black hates the trueblood's precisely because of this).

We already suspect that the Bard is the heaven's counterpart to the Dead King, does that hint to other hero/villain links?

MetruX

If so, this might be more a game board than we thought, when you deploy a important piece you give the other side a piece of equivalent power, that he may deploy to intercept yours, or somewhere else to tilt the balance. If so, each place that is Evil or Good might as well have been chosen by the Gobs, Above or Below.

342

Why do you think this has been compared to a shatranj board the whole time.

stevenneiman

If it's a game, I feel like it's less like chess (or shatranj, which sounds like it's basically chess but possibly with less strategic depth) and more like poker. Each side largely knows what its own advantages are and the game is mostly about deciding how much Above and Below are willing to wager on any given hand.

kelioez

Poker is great example tbh, it encapsulates the entire scene perfectly

Lark

Phenomenal as always. Thank you for this delightful story.

Matthew

I like that she still has Black's back on the important issue of breaking the game.

Can we have a Heirarch, Grey Pilgrim, and Black teamup?

Dany

Black doesn't want to "break" the game. He wants to WIN the game.

Cat seems to sometimes understand that, but not in this chapter.

Rook

Black wants to win, Cat wants to flip the board, and Hierarch has decided they're already playing a different game, thus everyone else is breaking the rules

Walter

The games of Foreign Tyrants are of no interest to The People, Long May They Reign.

Cloudlight

Hear, hear.

Jeremy

Damn, it got dark and philosophical up in here!

SilentLurker

I can genuinely say I've found a Hero I like now. The Grey Pilgrim, for all he has an annoying idea that his side is incapable of moral offences, is both interesting and also seemingly willing to try to make change, even where it means compromise. For that alone he's easily the best hero we've seen so far.

Rook

I don't think he's saying Good is incapable of stumbling, it seems to me it's the opposite. He agrees that Procer isn't perfect, he admitted it was their failure to only march on Callow out of fear when it was too late, and he doesn't seem to be any particular fan of the suffering that innocents and civilians go through as a side effect of Good vs Evil.

It's just compromise. Cat has no perfect solution so she settles for what she sees as the Lesser Evils, and the Pilgrim also doesn't have any perfect solution, settling on what he thinks is the Greater Good. I mean he's stands on the other side of the fence but you can't begrudge a man for not abandoning an entire lifetime's worth of belief and experience over a single campfire talk.

Stormblessed

Gods, Cat keeps offering so much as terms to avoid conflict but nothing is ever good enough for pissy little Good, who has to have everything. At all. They offer no reconciliation, no compromise.

Sean

In an interesting way, I think Good can be seen in a broader way as an unwavering loyalty to one's ideals. Evil, broadly speaking, has no ideal but the acquisition of power (and to a lesser extent, what could be called hubris). On the otherhand, Good gains its power by an unwavering dedication to ideals, regardless of whether or not those ideals are actually worth anything.

In the real world, both of these have wrought tremendous damage. Ideological conflict being as responsible for as much misery as selfish ambition.

Walter

Cat is super lucky this dude has a truth sensing power, or she wouldn't have even managed this much. I mean, put yourself in dude's shoes.

You are preparing to liberate a land which was conquered by the Empire of Evil. The slave in charge of it is noted badass Black Queen, famous for her motto 'justifications only matter to the just'. So you can't ask her to justify anything, because she not only thinks having reasons for stuff is for chumps, she thinks it so strongly she PUTS IT ON HER BANNER.

You know a few things about her. She recently had a pissing match with another monster, and wiped out the population of a large city in an attempt at building a demon summoning superweapon, which then got broken in more internal squabbling.

She crucifies prisoners. She is resettling the ares she has ethnically cleansed with goblins, a race of war criminals known primarily for sexism and arson.

The various slaves under her are kept in line through fear of her omniscient surveillance systems and her mighty army, which she used recently to settle yet another squabble with her own underlings by, surprise surprise, hanging her enemies.

Looking at her, you can see that her soul is shrouded in Winter, the branch of Fae characterized by skullduggery and treacherous conduct. She attends the meeting not openly, to treat with the dignitary, but in disguise, with monsters waiting in Arcadia.

Now you start talking, and she has a proposal. She gives you her word that she'll help you take down her master (this is the same word she gave that master of her fealty, for those keeping score), and in exchange you leave her to continue to oppress her people and turn them to devil worship.

Sound fair?

werafdsaew

Catherine didn't wipe out the population of a large city; that was Diabolist. And when did she ethnically cleans anyone?

Walter

Nobody else knows that. Cat attacked one of her own cities. All of the civilians ended up dead, and everyone who surrendered she crucified. The official story is that some of the victims were responsible for killing the others or something, but the obvious explanation is that the winners did the killing.

werafdsaew

You're not reading the same story I'm reading.

Silynt

That's the whole point of this person's comment – the Pilgrim isn't reading this story and so can't possibly know the whole truth. Walter listed out a bunch of things that the Pilgrim could reasonably know about Cat's recent activities, and his point is that without being able to KNOW that Cat is being honest, he has absolutely no reason to take her word on anything.

Agent J

The Angels said it best. "We take everything and give nothing." Are we really surprised that their tools have taken up the same motto?

Joel

Both sides scored some points here, but I think that Grey Pilgrim was positively shocked at how reasonable she was. If that "code" of warfare holds, it could have interesting effects on the "story" of this war. If neither side is committing atrocities, and Catherine doesn't do anything too Evil, then it becomes less of "Good vs. Evil" and more "unlawful invasion."

Byzantine

We already know it is possible for a country to be ruled by Good and Evil working together. Unlike Black she isn't going to try breaking the game, she's going to see how far she can push the rules.

vuthuha912

I swear if the entire game of Good and Evil has gone way too far. Many of the problems that plague Praes can be traced to desperation. The Good side instead of sympathizing and trying to alleviate the situation only double down on stomping Evil while Evil without a way out, continues to escalate their effort. Like, if they gave Praes the grain it needed in exchange for technology or precious metal then both sides might have staked in keeping the trade going and limiting the scale of warfare accordingly. Yet, somehow, the reasonable person who can make the decision all died due to a bunch of reasons and we end up with a mess of the current situation. Both sides hate the other so much that they have no sympathy for the situation the others were in. Only when a girl from a Good country is willing to look at the other side and sympathized with them can changes be made. And even with a girl like Cat in the middle, things are still a mess. The Big Good – Cordelia is still too high up to actually consider meeting the offer. The Big Bad – Malicia just escalates due to crazy dread empress syndrome or desperation. The other Big Bad – Black got stabbed by Malicia and Cat for ... saving their life against their consent (in his opinion), and has been preparing to strike at Good to protect his country. Still, both sides don't think that negotiation is on the table, both don't think that the other will stop seeking their destruction and both are willing to see the war till the end.

I can not say that both sides don't have their reason and that they aren't right about their opinion but someone gonna be the better person if negotiation were to happen.

boballab

It won't hold, this whole chapter is setup and foreshadowing of that and it won't be "evil" that breaks it either. The Princes will do something that breaks the terms such as killing the Orc's out of hand when they surrender or doing something with the Demon and that act is what will break the hero contingent of the Crusade.

Amoonymous

I like this thought (and would like your comment as well if I had a WordPress account).

Good being the first to break the terms would also tilt the story (more) towards Evil being the relatively innocent victim (and thus make Evil more likely to win).

Nairne .01

It would certainly be interesting if that prince took the demon after gaining enough support to shake things back home so he could be seen as representing the Principate and that given the tools they too would unleash demons on the world.

DroughtBringer

If the Prince did use the Demon, though, would would Grey Pilgrim react? I could see that either forcing or letting Cat and him work together.

Something I've been waiting for something to happen that brings Good and Evil together; if Winter is Evil and Summer is Good, we have still yet to see the joining of the courts as we saw from Arcadia.

Darkening

Hahahahahahahahaha Summer as good, that's funny. They're blue and orange mentality at best.

Cpt. Obvious

Killing their heroes isn't what the Grey Pilgrim was talking about. After all she's killed a lot more than two just this past year, so that's not it.

The first insult was when she forced the choir of... Well the ones backing William. She effectively spit on everything that they stand for as she forced them to raise her from the dead.

She even said something along the lines of "Come on you fuckers. I won the game playing by your rules and now you have to pay up and raise me from the death your pawn caused me. That's right you will use your heavenly powers to grant life to a evil undead undead abomination to all that is creation, and you have no choice about it. ”

And then she curbstomped William which probably did little to smooth their feathers.

I’m not sure what the second one is though. It’s not that Cat hasn’t done some outrageous things, but I can’t remember anything that explicitly involves the heavens.

Cpt. Obvious

And that comment didn’t end up where I thought it would...

frolamiz

Yeah, we where already making parallels between Praes’s high lords and Procer’s princes earlier and how the current Procer is acting more like Prae than Prae with the backstabbing, invasion of callow and use of great rituals.
The greedy prince leading one of the armies of the crusade choosing to keep the demon for its power make a great story for his coming into a villainous Name.

Rook

The Pilgrim actually worded an extremely dangerous pledge there about torture.

“You may be certain I will allow no such thing so long as I draw breath”

Extremely double edged sword there, pretty surprised. It could be used offensively – interpreted as a pledge to not let the culprit off so long as he draws breath; and it could be turned against him just as easily – interpreted as allowing such a thing to be forfeiture of his right to draw another breath.

Especially when this comes in the context of a formal verbal agreement between the two. I’m not sure if he’s banking on his experience to play a very dangerous game, or intentionally making a show of goodwill.

Busser

I mean the key word is allow. I think like most good he is uncompromising in whatever ideals he does hold.

As long as he has verbally forbidden it, I would think that’s enough.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Remember, Cat made a big deal about whether or not the Pilgrim can enforce the agreement to his side. If he dies, obviously all bets are off. Just like killing Catherine means demons are on the table again—a fact Mr. Gray doesn't seem to realize—because what good is a rule nobody can enforce?

Honestly I think Cat got the better end of the deal by far. Did she give up any advantages she actually wanted to use? And she got the Pilgrim to agree to keep the Choirs out of it, as much as that's going to be possible. And Cat has so many other weapons, like the Fae, the Observatory, etc. That, or the Pilgrim has some hidden aces she's unaware of.

sengachi

Ohhhh, there's a thought.

By offering these terms she's fundamentally altered the nature of the Crusade. If they're accepted the very narrative may see her side as less "Evil with a capital E" and more "homeland defenders". And if they're refuted, then the Crusaders definitely give up their "Good with a capital G" advantage.

Raved Thrad

Is it just me, or does the Grey Pilgrim ultimately have his head up his ass? When he says "You have hacked your way through every opposition set before you, and twice now slighted the Heavens through their ordained servants" I parsed that as "How dare you kill the heroes heaven sent to kill you." It takes a certain kind of zealotry – one which I equate to evil – to berate someone for killing the assassins you (or your side) sent after them, no matter how holy or righteous you think your side is.

naturalnuke

The thought of infallibility is a big one among those that see themselves on the side of the 'greater good'.

Rook

The same can be said of the mentality of the Lesser Evil though. Both of them have their own blinders and neither are perfect; the latter tunneling on the fewest flaws and the former tunneling on the greatest virtues. It's a mistake to consider a difference in point of view as arrogance simply because they disagree.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Huh? How is this anything other than whataboutism? Of fucking course neither side is perfect, so fucking what? And what is this "Lesser Evil" you speak of, and what parallel thing did it do?

Lucas

She did insulted the choir tho right? But yeah, they did try to kill her first.

Rook

It's not so much being in opposition so much as looking at the end results. The characters in the story don't get an omniscient birds-eye view of her methods the same way readers do. All that they know of is that everyone she's gone up against so far had ended up a corpse, if you can still call what was left over a corpse.

I mean as a reader we know it's not true but she's the type of character where her namesake 'foundling gambit' is literally burning everything down with goblinfire

Yeah Nah Yeah

I think he was referencing the two separate times she told angels to go fuck themselves. Once with the Lone Swordsman, and once with old mate from the start of this book.

poignardazur

Yeah, he was being pretty arrogant.

"How dare you have killed all these people we sent to assassinate you and invade your country? Aren't you ashamed of all that blood on your hands?"

It's the same kind of thinking that lead to the Treaty of Versailles.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Heh, I had to look up which one the Treaty of Versailles was, but the very first sentence in the wiki article was enough reminder to see your point

Nafram

I believe he was referring to the fact that she personally rebuked and insulted the Choirs when she met them face to face through Willie's sword and the Stalwart Paladin's connection (how that works I have no idea). Then she proceeded to rub salt in the wound by immediately killing their ordained servants in a brutal fashion right in front of them. And while she may be well justified in both of those things, a Hero, even one as reasonable as the Grey Pilgrim, would balk at those, especially what happened with Contrition.

Cpt. Obvious

Killing their heroes isn't what the Grey Pilgrim was talking about. After all she's killed a lot more than two just this past year, so that's not it.

The first insult was when she forced the choir of contrition to raise her from the dead. She effectively spit on everything that they stand for and even said something along the lines of:

"Come on you fuckers. I won the game, even playing by your rules. So now, again by your rules, you have to pay up and raise me from the death your pawn caused me. That's right you will use your heavenly powers to grant life to a evil undead abomination to all that is creation, and you have no choice about it. "

That she then curbstomped William probably did little to smooth their feathers.

I'm not sure what the second one is though. It's not that Cat hasn't done some outrageous things, but I can't remember anything that explicitly involves the heavens.

For some reason I can't recall anything special about the Stalwart Paladin that would make his demise more noteworthy than any other of the heroes she's killed.

Doruma

"What I can't break, I would regulate."

I think we just found her first aspect of her new Name, Regulate.

sengachi

Ohohoho. That would be a *fascinating* Aspect.

Rook

Thematically fits too, what with Black having Break and all.

Although it brings up a pretty comical image of a madman trying to fill out all the paperwork required to commit his permitted atrocity for the month

Antipath

Black has Lead, Conquer and Destroy. You're thinking of Cat's second run aus the Squire.

Nairne .01

Is it me, or was someone already using this aspect? (I know more than one person could possibly have it, and it would probably work quite differently too).

Alivaril

I am absurdly happy this conversation wasn't skipped. It's also one of the rare times I haven't been annoyed by an impending conflict between two likable people with legitimate points. On that note, good job with Grey; he's a really nice change from certain Stupid Good individuals.

nipi

That may be because he is The GREY Pilgrim.

Joel

Whenever Cat refers to him as "Pilgrim" I'm imagining her as John Wayne.

danh3107

Now that was worth being blue balled for a whole weekend for, awesome.

Fern

Looks like we're going to settle on enementor then; i can safely say i'm pretty happy with that. It's interesting to see a Hero actually willing to debate philosophy without sounding like a tool.

Big Brother

The Grey Pilgrim is now my new favorite. Sorry, Masego. Any Hero willing to sit and talk terms with a Villain to establish restrictions in warfare before combat ever begins is one worth listening to.

Antoninjohn

And then Procer raised the city, the Angels were sore losers and lent a hand and on a field of cold and darkness did Cat strike down the armies, the heroes and the Angels backed by the power of their broken Oath

sengachi

Ohhhhhh shit, any oath she'd give would cut both ways wouldn't it? Breaking an oath with a fae lord/god is up there when it comes to Bad Ideas, and narratively speaking, breaking faith with the beleaguered queen of the country you're invading automatically forfeits your divinely protected Good status.

Cat probably could turn them breaking their oath into a hell of consequence.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

*RAZED, not raised. This misspelling completely and overwhelmingly razed your point: what you said is not what you meant.

SPELLING MATTERS, not that you would know it from EE's writing (ugh)

Rook

The Pilgrim has a point.

Cat or even Black are the exception, not the rule, the same way the Pilgrim is an exception for team Good.

I think it's important to realize this is a guy who's spent most of his life fighting the Heirs and Diabolists of the world. Fought villain after villain and failed trying to talk sense into the Evil equivalent of the Lone Swordsman more times than Cat has yet to even try.

I don't think he's looking at Cat when he decides to keep on his path. He's most likely afraid of what happens when she's gone and Callow flips, all the Akuas of the world that might spring forth from it. At the end of the day his main issue is that he doesn't have enough grounds to trust Cat can break that kind of cycle he's probably seen a hundred times. It's not an unreasonable position.

nick012000

If Callow flips to Evil, I don't think they'd produce very many Akuas, if any. They'd just be magnifying Callow's negative traits, like their tendency to hold grudges. You'd start seeing things like the Tolltaker, Callowan Squires and Black Knights, villainous Queens and Kings, etc. Maybe you'd get Named members of the various Dark Guilds, like Thief running the Thieves' Guild.

NZPIEFACE

oh fuck, cat's already started creating names for callow.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Remember the aspect Learn, and how it's compounding over time? Evil, at least as Pilgrim describes it, is a corrupting force, building on itself, and in a few years (5? 10? 50? Does it matter?) the Callow you know will be unrecognizable.

Fuck, in fact, over a few decades even without Evil influence, it will change to the point of unrecognizability. Your assumptions about Callows enduring nature are off base. And even if they aren't, we don't know the nature of the Heros Callow has produced. There may well have been budding Akuas in that bunch, we don't know.

Nightlurker8

"We are the Others, We serve different forces,
But in the twilight there is no difference between the absence of darkness and the absence of light.
Our struggle is capable of destroying the world. We have concluded a Great Treaty, a truce.
Each side shall live according to its own laws,
Each side shall have its own rights. We delimit our own rights and our own laws. We are the Others. We establish the Night Watch,
So that the forces of Light may monitor the forces of Darkness. We are the Others. We establish the Day Watch,
So that the forces of Darkness may monitor the forces of Light. Time will decide for us."
The Great Treaty between Darkness and Light. ©Night watch.

John Smith

Wait, I don't remember a Stalwart Paladin. When did that happen? Or am I being brainless?

Byzantine

Prologue to this chapter.

White

The prologue of the book. He was one of the three heroes trying to kill Car.

Author Unknown

This was everything I hoped it would be and more.

Jordan

Damn

Rainbow Trenchcoat

I think this is probably the single most important moment that's happened in the story so far, because the Grey Pilgrim conceded that the Angels were in any way equivalent to demons, and was willing to forswear their use. From the Prologue on, the most important point about the Angels was how the Choirs showed themselves to people at their worst moments, and then fundamentally broke them in some way to fit into their greater plan. Good's whole point is that people can't be trusted to do the right thing, and so there's interventions from the Angels at the most direct to the Bard at the more subtle. Agreeing to block that intervention is a huge change for the Good side.

nipi

He didnt concede that they are equivalent.

"The nature of those interventions is different," he said. "The Choirs are not a blight, their purpose is to aid in the rectification of wrongs."

This is what he conceded to:

"We can't prevent escalation if your bargaining position is that we fold but you don't."

NZPIEFACE

Wait, is Bard an angel?

daniel young

No bard is just an immortal, shapechanging, teleporting meddler.

DD

Lots of Pilgrim love here, for good reason. But I still kinda, you know...want to Cat to kill em all. And then turn on Praes and crucify the High Lords. And then spank Malicia for acting like a mentally ill moron this past little while. I know it won't go that way, but still.

Vortex

I mean Malicia's actions make perfect sense to me. Just as Cat prioritized the interests of Callow and Black prioritized his personal agenda of breaking the game, Malicia prioritized the interests of her Empire, as any good Empress should. Now, she did it in an evil and backstabby fashion, but that is Praes in a nutshell and she has a reputation for being the most backstabby and evil of all of them.

Engineer

I am really looking forward to this talk being repeated with Amadeus, Alaya and Cordelia also in attendance.

oldschoolvillain

As much as I love the talk they just had, I can't see Prince Amadis bending to the will of an "ancient kook", as I'm sure he'll view the Pilgrim after this, when slaughtering prisoners and looting cities for supplies makes things so much simpler on him.

Rook

Realistically I can see him conceding in this to be honest. It's really just a numbers game, is it worth losing the cooperation of two of your biggest powerhouses (likely more, given that the veteran heroes will probably draw more than a few of the younger ones into their orbit) to sack some cities right now, considering you plan to own by the end of it all anyway? Probably not.

Not to mention it's limiting on both sides, and limiting the foul play is on paper a good strategic move when you have such a major advantage in numbers in the first place.

oldschoolvillain

That, though, requires a view of the bigger picture than we've seen Amadis display so far. Remember that this is the guy who was pushing for a Proceran Prince to go down and take command of the Liesse Rebellion, which would have turned it from a civil war/rebellion to a blatant expansion attempt. He doesn't seem to see past his goal of becoming First Prince, and damn the consequence, hang everyone who would stand in his way of that.

The Princess in command – Malenza, I think her name was? She might see the strategic benefits of agreeing, but she's been shown to be the competent commander to balance out Amadis being the bumbling slimy politician trying to turn the crusade into a political coup. How much influence she has is yet to be seen, especially since I think it was implied that he had leverage over her.

Rook

I think it's pretty straightforward really. Slimy as he may be, he's still on the side of Stupid Good, with all the prejudices that apply. He has a lot of reason to fear that the Black Knight's protege has a lot of nasty tricks up her sleeve. Limiting those is a pretty straightforward victory, especially if you're also being pressured by the two biggest powerhouses you have available.

On top of that he's shown to have quite a lot of fixation on divvying up Callow after the conquest, it makes perfect sense to not burn down the prize you're aiming for to ashes. If for no other reason than selfishness, he already has plenty of motive to ensure he doesn't 'liberate' callow into a barren wasteland.

SMHF

You know when the Grey Pilgrim said coming to an understanding between Heroes and Villains is "unprecedented", I get the feeling it has less to do with no one ever trying it and more with Name shenanigans!

I mean stopping Heroes and Villains from making peace with each other, is probably the one thing both above and below Gods agree on!

btw dont forget to vote for the Guide! lets keep it on number one spot as long as we can! 😊

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

nipi

Is it "unprecedented"? What about the kingdom ruled by both a Hero and a Villain?

letouriste

unprecedented on calernia at least. that kingdom is on another continent

Zach

There's always been this weird mismatch between the gravity attached to happenings on Calernia (like the Gods apparently being super-invested in there being a balance there) and the scattered mentions of Calernia only being a small part of the world and there being an all-powerful race of sci-fi gnomes (who are apparently strong enough to render the powers of Calernian nations – which include demons and shit – meaningless).

vuthuha912

If you think about fictional China then you know that real-life China is the absolute master of East Asia, just like the Roman Empire but their hegemony lasts even longer than the Roman. They tried to conquer every place they can possibly conquer and successfully keep it long enough that it sets precedence: the biggest achievement for an individual whether they are good or evil is to unite their entire world. The biggest common between good and evil in every Chinese story I have read is their desire to put everyone under their rules and go down in history as benevolent kings or virtuous men (honestly, you can count on one hand the number of Chinese Emperor who ACTUALLY live up to their ideals). When you have protagonists like Cao Cao and Liu Bei then no wonder they can work with each other. I assume not! China in this setting has the same kind of mentality as the main characters from Romance of the Three Kingdoms.

To replicate a similar result in Calernia is not possible, unless Triumphant had Black sensibility and everyone started playing country building instead of war game then yes, they might.

nipi

Is that a typo?

"But even if I used tit"

Cat, you naughty girl. Tame your tongue. You're in the presence of a holy man. 🙄

So is one of cat's new aspects going to be Regulate? (And there were a few other words thrown around in that conversation.)

nipi

I wonder when Cat is going to sit down and start making oaths to restrict what she knows Winters' mantle is changing her into.

Allafterme

I half-expected a hero with an angelic staff up his a*s so far up that you can see the holy shine when he speaks. Excellent chapter.

letouriste

just wait, there is definitively one in the attacking force

mavant

How on earth are you planning to enforce rules on the Ranger, Cat?

NZPIEFACE

Oaths and authority of her name.

It's always been a Name's way to force Creation to their will.

oldschoolvillain

Ranger, and by extension, Refuge, are independent polities of the Kingdom of Callow. Catherine doesn't have any power over Refuge, but the Crusade won't be bound by their bargain with Cat if they go that far south.

SilentLurker

Refuge is actually an entirely separate nation that is a technical protectorate of the Kingdom Under. You know, that one nation on Calernia that might qualify as a world power comparable to things like the Miezens, the Yan-Tei Empire, and the Gnomes? Refuge is not in any way loyal to Callow, and it is mostly off limits because Ranger, acknowledged as the strongest Named on Calernia by basically everyone, says so.

nick012000

By force, because that's the only type of authority that the Ranger is willing to accept. She did say that Named on either side that weren't willing to agree to limit their use of power would be killed.

LM

This reminds me of Vietnam. Or perhaps Vichy France? A very good chapter, either way.

letouriste

the regime de Vichy is more akin to Callow at the start of book 1.

beleester

"Pilgrim, you think I approve of any of this shit?" I flatly said. "It's my people who got bled for that weapon. I signed on with Evil to personally put a knife through the eye of anyone intending to pull this kind of play on Callow, among other things. You want to bring down the Tower on Malicia's head? After last year, you can be my guest."

Be honest, Cat. You were perfectly willing to take that weapon for yourself before Black blew it up.

I mean, I'm glad she's changed her mind since then, but she's definitely willing to go full supervillain if she thinks it might prevent further invasions.

---

She had heard Malicia's argument after her talk with Akua on the roof, but she also hid the bargaining cheap that was Akua's horcrux. While she mentioned that the transition into Black Queen would allow her to take the control of the weapon, this Name would be influenced by Winter enough that telling which urge was her (exaggerated) wish to protect Callow and which was the Role settling into the grooves of a villain with a superweapon is harder than usual.

werafdsaew

I think she's simply aware of the sunken cost fallacy. She would not trade lives for the weapon, but once the weapon has been created, would keep it to avoid further war.

NZPIEFACE

You know, I think we've been missing something really important so far.

So many times this book, only 8 chapters in, have we seen countless references to Cat holding back her Name, Mantle, and idiosyncrasies.

Is that not the biggest Checkov's Gun so far? How long will we get to see the gun be loaded before it fires off a nuke?

Also, I just want to see her decimate shit with her name and raise the dead into an undead army.

DroughtBringer

Huh. Spent some time thinking about Grey Pilgrim and stumbled upon this:

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Grey\_Pilgrim

And I'm now significantly more concerned about him, and how powerful he is.

Forrest

To be fair, I don't think Cat would be a problematic ruler in Tolkien verse, since Creation itself would not see to altering an entire country just because the ruler was a bit morally ambiguous when deciding to protect her home and people. So there probably would not have been a conflict in that case. But alas, Creation in this case is geared to try and force a people down one of two roads.

Antoninjohn

The rule of three for the story, 1. No raising cities 2. No Angels 3. No killing prisoners and accept surrender
Break these rules and Callow has the story

Forrest

Side note: They just made a Story altering deal, that only one of them is in any real position to enforce.

oldschoolvillain

While it's true that Catherine isn't in a position to really enforce the terms of the deal on the Crusade, consider this – when has breaking a deal with a Queen or High Lord of the Fey courts EVER gone well for someone? Also, if the Crusade breaks the rules, they'll lose a lot of their Heroic support, and Catherine will be fully justified in emptying every hell that Masego can get his hands on to drive them out of Callow.

Forrest

I actually meant the other way around. Catherine can enforce her side to obey the agreement, as the queen. Meanwhile, the Grey Pilgrim may be a popular cultural hero, but he practically even said himself he can't make the nobles behave in response to Cat's abdication offer.

Jabbertalky

Erraticerrata:. 'tit' when you wanted to write 'it'

Anon

I'm perhaps a little confused at the recurring Name usage (capital-tense) going on by the opposition for Cat as the Black Queen. Does no one save Black and maybe Malicia not realize that said Name didn't come to her?

(Sidenote: Hopefully Malicia can't hear this conversation, or Cat's a goner)

Aside from that...it's sad to see that even the most reasonable 'Good' element in the pilgrim refuses to see any large-scale compromise with leaving Callow and preventing Procer from divvying up the spoils. Procer getting a pass for being 'good' leaves a bitter taste on the tongue.

But on some level, the refusal makes sense due to the Named still being a thing (which influences more than any normal man or woman could), but at the same time, if you think a thing is destined to fail, you'll usually end up self-fulfilling that prophecy.

I'm a little uncertain on Cat's plan of 'regulation' – does she mean something akin to 'self-policing', in that all sides police each other to avoid excessive GOOD or EVIL actions? That seems like a terrible idea, from an outside point of view, and one that GOOD would have a huge difficulty in agreeing to.

Unmaker

Having rebellious underlings is normal for rulers of Praes. Admittedly, not many of them want to overthrow Praes itself, as opposed to rule it, but Malicia has probably already predicted Cat's attitude anyway.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

It hit me that Arcadia opting out of Summer/Winter is a prologue of creation opting out of good/evil.

Darkening

Hm. I suppose it did get mentioned that arcadia and creation were created as mirrors to each other, and masego speculated that they still might. Should be interesting to see if that actually pays off somehow.

Stephen R. Marsh

Yes. I was just realizing what that could mean. I should have caught it earlier.

Zach

Yeah, including the fact that the one to jump the gap was from the Evil-equivalent side and did so through morally questionable means, which is a decent parallel to Catherine's efforts.

WuseMajor

If that's an example of the kind of person sworn to Compassion, I think I can see why they're supposed to be the most dangerous.

oldschoolvillain

Where did it mention that he was sworn to Compassion? Also, when did it say that the Heroes of Compassion were the most dangerous? Not saying you're wrong, I just can't remember these events.

Decius

Crusade finds the demon, Cat fights the demon with them because the demon is worse than the Crusade, Crusade goes home because the Grey Pilgrim refuses to gain an advantage from the Callowan hosts fighting a demon.

lennymaster

You forget he survived 60 years fighting the Diabolists of Calernia. I think he is just a mite too practical for that.

Shawn Panzegraf

I dunno,
I might try for a nice win...but force my back to the wall, and I'd Bonfire it up and worry about a unified Calernia hating me later. Still don't get why critically weakening Procer's defenses versus the Ratlings would be bad. Procer will hate the one responsible for it? How's this a negative when they're at the head of an invading Crusade already?

Cat's playing this like Procer/The Crusade are unbeatable heavies...but only if you play by Good's rules. Armies are made of soldiers. Soldiers are people. Convince those soldiers they are allowing their families and loved ones to be slaughtered whilst they're serving in a foreign war, and find out what the term desertion means.

Just getting a little tired of the new soft Cat. Escalation and double-down on some more escalation got her this far. She doesn't have the mindset, the skillset, or the disposition for clever statesmanship. She's a warlord. What she wants to be is immaterial. Killing her enemies until there's no one left to disagree with her philosophical position is her strength.

RandomFan

That's evil's trap. You escalate, and good escalates back- and the thing is, good's closer to united. The heroes might be no saints, but the Good nations seem inclined to cooperate if things go sideways bad enough- even when not, the heroes don't engage in petty backstabbing, it seems, with the exception of bard. Good isn't united, but they can put away the swords when push becomes shove, it seems.

Because of this, and because your Evil associates are as likely to see you as a threat as an asset, Good can escalate farther, even without the inconvenience your Evil peers can cause.

The more harm you cause, the more likely your story ends in an unmarked grave. The heroes won't back down for mere threats, unless you bunker down or are an endless horde, it seems. And note that even the dead king doesn't seem to have been doing much on the offensive- he's just holed up and takes down whatever heroes come for him, most days.

The Tower's tried escalation for generations, Triumphant herself was a master of it- but it ends the same way. Everyone bleeds, and you haven't built anything of value for it. You don't bleed less for it, either- no, you bleed the most. Even her own kingdom says "May she never return"- for all she was a champion, they don't want her back.

That says something. I don't know what, but I don't think being the queen of escalation lets you win, not alone.

Besides, she hasn't locked off a lot of routes to escalation. Fae are still fair game for both sides. Her resurrection trick, if she pulls it again, is probably more dangerous than wielding an angel-feather sword but also fair play. She never agreed not to use goblinfire. All said, she agreed to not do stuff she wouldn't do anyways save from utter desperation in exchange for never having to deal with angels. Angels would have been an inevitability, otherwise- good sees no issue with using them, and of course they could.

In short, she won the negotiation. Sure, the Grey Pilgrim probably got as much as he could of what he wanted out of it too, but that's not losing.

You can't beat good down. That's just not possible- Black pointedly avoids that kind of escalation for a reason. If Cat hadn't grown up and tried to focus on something other than "win", she'd just be the next Triumphant- may she never return.

Dwwolf

Double post ?

Mr. Nobody

Found it: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/02/interlude-crusaders/>

I think he just put the wrong link on the table of contents.

Hardric62

Late to the answer, but... I can bet this measures won't take for long... Posterity is talking about Uncivil Wars, after all...

shieldredblog

It occurs to me that as a Hero of Mercy, Absence may be the Grey Pilgrims weakness.

Nothing alleviates suffering like having never existed at all.

Onyavar

"Am I not allowed to grieve the sight of a child who mutilated her own soul trying to make a better world?" he asked.

That brought up the tears.

Especially when I think that Cat will have mutilated her soul further when she is done with his army.

---

Interlude: Crusaders

"There is no absolute virtue to peace. To avoid war out of petty fear is the exact same moral failure as waging war in name of it."

– Clément Merovins, fourth First Prince of Procer

"They're up to something," Princess Rozala of Aequitan said.

She had, that very morning, received a second report on enemy movements that baffled her. Unlike Amadis, who already saw their victory as writ in the sky and was positioning to benefit from the aftermath, the only daughter of Aenor of Aequitan had made deep study of their enemy. Oh, the Prince of Iserre was not a fool. Ambitious beyond reason, perhaps, but no imbecile. He'd be much easier to deal with if he were. Yet he only ever saw war as the pursuit of political advantage through steel, and that blinded him to the nature of the foe before them. Rozala was an Arlesite of ancient line, and her kind were as distinguished with the sword as they were with verse. Her people had fought and fought well in almost every major war since the founding of the Principate, and the Malanzas had been famed as generals long before they rose to royalty. Which was why this 'Army of Callow' worried her. The Legions of Terror, in their current incarnation, were admittedly one of the finest military machines on Calernia – second in lethality perhaps only to the army of Helike, though much more numerous. Yet that was not what she was facing: more than half the Army of Callow was foot from that same kingdom, and more worryingly under the Black Queen's banner rode knights.

Prince Papenheim had taught her mother a bloody lesson in the dangers of engaging heavy cavalry with light, at the Battle of Aisne. Rozala had no intention of repeating the mistakes that forced Aenor of Aequitan to drink mandrake extract. She had seen the aftermath of the Regal Kindness, and it was neither of those things.

"Praesi are known to have a certain low cunning," Prince Arnaud of Cantal mused. "No doubt they've some sort of parlour trick in the works."

Rozala eyed the middle-aged man with open distaste. The man was the living justification of every prejudice about Alamans arrogance, and she would have disliked him for that even if her agents had not learned about his... proclivities. She was no Lycaonese prude, but someone taking a knife to that man's cock would have been a boon to Creation.

"We underestimate the Empire at our own risk," Princess Adeline of Orne sharply replied.

Rozala inclined her head in thanks and the other young woman offered the ghost of a smile in return. Adeline had already hinted that she was not so securely under Amadis' thumb as the prince seemed to believe, through subtle intermediaries. Of all the royals to have crossed the Stairway, the Princess of Aquitan was fondest of this one. Adeline had ruled Orne for less than a year now, ascending to the throne after the assassination of her brother at the hands of what was speculated to be the Assassin himself. The princess understood the dangers of tangling with the Tower better than most. She also despised the First Prince to the bone. The Augur had, after all, not seen fit to give warning about her beloved brother's coming death. Cordelia Hasenbach, they were learning, could kill simply by staying silent.

"It is unseemly for women of your standing to quake at the coming of the Carrion Lord's bastard," Prince Arnaud sneered.

Rozala's lips thinned. There were persistent rumours that the Black Queen was the villain's illegitimate daughter, though she put no more stock in those than the speculation she was some distant Fairfax spared after the Conquest and reared in secret over the decades that followed.

"It is unseemly for a 'man' of your standing to be such a relentless jackass, Arnaud," Princess Adeline replied with a lightness that belied the anger beneath it. "But you don't hear us snipe about it, do you?"

Rozala sighed almost inaudibly. The Princess of Orne needed to learn to leash her temper, else they would eat her alive in the Highest Assembly. An ally this easy to bait was more liability than grace. She would have intervened to soothe the tempers, but Amadis finally decided to grace them with his presence. He was not, she saw, alone. The kindly wizened face of the Grey Pilgrim was a welcome addition to this council, but the other silhouette flanking the Prince of Iserre was not. Laurence de Montfort was short and skinny, for so infamous a woman, and her creased cheeks were showing the mottled spots of creeping age. They did nothing to detract from the austere presence of the Saint of Swords. The Princess of Aquitan stiffened, though she forced her shoulders to loosen before anyone could notice. Not royalty could ever be comfortable in the presence of the Regicide.

"I do hope my lateness caused no offence," Amadis Milenan affably smiled. "It occurred to me that an infusion of wisdom to this council would benefit us all, hence my company."

The smile was a little too broad, Rozala decided, to be entirely truthful. Had the heroes strong-armed him into inviting them along? They had certainly begun wielding their influence more strongly since the crossing. For all that the Saint was the one who brought sharp discomfort, it had been the Grey Pilgrim that brought terms back from the failed attempt at diplomacy in the south. The man was much more influential than his easy manners suggested.

"We are honoured to be offered seat at his table," the Pilgrim smiled, inclining his head.

"Honoured, yes," the Saint drawled, a hard smile splitting her face.

The Regicide had been exceedingly clear about her low esteem for royalty as a whole, which cast interesting light to the rumours she'd once been the lover of Klaus Papenheim. It would take someone with stomach as steady as the Iron Prince's to bed that one, Rozala silently conceded. For all they knew all there was down there was more swords, though for a Lycaonese that might just be spice in the wine.

"No offence at all," Prince Arnaud smiled brightly. "We always welcome the advice of those Chosen by the Heavens."

Rozala hid her derisive snort behind a sip of wine as the heroes and their glorious leader took their seats.

"Princess Rozala was expressing worries about Praesi scheming," Princess Adeline spoke up.

More to break the heavy silence than anything else, the ruler of Aquitan suspected. She did not grudge her the distraction.

"Ah," the Grey Pilgrim smiled gently. "Always a subject worthy of interest, yet I would caution you that it is not Praesi we face. It would be a mistake, Your Graces, to believe the army to the south anything but Callowan."

Rozala disliked the notion of taking military advice from priestly vagrant, however high his repute, but the circumstances warranted prudence. It was a villain that led the Army of Callow, and she knew little of their breed compared to the old man.

"Callowan she may be, but her throne was built on sand," Amadis languidly added. "Her grasp on the kingdom remains shallow. Duchess Kegan Iarsmai has already replied to my envoys."

Rozala hid her surprise. For all of Amadis' swagger, she'd fully expected the House of Iarsmai to remain aloof from the crusade until a clear winner could be discerned. The Prince of Iserre's smile broadened as he looked at her, the unspoken gloating ringing loud.

"Though she will not declare for us openly at the moment, she was willing to send a detachment of the Watch to join our forces," Amadis revealed. "They've already begun to sail across the Silver Lake, and I expect they will swell our ranks in time for battle."

The Arlesite princess frowned, displeased she'd been cut out of negotiations involving military matters.

"And how many of the Watch did she pledge?" she asked.

"A full thousand," Amadis said. "Easily worth thrice that number, if the old histories are to be believed."

And what did you have to promise that Deoraithe fox to get them, I wonder? Rozala thought. Amadis Milenan had been rather generous of late in partitioning the kingdom he expected her to conquer for him.

"You really should have been smacked more often as a child, Amadis," the Saint of Swords idly said. "Gods know a few bruises would have done wonders for your character."

The silence in the tent was so absolute it was nearly palpable. Rozala smothered a very unseemly grin.

"Pardon?" the Prince of Iserre coldly said.

"You heard me just fine, you repulsive little wart," Laurence de Montfort said. "Kegan Iarsmai fought a campaign with the Black Queen less than a year ago and you think that, what? Your viper tongue befuddled a Duchess of Daoine? That house was putting Praesi heads on pikes back when your ancestors were shitting in their own huts. She's playing you like a spectacularly dim fiddle."

Amadis Milenan's face purpled with fury. It was unlikely, Rozala mused with dark delight, that anyone had insulted him this bluntly even once in his life. The Grey Pilgrim cleared his throat.

"Laurence," he reproached.

The Saint of Swords sighed.

"Fine," she said. "The honourable Prince of Iserre is displaying the intellectual faculties of an averagely dim fiddle."

The Grey Pilgrim looked pained.

"What my blunt-spoken friend means, Your Grace," he intervened, "is that Catherine Foundling belongs to a very specific breed of villainy. The nature of her Bestowal is what my people call a thresher. One who separates the wheat from the chaff. She will earn great enmity, but also great loyalty. And she has fought by the side of Duchess Kegan before, against common foe."

Rozala was honest enough to admit that watching the Prince of Iserre having to swallow his cold fury to avoid beginning a feud with heroes was making her evening. Perhaps even her month.

"The Duchess bargained well," the prince stiffly said. "And extracted great concessions in rights and territory. The Queen of Callow has naught to offer of equivalent value."

So, land had been sold. Rozala wondered how far he'd gone. Had Laure been offered up? Denial almost certainly, it was the old dagger the Fairfaxes had kept pointed at Daoine's belly in case the Deoraithe began talking of independence again. The Princess of Aquitan quietly cleared her throat, gaining everyone's attention.

"I'll be blunt," she said. "The Black Queen should scare everyone in this tent. She has displayed surprising restraint so far, but this is the same woman who crucified a few hundred mages after the Doom to make a point. We are cornering her, and she has a reputation for baring her fangs when cornered."

Rozala sipped at her wine, drawing out her point in a reminder that in matters military it was her word that counted most.

"We marched out believing she'd come after the first bait we set out," she continued. "The failure of the trap at Harrow makes it very clear we were wrong in our assessment. And that is without considering she not only knew about the overtures to Baron Darlington, but turned that debacle into an offer of her own. I expected she scares the Duchess a lot more than we do, at the moment. Any contribution from her is suspect."

I'm not going to let you forget the Darlington failure any time soon, Amadis, she thought, smiling at the Prince of Iserre. So much for the north rising up behind the Black Queen.

"Making terms with the Enemy is always a fucking blunder," the Saint of Swords said. "Mark my words, the moment she feels the noose tightening the usual horrors are coming out. You should have smoked her then and there."

"She spoke truth, Laurence," the Grey Pilgrim stated, and there was iron beneath the mildness. "Do not gainsay me on this. I find it deeply shameful that any of us would hesitate at an opportunity to lessen the bloodbath, no matter the provenance."

"You've always been soft, Tariq," the Saint said. "The only thing I agree on with this band of clucking hens is that the east is in need of a good cleansing. The rot will only spread if we spare the flame. We go in half-hearted, and you know we'll have to come back in twenty years. Assuming we're still around."

Something pale and cold roiled in the Grey Pilgrim's eyes. Rozala felt the taste of a storm against the roof of her mouth. It unsettled her enough she spared no irritation for having been called a hen.

"You should know better," the hero quietly said, "than to question how far I will go to spare this world pain. You, of all people."

The old woman looked uncomfortable, then chastised. Rozala's eyes sharpened with interest. Of all the Named gathered under the banner of her army, these two were known to be first among equals. That they would quarrel at all had interesting implications. Until now, the politics of the heroes had been utterly opaque to her save for the fact that the other Levantines took the Pilgrim's words as sacred writ. All of the Named had resisted attempts to induce them into a deeper relationship so far, but if this rift before her was exploitable there were... possibilities to keep in mind. Known ties to a Chosen would silence her brother's ambitions for good, no matter his schemes.

"Apologies," the Saint finally said. "You know my temper."

"Like a bear with a bad tooth," the Pilgrim fondly said, patting her hand. "Already forgotten. We are all worried about the young ones in the south."

Princess Adeline cleared her throat daintily.

"Apologies, Chosen," she said. "But if I may ask, are you speaking of the heroes marching for the Vales?"

"I was under the impression the remaining Calamities were expected to fold," Rozala added warily.

If the Red Flower Vales held, their position up north became exceedingly precarious. Their supply lines would be effectively impossible to maintain as soon as they passed Hedges, and the First Prince had indicated she would be displeased if the crusaders turned to foraging in Callow. The Arlesite princess wasn't going to starve her army out of fear of offending Hasenbach, but she'd also rather avoid kicking that nest of wasps for a while still.

"In matters of might, the Carrion Lord is outmatched," the Pilgrim agreed. "So, we suspect, is the Warlock."

The Saint snorted inelegantly.

"The Witch is from Brocelian Forest," she said. "What she learned, she learned from the Gigantes. And that lot ruled the roost while the Praesi were still busy figuring what cocks are for. She'll pulp his ass across the valley floor, if they go spell for spell."

"Young Hanno has already fought the Black Knight once," the Pilgrim smiled. "He will not repeat previous mistakes. Yet the opponents are villains grown old, and this is a rare thing for a reason. It will not be an easy victory."

"The man is one of Ranger's toys," the Saint conceded. "And that ornery old bitch plays rough. He won't go down without making a mess."

The Levantine flicked an amused glance at his companion, but did not comment.

"We thank you for your guidance," Prince Amadis said calmly. "Yet I fear we have strayed from the purpose of this council. Princess Malanza was expressing worries, I believe?"

Rozala nodded.

"It's clear that the Black Queen is expecting to give battle on the outskirts of the Barony of Hedges," she said. "But I've been getting reports of her splitting up her host, and that honestly baffles me. We outnumber her by more than two to one. She should be the one attempting defeat in detail, not the one offering me that opportunity on a silver platter."

"She is barely more than a child," Prince Arnaud shrugged. "Blunders are to be expected."

And there went the only Alamans royalty in the tent, breaking his silence to offer idiocy.

"She's a girl that never lost a battle," Prince Amadis warned. "In matters of statecraft poor judgement is to be expected, but she is not unskilled at war."

"She could have gotten arrogant," Rozala admitted. "It's not uncommon in undefeated commanders, and that she was confident enough to offer limiting rules of engagement when so heavily outnumbered is telling. But I imagine the Exiled Prince and the Summer Court told themselves much the same right before she ripped out their guts."

"Though her nature is undeniably warped," the Grey Pilgrim said, "she struck me as remarkably clear-sighted in some regards. Not a woman prone to blind mistakes."

"There's a whole city of dead Callowans that begs to disagree," the Saint drawled.

"It is not only the children of the Heavens that can learn from their mistakes," the Pilgrim chided her. "She will be wary of being burned in that manner again."

"Perhaps she intends to gather her forces through the fairy gates," Princess Adeline suggested.

"We know there's a delay for journeying through Arcadia," Rozala replied, shaking her head. "And she can only take one host at a time. There are three columns marching towards us. Even if she timed it perfectly, she'd still have a third of her army in the wrong place when the battle begins. Which, to put it bluntly, she cannot afford if she wants even a shadow of a chance of winning."

"We know the Wild Hunt is sworn to her," Prince Arnaud said. "Perhaps she can make multiple gates."

"I can't dismiss that possibility out of hand," the Princess of Aquitan agreed. "But that still begs the question of why she'd split her forces in the first place. She has to know we'll be expecting gates to appear at our flanks and back when we engage. There would be no element of surprise, and that is half the advantage to be had with them. And if our foot moves quickly enough towards the gates, we could even keep her penned inside Arcadia. It is risking disaster for no gain I can discern."

"That is worrying," the Grey Pilgrim admitted. "I must see to the children, Your Graces, but I will seek guidance from Above on the matter. Perhaps a meaning to this can be divined."

Rozala hid her surprise. She'd been under the impression that future-telling was rare even among heroes, and often too vague to be of any practical use. The Augur was rumoured to be speaking in tongues half the time, and that Hasenbach was constantly struggling to turn her attention to threats instead of weather patterns. If the Grey Pilgrim could truly discern the workings of Fate, however, this was major advantage. It was irritating that such a thing would only now be revealed, but then Rozala was hardly in a position to chide the man for it.

"We will look forward to hearing your wisdom, Chosen," the Princess of Aquitan said.

The man rose, and bowed deep. He cast a look at the Saint, who smiled but shook her head. Rozala schooled her face into calm. She had an inkling that what would follow would not be pleasant. Silence followed in the wake of the departing Pilgrim, until the Saint of Swords sighed.

"He's a good man, you know," Laurence de Montfort said. "Likes to see the best in people."

"A-" Prince Arnaud began, but he was interrupted.

The Saint raked her fingers across the table, leaving deep gouges in the wood that no mortal fingers could have made. The sound was deafening, an ugly grind of steel.

"Shut the fuck up, you insignificant toady," the Saint said. "Now, Tariq chooses to believe in your moral fibre but I know better. I know the wickedness that you crave, that sweet whisper of earthly power. There are some among you, even now, that believe holy war can be made tool of ambition."

The old woman smiled at them, cold and terrible and utterly indifferent to their survival.

"You will not disappoint this nice old man," she said. "You will keep to the terms, and not seek to work around them. And if you seek otherwise?"

The Saint barked out a harsh laugh.

"You might be under the delusion that the consequences of ripping you animals to pieces would give me pause," she mused. "Discard that notion, princelings. The only people I answer to are up Above, and they exactly what you are made of."

Laurence de Montfort rose to her feet, shrugging.

"Think of me as the angel on your shoulders," she suggested. "You know, the one that says 'be Good, my children, or I will fucking dine on your entrails like an orc.'"

The Saint of Swords smiled at them, wagging a finger.

"I think we have an understanding, don't we?"

No one nodded.

No one needed to.

---

erraticerrata

First update of the month, so extra chapter in the usual tab! This one is titled "Court I", the first of a multiple POV arc set in the interim between Book III and IV.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What do you mean by "tab?" In the menu there's "Home", "Art, Maps, and Other", and "Table of contents." That's all. I don't see anything else this could refer to

Stormblessed

Basically I expected nothing less from an interlude of our oncoming Heroes. Or "heroes". Brandishing threats and brutal murder is only heroic because they got Angels and Good and I can really see Black's point about the unfairness of their reality during chapters like these.

Byzantine

I have said it before and will say it again: Good is order and Evil is chaos.

They are just using the labels "Good" and "Evil" because the Heavens had a better PR guy.

sengachi

I don't think that's quite accurate. Malicia has proven quite well that Evil can be order. And William proved quite well that Good can be chaos. (Also one of the main heroes literally flips a fucking Heaven-backed coin to decide his opponent's fate. Good is absolutely **not** order).

I think what we see in this world is an absence of an actual force promoting good. At least, good as I'd see it defined. To me good is something which seeks to construct a world in which everyone is valued and cared for.

Evil in this world definitely can't be good because Evil in this world is all about personal accumulation of power. Black's ideals and goal might break the dichotomy of Good and Evil, but it won't actually make the world a better place in any meaningful sense. All he'll have succeeded in doing will have been concentrating power behind a new status quo, which will be no more beholden to people's good than what came before. Praes may no longer have to go to war on the regular if he has his way, but the world he seeks to create isn't one in which those in power have any material incentive to actually improve their citizens' lives.

(Framed this way I think we can make a pretty decent argument that Cat isn't actually a villain. She's actively decentralizing her power, doing the opposite of what Evil typically does. She's not Good ... but she's not Evil either).

And that brings us to Good. Good, I think, is retribution. And it is explicitly **not** redress. It is payment and consequence for sins with no remedy or solution to improve for the future. There's no moderation to it, and no positive purpose. Unlike Evil it does recognize cruelty and injustice as, y'know, bad things. But it doesn't **do** anything about that. It kills the people who perpetrate it, but that's barely even handling symptoms. There's certainly no attempt to address causes. It's an action movie's caricature of justice, in which the world is fixed by Bad People being Punished and Good People Triumphant, without any actual social change or serious contemplation of systemic problems.

The end result of which is a world in which the powerful spend their citizen's lives as currency, and one side revels in it while the other side chides them for reveling in it. And villains concentrate power and heroes kill villains and absolutely no one tries to make the world a better place. (Except Cat and maybe kind of Black). And everyone with power, hero and villain alike, gets to throw that power around as they see fit.

Graeme Sutton

Good in this world seems to be based purely on a Natural Law ethical framework. Nothing that we would recognize as utilitarianism or humanism seems to enter into it.

TeK

I personally would like to see Good that is redemption. To quote the line that sang true to me:

"There is not a single life I've taken I have not regretted," the Grey Pilgrim sighed. "No matter the deeds to their name. To inflict death is to end the possibility of redemption, and that is the greatest gift the Gods have granted us."

And people are so often disappointed with it, because most Heroes think that Good is about retribution. Half the problem you got with Villains doubling down, opening grimuars and summoning demons is because they KNOW, that they will get no second chance, only gallows. Not a shred of Compassion and Mercy, just Justice and Contrition. That is why so many Villains rage against Heavens. The sheer fucking arrogance of many Heroes, to think that because someone is not on the same side as you, they can't even be considered humans, but should be put down like rabid dogs. I would balk at that too.

Charlie Hegarty

I think firstly that Good in this story does to an extent fit your definition of good but also that the you are putting somewhat of an unfair burden on the forces of Good, this is medieval setting and as such isn't going to reflect modern opinion because that has evolved over time.

I would say that there is a positive moral value to the prevention of evil acts, in this chapter the 'brandishing of threats and murder' is not heroic only because they have Angels on their side but because it is done to prevent what we would consider war crimes. The positive purpose of Good is the creation of a world where less atrocities happen. I would agree that heroes should do more, but that stopping Evil acts from happening is still good; it is hard after all to have that better future where everyone is valued and cared for when there is a Tyrant in charge who will enable the destruction of their own city. The world might not be fixed by 'Bad People being Punished' but it is made better.

Also we have only seen martial heroes who are fighting villains as this story is about a villain and consequently those fighting her. Heroes chosen by the choir of mercy who never take a life probably do acts that aren't focussed on mitigating the damage done by villains but on making the world a better place. Cordelia for example, has for a long time been working on accords with the hope of unifying Procer more, so that there would be less civil wars, which certainly sounds to me like trying to address systematic issues within her country, but this is not her story this is the story of a villain.

TeK

Did I hurt poor Heroes itty-bitty feelings? Maybe I am unfair to Good and putting too much on it. The thing is, what's the difference between Good and Evil then? Both Cat and Black "Punished Bad People". Black also invaded country to break them from perpetual circle of countless wars, saving many, many lives. Oh muh God, he's a Hero))) That's the point of Good, that it strives to be better. The moment they slackened at this quality, they are nothing more than glorified butchers. I know there are good heroes out there. As of yet, Gandalf is my favorite Hero, hands down. Really excited to see someone sworn to Mercy or Compassion. But do you know, what I would've expected someone sworn to Mercy do? Go into the thick of fighting on the continent (Callow), and help everyone, like a red Cross or Doctors without Borders. Where are all of them? None even came with a Crusade. Also, you do not Prevent anything, if you only React.

Yeah, there are ONLY martial heroes. Even technically non-martial Heroes do only fighting. I've been whining earlier that there are little to none Non-Combat Names, like say, Inventor, Architector, Plower, Chef, at best we got vague governmental Names, say Good King, Hierarch, they still fight, just in non-direct way, like Jupiter is still a bloodthirsty ork, even if she found a unique way to indulge her passion.

Lastly, Cordelia is NOT Named. Me thinks it's why she's so much more far-sighted.

Jago

War crimes ....

Exactly how mind reaping a whole city and making an army of all its inhabitants isn't a war crime?

You have realized that that means making child soldiers of all the underage people of that city?

I am not speaking only of the Lone Swordsman attempt, but of what has already been done in the past.

Or almost anything the Wandering Bard do? Pushing for the realization of Akua weapons, manipulating the Free Cities war to slay a single Calamity and sacrificing people left and right to get that result?

Good (not capitalized) isn't the absence of Evil (capitalized), especially when Good use evil means to get that.

The definition of Good in this story is "our side".

Nothing more. All is allowed, no moral restraints, no doubts, anyone that isn't on that side is automatically an enemy and Evil.

Some individuals and some heroes are good and not only Good, but they seem to be exceptions, not the norm.

Byzantine

I'm talking Order as in obeys the Laws set down by the Heavens vs Chaos where they obey no laws except their own – and even those only when they want to. It isn't quite the same as D&D chaos and order, but it makes a usable comparison.

The entire concept of "Good" and "Evil" are really "The gods should dictate our lives" versus "We should be able to do whatever we want." With an amendment that in the second case the gods won't be helping, either.

This makes Evil turn to using human means to do the impossible, which generally involves a horrific price. On the other hand Good gets to turn to the divine and get their aid to accomplish the impossible, letting them evade the human price. Instead they pay it by being obliged to follow the rules the gods above set down.

His Royal Madness

I know this is really late but Catherine's phrase "Justifications only matter to the Just" is very accurate to the Heavens and Good. All the forms of Good are those who's forms of Justification and Justice align with an alien sense of right. The Angels are an alien form of Good that is distilled through Heroes they deem as aligned with their views on a human level. Even their actions and thoughts are on the extreme level of human acceptance.

Abrakadabra

You Just dont get it. Good IS order. Divine order, which means divine hierarchy. Which means kneeling before the gods above and observing their rules and judgment. And Evil is chaos, because there is no divine order, no rules, no judgment.

AS an aside ever wondered why Bellerophon sides with the below? Because they refuse the divine hierarchy thats why.

stevenneiman

@Sengachi Hanno is actually one of the stronger arguments for Good being defined by order. He's not like two-face, flipping a coin because he craves the randomness of its results. He flips a coin because he knows the results of that flip to be decided by a higher power and genuinely believes that power capable of making better decisions than he could himself. Of course, from an outside perspective his attempt to escape responsibility by following orders doesn't work any better than it did at the Nuremburg trials.

What I would say is that Good is about community and social contract and Evil is about personal ambition, though both also have a lens of classic hero and villain roles in stories. These two forces have roughly the same conflict and roughly the same balance of pros and cons as in the real world, amplified, formalized, and distorted where stories clash with those broad ideals. Good has a regulating effect which can often prevent the most disastrous of individual behavior, but which can also prevent dissent against harmful social policies and convinces people that what they do is for a higher purpose even if it isn't actually helpful. Evil encourages people to do whatever they feel is appropriate, which leads to more of the worst kinds of people like Akua or Triumphant (may she never return) rising to power and not being checked because the system encourages their behavior, but at the same time no divine support to control others beyond what you can accomplish by your own means, which means greater personal freedom in most cases.

Where things get really nasty is in the recurring patterns. Almost every real conflict is driven by people who believe that they are in the right and that they could make the world better if they could just get the other side to get out of their way. Not necessarily healthy, but it's at least a paradigm which is focused on progress. In Calernia, conflicts are driven by the forces of narrative, which set up both sides for the spectacle of making them fight, and those forces are given reasons to fight almost as an afterthought. This not only robs conflict of any kind of purpose, but also precludes any kind of meaningful victory. Good triumphs over Evil because that's what the stories are about, but Good can never win in such a way that there won't be a sequel. The horror isn't so much that Good and Evil have flawed ideologies (the real world has plenty of flawed ideologies but it isn't nearly as much of a mess as Calernia), it's that those ideologies can never be the real focus of conflict so much as the conflict itself.

The real world does occasionally see things like this, but they're fairly isolated cases compared to Calernia, because they need to be set up by malicious people rather than being the default state. Things like wars started because someone wants to profit from them or use them as a distraction from their own action, or artificial controversies created to hide the truth that everyone in the know recognizes. Despite their rarity these kinds of conflicts are often the most harmful and the most long-fought, and in Calernia they are happening constantly by divine mandate. The Gnomes might have escaped this by focusing their narrative on progress and on effectively managing threats, but there's not enough data on them to do more than speculate.

Metrux

I myself think that Good is about control, because anyone who is truly Good follows the Heavens, no exception, since the ones who could be Hero or Villain are more grey than Good. While Evil is about freedom, but not free will, such as you can control someone else as long as you're capable of. You can see that both in the first prologue, in inverted roles, as in every heroic chapter.

The problem with Calernia, in the end, is not the beliefs, but I don't think it is the focus of the conflicts neither, it is the Gods Above. The Gods Below are horrible for what we've seen, but they never make you do anything, while the Gods Above are the ones making the conflict. Every Villain becomes a Villain because he wanted something, most of the time, something that Heavens took from them or wouldn't allow. Sure, most of those are selfish and even idiotic, but then we get people like Cat, Hakram and Hierophant: She wants to help her people, he wants to make his warlord's dream true, the last wants to learn all there is to learn. They basically don't want any confrontation, and doesn't this seem good, although it sits on the Evil side? The Heroes, on the other hand, are ALWAYS under Heavens mandate to vanquish Evil, their mission is always something antagonistic, while Villains want to achieve something, Heroes want to oppose something, most of the time something bad, but even then they are against, not in favour.

In the end Good is absolutely not good, and Evil isn't necessarily evil, but Good is what drives the necessary conflict for ever single person, so as long as there is Heavens mandate there will be fights and deaths in this ridiculous scale, with only some pockets that have too much power to be draged into it, like hte Gnomes or Archer's place. Thus, my belief that it isn't the beliefs or the focus, but the Heavens that drive things to this state in the story. To be made clear, in the story only, not a religious discussion here.

iwishiwasinger

I agree with everything else but I think the most important thing in this story is the Gods. The gods in this story are claimed as black and white, but I have one question. Are there actually two factions of Gods or just one?

As you mentioned things are started usually out of greed and one of the best examples is that of war profiteers rather than politicians. I can't help but wonder if all the villains and heroes are being nothing more than faith generators and wondering if the Gods above and bellow aren't in the same office.

A seemingly off hand thought by Cat when she was sitting in the temple was that the congress never changes in size in the church. It never gets too much nor to little. Reasonably that means divine intervention. It makes very little sense though, because that would imply that the gods above were stronger and we know that villains are tired of losing because of black, but why haven't villains disappeared entirely? The villains can't be losing that bad because then why would there be any left after thousands of years of war. The Gods above are obviously cheating, because they keep helping out whenever they are close to losing, and while the same is similar to demons being summoned, they don't seem to ever help the villains in the long run unlike the angels.

The other thing that would suggest they are cheating is how many heroes pop up naturally the second there is one evil person nearby but as far as we know the villains only pop up near other villains and only to replace the last villains. There should be no reason that villains have survived this long, which can only mean that there is a reason that the angels will suddenly pull their punches when they are about to win and will stop the gods bellow from winning. It could also be that the angels have won long ago and that evil is only kept to fear monger. I could definitely imagine the temples saying things along the line of "your sister was killed by a demon because someone became a villain if you don't go to church and donate sizeable gold to the temple you are basically letting the demons win and killing her again."

I would love to see this as how the story goes. They could end up fighting the angels and just when they think they are going to lose the gods bellow are suddenly killed off and there with the biggest grimace is Lady Triumphant having returned after taking over hell and the last campaign being into heaven with Lady Triumphant, heroes, villains, Orcs, Ranger, and Catherine fighting the Gods themselves

Quie Possibly A Cat

I disagree!

More seriously we DO see examples of Good "winning" and Evil "winning" on more local scales. Keter, the Dead King and his Hell are an example of "Evil wins" in that area.

For Good we have the far off Elf country that spans a whole continent. And as we know, that type of elf is "Good", even if they commit a little light ethnic cleanse.

There does not seem to be any strong rubber band that keeps on resetting things to neutral. There are probably other forces, just like in our world, that prevent one nation or faction from overrunning everything. But it absolutely can happen!

iwishiwasinger

But they haven't seriously won, and if no one ever won on a local sense then there wouldn't be as much fear. If no one good people died in movies you wouldn't have to be afraid for you character's lives and the same could be said with countries. Yes there are the occasional victories but why hasn't one side completely won. You say that there does not seem to be any strong rubber band but there does with the angels that are extremely powerful and that aren't afraid of interfering heavily, but that just haven't finished off evil. The villains also seem to only be created in an enviromeant where there are other villains which also puts them at disadvantage too. So the question is why hasn't good won for good?

There is just enough victory that either side thinks they could win or at least benifit and make a difference.

Again Cat mentions that the church never gets too big or too small, which in this case seems to be a chekov's gun. It is weird for her too mention that. I also can't help but wonder who the bard is. The bard doesn't seem to be liked by good or bad, but is also seemingly unstoppable. She might be someone else working against the system of continual war.

The small wins seem to encourage prayer on both sides. Maybe if it is not outright collusion, they might both understand the consequences of their side winning. Prayer would be trivialized as it is today. If you never have good you can't be truly evil and if you don't have true good you don't have evil.

It is also possible that we use the comparison of light and dark to show power. The greater the light the more noticeable the dark. The darker the night, the more bright the light shines. Maybe if good is about to win the angels can't interfere and must rely on heroes and maybe if evil is about to win the greater the cost the devil's charge. It would explain Triumphant's loss if the angels got a power boost because they were about to lose.

stevenneiman

I'm not really sure about the exact specifics, but what's important is that the driving force is the spectacle of conflict with the reasons for there to be conflict arising as a result. This is the opposite of the real world, where reasons for a conflict to exist generally spawn conflicts. For example, the leaders of Praes got stupid and greedy and attempts to check population growth always failed because Praes was an Evil nation meant to invade the Good nation of Callow, rather than Praes invading Callow because their rampant population growth created a need for more food. It's like that with every conflict in Creation. Whether its the work of Fate, one or both of the Gods Above or Below, or if there's no difference between the three, all that matters is a setup that by design and almost by definition has problems that will be addressed by war but never solved.

It's just like Cat's vision of the cycle of Summer and Winter victories. One side might win or lose, but the board always gets reset close enough to the same way, and the trivial coup-counting victories are meaningless compared to the fact that nobody can leave.

RanVor

I'd rather say Evil is change and Good is stagnation. Every Hero we've seen so far is all about upholding the status quo by any means necessary. The entire point of this crusade is bringing the situation back to square one.

danh3107

The Saint is a prickly, ornery old bitch. I like her

Nguyen Hong Hai

Really wish we could see how the old lady tussle with Ranger, that is the stuffs of legends there.

Antoninjohn

The official reason for the Crusade is the greater breach, but who funded and ordered the greater breach, the First Prince for more territory, and Cat knows this through her murder coat and can tell everyone about it on a sworn Oath of truthfulness, along with Callow officially annexed by the Princes suddenly there "allies" won't be very happy and they loose high moral ground

naturalnuke

The money was from Malacia not The First Prince.

SilentLurker

Actually the money was from neither, and came from Akua's only family funds. Malicia's contribution was disguising exactly what was happening and allowing specific materials that only had a few purposes to reach Akua in secret, instead of being discovered and done away with. As for the First Prince? She probably had Augur tell her something was going to go down, and started setting up for the repercussions instead of stopping it. At the heart, all the really high rulers appear to be schemers of the worst sort, and equally capable of terrible deeds, just executing those deeds in slightly different ways due to differing resources.

SilentLurker

meant to say *Akua's own, not *only

JackbeThimble

Akua's family funds came from the First Prince.

SilentLurker

I don't remember this. Can you point me to the place in the books where this is? The only big thing I remember the First Prince funding in Callow was that first Rebellion.

White

It was in one of Malicia's conversations with either Black or Cat. Probs black. They were talking about how Cordilia was propping up Talia as revenge for Malicia using the Pravos bank to extend the Proceran civil war.

Malicia let it happen so that she could cut the money off in a coup de grace, but presumably no small amount of it was used to fund Akau's little plan.

*frolamiz*

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/04/closure/>

"It was the irony of it I could not resist," Tasia said. "All that gold you poured into Procer, turned to silver and sent to my coffers. You might as well have been funding me yourself."

JackbeThimble

The Saint of Swords appears to be living up to her illustrious surname.

So is this basically confirmation that Catherine's Name is now "The Black Queen".

*oldschoolvillain*

Not really. People have been calling her that for ages now, the Heroes might just be making that assumption, along with the rest of Calernia.

JackbeThimble

Yeah but WOG is that there are no 'Stealth' Names. What makes it a Name is the fact that it's what people call you. If she has a new Name then people should know what it is by now.

Rook

We did, however, have some foreshadowing through the augur that Cat is ill suited for a throne though, and on top of that she still has no aspects that would confirm a Name being set in stone.

A major war against literal legends crawling out from under rocks older than half the players is exactly the kind of thing that could engrave a different Name for her.

SilentLurker

Except this excludes Book One where Black and Cat talk about Goblin Names, and how if your culture, what a Name springs from, revolves around working in the shadows and being secretive, the Name could be hidden. It isn't a guarantee, but I'd be willing bet there are some Named out there that are completely unknown to be Named.

naturalnuke

"Jokes I'm the White Knight now!"

– Catherine faking another prophecy

bobthebuilder

specifically said the transition was interrupted when Black destroyed the deal between Cat and the Empress

stevenneiman

"Black Queen" is a common nickname which neither side has any reason not to use. Personally, I suspect that her technical Name is either Queen of Callow or she doesn't exactly have one. It already talked about Fall having a cancerous effect on her old Name of Squire, gradually eclipsing her other Aspects, so I wouldn't be surprised if the current state is that she doesn't exactly have a Name or Aspects at all at the moment, just a the power of Winter wrapped around the remains of her old Name.

Not that I can ever be 100% certain of anything with this story. I definitely think that there's a low but nonzero chance that her Name is Black Queen now.

haihappen

My suspicion is that she currently has _NO_ name attached to her, because Winter ATE the last one. Winter only ever takes, and gives nothing back. Didn't Cat say something like "there is not enough of the name left to qualify", which could have meant "left inside her" or "left at all". The Name Squire may be gone for good, at least until it is restored some way.

And the Name Black Queen was forming in Liesse, but that forming was interrupted by the Black Knight, when he destroyed the Folly. Maybe that forming was completed when she was crowned, but maybe not, and Queen is traditionally a "Good" Name, so it is unlikely that she ended up with that one.

My second-best personal theory is that she is currently on her path to "Queen of Winter" as her Name, but is consciously or subconsciously fighting it, because that would make all her domain into an icy wasteland.

First one, as stated above, is that as long as Winter has its claws so deep in her soul, she cannot get a Name.

Or, because of narrative imperative, some shit will go down and the truth will be revealed in a dramatic fashion.

NZPIEFACE

Queen of Winter would just make her a god though.

DroughtBringer

Huh. Saint is... interesting.

---

Erraticerrata, is it House of Ismail or house of Iarsmai? It was Iarsmai thorought the entirety of the last book, so I thought I'd ask.

Rook

The Saint has so little subtlety it makes Cat almost seem refined. If there isn't enough vitriol in their first conversation to create a second wasteland, I would be very surprised.

oldschoolvillain

It'll be great.

Walter

Saint seems like the other side of the Black coin. Like, Black is enraged that the world never lets the villains win. Saint is enraged that the heroes victories never 'stick'. Every time they put the east to the sword they have to come back and do it again a generation later.

It feels like this is the hero, above all others, who Cat must strike down. I have a presentiment that if she wins she'll try to burn her victory into the world in horrific fashion. Kill all Orcs and Gobilns or something similarly hideous.

Graeme Sutton

Something like... 'kill them all and let god sort them out.'?

vuthuha912

I find that Black and Saint are the same in their opinion of Evil. Black hates Evil, everything about it, the backstabbing, the devil summoning, the if-I-am-on-fire-then-so-is-everybody-else attitude, he wants to kill them off the stop it. Maybe Saint can do it for him when he is busy at Vale. Black might even help Saint deal with the Stupid Evil. He might die for it but honestly, he does not seem to care. The exact reason that the entire Akua mess happen is that Black wasn't forceful enough. He is too lenient and too willing to compromise for his friend. I swear if you had given somebody 20 years to change their minds, show them a way out, give them as many chances as possible and they still didn't change their side then we have to accept the fact that they will never change and deal with it accordingly. Sure, they will fight back and it will be bloody but it is better to do it when we can still recover than right before the fight for survival.

My gosh, 40 f*cking years, and the result is the 2 c*nt on the Ruling Council and Akua. How many 40 years do you have in a lifetime? How much longer do we need to wait for these people to have a change of heart? Never, I will tell you.

oldschoolvillain

"She'll pulp his ass across the valley floor, if they go spell for spell."

Ha. Ha ha. Aha.

Funny thing about Warlock – he didn't get his sobriquet by going "spell for spell" with his old mentor. He got it by being clever, and arranging his enemy's destruction without the application of such brute force. True, The Witch might be a vastly superior spellcaster than Warlock (I doubt it, Word of God had Warlock as the greatest living sorcerer in Calernia in Liesse III or IV), but if she whips him in their first encounter, he'll open up their second encounter with a chunk of hell big enough that even he can't destroy it. In the case of his defeat, it was outright stated that he knows more of the hells than pretty much anyone in Calernia – dropping her into one or ripping open a Lesser Breach to introduce a few demons to the Crusade would be right up the Praesi alley.

That said, these guys seem competent. But making a very big mistake when they say that Black is doomed because Hanno is stronger than him. Black has never found victory through raw strength. He's done it by being careful and by not playing fair. And when he's got an army in front and behind him, with a general greater than Juniper and a pair of old bats like Ranker and Sacker behind him . . . this'll be one to remember.

DroughtBringer

Greater than Juniper? I'd disagree, I'd say that The Woes (and company) replace The Calamities (and company) by building off of what came before and becoming something more. Juniper wins. That's what she does, and the more tactics she sees the more wells of knowledge she has to draw from.

Although others may have more of a legend to them, I think that The Woes are set up to surpass the Calamities in every way.

SilentLurker

Grem One Eye is largely acknowledged as the single most competent tactician on Calernia, with even Black, who can apparently plan for twenty years ahead with little difficulty, and it took a memory carrying Hero as old as the Dead King and a prophet to throw a wrench in the works, saying he can't match Grem. Juniper is excellent, but tacticians, unlike regular soldiers who start to get weaker as time goes on past a certain point, only get better with experience until they either start losing their minds or retire. Juniper might match Black if she has a good day, but she's still a few years from being able to really stand equal to Grem. Juniper also isn't a Woe, and neither is Grem. Both are mortal, and it's also worth noting the last orc before Hakram to come close to a name was Grem, and with his skill set, there's only really one type of name he could have gotten.

Cap'n Smurfy

Warlock is probably far more talented as a spellcaster alright. I get the impression the Witch has more raw power though and probably a solid background in enchanting from the Gigantes. The idea of the two going directly head to head seems off to me though. Warlock isn't one for direct spellcasting and witches in folklore tend to be more about curses, rituals, summoning and potions, not fireballs and lightning bolts to the face. It would be hilarious to see the two try and constantly one up the other with clever spellcasting tricks though. "Fool, you are now under my control!"

"That was just an illusion with a rebound spell. It is in fact you who is under my control!"

"I knew you'd do that which is why I'm wearing this amulet of rebound spell rebounding!"

"I knew you'd know I'd do that so I actually cast an illusion on the... ect"

Nguyen Hong Hai

So basically your average DnD munchkin sessions?

Engineer

Oh that would be a treat! However EE said Warlock would go all out before the end of the series and this strikes me as the perfect time for that to happen.

sengachi

Nah. It's totally gonna be saved for Triumphant returning.

SilentLurker

WOG that I remember is that Warlock is actually just in the Top 5 on Calernia, though this might be because those five have never gone head to head instead of being a statement that he isn't the best.

criptus

iirc, WOG is that Warlock is in the top 5 in Calneria, not number one.

criptus

Yeah, Warlock is number 3: "Warlock is the third mage in that top five, and your two guesses are on the list."

Cap'n Smurfy

Well the top one has to be the Dead King, but then whose the second? One of the Gigantes?

Quie Possibly A Cat

Assuming Team Good knows their stuff the Witch is presumably the 2nd best.

- 1) Dead King
- 2) Witch
- 3) Warlock
- 4) ???
- 5) ???

Cap'n Smurfy

Looking at the oppossiton, all I can think is "Oh dear, Cat's going to eat them alive.". Heroes aside, I can see why an upcoming battle is named The Prince's Graveyard with this pack of morons in charge.

Darkening

Yeah, the one princess seems relatively competent, but running a war by committee seems like it's going to end horribly. Especially if the watch is coming and ready to backstab them.

Rook

From the Heroes attitude toward the nobles, I almost wonder if the Prince's Graveyard will be all Cats doing.

The Saint is about as softhearted as forged steel with all the subtlety of Ranger, and she almost mirrors the Choirs in how severe her judgement is in anything she doesn't see as strictly Good. I can see her fighting a battle against every side at the first hint of her lines being crossed, since she's made it abundantly clear that she's not on Procer's side. She's on the side of the Gods Above and just about nothing else.

I don't see the pilgrim being any less severe when push comes to shove either. You don't command respect – not request, but *command* respect while her temper is flared up – from someone like the Saint by collecting bottle caps. Something tells me that the iron in kindly old grandpa's eyes is as sharp as any razor when he bares it.

Quie Possibly A Cat

Yeah, just because its the Prince's Graveyard doesn't mean that Cat's gonna come out ahead. It might mean bad things for the Princes, but it sounds like Saint wants to kill them all as it is. Her nickname is Regicide! Look their chances of survival probably go up the more complete and total their defeat. If they win there is about a 100% chance they manage to piss off Saint.

Rook

Pretty long shot, but if the Pilgrim/Saint were so inclined it would be one of the only ways to actually flip Cat over to Good. Win against her first, and offer terms to forcibly keep Procer out of Callow in exchange for switching sides. Presented with an option to keep Callow safe when the alternative is likely death, there's actually very little holding her back from taking the offer (albeit mostly in Name, since she's all about Callow in the first place).

Her Name is up in the air, she only gives a shit about Callow, Adjutant only gives a shit about her, Masego only gives a shit about research, Archer gives no shits about anything, and Thief leans toward Heroics in the first place. She's estranged from the Tower and Black at the same time, and Callow in general has no inherent Evil inclinations. Kegan is probably more comfortable on the side that puts Praesi heads on pikes, and appeasing the Hunt has never been the issue so much as keeping power over them. Even the fifteenth is more bound to her than Praes at this point.

It suits the type of outcome the Pilgrim is looking for as well, since it's essentially a chance for Redemption of not just one Villain but most of her massive retinue and the entirety of the nation at the same time. A far less bloody way of putting a Heroic ruler on the throne – without murdering the current one or destabilizing the country.

Unmaker

@Rook (just in case this doesn't indent)
Your reasoning looks sound... but I'm not seeing that actually happen. This is, after all, Practical Guide to Evil. Redemption just doesn't seem like it would fit in there.

Rook

Yeah it's a real long shot. Title of the serial kind of kills it though lol you're right

TeK

Who knows? Maybe the first rule of Practical Evil is: don't be Evil? Given a world where Good is ordained to win, seems like a working strategy.

Ashen Shugar

Practical Evil is to run a protection racket until you've managed to buy up a bunch of legit, profitable businesses, then go squeaky clean. I don't think it's completely out of the picture for Cat to stay in a winter frozen transient name state until everything is almost settled, then jumps into a "Good" name for the final climb up the tower.

Or maybe, she climbs the tower, settles everything, then finally transitions in "Dread Empress the Kindly". Then everyone in Praes goes "Huh?" as their jaw drops. ; )

Atypical Gult

Actually, that would make things easier for Cat, for if the Saint kills the Princes, Cat can truthfully tell Malicia that she did not have any hand in the death of the two Princes who she was supposed to keep her alive. It's not like Malicia asked her to save them, just merely not kill.

Considering how Cat's luck though, I expect that this would not happen precisely for that reason.

Theoretically_human

"and they exactly ____ what you are made of."

I Think you _____ a word there.

great chapter EE

oldschoolvillain

"And they [know] exactly what you are made of" I think, was supposed to be the sentence.

Darkening

Y'know, for a moment I felt that last bit would be out of character for an angel to say, and then I remembered what angels are like in this setting. I could totally see one gutting someone for misbehaving.

nipi

Yeah. What happened when you summoned an angel of Judgement? Oh right everyone deemed to have sinned dies or something like that

DD

I am Team Evil all the way. Not a Stupid Evil fan, but I came weary of fantasy's constant forcing of "good" victories, even when an idiot can pick out the plot holes and pick out the obvious reasons the heroes should have lost. This serial let's me dance upon their graves.

That said, I am quite liking this Saint of Swords, though not enough to want her to survive the Calamities or Woe.

*ahd*

The Saint of Swords may possibly be able to see peoples' actual intentions and desires.

(Which, yeah, explains the general crankiness. I would be crankier than that.)

Outside chance she'll take one look at the Foundling and defect to join the Woe.

Rook

There's no way the relationship between Cat and the Saint ends in anything but someone getting steel shoved through their throat (figuratively speaking, considering at least one has already survived a beheading)

The Saint seems to be wholly on the side of Good, which means she's likely not one to tolerate the petty bullshit Procer will try to pull using the name of Good. Unfortunately, it also makes her nearly irreconcilable with anyone even superficially related to the Gods Below.

I don't see her as a sympathethetic/finding common grounds type of character so much as, 'well, at least the psychopath is consistently brutal to everyone'

*ahd*

Never seen a pair more suited to playing Good Hero, Bad Hero.

Now if only I could be certain which of them was which. (:

Fern

All other things equal (and they are, i believe; Cat's going to have superior leadership and unit cohesion, the Princes multiple have superior numbers) this battle's going to come down to ability to react to fulcrums and manipulation of story. Cat has the obvious advantage there, of course, but she's going up against the Grey Pilgrim, but he's hamstrung by the Princely committee, but he's got enough influence to change their minds, but will it be enough to change Princess General's mind, etc. etc. etc.

This is going to be VERY interesting

Dany

Will it, though? Procer isn't led by Names. That strikes me as a major strategic advantage going against someone like Black or Cat, who seek to manipulate the story. The un-Named aren't really part of the story the same way a Named is.

It could be that Cat defeats the Names but doesn't defeat Cordelia.

DD

Cat, for all the "unit cohesiveness" you cite, is ready to stab her nominal allies in the back for the greater good of Callow. I have too much respect for the Calamities and Malicia to believe they aren't at least somewhat aware of that. Cue Xanatos Gambit Roulette. This could easily turn into a huge mess for Team Evil, and maybe Team Good as well.

Fern

Unit Cohesiveness i.e. well drilled troops with excellent leadership, which Cat has left mostly up to Juniper.

As far as the Gambit Pileup is concerned, I think Cat was only really willing to betray her allies if it meant Callow was completely spared this and any other proceran invasion for the foreseeable future. Aside from that, she's tried pretty closely to everyone in command; I imagine Juniper trusts her enough to know that she won't raise banner against the tower w/o good reason, the Woe all believe in her in their own way (I won't say for certain until we get a Thief POV, ofc), Talbot isn't going to betray the only Callowan power in the middle of a war, and the Daoine are a bit too smart/aware of their own limitations to turn on Cat at this point. If there's any betrayal, it's going to come from the East, and we've seen the one obvious point of failure there (Praesi gold in Callowan coffers).

Malicia's the one to watch in these next few chapters; how she decides to handle Procer is going to play a large part in where Cat ends up at the end of the story.

goliath1303

That was a LOT of "buts" in one sentence.

SilentLurker

"The man is one of Ranger's toys," the Saint conceded. "And that ornery old bitch plays rough. He won't go down without making a mess."

So, am I the only one who wonders if Ranger might make an appearance? As far as we know, the big reason she left the Calamities was a disagreement between her and Black about Malicia keeping the throne. Now that they've fallen out though, is it possible she could show up?

I can see that throwing a GIANT wrench in the Crusade's plans. And given her nature as a non Hero/Villain name, at least explicitly, she might even be hard to predict for Augur. She might only be one person, but she also the only person on the surface Calernia who in the modern day went, "I like this place, it's mine", and everyone just went, "OK, it's yours. Please don't hurt us." It is a Crusade too, with a ton of Heroes to fight. I'm sure there's one or two she might deem worth hunting. All around I just think throwing in Ranger could screw with the plans a ton, and provide moments where we see what the Calamities are like, now that their time is mostly ending.

On another note, the Saint of Blades and grey Pilgrim relationship feels familiar. She might not always agree with Grey Pilgrim, but she is apparently fairly close to him, and reminds me of Scribe in how she promises retribution if they betray his trust.

werafdsaew

If Ranger shows up, it's definitely to hunt the older Heroes, since she's running out of things to fight.

*frolamiz*

If I remember correctly, Refuge is considered a protectorate by the Kingdom Below, which Black admitted is the only power on Calernia that can be considered more than local. It always made me wonder what happened between her and the Dwarves. It also help that the place she claimed is in an inhabited forest where The Hunt activities are known to be centered around.

*benthelynx*

Aren't the gnomes separated from the dwarves? (Both being non local powers)

Fern

Didn't we get a hint that the Kingdom Below was planning something in the last epilogue? This should be interesting...

benthelynx

Isn't ranger technically a hero name? (In the same way thief is)

Rook

Ranger as a Name is pretty neutral. Some of them are obviously Villainous or Heroic (not a lot of paladins or gallant anything will be Evil for example), but things like archer, ranger, thief, or squire are ambiguous enough to be either.

The Named as individuals all seem to be on one side of the other (other than the Hierarch, but he's a bit of a special case), but the names themselves aren't always innately heroic or villainous. For example the Black Knight and White Knight apparently both transition out of Squire, not the Black Squire or the White Squire.

sengachi

Ranger seems like a mostly blank slate upper-tier name which could be transitional, final, Good, Evil, Neutral, martial, magical, intellectual, basically anything. The only truly concrete component of it is that Ranger seems like a more loner name (so you're not going to get Lead as an aspect or anything), but even then it doesn't run counter to teamups like the Lone Swordsman did.

And it looks like the current Ranger basically grabbed the ambiguous nature of the Name and used that to twist it until it was nothing but her own personal powerup, rather than something with narrative properties.

TheTime

So Pilgrim and Saint have a Good Cop-Regicidal Maniac Cop dynamic. I like that~

White

"the speculation she was some distant Fairfax"

You know, I was with Princess Rozala on this one, but... the narrative is really powerful. What was it Cat said in first Liesse? "I have Three things. A kingdom, and enemy, and a claim." Well, guess what's also true right now.

I'm not saying that Cat is a Fairfax byblow, but dear god would it utterly destroy the crusade's narrative if she was. On the other hand, given how the last time she spoke those words she did in fact become queen... Well, it's pretty clear to see where she's going to get her transition.

Several other readers have remarked on the similarities between Cat and the Queen of Blades. Now, the Saint of Swords (who seems very much like an old chaotic good version of Cat) is set up against Foundling. Who better to defeat the saint of Swords than the Queen of Blades, especially because of the formers expressed hatred for nobility. There are so many story threads here. To top it off, Cat becoming the Queen of Blades also utterly destroys the Proceran narrative. That's a Callowan name without question (even if the first wasn't a name. That's been vague, I think?). She takes on a old callowan name, and suddenly the reasoning behind the invasion—to unseat the villain of Callow—goes up in smoke.

So many threads. So many, many threads.

frolamiz

Yeah, narratively, an orphan is a goldmine. It's no wonder this trope is so overused. She **could** be Prince Amadis bastard child foretold to be his doom at birth that a servant has hidden in Callow instead of killing.

Or anything else. A wildcard for the author to play however he want.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Cat: You are my father

Amadis: Wha-

**Amadis gets killed by Cat**

esryok

She already used the "Luke, you are my father" card when she became Duchess of Moonless Nights. In her shoes I'd be nervous about trying to double dip, at least now that she's a construct and shucking her mantle might be fatal.

Quie Possibly A Cat

Or she could be the bastard daughter of the fifth son, of the seventh daughter to the bastard daughter of the ninth boy to the niece of the third [seventeen+ more generations] of the first Queen of Callow! The best part is she probably is something like that!

DD

I would absolutely hate that, in spite of the narrative power.

Why can't we have an orphan hero or villain just be Nameless, son of Nobody Important and No One Special?

Micke

'I snorted at that. Booker's skin and hair were as dark as mine: we both had Deoraithe blood running through our veins. Still, I was an orphan and she was Laure born and raised – neither of us had ever set foot in the northern duchy or spoke even a word of the old tongue.'

Maybe she's Kegan's cousin, twelve times removed (or long-lost niece)?

Letouriste

I doubt a revelation would matter at all to her. And I expect all the fairfax, even the ones far in the succession line have been killed by black.

Would make More sense narratively for her to start a new sort of dynasty too

Quie Possibly A Cat

Because if you go back far enough in generations you're related to everyone! Also inserting "niece" allows for even more trickery I think.

*Euodiachloris*

I can see the Winter side if Cat not wrecking "Queen of Blades". Foes will Fall as blades of iron and ice slice in a deadly dance as terrible and cold as a midwinter night.

Nothing offensively fluffy to gobble up, there.

nipi

Typos here:

"exact same moral failure as a waging war in name of it."

and they exactly what you are made of."

*wyaldriddler*

Woah.

This chapter was enlightening. To be perfectly honest the situation on the Proceran side seems so bad that I expect it to flip around and actually eek out a win. I'll just, enumerate the issues here:

First the way the opening paragraph is laid out it makes it decently clear Rozala sees Amadis as an enemy.

Second is the immediate problem of Arnaud. That is a pile of heaping hot shit ready to blow up in someone's face. He's got acceptable target written all over him.

Third is the Princess of Orne, who seems like a excellent Malicia plant, and part of the hidden blade Malicia is aiming to make Procer irrelevant. Additionally the way Rozala wavers on Orne so quickly is not a good sign.

Fourth, Amadis has aimed a knife at his heart by "hiring" the Watch because we already KNOW that Cat has made a deal with Kegan and Kegan holds to her deals.

Fifth, Darlington is Fucked. If Procer knows that it failed, then he likely reported back, so Cat knows and he is Deeeeeaaaaaad meat now.

Sixth, the conflict between Laurence and Pilgrim is... mostly standard for this sort of tale, but it's severity is of some note.

Eighth Cordelia mandating no foraging is... cute considering some implications that we have seen for her actions so far. Be interesting to see how that works.

Ninth the Procerans have no idea of Cat's gambit. They've actually suffered a MASSIVE intel failure because they have no idea how far and fast Cat's boot is going to be traveling up the ass of their supply lines. Completely clueless as to the point of her splitting her forces.

I was worried there for a bit that the Saint wouldn't care about the terms, but that she wants to enforce them so hard is a good sign. But yeah, something is fuuuuuuuuucked in the state of Callow.

oldschoolvillain

I have to disagree on the fifth point – Cat already knew that Darlington was entertaining envoys from Procer, and turned it to her advantage. She distrusts him, but I don't think that she'll kill him unless he either continues juggling the thought of treachery or proves to be a liability in a warzone.

Also, I think you skipped point #7?

Rook

Agreed. No way she kills him while she's reasonably sure she's got him under her thumb out of fear. He's a known controllable element, treacherous nature aside. Displacing him might bring in someone more trustworthy but it could just as easily go the other way.

Much better the enemy you know (especially one who fears you and can be bent to your will if needed) than the one you don't

wyaldriddler

Certainly a possibility. My thinking on the matter was that Cat caught him out and then essentially implied that if the relationship continued he was just dead. If she's using him as a catspaw though, that's yet another area where Procer seems to be routinely screwing themselves in the ass.

Quie Possibly A Cat

I think someone might have forgotten to keep up the wards around the Absence Demon.

Redlaw

It seem that the older they are the least they are influenced by their name. Of course it could also be because they have more experience of the world. The saint of the sword is a good example. If black is a practical villain then she is a practical hero

Yotz

On that I'll disagree with you. If any on the Heroic side can be called "practical" that would be Grey Pilgrim. From his words he is ready to tolerate some evils in the world if it leads to lessening of world's suffering. With Saint of Swords it is markedly not so – she will burn everything and to Heavens with consequences: "kill them all, hashmallim will know their own"(C), and all that jazz.

nick012000

So, add "led by Named that keep the rebellious nobles in check by fear alone" to the list of reasons that Procer's acting more like Praes than Praes is.

Letouriste

So....they judge the calamities by sheer power? Lol:P if there is something defining them, this is the way they gave up power for a purer source of strength. I think the heroes at the Vales will be totally wrecked if they really think they are stronger

MetruX

I disagree a little. They will be screwed if they believe they'll WIN for being stronger, not if they believe they are stronger, since they truly are. The Calamities work without pure power, but it is always good to know things realistically, and being more powerful IS an advantage of the Heroes, just not one that should give them the win.

sengachi

Yeah, didn't Black just have a whole series of Interludes showing that he and his don't rely on raw power at all when fighting heroes?

Rook

Black is a thin needle slid into your throat, not a hammer. Not the strongest, but no less dangerous for it.

The Heroes that face him all learn this eventually, the question is whether or not they survive the lesson.

Author Unknown

Interesting that the Grey Pilgrim reveals some ability of foresight; it lends weight to argument that his accompanying the envoy was specifically to meet Cat.

Is anyone else imagining Duchess Kegan sitting on her throne snickering while saying, "I can't believe he fell for that."

Quie Possibly A Cat

I'm glad to hear she got the watch back in working order. I was worried the ghosts would combine into some sort of angry Omnicidal Oversoul or something terrible.

TeK

We do not snicker.

Official motto of House Iarsmai

*Euodiachloris*

(Slasher Smiles Permitted Upon Occasion)

Letouriste

i wonder how nauk is doing...maybe he has permanent flame going out of his eyes?

The guy got burned (pun intended) and lost all his followers he trained. Right now, he is not needed in the frontline so maybe he train new recruits?

Antoninjohn

For a treaty to be made there needs to be trust and by the Humbling of Giants and the fact the Callow has had their land stolen by "heavens sent trusted allies" shows that it's not Cat that can't be trusted but Procer and the first Prince

Letouriste

Probably half the reason cat proposed this is she expect them to fail their part and lower their cause.
Would make the heroes easier to kill and get her a superior position in the post war peace talks.
The other half is about her not really wanting to kill the enemy leaders (malicia order, her own Accord thing etc...) and to see her officers dying

don

Is anyone else noticing that Pilgrim agrees not to use angels, then almost immediately turns around and uses an angel for an auger? Even though it could be argued what the definition of 'use' entails, that still seems a bit mealymouthed.

sengachi

Eh. I see that as the difference between using a scrying spell that routes through a Hell to get around wards and summoning a demon to kill folk. It's pretty clear what the agreement was meant to prevent, and it's the latter not the former.

Engineer

EE, if I may make a suggestion; could you please write Names when they are introduced in italics or something similar? It's quite difficult to discern what is a Name and what is a mantle/title.

TeK

That is half the point, no? Keeping the audience at the edge of the seat, suspense and intrigue racking up emotions.

Engineer

... Damn, you're right.

sengachi

I just remembered. Adjunct is somewhere else right now. Doing something with military forces. I'm betting that Cat's apparent troop splitting is going to suddenly turn into an encirclement when Adjunct gates in with the other half of her army.

DD

Who is Adjunct? Am I missing something?
You've got me thinking about the Malazan Books of the Fallen.

Letouriste

He mean Adjudant, hakram^^

sengachi

Woops. Damn autocorrect.

Leonard Inkret

I'm getting confused when you refer to the same person by their first name, second name, or their title. It makes it hard to keep track, and gets especially difficult when basically all of these new noble characters are pretty new, and there's a lot of them in the same place. xd

But thanks for the chapter, love your work

Draconius Sinister

Hate to be negative, but the Saint Of Swords grinds my gears. It feels like her whole job is to be edgy, and all her cursing makes me think of her as nothing but a child that never grew up. I'm seeing edgy teen rather than sixty-plus years old woman who has battled horrors and evils the entire time. All of what she is doing feels like posturing, either to make her seem like a badass or the Pilgrim to look more like the mildmannered grandfather that can tear you apart. I think she'd be a much better character without the cursing.

Of course, she is new, and I am not the writer. Could be I'm missing something huge. This doesn't mean I'm going to stop reading or anything, aside from my issues with her the chapter was very good, and I can't wait for more!

aran

Oh look, it seems that the other side has a Catherine as well in the form of Laurence.

I'm sure they'd get along like a city on green fire.

editor

Mistake on "The only people I answer to are up Above, and they exactly what you are made of." Should be "know exactly what you are made of."

Exec

God damn. Pilgrim and Saint are so fucking great!

They are everything I hoped for from the veteran heroes' side – A genuinely wise and merciful hero, and a fuckshitupper that would've probably been Cat's best friend in another life.

His Royal Madness

I know this is really late but Catherine's phrase "Justifications only matter to the Just" is very accurate to the Heavens and Good. All the forms of Good are those who's forms of Justification and Justice align with an alien sense of right. The Angels are an alien form of Good that is distilled through Heroes they deem as aligned with their views on a human level. Even their actions and thoughts are on the extreme level of human acceptance.

---

Chapter 9: Grand Pas

"Casualties are a consequence of properly employed tactics, not the intent. To merely bludgeon away is to reduce the conduct of war to arithmetic."

– Theodosius the Unconquered, Tyrant of Helike

Hakram had once told me about an old orc proverb: even a child can devour a bear, one mouthful at a time. Apart from reminding me that most orc sayings tended to involved blood or death in some way – and that orcs apparently weren't afraid to eat things with even larger teeth than they, to absolutely no one's surprise – it'd struck something of a chord at the time. As a rule, I'd tended to be the underdog in fights since becoming the Squire and never had that been truer than when my waltz with the Tenth Crusade began. Fifty thousand Proceran soldiers had come through the pass, and though Juniper had been dismissive about the quality of most that host she'd cautioned that numbers had a weight of their own. Even if we traded soldiers at a rate of one to three, halfway through that battle my army would collapse as an effective fighting force while the Procerans just got started with deploying their reserves. From a strict military perspective, we couldn't afford the casualties that thoroughly shattering the crusader army would cost us. From a political perspective, if took the gloves off I'd effectively kill any chance of Callow retaining its independence in the long term.

We had to beat Princess Malanza without beating her too badly, without losing too many men or resorting to any of our uglier tricks.

The Hellhound had complained of having her hands tied often and loudly, if in private, but under all that barking there'd been a visible thread of pleasure. She might have hated that politics played any part in this campaign, but I suspected she enjoyed the challenge of having restricted tools. It was forcing her to think beyond her traditional methods, to put the steel trap of a mind under all the glaring at work. We'd begun planning our battle before we ever entered Arcadia, refining it with every fresh report from the Jacks and the Observatory. The Unconquered had famously said that grand designs in war were a thing of vanity, but to us they were even more than that: with the number of heroes the other side was fielding, any plan too complicated was essentially guaranteed to fail. As long as there was even one critical component that had to succeed, that specific time and place would be crawling with angry, literally Heavens-sent foreigners out to fuck up our day. We couldn't reiterate the old traps we'd used in Three Hills and Marchford: no matter how clever the bait, if we closed the teeth we'd find that steel gauntlet beat fangs.

So we hadn't made a plan, not exactly.

It could be argued to be a dozen of them, instead, or even just a general operational doctrine. If having a pivot meant we lost, then we had to either avoid pivots entirely or make them impossible to reach. And we had the means for that, for all our other flaws. That was our real trump card, when it came down to it: the fairy gates. Or more specifically, the mobility they lent my troops. I doubted they understood everything I could do with those, or even that I wasn't the only one who could make them: the Wild Hunt could open its own, if it was led by Larat. So far I'd used Arcadia to cut down time on long journeys, but that was only the surface use. Closer to the enemy I could still use them to disappear an army into thin air and reappear close by quicker than was physically possible. Just because I'd not used the gates for short journeys didn't mean I couldn't. The first step had been splitting the Army of Callow into three columns. Two of six thousand, and one of nine and chance – the largest one was the central one as well, and fielded all of Baroness Ainsley's reinforcements. The two armies on the wings had split from the central host, moving east and west.

We'd set out the silver, now we were going to eat the bear one bite at a time.

The crusading army was large. It had nearly twelve thousand horse to my own mere five thousand. It had priests and wizards and heroes. It was also slow. We'd only realized how slow it really was when it crossed the northern passage, and carefully confirmed it over the weeks since. Of that fifty thousand men, more than a third was levies. Men and women in the prime of their life, certainly, and in good shape. But farming and marching were different kinds of labour, especially when weighed down by arms and armour. The Hellhound had described our conflict as two hounds with a chain around their neck, sallying out to fight in the place where both our chains allowed us to reach. The anchor on our side was Hedges. We couldn't allow them to take the city, since it opened them a direct path into the heartlands of Callow. The anchor on theirs was their supply line. Snaking across the Whitecaps, the wagon caravans moved day and night to bring enough food across that the crusaders wouldn't run out of foodstuffs before they reached a place where they could take local supplies – either by sacking granaries or foraging the countryside. But the passage was narrow, and they had fifty thousand bellies to feed. The foodstuffs from Procer were slowing the rate they were burning through their reserves at, but it wasn't stopping it.

If our strengths were insufficient to carry the day, Juniper had said, then we had to play to the enemy's weaknesses. And the two that were exploitable were the sluggish pace and sprawling supply lines. Now, Malanza had already proved she was no fool. She had to know it would be child's play for me to take the Order of Broken Bells out and hit the pass up north while she was still too far to prevent me from putting everything to the torch and leave a small garrison behind to make sure the river stayed dammed. We believed she'd gambled on her having enough supplies to reach Hedges even if we did, which meant she'd be picking up the pace soon to force a battle there. Taking a swing at our anchor to force us to be where she needed us to be, essentially. Except instead of facing the single host manning walls she must have expected to see arrayed before her, she now had three field armies to contend with. And those armies were moving closer to hers, making a loose half-circle so she'd be blundering into encirclement if she didn't break us apart.

"And now we find out what kind of a commander Malanza is," Juniper said.

The two of us had remained with the central army, the beating heart of the net we'd cast over the region. The crusader army was too far in the distance for us to see even the fire smoke. Seven days away, by our estimate. We'd been prudent in case she had the means to make them pick up the pace. Scrying had allowed the western and eastern army to keep the same distance on the sides.

"The Jacks finally confirmed the Watch linked up with them two days ago," I said. "Kegan is keeping her part of the bargain."

"They won't be trusted," the orc grunted. "Not if what you told me about the Grey Pilgrim is true."

"They don't need to be trusted," I reminded her. "They just need to be there."

I'd sent instruction down to Hakram to kick up a fuss at the border with Daoine to add some weight to the gambit, but my hopes were not high. Procer, unlike the Empire and I, did not have the benefit of having mages capable of scrying within Callow. Which meant information travelled back to Malanza and to the First Prince with a considerable delay compared to us. They might not even learn about Adjutant's agitation in time for it to matter, but the possibility still existed and that was enough to warrant the attempt at disinformation.

"So, what's your guess?" I asked after a moment of silence.

"She either splits her forces to engage us separately or she goes straight for the head of the snake," Juniper said. "There's risks to splitting. She's not sure how quick we can redeploy and our foot's usually better than hers. Smaller armies make that count more."

"So you think she's headed for us," I said.

"It's what I'd do, if I were her," the Hellhound said. "Otherwise she's engaging on terms we dictated. She swings at us, though, and she can assume we'll pull down our other two armies to reinforce us. She still gets the battle she needs."

"We can't give her open field all the way down to Harrow," I conceded.

"The woman has been having too leisurely a march so far, Foundling," Juniper sharply grinned. "Time to kick the hive. First blow tonight."

I nodded slowly.

"East or west?" I asked.

"Sending your vicious little minion to the east first loses us at least four days," she grunted. "West, has to be. I don't want to give her a breather or too much time to think."

"I'll talk to Larat," I said. "The Hunt's been raring to get off the leash."

"Lots of that going around," Juniper said, a tad drily.

I frowned at her.

"You're going somewhere with this, I take it?" I said.

Juniper spat to the side.

"Don't take this wrong, Catherine, but you've lost the taste for it," she said. "Any fool can see that."

"I'm not sure what you're saying," I admitted. "That I'm trying to stab people less? Juniper, saying fuck it and chewing through the opposition no matter the consequences is what got us in this mess in the first place. We're not playing with the kind of stakes where mistakes can be afforded anymore. One slip is all it takes to tumble down on our heads."

"You put on a crown so you have to play Wasteland games," the Hellhound grunted. "I don't like it, but I get it. But a year ago, Foundling, you would have been licking your chops at the thought of a battle like we're planning. You were hungry for it. Now you're just..."

"Tired," I finished quietly. "Tired and afraid."

"It's not pretty to look at, Catherine," my Marshal said. "Now's not the time for the fire to go out. The enemy's at the gate and going at them half-hearted is going to get a lot of people killed."

My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched. If Juniper was willing to say this much, she'd been sitting on it for some time. And she wouldn't be the only one of my officers thinking it.

"When I was nine, I think, I was sent to the market by the orphanage matron to pick up our meat for the month," I told her. "When I got there, I saw the butcher getting roughed up by city guard. They wanted him to join one of the guilds, so Mazus would get his cut."

"So Imperial Governors were shit to your people," the orc shrugged. "Not exactly a revelation, Foundling."

Compassion had never been one of Juniper's strengths.

"I stood there," I told her. "I knew, bone-deep, that there wasn't a fucking thing I could do about it. So I just watched."

Juniper bared her teeth.

"You have the fangs now, Catherine," she said. "Keeping them pearly white means nothing's changed."

"I used to believe that," I admitted. "You know who broke that fight up? Legionaries. A pair of orcs. They beat the guards badly enough one had to be carried away. I think that's when I decided, before I really knew it, that I was going to join the Legions. So one day I'd be the one handing the beatings instead of just standing there."

"So why the fuck are we giving Procer a pass for invading, then?" Juniper growled. "Those princes, those heroes. It's like we're worrying more about keeping them alive than our own soldiers. No one put a knife to their throat to make them cross that pass, Catherine. Banner went up in Salia and they signed on. I'm not preaching devilry at you – that sort of blow always comes back around. But we have all these nasty tricks we're just sitting on, and I can't think of a good reason why. So Procer gets pissy if we kill their boys? They're already riding on a godsdamned crusade. Burn them all, and the First Prince too. I'll say this for the Empress, at least when she screws us she doesn't expect us to apologize for it."

"You're still angry I shut down Bonfire," I said, and it was not a guess.

"I love it, you know," Juniper grinned unpleasantly, all teeth and malice. "Having this unholy mess up north and still having to beat the opposition with my hands tied. Ain't no one ever fought a war like that before. We will be remembered. But you know how we got all these fancy titles? 'cause we were willing to go as far as we needed to. We brawled in the mud to get up here, Catherine, and suddenly we're too good for it? We're going soft. And soft ends up in the cooking pot, sooner or later."

"That's the thing, Juniper," I said quietly. "This is the strongest I've ever been. I have armies, wealth, a kingdom. I have the Woe, sharpened fighting heroes. I have the Wild Hunt and the last good claim on Winter. Even in wildest dreams as a kid I never thought I'd get this much power."

I bit my lip.

"I thought that was enough," I told the orc. "Having the biggest stick. That once you had that, everything else fell into place. But while I was using that stick to whack the opposition, running all around Callow, an entire city went dark."

Juniper opened her mouth, but I gestured for her to let me keep speaking.

"No," I said. "Really think about it. An entire city. More than a hundred thousand people, Hellhound. Because we were good and we were strong and we got cocky. There is an entire part of a kingdom gone forever because I thought being feared and powerful would see us through. It didn't. It won't now, either."

"You can't let Liesse fill your shadow, Catherine," Juniper said, almost kindly. "Wasteland get always fucks the world. It's the only trick they have."

"I have to, Juniper," I said. "I've walked out ruins still breathing again and again, so I stopped thinking we could lose. But we did lose, last year. We killed and got killed, and all we had to show for it at the end was a mass grave."

"We killed Diabolist," the orc said. "We shut the door on the Fae."

"We beat them," I said. "That's not a victory. We just stopped them from making the larger mess they had it in them to make."

"Then you learned the wrong lesson," Juniper said. "And we should have pulled the trigger on Bonfire the moment the army was halfway ready. We're still fighting their kind of war, Catherine."

"No," I said, and ice crept into the tone. "They think that, no doubt. Some of your officers might think that too. But make no mistake, this is my play from opening to curtains. I'll negotiate with the other side, because it gets me better results than crushing them outright. Because peace is a better path to what I want than setting cities aflame. But I still have it, Hellhound. The urge to just step on them. The victory I'm after simply happens to require more than corpses."

The Marshal of Callow studied me for a long time, before giving a sharp nod.

"So long as it's not squeamishness," she finally said.

I looked up at the afternoon sky, the spring sun that failed to warm me.

"You're right, about the fear," I said. "I am afraid. That was the hardest learning, that power doesn't solve anything, it just... broadens the scope. Raises the stakes. I got on top of the pedestal, and now that I've had a good look around what I'm seeing is making me want to flinch."

I was not blind to the gathering storm. The Empress was feeling cornered, and she'd already proven the kind of measures she was willing to take if she thought survival was at stake. Black had holed up in the Vales for winter, cut from his old anchors, and in a way that made him more dangerous than he'd used to be. When he came out swinging, and he would, there was no telling who he'd be swinging at. The Free Cities were a pot about to boil over, led by two madmen whose intent was anyone's guess. And the whole muster of the West was gathering, preparing to hit Callow in waves. And in the middle of it all, I had to break the ugly story that had ground both Callow and Praes under the wheel for millennia.

"Fear's good," Juniper said. "Fear is blood and life. But it's too late to flinch, Warlord."

"I know," I murmured. "And so we got to war again."

We parted ways after that, and began our work. The thing was, what we were doing wasn't rewriting the book. The tactics at work were old ones, used by armies for centuries. On the other hand, none of those armies had had fairy gates to work with. All it took was asking Hierophant to scry our western commander – the freshly-promoted General Nauk, as it happened. And so after nightfall, the six thousand men of the western army disappeared from the field. They reappeared three days of march behind the crusading host, and the wolf riders that had once been General Istrid's began to raid their way up the Proceran supply line. They took cattle and grain, poultry and bread, but left the men who surrendered untouched. Didn't even take them prisoner.

Juniper's notion, that, not sentimentality. Leaving them behind mean more mouths for Malanza to feed. The Princess of Aequitan sent twelve thousand men north to bring Nauk to battle, mostly horse and fantassins, but by the time they arrived the army was long gone. It reappeared to the west a few days later. That's right, Malanza. Now you know for sure I have two gate-makers. So let's find out if your heroes can discern where they are, shall we? The hive had been duly kicked.

Now we got to see what came screaming out.

---

Burnsy

So far I'd used Arcadia to cut down time on long journeys, but that was only the surface use. Closer to the enemy I could still use them to disappear an army into thin air and reappear close by quicker than was physically possible. Just because I'd not used the gates for short journeys didn't mean I couldn't.

This is a random comment but this is the exact tactic I used against my latest opponent using psi jump drives in stellaris. It's INCREDIBLY EFFECTIVE if you use it right, and I'm proud of both myself and Cat for seeing it through.

onedollargum

Everyone loves a good Piccard Maneuver. =D

nimelennar

But what if your uniform tunic doesn't ride up on you?

RanVor

Army-scaled Teleport Spam. Brilliant.

Antoninjohn

I think it's going to become violent anyway the heavens want escalation and they can pull a lot of strings and burn a few Callow cities single handedly and when that happens Cats going to get mad and Callow will go Blood for the Blood Queen, Skulls for the Skull Throne, Souls for the Soul Eater

Yotz

MILK FOR THE CORN FLAKES! WHIPPED CREAM FOR THE ICE QUEEN!!

...and for her treacherous lieutenant, I suppose – nothing pacifies the Wild Hunt better than unbridled bloodshed and whipped cream, after all.

The trick is to balance those two, for even illusory bridles on one's ability to let blood or insufficient amount of whipping applied to the cream can promptly drive one crazy in a very bad way.

Trust me on that.

In all seriousness though, that would be too predictable of an outcome, therefore – boring. It would serve as a nice moral to a Tolkienesque story, of course – Queen of Ashes, sitting on her Throne of Skulls in the middle of Queendom of Waste, drinking a wine of sorrow from an empty chalice that is a skull of her closest friend...

But from what we've seen so far, I dare to hope, this story is far from Tolkienesque – and amen to that! After all, that also means no more dumb questions about the Eagles from the people who with stupendous spectacularity failed to understand basic premise behind the Parable of Frodo.

HandyCapped

Could you elaborate on that spectacular misunderstanding about the eagles and the basic premise behind the parable of Frodo? So far, there have been quite a few fans claiming that, but all of them have been reduced to muttering and half answers, when asked further about it. This is particularly vexing, as I'm not even in it for the smugness or anything, but I'd just really want to see the point of it.

EagleFacts

Many people think they should have just taken the Eagles to Mordor. This has quite a few problems.

1. They would refuse. Eagles aren't pack animals. They are emissaries from the Valar (angels), on par with Gandalf.
2. They would die before even getting close. Humans and Orcs alike shoot at them and they can't fly high enough to be out of range. Getting near Mordor only to be shot down by Gondor archers would be ironic, but not the best decision.
3. They would be seen. The Eagles are quite conspicuous and Sauron would see them, then send the Nazgul after them. It'd be practically handing the Ring to him.

Tarial

Alternatively, when Gandalf tell them to "fly, you fools", he means to tell them to get the giant birdies but they don't understand, so they walk.

Walter

I didn't realize Cat could open gates without being physically present. If she can open a gate for Nauk's army while they are camped just by scrying him...can she do the same for the Proceran crusade? Leaving them wandering in Arcadia seems like a good tactic.

sheer_falacy

Pretty sure it's Larat opening the gate there – she mentioned he could do it this chapter.

And the gates seem like static things that you have to go through, so she can't use them on the crusade. Plus trapping a bunch of heroes in Arcadia is a great way to get them coming out (somehow) at the least opportune time.

soonnandnaanssoon

Also, time passes by differently in Arcadia. Trapping the heroes in a realm of horrors where they might uncover a new skill/trick or transcend themselves to return to their comrades, just in time to stop the villain from the striking the final blow is a Narrative setup that might actually work.

SilentLurker

And we saw the Lone Swordsman exploit this after Cat let him go. Got a year of training done in the course of a month outside of Arcadia. This is definitely one of those Bad Idea scenarios.

Euodiachloris

Yeah, supplying a free levelling-up side quest with a bonus grudge multiplier isn't exactly a clever move...

werafdsaew

I think Larat was with Nauk.

Soronel Haetir

In addition to it being Larat that opened that gate even if she could move the Proceran into Arcadia I don't think she would. She came right out and said a pile of corpses isn't her goal here.

Morgenstern

It's in her last thought comment: >> That's right, Malanza. Now you know for sure I have TWO gate-makers. So let's find out if your heroes can discern where they are, shall we? <<

sheer_falacy

"You can't let Liesse fill your shadow, Catherine,"

Should be "fill", though I still don't quite understand it.

Unorginal

Its flowery language for you shouldn't let the shadow of Liesse hang over every action you take. I quite like the non-standard turn of phrase.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Hive metaphors, huh.

Well I'll be damned.

RanVor

Cat would execute you right now.

naturalnuke

Nah, sappers get a free pass 😊

ALKATYN

One subtle way they are inverting the normal Good and Evil dynamic I just noticed is that normally it would be the heroes using the small army and clever tactics vs. a numerically superior enemy force. The rules of the Narrative seem to work more at the level of individual named then at the scale of armies, but if I was on Procer's side I'd be rather worried that we were letting the other side be the plucky underdogs in this.

SilentLurker

Not only that but the Proceran's are the invading force. The title of Crusade and the Heroes are honestly the only thing I see keeping that force somehow on the side of the Heavens. Invaders, check. Planning to permanently take the country, check. larger army, check. Basically all I see is an incursion into a semi-sovereign nation, and that is not really on the side of Good without the heroes to make it so.

Taichi22

It might just be that the gods tend to prefer supporting those kinds of stories, good or evil be damned, and the roles have now switched up.

Hammerman

I think that is the narrative that our Dark Queen is spinning, tied in with promises from the Grey Nomad they are practically inviting the Wild hunt to prey on them one stormy night as oathbreakers.

Rook

The mobility from the fairy gates isn't the key here. It's a good tactic don't get me wrong, but it isn't even close to the enough with this caliber of opposition.

On top of that, if this was the key, she just tipped her hand immediately. The Catherine Foundling that's leading this host isn't the same Catherine Foundling that simply Struggled through the mess by the skin of her teeth with no plan in place. This isn't it.

The key is misdirection, making them play the wrong game from the start. Just like Black tricking Akua into playing the wrong game with his body double, and just like the Bard tricking Black into signing Captains death warrant using a series of utter short term defeats.

Tipping her hand this way has to be intentional. The Faerie gates were the focus of attention in the first place, a known dangerous card. With this she just shifted even more attention to them; and more importantly she indirectly shifted attention away from other possibilities. Reaffirming assumptions that might not be true.

I'd guess at two things so far. The lesser game is pulling focus away from Glamour. It's something all Fae can do to a varying extent, is completely overshadowed by the gates at the moment, and wasn't used in Liesse or the Arcadian war. So what if the first bad assumption she's pulling them into is that they actually know which force is where. That the gates they scout actually exist, and that they can scout the gates at all.

What if you could, say, hide a gate with a waiting army in plain sight? Use the visible forces to draw the opposing army into showing their backs to the gate, and bring a hammer of cavalry down on the anvil once the battle is underway.

The bigger, potentially much scarier game though, is the assumption that gets reinforced with all this focus on mobility. Putting so much effort into moving pieces around more quickly, that implies that the pieces actually need to be in position to strike. But if this assumption doesn't apply to a certain piece, you could checkmate them from out of the blue.

That scary weapon she had in her pocket – what was it, absolute positioning? What if that was something that let Masego cast from the observatory at a position on the battlefield, without actually having to be at the battlefield. What if the key was being able to know what was happening from inside his fortress with the Scrying amplification, and being able to change the game at a pivotal moment when no one took him into account because he isn't physically there.

It would be the exact kind of trump card that would make you a hellgate level threat once the implications are realized. The entire war – the guerilla tactics, the illusions, the faerie gates – they could serve as a distraction so that it wouldn't be on anyone's mind when it needs to be used.

The best part is, it would be a plan with almost no chance to fail, because it isn't really a plan. She can literally just fight as she normally does, and it's a card which isn't even in her own pocket. It would technically be in the Hierophant's.

---

Absolute positioning presumably would require the Observatory to be directed by Hierophant, who was told in chapter two to have departed with Catherine's host. More importantly, it's exactly the kind of a trick that Cat and Juniper talk about in this chapter – brutally efficient, but severely complicating the later negotiations, which they'll need more than a magical superweapon at the moment. It's been foreshadowed, so they'll probably have to use it in this book, but so far that doesn't seem to be the plan.

Yotz

Going to spout some more tangentially related dubious truisms, so bear with me:

* The goal of your actions during the game is not to make steps that will lead you to victory. What you ought to do, is to take actions that will lead to creation of environment where every step your opponent takes leads him to profound defeat regardless of his intentions. This way all players will be striving to reach the same outcome. *

Take scrying, for example. It is far too useful, far too great of an advantage to discard once you've managed to acquire it. And of course – big army with no reliable communications can be likened to Polyphemus during his unfortunate confrontation with certain Nobody, especially in the middle of war against someone who can utilize scrying to the greatest extent.

Now, imagine there is a way to gain at least partial control of your opponent's scrying wetware. Not simply to deny one's ability to communicate, but – in essentiality – to tie puppet strings to your enemy's nervous system.

It is a very dangerous thing to do, yes – but not on the level of Mass Application of Demons of the stable Greater Breach, surely.

All one need to do to counteract that threat, is to stop using scrying!

...Oh, wait...

Not a robot

– Juniper, IIRC

MetruX

I agree on the first part, but disagree on what the true plan is. You see, she said already that she needs to give battle before they reach Harrow, but she also mentioned she can bring the army out in a moment, thus my take on the plan is this: She will keep harassing the supply lines, forcing the enemy to march faster and give battle. After stopping their advance, she retreats through the gate to a nearby position, but one that would need more marching and tiring out just after a battle. When she pursues, because even if she decides to rest first she will pursue, Cat can do the same again. And again. And let the food end this war, without much death, but in an utterly dominant way. If the enemy decides to rush to the city instead of fighting them, there is still the problem that the First Prince said to not take form the people of Callow, thus Cat will try to stop her, but one way or another this is create a schism that won't let this army run freely anymore. Win/win.

Highwayman

Juniper isn't wrong, but she has too much of a militaristic view on things in my opinion. Its a pleasure to see Cat maturing.

And Nauk! I missed Nauk. There hasn't been much mention of him in ages!

NZPIEFACE

He's been half dead for ages.

HiThere

Indeed, I thought the last time Nauk was mentioned he was still in a coma. Did something happen, maybe in an upcoming "Court" interlude perhaps?

Morgenstern

If I remember correntyl, he got healed by.. Warlock, was it? Because Masego wanted him to, even though Wekesa himself disliked it as hell because he dislikes Cat that much?

Morgenstern

correntyl.. what? o0 "correctly"...

Antony444

Brilliant manoeuvre on Catheriine's part here. The Proceran army is going to get even slower, and their supply situation more complicated. Plus they have been denied a battle and a massacre to show their cause is heavenly.

One thing which is for the moment really bad for the Tenth Crusade and the heroes is that for the moment, only the Saint of Swords and the Grey Pilgrim have been described in this army. The other twelve heroes are completely unknown and the Callowan Army is always describing as 'heroes' on plural...the next battle for many of them is going to be their last, I think. Is it going to be a graveyard of Princes or Heroes first? What an interesting dilemma...

Antoninjohn

For Cats deal with the watch do you think she's going to make a fairy gate to Arcadia and invade or just have Mango stick that demon of corruption on them

---

She says that Watch "don't need to be trusted, just need to be there." The only Idea I have that wouldn't include giving them orders to do anything is for Malanza to leave a detachment of three thousand to keep an eye on them, so I must be missing something. Also, Cat just banned any use of diabolism for this campaign, so no deploying the demon.

Redlaw

When many heroes from different band gather together the story is directed by the one with the heaviest. If their story isn't strong enough they will be crushed.

In this case we have two super old heroes who can determine the course of the battlefield. I dare to say that at the end of this war apart from them the number of surviving heroes will not exceed two or three

taovkool

From wiki:

In ballet, a grand pas (French: [gʁɑ̃ pa]; literally, big or large step) is a suite of dances that serves as a showpiece for lead dancers, demi-soloists, and in some cases the corps de ballet. It usually consists of an entrée (introduction), a grand adage, sometimes a dance for the corps de ballet (often referred to as the ballabile), optional variations (solo dances) for the demisoloists, variations for the lead ballerina or danseur or both, and a coda (sometimes referred to as a coda générale or grand coda), which concludes the suite.

Oh, I'm just loving the implications thrown here and there. Not really sure what Kat's planning, but I know i'm going to like it.

qfeys

When did Nauk come back to life?

Darkening

I don't remember myself, had the same thought. I mean, it was mentioned that faerie magic could fix him and Cat has that in spades these days, so maybe she fixed him? Dunno.

oldschoolvillain

When Cat and Warlock came close to throwing down in Book 3 – Masego asked Warlock to heal him.

sengachi

Sometimes, most times, characters stating aloud how they feel and why they're doing what they're doing is bad writing.

But when you have a really complicated issue, and really nuanced stakes and meaning, just being able to state something can be impressive in its own right, and engrossing to read. This is that.

Euodiachloris

Part of me is all like, "Congratulations, Princess Malanza! Your glorious prize is: a Vietnam War situation! Except, the climate is more temperate, you are dealing with Gates over tunnels and your version of 'the Press' back home who will kick up a fuss about body bags is actually your Boss Lady of Exceedingly Pointy Words. Enjoy!"

Theoretically_human

if cat gets angry enough she could freeze the area around the army and then the eather stops being temperate

grzecho2222

Courvedmouth tactics are always fun to watch

Euodiachloris

Such lovely transport you had...

DroughtBringer

Beautiful chapter! Seeing Cat grow had been fun, and it's nice to see her move away from just using power.

letouriste

"General Nauk" !!!!! glad to see he is well and kicking:) given he lead a separate army we will maybe see his pov soon and learn what happened to him after waking up.

the grand pas title can have so much meaning:o

Atypical Gult

When you think about it, Cat going for a diplomatic style victory over crushing the opposition into a mountain of corpses is probably going to surprise and throw off everyone else. She has a reputation for being ruthless and solving problems by smashing her opposition with her sword/fist/boot. So if she suddenly starts cutting deals and avoiding force of arms to achieve victory, its going to seriously mess with people's perception of her.

I'm very interested to know more about her Liesse Accords and plans to end the war/keep Callow out of the war. As stated in one of the earlier chapters, she's playing an entirely different game than all the other commanders on field. There are hints of that in this chapter too. Here's hoping she totally crushes the Princes. Can't wait for the next few chapters.

Urgh. I hate it when I catch up with the author and the latest installments. It means I can no longer binge read and devour entire novels at once.

ICSM

I'm fully waiting for conservation of ninjutsu to kick in and dispatch most of the heroes. Right now, aside from Hanno, the Pilgrim and the Saint, they all amount to glorified monks destined to job at the best possible moment.

Hitting supply lines is a fine opening move, but nothing more than that. As Cat has stated, the Crusade probably has enough rations to last until Harrow. I can't see it being crippling to them, but it is a fine way to kick procerans into action. Taking no prisoners is a fine touch. Annoying, and costs literally nothing.

I would love for this to be resolved in a battle of cannae style battle.

wyaldriidler

As Cat obliquely mentioned in this chapter it was a form of probing attack which achieved multiple things:
Probing the enemy, obviously, to see their response to a threat they can't ignore.
Deception of the enemy as to what she actually wants to do.
Causing annoyance and complication to the enemy, forcing them to move up their time table.

Off the top of my head, I'm pretty sure Cat is using some principles from that Proceran hero who defeated Theodosius of Helike by having a bunch of plans at "the first step" since the first step in a villains plan's always succeeds. At least I think that's where the principle came from.

TeK

Nah, you missing things. First step is mentioned with Irritant and Tyrant, the general you are talking about is Isabella the Mad, most commonly known for making such an insane fight, Theodosius just got annoyed and quit.

dandon223

Ok , so I have just read all chapters in like a week. Maybe it is too late for that , but I just wante to say that I had really hoped for some more "Heroes" to go to Cat camp , but I guess my dreams got shattered in prologue, or maybe not? What do you think ?

wyaldriidler

We'll see. The "Heroes" if their cause is shown to not be righteous may defect to her side, and while the Pilgrim for example is very very unlikely to defect, he did agree with her on some things and she agreed with some things he said. Actual functional communication is a pretty huge step up from where it was before Cat.

James, Mostly Harmless

A series of wasp stings to enrage your enemy and make him move where you want. First, an attack on the rear to suprise them and destroy supplies. Doesn't do a lot of damage, but now the Procerans need to devote troops to protect the supply lines that they had planned to use in the attack.

I suspect next will be raids on the Proceran foraging parties, they may have food but probably not enough wood for fires. This will further annoy and anger the troops. Meanwhile, the younger heros are anxious to fight evil and will be pushing to attack. Some of the Princes will push to attack as well, these Callowan attacks make them look bad.

grzecho2222

She can go full Courvedmouth on them and destroy their supply of horse food. Mayor problem for proffesional cavalry was always food, since horses breed for combat are quite picky about what they can eat and won't survive very long on grass alone. If Masego can summon rain that also would be great since armies absolutly crawl through mud especially ones with horses.

grzecho2222

*horse breeds

Shawn Panzegraf

The thing that bothers me about all this love for the Grey Pilgrim is this:
For all that his demeanor is a bit more reasonable, the GP suffers from the same blinders as every other Hero. Kill Catherine and then what? If Procer divvies up Callow, all you've created is a multi-generational story of an occupied land seething with hatred for their foreign overlords. Truthfully, that's far, FAR more likely to drive the Callowans as a people into the arms of Below than having a Villain whose a stabilizing force on the throne for awhile.

End of the day, Heroes in the Guide are incapable of being Good. Above isn't interested in Good. The Heavens simply want to beat Evil. Mass mind-rape, (which was actually done on a scale far beyond what William attempted, to throw a failed Crusade at the Dead King) and the extinction of countless innocents doesn't make the Heavens blink in the slightest.

Before it's over, I'm sure we'll have seen definitive evidence the GP is just as much a minion of the homicidal/genocidal angels as all the other Heroes.

plantsbeans

I finally caught up this chapter, aka this story has been ruining my life for a few weeks now. I have a few questions now that I'm here.

Didn't Catherine make a promise to Larat to give him the heads of seven mortal princes and one, in exchange for him taking the field against summer on their third trip through Arcadia? The imprisoned princess of summer thought that was a very bad idea. What happened to that debt? I'm guessing I missed the resolution since he mostly seems subordinate to her now.

My other question is regarding Nauk – did Hierophant just heal him? I don't remember a big fuss about it.

oldschoolvillain

Technically she swore to take the crown's of seven mortal princes and one, and to lay them at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall. That prince no longer exists, as Larat abdicated his title, fundamentally changing his nature. Especially with the shift in Arcadia away from the Courts. It's a technicality, but those are important when dealing with Fey.

Antoninjohn

You have to remember that Procer's view of the common folk by the Princes is that their lives don't matter, shown by how they regularly kill them off in political wars which happen about once a year, given that I can't see them hesitating to just start killing off Callow and trying to dump the fantassins as colonists

grzecho2222

Bears are completely normal food source. Bigos is traditionally made from them.

TeK

Didn't notice anyone mentioning it, so just putting it there, hoping someone will notice.

EE, do you know that your page name for Chapter 9 is actually practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/04/chapter-10-grand-pas/? Tad misleading.

Digitize27

You're right. It's almost like chapter 9 is... absent.

editor

Mistake on "You can't let Liesse fill your shadow, Catherine," missing an L in fill

editor

"I know," I murmured. "And so we got to war again."
Should be " go to war again"

Gobbler

"It's like we're worrying more about keeping them alive than our own soldiers. No one put a knife to their throat to make them cross that pass, Catherine."

THANK YOU! Juniper. The amount of effort and trouble she seems to have gone through to avoid harming the other side is ridiculous.

---

Chapter 10: Allegro

"There are no reserves, you fool, only second waves!"

– Isabella the Mad, only general to have ever defeated Theodosius the Unconquered on the field

"They're about to split, Boss," Robber said.

He was standing too close to the scrying bowl, which made his face look a lot larger than it should be and was just kind of distressing to see in general. Thief cleared her throat.

"We need numbers and direction," she said.

There was the sound of struggle, a yelp and then Robber was pushed aside. Indrani grinned at us through the bowl and I sighed before she even began speaking.

"This camp is just crawling with heroes, Cat," Archer said.

"Dunno if you were aware, but they've got at least one mageling. Zeze's going to have competition."

"And how would you know that," I slowly said. "You were under orders to stay out of sight."

"I got eagle eyes," she proudly said.

From behind her I heard Robber snort.

"It's true, Boss," he said. "I saw the eagle she took them from. Wasn't pretty."

Indrani pouted.

"You ruined it, Blaster," she complained. "I was going to work up to the reveal after she got snippy."

I was too wary to be amused by the thought of Archer attacking the local wildlife, sadly.

"Tell me you stayed out of sight," I said.

The other Named rolled her eyes.

"I was good," she said. "Used an aspect at a distance, they never saw me."

"We don't know if they have anyone able to detect that," I told her harshly. "Now there's a chance they know you're out there."

"They're not Praesi," Vivienne said mildly. "I won't call this anything but reckless, but unless they were on the lookout for her already the chances she triggered a ward are negligible."

I ignored her.

"Quiet, Archer," I said. "Quiet is what I asked you for."

"It's what you got," she dismissed. "That was over a day ago, if they thought someone was out there they would have sent heroes after us by now."

"Let's hope for that," I grunted. "But we're now assuming you, at least, were made."

"It's just twelve heroes," Archer shrugged. "Nothing to worry about. Worse comes to worse, I shoot a few in the eye and run away."

Strange, it hadn't occurred to me before now that the muster of heroes on the other side was essentially a tenth and two officers. I had been tired, and there'd been a few days a while back where I'd had vicious headaches. Must have been the lack of sleep having unforeseen consequences. We were all feeling the pressure: even Vivienne and Masego had been out of sorts.

"Don't engage, just run," I told her. "And get Robber back in here, unless you can tell me about their troop movements."

"She can't," the goblin piped up from a distance. "She was roaring drunk at the time."

"Barely tipsy," Archer blatantly lied. "But this is beneath me, so Jasper can handle it."

She moved aside, and an irritated-looking Robber filled the bowl again.

"Best we can tell, Malanza's splitting her army half and half," he told us. "Same for the heroes, though that's harder to be sure. They've got their own little camp aside from the army."

I grimaced. Juniper had told me that if the crusaders separated their army they were unlikely to send a host after each of my own. It'd whittle down their numbers by too much, enough that if we went to reinforce a single army we'd have them outnumbered at that particular battle. Evidently Princess Malanza intended to have numerical superiority wherever she engaged regardless of reinforcements.

"And where are they headed?" Thief asked.

"This is guesswork," Robber warned. "But by the way they're shifting their supplies, I'd say centre and west. There's a few days left before they'll be ready to move."

Vivienne let out a breath and my face darkened. So they could tell where our gate-makers were. I'd sent Larat and the Hunt to General Hune in the east, after Nauk had struck the supply lines from the west, in an attempt to keep the shell game going. It was possible the Proceran princess had gotten lucky with a guess – her odds weren't bad, half and half since it was a given the centre had to stay mobile – but she did not strike me as the type leaving things to luck. Which meant there was a hero who could sniff out our gates, or at least the assets who made them.

"All right, good work," I said. "Anything else to report?"

"They're keeping a close eye on the Watch," the Special Tribune said. "There's a hero on them at all times, and the two old timers visited a while back. Not sure what happened, but no fighting afterwards. They didn't relax the surveillance either, though."

My lips quirked. We'd known going in that the odds of a truth-teller being along with the crusade were high, and we'd planned accordingly. None of the Watch were aware of what side they were actually on, and I'd made sure Kegan planted false rumours in her commanders that the heroes could chew over. The secret order was known only to one of her mages, and even the specifics of it were nothing too suspicious on the surface: all the mage had to do was check for a signal in the sky at a specific hour, and scry after seeing it. That, and note the position of officer tents. It would be quite enough.

"No need to worry about that," I told Robber. "Keep your people ready, Special Tribune. We'll have work for you soon enough."

"Looking forward to it," the goblin said, baring needle-like teeth.

The spell died, and after a last glimmer of sorcery the scrying bowl was filled with mere water again. Vivienne drummed the table lightly, though given the sensitivity of my hearing she might as well have been pounding away.

"I know," I said. "We need to make a decision about Headsman."

Thief smiled mirthlessly.

"I know you worry about the fallout, and not just because enemy officers will be put to the sword," she noted. "We'd be revealing another trick the crusaders don't know about."

"But," I said.

"The means it would be carried out might be different, but Procer is not unfamiliar with the use of assassination to influence warfare," Vivienne said. "Catherine, they murder each other over grazing rights disputes – and I'm not exaggerating there, the sister of the Prince of Orne was poisoned over that not even eight years ago. We are fighting off an invasion."

"You know what we need to achieve," I reminded her.

"Hasenbach at the table, without blots on our war record that would make her people unseat her if she negotiated with us," she agreed. "But considering the woman sent all her opposition into the mind grinder that is you, I doubt she'll balk at treating with us after 'mere' peasant officers are killed."

The last part she spoke with distaste, as much for the phrasing as the people it applied to – not the officers, no, but the handful of nobles who considered them so very expendable. Not that I could talk, I'd admit. Headsman had been designed as an operation that would shake the crusader army without getting half the High Assembly howling for our blood. I was, in my own way, considering them just as expendable. The thought tasted bitter, but I did not deny it. Lying to myself had become a lot more dangerous since I'd let Winter in.

"If we pull the trigger on it, we have to act now," I admitted.

"There is a chance their host will later reunite," Thief said.

"If we fuck up," I bluntly replied. "We want them split, it makes them manageable. The only way we have all their major officers together again is if we blunder. Besides you've already told me the longer we wait the higher the chances this fails."

"It's a judgement call," Vivienne said. "I don't envy you the decision, but it is yours to make."

I watched her as she brushed back her hair. It'd gotten longer, though still quite a ways were left to go until it reached the length of mine. Her blue-grey eyes were untroubled, which I envied more than a little. Every day seemed to add another few pounds to what was already balancing on my shoulders. I chewed over what she'd said, but not the decision she'd brought to the fore. More the fact that she'd laid it at my feet, instead. When we'd begun, Vivienne had made it clear she was only sticking around so long as she thought I was the best game in town for Callow. And now here we were, planning how to turn back an invasion together.

"You seem amused," she said.

"Just thinking about how far we've come," I honestly said. "Can you imagine us having this conversation two years ago?"

She laughed, a little bitterly.

"It was a simpler world I lived in, two years ago," Vivienne Dartwick admitted. "The lines in the sand were visible."

"And now?" I asked quietly.

"Now I wonder," Thief said, and her lips set in a hard line. "In your service, I have been part of ugly things. No two ways about that. But nowadays I look at the rest of Calernia, and all I see is vultures. You are flawed, I know that even if you've grown on me. But you're also the only one who seems to care about any of this. There are twelve heroes on Calernian soil, Catherine, and every single one of them is a pawn to Proceran ambition. It is the reason they came in the first place. I thought... I thought better. Of all of us."

"They're not responsible for the Conquest," I murmured. "For Malicia's cold-blooded ruthlessness, or what came of Black playing his game with the Heavens. They get no pass from me for their own actions, but I will not blame them for that."

"I've studied them, Catherine," Thief said. "And the histories as well. When Callow as being invaded, Ashur was fighting for supremacy of the Samite Gulf. The princes of Procer were so far gone they preferred fighting civil war to taking up arms against Praes ascendant. Half the Dominion was fighting border skirmishes over trade rights, without a care of what happened beyond their borders. And the heroes... well, they had their own struggles, the ones that were already born. Yet none so great they should not have been set aside to fight against the fucking theft of an entire kingdom. It is infuriating, that it took them twenty years to suddenly find their principles. Can they really be called that, if they only surface when convenient? It reeks of pretext instead, and my tolerance for those has grown thin."

Your people grown warped by your presence, the Grey Pilgrim had said. Old traits grown more vicious and acute. I could not tell if Vivienne had come to speak those words because she had seen the face of the enemy and felt only disgust, or because of something more insidious. A spreading influence I was unaware of. I had asked nothing of the Gods Below, since taking my Name, but I would have been a fool to believe they gained nothing from empowering me. Does it not matter in the slightest what I do? I wondered. I'd always dismissed the talk of heroes as mere religious prattle, the kind of empty sermons the House of Light garnished its true power with. But if there was truth to it, if I was a blight on Creation just by standing on the side of Below however loosely... That was the thing, wasn't it? I was expected to take on faith the words of people trying to kill me. Or to follow the sayings of sacred texts that had been used as tools of ambition as often as not. There were no easy truths to find. All I had was what I knew, and it was always too little.

"I do not mean this as excuse of the Empire," Vivienne softly said. "I have learned of the people within it, that they are not as wretched as I once believed. But the High Lords and the Tower, that entire edifice of bloody misery? It must be brought down. There is not other choice, because we cannot tame a dog gone rabid. But I will not mistake the horrors of one side for the virtues of the other."

"It was easier, wasn't it?" I said whimsically. "When we thought right and wrong had a colour code?"

Thief put a hand on my shoulder and squeezed, a rare gesture of affection.

"I will not thank you, for opening my eyes to that," she said, withdrawing her hand. "But I understand now, why you are who you are. Why anyone would look at the sky and curse. There is a point where it is no longer about right and wrong, isn't there? Where it's about doing something, anything, to avoid falling in that same old pit."

Her fingers clenched, her eyes hardened.

"They don't get to walk over us, to kill us, just because some fucking angel handed down a mandate," she hissed. "They don't get to avoid the responsibility of that choice. Or the consequences."

Villain, I thought. There was only one side that spoke this way, and didn't pray to Above.

"Black told me, once, that Fate it the coward's way out," I murmured. "The abdication of personal responsibility. I hate him a little bit, for still being right after all these years."

She snorted.

"We might still lose, you know," Thief said. "That's the part that gets me. No matter how prepared we are, it might not be enough."

"Could be," I agreed. "But then we do the same thing villains have always done, when their plans fall apart."

"And what's that?"

"You get up," I said. "You spit out the blood in your mouth, and you try again."

We stayed sitting there for a long time, the two of us in front of a bowl gone fallow.

"We proceed with Headsman," I finally said, breaking the silence. "Tell Masego to prepare. And send word to Kegan. The Deoraithe are to cross the river."

"I will," Thief replied. "And me?"

"I'll open the gate as soon as Hierophant does the numbers," I said. "This is going to be... delicate."

"Isn't it always?" Vivienne smiled.

—

It'd been some time since I had worn my full regalia – if it could be called that.

Full plate from head to toe, with chain shirt and aketon beneath. I'd considered this heavy, once, enough that it restricted my mobility. Nowadays I barely noticed it. I wore the helmet Hakram had gifted me, the hinged thing of steel with the black iron crown set atop it. My shield lay hanging on Zombie the Third's flank as it idly picked at grass it could not actually digest, but my longsword was clasped tight to my flank on the sword-belt. The satchel at my side held munitions, though not standard issue. Robber had tinkered away before his departure. The Mantle of Woe streamed down my back, its bright colours muted in the shade of a moonless night. There was a weight to wearing all of this, and not only a physical one. Black Queen, they called me, but it was not a Name. It might have been, before my teacher broke Liesse and himself with it, but the story had died and the path with it. It would have been a lie, though, to still call myself the Squire. No one did anymore. I could still feel the bare bones of that Name, some days, but the flesh and muscle over them was Winter's. Whatever I'd done in Liesse, when I had broken Masego's scaffolding, it had ended my tenure. I had no aspects anymore, only the power that my mantle lent me. Even what I'd ripped from Akua, what had once been Call, it was... different now. By taking it I had come to own it, and that opened doors I'd never even dreamed of.

I rolled a dark wooden whistle between my steel-clad fingers, feeling it pulse with had once been the Diabolist's power. To be fae, and I had touched the face of that, was to cease seeing the difference between principle and object as more than thin boundary. I'd experimented with that power, under Hierophant's supervision, and the whistle had been one of the greater successes. It was an aspect made matter. Certain limitations had not been escaped, and some had even increased – anyone could use the whistle, yes, but Take had been theft of a finite bundle of power. The whistle could only be used once, since I'd yet to figure out how to partition uses. It would, however, work with the full strength of that aspect.

"A worthy trinket, for the Queen of the Hunt," Larat said.

I glanced at him. Of all the fae sworn to me, he was the only one willing to bring his mount close to mine. In the early days after receiving their oaths, I'd had to... establish a pecking order. Some of them had been under the impression that entering my service was only a means to enter Creation unrestricted, and that now they'd entered they could play as they wished. My eyes turned to the dark-haired woman at the back of the pack, who shivered when she noticed me watching her. She'd been of Summer, before. It had not stopped her from trying to make sport of a full tavern of people in Laure, weaving glamour into their minds so they could play out a tragedy for her where real blood was spilled. Thief had been tracking all of them, so I'd intervened before any damage was done. I'd taken power to call her to heel, though, and drawing that deep had coloured my reaction. There were only two fingers to her left hand, now. I'd made her eat the rest.

No one had tested me since, at least.

"Won't see use tonight," I said, and flicked my wrist.

The whistle disappeared into nothingness, returning to Winter.

"Such leashes you inflict upon your might," the former Prince of Nightfall sighed. "You could take so much more. And you have yet to bestow."

I grimaced.

"I'm not going to hand out mantles to anyone, Larat," I said. "Much less you."

