them loose to keep his seat would likely result in civil war anyway – without their diplomatic support and reputation, he was a much weaker man and their people responded only one way to weakness. And while that civil war burned, Praes would turn its attention to them. It might be that the exiled orc legionaries would return with the Tower's backing or that the Empire would raise other lords of the Steppes outside Troke's authority, to be honest the exact form didn't matter.

Whoever held the Tower would not tolerate a troublesome and rebellious bloc just like the Tribes existing in the north of the Dread Empire, so they'd intervene. Weaken and divide. The end result would likely be what the Split Tree were trying to avoid in the first place with their grand plan: southern clans tied up with the Legions and permanently at war with the fading clans further north. A buffer state the Tower could use as manpower for its armies and could never rise to become a threat to Ater.

"We will adapt," Hagvor Allspeak finally said, tone weary. "Change our approach. For this chance I thank you, Hakram Deadhand."

Hakram hummed. He did not take the implied dismissal.

"Your answer's not in closing the door," he said.

"It's even less in being eaten by the Tower," Hagvor curtly said.

"It's too late to cut ties to the degree you envisioned," he bluntly replied. "It would cost too much to too many people who have no reason to listen to you except force. But that's the wrong approach, anyway, because distance isn't what you actually want – it's just the method you decided would get you that."

"And what would you know of what we want, Adjutant?" Gulda Hardhead scorned.

Hakram wondered if she truly disliked him or whether this was a ploy. One friend, one foe, Hagvor striking the balance. Regardless, there was an odd pall on the room after she spoke. Most faces were touched with a frown, Bjarte even casting a wary look around. They can't feel the Name anymore, Hakram realized. The pressure of it. The longer the conversation had gone on, the more the last wisps of his moonlit oath had gone away. Casting the Name in his face rang wrong to their ears because he no longer held it. The chieftain considered him with wary eyes. He smiled amicably, never showing teeth.

"You want a unified orc state with strong enough foundations that the empire can't absorb it," he said. "You want to avoid the Steppes being empty because all the youths went south to the Legions, coming back only to live in Legion towns and raise their children to do the same. You want to avoid clan weavers abandoning the trade because it's easier to buy ten baskets from Okoro at a copper each, to avoid storytellers reading from Praesi books instead of learning the old sagas by rote. You want for there to be someone other than Soninke scholars able to read our glyphs in forty years."

Gulda rocked back like he'd just slapped her across the face.

"I understand what you want perfectly," Hakram Deadhand. "You're just going about it wrong."

His steel hand clasped the edge of the table, making it creak.

"You think that by making a few opportunities you'll turn our people away from Praes, but you're not looking at the numbers," he said. "You'll make a standing army at your holy grounds, but how many warriors will be able to be part of it? A thousand, five? The Legions will take anyone and make them rich. And maybe destroying the clans with ties to the empire would make room, free land and wealth, but it won't work like that in practice. Not unless you slaughter the entire clans and none one has the stomach for that so they'll move into the Empire, migrate, and then it's the same problem you thought you avoided only the border's thirty leagues south. Your fundamental mistake is that you are denying opportunities instead of offering better ones."

"We cannot outbid the Dread Empire," Hagvor quietly said.

"Then stop kneeling to it," Hakram flatly replied. "You are trying to mend this from a position of weakness that no one has forced on you but yourself."

"There's not enough support for rebellion," Gulda Hardhead told him.

Her tone was, he noted, significantly warmer than before.

"Not for secession, maybe," Hakram replied. "But rebellion? We're already rebels just by gathering here. How many clans do you think would scream their throats sore in approval, if the proposal was instead to march on Ater and cram our terms down the Tower's throat?"

"Many," Bjarte said. "But what would that solve, Deadhand? We get lenience for a generation, that is all. All the dooms are pushed back, not ended."

The white-haired chief hummed at him.

"You want to make... opportunities," she said. "That rival theirs. Only they'll be ours, not the Tower's."

"Trading with Praes, learning from it, being tied to it – this is the trend of the Steppes," Hakram said. "And it cannot be reversed without prohibitive costs. But none of these are unhealthy if they don't lead to our being digested by the Empire. And the key to that is for us to offer another way."

"There is not enough wealth in the Steppes," Bjarte said. "Ours are not rich lands, save in grass and frost."

"So why does the Empire care to assimilate us in the first place?" Hakram replied. "Manpower. Warriors. That is what we make that they want from us, Praes and Callow both. Orcs soldiers have been the backbone of the two most successful armies Calernia has seen since the days of Triumphant."

Hagvor caught on first.

"Mercenaries are illegal in Praes," she pointed out.

"Laws change at the end of a sword, in this empire," Hakram calmly said. "All the time. Why should it not be ours, for once?"

Rumbles of approval from the twins at his back. The older heads needed more, though. Could see further.

"These armies took more than orcs to be victorious," Hagvor said. "They make war in a new way. Companies, not warbands."

"Let warbands do the work of warbands and companies the work of companies," Hakram said. "If we must raid, let us raid. But battles are a soldier's trade and best left to soldiers."

They didn't like hearing it, but that was the reality of it.

"Clans can't make an army like that," Gulda Hardhead said. "Not on the move. It takes too much training for the drills. You'd need a settlement to support it."

"A settlement where the wealth of retiring legionaries could flow," he replied, "and be put to use to benefit the Clans instead of unmake them."

Many orcs who'd lived in towns and cities for decades would balk at returning to tents anyway. They all knew that. A solid roof over one's head was a comfort few liked to let go of. And while they didn't like the face of it – a town for Legion orcs, for those who wanted to leave the old ways – they'd already agreed to a city in principle. Their holy grounds for the High Lord of the Steppes would have been the same thing, only smaller and poorer and badly run.

"It might grow to threaten our ways, this settlement," Bjarte said. "The sole city of the orcs yet not bound to their ways."

"So send shamans and teachers," Hakram said. "And if you worry of the Clans being adrift, raise your holy grounds in the Steppes to rival it."

Hagvor's eyes narrowed, the eerie tint of them making them look like jewels in the light.

"You speak as if this settlement would not be in the Steppes," she said.

"No," Hakram said, "it wouldn't be."

A beat as she figured it out.

"You mean to keep this fortress," she said, sounding a little impressed.

"If the Dread Empire of Praes would keep us in the fold," Hakram Deadhand said, "then let it pay for that privilege. Lands and rights. Is that not what all the High Seats rebel over?"

Hard smiles all around. He had them, he thought. Only the mirth went away.

"Troke has made bargains with the Tower," Hagvor Allspeak finally said. "They would not pair with the path you describe."

"No," Hakram quietly agreed, "it is true that Troke Snaketooth cannot deliver this to you."

And he said nothing else, only meeting her eerie eyes with his own unflinching stare. Silence stood, stretched, stayed. Like a physical force, strong enough to cut with a knife. Until the white-haired chieftain rose to her feet, limbs cracking and back bent. Hakram did not look away.

Risen, she knelt.

"Warlord," Hagvor Allspeak swore, and so it was true.

Hakram breathed in as every other in the tent knelt the same, letting the feeling settle over him. The claim. Already he could feel his rivals. One the south, distant and faded. An old claim, long set aside but not quite gone. Grem One-Eye still stood with few equals in the eyes of his people. And another one, closer and sharper and just as aware of him as Hakram was aware of them. Troke Snaketooth had been further along his path than anyone else dreamed of.

And so, Hakram thought, it would end in red.

—

Within the hour Troke Snaketooth gave answer.

With unfortunately characteristic cunning, the chief struck where no one had expected him to. Four fires erupted across the camp, which was not unusual given the loose approach of some clans to precautions against this, but these were no accidents. They burned down three of the largest repositories of dried meat in the great camp surrounding Chagoro and the largest tent of the Brazen Bird Clan – whose territories near seaside salt flats made the main trader of salt in the Steppes and the sole clan to have brought a large amount of it to the taratoplu. Troke had burned the food reserves and the ingredient needed to preserve butchered animals. Clans would now live on the cattle they could butcher, which would not last a week. Three, four days at best.

Now that a rival had appeared Troke meant to force a vote while he still had numbers and the wind in his sail.

It was a good strategy, Hakram was forced to admit. The chief of the Blackspears tried to summon the clans into the fortress barely an hour after the fires, claiming they needed discussion, which would make things even worse. It would deny Hakram time to grow his support: the Split Tree were mustering like-minded clans in his behalf, but those talks would take time. Two hours was not long enough. It was Oghuz who found a solution: he ordered some of his warriors to terrify their own clan's herds and let the cattle loose, resulting into a stampede away from the camp. The Red Shield refused the summons, as they urgently needed to gather back their sheep and pigs.

Oghuz's champions then loudly implied that this scattering was no accident and that all of Troke's opponents might come to face the same troubles, which had enough clans wary of the Blackspears the Snaketooth had to push back the talks until sundown.

Torches lit up the great hall of the fortress of Chagoro, which in truth had been the mess hall before being made into gathering grounds for the Clans. No more than three heads could enter by clan, which still meant more than six hundred orcs packed tight between the walls. Each chieftain came with a painted shield, their vote to cast, though counting them could get... combative. Accusations of miscounting or lies were common and usually settled in blood – every chief had come tonight with a champion among their three. The Blackspears and their allies had come first, at least an hour early, so they had the back of the hall to themselves and an imposing position. They looked many and strong, which mattered more than most like to admit.

Hakram would make Troke rue that trick before all said and done.

He came as one of the three for the Howling Wolves, standing with the clans of his birth as the shaman whose day it was to officiate – a woman from the Arrant Axes, a Blacksphear ally – sang one of the old songs of praise to the Hungry Gods and reiterated these to be truce grounds. Only duels would be allowed here, no red fights. Unsurprisingly, though half a dozen chiefs clamoured to be the first to speak it was Troke who was chosen by the shaman. The chieftain of the Blackspears was a tall and well-formed orc, with short choppy hair and three golden rings in each cheek that made the pale scars on his face stand out. He was not built as thickly as some orcs, but as a warrior he was second in his clan only to his husband.

Skarod Longaxe, the envoy that had come to Wolof and now stood at his husband's side with cold eyes. Hakram would rather avoid fighting that one. There were a lot of dirty jokes about the reason for that wedding being that Skarod should have been called Longspear instead, but the champion was one of the finest killers in the Steppes. He'd killed three dozen warriors in duels without taking a wound, it was said, and only gotten better since. Hakram was not certain he would win should they fight.

"We're about to go hungry," Troke Snaketooth said.

His speaking voice was smooth and carried clearly. That'd been practised, Hakram was sure of it. The man had always been ambitious. There were murmurs among the assembled orcs, but no great exclamation of disagreement or surprise. Most chiefs had either put it together or made a friend who had, by now, though only the two larger alliances would have a decent idea of the days left before it happened.

"Three days, my shamans say," Troke revealed. "Three days before we'd forced to leave behind this fortress and the choice we're meant to make here."

He swept the hall with his gaze.

"Shame," Troke Snaketooth snarled. "Shame on you, on us. How long are we going to stand here quibbling when Praes lies open to our south? Are we going to have to skulk back to the Steppes with our tails between our legs because we couldn't agree on how to swallow the meat in our maws?"

A chief from the far north took offence to that and was given turn to speak by the shaman, but though the man was right that High Lord of the Steppes was a larger choice than what Troke pretended it was not a popular refrain with the hall. Seeing that, the man turned insulting and that was a mistake. Challenges were traded and Skarod Longaxe stepped forward. The chief's two warriors were slain and his own leg crippled as Skarod forced three duels back-to-back. It was a statement, meant to cow smaller clans, but Hakram thought it a mistake. Skarod had taken no wound and tiredness would pass, but if Troke sent out his husband on his behalf too often he'd look like a coward.

The next challenge he'd have to field himself, Hakram thought, or take a hit to his reputation.

Other chiefs stepped forward to accuse Troke of using the situation to grab power, but all toed the line and their accusations weren't winning the hall so they petered out. No one wanted to fight the Blackspears if it won them no support. It wasn't going to be that easy to call for a vote, though. A chieftain from the east, baring her teeth wildly, tossed out a different sort of challenge.

"You speak for you and yours, Troke, but there are others," she said. "Other claims. Will Dag Clawtoe not speak up, if he seeks to be our Warlord?"

That hadn't been arranged, though if it took much longer Hegvor had seen to it someone else would speak along the same lines. Chiefs just liked seeing bears fight in the pit, so many were willing to get that fight started themselves if need be. Only this time it was Hakram who stepped forward, axe at his hip. He could feel Troke's stare on him, the recognition of the claim. The hatred from him and soon his husband. They'd not know for sure until now, then.

"Dag Clawtoe is not who we would we acclaim for Warlord," Hakram said. "I am."

Surprise, some laughter – he was a cripple, after all – but more murmurs. After the initial beat, though, the sound of blades on shields. All save three of the clans that'd supported Dag for Warlord were making known their support of him. Fools had listened to the nose, Hakram knew, but the clever had been counting shields. The shaman called for silence, then reluctantly granted him the right to address the hall.

"You've heard of me," he said, without false humility. "I've fought more battles than anyone in this hall, led armies to victory in the west. I've killed fae and Revenants, monsters and Named. I've been to Arcadia and back, walked beneath the gates of Keter and seen the First Prince of Procer kneel. I'm Hakram Deadhand."

He stared down the hall.

"You've heard of me," he gravelled.

Blades on shields, not only from his allies this time. His people did like a good boast. It didn't mean votes, but it meant he was being heard.

"I stand for Warlord by the weight of my deeds," he said, using the old turn of phrase. "Let them raise or bury me."

A voice finally cut through, belatedly given right to speak by the shaman.

"You're one of the Black Queen's," a chief shouted. "Are we going to kneel to Callow? Fuck that."

"That oath came to an end," Hakram said. "I am the Adjutant no longer."

A beat of silence, an idea.

"Do you not agree, Snaketooth?" he added.

Troke looked unpleasantly surprised at being called on, hesitating at the answer. I win whatever you do, Hakram thought. Either the Blackspear would lie and deny their shared claim, an action that would weight on any confrontation between them afterwards – a finger on the scales, Catherine would put it – or Hakram would be vouched for by his strongest rival. A word none would gainsay.

"He's not the Adjutant," Troke said, and tried to speak but shouting drowned him out.

The shaman called for silence.

"He's not the Adjutant," Troke repeated, "but he's worse. You're a guest, Hakram Deadhand. You left for the Legions and now you come back for the crown Callow can't give you. What would you know of the Steppes?"

Rumbles of approval. Particularly the northern clans, from the Lesser Steppes or close. Some of those thought it suspicious when orcs even talked to humans, much less fought at their side.

"I am an orc," Hakram laughed. "What more do I need to know?"

That landed too, to Troke's visible distaste. Orcs were not so united in their answers about what it meant to be one of their kind that everyone – or even most – in this hall would agree with what Snaketooth would mean by it.

"Funny, though, that making war west would make my scalp less green in your eyes," he continued. "Do you enjoy killing other orcs so very much, Troke?"

Blades on shields. The Blackspears were not beloved even if they were on the rise. They'd crossed many of the clans closest to them over the years, some under Troke himself. The Snaketooth was wise enough not to engage in that, which left room for another chief to speak up and keep questioning whether Hakram was a Callowan spy or not. The woman insulted him quite bluntly, obviously looking for a duel, but Hakram wouldn't fight her himself. Her clan was too small for that and she was likely looking to make a name through this. He looked back, and though Dag was visibly eager to be called on Hakram spoke another name.

"Oghuz."

The old orc laughed, appreciative. Oghuz the Lamé's blade stayed in its sheath as he walked up to fight Chieftain Sarai of the Drifting Leaves. In front of a crowd of hundreds, the old champion brutally beat to death the challenger with his blackwood cane. All it cost him was a cut on his bared arm, which some in the hall would recognize as a habit from his old champion days: there was one such scar on his arm for every kill he'd made duelling. It was not a statement as bold as Troke's, but it served as a stark warning for anyone trying to make a name off of fighting him: try it and you might be remembered as a figure of fun instead.

The right to speak was spread around after that, the shaman granting it to every chieftain trying to drum up support for their own candidature as Warlord – or High Lord of the Steppes, as some took a page from Troke's book instead. Neither Hakram nor the Blackspears spoke up again, not openly anyway. The alliances behind both of them sent people to speak with other clans at the back of the hall, trying to buy support of their own more quietly. For all that many oaths had been given outside this hall, there was a long tradition of deciding which horse to eat only at the very last moment.

Maybe an hour passed and people were getting restless. Dag came to him as Hakram listened to the chief and shaman of the Ice Eaters, who was promising that he knew a ritual involving bathing in human blood that would give magic to all orcs should he be chosen as Warlord. Well, he was definitely standing out from the others.

"We're up to fifty-four," Dag told him. "Troke's nearing on ninety, we think."

Hakram nodded, thinking.

"Call a vote," he said.

Dag looked confused but nodded anyway. An allied chief asked for the right to speak after the Ice Eaters chief left in sullen silence and used it to call for an acclamation, a demand the hall took up with relish. It was rare for an assembly to last so long without a vote being called, often one was asked at the very start, to make it plain where everyone stood before the talks began. Troke smelled something was wrong, Hakram thought, because otherwise it would not have been wariness on his face. All those who would stand for Warlord or High Lord strode out, and without further ceremony shields began to be tossed as their feet. Troke and Hakram's supporters threw their shields quickly, already convinced, but most of the hall did not. A handful of other chiefs earned about thirty shields between them, but most clans were holding off to see what happened to the leading candidates.

That patience was rewarded when the Split Tree Clan and its seventeen closest allies walked right past Troke to throw their shields at Hakram's feet. They moved to stand with the alliance after, to roars of surprise in the hall. Hakram almost smiled, because suddenly the back of the hall that Troke had claimed and filled no longer looked like a solid wall of support. It looked a little empty while staying very, very visible. Didn't I say I'd make you rue that trick? The final counts were hard to be certain of, but Hakram trusted his eyes: seventy-two to eighty-one. Troke had received more support than expected but the gap had closed.

Now everyone in the hall knew that this ended with one of them the victor, so the real fight began.

Champions first. It was a roughly even trade of victories and defeats, with little unexpected save that Dag distinguished himself by winning thrice – though, unlike Skarod Longaxe, not in consecutive duels. The first few duels were without rancour, but by the seventh the tone had changed. Champions went for kills, not blood, and enmities were made. Without a clear victor in the violence, the fight was passed on and so Hakram stepped out of the crowd as Troke did. Armed, both of them, but it wouldn't begin with steel.

"Deadhand," Troke Snaketooth said, enunciating every syllable. "Pretty name. How did you get it again?"

"When I faced a hero and lived," Hakram replied. "Without a Name of my own."

"When you lost a hand to a hero," Troke said. "Only you've lost more than that since. How much orc is there left in you, Deadhand?"

It'd been a certainty the man would bring up the crippling, but Hakram still had to push down a grimace. He was past doubting himself over what he had lost, but his kind had poor opinions of the crippled. Having borne a Name – still having a Name, for those who did not understand the details and there would be many – made up for it some, as such things were forgiven in the renowned. Grem famously lacked an eye and was not held in contempt for it. But that was only an eye. Hakram had lost three limbs, nearly a quarter of his body was steel and bone.

Even among those who supported him, many faces agreed.

"All orc, where it matters," a woman's voice called out.

Hungry Gods, was that Sigvin? Whoever it'd been there was a gale of laughter as Troke bit down on a scowl. That was one way to disarm the line of argument, Hakram supposed.

"You like to talk about who I am," Hakram noted. "Who you are."

"Because I don't know you, Deadhand," Troke said. "Who here does? You boast you've fought in many wars, but what I hear is that you've fought for everyone but us."

Hakram snorted.

"Us, Troke?" he said. "Who's that? How many of the clans in this hall get to be called us?"

"We're orcs," Troke scoffed. "We get-"

"We're nothing," Hakram cut through.

Something like glee passed through Snaketooth's eyes as rumbles of anger passed through the hall. Troke kept silent, all the better to give Hakram enough rope to hang himself with. The tall orc cast a long look around, unmoved by the anger.

"You don't like hearing that?" he said. "Good, you shouldn't. It doesn't make it untrue."

He gestured around them.

"Look at us, huddling in a Soninke fortress arguing which Praesi city we should sack before we run back to the Steppes," Hakram scorned. "Half the armies on Calernia are fighting the greatest war this continent has ever seen and what does Troke Snaketooth offer you – Nok?"

He laughed, sharp and mocking.

"The least of the High Seats, and after the Ashurans already looted it," Hakram said. "For that privilege we're supposed to lick the Tower's hands like loyal hounds?"

"So you want us to lick Procer's arse instead," Troke said. "Is that what you're getting at? We ought to sign up with the Grand Alliance and go die for some fucking idiot princes in some nowhere out west? So much for the fucking War College."

Laughter and blades on shields. The War College was disliked by some, Procer by nearly all. Callow was respected, in a way, but the Principate? It was the decadent idiot of orc stories, the avatar of excess and cupidity. There was not a thimble of esteem for the Principate of Procer to be gathered in this entire hall.

"Procer's not my trouble," Hakram dismissed. "But this kind of talk, Troke? It's why I called us nothing."

The Snaketooth had a wary glint in his eye. Last time that utterance had not burned Hakram like the other orc had thought it would. The tall orc instead turned to the chiefs around them, the clans.

"In five hundred years, when they talk of the fall of Keter, the war to end all wars – what will they say of the orcs?" Hakram asked the hall. "Where will the Clans be in that story?"

He sneered.

"Knifing each other over a few dozen chest of loot while the real powers of Calernia carve the land up into great realms, the empires of the coming age. That's what it gets you, playing the Tower's game."

"So you want us to rebel, like Callow-"

"You talk more of Callow than I do, Troke," Hakram cuttingly replied. "Do you need a recommendation to enrol in its army?"

Hard laughter, not kind to the chieftain of the Blackspears. It put the man on the back foot long enough for Hakram to keep speaking.

"We became part of the Dread Empire of Praes because of the promises made under the Declaration," he said. "Do you think those promises were kept?"

Rumbles of approval.

"Well?" Hakram challenged. "Do you?"

Shouts, some harder to parse than others, but the screams of NO were clear.

"If the Praesi don't keep their end of the bargain, then why are we still on our knees?"

Blades on shields. Troke's face darkened. He was losing the hall and knew it.

"High Lord of the Steppes," Hakram scorned. "What a way to call burying your head in the sand. Troke offers you Nok and Malicia's blessing, do you want to know what I offer?"

YES, the assembly shouted.

"I give you Ater and all the Tower owes us," Hakram said.

A roar.

"I give you Keter, riches and glory for a hundred years," Hakram said.

The roar grew.

"And when we come home at last, we'll raise a city from the stones we took from theirs," Hakram Deadhand thundered. "One great enough that even in a thousand years they will tremble at the return of our Horde!"

The roar drowned out everything, and as it rose something grew within Hakram. Sharpened, refined it. And, the tall orc thought as he met Troke Snaketooth's eyes, the same thing was weakening inside his rival. The tide was turning, and that meant there was only one way for Troke to win now. The chieftain of the Blackspears slowly unsheathed his sword as the roar finally died down.

"Castles in the sky," Troke Snaketooth bit out. "Their fall will kill us all. Answer for that, Deadhand, with a blade."

"If you champion nothing, Troke," Hakram replied as he took his axe in hand, "that is the sole prize you can win."

The other orc was quick. Quicker than he should be, even as tall as he was. There was an unnatural swiftness to his limbs, the kind that came from a claim settled into one's bones. Hakram was fresher to his own, but he knew Names in a way that Troke did not. The chieftain's slash found only steel as Hakram turned and let his arm take it, while he continued to pivot and swung at the man's head. Troke dropped below the blow before the arc had even begun and Hakram bared his teeth. He knew how to win. They broke and circled each other as feet stomped against stone and blades against shields, their steps careful until Hakram went on the offensive.

A wild chop, cutting down with the beginnings of Name strength, but Troke caught the haft of the axe with the side of his blade and withstood it. Hakram drew back and the chieftain's footing shifted as he gathered momentum, preparing for a throat that would go through Hakram's throat. But then the tall orc took a hand off his axe, his bone one, and slapped at the side of Troke's head. It was a blow that'd hurt but not kill. Catherine would have taken it and finished the thrust, Indrani would already be wrenching her swords of his eyes. But Troke had not yet learned to set aside the instincts of a Name, and so he went to block the slap with his sword instead of finishing the thrust. He'd begun to move before his mind could catch up to the choice.

And so Hakram caught the blade in his dead hand and smiled. He squeezed, steel grinding against bone with a horrid sound, and then the sword broke. Troke's eyes widened and he was pulling away, but the man found the head of Hakram's axe resting against the side of his neck. Someone let out a hoarse shout behind them. The Snaketooth's gaze did not waver.

"I knew it might end this way," Troke said, grinning ruefully. "But I was hungry, Deadhand."

He breathed out.

"No regrets. Finish it."

That was the way, wasn't it? The red, blood and rage and victory all in one. But he'd never had the red in his blood before, so why start? Hakram's axe drew back and he swung, Troke's eyes closing as the flat side of the axe head came to rest against his neck.

"It is finished," Hakram said.

The man's eyes opened in startled surprise.

"I have a use for you, Troke Snaketooth," the Warlord said.

All around them shields were cast down and orcs knelt. The shaman had not called for acclamation, but some things were beyond ceremony. Two hundred shields fell at his feet, as inevitable as the coming of dawn. It was done. The Warlord thought of a moonlit oath, then, and part of him felt like weeping.

But it was done, raised and buried.

Linus42

I mean I did expect Hakram to get Warlord. Didn't expect this followup so quick but I guess it makes sense. Hakram is kinda on the clock to show up and be relevant to Ater. A fast resolution to the plot though, Hakram has a merciful streak kinda like Akua. Granted I suppose it makes sense the opposition is brand new character really so how much difficulty can it cause.

Wonder

I just couldn't resist taking a page from InsaneNoodlyguy's book;

"And when we come home at last, we'll raise Our Story from the votes we took from theirs," Hakram Deadhand thundered. "One great enough that even in a thousand years they will tremble at the return of our EE".

Insanenoodlyguy

I love you.

Tenthyr

It helps Warlord is an established name. Unlike Catherine, Hakram doesn't need to spend his time hacking creation into the right shape to make his.

Insanenoodlyguy

It was badly crippled though, due to their cultures ties to Praes. Troke was finding a way to fit his hand in that bent glove, Hakram just twisted it back into shape.

Thanatoss

Good point

Stormblessed

Damn that was so fast. If it had been Catherine's story it would've went on for a long time, but I suppose it couldn't go on for too long here.

Still, it was enjoyable and one of the final lines " The Warlord thought of a moonlit oath, then, and part of him felt like weeping." really packs quite a punch.

aurikdomi

A punch right to the feels yeah.

irritantseraphim

Yeah. Literal tears in my eyes. Hope that he and Cat can stay together, somehow.

shikkarasu

Hakram doesn't want to abandon her, but work with her as an allied ruler. Cat considers him her oldest friend. And if Fate meddles in this? Cat has been working on a way to physically stab Fate since Book 1, it best back off if it knows what's good for it.

Yeah, the nature of their friendship may be changing, but they will always be together in some capacity.

Liliet

Not physically together presumably, but they'd been apart a bunch of time ever since the Northern Crusade anyway. Hakram was always too good to be stuck doing Cat's laundry.

Scrying exists ^^

ruduen

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

I do think he and Cat are going to have a lot to work through. Here's hoping they can keep up the pace until the Tower's dealt with, and at least have a night for drinks before it comes time to head back to the war with Keter.

Linnus42

Also eh Look Aisha and Juniper confirmation.
Poor Cat probably going to get drunk and bang someone random....Barrow?

Still Hakram going his own way does make me wonder again what Hanno and Hakram are beefing about and how all these new names and new leaders is going to shift the GA balance of power. Next Leadership meeting and Named meeting will be interesting heck they might basically be the same with generals included lol.

Liliet

I think Cat had already once thought of how Aisha was gorgeous but she was NOT getting in between her and Juniper if you paid her.

Junaisha is still ??? in many respects but that everyone can see SOMETHING is happening and that something is indeed happening has long been canon ♥

KageLupus

One of the recent chapters basically confirmed that Juniper is into Aisha, they both know it, and they also know she won't act on it while they are on campaign (which they've been on in one way or another for basically years on end).

My guess is a very cute little "where are they now" section of an interlude where they are officially shackled up once the war with Keter ends and the Army of Callow can finally go on leave.

Liliet

Well, Juniper being into Aisha is not exactly RECENTLY confirmed... ♥

Charles

Rest in peace, Adjutant.

dadycool

The Adjutant is dead. Long live the Warlord!

RoflCat

And now we say hi to the Jailer with moonlit rejection under her resume and very thirsty for our Warden.

Insanenoodlyguy

No. Cat explained her plan to us too soon. And we already know Akua just isn't hearing the song. It won't go how Cat plans.

Zach

Yeah, Catherine fucked up by internally monologuing her plan. Now it's guaranteed to not work out as she expects it to, lol

Cpt. Obvious

Personally I think no one, girl or not, is going to be climbing the Tower anytime soon. Akua isn't hearing the song because Amadeus is going to use all the goblinfire the tribes were able to scrape together to turn the Tower and all the crazy it contains into the largest torch in Creation.

Then he and Cat will fight about who will be the next ruler of Praes. And the winner will be whoever scares fate the most.

Now the real question is if the intercesior can keep her grubby hands out of this.

kylepcarlson4577

I just get the feeling The Dead King still has the best long game here. I think Akua is really on the chopping block for being killed off, likely for good this time. I also think the Wandering Bard will take a crap all over Cat's jail plan for her own mysterious reasons, whatever they are. The Wandering Bard wants something big involving The Dead King's Name. Maybe including her own freedom/death or something by the end of it.

Miles

I love that the last time he used an aspect it was to Find the way to get the Warlord Name.

Isaac Martinez

Cat would be so proud of him... And maybe pick something in exchange for that broken oath. Catherine no longer wishes to rule, and Hakram is now who wields the knife for his people.

...Could it be a new cycle? Will a new Adjutant be born for the New Warlord? Mixing Praesi and Horde cultures?

caoimhinh

Heh, the next Adjutant is probably Abigail's right hand.

ninegardens

Abigail would hate it so much.

And we readers in turn, would love it.

beleester

Abigail already has Scribe, but close enough.

Earl of Purple

Scribe's in Praes right now, and she's had Krolem longer besides. Abigail's accidentally found her way into one of Cat's grooves- Callowan nobody, promoted to officer, has a reputation as a good tactician and a brave fighter. If Abigail gets a Name, then Krolem- as her right-hand orc, the man behind and to one side to pass her wine when she wants it, will probably get Adjutant. But Abigail's too scared to want a Name, and probably won't get one.

Insanenoodlyguy

I just realized that Abigail is probably the new Warden of the East if such does end up existing.

Zach

Named are almost invariably defined by having some strong belief they want to impose on themselves or the world, and Abigail doesn't have such a belief.

agumentic

Named are defined by having a Role and a story. Belief one wants to impose is one way to get those, but not the only one, as the oft-brought example of baby Cursed shows.

OutliveTheHand

Remember that the Hierarch was adamantly opposed to getting a name. He just wanted to be left alone. The tyrant forced him into it. If Kairos can force someone into a name I'm sure Cat could force Abigail into a name.

Insanenoodlyguy

I just realized that Abigail is probably the new Warden of the East if such does end up existing.

Jason Ipswitch

AS Hackram comes into his name, it makes me think about how big Cat's name is going to be, with everything leading up to it. There's definitely room for a Warden of the East to match the Warden of the West, but I don't think that's a big enough name for Cat, now. Whatever her "Overseer or Named" Name is, it won't be Warden of the East.

But you know who would make a good Warden of the East? Amadeus of the Green Stretch.

Casey Glick

I'm still betting on Akua, because it's hilarious. Warden/Mashall/Protector of the East is going to be a different name from Dread Emperor/press of Praes, and it seems decently likely that Amadeus and Akua are going to be the two. But Amadeus' story has been about Praes and securing for it a new future. It is Akua who has been caught between the stories of the two.

But mostly it would be fucking hilarious.

Insanenoodlyguy

Crackship moment: Akua becomes the Thirst of the East, married to the orcs hunger. She sympathizes with the person on the other end of the spectrum, one who knows attraction but has been hurt by Cat in a way that can't be forgotten. And so Hanno and Akua start doing it and never stop.

Big I

Could be Arch Heretic of the East. Could be something like Overlord or Dark Lord, which would be a very meta take on the "Evil Overlord" trope.

Miles

Still? The dead horse has been eaten what are you even trying to get by beating its chewed up bones?

Metalshop

I honestly think her Role is going to end up being bigger than Warden of a direction for the simple reason that her story spans the whole continent. Everyone in basically every faction in every nation, tribe, or polity on Calernia knows about her and has to account for her behavior and her resources when planning their course of action. The only exceptions to that are the rats, with whom she's had no interactions with living individuals. In literally every other case, she figures as at least a major player in whatever narrative is happening at both the continental scale and at the national level.

She's going to end up in Triumphant's weight class purely on narrative face time accrued while in transition between Names.

Reader in the Night

And so the Woe take a massive blow. Though Hakram is still of the Woe, his final loyalty can never be to the Woe, and so their power dynamics (or how close their sit is to the fire, to use Akua's metaphor) shift.

Vivienne got away with never having her final loyalty be to the Woe, but she was also the most distant member and at times even questioned her position in them. Now Hakram is in the same position, only worse because his loyalty is not to Callow.

This could have the interesting consequence of Hakram questioning his place in the Woe and Vivienne reassuring him, in an interesting reversal of a conversation held in Laure what feels like a lifetime ago.

Liliet

> his final loyalty can never be to the Woe,

This was true of Cat and Vivienne both already. Hakram is only joining the club. Woe was never the kind of circle that demanded loyalty to itself above all. Just a group of friends respecting each other's causes.

dadycool

And Masego was just along for the ride.

Ed

No, Masego is still loyal to what he always was and always will be. Scruting the inscrutable, demystifying the mysterious, tearing forbidden knowledge from it's musty recesses and holding it close to his heart. His loyalties will never change.

Reader in the Night

Yeah? I said as much in the post, I didn't even imply Hakram wasn't part of the Woe. There will just be a large shift from being Cat's Right Hand/Shadow to being a Head-of-State in his own standing (and by definition, trusted with less).

... Also, I just realized that Hakram's oath to Cat needed to die because he named her his Warlord, and the Warlord cannot have a Warlord of his own.

Liliet

Yep!

Liliet

...Now I'm curious if Catherine could feel this on her end.

anyway HELL YEAH HELL YEAH HELL YEAH!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

Darkening

She definitely is going to feel something when he stops being Adjutant, she's mentioned a number of times how his name complemented hers and she could feel him. Probably less strong with her currently unformed name, but she's definitely going to feel something disappear. And probably assume he's dead or something.

dadycoool

It's extremely fortunate that not only did Hakram already start to fade in relevance back out East, but Cat's Name is evolving in such a way that Adjutant isn't as intrinsic to it the way it was to her former roles. Then again, Adjutant was more Cat's personal extra limb than any of her Names' or Roles'.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure Adjutant has been losing the relevance of his Role since Book 4, when Indrani started playing the role of Cat's confidante and therapist and Vivienne started covering the blind spots of her and Hakram put together. His relationship with this fact has been deteriorating pretty badly, what with his jealousy of people taking on minute aspects of his job – I do not think Book 2 Hakram would get into a competition about who got to hand Cat her cloak ffs Ever since they made it to big leagues, the writing was on the wall that Hakram's best was moving in a direction separate from being Cat's shadow. He was still her best friend and he held onto the shadow thing tooth and claw but like I said it was turning increasingly toxic. He's always been more interested in ruling and administrating than Catherine herself, they would end up separating invariably when she got to her dream retirement – either that, or one of them would have accepted being miserable for the sake of staying with the other, and wow, no.

Liliet

I think she'll be able to distinguish he isn't, or at least believe that it's an alternative viable explanation. This story is Like That and I love this about it.

That said? If she can't tell either way THIS GETS EVEN MORE FUN HEEEEEE

dadycoool

Cat: "Oh no, Hakram's dead. Much sadness."

Cat: Lays siege to Ater

Hakram: shows up to help with the entire Hoard

Cat: ^_^

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, I think it's refined enough to know that. She said she'd know if Black was truly dead, and he was close to it by multiple definitions at that point. I'm guessing if Hakram died, she'd feel pain and anger and know he was gone. Instead, I'm guessing she felt a very similar sadness to the one Hakram felt and knows her Adjutant is no longer l.

Yunamed

Yeah. Like losing a sixth sense, no one to throw her burdens onto. No one to forge her signatures now.

Casey Glick

I cannot believe for a second that Hakram wouldn't forge one of Cat's signatures should the opportunity arise.

The "Black Queen" will be providing resources to the Steppes long after Cat disappears. "The signature matches the one one file", says the bank teller.

Mental Mouse

I can imagine a black crow appearing amidst the gathered orcs, to deliver Cat's congratulations and perhaps a few gifts.

Liliet

...Eh, she's got Scribe.

And Vivienne can put her own signatures on stuff now!

Juff

Typo Thread:

barked as his > barked at his considering he knew > considering what he knew mediated and how he > mediated, he and cut of > and a cut of bring him from > bring him in from that's been a > that was a authority, to be honest (either add a but or change to semicolon) none one > no one
One the south > One in the south made the main > made them the main Red Shield refused > Red Shields refused
Blackspears the Snaketooth > Blackspears that Snaketooth most like to admit > most liked to admit before all said > before all was said the clans of his birth > the clan of his birth we'd forced > we'd be forced They'd not know > They'd not known listened to the nose, > listened to the noise, would weight > would weigh being called, often > being called; often dozen chest > dozen chests swords of his eyes > swords out of his eyes

therealgridlock

"preparing for a throat that would go through Hakram's throat."

>Thrust that would

therealgridlock

Let it be known that the Deadhand is stronger than any pretender's blade!

Hail, Hakram!
Hail, Deadhand!
Hail, Warlord!

mamm0nn

I know Adjudant was already Named and thus it was easier to transition into Warlord, but still. We should've seen Warlords rise amongst the orcs in the last few centuries if the Name is still available, especially if the likes of the Blackspear was already well on his way to get it at the time of blooming. We've seen and heard of Named becoming for lesser reasons than the stakes here, after all, and Warlord is far from a forgotten Name to resurface or come with a specific Role that orcs rarely dabble in.

therealgridlock

Fact of the matter is, until now, the orcs weren't united. They were a people left struggling and inundated by new culture.

Now, for the first time in decades, they are unifying. That's why names are coming to the fore.

Hakram was right, they were nothing. They were nothing, they did nothing, they had no great stories to fulfil. Adjutant proved that orcs still had a role to play in the conflicts on calernia. Warlord proves that they finally have a purpose to unite under once again.

It isn't coincidence that it is all coming together for a climactic battle at the Tower, because after that's settled? There's only one book left, conquering death.

dadycool

In addition, Grem actually was a Claimant, so he's likely had the echoes of Warlord for decades, except he and the Steppes were so established as subservient to Black and Ater that he couldn't get away with saying that he was truly leading his people the way a Warlord should.

therealgridlock

Very true. Forgot about that bit. Likely Black had a hand in convincing him to just hold on to it and do nothing. Or Grem is smart enough to figure out what was best on his own. Hopefully it doesn't come to too many blows between Grem and Hakram, that would be a scary fight.

Mincheriit

I doubt they would come to blows over the name, iirc it was mentioned that grem's claim felt old and accepted that it would be or something. I took that as he could have become or worked on his claim to warlord but let it go.

Insanenoodlyguy

I suspect it will be gentler. The fight itself may happen between forces, but Hakram is already Warlord. I think Gren will acknowledge this is the correct way of things and that will be that.

Mental Mouse

He might also be able to announce to whoever's nearby, that a Warlord has been chosen.

Miles

Grem can get another name now, now that that claim is settled.

Maybe he'll be Amadeus's Adjutant.

Liliet

Pretty sure Grem could already get another Name. He was just never the Adjutant type.

mamm0nn

Except of course that in the centuries since the Miezian occupation, there would've been plenty of times for the orcs to unite against various threats. Not to mention the Tower's occupation and slavery conscription being a constant reason for orcs to unite and rebel.

You can't tell me that after centuries, now is the first time ever that the orcs thought that 'Yeah, maybe we should try to do something together, you guys.'. That there hasn't been a single orc hero or chieftain with a power bloc or suitable Role to become the Warlord. A Name that is literally just about being strong and gathering the tribes to be loyal towards you, something orcs have been doing constantly. Other Names like Shining Prince have been popping up regularly for much less.

Right now is one of the least likely times for a Warlord to rise, because orcs are neither powerful nor weak right now, and inevitably just part of a larger tale. The orcs aren't truly united in a brutal fight to break the mold, and Deadhand isn't the archetype of a Warlord.

Hell, he doesn't even want to change things to his own will by violence and might, as is Below's creed. Might makes Right. Warlord is a penultimate form of that, yet here we see someone who doesn't seek to just conquer until the conquering stops or the country is in shambles. He seeks to break the Tower not with his own might, but because he wants to strike a balance in the orc's lifestyle. That's not a Warlord, and if he suffices then there should've been dozens of Warlords in the last few centuries that would've been more the stereotype. This is just going against how we've been told Names work.

Earl of Purple

It's like Procer. The orcs only had enough weight for Names when united, and after the Miezans destroyed the Broken Antler Horde, the clans of the Northern Steppe have had very little to do with the south. They lost all their magic-users, the Gift almost entirely removed from their population, a whole raft of Names that would go with that disappearing as a consequence. And not just the Names- the role the shamans played, as mediators, diplomats, spiritual guides and keepers of history, they all went too.

They haven't unified because Praes kept them at arm's length, it swooped in every so often and grabbed a bunch of orcs from the nearest clans and forced them into war and few to none ever returned. In exchange, the orcs... got very little. There was no trade, for the orcs had no wealth. There was raiding, but most was internecine, and a clan that raided the Soninke too often would likely be destroyed by the High Lords. Without shamans to keep the orcs together, and intervene in conflicts before they grew out of hand, they could not unify. Too many feuds, and the Praesi didn't affect every clan, just the ones in the south. Until forty years ago, when Grem One-Eye managed to get a claim on Warlord, but he backed down at the last minute to get orcs trained as soldiers, instead of used as fodder. Maybe other orcs have been claimants for Warlord in the past, but got murdered by Praesi assassins or killed in a duel or even shot by a Deoraithe on the Wall before they could actually cement that claim.

mamm0nn

Praes swooping in to grab some orcs and all that stuff to keep them divided seems like exactly the kind of stuff that would birth a Warlord with the Role to unify. And while some may indeed die to assassins or war, they would've still felt the Claim (which orcs haven't felt for years for no reason until Hakram) and the ones that avoid such fate as is a Name's wont would've only been more likely and quickly to ascend to a Name. What you're saying is only more reason that there should've been orc Named before, not a reason for their complete absence. And the Miezan slaying killed a whole lot of Named culture, sure, but the Warlord faith remained and became only stronger for it.

Liliet

> the ones that avoid such fate as is a Name's wont would've only been more likely and quickly to ascend to a Name.

It is really, really not this easy to accomplish, and much much easier than you're imagining to swat down whenever it starts trying to crop up.

mamm0nn

You wouldn't start swatting it down until a Name is blossoming, most Dread Emperors weren't as learned in Name lore nor with a farsighted policy to assassinate possible Names the way Black did, and the moment that a Name even has Claimants we're already at the point that orcs would know it's possible for them to get Names. By the time Praes would know who to snuff out, it's already too late to make orcs think they can't have Names.

Liliet

Orcs did know they could have Names, they just never managed to.

TeK

Well, they clearly actually tried to unite, and there has been claimants to the Warlord, the latest one being Grem, but noone managed to succeed. That is why the claim is still alive all this years. It did, however, change, as did the orks. So now the Name means something else, as should be the case in the dawn of the new Age.

Shveiran

I believe it was mentioned in Book 2 that Grem was the first (known) orc claimant to a Name since a very long time. I'm not sure how many there have been before.

therealgridlock

Don't forget, Captain killed one of their gods. That likely had had something to do with why it's taken so long to make a new Name.

Fact of the matter is, idunno what you want me to say, the story implies they had no reason for names, that they weren't united, didn't have a role to play in the stories.

Feel free to criticise the story, if you think it a bit absurd, but the story we are reading is the main story, we don't know much about what's not talked about in the story. All we do know is names pop up around Cat like they're going out of style.

Maybe black killed all their other claimants like he did heroes in Callow. Maybe the cultural zeitgeist was happy just eating meat and staying away from the rest of the politics.

But the author says there aren't any, or haven't been any notable ones/that we know of. Arguing with that point is a bit like telling god he is doing his job wrong. If we don't like it, we can opt out any time we like.

I agree, feel free to criticise his writing. Maybe it is unrealistic, but all the author has to say is "there's a reason for it. That's why it's written that way" and all your arguments are moot.

mamm0nn

I'm not talking about the last 50 years or so since Captain killed a demigod of theirs and Black was around. I'm talking about the centuries to millennia between the last orc Named and Black's ascension, where there have been no orc Named. EE did give some reasons for that, and those worked. Until this chapter, when it turned out that Warlord could've been taken all along, and there must've been dozens of situations when a more suitable and stereotypical Warlord could've risen than Hakram.

Orcs have been kidnapped by Praesi to use as fodder, and they hated this. Did they unite against Praes? Probably. Did a Warlord rise for the very Below purpose of 'raging against the heavens and/or breaking the world to fit their liking by raw strength'? No. Praes has been weakened and divided before, after losing against Callow or due to civil wars. Orcs must've tried to use that, and the last few chapters state that raiding Praes in times like these is certainly not something new. Did a Warlord rise? No.

Before, why the orcs had no Named was kept vague enough that it worked. There was some reason for them to not have Named, why they couldn't get them. Maybe they were losers and Below doesn't back the losing side like this. Maybe there was a Warlord who simply never died somewhere else but Calernia, keeping the Name indefinitely occupied. Maybe there was some kind of block on Named in a Praesi ritual somewhere.

But this chapter said that 'Hey, Warlord has always been up for grabs, generations of repressed orcs in centuries of turmoil and conflict have just never seen anyone fit to take it. Or for new Named to rise from their new culture.' And that just makes no sense at all. EE usually has better background history than this.

kylepcarlson4577

I think one reason the orcs, goblins and drow don't get Names = civilizations/species in decline or being successfully culturally assimilated are not driving the Story. (Are there any recent Gigantes or Elf Named by the way???) The orcs were not just oppressed. They're being assimilated. They're not REALLY rebelling and haven't been for hundreds of years. It's unquestionable that the best military victory they could get over Praes is a temporary occupation of nearby regions for maybe a few decades after a periodic Praesi boondoggle. Some orcs are materially better off because of this assimilation, if not culturally. Their population on the steppes and overall has boomed because of trade with Praes and with Praes's conscriptions removing mouths to feed. I think the goal of a Warlord Named is more flexible than we thought and that the various Orc factions may have been pulling it in too many directions until now to coalesce. It's really more of an expression of a unified purpose for the species rather than seeking "war" per se, but war has been the most common unifying purpose by far. One could argue Grem got close to the name at the high point of Orc unity over the past couple hundred years, which was an agreement to secure higher social status in Praes via the Legions. But he didn't coalesce because there is obviously still a lot of resistance to the cultural costs involved, and Greg's loyalty is divided between the multicultural Legions and the orc people.

I dunno some spitballing here. Also gotta wonder if the dwarves or gnomes have Named. Or I guess the non-seclusionist elves on other continents.

mamm0nn

That's indeed fair and a good point. Below needs not back losing horses. And yes, just because orcs would continue to be repressed and assimilated because they have no Named while a Warlord could change this eternal slippery slope of insignificance, doesn't mean that Below gives a shit. But Callow is also kind of a losing horse but Heroes were popping up regularly, and a lot of Procer Villains were pretty much just trash destined to be defeated by a Hero from what we've seen.

Orcs having no Named at all, not even small ones born from their new culture, is kinda weird. Hell, even the ogres were getting semi-regular Named and they've got just one city somewhere. The orcs are stronger and more numerous than them, at least.

(We've seen the Dwarves having at least one Named, the guy that Cat made her deal with.)

Liliet

This is? a pretty big plot point?

Orcs have had NO Names since Miezans conquered them and broke their culture. The orc culture is undergoing a huge, unprecedented revival since Amadeus's rebellion, one they were previously NOT ALLOWED. They were treated as slaves in all but name, and their neighbours did the work it took to make sure no exceptional individuals among them were ever allowed to accomplish anything.

Hakram becoming the Adjutant made him a target of non-stop assassination attempts back in Book 2, and that's with the explicit protection of the current Black Knight and his Squire?

mamm0nn

Yes. Orcs had no Named since the Miezans broke their Antler clan. But in this chapter we also saw that orcs have entire tribes still dedicated to their old culture, and several shamans able of magic apparently stronger than the 'knucklebone throwing' or whatever weak sauce they mentioned in previous books.

They most certainly had a culture and numbers that weren't actually complete slaves, they had all the means to awake Named to change this situation of theirs. They weren't cotton pickers, every one of them either under a personal watchful eye of the Praesi with a few escapees in the swamps. These were still clans and tribes living free if repressed as a vassal state.

There's no reason for the orcs to have never had the chance for any of them to grow into a Claimant at all. Those may have been assassinated afterwards, but they would've popped up first and made waves. Instead, they got no Named for no reason, because the Praesi of old had no Scribe and Black levels of organisation and Name lore to kill Named before they appear.

Insanenoodlyguy

No they didn't. they have a FRACTION of their old ways. Most of them were lost to history. The orc riddle of steel is now answered with "our conquests smashed the tablets." The real underpinnings, the legends, the facets those chosen by fate could fit into, all of these were gone. They were the MOOKS. You don't see exceptional mooks very often at all. You might see a mook with character, some personality, but that one usually dies first. Being just the low tier minions of the evil empire means there's no expectation in or out of your people to be more. Oh i'm sure those shamans wanted names to re-emerge, but that doesn't mean they had enough weight to do so. Even Hakram himself got a name that was not of Orc culture.

But that in and of itself started the shift. Because even if it wasn't an Orc Name, it was, after so long, an Orc with a name. Proving a name was possible. Suddenly the idea of an Orc not being able to get a name was no longer something Orc's had convinced themselves of. These conditions you are talking about? They just happened in the last few years. Oh I'm sure over the long years there have been efforts here and there, potentials that just never got past that, but now the momentum had started. It was more possible to have a Warlord now than there had ever been in that long stretch of time. Once Hakram got a name, this was bound to happen. And if Hakram had died in callow during the first stages of Cat's adventures, never having been named, Snaketooth never would have had this chance.

Liliet

> they had all the means to awake Named

I don't see how this follows.

> Those may have been assassinated afterwards, but they would've popped up first and made waves.

So maybe they did? I don't recall any statement that orcs didn't have any claimants.

Also, Praesi of old absolutely had Namelore, are you fucking kidding me. There have been orders to the Legions to never engage Callowans when they are absolutely sure they will win, etc.

Earl of Purple

We know gods keep their Names, if they had one, and that Names don't duplicate. That god could have still been a Warlord, and so been in the way of a new one. It took Sabah murdering it to free the Name up, which she did at about the same time Grem One-Eye had a claim to Warlord.

Liliet

We know gods keep Aspect powers, it seems quite likely they don't keep Names like this. Sve Noc was never again referred to as Priestess of Night since apotheosis.

agumentic

>You can't tell me that after centuries, now is the first time ever that the orcs thought that 'Yeah, maybe we should try to do something together, you guys.'

Maybe not the first time they thought about that, but, as North I tells us, it is the first time a taratoplu has gathered since the Broken Antler Horde.

sengachi

It's not that it was easy for Hakram to ascend to the Name. He couldn't have, say, decided a month ago he wanted to be Warlord and just done it.

The people who made the elevation possible were all the orcs in the tent, and all their clans behind them. And what they did, gathering in a unified truce for the purpose of unified war? That was new. That was unique. Orcs standing unified on their own feet, without a slavemaster's boot on their back, hasn't happened in a very long time. That's why the Name Warlord didn't happen before this in the last few centuries.

Hakram was just the person with the experience, the reputation, the skills, and the familiarity with wearing a Name necessary to be the person standing tall in the tent when it came time for the power the orcs had gathered to find a mantle.

mamm0nn

I find it very hard to believe that there hasn't been a single orc fighting against their suppression or trying to gather the hordes, in the centuries of Praesi occupation. When Praesi were pretty much enslaving them in all but name and made precise study of how much meat to feed an orc to keep them dazed yet effective. Hell, the last 50 years have been the least repressed and united in misery that the orcs have been in a very long time.

See my reply to the previous reply for more.

TeK

Well, you kinda answered your own question though. The orcs were little more than a livestock for a long history of Praes, specifically kept as such. Anyone trying to gather them into unifying would've been noticed and drowned in blood and hellfire. Warlord is NOT a sneaky Name. It took many decades to make orks even slightly recover, a literal claimant to the Name, an actual orc Named, Praes being pushed to the brink and it's Tyrant getting a bit too clever and try to actually spawn a Warlord Name (let's not kid ourselves and think that Malicia didn't see Trok coming).

mamm0nn

There has never been a time when Praes was too much in shambles to keep a close eye on the orcs, despite their eternal folly of wars with Callow and mad Dread Emperors? There has never been enough orcs unified for a Claim, despite that these chapters also suggest that raiding Praes in times of its weakness is a common orc habit? There has never been an orc sneaky enough to get a secret bloc going in times that Praes underestimates orc cunning and intelligence?

No, I didn't argue against myself. The circumstances here should've been present a hundred times over before, and better too.

agumentic

Yes, such things have never happened before in an opportune enough time. You have to understand that there's nothing casual about what is happening now. Orcs were mostly fighting each other for most of their history, so trying to unite was always a difficult proposition. When Praes was weakened, so were they, usually in a bigger proportion, because they were fighting on the frontlines. There was little desire to rebel against Praes, because they too believe in the rule of the strong and every time there was an attempt to challenge it, it was smashed back down before the Name could emerge.

The situation right now came out of orcs growing strong enough for a claim decades ago due to a particularly negligent Emperor, then a new ruler siding with them instead of just smashing them down and giving them decades of relative peace, enough that Names started to emerge, then Praes growing very weak and the whole age changing. It is entirely believable that this particular confluence of events just never happened before.

Liliet

Hakram becoming Adjutant made him an immediate target for countless assassination attempts even despite his position at the side of the Black Knight's Squire.

Remember how the faction Akua was part of called itself "Truebloods" and based half of its ideology on anti-greenskin and anti-Duni racism?

ALL High Lords had skin in the game of not allowing orcs to rise again. And with their resources, with their sorcery, yes they succeeded at it for the entire history of Praes.

The Name of Warlord cannot be claimed without a taratoplu. And you cannot have a "sneaky" taratoplu.

sengachi

A) Grem One-Eye actually was a viable Warlord decades ago during Nefarious' reign. This circumstance did come to pass once before, the Claimant just personally turned it down in favor of backing Black's reform efforts.

B) This gathering is being endorsed by Malicia. She has her own candidate in the running. So yeah, even now with all of this chaos and upheaval and infighting, it's still totally plausible this wouldn't have been able to happen without the Dread Empress allowing it.

dadycool

Well, it sounds a lot like he's breaking away from Cat, at least in a Junior Officer kind of way. They'll certainly be allies, keeping Callow and the Steppes closer than any other alliance for a while, but he's a Ruler in his own right now, with a nation behind him that depends on him. There simply isn't enough space in her shadow for him anymore. Interestingly enough, Hakram and Vivienne are "growing up and leaving the nest" at essentially the same time, gaining their own followers and ruling their nations without Cat's oversight.

Frivolous

I'd like to point out how truly shocking Hakram's achievement is. He became Warlord so quickly and decisively.

He hadn't returned to the Steppes in many years, and yet it took him LESS THAN A DAY after he decided he was not content with things as they were, the futures for the orcish race, to become Warlord.

Three meetings, then the final gathering, and poof! He's Warlord! First in centuries!

This, in contrast to Troke and the other possible claimants, who must have spent years working towards it, and despite the efforts of Malicia to make Troke a High Lord.

I'm sure Catherine will be proud of him. Unhappy with the loss of her Adjutant, but oh well.

There was plenty of foreshadowing, by the way. The long intense conversation between Catherine and Hakram in Adjournment was full of it.

I'm rereading Adjournment now with fresh eyes. Hakram's ascent to Warlord is only the culmination of all the potentials in Adjournment.

Earl of Purple

There was a Warlord coming. The orcs had united to elect one, and Troke was gathering support. He had a claim from every orc that backed him, and Hakram had a claim from those that followed him. The diplomacy solidified in everyone's minds that one of these two would be Warlord, and the fight was over who would get it. He didn't need to spend years getting support, because he could take advantage of the support they had gathered.

Frivolous

Agree. Hakram hijacked Troke's and Malicia's plan.

Much more efficient than doing it himself.

Mental Mouse

Cat taught him well...

Miles

He used Find in North I, to find the way to make that happen. This is technically a huge loss of power for him, since Find had basically evolved to rival Contessa's (from Worm and Ward) power at this point.

Miles

He used Find in North I, to find the way to make that happen. This is technically still a huge loss of power for him, for now. Find was basically evolved to rival Contessa's (from Worm and Ward) power at this point.

Frivolous

Miles: Losing Find was a blow, yeah.

Basically all the perception aspects are great. Behold, Witness, See, Listen, Wish, Doddering Sage's Perceive, Nim's Survey – all massively useful in both combat and day-to-day life.

For the same reasons, Thinkers in Worm and Ward were also considered the most dangerous and to be taken out first.

On the other hand, Hakram and Vivienne now have 3 new aspects to look forward to!

I wouldn't be surprised if Hakram gets something Find-adjacent as Warlord. After all, Masego traded Glimpse for Witness when he went from Apprentice to Hierophant.

Anonymous

Chapter felt like trash. Suddenly orcs can just claim the name of Warlord by wanting it and rallying some clans when previously there was much greater difficulty in becoming a named Warlord. Hakram gets his claim to the name rather effortlessly. "If not Hakram then who" is used to justify Hakram's sudden pivot and yet there are plenty of others who would've made more potent warlords than Hakram. I think the real point of this mini-arc is basically to elevate the members of the Woe through that magic protagonist power, but plot armor has always been a weakness of PGTE. It's lazy and lame. None of this felt earned, and Hakram still does not come across as having what it means to be a warlord.

saithorthepyro

I have to heavily disagree. Hakram forging an independent path from Cat for the sake of his own people and their increasing distance was established pretty definitively in the last book.

As for Warlord arising, it is not just the Orc's willing it into existence, circumstances have arisen that has forced the orc tribes to unify requiring a Warlord take place as leader of the tribes. Praes yoke on Orc Society has been broken, their ties that Black was attempting to forge tiring their story to that of Praes are being cut, and they for the first time in a long time have an opportunity to be a significant entity besides a slave race for the Praes in all but name. Circumstance and events have made the unification of the tribes and the name of Warlord possible, not just a bunch of Orc's really wanting the name.

Anonymous

Hakram forging an independent path is not the problem, but this wasn't so much a path forged as much as it is casually taking a few steps, cutting some backroom deals, and suddenly Hakram is blessed with the name of Warlord where he has a very weak claim (Hakram leads no armies and is not really in the warrior's trade anymore and does not have any sort of fanatic loyalty behind him that breathes that sort of aura of a titan of war), a path which used to have massive requirements for claimants to stand a chance. Now, suddenly Hakram, a guy who has spent most of his time away from the Burning Steppes and decides "oh, I guess I'll take the name of Warlord in order to get some stuff done the way I prefer – I mean if I don't do it I'm not sure someone else will, so I suppose I will – hang on, do I even owe these people anything? – eh, I guess I'll do it" gets to duel a person, rustle some votes, and instantly has enough creational weight to get WARLORD as his name. I mean, no. EE can do it, but it's not something I consider a reasonable or persuasive flow of events.

saithorthepyro

Cats claim to her name was being a girl with a knife who Black kept an eye on. Pasquale's claim to her name was some unskilled natural abilities with Light and praying. Hakram's claim to Warlord is being an expert buerecrat, logistician, and planner who can see what is happening to the Orc people and realizing what needs to be done about it. Warlord having to be focused on martial army combat isn't a hard rule in the same way that Black Knight having to be a destruction focused combat name was shown to not be a hard rule by Amadeus and Nim. It's been a thing throughout the series about how Names change and evolve as both their bearers and the cultures they are built one change.