He laughed, cold and crisp.

"I have no more need of titles, save that which is owed," he said. "But you are Queen of Winter, Catherine Foundling. No queen can be forever without a court."

"You must take me for a complete idiot," I mused. "Bad enough I have it whispering in the back of my mind, I'm not going to spread that influence."

"Ah, but there are such benefits to bestowal," Larat smiled. "Freedom from the chains of entropy among them. How many of those you love are you willing to lose to age, before bending your neck?"

My fingers clenched. Was he implying that if I titled Robber or any other of the goblins... No, I could not begin down that road. Bad enough I'd had speculations about what the Council of Matrons might be considering back in the Wasteland, if I ended up granting a sliver of Winter to Robber there would be blood.

"I am no stranger to sacrifice," I replied shortly.

"So you say," the Huntsman languidly shrugged. "We have all the time in the world to find out, don't we?"

I eyed him darkly.

"Even for a treacherous lieutenant, you're a little much," I told him.

He scoffed.

"Am I a mortal, to deny my own nature?" he replied. "I am Fae, my queen: be it fair or foul, I will never be less than I am. I will be monster and schemer, hound and prince, but not once untrue through any of it. Deception lies in the eye of the other, not in one's own blood."

"That was very inspiring," I drawled. "Doesn't make me want to stab you just to be on the safe side any less, but lovely little speech. Really. If I still had functioning tear ducts I might shed a tear."

"Tears will be shed when you feel them," Larat told me. "Your mistake is in trying to quantify, to place rules where there is only will."

That, more than his tirade, had me shivering. Because it rang true. Place rules where there is only will. I looked away. Masego had continued to study my body, and the more I learned the more unsettled I became. He'd told me since the beginning that my flesh and blood was a construct, now, that there was nothing natural about it. To learn that I no longer sweated had been no horrifying revelation, but that while I might breathe out of habit I no longer needed to? There was a reason my liquor cabinet was well-stocked.

"You're sure we're close enough?" I asked.

Larat sighed.

"Your meddling practitioner tries to regulate that which is beyond regulation," he said. "My queen, there is only the story. All else is beneath your notice."

Yeah, that was less than reassuring. I felt the power bloom in the distance, and turned Zombie around so I could have a better look. Red lights in the night sky, so tall and bright they must have been visible even down in Laure.

"Ready yourselves," I called out the Hunt. "You know the rules."

There was sparse laughter, but many eager grins. I did not have to wait long before it came. I'd expected it to be different, even though I'd not really known what to expect. Like a gate, maybe, or a spell. All I felt was a window, just at the corner of my vision.

"The Wild Hunt rides tonight," the fae who'd once been the Prince of Nightfall laughed. "Raise your banners, damned souls. Sound the horns and loose the hounds. Let us make sport under moonless night."

I stepped through, bridging thought and act without embracing either. The water-filled bowl shattered as we crossed through it, a reflection made truth. Wind whipped at the inside of the tent as Zombie neighed, the terrified Deoraithe mage at my feet turning white. Every Callowan knew that scrying near the Waning Woods was like sending an invitation to the Wild Hunt.

We had accepted it.

---

soonnanandnaanssoon

Ooohh the chills down my spine when Larat said those words. Winter has come.

Aeon

Very interesting. Confirmation that she hasn't gotten her new name yet. I honestly can't wait for her to come into a new one, because I think it'll be coming sooner or later. Awesome chapter.

Rook

That brings up a question, are we sure whether she's going to get a Name at all? I mean it's been assumed as the rule so far, but the thing is that she's pretty much Fae now, she already seems to play by a completely different set of rules.

Larat mentions that she inflicts 'leashes upon her own might', and that she could 'take so much more'. This could be interpreted as holding herself back out of morals or caution; but it's very ambiguously stated, and it would be an extremely Fae thing to do to tell the truth in a way that's prone to misinterpretation.

His actual point might be that she's already at the height of her power, and that she's just limited by what she thinks the rules are – the old rules. What if a new Name hasn't come and never will come because that unshaped mass of power was eaten by Winter when the Black Queen broke? It would be an explanation for why she has a Squire-level strength with no proper Name at all. It's her self-imposed binding, that's what she thinks she should have until a proper Name is granted.

It opens up some interesting implications, if Winter could eat bestowed Name power and make it solely her own, instead of borrowed from the Gods Above or Below. If she could extend her capacity by Bestowing the Taken power and using it to bind individuals to her court? Her court, and her by extension, would essentially be the Fae equivalent of an infinitely-growing slime.

Decius

She's not going to get a Name like Black Knight.

She's going to get a name like Dead King.

naturalnuke

I'd like to mention that the Crusade is set to take place in the metaphorical 'dead of Winter'.

This can't end well for them.

Shoddi

Hmm... "The Dead of Winter".

That's could be a good name for the winter-fueled zombies she creates.

Figerally

She has leaned so far into necromancy that I wonder if Death Knight is a Name, but that might just be wishful thinking influenced by Warcraft.

BryceWilliam

this story is all about *stories* about narrative weight, Cat becoming this strong was part of the climax last book yes, but it wasn't its own.. *event*. When cat took the name squire we got a whole chapter about it. the whole story so far has been slowly building up to a name transition, it can't not happen and it also can't have already happened because when it does its going to be the main focus of that chapter and maybe even several chapters. Its going to be a huge deal and have major impacts on something insanely important happening in that moment.

hell id guess that Cats gonna get her new name and pass out in the middle of a battle and we'll get some interludes of the Woe defending her but then when their about to lose Cat comes back from dream quest 3.0 and rains down hellfire

Drd

New aspect – Goblin Fire. :]

stevenneiman

I think that what she might end up with is a chance to be free of Fate entirely. She's a Fae, but she isn't bound to the old ideals of Winter because there is no Winter but her, while at the same time not being mortal anymore. As a fae (or at least pseudo-fae), she would be bound more tightly to the applicable stories, but the only applicable stories are her own stories of forging her own path

burdi

I think she can't come to her name, because she is the Winter Queen, yet she have not a court, "No queen can be forever without a court", when she start to bestow title, her court will start..and when it has, she will come to her Name, something that cannot be changed anymore that her Name is The Winter Queen

Big Brother

There's a reason Cat gets even more terrifying the longer she lives. Her Story is not one of a Marble on a track, forever following the same path, but of a wrecking ball falling on that track and giving true freedom for all that were stuck in that rut.

Rook

That, and the whole murder-knight thing she has going, where she rides around on a rotting horse corpse while covered in a metric ton of steel and war trophies. That's pretty scary too.

Unorginal

Ahhh but while she may ride on a necromantic horse it's not a bones and gory bits style one. Rather it had refinement, class, can fly, probably doesn't even have any noticeable holes in its pelt yet. Also has its own personality and it is not dependant on Cat unless she wants it to be.

Or so I have interpreted the text, honestly, I could be really wrong when I say that.

danh3107

The Wild Hunt rides once more, when the horn sounds there are only two choices: Ride or be Ridden down.

Naeddyr

Thanks for the chapter. So seems like Cat doesn't have a Name anymore, it's just Winter and some trinkets.

Does she count as a Villain then, anymore? I think we could try to fudge with a technicality here.

oldschoolvillain

I don't know, honestly. As much as she still claims she's on a "side", with Hierarch's action in the Epilogue of book 3, Archer/Squire/Apprentice all being Names capable of Good or Evil, and Adjutant/Hierophant being previously unknown Names, and now Thief spitting in Heaven's eye but maybe not being quite a Villain . . . she could honestly just be building a Neutral Kingdom and sending a missive to all the other countries saying "Bugger off, Callow is not yours to burn."

Sanityfaerie

Pretty sure Hierophant isn't new. Apparently, being blinded and having to find an eye replacement was a known feature of the type – or at least certain comments (by Warlock?) shortly after he made the transition would suggest so.

goliath1303

Does anyone happen to know if this is true? If so, can you point me to where that was started in the story? I vaguely remember a WoG or something saying that it wasn't a new name, just that it was either one that hadn't been around for a while or it's not a very common one. I definitely don't remember the bit about being blinded and finding a replacement though. I know this is an old comment and I'm not really expecting a reply from Sanityfaerie, but maybe someone else who comes along can answer this question.

burdi

i think winter is represent of villain in the arcadia, that make catherine a double villain...maybe

Panic!

Summer and Winter does not equal Good and Evil. Like said Before it's more of a situation of Red vs Blue.

Euodiachloris

It is interpreted as such, yes. But, just as with Good, Summer was no joke, either. And in Arcadia, neither Winter or Summer remain.

It might not remain in Creation, either. The Wild Hunt is technically a Winter thing, but the Summer Court has revels and hunts of its own, too, in myths and legends. In short, Summer could also call the Hunt, although its nature was a bit different. Think the difference between fox hunting with dogs and hawking. Things still die.

Yeah Nah Yeah

>The Wild Hunt is technically a Winter thing
I thought the Wild Hunt was a Spring/Autumn Court thing?
Don't think the Wild Hunt was ever tied to Winter/Summer until Larat and co. joined up with Cat.

Euodiachloris

In some traditions, it's mid-winter. And, it all ways hangs around the chilly rather than the toasty. The dances, revels and marches that have laughter, bells and a side order of entrapment and slaughter? Summer.

oldschoolvillain

Practical Guide specifically stated that the Wild Hunt comes into being in Spring and Autumn.

JackbeThimble

I get the impression she's more in the Monster category now. Like a Dragon or that Orc Demigod that Captain fought.

oldschoolvillain

Whoo, Robber was good, Archer was, honestly, irritating for not taking this seriously and assuming she could take a full dozen heroes solo – you never get away after you shoot more than one, a student of the Ranger and a “Fey Expert” should know that. Vivienne's bit was wonderful, honestly. Seeing her Fall in truth, here, was great. A woman who once thought being Righteous was enough now spitting in the eyes of Heaven. Oh she and Cat would actually make such a fantastic couple. Then . . . the Hunt. Ooh that sent chills down my spine, because that was truly glorious. And it gives Cat's lesson to Ime on what it's like to be Hunted a whole new perspective on how badly the night will go for those officers.

Yotz

Ah, The Legend of Woe:

The Hierophant, a cold madman whose strange sorceries tamed demons and stilled miracles.

The Thief, a fallen heroine said to have once stolen an entire fleet and even snatched the sun out of the sky.

Hakram Deadhand. The Adjutant. They said he was unkillable, that he was large as an ogre and his hand of bones could wrest out your soul.

And, last but not least – the Archer, who managed to shot herself in the butt with yumi, twice. Somehow.

James, Mostly Harmless

Leading them, the Queen of Air and Darkness with the Wild Hunt at her heels, crowned in black iron and cloaked in Woe. She will be another about whom they say “may she never return” whe she is gone!

grzecho2222

Queen of Air and Darkness whose first enemy was knight in sour armour type of hero who wears longcoat, was supposed to be her red right hand, planned his own death and is totally dead with no chance of return what so ever.

NerfContessa

I.
Didn't see the similarities.

Haha, oh man, William, you could have been a Dresden expy if you had been less contrite...

Blue

Oh yeah still shipping Catherine and Vivienne. They're good together and looks like they can push and pull each other in the directions they need to go. Cat has become suprisingly hamstrung by a mindset to appease Cordelia and I don't see that working in the long term. It's holding her back from taking the action she needs to on an almost dangerous level. Glad Thief talked her around.

Joel

Now that is a brilliant play. Have the Watch (who have no secret commands otherwise) scry, which opens a gateway to the Wild Hunt (which you command). The enemy is so busy looking for the types of gates you usually make that they won't see it coming. Perfect.

Decius

Brilliant on many levels;
Assume that the heroes will be able to determine the actual orders given to The Watch
Give the watch the order to scry when a condition is met.
The enemy expects that the scrying is to get additional orders, to evade their truth-detection.
The enemy closely monitors the scrying, to figure out what the secret orders are and if the Watch is betraying them.
Wild hunt appears.
Enemy is suddenly being attacked, right when the Watch is scrying for secret orders that might be betrayal.

Enemy concludes that the Watch is betraying them.
Enemy implements their contingency plan to attack Watch.
Narrative is now that the Enemy attacked their ally without provocation.

daniel young

Very clever foxes

Andrei

Considering all the spotlight the whole “being a villain will make people under you darker” thing is getting if the Watch doesn’t get clarification that they were used I can see this becoming one of those long grudges Callowans are so famous for (and the Watch especially)

Antoninjohn

The God’s fear her for she is the Anathema, also known as the God Empress of Mankind

“The Empress Protects”
-The Lectitio Divinitatus

Yotz

While we on the “random crossovers” timelike curve...

...

Brace yourselves.

The Winter is coming.

grzecho2222

Talbot: But Your Highness, now that they know of our plans—

Cat: Ahh, Grandmaster, but that is the plan. Now that they know our plan, they will plan around our plan, and so we shall in turn plan around the plan that they are planning around our plan!

Talbot: Your brilliance knows no bounds!

Cat: And regardless... we have one advantage that they sorely lack~... GATES!

Yotz

Talbot: My Queen, what do you plan to do tonight?

Cat: The same thing we do every night, Grandmaster – try to defend Callow!

grzecho2222

Dread Empress Triumphant: Ahh, after many years I'm free. Time to conquer Creation.

Bard: She escaped. Recruit Band of Heroes with attitude.

Bookworm

I wonder if Catherine should even have a new Name at this point in the story. She is growing in such a way that she sounds like our own myths. Merlin, Hercules, Beowulf. Those figures formed the archetypes in our reality, rather than the archetype forming the figure as happens in this story. All of the excerpts at the start of the chapters refer to her as Foundling (as I recall), which just reinforces that she will not get another Name. She does not need one, and frankly, being forced into an archetype may inhibit her from doing what has to be done, as demanded by her character and story.

Anon

I don't necessarily disagree, but as has been pointed out both in this chapter and previous, the more she takes from the fae, the more bound she is to the rules of Arcadia, which can be used to entrap her.

Bookworm

I understand this, but it is an obvious trap laid out by the author. Because of the foreshadowing and the fatigue seen in Cat, it becomes more enticing for us the readers to believe in this danger, which is necessary for good writing. And good writing would seek to elicit our relief and excitement when she avoids such a trap in an exceptional way. It is guessing on a meta-level, but I don't think she will ultimately fall under the binding of the Fae name (though there may be some temporary flirtations with Winter). No, I think the Fae mantle is just an escalation of the Named ploy. Both force the wearer of the mantle or bestowal into the archetype, the Fae more so than a Named. But Foundling's character and story demands that she breaks free of archetypes in order to pursue her own path (which is an archetype of its own in our world). She is the ultimate driving force.

Andrei

The thing is we're seeing new names pop up around her and these don't really have an archetype (think Hierophant) so if she ends up getting a new name she wouldn't be bound by any story other than the really big Good vs Evil one since there is no historical context for what she will do as "Insert name here"

amc

her new Name is 'Triumphant'

Allafterme

Thats heresy, but I'll take it 😊

blitzxs

"The secret order was known only to one of her mages, and even the specifics of it were nothing too suspicious on the surface: all the mage had to do was check for a signal in the sky at a specific hour, and scry after seeing it. That, and note the position of officer tents. It would be quite enough."

Heh. So we finally get to see the Battle of the Camps. This'll be interesting.

Anon

Hmm....Cat's certainly giving the 'evil begets evil' aspect some solemn/serious thought – I would have thought that if this were true, it would have been evident (or at least visible) before now – considering Cat's the 'least' evil she's ever been, compared to when she was willing to accept the weapon with Malicia to act as a deterrent.

It almost feels....perhaps a little too blunt, now that she's seeing it everywhere? I get that it's going to likely end up a driving force for her to abdicate (along with the rest of her plans), but if doing that much is enough for Thief to become 'evil', (of which, incidentally, she's really not, if she's trying to fight against zealots who won't back down to reason), this would be a much more common tactic among villains....Unless the 'thresher' type of villain mentioned by the gray pilgrim is relatively rare?

Especially when Cat's now technically only 'named' in the vaguest sense – unless the Squire's skeleton is enough to leave that association, and/or Winter itself is enough to make the people evil (which could be closer to the truth, given how the fae interact with Creation), it seems like reaching.

But at least Cat's moving ahead with her plans, and the story, right now, does have some credence against fighting back the Crusaders, even if the latter are on the side of 'Good' – which I'm guessing will end up being a part of the Prince's Graveyard battle.

However, I'm guessing the name battles are going to start taking their toll, even for someone of Cat's power. And on that note, I'm perhaps most worried about Cat's body at this point – between the headaches, the mental contamination, and the other worries her Winter body has brought her, I'm expecting it to end up a focal point sometime during this battle.

At any rate, I'm curious to see how the named battles start stacking up – with the grey pilgrim teaching the younger heroes, and the sword saint running interference, Cat's gonna be pressed for success.

Also, sidenote: has the story ever made mention of any good/evil names 'hopping' to the other side like Thief is maybe doing here, and the potential consequences therein? Unless Cat's 'allowed' to do that because of the 'thresher' nature she has, I would think the heavens would start to try and trip up Thief.

PS: the Vivienne/Cat ship also takes a few steps forward, though not in healthy ways....

Darkening

There was a big deal made out of Cat's rule of three with William being a possible redemption story, which seems to indicate it's certainly possible for people to go from villain to hero and back again.

Mr. Nobody

I think Vivienne had a kind of Neutral Name since the beginning seeing how Assassin didn't kill her, going as far as trying to recruit her back then.

Jonnnnz

Evil begets evil, but good sometimes also begets evil. Take the Champion, a hero that only cares about killing, as an example. Or take Black and his plan, where people don't need heroes, as an example of evil begetting good. The dichotomy of good and evil is at best forced from human standards. It only really exists for the gods

MetruX

Like mentioned in the comments in so many chapters, do not confuse Good with good and Evil with evil, what we see as good and evil don't define those forces, since they are directly derived from the Gods, both Above and Bellow.

*ahd*

"Twelve heroes on Callowan soil", surely.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

don't call me Surely.

Yotz

You mean this very night, before the rooster crows, one of them will disown their side three times?

frolamiz

Yeah, the story will love that. Under the moonless night, the Queen of The Hunt, Sovereign of Moonless Night, lead The Hunt to pursue mortals who dare to trespass in her domain.

This one is going to give birth to so many rumours, myths and folklore...

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

I hope that summer fae was able to season her fingers before eating them.

Euodiachloris

Regret is over accommodating sauce. Comes in ready instant, prepared from fresh the long way, or a little corner-cutting cheating, too.

Shoddi

They were lightly salted with tears of regret.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

It seems that Cat might've stolen Vivienne's heart.

White

Poor Killian. We barely knew thee.

Yotz

Don't discard her just yet – she is a half-Faerie, after all. One potential avenue would be stabilizing her blood-related problems by Bestowal of, say, Viscountess of Whatever-is-the-antonym-to-Indian-Summer upon her...

And in the face of Eternity silly little things like polyamory are not only normalized and accepted, but rather expected from one.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

That just cries out to happen. 😊

nick012000

Thought: Names are bestowed by the gods of this setting, right?
And the Kings and Queens of the Fae are said to be (lesser?) gods.

Does that mean that Cat can make Named?

Yotz

More like orthogonal gods – but yes to the first, at least as I see it.

To the second – depends: are Fair titles can be considered names? For they sure as sugar are something more than just “Baron of the Rotten Bog” or “Marquise de Sty”...

MetruX

You should remember she fought a Fae who was Named in the “common” way, the Rider. Thus titles have power besides Names, and you can have both, not only in Cat’s way.

Yotz

Remind me, please, was the Rider Entitled in addition to be Named?

What I lead to – there can be several explanations to this:
* firstly, the Rider was Named by the will of the Gods of Creation, for only they can bestow a Name, while only Lords of Arcadia can grant a Fair/Foul Title, thus the “orthogonal” part;

* secondly, “The Rider” can be a lesser Arcadia Title like, say, the Constable, the Küchenmeister, or the Seneschal.

Regardless of that, the question was about Cat’s capacity to create a Name for someone. The way I see it – she can only facilitate Naming (like it was with Hakram), but not simply nickname one and expect it to become one’s Name just because of her own Title. She, however, can grant a lesser Title to anyone – or almost anyone – without any fuss, and it will stick.

TeK

He was a Rider of the Host. He didn’t have a name, only profession.

Yotz

Which can be a Title. Count and Baron are professions too, after all.

agumentic

"Wasn't able to get all the Names," Thief said. "But I do have a number for you: there's fourteen of them." – Chapter 5.

Ouch, so the fight with Absence did not happen without casualties.

Morgenstern

Or two of them are on a trip somewhere else for yet unknown purposes...

SMHF

Cat knew there's gonna be fourteen Heroes in the enemy camps from Vivian's report... the fact that no one bothers to point out why two of them are Absent now should tell us something!

d_o_l

Holy shit, I totally missed that. And next to the remark about having a vicious headache for no reason in particular, too.

shieldredblog

It may be the Grey Pilgrim got absenced then. As hes the only Hero she even talked too and Absence seems like it would be a weakness for the Choir of Mercy that's all about alleviating suffering. What does that do for the terms set?

agumentic

No, Cat still mentions that there are 2 experienced heroes leading ten novices, so both the Pilgrim and the Saint are alive.

Yotz

Which brings to a question: how exactly do the Absence works? Are the Absenced simply cease to exist, blinking through time and space a-la certain Bard until the effect wears off; or they continue to exist within Creation but get ignored by everyone and everything akin to certain Joe Schmo, who is compleatly normal, non-anomalous person, and in no way, shape, or form is a Keter-class permanent containment failure in progress? For if the second is true, that opens some terrifying options for the side of The Greater Good...

agumentic

Probably just cease to ever existing forever and retroactively. It's hard to say what would that mean for all their achievements and consequences of all their actions, but they may also retroactively vanish. Which turns everything into a huge mess, actually, but that's demons for you.

oldschoolvillain

mm, not necessarily – the example of a Demon of Absence's power was some city vanishing from everyone's memory for a specific period of time, though I can't remember how long that was. It's possible that the Heroes will make a triumphant comeback just in time to save the group from utter defeat.

Quie Possibly A Cat

So potentially the two vanished heroes can kick their way out of non-existence, pop back into creation at the worst possible time and probably come out with a gaggle of power ups? Wonderful.

d_o_l

Not necessarily. That's how things would normally work, but it's stated that demons actually destroy the narrative itself. The usual rules don't apply when demons are involved.

Yotz

More likely not "kick their way out", but simply appear suddenly and without their volition or intent in second worst possible moment as if they always were here. If continent wide empire can appear as of nowhere, why not two Heroes?

Demons do damage the Narrative, though, so possible heroic reappearance can't be predicted with narrative tools – ultimately, one must be/have knowledge from beyond the weave of the Story to be able to see/remember damaged parts of it. So – possibly, Hierophant. Probably, Larat.

Euodiachloris

And, sort of Cat. She's hungover after Creation got kicked, possibly. But, it's her first time, so she thinks it's just being knackered. 😊

grzecho2222

Or it works same way as Licho (demon of random disappearing) and it just moves random people/objects/places/concepts to heck knows where

Antony444

Well, we can safely say the Procerans and the Heroes didn't see that one coming...or they would never have authorised a single scrying, or refused the Watch inside their camp. The enemy is already inside their defences. The heroes are numerous, but there is one charged to mount guard near the Deaoraites who is going to find himself against Catherine and the entire Wild Hunt. I would not like to be in his place. Add to this that Masego is planning something impressive magically.

Yeah, this battle has already begun badly for the Crusaders and the intended target is not people the Princes are going to protect at all costs. After all the lives of high-ranked nobles are far more important than up-jumped commoners, right?

The effect is going to be terrifying, seriously. If it works, any mage on the surface of Calernia scrying at night is potentially a target. That isn't exactly going to provide a boost of confidence.

I suppose this is the Battle of the Camps...and unless the authorities are misleading us, the Light has already lost two heroes to a demon of Absence.

Can't wait for the next chapter...

taliesinskye

Personally I suspect that the two missing heroes are the Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords off on an errand somewhere, not heroes lost off-screen to Absence.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Doubt it. Cat noted on how it was strange she hadn't noticed there was a Tenth of Heroes+two officers. Two heroes got fed to Ur, Demon of the Firsts Choir. I mean, Abstemious Demon, Archer's Greatest Weakness. I mean the Demon who Smells of Sunflowers. Okay, this is just going downhill.

I guess we know why no one was able to locate any records of it.

Yotz

Surely you meant the Demon of Absinthe, Archer's Bestest Friend! Its appearances have been thoroughly recorded. And... let's call it "studied".

Euodiachloris

I thought her greatest weakness was a stunning pair of buttocks... xD

Miles

I think she would have been questioning where the other heroes went if there had been 14 and now there were only 12, but there wasn't a single line about it.

oldschoolvillain

It also mentioned she had a splitting headache, and that even Vivienne and Masego had been "out of sorts." As close to confirmation that the Heroes engaged Absence and lost two that we're likely to get for now.

taliesinskye

OK, that's a pretty strong argument. You've changed my mind.

Thea

It's funny, really. Cat fought the fae in Book 3 because she wanted all fae influence out of creation. Except she turned herself in the quasi-Winter Queen, making all people of Callow quasi-Winter Peasants, until she elevates them. But this might be the actual reason Callow's people turn harsher. "Better them than us" is a winter-theme as well. Because as a villain, the Squire, she shouldn't have enough power to subtly influence a whole nation, and she hasn't received Name-power since.

This would mean... as long as Cat rules, Callow will grow harsher. She might escape by eventually abdicating and focusing on being the Queen of the Hunt. It would allow her to travel, for example with Archer or people she might eventually bestow titles on, after all. Relying on your close and loved ones and keeping close is another winter-theme, after all. And as the Queen in Exile, she always has a story thread to come back and pull Callow out of trouble. Like one vicious Guardian... maybe not Angel, but you get my drift. Would that qualify as a happy ending?

grzecho2222

She seems to be going way of:

- Future Callow is invaded (again)
- King/Queen is failing
- King/Queen goes into the darkest, the coldest place in Callow during moonless night
- King/Queen offers his/hers crown of gold and mantle of ermine and asks for help the darkest ruler of Callow
- Black Queen (or under other Name) appears crown in iron and cloaked in fallen
- Black Queen raises armies of Callow from death and calls for her court of horrors
- Black Queen crushes invaders

-King/Queen realizes that they have no idea how to make her go away now
-Ow snap we count as Evil nation again

Yotz

For souls long lost and full of fright,
For those alone in Moonless Night,
To set right what has been made wrong,
I call you, Black Queen – make us strong!

Miles

I'm kind of hoping she casts off that mantle at some point and becomes not-fae again. Right now her greatest weakness is the fact that the Queen of Summer/King of Winter union is the court that would oppose her metaphorical one, and if they were to die somehow she'll go dormant until the fall/spring cycle completes, along with all the other summer/winter fae.

And it's only a matter of time before the King/Queen of Winter/Summer have a little spat and who knows how that'll turn out.

MetruX

They kind of don't exist anymore? I mean, the whole reason for the wedding was to end the cycle, there is no more Winter and Summer, the only thing from ANY of them that exists is Cat. Larat is only there because he abdicated his Winter mantle to become part of the Wild Hunt, which is something any Fae can do, but the Wild Hunt is strictly from Spring/Fall, thus if they are here, there is no Summer/Winter, or simply it all got broken, like the king wanted.

All in all there is simply no problem or reason to worry about them dying, they are not her antithesis, and she isn't even a true Fae, so she won't go dormant, just like half-fae doesn't, neither does Fae on reality soil.

TeK

Grandmaster Brandon Talbot: They'll hunt you.

Catherine : You'll hunt me. You'll condemn me, set the dogs on me. Because that's what needs to happen. Because sometimes...the truth isn't good enough. Sometimes people deserve more.

Sometimes people deserve to have their faith rewarded.

Brandon's Son: Catherine? Catherine! Why is she running, Dad?

Grandmaster Brandon Talbot: Because we have to chase her.

Brandon's Son: She didn't do anything wrong.

Grandmaster Brandon Talbot: Because she's the Named Gotham deserves, but not the one it needs right now. So, we'll hunt her, because she can take it. Because she's not a Hero. She's a silent guardian. A watchful protector. A Dark Knight.

Damn it's sad she's not a Squire.

RanVor

I didn't expect to see Herbert again so soon... not that I'm complaining.

Overall, yet another brilliant chapter.

Quie Possibly A Cat

Whelp, it looks like the demon is out and about.

wyaldriddler

Weeeeelllll then.

So, for our first point of the day, it looks like the Pilgrim's requests for Heavenly aid gave him a way to track the gate makers. Reasonable and a good choice, if that was anywhere close to the game Cat was playing. But sadly, as has been demonstrated, she isn't playing that game.

It's almost like she doesn't even know what game she is playing anymore! It's great! Embrace the madness of Isabella!

Second thing, Absence is up and about and seems to have eaten two heroes. It's interesting that even when she is so charged with Fae power that Cat is still affected. However, the very fact that people in universe can remember the name and existence of Absence indicates their power has flaws which can be used to undo it.

The two old timers are definitely still here though and it was two rando's who got ate, so it's possible that Absence has activated on it's own some how and is slowly working it's way through the Procerans. I... would not be surprised to find out that chunks of the armies are starting to slowly go missing.

Third up is that what the Pilgrim said disturbed Cat and set her up on a path which is currently ill defined. The bluntness of her awareness of this seems like a growth from her initial thoughtfulness before the Pilgrim, but I am concerned its some kind of mind shenanigans like the redemption story attempt. The Pilgrim seems a bit too honest, and affected in turn by what she said to do that kind of thing intentionally. Could be the Heavens being cheating meddlers.

Fourth Cat looks like a badass and is really getting into enchanting of magic items. The fact that it can be used by anyone is rather concerning. Though I wonder if it can be used to call Cat by one of her allies. It's a good thing she isn't relying on it though as Black taught her.

Fifth, it must suck like flaming ass to be a grunt in Malanza's army right now. First there was a great long hike through a mountain pass over a giant stair case made through spooky magic. Then they got into Callow and have faced minimal resistance juxtaposed with pants shittingly terrifying moments of abrupt lethal battle by armies which can't be pursued. The supplies are gone and you might not make it to Harrow. The Great Hasenbach is forbidding the soldiers from feeding themselves through intense foraging. Annnnnd now you learn that your enemy can somehow pop right in the middle of camp while you're taking a piss in the latrine.

Life sucks being a Crusader.

Author Unknown

Two questions spring to mind. One, how good is the Grey Pilgrims foresight. Cat seems to be doing something very reckless, that she specifically said she wasn't going to do: making plans which hinge on things going right. Jumping into the middle of the enemy camp with only one way out makes it seem like she has forgotten the kind of bullshit heroes can pull out of there ass. 'Specially given that she is gambling on them not reacting fast enough to counter her before she can retreat. For all she knows, the rest of the merry band has chosen this moment to have a few drinks with the commander.

Two: Quis custodiet ipsos custodes? Which hero is keeping an eye on the Watch? Cat is guaranteed a Hero battle against an unknown opponent and she still waltzes right in, even though she will be needed to flee. Yeah, she has had a good run against newbie heroes, but this seems rather arrogant. All that talk about Squire being nothing more than a skeleton brings up one potential weakness. For all her current strength, her foundation is still that of an introductory Name.

All in all this strike me as a remarkably reckless move. One of questionable merit. Even if she accomplishes her objective, I don't think it will have the effect she wants. Some of the princes seem to think that the real war is fought with hushed voices in smokey backrooms, and all the marching and everything is just the fiddle bits in between.

I expect some of their reactions to loosing their commanders to be something along the line of: So we lost a few jumped up peasants? Plenty more commoners where they came from. Promote a few and get on with it. After all, their only job is to do what their betters tell them. How hard can that be?

I'm concerned about how this all going to play out. I would feel a lot better if Deadhand was there to pull her frigid ass out of the fire, again.

MetruX

1. You are simply assuming there is only one way out, which is a pretty bad thing to do when you confront Fae. To start with the way in has already been destroyed, the scrying bowl broken, but they could accept the invitation on any other scrying bowl anywhere (we don't know the limitations, if there are any). Then we come to have two fae gate makers just on this group, which strikes me as making retreat a very easier thing, especially since anyone under her command is free to pass through Arcadia, but her enemies are not, so shenanigans should stop them from going after the Wild Hunt. Also, we don't know what Masego is doing, but it should be nice aswell.

2. Why would that ever be a problem? This is not HER battle, but a Wild Hunt with her in it, it's been noted before that few Named have ever seen the Wild Hunt and left alive, that is one of Ranger's list of achievements, so a single Hero in the way, trying to fight or contain the Watch just before the freaking Wild Hunt comes for him? Yeah, I don't see any way he is going to cause Cat any problems, even the Pilgrim or the Saint would have trouble staying alive in this situation, and I'm pretty sure it won't be one of them guarding the Watch.

All in all, Adjutant being there would make things harder, since he can't mount and he isn't part of the hunt, which would make him a fourth party (if you count the Watch as a third one). He would need to have his ass saved, not the other way around.

TeK

You misunderstand something, I think. The fact that Catherine is, for all relevant intents and purposes, nameless is a huge advantage. For one, most of players seem to think, that she is a Villain. She is not. Villains are Named, so if she has no Name, she is not a Villain, she is a monster. Or a force of nature, given that she is of Winter. It's another breed entirely and requires different tactics and different attitudes. For example, Villains always lose at the end of the story. Monster?

grzecho2222

They come back in sequels?

warriormonk19

What does Cat owe Larat? Did she promise him something when he brought the Winter Army to ride against the Summer's in Book 3?

oldschoolvillain

"The Crowns of Seven Mortal Princes and One, lain at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall"

That is, at least, what she told Princess Sulia. She was warned, however, that it must not come to pass, so whether she finagles out of it or not is in the air. It was given a callback in the prologue though, so chances are not high.

taliesinskye

The funniest way of getting out of it would be to buy eight princes brand new, very fancy crowns in exchange for borrowing the old ones to get the sizing right.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not sure that'd work. As long as it is a crown of a mortal prince, it counts to be given, but that means it likely counts to be gotten. Pretty sure this is some story bullshit that lets Larat ascend into something, or gives him a destiny/prophecy fulfillment that makes him neigh-unstoppable as he gets whatever it is he wants.

TeK

Say, crazy thought, but what if he wants to be a King of Winter? While he did said, that he does not want any titles, he mentioned "beyond already owned". What if this crown bullshit is some kind of wedding gift? He mentioned that his realm is very close to Cat's. If the Winter court will be firmly established in the Creation, since it sees everything in monochrome, the Summer court will need to appear. And since we already got one court in Arcadia, it can potentially mean war between Arcadia and Creation.

I think my headcanon needs a bit more polishing.

grzecho2222

Good guys: Oh Gods.

Evil guys: Oh Hells.

Dead King: "Training flower catching"

NZPIEFACE

Isabella is fucking great. I can see how she bet Theodosius now.

grzecho2222

"Agreed," he said. "Innocents should not be made to suffer. You must refrain from using demons."

"I'll swear to that, if you refrain from calling on angels," I said."

Grey Pilgrim never said that Heroes won't use Demons. Is there a possibility that some Antihero is using Demon as invisibility cloak?

grzecho2222

Or a prince?

JJR

Probably not Demons, they are too far over the line to even keep anti-heroing afterwards I think. Given how the damage creation itself and rather permanently. Devils though, there's a maybe. They are far more controllable and arguments about "The Great Good" might abound.

Either way, this would open the narrative door to Cat using Angels on the crusaders. Most of the choirs would only strengthen the crusade of course. But what happens if the entire army is made Merciful? It's a bit hard to win a crusade if you will never again take a life.

sengachi

"Strange, it hadn't occurred to me before now that the muster of heroes on the other side was essentially a tenth and two officers. I had been tired, and there'd been a few days a while back where I'd had vicious headaches. Must have been the lack of sleep having unforeseen consequences. We were all feeling the pressure: even Vivienne and Masego had been out of sorts."

Oh, so that's when the absence demon ate those two heroes.

Blue1ao

1st comment I've made since binging this I realize it's already written but I hop robber joins her court

vuthuha912

Cat. Procer does not follow the Below, they had food, and every resource they need, yet, they still act like Praesi without the magic part. At least, we know that part of Praes's problem is the lack of food and divine interventions pushing them further and further down a pit and they lashed out. Procer has nothing to blame but itself for its inadequacy. Humans aren't nice, they can be vicious to everybody else, and most of the time, they do. None of your advisers is wrong in their opinion of Procer. Your people can be influenced by the Below but even when influenced they are still head and shoulder better than most Procer Princes who go to the House of Light daily. Hell, Black and you are both fighting for your country when they all sit around waiting for it to fall so they can take a share. Black does this whole thing for the benefit of Praes – who people get fuck over by Gods so hard, self-destructing is their only option. He is playing the Game to drag his country out, not for some personal ambitions. Vivienne is doing the same, she sided with you because you are objectively better for Callow than any of the Heroes she is with. Every officer that you have is fighting for their country, they are more heroic than any people on the opposite side.

I am telling you justification matters because idea matters and thoughts matter. Sure Black conquered your country and that is inexcusable but when you know why he did what he did, you can actually tackle the root and help each other. How about William? He has justification and you know why he did what he did. Yet, it does not matter because the reasoning is not good enough for what he was doing. Racism is no excuse for trying to brainwash an entire city into a suicidal Crusade. Religions are not a worthy cause. Buddhism nearly wrecked my country's economy so we changes how we follow it. Religion is good for nurturing order and virtue among the people so everyone can live better lives but if it betrays its main purpose then it needs to be challenged and changed.

Who the fuck cares about Heaven's opinion? Black doesn't, Cordelia doesn't. They both said fuck you to Heaven and go on to manage their country. When there is no food on the table or death is at the door, honor, dignity, and morals all run off. Good teaching is not good enough. It lets too many people suffer to be considered adequate. It needs to change. Evil was never okay to begin with that is why Black is trying to change it or wreck it when you look at his attitude toward Tyrant, Heir, and Malicia.

---

Chapter 11: Ballon

"You might say that they'll never see me coming."

-Dread Empress Malevolent II, announcing the raising of her invisible army

"Your Majesty?" the Deoraithe mage stuttered out.

I leaned down and gently touched his forehead with an armoured finger.

"Don't resist," I said. "It'll be uncomfortable, but not painful."

Unless he tried to fight me, but in this case the fear that trailed me as much as my cape saw to the matter. The man went rigid as a board. I breathed out mist and Winter crept through my veins. His soul wriggled under the tight grip of my will, as I rifled through vague memories. He had, I thought, a well-organized mind. Shame about the panic tinging it. I found what I needed anyway, the locations of the officer tent's he'd found as he'd been told.

"You were thorough," I said, withdrawing my finger. "Well done."

The fifty riders of the Hunt were too many for so small a tent, and one of the fae casually blew it away with a flick of the wrist before it could tangle the banners. Midnight was no bar to my sight, and what I saw around us was the Watch responding to our sudden arrival with flawless professionalism. Ah, the things I could do with an army's worth of these. It was almost tempting to hollow out Kegan's soul, tie puppet strings to the remnants and take them all for my own. I bit my lip until it bled, the flare of pain helping me focus. I reached for my saddlebag, taking out the seal of House Iarsmai I'd asked Kegan to send me months ago. I tossed it into the mage's hands.

"Validate this," I ordered.

The man shivered, though I was unsure why. I'd been very polite so far. Murmuring in the mage tongue he traced the tall dead oak on the seal with his fingers, gasping when it glimmered green.

"It's real," he said.

Unsheathing my sword, I flicked the blade behind me after gauging the surroundings. Creation folded unto itself, the fairy gate opening thirty feet wide and just as tall. I tied off the threads, giving it a finite lifespan. One of the newer Winter tricks in my arsenal.

"By the authority granted to me by Duchess Kegan Iarsmai, I order the Watch to immediately withdraw," I called out. "And quick about it, I don't have the time to hold your hand. You have half an hour before the gate closes."

Zombie was chomping at the bit, which admittedly was better than chomping at grass I'd probably need to have a goblin dig out of her later. I took a moment to calm myself, then dug into the memories I'd glimpsed. Reorienting myself was the hardest part of figuring it all out, since none of the unconscious markers the mage had used were markers I was familiar with. Masego and I had figured out a way around that through the Observatory with the card I'd been keeping up my – heavily armoured – sleeve, but I was without the benefit of Hierophant tonight. My mind struggled with the discrepancies, until I let through another sliver of Winter and there was a sensation like a spike through my forehead. No pain, though, only terrifyingly clear understanding.

"Riders of the Hunt," I called out.

All fifty of them turned to me as one with unnatural smoothness.

"Follow," I laughed. "Tonight we ride."

"Finally," Larat hissed, blade in hand. "Sound the horns. Let them hear us coming."

Banners were raised, not of silk or cloth but crow's feathers and shadow. Shining coldly like a raven's eye. A fae with hair like spun gold touched the horn to her lips, and doom screamed across the night. I spurred on Zombie, and felt her devour the distance easily as I guided us by memories not my own. The Watch parted for us, already preparing to retreat, and we fell unto the unprepared camp of the crusaders like hungry wolves. Men shouted out in Chantant, known to me regardless of sight. The heat of them could be felt on the tip of my tongue, the fear that set their hearts aflutter thundering in my ears. It pleased me. It was slaughter, wherever we rode. Men half-dressed and half-awake were torn apart by sword and spear and darker things: hounds of air and darkness, called forth by the horns. I wielded the monster like a knife as my thoughts cooled. The Alamans army closest to us had kept the tents of their officers together and I made them pay for that mistake. Before the hounds even reached them the soldiers I raised my hand and choked them with rings of ice and shade, a dozen dead in a heartbeat. Smiling, I leaned forward.

"Up," I ordered. "Kill."

Corpses with broken necks and ugly marks around their throats rose up as the Hunt passed through. Screams followed in our wake. We would begin, I decided, with the outer ring. Princess Malanza's own host was closer to the centre, but I would let her people feel it coming. Know what was prowling the night for them. We carved our way out of the Alamans army camp, scything through the company of fantassins that tried to form up in our way. Men and women were trampled by horses, terror blooming again in the wake of death as the corpses rose and chaos spread.

"You will go no further," a man's voice announced calmly.

I cocked my head to the side. No fear in this one. And such power. Young but scarred, his voice had echoed of faraway Levant. A large man with a war hammer hoisted over his shoulder, burdened with heavy plate. I neither slowed nor ceased, Zombie galloping straight at him. The hero hefted his war hammer and struck with impossible swiftness, aiming to shatter the legs of my mount. With a cold laugh I guided my horse and her wings unfolded, leaping tall above the man as the Hunt streamed around him seamlessly. We rode even as the man screamed of our cowardice, ever onwards. I had not come here to be waylaid by petty sidekicks. The camps had come alive and our prey was moving. It became slower work, picking off officers who'd joined their companies. Frustratingly slow. The riders slaked their blood on those that could be found instead. No surrender was offered and no mercy granted.

Then the sky came down on our heads.

Instinct allowed me to guide Zombie away from the worst of it, but wet earth sprayed over us as a massive gouge split the ground open. Even as it began to rain mud, a woman walked out of the mess. Old, I thought. Neither tall nor short, and she wore no armour aside from a cuirass over long cloth robes. In her hand was a simple sword of oiled steel, and she was rolling her wrists to limber them.

"Saint of Swords," I said, voice echoing with the howl of blizzards.

"Black Queen," the old woman said, light tapping the flat of the blade against her shoulder. "Nice of you to visit."

My will spread, weaving glamour across the sky according to borrowed memories.

"Go," I told the Hunt. "Fulfil my purpose."

"Stay," the Saint grinned. "Die screaming."

She swung again, and this time I grasped what was being wielded. Not an aspect or a spell. Nothing like the Lone Swordsman's power or the Gallant Brigand's. No, I'd only seen this once before: when Ranger had considered killing me seriously enough I'd felt myself die. When the Saint of Swords attacked, she did so with the sharpened intent to kill us. She had hardened her willpower so much that Creation counted no difference between her will and truth, the air howling as it cut itself apart. I drew deep and laughed, ice crashing against the blow with a gargantuan cracking sound. Shards sprayed everywhere as the Hunt obeyed, hounds and riders streaming out in every direction but that of the coming fight. I leapt off Zombie and set her aflight. Her wings made her too valuable to risk here.

"Winter, is it?" the Saint of Swords mused, strolling forward. "Never had that before. Try to make it entertaining."

"You will make," I said, "very useful artefacts."

A quiet voice in the back of my mind howled, screaming that revealing any unknown capacity to the enemy was sheer stupidity.

I could not seem to care. It had felt... right to chastise her that way. We closed the distance as one, swords bared. I feinted to the side but she slapped it away contemptuously, a half-step bringing her into my guard and without missing a beat she cut my throat. Red gushed out, but it was more Winter than blood – an exertion of will was all it took to heal the wound. I spat out the blood in my mouth, making distance between us.

“Regenerators,” the Saint sighed. “You never bother to learn how to fight properly, with a crutch like that. Sloppy.”

The nonchalance tasted fouler in my mouth than the blood, called for utter destruction in answer, but I breathed out and smoothed the edges growing ragged. I attacked again, low and quick. Parry, but when she closed in again I was ready: a spear of shadow formed out of my free hand and tore towards her. Snorting, the heroine raked her bare fingers down and tore through the darkness like wet parchment. In the heartbeat where I hesitated, she struck quick as a viper – aiming to cut off my head in full, this time. I ducked under by the barest of margins but she kicked me in the face, and as I rocked back she struck again. My parry was effortlessly turned, blade twisting around to carve through my wrist like it was butter. I pivoted, caught the hand still holding the blade with my other one and forced it back on even as I avoided a thrust that would have gone through my eye if I’d been a moment slower. Winter flared and the pieces reattached, my fingers twitching as the power skittered through them.

“I can see it,” the Saint mused. “Take the crippling to avoid the killing. There’s a hint of Ranger in there, however diluted. A bastard’s bastard.”

I rolled my shoulders as she watched me indifferently.

“Again,” I said.

“Change of plans,” the old woman smiled.

The spell struck me from the side like the fist of an angry god. I felt my flesh melt off, my blood boil – until I opened the floodgates, and shot out of the fire storm as my face peeled off flake by flake. That had stung.

“Reinforcements, my dear lady,” a man’s voice drawled. “Though you seem to need them not.”

My eyes flicked to the side. Three of them. Short man with a leather coat and a casting rod must have been responsible for the flame. An olive-skinned woman with two knives and a red-painted face started walking towards me, while the last was unarmed. Priest, I decided, looking at his ornate robes. Attrition was no longer feasible if they had a healer. On the other hand, now it was four on one. My odds had just gotten a lot better.

"Well," I grinned, my teeth grown sharp. "Now it's a party. Have at it, heroes."

"How uncouth," the man in leather said, wrinkling his nose.

When the fire came again, erupting in a cone from the rod, I flicked away. Two Knives closed in from the side as the Saint was forced to go around the spell. Eyes following the arms, I let the knife-wielder commit to a cut from the left before half-stepping out of the way, hand snaking up to catch the extended wrist and snapping it. There was a scream, but I slapped her open mouth and filled with ice. She began choking until Light bloomed and melted it. It even streaked down to unsnap the wrist. No matter, I was already past her.

"Damnation," the spellcaster cursed, seeing me close the distance in the blink of an eye.

A sphere of what looked like liquid flame formed around him, but what was fire to me? I gathered power and struck at it, ripping off a chunk of the protective sphere to get at the terrified man beneath. Instinct warned me and I listened. Leaping above the flames, I narrowly avoided being run through by the Saint – though, twisting halfway up the arcing jump, I shaped a spike of rime and sent it howling after Two Knives. The heroine flickered, as if she'd been an illusion all this time, and what should have torn through her abdomen instead put a hole in the ground twenty feet behind her. Displacement? Useful trick. Too useful to be anything but an aspect. I landed in a crouch.

"Keep away from her, kids," the Saint ordered. "She's a few years ahead of what you can handle."

My eyes flicked to the sky. Of the five glamoured markers I had placed, three were left. I'd have to play with these a little longer, lest they pursue the Hunt. I grimaced. I'd drawn on Winter enough already that anything more was going to starkly affect my judgement instead of just reinforce bad instincts. Until the markers are gone, I told myself. Then retreat. I drew deep, and this time when the Saint struck at me I drowned the world in ice. Massive spinning blades tore through the air and ground, though I felt them shatter within a heartbeat. The hound had teeth. No matter. The creature with Two Knives had retreated to protect the thing that wielded Light, but the spellcaster was vulnerable. I wove around balls of flame effortlessly, parted a burning wall with a flick of my sword and found the human behind it staring back defiantly. It had gathered sorcery before it, a hundred hanging needles that burned the very air around them.

"Dodge that," the human hissed, and they flew.

Laughing, I formed a gate that swallowed them into Arcadia and closed it just as swiftly. The human was casting again, and I could feel death coming. Light, from the side, and something more dangerous from the hound. I shaped glamour with but a thought, mine own silhouette striving for the spellcaster as I leapt up shrouded in nothingness. The illusion was broken by a beam of Light, but the hound had caught the scent: even as I landed atop a ring of shade, she cut a wound into the air and ran atop it towards me. I broke the ring and fell as the other humans finally saw through the glamour, slow things that they were. Abandoning the spellcaster, I made for the Light-bearer and its protector. The knife-wielding thing shouted out a word in some foreign tongue that tasted of spice and blood, charging me with blinding speed. Ah, the arrogance of mortals. Gracefully, I stepped around the blow and simply left my sword in her way. It carved through her shoulder, blood spraying as the arm fell to the ground. I took a modified sharper from the satchel and shoved it into the stump, triggering the mechanism inside with a shard of ice. The detonation broke bone and tossed her away even as the Light-wielder shot another brilliant beam at me. My free hand caught it, fingers beginning to melt away, and I forced it to careen aside.

It had slowed me. The gout of flame I avoided with a mere half-step even as my fingers grew back, but the Saint struck harder. Holding the wound she had carved in the sky like a massive blade, she scythed through the side of me. I was quick enough it went through my shoulder instead of my head. In a heartbeat, arm and leg and flank were pulped. Winter hissed in fury, and they began to coalesce anew in ice.

"Not regeneration," the Saint frowned. "Creationally fixed body. Just pour power until it remakes itself. You've turned yourself into proper abomination, girl. If there's still any of you left in there."

"Irritating," I noted, voice echoing with the death of embers.

"Beat it, kids," the hound ordered. "This one's going to take a lot of killing before she goes down."

Already the Light-wielder was fixing the creature I had mangled. The hound was an irritant, she must be dealt with before the rest was tended to. I seized threads of glamour and sent them into her mind, but they... broke. That was no soul. It was a sword, and somehow more.

"You hold dominion," I said.

"Only over the one thing," the Saint grinned. "But that's usually enough."

My eyes flicked to the sky. Another glamourised marker had vanished. Only one left now. And when it did, I would... I frowned. It was hard to remember. The hound took advantage of my distraction, striking anew. I let instinct guide me and steel rang against steel. She batted aside my guard but the spike of frost I shot at her throat forced her to turn her follow-through blow into a parry as I returned on the offensive. Cut high, swept away, but I turned with it and lunged at her back. She caught the tip between two fingers and twisted, the steel shattering. Frost filled the break as I withdrew, tasting her movements in the air. The footing gave her away. Or so I had thought: what should have been a strike at my arm was a slide forward instead, and when I tried a head-butt she met me with her own. We hit halfway through, neither hurt until she raked her fingers across my chest plate and cut through still boiling-hot steel. I let Winter loose, screaming cold winds blowing the both of us back. Some part of me insisted I look at the sky. The rest wanted to carve open that insolent hound and add her entrails to my cape. One was more pleasing than the other.

"Let us test it, then," I smiled. "The mettle of our domains."

Darkness fell, and came cold with it. The world fell away. Yet under an ink-black sky stood the Saint of Swords, radiant and unruffled. Unimpressed. I inhaled the scent of it, puzzled.

"Your dominion," I said. "It is not projected. Only within."

"Took me a decade of hard killing to get that down," the hound replied. "But there's always a fight to be found in Procer, if you know where to look."

My frown deepened and the cold focused on her, but all it did was cool the blade. It had been forged of great fires, I thought. What coldness I had to offer was insufficient.

"Gods, I'm going to feel this one in the joints," the Saint grunted.

She had no sword in hand, when she took her stance. I grit my teeth and poured all of my domain into her, but slowed was not stopped. She swung, and the light was blinding. Something... not broke, but it was wounded. Damaged. As I screamed the night fled, and I found myself kneeling over grounds rent asunder by our fight. Returned to Creation. The heroine was panting. Shit, I thought. What the fuck was that? I was feeling like myself again, but I was also feeling my heart beat. Like it actually mattered, like I was human again. The last marker was gone, I saw. And I sure as Hells wasn't sticking around to take another of whatever in that'd been. Seizing reins gone frail, I called back the Hunt. Fewer than anticipated answered my call, but I realized with ugly surprise it was not rebellion I was dealing with. The heroes must have killed some of them. At least ten were gone, maybe more.

I legged it. No two ways about it, I made like a proper villain and fled the field. The heroine tried to follow and almost caught me around the corner behind a tent, scything straight through with another of those not-blows, but Zombie answered my call and landed just behind. We took flight even as the old woman cursed and carved another wound into the air, immediately running on it after me. Yeah, fuck that. I wasn't picking a second fight with a Named who could shrug off my full domain. I opened the gate in the sky even higher, seeing the Hunt take flight behind me, and went straight through into Arcadia. I didn't even stop there, flying Zombie far from the entrance. The Saint, thank the Gods, did not follow. I learned why when another four of the Hunt disappeared from the back of my mind.

I could not help but be thankful she'd chosen to whittle away at my trump card instead of trying to go after me. It might have been possible to trap her in here, but that smelled of the Saint cutting her way back out at the worst possible moment down the line. The Hunt gathered to me, having lost a few feathers, but Headsman had been a success. Not without losses, but I wasn't entirely opposed to the Hunt being thinned out before they inevitably stabbed me in the back. Larat was the first to address me after I landed, drenched in blood from head to toe. Someone was in a good mood.

"A victory, my queen," he said.

I looked up at the Arcadian sky and smiled. Sure, it'd been that. But more importantly, it had been a very good distraction. After all, the very moment I'd opened the gate for the Watch someone had come through. And while we were busy being loud and visible?

Thief had been on the prowl.

"All right, saddle up," I called out. "We need to find the Watch contingent before retreating."

We needed to hurry. The sooner we got back to camp, the sooner I could ask Hierophant why my skin was capable of bruising again.

---

danh3107

Did.... Did the saint just cut through Winter?

>That's no soul, it's a sword.
Jesus H christ she really is Shirou

Allafterme

Cat gone too deep to Blue & Orange morality this time. I don't think she could break off the fight by herself, bloody Saint of Swords probably saved her life 😊

lavos

Indeed, the irony made me stop reading and laugh a bit before continuing.

Byzantine

Saved her life and probably her mind, too.

NerfContessa

Which are one and the same, at the moment.

And yeah, Saint is a scary scary lady.

ruduen

If that's actually a domain of swords or a sword? Quite possibly, yes.

maresther23

Saint is the Sword of the Heavens, she has Domain over herself.

sengachi

That's almost as scary as Ranger's aspects in a way.

NZPIEFACE

Wait a minute, I can see where this is going for Cat.

greatwyrmgold

I like how you think, but if Cat takes the time to learn that trick Callow will be the newest and most Waste-blasted Principalities.

stevenneiman

I think it's a Domain power that's only inside her mind. But in a world with reality as malleable as Creation, "only inside your mind" doesn't have to be much more of a limitation than "a lone hero facing impossible odds". The result seems to be something a bit like Neo from The Matrix, from what I know of the movie. She has ridiculous powers that let her hack reality to achieve incredible things, but usually uses them to back up physical combat skills.

grzecho2222

And she won domain measuring contest with Cat

Nguyen Hong Hai

I told ya the woman is really made of sword, she even got a sword demesne.

N/A

Ah. Cat has at last encountered Royalty, one who wields the terrible blade of Want. Behold that the sanctioned action is to Cut, and learn.

Unmaker

For some odd reason I can't seem to Like this, so: Like!
For those of you who don't recognize this: <https://killsixbilliondemons.com/> is hard to describe but quite amazing.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

In 4 actual UBW

Highwayman

Finally, we see the Wild Hunt ride! Hair-rising as always, EE.

And it makes me giddy inside that Cat is more human again!

Agent J

The Wild Hunt was beautiful to watch. The sheer revelry with which they slaughtered their way through the camps was practically a religious experience.

Cat being more human, however, is less than thrilling. She's been drawing too deep from Winter's well in general, but especially in this chapter. We've been promised consequences due to this sort of recklessness. For the enemy to simply snap their fingers and accidentally "fix" her would be anticlimactic.

*hoyboy*

I mean, sure. If you're fucked up.

Being a normal person, ew.

Yotz

Only the aberrant deem themselves normal.

Also, do not presume that religious experience is always one of joy – the word "awful" means "full of awe" for a reason.

---

> For the enemy to simply snap their fingers and accidentally “fix” her would be anticlimactic.

Looking back at the entirety of the endgame of the second book, I can’t decide whether that would require too much wanton stupidity and horrible moral judgement on the antagonists’ part, or it would be an awesome way to let the Fate make them trip over each other.

TeK

Think of it this way: there are consequences, just different from expected. She drew too much, and so didn’t abandon fight with Saint, instead taking her ultimate attack, which damaged Winter, but not her. I can even see why: she attacks by sharpening her intent to kill, imposing her will onto reality. It’s not far-fetched to assume she intended to attack Winter Queen, or something along these lines and in doing so, accidentally spared Catherine.

Unmaker

“For the enemy to simply snap their fingers and accidentally “fix” her would be anticlimactic.”

But there are so many possible sequelae that are bad for Cat that that might be what actually happened. The angels probably want less of Winter in the world and less power for a Villain, so a slice off of Winter is not unexpected. What happens to the Hunt’s already dubious loyalty when Cat is not all of Winter? Turning Winter on itself is also probably something the divine sees as a plus, and such a twist is a very Heroic and Story-like thing to do. Speaking of Roles, Cat could have avoided getting a Name indefinitely as long as she truly wielded Winter, but now I think a Name is closer, which brings the conflict back closer to a story. And we know how powerful tropes are in this world. So I don’t see it so much a ‘fix’ as a forcing of Cat back to more traditional Good/Evil fighting.

Joel

Jesus, that blade is something. No wonder everyone treats her with kid gloves.

Gian

Did she just initiate a pattern of three with the Saint?

Fern

It depends on there being enough weight for the story to consider them rivals.

HappyNap

Isn't cat already in a pattern with the White Knight tho? Something about neither Black nor the Mad Boy (whom i can't remember the Name for right now) not getting the Pattern of Three with White

shieldredblog

No, Black failed to initiate a pattern of three because Fate was trying to kill him and set it up so his Squire would take over.

She lost the Name Squire before Black died or she even met the White Knight.

d\_o\_l

Unclear, but probably not. It was a victory for the Saint in the context of their duel, but it was a victory for Cat in a wider strategic sense. I think the story needs to be a little more clear-cut to initiate a pattern of three.

Erfling

Probably not since cat never intended to fight to the death, only occupy her long enough before retreating.

Antoninjohn

To kill the Fey for real their story has to be destroyed like that Duke of Winter Cat killed so can Cat resurrect her hunt using her domain

Yotz

Probably, but why? They'll outgrow their usefulness eventually, and less of them left in the moment of their sudden but inevitable betrayal – the better.

nipi

I kind of expected fae to reset when their seasons turn came around again. Not sure how that would work with Cat. She use Calernias seasons?

DroughtBringer

Vote for the guide!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also what the literal storms? That was not what I was expecting and how much of Winter was lost? She obviously can still open gates so we know she has Winter still, but what all happened there?

And I feel like this battle was destined to be a loss, with Saint having forged her soul; Winter took Cat's, and, if Cat wants to get back on the same level as Saint I think our good friend the Beast will be coming back.

ruduen

I'm not sure if this is a loss or a tie, given the mutual loss of resources on both sides. Of course, given how experienced this particular hero is, I think that there's more to it than just setting up a rule of three.

Rather, I wonder if this leans more towards the Saint of Swords setting up a different type of story. If this becomes more of a story with Catherine dealing with an inner conflict between parts of herself (human, winter, etc.) or hits the stride of a redemption story with her losing the 'dark' parts of her name... Even if that's not what she wants, it leads to more points that the heroes can use and abuse during the fight.

Of course, with a redemption story, there's also the risk of a villain falling during the middle of it.

TheAtomicOption

Oh wow, I think winter was just somehow... severed from Cat in some way. Maybe Saint did her a favor?

taovkool

Probably by accident. Like cutting out the source of her Winter power. Same thing Akua did back when she stole the Squire aspect with that goblin I forgot the name of.

Quie Possibly A Cat

Cat's not entirely cut off from Winter. She opened a gate out remember?

Nor is it really a favor. I mean, its probably good for Cat to not being going full Fae, since that has about a 100% chance of blowing up in her face, but she also is almost certainly weaker on the power scale now too.

Raved Thrad

I wonder if any of the baby Heroes died. It'd be a shame if that many huntsmen bought it without taking at least a couple of the gooders with them.

Mr. Nobody

Larat certainly had his fun.

letouriste

larat probably killed one

taovkool

Ballon (French pronunciation: [balɔ̃]) is the appearance of being lightweight and light-footed while jumping. It is a desirable aesthetic in ballet and other dance genres, making it seem as though a dancer effortlessly becomes airborne, floats in the air, and lands softly. The name is widely thought to be derived from the French word ballon (meaning "balloon"), though it has been dubiously claimed that the name was inspired by French ballet danseur Claude Balon, who was known for performing exceptionally light leaps.

Another dancing references. This time about mesmerizing light steps and leaps.

taovkool

Unless it meant a balloon or something, in which case, I am overthinking this a little too much.

burdi

the super light beam seems like the hound's strongest attack, she was panting after the the attack. so, her strongest attack incapable to kill cat and only wounded the winter. well, maybe cat will got a new Name when winter grip on her a little lose

Anon

Hmmm...well, I'd say Cat needs to get rid of the Winter-mind-affectation RIGHT NOW, but it appears the Saint may have already done that – either permanently, or just temporarily, with the giant beam of light implying damaged, not completely severed.

Which...has the potential for good and bad – good in that Cat may be human again, and as such, may now be able to (re)-transition back into a proper name...but bad in that Winter was power she desperately needed to throw above her weight class with.

Not to mention her being able to draw upon Winter's power being kind of key to her being the duchess of moonless nights and Queen of the non-unionized Fae... and a powerless queen draws no loyalty from the hunt.

Though technically, come to think of it, since swords are made from iron, the Saint's 'dominion' may be a natural counter to any fae powers.

I also feel Thief puttering around in the camp is going to end up badly, but we'll have to wait and see on that front, as Vivienne has survived before...and that could either lend her story strength to continued survival, or place her ripe for a 'betrayal' back to the side of Good.

Also, if Cat couldn't even kill any of the baby heroes with just a priest puttering around...that doesn't necessarily bode well for the Woe's odds – obviously there's an extenuating factor in the Saint, but...I dunno.

In any case, Cat's gonna need to find some way of creating a story about an inability to be cut/severed if she wants to not insta-die to the Saint, now.

grzecho2222

Cat already been "healed" of being "not exactly human" once and Creation dislikes repeating itself.

Also blade won't cut Cat if she cat(ches) it be clapping her hands on it or with her teeth (and I think she did something like that back in Book II(?) and it's very old trick

Naeddyr

I don't get where people in the comments have got "Creation dislikes repeating itself". That is antithetical to the whole setting, where everything is just repetition and iteration of Names and Roles.

grzecho2222

Creation dislikes repeating itself within boundries of one story would more correct, also

Akua in Epilogue of Book II:

"Creation did not embrace such tedious repetitions."

Same reason Tyrant always makes new plans and act so random, Stories repeat, but each part of one Story is diffrent from other

Erfling

Creation doesn't repeat itself within the same story

burdi

i agree with you

Cat's soul getting erode, slowly she will became a creature that wear her face but not really catherine foundling, the sign already there (she forgot her own plan to go away after 5 mark gone, in the middle of fighting, unbelievable. and in the chapter 10 "I had been tired, and there'd been a few days a while back where I'd had vicious headaches") after cat ripped off masego work, winter flow like great flood and cat or masego can't do nothing, it broke her body and made new one, her soul in winter absolute grip and its slowly erode her soul.

but now, the hound had wound the winter, she got her change finally (for worse or better)

Darkening

Even the weakest named can take a beating before dying, look at what Cat did when she was a newborn squire, picking herself up off the floor with her torso cleaved open. She blew one of the heroes arms off, and would have easily killed all 3 if the saint hadn't kept interfering. With the priest around, possibly a hero priest and not just a regular one, you'd need to instantly kill someone via decapitation or exploding their heart or something, and given how cheaty the heavens can be, I wouldn't be surprised if resurrections got handed out before this is all over.

nipi

If Im not mistaken Fae are vulnerable to iron not steel and most swords would be made of steel.

burdi

i wonder, what will thief doing in the camp

1. kidnap malanza (that will surely make the army impotent)
2. poisoning food and water (seems like a recipe to get captured somehow)
3. steal something that cannot be stealed (seems like very possible)
4. to get information from the inside (she maybe success, so cat can stay a head)

haihappen

"Steal" their commander? Sounds like something the Thief would be good at.

What else of (strategic) interest is there? Maps, Horses, Supplies? Influential nobles that can be used as bargain chips?

Darkening

Wonder if Thief can put people in her 'bag' and what happens to them if she does.

NZPIEFACE

Literally everything. She stole a whole fleet once.

The Sun, too.

Yotz

5. To put in the camp something of her own. Or her certain close friend's own. Something like a dormant targeting beacon for Observatory, passive listening device, or onsite scrying tap.

Yotz

Or, if you prefer – to Steal their Privacy, Freedom, and ability to Speak Freely.

TeK

Or she can Steal their hearts, and the entire army will march home.

Decius

Dress like one of their junior officers and accept a field promotion.

grzecho2222

Pilgrim: Ladies and Gentleman I suspect there is a Callowan spy among us
One guy standing next to only pale skinned person in room:
Nonsense!

---

Grey Pilgrim: "Tell me... did anyone happen to kill a Thief on the way here? No? Then we still have a problem."

...I know the spot is more or less occupied by the Assassin, but now I want to see Thief transition into a Spy Name. Would even fit her current Role.

taliesinskye

Since we didn't see Masago's trick yet I'm guessing that Thief is marking targets for the Orbital Hierophant Cannon.

grzecho2222

This whole war seems weird like the pseudo-crusade of 1109 with two armies invading, hit-and-run tactics, defenders avoiding battle, invaders trying to take over city and failing but not being destroyed and monarch of defenders trying to win by tiring enemy and diplomatic pressure

wyaldriddler

Ohhhhhhhhhhhh. Well...

So, Procer might have just got a bit of a boost. What the hork am I talking about you ask? Well remember how the Alamans Prince was a dumb commander? The Alamans officers just got *Wrecked* because they were all grouped up when Cat came rampaging through and that leaves it ripe for a competent replacement to appear from the woodwork, mortal or Named.

Oops?

Also the Saint is TERRIFYING. Thinking about it, the Pilgrim should also have something similar, and in theory Cat should be able to learn how to do it like they do given that the Saint has mentioned a hint of a hint of similarity to Ranger in Cat's behavior.

letouriste

i dont think cat allowed the hunt to kill the people malicia want alive.she also want the less competents people in charge so i guess amadis is still alive along with some of his most stupid allies (like that alaman noble)

taliesinskye

She didn't kill the incompetent commander of the whole army, she just killed all the lower ranking officers. (Who might have been actually competent.)

Antony444

Well this can't be considered anything else than a defeat for the forces of Good. They have lost a lot of their irreplaceable officers for about fifteen Fey of the Wild Hunt. They didn't take down the enemy leader, they didn't kill Larat. They have the confirmation their accord with Daoine was worth absolutely nothing. Hundreds of common soldiers have died. Their camp is in chaos.

The only good things the Procerans should be able to see is that:
A) they didn't lose a hero in this fight (so far as we know)
B) the Saint of Swords has proven she can beat the Black Queen decisively

But even these affirmations unknowingly are lies. The Heroes were after all not the targets. The intervention of the Saint of Swords may have restored completely Catherine's sanity and crippled the insane winter-influence transforming her into a creature of pure evil.

And above all, Thief is in the camp and the heroes were certainly drawn out of position from whatever object/artefact/person she wanted to steal.

It makes me wonder where the Wandering Bard is, because it's absolutely not with the Army of Prince Amadis. There were too many opportunities in that fight for Catherine to die or to become something utterly inhuman. It's not usual for the great manipulator of stories to miss this opportunity...

The Battle of the Camps is already over it seems...and the ugly consequences of it are about to start.

burdi

she was banned by Hierarch, charge with treason. so wandering bard in nowhere

hoyboy

Great spin work, Mr. al-Sahhaf!

grzecho2222

Cat should decide what she is, because this is the n-th time she is going through some kind of transformation:
normal mortal – normal villain – redemption hero (aborted) – mastermind villain – villain with good publicity – undead normal – undead villain – redemption hero/mass murderer (aborted) – practical villain – pseudohero (fight with Rider) – roleplayer – fairytale tragic villain/pseudo noble fairy – Black Knight/Dead King combo – four Cats – monster – Evil fairy queen – Practical Evil monarch with iron fist – leader of Wild Hunt – Tragic Villain

grzecho2222

This is not Protagonist Journey from Someone to different Someone, this is Lost in the Woods and We Already Walked Past
That Tree level of inability to stay one thing

Yotz

This is a Changeling.

grzecho2222

Bard changes bodies, Cat changes her body

letouriste

“person she wanted to steal”

oh right, she can steal people now she think as a villain...

probably.
would be really funny to see:) (and badass)

Walter

I think WB is with White Knight nowadays.

Antoninjohn

We are shown that sealed documents can be verified at the start with the Watch so I think the Thief is going to steal the documents of Princes dividing Callow among themselves then Cat is going to use that as evidence along with her own sworn Oath of truthfulness that Hellgate was built on Procer silver as an excuse to take Callow to force the other countries in the crusade to back off

Draconius Sinister

Cool chapter. Don't know why some are so amazed by the Wild Hunt's ride when we saw so little of that, with such little description, but what we see of it is pretty cool. I'm more down with the Saint of Swords fight, (though still unsure of her characterization) as that was a flipping fun fight scene, and we got maybe our best look at the pros and cons of Winter, and more importantly, how it affects Cat's mind.

sengachi

Saint of Swords cutting reality to be able to fight in the air is the kind of utterly ridiculous overkill only legends get away with. I love it.

---

Well, Catherine herself can create panes of shadow mid-air and gates to no-sell the enemy attacks; what separates them is skill, not raw power.

Metrux

I don't think so, Cat can do that because this is common for Fae, and her power is manipulation of an element, while the Saint just straight up cuts reality to do something she shouldn't be able to. It's the difference between having a ranged attack and attacking so strongly that your shockwaves are a true attack.

warriormonk19

Not so. Cat could manipulate shadows ever since she was a Squire, and Black can fight by using shadows to wield multiple weapons.

Nguyen Hong Hai

EXCALIBUR! Beam sword ftw!

Author Unknown

I really hope we get to see Procera's reaction to this from their PoV, or maybe from Thief's PoV as she watches them from the shadows. If for no other reason than to see how many princes need to change their underwear.

@ All of the people complaining about Cat being 'cured' of Winter: She wouldn't have been able to open the gate to escape if she wasn't still in Winter's grasp.

Yotz

Amen to that on both cases.

grzecho2222

Funny thing is that we don't know what in Winter got Sworded. It could be the leashes and now Cat will merge with Winter or even funnier it could be the part that was supposed to Winterize Cat and now Cat is instead Foundling Winter Granny Weatherwax style

Blue

Her body is no longer a construct. That's what got damaged. She's possibly human again, which means Winter is probably not going to be able to heal those chopped off limbs anymore. Plus side is she likely won't be as lost to Winter's influence on her mind.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Her regeneration got swords.

tpdbooks

I really enjoyed the subtle shift in writing-style as Cat became more fae throughout the chapter. You could really see her transformation by the steady increase in melodrama and typical villain remarks that she was putting out, not at all like the normal her Great job!

Neuromute

Pretty good showing Saint, but still only a middling practitioner of the art of cutting, a far cry from Mathangi Ten Meti Murder the Gods and Topple Their Thrones.

Not\_a\_robot

And yet even the Sword if Maybe pales in comparison to Meti herself, powerful though she is. The mere fact that the Saint still needs a sword to Cut shows her lack of mastery of the Art of Cutting.

oldschoolvillain

Actually, she specifically didn't have a sword in hand for her ultimate.

sengachi

I wonder if Triumphant might ever kill enough demons to qualify for the name Kill Six Billion Demons.

sengachi

I wonder if Triumphant

SMHF

Great chapter! It's nice to see The Saint living up to her name! The thing is though, you don't get this powerful by doing push ups... unless you're Saitama I guess! And while Good side is generally OP, The Saint must have paid a price for this kind of power.

So like Cat's aversion to wards, she probably has a weakness of her own.

Raved Thrad

It just occurred to me that this chapter is the very epitome of the 15th living up to their motto. With phase 1 being the slaughter of the enemy and phase 2 being Thief doing what she does best, Catherine's side just literally applied "kill them and take their stuff" as a principle of warfare.

Nairne .01

I bet Robber would agree with you.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

I keep wondering not only about Robber's possible promotion to the winter court but of Cat's erstwhile girlfriend.

grzecho2222

Robber still needs his musical battle with Bard, given that he is an artist that creates new songs and comedies all the time, while Bard plays truly once? And most of time she only recreates old ideas

Евгений Пермяков

So... Queen of Air and Darkness ? Huh.

letouriste

"she cut a wound into the air and ran atop it towards me.
Holding the wound she had carved in the sky like a massive blade, she scythed through the side of me" omg:o

btw, looks like she will be free of Winter influence for the rest of this war. this is good for strategy but bad if the heroes go straight for her. for her mind though, this is a nice respite:) and she could even get a Name in this state

Jessica Day

So the crusaders are being forced to split forces and stretch supply lines and they maintain orders via scrying... And they now know scrying might pull down the wild hunt.

A terrifying position to be in vs an army that teleports.

taliesinskye

I think you have to scry the Hunt in order to invite them in, which is why Cat arranged for the Watch to be there.

grzecho2222

I have a bad feeling Vivienne will get caught and will have unfortune meeting Prince Arnaud what will be the catalist that will make this The Uncivil War. It is almost certain that one of the non-Heroic leaders will heck something up so badly that it will cost them their weight in Story and so far he the best (or maybe the worst) candidate for that with Amadis being "just" overly power hungry, Rozalia being too militaristic, Adeline being too normal and I don't remember other 3 even appearing Honestly, while everyone is talking about how they don't want Cat to get off free from the grasp of winter... I more so don't want to see her get nerfed again. We've already been at the point where she was far less capable than just about anyone else she was around. I might even point out that this is book 4, out of 5. Yes, power in this setting tends to come at a price, but she already paid that price. Just seeing her flounder again would be pretty off putting in my opinion.

Forrest

Also, I don't know how ms blade saint was completely unaware that Cat was being a diversion from the wild hunt wrecking the army structure. She could have advised the other heroes to go stop the rest of the wild hunt while she was dealing with Cat. Though it is nice that it worked, despite apparently being more of a diversion for Thief to come in.

grzecho2222

When you are diversion for a diversion for someone that is probably also a diversion

Thea

If she could have killed Cat, there wouldn't have been a need to stop the Hunt. Now, consider what we've seen of the Saint's personality so far...

the verbiage ecstatic

Yep. The Saint is definitely canny, but I think she prefers the straightforward approach to problem solving. Why bother being strategic when you are really, really good at killing things?

If the Pilgrim had been on the scene, this probably would have gone differently for Cat, and not in a good way.

Walter

My guess as far as what Thief was here to steal is 'all their supplies'. We know Cat wanted to cut off their resupply, if Thief yunks their existing provisions they would be hosed.

Andrew

>Zombie was chomping at the bit, which admittedly was better than chomping at grass

The expression is "champing at the bit," which kind of ruins the second half of the sentence.

Amazing story, just caught up, too many thoughts to leave in this review though, I'll probably take them to Reddit.

TeK

Most likely a typo.

grzecho2222

Cat loves her magical murderponies

MetruX

I actually think he was LITERALLY chomping at the bit, since this is no common horse. If that is so, think of it :B

Agent J

The difference is negligible and, outside this idiom, “champing” as it’s used here is pretty much obsolete in modern English. Many professional writers, be they novelists or reporters, can be caught using chomping instead. To the layman, ‘chomping at the bit’ brings forth a similar image in much greater clarity.

And I say that to say this; language is fluid not static. What matters most is effectively conveying the idea. Like with the whole ‘literally=figuratively’ debate, I believe chomping on the bit is an acceptable substitute.

Azqa

I am extremely curious to see what artefacts Cat & Co. have made from the heroes they’ve killed, given her slip to the Saint.

Unmaker

I don’t see anyone else mentioning this: The SoS said that it took her time to contain her domain to her body only. That implies it is a higher power than just letting your domain spill out. Since Cat can’t help but let Winter loose sometimes, that makes Sword win the clash of Winter versus Sword because the SoS has better control of her domain. Which is something that Cat should have picked up on immediately, but Cat’s brain was a little too Winterized to figure that out.

werafdsaew

An alternative interpretation is that it took time for the Sword Saint to acquire her domain at all.

aran

Saint’s ability kind of reminds me of Mathangi Ten Meti “Murder The Gods And Topple Their Thrones”, noodle vendor and student of the principal art of Cutting (<https://killsixbilliondemons.com/comic/wielder-of-names-5-99/>).

Raved Thrad

Interestingly enough, “kensei,” Japanese for “sword saint,” was one of the names (or is it Name?) people called Miyamoto Musashi, the author of The Book of Five Rings. In his chapter The Book of Water, he writes:

“...once you take a sword in your hands, you must be prepared to cut apart the enemy, whatever the means. Whenever you parry, hit, catch, strike or block the enemy’s attacking sword, you must know the opportunities to cut the enemy in the same movement. It is essential to attain this. If you think only of catching, blocking, striking or tying up the enemy, you will not be able to actually kill him. More than anything, you must be thinking of carrying your every movement through to the kill."

Or, as one translation I remember goes (paraphrase): "Always remember that your ultimate goal is to get the enemy to die."

That sounds like a pretty good description of what Saint of Swords is doing with her Satsui-no-Hadou, or "Surge of Murderous Intent."

Engineer

So, if your willpower is strong enough you can actually alter Creation? Was this why Triumphant was so powerful? She purely thought about destroying anything and everything in her path with no doubts at all and this insane believe coupled with being a Named allowed her to beat the shit out of a continent and caused the immortal elves to run away?

If so then then Cat has the potential to become the most powerful entity in Creation. All she needs to do is strengthen her willpower (maybe read Napoleon Hill), reawaken her Name and fuse it with Winter so that it becomes truly a part of her (no detrimental personality effects sans the psychotically insane belief that she will destroy any every and all dumbasses who stand in her way be they Gods, Devils or all the Armies in Creation)

If Named like Ranger, the Saint and Elves can achieve this effect, Named who don't have access to Fae abilities, it stands to reason that Cat can achieve this too. Boosted with her Fae power and she should be able to outclass both of them.

wyaldriddler

The scary part here is that Elves can do this themselves to a lesser degree than Ranger and Lady Swords, but we've encountered none of them which are named.

tbarim

Hmmm, so we've got a woman who's effectively an all cutting sword. Should Cat be looking for a sheath, or the handle?

oldschoolvillain

The pilgrim seems to be the handle so far, and Cat just had a run at being the sheathe. Didn't go so well for her.

grzecho2222

Puntastic question

editor

Typo "I pivoted, caught the hand still holding the blade with my other pne" should be "my other one"

Max Scherer

So got she weakened again? Man i hope she gets a new name. I like this about the story and that she is only Winter is somehow really boring....

---

Chapter 12: Cambré

"In a finite world, one's gain (victory, large cave) inevitably means loss (dead female, enemy grows) for another. There can be no peace (looking away, knife already in a corpse) when the very nature of Creation is contest (not enough meat, talking)."

– Extract from a theorized translation of 'Remnant and Ruin', one of the few goblin texts ever obtained

"This should not be possible," Masego said, sounding obscurely pleased.

He was in a good mood, though I did not share it. The frequency at which I ended up lying on table while he fiddled with my guts and soul was quite frankly depressing. At least this time I had pants on, only my upper body bare.

"We keep this up for another year," I said, "and you'll have seen me naked more often than Kilian ever did."

The dark-skinned mage sighed, glass eyes rolling inside the sockets. Ugh. Full turn, that would never be not creepy even glimpsed only through an eye cloth.

"Your insistence I 'buy you dinner first' is absurd," Hierophant said. "The only food available here is Legion rations, which you already own. I think. My attention might have waned when we had that afternoon where you explained to us how kingdoms worked."

Ah, that'd been a Hells of an affair. The afternoon session of 'We Are In Charge Now And Why That Matters' had not been a favourite of the Woe, since the two people who actually needed the explanations had been less than interested in actually hearing them.

"Sometimes, Zeze, I feel like you only want me for my body," I drawled.

"Ridiculous," he sniffed. "Your soul is far more interesting. Your physiology is worth two treatises at most, it is unlikely to be a reproducible phenomenon."

"Get me candles and wine, at least," I suggested. "It just doesn't feel special otherwise."

"I thought you didn't drink wine any —" Masego frowned. "Wait, is this another sex thing I don't know about?"

For someone raised by a personification of desire, he could be surprisingly innocent. No, maybe not innocent. That implied he'd been sheltered, which I really doubted was the case. Ignorance born of disinterest. His blind spots were usually willing and damnably stubborn.

"Masego, I'm offended you would even imply that. Get your mind out of the gutter," I chided him, smothering a grin.

He looked mighty suspicious, but did not argue. He'd learned the hard way not to engage on this particular battlefield. I cleared my throat.

"So what's the damage?" I asked.

His brow creased.

"You're changing the subject," he muttered. "You always do that when you were lying just before."

"Calling me a liar is technically treason, you know," I pointed out.

"And that's bad, in Callow," he nodded slowly. "Even if you win."

Yeah, Warlock and the incubus had not done wonders for his moral compass. It was a work in progress.

"So?" I pressed.

"The Saint of Swords appears to have, for lack of a better term, cut Winter itself," Hierophant said.

"That much I'd guessed," I said. "I mean, practically speaking, what does that mean? Because I was having a Winter fit before she beat me like a goblin stepchild, but after I was back to normal. More or less."

"Temporary state of affairs," Masego said. "If you were hoping to maintain your hold on the mantle without being subject to principle alienation, you were sadly mistaken."

I coughed. I supposed it was too much to ask for that the Saint fuck up along the same lines as Akua had when she'd returned my full Name to me.

"I bruised, after the fight," I told Hierophant. "It faded before I got back to camp, but it actually hurt for a while. That hasn't happened since Liesse."

"I've already told you she cut Winter," Masego said, sounding befuddled. "The implications should be clear."

"Oh, absolutely," I lied. "But I need you to put it in layman's terms so that I can explain it to other people. Like, say, if I needed to tell Archer about this."

"She's actually quite well-versed in arcane dialectics," Masego noted. "Lady Ranger covered the workings of sorcery very well while teaching her to slay mages."

I wrinkled my nose.

"Lucky her," I said. "Black never went in depth."

"Uncle Amadeus never did have what could be considered a proper method in this," Hierophant shrugged. "As Father tells it, his approach has always been having a wide array of tools to employ against enemy weaknesses."

Which only helped me so much, I thought. Unlike my teacher I did not have several decades of scrapping against all sorts of spellcasters under my belt. To avoid running into nasty surprises, I'd largely delegated that kind of fighting to Masego himself.

"Juniper, then," I said.

The blind man bit his lip.

"I dislike using a metaphor, but so be it," he said. "Think of your mantle as a cape. Much like your body itself, it is a fixed object in the eyes of Creation."

"Which is why I can rebuild it from scratch when I lose parts," I noted. "Which does happen more often than I'd liked."

The mage's head bobbed in agreement.

"The main difference being that your body is a shape, while your mantle is a pattern of power," he said. "That power is, of course, finite. Not in the sense that using it spends it, but along the lines that the cape remains a cape – it does not grow or lessen, as a living thing would."

"So she cut the cape," I guessed.

"Essentially," he admitted. "You might say she cut out a corner of the cape. The pattern itself being fixed, the rest of the power thinned itself as a whole to recreate that corner."

My fingers clenched.

"Are you saying I have less to call on, now?" I said.

"Well, yes," Masego frowned. "Which I believed impossible, as power does not simply disappear, but evidently in this case it has. It is not unprecedented for heroes to violate Creational laws that apply to everyone else, but this is rather blatant even by their standards."

"She was a pretty straightforward old bat," I grunted. "So why did I bruise?"

"In the absence of Winter's full influence, Creation assumed you to be human again," Masego said. "With all the consequences that apply."

I rubbed my forehead, feeling a headache. That made it sound like my actual body was basically a trick played on Creation, which was exactly the kind of thing I'd been terrified of hearing for the last year. Fuck. I really wanted a stiff drink right now.

"So if she cuts me again in that manner," I said. "There'll be a window of opportunity where I'm mortal again?"

"You are still mortal," Masego said. "In the sense that you can be killed, at least. I give decapitation a better than half chance of working, though for obvious reasons we cannot test this. You would, however, lose the ability to reform for a span of time. An increase in fragility, though passing."

He didn't sound too happy about being unable to experiment with the removal of my head from my body, but I'd learned to ignore it when he was being an ass by accident. I rose to a sitting position as Hierophant got up and began methodically putting away the silvery instruments he'd used to have a look inside me. I didn't feel a great need to reach for my shirt, folded on a lower table to the side. Being half-naked in front of Masego was like baring my ass to a potted plant – there was no real interest on the other side.

"We're getting close to the pivot for the campaign up here," I told him, rolling my shoulders to limber them. "That means a pitched battle, and likely revealing our shared trick."

Hierophant smiled.

"Good," he said. "I've been itching to prove the theory."

I grimaced. That proof was likely to kill a lot of people, but then there was only so far I was willing to go to preserve the lives of an invading army. Getting my own soldiers killed when I could avoid it wasn't on the table.

"Before that, I'm going to need you to mess with their scrying," I said. "We want them cut off from the Principate when they feel the pressure mounting."

The dark-skinned man shrugged.

"It is possible to accomplish," he said. "Their formulas are... rough-hewn. Easy enough to muddle. Yet doing so will require most my attention."

"That's fine," I said. "We've got a few more days left until it comes to a fight, by Juniper's reckoning."

"I could simply use the connection to kill their practitioners," Masego suggested. "It would require less sustained effort on my part."

I breathed out slowly.

"Do it," I said. "But spare at least five of them. I need them able to scry the Principate after the fight."

"This ought to be amusing," Hierophant chortled. "They've yet to properly master defensive wards against the law of sympathy."

"Try not to be too brutal," I sighed.

"An interesting limitation," he decided. "I will take it into consideration."

Well, at least he wasn't going to draw it out for kicks. Wasn't in his nature. That was really all I could ask for. I slid off the table and picked up my shirt, slipping it on as he finished his clean-up.

"I would wish you a good night," Masego said. "But you don't really sleep anymore, do you?"

"Might get some reading done," I said. "Reitz is a pain to learn."

"I am pleased you are expanding your horizons," he said, patting my shoulder awkwardly.

I couldn't help but smile. He really was trying, wasn't he? I pushed back one of his tresses fondly and bade him goodnight. My tent felt emptier for his absence, and the books I had piled up in a corner were a less than attractive prospect no matter what I'd told Masego. There were only so many histories you could read until they all kind of blended together. With a battle on the horizon, Juniper would either be sleeping or planning – either way, not to be disturbed. Vivienne was still presumably making her way back from her little jaunt in the crusader camps and Indrani was both away and probably busy bullying Robber. Larat was, well, Larat. I dropped into the seat I'd once 'liberated' from a fae stronghold, savouring the decadent cushioning. It was a strange thing, feeling lonely in a war camp still thriving with activity even at this hour. I missed Hakram like one of my own limbs, the ache having only grown over time. It should perhaps worry me, I thought, how much I'd come to rely on him as a touchstone for my sanity. In the corner, draped over another seat, the Mantle of Woe waited silently.

"I grant you leash," I murmured. "I grant you eyes and ears, tongue and feet, at my sufferance."

Akua Sahelian strode out of her prison with unearthly grace, clad in red and gold. I kind of resented that even with a gaping hole in her chest she remained stunningly beautiful.

"It has been some time," the Diabolist mused. "Longer than usual."

"I'm not speaking with Hasenbach before things are settled on the field," I said.

"Is that my only value to you, dearest?" she teased. "Another pair of eyes on your foe?"

"I'm not sure what you're trying to accomplish with the pet names," I noted. "It takes a little more than sweet talk and curves to get me going, Akua."

She laughed, clear as bell. I really had to commend whoever had taught her that, it made her sound almost pleasant.

"You believe I am attempting to use the fact that you are twice bloomed?" she asked, looking genuinely curious.

Genuine meant nothing, with that one. She could make it sound like she actually believed the sky was yellow if she tried.

"Bisexual, Akua," I said. "The word is bisexual. Seriously, what is it with Soninke and making everything sound like bad poetry?"

"Your own people have the unfortunate tendency of using simple terms for complicated matters," she chided.

Fluidly, she sat in the seat across from mine. She didn't actually need to, of course. She was little more than a soul, and the physical seat made no difference to her position. But villainy of the old breed did have a way of prizing style no matter the situation, I'd give them that.

"Darling, to have interest in mere gender is hopelessly rustic," she sighed. "Power is the only valuable measure. The superior looks of my people are simply a reflection of our ability to have them. The true worth of them is implicit."

"You'll excuse me if I don't take advice in that from the get of High Lords," I replied, rolling my eyes. "As I understand it, your take on break ups usually involves poison."

"For lesser lords, perhaps," Akua spoke with open disdain. "It is gauche to use anything but a dagger if there was real affection. Poison is a political tool, Catherine. When employed within one's direct circle, it represents a lack of faith in one's abilities."

"More ritualized murder from the Soninke crowd," I drawled. "There's a shocker."

"You must learn to discern between enmity and dialogue, if you are ever to rule the Empire," Akua said. "Your lowborn origins are not so much of a hindrance as you might think, but your Callowan roots mean you must never be anything but exquisite at the Great Game if you are to be seen as more than a violent foreign thug."

"I really don't," I snorted. "Want to rule the Empire, for one, but also need to learn what you're talking about. Any culture that requires regular intervention by mass-murdering demigods to function doesn't deserve to keep existing."

"Then you declare war on the High Lords, my heart," Akua said. "As your teacher once desired. There is nothing but horror awaiting you on that path."

"There we go again," I noted. "I'm not your anything, Sahelian. Except killer, I guess, I'll own to that one. It did make my year."

"What other heart can I claim, dearest?" the Diabolist smiled, lightly tapping the edge of her wound. "You have bound me and taken me into your service."

"You're a tool, Akua," I bit out. "In all meanings of the word."

"And you think this is ungainly in my eyes?" the Soninke laughed. "That is only your due as victor."

It was an accomplishment, I decided, that even as a powerless shade she could still unsettle me. Best not to linger on the subject.

"Talk to me," I said, "about goblins. You were aiming to be God-Queen Bitch of Calernia, you must have taken them into consideration when planning."

The dark-skinned beauty studied me with a too-wide smile.

"They have approached you," she said. "The Council of Matrons."

"That's overstating it a bit," I said. "But inquiries were made, a few months ago."

She folded her hands in her lap.

"And now you speak to me," she mused. "Understandable. Among your most trusted, the two goblins are ignorant of the inner workings of the Tribes. Those that would know most are your two Taghreb, the bastard and the Bishara, yet their understanding will be... limited."

"Yours will be too," I said. "But you always had a way with digging out secrets, so you're worth hearing out."

"If you are to understand goblins, dearest, you must first grasp that their core nature is that of scavengers," Akua said. "Never have they risen in rebellion when the Empire was strong, and even in weakness they are patient."

"They don't fight armies if they avoid it, I already knew that," I frowned. "Which, considering their size and fragility as a species, is kind of a given."

"It runs deeper than this," Diabolist said. "Goblins will eat anything because they can never assume they will be able to forcefully claim what they need. To be one of their lot is to know from birth that most other life on Creation is larger and stronger. That death is always around the corner. Morality is, to a goblin, at best a distant concern. Bare survival always comes first, and in its pursuit they will commit acts that would given even a High Lord pause."

"Considering the neighbourhood, I can hardly blame them," I said.

"You do not grasp my point," Akua said. "The mindset is not a consequence of Praesi aggression. It does not ebb and flow with threats. It is the starting point of every single goblin ever born."

"Yes," I said patiently. "And Praesi think demons are a valid solution to, well, anything ever. My point is that they're not being unreasonable in thinking that way."

Akua smiled.

"You believe they've never dabbled in diabolism?" she said. "My dear, the Sahelians have known for decades that one of the primary ingredients in munitions is powdered devil. Our alchemists never managed to reproduce the process involved, but it is a certainty. Now, consider that goblinfire burns all things born of Creation. What do you think that recipe involves?"

My heart clenched.

"You can't be serious," I said. "They're using demons? How would that even work?"

"My people have studied both alchemy and diabolism for over a millennium," Akua said. "And we have absolutely no idea. Munitions are only created in the deepest tunnels, and those that take part in the process never see the light of day. There is a reason goblin mages are so rarely seen among the Legions: as a rule, they are sent below and never return."

Well, shit. Had I been throwing around burning demon juice at my enemies this whole time? Fucking Hells, that was going to take a while to process. I leant back into my chair.

"All right," I said. "So the Matrons are not to be trusted."

"This does not mean that they cannot be used," Akua said. "They never plot uprising unless they believe the Empire is on the verge of collapse, and that their own people might be drawn into the matter. This implies Malicia's hold over the Tower is not so solid as one might believe. The Matrons would not risk fighting an Empire united behind its Tyrant."

"Ashur sent a war fleet to seize the Tideless Isles," I told the shade. "What few reports I've managed to get on that say they're hitting anything near the coast that doesn't have walls."

"No a threat to be underestimated," Akua agreed. "Yet as long as the cities hold, the might of the Empire is not overly affected. Mere foreign incursion would not be enough to move them. Has your teacher returned to Praes since our... lively debate?"

"You mean that time where you murdered a hundred thousand of my countrymen," I said very mildly. "At which point I ripped out your fucking heart and Black wrecked your doomsday weapon."

"Yes," Diabolist lightly said. "That. Quite the eventful day. Whatever did happen to the wights, anyhow?"

I did not reply. I simply applied my will, and her hand rose up to plunge into the wound. I had her tear at her own insides, patiently listening to her wretched screaming as she clawed at herself. After a while, I withdrew my will.

"I tend to disapprove of torture," I said. "But we're all cutting corners these days, aren't we?"

She stayed silent, panting.

"Your victims were released and buried," I said. "Even if I'd somehow been able to stomach keeping them, half of Callow would have risen in rebellion at the news. Now, prove yourself useful. Black has not returned to Praes since I carved out your soul and made it clothing. What do you get from that?"

"There has been break between him and the Empress," she got out. "She would have him killed if he returned, or at least that he believes this."

"Unless they're running a game," I pointed out. "Getting the opposition out in the open to cut them down in one stroke."

"If that were so," Diabolist said, "the Matrons would not have approached you. They must have reason to believe the split is not feigned."

Mhm. That made sense. And it meant that, down line, I might be able to find an ally of convenience within Praes.

"Back in the box, Akua," I said. "And if you ever again speak so casually of what you've done, I'll sit down with Masego to figure out if shades can lose limbs."

I withdrew all I had granted her, and she vanished into thin air. I closed my eyes, tired in a way sleep could not remedy.

This battle wasn't even done, and already I had to prepare for those that would follow.

---

*DroughtBringer*

Go vote, people

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Stormblessed

Somehow this book provides more insight into Akua in so many ways that the other books did not. It almost (I do stress the almost part) feels like we really never understood Akua and the Old Praesi way of thinking.

RoflCat

We've always seen her from Catherine's POV, which is almost always when they're facing off.

So when Akua is being this...obedient?...Well, it's kinda like gapmoe. You know, the grumpy delinquent turn out to have a soft spot for small animals sort of moment?

This time the whole bitch queen who wanted to rule the continent is ok being a slave to her victor is....quite a gap.

...Well, unless it turns out Akua was planning something inside the cape and has been playing along, biding her time...

As a person who enjoy shoujo ai/yuri a bit too much I personally hope her subservience is genuine though, might even be interesting if she ends up being a semi-official member of the Woe at some point.

---

Please, no. She's a bad enough person on her own, and her next incarnation is still a toddler. I just hope that if she ever recruits a hero with a proficiency for soul-searching, she'll saddle them with the task of finding the kid and teaching her to overcome the phylacteria's influence.

Mr. Nobody

There will be no next incarnation as long as her soul is bound to the Mantle of Woe.

dalek955

Don't be so sure. Before Cat killed her, she did the same soul-separation ritual she used herself on some random toddler, then rewrote the separated soul into a copy of her own. That's the 'next incarnation' — was talking about.

RoflCat

Said soul is currently in Thief's pocket, so unless the baby can somehow live without a soul, there's no next incarnation.

dalek955

Same ritual Akua used on herself, remember? She's established it is somehow possible to live and even bear a Name with an external soul.

Nostradamus

There is no overcoming the influence. It isn't influence. The baby's soul was plucked out. It's now an empty shell awaiting a new host. Had Akua's plan succeeded, she would simply be the toddler. All her memories, personality, everything would remain fully intact. She wouldn't even be Baby Akua, she would be Akua with a Baby Body. Think Tanya the Evil.

Nivek

Iron sharpens iron. Akua lost and therefore serves until her new mistress significantly stumbles. It's that simple.

haihappen

Running theory of mine is that Akua is still the same, a Sonike highborn who sees other people only in terms of usefulness as a tool to get what she wants. And in this case, I much speculate that she is hatching at least a dozen plans on how to turn the situation around and either getting free, possession Cats body, or simply manipulating Cat to do stuff she wants until she can enact one of the former options.

Not one thing Akua says, or NOT says, for that matter, can be trusted. She will not factually lie when it could be discovered, as this would impede her usefulness as a tool. Being is useful tool is the only excuse Cat has to herself for granting her face time.

Cat's loneliness is an IN for Akua, and she has definitely picked up on that. Wanting to talk to somebody, and having somebody within easy reach... thats tempting.

Rook

Akua will lie, that's a given, but almost all of her words will be fully true. Falsehoods work best when they're not known, and too many too often make them easily noticeable as well as potentially losing Cat's ear. Not only is it a ridiculous amount of effort to try maintaining more than a very few select lies, the feasibility of it is questionable at best in the first place.

That kind of blunder isn't Akua Sahelian. For all her flaws, she's never been one to waste effort or make a move without a reason. She isn't a cudgel, she's a dagger in your back at just the right time.

Her lies are dangerous precisely because they're going to be obscured by so many truths that anything she says has a very high chance of being perfectly accurate. Cat can't afford to disbelieve everything since too much caution leading to ignoring true statements can ruin you just as easily as lack of caution causing you to follow falsehoods, and she neither has the spare time nor resources fact checking everything Akua tells her. Both Cat and Akua understand this, it's how this game is played.

No, it's going to be almost all truth up until a certain Pivot, and what makes or breaks this is going to be whether or not Cat can accurately notice the little inconsistencies and catch that moment when it comes.

haihappen

I said what Akua should not be "trusted", which has nothing to do with what she says is being true or factually correct. But yes, she is a dagger, akin to a coiled snake, and will strike the moment she thinks she can get away with it.

I just noticed Akua still has the Diabolist Name. Not surprising, actually, as she maintained it with her soul apart from her body before death.

But this has... interesting implications regarding her potential usefulness and the situations she could be aiming to produce: Her being granted at least a sliver of her former power by Cat, because the situation is desperate.

Akua may be the most secret (and not secret, since it is an open rumor that Akua's soul is bound to the mantle) and terrible/destructive weapon that Cat has: a bound Named at her command. Probably also the most unreliable one.

Is it a kind of a running gag that Cat has a trove of allies that she knows will betray her, and keeps saying that to their faces!

Larat: check

Akua: check

This one noble in Hedges that I cannot remember the name: check

(soon) Goblin Matrons: double check

Euodiachloris

I suspect it's a High Lord thing. To Akua, all is still right with the world, even in her state. She still has behaviour templates to follow as one who has been defeated.

In short, most people would go nuts in no time having their soul ripped out, stuck in a stone and left at the whim of others. But, because of their own cultural quirks, the High Lord's and Ladies of Praes have a chance to come through it about as sane (and that's not saying much) as they went in.

Which kind of explain a why punishments in the Tower take it to the next level, as in the Hall of Screams. 😊

sengachi

Akua has nothing to gain by fighting back at this point. And no pride so sacred she cannot bury it for an advantage. So she will serve Catherine, and not scream and yell and throw a hissy-fit at her, because that's what gives her the best chance of being let out in the long run.

Jonnnney

We always saw her when she was top dog in her own eyes. A lot of what she did was because it was what villains were expected to do. Her personality was always second to her ambition and to the traditional actions of a villain. As a subordinate she is more free to act

haihappen

Nah, she is still the same.

Remember the discussion she had with her second in command during her Liesse Governorship, when she came into her new Name?

He blatantly admitted aiming to be her Chancellor or similar when she eventually ascended the tower, either to overthrow her later or level the field so that down the line, his descendant has a shot at claiming the tower.

And this is not something he is ashamed of, as it is a virtue in Praesi culture to be ambitious. Akua is very much not chastising him for it, as she has the very much same mindset, only grander in scale.

That is the Praesi way: From a position of weakness or subordination, you bide your time until you can seize your opportunity to rise to the top. All methods are good and fair in that pursuit. Iron sharpens Iron.

Fucked up, yes, but I guess this is very much restricted to the lords and nobles? I would be interested in what the run-of-the-mill Soninke or Tragheb peasant/commoner mindset is. An interlude about that would be awesome. Perhaps in how the actions of the high and mighty affect them and their opinions about that.

danh3107

It's amazing how much I hated living akua, but ghost akua is really growing on me.

Also goblins make napalm out of demons, and given what goblins do regularly in this story I'm honestly not too surprised. It's also FUCKING COOL

nick012000

Goblinfire's not napalm, dude. It's Chlorine Trifluoride.

http://blogs.sciencemag.org/pipeline/archives/2008/02/26/sand\_wont\_save\_you\_this\_time

grzecho2222

Again?

taovkool

From wiki:

cambré (plural cambrés)

1. (ballet) A bending at the waist in any direction, forward, backward, or to the side

Cambré is a classical ballet term meaning "arched." When a dancer is doing cambré, their body is bent from the waist and stretching backward or sideways with the head following the movement of the upper body and arms.

I have no idea how to translate this into the archetype of a story plot. The beginning of a spin or a feint? Too much speculation.

Bit of a personal question to erraticerrata, any particular reason for your fondness in ballet terms? Are you a dancer perhaps?

oldschoolvillain

It's the theme for the book – each of them had a set of interludes for the other teams running in events, and a set of chapter titles to match. What's curious is that the pattern seems to have been swapped here, and that the interludes are now the ones that are unconnected. Considering that it was Akua's interludes that were closest to the theme we're seeing, this . . . could be worth some concern.

taovkool

Wait, so the pattern might not be connected to whatever the hell Cat was doing, but instead it was connected to whatever the hell Akua was doing?

Those terms of endearments she kept using. Is Akua trying to play out a story of some sort? The only ones that came to mind are genies or guardian spirit a la fairy godparent. More than that, I have no idea. Is there a story about a guardian spirit fucking its owner over? Or at least, one where Akua was released from Cat's binding?

Letouriste

Pretty sure there is.

In one story they exchange places because of deceptions (forgot the name) and in at least several others the bound creature is released at their owner death (pretty sure this is even a trope) .

For the second case, I think the creature need to suffer a lot without having provoked such harsh actions (beatings etc...).

So, if cat mistreat severely akua without reason...Akua can expect help of creation to her escape (she need to be as subservient as possible in her attitude and to be on the good side of the readers. She need pity basically)

Faiir

This makes me think of gods above as idealistic readers, and gods below as those more cynical ones, both trying to affect the the story by submitting comments to the author..

Demons would be the trolls annoying the author and thus destroying the story, and angels would be the moral guardians insisting that the story follows their values.

In this case, EE using readers' comments to alter the story would have an in universe explanation!

oldschoolvillain

Cat needs to get laid. Badly. Preferably with our fantastic and literally fiery redhead, but I'd take Vivienne as a rescue Ship.

Letouriste

Well,now she is human again for a few days,this is the best moment for that;)

grzecho2222

A lot of people, orcs, goblins, fey, ogres, devils: "Suddenly feel dread"

Walter

"I grant you leash," I murmured. "I grant you eyes and ears, tongue and feet and...."

Antoninjohn

If the pattern of Winter is cut by the Gods Above to try and kill Cat she can weave it into a new form and given that when Cat's story of weaving in to new form is to take the power of her defeated does and add them to her Murder Cloak of Work, Winter/

Cat is going to get even stronger

Antoninjohn

Foes not does

grzecho2222

The longer the cape, the stronger she gets?

NZPIEFACE

"There's no one around me and I'm kind of bored. Let's call up Aqua to talk about goblin politics."

That seriously can't bode well for her if that's the first thing she does.

TeK

She's so lonely, she'll even summon her archnemesis and accomplished mass murderer to chat. This is sad. I feel sad.

Rook

Well she could also numb herself by drawing on a Winter mantle that bleeds into her soul, or avoid the issues by drowning out the emotions in alcohol.

See, she's got plenty of options! Cheer up, I see no possible way this can end badly.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The alcohol option is out, since she's under oath not to drink on the campaign (and due to her fae mantle, the oath is inviolate). But yeah.

Micke

Considering the matrons have murdered at least one legion general, there's a goblin settlement in Marchford, and a goblin matron is the highest ranked commander at the other Callowan front, it would bode even less well if she ignored it until another military campaign was the only possible salvation.

frolamiz

Aren't Orgim and Black ranked higher than her?
And I believe that Ranker is too deeply involved with the empire to gain much by betraying them, Sacker is a more likely traitor.

Oshi

It's more like there is no one I like around me so I can't avoid doing all the shitty things I have to be doing. Ugh let's get Akua over with.

grzecho2222

Cat: My dear enemies and Larat.

TeK

Well, all in all, revelation about munitions is not particularly stunning. We already know that angels can be used in pieces, stands to reason that demons can be too. I wonder, would her oath to not use demons/devils prevent her from using munitions.

Oshi

The remains of dead demons are not the same thing as releasing an actual one into the world to wreck havoc.

grzecho2222

"Her cloak looks so great with this white feather accents"

Mr. Nobody

Hopefully Cat will make a good sword out of the Saint of Swords. The old hag can even cut patterns of power, just imagine what a sword made out of her would do.

Highwayman

The Saint of Swords would be the rudest, most straight-forward sword in all of Creation, I'll bet.

*Euodiachloris*

You don't exactly want twisty, convoluted wordplay and Byzantine social plotting in a sword. See thing; cut thing; snark.

grzecho2222

What a cutting remark. Or "I fight with sarcasm sharp as blade"

*Walter*

Whereas Saint fights with an actual blade, also sharp as a blade.

Rook

It'll be so straightforward that she'll have two edges, no guard, and have a handle sharp enough to count as a blunt dagger by itself.

The ornery old hag ain't no scheming Praesi high noble. Her price won't be a sweet lie in your ear, it'll be cutting off your fucking ear as a warning shot.

Nivek

That bit about how Praesi use poison and knives to thin their inner circle seems limited. You should also have thrown in poisoned knives and knifed poison in that description. I have no idea what knifed poison even is but I have no doubt that the Praesi invented it at some point.

nrsa

Knived poison is obviously poison that was frozen solid and carved into the form of a dagger. That does actually sound like a fun way of killing someone

Thea

Well, there may be a solid poison shapeable into blade form. Should be easier and more applicable as small needles, e.g. for a blowpipe, but a knife might be possible. Somehow. Cut someone, blade dissolves a bit to poison them, and you hope it didn't dull so much you can't cut anyone else.

Rook

Please, a discerning noble wouldn't be as base as to let practicality get in the way of frivolous manners. Blowpipes are probably reserved as a commentary on verbosity, and a knife instead of a dagger would imply that your lesser political standing made the outcome clear from the beginning. A poisoned knife would only be acceptable to show acknowledgement of ability while also criticizing that your perspective is still that of a crude lowborn.

Letouriste

Clap clap clap sir. I totally can imagine a highlord saying this:D

TeK

It's actually cowardness and show of a lack of both self-confidence and true affection, if you use something else than your bare hands. Bonus points for killing someone by having sex until their heart bursts (probably would need to use poison). Truly romantic.

Absinthe with Mephisto

Mantle of woaa.

grzecho2222

"Careless Whisper starts playing"

IncognitoMe

That's the second time the Ashuran attack on the Tideless Isles has been mentioned and it already stuck out to me in the Stairway Interlude.

They said there that the son of Magon Hadast is leading the assault and I am certain that in a previous chapter somewhere it was discussed that Malicia owns that guy.

You guys think there's a revelation later that that fleet from Ashur has been lying to their crusader allies and Praes is better prepared than expected?

Also, do you think we'll hear from the Pirate Queen villain again, that Black at some point strong-armed into working for the tower and that is based in the Tideless Isles? That one was in one of Cat's name dreams is a nice Chekov in my opinion.

grzecho2222

Malicia and legions left in Praes are definitely doing something and given that they are not marching to support Black, my guess is that whatever happened Crusaders fleet is at least not completely out of picture.

On the matter of Chekov Guns, there is also missing bell in chapel on angel island and considering Callowan obsession with bells (City of Thousand Bells, Order of Broken Bell, bell being kinda symbol of Callow and its royalty)...

burdi

So, thief already did her mission, whatever it was. I think it's about the absolute positioning from observatory, amazing as it is, it still needs a beacon, a sign to positioning its attack it kind like a GPS

Letouriste

Why do you think there would be only one mission? She got time during that battle, she could do several critical things.

Like capturing the princess general, stealing their supplies, hiding some beacons for Masego future spells, stealing the weapons of some heroes (unlikely), hiding some traps, stealing the gold that Prince Amadis uses for paying his troops etc...

grzecho2222

...shaving his dogs, deflowering his wife...

burdi

or shaving his wife, deflowering his dogs..

Letouriste

« There can be no peace (looking away, knife already in a corpse) when the very nature of Creation is contest (not enough meat, talking). »

That sentence is so...deep, and weirdly funny^^

Every talks with masego are pure gold:)
And now I have a picture in mind of goblins doing horrors experiments with a creature literally tearing the fabric of the world apart by existing...gods, and I believed Warlock was the scientific madman in this story:o

mindsword2

Gods Above, I love Masego.

"I thought you didn't drink wine any —" Masego frowned. "Wait, is this another sex thing I don't know about?"

I have had to say thing almost exactly like this far too often to not appreciate it when someone else has to struggle through and still be the smartest badass around.

Author Unknown

Wow the whole munitions from demons and devils thing feels like getting backhanded by hindsight. It seems so obvious now, I can't believe I didn't see it coming. Probably because there are chemical means to accomplish most of the effects; good misdirection EE.

Agent J

And there's the fact that the Gnomes sent a yellow letter when gunpowder was being experimented on. Yet no one bothered to question what the munitions were made of. Or, at least, I didn't.

Berder

So we know Masego is astounded that part of Cat's mantle could be destroyed. Is it possible that it was not actually destroyed? And if not — where could that severed corner of her mantle have gone to? And if the whole cloak could regenerate the corner – could the corner perhaps also regenerate the whole cloak?

My theory is that Akua now has a weak version of Cat's mantle. She was in close proximity when the event occurred.

(Perhaps a correction: Akua described an empire united behind its "Tyrant." Shouldn't she have said an empire united behind its Empress?)

wyaldriddler

She could have, but "Tyrant" is actually the proper Name for Dread Empresses and Emperors of Praes it's just not used often because of Helike.

Naeddyr

"Tyrant", when not referring to the Tyrant, is like "King"; Dread Empress is the Name. There's "Good Kings", but not all "Kings" are "Good Kings" (or "Bad Kings" or named in general). It's just a synonym for the ruler of Praes.

wyaldriddler

Really? Huh, coulda swore this was mentioned at one point in Book 3. *shrug*

grzecho2222

Or her cut off part ran away to some dark forest where it is cosplaying as necromancer

tildor

Call it heresy, but after all this time I still ship Cat and Masego.

WuseMajor

I wonder if Cat is gonna start arranging a contingency or something so that, when the Saint cuts off the rest of Winter, she'll end up human again and with a proper Name in the process.

---

Erraticerrata, given that sappers are taught the spreads for goblinfire on various types of ground (with magically significant numbers in it), and that keeping notes on demons affects the surroundings, is diabolically charged alchemy the reason the sappers are typically perceived as mad, or the demonic essence is diluted enough to be safe in that regard?

shaundrodgers

Great chapter EE!

Catherine's feeling of "UGGHHHH fuck all of this" was delightfully palpable. It was nice seeing some more banter with Masego and Akua little tidbits about Praesi social niceties was both horrifying and intriguing.

I started reading last year and im loving the new book so far!

To you the best, to your enemies your worst.

RanVor

Damn, Ghost Akua is so creepy.

I have a feeling something bad is going to happen in an instant Masego's attention is diverted.

onedollargum

The cloak was cut and the power diminished, which was thought impossible. What if it was impossible to simply lose that power? What are the chances that the metaphorical cloak joined her actual cloak? What if Akua has a shred of Winter, now?

onedollargum

In relation to the opening text: Cat's loss, Akua's gain.

Euodiachloris

Winter is still Cat's. I'd worry more if Cat binds another woman to her mantle, though. Winter, guardian, death, war, taking, grief, crows, blood... the The Morrigan

DocTao

So, when will Black get on with things and get himself a new Squire?

grzecho2222

New Squire will most likely Hero to be mirror to Cat or Robber since we know that goblins can be traditionally Named, Also given that Black will probably stop being Black some time soon (be it by losing Name, changing it or getting killed) new Black Knight would arise and given that all three known Squires have one thing in common (deep dislike toward some aspect of Empire) and Robber is the most martial of three people that we know that display it (Robber, Pickler, Ratface)

vuthuha912

Not now, a war is no condition to adopt another child. This new Squire should be a Praesi and as heroic as Cat. A Praesi so that they have a motivation in fixing Praes and a hero to actually help and not just using him for power like Malicia

TheAtomicOption

I'm confused as to why people think Akua might have part of the cloak now. I do wonder what happened to the part that was cut off though. IMO the most likely candidate to have taken control of it in some way is the heroes—and that would be a really scary prospect that could result in another nasty tradeoff during the big battle later. 😞

sengachi

"In a finite world, one's gain (victory, large cave) inevitably means loss (dead female, enemy grows) for another. There can be no peace (looking away, knife already in a corpse) when the very nature of Creation is contest (not enough meat, talking)."
– Extract from a theorized translation of 'Remnant and Ruin', one of the few goblin texts ever obtained

So while this is a terrifying look into goblin culture, but I'd like to go off on a huge tangent and note that this is kind of wrong from a game theory standpoint.

Oh total mutual defection and hostility is a very easy local optima to get trapped in, don't get me wrong. And I don't disagree with the statement in a narrative sense or in a realism sense, that's stuffs been said before, will be said again, and it makes sense why people come to such conclusions.

But in any complex game theory scenario with finite resources, especially one in which competition expends resources, intelligently cooperative agents almost always win out.

When modern AI programmers write game theory optimizers (<https://www.nature.com/articles/s41467-017-02597-8>) they don't write them to cooperate or defect. They just write them to *optimize*, whatever that may mean. And you know what the fascinating thing is? For complicated scenarios with intelligent adversaries? *Especially* if you can communicate with your adversary? 'Optimal' always means cooperative. Not unconditionally cooperative, of course not. But smart cooperators beat out smart defectors by such a wide margin that it's all but taken for granted that cooperation is optimal in game theory. (At least, in game theory scenarios complicated enough that learning can happen).

Although, I should note that cooperation breaks down and defection becomes valuable when three main things happen. (Well, when a lot of things happen, but here's the three main ones).

Also it's worth noting that these things feed into one another in a **big** way.

A) A terminal scenario exists and starting resources are imbalanced. If actors can murder or subjugate other actors or in some way "kill them, take their stuff", and someone starts with enough resources that they can just soak early-game counter-defection losses, they can just take over the game. And ruling the world is optimal.

B) Limited quality, quantity, or expansiveness of communication combined with impermanent group structures. If communication is restricted in complexity, hostile actors can easily spoof cooperative signals. If communication is costly or outright capped, hostile actors can restrict their actions to being malicious but not quite malicious enough to warrant people sharing information about them. And lastly, if these things are true and what information is shared isn't universally accessible, hostile actors can move to greener pastures when eventually they are identified as hostile, either by individuals or by local groups.

C) Inherently exploitable groups exist. This goes without saying of course, if a group of actors who can't effectively fight back against defection exist, of course they'll be exploited. But it goes beyond that. The existence of exploitable groups causes the proliferation of defection schemas in general and the breakdown of deontological cooperation schemas, which results in cooperative groups fracturing into local cooperation schemas rather than global cooperation schemas, and then those groups tend to get ordered into a hierarchy of exploitability.

So stepping away from the game theory tangent ... the goblins are kind of wrong? "There can be no peace when the nature of Creation is contest" is just dead wrong. Finite resources do not push towards mutually assured defection, in fact they push towards the exact opposite. But at the same time ... sometimes the bloodiest knife comes out on top and there **are** reasons for that.

... Fuck Errata, you have the best chapter openers, I hope you know that.

TeK

I have to disagree with you there. While I would not argue game theory with you, it's math, and math is not always applicable to the reality. Much less to fantasy. That aside, I think the epigraph refers more to the "conservation principle". Basically, to gain in one place, you must lose in another. Cooperation is a very loose concept. For example, you got limited food, so you need to reduce your population. Even if all agents cooperate towards their mutual survival (without reducing the population, which will mean loss for some agents), they, at best, will just even out their expected lifespan (which will be very small), and eventually everyone loses. And if they cooperate towards the survival of group as a whole, while technically everyone wins (if they are lucky), one can argue that given that they leave the game, they lose one.

sengachi

Actual game theory applies mathematical models to reality in much the same way biology population models do. Very, very well.

Also that's not what cooperation means in game theory. It's a very common misinterpretation, but a wrong one. Cooperation isn't "all individual good subverted for the collective good". It's "opening oneself to the possible consequences of betrayal to avoid the sure consequences of mutual conflict". And intelligent cooperation is mutually deciding upon and taking steps to reduce the risk and cost of that potential betrayal, specializing individual's actions to optimize resource output in ways that make a collective more efficient than a collection of individuals, and leveraging large group size into being able to win pissing matches with intransigent defectors, etc, etc.

High-level cooperation isn't communism. It's bureaucracy.

TeK

Thanks for explanation. I really need to update my knowledge on game theory.

sengachi

No problem. Always happy to share. 😊 Game theory is really fascinating and it's a crying shame that it typically only gets presented as the one-off, no-priors, no-mutual-information, no-communication, no-overlapping-goals, two-party Prisoner's Dilemma. It's like, yeah, sure, take out everything that makes game theory applicable to real life and actual people and present that as the quintessential example of the field why don't you. That's not underselling the discipline at allllll.

(I am very salty about this, sorry).

Warriormonk

Is the damage to Winter's mantle permanent? Or is it simply a temporary drain on the rest of the mantle while it repairs the damaged/cut off part? It would suck if it was permanent.

On the other hand, the novel strikes a good balance between the endless quest for gaining personal power and character development/other practical matters of power (Black's tactics, Malicia's politics)...

Also, Ubuu, I'm pretty sure that Black and Malicia wouldn't kill each other as we saw them come to a fragile sort of make-up at the end of the last book. Although, Black may somehow change in his Role to fit into Cat's vision of things/how the world should be.

warriormonk19

Also, I think you meant to say 'obscenely' instead of 'obscurely' in the first line.

Masego said, sounding 'obscenely' pleased.

crescentsickle

I think that Akua is planning for a really long game. I believe that she sees the only way for Cat to succeed in what she wants is to don the mantle of Empress. She may not want it, but it may be the only way she can force the Deoraithe and the Orcs not to fight, to settle the Goblins, to pacify and reform the Soninke and Taghreb. She believes that either Black and Malicia will end each other or will fall to Cat in a three-way power struggle.

At that point, Akua is hoping to have served Cat for so long as a former-rival-turned-loyal-but-still-probably-traitorous role that she automatically qualifies as Chancellor without Cat being able to stop it, and for her to assume the Role to allow her to escape Cat's prison for her. Then she makes her own play, whether to just rule Praes, gain the title from Cat in a peaceful manner (because Cat doesn't want it), or violently obtain it.

benthelynx

Rereading this I'm surprised, with the oath Cat made, that Akua is not worse off than she is. I mean having your soul bound to a cloak is bad, but it's not "will be remembered in a thousand years" level of bad. And Cat's pretty bound at this point to fulfill oaths like this to the letter.

vuthuha912

Very cute Akua but there is something that you've not considered: They are avoiding each other because being in the same place hurt too much and it is easier to not think about it. Black just ghosted the Empress because he disagrees with her but does not want to challenge her outright so he just stays in Callow and works on the defense. He might want to do something productive while having a cold war with his best friend. The Empress obviously wants him to 'come home' to Praes whether to show Praes she still has his leash or to mend things with him – this is not clear.

A separation if you consider their partnership as a sort of marriage. I am not sure Akua actually see enough normal partnership to know that just because someone is no longer working with you, doesn't mean they will try to kill you.

Why are you talking to Akua, Cat? Write a diary or scry Black. You never know when it is the last time that you speak together, especially in a war. I am sure you don't want the last memory of you two together to be you stabbing him in the gut while he gave you the knife. It wasn't that bad what he did. He doesn't talk with you about the plan for the flying fortress but most of his actions are for your benefit. You know he loves you dearly and you love him. Why can't you guy just talk it out? Make him understand that having agency is important to you and such, asking about his plan and trying to cooperate with each other. He might even tell you about Praes if you asked.

Black, please talk it out with Cat. You are a grown-up and her caretaker – you need to be there for her. She is not okay right now. You need to ask for forgiveness and give out an olive branch. You did just that with Malicia despite her being the one in the wrong.

---

Chapter 13: Élevé

"Civilized men disapprove of murder, of course. Unless it involves banners and great numbers: then it becomes one's patriotic duty."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

We knew Thief had succeeded days before she returned. The crusader host had begun a hard march south, at a harder pace than they'd ever taken before. Malanza was working her soldiers to exhaustion, and we knew exactly why: Vivienne had emptied their stores. Larat had gated General Hune and her army at their back once since then, to break the supply lines again, but they'd not even bothered to send an army to chase the ogre's soldiers away. The implication was that the foodstuffs coming from Procer were too few and infrequent to feed the number of hungry mouths she now had to deal with, and Thief confirmed as much when she stumbled back into camp.

"Heroes were busy with you or your minions," Vivienne said. "I had almost a full hour before someone noticed the stores were emptying."

"They didn't pursue?" I asked.

"They tried," she shrugged. "But they had nothing that could see through my aspect, apparently. Or at least no Named that could and came close to me."

And with that, the preparations for our battle were done. We had Princess Rozala Malanza's army exactly where we wanted it: tired, undersupplied, and forced to march on Hedges or starve. There was serious debate among the general staff about retreating even further south to stretch those advantages out, but in the end we decided against it. Any further and we were entering the heartlands of the Barony of Hedges. Assuming we won the battle, some defeated soldiers would flee into the countryside and the last thing I wanted was a few thousand deserters ravaging the region out of desperation. The Army of Callow folded back into a single entity, with the addition of a thousand members of the Watch. That brought us to slightly over twenty-two thousand soldiers, in whole. Against over fifty thousand crusaders, twelve – perhaps eleven if I'd mangled Two Knives enough, but I wasn't relying on that when they had healers – heroes and who the Hells knew how many priests. Enough that scrying the crusader host directly had been a wash for months, anyway, and given the sprawling stretch of their war camps it had to be a least a few hundreds. My side boasted a few sharp knives as well, at least: Hierophant, well-trained mage lines, five thousand of the finest heavy cavalry on Calernia and Pickler's vicious war engines.

The first enemy banners came in sight midmorning.

Yellow striped across red, with three white lions. That was the Prince of Orne's own, if memory served, and the lesser banners beneath it kept to those same three colours. In the Principate, the heraldry of lesser nobles beneath a prince had use of only that's prince's palette. That led to an orgy of improvisation, most of it patently absurd to look at – like the red lion with a yellow pig in its mouth set on white I first saw not a half-hour later. The vanguard was pure Alamans. First came the horse, with rich armour and richer pennants, then a mass of five thousand fantassins. I'd not forgotten the lecture had given me on Proceran soldiery. Most their armies were levies raised and kept only for the length of the latest war, poorly equipped and barely trained. Vulnerable to shock tactics, why was why Procerans tended to put such an emphasis on light cavalry. Peasants with shitty spears tended run when a wedge of glittering charged at them. The second kind of soldiery was the one before me: fantassins. Former levies who'd lost everything in the wars or gained a taste for the soldier's life, and now served in companies of their own making – though usually on the take from one prince or another. Leather and mail armour, wooden shields and longswords. Most of them were also carrying javelins, though, and that was more worrying. A well-thrown javelin would punch through a Legion regular's mail if it came from close enough.

The last was principality troops, the personal armies of the many royals of Procer. Heavy infantry, mostly sword and board soldiers though their shields were lighter and smaller than Legion standard issue. They also had archer companies, which might get nasty. Legion crossbowmen tended to shoot further and stronger than any archer not using longbows, but I had relatively few of them and the rate of fire for a properly-trained archer was better. Juniper had raised crossbow companies when forging the Army of Callow, but in skirmished like that numbers often carried the day and those wouldn't be on our side. The last principality soldiers were the cavalry. Light horse, most of them, since only the Lycaonese relied on heavy charges and there were none among the opposition. Our last count had the opposing cavalry at almost eleven thousand, more than double the Order of Broken Bells. Baroness Ainsley's two hundred knights did little to even the odds, though they were still welcome.

The enemy vanguard stayed a mile away, not even remotely inviting an engagement. I wasn't surprised. We'd waited for the crusader here for a day, and Juniper had my army at work the entire time. Field fortifications had been raised, trenches dug and siege engines set over low hills of beaten earth. Attacking us in our entrenchments without numerical superiority was suicide. Not that it prevented a few hundred enemy horse from parading out of crossbow range, banners waving in the breeze. Juniper sent out the Watch to clear them out, and they retreated after the first volley – which, sadly, killed no more than a dozen.

"Trying to gauge longbow range, you think?" I mused, eyes flicking to the Hellhound.

I was astride Zombie while she stood by her command table, surrounded by her staff. Easy for her to do, I thought bitterly. If I was on the ground, I wouldn't even see beyond our reserves. Everyone was so fucking tall, it was really unacceptable.

"They should already have a notion," the orc growled. "Not like it's changed much in the last few hundred years. No, they were just arrogant little pups out to posture."

And they'd lost half a line of their buddies for it. And that's why you don't let nobles run an army, I thought. Or at least not Proceran nobles. The Old Kingdom had done fairly well relying on its own.

"I dislike just leaving them out there," I noted, gesturing at the five thousand infantry in the distance.

"Bait," Juniper said. "There'll be heroes, I bet. And if we sent enough soldiers to swat them away, we'll weaken the fortifications for when the real army arrives. Let them come."

I sighed. She was probably right. It didn't make any more pleasant to stew in the sun while the crusaders lumbered towards our battle. By noon, the amount of cavalry in the distance had doubled. The spread of colours among banners had expanded. Blue, black, green. Wyverns and dragons and horses. Our own were less... exotic. The Fifteenth's banner still flew, with my own personal heraldry besides it: scales, with the sword and the crown. The Order of Broken Bells had its own as well, but aside from that the only departure was the flock of starlings on blue that belonged to House Morley of Harrow. The infantry swelled as the hours passed, and before Noon Bell was at an end the enemy had fully arrived. I puffed at my pipe, watching the mass of shining steel ahead. There weren't as many on the field today as there'd been at Second Liesse, but there were more soldiers. It was going to be a very different kind of battle.

"You think they'll open with Named?" Juniper asked.

I shook my head.

"They've got veterans on the other side," I said. "Heroes that have been around for long enough to know you don't open with Named. The first will come out the moment we start winning on one side of the field."

It would take careful managing, we both knew. Heroes could not be left alone. Most of them would scythe straight through even hardened infantry and their mere presence could turn a rout into a stubborn line of defence. On the other hand, my side didn't have the numbers to hammer down every hero that popped up. In a contest of Named, I was short more than a few. And Thief hardly counted, considering she wasn't a fighter. Hierophant and I could punch pretty hard, but on the other hand if our army started needing us to win then it became essentially guaranteed that some hero would cut us down. Best case, we'd be driven off the field, but best case wasn't something to count on when there was the Saint and the Pilgrim on the other side.

"Priority's teasing out whatever they intended to use as the northern passage if we blocked them," I said. "That's too dangerous an unknown to allow Malanza to keep sitting on it."

I'd gotten an oath about the opposition not calling on angels, but the Pilgrim would never have agreed to that if his crew didn't have other weapons to wield. With Praesi, it was the sorcerers you had to worry about. With the Procerans, though? My money was on the priests. I leaned forward, watching the crusaders in the distance, and frowned. Was that? Yeah, no two ways about it. They were moving carts and pitching tents.

"They're making camp," I told Juniper.

The orc snorted.

"How prudent of them," she said. "Malanza must think there'd a decent chance it'll take more than a day to exterminate us. I doubt she'll be going for attrition with her boys' stomachs going empty, but she'll be generous in trading soldiers."

"Our camp is the largest concentration of foodstuffs between here and Hedges," I said. "If she's desperate..."

"She knows we can gate out if it gets to that," Juniper replied, shaking her head. "No, this is just her hedging her bets. We'll see the first skirmishers moving out within the hour, mark my words."

The Hellhound, for once, was proved wrong. She'd not misread the military, as it happened, but the political. A party of four riders under truce banner rode out, stopping halfway between our camps. I went to meet them. I could have brought Juniper and Hierophant, or even Baroness Ainsley as the ranking noble with the army, but that would just be posturing. On this field, I was the one making decisions for my side. Zombie trotted out cheerfully, the sun pounding down at us until I sat in the saddle across from the crusader delegation. There were some familiar faces there. The Saint and the Pilgrim, though they were at the back. The old woman discreetly sliced her finger across her throat when I glanced at her. Charming. The Grey Pilgrim inclined his head in greeting and I did the same, before taking in the other two. The man was much older than the woman, at least late forties. Prince Amadis Milenan, at a guess. To my surprise, he was good-looking. I'd expected some caricature of a Chancellor, but instead what I got was very well-groomed older man with fair hair and a chiselled jaw. The other – Princess Rozala Manlanza, most likely – was maybe a few years older than me. Dark eyes and darker curls, with the kind of wicked easy smile that belonged more on Laure tavern girl than foreign royalty.

"Afternoon," I said. "I'd say welcome to Callow, but I see you've already made yourself at home."

I punctuated with a nod at the army behind them.

"Queen Catherine," the older man said, bowing ever so slightly. "I am Prince Amadis Milenan of Iserre."

"So I'd guessed," I said. "I already know the two greyhairs in the back. Should I assume the curvy one measuring me up is Princess Malanza?"

"Are you trying to seduce your way out of this, Black Queen?" the woman in question asked, sounding amused.

"Unfortunately I have a strict non-invading Callow clause for people I let into my bed," I said. "I'll take that as a yes, by the way. You took your sweet time getting here, Malanza."

"My supplies inexplicably disappeared into thin air," the princess drawled. "Slowed us down some. I don't suppose you'd happen to know where they went?"

"Must have been rats," I said sympathetically. "Callow's had a vermin problem, these last few months."

"What a coincidence," Malanza said. "We've come to remedy that very issue."

Shit. Now I kind of liked her. I'd probably feel a least a little bad about putting her head on a pike down the line. Prince Amadis cleared his throat.

"I must implore you to excuse the uncouthness of my general," he said. "The prospect of battle wearies her, as it does all of us."

"I'm not a stickler on etiquette," I smiled. "Trying to sell chunks of Callow, though? That does get on my nerves a bit."

Not a trace of dismay passed on the princes' face, though I knew he couldn't be pleased about the Watch turning on him. Duchess Kegan had been less than impressed by the man, as it happened. He'd promised her both Laure and Denier when she'd pushed, which she'd taken as meaning he would have double-crossed her the moment he could.

"Preparing for peace is hardly treachery," Amadis said. "You are outnumbered in both Named and men, Queen Catherine. Let us not spill blood unreasonably. I have terms of surrender to offer, should you be willing."

I glanced at the Grey Pilgrim, whose serenity was unruffled by this. Did they seriously expect to fold now?

"You would have to abdicate, naturally," the Prince of Iserre said. "But I would title you Princess of the Blessed Isle, and grant you the eastern half of the lands currently in the rule of the governorship of Summerholm."

"Huh," I said. "And you heroes would respect those terms?"

"We would," the Grey Pilgrim said, sending the Saint a quelling look when it looked like she'd speak up.

"It this the part," I mused, "where I'm supposed to be thankful about you trying to make me your marcher lord at the frontier with Praes? Let's not even touch the part where you're carving up Callow between your supporters, because then I'll lose my fucking temper and we're under a truce banner."

"You cannot win this war," Prince Amadis sharply said. "This must be obvious by now."

"Malanza's face is blank," I said, pointing at the princess. "That's because she's trying not to smile. That should tell you more or less what I think of your offer. Now, here's mine."

I let out a long breath.

"Go home," I said. "I'll even provide enough supplies you don't starve on the way out, though you'll have to pay for them and there'll be a 'I shouldn't have fucking invaded another country' markup. You'll find nothing here but death, so just go home and settle your pissing match with Hasenbach out of my homeland. If you cross the passage, I will not pursue."

I glanced at the princess of Aquitan.

"That holds for after someone runs him through," I told her. "Leave, and you will not be harassed on the way out. I don't particularly want to fight this war, Malanza. It ends the moment you let it."

"Are you threatening me under peace banner?" Prince Amadis Milenan calmly said.

"I'm telling you I'm about to stop being nice about this," I told him. "I've bent over backwards to limit the damage, but if it comes to a battle a lot of people are going to die for very stupid reasons. And to be blunt, they'll be yours more than mine. We could avoid that entirely and both be better off."

"This is a crusade, Catherine Foundling," the Saint of Swords said. "Not a petty invasion. You do not make truce with holy war."

"There's no point in talking to you, Saint," I sighed. "You're Ranger with a shiny coat of paint and a socially acceptable pretext for killing."

The old woman's face darkened.

"You're going to lose a hand for that," she said.

"Amateur," I dismissed. "I've spent years dealing with Wastelanders, you second-rate bully. You think you've got a single threat that can shake me? I used to answer to a woman who uses a fucking demon as a gatekeeper has an entire hallway of forever screaming heads. Your notion is bad is her starting point."

I barrelled on before she could reply.

"I'll keep to the terms I agreed on with the Grey Pilgrim," I said. "Where are we falling on prisoner exchanges?"

"No guarantees," Malanza said. "Should there be worthwhile trades to make, you will be approached under banner."

Translation: she was sitting on any men of mine she caught unless I got my hands on someone high up enough the ladder it would be politically inconvenient to leave there.

"There doesn't have to be a battle," the Saint said. "You and me, girl. Here and now. We settle it the old way."

I glanced at her skeptically.

"Last time we scrapped you beat me like a rented mule," I said. "I'm not getting anywhere near you without a mage company and half a dozen ballistas. Pass."

"Cowardice is an ugly thing," the old woman smiled.

"The chorus of the side with the bigger swords," I shrugged. "If that's all, I have an army to lead."

"Such generous terms of surrender will not be offered again," Prince Amadis warned.

"I'm feeling generous too, Proceran," I smiled. "So when I sent your head on a pike back to Salia, your soul won't be bound to it."

And on this particularly diplomatic note, I spurred Zombie away and returned to my host.

Within the hour, skirmishers on both sides advanced.

---

Antoninjohn

Mango has already been seen to send Corruption down magic links, how effected will the Crusade be when that happens to all there mages at the same time

Darkening

Does he even have Corruption anymore? I mean, there was some left after the end of Liesse I imagine, but I'd have expected Cat and him to have a long talk about the appropriateness of binding demonic essence into yourself without telling anyone.

Jeffery Wells

It was never said whether he collected it back afterwards. I suspect not, for a few reasons. First and foremost was how well it was foreshadowed in the first place. Failing to do so in the Akua arc and then pulling it out again later would just be bad writing, and the writing here has been stellar so far. Second it's a trick he's already used. Masego is meant to be the worker of wonders, pulling the same trick more than once, unless he's forced to do something relatively mundane by Cat for strategic reasons, is just not something his character would do. You already see that the spectacular move of killing almost all of their mages is going to be little more than a footnote. Masego do the thing, Masego did the thing, not worth spending any story time on. Lastly it's definitely the sort of thing that would strengthen the crusade even as it weakens the crusaders' army. That's something Cat will want to avoid. If Cat would avoid it anyway there is no reason to write it into the story.

taliesinskye

Or perhaps all their priests? Loss of magical healing would cripple one of these armies in both morale and practical terms. They seem badly dependent on it.

BryceWilliam

it won't happen cause the anti-demon/angel truce. using demon corruption would kinda break that.

Antoninjohn

Not the Demon, the fragment of the Demon left behind from the drop of Corruption on his arm, it he was shown at Liesse against the other Demons

Miles

I don't think the heroes will recognize a distinction between "demon" and "Demon chunk" for the purposes of the treaty. And even if they do, the angels will use that as an excuse to interfere. ("We didn't use angels, we just used their feathers, songs, and interference")

sheer_falacy

That would count as using demons. Actually, sharpeners and goblin fire probably violate the agreement too, that'll suck for Cat soon.

Nairne .01

Except, who knows how much knowledge the “forces of good” have about what goblinfire and sharpeners are made from.

Yotz

Given the number of priests and Heroes – and especially Saint and Pilgrim – I wouldn’t discard the possibility of them if not knowing outright because of The Hint From Above, then being able to sense/deduce something after treating the wound of one Cat used a sharper on.

If they indeed know, they would probably seat on the knowledge until the crucial moment to use the pretext of seeming treachery on the Cat’s part to summon a Choir.

On the other hand, miracle working can be considered a Divine Intervention by the same vein of thought, which either makes priests rather useless or makes Proceran side an oathbreakers long before first use of goblin munitions.

On the other other hand, it’s probably just dragonfire and has nothing to do with demons.

stevenneiman

@Yotz I think that the Grey Pilgrim is the only one I would count on being able to figure it out, and he can probably convince everyone else to keep it quiet if he doesn’t think they’re too much nastier than anything else. For all his hostility I do believe that the Pilgrim genuinely wants the rules of engagement to work out and set a precedent of cleaner warfare. As Cat pointed out that requires both sides to be capable of having as good of a chance as they had without rules, and if he demands that Evil lose its last-ditch WMDs, its cheap magical soldier substitutes AND its most useful tactical weapons in exchange for only the last-ditch WMDs of Good, that balance won’t be preserved enough for Evil to stick to the agreements.

Jonnnney

Unless the heroes wanna offer to stop using their equipment granted by the heavens I doubt they’d complain about materials derived from the hells.

Yotz

Never underestimate the power of one’s pretentiousness, especially if they carry a soapbox with them.

Sylfa

There’s a number of reasons that couldn’t possibly be used.

Assuming it works exactly as well as your implying: after winning they will denounce Callow and it's true villain queen that backed down on her agreements. So the continuation of the 10th crusade, along with the next few crusades at that will consider Callow to be evil.

But the problem is that it's demonic power, and they have many priests there to deal with it, so while it certainly would create a big distraction it wouldn't necessarily change much.

But again, the real problem is that she swore not to do so, breaking that promise would create a story about how the villain broke their promise and they are basically done for.

But again again, she's Fae now. Fae cannot break their promises, just look at her trying to reach for alcohol and her hand wouldn't even move. She cannot break the promise of not using demons.

But again again again, she's Catherine Foundling. She wouldn't unleash demonic essence in Callow even at the worst of time, she'd rather go with the Wildfire protocol and force them to retreat if they want their country to remain standing by the time the crusade is over with. And she absolutely wouldn't do that, she'd rather surrender and exile herself.

Darkening

Well, that meeting went about as well as I expected it to. Interesting that the Pilgrim didn't say anything. I guess he knew there wasn't much point. Loved the bit between Cat and Saint. Kinda wish we could see a fight between Ranger and Saint now, bet it'd be a hell of a show.

Mike E.

Darkening...would be a helluva fight, but I'd feel bad for all the civilians within a 5-mile radius who suddenly had a drop in life expectancy. Recall that Captain and Black simply sparring without holding back on their Name strength nearly leveled some nobles castle.

DroughtBringer

Fun chapter!
Even though we hardly saw Pilgrim do anything I'm still liking him.

Go vote for the guide!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

taborask

Hey, we're beating Ward for the first time ever!

Morgenstern

It's not the first time, happend a few times before.

DroughtBringer

The first time it happened the comments on the Ward chapter were people freaking out.

ParadoxicalThought

I just love when Cat gets snarky. And apparently she likes it too!

"Shit. Now I kind of liked her. I'd probably feel a least a little bad about putting her head on a pike down the line."

Joel

Damn, Cat, do you think maybe we could try to not to piss off the person who's very being revolves around cutting things? That Ranger comparison was vicious.

stevenneiman

I think part of Cat's story is bluntly telling people what they don't want to admit. Not only did she do that, she made the person who was supposed to be able to take her down look like a conceited, unsympathetic bully and not even an impressive one. That gives her a major advantage, as does the fact that the Saint might have been dumb enough to give her a Pattern of Three. The Pattern would be pretty weak since Cat did accomplish more of her objective than the Saint did, but the Saint did still "win" the fight.

Jonnnney

There is strength to be gained from having a rival much stronger than you. Stories are more entertaining when rivals are similar in strength. I still think a decent amount of Catherine's early strength came from Heiress declaring Squire to be her rival.

Gunslinger

Only Cat told Black that Akua was never her rival as her story didn't involve Callow

Jonnnnz

Cat already has her rival. Gods, demons, all the armies in creation.

ethericsentinel

Pretty sure that if anyone is the fated rival of the gods it's Anaraxes.

Dragnor425

Yay

Yotz

Indeed.

burdi

this is almost feels like when cat fought againts summer

Big Brother

Princess Malaza is now my second favorite part of the Crusade, just behind the Pilgrim. She's got the stones to sass Cat, and I feel like she's gonna find her way into some peace talks with Cat in the near future.

IDKWhoitis

I give it 50/50 odds she's taken prisoner in the following battle or she's there to replace Amadis after this battle concludes.

Orçun Sevinç

Malanza seems like the only one on that sorry lot that call defeat for what it is, close shop & head back home.

Matthew

She does need a counter to Saint and Grey Pilgrim.

IDKWhoitis

I'm sensing Ranger shows up for a good skirmish with the Sword Saint, like old times.

Or alternatively, lures them into Acadia, kites them to a different place, then back into creation. Afterwards she disappears back into Acadia. Heroes won't be able to jump out of Acadia if they are already back in Creation, just in the wrong place to participate in the battle or into a trap.

stevenneiman

Nah, those kinds of delaying tactics always end up running out at just the wrong time. It wasn't trapping the Saint of Swords in Arcadia that was risky so much as if was trying to keep her out of the way.

As a sidenote, I get a sense that she's not nearly as powerful as Ranger. She might use similar techniques, ripping apart reality to augment mostly melee combat skills, but Cat managed to escape her with only a minor wound to her power when the Saint was (as far as I can tell) genuinely trying to kill her. Also, the Ranger has existed for multiple natural lifetimes using an Aspect that ensures that she comes out of every battle that even came close to challenging her stronger, while the Saint has had at most 80-90 years of training under her belt and may or may not have had a growth Aspect.

taborask

It's hard to say. Cat also landed absolutely zero real hits on the Saint that whole fight, and had to get her ass kicked. There's no way to know the limitations of the Saint's domain, it might make her almost literally unbeatable

Yotz

I'd wager with Ranger you can beat her – theoretically, mind you – if you somehow manage to kill her faster than she kills you – which in itself is a feat of mythical proportions; while with the Saint you may not even bother – she's near completely immune to anything you can throw at her, and that before the Hashmallim on her shoulder. She may not be that deadly in short time span, but she just never stops, and there nothing you can do put her down – short of several Demon incursions, probably. How can I put this... Ranger is a 4/1 First Strike, while Saint is 1/4 Indestructible.

---

Remember that the way Laurence recognized Ranger's fighting style was taking a crippling wound to avoid a lethal one, it's quite possible she's the stronger one of the two in the terms of maximal possible power put into one swing.

stevenneiman

Ranger's Aspects are as far as I can tell the most powerful you could possibly get. Transcend allows her to survive things that should be impossible even for her (meaning you pretty much can't beat her on the first attack like you're saying), and Learn and Perfect together mean that any technique which doesn't kill her on the first use (which is all of them, again thanks to Transcend) she's just going to throw back at you better than you could do it yourself.

While the Saint's internal domain Aspect might grant her a lot of cool immunities and a shortcut to a similar kind of power to what Ranger has from sheer will, she's blowing an Aspect slot on that while Ranger gets it just by virtue of age, training, and will. And we haven't seen anything showing that the Saint of Swords is actually any tougher than Ranger, all we know is that Ranger likes to avoid attacks and that the Saint can block mental or spiritual intrusions by turning her soul into a sword. Given Ranger's personality, I wouldn't be surprised if she evades more for the challenge of turning life into a no-hit run than because she actually needs to for her own safety.

Both of them also seem to lack either the skill or possibly the motivation for storycrafting, though this might just be because they both have established stories they've never seen the need to change. Ranger is an incredible figure who can accomplish anything but can't be controlled enough to do anything reliable, but who can be used as a storytelling tool any time you write yourself into a corner, and Saint is the mighty cavalry where any trouble the protagonists have is because she's either busy elsewhere or is consciously leaving them to fend for themselves.

Drd

Ranger is half elf. I can't remember exactly how old she is but it's over 100yrs, though she could be a lot older.

daniel young

Pretty sure we had a chapter about her remembering stuff from a millennia ago at one point.

stevenneiman

I have to say, of all the questions I have about what's going to happen the biggest is what the Grey Pilgrim can do. I'm sure it's going to be ridiculously impressive just like the Saint, but I suspect that it's going to be a lot more different from the Saint than the Saint is from the Ranger.

sengachi

They Grey Pilgrim seems less like a super heavy hitter and more like the guy who comes riding over the ridge with the Rohirim at the exact right moment with a staff full of light to blind your flank.

Which isn't to say he can't throw down, I'll bet you he could take a Balrog if he had to. That's just not his purpose in war I don't think.

ALKATYN

Since he seems to be the equivalent of a high level priest I'd guess something like mass healing, inspiration, dispelling evil magics. But its always possible for there to be a subversion

soonnanandnaanssoon

From what I've gathered he's most likely a warrior monk/priest kinda hero. He's Levantine, and the Sage who was also from Levant from Ranger's side story was a melee monk type. His simple grey robes give off the priest kinda vibe so I'm guessing OP melee & healing abilities.

DroughtBringer

Grey Pilgrim was one of Gandalf's names, specifically his name in Elvish.

TeK

Gandalf reference is such a red herring.

Hammerman

Oh I expect at least a you shall not pass, if not a demon battle with a grey becomes white after he returns from dragging the demon out of creation into hell.

stevenneiman

Typo thread:

"I'd not forgotten the lecture {someone} had given me" I don't remember who told her about this

"Most {of} their armies were levies"

"Vulnerable to shock tactics, [why->which] was why Procerans tended to put such an emphasis on light cavalry"

"Peasants with shitty spears tended run when a wedge of glittering {steel} charged at them"

"but in [skirmished->skirmishes] like that numbers often carried the day"

"I was astride Zombie while [the->she?] stood by her command table"

"wicked easy smile that belonged more on {a} Laure tavern girl than foreign royalty."

"[It->Is] this the part," I mused, "where I'm supposed to be thankful about you trying to make me your marcher lord at the frontier with Praes?"

"I used to answer to a woman who uses a fucking demon as a gatekeeper {and} has an entire hallway of forever screaming heads. Your notion is {less} bad [is-than] her starting point.""

ALKATYN

Peasants with shitty spears tended run when a wedge of *glittering* charged at them.

Juniper had raised crossbow companies when forging the Army of Callow, but in *skirmished* like that numbers often carried the day and those wouldn't be on our side.

It didn't make any more pleasant to stew in the sun while the crusaders lumbered towards our battle.

Your notion *is* bad is her starting point."

Within the hour, skirmishes on both sides advanced.

taborask

I don't think he reads these. Looking back through old chapters, all the typo's are still there

lennymaster

Eratica properly waites for puplishing. Not much use in correcting mistakes now when he can just wait for an editor he properly has to use one way or another to do it for him.
Also it is properly an incentive to buy the books.

Barthumphries

For those like me who post the typos we find (that weren't already published), seeing typos that don't get fixed is a disincentive to buy the books.

Barthumphries

We'd waited for the crusader here for a day Change "crusader" to "crusade" about you trying to make me your marcher lord at the frontier with Praes?

Change "marcher" to "march"? I'm not sure, but I don't think this is the correct term.

Euodiachloris

Marcher lords are lords of the Marches – border areas. It's traditionally used for the Scotland-Northumbria and the Wales-England borders.

In short, patches of land that regularly change hands between countriess and which are heavily fortified with a plethora of watchtowers, bastle houses and keeps, all meaning that they play host to many petty lords to look after all stonework and pay to keep eyes watching and watchfires ready and waiting.

Barthumphries

Shouldn't she be a Marquess, Marchess, Marquis or something?
Hunh, after checking wikipedia, apparently Marcher was a Welsh title: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Welsh\_Marches

Amoonymous

Got some grammar suggestions (suggestions in [brackets]):
"Peasants with shitty spears tended [to] run when a wedge of glittering [cavalry?] charged at them."

"...but in skirmishe[s] like that..."

"The other – Princess Rozala Ma[]llanza...that belonged more on [a] Laure tavern girl..." (originally "Manlanza")

I'd also recommend "you've already made your[selves] at home" over "yourself" as she's speaking with multiple people, but I could see arguments against that.

" "[Is] this the part," I mused..."

This is one I'm unsure of but believe should be correct:
"...and there'll be a[n] 'I shouldn't have...'"

"demon as a gatekeeper [and] has an entire hallway of forever..
Your notion [of] bad is her starting point."

"So when I sen[d] your head on a pike back to Salia..."

Mostly small typos.

Thanks for the chapter!

Soronel Haetir

Hi-ho, hi-ho
a killing we will go,
with swords and staves and hand grenades,
hi-ho, hi-ho, hi-ho!

Highwayman

"... I won't be getting anywhere near you without a company of mages and half a dozen balistas."

This. This is so refreshing. Even after all she's accomplished, after every thing (Fae, demons, other Named...) she has put her sword through, Cat still has the humility (though snarky, but it makes me love it even more) to outright admit irwhen she loses, even to a hostile party.

Stop writing Cat so well, EE. You only make it hurt me more when something happens to Cat T_T

NZPIEFACE

Man, Saint really doesn't get it.

*ahd*

The Saint of Swords? She can't imagine a world in which beating the Black Queen like a rented mule and then using up Callow to fuel Milenan's ambitions isn't the right and just and proper thing to do. Because! Crusade!

Apart from that, I like her.

Engineer

When phrased like that her stupidity is painfully clear. Damn. She really is a thug.

danh3107

She's a decently likeable thug

Engineer

... Fair enough.

*ahd*

Thug is an acceptable lifestyle choice, it's all about who you beat down and why.

Given the Angel of Feasting On Your Entrails speech, and that "let's spare everybody the battle and I kill you here" offer, there's a small but not zero possibility that with enough evidence, the Saint could be persuaded that going around Callow is the right and just and proper thing to do.

If at that point Malicia has fallen from power and Ranger (is still alive and) decides Black is worth rescuing, we may just get that Saint of Swords vs Ranger death match.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Only now is the time for Cat to balance out all the hero's with a new winter court.

WuseMajor

She didn't seem particularly happy about using this war to fuel Milenan's ambitions, honestly. I suspect she's mainly here to kill Cat and then destroy the Evil Empire and the only reason she's with this army instead of cutting a friggen Eight Lane Highway through Callow into Praes, with a slight detour to murder Cat and destroy her castle, is because she knows that someone would get a lucky shot in before she made it.

So, yes, I agree she's a thug with Heavenly Backing but she's not entirely stupid.

Jonnnney

Yeah, she is here because of the crusade and to prevent the Praesi Super weapon from ever being rebuilt. She doesn't care in the slightest about the lives, let alone ambitions, of the princes of procer

grzecho2222

I disagree, she acts like total moron here. Pilgrim said it. The Weapon isn't the only problem for Good. Praes has been doing this for ages and with current problems won't make another one soon. Callow turning Evil is much more of a threat. But Cat being queen isn't the cause of it. Fact that Callow has been protecting west from Praes and only getting stabbed in the back and laughed at for it is the main reason. They got conquered by their worst enemies and gotten no help for the rest of Good. Procer started rebellion with madman that killed a lot of innocent people (civilians and people of mixed marriages) and tried to brainwash entire city. They got invaded by another dimension and madwoman of mitological scale. And whole this time they got help from this one orphan girl, who literally fought demons, angels, devils, undead and gods for their sake, one that spent most of her time making them safe and helping victims of war. And now when finnaly they had fixed most of problems and stabilized the land, that moment Good is invading THEM and not even to attack real evil people in Praes, but to kill one person that saved them and to divide Callow among hated Procer Princes. Said girl also made peace with local Hero and is protecting people from stupid nobles. Now think what will happen if their queen goes to talk to negotiating party and ends up misteriously dead.

grzecho2222

Also no small part of their knights power comes from being good. What chances are that their "Prayer turned armor" will work against Heroes and priests? Now where they can get another source of empowerment with all of this Legion mages on their side? Broken Bells becoming order of Dark Knights?

Yotz

Harbingers of evil, henchmen of the Black Queen, warriors of corruption, men and women of honor!

NZPIEFACE

No, I mean, she doesn't get that most villains don't really like getting their asses handed to them.

Anon

Hmm....well, if I had to guess, the 'Cat makes named aspects into items' will come into play somehow, otherwise, I don't see much room for her to stall the 12 Named off – especially considering how devastating Saint will be on offense, and Pilgrim on defense healing all of the wounds the 'good guys' take.

Otherwise, starving out the Procer army is a good thing, but unlikely to last long enough to not have the other side start razing – it's either that, or they push for a decisive victory within a few days.

Curious to see if Melanza makes it out alive – it's called the princes' graveyard – plural, not singular, but someone's gotta keep alive to bring Hasenbach to the table without making Cat look like a crazy evil murderer type.

But then that gets back to the Pilgrim and the Saint – I don't see Ranger interfering on Cat's behalf, and Saint has already been shown to trump Winter once. Cat could try to strand the Saint in Creation somewhere with a gate, but that risks backfiring, as has been already stated.

Otherwise, it's....bringing a shitton of spikers with her, I guess?

In any case, curious to see how the thinning of Winter's mantle will affect Cat's judgement now, once the battle gets underway.

burdi

The saint had beat cat like rented mule before, but she doesnt seems to overly afraid of her so i bet cat has plan on how to beat the saint

sengachi

Oh shit. Put in that context sending unnamed Named up against Cat really just feels like giving her ammunition (literally) to use against the big Named.

Morgenstern

Remember the clause about not raiding Callow....? 🤔

---

Procerans are making camp, and the army of Callow has been digging in for some time, so it's probably the Battle of Camps, not Princes' Graveyard. Also, Catherine mentioned having to reveal absolute positioning, which is a shared attack for her and Masego, while the artifacts are probably already known to the heroes, since Catherine herself let it slip in the fight with the Saint of Swords.

Engineer

I do not believe Catherine is outnumbered in terms of Named. Remember, heroes have been getting their asses kicked and their souls "claimed" for the better part of a year by her. I bet the Dead Company will feature soon....

sheer_falacy

Using the trapped souls of dead heroes is exactly the sort of villainous scheme that always backfires, though. It's gonna be a hard line to walk.

d_o_l

Not necessarily. If that were her master plan, it would be guaranteed to backfire. As long as it's just a ploy in her larger plan, it's much more likely to work.

Naeddyr

Then it falls under the "the magical weapon will find a way to betray you at the worst possible moment" teaching from Black. There really is no way for Cat to use the bound souls of Heroes in a traditional way without it backfiring spectacularly. Fuck, the best I can think of is to make them artifacts of Functionally Good: things like shields that shield civilian cities, swords that kill in self-defense, reverse mythology.

nerferf

There might be no dead company after all, We were shown that she is able to make artifacts out of aspects so she may just have an stockpile of random things

I mean that makes more sense given cat isn't willing to use undead willy nilly given the lines that would be crossed and how much harder to get them to give up it would make them

nipi

Typo:
"why was why Procerans"

nipi

"Legion crossbowmen tended to shoot further and stronger than any archer not using longbows"

Must be a heavy crossbow then. The way I understood it crossbow bolts tend to get wobbly at greater ranges due to their short length. So they loose a lot of penetration at greater ranges.

Onono

Longbows in war are normally heavy/war crossbows, only trained yeomen are capable of drawing these. They are so heavy on the draw that they cannot be accurately aimed, but provide volley fire superior to any other propellantless ranged weapon.

Not comparable with normal bows or normal longbows, which allow target shooting.

Miles

I have a bad feeling that the heroes are going to free Akua with how much Cat is taunting them about that soul

Author Unknown

Saint seems a bit too cocky. Sure she beat Cat when the fought, but... She is the Saint of Sword: if she couldn't come out ahead when crossing blades with a transitory Named only a few years old, she wouldn't have lived this long.

Thing is, shes spent all of her decades roaming around an area considered to be a magical backwater. I don't think she is as ready to face the kind of magic Cat is bringing to the table as she thinks she is. She undoubtedly has a number of tricks up her sleeve, but I think this ends with her strapped to a table while Hierophant figures out how her domain works and/or Cat gets a new sword.

beleester

The Saint managed to cut a *domain* in half. She managed to cut a hole in the sky, then wield it as a sword. She's not just a swordswoman, she fights on a conceptual level, like something out of Fate/Stay Night. I wouldn't be surprised to see her parry Hierophant's spells, cut her way out of wards, or maybe cut one of Warlock's meteors in half.

In general, don't underestimate "master of one" heroes. They tend to be creative enough to apply their one trick in places where you wouldn't think it possible.

Snowfire1224

I think it said that she supposedly cut through magic, so that might not be a good idea.

Walter

If I was Saint I'd mostly be worried about Ranger showing up to attack her. The Woe don't seem like they pose a threat to her as long as her gang of heroes outnumber them.

Author Unknown

People keep speculating that Ranger will show up, but Ranger isn't on Cat's side. She is on her own side. She doesn't care about Cat, Callow, or the Empire. Just Black. And maybe the rest of the Calamities.

Moreover, this is the same ranger that walked Arcadia every year to pluck out an eye for jewelry. If she wanted to fight the Saint of Swords she has no reason, nor inclination, to wait until Callow was attacked. It isn't like the Saint is as hard to pin down as the Queen of Summer.

Antony444

Loved this chapter, we always knew the propositions of surrender from both sides were going to be rejected, but it was extremely funny Cat insult the Procerans and the Heroes...

The Saint of Swords is a badass, but she didn't display a lot of intelligence in this parley. Of course Cat was going to refuse a duel with her. Accepting would have been a death sentence for the Queen of Callow, given how the Heavens have the habit to always screw things in their favour.

The great battle is about to begin, but while the Light has a huge numerical advantage, they must win quickly or they will die. I suppose the first skirmishes are going to show how bad an idea it was to go after Cat instead of protecting the experienced officers. Heroes can rally the men, but they are not necessary tacticians and strategists of the highest order.

Prince Amadis will not survive this battle, it seems a certainty now. Likes Malanza banter, let's hope she survives the battle to come...

don

Hey, in case y'all forgot, the Dead King made noises like he's ready to play...

I'm guessing that a deus ex mortis will be the reason Sword Grannie pulls back from Callow. To be honest it's the only thing I see working, unless she somehow gets in the way of an unrelenting storm of ballista bolts and her sword arm gets tired.

I really hope Erratic breaks down and fixes some of these typos instead of ignoring them. Usually I don't mind but they're bad enough to be immersion-breaking here. I recently re-read the story, and I was able to overlook most all of the other chapter's typos, but damn are they bad here... well whatever. Great story either way.

sengachi

I think I'm starting to understand Cat's strategy better. Which is kind of stupid of me really, Black's told us a dozen times how you fight heroes.

With heroes who are your equals you never get to pull the ultimate tactical reversal on them. Or execute that perfect strategy. If a single point of action means their destruction or your victory they **will** fuck it up. Fighting heroes isn't about landing the perfect knockout punch, not unless you've gotten pulled into some nemesis deathmatch (and that's a bad place to be). It's not even about exhausting them until can't fight anymore, because they will be given a divine second wind at the worst possible moment for you.

No, to fight heroes you need to win small victories. Things which add up, and add up, and add up. Nothing which individually earns them a narrative comeback or underdog bonus. Nothing that the gods could possibly justify interfering in without ruining the whole game. Just small victories which are **earned**. So that when the final fight comes, they heroes have lost before they've ever reached the battlefield. So that there is nothing short of direct divine intervention which can save them, because everything that could be done was decided months ago, during each of your small victories.

And that's what Cat's been doing.

Target their officers. Not their high leadership who are irreplaceable, or their Named who are so individually important. Just their officers. People whose military expertise and leadership will be sorely missed by Procer but whose lack isn't enough to end the game.

Target their supplies. Not enough to starve them outright, that would be countered. But enough to force them to a fight of your choosing and preparation. The gods won't shut **that** down.

Take angels off the table early, so that when the end comes and only divine intervention will save the heroes ... divine intervention is already off the table.

And I'll bet absolute positioning is something in that spirit. Not some all-destroying weapon. That would break too many rules of fighting heroes. But something that will **hurt** Procer in a way that's *earned*. Something that will allow Cat to disengage or force Procer to pull back. Not a game ender, but another solid, earned victory that eats away at the heroes' ability to win.

Draeysine

I agree. Absolute positioning sounds like something that can do many small changes that add up in a battle. I'm thinking small gates that move people around to a different side of the field. With Hierophant targeting with the observatory and Cat fueling it, sounds possible.?

Yotz

Speaking of small changes. How about opening several hundred thousands of very small gates inside people skulls sounds for you? Or we can go for their bowels and drink their suffering like a fine wine! ...Well, like a beer swill in this case, but you catch my flu, I suppose.

I know that would be against all that "we must win but not MURDERIZE them", but quite a notion to entertain, n'est-ce pa?

Honestly, the ability to open portals on a whim opens so much options it's not even funny.

How about opening a gate to Arcadia, stockpiling ammo, molten lead, Very Big Rocks, whatever on the Fae side, then opening gate from Arcadia to the battlefield – but, say, a mile above it, and just drop the stockpiled crap down? Or just repeating the trick Cat used in the Prologue to create temporary one volley killzones? Or opening Gates horisontally under the feet of enemy solders, dropping them somewhere unpleasant – like a lake of pure HATRED in some Lords forsaken part of Arcadia? Buck me sideways – I feel stupid just by suggesting such obvious implications, and dread something a person of true ingenuity can invent...

Adurna

How does your GM keep up with you? -.-'

Fun ideas though, if likely not possible on such a scale and of limited value against experienced heroes.

taliesinskye

Most of those portal ideas wouldn't work because the portals open to the same place and position on the other side. If you wanted to dump rocks on the enemy's head through a portal you'd need to be standing a thousand feet in the air when you opened the portal, and get the rocks up there somehow. Open a portal straight downward and you just find yourself standing on fae grass, not over wherever in faerie you want at whatever altitude.

Yotz

I seem to remember there is a Hellgate that opens several dozens of feet above the ground on the Hell side. So you can stand on the ground, push someone through, and that someone will fall from on high on the other side, being unable to go back.

What exist, can be replicated, I posit.

And yes, this comment being written after the Grand Reveal of what Absolute Positioning truly is.

John Smith

Lot more mistakes in this chapter than usual. Missing words, etc. It was nice to see Catherine shut Saint down, though.

Decius

There's a good opportunity to promise food and either safe return passage or Callowan citizenship to any deserter. The loss of their food supplies can't be easy to hide.

If the "good guys" start threatening to kill deserters their morale drops significantly; if they appeal to the Crusade they become more vulnerable to pointing out the political forces in play, and if they accept the desertions they lose the war.

Bookworm

I was thinking about how she can possibly defeat an army like this without killing everybody using some dastardly ploy, and realized that she has already done it. The supplies are gone, they are, or will be, desperate for food. All she has to do is slow them down enough that they cannot get to Hedges in time to resupply through pillage. Force an engagement, then retreat probably via gate, harass, make it impossible for the opposing army to march at any appreciable speed. Hit and run tactics to win the day. Unless, of course, the story behind the invasion demands a pitched battle. This is my Evil-lite option.

Alternatively, there is a Neutral option. With Thief able to Steal large amounts of goods at once (like a walking, talking Inventory bag), I was wondering why she didn't just threaten to remove the supplies from Hedges if they march on it. They will be forced to fold and retreat because they cannot feed their army and any civilians they "liberate", and Thief can just restore the food supplies after Hedges is no longer threatened. The threat alone makes continued invasion along their present axis untenable, to be kind. Now would have been the ideal time to threaten such action (although I would have threatened more along the lines of fire to mislead about the use of Thief). Of course, this option requires the opposing side not to be complete imbeciles and understand the impossibility of successfully leading a starving army.

There you have it. Two possible ways to stop this axis of advance with minimal bloodshed, the latter method being the more humane method. Of course, I am almost positive that neither option will be used, but hey, it's always fun to postulate what you would do in a similar situation.

Bonus thought: it is still possible to do both. Give a bloody nose to suss out any trump cards, make them feel the lack of food more acutely, then offer another truce talk asking them to pretty please leave or we take all the food away. Minus you, Prince Amadis. Your head is going on a pike either way. Hopefully during battle so Good doesn't have to sacrifice their morals for the lives of their people. Yay, I like this one.

DroughtBringer

My big fear of just using starvation as a tactic is of a possible miracle, like Jesus with the Bread and the Fish (https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Feeding\_the\_multitude) or a similar story of finding food for a large amount of people.

BarthHumphries

Entirely possible. This is a Crusade, after all.

editor

"Your notion is bad is her starting point."
Should be "notion of bad"

Jonathan Rodriguez

The dialogue here was so amusing. Loved it. Catherine is such a well-written badass.

---

Chapter 14: Arabesque

"So spoke His Dread Majesty in the wake of battle, even as the High Lords praised him: 'Speak not flattering untruths. Another such victory and I will rule an empire of ghosts.'"

– Extract from ‘Commentaries on the Campaigns of Dread Emperor Terribilis the Second’

It began.

When Juniper had sent our skirmishers out, we’d been able to scrape together four thousand including the Watch. Crossbowmen, human and goblins, with one thousand deadly Deoraithe longbowmen at the back – when the enemy began returning fire, these were the ones I wanted the lightest casualties for. They were too useful and too few to waste on opening exchanges. Malanza sent forward nine fucking thousand men, and we were pretty sure that wasn’t even all she could field. The opposition apparently had much the same thought as we’d had, because the first wave to come in longbow range wasn’t principality troops: it was levies. I sucked in a breath, eyes making them out perfectly regardless of distance. Men too old and too young, with hunting bows instead of the kind of weapons a battlefield required. Some even had slings, which Juniper noted out loud some Arlesite principalities were known for. The Watch nocked, drew and fired without a word. At least a hundred levies died in the first mass volley as the Proceran skirmishers advanced, closing range. Conscripted peasants taking arrows so that the personal forces of princes would not. The sight of it had me gritting my teeth.

“It’s sound tactics, no matter how much you glare,” Juniper said. “Gets the people who can properly return fire in range without losses.”

“I know,” I said, fingers clenching. “I know it is.”

But how many kids and greybeards who’d just died had actually wanted to be on this field? I couldn’t know for sure, but Principate rulers had full right of conscription as their Gods-given birth right. They didn’t even to justify it, not like nobles had in the Old Kingdom – where only foreign invasion had granted that temporary privilege to aristocrats. The sickening thing was that many of them probably did want to be there. Because priests and princes had told them this was a holy war instead of Hasenbach trying to kill two problems with one stone or Amadis and his cronies making a play for the throne. I wasn’t so much a hypocrite as to damn them for it. I was well aware that the main reason my own army fielded only enlisted was that I’d had neither the funds nor equipment to raise and keep the amount of soldiers a general conscription would have brought. My fingers remained clenched anyway. Making decisions where part of my forces were openly deemed more expendable than others hadn’t grown any more pleasant with time, that unspoken admission that some lives were worth more than others.

“More kids than I’d thought,” my Marshal said after a moment, eyeing the enemy through a scrying bowl. “That’s interesting. Either she’s sounding out whether we’ll flinch at killing those, or they came closer than we thought to scraping the bottom of the barrel."

"Hasenbach's problem is a surplus of fantassins, not a lack," I said.

"These aren't fantassins, Catherine, they're levies," the Hellhound said. "Those boys we're putting holes in look like they should be working fields and trades, not fighting in a war."

I frowned.

"You think they're having manpower issues?" I sceptically said. "So far, between the three armies, they're fielding about one hundred and twenty thousand men. Their population can take that. We know that for a fact, you've read the same reports I have."

"On parchment, maybe," Juniper grunted. "But looking at them now I have to wonder. The civil war hurt the south pretty bad and they didn't even have a full decade to recover. The north was spared, but it has to keep soldiers on the walls to deal with the ratlings. We might need to consider the possibility that Hasenbach didn't forge her Grand Alliance just to keep her borders secure. That she might have needed the troops as well, and that if she loses enough soldiers some parts of Procer will collapse."

My reflex was to disagree, but I forced myself to stop and think. There was some sense in that. The First Prince's issue with fantassins was that she had several armies' worth of them floating around without a war to fight or skills to ply in peace time. I'd taken that as meaning she had manpower to toss into the flames, but that was not necessarily be true. It might not be a surplus of people so much as surplus of the wrong kind of people. If Juniper was right and killing levies meant scything through the same men and women who should be keeping Procer functioning... Well, there was a chance that down the line principalities would have bow out of the crusade because they literally could not afford more losses. Which was a mixed blessing. Parts of the Principate withdrawing would ease off the pressure on Callow, but it might also lead to internal instability in Procer itself. Which, in some ways, would be helpful. Procer, if eating at itself, wasn't mucking around in my homeland. But it also gave Black and Malicia a much freer hand, which was almost as dangerous. And if the instability takes Hasenbach off the throne... Honestly, I wasn't fundamentally opposed to that. The chances of the next First Prince or Princess being as dangerous as Cordelia Hasenbach were fairly slim. On the other hand, I knew Hasenbach. I'd made a study of her, we had a personal relationship. Whoever replaced her would be an unknown and that carried risks.

There were already too many of those in this war, and wind picking up a third of the way through the tightrope was bad news all around.

While I'd been wrestling with the thoughts, the skirmish had turned bloody. We had range and rate of fire on the enemy, but they outnumbered my people by more than twice over. The first half hour was a one-sided massacre. Between the Watch and the crank crossbows, we carved a red swath through the levies. But then the professional soldiers of the the enemy got in range to shoot back, and I stirred uneasily atop Zombie when I saw wooden shafts begin raining down. Goblins were a smaller target than humans and my men were spread out loosely according to Legion doctrine, while the enemy remained in tight packs. That helped some, keeping the exchange of lives at about parity even with the lopsided numbers. The hard truth, though, was that Malazanza could afford to trade her entire skirmishing contingent for mine and walk away with a strategic victory.

"Juniper," I said.

"Another two volleys, Foundling," the Hellhound said.

"We're barely denting the principality troops," I sharply replied.

"Levies we kill now aren't covering the first wave against our palisades," the Marshal of Callow replied. "It's a worthwhile trade."

Another two volleys, like she had said, and then the horns sounded the retreat. The Watch, I saw, had not lost so much as a single man. When the enemy had advanced, they'd retreated equally and kept killing all the while without missing a beat. If Ratface's discreet following of Deoraithe spending over the last year had not made it clear how ridiculously expensive training and arming them was, I would have been livid with envy. As it was, I was merely very jealous. The enemy skirmishers had little stomach for pursuit. They'd killed and wounded nearly a thousand of my crossbowmen, but at three times the cost – and most of those dead, not just bleeding. Juniper's order to withdraw was coming just ahead of the point in the cold lay of arithmetic where the skirmish would become costlier than it was useful.

"Marshal," one of her aides spoke up. "Enemy cavalry is moving."

My eyes flicked to the side. Malanza had been traditional in the arraignment of her forces. Three thick waves of infantry in the centre, with four thousand cavalry on each side and another four thousand in reserve at the back with what looked like a few thousand principality troops. A hard-hitting reserve that she could pour into whatever breach her foot managed to make. The cavalry contingents on both sides were on the move, though.

Riding ahead of the crusader host, converging on my skirmishers from the flanks. Only at a trot for now, but when they got close enough they'd charge.

"Probe?" I asked the Hellhound.

"If they don't hurry the fuck up, our soldiers are back well within siege range before the horse gets anywhere close," Juniper said. "That'd be... costly, for her. They might be trying to bait out the Broken Bells."

"Talbot could hit one of the flanks hard and withdraw before her foot gets there, or even the other cavalry wing," I noted. "This seems like..."

Trumpets sounded from the other side, and after a few moments of milling around the enemy skirmishers began to pursue.

"That's," I began, but closed my mouth.

What the Hells was Malanza up to? She had to know that if her archers got in killing range of our trebuchets and ballistas it'd be a godsdamned massacre. Even if her cavalry hit at the same time. We'd lose crossbowmen, sure, but a heavy formation of advancing enemies would be a sapper's wet dream. And she'd lose twice as many soldiers when her people broke and fled, especially if the Broken Bells sallied to hit them on the way out.

"Juniper?" I tried.

The orc did not respond. She'd gone utterly still, eyes fixed on the approaching enemy. She barely even breathed or blinked.

"Her infantry isn't moving," Juniper said.

"I can see that," I replied flatly.

The meat of Princess Malanza's infantry had yet to move, still standing in the distance.

"Her infantry isn't moving," the Hellhound slowly said, "because it doesn't need to."

Which made no sense to me. Not with the forces the enemy had set in motion. Cavalry and skirmishers, this close to our engines?

"Full retreat," Juniper barked at the closest horn blower. "Break formation."

The officer blinked, then sounded the calls. I did not know the orc's reasons yet, but I did know better than to gainsay her instincts when it came to battle. The crossbowmen scattered and legged it as the Watch ceased firing and put their supernatural swiftness to full work. What was the play here? Already the Deoraithe were in siege range, and the goblins among the crossbowmen weren't that far behind. The greenskins could scuttle quick as spiders no matter the terrain. It's not about the forces, then, I decided. They still matter, but only as part of a larger tactic. Something was missing, and that thought was a familiar one. Juniper and I both had it before, when wondering why Rozala Malanza would try to take her army through a narrow passage my men could hold the end of. And the conclusion, I remembered as my blood ran cold, was that she'd had something up her sleeve we didn't know about.

Three heartbeats later we learned.

From the beginning, we'd dismissed the notion that the crusaders would use their priests the same way we did mages, for sorcerous artillery and shock tactics. Brother and sisters of the House of Light were not supposed to take the lives of others. We'd theorized there would be some willing to break those vows, and that they would be a threat to deal with. But aside from this, we'd believed the priests would be a purely defensive and support asset. Our failure, Rozala Malanza taught us, had been one of imagination. Ahead of the retreating Watch, panes of light bloomed. At least forty feet tall, though thin. A fence, I realized. They are fencing them in. Pane after pane formed, boxing in our retreating skirmishers in the span of time it'd take me to light a pipe. An opening was left, at the back. Where the enemy bowmen paused and put their formation in order, as on both sides of them the Proceran cavalry began to charge.

"Tell Pickler to fire at will," Juniper barked at the closest mage.

The message passed and the twenty heavy ballistas fired their stones. The first volley hit the fence at a high angle, and the stones broke without even visibly affecting it. The trebuchets threw their load in the moment that followed, arcing high over the fence straight at the enemy archers. They never reached the crusaders. More fences formed over their heads. Some rocks shattered, others bounced off. The broken remnants remained on the light, as if it were a physical thing. I gestured for another mage to attend me.

"Get me Hierophant," I said.

The rectangular silver mirror in the man's hands shivered after he got out his incantation, revealing Masego's face. He was currently with the mage lines, and already I regretted not having him at my side.

"Hierophant," I said. "You see the fences?"

"Miracle work," he said. "Interesting use of priestly powers."

"Shut them down," I said. "Now."

He nodded, and after a shiver all the mirror showed was my own reflection. My fingers clenched as I watched the first volley from the Proceran bowmen hit my skirmishers, all on the left wing. They're concentrating their volleys, I thought. Annihilation tactics. They did not intend to leave any survivors. My soldiers returned a ragged volley of their own, save for the Watch. Throwing hooks above the fences, the Deoraithe found physical purchase and began to climb. I had hope, for a moment. Until the fences above the Proceran archers angled to drop the remaining stones harmlessly in front of the crusaders and disappeared. They shortly after reappeared above the fences keeping my skirmishers boxed in, cutting cleanly through ropes and hooks. Fuck. The colder, calm part of me noted that they'd had to dismiss some fences to add them elsewhere. That implied there was a limited amount they could make. Commanded by Masego, my mage lines gave answer. Seven massive spears of lightning began to form above our fortifications, strengthening with every heartbeat.

"Pickler," Juniper growled behind me, standing in front of a scrying bowl. "I want continuous fire on those archers. Don't stop even if it doesn't go through."

On the other side of the field, sorcery flared up.

Hierophant had torn through their mages for two days before they stopped trying to scry, and it has cost them at least twenty practitioners. They had easily ten times that many left, though, and Archer had confirmed at least one of the heroes looked wizardly. If it came to a sorcerous pissing match, I would still bet on my own men. They'd been taught rituals by Hierophant, and more than a third were both Praesi and Legion-trained. Procer was a magical backwater, if it came to trading blows they should come out on the losing side. Which was, I saw as the enemy sorcery took shape, why Malanza had ordered them to do nothing of the sort. Praesi magical shields tended to be translucent and tinged blue, when not entirely transparent. The Proceran equivalent was opaque and yellow. Four layers came down in front of the fences even as the spears of lightning shot out. My mages were better, as I had thought. All four layers broke under the screaming storm of lightning. But by the time the sorcery reached the fences it had been weakened enough they merely shuddered under the impact. Layered defence, the cold part of me noted. Clever. The rest of me bit my lip until it bled, as I realized the crusaders were just going to slug it out like this again and again until all my skirmishers were dead.

"Juniper," I called out, the orc turning to meet my gaze. "Broken Bells?"

She cursed virulently in Kharsum but nodded. The horns sent out our five thousand knights into the fray, palisades opening to let them stream out. Would it be enough? No, I already knew. It wouldn't. But it might lower the damage of this from disaster to wound. Talbot had his knights form into a wedge the moment they had the room, galloping out to the left to hit half the enemy cavalry even as Pickler's engines hammered the fences above the crusader archers repeatedly. They held anyways. I knew better than to get my hopes up, and my pessimism was rewarded when the forward sides of the fences keeping my skirmishers contained winked out. They reappeared in a long diagonal in front of the advancing Broken Bells and my fingers clenched once more. Not a single of the knights died, but the length of the fence was unbreakable and forced them to take the long way around. Keeping them away long enough that the enemy horse would reach my skirmishers unimpeded. With a mixture of grief and pride, I saw that my crossbowmen were in formation and returning fire. They took the losses from the enemy archers, ignoring them for a hard volley into the tip of both Proceran cavalry contingents. Horses fell and screamed, men went down. The charge continued. The remainder of the Watch split in half, heading for the edges of the fences on both sides.

Masego, I knew, would not take lightly that he had been thwarted even once. The lack of lightning spears forming in the sky to answer the yellow shields that had come down a second time heralded that he would have gotten... creative, and when my old friend unleashed his wrath he did methodically. A jagged shard of red light bloomed and struck the first shield. The yellow sorcery shattered, but the shard remained. Another shard formed, and struck the back of the first shard like a hammer on a chisel. The second shield broke. It was working, but too slow. The Watch was getting away but the Proceran cavalry hit my skirmishers and it was a massacre. They tore through the first three ranks like wet parchment before the momentum was even slightly slowed. Another shard formed and the third shield broke when it hit – and then the fourth shield as well, a heartbeat later. They were accumulating strength, I grasped. The light fence shuddered but held. In the handful of heartbeats before the fourth shard formed and hit, at least a thousand of my men died as I watched in silence. When the light finally broke it was too late for them to even run. The riders were already among them.

"Pickler," Juniper said quietly. "All ballistas are to fire into the cavalry. Keep the trebuchets on the the archers."

I opened my mouth, then closed it. The orc's face was grim as she met my gaze. The siege engines, we both knew, would kill our crossbowmen as well as the cavalry. But those men had been dead the moment the Proceran horse reached them, the cold part of me assessed. This way, at least, the ranks furthest back could be salvaged. The salvo pulped soldiers and horses alike when it hit.

Theirs and mine both. I felt wintry, vicious rage well up in my veins. For a moment I indulged the wind-like whispers and the poisonous comfort they brought, but then I dragged my mind back to clarity. Pickler managed another handful of hits on the enemy horse, but less than a hundred died from them. They were already retreating and cavalry was hard to hit with mostly static engines. Especially when fences bloomed to cover their retreat, as Malanza smoothly arranged. My surviving men fled back to the palisade. We had sent four thousand onto the field, Juniper and I.

A bare thousand returned, more than half of it Watch.

"We have," Juniper spoke into the graveyard silence of the general staff, "underestimated Princess Malanza."

In the distance, trumpets sounded again and the Proceran infantry began to advance as the forces that had engaged pulled back. In front of them, seven lone silhouettes took the lead. Good, I coldly thought.

I was in a killing mood.

---

SMHF

Help Evil stay triumphant!

Vote for Guide!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

You beat me to it. Nicely done!

Captain Obvious

may she never return.

DroughtBringer

Wow...

That was brutal.

Seems likes Cats going to be going to toe with 7 heroes?

That's quite a bit, but should be interesting at the least.

They've been unnamed at this point, so I'm expecting that they will not be that powerful so long as Pilgrim and Saint aren't there.

Also go vote for the guide! We're at first and we can't let Ward overtake us!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Adra

Remember we're in a universe where the Conservation of Ninjitsu is a physical law

danh3107

I think would've been more correct to say you underestimated the crap priests can get away with apparently. What they did directly led to loss of life, what are vows if you only adhere to the letter and not the spirit?

pah

ALKATYN

its a holy crusade, if cheating is ever justified thats when

Quite Possibly A Cat

Its not much different from healing. They're allowed to heal soldiers just fine, even though the soldiers are obviously gonna go back and kill people.

Anon

I mean, as far as things go, the priest are relatively okay, from a spiritual perspective.

They're preventing an 'evil' force from escaping to kill more 'good' guys – and they're not harming anyone (arguably, at least, considering the walls re-orienting to cut off escape routes probably had a few possibilities for death when they cut through the ropes)

They're not harming anyone directly, which, unless their oath is complete and total pacificism (which it likely isn't) they're fine.

And honestly, if the priests were really as hobbled as Cat apparently had thought, there wouldn't be that much of a reason to bring that many of them with the main army in the first place.

Faiir

Yes, they're literally stopping evil.

nick012000

>if they were really as hobbled as Cat believed, there wouldn't have been much reason to bring them along in the first place

The vast majority of the deaths during pre-modern warfare didn't come from wounds in battles, but from diseases, both as a result of wound infection, and as a result of poor hygiene in their camps in general.

onedollargum

Your vows let you summon kickass shields, that's what XD

In any case, sheparding a flock seems like a pastor's job. Even if it's sheep to a slaughter.

RanVor

That's exactly the kind of hypocritical self-righteousness you'd expect from the servants of the Gods Above.

Raved Thrad

Didn't Malanza leave off on discussing terms for prisoner exchanges? I'm betting Cat will now prioritize murdering those priests.

blitzbasic

You could argue that healing people that fight in a war afterwards equally leads to a loss of life, and that is obviously fine. I don't think that the spirit of the vow is "don't do anything that could impact a war".

Darkening

Well, that was a great use of crowd control effects. Nice to see technical pacifism in full swing with these priests.

Skraeling

I didn't kill him. The bullet did. And I didn't fire the bullet, it was fired when a firing pin hit it. all I did was pull on a small piece of metal.

TeK

I didn't kill the man. He died himself, when his brain shut down, because he didn't had enough blood, after it had flown through the knife-shaped wound in area of his neck. Which'd appeared accidentally, a chunk of metal in form of the knife tearing his skin and flesh, because due to electromagnetic forces, some particles had repulsed others. I was just moving my hand. Honestly, I'm the real victim here. My white priestly robes are all draimed in blood because of this knife. Curse you, blacksmiths!

Naeddyr

Ouch. Thanks for the chapter!

Antoninjohn

Cats going crucify many priests and a lot of church's are going to burn for this

agumentic

Not really. All's fair in love and war, and those priests didn't do anything Cat's mages wouldn't.

superkeaton

Ah, I was wondering how tricky the priests would get.

As it turns out, decently.

Type

Wow... this is going to be a battle to remember. If this is the opening move of the Crusade's army, however revealing one of their trump cards so early in the battle seems unwise. Although the damage they did is considerable as Catherine has already lost a little less than a seventh of her army all told, including a large chunk of the watch and the majority of her crossbows.

sengachi

If they had managed to completely destroy Catherine's mundane ranged contingent before the battle, when Procer already has such a massive advantage in that area, that might have been the entire battle right there.

burdi

if cat win by logic strategy it will not her she always win by following her instinct what make her dangerous is not because she has the winter power or because she was named but because she is catherine foundling, thats what she said in book 2..i cant remember in what chapter but thats when she was about to fight demon with limp feet and spoke to archer

stevenneiman

I think it was actually after that zombie goblin stole her Name. But I can't remember exactly when that was.

MurkyTruths

The battle of the camp's is about to get good....

Shawn Panzegraf

See, this is why stuff like Bonfire makes sense. There's no reasoning with Good. So best be the very best monster you can be and render Good's people willing to rise in rebellion rather than go to war Vs. Evil. Being Soft Evil got Catherine every Hero in six countries after her head anyways. What, another sixty woulda popped up if she got brutal?

Orçun Sevinç

Isn't that how Triumphant (may she never return) get shafted? People could only take so much terror before they consider themselves dead anyway and there is no putting the gene back to lamb after that

vuthuha912

Well. Japan did surrender after 2 atomic bombs but who knows if that is the best situation.

Bonfire might be a little too bloody. Burning the town is just too much and you lose moral high ground with it but if you use it to ... you know ... torch the granary/steal them – assuming that you know where people keep them. Obviously, you can force the army to return home to take up farming to avoid starvation. It might also mean that the reserve Cordelia keeps in case of emergency (what kind of general goes to war without some sort of emergency grain reserve) will have to be used. If Cordelia keeps pushing for war (guarantee that her people will die of starvation) or does have a grain reserve hidden somewhere (underestimate the consequence of war and logistics) then I don't think you should consider her as a partner. People like that completely disregard human lives and have zero common sense and should not be considered potential rulers in any capacity.

It is still wiser to attack the supply line and cripple your enemy's ability to wage war than to face them head-on when they have superior numbers. Cat decisions are quite reasonable. It is less risky but still achieves the same outcome. Didn't Black fucking buy his way out of a rebellion? It is a lot more practical to me.

TeK

If I remember correctly, if you push Good to far, you got 300 000 angel-hardened contrite battle zombies forming the core of the host, around which every other Good nation and every Hero on Calernia unite. Or you got a continent-wide rebellion, backed up by over seas empires, one of which is even partially led by a Villain. World needs balance.

stevenneiman

What you need to do is make it safe to be anything but your enemy. Don't go on the offensive, don't kill civilians, but make sure that any host that enters your kingdom leaves in expensive tatters with nothing to show for it. It works for the gnomes and it can work for you. Just so long as you're damned sure not to piss off the gnomes, that is.

The biggest mistake anyone can be is to become the force that must be resisted, because it always will be. Whether it's gnomish WMDs, Praesi demons, or Proceran angels, you won't like the results.

Pipiemman

Anyone have a thought as to what would happen in Cat gave a hero a title of Winter? We've already seen that even the Heavens have to obey the story when they were forced to bring Cat back to life, so if a story could be arranged to "name" a hero, I feel like it would have to go through.

the verbiage ecstatic

I'm guessing it would work, but that it's substantially harder than just killing them.

Generally in literature, when someone bestows a title, the recipient has a choice to accept or reject it. The only "titled against their will" stories I can think of involve hereditary destiny: tough luck, Arthur, you pulled the sword from the stone, confirming you as the long-lost son of Uther, so you are the king, like it or not.

So Cat would have to either somehow set up a story like that, or set up a story where the hero willingly accepts the title / acknowledges it as just.

Hard to use that as a battlefield tactic. Might work to pick off an especially dangerous hero... Cat arguably laid the groundwork for flipping the Saint by playing the "you're a cold-blooded killer who just happens to wear a white hat" card, but I imagine following that through to a successful conversion would be quite a challenge, and the odds are good the Saint would just run Cat through anyway as kill #1 on her murderous rampage.

stevenneiman

Pretty sure she didn't actually plant the seeds of a conversion for Saint, just stole her self-righteous momentum.

Remember, reducto ad absurdum is a battlefield tactic in Creation, just as effective as it is as a debate tool here. Now Saint isn't the mighty and noble hero, she's an arrogant, self-righteous bully and a kinda pathetic one at that. And, not so coincidentally, she was dumb enough to inconclusively beat Cat on their first meeting. She might have gone out to spread terror among her enemies, but I wouldn't be surprised if fishing for a Pattern of Three wasn't at least part of Cat's objective.

Anon

I'm...perhaps a little confused – could Cat not have opened a portal to Arcadia to quickly shift her troops out of the kill-zone? Or did the Priest's wall prevent her from opening a gate inside the 'protected'/fenced in zone?

I guess I was under the impression Cat didn't need physical access to the location in order to send up a gate, given that they'd earlier discussed jaunting off to Procer to wreck havoc on the undefended towns therein in order to pull the crusade back and/or force concessions from Hasenbach.

Otherwise, I'm wondering how much power this drains from the priests in question – yeah, they likely have named support, but if what Cat's saying about the training disparity is true, they have to be maximizing things to keep up a 4-tiered wall, PLUS the fence itself, continuously active despite it being hammered – though to be fair, the number disparity is probably playing a role therein – since the wall itself is non-lethal, it lets ALL of the priests go in, rather than 'only' the few that would be willing to break oaths.

In any event, Cat and Juniper got caught with their pants down – I'm kind of surprised they hadn't theorized how non-lethal application of magic could still be utilized in order to. It definitely feels like Melanza, at least, was taking things seriously from the get-go.

And now Cat's down to 9k troops, and Melanza has only lost a couple thousand (if even that) of her worst. Looking a little more desperate, and desperation doesn't generally tend to go the villains' way.

In any case, time for some hero fights, though I almost want to see more of Juniper's tactics at work...unless the Prince's graveyard turns out to be a later encounter.

poignardazur

I was expecting them to at least mention the possibility of portalling through Arcadia, but I don't think that would have made sense. Any attack like that is potentially a bait to get Larat and/or Cat in range of the two big guns. Cat can only afford deploy gates if she's reasonably certain an ambush won't be waiting at the exit.

Anon

I don't necessarily disagree, but not having the gates even come up as a possible escape (hell, even to get out, say, another thousand or what have you) was a bit odd.

In reality, it probably would brush up against Cat's warning regarding named villainous intervention being 'necessary' leading to a hero screwing it up somehow, but at the same time, she had a good chunk of time to get her army out before the cavalry fell upon them, which makes it less of a 'necessity' that the heroes could pounce on.

Rey d`Tutto

Cat was in the fortifications w/ Marshall J. Larat's location was not disclosed, but he wasn't with the skirmishers. Neither can make a portal that far away from themselves, that we've seen, Cat just learned how to "tie off" a gate she'd made, otherwise she's gotta maintain it as long as she wants it open.

Metrux

Besides neither she or her fae being able to open portals from a distance, this is a trump card, if you will remember. She is keeping it close, that she can use portals for small teleportation instead of just full march through impossible times.

About they attacking Procer, you really think she wouldn't be herself going? The whole idea was for HER to be there destroying until they couldn't take it anymore.

It probably didn't come up because it's plain impossible, so why would you think about it? It's the same as thinking that thief could've put the stolen sun in the knights path, in the situation it's virtually impossible, so why bother wasting words on it?

onedollargum

A number of hypothetical reasons why taking the losses is preferable/unavoidable:

- She (or some of her high-tier and possibly traitorous minions) has to be there to open the gate.
- Such gates aren't perfectly precise on a micro, tactical level.
- Making a gate might take too much time.

Using a gate is tantamount to using an aspect. With so many heroes aligned against her that's a bad move.

-Catherine is the Duchess of Moonless Nights, and the time is early afternoon. It might be that manifesting a gate at this time of day simply isn't feasible.

-Procer has an as-of-yet unknown trump against gating.

Antoninjohn

The priests are not using their own power it's given to them by the Gods Above, the issue is to be a priest requires taking oaths not to kill people with that power but to heal people, the priests of the Gods Below can use power to kill people but that requires sacrifice the Good side can't, but as you can see Good is currently cheating which will probably bit them back especially as Callowens hold deep grudges

MetruX

Just a small thing, there is no priest of the gods bellow. Not even a church for them. It is explained in book one or two, I'm not sure now, that no one sends prayers or asks things from the gods bellow, it's a different kind of religion.

Daemion

A portal wouldn't have helped at all. The priests would have simply put a barrier in front of it.

agumentic

She explicitly can't. It's possible to calculate what place in Arcadia corresponds with whatever place you want to be, go there and open a gate from the other side, but it takes time, and might not actually be faster in short distances. All this happened in the span of minutes, with Hierophant busy trying to break the shields.

the verbiage ecstatic

And on the Proceran side, why are they sending out the heroes? They just had a successful play, that Cat doesn't have an answer to, and the longer they keep up with attrition tactics, the more their numbers help them. Heroes perform best when the tide of the battle turns against them: they should keep wearing down Cat until she finds a way to flip the dynamics, and THEN the heroes should be deployed to counter her.

Draconius Sinister

Well, that's a bit upsetting to see. Excited for when Cat hits back though.

Anon

As an addedum...come to think of it, the re-angling walls are a pretty good trick – assuming the wards can re-orient at will and are easily adjusted in a short time-frame (which they did here, at least), that's battlefield control on a similar (And roughly equally effective) scale to Cat's gates, only inverted.

It probably won't work as well now that Juniper can account for it. but it did what it needed to do – which was nigh-disable cat's mobile ranged component. I'm kind of curious as to what Juniper and Cat DID think the priests could do, given how flat-footed this caught them.

At this point, all that's needed to be done is to pick off the siege engines and/or maneuver around them, and Malanza can just throw bodies at Cat's army until Cat's army is decimated. Masego and the Mages may be able to work some magic and outmuscle the priests' defenses (as evidenced here), but the priests have numbers, and can heal anything that's not an instant kill-wave.

Now I'm really curious as to how the tide can be turned – Cat's got worse odds now, which (on some level) may help given her story so far, but at the same time, unless she can avoid the Sword Saint long enough to kill off the rest of the heroes and a ton of mundane soldiers (of which she's already promised to not break out the truly nasty stuff), this was a savage blow.

Also interesting, in a detached sense, that this attests to Malanza's 'meh' to the prisoner exchange.

Dylan Tullos

Anon:

Cat can't afford a "win" that leaves her army broken. This is only one Crusading host, and the First Prince has plenty of reserves.

She has to win decisively, preserving her forces, while Malanza is quite happy to suffer heavy casualties as long as she wins. Now we've seen that the Princess knows what she's doing, that just got much harder.

Malanza has no reason to agree to a prisoner exchange. She has the bigger army, so trading one for one could only be a disadvantage for her.

Princess Malanza is fighting like Black. She has superior forces, so she's fighting methodically, picking apart Cat's army one piece at a time rather than launching an all-out assault. Attrition works in her favor, which means that Cat has to gamble and try to make a decisive attack.

Metrux

Previously there was plenty of priests at war, it's just they never directly participated, unless to counter big ass evil rituals, all the other time they stayed around and healed people.

Rook

Strong opening move by the crusade, but maybe not the smartest. It might actually end up beneficial in the grand scheme of things for Callow.

The reason being that it's a tactical loss but a strongly favorable narrative. Malanza just put their backs to a **literal** wall and struck with overwhelming force. Usually a good move, but maybe not so much when the narrative pattern of your opponent revolves around baring her fangs when up against the wall and disemboweling said overwhelming force.

Fighting for the name of Squire, the training exercises at the academy, marchford, liesse, the arcadian war, second liesse – every single story Cat has been a part of has started with backs to the wall and an opponent with bigger guns, and has ended in the underdog sacrificing an arm to unceremoniously tear out the opponent's throat.

The first strike looks good on paper yeah, but it also just railroaded the story into a setup where the next move will almost certainly be Cat hitting back twice as hard. Very similar to Black signing Captain's death warrant with a series of tactical victories but a narrative defeat, except in this case it seems like Malanza accidentally set up and stepped into the trap of her own volition rather than any clever play by either party.

Only question is it's not entirely clear whether Cat herself will actually realize this and capitalize on it. Winter flaring up her temper might actually work to her advantage in this case.

Anon

I don't know if Cat's connection to her name is strong enough to empower such a narrative at this point in time, though.

Winter might be, since it also has been a part of Cat's journey through several such encounters, but the Saint has already been shown to match and out-cut Winter once already – and relying on any one aspect as a villain is a surefire way to have a hero find a way around it.

Remember too that Cat has artificially hobbled her arsenal in order to make nice with Hasenbach at the end of this all – at least, that's the plan so far.

Rook

The good part of this is that it has nothing to do with Winter, it's been a part of her story since she was the Powerless Orphan. This kind of narrative advantage is relevant in all cases, but especially in the case of battles between named – the mantle is just icing on the cake. Remember the Lone Idiot ended up being a fairly powerful opponent on the back of nothing but the rule of three, and Captain of the Calamities died at the hand of a barely relevant middling Hero by force of story alone.

Which is actually very convenient that they chose this very moment to send out seven of their Named. It's a perfect opportunity to take a hold of the flow of the story to erase a few of them as her own opening salvo, and firmly turn the tide back in her own favor.

benthelynx

Which would be spending that advantage, and probably setting up a counter counter narrative. But it's so early in that not doing so is probably letting that advantage dissipate.

RanVor

Yet another excellent chapter.

Could Cat be in for a Terribilic victory in this battle?

Saragh

Does anyone else look at this and think this is a classic story in Callow?

A horde of poorly trained conscripts supported by noble elites pouring across the border aided by powerful rituals and magic. Facing them is an outnumbered army lead by Callow royalty and with the knights of the kingdom behind their queen.

Ignore the names for a second and look at the story. Now consider the idea of seven villains attacking five heroes in front of massed armies.

Jonnnney

Gotta say I'm disappointed in Catherine. They had a day and I prepare and they didn't have a single trick to play? I wanted to see if goblin fire could burn through a miracle instead they put up a fence and Cat decided to ask Masego to try and break the fence and three thousand of her people died. I understand it's just the opening volley but I seems kinda meh. I may have missed it but did the Mages didn't any fire nor did our named kill anyone

Daltos

They still needed to retreat through there, goblin fire would've just blocked them off even more so since they would've had to wait for it to burn out since magic just gets eaten up by it, and that's ignoring the fact that they probably would've had to go through a good amount of their stock to do so since that had to be a long fence to pen up a couple thousand people.

Metrux

Unless I am terribly equivocated, she agreed to not use anything of the complete destruction sort. Goblin fire is sure to be included. The thing here is how fast it happened, when she finally understood her people were already being killed, so they couldn't prepare anything in time. For using the day before? Now you must ask yourself this: if priests were always in wars against Praes but never did anything like this, what do you think they did? The answer is surprisingly easy, give it was said plenty of times before: the protected from or dispelled massive rituals. So she neither could have a ritual prepared, goblin fire used or time to do something else. All in all she got out of it better than most people would've.

werafdsaew

Cat agreed not to use demons and not to target civilians. Everything else is fair game.

haza18

The watch is actually so badass, trying to grapple their way out 😊

Author Unknown

Priests are scary. I wonder if their no killing rule applies to animals. If not, given the way those shields cut, they could just create one a foot or so above the ground in the middle of Broken Bells and take out Cat's entire cavalry contingent.

It may not have been wise to unleash the priest so soon. Not unless they have a whole lot more tricks up their sleeves. They hurt Masego where it counts: his pride. And you can bet he is going to be spending a considerable amount of time developing a counter. Unless Malanza thinks she can win the entire war here, she may have overplayed her hand.

It hurts to see Cat lose so many. Not just the people; crossbows are expensive y'know.

Metrux

You know, this made me think something rather interesting. Priests were used by the old kingdom to disable Praesi use of massive rituals, but Hierophant is especially a breaker and controller of miracles... Maybe those priests will see something they wholeheartedly did not expect >;)

benthelynx

Typo ish comment: this sentence required rereading for me. "But it might lower the damage of this from disaster to wound." It might help it was written as "a disaster to a wound"

Quite Possibly A Cat

Your probably right, but it works both ways me thinks...

benthelynx

It works, but feels clunky? Clumsy?

stevenneiman

"They didn't even {have} to justify it"
"but that was not necessarily [be] true" alternatively, "might not necessarily be true"
"Malanza had been traditional in the [arraignment->arrangement] of her forces."
"when my old friend unleashed his wrath he did {so} methodically."

Draeysine

Man... these are some next level D&D tactics. Wall of force weaponized.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Wait, does the no killing rule apply to Miracles? Because that would be the Gods killing people, not the priests killing anyone.

Letouriste

Good question:o

esryok

On multiple occasions Ashen Priestess erased people from existence or reduced them to ash. In particular, when she erased those Stygian magisters it was described as a miracle. Seems like killing is permitted at least some of the time.

Luis

This has painted a target on the back of priests now that will never wash off. think about it. There is a difference between medical personnel and combat personnel.

Priests most likely had a protected status as only healers and people who could kill undead. Classically evil armies would probably not care, but any formation with priests would automatically be suspect. Now they will be factored into troop formations and tactics. Any commander not wanting to walk into the trap Catherine did would make a point of trying to avoid it and there is no guarantee that the priests in the enemy army would not operate like this moving forward so....taking out their capacity to do so would be a military priority, like trying to shut down ballistas, and mage lines. so targeting priests would be smart, just like targeting mages is now.

shieldredblog

Also it has some interesting implications for the overarching story. If the Crusade uses miracles against soldiers, its reinforcing Callow as justified being on the side of Evil. Making the citizens of Callow, who already grew up under the thumb of tolerable Evil rulers, see the Heavens as against them.

Even if the Crusade wins, instead of Heroes rising to free Callow, the narrative could change enough that rebel Villains rise up to free Callow instead.

Dylan Tullos

Luis:

You make very good points about the distinction between soldiers and medics.

However, only a Crusading host is likely to have a battalion of priests to work military miracles. In wars between Good nations, the House of Light remains neutral, and priests serve in their traditional role as healers. This military innovation is only likely to apply to wars between Good and Evil powers.

As you say, Classic Evil doesn't care about the rules of war, so this won't change anything for them. It's only Practical Evil that will change its behavior towards priests, and I think that it will work out as you predict. Practical Evil commanders will treat priests as military assets from here on out.

Maybe there will be a future distinction between "fighting" priests and pure healers. The healers could wear a distinctive uniform that sets them apart, and armies would avoid tricks or face the reasonable consequence of having Practical Evil target all priests without distinction. If they have separate units of priestly medics, clearly distinguished from the soldier-priests, then there's no reason why we couldn't have priests as combat personnel without losing the traditional immunity of healers.

shieldredblog:

Everyone in Liesse is dead because of a "tolerable" Evil ruler. Malicia decided that their lives were less important than getting her hands on a superweapon, and she sacrificed them without hesitation.

Practical Evil is still small-e evil. It's just smarter about it.

shieldredblog

I'm not saying it justifies anything to us, the readers. The on the ground citizen of Callow is a different story though. All their going to see is Callowen soldiers run down because of weaponized miracles.

Miracles serving Proceran interests at the expense of Callow.

shieldredblog

A rather large group of people just threw away their diplomatic protection there. If you fight, your soldiers. Hopefully a road somewhere gets some new mile markers.

TeK

That got me thinking. First of all, Callow has it's own House of Light, which is heretical by the views of Procer (more militaristically inclined, as it is), second, those panes of light, they can CUT PHYSICAL THINGS. What if those panes appeared not vertically, but horizontally in the midst of army? I mean, it's the same effect, ultimately. You can even create them not in the midst of the host, but, say in front of charging cavalry. I mean, you don't kill people that way, they kill themselves! Totally not murder!

Letouriste

Probably too close of a weapon to justify that to heaven eyes

Walter

I dunno if I agree with Cat's suspicions re: the levees. These guys are out of Procer already, and whether they survive or not will be gone for years. I don't think killing them can make Procer collapse. They wouldn't have been permitted to leave their farms/homes if they'd been crucial.

shieldredblog

Considering the Dead King is about to throw his hat in the ring, it probably does actually.
Not that they know that.

I think there's a good chance that the Pretty Prancing Princes of Procer simply don't value mere peasants enough to understand the damage they're doing in the long run.

Walter

If Dead King acts the big question is where he will go. We know he had a hard on for Triumphant, but that's about it in terms of his personality.

shieldredblog

No question.
He's marching out of that Hellgate that Warlock locked.

MetruX

The thing here is that what a nation needs while in war is not the same as when in peace, they can be necessary but still taken because while war raged you need less of them. So when peace comes you need some more, but if you lost too much... Then you can't provide for all the people who came back from said war.

Moondoggie

Classic Warhammer Empire play.

Net of Amyntok their skirmishers and follow it up with a Reiksguard charge. Nice early game pick.

nobodi12

An updated map of Callow

nobodi12

An updated map of Callow

Letouriste

The white mark is kinda ugly on such map^^ a red cross would be better

MetruX

I think the white mark rather nicely personificating what happened. It has a breaking contrast that reminds us of why it is how it is in the map ;3

JJR

That's where Liesse ended up and a trio of demons deppressed/maddened/disordered a large chunk of land, right?

---

Last chapter Harrow was mentioned, it's not absensed.

nick012000

And once again I'm reminded of how implausible the geography of that map is, with a river running between two oceans. The only way I can see it being even remotely possible is if some giant spell cast near Wolof made the water start flowing uphill for a while, creating the division in the river there, before it started flowing downhill again towards the south.

TeK

It can be technically plausible. You got big lake, where mercantis at, and it's possible that sometime after river goes out of it, it splits and goes in the direction of Praes and Free cities respectively. Or maybe even, in the point of splitting, there's some water-generating magical phenomenon. Plus, you know, it's magical world. As we all know, gravity does not work when presented with a classical element of void. So yeah, a wizard did it.

nobodi12

mercantis sits in the ocean not a lake.

TeK

What? Had you actually looked at Calernia's map? Here it is: <https://ibb.co/b9DLMF>. Or you can just look at the "Art and Maps" button at the top.

So going back to question in hand, if Mercantis sits in ocean, than Caspian Sea is an ocean too. And it's not even a sea!

nobodi12

But I would love Erratica address this problems and give some explanation along the lines of: it is praesi fault.

JJR

Can I give it a try?

Time was there was a river that began in the mountains south of Hospes and flowed north all the way to the Tyrian Sea. This annoyed the Praesi; as it had a tendency to get in the way of their favorite pastime, invading Callow. Sure, they could always force the initial crossing well enough (phase 1 always works) but inevitably some Heroes showed up to wreck the bridges, or tunnels, or logistical trebuchets and forced the Legions of Terror to surrender or face starvation. One invasion the Warlock decided to get clever, he would create a ritual that would make the river flow south instead of north. If there's no river it can't get in their way after all. Alas his ritual worked too well; and the entire river was compelled to flow south. not just the water coming from the source. To this day a river flows out of the Tyrian Sea to the north and uphill as it travels southward until it reaches where the ritual was enacted and splits. One branch drains into the bay around Mercantis actually flowing downhill for a bit. The other flows through the valley between the mountains, with only a small amount of regard for going downhill.

TeK

One thing about geography I would like to know the answer too, is why the apparently unbreachable Red Snake Wall can't be just circled around through the forest. Or why there is no river connecting lake on the border of Keter and Procer, and nearby ocean shore.

JJR

Depends on which forest you mean. If they try to go through the golden bloom elves will kill them (they kill anyone who isn't a Hero). Going through the Greywood would be more doable, but that would mean crossing a river twice. A river that seems broad enough to act as a better barrier than the wall.

TeK

By Red Snake Wall I meant the wall between Procer and Levant.

JJR

Oh, sorry. I thought I knew what I was talking about.

Shoddi

@nobodi12 – I was just about to ask you if leaving Harrow out was accidental or intentional. Then I put the “new” map side-by-side with the one on the Arts/Maps/Other page, and flipped between the two repeatedly.

I see what you did there. Well played, nobodi12.

SpeckofStardust

So everyone else notice that if the troops were withdrawn when Cat first suggested it they would have been pulled out in time?

sengachi

Nah, the priests would have just thrown up the fences half a minute earlier. A few more soldiers would have escaped, but the fundamental outcome wouldn't have been changed.

Novice

I see Princess Malanza is a Protoss player. Forcefield OP.

TeK

As long as she doesn't photon cannon rush, it's fine by me.

maelos61

The next chapter's name is 'Grand écart' I hope?

Draconius Sinister

Oi, so this question is kind of out of nowhere, but is it possible that Aspects are less abilities corresponding to how the Named operates or fights or whatever, but more a command from the Gods Above or Below as to what they will do in a given story: for example, the White Knight is meant to Ride into battle, the Black Knight is meant to Lead his troops and Conquer the enemy? This doesn't seem especially groundbreaking at first I'm sure, but it implies that Black and Cat have broken stories rather than beaten them or used them to their advantage. William was meant to Triumph over Cat. Funnily enough, this would mean that Hanno unintentionally broke his own story by learning how so many different heroes fought, rather than becoming his own sort of warrior and becoming the hero that Rides into battle at the last second and turn the tide. He is no longer the man with a last resort trump card, as Black examined, he's hamstrung himself by breaking his own story.

I have no real evidence for this save for that names evidently come from the Gods, and so do Aspects, and that all of the Aspects are imperative commands, evidently given to the heroes and villains BY the Gods.

SpeckofStardust

On the other hand if you look at when Black used Break on the doomsday weapon, It was noted that ""Destroy," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said, and his Name pulsed." meaning that ultimately he was acting under his own decision and outside the story so far, as further evidence that his action ended Cat's Named transition. The Name's might be power granted and heavily influenced by the God's but they are able to be broken (and kinda tamed) to the person using them.

As shown by Black and a few other people.

deepee

pros and cons of sending undead pigeon puppets filled with goblinfire into the heart of the other army?

vuthuha912

Well. I like your tactic, Princess. Allow me to repay in kind by targeting your medics from now on.
Seriously, Black targeted the healer first for a reason. Zuko from one of the fics I read just constantly fired at the enemy to prevent them from leaving their shield to do anything worthwhile? Can we do the same with these priests?

---

Chapter 15: Bravura

"And so my reign ends as it began, with fewer allies than stab wounds."

– Alleged last words of Dread Emperor Pernicious, the Imperiled

"Tell me about those fences," I said.

Hierophant had gained back a few pounds, enough that his thinned frame looked full again. How he'd managed that on army rations I had no idea, but the mystery was not a fresh one: he'd gone through both the Rebellion and the Arcadian Campaign without losing weight. I'd been half-convinced that it was a self-perception anchored deep enough that his Name enforced it, until he'd wasted away in the Observatory. He'd still come a long way from the bespectacled boy I'd once known. These days he looked, well, dangerous. There might have been little muscle to his frame, but he stood tall – taller than me, but then who didn't? – and the long trinket-woven braids going down his back leant him a certain panache. The black eye cloth covering his glass eyes matched the permanently dishevelled black robes that were the only thing he bothered to wear anymore, not that he'd even been prone to indulging in fashionable clothes. The power he now so casually wielded clung to him even when unused, half-felt wisps of sorcery never quite gone. Masego had been perhaps the most destructive of my companions even back when he'd been the Apprentice, but he'd rarely seemed anything but awkward and a little pedantic when he wasn't casting. Now, though? He looked like the kind of sorcerer you didn't walk away from fighting. It suited him.

"A lecture on the nature of priestly power is out of the question, I suppose," the dark-skinned man sighed.

"Ask me again when an army isn't marching towards us," I said.

"That's almost never," he muttered under his breath. "Very well. Though weaker – diluted, according to some theories – than the Light we have seen heroes wield, the essential nature of priest miracles is the same. That is the stuff these fences were made of."

"Can it kill soldiers?" I asked.

"No," he shook his head. "As a reflection of oaths taken, the miracle should not be able to hurt anything living."

Well, that was something. From the way the fences had cut straight through hooks and rope, I'd have to assume it could wreck armour and fortifications if they hit at the right angle. That was... problematic. We'd raised the palisades in the first place because we needed them as an equalizer for crusader numbers. If they could just cut them down at will, that measure was gone.

"Next time the priests try the fences, can you just hit them directly to interrupt?" I asked.

Reluctantly, the mage shook his head.

"Mass sorcery at great distance needs a scrying tangent to be aimed properly," he said. "Unless it is fired blindly. Priests, as you well now, disrupt scrying."

So, unless Malanza blundered by putting all her priests in our field of vision and clustered together smothering the fences in the crib wasn't an option. This just kept getting better, didn't it?

"Then we need to have an immediate answer ready for when they do appear," I said flatly. "I'll need you with me for the brawl, so the mage lines will have to handle it."

I flicked a questioning glance at him at that, inviting him to pass judgement. I heard his left eye twist inside his skull towards me, but he did not reply. Right, subtle cues. Not his strength.

"Can they handle it?" I asked.

"They can cast the Ripper without me," Masego agreed, and elaborated when my eyebrow rose. "The red light constructs we used for the second exchange."

"That's..." I sighed. "I need a little more than that, Masego. Would wards work?"

"Against miracles, they are mostly useless," Hierophant noted. "The spectrums are too different, there is little overlap. We would have a great deal more success targeting their mages."

"Priests wouldn't screw with that?" I frowned.

"Unlikely," he said. "Remember the precision they formed those shields with, and at such distance. That cannot be obtained without scrying or other means of relayed direct sight. Having priests among them would make that impossible, implying the mages stand alone. I'll add that whoever designed that strategy has a keen understanding of all forces involved, which is quite rare even among Praesi. Rather impressive."

So either they had a very skilled wizard on the other side, or the Grey Pilgrim had contributed to Malanza's battle plans. I hoped it was the latter, because the enemy had enough advantages already without having someone even remotely in Masego's league to field.

"Order them to target the mages first," I finally said. "The fences will be trouble enough on their own, we can't afford for wizards to give them additional staying power. Inform Juniper's staff I gave the order, too, I don't want them in the dark."

The blind man nodded, idly tracing a circle of silver light in the air with a fingertip and inserting a scrying spell within. I looked on in interest for a moment, since that was definitely a new trick. I'd been under the impression there needed to be a physical anchor for scrying, but apparently Hierophant had figured out a cheat. I left him to it, leaning my elbows against the top of the palisade. The two of us were on a wooden walkway, between two rising slopes where Pickler's repeating scorpions would be pushed up when the enemy got close enough. We had thirty of those overall, a massive amount of siege weaponry even by Legion standards. It meant we were light on combat sappers, since those same soldiers had to attend the engines instead, but sharpers and charges weren't going to win us this battle. Not against fifty thousand hero-led Procerans. And, speaking of the devils. The crusader host had lumbered forward, its three infantry waves advancing slowly as the cavalry wings retreated to cover their flanks. In front of the first wave, though, the same seven silhouettes I'd glimpsed earlier were pulling ahead. Heroes. Three sword and board, I noted. Men and woman. Another I recognized from a previous fight, the same priest who'd engaged me as backup for the Saint. No sign of Two Knives or the red-robed mage, but I knew better than to assume a vicious crippling had been enough to keep the heroine I'd mangled out of the fight.

Hopefully she'd already had all three of her aspects, because if she hadn't she'd likely popped one out since designed to screw me over. Clearing out the heroes that had come into Callow over the winter had taught me that a hero having an undefined aspect just meant that the Heavens had the means to teach their hatchet men a trick to counter one of my own. They were rarely subtle about it, too, which was kind of insulting. It would have been polite to be less obvious in their attempts to stack the fight for their side. Of the last remaining three heroes, I recognized another. The man with the hammer I'd ignored when riding with the Hunt. The other two were unknowns: one muscly, barefooted woman with a staff that could mean she was either a sort of priest or fighter. And a boy that could not have been older than sixteen, with a greatsword propped over his shoulder that was nearly as tall as he was. And didn't wear a helmet, because of course he fucking didn't.

"It is done," Masego said, coming to stand by my side again.

I nodded slowly.

"You remember our training?" I asked.

"Healers die first," he recited dutifully. "Then practitioners, then I must constrain the enemy to ease your task or prevent outside intervention."

"It doesn't look like they have a mage with them, but that just means they're holding the man back in reserve," I said. "Watch for that. And if the Saint of Swords ever tries to close distance with you..."

"Flee," he completed. "I must never let her be closer than ninety feet."

"And that's the conservative estimate," I grunted. "She didn't even use an aspect to smack me around, Masego. She starts getting serious, don't think in victory terms. Escape and containment, while we gather massive enough a response to force her back."

"You sound sceptical of our ability to kill her," Hierophant noted, sounding surprise.

My fingers clenched.

"I am," I admitted. "We're good, Zeze. Better than good. But her and the Pilgrim? They have decades of experience and accumulated power on us, and their Gods aren't shy about putting a finger to the scale. Don't think of it as us tumbling Summer again, because against Summer we had levers and rules. We're the green heroes taking a swing at your father and Black, in this story. We get cocky for even a moment and..."

I did not elaborate.

"Heads, pikes, the usual," Masego said. "I shall endeavour prudence."

We stayed in comfortable silence after that, watching the enemy advance.

"I think that I dislike them," he finally said, after a long moment. "These crusaders."

I snorted.

"Well, they are at war with us," I said.

The mage shrugged.

"So were Summer and Akua Sahelian, yet I never could must much antipathy," Masego said. "Even towards the Exiled Prince and his mercenaries. They were only creatures acting as their nature demanded, and that is a blameless thing."

"Is it really?" I murmured. "Just because something comes naturally to you doesn't make it right."

"A very Callowan view," Hierophant said. "Your people seek to overlay Creation with a notion of objective morality, which always struck me as rather absurd. If the teachings of any of the Gods were fully correct, Creation would not exist at all. It is, after all, a debate."

"The Gods can say whatever they like," I muttered. "The truest thing Black ever said to me was that, in the end, only we are responsible for our choices. Taking marching orders from Above or Below is just abdicating the rights your own life. The Book of All Things has this lovely little verse about that, you know. Choice. But is it really that if the only two answers are already picked out for you?"

"Free will," Masego smiled. "You always did obsess over that. I'm not certain such a thing can truly exist, Catherine, not in a world that was created."

"You're the one who wants to open up Creation to see how it works," I pointed out. "When you were in a fugue, after becoming Hierophant, you said something I still remember. The godhead is a trick of perspective."

"I believe it still," he admitted. "Now more than ever, as I have seen what became of you. How Winter's mantle alienated you from mortal existence. To think as a God, I suspect, is to be a God."

"And you'll try to get there," I said. "Seems meaningless, if it's not your choice."

"Perhaps I was simply meant to attempt it," Masego mused. "Because it is my nature to do so."

"Does it really matter?" I asked. "Whether or not that was writ in you from the start. All we can do is act."

"Perhaps not," he murmured. "And so I find myself disliking these crusaders."

"They killed a lot of my men," I said quietly, fingers forming a fist. "And we're only just getting started."

"Death is death," Masego dismissed. "But the way you carry yourself now, as if they put stones on your shoulder? This I hold against them."

I bumped my hip against his side affectionately, then leant against his shoulder. He allowed it without comment, which was as close as he'd ever come to openly returning the affection. I'd never quite get him, would I? How in the same sentence he could display both kindness and utter apathy.

"It's going to be a long war," I whispered.

"And we will win it," Hierophant said with bedrock certainty.

"And what has you so sure of that?"

He laughed quietly.

"Perhaps it is simply my nature," he said. "Go now, Catherine. Go and follow your own."

I moved away. Closing my eyes, I breathed in and out. Seven heroes, huh? Time to see if we could thin that herd a bit.

Opening my eyes, I unsheathed my sword and leapt down.

—

When fighting a group heroic Named, Black had once told me, two manners of adversaries could be found. The first was a proper heroic band. Should that be the case, coordination and weaving of skill should be expected. Against a band, either dispose of the healer first or place an instantly lethal blow against the leader figure. That would allow me to either inflict attrition or break coherence. The second kind of adversary was a mere grouping of heroes. No leader, no teamwork beyond the obvious, limited coordination. Rarer, my teacher had assessed. Mostly seen in large scale continental wars or when an overwhelmingly powerful villain emerges, like Triumphant or the Dead King. I was neither the most dreadful of empresses nor the ancient abomination that lurked within Keter, but here I was anyway. Fighting seven heroes as the host of Procer advanced behind them. They had been ordered to be prudent, I grasped. Three advanced towards me: one sword and board, the war hammer and the greatsword. Behind them stood the barefoot staff-wielder, and further back the last two with shields were flanking the healer. This isn't about power, I thought. Power is the crutch of Named. Clarity and skill will win ever time.

"I don't suppose," I said, "that we'll have a round of introductions?"

The hammer-wielder chuckled.

"What worth are those to the dead?" he replied.

"That," I said, "will make for a very ironic tombstone."

I let them strike first. The pair with the large weapons went for the flanks as the shield-bearer slowed to box me in. Eyes on him, I let my senses bloom. No Winter, just the inherent abilities that came with my body being a fucking construct. The mantle would remain inert as long as possible, since I was pretty sure the real reason the Saint and the Pilgrim had yet to show was that they were trying to bait out a Winter trance so I wouldn't think of retreat when they did arrive. The hammer went for my legs, and not even a heartbeat later the greatsword whistled towards my torso. Board arcs both, that they could readjust if I went forward. I did not. The thing with large weapons was that, once you'd committed to a blow, there was a heartbeat where it was very difficult to move. Where the muscles were busy dragging that large chunk of steel around. I moved towards the greatsword, adjusting to the arc and ducking under at the last moment. The boy wielding it grunted, shifted his footing and swung backward at the height of my hips. Without missing a beat I slid under, letting a hammer blow pass through the air where I'd been, and in a crouch passed behind the hero as my blade whipped out. His greaves did not cover the back of his leg. I rose smoothly from the slide as he was forced to kneel down, his tendons cleanly cut. Light bloomed inside the wound.

There was a heartbeat where I could have thrust the tip of my sword through the unprotected back of his neck, but I knew better. The sword and board man was already rushing me, shield angled up as he swung his blade. I did not parry, instead throwing myself on the shield and rolling over it, landing behind him. It threw his footing, and when the hammer-wielder tried to whack me I smoothly kicked the back of the the shield-wielder's knee and pushed his back. The hammer struck him in the shoulder, shattering steel like it was chalk. A curse, a scream, but I had more important matters to deal with. The first reserve was about to cut into the dance. The barefoot woman was stalking towards me, centre of mass supernaturally steady as she did. Ugh. Not a caster or a monk, then, a brawler. Wood or not, if that staff hit me I suspected I wouldn't enjoy it. Light bloomed, and the shield-wielder's broken shoulder snapped back into place. Without looking, I could feel all the moving parts. Hammer man was rushing my back, weapon already hoisted. Greatsword boy was going around to my left, warier now that he'd had a taste. And the one with the staff was smiling serenely as she advanced. I spat to the side.

"All right," I said. "Let's have another go."

I waited until sorcery bloomed in the distance to move. A whirlwind of flame erupted around the healer and his bodyguards, though before my view was blocked I saw light flare on the shield of one of the heroes. No kill there, but it should keep them busy for a bit. Masego was only getting started anyway. Hammer-wielder struck first. I knew the angle of it without looking and half-stepped out of the arc, but the man laughed.

"Broaden," he said.

The war hammer tripled in size, and there was no avoiding all of that. My shoulder was clipped and it fucked with my footing, keeping me in place just long enough for the greatsword boy to strike.

"Pierce," a woman's voice spoke from behind me.

Power howled. Ah, they were trying to bury me through concentrated might. Shame they'd not trained together sufficiently. It was a tricky thing, to keep myself in the way of both the thrusting staff point and the greatsword until the last moment. A handhold of ice formed just above my free hand I used it to hoist my whole body up, letting the golden-wreathed wooden staff impact the greatsword. It broke like it was made of porcelain, but I didn't get to enjoy that for long. The hammer-wielder was still on my ass, smashing down with his oversized chunk of metal as if the weight hadn't changed along with the size. I dropped the handhold, and the fall bought me a heartbeat as the swing followed me down. It was enough. I rolled to the side as the ground shook and chunks of wet soil went up in the air. The staff-wielder's naked foot caught me in my armoured chin but I felt the godsdamned steel bend under the impact as it sent me rolling. Fuck. That was one was dangerous, not because she was more competent but because she was quicker and quick was what my survival depended on.

The storm of fire winked out as I got back on my feet, all four heroes in the fray rushing me. A glance told me the healer and his protectors were completely untouched, but a moment later spikes of lightning began hammering down on their position one after another and just like that we were back in business. I watched my enemies approach, their angles and their speeds. Greatsword boy, I noted with amusement, was wielding the remaining half of his weapon like some sort of oversized cleaver. He didn't look all that happy about it. I circled slightly to the right, putting the hammer man between myself and the staff-wielder. And that meant... Ah, there you are. Sword and board feinted high and I took him up on it. Even as he flicked his blade down towards my throat, I turned my parry into a swing towards the side of his neck. His shield went up, and that killed his field of vision. Greatsword hero had to get close, now that he'd lost his reach, and it was not his specialty. I flicked to the side and caught his extended wrist, twisting his sharply so he was forced to stand in the way of sword and board's attack.

"Resist," the boy hissed out.

Light spread across him in the blink of an eye and I dropped him before it could touch my fingers. The other hero's blade bounced off unceremoniously. While the younger one tried to pivot so he was facing me again, I followed his movement smoothly and lunged at sword and board's throat while he withdrew. The shield came to knock away the blade again, but that hadn't been what he needed to watch out for. My wrist flicked, a knife dropped into my armoured palm and I rammed it through his eye from the open angle. Behind him I heard the hammer-wielder curse, since he didn't have a clear shot at me. Even as the hero I'd knifed dropped and began twitching death throes, my ears flicked. I hastily backpedalled as the staff-wielder leapt over the fight, landing where my shoulders had been a moment before. The wood whipped out, and my hasty parry was poorly angled. It went straight through my guard, denting my plate and tossing me away for the second time. Well, at least one was down and the healer still busy. Unless he could – no, I wasn't even going to finish that thought. I dragged myself upright and smiled at the barefoot woman.

"Round three?" I offered.

Her staff rose. I almost missed it, because it wasn't flashy. It was just a low ripple, a murmur of power. But my senses were no longer a mortal's, so my eyes flicked to the hero I'd killed. At his side knelt an old man in grey robes, who gently took out the knife. He then passed a hand over the bloodied face, murmuring a prayer. The hero's eyes opened and he let out a ragged gasp. There was no longer any wound on his face. The Grey Pilgrim rose to his feet gingerly, and offered me a rueful smile.

"Round three," he agreed.

---

Highwayman

Cat is like the boss of a raid that doesn't stay inside inside the boss chamber but instead comes out swinging at the raid party early.

Reminds me of how my party got wiped attempting Illidian, somehow.

Joe Jms

I'm sorry but something's been bothering me for a few chapters. The goblins had the opportunity to find a scorpion with a different claw pay have a mage modify it and they misset the chance to name him Hakram Catspaw

Sanityfaerie

The scorpions are all named after her *foes*.

Levinus

They named a goat Ratface's ex and he wasn't even in the room to hear it. Your point?

sengachi

Look, both Ratface and Aisha had to have exacted revenge for that at some point. And while for the goblins that was probably just good fun, imagine what kind of vengeance they could expect from the Deadhand. The Fifteenth's goblins "don't fuck with them" list is probably very short, but I'd expect to find Hakram's name on it.

Levinus

I hadn't thought of that. But when do we associate sense with sappers.

ClickPause

Cheating bastards.

Cap'n Smurfy

Grey Pilgrim once again proving that it's not the heroes that focus on killing who are most dangerous.

naturalnuke

Fucking healers.

PingleBerry

Always murder the white mage.

Naeddyr

Round three! the comment section echoed.

PotatoMan

Let's go!

Cap'n Smurfy

I love how we get the description from Catherine's perspective, yet I can just imagine how it must look to the heroes as she weaves through them, making them beat each other up for her.

Dainpdf

I can just imagine Black watching the battle, seeing the heroes attack, and mutter "Mistake."

Antoninjohn

Resurrection, really throwing subtly out the window here. You know the Gray Pilgrim follows the Choir of Mercy and is going to try and kill Cat no matter what for earthly gains while Cat is planning to give him Mercy in order to prevent more bloodshed/pain when she does that's going to be the ultimate insult to him and the heavens

oldschoolvillain

Heroes aligned with the Choir of Mercy cannot harm another being – that was mentioned back in book 1 or 2.

d_o_l

No, you're thinking of Compassion.

jonnnney

I don't think knife eye wasn't dead yet. The Grey Pilgrim arrived just in the nick of time as ordained by the great story.

Dainpdf

He's made rescuing young heroes a part of his Role. That makes him a terrible piece for Cat to have against her in this war. At least he blew this pseudo aspect early on.

danh3107

Maaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaan, fuck round three

JackbeThimble

'And Then the Pilgrim was Garroted by his own shadow just as a portal to hell opened up above the other three heroes heads and half a ton of molten rock smashed down upon them.'

'Round 4' growled the hero with the great sword as he turned and cut sword-and-board's head off.

Metrux

I think you have a very undeterred imagination xD

SpeckofStardust

uhmm I don't think anyone on either side is going to stay dead this fight.

DD

Ok...flat out resurrection like that has got to be cheating.

sheer_falacy

We already knew that heroes had resurrection available – it was very important to Cat in First Liesse, actually. There are presumably limits on it, but the Grey Pilgrim is very high end.

Orçun Sevinç

But considering how he suddenly appeared beside a dying hero, I bet that is Name-enforced and exploitable. Shank another hero at the other side of the battlefield and I'll bet good money he will be away from where it counts.

Dainpdf

He probably can't do it more than once – that wouldn't make for good narrative. Or every time he does it, it gets less effective.

Letouriste

What's a less effective resurection? Half-dead state? Zombified but still somehow alive?

Metrux

Maybe not the results, but the means/costs? He gets more tired, takes longer, that kind of thing... Until he can't do it anymore.

Dainpdf

They may come back seriously wounded. Or it takes longer. Or the healing (because the guy may have been still alive) is less powerful. Or his timing is worse, exposing him or others to risk.

SpeckofStardust

Considering all the things Cat had done to avoided certain death (including full on resurrection). It is well within fair play.

Sagacitas \(@Sagacitas\)

Names are fundamentally cheating from start to finish, that's kind of the point.

stevenneiman

I don't think that was resurrection. He was mortally wounded in a way that would have been quickly lethal, but I don't think he was quite dead yet. Pretty sure that it was just very quick, very effective, very timely healing.

superkeaton

I wonder if the Grey Pilgrim travels through the same off-screen Nowhere that the Bard does.

SMHF

"HEROES NEVER DIE!"
Fucking Mercy mains! -_-

Btw dont forget to wait for the guide guys!
<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

SMHF

Vote... I meant vote... -_- Gonna take a nap now!

Anon

Well, I suppose it was to be expected that 'trainer of young heroes' would, on some level, include resurrection for a priest-type mentor hero.

Now, how many times he can do it is the question of the day – or at least, will he and the other heroes be able to box Cat in to draw on Winter and thus use Saint to tear her connection to the Mantle to shreds.

Like...unless Cat (and Masego) can continue to 2v7 AND somehow keep the Pilgrim from healing, things aren't looking so hot – granted, that's playing into the narrative of forcing Cat into a corner, but even that may not be enough.

haihappen

Do not forget that two members of the Woe are unaccounted for, and the heroes therefore need to be cautious. Thief may not be a brawler, but did exhibit the possibility to yolk powers, or the manifestation thereof, away.

And Archer just screams battlefield assassination to the first hero that gets into the position to kill Cat. Dramatic reveal and all that.

Walter

They are probably fighting the unaccounted for heroes.

Metrux

The battle is not started yet, at this exact moment the only ones fighting are the Named, since the host was BEHIND the Heroes and Cat went forward to meet them. I don't think Archer will get a kill shot, but she or deadhand will for sure appear to help Cat... Unless they are doing something else of a secret plan we readers had no access to. But yeah, even with all five of them fighting Saint alone would be subpar, fighting her with several Heroes and Pilgrim... Suicide doesn't even being. She wasn't wrong she said to Masego that with Saint there victory is not to be aimed. But I think Masego wasn't wrong when he said they would win in the end...

ahd

Black taught his squire well.

daegone823

I really wish I knew the names of the new heroes so I can add them to the wiki page. If we never find out I hope erraticerrata tells us in the future as I am begging to know the individual heroic names.

Rook

The barely introduced hammer guy said it pretty well. What use are introductions to the dead?

Some of them will probably get fleshed out, but with so many of Heroes and the Pilgrim/Saint taking so much of the limelight as primary antagonists... Cat might pulp a few of them too quickly to learn their Names

Honestly I would say their odds of survival in the near future are proportional to the amount of screentime they get. I'd say the monk and sword+board have the best chances so far, what with monk being paid some special attention, and knife eye being the first rez

daegone823

I believe that the names help reader understand the universe or country from which they came from, they represent the best or worst that culture has to offer thus far all we have had presented from this "good" nation are a sword slayer, hero trainer, and a soothsayer. Not really much of a representation in comparison to Praes which has iconic names such as Black Knight(military), Warlock(Magic), and the Empress( maniacal plans), Chancellor (Diplomacy). Each serves a purpose whereas we really have gotten no indication about what these good nation stands for. Levant though has had a few representations of there warrior nation though, still that is a small piece of the puzzle.

Metruux

I think this is more a manifestation of the culture. We all remember Black talking about how Names change based on the culture that birthed them, like a culture that presides over secrecy would have secret Names. In Praes everything goes around the tower in a spiral of power, everyone and everything has a position, it is very orderly if you think about it, and thus their Named each have a specific position and role. For what we know of Callow the Names were MUCH more varied, except for two: the royal and the mage; every other Named changed from generation to generation, but they all kept to the "fucking the enemy more than they could fuck you", which is a very Callowan thing.

Thus, it seems a little senseless the Named we've seen, but we don't know their culture, neither the place their Names have between other Named in their cultures.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Did anyone else notice the discrepancy about Masego's scrying? Masego scryed Juniper without a scrying bowl back in Book 3 chapter 43, so the trick isn't exactly new. Somethings feels absent...

haihappen

Yeah, the demon is still unaccounted for. I can see a few possible cases it is used without dramatic implications: E.g., Black/Warlock drop it on the Stairway to make it disappear.

Barthumphries

It's a demon of forgetfulness. It has been accounted for, we just all forgot about it. :p

onedollargum

Those ones are the worst. It's hard to defend against point-blank existence failure.

haihappen

Error 404: Existence not found or

Segmentation fault! Invalid access to reality NULL

or

*sky turns blue and displays:* This reality encountered a critical error! Please restart.

MetruX

But didn't he use a medium anyway? I think what she thinks on this chapter is that scrying always uses something as medium, while he just plainly wrote on air.

Big Brother

And at this point, maybe during this engagement, or at least before the end of the Battle of Camps, Cat will probably get her new Name. Something new, something powerful, that let's her stand toe-to-toe with the Saint AND Pilgrim in preparation for the coming war with the Gnomes.

Because that's coming, possibly at the moment the Crusade falls, because Pickler's siege engines are probably a little too advanced for their liking. Praes has already gotten two Red Letters, and you can bet the gnomes know Callow is a Praesi Protectorate at the moment.

haihappen

She will get a new Name only after the Saint has cut Winter to shreds and forcefully separates her from the remains, which most likely results in her body dying from the backlash. And then the Pilgrim revives her, because he saw the best intentions, even if tainted by dark methods. Which gets him killed, probably by the Saint. Which forces a clash between the Saint and Cat, in kind of a "you killed my mentor" pattern, but with the roles somewhat broken, but that wouldn't be a first, would it?

In that slash, a Name may emerge. Or after.

The "You killed my mentor" part may come in if the crusader host breaks her army, marches towards the vales and Black gets killed in the battle by the saint. But that would rob the White Knight of a mirror on the Dark side, possibly ending his story there and ripping of any possibly present plot armor...

Too many possibilities...

chris S

I don't think there's going to be a Gnome war. The gist I've got from earlier mentions is that when the Gnomes decide a nation gets too high tech for their liking, it's less of a war and more of a "entire nation disappears overnight" type of situation.

Cap'n Smurfy

Pickler's siege engines don't bother the gnomes as, at the end of the day, they're just particularly clever balistae. They're not game-changing. All the stuff the gnomes have taken issue to are things that could kick start an agricultural or industrial revolution. Technologies that could change a civilization, not weapons and magic.

MetruX

Actually not even that, their problem is not in advancement or any such thing, but in physics. If you advance in physics you can learn all kinds of nice things that can't be unlearnt... So they destroy anyone who comes close to the fountain of their power. If you create a magic tech to allow everyone born be the little bit stronger or faster, they wouldn't care in the least.

Also, there would be no war, even elves and dwarfs won't intrude with physics because they fear the Gnomes, Cat is good, Cat is great, but come the Gnomes she'll only die without doing a thing.

Edrey

zeze is watching and he can copy miracles now so the future looks promising

Author Unknown

"You remember our training?" I asked.

If only more people had this training...

Absinthe with Mephisto

A knife entering through the eye would have to pass through the bone behind it, then, if it somehow punched through the bone, it could cut through the frontal lobe if angled upwards, humans can survive this. If the knife goes deeper into the brain and hits the more wild parts of the brain that controls more primordial parts of our brain that controls functions such as breathing or one's heartbeat, this would kill our poor hero.

oldschoolvillain

If there is a single weapon that Cat can be expected to kill someone with, it is the knife. That's her truest weapon in this story, honestly. She made her first kill with it. She's been constantly upgrading how she uses and accesses them for maximizing their capacity for murder. The knife, even more than the sword, is Catherine's weapon. If she stabs you in the face, you are going to die, regardless of the anatomy of the blow. I'm pretty sure that Catherine's knife will be what kills the Wandering Bard, because there is so much narrative weight behind Catherine wielding that weapon that the only other option I can see is goblinfire.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Oh damn nice catch. She also ended her apprenticeship as the Squire with Black by stabbing him in the stomach, just as he did with her. I feel that adds to the narrative weight of the knife as a symbol of Cat's growth and evolution as a character and as a story -breaker too.

haihappen

It ended as it began: By shedding blood with a knife.

I am pretty sure she still has that knife, even it is lost or assumed to be destroyed, I dare think it is one of those items that has become a part of her, and will find its way back to her every time.

Walter

I don't think WB will die by a weapon. Her bodies are disposable. Killing her essence, or just making it stay away, will take story shenanigans. I think she 'dies' by being outwitted.

Cynar

How about a knife coated in goblin fire? Seems the perfect weapon to deal with a magic teleporting opponent, who seems to be fueled by high proof alcohol.

Upclose and personal, with the goblin fire robbing her of her default retreat. Also, combining goblin fire with alcohol sounds rather spectacular. 😊

MagnaMalusLupus

Maybe this is a bit of useless speculation, but I'm wondering if Cat won't get a new name like The Knife; as you've mentioned, it seems tied to her story heavily, far more than any other symbol. That being said, it doesn't denote leadership at all, which doesn't match her current position.

Perhaps becoming the first true Queen of Blades, as the other one was just a title rather than a Name

Naeddyr

The problem is that Names are about public perception, myths and stories and people thinking thoughts at you. WoE is that Cat wouldn't become "Queen of Blades" because A) it's not a name B) she's not associated with the original Queen of Blades at all. Besides, she's not even that good at swording, really.

Same goes for the Knife. Tell a random Callowan their new monarch has that Name and they'd go all "but why?".

Honestly I am actually still expecting Black Queen to lurk somewhere out in the ether waiting for an opportunity to pounce. Other variants such as Dread Queen or Dark Queen or Grim Queen or Winter Queen probably went home with a black eye or sprained ankle.

Metrux

My own take is that she won't have a regency Name, because she WILL resign. It's already too entranced in herself to let it pass. Thus she will have a name NOT suited to ruling, giving even more weight when she leaves the nation so it becomes better.

Oshi

Yes but the considering Cats physical strength this is very possible. It's likely he wasn't dead but close to it and that's why the Pilgrim was there.

JackbeThimble

The average dagger is longer than the average human skull. Much longer. If you get through the orbit you're going to pass through everything until you come out the back of the occipital lobe, at which point the person is going to collapse in massive shock shortly before dying.

Metrux

I think you don't know much about anatomy... Humans can survive a full spear through your cranium, but most would die of shock right there. Also, there is no bone behind the eyes, it's exactly why it is such a weak spot. You see, people want to cripple vision, sure, but wouldn't the nose and ears also be crippling and easier to hit? People aim at the eyes because, differently from the others, it is unprotected in the vitality, if it goes through the eyes, it hits directly at the brain.

But, none of this matters, we are talking about Named, people who can survive a grenade on the face, while still dying to an arrow through the neck. This is much more about the tale than the true damage dealt, a punch or kick can be deadlier than a blade, so if the story says it was a killing blow... It is. Otherwise, expect them to go right through any damage dealt.

Iqueenofblades1

Is it just me or are the chapters shorter than they used to be than the first few chapters of this book and compared to the previous book especially. Because I just finished reading the entire series again, and it seems like it to me.

I miss those long chapters 😞

Mike E.

Keep in mind we have steadily been getting 3 updates a week for quite awhile, so overall volume of prose is probably up even though each update may be slightly smaller.

esryok

EE's word count has gone through the roof since Patreon hit its targets. For the curious...

Average chapter lengths per book | words per week:

- Book I: 5,141 | 5,325
- Book II: 4,227 | 4,642
- Book III: 3,889 | 7,709
- Book IV: 3,804 | 13,657

Pilgrim the White

Grey will slowly warm up to Cat. Towards the end of the book he will resurrect Cat (as a human?) after Saint finally kills her.

Letouriste

I expect to FORCE HIM to resurect him:)

The only problem with that would be her story can't easily allow a second resurrection

Lee

Fucking priest

Yotz

...And so, I the pitch of battle so demonstrably and unequivocally stacked, I finally felt it – the call of oblivion, the tattering brink of madness... and the promise of power. Well then. I will not gaze into the Abyss only to feel it returning gaze – I'll pluck her eyes and make them my own.

My lips trembled, then moved as of their own will, forming meaningless syllables of ancient blasphemy.

"Eye d'ee d'ee k'yu d'ee."

nobodi12

A updated map of Callow

MagnaMalusLupus

Well done, but I'm not seeking the Redflower Vales. Wouldn't they be on this, or am I mistaken?

nipi

Typos:

"Clarity and skill will win ever time."

"That was one was dangerous"

stevenneiman

"yet I never could [must->muster] much antipathy"

"Taking marching orders from Above or Below is just abdicating the rights {to} your own life"

"Clarity and skill will win [ever->every] time." or, possible though less likely, "over time"
"[Board->Broad] arcs both, that they could readjust if I went forward."

sengachi

How do you target the Healer first when the healer is the fucking Grey Pilgrim?

Walter

You do not? Like, presumably this is the question generations of villains have been throwing up their hands at. Dude's rep is that when he throws down with villains while his pupils get away he never loses. That's a serious rep for an old man to have.

Euodiachloris

Rule One: Do not act incautiously when confronting little bald wrinkly smiling men!

Snowfire1224

Discworld. Thief of Time.

stevenneiman

Honestly, the scary thing about him is surviving this long as a mentor figure. They tend to have about the same survival rate as kamikaze pilots with terminal cancer, so for one to survive that well he needs to have both storycrafting skills and power.

burdi

Grey Pilgrim had to live so cat can get her peace with another country but its not her first plan which isnt feasible anymore

after several dead heroes revived by Pilgrim, it is not impossible cat will "fuck it, better all of them dead than my own", so she will kill pilgrim first because she has no other choice and said "fuck with them all, let them come..i will burn them all, whether its god or all the army in the calernia, villains and heroes..they want to fucking with callow i will kill them every single one of them"

hoyboy

She should make sure to find a good dry cleaner who specializes in washing out the blood and ashes of her own people first.

Metrux

I don't think she CAN kill the Pilgrim. Not as she is now, anyway. Masego in a special occasion? Hakram while fighting for her? Yeah, but she herself is in no position for that.

*benthelynx*

He has used that aspect now. Not sure he can use it again as many times as he likes.

*Walter*

Heroes at this point:

- 1 Gray Pilgrim
- 2 Saint of Swords
- 3 Hammer Guy
- 4 Sword and Board who rushed Cat
- 5 Staff Lady
- 6 Greatsword
- 7 Healer's first guard
- 8 Healer's second guard
- 9 Healer
- 10 Mage ?
- 11 Two Knives
- 12 ?

Dunno how right that is, just a first stab at hero identifying.

MagnaMalusLupus

Is Red Robe the mage you mentioned? If not, that's 12

esryok

From context it seems like "red-robed mage" is meant to refer to the pyromancer Cat tangled with during Operation Headsman, though at the time he was described as a "short man with a leather coat and casting rod".

Pretty sure there's still one hero we haven't seen.

*Shawn Panzegraf*

Kinda want to call BS on that GP save:

You put a combat blade through the eye socket, and you've hit white matter in the brain. Even if magic can whoosh all that trauma away, there are distinct bio-electric patterns in there that are really, really important. Things that would be disrupted by that kinda of trauma.

It's a pet peeve of mine in the fantasy genre when "clerical" magic heals brain trauma, yet the healed experiences no memory loss, personality change, or other side effects. Simply whisking all the damage away isn't enough to make that person mentally whole again. If the healer in question is capable of restoring stuff that intricate, then resurrection of anyone, no matter how thoroughly dead so long as a body remains should be trivial.

I find myself thinking about this a lot, because arrows in the eye are INCREDIBLY common in the fantasy genre. Followed right behind by knives, thrown mainly, then wielded. I grit my teeth whenever I read a healer hand-wave that away.

JackbeThimble

Dude. The main protagonist of this story doesn't even have a brain-she just uses fae magic to fake it well enough that the world acts as if she does. This isn't that kind of story.

MagnaMalusLupus

The difference is that in this story, there is the notion of a distinct soul that contains all of who one is and completely separate from the body itself. So long as they are connected, healing the body would be pretty straightforward for a sufficiently powerful divine individual. Plus, the Gods Above cheat.

Euodiachloris

Angels and/or Gods did it – and they tend to have the blueprints. 😊

d_o_l

I mean, it's literally described as a miracle in-universe..

TeK

What if his condition is just reversed back in time? No lasting damage to brain, no traumatic memories, he's all up and healthy again. Thought of that? And yes, resurrection can work on people who were dead for a lo-oh-ong time. Your problem, is one of a failure of imagination.

Mlissa

I now have, in mind, a scene where someone appears in the middle of the fight, right after the Grey Pilgrim healed the unnamed Named, to rant about how bullshit that was and why it shouldn't work using knowledge of modern biology. Everybody stops fighting from the sheer absurdness of it all. The Grey Pilgrim and the new guy get into a peaceful yet heated debate about medicine and History of miracles that ends up as a debate between science and dogmatism. All that while Cat, amused, sits on her folding chair and smokes her pipe.

Yotz

My two bits to the pot – we are talking about the world where [i]souls[/i] exist. Memory and cognitive functions therefore are delegated to spiritual realm purely, and any memory I II II I_ and/or cognitive disorders would be a product of defective vessel for a subject's soul, thus making the removing them a simple process of repairing the vessel, id est – body.

And no – inborn defects, nor mental illnesses a-la schizophrenia do not fall under this case, cause being underdeveloped soul for the former, and damaged soul for the latter.

The point of arguing the miracle cure of severe steel poisoning in such world would be akin to standing on the high tower near Cori Celesti during thunderstorm wearing naught but a pure copper armour set, and proclaiming loudly that gods, in fact, do not exist and all religions are based on lies. I mean, you can get away with this if you are made of clay or something – but otherwise...

Now, if we are to discard the concept of soul altogether and accept that each and every human being is nothing more but a biomechanical turing machine, albeit a very complex one – you, monsieur Panzegraf, would be compleately on the money with general course of your statements. Otherwise – not so much.

PS: Regarding ASoIaF and consimilar – people who got themselves resurrected tend to accumulate certain... [i]quirks[/i], that's true, yes. But. Said curious fancies on their part are direct result of their souls being damaged by the aftereffects of death, or something from the other side impersonating the diseased, and doing it poorly. In the case of truly Divine Intervention first would be easely mended, and second would either out of options, or being done be design of Deity in question.

Yotz

PPS: Semblance of realism?
Really?

...

Well then. Be on your own, vqrð nafjarðar, be on your own.

sengachi

I'm pretty sure Grey Pilgrim invoked the power of literal, actual capital-G Gods to make this happen, and if anything had complete and perfect enough knowledge of the universe's past to effect this kind of healing, it would be Gods.

Also you do have a point, and that point is probably why actual resurrection happens so rarely. Because it's **not** just healing. It's way, way more than that on a mechanical level.

Brian Heward

Maybe it's still coming, but I'd expect using gates to deploy siege weaponry in the middle of the enemy's mage or priest lines would be a good counter to the fence problem. (Cat isn't the only one in her army who can use gates this would take 1 fae + a bunch of goblins, leaving the mages free to decimate troops elsewhere instead of the goblins and mages both firing into fences.)

The goblins have proven the effectiveness of this before. Open a gate, fire a few shots, if you start to get overrun close the gate, finish off the enemy in arcadia, reset to open the gate again in a new location.

It's really hard to defend against someone who can be behind you at any time when they weren't there a second ago and can ignore any walls, shield lines, or even troops surrounding your high value targets.

Even if the priests are fucking with scrying I'd expect opening gates blindly in the general area of the enemy's army would still work wonders. (Although from what I understood the priests can only defend themselves from scrying, not the mages.)

nigeltheoutlaw

Heroes are such fucking cheaters.

Syst

Is it possible to have a "Next Chapter" link at the top of the page?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

You can also get to the next chapter via the sidebar on the right. It's not what you're asking for, but it entails less scrolling, so...

shieldredblog

Maybe I'm crazy but I find it odd that the Grey Pilgrim appeared from nowhere and essentially undid a fatal wound right after a off camera fight with an Absence Demon.

I always thought that his Choir of Mercy was strangely weak to Absence, as he's stated that he'd do anything to prevent suffering. What if he could Undo suffering?

That 500 year old demon is out there somewhere and we know that it's age will make it cleverer than most. No way is it going to die off camera.

Also Heirophant being around is another small clue. If the Demon has somehow corrupted the Hero, than he'd be needed.

MetruX

I don't think Masego would be here simply because the Demon is around, they wouldn't know it is, and this young mage is no hero, he wouldn't be at the right place at the right time to fight a demon. But, more than that, he is needed FOR THE VILLAINS to fight a demon, heroes can kill demons while villains cannot. We saw a bunch of inexperienced Named without coordination killing a demon of corruption as old as this one, so why couldn't the rest of the Heroes take it doen, with or without the Pilgrim?

Also, for all their power, demons are limitless and limited. The power of heavens and of the bellow stay always the same, but there is always more demons and devils being born... Don't you think the same numbers are dying? In the grand scheme of things demons are a pretty small thing, even if compared to their angelic counter parts, I can totally see demons abound dying off screen.

shieldredblog

This demon has a backstory though and if it was dead I feel like it would have been mentioned and made very clear. Also I meant ERRATICERRATA wrote Masego into the scene because the Demon was around, not that Masego knew the Demon was around.

Euodiachloris

If it died, who would even know? Betcha its death/banishment throws involve a "everybody loses all memory of this encounter and things and people lost to them" AOE.

Shawn Panzegraf

Ugh,
When you start making "This story's sub-genre permits X" arguments, you're basically just tossing any semblance of realism out the window. While the Guide's story-universe allows for a lot of patently unreal stuff, the fantasy elements that go against realism are generally well understood/definitively delineated from a Reader PoV. Magic has strengths and weaknesses, Aspects work along several threads of Commonality, etc etc.

In other words, it's realistic until it isn't. That doesn't mean it should be taken for granted that a wound which would generally be instantly fatal can be hand-waved away without consequence. (I read the people survive penetrating wounds like this post. To retort: No, people really don't survive having made-for-war weapons driven through their eye sockets with sufficient supernatural strength to go clean through, rather than crunch through, the bone behind the eye. The force of such a blow would do brain damage, before you even GET to the stabbing.)

Heroes healing the non-fatal with bursts of Light is fine. It's what Guide Heroes DO. It's almost a commonality they all seem to share. Shaving this close to the death-line is an ugly precedent IMHO. Good already has enough mechanical advantage over Evil. Requiring Evil to Decapitate At Minimum to be sure of a kill is a bit too far for me.

That's just my humble opinion. Won't stop reading over it or anything.

oldschoolvillain

It was mentioned way back that villains live until they're killed, while heroes have options for resurrection. And the Grey Pilgrim has already been hinted at having a direct line to his choir, high power white magic could absolutely undo a fatal blow so soon after it had been struck.

TeK

Heroes can literally go back from the dead, but Villains can go back AS dead. Dread Emperor Revenant as a shining example, Dead King is, probably the other, not to mention those angry undead Praesi High Lords who thought that death should not remove them from the line of succession. And Aqua and her baby-soul failsafe measure.

I don't understand what is impossible with resurrection if you got a universe where people can turn themselves into undead abominations AFTER decapitation, and then go on and STOP being undead abomination, returning to being alive. Did that went well withh you? Or is it fine, cause she's a protagonist?

Unmaker

Cat knows for a fact that the Gray Pilgrim is the type to show up at the last minute and save any hero that he previously mentored. I hope that she is truly Black's pupil and her killing the kid was to deliberately draw the Gray Pilgrim out for some planned nastiness.

Phantom

This chapter made me wonder how the heck does the villains in the past even managed to defeat the heroes or conquer the world when the heroes are so overpowered with abilities and skills in the first place.

TeK

How to you defeat someone OP? Just be more OP.

Shawn Panzegraf

Not getting what I'm saying,
I don't have any beef with magical resurrection. It's a staple of the fantasy genre. Particularly among the "forces of Light." I started talking about a) That it bugs me that brain-healing via magic never seems to come with any consequences given you're talking about the seat of consciousness being meddled with, and b) That there's a difference between the healing of a life-threatening and/or mortal wound, and resurrection itself.

In other words, if the GP resurrected him, fine. He's a high-end mentor type Hero. That's in his expected power range. What I was mainly saying is it's a bit much for me if a dagger to the brain gets called "simple" wound-healing. Beyond that, I was only talking about how there never seems to be any complications with brain trauma in the fantasy genre in general, and that simply mending the biological damage isn't the same thing as making that person the same as they were before said injury.

Given we don't even know what the GP did to mend the sword-and-boarder, it's a moot point anyways. I kinda took the junior Hero gasping as he was fixed to mean he was resuscitated, which implies he was resurrected, but that's a subjective interpretation.

It was commentary about a sort of sequence of events often seen in the fantasy genre at large I was talking about. Not ranting about the Guide as some glaring offender of the principal anyways.

Oh, and for those saying there isn't bone behind the eye...what those of us talking about penetrating bone behind the eye mean is the channel of the socket behind the eye narrows considerably once you're past the actual eyeball. For something to go through the eye and penetrate any distance, it would have to push through bone to either side of the penetrating object. Unless you're talking about the narrowest of stilettos, most things people pierce the eye of a combatant with (including daggers, and DEFINITELY arrowheads) are wider than the channel of narrowing bone. It's not a matter of an actual barrier behind the eyeball, it's the bone to the rear-right/left of the eyeball that has to get a furrow scraped through it to do the deep penetration. Make sense?

aran

"Broaden," he said.

... not denying that it was useful right then, but seriously? An entire **aspect** just for enlarging your weapon?

JJR

This is what he used it for at that moment, this does not mean the aspect is restricted to weapon enlargement. Another use might be to increase the size of defensive armaments. Using it regularly means you could get away with carrying a 1/3 sized shield and pump it up to full size only when needed. More offensive applications might be to target flaws or holes in enemies armor/defensive fortifications and rip them open.

A more abstract one, suppose he needs to learn how to do a new thing fairly quickly. Maybe he could Broaden his Horizons.

daegone823

Apparently it was similar to bleach where the weapon weighed the same for the hero even though others would feel a heavier force. Defies physics a bit but whatevs its an aspect and maybe it can also be used for other things such as shield or for bladed weapons enlarging a small weapon wound while still inside a villain. Gin Ichimura(bleach) showed that it wasn't the size of the weapon that mattered but the speed at which enlargement took place that made it dangerous.

I don't know if you were looking for an explanation but here's one.

stevenneiman

Compensating for something?

aran

I feel compelled to make an Order of the Stick reference at this point: <http://www.giantitp.com/comics/oots0114.html>

---

Chapter 16: Pirouette

"When the abyss stares back, wave. Offer refreshments. Being impolite to the abyss is never a good idea."

-Dread Emperor Malevolent I, the Unhallowed

"Oh, come on," I complained. "I know I don't have a lot of room to argue about healing, but that knife was tickling the back of his skull. Even I wouldn't walk that off so easily, and my body is basically lies and mirrors."

There was some shuffling from the opposition, either because of the reminder I'd just killed one of their crew or because grievances at how fucking ridiculous their powers were weren't what they'd been expecting. If they'd been waiting for despair, they were out of luck. Not that I was particularly pleased my work had been literally waved away by the Pilgrim, but that the heroes would be almost absurdly hard to put down wasn't exactly a surprise. The Heavens had already thrown their second-raters at me and I'd chewed straight through them over winter. They were done fucking around.

"You could still surrender," the Grey Pilgrim offered.

Instead I sighed and tapped the side of my helmet. The sliver of power was enough to activate the dormant rune.

"Spell formula stable," Masego said. "No divine interference."

"Confirmed resurrection," I said. "Pilgrim's come out to play."

Thief had warned me that last-moment rescues were his specialty so it wasn't coming out of the blue, though after actually landing that blow I'd expected the hero to actually stay down afterwards. At least the first part was going more or less according to plan. Smacking around the greenhorns some had forced one of the real monsters to intervene before I dug a little too deep and Winter took the helm. I almost felt like shivering at the idea of facing the Grey Pilgrim when in a state of mind where monologues felt like a good idea. Akua might have been right that playing it up for Creation added some hurt to the swings, but there was a reason I was wearing her as a cloak accessory instead of the other way around.

"Noted," Hierophant replied. "First contingency beginning."

"Skip straight to second," I grunted. "I think we underestimated how much trouble the old man would be."

Which was a Hells of a thing to say, considering we'd planned for him being in the same wheelhouse as Warlock. But if I was reading this right, swinging his miracle dick around wasn't the Pilgrim's game. He was more a metaphorical full hand on the scales than the kind of Named that tossed around burning mountains. And that's only eight out of twelve accounted for, I thought. Saint and at least one mage are still waiting in the wings.

"Understood," Hierophant said. "Sunrise Final is-"

Power flared, and his words cut out. I glanced at the Grey Pilgrim, whose staff was wreathed in light.

"Rude," I said. "You could have let him finish. Regardless, I'm reconsidering my stance on single combat. Theoretically, if I agree, do I get to pick my opponent?"

I met the stare of the man I'd stabbed and winked on the same side my knife had gone through. He flinched.

"She is temporizing while her ally prepares his strike," the Grey Pilgrim told the other heroes. "Prepare yourselves, children. After that blow is weathered is the moment to strike."

Gods, but I hated fighting smart opponents. Banter would have kept William and his crew busy for a few minutes, at least. It didn't matter, in the end, because I hadn't spent the last year busying myself sorely with the affairs of rule. While they'd been assembling their armies and heroes, I'd been training the Woe. And the one amongst them I'd spent most time on was Masego, hammering in the basics of battle that he'd once ignored in favour of simply smashing everything in sight with sorcery. The first thing I'd taught him? A well-worn adage from Theodosius the Unconquered himself. Swiftmess is the lifeblood of war. Before the heroes could further prepare, Hierophant struck. Dawn rose from a sun unknown to Creation, the terrible heart of Summer shining down on the cluster of heroes. Even from where I stood, the heat was overwhelming. Wind picked up even as the Named before me winked out of sight, swallowed by scorching light. The Princess of High Noon had been one of our most vicious enemies to deal with, but we had gained much from her defeat: even this pale imitation of her power made mockery of the kind of sorcery we usually called on.

Within the blaze, a star was born. Shining atop the Grey Pilgrim's staff as he stood unruffled, his loose robes untouched by wind or heat.

"As there was first light, there will be last," the old man said. "Under radiant star was the first of mankind born, and it will shine long after our time is past. Transient we, yet unbowed by the passing. I refuse your verdict, usher of mysteries."

With a thunderous clap, the blaze was parted. A corridor opened, leading straight to me, and the heroes rushed down. I rolled my shoulder. Half the knockout punch was delivered, I was my responsibility to take care of the second half. The barefoot staff-wielder was first across, blindingly fast. Behind came the usual triumvirate: greatsword, war hammer, sword and board. Not the same as before, for the latter. Apparently coming that close to dying had shaken the man, because it was now another. The sorcery came down around me, too close to a ward for comfort. I grimaced. I'd have to suffer through, at least until the time to withdraw came. Stance wide, I raised my guard and waited for the first of the hunting hounds. She thrust high, towards my throat. Batted aside, but she was better with her weapon than I was with mine – a spin was all it took for her to be smashing down at my pauldron. I took it. The steel shattered like clay, but the impact wasn't strong enough to screw with my own blow. It carved a wound across her cheek, narrowly missing the nose. I got in close to sucker punch her belly, but she parried the blow and I was forced to step back to avoid having my ribcage caved in. Light bloomed on her cheek, the healer's work.

It healed nothing.

Masego had fought demons at Second Liesse. One of them had been a demon of Order, what Praesi called a Beast of Hierarchy. Their essence, as I understood it, was a perversion of laws. Hierophant had learned to mimic that, to a very limited extent. Inside my killing grounds one law had been established: Light had no effect. The barefoot woman withdrew before I could exploit her surprise, damnably well-trained, and then I had to deal with the second wave. Greatsword – what was left of that weapon, anyway – went for the left side. Hammer for the right, the fresh sword and board keeping me boxed in. I almost smiled. They'd had a limited amount of training together and it was showing: that made it the second time they were trying that tactic on me. Last time I'd gone for one of the sides, and they weren't idiots: they were expecting as much. Instead I barrelled forward. The hero's shield bashed forward to keep me in place for the others to hit, but they'd learned the wrong lesson from the last time. It wasn't that I couldn't break their formation, just that I hadn't chosen to. My armoured fist hit the shield and it dented, the man wielding it crying in pain as it broke his fingers behind it. It was a good opening to slice his throat, but the other two were at my back so there was no time. I ran into him, the two of us falling to the ground as weapons whistled behind me.

Instinct led me to throw myself to the side instead of wrestling on the ground. It saved my life. Summer's dawn had not only been broken by the Pilgrim, it had been wielded: he shaped it into a beam and threw it at me. His aim was perfectly angled, enough that it didn't touch sword and board when he stayed on the ground. Behind me, earth exploded in desiccated chunks. Time was running out: I couldn't engage four heroes and the old man simultaneously, that'd just get me killed. I'd have to get aggressive then.

"They damaged the Light," the barefoot woman said in heavily accented Lower Miezan. "Careful."

It was the right move, telling her comrades healing mistakes was no longer an option. It was also the wrong one, because for a heartbeat they were surprised. I shot back towards the boy with the wrecked greatsword, ducking under a swing and catching the wrist. Hammer-wielder would have smacked me away, aiming for my hips, but a flex of the legs had me putting my feet on the boy's chest while the hammer passed under me. For a heartbeat I was vulnerable, and that had the staff-wielder on my ass. Not quick enough, for once, I thought. My thighs tightened, and using the boy's own chest as a counterweight I ripped his arm off. There was a spray of blood and an anguished scream as I fell into a roll, the staff smashing down where I'd been a heartbeat before. Left with a bleeding arm wielding the remains of a greatsword in my free hand, I threw it in the hammer-wielder's face before he could aim another strike. He was horrified enough to take a hand off the hammer to push it aside, and that was a mistake. I landed the roll on my feet, angled my stance and smoothly rose. My blade thrust in an upwards diagonal into his throat. He opened his mouth, trying to gurgle out a word – aspect, probably – but I smacked the pommel and the sword went straight through his spine. It was an uglier death than a clean decapitation.

"Enough," the Grey Pilgrim said.

He pointed his staff at me and a star came to life. The beam hit a pane of force three heartbeats before it would have incinerated me, both of them exploding deafeningly. Gods bless Hierophant. Sword and board was getting back on his feet, greatsword boy still screaming about his missing arm – seriously, what a wimp, I lost limbs all the time and you didn't hear me yelling about it – and staff-wielder was... back on me. Godsdamnit. I threw myself to the side, swiped at her feet and got treated to a kick in the face for it. While I was rocking back she flowed into a thrust at my throat. Ah, experience. She'd gone for that too often, I'd expected it this time. I caught the tip of the staff with my hand, feeling the steel give and the palm bones break, but I kept my grip on it while I slashed at her throat and she tried to withdraw for a parry. Blood spilled on the ground. Two down, though it was anybody's guess for how long.

"Sever."

Masego's miracle vanished. So did my sword, my hand up to the wrist and the armour over it. Fuck. I backpedalled hastily as the Saint entered the fray.

"Aspect already?" I said.

My hand formed again, though much slower than it should have. And it remained ice instead of looking like flesh. That was a problem.

"Your little mage's trick was impressive," the Saint of Swords said. "But time to wrap this up, if we want it over before sundown."

The lack of sword was more a problem than the severed limb, ice or not. A flick of the wrist had a knife falling into my palm, but that was rather cold comfort against this particular monster.

"Fine," I said. "I've been thinking on how to beat you anyway, Saint."

The Grey Pilgrim, apparently uninterested in banter, sent another fucking star at me. Hierophant, bless his soul, split it in four and forced it to shoot in four different directions.

"Have you?" the old woman drawled. "This ought to be interesting."

I could not help but notice none of the heroes I'd put down were getting the resurrection treatment. Was it just comprehensive healing at the last moment, then? Too little to go on to be sure.

"One swing," I said. "If you can take that, I'm probably out of luck."

The heroine laughed.

"Well," she grinned. "Give it your best shot."

Ice formed a sword blade out of my knife as I shifted my grip. Steadying my stance, I allowed the power of Winter to gather in me. Motes of blue emanated from my frame. To my surprise, the Saint actually bothered to get into a stance of her own. Huh, she was taking me seriously. That was kind of flattering.

"Welp," I said, and run away.

I legged it as fast as I could, which was very considering my mantle. They really must have taken me for a complete idiot, if they'd thought I'd stick around to fight a crew of heroes and the two old beasts. I heard the air howl behind me as the heroine cussed me out in Chantant, leaping onto a platform of shade to get out of the way. I tapped the side of my helmet as I leapt back down, running as fast as I could towards the relative safety of the palisade.

"Masego," I said. "I need you to-"

"Dodge," he screamed through the spell.

I threw myself to the side, and idly reflected that the smoking wound in the ground to my left could easily have been my corpse. Lovely.

"Mage lines on her," I continued. "Artillery too. Gods, everything we can throw."

The sharp tang of lightning filled the air as what must have been no less than thirty feet behind me exploded in a screaming storm. I did not look back.

"She just ran through that," Hierophant said through the spell, sounding somewhat offended by the notion.

Engaging the heroes far away from the fortifications had seemed like a good idea at the time, but I was perhaps coming to realize it might have been a tactical mistake. The air howled again and I leapt onto an angled platform, immediately leaping onto another to remain above ground. Where there was now a hole. Shit. A handful of Pickler's engines began firing, but I wasn't holding my breath for scorpion bolts stopping that one. I heard the screaming wind of another strike coming my way and shaped a platform, but it was immediately hit by a beam of light. Fucking Pilgrim. I had to reach for Winter and slap down half a ton of ice behind me, not that it stopped the Saint for more than a heartbeat. I gave part of my attention to the little bundle in the back of my head that was Zombie, ordering her to take flight and guiding her towards me.

"I'm not hearing her anymore," I said through the link.

"Put wards around her," Masego replied stiffly. "Can't talk, she's cutting them as fast as--"

The spell cut out again. Fucking Pilgrim. My damnably short legs devoured the remaining yards as quickly as they could. Seriously, you'd think Winter would have the decency to give me another few inches when rebuilding my body from scratch. Fine. I'd cope. I should get there without – don't you fucking dare blow it now, Foundling. Naturally, the Heavens rewarded my hubris by a neat little box of yellow opaque shields appearing around me. No rescue was incoming from my mage lines: the moment those had appeared, I'd felt sorcery bloom in the distance and shoot towards enemy lines. I was regretting the tactical decision of aiming my casters at the enemy's, right about now. I opened the floodgates, let Winter course through my veins and smashed through the shield in front of me the exact samemoment the Saint of Swords scythed through the one at my back.

"Seriously, what does it take to put you down?" I called out.

"More than you've got," the old woman hissed.

I was on the move before I even began speaking, but not quite fast enough. I lost my left leg up to my knee before I could dodge, though by the time I came out of a roll it had formed again. Fuck, I was digging into Winter way more than I'd wanted to this early in the fight. We'd have to use our trick as soon as I got back, even if that made it less effective than it could be. I leapt up onto a platform, a beam of light hitting a pane of force that blew them both up again a heartbeat later. I decided then and there Masego was getting a raise. Which shouldn't be hard, considering I wasn't paying him. The Saint carved through the platform, and my other leg that still had armour on it, but I was already in motion and I landed on Zombie's saddle. Awkwardly enough I almost fell, which would have been a very humiliating way to die, but my mount flew up and finally we made it out of the Saint's range. For now, anyway. Already she was cutting the sky to run up that same cut.

"Masego," I said, tapping the side of my helmet. "Get all our godsdamned mages to hit the target I'm marking."

There was no reply, because the spell was cut – fucking Pilgrim – so I'd have to hope he heard me. Weaving glamour into a glaring red arrow pointing at the Saint even as she moved, I guided Zombie into a sharply angled descent towards the palisade. Darkness formed into an orb above the Saint, and a heartbeat later a smaller beam shot out of it to hit the location I was indicating. To my vocal disgust, she somehow parried the fucking darkness. Gods Below, what was it going to take? After scorpions reoriented to fire on her, the Saint finally withdrew. I knew better than to believe that would be for long. She'd be back with the first wave of crusaders, which shouldn't be long. I'd been a little too busy fighting for my life to notice, but enemy archers had gotten close enough to the palisade to begin firing and the infantry wasn't far behind them. Zombie landed at Masego's side and I got off, slapping her rump as thanks for saving my own. She whinnied, which I definitely hadn't told her to do, and smugly trotted away.

It was telling that, at this point in my life, even my undead horse was sassing me.

"Hey, Zeze," I panted. "We having fun yet?"

"I've contained demons with the Ivory Globe," he replied, panting as well. "Demons, Catherine. She just cut out a door and kicked it open."

"Yeah, we're not going to be fighting her head on any time soon," I snorted. "Not unless we have a mountain range at hand to collapse, anyway."

His glass eyes flicked down to my bare feet, the movement visible even through cloth.

"What happened to you boots?"

I gestured vaguely backwards.

"Oh, they're somewhere back there," I said. "Along with what used to be my legs."

He snorted.

"One of those days, is it?" he said.

"Well, at least I don't have to bluff an angel," I mused. "So there's that."

We shared a smile.

"You ever see what happened to the heroes I killed?" I asked.

"They were not resurrected, last I saw," Masego said. "I suspect what the Grey Pilgrim uses is merely a much more powerful version of priestly healing, not true resurrection. Which seems logical, as that is usually the province of purely healer Named."

And the old man definitely wasn't that. His little light show had carried quite the punch. I adjusted my cloak around my shoulders, which did little to hide the fact that I was barefoot in the middle of an active battlefield. The crusaders were bringing ladders to the fore, I saw. If there was ever a time it was now.

"Our turn," I told Masego.

The blind mage smiled, and a whispered incantation had a water-filled bowl appearing in the palm of his hand. He'd not made it, of course. Materializing something even this small would likely kill him. It'd been brought out of a personal dimension, if I had to guess. Within the carved wooden bowl was dark water, the same that could be found within the pools of the Observatory.

"Let's hope this works," I said, glancing at the enemy army. "We're in the shit otherwise."

"The formula is-"he began.

I interrupted him by plunging my hand into the water. I went straight through, but did not reach the bottom of the bowl. My eyes fluttered closed as Masego whispered soothingly in the arcane tongue. Absolute positioning, he'd called this. I could feel my mind... expand. Beyond a perspective a mortal could bear, but I was hardly that anymore was I? One spike of painful clarity after another went through my forehead as I saw them whole. Calernia. Arcadia. The juxtaposition of them.

One end, Masego's voice whispered into my ear.

I knew it well, that place. I'd fought there twice, once against the Duke of Violent Squalls and the second time against the Diabolist. The Fields of Wend. A depthless lake filled with moving glaciers, sprawling as far as my not-eyes could see.

And another, Masego reminded me.

I could see the battlefield before us, from above. The armoured multitudes advancing towards palisades, like toy soldiers on the ground. Devices of wood and metal firing bolts into men, the shining silhouettes advancing with the host. So many of them.

Align, Masego whispered.

And so I did. Gates, I called them, but that was the barest understanding of what they were. There were no words in any tongue I knew to express it, but instinct bridged the gap. In the sky above the army of crusaders, a circle a mile wide opened.

Through it poured a lake atop their heads.

---

Snowfire1224

So hears what I'm thinking cat will do to defeat saint: get her to cut herself to peices

List

Isn't this just asking for a miracle intervention though? The priests deploy their shield and the water drowns the Callow countryside. Saint then Moses cuts them through the slush straight at Cat's army. The worst that happens is that they maybe get bogged down in the mud a little? I dunno I'm just not all that impressed with it. Why didnt she open a font of lava from an active volcano over their heads instead? Much more immediate destruction even if the priests used their shields the heat would still go through.

Charles

Think about how much water weighs. A cubic meter of water weighs 1000 kg. "A depthless lake stretching further than her enhanced eyes can see" is dropping on them from the sky, and it means that basically every person is getting struck with thousands of kg moving pretty fricking fast, immediately before being knocked down and drowned in their own armor. Even if the water drains away reasonably fast, there's still going to be a lot of it for more than the 60 seconds or so it takes people to drown, even setting aside the fact that it's likely to knock the wind out of them as it hits.

This is not "bog them down" levels of water.

Jeffery Wells

It's not just water, either, but water at freezing temperature. I can tell from personal experience (once fell into a glacier-fed lake that was about 3 degrees above freezing) that I've cold water completely said you of energy instantly. A bunch of soldiers in armor will drown in seconds without immediate, direct rescue. The heroes are powerful, but that's insane.

stevenneiman

It might actually be the lack of drama. A flood of lava means inescapable death, and you know what happens to villains who use supernatural means to (literally or figuratively) rain inescapable death down upon their Good foes. Now think about fighting in the rain, and how bad it would be if you get that to its logical extreme while the people you're fighting against have dry ground. Being a successful villain is often about getting what you need without ever quite giving the story an excuse to turn lethally against you.

Hammerman

Not sure a sea of icebergs a mile wide falling on the sun power in Pilgrims staff will give anything but a thunderclap of steam 14 miles wide. Should be exciting.

My very own name

Well, you have to consider that the lake also contains glaciers and shit. If that fell above the army, it wouldn't be exactly easy to shrug off.

werafdsaew

There is a limit to how many shields the priests can deploy, and I doubt it's anywhere close to enough, especially since you need to make it airtight or else gravity will screw over. And divine intervention is off the table due to the rules of engagement.

Bonesawer

I think people are drastically underestimating the amount of damage water does when falling in sufficient amounts from high up. When a regular human falls into water, there's a 50% chance of dying from falling from 30m up. I would assume that the water is falling from higher than that, and the force applied to the people is going to be higher since the ground is keeping them from decelerating relative to the water.

In addition, the "water jet" effect is easy to ignore but extremely deadly. Anyone outside of the radius of the portal is going to be scythed into by extremely pressurized jets of water caught between the immense pressure above and the ground below.

Another factor likely to kill people is the simple pressure of the water once it has landed. All of this is ignoring the additional kill-factors of the ice in the water, the speed that the water will be shooting out of the portal (since she opened it underwater), and the temperature of the water.

To be clear, just a simple pillar of water falling from where the portal was opened would kill everyone within the shadow of the portal and a good deal of people outside of it. This is far worse. Heroic intervention is going to be 100% necessary to save the army. Honestly, this is going to be very bad for her own army as well.

greatwyrmgold

You had me up until "Dumping lava on them doesn't make the villainous fall several times more likely while also causing countless other problems that water doesn't".

jesdynf

Maybe it's juvenile, but I'm hoping Black was somehow able to scry that fight between Catherine and the Saint, and I'm hoping he cried a single manly tear when he watched his student bait and *flee*.

stevenneiman

I think I figured out Masego's personality in his new Name. He sees the world as being composed of two kinds of things: things he can understand with his brand of ivory-tower logic, and bullshit. Hence, his Name is one capable of turning the ultimate example of one into the other, the mysticism of miracles into magic he controls.

Phantom

I hope the heroes did not do what Jesus did, by literally splitting the sea into two.

Someguy

While Saint of Swords cutting the tide in half and surviving is extremely likely, that does not mean things will go well for the side of "Good" the un-Named "crusaders". The Named may be fine standing behind her as she does so, the rest of the invaders will still be washed away, frozen, hypothermic or squashed by falling glaciers.

lqueenofblades1

Moses did that. Not Jesus. Jesus would turn the water into wine. Cat would love him.

Barthumphries

Well if you want to get technical about it, Moses made the physical motions for the waters to divide, but it was through the power of Jehovah that the waters actually divided. 😊

Just helping keep the story straight. 😊

daegone823

No Hammer guy and staff girl I wanted to learn more about your hopes your dreams I hope someone mentions you in the future a passing soldier, a grieving widow, an orphan declaring vengeance. I wasn't ready.

Please author at least mention their name a hero is nothing without a name.

Luis

This feels like a trap with a lot of layers.

1. The weight of a tons of water is gonna hurt a lot of people. Wreck formations, and damage equipment.

2. Water is heavy. Drenched people are slower people.

3. Mud is slippery. Fighting an offensive battle against an entrenched opponent in mud is a very bad idea.

3. The water is already cold. That much cold water on everyone plus Catherine's ability with manipulating ice can lead to massive hypothermic injuries. Think mass casualty frostbite with minimum effort from cat. shivering opponents can't fire their bows or swing their swords too well.

4. Water is an excellent conductor of electricity and Masego and Catherine's mage lines can cast electrical attacks.

Alivaril

I'm honestly having trouble seeing how the enemy army would survive this one short of full-fledged divine intervention. Someone mentioned lava, but that's just superheated rock and actually moves rather slowly. THIS has splash damage and is much, much deadlier than a gigantic hell-meteor in general.

An umbrella-shield would deflect a comparatively tiny amount of the water and would likely shatter soon after, assuming it's not straight-up invulnerable to physical attack (which their walls clearly aren't) – and then have yet more water crush those below.

Turning it to steam? Again, yet more water from above, assuming it didn't outright cook the surrounding area. Water contains an awful lot of thermal energy by the time it turns to steam.

Saint slicing the world? Her cuts in the sky are solid enough to run on. No vacuum suction here. If she could cut out a circular vacuum-portal large enough to defend the army, she'd be using it for offense already.

Hell, Saint even made good on her petty threat to remove Cat's hand. If that's permanent, our hero has already made her usual sacrifice on her climb to power.

Speck of Stardust

The thing is that the water falling is happening between the 2 camps, both camps are likely going to be fine. That said a massive number of dead incoming.

Trebar

Oh. I have reached the end of what is currently written. Looks like I'm going to have to wait like everybody else now 😞

General Chaos

And so begins the Tale of the First Lakeomancer

Skivverus

So, fifth-plus time rereading this, I decided to do (some of) the math.

Mile-wide portal translates to a cross-section of a bit under twenty-two million square feet.

With close-enough-to-Earth gravity, that's three hundred fifty million cubic feet of water in the first second, going past a billion if it sticks around past two seconds.

Divide by the number of soldiers in the Proceran army, and we have at least seven thousand cubic feet of water per soldier. For comparison, an average human takes up about two and a half cubic feet of space.

Alternatively, you can think of it as "every Proceran soldier gets their own personal nineteen-foot-tall freezing raindrop" (six meters, for the metrically-inclined).

---

Interlude: Kaleidoscope

"Spoken like a man I'll have raised from the dead just to execute a second time."

– Dread Emperor Malignant III

They'd meant to make a lake, but that was not what Juniper was looking down at. After the flow was cut the currents had slowed to a crawl, then settled, and what had once been a plain was now cold marshlands. Dotted by a handful of glaciers, for now, but eventually those would melt. Not in time for the battle to be affected, the Marshal of Callow decided. The massive chunks of ice could be relied on to block field of sight, but they should not be taken as a more than temporary cover. Not with the calibre of Named on the other side. With the sun beginning to set down, the marsh was empty save for shallow waters and corpses or not. Earlier in the day she'd sent the Watch to harass crusaders trying to fish out survivors, but she'd had to call them back when the heroes took the field again. Juniper licked her fangs behind closed lips, the ridge inside her mouth allowing easy access to clean. She'd been told by Aisha that the way it made the mouths of orcs look to human – too broad, too prominent, almost animal-like – was one of the reasons so many of them assumed her people were thoughtless brutes. It was, her old friend had said, an unconscious judgement. The Hellhound did not mind. There'd been many judgements made today, some more harmful than mere human stupidity.

She still remembered the moment she saw the gate open in the sky. The primal awe the sight had shaken her with, that reminder that she was a very small creature in a very large world. That there were entities striding amongst mortals that could flatten them with but a word or a gesture. It'd been difficult to gauge how many Procerans died the moment the water hit them. At least two thousand, she suspected. The gate had not been so high up in the air that gravity would turn it into some divine blow, but the sheer weight of the mass of liquid made that largely irrelevant. A hammer flattened an ant even if you were barely swinging it. All that power, wielded by a shifty sorcerer and barefoot woman who'd murdered a demigod. That'd always been Catherine's walk, hadn't it? The fine line between absurd and terrifying. A single moment and the entire lay of the battle had changed. Proceran advance had immediately collapsed, thousands fleeing the sweeping tidal wave pointlessly. The died anyway, drowning in armour. Another few thousand were still lying at the bottom of the marsh.

The crusaders had been struck with horror, but there were people on the other side who'd mastered their panic. Within two heartbeats, mage fire and white-hot heavenly flame had erupted in the centre of the cascading waters. Tons of liquid turned to scalding vapour, but the edges had kept pouring down. Slowed but not stopped. When the first glacier went through, it was split in two by the fires and further broken apart by what Juniper was fairly certain had been the Saint of Swords merely swinging her blade. It'd limited the damage caused by the massive ice structures, but then they'd been swept by the current too and began crushing everything in their way. Another two heartbeats and fences of light formed themselves across the portal to keep the water in, as the heavenly flames winked out. It hadn't been enough. They lasted barely a heartbeat before shattering under the weight. From beginning to end, the entire affair lasted for eleven heartbeats.

Then the Grey Pilgrim struck.

It had defied easy description, and not only because anyone looking directly at it went blind in the aftermath. There'd been... a star, perhaps that was the only way to put it. Only instead of a distant radiant light it had been a knife. It carved through an edge of the portal, and the whole thing shuddered. Then it went straight through the other side and the sky blew up. A ring of power spread for miles, boiling hot rain falling across the battlefield for the better part of an hour afterwards. The fairy gate was broken, though now there was a strange circle-shaped glimmer above both armies. Juniper had not been pleased, at the time, but neither had she been furious. The gate had not been meant to be kept open for much longer anyway. Her mistake, she now realized, had been thinking in terms of mortal war. Her Warlord's spell had taken the day away from that mould, and price had to be paid for such great power. Especially when that power was broken by a foe. There is a reason the Carrion Lord does not unleash the Warlock at the beginning of every battle, she thought. And now we learn it the hard way. The exercise of a villain's power always left them vulnerable, and the backlash for this unmaking had been particularly brutal.

Catherine was not dead, they were fairly certain. Juniper had mages drag her out of sight and examine her the moment after she collapsed. But she was unconscious and... dreaming. The orc had been told that the queen's body was now made of the stuff of the fae, but she had not truly grasped what that meant until she watched Catherine Foundling's body shift around like a puzzle box. Square blocs of flesh erupted her chest, short spikes bent bone and muscle in every direction and Juniper had grown nauseous watching her commander's face melt down to the skull and reform with an eerie keening sound. She still felt ill thinking about it. Orcs were flesh and bone, instinct and feeling. There was almost nothing of any of that left in Catherine. What had struck Hierophant had been subtler. They'd thought him fine at first, as he remained standing where he'd been. Only when he'd not replied to a question had the soldiers noticed that he was perfectly still. No longer even breathing. There was now a permanent rotation of two mages by the man's bedsides weaving spell to mimic what his lungs had ceased doing. His heart still beat, at least. Neither of the two had woken up in the three hours since the Pilgrim had attacked them.