Also the entire point of Villainous Names are that they are for those who see what is in front of them and forces it to change and take power for themselves. In this way Hakram's claim is very apt, since he saw the unfolding events of the tribal meetings and forced them to bend to him. He even did it with a fight at the very end if you want to argue a martial component is required.

And finally, Warlord was going to happen regardless. For the first time the tribes are free from Praes to choose their own path for the future and where they will fit in the new world, and tens of thousands of Orcs are there to decide it. Whoever can get those 200 clans to back them is Warlord, because they have the unified backing of the orc race behind their backs. That has always been the Warlord, the one who can unify the fractured clans.

Anonymous

Cat got her claim to Squire by having the Black Knight directly put her in the role (probably also helped that Above was also already scouting her for that name), which gave her weight. Don't know about Pasquale. Nim I think honestly represents a similar deviation. Early on it was established that the Black Knight's role wasn't so much to lead armies (Dread Emperors tended to do that) but to crush heroes and be a big bad scary dude (which is why Amadeus was so weak and only retained his claim to the name through being a nevertheless skilled and effective combatant who did kill a lot of heroes) but I think EE couldn't work a black knight antagonist like that because the Woe would crush him and EE likes to involve armies in the story and pretend they're relevant.

Generally speaking, strength of will or no, acting against your role diminishes the strength of your name or your claim to it (it is, after all, possible to just lose your name doing this). Villainous names are demonstrably not an exception to this.

Claiming the name of Orc Warlord through being a bureaucrat and logistics manager is hilarious and rather ill-fitting, especially when Hakram did not employ these talents in a significant way as part of his climb to the name. In fact, there was barely any climb at all. The duel was practically a token event in order to try to satisfy pretenses of a Warlord doing Warlord things. Hakram did not earn the name so much as he had it casually handed to him.

The fact that the name of Warlord was going to happen anyway is something I agree with, but that doesn't mean that this way of doling out the name was good. The notion that getting the clans to back you is enough to make you a Warlord is at odds with the historic difficulty of claiming the Warlord name. It's not like orc society rallying behind a Warlord is somehow a new direction they had to get culturally ready for.

Abnaxis

The Name of Warlord is like the Name of Hierarch— if all the clans say you're the Warlord, you're the Warlord. Anaxares was disgusted by the even concept of being Named, but the Free Cities voted for him unanimously—making him only the second Hierarch in the history of the Free Cities—so he became the Hierarch despite his wishes.

By and large all of the ruler Named become Named by succession—whether the succession happens by vote (Free Cities, Steppes), coup (Praes), or primogenature/noblese oblige (Callow), all you need to be a rule named is to by-and-large legally be the rule of a nation that has Named rulers.

The only reason there hasn't been Warlord in centuries is because, like the Free Cities, the orc tribes have never agreed to one until now. You might say that it was too unearned for Hakram to have convinced the clans to unanimously back him, but there's plenty of precedent for rulers becoming Named purely by technical fiat to be upset that he got a Name from the votes.

Darkening

Ehhh. To be fair, it's been stated a number of times that plenty of rulers don't get the Good King name or w/e when they ascend to the throne, though it seems pretty universal for Praes. So you could probably have a warlord that wasn't a Warlord. On the other hand, this moment is a massive gather of clans gathering to decide the future of their very species at a time when they have the leverage to actually push through a change, during a momentous era in history where old norms are being shattered and the Gods are handing out names like candy to balance out how overpowered the Dead King is. Could be the Gods Below are trying to raise a new villainous throne in light of what Amadeus is planning to do to the Tower. Could be they want the orcs ready for the new Age of Order so they can have a united faction to bet on.

Abnaxis

My impression is that even when there wasn't a Good King in Callow the monarch was still always Named of some sort (e.g. Rebel Queen). That's Callow's thing, always having Named royalty to oppose the latest flavor of Dread Emperor/Empress.

Liliet

No, Callowan monarchs were Named "half the time" (c) text.

Abnaxis

Also, you're still ignoring the fact that all it took was a vote and a "shrug, I guess," from the rest of the free cities to Name a Hierarch. Sometimes Names happen purely because the right people say they do, regardless of weight.

ninegardens

How dare you insult Anaraxes, Diplomat of the Belephrone (May She Stand Forever Tall).

Seriously though, the vote was a thing, but also... Anaraxes wasn't exactly a wimp. He WAS hard edged, dedicated to an ideal. His pivot came not from the vote, but for Refusing the physic spy dudes who claimed he was a "Person of importance".

His pivot came from his insistence of HIS story on the world, from his repeated denial of the Tyrant. If I remember correctly, Tyrant introduced him to the Bard, and the bard was all look “hmm... interesting”, well before any vote was called.

Anaraxes the diplomat was serious business.

mamm0nn

By that logic, either they shouldn't have felt the Claim and its powers, or orcs should've had Claimants all throughout their history (we've been told that they've not had any of those), which would've been urged by Providence to unify all the orcs after they unify enough or find themselves striving to unify.

The claimant status shown in this chapter negates the validity of your argument, which could've worked otherwise.

Liliet

Who says they didn't have claimants? They didn't have Named, because all potential claimants got killed, simple as that. There was a whole “rest of Praes” making sure of that in a decentralized yet united in the sentiment manner.

Abnaxis

I think this was a response to me?

To “unify the orcs” one of two things needs to happen—either all the tribes need to fall in line behind a single chieftain, or one tribe has to grow large enough to overtake all the others.

The former would never happen because the orc way is “no-holds-barred war with your neighbors, trade with anyone not your neighbor.” Finding accord among all the tribes would require chieftains to vote for a Warlord who probably literally ate some of their relatives during a raid on their camps.

The latter would never have happened because orcs are nomads. Running an empire requires police to put down unrest, roads to carry news and respond to crises like famine and draught, cities with all their underpinnings like farms and smithies and banks... all things orcs look down on as a society.

The only reason ANYONE is a claimant is because the Legions created by the Reforms broke tribal lines. The Reformed Legions force Blackspears to stand in shield walls with Red Shields without infighting, and reward obedience with loot and state-condoned violence.

That makes any orc who heads the Legions one step away from being Warlord because he has orcs from every tribe under his banner.

The only reason why anyone but Grem is a claimant is because Malicia recognized Grem's historic claim for what it was, and started enobbling orcs so orcs would have an alternative banner to the Legions they can declare allegiance to in return for economic gain.

Hakram can only come in as a claimant because the orcs are already deciding on which claimant they want to support between the two presented to them by Amadeus and Malicia. NONE of the claimants would have been possible before the Reforms, that's why there never had been one after the orcs were "freed"

Liliet

> The notion that getting the clans to back you is enough to make you a Warlord is at odds with the historic difficulty of claiming the Warlord name. It's not like orc society rallying behind a Warlord is somehow a new direction they had to get culturally ready for.

Orcs were specifically kept from ever getting together for a formal gathering like this. They were, like... oppressed? With force of arms?

There has been an opportunity for the Name of Warlord ONLY since Amadeus's civil war and Grem One-Eye (who was also a claimant but chose not to do the thing).

sirfury

I may be wrong, but I think you may be overestimating the creational weight of the Warlord name, based on the success of the last(only?) Warlord at the peak of his reign. I'd bet he's started off much like many other Ruler names, as having the potential for greatness. The Warlord doesn't have a lot of examples, but if you look at the others like Dread Express, Tyrant, etc, there were successful ones and unsuccessful ones. Whether any ruler name ends up being worthy of greatness is up to the individual who claimed it, not by virtue of having the name in itself. Hakram only got through the first of the hurdles, winning the approval of the other clans in a fate created situation where they were all gathered up to already vote for a leader, based on the strength of his victories in battles and his keen intellect, and by being the best candidate.

sirr fury

Furthermore, the impact of Hakram becoming Named cannot be underestimated amongst the orc clans.

The 'weight' of Hakram's Adjutant Name may very well have moved the hand of fate towards the creation of desire and regaining of lost hope that orcs can indeed be allowed Names again and the previous Warlord was not a one time deal.

irritantseraphim

There was no unified Horde of Orcs for centuries, so the tropes and weight needed to claim it might have worn thin. Back when Warlords were challenged and regularly had to defend their Name, you had to be mightier than everyone else.

Now, the Orcs are coming together to decide on their fate, Hakram being caught in the middle. Of course, he owes nothing to the Orcs, but there won't be any "Orcs" in that sense soon, if he doesn't step in. So he has to.

And Cat claimed her first Name the same way. By defeating her rival Claimants. Hakram defeated his rival, winning the vote of the clans and unifying them behind him.

While I agree that the development felt rushed, I like it a lot and it actually makes a lot of sense, to me.

Snappy270

Okay first of all "massive requirements for claimants" ??? All you need to be named is a story, a pivot and then the will to see it through. Stained sister just got it from praying while her village was being eaten. Witch of the woods got it from being a girl in the woods who knew magic. Not all claims need big, dramatic instances. There are many ways to gain a name, hierarch became one from the free cities voting for him with tyrants backing. Malicia only became the dread empress when she was crowned.

For warlord this is was this first gathering since there heyday. The first! You kept saying there would be more warlords but the fact is there haven't because the orcs were united in purpose since their first horde was destroyed. So there always was going to be a warlord after this.

The pivot was when hakram had to give up his name and his love for catherine for his people. Also "oh i guess i'll become warlord to get things done my way" is the exact line of thinking for many people wanting to get names.

Finally when on earth was black considered a weak black knight ? When his name weakened in procer ??? Black was the most successful villan in his generation. He used tricks to win fights cause he knew heros had an inbuilt advantage, but he was an equal to Captain a martial name. When did he act again his name, his name was to be killer of heros and the martial arm of the empire which he did brilliantly

Darkening

Black is hilariously talented and brilliant, but he has a lot less raw power than he could. He mentions early on that his predecessor could have blown up a tower with his shadow powers, where black can basically just use them as a couple extra arms. Which is useful, but not the same sort of raw power we're talking about here.

ninegardens

Black was... kind of a "minimize collatoral damage" kinda of dude. He was a policy wonk, and idealist, and the kind of dude who would mentor up a young orphan to replace him, as opposed to brutally murder her in her bed.

He didn't betray his Empress.

He completed one conquest and the sat on it for 40 years, rather than continuing to extend himself further.

I don't think we've seen many previous Black knights, but seriously: historically my guess is that they were very much "the bloody knight"/ "The dragon" archetype. The Black knight is meant to scary and bully thier underlyings into submission. Amadeuas is... not that. He only barely fit the groove.

When he went full "Tactical leader" in Procer (as opposed to battlefield bruiser) he was punished for that, but he had been leaning pretty heavily in that direction for a long long time, and he explicitly said (often) that his raw power were weaker because of it... but also that by dodging that grove, his Name railroaded him less. He was more flexible, less of freight train (headed for a cliff) and more of a go cart (with sharp cornering ability).

mamm0nn

Hakram just casually becoming Warlord shows that there's no reason for the orcs to not have Named, though. They've been under Praes's joke for centuries, developed a new culture and there have been plenty of opportunities during Praes civil wars and Callow's victories for them to do something. If there was no different, hard reason for orc Named to be unreachable, then why hasn't it happened somewhere in the first century after the Miezens left? Or the centuries past that?

We've been told that the Warlord is THE orc, but I don't think we've ever been told that the Warlord has to unify ALL of the orc tribes. And even if they did, if one can become a Warlord Claimant and get the powers, then they'd just have to unite a few large tribes and seek to unify them all, and then Providence could take care of the rest. We've even been told these chapters that orcs regularly unite and raid other Praesi lands during times of turmoil and weakness like these, meaning there would've been plenty of times that enough orc tribes unified for a Claimant to rise. And the very rising of a Warlord Claimant would've excited the orcs so, that Providence could've definitely just picked a suitable lad or lass and see all the leftover tribes join in afterwards.

Liliet

> We've even been told these chapters that orcs regularly unite and raid other Praesi lands during times of turmoil

Raid, yes. They're always raiding someone, might as well take advantage of neighbours.

Unite? That's a much bigger proposition, and they've never been given a window of opportunity large enough for that.

Liliet

> when on earth was black considered a weak black knight

He was a weak Black Knight in Name firepower. He had a small "mana pool" to use for his Aspects and Name tricks. He was wildly successful despite this, but he WAS always weak compared to "destroy a fortress with a gesture" predecessors.

(He destroyed a fortress with a gesture once. Sent him into a coma for three days)

You are completely right about the rest of this.

Casey Glick

IIRC, Amadeus wasn't weak, per se. It's just that he was spreading his powers out over the army more than Black Knights usually did. It's part of why his armies were so good with him at the head, but why he couldn't personally, like, destroy an army.

Liliet

No, he was specifically weak.

> "It's been two days since you last used an aspect," she said. "I expected you to be in better shape by now."

>

> "I drew deeper than I have in decades," he candidly admitted. "And you know my well is shallower than most. I expect within a fortnight I'll have recuperated."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/10/interlude-queens-gambit-declined/>

There have been other references but this is the only one I remember the exact location of

Liliet

> All you need to be named is a story, a pivot and then the will to see it through.

Correction: all you need to be Named is a story, period. A pivot and the will to see it through is FREQUENTLY a part of said story, but there's been a number of Named who only realized they were a fair way into it because there was no specific moment, just a slow solidification.

(Also, newborn baby Sabah)

Tom

> Now, suddenly Hakram, a guy who has spent most of his time away from the Burning Steppes and decides "oh, I guess I'll take the name of Warlord in order to get some stuff done the way I prefer – I mean if I don't do it I'm not sure someone else will, so I suppose I will – hang on, do I even owe these people anything? – eh, I guess I'll do it" gets to duel a person, rustle some votes, and instantly has enough creational weight to get WARLORD as his name.

The foundations for what Hakram did in this chapter run very deep:

> "I'm an orc, sir," my officer spoke carefully. "We don't really do the Name thing."

> Masego clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth in disapproval.

> "Inaccurate," he chided Hakram. "Names were fairly common in the Steppes before the Miezan occupation."

> "That's the better part of two thousand years ago," I replied flatly.

> The Apprentice seemed utterly indifferent to that fact, much to my irritation.

> "It's still nascent in form," the Soninke noted. "If it makes you feel any better, you might get yourself killed before it turns into anything concrete."

> It was becoming apparent that social skills were not one of Masego's no doubt plentiful talents. Still, this had implications. I'd never heard of an Adjutant before and that was a little worrying, but there was also the fact that for the first time in a millennia and a half a greenskin was coming into a Role. That was... shit, the political ramifications of this alone went way above my head. Black always said that Names were a reflection of the people they sprang from: was something changing with the orcs, or was this about my own burgeoning influence? This is about the Reforms, has to be. But why was the Role appearing here and now instead of forty years ago, when they'd first been implemented? Gods, this was going to be such a headache. I cast another look at Hakram and he seemed more troubled than elated at the news. Evidently I wasn't the only realizing how much of a mess this could turn into.

From: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/12/16/chapter-5-recognition/>

> "There's another part to that tale, Adjutant," the thief said. "One you forgot to tell. You see, there's quite a few Callowans in the army who have kin that got eaten by orcs. Not even thirty years ago. What the Wasteland did to your people is a horror. What they went on to do to mine is a fucking horror as well, and one does not expunge the other."

> "I know that too, Thief," Deadhand said. "You asked, in your own roundabout manner, what it is I care about. I have answers you won't care to hear, but this one you will. I care about seeing a world where, when I tell this story, the woman on the other side of the table can't reply the way you did. Where we're more than hunting hounds for those who measured our starvation."

From: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/05/interlude-zwischenzug-ii/>

> "You want to use the Legions of Terror loyal to Black as a bulwark between us and Malicia," I suddenly said, opening my eyes. "Grem and his legions to be put up on the Blessed Isle, I'm thinking, with a neat supply arrangement the crown would handle the grain part of."

> "And more," Hakram said. "I have been speaking with the Clans willing to take my envoys. There are some who still remember the Steppes nearly bucked the Tower's rule, when Nefarious still reigned."

From: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/03/11/chapter-19-precedent/>

> The pair from the adjunct secretariat had been dismissed, leaving me with a pile of papers where the words 'maybe' and 'should' came up uncomfortably often. While the phalanges who'd spoken to me – an orc and a Callowan, nice touch that – had been well-versed in the details, looking at the plans I recognized the careful method that lay behind them. This was Hakram's proposal, and not one he'd begun working on recently. Too much groundwork had been laid, and some of those numbers would have taken months to get. I was honestly astonished he'd managed to get his hands on estimated fighting strength for the greatest of the Clans, as the Jacks were completely blind in the Steppes.

> As far as proposals meant it was well-crafted, and made it clear that not only was propping up an orc state in the Steppes achievable but it would benefit Callow in several practical ways. Establishing treaties with orc leadership and trading ties with western clans would ensure that raiding of my kingdom did not resume down the line, while a mutual defence pact would mean that if the Dread Empire turned on us both Wolof and Okoro would be knocked out of the war before the first sword was drawn. The Clans weren't rich in much besides amber and fur, but trading those goods south in Mercantis would mean steep profits for Callowan traders given the demand for both.

From: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/08/28/chapter-54-kings-fianchetto/>

(Also some relevant bits in chapters 51 and 52 of that book)

If you want to dig for more: <https://www.google.com/search?q=site:practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com+hakram+steppes>

medailyfun

The ties between the orcs and the Empire are not cut, economic dependency is not something to overcome easily as well as the Legion stuff, the orcs just got a chance for a different story alongside the Empire/Calllow.

Konstantin von Karstein

To be fair, nearly every story has plot armour for its characters.

Anonymous

Yes, but most stories don't go out of their way to insist the protagonist does not get plot armor (ie. providence).

saithorthepyro

I think you are confusing the two. Providence is an extremely blatant Deus ex machina, something that is not foreshadowed, demands no cost from those saved, and really lowers the tension and stakes. Pretty much all the times Cat and Co has survived has typically been by the skin of their teeth and by their own skill and planning, and they have payed for it. Cat is essentially a copy of herself whose had two different eldritch abominations mess with her head and soul on top of her limp and missing eye. Masego has been blinded and stripped of his natural ability for magic. Hakram has been crippled. Only Archer, who is about to go up against Ranger narratively, and Vivienne, who is the most heroic of the group, haven't had those kinds of wounds. One of the few actual Deus ex machina was Cat coming back from being a zombie which was her literally stealing providence from Above. And this isn't getting into the emotional stuff or trove of dead supporting characters. Yes they are still alive, because their character arcs are still in progress, they are useful for the story, probably till the climax they'll be relatively safe but that does not mean they have been plot armored to the point of removing the tension, because even when they survive losing the Woe do lose in permanent ways that affect them.

sengachi

That is in fact exactly how ruler Names happen. When people come together and acclaim someone with enough social and cultural weight behind it, they become a Named. Tens of thousands of orcs have rallied together for a great war, fought and bled and died to promote their champions. They've politicked and jockeyed for position and thought deep on the cultural importances which matter to them. They and their weight were going to elevate a Warlord, whoever it was that may be standing victorious in the center of the tent at the end of this.

The reason this couldn't happen before this was because the Praesi had the clans fractured and disunified. They haven't been able to get such a gathering of clans before this day, to acclaim in one voice a Warlord. And that's been foreshadowed.

The clans having enough of a unified (Legion) culture to raise an Adjutant was part of it. The clans becoming more story relevant, having a place in the big plays, getting the power to make a difference rather than be used, all of that was leading up to the clans being able to raise a Warlord again.

Also, Hakram has literally been training to understand political games since before the academy. The stone game, remember? It's his thing. Like, loyalty, cool blood, and having a better mind for the mechanics of politics than anyone but Amadeus are his three Things. They've always been his three things. And you're unhappy that he's good enough at that last thing to be uniquely qualified here? To be the only one who can thread the political needle and the trials which will come after?

If you're not happy with this, I don't know what you would have been happy with.

Anonymous

Names are earned, and if Warlord went to every orc with acclaim who rallies the orcs there would've been a lot more Warlords long before now. Hakram basically casually took the most important name to his entire people just by deciding he'll take the name, fighting a duel, and rustling some votes. The creational weight he has to be the Warlord is absurdly dubious. Vivienne becoming Princess of Callow felt earned. Hakram becoming Warlord did not.

Troke's claim was also dubious, considering how weak weak-willed his plan of action was for a Warlord. He was basically seeking internal power rather than external conflict.

Rynjin

Hakram has been building toward this name for at least two books now, you just haven't been paying attention. He's always had plans to change his people and make them something more than brute pawns. That is exactly the kind of thing stories are made of, and Named are living embodiments of stories. This writing was on the wall from the time he had that spat with Cat after he presented his "help the orcs so they can help us" plan last book. He's had years to revise that plan since then.

Fast this certainly was; made that way by the other claimant, who rushed the confrontation. Unearned? Not in the slightest.

Frankly though, I'm pretty sure you know that. I don't really trust the motives of people who post anonymously in comment sections like these.

sengachi

Just going to blatantly ignore all of the people (and several books of this story) telling you why the orcs couldn't raise a Warlord before this point I see.

mamm0nn

But the whole Claimants popping up and a Warlord being chosen like this, kind of counters and negates most of the things that they've said, though. In the end, why there were no orc Named was mostly because of some unknown reason tied to but not solely their loss of culture to the Miezens and their suppression by Praes. That unknown reason kept things logical enough, but when someone can just casually decide to become Warlord regardless of foreshadowing in other regards, then that reason stops working.

Liliet

There... wasn't an unknown reason. The reason was known. They were not allowed to unite and gather an army, they immediately became a target for their more powerful neighbours deeply interested in preventing that from happening and not shy to toss some demons their way if they had to.

Their culture was suppressed because they were not allowed to practice it, not because they forgot it.

(Though they forgot plenty of things too, just not this one)

sengachi

Unknown reason?

You mean the literal slavery, rule by force of arms and magic, assassinations, and other such direct oppression used by the Praesi? Those reasons that have been mentioned over and over and over again every time the historic Name of Warlord has come up?

mamm0nn

But the Claimant thing means that the orcs didn't all have to unite. If a chief would've unified enough tribes or enough important ones with the intent to unify them all, then they should've become a Claimant. And once a Claimant, Providence could've seen them through to unify, or fight the other tribes that would never yield which Below would only find amusing to watch.

A gathering of all the tribes shouldn't be the only possible way, such a thing seems counterintuitive to the Warlord, Below and orc culture. Remember, a Name is what people tell tales of. Either orcs knew that their chiefs have to gather and choose a Warlord, in which case they would've been moved to do so many times before now, or orcs don't say that and thus there's no good reason why the Warlord would be limited to being elected like that before even getting a claim at all.

Liliet

> And once a Claimant, Providence could've seen them through to unify

Unfortunately, enough brute force shatters any amount of Providence – especially in a villain vs villain context, which this was.

And until the recent devastation following on the heels of Amadeus's and Malicia's deliberate decade-long campaign to weaken the High Lords, there was a lot of brute force poised on the orcs' borders to respond to any perceived potential threat.

Earl of Purple

Orcs also don't just raid Praes and each other- they raid Daoine, too. And a hero-vs-villain fight has plenty of providence, but not for the villain. An orc warlord raising an army amongst the Clans to throw against the Wall and making a claim on the Name Warlord will get ended, by the Commander of the Watch if nobody else. And if the warlord tries to go against Praes, then it'd be a villain-against-villain fight, between an orc relying on ancient lore and instinct against a Praesi villain- Black Knight, or Warlock, or Dread Emperor, or something else- that knows what they're doing and has a wealth of lore and experience to draw from.

Matthew

It does feel fast, but I would object to it being unearned or unwarranted.

The orcs method of war hasn't been relevant for centuries. Raids clans produce warriors but they aren't actually a threat to callow or praes in any real sense. They can be a nuisance, but the settled societies can stop them.

Hakram comes in as an orc for the new era.

He is an orc warlord who can fight praes or callow with modern methods.

It's too fast, I agree.

I guess it's sort of the Genghis Khan story. The Mongols had been just one of many steppe tribes who had been fighting the Chinese for centuries. It wasn't until Temujin lost a civil war and, in response, entirely transformed Mongol society to turn the fearsome mongol warriors into a functioning army full of soldiers that he became Genghis Khan and crushed all before him.

That's sort of the thing here. Old praes used orcs as warriors, black used them as soldiers. Hakram is an orc soldier who will use them for themselves.

Mental Mouse

Sudden... not really, this is just the climax of the story. A seismic shift a mile beneath the ocean can send a faint swell across the ocean –barely a foot high, but it can travel thousands of miles. And then it reaches the coast, and the wave breaks... as a tsunami.

Everyton Nothington

I disagree with like all of that. Hakram didn't pivot "suddenly" there have been drift between him and cat ever since he was crippled. There has also been foreshadowing regarding Hakrams desire to make the orc clans more prosperous by drafting treaties between them and callow (the desire was there even though he didn't push when Cat didn't allow it). He just didn't see the scale of the problem until being there in person, if he didn't step in, the orcs way of life and cultural identity would be lost, in one way or another.

Even if there are "plenty of others" (like who? Grem? Juniper?) they where not there and if they where, they didn't have the information or the vision to give the orc clans a desirable outcome.

As for Hakram not having what it takes to be a warlord, he is pragmatic so he has previously followed those who he thinks best can help him achieve his desire, but if cat was not present, and the anger he describes in book 2, chapter 16, was evoked in another way, I think he could have attempted to raise a banner on his own, just less successfully as he was less experienced.

But yes, Hakram isn't what you typically think of when someone says Orc Warlord, but this could be yet another pivot in named.

We have seen many archetypes shifting to being more nuanced in their approach to good and evil, and generally becoming more pragmatic. Hakram becoming warlord could be either the effect of, or being the cause of, the name Warlord shifting to a less chaotic / destructive force.

But either way, Hakram is one of the most competent characters in the series. You complain that the main characters become powerful and have plot armor, but first off, if the main characters aren't powerful, they will stop being relevant to the story, and thus either be killed like Ratface and Robber, or gaining a story pivot where they gain power like Vivien and now Hakram.

In addition, as Cats story shifts, side characters must fill new roles as their old become superfluous to the story, or be written from it. I personally much prefer Hakram, a character with history and depth, being the new orc warlord rather than a new character I have no understanding of or history reading about.

As for plot armor, it is indeed a thing in the story. Complaining about it makes as much sense as complaining that Praes exists. As you must know, fatalism is a theme in the story and plot armor is a thing that explicitly exists in the setting and is something characters are aware of. But that aside, plot armor isn't something that is bad by itself in any story, just when it breaks immersion, and or takes away consequence, and from where I'm standing there have been plenty of consequences resulting from fuckups by the characters previously. It might not have harmed them physically every time, but plenty of sub plots have started because they have to resolve a issue they caused, which is a consequence.

Finally, the thing about Troke denying Hakram as no longer being the Adjutant (and implicitly denying him being a claimant to Warlord) putting a finger on the scales was not something Troke had to be aware of for it to be true. It was only Hakram's namelore we saw on display.

We know the name Warlord encourages being brutal and unyielding in your aims as we saw when hakram thought about having to kill the leadership of the Split Tree Clan. Denying Hakram as a challenger would not be in attunement to the name as it would be an indirect way of facing a problem, so not acting in accord would weaken your claim/position. Hakram knew this, we do not know if Troke did, Names subconsciously drive people to act in a way consistent with the role, and have to be consciously fought to subvert, again, this has been a theme for a large portion of the story,

I know can't change your mind, literature is subjective after all. But I find your view offensive.

Liliet

Catherine and Hakram have been drifting apart ever since she became Queen of Callow and her duties expanded far past what one Adjutant could cover the blind spots of.

The breakdown upon him being crippled was just the tip of the iceberg finally rising to the surface.

KageLupus

Hard disagree, on pretty much every point. First, I don't think that the Name came on suddenly. Hakram only consciously decided to aim for it in the last chapter, but there have been any number of story points leading up to that moment. Even as far back as the last book, Hakram was trying to get Cat to provide weapons to the Clans so that they could fight against Praes. He has wanted more for his people for awhile now and has slowly been getting more hands on about it. Narratively, ever since Hakram was injured in the Arsenal his story has been leading up to this point.

I don't think it was an easy thing to become Warlord either. Think about the series of events that made it possible. The Clans all gather with the explicit purpose to choose a leader, already a rare occurrence. And while the stated goal was choosing if they should raid Praes or not, the underlying narrative is "What does the future of the Clans look like?" So in general this is a pretty special occasion and should be a narrative fulcrum. Considering there were two claimants to the title I think that is safe to say.

As for Hakram not being the best choice for Warlord, I would personally disagree. In my mind he is exactly the kind of Warlord that the orcs need right now. He has deep-rooted ties to orc history (trained as a shaman when young, sings battle poems while fighting duels) while also being much more worldly than the average orc. One of Hakram's strongest suits has always been his analytical mind, and that only gets more true the more information he has to work with. All of that combines to make him one of the few people who can see the pitfalls with the current setup and have a viable alternative.

Previous Warlords just had to bring the Clans together to go on massive raid campaigns, but the world has changed since then. This time the fight is for the future of orc culture and whether they are relevant in the world or just a footnote people mention when they talk about Praes. It is a new kind of war and requires a new kind of Warlord, one who is intelligent and politically savvy as well as an able fighter. In other words, everything Hakram has been characterized as since book 1.

Liliet

Considering Hakram's initial stated reasoning for joining Cat's cause was "she's going to kick the asses of EVERYONE who looks down on us and I want to help with that", it's been narratively coming a MUCH longer time than since Arsenal.

I've heard "Dread Emperor Hakram" predictions since I caught up.

Miles

Try reading instead of skimming and you'd find that every complaint you made is actually the opposite of what happened.

Abrakadabra

It is not weak at all. Hakram was always a potential warlord, the first named ork in centuries!

Unlike others, he do not have to go trough great journies to steel his heart, because Unlike the rest of the orks, he was always one WHO uses his head and restricts his emotions. All he needed to do was to make a decision. Because when Hakram makes a decision, he makes it with full conviction. No half-heartedness in him.

It was the same when he kneeled before Cat. One conversation convinced him, and when Hakram is convinced about something, he is fully convinced.

Anonymous

I'd also like to add that it's silly that Troke had to confirm Hakram's claim to Warlord lest it somehow become a finger on the creational scales (that's some serious namelore for Troke, an orc who comes from a society where no one is named) in their conflicts while immediately moving on to point out what a newcomer Troke is to knowing how to fight like a named. That's some very conveniently narrow expertise right there.

sengachi

Nah.

1) That's not even necessarily namelore, that's just having a lick of political acumen.

Hakram may have known it would put the finger on the scales for him, and been confident that Troke lying would do Hakram more good than harm.

But Troke didn't have to know that to make the decision to not call Hakram out. All Troke had to know was that his opponent had spoken a truth and Troke didn't know what kind of evidence he could back that up with. If he lied, he was banking on Hakram not being able to otherwise prove it. Cus if he lied and then Hakram Spoke or dumped some Name pressure on everyone, or even pulled out a baby Aspect, Troke would be named a liar in front of everyone, and a cowardly one who couldn't even face a counterclaimant directly.

2) There is a mountain of difference between knowledge and combat drills. The kind of combat trick Hakram got Troke with happens faster than the speed of thought. Literally, the nerve signals from eye to brain to arm are slow enough, and a blow fast enough, that there's no time for higher order processing. If you have to think about how you'll react in a fight, you aren't reacting in time. The only way to fight better than someone else is to drill, drill, drill, drill, drill, drill, drill, drill, drill until your reactions happen at the same automatic level as a flinch reflex.

It doesn't matter if you know how to respond to a combat trick, if you haven't drilled how to counter it, it'll get you. And Troke has only been wearing the Claimant's mantle to Warlord for, what, a couple weeks? Tops? He hasn't had time to drill like that, nor another Named to do those drills with. His mantle came in, plopped a new set of reflexes in his brain that his opponent is more familiar with than he is, and even if he knows to do so he hasn't had the time to drill in a new set of replacement reflexes yet.

So Hakram won. When your opponent knows you have a bad reflex and is skilled enough to exploit it, you'll lose every time, no matter what you know.

KageLupus

Not only that, but this is not even the first time we have seen this trick in the story. Cat did the exact same thing way back when she fought that goblin that picked up Squire for all of a fight. She knew that Named instincts take time and effort to overcome and exploited that to create an opening and defeat her opponent.

Hakram doing the same thing is a really neat callback and mirroring of that fight.

sengachi

I like this end for the Woe. Because the Woe are friends. And they will always, to the end of their days, have each others' backs. But they are not the Calamities, sworn in service to a master and cleaved to her purpose. That's a brittler tie than what they have.

No they each have their own paths, their own goals, and their own drives. And their bond is that they will always value and honor each other's paths.

Hakram's path has always been his own. It started with a curiosity about the forces which shape the world he lives in. A game of stones representing Lords and a Tower. It expanded to include Callow, when he realized they were important. And he joined with Callow's purpose, with Cat, because he saw the importance of being important. Because he knew that to improve his people's lot, what was needed was him supporting her dreams. And she was worth it, and he found worth in kneeling to a worthy Warlord.

But always, even when he was distant from the Steppes, it mattered to Hakram that he was an orc. And he can't sit by and let them not be important, not be another player in the game, when he can make that happen. That's worth setting aside the role of Adjutant for him, however much he might love Cat.

The thing I love about the Woe though?

They're not the Calamities. This isn't a betrayal. And it's not actually an end. Cat will back Hakram in this with a smile on her face and with every drop of love his loyalty has earned. It's sad, yes, that he won't be at her side in the years to come. They'll both have heavy hearts over this. But that doesn't mean he's not still part of the Woe, and that they don't still matter to each other. Cat just gets to be proud of Hakram in a whole new way now.

Casey Glick

The Woe are a family, not a team. It isn't a betrayal when your sister takes a job across the country, or when your son moves out for college. It's sad, but that's how life happens.

But it the careers aren't a change to the family itself. New jobs broke up the Calamities, for all that they remained bound to Amadeus. The Woe are tied to Cat, yes, but also to each other. And it doesn't matter if none of them can fight, or if they aren't useful in some way. Remember that Hakram cut off his own hand to get Vivienne out of a dark place. Can you see Ranger doing that for anyone, possibly even Amadeus?

For the Woe, wherever two of them gather will always be home.

Liliet

This.

nick012000

So, Hakram's goal here is to turn the Orcs into Prussia: an army with a country attached to it?

Liliet

Sounds like it, and sounds like it's currently their best bet...

beleester

Yep, stealing Troke's idea and doing it better.

Although I didn't predict "orcish mercenaries" as the middle ground. I suppose if you want to fight but don't want to fight in an organized army, that's the best way to do it.

Miles

Basically the fantassins all over again.

letouriste

" "All orc, where it matters," a woman's voice called out.

Hungry Gods, was that Sigvin? Whoever it'd been there was a gale of laughter as Troke bit down on a scowl"

It tells a lot about hakram sleeping habits he does not know for sure whose voice it was haha really great chapter. I'm really glad i didn't have to wait weeks to have the falling out of the last one.

The Dragon of the Marshlands

So Cat won't be Warlord. Thought she might be for a few chapters, because war is such a large part of her.

How about a Name Black Queen? Or soething about Foxes (the song in her mind when dealing with the Wandering Bard in Arsenal might be forshadowing). Or some High Priestess of Below. I dont think the Warden of the East sticks.. More suitable would be Dread Empress Catherine with her Chancellor (or reborn Black Knight) Amadeus.

Miles

Her Name will be Name Loremastre, or some other Owner of Named/Pwner of Named theme.

She's pulling away from the ruling business but leaning into the Thrashing of Named role.

Steven Silver

Sooo many one-liners in this I had to stop to "oooooh" "ahhhhh" and "sick burn!!!" For half my reading time ♥

Also, I like how Hakram was such a good fit for Warlord that he kind of got it in an afternoon XD

Creation: "you should be warlord"

Hakram: "No, I'm just here for Cat"

Creation: "but you'd be really good at it~"

Hakram: "...no, I want to keep my oath to Cat."

Creation: "Look: it ain't gonna go good unless you step up"

Hakram: "...I'll think about it"

Creation: "DONE! No backsies!"

Mental Mouse

Nah, it wasn't Creation forcing him into it, or not exactly. He noted explicitly that as Adjutant, he could have sought to Find a path toward dragging an Orcish High Lord into Cat's alliance.

But that would have been "solving the wrong problem", and he was always good about avoiding that mistake. In analyzing the conflict, he found it was rooted in a more basic problem for his people... he decided to solve the right problem, and he was uniquely qualified...

Because this was also the culmination of his own story. Not an unquestioning tribe member, but someone who'd had to go away from his people to reach "now I am an orc", who had then spent a decade gathering knowledge, wisdom, and power, and had now returned to his people at the critical time.

Steven Silver

Hey, you say he was uniquely qualified, I say Creation had a groove just right for him. Po-tay-toe, po-tah-toe 😊

Mental Mouse

The difference is, Hakram himself was the one who made that groove. (With Cat's encouragement and training in story-fu.)

Steven Silver

Careful, that's a dangerous misconception. Hakram is a fit for Warlord. He did not pioneer the name himself; Orcs already had a concept of what a Warlord should be.

Liliet

See, you're right, but it's funnier to phrase it the other way.

Sugar Roll

Am I the only one here who imagined Hakram and Troke in a WWE ring trash talking with a mic before finally fighting to the delight of the fans?

Steven Silver

Not anymore XD

Cicero

Hmmm... so Hakram is looking to make the Orcs into something like the Swiss?

Agent J

What? No. The Swiss are an independent nation that is staunchly neutral. That's not remotely what he's after. Hakram is swinging for a fully autonomous region within the Empire, with strong ties to Callow to boot.

Evgeny Permyakov

>What? No. The Swiss are an independent nation that is staunchly neutral.

Google for 'swiss mercenaries'

boballab

Yep the Swiss mercenaries were so feared that they became part of a continent wide treaty that limited them to one client: The Vatican.

Cicero

Swiss Mercenaries, back when Switzerland was part of the Holy Roman Empire.

Evgeny Permyakov

>What? No. The Swiss are an independent nation that is staunchly neutral.

Google for 'swiss mercenaries'

Casey Glick

Ohpleaseohpleaseohplease

Swiss Mercenary outfits for the orcs! Please!

boballab

Here is food for thought: All of the Woe are moving up to more powerful Names. It started with Zeze becoming the Hierophant, Vivienne went from Thief to Princess, Hakrum is moving up to Warlord and Cat is moving up to something that can overrule other Named. That leaves Indrani and Cat suspects a fight with Ranger and with the way the story is flowing that is bad for Ranger. I wonder if Black has noticed it yet? Also Ranger has two pupils left one is considered a Hero, the other a Villain, but even though she was a Calamity Ranger comes across as neither Good or Evil. Wonder if the story will force the two pupils to fight each other as well, or if they will have to split Rangers heritage along Good/Evil lines after they beat her?

ohJohN

Three of Ranger's pupils are still alive, not two: Archer, Concocter, Silver Huntress. Alexis the Argent is undeniably a heroine (she can use Light, after all). I think Indrani flirted with neutrality when she first appeared in the story, but at this point she's pretty clearly one of Below's. As for Cocky:

Book 6, Chapter 15: Machinations (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/03/06/chapter-15-machinations/>)

Liliet

Indrani was a very powerful Named ever since she joined, she was kind of a step above them in even not-her-specialty melee combat until Cat went OP bullshit with Winter.

She doesn't need a more powerful Name, that's not her story. She has the power, she just needs to figure out what she wants to go with it.

Adrian_V

Mmmm many people think this is the end of the WOE, personally i just see it as each one finally really growing into adults because what is growing but being able to stand on your own for your own sake?

They are simply maturing, and part of that is accepting that each person must walk their own road to their own goals in life, before they were forced to grow but still retained some naivety? childish delusions? whatever you want to call it, point is that like the calamities before them they each will have lives of their own beyond being a band of five.

I think they will end up stronger because of it.

As for the chapter i love how Harkram's pact is basically saying "we suck ass right now, so lets do something and become important", he is taking the best points of each side and adding more thanks to his experiences, he has seen more of the world so he simply knows more

Frivolous

I wonder to what extent orcs use birth control.

If they don't really, Hakram is very easily going to end up with a lot of kids. Dozens, maybe hundreds.

Good for him.

Miles

They must have some contraceptive artifacts he keeps with him all the time. Otherwise the cost of raising those kids would make it impossible to leave his well paying job to try and be a warlord.

Frivolous

This is irony or sarcasm, right?

I'm really really bad at recognizing either.

Frivolous

I wonder how Cordelia and the Levantines and the rest of the Grand Alliance will view this development.

They didn't resist much the inclusion of the Empire Ever Dark into the Alliance, because the drow were very mysterious and magical, and Catherine led them, but the signatories of the Grand Alliance have a lot of history with the orcs. Familiarity breeds contempt, and hatred.

I'm not sure Hakram will seek membership with the Grand Alliance, but I think he will.

Given that, I'm assuming Catherine will vouch for him, regardless of their personal troubles. It helps that Hakram was always very polite and all when talking with Cordelia and Rozala and the Levantines.

On the other hand, I'm sure EVERYONE will think that it was all Catherine's plan that Hakram became Warlord. She sent him as the lone envoy to the orcs, and bam, he's Warlord! Absolutely no one will think it was Hakram himself who decided it, since he's always been seen as Catherine's henchman.

Many people will be happy, because orcish warriors are good, the situation is desperate, and the more the merrier. Many people will be very suspicious because an orcish Horde led by Catherine's right-hand man is going to look really scary, especially during mealtimes.

The Horde, the Army of Callow, and the Empire Ever Dark means there are 3 armies led by members of the Woe. That's really scary.

Heaven knows what the heroes will think about it.

Liliet

The drow are not a part of the Grand Alliance. They're a part of the coalition aligned against Neshamah, of which the Grand Alliance is one political entity, but the Grand Alliance itself only includes Levant, Procer and Callow (and used to include Ashur). It's the Good Nations' Club, specifically to give their non-Good neighbours a big fat disincentive to touch them. Cat is planning on making a separate defense treaty with Praes so that should the GA break theirs Callow can call on their Praesi allies and should Praes break theirs Callow can call on the GA.

Hakram is going to be joining the Accords when that becomes relevant, but not the Grand Alliance.

hakureireimu

"Familiarity breeds contempt, and hatred."

Considering how ignorant Procer are wrt the orcs, I'd say they don't have any real familiarity.

Frivolous

hakureireimu: I'd forgotten that, yeah. I remembered just now that the Tenth Crusade had to invade through Callow to reach Praes.

Also that the Exiled Prince (from the Free Cities) thought Willy was racist for hating orcs.

So, retract that part about hating orcs.

My main point that everyone will think Hakram becoming Warlord was all Catherine's plan, though, remains.

Earl of Purple

As a corollary to this, I wonder if he has to re-sign the Truce and Terms. His name's already on there, but he signed it (probably) as Hakram of the Howling Wolves, the Adjutant. Now he's Hakram of the Howling Wolves, Warlord of the Orcs.

Frivolous

Earl of Purple: Don't know. It is an interesting question, yes.

This is the first time someone has changed Name since the start of the Truce and Terms.

At least Hakram didn't change allegiance. He's still of Below, not Above. Becoming a hero would have been really interesting, and problematic for everyone, though not as bad as the Red Axe.

Shveiran

Considering that Transitional Names are a thing, I'm sure the T&T have a provision for this even if we never saw it on screen.

Miles

Volume is a really weird term for economic comparisons, Hakram.

The hides and spears or food that tribes might trade between each other have much lower volume than the water they're undoubtedly shipping into the wasteland but have much higher value to the traditional orc way of life.

Miles

Weird measure*

Liliet

I think "volume of trade" is a term of art, and measured in $$

Xinci

Mm the foundation for any long term stability for the orcs will be transhumanance pacts for the migration of the orcs cattle, probable introduction of more vibrant flora to further add nutrients and variety to the steppe(likely sourced from Cardinal when it becomes active, but the wasteland itself is a treasure trove for such things), and those migrational pacts being enforced somewhat similarly to what Cat plans for the accords, likely with the Warlord as a guarantor/forceful adjudicator. Given how complicated such dealings may get, a Warlord around to help ensure it, is quite helpful.

As the orcs are obligate carnivores the crux of them thriving isn't on is on their cattle and thus what their cattle eat. The steppe is a closed loop in part because anyone one tribes grazing lands determine how big it can grow and any other tribe using that land acts as a threat. Working out transhumanance pacts allows the land to grow more vivacious due to the grass generally being younger and more nutritious at time of consumption, it also mitigates internal warfare that disunifies as it means that any interfering clans have to deal with multiple defending clans. Notably the Split Tree are in an excellent position to enact these pacts, with the new Warlord Hakram as an enforcer, ...and both the Soldier town orcs and the Raider ones on the steppes would enjoy or likely be drawn to it, even if the soldier town orcs could import grain to feed cattle or goats and such from Praes. This gains the Warlord that needed loyalty as the orcs gain more by cooperating than they do by infighting further, it aids the mitigation of further fragmentation.

The nutrient level in the cattle they eat will depend on the quality of what they eat in turn. So if the orcs can introduce varied high quality flora they can overtime raise both the number of possible cattle sustained by the land as they migrate across it, but also the overall possible number of orcs sustained as they can live off of less meat per cattle, or better said be better fed per cattle, and thus be more likely to survive various environmental pressures and stressors. Aksum's interest in designing monsters and Callow possibly should Masego introduce the Summoners art for making possibly custom made fauna, are probable exporters of aids for generally vivifying the Steppes further. The more orcs the steppes can hold the better they can act as a mercenary state.

The Legionaire Orcs and the Steppe Orcs are possibly going to have a schism in the future unless they are under a similar integrate paradigm, one can already see the competing philosophies within them that may cause eventual infighting unless suborned to a shared sense of purpose. The Legionaire's desires for static towns actually make good possible trade post for guarding the migration of Cattle, while the more mobile raiders are quite useful as counter-agents against dissenting clans who raid those who have accepted migrational pacts.

In other news its quite interesting to see how undifferentiated Names seem to come at a precipital point after a great change has caused the culture its coming from into a kind of clean slate state. Either having lost much of itself so that a new iteration comes as the shattered sub-cultures ameliorate, forceful adaption due to great change, or like in the orcs case erasure of known precepts. Its an interesting pattern in that it can be seen in both Above's "from the ashes" style where Good loses but comes back in the end, and in Below as Villains suborn known groups or resources to bring their vision of how the world should be into fruition often meaning remolding and changing an existent structure. Its kind of like evolutionary change after an extinction, with new creatures filling in niches rapidly.

I do wonder if Hakram felt that bloodlust due to a kind of inbuilt part of the Name that was carried on or if it was there because orcs felt that a Warlord would feel bloodlust and thus that was writ into the Name. His rejection of this and his own thoughts do make one wonder what his own groove will be for it(similar to how Black was making a new one for Black Knights).

mavant

So are Juniper and Aisha confirmed together, or just kind of obviously pining for each other?

Martin Hrádela

They are interested in each other and both know it by the looks of it.

However they (especially Juniper) are very professional so they are basically waiting to not be on campaign or maybe even retire first. Also the interspecies thing seems to be extremely uncommon so it doesn't help either.

Interlude: West II

"The easy wars are the ones where one side's right and the other's wrong. The terrible ones are where they're both right, because once they know that there's no wrong they'll flinch away from."

– Aretha the Raven, Nicaean general

They were losing the war one victory at a time, Hanno thought.

There'd not been a defeat in Hainaut since the great battle that'd destroyed the principality, and still its defenders were losing the land. Hanno among them. Undaunted by a string of defeats in the fields, the Dead King had begun attacking with renewed vigour and it was working. The trouble was that while Hanno's army had been crushing the dead wherever they met, it could only be in one place. It could not both prevent the dead from reopening the tunnels at Malmedit and prevent them from breaking through at Juvelun, it could not both fight the army coming from Luciennerie out west and relive General Abigail from the latest siege at Lauzon's Hollow.

Hanno's army was spent and exhausted, ever victorious and ever smaller. And even worse was that they were no longer truly an effective shield. The Dead King had begun ignoring the defences in Hainaut and sending large flying constructs – named Pelicans, for their head resembled those of the birds – over the walls to disgorge warbands in Arans and Brabant, where they wreaked havoc before being slain. The Pelicans themselves avoided fighting, however, and though Antigone had brought down several with storms and lightning more kept coming. General Abigail believed that soon Keter would begin landing mages the same way to create disrupting forces by slaying and raising villages.

The Fox's instincts were sharp enough that Hanno was not inclined to doubt them.

From what he heard, it was much the same to the west. Princess Rozala and her Named had pulled off a miracle just south of Peroulet but the defence line there had still failed for a time and it'd been costly to restore it. To the northwest, the Kingfisher Prince had smashed through every army on his way south to Brus while a sea of undeath nipped at his heels. Then to win his home some respite Frederic Goethal had turned back with half a dozen Named and his retinue to destroy a Crab, getting severely wounded. He would have gotten himself dead instead, had Otto Redcrown not ridden to his rescue and led their retreat through an avalanche. The love ballad about it was highly popular in camp.

Yet for all that the singing did the souls of soldiers good, it did not change the truth of things: the defences south of Cleves were teetering on the brink of collapse and those north of Brus would not hold when the tide came. Everywhere the war was being lost, and as was always the way when doom crept close men looked for someone to blame. The Army of Callow was the least harmful, simply insisting that if the Black Queen were there the dead would already be routed, but others were not so measured. The First Prince was cursed for weakness, Amadis Milenan men lost at the Battle of the Camps that might now turn the tide and the League of Free Cities for having made it all worse.

It was worse between Procerans. Lycaonese blamed feckless southerners, having lost half their princes and all their homes defending strangers they held in contempt, while Alamans cursed the Lycaonese for having drained their lands of men to defend the indefensible and Arlesites for being miserly in helping with the defence of the realm. As for the Arlesites, more and more they questioned their very presence in these parts. Why should they stand against nightmares when their own homes were yet untouched? Should they all die and leave their homeland undefended for when the storm came? Desertions would have been common if there was anywhere safer to flee to. Hanno had kept the army from coming anywhere near Neustal, knowing he'd lose hundreds to Julianne's Highway overnight should he approach the fortress.

Hanno had been giving hope where he could, though not always in manners comfortable to him. Too many called him Lord White, and some of the rumours from further south... He had pushed down the discomfort, it was a small price to pay for keeping the armies from despair. The Lycaonese captains he had supported when the northerners had almost split over returning to their homelands had begun to look to him for orders, like the Brabantine levies, and even fantassins now sought his commands instead of Princess Beatrice Volignac's – she whose very lands they were fighting in. There was a time where Hanno would have taken a step back, after realizing he now led what was effectively the second largest military force left in Procer, but no more.

The Truce and Terms had been forged under an understanding: he and Catherine would see to the affairs of Named while Cordelia Hasenbach saw to the affairs of state. It was never to be a perfect arrangement, not when Catherine Foundling was also an influential ruler in her own right, but there had been a balance. All contribute, all held up their part. Only now the First Prince no longer did. Reinforcements were no longer coming, the flow of soldiers and supplies tapering off. Salia was not holding up its part of the bargain, the promise that mortal law could see the war prosecuted without need for Named to step in. So what reason was there for Hanno to step back?

He would not hide behind a broken bargain when his duty was clear.

And so he had spoken with Antigone, who had spoken in turn with the only father she remembered. Which led him to a cool morning, standing with only her at his side as in the distance the sun rose and a brisk wind twisted around them. In the distance smoke rose in curtains, Keter's armies ever making a hundred fresh devilries to unleash, but here on the hills the only thing to mar the green grass was soft dew. Greenery and water shivered both as the Witch of the Woods finished the last of her spell, clouds high above dispersing as if they'd been swatted through. A weight settled on the world, dew turning to mist as the grass began to twist and grow.

In the rising mists stood a giant out of the old stories. Bronze-skinned like others of his kind, but none of the Gigantes would ever dare to claim kinship with Kreios Maker-of-Riddles. It would have been absurd, in their eyes, as a fly claiming kinship to a hawk. The Titanomachy kept to no king, but that was only because it kept to something simpler: a god. There had been many, once, but now only one still lived. Crippled, left a shadow of himself. And yet Hanno knew without a doubt that even the spell-shadow now staring down at him could snuff his existence out with a thought. The ancient Titans, the founders of the Titanomachy, had done a great many arrogant things.

Calling themselves gods had not been one of them.

"Antigone."

The voice was fond, thick with affection. Hanno's comrade shifted, head dipping down and to the side to show both love and reverence. What had led Antigone to be raised by the Titan he did not know, much less what had convinced the ancient creature to teach her of the powers of the Gigantes, but their closeness had been evident from the first time he'd seen them. The Riddle-Maker had no such fondness for him, however, and the gaze was not so kind when turned to Hanno.

"White Knight."

"Lord Titan," Hanno replied, simply dipping his head.

Reverence but not love. Insincerity in the language of the Gigantes was seen as highly offensive. Worse than an insult, which at least was clearly conveyed.

"I am told you would make a request."

He straightened.

"I would," Hanno said. "This war, Lord Kreios, is one we are losing."

"So it is."

The indifference was plain to hear. The Riddle-Maker did not involve himself much in the affairs of his own descendants, much less these of humans. To that pale and patient gaze, they were like mayflies: come and gone in a moment. What did petty wars matter to the last of the Titans?

"It will not be like the others," Hanno said. "The Intercessor has meddled. Should it be lost, there will be consequences."

The Titan's gaze was cold.

"To you."

"You are wrong, Lord," Hanno replied. "If this were a crusade, perhaps, but this war is not that. The east came as well, and now the south rises. The world stirs. This war will not be like the others."

Consideration.

"The Young King no longer withholds strength."

A concession.

"Your request?"

Hanno breathed in. Many a time he had thought of what he might say, of what words might sway an entity that had known more years he had known breaths. A hundred speeches he had crafted and discarded, only to admit the truth to himself: there were no words that would do it. Convince the Riddle-Maker should he not wish to be convinced. All he could do was ask and hope.

"Fight," Hanno of Arwad said, and the word rang of power. "Stand with Calernia, with life and hope. Stand with us and fight."

Silence.

"All things pass," Kreios Maker-of-Riddles said. "You and he alike. Fate cannot be gainsaid or turned back: what must be will be."

"Apathy?" Hanno replied. "Is that your answer, last of the Titans? Is that the wisdom your many years have to offer us?"

He glared, defiant.

"I see no wisdom in this," he said. "Only weariness, and what worth is that? Who in this world is not weary, Riddle-Maker?"

"There is no word in any tongue your mind can comprehend," the Titan said, "that would touch a sliver of what true weariness is. How could you? You grope at a speck of dust in the face of eternity and call it an end. You are not even a beginning, child. You are the dust of dust."

"Then what holds you back?" Hanno challenged. "If none of it matters, if we are but dust, what stays your hand?"

The dark-skinned man raised his chin, glaring up at the shape in the mist.

"Retreat from the world all you like, it does not retreat from you," Hanno said. "It will knock at your door, Maker-of-Riddles. It may be that you would weather our destruction, but would the Titanomachy?"

"All things pass," the Riddle-Maker simply said.

Hanno scornfully laughed.

"It may be that you are worse than the elves," he said. "Even they, in the face of oblivion, can muster more than a shrug."

That, at last, earned a reaction.

"If you knew the truth of your insult, you would swallow your tongue," the Titan said. "What the Dawning King schemes is abomination. Parcelling godhead into children, forcing a spring rightfully denied."

"And this shines kindness on you?" Hanno coldly said. "What a prize to claim, that your apathy is less a curse on Calernia than abomination."

"Your fight means nothing," the Titan said.

"He's right," Antigone said.

Silence. Surprise.

"Antigone?"

"We don't deserve saving," the Witch of the Woods said. "It's still true, what you told me when I was a child: we are petty creatures, humans. Most of us are not worth the saving."

The last of the Titans watched the woman he had raised, wearing her face of painted clay, and said nothing.

"But it's not about us," Antigone said. "It's about you."

She moved her head to the side, tilted it back. Grief, question.

"You stand at the crossroads again," Antigone said. "Do you want to be the seven or the one?"

Hanno's eyes narrowed. He had known that pattern to be older than most suspected, but whatever ancient lore she was speaking of was beyond even the reach of Recall. The Riddle-Maker's pale eyes stayed on the woman he'd raised, silence stretching, and suddenly the pressure vanished. The mist dispersed and the wind began to blow again. The spell-shadow of Kreios was gone.

"Will he come?" Hanno asked.

Antigone's shoulders were tense. I don't know, she signed. Hanno of Arwad ruefully smiled, looking up at the sky. This morning the answer had been a no, he thought.

It was a small step forward, but still a step.

—

It was Lyonis that had done it, Cordelia decided.

On the great map at the heart of the Vogue Archive, the grey of death had spread. Bremen and Neustria were both lost to the dead and already the norther border of Brus was being tested. Once the generals of the Dead King had found paths through the swamps, once the thousands of Lycaonese slain were armed and assembled into battalions, the push into Brus would begin and the death knell of Procer would ring. And yet those news had not resonated strongly, down south — only Lycaonese principalities had fallen and Cordelia's homeland was barely considered part of the Principate in some parts.

It was when the dead had smashed through the last few strongholds in Cleves and toppled the hastily raised defences in northern Lyonis that the panic had begun to spread. Princess Rozala had done the impossible – won three battles in three days with the same army across a breadth of sixty miles – and broken the enemy offensive before restoring the defences, but some had still slipped through. For the first time since the war had begun, bands of undead had made into Lyonis. One had even made it as far south as the border of Salia before being ridden down.

Despite Cordelia's best efforts to maintain the calm, planting rumours it'd been bandits instead, panic had spread like a disease in every direction. The people of the Principate were being confronted with the fallibility of the realm they'd been under all their lives, the thought finally occurring that this wasn't simply another crisis: Procer would be annihilated if it lost and it was undeniably losing the war.

Riots had been only to be expected. In Salia at least Cordelia had been able to put down largely without blood using the alchemical compound the Concocter had sold the Assembly the recipe to. Elsewhere the rioting had been put down violently if it had been put down at all. Entire swaths of Iserre were now in revolt against both Cordelia and their own prince while the ports of eastern Creusens had seized grain barges meant for further north before beginning to turn away all ships. That was not the worst of it, of course. This very morning her spymaster Louis de Sartrons had brought news of a smaller but more personal grief.

Princess Francesca, her friend and ally of almost a decade, was dead. Her palace had been swarmed by a mob of rioters and disaffected soldiers, who'd dragged the sixty-four years old princess into the streets and splattered her head with a rock before displaying her on a pole. It had happened, Cordelia was told, because Francesca had refused to consider what her distant cousin and successor proclaimed within the hour: Tenerife was seceding from the Principate of Procer. Envoys were being sent, Louis had told her, to Empress Basilia of Aenia and the League of Free Cities. Tenerife was leaving a sinking boat in favour of the protection that might be offered by a rising one.

The principality of Orense had followed suit within the week, deposing its distant prince still fighting under Princess Rozala and installing his youngest daughter in his stead, a thirteen-year-old girl who signed whatever the rebel leaders put in front of her to avoid having her throat cut and her ten-year-old brother shoved into the seat instead. Those were the open rebellions, but there were those more discreet.

Cordelia's steadfast ally Prince Renato of Salamans had regretfully informed her he would no longer be able to send food and men north. If he did, he would lose this throne within the month. Prince Salazar of Valencis had done the same thing but less honestly, speaking instead of 'unforeseen delays' in sending both. Cordelia's authority strengthened the further north one went, it could be said, but even there it was thinning. Orne, Cantal and Creusens now refused refugees at their borders no matter what was ordered. The only principalities that still obeyed Cordelia were those who felt the Dead King looming over them and even that rule was not ironclad.