That left the Army of Callow very, very vulnerable.

So far there had been no attempt at a heroic assault, but there was no telling how long that would last. An issue compounded by the fact that none of Juniper's mages could tell her when the two most powerful members of the Woe would wake, if they ever did. The army's fortifications had withstood the waters well at least. The wards held, and the only place the palisade broke was on the left flank when a smaller glacier chunk hit the wall. Mages had been able to keep that contained with shields, enough that the entire battle line didn't flood. It had been rebuilt since. Was this what you feared, Catherine, when you forbade Bonfire? Part of Juniper still believed that plan had been the best chance at a winnable war they'd had, but now she was being forced to admit there was more to wars with Named than tactics and strategy. It was a bitter pill to swallow to admit that she'd had a weakness in her thinking, but now that she knew of it she must fix it lest she make mistakes in the future. Juniper spat into the shallow waters filling the ditch before the palisade, then turned around. She was in overall command, now. And there were things to be done, the first of them having a conversation with a woman she despised.

For once, the Thief was easy to find. The thin woman was lounging outside the tent where the remainder of the Woe slumbered uneasily, propped up in a folding chair and sipping at a silver flask. Juniper sniffed out the scent. Brandy. Even her taste in alcohol was shit.

"Marshal," the Thief drawled. "I had a feeling you'd be coming."

And still she drank, Juniper sneered. Vivienne might have grown on the Warlord and the rest of the Woe, but the Hellhound had never taken to her and never would. The Thief was the worst parts of her people crammed together in a single arrogant frame. The orc had learned to set aside most the dislike of Callowans she'd been taught as a child, admitting to herself that they were no worse than the Soninke save perhaps for the occasional petty moralizing. But this one, she was a reminder of why it'd taken the orc so long to like Catherine. She was hollow in the bone. Orcs and goblins understood, without ever needing to be taught, that the heart of the world was kin and clan. The Legions had taught Juniper that kin did not necessarily mean blood, or clan her own people, and it was that shared understanding that had brought her close to Aisha – who had, herself, been forced to learn to divorce the loyalties of her childhood from those that were truly deserved. The Taghreb were perhaps the closest thing humans could come to reasonable. They understood tethers. Soninke, like Callowans, had no such loyalty in them. Instead they worshipped at some abstract altar of principle, a mortal-made god of meaninglessness. Climbing the Tower, saving the Kingdom: there was little difference save in petty details. The years had taught Juniper that though the people might be fools, individuals need not be. That the things she found so disgusting gathered mostly at the top.

But Vivienne Dartwick was the incarnation of everything she despised about Callow.

An admitted thief, one who took but did not contribute. Were she an orc, she'd have ended up in a cooking pot by now. And while she professed high ideals, unlike Catherine she didn't even have the decency to bleed for them. The Thief was not a fighter, only a parasite. Like a tick she had nestled over new warmth when her previous host died. And had made herself useful enough since that she could not simply be carved up and eaten like she so richly deserved. Just looking at her made Juniper want to bare her fangs. The antipathy, she knew, was shared. The occasional contemptuous looks shot behind Catherine's back made that eminently clear, though they were both professional enough that they worked together without trouble. Or had, anyway, when Catherine was awake. Without her between them the Hellhound had a feeling the knives would finally come out.

"War council is to be held," Juniper growled. "You will attend."

The Thief's brow rose, almost mockingly.

"I am not a member of the Army of Callow," she said.

"You're a spymistress," the orc said. "A hoarder of secrets. Now is the time to spit them out."

"I know quite a bit that you don't, Marshal," the wretch agreed with an easy smile. "But little of import to the battle. Which seems, regardless, not in the process of being waged."

Juniper's blood ran hot, but she ground her fangs. She would not be baited so easily.

"We do not know when she will wake up," the Hellhound said.

"Which makes most planning irrelevant," Thief replied. "Without Catherine and Masego, we lack the teeth to go on the offensive. Plan your defence, Marshal. You do not need me standing at your table as a prop displaying your influence to do so."

That the tick would so familiarly refer to people she'd once sought to kill had the orc's fury spiking. She knew that humans did not have the same understanding of blood feuds, but that insolent girl should be in pieces. Already once a traitor, she would turn again. It was only a matter of time.

"So instead of having some use, you'll just sit there and get drunk," Juniper scathingly said. "What a Named you are. I'd get as much use out of a fucking tavern girl."

"Do you often fuck tavern girls, Marshal Juniper?" the woman asked smilingly. "My word, I had no idea. Still, this is a little bawdy for idle conversation don't you think?"

Juniper's fists clenched. Without ever moving, the Named had changed from a lounging wastrel to an amused aristocrat. She was making an effort to be infuriating.

"I will remain here," the Thief said, "and watch over them. If you do not believe there are agents of Malicia in this host, you are a bloody fool. My hours are better spent keeping an eye out for a knife than repeating numbers you already know for an audience of officers."

There was much that Juniper wanted to reply. That having her at the council would allay fears, serve as a display of unity. That a fucking spymistress had no right to gainsay the orders of the Marshal of Callow, especially not on campaign. But there was no point, so she held her tongue. Turning around without another word, she left.

She had a battle to win, with or without help.

—

Rozala slumped into her seat, exhausted beyond belief. Night had only just fallen, but she knew the work would continue through the dark and unto dawn. In the first few hours, when chaos and panic had spread across the host, she'd desperately struggled to restore order. There was a very real chance the crusaders would have routed, if not for the heroes. They'd walked among the soldiers, helping and healing and soothing away fear. The Princess of Aequitan was still sure at least thousand levies would disappear overnight. After the tides stopped and the scalding rain ceased, the reports had begun coming in. Even now it was hard to tell how many had died, over less time than it took to boil a kettle of water. Early estimates were at nine thousand dead and at least half that out of the fight.

Rozala Malanza closed her eyes, and dealt with the truth that she had just commanded the most disastrous military offensive in living memory.

And the battle had begun so well. The Heavenly Fences had allowed her to trample nearly a seventh of the enemy army within the first hour, badly crippling the enemy's ranged abilities: without the crossbowmen, the casualties involved in taking the palisades from the Army of Callow would have been greatly lowered. The siege engines would have taken their due, yes, but the Fences would have limited the damage. It would have been a rough affair, no two ways about it, but most definitely a battle she could win. And Rozala had made plans to hit hard and fast enough at least part of the enemy's supplies could be seized before they retreated through a gate. Enough that starvation could be kept at bay at least a sliver of the way to Hedges. Now there was most a mile of frozen marshland between her army and the enemy's, and her men were two days away from beginning to boil grass to have something to fill their stomachs. There was a very real chance she would have to order horses butchered, if it came to that, and she could already hear the other royals howling about their expensive war horses getting the axe to feed mere peasants.

The dark-haired princess shivered. Part of it was that she was still drenched and cold: after the first reports, she'd handed the reins to her officers and gone with the rank and file to drag survivors and wounded out of the water. It was the least of what she owed for today's debacle. The other princes and princesses followed suit, even Prince Arnaud who she doubted had ever done a hard day's work in his life. It'd been a given they would, after word spread she'd gone out personally. They couldn't be seen to care less about the soldiers, could they? The thought was uncharitable, but not necessarily untrue. Rozala's mother had always taught her that command was her right, but also her responsibility. A general who spent lives frivolously was just a butcher, and the Malanzas were no such thing. Ambitious, perhaps, but their roots were that of ancient and famous generals. Her distant ancestor Lorenzo Malanza had been the one to conquer the northern half of the Dominion of Levant for First Prince Charles Merovins. His splendid victory at Tartessos was the subject of song to this day. And she had shamed that memory, she thought with a grimace. By her failure, but also the other reason her hands were trembling.

Gods, she'd been so small. And no great beauty either, with that strong nose and those razor-sharp cheekbones. She'd talked like a sloppy commoner, all insults and insinuations where the situation demanded poise. And Rozala had not been able to hold back, trading verbal blow for blow with the same nonchalant woman who had just dropped half a lake from the sky. The knowledge of how easily the Black Queen could have killed any of them had the heroes not accompanied the delegation would haunt her thoughts for years to come. What kind of a woman could do something like that, just speak a word and nigh-instantly slaughter thousands? The princess was not unfamiliar with war, but this was... something else. A titan stepping on ants. She did not blame those who would desert in the night. And now she understood the fervour in the First Prince's eyes, when she spoke of the evils in the east. Rozala reached for the bottle of eau-de-vie she'd sent for, breaking etiquette by pouring her own cup and downing it in a single gulp. The liquor warmed her enough that she did not send a servant for a blanket. Neither did she change out of the wet clothing, though. Let her visitors remember where she had spent her hours.

The Grey Pilgrim was the first to arrive. Rozala rose to her feet, and bowed with genuine respect. The old Levantine had saved hundreds of lives after personally destroying the Black Queen's weapon, wreathed in Light as he spread warmth and healing wherever he went. The former had been the most important of the two. How many would that have lost to the deathly cold, if not for the pulses of heat?

"Chosen," the princess said. "I am in your debt for your toil. Any boon in my power to grant is yours to claim."

A dangerous thing to offer Named, she knew, but looking at the exhausted old man who looked like was folding into himself Rozala did not hesitate. He had saved lives in her care, and Malanzas did not leave debts unpaid. The Pilgrim looked at her through eyes gone rheumy and clasped her hand with wrinkled fingers.

"You owe me nothing, child," he whispered. "Would that I could have done more."

"Through winter and summer, my word stands," Rozala formally replied in the old Arlesite oath. "So long as the Heavens watch and Creation withstands."

Whether he ever asked the favour of her or not was irrelevant. She would not allow kindness to go unanswered. The hero smiled sadly.

"This is not the first or last tragedy this war will bring," he said. "Steel yourself, Rozala Malanza. The worst is yet to come."

"A prophecy, Chosen?" Rozala asked.

"An old man's intuition," the Grey Pilgrim said, shaking his head. "Darkness grows. I fear greater evils than Catherine Foundling are yet to come."

The dark-haired princess' blood ran cold. Worse than the monster who'd faced half a dozen Chosen on her own and brought down the sky? She could think of few greater evils in existence, save for the Tower itself and the Kingdom of the Dead. Neither thought was comforting.

"I hear your guidance," Rozala said, bowing her head in thanks.

"May I?" the hero asked.

Uncertain what he meant, the princess nodded in agreement regardless. The glimmer of light was barely visible, but warmth washed over her. Permeated every part of her body, chasing away cold and weariness and fear. Like she was sixteen again, fearless and ready to rise against Hasenbach to avenge her mother.

"It will be a long night," the Pilgrim said, panting lightly.

She helped the elder into a seat afterwards, seeing his legs shake, and broke etiquette again to pour him a glass of liquor and press it into his hand. Chuckling ruefully, the Levantine sipped at it. He made a face.

"Eau-de-vie," he said. "The things you Alamans drink. Ah, what I would not do for a good pear brandy. It always tastes like Alava."

One of the great cities of the Dominion, Rozala recalled, nestled among tall hills. Famous for its orchards and its herds. It had held on a decade longer than the rest of Levant when the Principate invaded, and even after the city was besieged the inhabitants preferred to burn it and flee into the hills rather than live under Proceran rule.

"Your birthplace, Chosen?" she asked, returning to her seat.

"Levante is where I drew my first breath," the old man replied. "But Alava is where I grew to manhood. It is where I will die as well, if the Heavens ever allow these old bones to rest."

"Creation will be lessened for the loss," the princess said, and to her surprise found she meant every word.

"Creation will go on," the Pilgrim smiled tiredly. "We are never quite so important as we like to think."

She would have enjoyed quiet conversation with the man a while longer, but it was not to be. Prince Amadis Milenan strode into the tent, his embroidered tunic pristine and his hair perfectly coiffed. It was not enough to hide the tightness around his eyes. Behind him was a short man in a leather coat that went down to his knees, covering loose trousers and shirt of coloured silk. The Rogue Sorcerer, as he called himself. Of the Chosen, it was him Rozala knew best: they had spent long hours together planning the battle and his role in it as leader of the wizards. She had found him genteel and polite, surprisingly so for a man whose Name implied a certain uncouthness. The princess began to rise, but Amadis held out his hand.

"No need," the Prince of Iserre said. "Not after this kind of day."

The princess hid her surprise. She'd half-expected that after today's debacle he would seek to undermine her position with recriminations. He still might, regardless of this unexpected olive branch, so her guard would remain up.

"Princess Malanza," the Rogue Sorcerer greeted her, inclining his head before taking a seat.

"Chosen," she replied, just as courteously.

Amadis let out a long breath after sitting down, a long moment passing before he spoke.

"This was," he said, "not the way we had anticipated this battle would go."

An understatement if there ever was one, Rozala thought. The use of we did not escape her attention. Blame was not being put solely on her shoulders.

"The failure was mine," she said anyway.

"We'd prepared for many things, Your Grace," the Rogue quietly said. "But the sky opening up to drop a lake was beyond our predictions. There is no fault in this, save in believing that our opponent would not be so monstrous."

"I agree," Amadis said calmly. "I cast no doubts on your competence, Rozala. Your initial success is proof enough of it. There will be no talk of removing you from command."

The Princess of Aquitan inclined her head in silent thanks. Did this shake you enough you are taking this seriously Amadis? she thought. Or are you simply keeping me at the head of the host to scapegoat if the situation further worsens? No matter. For now, it was still her battle to fight.

"I must begin, then, with a delicate question," she said. "This... gate. Should we expect another if we attempt a second offensive?"

If so, this campaign was over. Rozala would not throw away half a hundred thousand lives for pride, even if refusing to do so ruined her. They had learned the enemy's trick, but the enemy would have learned theirs as well. There was no guarantee the Pilgrim would twice succeed in breaking the gate. The two Chosen traded glances.

"That is a complicated question," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "Against most other villains, I would say that forceful shattering of the gate might actually kill them. The amount of power and involvement in crafting such a thing is staggering, and the break would lead to vicious backlash."

"Yet Catherine Foundling is not merely a villain," the Pilgrim said. "She is a titled Duchess of Winter. Perhaps the last fae of that realm, if I interpret the Augur's words correctly. She is no longer human, in a sense. What would destroy the likes of the Warlock or the Carrion Lord might not affect her at all. Her nature has grown other."

"We have seen neither the Black Queen nor the Hierophant since the battle," Prince Amadis noted. "To be frank, I was expecting an Imperial offensive while we were in disarray. We might very well have lost the battle if one had followed."

"I'll concede that much," Rozala said. "Yet there might have been other limitations at work. I am no scholar of sorcery, but it occurs to me that such a great blow – even if it had not been shattered – might have incapacitated the two of them for some time. The duration, however, is beyond my ability to theorize. We may very well be facing another gate come morning."

"We'll know it's coming, this time," the Rogue Sorcerer darkly said. "It's not impossible to contain the flow until the gate itself can be broken, though I'll admit it'll be difficult."

The princess put her hands in her lap, resisting the urge to brush back her hair.

"There are too many uncertainties," she said. "I am reluctant to commit to an assault when everyone I send might be drowned. And that is without addressing the difficulties of an assault. Wading through the marshlands will be difficult, and it might be weeks before the soil drinks the water whole. That means having to march around it, and likely splitting the host in two."

"A probing attack come morning, perhaps," Prince Amadis suggested.

Even a probe could see a few thousand men die screaming to find out the answer to a simple question, Rozala thought. The alternative, however, was retreat. Through hostile land, while so low on supplies they were barely worth mentioning at all. The Black Queen had offered to provide food for a march back, but there was no guarantee that offer would still hold after today. And if it did not, the amount of men she'd lose to a small-scale offensive would be a pittance compared to what hunger would kill. That was without even considering the reports that the Duchess Kegan's army was crossing the river far to the north. The numbers there were said to be over ten thousand, and the Deoraithe were infamous for their skill at la petite guerre. Harassment and ambushes, without ever giving battle.

"This is not the kind of decision that can be lightly made," the Princess of Aquitan said. "And not without knowing all the facts. I must recommend we send an envoy to their camp to find out if the queen's terms still hold."

Amadis' lips thinned in displeasure.

"Surely you're not suggesting retreat," he said.

"I am reluctant to even consider it," Rozala admitted. "Yet if the Black Queen is unharmed and the terms hold, it may be that we have no other choice. We cannot dally. Time works against us more than they."

"I would accompany your envoy, if you permit," the Grey Pilgrim said, breaking his silence.

He looked half-asleep, even now. The princess kept her scepticism away from her face. Had the Chosen not tried to take the villain's life but a few hours ago? Still, she did not pretend to understand the ways of Named. For their sort, attempted killing might be no great enmity. The Prince of Iserre watched everyone at the table silently, then slowly nodded.

"Envoy will be sent," he agreed. "And to speak with only the Black Queen, so her state may be assessed. Should she prove incapacitated, however..."

Princess Rozala grimly smiled.

"Then we will settle the score in full," she said.

Malanzas, after all, did not leave debts unpaid.

---

Joel

Catherine, I know you're a tired eldritch abomination, but now is not the time for a nap!

Also, this was a good way of handling Cat's plan. It backfired enough to take her out of action, but there's no doubt that it devastated the enemy army.

ALKATYN

The backfire also explains why we don't see these kind of things more often, and why this wouldn't result in a major backlash the way akua's weapon did

RoflCat

Assuming the crusaders get their attack on, I feel this'll just lead to Cath's heroic last minute arrival/awakening with power up.

After all, we've seen proof in Liese that being a villain doesn't preclude you from playing a heroic role in a Story (even if the Above will be pissy about it)

And a certain term come to mind: Apotheosis.

Bookworm

We will probably see her awaken in time to act in some fashion because that seems to be part of her Story (both in plot and meta) but she is also a Villain. That means that there is going to be a price. Only Heroes get freebies.

Barthumphries

She'll lose a significant part of her army, then wake up. The only real question is whether or not Malanza will awaken Winter when Cat returns as Warlord.

Dainpdf

Warlord is an orc Name. Cat is not getting that one. Queen is still out there, and she has missed it twice before (pattern of three anyone?)

Metrux

Yes, warlord is out of the table, but so is Black Queen. It's been plainly stated that, after it was broken last time, her ver nature changed. She can't go back to that.

Dainpdf

Yeah, but she's lost the opportunity for a Queen name twice. Both in Liesse. Pattern of three. She gets a queen Name in Liesse.

werafdsaew

People are still going on about Cat getting the Warlord name? The WOG already denied that possibility very explicitly.

Dainpdf

Cat got her apotheosis when she killed Akua. She may get a Name out of this deal, though. Maybe.

Yotz

In her house at L'Iesse, Black Queen waits dreaming.

Raved Thrad

Black Queen Catherinethulhu? 😊

Dainpdf

The Queen in Black.

James, Mostly Harmless

They will write plays about her that will drive people mad! But only the Goblins will dare perform "A Zombie-Goat on the Roof".

Yotz

Kilian: You sir, should remove your pants.

William: Indeed?

Cat: Indeed, it's time. We have all laid aside modesty but you.

William: I... wear no pants.

Kilian: (Terrified, aside to Cat.) No pants? No pants!

Raved Thrad

Is this a scene from "The Swordsman's New Pants?" 😊

Zaicora

If you're going with lovecraft, nyarlathotep would be more accurate.

tyizor

So are we going with the Sleeping Beauty meta-story now? Oh boy, what a ride.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

At this point Cat's army runs away while the crusade starves and freezes.

DroughtBringer

Rozala Malanza is probably one of my favorite characters now, I really hope she doesn't die.

BryceWilliam

She's one of the few people Cat can kill and not worry about making the crusade worse. She doesn't read high enough in power or weight to really be Cat's 'enemy' she's more June's, but its not June's story. So I doubt she has the negative weight to hold any real staying power. My bet is she dies when June does some sick ass attack on the enemy commanders and wipes out a lot of leaders or she dies on a cross by Cat's orders.

Jakob Israelsen

Wasn't she told explicitly by Malicia not to kill Rolanza or Milenan?

Yotz

Not so “explicitly told”, as more like “strongly suggested” – as in “I suggest you to buy that insurance option. After all, it would be tragic if something happens to your lovely shop, or your beautiful wife, who in twelve minutes will pick up your two wonderful children from the school on her usual trip to the grocery...”

Dainpdf

No staying power doesn't mean she dies. Only means she gets shunted to the background once her part is over. Pity she feels horror at Cat. She'd make a good person to turn.

HandyCapped

I'm on the fence on that. She led a massive invading army to all but butcher and wring dry the land of her “enemy”, but still has her horse high enough to consider it a ‘debt’, when her victim(That Cat undoubtedly is, even if she is slugging back) dares to defend herself. With “monstrous slaughter of men” – to say the least. As if that wasn't on the menu the whole time.

Jeremy

Well... shit.

WAKE UP CAT!!

Morgenstern

I vote for Thief playing Black Queen once more, she did it before... though, admittedly, not to fool the likes of a Grey Pilgrim... and probably glamoured, which could prove tricky. They DO still have “Larat” and the other fae, though, if any of those should be willing to glamour something while the Queen sleeps and thus cannot order them to... hmm...

soonnandnaanssoon

The Water is Still in that marshland swamped with the dead no?

daegone823

A mountain of corpses killed by a giant weapon + a necromancer who loves raising enemies, wonder where this has been used before recently.

Alex

10 bucks says Cat wakes up as the Crusaders are about to win and she raises every dead soldier for miles to fight for the good (?) guys.

daegone823

Cat new name the Undying, or the Broken, the Shattered Queen, maybe the Amalgam

Yotz

The word you seek is "Deathless".

Flameburst

Her aspects will be Live, Die and Live Again

Ethereal

Witness!

Sykomantis

It has to be one word.

Live, Die, and Resurrect

Yotz

Live, Die, and NOPE.

Raved Thrad

I'm still holding out for "Death Knight."

James, Mostly Harmless

I wonder if this will become in time Calernia's version of the Dead Marshes (http://www.henneth-annun.net/events\_view.cfm? evid=184)?

daegone823

Okay so at least we know of one of the named the rogue sorcerer,
I wish they would have said some throw away lines like:

"Too bad about hammer guy

Hammer guy

Yeah you know the, The Righteous Protector, the guy with the hammer."

Maybe Cat learns a new aspect or transitions at this point winter was injured before now it was broken. Time for something to take it's place. Aisha and Juniper ship sailing or ...?

Barthumphries

He had his chance to join the story and threw it away. Let's not bring him up again.

Dainpdf

I don't think she's getting rid of Winter that easily.
Especially when she's the last thing it has a hold onto.

Alivaril

I wonder if – and hope that – Catherine is having some helpful dreams. She doesn't sleep anymore due to Winter nightmares and I'm honestly starting to miss her having a Name. The sort of raw power she's been displaying lately just isn't as satisfying as her Aspects were – tracking which ones have been used, looking forward to Struggle or Take flipping a fight with Hero-tier BS of her own, etc.

...It's both a good and a bad thing that the Grey Pilgrim is going along; he'd see through any glamour intended to imitate Catherine, but he might also have come to his senses as far as the Crusade is concerned. An individual with that kind of power is one you want on your side when the Dead King comes knocking. And who's to say the Callowan army wouldn't burn their own supplies out of sheer spite should they start losing, or that Thief wouldn't *Yoink* the supplies again?

It'd honestly be better on multiple counts to play the narrative and heal them. If they continue the slaughter, they'll ensure their inevitable demise. If they don't, the Crusade can retreat without further losses and he can shove Cat toward redemption.

Plus, whoever heard of a villain being killed while they were weak from some ritual? That's something that happens to Heroes, ones who awaken in the nick of time.

daegone823

I know what you mean I miss the whole name dreams that foreshadowed a new type of enemy she somehow had to interpret her teachers past actions with her present circumstances. Still Chatrine has progressed a great deal still maybe she could have some named dreams about past fae battles so she can get an understanding of her current predicament. Fae more than any other race have dealt with narrative problems and they could help her in understanding the bard who has proven to be an extremely old name.

Alyxe

I am glad Grey Pilgrim might go, as well.

Why? After that comment about dying in Alava, I am kind of hoping that was Vivienne with Chekov's Brandy. Shared drink... shared knife...

Raved Thrad

Well, we've seen fights between heroes and villains; I wonder how a fight between heroes would go, and if the heavens would intervene somehow.

ALazyMonster

I know what you mean about wanting Cat to have a name I think it would be awesome if she got a name that was explicitly about giving fate itself the finger. I mean this is more or less something that she does constantly. The first thing that comes to mind with I wish for this is something like Riku from the back story of No Game No Life where he literally ended all the gods as a way to end war.

Dainpdf

Any finger a Name could give Fate would be ironic. Roles are woven of Fate, after all.

ALazyMonster

Fair point, but I like to interpret the way that roles have been explained as they are patterns and the way they work is based on what people think of the stories that go with a name. The difference in my interpretation is that fate is the will of the gods (above or below) and a role is more how mortals perceive a name. A Name that is directly opposed to fate would be one who opposes the choices of the gods and their agents. Where my original thought from (the idea of Cat getting such a Name) this came from her talk with Archer about what she wanted, since all named want something. I believe Cat said something like "I want to kill anyone who wants to drag us back into a story"

Dainpdf

Well, what Name you get doesn't always represent what you want – just ask Hierarch – but I get your point. I still think "fuck fate" is more Black's thing, and moreover more about what one does with a Name than the Name itself, but it is an intriguing idea.

amargosamountain

"Any finger a Name could give Fate would be ironic. Roles are woven of Fate, after all."

The fuck is this supposed to mean? Any finger?

Dainpdf

You would do well to note I was answering this:
"I know what you mean about wanting Cat to have a name I think it would be awesome if she got a name that was explicitly about giving fate itself the finger."
I meant any affront a Name could give Fate would likely end up ironic or otherwise ineffectual.

Dainpdf

Pretty sure "willing and capable of slaughtering thousands on a whim" did not help convince the Pilgrim that this fight is futile. He knows worse is to come, but this is still necessary for the Greater Good.

JackbeThimble

A fight for your existence is not a whim. The crusaders had slaughtered thousands of her men minutes before and she gave them every possible opportunity to avoid bloodshed altogether.

Dainpdf

Yes, but she is not exactly stable (and he's not only seen proof of that but tried to use it), and if she did have a whim she could and would kill thousands.

Absinthe with Mephisto

Malanzas do not leave their debts unpaid.

By switching to Mastercard today you can save 15% off of any hero merchandise.
try it out today for free!

We can not be held responbile for any losses that incur at the hands of thieves and tyrants.

Bonesawer

I think you mean Malanzacard

burdi

come on, time for a new Name for chaterine foundling

tyizor

Part of me is a fan of this spelling of her name. It sounds so sarcastically civil.

don

I'm less than impressed by this outcome. It leaves things open to dragging on, damages Cat even more than before, and all before even considering what the Dead King is up to.

Is this story turning into a slow tragedy with a crippled protagonist at the end, Taylor Herbert-style? Our main character rides off into the sunset, still breathing but functionally irrelevant? Or even worse, dies with her 'goal' fulfilled, the bullshit calmed down and Callow safe but no personal gain and tremendous personal loss?

Fuck. That.

That's off-putting, and cliché', and done to death these days. Stories where the protag gets the bittersweet ending, crippled and rendered meek – I tend to skip to the end, go, "That's nice," and lose interest in further contemplation of them. In Worm, after that ending, the epic battles all seem... lesser. They lose impact on re-reading, even if the world's saved and all that.

I love this story, and yet with this chapter I see a hard turn pointing towards that end. And that would be – not sad, because that implies inciting emotional impact – it would be depressing. I would feel apathetic, ultimately. And that is sad.

werafdsaew

Pretty sure that is not where the story is going. For one Cat has infinite regeneration.

*don*

It doesn't have to be a physical crippling, though Cat's already limping everywhere so there's that. It could be capability-crippled; like if now opening gates is problematic, and then she can't do it at all, then she gets her regen shredded some more – maybe then she gets a sideways power-bump, like with her ability to take Aspects and turn them into one-time consumables, but that gradually loses its performance value, and then it becomes politically untenable for Cat to keep her crown and stay around long enough to actually steady the boat, so the job goes to a compromise candidate, etcetera, etcetera. I can map that line of descent in my head crystal-clear I've seen it so many times... The first time I ever ran across it was with the Narnia series, and fucking hells I hated how that series turned out. Or Avalon and Arthurian myth, or the Mockingjay series, hell even Harry Potter has a fairly lukewarm outcome for Harry. Family man and middle-management, hooray! ...Actually, the family man part is great. But seriously, after all the pure shit he could at least be a bit better off than Robin William's version of Peter Pan. And on, and on.

Hero or villain, the 'whittled down into normalcy' is terrain that is completely fucking mapped out by generations of stories. And I've always hated it. The only thing worse is 'Accomplish your goals, then die!' which is **also** fairly common.

It's not the crippling, it's the meaninglessness of it all. The wheel turns, and our narrative river always empties into the comforting sea of mediocrity we all are supposed to identify with. Hey, Protagonist is one of us now! Or Dead! Yay, we can feel special in our shared lack of specialness now!

Narnia is shut away forever now. There's no fucking Camelot anymore. No. NO! Screw that – give me an Honor Harrington, whose badassery is not only legend, but she's now an Admiral and busy STILL BEING SPECTACULARLY AWESOME in the background of the newer books even when she's not the focus of them. THAT is an outcome I can get behind.

Dainpdf

Uh... So what you want is a happy ending? Or a wish fulfilling one, I guess?

Bad news: at least as she is now, that is not what Catherine wants. She recognizes she is toxic to the country she loves, and she wants to get out as soon as she can countenance it. Whether she **can** ever do so remains to be seen. Black and Malicia are sort of the example she's trying to avoid. Stay in power long enough and you become a cog in it.

grzecho2222

There are also bad endings, but I would admit that "normalcy" kinda became new "Happy Ever After" and been kinda overdone. What happened to endings where everyone loses or where it turns out that whole thing was pointless or heroes win, but victory is meaningless or where heroes stay heroes or bittersweet endings? But I think that it is a little too early to be angry about ending, since it can be anything from Cat fulfilling her long dream of stabbing Fate itself to Cat pulling 180 and telling that all of this was first part of her plan (the one mentioned in summary)

werafdsaew

Like I said, not this kind of story. For one has power reduction **EVER** happened in this story even once? What doesn't kill a Name makes them stronger, not weaker. Everything points to her waking up in the nick of time with new powers.

Sanityfaerie

Actually, yeah. She had one of her three aspects as squire destroyed by the demon thing. She spent a short while undead, without access to much of her Name power. Arguably, becoming a winterthing was a loss as well, at least over the short term. She cut a piece of winter carved off of her by the Saint. A big part of her path has been "get crippled. Adapt and overcome."

Of course, for just that reason, I'm pretty sure that she'll come out of this one with some sort of power-up, or at least an interesting lateral move. I'm not real worried about her being crippled permanently

Sparsebeard

If you can edit, I would, it's pretty bad form to spoil other stories in the comments...

don

There's no edit function. That said, Worm's been around for long enough now that it's a bit like spoiling Iron Man 1 or 2. Though 3 might be pushing it.

Letouriste

You can't edit comments and yeah this is pretty bad forms. I paused my reading of worm when only the last two books were remaining because that started to be as depressing as the first few chapters...i'm not surprised of how you say that finished.

Not\_a\_robot

Dude. I liked your comment before I finished reading it, and I can't take that back, but spoilers. Seriously. Don't do that. EE, some help here? Please?

lennymaster

Oh, come on! I barely read half of Worm and I only got so far because I held out hope that it would not end exactly that way. Anyone could see that the story would go that disgusting bittersweet semidefeat way within the first few chapters. Yes, I do not like spoilers, but there are spoilers and there are SPOILERS. This was the first kind and I cannot bring myself to become upset about it. Especially not about Worm, the DC of the webserials.

lennymaster

"DC of the webserials." meaning completely overrated, senselessly cruel towards its Heroes, badly written Villains and completely failed plotlines.

The only decent character they ever created was the Joker, and they have been sucking on that corpse for ages now instead of making something new.

Wow the comparison between Worm and DC seems ever more fitting.

Dainpdf

Uuuuh... I really don't want to discuss Worm here. Just let me note I very much disagree with you.

About the gravity of the spoilers: there are always new people coming into the webserial scene. It's not that large.

Plus, the spoiler was not even of any argumentative use in that post. The comment effectively just says "please don't write this way because I hate it. By the way I also hate this other serial because (spoilers), which is similar".

John Galt

@lennymaster. Worm's ending was predictable; you still shouldn't drop spoilers for another work. Also, while you have a couple legitimate points, you sound like a self-important hater. Especially with the last line. Wasn't aware that your personal opinion of a work dictated whether spoilers were ok or not. – FYI, "Sorry for the spoilers" anywhere in there and I wouldn't have written this.

ALazyMonster

I have a feeling that it's not going to end with some sort of martyrdom for Cat because early in the story Black and Cat had several talks about how that is a pathetic ending, so have some faith I doubt Cat is slowing down at all.

Dainpdf

This is not the place for discussing Worm, so I'll limit myself to saying I believe you missed the point of that story. As much as I can say that, given that I'm also only a random reader.

Yotz

Amen to that.

JackbeThimble

Sorry man but I don't think any web serial author is ever going to hear 'This Reminds me of Worm' as a bad thing, with good reason.

Rook

It should probably be noted that Cat isn't the type to be so proud as to have all her contingencies ride on her being in play, and both Archer and Adjutant are still cards left to be played. They still haven't shown up at all during the battle.

That being said, gonna call it now. The Crusade is still going to slaughter a massive chunk of the Callowan forces – including possibly one of the Woe or similarly major character – before Cat and Hierophant wake up. That'll be the trigger that leads to Cats new Name or whatever transformation afterwards, having something to do with loss.

Lose her morals, lose an aspect, lose her limbs, lose her humanity, lose her mentor and father figure. it's part of who she is. Everything she gains she bleeds for, nothing is given for free; and the only thing she has yet to lose is Callow and her companions.

That greater Evil than Catherine Foundling that Gandalf here is sensing? It's not going to be a Mary Sue out of nowhere, it's going to be whatever is left after another piece of Catherine Foundling gets carved away.

Yotz

But what happened to all the pieces getting carved off? It wouldn't be called 'Chopfyt', that's for sure...

Raved Thrad

It's not that I dislike her – I love how much nuance her character has developed – but if one of the Woe were to die I think the one whose death would have the greatest dramatic impact, short of Masego or Catherine, it would be Vivienne. Not only is she a Heroine, as the story paradigm defines her, but she Believes. She does what she does because she sees that no one else will, and she supports Catherine because Catherine is doing what no one else is willing to do: protect Callow and her people. She may not be a fighter, but I can see her, knife in hand and screaming her hatred at the heavens, fighting like a cornered rat, cursing her killer or killers for thinking that what they're doing to support the suffering and subjugation of innocent Callowans is anything near heroic.

And if she doesn't immediately die, I can see her dying in Catherine's arms. Now that would be something: for the great martyr of the 10th Crusade (or maybe just the first one?), on the Callowan side, to be a heroine who died fighting invading heroes. Who knows? It might just be the turning point that has peasant levies showing up with old swords and hunting bows and wood axes to show up to turn out the invaders.

James, Mostly Harmless

Sound the warhorn loud and high
From the Fields of Streges to Harrow's halls,
Let all of Callow their slogan cry,
And rise and follow Catharine!

Yotz

...this is all your fault, you know...

-ahem-

Only thumps of my heart tell me that I'm alive,
Through my half-melted eyelids I see the Dawn's flame,
And I see it, Gods save me, as I open my eyes –
Great Unspeakable Horror that bears no name.
They came as a landslide, a flood, thick and vile,
They trampled through us as they crushed us to mud;
Our banners and crests rest upon refuse pile,
For they killed everything, drenching earth with our blood.

They came as a landslide, a flood, thick and vile,
They trampled through us as they crushed us to mud;
Our banners and crests rest upon refuse pile,
For they killed everything, drenching earth with our blood.
Through the stubble yet smoking of burned wheat field
I may sneak yet away, steal the boat and grub;
To become sole survivor, all I need is to yield...
But I sneer as I order myself to stand up.

Only thumps of my heart tell me that I'm alive,
Through my half-melted eyelids I see the Dawn's flame,
And I see it, Gods save me, as I open my eyes –
Great Unspeakable Horror that bears no name.
I see shadows, and ashes, and stones, cold and dead;
I see nothing that left here for me to defend –
But my sword I hold still, I'm cloaked in dread,
And remains of my shield does not burden my hand.

All I know now – that my land will not die when I leave;
There is no way in Hells I will drive them away,
But I know – from now on they have no right to live,
They have no right to breath, to see that bright day!
So I lift my bent warhorn, and I straighten my back,
And I call all the soldiers, both present and gone,
And I scream them "Stand up!", and I scream them "Attack!"...
If there no one 's alive – then the dead will march on!

grzecho2222

We warriors, we soldiers, we knights
We fought under banner so bright

We defended lands of west from evil
Our foe was warlock, demon and devil

In time of misery we stood alone
Our army turned into field of bone
In shackles we lived for twenty years
Fate we were sourly forced to bear

Lady with soul dark and dark as night
Has ended with murder this sad plight
With chaos and death she saved her kind
Better Dark Queen we couldn't have find

But now Heavens have called their brats
Who lived lives in peace and grown fat
How loudly of Good speaks this breed
To mask their pride, ambition and greed

But now we march under banner of night
They will face us turned into force of blight
They will learn the true meaning of dread
When they will rise to aid us while dead

Raved Thrad

(You're a terrible influence, you know that?)

Come, ye sons and daughters of Callow! Come To muddy field and shallow grave, come ye to hold the line!
Death comes a-calling, with work for hands all wet and stained
With the lifeblood of those who march to war!

Rise with the dawn, to loved ones' lamentation, and dreams of swords!

March, ye sons and daughters of Callow! March
To the side of Callow's queen, of blackest night and darkest moon!
War comes to Callow, in stamp of boot and jingle of hauberk
In gleam of blade and glint in invader's eye!

Stand in your ranks, to the chattering of teeth and the blaring of horns!

Fight, ye sons and daughters of Callow! Fight
And die, and get up to fight again, to shed the blood of the conqueror!
Rack and red ruin are your lot, 'till Death has made up his number
And the land is glutted in blood once again!

Fight, and die, to a long day's blood-letting, and a red nightfall!

lennymaster

Wow, I can totally imagine it!
But that is probably because I do not like her and I would love for Robber to take her place as Saboteur or something in that vein.

werafdsaew

I doubt any of the Woes will die, for the simple narrative reason that they are the next generation of the Calamities, but they haven't exceeded or matched the Calamities yet. So until they do, they have to keep rising.

Dainpdf

I would be somewhat disappointed in that. Not in the writer – it is a perfectly valid path to take – but in Cat. She has said before she wants to stop with the carving at herself. If this story is about her crystallizing in that Role, and being unable to move past it, it would fit. But I don't think it is.

Nethermore

Yeah, with 15000 taken out of the fight there had to be a price to pay. I just hope it's not another reduction in power, because that shit is getting old. Being forced to sleep through such an important part of the battle should be punishment enough.

Also, at first I think everyone guessed the Grey Pilgrim was just playing white, but evidently he's tacked a bunch of high-powered healing spells onto his blue deck full of counterspells, redirects, control magic for spells, future sight and probably teleportation. As long as he isn't distracted major magical workings are going to be punished severely.

Yotz

'Illusions of Grandeur' it's called.
Trix was one hell of an Evil deck, with a very capital 'E'. Without a little charitable miracle of Donate there will be a corresponding hell of a price to pay for it, though.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Called yourself Grey but playing blue trickeries. As expected from filthy control decks. Real man go 1 color only!

Yotz

Precisely!

Blue FTW.

Dainpdf

We **were** told his shtick was last minute saves and disruption.

Dainpdf

Plus, at least he's not playing Dredge like Akua.

werafdsaew

**Another** reduction in power? Cat's journey is a journey of exchanging lesser power for greater power. When has this reduction ever happened in the story anywhere?

Antoninjohn

Archer and Robber are now ready to execute the first part of her fallback plan, it starts with the remaining supplies. After these battles it's time for Cat to take over all of Calriena

Anon

Eh.....I get the progression from a narrative sense, but both Cat and Masego being insta-KO'd by backlash feels kind of....wonky.

The Grey Pilgrim already performed literal resurrection, stole a bunch of spells from Masego, and was utterly pushing in Cat's offensive. Having him be able to perform offensively on an equal to, if not greater level than the Saint, just feels....cheap. Like, if the backlash from the spell burning itself out had knocked Cat out that'd be one thing, but this....unless the pilgrim's got a literal star inside his staff similar to the duchess of the morning sun, the heavens probably showed their hand, a bit.

Granted, I imagine the pilgrim will want to gauge Cat's 'reason' for killing so many people, and worse comes to it he'll prevent her from being assassinated by Procer forces during the visit, but....I dunno.

Otherwise, I am curious – if the original plan was to make a lake (which would have definitely killed off most, if not ALL of the army, rather than 'only' kill 9000 and wound another 13,500) killing off so many of Hasenbach's people in such a manner isn't likely to make her capitulate – it's more likely to have people see Cat as true evil, and demand another crusade, and another, and another.

Melanza feels more and more like she'll hold onto this grudge til her dying day – which makes her survivability seem less and less likely.

But depending on what exactly Cat is dreaming of, I imagine we'll see either the Dead King, or Triumphant (may she never return) start to make waves....incidentally, I wonder – if Cat claimed all those souls with the use of Winter's power, would that add to replace some of the 'power' that the Saint had cut away?

(Also, I forgot about last chapter, but whatever happened to the Duchess of the Morning Sun? Last I recall, her energy was being drained and used by Cat for....something?)

Byzantine

Pilgrim isn't saying it, but I think what he did crippled him too. That kind of power does not come without a price.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Exactly. He looks hammered.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Though his demands to see Cat are obviously for recon. I'd deny them for that very reason even if she was whole.

BroadAxe

You forget that the heavens do not play fair, AND you forget that the saint of blades and the grey pilgrim are in a sense named with much the same amount of success as Cat, except they are WAAAAAY older. He is quite littreally "the mentor" that completly overpowered guy that shows up and saves the new heroes so they can become epic heroes, while he himself is far beyond that.

benthelynx

In some ways that was a defensively used ability.

Tragedyofphilosophy

I think the Pilgrim got a massive power boost for context, he's always there right in time after all, this was acting in complete perfect Harmony with his purpose.

I doubt he can pull that kind of feat off under normal circumstances.

Joeobjoe

Why indeed, Grey Pilgrim by all rights should've been completely backed into a corner, unable to do anything as all those men die. Pulling that last minute burst of extreme power at a cost was completely unforeseeable.

In all seriousness though, it's good to see an example of what happens when you do press a hero into an unwinnable situation. Gives more weight to Black's insistence on his rather esoteric hero killing techniques.

Dainpdf

The Light has been shown repeatedly to be super effective vs sorcery, for one. Also, we were told just last chapter that it was **not** literal resurrection. People can and have survived metal being shoved into their head. What the Pilgrim did was "just" very powerful healing.

As for displaying power comparable to the Saint, he disrupted one thing his power was super effective against and then almost collapsed, while the Saint cut through the demon containing bubble without missing a beat.

Morgenstern

To be fair, "demon-containing" does sound rather specific. In that it targets DEMONS. Saint is no demon, is she...

Unorginal

It can contain demons, it's not geared only towards demons. Note how Hierophant mentions that the ward-schemes have held against demons rather than saying they were for demons. Masego isn't the type to settle for sub-optimal spells if I've read him right.

Dainpdf

From Masego's reaction, I would assume it wasn't a specific demon container.

Raved Thrad

I remember all the imprisoned Summer fey being called to her side when Catherine started her parlay with the Summer Queen. Masego has a small fit when his wardings break and High Noon is released by the Queen's call.

Raved Thrad

Bindings, rather. Not wardings.

wyaldriddler

Pilgrim basically flipped around the mini Sun Masego dropped on him and the greenhorns which made miracles impossible inside its bounds. That's what he's been flinging around this entire time and he essentially spent it breaking the fairy gate.

As an aside I feel like that glimmer in the air left behind is going to be rather important later on.

Darkening

Yeaah, this area is already pretty close to that forest where the barrier to arcadia is thin enough for the wild hunt to come out and play regularly, and now Cat just punched a giant hole in it. I imagine that's gonna have effects.

Dainpdf

I thought this was a Light thing. The Light has been known to repel sorcery (the runes in Callowan knight armor, the priests making scrying impossible, etc).

Anna

To think the war could be over by this time tomorrow. Alas, won't happen. Poor Cat, things never go quite right enough for her.

Edward Tumbaga

I wonder if Black's army will leave their position and join Catherine's army via portal. Larat can gate Black's army, destroy Malanza's, then the combined forces can meet the other army under Klaus. It will take many days for Klaus' army to march to Malanza's location and the combined villain army will have destroyed Malanza by then.

Decius

Thief, being a good spymistress, is going to make sure that the envoy sees exactly what she wants them to: A wounded but still capable Duchess of Winter.

The Grey Pilgrim will, of course, see through the ruse. He will also be convinced that the correct choice for the Crusade is to retreat, and later to take Cat up on her offer to help assault the Tower.

grzecho2222

They do have one short part-fae girl, who was getting wierdly small screentime, whose death to assasination on negotiations would spark series of catastrophies

Morgenstern

Also true. Although the Pilgrim has met Cat in person several times now. He'd probably not be deluded by that, either.

Burnsy

They talk about murdering thousands of people by bow as if it's something to be proud of, then judge Catherine as a monster because she did it with one blow.

They know she offered repeatedly to help them if they'd just stop invading her country and they still see her as the bad guy.

I cannot stand the hypocrisy of these people, least of all because it's so goddamn realistic.

Anon

Agreed on the hypocrisy note – though it does perhaps bear mentioning that Melanza was actually considering Cat's offer of foodstuffs if they did retreat.

She'll likely never get over her loss of so many men though, despite being willing to lose similar, if not the same, amount of men in sieging Cat's army.

White

Indeed, the hypocrisy is sickening. In the same breath the Princes go from talking about what a great gambit Rozala had to kill thousands of crossbow men, to calling Cat evil for having the temerity to fight back. They just used miracles to assist in slaughter and yet the idea of Faery Gates turned to the same end is somehow sickening?

I'm disappointed in Rozala and Pilgrim. Especially Pilgrim.

Finally, I think it's kind of amusing that the crusade is still counting on taking supplies from Cat's army. Between thief and goblin munitions, the only edible thing that will be left in that camp come victory will be the bodies the crusaders had to walk over. Even if Cat's not there to pull the trigger, Juniper is too sound a strategist to allow the Crusader's to regain supplies.

Raved Thrad

Yeah, the arrogance and hypocrisy are irritating, but then it's a testament to the author's skill that they can evoke such emotional responses from us, I think. It's starting to sound strident and annoying, though, every time the crusaders and heroes are basically complaining about how Cat and the Callowans (ooh, nice name for a band!) refuse to just lie down and die. Every time they meet, Pilgrim has basically said, in more ways than one, "You're evil and an abomination, you know that, right? And if you don't, well I'm telling you that so you can feel bad and want to die. Would it hurt you so much if you just stood still while I ran you through? You know, so that everyone will be happy."

Pilgrim the White

You see too much from Cat's perspective. Invaders used miracles, true but they still used soldiers to kill soldiers. That's war, it's ugly but it's known. Cat just killed thousands outright in seconds and they were powerless in front of it. Don't look at it like one side killed x amount the other side also x amount so it's equal, context matters. Think of it like Usa droppin the effin nuke. It's evil by our standards of today, no doubt.

Also Cat is a villain and you gettin surprised by Pilgrim referring to her as evil is just... Not to mention he simply says "greater evils than Cat are on the way", that should be taken as a compliment .... Pilgrim is the most level headed and reasonable person on both sides of the story .

Don't let the narrative cloud your judgement.

Lucas

Not only that but monster is also a way of saying she is really strong.

Slide

Don't you know that once you believe you've been sanctioned by the gods above, whatever you do in their name is instantly the 'right thing' and 'right way' (TM). And anybody who opposes you is automatically 'evil'.

Holy Wars have no hypocrites.

And random aside I think it's sweet how Thief is standing guard over Catherine. Also interesting to see how differently Juniper and her see things. And how they have no room to see each other's viewpoints. Eerily like a mini good and evil unable to see eye to eye.

RanVor

That's pretty much war in a nutshell. "When we kill your guys, it's righteous and justified. When you kill our guys, it's vile." It's not limited to heroes in any way.

StiozZ

The difference between a terrorist and a revolutionary is a matter of perspective.

Raved Thrad

Or conquerors and liberators.

Dainpdf

There are ways and ways to kill. Some would argue there is a difference between ordering people to the battlefield and deploying a weapon of mass destruction.

For one, Malanza needs some approval from her people to raise soldiers and do what she did. Cat, as far as the Princess knows, just has to will it.

I will concede that what Catherine's did is, in my opinion, not *that* bad. It's still terrifying and monstrous.

BryceWilliam

If Cat wakes up and doesn't have a new Name I'll cut off my pinky.

"She's having some weird dream"

Every fucking time she gets Name related changes its from a fucking Named dream, she's gonna wake up just as their about to lose horribly and be the fucking Faerie Queen or some shit.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Pretty sure next chapter will be about that, I think this is a dramatic moment enough for a Name to be awoken. My 2 cents is that it will be related to sacrifice and gaining knowledge, 2 things Cat are familiar with.

Anon

Normally I'd agree, but Cat's already been shown to get 'wonky' when her Dominion is affected, and the Grey Pilgrim just carved the sun (a metaphorical aspect of Summer) straight through her gates.

That, and 'dreaming' seems to be more an assumption of Jupiter and the Mages based on Cat's body warping around, and not some mystical insight into Cat's mind.

Plus, if Cat were to be 're'-named now, IMO it would be moreso Creation trying to re-assert dominion on her to prevent Arcadia-based shenanigans from getting too out of control, than Cat getting a full-on Fairy 'name'.

danh3107

I know this sounds bad, but honestly, I don't care if it's creation trying to re-assert control over Cat. This fae abomination thing has just gotten really old and boring, real quick.

*benthelynx*

For you perhaps. I like it :p

Agent J

Boring for some, maybe. I greatly prefer this to having some random name slapped on her as a power boost. Especially if it comes at the cost of her free will. When she gets reNamed, I expect there to be greater narrative weight than merely a losing battle.

Like if the Heroes break and call on an angel to Judge her and she gains a Name to Reject their Judgement. Or if the Gods Bellow spit out Triumphant and her Hellish Legions as answer to the Gods Above and their Righteous Crusade, once again turning Callow into a battlefield for the eldritch to settle their squabbles and Cat has to gain a Name tear them all down and reassert the Laws of Men over her sovereign domain.

The Queen of Winter should not get a name until it is narratively appropriate. And this battle doesn't have the narrative weight for a name gain to be satisfying.

Raved Thrad

If the heroes or crusaders (lots of priests there, who knows?) call on an angel, then they've just broken the terms of the fight, and all bets are off. I wonder how heroes breaking their word affects the narrative...

Dainpdf

I suspect she won't get a Name now. We haven't even had time to really explore her powers yet.

If she does get a Name, I assume it'll be Queen of some sort, and in Liesse. Because she was already offered that name there twice. Once when received an offer by the angels, and once when she was about to accept Malicia get Akua's weapon.

Agent J

That's a very interesting point. I just noticed that Cat has rejected or lost both the names of a Heroic Queen and a Villainous Queen. A third Queen title popping up in Liesse would likely be Neutral, keeping in line with Cat's Fuck the Gods motto and allowing her to carve her own path outside the purview of the squabbling gods.

Unorginal

We know Greyknight is not possible, (from a WOG) because there is no cultural inertia, no drive behind the formation of a Name there and in much the same way its more than likely that the same could be said of any neutral queenly name. We haven't yet found an ingrained cultural drive to create the grey*whatever name.

Unless something in the story lets her step around that... then no dice. There won't be a grey-queen name.

Burdi

whatever template that is become of catherine's body is broken thats why her body confuse how to remake her body because the file is corrupted cat need to make a new file for her body blueprint so it can has a form and the good news is that there are a chance for cat to make her height added a few inch so her leg can became longer so she can run faster if needed

Raved Thrad

"Instead of a Carrion Lord, you would set up a Black Queen. And I will not be terrible, but I shall be beautiful as the morning and the night! And tall! I will be tall for once, dammit!"

Raved Thrad

The sheer arrogance of the crusader forces never ceases to astound me. Basically, Malanza was going "How dare this monster kill so many of my soldiers! My self-image is in tatters! I'm so hurt and offended I need a safe space! It's not like I killed an entire seventh of her army by hemming them in with priest spells and mowing them down when they couldn't run, right?"

Welcome to the horror of war. Go home, maybe you'll live to tell your children of the time you tried to invade and chop up another person's home kingdom, y'know, "for the good of everyone."

Except the dead. The dead don't care.

Unorginal

Give her a little credit, it wasn't up until now that she believed she was doing a *good* thing by invading Callow. For her, she was confident this would merely be the avenue through which she might someday gain revenge. She had no illusions about the 'goodness' of her campaign.

And it wasn't arrogance. Catherine's troops may be better but the problem with elite-small forces (and they don't even qualify as truly elite.) is that they have this inability to absorb losses. The Crusader Army would have won in almost any world where Named didn't exist. They've got men, officers, priests and (admittedly shitty) mages to spare while the loss of every single soldier in the army of callow is keenly felt, much less the harder to replace officers and mages of callow.

We've also been spoiled by the fact that we're readers. Maz had no idea that this could conceivably happen, she's Proceran, they don't do Named often and this magnificent wrecking ball of a move has for the first time in her life made her aware of just how small she is in the grand scope of things. No one deals with that well, especially someone who's always been so confident that they are important and no reader here including myself would be dealing with the situation any better if they were to fill Maz's shoes.

Maybe I'm a little sympathetic because of how this sudden realization hit me in real-life too, nearly died in an industrial explosion (chemical storage facility, TJ, China.) that destroyed windows of my apartment several kilometers away and knocked me down from a standing position. If I had walked too much closer I would be dead as well, every fire-fighter on site and more than a few police officers in a nearby station were pretty much vaporized instantly when water mixed with whatever the fuck was inside the warehouse.

Unorginal

Addition: Worst part about that entire fuck-up was that somebody had decided to bribe local officials to look the other way about the storage conditions in the warehouse and so when the fire-fighters arrived no one bothered to tell them that it was a warehouse filled with industrial chemicals.

Raved Thrad

I have no idea how I'd react to that, but I get that it affected you greatly. I have nearly died a couple of times, all because of something stupid I did (though whether or not it was ultimately justified is something I'll leave in the air :P). To just barely escape instant, ugly death, however, without warning and due to no fault of your own, that's something I have managed to avoid so far.

ParadoxicalThought

Malanza sounds like a Lannister with all this talk of always paying debts

Nguyen Hong Hai

At least the lady got actual talent to back up for it and do note that while Cat got a dependable and loyal crew to rely on, Malanza got stuck with a bunch of motleys and backstabbers, also drinking the Goodness Kool-Aids for who knows how long so this is as good as vanilla human can reach.

grzecho2222

I'm not sure if talking about debts is smart when your plans made Black Queen an arm and legs

SpeckofStardust

To be the spoil sport here, I think she'll get up when the gray pilgrim due to here fae survival instincts (we all no she wasn't born with any)

Antony444

It's amusing how much the Procerans are terrified of Catherine when they have the Grey Pilgrim able to shatter gates of this power, the Saint able to cut icebergs with a simple sword and heroes able to survive in conditions where a soldier is absolutely dead meat.

Catherine's price for this power is basically to turn herself in an eldritch abomination. The heroes have just to survive and get older.

I'm a bit surprised though the Crusaders think that if two of the Woe are out of the way, they can start a new battle and win. They have heroes, it is true. But their numerical advantage has been in great part completely annihilated by this tidal wave. Worse, you can do all the speeches and heavenly blessing you want, the fact is the troops took a monumental beating and certainly won't be in the mood to march again the next morning.

The army of Prince Amadis needs a lot of food, fire, sustenance and comfort right now, not another battle. On the other side, they have an Army of Callow which has just lost its vanguard but whose main body and fortifications are intact.

Worse, Larat is alive. In the worst case, Juniper can always order a retreat a day or two south and the supplies of Malanza will be further depleted.

They have the Army of Daoine in their rear, either to block the Stairway or to fall on their levies fleeing from this massacre. The Procerans have just lost quantities of officers in the camps, and the regimental structure has just been pulverised. They are a few days away from complete starvation and even a victory may not change this situation.

You can have the angels on your side, but now unless the next miracle is an entire supply convoy the chances of victory are next to nonexistent.

Letouriste

Why hakram And Archer were not present? I know hakram was taking care of liesse but an army take precedent and cat could have made a gate for him (the invaders have taken their sweet time to arrive) and Archer was spying on the heroes right? So she should be around.

Storyaddict

First I thought why another interlude? It just got interesting. Now i see it as a great way to showcase the aftermath of the gate. Superbly done!

Truly satisfying was the fact, that despite all their cheats, the so called „good“ side was beaten back by solid tactics, like cutting the supplies, affecting morales with a terrifying gate and the sheer surprise of it. It came to pass at a cost but still.

To all those crying for cat to get a name please reconsider, for any name comes with drawback when the Named is not acting in the spirit of the name. Black queen is squeamish about bonfire? Power loss. Offering retreat after invading her country? Power loss. That is not a villain in the eyes of creation. Her being part fae allows for more power, as the backlash of the portal interruption would have killed even Black, AND she can act outside of the typical villain vs hero circus in creation.

Has cat only used the power of a duchesse and not a queen? Because nighfall said, a queen needs a court.

Please stick with the winter stuff and the eldritch abomination. Its way more intresting. Go queen of winter!

Dainpdf

Well, Black is not particularly powerful. He's particularly cunning. But yeah, apparently the backlash would have killed the Warlock, and it almost killed Mas ego (gotta remember it was split two ways).

On the topic of binding, I'd say being fae binds her tighter than any Name could.

Raved Thrad

On second reading, a couple of things stand out to me: first is the quality of Rozala Malanza. I cannot say whether or not she is a _good_ person, but it is clear she is an honorable one. Of all the scheming Proceran nobles tied up in this game of thrones (or game of houses, depending on which fantasy series reference you prefer), she strikes me as someone to follow and die for. She reminds me of the Atreides from Frank Herbert's Dune novels. The very fact that she's not willing to just order her soldiers to their deaths, and that she actually got her hands dirty trying to rescue and help people after after Catherine and Masego's Summon Icy Lake spell hit. Her inner monologue indicates that she felt she had to shame the other nobles into doing so; that right there indicates that she has a clear idea of what kind of leader she wants to be.

Second is the oath between Malanza and the Pilgrim. While they can't seem to get over their "we're here to kill and enslave you, it's for your own good" attitude towards Catherine and the rest of Callow, I'm hoping this gives her and the Pilgrim an out. While I don't see the Pilgrim being able to personally abandon his personal quest to root out the evil that he sees in Catherine, Malanza's willingness to suffer personal and political ruin to uphold her oath opens the possibility to Cat convincing the Pilgrim to tell her, and by extension her army, to go home.

As for Malanza swearing undying enmity towards Catherine, well, that would make for a wonderful story of two people caught up in conflict due to their heroic flaws and natures: Catherine's is that she does what she does, up to and including the most monstrous of deeds, because she's trying to stop the suffering of her people, while Malanza, from what we've seen here, is driven both by her personal honor and what she sees as personal debts. Honor and obligation, the Japanese concept of giri. Greater tales of honor, personal triumph, and tragedy have been written with less.

benthelynx

I'm going to be disappointed by the lack of zombie goats in this battle.

grzecho2222

There are thousands of dead in ice cold swamp (first Name dream happend in swamp) who may rise their objections toward Prnicess's tactics

Phantom

I felt that there's a few discrepancies in this chapter that maybe akin to plot hole unless someone can help to explain or clarify it.

First, is that I find it quite illogical for the heroes to still even be able to do anything when the lake water was pumping out. People around the mages, priests and heroes are drowning and yet the priests were still able to cast spells while in water? While drowning or swimming? Can they even do that? That applies to the heroes too, slashing glaciers and shooting beams, while they are maybe doing it while probably standing on water? Last I read, the lake's ice waters were able to reach all way to the army's fortifications, the ones in the direction that the heroes heading towards. Which under the water rush that still had enough force that make some parts of the palisade broke.

If I read it this way, it just make sense how the heroes and soldiers were not flushed to the front of the fortification already or crushed under the water volume pressure. What's more the chapter didn't even explain how the hero could even do what they did but just stating that they did it...

Second, shouldn't the gate Cat opened under the lake be just like any other typical portals she had opened before? Maybe slightly larger, but she opened gates big enough for armies to pass through and this time, it only allowing ice water to pass through.

If that's the case, there's been a lot times where she had opened gates near heroes or allowed them the chance to do so. Shouldn't the heroes just be able to knocked her out before is they just disrupt her opening gates?

---

Priests weren't anywhere in sight when the army started advancing, so they're likely to have been in the back of the host. As for the gates, there must be a difference in investment into a smaller gate to a random unoccupied part of Arcadia and a mile-wide hole in the sky opened with a dimension-scrying ritual away from the caster.

Phantom

That may possibly apply for the priests, but I doubt it would still be possible for the heroes who were almost directly under the water drop though

grzecho2222

Battlefield turned into cold swamp full of corpses, first Name dream happened to include cold swamp full of undead, what are chances that something happens to dead or worse (for Good) that something will use this similarity to escape from Cat's dream?

narcoduck

I'm betting on a Name dream (the symbolic soul-searching quest), but not what we've been used to. As others have pointed out, Cat's trial to become the Squire involved a swamp full of the undead because she has "this belief that nothing worth having can be had easily" (Book1:Chapter5 role).

But Cat isn't human anymore. She is a Dreaming Fae; "A madman [who] thinks the world other than what it is, and in a mortal that is a harmless thing. Not so in one who molds Creation to their will, as all Named do."

—King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

I think we're about to see the Enemy Without (<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/EnemyWithout>); Good Cat and Evil Cat are about to come out to play, and we'll see whatever happened to Cat's Beast of a Name after Winter's coronation in her soul.

BarthHumphries

Typo thread:

The orc had learned to set aside most the dislike of Callowans
Add of after most

She knew hat humans did not have the same Change hat to that

The Princess of Aequitan was still sure at least thousand levies
Add a after at

and she could already heal the other royals howling Change heal to hear but looking at the exhausted old man who looked like was folding into himself

Add he after like

Come on, people, just make a typo thread first thing each time.
:p

BarthHumphries

The Princess of Aequitan was still sure at least thousand levies
Add a after at
Whoops, i meant after least

Aze

Y'know there is a missing member of the Woe : maybe we will see Hakram pull out a 'Ride of the Rohirrim' while Masego and Cat sleep, he has a few thousands soldiers if I am not mistaken

And I really hope that the Wild Hunt will not start their expected betrayal now that their Queen isn't there to stop them

thegreatfeed

I just loved that subtle tipping of the scales by heaven. A moral destroying attack results on the crusader front becoming United.
And that arrogant mazela willing to take the retreat deal but still thinking of vengeance.

BarthHumphries

Morale destroying. They presumably still have their morals. 😊

Archaic

While I don't think Cat is necessarily going to get her new name straight away, I can't help but see some parallels to a certain myth that might indicate where a new name could come from. So... stop me if you've heard this one before.

Orphaned at a young age, they are taken in by a person they quickly start to see as a father figure. This mentor doesn't just try to teach them the way of the sword, but also to instill in them certain values which will be invaluable to them once they take their place as a leader of the country of their birth. In particular, attitudes to war which can almost be boiled down to using war as a tool to achieve a final lasting peace (specifically, under one's own rule). They do not suggest that might makes right so much as they imply that one must harness (destructive) might to enforce/implement the cause of the right.

Put up against a number of threats to their homeland, one of their most prominent and foes is a strong and assertive magic wielding woman who comes from a background of nobility. Through their actions, this foe plunges the protagonists homeland into virtual civil war. This individual had a kind of special tie to our protagonist, and is strongly associated with the fae.

Establishing their credentials to rule over their homeland, our orphan pulls a special sword from a stone. But this particular sword was special to them only in this context. It was not the weapon that our protagonist would eventually be best known for (and notably, their acquisition of that involves a large body of water...).

The orphan eventually discovers their "real father", and inherits their birthright. By the time they've established their rule over their country of birth, the orphan has surrounded themselves with a group of followers, including several renowned warriors whose mere name strikes fear into the hearts of their enemies.

Due to their possession of a certain thing with fae origins, our protagonist essentially has the ability to recover from any wound, with time. They don't even truly bleed. But when this is suddenly and unexpectedly taken away from them, they're able to be grievously wounded. Being taken away to the lands of the fae, they return in the hour of their country's greatest need, acting to defend it against invaders.

Or to put it more bluntly....it sounds to me like Catherine is the Once and Future Queen.

Jack

"We'd prepared for many things, Your Grace," the Rogue quietly said. "But the sky opening up to drop a lake was beyond our predictions. There is no fault in this, save in believing that our opponent would not be so monstrous."

Man, these guys have no idea how many plans she vetoed before coming onto one as 'nice' as this, do they?

Rodrigues

In this context I think monstrous is referring to 'super strong'

Raved Thrad

So, better than Amazing, but not quite Unearthly? 😊

patrar

When will you learn, Cat? The Wending Heart was never a good place for you. You killed your 'father' then lost your heart the first time. You lost control over your name and body the second time. Now this.

Is this a Rule of Three battle of attrition between Catherine Founding and the Wending Heart? Hopefully that awful lake is now permanently drained dead.

Max Scherer

This chapter shows why i hate the good side. They are so fucking hypocritical. Yeah she killed thousand, but they would do the same and its war and they are invading. So yeah fuck the good site.

vuthuha912

You know Princess. I would be angry too. But you really should consider whether continuing the invasion is worth the manpower. May I remind you that your army consists of priests, farmers, craftsmen, and veterans? All of these people can come back home, work the farm, work the forge and revitalize the economy that was wrecked by the civil war. A few decades more and the population will recover. What are you guys doing in the middle of a foreign country that never attack you before? The morale of the army is quite down right now. They must be homesick too. Just let your men go home to their families.

Let the East deal with their own problems. You are in no position to guarantee a decisive victory. Even if you manage to win, it might not even be worth it. Stopping Evil is not as important as the economy.

---

Interlude: Kaleidoscope II

"Fear is the mother of character. Without it we remain children until death."

-Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

Vivienne had once spent a few days running a shell game in the streets of Southpool, when she'd still been an apprentice under the Guild. It hadn't been about the coin, for she could have made a hundred times the coppers from burgling a single noble house. Her teacher had teased her about it, calling her a petty hustler instead of a thief, but what she'd learned had been well worth a few sardonic comments. Confidence tricks were about sleight of hand, but also about reading the other side. Gauging how much of a taste you had to give them before the fleecing, how much you could squeeze out of them before things got ugly. She'd learned more about diplomacy over those three lazy days than through years of lessons. It was why she'd pressed to be the one sent to speak with the Proceran envoys, that and the undeniable fact that if Marshal Juniper went instead it would be a bloody disaster. The orc had a place as one of the larger cogs in the kingdom's machinery, but she was useless in all matters not military. That the Marshal of Callow seemed under the impression that her judgement off the battlefield should ever be seriously considered was just a mark of the greenskin's arrogance.

A child that screamed 'kill them all and eat them' every time you glanced at them would be about as useful.

Thief had been forced to lean on the open trust Catherine had shown her in the past to be nominated, and the heavy-handedness had won her no friends in the general staff – which essentially ran the camp while Cat slumbered. The usual deference shown to Named by mundane apparently thinned when said Named had been late to join the cause. Callowans listened to her, and her role as spymistress of the kingdom meant she had most everyone's ear, but there were few of her countrymen high up in the ranks save for Grandmaster Talbot. For all that the rank and file of the Army of Callow drew increasingly from her people, the senior officers were still largely from from the three legions Catherine had brought to her banner. Vivienne saw no need to take issue with that. Officers died and retired, and the Legions promoted strictly from within the ranks. Her countrymen would keep rising up the ladder until 'Army of Callow' was more than a name. Any halfway decent thief knew that patience was as useful a tool as action, and Vivienne was a better thief than most. More importantly, after securing her role she'd had free hand to deal with the envoys as she wished.

First off, there would be no talk of allowing them into the camp. Let them remain outside under their banner with the morning sun pounding down. They'd shown up around Morning Bell, so Vivienne had let them stew outside for another hour. There was no guarantee she would manage to fool the opposition, and the longer they stayed there the better the chances of Catherine or Masego waking up. She'd not dared to let them wait longer than that. If she did, it might be recognized as the temporizing it was. An hour should just be taken as an insult instead of betraying the relative weakness of the Callowan position. She'd gone out alone to meet them, afterwards. Vivienne knew she could master her own body language if she concentrated, but anyone else was a risk. The two men were still standing when she arrived, and discreetly she studied them as she drew near. One was obvious, the wrinkly old man they knew as the Grey Pilgrim. The other was known to her as well, as it turned out. The distinct nose marked him as a relative of Prince Amadis Milenan and the long curly locks were distinctive enough she recognized them from a sketch her Jacks had obtained. Jacques Milenan, a younger cousin to the Prince of Iserre. His mother was... from an Alamans royal line, though she could not recall which one at the moment. The man was supposed to be high in Milenan's council. Which meant they were taking this seriously.

While she'd assessed them, they'd assessed her. The Pilgrim's face was perfectly calm, a mask she suspected he'd worn for so long there had come to be some truth to it. Vivienne knew something of pretending to be someone for long enough the deception grew roots and leaves. Thief swaggered forward, producing her flask and pulling at the brandy inside. She sloppily wiped her mouth after and silently used her aspect to trade the flask for an identical one that was the same drink, only heavily watered. Now she just had to let her breath do the lying, and they'd assume her to be less sober than she truly was. The Wandering Bard had taught her the uses of fooling others into thinking you an incompetent drunk.

"Greetings," the Proceran said, inclining his head. "I am--"

"Jacques Milenan," Thief interrupted lightly. "I know who you are, crusader."

"And you are the Thief," the Pilgrim said calmly.

He was leaning on his staff, Vivienne noted as she approached. Genuine tiredness or a ploy?

"That's me," she chuckled, making sure the breeze carried the smell of brandy.

She drank from the switched flask. The mundane envoy did not quite manage to hide his disdain.

"Request was made to treat with the Black Queen herself," the Pilgrim said.

"That's funny," Thief said. "That you think you're still in a position to make demands, I mean. I was under the impression a fifth of your army got wiped and you were one week away from beginning to dabble with cannibalism."

"Has the queen refused to receive us, then?" the Pilgrim asked.

"Your side sends some spare kinsman and a man who tried to kill her, then expect Catherine to come out to make small talk?" Vivienne snorted. "I thought high-handed arrogance was a Proceran specialty, Pilgrim."

"If you will not treat in good will, there is no need to treat at all," the Milenan said flatly.

She shrugged.

"So walk," she said. "How much good will do you think you've earned, princeling? You invade our kingdom, attempt murder of our anointed queen and all the while plan to carve up our lands to dispense as favours. If every last one of you dies drowning, I will not shed a damned tear over it."

The old man's eyes narrowed. Not because of her words, at least not exactly. Because he'd been able to tell she was speaking the truth. He'd not expected a former heroine, if she'd ever truly been that, to say as much. The very reason Vivienne had said it: she needed to confirm whether or not he could still discern truth from lies, and the sentence was incendiary enough it should garner reaction. Good. She had confirmed it. Bad. He still had the ability, even when visibly tired. That complicated things, not that she'd expected the Heavens to provide relief. She wasn't hanging with a crowd on their good side, nowadays.

"Negotiations with a lieutenant would not be binding," the Pilgrim said.

"I can speak with my queen's authority," Vivienne said, and it was technically true.

She watched the hero closely as she spoke, trying to find out if that would register as lie. She'd never actually said that Catherine had given her mandate today, and in theory it wasn't impossible for the Queen of Callow to grant this particular authority to her one day. The old man's face remained unmoving, but that told her nothing. He was too clever to be caught through a visible tell twice.

"My instructions," Jacques Milenan said, "are to treat with none but the Black Queen herself."

"Black Queen's not coming out for the likes of you," Thief said, another technical truth. "Come back with your cousin or Princess Malanza and the matter will be reconsidered."

If that worked, it might get them through the morning before the enemy realized a game was afoot. If it didn't, well, all they had was suspicions. They had to be wary of a repeat of yesterday.

"This is not how proper diplomacy is conducted," the Proceran stiffly said.

Vivienne toasted him with her flask.

"You'll note my Name is not 'the Diplomat'," she replied, and took another pull.

She could feel the Pilgrim's eyes on her. Searching, measuring.

"Then I would request audience with the queen personally," the old man said.

"Unless you've suddenly gained a principality or right of command over the host, your function here is purely decorative," Thief replied. "As far as I'm concerned you have no right to make that request."

The hero sighed.

"I am willing to provide healing to wounded in exchange for the audience," he said.

"Chosen," the Proceran said. "Surely you cannot be serious."

Thief drank from the flask again so her face would not be visible to read. This... Would Catherine and Masego qualify as wounded? She was not certain they would. And if they didn't, she would be revealing their state for no gain. It would also mean taking the man at his word, which she hesitated to do. She'd ran with William's crew long enough to know some of the more pragmatic heroes had notions about whether promises made to the Enemy needed to be kept. On the other hand, if those two could be healed most of the army's problems went away. That, she decided, was worth the risk. The flask left her lips.

"An oath to the Heavens," she said. "Of my own wording."

"No," the Grey Pilgrim said.

"Fine," she conceded, idly waving her drink. "We can word it together."

"You misunderstand me, child," the old man said. "There will be no healing."

"No audience either, then," she shrugged. "We'll expect an answer within the hour about whether or not Prince Milenan or Princess Malanza will be coming."

"That will not happen either," the Pilgrim said calmly. "You have betrayed yourself."

Vivienne's heartbeat quickened, but she kept her face smiling.

"Have I?" she drawled. "Then, by all means, take another swing. After you're driven back, expect the cost of supplies to rise accordingly."

The old man met her eyes with equanimity.

"You were a heroine, once," he said.

"And just like that, you lost my interest," Thief said. "See you around, gentlemen. I'd recommend your backers check on the state of their coffers before ordering an offensive. My heart would just weep if the price of retreat was destitution."

And with that last lie ringing in the air, she turned and swaggered away. Shit. She'd been had. She'd put a good face on it, but on someone like the Grey Pilgrim the odds of it fooling him were depressingly low. Fuck.

Time to see how well they could bluff with an empty hand, then.

—

"She will be incapacitated," Tariq said. "Not dead, for the Thief still had hope, but the Black Queen was hurt by the shattering of the gate."

Princess Rozala considered the matter with due seriousness, to his approval. The young woman had been robbed of true morals by her uprising, but her mother had instilled her with a sense of honour and duty that allowed some small sliver of them to remain. She was forgiven this, for the fault was not her own. Children could not help what they were taught. Tariq held great hopes that the horrors of this war and the others to come would allow her to grow into the woman she could have been. It was a small thing, in this sea of darkness, but every speck of light drove back the night. It did not matter that the candle was small or passing, only that it burned. It was good to remember old wisdom, in days like these. The well-worn truths helped bring perspective to it all. Creation was imperfect, and would be until its very last breath. All the Heavens required of their children was to leave it a little brighter than they had found it. A hundred thousand pebbles make a tower, one piece at a time.

"Then we resume our offensive," Princess Rozala said quietly. "Gods forgive us all, if we are wrong."

The old man stilled his tongue as the Princess of Aquitan began discussing marching orders, watching the men and women at the table. These four, two princes and two princesses, were the mortal heart of this crusade. Or at least the part of it here in the north. Prince Amadis Milenan held the most sway, and it was to him the First Prince had granted command, but the Iserran had become almost self-effacing since the butchery of yesterday. He deferred to the general of the host in all things, and in him Tariq read both fear and cunning. The possibility of defeat, before thought absurd, had shaken him. Yet he was also subtly inviting Princess Rozala to overstep her authority, to further isolate herself from the other royals of the host by giving unpopular orders. Even now that he had glimpsed the abyss, the man schemed. The rot went deep in this one. Though we be flawed instruments, we may yet serve greater purpose, the Pilgrim chided himself. Imperfection was not sin but the very design of the Gods. Salvation without temptation was meaningless. The failure of a man to recognize his weakness should be met with pity and not blame.

The other two royals were smaller flames to these two, he would admit. Princess Adeline of Orne was young in a way that had little to do with age, and still bleeding from her brother's death. He grieved with her for the loss, though he'd not known the man. The wake of his passing was recommendation enough for his nature. The princess sought alliance with Princess Rozala, and Tariq read admiration in Adeline's heart when she gazed at the other woman. There could be friendship forged there, if trust bloomed, and they would both be happier for it. The Pilgrim half-smiled. Perhaps a helping hand could be leant to the matter. The last was Prince Arnaud of Cantal, and what the old man glimpsed there had surprised him. Laurence was a creature of pure instinct, having spent her lifetime blurring the boundary between thought and act, and her intuition was a sharp thing. Yet the Pilgrim had doubted her, when she'd said that one was the most dangerous of the lot. No longer so now that he had gazed within. All that lay there was patience and the utter absence of emotion. Tariq watched as the man blustered, speaking foolishly of sweeping advance, and how all the others dismissed him in their eyes. Even Prince Amadis, who thought himself the cleverest of them all.

All the others had warmed to Tariq, after Laurence acted as offensively in councils as she could. Offered him trust, treated him as the man of reason holding back the reckless Saint of Swords. All of them save Prince Arnaud of Cantal.

"I trust the Chosen will participate in the assault?" Prince Amadis asked.

Face never betraying that his attention had waned, the Pilgrim nodded.

"I have already spoken with Laurence," he said. "Save for the Rogue Sorcerer and the Forsworn Healer, we will split with the armies and fight with the soldiers."

Queen Catherine had brutalized the children, but not beyond repair. Antoine's arm had been reattached, and another greatsword found for him to wield. With the coming of dawn, Tariq had been able to Forgive the death of Mansurin. The young man, displaying the famous fortitude of the Champion lines, had only been spurred to greater zeal by his stay Above. Little Sidonia, with her laughing eyes and quick wit, would have to remain under shroud of preservation until tomorrow. The Pilgrim still ached at the memory of seeing the young heroes reaped like wheat as he was held back by the Hierophant. He and Laurence had known that the best chance to spare lives was to slay the Black Queen early in the battle, and that to draw her out the children were the one bait she would not refuse. He regretted it still. Resurrection left a scar on the soul, always. No one could be ripped from the embrace of the Gods without finding Creation and faded and brutish place for the rest of their days, even if the memory of the Heavens was withheld. The Pilgrim excused himself as the council ended, paying due courtesies before returning to his own.

He found Laurence standing by the marshlands madness had made, repeatedly taking her sword an inch out of the sheath and sliding it back down. She was uneasy, then. Tariq came to stand by her side but did not speak. She would do so herself, when she was ready.

"I don't like this," the Saint finally said. "Feels wrong."

He did not contradict her. Though Tariq had been granted insights, they were into the souls of mortals. Laurence de Montfort's strength had come differently. Her sword had reached the Heavens, and by touching the divine with steel she had attained a sensitivity to the lay of Creation he had never seen the equal of in all his years. If she was troubled, there was reason for it.

"She may rise," the Pilgrim said. "The shape of it is there. Wounded or unconscious, those she loves besieged, she may return to offer salvation at the darkest hour."

"And that's not a villain's story, Tariq," the woman grunted. "She's hard to predict, and that'll get people killed. You're sure about what you saw?"

The Grey Pilgrim let out a tired breath.

"What Catherine Foundling craves above all is peace," he murmured. "On chosen terms, perhaps, but peace nonetheless."

His heart had broken a little to see it. That even though she had butchered all that she was, the little girl within was still desperately grasping at the light she'd once glimpsed Above.

"She killed thousands," Laurence said. "And she'll kill more, if she squeaks away here. Compassion's not my wheelhouse, but whoever made her into what she is deserves a slow and painful death. She's been twisted. No one sane would ever do what she did to her own soul."

The child herself, the Pilgrim suspected, would be infuriated to hear someone speak of her that way. Her embrace of her own mistakes rivalled any flagellant's.

"It is going to be a long war," Tariq whispered, the weight of the years heavy on his shoulders.

"Longer for us than most," Laurence replied, barking out a laugh. "We'll be part of the five, old friend. You can be sure of it. I already feel the pull."

The Pilgrim looked up at mockingly sunny skies. There would be a time, after the war turned here and the Red Flower Vales broke, where the Heavens would assemble their sharpest blade. The ancient forms would be observed. Five heroes, sent into the breach to quell the howling dark. Young Hanno would lead them, for the Seraphim had shaped him to the duty. As for the faces of the others, they could only guess. That charming young Valiant Champion was likely, as she'd followed the White Knight before. And there would have to be a practitioner. The most powerful of these was the Witch of the Woods, should she survive her confrontation with the Warlock. And the two of us, the Pilgrim added silently. Relics of an age already past, dusted off one last time. There was always a price to pay, to end the rise of Evil. Tariq hoped it was the two of them instead of young lives cut down before their prime.

"She'll be there too," Tariq said. "She always is."

"Surprised she hasn't dropped in yet," the Saint admitted. "But it doesn't smell like a brewery, and that's fairly telling."

"That worries me as much as your unease," the Pilgrim said. "For if she has not yet appeared..."

"The worse is yet to come," Laurence finished. "There's a cheerful thought."

She sighed and stretched her limbs.

"Well, no point putting it off," she said. "Let's go kill some people."

So spoke Saint of Swords. The Regicide, to the Principate. The Smiling Iron, to the Chain of Hunger. The Fool-That-Cut-Nothing, to no one still living.

"Let's put an end to this war," he replied. "Before it gets worse."

So spoke the Grey Pilgrim, whose names were too many to number. Fleet-foot and Patient Hand, the Kindly Stranger and the Peregrine.

Silence followed and legends went to war.

---

JD

You have some skill, Thief, but you'll need to wake up earlier than that to get one by the earthly personification of Wise Old Man

danh3107

And lo were my balls blue once more...

But instead of pure blue ballery this interlude is more like being edged, because damn if it wasn't a pretty good chapter.

naturalnuke

I love it.

wirelessgrapes

I like how they're acknowledging that Cat doesn't have a Villain story. That's most of what her setup for this book has been.

wyaldriddler

I like Tariq, but not even he can see the full picture, though he seems to be kind of trying.

Also Gods Below Thief, you had ONE JOB! :V

Ah well, makes things more interesting.

oldschoolvillain

She had one job, and she did it damnably well. She just has the unfortunate position of being a lower level than the Pilgrim.

Sniggs

I dunno, I kinda thought she did a really shit job myself. She arrogantly walked into the meeting vs. a guy with limited mind reading abilities without even putting together the basics of a plan. Did she even consult Juniper, Aisha, Ratface, et al.? The former would have given her advice on when to keep her mouth shut instead of using back-alley bluffing techniques, so it'd have been harder for Thief to get caught in a lie. The latter two would have helped her anticipate likely strategies (like a healer offering them healing...), so Thief could have had a script to work off of.

Instead she got baited in via a pretty low-level greed play on Pilgrim's part, had to weigh the pros/cons on the spot (huge tell right there), and then finally accepted a "deal" that Cat would never in a million years have gone for. Letting a god-tier status Hero waltz into your base of operations to heal your redshirts? Really Thief?

I was supremely unimpressed with her. Not that it's necessarily her fault, since she's kinda low-level in general and inexperienced with these plays in particular, but her "I'll just wing it" arrogance was a tad infuriating.

Also, now that Cat's crew has determined that Heroes' cold-reading/mind-reading skills are both somewhat common and tend to be ridiculously effective at high levels, maybe it's time to start putting some contingencies in place? Like AI-in-a-box style ones? You can't get caught in a lie by the supernatural lie detector if you don't speak to them in the first place.

Decius

Thief's mistake was in bargaining for an audience. The right response to the offer of healing would be "I will tell the queen of your offer, but it will not be accepted unless you are willing to make an oath". Then go back, think out of sight of the guy with stacked Sense Motive, and work out what oath to demand that will have the desired effect (Grey Pilgrim makes Heroic Effort to recover Cat and Heirarch, and doesn't reveal their weakness in any case) without the demand of the oath revealing that those are the conditions.

But Thief thinks too quickly to not take the camp condition into account, but not quickly enough to outwit.

Alternately, work with mages on temporary memory alteration, and go out utterly convinced of what you want the enemy to believe.

Hate from a smart phone

it's not like she lied. Pilgrim saw a sliver of hope, that's all it took. That her bluff failed is more a testament of how ridiculous grey wizards are.

The alternatives would have been "normal people" vs Named and, frankly, Thief is the best at hiding stuff and, amongst the remaining staff, the best at handling "name" stuff overall. I don't think the other officers would have given such specific advices against healing bait.

And technically, she made them wait for a whole hour. So, not a complete fail. But then again, the weight of the current story makes such a wait inconsequential : at this point Catherine will wake when she is needed.

So yeah, Catherine would have certainly negotiated better, Hakram might have. Thief did a good try.

MagnaMalusLupus

Except it wasn't that she was caught in a lie, because she didn't actually lie. Her mistake was in thinking he could detect truth, where as he could actually detect emotion. He purposefully dangled powerful healing in front of her to see if she reacted with hope, despair, or mild interest, which would correspond to incapacitated, dead, or perfectly fine. It's a neat trick. He's also an asshole.

Morgenstern

Also, second what MagnaMalusLupus said, of course. 😊

Morgenstern

Redshirts? o0 She never ONCE considered healing *redshirts*. The only thing she greedily considered was forcing him to heal *Cat and Masego*. Those two are NOT redshirts in any sense any longer, even though they have not reached the level of the Calamities yet...

usernamesbco

She should have opened with acknowledging Cat was alive, and telling them what they really needed to worry about was whether Masego pulled through, because if he didn't Cat would brutally murder them all. Technically all true, and a good enough deflection.

When Pilgrim offered to heal him admit Cat would probably allow that, but Viv wasn't going to tell her he offered because Viv didn't trust him.

Adra

I can't really bring myself to blame her. We pretty much got confirmation in this chapter that Pilgrim has maxed out ranks on Sense Motive and a WIS-based class.

Also, if I read that right, his Forgive aspect can do the true resurrection that Masego was talking about a few chapters back.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Grey Pilgrim is true min-max here, although like Black we still haven't seen what his trade-offs are.

James, Mostly Harmless

One of Pilgrim's "blindnesses" is he is so focused on fighting the EVUL gods that oppose his GUD gods that he cannot see the evil that his side commits. If Procer conquers Callow, it could quite possibly be worse for Callow than when Praes conquered them.

mavant

That's not really a weakness in the munchkinry sense, so much as a personal weakness. The Black Knight trades reduced personal power for aspects that are useful in leading an army. The Pilgrim has extraordinary personal power both in direct combat (super lasers???) and in healing (one resurrection per day, even of someone who died a day or two prior?) and in diplomacy (Sense Motive maxed, as observed elsewhere). So what's his dump stat? Or is he too pure for tragic flaws?

Ex

As a Wise Old Man, Pilgrim doesn't necessarily have flaws or a dump stat. His actual tradeoff is that he has to die shortly after appearing on screen in order to further the story. Overpowered mentors exist for that purpose.

TeK

Thinking RPG-esque here, but he seems pretty well rounded on pretty every stat. So his dump stat might be luck, or it's being NPC, who can't act outside of scripted actions.

grzecho2222

He seems to lack anti-mob attacks, he deflecks, parries and has attack against single person but it seems like he has nothing against bunch of normal mortals

Warriormonk

It is possible that he doesn't have any tragic flaws. It's not like all Names have access to the same amount of power, or must give up equally as much as they gain. Black Knight vs White Knight would be a fairer comparison to make, as opposed to the Black Knight vs Grey Pilgrim.

If you think the Grey Pilgrim is OP, think about the Dead King.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I think that confirms he's a bit of a LOLHAKZ!!! sort.

Raved Thrad

Does Catherine still have Take? If so, wouldn't it be fitting revenge for her to Take that away from Pilgrim? "I'm going to raise each and every one of my people you killed here. And then I'm going to make all your dead Rise. And then I'm going to show you what happens to people who invade my kingdom."

RanVor

Unfortunately, she doesn't have aspects anymore.

Raved Thrad

Sigh. Well, at least we can still look forward to the second part. A swarm of thousands of undead! Procer faces a zombie apocalypse! 😊

darkening

Maybe she can make an artifact out of him to do it though. that's the power that replaced take after all.

Metrux

That's not really a new power, and neither a replacement. She has replaced no aspect, because she is still transitioning into a new Name. This is just the result of her studies with Masego, learning to harness her Mantle as fae. Otherwise, yes, she can probably make some temporary artifact out of him, since all her artifacts made this way are temporary and limited, while still been usefull.

Morgenstern

Nah, "Take" was replaced by the Hunger of Winter. Winter devours (aka takes) everything. It just devours a bit more than Take ever did... including Cat's Name. Oops. But hey, she has Fae powers now, instead, that she only BARELY learned to control/exploit yet, so what the heck. She's way more powerful now. She just needs to be wary of the restrictions/pitfalls coming with being fae and allowing Winter too much reign, that's the trade-off, not losing less powerful aspects... She has everything she had before, including the self-healing, and MORE...

Jonnnney

Her entire training in diplomacy was running a shell game for 3 whole days. I sure as hell can fucking blame her for being too arrogant to even ask the opinion of a single living soul before trying to outwit a hero with 60 years of experience.

MetruX

I don't disagree she did wrong, but you're not seeing the whole picture. She WAS trained in diplomacy by the other thieves in the guild, she just noted that she learned more in those 3 days than all the years of training.

Lance

Would not be surprised if cat is part of the five

Yotz

Cat and Masego, I'd wager – they need a practitioner. Although a negligent possibility, it would be so glorious to see the Hierarch being the Fifth instead of the Bard.

Raved Thrad

I can just see the Hierarch quoting the laws of Glorious Bellerophon at their enemies, and Cat facestabbing them as they mill around in confusion.

Blue

Nope Catherine, The Dead King, and Triumphant , when she returns, will form their own party, and take apart the gods above and below because the gods are the real evil. Think Zion in Worm. All those granted powers but why??

anigaming

A part of me really wants the emotionless prince to be Assassin. Also, given how much the old heroes think the worst is yet to come, I'm betting either Masego or Cat come out of their stupor with something nasty. I'm curious what it will be though.

forsheen

I think they know that "Dread Empress Triumphant may she never return" is coming back from hell.

Misterspokes

The emotionless Prince is the Saint of Swords.

Looking Glass

No, the emotionless prince is a man, Prince Arnaud of Cantal. The Saint of Swords is a woman named Laurence.

Stormblessed

Tariq is kind and it makes him all the more dangerous.

WuseMajor

Iirc, the Choir of Compassion is supposed to be the highest of the heavens and the most powerful.

ayon96

Vote for the book

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Lucas

Great chapter.

I like how the heroes can see that Cat doesn't have the usual villain story of obtaining power for power.

ftaku

"ShE KiLLEd ThouSaNDS" well duh it is war and she had to. Wonder how many the Saint of Swords has killed, it is probably more

danh3107

bUt NOt aLL At OnCe seems to be the main thing they're freaking out about

The Chosen One

Yeah, but if you think about it, walking onto the battlefield and drowning thousands of soldiers one at a time, with a bucket, might actually be more disturbing.

vuthuha912

Yeah, It is not that awful. If you think about it, Napoleon shoots at the ice to drown his enemy to achieve the same thing. Also, most naval battles can result in the same kind of casualty.

werafdsaew

> She may rise...she may return to offer salvation at the darkest hour.

Waking up in the nick of time with a powerup confirmed!

> She'll be there too

Ranger?

danh3107

Bard mate, they mention the brewery smell.

oldschoolvillain

Nope. Someone that the Heroes have worked with in the past. Someone who has always fought hard – possibly harder than anyone else – to preserve the cause of Good. Some of the readers hate her, but she is, always has been, and always will be a Hero.

The Wandering Bard.

oldschoolvillain

I love the acknowledgement that the two Heroes give, and the mentions of the behind the scenes machinations that the Pilgrim has set in motion. All this time he's come across as a genuine All Loving Hero rather than a murderous Leroy Jenkins granted heavenly power. But all this time he's been working the Princes like Malicia or Cordelia. He's starting to show his dastardly side, and once a Hero gives a hint of that, they get a death flag with Catherine's name all over it. This, I think, was alluded to here – Saint said she could feel the pull towards her part in the final Five Man Band, but the Pilgrim made no such statement. I wonder – if the choice was between killing Catherine, or saving her so that she could take his place as a Hero in that group, which would he choose?

That said – something BAD is coming, and coming fast. Dead King? Maybe. Probably. He's been theorized to be the counterweight to the Wandering Bard, and according to the Heroes who appear to have worked with her before, she only shows up when the worst is about to occur. She might be down in the Red Flower Vales, fighting Black, but I doubt it. Showing up to the party to face off with her supposed Counterpart? That smells like a Big Damn Heroes moment, and Tropes are where she lives.

Mr. Nobody

I've been saying this for a while now, but I'll say it again: Maybe the "Five-band man" pull she's feeling is because she WILL be part of one, though her role in the team is going to be "The Sword of Woe".(As an Artifact of Catherine)

Really, I just can't help but see Saint's confidence as a large death flag written "Aspect reserved for Catherine Foundling and waiting to be weaponized".

RanVor

Gods Above hate Catherine because her very existence defies them, and they're sore losers. They just can't stand not being in the right for once.

Trikki

Oh man, I haven't even thought about that yet, but . . . it would be SO awesome if Catherine received a "neutral" Name and became part of that Five Man Band of the Heroes, fighting Triumphant / the Dead King / whatever doom approaches. The interactions between the members of the group would be hilarious.

RanVor

Cat already is a part of a Five-Man Band. And I don't think it's possible, there's way too much bad blood between her and the Heroes to just forget everything that happened. Not to mention the Heavens would never allow their lackeys to team up with Cat.

John Laing

She's already got a title of fae nobility, which seems to be the closest thing to a "neutral Name" the setting's metaphysics can readily support.

blarg

Fae titles are divided by court. Her court, Winter, is the Arcadian equivalent to villainy, whereas Summer is the Arcadian equivalent to heroism. (Presumably the other two courts, of spring and autumn, have a similar dynamic.) She's not neutral in her power alignment, she's just the over-the-top fairy version of Evil instead of the regular mortal version.

Metrux

You readily forgot Ranger and some of her trainees. THEY are the neutral Names, although some of the trainees are either Heroes or Villains.

Taichi22

The way I'm seeing this going in my head is Cat somehow shutting down both of the 5-man bands from the Gods Above and Below, either by brokering a peace or breaking their stories and killing them.

Yotz

The Dead King starts the overwhelming invasion, throwing at opposition everything up to and including the mystical Teapot of Russ el Jameson.

Plot twist: the Dead Kingdom inhabitants are actually refugees – something (may it never return) is chasing them from their ancestral lands and Hells...

Raved Thrad

That brings up an interesting point: for all their posturing now, why haven't the heroes ever done anything to try and unseat the Dead King? I don't see why they're so insistent that Catherine is a boil on the face of creation that needs to be lanced, when there's a sorcerer king with a kingdom of undead and a permanent gate to the hells at his command.

wyaldriddler

At least four Crusades were launched at Keter. They all failed totally and made the Dead King stronger. This was actually discussed some time in Book 2 I believe.

Unorginal

More than that even, hell one was eaten by a demon of absence and in story no one seems to remember it despite the naming schema missing one number. (I could be wrong about the demon though. if for so and so reason it's just simply taboo to bring it up or that is was so minor it wasn't worth mentioning.)

TeK

Because since Terribilis II broke down Second and Third Crusade, every other one WAS about Dead King. They spent countless thousands of lives, without ever even breaching walls of Keter. Since Dead King is dormant for know, better deal with the threat, you can realistically deal with.

Trebar

Also, necromancer. Each of those failed crusades got raised to increase the size of the Dead King's army. It's probably where he got many of those undead Heroes.

Nethermore

The Dead King as a counterweight to the Wandering Bard seemed unfair to me considering how Bard flits about and stacks the deck all over the globe apparently while the Dead King is just sitting on his ass, but when you consider that he's probably the only Named in his kingdom and repelled several crusades that totalled possibly scores of heroes by himself, things start to look more balanced.

Still doesn't keep the Bard from being insufferable, though.

Morgenstern

I rather think we're still seeing the effect(s) of Hierarch shutting down the Wandering Bard that the two old legendary heroes are wondering about here, as they do not yet know about it. Keep in mind that all this stuff is not all that far away in time, but rather in distance.

oldschoolvillain

Oh, and also, Catherine is going to be PISSED when she meets Hammer-Boy again. Freaking bullshit hero Raise Dead powers.

Mr. Nobody

She's lucky it was just the Hammer hero. The girl with the staff took more effort to put down 😊

daegone823

Hammer boy rises again, thank you author for this sweet wish. i know you did not do it for me but it brings me joy to see that hammer boy will become something more than a throw away. I can see him facing Hakram in a hammer vs axe fight. One on one brawl.

grzecho2222

"Are you the god of hammers?"

Yotz

Oh, don't you worry – she will be back tomorrow, when 'once-per-day' inbuilt codex limitations on use of bullshit Aspects wears off.

morrogin

but then they have to resurrect the rest of the heroes that cat & co slaughter upon waking up

Warriormonk

The most frustrating thing is that Cat could be reviving her own people or Heroes she kills, as undead.

I wonder if she has experimented at all with this power, because when she was fighting through Diabolist's castle, she had a whole posse of intelligent undead mages that she'd raised.

Unorginal

That's a dangerous story to walk down. As long as she doesn't acknowledge that part of her power then the story won't turn against her but if she does then she becomes in part evil-overlady #1001. Not only that but she still finds the idea morally wrong (on some level) as per her upbringing as a Callowan.

Captain Semantics

My theory is that at least some of the heroes she's been killing off asbthey enter Callow (like in the prologue) got raised afterwards.

Antoninjohn

The Gods Above are really against Cat here not as much as they will later however when she realizes that the only way to have lasting peace is to take over all of Caleria and form it into the Imperium. To keep it steady and not have the Gods Above ruin it with rebellions she will perform a mighty ritual that will ensure her power over the land, however when the heroes break it the ritual meant to ward against Dread Empress Triumphant will instead allow her return, then Cat will unite the people against Triumphant and use propaganda of the returning Triumphant in order to try and stop the peace to discredit them. Remember the Bard talks about how the Gods Above support demon summoning Named over Cat, so the heroes will be supportive of Triumphant, if the people will have a choice Triumphant who will make you crucify your parents or Cat who won't

TeK

And the headdannons run free and amok.

Walter

Who on earth gave Saint a mocking name? How could they possibly have expected to survive such foolishness.

DroughtBringer

I saw that as backstory.

She was a young girl desperately wanting to go to war with her older brothers, and made fun of for it. Until she came into her Name. After that Saint left and returned to find her town a ruin.

She was defeated and spent her time wondering her place in the world, spending every waking moment with her sword in her hand, becoming better until there was no one else that would match her skill. While training she came to inner peace and “scraped the heavens” granting her power she wields now.

They died not because Saint killed them, but because she wasn’t there to save them.

The Quietist

“no one still alive” I’d guess the Dead King.

Yotz

>How could they survive?

By being obnoxiously powerful?

If one can neutralize the Saint with a trivial effort, one can give her pet name of “the little bitch” and get away with it.

The Dead King counts, being very much not alive, and a powerhouse on mythical scale.

grzecho2222

Goblins use names with “-”, or worse it could be gnomes

Nguyen Hong Hai

So waiting for Saint trash-talking the Bard for all the antics she caused. Also erratica has a taste and it is scary lady wielding swords.

DroughtBringer

Great chapter! One of my favorites thus far!

Anon

First off...this kinda feels like it could have been a continuation of the previous chapter – the ‘pause’ in release makes sense given that there’s a time skip of a few hours, but that being said, it does feel a bit ‘blue-ball-y’.

Aside from that...Arnaud merely playing the blathering fool all too well, or is the Absence Demon contamination having spread somehow?

The Saint's comment about Catherine's being 'twisted' is kind of amusing, to be honest – yes, Black and Malicia played large roles, but at the same time, if Cat really was a fulcrum, that's equally, if not more so, on Creation's head. I suppose the pilgrim could be going under the assumption that Cat's first death, when she used the angel to resurrect with the Lone Swordsman, is the glimpse of heaven she's searching for now....

I was hoping we'd get a little more 'heroic' insight on Thief's swapping sides – her betraying sides to join up with Cat is something that I can't imagine happens all THAT often, given the lines that get drawn, and how easy it would otherwise be for villains to corrupt heroic names. Add that to the fact that 'thief' isn't generally a country-associated role....

Interesting comment made by the Pilgrim in that none of the Procerans are truly 'good', compared to himself or Laurence. Even Melanza is noted to be decidedly lacking in true goodness.

Also, I'm a little confused...if the plan was to lure the kids out to get Cat killed early...why didn't the Sword Saint interfere during the fight? The pilgrim intervened instead, when the Saint had already been shown to be able to smack Cat around.

But in any event, the question is...how much of a powerup could Cat possibly get from her previous actions? The souls of all the men she drowned with Winter's lake could make up a suitable source, but that would risk 'committing' her to a much more villainous path if she starts using souls as a power up.

Metalshop

The only power up she needs is inside her already, no extra action required. Masego said it himself, godhood is a trick of perspective. And Cat is now submerged in a dream so fierce it's warping her body, the first she's had since becoming what she is now.

Dollars to donuts she wakes up mean, with some new Winter trick.

Raved Thrad

You know, that just might be it. It's possible that the reason the two old heroes were pulled into this conflict is that Catherine is on the cusp of godhood – not necessarily Godhood, but the fae royals might as well have been gods. Right now, her body is fluid; if her body is a construct, it begs the question, who created the construct? Is it short because that's how Catherine sees herself? What is the template that it re-moulds itself from when it is damaged?

It's possible that the shape of her body, construct or otherwise (deified? apotheosized?), as well as her powers, will all depend on the dream she's in, and how that shapes or reshapes her mind and self.

Walter

Cat enslaves and slaughters wholesale. Her path can't exactly get 'more villainous'.

Raved Thrad

Slaughters, yes, but at what point has Catherine enslaved anybody? I'm pretty sure Hakram would have had strong words for her if she ever had.

Walter

Akua is the obvious one, but the Gallowsborne were slave soldiers, etc. Masego's henchmen at the observatory was one of Akua's too, right? "Serve or die".

Raved Thrad

Hnh. Well, when you're right, you're right. I have no idea why that didn't even register with me as slavery. I'm inclined to think it was the "...or die" part, but that makes no sense. I guess my sympathy for the characters (or a particular set of characters) is showing.

Walter

Yeah, I didn't start thinking about 'Cat from outside view' until Pilgrim showed up. If you don't know what we know about her she looks positively monstrous.

grzecho2222

Gallowborne are penal company and henchwoman was war criminal that agreed to basically the same. There is a really big difference between this and slavery

Mr. Nobody

Then you're saying neither the Romans nor Egyptians never enslaved anyone, because forced labour with captives isn't slavery, right?

MetruX

They aren't captives, they are people sentenced to death that she choose to extend life in exchange for work. Besides, while people are saing "she couldn't be more villainous", you must remember this ploy was first used by a ver famous HEROINE of Callow. Although things seem good and evil, they are Good and Evil, and every three episodes I have to remind people those are not the same. Also, Akua? She deserves this, and she isn't obliged to serve or even compelled to, she choose this after defeat, while all Cat does is keep her soul confined, with the bonus of being able to partly release a spiritual form of her. Honestly, pretty close to actual prison in our world.

vuthuha912

Yes, yes, move on, please. This is the medieval period. Cat is saving their lives. Their original sentence was execution but Cat doesn't want to kill her own countrymen so she sorts of makes a deal with them. The same thing with the Praesi that join Akua – she doesn't want to slaughter them all while her country still need the manpower

Sortale

Typo post:

"role she'd had free hand" *a* free hand?

"still largely from from the three" one less "from"?

"If you will not treat in good will" goodwill no space?

"it should garner reaction" *a* reaction?

"register as lie" as lying? as a lie?

"Then I would request audience" *an*audience?

"morals by her uprising" upbringing?

"instilled her *with* a sense" not sure if "with" is correct

"we may yet serve greater purpose" *a* greater purpose"

"Imperfection was not sin" *a* sin?

"The princess sought alliance with" *an* alliance? to ally?

"Creation and faded and brutish" "a" instead of "and"?

"remain under shroud of preservation" *a* shroud?

"there was reason for it" *a* reason? reasons?

Muspellsheimr

Strongly implied that Catherine will wake up before the battle is over.

Regardless of when she wakes up, I speculate the nature of her catatonia will finally grant her a new Name when she does arise. I do not believe she is capable of a heroic Name, but neither do I expect ot to be a villainous Name. I am reasonably confident it will be something new entirely.

Rook

I feel like the biggest bomb under the Crusade's feet is the exact story of five that usually comes to pass. Yes the shape of it's there, and yes the pattern is a damn strong one, but it's a very rigid one.

As the Warlock demonstrated against the Wizard of the West in the past and as the Pilgrim himself demonstrated against Cat just recently, a rigid force is terrifyingly strong but the backlash from the breaking of it is beyond terrible.

At the end of the day the problem for the Crusade is that Cat is using a Villain's methods while following a Hero's story. She's literally fighting for peace and to protect her loved ones. The Pilgrim admitted it as much himself.

If that ends up being enough to break the standard story of five, it won't matter if Cat turns into a monster. The feedback from the narrative alone is going to ruin the Crusade and everyone affiliated with it.

shieldredblog

Ya, i;m surprised that haven't stopped with the whole crusade idea already because the narrative for them is already failure. Of ten Crusades maybe two sorta worked? The rest all seemed to have failed hard.

RoflCat

Random thought: What if Cat woke up and made similar declaration she did in the Prologue? Sixth time's the charm yes?

With such declaration that she's willing to help them do their Crusade, then if they attack her then they'll basically be revealing their 'real' objectives.

Heck, she can even promise the Pilgrim similar expectation she had for Black to Praes with herself to Callow. A decade or so, to make Callow strong enough that it's not the piss bowl when Good and Evil have a pissing match, even under heroic surveillance (GUESS WHO'S GETTING NOMINATED!?)

A...less likely possibility, is Cat forming her own the Five, but not under the Above, nor Below, but of Creation's.

See, I get a feeling that Creation itself might have its own ideas, one that isn't align with Above or Below.

Like, say, it'd prefer this whole stupid Good vs Evil war over with, and guess who's the girl trying to break that story?

Yotz

Let's see – Cat is a given; Masego cares not for Good nor Evil, he just wants to decompile everything and tinker with a source code; the Archer is here for shits, giggles, and Masego's tight bollocks – Above and Below for her are just a positions during the intercourse; Vivienne is the Hero who fights other Heroes, and is in willing thrall of a Villain who plays role of the Hero – that, and the Thief being not very heroic Name to begin with, coming more from the dull everyday as opposed to the Ideals; Hakram is a Survivalist turned Bureaucrat – an a very fine one – all while retaining all the characteristic brutality of the former, he exists on the morality scale only partially compatible with Good/Evil dichotomy...

Less likely, you say?..

Raved Thrad

"And that's not a villain's story, Tariq," the woman grunted.

It's possible that the reason Catherine has yet to succeed to a new Name is precisely that. She's a villain whose story is not that of a villain. Can it be that neither the gods above nor those below can see themselves giving her a Name, because they can't figure out which side she's on?

As for the institutionalized blindness of the "good" side, I think I get it now: it's when the Pilgrim tells Thief that she used to be a heroine. For him, there is only (nominally) good and (supposedly) evil. She is an enemy because she refuses to join in the march on Callow, never mind that she herself is Callowan. On Thief's side of it, however, she is a heroine. She is fighting for her people, her land, and those willing to do the same.

The conflict between the two sides becomes a matter of arbitrary sides vs that of methods. The gooders think (or maybe have confirmation, who knows?) that they're on the side of the heavens, so anyone who gets in their way, be they villain or soldier or peasant, is on the side of wrong and must die, if that's what it takes. On the side of "evil" we have people who use decidedly villainous methods to do good. It's the only reason that makes sense when the gooders keep complaining about how Catherine killed thousands. "Oh, we killed three thousand of them, it was a good thing. But she killed so many thousands of ours, what a horrible thing to do!" They cannot see that loss of life is loss of life, no matter the method or number: for them the only life with value, and thus counted as a loss of life when killed, are those on their side. On the other? Those are just casualties inflicted on the enemy. Not actual loss of life.

If some little girl were helping a Legionnaire to his feet and a crusader bowman shot her dead, they'd count that as a casualty inflicted on enemy supporters, and thus the enemy.

This is the most immoral interpretation of "good" I've ever seen. This makes the Kingpriest of Istar seem like a whiny little boy. And it just makes me root all the harder for Team Evil. Or maybe just Team Cat. My black heart trembles in awe at the merest thought of Malicia and what she can do, but shit, I wouldn't want to be anywhere near her.

On a tangent, I would like to see Ranger come and duke it out with the Saint of Swords. Heck, she could even die and the Saint live – that would just turn up the dramatic tension even higher. I just think it would be interesting to see who's really the meanest sword-wielding bitch in the land.

TeK

As per Godwin's law, I have to ask you to compare Praes to Axis, Crusade to Allies, and repeat your whining about "life for life" without batting an eye. It doesn't matter whether comparison holds. The loss of life is a loss of life, and you should feel bad about the tragic fate Hitler. Where's your heart, people?

Raved Thrad

Whining, is it? I'll remind you that Hitler was actively moving against the rest of the world. Callow, on the other hand, just wanted to be left alone. It's one thing to be exporting war to the rest of the world, it's entirely another to be sitting at home, looking at an invading force wanting to divvy up your land "for the greater good" when all you want is to get on with your life. Your whataboutism citing Godwin's Law would only work if Hitler had been peaceably sitting at home, ramping up his forces, and doing nothing untoward when the Allies invaded. Or maybe you think Cat's refusing to die and killing all the assassins they sent against her is an acceptable pretext for war? "We came here to invade your land, kill you, dispossess your people, and divvy up your kingdom. How dare you refuse to die and kill so many of our people?!? You must be a villain!"

TeK

WW2 metaphor is more apt than you may think. Cat's no Hitler, Malicia is. Procers plan to divide Callow between them is no different than Allies dividing Europe between US and USSR. Reichs armies consisted of conquered nations as well, even if Hitlers warlord ruling conquered country is not exactly as bad as Hitler, it does not make him good, or, ya know, exempt from the whole killing thing. Crusade is much more a prefentive strike, at least in respect to Callow, especially in the world where having Villain ruling a country corrupts said country. Some people of "liberated" countries actually fought the Allies. Now that I think about, Callow really reminds me of Poland. Abandoned in the wake of Hitler's conquests, help denied, later invaded and partitioned by a mighty neighbor (Procer). Good Lord!

Admittedly, it's more of a joke that got a little out of hand, so how about I apologise for my uncouthness and we leave it at that?

Raved Thrad

Accepted. Your graciousness in offering apology is rare these days, especially on the 'net, and I honor you for it. I'll admit you got my dander up with that quip about whining. I guess it just shows how passionate we are about this story.

RanVor

I'm sorry to revive this conversation, but I feel compelled to point out that Malicia didn't want this war to happen either. The crusade is a preemptive strike against a blow that wasn't even intended to land. The comparison between Callow and Poland is more than apt, though.

TeK

Well someone's out to be the Hitler. And exactly against what preemptive strike that is Crusade is launched is told by Grey, I think. With Callow being lead by Villain, it's evil, with such a major bullwark turning coat, Procer is weakened, and when Procer loses, everyone loses. Continuing the metaphor, presume that Hitler was a tad more realistic, and understood that he can't win the wars to follow, so he stopped at his conquest of Poland, and solidified his positions. While Allies got their shit together and finally launched preemptive strike. Unfortunately, pissed off Polish people are angry at them for betrayal, so they actually resist the Allies.

Yotz

You need not to involve theoretical possibilities with Poland – during Warsaw Uprising Armia Krajowa threatened to kill any Soviet who they see in the city. That is, until the thing went south for them. Then they begged for assistance. While implying that Soviets must help them, die for them, then skeedaddle away as soon as possible, because noble Poles will not tolerate godless commies in the borders of their glorious land. Said borders including two thirds of the Ukraine on the eastern side, half of the Baltic states, a chunk of Czechoslovakia, contested city of Danzig...

Not like this attitude was something new for them – guess what led Catherine the Second to make a toilet seat out the throne of the Polish kings?..

TeK

I did not glorify anyone. I'm very much aware of what Polish-Russian relationship were like. Unfortunately, I'm also Russian, and that makes my perspective tainted, so I try my hardest not to make any definitive statements, or, at all.

grzecho2222

I'm Polish and I as much as I think that are a lot of similarities between Callow and Poland, this looks less like WWII and more like WWI if it happened way earlier, during Bismarck. More shady politics and way less killing civilians.

Yotz

I concur. Though, Callow being a protagonist nation with a salad of different characteristics, I think many of Russian readers would see Callow as primarily Russia-inspired. More specifically – Kievan Rus. The Story truly is a universal constant where humans involved, I suppose.

But yeah – for all the good democratically elected mr. Schicklgruber had made (and he actually managed to do some), significant part of his philosophy, actions, and goals are seen today as outright Evil, which makes for an easy excuse to colour sides of WW2 with clean primaries. The Great War was, in contrast, an ungodly mess of everything and everyone. I dimly remember reading somewhere pilots actually keeping to idealistic knightly Code of Honor, behaving like ideal gentlemen of the Round Table, all while the Trenches were slowly rotting below, and generals actually being honestly horrified by the consequences of Ypres – and then proceeding to order even more of the same. A War of Arseholes it was, truly.

If it to happen earlier – in Bismarck's age – well, given that herr Otto was a very special character, who was noted for being brutally honest and machiavellian... It honestly seems to me, that he'd try to resolve the conflict entirely through shady politics, actual shooting being a waste of resources, and all that.

TeK

I mostly used WW2, because it's pretty much the only war where bad guys and good guys are universally agreed, and yet both sides are not so clearly monochromatic in the slightest. I can't see how it's more like a WW1. Who's Franz Ferdinand in your metaphor? Aqua?

@Yotz

Callow and Kievan Rus couldn't've been less alike. Where did you see similarities?

grzecho2222

Russia and Prussia were both trying to buy support of Polish people, while fighting in Poland. All of it while Piłsudski (who has a lot of similarities to Cat, who is more brutal and more positivistic female version of him) was playing everyone including Japan to reestablish Poland as independent country in the best position he could. Assassination was just the catalyst for decades of political stress and it seems like we will see some rebellions before Crusade will end

TeK

Oops, thank you so much for filling this blindspot in my historical knowledge.

Yotz

@TeK

Land that stands between the enlightened Europe and authoritarian Horde, formally belonging to former but never fully accepted, divided in several nearly independent princedoms under the formal rule of the Great Prince; self-actualization as a 'Shield' between Europe and the Horde; The Yoke; trade route from Varangians on the North to the coalition of free cities of the South...

Don't know, some vague impression, probably nothing...

werafdsaew

To continue with the analogy, the dictator who's in charge of Poland agrees to step down and hold free elections, and allow the allies unimpeded passage to Nazi Germany. Her only condition was that Poland remains a free and independent country. The allies refused, however, because America was controlled by evil corporations who wants to divide Poland up for their oil.

grzecho2222

Piłsudski proposed to help White Guard (followers of Tsar) destroy Lenin and his Red Army, if they will agree that Poland is independent nation. They refused and told him that if he helps they will oppress Poland little less. He disagreed and in the end Lenin crushed White Guard

oldschoolvillain

Even if Malicia didn't want to use it, eventually she is going to get the knife and her successor will be one of the batshit insane villains who wants to be the next coming of Triumphant, and they WILL use it. That is, ultimately, Praes' story even more than its invading of Callow. No amount of politicking and poison will save Malicia from that fate – especially since Catherine resolved to take her down in order to make the Liesse Accords work. Whatever they happen to be.

RanVor

That's very likely. Unfortunately (or maybe fortunately) punishing people for things their successors may or may not do in the future is not an acceptable behavior in most civilizations. Procer is apparently an exception.

hoyboy

It's not about punishment, it's about taking a weapon of mass death and destruction away from the hands of an unstable society that will inevitably give rise to a leader willing to use it.

So they don't, y'know, kill millions and millions of people, petty things like that. How dare those asshole heroes get in the way of a villain's gods given right to genocide?

RanVor

If you didn't notice, this weapon doesn't exist anymore. Furthermore, the people dying in this war against nonexistent threat are the very same people who were sacrificed to allow its creation in the first place.

Also, by your logic, we should invade Russia because it's a nation known for spawning warmongering dictators and there's a shitload of nuclear weapons stored in there.

hoyboy

It doesn't matter, Praes has shown the capacity and willingness to combine their newfound efficacy and capacity to create super weapons in such a way that they're more of a threat than they've ever been before. Then add on the fact that Praes has other mass destruction capabilities by way of Warlock and you see how the rest of Calernia has every good reason to smash Praes into dust.

And yes, it would probably be a good idea to prevent a country like Russia from getting those kinds of weapons, if not for the fact that they already have them making removing them impossible. Despite my disagreements with US foreign policy, I do not think that nuclear weapons is something that we should just shrug and let countries pursue.

TeK

Praes had WMDs for a really long ammount of time. Malicia said so herself – she had five or six weapons of the same calibre as Liesse, at least two of which are leftovers of other Emperors. At it's core, WMD in-verse require ungodly amount of resources (which Praes has), a wealth of magical knowledge (onto which Praes has sort of monopoly amongst humans), and centralised goverment capable of combining the two. The possibility to create one was always there, and unless crusaders will butcher every living soul east of Hwaerte, it will stay that way. This Crusade is nothing more than poorly planed reactionism, that lashes out without any clear goal in mind, or, with goal, but said goal having absolutely nothing to do with their warcry.

The same with nuclear weapons. I personally think that nobody should have it, but the cat is out of the box, and creation of those is not really a big secret, which is punctuated by NK developing one for itself. If nobody will have it, everyone will try to make one, to fill created power vacuum. So someone should have a WMDs, if only to dissuade someone less stable of creating one. And there is no country with which I would've felt save wielding such power singlehandedly. While Russia is bad enough, but we all know the only country to ever use nuclear weapons in wartime, eh? Current situation is a best possible solution, believe it or not. Checks and balances, isn't it right?

MetruX

I actually see the US as worse than Russia for having nuclear weapons, they are the ones who actually used them, they are the ones who created wars for oil and, before that, joined a war simply because they couldn't sell more guns without joining. Honestly, if you look at it objectively, the only reason the ONU and all countries in it haven't done something about the US is because we became all dependent on them, and raising something against they risks the use of said mass destruction weapons. So, while it was righteous to fight against germany and russia, when it was to fight the United States they were simply too powerfull for a take down, and no one wants to be taken down together with them.

RanVor

Ok, this conversation strayed somewhat far from my intended point, which is as follows: suspicion is not a valid reason for an invasion. I brought up nuclear weapons as an analogy to illustrate the fault in hoyboy's logic (which they promptly ignored). I didn't actually intend to discuss real-world situation.

Silverking

I think the best way to describe it is "tribalism"; the worst guy on our team is inherently better than the best person on yours because "we're the good guys."

TeK

Okay. I have an interesting theory, and I like to dream:

What if Peregrine's play is to make Cat's a Hero? Or not his, but someones (WB, looking at you). Ok, so first of all, the Black Queen is not a Black Queen, and she barely if not at all qualifies as a Squire – so she has no Name. Second, it was omitted by Saint, that waking up in the last moment to save her people is not a Villanous gambit – so why should it be? She still has Light inside her, and if we believe Grey, resurrection leaves scar on soul, making person see Creation as faded and brutish place – and so she wants to make it better. Also I want to touch the Saints compassion towards Cat, I read people chastising her for hypocrisy – but I think that she and Pilgrim are seeing the makings of a great Hero inside Cat – yet one twisted and perverted against it's own nature, little girl turned into a greater evil she picked her knife fighting. She Who Fights The Monster at it's finest. After all, you always need to be polite to Abbys, and offer refreshments.

Next is the five finest of heaven sent against great Evil. We got to likely candidates (Dead King and Triumphant), and some much less likely. Theorised band is comprised of Hanno, Champion, Saint, Pilgrim, and possibly Witch. But nothing really stops Woe from becoming these five. Hear me out: we have no evidence that Hierophant is a Villanous name. We know for a fact that Thief is not automatically Villanous, and it'd been hinted that Archer is not in cahoots with Below as well. Adjutant is whatever Cat is, and so we come to fact, that Woe's alignment is almost wholeheartedly depends on Cat's one. So it's not out of question for them to turn into Heroes. It also may have been hinted that Thief does not shine as bright being a Villain, so there's that.

What I think is going to happen, is that Saint will die, but will sever Cat from her mantle, forcing her to come into a Name – a Heroic one. Since Callow is now led by Hero, Crusade loses any legitimacy (at least in respect to Callow) it had left, some completely unexpected shit happens – it always does – and focus shifts on Red Vales, where Black and his crew meet their end, but bite Creation in the arse one last time, killing Witch, Hanno and his crew. Black maybe is saved by someone, possibly Ranger, but perhaps losing his power/Name in process.

Shit goes down, and for the lack of better candidatures, Woe become the blade of Heavens, finally transcending all Calernian stories, where all races and nations and Calernia unite (with possible exemptions) against the final Big Bad.

RanVor

She already refused to take a Heroic name once.

Raved Thrad

Do you mean when the Hashmallim named her Queen of Callow?

RanVor

Yes, that one time she made it absolutely clear she has no intention of becoming a pawn of the Heavens.

Mr. Nobody

Yeah. Furthermore, as long as the name of this story is "Practical Guide to Evil" there probably will be no heroic Name for Catherine nor even an acknowledgement of Cat being some practical heroine misinterpreted by her enemies.

TeK

I will repeat the argument I made like a gazillion chapters ago: if you're playing the game so rigged, one side will always lose, and you are playing on that side, what is the most rational way to win?

grzecho2222

Cheat? Change game? While Callow is on the side of Good it is forced to play the Role of The Good Kingdom That Got Invaded, Oh So Sad, Where Our Heroes Can Fight Evil And Then Go Home, Black said it pattern of Callow is to be grasped and Cat wants to change this pattern into something else. Her becoming Hero would just make stronger.

TeK

Not really. While patterns are very strong inverse, they still have to be realistic, otherwise they will hurt the suspension of disbelief. Praes invaded as much because it's teh Evil Empire, as because it's starving. 20 years of conquest already established a pattern of cooperation and trade between two countries. Cat's becoming a Hero of Peace will only reinforce this new pattern. As for where to spend excessive manpower – there are so many ways to slaughter thousands of people that does not involve invading Callow. Invading Praes, for one.

I have a theory. Creation doesn't really need Good and Evil, it merely needs sides. So that there'll be conflict. It can be Good vs Evil, Capitalism vs Communism, Orange Shorts vs Blue Pants, Winter vs Summer, Ranger vs Everyone, you name it. Getting invaded is not an Only Good Story about Callow. For example, if Praes is Good, they wouldn't need to fight too, right? And they can make elves into enemies, or dwarfs, or Dead King, drow, mermaides, gnomes, the possibilities are nearly endless.

TeK

She refused it because:

a) Angels ask her to butcher her own people (Fifteenth)
b) She still thought that she can work something out with Praes

c) She had a Name, and a Villanous one at that

Now she lost all hope in treating with Praes, at least as long as Malicia's alive. She has no Name, and becoming a Hero will actually fix all her problems (well not all, but really a lot), like, for example, CRUSADE, constant Hero insurgencies, corruption of her own people. She was willing to murder, torture, for her people, she even mutilated her soul. Is switching coat really that big of a price to pay? I'll be not suprised if it's part of her ploy.

RanVor

Except being a Hero in this universe essentially means being a slave to the Heavens, i.e. the ones who wanted her to butcher her own people.

wyaldriiddler

Yeah TeK if Cat gets a Hero Name of any form it pisses *all over* the entire premise that Erratic is going for here. He's too good of a writer to shoot himself in the foot like that, especially since at that point, he'd just basically be riffing and doing a new take on the worst parts of Worm.

Additionally I point to the Dead King and the Yantei. "Villainy" doesn't always lose in Creation so your premise that one side always loses is cast iron false.

TeK

Not really a strong argument when you try to get into creators head. Let me clarify something for ya: I'm not saying ghis will happen, more that I would like that to happen. I'm a sucker for the happy ending. And I really liked in Worm when Skitter became hero.

But I do understand that my wish for everyone becomig friends and living happily ever after is not going to happen here. Just, what exactly stoping Cat from becoming hero? And why can't Hero become a Dread Emperor of Praes, infusing two countries into completely new one? Given the peculiar Emperors out there, I won't be surprised that for some time the title of Dread Emperor had been held by a royal chamberpot.

vuthuha912

I don't know. Didn't Black have a chance to be White Knight but choose Black Knight because he wants to change his country. If it is as simple as having a Hero become the leader then Black might have just become a Hero, purge the Stupid Evil, establish alliances with other Good countries to make sure that Good stayed on the throne of Praes then retire knowing his country won't be fucked by starvation with 2 new 'reliable' trading partner. Maybe, it is against the law for Hero to be a Dread Emperor or Empress. With the number of emperors and empresses killed by Heroes, you think that Praes should have a hero as emperors already. The court in Praes will shank them before the throne is warm. They shanked Maleficent, Terribilus, Sinistra, and any other blokes that dared to fix the problems. It might be a groove in Creation that Praes will fuck itself as much as it fuck with its enemies.

Remember the 2 c*nts of the Ruling Council that try a power grab in a middle of a rebellion – effectively ruining a chance for cooperation between the ruling power of Praes and Callow in the future. This is breaking the fishing rod for a small fish as far as I am concerned. It is too mind-blowingly stupid for anyone with an ounce of concern for long-term planning.

I remember reading somewhere that redemption arcs are more likely to end in the death of a villain than not. The Below might even encourage the death route of the redemption arc to stop their followers from deserting in mass. Honestly, Praes is stuck as an Evil entity thus all of their top position has to be an Evil Name.

It is not as simple as switching sides. The nobility of Praes can totally switch sides to Good to wait for a chance to shank their superiors. Yet, they didn't do it during the Crusade. In real life, many people totally converted to Catholicism to avoid prosecution and such. Renee of France did 'convert' on paper and continued to follow Calvinism in private. What exactly is stopping Praes from doing the same. Maybe, the Below is not happy with it and has a way of keeping all its subjects from trying to go.

MetruX

Okay, so: Practical Guide to Evil, a stor about a little girl, lost on the clutches of Evil, learning of the world until she becomes a true Hero. No, I don't see that coming. So yes, the Woes are whole behind Cat, no matter if Good or Evil, but the Woes are NOT the main point of her. The greater reason why she was still seen as Cat and not her Name is because she focus more on the common people than the Named, the way she sees the world, Named are fulcrums but only common people can generate true change. And since the Heavens themselves put people as dust in front of this strange Good "morality", she will not align with them. She only chose Evil because any other choice would leave worse results.

Think about hte beggining, it was never a villain with a heart of gold, or with a internal good side... She was always neutral. Black himself sayd she never had in her what it takes to be a Hero, because Hero is accepting, Villain is breaking, and she wants to change, which means break. Now, think of her soul interior, two clones, Evil and Good, but none trully her, while her own vision of her power is a beast, a violent, cruel and AMORAL creature, neither good nor evil.

So, really, maybe a Hero would make a good story, but not this one. She is bound to be Evil or neutral by the end, and my only regret will be if she doesn't break the Heavens and their rules before she dies.

Dany

I wouldn't take Black's observations too seriously. He's invested in Team Evil out of sheer pride and invested in manipulating Cat into being a Villain.

vuthuha912

Not sheer pride but more likely patriotism and loyalty to one's family. I have been saying this from the extra chapter with Hanno's mother. It is really hard for an Evil citizen to move to a Good nation and start a new life. Black can pass as a Callowan since he is white but not his friends – Alaya, Wekesa, and Sabah. His entire family is dead, he only has them left. If he abandoned them and just go for himself then he can totally get as much glory as a hero. Didn't Black become extremely weak because he acts so unlike a Black Knight? He might do a lot better in Good Country with a different role with his kind of mind and talent. He wouldn't have to kill heroes anymore – turning them into allies and friends. He might even be friends with Saint of Swords due to their shared hatred toward Stupid Evil. See how charming he can be with Cat, I have no doubt he can make friends quite well if he is on the side of Good. With the state of Praes politics, it would not be particularly hard to fuck them over slowly and steadily. They are as inept as they can get.

Sometimes, your birthplace really can decide who you can be. Staying when the situation goes to shit can be pretty hard. I'll never blame any refugee running away from a war-torn country or a dictator but I also know that there are people who willingly stay to help with the situation.

daegone823

So does this mean all the other heroes except for saint and maybe witch and hano have deathflags. Feel real sorry for them now.

oldschoolvillain

In theory, and based on Pilgrim's apathy on the subject, it could just mean that the other heroes get to go home before the Five do.

Raved Thrad

What? No! Blood for the Blood Queen! Skulls for the Skull Cloak! 😊

frolamiz

Correction: Souls for the Soul Cloak

Raved Thrad

Good one. 😊

oldschoolvillain

Oh, of course. Not a single hero beyond the Five is leaving Callow with their head on their shoulders and their soul in Heaven. This Crusade ends with Heroic heads on spikes and their Aspects carved out to make shiny new trinkets for Catherine to stock up for the next person foolish enough to take a swing at her. It was just a theory.

Eevin

"Compassion's not my wheelhouse, but whoever made her into what she is deserves a slow and painful death. She's been twisted." In the Red Flower Vales, Black senses the sudden impulse to be not-smug-at-all.

Raved Thrad

"All of a sudden, I felt like there was a blade at my neck, despite there clearly not being a blade. I got excited and looked about for Ranger, but she was not there."

Yotz

"By the way, please call the blacksmith – I need him to repair my armour. The codpiece deformed during that incident."

Raved Thrad

This might be TMI for some, but as I understand it, the codpieces on medieval armor had space for erections. Because apparently some people got hard while dealing gory death on the battlefield, and it's not always quick or easy to get out of a full suit of armor.

Unorginal

Cod-pieces were rare on armor though, they were an article brought over from civilian fashion and were rarely used because one: other (just as effective) alternatives for family jewel protection existed and two: it made sitting on a horse awkward as hell. So chances are good that the BK has no cod-piece.

Burnsy

These two are going to get the shock of their long lives when Cat turns out to be one of the five (possibly dragging Maesgo along with her, grumbling and moaning).

Also GP needs to be nerfed in the next edition. Too broken.

Raved Thrad

On second reading, one particular set of lines stands out for me:

> "She killed thousands," Laurence said. "And she'll kill more, if she squeaks away here.
> Compassion's not my wheelhouse, but whoever made her into what she is deserves a slow > and painful death. She's been twisted. No one sane would ever do what she did to her own > soul."

I couldn't help but think of Catherine, in the voice of a certain beloved psychopath, saying "We do what we must because we can. For the good of all of us, except the ones who are dead."

James, Mostly Harmless

What Saint and Pilgrim see as twisted Kat undoubtedly sees as acceptable sacrifices to protect her people. They cannot see that Cat does not follow the Gods Below but instead uses the tools and trappings they created for the good of her people. Frankly, this army reminds me of the Crusaders who sacked Byzantium because they were not the exact same faith as the Crusaders were.

Raved Thrad

Not just acceptable sacrifices, but acceptable tactics. We've already seen that Catherine is purposely limiting what she can do, because she's not after the deaths of the crusaders so much as she wants the best for her people. She's playing a longer game than the two old fogeys, who seem to see only as far as "subjugate Callow, destroy Praes, feel good about ourselves."

Should the Procerans manage to depose Catherine, the best they can hope for is for the rest of Callow to grudgingly obey their new overlords. I see that as unlikely to happen. First off, they'll be imposing non-Callowan rule on Callowans, which the Callowans will not stand for. Evil Catherine (or her methods) may be, but she's a Callowan evil. Local girl done good by doing bad. And since the Procerans will undoubtedly be press-ganging Callowans into their army, if only to replace those already killed or fled, the situation tips ever closer to ruin. I can see them facing a peasant rebellion, getting mired in a Callow they thoughtlessly thought they could just parcel out among them. Whether the people rally for Catherine or they fight sporadically, disorganized, as a local resistance, they'll still be chipping away at the Procerans' men and timetable. And with such a narrative ongoing, who's to say that a local hero might not, heaven forbid, rise up to rally the countryside against the invaders, heroes and all? The heroes might shrug at killing people in an army commanded by a villain, but what happens when they start having to murder freedom fighter guerillas who just want the invaders out of their country? What happens to the crusaders' narrative then?

Walter

Callow won't rebel in the name of Praes. They remember Diabolist. If Procer liberates them they will thank them kindly, find a Fairfax heir under a rock somewhere, and proclaim a new day begun.

Callow may not rebel in the name of ANYONE. They lost a lot of people in William's rebellion, then Akua's genocide and now their forces are fighting Procer. I don't think they have the manpower to do anything beyond the current forces backing Black Queen.

vuthuha912

Of course, they won't rise for Praes. Do you think the Vietnamese rose for Japan when they kick France out? We are perfectly capable of playing two sides, okay. Callowan will fight both Procer and Praes. Procer is 'liberating' Callow as much as Japan is liberating Vietnam from France. We are not letting a foreign snake bit our hens. The same thing can be said for Callow.

shieldredblog

All Villains just use the tools and trappings the God's below created.

Unlike Angels, Demons don't command or offer aid. They have no scripture or churches that we've seen and dealings/rituals with them seem transnational, not personal.

We really have no idea what it is the God's Below are actually trying to do, except oppose those above.

hoyboy

Considering that the common denominator among villains is killing, mass destruction, and causing suffering I think it might have something with killing, mass destruction and causing suffering.

grzecho2222

Common thing among villains is creating something stronger than themselves (purposefully or not) Below seem like mentors that harass their students until they grow strong enough to fight back and then they are all smug how "now your training is finished"

hoyboy

And then they've left the student as someone who will carry on the tradition of being a violent bullyboy with the excuse for making people stronger, so great job.

grzecho2222

Compared to teacher that is nice, but will teach you nothing and freak out when you don't agree with them? Both of them are terrible choices for teacher

hoyboy

But they are not equally terrible. One needs to go back to teachers college for remedial. The other needs to not be allowed anywhere near children and maybe should be in prison.

Unorginal

If you guys go check PGtE's Reddit page there is a whole thread dedicated to WOGs. Reading through it gives the sense that the Gods Above are about a stronger community together under the direction of heave (with additions of long-term GREATER GOOD planning.) Meanwhile, The Gods Below are about individualism mixed with cruelty and disregard for others.

(Mainly just plugging the Reddit page, seriously go there we always need more people.)

Yotz

If I dare to invoke the shadow of Babilon 5?
Think of the conflict between the Vorlons and the Shadows, the former being rigid idealists heavenbent on the Scripture of Greatest Good, and the latter – brutal social darwinists, spreading conflict and suffering to facilitate the survival of the fittest.

Above follows the maxim of “Right makes might”, and would be building a Divine Mechanism, where each small part is significant, but have not freedom of any kind save for the freedom to follow the Scripture. The amount of resources is limited, therefore each member of the community should limit him/herself in the consumption, for only together they will have enough power to gather enough resources for the community to continue to grow, and overall growth of the community is the only thing that will allow individual parts to grow. And any step from the clearly defined Path is treated like a disease – for it is cancerous in nature indeed – and will be cured with mandatory injection of the Greater Good. The only thing that keeps them from implementing that, is that humans are not ideal by the nature, being the mix of the two Primatii, and will always seek ways to improve their situation at the expense of someone whom they can find an excuse to treat this way.

Below follows the maxim of “Might makes right”, and would give everyone absolute freedom to jump-start the Grand Evolution. Let weak feed on weak, that we may divine the nature of strength, and all that jazz. Of course there would be bloodshed and oppression – the amount of resources is limited, to allow yourself to grow you’ll need them, and if you try to be nice and stuff, someone more fit will consume them, leaving you and the ones you shew mercy for on the side of the Path, or being trampled over by the ones who’ll not shy of the actions. You don’t want to cut throats and bully the weak to acquire resources? Boo-hoo, cry me a river! That’s an order, by the way – start crying, or I’ll make you. The only thing that keeps them from implementing that, is that if Atlas shrugs, the World will crush him, and everything would be better for that, full stop. That, and the little insignificant things like 'compassion' and 'empathy'. Heart is the most awesomest power, you know...

grzecho2222

That's why Hierarchs insane democracy and Cats positivism have surfaced, both Above and Bellow visions of how world should work clash horribly with free will and you can't change them.

Dany

I think it's interesting that people assume the Gods Above and the Gods Below are not on the same team re: whether the gods should direct humans.

This is a story about a world with cyclical, unbreakable, Good vs. Evil conflict, and Villains are as bound by their names as anyone else. The gods opposed to interference are presumably...not interfering.

vuthuha912

My question is can you find a solution to the problems that are plaguing Evil nation. 90% of criminals irl are pushed toward that road due to poverty, lack of opportunity, and various other factors outside their control. If I had money, I will be the nicest person in the world. If I were full, I would give my neighbor some food. The ruling class of Praes is hopelessly in love with Evil so there is no helping them. But, many people have been pushed down this path because of where they were born like Cat or Black or Terribilus I&II or Maleficent I&II or Orcs or Goblins. Maleficent I united her country to fight off magical Roman and she got a knife to her back for her troubles. Because of 1 person's actions – Sinister I stabbing his superior, the entire Empire turn into the Dread Empire, officially shutting off trades with the two biggest grain providers on the continent: Procer and Callow. You tell me how to unfuck this entire mess. It takes a lot of work to have peace on a continent as divided as Calernia. They are so divided that Evil and Good don't even see each other as human anymore. Good doesn't think Evil deserves the right to live while Evil lashes out at Good. Japan doesn't just become a US ally for the 2 A-bombs, they become allies because the US provides a way out for Japan: food, trade, and military support against China.

Hardric62

One resurrection by day, uh... The 'Gods' aren't even trying to make this look balanced (and I say 'Gods only, I've got the sneaking suspiscion the 'Good'/'Evil' pissing contest is the only difference between the two sides, if that's not just one running both sides for shit and giggles). And I find this funny they moan about a soul destroyed when the Pilgrim explicitly says that resurrection scars the soul... Or the fact the only difference between him and a necromancer is that the 'Gods' approve when he does it.

The more I see the 'Good' in this story, the more they look like the joyous and murderous followers of Law of Shin Megami Tensei. The angels certainly play the part, and the purging they do in the name of the 'Gods' is getting always bigger and bigger (the Law side is generally the one starting the genocides of the 'unclean' in SMT...)...

Not that 'Evil' is better, as we saw again and again in this series. And the cutthroat mentality for supreme power here mirrors SMT Chaos fine too...

Meaning there is only one thing left... Embrace Neutrality, and mankind first, and begin to punch expired godlings in the mouth until they give up their sick little games. The Bard will be a good start.

Go for it Foundling, break them! Although twisting the game to make all this nice and shiny crusaders the 'Evil' side would be a really good start.

Saragh

Is there any chance that, in the absence of any other fae type Cat absorbed both powers active on the field, the duchy of Moonless Nights and the Duchy of Noon Sun. What's happening could be the two powers warring inside her. Not sure what the implications would be.

Raved Thrad

As I remember it, Sulia of High Noon was freed of her bindings when the Summer Queen called all her fae back to her side for Cat's parlay.

Vhostym

People seem to keep commenting on the Pilgrim stealing Masego's sorcery, and using Summer power to attack the portal. But based on the phrasing in Pirouette where the Pilgrim creates his own star to split the power of the sun, it's much more likely that the Pilgrim has a star related aspect that he used. Especially since he seems to be modelled almost completely after Gandalf (one of the Istari).

So I'm pretty sure there's no unexpected summer influence on Cat's soul right now, though other influences can't be discounted. However, similarly to what we saw in Book 3 where Cat was displaying much less power than you'd expect from a Duchess of Winter, she's still not acting on the level of what we saw of the Queen of Summer. So there're probably some decent power grabs she could take if she's willing to shoulder the cost.

narcoduck

"I do not fear wicked men, who know only cruelty and pain. The fear they inflict leashes them as well. But a decent man? Oh, there is no limit to the devilry a decent man will fall to, if he believes it necessary."

—King Edward Alban III of Callow, best known for annexing the Kingdom of Liesse

What if instead of Summer's Sun like we all thought, he called upon the power of an angel to break Cat's portal. Thousands of crusaders were dying in moments, and thus he believed it necessary to break the agreement. That could be why he appears so weak now (breaking a deal with a Fae and the strain of calling upon the Heavens).

Nominally, King Alban's quote is for the breed of villains like Cat. Are we going to see what a Practical Hero looks like?

vuthuha912

Cordelia is practical Good. She is the mix of Malicia's political talents and Black patriotism and institutionalism. She is both of them before both falls to evil madness (Black for his arrogance and Malicia for her Flying Castle). Still, Cordelia is quite arrogant herself and if she can get a nuke, she won't hesitate so... maybe there is not much of a difference between Practical Good and Evil. They are fighting for each other and against Stupid Evil.

Polite Cultist

Er... I forget, is the Archer doing something? Like, has Cat sent her off to do her malevolent bidding?

Or is she capital A Absent?

Because uh... Demon running amok.

grzecho2222

And nobody realized that they are missing, unless they, this two Heroes and whoever else got missing are still fighting Demon.

Draeysine

"She killed thousands "

Bruh, so have you. Is it an efficiency issue? Should nobody be able to drop a bomb? I don't understand how blind people can be. What are they putting in that Good-Aid ?

Raved Thrad

You shall forevermore live in infamy for the term "Good Aid."

Author Unknown

So... What effect does a mile wide portal have on helleggs?

Forrest

I would point out that in the game of war they are playing, the crusade is playing as a finite player, while Cat is playing as an infinite player. Just another angle to look at this in.

letouriste

good try thief, at least now pilgrim know you have brandy. if that is not the setup of a pivot right there, i don't know what this is:)

Antony444

So the Procerans are going in for day 2 of battle. They are going to lead the charge with nine heroes (since one is awaiting resurrection and two are in reserve) and have lost one-fifth of their army.

Oh and the best part: they have to charge through a swamp land covered where the corpses of over nine thousand men and women are awaiting.

The enemy is fresh, massively outnumbered in Named and troops, they have proved they can't stand against the two big monsters, and two of the Woe are unaccounted for, their cause is righteous because they defend their lands against a rapacious enemy wanting to grab their kingdom for sheer cupidity and greed. The Saint of Swords and the Grey Pilgrim have proven they're more or less unbeatable with the 'help' provided by the Heavens. Even when a Hero is slain, he's going to be resurrected in the next minutes or days, making all sacrifices useless.

The Priests of Light are here to corral the Callowans, killing them in all but name and making a mockery of their vows.

Story-wise, I would not be anxious if I was in the Crusader army. I would be flat-out terrified.