Panic was making men do foolish things. Prince Ariel of Arans, spooked by the growing incursions of the dead into his lands, was trying to approach Callow for protection again – and willing to go under Laure for it, should that be the price. Cordelia was more amused than offended, knowing that neither Queen Catherine nor Princess Vivienne would be remotely interested and that Duchess Kegan, the regent in the capital, was of the opinion that everything east of the Parish should be left to burn. Worse than that was the talk in Brabant, where civil unrest had been placated only by the ruling princess abdicating and promising the offer the crown to the man the people saw as their salvation: Hanno of Arwad, the White Knight.

Cordelia's agents had told her when the Brabant levies had begun to call the man 'Lord White' but, now that the sentiment was spreading through their homeland, she was facing the very real prospect of Prince White. The First Prince was not sure she had the votes to prevent confirmation of such a title by the Highest Assembly if the matter came before them. It was a sign of the times. Salia's authority was weakening and now a hundred petty kings were emerging from the cracks on a once-great realm. And yet what could she do? So very little, when it came down to it, but that was no excuse for inaction and apathy.

Cordelia Hasenbach would not stand before the Heavens having known idle hands while the Principate of Procer burned down around her.

And today she would be laying eyes on one of the ways she might yet stem the tide. The weapon had been moved out of Aisne, which was now too close to for her tastes, and brought to Salia itself. Outside the city proper, requiring an hour's ride there and back, but Cordelia would make the time to look at the angel's corpse with her own eyes regardless. The test done in Aisne had made it necessary: if the First Prince was to use such a weapon, she would first gaze upon it. It was the last of what was owed. The man she'd chosen to oversee the matter awaited her at the edge of the grounds, mounted as well, as Cordelia allowed herself a genuine smile: even in these circumstances, it was a pleasure to see Simon de Gorgeault again.

"Your Most Serene Highness," the older man said.

"Simon," she warmly replied.

She had not forgotten his actions during Balthazar's attempted coup, or his loyal service since as her Lord Inquisitor. He'd put down the title to serve here instead, but it had taken little urging. They both knew that spending time curtailing the House of Light now be much like closing the blinds on a home aflame. Besides, she had needed someone she could trust to handle this. He led her through the small houses where the priests and soldiers lived and to the temple that had been chosen to host the corpse. Larger than such a temple out in the countryside should be, for it hosted the tomb of some distant Merovins, but not a structure of great beauty: it was all worn pale stone and tall angular ceilings.

Once windows of tainted glass would have added some charm, but over the years some had been broken and replaced by simple green glass. Yet the temple was large enough and it was placed far from prying eyes, which was what had been required.

"I would advise that you gather yourself before entering, Your Highness," Simon said after they dismounted. "It is... an experience."

Cordelia silently nodded, eyes going down to her palm. She could faintly feel the burn of laurels against it, a pale echo of the searing pain she had felt the night she caught the coin of the Sword of Judgement. Simon de Gorgeault led the way into the temple, guards closing the gates behind them, and silence washed over Cordelia. It was as if the air had turned to water, and though she gulped down breaths she found her heart going wild. Simon's cheeks were flushed but he seemed otherwise unaffected, perhaps from practice. Cordelia eventually gathered her bearings, smoothing down her dress and proceeding further into the temple.

There must have been rooms and halls she walked through, but she could barely see any of them. The slipped through her mind as if it were oily fingers. All that the First Prince recalled was movement, and then she stood before it. The weapon. The ealamal. It felt like the bones of a grand creature, curving along the ceiling, but there was nothing natural in this: wings of burnished copper spread wide, touching... something. A spine, Cordelia's mind insisted, but it was not of bone. Her eyes shied away from it and what she could glimpse seemed like stone sometimes, though impossibly small compared to the burning wings of copper, and yet at others it seemed like translucent spike of swirling colours. Her eyes watered from trying to look at it.

"Only priests capable of wielding Light can look directly at it, Your Highness," Simon said.

"The wings seem as though they might be simply copper, but the... spine," Cordelia quietly said. "That is not of Creation."

"You have not looked long as the wings, then," Simon said. "That is for the best. I have known shallower seas."

Cordelia shivered.

"But it worked, when used?" she asked.

"It is as an amplifier for Light, and something more too," Simon agreed. "It carries something of the Choir of Judgement within itself and spreads it wherever it goes. It would incinerate undead and devils it touches, certainly, but beyond that the matter grows complicated."

"It did not kill anyone who could use Light," Cordelia said.

"But it killed soldiers as well as the criminals, Your Highness," Simon said. "Not all of them, but many. Should a wave of such power pass over Procer, hundreds of thousands will almost certainly die."

Judgement was strict and not inclined to mercy when doling out punishment. The weapon, when used, seemed to mimic the harsh attentions of that Choir. And people were only people, with all the frailties and wickedness that implied. Should the weapon be used on a large scale, many thousands would be slain. But not all of the Principate, Cordelia thought. Many, too many, but not all. And even should Catherine's worst predictions come true and the Intercessor seek to influence such a weapon – which should not be possible, with Judgement silenced by the Hierarch's spirit – to spread over all of Calernia, it would not represent annihilation. Some would survive. It would be a monstrous order to give and a horrifying outcome, the First Prince would not pretend otherwise.

It would still be preferable to letting the Dead King kill every living thing on the continent.

"Have it prepared for use," Cordelia rasped out.

The former head of the Holy Society stiffened.

"I have misgivings, Your Highness," Simon said. "I understand your instinct: it will take months of priests pouring Light to make of the corpse something that would give the Dead King pause. Yet such power, when gathered, has a way of demanding use."

"In five months, the Principate will collapse," the First Prince of Procer said.

The older man paused.

"We have too many refugees, Simon, and not enough fields," she said. "I have been staving off the end by buying every scrap of grain I can borrow and beg, but the point of no return has come and gone. We have too many refugees and not enough fields, we are no longer sustainable."

"Can Keter not be toppled?" the older man asked.

"Undead will be at the gates of Salia by the time our armies encamp below the walls of the Crown of the Dead," Cordelia said. "I expect by then the south will have effectively seceded anyhow. I have ensured our armies will have supplies to carry on that last strike, but I can do no more than that."

"Can the Chosen not turn the tide?" Simon asked, almost plaintively.

"The Chosen," Cordelia hissed, "are the backbone of our defeat. How much time did we spend wrestling them into order as again and again they threatened the foundations of the alliances keeping us alive? The Damned might be a pack of rapacious killers, but they never gave us half the trouble the Chosen of the Heavens did. The Red Axe, the Mirror Knight, even the White Knight himself."

She clenched her fists.

"I was promised that the Named would be seen to, but in this only the Black Queen kept her word," Cordelia Hasenbach harshly said. "The White Knight failed utterly in this, and I will not now rely on him when the fate of every living soul in Calernia rests in the balance."

She stared down Simon of Gorgeault.

"Have it prepared for us," the First Prince repeated, and this time the ring of an order was unmistakable.

The laurels burned against her palm, but Cordelia did not flinch. She would do what she must so keep the west in the war until the last moment. And should it stumble, should it fail?

She would, again, do what she must.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

"Will he vote?" Hanno asked.

Antigone's shoulders were tense. I don't know, she signed.
Hanno of Arwad ruefully smiled, looking up at the sky. This morning the answer had been a no, he thought.

Linnus42

To ErraticErrata, I know what "niggardly" means but I strongly advise against using that word period. I would suggest using any sort of synonym you want quite frankly.

Oshi

+1

Tenthyr

Yep.

icouldbeusingmytimebetter

Strongly agree

TeK

I mean, I understand why, but WHY? Is there anyone in the world who will find offence in the word that sounds like another, even though it has absolutely nothing to do with it? By which point it gets too absurd?

Linnus42

I mean you say that like the word EE used is the only one can convey his point. I think he is much better writer then that. What is the harm in simply using a different word that has the same meaning but doesn't sound like a heinous racial slur?

Velrix

Sounds like a racial slur ? Sounds ? Hey stop writing you're insulting. If you're indisposed by something that Sounds like another, go see a psy, you're indisposing Me.

isioisi

You are the ones continuing to give that word power by trying to strike down any that even share passing similarity. See it, recognise it is not the same, and move on. Don't make an issue out of something that isn't.

sengachi

The word was given power by a lot of extremely evil people and their extremely evil actions. That well is poisoned, and you can't unpoison it by insisting on drinking from it anyway anymore than you can undo antebellum slavery.

AbraKadabra

Extremely evil, huh? How Extremely? Like dread empress triumphant evil? Or Just Malicia evil? Or you are Just throwing around big words?

Miles

May she never RETURN!

glares

Insanenoodlyguy

And if we were attempting to use that word, "take it back" sure. This word however, is not that word.

Adrian V

The simple fact that it isn't, changing it because it sound ssimilar is not only stupid but dangerous because it gives power to that other word, instead of help it only agravates things

Iceember

I think most people don't and won't have issue if EE does decide to use another word.

The issue stems from the fact that someone is policing a word that sounds like another word that has been used in a negative context for a long time. To add onto that, the policing of this word is grounded in the guess that someone may take offense to the use of the word.

ISiejek

I think you got it bang on, Would EE changing that would be offensive, no, is somebody claiming that you should otherwise someone might be offended by utterly ridiculous, yes (not the claim that somebody might get offended that's probably true, but those are the people whose opinions we really want to enforce now are they...).

Hargabga

No harm. I, however, resent the precedent of self-censure on the grounds of "it sounds similar". A line has to be drawn somewhere. Getting rid of established historical racist slurs is a good thing, because it shuts down on the ideas of the olden days not allowing them to propagate itself further. It makes an objective impact on the world.

Getting rid of everything that can be even remotely construed as offensive serves noone and just makes things worse, because this kind of thinking does not stop. Because you are not fighting harmful ideas and stereotypes, you are creating them.

Say you forbid everything that even sounds like a racial slur. Now the real racists pick up a new word to do the same. You forbid it and it's lookalikes. Congratulations. They pick up a new one. The cycle continues. You have no language left after a few iterations. That is what happens if you just never stop.

caoimhinh

In this day and age, some people just love to find something to be offended about, no matter how ridiculous it is.

Onos

+1

Liliet

I'm with Linnus42 here.

Abrakadabra

Nobody cares...

Daltos

You obviously, seeing as you care enough to comment.

Abrakadabra

It means that offering 'I am with this side' is a worthless comment that is akin to saying 'Einstein said that' which is also stupid since it appeals to authority, but it does not even have that dubious authority here.

sengachi

It's not about finding something to be offended about. It's about recognizing that some people have very good, very personal reasons to flinch and have bad reactions to the word. (Yes I know there's not etymological connection, that's not the point). A whole lot of deeply fucking evil people poisoned the English language for any word which sounds like this. If you have an issue with the fact it's a word people have a bad reaction to, take it up with them, not the people pointing it out.

Shveiran

It is not my habit to diminish pain, but in my opinion anyone having a painful reaction to a word someone uses without any ill intent because it sounds like another, unrelated word needs to work on their own knee-jerk reactions; that burden is not on the speaker. This is not about respect, for no disrespect is being offered.

I'd also humbly put forward that, if we mean to ban similar sounding words and not just the offending ones, we'll never get it done.

After all, a shrimp is not a simp, a boar is not a whore, a rope is not a rape, I often have a shave but I never had a slave, and a bastard is not made of mustard.

Asking people not to be offensive is reasonable. Asking them to go this far is simply impractical, and therefore doomed to fail even if we agreed it would be more courteous to do so.

webster_json

'simp', 'whore', 'rape', 'slave', 'bastard'... are all not particularly offensive terms. At most 'rape' can be triggering, but it remains a widespread word largely because it is common and useful (as a word, not the act itself).

The word we're talking about... I think a lot of people in this thread aren't American. I don't know if you are. Maybe. But it's not a swear word, it's not an insult per se, it's not a 'bad word'. If you use that word, it's because you want to be seen as signaling that black people are inferior.

The period of slavery is America's greatest shame, multiple centuries of what cannot be called anything but evil, evil committed unrepentantly as a society... and more to the point, it still echoes today. Race relations in the US may be always improving, but they are not good. You can trace a direct path from police violence, or deeply-entrenched poverty, or segregated schools (which still exist de facto in many cities, even those like NYC that are naturally highly diverse), and take that back to the Civil Rights era, or the former decades of redlining, or the prior history of the Jim Crow Era, all the way back to the Civil War – a war that killed more Americans than all others in our history combined, despite a smaller population, and a war which is still, again, extremely visible today (I've seen Confederate flags (which technically weren't, but anyways) waved at rallies by the dozen before – in a Northern state, no less). And, of course, centuries of enslavement prior to that, on which our very country was built.

Other countries don't follow the same linguistic standards, which is why telling Spanish-speakers not to use 'negro' is silly. Other countries don't have the same history of enslavement within the bounds of their own country, which is why they may be more blase about such things. But in this one case – especially when, frankly, 'niggardly' is an extremely rare adjective with a meaning easily covered by synonyms – I think it's absurd to equate it to 'being afraid' of common slurs.

Shveiran

I am not American, but what of it? I'm sorry, but English is not just the American language, and is being used on a large portion of the internet by non-native speakers like myself besides.

You tried to explain why that word (which is not niggardly) provokes such a strong reaction in the U.S.. I dare say I understand, but I don't think it matters, for the same reasons you too are applying to my examples.

You say "they are all not particularly offensive", and I assume you are in good faith and speak from your own personal experience.

My experience is different.

In Italy, until not so long ago, being born out of wedlock was a real cause of social stigma; trying to explain to them that being called bastards as they were growing up was not offensive would not go over well.

Insulting someone by calling them a simp means to champion a toxic view of sexuality that is rampant in my country, which influenced my own upbringing and I can see impacting the kids I follow as part of my charity.

Insulting someone by calling them a whore is both punching down on women often enough forced into such a career (at least here, I don't know how many are "freelancers" in other countries) and again perpetuating the stereotype that men play the field but women shouldn't.

As of slavery, well, here the word you are fighting against is only used to mean “black-skinned foreigner”; the foreigners I’ve met don’t like it, obviously. But they don’t flinch. Their eyes harden instead when someone uses a turn of phrase like “I was worked as a slave”, because slavery is what they suffered (some, sadly, even in Italy in the work-camps of the Mafia).

Please understand that I am not claling you out because you said those words were not offensive.

I’m just trying to say that, in my opinion:

- if we try to rank words for offensiveness, most of our criteria will not be objective but based on our experience;
- the Internet is not on American soil;
- giving heat to words that sound like others seems rather silly and impractical to boot.

We are a long way from learning to talk without using actually offensive words with each other; to already include in our focus innocent words that sound almost like those is doomed to fail. Trying to fight on all fronts may be (may be) right in principle, but it nevertheless guarantees defeat.

ISiejek

I just like to say I’m really impressed with how respectfully and effectively you made your point here, that’s rare to see on the Internet nowadays

Josh

Care to explain why choosing a different word is such an unfair burden to place on someone, and how you imagine the moral calculations between someone being upset vs the seconds it would take to look up an online thesaurus would go?

While I’m asking these questions, care to add how someone should know if another person means them ill-intent other than by judging behaviors and the person’s response to being told that one of their behaviors has causes some harm? Exactly how much etymology should someone have to study before you’d allow them the human decency to request that you not do something that hurt their feelings? Do you have a bunch of tests you carry around so that you can accurately judge whether or not anyone you speak to that might take offense at your word choice has the prerequisites for you to care? Would it make any impact at all in your life for you to think a little longer before using a word that might be misinterpreted, at least an impact other than the outrage you might feel that someone out there might not have to feel hurt and alienated because you can't use a word that only barely was used before people raised a fuss about it?

It is a matter of respect. If someone asks you to not do something for them and you turn around and either condescend and argue with them about their feelings validity, or you straight up tell them you don't care about them and will continue doing it anyway, that is disrespectful and unkind.

Abrakadabra

I am sniggering at your stupidity, snowflake.
Yes, sniggering another Word to ban. After that you can burn all the books that ever used such words. Just like the real racist did in Berlin way Back.
Anyway, good crusade to you, little reverse ayan, and good night.

Hakram's Dead Hand

Yeeesh. "Snowflake" "little reverse ayan" All you've done is belittle and insult in this entire thread.
Maybe you should take a step back and calm down, or try having a civil conversation. There's no reason to be intentionally toxic, Abrakadabra, and it might do to have some consideration for others.

Abrakadabra

You are correct, and I might have overreacted. But I think he just asked for it really.

Zach

There's a very big difference between the word in question being used in writing and being used in speech. With the latter, it's actually reasonably possible to mistake it for a racial slur. In writing, however, it is not. There's also a difference between a situation like this (where there's nothing actually wrong with the language used) and something like misgendering someone (where the language used is incorrect and a specific person is the target of the language). These things should not be conflated.

It's kind of sad seeing this sort of thing, because this meaningless nonsense is basically what people are forced to focus on when they realize that they can't actually influence any of the things that materially impact people's lives. Since there's nothing people can do about the issues that cause actual material suffering, they just endlessly quarrel on the internet about cultural minutiae.

veritas

It's not unfair, it's ridiculous. You can't go through life expecting to not be offended. You do not have the right to not be offended. You can't have disagreement without risk of offense. You can't really have progress without ideas being challenged, therefore risking offense.

You're asking people who are trying to do something great (like provide us content) to waste time trying to avoid every little thing that might offend someone in this big wide world. The sheer arrogance of that request is astonishing because you're asking for an exercise in futility. It doesn't matter if it takes only a second. We all have very limited time on this planet. Engaging in something as pointless as using different words is a waste of their life. No, you don't get to make this kind of request without ridicule.

Also where is the line drawn? Any time someone doesn't like an argument, they can claim the argument was offensive. What is even the point of discussion?

There's a big difference between respect and civility. Most people are civil to people they don't know. That is NOT respect. And most people haven't done enough with their lives that they merit real respect.

Evaluating intent is always contextual. It's part of social interaction. If this is a serious question, you need to learn how to actually interact with people.

Raved Thrad

This. Exactly this. People have gotten so used to shouting "waah I'm offended" and having others chime in on it online and subsequently bullying people into capitulating to them that they've forgotten one simple thing:

Offense gets you nothing. You are owed nothing due to your being offended.

Being offended is a choice. You saw something, you processed it, and you chose to get your dander up. Nothing is inherently offensive, and citing that you are offended by something is you expressing a subjective situation, not an objective one.

And again, it gets you nothing.

You can shout to the highest heavens about how something offends you. Offenditard religiots and conservatards get in my face all the time about how I'm a hellbound atheist who offends their moral sensitivities. They can shout themselves hoarse until they turn blue and it still gets them nothing.

Something offends you? Then go unoffend yourself. That's the only sane, logical, and adult thing to do. Everything else is a childish tantrum.

Rynjin

No one is obliged to acquiesce to every asinine request someone has. Refusing to do so is neither condescending or unkind, it's simply a matter of not letting someone else's raw, unfettered selfishness rule their life.

If it were actually something offensive, certainly. If your best argument is "it sounds vaguely like an offensive word but I know it's not", no, absolutely not.

This is that debacle with the Japanese streamer getting banned on Twitch for saying "nigerundayo" (run away) in his own language all over again. Absolutely fucking stupid.

Raved Thrad

Ugh, you should have seen when duhMurrican SJWs discovered that a region in my homeland is named "Negros," completely overlooking the fact that we were enslaved by the Spanish for almost 400 years. They went on long diatribes about how it was racist and offensive and demanding that we change the name of the place.

Fucking idiots.

M4X1MAL

Stop being ridiculous. What about the country of Nigeria? Should we avoid speaking its name because it reminds people of a certain slur and makes them uncomfortable? Should Nigeria change its name for that reason? I bet you're an american, right?

Abrakadabra

Ah, and when I eat the candy that is named negro after the italian inventor? Because that was his name. Should we Just throw away everithing that EVER offended someone?

Josh

No, but you should take steps to avoid using words, ideas, and concepts that would probably offend someone, regardless of whether or not you agree with their feelings.

At least you should if you want to be a person that can be called kind. The validity of anyone else's feelings but your own aren't your business to litigate. Their feelings belong to them and whether they're valid (or not) is up to them as well.

If you could avoid a behavior that could cause harm to someone else but don't, you're an unkind person. If you could easily avoid a behavior that causes harm (like opening up a thesaurus and picking any other word) but you dont because you have this idiotic belief that what you think is offense-worthy is the only thing that should be offense-worthy, then I'd call you a shitty person.

Other people's feelings matter more than your own, and everyone like you's, moral grandstanding about censorship.

AbraKadabra

Well, then I am a shitty person. And fuck you.

Sparky \(@ProsocialSparky\)

Correct, that's how we describe people who don't prioritize the well-being of others.

When people don't like you and decide to screw you over because you're useless, now you know why. You have no one but yourself to blame.

AbraKadabra

You are a selfdeluding jackass WHO thinks know others by a couple of words written. I care a out people. But strangers who wants to rule the way I speak and think? They can go to the deepest Hell and drown in their own shit.

In your heart you and your buddy think yourself the master of those you would guide towards your 'better world', or whatever you have. Because you believe you know better. You don't.

Josh

I feel like I had to come back to this and respond, share my opinion. I don't like the drive that people have to try and paint a person by a single aspect of their life. What everyone has seen of them (pronouns unknown, feel free to clarify Abrakadabra) in this comment thread is a negligible part of who they are.

Abrakadabra is a person who has done and will do awesome things for people around them. There are people that cherish them and for good reason. It's hella rude to say that they are useless and not liked, even if I were to grant that the measure of a person's worth is usefulness or popularity (which I'm not). I think it's a mean, petty, and inconsiderate act to try and attribute the issues we have with their perspective as a fundamental character flaw, especially if you have no intent to try and address those things and are just attacking someone's character and self-esteem because of the gratification it gives you.

This topic and Abrakadabra's responses might have a lot more of a profoundly negative impact on your mood than it does on mine because of your experiences, in which case I'm not above being a jerk when I'm upset either and it's a lot easier to say that you should be kind to others when you're not also trying to deal with personal emotions. That being said, I'm not obligated to stand aside when I feel one person is doing things that might hurt another person, even if we both nominally agree that Abrakadabra's view can be really insensitive. I mean it seriously when I say that I care about other people's feelings, and that doesn't stop being true just because I think someone is doing cruel things.

Abrakadabra

Like I care about pronouns and whatnot... For all intents and purposes I might be not even a human but a sentient ice cream machine. Because it matters not on the internet... Similarly you cannot REALLY be cruel to someone over the internet, though I saw some who went great lengths to do that, and the attacked party just turned off the computer and had a laugh.

Because noone can force the other to do anything over the internet, and that is what makes it great!

So yea, because of the suggestion that I have to do something like opening a thesaurus for the sake of someone I will never meet I myself might got offended without noticing.

I am sorry about reacting harshly.

But my main point stands, forcing others to something, and presuming to declare what is moral and what is not, moreover having the gall to Tell that whoever does what I want is good, and who does not is evil (or insensitive in this case) is really rude and offending in itself, far more than a misinterpreted Word might be.

Which misunderstanding can be cleared up immediately anyways while the intent to define for others what they should do and what is forbidden cannot be misinterpreted.

Josh

Since I'm already here to respond to Sparky, I might as well take the time to respond here. I don't think that's true, and I don't think you think that either, so I don't know why you felt the need to respond with a lie and an insult. Rather, I don't see why you would feel the need to do that other than to be a disingenuous dick.

Message received, you care nothing for my opinion, your mind is made up, and there's nothing I could say to get you to reconsider. I'll not try anymore, and I wouldn't have even come back in for this response if not for the dishonesty and hostility. Hope you change your mind at some point in the future, cause I want to live in a world where people care more about each other than they do trying to dismiss and not care about others because of their own limited perspective.

AbraKadabra

Limited perspectives have a thing for going them, you must admit. They are honest.

'Those are friends with everyone really friends with none.'

So I hope you will come to really, REALLY care about someone or a narrow group to the exclusion of everyone else, and realize that the opinion of strangers not matters to you that much.

sivarajan

I feel offended by all your comments. Are you going to take the easily-avoidable step of never posting here again? Or are you going to question the validity of my feelings?

Josh

I'll post because I believe that arguing for understanding and tolerance is more important than trying to tolerate intolerance. I think that trying to explain or share my pov is a worthy cause if it means that I could maybe change someone's mind and they then become a little bit more sympathetic and compassionate to others. I weigh that my doing something to achieve that goal is more important to me than stepping down because someone doesn't want to listen to me.

If the topic was less fundamental to who I was and what I cared about, then I probably would just stop if asked. I realize in not doing that, however, that you said my comments offended you, and while I won't necessarily stop speaking on fear of offending you, I will apologize and ask for clarification on how I offended and the emotional context of why so that I could maybe find a way of achieving what I want while also not hurting you.

It's a compromise, not a battle to the death. What could I offer to make things easier on you while still getting what I want? And if there's an impasse and nothing can be worked out, I try to empathize and be kind but continue with what I was doing and let you handle yourself until a compromise can be reached. I care about your feelings, not the exclusion of my own, but just because you're a person and have inherent value.

Rynjin

The "tolerating intolerance" tack only works if you're combating actual intolerance. Instead, you are IMAGINING intolerance, because you...don't understand English very well? I'm not sure.

Yes, absolutely, if someone is being racist, or sexist, or otherwise discriminatory, you are not obliged to hear them out. But that, again, only applies if they are actually doing so. You lose the moral high ground the instant you change tactics from combating actual injustice, to pushing the idea that anything vaguely resembling intolerant speech should be censored; and I'm not even talking about dog whistles here, before you change the subject, I'm talking about this literal situation where a word "looks racist" through whatever twisted lens you want to view it through, regardless of its actual meaning, and so should be censored.

Your own misunderstanding is not an excuse to claim victimhood.

Josh

I'm not arguing for censorship, nor do I think the word is racist.

What I'm saying is that you shouldn't need either of those to be true before you bother to care about what other people are feeling. That the entire facade of trying to determine the etymology of a word and whether it's racist or not is just an excuse to try and change the subject. Notice how you are not engaging on the grounds of "if something makes someone uncomfortable, I should try not to do that thing to them" and instead the topic gets drug back to racism and how evil censorship is.

I have no desire to dictate what words, phrases, feelings, ect that you have and use. What I care about is trying to share my value of compassion and empathy, and I think that if I communicated correctly, someone would understand that starting a flame war over an uncommon word isn't worth the strife it would cause people.

Maybe some people don't understand English words, who gives a shit? Does that make them any less deserving of compassion? Not to me, and I hope not to anyone else either.

Rynjin

The problem here is your definition of "compassion" seems to be "everybody does what I say". That's not compassion. It is, as I put it before, selfishness.

If 99% of people have no problem, but you have a problem, the problem is typically you. No one is obliged to tiptoe around saying anything for the sole benefit of you, and only you. The compassionate thing to do here is to realize that something has hurt you, but no harm was done, or meant, or could be inferred without your own specific hang up and so...you move on. Get the fuck over it.

Here's a quickie example. I fucking hated my dad, right up until he died last year. I get a twinge of anger, tinged with jealousy, any time I see excitement over Father's Day festivities, whether it be ads or just people on social media posting stuff about how much they love and appreciate their fathers.

That's a me problem. Full stop. How much of a prick would I have to be to go out there and say "Yeah, hey, I know you're all having a great time, but I don't actually give a shit. Father's Day makes me feel bad, so can you all stop celebrating?"

It would not be compassion if everybody suddenly decided to make their lives worse to make my life marginally better one day out of the year. And if you multiply that among the ~7.5 billion people on this planet, your definition of "compassion" is untenable. You can't expect everyone to cater their entire lives around your whims.

Henry

If a word used with no racist intent that only barely sounds like a racial slur causes you pain of any variety I think that's more on your deeply seated issues than the person who used it. Like can we not say Niger because it vaguely sounds like the N-word. Of course not it's completely unrelated. Like I get the urge to be respectful to people and acknowledge their feelings but you have to recognize that asking someone to change your word I just vaguely sounds like something bad is patently insane.

Adrian V

You can almost see where the people grew up because of their reactions, to most people outside the US the whole thing seems ridiculous, by your flag I remember you are Colombian so i bet you know 1 or 2 people that others just call "Negro" as an alias or something without ANY offense

caoimhinh

Yep, here in Colombia racism isn't that much of an issue except in some very isolated cases, since there was a lot of miscegenation here, so most people are mixed race, even if some may want to pretend to be pure caucasian or pure African American.

I supposed is a similar phenomenon to how the people who use the word "nigga" the most are black people but their use of the word wouldn't raise any eyebrows, while it would be scandalous for a white person to use that word.

About people being called "negro" or "negra", I know dozens actually. I live in Cartagena, which is a coastal city, and due to its history, the skin tone of people here tends to be darker than those near the capital, and our cultural heritage is a bit different too. Here, there are many that are called "el negro" o "la negra" and there is absolutely no disrespect or offense meant nor taken.

A word has power because of how it is used, and due to the meaning attached to it. And it is ridiculous to avoid or ban words because they are similar to other words.

Here there have been cases of someone using the word "negro" as an offensive term, and that's immediately noticeable by anyone who hears how it is spoken, and that is not okay here, it's not tolerated. It's immediately obvious when someone uses the word as an insult or with ill intentions.

Josh

I'm calling bullshit. Im going to go out on a limb and make a sweeping statement: there isn't a country in existence that doesn't have any issues with racism. Even a cursory Google search reveals several articles from Colombian human rights groups with damning statistics regarding afro-colombians as a minority group.

To be compassionate to you, a report from one of those human right groups does mention that this idea of a post-racial Colombia with a "no racism here, no sir" attitude was a deliberate myth spread by politicians.

That sort of propaganda has been spread by a lot of ruling classes with (probably) a lot more signs of overt racism and was still swallowed by millions, so I can understand why you'd believe that, but I'm pretty sure you're incorrect and that if you called up a local human rights group they'd be more than happy to tell you all the specific ways that there is a racism problem in Colombia.

Abrakadabra

Human rights groups, huh? You do realize that the very livelihood of those people depends on finding offense everywhere? They would be without a job pretty soon otherwise, so I take statistics like that with a grain of salt.

Josh

Ask anyone working for a human rights group how many of the people they know would gladly sacrifice their job if it meant that they would accomplish their goal.

Ask the leaders of those groups what percentage of the labor that occurs under them is volunteer driven, as opposed to a paid position, and even further as opposed to a well-paid position.

Or, you know, you could look that stuff up if you truly believe that so many people are willing to put so much effort and misinformation into keeping a supposedly make-work job.

Abrakadabra

Yeah, if asking would provide honest answers, right? And what they believe not make it true in any case. Self important people WHO thinks themselves heroes are everywhere. Some even makes a living out of it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

While I agree that words like "niggardly" should not always be avoided, you're clearly just a racist who's annoyed that people frown on racism. Stop projecting your self-serving, cynical nature onto others for a moment and you'll find there are plenty of honest activists in the world. But of course, you're too weak to do this.

Abrakadabra

Do you know Why cinicism never dies out despite being so looked down upon? Because it is mostly correct in describing human behaviour. Because of that 'mostly' part I am a realist instead. And honestly self aggrandizement is a very common motivation for many people. To fight for a 'worthy' cause, yes that is a great temptation. And also the reason why it makes many people biased in looking at and correctly understanding reality.

Adrian_V

Read again, he says it does exist but in a minority, for that matter don't trust everything the internet says because i bet most of the racism present involves the group we call "guajiros" rather than black people, here in venezuela is like that, well only in the parts that have a frontier with colombia.

Personally i trust my own experiences living here and of those i know personally and it all tells me serious racism is almost not existent here, in almost 30 years the only case of racism i have seen came from a family of relatively recent immigrants (yeah the irony is great, just goes to show you the kind of logic those people have)

Liliet

I'm Ukrainian, yet I can somehow follow the argument without problem.

It's about empathy and respect, not about origin (though origin does play a role, I'm sure it's easier to have empathy and respect for issues closer to home)

sivarajan

The word "empathy" sounds like "psyscopathy," an ableist slur against neurodivergent people. Please stop using it.

sivarajan

*psychopathy.

sengachi

It really doesn't matter if they're etymologically distinct. The first flinch reaction for a lot of people when reading it is negative, there's a good reason for that negative reaction, and there's just no point when other words with less baggage will do.

anonymous4968

There is no point. If it makes people uncomfortable for no justifiable reason, particularly when other less offensive words could be used. It happens all the time anyway.

One great example is Rapeseed. Even if the etymology of the word is the old Latin word Rapa, literally meaning Turnip. The sheer word Rape sensitive enough to be avoided. That's why in most countries it's called Canola now.

therealgridlock

You hear about that time feminists got upset over rape yellow paint?

You know, cuz they thought it was piss yellow, not the plant that's yellow and grows in massive yellow fields.

Funny how the more things change the more they stay the same.

anonymous4968

That sounds like like "feminists" to me and more like multiple supposedly higher intelligence somehow not realizing the multiple outs that could've avoided any problems throughout the whole release cycle. For example, calling it turnip yellow.

It is also highly off topic.

anonymous4968

Less like*
Higher intelligences*

Why can you not edit nor delete wordpress comments?
That's somehow worse than twitter.

Mental Mouse

Yes, there are people who will find offense. Many of them. Trying to dismiss them as "absurd" just doesn't fly. Bluntly, that fight has been lost.

sivarajan

To paraphrase Kairos, "The Age of Reason is not dead yet. Not while I breathe."

Shveiran

In hindsight, perhaps championing the Age of Reason with a quote from a self-proclaimed madman was a mistake.

tmightyquinn

Because the fundamental purpose of writing a story is to evoke an emotion in the reader by immersing them in a world and making them care about it, I would agree that taking out the “niggardly” is the right call. Not because the word should be illegal for all time, but because it probably evokes the wrong emotion in readers like myself who are familiar with the colossal fallout of the N-word.

The word “niggardly” breaks immersion for me, because when I come across it I think “holy s is that allowed?” for a moment before realizing that it’s a different word. Suddenly the reader is thinking about racism and linguistics instead of whatever cool thing is happening in the story. Case in point: this comments section

Whether the word should be tainted is kinda beside the point, because for many readers, it already is. That’s not to say you can’t use it, just that doing so might have an emotional effect. This is, incidentally, why you’re more likely to see things like the verb “retard” (as in to hold back) in papers or articles, because those writings are more about information than emotion, and the baggage doesn’t matter as much.

To summarize:

- you can use the word “niggardly” all you want, I don’t think anyone will be offended so much as surprised
- I personally won’t ever use it in a story, because in my cultural context it will likely evoke an emotion I do not intend

jamesc9

I’m used to stories about USians who can’t distinguish between ‘pediatrician’ and ‘pedophile’, and enact vigilante justice against doctors. A web search finds events that purport to be instances.

I don’t know that forestalling such people is a just thing. I could imagine thinking it a pragmatic thing. If the other alternative is criminalising stupidity, I would not vote for it.

GoodGirlJW

An extremely large portion of the world would, yes.

Anonymous

The word “niggard” does not share any common root with “nigger”. It isn’t particularly offensive language. This is simply being oversensitive, imo. It's one thing to avoid words that can give genuine offense and another to avoid words because they sound vaguely similar to offensive words even though anyone can tell that it is a different word.

At this stage what you are doing has no relation to the concerns of actual black people and nothing is bettered for it, practically speaking. You're simply frustrating the ability of people to express themselves for the sake of misplaced moralization.

Raven

not to mention the fact that the word "nigger" is only really a thing in the US, whereas I'm willing to bet that a lot of the readers are from other parts of the world (myself included) and don't draw any parallels to the n word unless its pointed out

Kharn

As a black man living in the U.S. y'all sound dumb as shit. Nigger and Niggardly are two different things. Sure, I get the obvious point everyone is making but that's just being a bitch, in all honestly. The moment I read the word I knew a hundred hundred people would make a fuss about it

Henry

I know I didn't and I am from the US. I'm pretty sure if we were to take a straw poll of people asking them if they got any connection before it was pointed out to them most of them would say no

ISiejek

Yeah I didn't even notice that it was a little bit alike, I read the word knew what the word meant because I've read words before and I'm not a four-year-old and have no problem with it, did run out of popcorn while reading all of the comments though 😂

caoimhinh

Lol yeah, the moment I saw the word niggardly written there, my reaction was to snicker and think "Oh, I have been on the internet enough to predict that someone is gonna get triggered by this, I just know it"

jamesc9

@ISiejek, so if running you out of popcorn was not the point of the story, then it seems that an author choosing this word rather than another has, pragmatically, had an unintended effect.

Ilncos

To ErraticErrata I, in the other hand, strongly recommend you use any word that you prefer. I dislike censorship and more if it is based in something as childish as a word sounding similar to other. congratulations for creating such an inclusive world where there are people of different races and sexualities and they are not discriminated against for it

Abrakadabra

Yes, one of the main attractions of the series is not making it about the sexuality and racial issues. Different people exist, yes, and nobody blinks. And that is far more preferable to me Than having to watch these people struggle because of the way they are and having to wait till they defeat the obligatory racist/sexist/whateverist bad guy. This book is about real issues with real conflicts, like how praes really starves without attacking its neighbours, economy, even politics(!) not made up bullshit designed to divide people.

(Because I really think that a great part of the réal world politics is nothing else but a gigantic diversion to divide people while the richest 0.1 percet walks away with the loot.)

Shaerick 68

Don't be such a child.

Abrakadabra

Bullshit on that. Language is there to be used. Dont listen to all these naggers... They are Just nagging.

Raved Thrad

I'd say it's a niggling sort of nagging, but that might be throwing fuel on the fire.

kal durak

Speaking as someone who has had to endure the slur used against him, I still would object to relegating "niggardly" to the PC void!

We can't keep hiding from the possibility of people taking offense where none was meant. If we do, we might as well just crawl into a hole and pull the dirt in after us!

sivarajan

Snigger at the nagger's niggling.

Abrakadabra

Yep. While traveling from Niger to Nigeria... Between the two there are 2 hundred million people whose very name for their country offends someone a continent away...

Bra bra

You do realize that there is a country called Niger? And that there is Nigeria too? Between the two they have 220 million people. Most of them black. Why not in true proceran style we try to make them change their names? And if they refuse to comply, then we can start a crusade... I mean we can bomb them Back into the stone age for being racist.

SomeGuyWhoReadsThings

Yep, I think it's very telling that no replies even write out the word in question. Not even the ones defending the use of the word. Let's not pretend the connotation isn't there, even though I understand it shouldn't be. But we live in the world we live, not in a purely theoretical one.

ISiejek

That's not about the connotation that's about just being respectful using the actual word would be disrespectful to most people, based on how they were raised, note however that nobody even the people against the word have a problem writing niggardly

ErraticErrata

I actually thought I'd used the word before to no comment – I certainly have in other works of mine – but going back it appears I haven't.

Comes a little out of the blue for me, but this seems common enough an opinion in the US there's a Wikipedia article about the controversy so you're hardly alone. And while I was on the fence at first I've since had to clean up some pretty heinous and racially charged comments that were in pending.

Change it is, then.

therealgridlock

Feel no need to change for an American audience who fear words. I trust in your ability as a writer, and have never suspected you of anything morally reprehensible.

Ultimately if the reader doesn't like your story they are free to not read it. I've defended your work before, and that's what it ultimately comes down to.

Critique of the story is one thing, grammatical critique is another, but it's just a word, and it's not as scary as some people think.

To answer you as to why people are scared to even write out the word, in the west, there exists a thing called cancel culture, and if one speaks certain words too loudly, they can be fired for it. In the UK they can even be jailed for it. So needless to say it is not the word that has this power, but the mob mentality that destroys those who say it.

ISiejek

Change if you want to because it makes things easier for you just now there are reasonable people out there who understand that the two words have nothing in common

Clmineith

You do what you want.

But honestly? I'm disappointed you bowed in front of such idiotic arguments.

kinghaart

Sounds more like idiots weighed in with racially charged comments and the author has every right to say they don't need that evoked from their work, even if unintended.

It might not detract from the work but this comment section is proof that it distracts from it.

therealgridlock

Has anyone here even considered that EE isn't a native English speaker and that they have literally no comparison for cultural context of which everyone here complains of this evil word?

Has anyone here even considered that EE may have chosen this word specifically to spark this debate, knowing that many would fear a word for being too close to another word that just means black in most latin languages, and that many would cry out that it's just a stupid word?

If we speak, it may well be what the author intended. If we do not speak, it may also we'll be what the author intended.

It is my opinion that if it is not a spelling error, or grammatical error, then it is not our jobs to police the writing of the author. They have the freedom to write their art, and we have the freedom to consume or not consume, according to our free will.

Never has EE even come even remotely close to insinuating that they could have even vaguely racist beliefs. In universe EE has had people of all colors, all species, even some trans people, all working together as equals, so why should we be suspect now?

Trust the author, or move on. That is enough.

AbraKadabra

'Never has EE even come even remotely close to insinuating that they could have even vaguely racist beliefs. '

Like it matters...

Or next time we May ban from say communists from becoming heart surgeons, because they might poison our hearts that way...

AbraKadabra

"Beware he who would deny you access to information, for in his heart, he dreams himself your master."

I think it applies here too, oh great denominator and final arbiter of words. Just please dont beat me with your stick for speaking up against your mighty self.

AbraKadabra

Calling someone something hurtful is not hatespeech. It is namecalling. Children do It all the time. So yes namecalling is childish, and pitiful if it comes from an adult. But it is hardly 'evil', only assholeish.

Real hatespeech is when someone incites others to hate something or a group. Please all of you get yourself informed.

Sir Nil

Well, there's the time limit, 5 months.

5 months to wrestle Praes into order, send legionnaires and diabolists and orcs into the thick of war. 5 months for the new Empress of the League and potentially the Hierarch to show the Egregious Millennial Despot the power of DEMOCRACY. And perhaps 5 months for the Drow to actually become relevant again.

5 months to win, or the ticking time bomb does what a ticking time bomb does.

Linnus42

DK showing the advantage of Numbers as the armies of Man cannot hold even with Named stemming the tide. You can win every battle but still lose the War. Also shows the military advantage of an Air Force against people who don't have reliable Anti Aircraft Options.

Typical girl brings boyfriend home and Father hates boyfriend. Hanno's Influence grows while Cordelia's wanes. Of course now that Cordelia has moved the weapon to Salia its not secret and DK has a chance to target it with the priest taking months to charge. Especially given his new airforce allows him to drop troops in behind. Made even easier by Cordelia not relying on Named support who are the only ones holding the armed forces together but she is biased. Still if Cordelia is unsure she can win a vote to hold Procer by what authority does she claim to fire such a weapon? Beyond that Cordelia is being kinda arrogant in assuming Bard cannot intervene considering she doesn't understand Name Lore, Stories or Bard at all.

Shveiran

Meanwhile, her "rival" has come to believe he knows how to rule better than Cordelia. While never having held any kind of office and never personally led an army larger than five people.

F#ç@ing Heroes, man.

caoimhinh

Hm? He is not thinking that.

He is simply not shying away from the responsibility of leading when it is falling on him during the campaign, where their victory represents the survival of the whole continent.

Nowhere does he say that he is better than Cordelia, or that he is suited to rule anything at all. He is just no longer keeping away from the things happening around him like he did before when he was all "I do not judge, I won't get involved in politics, I won't get involved in any discussions. If you want me to intervene or arbiter in something, I'll summon the Coin and kill at least one of the parties involved".

Now Hanno is being dragged into the position of leader of people and armies, taking command and making decisions beyond simply leading Named or tactical actions on the battlefield. And he HAS to do it, because there's no one else, and shying away from that responsibility when there's so much at stake is something he simply cannot afford to do.

He does not like this, he doesn't want this, and does not think himself suited for it.
He will still do it, though. Because he must.

Snappy270

Aah but he did say that Cordelia has not done her duty but supporting the troops even though she literally can't. And last west chapter he gave misgivings about allowing her to keep the angle corpse.

He isnt wanting to depose her. But he is starting to think someone else should do the job

Thorsten Rapp

Pretty sure that in the last West chapter, he outright stated his point of view, which was "I can do better" which means, to me, shveiran is right.

Shveiran

See, but there IS someone else.

<<>>

Who knows more about war, or supplies, or the factions involved, between an Ashuran hero who has never held command outside Named skirmishes, and a Princess of Procer who trained fro command her whole life and was acknowledge as a skilled tactician by the Iron Prince and the Black Queen?

Hanno has clout, and that has its uses.

I wouldn't mind even if he was to act as a figurehead for her, but he is not the best person available to make decision on a tactical or strategic field.

It is not something Hanno is good at, and now is not the time to learn.

Stepping up is GOOD, abandoning his humility is ill-timed at best.

Also, again, he has done nothing wrong so far. But these...

<<>>

...these are not the words of a man planning NOT to interfere with rulership.

If he is not taking a step back, that only leaves stepping FORWARD, and his duty seems ALL but clear.

Shveiran

Where... where did my quotes go? Godsdamnit. Sorry.
Reposting:

See, but there IS someone else.

@@@ The Lycaonese captains he had supported when the northerners had almost split over returning to their homelands had begun to look to him for orders, like the Brabantine levies, and even fantassins now sought his commands instead of Princess Beatrice Volignac's – she whose very lands they were fighting in.@@@

Who knows more about war, or supplies, or the factions involved, between an Ashuran hero who has never held command outside Named skirmishes, and a Princess of Procer who trained for command her whole life and was acknowledged as a skilled tactician by the Iron Prince and the Black Queen?

Hanno has clout, and that has its uses. I wouldn't mind even if he was to act as a figurehead for her, but he is not the best person available to make decision on a tactical or strategic field.

It is not something Hanno is good at, and now is not the time to learn.

Stepping up is GOOD, abandoning his humility is ill-timed at best.

Also, again, he has done nothing wrong so far. But these...

@@@Salia was not holding up its part of the bargain, the promise that mortal law could see the war prosecuted without need for Named to step in. So what reason was there for Hanno to step back?

He would not hide behind a broken bargain when his duty was clear@@@

...these are not the words of a man planning NOT to interfere with rulership.

If he is not taking a step back, that only leaves stepping FORWARD, and his duty seems ALL but clear.

shikkarasu

...I think you missed the point.

He is 100% planning on interfering, but it is because the soldiers are following him whether he likes it or not. He is most certainly bitter and letting personal opinions enter into his judgement (the very thing he was worried about) but he isn't wrong that Cordelia is losing control of the situation. He is taking what Raphela told him in North I to heart and choosing to do something rather than nothing, because doing nothing would doom the entirety of the north.

He has been angsty over how unclear his situation is and how short-sighted he as a human is since before he became the White Knight, now he is dealing with the only thing that is clear: someone has to try, and Cordelia can't do this alone.

Is he making the right choice? I think given what he knows yes, he is. We all have faith in Cat, but he is, ironically, looking at the practicalities of the situation and getting ready for some Necessary Evil. Not unlike a young Catherine.

Abrekadabra

I think Cordelia just gave a villainic speech? Or something like that. Almost like raging against the heavens. She may get a villain name out of that attitude.

Shveiran

I might be. I would prefer you being right to the alternative, honestly.
I just don't see many suggestions that he is taking practicalities into account, and am therefore worried that a new instance of "uncompromising hero makes a stupid (if somewhat sympathetic) stand" is coming.

We shall see.

ADzen

Well, did he prevail in leading "moral" portion of supposed herd of cats? On which grounds he thinks this responsibility over people is his to bear? He never actually mustered command of anything, and now because of pivot in his story he's suddenly all arrogant now. He was least inadequate hero before, which made him representative under Truce and Terms, and now without Peregrine to navigate him seems like his judgement sailed the way of his Chore.

Ilncos

Probably He can do some Recall to remember some predecessor with that knowledge. As ugly as that cockiness is, is way better than the "i don't judge, only a tool" stuff

Linnus42

Actually since Cordelia is not sure she win a vote to hold onto her title and First Prince is her elected title and the only one the Hierarchy actually respected. I wonder if her lack of ability to win a vote means Hierarchy would stop the weapon from firing or mess with it.

Shveiran

I seriously doubt Anaxares respects the office of the First Prince.

It is an elected title, but the only electors are Princes, whose rights are inherited; it is a far cry from a democratic institution, and the Hierarchy has never been about the "good enough" approach.

Still; one does not expect a fish to fly. It would be rather late for the Hierarchy to start making sense now.

Steven Silver

It was put to a vote of the People and found that, indeed, fish can fly. XD

Real talk: I have no idea how Belerophon is still standing, but oh boy, is it hilarious!

Reader in the Night

She is not sure she can win a vote to not crown White as a Prince of Procer, not a vote to keep her job. While the peasants are blaming her, the real powers are preferring to skip ship than change the government.

Sir Nil

And another interesting point about Villains is brought up again, sure they might be evil, psychotic and murderers, but twenty bucks is twenty bucks. They won't throw away money or a roof over their head over something like ideals, in general, the fact that Villains made themselves, make them feel more sensible than a Hero who was made to fulfil an agenda.

dadycool

In the face of the End of the World, where legions of Good might falter and cower, the Evil generals and taskmasters tolerate no hesitation in their ranks as they march into the very jaws of death. And when the chips are down, where Heroes might quibble about the morality of putting the Big Bad down for good or try and find the good in their enemy, Villains will go in and just finish it, with no time for moral dilemmas, or giving their enemy another chance to stab them. Where the righteous will sacrifice themselves for the good of the innocent with their whole life ahead of them, trading current ability to get the job done for a gamble that the next generation might be enough, the damned can be relied upon to look out for themselves before anyone else and appreciate the simple art of a good stabbing. I think this might be the essence of this whole story, that the ideals of Heroes pale in comparison to the cold and hardness of a ruthless Villain, when there isn't a brick on the scales, at least.

caoimhinh

Another thing is, that Cordelia is being a hypocrite here. Because it has always been her that didn't or couldn't hold her end of the bargain in the deals, and it was always because of what I came to call "Proceran Bullshit" in past chapters.

It can be summed up as this: Politics. But more accurately, it is pettiness, delusional behavior, and selfish acts by Procer's populace and especially its upper echelons.

The villains kept to their end of the bargain because Catherine actually enforced it, while Cordelia was always "oh no, I can't make the Highest Assembly obey and they are scheming to depose me.", "If I do this, the princes will get angry", "This could leave a precedent that could be exploited in some years by someone", and so on.

With Cordelia and Procer, every single time that there was a reasonable course of action, she refused it because of ~~Proceran Bullshit~~ politics, only to be forced to do it anyways after many sacrifices were made, and this goes all the way back to the Crusade.

Look at the idiots in the south rioting and rebelling while there's a freaking army of undead invading them. And she has the nerve to blame the Heroes for the mess that her own country is causing. Heck, even the Heroes who caused trouble were from Procer (Red Axe and Mirror Knight), and even that mess in the Arsenal was a minor thing compared to what the stupid princes of Procer keep doing, like scheming to betray the Drow or dragging their feet to send help to the North.

Linnus42

I argue Cordelia's best chance to stem the tide was when she was offered the Name, Warden of the West and she turned it down. Because she thought a Name shouldn't rule Procer. So its kinda rich she acts like she did everything she could to hold Procer together when she said no to her best option on Purely Emotional grounds cause she didnt realize Procer needs to evolve. Now you can argue well if she took the Name it play into Bard's Plan but that has two issues. First, Cordelia didn't know jack about Bard at that point so it was not part of her calculations. Second, she doesn't have a Name now and still wants to use the weapon so I am not sure what the difference is.

As for Red Axe, I argue such a situation was inevitable when you let the Damned have free passes for all crimes before joining. Some Chosen was going to have a tragic backstory and try to run through a Damned who massacred their village and raped them. I am not even sure Red Axe would have been able to not try it manipulation or not cause that is the core of her name. Still the main point is Cordelia is blaming the Chosen for a crisis caused by a Damned. Said Damned doesn't rape and slaughter a Village this issue doesn't occur. Beyond the fact that MK didn't really do much to have long term impact and was impart corrupted by the daughter of Proceran Prince so Cordelia's department. And plenty of traitors on both sides and screw ups like say Indrani who brought Red Axe in not watching her closely enough.

sengachi

I'd absolutely agree that the Red Axe conflict was inevitably baked into the Truce and Terms, and that that was an incident caused by the Damned rather than the Chosen. But I'd disagree that blaming the Chosen instead of the Damned is what Cordelia's doing wrong.

The problem is she's blaming someone other than the Dead King or the Intercessor.

There was no better option than the Truce and Terms. They knew what problems may come of it, and set up a justice system to deal with that. They tried to have contingencies. Yes that system suffered problems because of members being imperfect human beings who were not all in perfect lockstep but ... well but that's literally something inherent to all justice systems (except a certain Choir's coin). Sure all of these problems could have hypothetically been resolved better, but in real life human practice?

It's a miracle their system held up to the Intercessor's attack as well as it did.

But rather than acknowledging that she's watching humans, real fallible humans, reach their limits and hit breaking points and be imperfect in predictable and understandable ways, she's blaming them for it. Rather than the entities which pushed those humans and the systems they're in to the breaking point.

And in doing so, she's doing the same thing all those fractious blame-layers she mentioned in the beginning of the chapter are doing. Finding someone, anyone to blame other than the unstoppable monster they can't do anything about.

Mental Mouse

The Red Axe situation wasn't "inevitable", but merely a possibility – until Bard started leaning on it. She's the one who pushed that story into paying out despite all the safeguards against it, making every roll of the dice come up snake eyes.

Mincheriit

Ngl i felt this too, proceran bullshit politics. Though to be fair, Cornelia is doing the best she can from her proceran side of things and she cant help at all if some incompetent is titled first prince instead. You gotta play with the hand you get. She had a shit and and quitting just puts a worse player on. Still, damn it procer.

Abrakadabra

I think Cordi May get a villainic nama out of that attitude. Or prevent her from getting a heroic one which raisesbthe chance of Hanno becoming warden of the west. Or she becomes a villainic warden but that is unprecedented.

Abnaxis

I think that's a bit unfair, to Cordelia at least. Procer itself is determined to destroy itself like lemmings running off a cliff, but Cordelia is doing the best she can.

In the West I chapter, we saw her doing exactly as you said–forcing measures in the Assembly to grant her the unilateral war powers she needs to fight the Dead King. Now since she's unpopular they're blaming her and withdrawing their food and troops from the war because they're idiots. And she KNEW they were going to do that, but by that time she had no choice.

I don't really blend Cordelia for playing politics when Procer is just SO anxious to join the army is the dead...

beleester

This comment section: How dare the heroes force people to obey them and call it righteous?

Also this comment section: Heck yeah, villains cutting through the bullshit and just making people do the right thing!

Laws don't mean anything if the people in charge can bypass them when it's inconvenient. For better or for worse, Procer actually takes its laws seriously, and Cordelia, a Proceran, is trying to find a way to get shit done without burning down Procer's institutions entirely.

(The same dilemma that every ruler on Calernia has been facing, in one form or another. It's kind of a central theme.)

Insanenoodlyguy

She was. She's not anymore. She's the First Prince now, and that is not the name the Gods Above offered.

Sir Nil

Lol, I was just thinking Villains don't stab each other in the back until victory is in sight or after winning.

Zach

What in the world are you talking about? This isn't even remotely true. This doesn't apply at all to the most important heroes of the age (Saint of Swords and Grey Pilgrim). Hell, Saint of Swords' whole issue was that she never quibbled at all about killing Bad Guys. And Pilgrim was just as ruthlessly pragmatic as Catherine.

And the "cold, pragmatic" villains are also a minority; people like Catherine or Amadeus are exceptions. Most of the time villains are just terrible lunatics like Akua as Diabolist and doom themselves in pursuit of some (usually extremely harmful) ideal. They're only as helpful as they are during the Dead King war because they're being wrangled by Catherine.

It's bizarre to me that someone would get this far into this story and come to the conclusion that it's point is "villains are smarter than heroes."

Shveiran

Villains do seem SMARTER than the heroes.

That doesn't mean they are better, though.

Insanenoodlyguy

Black said himself Cats growth was so insane because he never told her how it was meant to work. We've seen the Champion ignore ghosts because they aren't real. Ignorance is an incredible power that shouldn't be underestimated.

Reader in the Night

If we learned anything about the Doom of Liesse, is that a ticking time bomb can't not blow up. It can be destroyed, it can be turned against its supposed masters, but it just sitting unused by the end of the War is not really a possibility.

nimelennar

It's worse than that.

"Yet such power, when gathered, has a way of demanding use."

Five months, and then, even if they do win, the ticking time bomb does what a ticking time bomb does.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not if Hanno destroys it. The Warden of the West and the First Prince are each no longer willing to accommodate the other.

Mental Mouse

And Hanno's been there before... unfortunately, he apparently hasn't learned the right lessons.

Insanenoodlyguy

Depends. He might be absolutely right about this.

SpeckofStardust

Well crap, if the food is going to run out even if they beat keter there might not be a west to be warden over. At least not the west that would make a warden.

Insanenoodlyguy

This is actually where Praes comes in. They are actually agricultural experts, though it's certainly not what they are best known for. But they can do a lot with actually farmable land, I'd wager.

Cicero

And thus are the Gods Above condemned as frauds.

boballab

Not really, it is just bringing back to the forefront what the war is really about as stated way back in the Prologue for book 1 and reminded by the Titan in this chapter: "The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made.

So, we are told, were born Good and Evil.

Ages passed in fruitless argument between them until finally a wager was agreed on: it would be the mortals that settled the matter, for strife between the gods would only result in the destruction of all. We know this wager as Fate, and thus Creation came to know war." This is the first page of the Book of All Things. You must ask yourself which set of Gods are trying to guide and which are trying to rule because the mortal characters we see now appear to be the ones that are going to settle the wager of the Gods.

marillius

Seems to me everything we've seen about Below kind of suggests they're not the ones that wanted to rule.

jamesc9

In the Age of Wonders, sure. In the Age of Order, I'm not so sure.

Ilncos

There is other land apart from Calernia. I mean, look like a the better of X more than a single match

Konstantin von Karstein

And the Gods Below as pro genocide and mass murder, so I still prefer Above.

marillius

Read this chapter again. The gods above are ALSO pro genocide and mass murder. Every time an angel shows up, they either kill or brainwash everyone in the area.

Konstantin von Karstein

Read this whole story again and watch carefully the historical precedents. Who is more supporting of genocide and mass murder, who does it more often?

marillius

"And the Gods Below as pro genocide and mass murder, so I still prefer Above."

This was your original point. You're moving the goal post here. First it was 'Well above doesn't do genocide' and now it's 'well above doesn't genocide as much'. And someone else is trying to say that above doesn't like it as much but even if that were true, which it's not because angels don't do 'without intent' because they're all intent as far as we can tell, they are still GENOCIDING. So... does it matter who does it more?

Hell, I could argue back that at least below doesn't pretend it's a good thing the majority of the time. They call it what it is, a slaughtering of enemies, and not a 'cleansing' or a 'holy bath' or whatever the church tries to justify these moments with. So are we going to say they're better because they're honest about it? No.

The point is both sides suck. Cat just chose the side that's honest about it.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes, it wasn't very honest of me. Sorry. But you say
« The point is both sides suck. Cat just chose the side that's honest about it. »

Both sides indeed suck, but one does so much more frequently. As the history of Calernia shows us, there were way less Heroes doing mass murder and genocide than there were Villains. If the choice is between the team who rarely slaughter innocent and the one whose standard operational procedure involves regular mass human sacrifices to power flying fortresses, I know which one I would choose.

« Hell, I could argue back that at least below doesn't pretend it's a good thing the majority of the time. »
Except that Above IS good most of the time. Look at how many people were saved by Heroes historically, look at who held the line first against the deads at Cleves (or Hainault, I don't remember), Tariq who stopped Black from causing tens of thousands of deaths at the price of a few hundreds? Cat and Black are the exception among Villains, not the rule. The rule is Akua or Kairos.

marillius

Oh that's entirely fair and you're not entirely wrong. I'm not arguing the point because I think Below is necessarily better. Just that Above isn't Good in this world. Even what Tariq did, while it might have saved many lives, still probably killed children. There's no justifying that from our sensibilities.

Konstantin von Karstein

Personally, I find it completely justifiable to kill a few children if it saves thousands more. It's extremely ruthless and maybe heartless, I know.

But I completely agree with you that Above isn't good, it's just less bad than Below.

someone

Does Below commit genocide more often than Above though? History tends to be written by the victors, and as Amadeus likes to remind us, Above usually wins.

Konstantin von Karstein

That's just bad faith. Even records from Evil polities agree with the fact that Villains commit more genocides or mass slaughters. Villains are not ashamed by the atrocities they commit and tend to gloat a lot.

caoimhinh

The thing is, so far we haven't actually seen the Gods Below making statements or giving commandments beyond the "Do as you will" kind of thing.

It's not that the Villains slaughter people because the Gods Below say so, they do it because they want to or because it serves their goals.

On the other hand, we do have examples where the Heroes commit genocide because the Angels told them.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes, but there's much less case of Angels telling someone to slaughter people than Villains doing it.

caoimhinh

True, and that's the point of what I'm saying:

They do it because of their own reasons, while the Heroes would actually get a commandment from Above to do that.

So, technically, the only side that's pro genocide and mass murder would be Above, as Below explicitly has a hands-off policy in what their "Champions" do.

Below simply doesn't care.

Konstantin von Karstein

Technically maybe, but in practice no.

caoimhinh

It's like that meme of "Well, yes, but actually no" hahahaha.

Team Evil definitely causes more horrible deaths and mass killings, but what I wanted to point out was that it wasn't ordained by the Gods Below. It was done by people.

Whereas a Champion of Above can actually come and commit genocide out of a divine commandment.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, true. Above isn't good, only less bad than Below.

Shveiran

Every time an angel's power is ACTIVELY unleashed on Creation without even the intelligence of that creature guiding it.

And I'm not defending the Hashmallim, but we have seen instances of Angels acting in a more controlled manner. We never saw an instance of demons acting out that was not FUCKING TERRIFYING.

I don't like Above, I don't like the Angels, and honestly loathe defending them, but let's try to keep objective here... there is just no comparing Choirs and Demons.

Vylus8

The way I've always seen it is that Below doesn't actually champion anything (Genocide included) what they champion is essentially "do what you want and we will back you up". The unfortunate downside of this is that they have to put their money where their mouth is even when the thing the person wants is objectively evil e.g. genocide. Cat is proof that you can belong to below and not be a cackling mad man intent on murder and subjugation.

Above's whole deal is do as we say because we know best. The issue with this is they don't think like mortals and can't sympathies on our level. This leads to decisions like Contrition mind raping a whole city. To the angels a totally reasonable step as it would get them a nice strong crusading army. To actual people this is a horrifying decision.

marillius

We have nothing to say that the angels aren't intentionally doing it and a LOT of indication from multiple HEROES that say that it is intentional so... Both sides do the genocide. One does it more, the other pretends it's a good thing.

malekdeneith

Demons aren't Below's equivalent to Angels though. Devils are. Demons are something else altogether and as far as we know they weren't created by Below (even if Below's champions like to use them)

Piromin

Except demons aren't actually from Below?? It's been stated several times they come from outside and aren't included in the whole gods game. Evil uses them more often? Yeah, people suck, but that's more on the individuals than on Evil itself.

Also Angels acting in a controlled manner... The choir of kindness making an entire plague to get Amadeus, the let's brainwash an entire city, the... endurance? choir trying to straight up smite Cat because their hero lost and above are petty as hell, all of the people White Knight has executed because a coin said so, even when their crimes likely weren't execution worthy, the humbling of the giants, where Heroes, from Above, tried betrayal and attempted genocide

Yeah, terrible things happen in the name of Below, but just as many terrible things happen under orders from Above, only these are seen as just and heroic, because Above never loses, and when it does it flips the table so it hasn't lost.

Shveiran

Honestly, we agree on the "many terrible things happen under orders from Above", it's just the "just as" I can't let pass.

Because... no, that's... no?

aurikdomi

Demons are outside entities separate from below

Snappy270

Technically they aren't pro those things, they just have no qualms about doing it. They only promote gaining power in any way their follower can. Above though approve or encourage killing for the slightest "evil", mass murder as a mercy instead of allowing a villain to roam or just mind wiping slavery. At least below can be bargained with.

saithorthepyro

Honestly I actually still prefer Gods Below? Gods Above believe that a moral order needs to be forced onto the world for it to function, that everyone must adhere to a standards set by them. Gods Below don't seem to have any structure, hierarchy, etc., and seems more content to give power to people who seem ambitious enough to try and change the world around them, and seems to think that mortals should decide for themselves how they act. And as the books have shown even historically at times it has not been as simple as good vs evil.

saithorthepyro

Actually let me reclarify, I consider both sort of equal but only because the Gods Below seem to prefer testing egalitarian ideas using some of the worst people possible, but I suppose it would be a cop-out for them to only give powers to those who would behave the best.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, but most Villains historically were monsters. Those standards set by Above seem (at least to me) a fair trade in exchange of not being use as ritual fodder or be killed by a magical plague. And changing the world include people like Triumphant and Neshamah. I'm not saying Above or Heroes are perfect paragons of morality, just that they're much more safe to live under than Below.

saithorthepyro

I think however we are seeing a shift in it. I've got a theory I put up on the Reddit about how the Bella's response to Tariq and Laurence's effectiveness was not Dead King but instead Amadeus, Basilia, Cat, and Cordelia and that while Below has changed their playbook to be less monstorous on purpose and instead towards more an egalitarian, free will bent, and Above has not changed their playbook at all, it's resulted in the current dichotomy were the Below-Above conflict is shifting off a good-evil axis.

Insanenoodlyguy

Above's heroes just are able to ride the stories, better. But that's not an inherent property of "good" just of the hero story. First it made a man who could avoid such stories, then it gave him the next step to train: a villainous hero.

Isaac Martinez

Ominous. Cordelia is holding Judgement over almost all Creation. Like an unintentional villain that has a doomsday device, with good intentions.

dadycool

At least she realizes that she's holding the pavement and staring at a path to Hell.

Steven Silver

She gets no points from me just for being self-aware <_<

Insanenoodlyguy

Not unintentional anymore. She is the First Prince now. And on her at least, that is a villain name.

Konstantin von Karstein

She isn't Named rn tho.

nick012000

I think she is. She got the Name at the end of this chapter, when her palm was burning and the narrative referred to her as the First Prince.

Konstantin von Karstein

The narrative often refer to her as First Prince, with F and P, that means nothing.

She also got that scar just before behind offered WotW.

Furthermore, it wouldn't make sense from a narrative standpoint to make her a Claimant for WotW in one chapter, and in the next one make her receive First Prince. She clearly is presented in opposition with Hanno in this chapter, it's certain she's the other Claimant.

Finally, I think that Cordelia getting a Name would be announce with little more fanfare by the narration.

aurikdomi

Just most of Calernia, not all of creation

Tenthyr

I don't blame Cordelia for feeling how she does, and honestly Hanno is still at a dangerous crossroads. He might become better for what he chooses. I can also see Catherine being... Not so okay with what he will have done by the time she comes back.

caoimhinh

I actually do blame her for feeling that way. Cordelia is being a hypocrite, in my opinion.

Her hatred and distrust towards Hanno stems from that incident in the Arsenal when he didn't like that she and Catherine acted behind his back to satisfy the whims of the Highest Assembly, despite the accord that had been reached previously being clear on how to proceed.

Hanno was in the right there, though Catherine acted in the most pragmatic way in order to solve the issue quickly, Cordelia still has no cause to be resentful, as she indeed did not hold her end of the bargain and demanded the Highest Assembly to judge the Red Axe, despite having already agreed that such would only be done by the delegates of the Truce and Terms.

I don't see how Cat would have anything to complain about Hanno when she returns. He is also not doing anything wrong now, he is in fact doing what is necessary to keep the forces fighting North together and active. All this while Procerans are making a mess south and rioting like idiots instead of helping or doing anything productive towards their survival.

Shveiran

Hanno was not in the right in the Arsenal: he acknowledged the existence of a problem, refused all offered solutions, proposed none of his own, then acted pissy because a solution was still acted upon.

Now, I see him walking the same path.

He has done nothing wrong, YET.

But if Hanno claims political power during this kind of crisis without the slightest idea on how to keep grain and steel flowing, you can bet your ass that Catherine will not pat him on the back.

Is Cordelia failing to deliver? Yes.
Could Hanno deliver more? No.

Hanno's place is knocking on Keter's door, as the champion that a martial hero is supposed to be.

It is NOT leading the Highest Assembly or reforming Procer.

caoimhinh

He was in the right, the terms of the agreement on how Named would be judged were clear.

Cordelia wanted to breach it to pacify the Highest Assembly, and Hanno didn't agree because the terms were already signed and she couldn't expect to back off from it the moment it became inconvenient for her.

Catherine was the middle ground and satisfied both, Hanno was pissed because her solution was done behind his back and defiled the corpse of the Red Axe, all to satisfy the demands of Proceran princes.

Now, Hanno is NOT claiming political power, he doesn't want to lead the Highest Assembly or reform Procer. He has zero interest in that at all. The only thing that he is doing now is actively participating in the decisions of the campaign and acting as a leader of people, something that he refused to do before because it was the commanders, princes, and so on that were to lead the people, Hanno usually kept to only Named affairs and kept away from other stuff.

He has no interest AT ALL to lead Procer or having control of a Principality. All he is doing is keeping people together during this campaign because they are turning to him to act as a pillar, and he needs to do that in order to prevent the collapse of the army keeping the undead at bay. Really, even that princess that promised the crown of her principality to Hanno only did it because she was facing riots and decided he could act as a beacon of hope to keep the people calm and under control.

Shveiran

If that is all Hanno wants to do, why does he spend so much of his thoughts pondering Cordelia and her failures? There is no connection between that and being a "leader of the people" on the frontline. Whether he admits it or not, he is not thinking about stopping to this.

Also, again, I am not a fan of Hasenbach, but I really feel the criticism is unwarranted here.

You are presenting as a tantrum the fact that the Principate wouldn't let go that someone tried to murder one of their rulers. We have a treaty to allow French citizens to be judged in France, for instance, but if a Frenchman came here and shot the Prime Minister, you can bet your ass we would try him in house.

THIS IS NOT AN UNREASONABLE STANCE.

The T&T were a simple treaty without too many clauses; this situation was clearly something that had not been considered possible, and that justifies an exception. Now, I realize while C&H did not grant it, but let's be real: there was a very good reason to ask for it.

caoimhinh

But that's a different thing, and it is an unreasonable stance, because there's already a regulation that says that certain individuals with a special denomination must be judged by an international tribunal.

People who had been given amnesty for their previous crimes in exchange for service for the international organization known as the Grand Alliance, and who had been placed under the legal jurisdiction of not any one member of it but selected individuals and an international court with representatives of the signatory nations.

If a nation signs a treaty, it can't just break it whenever it wants if the treaty is to have any value.

Your example of a random french citizen trying to murder the (British?) Prime Minister is not an accurate comparison to this situation because it blatantly ignores the special status of the individual committing the crime and the international treaty that is already in place and clear on how to prosecute individuals of said special status.

A more accurate case would be something like the International Criminal Court.

You can't just consider the Named random citizens, they are more akin to a member of an International Special Task Force going rogue or something like that.

Also, do you honestly believe that the Truce and Terms is just some vague agreement that wasn't scrutinized and had many angles considered by all involved in the creation? That an international treaty, especially one of the main treaties securing a fighting force for the War On Keter, which included criminal amnesty and jurisdiction of law for the Named, was a "simple treaty without too many clauses" in which that scenario wasn't considered?

This is just a case of Procer liking treaties up until it is time for them to fulfill their end of the bargain, which is why Callow and Levant had so much distrust for them, as mentioned in various chapters.

sivarajan

Perfidious Procer, huh?

nimelennar

The solution was done behind his back only because he'd turned it on them. They tried to involve him in finding a solution that would satisfy the Truce and the Terms but also keep Procer in line so they could keep fighting the war. He refused, choosing his personal integrity over every practical consideration.

If you walk away from the negotiation table, you lose any voice you had in what deal is struck. That's what he chose to do, and so the person he should blame for a deal emerging that he didn't like is himself.

caoimhinh

Not exactly.

If you recall, Catherine also refused Cordelia's claim to have the Red Axe judged by the Highest Assembly. Because the Truce and Terms is the precedent of the Accords and thus couldn't be weakened by letting Procer breach them the moment it became inconvenient.

Hanno didn't turn his back on the issue. Cordelia tried to convince him and Cat, and failed in both cases. He was part of one decision, and in that decision he was supported by Catherine, because there was realistically no way it could be done otherwise as the proceedings were clear and they couldn't just let Cordelia back off from fulfilling the Terms.

Cordelia resents Hanno out of pettiness, because he was the one with the final word as the representative of Heroes and thus the one with the authority to pass the sentence. But the Red Axe being judged by the Tribunal of the Truce and Terms was never in question, as the signed agreement was clear on the matter and Catherine agreed wholeheartedly with Hanno in this. It wasn't Hanno being inflexible or standing up for an empty principle, both he and Cat agreed that it had to be done as that was what had been signed.

What Hanno took issue with was what happened afterward: them taking the corpse of the Red Axe and raising her as an undead just to satisfy the pettiness of Proceran princes who wanted to feel that their power wasn't threatened. They did not include him because they assumed his response and thus opted to act behind his back.

And Cordelia doesn't resent Catherine because despite agreeing with Hanno, Cat provided a means for her to delude the Highest Assembly and pacify them through the raising of undead Red Axe.

nimelennar

"They did not include him because they assumed his response and thus opted to act behind his back."

Not true. They tried to include him. At the end of Chapter 37, Cat is basically begging him to let her include him in the process of placating the princes. He refuses, turning his back on the idea, and stating that there's nothing he can offer them, so she goes to work behind his back. But it wouldn't have been behind his back if he hasn't turned it first.

sirfury

Regarding Cordelia's anger towards Hanno, my understanding is has more to do with how Hanno was unable to keep the Red Axe and the Mirror Knight in line (like Catherine did the Damned), which cost her politically (favours, which she was using to ensure troop and resource supply to the frontlines) and to a lesser extent that Hanno was being obstinate about Red Axes verdict and didn't have her back (like she previously believed), because Catherine provided a solution(for the verdict) in the form of an undead Red Axe.

Linnus42

Cordelia is being super biased.

I mean Hanno did check Mirror Knight but Hanno is not always around Mirror Knight. Meanwhile Cordelia was stonewalling Cat on the Drow Backstab Plan from one of her Princes whose daughter was trying to rope in Mirror Knight.

As for Red Axe, the crisis started due to a Villain raping Red Axe and murdering her village. So kinda weird Cordelia is saying that Damned aren't the issue. Bard is on neither side. Meanwhile it's Indrani's Band (A V and Cat's close Ally) who brings in Red Axe (a fresh Chosen who Hanno has never met) and doesn't watch her leading Red Axe to sneak off to murder her rapist. She also has a traitor in the Band she normally runs with. Meanwhile at Arsenal itself we have Masego missing a whole smuggling ring not really example of sterling Damned leadership there. Mirror Knight bumbles it with a hastily constructed band also including traitors. Meanwhile Cat is on command on the ground when it all goes to crap, she sends Frederic to guard Red Axe who only pulls off her backstab because a Damned Cast an Illusion. So I am not sure how anyone can look objectively at the whole Arsenal debacle. And says its mostly the Chosen fault and Hanno's fault lol.

sirfury

Everyone is biased. As for the events that led up to the Red Axe incident were many, including enemy involvement. But Cordelia didn't care about the Red Axe killing another named, only when she attacked a Named, who also happened to be a political figure in her domain (a loophole their enemy exploited)

I'd gather, Cordelia, or any other non-Named ruler in the same position frankly don't care for the specifics as it is Named business, and how they deal with it is up to the self appointed figureheads for the Chosen and Damned, as long as it let's her do her job, which is keeping in-line not only all the corrupt Princes and ensuring they give their due share of troops and resources, as well as the other usual stuff a Ruler has to do, including looking after the wellbeing of millions (?) of subjects, there needs, especially at a time of crisis.

Right or wrong, possible or not, the fact Hanno could not keep a leash on the Chosen as Catherine seems to have been able, especially as Chosen are "supposed" to be the better (behaviourally) of the Named, is all Cordelia cares about. She was also under the wrong impression Hanno had her back, and he "failed" her on both accounts. Hence her disappointment in him. You have to remember, she never was fond of Named to start with, like a lot of non-named rulers. But Catherine, despite being the poster-child Queen of the "evil" faction and someone she had attacked herself, turned out not only more reliable, but more understanding of the problems a Ruler faces and the bigger picture, which Hanno did not (at the time), based on his lack of experience in Ruling, and his narrow focus of looking after "his" folk before others. This is obviously, Cordelia's perspective of the situation.

TeK

Interesting. Both sides do what they think they must and blame the other for not upholding their end of the bargain. Even though none can be faulted for it. Hanno cannot enforce his will upon the Chosen, nor scare them into submission like Cat does, and Cordelia cannot really conjure fucking bread out of thin air. I still lean with Cordelia though. She done everything, gone above and beyond to do her end. Hanno buckled the same agreement he took the moment it became inconvenient. The sheer balls on the guy, to blame Cordelia for it. I respect him a lot less for that.

caoimhinh

I mean, Hanno IS right.

Their disagreement was because he didn't agree on letting Cordelia take the Red Axe to be judged and executed by the Highest Assembly while she demanded it on account of needing to pacify the princes of Procer.

But he was the one in the right, the Truce and Terms that Cordelia and Procer had signed established how Named would be punished for their actions, and it was Cordelia who was buckling the moment it became politically inconvenient for her, which has been her whole tendency ever since her first appearance, it's like how she started war against Callow and refused peace because of Proceran internal politics.

Hanno didn't give in to her arguments because he had no reason to cater to Procer's politics, that's for Cordelia to handle and if she can't then that's her problem to solve, a head of state can't sign an international agreement in the name of her nation and then back off from it the first time it's personally inconvenient for her. Catherine helped her and bend the rules to solve the issue because she didn't want to deal with that mess and Cordelia was obviously incapable of solving it herself, but that doesn't mean Hanno wasn't in the right within the agreed terms.

She simply resents him for not letting her openly breach the agreement she had signed, she resents him for not catering to her needs, when she is incapable of keeping the Highest Assembly in line.

Right now, Hanno is taking command of the armies fighting North simply as a matter of sheer survival, doing what is needed just to ensure they can keep fighting. Meanwhile, Cordelia has lost control of Procer. It's rich coming of her to blame the Named when this whole mess was caused because of the pettiness of her own country.

Reader in the Night

I think we might be missing sight of what the opening quote tells us: Both sides have a point.

Hanno cannot expect the common populace of Procer to act like rational agents concerned with JUSTICE, because that's just not how normal people operate.

Statecraft does not give a ruler the room to stick to the spirit of any agreements they signed, because otherwise the system collapses. Hanno has been Named for so long he forgot to factor in the normal people.

caoimhinh

The thing is, the way I see it, Hanno isn't blaming the common people for not acting in accordance with justice or anything like that (I doubt he even knows right now about what's happening in southern Procer), but rather that he used to be like a priest that was never involved in secular life but that now is forced to take part of the decisions of the community.

It's also not about statecraft.

His comment about how Cordelia is not keeping her end of the bargain and so he is not "stepping back", refers to how he used to refuse to participate in any council or decision outside of his direct responsibilities as a Named. He wasn't a leader of people, and when people came to him for advice or to make a decision, he always sent them to their respective authorities. He always stepped back.

Now he isn't doing that. Because now he can't afford to keep minding the sensibilities of rulers nor keeping away from leading these people, because he needs to keep them together to fight against Keter.

Shveiran

Look.

It's one thing to say that Hanno and Catherine had good reasons to disagree with Cordelia on the issue of jurisdiction over the Red Axe.

I even agree with that position.

But it's a whole other thing to say Cordelia had no good reason to have her own position, or to diminish it saying it was "petty politics" or the need to appease stupid Princes.

She wanted to prosecute the ATTEMPTED MURDERER of one OF THE PRINCIPATE'S RULERS.

The idea that a member of a fledgling alliance would surrender jurisdiction over that to someone else without an issue is LUDICRUOUS. It would mean that a Named can murder the First Prince herself without answering to the Principate itself.

I despise the Princes of Procer. Seriously, they are close to the High Lords in my book (well, my read of EE's book, actually) but they are not throwing a tantrum, I'm sorry. The T&T were signed with the unspoken understanding that Named would not go around murdering the leaders of the Grand Alliance; and unspoken as it was, it's not exactly a small breach of faith.

Keep in mind, the issue of jurisdiction is not just legaleese. There was no real guarantee that teh Red Axe would be put to the sword. If she was spared, was Procer supposed to just sit back and take it? Would Levant have done so, or Callow?

caoimhinh

But that's what she signed for.

What? Do you think it's fine to back off from an international agreement the moment it becomes personally inconvenient?

It was agreed by the Grand Alliance how Named would be judged, and the representative of Procer is part of the tribunal that would pass sentence, even if it would ultimately fall on the representative of Above or Below to decide and carry on the punishment.

She KNEW that was what she had agreed to. And the moment she had to fulfill her end of the bargain, she balked at it.

Yes, it's normally ludicrous that a nation would give up the right to judge criminals, yet it can happen, and that's what Procer and the rest of the Grand Alliance did, because Named were treated as special international assets given special privileges and heavy responsibilities for the duration of the war against Keter. These are special circumstances.

Named, under the Truce & Terms, are an international task force, and there is a designated officer and tribunal to judge them if they commit a crime. This was agreed by all parties involved, so wanting to walk away from fulfilling her part of the bargain is simply unacceptable.

In any trial, there is no guarantee of what the sentence will be before the trial is carried out, although the punishment for a certain crime can be known beforehand. And it was already a given that the Red Axe would die. Cordelia knew that, the thing is, she had to satisfy the petty Highest Assembly and had the sentence be given by Procer.

And yes, they were supposed to accept it, BECAUSE THAT'S WHAT THEY AGREED TO.

Shveiran

THEY AGREED TO give amnesty and renounce jurisdiction over individuals, whether criminals or not, meant to become a task force that empowered the Grand Alliance's war effort.

It shouldn't require clarification that such an agreement stands on the basis that the task force will stay pointed at the enemies of the Grand Alliance, and not start murdering its very leaders.

If this was a court of law, it would be trivial to void that compact in most countries, because such an egregious breach of faith has consequence. The keeping of good faith is one of the pillars of contracts in nearly all western democracies, and is considered a binding part of the contract EVEN IF IT IS NOT written on the document.

But this is not a court of law, and so it doesn't matter whether the compact is legally binding or not: unlike signing a contract with a devil or fey, international treaties lack a superior force enforcing them, and thus survive because of consensus.

If you push them too far, they break; and murdering a country's ruler is pretty damn far.

caoimhinh

" international treaties lack a superior force enforcing them, and thus survive because of consensus"

YES! EXACTLY!

They put in place protocols and mechanisms for this kind of things, and those are agreed upon and signed by the respective parties. And the treaty needs to be obeyed if it is going to last.

They had already decided what they would do if one of the Named decided to break the Terms, and that was the international tribunal we saw carrying sentence over them.

What Cordelia wanted was the exclusive right to prosecute them, but that went against the treaty. It's not complicated to see that it goes against what was already agreed.

Shveiran

I can't help but feel you kind of missed my point, here.

sirfury

You are thinking about rights and wrongs, promises and agreements.

Now add to that realities, like the extinction of humankind, and how likely other corrupt Princes (with powerful armies and resources) are unlikely to take the optimum actions to prevent it and instead make short-sighted personal choices that would only hasten their own, their subjects, and their allies demises.

The bottom line has always been winning the war. Any agreements made earlier, were only made in the assumption that they would best achieve the end goal.

If Cordelia sees that bending an agreement to gain favours that she can later turn into more troops and resources for the war, and in the worst case prevent the collapsing of the fragile Principality and allow her to keep her seat to further ensure the State keeps churning out soldiers, is that the right decision on her behalf, or wrong? If she gets deposed, would her successor still be bound to the agreements, and would they even care. Would there still even be a Principality that can coordinate and provide massive armies for the war?

As the quote in the beginning of the chapter aptly describes, the 3 main figure heads of the alliance believe they are doing the right thing for the people they are responsible for. Now that doesn't mean they are right, just that they believe they are. None of the three are vain rulers simply looking to save their asses for personal profit. Even Cordelia has confessed to scraping the barrel of promises and favours just to ensure a steady supply of manpower for the war effort, and believes she'll get deposed even if they survive. But she believes she is currently the best person in her position of power in the Principality during the War.

Not saying Cordelia took the best course of action, but I find your use of "satisfy the petty Highest Assembly" missing important context for the realities of the situation. Call them petty if you must(they are), but don't ignore the actual power they have in the form of manpower and resources that they could very well decide not to provide for the war, without the political cajoling of Cordelia.

caoimhinh

True, but also keep in mind that this wasn't Hanno being stubborn about it. Catherine backed him up in this, because the treaty had to be respected.

Cat refused Cordelia's demand of having the Red Axe judged by Procer, remember?

Cordelia just keeps resentment towards Hanno for keeping to his responsibilities in the bargain and not letting her break the treaty, but Cat backed him on this too.

The difference is that Cat offered something afterward, the raise of the Red Axe as undead in order to pacify the pettiness of the Highest Assembly. Another important fact is, that Hanno didn't back away from that, he was simply unaware of it, because Cat and Cordelia did it behind his back, assuming he would not be fine with them making an undead out of the Red Axe.

Shveiran

Yes, which is why I (we?) argue that it is not unreasonable to DISAGREE with Cordelia, but it feels kind of brash to discard her position as "petty politics".

Abrakadabra

You are correct. Cordelia is good, but practical good! While Hanno is the idealist one. And practical good And practical evil are so similar, they might Just be siamese twins.

saithorthepyro

Well at this point Cordelia has apparently become one of Below's by embracing the name of First Prince... although that's more on their extremely broken morality system.

Konstantin von Karstein

Cordelia is not Named, she's still a Claimant for WotW like Hanno.

saithorthepyro

Some have theorized that this
""Have it prepared for us," the First Prince repeated, and this time the ring of an order was unmistakeable.

The laurels burned against her palm, but Cordelia did not flinch. She would do what she must so keep the west in the war until the last moment. And should it stumble, should it fail?

She would, again, do what she must."

is if not the claiming of the name First Prince a pretty clear sign she is extremely close.

Mental Mouse

If she was bucking for First Prince to be a Name, she wouldn't have it in common with Hanno. They are competing for the Name of Warden Of The West.

Abrakadabra

Maybe she will be warden of the west, but a villainic one... Probably.

Zach

Where in the world do you people come up with this stuff?

Genuinely baffled that someone could read this story up until this point and think that Cordelia is Named

Hargabga

That is correct and something that I failed to consider. And that's the issue here, isn't it? Hanno thinks that the moment Cordelia asked for Red Axe, openly breaching agreement she herself signed, that was their breach of trust. Cordelia thinks, the moment Hanno let his principles trump over the matter of state survival (and to a lesser extent the fact that Red Axe (Heaven's Chosen, mind you) attempted to kill the Prince of Procer) the moment he failed her trust. Both sides have a point if you look from their position.

And I still will be leaning with Cordelia. She stood for the real breathing state, for lives of millions (even if it was in the shape of a few crowned heads). He stood for the empty principle, a stillborne thing that helped noone. The fact that he refused to compromise (which is basically diplomacy as far as Cordelia is concerned) was such a powerful Vietnam flashback to Saint of Swords, that he fell out of her trust ever since. And for good reason.

caoimhinh

From Hanno's POV, the breaching of trust was going behind his back to turn the Red Axe into an undead so she could be judged and killed by the Highest Assembly, just to satisfy the pettiness of the princes of Procer. But that was the issue with Cat.

With Cordelia, the issue was that she proved once again that politics due to having to keep the petty members of the Highest Assembly happy so she would not be deposed by them meant that she would potentially back off from deals and agreements, which was a fear that many parties had raised before, as Procer is notorious for historically backstabbing allies while keeping to pretenses of righteousness.

Cordelia didn't stand for her state, she stood for satisfying a few princes and cared about leaving precedents in law. And also because she wanted to use the death of the Red Axe as a warning for that prince that was scheming against the Drow, remember? The reason I think that Hanno was still in the right is that this wasn't just an agreement between three people, it was an international pact signed by representatives of various nations and factions, and it stood for something greater than any of the parts.

That the head of a nation wanted to back away from an international agreement because her own personal reasons, or even because of the internal politics of that nation's congress like a few congressmen getting angry, is simply unacceptable. Especially because she wanted to back away from fulfilling her part of the bargain while still keeping the Truce and Terms.

This is a different thing from how the Saint of Swords acted. And in fact, even in the case of the Saint of Swords, that whole mess started because of Cordelia, who was the one who started the crusade, the Saint simply bluntly told Cordelia that a Crusade was out of her control and couldn't be used for her own personal reasons.

Hanno simply told her that if a country signs an agreement, they need to abide by it. I don't think it's anywhere as extreme.

Snappy270

I can see your point but you still are doing what Hanno did. Not provide an alternative. No other way within the rules you wish to up keep that can resolve this situation. Just keep stating the rules.

The FACTS are that Procer was the one propping up the alliance with its resources and Cordelia diplomacy built the arsenal and feed the whole army. It was Cats armies and alliances that made the alliance possible. The white knight had no significant clout to the scenario as he couldn't keep his heroes in line. So is just an obstacle in the way of keeping the alliance together.

So they signed agreements they and bent over backwards with some loopholes to keep them. The white knight has done nothing to help, just kept repeating the treaty. And now he may not want to lead but he will do his duty if he needs to and if that takes Cordelia off the throne he will and Cordelia fears this.

Also she hates other heroes for just doing what they want such as the grey pilgrim killing a whole village to get black. While villains like Cat she has come to understand can be bargained with.

Hargabga

Except it wasn't exactly that. Cordelia didn't have to satisfy a few congressman, she had to satisfy all of them, because the precedent was someone killing a congressman. Now yes, it was totally petty and unreasonable but politics often are. She didn't "back out of the agreement", she asked Hanno to understand her position and cooperate with her to help her preserve the war effort. He had every right to refuse to budge, and just like him, Cordelia technically didn't break any agreement by raising Red Axe. Both broke an unspoken agreement while keeping to the letter of law, because White Knight refused to budge on petty principle over realities of the world. This is why, while both sides have a point and are equally wrong (right), I lean with Cordelia still. It would've cost Hanno nothing, aside from petty principle, to cooperate with First Prince and holding a joint trial, for example. He refused to compromise just because he had the right not to.

caoimhinh

1) No, it couldn't be done. On account that treaties must be obeyed otherwise they have no strength. If they start making exceptions then no one will respect the treaty.

2) It wasn't Hanno standing up for petty principle. Both him and Catherine agreed on this: the Red Axe had to be judged by the T&T tribunal, not the Highest Assembly. Cordelia went to Cat first and hoped to get her help to put pressure on Hanno, but Cat refused her. Because of point 1, and because the T&T are predecessors to the Liesse Accords, and thus Cat cannot let them be weakened on such a weak basis of the sensibilities of princes being harmed when it comes to them fulfilling their part of the agreed treaty.

3) The tribunal of the T&T is a sort of a joint trial already, with representatives of Procer, Callow, Levant, Heroes, and Villains. Also, it was Cordelia who wanted exclusivity, having the Highest Assembly alone judging the Red Axe, her demands went against everything that had been agreed and it was her who didn't budge.

Again, Hanno and Cat were in agreement that Cordelia couldn't demand this, as the mechanism were already agreed and in place for such cases, she couldn't back off from it. What Hanno takes issue with is by what Catherine and Cordelia did afterwards, defiling the body of the Red Axe and making her an undead to satisfy the princes of Procer. And it was a decision that he had no control over, because it was done without him knowing.

Cordelia resenting Hanno for abiding by the law and respecting the agreed-upon treaty is just hypocrisy on her part, considering how she is all about how Procer is a nation of laws and rules that must be obeyed.

Abrakadabra

Cordelia is practical good, she is the mirror of Cat I think. She May get a name out of this I think.

Hargabga

1) Yes, it could've been done. Hanno had supreme authority over Named. That authority, in recognition of a situation that wasn't specified within treaties, could've been ceded. Hanno just didn't want to, because he thought it was "unjust".

2) Both agreed that yes, under normal conventions Red Axe needed to be judged under T&T. However, Cat also agreed that such situation wasn't exactly thought about in the design of a treaty. Which is why Cordelia asked for renegotiation. Which is entirely reasonable. If a contract you signed has a loophole that will let someone loot your house, why on Earth would you still continue to sign on it? Procer could always back out of an agreement completely, if forced. That is a consequence of not recognising realities and refusing to negotiate further. That is what Hanno does. And why? Well, because he just don't like it.

3) True. Except it wasn't her demands. It was demands of reality. She isn't a Tyrant. She can't force people to follow her against their will. I can't fathom why you cannot see that. I can fathom why Hanno can't see that though. He thinks "personal agency" is a punchline, and not a very good one.

It's not hypocrisy to recognise that world doesn't run on movie logic.

dadycool

Interesting how Cordelia and Hanno are blaming each other for failing to keep their people in check and supporting each other. The quote is right, they both think themselves in the right, so they're each bringing to bear their final solutions in desperation, thinking themselves all alone in a hopeless situation.

Interesting how Cat, who was once thought to be the worst enemy they would ever face and a monster beyond humanizing, was the only thing keeping them together. It makes sense, since her being Named means she can see Hanno's side, to a certain extent, and her title means she can see Cordelia's side, to a certain extent. Unfortunately, she'll likely return to a shattered Procer, a broken alliance, if not Grand Alliance, and a problem greater than she can easily solve.

ninegardens

I think it wasn't just Cat keeping them together.

I'm pretty sure the inevitable bootcrunch of failure is driving them apart here.

saithorthepyro

TBF, Cat and Hanno were also drifting apart after the Arsenal incident because Hanno really seems unable to grasp politics, diplomacy, compromise, or that a lot of common people really, really don't care about abstract concepts like justice and honor when there is a hoard of ravenous undead on their doorstep.

Burnsy

So much happening, but I wanna take a quick moment to say; fuck Antigone and her 'most people aren't worth saving' crap, and fuck Kreios and his ancient arrogant ass. EE does such a fantastic job of making the 'Good' guys just absolutely insufferable.

Reader in the Night

I mean, look at the people in Procer who decided to riot in the middle of an active war for their own survival; or look at the people who decided to try and jump ship and act like the War isn't their problem, despite the fact that it very much is. It's like they are trying to get themselves, and everyone else, killed. Do they deserve to be saved, despite their best efforts?

Shveiran

Who, the ignorant peasants that are scared to death? I'm not a fan, but they are not leaders nor do they have access to a bird's eye view of the matter.

I'm not a fan and sure, that makes a mess, but that's just scared people acting irrationally. I'm not really comfortable making a judgment call on whether someone is "worth saving" based on the fact that they make wrong choices during the end of the world when they don't have the tools to deal with the problem.

It's not exactly a moral failing, you know?

Reader in the Night

Oh, I totally agree. Humans are flawed, and that's not bad. They clearly don't deserve to die.

But does that make them "deserve" saving? Think on the perspective of an immortal giant: Should anyone be expected to self-sacrifice to rid other people of their own problems resulting from their own actions?

The question being asked of the giant is not, "Do these people deserve to live?", the question is "Is it your problem if these people live or die?"

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I hold that if "these people deserve to die" is false, then "these people deserve to be saved" must necessarily be true. I get what you're saying, it's just that Kreios is himself a flawed person, and his refusal to concern himself with this, to make it his problem, is part of what's imperfect with him. Not that perfect characters would do anything but weaken the story, of course.

C_B

Yes. Obviously yes.

People don't need to be morally flawless or perfectly rational in order for "they don't get massacred" to be a better outcome than "they do get massacred." I don't understand how this is controversial. Lots of civilians getting massacred is bad. Preventing that from happening is good.

marillius

All those people who have been stepped on by nobility their entire lives and are still being stepped on, always being told it was necessary and important and right, that they HAD to? All of those people who have NO IDEA what's going on beyond rumors and some fricking undead showing up because the First Prince decided to go with Propaganda and INTENTIONALLY leave them all ignorant? All of those people don't deserve saving?

Shveiran

Honestly, we could stop at "all those people" and the answer should still be a resounding "yes".

marillius

Fair. I'd have to do a little bending to give you an example where the answer might be no, honestly.

Zach

In real life there is no guarantee that wars can be won, or that you or your family and loved ones will survive a war. These people don't have access to full information about the situation, and they frankly aren't even wrong if they think the government is lying to them (because it totally is – Cordelia was spreading rumors that the dead hadn't invaded as deeply as they actually have). So they're panicking, because the situation is one worth panicking about. For all they know, they're just going to be fed into the meat grinder and might be able to escape or otherwise avoid the conflict. They have no magical way of knowing otherwise.

saithorthepyro

The issue when you are chosen to be the standards of good morals in a world of complications, is that eventually one sees all who cannot match your standards as equally evil.

In the end despite things like the Plague, Tariq was probably the hero furthest away from that mindset.

Mental Mouse

I'd chalk that up to Antigone knowing how to manipulate the Titan.

Henry

I think it's partially fat but mostly the fact that she is a True neutral forest druid. Those types are known for caring about much outside of themselves and whatever druid traditions they come from.

Juff

Typo Thread:

lighting > lightning
Milenan men > Milenan for men
All contribute > All contributed in the distance (repeated the next sentence) years he had > years than he had put down largely > put them down largely promising the offer > promising to offer now be much > now would be much
The slipped > They slipped long as the > long at the must so keep > must to keep

Evgeny Permyakov

And so it's begun. Cordelia and Hanno are now competing for the Name of Warden of the West. Who is going to win – an unflinching politician or an unflinching knight?

ninegardens

General Abigail, the Fox, swoops in for the surprise nomination.

Or... more honestly, Rozalia might be a good Compromise pick, keeping both Hanno and Cordelia on as minions with their respective skillsets.

Evgeny Permyakov

Oh, I'd love for Abigail to win, it would be a great irony. But I very much doubt it, even if it isn't impossible.

dadycool

Her thing is failing upwards despite her best efforts to get herself exiled or something. If she can badmouth a bunch of politicians to their face and get a laugh and pat on the back from those same politicians, do you really think there's any position she can't blunder her way into?

jamesc9

Her thing was explained many chapters ago, shortly after Cat formalised her promotion to General (defined de-facto as the most senior surviving person in an army). She wants to be fired for mild incompetence, into a position that is less gallows-adjacent.

caoimhinh

#TeamHanno

Do what must be done, enforce law, be just within certain boundaries, don't fall to pettiness and bullshit political excuses of why things can't be done.

Shveiran

So, basically, kill them all if they step out of line.

That is where this ends, is it not? For all that Hanno was so uncomfortable with the Iron Prince dealing with the revolting fantassins, that would be his only solution.

Not because he is cruel, but because he DOESN'T HAVE ANOTHER SKILLSET.

Abrakadabra

Yep, he has a hammer, and everithing around will be resembling a nail if the shit hits the fan.

Henry

To him Credit he actually is pretty good at gaining personal loyalty. He may struggle with big picture politics but I have no doubt he could come up with a heroic speech to get a bunch of captains to back down

Shveiran

Sure! Which is why I'm GLAD he is stepping up. What worries me is that I see him looking for the next step to take, and he seems to be looking to places where "big picture politics" are kind of THE requirement.

hakureireimu

Who is this? Certainly not Hanno.

Snappy270

And so begins round 2 of the procer civil wars and hanno tries to battle the largest country on the continent. With the preisthood becoming his zealots, his "Judges" maybe and slowly becomes the thing he hated. A Tyrant.

saithorthepyro

Really tired of hearing that attempting to kill foreign rulers and pretending that not doing anything to concede to entirely reasonable fears about Heroes doing purges of those they don't like is somehow bullshit political excuses. Things like that have consequences that need to be handled in a way that doesn't cause rebellions, or the Heroes can go ahead and go to war against the Dead King with no armies, coin, or support to help them out.

Also Hanno obeys no Laws but whatever a weird alien force that calls itself an angel whispers in his ear, and now that is gone, the law is what Hanno is decides. All hail the new Tyrant!

Xinc

To be fair, given how rotten Procer was and is, fear of such things happening was justified. Very much a "you dont burn if your innocent" story

Insanenoodlyguy

Not sure about that. I think Cordelia just became the First Prince.

Konstantin von Karstein

No, what made you think that? It wouldn't make sense for EE to make her a claimant for WotW then in her next chapter become First Prince.

saithorthepyro

The theory going around on the subreddit is that First Prince/Warden of the West are Villainous/Heroic mirrors of the same concept, so are linked in some ways but still distinct enough, I think someone put it the same name worn differently depending on who claims it. Or that they are close enough that claimants can at least sense the presence of another.

Zach

This doesn't make any sense. I don't think there's even any history of First Prince being a Name; it's just a political position in a firmly Good-aligned nation (or whatever you'd call the Principate).

Evgeny Permyakov

Actually, let's look.

East interludes – 2 chapters – Amadeus, Akua, Malicia, yet unsettled

North interludes – 3 chapters – Seems to be under Hakram

South interlude – 1 chapter – Seems firmly on the way to be under Basilia

West interludes – 2 chapters – Cordelia and Hanno, yet unsettled. Thought Abigail on the outskirts has potential as well.

Earl of Purple

There should be more South chapters to see how Basilia handles the news she's now the ruler of Tenerife, the Principality that was one of Theodosius the Unconquered's first conquests outside the Free Cities and has leant toward Helike every time Procer let it.

saithorthepyro

I'm personally betting she takes over, then conscripts everyone to go fight the Dead King anyway.

dadycool

lol, "Empress Basilia! Thank you for rescuing us from having to face the Dead King or contributing in any meaningful way to the war against him!" "Yeah, about that..."

hue hue

I bet the next one will be about the drown

Sykomantis

And from our of nowhere we get Interlude: Under I

ninegardens

So something that sticks out.
Like... REALLY sticks out.

Mr Hanno "I don't judge" White knight:
"Coredlia has failed to uphold her end of the bargain"
Also
"Dear titan, fuck you, get off your ass. You are worse than the elves".
Like.... That is some pretty sick judgement right there pal.

And... I can't help but think... against the Dead King... Hanno may have just made a very very bad mistake.

Yes, Krieos Riddlemaker is powerful. Great. Good.
He's also OLD. He's something that Nessie has had a long time to prepare for. He is not new Dead King will have contingencies for putting that guy down.

It only took two years to develop a counter to Sve-Nok, a Sve-Nok IS new.

If I were an immortal lich king, and there was a vaguely benevolent god on the opposite side of the continent, I would work on counters for that... you know, some time in my many thousands of years. Who was it that said that Usurption was the heart of sorcery?

Krieos is just not someone I want anywhere near the front lines. Keep him back. Use him as support, or logistics, or whatever, but putting him within Spellcasting range of Nessie is a bad plan.

Darkening

I mean, Hanno stopping his impartiality and choosing to Act is his whole character arc right now. He's judging Krieos for doing what he was doing before and being the Silent Man from the story he told earlier. As for coming up for a counter for sve nok in two years, he probably had seen Night in action before, given that the drow's first reaction to him being mentioned was basically utter terror. There's a story there. I doubt he can counter Krieos completely, but this story really looks like it ends in Krieos burning up all his stored magic and life force for some final redemption equals death moment.

Linnus42

I mean I don't think DK has ever gotten close to Krieos. Whereas DK bordered the Drow and was even consulted by the Twilight Sages. He has had far more time to study Night, Sve Noc and the Drow than he ever has had to study the Twilight Sages.

Shveiran

Old Night, though. Post-Winter was a different beast, and not just because it was stronger. and Sve Noc didn't even exist pre-Winter (or rather, they were not a twin goddesses).

It was still a base to start from, I'll grant that. But then, I guess the DK did study the Gigantes at some point, if only through a crusader like Antigone.

mamm0nn

See, this is why you need some Named that can show up, say 'Hey rioters, you look like you've got plenty of energy and spunk left in ya! You've hereby been conscripted to fight in the war in the north.' Right now, Procer needs a reminder that their rights diminish in harsh times, especially when they're being idiots.

Reader in the Night

The problem is that half the time the Named forget that themselves. They put their own personal shit, or whatever credo they choose to live by, as above the continued survival of the continent.

Regular people and Named can both be idiots, but in very different ways. The nature of Names means that the ones that hold them are ridiculously stubborn motherfuckers, while normal people are flaky and prone to panicking and doing counterproductive shit.

saithorthe pyro

TBF, in the face of having to repeatedly send family members and food north to support a war effort, sustain a massive wave of refugees, constantly deal with economic and agricultural strain to try and deal with an invasion, and it's still not enough and the undead are leaking through and it looks like the apocalypse has some, of course people are going to panic and try to find a way out that does not end with them and their families slaughtered and raised as undead monstrosities and their souls used to fuel Keter's experiments. They are already being conscripted, things are desperate, and when you are talking about medieval era peasantry rights isn't exactly something that exist to begin with.

AbraKadabra

That is a modern misconception. Medieval peasants had a good number of rights. And those rights were later stripped away after the middle ages started vaning and the New age begin where ironically they had less rights until the revolutions started up.

Oóher Than that I agree.

saithorthepyro

It kind of depends on where you were and what were considered rights, and yeah in practice they had more rights than on paper half the time because it was harder to centralize and....eh let's just settle on Procer's people weren't being treated lightly before they decided they were going to rise up. Losing wars tends to do that.

Frivolous

I'm just really glad that Otto Reitzenberg might be alive. It's only a hope, not a certainty, because the mention of Otto above is not defined in time and seems to contradict Interlude: West I, but a hope is better than nothing.

Also aww, a love ballad about Otto and Frederic. I love it.

Shveiran

I like it too, but is that canon?

I was under the impression that was just camaraderie.

Like Robber and Hakram, not like Juniper and Aisha.

Frivolous

Shveiran: Sorry, I don't know what you mean.

Are you asking if the love ballad represents an actual romance between Otto and Frederic? No idea. Could be wishful thinking on the composer's and singers's parts.

ohJohN

I'm pretty sure it's just camaraderie (despite preexisting in-universe rumors about their closeness). We've seen both Frederic's and Otto's perspectives in interludes, which mostly established their deep respect for and friendship with each other without any obvious (to me, at least) romantic subtext. We've also only seen Frederic interested in women (Cordelia and Cat) which, though obviously not conclusive, gives some evidence for his preferences.

Funny you mentioned Robber, though – there's a not insignificant chance he's the source of those rumors in the first place. Here's a quote from the chapter when he arrives in Hainaut for the offensive:

Book 6, Chapter 49: Association (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/08/11/chapter-49-association/>)

ohJohN

For timing: "West I" took place right before the forces at the Morgentor retreated to Brus. In this chapter, we learn that after making it to Brus, Frederic rode back out to destroy a Crab and was subsequently rescued by Otto.

For the contradiction, if you're talking about this bit in "West I":

"They were a stern and unflinching lot, the Reitzenberg. The Prince of Bremen was called Otto Redcrown by men for the proof of that, the same stubborn charge that'd killed his father and two elder sisters before the crown passed to him and he carried it to its end."

I think it's just confusingly phrased. The intention could be that he carried the charge that killed his predecessors to its end (which he did!). Or that he would carry the crown to its end (but hasn't gotten there yet) because he's the last Reitzenberg – when he dies, there will be nobody left for him to pass it to.

Otto is almost definitely still alive, at least at the time when word was last sent to Hanno.

He led the retreat after rescuing Frederic, which prevented the latter's death, and I'd expect Hanno to ruminate on how morale on the northwestern front had plummeted if he knew either of the princes leading it had died.

Frivolous

ohJohN: Thank you for the analysis.

Unrecovered

That thing will blow up in everyone's face, won't it? Angel corpse made in a weapon of mass destruction.

sengachi

Every single person in the comments arguing whether Hanno is right or Cordelia is right? Here's the thing.

You're doing exactly what the opening quote talked about, and what Cordelia described happening among the fractious rulers in the beginning of the chapter. Blaming allies for failing to be perfect and perfectly fend off the Dead King.

The simple fact is that, to be blunt, both Hanno and Cordelia are doing pretty damn good jobs in a nightmare situation. They're doing imperfect jobs, making imperfect decisions based on imperfect data and imperfect judgement. But if you want perfect objective judgement with no flaws and flawless execution, go talk to Judgement, not mortals.

The reasons there's problems, the reason they're all stressed and pushed to the breaking point and making possibly disastrous choices is because of the Dead King and the Intercessor. Not Hanno or Cordelia, those two. They are in a situation where every action carries unconscionable risks, in which it's totally impossible to say beforehand which decision might lead to ruin, and in which mortal human judgement is being applied to problems beyond literally anyone's prior expertise or skillset.

We want there to be a way to thread the eye of the needle. We see a world and characters we've grown to love and we want everything going wrong to have an Answer, which if only executed right, would fix everything without losing even more. And when that Answer isn't delivered on, we find characters to blame and fight with each other over.

Just like the rulers splitting apart and blaming each other as Procer burns.

But there's no one to blame. There's just inhuman pressure being applied to humans, and the inevitable cracks that creates.

sirfury

Like a lot of commenters, I would agree Cordelia is not without faults and has made more than a few mistakes. But it also seems that some commenters are brushing aside the nature of the Principality and the First Prince position and simply calling it "politics, end of discussion", without giving it its due diligence and giving much thought on how it actually affects Cordelia's decision making process and dictates her actions. Comparisons between the Rulership of Catherine and Cordelia are not apt, as Callow and the Principality are different beasts. (Besides Catherine isn't doing too much of Ruling anyway). The latter is a vast land is basically a political landscape of many small kingdoms ruled by numerous corrupt Princes with the First Prince having in reality only a little power over them, as a lot of important decisions have to be made by Council vote.

Many of the unfortunate decisions she made were keeping in mind the likelihood of them being passed by the council vote, and a lot of the morally, objectively better decisions would simply be voted down and might even have caused her to be replaced as First Prince. And would that have been a better outcome than the present? Debatable.

More than the First Prince, the Principality is the issue. As it was centuries in the making, its unmaking would also take a long time without something more drastic than the present scenario. And would likely still claim more lives than now. Civil wars can be years in the making and total death tolls are nothing to scoff about.

All I'm saying is while it may be correct to call out Cordelia's failures, it also must be done taking in full account the actual power her political position grants her, and what she has to do to keep the Principality from disintegrating during the Dead Kings assault, when despite all its corruption and bureaucracy, it still has been producing (till now) manpower for the war. Is the Principality a good political system, especially at a time of crisis. No.

Can much be done about it in the short term. No.

It is what it is. After this event, if it survives in any capacity, it will likely change. But that is a topic of discussion for a later date.

nimelennar

I love that Abigail's "sharp instincts" entail a doom-and-gloom prediction. Even off-screen, she's in character.

sengachi

Abigail: "What could the Dead King do that would be utterly terrifying, beyond my ability to counter, and ruin all our days?"

Abigail: "..."

Abigail: "... alright I think I know that the Dead King is going to do next so write this down."

letouriste

welp, it's not ominous at all...

Xinci

Well, its interesting to see that those with Light and presumably those who are...less sinful, I suppose would be spared. I do wonder though if its just based on traits in this case then or if its another contingency by Above following the pattern of "from the ashes" they tend to work with. Given those who would survive would probably have potential to follow Good, anyway. Without Judgements clear vision can see some potential issues, and presumably such a contingency isnt the best option for em.

Anyway, one requires Light to properly observe the Angel which is interesting in implication. I would presume the spine to be linked to the Heavens where the living choir is given the "not of Creation" thing she says, the wings one can see the skein of causality through presumably, though they likely serve many more functions. The spikes I also presume to be causality related but am unsure on the exacts, maybe also related to that analogue of their vision being able to be refracted like light through glass.

Kreios's titles for people are quite nice. Its rather horribly nice to know that the Elves indeed plan to warp Spring into giving them young. Likely along with the forest home that cursed them...Perhaps it can be usurped or unwrit when knowledge of the magics used in the war burgeons further understanding. The Deoraithe will need to adapt for sure, when they learn the news. Regardless doing so is kind of a trap as well, as it now allows possible rebels against the institutions of the Elves, though given how old they may need to become to be strong, it is likely that only a few will turn against them at first.

Darkening

Apparently Triumphant trumped its Gaze and killed it instead, so it's not exactly an infallible weapon. Presumably she countered it with hordes of demons, since that was her thing, and the Dead King has demons too. Though she probably had a story on her side, whereas the story would decidedly be against the dead king in this case. I'm super interested what Cat would see if she looked at the angel. She has her whole story of defying angels going on and would probably stare straight at it until her eye started bleeding just out of spite.

Xinci

Ah also, I suppose Antigone is correct in that the choice to fight isn't about them. Its about his own willingness to give aid to such beings where he once wouldn't have. To be kind, when he was once cruel. Sure its a redemption story that will likely kill him and have various usurpers come for the corpse but perhaps that mental and emotional catharsis will be worth it. Does make me wonder if he will teach anything that could help the Gigantes come out of isolation later on, given they probably used people as ritual fodder its likely that some means could be artificed to aid them in their workings without human sacrifice at this point.

Frivolous

I wonder if Hanno is passing or failing his crisis of faith, as Tariq mentioned to Catherine in Dynamism.

All the political and war problems Hanno and Cordelia are dealing with could be seen as incidental to this issue, whether Hanno is winning against the crisis or losing, because this is about Story, and Story rules all.

saithorthepyro

Honestly I think the answer that will be to if Hanno made the right choice will ultimately be...whichever one he chooses. Unless he actually transitions to a Villain name in his choice I doubt he'll have doubts about whichever action he takes. How that action is perceived by those around him, especially non-Heroes, will be the bone of contention.

Frivolous

saithorthepyro: There is also the possibility that Hanno is failing his crisis of faith, that he is not living up to his principles and his values, and that he will simply lose his Name of White Knight, not transition to any other Name like Warden of the West.

I think Hanno might be failing, actually. I think he and Cordelia might both be failing.

With Cordelia it is not so much of an issue, because she's not and has never been Bestowed. But for Hanno it's a big issue.

It would be nice if we could see Hanno using Light or one of his aspects, like Recall. That would help prove that he's still got it, that he's still White Knight.

beleester

This reminds me a lot of that debate over the Scorched Apostate and the Stalwart Apostle. Rely on faith that the heroes will win in the end, even when that seems impossible, or rely on the power of your own actions even when the only action you see is terrible? Cordelia is having a crisis of faith, and seems to be leaning towards the villainous side of the choice.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, she fell.

"Have it prepared for us," the First Prince repeated, and this time the ring of an order was unmistakeable.

The laurels burned against her palm, but Cordelia did not flinch.

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't think she did. Narratively speaking, it wouldn't make sense for EE to make her a claimant for WotW then in her next chapter make her into First Prince.

«The ring of an order » absolutely doesn't makes it look like she suddenly became Named. The laurels would probably do mire than a light lien if she had become a Villain.

MoreBeer

This wouldn't be the first time Cordelia has been offered two names though, one from above and one from below. When she turns down the first, the second is offered. And unlike last time, this time she's clearly accepting.

Konstantin von Karstein

She's not accepting anything.

Konstantin von Karstein

At least for now.

Reader in the Night

May I just say that Abigail's ruse of competence has become so pervasive, even Hanno believes it? And at some point, if everybody believes a certain lie, it becomes a truth. Dunno if Abigail is moving towards a Name, but she certainly is creating a reputation.

Insanenoodlyguy

She's a Ciaphus Cain at this point. She has a low opinion of her own competence, and she's certainly less courageous and ingenious as her reputation, but she's not actually bad at what she does. Notably good, in fact.

agumentic

Hanno believes it because it's not really a ruse. Abigail is very competent at her job, she just doesn't believe it herself.

Sykomantis

I am living for the fact that this chapter in particular is causing so much argument in the comments. This level of irony is a delicacy.

ohJohN

Is... is Kreios really supposed to be hundreds of millions of years old?

Fermi estimate: humans take about 20k breaths per day, Hanno is roughly 30 years old, so:
 $20,000 \times 365 \times 30 = 219 \text{ million}$

If we take Hanno literally here, that sure gives Kreios's talk about "dust of dust" some serious weight – even for the lone survivor of a long-dead race of practically-immortal lesser gods, that's a damn long time to have lived. For an IRL comparison, the distant ancestors of humanity started walking upright ~6m years ago, and homo sapiens evolved only ~300k years ago. I'd call Kreios a dinosaur, but he is conceivably older than the dinosaurs (which first appeared ~243-233m years ago).

Mental Mouse

I think you are being unnecessarily literal here. Especially since Hanno is not necessarily good at math.

Henry

Is he actually pretty well educated being a former scribe. I don't Magine him know quite a bit about math unless there something I'm forgetting

hakureireimu

Unless I have my geography mixed up, this should be West right?

Murska

It is interesting that generally in the real world when people are faced with a crisis, they hold together and sacrifice selflessly. But many Procerans seem to just lose their minds and scatter to the winds, even though it should be abundantly obvious to everyone that unless the armies in the North prevail, they will all perish.

I would more expect Cordelia to have to deal with too many volunteers for the military compared to those working on fields and people renouncing payment and giving up everything they have stored to help than people refusing to aid the struggle or seceding to die with some other state a few months later.

People aren't stupid in this particular way. They can see the writing on the wall.

An interesting counterpoint, perhaps the psychology of Calernia has been warped by Heroes saving the world when everything is at its darkest over and over again. It pays off to refuse to contribute to the common good at your own expense if the crisis is always resolved in the very end and your contributions don't actually matter.

Xinci

I would say specifically its because Procers subcultures seem to have been manipulated in various aspects by the Dead King over time to make it easier once he actually has to invade.

1) The lycoanese are kept in relatively few numbers by raids and their mages picked off so they cant develop too many force multipliers. They remain isolated from the southern groups and as such take the brunt of cultural pressure to properly adapt to fighting such a relentless enemy.

2) The Arselites and Alamans to the south have possibly had a fear of mages exacerbated over time even after the Mage guild was dismantled, making wide ranging responses that could use their large population to their advantage unlikely to develop.

3) The Arselites are least have a wide internal culture for dueling, which while useful for getting skilled at arms tends to not aid the making of soldiers that well and often aids continual internal disputes.

4) Their main ways of sorcery are based on prayers without the presumable safeguards/shaping of the scripture, which means that while it can do stuff it seems rather hard to narrow it down well enough to work.

5) The House of Lights influence has been waning for decades, meaning less priest are around in more vulnerable positions or less priest available in places that can easily be fortified against a possible invasion.

The Lycaonese's reaction fits that of a culture who has been shaped for conflict vs such a unflinching foe, however the rest of Procer is coddled and weak. They arent prepared, and as such, flight overpowers fight. They do not have a true sense of unity

308924810a

That's an interesting point.

Suppose that the political culture has been shaped by multiple incidents of some great villain arising to prominence over an area, crushing the local power bloc within that area, and in the process creating their own inevitable downfall by provoking and story-empowering the heroes that will rise against them for their actions.

Under such a circumstance it'd be rational for lesser powers to defect away from the power bloc that's being crushed by the villain, thus avoiding the devastation that a rising villain can bring by sheltering under another power bloc which the villain would be badly overextending to provoke, then waiting for the fated hero to defeat the villain, giving them the opportunity to take advantage of the power vacuum left by the fall of a villain in order to expand their own power.

The issue here is that this defection is uncommonly bold in some ways, because if the Grand Alliance wanted to send a Named assassin after any defectors they absolutely could.

308924810a

Poor communication kills.

The war effort can't really afford to lose either Cordelia or Hanno.

DC

"General Abigail believed that soon Keter would begin landing mages the same way to create disrupting forces by slaying and raising villages.

The Fox's instincts were sharp enough that Hanno was not inclined to doubt them."

It is something of a sign of the times that Abigail's endless pessimism and misfortune has made her a highly effective general in this war.

She also continues to remain the best character because behind this short reference is an entire imagined chapter of lament and resignation ending in that conclusion.

I am really looking forward to what becomes of her and her legacy in the epilogue. Calernia needs an entire family, tradition, maybe even a Name for people like her. :v

benthelynx

I was thinking The Reluctant General, but honestly there is more to it than that isn't there – it could be it's own line of names tbh

308924810a

Thinking about this whole situation again, I think this:

-Princess Francesca, her friend and ally of almost a decade, was dead. Her palace had been swarmed by a mob of rioters and disaffected soldiers, who'd dragged the sixty-four years old princess into the streets and splattered her head with a rock before displaying her on a pole. It had happened, Cordelia was told, because Francesca had refused to consider what her distant cousin and successor proclaimed within the hour: Tenerife was seceding from the Principate of Procer. –

Needs to be examined more carefully. It's too convenient for the Dead King.