Whatever happens now, the possibility of retreat on this terrain is very low. Mobility is going to be severely hampered. And if it fails and they retain a big part of their army? Massive starvation because Heaven or Hell, every army needs to eat and a big battle is devouring supplies at a horrifying speed...

This is all or nothing; we are certainly going to watch the Graveyard of Princes and Heroes in the next chapters...

grzecho2222

They are going around from two sides, also I'm not sure if you can resurrect away goblinfire, also this seems to be Battle of Camps

Walter

Jeez, if Cat and Masego don't wake up the Callowans are going to be absolutely massacred. Juniper has no answer to even the minor heroes, and Saint/Pilgrim will paint the land red with no Named to stand against them.

Maybe the speculation about the psychopath prince actually being Assassin here to cost the Crusaders the favor of the Heavens by sacking Hedges is correct? I dunno. It seems like the army is about to be obliterated. With no fair gates to escape they will be slaughtered to the man.

ayon96

Black knight, Warlock, Captain, Assassin, Scribe
Cat, Adjutant, Hierophant, Archer, Thief
Making of five
So five is the maximum size of a party for Nameds

Raved Thrad

That only holds true if Scribe only joined after Ranger left.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Juniper either fights at the barricades or leaves a rear guard and staged a fighting withdrawal.

The staggered withdrawal makes it hard when the starvation hits the attackers.

I'm really curious to see what she does.

I'd have decamped during the night.

Make them chase me and starve.

But then I'd have created a winter court to give me fae to balance against heros.

Anyway it should be interesting.

beleester

They have to defend Hedges, though, so they can't retreat very far. And IIRC Catherine didn't want to retreat all the way to Hedges because she wanted to minimize the damage the invaders would do as they traveled.

Stephen R. Marsh

I get that they have to defend Hedges to an extent, but the "good" side is down to two days of food and then starvation.

And the parties have agreed to avoid civilian pillaging and destruction.

Again, I don't know what Juniper would will do. But in this situation, in these facts, I would be staging a fighting withdrawal. A shadow rear-guard at the palisades to delay things. But the majority of the troops would have withdrawn in the night.

I would so dearly love the Wild Hunt to harry the back of the crusade (since the heroes will be at the front) – but that would have taken a liason that would work with them even after Cat went comatose. If I were the warlord/field marshal I'd have wanted that.

And, of course, the two missing named ....

So.

First, I don't know what the author will do. I expect surprises.

Second, I don't know what Juniper will do in the context. It doesn't appear that she is focused on using starvation and attrition as her major tools.

But, Third, I thought I'd just state what I would have done if I were commanding. I'll bet that Juniper does better than I would have.

Stephen R. Marsh

"Gods go with them, though hopefully not the ones Above. The kind if work I had in mind for these two would be frowned upon, upstairs."

Still looking forward to more. 😊

Nerfnow

Jacques Milenan, a younger cousin to the Prince of Iserre. His mother was... from an Alamans royal line, though she could not recall which one at the moment.

Demon strikes again, did it cross borders into porcer by the stairway?

NZPIEFACE

Forgive.
Resurrect.

Two of his Aspects...

wyaldriddler

Forgive is his Resurrect aspect.

Barthumphries

Lot of comments, don't know if anyone else has said it, but it seems confirmed that a person can have more than one Name. Still apparently only three Aspects, but I'm sure there's more than one advantage to having an additional Name.

wyaldriddler

What do you mean? The stuff with Grey Pilgrim and Saint? Those are epithets or titles, not Names.

Captain Semantics

Of course this is where I catch up to the story...

Shawn Panzegraf

Yanno,
I'm starting to feel like Good has entirely too many edges. The ONE material edge that Evil was supposed to have, not aging, ergo retaining their health and physical vigor...and the Saint gives the lie to it parkouring through the sky by cuts in Reality. If old Heroes fight like eighteen year olds, Evil doesn't get any advantage from being unaging, since they never live past their natural spans anyways.

An upcoming resurrection two days after death. Another done despite the damage being done in a no-Light zone. There really, REALLY doesn't feel like there's anything Equal And Opposite in Good and Evil. In fact, I can't even imagine how things like Praes and the Keter ever manage to originate in the first place. In every single potential aspect of conflict, Good is not only superior, but flatly and inarguably so.

I haven't been thrilled with the Crusade-writing so far. They already had double the troops, three times the Heroes versus Villains, AND two Ranger-Class Heroes among them...there's creating a bleak situation for the underdog to triumph over at the 11th hour, and then there's just Too Much. I'd really like to see the throttle eased off on Good some. The Pilgrim managed to break the work of TWO villains, and he's just a bit tired for it (which conveniently didn't include any meaningful disadvantage for him).

Still reading, but this plot arc is palling for me.

green

the more I hear of his thoughts, the more I dislike the Grey Pilgrim. I had hope for him at first, but he is **deeply** blinded by his prejudices, and completely incapable of seeing the truth in front of him. what a waste.

Max Scherer

Yeah if they win this battle and go through Callow The Quality of this story will drop, because again there is a drawback. Maybe Cat will win at the end, but the cost was again way to high **sigh** I dont know her victorys never feel like victorys and i only read it because it is intersting and not because it is satisfying....

---

Interlude: Kaleidoscope III

"The meaning of the exercise of war is the destruction of your foe's ability to wage it. 'Victory' does not exist as an independent entity; it is merely the manifestation of the enemy's defeat."

– Extract from 'Considerations on Warfare' by Marshal Grem One-Eye

It would come down to steel and blood. The Thief had failed, not that Juniper held much hope for success. The woman was not as clever a liar as she believed, and the enemy was cunning. Much as she disliked the former heroine, the orc refrained from spending a quarter hour verbally ripping her to pieces. She had more important duties to see to, now that near forty thousand crusaders and their heroic hired killers were on the march. Heroes, huh. Much like knights, Juniper had never thought much of them. All a knight could claim to be was a killer on a horse. The rest was pageantry. And heroes, well, the Hellhound had never cared for the smell of hypocrisy. 'The Heavens told me to do it' did not qualify as a valid excuse under Legion regulations, and those were the closest thing to fair laws Creation had ever seen as far as she was concerned.

"She bought us a few hours, at least," Aisha said.

The two of them were alone in the tent, at least until the rest of the general staff arrived. Juniper cast a look at the Taghreb, eyes lingering on soft skin of her bare wrists. Such delicate appearance, for such a dangerous woman. The urge to sink her teeth into the warm veins warred with the urge to feel the softness with her own rough hands. The orc cleared her throat.

"For all the good it's done," she said. "We're in for a red day."

The olive-skinned Staff Tribune flicked her an amused glance.

"The Fifteenth's eternal motto," she teased.

The orc did not allow the laughter in those bright eyes to distract her.

"We have a choice to make," she growled. "Static or moving."

Princess Malanza was splitting her host in half, roughly fifteen thousand on each side of the marshlands advancing in thick columns. It'd been too much to hope for the crusaders would try going through the water. It didn't take Grem One-Eye to see that'd mean easy targets for Juniper's engines, and Rozala Malanza had already proved she was no fool.

"Legion doctrine dictates retreat to a hardened position, when met with superior force," Aisha said.

Their current position was as hardened as field fortifications could allow, so the traditional call would be remaining behind the palisades and preparing for a hard fight. It meant, though, surrendering the initiative to the enemy. And the Hellhound had been burned playing number games with this foe before. She was wary of a repeat.

"We could have local superiority, if we sent enough men to hit a single column," Juniper said. "And possibly break that side before the other one gets anywhere close."

"Without heroes on the field, it would be risky," the Taghreb said. "With them, it nears wishful thinking."

Her Warlord had picked a fucking bad time to take a nap, that much was undeniable. Were there even half as many heroes, Juniper would not hesitate to strike anyway. Twelve, though, was too many for her tastes. Even if all they did was prop up morale wherever they stood it might be enough to tip the balance. If the Saint of Swords or the Grey Pilgrim happened to be with either army, massacre was the word that came to mind.

"We let them march without contest, and by afternoon we'll be surrounded and up to our neck in Named," Juniper said. "Even if we don't give battle, we have to slow them down."

"We have munitions," Aisha pointed out.

They'd both known that, but the point of this conversation was not her friend pushing for a plan. The back and forth allowed Juniper to sharpen her own thoughts, using Aisha's words as a grindstone.

"There's a thought," the Hellhound mused. "Not as a weapon, but as ground denial. Plaster one flank with goblinfire and hit the other column with our full muster."

"We'd be leaving our camp exposed," the Staff Tribune said. "We risk a wipe if they have a way to cross the marshlands or get around the goblinfire."

"They're leaving their own exposed," Juniper noted. "They've got at most a few thousand soldiers there that're fighting fit. And they're serving as Malanza's strategic reserve. Which means this isn't just testing our defence, she's aiming for a full victory."

"Assuming they know our queen is incapacitated, they might be under the impression they need to hurry before she awakens," Aisha said.

"That has sense," Juniper said. "And if true, it means the enemy is committed. They will not withdraw because of losses."

"Malanza's not been shy about trading casualties so far," the Taghreb shrugged. "This is not fresh observation."

Juniper shook her head.

"No," she replied. "It is. If you're right then static defence is not an option. They'll not retreat with sundown no matter how many we kill, just send wave after wave against the palisades through the night. They're in it to the death, and that means the only way we make it through this is by forcing a retreat."

Aisha's eyes narrowed.

"And the only thing that would make Princess Malanza call one is the risk of a defeat so major her army would not recover from it," the Staff Tribune said.

"Which we can't inflict by force of arms," the Hellhound said. "Or by Named superiority."

That meant the effect had to be obtained indirectly, through strategic means. Juniper licked her chops hungrily. It was a puzzle. One where the slightest misstep would doom her army and likely Callow with it.

Gods, she'd missed this.

—

Captain Pierre Dulac squinted into the sun. The Callowans were fucking crazier than he'd thought, because he was looking at a force of at least four thousand. The Brabantine had served in the army of Prince Arnaud for a decade and a half now — loyalty to the principality of one's birth was all well and good, but the Cantalins paid better — and fought in four of the Great War's largest pitched battles. He'd been known to make the boast that he'd killed someone from every principality in Procer, after a few drinks, and for all he knew it might even be true. He had, to put it bluntly, gotten a handle on the waging of war. No fantassin lived long enough to make it to his current rank if they didn't, much less rise to command of a free company as he had. Which was why he was surprised the enemy had abandoned perfectly good palisades and the cover of their war machines to sally out against the column he was the vanguard of. Spitting out the ball of redleaf he'd been sucking on all morning, the captain slowed his march so his second would catch up. Pierre often led from the front when on the march, though he'd gotten old enough he left the sword-waving to younger sorts when battle started.

"Captain," Lieutenant Francesca, better known as Belle, greeted him.

The southerner was a massive beast of a woman, built like an ox and hairy as one. Some Lycaonese fuck had taken off the tip of her nose with a blade at the Battle of Aisne, which only added to the gruesome spectacle that was her. Not a nice woman. She was quick to use the knife and cheated at dice. But the men were fucking terrified of her, and that had uses.

"Tell me my leaves didn't go bad, Belle," he said. "I'm not hallucinating that army, am I?"

"I see them," the lieutenant grunted.

"Fuck," Pierre feelingly said. "I was hoping they'd stay holed up and we could trick another company into leading the first wave."

"Callowans," the woman shrugged. "Hicks one and all. You want to send a messenger to the prince to ask for orders?"

The captain grimaced. He'd rather not if he could avoid it. Their column was following the western bank of that creepy magic swamp, from a bird's eye view, and unlike the other army they had no cavalry backing them. Princess Malanza had gone to command the host with horse, like a good little Arlesite trying to win wars one charge at a time, and that left Prince Arnaud and Princess Adeline sharing command over this column. Pierre didn't know shit about the Princess of Orne, but everyone and their sister knew Prince Arnaud was a proper twat. He was a twat who paid well and on time, so Pierre's company remained in his service, but the fantassin wasn't eager at the notion of following the military wisdom of the Prince of Cantal. Like all princes, he wasn't known to send his retinue into the breach when there were spare fantassins lying around. Better to take a look on their own terms, the captain figured, without any 'inspired' instructions about when they could retreat.

"Rustle up the last ten men who pissed you off, Belle," Pierre Dulac said. "We're going to have a closer look at whatever they're cooking up."

—

Tribune Abigail of Summerholm should have known someone was out to fuck her when she got offered the promotion after Akua's Folly. Sure the pay increase was nice, and word had got around she'd been in the frontlines during both the Arcadian Campaign and Second Liesse – which made it really easy to trick strapping young lads from home into her bed, if they were as dumb as they were pretty. Plenty of those floating around, it was the type that made shit life choices just like her and enrolled in the Army of Callow. On the other hand, she'd been transferred from the command of General Hune to that of General Nauk. The godsdamned Princekiller himself. The orc looked like a torch had eaten half his face, and acted like he was going to eat half Creation to even that out. Of course they'd put her under the command of the one man in the Army of Callow who was guaranteed to be sent over and over again into the worst possible messes. Abigail had bought a sack of leeches in Laure and paid someone to drop them in Tribune Ashan's bedding when no one was looking.

That fucker was the one who'd recommended her for promotion.

Worst of all, her cohort was green as grass. Oh, sure, the Hellhounds had drilled them to collapse and taken everyone through a brutal gauntlet of field manoeuvres and war games. But they'd not looked death in the eye properly until yesterday and this was already beginning to shape into a worst fucking mess than Akua's Folly, which was really saying something. Three thousand dead legionaries within the first hour, because the priests on the other side had found some loophole in the Book of All Things. See if I ever give alms to the godsdamned House of Light again, the tribune grimly thought. Could have been her down there, if the Hellhound had decided on different tactics. The Black Queen had seen their priestly fuckery and raised them mass slaughter, which had been good for morale. Until rumours she'd been wounded by the spell began circulating, anyway. Another rumour had immediately started going around that it was a trick and she was baiting the crusaders, but Abigail could recognize the work of the Jacks when she heard it. The Queen of Callow was having her beauty sleep while the enemy marched. Rank hath its privileges.

"Tribune," someone spoke from behind her.

Abigail spat and turned to look at Captain Krolem. The orc was standing stiffly, broad arms visibly itching to salute. It'd taken her a while to wean him off that. Fresh meat from the Steppes, this one, passed through a recruiting camp in the Fields and now a proper loyal subject of the crown of Callow. Now that the Tower had forbidden recruitment in Praes, his sort was rarer addition.

"I'm listening," she said. "But if it's the fucking sappers again--"

"It isn't, ma'am," the orc assured her. "Our outer line reports enemy movement."

"So they have eyes," Abigail noted. "Definitely picked the right people for the watch."

"Aside from the column," the orc clarified. "A single tenth of Procerans. Scouts, we believe."

Ah, shit. Her cohort was far ahead of where the sappers were plotting whatever Marshal Juniper had sent them here to do, but she had instructions from the Princekiller to stomp hard on any crusaders coming to have a look. General Nauk had made it clear his forces would not be retreating until the sappers were ready, and someone out to kill Abigail had decided it was a great idea for her cohort to be out on the front lines. At least she wasn't the poor bastard whose cohort was stuck next to the creepy murder swamp full of dead people to anchor the flank. Hells of a silver lining.

"Send out a line," she told the captain. "And since I'm in such a giving mood, they can eat whoever they kill."

"Kind of you, ma'am," Krolem replied, sounding absolutely serious.

Of course he was. Tribune Abigail worried her lip and stared at the column in the distance. An hour, maybe, before the enemy was in engagement range. They'd been waiting out here for two. Maybe the Heavens would smile on her for once, and the sappers would be done soon. She looked up at the sunny sky, grimacing.

"Come on, you assholes," she said. "I got to sermons thrice a year, that's gotta count for something."

—

"Only four thousand, Your Graces," Pierre said, bowing again.

He wasn't sure if etiquette required it, but with royals it was always better to be on the safe side. The Princess of Orne had turned out to be young and easy on the eyes, not that he allowed himself to look. That was a good way to end up blinded. Neither she nor Prince Arnaud had bothered to dismount from their horses to receive his report after he was ushered into the presence of greatness. He was pretty sure each horse was worth at least ten times the war chest he'd accumulated after over a decade of soldiering. They were, he grimly thought, probably better fed too. His company had bought food and kept a hidden stash since, because relying on the largesse of princes was a good way to end up starving, but even their own reserves were beginning to run out. The horses, he could not help but notice, looked perfectly healthy. Better a prince's mount than a peasant, eh?

"And you did not approach close enough to ascertain what they were doing there," Prince Arnaud of Cantal said, pawing at his wisps of a beard.

The disapproval was clear, as was the implied question of why he had not. Somehow the fantassin doubted that the answer of 'the orcs they sent out looked a little too eager' would earn him much favour here. He cleared his throat.

"As my men and I had already come close enough to see their formation, I judged it more important to return and make sure that knowledge was brought to you," he lied.

It was one thing to kill for Prince Arnaud's silver, another to die for it. The man didn't pay that well.

"Prudent," the Princess of Orne said, tone neutral. "And what can you tell us about their formation?"

"They're digging in, Your Grace," Pierre said, bowing again. "There was no reserve, but there were troops detached on their flank to prevent easy encirclement. It looked like they were preparing to fight."

Princess Adeline frowned.

"With four thousand?" she said. "We've more than thrice that number."

The captain had not been addressed directly, and so decided not risk speaking up.

"Were there many mages, Captain?" Prince Arnaud asked him.

"Not on the front lines, Your Grace," Pierre replied. "I cannot speak for further back."

"It seems a rather obvious trap," the Princess of Orne mused.

"They might be a mere sacrifice to slow us down," Prince Arnaud said.

"Or a feint by the Callowans," the other royal said. "Trying to give us pause without any true threat."

"We can simply smash through," Prince Arnaud said lightly. "Why even bother with battle order, against such feeble opposition?"

Pierre winced. Going in half-cocked against the bastard child of the Legions of Terror would get a lot of people killed before numbers won the day. The captain had never fought legionaries before, but he'd heard stories.

"Let us not blunder at this late hour, Arnaud," the Princess of Orne coldly said. "A careful approach is needed. We give battle only when properly arrayed."

"if you insist," Prince Arnaud indifferently said. "Fuss, if you feel the need. The Principate will prevail regardless."

Pierre Dulac silently wondered when they going to remember they had not dismissed him. And, perhaps, if it was time to politely inquire whether the Princess of Orne was still hiring.

—

Princess Rozala Malanza watched the enemy host through her mother's old Baalite eye, the clever arrangement of lenses within the wooden tube allowing her to study in detail even at a distance. Ashurans demanded a fortune for every single one of these, but the imitations from Nicae were of much shoddier quality. That the Thalassocracy would remain so tight-fisted over a device they had not even invented themselves — it came from across the Tyrian Sea — was typical of that grasping gaggle of merchants and sailors.

"More than twelve thousand," she said.

"They mean to give battle?" Prince Amadis frowned. "Would it not have been a superior notion to do so from atop the palisades?"

"Maybe," the Princess of Aquitan hedged. "The Legions of Terror are known for their skill at sieges, but this is the Black Queen's army. They made their reputation on pitched battles."

"Then why even raise them?" the Prince of Iserre murmured.

"Something's changed," Rozala said. "Their general has a plan."

"One would assume," Amadis drily replied. "I don't suppose you could hazard a guess as to the nature of that plan?"

The dark-haired princess frowned. The enemy should have perhaps nineteen thousand soldiers left. Assuming at least two thousand had been left to guard the baggage train, the soldiers in front of them represented around three quarters of the Army of Callow. That left a rough quarter unaccounted for, a fact that was making her uneasy. The enemy could not hope to hold back the other column with those numbers, they'd be encircled and slaughtered to the last. And, to be frank, if defeat in detail was to be attempted it was Adeline's host that should have been the target. Rozala had stripped it of cavalry specifically to tempt such a blunder since the Saint of Swords was with that army.

"They could be attempting to delay us until sundown," Rozala finally said. "To prevent us from encircling their camp, counting on my being reluctant to conduct war after dark."

"You do not sound convinced," the Prince of Iserre observed.

"It would be the first major mistake by their commander," she said. "I was taught it is a rule of war that when a skilled enemy makes an obvious mistake it is no such thing."

"It may no longer be the same commander," Prince Amadis said. "Their Marshal would hold authority, in the Black Queen's absence."

"Juniper of the Red Shields," Rozala muttered. "Hasenbach's reports did not mark her a fool. She is alleged to be one of the finest graduates of their War College."

"A skilled second does not necessarily mean a skilled first," the man replied. "I will not question you in matters of war, but what seems like foolishness might simply be youth and desperation."

She might be young but she's fought just as many battles as the rest of us, the princess thought. Yet the Princess of Aquitan could not remember a single of these where the incipient Black Queen was not holding overall command. It was a plausible explanation that Amadis had offered. Yet she still felt as if she was being invited to make a mistake. It was irksome she could not quite put it into words. It was... an alignment. Rozala knew that dwindling supplies were forcing her to be aggressive. She'd only risked splitting the host in two because heroes accompanied both halves, and there should be no villains left to fight them. The Wild Hunt might strike unexpectedly, so she'd left soldiers to guard her camp and wounded, but everything else she had to field was on the march. Her armies were moving in strength, but there was a certain fragility to that strength. All of this together was bringing muted dread she could not explain.

"We wait," she finally said. "The other column has orders to signal if they engage the enemy or find their path unobstructed. We will proceed when we receive either."

An hour passed with two armies eyeing each other across the field until sorcery rose into the sky. Three red streams. Princess Adeline was attacking an enemy force.

The choice was out of her hands, then. She could not allow the army before her the possibility of disengaging or reinforcing the other side of the marsh.

—

Watching the streaks of red in the sky from her open tent, Juniper allowed the reports spoke to her to go unanswered. The enemy on the left flank was moving to engage Nauk. The enemy on the right was moving to tie up the army she'd put in front of them. She looked down at the map on the table, the figurines she had set down.

"That," she murmured through her fangs, "was a mistake."

The Hellhound smiled, and in her mind's eye she loosed the arrow.

---

DroughtBringer

Oooh. Very excited for next chapter, watching Juniper shine shall be fun. Also, everyone go vote! We are only slightly behind Ward and can easily get past it today!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Matthew

I feel bad. Practical guide seems a much more in spirit sequel to Worm than Ward does. I feel like Ward hasn't found its stride yet.

werafdsaew

Really? Having read all 3 I'd say PGTE is very different from Worm.

Levinus

I just finished worm. Is ward a continuation or just an after story prolonged like those cash grabs riding on the originals success?

Fern

It's a direct continuation, it takes place about a couple years after the finale of Worm. I'm guessing most people aren't too fond of it because the MC is lawful good and not chaotic good/neutral, but I'm pretty fine with it. I think it's finally hit its stride with the newest arc.

Levinus

Just finished the first chapter. A new series with Glory Hole's perspective, ok I shouldn't judge so soon but is the story still related with Taylor or just an aftermath and rebuilding?

Insanenoodlyguy

Didn't you read Glow-Worm, the inbetween? Taylor is gone.

Anon

At the risk of possibly being pedantic (and or spoilery), unless something's changed or I missed something (only sporadically checking in on Ward), Taylor's fate, whatever it may be, is up to the reader.

It's perhaps more accurate (again, unless I missed Wildbow retconning the epilogue for like the 4th time) to say that unless something REALLY changes in Ward's story development, Taylor won't be featuring in Ward in any significant capacity beyond her past actions.

Levinus

I guess I'll start with Twig for now and see where Ward is going.

therealgridlock

Twig is pretty great, a true epitome of mad science and body horror.

Dainpdf

Wait. He retconned the epilogue? Weird.

therealgridlock

I don't actually know what the canon ending is, but when I read it she was alive enough to meet Contessa, but not enough to actually communicate or interact.

I was under the impression she was functionally out of the story even if not totally braindead, her dad had to take care of her.

I mean, experimental brain surgery will do that to you.

I guess it's possible wobblebibble intended to imply Contessa Kills her as a mercy but the last we see is a name on a plinth of the dead from brockton bay, without ever actually seeing her dead body.

Perhaps the tri-quel will show her as a side character? She's only mentioned like... Five times offhand and once directly in Ward, so idk. Likely there won't be a sequel after it though, since it's already basically been said it's the end of the written universe for that story.

The sequel to pact is well on its way, and presumably after that is twig 2; electric slime eels.

sheer_falacy

It's not about Taylor. It's a new story taking place after the events of Worm, featuring both new and familiar faces.

And no, you shouldn't judge so soon. Victoria has changed, and everything we saw about her in Worm except her interlude was filtered through Taylor's view.

Anon

I mean, I've given it like....7 arcs or so, and IMO, Wildbow is struggling to write a non-'escalation' plot that manages to hook me...for that (and a few other reasons), since it hasn't hooked me, I'm just kinda getting...bored.

However, further discussion of Ward can probably be better achieved in a more appropriate setting than a comment chain in a different author's work – as Ward is (apparently purposefully) going for a different tone than Worm, and/or this work.

maelos61

Yeah, sadly enough I'm of the same opinion. It just didn't grip me somehow. Maybe Pact will finally be bumped up to 2nd worst Wildbow story?

Theo Promes

not quite sure this is the right place to discuss it, but I have to say, I disagree. I enjoy Ward immensely, and while I'd agree that it took a few chapters to hit its stride narrating the rather daunting premise of team Therapy, I feel like things have been shaping up quite nicely over the fallen arc. The main thing I personally am missing right now is villainous banter, but I'm pretty confident that comedic relief itch will get scratched soon, too.

It is true that wildbow is amazing at escalating to grab the reader and pull them along, but I also like this sort of post-apocalyptic connection building, politics style narrative that he is exploring currently. And I'm pretty sure the other shoe will drop at some point...

Theoretical_Human

we should not be discussing ward her, but did he end the fallen arc? i grew bored of them.

stevenneiman

I honestly like Ward, but I do agree that PGTE is probably more like Worm than Ward is. I think the point of Ward is to act as a sort of counterpoint to Worm, focusing more on the dangers of being reckless and thriving on chaos. On the other hand, Guide has been moving a bit that direction as well, with the way that Cat had started having to simultaneously take the initiative and worry about the consequences of her actions.

I feel like Cat is moving towards a compromise between caution and unpredictability, while Victoria is trying to leave her old, chaos-loving self behind entirely. Which makes sense because Victoria was personally harmed by her mistakes a lot worse, and never really had any major victories with her old methods. For all that they had unpleasant side-effects, Cat's methods did usually get the intended results.

JD

Oooo, interesting. Because she is Named, Cat has received all of the credit for her previous victories, even though we all know that the majority of the genius tactics were Juniper's. That's a major tactical advantage.

RoflCat

I think it's more because in Procer (and Praes too) they're still under beliefs of Name > all else, in that anyone who's good enough to change the world would have a Name attached i.e. they look up at the ceiling.

Whereas Cat (and Black to a certain degree) is trying to raise the floor, and despite their lack of screen time her non-Name companions are the ones keeping Callow in shape (Talbot, Ratface, Juniper, even the Jacks are made up of non-Names)

Yotz

That, and she's an ork – which means she can't be that dangerous and/or bright (beyond the obvious rude bestial cunning and brute force) from their point of view. Yes, there are some /in/famous of greenskin kin, but since Procerans never have heard of that particular one in terms of One-Eye or Knightsbane – well, soon they will know better...

Porkman

Procer is not a name believing place. I think it's said somewhere that they are unique in that they aren't ruled by names and they kick ass without them. They have Cordelia Hasenbach, a non named, going up against the Calamities for 15 years and she's not dead. Procer uses names but they don't rely on them.

Antoninjohn

Without Auger Procer would be smashed by the Dread Empress

Porkman

True, but they aren't ruled by the names. Praes has it's ruling structure built into its local names. Dread Emperor/Empress is a name. Chancellor is a name. By definition, it can't be ruled without the ruler becoming that name. Same thing with the Tyrant.

First Prince isn't a name.

Shequi

I don't think it's that Procerans think that way about Names,
I think it's that they think that way about Royalty.

RanVor

It's funny how they try to discern what the change of the Callowan command means for them, while in reality there was no such thing. It was Juniper all along.

Theo Promes

yeah apparently they think cat is a tactical genius, which is admittedly plausible given her unerring ascension and the various battles where her armies managed unlikely victories.
That this is a team effort between cat as a blunt instrument/fulcrum and Juniper's tactical genius is plausibly much less apparent from the outside.

Engineer

Their mistake was not categorizing the Fifteenth's battles into two sections: the Narrative side and the Mundane side.
Catherine compared to Juniper is the less skilled General when it comes to mundane warfare tactics, however in terms of Narrative Warfare she has few equals, having beat entities several orders of magnitude greater than her through exploiting Stories.

With Hasenbach's reports and the wisdom and experience of the Grey Pilgrim, they have all the required prior information and tools to reach this conclusion. But their prejudice and arrogance are blinding them to this.

The Proceran Royalty will pay dearly for this mistake.

Matthew

Since conservation of ninjitsu is in effect, can the saint of swords be tied up by just having a couple hundred people to hack through? Like, even though theoretically she could cut the legs off of hundreds of people in one sweep, her powers won't allow it unless it's against named.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Me think Abigail getting chewed up is a running gag now, really have a blast with the girl's practical view on sermons.

RanVor

Wait, it's the gal from the Interlude: Skirmish I? I didn't notice it before.

Letouriste

She is shaping to be a secondary character with some screen time;) we have seen her in three or four interludes I think (first battle against deads,talking a little to cat just before liesse,here and maybe somewhere else I forgotten)

Yotz

Well, we haven't seen any new Special Tribunes for a pretty some time, so /fingers crossed/...

Euodiachloris

Long prices... or leaches. Same difference. xD

She should not rub shoulder with goblins too often. They'd be a bad influence on a promising enough mean pranker.

boballab

Saint isn't as good as she thinks she is. Remember back to one of the interludes or extra chapters (Can't remember which) where Ranger snuck into the Undead Kings lair? Then there was the fight between Ranger and the Summer Queen. It was in one of those stories that Ranger stated she only went after those that might be a challenge? Notice Ranger hasn't gone after Saint? Think about that, Saint has a rep and she is good, but she relies too much on certain tricks over and over and she can be baited as shown by Cat. Then there was the point that the Saint made about Cat, that her story is in the pattern of a hero (Cat was supposed to be a hero, if you read between the lines of one of the epigraphs and why Black sought her out). If Cat is following a hero's pattern and Saint is opposing her that forces her into the villain pattern, and what happens to Named villains that attack a smaller force led by a Named following the hero pattern...They get trumped and killed, something Black pointed out more than once.

nick012000

For all we know, Ranger *has* gone after the Saint of Swords, and either the Saint of Swords was strong enough to drive her back, or Ranger decided to let her live afterwards.

Engineer

I think its the latter.

Ranger hasn't shown to be in the habit of killing her prey (that haven't truly pissed her off); merely to beat the shit out of them. What usually happens to a Hero after they get their ass handed to them by a stronger "rival"? They get stronger, allowing the Ranger to once again hunt them which perfectly feeds into Ranger's Role. Take note she didn't kill the Queen of Summer.

Rq

If Ranger hasn't gone after saint, where do you think Ranger dot her copy of saints signature technique from?

dalek955

Ranger has been crashing around for hundreds of years, Saint is sixty at the oldest. Who is more likely to be copying who?

eso

And it naturally occurs to nobody in the Proceran leadership that Juniper might have been calling the military shots the whole time.

Allafterme

I do feel sorry for the poor Tribute Abigail. Nauk still kicking and twice as mean than before is just the stuff nightmares are made of 😊

Blinks

I think she's going for the food supplies.

Destroy her own, destroy theirs. Everybody starves. Unless they allow Cat to take people home through her gates.

Sniggs44

This does seem like a good strategy, but IIRC the crusaders have enough food to march all the way to a major Callowans city, with or without the stuff Cat's army has.

If it was just a matter of taking out the crusader's food supplies, why hasn't that been the focus from the get go? Just drop the lake on their supply train and then portal out.

I'm thinking (hoping) the strategy Juniper is executing isn't just a way to burn the enemy supply train.

HiThere

I'll try to answer your questions.

It was mentioned earlier that the crusaders have only 1-2 days of supplies left. Part of Rozala's objectives was to seize the legion's supplies, which would allow them to just barely make it to Harrow.

Taking out the supplies was a large part of the earlier strategy; Thief was sent during the negotiation with the princes to steal their supply stores, she succeeded, and later Hune and the wild hunt were sent via gates to make sure additional supplies from Procer did not reach the crusaders.

The "Lakehammer" used by Cat was a trump card, an army-killer. Using it too early would leave the crusaders wary and ready to counter. Better to send Thief and keep that card for when it would be really needed.

As for Juniper's strategy, unknown, I speculate she's going for defeat in detail. Engaging the crusader side with the horses, the less-obvious target, while keeping the other one at bay with munitions and goblin. Local legion superiority could carry the day, though I do not know how exactly she plans to deal with the heroes.

Hope this was helpful 😊

Darkening

Minor point, Thief stole the supplies while Cat and the Wild Hunt were attacking the camp, not during the negotiations.

Blinks

They've got enough food now. If Juniper takes out their food supplies and nukes her own things get far more dicey. Especially if she takes out any kind of siege weaponry that might be available.

At which point Juniper can either set herself in for a fight to the death around Cat and hope the Queen awakens in their darkest hour or begins retreating the army herself.

At which point the crusaders have no food, their supply lines interdicted and no cities within reach they could batter down to get needed supplies.

Oh! Maybe she just punches the whole way. Goes through the marsh, through the Crusaders camp and starts moving north. Simply abandons her Camp entirely. They take each others camps "Battle of the Camps" as it might be known but from Junipers point of view it works out perfectly.

Naeddyr

Motherlover it's the war college battles all over again!

grzecho2222

Or Hakram with Duchess will box them around Cat, like the second Battle of Akka (1189) making this double siege (Akka was triple at one point, but maybe we will see this also)

sengachi

Oh jeez, there's a thought.

Is Larat still available to Juniper as a resource? Because if he is, a scorched earth retreat might be a valid victory tactic. Torch whatever supplies you can't take with you, detach a substantial force to sweep your opponents few remaining supplies from behind (the assumed 2,000 soldiers guarding the baggage train have not actually been seen I'd like to point out), and then fall back in good order through a gate. Give your opponent a moving battle rather than a static defense, to keep your forces from being pinned down so they can retreat when they have to. Or perhaps just delay the start of combat by as many hours as possible and use harassing tactics which drag the battle on as long as possible.

Procer's so low on food already that a day's delay (less if Juniper hits their supplies any more) might leave them too hungry and tired to successfully assault a Harrow which Juniper is defending. Stalling Procer for time and then bugging out is totally a victory condition for Juniper.

It'd even match up with One-Eye's opening line. Victory isn't about any nebulous definition of 'winning', it's about removing your opponent's ability to wage war. And you can't wage war on empty stomachs. Therefore any outcome which sees Procer still here a day from now and the Legions not here is a win for the Legions.

And as a last detail, this seems like something that would be remarkably hard for Heroes to narrative their way out of, and not a tactic the Saint of Swords or the Gray Pilgrim seem well-suited to counter.

TeK

Yeah, the problem is gates. Cat's incapacitated, and even if Larat is here, he may not be as readily subservient to Juniper.

Blinks

He's also a, y'know, treacherous lieutenant. Best not to put him into such a situation as it'll not end well.

Euodiachloris

On the one hand, having fun with the treason game. On the other, having heaps of fun playing very-distinctive-cat-and-rather-surprised-mouse with an entire crusade. On the gripping hand, having fun just sitting back and watching all the tangling, untangling and crashing the various narratives are going through... Decisions, decisions; what is a fun loving fey to do?

All, probably. With a little bit of Bejeweled on the side for when feeling a little bit bored.

Author Unknown

IIRC the mnemonic is 5 minutes without air, 5 days without water, 5 weeks without food.

They are not going to fall over dead just from missing a day or two of food. They will, however, become lethargic and unable to really fight. If Juniper fled now, Procer would probably be able to make it to any nearby city, assuming it isn't heavily defended. That might mean Procer would have to make some hard decisions, like abandoning armor and weapons or eating horses, but it is possible.

I don't claim to know what Juniper has planned, but I'm betting it's a better option for ending the Procer army as a threat.

Morgenstern

Hmm... I did a first aid course just yester-yesterday and they said four, not five, for the mnemonic.

CBH

Its the rule of 3's, not 5's. 3 minutes without air, 3 hours without shelter, 3 days without water, 3 weeks without food.

Might be important just in case you're ever trapped in the wilderness. 😊

DD

Kinda right. People forget or are never taught certain things. The numbers are based on rough averages, so the ability to survive is actually variable, depending on the person and the local environment. Also, if you have certain types of food, it may contain all the water you need to get by. Many don't realize that the old "8 glasses a day" is from an 1800s book and had a second part to the sentence "...most of which can be found in food."

People can and have lasted a lot more than three weeks on no food, though they absolutely would be unable to fight at that point.

RanVor

Well, the point is to neutralize them as a fighting force, not to starve them to death. A week without a meal and it's more than done.

Tristan

For those of you wondering, CBH has the correct estimate. I've heard the 4 & 5 numbers thrown around before but realistically, average individuals may still be alive in that 'extra' time they're likely to be incapacitated. You might survive to day four with out water but you're also likely to be incapable to saving yourself at that point. Would also like to point out that the mnemonic is intended to inform your priorities in an emergency. In extreme weather, shelter is far more critical than food & water.

RanVor

Even if they managed to capture a city, they might be forced to pillage to get enough supplies to survive, breaching the agreement and destroying their credibility completely.

sengachi

Yeah a day without food won't kill anyone in Procer's army. But it will *annihilate* their capacity to give battle. Let alone to siege a fortified position.

A traveler forced to go without food for a day is miffed and a little uncomfortable. A soldier forced to go without food for a day is a corpse come battle.

taovkool

On the other hand, she'd been transferred from the command of General Hune to that of General Nauk. The godsdamned Princekiller himself. The orc looked like a torch had eaten half his face, and acted like he was going to eat half Creation to even that out. Of course they'd put her under the command of the one man in the Army of Callow who was guaranteed to be sent over and over again into the worst possible messes.

You know, it feels strange that Nauk hasn't made an appearance as of yet after the arc began. He's a pretty big supporting character and they've all made their appearances. What the hell happened to that guy after Warlock fixed him up?

Letouriste

I think cat is kinda avoiding him a little because of guilt. So we would not see him much until an important meeting where the complicated feelings would be plain to see or something like that...or until next interlude^^

Nani the fuck?

"The urge to sink her teeth into the warm veins warred with the urge to feel the softness with her own rough hands" ???

Kylen

Literally her actual orc hunger is fighting with the fact that Juniper may well have a deep crush on her.

RanVor

I think I'm not the only one who found that line very creepy.

taliesinskye

Anyone want to bet that Juniper just found a way to attack the enemy camp while both enemy armies are tied down? I think that's how she forces a strategic defeat here.

Morgenstern

Same thought, but I don't quite see how destroying their camp would necessarily force a retreat. Is she banking on Rozala's honor or what? o0

Morgenstern

One way: Robber and Archer would be my first guess. They're still out there. And Juniper just thought in terms of an archery, as tiny tidbit that might or might not be important.

wyaldriddler

That's one of the things she does, she did it before she met Archer during the battle with the Exiled Prince if I recall correctly.

Morgenstern

Hm... One thought just occurred: are the priests back in the camp...?

And as a quick mobile force maybe we could see the Order of Broken Bells on the move again. Might send 'em around.

wyaldriddler

"`She looked down at the map on the table, the figurines she had set down.

"That," she murmured through her fangs, "was a mistake."

The Hellhound smiled, and in her mind's eye she loosed the arrow.“`

Welp. They're dead.

Antoninjohn

Cat is a goddess so she can answer prayers from her believers/followers which is pretty much her whole army, would come in handy if the priests manage to shutdown the Order of Broken Bells magic resistance, I know that should not be possible but with how much the “Good” guys are cheating I can see them doing that

grzecho2222

Order of Dark Knights would be fun to watch.

daegone823

Read all the comments and no one comments on the Juniper and Aisha cruise ship sailing with fair winds

Fern

soft hands indeed

Darkening

Yeah, that ship's going strong at this point.

Letouriste

i can't help to see she want literally eat Aisha:) feel kinda vampire-like love story

Gunslinger

>The urge to sink her teeth into the warm veins warred with the urge to feel the softness with her own rough hands.

We've all been there June

maresther23

There is the shape of a story there. In the middle of the Moonless Night the Black Queen raises to defend her friends and country, unleashing monstrous forces against her enemies. By dawn, the Grey Pilgrim Forgives the monster, restoring her soul and cutting her mantle. By midway, Catherine Foundling defeats her enemies once more, through superior tactics and with a weaponized box.

Notimpressed

*Weaponized Goat

Rey d`Tutto

Undead Goat Bomb Brigade!!!

---

Sheer Goat Attack, maybe?

Antoninjohn

The story is a Practical Guide to Evil not a Hypocrite Guide to Heroes. Cat is not becoming a Hero and serving the Gods Above, it does not matter how much they try to brainwash her she does not become a hero

Decius

Whether she does the will of the Gods Above depends a lot on what the will of the Gods Above is.

It's entirely plausible that she's a Hero AND a Villain, in addition to neither.

Engineer

The main thing about practicality is that you don't have any rigid boundaries. If Cat needs to play the role of a Hero to achieve her objectives she will do so, if she needs to play the Role of a Villain to achieve the same she will also do so. So her playing the role of the Hero, come to save her army in their darkest hour is entirely inline with the theme of the Guide because she is not is deluded by the "good" of the Gods Above nor the "power" the Gods Below offer. The Roles they empower are merely means to an end.

grzecho2222

Enlightened tyranny, positivism and very TTS "Who said that gods are more than mortals" seem to be running theme of Team Cat and Team Black

Fern

So, here's what we know:

Because Princess General is aiming for a complete victory in one go, and a single hero, let alone fourteen of them, buffs morale in attacking armies, the Principalities won't tactically retreat, meaning Juniper is going for a strategic endgame here.

Rozala's camp only has 2000 guarding it, likely with all of their supplies.

The bulk of the Callowan army is looking to plant munitions, then retreat.

Here's what i'm guessing: Juniper draws in the Principality host between the munitions and the palisade, and starts working their asses like a drunk stepfather. She then sends her 2000-odd force of knights under Talbot to hit their supply train and then make a fighting retreat. Since the heroes and Amadis' own ambitions won't allow Rozala to retreat, this is the only winning option for Callow.

The big hole in this plan, of course, is the heroes. But then, a Queen awakening at her kingdom's most dire hour to lead her army and her troupe of named has a nasty shape to it.

This is gonna be interesting.

daegone823

Hyped to see if Nauk can gain name. I mean Hakram was a large part in Chat's story and Nauk mirrors villainous traits. He was raised from a near dead state by Warlock, killed a large demon in the midst of red rage, but most of all his reputation precedes him which can foster the creation of a name. I mean if rogue sorcerer and thief are names they should have orc names for berserker's which Nauk is becoming his undying allegiance to Chat has only focused his savage rage onto an enemy.

grzecho2222

New version of Warlord (highly unlikely) or something completely new like Wojewoda (chosen leader of warriors or one of armies)

Notsteve

I hear there's an opening for the name of Captain. Maybe for a character that's big and strong and has a curse that powers them up but makes them go berserk...

Cap'n Smurfy

The advanced tactics and set up here is great and all, but holy crap Juniper is repressing a pretty blatant crush on Aisha!

Anon

Hmm....Juniper seems to be operating under the assumption that priestly fuckery won't be going on any more – if they could create walls, they could equally feasibly create something else non-lethal but that could still mess with the Callowan Army's plans.

And that's to say nothing of the 12 named, two of them high-tier, who can say 'screw you, not happening' to various elements, if need be.

I know Juniper's been played up as decently tricky, but there's a lot of elements that can still mess things up for her to seemingly be so confident.

TeK

Remember how in the battle of marchford she went for sleep in the middle of the battle, placing contingencies not only for demon being like really tricky, but for Aqua suddenly appearing to slaughter the rest of Fifteenth? And she has only upped her game since.

TeK

Ok. Let's review teh pieces. Deoraithe are going in force, obviously to reinforce Cat. Adjutant is with them and some detached forces as well. And we know that Larat can make gates, and it's at least hinted he is not with the Army of Callow (having a band of murderous demigods up close, when you've suddenly lost the leash is not something you just ignore), it's possible reinforcements are coming. But somehow I wouldn't bet on this. Procerans have three major detachments, fifteen thousands on each side of the march and approximately five in reserve, protecting camp. Priests are most likely equally spread, so much less boxes, and their mage lines are butchered. Callow has something around nineteen thousands total, putting around twelve on one side, and four on the other. And some people staying in reserve, two thousands by Malanzas estimates. Brave General Two Face and his four thousands are behaving as proper minions, continuing time honored Callowan tradition of burning all your problems in goblinfire. Against them stands Fool-that-cuts-nothing, and no cavalry, as well as some heroes. Lead by not exactly brightest commanders overall, fifteen thousand infantry strong. Not mobile, so that's a plus. On the other side, twelve thousands and change are standing against fifteen thousands total, with full force of cavalry both. Also, despite what everyone on the Proceran side thinks, Callow still has Garcher and Thief. And the Demon of Absence, as well as two heroes are unaccounted for. Cat's and Mazego incapacitated for a time being, and yet, in her memuars, Juniper attributes Battle of the Camps to Cat, which seems rather counter-intuitive to me. Either author forgot he wrote this (like when Juniper is both of Red Moons and Red Shields), or the basic outlay of battle was already preplanned.

The problem is, as epigraph hints and Juniper thinks, the only way to win this battle is to force a retreat by strategic means. Already is clear that this is an eponymous Battle of Camps, so the point of fulcrum would be said camps. The Juniper said so herself, they need to put Crusaders into position where they have to retreat, or face annihilation. What Procerans need right now more than crushing down opposing army are supplies, supplies which are currently in Callow's Camp. Denying them any supplies, harassing theirs and then retreating in good order, leaving Crusaders for a guerilla tactics of Deoraithe seems optimal to me. What will really happen? Frankly, I don't want to think about, it'll spoil the surprise.

But on the side note, given that Thief can apparently snatch entire army supplies, why Juniper's yet to use her as a mobile supply train? Or maybe she does, and her camp is already empty of anything to plunder?

Naeddyr

It might be perfectly possible that Thief's Aspect doesn't allow for storing things that she doesn't technically steal. A fleet of enemy ships and accompanying water? Sure. A grain of rice that her allies want her to take? Well, she could technically put it in her pocket...

TeK

She is a Villain and a Thief, and if a former knife problem in Fifteenth is any indication, she is kleptomaniac too. Some people justify stealing as to "relieve person of pressure caused by money", I don't see why she can't steal supplies so that "it will be a little easier to move". She'll return it later, promise.

Allafterme

That is not the case, she vanished the contingency soul for Akua after Cat gave the obsidian cylinder to her and told her to hide it.

Euodiachloris

Cat and she were partners in that caper. And, "hide the loot" is something somebody in anything nefarious will have to do at some point. *shrugs*

Darkening

Well, for one thing, putting all your supplies in an extradimensional space that could be lost to you if a hero happened to put an arrow between Thief's eyes has a bad shape to it? But yeah, makes a nice backup and helps with moving quickly if she can just grab all your supply wagons and hightail it out of there.

TeK

She does not engage in combat that much, and has an Aspect involving stealth. And who's to say that after her death, everything she stole is gone? It just may materialise near her in the moment of death. Btw, it would've been awesome to see her appropriate a shitton of goblin munition, and bring it back later in some kind of grand Last Stand, going kaboom with enemy.

Raved Thrad

Damn, you beat me to it. Not that I think Thief is the kind to go kamikaze, but it certainly is an idea, especially if her yoinkhole stores items in stasis so goblin munitions aren't in danger of exploding until she takes them out, or she dies and they suddenly appear.

grzecho2222

Yoink explosion itself, it worked on sun

Yotz

All my thoughts at this point spin around different kinds of wunderwaffe (like zombies with pressurized necroice core), but that would 1) require Cat to dream about it, and 2) too much ex machina for my tastes. Beyond that, I always was shite at strategizing.

Said that, here's two cents on the matter: Nauk's flank was given order to prevent enemy from discovering whatever the sappers do here, then – I presume – retreat when munitions would be put into place, and lure procerans on the mindfield; other side of engagement was placed to tie up corresponding enemy group – and enemy must engage on their own will to prevent cavalry from slipping out, which they would if you just attack first – procerans must be committed. Now, when sides are locked and can't maneuver freely, Nauk begins to crawl back, 'retreating' under the enemy pressure, and using mines to force the Saint show herself. GP is considered to be absent (not Absent) due to report/analysis of his condition by the Thief As soon as Cutter's position is known, Talbot steamrolls the other flank, while the 'retreat' on the Sainted front becomes 'full-fledged panic' with complimentary running back to the palisade. In the middle of all this, clearly seen greenish fire begin to light up the sky over the place where all the supplies in the Callow camp are held, and – since proceran cavalry currently is tied up/being crushed by Talbot – there's nothing they can do about burning supplies. To add insult to injury – from the general direction of the proceran camp sounds of explosions and plumes of fire can be seen, courtesy of certain Special Tribune and – ahem – the Garcher...

Proceran leadership understands that force attacking their camp can't be that large, but fears it can be large enough to successfully destroy remaining supplies, and callowan supplies are clearly gone – no way they can crush the Army fast enough to loot the burning camp. So they try to pull soldiers from the lines fast enough to prevent destruction of their camp, and carefully enough to prevent incoming massacre of retreating courtesy of the Army of Callow.

All that kitten calamity goes sideways due to one or another Heroic Interventions, then completely south when Saint goes on rampage. All seems lost for the side of Ebil, which triggers “The Darkest Hour” protocol. The Black Queen has awoken...

Yotz

Meh, while I was typing all this, Fern already supplied that much. Oh, well – in any case we will see the resolution soon.

ALazyMonster

You mentioned this being the battle of the camps, wouldn't that just have been the raid on the Proceran camp that let Thief steal the supplies? This seems like this would be more like the prince's graveyard to me as this is a series of battles and there really is no camp involved in this fight other than Procer's reserve.

Metalshop

Ok, now I'm /very/ eager to see Nauk onscreen. There's been enough teasing and delaying of his appearance that I think something odd is going to be up with him when he does show. Maybe there's some Summer fire left behind in him or something...

Letouriste

Same for me:) but I think the reason is some awkwardness between him ( his injury is shameful to orcs) and cat( guilt). EE seems to build something with that or just feel like putting nauk in the background. Normally such action would be a death flag but there is a badly needed talk between them two we didn't see so I guess he is pretty safe right now

TeK

Actually, he might just die off exactly because there is so much needed talk between them. What's more, I think him getting in dire straights or outright dying would be a catalyst for Cat to awake.

sengachi

“The urge to sink her teeth into the warm veins warred with the urge to feel the softness with her own rough hands.”

... is it bad that I interpreted both of these as sexual, not just the latter?

Yotz

A person of taste I see...

sengachi

... is that a pun?

grzecho2222

Don't be bitter, even if this might be rather tender topic for many sour reactions may spoil the taste of this sapid discusion

sengachi

Okay you? You go to your room and think about what you've done.

grzecho2222

"Evil Laughter"

Allafterme

It takes an orc to get lust and gluttony go hand in hand...

Seabornia

Am I the only one who assumes that lack of Archer's mention in last chapters implies she and Robber are "absent" ?

Letouriste

Juniper is probably in the known for what they are doing so I guess they are not with the army,yeah. In the first place, Archer is not suited to fight with armies. she is more of an hunter kind of fighter.

thegreatfeed

Fuck that is scary. I hope GP deals with that demon, it has been giving me the Herbie jeevies.

Highwayman

Nauk kinda sounds like a big great American Bully here; vicious with an ugly mug but cuddly at the same time.

daegone823

Where is the cuddly part I think it died with his friend who was a double agent. I forget his name.

Blinks

Aright, this is how i think it might kind of go.

Munitions for ground denial in both engagements of the battle. The tactical situation is fairly hopeless. The enemy has too many soldiers and too many named. Which makes it a game of keep away until Cat wakes up again.

By hook or crook get across the marsh but Juniper destroys the supplies before she does. They've been noted a lot and made such a part of the story i think they're doomed to die.

Take their camp, pull the forces in. Crusaders take Junipers, maybe in the night just to make sure they don't know all of what's going on. Essentially swapping positions except for Junipers the only one with supplies now and she is literally sitting on the Crusader supply route. Assuming anything was getting past the Watch anyway who can now reinforce easily.

Battle of the Camps indeed.

aran

So, uh, random point of interest. Probably nothing.

If those munitions really are made out of the essence of devils (and even demons, in the case of goblinfire), then are they covered by the agreement Catherine made with the Pilgrim? Meaning their use would break the truce, and allow the Crusaders to start calling on angels?

(If that is the case, then I'm completely sure the Pilgrim knew exactly what he was doing by insisting on those rules of engagement.)

Yotz

This topic was discussed previously, afair. The point of mild contention was as such: Procerans use miracles in warfire; priestly healing, protective blessings – not to mention the Fences – are by nature of the Above, and so fall under the terms of treaty as “angelic intervention”. If Procerans so chose to enforce ban on the goblin munitions, they'll break terms of the treaty retroactively, since between the point of the agreement and the point of the supposed munition ban they were using miracles freely.

The treaty, as I understand it, counts only direct use of Demons and Devils from one side, and direct interventions of Hashmallim from the other. That includes direct summoning, and accepting the offers from the Other side – but! – not the use of, say, angelic feathers as swords, or devils' teeth as flechettes. Although, bilethrowers filled with demonic vomit are, probably, out of question due to inherently existencidical nature of said materiel.

That, and I still think that demonic trace is a red herring – munitions are made with the essence of dragonfire, not Infernis. Well, if Dragons of this world are not of Infernal origin – in which case they'll fall under situation described above.

Dragnor425

Wait Nauk is still alive?

daegone823

warlock agreed to help him. He was in a near death state after being burned by summer fire. He is now something less. It was revealed in the first chapter how priest can heal wound easily with miracles simply calling on the heavens, whereas mages must put everything mechanically back in place meaning more room for error.

If a hero such as sword and board is deeply affected by resurrection of the pilgrim who has a natural affinity for healing with miracle abilities, then the warlock which specializes in affliction and pain was less kind to Nauk.

He is now something less than what he was before. based on what the tribune stated he is twice as pissed as he was before. He probably only has the rage as well as his allegiance to Chathrine keeping him sane. That and the near countless number of enemies she puts in front of him.

So to make a long story short yes he is alive but the psychological and physical pain he must experience must be immense not to mention his soul must have been modified, ripped, scarred, or worse something was used as a substitute.

Stephen R. Marsh

Well, if the Interludes are true to form, III will be followed by Cat's narrative again.

Curious if that happens or not.

Detton

The comment that Cat's situation does not feel like a villain's story had me thinking. I dont think she will become a hero – I dont think the Gods Above like her enough to give her that willingly.

However, Black and the Calamaties have been changing the game for 40 years; redefining what it was to be evil by defying and recognizing the tropes that cause their downfall.

What if Cat and her situation (not having a Name currently, all the stuff shes been through), have finally broken the board? That we are now seeing this world's narrative-focus reality finally split down the seam?

Just a thought. Excited for the coming chapter(s)!

Trebar

The talk about munitions is a red herring. All that talk about ground control and tying up one column while dealing with the other was before the revelation that Procer needs a complete victory and all that talk about strategic defeat. It's also never mentioned what the sappers are doing; just that they need time to do the work.

What are some things sappers can do other than munitions? Well, we know they can dig but that hasn't been utilized often as it is often less effective than munitions outside of siege situations. But this time there's this random lake just begging for an outlet...

Euodiachloris

Don't be between a large body of fresh, newly uncorked water and the sea, yes. Especially if in a valley. *winced*

Everybody

Hey just noticed the Summary page still says "Updates Monday and Wednesday" , should probably update with the good news 😊

Jworks

When are the updates now?

Poetically Psychotic

Not giving a reason for Prince Arnaud's deception was excellent writing. I cannot for the life of me figure out why he's pretending to be an incompetent, arrogant jerk, and honestly it's kind of creeping me out. "That which we don't understand" and all that.

Lemon

Hoping Cat wakes up when things are looking grim and summons her first large undead army from the creepy murder marsh. Undead armies would suit her so well because it's seen as the epitome of Evil but can save so many Callowan lives. And she could transition to Death Knight in the future after she becomes Mortal again.

---

Interlude: Kaleidoscope IV

"And so Dread Emperor Irritant addressed the heroes thus: Lo and behold, I fear not your burning Light, for I am already on fire."
– Extract from Volume IX of the official Imperial Chronicles

Abigail was beginning to reconsider her position on tanning being an acceptable vocation. Sure, the smell was horrible and they made you live outside city walls. Pay wasn't that good, and good luck trying to get anywhere without joining a guild that'd squeeze you on fees. On the other hand, she mused, the average tanner did not usually have to deal with fifteen thousand angry crusaders howling for their blood. I probably shouldn't have gotten sauced and insulted the entire family before leaving, she decided. Now even if I come crawling on my knees they'll make me marry a cousin before taking me back.

"I just can't do it," Tribune Abigail of Summerholm sighed. "They all look like ferrets."

"Ma'am?" Captain Krolem asked.

"We have to win this one, Captain," she told the orc solemnly. "There's a lot riding on it."

"For the honour of the Black Queen," the orc growled approvingly.

"Yes," Abigail lied. "That is exactly what I meant."

The queen could stab her way to an honourable reputation on her own, as far as the woman was concerned, but telling greenskins shit like that was never good politics. It wasn't quite as bad as someone badmouthing the Carrion Lord – or, as this was known within the Army of Callow, suicide by stupidity – but orcs tended to be touchy about Queen Catherine's reputation. She'd had drinks with a Taghreb once who'd explained it to her, and what she'd gotten out of the man was that greenskins had a great big cultural boner for people that were good at killing. And Hells, no one ever said the Black Queen didn't have a talent for that.

"Rotation, Captain Krolem," she said, eyes scanning her frontline. "We're tiring."

The Hellhound had, in her great wisdom, decided that the four thousand men under Nauk Princekiller were enough to kick an entire enemy column in the balls. The tribune wasn't all that fond of the Marshal of Callow, who was rumoured to eat people who got sloppy with kit maintenance, but she had to concede this wasn't going as fucking horribly wrong as she'd expected when the enemy had advanced. For one, compared to Summer fae and wights the levies were godsdamned pushovers. It was incredibly refreshing to fight people that didn't keep attacking after you hacked an arm off. Captain Krolem sounded the whistle around his neck and the twenty soldiers at the front of her cohort withdrew, a fresh line taking their place. The crusaders didn't have fancy manoeuvres like that. When they got tired they just died, thank the Gods. Her eyes flicked to the sides and she grimaced.

The crusaders had wasted the better part of an hour getting in battle formations before attacking, but what had struck her as unnecessary wariness was beginning to pay off. Sure, they were failing to breach the shield wall, but the flank to the west was a problem. General Nauk had left a full kabili of one thousand floating out there to prevent easy flanking, but the crusaders had the numbers to keep going around even after engaging those. The only reason the host hadn't been enveloped yet was... A horn sounded, and Abigail kissed her mailed fist in thanks to the Gods Above. Retreat to the next line, at last. It was the third time the general called for one, and they gave more ground every time. Abigail figured at some point the entire army would just fucking leg it, and it couldn't come soon enough.

"In good order, soldiers," she called out. "Anyone falls out of line and I'll drown them in the marsh myself."

It was going well, she thought. Better than she could have reasonably hoped for.

"NAMED," a legionary called out.

It fucking figured.

—

It was like trying to break a stone with a wooden hammer, Captain Pierre Dulac thought as he strode over the corpses of his fellow fantassins. It left a mark, but the hammer tended to break and considering his company was the hammer of this tortured metaphor this was not a pleasant state of affairs. The Brabantine had heard stories about the Legions of Terror, how they'd swept aside the armies of Callow effortlessly, but he'd always believed them to be exaggerated. They'd had twenty years to swell, after all, and he was not unacquainted with how evenings at taverns made yarns grow ever more vivid. After the first time he'd lost thirty of his finest trying to break through the enemy shield wall, however, he'd had to swallow his old opinions. The heathens fought as hard as the devils they bargained with. Horns sounded in the distance and the Army of Callow moved as a single living creature, retreating at a measured pace as balls of flame bloomed in the sky and began raining down on Proceran lines.

Pierre put his shield over his head and knelt, waiting for the rain to pass. A man to his left was a little too slow to bring up his own shield and sorcerous flame struck his face, searing flesh and muscle in the blink of an eye. The fantassin squinted. New recruit, he was pretty sure, some Segovian second son who'd enrolled to seek his fortune. The poor fucker should have listened, when his mother told him fortune was a fickle bitch.

"On your feet, men of Procer," a voice rang out.

The captain obeyed before he even realized what he was doing. The man who'd spoke was tall, and his accent in Chantant was heavy with the thick syllables of a native Levantine. Armoured in silver, with a shield polished until it shone like a mirror and a sword that was more radiance than steel, the Chosen could be felt even from ten feet away. Like a pulse, a whisper of power bestowed by the Godss.

"The enemy retreats," the hero said. "We must pursue. The Heavens will it."

"The Heavens will it," Pierre replied in a fervent whisper.

He would have formed the wings with his fingers, had he not been holding sword and shield. With the end of the wave of fire, advance towards the retreating legionaries was left unbarred. His company formed ranks and advanced, the Chosen at their head, and they shouted defiance. The humans and greenskins on the other side watched them in silence from behind their shield wall, grimly professional. No levies, these. The difference between soldiers trained and soldiers conscripted had been written across the field today.

"Do not be afraid," the Chosen called out. "Their dark queen is wounded and they stand bereft of her protection. This battle will be won by faith and courage."

"Company, charge," the captain screamed. "Honour to the Wreath!"

Shouts gave answer, the oaths of half a dozen principalities sounding where no banners stood.

"Double pay to anyone who stabs the shiny fucker," a woman's voice called out from the other side.

Pierre blinked, but had not time to spare for surprise as a moment later his shield hit the enemy's. A massive orc, who smashed him back with brute force. The fantassin had not survive the Great War without picking up a few tricks, though. He went low and stabbed up, finding flesh, and the greenskin howled in rage. Squaring up behind his shield the captain let the creature's violent death throes bounce off wood and iron, pushing forward before the legionary behind this one could fill the gap. Along the line his men were like wave hitting a cliff, save for where the Chosen led. Legionaries were smacked down like insolent children, and those that tried to force back the hero found a sliver blur carving through their flesh. The fantassin rocked back as a Callowan went shield to shield with him but dug his feet. Gritting his teeth, he had to retreat when the legionary to that one's right stabbed forward with his sword. Another of his men took his place, and he joined the pressing throng to look for a better opening.

"Scatter," a voice too deep to be human shouted.

Pierre found his gaze moving to the side, attracted by sudden movement where the Chosen was fighting. The legionaries who'd been surrounding the man retreated swiftly, and a moment later lightning struck. The Brabantine's blood quickened and he blinked away the bright light, relieved when he saw the hero stood unmarried with his shield up. Lightning scarred the earth around him. A trail of red went up in the sky above, some sort of munitions, and the captain grimaced. That did not bode well. A spike of flame formed above the Chosen and hammered down at him, but the mirror-like shield shone blindingly and the fire blew back into the sky. The second spike, though, shook the Chosen's stance. The third drove him back. The fourth nailed him into the ground. Pierre hurried towards the grounds, not sure what he could do but knowing he had to try. The fifth spike formed... and went out. Snuffed like a candle. By the Chosen's side a wrinkled old woman stood, glaring up with a sword in hand. The Regicide, Pierre understood with trembling hands. The fantassin hurried and helped the other Chosen back to his feet as the Saint of Swords casually carved through half a dozen legionaries with a single swing.

"What part of careful advance did you not understand, kid?" the Regicide said. "This is a battlefield, not your sister's wedding. Going in with your dick out won't get you fucked the fun way."

Pierre would never be so foolish to admit this out loud, but he felt a little cheated that the first sentence he'd heard the Chosen of the Heavens speak involved mention of dicks. It was perhaps less radiantly heroic than he'd expected.

"I apologize for my failure, Honoured Elder," the Chosen still leaning on him gasped.

"Apologize by not forcing me to drag my ass here again," the old woman snorted. "Steady this flank, sorcerers are focusing on the right."

The Saint glanced at Pierre, who blanched, and nodded approvingly at him before moving out in a blur. In the distance, horns sounded again and the legionaries began to retreat. The hole the Chosen had carved into the lines had already reformed seamlessly, and the fantassing let the hero he'd been holding up steady his own footing.

"Again, Captain," the man said. "The Heavens will it."

"The Heavens will it," Captain Pierre Dulac agreed.

—

Well, at least she was still alive. Tribune Abigail rubbed at her left eye again, pretty sure she was going to have to get that looked at by a mage. She'd made the mistake of looking at the fucking hero when he made his pretty little shield shine and she'd had to deal with persistent black spots ever since. General Nauk had finally sounded what should be the last retreat before they got the Hells out of here, so her odds of surviving the day were looking sunny. She'd also gotten through a visit by the Saint of Swords without losing any limbs, which had her in a good mood. Named were like lightning: the odds of them striking at the same place in the battle line twice were pretty low once they left. She'd lost a quarter of her cohort when the shiny fucker had led a charge, and not even calling for heavy mage support had gotten rid of the bastard, but they were approaching the low earth slope the sappers had raised and that was probably a good sign. She hoped. It wasn't like tribunes were high up enough the ladder to be in the loop for whatever secret plans were unfolding. The crusaders were pressing on all sides, but the measured pace of the retreat had continued to prevent encirclement.

Still, thank the Gods the enemy didn't have cavalry.

Abigail squinted at the enemy, to her dismay finding out that the hero from earlier was still leading the pursuit. Fuck. She'd really been hoping that would end up being someone else's problem. Her cohort still had two tracers to send up to request mage intervention, but for the heavy stuff the mage lines could only hit one place at a time. If her signal went into the sky and they were already busy, the enemy Named was going to fuck them up.

"At least they don't fly," Abigail mused out loud. "So there's that."

"Ma'am?" Captain Krolem asked.

He tended to do that a lot. It was a little unsettling for an orc his size to turn into an eager page whenever she spoke.

"Keep us at pace, Captain," she said. "I'm just thinking."

"May I ask about what?" the greenskin said.

"Comparing this to the Arcadian Campaign," she said. "Didn't fight much at Five Armies and One, but this is about as bad as Dormer."

The orc looked at her eagerly.

"Is it true you ripped out a fae's throat with your teeth?" he said.

Oh Gods, the rumours kept getting worse.

"I stabbed it," she denied. "Blood just sprayed into my mouth."

Because she'd been screaming at the top of her lungs in terror at the time, then nearly choked to death as the fae kept trying to knife her.

"Drinking the blood of your enemy is an honourable thing," Krolem assured her.

Burning Hells, she'd never get used to orcs. Sometimes they were almost like people, then they said shit like that.

"Eyes on the enemy, Captain," she said, retreating from the line of conversation.

Speaking of retreats, her cohort was nearing the position they'd been ordered to stop at. The beginning of the earthen slope snaking across the field. Abigail glanced at it and frowned. Wasn't high or angled starkly enough to serve as proper field fortifications. What had the sappers been doing? Looking further back, she saw the packs of goblins standing in companies. No longer digging. Was this the sum of the plan, raising a second-rate hill? It was impressively long, sure, but all it meant was that her soldiers were going to be killed with the high ground. Pressing through the ranks to get to her, one of her lieutenants was making her way with an urgent look on her face. Tribune Abigail went to meet her half-way after leaving Krolem in command.

"Ma'am," the dark-haired Callowan saluted.

"Report," she ordered.

She'd sent the officer to have a look at what the goblins were up to, in case it ended up blowing up in her face.

"Tunnels, ma'am," the lieutenant got out. "They dug tunnels."

Abigail frowned.

"To where?"

The lieutenant gestured forward.

"In that direction," she said. "I couldn't tell how far, but at least beyond our position."

The tribune wiped sweat off her brow, though she was pretty sure she'd smudged dirt more than wiped wetness. Tunnels, huh. What for? Her cohort finished falling back in good order moments later, and she got her answer. The ground shook with muted explosions, snaking across the field until a chunk of the battlefield went up in the air. The Callowan almost fell, but caught herself at the last minute. Dirt began to fall like rain maybe a third into the Proceran host, and her brows rose. That would have killed a few hundred, but it wouldn't stop them. It'd dug some kind of trench in the ground, she saw, pretty deep and wide. Not exactly a knock out-blow, though. Then the water from the marshlands began pouring into the trench and Abigail of Summerholm breathed in sharply. A river. The Hellhound had dug a river in the middle of an active battlefield, too broad and deep for easy crossing. And now a third of the Proceran host was stuck on the wrong side of it. Horns sounded, but the call was different this time. It'd been one of the first she learned, when going through officer training.

All companies advance.

—

"Left flank, tracer just went up," the human officer said.

General Nauk of the Waxing Moons did not reply, idly chewing on a finger. He'd had one of his aides drag a corpse out of the swamp. Bloated corpse wasn't his favourite, but it beat rations and the water made the flesh easy to tear off the normally tricky finger bones.

"Use the Spikes," Legate Jwahir said. "And keep hammering, the Marshal handed down orders to try a kill on any hero on our side of the river."

Juniper of the Red Shields. The Hellhound. They had been friends once, he thought. He could remember parts of that. Enmity too, but that only to be expected. Nauk was certain he had not been a very good orc, even before Summer burned away most of what he was. Licking the last scrap of flesh and skin off the tip of the finger bone, the general swallowed. Eyes on the battlefield before him, he savoured the taste of meat and blood as he watched Proceran lines waver. The crusader left flank was attempting to salvage the situation by circling around, but he'd put most his heavies in the kabili standing in their way. It had meant more casualties for the regulars under heroic pressure, but that was necessary. He did not have enough men to be able to afford coddling.

"Jwahir," he growled.

"Sir?" the Taghreb answered, turning to him.

"Burn them," he said. "We're not lingering, not with heroes on the prowl."

His legate looked like she wanted to argue, but he stared at her calmly until she flinched and gave the order. Calm came easily, these days. Balance for all the things that did not. The old killing urge was muted, the Red Rage burned away. Instead now he had this vicious spasm of violence never too far from his hands. That and the hollowness, but he had grown used to that. There was satisfaction to be found in his work, as close to pleasure as it got. General Nauk watched as clusters of green flames exploded in the ranks of the crusaders on the wrong side of the river, picking at the flesh between his fangs with the finger bone. The screams were soothing, almost as good as listening to the spasm. He'd keep his troops in place long enough the Procerans could not escape, then pull back to the camp as instructed. Heroes could still bleed them, and if a commander on the other side managed to restore order long enough to start sending soldiers around the river – which only went on for so long, time had forced limits – defeat could still happen. The world shivered.

"Sir," Jwahir said.

"I see it, Legate," he grunted.

A pair of heroes were hacking at the river with great spurts of Light, trying to collapse a ford. He snorted, dimly amused. Might work, but it'd take too long. Even if they didn't get exhausted before the end, the amount of men they'd be able to spare a burning death would be minimal. Dark eyes, one dead and one living, turned to the crusader camp even though it was too far to see. Soon that would go up in flames as well. Special Tribune Robber would be starting fires there, green and otherwise. Nauk felt like she should dislike the goblin, though he hardly remembered why. Something about a woman? Felt childish. And now he was hungry again. His fangs crushed the finger bones and he sucked at the marrow within, swallowing shards with it before licking his chops clean and tossing away the remains. A great ripping sound sounded in the distance, and the orc jolted in surprise. There was a wound in the sky, a woman running on it. Past the enemy lines, past the goblinfire, past his own men. Nauk's brow creased.

"Scry our mages," he ordered the Callowan officer. "The rest of you, go away."

Legate Jwahir's lips thinned.

"Sir-"she began.

Nauk unsheathed his sword.

"Disobeying a superior officer's order had clear consequences, Legate," he said. "The army now goes in full retreat. You hold command until told otherwise."

The woman paled. The orc did not pay much attention as the mage officer placed the scrying bowl in front of him on a tripod and the rest cleared out. His eyes were on the old woman running across the sky. Heading towards him. She flicked her sword, carving another rippling wound and sliding down until she landed in front of him.

"You'd be the general, then," the Saint of Swords said.

Nauk tapped the flat of his blade against the scrying bowl's edge.

"Spike," he ordered.

Flame hammered down a moment later and the world became a sea of fire as he laughed. Ah, that'd felt good. The impact had knocked him off his feet, but he rose.

"Again," he called out.

The heroine carved apart the flames that bloomed above them both, glaring at him. Another cluster was born and they both went down. Fire licked at his hands and the Princekiller hacked out a cough. She wouldn't die that easily. But neither would he. He'd felt harsher flames than this. Still did, whenever he closed his eyes. Through the smoke a shape burst out, but he was quick enough the cut that would have taken his throat cut through his ruin of a cheek instead. Barely felt it. The old woman eyed him contemptuously, raised her blade once more and then hurriedly backpedalled when a long knife scythed through where her throat had been a heartbeat earlier.

"So," Archer said, blades twirling in her hands in a display of unnecessary dramatics, "Is it me or you've gotten a little crazier?"

Nauk hacked out a laugh.

"Try to get me a slice, will you?" he said. "Never had heroine before."

"That wasn't a no," the woman drawled amusedly.

"You're one of Ranger's," the Saint of Swords interrupted.

"And you're..." Archer began. "Shit, I could have sworn I knew. Sorry, I really wasn't paying attention during that briefing. Catherine was wearing this very flattering tunic and I was hammered like you-"

The heroine struck, but Archer danced around the blow and forced her back with a slash that would have gone across her eyes.

"Go for a walk, Nauk," the brown-skinned woman said, as if she hadn't been interrupted. "I don't think she's happy about your setting her minions on fire. Go figure. Some people just take things too personally."

"Flank meat," General Nauk suggested. "Or cheek. Tender pieces."

"Gross," the Named said, wrinkling her nose. "And I've been stealing goblin bedding for like a month, so I know gross."

The orc snorted, and fled to the sound of Archer beginning to expound on the virtue of royal liquor cabinets with breakable locks as the heroine tried to kill her.

—

Princess Rozala clenched her fingers until the knuckles turned white around the reins. They had been so very, very close to utter and complete victory. She'd followed the classics perfectly. A first wave of levies to tire out the enemy infantry, followed by fantassin companies across the line while princely retinues struck at weak points. She'd tied down the enemy cavalry with a portion of her own, then sent the rest to circle around to hit the back of the Army of Callow while she thinned she extended the line of her left flank. The enemy mages had been more than a match for her priests, but the struggle had occupied the both of them and left her foe with no real check for the Chosen. Who'd torn into the shield wall with remarkable alacrity, constantly forcing the opposing commander to reinforce breaches with fresh troops. Within the first half hour of the battle, victory was in the air. Wherever Named struck, the Army of Callow bled men like a leaking barrel. Then her circling cavalry had struck, and found a thin line of scorpions awaiting them. She'd almost laughed at the sight. The wave of bolts tore bloody swaths, but it could not stop thousands of horseman on the charge.

Then they'd fired again, barely a heartbeat having passed.

The tip of her cavalry wedges disintegrated. Men and horses died like flies as the scorpions damnably kept firing. The losses promised to be brutal, but as her horsemen spread out and began to close distance she bit down on her fury and made her peace with the trade. A higher cost than she would have wished, but victory was coming nonetheless. Then the goblins had wheeled out some shoddy-looking slings, and packed munitions began to blow away whole chunks of cavalry. Her people were valiant, many of them hardened veterans from the Great War. It took them sixty heartbeats to break, and what should have been a triumph tipped towards a draw. The Callowan knights, though outnumbered, broke through the cavalry she'd sent against them after an hour of hard fighting. Losses on both sides were... steep. One of the few comforts of the day, that over a third of the enemy's cavalry had died before her own fled the field. Without the Chosen it might very well have been a defeat. The enemy commander turned those vicious scorpions against her fantassins, revealing that in addition to being repeating they could also be swiftly moved by oxen.

Then the Grey Pilgrim had taken the field and radiant light carved through the engines like a heavenly stroke. The enemy commander ordered a retreat soon after and the legionaries withdrew in good orders, bleeding men to heroes and skirmishers they had no answer to. But the knights of Callow threatened to charge them, and Princess Rozala had no choice but to order a temporary withdrawal while she sent some officers to force back steel in the spine of her horse. After another hour she was gathered in good order again, and ready to order another assault. With the scorpions destroyed, her foe would break. The the sky streaked with sorcery across the march, and she learned that the other column was in full retreat. But a half hour later, another signal touched the sky. Her camp had come under attack. Soon after the flames grew tall enough she could see them even from this far out. Princess Rozala had fought a battle, today, against twelve thousand men. She'd slain near a third of that army, at the price of perhaps five thousand dead of her own. Yet if she pressed the assault now, without the other column, she might very well be assaulting a fortified position with numerical inferiority. Gritting her teeth, she ordered a retreat back to camp.

One night. One night of rest in whatever was left of her camp, and then with dawn she would dispose with all strategic subtlety. She would muster her entire host, and hammer at the enemy until they broke.

—

Vivienne woke to the sound of someone pouring wine. She had a knife in hand before her eyes opened, and she was halfway out of her chair when a chuckle gave her pause. Thief stilled her heartbeat, meeting the former Prince of Nightfall's lone good eye. The fae had a cup of wine in hand, sitting at the edge of Catherine's bed. There were four mages in the tent and over thirty of her Jacks outside, yet not a single one of them had raised the alarm. The Callowan eyed the mages, who had neither noticed her waking nor Larat's presence.

"Where have you been?" she croaked out, voice still-half asleep.

The sound broke whatever glamour had kept the mages from noticing what was going on. Their eyes widened in alarm, but Vivienne's hand rose and they shut their mouths.

"Around," the fae drawled.

Instinct warred in the woman. Part of her wanted to dismiss the mages, since this might be a conversation best kept private. Another part of her was very much aware the nonchalant fae could kill her with a flick of the hand and Catherine was not awake to hold his leash. The mages might be her only chance of survival, if the fae felt inclined to violence.

"Every word spoken in this tent is under seal," Thief told the mages, choosing self-preservation with a bitter taste in the mouth.

"Precious," Larat smiled.

"We fought a battle, today," Thief sharply told him.

"And won it, I hear," the fae replied. "Or at least avoided loss, which is victory enough for the likes of you."

"She'll have your hide, for staying out of it," Vivienne said, forcing calm.

"I take no orders from mortals," the fae sneered.

The implication that Catherine was not one of those hung heavy in the air. Thief's lips thinned. It might even be true, to an extent.

"Then why have you reappeared?" she asked.

The one-eyed fae idly set down his cup on the bedside table and rose to his feet.

"Perhaps I've decided to dispose of my shackles," he suggested. "Or merely to hack away at dead wood."

The way he smiled at her when speaking the latter sentence sent a shiver up her spine.

"Doubtful," Thief said. "There's no Hell horrible enough for what would happen to you if you did, and we're both aware of it. That's not the game you're playing."

Larat shrugged languidly, leaning against a dresser.

"Perhaps I am simply waiting," he said.

Vivienne frowned.

"For what?" she pressed.

There was a gasp and Thief wheeled about. One of the mages was staring at the bed, where Catherine was... well, her body was no longer shuffling around. The woman flicked a glance at the fae, who was smiling thinly. Amused. After a long moment, the Queen of Callow's eyes opened and she let out a ragged sound. Rising to a sitting position on her bed, she rubbed the bridge of her nose.

"Well," Catherine Foundling rasped. "That was a thing."

"Oh thank the Gods," Vivienne whispered.

Then Larat plunged his blade into her throat. Thief froze in utter surprise, but Catherine did not. She slapped the fae across the face, breaking his chin and teeth, and got on her feet. She took out the sword and her throat reformed within a heartbeat. Larat began to get up, but Cat kicked him back down and kept her bare foot on his chest. The fae began to laugh.

"Already?" the Queen of Callow said, and glanced at the mages still in the tent. "Bind him."

She reached for the cup of wine on the bedside table, then after a sigh withdrew the fingers. Thief's fingers clenched.

"Hold," she said.

The mages looked at her in surprise.

"And in wickedness doth Evil sow the seeds of its own defeat," Vivienne quoted, meeting Catherine's eyes.

The queen rolled her eyes.

"For barren is the womb, and certain the fall," she replied.

Is was, Thief knew, the correct second half of the verse from the Book of All Things. It was also not the correct answer to this phrase. It should have been the punchline to a truly filthy joke about sailors and holes in the hull she'd learned while a waitress in Laure.

"Hello, Akua," Vivienne said.

The Queen of Callow's face went blank and immediately a long spear of ice formed from her extended hand, the point resting on the sleeping Hierophant's throat.

"None of you," Akua Sahelian said through Catherine's lips, "are to move or make a sound."

The mages went still. Larat was still laughing.

"You won't," Thief said.

"I assure you," Diabolist said, "the survival of this man is of middling import to me."

"You won't," Thief repeated, "for the same reason you didn't drink from that cup. You're still bound by the oaths her body took."

Akua's eyes narrowed and her wrist flexed, but did not otherwise move.

"Clever girl," Catherine's lips said. "She took an oath not to harm any of you."

"Moonlight," Thief said, and the body froze.

Passing a hand through her hair, Vivienne felt her stomach drop. This, she thought, had just gotten a great deal more complicated.

"Bind her," she ordered the mages.

Larat, she noted, was still quietly laughing.

---

Yotz

Irritant slowly but surely becomes my favourite Dread Emperor. Reminds me of Nathan from 'Misfits' – annoying as all hells, and immortal, so you can't even get rid of him for long – sooner or later he'll return like a migraine he is.

maelos61

I stopped watching after Nathan left, he was so damned annoying, but so funny too.

Yotz

I tried to soldier on, and it was a slog. Like a spark went out, and what left was only vapidty itself. Skipped to the end making checkpoint viewings just to see how it ended.

nimelennar

The reveal of Irritant's Law back in Book 4, Chapter 6 wasn't enough for him to win that contest outright, in your mind? It certainly was for me.

stevenneiman

For me it was still a contest with Traitorous (or possibly Treacherous, I can never remember which), but I think Irritant is ahead with this one.

Yotz

The one with "I'm not saying that I've killed all your friends and relatives long time, and replaced them with shapeshifting devils... Just saying, that's a possibility to consider", or something to those lines, yeah.

stevenneiman

The conclusion was "...but I'm certainly implying it very heavily"
And yeah, that was a large part of the reason why I liked him so much. But let's be honest, all of the quotes from either of them have been amazing.

grzecho2222

I wonder what killed him. Being bored with winning?

Jabes

I was going to comment how much I loved the chapter, but my love of Emporet irritant sometimes overshadows that 😊

Lord Chungus

Well, shit

Eduardo

How will they know that Catherine is back?
If she is back?

Barthumphries

By giving and receiving the proper passwords and passcodes.

Draeysine

Larat is super cool for a treacherous lieutenant. Knew something was up, so he shows up pours wine out as bait so Thief knew what was up, as well as tell thief about removing "dead wood" in a vague double meaning, THEN stabs the annoying girl possessing his queen as soon as she wakes up because it's both expected of him AND he knows that Thief is there to stop her further. Laughs the entire time because it's all a fun play.

Mine

Well there's nothing else to say other than Holy shit! Nauk got his feelings and memories burned by the fae 🔥!!!

grzecho2222

Larat acts like little rascal most likely because he is happy to finally be under leader that is magnet for trouble.

Dylan Tullos

This battle was a defeat for Team Practical Evil. Whenever a legionary dies, Catherine loses a highly trained professional soldier that she will desperately need later. When a fantassin dies, Cordelia Hassenbach loses a dangerous mercenary who has no place in a peaceful Procer. The Tenth Crusade has reserves; Catherine doesn't.

So far, the Crusaders have killed more than seven thousand soldiers of the Army of Callow. That's nearly half. Their own casualties have been substantial, but they have more men, and this host is built out of the First Prince's political enemies and the fantassins she wants to get rid of. The loss of the peasant levies is sad, but the only people in this army that Hassenbach actually needs to survive are the Heroes. Everyone else is either someone she can afford to lose or someone she actively wants to die.

Catherine can't simply replace her legionaries; professional soldiers take years to train properly. Even in the best case scenario, she'll be left with a crippled army, while the Crusade has armies to spare. Juniper is tactically brilliant, but Cordelia understands that strategy beats tactics; the alliance with the bigger army can afford to trade at a loss, since she can afford to replace her losses and Catherine can't.

donforrester456

The military aspect is fairly fascinating. I've been questioning, 'Could Procer eventually make a professional military like Praes?' Historically, the rise of a professional military, with leaders such as Kaiser Wilhelm and Napoleon, was tied to the modern notion of statehood and 'countries' as opposed to 'kingdoms'. While one didn't cause the other, they were definitely synergistic influences.

Praes, for its flaws, is at a place where having a professional military works. They have centralized political power in a way that Procer cannot, and both the cultures within Praes and the pre-existing Imperial bureaucracy lend themselves to its existence. Though it still took a period of severe internal strife and political upheaval to make it happen, one could say that Praes already had the elements for it before Black catalyzed them.

Procer is not ripe for such a thing AT ALL – their ‘Princehood’ political structure is practically designed to obstruct the creation of one, with only the threats at the northern borders giving a compelling reason for a truly national army. Though Praes is giving a convincing argument for having a national army at that border too, simply by existing as a unified state with Callow for so long.

The closest I can see Procer getting is the Ottoman style of semi-professional, semi-tribal, semi-mercenary (and semi-Janissary i.e. slave, but I don’t see Procer going that far). Actually, a more apt comparison would be the Macedonian states post-Alexander. Meanwhile, the Legions of Doom are analogous to Roman legions almost 1-to-1, discounting mage lines and goblin fire. We all know how that contest went.

Professional militaries historically trounced states whose military was mostly levies and mercenaries, such as Renaissance Italy and the fragments of the Holy Roman empire, even when vastly out-manned and out-financed; besides Rome’s example there’s also Prussia’s takeover of the German states demonstrating this. If it weren’t for that Procer *enormously* outpopulates Praes/Callow, has large allies to fight with them, and has Praes/Callow still recovering from ugly internal strife, Procer wouldn’t stand a chance. It might still not.

Though the disparity in naval power is disconcerting – Britain built the biggest empire the world ever knew on naval power. Praes is in France’s position on that one compared to the Ashurans, and that is a bad matchup. Something to watch, that.

Obviously, Procer will take notes and want to copy this whole ‘professional military’ idea. But I suspect it will take deep political reforms before Procer is able to field anything like what Praes has – even if Cordelia Hasenbach made such a thing her priority, conflicting internal interests would tear the military apart like we’ve seen in historical Europe and more recently Africa, the military juntas, tribal divides (‘Principality’ divides – we say tribes, but they could be considered on the same level of cooperation/competition for internal power) and precursor states to much of central Africa coming to mind.

Barthumphries

“Praes is in France’s position on that one compared to the Ashurans, and that is a bad matchup. Something to watch, that.”

What with the games that city lords like to play, I presume all Praes’s cities are heavily fortified. And since they don’t really have a navy, they probably don’t really care what happens on the ocean. If merchants want to make money, merchants will take the risk and run a potential blockade, etc.

Praes is in Spain's position with the Rock of Gibraltar. No navy wants to try to take that.

Dylan Tullos

donforrester456:

I agree with what you're saying about the qualitative superiority of Black's Legions. From what we've seen, they are the best human army on the face of Calernia.

However, the Dread Empire's political situation is drastically different from that of Rome. Rome had the advantage of being able to fight their enemies in sequence, digesting each conquest before they embarked on their next war. There was never a Grand Alliance dedicated to destroying Rome, and there was no unifying ideology that could bring all of their foes together.

The Good nations of Calernia aren't going to sit back and watch while Praes conquers the continent one bite at a time, and they have Named to even the odds. With Heroes to back them, fantassins can fight a Legion shield wall and win. Catherine just lost more than four thousand expensive, highly trained professional soldiers in exchange for five thousand mercenary fantassins. That kind of exchange rate leads to inevitable defeat.

Having the best military on the continent doesn't count for as much when you're at war with the rest of the continent. At some point, quantity outweighs quality, especially when one side can simply replace their losses in a matter of months and the other side requires years of training and preparation to produce new soldiers.

grzecho2222

Unless you count the fact that only the core of Army of Callow is made from veterans, And with it you can raise new legion in 2-6 months (if we compare them to roman legions). Training soldiers is faster than training warriors. Problem for Cat wasn't time but cash, she had to rebuild the country. If can defeat this attack and has a year of peace she can easily make even bigger army next time.

oldschoolvillain

It's like Larat said – "[You] won [the battle], I hear. Or at least, avoided loss, which is much the same for the likes of you."

True, it may not have been a true victory in the sense of soldiers exchanged, but Callow achieved its operational objectives – burn the camps, hold Procer back – while Procer achieved no such objectives. Additionally, 5000 men were trapped between a river, set on green fire, and then executed by Nauk's legionnaires. Rozala lost an additional 5000 on her side of the river. Add that to the couple thousand that the Lake maneuver killed, and Team Practical Evil is actually coming out about even in terms of casualties, going by percentages.

Dylan Tullos

oldschoolvillain:

Cordelia Hassenbach sent this entire army to bleed Catherine and die. The leaders are her political enemies, most of the soldiers are surplus mercenaries she needs dead, and she doesn't care if they come back.

So far, about half of Catherine's army is dead or wounded. None of the Heroes that Cordelia actually needs to survive are permanently dead. At this rate, Cordelia will achieve her operational objective of destroying the Army of Callow and her operational objective of getting rid of her troublesome fantassins.

Catherine's "victory" involves killing a lot of people Cordelia wanted her to kill. In the process, she lost most of her skirmishers, a third of her cavalry, and about half of her highly trained professional infantry. Cordelia has more armies, while the vast majority of Catherine's forces are involved in this battle.

Tactical victories are only important if they lead to strategic victory. And when we look at the big picture, the score so far is Cordelia: 2, Catherine: 0.

Warriormonk

Ah, but what about Juniper's observation about the skirmishers/levies being comprised of more young farmhands than she would have expected?

Could the loss of this army be putting Cordelia on more of her back foot in terms of negotiating with Cat later down the line, which has been foreshadowed since the end of the last book?

Stephen R. Marsh

Yes, it puts them in a hole for the next harvest.

Still, this was interesting, down to the staged withdrawals.

Looking at the next one, with the way team good's supplies are going even faster than expected.

oldschoolvillain

That's true. I admit I was focusing more on the scale of Rozala vs Catherine, seeing as how in the big picture, Catherine is not the only army that Cordelia has to contend with. There is also Black and Juniper+ up in the Red Flower Vales, there are still several legions in Praes headed by – if I remember correctly – a dragon, a vampire, and an Ogre marshall. Not to mention the troves of untapped artifacts that Malicia has to draw on if things get truly ugly. So far, the objectives of the Crusade – those being, unseat Catherine, unseat Malicia, dismantle Praes – have been entirely unmet.

So, when we look at the big picture, the score so far is actually Cordelia: 0, Praes: 0.

grzecho2222

I would say Cordelia: -1, Cat: 0, Black: 1, Malicia: 0
You are missing the bigger bigger picture. Pilgrim said it. The worst possible outcome for Good is Callow turning Evil. And when you look at Abigail and married couple from Prologe you can see that they start hating Heroes and Good more and more. The two points of this attack were flanking Black and getting rid of Cat, because when Crusade will go through Callow to Praes they will need food and water and you can bet that they won't accept food from Evil ruler and everytime they take something from people of Callow by force they will remember it and it forces Cat to lead them to fight them which make them more Evil and so on. Even if Crusade wins this war this way they lose in long run which is opposite of what Cordelia wants and what Black wants.

d_o_l

Cordelia wants the crusaders to take loses, but she still wants them to *win*. Without a flanking force, the crusaders are unlikely to be able to defeat Black at the Vales. If they can't break through there, the whole Crusade collapses.

vuthuha912

Not really. Cordelia is losing men for her farms, craftsmen, tradesmen, and so many others. A country is not built on heroes and princes alone. Fantassins are potential farmers to me. Give out lands, reduce the taxes on farmers, rebuild roads, repair water infrastructures, etc. These are the most important duties of a ruler, not killing or waging a war far away to kill off excess landless peasants. Girl, your duties are to your people, even if there are too many, you still have to take care of them. Can you just wait a few years to improve the economy before you go to war?

That is why I've been skeptical about Cordelia – she wants the best for her country but the girl totally forgets about the peasants. I don't know if there is a problem with the political systems but the first thing you do before waging war is to have a booming economy. Yet, I doubt the girl who thinks about killing excess peasants in a religious war instead of land reforms like a normal person is the type to care about recovering her country's agricultural production. I have read enough Chinese history to see that Cordelia is very close to having a peasant rebellion. Constant civil wars, corrupt warlords, little land for farmers, etc. Have a drought or a flood ruin this year's harvest and you have the situation of the Han Dynasty at the beginning of the Three Kingdoms period. Yellow rebellions – Procer edition will be really fun.

Someguy

Actually, I thought Juniper has already won. The invaders have 2 days worth of supplies at most. Team Evil doesn't have to win any battles, they just have to stall until Procer starts starving and discipline falls apart with mass desertion. Unless the Grey Pilgrim can do the 'breadcrumbs to whole fish' thing, they will all starve to death.

Nairne .01

Do they now. Their camp just burned down.

dusting

excellent deduction my friend.

But I've been thinking. This is all slowly going down hill. For Team practical evil. Even though they have been doing the utmost best with all resources available, excellence on all fronts.

Now why is this important? Hero does everything in his power and more that can be expected from him and yet still falls short. *wiggles eyes*

Also lets not forget this is essentially the most "Evil" part of the crusade. Traitorous elements, violent mercenaries etc. Also, what do we call the one invading a country where the general populace prays to good? Yep.

TeK

Procer doesn't have reserves, you fool. Only second waves.

Truly marvelous to see Rozalia loving up to fame of her ancestor, the only one to ever defeat Theodosius the Unconquered in the field.

Trebar

YES! Called it on the river!

"What are some things sappers can do other than munitions? Well, we know they can dig but that hasn't been utilized often as it is often less effective than munitions outside of siege situations. But this time there's this random lake just begging for an outlet..."

superkeaton

I was wondering if Akua could do that. Well, this makes things much more troublesome for poor Catherine.

I am really starting to like our dear Tribunal, though.

nipi

Cant say I wasnt expecting this since the moment Cat went to lala land.

grzecho2222

She is roleplaying Sleeping Violence

Lordy

Abigail + Cat FTW. Who is with me?

grzecho2222

Cat+Hakram. For the sheer amount of horror from everybody.

Agent J

Ew. That's damn near incestuous at this point.

CatxArcher. Like mentors like wards.

wyaldriddler

That's quite possibly even worse. Imagine the horror everyone would have when they think of what those two could get up to. :V

'Sides, we all know Masego and Archer is the real deal.

RoflCat

Would not surprise me if Archer just suggest a threesome.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Throw in Thief too, the more the merrier.

wyaldriddler

One thing that I haven't seen commented. The "The Heavens Will It" thing Mr Shiny is pulling out of his fancy ass.

I'll just say that looks like some really fancily hidden mind control. Because *damn son* I'm impressed with how far you have your shiny fingers up in people's ass brains.

daegone823

I enjoyed the perspective of the good side. There heroes simply tell them to do something and they do it. The jedi trick used over a large area is really cool. Reminded me of the scenes in kingdom of heaven whenever crusaders where about to go to battle to kill people in the name of "god", they always said "god wills it", to justify there actions. Which were clearly in contradiction of turning the other cheek.

Whereas the evil side are dominated by there named villains and run from them fearing there wanton destruction. The good side calls on human armies to surround themselves while evil villains are singular powerful yet ultimately tragically flawed individuals.

Which gives credence to how the calamities were such a force to be reckoned with, they were able to benefit in the same way that heroic bands benefited by rallying around others. They covered each others weaknesses thus in there flaws they grew even more powerful. The fact that Chathrine's band posses heroes, neutral, and villainous name working in conjunction with one another is a symbol of there ability to not just benefit from the villainous power, but heroic bands proficiency with groups, and neutral parties lack of influence by either of the below or above powers.

Richard Warriner

I am conflicted.

I wait with baited breath for each next chapter, railing against patience and silently pleading that time magically shift.

Never mind it has to be written first before it is put up.

Hi my name is Folly, and I am an addict.

daegone823

I too suffer from an addiction it seems the more of this wonderful fiction I am given the higher my tolerance for it. The more I read the higher my tolerance and the more I need.

I tell others at my work and home about how ground breaking this book is and how it checks off each of my needs and they just don't get it.

I recommend adding to the wiki it will give you an excuse to reread previous chapters with fresh eyes.

amargosamountain

"I tell others at my work and home about how ground breaking this book is and how it checks off each of my needs and they just don't get it"

Maybe this is on you for not explaining in a way they understand, or not creating the proper expectations?

Maybe this is on EE because the typos and irritating still-uncorrected errors from chapter 1 on turn people off?

daegone823

Yeah well maybe your right thank you never new therapy could come this cheap. Now off you go to fix another person's problems. Thank you kind sir or mam

TeK

Same here. While my addiction admittedly lessened in period between books, it steadily picks up again.

Varelse

Cat will wake up with an new name – Peacekeeper. And her aspects will be Stop, Listen, and coreablorate.

shieldredblog

So no one thinks Nauk is getting a Name?
He dodged one of Sword Saints strikes and laughed in her face, much like Adjutant did. He is a legend in his army.
All the pieces are there.

sengachi

He's too shallow as a person. Names are more than reputation and feats, they're an attitude. As Cat has said so many times, to be Named is to be dead certain that you have the right of how Creation ought to be. Nauk -especially this new Nauk- doesn't have that. He's just floating along atop the currents of war.

grzecho2222

I agree, but I think that we will see Callow spawning its new villainous Name before long and I think that Talbot will be the one, something like Grandmaster

shieldredblog

What I really want to see is a Name spawn in Callow in response to the Crusade that has nothing to do with the Legions. A villainous take on Callow's many rebellion and resistance stories.

Someguy

Unless he recovers his full mental faculties and becomes the [Reborn].

Barthumphries

Ever heard of Pet Cemetery? That's Nauk. He's going to tie in with the... what's his name, the Dead King coming back.

NZPIEFACE

Oh, moonlight, cause shes the duchess of moonless night.

JJR

I'm not sure if I'm reading this right, but does Thief have a some sort of power to freeze cat's body? Maybe an oath that Cat gave to be still if Thief ever says 'moonlight' to her or something.

Barthumphries

Yes, that's exactly what happened.

TeK

I think whoever says that Nauk ain't gonna get a Name should reconsider. Nihilstic view is still a view. And he's a Princekiller and we got Princes of Procer as well as Prince's Graveyard ahead 😊

ahd

Archer could have engaged at range, but is instead going toe-to-toe with the Saint of Swords...with blades.

Yep, she's one of Ranger's, alright.

lqueenofblades1

Not really. The Saint would have just used her sword-fu to cut through the arrows...and the bow...and the hand. At least with blades you can actually keep her occupied long enough to be a distraction or whatever.

lqueenofblades1

I really want prequels to this story with protagonists of Dread Emperors Irritant and Treacherous and their shenanigans.

Pilgrim the White

You know i kinda fancy Amadeus' story. Starting from when he was a farmboy.

I hope she considers that one whenever guide is concluded 😊

fbt

I love Abigail sooo much! great chapter, ty!
Not sure what's up w/ Akua, but hoping she ends up as catbox liner in one of the hells, ofc.Gray Pilgrim has noted all Cat wants is peace..and he's not in the forming 5-some. Maybe he realizes she's (kinda sorta) in the right in this? At least compared the the hypocritical warmongering hero set.

Goodpie2

PROTIP: Never follow a cliffhanger with a series of flashbacks and interludes. Readers frequently just say "Nope, fuck it. Not worth it," and either skip the flashbacks or drop the story entirely. This is the second time I've done both. Last time, with the battle of Liesse, I stopped reading entirely for over a month.

zout

Bringing back the same old enemies over and over and over and over does not make for an interesting book.
Nor does every battle ending in surmountable "insurmountable" losses and Cat being beaten but somehow still winning in the end. It's become formulaic and tedious as it's 10 to 20 chapters for The same pay off...
The premise is of the story is brilliant but at this rate it can't carry the drag

morroian

Yes I was tired of it in book 3 and sad to see it happening in the very first battle here.

---

Interlude: Kaleidoscope V

"The final disappointment of heroism is to find that a just war was, in the end, just a war."

– Theodore Langman, Wizard of the West

Ink and parchment would see the day recorded as a victory, but Juniper of the Red Shields knew better. Despite her best efforts, the Army of Callow had reached the threshold where even the slightest losses began to affect combat efficiency. The loss of the crossbowmen on the first day had already crippled the host's ability to wage open battle, but the second day's losses had been a mere hour away from catastrophe. Twenty-two thousand soldiers had come to these plains, and now less than fifteen thousand remained fighting fit. The mage lines had nearly burned themselves out fixing minor injuries, an ugly choice to make. The Hellhound had broken Legion triage doctrine, which emphasised keeping as many legionaries alive as possible, in favour of getting as many men able to fight as possible. The deeply wounded had been allowed to die, or put out of their misery when requested. It burned her, the knowledge that the other side would have no such decision to make. Priests were a larger logistical advantage than she'd believed they would be.

The Marshal of Callow set aside the thought temporarily, though it never strayed far. There were decisions to make tonight in the dark and they would be no more pleasant than those of the day. She entered the tent without a word, the pair of legionaries guarding it saluting as she passed.

"If you're here to cheer me up, you should have left the armour behind," Archer drawled.

The orc did not bother to humour the Named's coarseness with an answer, instead looking her up calmly. Lady Ranger's pupil had done away with the woven scarf that usually covered the lower half of her face, along with the cloak and coat she insisted on wearing even now that spring had come. It bared skin, but despite the other woman's finest attempts at a suggestive pose there was nothing seductive to be found. She was a mass of bruises and cuts, a red scar going up her cheek and across her left eye, through the eyebrow.

"She beat you like a drum," Juniper stated.

Archer's nose wrinkled.

"Got a few shots in myself," she denied. "Pretty sure I broke her shoulder, near the end."

"It will have been fixed within the hour," the Hellhound said. "They have a healer among their Named."

"You asked me to cover Nauk's retreat," the ochre-skinned woman shrugged. "Mission accomplished. Now where's my seraglio of doe-eyed Taghreb beauties and oiled-up Soninke manservants?"

"Lodge a request with my supply tribune," Juniper blandly replied. "I'll have it fast-tracked."

"We are the least decadent Evil side I've ever heard of," Archer whined. "Who does a girl have to stab, to get fresh dates and a fan-waving pretty boy?"

"The Empress, one assumes," the Hellhound grunted. "Will you be able to fight tomorrow?"

"If you're going to use me for my body, you could at least make it enjoyable," the Named snorted.

Engaging with this one, Juniper knew from experience, was akin to giving a stone that initial push down a hill. She let silence do the talking.

"Not confident about taking on the greybeards," Archer admitted. "I could handle a few round with the side-pieces, but the Saint's gotten used to my forms and the best I can manage with the Pilgrim is a shooting war."

The orc's lips pressed tightly, revealing dismay. That limited their options sharply. Already the loss of most of Pickler's repeating scorpions and all of the Spitters had taken a tool out of her available arsenal, but if Archer couldn't even be counted on to check either of the prime threats? It might still be possible to win, if she defended cleverly enough. But even if she did, the ruin inflicted on the other side would be matched by the devastation of her own host. Should the Army of Callow take even another four thousand casualties – a very conservative estimate of minimal losses considering enemy numbers and Named – then it was done for the year as anything but a second-rate defensive force. The recruiting camps in central Callow would continue providing a trickle of freshly-trained companies, but that covered only mainline infantry. Sappers, mages, knights. Neither of these could be so easily replaced, and without them it would be exceedingly difficult for the Army of Callow to handle the numerically superior forces the Tenth Crusade would inevitably send their way.

"Rest up," Juniper finally said. "We'll need you tomorrow."

Archer leaned back in her seat, eyes for a single heartbeat bereft of the usual mocking indolence.

"Hellhound," she said. "The Saint? I might have gotten a handle on her weakness."

The orc paused, meeting the gaze of the Named.

"She never used an aspect," Archer said. "And her cuts, it looks like she's tossing them around carelessly but there's always a purpose to it. Either as a deterrent, to allow her to move quickly or to put down an opponent hard before they can fight back."

Juniper chewed over that.

"I've had very few reports of her using the cuts against soldiers," the Hellhound finally said.

"She'd been fighting for over an hour when we scrapped," Archer murmured. "And she never used any of the fancier tricks Catherine mentioned she has up her sleeve. I think she physically couldn't."

"She has limited amount of power, then," Juniper deduced.

The other woman shook her head.

"I think she'd old," Archer replied. "And that using tricks and aspects takes a toll on her body. She doesn't fight your boys because, even if she kills a thousand, after that she's emptied her tankard. It's why she's not the tip of the spear, she only comes out to remove problems."

The Marshal of Callow inclined her head in silent thanks. It would not tip the balance of the battle, but it was great contribution nonetheless. So far, the Saint and the Pilgrim had acted as invincible forces of nature wherever they arrived, only ever checked by other Named. Juniper already suspected that the Grey Pilgrim could only intervene when others were threatened – else why only take the field when the repeating scorpions had already struck? – but now there might be a vulnerability to exploit in the other monster as well. The Hellhound offered a simple nod before leaving the tent, mind already returning to the decisions ahead. Which, to her irritation, she would have to consult another before making. The Thief was easy enough to find. It had been hours since she'd first settled in front of the camp fire she now stared into. Juniper claimed a log by her side, displeased she had to share a fire with the likes of this one.

"We need to retreat," the Hellhound bluntly said, eschewing greetings.

"You know we cannot," Thief replied just as bluntly. "If the Principate keeps a foothold on this side of the Whitecaps, there will be no truce to be had."

"There'll be no truce if the Army of Callow is wrecked either," Juniper growled. "Which is the best outcome to be counted on if we fight tomorrow."

"Duchess Kegan-" the other woman began.

"Is half a month away, at the earliest," the orc interrupted. "And not to be relied on if the tide looks like it's turning against us. The Watch contingent in our ranks is a blade that cuts both ways."

"The duchess will not lightly go back on her word," Thief said.

Juniper frowned. The Named spoke as if she knew something the orc did not.

"What are the odds of Malanza following us, if we retreat to Hedges?" the Callowan asked.

"Slim to none," the Hellhound replied. "We just torched their last supplies. They can last a little longer by butchering their horses, but by my count they'll be starving for at least a week before they get to the fortress. They'll know they can't win a battle in that state. If we withdraw, I am certain they'll fall back to Harrow and disband part of the host while sending for supplies."

"Which leaves half of northern Callow occupied," Thief said. "I am no student of strategy, but I can assure you that is a diplomatic and political defeat that will cripple us."

"The moment we get Catherine back, we can link up with the Deoraithe by gate and drive them entirely out of Callow," Juniper replied. "They'd have a few months in the region at most."

"It is still too long," the woman tiredly said. "Depending on the outcome at the Red Flower Vales, the Empress might backstab us during that period. And if public perception is that Catherine cannot defend Callowan borders, much of the crown's support vanishes. Riots, at the very least. Possibly small-scale rebellion. That divides our manpower, and I assure you we will not be allowed to put back the army together after it has been split. No major player save perhaps the Carrion Lord would see our strength preserved as being in their interest."

"If Lord Black wins-" Juniper began.

The Thief spat into the flames.

"Then it is a certainty that the Empire will sabotage us," she said. "From Malicia's perspective, a Proceran foothold in the north is a leash on both the Carrion Lord and Callow. Neither can turn against the Wasteland while the kingdom is in danger of falling to the next offensive. She'll want us strong enough we can bleed the crusade, but weak enough we have no negotiating leverage."

"If we fight tomorrow, the army's done for the war," Juniper honestly said. "At most, if we force them to retreat all the way back to Procer, with the Deoraithe backing us we can hold our end of the passage. Any offensive operations became a fantasy until our next three training cycles are done, and that's at least a year. Longer, for sappers, and we drained the pool dry for both mages and knights."

The Thief hesitated.

"Perhaps a partial retreat?" she ventured. "Followed by a counteroffensive when they are unaware."

"Without the gates we don't move nearly as swiftly as before," the orc refused, shaking her head. "I've already considered it. Might soften them up a bit to let them starve, but it won't make enough of a difference with heroes in the ranks. We still bleed too much."

The Callowan brushed back her hair, then grimaced.

"You are telling me that either path has a decent chance of taking us out of the war," she said. "That there are no good choices to make."

"Only bad ones," Juniper agreed. "And among those, there's one we haven't discussed."

The Named stiffened, the fire's flickering light revealing cold fury.

"You can't be serious," she hissed.

"You have a way to shut her down," the Hellhound said, and it wasn't a question.

Thief's eyes grew cold.

"A heavy assumption," she replied.

"I've known Catherine longer than you," Juniper said, baring her fangs. "She didn't even trust her Name, and her mantle is a great deal more dangerous. She would have contingencies in place, and within the Woe you're the only she considers to have a moral compass."

"I will not allow Akua Sahelian to walk free," the Thief hissed. "Much less to wage war."

"Then this conversation is over," the Marshal of Callow said unflinchingly. "I refuse to fight a battle tomorrow in the current circumstances. We'll take our chances with a retreat."

"How could you possibly trust her with any kind of power?" the Callowan said.

"She's a Praesi of the old breed," the Hellhound said. "In front of her is the Tenth Crusade. Blood will tell. Trust has nothing to do with it."

"If she gets loose, she'll turn on us," Thief said. "Without a second thought."

"You have your leash, and we still have Archer," Juniper calmly said. "Sahelian is a coward at heart, and she plays the game according to the old rules. That makes her predictable. She will not make a move unless she is certain she can slip the noose."

"The Callowan half of the army would defect, if they ever knew," the woman said.

"If they ever knew," Juniper repeated softly.

She had won the argument and they both knew it.

—

Akua Sahelian wore Catherine's body seemingly without the slightest awkwardness. Sitting with her legs crossed, stripped of anything but a loose tunic, the Diabolist opened her eyes when Vivienne entered the tent. The glow of the wards keeping her contained was the only light there was to be had, weaving strange and moving shadows over the panes of cloth.

"Vivienne," Sahelian smiled with lips not her own. "I'd expected another bell before you came to terms with the necessity. Your perspective has broadened since I last had you studied."

Thief dragged a seat and dropped it in front of the butcher, dropping down into it without even the pretence of elegance. Idly flipping a knife her aspect had dropped into her palm, she watched the Diabolist silently. Were she not uncertain of the effect it would have on Catherine, she would have already ordered Sahelian's soul to be ripped apart piece by piece.

"Think you have it all figured out, do you?" Thief said.

Catherine's body inclined its head with an understated grace its true owner had never quite managed.

"Though your hostility is understandable, it is unnecessary," Diabolist said. "We serve the same mistress, after all."

"Eclipse," Vivienne said. "Rip out your left eye."

Over a month of late evenings had been spent wording the contingency oaths. Possession by the Diabolist had not been the issue they'd expected – Catherine's fears had been centred around Winter making her lose perspective – but the conditions were cleared by this state of affairs regardless. Thief had reason to genuinely believe Catherine's judgement was impaired by an external factor, which allowed her to call on the first three oaths. Sahelian smiled even as her fingers dug behind her eyeball, ripping it out. Vivienne noted with satisfaction the smile had grown a little stiff during. She could still feel pain, then.

"Try to play me again and I'll have to get inventive," Thief said even as the eye reformed.

"Noted," the Diabolist replied, inclining her head. "You have a use for me, or at least the power this body holds."

"I do," she said. "You're going to kill crusaders."

"A most enjoyable task," Sahelian smiled.

"Eclipse," Vivienne said. "Rip out your left eye."

She waited until the eye had reformed before speaking again.

"That one," she said, "was just because you pissed me off."

The fucking smile never went away.

"I expect there will be heroic opposition," the Diabolist said.

"There should be at least ten left, maybe more," Thief replied. "Most dangerous are the Saint of Swords and the Grey Pilgrim."

The Queen of Callow's body hummed and cocked its head to the side. The gesture was so Catherine that Vivienne almost ordered Sahelian to rip out her eye again.

"Not unworthy opponents," Diabolist said. "I will prevail regardless."

"You are not to cause a massacre," Thief said. "After inflicting no more than six thousand casualties, you are to retreat."

Sahelian's smile turned sharp.

"Restraint," she drawled. "How quaint. You miss an opportunity."

"Eclipse," Vivienne said. "Rip out your left eye."

The Diabolist's breath grew ragged, in the aftermath. She continued speaking anyway.

"You need the crusaders dead," Sahelian said. "Yet you also require Catherine's reputation to be unsullied when negotiating a truce. Allow me, then, to bloody my hands. I will make it clear to the heroes that this her body is not currently her own."

"You don't know shit about the current political situation," Thief said.

"I know you cannot fight a war against Procer while unseating the Empress," the Diabolist said. "What follows is a mere exercise of logic."

We can't negotiate with the heroes if they think Catherine is a sharper than can go off at any time, Vivienne thought. Sahelian had not grown beyond the causes of her failure. She still looked at all the nations of Calernia with the belief that sooner or later she would war against them all. Peace stretching further than a temporary truce never entered her calculations.

"You will pretend to be Catherine," Thief said. "And stick to the limits I have already outlined. In addition, you may not slay the Grey Pilgrim."

"Even if this body is at risk of permanent destruction?" the Diabolist probed.

"Eclipse," Vivienne said. "Rip out your left eye."

This time she flinched, to the Callowan's satisfaction.

"Don't attempt to make a loophole again," Thief said. "Not even then. Flee instead."

Sahelian softly laughed.

"And what," Thief asked, "has you so happy?"

Catherine's dark eyes met her own.

"Do you believe in redemption, Vivienne Dartwick?"

The Callowan shivered.

"There's nothing in you to redeem," Thief said. "You are a thing pretending to be human."

"My people," Akua Sahelian murmured, "do not put much stock in it either. But I have pondered this matter deeply, of late. Perhaps there is some worth to be found in it."

The moment I have a speck of leverage, I will convince Catherine to break any semblance of thought in you, Vivienne thought. You are too dangerous a loose end to allow, and you should have forever disappeared after Liesse. There is no place left in this world for you.

"How hard could it be possibly be," the Diabolist mused. "Acting heroically, that is."

Vivienne rose to her feet.

"You will 'awaken' slightly before dawn," she said. "Prepare yourself."

"I look forward to our fruitful alliance, then, my trusted comrade," Sahelian grinned.

The aristocrat clenched her fingers. That wasn't her grin. She had no right to wear it.

"Eclipse," Vivienne said. "Rip out your left eye, seven times in a row."

She left the tent to the sound of muffled screaming.

—

Prince Amadis Milenan had only managed to sleep after drinking half a thimble of poppy brew, and even then he'd woken long before dawn. The trembling in his hands tempted him to indulge a second time during the darkened hours, but his father had always warned him off reliance on medicine. Many a great ruler had been unmade by growing too fond of a particular vice, when age or exhaustion weakened their resolve. He would not follow in that mistake. Instead he sent for inks and parchment, splaying them over his scribing desk and lighting a pair of oil lamps. The lines of the first illustration were botched by the shaking of his fingers, but the longer he forced himself to concentrate on the matter the steadier his hands became. It was a thorny issue to work these failures seamlessly into the greater design, but he'd had a taste for this sort of diversion since he'd been a boy and when the quill scratched the last of the blue on the parchment he found himself satisfied with the illustration. Not his finest work, but neither would he be ashamed of having it displayed before peers.

He'd sketched a view of Lake Pavin in the traditional Alamans manuscript style, that sprawling expanse of deep blue touching stony shores. He'd done so from memory, drawing on the beautiful summer he'd spent in Cleves as a young man. Having met his wife there had left him with a lingering fondness for the beautiful principality that had occasionally been politically inconvenient. Jonquille still occasionally teased him for being softer on the land of her birth than she was herself, to the amusement of their children. He rather missed her, at the moment. Her discerning judgement and sharp temper, the way she could soothe him without ever saying a word. His father had been furious he'd betrothed himself to a girl from a largely insignificant branch family, but never once had Amadis regretted it. He'd paid for the sentimentality in the years that followed, even risked disinheritance in favour of his younger brother, but those were all passing things. The partnership had endured far longer than the grievances. The thought that he might never see her again was a sobering one.

He penned a missive for his wife beneath the illustration, strangely uneasy, and blew on the elegant cursive quoting the couplet by Drunken Berilion he'd botched declaiming at her on their first meeting. She'd recited it back at him properly with laughing eyes, and neither had looked back since. The prince sent for a footman to have it set with the diplomatic correspondence, a mild abuse of prerogative near every royal in the host had indulged in at least once. Even Arnaud, that old sot, liked to write to his bastard son. His worries having ebbed, the Prince of Iserre watched the sun begin to dawn as he ate his frugal breakfast. The most extravagant of his personal foodstuffs he'd had distributed to his men in a gesture of good will, though he'd kept enough there was no risk of either he or his personal household starving. He remained silent as his manservant removed the empty plate, contemplating the coming day. Twice now, his host had waged battle against the Army of Callow. Twice they had been driven back, at great cost. Prince Papenheim's army would be facing that infamous old monster the Black Knight in the Vales, and the costs of that victory would not be slight. That thread woven with his own losses inked a picture he disliked.

The armies of the Dominion would enter the Principate soon enough, a Principate weakened by war. Prince Cordelia might put her faith in the alliances she had bargained for, but an alliance of victors was like a hearth in summer. The diminished and defeated found no friends, only hungry dogs. All of this, unfolding because a handful of children with an army refused to be defeated. No matter. Princess Rozala believed that this day's fighting would end it all, though the price would be heavy. All could be remedied, once victory was attained. Trumpets sounded in the camp, and Amadis raised an eyebrow. It was not yet dawn, after all. Malanza was displaying unseemly haste. Then they sounded again, urgently, and his blood ran cold. This was not the call to rise.

It was the call to battle.

---

erraticerrata

First update of the month, extra chapter as usual. A continuation of the last, titled "Court II".

JD

I guess Akua really believes that Death Equals Redemption.

Allafterme

C'mon, its Akua we're talking about...

Rook

Knowing Akua she means it from the bottom of her heart. The catch being, her idea of 'redemption' is probably something so twisted it makes the Woe seem like ordinary average folks.

Dainpdf

She wants redemption from the sin of defeat.

WuseMajor

She reminds me a bit of Lucrecia from Girl Genius. She was also a "reformed" villain who decided to be a hero because they always win and went about it in very scary ways.

Insanenoodlyguy

Never thought of it that way, but yeah. Could draw some good parallels to Black and Wulfenbach as well, though ultimately Wulfenbach actually wants to be good person, though knows it won't happen.

For those that don't read GG, the beginning of Lucrecia going "good."

http://www.girlgeniusonline.com/comic.php?date=20041206#.WxFiotLD\_bg
http://www.girlgeniusonline.com/comic.php?date=20041210#.WxFif9LD\_bh

Euodiachloris

Ah, dearest Lu. Every last bit of (probably) her. ;P

Euodiachloris

She could be trying to throw Cat under the Angel bus: by getting Cat brainwashed into becoming Good... I mean, being redeemed. Which would be a weird form of win for Akua.

There are major downsides to that, though. Especially if you're currently an undead artefact possessing the redeemed.

Dainpdf

I don't think that's what she's doing at all. She's definitely still on Team Evil.

aran

And right now she's living inside the protagonist's head.

Shequi

I think she's trying to unsettle Vivienne by commenting on how far she has fallen that she's willing to use torture.

nipi

Bottom of the hearth she no longer has. Someone ripped it out after all.

Im thinking she is talking about the Thiefs redemption. Her newfound brutality being a redeeming feature in her eyes.

Metrux

I guess you mean heart? Hearth is a place of fire inside a home.

stevenneiman

I find it hilarious how the closest we've seen to Defeat Equals Friendship is from a such a monster.

NZPIEFACE

You have a rival, who you have a long relation with, that you eventually beat in a climatic battle, and now you take them everywhere.

Why wouldn't she be part of Cat's entourage now?

Metrux

Because Cat hates her, like the whole rest of the entourage, and will never trust her?

Stormblessed

Vivienne is absolutely ruthless here. Very very unheroic. Unless torturing a villain counts as heroic these days. Which unfortunately it might.

I think it's also interesting that Akua said "we serve the same mistress." Either she being manipulative or she sincerely believes she's on Kat's side now and out for her 'best interests'. But because it's Akua it's probably both meanings.

Anon

Do remember that the entire reason Thief joined up with Cat in the first place is because she's a patriot.

And Akua murdered like 60,000 of her kinsmen for no other reason than to further her own ambition.

I'm still somewhat surprised she let Cat keep Akua around at all, to be honest – but I suppose that just goes back to the nature of being a protagonist versus a party member.

Novice

Are you actually defending Akua motherfucking Sahelian? The Diabolist? The manipulative bitch? The butcher of Liesse? Murderer of a hundred thousand? Really?

She deserves far far worse than what Thief has inflicted.

Anon

Nah, I was giving context to Vivienne being so 'cruel' and/or unheroic.

Idly, Akua has made mention before to Cat that she at least 'somewhat' considers herself to be Cat's servant, due to Praesi tradition of being defeated meaning that she is now Cat's 'possession'.

Whether she actually means any of it, and by association, the redemption angle she's trying to play, is up for debate.

Novice

I will admit that Akua's talk of redemption has got me a little bit interested in her. But I still genuinely believe that her story is already done and she should not have this much impact in the story. I was actually looking forward to her being an exposition fairy to Cat, but alas.

Dainpdf

Torture is unheroic. It is hurting another, generally for the pleasure of seeing them suffer. There is no context (excluding **very** convoluted ones) I can think of where torture is not an evil act.

Author Unknown

I honestly don't see it as torture. I see it as training a beast. Do you consider bopping a dog on the head with a rolled up newspaper, or spritzing water in a cat's face torture?

She may be a bit ruthless when jerking Akua's chain, and that chain may lead to a choke collar. But, it's a collar around one hell of a monster; one that needs trained quickly.

crescentsickle

There are some schools of thought where that is indeed considered torture.

Some research regarding humans shows that nations that outlaw corporal punishment (spanking, etc.) have much lower rates of violent crime. Correlation and causation adage aside, there is a pretty strong movement in general for positive-only reinforcement or no negative reinforcement that could possibly be construed as "traumatizing".

Per those schools of thought, even if this is training Akua, it is torture.

If you factor in "Good is an actual force in-universe", I can see it going both ways, because we've seen a wide array of heroes. I could see William going for some variety of torture, for example.

RedoneAgain

William did torture people. It was when Cat just arrived in Summerholm with her new legion. He was carving stuff onto people's faces while they were alive.

Lucas

Negative reinforcement is different than beating someone when they do X. That is punishment, and was proven not to work the same as reinforcement because whoever received it would not continue the behavior when the punisher is not along. At least that's how I think Skinner thought about it.

Cicero

However it is not what most people have historically considered torture.

I mean, what is the difference between assault/battery and torture then?

Historically, torture has been considered one of three things:

1: The inflicting of pain on a helpless person for the personal enjoyment of the person inflicting the pain.

2: The inflicting of pain in order to compel the target to reveal information they do not wish to reveal

3: The inflicting of pain on a helpless person in order to compel a betrayal of their current loyalties. Either in the reveal of information that harms their current side, taking affirmative action that benefits the side of the torturer, or in confession of a crime thereby justifying their punishment and/or execution.

In modern times we tend to focus on the first one, and assume that is the motive. This form of torture is always immoral, even under moral systems that accept the justification of torture in other circumstances. Generally it's the kind of motivation associated with demons and devils.

The second is the most commonly argued about as a possible justification of torture even in modern morality. Specifically, the "ticking time bomb" scenario. In this specific circumstance the argument is that torture without malice is essentially assault. Assault is legally and morally justified when done to protect the lives and well being of others, therefore in a ticking time bomb scenario, torture to obtain information that saves others lives is a moral choice.

However, historically, the third scenario was actually the most common usage of torture. This is sometimes blurred with the second, because obtaining information is a common shared objective. However, in actuality the difference is quite big. The whole point of this kind of torture is to change a person's allegiance, not just to obtain information. As such it's a direct violation of freedom of conscience. One of the most common purposes was to force someone to change their religion. In modern times it's been used primarily by totalitarian tyrannies to compel someone to accept an ideology they don't agree with. (Usually Communism, Socialism, or Fascism – think Mao's Cultural Revolution). The widespread idea that individuals have an inalienable right to their own beliefs is actually quite new, being perhaps 300 years old, and born out of the religious wars of the Reformation. (Yes, some philosophers had articulated it previously, but it didn't have much hold in the actually world.)

The case here doesn't really fit into any of those categories. If anything it's closer to domestic abuse in which one person inflicts pain on another to maintain an already existing position of authority by making the weaker party afraid to betray the stronger party.

Except of course that Viv and Auka aren't married and Viv never promised to cherish and protect her, and Auka is currently and actively possessing the body of Viv's friend and Queen.

(As a side note on corporal punishment, causation probably runs the other way. Nations that already have lower crime rates are more likely to ban corporal punishment. There may even be two Nash equilibrium here, in which there is a tipping point in cultural traits at which corporal punishment does more harm than benefits, but in other nations they are at a point where corporal punishment does discourage crime more than it promotes it. Possible examples of these two extremes? Sweden and Singapore.)

Dylan Tullos

Author Unknown:

People are not animals. The idea that Vivienne can "tame" Akua Sahelian by inflicting pain is stupid to the point of suicide.

Every story where someone tries to torture a monster into submission ends the same way. Sooner or later, the monster breaks free from their control and takes horrible revenge. In this case, I'm betting on "sooner" rather than "later".

Author Unknown

Wise, no defiantly not wise. Certainly not with a hellegg nearby. Never said that. I said I don't consider it torture, and you have hit on the reason why: I don't consider what is left of Akua a person. I consider it a monstrous thing twisted by it's Name and desire; something that left humanity behind a long time ago. It can't be reasoned with. It can't be controlled. At best, it can be fenced it for a time. It should be destroyed. Perhaps that is overly Good of me, or maybe it is just practical.

Dylan Tullos

Author Unknown:

I consider it evil to enjoy inflicting harm on someone or something, whether they are a person or a monster. If Thief needs to kill Akua, she should do it, but torturing her for revenge is actively harmful to Thief, even if Akua doesn't count as a person. Torture leaves marks on the torturer as well as the victim, and it creates a mindset that enjoys harming others for personal satisfaction.

You're right to say that Akua should be destroyed. Catherine should have done it at the start. That's not Good or good; it's just common sense. If you keep a monster on a leash, it's only a matter of time before it escapes, and trying to use Akua as a weapon makes summoning demons seem almost sensible.

Author Unknown

A couple of interesting points. Is it lasting harm to Akua? I wouldn't say so. Physically, certainly not. Psychologically, I don't think Akua is still capable of changing her behavior that much. She has shown she left reason behind and expects reality to conform to her will. How long until she sees her current condition as a part of her master plan?

Also, how much of what Thief did was for Thief's own pleasure and how much was simply because Akua defied her. You don't take pleasure from bopping the dog with the newspaper (or you shouldn't, if you do seek psychological help immediately) It isn't like she can use positive reinforcement when training this particular monster.

The harm to Thief if she did it for her own emotional gratification is indisputable.

Shift

Are you just arguing for the sake of arguing???? because you seem to have forgotten that Akua is possessing Catherine. Thief is not doing it because she enjoys it, it's a necessity. Do you think she could just ask nicely and Akua would do it? I think the rules of what construes torture go completely out the window when someone is possessing someone else.

Agent J

"I said I don't consider it torture, and you have hit on the reason why: I don't consider what is left of Akua a person."

... what? That's objectively wrong. Akua's personhood is not something that's up for consideration. All thinking, sapient beings are persons. From the kindest soul to the cruelest, from the wisest person to the dimmest, from the mentally stable to the most deranged psychopath. Personhood has nothing to do with morality or mental health or, in this world, species.

Akua Sahelian is a person. A vile, twisted, and monstrous person, but a person all the same. Should she have been erased from Creation? Absolutely. Should she be tortured? That would depend on your opinions about torture. Is she a person? Obviously...

MetruX

I don't think this view applies on this world, actually. Devils can become sentient, but until they become thousands of years old they usually will not be considered people, and it is a whole nother argument if fae are people or not in this scenario. As such, Akua has, yes, stopped being a person. She can think by herself, but she isn't a person in any sense, since she has no control of herself, even if let loose from her restraints.

Also, on the major discussion: Good is not good, I always say in those comments, it may very well be Good here, as much as it isn't good. I dislike that Akua still exists, so any opinion I have on if Thief should be torturing her or not is biased, thus I leave this part of the discussion to others.

WuseMajor

...Wait. If Akua is now the Chained Monster and Thief is the one holding her leash, doesn't being mean to the monster carry a very dangerous precedent?

Dainpdf

If you take satisfaction in the feeling or do it just because you're irked (like she did when Akua just smiled)? Yes.

amargosamountain

Oh, so you're fit to say what somebody deserves? Maybe she deserves love and nurturing.

burdi

thief definitely in the process to become villain just like the pilgrim said

RanVor

There's no "in the process". She's already a villain, has been for some time by now. She was explicitly referred to as such in today's extra chapter.

NZPIEFACE

tfw you forget good ol' Will

Euodiachloris

And another meaning on top. I wonder how the Soninke anthropomorphise death and/or destruction, for a start. Because, if as a woman in both or either case...

Notsteve

I agree that this is torture, and that it's definitely unheroic by our standards. But I think one of the big themes in the story here is that heroic Named aren't necessarily what we would call heroes. A Named torturing someone, especially torturing a villain, doesn't mean they don't have a heroic name.

In this world, Good doesn't necessarily mean nice. Heck, it doesn't even mean anything we would think of as good. I think we've seen that just because a country is Good doesn't mean it's a better place to live.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Akua and Redemption? I think you misspelled re-damnation there Akua

wirelessgrapes

Goddamn that's a pretty fucking nasty play by Juniper.

Daemion

Akua is lots of things but I doubt she'd ever make a Catherine convincing enough to fool the Saint or the Pilgrim.

Allafterme

That may be for the best, since winter influence plus f*cking Sehalian is a ticking nuclear bomb

Agent J

I might actually have to disagree. Akua is, if nothing else, a master class actress. She's also had ample time to study Cat's mannerisms, especially now that her soul's been bound to her.

Dainpdf

And Vivienne is a good liar, yet she lasted seconds against the Pilgrim. Akua might fare better, but that's still minutes at best.

Novice

I very much agree. This is a mistake laid on top of more mistakes.

Dainpdf

Not sure whether it's a mistake. They had two bad choices and a gamble. And Akua is certain to cause a lot of damage to the Crusade before she's done.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

All their choices were bad. They chose the bad choice that didn't have an immediate, obvious cost. The problem with that is that Akua Sahelian is likely to be far more expensive in the long run.

I wouldn't unleash Akua at all, but especially not in a world where the Narrative shapes reality. I've read plenty of stories where desperate people unleash a great evil to stop their enemies, and I can't think of one where they didn't end up regretting it.

Dainpdf

How can Akua be worse than "we lose the Kingdom" in the long run? I mean, if you're Juniper and don't particularly care about whether a few people get fates worse than death along the way.

Unleashing great evil might have its narrative cost, but the fact it was done without Cat's explicit approval and with tight reins it might work. And that's all they need. If any mistake was made, it was keeping Akua in the first place. Doing that virtually guaranteed their hands would be twisted into releasing her (as they were right now).

Morgenstern

Thing is, this (unleashing Akua *now*) might actually cost them Cat's awakening in the direst moment. Because they get rid of that direst moment. I don't like where this seems to be going... unless the author gets in another direst moment, a personal one, for Cat... I don't want Akua instead of Cat, man. *sigh

MetruX

I think you're being a little narrow, in this. She is directly limited to killing no more than 6000, it is probably just a demonstration, not a full on death toll. Their plan is to make the enemy hesitate, which is a very good thing, especially if you are bidding for time. Also, they won't kill the Pilgrim, though she can soften up the other Named, so in the end, when the man clash and things get ugly, it won't be ugly enough to completely destroy Callow, thus leaving Cat with an edge to work.

Yes, this WILL backfire, but will probably still be a better outcome than any of the other two choices.

Decius

If we're very lucky, the Heroes will destroy what's left of Akua so that they can deal with Catherine again.

Dainpdf

I don't think that would work out well for Cat. Whatever heroic sort burns the Akua out of her is likely to do it quite literally.

MetruX

When have we ever been this lucky?

RoflCat

Based on her words, she won't.

She'll make it clear, that she's Akua Sahelian, taken over the body BECAUSE the Pilgrim did what he did.

And she'll show them, what Catherine Foundling could've done, if she wasn't such a NICE person.

Basically she's going to Bad Cop the shit out of them, and I'm going to enjoy it.

Still hoping she'll get to join the Woe somehow, because I think it'll be entertaining to watch, even if the chance is practically 0 because of Thief.

Daemion

Vivienne threw that out of the window. If Akua reveals herself to the world, then people would consider Catherine unstable, a ticking bomb. This would undermine everything and she'd never get Procer to negotiate peace.

Akua might believe that simply killing all of the invaders would solve that issue... but it doesn't.

I also doubt Akua will do any better against the Saint and Pilgrim duo than Cat did.

NZPIEFACE

Ah, you seem to forget the large number of corpses just hanging around.

MetruX

In the end this doesn't matter, she is very limited, she will act as Cat and kill no more than 6000, while not killing the Pilgrim. This is what they'll make her do, so unless the author plans on a drama instead of an adventure, this is what we should expect from Akua.

Jane

I'm not certain that matters, actually... If Akua "behaves", it demonstrates that Cat still has control of her, even when she's not herself. And there's a chance that neither Pilgrim nor the Saint tells the commanders what they know; if they retreat, this portion of the Crusade is over, and they have no particular loyalty to Procer.

Besides, they already know that Cat acts irrationally when in the depths of Winter – they might well mistake the changes in her behavior for Winter influence, or some aftereffect of the backlash of the gates.

nipi

Fooling the Callowan host is the more important parth here, I think.

Dylan Tullos

Well, there's no way this could possibly backfire.

Asking whether Akua Sahelian can make things worse is like asking whether Robber thinks fire is pretty.

soonnanandnaanssoon

And that's why Robber named his spider Akua Sahedon't.

Dainpdf

Juniper is banking on her “FOAR TEH EVULZ” nature making her target mainly the Crusade, and that she’ll make things worse enough for them that the balance will actually end up preventing damage to the Army of Callow.
Quite a gamble, really.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

This is AKUA we’re talking about. She could follow orders to the letter, defeat the Crusade, save the Army of Callow, and still wind up making things worse.

Classic Evil is the unquestioned champion of short-term victories that end in disaster. Breaking them out because you need an immediate win...well, I understand the situation is desperate, but they’re not thinking ahead.

I’m fairly sure Catherine wouldn’t want to unleash Akua for any reason, and if any other Callowans find out about it, they’ll murder every Praesi in the army and defect to the Tenth Crusade. Unleashing the Butcher of Liesse is not the kind of decision you can justify to Callowans.

Dainpdf

Yes, but even 70% chance of disaster is better than a certain one.

There’s no other real option, and Akua herself knows it. She’d probably not have tipped her hand like this if she didn’t.

Again, the hope is the damage she prevents the enemy from dealing to Callow outweighs the damage done to her own side. I wouldn’t give it good odds, but there is a chance.

MetruX

Have you people heard about the Godzilla Treshold?

I rest my case.

Dainpdf

Do you mean Juniper used Akua because the Crusade passes the threshold (I agree it does – there is apparently no other option than “lose everything” without using her) or that the Crusaders might amp up their efforts because Akua might pass the threshold (something akin to what Thief cautioned about)?

Euodiachloris

Or if other people's stuff has his name on it... 😊

Pilgrim the White

Sudo Rip out your left eye

Dainpdf

Sudo rm -rf ./Diabolist/

memes

Catherine should have put Akua in chroot jail

Dainpdf

I think she did. The problem with that? Gotta give them root access first.

Cicero

Maybe the Thief can make up some sort of semi-plausible lie as a backup lie. Since Auka will inevitably fail.

Something like: "I Stole Cathrine's body and was puppeting her – but had great difficulty controlling Winter. I was only able to do it because of the unique state the Grey Pilgrim's attack left Catherine in."

Byzantine

She could also just say "Winter did it, as it finally had the opening to take complete control. We've taken precautions against it, but to end the war we were willing to unleash it, for a time." It's got the benefit of not even being untrue – Akua can only do this because Catherine's body is made of Winter.

Decius

Better not to lie at all.

"Akua's soul survived the death of her body and is now controlling the Queen's body and a good portion of her power. If you can sever Akua's soul and restore our Queen, she will assist the Crusade in marching against the Tower."

MetruX

Except she won't? At the most she would let them pass unmolested, and after all of this even this much is not guaranteed.

Think about all we have seen, Cat will not become Hero neither fight for the Crusade, as much as some would want her to.

Antoninjohn

Akua could be a willing comrade of Cat seeking redemption after all she tried her old villainy vs Cats practical and lost so she might switch to the Cat's/winning side or instead she tries to backstab the Woe and suffers greatly. I wonder which she picks.

Anon

Hmm...I legitimately think this line with Akua is a narrative misstep, in terms of the current book.

Others may disagree, but Akua (or the shade of her) is never going to fly past the Grey Pilgrim – whom, if he is left alive, will be able to read Cat's emotions/tells, and know that Catherine isn't in the driver's seat. And from a 'redemption' standpoint, Akua has also shown zero semblance of even coming close to wanting to redeem herself for the murder of all of the inhabitants of Liesse, in any of the conversations she has had with Cat.

From a meta-contextual standpoint, we're now at 5 chapters in a row with Cat being KO'd, and now to have her to-date most hated enemy take up in her place, after we just had an entire book devoted to her – and all the meanwhile, there are MUCH bigger fish to worry about.

I think I'm going to bow out until Cat wakes up, Akua is utterly uninteresting (and IMO makes this part of the story more boring/worse because of it), because nothing in the conversations she's had with Cat (that the audience has seen) will indicate she has any assumption of not trying to pull off another backstab the second she feels she can get away with it.

The only small (almost miniscule) hope is that this is Cat is either pretending to be Akua/controlling Akua's shade to puppet her for....some narrative reason that I can't even hope to fathom, in order for her to 'justify' going against Malicia's edicts (in that Akua did it, not Cat)

Laken

They don't know that Pilgrim can see the truth of a person. Not letting her take to the fields due to that would be a narrative misstep since they lack that info.

Oh nvm, you mean Akua is boring. Why the hate against Stacies, Anon. Tell you what, ill give you 10 good boy points for each chapter of Akua you read.

Anon

Thief already that Pilgrim was able to 'read' her to the extent of knowing her saying 'okay' to healing meant Catherine was out – whether that's emotion sense or not, it means he has good enough stock in a person to bluff a dedicated non-combatant Named.

Cat making a 'miraculous' recovery may play into the fears he discussed with Saint regarding the story supporting her, but that only lasts until he comes into contact with the monster wearing Cat's face. And Juniper's quote gives him the perfect leverage to break Callow's armies.

As for Akua, I'm not saying she's boring (well, I am, but not solely in that context) – moreso that her being able to take control of Cat's body like this is unearned.

Yes, EE has pulled this kind of 'pull back the curtain after the fact' secrecy before, but IMO the setup for it isn't right here at all – Akua's 'story' in this book hasn't felt anywhere near the gravitas of taking control of Cat's body, and absolutely nothing in the interactions she's had since her defeat lends any sort of credence to the type of 'negotiating' Cat did with Black and jabbing a dagger in his side,

I'm also full-up on 'good boy points', but thanks for the condescension.

Laken

They think he has an ability that lets him discern the truth at the moment. What he has is so much more.

A common theme in the story is people paying the price of their own folly such as Cat not killing the Lone swordsman and by proxy damning his countryman. Cat not killing Akua's soul and binding it to her mantle was just too stupid to not backfire disastrously, the setup has been here all along.

And i gotta say i really want to see what the author makes of Akua. She is obviously a psychopath but will she truly try to redeem herself? Will she backstab them the first chance she gets? Can she be redeemed despite everything?

What kind of Anon doesn't want GBP?

MetruX

I very much dislike Akua's continued existence, but my take is that Akua don't see redeeming as we, or even as the other characters.

Novice

Is your last sentence really necessary? You're being a child here.

Laken

@Novice ill let you know that GBP is a premium currency to Anons for acquiring valuable resources such as tendies. 10 GBP per chapter was me being very generous. (its a running gag don't take it seriously mate 😊)

Novice

Considering @Anon's reply to you, I think they're offended. But if you're sure, you do you.

Laken

Yea him getting offended confused me as well but w/e.

amargosamountain

Who made you the boss of the good boy points?

memes

I want Cat back too

memes

Seeing Akua using the power Cat's worked so hard for is painful

Andy

I think Akua works great as someone to drive character development for the Woe, especially Thief as we're seeing some very evil behavior from her this chapter. Also the story is called A practical guide to evil, not Cat butcheres people every chapter, I think its necesarry to show off all types of evil and killing Akua off only to bring in another follower of the old type could backfire spectacularly since people could just see the new villain as "Discount Sahelian".

Metrux

You do know there ARE better villains of the old type than her, right? As in, the Dead King, the Tyrant of Helike, some people from out of the continent... We already HAVE villains with the odl mentality and diferent ways than Akua, and she has been completely exhausted in the last book. There is neither the need to keep her own brand of villainy, neither to introduce another villain to give those different perceptions, so we can only assume EE has something different in store for her.

Otherwise, she is my only critique to the whole series, so far. Not her in general, her in this book.

soonnanandnaanssoon

"I have a very different understanding regarding the phrase 'Let it rip'"

– Thief Vivienne Dartwick after the Battle of the Camps

Anon

Actually....wait a second – how does Akua know Thief's true name? I don't recall Cat ever speaking it in front of her, and thief seemed to guard it really closely.

Also, Jupiter saying 'if they ever find out' is like a reverse chekhov's gun for the grey pilgrim doing just that – in which case, Callow basically collapses.

Dainpdf

She did have her investigated.

MetruX

Akua was always better than Cat in these kinds of things, she probably knew Thiefs name way before Cat did.

Alivaril

I swear, if Akua breaks the rules of engagement laid out with Pilgrim or otherwise screws The Woe, I'm going to be... let's go with "disappointed." I still believe she's a character dragging herself into conflicts long past her prime.

Dainpdf

I do agree Akua as an antagonist is done. Bringing her back as that would feel like regression. But I have faith erraticetera will make this Catakua thing interesting.

sengachi

Catherine sworn an oath on that one and Akua is bound by Catherine's notes.

nipi

I dont think she can break the orders Thief just gave her. Fae and oaths you know. So demons and devils are off the table for the used-to-be-Diabolist too. But she will be able to do stuff that wasn't talked about here or before. Undead?

Someguy

Undead makes sense. There's plenty raw materials in the new marsh.

Decius

Against a Crusade? Against a Crusade well-supplied with priestly magic? Undead would be worse than useless.