I've been reading up on how failure cascades work in gaming and I've come to the realization that manipulating a principality into seceding, immediately after a failure of the northern defenses, and following a period of sustained adversity, is a pretty decent way to trigger such a cascade.

If you can induce one principality to secede while the others are reeling from having found their past efforts and sacrifices insufficient to properly halt the threat, it becomes a coin flip as to whether the politically knowledgeable classes will react with a great outpouring of rage towards the defectors, or whether they will react in despair that their current efforts are not enough to keep them safe, and begin panicing and casting about for an alternative. And because it appears that neither newspapers nor, in this setting, scrying, are in position to create a unified national discourse, they should have to flip that coin repeatedly for each of the political discourses of specific regions within Procer.

Wasn't there some villain raising an undead army within the Brocellian? That sounds like a distraction the Dead King would have set up.

And he has Revenants and spies, he probably could have caused one or two of these defections.

Only issue is that, the withholding of resources for the war effort without instead pursuing an alternate path to safety still doesn't quite make sense. It'd only fit if there were local threats or shortages which give a ruler's retainers justifications to argue that focusing resources within one's own borders is necessary. Bandits, rebels, or rioters that have made the shift from being rioters to being rebels might do it, but I think it'd fit better if this practice of transporting airborne raiding forces had been introduced a while ago, and there was implication that a bunch of small raiding bands of undead had already both slipped through and somehow able to dodge easy interception once out of the range of the Dead King's scrying-disruption rituals.

Someperson

Well then. This has the shape of a conflict that will define heroism for the next Age. And it will be messy.

Cordelia and Hanno are clearly lined up to be at odds, with hinted at rival claims on the same Name, parallels between each of them reaching for some very big guns to resolve the conflict, and serious (and honestly well-founded) sentiments that the other hasn't kept up their end of the deal. Loosely speaking, Cordelia's authority and role is mainly that of a ruler where Hanno's is mainly that of a hero.

Catherine would probably sympathize quite a bit more with Cordelia's views, and the fact that she even (somewhat surprisingly) gave Cordelia her blessing to start testing the Seraphim bomb makes this angle seem all the more likely. However, she also gave Tariq her word just before he sacrificed himself that she would reconcile herself with Hanno and not interfere overly much with him finding his own path with what it means to be a hero in the coming Age. There is no way that breaking such an oath could have anything short of disastrous consequences for her story, and it would be very difficult for Catherine to involve herself in this conflict in any way without really going against the spirit of the oath, and yet somehow I doubt she will manage to be completely hands-off about something so very important. Whatever role she takes in this will have substantial constraints to tiptoe around.

And then of course there is the heyday that the Wandering Bard will have with this extremely important showdown that will probably shape many future Names. Assuming this isn't what she was sowing the seeds for all along, and one of the outcomes that she intended from everything that happened at the Arsenal.

Someperson

The trouble is, it isn't really just a matter of one of them "winning" or "losing." The Liesse Accords is about drawing boundaries between Named and the affairs of normal people. But now, Hanno is a Named trying to also become a political leader, and Cordelia is a political leader trying to also become a Named. There is no good way for that conflict to be decided.

Unless the conflict is turned completely on its side, the Liesse Accords are sunk. Naturally I expect the classic Foundling fallback against the unwinnable, wherein one flips the board and then insists everyone else was mistaken about which game was being played all along.

Storm

yeesh, this comment section is horrible.

Interlude: East III

"Red runs the Tower's mortar."

– Praesi saying

Within an hour of entering Ater, Akua Sahelian was sought out for a conspiracy to overthrow the Empress. By the end of the day, no fewer than seventeen such offers had been made to her.

"It is all very tasteless," she mused. "A defeat against an invading enemy – Callowan, too, how classical – paired with a great gathering of nobles at the imperial court, everyone scheming to overthrow the Tower and a vague sense of doom looming over all these proceedings. One would be forgiven for thinking they'd stumbled into a tragedy written now by Adomako. Any moment now we will stumble into a scene of overdone symbolism."

The golden-eyed sorceress paused.

"A wounded gazelle being fought over by lions," Akua decided. "It's always lions, isn't it? There is an excessive fondness in our writing for the beasts, Kendi, given their general uselessness."

"You are mad," Kendi Akaze harshly replied. "And not even in the way fools honour. Do not think I will not sell you out to the Tower at the first opportunity."

Perhaps it was the presence of the Amaranth around her neck, the way the ancient artefact drowned out all the pettier emotions, but Akua had found herself growing fond of the man. He was remarkably straightforward in his hatred of her, and though he had not attempted to kill her since their mage duel in Kala she suspected it was only a matter of time until he tried again. She did not blame him for this, or feel particularly offended. She had led the man's sister and several of his kin to their death at the Folly they named after her, and that was a better reason for hatred than most.

"I expect several of the nobles who approached me for treachery did so on Malicia's behalf," Akua amusedly replied. "Not that my having committed to nothing will soothe her fear of me in the slightest."

"And why should she not fear you?" Kendi said. "All the world knows you seek her throne."

"Naturally," Akua agreed, draining the last of her cup.

She had lost the habit of pairing wine with antidote. The taste was no longer familiar to her, after drinking from other bottles. Her fondness of it had thinned. Her fondness of many things had thinned, the sorceress thought, and rose to her feet.

"Let us be off, Kendi," Akua said. "There is time to be wasted and I would waste it elsewhere."

Out in the City of Gates, not these luxurious apartments that felt like they were closing in on her from every direction. Like a noose slowly tightening. Kendi made an unpleasant comment about her intellect, charmer that he was, but he followed. He always followed.

How else, Akua thought, could he find the moment to stick the knife?

They went into the streets of the capital, followed by a horde of shadows. Spies belonging to three dozen different lords and the Eyes, soldiers, Sentinels and two – no, three assassins. Really, an illusionary veil? Akua had first made her reputation bleeding fae, this was insulting. She informed the man as much after melting off his limbs in a cloud of acid before turning to ask her other would-be assassins to try it again tomorrow, for she was not in the mood for sport today. Her shielding spells came up quicker than the arrow came down, so a few blood-curling screams later the last remaining assassin fled.

"Someone will succeed," Kendi told her. "Sooner or later, you will fail."

"I can always count on you for perspective," she replied, patting his arm fondly.

He looked like he'd swallowed a lemon, which put her in a good enough mood to make up for the sloppy assassination attempts. Even the Jacks would have done better, and they'd only been around for a few years on top of being led by a whiny heroine. Akua found, as she walked the streets, that Ater was a pot about to boil over. The capital had swelled with refugees not only from Nok and the outskirts of Thalassina but now also the swaths of the Wasteland that'd been ravaged by the civil war. It was said that the City of Gates held half a million people within its walls, but she knew that to be inaccurate – it was usually closer to three hundred thousand, only growing when famine struck other parts of Praes.

At the moment, though, she suspected that there truly might be five hundred thousand people in the city. A disastrous number to try to keep fed during a siege, no matter how full the Tower's granaries, and the city was poorly equipped to host them besides. Large swaths of the capital were abandoned, and though it was better than living in the streets making a home in those districts was barely livable. District mages would keep the sewers working, the wards in good state and keep an eye out for epidemics but wouldn't really go out of their way to help beyond that. There were only so many of them and the city was enormous.

It'd once been custom for wealthy nobles to patronize sections of the city, but Malicia had stamped out the habit to consolidate her control over the capital. Would she reconsider now? Unlikely, Akua decided. The situation was too volatile for the empress to be willing to take on such a risk. Her wanderings through the half-ruined streets were noticed not only by spies and soldiers but also by the refugees themselves: someone must have recognized her, for a crowd began to gather. And, as crowds were wont to be, it grew angry. At first she wondered if she would have to retreat under shield spell as a mob tried to tear her apart, but then laughter choked up her throat as she made out what was being shouted.

"Down the Tower," the crowd shouted.

"Death to Malicia," the crowd insisted.

And, worst of all-

"Warlock, Lady Warlock," they shouted. "Sahelian. Save us, Sahelian."

Save us, Sahelian, Akua dully repeated. Had anyone ever spoken more absurd a sentence? It would have been the work of a moment to whip these dirty, desperate people into a raging mob. The fear was thick here, the Black Queen's name on half the lips. The Queen of Callow would come and kill them all, they said, like she'd done to the refugees that'd tried to cross into the Fields of Streges. She was here to bury the Empire, bury them with it, and it was all Malicia's fault. Five years ago you would have rioted at anyone trying to overthrow her, Akua thought. How quickly gratitude faded in the City of Gates.

"They'll turn on you too," Kendi said from behind her. "Tear out your throat like animals. It won't last."

It would have been so easy, to whip them into a frenzy and send them rioting into the streets. To sow the seeds of a chaos only she could calm and through that, oh through that she would rise. Climb the Tower until there was nothing left above, no one worth bowing to. So Akua climbed a broken house, a sea of people gathered before her, and told them the truth.

"The Black Queen will not kill civilians," she said. "The Army of Callow quarrels only with the Tower. Stay indoors, stay out of the way, and you will be safe."

It was not what they'd wanted to hear, she thought, as a rippled went through the crowd. They'd wanted blood, wanted death, wanted something to sink their teeth into. It was easier than going back to their hovels, afraid and cold. So she gave them something more.

"I have nothing left but my magic to offer you," Akua said, "but that much I will give you. Bring your wounded, your sick. I will see to them."

Something more than fear and cold. The first few were children – broken limbs, coughs, lungrot – but by the time she was done with them already people had begun to act. To organize. A run-down mansion that was clean and dry was opened to her, beds dragged into the great hall and what clean linen there could be rustled up volunteered. Strangers did this who had not known each other for an hour, with a smoothness that surprised. Jino-waza. A few hedge mages came forward and she taught them a spell to boil water and conjure clean water before continuing with the work. They came in as a trickle, already a line running outside for half the district and kept in order by large men with makeshift cudgels, but the trickle never slowed.

Akua's magic did not tire. Fingers reattached, infections burned out, broken bones soldered. Cuts closed, parasites flushed out, nerves regrown. She had done this all many a time, after the Army of Callow saw battle. With Night instead of sorcery, but she was only better for the change. She was not sure how long she healed, the faces and people blending, but eventually she found she was drenched in sweat. The Amaranth kept getting caught in the red silk collar, so she set it down to the side and returned to the work. Immediately the heat washed over her, from the fire and the people and the Wasteland's pounding sun, but she mastered herself. A man was ushered in with his young daughter.

She had a fever, which Akua's finding spell told her was from an infection in the stomach. It would be more tedious than difficult to heal, which she informed them of. The man – a tall, heavy sort with soldier's scar – looked heartbreakingly relieved.

"I knew you'd come through, Lady Sahelian," he said as she began the spell. "You've always done right by us."

Curious, she spared the man a glance.

"I mean no rudeness," she began, and he snorted.

"I was only a soldier," he said. "But I served under you at First Liesse. Would have at the Second too, if my wife hadn't gotten pregnant with my youngest. The name's Kamau."

There was, to her dim horror, open pride in his voice at having served her. How desperate must you be, that the memory of my follies is the raft you now cling to?

"I was never disappointed by any of those I led into Liesse," Akua said, uneasy at the lie.

At feeling the need to tell it.

"It's been hard times since," Kamau admitted. "What with your lord cousin taking over in Wolof, some of us were sent away. We tried to head south, but it... didn't go well."

"The Green Stretch turned you back?" she asked.

"No, not them," the man said. "Callowans on the other side of the Wasaliti. Just farmers, at first, but then the Legions – the Army of Callow, I guess they call themselves out west – got bloody too."

He grimaced.

"We lost my wife fleeing back to the Blessed Isle," he admitted. "It's only this one and my son now. I have no words for how grateful I am you're helping her."

His eyes turned harsh.

"Would that you'd killed them all at the Doom, Lady Warlock," he said. "We'd be better off for it. Next time, yeah?"

Her throat tightened, the magic flowing from her palm into the girls' belly almost wavered. I used you, she almost told the man. I used you all, until you were spent and dead and when you were I never looked back. Can you not see that? Can you not see that soldiers swung the swords but I own every death?

"It was a bitter day for all who knew it," Akua croaked, lips gone dry.

"Been a lot of those since you started the wars – I hear the scholars call them the Uncivil Wars," Kamau said, but suddenly paled. "Not that I meant this was your fault at all, Lady Warlock, I-"

Could not possibly speak a sentence more damning than that one, Akua thought. But she painted a smile on her face, moved the lips and soothed his fear.

"Need not explain anything," Akua said, then withdrew her hand from the girl. "It is done, dear. Be careful to drink only water until tomorrow, and don't eat anything even if you get hungry. Your stomach is very sensitive, you'll spew it right back up and it would hurt you."

The little girl gravely nodded, and her father led her out after another round of apologies that she dismissed. Akua felt faint, as she next man was ushered in. How many of the people she had healed today were in the capital because of an action she had taken? Her folly had been used as the pretext for the Grand Alliance to go to war, for Ashur to ravage the coasts of the Empire, but there were faults closer to home. It was her banner raised that had begun the civil wars that were still raging across Praes, her schemes that had... Akua laid a hand against the wall, dizzy. She felt Kendi's eyes on her, considering.

Forcing herself not to move with unseemly haste, she put the Amaranth back on and let the ancient grief of the crystallized tear wipe away the knots in her stomach. She returned to the work, learning from men as she did that the High Lady of Kahtan had sent mages do imitate her and now dozens and dozens of highborn were doing the same. When finally she tired, her magic grown sluggish, she told the people as much. Some refugees wept as she went, but more cheered and even more bowed. It sickened her. She turned to the Taghreb woman who had first thought of using the mansion, had risen through the crisis as a leader of sorts.

"I am using you, you know," Akua said. "To raise my reputation."

It was true, she thought. It must be true. It was one thing to spare a man, a forgivable whim, but this... she had purpose, reason. She had taken an opportunity offered. The other woman shrugged.

"Maybe," she said. "But what does that matter, to the people you healed?"

Akua flinched away from her, from it all, but she was not to be allowed to retreat in peace.

"That was reckless," Kendi said. "She could have turned on you, told the crowd. You just came close to dying."

"I am always but a moment away from dying," Akua replied, forcing nonchalance.

The dark-skinned man rolled his eyes.

"Yes, mile thaman Sahelian, lovely," Kendi said, "but I don't mean philosophy-"

"Neither do I," Akua curtly interrupted. "Do you think my return to flesh came without a price? Somewhere in me lies a way for the Empress to kill me with a word. I do not speak in metaphor, Kendi, when I say I am only ever a moment away from death."

That silenced him, though she was not sure whether the quiet was thoughtful or surprised. No doubt he would soon begin to consider how the Empress might be incited to put her life to an end. Tired of it all, Akua moved towards the centre of the city. The Black Knight, at least, could be relied on for cold company. Marshal Nim was not the Legion headquarters of the capital but instead at her own manse, which Akua promptly headed to. That the servants allowed her and Kendi to enter was a surprise, but not so much of one as the fact that Nim was very obviously drunk. As mfuasa were trained to Kendi went to a corner just out of sight, where he could easily be forgotten, but his gaze missed nothing.

"Marshal," Akua greeted the ogre. "It appears you have me at something of a disadvantage, drink-wise. Will you not offer me your hospitality?"

Only the Black Knight did not stare her down coldly, call her a snake or sent her away. Instead, to Akua's dismay, the ogre twitched and then wordlessly gesture for her to sit. Most chairs here were built with ogres in mind, and the bottles on the table were closer to a barrel than what the sorceress would have meant by the term, but Akua found a carafe of terrible Aksum gold and a glass that was not larger than her head. She took a sip, then grimaced.

"This vintage is a war crime," Akua noted, "and I should know."

Marshal Nim stirred, as did the golden-eyed mage's hopes, but they were just as swiftly dashed.

"You were right," the Black Knight said.

"As is only natural," she replied, hiding her alarm.

"Malicia doesn't trust the Legions as far as she can throw them," the Black Knight said. "I am to share command of the defences with the High Lady of Kahtan."

Who commanded the largest of the highborn armies come to reinforce Ater as well as the largest coalition of nobles not under Malicia's thumb. In olden days that would have made High Lady Takisha the Chancellor, but nowadays it mostly meant that the Empress was scheming to kill and discredit her.

"I can't even blame her, after Kala," the Black Knight cursed. "They deserted, Sahelian. Deserted!"

A bottle of wine hit the wall, shattering with enough glass spraying everywhere that it would need wheelbarrow to clean up. Akua eyed the other woman clinically. Nim was drunk, obviously, but more than that she was despairing. Not only had she been decisively beaten by Marshal Juniper on the field – which must have stung, considering the Hellhound had not been all that highly thought of among the upper ranks of the Legions – but in the wake of that defeat almost a third of her army had deserted rather than fight. Now she had only her last loyalists and the skeleton legions that'd been left in the capital, a force weaker than the one Marshal Juniper had already beaten.

The Legions of Terror she had been fighting to preserve were effectively dead. The soldiers that'd walked off the field at Kala would not be returning to anyone's banner any time soon and the Tower would not forget or forgive that desertion – no matter how earned it had been. Even the legionaries who had stayed would be asking themselves why they were still fighting for the madwoman in the Tower that'd turned two thirds of the continent against them. Her Role was broken at Kala, Akua decided. She failed in the central conceit of it, which was 'the general of the Empire's armies'. She must either find a different Role or lose her Name.

And Akua, who had tried to save her life and helped at every turn, was here in her moment of weakness. I could promise you the Legions you want and mean it, Akua thought, and for that you'd follow me. It was the right place, the right time, with the right history behind it. The Gods Below were offering a Black Knight of her own on a silver platter. All it would take was making promises that Akua genuinely believed would be in the interest of the Empire: the Legions had become one of the pillars of Praes since the Reforms, they were well-worth preserving and kept separate from politics exactly the way Marshal Nim wanted them to be.

All it would take was for Akua to speak sweet nothings with a silver tongue.

"You are a fool."

Oh dear, that'd been her speaking hadn't it? No matter, she could still salvage this.

"Are you truly so weak-willed, Black Knight?"

Not only was this distinctly not a sweet nothing, Akua thought, but it was arguably the opposite. An insulting something? She drank a bit more war crime to wash down the taste of whatever madness had seized her. Nim was shaken out of her daze by the insults, at least, which was a form of progress. Towards nothing pleasant, but progress anyhow.

"Even if I smash your head in for that, I'll still be dead before the month is out," the Black Knight said. "I know what a pattern of three is, Sahelian. I have won once and since suffered a draw. That boy will have my head soon enough."

"Then find a way to lose on your terms," Akua harshly replied. "Are you a Marshal of Praes or a maudlin child? Defeat need not mean death. Even Fate can be gamed. As for your precious Legions, what did you expect?"

"That they would stand behind their Black Knight," Nim roared.

"They did," Akua calmly replied. "You are not him."

That cut deep, she saw, but she was not done.

"Did you think this would be easy, Nim?" she mocked. "That you would earn a Name to pluck ripe peaches from the tree? You are villain."

She threw her own glass against the wall. It shattered most satisfyingly.

"You are the Black Knight of Praes," Akua hissed. "Have some fucking pride. You lost and your ideal is in tatters, what of it? Do you think a hundred of your Name have not stood where you do, all ashes in their hands and blood in their mouth?"

"It can't be salvaged," the Black Knight replied, eyes wild. "We all saw-"

"Then raise it again from the ground up," Akua cut in harshly. "Or are you so enamoured with being the lesser of your predecessor that you can not do the same he did? This was never going to be handed to you, and it offends me that for even a breath you thought it might be. You are Named to struggle, to rise above what you were. If you cannot tolerate the way of the world, then change it."

Marshal Nim rocked back.

"I – you," she stumbled. "What is this, Sahelian?"

"A disappointment," Akua scathingly said. "I thought better of you, Marshal. A petty idealist you might have been, but you did not lack for spine. The Hellhound did not take it from you on the field, so where was it mislaid?"

Nim looked as lost as she was drunk.

"I thought you would," she said, hesitated.

Make an offer, she did not say.

"What are you, that I should?" Akua said, rising to her feet. "Naught but a broken thing which knows not what it wants or what it seeks. You have no design, no fire, not even a plan. You call yourself Named but you are a dandelion, a victim of wind and whims."

She was panting, by the end of that. And wondering if it was the Black Knight she was castigating.

"Stand on your own feet, Black Knight," Akua Sahelian said. "What use could anyone have for you before you do?"

And so she rose to hers, dizzy. And looking at Nim's face she felt like cursing, like weeping, like screaming at the top of her lungs. Because when she had walked into this room the Black Knight had been a woman who might have made a deal with her, but now she looked at Akua like someone who wanted to follow her. Like ragged Kauma in the ragged mansion, handed scraps of a fate and yet so odiously grateful. Did she need to set fire to the city, before someone at last screamed enough? Akua fled.

"She will know what you are in time," Kendi said. "And hate what she sees then."

"She should already hate me," Akua bit out.

By the time they got back to her manse it was dark, and so the highborn came out to play. The ones that had approached her during the day were fools and amateurs, but those who fully intended to see the Empress usurped now came crawling out of the gutters. The invitation she received was not signed, but that was the way of such conspiracies. She put on a cloak and returned to the streets, Kendi following dutifully, to see what the conspirators had to offer. One could not topple the Tower without the support of powerful backers. The heavily warded manse she was led to by a guide was dark, and she was brought to a room where twelve sat masked at a great table.

Amused, she stared down the woman at the head of the table.

"You are sitting in my seat," Akua said.

There was a ripple. Laughter, offence, some just surprised by her gall. Kendi disappeared into a dark corner, already forgotten by almost everyone in the room.

"That remains to be seen," an indistinct voice replied through the mask.

"Does it now?" Akua mused.

It had been hours since she used magic. She was still exhausted, but her disdain for this farce lent her strength. Power billowed out tearing through the anchored illusion forcing shadows and then, obeying her will, cutting cleanly. One after another, twelve masks dropped. Some were hastily caught, but not enough.

"High Lady Takisha," Akua noted, locking eyes with the woman at the head of the table. "How bold."

"I'll have to kill you for this," the High Lady of Kahtan coldly said.

She laughed, scornfully, in the woman's face.

"Ah yes, so that instead these fine conspirators might instead support your bid for the Tower," Akua said, running a finger across the table. "No doubt you gathered this little event because you were able to climb it on your own. You are known as a woman highly lacking in ambition."

A moment of silence.

"She has you there, Muraqib" a masked man carelessly said.

"Without my support and that of my vassals, you have no chance of success," High Lady Takisha evenly said. "This will have a price. First comes the restoration of the Name of –"

"No," Akua said.

Startled surprise. This was not, the sorceress knew, how this conversation was meant to go.

"Pardon?" High Lady Takisha said.

Akua was so very tired of this, she realized. Of the cloak and dagger plots, of the pit of hatred and betrayal that was the Tower. Of this empire of endless teeth, guzzling down its own people not to achieve anything but for the mere purpose of continuing to exist. And they were part of it, too, these masked fools before her. Teeth in the maw.

"You do not make demands of me," Akua said, and it felt good.

"You are mistaken if–"

"Who are you, Takisha Muraqib, that I should take heed of you?" Akua asked, honestly meaning the question. "All I see is the last rat standing. What have you won, what have you done, that your displeasure should give me pause?"

"Hard talk, coming from the Black Queen's concubine," a man bit out.

"I would have more power as Catherine Foundling's bedwarmer than you ever have or ever will wield," the golden-eyed aristocrat laughed in his face. "That's why you're here, all of you, in this room instead of halfway across the city plotting to back someone else."

She swept the room with her gaze.

"So let us dispose of the pretence that you are owed for this conversation, that this is a favour done onto me," Akua said. "You are vultures circling a wounded lion but too afraid to take the plunge. I need you?"

She moved her lips into a smile.

"You need me," Akua corrected, "and you, High Lady Takisha, are still sitting in my seat."

Silence stretched out, and something like relief welled up. At last, she thought, the end. They would balk and turn on her, Malicia would end it and- and Takisha Muraqib, hatred in her eyes, rose to her feet. No, Akua thought. No. How can you not seen that I have nothing to threaten you with, no one behind me? You are a High Lady of Praes, the sharpest of irons, so why are snatching defeat from the jaws of victory? Why, you misbegotten Hellgods, do I keep winning? Appalled, Akua Sahelian took her seat at the head of a table where twelve of the most powerful lords and ladies of Praes sat.

"They measure your back for knives already," Kendi told her as they left. "You will not be forgiven for this."

"Then why," Akua sadly asked, "did they let me do it to them?"

She returned to the manse, sagged into a seat, and closed her eyes. Exhausted beyond words. Behind her she heard Kendi moved, but somehow she was still startled when pain bloomed on the side of her head.

—

Akua woke up. The Gods were laughing and Akua Sahelian woke up. Her back hurt, and fingers found a bloody scar on it, but she was breathing and when she rose in her bed she found Kendi Akaze seated across from her, eyes smiling. On a low table before him there were two objects. One was the Amaranth, smashed to pieces. The other looked like a strip of bone, carved with so many rows of small runes that it was hardly recognizable.

"Lodged in your spine," Kendi amiably said. "It was difficult to remove it without paralyzing you, but I managed."

"Why?" she croaked out.

"Because you are in pain," he said. "And I want you to drown in it without your necklace to save you."

"This is madness," Akua hissed.

"Is it?" Kendi said. "I followed you today. You have won the people, the Legions, the nobles. The Empire is in the palm of your hand, the Tower yours for the taking."

He leaned forward.

"And what do you think of that, Akua Sahelian?" he asked.

He was not lying, she realized with anguish. She'd known it too but shied away from looking the truth in the eye. After a lifetime of scheming and murdering, after struggling and betraying and burning every bridge there was to burn, the Empire was in the palm of her hand. She let it sink in, settle into her mind, until an answer came from the heart of her.

Akua threw up all over the marble floor.

"That's what I thought," Kendi said with cold, hard satisfaction.

—

Catherine Foundling was coming to kill her.

The knowledge of that circled Malicia's thoughts like a vulture, never close but never far. Amadeus' little orphan, turned into a brutal warlord, was marching on Ater to kill Alaya of Satus. Malicia tried to set the thought aside, but all the news brought to her only made it stand out more starkly. Her impostor in Mercantis had been unmasked, the devil slain and now the Forty-Stole Court was maddened with rage. They had cut all ties with the Tower, placed the Empire under embargo and offered a fresh round of loans to the Grand Alliance at courteous terms. And, worst of all, they had sought the protection of Empress Basilia of Aenia.

A title the entire League of Free Cities had recognized after the fall of Penthes, along with the worrisome one of 'Protector of the League'. Not only had the entire League of Free Cities followed Mercantis in severing ties, but now all its ports were closed to Praesi ships and the city-states were mobilizing for war. To join the war against the Dead King, Ime believed, but she could not be sure. All Malicia could know was that there was only one large military force on Calernia uncommitted to warfare, and that it was her hard-bitten foe. That hatred would linger for decades, lead the south to oppose her for the rest of her reign. If she had one.

Catherine Foundling was coming to kill her.

Ashur was still sundered in two, but it was no longer starving because Malicia no longer controlled the fleet meant to blockade it. The necromancers that'd usurped the fleet of Nicae through use of Still Waters no longer took her orders. They had taken to raiding the coasts of Ashur and the League for plunder and corpses. For now they traded with Stygian slaver ports for supplies, but that would be clamped down on by 'Empress' Basilia. They'd have to find other ports of call eventually, and Malicia feared that the Tideless Isles – scoured clean of corsairs by Ashur – would appeal. Her own masterstroke turned pirate might begin raiding the coasts of Praes.

Out west the Dominion had been stabilized by the First Prince's clever diplomacy after the Isbili were wiped out in some sort of blood magic ritual, but the Black Queen had won the higher prize by making the leading couple of Levant her pupils. Procer itself was finally collapsing even in the face of Hasenbach's inhuman efforts to keep it together – the first secession had happened six months later than Malicia's prediction, which was a staggering delay. The First Prince had kept together her empire with little more than letters and diplomacy as it tumbled into utter ruin. Malicia was genuinely admired the feat, but Hasenbach had not lasted long enough. The collapse was happening too early, there was nobody left in the Grand Alliance in a position to contest Callow's influence.

And Catherine Foundling was coming to kill her.

And all the ruinous reverses abroad were nothing to what trouble had now fallen on Praes. Wolof had been knocked out of the war, the alliance of Aksum and Nok subverted by a foreign power and now Okoro was cowering in its fortresses. The Clans had elected a leader, but Malicia was uncertain whether or not it had been Chieftain Troke Snaketooth. All the informants of the Eyes had gone silent overnight, and while the orc she'd made bargains with had been in the lead last she heard, there was no telling who had triumphed. Worse, the horde of greenskins was not only going nowhere Nok but it was very clearly marching on Ater, burning and pillaging everything in its path. Malicia was now facing the distinct possibility that even if the Grand Alliance retreated the Clans might still sack a weakened Ater.

Ater itself was slipping her fingers. She could feel in the way that Rule was weaking, the way fewer people truly saw her as the Dread Empress of Praes. Sentiment in the streets was turning against her, the Legions were a mutinous wreck riddled with desertions and the nobles come to attend the imperial court had plots the way stray dogs had fleas. She'd remained ahead of them, so far, but she was a dancer with a shrinking stage to dance on. Gods, even district mages were getting murdered out in the ruined districts. With a goblin steel blade, so it was likely some Legion deserter stirring up trouble. The only force Malicia could still truly trust in was the Sentinels, and the thought had rage frozen in her throat.

These were the same soldiers that had nailed her father to the floor of his own inn, and Catherine Foundling was coming to kill her.

The brutal little bitch could not be bargained or reasoned with, she was out for blood and no matter what Malicia threw at her she seemed to come out on top. The battle in the Wasteland that should have broken her army had instead seen it reinforced, Marshal Juniper crowned the finest general to come out of the War College and Sepulchral bending the knee. It was even more ridiculous than Wolof, where even captured she'd somehow still claimed victory. Next she would be struck by lightning and somehow gain the power to call on storms, the absurd chit. There was no going around her, either. The First Prince no longer even bothered to read her letters and with Mercantis turning on her she no longer had an intermediary.

Only strength would make the Queen of Callow listen, and while the host gathered in Ater's shadow outnumbered the Army of Callow it was not Malicia's. It belonged to a hundred different nobles, too many of them traitors. And even if it gave battle, the empress was not certain it would win. The Army of Callow had humbled even the Legions, which had triumphed against the armies of the old Praes handily. Malicia still had the Tower's arsenal, and for the first time in her reign she was deploying the artefacts and horrors that a thousand tyrants had sealed in deep vaults, but she had... concerns. Even should these powers bring her victory, it might be the kind worse than a defeat. Yet what else was she to do?

Alaya did not want to die, and Catherine Foundling was coming to kill her.

It was a relief when Ime came to meet with her, a distraction from her thoughts and their downwards spiral. Connect told her that her spymistress' loyalty had weakened but not in a harmful way. The nuance was hard to read, but Malicia had learned. Ime must have thought of running, then. She had not, Malicia reminded herself. For now, that was what mattered.

"Akua Sahelian spent most of yesterday healing refugees," Ime said, moments after being seated. "She then met with Marshal Nim in her private manse. Late that evening, she disappeared into a warded location – my agents were slain trying to find out with who. There were no survivors."

"I will summon her to the Tower, then," Malicia said, cocking an eyebrow. "As was the intent from the start. With the alternative being death, she will give us the names and facilitate a purge of the most disloyal."

"I thought you might say that," Ime evenly said. "But she's too dangerous to be allowed to live, Malicia. She has too much support while yours wanes."

Malicia stilled.

"What did you do?" she harshly asked.

"I used the kill switch," Ime said.

The empress mastered her anger. Only she had been supposed to be able to give that order. Yet another way her authority was weakening.

"Now we have no match for the Hierophant," she said. "Which might well lose us the siege."

"It's much worse than that," Ime said. "I used the artefact, but she's still alive. It was removed, Your Majesty. We no longer have a leash on her."

Malicia's fingers clenched. The Warlock – or close enough – was now free to act against her without deterrent. And she could not simply order her killed, because even should such an attempt work and fail to trigger an uprising against her killing Akua Sahelian might well get her killed by virtue of there being no one able to stop Wekesa's son from mauling the defences of the capital. Her mind spun, looking for angles, but there were none. No answer, no clever trick.

From her silence, Ime must have come to the same conclusion.

"I advised against recruiting her," Ime quietly said. "She's always been a risk-"

"I know what you advised, Ime," Malicia barked out. "I assure you, there is no need to remind me. I deemed it necessary at the time."

She'd meant to kill the Sahelian or surrender her back to the Grand Alliance's custody the moment an arrangement was reached, either way ending her as a threat. Where had she found a mage trustworthy and skilled enough to find the artefact in her spine, much less remove it?

"We need to prepare to pull out of Ater," Ime advised. "Set our enemies on each other and approach again from a better position. It might be time to seriously consider wedding either Sargon Sahelian or Jaheem Niri. It keeps them committed and us in the game."

Jaheem Niri was already married, not that he wouldn't murder his wife in a heartbeat to become the imperial consort. The prospect of marrying either was repulsive enough that Alaya felt physically nauseous. She closed her eyes, looking for any other way. Ime stayed silent for a long time, then rose to her feet.

"I will prepare what I can, Alaya," the spymistress said. "Think on it, that is all I ask."

The empress stayed alone in the council room for a long time, with only silence and that ever-present thought for company. Eventually she rose to her feet, the sky outside turned to night. Sleep, she thought, sleep would put it all in perspective. But her quarters were not empty. On the table by the enchanted window, a woman was leaning back her seat, boots against the rim of table two hundred years old as she looked down at the city. Fair-haired and tanned, she had in her hand a crystal glass from Malicia's personal cabinet that she was refilling with wine from a silver flask. In her lap lay a lute, old and worn but still beautiful.

"I am told you are particularly vulnerable to Speaking," Alaya said. "I wonder, would I even need to vocalize to make you kill yourself?"

The Wandering Bard turned to offer her an insolent blue-eyed grin and a sloshing toast that spilled wine on her leathers.

"Those who live by the sword tend to get killed with swords," the Bard shrugged. "You know how it is, I'm sure."

"You are on the Red List," Malicia said. "Kill on sight."

"And yet here I am," the Bard noted, "still breathing."

A moment of silence.

"So you are," Malicia conceded.

The other woman laughed throatily, by the sound of it already well on her way to drunk. The empress knew better than to believe it made her any less dangerous.

"Have a drink with me, Dread Empress," the Bard said. "I had... well, I wouldn't call it luck all things considered, but it was a fateful draw."

Best to humour her for now. Malicia stepped aside to take a cup from her personal cabinet, which as she'd suspected was wide open already, and took a glass match for the Bard's own. She set it down on the table, eyebrow cocked, and took a seat of her own. Casually, as if this were not the knife's edge. The Bard set down the lute on her lap to lean forward, pouring Malicia's glass uncouthly full from her flask. The empress politely took her cup, breathing in the scent, and froze. She took a tentative sip. It was truly horrid wine, somehow tasting of mud, but Alaya knew it well. She'd been drinking it for years with someone now lost to her. Her heart clenched.

"Fate's a bitch," the Wandering Bard confessed. "I should know, I've served as the closest thing Calernia has to one since before... well, written calendars really. Only the Riddle-Maker's older and his kind didn't really bother with that sort of thing."

Ice, let her be ice. Smooth and cold and polished enough this old monster would see only her own reflection.

"You will not distract me with interesting fragments of history," Malicia said. "You came here with a purpose."

"It's the only way I can go anywhere," the Bard snorted, then drank deep of her cup. "Gah, definitely not a lucky draw. But as I was saying, my good – well, you know what I mean – empress, I feel like the time where we were enemies has passed. At least temporarily, yes?”

“You killed Sabah,” Alaya evenly said.

“You liked her,” the Bard noted. “So did I. Most people did, I imagine, when she wasn’t eating or killing them. But she needed to die so I could get my way. So she did.”

Ice, ice. She would not think of kind smiles or the children left behind, for where would that lead her? Only ice would see her live out the year. Malicia moved her lips into a smile, did not let it reach her eyes.

“And how many of my troubles can be laid at your feet, I wonder?” Malicia asked.

“The funny thing is,” the Bard said, “honestly not that much.”

She waved a hand dismissively, trailing wine all over the table.

“I work through Named,” the Bard said, revealing nothing the Eyes had not already told her, “and Named haven’t been your problem. Your empire has been going to shit because you Role doesn’t match your Name.”

“Is that so?” Malicia politely smiled.

“You’ve been ruling like a Chancellor,” the Bard said. “But the Chancellor’s not meant to be on top of things in these parts. A Dread Empress is meant to add, inspire, create. You’ve been dividing, lessening, binding. Chancellor’s work, and that’s why it’s all been going downhill: you no longer have other Named on your side to compensate for that.”

“I told you history would not distract me,” Malicia said. “Did you think namelore would?”

“I just like to talk,” the Bard artlessly confessed. “But let’s be all business, if you want. You have a problem: Catherine Foundling very badly wants you dead and there’s no one left in a position to stop her.”

“Ater still stands,” Malicia said.

“Said every Dread Empress who ever got murdered,” the Bard replied, rolling her eyes. “It’s not a siege that’s going to decide this. You’ve got an empire’s worth of stories come home to roost in Ater, Allie, and that’s what kills or saves you.”

“And here I had thought it would be a blade,” Malicia smiled.

The Bard snorted.

"Sure, if you want to be obtuse about it," she said. "The blade's just the natural consequence of the story turning against you. It doesn't drive the carriage, it's a destination. And you're in luck, my friend, because it happens that destination your-head-on-a-pike just isn't doing anything for me. It's a bit of pain in my ass, to be honest."

"What a fortunate happenstance," Malicia said. "I, too, would prefer to avoid my decapitation. You have thoughts on how this might be achieved?"

"I'm all about thoughts," the Bard agreed. "Just so many thoughts. So lemme share one with you: do you know when a Named is most vulnerable?"

"At the end of a pattern of three, presumably," Malicia said.

While those did not necessarily end in death for the villain involved, that did seem to be the prevalent trend.

"Nah," the Bard slurred, "it's just before they come into their Name. See, that's the spot where they're riding fate but they're not really protected yet."

The empress considered the other woman a moment, drinking shallowly from her cup.

"I am told," Malicia said, "that Catherine Foundling is coming into a Name."

"Defence isn't how you win this game," the Bard said. "So we're going on the offensive, you and I."

Malicia's eyes narrowed.

"How?"

"It's not set yet, what she's turning into," the Bard said. "So we nudge it so it becomes what we need. The east that is land and armies and politics, all the things that pass, instead of the East – the story, the idea. Old Evil and buried grudges, the other half of the world. She's only as dangerous as what she keeps, you see."

She was starting to.

"And when she transitions?"

"There's this joke I love," the blue-eyed Bard enthusiastically said. "It's from Ashur so, you know, it's not actually funny, but it's great anyways and it goes like this – and stop me if you've heard it before!"

She cleared her throat, which somehow had her spilling a third of her cup over her own lute and then cursing before wiping it off effectively with her sleeve.

"Right so there's this man who goes to a priest, a Speaker," the Bard said. "And he says that his daughter's taken up with some Praesi, proper smitten. So he's come for advice because he needs a time, a place and man to officiate."

The Bard began chortling, already taken with her own joke.

"So the Speaker gives them, only the man comes back the day after all riled up," she said. "Says it was a disaster. Why, the priest asks. Did the wedding not go well? And then the man erupts: wedding? I was asking about-"

"-a funeral," Malicia finished.

It was easy enough to infer from context. The Bard pouted.

"I don't know why people keep doing that to me," she whined. "No wonder you're a villain."

Malicia ignored her... ally's petty moaning, herself taking petty satisfaction in having caused it.

"A time, a place and a man to officiate," Dread Empress Malicia mused. "That is all?"

"That's the good thing about Catherine, Allie," the Intercessor grinned, all teeth and malice. "You can always count on her to bring the knife."

Curtopolis

Am I the only one that thinks the line about the bard being the closest thing on calernia to fate is a hint about cats name? It has been heavily implied she is becoming the bards successor/opposite.

NewXToa

The Bard already tried to shape Cat's name so it would form in relation to the Bard, and Cat specifically stopped that from happening, so that's not what Cat's name will be. I get the impression that she's going to be the Warden of the East – her counterpart is obviously Cordelia, who is the Warden of the West (in role, if not name). A few chapters ago Cat went on a rant to the praesi in Sepulchre's camp about how they needed a warden to keep them in check. In addition, in this chapter the Bard is talking about shaping which kind of the East Cat gets dominion over. It all seems to be pointing to Warden of the East.

Jack

I think the "Warden of the East" type role as you've described it, that of Cordelia's counterpart, is what the Bard wants. That just leads to her being a powerful leader, good at diplomacy (in her own way) and warfare. Impactful but transitory.

But the Bard is scared that Cat will become something more. I don't really know what that looks like but I'd guess it's sort of like a longer lasting, more sustainable Triumphant. THE villain that can maneuver outside of fate and upend the big Gods' plans.

tynam

Warden of the East could be a longer lasting, more sustainable Triumphant. The Bard doesn't want Cat to take that Role; she already tried to trap Cat into a different one. But that failed, so like any good planner Bard is rolling with the punch and trying to make the role that Cat is taking into one Bard can cope with.

Frivolous

I found it interesting that all the informants the Eyes of the Empire had among the Clans went silent overnight, presumably after Hakram was acclaimed the Warlord.

I'm assuming all the informants were orcs. I wonder what was the reason for their falling silent.

This is the first time we've seen a real orc Warlord in play, so maybe orcs are just that obedient to their Warlord, regardless of personal and/or previous allegiances?

If that is the answer, then it means Hakram is unlikely to be assassinated anytime soon by Troke or some other ambitious orc.

Maybe Hakram already knew, through Scribe or his own use of Find, before he lost that aspect, who the spies and moles were, and had them silenced?

Or maybe Hakram can Speak. Again, this is the first time we've ever seen a Warlord, and it wouldn't be out of the question that a Warlord can Speak.

Frivolous

Addendum: From Interlude: Zwischenzug:

<<>>

Hakram was halfway to Speaking when he was just Adjutant. I think it would make a lot of sense if he could Speak now that he's Warlord.

Frivolous

Addendum to Addendum:

Argh, didn't quote correctly.

"Enough," Adjutant said.

The voice rang with power. Not quite Speaking, Vivienne thought, yet not too far from it.

Ciel Morgenstern

He told Troke Snaketooth he had a use for him, remember? Troke was THE primary contact of Malicia, presumably leading the Eyes' contacts in the Clans.

308924810a

So, thinking about this situation some more, I'm pretty sure that Amadeus' plan doesn't involve him becoming Dread Emperor, but instead he intends to make sure that Cat is the only viable option for Dread Emperor. Possibly by killing or ensuring the death of every other viable Claimant, including himself.

jamesc9

So, if she refuses, what does the lack of someone filling the Role do to the Name?

Under normal circumstances, it would attract an alternative claimant. How long does he have to stay around, killing claimants?

Ciel Morgenstern

My theory is he plans to bring down the Tower and all Lords/Ladies around it, too, in a big big bunch of nice green fire, maybe burning down the whole of Ater. Welcome to a new FORM of government altogether. He vowed to "kill the song" or some such, if it continued to bother him...

Meela

The Akua part of this chapter was hilarious. The Gods Below are throwing her softball after softball trying to get her to stick to the path of Stupid Evil and it's just deepening her existential crisis. I never really bought into her cynical redemption but watching her crack up is immensely entertaining.

skairunner

I absolutely love that she even found her own treacherous lieutenant

jamesc9

I wonder if I see Akua-uncontrolled approaching Malacia to negotiate terms of co-existence.

Imissedtheinterlude

Is "Kamau" a Kikuyu inspired character?

Zopilote 506

"I CANT KEEP GETTING AWAY WITH THIS"
Akua Sahelian probably

SpaceDorf

Yeah. Akua got pretty Catty in this chapter

kinghaart

Excellent chapter!

Yes, now Warden seems like more of a trap by Bard. I have a theory on the ideal name for Cat but not quite ready to share it yet...

Chapter 22: Advent

"Every crisis is an opportunity, Chancellor. Mostly an opportunity to die, but occasionally other things as well."

– Dread Empress Malevolent II

"I always forget how ridiculously huge Ater is," I said.

In the distance the tall ramparts of the City of Gates loomed, crowned with bastions atop the inner walls and the gargantuan silhouette of the Tower rising to touch the clouds. It was an impressive sight, the kind that gave you pause even if you knew – as I did – that it was rare for the Dread Empire to actually have enough military strength in the city to man the entire set of walls properly. The capital was so large that if it were not so terribly fortified it might actually be indefensible, though another school of thought back in the College had argued that the size was actually part of the defences. Tyrants in the Tower had never been shy about drawing their opponents into abandoned districts before setting them aflame.

“Surely Salia is even larger,” Arthur ventured. “It was raised in fertile lands near a river, not at the heart of the Wasteland.”

“In size Ater is larger,” I noted. “Entire sections of it are usually abandoned, though, and Salia definitely has more people in it.”

The Squire eyed the capital of the Dread Empire with a skeptical look on his face, which had me smothering a smile. Back when I’d first come to Ater I’d been too wrapped up into myself and what Amadeus was teaching me to really take it in properly, but arriving as part of an invading army was giving my fellow orphan a bit more perspective.

“I don’t see how they can feed that many people,” Arthur admitted. “Or even have enough drinking water. Is it an underground source like Hainaut?”

“Five different underground lakes,” I confirmed. “The Miezans built a bunch of enchanted funnels when they first took over the city that feed a system of fountains anyone can take from, but there’s been works since. Dread Emperor Vile made aqueducts and cisterns when the population got too large and Dread Emperor Tenebrous-”

“Isn’t that the one who turned into a giant spider?” the Squire asked, sounding amused.

“Allegedly,” I snorted. “No knows for sure, though there sure are a lot of them under the city nowadays. Anyhow, Tenebrous made an enormous reservoir to catch rain and freeze it, a reserve for when the city is in drought.”

It was a pleasant change to be able to tell when Scribe was approaching. Like a touch in the back of my mind, a star I could see shining in the black whenever I closed my eyes. One of many.

“Vile’s cisterns were dismantled under Dread Emperor Venal,” Eudokia said, standing right behind Arthur.

Who nearly jumped out of his skin, swallowing a curse. It was a nostalgic sight: she used to do the same to me back when I was the Squire.

"That's the one who thought Ater was a shithole and tried to build his own capital, right?" I asked.

"Indeed," Scribe agreed. "The cisterns were lined with silver for purity enchantments, he had them broken down to use the metal in coinage."

Well, the man had come by his regnal name honestly.

"They were never replaced?" Arthur asked.

"Much later," Scribe replied. "Maleficent the Second had the silver statues in Delos' great library melted down and used for replacements after the Secretariat tried to refuse her access to their histories."

She'd had a way with insults, Maleficent the Second, when she wanted to make a point. It was said she'd had the third of the Magisterium that'd refused to surrender to her enslaved and forced into the Spears of Stygia as an admonishment.

"So thirst isn't going to make them surrender," Arthur said. "What about food, though?"

I cocked an eyebrow at him.

"Do you want a lecture on how the imperial tax system works?" I drily asked.

"Is it murder?" the boy drily replied. "I'm guessing murder is involved."

"Ater has the largest granaries in the country," I told him. "They're massive, the size of palaces."

"Even with the field ritual gradient and rotations introduced under Nefarious, the fields around the city can only feed a little under half of Ater," Scribe said. "The remainder comes from taxes. High Seats are charged with collecting a tenth of the harvest in their lands and that of their vassals, which is then sent to Ater."

"Independent lords can have harsher or lighter burdens, depending on whether or not the Tower likes them," I added, "and the freeholders of the Green Stretch are bound to sell a third of their harvest to the Tower at a fixed price."

Less than it was worth, usually, but it was part of the terms they leased the land from the Tower at.

"Malicia improved the yields for Ater significantly during her reign," Eudokia admitted, "by changing the laws so that lords could pay part of their monetary taxes to the Tower in food instead. Poorer lords with good years leaped at the opportunity, and with Callowan grain pouring in all the while there is a truly prodigious amount of foodstuffs in the city at the moment."

"We're not going to starve them out," I summed up. "They've got six months in them, at least, and maybe as much as a year if they ration severely enough."

We did not have six months, I kept to myself. Cordelia believed that Procer would finally break in five, but we had to leave Praes before that: it'd take us at least a month and a half to return west and half a month to muster for the attack on Keter. We had three months here, to be generous, but that'd be a razor-thin margin. Two was more realistic, two and maybe the odd week tossed it on top of it. Which meant we would need to either force a surrender or take the city by force, storming the walls. I was very much trying to avoid the latter, because the last of the Legions would bleed us dry for it. The entire city was a fucking deathtrap of old artefacts and half-buried monstrosities. If we didn't get several demons tossed at us before this was over I'd eat my crown. I cast a look at Scribe.

"You needed me for something?"

She nodded.

"There is word from the High Lady of Kahtan," Eudokia said.

Takisha Muraqib was the leader of the largest chunk of enemy troops outside the city, so I'd made a point of trying to approach her for a settlement the moment I could. If she turned on Malicia a lot of nobles would follow her example, which might well take the city for us without an assault. Loyalty in Praes was a lot like horse racing: people loved a winner, but if the champion limped all bets were off.

"We'll talk later," I told Arthur. "Sit down with Apprentice and figure out tactics for fighting the Black Knight indoors or on a street, it's where you're most likely to run into her. If you come up with something solid, we'll try it out on Named."

I already had several particularly vicious exercises in mind. As far as I was concerned, you'd never really had to deal with a proper ambush until you tried grounds that the only son and pupil of Wekesa the Warlock had been given an hour to trap. Last time he'd temporarily ended gravity in a warded circle, which had been spectacularly amusing to watch on top of being very humiliating for the kids.

"I will, Your Majesty," the Squire swore. "We've been talking over ideas on the march."

"I'll look forward to it, then," I said.

The kid – young man, really, but it was hard to think of him that way – left promptly to get to it, which left me weathering Scribe's mild gaze. I raised an eyebrow at her. The one over the dead eye, I was trying to train myself into doing that. It drew attention to the eye cloth, made the faint-hearted uncomfortable.

"Mentorship is not without danger," Scribe said. "Especially mentorship of a hero."

"I don't teach him myself," I said. "Been careful about that. All I've done with him is talk, never so much as a spar."

"Given your own teacher, I would have thought you aware that the talking is the most important part," she replied.

"Named can learn from others without being pupils," I said. "It's not like every time you pick up a trick or a bit of tactics from someone you're wedded to them as mentor and apprentice. I've learned things from Malicia and Captain. Hells, I learned from the Pilgrim once or twice."

Not that he'd ever gone out of his way to teach me anything. Besides, I'd been careful to give neither tricks nor tactics to Arthur Foundling. If I ever ended up on the other side of the field from the kid, I wanted as much of my repertoire still up my sleeve as I could fit.

"It's a fine line," Scribe noted. "I do not seek to scold, to be clear. It is your choice to make, and you have drunk from deeper wells of namelore than I ever did."

"Always thought that was weird, to be honest," I admitted. "The Calamities were around for almost sixty years in one form or another, it seems strange most of you never picked up more. Malicia too, I guess, but her I can understand. It's not like any hero made it to the Tower in her lifetime."

"It was always Amadeus who saw to those tactics," she said, "so in a sense most of us never considered it any more necessary to acquire skill in this area than we would have thought to rival Wekesa or sorcery or Sabah in strength."

"You still survive decades and decades as Named," I said. "You had to have learned some things."

"I suppose in detail my experience outweighs yours," Eudokia mused. "Prior to the Truce and Terms being founded I'd encountered many more Named. But you've no doubt realized by now that there is no truly reliable method to deal with Named opponents."

"Swords tend to work," I drily said, "but I catch your drift. The same story you can ride to kill someone will get you killed against another."

"I imagine I've read more stories and studied foreign myths than you have," Scribe said, "for the same is true of Amadeus, but I do not have the... knack. I can make a plan and execute it, but I find it difficult to improvise and adapt a victory the way you did against the Arcadian courts, for example, or at the Princes' Graveyard. It requires a mindset that I struggle with, as do most Named."

"A lot of us tend to specialize," I agreed.

"It narrows our understanding of the world and the way we seek victories," Scribe said. "In that sense you are anomalous, though not unique."

Yeah, I had no delusions there. My father's way of using stories was different than mine but no less dangerous, and there'd been several points in the Tenth Crusade where Tariq had come very close to either killing or shackling me. Kairos had been up there too, the mad bastard, using the methods of the Old Tyrants with prescient skill. I also figured that Ranger had to be good at reading stories, to have survived this long antagonizing the amount of Named she had. Nobody acting like that lived as long as she had without being able to tell when a story was going to get you killed.

And there was, of course, the patron goddess of namelore waiting above it all: the Wandering Bard, the Intercessor. Who had declared war on me in Wolof only to disappear into thin air. I would have liked to call it impotence on her part, but that was the kind of delusion that'd get me killed. If I hadn't seen her it'd been because she was moving her pieces into place, preparing her killing stroke. And since there was only one part left to this campaign, the fall of Ater, inside the City of Gates would be where she waited for me. I shook my head free of the thoughts.

"So what did High Lady Takisha reply?" I asked.

"She is willing to meet," Scribe said. "Yet I would temper your expectations: Princess Vivienne believes Takisha won't move unless we promise to back her for the Tower."

"Is there anybody in this fucking country who doesn't want me to back them for the fucking Tower?" I growled. "Any moment now some hell will spit out Traitorous so he can bloody well ask me too."

"It is unusual that you would be so sought, in my opinion," Scribe noted. "You have dealt with or rule over every major amalgamation of power east of the Whitecaps, an amount of influence that I some ways surpasses what Malicia wielded after the Conquest."

I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. I'd made a claim, before raising High Lady Abreha from the grave. One of authority over others. Creation was moving to meet it. I was finding it easier to parse out what people wanted – my instincts already whispered that Vivienne was right, High Lady Takisha would not move without the Tower as a prize – but that was the lesser part of it. I could feel Named, now. When I closed my eyes, I could see them like stars shining the dark. Only it wasn't all of them. Most heroes I couldn't make out. Vivienne yes, and the Squire when he was close, but never the Silver Huntress. Authority, I thought. It was about authority.

And the clearest part of it was that Below smiled on me herding their own, a warden to villains.

"Influence doesn't always pay off," I finally said. "Let's go talk with Juniper, Scribe. See what our options are before meeting up with High Lady Takisha."

—

The Marshal of Callow wasn't one to mince words, so she came out with it bluntly.

"Depends if they're stupid about it or not," Juniper said.

Our maps of Ater were accurate, as there hadn't been any major works done in the capital since they'd been drawn, but they were unreliable in the sense that they'd didn't tell us what parts of the city were being inhabited at the moment. Malicia had taken in refugees by the thousands so a lot of the empty districts would have filled up, but which and by who was anybody's guess. Scribe and the Jacks had a few people in the city, but it was a drop in the bucket for a place that large. I doubted even the Tower had a full accounting to use, and for all her faults the empress had built up a prodigious bureaucracy in her seat of power.

"I'm not going to stand here and defend the stock of Praesi aristocracy," I said, "but let's assume they won't make the worst possible choices."

"Then we're in a tricky position," Juniper said. "When it comes down to it, Ater isn't really a city that can be sieged the traditional way. It's the incarnation of a logistical pit: to surround a city this large with any real strength, enough to keep away sorties, you need an army large enough it's impossible to feed in this region."

Which meant massive supply lines stretching over some of the most dangerous lands on Calernia, in constant danger in collapse before enemy soldiers even got involved. If you were a foreign army, anyway. The High Seats are much more manageable wars on their hands, which went some way in explaining why so few external enemies had been successful against Ater compared to internal ones.

"That much we're agreed on," I said. "We're not going to try, and by the looks they're well aware of that."

Our eyes moved the map between us. Ater had nine gates, massive things that had once needed specially bred monsters to be opened or closed until they were replaced by gear mechanisms a century or two back. Of those nine gates, three were currently still open. The Army of Callow was encamped to the west of the capital, near an abandoned town that had large and deep wells, but the three gates on the eastern side of the capital were wide open. Which only made sense, given that a gaggle of nobles from all over Praes had brought around thirty thousand men from various private armies and encamped there. They'd not entered the city, as it was against the laws of the Empire to bring troops inside the capital without permission and no one was yet ready to move against Malicia, but our scouts confirmed there was constant movement through the gates.

"High Lady Abreha is but a week behind us," Scribe noted. "Her army tips the balance of power in our favour."

"Eh," I hedged.

"We can likely beat the noble armies on the field," Juniper agreed. "They have no unified command structure or proper organization."

"And they've got a lot of household troops, but they've also got a large proportion Taghreb tribal levies," I said. "Good raiders and irregulars, not so great in a shield wall. In a stand-up fight on plains, we'll smash that army to pieces."

"It will not give us that fight, I take it," Eudokia ventured.

"They'll retreat into the capital," I said. "Use us as leverage for getting their troops inside without officially rebelling against Malicia. Given that her trustworthy forces are running thin, she'll likely have to bend."

"The remaining Legions are around eight thousand strong," Scribe noted, "but even my people never got a good read on the total number of Sentinels. Too many of them never leave the Tower."

"You gave us a floor of eight thousand so I'm assuming at least ten," I noted. "I'm skeptical how good they'll be in a fight, considering their heads are supposed to be fucked to the Hells and back to make them perfectly loyal, but it shouldn't matter anyway considering most of them will be tied up keeping the city from falling apart. I'd be surprised if Malicia can shake loose more than two or three thousand to throw at us."

"Pickler believes she can breach the capital's walls, and if she does I believe we can take Ater after High Lady Abreha reinforces us," Juniper said. "But that holds only if the nobles stay out of it. Otherwise they'll bog us down in the outer districts and we'll be forced out by spellfire."

We were at a massive magical disadvantage here, even with Masego weighing heavily on the scales. The sheer amount of mage cadres we'd be facing if the enemy got to mobilize fully against us was pretty daunting. There were at least a few hundred mages capable of High Arcana in Praes, and almost all of them would be shooting at us. And that was without even getting into diabolism, which I saw as pretty much inevitable. It was a historical staple of Praesi getting cornered.

"Keeping the nobility divided and unable to coordinate defences seems a priority, then," Scribe said. "Should I begin arranging assassinations?"

"Not yet," I said, then bit my lip. "Assassin, could he get High Lady Takisha?"

If she got killed, her High Seat would tear itself up over succession and Kahtan would no longer be able to serve as the banner under which all the lesser Taghreb nobility gathered. And the Taghreb were where the manpower was at, right now. The Wasteland had bloodied itself with continued civil war, while the Hungering Sands hadn't really seen any action aside from raids since Foramen was seized by surprise. If we broke up the southerners into smaller squabbling blocs and then hit Ater before someone could step into the power vacuum, it was possible they'd stay out of the fight.

"Takisha is remarkably paranoid when it comes to her personal safety," Scribe admitted. "Three layers of amulets at all times and frequent body doubles. Even odds Assassin would get to her, being conservative."

"We're holding back on that, then," I said. "Look up targets that would destabilize the coalition behind her, but I'm not pulling the trigger on that yet."

If we took a swing and missed it'd make negotiating with her pretty awkward afterwards. Praesi didn't take this sort of thing as personally as most people would, but it certainly wouldn't win me any favours.

"None of that matters when we haven't addressed the dragon in the hut," Juniper said. "There's an army as large as all of ours combined marching on Ater as we speak."

"Three weeks away, at the current pace," Scribe said. "Matters could be resolved here before it arrives."

"I'm not sure that'd be an improvement," I admitted. "Until we know who the warlord leading the Clans is I'm not keen on punching a hole in the walls of Ater."

Juniper snorted.

"Let's not take the fucking city only to have to hold its busted walls against one hundred thousand orcs," she summed up. "The military wisdom of the College shines in us still, Catherine."

I grinned back at her.

"Wisest heads of the age, Hellhound, that's us," I replied.

Scribe let out a little choking sound but did not go as far as contradicting us.