Dainpdf

The call to get slaughtered by the Diabolist. She's precisely the type of villain that does horrific amounts of damage before being taken down – we can only hope the collateral damage is not excessive and that Cat doesn't end up paying too heavy a price. Because we all know the Saint and Pilgrim would eventually take Akua down *hard*.

Harry

I get that this is supposed to be a big mystery, but why would Thief either not make mention of having asked Akua about knowing where Catherine is, or use the oaths to force Akua to give an explanation, and/or a timeline of what happened to Cat, and how they could get her back?

Like, if we're meant to be in the dark fine, just have Akua say she doesn't know, but Thief making zero mention of trying to figure out what the fuck happened feels like it's placing an idiot ball on her in order to keep the readers in the dark.

(Juniper saying 'the moment we get her back' doesn't really do enough justice on that front, as it's utterly devoid of any actual intelligence)

And on that note, I'm still a little uncertain of just how much 'power' Akua would actually have – from what I understand, the mantle of Winter belongs to Cat – and as such, her body is reshaped accordingly.

Yes, the body has access to Winter's power but the strength of that connection comes from Catherine being the Duchess of Winter first and foremost, not the other way around (especially because the body is essentially just a construct) – Akua being able to access anywhere near its full power doesn't make sense to me, as the connection should be minimal, if present at all.

MetruX

She IS still the Diabolist, so she probably has access to her own powers, besides the physical qualities of this body. Also, who says she didn't ask or do something to know? We got a little time skip, but more than enough for her to have tried questioning Akua, especially since Akua is in a different situation from where we left her, and the fae is nowhere to be seen.

Also also, it would be pretty idiotic to ask Akua about that. Akua is the biggest pain in the ass to deal with, and will usually manipulate and backstab anyone in close proximity.

Rook

The only silver lining is that the Crusade will be the first ones to experience the unbelievable pain-in-the-ass that is Akua Sahelian this time around. We'll get that satisfaction at least, before shit hits the fan again.

Novice

Also, Amadis writing to his family and reminiscing about his wife and his youth before a decisive battle? That's a death flag.

Euodiachloris

Not a flag, no. Not even a flare. He put up a large metropolitan New Year's fireworks display, the prize idiot. 😐

Burnsy

You know, the twisted thing about this is that I genuinely think that Akua thinks of herself as Cats ally now. Any ally that will stab in her in the back the very first chance she gets, but so long as Cat keeps foreseeing and dodging those knives, Akua will keep going.

letouriste

well, an ally for akua is only until the next backstab so that still fit the description

ahd

Iron sharpens iron.

It's not *impossible* that the Diabolist has finally eaten enough pain from poor life choices to start making less bad ones, such as "be a faithful servant of the Black Queen and you get to stand in the ashes of Ater, after helping to burn it."

Still not the most likely possibility, but I'd like to see it happen.

Highwayman

While I hated Akua during her arc, I cannot deny that she is a delightfully evil bitch that certainly lives up to expectations regularly. Kinda like Joffery, no? (Might be mistaken here as I never watched pass S2 of GOT)

And Thief torturing Akua was a delightful thing to read, both because I dislike Akua personally and because it is a tell that Thief is firmly in the grey zone. She now has the same vibe as when Batman decided that nah, leaving villains alive ain't worth it.

Great stuff as usual, EE.

letouriste

joffrey* and the guy kept getting worse each episode^^.
Thief is already a villain in this universe. a fallen heroine.
nothing grey about her anymore,

benthelynx

Thief is technically a hero.

benthelynx

Based on where she gets her powers from (heavens above)

RanVor

Not anymore, if she ever was. She started doubting it after joining Cat.

MetruX

The doubt doesn't make her a Villain, and not all Names are purely Good or Evil, as evicenced by Cat being able to change allegiances before, and no one knowing if Ranger is a Hero or Villain.

RanVor

I meant to say she started doubting she ever was a Hero.

Names themselves are not purely Good and Evil, but the individuals bearing them are. That we don't know if Ranger is a Hero or a Villain doesn't mean no one knows it in-universe. And Cat never changed allegiances, she just manipulated the story into a pattern where she takes place of a Hero.

burdi

just wondering

where is catherine actually, there is no way akua can control cat with CLAIM and BIND since battle in the liesse prove that winter was to big for her power to hold and this "Sitting with her legs crossed, stripped of anything but a loose tunic, the Diabolist opened her eyes when Vivienne entered the tent" show us that the fucking Diabolist not in the Cloak of the Woe anymore.

the is only one power that can take Diabolist out of her prison to cat body, the Winter itself backed by Creation.

confrontation between cat and saint prove that winter can repair itself, the backlash from absolute positioning maybe very well broke cat's soul and mind. but Winter needed a mind to exist (my own theory) and Creation needed story to continue, so It took Diabolist soul to mend cat's broken soul (i dont know whether to excited or terrified)

the saint already said that cat's story in this moment is not like villain and the pilgrim already said too that there is a big possibility cat will return to give help in the darkest hour. so since its already in darkest hour for The Army of Callow, with defeat looming in their face..help is needed and The Black Queen has to wake up just dont know, is it possible to meld two soul became one as we can see through many chapter that cat's soul and mind not strong enough to hold Winter mighty influence. if it continue there is no other end in her journey except to became creature of winter wearing her own face of course that just my theory, maybe cat in the journey in arcadia, meeting former king of winter to get her queen of winter title official

MetruX

Well, I see it VERY differently from you. To start with, the souls were already connected, and she probably can't completely control Cat, only her body, so Diabolist powers can be the culprit, no need for winter and reality to mess around.

Then we get to the point this is NOT the darkest hour, the darkkest hour is, by definition, the point where things can't get worse, and by people desperation things can very much become worse, so not hte time yet.

Lastly, I don't think she will keep Winter as her main power. Simply makes no sense, she very much fits a Named in reality yet. So maybe her new Name will help tame Winter, or she will get rid of it for her new Name. That's by two bits, anyway.

blitzxs

No way in hell can the crusaders get even remotely ready for an assault via Gate. They were so sure that Catherine's out of the picture or at until her army is at the edge of defeat, that they, Named or otherwise, never assumed that the Callowan army would be the one on the offensive. This has got to be the Battle of the Camps. The one where Catherine and the Wild Hunt attacked was only a diversion to steal the Crusader's supplies. This has got to be it.

Warriormonk

Cat sent Larat to attack supply lines, letting the Crusaders know that they have two people including herself capable of making gates.

They may have defenses prepared for gates, just in case.

lqueenofblades1

>>Catherine's dark eyes met her own.

"Do you believe in redemption, Vivienne Dartwick?"

"My people," Akua Sahelian murmured, "do not put much stock in it either. But I have pondered this matter deeply, of late. Perhaps there is some worth to be found in it."<>"When historians try to pin down Foundling's methods they point to the Battle of the Camps or the Princes' Graveyard, but those came later. After she'd learned her trade. If you want to understand how she operated, look to the Battle of Four Armies and One – from the beginning to the end, she was playing an entirely different game from every other commander on the field."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Shields.<<

I suspect Cat's playing a trick on the narrative or the heroes. I can't think of a reason, but I strongly suspect she's up to something. Like everyone said, there's no reason for Akua to be plot relevant...unless Cat is twisting the narrative about her being the heroic side in the war further by using a villain to anti-hero redemption arc via Akua. I suspect the Proceran army is about to be crushed.

lqueenofblades1

For some reason WordPress cut out half my post.

I think it's Catherine that asked Thief if she believes in redemption. She's playing a con, on either the narrative, or the heroes. Which is why even the Woe can't be in on it. And plus, for all we know, she just improvised it while unconscious and dreaming.

burdi

holy shit, i think your theory has possibility in it this will be epic
i still thinking that somehow part of akua soul got absorb in catherine soul in order to repair it

grzecho2222

I think that Akua is doing "Former Enemy attacks hostile army to buy some time, so the Protagonist can appear with new forces and drive them back only to discover that the Former Enemy is dead/dieing and admits that they will miss them" kinda gambit with intention of gaining something from it. Hard to tell if Cat is on it or not, but it seem that she will come back in critical moment to do some Oddfathers-style neutral necromancy – "Hear me People of Callow, hear me People of Praes, I ask You to rise in defence of your land, your families once more. Come and drive away the prideful invaders and their greedy masters. Come and fight again!" – and dead legion will rise.

Antony444

Well this battle promises to be interesting at the very least...we are about to see what Winter can really do when most of the moral constraints are out of the way.
Juniper was great as always. I think new strategies are going to be thrown since this time Akua must obey the pre-battle plans.

But it was Prince Amadis of Iserre who was perhaps the most interesting. First, because it presented him as a human for the first time, far from the opportunist jackass of the first appearances.

Second, because he thought about many good points.

Cordelia Hasenbach manipulated the 'Good' nations of Calernia to join her great Tenth Crusade. But has the First Prince truly considered what can happen if they fail?

Her opponents being crippled may be a very bad thing in the weeks to come.

If Amadis and Malanza lose the next battle (and there are good odds they will at least finish the battle with half their forces dead), then it's 50 000 men gone.

Then our good friend The Tyrant attacks by surprise the 20 000 men stationed in the south and proceeds to set the Principalties aflame.

Black manages to defend the Vale and inflict losses which makes Papenheim stop his offensive.

The Levant troops are diverted from their original course to protect Procer, hardly the heroic and redemption show they had been promised.

The Ashuran Navy is unable to do more than a few skirmishes and annoying the Tower.

Then the Dead king strikes.

In her haste to get rid of the villains, Cordelia could lose as many as 120 000 men (which has to be a very significant number even for them) and have her home country fought as the battleground...making the Tenth Crusade a monumental failure from the start.

lqueenofblades1

I've noticed comments along with this story (on the surface at least) to be falling to same preconceptions that medieval nations couldn't field large armies. Even in Roman times, whether you were Athens or Rome itself, only a tiny fraction of your men were in an army at any time. Rome was different in that the Senate could conscript you at will and many spent their youth training in preparation for being conscripted, so even though during the Punic wars when Rome was much smaller and several consular armies were destroyed consisting of tens of thousands of men, replacing them was pretty easy meaning Rome was punching well above its weight for its size. Even the Seleucids at their height, their all-out mobilization was a 110,000 men with a total population of several million. Even if the entire army was annihilated, it's hardly that big a drag on the demographics. Yes there may be several thousand less farmers, but it's honestly not that big a loss especially considering they're from all across the empire and spread out across various towns and cities, and armies tended to also make use of mercenaries. The state will have a few years of economic pain, then will recover. Procer has a population of millions simply because anything less couldn't support an army of 100,000 with such technology, as well as the already massive losses taken during the Civil War. 100,000 people hell 200,000 people dying will be a drop in the bucket in the long run to Procer. Cordelia will probably be thrown out of power but Cordelia is the government, not the state. Even if the government changes 10 times, Procer is Procer and it wouldn't be such a big loss to it.

The peasants will breed themselves back – Every aristocrat ever.

frolamiz

On the medium term, perhaps.

But on the short term, it would be disastrous. Procer has been described many times as weakened by the long war between princes, and is barely starting to recover thanks to Hasenbach. The principalities keeping in check the Dead King and the ratlings cannot afford weakening anymore, and their society is already militarized in all its aspects to resist their invasions.

If the crusade fail and Procer lose its armies, it may recover militarily if given some time (and economically after a decade or two), but the Dead King is already on the move, and even if he wasn't, it would be the perfect time to strike. The newly raised armies would be comparable to untrained levies even if they could muster their new army fast enough. Even if they were individuals that had trained (which is unlikely, a farmer's life is harsh enough already without adding training to it), it would be an army of warrior instead of soldiers, and we saw with the battles between Summer and Winter how these go.

And you have to take into account that merely assembling them would take months at the earliest. It's not for nothing that the Arcadia gates are such a logistical advantage in this medieval setting.

SMHF

Akua talking about redemption gives me a bad feeling... For her, this is like a once in an afterlife time opportunity... so that whole redemption talk, is probably her attempt at a story to set herself free!

Which I really really really hope doesn't happen!

Back in the lamp with you, Akua!

Darkadaption

Akua leading the army while pretending to be Cat reaps the benefits of a strong story.

– Villains who have been out of the picture always create a big impact when they return (and this applies both for Akua making her possession play and, "Cat," awakening to lead the army on the third day).

– The deception will then be inevitably discovered leading to a reversal. Where the story backlash for the ploy goes is interesting, my bet is Thief as a Callowan patriot making deals with the Butcher of Liesse. However Akua herself may suffer as both the possessor and Casus Belli for the crusade.

– Nevertheless the reversal will create a desperate enough situation to bring Cat back to save her friends/army.

The overall story when she wakes is going to be:

Cat returns by throwing off possession by her oldest enemy/awakening in her friends' hour of need/in order to turn the tide of a losing battle/that she needs to win in order to defend her homeland against invaders.

That's about 4 separate Named power boosts in the context of the story.

I'm pretty sure that Cat engineered this situation (possession and all) to give herself a near unbeatable amount of narrative weight.

Albatross

On Wednesday I was pretty down about this whole 'lets bring back Akua thing'. But if the redemption thing holds true I actually kinda like it? Idk the fact she went straight for 'hold Hierophant hostage' on waking up doesn't seem like a good sign

Gunslinger

While I despise Akua and hate how her presence means Cat's not going to wake up till Wednesday at the least, I'm quite curious to see how she handles the winter mantle.

Also RIP Saint

Someguy

Thief is going to upgrade into [Thief of Time] to steal away Saint's lifespan? Too bad Archer could not use Unli.ited Blade Works.

Jokes aside. Cathrine should have aimed for the decimation of the Invaders like how Black put down the rebellion. Granted, she has less tools and resources to work with but forcing a "truce" with crowd brainwashers and an enemy pulling a Genghis Gambit due to realpolitik is a bad idea.

grzecho2222

Or maybe her blade.

*benthelynx*

Typo: neither should be none.

"Sappers, mages, knights. Neither of these "

*Barthumphries*

Further typo:

The prince sent for a footman to have it set with the diplomatic correspondence
Change set to sent

Naeddyr

My prediction:

Akua is going to act as a soul-shield. Not just a meat-shield, a soul-shield. The Saint is going to cut the fuck out of her, possibly even kill her, and that's when Cat returns.

Someguy

This is the best idea i've read all day.

BarthHumphries

That is a great suggestion. I'd buy that for a dollar.

nipi

Wonder if Akua will introduce the Crusaders to Cats "white walkers"? Cat hasnt made any it this war if Im not mistaken.

fonti

Am I the only one seeing this love story forming between Cat and Vivienne?

breadknife

I'm onboard this ship as well

tbarim

I think that particular ship is really risky right now.
Catherine is needing a climactic story event to wake up...

Vhostym

I love how all of the Akua hate here has left it so that there are no comments questioning how... fortuitous... it is that she appears now, at the brink of Callow's defeat. Almost as if a hand from below is tipping the scales.

I mean, I get the hate, Akua was always that after the last moment villain that jerks reader's expectations, and we loathe that. In book 1 she was a pretty standard villain who only really started antagonizing Cat after William showed up and took the spotlight. In Book 2 she was a problem on the side after Marchford and until Liesse, and unlike William we missed seeing her get her comeuppance. In Book 3 she was almost forgotten, or at least once again the lesser problem, until after Summer's defeat, and at that point many of us readers were hoping the book would end. That said, this is a pretty cool time for her to show up, even if we all know she's going to betray The Woe and fight them again.

For now though I'm more interested in the parallels between what has happened here and Angelic intervention on the crusader's side. I'm sure that if the Crusade had been pushed to this point, without the Grey Pilgrim's oath, Angels would have intervened to turn the tides. Instead Heaven seems to have been playing its hand more conservatively but consistently throughout the entire battle, with relatively little overt countering from Below. So it's quite interesting to see Akua show up now, considering all of the potential power that Below could levy, it implies a lot about her potential impact here. The one thing that we know is that with Akua, we can expect the heroes to start taking actual casualties (it's been two days now, so both dead heroes have probably been rezzed) like they were supposed to all along.

Metrux

Excuse me? Are you trying to imply the third book was about fae? The book was wholly about Akua, even the fae coming was because of her, and she was more than overexposed there, honestly, I feel like there is nothing more to know about Akua, and this is not good for a character, especially a Villain, since this is the time when you defeat her/him and say goodbye.

grzecho2222

I wonder what Gallowborn and drow that were conscripted are doing.

Also, have we ever got any info how drow compare to elves of Golden Bloom?

Sen

A mistake, Thief. I suspect that 'Flee' was an inappropriately vague instruction. If Akua seeks out our pilgrim friend, she has permission and imperative to leave the battlefield and seek out her own ends.

Anon

Technically no – I believe flee only applies insofar as escaping from the grey pilgrim.

Unless He follows Akua forever, her next order would eventually be to return to the camp/Thief.

RanVor

A Terribilic victory indeed.

Like almost everyone here, I'm tired of Ubua, but her comment on redemption got me thinking, and I came to the conclusion that she still has the potential to be entertaining for a few chapters. Until she inevitably backstabs everyone again, that is.

Also, between this and Court II, I can't believe people still claim the Thief is a Hero.

sengachi

I mean, Akua is basically Hitler. If you decide to inflict serious pain on a leashed Hitler to try to dissuade him from breaking his leash that's not, like, pure in the way that would pass muster for a paladin. But it's also not capital E evil. Heck it's barely a pragmatic lesser evil. Maybe it rates as a sensible but mildly disconcerting measure. Even if you take a vindictive pleasure in it that barely tips the scales at all. Especially if you're part of the group that genocide was committed against.

Thief was barely a Hero in the first place. She never had any kind of selfless motives, just an urge to make the Empire pay for the insult and injury piled on top of her mother's death. She only got to be a Hero by dint of being on a rebellious Callow's side of the narrative. Where she is now? Being a bit casual with the "torture Hitler" button? There's not much moral distance you have to travel from where she was to where she is, if any. Fuck knows William would have done way *waaaaaaay* worse than Thief did to Akua, and he still classified as a Hero. So yeah, I get how people are still calling Thief a Hero. This really doesn't represent any great moral shift in her character, let alone something beyond the limits of what the Heavens are okay with.

RanVor

I'm inclined to disagree. Torturing any person for any reason is a capital E Evil, no matter how horrible their deeds. Them being the tormentors is not an excuse for us becoming the tormentors too.

Although I must admit the scene in question was immensely satisfying.

sengachi

I mean I do generally agree that torture is always a bad thing (as it doesn't actually produce any kind of reliable information or actually change behavior).

But for someone like Thief who believes that torture might actually influence Akua's behavior? Who thinks it has even the slightest chance of reducing her likelihood of slipping the leash? Even if Thief's wrong, I'm not inclined to penalize her too heavily for making the decision.

MetruX

Besides what the other discussion already spoke of all that, in this same chapter, I'd just like to point out Hitler is not nearly close to being the one behind the biggest genocide. Just when Spain came to the Americas they killed more Indians, pacific ones who were trading with them. So, you know, Hitler is horrible and no one will disagree, but people just put him into a reversed pedestal, there are actually much worse than him.

sengachi

Oh yeah, the point in using Hitler as an example isn't "this is actually the worst person in history", but rather "this is the worst person in history that both you and I are likely to know the most about, have a mutual understanding on their awfulness, and be familiar with the consequences of their actions". There's not much point bringing someone up as a "person X is like person Y" example when the person you're talking to might not know much about person Y.

NZPIEFACE

Aqua Sahelian's wonderful ideology of "Winner takes all"

Warriormonk

Ah, Akua seems to be so tightly bound by Cat's contingency plans that this may actually work if Thief is careful enough. I wouldn't mind having Akua around as another treacherous lieutenant other than Larat. It'll keep Cat on her toes, but also a lot of firepower. I don't know how she would explain the butcher of Liesse to the rest of the government or Callow though.

Also, I am really, really happy that we'll get to see the powers of Winter fully unleashed, at least until Akua kills 6000 soldiers. 6000! I mean like, holy shit! Can't wait to see how that goes on Monday 😊

Walter

Akua can't kill Grey Pilgrim, but if Thief is out of command range then I bet anything that among those six thousand are the Princes and Princesses of the Crusader host.

Kallikrates

A tiny detail I don't think we've seen for a while. They are referring to Akua, by her Name. Does that mean she still has the Name? Is the Mantle of Woe also the container/prison of a Named Villain???

MetruX

Yes, she still has her Name. It isn't much clear, but I think Villains don't lose their Name on death. Maybe Heroes neither, since they can be resurrected?

Lucas

So, as the saint said, waking up at the last moment to save your people is not a villain story. Having your pet monster do it is.

Edrey

akua using undeads to attack sumoning devils using the crusaders, breaking the deal with the pilgrim and having angelic intervention is the kind of thing i expect here only with cat awakening and tricking the angel to his death

Tohron

I'm getting a nasty feeling that Akua has a play involving the Absence demon up her sleeve. That thing was brought up too many times to be completely dealt with offscreen.

JJR

I'm thinking, with demons of absence, their very nature means they will only ever be dealt with offscreen.

JJR

You know, if there were one piece of advise I would have given in regards to Akua, well other than get rid of her, it would be DO NOT MISTREAT HER. Thief is risking turning the Narrative in Akua's favor faster than she can say, "What about the city she murdered?" Well, hopefully Cat can pick up the pieces when she get's back in her bodies helm.

Max Scherer

Did anybody mentioned to Akua to NOT use the Demon that is still somewhere. I cant be the only one that sees Akua on the loose with a still unaccounted demon to be a bad idea.

---

Interlude: Kaleidoscope VI

"You can have the throne when I'm done with it, which will be never."

– Dread Emperor Revenant, initiating the First War of the Dead

Rozala had only felt it once before, throughout the whole of her life. That limpid clarity that was perfect understanding, the crystallization of thought and moment into a single flawless shard. She'd been a child, last time, and her mother had kissed her brow before sending her out of the hall. She'd remained alone on the ancient throne of Aequitain, a cup of poison in hand. In that moment, as the oak doors closed behind her, Rozala Malanza had known that she would take Cordelia Hasenbach's head or die trying. Known it in a way deeper than she knew her breath or the flow of her blood, felt that certainty become part of her soul. Now, standing at the centre of a storm of shouting men and bared steel, she learned something else.

She had overestimated her own cleverness.

It was a bitter lesson. She'd learned the ways of war since she'd been a young girl, been taught them so deeply her grasp on the Ebb and the Flow had paid for it. There were perhaps a handful of generals in all of Procer that were finer commanders than her, and all had decades of experience that in time she would come to match. The Iron Prince, she'd fancied, had been the only one who could match her own discernment in matters of battle. And Klaus Papenheim was old, stepping closing to death's threshold every year. As the blue-eyed dead advanced in utter silence, Rozala Malanza realized that the waters of the world were deep and her understanding of them shallow. What had seemed like cleverness days ago might very well cost her this day, this battle, this campaign and perhaps even this crusade.

That the dead would rise was no great surprise. There were reports of the Black Queen having raised them for purpose of war in the past, and though the Army of Callow lacked Wasteland mages it would have been naïve of her to expect complete ignorance of necromancy. And so, even after the Queen of Callow was laid low, Princess Rozala had laid a trap. She'd crafted it carefully, drawing on the knowledge of the Rogue Sorcerer and the Grey Pilgrim. Even if the Black Queen woke, as the Pilgrim had hinted she might should defeat loom tall over the Callowans, Catherine Foundling had limits to the power she could draw. Great workings such as raising a mile of marshlands' worth of dead would exhaust and weaken her. And so, patiently, she had ordered preparations. Rozala had no lack of priests and Chosen, and if there was one truth to be had about water it was that it could be blessed.

It would have been a beautiful counterstroke. The moment the Black Queen invested her power into the dead, heroes and priests would have gathered together to bless it and the touch of holy would have broken both the host of undead and the villain raising them. Two birds taken with the same stone, turning the Enemy's arrogance into just demise. And so when the alarms had rung and the call to battle trumpeted, when she first received report that blue-eyed undead were rising from the marsh to attack the camp she had smiled. She might, after all, have just won the battle. Then the priests and the Chosen sallied out, carving an island of Light by the shore until they could finish their holy blessing, and when the ripple of pale shivered across the surface of the water triumph coursed through her veins.

Until the moment she saw the dead were still advancing, and Rozala Malanza was struck by terrible clarity.

The dead were coming. Thousands of them, leashed to the Black Queen's will. It was possible for her host to successfully defend, even if caught by surprise and still half-asleep. With the Chosen holding the shore until enough soldiers could be assembled, it was possible to weather the storm. Unless the crusaders were forced to defend on two fronts. The Princess of Aquitan swallowed her fear and despair, soothing her mind. It was not yet done. If the Chosen managed to slay the Black Queen, the tide could be turned.

"Gather the men from Orne and Cantal," Princess Rozala barked, her raised voice stilling the chaos. "We are, I believe, about to be attacked by the Army of Callow."

She did not look to the shores, where the Named were gathering. The Pilgrim and the Saint would understand the situation without need for her to send a messenger.

It was as all on their shoulders now.

—

Christophe raised his shield and the undead's blow glanced off the polished silver. The creatures were slow, for all that the Rogue Sorcerer had been astonished by them. The man's insistence that they'd been raised through the pure power of Winter instead of a Damned's fell abilities or even necromancy seemed to make little difference when it came to meeting them on the field. Flicking his wrist, he separated the abomination's head from its body and the corpse dropped to the ground. The blue eyes winked out a moment later and he settled his stance. The wave was at an end, though already more were rising from the tepid waters. The Mirror Knight feared no Evil, yet he disliked the lay of this battle. His fellow Chosen were too few to hold the whole shore, and there were dangers in standing alone against the horde. Kallia had lost an arm to a dead crusader but a half-hour past, the thing clutching at her body until the munitions within detonated. Goblin devilry, the mark of a degenerate breed. The scuttling greenskins were without honour. The Forsworn Healer had reattached the arm and healed the wound, but the Painted Knife had been shaken. He could not blame her. Unlike him, she'd fought the monster up close. Christophe would never forget the sight of the Black Queen laughingly tearing apart an entire band of heroes almost by herself. She'd ripped out their lives like errant weeds, making a game of their struggle. Antoine, his young Alamans brother-in-arms, was still plagued by nightmares from having his arm torn out and tossed in Mansurin's face as a distraction.

Yesterday had been almost worse. Christophe had come within a hair's breadth of death leading the fantassins in their advance, saved only by the intervention of the Regicide. A second time he had felt the Cold Lady's breath on his neck, when the Callowans had plied wicked sorcery and made river where there was once solid ground. He'd been on the wrong side of it, surrounded by the enemy, and prepared for his last stand when death suddenly bloomed in green flames. The impotence of it had been what stung the worst. Men and monsters he could meet sword in hand, but how did one fight fire? Soldiers he'd spilled blood with, comrades under the Heavens, had died screaming while the power he'd been bestowed by Above proved useless to save anyone. He was the Mirror Knight, granted his armaments by the spirits of the Old Lake after he passed their harsh trials. His power was the reflection of Evil against Evil, the conception of the snake biting its own tail. Yet he'd crawled away shamefully from the blazing green, fished out of the waters by a soldier after almost drowning in his flight. The Enemy had failed to scar his body, but the remembrance of that shame would leave mark on his soul until he drew his last breath.

Not all had been so lucky that dishonour was the price exacted. Mansurin's second death had taken him beyond even the Grey Pilgrim's reach.

Christophe chased away the thought and let the light of day wash over him. He drew strength from it, from the Dawn that was one of his aspects. He rose with the morning sun, tiredness and uncertainty leaking out of his body. The Elfin Dames had shaped him in this, granted him the boon that with every dawn his soul would rise – and never retreat. The Mirror Knight had once been a thin and sickly child, but the passing of the years had made him a warrior beyond mortal capacity. It was a slight thing, but every morning saw him a little stronger. A little faster. A little more enduring. Another decade of this, the Regicide had told him, and he would be beyond even her ability to match. Perfect within and without, as the Heavens meant him to be. His strength reaching its peak and a sliver beyond, he waded into the shallow waters and scattered the marching dead. He scythed limbs and shattered skulls, his silver blade breaking steel and the dead flesh beneath. He retreated only when none were left to stand against him, soiled water dripping from his greaves. The whistle caught him by surprise, and he turned so his helm would allow him sight.

"Mirror," the Vagrant Spear said in broken Tolesian. "We gather. Take head of queen."

The Arlesite tongue was not his most fluent, but he had made some study of it during his years defending the convent. Sidonia, as the other Chosen insisted they all call her in private, seemed unruffled by the darkness besieging them. Christophe admired this greatly, as she had been returned from the side of the Gods Above for nary an hour. The Pilgrim's power had breathed life back into her still body so recently, yet she returned to their holy struggle without hesitation. The strength of her resolve was worthy of praise. No all the Grey Pilgrim had returned had been so unflinching in their devotion. There was no trace of daze and confusion in her eyes, only certainty, and the Mirror Knight wrestled with the strange thing that was attraction towards a Levantine. Had his vows not forbidden it... He cleared his throat, cheeks flashing with embarrassment.

"Are we to leave our fellow crusaders to stem the tide alone?" he asked.

She nodded.

"Great Elder say, battle won only when queen dead," she replied. "Strike strong. Avenge dead."

Reluctantly, the Chosen withdrew. Already crusaders were forming in proper ranks behind him, priests mingling amongst them. Holy flames would not burn as bright as they should against these queer undead, but burn they would regardless. It would have to be enough, until the Black Queen was slain. Christophe saluted the brave soldiers with deep respect, and there was a flicker of guilt within when they responded in kind. He knew this was retreat with purpose, but it still felt wrong to leave them to stand alone. He followed Sidonia, who led him surefooted to the gathering of Chosen further down the shore. The Knight was the last summoned, he saw. The others greeted him, grim but resolute. The Saint of Blades stood apart from the rest, lazily carving through undead without even relying on her Name, while the rest of the Chosen clustered around the Grey Pilgrim.

Some he knew by name, others only by Name. Kallia, face painted in a fresh coat of red as she held her twin knives, stood besides young Antoine. The Blade of Mercy had his greatsword propped up on his shoulder, eyes gleaming white as he drew on the Light to slay his fears. The Forsworn Healer had his eyes closed as he mastered the pain of feeling so many deaths bloom around him. The Silent Guardian, tongue forever stilled by her oaths, kept her shield close even with her sword sheathed. Christophe had shared a shameful escape with her, yesterday, and their eyes met with unspoken understanding. Never again. The Myrmidon, garbed in bronze and faith, was sharing quiet words with the Rogue Sorcerer. Often these two kept to themselves, as the Sorcerer was one of the few Chosen that could speak her obscure Free Cities dialect. This was the sum whole of the Chosen of the Heavens in this blighted place. Mansurin and François had been taken by the green fire, never to grace Creation again. Christophe sheathed his blade and formed the wings against his breastplate, commending the souls of the lost to the Gods. They had served unflinchingly to the end, and deserved endless felicity for it on the Other Side.

"Hear me," the Grey Pilgrim said, and a ripple went through all of them.

None dared disobey, when the Peregrine spoke. The Mirror Knight felt a thrum of excitement. When had such a gathering of the Good last taken place? Blessed souls were a rarity in the lands of his birth, and like him often served their purpose in isolation. The Tenth Crusade had gathered them all for greater design, and they would see it through. The Heavens will it.

"We go now to make war on the Black Queen," the old man said. "We were twelve, once, but no longer. Do not forget this. As the Heavens protect us, the Gods Below look well upon her – for she serves their purpose, however unwilling. Victory is not assured, for we now venture in her realm of death and ice."

The elder Levantine smiled sadly at them.

"There is no glory in this," he warned them. "Bards may write songs, one day, and chronicles sing your praises, but this is earthly luster. We march in the spirit of sacrifice, to bring light into the dark. Do not look ahead or behind, only to each other. There is no salvation to be found save at the hands your comrades."

Christophe kept himself from frowning. This was far from the exaltation that he had expected, and suspected they all needed.

"Stand with pride, nonetheless," the Pilgrim softly said. "You came here of your own will, proving yourself worthy of all that was bestowed upon you. Much has been demanded, yet nothing is promised but duty fulfilled. Stand proud, children. We are the torch taken into the night, and though our flame is passing today we burn bright."

The Mirror Knight shivered. He felt it, just like the others. The eyes of the Heavens on them. That sacred thing that made them who they were. The trance was broken by a cleared throat, to his vexation.

"All right, kids," the Saint of Swords said, idly decapitating another undead. "We're going after the tiger in her own lair, so expect this fight to be a notch above anything you've been in before. This is the third dawn, and she's fresh returned: she will be at her peak and out for blood. Guardian, you're to cover Forsworn against anything she tosses out."

The silent woman nodded, edging closer to the healer.

"Myrmidon, you're sticking by Rogue," the Saint added. "If she hits you, buy him time to retreat and hold her in place until we can flank."

The old woman looked upon the rest of them with a hard smile.

"Knife, Vagrant and Blade," she said. "You're our knife. Stay out of it until Tariq gives the signal. As for you, Mirror..."

The old woman's grin had Christophe uneasy, though the light of dawn pushed the failing away soon enough.

"You're with me," she said. "We're claiming the first dance."

The Chosen nodded gravely. If he could save the lives of others by enduring pain, there was no real choice to be made. His power had granted him the ability to withstand much.

"Steel yourselves," the Grey Pilgrim said. "It begins."

The old man struck the ground with his staff, and the marsh parted.

Standing tall, the Chosen advanced.

—

Kallia's heart grew steadier the longer they walked. The Painted Knife adjusted her stride so would not leave the shorter Vagrant Spear behind, silently hinting the Blade of Mercy should follow suit. The boy was taller than either of them, regardless of his youth. He'd have to be, to lug around that chunk of steel he called a weapon.

"There will be honour to be found today, strife-sister," Sidonia murmured in Lunara when she caught up. "Worthy strife to offer the Blood."

Kallia almost rolled her eyes. Alavans. The hill people were a ferocious lot, but they did clutch the old traditions a little too tightly for her tastes. She was from Levante, herself, which was a true great city instead of a remote valley of orchards and cattle fences. No one could deny the people of Alava were great warriors – their city was the home of the Champion's Blood, after all – but Sidonia wasn't someone she'd ever be able to discuss the latest songs from faraway Smyrna with, or even the latest couplets from the Hidden Poets of the old city. Still, she found her mood lifted by her fellow Levantine's eagerness. In times of strife, it was heartening to remember the old ways.

"I'm not of any of the lines, Sidonia," she reminded her comrade. "Either greater or lesser."

The records of the Holy Seljun had shown that there had once been a Knife of Night a century past, who shared purpose with her, yet the man had never had children and so had spawned no lesser line to be added to the families of the Blood. Should Kallia ever have children of her own her line would be added to the rolls, but she had never been hungry for that honour. Only the greater lines won more than empty titles and emptier privileges from being recognized, as was only fitting for the descendants – in Blood or Bestowal – of the five heroes that had founded the Dominion.

“We Spears have timid boasts,” the other woman shrugged. “It will be good, to add this strife to our histories. We stand too deep in the shadow of the Champion lines.”

Not so deep, Kallia thought, now that Mansurin had been felled. He’d been born to the thinnest of the lesser Champion lines, but he had been descendent in Blood. His death was worthy of grief, but not unexpected. The descendants of the most fruitful of the founders of Levant were many and often Bestowed, but were known to die as often as they were empowered. None of those lines had ever learned fear, or the virtues of retreat in the face of the Enemy. The Painted Knife still felt awe at the remembrance of her meeting with the Valiant Champion, months ago. The woman was no descendant in Blood, but she had inherited the full Bestowal of her line’s founder. This was a rare thing, considered omen of great strife. Not, Kallia thought, that there was not even greater rarity ahead. Her eyes lingered on the crooked shoulders of the Grey Pilgrim as her hand unconsciously reached for the pouch of red paint at her side. She’d almost drawn the Mark of Mercy out of habit. And, she would admit to herself, wonder. The Great Elder was full inheritor in Blood and Bestowal of the ancient Grey Pilgrim that had been the first Seljun of Levant. Royalty beyond royalty, no matter what lesser kin now held the earthly title in Levante. More than that, he’d saved her life. Years ago, when that Spirit of Vengeance –

“Eyes ahead,” the Blade of Mercy spoke in Chantant. “We are nearing.”

Kallia’s mastery of the Proceran tongue was better than Sidonia’s, but both understood him perfectly. Her instinct was to move closer to the boy, stand shoulder-to-shoulder against the threat, but she could not – he needed room, to swing around that greatsword of his. The Painted Knife flicked a careful glance at the walls of water flanking them on both sides. After the Saint of Swords dispatched the first few undead to wander out effortlessly, the probing assaults had ceased. Their march had been unhindered; the path of mud they strode across leading to a tall glacier ahead. The Levantine stared at the mass of ice, still unused to the sight. These lands were strange ones. She had never seen snow nor ice before crossing the Stairway and glimpsing the tall peaks of the Parish, but now she had seen too much of it for her tastes. All the Bestowed grew tense when the enemy came within sight, save for the Great Elder and the Saint. It settled Kallia's nerves some to see them so calm. They were a mighty pair, no lesser than the foe ahead. The Black Queen, she saw, was patiently awaiting them.

The Painted Knife's fingers clenched around the hilt of her blades when she took in the full sight. The glacier had been turned into a blasphemous challenge to the Heavens, sculpted by eldritch power to nestle a great throne upon which the Enemy was seated. No, not seated. She was lounging, almost mockingly, with a long dragonbone pipe in hand. The Black Queen blew out a stream of smoke, eyeing them nonchalantly. The Bestowed slowed, spreading out as the Saint had ordered. Kallia felt Sidonia let out a delighted breath.

"Now that," the Vagrant Spear murmured, making the Mark of Valor with shaking fingers, "is a worthy foe. Honoured Gods, a thousand singing praises for offering a great struggle to this humble one. Blood spilled on these holy grounds I dedicate to your name, my unworthy life placed on the scales of your judgement."

Naturally, the Alavans was excited by the sight of this. She should have known better than to expect wariness from a Heavens-maddened lover of war. The Blade of Mercy glanced at them.

"Prayer," Kallia explained in Chantant.

The boy looked approving. It was probably for the best he did not know about Levantine battle prayers. Whatever chatter had bloomed was whisked out then the Great Elder strode to the forefront, passing even the Saint of the Blades and the Mirror Knight.

"Child," he said, tone appalled. "What have you done to yourself?"

Sidonia shuffled impatiently. She did not know Lower Miezan, and so had no understanding of the conversation taking place.

"What needed to be done," the Black Queen calmly replied. "My side doesn't get to walk away clean, Pilgrim. I see you've been tossing around resurrections like they're godsdamned solstice treats, too. Charming. Not going to have any long-term ramifications at all."

The monster paused, then leaned forward.

"Did that register as a lie?" she grinned. "It didn't, did it? Have a good think about that one next time you try to sleep, Pilgrim."

"Surrender," the Great Elder said. "Abdicate. It is not too late."

"You missing the part where I'm currently winning the battle?" the Black Queen drawled. "Hells, it's not too late for you either. Terms were offered and they hold. Take your army and go home. This doesn't need to turn into a Named pissing contest."

"You would argue this, after slaying thousands?" the Pilgrim asked.

"I feel like we might need to revisit the concept of foreign invasion," the villain noted. "Specifically the part where it has fucking consequences. Like, you know, people dying. You'd think that one would be a given, but apparently you're slow learners. Wahwah, my attempt to conquer a – sort of – sovereign nation wasn't met with flowers and a godsdamned parade. It's almost like we're not happy about the whole thing. Go figure."

"And you think your reign a better alternative?" the Grey Pilgrim asked calmly.

"Hells, Pilgrim, I was born to rule," the Black Queen replied with a toothy grin. "But I'll settle for getting you fucks out of my backyard, this once. Any takers?"

The monster's gaze swept across the crowd of Bestowed as she idly emptied her pipe and put it away within her cloak. The only answer was Light blooming and weapons raised.

"Ah, well," the Black Queen mused. "Pissing contest it is, then."

—

If Akua had always known heroism was this entertaining, she would have begun dabbling years ago. A hook of Light lashed out at her as the healer Named shaped the heavenly power and tore through her throne, but she'd already been moving when the working had just begun. Landing in a crouch atop her glacier, she unsheathed her sword and tapped it pensively against her armoured leg. It was unfortunate that the deception required her to remain in dearest Catherine's garments, as they were admittedly horrid, but needs must. The body was wonderfully responsive, and though without the Gift the mantle allowed her powers not fundamentally different. Tainted with Winter, perhaps, but that was no great trouble for her. Her angry little overlord had, as usual, allowed herself to fear her own power to such extent it crippled her when instead she should have been learning to master the influence. One never quite escaped one's origins, it seemed. A shame Catherine was disinclined to take lessons from her in such matters.

Akua Sahelian was no stranger to otherworldly influences, and so she embraced Winter eagerly.

The mantle howled through her veins, and eyeing the healer and his grim little sentinel she flicked her wrist. Her glacial throne, a useful mass of ice she had chosen as her seat for purposes both practical and theatrical, twisted sharply and speared forward. The Saint of Swords shattered it within a heartbeat, sword clearing the scabbard, but Akua was unmoved. Ice remained ice, even when broken to pieces. An exertion of will transmuted the shards into cold mist and it fell over the pair of heroes like a blanket. Beneath her a man with a mirror-like shield was climbing the glacier with unseemly haste. And was that sorcery she felt? What familiar taste. A pilum of concentrated yellow flame tore towards her, and she raised a contemptuous eyebrow. The Half-Hornet, truly? How provincial. No one she knew would be caught dead using that in a serious battle.

She leapt down, feet landing on the climbing hero's head, and measured the angle so the only corrective action the spell formula allowed for would fall well short of her. The sorcery hit the glacier with a thunderous crash, splitting it in two. Ugh, he'd even overcharged it. It was like watching a grown woman improperly dose last season's poison. Movement flicked at the edge of her vision and Akua's boot came down to smash the helmet beneath her, forcing the hero down and allowing her to avoid the Saint's blow by less than an inch. The tips of Catherine's pathetically unadorned crown were shaved cleanly off. The sorceress threw herself to the side, sliding down the falling glacier as streaks of light further shattered what had been a very tasteful throne, in her opinion. A piece of the crown fell at her side, and once more Akua mourned Catherine had not even been willing to add some sapphires to it. They were only moderately costly to import through Mercantis, and they would have fit a Queen of Winter perfectly. A triad of heroes, two of them Levantines by the skin tone, charged towards her as she caught her footing at the edge of the slope. The pair still shrouded in mist, she noted, were beginning to disperse it.

That just wouldn't do.

Akua flicked her wrist and turned the mist they'd inhaled to ice again, clogging up their throats and lungs. Transmutation, she noted approvingly, came particularly easy to the mantle. Likely a consequence of the ever-fluid nature of the fae, or that these waters had come from Arcadia in the first place. The triad closed in, an inexplicably barefoot woman serving as the tip of the wedge.

"Glory in strife," the beggar screamed out in Lunara.

Did Catherine know any Levantine tongues? Most likely not. Still, a responding battle cry was in order. It was the heroic thing to do. Something about Callow? Akua pondered her understanding of Catherine's temper. I am angry, the sorceress decided, because I am disappointed as I have mystifyingly failed to grasp that the Heavens prefer their pawns powerful yet rather dim. I must now protect the venerable sanctity of farms and countless peasants everywhere, as I am very concerned with their fate even though they are ignorant and full of lice.

"Fuck off and die," Akua called back, tinting her voice with wrath.

There. Crass more than witty, but Catherine did tend to walk that line. Entirely disinclined to engage three Heavens-empowered hardened killers with only a sword and dubious moral grounds in hand, she retreated into the waters and let them envelop her fully. Breathing was not necessary to this body, after all, and she could feel her foes where eyesight failed. She took a moment to touch the marching dead with her mind, noting with approval that though after the heroes claimed her attention she'd only succeeded in making them mindlessly advance and attack, they were bleeding the crusaders. Slowly but surely. She'd been rather displeased at the haste the enemy approached her with, as she'd been amusing herself by redeploying Catherine's old goblin tricks against fresh opposition. A heartbeat later, the water surrounding her blew away as the Saint's blow forced the marsh to recede.

"There you are," the unseemly old woman grinned.

"Dodge," Akua replied with a friendly smile, greatly enjoying herself.

Two massive blocks of ice formed into the waters on each side, their mass smashing forward and sending the tide hurtling back towards both of them. The wicked enemy of all things Callowan blinked in surprise, but alas it was not to be. Starlight stolen and made a streak cut towards the sorceress, evaporating the water and prompting a frown. This was not mere heavenly lightshow: it was the principle of untainted radiance directly from firmament, made into a weapon. Such a thing could be interrupted by workings, but it would take nothing less than a miracle to usurp or reshape it. Fortunately, she was not without answer. The gate opened before her, a perfect circle pressing back the fabric of Creation, and Akua carefully threaded the needle. Difficult, on such short notice, yet not impossible to a practitioner of her skill. Orienting the gate properly, she wove will into forming the corresponding exit behind the trifling Proceran who'd tried to hit her with childish sorcery. The radiance hit him in the back before he could react, though to Akua's displeasure it did no harm. The Pilgrim could control his working to a truly despicable extent. Tying off the two gates so she could not be made to suffer the backlash of their breaking, the sorceress condensed a platform of ice to leap off of before the Saint could bisect her.

She landed smoothly atop the water on a foothold of ice, moving towards the flank of the assembled heroes before the old cutter could catch up with her. The enemy seemed puzzled, she saw, by her refusal to engage them on their own terms. Had Catherine truly traded blows with them up close? The sorcerers almost wrinkled her nose. Waving about swords was the business of people who failed to murder demigods for power. Perhaps it was time to make that exceedingly clear to the opposition. Winter burning gloriously through her frame, Akua Sahelian shaped the full power of the mantle. Half a mile of marshlands turned to ice as she remained standing on an elegant pillar, the surrounding waters disappearing as they froze and gathered into a monumental ball of frost hovering over the heroes. The Saint was running on now solid ground, sword flashing to carve a groove through both Creation and the pillar, but the sorceress merely cocked an eyebrow. Even severed, the upper part of the pillar remained unmoving in the air. Fire and starlight shattered the mass of ice, but the heroes were gravely mistaken if they thought this was a mere foot to stomp on them with. A flick of the wrist had the ice transmuting back into water and falling into a shower over the Named.

Another flick had it freezing again, and they were buried in falling ice.

"Come now," Akua said. "This is as obvious an opening as you'll get."

The Saint of Swords was a wizened old killer, with an impressive reputation. She was not, however, invincible. Even as she turned around in an instinctive parry, the old woman took the arrow in the shoulder as the Archer finally made her presence known. The sorceress felt the trembling heat of the wounded heroine, and Winter demanded her screaming death. She clicked her tongue against the roof of her mind, will lashing out to take the mantle by the throat and choke it. The urges receded ever so slightly. More dangerous than she'd believed, this influence. The principle alienation was similar in nature to the bleed from binding an ancient devil, but unlike the latter it did not recede after the moment of binding. Akua leapt down from the pillar, power lashing out to smash both broken halves on the Saint. The heroine flickered with Light and it pulsed in a perfect ring around her. Aspect, the sorceress decided. Weak enough it could likely be used more than once, which would be difficult to deal with. No matter, there were more tempting prey. Akua felt mild revulsion at the term her thought had ended by, to her surprise.

She did not have the time to linger on the matter, as the heroes had escaped her little greeting gift. Light broke through the ice, once, twice, and then in an eruption of steam the entire structure vanished. The second-rate wizard's doing, she suspected. For a heartbeat she mused leaving the battle entirely, going to lead the dead personally, but found she could not. It would mean leaving Archer on her own, something she could not accept. The notion displeased her, even. The sorceress' brow creased. This was not coincidence. She could feel her mind even struggling to consider the subject, which was telling. Feeling the Saint pivot to cut through a second arrow, Akua moved towards the other heroes as she fought the influence.

"Oh," she murmured to herself after a moment. "My dear, that is exquisitely done."

The sorceress had slipped her bindings by snatching an errant piece of Winter and making it her own. Through it she'd opened a path to the greater mantle that she'd eventually managed to crawl through, entirely so when she found no opposition awaiting. In her current state, it would be impossible for her to claim this body if Catherine disallowed it. The discrepancy in will and power was overwhelming. Yet using the sliver of Winter, Akua had succeeded in stabilizing the construct she now inhabited and claiming use of the full mantle – which she'd drawn on, this entire fight. The path going both ways, the mantle itself was now influencing her. Which had seemed a minor concern, until she realized that Catherine Foundling had bound her very soul into its fabric. The more Akua drew on the mantle, the more she called back the body's true owner. I had wondered, as to why you never had Hierophant lay deeper bindings on me, the sorceress thought. It never truly mattered, did it? You left yourself a backdoor. She could not help but approve. Perhaps some mundane sorts would have been horrified, but Akua had first ripped out her own soul to use as a tool as the tender age of thirteen. Ruthlessness turned against yourself could be a very useful tool, if properly employed. In matters of self-mutilation for the sake of advancement, she must admit Catherine Foundling had few rivals. Eyeing the spreading steam, Akua made a decision. Struggling against this was pointless, and might be taken as treachery she did not intend.

"Let it not be said, my Empress, that I did not offer service leal and true," Akua Sahelian mused.

She called on Winter again, the fullness of the mantle, and kept digging deeper until her vision blurred. Her reward did not take long to be delivered.

Back into the box, Diabolist.

Darkness came, yet Akua smiled.

A useful tool, after all, was never allowed to rest for long.

---

Sir_Immith

Akua is my favorite character.

There, I said it.

burguulkodar

I'm quite puzzled why Adjutant was never around in this fight...

Also Archer could have killed off some heroes at distance with her shooting-a-mile-away-headshot, but never even try.

Archer+Catherine against 10 heroes seems stupid, but maybe Thief will help somehow. Hierophant not being there to counter magic will really be dire, though. I don't quite see how they will win this.

greatwyrmgold

I thought Adjutant was still at the other end of Callow.

Jeffery Wells

He's on his way back, but will be a while – months possibly – before he arrives. There is an interlude between him and the leader of the Regals that was a little confusing, because said leader is the head of Callow's knights and fighting in this battle. It never explicitly stated it but the meeting clearly happened before Adjutant went South.

General Chaos

That wasn't an interlude, it was an extra chapter. It happened between books 3 and 4.

rook37

The contrast between the heroes' and Akua's perceptions of the "tasteful" throne is one of the funniest jokes yet haha

Onos

Yes, someone on the Villians team going for the instant-kill headshot against a dozen heroes is sure to be a great plan. Definitely not the kind of thing Providence would mess with at all.

greatwyrmgold

Akua's caricature of Catherine was quite entertaining, but her inner monologue was even better. A true villain in the throes of quasiheroic bliss? Now there's a treat!

aran

Akua pondered her understanding of Catherine's temper. I am angry, the sorceress decided, because I am disappointed as I have mystifyingly failed to grasp that the Heavens prefer their pawns powerful yet rather dim. I must now protect the venerable sanctity of farms and countless peasants everywhere, as I am very concerned with their fate even though they are ignorant and full of lice.

This is still one of my favorite parts.

Aaradur

Dread Emperor Treacherous is mine

Giraffee

I'm sorry if this sounds like I hate the story, but 5 interlude chapters in a row AND a bonus chapter was too much for me. Ended up skimming through V and VI

Onos

Nobody's forcing you to read the story chief, if you want to miss some of the best foreshadowing in the Guide that's your call. I don't think passive-aggressive criticism of the story structure will really stick either since we're like three books further on at this point.

Bart_KF

"Glory in strife," the beggar screamed out in Lunara.

Did Catherine know any Levantine tongues? Most likely not. Still, a responding Battle Cry was in order. It was the heroic thing to do. Something about Callow? Akua pondered her understanding of Catherine's temper. I am angry, the sorceress decided, because I am disappointed as I have mystifyingly failed to grasp that the Heavens prefer their pawns powerful yet rather dim. I must now protect the venerable sanctity of farms and countless peasants everywhere, as I am very concerned with their fate even though they are ignorant and full of lice.

I had to stop reading, laugh uproariously, and immediately post this comment. Holy shit. What a swerve.

skairunner

Damn, Akua has a very very twisted mindset. I think she might actually care a little about Catherine right now

---

Chapter 17: Contingent

"Peace is little more than the recognition that the reasons for which war was undertaken are no longer relevant."

– Dread Emperor Benevolent the First

I came back to myself with a roiling sea of Winter at my fingertips.

Fucking Hells, Akua. The trap I'd set that ultimately brought me back had required that the Diabolist or another entity to essentially go mad with power for it to work in the first place, but this was still beyond my predictions. Even with oaths binding her and Vivienne holding a leash, what I saw beneath me was a dark reminder of the quantity of power that could be thrown around without breaking the letter of the limitations I'd imposed. Half of the lake I'd dumped over the head of the crusaders with Masego's help had apparently been used to smash the heroes, though I saw no corpses to show for the effort. Not that one of those would necessarily mean the end of it, with the Pilgrim around. Five contingencies, and this had been the one to work. I could not help but be pissed that even after all that planning in the end it'd come down to Akua making a mistake, however baited that mistake had been. Hierophant was nowhere in sight, so he was probably incapacitated. That was one down. Thief's secret set of oaths must not have been sufficient to call me back from that... unpleasant journey, which made two. I'd not woken up to a sword through my back, so Larat hadn't worked out either – but then that had always been the chanciest of the five. The oath forced on the fae had been comprehensive, but with that sort of creature it was hard to make one completely water-tight. He'd failed, either on purpose or not. I'd have to get the details out of him, but regardless that made three.

As for the last trick, well, it had very specific requirements. I wasn't surprised it hadn't gotten me out, though I'd need to have Hierophant take a look at the overlay as soon as possible. We were pretty sure it wouldn't kill me if it triggered by accident, but there were always risks in turning yourself into living munitions.

I held the power in check, barely, as my gaze swept the battlefield. Ten heroes, looking ragged but unbowed. The Saint had taken an arrow, which meant Indrani was up and about. A relief, that. The rest were clustered together, protecting the Pilgrim and the wizard I'd scrapped with that one time. The thousand little bundles in the back of my mind made it clear Akua had indulged in a spot of necromancy, which brought mixed feelings. For all that Masego insisted there was nothing inherently bad about that kind of sorcery, after Second Liesse I had my doubts. Maybe there were applications that weren't inherently horrid, but no one seemed to be actually using those. On the other hand, if the undead were getting chopped up that meant fewer of my soldiers were dying. I could appreciate the results, even if the means had me more than a little uncomfortable. I'd take a closer look at those later. For now, I was juggling the difficulty of maintaining the ice beneath my feet that kept me on the surface of this eerie marsh while simultaneously trying not to blow up either myself or my surroundings with the power Diabolist had drawn. My grip was beginning to slip, so action was in order. Senses no mortal could have were in full extension, telling me of the humidity in the air and the spread of both water and ice in my surroundings.

I dumped the power into the water beneath me, flash-freezing it with a loud snap as I continued spreading and shaping the working. The glacier formed at a mind-boggling pace, water rippling around it, and I closed my eyes to focus. Getting the paddles of the waterwheel all the same size was difficult, though it grew easier the more power I shed. I could have made it larger, not that it wasn't already massive, but just a structure of ice wasn't what I had in mind. Fingers clenching, I severed the platform I stood on from the wheel and lashed out with my will. Slowly, the wheel began to turn. The waters churned. I continued dumping power into the movement, accelerating it, and the tide of soiled water raged towards the heroes with a roar. Fuck it, I thought, and tossed the wheel at them too. We were past subtlety at this point. Eyes flicking towards the Saint, I sighed as she carved herself a path above the current and stood atop the arc. That'd been too much to hope for, I supposed. An arrow whistled at her and I took advantage of the opening Archer had just gifted me to move further away as I riffled through the bundles in the back of my mind until I could find Zombie. Good girl that she was, she'd been waiting on the edge of the marshlands. She seemed pleased by my summons, taking flight with haste.

I wasn't sure what Akua's plan had been but it hardly mattered. While it looked like she might have been getting the better of the fight with the heroes, fighting them at all was a mistake as far as I was concerned. Even if I killed a few they'd still get me in the end. In the distance I heard a gargantuan crack as the ice wheel fractured into pieces merrily carried by the currents, heroes having climbed atop them. That, as it happened, was an opening I'd left on purpose. I drew on Winter, feeling it whisper lovingly in my ears, and shattered the wheel shards. That dumped the heroes back into the water, though the fucking wizard made some kind of ring of fire that evaporated a safe place for them to gather and regroup. Saint was back on the offensive, making her way to me, but I wasn't having any of that. Zombie made a low pass and I leapt atop her saddle, fingers slipping into her mane to anchor me while I got my feet in the stirrups. We went high after that, the undead horse's wings beating hard as we ascended. My cloak was wet, I only then noticed. Like I'd been swimming. What the fuck had Akua been up to? No, not the time. By the height of the sun it was morning still, and promising to be a warm day. Not a cloud in sight. My mount gliding slowly, I took a look at the broader situation unfolding across the field.

The undead were shambling forward into a defensive Proceran line near what must have been a shore, before most the water in the marsh was used as ammunition in the Named brawl below me. The dead were not making an impressive showing. They seemed to have some semblance of intelligence, but there was no real coordination. They went in waves and shattered on the formations of fantassins and the priests accompanying them. Still, casualties were slowly mounting. I suspected the first few waves must have been wiped almost without losses, but now the crusaders were tiring and beginning to make mistakes. There was, to my surprise, another front to the battle. The Army of Callow was out in force, though there were a lot fewer of them than I'd expected. Had Juniper left men to guard the camp? Regardless, if she was leading this engagement she was being rather conservative in her command. Mages on both sides were trading spells at a pace, but aside from a long shield wall of regulars pressing against crusader lines there was no other real fighting going on. She's not fighting to win, I thought, frowning as I watched the Order of the Broken Bell manoeuvre on the flank to draw away enemy cavalry without ever engaging. She's delaying and tying down men while incurring as few casualties as possible.

That was unlike the Hellhound, who tended to go for the throat whenever she could. Which meant she was relying on the dead to do the heavy lifting – and by extension had relied on Akua. That was a desperate measure if I'd ever seen one. The situation must be worse than it looked on the surface. The moment the front holding back the dead collapsed the battle was good as won, barring heroic intervention, but at the current pace that might take hours. My brow tightened as I scanned the battlefield for any hint of the Wild Hunt's presence, but they were nowhere in sight. Had the fae sat on their asses the entire time I'd been gone? Fuck. It was a solid assumption there'd been a battle while I was gone, and without the fae the Army of Callow would have been fighting Named with only Legion mages to back them up, while the enemy had wizards and priests both. It must have been a fucking slaughter. Were the men I saw below all that was left of our host? There were what, maybe thirteen or fourteen thousand there?

The Procerans looked like they'd taken a beating too, lost at least another few thousand since I'd dropped the lake on them, but Malanza could afford those losses a lot more than we could. She was throwing away levies and fantassins, not professional soldiers.

While I'd been taking my look around, the heroes had gotten their shit together. A beam of radiant light – fucking Pilgrim – tore up towards me, followed by a swarm of little balls of flame that looked liquid. I led Zombie into a deep dive to shake the projectiles. Archer could take care of herself, I decided. She was probably half a mile away and picking her targets carefully, in no danger of being swarmed by the enemy. Just in case I wove a glamour into large streaks of yellow and red indicating she should disengage even as I spurred Zombie to head towards the shore battle line. I whistled loudly as my mount's hooves swept just above the water. It was not long before I had my answer. Loyal dogs that they were, the Wild Hunt came as summoned. There was an eldritch glimmer on the surface of the water at my side before Larat came riding out in full armour, sword in hand and grinning broadly. Even as his horse kept pace with mine, the rest of the Hunt emerged in our wake.

"Your Majesty," the one-eyed fae greeted me. "Was your journey a fruitful one?"

"We're going to have a talk about that, you little weasel," I darkly said. "But it'll have to wait. I have work for the lot of you."

"We await your will eagerly," the raven-haired man replied.

"Ignore the heroes unless they attack you," I ordered. "See those Proceran formations ahead?"

My sword helpfully pointed out the Proceran defensive line.

"Their fear and desperation wafts most pleasantly to my nostrils," Larat informed me.

They did to mine as well, and Winter grew hungry for the banquet, but I forced myself to focus.

"Break them," I said. "Killing's not the objective, the Hunt is to concentrate on shattering their lines."

"Tasteless meat," the one-eye fae complained.

"That sounds like the talk of a man hungry for fingers," I noted very mildly.

The bastard laughed.

"Your will be done, Sovereign of Moonless Nights," he smiled.

"It better, for your sake," I smiled back cheerfully. "Because you seem to have fucked around in my absence, and we're going to have a nice chat about that."

I didn't even allow him to respond, pulling Zombie up and willing one of her wing beats to splash water in his face. Let him try to look all elegant and sinister with muck everywhere. I absently tugged on the reins to lead my mount towards the crusaders, but my mind was elsewhere. I needed to keep the heroes busy for a while, there was no telling what they'd get up to unattended. I reached for the dead, grimacing after a moment. Ordering them one by one would take too long. I thinned my will and cast it broadly, grabbing a rough thousand still roving around. Pain spiked through my forehead. Too much feedback. I grit my teeth and ordered them to assault the heroes before withdrawing my will. They weren't going to win that fight – a band of tired and encircled heroes fighting back to back against a relentless tide of undead? It had victory written all over it – but it should keep them out of my hair for a while. I tasted the warmth of the enemy Named, trying to get a sense of their readiness, and my fingers clenched. There should be ten. There were only eight. Where had they – no, it wasn't even worth asking. They would be at the very worst possible place for me.

Guarding Rozala Malanza.

I allowed myself a moment to contemplate the unpleasantness that was fighting people both stronger than me and certain to be where I least wanted them to be before pressing down against Zombie's back. She neighed and angled for descent as we flew towards the back of the Proceran lines. A handful of archers loosed arrows upwards, but I was too far and too swift for them to have any real chance of hitting me. Unfortunately, mages were bullshit and evidently I was both recognizable and a favoured target. Panes of opaque yellow force formed around me in an airtight box, but they were in above their heads this time. When it came to power, pound for pound, there were only a few people in Calernia who could beat me if I put my back into it. A lance of ice and shade formed around my hand and Zombie dove down. There was a heartbeat of resistance when the tip of the lance met the sorcery, then they both shattered and we flew through as my cloak trailed behind me. With a target painted on us so blatantly, it was no surprise I had to lead Zombie into a desperate roll to avoid being incinerated by a beam of light. It caught the edge of my cloak, leaving it singed and smoking. Fucking Pilgrim. It was supposed to be resistant to magic, wasn't it?

He was down there, as I'd suspected. Leaning on his staff, the Saint of Swords by his side and waiting patiently for me to gain enough momentum I wouldn't be able to pull out of the dive when she struck. Malanza was behind them, and as the air whistled around me I got a glimpse of her face. Fear, yes, but much more anger. I had to respect that she remained on her horse and unmoving even as my descent quickened. Her officers were not so brave, scattering to the winds. I'd have to play this one precisely, if I wanted to avoid getting skewered in the process of landing. Fortunately, I was spending increasingly large amounts of my life either falling from things or being thrown off of them. I'd become a fair hand at it. I drew on Winter and shaped it, tossing ahead of me a spear of mist that detonated into a cloud. Throwing myself off Zombie, I ordered her to peel off even as my relationship with gravity took a sharp turn downwards. This, I mused, had seemed a better idea before I'd gone through with it. The timing held. A cut dispersed the mist, missing Zombie by a mere inch. Then the Saint struck again and I cursed.

I threw ice at the cut, saving my hide just long enough for my feet to land on wet earth. Mud sucked at my boots and both my knees snapped, but they were reforming before I even stood. The Saint of Swords was lazily advancing, the Pilgrim pointed his staff and Malanza looked like she really wanted to be pretty much anywhere else.

"Truce," I called out. "I'm here to talk."

"I'm not seeing a banner," the Saint noted.

Really? She was such a godsdamned asshole. I flicked my fingers and wove one out of glamour, but she pointedly did not look at it.

"I don't want to fight you," I insisted.

"So don't," she suggested. "Angle your neck a little to the side, it'll be a cleaner cut."

She was closing distance, which I knew from experience would result in my getting chopped up painfully and repeatedly.

"Pilgrim," I tried, looking behind her. "This can end right now."

"Gods forgive me," the old man said. "But you are right. It will."

"The battle is lost," I said. "Your lines by the shore are collapsing as we speak. Even if you force me to flee, none of that changes."

"Armies are armies," the Saint shrugged. "Named are Named. More than one way to win a war."

One step away from striking range, now. And the moment she got there we entered the wheel of pain, where every spoke was me losing a limb and trying very hard not to scream. The bundle of instincts that were not my own was licking its chops, hungry for the fight. To crush my enemies and savour their screams. The rest insisted I make some distance, because this was about to get ugly. I unsheathed my sword. This isn't going to work, I thought, but I had to try anyway. My fingers came loose and I dropped the blade.

"Unarmed," I said. "Under truce banner."

"You're a weapon unto yourself," the Saint of Swords snorted, and stepped forward.

From the corner of my eye I saw implacable light bloom at the tip of the Grey Pilgrim's staff. If I got hit by that, I suspected the consequences would be much more unpleasant than a sword wound. Nothing friendly felt the way that power did.

"Stop."

I'd been reaching for Winter, but stayed my hand. That was not the Pilgrim's voice, and certainly not the Saint's. Rozala Malanza took off her helmet, sweat-soaked curls falling across her face.

"You want to talk, Black Queen," she said. "So talk."

"You fucking yellow-bellied-" the Saint began.

"I am the ranking general of this army, Regicide," the Princess of Aquitan coldly replied. "I take no orders from you. Slay me or stay your tongue."

By the looks of her, the heroine was feeling inclined towards the second. The light winked out on the Pilgrim's staff.

"Laurence," he said. "She cannot easily retreat. If talks fail, we will strike."

That wasn't how fucking truce talks were supposed to work, but then I'd not exactly respected the usual etiquette either. Disinclined as I was to give them a full pass, I would at least recognize they had some wiggling room when it came interpretation. The heroes were a distraction here, I decided. The one who mattered was the princess watching me with hard eyes.

"Battle's over, Malanza," I said. "Let's end it before any more people die pointlessly."

"I was assured you could not open your deathly gate again without the Hierophant," the Proceran said flatly. "He is not here. The battle is not yet lost."

"So maybe you wreck my army," I said. "Even if you manage that, yours gets wrecked in the process as well. And you can be sure enough of my people survive to run that we can defend Hedges against what you have left. Logistically, you're done. You don't have the supplies or the men for a successful offensive into Callow."

"If we take your supplies-"she began.

"Not happening. I gave standing orders to burn what we can't carry, if we lose," I interrupted brusquely.

Her eyes flicked to the Pilgrim, and reluctantly the old man nodded. The Saint's already grim expression darkened further.

"I will not surrender to the likes of you," the princess snarled.

My fingers clenched.

"Gods Below, what will it take?" I hissed. "Do I have to murder ever last Proceran on this field before negotiations can be had? Are you really so unwilling to consider not invading you'll let dozens of thousands starve?"

"Your doing," Malanza hissed back. "You steal our supplies, harass us and then claim affront at our desperation? You are the architect of this madness, Catherine Foundling."

Winter whispered in my ear, urging me to rip apart the righteous little shit who had the gall to pretend she was the victim here while leading a fucking invasion army. My fingers dug into my palm until steel gave and flesh beneath it, blood dripping on the ground. The Saint's stance shifted ever so slightly. Breathe in, breathe out. Pride was a liability. Anger an unhelpful bias. Be cold, I told myself. Be clear. Be a creature of logic, because logic is what gets you through this. Everything else is distracting noise. I thought of pale green eyes, and lessons I had not yet outgrown.

"Then do not surrender," I said calmly. "Sound a withdrawal. My side will do the same. We can discuss terms for your retreat from Callow when our people aren't dying."

"And allow hunger to do your work for you?" the princess retorted.

"I'd be putting down an army of the dead as a gesture of good will, Malanza," I said. "My concession is greater than yours."

Her face remained unmoved by the statement, but she was silent for a moment.

"Supplies for the night," she said. "Food, water and tents. Delivered after we tend to the wounded."

I forced myself to consider the counter-offer calmly. Would those make enough of a difference I should bargain down? Vivienne still had their old foodstuffs in her metaphorical pocket, so it shouldn't lead to logistical issues for the Army of Callow if I shelled these out. It would still mean that the enemy, while not fresh, would at least have full bellies. They'd be closer to fighting fit. If negotiations broke down afterwards – no, wrong way to think about it. If we had a night to spare, odds were I'd be able to get Hierophant back up. My comparative advantage was greater, even with the undead tossed aside.

"They'll be added to your bill," I said.

The princess opened her mouth.

"Flat cost," I added. "No surcharge."

Her mouth closed. Grudgingly, she nodded. We both knew that if negotiations failed any talk of coin would become academic anyway.

"Truce until negotiations come at an end," I said. "First session held at noon tomorrow."

"Granted," Malanza replied.

My eyes flicked to the Named at her sides.

"That includes heroes," I said.

"I take no orders from mortal rulers," the Saint flatly said.

I ignored her. She was irrelevant in this, unless she was willing to fight the entire Army of Callow on her own. Even if she got the rest of the heroes to back her, it wouldn't be enough.

"You can't seriously expect me to feed and shelter your army while we're under attack by your allies," I told Malanza.

The Proceran looked like she'd swallowed a lemon.

"I will formally renounce alliance with any hero resuming hostilities while we are under truce," she said. "I can do no more."

It'd be enough, I decided. Might even be better if the Saint attacked after that, we'd get a clean shot at her without making a diplomatic mess.

"I strike bargain under these terms," I said.

I got my gauntlet off and offered my hand. Revulsion flickering across her face, the princess spat on the ground.

"I strike bargain under these terms," she replied. "Get out of my sight, Black Queen."

I supposed we were past courtesy, at this point. It'd never been my strong suit anyway. I crouched to pick up my sword and sheathed it, keeping an eye on the furious Saint as I did. She turned and walked away. The Pilgrim sought to meet my eyes, studying me a pensive frown, but I was done with him. Zombie landed moments later, a handful of arrows having sprouted in her flank since I'd last seen her. The enemy archers had been busy. It still took half an hour before the battle came entirely at an end, the last of the dead dropping into the mud like a stringless puppet, but it ended.

None of this felt like a victory, but at least it wasn't a defeat.

---

SMHF

I know they say the only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing... But trust me, voting for Evil is much more helpful!

Help guide get back on top!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Soifon

Dread Emperor >Benevolent<? Is that name for fun or there really was one like that? o.o

Darkening

He's been mentioned before. Don't recall anything specific about him, but I remember the name.

Jane

I think we've heard of him before, but... As I recall, Praesi definitions of "benevolence" differed rather greatly from the common usage.

Mental Mouse

Even with our understanding, it's still scarier than the openly sinister names.

TeK

He's the author of the one of my favorite quotes: "Morality is a force, not a law. Deviating from it has costs and benefits both – a ruler should weigh those when making a decision, and ignore the delusion of any position being inherently superior."

stevenneiman

He was real. I think his thing was about understanding how to manipulate the interaction of Good and Evil in his favor. The only other quotes of his I remember were one about letting his enemies arrange their own doom, and one (which someone else already mentioned) about understanding the advantages and drawbacks of choosing Good or Evil rather than believing them to be ends in themselves.

Jeremy

Well, makes sense.

But what was the fifth workaround for Winter?!

wyaldriddler

The one that actually worked.

First is Masego.

Second is Theif's oaths.

Third is Larat.

Fourth has something to do with turning her body into munitions.

Fifth is the Winter Trap.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!

Hmm... Larat mentioned a Journey; I wonder what Cat experienced and if we'll get a flashback.

Naeddyr

Yeah! Whoo! Diplom the shit out of them, Cat!

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Diplom? Seriously? Are you TRYING to prevent communication from taking place? Well at least you didn't call her Kat or Chat

Jane

Doesn't everyone know the proper nickname for Catherine is Dog?

Naeddyr

Oh fuck off, no one likes you.

nerferf

Ack so the battle of camps continues

What are the odds and implications if the heroes off the nobles and take the army for themselves?

After this i dont think any cool heads among the heroes can keep the peace in regards to the more hotheaded ones

Would be interesting to see the heroes reaction to how aku was waving so much power about, getting humuitated like this when promised and epic battle is not going to go over well

Cicero

Pilgrim would never stand for that. As powerful as the Regicide is, the Pilgrim is clearly the boss of the heroes.

At most... maybe the Mirror Knight and the Spear would side with the Saint over the Pilgrim. The rest will side with the Pilgrim.

Just not happening.

Insanenoodlyguy

Unless the Pilgrim snaps. Everybody is so sure Saint will do it it has a narrative weight of twist to it if Pilgrim is the one who just can't abide it. Because of the Sunken costs.

Things have already gone so bad but if he lets the "punishment" of past sins win, surely that punishment will grow all the worse, and Procer will feel it most of all. So he invokes the story of damning himself to get the job done, going against orders to finish the job. Of course, since Cat is playing the role of hero, he's the treacherous one violating truce and suddenly far more vulnerable.

nerferf

Aye i can see that,

Pilgrim is the only one willing to talk peace when the others already thought cat was full of it and was just lying

Him noticing the changes when aku was in control seems to make him more willing to just kill cat given how he barely even tried to stop saint here

Pilgrim seems to be in confused and lost when he tried to reach cats eyes as he doesn't have a clue what is going on anymore and when the mentor got no clue then the other hero just to decide usually

daniel young

Also it's never wise to break oaths with fae

eh

Has Cat really been all that villainous? Her overarching story is a rise from tragically orphaned orphan, to pit fighter, to misguided protege of a monster, to vaguely benevolent ice queen. She had a tragic and violent past, she had bad influences, she hasn't had a kick the dog moment worse than crucifying some naughty mercenaries and turning a war criminal into a fashion statement, most of the heroes are cowardly idiots, Squire/Thief/Hunter (and maybe Hierophant/Adjutant) aren't strictly evil Names, she's thrice offered terms to enemies that are out for her blood in order to save lives, everyone from Akua to the Grey Pilgrim believes her story has core heroic components, and she's literally an ice queen ready to have her heart thawed.

She's ideally placed for a redemption arc, and with the break from the tower and from Black she's arguably already a budding antihero. Pilgrim will presumably notice this before he tries to murder her, and avoid a story where his side are arrogant betrayers acting from a sense of misbegotten superiority.

Lucas

She started a war so she could ride in ranks.

Oshi

For which she suffered deeply and mutilated her soul/led to the death of 100k people she was trying to save,

cheeseyme1999

yes and no. On one hand she is indeed being heroic by our standards, but in this universe good and hero both apply to followers of the gods above, not actually being good/heroic. Cat opposes the gods above, she is automatically a villain and it's the villain's set of tropes that apply to her.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

If the Grey Pilgrim is to be believed, then yes, simply by being a Below-oriented head of state, Cat is actively spreading Evil, corrupting her people by drawing out their Evil tendencies (sort of like how the US gets Trump and suddenly America is evil and racist. Cat's supernatural Evil influence will probably be slower and more subtle, you know, so it's believable).

Personally, I suspect Grey is right, but not quite in the way he thinks. I predict the spreading "corruption" will turn out to be neutral or more likely beneficial for the common people. Maybe mastering this "leader effect" was originally Black and/or Malicia's intended endgame (pure speculation)

RanVor

Except in US's case, it's the reverse. Trump was elected *because* America is "evil and racist", as you put it.

David K. Storrs

The large majority of us are not; he lost the popular vote by more than any President in history. Unfortunately, what Americans *actually* want doesn't matter in an election, because we have the electoral college, this historical artifact that was literally created to disenfranchise the majority. If 39,000 votes in 3 swing states had gone the other way, Trump wouldn't be our Baboon in Chief.

Even beyond that, it seems like the majority of people who voted for him did so either because (a) they wanted a conservative Supreme Court justice and were willing to trade all the damage that Trump would do to our nation and our reputation in order to get it or (b) they bought into the smear campaign that the Republicans have been running against Clinton for 20 years.

Yes, the racists all voted for him, but please believe that they are far from a majority here.

Abrakadabra

You also delude yourself. Clingon is actually evil, turncoat, and incompetent.

Abrakadabra

Dont delude yourself. Murica was always evil and racist.
P

sengachi

She crucified hundreds of people to send a message.

Decius

If the heroes take over, the diplomatic part of the war is over and a Red Skies style gambit is on the table.

Dainpdf

Still a bad sort of gambit to throw huge sorcery at heroes on the nett of days.

HiggsUnbound

Im interested too.

I'm concerned actually, heroes tend to get more powerful every time they get beaten up and survive to walk away, that means every time Cat allows this the danger grows.

It really has to stop.

Brilliant idea

Ah, but if we look at her history, so does Cat

HiggsUnbound

True. But Cat is... She's the protagonist. The rules simply don't work the same for her. She upsets the normal rules.

Aaron Wagner

Wow, just wow.

Big Brother

Pilgrim and Saint can sod off. I cannot wait for them to pass into dust.

1queenofblades1

If that happens, then truly Thanos will have done nothing wrong...

SnacShac

r/unexpectedthanos, perfectly balanced... as all things should be

Jimbo

Man, this is not enough to satisfy my fix.

LM

Well this was definitely not the climax the story was trending towards.

I understand the perspective of the generals calling truce, but I would think that thematically the Gods wouldn't let this stand. This is the third confrontation, and the third draw.

wyaldriddler

I also think it is the third time Cat has offered peace, though I'm not sure.

Jonnnney

The gods above can satiate their boodlust elsewhere

wyaldriddler

Also I just want to comment on how Cat is NOT a morning person apparently. Cause damn, she woke up angry.

Misterspokes

She woke up in the middle of a battle with winter raging through her, she's ready to kill and actively suppressing it...

tbarim

It's like waking up to find squirrels in your kitchen. It doesn't matter how good you slept, it's going to be a bad day.

thegreatfeed

Loved this. She just went over the heroes heads to what really matters, logistics and mortal men. Of course all is gonna be fucked up by the pilgrim calling on Malaza's oath, but good try nevertheless.

wyaldriddler

If he does use that oath, things are going to get fucked so fast everyone will be laid up with broken spines.

And he probably knows it too, since it pisses all over the character he has established for himself in this story so far by slamming full speed into his flaws.

wyaldriddler

Especially since Cat is a Fae and they just made a bargain about negotiations and truce.

Lucas

What path is this? Can you tell me in what chapter it appears?

thegreatfeed

You mean the oath? It's on the first kaleidoscope, or maybe the second. Right after the lake drop.

Jane

If he does that... That's going to break the story hard. Not "The Practical Guide to Evil", to be clear, but the whole story of the Crusade – a Hero cruelly calling on a debt owed to march the Crusader army to their certain deaths, after peace had been reached? That's a total Villain move, and the kind that ends harshly for the Villain in question.

It doesn't really seem in keeping with Pilgrim's character, but it's not out of the question. If he does it, though? That would backlash severely.

Dainpdf

It can be a Hero move, but only for William's sort. Not the Pilgrim. He's a savior, not the one who sends people to glorious death in battle.

shieldredblog

Ya, William's whole calling down and Angel of Contrition to make a suicide army trick, was in fact copied from a Crusade. One that failed to do more than annoy the Dead King.

Dainpdf

His move was actually an attempt to call down a Crusade. But hey, Praes is a softer target than the Kingdom of the Dead... We thought, until we found out about the classified protocols.

Veryconfused

I think cat underestimated the value she was giving up in feeding the enemy.

These negotiations, if they work, would mean either A) an end to the crusade, or B) black is dead. Procer cant lead a crusade if its hosts either surrendered or were defeated. No one else would join the cause.

The enemy army had pretty much no food last night, and likely didnt have any food this morning. Her army is well fed. Both armies have been standing in full armor for most of the morning, but a hungry man tires faster than a full man, by the time the dead had died again, Procers army would be practically useless, even the portions that had nearly been standing opposed to cats army. And while cat might not be able to go toe-toe with 10ish heros, cats army can.

It seems likely Juniper was pulling something similar to hannibal at Trebia, let the enemy army exhaust themselves/freeze/starve, while yours is still ready and capable, and on your own terms, crush them.

The taking hours for the front to collapse is highly unlikely, especially with the fae back in the picture and their ability to jump around, get a few key positions undone, engage the maximum number of troops, and let the starvation exhaust them.

Cat could have just jumped around with her gates and the fay + whatever little calvery she had left, hitting where the heros arent, and collapse Procer's army.

Heiropant is not equal to feeding the entire army.

I am kind of unimpressed with Cat's plan, her disregard for the incredible staff she's built, and refusal to investigate what was presently going on.

Soifon

Remember that Juniper didnt want to retreat because they didnt have gates without Cat. Now that they have they can leave very fast, burn everything behind them and come back with help from the Duchess

Veryconfused

True, but like, do they even need to? their army may be decimated, but so long as they are on site, the enemy army is going to be weaker by the hour. Hungry men do fight well, and unless gray pilgrim is even more overpowered than implied, hero cant be everywhere at once, most of the enemy army will be likely falling over from exhaustion before Juniper even initiates contact.

Faiir

Didn't Akua use 'feeding of the enemy' as a source of power, twice?

daegone823

You guys are forgetting rule number one when facing heroes. If things look like they will go in your favor then you should retreat. Remember Black and Hano when victory was in his grasp it was the worst moment war in Calernia is not just 2D, 3D, its 4D (names tip the scale every time).

---

Oh, yeah, if Malanza decides not to pay, then Catherine can just retrieve the supplies eaten and have a few thousand crusaders dead/weakened instantly.

sengachi

Also Cat's a fae now. They've got a whole thing about taking food without paying for it, to say nothing of breaking bargains.

I get the feeling that bargaining with a fae Queen for food and then stiffing her is a quick trip to a very bad place.

Morgenstern

You're forgetting that Juniper already mentions that the Army of Callow is at the point where every single death makes it noticeably a lot less efficient and the losses are ones that will be felt for YEARS. So, if Cat wants the long-term plan, she's doing exactly the thing she has to, just like with all the negotiations and not killing off too many of the enemy host (if based on the wrong assumption that peace CAN be had and on more or less her terms, somehow).

Insanenoodlyguy

Remember that Cat's ideal victory condition is not destroying this army, but forcing it's withdrawal. Your plan seems plausible. But it's not what she wants.

Jane

While I do agree, it was a necessary concession; Malanza knows how precarious a position her lack of supplies puts her in, and wouldn't risk Cat just drawing things out until the army is dead of starvation.

That said, the Crusaders have lacked food for several days – they're still going to be pretty weakened if they only get a single meal out of this. And if Cat wants to play hardball, she can give them a half-rations worth of food each, to fulfill the terms of their bargain while still keeping the army on the brink. If she was especially unscrupulous (and she won't be, because it would blow up the negotiations, drugs don't actually work this way, and they don't have the right supplies regardless), she'd dose the food with a light sedative so that they'd still be groggy and weakened if it can't blow.

What I would do, if I was her, though? Be sure to give them a generous amount of wine as part of the supplies. The Crusaders are going to need some heavy drinking after the last two days, and truce talks encourage soldiers to rash celebration. It'd look like kindness, but it'd be a good edge if talks broke down.

I am kind of unimpressed with Cat's plan, her disregard for the incredible staff she's built, and refusal to investigate what was presently going on.

Yeah, it was the right call, but... Mostly because Cat has good instincts. It was pretty weak evidence to base her decision on, and I don't know that it would have taken much to have had a quick talk with Juniper before doing anything – her Pegasus is pretty fast, and nigh-unstoppable.

Still, forcing her way to Malanza's tent may well have been a then-or-never moment; who knows how long the other heroes would have stayed put, after Cat quit the fight.

poignardazur

Uh. That **is** deviously clever. (Malanza could just not distribute the wine, though)

Dainpdf

That would be terrible for morale if word got out. Unless some pretty great PR work was done (say, convincing people it is poisoned).

Dainpdf

She needed to seize the momentum, and finish this battle while her army is still in salvageable condition. Yes, she could win this battle, but the gains for her are negligible or actually negative when compared to them retreating, and the costs might be prohibitive – they can't afford any more losses, and every second this war goes on is a chance some Hero will get lucky and take her down.

HiggsUnbound

That's a devious and effective plot, "giving the wine".

However, pretty sure clerics and especially Pilgrim with his waves of light can mass-detox people.

sengachi

Yeah but then they've burnt healing power on a mass detox right before you hit them with all you've got (and we've seen very well how ugly that can get, with the Ashen Priestess).

Author Unknown

What I would do is give them a lot of rich food. The hope being that they would eat too much too fast, get sick, and vomit it back up. Then Cat will have fulfilled her part of the deal, but most of the Procer army wouldn't actually receive much nutrition. Plus Cat gets points for being generous.

donforrester456

As a diabetic, I can appreciate this strategy. Give the Crusade enough cake and ice cream to **destroy them**.

Jane

Hm... Things might have been much better for Cat if Akua had waited five more minutes to call her back... No doubt Akua could have dealt with a few of the younger heroes, who are certainly going to be obnoxious even if this truce holds. Killing them in clean battle would no doubt be demoralizing for the Crusade, without causing the sort of diplomatic issues that Cat fears – while they are potent war assets, they are not, in the end, Proceran, for the most part. And those that are, aren't nobility.

But, eh, that's how Juniper would look at the field, not Cat. Peace is the goal, not breaking the Crusade's war potential.

Also a pity that she has no idea as to what happened while she was "gone", not that she had any reason to. I doubt she's going to trust Akua's description of what happened in the fight, and there was no one else close enough to corroborate her story – Archer might have great vision, but too much of the fight took place in ways that obscured her vision.

I wonder, though... If Akua had held control for the entire day, how would the battle have gone? The plan seemed fairly sound, from what we saw. Could the Army of Callow have forced a military victory without losing too many soldiers? A single unstoppable villain against a party of heroes also sounds like a recipe for a loss, but could Akua playing the "hero" have given her the narrative weight to pull it off? She didn't have to win after all, just keep the heroes occupied until the dead army did their job – a single champion holding against impossible odds is a powerful story in its own right, especially in the hands of Callow.

Of course, from a diplomatic perspective, staying her hand in her moment of victory probably gives her more credibility than annihilating the enemy army, but... Well, breaking the army past repair here probably offers her more security. A neighbor as devastated as Callow is is a neighbor that can't find a pretext to wage war on her for a decade, assuming the rest of the Crusader army is still strong enough to weaken Black and Malicia.

Though... Hm... While it wasn't a bad call, I wonder if it was really a good idea to make a decision this important without having talked to anyone who knows the current condition of the relative armies? I mean, she didn't really have much idea as to whether they were on the brink of complete victory or utter defeat. Though she does have good instincts, and correctly read the implications of the field.

As a final observation... I get the feeling that Cat forcing the Saint to put down her sword by order of Malanza probably earned them both her eternal hatred in a way that even having party wiped the Heroes (sans Pilgrim) wouldn't have. Being forced to compromise with Evil seems like the one thing she absolutely won't forgive.

/end first impressions.

Dainpdf

I agree on the "not talking" point, though things were somewhat rushed at that point, and she read the situation fairly well. As for killing more heroes... The "lone champion holding the line" story tends to end badly for the champion themselves, plus there's the inverse ninja principle. Not to mention the Saint barely tolerated negotiations as is, and who knows how far the Pilgrim can be pushed before he stops being the voice of reason.

MetruX

Actually we already got glimpses that the Pilgrim is NOT as he seems in personality, this is kind of a facade, making him more credible to others, and Saint is in the knows. So, he stopping being the voice of reason could be pretty easy, after all.

About the lone champion you're right, the story, for heroes, is usually that they defeat everyone, but end up dead together, as a last sacrifice.

Dainpdf

What? Where did we get that?

We got the Saint actually displaying a form of hero worship for him, and threatening people if they disappointed him because she knows he'd do nothing of the sort.

Cicero

Hmmm... well since it's clear that Cat has no memory or knowledge of what has been happening while she was out (not even recognizing that Auka was loyal and did not fall into her trap) this does make perfect sense for her. Get a truce so she can determine what is happening, reconsolidate her power, and prepare for the next conflict. Either a negotiated peace (unlikely) or a renewal of battle on more favorable terms.

Although... the existing tide of battle probably favored the Army of Callow. If Cat had kept the heroes busy – but obviously Cat doesn't have the right fighting style to handle the Saint and Pilgrim. So maybe this was the best choice after all.

And here I was taking odds on which heroes would survive the battle with Cat.

Not what I expected.

Dainpdf

I was so sure at least the Mirror Knight would fall... His "grow stronger" gimmick is a huge death flag.

MetruX

Maybe not necessarily? Imagine that he ends up leaving and respecting Cat, despite she being a Villain. Then, years later, at the end of the last book, they meet again, and he asks if she is ready. She just sighs or smiles and says it's been enough. He kills her after she completed what was needed, and the story ends.

It's not a bad ending, and he could even be the one to keep around to make sure Callow stays free.

Dainpdf

A non Callowan hero? Surely not. Also, he was introduced way too late for us to have that sort of ending, without a whole lot of development time spent on him.
It's possible, but I doubt it.

Ein

Akua was doing the whole epic battle thing and looking a proper badass. All she managed to do was to tire out some heroes.

Cath wakes up, and within a few minutes has the enemy in surrender talks, with Pilgrim and Crazy Sword Lady completely shut down and the other heroes made irrelevant. All without raising her blade.

RoflCat

To be fair, Akua could've gone further and probably might even win (her story here is of the ruler waking up in time of crisis and facing off the invaders, a heroic one), but then she realized the path to bringing Cat back and chose that instead.

Which make me a little sad that Cat wakes up without any knowledge of that, I'd love to hear her reaction once she learned that Akua didn't go nuts and trigger the Winter Trap, she knew the trap was there and chose to trigger it as a sign of her loyalty.

RanVor

She probably wouldn't believe.

Jane

I think she can compel honesty from Akua, though? Akua can give a weasel answer, but if she forthrightly says she realized how to bring Cat back, and chose to do so, Cat will know it's the truth.

That doesn't mean she'll accept that truth, choosing instead to believe it's in furtherance of some scheme, or that she just doesn't see how the truth is being twisted, and it's entirely possible she'll never ask a relevant question to begin with, but if she does ask, she'll most likely at least trust the broad outline of what actually happened.

RanVor

Well, it **was** in furtherance of a scheme. That doesn't mean Akua doesn't intend to serve Cat loyally, at least until she gets put in a position of power again, which might as well be never.

MetruX

You forget about another part of the Praes way. If you can't have the power, you set things up so your descendants can. She has none now, but who says she can't have some later? Lack of a body, what's that? Is it tasty?

Decius

Not surrender. Withdraw.

HiggsUnbound

At the same time, it's difficult to dispute that Akua clearly is the more skilled bearer of Winters Mantle. She made those heroes, even saint, look like chumps.

Cat is far below her potential, if she could master winter as Akua did... Damn, I'd place her equal to the Calamities. A few of them anyway.

MetruX

The problem is not her prowess or power. Remember that since the beginning we've been told that the Calamities are actually weak for Villains. Villains tend to have the upper hand in raw power against Heroes. But they still loose. Every. Single. Time. And Akua is just like those losing Villains, using full incredible power, that still leads to their end...

Antoninjohn

Heroes don't compromise and they have brainwashing powers, Cat needs to rebuild Callow and break it's story of been invaded, she's immortal so she can grow stronger and take over Calerina in a century or two instead of with a rebuilding nation, through she might have to end up casting a mighty spell to place Callow in the lands of Arcadia more a century then come into creation 10 minutes later

Dainpdf

All villains are sort of immortal. Thing is, eventually a hero gets all of them. I don't think planning on the premise of living forever is sound.

Dylan Tullos

Antoninjohn:

"Taking over Calernia" is a terrible plan. You end up fighting the entire continent and losing.

RanVor

Well, there was one who fought the entire continent and won.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Triumphant did fight the entire continent and win.

Then she ended up fighting two foreign empires while Calernia rose in rebellion. That didn't go so well.

The problem with grand plans of conquest is that you just end up stretching your forces thinner and thinner while making more powerful enemies. Triumphant conquered Calernia, but she fell within twenty years, and she destroyed Praes for a generation. There's a reason the Praesi say "may she never return".

Antoninjohn

Callow was taken over, and kept and the idea was she tricks the Heroes into breaking a ritual to prevent beings in the Hells into calling back Dread Empress Triumphant turning the story from Good and Evil to Cat being the lesser evil, sacrifice all the people who will die from Triumphant in order to keep Calriena under control

Forrest

Now, see, I would love to see the heroes reactions after all this. They just got toyed with in battle, and they then get humiliated by truce. I would love to see their take on things after that. But- We just had six interlude chapters. Six of them. Honestly, that probably had more than a little bit to do with how many of us were frustrated about Akua showing back up as a major piece again.

Either which way, glad to see Cat is back and being rational about her approach. Too bad she can't seem to remember what she did in combat when Akua was running things. Alas.

Rook

It's the right decision, she's fighting the right battle.

If she finishes the fight against Procer then she wins the battle and loses the war. As far as Callow is concerned, minimizing casualties is what's important right now, not bleeding yourself for the satisfaction of cleaving into the crusade's forces. As far as the Gods Above and Below are concerned? you're already playing into their hand if the conflict is ongoing, and they're half the problem in the first place.

If they wanted to just kill the leadership, they could've used absolute positioning to open a faerie gate two inches above Malanza's head and poured a cup of goblinfire through it. Or hell, pop up a bigger one above the gathering of non-named commanders and just have Archer shoot them all before anyone can even figure out what's happening. Named interference could be neutralized as easily as waiting for them to take the field in the frontlines and striking while the Pilgrim is temporarily anchored after showing himself to save a baby Hero.

The point was never to kill them in the first place, the point was to avoid killing each other. It's a very intentional choice, and it's honestly the better one at the moment.

Dainpdf

Gotta scry the general for that, and that's not happening with all the priests running around. Plus the Pilgrim would probably pull something out of his... sleeves and save her.

Oshi

In that case probably not as much of an issue as you think. Equate the gates and dropping fire to modern satellite imaging and carpet bombing.

Dainpdf

But they actually mentioned it was a problem a couple chapters ago. It's why Cat had to rely on the maneuver with the Watch scrying home to invade the enemy camp. Because she couldn't scry into their camp and therefore couldn't open gates in there normally.

Cicero

Remember that Cat is under orders not to kill the two leaders

MetruX

You really think she worries about those orders right now? She's more predisposed to rip Malicia apart than hear her out. She will only keep to it as much as it favours her own plans.

WuseMajor

Ok, I get that there are times when you need to make a stand against the darkness, but when the Evil Queen has offered peace talks a bunch of times and worked really, really hard on getting the first version of the local equivalent of the Geneva Convention installed before your fight, it seems like it might be worth considering that you might not be on the correct side here.

Ok, sure it might be a trick to, ya know, ambush the opposing military commanders or poison everyone, but it's still worth considering that you might be a self-righteous ass instead of a decent human being.

*ahd*

The Heavens will it.

Once you start wondering whether the Heavens should be obeyed, you stop being the Grey Pilgrim and start being, well.

Rook

Correct. A soldier's duty is to follow orders, not question if they make sense. If your commanding officer tells you to mop up the rain, you stand in the rain and mop it up

In this sense the Heroes are doing an outstanding job of what the Gods above recruited them for. Same goes for Villains and the Gods Below. It's not a coincidence that the overwhelming majority of Names and Aspects on both sides of the fence are innately combat-oriented.

The fundamental misconception that Catherine has – one which Akua understands perfectly, ironically enough – is that she thinks the Heroes are 'Saints' when they're actually 'Swords'. She's got the emphasis on the wrong part.

Dainpdf

From what I got from the Pilgrim, a villain like Cat is somewhat akin to a Demon, though on a lesser scale. Even if she just sits there, doing absolutely nothing, her mere presence (especially in a position of power) is enough to spread the influence of the Gods Below. And honestly? While I can't really recommend the Good nations we've seen (Procer and Ashur chief amongst them), Praes and Helike, let alone the Kingdom of the Dead, are not places you want anywhere to turn into.

Dainpdf

Essentially, from their point of view, they're waging a war to get to a lot of radioactive waste that is all over the place. Yes, war is terrible, but the waste will cause more damage long term. At least that's what they believe.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

From that perspective, Cat's peace deal is basically saying "Go home so I can turn Callow into a radioactive wasteland as bad as Praes."

Even if they didn't care about Callow at all, that deal wouldn't work, because Procer would be right next to a radioactive wasteland of Evil. Either they win this here and now, or they'll end up with Praes and Callow as one big Dread Empire on their borders. If they don't want devils and demons swarming into the Principate every time a Dread Emperor/ess decides to have some fun, the Crusaders need to break the Empire and restore Callow to the side of Good.

Catherine refuses to understand this because she rejects any worldview that conflicts with her own.

Dainpdf

Being Evil doesn't mean Callow and Praes have to stay allies... But battles between Evil sides tend to involve devils, demons, and whatnot.

What Cat is asking here is really quite a lot. She's asking them to condemn Callow and everyone in it to Evil, on the vain hope that they'll somehow be able to take it back some time in the future.

Rook

They 'condemned Callow to evil' for decades on end under Praes in the first place. They're here now because of political convenience, not because they're so horrified at the idea of callow being ruled by a Villain.

What happened in the last few months that made it so much worse than Malicia and Black being the rulers for years and years? The fledgling Villain who's so shit at being a bad guy that Akua considers her to be more of a Hero is unacceptable, but two of the most notorious Villains in recent memory – the literal boogeymen under Calernia's bed – are no big deal?

She really isn't asking them for much, really. The message is 'go back to failing to do your job like you have been for an entire generation worth of time, because I'm making it politically inconvenient for you again'

hoyboy

Ummm... Procer has been dealing with a civil war for the past thirty years, this is like blaming someone for not running into the burning house next door to save people because they're busy trying to prevent a home invader from stabbing them.

Rook

Um, the named who are claiming a villainous ruler to be the just cause for the crusade aren't proceran military officers or even proceran at all. For the non-named it's been explicitly spelled out through Cordelia & Co POV chapters that this is just a political war to give Procer a common enemy and shore up their own strength, not one of morals.

It was The Pilgrim himself who admitted in no uncertain terms during the initial talks, that it was their failure to only march on Callow when it was too late, and only then out of fear.

So blaming them for not saving Callow earlier is like blaming a criminal for their crimes when said criminal explicitly admits to it, and hard proof exists in the form of omniscient narrative exposition.

Dylan Tullos

Rook:

What you're saying is true, but that's all the more reason why they should act now. They failed to protect Callow from conquest due to their own selfishness, and it's time for them to earn some measure of redemption by crushing the Black Queen and restoring Callow to the side of Good.

The Good nations of Calernia are definitely guilty; the Tenth Crusade is about them admitting their guilt and trying to do better. They're finally uniting under the banner of a holy war to fight Evil, like they should have done from the start.

Rook

Except for the part where they're insisting on breaking themselves against the Black Queen who is both planning to abdicate as well as offering safe passage through to Praes, using a shortcut that can ferry the entire army across.

The point of contention has been that she plans to abdicate to a Callowan Ruler and keep the nation intact, instead of having the nation carved up like a pie to be ruled by the Principiate which kills their own people more than anyone else.

They're uniting under the banner to get her off the throne a few years earlier and kill tens of thousands in the process, after doing nothing for decades. Meanwhile the greatest villains of the century seated on a throne of a historically evil nation, who were directly responsible for creating both the Black Queen and the Hellgate are, uh, secondary concerns. I guess.

Dylan Tullos

Rook:

Grey Pilgrim isn't Proceran, and the Saint is famous for killing a Prince. These are not people who care about the secular ambitions of the Principate.

They're turning the deal down because leaving Catherine on the throne risks Callow becoming an Evil nation. If they go Evil, then there's nothing to stop Praes when it inevitably rebuilds, just like it did after the First Crusade.

Calernia needs Callow to be the guardian of Good, to stand against the darkness. If Practical Evil reshapes Callow, then there's no guarantee that they won't ally with Praes next time the Dread Empire comes looking for conquests.

Whatever the princes think, this isn't about carving Callow up. It's about ensuring that Callow returns to the cause of Good, rather than becoming an Evil nation and possible ally of Praes. In the long term, an Evil Callow is more dangerous than any demon or Hellgate, because they're the people that the rest of Calernia relies on to stop the Villains.

Malicia doesn't have an active Hellgate, and Praes is already lost to Evil. The long-term goal here is to throw Praes back to their previous borders and restore Callow, and that means removing a Villainous ruler who is turning her nation Evil. Grey Pilgrim explicitly says this to Cat, but she ignores him because she wants to magically make Good and Evil go away.

Reality doesn't work like that. Good and Evil are real, and Callow has to pick a side. Catherine chose...poorly.

grzecho2222

Exept for the fact that Callow is turning Evil because all their allies abandoned them, they had three wars in last years and now when finally they are free and under competent ruler and want to be left alone to rebuild their country, this exact moment their Good allies attact them, want to kill their queen and take appart their lands, while acting like arrogant jerks and blabbering how Good and proper they are

shieldredblog

The people of Praes live under Evil sorcerer kings that fertilize thoe fields woth blood and love summoning Demons. The high lords kill each other constantly and routinely raise the dead.

Procer is worse than that.

Being sacrificed to feed your family is probably a lot more fun than watching your family starve to death because your rulers are renowned elitist aristocrats. Procer has had more civil wars than Praes as well.

You seem to be distracted by the flamboyant nature of Evil. Mundane evil is always worse than the flashy stuff and Procer is as guilty of that as anyone. Heroes don't prevent starvation or deliver firewood during cold winters. They just kill what their told.

Dylan Tullos

shieldredblog:

You make excellent points. We've seen how often the Princes fight their Good neighbors or each other, and while Ashur might be less violent, their society is even more static and oppressive. These Good societies aren't actually good, and Heroes should be opposed to tyrannical Princes as well as cackling Tyrants or scheming High Ladies.

I guess the only real answer is that the High Lords and Ladies do all the mundane evil stuff in addition to the demon-summoning and necromancy. There is plenty of starvation, oppression, and general awfulness in Procer as well as Praes. It's just that only Praes has the mass sacrifices and evil rituals.

So if everyone is ruled by selfish, uncaring aristocrats, I think Heroes are right to prioritize the murderous elitists who warp the very fabric of reality with their unholy powers. They're all baddies, but some baddies have access to really nasty powers.

Entirely in agreement that Heroes need to spend some time helping Good societies actually be good. If Heroes did more work to build a better world when they weren't punching demons in the face, Calernia would be a much nicer place to live.

hoyboy

That's not how societies work. The cornerstone of any state is being able to make sure that the populace using it's labor to produce food and goods are themselves at the bare minimum fed enough to do labor in the first place. Even under it's most brutal conditions feudalism still operated under this basic social contract. Starvation didn't tend to happen just because the overlords were meanies, it happened due to environmental factors such as blights and disruptions such as wars.

If a society does let lots of people starve, like for instance if the labor of large swathes of the population aren't needed, they tend to start getting their torches and pitchforks out. Quite simply, if Procer was as dire as you say it must be, then Procer wouldn't exist. It wouldn't have the strength to hold itself together as a federation, would be torn apart by constant rebellion, and absolutely would not have the available manpower to send tens of thousands of people into a war.

Meanwhile there's nothing stopping Praes from having poverty and starvation as well, it explicitly used invading Callow as an excuse to send surplus populations to die in pointless imperialist war so they'd have less mouths to feed. That's pretty fucking mundane evil if I do say so.

shieldredblog

hoyboy:

Except we know at least half a dozen Dread Emperors tried to avoid that exact scenario and were killed by the Narrative. (One tried to kick start a industrial revolution.)

The Black Knight didn't invade Callow because he wanted his own Kingdom, he knew the Gods would replace him if he didn't.

As long as Praes and Callow exist as independent countries, they have to fight. At least until the Narrative changes.

Dainpdf

You may recall the Calamities have been hard at work precisely delaying the forces of Good from being able to assemble to do precisely what they're doing. It's not like they've been sitting on their thumbs for decades.

And the Saint or the Pilgrim moving alone wouldn't do that much – they're not the only powerful ones around, and they're somewhat kept in check by the powerful evil Named.

RanVor

Catherine refuses to understand this because she doesn't give a shit about Procer. She does, however, give a major shit about Callow, which has been a victim of the Good Vs. Evil pissing contest since forever. And she's hell-bent on changing that. And the first step to changing that is not allowing Procer to conquer it.

shieldredblog

Also the quality of life under Praes has increased. Meanwhile Procer is one of the most repressive and elitist governments on the entire planet. Their peasants are kept poor and uneducated and used as fodder in their endless civil wars.

RanVor

Hellgates aside, Procer isn't that much different from Praes – a giant empire constantly terrorizing its neighbors, filled to brim with scheming, backstabbing nobles who treat their people like shit.

Novice

You just described Praes. High Lords, remember?

RanVor

Yes, I meant to do that. My point is that under all the facades, Procer and Praes are actually very similar.

RanVor

Sorry, I read it wrong.

Euodiachloris

Where the whole "clean-up" argument falls down, though is... they all sat back and let Chernobyl happen 20 years ago, and only now do they think about carting in cement.

If Evil is like radiation, then fine: going in when everything is super-hot is a Bad Idea. But, they don't view it that way; they think of it as the contamination getting stronger over time, rather than "boom then gradually fade"..

Yet, 20 years. And, only now a Crusade. And treating everybody in Callow as Evil, even though most still look to the Houses of Light.

I know the Calamities are scary, but damn, The Heavens are as much responsible for what Callow is turning into as Black is... because they piddled about raising narrative drive, while not caring about the people on the ground In any way but the most tenuous abstracts. Oh, and decided that Evil leadership meant All Callow Evil Because Standard Haphazard Insurrection Procedures Failed: Cleanse From Without.

vuthuha912

But does a country really turn that toxic with Evil influence? We are seeing Cordelia throwing peasants at the Crusade to have fewer mouths to feed. The prince of Procer is as treacherous as a Praesi noble. They aren't even seeing the other side as human. It is in human nature to be evil. Praying in the house of Light doesn't stop you from being cruel or racist or sexist or elitist. Human can be awful regardless of race, gender, and religion.

Cordelia and Black are quite close in terms of philosophy and motives. She just choose politics instead of military means. Everyone in this conflict is fighting with underhand tactics but for really good reasons. Black doesn't want his country to wipe out, Cat wants independence, and Cordelia wants to unite her nations. They can't negotiate so they keep on fighting. Make no mistake, Cordelia will kill as many as she needs to defeat the others. She is not that much greater of a person than Cat or Black. Cat, Black, and Cordelia are working in the moral framework of a typical medieval ruler. They are even better people than medieval rulers since they actually do their job for patriotism and are not motivated by personal like several assholes I can think of. No one is building a lake of alcohol or filling their tomb with gold or forcing people to be buried alive to keep them company in the afterlife or violating widows or burying servants of defeated enemies. They also don't think of killing every civilian in a city as a necessary warning/ deterrent for the other sides or as some sort of revenge for the governors. They don't even try to kill their siblings for power and all of their descendants to avoid a rebellion.

And you may remember the reason Tyrant becomes Tyrant is because he doesn't mind dying – he is destined to die and no amount of praying was going to change that. Then he said fuck it and make a huge mess everywhere. Praes is what happens when an entire nation falls to the same type of hopelessness – they said fuck it and drag everybody down. It is a vicious cycle that keep Praes down: Desperation -> crazy shit -> a pattern -> shittier situation -> crazier shit -> deeper pattern... It is cocaine at this point. Getting rid of cocaine is just the first step, rehab is the step that people keep on skipping. Cordelia's dream while tempting is still not addressing the root cause of the problem – Stupid Evil. Even if Black failed in his attempts to stop Evil from being as destructive, he is not wrong in his assessment of Evil and its effect on both the society it rules and the one next to it. Society can only move as fast as the slowest person. Evil, more specifically Praes need to change so that everyone on the continent can be safe. Well, keep killing Evil Names aren't the way – it is proven by the current state of the continent. The Crusade that occupied Praes aren't able to contain it for long. I also don't see the cleansing effect that Good had on Praes. Reforms and diplomatic solutions are probably the solutions, maybe. Praes is not an easy mold to break and more importantly, Praes need to want to change and not force by outsiders

WuseMajor

Incidentally, my perception of the end game this story is leading to is "Cat climbs the tower, throws Malicia off of it, and becomes the Dread Queen, Crowned in Woe, Anointed by Winter, Ruler of Praes and Callow and possibly Procer. And maybe she gets a few things done before becoming the End Boss to the Five Man Band of heroes, forged in this crucible of War."

My expectation of the actual end game this story will head to is either "Cat manages to beat enough people over the head with a stick, brings them to the negotiating table and forces through her Accords, then takes Archer off to go see the world," or "Cat gets so DONE with everything she abdicates to the Pilgrim and fucks off to a beach."

wyaldriddler

A beach, in Arcadia. :V

grzecho2222

Cat brings beach with herself

shieldredblog

She Wins unconditionally and unlock a new Aspect.
Lounge: Summons a Beach where Named cant bother you

Insanenoodlyguy

I feel like the final fight is with the Gnomes, whether she's become the Empress or not, but probably.

Cat is all about changing the status quo and progress. Narratively they are her ultimate enemy.

MetruX

They are ONE OF the super powers in the world. Not the only one, neither the most important one. Really, for her story the Gnomes are simply a mention far away, it's kinda too hopeful thinking they are the end game enemies, since there are so much going on and this is still small scale for any of the big powers.

Silverking

Dang it, Cat, you're supposed to wake up from your Winter nap with a Name or an Aspect, not just lost time! Although, perhaps Larat's mention of a "journey" might mean that there's something else going on.

As for the truce, I think it was probably the better of limited options. To paraphrase Quark from DS9, "Peace is cheapest when nobody's got a clear advantage." The crusaders were close to starvation, but there's always been so many more of them. The undead helped close the gap, but Cat seemed to think that actually pulling ahead would take time that the heroes wouldn't give them. Akua was having a ball toying with Winter's power, but as Black knows, Villains either need to get a decisive victory fast or pull out; delaying tactics wouldn't be narratively sustainable.

As for what to come next:

- Militarily, she needs Hierophant up and running to act as the "secret weapon" that would make Malanza think twice about further combat.

- Diplomatically, she needs the crusaders to consider her someone they can negotiate with. If oaths of righteous revenge come out, Cat loses even if she wins. In the short term, Callow can't withstand the full might of a crusading Praes. In the long term, a peace that only lasts until she's incapacitated or dead is not acceptable to her.

- Narratively, she needs a Hero to do something stupid and break some term of the truce. Divorcing the Heroes from the support of the army would be helpful, losing their (shaky) moral high ground would hurt, and...I'm not up on my mythology, breaking a promise with the Fae seems to be a thing that has "consequences."

Dainpdf

I think Cat just wants to preserve as much strength as she can, though taking out one of the more clearly brash heroes gunning for her head wouldn't hurt.

RanVor

The Heroes must have been mighty confused when after wrecking them effortlessly the Black Queen suddenly turned her tail and run away.

I think Cat is giving up a certain advantage for an uncertain one. After all, she doesn't even know the state Masego is currently in. What is she going to do if she doesn't succeed in waking him up, go to negotiate with well-fed, well-rested and still overwhelmingly massive crusader army, and then negotiations fail? Malanza might not be so eager to treat when her soldiers aren't starving. Cat would lose every advantage she had and gain nothing in return. Well, I guess now that she has the fairy gates back, she can always run away. Not that it'd be helpful in the long run.

I'm kinda disappointed Cat doesn't remember how big a favor Akua has done her in the previous chapter, although maybe it's for the better. The Diabolist has become an incredibly useful tool, and that's exactly why relying on her now is more dangerous than ever before.

Overall, I can't help but feel this chapter is a bit of a letdown, but that's mainly because of incredibly high expectations the previous chapter has left me with. It also might have something to do with distinct lack of Akua in this one... Ok, I'm joking, but after Kaleidoscope VI I can't wait for her to make an appearance again.

Also, we lost the first place to Ward again. This is simply unacceptable.

Dainpdf

Small problem with the "certain advantage": it is narratively and logistically unfeasible.

Cat needs her army as intact as possible, and has very little to gain from running the score on a battle from which she just wants an enemy retreat. So it's in her interest to stop everything as soon as she can.

As for the actual fight with the heroes, a prolonged fight against multiple heroes is a complete crapshoot. Black would scoff at the very notion.

RanVor

What I'm asking about is what she's going to do if her plan fails (which is likely, considering it hinges on negotiating with fanatics). As it stands, the Crusaders are going to crush her completely unless she succeeds in rebooting Masego *and* talking some sense into the Heroes, and both of these objectives are rather hard to achieve within the limits she has. And she just got rid of everything that might have helped her in case of failure.

Dainpdf

The people she'd be negotiating with (the nobles) aren't that fanatic about the cause. The Princess, in particular, has shown much concern about her troops.

As for what to do should negotiations break down, she seems pretty sure she could wake Masego up, and keeping up this fight would not actually help too much. Either she keeps distracting the heroes (at mounting risk of death) or they go turn the tides of the battle. And even should she somehow succeed on the former without the Saint turning her into sashimi, every soldier who dies now is a great loss for the Army of Callow. One it may not be able to afford.

RanVor

How can she be sure she'll be able to wake Masego? She only knows he's incapacitated because she figured it out from the battle. She hasn't seen him since the Pilgrim broke her gate. She doesn't even know for sure he's still alive.

I'm not saying she made a mistake. I'm not smart enough to predict every eventuality. I just think she's risking too much too lightly.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

You're right.

Catherine is taking big risks because she can't survive a Terriblic victory. Even if she wipes out the entire Crusading host at the cost of no more than three or four thousand of her own men, she can't afford that.

If Catherine is going to survive, she has to have enough of her army left to defeat the next wave of invaders. Unfortunately for her, that means she has to risk her entire force to avoid unacceptable losses, chancing a defeat to gain a less destructive victory.

Dainpdf

Masego probably walked her through the possible consequences of the working. It's part of why she was reluctant to use it.

So they probably planned for what to do in case it happened, and outlined the procedures for that situation.

I don't bet Cat would know how to wake Masego, but I bet he would have known and would have told her. That's the one explanation I have for her confidence.

grzecho2222

It was implied that Cat can appear in dreams

Dainpdf

Where?

grzecho2222

When she talks with Kegan she mentions something about haunting Kegan's nightmares if she wants

Dainpdf

Right. That sounded more like a thing she could do to Kegan right then, though, no? Place some sort of working on her that would give her terrible nightmares.

superkeaton

Cat is definitely over Pilgrim. She's genuinely attempting to make peace and end the war in good faith and he's still gunning for her, making him no better nor more useful than Saint.

Dainpdf

Might have something to do with her showing she's a pretty big threat, plus the repeated murder of his charges. But hey, he helped hold the Saint back.

RanVor

Which in turn might have something to do with his repeated attempts to kill Cat and ruin everything she stands for.

Dainpdf

Well, yes. It is a given that two sides at war will attempt to harm one another, and thus create ever more reasons to prolong the conflict. The cycle of hatred is a powerful thing.

Dylan Tullos

superkeaton:

She's trying to end the war in a way that leaves Evil in power in Callow. Her "peace" gives her more time to rebuild Callow, raise a larger army, and prepare to fight Good on more even terms.

Given the constant conflict between Good and Evil, why would it make any sense to make a peace now only to fight a stronger enemy later? An Evil Callow is a threat to all of its neighbors, and needs to be put down hard.

RanVor

Except we know that's not what she wants. She plans to rebuild Callow and abdicate, leaving the crown to someone who has enough sense not to get into another stupid war.

And if you stop thinking in Good/Evil terms, you'll see Procer is a much greater threat to its neighbors than Callow.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Anyone Catherine abdicated to would be either Evil themselves, or willing to work with the Evil people who command Callow's army. Ending their current war so that they can fight a bigger, harder war twenty years later...that's not a good plan.

Procer's Princes are terrible people. Evil creates Hellgates that summon armies of devils, and they're not scared of calling demons that maim the fabric of reality. Letting people like that live on your border is an invitation to having entire cities wiped out, like Liesse, whenever they decide to unleash their unholy sorceries.

Procer is a mundane threat that can be handled through mundane armies. Praes and Callow can access Calernia's equivalent of nuclear and biological weapons, while Procer has a bunch of people with pointy metal sticks. No matter how bad a neighbor Procer is, there won't ever be any Proceran Hellgates, while Akua Sahelian just showed everyone what Evil is capable of if they're left unchecked.

RanVor

Then why are you still reading? It's obvious the story isn't going to end the way you'd like it to.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Until Liesse, I would have agreed with you. But Practical Evil just lost hard, and the rest of the Continent is finally getting their act together.

I don't think the story's ending will be exactly what I want, but I'm still rooting for Cordelia, rather than the people who think that making deals with the Dread Empire is the way to go. That kind of plan cost Callow its second-largest city and more than two hundred thousand people.

Also, Akua is so much fun. I loved her attempt to think like Catherine.

RanVor

Well, for me it looks like you just declared that you hate all the main characters and want them to die. You know it's not going to happen, so there's no point in going on, in my opinion.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Are you so sure that the author won't kill off any main characters? I'm fairly sure at least some of them will die before they end.

Anyway, I don't dislike Hierophant, Adjutant, or Archer. I dislike Cat and (to a lesser extent) Thief for the absurd idea that the best way to do good is to join a foreign empire of ruthless militarists with a proud cultural heritage of demon-summoning and evil cackling. This is a bad plan, as they learned at Liesse.

Collaboration is a dumb choice. It's quite possible to free Callow and defeat Praes, and Callow was a lot better off fighting the Dread Empire than surrendering to their Evil overlords. Catherine's attempts to rationalize her actions as protecting Callow have failed, and she's turned the southern third of her country into a refugee camp while she's at war with most of the continent.

Wasn't being a collaborator supposed to spare Callow from being invaded? That plan was a disaster, like most of Cat's plans, because she's really not a great strategist. Black's "Rage against the Heavens" strategy makes sense, but Catherine's whole idea of shielding Callow was obviously flawed from the outset. They're going to be a battlefield; the only question is which side they were on.

She picked the wrong team, and now Callow is paying for it.

RanVor

In your mind, you have already condemned Callow for an eternity of suffering at the hands of cruel tyrants and no less cruel liberators. I didn't. I believe in Cat and her quest to tell all the gods to fuck off and leave her people (and possibly all people) alone.

She picked the wrong team because:

- a) it was the only team available,
- b) not being a part of the team wasn't an option, and
- c) the other team is actively acting against her goal of removing Callow from the conflict forever. So she didn't really have that much choice in that matter. It's far too late to change sides now, and even if it wasn't, she'd have to forgo her goal for a vague promise of not getting fucked over too much. She's doing what she can with what she has, and she isn't actually that bad at it.

Also, she quite possibly prevented Akua from becoming a Dread Empress. That's gotta count for something.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Callow did pretty well when it was a Good nation. Yes, the Praesi invaded every generation, but Callow usually threw them back without too many losses, and most of the country wasn't touched by war.

That's not "an eternity of suffering", that's an unfortunate consequence of having a terrible neighbor. Catherine's alternative is to surrender to that terrible neighbor and then to inevitably be caught up in their frequent and ugly civil wars. The people of Liesse would have something to say about that decision if any of them were still alive.

I don't blame Catherine for picking the wrong team; as you say, she had limited options. I blame her for remaining on Team Practical Evil after Liesse, when she had clearly seen that they couldn't protect Callow.

It's not too late to change sides even now. I would have done it much earlier; at the start of the campaign, Cat should have opened a gate to Arcadia, bring Malanza's army into Callow, and smash Black. He'd be surrounded, cut off from supplies, and vastly outnumbered in both regular soldiers and Named. Cat would renounce her evil mentor, and rise with a Heroic or Neutral name to strike down the Black Knight and restore a free Callow.

If Cat was Good or Neutral, there would be no excuse for deposing her. Callow could resume its ancient role as a bulwark against Evil, Praes would be broken for at least a generation, and the Good Queen could create a Legion-trained army that would stand up to the worst Praes could throw at them.

Cat's problem is the sunk cost fallacy. She keeps trying to find a way to fix her mistakes when she should just defect to Team Practical Good, join up with Cordelia, and wipe out Team Practical Evil.

Stopping Akua does count for something. It would count for more if Akua's rise hadn't been aided by Malicia, who was deliberately trying to get her to make a superweapon. What's the point of Practical Evil if they can't stop Diabolist before she kills an entire city?

RanVor

There's no Team Practical Good. All the business Procerans have in Callow is to force people of Callow to martyr themselves so they don't have to. There's nothing noble about it. The closest thing we've had to the Practical Good so far is the Bard, who made it clear that the Heavens prefer mass murderer Akua to rational, not-attacking-unless-provoked Catherine.

It is far too late to change sides. If you didn't notice, the first demand of the crusaders after entering Callow was for Catherine to die, and it remains their main condition to this moment.

As for stopping Akua, I meant that scene towards the end of the third book in which Catherine experienced alternate timelines as the Hero, the Tolltaker and the officer in the Legions. In all of them, Akua has successfully overthrown Malicia and became Dread Empress Magnificent. As we know, it didn't happen in the real timeline.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Callowans can be martyred fighting evil, or they can die because their Collaborator-in-Chief decided that making Akua Sahelian governor of Liesse would have any disastrous consequences. Maybe it would be better to go out fighting rather than dying in an Evil Civil War.

Cordelia is Practical Good. She wants all the Good nations to make peace with each other and work together to stop Evil. If Catherine was willing to abandon her Praesi buddies and stop making Callow evil, they could make a deal. Instead, Catherine has gotten half of her army killed, and she's at war with most of Calernia.

Catherine could renounce Evil and take up a Good or Neutral Name. Once she did that, she wouldn't be a Villain anymore, and the Heroes would be glad to team up with her. The "redeemed Villain" story is old and well-established, and there would be no problem with a repentant Villain on the throne of Callow.

We don't know how much of that vision was "real", and I sincerely doubt that things would have gone that smoothly for Akua even if Cat wasn't around. Black is still there, after all, and he and the Calamities are probably more than a match for Diabolist.

Despite Catherine's belief to the contrary, there's nothing that awful about serving as a bulwark against Evil. Callow has only been conquered twice in centuries of resisting invasion, and the only thing stopping them from returning to their proud traditions is Catherine Foundling, who insists that the only "practical" approach is to team up with the most hated nation in Calernia.

As a result, the southern third of her country is in ruins, and the northern third is being invaded. If Catherine had joined the Crusade, they would probably be casting down the Tower by now, and Callow could enjoy a few decades of peace and quiet. Instead, they've committed to ongoing war against Procer, Ashur, the Dominion, and every Heroic Named in Calernia. How's that working out for them?

RanVor

Or they can break free of the cycle and make others take their pissing match somewhere else.

As you probably well remember (and consciously choose to ignore this fact), Catherine was oath-bound to recommend Akua to the post of the governor of Liesse, still did everything in her power to make sure the Diabolist didn't actually get the post, was rightly horrified when it happened, and it only happened because Malicia already knew what Akua was up to and Catherine's input didn't matter in the end.

Another fact you keep ignoring is that Malicia's main goal is ruling Praes forever. Therefore she's not going to jeopardize it by invading people she doesn't have to invade, for the reasons you masterfully summarized in the different comment chain. She's Practical Evil after all. She's more intent to preserve what she already has achieved than getting in over her head knowing she's going to get fucked over at some point. Invading Callow was necessary, because without it, Praes would starve. Invading Procer is pointless from Malicia's point of view.

Eliminating Praes as a threat forever is not feasible. Destroying the Tower won't be enough; it's been done twice and it didn't work. Only complete extermination of the entire Praes population would put an end to the Dread Empire. Without it, people of Callow would be forever forced to bleed in pointless wars that could be averted, but didn't because Heavens want it that way, and it's more convenient for Procer.

By Catherine's "Praesi buddies" you mean Juniper, Aisha, Hakram, Ratface, Masego and others, right? Juniper and Hakram would surely die first, because they're monsters and cannot be allowed to live. Masego would be killed on account of being a villain and son of a Calamity. Catherine would probably be forced to slaughter them herself, to "prove her redemption". Aisha, Ratface, Kilian and others might at best be cast out, then re-inducted into the Legions and killed by Callowan soldiers. All in the name of the GREATER GOOD, of course.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Catherine had reasons for agreeing to appoint Akua to be governor of Liesse, but it was still her decision and her responsibility. She acknowledges this. Catherine underestimated how much harm Akua could cause, and she was distracted by other problems, but her entire job is to stop this from happening, and she didn't.

I agree that Malicia isn't going to cackle and decide to invade Procer. But no matter what she thinks, Malicia won't be in charge forever. As Malicia rightly pointed out, Praes is a nation full of people who want things, and one of the things they want is to conquer and loot their neighbors. Now that Callow is part of the Dread Empire, their closest neighbor is Procer. Oh, and they have a poison that lets them kill an entire city and raise the corpses as zombies.

You are also right to say that Praes can't be eliminated forever. The most that the Crusade will do is break their power for a generation or two. In that time, though, Callow can build Legions of its own, form stronger alliances with other Good nations, and prepare to fight the Dread Empire. Or they can surrender to the culture that produced Akua and fight the rest of Calernia right now. One of these sounds like a better plan than the other.

Bleeding in wars against Praes is better than being sacrificed for ritual fodder or used as cannon fodder against other Good nations. If Callow has to fight someone, better Praes than the rest of Calernia.

All of Catherine's friends are combatants, and their lives are less important than the lives of innocent civilians. All of them have plenty of blood on their own hands, and morality isn't about sparing the people whose names you know. If they have to die so that Callow is spared, Catherine should do it.

"Breaking the cycle" sounds like a great idea until you realize that Bard has been slaughtering Black's plans like they were a rookie hero facing the Calamities. The only change in the Story is that, instead of Praes fighting Callow, Callow and Praes are fighting everyone else.

As the bulwark against Evil, Callow usually crushed Praes's armies in the south, leaving most of the country intact. As an ally of Evil, their country has been wrecked, and they're fighting one Proceran army to a very bloody stalemate. A traditional story that has them winning decisively could be better than a new story that has them getting stomped by the Tenth Crusade.

RanVor

So you're basically saying Cat should just forget about her dream, acknowledge the futility of her efforts and die? Preferably after murdering people who trusted her with their lives? Is that what you're saying?

Because that's what I see when I read your comments.

Ok, as for actual response:

Catherine didn't actually have a say when it came to appointing Akua the governor of Liesse. This entire farce was mainly for public eyes.

Of course Malicia isn't going to rule forever, despite her best efforts. But one would think that having a stable, relatively sane ruler in charge of a dangerous neighboring country is a good thing and it should be kept that way for as long as possible. Apparently it works differently in Calernia.

I'm sure people of Callow would prefer one bloody war with Procer to a thousand bloody wars with Praes. You speak of the invasions as if they were nothing. They weren't. Callow people of Callow suffered and bled, and lost their homes and families – every few years. The sad part is that the invasions weren't the product of just megalomania, but also necessity – without Callow's food, Praes just wouldn't survive. Of course i'm not saying sending hordes of devils and greenskins against Callowans was justified – but I totally understand why this pattern has gone on for so long. It was disastrous for both sides, but it was necessary. But it doesn't have to. If Callow and Praes form a relationship where, say, Callow exports wheat to Praes in exchange for safety of the borders, the entire pattern collapses like a house of cards. I think that is the true goal of the crusade – to ensure this doesn't happen and Callow and Praes stay in the state of permanent conflict forever. War between Good and Evil is, after all, the gods' main source of entertainment.

The Bard is an incredibly dangerous enemy. I personally see her as an "anti-Black", someone who's willing to sacrifice everything and anything to ensure the state of perpetual strife is prolonged forever. But that's all the more reason to defy her.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Cat's dream is to keep Callow prosperous and safe. Her goals hasn't changed, but her methods haven't produced good results. Instead of committing to doing the same things that haven't worked, but harder, maybe it's time to adopt a different approach.

If sacrificing some of her closest Praesi friends will save thousands or tens of thousands of Callowans, then it's her duty as a ruler to choose her people over her friends. You insist that there's something sacred about Catherine's friends and her current methods, but her main priority is the welfare of Callowans; if she can safeguard the country, her alliance with the Dread Empire and her Praesi companions are expendable.

I agree that Catherine was forced to appoint Akua. Having done so, she had to duty of stopping her by any means necessary. Catherine was in command, and command takes responsibility. She chose to side with the Dread Empire, and she chose to make a deal with Akua, and those choices made Liesse possible. Catherine admitted as much in her conversation with the First Prince.

Malicia funded Procer's civil war, sent Black to help the Tyrant of Helike, and allowed Diabolist to make a Hellgate. That's not my idea of how a good neighbor behaves.

Sometimes stable, reasonable people can be far more dangerous than raving madmen. Malicia is intelligent and capable, but she uses her abilities to invade and destabilize neighboring countries and help an old school Villain construct a Hellgate. Praesi stability simply means that they can export death and destruction to the surrounding area. Thankfully, their neighbors are done putting up with them.

The invasions were bloody, horrible affairs, even though Callow won practically all of them. Besides invading Callow, though, the Dread Empire's favorite pasttime is civil war. By joining them, Callow has just guaranteed that they'll serve as a battlefield in future succession fights, as well as any future conflicts between Procer and the Dread Empire. I'm sure that, now that they have Callow, future Emperors and Empresses will happily abandon their long history of invading their neighbors and make peace with everyone.

No, wait, that's the opposite of what's likely to happen. Malicia's successor will look at her success as a conqueror and decide to go invade Procer or the Free Cities, and Callow will be dragged along for the ride. Or they'll be a huge civil war after she dies, like there so often is, and Callow will get dragged in. Joining a giant, dysfunctional evil empire to avoid war doesn't seem like the most rational choice.

The Bard is terrifying, and she needs to be defeated. Unfortunately, Catherine doesn't have the knowledge or the cunning to do so. Even Black, for all his undeniable brilliance, has been completely outplayed by the Bard.

RanVor

You're missing the most important point – the alliance with Praes isn't meant to last forever. Once Callow is strong enough to survive on its own, Catherine is going to proclaim sovereignty. After that, if Praes wants something from Callow, it'll have to agree for Catherine's (or her successor's) terms.

You're also missing all the reasons Malicia did all the horrible things she did.

Actually, I see the Heavens' knee-jerk reaction to Catherine's rule as a proof that her dream is much more achievable than it seems, and than you try to make it look.

Even if Catherine somehow came to the conclusion that she has to do the unthinkable and betray all the people who trusted her up until now to join up with the bunch of jackasses who want to throw her country back into Forever War, I doubt it would improve her standing with Procer. An ally who changes sides whenever the wind starts blowing in different direction is unreliable, and an unreliable ally is worse than a reliable enemy.

You admit it yourself – the Bard is terrifying and she needs to be defeated. And yet you're urging Catherine to give up and join forces with her. Who's going to stand up to her then?

RanVor

Another fact you seem to be constantly forgetting about is that Callowans hate Procer almost as much as Praes, and for a good reason.

Let me outline what would likely happen if Catherine, in a sudden fit of stupidity, decided to abandon her cause and join up with Procer right now (as opposed to what you apparently think would happen).

1. THE SITUATION

The Army of Callow is severely weakened from fighting much more numerous crusader host during the Battle of the Camps. Malanza's army is also on the brink due to lack of supplies. Klaus Papenheim's army is stuck fighting Black and Warlock, and isn't going to move for some time. The rest of the Legions are stationed beyond the borders of Callow, waiting.

2. THE ASSUMPTION

Let's say Catherine decides joining the crusade is a wise move that will indeed help Callow (spoiler: it won't). During negotiations with Malanza, she offers full cooperation of the Army of Callow during the invasion and somehow manages to avoid being beheaded on the spot. The truce is made.

3. THE PREDICTION

The large part of the Army of Callow, including almost entire command staff, is immediately executed on account of being Praesi. The Army of Callow is finished as a fighting force. The Callowans declare Catherine a traitor for selling them out to the Procerans after promising them freedom. The remains of the Army of Callow are inducted into the crusader host, and promptly begin sabotaging it, stalling its advance and giving Callowans time to rise into rebellion. Already decimated from fighting Catherine and ill-prepared to fight the guerrillas, the crusader host retreats to regroup. Malicia seizes the opportunity and the Legions enter Callow as liberators, offering the guerrilla forces assistance in casting the invaders out of their land, while simultaneously reinstating Praesi rule in Callow. Hasenbach concludes that Callow is now forever lost to Evil and the next wave of the crusaders annex what they can and raze the rest of the country to the ground on their way to the Tower, to deny Praes the resources.

4. THE CONCLUSION

Callow is in ruins with no hope of ever being rebuilt. Catherine, seeing how utterly she failed her people, commits suicide. In Praes, the power vacuum created after Malicia's fall is quickly filled by another madman who immediately begins plotting the downfall of Procer. The idea of Practical Evil is lost forever, as is the only chance to break the cycle of perpetual strife. The Bard grins devilishly and disappears, her mission accomplished.

THE END.

Dylan Tullios

RanVor:

The proper term for a province of an empire "proclaiming sovereignty" is actually "rebellion". If Catherine, or any future Callowan ruler, decides to go against the Tower's commands, then Callow will be in rebellion, and we'll be right back in the Forever War, with Praes grasping and Callow resisting. The idea that future Emperor or Empresses will be cool with Callow just doing its own thing is hilarious.

Malicia had lots of reasons for doing horrible things. None of her neighbors care about those reasons. They're not sympathetic to her sad backstory or her desperate desire for control; they see that she's a dangerous tyrant who likes invading her neighbors and destabilizing rival countries, and they've decided to put her down.

Redemption stories are a big deal in the Narrative. Villainous Cat is a dangerous, unreliable traitor; Heroic or Neutral Cat would be welcomed as a comrade. Grey Pilgrim is in charge of the Heroic Named in Callow, and he'd be overjoyed to see Catherine come to the side of the Heavens.

Catherine isn't standing up to the Bard. She's not a player, because she doesn't even know what the game is. All she's doing is running around trying to put out fires while the Bard neatly moves her pieces into position and prepares for the endgame.

The underlying flaw with all of your assumptions is that Callow hates Procer more than Praes. But Procer hasn't murdered any cities and raised their people as undead, and Praes has. Quite recently, in fact.

Grandmaster Talbot and his fellow knights would be overjoyed to turn their swords against vile Praesi. The bulk of the army's infantry are Callowan, and their loyalty is to their own queen, not the Tower or foreign officers. Your entire projection is based on the idea that Callowans would rather support the Dread Empire than Catherine, and that idea is wrong.

Here's what actually happens:

Catherine defects. The Grey Pilgrim uses his truth sense, and tells them she means it. Saint is unhappy, but she goes along.

Catherine executes her own command staff and a large part of her army. She's still got her knights, though, and most of her infantry. They join up with the Crusading host and march south.

Black can't move because Pappenheim will invade the moment he moves away from the Vales. Legions from the Wasteland start to move north into Callow, but Catherine uses her gates to move the united army to the Blessed Isle, halting the invasion attempt.

Catherine then takes the Grey Pilgrim to the armies of the Dominion and gates them into Callow. With a vast army and a force of Heroic Named, they attack Black from behind while Pappenheim attacks from the front. For all of his strategic genius, Black has no chance.

The Crusading Host gates to Ater and casts down the Tower. The Dread Empire descends into civil war.

Catherine abdicates in favor of Anne Kendall, but hangs around to remind ambitious Princes that Callow is not their playtoy. The armies of the Levant back her up, since they don't want Procer to gain any more territory.

Everyone celebrates! Well, except the Praesi, but they're awful people, and they really had it coming.

RanVor

That is total bullshit and I'm not interested in replying anymore.

RanVor

Ok, I changed my mind.

You obviously never met a man who holds grudges. Like, **really** holds grudges. Callowans still remember Proceran occupation, and it really wasn't any better than Praesi one. Not to mention the recent offenses of Procer, like funding the rebellion that ended in a disaster. Or, I dunno, funding a certain Diabolist's little experiment in Liesse, although I'm not sure they know about that. Furthermore, the Praesi have been very cooperative since that incident (being thrown out of the country probably helped), while Procerans just invaded with a big army and began killing. This wouldn't sit well with anyone, but especially Callowans. Meanwhile, Catherine managed to wrest from the Empress a ridiculous amount of autonomy for Callow. It's not a province anymore – it's a vassal state, with its own ruler, its own currency and its own army. And the crusade comes to take it all away. So I'd risk saying people of Callow do, in fact, hate Procer a little more than Praes at the moment.

When the demon was unleashed on Marchford, who saved them? The Legions. When they burned in the fires of Summer, who saved them? The Legions. When the Diabolist turned Liesse into a flying, greater breach-shitting fortress, who saved them? The Legions. When did Procer save them? Never. The Procerans have no right to demand anything from them, and they know it.

The assumption that the Callowans would be happy to serve under (not side by side with, because they wouldn't have officers anymore and therefore wouldn't be able to wage war on their own) people who tried to kill them just a couple of hours ago is preposterous. I have no idea how you managed to come to this conclusion.

As for the vile Praesi, I'd like to remind you the scene in which young Hanno's mother was lynched before his eyes just for being born in Praes. Nevermind that she fled from there, didn't do anything bad and only prayed to the Gods Below because she was afraid of what would happen if she stopped. She was Praesi, therefore Evil and unworthy to live. This is the kind of people the crusaders are going to slaughter in large quantities. Not the villains. Not the nobles. Regular people, whose only crimes are being born and raised in Praes. They might not be the paragons of virtue, but let's face it – the Procerans aren't either. Not all Praesi are monsters. But that's not going to stop the crusaders from treating them as if they were. The Book of All Things speaks of the choice, but it's a lie. Not many people actually have it. For most, their allegiance is determined from the moment they are born, for better or for worse. This is ridiculously unfair and I refuse to stand by it. And to add insult to injury, the actual monsters will most likely survive, holed up in their strongholds no sane man would venture into willingly.

Of course Catherine is a player. If she wasn't, there wouldn't be a crusade. The real reason for this farce is that the gods look at Catherine and feel threatened. That's why the crusade is concentrating on Callow. As you probably well remember (and once again choose to ignore it) Catherine offered the Pilgrim free passage to Praes through Arcadia, and even helping in the assault on the Tower, during their first conversation. He refused. Why? Because the crusades's actual objective is to destroy the Black Queen. That's why every Hero on the continent suddenly took interest in the reborn Kingdom. Praes is only a pretext. Malicia and Black together aren't as dangerous to the Heavens as Catherine. She's just thinking on a too small scale. This isn't about Callow anymore. Scratch that, I just re-read her conversation with Pilgrim – she's well aware of the actual stakes.

As for your preferred ending, everyone indeed celebrates, and the Bard most of all, because she just won.

Ok, it's the end of the line. I'm not going to comment on this one anymore, for real this time. One more thing I wanted to say is that your arguments are so ruthlessly pragmatic, it's admirable and scary at the same time. Are you sure you're not a sociopath?

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

That's your call.

The real nonsense here is the idea that Practical Evil is somehow the best approach for Callow when it has "Evil" in its name!

Protagonist bias aside, Catherine is a collaborator who has miserably failed to protect Callow, and she's currently getting her army killed fighting the Crusaders while Malicia plans to backstab her and reduce Callow to a conquered province again.

However bad her alternatives are, they're better than teaming up with a cold-blooded monster like Black and a treacherous tyrant who secretly helped Akua make a Hellgate.

grzecho2222

Cat is representant of something called positivim and I would say that Cordelia is very similar to Bismarck. And when you know what his not very evil ideas spawned in the end you could say that Praes at it worst is better choice

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

I seem to have missed the part where the Procerans killed an entire city and raised its population as undead.

Oh, wait, that was the Praesi.

Who unleashed the demon at Marchford? A Praesi. Who caused Summer to attack Callow? A Praesi. At their best, all the Praesi have been doing is cleaning up their own mess, a mess that wouldn't have even existed if they hadn't invaded Callow.

The Praesi basically had an entire civil war right in the middle of Callow, and it was mostly Callowans dying in it. So much for the peace and good government of Practical Evil!

Right now, Catherine is running a largely independent Callow, but Malicia is already planning on backstabbing her and turning Callow into a weak, dependent puppet state. She's also stuck as an ally, fighting with Praes against the rest of Calernia. So Callow gets to fight all of the enemies the Praesi make, and they get to suffer whenever a Praesi succession dispute turns into a civil war, which is depressingly common. This deal is sounding worse and worse all the time.

You seem to have forgotten about what the conquest of Callow actually involved. First the Praesi invaded and killed anyone who resisted. Then they killed anyone who rebelled. Then they killed the families of rebels. They murdered a huge number of Callowans to conquer Callow and keep it.

Every Callowan soldier in the army has been serving under people who murdered Callowans. The only difference is that the Procerans have only been killing Callowan soldiers, while the Legions were quite happy to hang entire families for the rebellion of one member.

Plenty of soldiers find themselves fighting alongside, or even under, people they used to be fighting against. War makes for strange bedfellows. If Callowans can stand to fight alongside people of the nation they call "the Enemy", they can stand Procerans.

You are right to say that the Crusade is going to kill a huge number of innocent people for the crime of being born in the wrong country. What is the alternative? Wait for Praes to construct another Hellgate? Allow Malicia to foment civil war in Procer? Innocent peasants suffer in war, and Crusades are no exception. The only defense is that more people are going to die if Evil gets to entrench itself in Callow.

A Villain on the throne of Callow will turn Callow Evil. This isn't even about keeping Callow out of the Dread Empire; it's about keeping the country on the side of Good. We've seen what Evil looks like; Good, however flawed, is much better than the Dread Empire. If Catherine turns Callow into Praes, all of Calernia will pay the price. Better a war now than a much bigger, uglier war later.

If Catherine is playing chess against Bard, Bard is the world champion of all time, and Catherine is still trying to figure out how the horsy pieces move. Betting Callow's future on her ability to outscheme an ancient monster that defeated Black does not strike me as a great decision.

I am not a sociopath, but I try to think outside the box and consider the general welfare. Cat tends to get invested in the individuals whose names she knows, but Black just showed her that he views her as a tool, and the rest of her Praesi friends simply aren't as important as the huge numbers of innocent Callowans who will die if she stays on Team Practical Evil. Defecting would be ruthless and treacherous, but Black's lessons weren't wrong; she has to keep her on the prize, which is protecting Callow, not helping Black or saving her friends.

RanVor

Why didn't you tell me that from the start? We wouldn't have this conversation at all. I have no interest in arguing with people who believe in genocide for the greater good.

Metrux

Just to remind you, at the end of it all, that Procer conquered Callow more times than Praes did. For her, and most Callowans, it doesn't matter that Procer is good, they are the enemy. And honestly, they have more civil wars AND outside wars than Praes, so unless you think Demons are inherently worse than brainwashing angels, there is no reason to see Procer as better than Praes. Sure, Callow seemed to be better, but they were starving and bankrupt, always fending off both Praes and Procer. It's not about being on the right side, it's about breaking the sides altogether and making something better, except no one wants to even let her try.

Dylan Tullios

RanVor:

The proper term for a province of an empire "proclaiming sovereignty" is actually "rebellion". If Catherine, or any future Callowan ruler, decides to go against the Tower's commands, then Callow will be in rebellion, and we'll be right back in the Forever War, with Praes grasping and Callow resisting. The idea that future Emperor or Empresses will be cool with Callow just doing its own thing is hilarious.

Malicia had lots of reasons for doing horrible things. None of her neighbors care about those reasons. They're not sympathetic to her sad backstory or her desperate desire for control; they see that she's a dangerous tyrant who likes invading her neighbors and destabilizing rival countries, and they've decided to put her down.