"We've sent scouts their way and I know Hakram's still alive," I said. "I'm inclined not to think the worst."

I could feel his Name, see its star out in the black.

"If Dag Clawtoe had been elected, Hakram would have scried us by now," Juniper retorted. "I don't like it."

"If the Blackspears were in charge they'd be burning Nok by now, not approaching Ater," I pointed out. "I won't pretend I'm not concerned, Juniper, but Adjutant will bring this home. He always does."

"We should prepare for the eventuality that they are foes, at least," the Hellhound pressed.

I grimaced and thought it over. It'd split our focus, but to be honest at the moment there wasn't much for the Army of Callow to do. We were preparing an offensive for when Abreha – and High Lord Dakarai of Nok, who'd joined her with a small retinue – arrived with her troops, but it would be Pickler and her sappers handling the most of that. Charging into a breach wasn't the kind of fighting that required extensive preparations, just guts and steel.

"Do it," I finally said. "But make sure the general staff knows it's theoretical. I don't want half our camp convinced we're going to be fighting the Clans."

Fighting a warlord – maybe even just rumours we would – might actually cause desertions from the part of my armies that'd been the steadiest through several wars. As far as I knew, the loyalty of the Legions had never been tested in this manner and I suspected it was for good reason. A lot of orcs put loyalty to the Legions or the Army of Callow higher than allegiance to abstract things like the Tower or my crown, but I wasn't so sure that loyalty would win out if it was their own clans on the other side of the field.

"I'll keep it quiet," Juniper said.

"Which leaves only one force unaccounted for," I said. "Amadeus of the Green Stretch."

Scribe studied me.

"You're sure he's here?" she asked.

"I know Ranger's in the city," I said. "And they've stayed together until now."

I'd actually learned a little something courtesy of the Lady of the Lake, aside from her rough location: whatever it was that bound me to Named, it was possible to cut it. Temporarily, at least. The... tie began to reform after half a day had passed, more or less, and from what I could feel Ranger was becoming increasingly irritated at having to cut it off again and again. I bet Sever would have done it permanently, I thought with some amusement. I'd have to remember to tell her when we ran into each other, along with a pleasant question about how it felt to be inferior to inferior to the Saint even posthumously.

"He's a dangerous man, Catherine, but he doesn't have an army," Juniper said. "There's only so much he could do."

I winced at that, and so did Eudokia. There was a moment of silence, the two of us waiting for something brutally ironic to happen, but nothing showed up save an increasingly puzzled look on the Marshal of Callow's face.

"Don't repeat that," I finally said. "It might end up costing us."

She still looked skeptical, but in matters of namelore she knew better than to contradict me. I dragged myself to my feet, massaging my upper leg to press down on a cramp. Had I taken herbs today? I couldn't recall. I'd gotten too used to Hakram arranging these things for me. Might as well have another cup if I was going to be riding Zombie.

"A short detour and we'll get moving," I told Scribe. "Let's go find out what High Lady Takisha has to tell us."

—

Scribe despised riding horses even though she'd been doing it for decades, which I never ceased to find hilarious. Zombie disliked having to stay on the ground to keep up with the other Named and my escort of knights, but she perked up after I promised her meat when we returned to camp. She was unsettlingly fond of pig guts, which she ate very messily before grooming herself for hours. A truly vain creature, my mount. I approved. At this point I'd been through these little meetings often enough that I wasn't surprised when the Praesi came in dressed richly enough to pay for a bridge across the Hwaerte and I didn't bother to take it in the way I had with the Sahelians. No, this time it was a smaller detail I got stuck on.

I'd arranged a meeting only with High Lady Takisha, but there were three great aristocrats waiting for me.

The first was Takisha Muraqib, a handsome dark-haired woman in her fifties with a dignified air and enough gold on her it'd likely add up to several ingots if melted down. Arguably now the second most powerful in Praes, as the fall of Foramen to goblin hands had led all the Taghreb nobility to gather behind her. The second was High Lord Jaheem Niri of Okoro, a strikingly good-looking man with warm golden eyes and a roguish smile. He had to be what, in his mid-forties? He had a daughter a little younger than me, but she wasn't his oldest. The real surprise, though, was the third. High Lady Wither of Foramen, once Matron of the High Ridge Tribe. Pickler's mother.

Also the sworn enemy of High Lady Takisha, and according to my spies still very far away.

No wonder the Matrons of the Confederation of the Grey Eyries had sent word they were sending a delegation north to Ater to treat with me. It would be in part so they'd have a seat at the table after Ater fell, as I'd expected, but now a second reason was looking at me through pale yellow eyes. The High Lady of Kahtan might despise Wither and want to take Foramen from her, but that enmity was nothing compared to how much the Grey Eyries hated the traitor who'd turned on them in exchange for becoming recognized as High Lady by Malicia.

Still, this reception was a surprise and not a welcome one. It was taking me by surprise in multiple ways and suggesting there were undercurrents to imperial politics I'd not sniffed out. A dangerous thing, to treat carefully with. It was fortunate that I was such a dab hand at diplomacy these days.

"How long have the three of you stood so close?" I asked, cocking my head to the side. "One hour, two? And no one's dead. That has got to be some sort of record."

I hear the knight behind me choke down on a snort. The Praesi were less amused. Wither was impatient, Takisha sneered and High Lord Jaheem raised his eyebrows in a way that suggested rolling them without ever actually doing it. Impressive trick, that.

"We greet you, Black Queen," High Lady Takisha began, "and in-"

"Spare me the speech," I cut through, tone flat. "I arranged talks with you, not three High Seats. I might be considered justified to see this as a breach of our truce terms, so let's get to whatever point the three of you made yourselves to stand together to make."

"This is poor diplomacy," High Lord Jaheem said. "High Lord Sargon spoke better of you."

"Sargon was a stepping stone, not the last thing between me and the end of this irritating little war," I replied. "He got as much courtesy as I'll ever afford High Seat. You, though?"

I smiled toothily.

"Count yourselves lucky this doesn't begin and end with knives."

"You don't have enough knives to get this done, Black Queen," High Lady Wither said, voice startling reedy. "That is our point. If you come for Ater steel in hand, you will lose."

"That's arguable at best," I noted. "But I'll generously assume you came with something to offer, since only a fool would think I've come to Ater just to walk away."

"We are willing to support a negotiated settlement with the Tower," High Lady Takisha said, tone irritated. "So long as the sovereignty of the Dread Empire remains untouched, there is some room for compromise."

I cocked an eyebrow over my dead eye, unimpressed by the phrasing, and to my satisfaction I saw her glance at the cloth.

"I sacked Wolof without needing to break its walls, broke the Legions in Kala and now my army is camped beneath the very walls of the City of Gates," I said. "If some room for compromise is the best you have to offer, we'll be resuming this conversation after I've killed a few thousand more of you."

"You would refuse terms without hearing them?" High Lord Jaheem said.

"I'd refuse to humour posturing," I flatly replied. "You're here to do me a favour, I broke through your front door and set fire to your house. If you want me to stop torching everything in sight, make it worth my while."

"We would be willing to support armies being sent to aid the Grand Alliance," High Lady Wither said. "It's an open secret you're badly in need of diabolists."

"That's a start," I noted.

"The Blessed Isle can be formally ceded back to the crown of Callow," High Lady Takisha said.

Huh, hadn't seen that one coming. On the surface it was a worthless piece of land, considering it was a blackened wasteland ruined by my father's use of massed goblinfire, but that was a surface perception only. It was a strategic stronghold, the best way to keep Praes penned on its side of the Wasaliti should it decide to get unruly.

"That's worth something," I agreed, "but it's not why I'm here. The Tower would need to sign the Liesse Accords."

They didn't look too pleased by that, but neither were they surprised.

"We might support such a thing, given the right incentives," High Lord Jaheem said. "The text as we've obtained has some... concerning inclusions."

That sounded like someone after diabolism exemptions, which wasn't happening, but I wasn't above throwing some minor concessions elsewhere if that was what it took.

"The final draft of the Accords has not been made," I said. "There is still time to negotiate."

"That is reassuring to hear, Your Majesty," High Lady Takisha smiled.

I just bet, I thought.

"And who would it be that negotiates the terms of the Accords for you?" I asked. "Who do you mean to replace Malicia?"

Akua, I guessed. Had to be. She was the only prominent person left in Praes with enough power to be considered and not enough enemies to be too badly opposed. And what a knife in the belly it would be for this lot, when turned away from them. Just in time for me to cram my father down their throats. Silence stretched on for a moment.

"We do not mean to replace the Dread Empress," High Lady Takisha said. "We are loyal subjects, Black Queen."

My eye moved between them, and appallingly enough they looked serious. Not about being loyal, that was just absurd, but about not supporting Malicia being deposed. At least not here and now.

"Dread Empress Malicia has made herself too much a foe of the Grand Alliance and an ally of the Dead King to be allowed to keep her power," I plainly said. "You might have believed this to be negotiable, but allow me to now disabuse you of that notion."

I leaned forward, cold-eyed.

"If I have to burn Ater to the ground around her to see her driven out of the Tower, I will."

My gaze swept over all of them.

"If I must step over your mutilated corpses to get my way, do not believe for a moment I will hesitate. The Dread Empire has been nothing but thorn in our side as most of Calernia fights to hold back the annihilation of all life on this continent," I said. "There is not a speck of sympathy left for any of you west of the Wasaliti: I could raze every High Seat and even the fucking heroes would applaud."

I drew back, put on a friendly smile.

"Malicia is a stone around your necks," I said. "Put up someone else and then we can talk."

"Your threats are empty, Black Queen," High Lord Jaheem said. "You do not have long before you must return west with diabolists, else this campaign will have doomed your allies."

I met the man's golden eyes with a cold smile.

"I still have months," I said. "It's my patience that's in danger of running out, Jaheem Niri. Beware of that, while you still can."

Yet even as I spoke, I knew there were no grounds no win here. I'd made a mistake, I could feel it. Not in refusing to bend over the matter of Malicia or making it clear how far I was willing to go over the matter, but somewhere else. Focusing, I could almost feel it out. Neither Jaheem Niri nor Wither were surprised, they had expected this, so it was High Lady Takisha who'd wanted this conversation to happen. Why? What did she gain? She wants to move them, my instincts whispered, but I could not yet tell to which purpose. I almost could if I focused, but somehow I was sure that if I closed my eyes the stars in the darkness would distract me. But Takisha had gotten something she'd wanted from this, that much I was certain of.

Time to cut my losses before she got more.

"There is no point to this conversation," I stated. "I tell you only this: when we resume it, the terms will have grown starker."

I left them to that, casually tossing in the insult of not giving proper courtesies while leaving. Already I was frowning, lost in thought. I'd just taken a hit without knowing about it until it was too late, and I still didn't know what it'd been for. I did not have as clean a read on the forces at play in Praes as I'd thought I had, and if I kept it up it would cost me.

It was time to sharpen the same knives I'd wielded at the Graveyard.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

par

I left them to that, casually tossing in the insult of not giving proper courtesies while leaving. Already I was frowning, lost in thought. I'd just taken a hit without knowing about it until it was too late, and I still didn't know what it'd been for. I did not have as clean a read on the forces at play in Praes as I'd thought I had, and if I kept it up it would cost me.

It was time to sharpen the same votes we'd wielded at the Graveyard.

Miles

Boo! Lazy! At least find a phrase where the grammar works.

Forgot_My_Name

I could feel votes, now. When I closed my eyes, I could see them like stars shining the dark.

Sir Nil

Ha! And it will be revealed that Amadeus was Dread Emperor Traitorous all along! Using his tried and true tactic of creating cabals to overthrow the emperor!

Big I

Just as planned

MagnaMalusLupus

Tzeench, eat your heart out.

maginotswall not mere as planned, for it was a cunning plan...

edrey

stars in the sky.

name powers are back, Ranger should really be pissed now, haha also, the high lords want to use the people to attack Malicia, a magical record of cat wanting to kill malicia a any cost, and only malicia. itsnt a very original plan but it should work. a great chapter as always gollyath

I appreciate your writing as always, EE!

ninegardens

I'm... suprised that Cat's "authority" expands over Ranger. Most villians yes, but Ranger in particular is surprising.

Ranger disabling the tracking every day or so is hilarious though. Also good story craft: it makes her threatening, but falliable, and means if she shows up out of no where later, is explained.

I wonder if Cat can sense Malicia at the moment?

Miles

Ranger respects strength. Iirc Cat fought her to a draw without having a Name at one point.

ninegardens

.... I'm 90% sure that never happened.

Pretty sure the only time the ever met was when Cat's entire band was getting beaten by the queen of summer, and Ranger showed up and said "This is out of your league, piss off, don't get in my way"

Nairne .01

This, in fact, is more or less what happened.

Shveiran

What? No, that never happened.

The only times they met was in Arcadia, and they didn't fight.

knockoffnikolai

Cat's only been onscreen with Ranger once, and that was when Ranger fought the Summer Queen. Cat didn't fight her, and walked away with the impression that Ranger could have killed her without breaking a sweat.

Konstantin von Karstein

No. One a look from Ranger was enough to make Cat feel like her throat was being slit.

Frivolous

ninegardens: It means Ranger is a villain. I think the result is unequivocal.

Catherine's new ability, possibly her new aspect, wrecks all uncertainty about whether someone is hero or villain, answers to Above or Below, and all pretense of "neutrality".

I'm really glad one of her new aspects is a perception power. And she can even sense the emotions of Ranger at a great distance.

This makes Catherine a Thinker in Worm or Ward terms, and Thinkers rule.

This way we'll be able to find out whether Doddering Sage is a villain or not.

I wonder if Revenants and especially Scourges fall under her authority.

Liliet

OMG yeah it really does have potential to do that.

Of course, it remains to be seen if it can change its indications based on what a given person is currently doing (Ranger is certainly in a villainous Role meddling in Ater)

Nairne .01

Not to mention it could shift so much in the pivot due to Bard's machinations.

Shveiran

I don't think the Warden of teh East will have authority over Villains, but rather over the east. It's in the Name.

That includes any Named that is sworn or himself a power in the area. The Silver Huntress, like most heroes, is ultimately, is at the moment subject to the authority of the Representative of the Heroes, and is here kind of by mistake.

But Arthur is a squire of Callow, and Vivienne its Princess. And Ranger was until recently ruling a (small) piece of the East, and is also fucking about with the Crown of Praes.

What I find most interesting is that she can feel HAKRAM. For Hakram is, even if she doesn't know it, clearly not the Adjutant anymore (the orcs are marching) and that means a) Cat yet has an hard time figuring out what Name she is feeling, but she feels them because they are "Named on her turf" and b) that the Warlord – the Warlord – is under her authority. Holy shit.

hakureireimu

Did you not read this line? "warden to villains" Your theory is completely counter-textual.

Shveiran

Aside from the fact that Catherine herself is not really sure what she is becoming yet, it is not. This is the text:

"When I closed my eyes, I could see them like stars shining the dark. Only it wasn't all of them. Most heroes I couldn't make out. Vivienne yes, and the Squire when he was close, but never the Silver Huntress. Authority, I thought. It was about authority.

And the clearest part of it was that Below smiled on me herding their own, a warden to villains."

There is no Villain on the scene that isn't either an Eastern Villain or someone that signed onto the Truce and Terms and therefore ultimately answers to Cat as far as she is concerned: of course she feels all of them. The theory is perfectly coherent with the text because there are no Villains that she can feel that are outside the theoretical mantle of authority. There is no proof, but there also isn't any contrary evidence.

But it can't be "all Villains and some Heroes" or there is no balance with the Warden of the West. Which at best would get "most Heroes".

Therefore, it must be "most Villains and some Heroes". Just like most Villains actually do come from the East.

Reader in the Night

Catherine could Speak to Hanno and GP before her Name even properly formed. Clearly, her Authority is not limited to people of the geographical east.

Also, remember what Bard said. The Name is Warden of the East, the concept of "The East". It rules over ancient evils, old grudges, backstabbing, and diabolists. It's not (just) about the cardinal direction.

Linnus42

She spoke to GP, never done it to Hanno.

CGundlach

She did. Book Six, Chapter 71.

Cat enters a Pavillon with Prince Klaus Wulfenbach, Prince Arsene of Bayeux, White Knight and Grey Pilgrim at the table, and several mutinees in attendance. At some point she orders "Shut Up!", at which point both heroes looked surprised at her. She doesn't elaborate for WK, but notices that the Pilgrim is affected, despite Speaking usually only affecting people who are less powerful. (I also believe that WK is less powerful than GP)

A bit later she

"withdrew any strand of will lingering against the four men at the table, freeing them of struggle", implying that her Speaking affected not only the two Princes, but also WK and GP. We just don't know to which degree WK was affected.

Zach

I'm pretty sure Bard's plan is to force Catherine into getting the name Warden of the East with the "East" referring to "the geographical east." Remember, she talked about manipulating Catherine into a different Name.

stlldvs

" What I find most interesting is that she can feel HAKRAM."

But can she? The text says she felt Adjutant, and we know Hakram abandoned that Name when he became a claimant for Warlord. My guess is that when Hakram spared Snaketooth, saying that he had a use for him, that Snaketooth became a new Adjutant to serve his new Warlord.

Shveiran

Geez, I hope not. That's more a Chancellor than an Adjutant and no mistake.

I guess it makes sense for Hakram to catherine his way into an Adjutant, but using his freshly defeated former rival who doesn't share his goals and was formerly under Malicia's thumb doesn't seem smart.

I guess he could be trying to tie together the factions for good, but...

rouquincool

Pretty sure that makes her a Thinker/Trump by Worm standards.

Hargabga

It maybe that Cat's perception judges who is the villain. As in, she believes Ranger to be Villain, not that she necessarily is.

2xMachina

Villians are those who strive to change the world for themselves, while Heroes serve above.

Ranger is the paragon of villians, doing whatever she likes for her own sake

burlindw

Earlier, the Dead King specifically pulled a revenant out of a fight with Cat to avoid giving her a "whetstone to sharpen her Name on." I think the revenant was Callowan, so it seems that revenants may fall under her authority, but might not always.

nick012000

She probably can, but I get the feeling that being able to tell that the Dread Empress is in the Tower is not exactly a revelation that would shock anyone.

Reader in the Night

You know, this is about last chapter actually, but this one gave us relatively little to sink our teeth into: Bard said Malicia needed a time, a place, and somebody to officiate. There is close to a single person in all of Calernia with the actual capacity to officiate a meeting between Malicia and Catherine and not make it a farce, and that's Amadeus of the Green Stretch.

Matthew

This would work except the Bard killed Captain and Black is not going to forgive that.

Also, black is waiting to show up and fuck over the Bard.

kinghaart

Bard doesn't need him to know he's doing it for her.

Sugar Roll

And he's going to take Catherine's knife for Malicia.

Benjamin Huang

Crown of iron and blade of steel,
A war to win on eastern fields,
Crows of Night and steed most dread,
Thrice reborn returned from dead,
Squire once but ne'er Knight,
Legend born from the twist of a knife,
A queen in black, draped in woe,
Warden of all that lies Below,
Break the gameboard neath her feet,
To bring at last a lasting peace

dadycoool

Beautiful.

Nairne .01

Nice.

sengachi

Wow. That's gorgeous, and I can see it being a real poem in-story.

Portal

It was time to sharpen the same knives I'd wielded at the Graveyard.
Yesssssss, bard-vs.-cat all-out story-fu showdown!

caoimhinh

Everybody was Story-Fu fighting!

jamesc9

I'm not sure that these are the right knives. The serious story-fu with the Bard was in the Arsenal. The Graveyard involved defeating Skein again, taking the right to rule from princes; what else?

kinghaart

There was a fair bit of story stuff with the 7 princes and 1.

Juff

Typo Thread:

that I some > that in some danger in collapse > danger of collapse Seats are much > Seats had much inferior to inferior to > inferior to but thorn > but a thorn

Shveiran

Oh boy, here we go. One of my favorite moments in the story is getting a sequel.

The Black Queen speculating about the goals and plans of Amadeus of the Green Stretch, Dread Empress Malicia, the Wandering Bard and Akua Sahelian.

Twice as many opponents as the Graveyard, and though those were no slouches the opposition has stepped up... and knows her and her bag of tricks far better than the Pilgrim and the Tyrant ever did.

It's gonna be wild.

kinghaart

No Robber to help plan. 😞

And methinks the story knife she creates here might be the one Bard intends to turn on her.

Liliet

So, I have three immediate guesses about what is off:

1. The Matrons & Wither have decided to alter their strategy after Amadeus called them out.
2. It's about whatever Akua discussed with the conspiracy last chapter, and the change is because of her utter lack of desire to actually take the Tower.
3. Amadeus.

Shveiran

So, basically, "one of the things that were foreshadowed will be involved".

Nairne .01

I'm just waiting for the inevitable improvisation on Cat's part and the chaos that might ensue due to it. This feels a little like the Underdark and the arc with the drow with Cat being in the dark (yea I know, not? well, half intended pun) about the plans of her enemies.

SpeckofStardust

I think if Cat made a mistake it was giving them the timetable of months, which drops the urgency of her whole thing. They have more time to jostle her before she steps up to burning everything down to the ground.

Anonscheme101

"He's a dangerous man, Catherine, but he doesn't have an army," Juniper said. "There's only so much he could do."

and

"If I have to burn Ater to the ground around her to see her driven out of the Tower, I will."

Meanwhile Ranger and Amadeus are sitting next to goblin fire stashes in Ater. Nobody is going to believe that Cat didn't start the fire.

Rey d`Tutto

Cat didn't start the Fire!

It was always burning, since Ater was turning...

Nope, doesn't scan...

Anonymous

Ah, doubling down on "no really, Cat's name is going to be Warden of the East" to try to make readers bite, I see.

Burlyraven

So Above acts as a firewall to Cat's tracking, and Heroes have to disable protections to be tracked, consciously or unconsciously, is how I'm reading that. Said protection does not seem to extend to the Names that occasionally move with the story, apparently (a canonical thing from a Hanno interlude, since I've seen a few people have forgotten that in these comments).

Earl of Purple

The first thing, I think Hakram will do upon arriving, will be invite Cat to his tent, without letting her know. He wants to tell her in person, which is why he hasn't scried yet. Also I think he's unable to scry her because that would be taking her side, or seen as such.

Shveiran

Does... Adjutant have mages?

The orc have few Gifted, and maybe bringing GA, non-orc mages with him to the summit may have been bad politics so he didn't?

Konstantin von Karstein

The traditionalist clan has several shamans with magic, and one of Heiress' spy in book 3 was an orc that could scry. There's not a lot of orc mages, but among 100k there's probably a few.

Shveiran

True enough.

On the other hand... do they know how to scry? I think scrying was made a lot easier by Wekesa, which is what allowed the Legions to militarize the ritual as a standard procedure. And I doubt the traditional clans have gone to learn that.

On the other hand, scrying was around before that, so maybe there are a few that can even if they are not using modern formulae.

I wonder what school of magic the Clans practice, though considering it was never mentioned before my guess is "not an effective one".

Konstantin von Karstein

I imagine that in 30 years, there's was a few orc Legion mages who were taught the scrying spell, then retired to the step. They would then have taught to shamans the spell.

Earl of Purple

I think Sigvin could manage it, if she knows how. It's a traditional Praesi technique, and orcs don't have many mages to learn it- if one even finds a Praesi mage willing to teach them.

Sugar Roll

That's what Hakram will tell Catherine but the real reason he hasn't scried yet is because he's too busy with Sigvin.

Adrian V

He also could have banned any form of communications as to cripple Malicia, like if absolutely no info is going out Malicia will be in the dark too.

If Malicia doesn't know that is, can't remember what she knew about the horde currently.

Earl of Purple

She knows that someone's in charge, she doesn't know who it is, her Eyes in the horde have gone silent. She also knows they're not doing what she wants them to be doing, i.e. putting pressure on Nok to keep him in line.

Adrian V

Exactly, she knows only things didn't go as planned, she doesn't know who is in charge or how he/she came to power or their agenda, as far as she knows she could have been betrayed too. That doubt is worse for her since it feeds on her paranoia.

Cosmic Cnidarian

I don't think Cat's goal is Warden of the East. She sounds apprehensive in her response to Scribes comment about her influence, and her internal monologue about authority. Maintaining a level of civility among the villains is certainly a goal of her's, but it is not her MAIN goal. Could she really enforce the Truce and Terms while only having authority over the villains? Warden of the East is the Name that Bard wants her to assume, I believe, rather than something like Arbitrator. In my mind, Bard is sick of an endless life of playing referee to a game between Gods, and sees the Dead King's win as an end to the game, and her part in it. Cat becoming Warden of the East means that she becomes something controllable, another piece on the game board.

Forgot_My_Name

Bard explicitly doesn't want her as Warden of the East.

Cosmic Cnidarian

Bard doesn't ever explicitly say that (not that she ever explicitly says anything). She tells Malicia that they should have Cat come into a Name that relates to the material East, rather than the philosophical/metaphysical East. It may also be that both are just different forms of Warden of the East. Our only points of reference are Cordelia's rejection of Warden of the West, and Hanno's implied claim to it. Cordelia was certainly more concerned with the material governing of Procer, and Hanno's interest is managing it's heroes. However, I think its more interesting to think that Cat's aim is something more encompassing than just lordship over a pit of villains, and EE's word choice this chapter is a red herring.

Shveiran

No, the Bard explicitly wants to shape what the “east” in her Name will mean: practicalities (as in borders, factions and armies) or something that matters.

The rather obvious implication is that “east” is in the Below-damned Name.

Reader in the Night

I don't think the Name will form if practicalities are all that are left. Names are about stories, not political arrangements.

It's the same way Cat has been the Black Queen for years, but the Name of the Black Queen is beyond her: the story didn't pan out.

Shveiran

Except for, say, Scribe? Or Chancellor? Or heck, Adjutant.

A Name IS about a story, but a story can easily be about dealing with practicalities. It's a supporting role, but it IS a Role.

Not every Name needs to be flashy.

Rey d`Tutto

Yeah, but Cat's gonna be the CEO of EVIL, Inc., the President of th United States of Evil, the Hegemonic Overlord of Evil.

There had better be flash.

Shveiran

Well, yeah, I don't think Bard and Malicia will succeed. I'm jus saying that's what they are trying to do.

AbraKadabra

Could be Archheretic of the East. 😊

Cayle

It was mentioned that the more traditional tribes have Shamanic mages. Not sure how well they'd mesh with tresmegistan scrying or if they have their own.

Abnaxis

Does Cat actually have months at this point? Isn't Procer collapsing right now? I thought she had regular contact with Cordelia?

Maybe the mistake Cat made is letting Muraqib know she isn't aware of the happenings out West? Maybe that's the Bard's stroke of "I wouldn't really call it good" luck?

Shveiran

I assume she has regular contacts with Cordelia and that she is on point when she judges she has two months to break Ater.

Letouriste

So Hakram didn't scry cat then. Didn't expect that somehow despite the topic really deserving a face-to-face.

Adrian V

["He's a dangerous man, Catherine, but he doesn't have an army," Juniper said. "There's only so much he could do."]

Meanwhile with Amadeus

"I felt a perturbation in the force, and now i feel the urge to prove something!"

Daniel E

But who is going to serve as her hands this time? 😞 R.I.P.
Footrest

Shveiran

Let's hope it's not Arthur.

serdar314

And here we are. After 2 months of reading, the last chapter. Errticerratta, without doubt you are one of the best storytellers I had ever seen. Your different characters piling on each other, not stumbling, not confusing but as if they are stones coming together to make something greater than any of them. You have written 6 books and none of them short yet your stories have balance. Not too op, not too underpowered. Always a new villain, always a new way to continue. For all that thank you, thank you for this amazing story.

KiltedBastich

You know, at this point, I suspect that Amadeus is going meta on us. I just realized that as long as he doesn't have a name, the Wandering Bard can't really tell what he's doing. She can still see Ranger, but Ranger doesn't care. Ranger leaves the namelore and meddling to Amadeus.

I strongly suspect that Amadeus is pulling a plot on the Bard as well as Malicia, using Cat as the distraction for both. He's using his namelessness as effectively the narrative equivalent of a cloak of invisibility.

Rey d`Tutto

And this is why I read through the comments.

Gabe Meadow

It's also possible that he hasn't gotten in contact with Cat for that reason, so she can't leak anything to the Bard or Malicia's agents inadvertently, until the time comes for him to strike.

kinghaart

Best way to swing a story is to enter it unexpectedly.

Chapter 23: Sung; Singer

"To fear treachery is a mark of inferiority, for fundamentally it is a fear that espouses the lie of safety. Treachery is only despised because it comes from within, from behind the wall. Only a fool believes that there is such a thing as shelter from harm."

– Dread Emperor Perfidious

I'd not been to Spite Valley since the war games.

Its real name was Koso Valley, but no one who'd been through the War College actually called it that. The old fort that companies were assigned to hold or take during war games stood empty, Malicia's generals past trying to actually hold the approaches to the capital, but it wasn't there I was headed. I led Zombie downslope, past the lone watchtower and the woods until the slope began to rise again. Hills and a mess of rocky outcroppings awaited, small footpaths leading up until I found long abandoned fire pits. Rat Company had camped here, I remembered, on that first night I'd met people not yet become some of the most important in my life. Hakram. Robber. Nauk. Pickler. Ratface. Killian, once upon a time.

Nilin, too, who'd died before I found out he was a traitor.

In a way it was a little like coming home, a different one from the narrow streets of Laure but no less dear. In a lot of ways, I'd taken the first steps towards the woman I now was in this quiet valley. The shadows lengthened and night neared, and I left my escorts in the fort. I could make my own fire and Vivienne had brought cuts of meat to roast. We got to it with the practice efficiency of people who'd travelled together for sometimes months at a time, splitting up the tasks. Before long we had roasted pork and freshly picked berries for supper by an open fire as darkness crept over the horizon. In the distance I saw the campfires of my knights, but aside from that we were alone.

"Why here?" Vivienne asked. "You used the Mavian prayers near our camp before the Graveyard. Why travel hours away this time?"

"Worried?" I teased.

"I am," the Princess baldly admitted. "Half the Dread Empire wants you dead and assassins only need to get lucky once. I don't like that you're so far from our wards, much less alone."

"People would distract," I shrugged. "And we never actually told anyone where I was headed, so there's no secret for her spies to dig up."

"But why here?" Vivienne pressed.

I looked away, dragged my gaze across the jutting rocks around us. They looked like teeth, in the right light, as if we were sitting in some great beast's maw.

"It began here, my time with the Legions," I finally said. "And it will end in Ater."

"Symmetry-"

"Has its uses," I cut in. "Learn that. Creation likes patterns, Vivienne. Rules of three, seven and one, a hundred little ironic echoes. You either use that or fall victim to it."

"I'll not argue namelore with you, Cat," she replied, raising her palms in surrender. "It just seems out of the way, which is unlike you. You like being at the heart of the hive."

I sighed.

"I do, sometimes," I said. "For this the quiet will suit better."

The Princess frowned.

"You're worried about the Bard," she said.

"I'll be worried about the Bard even when I'm sure I've killed her for good," I said. "The Arsenal is the only time I've ever come close to pulling one on her, and I'm still not sure she didn't get what she wanted out of that mess."

It'd come close to costing me Hakram, and the more I heard about what was happening out west the more I wondered if I'd really been the focus of what she was after. Tensions between the First Prince and the White Knight were continuing to rise, to my worry, and I'd not forgotten it was the events at the Arsenal that'd started the enmity between those two.

"She's not a god," Vivienne said.

"She's the patron goddess of stories, or close enough," I snorted. "I actually think it's like a domain for her, you know? The Augur insisted she could 'see all stories' and there's not a lot of things for Named that give you that much power over a concept s broad."

"Kairos Theodosian beat her," the Princess said. "So can we."

Ah, I thought, but did he? She'd definitely not anticipated Anaxares the Hierarch being such trouble for her, I thought, but Kairos' scheme against Judgement? That, I was not so sure. It seemed too much of a coincidence, Cordelia fishing out an ealamal that was once a Seraphim just after the Tyrant plotted a way to shut the door on Judgement's fingers. The Dead King had put us on the path of finding out a terrifying truth about the Intercessor, that she could influence angels and so that using the ealamal was as good as giving her power of life and death over most of Calernia, but we'd found it out after Kairos had 'saved' us from that peril.

And in the depths of Liesse thrice-ruined, Kairos Theodosian had been spared execution at my hand because the Intercessor had given him a way out.

I'd never learned why. He'd traded for that, I knew, but what did he have to offer? I did not think that the Intercessor was behind any of these... movements, but that wasn't the nature of her power. She could see it all and stand where she wanted, when she wanted to be there. The Intercessor threaded the needle, that was her terrible trick, and all she ever needed to do was to follow the... objects in motion. I'd been fighting her for years, often bitterly, and to this day the only thing I was pretty sure of was that she'd tried to make me replace her at the Arsenal. Trap me into taking up her mantle as either a rival or a successor. I found it pretty telling she'd since decided to go about killing me seriously.

Almost like I was of no further use.

"After is the first place where it's decided whether or not we lose the war against the Dead King," I finally said. "If it goes badly, Vivienne, it could fuck up everything. There's no room for mistakes."

She hummed.

"And so you disappear into the night," she said. "So you can scheme in peace."

"I'm preparing," I piously corrected. "And speaking of, did you get the sheets done?"

"I did," Vivienne agreed, reaching for her saddlebag.

She handed me a neat sheath of scrolls. I wiggled one out, unrolling it, and found a rather good depiction of Dread Empress Malicia looking back at me from the top of the parchment sheet.

"They all this good?" I asked.

"They are," she said. "Got an officer from the Thirteenth with some talent to draw them."

I paused.

"Thanks," I said.

She eyed me skeptically.

"You hate it," Vivienne stated.

"I didn't say that," I protested.

"Oh Gods," the Princess said, sounding appalled, "you actually think they're too good, don't you?"

It just wasn't the same if the drawings weren't unspeakably shitty. Last time it was Robber who'd drawn them, and I still had those parchments tucked away in a chest somewhere along with other mementos. Tolerantly amused, Vivienne took out a writing set from her knapsack and stole the scrolls away from me to half-hearted protests. She took out Malicia's scroll first, slapped it against a stone, and whet the quill. A stick figure with a crown atop it and three strands of hair was made to represent Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name. I cocked an eyebrow.

"Aren't nobles supposed to get drawing lessons?" I jeered. "She's supposed to be the most beautiful woman alive."

"Right you are," Vivienne amiably agreed.

She wet the quill again and drew two circles over the stick figure's chest.

"There we are," the Princess said. "Like looking at a painting of her."

I snorted.

"All right, hit me with the other ones," I said.

Amadeus of the Green Stretch got to have a sword and a beard, the Wandering Bard got to hold an attempt in the direction of a lute. Akua Sahelian was drawn on fire, which I suspected to more of a wish on the artist's part than an accurate representation. They each got their stone, though unlike the Mavii raised stones the outcroppings here were low. I could see the horizon over them, the deep night sky beyond.

"I still think you should have a sheet for the nobles," Vivienne said. "Sepulchral's out of the running now that she's undead, but soon every remaining High Lord and Lady will be in Ater. At least some of them will be plotting to climb the Tower."

"I'm not planning to control who climbs the Tower," I said.

She glanced at me skeptically and I grimaced.

"I am," I conceded, "but only because it's accessory to what I'm actually after."

"Which is?"

"Who's going to dictate what Praes is, going forward," I said. "I'm not blind, Vivi. I know that my father might not actually want to take the throne. But that doesn't mean his philosophies can't rule."

She drew back, standing by the fire and taking a look at the parchments.

"Malicia has to die," the Princess said. "She's done too much to be left alive."

"I won't pursue if she crosses the Tyrian Sea," I agreed. "Anything else gets her a shallow grave."

"And Akua is not acceptable as Dread Empress," Vivienne said, a hint of warning in her voice.

I shrugged.

"Which is irrelevant, because she will not accept," I said.

I wasn't sure how deep the temptation would run, even now. I had my suspicions – she'd always seemed to think more in terms of legacy than titles, which was telling – but I couldn't know. Maybe the lure of power would make her blood sing, the idea that she might rule from the Tower at last. But I believed, bone deep, that when the moment came she would turn away. Recognize it as a cage made of everything she had grown to despise. And I was not wrong in this. But if I'm wrong? My fingers clenched. Assassin could not get to Malicia, protected by the Tower as she was, but Akua did not share in that safety. But I'm not wrong.

"Meanwhile the Carrion Lord is nowhere to be found and the Wandering Bard unlikely to be taken as a candidate for ruling the Tower," Vivienne said. "Why those four, then?"

"Malicia, Akua, Amadeus," I said. "They're the stories that Praes can embrace going forward."

Stasis, reclamation, reform. And each of them had enough sentiment behind them that they were genuine possibilities – Malicia's cause was plunging downwards at the moment, but that was not because her philosophies were disliked. It was because of chaos and mismanagement. Should she win in Ater and restore order, her reign might well continue for decades yet.

"I don't care if Sargon Sahelian himself becomes Dread Emperor," I said, "so long as he's following a mould I'm comfortable with. Hells, I'd take Marshal Nim if she made a move."

"You'd prefer the Carrion Lord, though," Vivienne said.

"Sure, I'd prefer the one man I can trust not to start a stupid war and to butcher anyone threatening the new peace," I drily said. "But he's playing his own game, so I'll not count on it."

Vivienne grimaced.

"It's too abstract a cause for soldiers to get behind," she said.

"Which is why I've been taking about deposing Malicia a lot and a little about helping up my father," I replied. "Easier to grasp."

She glanced at the last of the four sheets.

"And the Bard?"

"Didn't have that one, back in Iserre," I said. "She's the enemy, Vivienne. There's not a part of anything I plan that can go without an answer to 'what if the Intercessor intervenes?'"

"But what is it that she's after?" Vivienne asked.

"My corpse, for one," I said. "She's stated as much and I believe her."

My heiress looked startled.

"She outright said so?"

"I got a proper declaration of war from her," I said. "We're in this to the knife."

The dark-haired princess stepped away from the light, knelt before the sheet and wrote: kill Catherine Foundling.

"Beyond that I'm less certain," I said. "But I think she's here in Praes because she doesn't want me to get the east in order. She wants Hasenbach desperate, Hanno forced to the forefront."

"What would she gain from that?" Vivienne asked.

"Right now everyone's a closed door for her," I said. "She burned too many bridges, she's an enemy under the Truce and Terms and no one has an interest in letting her back in. If it everything goes to shit, though?"

"People are forced to consider whether she should not be bargained with again, should the alternative be death by Keter," the Princess mused. "Yet that won't work with everyone."

"Procer's collapsing," I said. "A lot of people are going to be willing to do some very stupid things when the defence lines finally break and it sinks in we're looking at the massacre of half the continent. She'll get enough tools to make it worth her while. Besides, compared to how she's a pariah now what does she have to lose?"

Vivienne conceded the point with a nod. Under 'kill Catherine Foundling' went 'prevent alliance'.

"And that's all?" she asked. "It does not seem so much."

"Which is why there's a third line," I said. "We're going to call it the hidden knife."

It went up, neatly written, and she glanced at me in a way that invited elaboration.

"She's after something else," I said. "It's too small a game for her otherwise. Killing me, screwing the Grand Alliance, it's big but not big enough. She doesn't work with plots that don't echo, she's never only about the immediate win."

"So the hidden knife," Vivienne said.

I nodded. She moved to the closest sheet, the one where a terrible drawing of Akua stood aflame.

"And what does she want?" the Princess asked.

I leaned back, going through my saddlebags to bring out a bottle of aragh. I ripped out the cork with my teeth, then spat it to the side.

"Try it," I invited, then took a drink.

The dark-haired princess stood with her back lit by the flames, milkmaid's braid crowned with a small circlet of silver. I watched her watch the parchment, glare at it as if it would surrender answers.

"She wants to take it back," Vivienne finally said. "Or close enough. I figure she'd settle for people just forgetting about it, if it were on the table."

"Redemption," I said. "That's the word you're looking for."

Vivienne turned a hard look to me.

"Cat, I know you're... whatever the Hells you two have been doing, but don't kid yourself," the Princess said. "You can't teach her to be a good person."

I couldn't even teach myself that, most the time, so that was hardly unexpected.

"You're thinking in House terms," I said instead. "Good and Evil, good people and bad people."

"If you're about to tell me there's no such thing as good and evil, you're going to need to get me drunker first," Vivienne said. "I still won't buy it, but at least I'll be drunk."

I snorted.

"Look, we're not really better than Praesi," I said. "When it comes down to it, Callowans are not less selfish or wiser or inherently better. That's probably the most important thing my father ever taught me: most people do shitty things because they're in shitty situations."

"In an absolute sense you're probably right," Vivienne said. "And I think a lot of what's wrong with the Dread Empire can be traced back to hunger just as much as the nobility, but that's not really an excuse. Not for Akua Sahelian."

"You're still falling in the trap," I said, "of thinking about it as opposing ideologies. That's the thing, though: there's not really a philosophy of Evil the way the House of Light says there is. Jino-waza's probably the closest thing in Praes and it's not inherently bad. It just becomes that when it's paired with, you know, desperation and a taught disregard for others."

"Except Akua has been philosophically Evil," Vivienne objected. "The word is something Wasteland highborn embrace and the damage she did was under that banner. Crushing her rivals, taking the Tower, conquering the world."

"The Queen of Blades went conquering in all directions and we didn't call her Evil," I said. "And when Hasenbach made her rivals drink poison after the Great War, did the House condemn her? Let's not even talk about the amount of people I killed to become Queen of Callow. We shouldn't be hypocrites about this. It's the means that make it something different, Vivienne."

"And she used those means," the Princess bluntly replied.

"She did," I agreed. "There's no excusing or forgiving that. What I'm saying is that she's done evil and Evil things, but I don't believe she's fundamentally either because there's no such thing as someone who is."

Even the Dead King had made choices, known crossroads.

"And what would that change?"

"That she can be taught to understand that people are... people," I said. "Not just in the abstract but close-up. That's what it taught her, our campfires and the Army of Callow. That the sum of people existing in the world weren't Named and those with golden eyes."

"That's supposed to make a difference?" Vivienne scorned.

"Imagine you've been breaking statuettes of clay all your life," I said. "Going through them like a spendthrift to get your way. Imagine, one day, waking up to see they were made of flesh and blood."

Vivienne's face blanked. It was probably the cruellest thing I'd ever done to anyone, setting Akua on that path. She had begun with a ledger so filled she might drown in the ink.

"Redemption," I repeated. "That is the word."

This time Vivienne put it down without argument. She glanced back, silently asking for the rest.

"Reclamation," I said. "That is where her path led her. She hasn't renounced nobility, that's not who she is. She's grown disgusted with the worst parts of it, the scrapped iron she threw in Kairos' face. She wants to take the talents of the highborn and put them to better purposes, not to undo their rule."

It was a difference in the way we'd been raised, I thought. Akua had been brought up to see the aristocracy as the best of Praes, its foundation and virtue. I'd grown up thinking of them as parasites best gotten rid of. Unlike me, she did not consider a world stripped clean of nobles as having been improved.

"And the last?" Vivienne asked.

I smiled.

"Why do you ask?" I said. "It could be only these two."

She frowned.

"Is it?"

"No," I agreeably said. "But why are you so sure of that?"

She hesitated.

"It just... felt like there should be three," she admitted.

"Good," I said. "Your instincts are sharpening."

If she was to found a dynasty fated to end up Named as often as the Fairfaxes had, I'd be professionally offended should it not be better than most at namelore. She seemed as irritated as she was pleased by the compliment.

"So, the last?"

"Freedom," I said.

Vivienne looked at me in surprise, blue-grey eyes blinking.

"She just got loose after years with us," she said.

"Did she really?" I asked. "First she was bound, and when she was freed she found herself bound still."

I smiled harshly.

"Now she finds herself poised to take the Tower, and she realizes that the throne would be just another set of chains," I said. "And these most contemptible of all she has worn."

She'd be putting those on by herself, after all.

"Akua will be wanting a way out," I said. "Craving it."

And how fortunate for her that I already had one to offer. Freedom went up on the parchment, Vivienne applying herself so the letters would come out neat even though the stone beneath was uneven. She rose to her feet afterwards with an expectant look. Instead of answering it, though, I pointed a finger upwards. Vivienne looked up and went still in surprise. The moon was fully out, meaning we'd been at this for a while.

"You need to get moving soon if you want to be back to camp at a decent hour," I said.

She hesitated.

"This is important," Vivienne said.

"It is," I acknowledged. "But is it important to you?"

She looked a little offended at that.

"Of course it is," she replied. "I wouldn't let you-"

"That can't be the way you do things anymore, Viv," I quietly interrupted. "You know that. There are other things you have to put first."

Silence.

"I'm the Princess, you know," Vivienne Dartwick said. "Not the Queen. It doesn't need to change."

"You are the Princess," I replied, smiling, "until you are the Queen. So it's already changed."

She had duties now in a way she'd not had them before. Not even when she'd been my regent. A Name was a responsibility that could not be denied, not unless you wanted it to hurt you: Vivienne must act the princess now, else it would turn on her. And that meant not blowing off her duties so she could help with my own, much as the both of us would have liked her to. It was a lonely feeling, but I pushed it down. How long was I going to keep all my friends on a string, never more than a tug away? I might not like the feeling in my stomach, but I liked even less how accustomed I'd become to the people I loved taking everything on my terms. Vivienne sighed.

"We're getting old, aren't we?" she asked.

"I guess we are," I admitted. "We can't be nineteen and on the road forever. We wanted to change the world, Vivienne. It's why we fought so hard to climb."

"Only it's different when you're on top," she said.

A pause.

"I wonder if it was like them for them too."

I followed her gaze, the way it came to rest on the two sheets left untouched. Alaya of Satus and Amadeus of the Green Stretch. The two people who'd reformed Praes into what it now was, led it to its greatest heights since the days of Maleficent the Second before it fell into the pit where it was now stuck. I shivered in a way that had nothing to do with the coolness of the night. Neither of us had an answer, and so after sharing a drink with me Vivienne picked up her bags and saddled her horse. She rode away into the dark, leaving me with a mostly full bottle and more ghosts than I cared to entertain.

It would have been easier if Hakram were here, he would have stayed by my side. There wasn't really anyone else left, was there? Indrani cared little for this sort of thing, and I'd sent her out on a mission besides. Masego was allergic to scheming or near enough, and neither Juniper nor Pickler were really... fit for this sort of thing. Aisha might have done decently enough, but I wasn't going to abduct my own marshals' right hand because I didn't want to feel as lonely. I wasn't that pathetic. Even Ivah would have been appreciated if it weren't up north trying to keep Serolen from further collapsing.

Gods, I realized with startlement, but I even missed John Farrier. How long had it been since I'd thought about the man who had commanded the Gallowborne? The real one, not the one I'd cut up into small companies and spent across a dozen foreign fields. I drank of the bottle again, sitting by the fire, and idly reached for my staff. Without even turning to look I slapped it down, landing on the back of the creature that'd been creeping towards me. It was... a scorpion? No, not just that. It had black fur over the shell and a catlike head. It tried to wriggle away until I flared Night, at which point it dropped 'dead'.

"How very believable," I said, amused, and then turned. "Were you going to warn me?"

I glimpsed a blade being tucked back into Scribe's sleeve as she kept silent. I snorted. Was she pissy because I'd not let her make an entrance by nailing the critter with a knife? I glanced at the cat-scorpion, which had been looking at me warily. It dropped 'dead' again the moment it saw me looking.

"I take it there's news," I said.

"Sargon Sahelian has arrived," Scribe said.

I cocked my head to the side and waited. That wouldn't have been enough for her to come.

"There was a riot in the streets of Ater," she said. "Citizens clamouring for Malicia to be deposed. It was put down by the Sentinels."

I let out a low whistle. That was a euphemism if I'd ever heard one.

"My people in the city don't believe it was a natural occurrence," Scribe continued. "Someone incited it."

And there were only so many people with agents in the right place for that. Unfortunately most of them had an interest in seeing Malicia thrown out of the Tower, so that didn't exactly narrow down the list. I made myself look past the implied massacre to what it would mean.

"It weakens her position," I said. "In front of all the nobles she's brought to her gates."

Scribe nodded, adding nothing. She stayed there as my eyes drifted back to the parchments. I felt Eudokia hesitate, then carefully speak up.

"Survival," Scribe said.

I glanced at her.

"For Malicia's list," she elaborated. "More than anything else, Alaya of Satus wants to survive."

I hummed.

"So why is she still here instead of on a boat to Tyre?" I asked. "She could take enough priceless things and run that the fortune would last her for five lifetimes and I'd be near impossible to stop her."

"Because she still believes she can win," Scribe said. "And it's personal to her now, a matter of pride."

I studied her.

"Amadeus?"

"Not only him," Eudokia said. "All of us. The Calamities helped put her on the throne, so she never entirely felt like it was truly hers. Now she stands with all of them dead or turned against her. If she does not win here, she proves her every doubt right: she never was meant to rule, and it was only the kindness of strangers that saw her climb the Tower."

I stayed silent for a long moment, considering.

"Write it down," I finally said.

She did not immediately move, asking a question with her eyes.

"Survival and Pride," I said. "And you better have brought a cup, Vivienne left with them."

"I'll see what I can do," Scribe drily said.

Her handwriting was beautiful, I thought, and impossibly perfect given the angle of her hand and the rough stone the parchment was hung on. A side effect of her aspect?

"The first?" she asked, having left the space empty.

"Stasis," I said.

Scribe cocked her head thoughtfully.

"That is an interesting interpretation of her reign," she said.

"You don't agree?"

"Regardless of our personal enmities, Malicia has been an able ruler and an effective reformist," Eudokia said. "Not all of her changes were of the Reforms – most weren't, in fact. The reason you have been able to trample over the High Seats with an army of fewer than twenty thousand is that she has spent decades bleeding them out. There was a time where Kahtan alone would have been able to field a host twice that size."

"I don't mean that she's trying to stop reforms," I said. "I'm sure she'd be constantly tinkering with the Empire, on the contrary. It's what at the core of her philosophy that's in stasis: her."

"Arguably, her philosophy as a ruler has been centralizing in Praes while using diplomatic means abroad," Scribe noted. "It was only when Hasenbach edged her out in Ashur even after decades of work that she began resorting to... traditional imperial foreign policy."

Doomsday fortresses and assassinations, she meant.

"You still misunderstand me," I said. "Sure she has strategies and policies and ideas. That's not the point. The point is that Malicia does not have a vision of Praes where she's not in charge of it."

I drank of the bottle, let the aragh burn down my throat.

"And I don't mean for a few decades," I said. "I mean forever. Malicia's not making an empire where the power rests with the Tower, she's making an empire where the power rests with her. She doesn't ever intend to give up that throne."

Scribe considered that.

"It would not be so unpopular a vision with most of Praes," she said. "The empire's peaks, the moments where it was wealthiest and most powerful, have generally come when an able tyrant held the Tower and concentrated power in their hands."

"If it were unpopular, it wouldn't be dangerous," I said. "And it's not like the vision is only hers now. High Seats noticed what she was doing, the way she was shaping the empire to make it easier for the Tower to stay in control. Gods Below, Scribe, she had an open rebellion in her heartlands for two years right on the heels of pretty much losing a war and she was still able to collect taxes from most of Praes. Everyone who's noticed is licking their chops and wondering what they might be able to achieve if they take over her machinery."

Stasis went up on the sheet. As if gathering courage, Eudokia abandoned the rocks long enough to pour herself a large shot of aragh in what I was pretty sure was an empty inkwell. She drank it down in a single breath, then squared her shoulders.

"Amadeus, then," she said.

"First one's easy," I said.

"Reclamation and stasis," Scribe mused. "For him, then, reformation?"

I smiled, nodding. We were both familiar with what my father's story for Praes would be. The High Seats humbled or destroyed, Ater unchallenged and the Legions of Terror the backbone of the empire. The only schools for mages under the Tower's aegis, local nobility broken and replaced by appointed governors, peace with Callow and assimilation of the forces on the fringes: the Clans and the Tribes. He'd cut out every part of Praesi culture he disliked and replace it with something he preferred. It was a stable and prosperous Praes he promised, but at the price of what was likely a decade of civil war after large swaths of the empire rebelled against his policies.

"Only that's the story, the ideology," I said. "In the here and now, he's up to something as well."

"Destruction," Scribe said.

The confidence in her voice caught my attention. I raised the bottle, inviting her to elaborate.

"He's never been particularly eager to rule," Eudokia said. "So long as he has free hand to push his reforms, in truth he prefers not to. It's why Malicia was able to trust him for so long. Even now he does not position himself for the Tower. Which means he is trying to achieve the same ends through different means."

I grimaced.

"You think he's going to swing an executioner's axe at everything he can't tolerate about Praes," I said. "Sweep the board clean."

"He will seek to destroy everything he believes a hindrance to a function Dread Empire," Scribe said. "That is my belief."

And she'd sold me on it. It made sense, with the only part tripping me up being that I still had a hard time believing he'd be willing to let the Tower fall into the hands of the people most likely to end up climbing it. Yet he'd made no claim of his own, gathered no armies to his banner. He was no closer to ruling Praes than when I'd last seen him, drunk and maudlin in Salia.

"There's more," I said. "Has to be. The methods he's been using are too odd otherwise. He's been back in the Wasteland for years while we fought out west, Scribe, he has to have been doing something all that time."

"He has been unusual in his approach," Eudokia admitted.

"And that means there's something else," I said. "An objective we haven't figured out yet, the reason he's been so strange."

Scribe looked at the parchments in the firelight, falling silent. I looked at her. I still had to fight it, Fade, but it was getting easier. And the more it fought me the more I could feel it. Her Name itself, but also the three candles within it. They felt close enough I could almost reach out. Not, not exactly that. It would be... harsher if I did it. Like an order. A scream, followed by silence. I only shook myself out of the daze when Scribe went still. She was looking at Malicia's sheet.

"Figured something out?" I asked.

She turned to me without missing a beat, tanned face pleasantly smiling.

"No," the Scribe lied.

Ah, I thought. And there we are. The first conflict between old loyalties and where you now stand. The victor was not unexpected.

"We leave it empty then," I said. "For now."

She rose to her feet, writing 'destruction' before withdrawing.

"What follows?" she asked.

"We figure out," I said, "where we give and where we fight."

"The Intercessor gives no grounds for compromise," Scribe noted.

"Which is why we're fighting her through the other three just as much as we're fighting them," I said. "Frankly speaking, my father's way forward is what I'd prefer but it'd be hard for most of Praes to swallow and he's still keeping cards close to his chest. We can aim for him, but we can't start there."

She eyed me strangely, holding back on a comment, then nodded.

"Akua Sahelian, then," she said. "Malicia is not acceptable to you."

"We're going to have to use Akua to topple Malicia," I agreed. "Which means getting her noble backing, since the Legions are unlikely to back her."

Scribe considered that.

"Assassinating some of the High Seats could create such an opportunity for her," she said.

"It's also risky," I said. "So we leave that aside from now. We know we want to use Akua against Malicia, but that doesn't mean Amadeus is going to stand aside and look. He's going after something, someone. We need to figure out what's that before we move."

"Given that nearly every prominent noble in Praes and most the middling ones are either in Ater or journeying to it, they seem the most likely target," Scribe said. "It would destroy much of what he disliked of the empire in a single stroke."

It might. It wasn't like killing the nobles would end their families, there'd be replacements, but the sheer number of dead nobles would throw their influence into chaos. With the High Seats dead and unable to keep their vassals in line, all the violence held back would flow and in that mess someone with a solid professional army – like, say, the Legions – would be able to decisively break the aristocracy's power if they moved quickly enough the nobles weren't able to get their affairs in order. Without gold and land and fortresses, Praesi highborn lost much of their danger.

"So we figure out how he'll do it," I said. "He doesn't have soldiers, just him and Ranger, so it limits the opportunities he can make use of. We find out what those are and we'll finally catch his tail."

"I'll see what I can do," Scribe said.

"We'll need people in the city when it comes to that," I noted. "Otherwise we can't act on the information. When Indrani comes back tomorrow we'll see about our options."

Callowans would stand out like sore thumbs trying to enter Ater discreetly, but I had Praesi officers in my ranks. Maybe not enough to make a strike force of killers, but there was another option to consider. How many people would be able to tell apart a Taghreb and a Levantine if the Levantine kept their mouth shut?

"That is a start," Scribe said. "But it does not explain how we are to ensure Akua Sahelian has overwhelming support among the nobility."

I cocked my head to the side. Sometimes it wasn't about winning, I thought.

"I know how," I said.

Eudokia turned a questioning gaze to me and I grinned.

"I'm going to lose a battle," I cheerfully told her, "and get betrayed."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Insanenoodlyguy

"You are the voting," I replied, smiling, "until you are the voted. So it's already changed."

Paul

Wow, that sounded so stupid. Nice job... not.

sengachi

There is no need to be a jerk about this stuff. Just don't like it and move on, if it bothers you.

therealgridlock

I, for one, think it is a clever use of the contextualization in time of the word "vote" to mean you are currently voting, and then you will have voted. Startlingly simple and clear.

The act of voting does indeed mean no matter what you will have voted, because you can choose not to vote, but then you aren't currently voting. To imply that one is currently voting is to imply one will have finished voting, therefore, the wordplay is excellent.

Miles

Except that "to be the voted" implies the action was done to you against your will or best interests. So in order to be "the voted", you achieved that status because of something someone else did.

therealgridlock

Yes, that is one way of interpreting the statement.

Another way of interpreting it is “the voted” are a group of people who have already voted and “the voting” are a group of people who are currently voting.

If we examine it from that context, “you are the voting until you are the voted” would mean “the” would be plural or group, not just individual, for the group of people who have voted. The already having voted.

It is a bit of a vague sentence but that’s why I found it interesting, the wordplay was good, and it made the reader think about it.

Gydd

technically speaking, that’d make you the voter, not the voted, no?

The Fighting – the people actively in combat.
The Fighters – The people who fight, now OR in the past.
The Fought – The target of the combat, no real commentary on your ability to fight or retaliate.

The Have-Voted would be the way to make it work as a concept, but it’s a messy solution.

Steven Silver

“I’m going to lose a battle,” I cheerfully told her, “and get boosted.”

Miles

“That is a Boost,” Scribe said. “But it does not explain how we are to ensure A Practical Guide To Evil has overwhelming support among the top 5.”

pigcow

first

Burnsy

Amadeus’s third motive is to save Malicia somehow isn’t it? He just can’t apply that cold rationality to people he genuinely loves.

ninegardens

Yeah, I'm seconding this.

Potentially just "Save the people who I love"- which may ALSO include Cat... but currently Malicia's in the most danger.

... I'm surprised Cat doesn't see it. Or perhaps she does, and just didn't record it, in order to keep up the rouse with Scribe.

"Reformation, destruction and Love" ... yup, that's our Maddie.

Frivolous

I'm not sure I can agree that saving Alaya's life is a probable goal for Amadeus.

My reason is goblinfire. Lots and lots and lots of goblinfire. That isn't a weapon that lends itself to sparing lives.

Unless Malicia has a way of jumping from the top of the Tower(ing Inferno) and surviving? That might work if so.

ninegardens

Or he removes her from the city first. Or he has an evac plan. Or its just a threat.

There is just no version of Maddie that I can picture willingly allowing Alaya to die.

Frivolous

If he really plans to spare and save Alaya, acquiring that much goblinfire doesn't make a lot of sense.

No one really controls or could control that much goblinfire. It introduces a huge, and to me, unacceptable, chaos factor into the scenario.

Also, remember that the Tower has demons in it, and demons can't be harmed by other demons. Which I think means goblinfire can't be used to harm demons, since goblinfire is made from demons.

What do we suppose will happen when the goblinfire consumes the Tower? Demons get loose.

What possible plan could Amadeus have to spare and save Alaya from loosed demons?

Salt

I think you're looking at it from the wrong angle. That's the mundane strategic analysis. Physics, technical details, and mundane probabilities. Stuff that's only of secondary importance in the guideverse.

The guideverse is a setting where heroes getting tossed off cliffs will always miraculously survive despite a "million to one odds". It's one where a plan with a 99.999% chance of success will end up failing without question because the planner simply considered their Victory Assured and that Nothing Could Possibly Go Wrong.