Redemption stories are a big deal in the Narrative. Villainous Cat is a dangerous, unreliable traitor; Heroic or Neutral Cat would be welcomed as a comrade. Grey Pilgrim is in charge of the Heroic Named in Callow, and he'd be overjoyed to see Catherine come to the side of the Heavens.

Catherine isn't standing up to the Bard. She's not a player, because she doesn't even know what the game is. All she's doing is running around trying to put out fires while the Bard neatly moves her pieces into position and prepares for the endgame.

The underlying flaw with all of your assumptions is that Callow hates Procer more than Praes. But Procer hasn't murdered any cities and raised their people as undead, and Praes has. Quite recently, in fact.

Grandmaster Talbot and his fellow knights would be overjoyed to turn their swords against vile Praesi. The bulk of the army's infantry are Callowan, and their loyalty is to their own queen, not the Tower or foreign officers. Your entire projection is based on the idea that Callowans would rather support the Dread Empire than Catherine, and that idea is wrong.

Here's what actually happens:

Catherine defects. The Grey Pilgrim uses his truth sense, and tells them she means it. Saint is unhappy, but she goes along.

Catherine executes her own command staff and a large part of her army. She's still got her knights, though, and most of her infantry. They join up with the Crusading host and march south.

Black can't move because Pappenheim will invade the moment he moves away from the Vales. Legions from the Wasteland start to move north into Callow, but Catherine uses her gates to move the united army to the Blessed Isle, halting the invasion attempt.

Catherine then takes the Grey Pilgrim to the armies of the Dominion and gates them into Callow. With a vast army and a force of Heroic Named, they attack Black from behind while Pappenheim attacks from the front. For all of his strategic genius, Black has no chance.

The Crusading Host gates to Ater and casts down the Tower. The Dread Empire descends into civil war.

Catherine abdicates in favor of Anne Kendall, but hangs around to remind ambitious Princes that Callow is not their playtoy. The armies of the Levant back her up, since they don't want Procer to gain any more territory.

Everyone celebrates! Well, except the Praesi, but they're awful people, and they really had it coming.

vuthuha912

Honestly, you aren't wrong about Praes – they are awful people, and if I were not as invested in Praes as I am now, I would totally advise people to ditch them. Yet, I sympathize with their conditions because you know they are dealt a bad hand – the worst hand that I have seen. Still, they really have to get their act together soon by being better people.

And despite having everything handed on a silver plate for them (foods, silver, power), Proceran prince is still as awful as Praesi noble. They are marginally better in the fact that they don't use magic and can't summon devils or demons. And not every Praesi can whip out a demon at any moment.

Other people's greatest virtue is not being born in Praes. They are as good as the condition allows them to be. Proceran Prince who prays in the House isn't more virtuous than a common Praesi. They squandered their good fortune on civil wars and attacking other Good nations. Praes does fan the flame but they need to have the thoughts of treason to actually commit it. My gosh, Cordelia – the best person to be Procer's leader, organizes the war to get rid of landless peasants. I mean wtf, girl. You are supposed to help them, with land reforms, trade deals, etc not throwing them like unwanted trash. She is good at diplomacy and making political alliances but shows no interest in internal improvements or welfare policies. Killing peasants in a foreign war is not a suitable solution – this is the exact solution that Praes uses on its population. I swear, killing/exiling several nobles and confiscating their property or just buying land and giving it to the peasant can deal with the problems quite well.

Forget about the 'common enemy that united us all', a common enemy will do shit if no one in that alliance shares the same priority. You think that having Qin as the common enemy will unite the rest of China into opposing them or the Coalition vs Dong Zhou or Wu and Shu vs Wei. A common enemy is not enough unless that common enemy can actually threaten the rest's survival, people will unite for 10 seconds and then break up. Unless Black or Malicia or Cat suddenly becomes as powerful as Dead King or Triumphant, people will keep on fighting.

Religion can be powerful but it will mean nothing in the face of death and hunger. The peasant class in Procer is shouldering a heavy burden of both fighting the war and maintaining the economy. They haven't got time to recover from the last decade of the civil war because their leader cares more about her grand plan than caring about the welfare of her population. She does care but not enough to lend them a hand or postpone the invasion for a little longer. One disaster more and Procer will be on fire for peasant rebellion.

As for Praes, the one reason why I don't want Black to die is that he is the close thing to a solution for that country. He understands their problems or the root of them, he actually wants to fix them, he has great eyes for talent, he has his priority straight, and he fucking survives his attempt at fixing Praes. He is closer than anyone in that awful country to fix it. He has no relationship outside of work, no family left, and needs no personal power or money. He is the closest character to Zhuge Liang and Xun Yu in terms of dedication and patriotism. Thus, I want him to succeed. Zhuge Liang failed despite all his brilliance and determination. Xun Yu trusted the wrong master and got himself killed. I want both of them to succeed so bad and it broke my heart because I knew they won't end up well. So just this time, please Gods both Above and Bellow, help my favorite character gets his dream and survive.

For Calow, I mean they can totally turn their back on Praes, I get it. The situation really sucks for them and they really should just turn sides. I think Cat was not wrong in trying to work through Praes and then try for a deal like India did with the British to gain independence. Obviously, Black was planning to do that from the beginning, trying to give Calow more independence. His main objective was just the grain preferably through tribute but trade is fine too. He wasn't fucking it up like Britain did with its maps and Pakistan. The power was planned to get to Cat eventually but Akua... happened. Thus, if we do betray Praes, we need to do it tactfully. Keeping negotiation and trading on the table because at least there is still a chance that the situation can get better than the old one. Also, a pardon and honorary citizenship for all Praesi military personnel fighting for Calow. We are not the type to push the people who bleed for us under the bus. They can contribute to society and pay taxes while we give them away out of their horrible situation.

Though I am proud of my country's resistance to foreign invaders, I can admit that the war to get our independence is way too bloody. Maybe if we wait a little longer, we might make a better deal with France into letting us go peacefully. But, honestly, my people are too tired of being under France or any foreign powers at that point. We asked again and again for a way out but racism really blundered our chances. Your method of dealing with Praes is too crass and absolute. If you killed both Black and Malicia then any chance of Praes getting out of the cycle goes with them in the near future. How long does Praes need to wait for another none crazy person to take the throne? How many Maligant and Regalia and Nefarious does it take to get Maleficent or Terribilus? This generation is the one where a sort of Terribilus (Black) and Maleficent (Malicia) appear. The chance was so slim that it might be a rare miracle. ... And Malicia fucked it up. But, it can still be salvaged ... somehow... someway. I want it to get better, not worse. Even if we are swimming against the river it is still better than letting all go like Tyrant.

And I call bullshit on Evil corrupt nonsense. Look at the Procer princes. Are they just the most virtuous of men and the kindest of women? They are just as awful as Praesi without the demon summoning. Gods have nothing to do with their choice to commit treason – by accepting foreign aid to prolong a civil war in their own country. It is on them. No demon is mind-controlling them except the Greed Demon. In war, bribery, assassinations, etc are fair games. People wage war even before the fighting begins.

Jonnnnz

A few points:

Is this a second beat of a pattern of three between the Saint and Cat? First time Cat soundly lost, this was a draw... Third time coming up later?

Akua brought the heart of the matter up: this is an invading force. They can complain all they want, but a general that moves an army to where they cannot retreat is the one that sentenced them to die. What exactly can they offer but surrender?

Last point: Cat is keeping with Malicia's directives. It is probably the smart thing. But at the very least she needs to make the lesson of "invading Callow is bad" stick... Which might require one of the two people that Malicia's orders were to leave untouched to be harmed.

Jonnnney

She lost twice to the Saint. First with headsman and second before dropping the lake.

Dainpdf

Multiple dead heroes plus a decimated, hungry army bringing stories of sudden frost lakes and legions of undead against whom the Light doesn't work like it should will probably do the work.

Euodiachloris

Let's face it, stories increase in the telling. And, the story of "Don't Play War Games With the Black Queen After She Has Offered to Let You Go With Terms You Don't Like – Because She'll Freeze Your Undercarriage Off and Then Make You Go Away With Worse Terms" has plenty of actual gory detail without any of the inflation.

Imagine what it'll look like with the helpful input of tavern singers?

Cicero

Actually Cat had two previous conflicts with the Saint.

First was the raid to kill enemy officer. Cat definitely lost. Had Winter cut, etc.

Second was the fight just before Cat opened the gate. Cat didn't even try to fight but immediately fled. Was this a loss? Or was it a draw since Cat never intended to fight and fleeing was her plan in the first place? She did manage to escape losing nothing more than bits of her armor.

Does the fight between Saint and Akua count was the third conflict? Akua was winning.

Or does this really mean that there is a third conflict yet to come between Cat and Saint, but Saint thinks it will be their fourth conflict, thus she won't be wary of the rule of three?

Or perhaps the rule of three doesn't hold as much power in large scale crusades?

ahd

Do the edges of Cat's gateways cut? I wonder what the result of Cat's absolutely positioned gateway would have been if opened at about chest level, rather than up in the sky.

Either the crusaders would have been bisected by the opening, or they would have been standing with their feet in Creation and their head in Arcadia.

...and then Cat could close the gate.

If Hierophant ever comes online again, we might get to find out.

Dainpdf

Either it doesn't work, or Cat deemed the chance of backfire (either political or due to easy access by heroes) made it too risky.

Dainpdf

This was... Okay? Anticlimactic, after the last chapter, although I do understand why Cat took the decisions she did.

James, Mostly Harmless

This may not feel like a victory, but it is one anyway. Even though they were outnumbered two to one in troops and three to one in Named, the Army of Callow fought the invaders to a standstill and forced them to withdraw. More importantly, Malanza KNOWS this is a defeat, knows that she had no way to win so the best that she could do at this point was survive.

RanVor

Actually, it's probably the only option that (presumably) doesn't lead to mutual annihilation. In every other scenario, the winning army would be terminally crippled and unable to continue the campaign. But with so much damage already done, there's not much difference between victory and defeat anyway.

NZPIEFACE

Wait a minute, if drawing Winter for Akua makes her more Cat, why doesn't the same apply here?

wyaldriddler

Because Winter is Cat now. Not Akua, or a pinball flipper between them, it is Cat. This is because Cat has fused her Soul with Winter.

stevenneiman

I think that the mantle is filled with enough of Cat's personality that she would always be there, but it's mostly still Winter. When Akua drew heavily on Winter, it heavily influenced her personality towards Winter and left Cat to inherit that influence, but it also brought back just enough of Cat's own personality that she was able to claw her way back on top.

pagesbe

To be blunt, I was kind of hoping that the invaders would be finished with here, diplomatically if not militarily, but I think it's very likely they'll be able to regroup themselves later on.

I also cannot get over how they heroes keep whining about her murdering thousands as if she was supposed to roll over and let them invade, or try to stop them without killing them, which is stupid and ineffective. Like, this one attitude makes me way less sympathetic to them.

RanVor

I agree. It's their "how dare you to resist when we try to kill you and destroy your homeland" attitude that makes me loathe them much more than the (objectively worse) villains.

Letouriste

That's because they are sure they are in the right, because the Gods they believe in are right. Religion is often a poison: /

RanVor

Fanaticism certainly is.

benthelynx

I feel it falls flat in that. It seems like a lazy way to define an enemy.

thegreatfeed

The fun thing is. They are not the enemies, they are just tools and pawns. The true enemy this time around is Hachenbach.

Trupo

Cat is moving narrative from heroes and villains duking it out while throwing mortals into grinder, towards diplomacy and leaders discussing the realities. Pushing the Creation away from being gladiator arena for gods amusement, and towards being a place to live in.

I think the Pilgrim is moving towards realisation he can do more good by becoming Cat's peacetime advisor / mentor / good influence on Callow than by warfare, too, and will end up "better world" side of things

Letouriste

Wrong, Pilgrim was totally on the mood to end her here and now and now can guess Akua still exist and can control cat in the future...any talk with Callow are gone if he find out that

Captain Semantics

I like the idea of Pilgrim becoming a mentor figure for Catherine, it would be a great subversion of tropes

Letouriste

I don't get it...why would cat think akua made a mistake? She should know better.
And that whole day of battle is ending without any benefits for cat,she is losing...I don't understand at all what is in her mind,I expected her to go talking with juniper for information. The only benefit she could get from that day is psychological ( Saint of sword got rekt and tired and the two mortal leaders got reality smashed in their face) but i'm sure the Pilgrim know something about her now and could guess he was facing akua...only bad outcomes are coming to my mind because a potential Akua coming back is enough for reinforcing the danger cat pose to these foreigners and to break all her long term plans.

HiggsUnbound

I mean, I loved it. It was amazing, the few moments we saw, managed to grind everything and everyone to a halt, instantly.

It was pretty damned cool.

However, don't heroes kinda level up every time they take. Thrashing and walk away alive? This is the third conflict, she needs to be careful, they're going to keep getting tougher the longer this draws out.

Also, clearly Cat is far below her potential in using Winters Mantle, Akua made Cats uses look novice.

And finally, a benevolent dread emperor?

Cat still doesn't have a name, and we have no idea if she ever will, but that, that sounds like something that could happen.

Antony444

Well, at least the Heavens cheated once more and in a ridiculous manner. Seriously, what does it take to defeat heroes? Akua literally dropped tons of ice on them and exploded their lungs, and yet she didn't manage to kill a single one. And the moment Catherine takes her winged horse across the battlefield, they are somehow teleported to Malanza's side.

At this point considering none of them have ever murdered particularly strong opponents, stolen mantles or any legendary feat, the point of view espoused by Black is utterly understandable. like the Mirror Shield, heroes are granted power way over their head in exchange of a lobotomy.

And to make it better, they're so full of hypocrisy it's painful to read.

Cat sadly was right to act as she did. She could have broken the Procer army, but she can't kill all the heroes before one manage to permanently end her.

The Woe are good, but they can't be good enough to fight this kind of threat who alter reality when and where they want.

I really hope now the Dead King is on its way to ravage the heartlands of Procer. It would definitely be the ultimate irony to see the visages of the Crusade leadership as they're forced to force-march to the other side of the mountains in catastrophe as a legion of undead is on its way to Salia. Claim of fighting for the Heavens are well and good, but if you can't defend your frontiers against the Great Enemy...

shieldredblog

Don't forget the Tyrant of Helike.
Ambushing the Crusaders as they march home is just the kind of Dick move he loves.

NZPIEFACE

I absolutely love the idea of the Tyrant of Helike.

Because they get the name, they get full control over a country. Isn't that fucking awesome?

Dylan Tullos

Antony444:

Catherine can open magical gates and used that power to drop a lake on her enemies. She doesn't get to complain about other people being overpowered.

Also, there is no cheating in war.

RanVor

Catherine worked her ass off and sacrificed everything she had, up to and including her humanity, to get those powers. The Heroes didn't sacrifice anything and likely didn't even lift a finger to get theirs.

hoyboy

First, not really. Just as much Catherine has has basically been handed to her as she actually earned.

Second, that doesn't matter. This is war, you use what you have. Just because you didn't "work" for your advantages doesn't make you bad for using them. That's childish reasoning.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Catherine has no idea what the Heroes have done or sacrificed for their powers.

hoyboy said it best. A child might think that it's not "fair" to use powers the other side doesn't have, but there is no "fair" in war. Her resentment is pointless and foolish, and amounts to nothing more than "They have powers I don't, they cheated, those big meanies."

Byzantine

It seems like it's the gods she resents.

...and she has something of a point there, given they are the assholes that set this entire system up.

Dylan Tullos

Byzantine:

Agreed. Resenting the gods is always valid, since they could have set things up so that Praes wasn't starving. Also, they created ratlings, which was not a nice decision.

stevenneiman

War isn't fair, especially proxy wars like every conflict between Good and Evil mortals and Named is. Besides, I don't think anyone who's been part of an asymmetrical war has ever not grumbled about it being unfair, whether they were on the side which is ultimately more powerful or not. I occasionally feel the temptation to get angry about the design of X-Wing miniatures, and not only is that a lot better balanced than the real world, I have no stakes beyond wounded pride.

Dylan Tullos

stevenneiman:

You are entirely correct. People will gripe regardless of whether it is rational to do so.

I don't object to Cat complaining from time to time, but I find it annoying that she always insists that her opponents are OP while never considering her own advantages. Would it hurt to take a second to be thankful for the best artillery, mages, knights, and infantry in Calernia?

thespaceinvader

SUPERHERO LANDING.

Those are REALLY hard on the knees.

stevenneiman

We have reserves.

donforrester456

Superhero landings always make me think the hero tried for a tuck-and-roll, messed up halfway, then tried to make it look intentional.

Draeysine

Ok to the people who think the Pilgrim will figure it all out:

How much does he really know about Akua? I mean sure he's heard the stories but if his first reaction to meeting Cat is anything to stand by it's that he doesn't know everything. Man has flaws, and Akua did a damn good job of playing Cat.

Let's say he does think something is up and pieces it together (even though he barely had enough pieces from his perspective), Akua didn't do anything drastic with the opportunity she had. Raising a few undead ain't nothing special, and it wasn't long before Cat came back. Obviously contingencies were made and several of them.

So arguably even if Pilgrim pointed this out to the Procerans, Cat simply needs to point out how it didn't make much a difference, not would it ever.

Dylan Tullos

Draeysine:

Pilgrim would point it out to the Callowans, who would respond by lynching their own Queen, joining the Crusade, and slaughtering Black's army.

If Callow finds out that Catherine kept the Butcher of Liesse around, they're not going to listen to her explanations. They're just going to kill her.

Draeysine

He would have to know The Callowans perspective on this, and he doesn't.

He would also be trying to win a PR campaign as a foreign invader trying to slander the name of the only Callowan ruler the nation has had in a couple generations who is also the person that fought tooth and nail against all many of creatures for Callow.

Point being Pilgrim doesn't have that sway with Callow , nor the insight of the citizens perspective, or all the information to make any of it happen.

Dylan Tullos

Draeysine:

It doesn't take a genius to figure out that Akua isn't going to be popular with Callowans after murdering a city and raising the people as undead.

I agree that Pilgrim couldn't just instantly convince Callowans. The main risk is that the rumor will get out, and that Callowans close to Cat will be able to notice little details that suggest Akua is still around.

As Akua said, useful tools aren't allowed to sit idle. Catherine is going to need Akua in the battles to come, and the more she draws on her skills and powers, the more clues she will leave for people who know what to look for.

Byzantine

I think "I bound that bitch's soul to my cloak for eternity as punishment for all the horrors she unleashed" would go over pretty well with the Callowans.

Dylan Tullos

Byzantine:

Callowans would love to hear that Akua's screaming soul was trapped in Cat's cloak for eternity. Unless they found out that Akua escaped and took over Catherine's body. That would be less happy news.

RoflCat

That's the story going around though? Remember the coronation chapter from Talbot's POV? About how some can still hear the scream of Akua from the mantle from time to time.

burdi

well

if cat bestowed winter to masego and named him The Prince of Midnight, shit will start to get real

Anna

I really look forward to that conversation with Larat. Both to chew him out for not helping while Cat was asleep, and to hopefully find out more about the "journey". Also I like Larat, so :3

That finger eating reference tho 😊

1queenofblades1

I assume next chapter is the failed peace conference and after that the conclusion of the Battle of the Camps, or this was the conclusion and that chapter will be the start of the Princes' Graveyard.

Author Unknown

If Cat can wake up Masego in time, she should bring Archer to the negotiations. For the sole purpose of provoking the Saint of Swords into attacking. (If anyone can do it Archer can.) If the Saint breaks the truce and attacks alone, Cat will have a excellent chance to end Saint with all the narrative weight in Cat's favor.

Draconius Sinister

Ugh. I'm sick of the Saint and the Pilgrim. Both of them are tropes at this point, and worse, twisted tropes that show only the worst parts of that 'character' while also ignoring that trope when needed to show them as having the moral low ground vs. Cat. Saint was always annoying, but Pilgrim is rapidly reaching her levels, being an abomination of kindly mentor character and Stupid Good.

Won't stop me from reading because the villains are so damn compelling, especially since I know if the story were from the heroes' POV we'd have a much larger appreciation for their side of the war.

Anyways, good chapter, aside from my character gripes. Malanza is getting cooler all the time, and always cool to see Cat wield Phenomenal Cosmic Power.

Oshi

Except not so much. If you read the the prior Interlude with Pilgrim perspective you'll see he is playing a part. He is thinking clearly and is very much someone who has a clear vision of all the players. His assessment of all Proceran leaders as well as his obvious maneuvering to gain their trust was telling. He's just fulfilling his role by acting within it while likely planning ahead for something more. The Pilgrim is NOT a fool.

stevenneiman

I just thought of something interesting about the Grey Pilgrim. Power, especially the kind of power that comes from being the person Fate has decided is going to win, is invigorating. The Grey Pilgrim's power is at its height when lesser forces of Good are in danger. He might claim that he regrets the suffering and danger of everything he has been involved in, and he might even believe it, but what if on some level he's just addicted to his own power and he knows that the only way to really tap into it? It would cast his encouragement of his teammates in a much darker light, especially considering that he kept pressing on even after he found out that there was a meaningful risk of defeat.

Cicero

Reread, and was thinking about what the outstanding plot threads are outside of the current focus on the battle and repulsion of the northern invasion.

1: The Hells Egg. Did the heroes clear it out? What happened with that?

2: The Goblin Matrons. An important plot line, but probably part of the future conflict with Praes not relevant to what is currently happening.

3: How are things going with Black and the Warlock? Apparently this Witch of the Wilds is a big stick, big enough to take on the Warlock.

4: Where is the Adjunct, and what is he doing?

Anything else that people can remember as open plot threads?

Oshi

What is the Augur/First Prince up to?

What is the Hierarch/Crazy Mc-Backstabby up to?

What is the Bard planning next?

The Kingdom of Dead is doing what now?

Malicia has plans....

Where is the Red Vales contingent of the Crusade (Hanno/First Princes Uncle)?

Endgame for Akua now that we know some of what she is capable of and that she is still a player.

What is Winters Plan for it's new Queen?

What the hell happened to the rest of the Fae with their new one court?

Triumphant? (Speculation there)

NZPIEFACE

Well, only 12 heroes came back.

Tohron

The heroes presumably engaged the Hell Egg, since they were previously talking about there being 14 heroes with the crusaders, then shortly after Cat passed info on the egg to the Grey Pilgrim, everyone thought there had only ever been 12. What exactly happened in the engagement is unknown.

As for Hakram, he was on the border of Deorathe territory trying to make their "deal" with Amadis look convincing by raising a fuss. Now he's heading south with a Deorathe army.

Cicero

Ah!! That makes so much sense now.

At first I was thinking there was just a mistake made, but the Hell's Egg killing the extra heroes, and everyone forgetting they ever existed because it was a Demon of Absence just makes perfect sense.

Interesting.

Cicero

Yes, but why was the Adjunct available to do that in the first place?

I refuse to believe that Cat sent him off to just be prepared in case she needed a little evidence. Evidence that most likely will never even be known by the heroes.

It sounds more like Cat has him doing something else, and that something else just happened to mean he was also available to handle the Deorathe business.

Jane

Say... It occurs to me... If these truce talks are successful, the Crusaders have to go back through the pass, right? ...The pass near where they woke up a Demon of Absence, and forgot about it?

It would really suck for Cat if, after having beaten the Crusaders on the field, and then come to a carefully negotiated peace to prove that she's not a monster... All of it just ends up forgotten because the Crusaders wandered into something they shouldn't on the way back. It's probably not in the pass itself, since they still remember there's a new way to get to Procer from Callow, but it's probably close enough to be a hazard.

Clay

Is it just me or do these keep feeling shorter and shorter. You need to stop making them so pageturn-y man.

Meme man

They are, but we're getting more total words a week than we were getting with two big updates a week.

erraticerrata

Several of the interludes were a few pages longer than the average chapter. I'm guessing in comparison this one – while actually slightly longer than usual – felt short.

Yotz

>Be cold... Be clear. Be a creature of logic, because logic is what gets you through this. Everything else is distracting noise.

All hail Catherine Foundling, daughter* of Sarek!

*may or may not be adopted

Yotz

Also, I seem to be unable to post the usual way.
Strange, that is.

CrysJaL

So I'm going to call it now seeing as I don't think anyone remembers this detail. The Grey Pilgrim and The Saint of Swords' conversation in Interlude III regarding the greater evil approaching really set the stage for how this is going to end. The Saint is arrogant and thinks that she is going to win the war by killing Catherine. After all she can't die here as she has a part to play in this fight against the coming darkness. She can only win against Cat as this battle is merely a precursor to things to come.

Cat still has her whistle which contains the aspect of Take. Capable of taking away another Named's aspect and remember what saint's third aspect is? Her sword which is said to be a domain in it's own right. Cat is going to Take the sword with the single use overpowered whistle and thereby own two separate domains. The Sword touched by the heavens and the domain created by the mantle of winter. She will be the fifth Named who takes part in the fight against the coming darkness. With the sword Cat will be deemed "sufficiently of the light" to be able to fight alongside the heroes and the Pilgrim, who will have his own redemption to atone to Cat regarding whatever happens next.

I'm also going to throw it out there now that I think The Black Knight will collectively make mincemeat of all the White Knight's group save for The White Knight himself, leaving at least one place left open for the future battle which will be The Hierophant, who is actually competent and powerful enough to be of serious use as opposed to the other Named woman. The woman who wasn't a match for The Warlock and who didn't even bring out the big guns to handle her in their first engagement.

cheeseyme1999

interesting possibility, but there are a few problems with your conclusions.

1) that procer is not simply serving the will of the heavens and the commanders here fucking hates Catherine's guts. Catherine will not support the heroes unless she gets security for callow, and while the grey pilgrim/heavens might be willing to accept Catherine, Procer can, has, and likely will tell the heroes to go fuck themselves so that they can annex callow and destroy Cat

2) Black won't make mincemeat of all but the white knight, at minimum the bard will survive until the final showdown.

3) the warlock is restricted from using his big guns under the red skies policy, he wasn't allowed to do so on what was just the first fight.

crysjal

1. You're assuming Cat isn't capable of compromises. She'd be able to work with anyone if it stopped for example, an army of the dead smothering the entire continent. Her motivation is protecting Callow. A universal threat will no doubt garner some attention.

2 and 3. I honestly forgot about the bard but I don't count her as really "part" of a band considering whatever she is. I actually forgot to edit it properly before posting. I believe black and co will kill all but the white knight over their next confrontation but he will also die in the attempt. This will create tension between Cat and him later when they encounter each other.

My first point about the whistle is the thing I feel most confident about though. The whistle is the super mcguffin that the hero pulls out at the darkest point which will be saint being the supposedly unbeatable villain in the story that the crusade has become. I imagine Cat will be thrilled to be on the other side of things for once.

oldschoolvillain

Just one problem: the whistle contains Akua's aspect of Call, not Cat's former aspect of Take.

Cicero

Thinking about it... I feel that narrative wise there just is not room for a peace agreement without at least one more battle.

So what are the survival chances of the various heroes/crusaders?

Prince Amadis – 1 in 5 chance of survival.

Princess Rozala – 3 in 5 chance of survival.

The most likely way for the truce to fail to resolve into a peace agreement is that Prince Amadis refuses to accept terms that Cat will agree to. Princess Rozala seems much more aware of the limitation and the vulnerability of the Proceran position. So once Prince Amadis dies, peace terms are then accepted. Also, an arrogant ambitious jerk writing a letter to his beloved wife because he has a bad feeling about the upcoming battle... yeah that's a death flag right there.

Grey Pilgrim – 99% survival chance

Saint of Swords – 2 out of 5 chance of survival

Grey Pilgrim is not going to die. He's got a wise old man mentor thing going on with Cat now and that is just too big a narrative to end now. Saint though... while there are things arguing for her survival, I think there actually is a chance of her death. It would be a major blow to the heroes, an unexpected loss for those Above, and would fit with the theme of three and the strong hostility developing between Cat and Saint.

Forsworn Healer – 2 out of 5 chance of survival

Silent Guardian – 1 out of 2 chance of survival

Healer has a target on her back. Especially since Masego will likely be awake for this again and she is the priority target. Silent Guardian is her usual guard so she is in danger too.

Rogue Sorcerer – 3 out of 10 chance of survival

Myrmidon – 1 out of 2 chance of survival

The Sorcerer is the other priority target. Plus, with Witch of the Woods being out there as the stronger caster, there isn't a need for him in the future. Makes sense of him to die here.

Myrmidon is his usual guard because they share a language.

Mirror Knight – 1 out of 5 chance of survival

Blade of Mercy – 3 out of 10 chance of survival

Vagrant Spear – 1 out of 5 chance of survival

Painted Knife – 4 out of 5 chance of survival

Mirror Knight has Dawn, marking him as someone to die early. Additionally, his extra characterization seems pitched towards his death. In contrast the extra characterization given the Painted Knife suggests that she will survive. Meanwhile the Vagrant Spear is far too reckless and aggressive – plus Cat killed her once before. Blade of MErcy also leans slight towards death I think.

Thoughts by others?

---

Chapter 18: Cradle

“Seven battles I won on my feet, and lost the war sitting at a table.”

– Periander Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike, after the founding of the League of Free Cities

“Six hundred and thirty-two dead,” Juniper said. “Our edge has been scraped raw, Catherine.”

I was really beginning to regret that oath to Hakram, because a bottle of aragh right now would do wonders for my peace of mind. I’d guessed it was bad, when I’d taken a look from the sky, but I hadn’t understood quite how bad it had really gotten. I leaned back into my seat and passed a hand through my mess of a hair.

“You did better than I could have hoped,” I admitted. “Considering what the other side was fielding, it’s a miracle it went this well.”

Miracle was the wrong word, I decided a moment later. It was short-changing Juniper. While I’d been traipsing about the magical wonderland of Winter, the Hellhound had been dancing on the edge against an army about twice the size led by heroes. That she’d not just lasted the day but actually inflicted a defeat was a reminder that Juniper of the Red Shields did not need a Name to be one of the sharpest knives in my arsenal.

“The casualties are trouble, but there’s worse,” the Hellhound grunted. “We’re near out of munitions, and without accord with the Tower the moment our stores run dry we lose one of our heaviest advantages.”

“Goblinfire?” I asked.

"Enough for one last blaze, but not a large one," my Marshal replied. "We're entirely out of demolition charges. Sappers still have a decent stock of combat munitions, but you know how fast we go through those when they're properly used."

Even if I hadn't been taught the logistics of that at the College, Ratface's constant reminders that a protracted campaign would see us run dry halfway through would have served that purpose. Once again, Malicia managed to fuck us without ever needing to do anything but say no. The Snake Eater Tribe that had settled near Marchford had made it clear it could not produce munitions, which meant the vicious old crones in the Grey Eyries had a monopoly. It was illegal under Imperial law for anyone but the Tower to possess munitions, not that it would have stopped me if I had a solid way to get them into Callow. I didn't, and there were watchful eyes at the border just in case I felt like trying anyway.

"I heard we took a hit on siege engines," I ventured.

Which was a polite way to say that Pickler had spent exactly three heartbeats welcoming me back before beginning to rant about the Grey Pilgrim apparently wrecking her lovelies. I'd taken that to mean the repeating scorpions, and while I did not share the slightly unsettling affection my Senior Sapper had for her creations the loss of them was still a heavy blow. They were one of our major force equalizers.

"Two repeating scorpions left, no Spitters," Juniper said. "We've still got our full count of ballistas and trebuchets, but they've already proven they can make those irrelevant with their fences."

As our skirmishing contingent consisted of pretty much only the Watch, that left the mages lines as our only effective long-range option. Which wasn't saying much, considering they'd have to deal with both wizards and priests on the other side. They'd be spending most their time on defence and damage control, not going on the offensive.

"Don't count on the mages," the Hellhound warned. "We've been running them ragged for two days, fighting and healing. A lot of them are on the edge of burning out."

I sighed, fingers drumming against the arms of the chair.

"You're telling me we can't have another battle," I said.

"Not if you want to have a force capable of fighting afterwards," Juniper bluntly said. "Four to six months of recruiting and refit, and we'll be able to campaign again. Anything else is scrapping the host."

"Well," I said. "That adds a certain spice to the negotiations, doesn't it?"

The orc grunted in amusement, and I allowed myself a moment of envy as she drank a mouthful of wine. My own cup was, sadly, water. Which I didn't need anymore, or particularly enjoy.

"Had a good look when we engaged this morning," Juniper said. "They're on their last rope too. Without their officers they've had to rely on fantassins for frontline command, and we bloodied those repeatedly. Levies got bled bad, and the principality troops were always few. Most of their soldiers are fantassins, now, and mercenaries won't be eager for another go."

"They've got heroes, Juniper," I reminded her. "Morale's not ever going to be an issue for them."

"You say that, but we know for a fact they had runners after the first gate trick," the Hellhound said. "Kegan's already caught a few up north, trying to flee back to the passage."

"The meat of them will stay," I said. "Still, worth keeping in mind at least half their host is gone. Gods, fifty thousand. I still have a hard time believe we held against that."

"Wouldn't have, without the gate," the orc said. "Though that wasn't without costs."

I couldn't call it luck, not with the amount of contingencies I'd had waiting, but I couldn't deny it'd turned into a gamble in the end. I'd been so sure that if we kept the positioning aligned for only a short while... No point in whining. They had used their abilities, as I had mine. A mistake had been made, all I could do was learn from it. That particular tool wasn't going to be put away entirely, but the restrictions on where and how it could be used had to be adjusted.

"It all rests on diplomacy, then," I said.

"Your speciality, infamously," Juniper said, rather drily.

I hadn't even been back for a full day and already my underlings were ragging on me. I flipped her off, feeling the weight on my shoulders lighten the slightest bit. It just wouldn't feel like home without the sarcasm. I groaned and rose to my feet.

"Best I get started on Masego," I sighed. "It could take the entire night, if it gets tricky."

"Don't linger," the Hellhound said. "This all falls apart if you're not at the table. He's not going anywhere."

I nodded. Much as I disliked the thought of leaving my friend under any longer than I had to, as long as he was in no danger of death there were higher priorities. Having him at the table with me, even if he was blatantly bored with the proceedings, would get a point across. But uncertainty would have to do, if it took too long. I clasped Juniper's shoulder in farewell, but paused when I felt her hand take mine. She tightened her grip, face half-hidden by her fur-like dark hair.

"Good to have you back," Juniper got out, looking away. "It's not the same without you."

I embrace her, awkwardly given our respective sizes, but after that I couldn't not.

"We're still in it, Juniper," I murmured. "Bloodied but on our feet."

She shook me off, but only after a moment.

"Go away, Foundling," she growled, sounding embarrassed. "And don't let me catch you sleeping through a battle again. It's horrible for our reputation."

"Yes ma'am," I replied amusedly.

She looked highly insulted by how sloppy my farewell salute was, and the good mood clung to me all the way back to Masego's tent. I'd know she was there without ever taking a look. People had a warmth to them that I had learned to discern. Orcs were warmer than humans, as a rule, and goblins almost feverish to my senses. Archer burned warmer than any of them. My mantle stirred, tasting the sheer vitality in the air with relish. Indrani looked, at first glance, perfectly relaxed. She'd moved the folding chair she was was on so she could rest her bare feet on Masego's guts and was casually chipping away at a chunk of wood with a knife. The carving looked like the beginning of a fox to me, but given her dubious artistic skills that meant very little. Her body was perfectly loose and at a rest, but the eyes gave it away. It wasn't the restlessness of a woman who couldn't wait to move I saw there. It was the silent frustration of someone who had a problem in front of them but no way to do anything about it. Shaving off another sliver of wood, Archer flicked it at Masego's face to join a growing pile and offered me a wan smile.

"Cat," she said. "Wondered when you'd come."

Part of me wanted to simply get what I'd come here to do done as soon as possible, but instead I claimed a chair and dropped it by her side. Boots resting on the edge of the bed instead of Hierophant himself, since I was a good and loyal friend, I made myself comfortable.

"Had to talk with Juniper," I told her. "Get the lay of the land."

She hummed, knife deftly twisting in her grip so she could change the angle she was carving at. How someone so good with knives could be so terrible at sculpting, I had no idea.

"We're fucked, but so is the other side, so we're all showing teeth and pretending it's a smile," Indrani said. "That about it?"

I snorted.

"More or less," I conceded.

A sliver fell to the ground. The tent was silent, save for Masego's spell-induced breathing and the quiet whisper of steel on wood.

"He's going to be all right," I said quietly.

"Is he?" Archer said quietly. "Not so sure about that."

I turned to glance at her and found her face aloof.

"You're angry," I said.

"Angry's not the right word," the other woman replied. "I get angry, I cut a throat. This is something else."

I folded my arms around my chest, feeling defensive but not quite sure why.

"Vexed?" I said.

Her smile was thin.

"A cousin of that, I reckon," Archer said. "I understand the Lady a little better, now. Wish I didn't."

"Thought you had a pretty good handle on her already," I said.

"As much as anyone can," Indrani shrugged. "But I did always wonder, why Refuge? Not like she enjoys running it. If it was just about the fights, she could have found those as a Calamity. They have a regular hero body count. And she still talks about your teacher like she's in love with him, or as close to that as she can be."

"But now you know," I said.

"I do," Archer agreed. "Put an arrow in that hard old biddy the Saint, this morning. Walking back to camp, after you gave the signal, I had a thought."

I remained silent, watching her.

"Catherine, don't take this the wrong way, but I don't really care about any of this," Indrani sighed, waving the knife around. "It was a good laugh when you put on that crown, and the scraps keep coming. Got no complaints about that. But they're just enemies not... my enemies, you get me?"

"It doesn't feel like your fight," I quietly said.

"You're my friend," she said. "So're the others, even Vivienne though she's usually a twat about it. It's not that I mind giving a hand, and I'm pretty sure we've still got legendary fights ahead of us. But it doesn't quite scratch the itch."

"Because it's not your story," I murmured.

"It's yours," Indrani agreed. "And there's something to being part of this. The Woe, or whatever you want to call it. I found something here I didn't know I wanted, back in Refuge. But I get the Lady, now, and why she left. Because this isn't something I was meant to do, just something I'm doing."

My throat clenched.

"You were always upfront about it," I said. "That you'd leave eventually."

"Stop looking like I kicked your unicorn," she sighed. "No one's abandoning you. I'm not Ranger, Cat. I want to see it through to the end, to see what's at the end. I don't have that... it's hard to put into words. She's old, you know, in a way I don't think we can really understand."

"I never got a hard number on her age," I admitted. "At least two hundred, but that's only rumours."

Archer's knife stilled, tapping against the side of the possible fox.

"It's the half-elf thing," she said. "You go in knowing the people you meet will be dust before you even hit your prime, and there's a part of you that doesn't grow roots. Because you know it's going to pass."

I thought of the man whose name we'd avoided saying, of a quiet conversation the two of us had had long before I loved or hated him. They never understand, he'd told me, so very tiredly. Even if they love you, they never quite understand. In this, as in so many things, I was still the bearer of his legacy.

"You look sad," Indrani said suddenly, and I found her eyes on me. "It's been a long time, since I've seen you so human."

The gentleness she'd said it with made it so much worse.

"I only ever seem to be," I murmured, "when I'm at my worst."

If It'd been Hakram at my side, he would have offered comfort. Masego would have given an explanation, brought reason into it. Vivienne... I still hesitated to be that open with her. The nature of our relationship had set boundaries. You could not bare your soul to the person you'd entrusted the means to kill you with, should it prove necessary. Indrani didn't say anything, though, because unlike the others she understood that some truths simply stayed with you. Like a scar, or a limp you barely even noticed.

"You ever miss her?" I asked.

"It's different, for us," Archer replied hesitatingly. "She's not my..."

Mother, I did not say. I knew a thing or two about words it cost to speak out loud.

"Isn't she?" I gently said.

Indrani laughed, but the mockery in it was not meant for me.

"It's deeper than that," she said. "She didn't tuck me in at night, Cat, she taught me a way to live. I didn't want someone holding my hand. Or maybe I did, fuck – I was a kid and I was scared. But she gave me what I needed instead. Being able to stand on my own feet."

"It's not a weakness, you know," I said. "Loving her for that."

Archer scoffed, looking away. I left it at that.

"You ever miss him?" she asked.

My smile was a bitter one.

"I shouldn't," I said.

It was admission enough. My friend suddenly snorted, jolting in remembrance.

"I had a talk with him once, after Marchford," Indrani admitted. "I was curious after hearing so many stories so I sought him out."

"You never told me about that," I said.

"Didn't think it mattered," she shrugged. "I was going to challenge him to a spar, but he had this look..."

I chuckled.

"Like before you even entered the room he'd figured out three ways to kill you," I said.

She grinned, and it had her hazelnut eyes alight. She was most beautiful, I thought, in fleeting moments. Indrani was easy on the eyes yet not so striking it took the breath away, without the scarf, but now and then there would be a moment and it was the only thing you could think about.

"Yeah, that," she agreed. "Couldn't find the nerve. We had tea, we talked about Refuge a bit and then about the battle against the demon."

She paused.

"And then after that, mild as you please, he smiled all nice and said that if I ever attacked you again he'd have me drowned," she added.

I blinked in confusion for a moment, before I remembered the first time I'd ever met Indrani. She'd burst out of a window without warning at the manor in Marchford, then slapped me around along with Hakram and Masego. While I was still freshly wounded from a fight with devils, no less. Gods, I'd completely forgotten about that. Archer cleared her throat.

"What I mean is, I think he does," she said. "Or did."

Love me, she meant. In his own way.

"Doesn't matter," I said. "He can put it in a box when he acts. It's not that I don't think it's genuine, it's just..."

"How can it be enough, if it can fit in a box?" she said.

I nodded.

"I think I can handle caring," I admitted. "As long as it also fits in a box."

Because it was one thing, to have this tangle of gratitude and affection within me that refused to go away, but it was another to let it dictate my actions. There was a chance, however slight, that I could get to the end without killing him. But there was a greater chance I couldn't, and when the time came I could not allow myself to hesitate. Not going against a man who wouldn't.

"You ever wonder if getting older just makes us more like them?" Archer asked, looking upwards at the ceiling of the tent. "Different roads, maybe, but going to the same place."

My boot scraped against the edge of the bed uneasily.

"I think we can learn from them without becoming them," I replied. "Or maybe I just want to, because the alternative scares me. Not sure it can really be called faith, when I'm more afraid of being wrong than believing I'm right."

"They wouldn't have called a truce," Indrani decided after a moment. "They would have found a way to kill every last one of them."

My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched.

"I'm not so sure they would have been wrong to do that," I confessed.

I could feel her surprise without turning.

"Thought you are all about victory in peace, these days," Archer noted. "Peace after a lot of killing, sure, but making nice still being the end of the road."

"If I'd listened to Juniper and gone with Bonfire," I said. "A third of my army wouldn't be dead right now."

"You just got done sleeping off your last big move," she shrugged. "Not sure if it was the right call to pass on the Hellhound's plan, but I can't say for sure it was the wrong one either. Neither can you, unless you know things you're not telling me."

"So I keep telling myself," I said. "But so far, all my plan's gotten done is a lot of bleeding by people my duty is to not have bleeding. And it might fail, Indrani. That's the thorn on the stem. I need the other side to be willing to make a deal, and I'm less certain of that being a real possibility by the day. I thought Pilgrim was someone I could work with, but after this morning... They're not interested in both sides getting what they want, because if we get our way even a little bit they see it as a defeat."

"So beat them," Archer said. "Crush them so brutally they're not thinking about winning, just surviving. They'll take terms then."

I laughed harshly.

"Gods, I want to," I admitted. "It might not be easier, but it'd be simpler. If all I had to care about was coming out on top and what it takes to get there. And that's the hypocrisy of it. Because as much as I rail against them, what I'm after is utter victory as well. It just involves make treaties instead of invading another country."

"I'm still not hearing a reason not to step on them," Indrani said, frowning.

"Because Triumphant took ten years to conquer all of Calernia and five years to lose it," I said. "Just being strong isn't enough, because if strength is all that keeps the peace then the moment you falter it's gone. And we all falter, eventually. You can't dance for decades without ever missing a step. I used to think Malicia lost sight of that, when she tried to get her hands on the doomsday weapon, but now I'm not so sure. After Second Liesse I told myself she'd put herself in the corner on her own. That by fanning the flames when Procer had its civil war she ensured sooner or later there'd be a reckoning, and then made it so much worse by trying to get the weapon. Now, though, I think I get where she was coming from. She thinks the only way they'll ever negotiate with her is if the alternative is annihilation. No uncertainty, no room for a turnaround. Just..."

I snapped my fingers.

"Gone."

"We rebuilding the fortress o'doom, then?" Archer asked. "I was under the impression we didn't care for it."

"Before I told Juniper to raise the army," I said. "Before I let everyone off the leash to rebuild Callow and get it on war footing, I drew a line for myself. That'd I'd only keep fighting so long as what I led to wasn't worse than surrendering to the crusade. Because if I can't even believe that much, I'm the problem more than them."

"No to the fortress o'doom, then," Indrani snorted. "I think? It can be hard to tell with you."

"If it takes Hellgates to make what I'm doing work, then it isn't worth doing," I replied. "The thing that gets me is, what I hate most about the heroes? I do it too. I'm furious that they think they should win just because they won't compromise, but when have I ever done the same when I had the power not to?"

And I couldn't just dismiss that. Because getting angry about them being stubborn didn't hold, when I was just as stubborn. I could believe they were wrong, but I couldn't just dismiss their right to disagree with me. The fury that burned whenever they cast their righteousness in my face was childish. I'd spent years telling my enemies that blame was pointless, that it didn't change anything. That it was whining to demand the world be as you thought it should instead of how it truly was. It'd been my answer, when facing Vivienne in Laure, and I would not renounce it now. The servants of the Gods Above had powers my decisions had barred from me, but that was my own doing. I did not surrender the right to restrain and work around these powers whenever I could, but I could not honestly call it unfair. When had fair ever mattered? That I had to refrain from using powers I had gained because they were harmful or dangerous in no way meant my enemies had limit themselves the same way. If I could not win with this state of affairs, that was on my head. There could be no such thing as cheating when none of this was a game. And Gods forgive me, but I'd known it would be like this when I took up the knife.

"Winner takes all," Archer said. "The law older than laws."

"I could probably end the war in about a year," I admitted. "If I hit Black's army in the back while it's defending against the crusaders, then help them move against Praes. There'd be a lot of death before it was over, taking Praesi cities, and probably just as much in purges afterwards. I'm not sure, though, that it won't result in fewer corpses than my way. I genuinely can't tell. If I threw it all away, if I rolled over for Hasenbach... Fuck, Callow wouldn't be independent but I broke William's neck because I believe the sign on the banner is less important than the people under it. I'm not after the same things I was when I started, not anymore. The amount of corpses on the ground at the end isn't all that matters."

"Never did get why you worry so much about people," Indrani said. "Vivienne's all about the good ol' motherland and getting even, but she was upper crust before she learned wandering hands. She's got a stake in that game. You? You're an orphan, Cat. Never left Laure before Black took you in, if Hakram is to be believed. Why do you give two shits if this country burns? Not like it ever did anything for you. A chunk of it still hates your guts, and considering you sure as Hells don't enjoy ruling it you're going through a lot of trouble to keep doing just that."

More than once I'd reflected that Archer had a lot in common with orcs, when it came to the way she looked at the world. I'd been wrong, though. Oh, they both liked blood on the floor and they measured most things through strength. But orcs had... loyalties. Not in the way I'd been taught to have them, but they were there. Follow the warlord, protect the clan, uphold what an orc should be. Indrani had none of that. If she was loyal to anything, it was herself. A betrayal, to her, would be forcing herself to do something she didn't want to do. Pretending to be something else than she was. Black and I were creatures fettered to outcomes, if not means. Archer, and Ranger as well I suspected, could not conceive a world where fetters could be anything but a sin. The only thing Indrani had it in her to truly hate was being restrained.

"I thought I could fix it," I quietly said. "I looked around me and thought that, if I had the power all those other people had, I wouldn't make their mistakes. I'd use it the way it should be used. That it would be better."

Archer studied me silently.

"And do you still?"

I made and broke the Liesse Rebellion, I thought. I bargained with fae as my people died around me, failed the responsibilities I had claimed so grandly a city was blotted out from Creation along with a hundred thousand souls. I am leading this land to make war on half the continent while the rest plots my demise.

"I'm not good enough a liar," I said, "to make myself believe that."

"So leave," Indrani said. "Take your cloak and your sword, wake Masego and convince Vivienne. You have a way with her. We can be out of the kingdom before dawn."

"Do you think we're good people, Indrani?" I asked.

"Good people is what we pretend to be, when we're more afraid of consequences than we are hungry or jealous," Archer replied without hesitation. "When the living is soft and someone else takes the pain for you. It always, always falls away when you walk through fire – and we've been in too many blazes to still be wearing that face."

"Right and wrong are less important than works or not," I mused. "That's what I was taught. And it fit, you know? Because mercy's the privilege of the powerful. The House of Light can speak the pretty sentiments because by following them it wins. Black never followed his philosophy to its logical conclusion, though, because it's not about logic for him. Not really. If the Heavens always win, why should anyone ever pick another side?"

"Gold, pretty boys, the power to fry anyone getting on your nerves," Indrani suggested. "Angels tend to be pricks, too. You're being all philosophical about this, but that's just you. Most people don't think that deep about it."

"The Empire of the last twenty years was probably the most reasonable Evil has ever been on this continent," I said. "It still involved exploiting an occupied country and habitual assassination. I don't think it was worse than other current nations, not objectively. But if the best Evil can do is acceptably awful, then some things have to be reconsidered. The Pilgrim said I'm leading everyone down the cliff just by being in charge, and just because he's trying to kill me doesn't mean he's wrong."

"So stab the Empress," Archer nonchalantly said, like it was just an afternoon's work. "Climb the Tower and, you know, don't do any of that."

"That's exactly what Diabolist is trying to get me to do," I murmured. "But I think it's a trap, Indrani. Because I'll have to get worse to stay on top in Praes. Below wins, and just because I'd hang the Heavens if I could doesn't meant I trust the opposition any. And whoever puts a knife in me, a few decades down the line, takes up the old banner with the scales having tilted their way. Pilgrim's right about that too. There's going to be consequences to all of this that won't come out for decades, and if I ignore that I'm fucking over a lot more people than I'm trying to save."

"You made part of this mess, can't deny that," Indrani said. "Promises too, to people you like. I won't pretend breaking would be pleasant. But this is larger and older than us, Cat. It's the Game of the Gods. Not playing is as close to victory as you'll ever get."

"If was a heroine," I said, "I'd tell you to have a war you need two sides."

"That ship sailed when you fucked over the Hashmallim, I'm pretty sure," Archer said.

I laughed ruefully, shaking my head.

"The last time I felt like I had a grasp on any of this was when I killed the Lone Swordsman," I admitted. "Ever since it's been like swimming in the dark. I know I saw a shore on the other side, but the night is young and I'm getting tired. The longer I'm at it, the more I doubt I'll ever get to land."

"And what's our shore?" Indrani asked.

"I call them," I softly said, "the Liesse Accords."

"They worth the swim?" Archer said, eyebrow quirking.

"They're why I still have a crown on," I replied. "Because for them to work, someone needs to enforce them from this side."

"So we fight," she said.

"So we fight," I echoed.

Silence lingered between us, almost restful.

"I'm not sure I do," I murmured. "Care. If I did, why would I need so many rules?"

"Same reason anyone has rules," Indrani replied, with kindness like a knife. "Fear."

I knew better, these days, than to argue with the truth. I rose to my feet and leaned over Masego, forcing away her feet and brushing the wooden slivers off his face.

"Wake me with dawn," I told her.

She nodded silently, blade beginning to chip at wood again. I laid my hand on Hierophant's head and breathed in, seizing his dream.

I never felt myself breathe out.

---

ruduen

The more she learns, the more she realizes she doesn't know. Funny how that can work out.

Still, that much self-awareness is a lot better than what some people manage.

JunkerZone

I think that Cat's also underselling herself here. She might be clueless, but the alternatives are for exploiting Callow, not helping it.

bookhero123

I am going to be frank here, this novel is spiraling out of control.

Cat's adventures is basically her refusing the gods above and below, end result is obvious.

How do you end a war between 2 superpowers that won't make peace with each other?

Become a 3rd superpower or Annihilate both sides (can't have a war with no sides).

My guess is that cat will lead the woe to be a neutral superpower; one that the ones above nor the ones below can even touch, something like the dead king's territory but so much better that no arrogant heroes rise to fight or delusional villains trying to conquer it.

These are my two cents. Also i would love to get a move on with cat's name, i get that trying to come up with something so she is not reliant on Names is the best way to go but going with queen of winter is the most fun i believe considering the origin of the name is from arcadia so the gods can't fuck with that.

Sorry for the rant I just had to say this because i really like this novel and i would hate if it just goes to hell for one reason or another because i just lost a novel a day ago from the indecisiveness of the author, IT HAD SO MUCH POTENTIAL! T^T

RanVor

EE allegedly has all the events planned out until the end, so I don't think it's going to happen.

Rook

Any good serial author has the skeleton of the plot hashed out far in advance. The actual chapter writing is just fleshing it out, not actually deciding where to go with the story week by week, it's a very common thing to do.

In this case IMO it's exceedingly clear EE already knows what he wants to write and the only likely improvisations we'll see are subplots/minor details, not critical plot points.

Dainpdf

Calm down. The plot is going places, characters are developing, and much awesome is being had. Cat doesn't need a new Name right now; in fact, giving her one would have been a disservice since this was where we actually got to see Fae Cat in action.

Erraticetera has not let me down yet, and I am willing to trust them to live up to expectations. Heck, these last few chapters have been really great in terms of exposing the opposition in the side of Good and having Cat struggle with it.

She chose Evil, but at what cost? Do the ends really justify the means? At what point is she just running on Sunken Cost fallacy? These questions are central to the thesis of this novel. Just giving Cat enough power to kick everyone around wouldn't just be a cop out. It would actively work against everything that has been put forward this far.

bookhero123

You do make sense, sorry if my comment came out as if I don't appreciate the novel and angry or wtv but i actually REALLY like this novel it is like top 5 for me.

I was of the same opinion about Cat name, as if she gets a name she is playing the same game the gods want meanwhile while she is drawing on fae power it counts as a nice f*ck you to any plot the gods wanna go for.

I would like to thank the author and everyone who contributed to bringing forth this amazing novel, i apologize again if i came off as aggressive or unappreciative of the novel.

Dainpdf

It came off like you got way too caught up in what you wanted to happen in the novel and were demanding it happen, and quickly. I'm glad it wasn't that.

Miles

If the gods above grant Good Names, and the gods below grant Evil Names, who grants the Neutral Names? The gods on Creation? It seems Masego's goal is to meet or be one. His Name isn't explicitly Evil either, iirc.

But I doubt Cat has to overpower both Good and Evil with her new side. Creation is guided by stories, and neutral sides have a tendency to be forgotten by both sides as soon as they can make themselves irrelevant to their story.

RanVor

With every other country, it would indeed be the case, but Callow is too vital to both Praes and Procer to be left alone just like that.

As for Neutral Names, they don't exist. The alignment of the so-called "Neutral Names" is dependent on which side is granting them. Once bestowed upon an individual, they stop being neutral. Us not knowing their alignment doesn't make them unaligned.

Arthur Hansen

And yet for a while Cat the Squire existed with both Evil and Good powers. If you look at her names under her banner, none of them really qualify as evil. Archer, Thief are given, but Adjutant and Hierophant do not evoke Evil. And even the last dregs of Cat's name, Squire, was explained to be able to become the Black or the White Knight.

So even though Cat came from Evil (and really functions like it), she does terrible, terrible heroics.

RanVor

No one ever said they **have to** play their part. None of the Woe decides (or is allowed by Cat) to **act** conventionally Evil, but that doesn't mean they wouldn't if the situation was calling for it.

This chapter, in particular, convinced me that Indrani is indeed a villain. What's more, she's the closest to D&D Chaotic Evil alignment of all the Woe, being interested only in her own gratification. While not particularly malevolent, she's still incredibly dangerous and difficult to contain.

The Names themselves are not binding – the Roles are. And those can be Good or Evil, and nothing in between. The Name of the Squire can be given to an individual with a Heroic or Villainous Role, but that only means the Heroic Squire will develop into the White Knight, while the Villainous Squire will develop into the Black Knight. They don't get to choose – it's determined by their Role.

Seems like I'd use a reminder on the topic of Good powers being used by Cat. I don't remember anything of the sort.

Arthur Hansen

The regeneration "Rise" that she got from The Lone Swordsman when the Angelic Choir tried to convince her to be the 'Good' Queen Catherine when she tricked/forced them to resurrect her because she was the hero, saving the normal people from both Evil and Good.

RanVor

But being a Hero in this world isn't about saving anyone. It's about serving the Heavens, and she was doing precisely the opposite in the scene you mentioned. And Rise was the power she stole using her Evil powers. It doesn't count.

Arthur Hansen

Yet the Roles they have are (somewhat) based on normal heroics, in other words saving people (from Evil) and 'defeating' said Evil. That was why the Lone Swordsman's actions were not heroic and why Cat was able to take up the Role of hero (and got her Resurrection and Rise power).

Good wanted her to fully take up the Role, but because they were the cause of the not-heroic actions, she refused.

Good is actually forgetting what good actions are at times as long as they get their pawns to fight Evil.

I wonder if that is the true test of creation?

Tsura

Not really true. Thief was originally a Heroine and became a Villain

taovkool

Philosophy with Archer. Some talk about Liesse Accord, whatever the hells it was. And it seems like Cat went off to some Winter Wonderland Adventure when she's asleep? Eh, whatever. Anyway, good to see more character development on Cat's part. All in all, it's a nice filler chapter to lead up for the next.

I'm still wondering how all of this leads to the so called Prince's Graves.

esryok

My guess it that will happen whenever the Kingdom of the Dead makes a move. Either a location in the Kingdom where previous crusades have died (along with commanding Princes) or the undead will kill a bunch of Proceran royals during the battle itself.

Fern

God, that'd be fucking horrible. Could you imagine? All this blood and sacrifice to get to a point where Cat can sign the Liesse accord; All of that is presupposed on the idea that people like Hasenbach will be in power in Procer, not people like Amadis. If the Dead King rolls in he'll kill all the royals and pacify Procer, sure, but it also means there's no counterweight to Praes. The Liesse accords might work because people who know better are in power, and if Hasenbach gets Dead King'd that hope is smothered in the motherfucking cradle. That's awful.

Dainpdf

One would hope the Kingdom would provide the impulse necessary for everyone else to become friends. Or at least stop trying to stab each other and maybe make some concessions.

hoyboy

Catherine accidentally helping destroy the entire continent through her actions to perverse one little piece of it would certainly be narratively on point.

RanVor

And what message would it send? That war is better than peace? That genocide is the right way?

Miles

Does it need to send a message?

RanVor

I kind of does.

RanVor

Or more like, it happens anyway, no matter the intention.

burdi

Maybe its the result fifty thousand army, lead by experience general, 2 old heroes, dozen other heroes yet they failed proceran reputation must be dead, like graveyard

naturalnuke

Nah, I think it'll be with the army led by Hasenbach.

sengachi

Filler?! This is the most interesting character moment we've had so far in this book!

Dainpdf

Yeah. This is a very powerful moment for Cat. A culmination of her growth in the "versus good guys" arc. I mean, it's still ongoing, but this is a major point.

Richard Ngo

Such character development! Much bonding! Very shipping!

Also, now that she mentioned it, I'm starting to think bonfire would have been a good idea. The crusaders massively outnumbered them in soldiers and named; I hadn't realised until now how cocky it was for Cat to think she could not only win, but win without significant losses. But the rules of the game she's playing are so constraining, perhaps there simply isn't any winning move.

Matthew

Bonfire wouldn't have worked.

The advantage they had would be temporary. Remember, Hero aspects adapt to the challenge evil presents.

So Bonfire would work for two months and then the Obscure Enchanter would get an aspect called "Follow" which would allow him to pop out armies wherever Cat's went. They'd get a "Divert" which would allow them to drop the portals into the ocean.

Bonfire only works because it relies on Fae/name powers working dependably and predictably. Which they won't do if it allows Evil to win.

Yotz

If I may:

"Forget being a hero. Heroes don't get to have fun. A supervillain gets to punch cars whenever they want, and make them explode and then walk through the flames and glare at people. ... At first, I was thinking about it just to make my dad mad, but supervillains get to enjoy our powers. We can knock down buildings, escape jails, claw our way back up after getting burned in half by red hot rivets..." She trailed off into faint giggles."

Arguably, the Evil wins by not winning. Or, rather, by continuing fighting. The only way Evil will ever truly lose, is if they allow Good to end this all. The core principle behind 'iron sharpens iron' primate, that is. Sure, individual villains will be brought down by the Good – but that's the point. Only through hacking out the old wood the new, stronger, better generation of villains will come to be. After all, if you got bested by someone, that means they are better than you, even if all they better at is being one hell of a luck sunuvas.

Of course, that means that Good will always prevail in battle, but I argue that the Evil already has won the war, for the Game of Gods was rigged from the beginning. After all, it's a very Evil thing to do...

RanVor

If so, it would mean Black is looking at all of this the wrong way.

Yotz

Not necessarily. He wants to end struggle and establish the new status quo, which ultimately deprives Good from the possibility of winning, and makes – from the Below viewpoint – the difference between the Good's ultimate victory and his brave new polychromatic world insignificant.

In essentiality, he wants to break the game board.

Dainpdf

I thought what he wanted was a permanent win for Evil, just to show that it can be done. An incontrovertible, demonstrable win.

RanVor

That has already been done. The Dead King, remember?

Dainpdf

It has. Still it's what Black wanted. Perhaps he specifically wanted a victory for Praes? Or maybe he felt the KotD was a flawed victory in some way.

Yotz

In his mind – yes. it wouldn't be a win for Evil, though, and this is a thing he is unable to understand due to his upbringing. He wants to break the pattern where Good always wins in the end, but he remembers what happens when you just conquer the continent.

A win for Evil would be preserving/returning of to the Old Praes, with style over substance, playing the game just for the sake of playing the game. And Old Praes is a thing he, dare I say, hates on par with the inability of his side to have a lasting victory even once. A permanent win for Evil would be Akua (before her ""redemption"" ark), or the Tyrant (who will do it just because he enjoys playing it – remember "I love war" speech from a certain piece of fiction?), or someone alike claiming the throne. It will all crumble to dust after their deaths, but – in Akua's case – she wasn't planning to die, and – in Tyrant's case – he doesn't care. Although, in the latter case, he is insightful enough to leave the building of foundations for the others – and even this is tinted with his usual flavour.

Black is too pragmatic in his Pragmatic Evil ways, he is of 'whatever works' mindset – at least as I understand his character. He will willingly and without hesitation will use the ways of the Good side, if the ways of the Good side will produce the needed result. He uses Evil just because it far, far more efficient way to do things – if you discard petty notion of morality. Which is completely what he refuses to understand – for it's very illogical, you see – is that his perfect machine of the new world, where literal cutthroat politics of the Old Praes, constant prideful blood sacrifices, and use of things that permanently damage your only home; his wonderful new world, there is no place for all such things would be a victory his side, but not for the side of Evil.

There is only choice in this world – between the way of the Above (“Evil? Not even once!”), and the way of Below (“Why choose the lesser Evil?”). Black sees this as a false dichotomy. If the rules of the game preclude one side from having a lasting, incontrovertible victory, then he will break the game by whatever means necessary. But if game was rigged by both sides from the beginning – ‘we always win at the end’ for the Above, and ‘if the game continues, we have won’ for the Below; if the game was rigged, then breaking the rules will be an anathema for both sides – and while the Good will be actively trying to discard the offending wild card (just as we was shewn), the Evil... Well, the only thing necessary for the triumph of Good is for Evil to do nothing. They will not oppose Black directly, for it would be against their philosophical basis (GP’s delusional worldview notwithstanding), but they’ll certainly limit the amount of support they provide. And if I remember correctly, Black is the weakest Black Knight of them all specifically because he willfully acts against the constraints of his role as the enforcer of Evil.

He is a traitor to the Below because he will not kill someone just to ensure loyalty of others, if giving someone a somewhat unnecessary commendation, or monetary aid to someone’s family would be more efficient/useful in long run than just removing the source of the problem.

He is certainly not of Good, because he completely willing to commit mass murder, torture on industrial scale, and institutionalize inhumane practices if that will provide a better result. If anything, he is the first Champion of Order in the world, where previously only the Good-Evil axis existed. At least, he is a first moderately successful one of whom we know.

Or I can be compleately wrong. In which case – disregard that, I [DATA EXPUNGED].

Yotz

My apologies for unsightly amount of typos and missing words. I need some sleep, it seems.

Dainpdf

Eh. I think the Pilgrim is on to something. He’s old enough to have an idea what he’s talking about. The idea that Evil has to be like Akua is a Praesi thing. Look at all the different evil city states. You do have a point, in that Black is breaking with a lot that is classical evil, but that **is** evil. Seeing things you don't like, and BREAKING them. No matter the cost, or the consequences. Like a description we got of Akua, that she'd blast her own side apart if it meant mangling the enemy worse.

Yotz

>GP is onto something

That I can agree. Even in our world narratives hold power, and lesser people seek to imitate the Powers That Be, completely shifting societal paradigms in the span of the generation. And The Loom of Cat's world works with the Fisher King dogma weaved in its foundation, it seems. Therefore, the Villain ruler will drag the land in question into the Dark Side. What Peregrin presupposes, is that the Evil inside inevitably will show itself, in one form or another, and they will have another Old Praes in the middle of continent in a the near future. Which is unacceptable, of course. I seem to remember, he was at least accepting to the offer of Cat's abdication in favor of the Heroic ruler. But he has no sway in the ways of the Proceran ruling elite, nor he desires to get ahold of that "privilege" – and so this line of negotiations meets impasse.

>Black is evil

Well, yes, of course. The difference between him and, say, Akua lies in the willingness – or, rather, eagerness – to use 'hit yourself to scare the enemy tactics'. And you are right about the Praesi perception of things – but if there are only evil to work with, then we will make good from evil. Black seems to be of 'Kinslayer' mindset – then his perfect world is ensured to be, he will sacrifice himself as a last remnant of the Things That Should Not Be. It's the part that makes him so giddy after the Second Liesse – besides certainly-not-fatherly-pride – that Cat broke the mold of his calculations, thus making the possibility that he can yet see the dawn of the new world with his own eye quite real.

hoyboy

This is over-philosophizing Black's entire character. His entire rationale for doing what he does is explicitly motivated by nothing more than a desire to win and a fundamental feeling of existential angst over being predestined to lose. He doesn't care about breaking the dichotomy of good vs evil, only in helping the latter win in service to his own self-actualization.

His philosophy of Practical Evil only diverges from normal Evil in that it's pragmatic, but it's still virtually identical in it's goals, which is the dominance of a ruthless, Named led society over a sprawling disposable underclass for the sake of Will to Power, so I doubt the Hellgods are all that miffed about it.

Novice

I'm not sure I agree with your last paragraph since Black has, time and again, emphasized the whole 'Institutions over Named' thing.

hoyboy

I don't remember him ever endorsing institutions in of themselves, just institutions of tools for himself and people taking after him to use. Which manifests itself in the personality cult surrounding him in the legion.

Which completely misses the point of institutions as a concept.

Yotz

@hoyboy

If you are right, when his plan to be killed by Cat is complete hogwash. In fact, whole storyline of Cat is a hogwash in that case, and may be discarded as such.

RanVor

To hoyboy, since I can't reply to them normally for some reason:

Institutions don't exist for their own sake. Their entire purpose is being a tool to aid governments in controlling the populace. Black intends to use them to do exactly what they are meant for – decentralizing power and creating a stable system that doesn't fall apart when the autocrat dies.

mordered

I agree, evil has already won. Even if good ended evil forever, evil would still win. For good has to have an opposite otherwise it isn't good anymore, it just is. With evil there is a struggle, in which evil acts can be committed. Without evil good is nothing, so evil wins by default.

Dainpdf

That argument sort of works in reverse, too. And it makes no sense, because here Evil and Good are tangible metaphysical entities. You can exterminate Evil and still have Good. As for IRL, you can't really exterminate evil because it is a gradation, but you can always exterminate the worst evils in order until your new normal is much better than it is right now.

Dainpdf

That sort of assumes transitivity. If Bob beats Alice, and Catherine beats Bob, that does not mean Catherine is stronger than Alice. That means she has a better match-up vs Bob.

As for how Evil wins, two ways, really. The first is for Good to do nothing. If Good will always beat you if it tries, the best way is for it not to try.

The second is General Tarquin's (from Order of the Stick): Just count the blast you got to have for decades before those pesky five minutes of loss as a victory.

Yotz

>That means she has a better match-up vs Bob.
So, a higher LUCK stat. Which make her better, arguably.

Also, Tarquin for the win!

Dainpdf

What? Stats?

...I'm very confused.

Yotz

Have you ever read the the "Ringworld" by one Larry Niven? If not, I highly recommend it. Also, spoilers below the line, my dear. For "Ringworld" and Pierce Anthony's "A Spell for Chameleon" (which was not so bad for a first book of the series, I suppose; can't recommend anything else from the Xanth in good faith, though).

All that, strictly speaking, is more than excessive, so I will treat it as an offering to the Prince of Excess, praised be Her Dark Name.

In short, though, someone always having a better match-up is sign of better qualities of the said someone. The key word is 'always'.

=====SPOILER LINE=====

>>Ringworld.

Humans in the Known Space are revealed to be selectively bred to increase their luck. Which leads to final result of the program being near invincible due to series of unfortunate – and fatal – events that befall any of the people who wish ill upon the person in question – often even before the intent itself was formulated verbally or mentally. A literal plot armour, and a special talent that – potentially – can manipulate probabilities on the level of abrahamic God without the person in question even knowing about the talent. Which leads to some disturbing thoughts on the nature of the free will.

>>A Spell for Chameleon

Come to think of it, there was also Anthony's "A Spell for Chameleon" with a similar element, where it speculated inside the story, that the Talent in question directly influenced the Weave of the world, puppeteering designated villain of the story into the trap, exile, and then into the organizing the invasion only to ensure the survival of the protagonist, who was never even aware of possessing any kind of magical power, much less on that scale – the obscure results of aptitude tests notwithstanding.

Basically, in series of altercations between two persons with similar skill levels, perks, and abilities (STR, AGI, INT, and so on), the person with higher LUCK stat consistently wins. Therefore, if new generation is better only in being inherently more lucky, they are still better than previous one. Said luck can manifest itself in having better match-ups, for example. Which train of thought led me to a comment which inflicted confusion debuff upon you {winking-with-a-tongue-sticking-out emoticon}.

Thought of the day: weaponized memetics is a heluva scary thing.

Dainpdf

No one said "always".
The problem of "iron sharpens iron" is precisely that Bob's only ability might be beating Alice, and Catherine's only ability might be beating Bob. Catherine might be weaker than Alice in every single respect save "vs Bob". And yet Alice might get killed by Bob and replaced by Catherine.

Bjarkan

where's this quote from?

Yotz

"Please Don't Tell My Parents I've Got Henchmen" by one Richard Roberts, a YA novel. That's the third book in the series, start with "Please Don't Tell My Parents I'm a Supervillain" if you so want to join in.

Dainpdf

We didn't really get to see what Bonfire is, did we? But yeah, there seems to always be a response from Above.

Nairne .01

Bonfire was supposed to be a tactic focused on attacking Proceran cities with hit and run tactics through Arcadia. I.e. Go behind enemy lines through Arcadia, lay waste to a city, when the enemy is just a little time away run go to another City through Arcadia. Rinse and Repeat until the enemy can't afford to wage war against you.

Dainpdf

You sure? I thought that was a separate thing.

vuthuha912

Bonfire should focus more on wrecking the supply that the enemy has. I mean there is no point in killing the whole city, just the food is enough – the classic Sun Tzu move. Let's see how long Procer can afford to send its men abroad while its food production is hampered. They can totally avoid a famine if they send their people home immediately but I am not sure Cordelia has enough consideration for the lower class to care if they starve or not.

Antoninjohn

Callow bleeds because the heavens are throwing everything and a kitchen sink at her because Cat's winning, she's evil and she's winning

Brad

That's just what the heavens want her to think. She'll be just about to decapitate the Saint of Swords and sign an advantageous peace treaty, then BAM! The Angels take away the concept of writing and it's all-out war again

sengachi

Yeah but as Cat just said, winning doesn't mean your people aren't dying. And if you don't want people to die, well, are you really winning then?

RanVor

"There's no such thing as winning or losing. There is won and there is lost, there is victory and defeat. There are absolutes. Everything in between is still left to fight for. [...] Until then, there is only the struggle, because tides do what tides do – they turn."

– Derek Landy, Skulduggery Pleasant

Dainpdf

That is sort of true until you remember that William was in part her doing, that the Heavens had nothing to do with Akua and the Empress (who Cat *chose* to ally with), and that under her reign we have indeed observed her people become more vicious.

RanVor

Technically true, but the only thing Catherine actually did to William was not killing him. It would have been the same if she didn't meet him in Summerholm.

As for Akua, I suspect she was at least partially the Hellgods' solution to the Foundling problem. They too would be affected by her victory, after all.

Dainpdf

She knowingly started a pattern of three with him. Also, I don't think Akua was so much a response from the Gods Below to Catherine as much as the last attempt of the old paradigm of Praes to unseat Malicia and her people; one last gasp of the Empire's narrative, its deformation quickly surpassing its elastic limit.

The timing doesn't fit for Catherine – Akua was raised way before she made her pivotal choice – and Cat was always just a stepping stone for our favorite Diabolist.

Plus, we have reason to believe the Gods Below still look favorably on what Catherine has wrought.

RanVor

But the pattern of three mattered only to Cat and William. It had didn't affect the progress of the rebellion in any significant way.

Akua was raised way before she ever met Cat, but it doesn't mean the Gods Below couldn't use her ambition to their own ends. And they might look favorably of what Catherine has wrought *now*, but what she intends is going to be as disastrous to them as to the Heavens, and I don't believe they don't know that.

Dainpdf

The pattern of three is where the whole rebellion thing got kickstarted. The rebellion would have been much lesser without the hero band driving it. Cat herself stated it.

As for what he intends... I don't know. What she intends and what she gets can be pretty disparate things.

RanVor

The rebellion was in the making since before she even knew he existed. Her only fault was allowing it to develop when she could stop it before it got out of control. Which is, admittedly, pretty damning, especially considering she did it on purpose.

Dainpdf

And she did it by sparing William, thereby allowing a band of five with a pattern with her to be formed.

RanVor

Yes, she did. But my point was the rebellion would have happened anyway if she didn't *meet* him.

Dainpdf

That was not the point I was arguing. It is irrelevant to the topic of whether Catherine sparing William was her causing Callow to bleed, by her own choices, not anything the Heavens pulled.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

The winner takes it all
The loser standing small
Beside the victory
That's her destiny

---

A leftover thought from the latest interlude: what if all the redemption talk from Akua is the set-up for her plan to escape her bindings?

Diabolist seemed to genuinely consider her actions heroic, so the obvious thought is that she's trying to make herself look like a champion for the Callowan side of the conflict, either as Catherine's "follower" or as a narrative leverage to be unleashed at some point. What if she's aware of the greater scope of the coming conflict, and now aims for a redemption story and a common enemy to bring her into the resulting band of five Named? Akua has no way to know about the Witch of the Forest, since she had no previous connection to White Knight's band (or the outside world in general), and the other major practitioner Named all have their respective bands. Even if she suspects the Heavens might have propped up a mage to match Warlock at Red Flower Vales, she might have banked on them dying anyway.

That way, if Catherine ends up making a truce with Procer (and tries to unseat the Empress, as Akua suspects), she can either return to Praes with a conquering army, putting herself back into prominence (maybe even as a new Chancellor, given her political connections), or fight whatever new opponents emerge, making herself indisposible.

I'm not saying that's a good plan, but it might look feasible from Akua's perspective. Why do you think would she make an attempt at a redemption story?

Daemion

I think at this point of the story Akua doesn't play a role beyond being a tool or prop anymore. She's out of the game. Maybe at a later point, in a different story, she might get a different ending. There are lots of stories about an adventurer finding some cursed artifact which then wreaks havoc and/or possesses them.

Yotz

So.

Someone finds a Mantle of Woe, takes it, and ends being possessed by the Diabolist for their troubles. The climactic grand finale is ensured, and when the Good Lads/Lasses are on the verge of winning, Akua proclaims "You fools! This isn't even my final form!", and draws on full power of the Winter...

wyaldriddler

And then boom! Out pops Cat and she is Pissed.

Heh, this image amuses me.

RanVor

I wonder, does that mean Cat can resurrect herself as long as the Mantle of Woe exists?

Yotz

Well, as long as she is of Winter, Mantle of Woe exists and contains the soul of Diabolist, and Akua holds a shard of the ~~Troll's Mirror~~ Winter's Mantle, I suppose.

sengachi

Maybe, but in that case I'm pretty sure she'd come back as a pure fae queen, no human bits left.

Dainpdf

Depends how much of herself she manages to hold onto by then. If she can learn Akua's techniques to suppressing influences with her will, it might work.

Yotz

I strongly suspect the in that hypothetical case the Diabolist will end not a Chancellor, but rather as a glorified doorknob, i.e. she will replace the Demon of the Tower as a doorkeeper.

Although, the image of Akua becoming, essentially, the Tower's AI makes me hear "Still Alive" for some reason...

Dainpdf

For the appreciation of the audience:

This was a Triumph
I'm making a note here: "HUGE SUCCESS"
It's hard to overstate my satisfaction
Praesi Villains
We do what we must because we can
For the good of all of us, except the ones who are dead

But there's no sense crying over every mistake
You just keep on trying 'til you run out of lakes
Sacrifice an immortal
And you make a hell portal
For the people who are still alive

I'm not even angry
I'm being so sincere right now
Even though you broke my heart
And killed me and tore out my soul

And sewed bound it into your cape
As I was sealed it hurt because I was so happy for you

Now these soldiers' bodies make beautiful undead
And they're not too shoddy, we're creating some dread
So I'm glad I got burned
Think of all the heights we've climbed
On the people who are still alive

Go ahead and leave me
I think I prefer to stay inside
Maybe you'll find someone else to help you
Maybe Grey Pilgrim
That was a joke, haha, fat chance
Anyway, Winter is great, it's so malicious and cold

Look at me still talking when there's Evil to do
When I look out there, it makes me glad I'm not you
I've experiments to run
There is research to be done
On the people who are still alive

And believe me I am still alive
I'm doing evil and I'm still alive
I feel fantastic and I'm still alive
While you're dying I'll be still alive
And when you're dead I will be still alive
Still alive, still alive

Yotz

Thank you for the treat, my dear.

But, one thing to mention... There probably must be MAY IT NEVER RETURNS after >This was a Triumph...

Dainpdf

You're welcome! Yeah, I capitalized it on purpose – it was too perfect.

Yotz

Also, I want an orchestral rendition of it, with choir of Dread Emperors/Empresses singing
>Praesi Villains
>We do what we must because we can

Dainpdf

I don't think that would work. Akua is too tinged with Evil to actually become part of a band of five. She's just taking a page out of Cat's book and playing good parts in specific conflicts, while attempting to find a place under Cat in order to “live” again.

Also? Show of loyalty to Cat at the end, as fickle as hers is, is unlikely to endear her to the Gods Above.

Daemion

I really enjoyed this chapter. All these relationships, thoughts, philosophies and inner thoughts give the characters more depth.

I think it's a good sign that Cat still has an active libido and that she can see the beauty in Indrani without Winter's hunger and lust influencing her. So maybe her body is a construct, her soul has been mangled and her mind is a tiny bit insane... but she's still human to some degree.

I wonder if Indrani sees Masego as friend or as potentially more. She seems to be possessive of him anyway. Somehow I want to see that courtship. It probably involves a lot of clear orders and maybe a manual written by Hakram. Possibly the equivalent to a PowerPoint presentation, just so Masego understands what is expected of him. 😊

Letouriste

Would be great!:) )

Masego is so awkward socially that any relationship he start is bound to be entertaining

Dainpdf

Pity EE had to sort of sink the Vivienne ship right now...

Highwayman

Winner takes all, the law above all laws...

Non-morality seems to be more and more reasonable the more one bleeds, doesn't it? And the thing is that its a very slippery slope too.

My heart aches somewhat after reading the discussion between Cat and Archer.

Jonnnney

Wait, why doesn't Cat just link up with Keegan? She could at least move the duchess closer to the battlefield

agumentic

Because it'll take several days to several weeks? Arcadia travel is not instantaneous.

Jonnnney

Keegan's army is only two weeks away via normal travel that's a day at most via Acadia

TheCount

Thanks for the chapter!

Well, damn. I hope Cat dont get lost on her way, i dont want to know how that would play out.

....If masego isnt waking up because he found something interesting.... well, archer should have a new training partner:D

Panic

Good as this chapter was I feel like the last two chapters where excedingly anti climactic in terms of resolution and events considering Cats coma and inner struggle. The Akua chapter was great and removed any ill feeling about the possibility of Akua becoming a focus again as a villain. Then Cat came back from her long time in Winter Wonderland and the expectation was that she would finally get her new Name. But instead we return to the adventures of Cat the Lesser and it really takes your breath away in complete Disappointment.

burdi

me too, disappoint that cat like never get a new Name maybe that because she confused, doesnt know where to stand like when she let william go in summerhold

wyaldriddler

At this point I think the idea is that she won't get one this book. And I am completely fine with that one and happy since its making the point she doesn't need a Name at all. Just her Mantle and the wit to kick ass.

Aside from that, I think part of the disappointment might be coming from the sharp difference between murder happy bouncy Akua and the surly sour Cat. Bound to lower the mood a bit.

Yotz

She may yet get one – a strange new one, never to be seen before – in the end, as a prelude to Grand Finale of the fifth book.

Euodiachloris

I think it's one of the things giving the Grey Pligrim a bit of a headache. He can't see any solid evidence of her Name, and this is a guy who is very good at looking. And, he doesn't know what to make of it.

As... if she doesn't have a Name bestowed on her by the Gods Below... how capital E Evil is she? What is her actual status? And, if she is only flinging fae powers around, yet keeping up with Named of all kinds without one, what does that tell you about Names and Roles?

Cat is a battered existential crisis, sprinkled with salt and vinegar, all served wrapped in a vulgar newspaper. Free chips with the shoulders; offering mushy peace. 😊

Decius

So what changes when The Black Prince makes Callow part of Praes, but still sell food to the wasteland?

Novice

Black Prince?

Panic

Edward of Woodstock, The Black Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Aquitaine, Heir to the throne of England, Winner of the Battles of Crécy, Poitiers and Najera. Capturer of King John the second of France. Father to King Richard the Second of England.

Decius

Just like all the other Princes of Procer.

Anna

"She tightened her grip, face half-hidden by her fur-like dark hair."

Wait, what? I thought orcs didn't have hair??

Seabornia

No facial hair , author clarified it on reddit some time ago.

Seabornia

Do you think it will be Saint of the sword killing all the princes and creating Princes Graveyard? It seems fitting for Regicide. It will make Larat go traitorous, as well as fuck up peace treaty.

ahd

Subthread for guessing Cat's new Name after she comes back from this dreamwalk.

I'll start: the Redeemed Villain. Aspects: Light, Shadow, Sarcasm.

wyaldriddler

I'm pretty sure EE is fucking with our previous expectations set up by all the various Have Dream Get Name shenanigans of older books when he has no intention of giving one to her right now.

Yotz

The Flipper. Aspects: Cynicism, Sarcasm, Irony.

SpacyRicochet

I wonder... Is (some variation of) Patriot available? And is it a heroic Name? 🤔

ahd

Probably neutral, like Archer or Squire. Aspects: Yes, No, For Callow!

Dainpdf

Vivienne is more of a patriot than Cat is.

grzecho2222

Nameless Queen. Aspects: Unchoose, Unbestow, Unname

MetruX

The Stranger. Aspects: Dead, Alive, Neither.

Euodiachloris

Motto: "Not fucking applicable" or "Next!".

sengachi

Heretic Queen: Deny, Swear, Bestow, so Named for rejecting the gods Above and Below alike.

(Swear as in oaths, but with the obvious and obligatory snide commentary from the Named peanut gallery about Cat's language).

Dainpdf

Still hold to the idea that she gets a Queen name, in Liesse. Pattern of three, twice refused.

Alex

The Dead King opens a Hellgate and invades Liesse, giving him power to create permanent portals out of his own hell to attack wherever he sees fit. The final confrontation happens there.

Dainpdf

Uh, why would he? He already has a greater breach; plus, Akua's hellgate-on-demand spell was broken, and its power source removed.

Alex

Oops, I didn't think it through. Completely forgot about the power source. Just thought it was plausible.

Thought process went: He essentially founded Praesi magical theory and thus could probably coopt the system, the place is practically consecrated to the hellgods with how much death occurred there, and hellgate-on-demand seemed up his alley (i.e. permanent fast-travel portals to anywhere so he's not stuck in Keter).

That story would allow Cat her third run at a Queen name too now that she rejected it once (the "heroic queen" name) and Black ruined it for her once (the "Black Queen" name).

Plus, well, bad guy and flying fortress seem to go together.

Dainpdf

The Miezans practically founded Praesi magical theory; he precedes that, I believe. What he did do was perform the greatest single known act of diabolism to date (perhaps save for our girl Akua).

But yeah, I can see the Dead King making some move that essentially forces Cat into taking the Name.

RanVor

Damn, this chapter destroyed me. After two days of arguing for Cat, I find out she doesn't even believe in it herself.

Nairne .01

Actually, the fact that she is fighting despite not knowing if she is right is pretty heroic.

Sure the main driver may be fear of admitting she is not right, but both that and the belief that she is right, have something in common.

She refuses to admit that she is wrong, that what she seeks is wrong.

So she struggles and that's not something anyone can keep doing.

RanVor

What she seeks is not wrong. The Liesse Accords might be the only thing actually worth fighting for in this world if they are what I think they are. The question is: is it achievable? If it's not, the price of trying is going to be horrific.

The Big Grey himself admitted that her goal is noble, but it's not going to work, because everyone else is too scared and/or arrogant to compromise.

Dainpdf

He also said he thinks she is tainted and so anything she accomplishes also will be. Whether he is right remains to be seen.

Dainpdf

That was what it looked like, but she has found she has an answer. The Accords. She's not as certain as she once was of her path, but that's growing up. She's still got something she believes in, and she'll fight for it.

Antony444

Well, that promises fun negotiations with the Crusaders. Both sides completely exhausted, one in danger of starvation and with the Army of Daoine on its rear. I can already see the sparks from here...

The long dialogue between Cat and Indrani was beautiful. Shows deeply why some villains abandon the concept of restraint and humanity bit by bit. You realise the world is far more complex than you had any idea...and you don't have the weapons to deal with it.

ahd

Odds of the crusaders keeping the truce terms, now that they know that killing the Woe is the only way to not lose?

Juniper could just quietly pack up the army and withdraw in good order through a portal, and then the Hunt can enjoy themselves with Rozala's last desperate attempts at foraging or resupply parties. Archer snipes the remaining heroic party's horses and baggage train, with the Hierophant waiting if the Saint tries to close for melee. By the time the heroes have finished walking to Hedges, Pickler has rebuilt enough of the new model siege train and the Watch are manning the walls.

Priests who have starved mostly to death are mostly no longer a factor.

That's the Callowan BATNA.

grzecho2222

Still waiting for the missing bell from island to be resolved

Walter

I feel like Cat gets *this* close to understanding, then zooms off in another direction.

Like:

1: I told William that the flags don't matter, it's all about the people living happily

2: If I surrendered and joined the crusaders we could defeat Malicia/Black with far less bloodshed and far more certainty of victory

And she gets this incoherence, she calls it out! So whatever her motive is, it isn't the people of Callow anymore. If she cared about them she'd have joined up with Cordelia, regardless of whether that ends up with Proceran princes in charge. They can scarcely be worse for Callow than her own reign, after all.

But, like, she isn't pot committed re: the flags either. Like if she admits to herself that she doesn't know or care about the callowan farmers that Akua's impression of her was caring about, then why isn't she working much more closely with Malicia/Black?

She is holding back an awful lot, with the notion that it is gonna get sane people to bargain with her, but she threw that aside when she lined roads with crucified prisoners.

I guess I just don't get what her objective is. If she isn't after the people's safety, because she isn't joining the Crusaders, and she isn't after evil's victory, because she won't work with Black/Malicia and she knows nobody will deal with her, because she is a fiend who constantly does murders...what's the goal here?

RanVor

The lasting peace. The situation where nobody is fucking anybody over. Forcing everyone to reconsider their position and stop constantly trying to genocide each other for kicks or ideals.

Walter

I can't really believe that when Robber is on the staff, right? Like, the people Cat has spoken to in recent memory are, I wanna say, Akua, Juniper and Larat? None of whom has any interest whatsoever in peace?

Novice

Those people doesn't have to be interested in peace. They're not the queen.

hoyboy

She isn't going to be able to change until she starts questioning her own will to power and whether she, a violent teenager, should be unilaterally deciding the course of an entire nation.

Alas, questioning that would basically be questioning both her own notions of wanting greatness in her youth and the ideology drilled into her by her parental unit emulator.

Dylan Tullos

hoyboy:

There's a lot of sunk costs fallacy involved, too. If she changes course, then she has to admit that she was wrong earlier, and that all of the lives she sacrificed were lost to no purpose. That's hard for anyone to acknowledge.

Dainpdf

You forget that, much like Praes wants Callow as a buffer nation vs Procer, Procer wants them as a buffer nation vs Praes. Procer is not all fun and roses. Cat is struggling in the hopes that she can make this work, not just for the sake of people right now, but for the future. Is conceding to Procer really an acceptable choice, looking forty years down the line? Look at what happened to the Pilgrim's homeland.

RanVor

If the Accords fail, surrendering to the crusade is indeed the least horrible of all the awful options left to Catherine. It just doesn't solve anything but the most immediate problems. There's still going to be a war with Praes a few years down the line. And then another, and another. The Callow is still going to bleed, and the next chance to change the status quo is not going to appear in her lifetime, if ever. Assuming she doesn't get executed on the spot, which is almost certain.

RanVor

Also, being a buffer nation is pretty much Callow's explicit purpose in Creation.

Dainpdf

Plus all the frontier nobles using Callowans in battle like they do their levies in Procer.

Nairne .01

Is it? I mean look at it. The crusade will not destroy Praes. The alchemy induced undeath released in Liesse was not the only thing the Tower has that's marked as a Red Protocol (correct me if I put the wrong name here). They'd be put under the grinding wheel again because when she'd surrender, they'd start conscripting in Callow (pilgrim or no pilgrim at the table), and when the tower retaliates it will be Callowans who die first.

RanVor

Sure, it's very bad. But surrendering to Praes might be even worse in the long run. Unless Black gets his way, but that's one helluva gamble.

Basically, if the Accords fail, Callow is fucked forever, no matter what.

RedoneAgain

I have to wonder, do the gods above and below really correlate properly to good and evil? The elves are firmly on the side of good but, I can't imagine them worshipping the gods above. Also there was an overseas empire that had both a villain and a hero ruler. It doesn't sound to me like they worship the gods above.

RanVor

The fact that their servants are each other's sworn enemies doesn't mean they have to be. The entire Good Vs Evil war started because they had a philosophical dispute, after all. I imagine them sitting around the table and playing the situation like a game, with Below getting pissed when Above try to cheat. Then Cat enters the stage and scares the shit out of them all with her revolutionary ideas. They start to panic and unleash everything they have at their disposal to bring her down, plunging the Creation into chaos in the process.

Nairne .01

I'd think Gods wouldn't panic like that. Creation was around way too long for them to not experience all kinds of things in their dispute and they act accordingly.

wyaldriddler

That's one of the core questions of the story. In the initial description you can't actually tell which side is which. Plus good and evil as described IRL are kinda terrible descriptions to apply to the Guide. They break down below the surface level.

RanVor

Actually, I'd say the Evil is pretty accurate. It's the Good that turns out not to be very good after closer examination.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

There's a whole lot of small "e" evil in Calernia, and a real shortage of small "g" good.

The Wandering Bard has a better claim to be "practical evil" than Black in some ways; her plans are practical, but she's definitely evil. The main difference between her and the raving madmen who want to remake all of Calernia according to their grand plan is that she's actually succeeding.

The Gods Below seem to be utterly indifferent to human welfare, but they're honest. You pay, and they deliver. Look at Hanno's mom; she gave her life, and they gave her revenge and ensured that her husband would be buried. In an awful way, their deals are fair, but you don't want to be in a place where you have to make a pact with them.

The Heavens seem to be nice when things are going their way, and horrible when they aren't. In peacetime, they have pacifist healers from the House of Light helping people and trying to build a better society. As soon as things go off the rails, though, they send Bard to restore the status quo by any means necessary.

The Gods Below are a merchant will sell you anything from heroin to nuclear weapons if you're willing to pay the price. The Gods Above are relatively benevolent rulers who will provide you with medicine for free, but they'll do anything to make sure that their narrative isn't disrupted.

RanVor

You do have a few good points here, Mr. Genocide. I didn't want to speak with you, but I'll make an exception and tell you this: the Bard is doing the same thing as all the Heroes, just with less pretending and more efficiency.

Dainpdf

The “whatever methods to win” thing seems to be a thing of Evil, however. Which is at the heart of her paradoxical nature.

RanVor

Remember that the side of Good never faced the Practical Evil before. They always won easily with their usual methods, unless facing the enemy with an overwhelming advantage, like the Dead King. But the Evil has changed and the usual methods don't work anymore. That's why the Heavens have sent their special agent, the Bard, to do the dirty work that needs to be done if they are to stay on top.

Dainpdf

I'm pretty sure the Bard has been around since ancient times. Black speculated the only things Team Evil got that could be the counterbalance for her would be the Kingdom of the Dead or Empress Triumphant.

Jecherio

I think Cat will get a neutral name. If you guys remember in chapter she talked about “regulating” things. I think the Liesse Acords will be a game changer in how the battle good vers. evil will continue. I very much looking forward to how it will play out

Jecherio

Remember the Hierarch? I see some interesting paraells between him and her.

RanVor

The Hierarch seems to be the Bard's Spanner in the Works. I wonder if it's a part of the Tyrant's plan. I don't know if he's a Hero or a Villain, but I don't think it matters. He probably considers all the gods Foreign Despots.

He is, in a sense, very similar to Cat.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Well, they are both Foreign Despots whose existence is an affront to the People. And they're both playing a different game than the traditional Good v.s. Evil.

I love the moment when Anaxares declares that if the People have decreed that he is a Person of Value, then the "people are wrong, and in need of purging."

He gets even better when he turns to the Wandering Bard and tells her that the Gods "drew no lots and hold no appointments." His particular brand of crazy might be terrible in its own right, but he's definitely not going to be a puppet of Upstairs or Downstairs.

Dainpdf

In this world of "with us or against us", however, he's still closer to Evil. And that's probably enough.

BarthHumphries

I'm just waiting for the other shoe to drop, for Procer to realize, "Oh no, we just spent a whole bunch of money and manpower on a crusade, that we lost, and that we pointed in the wrong direction because here comes the kingdom of the dead behind us.

BarthHumphries

And I expect Cat will have to join with Procer to fight the deadie baddie.

RanVor

WHO DOESN'T VOTE IS A CRUSADER!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

ahd

The Heavens will it.

DD

Cat is constantly beating herself up, which is fine for character development, but I feel like we're rehashing at this point. This gives us some insight into Archer but I don't feel like it advances Cat in any way.

The whole deal seems anticlimactic in a way I can't verbalize.

The feeling may be childish, like a kid wanting a clear winner or loser. Again, it's hard for me to verbalize, making me doubt my own intelligence. Maybe I'm just impatient after the many non-Cat threads.

Dainpdf

Well, the pacing has been haywire. We had a battle, then a stop when the lake formed, a long interlude with lots of cliffhangers (each promising an unfulfilled return to action). Then we get battles, Akua takes to the field, culminating in Cat waking up... And bam, slam the brakes again. It's quite jarring.

Dainpdf

I really liked the chapter in concept. This conversation with Archer puts a cap on all the development Cat has had so far. We get to see her rebuttal to the Pilgrim's "evil is toxic" position, way back before the war really started, and to Archer's "the only winning move is not to play". It feels like she's finally ready to move on to the end of this particular arc. On the other hand, the pacing on these last few chapters has been all over the place. It's been stop-start, and this chapter is another sudden stop from a hundred. It feels jarring and out of place when we had just started revving up with Akua taking to the battlefield, then Cat waking up. Also, the delivery here was confusing, and some points were quite difficult to unravel, not due to complexity but because of awkward phrasing or framing. Still, overall a great chapter. Thanks!

RanVor

Irrelevant to the chapter, but I wonder how much of the Praesi villainy is actually a product of them having nothing to lose.

Praes is a nation of no hope. They are taught from the moment they are born that they are doomed to fail no matter what they do. The gods have forsaken them, everyone hates their guts, and their dreams and ambitions are all meaningless. In an environment like that, it's very easy to decide that if everyone thinks you're a monster anyway, you might as well be one.

So they go on a mad rampage against the world, looking for vengeance on those who look down on them, but only managing to justify the prejudice against them. Trapped in a vicious cycle, they cultivate their hatred and wounded pride, passing it down to the next generations.

They are probably too far gone to change that, but it's kind of sad when viewed this way.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Common Praesi do live in a hopeless society. They can only wait for the next famine, or an invasion that will see them conscripted as cannon fodder. I can see how easy it would be to decide that if everyone treated you like a monster, you might as well be one.

Highborn Praesi are different. They seem to enjoy their Role as the villains of Creation, rejoicing in their mass sacrifices and backstabbing. "Iron sharpens iron" is the creed of a culture that rejoices in treachery and evil, seeing Evil as a means of self-improvement.

Both mindsets are born out of the same circumstances, but the common people chose to endure their Role while the rulers chose to embrace it.

Nairne .01

But you have to consider how the mindset started for the Highborn Praesi.

Was it the first sacrifices to make the fields fertile when they decided they are above the masses?

Was it something else?

I'm curious.

vuthuha912

That is why I want them to get out of the whole thing so bad and why despite the failure of Black to reign in Evil, I still want him to survive and try again. It is as hopeless as it can get at this point. He obviously loves Praes – the center of his world. He wants it to live on regardless of what philosophy it follows. Survive and have some sort of hope for the future. Black is obviously a product of his culture – that is why he is evil but he has the fortune of clear sight to know what the root problem of his country was and do something about it. I never care for his evil deeds or I kinda get it.

No Gandhi is going to rule Praes and made a substantial change. You need to be the Black Knight or Dread Empress to actually have a shot at fixing things. And even that is not enough. With the shitty relationship between Procer and Callow, even if we went begging on our knees for a trade agreement, it is not gonna worked because they would rather have a lunatic rule us for convenience than actually help us. So he went and force Callow into selling him grain at a fair price. Very villainous, very evil but so so human. It is like humans were born to suffer.

He is pragmatic and he is evil but he is someone who still fights for a chance at the future rather than sitting there and drowning like so many of his countrymen. If he died then Praes might have to wait several centuries to get another chance or it might not even get that. The pattern might be too deep to be broken and Praes is forever trapped in this hellhole of starvation.

---

Chapter 19: Recovery

"To seek to ascertain the worth of even a single a soul through morality is to force unnecessary mysticism onto a simple matter. As in all things, supply and demand determine the price."

– Extract from "Bought and Sold", a collection of the teachings of the Merchant Prince Irenos, founder of Mercantis

"I'll admit it," I said. "I was expecting a library."

My previous trips into dreamland had not led me to expect a great deal of nuance in the matter, though admittedly that'd been my own mind. Might just be that Masego was a little less straightforward in his way of looking at the world. The lack of swamp and shambling horde certainly implied as much. Instead Hierophant's dream was order gone mad. A pane of crystal under my feet, tethered to the centre of the massive structure by a long length of gold, kept me aloft. Unfortunately that did little to put my old fear of heights from rearing up its head. It was one thing to leap down from the sky when I knew my legs would unbreak themselves within moments, another to have only a thin sheet of crystal being the only thing keeping me from falling into endless void.

"Fucking Hells, Masego," I muttered. "Would it have killed you to put up a railing?"

Aside from the very real possibility of falling down forever, I had to concede there was a strange beauty to what I saw. It reminded me, in a way, of the depiction of astral spheres I'd once seen in Black's mansion in Ater. Though, instead of circling the sun the way mages had along ago proven Creation did, everything here was circling the sphere of shivering translucent flame held within a deep basin of gold. From it spanned long tubes of gold holding up lesser spheres all wildly different. Crystal and frost, roiling wind and swarms of small silver constructs. My own platform, like all the others, circled around the central sphere with a slow and measured ticking sound. I could glimpse gears and cranks beneath the basin that kept it all moving along. I shivered, though there was no wind here. Perhaps because there was no wind. There was something subtly wrong about what lay before me, though I would not deny its eerie splendour.

It was not a perspective, the way the cold machinery behind Black's eyes could be understood. It was...

"A way of understanding Creation," I finished out loud.

My voice felt dim and there was no echo. The void swallowed it all. My platform kept moving, and I shook myself out of the fugue. Odds were that I'd be able to find Masego within the sphere at the heart of this. I looked down at the gold support beam and winced. It was round, after all. If I slipped after making my way down... Well, I wasn't sure what the consequences of falling into the void would be, but considering Hierophant's mind was bound to have some very nasty defences I suspected it would not be pleasant. Not that my own little journey into Winter dreamland had been a treat. My fingers clenched. Don't think about it, I told myself. Winter had been trying to grind me down, by lingering on the remembrance I was only playing its game.

"So shimmying across that beam is a bit of a stretch," I decided. "That leaves trying to move from sphere to sphere."

I turned my gaze to the moving structures. While I couldn't discern the exact pattern yet – some beams extended at specific sections of the rotation, while others withdrew – I could at least grasp the likely length of the beams. And, more importantly, if one was ever going to come close enough for me to leap across. One, two, three – no, just two, that last one was moving back without warning and staying there. It'd have to do. I considered allowing a full rotation to take place just so I'd avoid running into any surprises, but there were no guarantees the pattern would remain the same every time. And, by the looks of it, this was going to take a while. Not all spheres were rotating at the same speed, but mine was fairly slow. Hard to properly measure time and distance in here, but I'd guess at least two hours for a full turn? Leaping uncertainly would be a risk, but so would be waiting that long when I was uncertain of the relative time flows in here and outside.

"I understand you're a man of deep and complex thought, Zeze, but you're not making this easy," I sighed. "You know what's the worst people have to deal with, in my mind? Condescension Queen and Lady Backstab. And that one endless horde of dead trying to kill them, but let's be honest – that's not exactly out of our wheelhouse."

I'd kind of expected one or both of the twins to materialize and mouth off after that, but I remained alone. Shame. Probably could have made rope out of intestines, maybe used bones for a hook. I paused.

"I'm not being unnecessarily gruesome there," I defensively told the void. "I don't know how to make rope out of hair, and to be solid enough to hold my weight skin would have to be tanned first."

Nothingness did not answer. Pointedly so, I felt.

"Well, fuck you too," I muttered.

It wasn't murder if they were projections of your unconscious mind, I comforted myself. Probably. I'd never looked up if the Empire had laws on the subject. Testing the platform beneath me, to my distaste I found it rather slippery. That was not going to be pleasant. I tried to see if Winter was willing to get involved, but I was reaching for nothing. No, I thought. Not nothing. It was just distant. Interesting, but it wasn't helping me in the slightest at the moment. The first outer sphere passed close after I spent half an eternity dawdling in the middle of nowhere, but I let that one pass. The sphere was wind and barely contained. Too much of a risk. The second rotated close after the rest of eternity passed me by, and I winced. Fire. Silver flames that flickered without a sound. Well, it wasn't going to be pleasant if I stumbled into those but it was still better than falling. The boots on my feet were old, nothing like those I now wore though I vaguely recalled having owned that pair before being apprenticed to Black. The wiggle room for my toes was nice, but the softness of used leather less so. I had to balance my weight carefully when I took a running start.

"Nonononono-" I valiantly screamed, realizing with horror halfway through the leap that the sphere was withdrawing.

I had no power to call on, no mantle or Name that could save my hide at the last moment. The stark understanding of my helplessness brought back something I'd begun to forget – fear. Not the dim worry for events yet to come that haunted my every hour since I'd taken the crown, but the colder thing that was having to look death in the eyes. I twisted forward, and my fingers caught the edge of the platform. My life was not owed to my own merits. The sphere had just withdrawn only slightly.

"Oh Hells," I panted, forcing my other hand to clench so the trembling would stop while I brought it up to clasp the platform's edge.

I felt sweat drenching my back, another sensation I'd near forgotten. My palms were growing moist as well, and that was a lot worrying since they were the only thing between me and falling.

"Godsdamnit, Masego," I said. "Godsfucking-"

I took a deep breath, then pulled myself up with grunt of effort. It was awkward, and my palm slipped when I got my leg over the ledge. I ended up falling awkwardly on the side, rolling in panic towards the fire to avoid the fall. Wait, had there really been enough –

The Conjurer was an utter fool, yet somehow he still lived despite Masego's best efforts. His lips twisted into a sneer and he traced Form and Force, weaving the formula his words shaped through them. Air clustered into three arithmetically perfect spheres and shot forward, though in his irritation he had allowed the proper angle to/

Seven full months had he studied the theory. It was the simplest working he knew, transmutation of power into heat and light, yet his every deviation from the original formula to craft his own had resulted in failure. The numbers were perfect, he knew it, but somehow the spell would not/

"We're not bleeding people, Apprentice," she said accusingly. "We're not that desperate." He blinked, more out of sheer affront than surprise. What kind of a blunderer did she take him for? He opened his mouth to snap/

– I rolled out of the silver flames, my body shivering. That had felt... I patted my own stomach, reassured to find it flat. For a moment there'd been a disconnect and I'd expected to find otherwise. I closed my eyes and laid there for a moment before slapping my own face with an open palm. The sting snapped me out of it and I dragged myself into a crouch.

"Memories?" I murmured, glancing at the sphere.

Maybe. I'd felt genuinely nettled throughout all three glimpses. The third time had even been directed at myself, which was giving me a headache since his recollection of that conversation was a lot more vivid than my own. There'd been a common thread. It might be the same for every sphere, a sort of archive. Gods, his mind was so weird. I was starting to feel a lot better about the murder swamp in my own. I shook myself out of the trance. The rotation had continued while I was elsewhere, and for longer than I'd thought. I couldn't even see the crystal platform I'd started on anymore. Still, screwed as that had been I was in a much better position now. There were twice as many spheres circling close to this one than there'd been for the last, and I picked on that looked like an orb of pure white marble for my second leap. There was no nasty halfway surprise this time. Time was hard to gauge, in here, but by my fourth leap I felt like I'd made some decent progress. I was more than halfway through, though difficulties had come with the advance. This close to the centre of the structure the spheres moved a lot quicker. And, I saw with a frown, the platforms around them were smaller. Not a lot of room for mistakes there.

I bid my time, reluctantly, until I picked one out whose rotation seemed steady and the sphere on it not too dangerous. A slower one passed by, but I wasn't going anywhere near something that looked like a hole of darkness sucking in everything if I could help it. A constantly moving jigsaw of ivory wasn't honestly much better, I'd admit to myself, but at this point there was only so much pickiness I could afford. With another heroically shrill scream I leapt, and it went perfectly. Angle and swiftness, all aligned as they should be. Then my boot touched the crystal, and with a sinking feeling I realized it was rough instead of smooth. Which wouldn't have been much of a problem if I'd adjusted my stance before jumping. I had not. I stumbled with all the grace of cart rolling down a hill, my forehead going into-

He did not understand why the orc kept seeking his company, though as long as he came with a shatranj board Masego would not refuse the company. Campaigning, much as Father had implied, was a dull thing to suffer through. It was only when Hakram sat across him, sliding open the shutters holding the pieces, that he realized he'd been awaiting Adjutant. That he had not ceased his dissection earlier because there was nothing more to learn from the subject, but because he'd been looking forward to their evening game. "White?" Hakram offered and/

"It's a sprite," Archer said, shaking the glass bottle. He'd known at a glance, of course, and the angry buzzing of the lesser spirit indicated displeasure at the rough handling. "I am not unfamiliar with them," Masego replied. "They are quite common in western Callow." The strange woman chuckled, tossing the bottle into his lap. He hastily grabbed it. "Magelight's supposed to be hard on the eyes," Archer said. "If you're going to keep reading after dark, use that instead." He started in surprise. Had she caught it for him? Why would she/

"They were the rooms of the Wizards of the West, you know," Thief said, leaning against the threshold. Masego did not quite succeed at hiding his start. She'd emerged without warning, as was her wont. Not even Summer's light cast a shadow on her aspect. His eyes swept across the room, finding only furniture and a bath in the Soninke manner. "There is no trace of their presence," he informed the woman. She shrugged. "Figured as much," Thief said. "But there's old stories about the location making it easier to align with 'otherworldly powers'. Thought you might want to have a look." The tone was defensive, he was certain. It held all the right markers. Did/

My face was less than an inch away from shifting ivory as I balanced uneasily on my feet. The roof of my mouth was dry. I licked my lips, retreating half a step. That'd been much more intense than the last. More nuanced as well. I'd felt the confusion shifting to understanding like it was my own. I still remembered what it felt like, people's faces being so hard to read. Was that how he felt all the time? I'd thought he was uncomfortable with touching because it was the way Warlock had raised him, but that hadn't been the way at all. I just... hadn't known what the touching was for, and I'd hesitated to act until I could correctly identify the reason. It'd been like living a world full of masks, so very few of which I could read. Slowly I calmed down. Touching my face helped, the touch of my own fingers on my own flesh. I didn't even bother to assess how much time had passed, since I already knew I wouldn't like the answer. The spheres moved, but I waited patiently for my openings. Another two leaps, and as I stood besides a sphere of lightning-infused amber I timed my last one.

I'd underestimated how massive the central sphere truly was. At least as large as the royal palace in Laure, and the gold basin that held it was even larger. The trembling translucent flame in front of me was unlike the other globes I'd encountered. It was not full, only a thin barrier. Through it I could make out lights and shapes, some still and others in movement. Steeling myself, I marched through. Heat licked at my skin, ignoring my clothes, but there was no rush of foreign memories. Inside the sphere, as I had thought, Masego awaited. He was far from the only thing in there. Constellations of instruments of all kinds filled the firmament of this place, gold and silver and obsidian and a hundred other tools – some I had seen before, others never even imagined existed. They all clustered around Hierophant, who stood with his back to me as he studied something I could not make out.

"Distraction," Masego said absent-mindedly. "Kill it."

The only other living entity in the sphere moved. I looked back at my own face, my twin snorting and unsheathing her sword. Not my twin, I thought. She didn't wear the same clothes as me, neither in this place nor back in Creation. She wore the same plate I had that day when we fought the Princess of High Noon, and her smile was too broad to be entirely human. It was a caricature of daring and insolence, not something lips could actually do.

"Masego," I called out.

"Ah, apologies," he replied patiently. "Please kill it."

Flicker.

The other Catherine was no longer that. Archer idly nocked an arrow, the boundary between her scarf and her face blurred. Her appearance was even stranger than my not-twin's had been. She was less detailed, like a rough painting of herself. It was when the string went as furthest back as it could that she sharpened, and in that moment she was stunning. The hungry gleam in the eyes, the easy arrogance in her stance. She wasn't more beautiful than the real Indrani was, but there was an intensity to her that I'd never seen in Archer. Like she was leaving an indelible mark on this moment. The surprise of it slowed me down, and throwing myself to the ground did not help quite enough. The arrow went through my chest and I grunted in pain.

Flicker.

Adjutant slowly spun his axe as he advanced towards me. More statue than orc, all that he was set in stone. The weight of his presence was feather-light, at first, but the longer it was there the heavier it bore down on me. He bared fangs of carved bone as too-clever eyes followed my rising to my feet. The eyes were the most expressive part of this statue of Hakram, inhumanly perceptive. As if they were the only living part of him. I broke the arrow's shaft, biting my lip to avoid screaming.

"Hakram," I said. "Don't do it."

He kept advancing.

"Hakram," I barked. "I order you to desist."

Still advancing. Fuck.

"Masego," I screamed, and then not-Hakram was upon me.

The moment he struck, he was a statue no longer. He turned into flesh and blood, strength uncoiling like a trebuchet released. I tried to catch his wrist, but I might as well have been wrestling that trebuchet. He smashed me into the ground effortlessly, painfully jarring the arrowhead still in my chest.

"Zeze," I yelled. "Don't you-"

"Wait," Masego said.

The entity froze, axe a hair's breadth away from my throat. Hierophant turned, and I grimaced at the sight. No blindfold on his face, i here. Hollow burnt-out sockets studied me, balls of Summer flame hovering within.

"I know you," he said.

"Catherine," I reminded him. "Your friend."

He frowned. His face blurred, then became calm again.

"Are you quite certain?" he asked.

Shit. He doesn't remember anything that's in the spheres outside, does he? I had no idea how much of the man I knew was standing in front of me.

"Masego, you need to wake up," I said. "I came here to get you back."

"Don't be absurd," he chided me. "There is so much left to study."

He gestured towards the thing his body had been hiding and my eyes widened. It was a sphere like those outside, though much smaller. The ball of Light was wriggling violently, a wound in it kept open by silver pincers.

"It is much clearer, without the noise," Hierophant told me. "We are making great progress."

I forced a smile.

"That's good," I said. "Tell me more about that. I want to see. But I'll need to get up, for that, and there's a blade at my throat."

Flicker.

I saw Thief's face, for a heartbeat, and then the entity was gone. Masego was gesturing.

"Come, come," he said. "You're familiar with the Ligurian theory of magic, of course."

I got up, hand on my throat.

"Of course," I lied. "It's my favourite."

He offered a beaming smile. His face blurred and he was calm again.

"You're not trying to trick me, are you?" he asked.

"Of course not," I hastily replied. "I uh, just really hate the Jaquinite theory."

Gods, I really should have listened more closely when he talked about that. Was being an occasionally shitty friend going to get me killed? That'd be fitting piece of irony.

"As you should," Hierophant sniffed. "Procerans. Their idea of a proper formula is to get down on their knees and pray."

"Just the worst," I agreed, slowly coming closer.

He gestured again for me to stand by his side.

"Now, the Gigantes do shroud their sorcery behind unnecessary claptrap," he lectured. "But I believe Gharan the Wise was correct when he theorized they are the eldest race on Calernia to have developed a comprehensive method for use of the Gift."

"Only makes sense," I said.

I was close enough to knife him, now, but would that actually help? Academic question anyway, I didn't have a knife and not-Thief could be anywhere. I glanced at the sphere he was inviting me to watch, and my vision swam. I could almost make out something. A memory, though I didn't live it like the others. Marchford. Night, with hundreds of columns of fire moving according to my will. A ritual repurposed, my first real stride towards understanding the deeper mysteries of High Arcana. I closed my eyes.

"You were the Apprentice, then," I said.

"Just a title," he dismissed. "As milestone that denotes understanding reached, but of little practical worth."

"You're not anymore, though," I said. "You're the Hierophant. How did that happen?"

A little heavy-handed, but I had a lot of detachment to bludgeon through here. Subtle wasn't going to work. Masego smiled. His face blurred. He was furious.

"Distraction," he said. "Unimportant."

"Name transition isn't important?" I probed. "How often have you seen that phenomenon?"

His face blurred, returned to calm. I'd survive to hear a reply, then. Apparently improving one's vocabulary really was a life-saving skill, who knew?

"Not enough," he said. "But it is all contaminated. Too much bias. Not enough left to examine after removal."

"Oh, that's all right then," I shrugged.

He nodded, pleased at my agreement.

"Difficult research isn't for everyone," I continued. "I'm sure someone will eventually get around to explaining it to you."

His face darkened.

"I do not need to depend on the findings of others," he said.

"Obviously you have to," I said. "I mean, you're just not capable enough to study it with the bias intact. You've said it yourself, it's too much."

I would have felt a lot worse about trying to trick him in this state if he hadn't ordered me shot moments ago. Hierophant dismissed the sphere of Light with a wave of the hand, and reached out. Plucking out a distant sphere of water in a way that should not have been physically possible, he set it in front of us.

"It can be done," he insisted. "Simply a matter of discipline."

"I look forward to your findings, then," I smiled.

His face blurred, and remained that way.

"You interfere with the process," he said in an utterly flat voice.

"I would never," I said and snatched his hand, forcing it into the sphere.

White light, blinding. A knife going through my back.

"No," Hierophant's voice barked. "No, go away. Catherine?"

I dropped down on my knees. Was that blood in my mouth? Fuck, it was just a stabbing. Thief was nowhere that good at killing people, I called bullshit. The spots went away and I looked at Masego's mortified face.

"Hey, Zeze," I grunted. "Been a while."

"Cat," he murmured. "You're – no, doesn't matter. I can end it."

His fingers threaded through mine, softly, and as he squeezed we woke.

---

Byzantine

Name dreams... I wonder if the Hero version is just as screwed up.

TripleJ

I think that it matches the ideological difference between what is defined as Good and Evil in this story. Good is not about kindness nor about helping anyone, it is about accepting the plan of the Gods above. The hero version is probably of angels torturing them about being humans until they give up. All contact with angels has basically been "browbeat your soul until you surrender" in the story so far. It is wrapped with an aesthetic that is about a positive order of things, but the core of it is humanity's submission.

Evil is not about murder and pillaging, it is about striving for your own goals and going beyond the acceptable to reach them. Cat and Masego had dreams that are about their struggles, about what they want to achieve – it may be horrible and twisted, but at all points they are expected to have agency and change things. It was the same even when Akua attempted to enslave Cat. The way out is always through choice, requiring human agency... wrapped in horrible cruelty on all sides.

TeK

And we wonder, why Heroes are so reluctant to see a reason. They have Stockholm syndrome.

werafdsaew

I think we saw a glimpse of why in the Prologue of this book: an attempt to deviate from the pattern by the Paladin was put down swiftly by his Angelic Choir.

TheCount

[quote]In the beginning, there were only the Gods. Aeons untold passed as they drifted aimlessly through the Void, until they grew bored with this state of affairs. In their infinite wisdom they brought into existence Creation, but with Creation came discord. The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made.[/quote]

It might be just me, but i always thought the gods below wanted the mortals to be guided to greater things, while the ones above wanted to rule them.... (but then, it might be my fondnes for intrigue acting up.) after all, who better to guide them than other mortals? so far, the villians were the... more creative types, you could say. at least as far as i could gather. though, im not sure about the gnomes or other continents.

and it might be just me, but the gods above reeealy dont like if people have opinions.... or personality for that matter (what with the mass brainwash lone swordy attemped).

NerfContessa

Same

.

usernamesbco

That was my interpretation, too.

greatwyrmgold

Probably. Catherine and Masego's minds aren't treacherous in ways reflecting their Names, but their flaws...and Heroes are human, too, despite their best efforts.

Mental Mouse

We saw Hanno's, which was pretty rough.

Antoninjohn

Cat has seen into the madman's mind that has perspective to see the Gods work in creation, that's probably going to give her some nifty new abilities

Rook

Such as his ability to inflict total confusion with a lack of tact and an inability to read the mood.

One of the only things we've seen so far that can completely bypass all magical protections and name shenanigans

Euodiachloris

Having autism isn't a fancy martial arts technique, though.
<.< Autism: for life, not just for a fight.

Nordvegr

Why fight it? It's a great gift. I may have been cursed with not understanding people, but the tradeoff for understanding numbers and things is thoroughly worth it.

I currently work retail, to practice and patch up my weakness. I've worked this job for six months without getting fired, so I'd say it's working.

Dainpdf

The ability to interact better with Masego, fueled by new understanding?

Euodiachloris

A 3D representation of the Tree of Life. OK. Those get mindbendy very quickly even without murder-happy figments along for the ride.

Annubisk

I'm thinking it's more like an orrery not Yggdrasil

Euodiachloris

Less Yggdrasil, more Sephirot (no, not long white hair).
Think QBL. 😊

You can find mobile 3D renditions not along traditional lines that look... odd. I prefer the Ari configuration, myself, but... hey. *shrugs*

jacobhollander

Now I'm curious as to what the minds of the other members of the Woe look like.

Dainpdf

I'm curious to see what Aoede's mind looks like. Also Hierarch's. He'd probably put it on trial, as a Foreign Despot.

grzecho2222

Wandering Bard – Stage on which faceless puppeteer plays out stories to public of shadows and silhouettes of light, while donning masks made from screaming faces and discarding them to ever growing pile
Hierarch – Quorum full of identical, indescribable people that argue and vote what they want

Dainpdf

That's quite creative. I like.

grzecho2222

Thief – storage room full of stolen things?
Hakram – military office mixed with archive?
Archer – battle arena mixed with high class tavern/ehm?

RanVor

That's probably what Cat would expect going in. As we've seen, it's not always accurate.

My very own name

Oh god I want more! Hierophant's back 😊

Leonard Inkret

Back in the game

wyaldriddler

Ow. Zeze has a fucking militarized mini Creation in his mind.

Go him.

naturalnuke

Zeze you spectrummy little madman, you really need to get better reception in there.

wyaldriddler

Cat will *never* let him live down the fact that she had to get stabbed in his own mind before he woke his lazy ass up.

Naeddyr

Look, if you get stabbed once by someone it's obviously their fault, but if you keep on getting stabbed *everywhere you go*, well, maybe it's a bit your fault?

Milpool

I doubt Cat would ever deny it's totally her fault. She would gripe about it, but she would definitely go, "Yeah, okay, I pretty much ask for it." Of course, so does everyone /she/ stabs, so it works out. Turn about is fair play.

Dainpdf

Maybe add some complimentary snacks, some railing, and danger signs on the more dangerous spheres. Oh, and please do something about this scandalous nether void thing you have going. It's so last season.

Snowfire1224

Hey I'm the first comment! Interesting insight into Masego's mind. Love the new chapter

Snowfire1224

Never mind ont eh first to comment. The page hadn't refreshed yet.

Ox

So, is cat going to glean something on how to pull on winter now!? I want an akua level power up!

Or, is this something seperate, could it be that this draws her closer to the boundary of god and mortal by seeing a glimpse of the god perspective?

NZPIEFACE

Boi. Zeze is a hell of a lot more abstract than Cat.

Parker

Well obviously. I love Cat but she can be very...direct with her reasoning and solutions. It's only recently that she's begun to think further ahead than the current battle/war

Highwayman

Archer and Zeze sitting in a tree,
K I S S I N G

Too soon? 😏

Rook

Less kissing, more discussing magical theory while being slightly confused as to why she's sitting unnecessarily close

Dainpdf

Pft, that ship has been teased for so long I worry a shoujo anime pattern has been ground onto it and they'll NEVER actually confront it.

Insanenoodlyguy

The problem might be more incapability than plot suspense.

We have no doubt now that he considers Archer beautiful. But is beautiful sexy? By which I mean, while he might consider her the most beautiful person he knows, is he equipped to even try at deeper emotional or even physical intimacy? I'm leaning towards him being a demi-romantic asexual. His response to an actual physical encounter would probably be something like "well, that was somewhat pleasant, but people waste all this time obsessing about THAT?"

Though if he did give it a try, he probably wouldn't give a shit if she wanted a non exclusive poly-sort of thing, so who knows, could still work.

Dainpdf

That might be the diagenetic reason. "Plot Suspense" is mostly a non diagenetic one. They can coexist.

Plus, I hesitate to attempt to determine a character's sexuality and romantic inclinations based on so little information in this regard.

Agent J

Has it been teased? Is a plutonic friendship so grand an impossibility? Intimacy is not tied to romance and Masego has shown neither the inclination towards nor the understanding (beyond academics) of that particular subject.

I suspect the closest we'll see Masego get is if Fadila coaxes him into it so she can get a genius child prodigy out of him. It's only an experiment, Masego. Don't be a pansy.

What? No, I'm not trying to sink your ship because I'm staunchly on the S.S. Team Catcher. Whatever gave you that idea?

Dainpdf

I was mostly joking, but yes, the ship has been teased. EE gave us plenty of scenes framed for romance, and has given this quite a bit of fuel. Does this mean Archer and Hierophant have any interest in each other or will ever, in a romantic sense? No.

But, in a narrative sense, the ship has been teased. SS Team Catcher? I'm afraid I missed a reference. Also, *platonic.

RanVor

Catcher = Cat + Archer.

Dainpdf

Ah. I was confused by the use of a personal name for Catherine and a Name for Indrani.

I'm more a fan of Vivirine/Cathienne myself (especially since I feel there's more narrative support for it), but I'm not much of a shipper.

grzecho2222

I am more and more sure that they will confirm they feeling in the most dramatic moment to defeat something or someone with THE POWER OF LOVE and make themselves default winners of the fight

RanVor

After all this time it would be weird if they *didn't* pick up any tricks from Cat's Book of Narrative Magic.

Cicero

Love how to Masego the Woe are primarily there to kill distractions that get in the way of his research.

Novice

I was thinking that the Woe being the most familiar to Masego right now, or that he trusts them the most is why they're the guardian to his mind. But your comment makes the most sense.

grzecho2222

We see Cat when he feels safe
We see Archer when he desire something (peace and quiet in this moment, but still)
We see Hakram when he is unsure
We see Thief when he is wary and smells a trap (also Thief attack is backstab)

ahd

Goodness. No wonder back at home in the palace Masego spends so much time jacked into the Observatory.

Blissful, distraction-free flow state. If only he could cast with absolute positioning from in there.

Robert Allaband

Sigh, poor Cat. Her first thought in solving anything is to kill something and use the body, be it horses, goats that explode and now figments of the imagination.

Dainpdf

She was taught by the best.

Naeddyr

Oh really, an ornery sorcery in an orrery, normally auguring archery.

Antony444

Well...no wonder the Woe are behaving like this. You look at the inside of their minds, and all which awaits you is insanity...

RanVor

Don't be like Masego, remember to vote for Guide!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Not\_a\_robot

Say EE, you don't happen to have or be familiar with someone with autism? Because I have autism, and that description of Zeze's problems with interpreting expressions and physical contact is about as close to a perfect description of my experiences you can get. "Involuntary egocentrism" is what I usually call it. Gorgeous chapter.

letouriste

if he doesn't, he would have probably consulted some site about that in details. there must be some forum for autist problems somewhere, a place to talk about life-hacks for understanding facial expressions

Dainpdf

There are also probably experts in the field he might have consulted, and also fiction written with autism in mind. True, some of it is terrible, but some of it is good.

and proud

Or he's a reddit.com/r/drama member

James, Mostly Harmless

This does explain why Akua's agents could not seduce Masego – he could not read the signals that they were giving him!

JackbeThimble

You can't drop a box of pencils on the internet without someone counting them, autism isn't exactly mysterious to anyone who spends much time in online culture.

TheTime

-“We are making great progress”

-His face blurred, and remained that way.

“You interfere with the process,” he said in an utterly flat voice.

-“No,” Hierophant's voice barked. “No, go away. Catherine?”

I don't think Hierophant has alone in there. something is clearly with him, in some way, and I don't think it's just the Woe's reflections.

crysjal

I imagine the thing that's with him in there is his name. Like Cat having had her beast Hierophant has an aspect that constantly wants to uncover mysteries of creation which was also present in the mindscape.

WuseMajor

Well or he's still got a chunk of demon in there too.

wyaldriddler

Or the construct thing which wore the faces of the Woe. He commanded it with similar inflection.

HappyNap

Gods below, but I feel stupid – I am pretty sure Zeze is autistic, or at least something akin to it, and it's been pretty obvious... And I haven't even considered it, because I haven't been looking.

As always, extremely well written Erratic

shieldredblog

Curious to see what results his intense study of the Light will bring.

He can already use Hierarchy/Order to make it useless.

letouriste

"Magelight's supposed to be hard on the eyes," Archer said. "If you're going to keep reading after dark, use that instead." He started in surprise. Had she caught it for him?"

yeah masego, take care of your eyes! *snicker*

James, Mostly Harmless

That probably happened before he lost his eyes to Summer ...

superkeaton

Cat's finally coming around to the realization that rogues are bullshit.

Dainpdf

Your search word "rogues" returned no results. Perhaps you meant: "heroes"?

Dainpdf

Nice chapter. Masego's mind is much more appropriate for him than the library, though that was also the first place my mind went.

Shequi

"Hierophant's dream was order gone mad."

Oh $h!+

A Demon of Order, which the Praesi call a Beast of Hierarchy.

Big flashing warning signs on that...

grzecho2222

I wonder if the dark orb is made of bad, dangerous, unpleasant or unwanted memories or is it reepresentation of forgetting
Also mind in parts that are all visible from center, but getting to the center is very hard and they are all on poles over abyss that probably can be cut off the center and thrown into the abyss. As if someone was afraid that Demon might get into and try something...

JJR

I thought the dark orb was the result of that demon of absence.
werafdsaew

>> They were the rooms of the Wizards of the West

Was this in Arcadia?

James, Mostly Harmless

I suspect that this was in the Palace in Laure.

James, Mostly Harmless

It is a sad that Kat knows how much blood to expect when stabbed in the back, and can call BS when the spirit in Masego's mind exaggerates the damage.

Aru

During Masego memory of Archer .....reminds of parallels between Black and Hye (Ranger).....to Masego and Indrani

Silverking

One thing I noticed about this chapter is Cat's reaction to her dream-state. I had hoped that she would have gotten an upgrade, but now it makes sense: progress requires accepting some aspect of your Name, and while she's willing to use and be bound with Winter, she refuses to ACCEPT Winter. To her, Winter's emotional endgame is becoming an oath bound dominating sociopath, who ends up dying alone amid its own chaos (as we see in the fairy cycle). Unless and until she can reconcile some part of that for herself, she's not going to be getting any power ups from that method.

James, Mostly Harmless

Masego's mental image of Archer comes from Book 3 Apprentice Interlude when he first sees her shoot <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/08/02/interlude-apprentice/> .

---

Chapter 20: Onset

"Proceran promises should be treated like stew: unless you know every ingredient, best not swallow."

– King Charles Fairfax of Callow, the Rightfully Wary

Archer's elbow was pressing into my eye. I blinked and craned back my neck before she could smack me again, turning in the bed. I carefully extracted myself from the pile of limbs over me, careful not to wake either of them. It was easier than I'd thought, since somewhat unsurprisingly Indrani was hogging the covers. Masego was laying back with his face towards the ceiling, still like he'd been put to rest in a coffin instead of passing out by my side when we came back from his mind. The eye cloth had been tugged down at some point, baring an eerie glass eye and partly covering one of his cheeks. I wrinkled my nose. Archer reeked of yesterday's fighting, so clearly she'd not bothered to clean up before piling on top of us. She murmured in her sleep in a tongue I'd didn't recognize, then promptly spread her legs where I'd been before. She was not, I noted with amusement, granting Masego any more room in the process. If anything she was coming closer to edging him off the bed.

I'd not taken off my tunic before falling asleep last night – and it still surprised me I'd felt the need to sleep at all – but I sat to pull on my boots. I splashed my face with the water basin more out of habit than any real need, the tepid liquid doing nothing to wake me up. A dreamless night, huh. Been a while since I'd had one of those. I made my way out of the tent quietly, stretching my frame when the sun bore down on me. If felt rested. Like I'd been tired and no longer was. It was a small pleasure I allowed myself a moment to properly savour. The Army of Callow's camp was only beginning to wake, dawn fresh to the sky, and I wouldn't truly be needed for at least an hour. If Hakram were around there'd be a meal waiting for me somewhere, along with the night's reports, but he was very far away. Last I'd heard he was bringing the latest recruits up Quicksilver River, intending to link up with Kegan's host before joining us.

The camp fire closest to my tent was deserted save for a single person, tending to a kettle hung over the flames. I didn't need to look twice to recognize Vivienne. She did not turn, though I was certain she'd heard me approach, instead putting down a pair of cups on a flat stone and reaching for the kettle. I raised an eyebrow. The twin bells set on silver made it pretty clear where she'd gotten those. Had she nabbed old Fairfax dinner sets? I smothered a fond smile. Of course she had. Why would even bother to ask? I dropped down at her side, glimpsing the leaves inside the cups. Tea, though not the Praesi stuff. Smelled... Ashuran, maybe? Wasn't the stuff Aisha got imported from across the Tyrian Sea anyway. Wordlessly, she poured the boiling water into them without spilling a drop. I claimed one, inhaling the scent. I tended to enjoy that more than the drink itself.

"I hope that was part of the tenth," I said. "If there's silver missing, the palace seneschal is going to be pissed."

Thief smiled, using a long spoon of silver to stir her tea.

"Stealing from the palace is a hanging offence," she said.

"Not since we revoked Mazus' decrees," I objected. "It's a whipping and a fine now, I think?"

"As Her Majesty says," Vivienne drawled.

She'd never actually denied it, had she? I sighed.

"All right," I said. "You were waiting for me. Out with it."

"We'll be sitting with the Procerans at noon," she replied before taking a sip from her cup. "Addressing our diplomatic approach is in order."

I hummed, inhaling the fragrant steam again.

"Our strategic objectives are still more or less the same as when we started to march," I said. "We need them on the other side of the passage, and to stay there long enough we have breathing room to refit while we prepare our next move. Coin too, if possible. I doubt they'll agree to actual war indemnities, so we'll have to get that through the supplies if we get it at all."

"I've been in contact with the Observatory," Vivienne said. "The situation abroad is evolving."

"The Dominion's armies should be in southern Procer, by now," I said. "But I'm guessing there's more to tell."

"Klaus Papenheim has finally begun his offensive in the Red Flower Vales," my spymistress said. "No word as to the results of the first battles yet, but the Carrion Lord seems to be holding."

I grimaced.

"He'd better," I said. "If the crusaders punch through, our army's in no shape to take them on."

"I've also had word from Praes, though the news is a fortnight old," Vivienne said. "Nok was sacked by the Ashuran war fleet."

I let out a low whistle. I wasn't exactly pleased at the loss of life that'd be involved there, but it was an impressive achievement for the Thalassocracy nonetheless. Praesi cities were layered with centuries of wards and sorcery, not to mention the pack of horrors the aristocrats kept bound in the basement for rainy days. I'd known the Ashurans weren't exactly pushovers, considering they had the largest fleet in Calernia, but most their wars had been fought at sea. Last large-scale engagement I could recall they'd fought on land was when they'd landed armies to help Levant rise against the Principate, and it'd been the incipient Dominion that'd done the heavy lifting there.

"They withdrew after?" I asked.

"Set half the city on fire in the process, after looting it," Vivienne said. "The Wasteland legions arrived two days too late to help with the defence. The Empress is taking a beating at court over it. Thalassina's threatened to rebel if they don't get a Legion garrison. "

"Whoever's in charge of the fleet isn't a fool," I mused. "Nok's the easiest target in the Empire, relatively speaking. They spent most their history under the thumb of one city or another. It's nowhere as crucial to Praes as Thalassina, but they made the Tower bleed. All the wolves will be drawn out by the scent of it."

"I would not wager that the Empress is too preoccupied to sabotage us if she so wishes," Thief said. "But the real pivot remains the battle in the Vales."

"You think Milenan and Malanza will want to stretch the diplomacy out until they know the outcome down south," I frowned.

"If the Carrion Lord is driven back, their negotiating position significantly improves," Vivienne noted. "If he wins, they are no longer sole bearers of the shame of defeat should they make bargain with us. From their perspective, delay has no drawback."

"Except for starving," I said.

She nodded, sipping at her cup.

"I would expect Prince Milenant to state the ongoing continuation of yesterday's arrangement is a condition for continuing to negotiate," Vivienne said. "Something along the lines of coercion souring the process of peacemaking."

"I've got no reason to – ah," I said. "They'll fold early on something major, then argue I'm negotiating in bad faith if I'm not willing to agree."

"Precisely," she said.

"We're not even peacemaking, not really," I sighed. "They don't have the authority to call off the Tenth Crusade. The most we can get is a very narrow truce that doesn't violate the letter of Proceran laws on contributing to crusades."

"It would be reputational disaster for them to agree to even that much without something to show for their retreat," Vivienne said. "We'll need to give them something."

"I can't move on them having a presence on our side of the passage," I stated flatly. "You know very well how much trouble that'd be for us."

She shook her head.

"Their ambitions to expand into Callow are checked, for the moment," she said. "I find it dubious they will attempt to overturn that state of affairs given their weak position. What they need, Catherine, is a way to save face. A way to accept terms that will not make them pariahs in the Highest Assembly."

"Reputation, huh," I mused.

I drank from the tea, though its pleasant fragrance did not extend to the taste in my mouth. Whether it was eating or drinking, the enjoyable parts of it were mostly gone.

"The way I see it, what they're most afraid of back home is Hasenbach," I finally said. "It's horrible for their reputation to make a deal with me, but won't see them overthrown. The First Prince, though, she'll toss their asses out in the cold if she has half an excuse."

"It would greatly consolidate her hold on Procer if the largest opposition bloc was publicly disgraced," Vivienne agreed. "Your point?"

"We hand them a way to kick the mess upstairs," I said, eyes narrowing as I stared into the flames. "Like you said, they don't have the authority to negotiate for the entire crusade. Just themselves. So if they're presented with something they can't accept or refuse without Hasenbach..."

"It is her reputation at stake, not theirs," Vivienne mused.

I set down the cup.

"I think it's time we brought Aisha in on this," I said. "Unless you became fluent in Proceran legalities since we last spoke."

She rolled her eyes. That was a no, then. With a groan, I got up. Time to get to work.

Seven tenths of diplomacy, as far as I could tell, was bickering over symbolic or largely irrelevant details. We wasted a full hour trading envoys with the crusaders just to the order the issues would be addressed in. That and the language that would be used for the negotiations. They pushed for Chantant, but I was having none of that. My knowledge of it wasn't good enough for easy conversation, and I wasn't using a translator for something this important when nearly all the opposite royalty could speak Lower Miezan without trouble. I folded on it being their pavilion and tables we met at, then conceded to their proposal of only twenty attendants in exchange for picking the tongue and the first issue. At least Aisha managed to horse-trade the give on attendants for a limitation on the number of attending heroes. Five was more than I wanted, but there was no realistic chance of the Pilgrim and his sharpest knives not being at the table. All of the Woe save for Hakram would be attending, regardless, so I wasn't feeling overly cornered when it came to the balance of Named power.

My delegation ended up split more or less half and half between Praesi and Callowans. For my homeland the two heavyweights were Grandmaster Brandon Talbot and Baroness Ainsley Morley of – currently occupied – Harrow. I wasn't eager to involve the latter, since she was not a well-known quantity, but it wasn't feasible not to. She was the ranking noble in my army and her holdings would be a point of negotiation. Even if it wouldn't have been a grave insult to keep her away from the table, I would have involved her. Baroness Ainsley had already proved she wanted to look after her people. She deserved a seat, no matter my personal misgivings. On the Praesi side, the most important were Marshal Juniper of Callow and Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara. The latter had picked out everyone else in our delegation save for the Woe, keeping the balance between provenances while digging out the scribes and learned officers that served as the closest thing the Kingdom of Callow currently had to trained diplomats.

The Proceran delegation was, in comparison, a gallery of royalty. Prince Amadis and Princess Rozala had always been a given, but there were a full six crowned heads in attendance. Thief provided names and sparse details quietly. Prince Arnaud of Cantal, by reputation a loudmouthed idiot. Princess Adeline of Orne, whose brother and predecessor had been killed at Black's orders. Prince Alejandro of Segovia, who'd publicly broken with his mother's old alliance with Hasenbach. Prince Louis of Creusens, allegedly so badly in debt to Amadis he couldn't even take a piss without the older man's permission. Save for the heroes, the other attendants were all kinsmen to one royal or another. It was the Named I studied most closely. The Grey Pilgrim's face was the usual serene mask but there were younger heroes with him. The sorcerer I'd fought before, which formal introductions revealed to be Rogue Sorcerer. A woman bearing sword and board and watching me unblinkingly was introduced as the Silent Guardian, while the woman with the red face paint I'd once cut the arm of was the Painted Knife. The last was the Forsworn Healer, and I frowned at the sight of him.

No Saint. That was only half a relief. If she was here, she'd be trouble but I'd at least know where she was for sure. I glanced at the heroes, frown deepening. Silent Guardian to hold me, Painted Knife to check Thief and the Sorcerer to delay Masego. The Healer to keep them going, and the Pilgrim to tip the scales. The five heroes had been chosen so they'd be able to hold up against the Woe in a fight. But if they think it's going to turn to violence, why is the Saint not here?

"... and Her Majesty, Queen Catherine of Callow, First of Her Name," Aisha finished, and I offered a polite nod to the Procerans watching me.

There'd been a Catherine Alban that served as queen regent for her son, actually, but by Callowan tradition that did not count as reigning precedent. Prince Amadis took a seat first. At the centre of his side of the table, before I did. The etiquette of that was against him – as the ruling sovereign of a nation, I had the highest status here and none should be seated before me. I didn't feel particularly insulted, on a personal level, but it was an insult. Offered right after the introductions. While I was less than invested in etiquette, I was invested in this negotiation not being a complete shitshow. So, as Prince Amadis leaned back into his seat, I met his eyes. Silence stretched under the silken pavilion. Slowly, I cocked an eyebrow.

"I was under the impression Arlesites were a mannerly people," I said, then waited a beat. "Your Grace."

I let another moment pass before sitting down and gesturing for my entire delegation to do the same, regardless of the higher status of the royals on the other side.

"You have a reputation for preferring familiar manners, Your Majesty," the Prince of Iserre smiled. "I apologize if offense was taken."

I did not think it a coincidence that familiarity breeds contempt was a common saying in both our homelands. Procerans had a reputation for being able to speak flowery flattery while meaning the opposite that was apparently well-earned.

"With friends, certainly," I smiled back as the Proceran delegation sat in proper order. "Are we friends now, Prince Amadis?"

"Rulers sharing an alignment of interests, mayhaps," the older man said, his Lower Miezian without trace of accent. "Yet is that not the cradle of all great friendships?"

I inclined my head, neither agreeing nor disagreeing. I flicked a glance at the heroes, which were all seated at the left edge of the table save for the Pilgrim. He was at Malanza's side, between her and the Prince of Cantal. Aisha made up my right side, Thief my left. Rank had not been the prime consideration in those arrangements.

"Before beginning, I believe it necessary for the nature of the involvement of your Named to be clarified," I said.

Aisha's notion. Prince Amadis had been introduced as the head of the Proceran delegation, as we'd expected, but the status of the heroes today was vague. Legally speaking, anyway. Several of them weren't even Proceran, and those that were should have no authority to speak of if this was considered a negotiation between Proceran royalty and the Queen of Callow. If it was a conference between representatives of the Tenth Crusade and a villain queen, however, that was a whole other matter. My Staff Tribune had predicted it would be the latter and not the former – otherwise they'd have no legal authority to stand on without the permission of the First Prince and the other sovereigns at the head of the crusade.

"The Chosen have graced us with their presence in an advisory role," Prince Amadis replied.

Good, I thought. Then it was the Prince of Iserre and his fellows I had to settle with, not representatives of the Heavens. We had, at least, the legal prerequisites for any treaty made here to be binding. Not that it assured the deal would be respected. Aisha had reluctantly informed me that the most prominent precedent for treaties between Procerans and an Evil polity was attempts at deals with the Kingdom of the Dead – which were broken by either side as often as not. There were treaties with Helike as well, but none relevant since the League of Free Cities had been founded. It would be shaky grounds to try using those as a yardstick. I nodded at Aisha, who bowed deep in her seat and addressed the table with a graceful smile.

"We would now open formal negotiations between the Kingdom of Callow and the lawful leadership of the invading army currently standing on its sovereign territory," she said.

There were too many people for me to watch them all, so I kept my gaze on the two I knew best: Amadis and Rozala. The Prince of Iserre's friendly smile did not waver in the slightest, but Malanza's brow twitched. Not pleased. The language as presented by Aisha treated the crusaders coming here like any other foreign invasion, the kind the Principate had tried for centuries with various degrees of success. It stripped the Procerans of the handy excuse of 'the Heavens told me to', which might allow them to wiggle out some responsibility for their actions. They weren't going to accept that, of course. But now the bargaining started.

Prince Amadis glanced at one of his diplomats, the middle-aged man bowing just as deep before responding.

"We cannot treat in good faith under these terms," the man replied. "We can, however open formal negotiations between the Praesi vassal state of Callow and the mandated expeditionary force of Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer."

Not presenting themselves as crusaders, but still as being here on Hasenbach's orders. I kept a frown off my face. They knew we weren't going to accept Callow being termed as a vassal state, since they'd effectively be making a deal with the Tower by intermediary if we did. I was fairly sure they could break any terms made if ordered to do so by the First Prince, if it unfolded like that, since the Highest Assembly had formally passed a motion to declare a crusade against Praes and a vassal state would be considered within the scope of that. It went back and forth for a while, until something like a compromise was reached: negotiations were now being held between the Queen in Callow and the mandated expeditionary force of the First Prince.

Aisha had tried for Queen of Callow, but they'd gotten out of that by pointing out that unless the Highest Assembly passed a motion or Hasenbach recognized it by decree, they couldn't legally recognize Callow as a sovereign state with me as its ruler.

Legitimacy was the issue here. My only claim to the throne was conquest, really, and even that was a little iffy. As it stood the treaty would still be binding, theoretically speaking, but it was made with me as an entity and not Callow itself. It became worthless ink if someone put my head on a pike. Thief flicked me an unsurprised look after, having predicted the implication of the other part of the terms. The Procerans, by presenting themselves as an expeditionary force, were paving the grounds for any bill incurred over supplies to be sent to Hasenbach's court instead of coming out of their own pockets. I sincerely doubted that Cordelia would flip me so much as a copper if anything less than an oath to the Heavens was involved, so we'd have to get creative about getting the coin if we were going to get any at all. Still, that they were trying to extricate from this at all meant they were taking the process seriously. A good sign, after that tumultuous opening. I caught the subtle movement of Prince Amadis' hand before anyone else on my side.

"The delegation recognizes the Chosen known as the Grey Pilgrim, formal advisor to the Prince of Iserre," the middle-aged diplomat announced.

The old man rose to his feet.

"I seek clarification from the Queen in Callow," he said calmly, "on matters of intent."

I looked up and fought back a sigh.

Wasn't it traditional that things had to at least go well for the villain before the tables were turned?

---

Rook

A useful tool is never allowed to rest for long. Is Akua already out of the box and keeping quiet, or is the Queen of stabbing and goblinfire arson seriously going to try treating with Procerans without her?

SpeckofStardust

I think she has to be actively drawing on winter to do that, which would not be allowed considering she'd then be 'armed'. At a diplomatic meeting. It wouldn't look good at all.

RoflCat

She might just be called out for this if it come down to it.

After all, the other side seem to want to deal with the one who would love to kick their asses (and probably can) instead of the one person trying not to murder them all and say "Fuck off and die"

stevenneiman

She might have asked for advice before, but she couldn't do it now without giving the crusaders, especially the Grey Pilgrim, too many hints. She knows that the Pilgrim has the power to detect truth or lies, but she has no idea about what else he can do except that he doesn't seem to get the full context of something that reads as a lie. He might very well be able to detect her calling out Akua or even turn it against her.

Useful tool

I think when Akua was referring to useful tool it wasn't in reference to herself, but to Catherine. She still in her arrogance believes herself to be in control on some level. And it fits with Catherine being the one asleep at the time.

RanVor

She was most likely referring to you.

But seriously, if that was true, why would she give up her freedom to bring Cat back? It makes no sense.

Tool

Why would Akua classify what she was doing at the time as resting? Fighting a battle against heroes is not the definition of resting. The only one resting at the time was Catherine.

RanVor

*Not* fighting a battle against heroes *does* qualify as resting, and is exactly what Akua was going to do immediately after thinking those words.

Why would Akua refer to Catherine as her Empress if she believed she was in control?

greatwyrmgold

Pretty sure the advice of a shameless RPG villain wannabe would be a liability. I'm more sure of that than I am that Akua wants to end this crusade.

SpeckofStardust

no.

HappyNap

Oh *what* a surprise the Grey Pilgrim is doing skullduggery again. Raise a hand if you're surprised. Nobody? No? Yeah, didn't think so.

A vote for the Guide is a vote for diplomatic resolutions;
<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Dainpdf

Skullduggery? How so? All I see is negotiations between Catherine and the Royals, then him contributing to his side. How is that skullduggery?

Metrux

The point is he just ignored negotiations and went right on to accusing her of... Something. The ending didn't make it clear what exactly he thinks, but he is obviously talking about Akua.

Dainpdf

I wouldn't say accuse, per se. But if you look at it, veiled accusations have been thrown from both sides from the start – both that Cat was an underling of Praes and that Procer was invading a sovereign nation.

nerferf

Wasn't it traditional that things had to at least go well for the villain before the tables were turned?

Welp your not currently playing the villain in this invasion remember, the heroes are and they need a victory before the table turns on them and then they get defeated

Rook

Especially since she's not technically Name-bound right now.

One thing about a Name is that it isn't just a strength, It's a shackle as well. Binding you to either Above or Below and all that entails.

Winter isn't exactly daisies and sunshine but the court itself isn't technically Evil in and of itself, the same way Summer isn't innately Good or anything.

Jane

I think it was, actually, with Winter being aligned with Evil, and Summer with Good – that's one of the big reasons why Winter was always slated to lose. Summer wasn't nice by any stretch, but they were technically Good, in the same way a fanatic Knight Templar would still be technically Good because they were standing on the right side.

I'd have to look up what chapter that was covered in, though, to be certain.

Ninja

Except Winter didn't always lose. Both courts won only to destroy themselves after doing so in an endless cycle.

Jane

Hm... I don't recall what chapter it was discussed in, but I remember that being the King of Winter's hidden motive for drawing Cat into the story – so that she could break the cycle, by merging the two courts, thus destroying Winter itself. He no longer even wanted to try to win, just to end the game.

It's also explicitly stated at a couple of points that Winter is the otherworldly reflection of Villainy, and we know that Villains are currently always fated to lose in this world, at least in the long term. It would be unusual if Winter didn't have to abide by the same restrictions.

Mr. Nobody

Nope. Winter always had to lose so summer would reign Arcadia yet again.

If I remember correctly, Summer didn't last long because they would burn themselves in war until there was nothing left and no enemy to battle.

Just like in Creation, where there wouldn't exist Good without Evil(or even the story, for that matter); Both Summer and Winter can't survive without their counterparts.

You can see this dynamic even on the perpetual war between Praes and Callow, in the statistics gathered by Black.

esryok

Winter would always lose if it came to a direct confrontation before their intrigues had weakened Summer. They definitely won some of the time.

goliath1303

This is definitely wrong. If it came to a direct confrontation then Summer would win. If, however, intrigue and subterfuge were used, then Winter won. Just go back and look at the dream Cat had after getting her heart back(I think that's when it was.) Summer won on the battlefield, but after Winter was gone they turned to infighting because only one could have the most. Eventually everything burned out and was scoured from existence. Winter though, won when they were the knife in the dark. By the time the hosts of Summer assembled they were a shambling incoherent horde that was easily swept aside by Winter. After that though, Winter turned on itself. Because eventually there would be only one last mouthful, they backstabbed and poisoned each other.

So ya, Summer usually won but Winter definitely had the ability to do so occasionally as well.

d_o_l

Winter is a **reflection** of evil. It isn't the same thing as evil as it exists in Creation.

Jane

Do we know enough about the metaphysics of the realm to say that conclusively?

We know that Creation is essentially a protracted argument between the Gods, but I don't know if Arcadia is part of that or not. If it is, wouldn't it logically be part of that argument as well, as that was the entire intent behind Creation?

I mean, the lack of Names and such suggest that it's apart from Creation, but maybe the gods above and below simply choose a different means of intervening in Arcadia, and the main characters, being human, simply don't know enough to have heard about it. It'd be a bit of a superfluous detail to introduce when the Fae are just an antagonist to be driven back to Arcadia, after all.

Besides, wouldn't being a reflection of Evil still influence her standing in the world? It's not as though she doesn't go full scenery-chewing Villain when she gets too hopped up on the Winter, after all, and she always carries a fragment of that around, even when she's "normal". Sure, she can overcome that, just as she's overcome her role in the last three books, but it still influences what actions she can reasonably take.

wyaldriddler

We do since the discussions in book III clearly laid out that Arcadia is a beta version of Creation. Evil *technically* maps to Evil and Summer *technically* maps to Good but they are different and not a part of the traditional Creation Good vs Evil story.

Jane

Ah, right, I'd quite forgotten that (despite having quoted it below, ack).

That said, what happens when you take a piece of Creation 1.0 and put it into 2.0? They were still made by the same people with the same intent, after all – it's just that it might not be wholly compatible. Does the narrative logic of the world adapt to accommodate it, or is she kind of a "bug" now, someone who ought be powerless instead being a demigoddess?

I could see a plausible story making use of either scenario.

Euodiachloris

It also worked the other way: the King of Winter imported Named from Gods' Argument: Mortal Combat into Gods' Argument (now available on limited access, legacy servers!).

The Woe were bugs wandering around Arcadia, able to break things. 😊

MetruX

Actually it's been stated, by hierophant even, that Winter seems to be a reflection of evil, not that it is, because: A. Winter can and have won some times, but just like summer, when one wins they destroy themselves in some fashion, leading to B. They are not two sides alone, they have a cycle WITH spring and fall, the two can't survive alone.

Also, they DO have Named, only one was shown, the Rider that she confronted there in the beginning, so they clearly are a part of creation, even if set apart, the same as the heavens and the hells, only that Arcadia is more neutral and what happens there is partly a reflection of what is happening/did happen recently on creation.

Both Summer and Winter have villainous traits, one being starving and needing, the other being full and destroying, while Spring is growth and peace, Fall goes to deterioration and lack, by spending more than can be made. But also we have The Wild Hunt only during Spring/Fall, and a Fae from one of the four is always from there, doesn't exist on other seasons, except for the Hunt, since any Fae can become a part of it.

Dainpdf

As Ninja stated, they both have components of Good and Evil. Summer is irascible and attempts to exterminate everything in sight, while Winter knows of diplomacy, treaties and alliances. They're both destructive at their core, of course.

Jane

From Book 3, Chapter 36. It was the first quote I had handy.

While I may be misreading the passage, it seems to state that Winter is meant to bound to Evil as much as any Name is – even if Winter is not pure lowercase good or evil, as nothing in the world is, they're meant to embody the concept in a way that regular mortals don't.

Euodiachloris

It looks to me like a lot of assumptions about 1) how Arcadia maps to Creation, 2) what Good and Evil within Creation are like and 3) that ideas from the "beta" version got closely mapped.

Because, if all Summer and Winter are just meant to be testing the concept of "two predetermined factions locked in constant struggle", neither need map to any other two sides locked in struggle in any other realm. Because the struggle may be the key feature being put through its paces, not the nature of the participants.

In short: people in Creation may have wrongly pegged a lot of things.

Dainpdf

Thank you for the quote. That does indicate Winter is probably more villainous and Summer more heroic. Guess I was mistaking Good and Evil, and good and evil. Still, some things to think about: First, that quote is speculation, as the Empress reminds; second, the idea would be that they *mirror* Evil, not embody it. And reflections can be muddled.

stevenneiman

As Ninja said, Winter and Summer were both capable of victory, the problem was that that victory was rendered meaningless by the renewal of the seasons, which inevitably turned each victory for Summer or Winter completely pointless. The King of Winter basically chose to sacrifice the hope for more meaningless victories in exchange for introducing a new agent who would allow something, anything to happen that hadn't happened to him before. It wasn't an attempt to win against Summer, because he'd done that enough times to grow sick of it

That said, Good and Evil to certainly lend a lot of theme and flavor to Summer and Winter, such as the way that Summer puts on a facade of compassion even for people she has decided to kill, or the way that Winter's biggest weakness is the fact that its members can't work together worth a darn. You can think of the Fae as being like the Thermians from Galaxy Quest, except if Sarris was also acting the way he does because of the show, and instead of pulp sci-fi they had watched a fictionalized account of world history. The Thermians aren't actually the crew of the NSEA protector, but they devote themselves to imitating it as best they can. In the same way, the Summer and Winter courts aren't actually Good and Evil, but they adopt a lot of the same trappings as if they were.

Charlie Hegarty

Well, she worked pretty solidly for team Evil before stabbing her mentor and taking control over Callow, which she enforces with a Legion of Terror whilst still technically being subordinate to the Tyrant of Praes.

Plus, her actions in this crusade: leading the wild hunt into the enemy camp to slaughter their officers, wielding doomsday spells and killing heroes.

All make her, honestly, still come off as the villain of this piece to me.

TeK

Yeah, she defeated foreign attempts to destabilize her country, an attempt to brainwash an entire city of innocents into a mindless army, took charge and provided leadership in period of political disturbance following previously mentioned foreign attempts to meddle in their politics by subsidising unstable political elements and, allegedly, providing indirect military help to rebels of another nation. Then she went on to protect her country from an otherworldly invasion, defeating a coup in process, and annihilated crazy genocidal maniac, which wiped out one of biggest cities of Callow and threatened to take over the continent. Than she consolidated leadership even more, recreating so much needed bureaucratic structure and helping refugees all over Callow, while also establishing de-facto sovereignty to her homeland. And now she trying to stop foreign invasion while being pretty much the only party willing to forgo her interests to avoid bloodshed. How is she NOT a Hero?

See what I did there? Nitpick handfull of detail, and you can paint anyone as anything.

NZPIEFACE

One man's hero is another man's villain.

mjwabby

"My Staff Tribune had predicted it would be the latter and not the former – " I think this is backwards, if I understand the rest correctly- Aisha predicts that they would act as Proceran royalty (former) not as members of the crusade (latter), right?

RoflCat

No, they're trying to pin it as they're under order of Hasenbach, that way they can throw all the responsibility to her.

Morgenstern

Yes, but *as royals of Procer* NOT as crusaders... because otherwise they *would have no authority to treat AT ALL*, as I understand it so far. Thus, "latter" and "former" *are* mixed up, imho as well.

Simurgh

But in the end they aren't negotiating as royals of Procer. They're negotiating as representatives of an expeditionary force under the First Prince.

Agent J

EE has mixed them up before, rather consistently if memory serves. May just be he's under the impression they hold their opposite meanings.

Jane

You know, the nice thing about being an Evil kingdom is that you only have to bother with the diplomatic niceties if you feel like puffing up your ego. Everyone knows who the greatest power is and that they ought be respected, and if either of those are in question, a few new screaming heads in a hallway will clarify the matter quite nicely.

Seeing hours wasted on who gets called what, with the distinctions actually *matter*ing instead of just being handy labels for "The Queen of Callow (who we really don't want to be Queen)" and "The Invading Army (Hasenbach sent us, take up payment with her)", makes one wonder how more states haven't slid into Evil just as a matter of convenience. Imagine how much more productive leadership could be if they didn't have to spend so much time parsing their statements!

/tongue in cheek

Rook

Frustrating and time consuming maybe, but not impractical. No one is an island, so dealing with the diplomatic bullshittery is not any different than arming yourself before gouging each other's eyes out in a fight, or lighting up a fire and putting on a jacket for the cold. It's just a tool to manipulate and adapt to the environment.

Considering that even legitimate justifications like Lone Idiot's contrition for his crimes or the Diabolist's right of birth weren't enough to keep them alive, swapping to evil on the basis that observing niceties is annoying would be a good way to have very little Weight. You'd be almost certain to die in your first engagement.

Jane

As I said, it was a joke 😊. Any time saved on working out who to call what (something that probably only takes a long time the first time, anyway) would be more than lost on the constant scheming for promotion via killing your boss. Well, assuming that's common in more than just Praes – I don't get the feeling Helike or the Dead King waste too much time on that.

Novice

To be fair, all these diplomatic procedures have their roots in RL history as well. Down to the Holy Roman Empire using the term King in Prussia but not recognizing the monarch as King of Prussia so as not to piss off the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

Rothschwerth

Similarly, Wilhelm I was crowned German Emperor instead of Emperor of Germany after obliterating the French. However, I don't see Cat becoming an Empress just yet.

Your comparison might be very fitting as Frederick the Great (a contemporary of Russia's Catherine the Great) shifted from being King in Prussia to being King of Prussia after reconquering Prussian soil in the First Partition of Poland. I don't remember whether there's any historically Callowan land in Procer, but I would be amused if a Partition happened.

Dainpdf

I get the impression both Good and Evil only come to the table when either they believe they'll have a great negotiating position, or their arms are twisted into it. Such as is the case right here.

JackbeThimble

...Is no one going to talk about the Woe's sleeping arrangements?

Jane

We're just all pretending we're above making prurient jokes about the three of them.

Highwayman

Now we know Archer is the kind of person that doesn't shower before she sleeps.

Oshi

Exhausted friends/family slept in the same bed?

Daemion

It was just the one time... if it becomes a habit to share a bed, then we can gossip. 😊

Dainpdf

Now we just need to get Vivienne and Hakram on that bed. And make Cat sleep again.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

"I seek clarification from the Queen in Callow," he said calmly, "on matters of intent."

"goblin munitions for all!"

Highwayman

Any no party like a goblin fire party.

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

dem gobbos 'r' on da loose b0sS

JJR

Those munitions are lit fam.

No seriously, we need to run.

superkeaton

Well fuck me, that felt short. The majority was lots of words to describe even wordier words and time wasters.

Still, a necessary evil. I'm interested to see what Pilgrim has to say.

Novice

I don't why I find "a necessary evil" funny, but I do.

Draconius Sinister

I... don't fully understand what the Pilgrim is going for here. I get that he's forcing Catherine to show at least some of her hand here, either telling the truth and giving th Procerans an idea of what she wants overall and what they can get from her, or a lie that will bind what exactly she can and can't fight for. Everyone seems to have a very firm idea of what he's after specifically though, and I'm sitting here like a dummy.

In regards to the other Heroic Named... well, Catherine is treating with those sent by Hasenbach, not the servants of the Heavens working in the Crusade. That gives the heroes leeway to torch and burn the camps while the Queen is away. Maybe it won't be what happens, but with how the Saint of Swords has acted thus far... Also, if Cat loses her army to a technicality, I'm getting the feeling that it will be slashy-freezy time for the royals in the tent. Hell, Larat might even get the crowns he's waiting on.

nerferf

Well pilgrim has no clue what to do at this point, he was so used to doing his support role for other heroes that at this point he has no idea what to do given he's playing a main antagonist for this chapter of the invasion

I mean at this point it's become obvious the heroes have no idea how to fully use narrative other than heroic tropes with a villain playing along and never faced this situation without the bard doing the thinking for them

werafdsaew

To be fair the only other Villain who leaned against villainous tropes is Black, and he doesn't tend to leave his opponents alive.

Anon

Well, presumably, as Cat has already 'told' the Pilgrim she'd be fine helping them march against Malicia if they left Callow alone, he should already know her intent.

This feels more like a probe to ascertain if Cat has already got a plan for dealing with Hasenbach to get peace accords written and signed – Cat doesn't have any strong declaration to answer, but I imagine that Procer will start to pull back if she clams up.

(Also, yeeeeeeeees @ more Archer being overly friendly, and Thief/Catherine shared jokes)

Amadis posturing when his side is low on food, morale, and was on the verge of a rout seems... a little odd to be so petty, but it could just be a ploy to gauge Cat's emotional state, I suppose?

Jane

Pilgrim might just be trying to figure out what the blazes is going on, since "Cat" gave some lines he found rather alarming during "her" monologue before fighting the Heroes. He might think she's a supremely gifted liar, or has some personality disorder, and is trying to suss out the truth before they do anything irrevocable.

Alternately, he might have guessed something strange happened during the battle, and is taking this opportunity to out her trick in the middle of the conference, knowing that it has a good chance of blowing everything up.

Dylan Tullos

Jane:

That's an interesting theory. Akua did a decent Cat impersonation most of the time, but the part where she claimed to rule by right of birth is incredibly out of character.

If he's able to figure out that she was possessed by Akua... well, all of the outcomes there are bad. It's just a question of how bad.

Barrendur

Tedious chapter, and preceded by a tedious chapter; I think the story has become dull, irritating and unnecessarily complicated. For the first time since the story began, I found the updates too boring to read in their entirety; I only skimmed the last two chapters, and I did not vote for APGtE.

Mr. Nobody

"Oh no... Not politics again! Give me a dumb MC swinging a sword and throwing fire balls everywhere!!"

"Dialogues...? Who needs dialogue?!?! I WANNA SEE SOME ACTION!!!"

"Damn... I almost fell asleep reading this. Let's watch some of Michael Bay's movies, I need more explosions."

Jane

Honestly, I find chapters like this more interesting than the battles. There are so many more ways to win (or lose, poor council we never knew) a peace than there are a battle.

Adurna

Very much agreed. So satisfying with the interplay interspersed with introspection.

Draconius Sinister

I actually agree with Barrendur. Politics has its place, and I do enjoy seeing the maneuvering and working around each other each side is doing, but I read primarily to see a protagonist fight their battles, and Cat has made it clear that the battles she shines brightest in are the literal ones.

I don't really understand the argument that some have made that Politics keep it interesting because it isn't like fights, in that the outcome is uncertain and the protagonist isn't guaranteed a victory. I get that it's unlikely that the protagonist in a given story will ever suffer a permanent loss in battle, unless if it is to change their character or give them something to work against, but how are politics any different? In both Cat is the protagonist, and the way the story has been building ever upwards in scale, we know that Cat will need both the personal power of Winter and/or a Name, to fight the Forever King and the Dead King when they make nuisances of themselves, and will need an army behind her, so she is unlikely to suffer any permanently crippling defeat in battle, be it personal or on a larger scale for her army. At the same time, we know that the Dead King and Forever King both have armies that Catherine CAN NOT TAKE in a fight alone, so she will have allies, which means narratively, she must succeed at negotiations at one point or another.

What I'm saying is that the political fights are just as predictable in outcome as the fights: Cat will win the ones she needs to. Talking down to someone because they'd rather read about demigods duking it out than the finer points of a ceasefire is needlessly rude, and hypocritical, just because their interests don't align with yours.

I'm with Barrendur, in that I'd rather not read again about how the Procerans are dicks, and the exact advantages and disadvantages have in a negotiation, again. That doesn't mean I'll begrudge you enjoying the verbal sparring or the introspective analysis of the situation, and how best to eke out a 'win' in unfavorable circumstances. Cat is guaranteed to win either way, eventually, and we're all just along for the ride. Let's all enjoy the parts we enjoy and let others do the same, no?

Metrux

I agree with your last declaration, which is why I disagree with the rest. Barrendur was rude, and honestly the wording there infer that he would rather have it changed, which isn't good for the author neither for the other readers. Sure, the ones that came after him shouldn't be rude to him in response, since this doesn't solve anything, but being rude to them in turn, and even more agreeing with Barrendur... You're just making more fire.

If what you say at the end is truth, please, just let those people have their fights and enjoy what you enjoy. I very much like the fights, and I very much enjoy those political chapters, because as much as victory is guaranteed, we never know what victory truly is in politics. To take example from your text, she needs to be there, strong, and with an army... But needs it be her army? Need it even be her own personal power? For the tone of the story it probably will be yes, to both questions, but that is not defined, and Erraticerrata has a way of surprising us, so yes, I do find political confrontations more open in their end. Though the fight chapters tend to rise more our emotions. Each has their shine, and being told by someone that what you like is "dull, irritating and unnecessarily complicated", that it was too boring to read, and that he stopped supporting the author for making what we like... Surely you can understand WHY they got rude and angry with him, even if they shouldn't do it?

Draconius Sinister

I'm not particularly mad at anyone myself, and I understand why people have gotten a bit mad. I'm just saying I agree in the sense that I prefer fights to politics. I certainly haven't gotten tired of the story, but things do feel like they're dragging a little bit, and somehow the chapters also feel super short of late. Sorry for the essay before, I was mostly venting about other people dismissing the fights outright in earlier chapters, and saying the politics were the only interesting thing. Still mad about seeing that conversation however many weeks back...! Sorry for coming off like an asshole, didn't mean to!

mórrígan

We're, what, three chapters out from a six-chapter streak of uninterrupted action? (Contingent still had what I would consider 'action' though this is up for debate.) Perhaps you should give it some time before long jumping to a conclusion? If the story continued on the path that the Interludes set for them – that is, of ***ACTION FIGHTS EXPLOSIONS*** every chapter – it would *also* get 'dull and irritating,' though not as 'unnecessarily complicated.'

I'm not sure if you noticed, but this is a wonderful, novel, and completely never-seen-before device we call *pacing.* By giving us downtime between encounters, we don't get *bored* by the constant fighting, and that's a ***good*** thing.

Also: I'm not sure where you've been for the past three books? This has happened over and over again over the last few hundred or so chapters. Action – downtime – action. The pattern hasn't changed since Book I: Chapter I and I'm baffled that *just now* you're noticing it.

Engineer

I'm feeling like I usually feel after a chapter of Mother of Learning.

Gunslinger

Atleast the wait is 2 days instead of 1. 5 months

Letouriste

What? Every chapter has been released in 1 month top.

Letouriste

Wait what? You felt all this from a chapter so short? This chapter was nothing special too. No way that can compare to a MoL one

Metrux

A chapter alone is like a stick alone, can be broken easily. To see the true strength of a book you need to see the entirety, just like a tree. Mother is great, I love it, but this story here is better when it comes to characterization, which leads to greater emotions being shared. Yes, this one chapter is smaller "not that special", on the long run. But it compounds with all the rest of the story, showing change, defeat, victory and hope, all in much less lines.

All in all, you're entitled to your opinion, but just the same you shouldn't scorn someone else's opinions.

Dainpdf

I don't know what the Pilgrim is going for here; the last line makes it sound like this is supposed to be an "oh snap" moment, but I have no idea why his question is important. Maybe it's a throwback to something I forgot?

This felt a bit short, not sure why... Might be the fact that the chapter was mostly connective tissue, with little real meat to it.

I look forward to Friday.

Adurna

His ability to read either truth or emotions from the answer means that it is a potent tool to limit Cat in what she says (can't say she is playing for too much more than she is) or at the very least gauge how honourable her intentions are.

Dainpdf

Well, I guess. That doesn't seem nearly dramatic enough for Cat to have the reaction she did.

Was it because the heroes are getting involved in the negotiations? Because, if she didn't see that coming, she needs to rethink her assumptions.

RanVor

For me, it seemed more like exasperation than "OH SNAP".

MetruX

A lot of people seem to not notice, and it's understandable, because this is very much an indirect and diplomatic way of inquiring about her changes as Akua. And in a way she can't ignore, neither can she truly lie, since he can tell the lies.

Does this seem more dramatic for you? :3

Dainpdf

That doesn't seem to mesh well with my notion of intent. I don't see what it has to do with the Akua thing, exactly.

Walter

The question of 'Where is Saint' is unreasonably terrifying.

RanVor

No. It is reasonably terrifying. The only reason for her not to be present is being a part of some vicious plot that will see Catherine fucked over at least twice before the end of the day.

Amoonymous

Yeah, but if that happens then not only is Cat and crew playing the heroic role, they're doing so as the party that was backstabbed (however "technically not a backstab" the Procerans try to play it off, it's still a backstab) while negotiating in good faith.

When it comes to stories, that sounds like the type that would hand Cat a win in this universe.

NZPIEFACE

They literally started this off saying that they couldn't talk in good faith.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

It is certainly possible that Saint is missing as part of a terrifying plot.

It is also possible that she's missing because she's a terrible diplomat and should never be allowed to participate in any negotiations.

Now, I'm pretty sure that there's something bad going on here, but that doesn't mean that there's no possible alternatives. Saint wasn't there the first time Grey Pilgrim spoke to Cat, either, probably because he wanted to talk with Cat when she wasn't distracted by Saint trying to kill her.

Dainpdf

That, or everyone else knew bringing her to this would be counter-productive, since she'd be hostile and work against negotiations, where they're apparently going for delay tactics.

Insanenoodlyguy

There is another reason, and a very simple one. She has near-violently disagreed with this sitdown happening at all. Breaking truce could have very real consequences for all involved, and there's a risk that not only might she attack the Callowins, but attack her own side if she feels they are betraying the heavens. I have no doubt they at least put her somewhere where she can make things go bad for Cat very quickly, but her not being here isn't just an obvious trap.

RanVor

Nah. It would be too simple.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Agreed. I just think it will be smarter and nastier than a straight backstab.

RanVor

Well, I guess it's also possible that they deliberately held her back specifically *because of* how suspicious it looks, counting on Cat to misjudge the situation and make a mistake. But I think it's less likely than that:

*after the negotiations concluded*

Cat: Oh, and if I may ask, where is the Saint of Swords?

The Saint: I'm in ur base killin' ur d00dz lol

*ahd*

Saint and Bard are holed up somewhere having a good chat and a drink.

Rook

The Saint is so fucking OP that she's scary when she's there and scary when she's not

RanVor

It just occurred to me that the Pilgrim might decide that stopping Cat is more important than the state of the army, and lie about her intentions, knowing he'll be believed unconditionally. And the Saint is already in position to launch a surprise attack on the Army of Callow in case the negotiations go down...

*Euodiachloris*

If that's their play, they'll have locked themselves into villainous roles, regardless of which side powers their Names.

I think Pilgrim has yet to wrap his head around the whole "our Heroes are their Villains and visa versa" cultural thing. Or, that Callow has been gradually developing a "screw both sides for making us their battlefield, yet a-bloody-gain – RESIST the invaders (any of them)!" narrative over centuries. 😊

Roles do gradually shift; so do which tropes go with which tale. 😊

RanVor

No one seems to take into consideration that not everyone is as genre savvy as Cat. The Heroes never needed to learn to think in terms of narratives. They never faced the situation that couldn't be overcome by acting stereotypically. They might not even realize that by doing something like that they give her an advantage. Or they might consider eliminating her army valuable enough to risk it.

Also, their judgment is most likely clouded by the Heavens, and the Heavens want Cat dead really badly. Sure, it's not very heroic to backstab the enemy during the diplomatic meeting, but that's always the problem with the Greater Good types – they always regret the things they're doing, but never enough to stop.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

The Wandering Bard is considerably more genre-savvy than Cat, or even Black, and she's the one pulling the strings. The Heroes don't have to be geniuses when they're being advised by an ancient monster that knows all the rules and loopholes.

"Always regret the things they're doing, but never enough to stop." Funny, that's exactly what Cordelia said to Cat during their conversation.

RanVor

If you didn't notice, the Bard isn't here with them.

As for the other part of your comment, remember the conversation we had under Chapter 17? I DO NOT INTEND TO REVIVE IT.

RanVor

Also, I just reread that conversation and Cordelia didn't say anything of the sort.

Dylan Tullos

"And yet," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "you still wear the crown and muster your armies for war. Sentiment is only meaningful if followed by action. If your grief at all the woe you have caused changes nothing, it is merely self-pity."

Agreed on not reviving our earlier argument. That wall of text ate most of the comments section.

Good point about the Bard. I just don't think Grey Pilgrim is the kind to break a truce; he seems extremely Lawful, and Saint listens to him. He'll try to maneuver Cat into a bad position, but I don't see him backstabbing during a conference.

The Heroes we've met so far have been honest. Even the grimdark Lone Swordsman always kept his agreements, and Grey Pilgrim's Name and Role is that of a wise, kindly advisor, not an antihero.

RanVor

I don't really consider what I wrote about the Pilgrim very likely. It's just crossed my mind as a possibility. Who knows what he might be capable of with the Choirs whispering in his ear...

Jane

Actually... I think Cat might be less genre-savvy in certain ways. It's been implied in the past (a couple of books ago) that Black was deliberately failing to tell Cat of certain commonly known things in the belief that not knowing how Names "should" work will make her stronger. I also recall Akua having been surprised at her ignorance in... Book II, I think, sometime after she tried threatening the orphanage? And in how she hadn't a clue as to what a Pattern of Three was until she was involved in one, while several other characters have actively attempted to exploit them, sometimes successfully (Akua), sometimes not (the foolish Paladin this prologue).

That said, though, we also have how the Pilgrim and Saint attempted to read the flow of her story last battle, predicting that she might rise from her unconscious state to save her friends at their time of greatest need. That didn't happen, and they questioned its plausibility on the basis of her being a Villain, but they went full meta in how they guessed it would happen – they didn't try to read the state of the battle, or of her personality, just what the shape of the story looked like. That suggests to me that they're more used to thinking in terms of genre than they are the actual parts of the story – which doesn't necessarily mean they're good at it, since even a small amount of genre-savvy presumably goes a long way in a setting like this, but I wouldn't necessarily bet against it.

Of course, depending on his goal, he might have to ignore his instincts and play a gambit he expects to blow up in his face anyway. If he thinks these negotiations will end in a long-term disaster for the continent, he might well be willing to inflict grave harm on himself and the army in order to avert it.

RanVor

"That said, though, we also have how the Pilgrim and Saint attempted to read the flow of her story last battle, predicting that she might rise from her unconscious state to save her friends at their time of greatest need. "

You're right. I did forget about that one.

How do you do those citations anyway?

Jane

(blockquote)text(/blockquote). Just replace the ( and ) with .

Careful, though; it's quite easy for the blockquote monster to eat your entire comment if given the smallest of typos to work with x_x . With the lack of an edit function, your comment can end up far more unreadable than if you'd just used quotes or italics to indicate you were quoting someone..

Jane

...Erm, while you've probably guessed this already, that suspicious blank after "with" should read > and < . Just flip them around when you're ready to invoke them.

TeK

Nobody picking up on tidbit about Nok? Thallassian fleet is led by their leaders son – one whos body and soul are owned by Empress. And now he showing unexpected savviness in Praesi politics by attacking Nok. The city is sacked – minus one High Lord, Legions "unfortunately were too late" (or were they?), now is the time to ask, what Malicia is thinking?

Gunslinger

He's in Malicia's pocket but I think Black's interlude pointed out that as long as his father was still alive he would be followed.

sengachi

Yeah but if they own the commander of the fleet, there's no way they didn't know when the city was going to be hit. They totally could have gotten the Legions there in time if they wanted to.

NZPIEFACE

Man, if only the sword in the stone was still around.

Decius

Cat has the best chance possible right now to get the Pilgrim on her side. She offered earlier to assist the Crusade to Praes, now's the chance to get them out of Callow for good.

mavant

Haven't read the full chapter yet, but man that OT3 ship tease

Dylan Tullos

The strategic situation is interesting.

Ashur is doing their job; by raiding the cities along the coast, they're putting pressure on Malicia and tying down the Legions stationed in Praes. Every legionary garrisoned in a Wasteland city is one legionary that isn't free to oppose the Crusading armies further west.

The Dominion is on the march, and if their armies are able to get through the Stairway, they'll simply overwhelm the remaining Army of Callow. Even if the Stairway is somehow closed or blocked, Pappenheim may have the sheer numbers to force the Red Flower Vales through attrition. With his army and those of the Dominion, he has a huge strategic advantage against Black.

Prince Amadis is a clever man, but I don't see him getting out of this. Cordelia has no reason to agree to any treaty he makes. She's already gotten thousands of fantassins killed, accomplishing one of her objectives, and now her internal opponents are openly negotiating with an Evil ruler. If they strike an agreement and retreat, it would be simple for her to cast the blame on Amadis and destroy him politically.

Cordelia has already accomplished one essential goal; Catherine has killed enough of her fantassins so that she no longer has to fear an unemployed mercenary army. Now she's on the verge of discrediting her political opposition. Once that is accomplished, her only remaining goals will be tearing down the Tower and bringing Callow back to the side of Good.

Tohron

Of course, there is one caveat here – Catherine knows that one of Cordelia's goals in sending Amadis and Rozala was to get them killed or discredited, and the two of them probably won't be happy to play along with that.

Dylan Tullos

Tohron:

Catherine can do her best not to kill Amadis and Rozala, but they've already lost a huge part of their army, and they're engaging in delicate negotiations with an Evil ruler. At this point, it would be very hard for them to put a positive spin on "Made a deal with Evil that had us retreat back through the Stairway".

The only way I can see for Catherine to avoid discrediting them would be to let them stay in Callow, which she's not willing to do. Charging Amadis and Rozala for food on the way out would humiliate them further, rubbing in their defeat and making it impossible for them to revive their plans.

vuthuha912

Seriously, Malicia doesn't think like a military leader at all. Cat should take her words as suggestions at most. If your army is there with you because they are paid to do so, killing you is the way to disrupt the entire thing. It is important to grasp the relationship between enemy troops and the commander. If it is skin deep – murder the top. If it is as thick as blood, be prepared to fight a drawn-out war. Various factors in the Procer army are paid and have no great loyalty to the state. It can be used to great effect.

And Cordelia also achieves the objective of depriving her country of useful manpower, a large sum of money, and straining its delicate economy. People need land to actually settle down and revitalize the economy. She should have gone with land reforms first. No one should be seeking war that closes after the last one. It is a surefire way to get your nation to collapse. No matter how just the cause, constant war really can ravage a country.

sengachi

I'll bet when Akua was doing her false hero monologue she made some statement parallel to a previous statement Catherine had made, and the Grey Pilgrim registered it as a lie from Akua but a truth from Catherine.

Also I'll bet the Saint of Swords is in position to destroy Cat's army if need be. Juniper isn't the only one who knows you can win a war without going for the head of the snake.

sengachi

I loved, absolutely loved, seeing Indrani, Masego, and Cat snuggled up together. That kind of casual intimacy means a lot to me and it really warmed my heart seeing the three of them be together like that.

Talmora

I am slightly depressed and annoyed at how this book is going. Barely any victories to Cat's name besides limiting the amount of assassination attempts. And now it sounds like Pilgrim is going to screw her over more....again....for like the third time.

shyntar

"Wasn't it traditional that things had to at least go well for the villain before the tables were turned?"

tyizor

As shyntar implied, Cat's not playing the villan role this time. She's forced it onto the heroes ironically.

Byzantine

You know, I don't she forced anything on them. I think they walked into it entirely on their own, of their own free will. Catherine, in fact, tried to stop them from doing so.

werafdsaew

That doesn't look good for the negotiation.

wyaldriddler

At this point, since I consider Saint and Pilgrim to be decently intelligent and genre savy, otherwise they wouldn't be alive, I figure they are going for a story which we don't know about. My current guess is some kind of beleaguered queen redemption story.

Which ah... well that's gonna be the third time Cat says fuck you to the Choir's.

Byzantine

The thing is Cat doesn't give two shits about Good or Evil. She's just trying to do the right thing for Callow – which seems to be really pissing off Good.

Shawn Panzegraf

There's another possibility,
One I HOPE is actually the case. Archer commented, after her go-round with Saint, that Saint is Old and she thinks Saint drawing heavily on her Name is getting to be more than her body can handle.

Think about the sort of stuff Saint's been doing. She's been cutting gashes in the air, to use as hand and footholds to the first time pursue and cut bits off Cat as Cat withdrew running on flat shadow-panes...and then the second time did the same thing, only a LOT more of it, to gain the necessary altitude to go after Cat while Cat was on Winged-Zombie.

All that Sky-Parkour, move after move after move, each move beginning with drawing on her Name enough to gash Reality enough to create grip-points out of thin air...above and beyond engagement after engagement, each and every day, if not multiple times a day, for pretty much the last seven days. To say nothing at all of all the conventional running and cutting-to-pieces of hundreds of Callowan soldiers. She's been forced to defend herself with her Name from Masego's very best efforts to alpha-strike her, and then had an extended engagement with Archer.

Saint may well be running on fumes, and (likely at the Pilgrim's earnest suggestion) is using the duration of diplomatic whatever's to rest and recharge.

I truly, truly hope it's that. Otherwise the whole Villains Don't Age thing is a meaningless issue of cosmetics. If aged Heroes retain full youthful vigor/constitution, then all Heroic aging means is they cosmetically look worse than the Villains. That doesn't really jive with the issue as it was explained very early on. To say nothing of the fact it would make Ranger a LOT less distinctive.

What I've been hoping to see for a bit now is some sign that all this 110% the Saint and GP have been giving to shield the younger Heroes from the lethal results of their errors has been whittling them down. Otherwise they're frankly OP. Even after staving off the Absolute Positioning Flood, the GP was merely tired-seeming for all of one day, but was splitting and re-purposing the Summoned Summer Sun the very next morning.

The GP and the Saint have been at it flat-out for some time now. They're very old, and it'd be incredibly interesting to finally see a chink in their invulnerability. Or..as someone else said, the Saint could be flatly opposed to treating with Catherine, and is using as non-participation in the diplomacy as the BS-figleaf justification she's going to use to explain how she can strike treacherously while negotiations are ongoing, and still be a "Hero."

RanVor

The Heroes being OP is one of the crucial plot points of the story. I wouldn't be surprised if they just got more powerful with age.

What makes you think Hye Su is a Hero?

Metrux

They age, don't exactly loose power. The whole gig is that THEY DIE TO AGING. If you trully think about it, villains can live forever. Heroes can't. So even if they stay at the height of their power until the day they die... They still die to age just like a normal person. You'll never see a 200 years old hero.

Metrux

A. She's a trainer of both Heroes and Villains; B. Her legend was big before the Calamities, and she did fight against several Villains; C. She has a Name that can be Heroic or Villainous; D. No one knows if her not seeming to age is because of Villainy or her elf ancestry, which means she could be the closest thing to a immortal Hero, or even a true Neutral party. It's been said before, when Cat was learning, that not even Black is sure if she is Hero or Villain.

RanVor

All of that is true, but from what we know about her personality, she seems more Villainous than Heroic. In the Guide sense, of course, not in the normal sense.

---

Chapter 21: Tug-of-War

"Invading Callow is much like drunkenly playing dice: the odds are never as good as you believe, and you know you've reached bottom when snake eyes are involved."

– Dread Emperor Malevolent III, the Pithy

I pricked my ears, gauging the enemy. Most of the Proceran delegation had either skipped a beat or seen their pulse quicken when the Pilgrim rose to his feet. That was telling. Since it was dubious anyone that high up in the Proceran pecking order was faint of heart, the implication was that this particular play had been kept close to the chest. There were only four who'd not had a physical reaction of fear or surprise: Prince Amadis, Princess Rozala, Prince Arnaud and the middle-aged diplomat who'd been the mouthpiece for the opposition so far. The first two were only to be expected, and the last a given, but the third? That was interesting. Arnaud of Cantal did not strike me as the kind of man the other two royals would keep deep in their confidence. Has he found out on his own? If he was spying on the leaders of the northern crusade, that was a possible angle for Thief to exploit. Turning him seemed unlikely, but if his spying apparatus could be infiltrated... Something to discuss with her later. I made a note to have Vivienne dig deeper into the man, as there was apparently more to him than his reputation. The Grey Pilgrim's words were followed by heavy silence and I did not hurry to respond.

This, I knew, was the beginning of the deeper game. The war behind the war, where Named would claw at each other like animals to get the morsels of narrative they needed for the final victory. The thing was, as it stood, I was winning that fight.

I'd repeatedly made overtures for peace, brought up whenever I could that the enemy was invading my homeland for mostly petty reasons and avoided – as much as feasible – falling into the kind of villainous stand that would get me winning in the short term and killed in the long one. As long as this remained a negotiation between mortals, for mortal motives, I came out ahead. Sure, they were a better hand at diplomacy and likely I'd end up unable to capitalize on several of my advantages. But that was fine, in the greater scheme of things, so long as I walked out of this pavilion with some gains and my narrative intact. There were earthly logistics to this, and Black had made an entire career out of proving those could win a war regardless of the subtler workings of Creation, but I was confident that as long as I held my ground story-wise I'd emerge in a position to begin the sequence of events that'd get me to my objective.

Which meant that I had to avoid engaging the Pilgrim as much as I could. I had a knack for stories, twisting them and using them. It came naturally to me. But the opposition had actually lived through hundreds of them. The experience gap between us was overwhelming, and that was without even taking into consideration whatever tricks the Heavens were sure to have bestowed upon him to make sure he'd keep coming out ahead. I could not confidently state I would win against the Grey Pilgrim, so my safest path was not to fight him at all. Ironically, my sharpest tool in ensuring that was something I generally had little patience for: etiquette. Instead of replying to the old Levantine, I leaned towards Aisha.

"Correct me if I'm wrong," I said. "But isn't it a severe breach of decorum for someone without a formal role in negotiations to directly address a queen?"

The lovely Taghreb's lips quirked.

"That is so," she said, pitching her voice so it would be heard by all. "Under Tower law, such a transgression is punishable by flaying of the left hand and foot."

Several of the Procerans' hearts quivered.

"It has been the stance of your delegation to advance the Queen in Callow as an entity separate from the Tower's rule," the Pilgrim said, face serene. "Was this a misrepresentation?"

I did one the things I hated most in the world: I kept my fucking mouth shut. The moment I got involved the narrative was back in play. Lose, I told myself. Let him win the small things, so long as you get what you came for.

"Observations on the nature of Praesi law are no admission of anything else," Thief coldly noted. "To pretend otherwise is disingenuous, and might be taken as an attempt to sink honest negotiations. Is that the intent of the Proceran delegation?"

I sat straighter in my chair. Thief was one of the Woe, and the Woe were under me. Would anything coming out of her mouth contribute to the tapestry the Pilgrim was trying to weave? Not if I contradicted her, I suspected, but if I was remaining silent... Best to stay on the safe side. Picking out a sliver of Winter, I formed a ring around her index on the hand beneath the table and squeezed it lightly. She inclined her head slightly to the left, acknowledging my warning as I allowed the construct to dissipate.

"A curious thing, that seeking clarity would be taken as offence," the Pilgrim said. "Regardless, there is precedent."

The Proceran mouthpiece bowed again.

"As far as the year seventy-four, Chosen recognized as titled advisors have been allowed to address to the Highest Assembly directly," the man said. "As far one hundred and eleven, the same have been granted right of involvement with negotiations held with foreign powers."

Seventy-four, huh. That was the year eight hundred ninety, by the Imperial calendar – Procerans begun theirs after the founding of the Principate, which had only taken place a year after Triumphant's fall. Considering the current Imperial year was thirteen hundred and twenty-seven, that was not a young precedent. It shouldn't matter, though, and if I'd picked up on that, Aisha should have as well. Living up to my expectation, the Staff Tribune advanced where we remained silent.

"Proceran custom is not universally binding," she pointed out. "There is no such precedent for our delegation. Regardless, right of involvement would not equate right of interrogation."

The middle-aged diplomat smothered a smile. A mistake had been made.

"Queen Eleanor Fairfax granted privilege to voice thoughts and questions freely to the contemporary Wizard of the West, after her coronation," the man said. "This is a matter of public record. That privilege has been maintained through every known Choosing since."

I kept my face rigid. Was that true? It might very well be. Records were sparse about the Old Kingdom, nowadays, save those that related to mundane matters – where the Empire's rule tended to come out as a more prosperous, if also more tyrannical, alternative. My teacher had been thorough in taking the knife to anything that could feasibly become fodder for a hero's rise, and knowledge about past Wizards of the West would have been high on that list of proscriptions. Except he wouldn't have been able expunge Proceran records, not in depth anyway. The man's heartbeat was steady, which could be an indication he was telling the truth – or merely that he was a very good liar.

"The Proceran delegation has not recognized ours as being representative of the Kingdom of Callow," Grandmaster Talbot said, cool voice cutting clearly through the hesitation. "Only of the Queen in Callow, making such precedent irrelevant. Which it would be even if otherwise, unless by some labyrinthine exercise of reason an equivalence between the attempted murderer of Queen Catherine and the ancient servants of the now-extinct House Fairfax was established. Which it was not."

Brandon fucking Talbot, I thought, smothering a grin. Riding in lance high at the last moment, proper knight that he was.

"Lack of recognition for Proceran law endangers the entire process of treaty-making," the middle-aged diplomat warned.

"Forceful imposition of foreign customs on the same process is not a standard this delegation is willing to establish," Aisha replied pleasantly. "We do not recognize the attempt to establish precedent by the Proceran delegation, and move the first issue on the program should now be addressed."

"Is this to be who you truly are, Catherine Foundling?" the Grey Pilgrim said, soft voice carrying across the pavilion. "A villain hiding behind petty excuses, unwilling to even speak with those you deem foes?"

My fingers clenched. The fucker. He had a lot of nerves saying that, after he'd tacitly allowed the Saint to try to kill me under a godsdamned truce banner. I leaned forward to – let him win the small things, so long as you get what you came for. My teeth came down and I bit off my tongue, knowing I would not be able to keep silent otherwise. If Masego's weakness was the need for utter precision, then mine was the inability to just keep my fucking mouth shut. Blood filled my mouth as Winter lazily coursed through my veins, repairing the self-inflicted damage. I swallowed as discretely as I could. The violent urge to respond was not gone, but the immediacy had ebbed. I kept my eyes on Prince Amadis, who was eyeing me with a mixture of disgust and fascination. I bared reddened teeth at him, watching his muscles clench to suppress a flinch.

"Shall we proceed, Your Grace?" I asked.

He inclined his head by a fraction. Good. I'd weathered the first blow, but if I knew anything about patterns that was the first of three. I would have to remain wary. Aisha had thought it odd that the Procerans had not fought back harder on the terms of truce and retreat being the first subject addressed, but now we knew why. They'd intended on flipping the table before it even came to that. Now, though, they were stuck actually discussing it. Withdrawal from the Tenth Crusade for the royals had never been in the cards, much as it irked me. For them to put their seal to a treaty binding them to that would be high treason and sustained heresy under Proceran law. One of the ancient First Princes had passed that motion through the Highest Assembly, after a few Arlesite principalities dropped out of one of the crusades against the Kingdom of the Dead. Their agitations in the south while the rest of the Principate was busy dying up north had been so deeply despised by the surviving princes they'd been willing to limit their own prerogatives to see the deserters punished. No, our wiggle room was narrower than that. The first opening was that, technically speaking, the Tenth Crusade had been declared on Praes. It would be damaging to their reputation to make a deal with me, but not actually illegal.

The second was that I wasn't asking for peace, only a truce. The terms we were after were eighteen months where none of the signatories or soldiers under their command could enter Callow, which was where we first got shafted by the premises agreed on. They managed to have it defined as 'the lands under the rule of the Queen in Callow', which gave them some flexibility. The moment a part of the kingdom renounced my rule, it was fair game again and they could get involved without breaking the letter of the agreement. Or, and I was just guessing here, if a disavowed heroine like the Saint just happened cut my head off – well, it would be convenient coincidence that there were no longer any lands under the rule of the Queen in Callow, wouldn't it? I was going to have to watch my back very, very carefully in the coming months. Eve more so than usual. Aisha began bargaining forthree years of truce and slowly allowed herself to be whittled down to fourteen months, though at least she got a concession out of it. The fantassins across the field were in the employment of the princes and princesses attending, but that was a matter of contract. Those could be released, at which point the terms would no longer apply to them. Horse-trading for six months less of truce, Aisha managed to extract they'd sign the treaty as well. None of the companies would be able to just sign up with the Iron Prince's host instead.

A goodwill clause forbidding the fantassins to simply disband their companies and reform under a different name was written in, because even I had seen that loophole coming. It was when we moved to the second subject, supplies, that Thief's predictions came true and they began their attempt to fuck us in earnest. You'd think they'd at least provide dinner first. Bad form, Amadis. Going at it with only wine made it look like they thought we were easy.

"As a sign of good faith, we would require that the Army of Callow continue to provide supplies while negotiations are ongoing, at the previously agreed cost," Prince Amadis requested, meeting my eyes directly.

It wasn't the first time they'd tried that. Fairly early on they'd narrowed in on the fact that my diplomatic training was lacking compared to Aisha's or Talbot's, and since they'd tried to get me involved as much as possible. Best way for them to do that was to ditch the mouthpiece and let the Prince of Iserre do the talking: he had enough status that etiquette dictated I couldn't just foist the thing off to Aisha if he spoke to me directly. It was a play on their part, we both knew that. But it also left me with no real reason to call them out, and if these talks imploded because I'd walked out without a damned good reason? That was the story of a villain queen so arrogant she was willing to starve dozens of thousands for perceived insults. It did not bode well for me. This was going to be a pivot, I knew that and the Pilgrim most definitely did. It meant every word spoken today had weight. I'd be eroding at my own gains if I pulled out now, and even if it likely wouldn't be enough to flip the entire story the opposition didn't need that, strictly speaking. Just my position being weakened would make it much easier to kill me. Was this the second blow? No, the confrontation was too indirect. The Pilgrim had made himself the speaker for Above, it wasn't something that could be handed to Amadis like a plate of pastries.

"While we are not willing to make that concession, we share your worry on the appearance of coercion," I blandly replied.

Meaning it wouldn't look good if it appeared we were negotiating with a loaded crossbow pointed at their balls, though we were both aware there were plenty crossbows today to go around. The Jacks had confirmed Hasenbach had her own scrying-capable mages in play, called the Order of the Red Lion. We also knew, from Masego, that they were at least a decade behind Praesi spell formulas when it came to that, which meant they couldn't do relays and their range was limited: they could chain the reports manually, but that was tricky business. Hierophant's best guess for the crusaders getting news from the battle at the Red Flower Vales was a delay of two days. Knowing Black, he was very unlikely to gamble it all on the first day. He'd stretch it out through series of fortifications, made even more efficient by the narrow valleys and steep slopes of the Vales. That provided us with some room to manoeuvre.

"We are willing to immediately provide three days' worth of supplies, at the agreed on cost, to prevent that misunderstanding," I continued calmly.

Prince Amadis' heartbeat quickened. Anger. Yeah, you princely shit. We saw that one coming. There was still risk involved, should Papenheim somehow win an immediate and crushing victory – or, more probably, if Black decided a strategic retreat out of the Vales was the correct decision – but odds were the crusaders would have to make the deal without knowing the outcome. They really wanted to avoid that, of course. But outright feeding them for three days yanked away their pretext to push for better terms. They could still delay until the days were past, but then we'd be the ones with grounds to protest bad faith. And we both know Kegan is coming. Your window of opportunity is narrow. If they failed to make terms before the Deoraithe arrived, their bargaining position took a hit. Juniper had urged me to send Larat to fetch Kegan's host, and I'd already made up my mind to agree if we didn't walk out with a deal by the day's end. It was a naked threat, sure, and before the meeting began I'd worried about souring the process by resorting to it. But they were already pushing back pretty hard, and if they were stretching things out on purpose threats were not a line I was unwilling to cross.

"The gesture is appreciated," Amadis said evenly. "However, I worry this could be misconstrued as impropriety. Rumours of bribery would damage the reputation of all involved."

My eyes narrowed. We were making the crusaders pay for the supplies, it was hardly a fucking bribe. Princes were touchy about their reputation, though, so while it wasn't a good reason it was a halfway plausible one. And it wasn't a reply we anticipated, though we should have. I glanced at Aisha, but she could be no help. Fuck. There was probably a way out of this, but I couldn't think of one at the moment.

"We can table the matter for the moment," I conceded grudgingly.

"As you say," the Prince of Iserre replied, the hint of a smile on his lips as he inclined his head.

Aisha bowed in her seat, then addressed the table.

"We now address the third subject on the program," the Supply Tribune said, "as requested by the Callowan delegation. Provenance and direction of promised coin."

In other words, who was going to foot the bill for the supplies they were getting. That was going to be one of the trickier bits, Vivienne had told me. The Procerans were going to try to pass it all to Hasenbach, but we might have a way around that. For 'practical reasons' we were going to suggest they provide the coin themselves, though it would be framed as a loan on the part of the First Prince towards them. Our turn to screw them over the negotiation premises, for this one. As an expeditionary force of the First Prince, they had legal grounds to agree to that – if they were Hasenbach's mandated minions, anything falling under war reparations was ultimately her responsibility to pay for. Aisha had noted some of them might consider it a worthwhile trade off to have the First Prince owe them money, since by leveraging that debt they might avoid political retaliation for a retreat. Thief had been more dubious, arguing that they'd balk since Cordelia might manage to get out of paying them anything back. It was going to come down to finesse.

"The delegation recognizes the Chosen known as the Grey Pilgrim, formal advisor to the Prince of Iserre," the mouthpiece intoned.

Well, shit. We were halfway through the list now, so in retrospective I should have seen it coming.

"In matter of direction, I seek clarification," the Pilgrim said. "The Principate of Procer is currently at war with the Dread Empire of Praes. As it could be considered treason for any coin paid through this treaty to come to gild Imperial coffers through either commerce or tribute, a question must first be addressed. Does the Queen in Callow intend to pursue formal independence from the Tower?"

I closed my eyes and thought. Why would he care about the gold? Coin didn't mean shit to heroes. No, he had a reason to ask this that shaped a story. Independence from the Tower. Callow already was independent, effectively speaking, but there'd been no open break. Malicia and I knew it was just a matter of time, but the current fiction it wasn't was useful for us both. If it was discarded, what was the result? Most likely, Malicia had to declare I was in rebellion even if she did nothing immediate about it. That was the part that had me wary, though. She couldn't do anything about it right now, not with Ashur marauding the coasts and a city freshly sacked. So why would the old man be after that? Pilgrim might not know about Nok, though, I mused. No, wrong way to think about this. If this was a political play it'd be the Procerans doing the talking. Since it was the Pilgrim, he was leaning on the pivot for some reason. Malicia declared me a rebel. What did that mean, in the greater scheme of things? Ah, shit. Evil turns on Evil. That was his play. And it was a story old as the First Dawn, too, so if I caught even the hem of it in my fingers it was going to drag me through seventy fucking Hells. Stories repeated so often they were considered self-evident truths had a way of pushing themselves to the fore no matter what the people involved wanted.

All right, then. What could I do to avoid the pitfall?

Couldn't argue there was no need to have the talk, this time, since that could be taken as me trying to frame the Procerans for treason. It'd turn this from truce talks to 'Evil queen lays a cunning trap', and that fucked everything up. I couldn't lie in front of the Pilgrim, he'd see through it and that got me back in the deep even if 'the Heavens told me it was untrue' might not hold up too well as a negotiating position. Flatly admitting I was going to just led me to a different problem, so that was straight out. Could I maybe keep this contained, force an oath whatever was spoken on the subject wouldn't get out of this pavilion? No, I decided. I didn't have enough of a leg to stand on, and it wasn't like the Procerans would jump for joy at the prospect of being oath-bound to someone holding a fae mantle. If you can't dodge, attack, I thought. Instead of avoiding his story, what story could I make? Liberating rebel wouldn't hold, not while I was wearing a crown. I'd only ever managed to squeak into heroic Roles when the opposition was... less than flexible, anyway. Treacherous lieutenant to Malicia? I could fit the boots, but it wouldn't get me anywhere I wanted to be. Praesi stories would just make it worse, as a rule, so it had to be either Callowan or old and worn enough it was up for grabs by anyone.

Unless... Akua. She'd been on her own idea of good behaviour since Second Liesse, which had taken a while for me to puzzle out. She should have been scheming to get out, and to be frank she probably was, but she was also very much trying to be useful. To get out of the box more often, in part, but there were deeper reasons. I had beaten her, or at least she believed as much. According to the sack full of razor blades that was Praesi philosophy, that meant she was my follower now. That was an old story, and though the Wasteland had practically turned it into a religion it wasn't just a Wasteland favourite. Or Evil's in general. Early crew of heroes runs into a seeming enemy they fight out of misunderstanding, then fall together either facing a common foe or when the misunderstanding is finally cleared. Everyone's friends, some cackling villain gets stabbed in unison and the Heavens pat everyone's ass approvingly. Hells, that was more or less how Archer had ended up joining the Woe now that I thought about it. So I needed to be metaphorical Archer, fighting the crusaders out of a silly misunderstanding somehow involving three bloody days of battle and at least thirty thousand dead.

I am a crusader, I thought. What did I want? To fuck over the Wasteland, a sentiment I wasn't exactly unsympathetic to. Kill Catherine Foundling, since she's an abomination and also an asshole who keeps killing our guys. How did I cease being the asshole who kept killing their guys? Well, maybe if they stopped trying to kill m- no, not productive. Plenty of heroes were guy-killing assholes, I reminded myself, in and of itself it wasn't a deal breaker. Larger perspective. Looking down from Above, what was happening in Callow? Praes is still in charge, I thought. The borders, the separate laws and the coinage wouldn't matter to something like the Hashmallim. A villain was still on the throne, the former apprentice of the Black Knight. My army was more than half Callowan, these days, but I still had a detachment of mass-murdering Praesi household troops and the greenskins. Goblins had an unfortunate propensity for stabbing, and orcs did eat people. Wasn't even that large a part of their diet, and it wasn't like they ate people alive – it was illegal, if nothing else – but even occasional corpse-eating did tend to disqualify people from standing on the shiny side of the fence. As far as Above was concerned, I was a Dread Empress wearing the Queen of Blades' clothes.

But I was in charge in their eyes, wasn't I? The legalities we'd been quibbling about all day didn't mean dust in the eyes of the Gods. That was the whole reason to remove me, wasn't it? A villainous ruler for Callow was bad for business, regardless of the earthly practicalities involved. Which meant that if I made a choice, Above took that as a choice for all of Callow. There was an opening there. If I pulled the rug out from under the heroes, it worked for the entire kingdom. My eyes narrowed. I didn't have to stop being a – unfairly characterized, I believed – murderous asshole. I just had to be their murderous asshole. Metaphorically speaking. Probably. And the way to achieve that... what was the name of Cordelia's Friendly League of Upstanding Nations again? Ah, right. I cleared my throat, meeting the Grey Pilgrim's eyes with a grin that was all teeth.

"To answer your question," I said, "I intend to seek signatory status with the Grand Alliance within the year."

Pandemonium erupted, the Pilgrim's face went blank and my grin only got wider.

---

ruduen

The combination of Catherine learning to keep her mouth shut and learning to read the flow of stories is quite a dangerous one, indeed.

I think that's even one step beyond not monologuing.

Dainpdf

She already did the latter, some – look at her confrontation with the Winter Fae. She's just way better at it now. But the tongue biting moment is powerful.

ClickPause

Just a little bit of confusion here, couldn't she have said the deal was with the Queen in Callow, not with the Dread Empire? She already said that before, in pretty much the same context.

Dainpdf

The problem is that, on paper, she's still under Malicia, and so money paid to her could end up in Praes. This would either make her betray Malicia or force her to accept feeding them at no cost.

Sylfa

It would be treason of them to give money that is known to go to the Tower, thus it would be unreasonable for them to agree to it. It would possibly also be construed as a hidden trap she tried to make them fall into, by later sending proof they committed treason, thus turning the admittance of the money potentially going to Praes into a story of the villain's treachery being unveiled by the clever, handsome, and so very very good old man that never would have considered attacking someone under a flag of truce especially after he vowed to not allow such acts to happen.

I reckon she could have simply answered that all the proceeds would go directly to the displaced peasantry to feed them, which recently suffered an invasion that forced the peasants to flee their homes and fields.

Reinforcing that the invasion is causing suffering for the good people of Callow and making it a truly good act to give all that money to be used for feeding them when they will have a poor harvest due to not being able to plant in time. Since Praes doesn't have a food export that would guarantee the money doesn't go there.

Her choice seems to be juicier, but I figure it would have been enough to dodge the stories they tried to push her into. And also not be treason for them to agree to.

stevenneiman

It's kind of an interesting thing to note how her tragic flaw, talking when she knows she shouldn't, is a classic of both heroes and villains. On the Villainous side everyone knows what happens to villains who monologue, but it still happens enough to keep it fresh in people's minds. On the heroic side, everybody likes a smartass protagonist who won't shut up, with the exception of the villains who think he should be intimidated.

Here, she's also done another very interesting narrative thing, turning one of her story elements (pragmatically mandated self-mutilation) against another (not keeping her mouth shut). I'm curious to see if there's a special significance to this.

Finally, this is a brilliant play in one final way. By basically declaring that she's going to hold against Malicia while simultaneously "struggling" with her old habits and the power of Winter, Cat just made herself the most outmatched hero present, which means that she pretty much just stole the Grey Pilgrim from them and there's pretty much nothing they can do to get him back. Even if he doesn't want to help her, his Name is going to make him, because that's what he does. He helps outmatched heroes.

Taichi22

i hadn't even realized this.

Oh, I'm looking forward to this shit. Grey Pilgrim is gonna be the tsundere grampa to Black's hardcore dad.

Dainpdf

But she's not playing a Hero role. She stated she didn't think she could swing that. She's playing "redeemable villain."

stevenneiman

She's been playing up the fact that she's just looking after her own people from the very beginning, sought peace that didn't involve the Principate looting her homeland at every opportunity, offered to help deal with the real threat, and now she's indicating her willingness to join with the forces of Good. That definitely seems like a redeemed (past tense) villain to me, especially given that she's playing on the war being a big misunderstanding. One with major risks of backsliding, perhaps, but redeemed nonetheless.

RanVor

She's doing the same thing as always – trying to con the Creation into recognizing her as someone she isn't. And, as always, she is succeeding admirably.

Dainpdf

Redeemed... When her forces include Orcs and Goblins, with said Orcs actually getting the permission to snack on dead enemies? That's not going to fly.
Nor is the use of goblinfire, which Cat now knows includes diabolism in its fabrication.
Cat can play the peace-seeking goals card, but that at best gets her to Well-Intentioned Extremist.

Metrux

Well, don't know about orcs, since we know nothing of their own culture, but goblinfire was ALSO used by heroes, the Lone Swordsman being the one mostly shown. Also, she used a sword made of an angels feather, and she's a villain, so... Yes, it is going to fly, because this is not humans looking at each other and pointing:

"This is evil!". It's reality in this world saying "This is how this story began..." and reality give no shits about the true nature, only about what it seems like. That, more than anything, is what differentiate Good from good and Evil from evil.

Dainpdf

She actually says in the chapter that it wouldn't.

Byzantine

She's playing "Villain seeking redemption by becoming a hero." It typically counts as heroic.

Dainpdf

It sort of is... But she's playing it at the "asshole with potential for good" phase. Again, she consort with maneaters, murderers and diabolists. One of whose souls she has bound to her cape.

Parasol

She needs to make sure that she avoids the 'redemption equals death' trope then.

RanVor

Oh shit. I haven't thought of that. It would be a perfect opening for the Heavens to fuck her over.

Mental Mouse

> Here, she's also done another very interesting narrative thing, turning one of her story elements (pragmatically mandated self-mutilation) against another (not keeping her mouth shut). I'm curious to see if there's a special significance to this.

I don't think so... "biting your tongue" is a classic trope, Cat just made it literal.

Mental Mouse

Oh yeah....

Daemion

Brilliant move. Malicia will love it.

Someguy

Especially since it fits so perfectly with the principles of her tritease for the end of the Age of Wonders.

Oshi

She might actually. If Praes survives and Callow joins the alliance. She might be able to leverage this into a peace treaty (probably with concessions that let her pacify her opposition) and achieve what she wants...

RanVor

Actually, I thought about that for a bit and came to the conclusion that Malicia wants pretty much the same thing Catherine wants for Callow, but for Praes. So yes, she would be very pleased with this resolution.

Dainpdf

Can't invade Praes by land if you can't invade Callow and they won't let troops through.

MetruX

They already offered to let troops through, so why not?

Dainpdf

Because if this offensive starts to go badly Cat has no reason to keep that offer up, and actual incentives not to. Mainly, that Malicia has her economy by the balls. At the very least, the Crusade would need to negotiate passage with her.

Unorginal

Riveting Diplomacy

Unorginal

That's a phrase I never thought I'd say.

Jane

Well, someone clearly hasn't spent enough time reading about the Three Kingdoms period in China!

/mostlyjoking

Taichi22

The Romance of Three Kingdoms is about this good when everyone goes to sit down at the table, but there's usually a sword dance or some poisoned wine about half the time, because they really don't give a shit about good etiquette.

vuthuha912

Not really. Most banquets are quite peaceful but the one with sword dancing and poison wine is the more interesting one. Cao Cao attended a party for ousting Dong Zhuo earlier in the story, but nothing happens. People were honestly plotting to kill Dong Zhuo and not interested in turning on each other.

Dainpdf

I started reading this thinking "oh gods, we the phantom menace now".
I was wrong.

onedollargum

Phantom menace *wishes* people bit off their own tongues to stop talking. XD

Rey d`Tutto

Nah, that's the audience's desires pertaining to some of the dialogue used in SW:Ep1.

Byzantine

Well... She did offer, at the very start, to ferry them all straight to the Tower to tear the whole thing down. It should not be a surprise she is entirely willing to flip sides – and the table – to end this pointless war, break Callow free, and end the narrative that keeps getting Callow invaded.

Insanenoodlyguy

Of course, any truce that observes the lands ruled by Catherine means that if she takes the tower, all of Praes falls under the umbrella as well. All she has to do is beat her own "allies" to the throne.

Jane

Unfortunately, the truce only applies to the signatories and their soldiers, who only constitute a small portion of the Crusade (especially after having been bloodied by Catherine); the rest of Procer's armies, and their allies, would still be free to attack. It also only applies for fourteen months, several of which would be eaten up by claiming the tower.

It would be a delicious abuse of the terms of the truce, however!

Insanenoodlyguy

If she successfully applies, which she has to at least be aiming for now for Grey to not being happily calling BS, it's going to be expanded a lot farther than that.

Euodiachloris

Ah, but lying Villains lie. So, she was lying. Had to be. It's a trick. Somewhere. Therefore, she was twisting what seemed to be the truth into a big, fat lie.

She has always been the Tower's creature; Villains will always want to climb it, thus will she remain, despite her suggestion of toppling it; doesn't mean a thi— Oh, Crap. xD

beleester

No, villains never lie, if the truth will hurt more.

And they *especially* never lie when the heroes have a lie-detector. They just come up with a plan that doesn't involve lying, and then smugly say "If you think it's a trap, why don't you check your lie detector?"

onedollargum

Not to mention she's a fey queen, and Catherine mentioned earlier how much they'd want someone like her under oath if she can't break it.

Goddam impressed

Cat you brilliant fucking bitch!

PotatoMan

What

superkeaton

Catherine scores a point.

How do you escape being the Villain? By becoming the asshole ally, the "befriended villain turned Good". Petition the Alliance and suddenly you can put a positive spin on things.

Also, that bit about her biting off and swallowing her own tongue was delightfully horrifying.

RanVor

And flashing her bloodied teeth to Amadis.

White

Get wreeeeeeeeeeeeck, scruuuuuuuuubs!

Dainpdf

In the immortal words of DJ Khaled: "Congratulations, Pilgrim. You played yourself."

Draconius Sinister

Weird to think of Cat sitting there silent for a minute or two thinking this through, but glad to see she kicked the Pilgrim in the conversational balls.

werafdsaew

Yeah time slows down when the Names have to make a decision of great import. It has happened quite a few times already.

Byzantine

Yep. Remember: Names are stuck in a narrative, so if the world needs to give them time to think they get that time.

MetruX

Also important to remember that in most negotiation tables the way of speech isn't the same as in a normal conversation. It is slower, and no one will call someone out for taking their time to think. After all, everything is a weapon or a shield in the negotiations, and making someone answer faster could very well be seen as bad intentions that, theoretically, shouldn't be upon a negotiation table.

Yotz

>with a grin that was all teeth

So, Cat finally realized her true nature as a Cheshire. Fascinating.

Jane

While I doubt this is actually the case, I like to imagine that between being Fae and having a construct body, her toothy grins at times like these end up becoming unnaturally toothy. Like, "Human mouths aren't supposed to stretch that wide or have that many teeth" toothy.

Dainpdf

Sharkerine. 'Nuff said.

Jane

Well, that's a beautiful play. Now they pretty much have to accept truce terms, or Hasenbach will use their recalcitrance to bury them.

"We could have had Callow on our side without a hundred thousand dead and constant rebellions, but you couldn't even be bothered to bring me her offer?"

Combined with how their disastrous performance in the Crusade will tarnish their reputation, she could easily use such a thing to ruin their houses for a generation, even if she had no intention of taking Cat's proposal seriously.

Of course, I imagine this will cause her some longer-term problems, but hey, that's Future Cat's problem. And Cat has never shied from causing Future Cat new problems – she knows full well how many headaches she deserves, for having caused her so many problems in the past.

Hm. I wonder if Pilgrim still gets a third chance, after a play like this?

wagnerap

Pilgrim made two diplomatic narrative plays, somehow I think the the third play will be a sword in the back. I just can't see this not being the princes graveyard, though it might become it anyways if Cordelia hangs them.

Oshi

Why would Callow be the cause of the graves? The Regicide is nearby.

Death Knight

I imagine the Princes being forced to accept the truce to save their own asses will really, really, REALLY rub the Saint the wrong way. Enough to finally snap en end them all.

RanVor

Because the way Juniper mentions the Graveyard of Princes in her writings implies it was caused by Catherine.

MetruX

Wouldn't she making they do something that gets them killed count? I mean, there are more than one way to kill a man...

Someguy

I thought the Graveyard of Princes is Cat's Treaty table where she destroys their political ambitions/careers and ensures that they will not profit?

RanVor

I'm not sure if that can be called an example of Catherine's battle tactics, which is what the Graveyard of Princes was first brought up as.

Jane

Mmm... It just doesn't feel like the right moment for this to be the Prince's Graveyard. There's been too much focus on the Heroes for that, and not enough on the Princes. Not to mention, it still feels like there's more to be done with Rozala and Arnaud – and if they don't die here, that pretty much just leaves Amadis ready to die, and that's not really enough.

Plus, the narrative feels like its been building towards a hard-fought diplomatic victory, and switching to a major Heroic ambush feels like it would undercut that. I could see a spiteful attack by the Saint to close things out, especially if EE has no further use for her, but I don't see the rest of the army going along with that at this point.

Komploding

If Saint does bite the dust, that would leave a spot open in the heroic group Saint and Pilgrim talked about earlier, Cat technically isn't a villain because she has so much Fae in her, could she somehow wind up in that spot? The Heavens don't seem to mind abusing technicalities to get their way.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Note that the Summer Court is open too

Dainpdf

Two plays: the first met with refusal, the second met with an unexpected pull of the rug. The fact that she made a twist out of it is important, because it takes momentum away from the Pilgrim throwing a second twist at her on the third act.

crescentsickle

What's interesting is that the Pilgrim should also know this intimately given his age and experience. This set of three isn't a turn, but a rising action for his opponent to demolish him in the third play. Since it's focused on these talks, I'm not sure it will extend into the future, a guaranteed win for Catherine hanging over his head.

However, I wonder if he'll actually try to play for the third act knowing he'll lose anyway, because Catherine has locked herself into a narrative where she is, nominally, a hero fighting against the oppression of Evil Praes.

If he plays the third act, and loses horribly at turning things around on her, she wins in a very big way at nailing down that narrative... locking her in as an actual hero, putting her at odds with her close band of followers, against her mentor, against Praes, etc. In that situation, even if the Pilgrim loses the third act very hard, he will win overall, both with cat sabotaging herself and for turning someone away from Evil.

It'd be a moment underscoring "Win the battle, lose the war."

Dainpdf

Cat underlined the fact that she can't play a heroic role in this one. Not with who her allies are, and without turning on Praes. She's going for the "redeemable hero everyone loves" role. Like an early anime antagonist. The Pilgrim didn't anticipate this. He considered her beyond redemption, so he didn't think she might go for that. That's why this is so potent – it's clearly a twist from everyone's reaction.

I think he expected her to try for a twist on number three, with the narrative momentum already greatly against her, and with the advantage that he's a Hero. Now he needs the twist, and a double twist at that, so he'll have a hard time.

Metrux

Also, as she noted before, any choice she makes serves for all of Callow and her band of Named. Because, for the Heavens, it doesn't matter the technicalities, she is the villain queen. So, since they don't matter, anything she does is with the fullness of her followers behind her.

onedollargum

I'm not really sure why the Pilgrim would want to disrupt this process though. If she seeks to join the good guys, Catherine becomes "Good", is no longer a "Villain", and therefore is no longer "corrupting" her company by ruling as a "Villain".

The only ways it's likely to fail is by either Catherine not seeking status in good faith, or by First Prince refusing her out of political reasons.

The narrative supports her, given she's already made so many overtures for peace. The thing I'm worried about is that this twist is the something the Narrative drove her to do. Where's the Catherine who swore to slay demons and angels both, to keep them out of Callow?

Dainpdf

I think the problem is her being Evil will taint her joining the alliance. This is the story of the Fae all over again: Summer tries to invade Winter. Winter sues for peace. They accept and are joined... Only for Winter to cunningly devour Summer from the inside. And guess who is the sole heiress of Winter right now?

Dainpdf

I don't see Hasenbach putting that argument forward. Doesn't seem like it'd play well with her base, especially after she spent all that energy whipping them up for a Crusade.

Jane

Well, I also don't see the negotiations failing, so she'll never have a need to use that argument 😊.

It's just, a request to join the Grand Alliance (with sincerity verified by a famous Hero) is really something that needs to be kicked upstairs, especially when you're well-known to be disfavored by the First Prince. It would be presumptuous for any Prince to settle such a matter themselves, but it would border on treason for someone known to be working against her to sabotage such a promising alliance.

If they were sweeping through the area, easily annexing it, they'd have the bribes to buy enough allies in the Assembly to blunt any objections Hasenbach could make, as well as clearly framing the issue as the desperate flailing of a defeated leader not worth treating with, but when it looks like Cat could draw things out for another bloody year if diplomacy fails? Villain or no, it's too good an offer for any politician to deny serious consideration to, and everyone involved knows it.

Besides, regardless of what Hasenbach might privately think, she's been looking for a plausible reason to destroy Amadis and his allies. This would be giving her one on a silver platter; why not take advantage of it to solidify her political position?

Dainpdf

The thing is that it's not a promising alliance. Cat asking to join would actually be pretty terrible for Hasenbach because, if Amadis fails (which is looking likely and is the only situation this is relevant) she won't be able to afford more war with Callow; on the other hand, letting Callow under Cat to join the alliance would be political suicide domestically and would also taint her vision for it. Oh, and it would make it almost impossible to invade Praes by land without the cooperation of Callow.

Metruux

Okay, let's start... This is a double play. Actually, could even be counted as a triple play. First, we have the heavens, headed by the Grey Pilgrim, who wants Cat dead or turned. Since she is not lying, and planning on asking withing the year to join a crusade, he can't go against her. It would be against himself and against the heavens to simply deny it, especially since he might loose after the denial.

Second, we have the first prince. She wants Amadis out, for her it doesn't matter if he dies or not, she only need him to loose power so that he won't stop her plans from the inside. He loosing the war, he going against her orders and not gaining enough alies, or he making another great blunder, all is positive for her, even if the war is lost. She probably sent him as a win-win for her, since if he wins, she won, if he looses, he lost. So, if they accept it, that's treason since they couldn't, and she wins. If they refuse, that's treason because they couldn't, and she wins. If they bring it back to her... They might not be traitors, but they still lost. She will love any of those, but might not like the implications for Callow.

Thirdly, we have the nobles on this host. They want to grow in power and prestige, and, most importantly, to get out of this alive. Their situation is desperate and they just lost. How they lost? Well, no matter what happens now, they are dead, either to war, to the heroes or to hasenbach, be it true death or political one. They are the biggest part of hasenbachs opposition, so if/when they come back, the ones who would "politically suicide" her can't do it.

You already brought this Callow won't let troops pass before, and I already said before, Cat already offered to do just that. This is a non-issue.

Now, let's start analyzing the aftereffects. Since she just declared that in good faith under a negotiation table, she became a traitor to the tower. Since all her choices are also of her whole kingdom, if she is accepted into the crusade it actually means she changed from villain to hero, which means no one has an excusable reason to invade Callow. And since they know she will petition for that, but it will be months in time, it actually doesn't matter, because they are obligated to accept the chance she will join, and they can't in good faith do anything else but wait for her to petition it.

I think this should clear up some things.

Dainpdf

One: the Pilgrim is not so muhh the leader of the Heavens as their servant. The Heavens don't want Cat in the Alliance, because she is Evil and, as we've seen with the Fae story, Evil in an alliance destroys all. Plus, Cat alluded to the fact that the Heavens don't care for her.

Hasenbach doesn't want these people dead. For one, they're people she has a read on. For another, they are competent officers. As a last point, they also care for the country. And she wants to root out evil, create an alliance of good, not reduce her forces.

Hasenbach answers to more than just the nobles in this host. She answers to an entire country that hates evil, and in the alliance to a bunch of countries that do. She can't bring the squire of the Black Knight in.

About Cat breaking with the tower: she has done this *precisely* not to explicitly break with the tower yet. Because she can't, for narrative reasons.

RanVor

Just like Malicia answers to an entire country that hates good, except unlike Malicia, Cordelia can't just tell them to fuck off and do what needs to be done anyway.

Dainpdf

Oh, and a small addition: Cordelia doesn't want Amadis gone, just broken. And yeah, he has nowhere near the power to let Cat in. Even Hasenbach doesn't – it'll need to be discussed with the other countries.

But that's not an issue – Cat has only declared she intends to ask to be included; she hasn't actually asked yet.

RanVor

This doesn't matter. Cat declared an intent to join the Grand Alliance. No matter how full of herself she is, Hasenbach knows very well she doesn't actually rule it, and Callow is too important for Procer to just sweep it under the rug. By refusing to take it into consideration, she risks reaffirming the Callowan enmity towards Procer and causing the kingdom to tighten its ties with Praes. By putting the matter forward, she risks letting a Villain into her precious Good Guys Club. Furthermore, Cat has yet to present any formal request to join the Alliance. Attacking in the meantime might yield the same results as an outright refusal. Basically, she has no option but to wait for Cat to make a formal request and then hoping it will be shot down before it's too late.

Cat has just bought herself all the time she needs to prepare for the next wave of the invasion.

Dainpdf

Oh, I know this was a brilliant play. As I said in another comment, I just think Cordelia will find it politically untenable to vote "yes" on accepting Cat.

None of the signatory nations will accept Callow, under Cat's rule, as a signatory nation.

In fact, notice the negotiations right now haven't even recognized that Callow is a sovereign nation under her.

Cat's declaration is useful mainly because it greatly strengthens her narrative, rather than because it will be politically useful. Unless she manages to twist Procer's arm into supporting her, that is.

Forrest

Except they likely would want to accept since bringing in Callow would be greatly beneficial to all of them. They only then would want to find a way to dispose of Cat down the line. Especially since foul play is not exactly out of their rule book.

Dainpdf

How? She is Evil. And Winter. If you'll look at the Fae story, you'll notice Summer generally doesn't end up well when it signs treaties with Winter. Also, outwardly, she's in league with the tower. Not exactly what you want when you're trying to invade Praes.

sengachi

Hasenbach: Let me get this straight. You were offered, by the Queen in Callow, free access through her lands to hit Praes. With her *backing*. You refused and decided to fight it out instead. Then you got your asses handed to you, your supply lines destroyed, and pushed to the brink of utter annihilation. Where, even after all the war and death, the Queen in Callow told you she still intended to sign on with the side of Good.

...and that what I get for lingering with empty "Leave a Reply" form for half an' hour...

Un-Metaphorical Grapevine

Pilgrims ought to be careful, they never know when a stray Cat might bite.

Lord Chungus

Luckily, they only bite their own tongues.

onedollargum

Cat got her (own) tongue.

TeK

And now, if our little upcoming Dread Empress climb the tower, and if they give Callow (probationary) signatory status, Praes will be part of the Friendly League For A Good Guys!

Jane

"In retrospect, we really should have included a clause insisting that members renounce the Right of Usurpation."

-Cordelia Hasenbach, upon hearing of the ascension of Dread Empress Foundling.

RanVor

I very much doubt Cat will ever climb the tower, for one reason – all the quotes from Juniper's and Aisha's future memoirs refer to her only as Foundling.

Jane

At the same time, though, that she knows The Girl Who Climbed The Tower is pretty strong foreshadowing that she will. There's going to need to be an equally strong subversion, like how her transition to Black Queen was broken at a dramatic turn, for the story to go in a different direction.

Thematically, finding her ending through a different path than becoming Empress is quite likely, but following the narrative logic, there are some pretty important flags that will need to be set first.

Byzantine

I can see her climbing the tower... and knocking the whole thing down, once and for all.

Jessica Day

Dread Empress Foundling has a nice ring to it.

Sparsebeard

It's also possible for Cat to climb the tower AFTER those quotes in the timeline...

Not that I can see a scenario for that but still, possible...

Insanenoodlyguy

But that ones simple. Cat, upon taking over, struck, reworked, or just pain ignored a lot of the old rules.

First time her buddies took the knee and called her Dread empress, she rolled her eyes and said "for fuck sake's, call me Cathrine Foundling. That title sounds ridiculous coming out of your mouths."

RanVor

Ok, that *does* sound like something Cat would say.

Edrey

and here we have the crowns of seven mortal rulers and one, i can see this alliance really happening

Dainpdf

And so Pilgrim gave Cat just enough rope to hang herself... She tied it to an undead horse and made it run.

Coincidance

Oh shit Cat is evolving.

Havak

This series is probably the only one where I'm actually excited to read a full chapter of diplomacy.

Silverking

I understand the second trap that Pilgrim laid out, but I'm not sure I fully understand the first one. I think it's like...

Pilgrim: "Why don't we have a nice little one-on-one chat, put aside the politics, just old Hero and young Villain having an honest conversation, see how it goes?"

Cat: "Um, we've established that politics is the tone of the conversation, and this ain't no open forum for peasants. Either keep your comments in regards to the truce, or keep your mouth shut."

...or is there something I'm missing?

Jane

While we don't know the nature of the first trap, Catherine suspected there was an attempt to invoke a Narrative based on the lack of surprise from the Princes present and Pilgrim's nature as a Hero. Catherine shut it down by refuting Pilgrim's standing to speak, denying him an opportunity to start whatever his plan may have been.

It's possible she could have navigated whatever he had planned, just like she did the second time he spoke, but, well... He's a Hero with decades of experience on her, and she gains literally nothing from giving him the opportunity, so it was much more expedient to simply refuse to engage.

Amoonymous

From what I get, the Pilgrim was basically making the case that he should be free to be "at ease" with Cat and provide precedence for her to respond directly to what he's saying, which would fuck up the whole "Don't respond" strat they had going.

The second time, I guess Cat responded because it was a question their side HAD to answer in order for the negotiations to proceed, and if she called the negotiations off it would lead to that whole "Arrogant Villain Queen" ending (and refusing to answer would halt the negotiations, effectively). Also, due to the weight of the question, I'm guessing either the rest of her group didn't want to risk an answer or she kept them from answering...though that's just my guess of how it would have played out.

Maybe she could've tabled it like the previous one, but then that'd be too much or something? Obviously it would've been up to EE to decide how "Cat stays quiet" would've played out there, and maybe Cat would've chosen that option if she didn't think of such a twist (and also because even when she stayed quiet, they had SOMEONE answer, just not Cat – which could loop around to the "too important" bit).

Decius

The first interrogation could be dodged because it was just the Pilgrim asking on his own basis.

The last one could not be dodged, because it was the Pilgrim pointing out an actual problem that the official people being represented might have with the terms under discussion. If reparations are treason, then reparations can't happen.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Though I think it justifies for the third act a request that they clarify their intentions

Insanenoodlyguy

yeah, but cat already saw the pivot here. no doubt if she'd continued being evasive or gave some technically-true answer he could have worked with that for a final "gotcha" question, but she just twisted it around. Oh he can ask, but it won't unmake her now, unless she suddenly grabs the idiot ball, villian ball, or both.

Anna

A very hor chapter, nice nice!

ahd

Hor, indeed. (:

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I felt it wasn't quite hor enough

RanVor

Magnificent.

RanVor

This just warrants an outburst of Evil Laugh.

Bonesawer

Dammit, Cat!

It's really irritating to see her keep falling into the nationalism that it is becoming increasingly clear is her Villainous Weakness. It's her blind spot, in terms of problems both immediate and down the road, and ones that cut into her narrative and are going to be what she falls to. She just can't avoid falling into it when she has the option to.

Although, I must admit to being personally irritated by it more than the story justifies since I want Black to win.

Take theirstuff

She doesn't really want to abandon being a villain, she wants to create an antihero narrative. This would allow her to run callow peacefully while still being allowed to do whatever villain things she wants

haihappen

"The lovely Taghreb's lips quirked."

Is there any Taghreb present? If Aisha is meant, shouldn't that read "Sonike"?

Shequi

Aisha is Taghreb.

BBM

Queen of Blades. Huh. That's... Almost too an apt comparison. So, there will be an alliance, then Cat's going to backstab everyone, name herself Queen Bitch of the Universe and not all their little soldiers and ships will stand in her way again.

Death Knight

And grow dread locks and start using undead suicide goat rushes.

... I can dig it

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Why would she suddenly backstab anyone?

donforrester456

Starcraft reference, the Queen of Blades is the Zerg queen who allied with the Humans and some Protoss to help her gain control of all Zerg under the premise that she was a more reasonable option for Alien Overlord; then after succeeding in taming the Zerg, promptly turned around and backstabbed everyone. Although there are noises that she was mind-controlled into doing that.

taliesinskye

I don't think Cat wants to conquer the world or climb the tower or whatever else. She might do those things if they were the only way to protect Callow, but I think she'd strongly prefer to just have peace and be able to rebuild Callow into something prosperous.

saiman92

I don't get why this is such a great idea. I mean she thought about how breaking from Malicia would be bad and then she breaks with Malicia?

Once she is a signatory she will have to join the crusade against Praes. She has seen the data and she should know that even if they win, it would just mean kicking the can down the road...

TideofKhatanga

If she breaks from Malicia by answering "Yes, I do intend to pursue independence from the Tower", like the Pilgrim goaded her into with his phrasing, it's bad. It says nothing but "I'm a Villain backstabbing my villainous boss". It turns her into another footnote in History books, another backstabbing villain who met her fate at the hand of the righteous.

If she breaks from Malicia by answering "Actually, I wanna join the Good Guy Alliance Against Evil", her narrative isn't that of a villain betraying her boss because reasons, but that of a villain going for redemption. And THAT is a completely different narrative in terms of consequences. Most importantly, it's a completely different narrative for the crusaders, they can't simply shut the door on her. "The heroes deny the redemption of the villainess sincerely trying to reform" never went well for the heroic party. They could argue that she's trying to trick them, but Cat doesn't have the reputation of a trickster. Also, Cat has put herself in the role of the wise ruler pushing for peace, refusing her now labels the heroes as "heavens-backed murderhobos waging an hypocrite war against a peaceful kingdom", which will weaken them HARD. It might actually give Cat enough plot armour to make her invulnerable for the remainder of the crusade.

MetruX

Actually, the true masterstroke is that they have to consider all of this, but none of it actually matters. Because this just gives her a year where they can't touch her, BEFORE she even makes the request, a year she needs to regrow her strengths... And, even more, they can't just say "okay, we'll wait for your petition" and then keep the army in her kingdom. This would be the same as refusal, and they can't simply refuse her, so they NEED to retreat and wait in good faith. Even the heroes shouldn't interfere because of Grey, except, maybe, the Saint.

taborask

So what's she going to do with the half of her army that's Praesi? Most of the greenskins probably won't care, but I find it hard to believe all of them will hate the High Lord's enough to make war on their homeland

Euodiachloris

Praes is very used to civil wars, power grabs, surprise coups and bits of it fending other bits from thinking about climbing the Tower.

Most would do what they always try to do: back the winning horse. One sin; one grace.

RanVor

You forget that majority of the Fifteenth sees Catherine as a revolutionary of sorts. Not only they don't mind going against Praes, they **expect** it.

BLH989

I can see how this ends.

Saint of Swords: "There is no way in hell I'm letting you do that!"

Catherine: precedes to fill Saint's lungs with goblin fire and undead goats

Catherine: There! Now you have to let me join the hero club!

1queenofblades1

Hahahaha who says Catherine Foundling cannot into diplomacy?

The Procerans gave her the rope to hang herself. Cat just tied it around their balls and pulled.

Someguy

"It admittedly took me a few years to make my peace with the fact that Lady Foundling's take on diplomacy is essentially to bring a bottle of cheap wine and a sword to the table, then remind the interlocutor that while the wine might be awful it is still arguably better than being stabbed."

—Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara

Cat just killed the 10th Crusade and turned it into the beginning of the "Uncivil Wars" mentioned in the chapter quotes.

wyaldriddler

Ooohhhhhh yeah. What chapters were these?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Hakram removed the wine, and by doing so broke the pattern?

grrtt

The first of the Uncivil Wars was the Liesse Rebellion, the second was the Summer Campaign, and the third was Akua's Folly. We don't know how many Uncivil Wars there are.

nick012000

How do you narrow your eyes when you closed your eyes in thought and haven't opened them yet?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

It's like drawing a circle extra closed

Al

Just caught up with the updates. What do I do now with my life?

RanVor

Wait, like the rest of us.

Letouriste

Don't worry, the release rate is fast

RanVor

It is indeed, although a part of me is still screaming it's not fast enough. I do my best to ignore it.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Read The Gods are Bastards, Mother of Learning, Ward, Iron Teeth, and Legion of Nothing.

Or if you're completely hopeless like so many of us and you're caught up with those too, pick randomly from a list of Hugo and Nebula winners. I bet no one here has completed that quest, getting distracted on tangents is half the point. I hit one Vorkosigan novel, and of course I had to read the other 17 before going back to the award winners list

Eduardo

Well, I am caught with all of those and to at least mitigate my adiction added Savage Divinity to the list. I am seriously considering that the author of Savage Divinity is a machine.

donforrester456

Savage Divinity is going on ~2 years now, but yeah Ruffwriter is dropping 3 chaps a week excluding occasional vacations.

Also, his chapters come out on alternate days as PGTE, so you have something to read 6 days a week usually.

Ethereal

Read Unsong.

donforrester456

I have. It's amazing, but... it's so very complex, and I find myself constantly knocked out of the flow of the writing and rejecting suspension of disbelief because of its form of worldbuilding. Which is not to say it's bad worldbuilding – it's very good – but it's a miss for me. Trying to understand the kabbalah references and whatnot, I have to say that my brain shorts out and every possible iteration of letters and numbers can be made to mean *anything* irl, if you go deep enough into it, so if I suspend disbelief of numerology and kabbalah etc. then I fall down the rabbit hole with every suggested 'meaning' made for a word. I mean, the story is internally consistent and logical within its own framework, but the nature of that framework to a math-minded person like myself ends up being as if I accepted the premise that  $1=0$ , then tried to recalculate trig tables with that.

I don't know if that made sense. tldr: I like the writing, but I choke on the applied symbolism.

Sparsebeard

The wandering inn's author is surely the most productive though, I mean two or more 10000-15000 words chapters each week with no pause like ever.

And the story is probably my favorite one... although all the other stories listed are very great too...

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Wandering Inn has a lot going for it, but the author's word count is not one of those things. I think it would be better cutting it down by 1/3. There are entire swaths I skim over while rolling my eyes. Remember that week where every paragraph began with "This is a story of...". Ugh.

Don't get me wrong, the creativity and character development in that story is top notch. The writing just rubs me the wrong way a lot of the time.

Sparsebeard

I don't agree, while there may be some rare passages / expressions that may profit from editing, this is in a minority of chapters (well, I mean like most web novel it would probably change quite a bit if they were edited and PGtE is no exception).

There is still the fact that a LOT happens in most chapters of TWI, I mean most chapters have as much happening as many chapters of other series. For example, all of the negotiation between Callow and Procer would definitively have been one chapter, with perhaps other things also happening.

Not that this is a critic of PGtE, the author is also a machine, and it's a different kind of story where there seem to be script for the whole story with a clear beginning and ending.

Whereas, TWI is more like an adventure where the story is pulled by the characters' weekly choices in a set, awesome, world, you get the sense that the story can go on forever with characters appearing and dying according to the world's whims... It's kind of like a very long tabletop RPG where every player pulls the game in it's own direction.

donforrester456

I can't stomach The Gods Are Bastards – a bit SJW for me, leaning too heavily on those themes to distinguish the moral divide between good and bad guys – but I can recommend The Wandering Inn for nuanced characters and uplifting moments (seriously, I've cut onions more than once reading that one), and Savage Divinity for its brilliant pokes at Xanxia / reincarnation story tropes, as well as just amazingly solid writing. There are other stories that are good, but those two round out my top three with this one. TWI might end up being my favorite of all time.

Not\_a\_robot

Found the trump voter who got triggered by a female protagonist and never read past the first book

Not\_a\_robot

Wait no, that was uncalled for and this story has a female protagonist as well, so my rebuke makes no sense. My apologies. Anyone using SJW unironically is just hard to take seriously. If I may, I don't think you've read past the first book, which the author himself has he really wants to rewrite because it really isn't that good. It gets a whole lot better later on, with many of the things you might think of as SJW being either clarified or acknowledged for being somewhat hypocritical at times. The Silver Legions are still female though.

Sparsebeard

Personally, I love both TGAB and TWI but I'll admit that I find TWI better as I might pass a few updates of TGAB and then catch up but will always read TWI's chapters within 24 hours of publication...

Also, you might want to avoid using loaded terms such as SJW which will trigger about half of the public if you want your opinions not to put off potential readers...

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Yes, I can see why someone who uses SJW as a put-down wouldn't like the beginning of TGAB. Ironically, the story AGREES WITH YOU in this! As another commenter mentions, the early chapters with Trissiny are to show how wrong she is despite being so certain she's right. That's not actually revealed until a bit later, and there aren't any hints that that's what it's doing. (You'll see several pointed complaints about that I left in the comments, early on.) I would strongly advise anyone to just bulldoze through those early chapters if you have to, the story blossoms into so much more than that.

Counterpoint: if you did intend SJW as a dog whistle to see if there are others like you here, perhaps TGAB just isn't for you. (I think Webb himself would strongly disagree, it should be said.) The story espouses some "progressive" ideals, but it's always conscious about not coming off as preachy. It just depends on whether you approach the story with good faith or not. For some people, even acknowledging there are two sides to an argument is unacceptably preachy.

onedollargum

Worth the Candle is also worth a look if you like tabletop role-playing games.

Gunslinger

Bravo, this chapter was brilliant. I'm not sure how Malicia would take this announcement. It would still be official that Cat's breaking away, just without the narrative of evil turns against evil.

Euodiachloris

Part of her would be delighted to send Cordelia an honest gift basket of heating poltices and headache cures with a note amounting to "my sincerest condolences concerning your Foundling-related migraines – these might help... a little".

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Why are we assuming this requires Cat/Callow to break away from Praes? The whole point I thought was to be able to remain on peaceful terms with both.

To me the only question remaining is whether the delegation was in shock, or in shock that she didn't see the obvious fatal flaw that everyone else did 🙄

Euodiachloris

I'm not assuming any break between Callow and anybody else. However, negotiating with all sides, attempting to take them to the cleaners while being a harder nut to crack than is worth the bother of cracking? Hello, Switzeland!

The proposed international Accords strike me as having a little Red Cross on them, no? 😊

Thea

They'd have to be poisoned though. To keep in line with Praesi traditions and all.

*Euodiachloris*

A mild laxative is technically a poison. Possibly a favouring, as well. 😊

Nethermore

"Catherine the Great" just doesn't cut it anymore. I propose "Catherine the Magnificent (Bastard)" :D.

*The Warren Peace NFL Report*

Ratface is the bastard. Cat is the orphan.

Nethermore

I case you weren't just being witty (or someone else isn't aware), I was referencing the "Magnificent Bastard" trope as found on tvtropes.org.

*The Warren Peace NFL Report*

I would have described it as "smartass", so thanks for choosing a more positive adjective 😊

RanVor

"Magnificent Orphan" doesn't have the same ring to it.

Letouriste

So cat want be piccolo-like? Interesting

Mike E.

That was good...now to see if the GP lies about Cat having been truthful with that statement (and I assume she is being truthful, else the GP's reaction would have been different).

Love that Cat is learning how to lose the small battles in order to win the big ones. There was another story (HPMoR) I read where one of the growth arcs for the main character was that they actually had to learn how to lose, vice escalating unnecessarily just so they could always had to win every contest regardless of the future cost.

Also Cat literally biting her own tongue (off) to keep quiet, nice twist of a common phrase.

Byzantine

A hero lying about a villain trying to turn good?

Has there **ever** been a story that worked out well for the hero?

Cicero

Only if the hero is inexperienced, and then gets a mini-redemption arc to teach him the folly of rejecting other people's repentance.

Byzantine

Good point. I don't think Pilgrim can pull that and "wise old mentor" at the same time though.

Evgeny Permyakov

>"To answer your question," I said, "I intend to seek signatory status with the Grand Alliance within the year."

Aw, a very good non-answer. That's fun.

onedollargum

It's nice too, in the way that it doesn't say when exactly during the year she'll petition them, or how hard she'll try.

Jonnnnz

I am beyond annoyed with the Pilgrim here. He is overbearing with his twisting the rules in bad faith to murder Cat under the guise of truth. He pretended to be reasonable at the start, but he has shown exactly zero compromise other than on things he would have agreed to anyway. The kindly old man act is only skin deep when he bothers with it... And right now he is not.

onedollargum

Good doesn't really compromise all too often, it feels like. Might be a sign of where Catherine stands too, given that she doesn't really compromise either.

They both do care to reach an understanding though, even if they are fencing while doing it.

MetruX

Named don't compromise too often*. It's actually what is needed to be a Named, as said by Black there after she became the Squire. To be Named is to hold something within yourself so firm it "makes you special". This kind of people tend to butt heads 😬

Tide of Khatanga

He is a kindly old man, and fairly reasonable too compared to most Named. But he has a duty, and that duty is completely incompatible with letting this generation's greatest villain-to-be alive. The Grey Pilgrim's kindness isn't an act, it just doesn't extend to Evil.

He reminds me of a quote from Carlos Hathcock about killing a lot of people as a sniper in Vietnam: "Hell, anybody would be crazy to like to go out and kill folks. I like shooting, and I love hunting. But I never did enjoy killing anybody. It's my job. If I don't get those bastards, then they're gonna kill a lot of these kids we got dressed up like Marines. That's just the way I see it."

Agent J

That's actually what I love most about it. We saw just how much of a charade his kindly geezer act was during his interlude. Analyzing and manipulating the princes/ses with remarkable ease. Using his cultivated image to great effect when dealing with heroes and villains alike. All with the single minded purpose to further the Greater Good. He's an interesting character. He reminds me more and more of the Wandering Bard.

Just This Guy, Ya Know

I love that she "intends" to join to Alliance. Which she definitely can. She can just set conditions that it will be near impossible for the First Prince to pass. Doesn't mean she isn't being truthful.

Also, it gives her a way to isolate the Saint, which is always a good thing.

I wonder if joining the Grand Alliance means she actually a.) has to declare war on Praes and b.) actually has to contribute troops who will fight.

On the other hand, I do worry about the change that The Black Knight and Malicia were trying to cause, preventing the constant wars between Praes and Callow by folding Callow into Praes and making it so Praes wasn't on the verge of starvation regularly. On the other hand, if this then turns into a Praesian civil (or uncivil) war, that might work. If Praes stops existing and becomes part of Callow, then the Dread Empire is gone, there is no need for Crusade, she gets to wipe out the nobles, etc.

I do wonder what her game plan for what happens when she's gone is. She's working to set up an efficient bureaucracy in Callow like Malicia has in Praes, so those would hopefully continue to function, no matter how inept the next rulers are. Given that Praes is a Roman Empire analogue, I am wondering about an Eastern Roman Empire here. The Byzantines were known for their impenetrable bureaucracy, but it did keep the Eastern half of the Roman Empire running for another thousand years after the fall of the west.

Jason Ipswitch

If an orphan girl from Callow climbs The Tower and becomes Dread Empress (with a little stop as Queen of Callow along the way), that seems like a win for Black's ideas. At least to me it does. Once it's established narrative that Callowans can become Dread Emperor/Empress, once little Callowan girls and boys dream of climbing The Tower, Black will have linked the two nations together in a way that will be nearly impossible to undo.

cheeseyme1999

that was Black's method, not his goal. Black is a man powered by spite, He looks at the heaven's winning every battle without putting in the effort and being as close to perfect as possible due to providence and he wants to tear the system down. If Catherine takes the tower as a villain and gets the crusade to fuck off then he's won, but if Cat joins the heroes it's a victory for good, not evil.

Allafterme

But you don't consider ramifications of such an action. Hasenbach wants everyone on her Grand Alliance. But if a villain, however how reformed, would immediately cause the Levant to drop them. That is 1/3 of the alliance. The Golden Bloom can't be invited like Hasenbach pondered too. It is a GREAT way to break the alliance from its seams...

RanVor

Well, this league is already kind of a farce, considering one of Cordelia's reasons for initiating a crusade was to stave off a war with Levant and Ashur, her fellow members of the Grand Alliance. What kind of alliance they are if they can't even keep themselves from fighting each other unless there is an immediate threat in the vicinity?

wyaldriddler

Evil? In the sense of how this story describes Evil at least.

vuthuha912

Or maybe he will like it. If he needs to choose between being Evil and getting fuck or being Good and getting better then he might choose the latter. Labels are not as important as the result. He is quite pragmatic. You know Praes is the center of his world, he loves that horrid place to death. Just like Tyrant said, his victories aren't a victory for Evil, it is a victory for Praes and Praes just happened to be an Evil country. If Praes somehow became a ... kinda Neutral or ... Good-ish country, it can get all the benefits, a chance for fixing the weather that won't end with failure, the chance for actually fixing the food issues, a better trade agreement with other living nations on the continent. It is a win overall for Praes. They lose their alliances with Helike and KoTD but it is not like the 2 nation are useful in anyway.

Allafterme

So Cat has become Friedrich I.?

sengachi

This chapter made me realize what the Wandering Bard's goal in pushing Black to the destruction of Liesse was. She was trying to get him to catch his finger on the hem of Evil Turns On Evil. Whether Malicia actually got weaponized Liesse was small peanuts compared to what the Wandering Bard was going for, which was Black and Malicia turning on another. Which they will.

It doesn't matter if both of them know it would be suicide. Malicia is being compelled to bury Black because they're both wrapped up in the Evil Turns On Evil narrative now. The Wandering Bard wasn't just trying to drive a wedge between two enemies of hers, she was hurling the two greatest threats to Good bodily into a fucking narrative woodchipper.

Good gods my fear of and respect for the Wandering Bard just shot up a *lot*.

JJR

It's a surprising move by Cat, but I think the Pilgrim can still turn this around on her with a simple question.

Pilgrim: "Seeking signatory Status is one thing, but finalizing it, accepting it, is another thing entirely."

Cat: "I'm not sure what you're getting at."

Pilgrim: "What I'm asking is; if we open the door for you, will you come in or stnad there with indecision?"

And then Cat bats someones water glass off the table and scampers away.

---

Chapter 22: Trip

"A war fought and won for the wrong reasons, under the wrong cause, can be a greater threat to the Praes than simple defeat. Maleficent the First spoke of villains raising their own gallows, but failed to add that the killing stroke in a hanging comes from the height of the drop."

– Extract from 'The Death of the Age of Wonders', a treatise by Dread Empress Malicia

"Preposterous," Prince Arnaud of Cantal blustered.

He wasn't the only one to speak up in the aftermath of that particular trebuchet stone being lobbed, but he was by far the loudest. And his heartbeat had not changed in the slightest, though his face was the very picture of angry befuddlement. All right, that one bore watching. I'd never met anyone this good at acting outside of the High Lords and maybe a handful of Named. I leaned back into my seat and riffled through my cloak pockets until I had my pipe in hand. The small satchel of wakeleaf parted under my fingers and I poured the contents into the chamber. I had a few matches, but also a quicker way. I coughed until Masego turned his attention from the book he was not-so-discretely reading under the table to me. I tapped the side of the pipe he'd gifted me with a finger. Scoffing, he flicked his wrist and fire bloomed within the chamber.

"Thank you, Lord Hierophant," I drawled. "As for the many statements of the Proceran delegation, I'll point you to the Chosen known as the Grey Pilgrim. A truth-teller of great skill, as I understand it."

The gaze of everyone in the pavilion moved to the old man, still standing and devoid of expression. That's right, I thought. I'm not lying. I didn't have to. I very much doubted the Grand Alliance would just hand me a tankard and invite me to sit at the table, but even a refusal would need more than just Hasenbach involved. The Ashurans would have to put the question through committees, unless their quasi-king Magon Hadast intervened, and more importantly the Dominion would have to go through the Majilis. Their inept, bickering and deeply divided equivalent to the Highest Assembly. The entire process could take months even for a refusal. And if they accepted? Well, it wasn't like I wasn't intending to make deals with all of them eventually. It was a necessary component to the Liesse Accords being adopted. It was a different approach than I'd intended, but so long as it worked what did I care?

"The Queen in Callow did not speak a lie," the Pilgrim flatly said.

I'd been a bit too much to swallow to tell them outright I was telling the truth, apparently. Nice to know even the Peregrine could be petty.

"This is a trick," Princess Adeline of Orne insisted. "You are one of the Damned."

Fancy Proceran talk for villain, I took it. The Chosen and the Damned, huh. Somehow I suspected a lot of foreign heroes who ended up fighting against Procer also ended up, by pure coincidence of course, painted with damnation brush. I breathed in the smoke, then allowed it to billow upwards with my exhale.

"And?" I said. "I already offered the Pilgrim passage through Arcadia if your army was willing to assault Praes directly. I'm not exactly unwilling to kick in the Empire's teeth, Princess, and I was under the impression that was exactly what the Tenth Crusade was about. Or are there other concerns I don't know about?"

My smile turned a little colder at that. She did not flinch, but her heartbeat quickened in fear. The taste of it was just as intoxicating as the wine I was oathbound not to drink. Brave soul, that one, but out of her depth today. She wasn't in on the game the Pilgrim was playing. Prince Amadis began to speak, but the Pilgrim hastily cleared his throat to stay the man's tongue. Wouldn't do to have the mortals fuck up your scheme, would it?

"As a vassal state of the Tower-" the old man began.

"Is the Proceran delegation turning back on the premises of this negotiation?" Aisha interrupted smilingly. "You are addressing the Queen in Callow, Grey Pilgrim, by mutual agreement."

I beamed at the lovely tribune. Ah, Aisha. Always quick on the uptake, wasn't she? If it didn't have 'terrible idea' written all over it in red ink, it would be tempting to give her a whirl.

"Over twenty thousand men were butchered by the Army of Callow," Malanza spoke up. "You expect us to ignore this?"

"All a misunderstanding, evidently," I replied calmly. "I believed your expeditionary force to be an attempt at invasion. I regret what came from it, but you must understand that Callowans have a chequered history with armies crossing our borders after using massive sorcerous rituals."

There was a muted sound as Brandon Talbot choked on his tongue. The implied comparison to the Dread Empire ruffled more than a few feathers on the other side of the table, but they couldn't exactly deny the bird's eye view of it. Hasenbach's burning of a passage was admittedly more grounded than your average Dread Emperor's crowning disaster, but the similarities were there.

"Your alleged intent to seek alignment with the Grand Alliance is irrelevant to the negotiations being held today," the Pilgrim said.

I glanced at Aisha. I was pulling one on him so far but it wouldn't do to get cocky. The more we conversed the higher the chances he turned the tables.

"That is inaccurate," the Taghreb aristocrat replied. "As is would be unlawful to be a signatory of the Alliance while paying any form of tribute to the Tower, providing this statement served the purpose of answering your question."

So, I mused, watching Amadis across the table even though he was not the object of my thoughts. You going to keep fighting this one, Pilgrim, or give ground and rally for the third? I'd cut the grass under his feet by presenting myself as a possible ally, right in the wake of a bloody battle that saw no clear winner. He couldn't work the 'heroes with their back up against the wall' story angle with a foundation that weak, not while the Procerans were fed and under truce. 'Evil turns on Evil' had been his move, but I should have tiptoed around the pitfall by stating in front of a truth-teller that I was willing to slap some red crosses onto the armour of the Army of Callow and fight the Good fight. That'd make me the one prick in every heroic band that crossed lines for the Greater Good, if it worked. The Lone Swordsman of continental coalitions, if you would. Two for two, so far. Parry and riposte. But we both know it's the third one that matters, don't we? I puff at my pipe, allowing the wakeleaf to fill my lungs. The old man was studying me in silence, but I did not meet his eyes.

"The clarification was sufficient," Pilgrim finally said, and sat down.

Cutting his losses, I presumed, since I was no longer willing to engage. I remained silent as negotiations picked up again through intermediaries. The Procerans made an argument that reparations were not needed if this was all an accident, but Aisha turned it around by noting that the sale of supplies was a different matter entirely. That the terms of the truce specifically did not prevent them from entering Praes took the wind out of their sails, since they had to maintain the pretence that their 'expeditionary force' wasn't an army meant to invade Callow – if they strayed from that, they were entering a nightmarish quagmire of war reparations and official apologies none of them could really afford back in Procer. My attention began to wane as the hours passed, tediously taking us to Afternoon Bell, but I forced myself to follow everything closely. I could not afford to be taken unawares when the Pilgrim intervened again. Yet none of the heroes spoke so much as a word, and I grew tenser the longer the sword remained hanging over my head. My side got its way when it came to terms of payment for the supplies, though the Procerans bargained down to only needing to pay a quarter of the total sum directly out of their pockets even if it was framed as a loan from Hasenbach to them. Odds were the First Prince would flip them the finger and that quarter was all I'd ever see, but considering I was essentially selling them back their own supplies I'd take it anyway. Even just having the documents would give me something to use when I had to treat with Hasenbach herself down the line.

The diplomatic claptrap continued, polite verbal fencing back and forth across the table. The crusaders tried to fuck us over what land was actually recognized as 'under the rule of the Queen in Callow', and to my distaste got the better of it. I couldn't exactly make the argument that the Red Flower Vales were mine when they were factually in the hands of the Legions of Terror, and that meant the northern crusade could move against Black down there without breaking our terms. It'd be months before they even got out of Callow, I told myself. And it would take even more time for them to recover and march on the Vales. By then Black would either have won or lost against Papenheim. If he'd won, I'd have to trust that he could hold the valleys regardless. I couldn't afford for him not to. And if he lost, well, the northern crusade would still be forbidden to go further than the Vales until the truce ran out. At that point I'd have more immediate problems anyway. We weren't halfway to Evening Bell and there was only a single issue that hadn't been addressed, guarantees for the treaty – though we'd have to double back to the supplies since that one had been kicked down the slope by Prince Amadis. It was beginning to look like we'd walk out of the pavilion with an actual agreement before nightfall, which had me wary.

The Procerans could have delayed much more than they had. We'd expected them to, as long as the battle for the Vales was undecided. This was going well, which meant I was about to have my knuckles rapped. Except the Pilgrim didn't get up. It was the mouthpiece that addressed the subject, and my fingers clenched under the table. This wasn't going to be straightforward negotiations, since it was about the mechanisms that would be enforcing the treaty. I wanted oaths to the Heavens out of everyone involved, witnessed by a hero, but Aisha had pretty bluntly informed me that wasn't going to happen even if I offered to make an oath of my own. Our best guess was that they'd push for something along the lines of the agreement being made public so anyone breaking it would have their reputation tarnished. We wouldn't accept that, since they might very well get away with breaking a treaty with a villain with praise for being clever in screwing over the enemy instead of any backlash for dealing in bad faith. The compromise we'd be working for was material value being left behind as guarantee, as well as staggered departure for the Proceran host so we'd have a knife at their throat if they tried to double-cross us. Breaking a promise to the bearer of a fae mantle would come back to haunt them, anyway, so this was mostly a precaution to account for any outside solution we didn't know about.

Except after Aisha proposed my terms – as a starting position to be bargained down from, to my chagrin – the Procerans didn't offer what we'd expected.

"As a sign of good faith, we are willing to offer a royal hostage," the middle-aged diplomat said. "We would, however, require an accompanying observer and a guarantee of safety for both."

That had to be the Pilgrim's play, but I wasn't seeing it. There wasn't a good angle to use with the supplies deal, at least none that I could see, and after that there was nothing left to negotiate about. All right, then, royal hostage. What could he do with that? Assassinate the hostage after I took custody of them, so this entire treaty was ripped in half. If Malicia had made me an offer like this, it would be what I expected. Except that this wasn't the way Pilgrim did things. Sure, he'd basically put his seal on the Saint offering me under a – glamoured, I had to concede that much – truce banner, but that plan didn't fit with the way he'd approached this so far. Letting me die for the greater good was one thing, and he'd been pretty upfront that was essentially his intent when we first sat down for our fireside chat. But murder? No, that was going against the grain. He could be banking on either one of my people fucking up or Praes being out for blood, though. Not outright bloodying his hand, but shaping the situation so it would unfold the way he needed it to. That I could buy.

Except I'd have the hostage neck deep in wards in the safest place I could find, and Malicia wanted to use Amadis' gaggle of expansionists to make a mess in Procer. That wasn't to say if she decided it would be useful to weaken me she wouldn't assassinate royalty that wasn't Malanza or Milenan, the two she'd ordered me not to kill. But unless she had Assassin to call on, which I was almost certain she didn't, she'd have a very hard time pulling this off. I had the fucking Hierophant designing my defences, these days, and the Guild of Assassins in my pocket. It wasn't impossible but it would require a significant investment of resources at a juncture when her backyard was already on fire. Pilgrim might not know a High Lord's seat got sacked and the court is up in arms about it, though, I mused. Lack of information? No, I could never assume that. Not with the Augur on the other side, and the pile of aspects the heroes had to draw from. Hells, it wasn't even off the table that one of them had a godsdamned angel whispering secrets in their ear. In what circumstances was giving me a royal hostage the correct move, assuming they didn't get killed?

If he wanted this treaty to work.

Was it that simple? That'd been treating him like an unmovable enemy when he was actually willing to work with me? No. Be cold. Be clear. Be a creature of logic, because the moment you allow your judgement to be affected is the moment you lose. My understanding of the Pilgrim, as based in fact, was that he was no more inclined to compromise than I. I desperately wanted someone on the other side to be willing to work with me, so I was painting what I wanted to see on the canvas. If he'd allowed this, it was because he saw a path to victory through it. And I couldn't discern what he wanted to accomplish from my point of view, so I would have to adopt his. I am the Pilgrim, I thought. I have seen dozens if not hundreds of the villains, and I am apt at reading them. My truth-telling abilities may run deeper than that. How did I trick Catherine Foundling, if I understood what she was after? She wanted the treaty to succeed, so – no, mistake. That was the shatranj board on the ground, not the one he was trying to win on. The villain queen has wiggled out of my plan to pit her against other villains by trying to make herself into the suspect ally on the side of the Tenth Crusade. That is an issue, since it makes her difficult to assault. But she took a stance, and every stance has vulnerabilities. What is hers? She is behaving like an ally, looking down from Above.

How much effort would it actually take, to enforce that?

My grip loosened under the table. So that was it. I'd already done it to myself accidentally with the Lone Swordsman, back in the day: the Pilgrim's play was a redemption story. It didn't matter that I was in charge of Callow, if I was no longer a villain. Sure, most redemption stories ended in death. Sacrifice to make up for previous sins and all that, passing the torch to someone that had the same heroism but less blood on their hands. That was just spice in the wine, though, since it got him all the benefits of Callow not longer heading down the cliff without having to deal the issues inherent in keeping me around after my bloody history. In a way, this could be considered an elegantly subtle assassination attempt. The Grey Pilgrim or someone he handpicked according to his understanding of me would be the observer in the Proceran terms, and then all he had to do was wait and let the story do the heavy lifting. I laughed softly, ignoring the odd looks it got me. Gods, I'd underestimated him. He was playing me on the earthly board to win on the story one. Callow, of which I was queen, needed the truce for practical reasons. I needed the truce because it was a first step in getting the Accords signed. And so I would accept, knowing he was trying to kill me through it.

I admired the calculated methods Black used to kill heroes. I'd learned from them, emulated the techniques when dealing with the heroes who came into Callow. In that same distant way, I could admire what the Pilgrim had done here. My teacher was a villain, so he came at it from the perspective that the stories would get him killed. So he avoided them. The Grey Pilgrim was a hero, so he came at it from the perspective that the stories would get him what he wanted. So he leant into them. From an objective perspective, even if this was very likely meant to kill me, I could only commend how well I was being played. He'd read what I wanted, and was giving it to me in a way that led to his victory. And even deeper than that, he must know that even if I saw through this I'd feel bound to accept. Because I wasn't Black. I was not a pupil of martyrdom, but I did believe there were things worth dying for. If I paid my dues in blood to the Gods Above, Callow would avoid the slaughter marching towards it. All it required me to do was smile, accept, and kiss the knife that would slit my throat. You have found the thing I most want in the world, and used it to kill me.

There wasn't a fucking devil in existence that could have played it better.

"And the identity of the hostage and observer?" I asked, breaking in before Aisha could pursue the matter.

"As the leader of this host, it is my duty to serve as the hostage," Prince Amadis Milenan said, inclining his head towards me.

And it was no doubt a fortunate coincidence that this honourable sacrifice would make him the hero who'd gone into the wolf's den for the sake of his men instead of the ambitious fuckup who'd pissed away over twenty thousand men trying annex Callow. The other royals would return to Procer, where Hasenbach wouldn't be able to blame them – Prince Amadis, after all, was the official leader of the army. And the man himself would be out of the First Prince's reach to punish, not that she'd be able to after he'd become a hostage to save his men. He'd come out of this smelling like roses, a tragic figure who had fallen prey to the wickedness of the Black Queen. Meanwhile his allies in Procer would be building the altar of his legend so when he returned it would be to the praise of the thousands instead of blackened by inglorious defeat. Burning Hells. Even when I won, with these people, they still didn't lose. Both sides getting their way had felt like a better principle before I'd had to look the truth of it in the eye.

"And I volunteer myself as the observer," the Grey Pilgrim added calmly.

I didn't humour him with a reply. We already knew my answer. I leaned towards Aisha.

"I'm going to agree to this," I whispered in her ear. "Use it to extract concessions over supplies. You'll find them more flexible than anticipated."

Her dark eyes were troubled, but she was a Wastelander through and through. Her face became a mask and she did not argue with me in front of the enemy. I leaned back and my eyes turned to the Pilgrim. I was past pretending this wasn't his game.

"I'll accept these terms," I said. "I believe we're done here?"

The old man inclined his head.

"So we are," he replied.

I rose to my feet, flicking a glance at Prince Amadis.

"Aisha Bishara speaks with my full authority," I said. "She will finish these negotiations in my name."

It was not proper etiquette, but I did not have it in me to stay seated and smile across the table from a man who'd just arranged my death, however beautifully. I offered the bare necessities of courtesy before leaving, Thief trailing behind me with worried eyes. Hierophant only noticed what was happening when I was halfway out the pavilion, then got up and left without even the semblance of an explanation. I halted and looked up at the descending sun, after I exited the conference. The Pilgrim thought he'd won. But he didn't understand quite what I was after, did he? That for the Accords to work, there was a need for someone enforcing them from the side of Evil. Or maybe he did, and didn't believe it would make a difference. In the end, a mistake had been made today.

Whether it was his or mine, only time would tell.

---

Big Brother

Woo! I'm loving this more and more the longer Cat and Pilgrim interact.

Jeremy

Well then. Things are going to get *interesting*. Although I must say that I'm sad Rozala isn't taking Milenan's place as Cat's hostage.

Oshi

Rozala isn't an ambitious twit Cat can hold against Hasanbach.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I was thinking more Cat could hold her against herself 😎

The Warren Peace NFL Report

It gets cold at night in a tent

SpacyRicochet

She did already establish she had a very strict 'Don't f-ing invade Callow'-rule for people sharing her bed.

Erfling

Ah, but that was all a misunderstanding

Insanenoodlyguy

Speaking of ships, in this chapter it looks like Juniper do the equivalent of putting her name in tape on the stuff in the fridge before Cat decides to eat it herself.

Dainpdf

Aisha is a bad idea for more reasons than that. It starts with "Praesi" and ends with "noble".

Insanenoodlyguy

rereading, it might have been literal as well. So delighted with Aisha's back up she literally wants to pick her up and twirl her. That is still a bad idea for all the same reasons mind. You pick up a girl and twirl her, there's assumptions made about your intentions.

ALKATYN

She is already the defacto leader in military terms, letting her be a hostage would give her an even bigger reputation boost, and allow her allies to frame the failure of the crusade as his, with her nobly sacrificing herself. Also, Pilgrim et al would probably not want her around Catherine, since they both have ruthless pragmatic streaks and a focus on revenge it would be easy for Cat to convert her, at least in part. Milenan is an old style Proceran noble so thats less of an issue

sengachi

Also the real irony here is that if they gave Cat a hostage who actually had a moral compass Cat would probably have them turning against Procer within a month because, well, because Procer actually is in the wrong. So they kind of have to send her an amoral self-serving bastard to act as the 'poor heroic hostage who kills the evil queen' because anyone actually heroic wouldn't serve.

Steve

I was super hoping for that, too. Screw Amadis 😡

ahd

The Woe don't care if the Black Queen is an anti-hero or an anti-villain. The Hunt don't either.

Remind me again why Catherine Foundling can't turn in place?

SpeckofStardust

Meta reasons.

Personally reasons.

Practical reasons.

Take your pick.

Byzantine

Because as she noted, the story involved will try to kill her.

ruduen

Yep, a redemption story is quite possible with the lines that have currently been drawn. I was actually wondering if they were going to turn it into something else – if they provided a royal captive, put under the heaviest guards, then that would've provided the lines for an appropriate rescue story.

Still, since Catherine knows just what's going on, it's time to see just how much wiggle room she's found in this particular story.

Someguy

There is another way to fuck the "Redemption" story by leaning heavily on Pilgrims' Mentor Archetype. Twist it into a variant of the "Hero's Journey" where the mentor gives his life to save the "hero". In this case, setting things up for Akua and the Mantle of Winter as targets.

Dainpdf

Well, he **would** be her fourth (she's had Black, Malicia and Akua) mentor figure... I think that's one too many.

letouriste

akua is not a mentor figure. just a rival you can learn things from

Dainpdf

Catherine specifically kept Akua around so she would teach her things. She's not a rival anymore. Still a viper, but a teachy one.

Miles

But none of her mentors have died yet. (Akua's death was before being a mentor)

Dainpdf

Yeah, but that's not my point. I just meant that after reaching magic number three it's probably hard to get another. Especially since she already had a "learning" name and ditched it.

Maybe if you count Akua as a tool instead of a mentor?

jonnney

The Empress, Black Knight, Heiropant's parents, several legions in the Vales and a good deal of the administration of her Army and government would all be big issues. However the main issue would be that Callow would rejoin the cycle of death and conquest with Praes that had plagued it for the past thousand years. I think she might could get away with ruling alongside a heroine, but if she switches sides her whole reason for grasping power in the first place evaporates.

Jonnnnz

Thank you.

Someone finally mentioned the obvious: the Gods have set up the continent with Callow being a target for a starving Praes. Black and Malicia's solution was that they become one nation. Cat saw the numbers. This agreement is poison in the long term because Praes will have to at least partially succeed each time no matter what treaties are signed to protect Callowan interests.

Yotz

As a tributary to the Tower, Callow brings Praes into the agreement, however tangentially. This would require additional diplomatic talks between the Tower and the League, all while the Praes must be supplied with analogue of humanitarian aid convoys at least. Callow will carry the lion's share of it, of course – both as a gesture of free will, and a sign of loyalty to the treaty signed – thus fulfilling divine mandate. Oh, and Praes will surely skin them alive with border taxes in any future trade dealing – metaphorically speaking, of course – thus succeeding in their nefarious plans on dominating Callow.

Welcome to the birth of Realpolitik, gentlehomos.

PS: Gods will be furious, though. At least of the Above, for Infernal Diplomacy is a thing, you see..

mavant

> gentlehomos

Hey, some of us are gentlebis.

Yotz

Bu you are of Homo genus, are you not?
If not, my apologies, my deer.

Jesse Coombs

My deer indeed for I am genus cervidae.

Kazon and Dogar

Except that Black's point is that a Dread Emperor/Empress that tries to enact something that will solve the starvation without taking from Callow will be made to fail. The (hilariously named) plot to steal Callow's weather failed and made it worse. Attempting to limit population growth was met with a quick death before it could be implemented. Black managed to divine that much clarity from historical records. The agreement you describe would be destroyed before it could be signed. That was the driving force behind the conquest: the loophole in the Gods-mandated plan in which Praes solves the starvation by taking from Callow, only this time with no need for human suffering in the process.

Dainpdf

Uh... It was stated that Cat can't be aligned to Praes if the agreement goes through. She basically stated that there's a snowball's chance in Summer that she's getting into the Alliance, without Pilgrim intervention.

Agent J

Yes, and she side-stepped the issue entirely “answering” the Pilgrim by saying she planned to join the Alliance. The Uncivil Wars are going to be a thing. The Girl Who Climbed the Tower is also a thing. She can’t be allied to Praes for the deal to go through? No matter. She’ll just conquer it.

*ahd*

The Empress would face a united Proceran host gated through Arcadia to the doorstep of Ater. Black is thinking about dropping Malicia in favour of helping Cat with her vision of a better world (see their last reported conversation); the Calamities (and Scribe, and, heck, maybe even Ranger) would leave Malicia to burn and follow Black in a heartbeat, and Hierophant’s other parent would follow the Warlock to join their son without even noticing there might be a problem. The goblins and orcs and ogres are playing their own game, but certainly would be welcome to come to Callow and settle/join the Army in a more congenial environment than Praes.

Over half of the remaining Army is Legion-trained but Callow-born. The hard Wasteland core of the 15th and adjacent legions is loyal to either Catherine or Black or both (see above about Black moving); and the Red Flower Vales legions have to have figured out that their Empress has suspended them over a bottomless pit of the One Sin by now, and might well follow Black.

The Broken Bells would just be smiling. A lot. Likewise the Daoine.

I don’t say this is the most likely scenario. I’ve given up scrying EE’s thoughts. But it’s hardly *impossible* that Catherine Foundling would break a story in a narratively-plausible way that nobody saw coming, is it?

RanVor

That much is true. The problem is, the objectives of Black and the Procerans are mutually exclusive. The entire point of this crusade on the narrative level is stopping Black before he actually achieves something that can’t be rectified. Remember, the Heavens don’t want peaceful and civilized Praes – they want a dystopian, militaristic shithole to serve as a punching bag for their flunkies. If they get their way, they will make sure the next Dread Emperor is going to be a power-hungry madman.

*ahd*

Last volume, yes, definitely. End of argument. Now, though?

Black's plans are in little pieces all over the floor (see also, his last reported conversation with the Dread Empress). He knows this, and is looking straight at that reality, and thinking about it. Maybe he is thinking it might be fun to have different plans, maybe with different goals. The Liesse Accords might fit the bill. Especially if he knew the Heavens were against that outcome, and he could get to work with Cat again to help her twist the knife in that direction good and hard. (:

Black's objectives **were** incompatible with the Crusaders'. They might not now be.

The Yan Tei precedent exists in-world.

"Patterns cannot be broken," Black smiled. "But they can be... transcended."

RanVor

Actually no. Black's objectives remain the same, and his plan is better than ever. In fact, it performed so far beyond his expectations that he's content to let it run by itself for a time being, to see if he can get even better results. Malicia doesn't see it because she focuses too much on the mundane side of things, and too little on the narrative side.

Now, if Cat changes sides and truly joins the good guys, and not just technically like she's currently planning, then his plan will come apart because he invested too much in her to have her lost to his enemies.

Moreover, Cat's and the Procerans objectives are also mutually exclusive. She has been declared abomination by the House of Light, and any deal they make with her, including the Liesse Accords, is going to ruin their reputation as Calernia's foremost bastion against the forces of darkness. Not to mention that they actually believe it's their gods-given duty to combat Evil wherever it appears. They're not going to just accept a treaty that goes against the tenets of their faith – they will have to be forced to do so. As one of them, Cat will have to submit to the same philosophy. The Accords are a work that just can't be done from the side of Good, with their inflexible doctrines and deep-seated prejudices.

Furthermore, Black's and Cat's objectives are, in fact, mutually inclusive. The Liesse Accords is the perfect chance for Black to solidify his victory, but they can't be achieved without him successfully reforming Praes to a sufficient degree. So, they both benefit from each other's work, but none of them benefits from the situation the Procerans are aiming for.

MetruX

"is going to ruin their reputation as Calernia's foremost bastion against the forces of darkness" is false, actually. They see themselves like this, but it's been noted, several times already, that all other nations see them as power hungry and backstabbing, that tried to conquer them one time or another. Who was actually the bastion against evil was Callow, a land full of heroes and reigned by one, generation after generation fighting evil, with the citizens themselves arming each other without anyone asking. Too bad they let the bastion fall and now the burning wreck came to glare them in the face, uhh?

For the rest, I mostly agree, it IS possible for Cat and Black to share the same end-game, though Black should probably die for it to happen, and it is practically impossible for Cat and Hasenbach both winning.

RanVor

The Procerans are seen by everyone as power-hungry and backstabbing because they totally are. They are also shielding entire Calernia from both Kingdom of the Dead and the Chain of Hunger.

Oshi

No some of the kingdoms are shielding them. Not Procer itself. More often then not they starve those kingdoms slated with the duty of it rather then help.

RanVor

Funny, the last time I checked the map of Calernia, Procer was the only Good country to have land borders with Kingdom of the Dead and the Chain of Hunger. Did something change since then?

oldschoolvillain

RanVor – you appear to be viewing Procer as a monolithic entity like Callow or Pears. It isn't. It's a bunch of kingdoms shoved into a sack together told to get along because they're led by the same elected official. Only a few of those Kingdoms border the chain of hunger and the kingdom of the dead, while the rest border Callow and each other.

RanVor

oldschoolvillain – Procer is not monolithic, but it **is** a united country under a common leadership. Basically, it's like the US, but with more intrigue.

Onyavar

@Ranvor, it's like the US but with small-scale civil war every decade.

sengachi

Cat doesn't want to throw down the Tower though. She's seen where that path leads. Good **must** have an evil overlord to fight. Praes **will** rise again and invade Callow once more if Cat violently overthrows Malicia, it's just a matter of time. If that outcome occurs, it's basically the undoing and the destruction of everything she set out to achieve.

So whatever outcome Cat goes for, it has to include Praes standing, with no reason to invade Callow, and with someone who's not Akua 2.0 in charge (though not necessarily Malicia).

onedollargum

The form of the story is basically: Praes, the Evil, always grasps. Callow, the Good, is grasped. The Praes collapses, Callow breaks free, and the story repeats.

If Callow breaks free, but both stay Evil, then the story breaks, much like what Cat did with Summer and Winter.

If Catherine turns Good thanks to the Proceran ploy, then Callow as a whole is Good. If Callow then breaks free, Praes is going to come knocking again and the story of misery continues.

Edrey

here cat have the role to unite both sides, callow and praes, winter and summer, and all calernia good and evil, and start a new age. the important is not just two countries but all the continent. so like summer procer must be forced

RoflCat

And of course the Above who want to continue the pissing contest, is not amused a mere mortal is ruining their game.

That's probably the REAL reason they've been going after her, much in the same way Amadis was invading Callow for achievements for himself, not the whole Good Crusade crushing Evil Praes.

Blinks

Could always have Callow conquer Praes.

RanVor

It has been done several times and it didn't help.

werafdsaew

She gave an answer in this chapter; for the Liesse Accord to work, someone has to be enforcing it from the side of Evil, and currently she is that candidate.

RanVor

It was outright stated in the second to last paragraph of this chapter – for the Accords to work, someone has to enforce them from the side of Evil. And there's literally no other possible candidate.

RanVor

Aaaaaaaaand I got ninja'd.

Yotz

I feel you.

Morgenstern

Actually, there might be. Black might well do it.

Metrux

Black is set, by himself, to die. There is no way for that, as much as so many people want to see him alive in the end.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You've met some of the gods Above. Would YOU want to work with them? Gods it would be like working with Trump

Novice

We haven't met any of the Gods Above.

ALKATYN

Heroes have far less autonomy than villains it seems, they are effectively working as peices moved by the heavens, not players themselves. Cat has slight issues with being bossed around. They also don't get immortality, and can't do a lot of the ruthless things Cat tends to do.

Alivaril

...Okay, I'm starting to notice a disturbing pattern of late: every time Cat gets a major victory in one chapter, the next crushes any happiness born from it. It isn't fun to read.

Jakinbandw

I mean, nothing had happened here. The pilgrim thinks he's killed Kat by pushing her into 'Death equals Redemption' but let's be fair. Kat has beaten harder stories before. While Kat is still worried about it (because the grey pilgrim is very skilled at story manipulation) I'm not. Kat is just as good if not better.

Kat just went 3 for 3 (but stories dont like that so it makes the last one ambiguous.)

ALKATYN

Re redemption equals death. She's already died at least 1.5 times, she might be able to come back again, though each time the cost is higher. Pilgrim could resurrect her, but its probably not side effect free

Morgenstern

And the argument was that she is NOT going to BE redeemed... and thus, not die, either...

shieldredblog

Hard to say what the side effects of resurrecting a villain is. She has already been resurrected but her soul never left Creation, as she was undead.

The pilgrim stated that Resurrection had side effects because souls hated being ripped from the glorious Heavens. I find this shady as all Hells.

If Cat was resurrected after a "true" death, technically he'd be ripping her soul out of the Hells? Could he even do that?

JJR

Getting ripped from the Hells might not be as hard. On the one hand the Hell Gods might take offense to the theft, on the other hand I don't expect the soul being rescued to resist in the same way the ones being taken from the heavens do. It also opens up a possible exploit in Pilgrims Redemption = Death plan. Visiting hell briefly and realizing that you are destined to end up there is a good excuse to run in the opposite direction as fast as you can. So, instead of Redemption leading to Death, Death leads to Redemption; but she can't be redeemed until after she is resurrected. And with deaths and redemption balanced out on the scales she would no longer have a guaranteed death hanging over her head.

shieldredblog

The Hells definitely seems to have a revolving door. Comparatively Heaven is shrouded in mystery. One reason I find it so shady. If it was as great as advertised, it wouldn't be so hidden.

Cat doesn't want to end up a Hero, so Death = Redemption is still bad.

MetruX

I really want you people to stop with Kat. She's Cat, it's from her name Catherine, and the K is just wrong...

Clint

That's not the only thing, this story keeps repeating the same exact events in different clothes each book.

Cat or her powers get injured and she is knocked out for awhile in each book.

Every time she starts to get ahead someone magically is 10 steps ahead.

Every time she has the ability to win before things get bad she doesn't take it for moral reasons and then turns around and acts like she won't do it next time.

Antoninjohn

The Hellgate was built on Procer silver under the First Prince's orders, in order to invade and ruin Callow. So the story has Procer playing the villain role to Callow with its massive ritual invasion and attacking with Demons and Devils

Oshi

There will be a band of 5. Whatcha wanna bet the band ain't what the Pilgrim thought it would be!

thegreatfeed

This was wonderful. I now want to test the owe's reaction to this.

ALKATYN

I suspect they will mostly not care, as long as Heiropant and Adjutant don't have to fight Praesi troops. Archer is neutral, Thief is hardcore Callowan nationalist

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You must mean the Woe? I'm as good as certain that the Owe is a group of mixed Named socialists trying to take down Mercantis' corrupt and exploitative capitalist system from the inside. It'll make a fascinating spinoff, if you're into that kind of thing.

Euodiachloris

Although... that kind of tale focusing on Walpolian levels of financial and political skullduggery would be a gripping read of its own. 😊

superkeaton

Brutal, Pilgrim.

Death Knightt

Well, it's not like you don't have a history of coming back from the dead, Cat.

Mr. Nobody

I think her soul will remain with Winter even after her possible death from the "redemption story" to enforce the Liesse Accords. (Apparently, Cat's soul is bound to Winter)

RoflCat

I think it'd be interesting if Cat ends up 'dead', then while Pilgrim was satisfied his plan work, AKUA came out to take over the body, declared herself 'successor to Catherine's will'

She could make it work too, because she's bounded to Winter, and Winter is very much Cat.
(She's also bound to Cat's body's oaths, so Thief can also act as a leash on her)

We saw how it influenced Akua's mind earlier, so Akua explaining it that way would be 'true' to Pilgrim.
Then later on Akua can just call on Winter a lot to bring Cat back, because who needs Hashmallim to resurrect you, when you've got your very own Guardian Angel....Guardian Diabolist?

RanVor

I WANNA SEE THAT SO BADLY

SpacyRicochet

We already did have the 'Die for the sake of the story, but not really'-trick happen though. Remember that Cath was Undead while fighting the Lone Swordsman, just so he could deliver the finishing blow and it not mattering.

I'm pretty sure using the same trick twice isn't how nice stories are supposed to go, so doubt it will come to that.

I favor the 'Hero's Journey' above the 'Die conveniently'.

Fuodiachloris

There are other tales of redemption, too. The reformed villain who becomes bound to the kingdom/ ideals/ people they once tried to destroy as a repentant saviour aka Merlin.

Right now, that's Pilgrim. Kind of/ ish. But, if he gets himself deaded-by-mentorship rather than archived-by-Nimue, that leaves being bound to serve a land/concept open. And, Akua might take being bound to serve the Practical Evil-style Liesse Accords over getting wiped out, letting the Good guys win or becoming a Tower fixture.

Pilgrim doesn't know he's dealing with two "redeemable" clients, here. Both quite willing to nix his game plan.

Insanenoodlyguy

Ohhh, that could work. Cat lets herself die, and then that redemption story is over... but she comes back. Free from the narrative, because she wasn't resurrected in the hero way, but by a villian.

Argentorum

Now the question is, what story will Cat try to write.

Though, in honesty, I'm surprised she didn't push for Milenza to stay, as the military leader of the host, or else pushed for the Saint instead of the Pilgrim. Obviously, she couldn't get both, but if she started with the Pilgrim, she could maybe bargain them down to sending Milenza instead of Amadis. Who knows.

As always, a great chapter.

Cicero

I would have asked for Prince Arnaud. That fellow has "dangerous snake" written all over him.

Better to keep your most dangerous enemy close.

wyaldriddler

Cat thinking that Malicia doesn't have Assassin near her or in "reach" so to speak, has basically confirmed for me that Arnaud is Assassin wearing a skin. We know he can do it.

RanVor

I thought it was because the Assassin is loyal to Black, not Malicia.

sengachi

I'm pretty sure Assassin is the one Calamity who's actually loyal to Malicia before Black.

RanVor

I'm pretty sure the only Calamity loyal to Malicia before Black is Black himself, and that's already starting to change...

Metrux

The assassin can lie to her special senses, he did so when she thought Black was gonna die, so he can't be Arnaud. Unless he is doing this just to show, or something, which I wouldn't put under him... Just would feel strange for him to do something like that.

Cicero

Err... isn't Assassin dead?

I thought he was disguised as Black and then killed by Akua in front of Cat?