What matters is whether he has the right story wind in his sails. Whether the narrative is one where him successfully saving Alaya would be a fitting end to their story. If he gets that narrative, he will thread the needle blindfolded from a mile away every single time, because reality will quite literally warp itself through impossible coincidences to make it happen.

Meaning the question to ask isn't "how strategically difficult would it be, for a man of his approximate physical ability and physical tools, to save Alaya while destroying the tower". The question is "is there a story setting where the tower being destroyed and Alaya being saved is the strongest narrative, and how does he push events along to make that particular narrative as strong as possible"

Frivolous

Amadeus isn't Named. I'm not sure namelore applies very much to him right now, which is one of the reasons why his presumed plans against the Intercessor might actually work.

Do we really agree that Story applies to any great extent to Amadeus right now? Because I really don't think so.

Example: Kairos's death scene. He was able to give his final lines because of Story, but he was Named.

Amadeus isn't.

ninegardens

Huh- interesting take. I always just took it as a "story groves apply to everyone... its just that Names are a particularly deep grove with more obvious power".

Also, even if Amadeus ISN'T named at the moment, if all the people he is interacting with are named, Namelore will still apply with them in full force. Hence, Malicia and Cat are well under the influence of Namelore. Maddie is Cat's long lost father/mentor figure, and can ride that groove EASILY wether or not he himself has a Name. Similarly, he is Malicia's final morality teather/ loyal loved one (if he chooses to be), and that also is a story he can lean on.

...

...

Both of these stories don't sound like the type that end with him surviving though, so I'm a little confused, as I do fully expect him to survive, succeed, and flourish.

He isn't on screen ever, but I fully belive that Maddy is the hero of this book, not Cat, who is currently more of a great big powerful story hammer, which Maddie is lining up with some weird goal.

milieu

Cat isn't Named too. She's referred to as the "Black Queen" or "First Under Night" by others, but those aren't Names. They don't grant her aspects. But Namelore definitely applies to her; it's the point of the entire exercise in this chapter. She's been wielding Namelore like a dungeon master since she consumed those stories in Arcadia.

Being a significant figure in a world with Names means Namelore applies to you, by virtue of interacting with others Named.

Frivolous milieu and ninegardens: With regards to Amadeus's motives and susceptibility to namelore, we'll see.

You seem to think being Named is an advantage. For me it's the opposite.

I think being Nameless and set apart from Story are significant advantages for Amadeus right now, since he's probably fighting the Intercessor. Intercessor might not even be aware of the goblinfire, precisely because Amadeus is Nameless and she cannot see him.

As for Catherine, she's a special case, maybe unique. We could see the years after losing the Name of Squire, becoming Sovereign of Moonless Nights, then becoming First Under the Night as a period of Namelessness, yes.

But Story and the Named don't seem to agree. Tariq and Laurence certainly treated her as a villain, and Tariq tried to set a pattern of three against her, which really shouldn't work for a Nameless.

If regular people were susceptible to patterns of three, Marshal Nim should have found out about them much earlier, long before she became Black Knight.

onedollargum

Names seem fine, I think it's the story roles that people have to be careful of.

Shveiran

Cat IS Named, or close enough: being a claimant makes you susceptible to namelore, and even those still convinced she won't become the Warden of the East have to admit she is close to becoming SOMETHING.

It has been straight-out said in text since the end of the 5th book, after all.

kinghaart

She's susceptible to stories for sure but per Bard, who should know, she is 100% not yet Named.

Salt

Not having a Name doesn't mean you're immune to story tropes. They apply to everyone and everything, just some more than others. There's a reason why Cat was got a little frightened just a few chapters ago when Juniper started talking along the lines of how they couldn't lose, even though Juniper isn't even close to having a Name.

That also isn't the point anyway, Catherine herself has spent the last several entire books proving that even without a Name, stories and Namelore can still be used just the same. We also know that one of Amadeus' major distinguishing characteristics is his penchant for using stories as a metaphysical club, and with more success than almost anyone else on the continent to boot.

If it's an Amadeus plan, success or failure is going to be hinged upon how well he shapes the story, and clever mundane machinations are mainly going to be the vehicle he uses to shape said story; not the central focus of his plans, nor the main reason his plan succeeds or fails.

shikkarasu

I agree that Amadeus loves Alaya like a Calamity, and we've seen how much the loss of a Calamity pains him, but remember when he was in the Free Cities, shortly before Sabah died? He told Scribe that he thought he was dying and she promised him that, if Cat was involved, either Scribe or Ranger would kill her. Said it with the suicidal conviction of a Right-Hand.

When she did, he thought to himself "how many of my loved ones will I need to kill?" It's not that he loves Catherine more than anyone else, he's threatened to kill her, too. Catherine represents his legacy. She is the inheritor of his ideals. That is what Amadeus is willing to kill Alaya for. He's willing to kill Scribe and even Ranger (and he thinks he can?!?). Amadeus has been around for near 80 years and he has his priorities set with 'fixing Evil' at the top.

kinghaart

Agree. He wants to rewrite the stories. He would kill Cat too if that's what it took.

Of course, that's just another story too. Maybe rather than rewriting stories the goal should be to eliminate their power altogether. I think that might actually be Neshamah's goal too.

kinghaart

What does he think Bard's mistake is? Maybe killing her will matter more to him. I'm not sure what mistake he thinks she made that she wouldn't be able to see through.

mindsword2

There is one thing on Malicia's list that Amadeus of the Green Stretch would want on his. Survival for Malicia. He still hopes to reconcile with his best friend, I think.

Salt

I think that's close but a little off. He wants survival for Alaya, not Malicia. That makes an absolute world of difference.

It fits with reformation and destruction as well since all three are accomplished by the same method – destroying the tower outright. He doesn't care about who rules the tower because he doesn't intend for there to BE a tower by the time he's done.

What he wants with "reformation" is to change Praes into one whose success relies on institutions that survive independently of the people in power. What he wants with "destruction" is cutting out everything he hates about Praes – the self-consuming nature of it that bleeds itself and prevents itself from ever progressing – which Malicia has now become a part of. What he wants with "survival" is saving Alaya, who he still cares for, not Malicia, who he's too practical to allow the continued survival of.

All three things are achieved in one fell swoop if he breaks the tower itself and the nobility gathered in Ater. No tower and no nobles means the power vacuum can be filled by institutions. No tower and nobles means one of the primary reasons Praes mutilates itself so much (nobles competing to climb the tower) no longer exists. No Tower means no Dread Empress, which ends Dread Empress Malicia without killing Alaya.

ninegardens

And I can't help but think... if Maddie manages to break and destroy the tower thoroughly enough to break the name... to destroy it, along with Malicia's power base utterly... I think Cat might be persuaded into permitting Alaya's survival, especially if Ammadeus makes it clear that that mercy is a condition of his continued support.

... I'm not sure where Ranger falls in all of this; she never really liked Alaya, and the fact that she is still supporting Amadeus somewhat implies that he's doing something she would approve of and find "worthy of her time". Alaya isn't that.

Shveiran

Not really, no.

Catherine has already said that in this Book that allowing Malicia to survive after all she has done sets a precedent no one can live with.

And the rest of the continent won't really let this "Malicia is not Alaya" argument fly.

She uses the phrase "if she crosses the Tyrian sea I won't pursue", and to me that means "if somehow she manages to escape beyond pursuit I won't make it my life mission to hunt her down". Maybe even "I'll argue against investing resources to that end with my allies".

That's really not the same as letting her go.

CGundlach

More important than the Tower falling is that the throne is destroyed.

The Tower has fallen several times already, but the throne of the Dread Empress has miraculously survived every time (or at least that's the Story behind it) and Tower was always rebuilt.

Notice also the mention of only the DE being allowed to sit on a throne In the Wolof arc (book 6, chapter 10: "It was against the laws of Praes for any but the Tyrant in the Tower to sit a throne"). That puts an even stronger Story focus on thrones, imho.

I think the only reliable way to destroy the Name would be to melt down the throne – and I don't think just setting the Tower on green fire would suffice to defeat its "miraculously survive the Tower" Story. Amadeus needs to make sure the throne is destroyed, so I believe the huge amount of goblinfire is just a distraction for the smaller amount that is needed to set green fire to the throne.

It could even be counterproductive to topple the Tower, as it being rebuilt is a familiar Story in Praes, as long as the throne survives. Destroying the throne and toppling the Tower might give opportunity to some people to restore the throne in the ruins and claim that it was never destroyed (IIRC there was one time where even Amadeus mentioned that he doubts that this is actually the same throne the first DE sat on), so he needs to make sure the Tower stands when the throne breaks, to break out of the Story of the Tower's revival.

Shveiran

Leaving the Tower standing would be giving up a powerful symbol. The stage is Ater, and the ending has to be monumental. Visible.

Planting goblinfire also on the throne to ensure it is destroyed is reasonable.

Planting it just on the throne is not.

Miles

It makes sense but i don't think it would go on the list because it's already on another list.

Cat is trying to trade tactical victories for a strategic defeat. But story wise for it to work she needs to give everyone a set of 3 (except the bard, who's getting 1 subverted – no hidden knife for thou)

kinghaart

Bard's hidden knife is that Cat will come riding in with a story designed to break her – to outplay fate itself. There is a very strong story around how such attempts end up for the one running against fate. You can stay ahead of fate a long time if you play it right, but if you play outright AGAINST it – fate ALWAYS gets its way.

Cicero

Ah yes, the old Emperor Tratorious tactic... Praesi never seem to be fully immune to it.

Salt

That's a very true point. It would also add weight to the story he's pushing. Like Cat mentioned in the chapter, symmetry matters, and the tower-based stories beginning and ending with the throne would be very strong symmetry.

Salt

I replied to the wrong post...

Liliet

sdfsakdfjahskjdfhf why change what works right

Liliet

so, Stasis, Survival, Pride and Reformation, Destruction... hmm. My first worry was "death" but Destruction already fills that slot thank fuck. He wants something that mirrors Malicia's pride.

...maybe he just wants her, though.

Forgot_My_Name

Maybe "Humbling"? To Alaya, to remind her of where she came from, knock her out of her pride-fueled insanity; or even to Cat, as a sort of last lesson?

I think humbling sounds a bit cruel for Amadeus, but it's not like Amadeus isn't a master of the cruel kindness. He did it to Cat, he did it to Scribe, he might be trying to do that to Malicia.

KageLupus

No, I think it would be something more along the lines of "Closure" or maybe even "Sentiment". Remember, Amadeus was never happy about how things turned out between him and Alaya. He spent so long supporting her that even now I can't imagine he would want her dead or even humbled. But I do think that he wants to resolve their differences one way or another. That could mean killing her himself, but it feels more likely to me to be him kicking her out of Praes and ensuring that she survives but is no longer Empress.

Whatever his ultimate plan ends up being, I think the third thing driving Amadeus has to be his personal relationship with Malicia and everything that has happened between them.

kinghaart

I think Compassion is more likely. Compassion for Alaya and the people of Praes, and the Villains caught in the cycle of going crazy trying to improve their lot.

Miles

Maybe he wants to go back to the world he Isrkai'd from.

therealgridlock

Unless he seeks his own death? It depends on whether it's death for others, death for everyone, or death for himself.

Or death of an idea, that's possible too.

shikkarasu

Call me sentimental, but "Legacy"? Amadeus' biggest fears have always been about other people in power, people he can not or will not eradicate, doing something stupid and undoing all of his work. Gnomes send a red letter? He takes off to see how much murder it takes to fix. Malicia makes a Doomsday device? He Destroys it without even considering whether he will survive.

The main reason that he loved Catherine so much (before he dropped the pretence and started calling her 'daughter') is because she is the perfect inheritor of his influence and ideals. He doesn't mind dying, so long as Evil remains in a better place once he's gone. Cat doesn't see it because she has difficulty admitting that she is worth being loved. Scribe doesn't say it because she hates the idea, and would gleefully kill Catherine to save him.

This is also why WB is doomed to fail in making Cat the Warden of the east instead of East. Amadeus was always grooming her to shepherd Evil, not Praes. This is a lesser treachery she peddles.

shikkarasu

Yep, bolded Doomsday in stead of Destroy. This is what I get for posting before coffee happens.

Stefan

What about the scorpion cat? It is still alive. A was fully expecting Cat to start petting it mid sentence!

dadycoool

It's even smart enough to play dead when she clearly made what was intended to be a killing blow.

Stefan

First time the cat lost (hit by the staff), second time it was a draw (play dead and get overlooked), what will happen next when it wins?

Miles

Headpats and scratches!

therealgridlock

Agreed, I'm sensing a theme 😊

hoser2

I'm hoping for zombie scorpion cat spy after tonight.

Reader in The Night

I wonder what Catherine's own sheet would look like? If I had to take a guess (I don't, but I obviously want to, read the mood)...

– Death; to Malicia and to everything she represents. Death to the self-defeating Praesi philosophy of iron sharpening iron, death to the Old Empire of Praes.

– Accord; Cat needs those diabolists, but more than that she wants a Dread Empire that can be part of the Liesse Accords. So she needs to have someone in the Tower who would actually sign them and mean it;

– A Story; the last one sounds weird, but she wants to defeat the Bard, she wants to form her Name, she wants to permanently change the story of Praes. She wants not just the immediate victory, but the win that echoes and shapes the narratives going forwards from this moment. She's very much like the Bard in thi regard.

milieu

Happy someone brainstormed this and brought it up.

I don't know if Cat necessarily wants to gain a new Name given how flexible she can be right now, but she definitely wants the final Story to encompass hers.

Cat wants...

- No Dead King extinction event, and fulfilling her commitment to provide a new Drow home
- Callow to never be at risk of invasion from Praes again
- Callow to never be at risk of damage from Named shenanigans
- No death from or plan failures caused by the Wandering Bard

So she plots to...

- Win against the Dead King by bringing support from the East
- Be a check on the East's power, by forcing them to "get their house in order" (vague)
- Garner as many signatories of the Liesse Accords as possible
- ? TBD at least maintain Wandering Bard's status as a pariah, via fixing the East

So far what will happen looks like...

0. Scribe immediately sets out to become the opportunity Amadeus needs to break nobility
1. Cat battles Ater, encounters Akua, has titillating dialogue, loses to Sahelian magic
2. Akua battle success consolidates noble support for Tower
3. Warlord Hakram arrives, has sad reunion with Cat (probably not in this order)
4. Some Scribe shenanigans happen in Ater or elsewhere; nobles power bases damaged / Ater breached
5. Akua's consolidated support panics Malicia, causing her to ... leave the throne room
6. The Wandering Bard shows up somewhere in Ater, something happens, maybe more than once
7. Akua in the throne room maxes out on disgust, realizes there is no redemption, goes to Cat and asks to be destroyed
8. Amadeus / Scribe / Warlord help Cat get the troops she needs to head back West to the Dead King
9. Maybe Warlord razes or settles Ater
10. Where is Masego when you need him to send the Tower into Arcadia or something, maybe a pocket dimension, to archive all those devils. This may be the instrument of Akua's destruction
11. Maybe Sepulchral ends up being the interim Praes ruler, administratively.
12. Cat meets Ranger; Cat talks to Amadeus again; Cat has to have had some Wandering Bard confrontation at some point; maybe Indrani talks to Ranger; maybe Ranger talks to Alaya; will be surprised if not one Named dies during the Ater arc 13. This list is too long Erraticerrata has amazing pattern management for running a simulation with this many actors and history.

hoser2

Very nice. One minor detail: needs more goblinfire.

Steven Silver

Scribe, you old horn dog!

I'm gonna pull out the 'ol "I think we all know where this is going." If you can't get with the father, go for the daughter, amiright? 🤔

If it rhymes, it must be true. That's canon name lore, right there. XD

Miles

Checks out.

Doesn't make a lick of sense but people keep repeating it because it's catchy.

Like iron sharpens iron. Anyone who's got 2 knives can tell you you'll only ruin both edges trying to sharpen them like that. Use a proper whetstone ffs.

therealgridlock

Yes, one piece has to be harder for it to be able to break the other, if they're both annealed, you just get a long rolled over edge, if they're both hard, they skitter across one another, until something breaks from enough force and becomes jagged.

You can technically sharpen iron (to a point. No pun intended.) With a file, which is just shaped hardened steel, but you're correct, sand of smaller and smaller pieces, or zirconium or zinc or carbon (diamonds) are the only way to get iron sharper to an actual sharp edge. Finer and finer grits until it's even and smooth.

Tumbling iron pieces in a rock tumbler would also work. But doing it with other iron pieces just gets you small iron rocks of random size and shapes. And lots of rusty flakes.

Miles

Incidentally, this makes "Iron ruins iron" a much more accurate phrase which is basically what the Praesi are doing to themselves.

jackbobbemail2211

Aduro95

Redemption. The preferred term of a woman who is absolutely not going to admit that she's taking a leaf out of the Choir of Contrition's book.

Miles

Because she does horrible things and sends Heroes to Hell?

Salt

It really does fit to a T. Contrition by definition is the feeling of remorse or guilt, which is quite literally what she inflicted on Akua by making her see average people as People. Contrition as a choir is all about, in their own words to William, "repent, you will NOT be forgiven" – which is pretty much exactly what Catherine's attitude toward Akua is.

Mental Mouse

As I've noted before, Catherine has been marked by each of the Choirs she's faced.

therealgridlock

The difference is, contrition makes you feel perpetually guilty, and gives you no possible penance, whereas this redemption doesn't have you doing psuedo evil acts in the name of an all powerful authority just for the will of the gods.

Cat didn't just tell her she was wrong and make her feel that way forever. She made her understand why she was wrong. She figured out how to feel bad for it on her own. And there may be no forgiveness for her war crimes (which aren't yet invented) but she can in fact be led to do universal good acts by her conscience. Not just "Good" acts.

Shveiran

Look, I'm...

...like, really uncomfortable defending what has come to be known as the mind-rape angels.

And I'm not, not really.

It's just...

... we only saw William. I'm not defending the mind-rape thing, I'm just saying that there is not that much difference between what they did to William and what Cat tried to do to Akua, when you factor in that one was done through mortal means and the other through the mind-shattering visions that seem to be the signature move of Choir considering Hanno and Tariq went through something similar).

Akua and William were showed that they did something awful and that there was really no evening those scales; once you step low enough, it doesn't really matter what else you do when it comes to being "absolved".

Even if people can easily agree that your birth has been an objective improvement on the world because you solved world hunger, that doesn't excuse whatever else you did because that's not how morality works, how good works.

If you save ten orphans, you are not excused for having killed one, because this is not about the sum total of orphans in the world but rather about having crossed a line that can't really be uncrossed. You are still a child murderer, you just became a saviour too.

Repent, you won't be forgiven.

What I think the Choir teaches, whatever fuck-ed up thing William ended up doing with their blessing, is that redemption is not about balancing the scales or erasing the slate. It's just about doing as much good as you can forever because you have done bad before and you are disgusted by what you did. And that can drive a fire under you, make it so that you can't ever really rest underneath the great oak saying "yes, I've done enough".

Not because something forces you, but because you feel it needs to be done.

And... I really don't see much difference in teachings, between what was taught to Akua and what was taught to William.

kinghaart

Actually in some ways William was more into Redemption than Akua – he thought a crusade would redeem him (that was probably a lie from the Choirs, but he believed it). Akua doesn't think there's any path out of where she is, at least not yet.

edrey

a scorpioncat who fient dead, i would call her catherine.
Viv and Eudokia, two spymistress come to play and both are sad stories.

and that old and trusted tactic, never fail to surprise. treason

i predict that Akua will end as a teacher of cardinal and Cat would call the Hierarch to blast the tower with the seraphin. like the trick of the bard in the arsenal, the empress, the tower and judgment. a very good pattern to end the bard

kinghaart

Agreed on the first half but Angel's explicitly won't work on Bard, she can influence them.

I think she wants to use the Ealamel to kill Cat specifically, and maybe not even anyone else.

letouriste

I like that scorpioncat. A lot.

This chapter was surprisingly sweet, i was grinning while most of it.

I'm willing to bet cat will be betrayed three times (one being from Hakram, one she is expecting RN and one being the Bard knife)

ninegardens

I think she'll also be thwarted by Maddie.

Not sure if counts as betrayal, since he never promised loyalty and he will not allow his best friend to be killed... but he will oppose her.

Poisson

Gosh those sheets really calling for some fanart. Chested stickfigure Malicia and Akua on fire in particular.

Also I love how, in retrospect, Hakram took a leaf from his former warlord's book – the way he dealt with the Clans by figuring out the underlying stories, that was so Cat-like.

ninegardens

Okay, so here's a wild one:

What if they put Scribe as Dread Empress.

Taking that role would be the ultimate service to Amadeus (watching over the reformations he desires). She'd actually be pretty good at it (okay, she is MORE chancellor, but still), and... she's an evil enough person to be effective, while not being so destructive.

Of all the people they have available, Scribe is actually the MOST qualified to act as caretaker of the tower.
Dread Empress Anonymous.

Daltos

I actually really like this theory a lot. And she's already a crazy good administrator, just scale up an intelligence network with a nation, considering what praes is that's basically all the important bits covered

jamesc9

So it's going to be a panoptic hell-hole, but that's probably better than being magically murderous and intermittently panoptic.

dadycoool

"Hi, my name's Eukodia, and I'm a Dread Empress."

sengachi

I mean I still think Amadeus is going to burn the Tower to the ground. But I can easily see Scribe managing Praes afterward. Or at the very least, standing in the shadow of whoever is ostensibly in charge pulling the strings.

billstewartmt

I've been wondering what Scribe was hiding. Could be that, or somebody else's suggestion that Scribe is helping Maddie's plans to destroy the Tower, or, what?

ninegardens

Current interpretation is that Scribe figured out Maddie's goal (to save Alaya), and decided not to tell Cat, as that would bring Cat and Amadeus directly into conflict.

The thing that I'm unsure of here is whether or not Cat already knows. Like... if she knows Amadeus at all, she should realize he will protect his family... there's never a thought in her head that indicates either knowledge or ignorance of this fact though, which... honestly feels like a bit of evasion on EE's part: clearly Black's reaction to Cat's attempts to kill his last friend are something she SHOULD be thinking about.

Abrakadabra

I like that, but in reality it is always the most inept who gets the power.

kinghaart

I think the Name has to change.

Dread Administrator Eudokia, First of her Ledger.

Reader in The Night

Completely out of left field, but I was in the quotes section of the TV Tropes page, and I came across this:

"Who reigns up high?
A dead man's sigh

What sleeps below?
A crown of woe
That is the Tower:
Learn and cower."

—Extract from 'And So I Dreamt I Was Awake', Sherehazad the Seer

A crown of woe sleeping below the Tower, written by Sherehazad the Seer? Is that foreshadowing for when the Tower comes down, maybe?

kinghaart

Dead King takes the crown offered by the Woe and is trapped "asleep" below the Tower? Akua ends up as Dread Empress and Amadeus dies (her rule is his reason for sighing)?

Isaac Martinez

I'll like to take my time to admire how we arrived at this point. Catherine learning that losing is the best option in the Everdark. When she decided who was her successor. When she chose to keep Scribe alive.

Linnus42

I think Black wanting to save Malicia is kinda obvious. Love is the greatest power kinda expect it from a story master. Though it does seem the Woe are all kinda going they are separate ways. I think EE said we see all them together once more when the story started but Ater might just be there last ride as any sort of group really.

Funny enough I think Cat is misreading Akua massively again. She is right in that Akua doesn't want to be dread empress though she probably take it if she had to after all some sacrifice goes with redemption or we could get a new Name title. But I don't think reforms and reclamation are mutually exclusive in the way she is making it out. I don't think you have to kill all the nobles to be a reformer. Certainly Cat doesn't seem to apply that logic to other regions nor does anyone else...u don't see Hakram killing all the Rival Clan leaders to reform the Orcs quite the opposite really. Basilia is also not trying that in the Free Cities so I think that it Cat anti-noble bias coming through (I can relate in the real world) but I don't think it applies to this story. Killing the Nobles or Not should not be the sole defining factor between reform and not. We very much see Akua wants to plot a better path and beyond that I argue gutting the traditional leadership tends not to be good during Wars and for Cultures. Beyond that the funny part is Akua doesn't need Cat's help to have high Noble or Legion support she has already done it herself.

ninegardens

I think its more... Maddie's form of "Reform" starts with destruction (according to Cat). Reform can be done without it, but the particular Reform she expects from Amadeus is incompatible with Akua's world view (and potentially incompatible with "Akua survives")

Shveiran

It's not about murder.

Akua is about trying to change the High Seats, which is where historically the power in Praes has been, and making of them something that takes charge of their responsibilities and actually makes Praes better.

Amadeus wants to destroy the High Seats and every other institution in Praes that he sees as beyond saving, and see something new, centralized and capable to work put in their place.

She is about trying to fix the old mould, he is about getting rid of it and buying a new one.

Juff

Typo Thread:

practice efficiency > practiced efficiency concept s broad > concept as broad suspected to more > suspected to be more the east > the East (when used as a name, it has to be capitalised)
If it everything > If everything so had to climb > so hard to climb like them for them > like that for them here, he > here; he marshals' > marshal's
I'd be near > it'd be near function Dread Empire > functional Dread Empire aside from now > aside for now

Sugar Roll

Catherine's blind spot for his father is on full display on this chapter. Scribe sees it but didn't tell her. Amadeus wants Dread Empress Victorious on the throne. It's funny how she fails to see it given the fact it's her who gave him the idea with their talk with Tariq.

As it happens, each measure Catherine takes to make it viable for Amadeus to sit on the throne also makes it viable for her to sit on it herself.

Looks like Amadeus will go on a noble killing spree—probably by goblinfire. It would leave the army of Callow (and the clans) virtually unopposed to take control of the rest empire.

ninegardens

My bet is that Maddie wants to destroy the tower itself, not just the Noble's.

The Nobles he hates, looks down on etc.

... The Tower took his friend from him. The Name of dread Empress is his enemy, and in order to get back his friend, he will snuff it out.

And the only way to do that, is for the tower to not only fall, but be annihilated. The Throne destroyed. The Vault's cleansed. The Tower took Alaya from him to the Serilago, and even after she was "freed", she was still prisoner to the Name.

The Name must be destroyed.

CGundlach

I'd even argue it is most important that the Throne is (verifiably) destroyed. The Tower has been toppled several times, but as the Story goes the Throne survived every time (although IIRC in one of the Black Knight & Alaya interludes Amadeus doubts that it is actually true, but Story trumps over truth). Thus destroying the Throne seems more important than destroying the Tower.

Even setting the Tower on fire might conflict the Story of goblinfire's ability to destroy everything versus the Throne's Story of always surviving the Tower, and I think the Throne would win that one, either by actually being spared or by someone restoring it in time and claiming it was spared. Specifically setting fire to the Throne could counter that; would probably also burn down the Tower, but then the Story changes from "burnt down the Tower" to "melted the Throne, then the Tower fell".

Shveiran

But you don't destroy a Name with goblinfire. You destroy a Name by putting a more alluring story in its place.

And Maddie knows it, so I'm rather curious to see what he is cooking up.

308924810a

"The real one, not the one I'd cut up into small companies and spent across a dozen foreign fields."

Huh, we finally get some mention of what the heck happened to the Praesi soldiers from second Liesse who were reformed into the second Gallowborne. I was worried that the author had forgotten about them.

Shveiran

I think it was mentioned a few times before, it's just that it was never really relevant to the chapter and therefore easy to miss.

Chapter 24: Bequeathal

"And so, her tribe burned around her, Matron Creaker stood in the ashes and spoke thus: 'Do you now think me cowed, Nihilis? I would have burned them myself, to be rid of you.'"

– Extract from Volume VI of the Official Imperial Chronicles

I had goblin troubles.

A third of them I saw coming, in that the Confederation of Grey Eyries had been bound to come scratching at my door so I might win them some concessions at the peace table after Ater fell. They had good reason to think I'd back them when it came down to it. Callow had played a role in the creation of the Confederation from the start: the Matrons had begun sounding me out for support as soon as it came out in the open that Malicia were at odds, even if it'd not come to anything for years. It had been under Vivienne's regency and with Hakram's backing that Callow had funnelled the Tribes coin and steel so they might arm themselves for a successful rebellion, then promptly recognize the newly founded nation. I'd maintained the policy since.

We'd not done it for free, of course. After the Night of Knives, weakening Malica without outright starting a war had been one of the leading goals of the Kingdom of Callow and accomplishing it like this had probably been the greatest diplomatic coup of my reign. The more immediate payoff, though, had been stocks of goods that only the Tribes could provide: goblin steel and munitions. The latter, in particular, had been necessary since the Army of Callow was still largely patterned on the Legions of Terror and their doctrine employed goblin munitions. The coin and steel we'd sent them had not been gifts, they'd been loans: the crown of Callow was to be repaid in goods.

It'd worked out more than decently, at first. The rebellion had taken the Tower by surprise and seized Foramen, taking control the imperial forges there and massacring the Banu – the noble line that'd ruled the High Seat. But then Malicia had gotten her affairs in order and sent Marshal Nim south with several legions, penning in the goblins choking out the convoys of goods they'd been sending us. We'd felt the lack of those starkly during the campaigns out west. Though in a decent position and dug-in, the Confederation had then been betrayed from the inside: Matron Wither of the High Ridge tribe, Pickler's own mother, had allied with other tribes to take the city from the Confederation.

She'd done this so she could return to Malicia's banner as the High Lady of Foramen, not only the first goblin nobility recognized by the Tower but the first High Seat in the history of the empire not to be human.

The situation down south had been a rough stalemate since. High Lady Wither was dug in behind her heavily warded walls and her initial trouble of riots in the streets had tapered off – due in part to the grain I'd traded her in exchange for goblin munitions at Scribe's suggestion – but she couldn't really venture far outside the city. The Confederation outnumbered her ten to one and the Grey Eyries were a hell to assault even for goblins, on top of another High Seat now eyeing up Foramen. High Lady Takisha had been considering reclaiming the city, it was said, to install a cadet branch of the Muraqib at its head. The Confederation was no better off, though.

The Tribes just didn't have the kind of army that'd be needed to take a High Seat in any way except the brutal surprise strike they'd first taken Foramen through. So instead they'd gone raiding into the hinterlands of Foramen until those were turned into a barren wasteland where no one lived, then settled into a sullen stalemate with High Lady Wither. There were frequent skirmishes over convoys and caravans headed to the city, but neither side was really in a position to score a decisive blow on the other and it'd shown.

Given that the Confederation of the Grey Eyries had been perhaps not an ally but certainly a partner to Callow since its founding, it was a given that they'd reach out to me now that matters were coming to a head in Ater. It wasn't like the Praesi were going to offer them a seat at the table, and the Matrons were canny old witches besides: from where they stood, the political considerations that'd led Vivienne to back their rebellion had not changed. It was still in Callow's interests to weaken Praes and I still needed their goods for my armies, so when I received the Confederations' delegation their leader spoke boldly after I got her into my tent.

"We would like for Foramen to be returned to the Confederation in the final settlement," Matron Braider said. "Preferably along with Wither's head in a box."

Braider was young, my matron standards, which meant she was mostly wrinkled instead of entirely. Her eyes were a sharp orange and unblinking, her needle-like teeth tinted blue from the strange paste she kept chewing. Vivienne, seated by me, looked unimpressed.

"The Confederation has not contributed to this war," she said, "save through irregular trade. You ask a high price for goods already paid for."

"We don't expect you to do it for free," Matron Braider said. "I've been empowered by the Council of Matrons to offer terms. I believe you'll find supporting us worthwhile."

The terms she outlined afterwards were, to be honest, pretty tempting. Treaty obligation to provide a certain amount of munitions and goblin steel at a set price every year, right of recruitment in the Eyries for the Army of Callow, a mutual defence pact against Praes and a fixed take of the Confederation's tax income pledged to building Cardinal until the city was deemed finished by a committee of Grand Alliance members. Vivienne wasn't anywhere as tempted, but it was pretty obvious that it'd wasn't her they'd tailored that offer for. Braider stayed long enough to answer questions and specify details before taking her leave, leaving me alone with my successor.

"The mutual defence pact isn't a real concession," Vivienne immediately said. "If they get Foramen they need one with us else they risk losing the city to Praes the moment it's no longer riven by civil war."

"So we milk them for something else," I shrugged. "Force them to never sell more munitions to Praes than they sell us, maybe, or exempt Callowan merchants from some tariffs."

After the wars, if the goblins held Foramen it would become the gateway to the Grey Eyries and all the ores in the mountains. Callow did not usually need to import steel or silver, but we did have a chronic lack of gold mines on top of a few other useful metals we had to get through Mercantis. Foramen would have great need of grain, given its poor lands and newfound hostility with most of Praes, so my subjects stood to make great profits there. Vivienne eyed me with some surprise.

"You're really willing to make this bargain?" she asked.

"I'm willing to entertain it," I corrected. "I'm not going to risk the peace I'm after for the fucking Matrons, Vivienne, but they're good terms. If I have an opportunity I might as well take it."

"I imagine whoever takes the Tower will have some issues with losing one of the empire's largest cities," the Princess pointed out.

"That'll depend on the strength of their bargaining position, I imagine," I said. "I'm not going to cram this deal down your throat, Viv – the defence pact would stay your problem long after I abdicate, for one – but we should at least seriously consider it."

The second third of my goblin problems, though, I expected a great deal less. Within hours of Matron Braider being settled in a corner of our camp, one of the phalanges interrupted me halfway through supper. Our scouts had caught someone claiming to be an envoy and brought them into the camp quietly, but they refused to talk to anyone save me. I went with a chicken leg still in hand, gnawing at the meat even as I sat down across from a young goblin. Thirteen, fourteen at most. A woman, but that was only to be expected if she was an envoy. Couldn't think of a lot of Matrons that'd entrust anything of importance to a mere male.

I glanced at the legionary behind her and nodded. The cloth over her head was ripped off, leaving a slightly dazed goblin of pale green skin with a frame large enough there was no doubt she was of a Matron line. I let her dark yellow eyes come back into a focus as I tore off all little more chicken. It was unpatriotic of me to admit it, but Praesi poultry was better than my own people's. Probably because of some terrible blood magic a few hundred years ago, but you couldn't argue with that tender flesh.

"So who would you be?" I asked.

"Trudger," she replied. "And you're the Black Queen."

"That I am," I replied, taking another bite. "What brings you to my camp, Trudger?"

"I have been sent as an envoy by my mother, High Lady Wither," she said.

I blinked in surprise. Wait, this was Pickler's sister? I didn't even know – no, of course she had sisters. Most Matrons had a dozen children, so that the weak seeds might be weeded out. It didn't really mean the same thing for them it would for humans. Few of them would have the same father, not that fatherhood was concept goblins put any stock in. Most of their kind would have found it obscene for a male to have a role in the raising of children, even if he'd sired the child in question.

"Pickler's never mentioned you," I noted.

"She wouldn't, the bitch," Trudger flatly said. "Why Mother is so fond of her when she took the first opportunity to flee is beyond me, but we're not here to speak of thin blood. You were approached by the Council of Matrons, yes?"

Not much meat left on the leg, but I bit it off and swallowed.

"I'm always talking the Confederation," I said. "We're friendly enough."

"They'll have come begging for you to give them Foramen," Trudger smiled. "I am here to deliver the better offer."

I cocked an eyebrow at her.

"Had a little talk with your mother not two days ago," I said. "She didn't seem so eager to bargain then. What's changed?"

"Malicia's cause is dying," Trudger frankly said. "The Warlock has been popular with the refugees for some time, but since the riots were drowned in blood many Aterans balk at supporting the empress. If she loses the capital, she has nothing left."

"Which has me curious why you're talking to me instead of Akua Sahelian," I said.

Trudger smiled thinly.

"I imagine you think very little of us," she said. "My mother and the Matrons. That we're all the same to you, Wasteland highborn made small and green."

"That's a leap on your part," I said.

But the first part, at least, was true. How could I think much of a pack of old women who spent a thousand Robbers like coppers at a fair every year? I couldn't fix everything in the world, I'd learned my limits, but there had been a time... I had not forgotten who I was clasping hands with, the nature of my 'friends'.

"We're hard, Black Queen, because the Eyries are a hard place," Trudger said. "Because the Dread Empire is a harder place still. But that doesn't mean we're blind."

Something burned in those yellow eyes that had me believing, for this moment at least, that she spoke from the heart.

"We know the difference between someone like the Carrion Lord and Abreha Mirembe," Trudger said. "You have known tyrants, Black Queen, but how often have your people been subject to them? We have, and that history is a thousand years of blood-curling screams. You want to know why we'd rather not deal with Akua Sahelian?"

Trudger bared pale, sharp teeth.

"You have proved you keep your word," the envoy said. "You proved, in Wolof, that you know restraint. And if we had half a chance, Black Queen, we'd kill every single Akua Sahelian in this fucking empire."

I hummed, dropping the chicken bones into a stretch of shadow. Zombie liked to break them. I leaned back into my seat, then nodded.

"All right," I said. "Let's say you have me convinced you're dealing in good faith. What does your mother want, and what does she offer?"

"We want to keep Foramen," Trudger said, "and we want peace."

It was a little more complicated than that, in practice. High Lady Wither intended on staying part of the Dread Empire of Praes and sitting on her High Seat, she just wanted me to make her problems go away. To broker a peace between her and the Confederation and to extract guarantees from the Tower she wouldn't be put down the moment the Dread Empire was no longer preoccupied with civil war. I was on the fence as to whether these was harder to get done than what the Matrons had asked me: ceding territory was one thing, but Wither was asking me to end a goblin blood feud and meddle in the Tower's authority over its own affairs. I pointed out the latter, but Trudger pointed out in reply that I'd already promised Abreha Mirembe to guarantee her title until the war on Keter was over so evidently I was willing to meddle. Which, much as I disliked admitting it, was a fair point.

"All right," I said. "I know what you want. What makes it worth my while?"

If the Confederations' offer had been tailored for me, then this one was tailored for Vivienne. Oh, Wither threw me a sop early on in the form of guaranteeing her High Seat would never interrupt the sale of munitions to Callow and would itself sell us goblin steel from the forges, but the rest was very much up her alley. A treaty guaranteeing Foramen would never send provide troops to make war on Callow so long as Wither's line ruled it, goblin and Taghreb blacksmiths provided to help setting up royal forges in Callow and a secret treaty supporting Jacks operations in the Hungering Sands. The deal was arguably less risky than backing the annexation of a major Praesi city, too, which would appeal to Vivienne.

The last thing she wanted after the last decade was for Callow to be dragged into more wars.

I didn't give Trudger an answer, nor did she expect me to. Neither did I release her back to her mother, instead stashing her away in my camp as far away as the delegation from the Confederation as I could. I asked Masego to set up wards to keep everyone out of her tent and tripled the guard around her, too, which was bound to be noticed by spies in my camp but couldn't be helped. The last thing I needed was for Matron Braider or her cohorts to find out Wither's daughter was my 'guest'. I stopped by the stables to toss Zombie a few bones, which she crunched with relish, but when I returned to my tent to take care of my correspondence and read through reports I found someone waiting for me.

The last third of my goblin troubles I would not have seen coming in a hundred years, because Pickler had never before shown so much as an iota of interest in the fate of her people.

"Should I even ask how you know?" I said, limping open to my liquor cabinet and taking out a bottle of pear brandy.

I didn't like the taste much, too sweet, but now and then I enjoyed having a drink of it. It was a way to remember a man I'd respected and detested but who'd died the same way he'd lived: trying to save others.

"I got it out of Masego," Pickler said. "It was only a guess, but Mother was certain to send someone after the Matrons did."

I gestured towards the brandy, and to my surprise she nodded. I poured her a cup as well before dropping down in my favourite seat. My Sapper-General drank of her brandy, letting out a happy noise at the taste.

"Better than what you usually drink," she said.

"An acquired taste," I said, speaking as much of the man as the liquor.

Pickler didn't bother to ply me with small talk, which I appreciated. It would have been horrifying unlike her, and honestly made me lose some respect for her character.

"What did they want?" Pickler asked.

"The Matrons want Foramen back," I said. "Your mother wants to keep Foramen. The rest is gilding."

She laughed, but it was a barren sound. Without mirth.

"Of course it's about Foramen," she said. "Why would they care about anything but the prize?"

I sipped at my drink, swallowing quick to the sweetness would not linger.

"She sent your sister Trudger," I said.

"Our youngest," Pickler said, sounding surprised. "She must have killed either Salter or Folder to be trusted with this."

A pause.

"Didn't think she had it in her."

"She didn't think much of you either," I noted. "Not exactly close, I take it?"

"I spared Salter when I had her on the ropes," she replied. "She took that personally since the two are enemies – they were raised by matron-attendants that hate each other."

"You never told me how you left the Eyries," I said.

She drank deep, then set down the empty cup with a sigh. She cocked her head at me and I gallantly filled it up again.

"In age, I was the fourth out of nine," Pickler said, then grimaced. "It's not that age matters, Catherine – we don't pick leaders for it – but it lets you make allies for longer. It's an advantage. I was one of those raised by my mother, since two of my elder sisters had already been given to matron-attendants. She was..."

A moment of hesitation.

"She was proud that I was good at things," she said. "Saw I had a talent with forces and maths, got three retired sappers to teach me. But she also wanted me to be other things, things I couldn't be."

"So you left," I said.

"The College was a way out," Pickler said. "They all wanted me to go, my sisters, because I'd have no allies even if I returned. Mother thought differently, said that there was worth in learning there and the allies that could be made. But I wasn't one of the greenskin slots for the College, Catherine. My tribe paid so I wouldn't be sworn to service. I was supposed to come back afterwards."

"I'm glad you didn't," I said.

"So am I," she snorted. "Gobbler, leaving the Legions to go back? Madness. Mother figured out I wouldn't during my second year, when I stopped answering her letters, but she couldn't stop paying without losing face. She tried to get people to pressure me, but that's how I got to know Nauk. He thought I was getting picked on by other companies so he brawled through three of them and the mages they'd bribed to help."

They'd been in the same company for two years at that point, I thought, but I wasn't surprised they hadn't known each other well. There were a hundred people in every company and it was common practice for fresher recruits to be spread out so no tenth would ever be too green.

"He was a romantic," I smiled. "As much as an orc can be."

"He was good," Pickler quietly said, "in a way that few of us are. I still grieve that. I'm glad you spoke for him at Sarcella, Catherine. I just wish we'd let him rest years earlier instead of dragging him back as that... thing."

I grimaced but did not disagree. Wekesa the Warlock had done what he could, but Summer flame wielded by one of its great nobles was no petty thing. There had not been much left of him to salvage.

"I thought it could be fixed," I said. "I thought a lot of things could be fixed, back in those days."

"Some still can be."

I leaned back into my seat, sipping at the last of my drink.

"I can't answer unless you ask, Pickler," I said.

She shook with something that might have been laughter, had there been amusement in it.

"I don't have anything to offer you, Catherine," she said. "I am not a High Lady or the Council of Matrons. The gold I have you have paid me, and my allies are your allies. I couldn't threaten to leave if refused even if I wanted to – where I would I go? The Army of Callow is my home."

"It doesn't always have to be hard coin and favours, Pickler," I quietly told her. "We can talk."

"Talk doesn't move the needle with you," Pickler said, and before I could reply raised her hand. "It's not scorn I speak. You are a queen, Catherine. You cannot act like other women."

"And yet," I said, "I'd like to hear you out anyway."

She drank of her cup, squared her shoulders.

"They're plagues," Pickler of the High Ride tribe said. "Both of them. The Matrons just want a hidden kingdom in the mountains with Foramen as a trade city and no imperial leash. The shit they'll get up to in the Eyries, Catherine, would make a devil shiver."

"The way I hear it, it's already no handful of roses," I said.

"You don't get let in on the real secrets unless you're a Matron," Pickler said, "but I... know things. The Tribes hold back on projects out of fear the Empire will notice and intervene. Wipe them out, even. Even now there's a lot of Matrons who think munitions should never have been revealed. And the Council is made up of monsters, but my mother's worse."

"She likes knives and backs," I conceded.

"She's a Matron," Pickler shrugged, as if that settled it. "But she thinks differently, Catherine. She wants to be the queen of our kind or ensure one of her daughters will be. It's why she wants Foramen: it's the lifeline of the Tribes. The ways my people are rich, ore and goods, they're not worth anything if they can't be sold to someone. So long as she has Foramen, she has them in the palm of her hand. And to get her way she wouldn't mind starving half our people to death from behind the walls of her city."

"I deal with terrible people all the time," I admitted. "I even backed Helike to prominence in the Free Cities because it'd put down Malicia's allies."

"They are tyrants, Catherine," Pickler said. "Leeches who drink the lifeblood of goblinkind to maintain their power and influence. And I know it is not like me to speak of them, of all they do, but I..."

She swallowed.

"I owe it," she said. "To him. Because he was right, when you spoke to us in Marchford. When I balked at your banner rising against the Tower."

Pickler met my eyes, the pale yellow unblinking.

"They kill us for sport."

She bared her teeth.

"Robber spoke true when he said they've gotten soft," Pickler said. "Look at them, darkening your doorsteps with deals they would have once sneered at. They've spent so many of us they can't even get their own dirty work done anymore. They ate each other's tails until there was nothing left but open maws and anger."

"I can't topple them, Pickler," I said. "Not without a war I can't afford to fight."

"You don't need to," my Sapper-General said. "They did it to themselves. Do you think my people are happy they're being used like this? The Matrons, my mother, they only own us so long as there's nowhere else to go. And that's something you can change."

I blinked at her in surprise.

"You allowed the Snake Eater tribe into Callow," Pickler said. "Let more in. Let us build without Matrons to hollow us out, without Preservers to open our throats the moment we reveal of ourselves. And they will come, I promise you that. Already the Legions and the Army are a home to flee to, but if you open Callow? Entire tribes will leave their tyrant behind."

"If I grant lands to tribes, I'll have a rebellion on my hand," I frankly told her.

"Don't," Pickler fervently said. "Don't let us forge another closed kingdom within the kingdom. Let us into your cities, your countryside, your wilderness. Let us be part of something that does not want to eat us."

I flinched away from the intensity of her gaze.

"They'll hate you for it, the Matrons," she said. "For showing them they don't own what it means to be a goblin, that just buried every other way and called it guidance. And I know it's not what you want, not what Vivienne wants, that you have to think in kingdoms and favours and hard coin."

She finished her drink, set it down.

"But we've stood behind you, Catherine," Pickler said. "Not them, us. From the start, we've been with you. Sappers and soldiers and scouts, we've bled for you. And I won't say it's owed, because my people don't believe in debt, but I need you to understand that I loved Robber – more than I thought, more than I knew – but there are fifty thousand like him the Eyries that never managed to flee. That are stuck and lost and will never see the light of day, know what the sun and the stars look like or even feel the wind on their face. Not unless you offer your hand to them."

She left her chair, stood before me.

"I don't have anything to offer you," she said. "Nothing to bargain with. All I can say is please-"

I pushed back my chair, half-risen even as my leg ached, but I was not quick enough to stop her getting on her knees.

"- help us," Pickler said. "Save us from ourselves, from each other."

"I-" I choked out, at a loss for words.

"I think you might just be the only powerful person in the world who cares, Catherine," she quietly said. "And I know you're a queen, that you can't afford to bend, but still I ask."

She smiled, heartbreakingly.

"Please," Pickler asked. "If not you, then who?"

I closed my eyes, almost short of breath. The stars were there, out in the black, but they felt... distant. Fading.

I had goblin troubles.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Isaac Martinez

For each live that has been lost in this war, there is a not crying and probably ugly goblin that needs a hug. With your help, everytime you VOTE, a goblin gains a barrel of goblin fire.

Think about goblins.

Liliet

ok this one is fantastic

Yunamed

You have to admit, some are good.

Víctor

Really nice this one. Apadrina un goblin del tercer regimiento

Ajay

I think her Name is going to be something like lord of names or something which is anti bard. If bard deals with names, catherine rules over them. This is proved by hakram getting a name so on

Miles

I thought that too at first, but then I realized the people closest to her would all agree her most likely name is "Brawling Tavern Wench"

Miles

Idrani would be the one to say it, or maybe Vivian if she was in a mischievous mood, and the rest would go along with it.

Dsylexic Wofl

It cant be anti bard. Catherine throwed away that chance back at the Twilight Ways. Her names seems to be going ti be Warden of the East or something close to it, but now that she is considering Pickler's offer, doubting her way, the role is working against her

kinghaart

I think Warden is a trap.

The reality is that deep down Cat wants peace and freedom for the average sentient being, so if anything it's times like this which remind her that she isn't really just about earboxing diplomacy but actually about standing up for others.

Liliet

Holy shit.

Best payoff OR best payoff?

Sinead

Pickler is the best sapper. She may have just launched the stone that breaks the Eyries.

Using the Amadeus proven tactic of throw a pissed off Cat at the problem.

At this point, with Cat having fingers in all the sparks of cultural revolution (which probably actually what breaks/starts an Age in narrative terms), she just sends Keagan a letter saying 'Just leave if you want.'

runifyoucan94

Fading stars... what does that means? She losing her name or what?

aurikdomi

But possibly losing the name or changing the name the WB was setting her up for, to become something else.

DC

A Warden keeps things out or keeps them in. What Pickler is proposing is very much the exact opposite of that.

Miles

It means she spent the whole night awake & didn't get a wink of sleep.

I don't think there's anything more symbolic than that other than maybe the fact it's a name power Hakram used to use to help her and now she has to do it herself.

WuseMajor

I think this was Bard somehow. This and Cat's other recent diplomatic mistake. Somehow, this was triggered to get Cat focused on the government and lands, instead of the Named and the Story of the Land, so her name is changing.

Very clever trick if so, but likely to bite someone in the ass eventually, since I don't think Cat can say no to Pickler about this and freeing all the people from Goblin North Korea is going to change things significantly.

Of course, I guess Bard doesn't think it's going to matter, given that she's going to see this continent wiped clean and broken soon.

DC

I kinda feel the opposite; the long-concealed sentiment of a single non-Named person doesn't sound much like what the Bard traditionally works with. To me it has more the feel of an angle that her modus operandi specifically makes her blind to.

tentativeidler

This is how I feel as well. I'm waiting for the Bard to try to change Cat's Name, and Cat goes "What Name?"

wowowiwa

I would argue that the "stars" are part of Wandering Bards Name for Cat. WB also probably sees Named as something (maybe stars) and can Wander to them based on that. Pluss I don't see how agreeing to Pickler's dream can possibly play into Wandering Bard's hands. The stars fading is jelly good even if Cat doesn't know that

therealgridlock

I've been assuming that the stars are names, and that this is on purpose as part of her new name, other commenters have brought up malfeasance as to whether or not this is WB interference one way or the other,

But I think it signifies something different.

Cat was almost on the cusp of her name, almost done with all the governments she had to topple to gather a final army to shatter the final enemy.

Being given an absolute heart wrenching plot hook and realizing there's an entire other people to save too?

The stars fading means she's moving away from her name, because she just now realized she has more concerns to deal with before it can happen. The name got pushed further back by the pressing realities of freeing an entire enslaved people.

I don't think it's a good or bad thing, I think it's just a pragmatic thing, they'll still be there after cat engages in this very personal struggle to save a nation of misspent youths.

Someperson

Catherine coming into a Name other than Squire has been very long overdue, and I do not think her Name has taken nearly a rigid enough shape yet that it could easily be lost by failing to meet the expectations of a particular Role.

Not lost, but changed. This has all of the markings of a pivot, one that will very likely shape the focus of the Name that Catherine comes in to. Before now it seemed heavily foreshadowed that her Name would be Warden of the East. Time will tell if that is still the Name she is headed towards.

Certainly, if there were going to be an aspect of the pivot that Bard was unable to predict, it would probably be Pickler. Fingers crossed, yeah?

Sinead

And so...

Will the call of the wind soon resound through the depth of the Eyrie?

Pete Kay

Am I the only that ugly cries Everytime I remember Robber hearing the wind?

M0och123

No. No you are not.

Cpt. Obvious

Why did you have to say that?

What? Why are you looking at me like that?

No, I'm not crying. It's just onions. I chopped onions and...

I'm NOT crying, OK?

Sir Nil

Given what we know about the 'Goblin Rebellion', there is in the end, only two deals. The one that benefits the Matrons or the one Pickler is asking for.

Sir Nil

I feel like this is setting up for an 'out' of Bard's hidden knife to turn Cat into a certain type of Name. We know Bard works through Names, and without confirmation of Goblin Names we could assume that the goblin troubles are acting completely out of Bard's control. At the very least, Pickler's option would not be Bard influenced. So Cat has the option of doing something completely out of the Bard's control or even expectation.

I also don't believe in the 'Warden of the East' thing, Cat is moving towards a role with authority over Names, and while she is the protector of Callow and plenty in that realm, along with having future ambitions for the region, her actual proto-name powers are moving towards authority and knowledge over named, which I don't believe would overlap well or completely with being a Name similar to what Hasenbach was going to get. So I don't think Bard really wants to nudge Cat into the Warden of the East, I feel like that's a lie because Cat is already riding the wave of becoming a Named with authority over other names. Bard wouldn't stop the arrow already in flight, she would nudge the target so that it would hit something adjacent but not as dangerous.

LInnus42

Yeah i think Bard is trying to tie Cat down with a more local name with a lesser portfolio. Cat was well on her way to being Warden of the East from what we can see with power over Name. Bard is trying to shift Cat towards having Power in Praes and/or Callow alone thereby weakening her power.

As for the Goblins I don't really see them as uniquely evil in this storyline. As Cat noted with Helike they were mass sacrificing civilians to float towers.

Shveiran

Well, hold on a minute. Let's not mistake the thumb for the fingers.

KAIROS was sacrificing civilians to make floating towers. Now, sure: he was the Tyrant of Helike and all those soldiers were happily going along with it. I don't think Pallas or Basilia or many of the others saw it as a problem. But sacrificing people wasn't and isn't a staple of Helikean culture; Helike is also the place from which the squeaky clean Dorian came from, and Dorian had a HUGE following. And the Royal Conjuror described shadow wars and devils in his years at court but nothing like a culling of the other branches or mass sacrifices. Those large scale, capital-e Evils are things that periodically happen in Helike, but Helike only rarely gets a Tyrant (remember the "gods spin a coin, you get a Tyrant when it lands on the edge" thing?).

Meanwhile, for goblins?

For the goblins this is business as usual. It's not a bout of madness, is that this is how the Matrons have always handled things.

Don't get me wrong, Kairos was a fucking monster. But one is a constant state of being, the other an occasional occurrence.

Miles

None of her abilities ever pointed to warden of the east. She never kept anyone prisoner in any story/role capacity, her idea of protecting anything is by attacking something else which is all kinds of the opposite of "warding", and besides all that she has no ties whatsoever to the east besides Amadeus, and he's trying to tear it all down.

Link Ness Monster

It's easy to make that argument if you limit your definition of "warden."

Look up the Warden of the Marches. Historically, they were responsible for securing the border between England and Scotland and upholding the terms of the truce between those countries.

How does that not seem like Cat?

Miles

Huh. This might actually make sense for the “warden” half of it. It’s an interesting perspective.

We still have the issue that Cat has no obligation to protect or raid on behalf of the east (Praes).

Another issue is that none of those wardens could have told the king/queen to shut up without losing their heads for it, much less expecting to be obeyed. This sort of Warden sounds more like unsupervised middle management than Cat.

Link Ness Monster

I think it’s meant to be role where she protects everyone else FROM the crazy stuff that comes out of the East. Tamping down on the worst instincts of Evil is what she’s all about, what the terms are all about.

kinghaart

Problem is, as Bard said, a Name like that helps for a generation but doesn’t change the pattern itself.

Shveiran

Did Hanno or Cordelia ever went around rattling chains?

Xi Cree

I feel like the ‘Warden of the East’ Name is actually the trap that the Bard is trying to force her into.

The Name that Cat is forging likely goes deeper and doesn’t have the baggage the Warden name would.

But it travels a similar groove in fate... and thus the Warden makes for an easy pivot point to send Cat down if she isn’t careful.

Sir Nil

Interesting, though your theory does come with the assumption that the proto name Cat has right now isn’t already the result of bard meddling.

Shaerick 68

Warden in the East has always been far too narrow of a name for what Cat is.

Mental Mouse

Possibly taking on the Goblins weakens the Name because they're not Named... so that's mission drift.

Isaac Martinez

Meh, the stars were just a bother anyway. Didn't let her close her eyes in peace. The Power and Name is not that important, the Role is what counts.

Stormblessed

Unless they're outside and I missed it, if the stars are fading does that mean Catherine's proto name is fading slightly? Is this somehow the part of the Intercessor's plan?

Catherine's name seems to be about large scale settlements between high powers with a certain level of detachment from the situation (see: how situation with Procer developed over time). If she puts her finger to the scale for the goblins in this very personal way, could this help make her vulnerable enough for some Hidden Knife of the Intercessor's later?

amit27592

No, the stars are fading is a callback to Pilgrim's star from earlier in the chapter. I think for once, there is no Bard's game here as she works through Names and Matrons & Wither are not Named. This is just plain mundane Goblin troubles.

Sinead

Pretty sure the 'stars' are the various Names under her authority that she can see in her mind's eye. The stars fading is akin to how Malicia's Rule has faded.

Miles

Stars fade when it's dawn.

spencer

I'd been thinking her Name involved authority over other Named. But why would that fade just because she wants to help goblins? Maybe you're right that there's something about personal vs detached motives. I don't think we fully understand her burgeoning Name yet.

RoflCat

To my understanding, it's because that Name with the stars sight? That's the one Bard was secretly nudging her to, the Warden of the 'east'.

But with Pickler's plea, it's pushing her Name into a new direction.

Instead of just being a jailer punishing/keeping criminals in check, she's now being given the option to SAVE people from their doomed existence.

shikkarasu

It's the difference between East(Evil, Villains) and east(Praes, greenskins). In genuinely considering social upheaval and restructuring the east she is losing her connection to the East.

Killing/deposing Malicia counts for either, since she's a Villain(East) and also major player in Praes(east). Cat has also been very firm on "I'm not putting Dad on the throne, I'm taking Malicia off of it." She has not cared about the ruling of Praes(east), as long as it stops ruining the War on Keter and making her job as head of Villains(East) difficult.

Now that she is about to start breaking apart Goblin culture? She's meddling in the east, and not for objective, Practical ends. The other two offers were just part of the Campaign. Letting the Goblins leave Praes? That weakens Evil, since they will have the chance to develop Good in their culture, and it influences the balance of power in Praes for reasons other than her current goals.

It's not focused on the East(Evil, Villains), it's focused on the east(Praes, greenskins).

onedollargum

I figured it was more that she was getting tunnel vision from a panic attack.

SpeckofStardust

Is Pickler a possible Named or is cat possibly going to feel Goblin Named?

KageLupus

Goblins having Named is still unconfirmed, and even if they did Pickler hasn't really done any of the things you would expect from a Name. She is a damn fine sapper and engineer, and has a special love for creating new weapons of war, but that is hardly the stuff a Role is made out of.

Ironically, if any goblin was going to have a Name come out of their actions it should have been Robber. He threw himself into every crazy, dangerous plan he could for years and was known throughout the Army of Callow. If that was not enough to generate a Name then I can't imagine Pickler has done anything to deserve one.

Konstantin von Karstein

Names are tied to a culture. If a culture values secrecy above everything, its Names will reflect it. I think Robber was too « visible » for a goblin Name.

Brian

Would that be true for Hakram, though?

It seems being true to his culture required losing his name (albeit leading it instead of supporting a leader, but, his Name still seemed poorly aligned with what we see of the culture); and if he earned it based on his 'adopted' culture (the legions), why not Robber?

edrey

cat's name is in a crossroad, the warden of the east or the East, the people or the story, and hell Pickler just shot a good one there, at this point i want other Name. lets say just the warden, simple, because this is way too big of a problem. in practical terms, the goblins could help building cardinal too, a good start.

dadycool

Such interesting goblin troubles. I can't wait for it to all come to a head so all can be revealed and have the puzzle pieces and hints make sense.

Tenthyr

I... Very hope Pickler wasn't used by Bard to weaken Catherine's name.

ruduen

I do wonder if it's that or if it's the opposite. The bard is trying to make it, "The east that is land and armies and politics, all the things that pass..." And both the Matrons and Wither are offering things that are important from a political standpoint, policies that support the Kingdom. Pickler's offer is more abstract and less mired in what benefits can be obtained – it's the one that speaks about the people. It comes closer to ignoring the politics to do what's 'right', for lack of a better term.

Making a choice between the two main offers is likely falling into the Bard's plans. The third option is... Well, the third option in terms of the story. But, the Bard would know that better than anybody, so it's even if it's the best choice, it's hard to say that it's going to be the correct choice. It's going to be necessary to dig deeper than that.

Sinead

Considering where Cat started, Pickler's probably a solid reminder of 'where she's come from'. The Callowans would back here whatever way she (reasonably) goes here, and Indrani and Maseago do not care enough to serve as a means to give her that sort of a reminder (they would not see the need to).

Pickler (as one of the last few of Rat Company) would be one of the only people that can get through to Cat this way.

kinghaart

Yep just her for the Goblins and Hakram for the Orcs.

I wonder if Archer would plead for Ranger if somehow Cat bested and was going to kill her.

Anduriel

This is beautiful. Fuck

shikkarasu

I think Wither was contacted to make a counteroffer on the Empress' orders, which in turn were at the Bard's suggestion. Having to decide the fate of the Goblins is a trap, because Cat loves her gobbos like any other part of her army. They are family. Bard may not have known that Pickler would make this perfect request, but she knew that the Story of Catherine's Name would ensure that the temptation to meddle would present itself.

If only one faction had made an offer? Cat would milk them for all they are worth and then support them, since they are a counter against Malicia. It would never have become personal. I'm not even sure that Pickler would have made a move if she hadn't caught wind of a 2nd option.

Benjamin Huang

the intercessor is a crafty bastard. arbiters are impartial, are they not? 😊

kinghaart

When in this story has Cat EVER been impartial?

She does arbitrate at times, but she's definitely full of biases that overtly show.

Adrian V

And here i thought Robber was going to be the last Goblin to make me wanna cry, damn the feels Pickler showed were great.

Huh if Cat follows Pickler path i think she will avoid whatever fate Bard wants since it appears to run contrary to her current role/path, wich Bard is already scheming against. Could be sweet if her heart is what saves the day.

She is an agent of change and Pickler's request is 1 of the few we as readers know represent real change, the other 2 are the matron trying to play the game as always (remember what Black figured out and used to blackmail Wither with). She is at a crossroads and honestly she may actually gain a name that doesn't fit into good or bad. Like it will be good from a moral (or meta/reader) point but still have evil aspects or parts.

qfeys

"If not you, then who?"

I feel like this is a theme of the end of this story. First it was Hakram. Then, during Akua's chapter, I got the impression that she would also have to step up, not because she wants to, but because there is no one else who would be good enough. And now Catherin is asked.

I think that there will be more characters that have to step up before this is over. Not because they want to, but because "if not them, then who?"

Anonymous

Honestly, Vivienne should be fine. Catherine can just delegate this whole situation to her.

Linnus42

I mean its most outright stated in Hanno's Chapter lol.

That does seem to be the theme characters having to do stuff they don't want to do because someone has to. Though I don't think per se you need Cat to reform the Goblins, Cat could in theory punt that to Viv and whoever rules Praes probably Akua.

kinghaart

Yep strong Buberism here. Lots of Roles at play...

Hargabga

And then she turns herself into a Pickler, funniest shit I've ever seen.

ninegardens

Goblins are AMAZING at crafting tempting diplomatic deals. God, its surprising they didn't get Praes wrapped around their shrivled fingers centuries ago.

Pickler is great.

Also... this may be stupid but... can Cat just accept all the deals?

By which I mean, accept all the deals, figure out if Wither or the Confederations deal is easy to swing by the new Emperor/ess later... and then once that deal is signed, say "Oh, by the way, Goblins are welcome in Callow."

There's nothing in the confederations deal that STOPS her opening her doors.

sengachi

That's certainly a thought, but Catherine would need a way to ensure the Matrons don't turn on her. Words on paper mean nothing to them unless they benefit, after all. They're not going to meekly let Catherine take their people out from under them without fighting back with everything they have.

Sinead

I wonder if another potential avenue is The Crows.

Like the Gobbler says that Goblins live short and brutal lives fighting over scraps. Isn't that similar to the issue that the Sisters have transcended in the completion of their godhood? At least based on what has been presented between golin culture and the Tenants, there isn't a whole lot of direct conflicts.

Imagine the Crows becoming an emerging icon for the Goblins. Especially since the Sisters have sacrificed for their people (See the Ruination). Which is more than the Matrons could have done.

I wonder if the Sisters gained additional adherents if that would change anything about their perspectives as well, since they would have this emerging new culture of the liberated goblins?

Darkening

It's been mentioned the goblins in the army took pretty well to worshipping the Crows already, I could see that expanding. Goblins with Night blessings would go a long way to balancing their issues with being too weak to stand up to other races in a stand up fight.

Shveiran

One of the Sisters was even in favor, IIRC.

But that was before the Ruination. There is a lot less Night to go around now.

Sinead

There is less Night now.

However, new worshippers could in time increase the Night. And they already know that the collaboration improves the Night (see the 'Striding' ritual from the raids on Lozon's Hollow)

I would think that in time, the investment would pay off. Especially if the first bit of faith is just in the First Under Night extending a hand.

To clarify, the reason I see the Tenants and Goblin philosophy as similar is because they both reflect the 'dog eat dog' mentality, with the Drow now having a perspective of 'We can make it better.'

ninegardens

Okay, NEW plan. The Queen of Callow can take the Matron's deal... MEANWHILE, first under the night can make an offer the Sve Noc's new adherancts, to join the drow in the ruins of Keter.

Daltos

I think it still does. What Pickler wants from Catherine would be an existential threat to the matrons. It's like how North Korea can't even allow basic trade with the south or they'll bleed people trying to get away. Or how China is angry at any country opening their doors to people wanting leave Hong Kong. It's a strike at the foundation of their closed systems. One I doubt the matrons will allow without reaction. We've seen them only think in the long term and survival, for their rule that is. They see Catherine pull this and I'm sure they'll plot some way around it.

Shveiran

From a diplomatic perspective, there isn't MUCH that stops her from doing so. Right now, no one in the Eyres or Foramen or the rank and file expects her to take Pickler's deal. Not even Pickler.

So there is no real backlash to expect. And then? Well, the Eyres aren't really powerful enough to fuck with Callow in a world where the War on Keter was successful (which is the only world that matters since the other is an undead wasteland). The worse the Matrons could do is take back the goodies they offered, but that's not, like, crippling nor anything. She would still get the Matrons to play ball now, which is kind of useful.

But from a story perspective, Creation likes clarity.

A choice needs to be made, here, about who the Black Queen stands up for.

Especially because, as we were reminded this chapter, Catherine's story is also the tale of someone who keeps her word ("I'm a woman of my word, however terrible that word might be.")

This will define her; this will resonate; this will shape her Name.

Making it a trick would cheapen it, because this won't be a trickster Name.

Oh, she can play a nasty trick; but that is not her story, just one of her tools.

Henry

Also she runs the risk of falling into a story about becoming a necessary evil but then forgetting the necessary part. And that's not good those stories usually only end in death or redemption equals death.

Shveiran

That would be dangerous, though I don't really see that getting tractions unless she sabotages the war effort by mistake.

Nearly ANYTHING can be made to look unimportant and thus unnecessary before the apocalypse.

sengachi

I love the idea of the Wandering Bard and Malicia having this involved plan to redirect Catherine's Name away from this powerful Named-ruling role ... only to find they already got beaten to the punch by some liberator Name because the politics of a bunch of Nameless goblins they were both unaware of mattered to Catherine.

Sinead

There's a Gandalf quote about the Eye in the Tower being blind to the works of the small and unimportant bringing about it's own doom.

And Goblins are basically Evil Hobbits, yes?

5colouredwalker

Thanks, I really needed that.
Now I'm laughing at the weird as fuck ideas of a PGtE Goblin version of LotR.

Insanenoodlyguy

"What's taters precious?"
"Right that's it, I'm stabbing yo-ow! He's stabbing me Mr Frodo! All I did was stab him!"
"What's that ring? Stab them both? I'm on it! Sorry Sam, a ring told me too!"

marillius

This makes me want it so bad. For Pickler's request to be the one she chooses, because it represents everything Cat wanted for Callow, only for a 50,000 Robbers out there who don't know better. Pickler doesn't think Cat can say yes. I don't think Cat can say no. And for this decision to change that name she's been building, to deepen it, to save her from the fate the Bard and the Empress Stubborn Idiot Like All the Rest... That would be satisfying.

bellacohl

I want it so bad too. Let us have hope, I really really hope that the comment about the stars fading means that Cat has already made her decision, deep down.

Letouriste

It feels more like doubt. Give it a few more days

Miles

Even if cat was just thinking with her wallet, Pickler's option is the only one. The other two were tailored to drive a wedge between Cat and Viv

kinghaart

Oh good take. Especially given that we know that they are colluding in some fashion (even if the stabby kind).

Juff

Typo Thread:

burned around her > burning around her Malicia were > Malicia and I were promptly recognize > promptly recognized taking control the > taking control of the goblins choking > goblins and choking my matron > by matron
I expected > I'd expected all little > a little was concept > was a concept talking the > talking to the send provide > provide far away as > far away from limping open to > limping to open horrifying unlike > horrifyingly unlike honestly made > honestly make swallowing quick to > swallowing quick so food at things > good at things where I would I > where would I that just buried > that they just buried like him the > like him in the

Sinead

Also, a few mentions of Cat still having two eyes.

Finn ...

"Food at things" made me cackle so much

Letouriste

Gobbler bless typos

Reader in the Night

Yup. And thus, whatever Cat's Name was going to be gets quietly shanked in a badly-lit alley by the ghost of Robber. Because a Warden's Name must be an absolute, it must be a Name that sacrifices whatever it takes for the Greater Good (or the Greater Evil, as the case may be). And Pickler just took the most devastating siege engine in all of Calernia to that concept: Catherine's devastating love for the ones that followed her through thick and thin.

The name of Robber of the House of Lesser Footrest is not a name invoked before Catherine Foundling lightly, and if Pickler had done it out of any form of political machination at all, Catherine would most certainly have set her on fire.

But she invoked it out of pure love for everyone's favorite little psychopath, and that's something that cuts straight through the Warden or the Black Queen, and gets you to the fact that Catherine Foundling takes care of her own. Now all she has to do is find a way to make doing the right thing profitable (which she will), and whatever her Name is going to be is going to have to adapt to that aspect of her personality as well.

Rey d`Tutto

And it will be gloriously devious.

Letouriste

Maybe gloriously goblin then?

kinghaart

I think the profitability is fairly clear – diversity. No longer being reliant on an external entity for ore and munitions because you can get that yourselves. Being on the right side not just of history but of the personal history of 150,000 Robbers.

The challenges are there too of course but Callowan has already resettled one tribe, so I think the big one will be putting down the Matrons rather than cultural assimilation which the Legions already proved out.

Wasn't it the Goblins that caused the latest Red Letter? Could Cat somehow negotiate with the Gnomes too off just the Goblins leadership rather than the whole of Calernia?

Frivolous

EE: I am not completely certain, but 'move the needle' sounds like a technological idiom to me. As in, it should not exist in Calernia. No seismographs or anything else that has a moving needle.

Please feel free to correct me if I'm wrong, anyone.

irritantseraphim

Scales in ye olden days had a needle that swung left or right depending on which cup was heavier. And I am certain there are scales in Calernia.

Frivolous

I believe the metaphor you are referring to is 'tip the balance'.

A short thing that points to left or right is a stick, not a needle. Because sticks are cheap.

Anyway, I've been Googling it and all the references are to instruments that are not ye old scales.

The most primitive instrument for a needle that could move is a magnetic compass. Maybe that's what Pickler meant?

Except none of the people involved are sailors.

Henry

I mean magnetic compasses aren't just used by sailors they were very good way of figuring out what is which Way on a map and for general scouting.

Frivolous

Yes. But compasses originated as nautical technology in real life, and the only compasses I can find so far in Practical Guide to Evil are figurative ones: Vivienne being Catherine's moral compass.

So we know that magnetic compasses exist in Calernia. But we haven't seen anyone actually use one yet.

aurikdomi

Pickler did just admit to the goblins having technology that they haven't shared with anyone yet.

Frivolous

Yes. So Pickler could have a graduated weight-measuring scale like we do, and it might not even be technological enough to offend the gnomes.

But Catherine couldn't understand the metaphor. So she just pretended to understand?

I know and agree this is plausible. I've been in conversations where people used idioms I didn't understand, and I didn't immediately ask for clarification.

Miles

Cat has had a near-orgasm from looking at a map at one point iirc. Her love of good maps is well established. Calernia's technology is advanced enough that they use maps on land too.

Miles

Also, the fact that Cat called Viv her moral compass implies she knows what a compass is

Cold Cyberia

It looks like long term Pickler's plan has better prospects. Think of the impact Robber or Pickler had on the Army of Callow and how much they helped Cat overall. Now imagine having many, many more of them; not just in the army but also as spies, architects, miners and craftsman. Having goblins who are dedicated to her nation would strengthen Callow in a way no amount of trade deals would.

There are considerable short term risks in alienating the Matrons but if what Pickler says is true, in reality Cat doesn't need to do much but to open the doors. I do hope she bets on the mud, as it were.

jamesc9

That seems very like Cat. I'm fairly sure that she's already told us, at least once, that the mud's where the real work gets done.

sidehammer056302

I... did not expect Pickler to choke me up...

daniel

This is the march of the dispossessed.
Next in line are the Duni?

Letouriste

Well, Killian is owed a talk i think. There's too much unsaid in their relationship ending.
Plus now there's less an less old timer, her been there gain a lot of weight, right?

Shveiran

Pfff. Come on, she is the teen romance Catherine hasn't talked to in what, five years?

If she ends up speaking up for the treatment of Dunis like Pickler did for the goblins, sure, I guess, but it's not like that relationship needs any more screentime. It is not relevant.

chris S that introductory quote is PERFECT for this chapter and the crux of Pickler's plea. It perfectly shows how goblins don't matter to the Matrons, the tribes they rule are just tools to solidify their power. Without Cat accepting Pickler's request, the future of goblind -to paraphrase a quote- is a boot stamping on a goblin's face, forever.

Shveiran

I have no idea why so many commenters seem to think a Name like Warden of the East would be at odds with her wanting to SAFEGUARD the goblins that are part of the EAST.

Warden. East.

It's... it's literally in the godsdamn Name, for crying out loud.

Mental Mouse

The closing text strongly indicates that EE thinks Pickler's offer is a threat to the developing Name.

Shveiran

Why a threat and not a different direction: the stars fade and appear more distant because Cat has "goblin problems" and they are more RELEVANT.

The East and not the East.

She is not losing her nascent Name. She is making a choice about what kind of Name it's going to be.

Which is pretty much what we have been told the Bard is trying to sneak on her. This (or more likely, this sentiment) will likely be the resolution to the Bard's trap in Ater.

Mental Mouse

Well, she's probably going to get a name, but it may not be the one that lets her see her people as stars (currently presumed to be Warden Of The East). Whether WotE or this new, even-more-inchoate Name, is Bard's plan remains to be seen. At this point, Cat is arguably the Bard's peer, but they're both playing deep and complex games – at some point, she needs to quit wondering "did she know that I know that she knows...", and play her hand.

sidehammer056302

Wow, I don't know how long it's been (I think YEARS..) since I've seen a word that I had 0% idea what it meant. "Inchoate," Now for a chance to use it in a sentence.. Thanks!

Miles

It really doesn't. All it means is it's morning.

Cat has never had stars tied to her Name strength before so this having such a meaning would be ridiculously out of left field.

Mental Mouse

The stars are clearly presented as being tied to her (possibly) upcoming Name, and when a Name weakens, its associated powers also weaken (as seen with Amadeus and Hanno).

kinghaart

and Hakram just a few chapters ago.

If it were mid-chapter I'd give less weight to it but at the end it's either obvious or a very good red herring.

scottcahoon14

Cat commenting on the lights growing dim. But, as others have stated, could just be her panicking.

Tyckspoon

There was a duality developing before, one of those hero-villain reflections that stories love (and possibly part of Bard's intended trap, because it would be just sooo easy to fall into and all it needs is for Cat to continue doing what she's already doing...)

Warden of the West is developing. It's going to be either Cordelia or Hanno, and I suspect the only reason Cordelia doesn't already have it is that Hanno made himself a claimant when he moved into a more active role in the war. That Warden role is clearly a protective one – the Role of somebody organizing the West in defence against external threats.

Cat's prospective Warden name was shaping to be more of a jailer or overseer, on the other hand – the one who sets rules and limitations on their charges in order to stop them doing harm to themselves and others. A task that is more villain-slanted, for somebody who will often have to make and hew to choices between two evils because the people you're responsible for permit no good (and certainly not Good!) options.

Pickler's request offers a pivot in two ways. One, it is purely a request for aid. It isn't about minimizing harm or figuring out which lunatic Villain will release the fewest Demons. It's a lead to the more protective aspect of Warden, or possibly a way away from the whole 'Warden' thing entirely.

Two, its for common people. Cat as Black Queen, as the villain representative for the Terms, as the main proponent for the Accords to come, and even in her developing Name so far... She deals with the great powers of the land. Named and rulers and powerful nobles. She does claim to care about the welfare of the commons, but even when she tries to do something for them she does it in a top-down way, by trying to change the rulers or the laws governing them. Pickler is asking her to do something directly for people with no power. Not as a treaty, not a bargain between Named or in terms during negotiation between states – it represents a major shift in focus for Cat and if she goes for it will also be reflected in what her Name becomes.

(Incidentally, I think her Name declares itself when she makes a firm commitment to her plans for Praes. When she stops trying to juggle potential plans and contingencies and says with conviction “Black rules the Tower, the Orcs are an independent nation, and goblins are welcome to live as Callowan citizens” .. Or whatever set of options she throws in with.. That’s when she can wield her Name. It won’t happen as long as she’s still also thinking “but what if I have to deal with Akua, and maybe its better for the War if the Matrons want to have a good relationship?”)

Shveiran

I see it quite differently personally.

You (and you are not alone in this!) say that the WotW is a protector and a rallying point for the west while the WotE would be like a jailor. And... yeah, that’s possible, sure, but there is no reason why it has to eb that way or why it should be like that.

Duality and symmetry work better when they are actually symmetrical, after all. Why wouldn’t both Names have the same two duties, one external and one internal?

The external is to Ward their charge; to protect them from harm, to shelter them from the storm.

The internal is to keep their house in order; making it so that it doesn’t eat itself alive, or become a problem for the rest of the world.

And there is nothing that goes against that in seeking a better future for the goblins, or really just stopping the abusive Matrons from keeping in power and enabling the goblins to look for something better. After all, they are in her charge.

I also disagree that this was in any way different from what Catherine has done so far.

Her treaties, her deals, everything has always been to protect the weak from the mighty or from themselves. This has never changed, the only difference is how she defined “weak”, “mighty”, or “protect”.

This is also still very much “top-down”: she is a powerful figure unrooting a bunch of rulers, she is not feeding orphans with her hands.

letouriste

...well, now i'm getting sure cat will not be Warden of anything. I'm thinking something more along “Guide” 😊

Beautiful speech by pickler there, made me drop a tear.

kinghaart

I think Amadeus fits the Role of Practical Guide more, though with Cat's not-mentoring of other Named it coups maybe go either way.

BargleNawdleZouss

I gotta ask: who is expecting Triumphant and/or Treacherous to make a grand return to Creation?

Just as planned, naturally. 😊

aurikdomi

There is that gem the dead king owns that only ever lit up when triumphant was moving, and though it seemed like it was lighting up when cat really started, I bet it was just a distraction because it really is Triumphant moving again mwahaha.

Sinead

Pretty sure that gem was a line of communication between the Tower and Keter. So it is Malicia not Cat who triggered the contact.

aurikdomi

Was that what it was? it triggered at least a book apart from when we know Malicia was talking to him but I guess you gotta start with small talk before sending diplomatic envoys.

Sinead

End of Book 3 after the talk between Amadeus and Malicia post Doom of Liesse. Cat has also jsut been crowned Queen of Callow.

If it was an ‘Immortal detector’, it would have triggered during teh Doom of Liesse when Cat fully ascended.

sidehammer056302

I don't remember which, but I want the Oddly Successful to return, or at least get his own booklet of collected and expanded quotes, XD

superkeaton

Oh my.

masterofbones

From the perspective of story/name lore, Cat can't turn Pickler down.

From the perspective of knowing what the matrons are, giving them any increase in power is a bad idea, even if it wasn't a trap, which it is. So Cat can't turn Pickler down.

Cat loves her allies and realizes just how much she can save if she frees the gobbos. Cat can't turn a begging Pickler down.

Miles

Cat doesn't want to have a third falling out with Vivian which is why she can't turn Pickler down.

Sykomantis

You know what? There's a Name I would expect to exist somewhere in this world that to my knowledge hasn't ever been mentioned, but, in thinking about it, if it actually existed, would have to be the most powerful name of them all: giving power to other Names, defining Roles, marking where the influence of Providence is more or less likely to occur, and judging whether and when actions should be attributed to luck versus skill.

The Storyteller.

The Storyteller would be able to Narrate the actions of others, would Know all current Names and Namelore, or could Learn new stories, rules, roles, names, settings, languages, topics, relationships, subjects, and methods of delivering stories to the masses. She could Archive or Restore old stories, Find lost stories, or Seek out new ones. She might Take the stories of others, Edit them to fit a lesson, mood, or theme, or Redact details that aren't important. She might even Impart, Bequeath, or Bestow the stories when needed, or Imbue stories with touches of style or idiosyncrasies for dramatic effect, or Embellish or even Exaggerate the powers, skills, and abilities of characters. She could possibly use stories as tools to Persuade, Discourage, Divide, Unite, Inform, Teach, Slander, Dispel, Disenchant, Delay, Motivate, or simply to Entertain, Set a tone, or make people Think.

Stories can make people Pretend to be something they aren't, Adventure to far away places, Horrify, Terrify, Thrill, and let them Imagine other worlds. And the one thing all stories must eventually do, is End.

Just a little something I've been thinking about. The Storyteller is always the start and finish of every tale, so who better to start the new Age, and how better than to start it with a brand new Story?

Sykomantis

I don't know how to make words bold so just imagine the asterisks mean bold like aspects

Miles

That is literally what a Bard is.

Miles

Come to think of it, you know what has power and authority over everyone in a story and is basically the opposite of a Bard because rather than telling stories it ends them? The Deus Ex Machina

Sykomantis

Don't bards do it through song though?

Shveiran

Only in D&D.

Not all bard-adjacent roles were about music, but since writing was so very expensive before printing was invented, they knew their work by memory... and therefore, most stories were made as "songs" because rhymes and metric make it easier to remember things. Stories were mostly "poetry".

That's what bards are supposed to be about: stories and lore.

Not godsdamned lutes and dancing, whatever D&D says.

kinghaart

No, it'd be either "Author", "Editor" or "Publisher".

TheReaperOfU

So, I'm new to the series as a whole, and started reading about a month ago. I just caught up. I am in absolute love with this series, thank you EE.

And of course, I catch up, and it's on a stupid cliffhanger.

lowebro

I think the stars fading is, ultimately, going to be a sign that Cat is stepping back from the realm of the named to something more mundane.

Throughout the whole story, whilst named have been important, there's been a HUGE emphasis on how many normal flesh and blood, average people have bled and fought for Cat. They were always her backbone, the nameless. From individuals like Ratface, Robber, Nauk and Pickler here to the soldiers in her legions. Her final stage of character development tying into that, having her possibly not having any name as she closes out her last fights, seems right to me. More than an ending where a new Name comes along and sorts all the problems out.

kinghaart

I think she might still get a Name of a sort but agreed that this would be satisfying too

kinghaart

I wonder if things might be better for Procer though if Cordelia had taken a Name.

Carry is practical and would probably accept a leash if it came with the power to fix enough things. Or maybe she's learned from 2nd Llesse?

hoser2

Wondering what Matrons are.

Could it be a blood ritual enacted on the female children of Matrons at birth?

Maybe a blood ritual, for more power?

The Matrons seem so different and so indifferent to other goblins. It feels like more than intraspecies genetic variation.

kinghaart

Hmm, maybe something like that charm Akua had which used grief to sharpen focus?

Chapter 25: Fool

"And so Dread Emperor Irritant addressed his Chancellor thus: 'You have moved me through argument, so I crown you in my stead. May you rule wisely.' The day after the royal banner of Callow was seen, and soon Ater was under siege."

– Extract from Volume IX of the official Imperial Chronicles

The first dart came from my left and I caught its glint in the morning light.

I clawed Night across the air, making a shield, but the one thrown a heartbeat later from my right I didn't see at all until a phalange moved in the way with her shield raised. It didn't help. Night shattered the first dart, but the second punched through steel like it was paper and then went on halfway through the orc's skull before stopping. And it wasn't even, I realized a moment later, the real attempt on my life. I was warned by shouts and the sound of crossbows being fired. Behind me, I thought, and turned to see a small creature leaping towards at my back. Hairy and clawed, like a toad gone wrong, but my staff was in movement and it was not quicker than me.

The side of the length of dead yew caught the creature in its distended belly, but it let out a high-pitched screech and spat out a yellow tongue that looked like a muscle. I saw something like bone at the end of the absurd length and threw myself to the side, but a legionary had come too close and he was in the way. Heavier than me. It was luck that got a fold of the Mantle of the Woe just close enough I was able to pull it closer to my body, covering my side in time for the bonelike stinger to slide off the enchanted cloth. I snarled, as much about the legionary who'd almost just gotten me killed trying to protect me as in anger. Night cascaded down the length of my staff in strings that crisscrossed the creature's entire body in the span of a heartbeat before turning sharp.

Chunks of flesh and gore splattered the grass and I breathed out, eyes scanning for other threats.

The assassins that'd thrown darts at me had been tackled down but there seemed to be no more of the creature, which – shit, the corpse was dissolving into the ground. Ichor. That thing had been a devil. What the fuck was going on with our wards? I spared a look for the phalange that'd take a dart for me, grimacing as a hand over her mouth told me she was dead.

"Take them alive," I shouted.

It was no good, though, I saw moments later. The assassins – garbed in regular's armour – had stopped moving because they were dead. Poison, most likely. I'd be getting no answers out of them save through necromancy, and maybe not even that. There were alchemies that made corpses near-impossible to raise, and though they were expensive I somehow doubted that whoever had arranged this was lacking in funds. I rose back to my feet, closing the orc's eyes. She'd taken that dart for me without hesitation, and if she hadn't I would most likely be dead. Fuck, I thought breathing out. This wasn't the first attempt on my life, but it'd been a while one had come so close to succeeding. If that tongue stinger hadn't been meant to deliver a particularly nasty poison, I'd eat my shoes.

I got my people moving to cover the security breaches, because there was no way a devil should have been able to cross our wards. Before the hour was out the phalanges had caught most of our traitors alive, two trying to pull a runner towards Ater before being shot in the back. Enough confessed without need for... firm interrogation that I got a picture of what had happened. A few of my soldiers had been turned either by threats to their families or petty bribery, which had allowed a pair of mfuasa mage infiltrators in through our defences. They'd used illusions and murder to let in a summoned devil through the wards and make their attempt before being put down.

"They went for enlisted, not officers," Vivienne said. "Not all of them Praesi, either. Two of the flipped soldiers were from Summerholm."

I grimaced.

"This one wasn't a warning shot," I said. "They meant business."

"It won't be the last either," the Princess said. "You've provoked the High Lords enough a single failure won't put them off."

"You don't think this is Malicia?" I asked.

"It could be the Eyes," she conceded, "but I have my doubts. They don't usually use either devils or mfuasa."

Which might be the point, putting us off the trail, but I wouldn't argue the point. I'd certainly angered enough of the Wasteland's aristocracy that they were as likely of an author for this nasty little surprise. I clenched my fingers. Time to make a point of my own, then. I'd need to speak with Scribe, and Archer as soon as she got back. She was a day late, at this point, but I wasn't worried: I could still feel her star and the way it was moving towards us. She'd be there by noon.

"We'll retaliate," I said. "

"I expected as much," Vivienne said. "And our traitors?"

"We have a punishment for aiding the enemy in our regulations," I said.

My successor made a face but she did not disagree. It might have been a Legion regulation, originally, but Callowans were not much softer on treachery.

They'd be stoned.

—

Archer dragged her carcass back into camp an hour past Noon Bell, immediately heading for my tent when she did. She stank of dust and sweat but I still poured her a glass of lemon water when she dropped into a seat with a sigh, sending one of the phalanges to get her warm food. Indrani drank greedily, emptying the whole cup before letting out a sigh.

"Gods, the things you send me to do," she said.

I dropped into a seat across from her own, lowering myself slowly so my leg wouldn't ache too much.

"Thought you were all about travelling," I said.

"Ater was damned interesting," Indrani admitted. "Wouldn't have minded staying a little longer to see the sights. There were... complications, though."

"Ominous," I praised. "You've been working on your pauses, I see."

She preened.

"I have," Indrani said. "I keep using them in random sentences, it drives Zeze crazy."

I swallowed a grin. Amusing as that sounded, I had sent her out on an important errand.

"Report," I ordered.

She leaned back into her seat, grinning in a way that did not bode well for whatever poor bastard I'd make transcribe this later, and only stashed that insolence away long enough to thank the young man that brought her a plate of greens and stew with slices of rye bread on the side. Archer wasted no time dipping her bread and scarfing down an entire slice, almost choking as she slapped her chest twice.

"Right," she gasped. "So report. Got into their noble camps no trouble, their security is horrendously bad. The outer parts, anyway. They ward to the Hells and back little sections where the important people sleep, couldn't get in those. Stayed long enough to learn that our buddy Sargon is here now, with a small escort."

"Good to know," I grunted. "We'd figured as much, but it's good to have it confirmed."

"It shouldn't be too hard to get a strike force in Ater the same way I went in," Archer continued. "Lots of servants and peddlers go back and forth through the gates every day, the Legions don't actually watch them all that closely. The problems start in the city."

"Heard through sources that Malicia's pretty much lost grip," I said.

"Yeah, she's not real popular at the moments," Indrani snorted. "The Sentinels followed up massacring rioters by being just as hard with a few attempts by people to get at imperial granaries, which didn't win her any admirers."

Unfortunate timing for her, that. I didn't disagree with taking a hard line over food reserves with a siege possibly looming, but it was becoming clear that the Sentinels weren't the kind of tool that could be used for delicate work.

"So who's rising?" I asked.

"Akua," Indrani frankly said. "She's the city's darling at the moment. They're convinced she's the only person that can beat you and she's been making all the right moves – she'd been healing people, setting up hospitals and shelters and organizing the refugees. Even the gangs like her, Cat, it's ridiculous. They started patrolling the districts the city guard won't go in anymore after she asked them."

I let out a low whistle.

"So she's making a play for the Tower," I said.

"Maybe," Archer said, wiggling her hand. "She hasn't actually gone there since coming to the city, way I hear it. She's got this mansion that's become like a second imperial court. There's already a song about the 'empress in the tower and the empress in the city'. Whatever she's up to, though, she hasn't actually made any moves to depose Malicia. Most people figure she's either still working on getting the Legions on board or there's some sort of clever plan afoot."

"I don't see the Black Knight flipping her way even if Malicia's star is waning," I said. "They get on terribly, by all reports, and Nim's a Legion loyalist. Without the army on her side, Akua will need major noble support before she can make a move. Won't have enough troops otherwise."

Support that I intended to deliver right into her hands, but was still in the making. It'd have to wait until Abreha and Jaheem Niri arrived.

"Could be," Indrani shrugged. "Went to have a look at the defences like you asked, and it's exactly like Juniper figured. They have a skeleton garrison on the walls facing us and the rest of the troops are at barracks in the nearby districts."

It was the only sensible way to defend a city the size of Ater with forces as small as the Black Knight's. She couldn't really afford to man the entire set of walls facing us, not with solid numbers, so she'd post just enough up there and keep her real numbers near streets that could be used to quickly mobilize. That was she could be sure her soldiers were where the fighting was actually happening when we attacked. Against a less seasoned commander the trick would have been drawing those troops out by an attack on the wall and then sending a smaller force to climb an unprotected stretch while the defenders were busy, but that wouldn't work on Marshal Nim. She'd keep companies in reserve.

No, like Juniper had said the only real way for us to take the city by force was speed. We needed overwhelm the walls before the Legions could fully mobilize, smash them while they were still separated and take up solid defensive positions before the highborn armies could intervene.

"Good," I said. "Did you get anywhere close to the Tower?"

"Nah, they've locked up those districts tight," Indrani said. "The Sentinels have been moving wagons around, though, so I'd bet Malicia's opened up the vaults for a few things. Couldn't get into the Tower itself, though, not even through Scribe's underground routes. They're either closed or swarming with guards."

"Ime knows her trade," I sighed. "And my father?"

"That," Indrani grinned, "is where it gets... complicated."

"Now you're just overusing it," I chided.

"Fuck... you, Your Royalty," Indrani eloquently replied. "So, I went around looking for ye ol' Carrion Lord like my boss – terrible woman, you know, couldn't recognize a good dramatic pause even if it bit her in the ass – asked. I was prowling rooftops and alleys like a majestic panther, but then I got shot in the shoulder."

"You what now?" I replied, alarm.

"Don't worry about it, shallow wound, all in good fun," Archer dismissed. "So since the Lady had said hello, I set fire to the house she was standing on to say hi back and we had a good laugh about it. Only that, uh, drew some invited guests."

"Sentinels?"

"Please," Indrani snorted, "like I'd worry about those. No, I was asking her why there was some gray in her hair now like an old granny – there wasn't, always pisses her off when I ask anyway – but then suddenly there was just this guy there."

"This guy," I repeated, skeptical.

"Yeah, just standing there," Indrani agreed. "So I was all like 'what gives, did you maybe not notice that building is still on fire, you jackass' and then he turns to me saying 'Black Queen vassal. You are spared. The debt is paid. Leave.' You know, like an asshole."

"Indrani," I patiently said, "did you pick a fight with the fucking Emerald Swords?"

She blinked at me, surprise.

"No, of course not," Archer assured me. "Though that was obvious from the context."

I narrowed my eyes at her.

"I picked a fight with the Emerald Swords and the Lady," she proudly told me.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose, feeling the headache coming. I wasn't even in pain yet, I could just sense its looming person like a fucking storm on the horizon.

"He'd told me to leave, see, so I did the only rational thing a woman can do in that position," Indrani began. "I-"

"-shot him in the eye," I finished.

"I did," she said, pleased, then leaned forward. "Twice. And I'll level with you here, Catherine, he did not enjoy that."

"Go figure," I said. "Ranger?"

"Kicked him into the fire when he was distracted and pulled down the house on him," Indrani said. "Shot her in the shoulder but she caught it and threw it back – almost took my eye out – but then the rest of the Emerald Swords arrived and it got messy."

"It got messy?" I drily said.

"Right, 'cause we drew a bit of attention so the Tower dropped a demon on us," Archer said. "Beast of Hierarchy, I think. Anyways the air started burning like oil and it spread fucking everywhere – no smoke, though, pretty weird right? – so I stabbed this elf in the back, 'cuz he was basically asking for it, and I maneuvered backwards from the situation."

She smiled proudly at me, the horrid wrench.

"You know, like a strategist," Indrani said. "Which I am."

"Tell me we don't have a demon-tainted Emerald Sword to deal with now," I said.

"Nah, everyone made it out," Indrani said. "Except for the diabolists Ranger shot, I guess, but if I learned anything in our years together it's that diabolists don't really count."

Yeah, and there it was. The goddamned headache.

"Anything else?" I asked, against my better judgement.

She considered that for a moment.

"I'm hungry," Indrani shared.

I sighed.

"About your... adventure, I mean," I said.

"Hey," Archer complained. "If I can't do the pauses, then you can't either. And what happened to us, Catherine? You never ask how my day went anymore."

I cocked an eyebrow at her.

"How did your day go, Indrani?"

"I don't wanna talk about it," she smugly grinned, shovelling a large spoonful of stew and greens into her mouth.

"How is that that I've met people who've literally eaten the souls of the innocent and somehow you're still the worst person I know?" I asked, reluctantly impressed.

"Natural talent," she told me through half-chewed greens.

There was nothing like spending time with my closest friends in the world to make me reconsider my position on people not being born terrible. I hid a smile, though, and drummed my fingers against the sculpted tabletop.

"It's a good thing that you're back," I said. "You can rest now."

"Sleeping in a bed will be nice," she agreed.

"You'll have to do it now, though," I idly said.

She stopped eating, staring at me.

"I've got a job for you," I pleasantly smiled. "You're going back into Ater."

"I was just in Ater," she whined.

"Yeah, but last time was too easy," I said. "So this time I'm sending you back with about forty handpicked Dominion warriors."

She wouldn't stay with them once they were in the city – anything a Named was involved in the Intercessor would know about – but that was all right, I had a different task in mind for her. Ater was no Wolof, after all, for all its formidable defences. It had fallen more times than I could count through the many centuries of imperial history.

Most of the time, from the inside.

—

It was another six days before High Lady Abreha Mirembé of Aksum – formerly empress-claimant Sepulchral – and High Lord Dakarai Sahel of Nok joined their forces to my own army. Most of their sizeable combine force had marched our way, a solid fourteen thousand. Abreha's reins on it were nowhere as tight as before though, since the Nok soldiery now had their own liege lord along instead of simple kinsman in command. Within moments of getting them in my tent I saw the tensions between the two of them. High Lord Dakarai, a gracefully aged older man with silvery hair and the most golden eyes I had seen of any Praesi noble, now resented the woman he'd backed for the Tower.

I even knew why. One of the foundations of their alliance had been the marriage between Abreha's then-heir Isoba and Dakarai's daughter Hawulti, but from the High Lord of Nok's perspective he had mismarried his favourite daughter: Isoba's position as heir to Aksum was now up in the air. Mind you, Dakarai was here instead of talking with High Lady Takisha and the others for a good reason: it was too late for him to move to Malicia's camp. Even if she accepted his allegiance he'd get nothing out of the switch and he was more than a little likely to get assassinated as an example down the line. Malicia couldn't accept his return, anyway, not as things stood.

Too many of her 'loyal' lords had spent years waging war against Nok in her name, they wouldn't accept a peaceful return to the Tower's cause. If the High Seat returned to Malicia, it would be over Dakarai Sahel's dead body and for obvious reasons that would not be terms acceptable to him.

"Your hospitality remains pleasing, Black Queen, but you asked us here for a reason," Abreha eventually said.

"The wards against eavesdropping were something of a hint, I imagine," I snorted. "Fair enough. I want something of you."

High Lord Dakarai studied me calmly.

"Should you want Nok's forces to take the vanguard in breaching Ater, there will be a price for it," he plainly stated.

"Nothing so uncouth," I said. "On the contrary, I think you'll actually like this one."

I explained exactly what I wanted out of them, and they listened with faces like masks.

Afterwards, Dakarai Sahel left my tent in a rage and Abreha Mirembelingered a little longer before following him out of the camp. I let them go, instead calling my war council together.

We had a battle to prepare for.

—

I pressed down against Zombie's back, squinting under the heavy glare of the afternoon sun.

The enemy was moving slower than I'd thought they would, though that was of my own making. Between Assassin, Archer and the Silver Huntress about twenty high-ranking nobles had been killed this morning. Among those we'd even caught two Muraqib and a Niri, the prize of the lot being High Lady Takisha's husband. Just after that anthill got kicked the Army of Callow had begun marching at a brisk pace, circling Ater to the north and advancing on the camp of the noble private armies. Much as we'd expected it would, though our advance had been almost immediately seen and reported it'd still taken them long to organize. I suspected they'd prepared a makeshift command system in case we did attack them, but the wave of assassinations had upended that arrangement before it could be used. So while the nobles fought over who would lead and who would take the frontlines, the Army of Callow had marched effectively unchallenged.

Juniper didn't like the plan, but I'd sold her on the necessity of it so she'd put her talents to work making the best of the inevitable risks. While the Army of Callow and the Akusm contingent was moving to the north of the city, about five thousand — all Nok forces — under High Lord Dakarai were circling the city's belly to the south instead. The route was slightly longer, and I could see from above that the Black Knight had taken the bait. Seeing a smaller force split from our main host, Marshal Nim had ordered one of the southern gates open and sortied against it. The temptation to try to defeat us in detail had been too strong.

Without knowing it, the Black Knight had been courting disaster. The Nok wavemen, the famous archers I'd yet to see prove their worth on the battlefield, were served up exactly the kind of fight they shined most in: flat open fields against slow-moving infantry. Those enchanted bows proved to be brutally effective tools of war at a range at least one time and a half of standard-issue crossbows, arrows touched with magic coming down in a rain that tore through even the testudo formation of the enemy legionaries. Still, there were only a thousand of those elite archers and Nim soon had field scorpions brought out so the slaughter didn't last forever.

It still cost the Legions a few hundred soldiers for little gain and blunted their sortie. The Nok forces kept moving east towards the nobles with only paltry losses and the Legions did not attempt pursuit. No doubt the Black Knight was wary of getting another mouthful of volleys before Dakarai retreated again and the game began anew.

Up north, the shape of a battle began to fall into place. The enemy commanders were thinking along the same lines as the Black Knight, they too preferring to fight our army split. It'd made them take a gamble: instead of staying in their camp, a decent enough defensive position, the lumbering host of thirty thousand was marching towards the Army of Callow and its auxiliaries. The general facing Juniper had decided to bet that the battle against our main army would be won or lost before High Lord Dakarai finished circling the capital and fell on their backs. From up here I could see another trap, too, this one more subtly laid: at the speed they were advancing, the noble armies would be meeting my own about at the height of one of the northern gates of Ater.

Cheeky, that. They were hoping that Marshal Nim might see an opportunity when the battle had begun to flank us from there. And more than that, I eventually decided. If the Black Knight opened the gates, the nobles could then retreat through it and into the city afterwards. Neither me nor the nobles were interested in fighting to the death while Malicia was watching us from atop the Tower like a waiting vulture. It'd be more sensible to allow whoever got the worst of the fighting to retreat, be it us or they. Even with an army marching towards you, I thought amusedly, you're more concerned with the Tower than the steel. A shame for them it wouldn't pan out this way.

An hour before Afternoon Bell the skirmishes began north of the city and I got involved. I made a few passes on Zombie and left trails of blackflame behind, leaving our Levantine skirmishers with a decisive advantage. An hour after that, the skirmishers retreated and battle lines formed. To the south of the city, though, High Lord Dakarai had slowed. It might be taken for resting his men, who had been marching for hours in the sun with enemies nipping at their heels, but it wasn't. To a practised eye, he was making sure he wouldn't be there for the battle to the north.

It didn't matter to the rank and files on both sides, who advanced with shields raised as sorcery and arrows began to fly. Hierophant ripped through enemy rituals – Akua didn't seem to be out there waiting to match him – so the volleys weren't too badly against us, and we closed the distance with only slight casualties. That turned into a massacre almost immediately. The nobles had put their levies in front and my legionaries chewed through them like a knife through butter. I was pretty sure the immediacy of that took even the enemy by surprise, because they answered by hammering at where their own lines met mine with rituals and that was hardly standard tactics even for the most wasteful of Wasteland lords.

It was a mistake, anyway. Getting columns of flame and clouds of poisonous smoke tossed at them by their own lords without the protections that my priests afforded the Army of Callow was enough to turn the fear of the levies into terror, which resulted in a small and then general rout. The household troops behind them were made of sterner stuff and tried to keep them in place, but that was like trying to ride a panicked horse: they got kicked for it, and hard. To my dismay, it looked like we were actually going to win this battle. Fuck. I'd badly overestimated the morale of the levies, and so had our enemies. My eyes flicked to the northern gates, waiting for them to open, but while Marshal Nim had reinforced the walls she kept them closed. Malicia's orders? I could only guess.

It was Abreha Mirembe who salvaged it. She'd been half-heartedly serving on the flank of the Army of Callow, fighting off the Kahtan tribal troops with a suspicious lack of rituals being thrown by both sides, when she saw the rout and ordered a general retreat of the Aksum army. I could see the dismay and fury flicker through the ranks of my men at the sight, High Lady Abreha's order creating a massive gap that the enemy lines plunged into without hesitation. It was a strange sight, from above: the enemy centre and left were collapsing before the Army of Callow, but my own left had walked off the battlefield just on the eve of victory and so the enemy right was coming hard towards a formation unprepared for it.

I swooped down to stem the tide, carving a wall of blackflame through the Kahtan tribal levies that stopped them cold in their advance. It bought the time for Juniper to do as we'd planned and call a retreat, just as at last the northern gates of Ater began to open. Nim was, unfortunately, too late to the party. The Army of Callow began to pull back, its enemies too far or in no state to pursue, and as Zombie rose back into the sky I breathed out in relief. It might have worked out even better than I'd intended, in the end. Abreha Mirembe had not just turned on me, she'd betrayed me just as I was about to win the battle: it would win her a great deal of esteem. Good. It'd make her betrayal and High Lord Dakarai's that much more believable.

Neither of them were in a position to go over to Malicia's side, after all, but it was not to the empress' banner they had flocked today. Why, they had just announced their support for the cause of Akua Sahelian by saving the entire goddamned capital.

And with that, the fall of Ater could begin.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Reader in the Night

Why, they had just announced their support for the cause of PGTE by boosting the entire goddamned capital.

And with that, the fall of Worm could begin.

Reader in the Night

Why, they had just announced their support for the cause of PGTE by boosting the entire goddamned capital.

And with that, the fall of Worm could begin.

SpeckofStardust

So this is the second betrayal against Cat that she planned for and caused.

Is thier going to be a third?

samshadar

In the best tradition of a certain Dread Emperor, it pays to be part of the plots to ones downfall. 😊

Someperson

I think it will be Scribe.

Liliet

skfjdhakdfjhasdfajfsk well I called it wrong this was A LOT less subtle than what I had in mind

Hargabga

To be fair, Cat is not really famous for... subtlety.

shikkarasu

I don't know. Barely anything will still be on fire come Evening Bell, and she didn't alert the Fae to her skirmish by ... borrowing any of their lakes.
Practically invisible by Catherine's standards.

Cicero

When your plan involves you losing, only to discover your opponent is even more incompetent than you thought.

Isaac Martinez

It must have been a pain to Emperor Traitorus and Irritant. The pain of being so perfect...

Adrian_V

I know somewhere I read something similar only both sides wanted to lose so they were really exasperated xD

Burlyraven

Anybody else notice that Cat's being a lot more careless and occasionally even resentful of the soldiers under her command? She's not setting up meat grinders or anything, and she still shows she cares, but not too long ago she was known for her almost motherly (albiet dysfunctional) care for her soldiers and laughing with them on the battlefield. Now she's setting up dangerous plans and getting frustrated with ones just trying to protect her.

hakureireimu

I think a bit of anger is justified when they almost got her killed.

Burlyraven

Oh, absolutely, but I can't help but think back to the Boot when she fought beside the two Heavies. It was an even more dire circumstance, and it just came across as more congenial.

Hargabga

Yeah, that one was... troubling. I wonder if it's a... natural development.

Daltos

I think it also has to do with the soldiers becoming increasingly.. foreign to her. As alluded to before the current army of callow has less and less personal ties to her and more a product of logistics. Most of the original legionnaires who joined her are dead or even defected, the gallowborne annihilated, the original army of callow she raised, mostly spent or with Abigail, the officer corp from her college days and the ones that came with her, assassinated or otherwise. Replaced with dominion men, defections or recruits like the legions like the 13th, fresh faces from their own camps in callow. People who weren't there at the start when she was small enough to know them and then her, who only know her as the black queen and everything else as her legend. It'd be life if most of your immediate family died and you and your one surviving sibling moved in with cousins you've never met before. They're family, but not family (imagine that in italics), a technical sense rather than one with feeling.

Adrian V

Is still there, is called anger born of love, also at herself, remember not even a few weeks back when they started the attack on wolof by taking over the aqueduct fortress she was talking with a praesi soldier.

Soronel Haetir

Poor little Akua, just can't catch a knife in the ribs.

Hargabga

Because everyone knows that a proper Wasteland... tradition, is to catch a knife with your... back.

Agent J

10/10 use of dramatic pauses.

Anomandris

"She leaned back into her seat, grinning in a way that did not bode well for whatever poor bastard I'd make transcribe this later...."

Didn't know you were from Calernia, EE....how's the weather over there?

Reader in the Night

Yup. Cat's plan is utterly fucked by her own inability to understand just how thoroughly she got through to Akua. Cat's plan relies on Akua plotting something, and she really isn't.

Though credit where credit is due, Akua might not be this far along down her path of self-actualization if she hadn't picked up her newest traitorous minion. He was the one who helped her realize just how much she hates this entire thing, and is gleefully watching her torture herself.

shikkarasu

Akua has gone full Abigail. All of Creation is working to put her in charge and she just wants to not so badly.

KageLupus

I am not sure Cat thinks Akua is making a play for the Tower. Based just on what Archer told her, and knowing the path that she set Akua on, I think Cat could at least guess that her overall plan is working. If Akua really wanted to make a play for Empress she could be doing so right now. Instead she is helping the commoners and keeping order in the streets. To most people that is going to look like building a base for her next move, but Cat has insider info.

Cat's plan here doesn't require Akua to actually be aiming for the Tower, she just needs to keep making it look like Akua is working against Malicia. If Malicia's position looks weak enough more of her nobles will switch sides and the prophecy is self-fulfilled. To me this feels like Cat is still banking on Akua being turned off of the idea of being Empress, especially if a lot push to do so comes from external sources. The more people who expect Akua to become Empress, the more she is going to see it as another prison.

RoflCat

It's sorta both working and not working I think.

Catherine think Akua will make a claim for the throne, but then realized she hate everything about it and desperately want out to the point of accepting becoming an eternal lid to Evil in a Jar that is Dead King.

Whereas Akua right now is just...doing it because 'why not?'... and hating how it's working out extremely well despite her intention otherwise.

Like, one of the thing Cat already misread was Nim. She thought Nim would be solidly for Malicia due to the ideal of the Legions, but the person herself is already broken to the point Akua could've turned her. But instead Akua went off on Nim for being such so weak that one critical failure broke her like this which will most likely get Nim on her side with far deeper loyalty than Akua expected or wanted.

It's definitely leading up to Cat getting what she wanted (Akua being offered the crown and loathing it), but not the way she wanted it (Akua isn't having the revelation after getting the crown, she's been suffering through it so her decision at that moment would likely differ to Cat's expectation) because Praes.

ninegardens

Hearing Archer and Cat discussing Akua and just... completely misreading the situation ("There's NO WAY Nim would join her...") is.... utterly hilarious.

Insanenoodlyguy

The unexpected windfall today might be the stroke of misfortune tomorrow: Supporting Akua will go better then expected.

Gods, Akua isn't even going to try to climb the tower at this rate. I thought she'd still do it, in a "somebody must, and if not her, who?" reflection like we've seen in the North and the West, but now it's looking like Akua is very intentionally not going to do that... so she'll be as surprised as cat when somebody (or possibly a citywide riot of somebodies) comes to her second court with a bloody crown in hand and says "We've done what had to be done. What is your first command Empress?" Possibly followed by a frantic Akua going "No! No! I am not your Dread Empress now or ever!" and somebody says something like "Of course you aren't, you are the People's Empress." or something else lighter sounding and suddenly she's got a Name (it won't be Dread Empress whatever it is, she'd have heard the song) and it's entirely the wrong one for Cat's plans. I'm thinking it might actually be a hero name, making her completely useless as an eternal guardian.

Long term everybody remembers Akua as the greatest hero who heralded in the new age by killing the Dead King. There's a big giant statue of her in Cardinal with the epigraph "What the fuck is wrong with you people?! Stop praising me!" Scholars have had an ongoing debate on if the Unbeatable Queen Abigail was intentionally quoting her as an expression of her own humility when she ended up with the exact same epigraph on her statue, or if there was something more between them that this made a subtle reference to.

I actually do ship this now. Abigail and Akua both find the same corner to hide in at some celebratory banquet after the war, look at each other's faces, ask at the same time "Are you a piece of shit and nobody else can see it to ?" and collapsing in each other's arms, crying. The subsequent relationship is very soothing to the soul and horrendously taxing on the two women's livers.

Raved Thrad

Akuagail FTW! And for the lulz!

Unless something horrible happens (nuu, not Vivs!) I doubt Abigail is going to end up Queen anywhere, so my bet is that she ends up Castellan and consort (or maybe just Consort) to People's Empress Akua I.

Razorfloss

This is way to appropriate right now <https://youtu.be/oRozBAIbaG4>

jamesc9

Seems like flashman, from the novels written in the corner of john brown's schooldays.

Cheetah724

MOOD KINDRED!!

Insanenoodlyguy

That was the inspiration, absolutely.

Agent J

I mean, I don't think Abigail is a piece of shit. Just chronically averse to anything resembling responsibility. And, hey, mood.

Zach

Cat is doomed to get owned because she's revealing way too much about her plans to the reader. I'm sure she'll come out ahead in the end (because otherwise the story wouldn't be able to continue), but her plans are definitely not going to work out as expected.

Miles

I think the likelihood of an "* Ex Machina" name is increasing.

Akua gets this great story of a former villain fully turned around and redeemed, going good for her local town, and at the very end a Diablos Ex Machina shows up to stab her in the large intestines, because redeemed villains have to die at the end of their story.

Hargabga

Despite what everyone seems to think about redemptions, it is wildly... impractical to have the redeemed die after turning coat. There is so much good they can do after... switching sides, it seems almost... wasteful.

Linnus42

Yeah Redemption Equals Death Occurs. But that is normally when someone gets redeemed during a Fight or right before a Major Fight. Not out of combat situations. So could Akua die fighting against DK sure maybe, do I think she is randomly going to die right after being put in charge of Praes unlikely.

Flameburst

Die, or be eternally punished. Maybe cat's plan is going to work despite us knowing about it.

Hargabga

So interesting, how Cat's plan gonna go after she gives noble support to... Aqua? Like, she fully believes Ubua won't actually... climb the Tower, but what then is the plan? What, does she think our Fleishy Ghost will just... surrender to her?

Linnus42

Yeah Cat has no idea how much Akua has changed. She has Nim lol onside.

Forgot_My_Name

It's amusing because right now Akua is essentially a spanner in the works. She keeps blindsiding both Malicia and Catherine by basically doing nothing at all. And at least part of that is her minion rescuing her just to fuck with her.

How droll that Cat's over-elaborate Callowan revenge scheme got co-opted for someone less-so-but-still-overelaborate callowan-style revenge plot.

Juff

Typo Thread:

towards at my back > towards my back take a dart > taken a dart thought breathing > thought, breathing been a while one > been a while since one retaliate," I said. " > retaliate," I said.
all a reports > all reports
That was she could > That was so she could needed overwhelm > needed to overwhelm looming person > looming presence combine force > combined force two Muraqib > two Muraqibs
Akusm > Aksum

Dave

Also Eyes > eye

ohJohN

goddamned > godsdamned (x2)

Shveiran

I realize this is a bit ranty, but I gotta say that these developments leave me really queasy.
I... really don't like where Akua's plotline seems to be going.

I'm not one of the, shall we say, Long Price crowd. I'm not disappointed it seems unlikely she won't be tickled for a thousand years by tapir poets or whatever. It's just that I don't want her actions to be glossed over.

It's not really about her being in pain; if nothing else, she already is. It's the... framing of it that leaves me constantly disappointed.

I see her exhausting herself to heal sick and wounded and think: a month ago, she was murdering allies. What changed?

I see her saving Nim from the Pattern of Three and think: a month ago, she was betraying allies to the pro-apocalypse faction. What changed?

I see her counseling the Black Knight and the nobles and think: you have no idea what you are doing, or why. What is this building toward?

And it's not just that the crowd cheers, the crowd is scared and lost. And it's not just how Cat thinks about it.

It's ... well, it's the text. The Akua interludes, which seems pointed a making her feel sympathetic. And they... feel kind of insulting, really.

Because they dissonate too much with all that went on with Saint, and all that happened since. Because allowing people to be redeemed is IMPORTANT. It is not just elves and warlocks, it's a very important debate in the western world's justice system, and this is starting to look like just what its detractors accuse it of being: a slap on the wrist of murderers that will kill again, a chance taken on people that don't deserve it. A risk to everyone else who did nothing wrong and deserves better. No matter what she does now, I feel like everyone that thinks redemption is too risky can just point to the bodies Akua left in the desert and say "tell those guys, that we shouldn't lock criminals up and forget about them." It doesn't matter, that she could have killed twice as many. What matters is that she still chose to kill them.

And this is not addressed.

She sits there, healing orphans, and all I can see are the bodies drying in the desert, or the undead tide growing ever closer to eating the world. And she looks, at best, like a damned Proceran Prince, which would be bad enough after all of this, and more likely worse because at least the Idiots In Cleves were not stupid enough to betray their allies before the war was over.

And Akua is tied into everything else, the plans with the Bard, and Malicia, and Amadeus, and it just spoils everything.

For me, that is.

I realize, reading the comments, that this is likely just me. Probably because this theme is very important to me and I've got a lot of hang-ups about it.

But I just wanted to get it off my chest.

ninegardens

Clearly and reasonably worded... or at least as clearly as something this... tangly(?) can be worded. Nicely done.

No real agree or disagree, or feedback.

I think...

This is dumb, but I don't come to PGtE for the themes. There's too much approval of the "Hard men making Hard Choices" doctrine for me to really buy into the story as a thematic work. And... I don't think it's trying to be that? It's trying to be a story, a myth, a hilarious fun time. We are running on Rule of Cool and Rule of Funny here- not on "rule of themes", and definitely not "rule of morality".

None of this disagrees with or is meant to invalidate your quesyness here, I'm just... mostly ranting about something completely unrelated that your post got me thinking about.

Linnus42

I mean I think part of this is Akua is in Praes and interacting with Praesi. They don't care she killed a bunch of Callowans. They care what she can do for them now for the most part.

As for redemption arcs tricky to write especially in gray storylines.

Shveiran

True, but as I said I don't really mind the part where the Praesi crowd adores her.

It's more the general tone of it. Like she is becoming some sort of martyr. And I was on board with that before she committed mass murder and betrayed everyone that could be betrayed like, 5 minutes ago.

hue hue

That's kinda of the point? Those who know akua never forgiven her, she herself knows that her actions are meaningless, that no matter much are saved the dead still pile like a mountain.

Shveiran

I'm not sure I understand your statement.
What exactly is "kind of the point?" That the story portrays her as someone I should feel bad about even as she lapses back into betrayal, madness and casual murder?

Everyton Nothington

I can see where you're coming from, and while I don't entirely agree in this case, also dislike the trend of redeeming irredeemable characters.

In Akua's case I agree that she should not get a happy ending. But I think it is an interesting choice to make her sympathetic. She still isn't a good person, what she does is still for selfish reasons, it just happens to have positive effects this time. But it lets me imagine some of the hopelessness she would feel, if she weren't I wouldn't care much about her story. Usually in books, sympathetic villains get a happy ending. I don't think it will happen this time, which I think is an interesting subversion.

Rant about politics in fantasy in general below, beware.

There is a trend in fantasy novels of glorifying authoritarianism. Not intentionally necessarily, but as a consequence of using a medieval-like settings and not examining the message certain plot lines send.

This book falls into this trap as well, although to a lesser degree than some. I was happily surprised when the soldiers deserted as an example. In most fantasy stories the general public is shown to be either useless or a hindrance due to incompetence. Either not being able to take care of themselves, or rioting because they panic or are tricked into panicking. This is not supported by fact, in general during times of strife, people come together (except those in power who panic and make bad decisions as they are the ones with the most to lose). This can be seen in cities where large scale terror bombings happen, or where natural disasters like hurricane Katrina occurs.

This is the standard of large scale fantasy stories.

"It's not that having an autocrat is a bad idea, it's that we have the wrong autocrat that is causing the problem" paraphrasing a 'bit', but that's usually the message. It can also be seen as "it's not a systemic problem, it's an individual problem". And while I don't think authors are obligated to have a nuanced take on real world politics, I think the most interesting stories have allegories to real world issues.

I won't go into specifics as I don't want to spoil the story, but there is a popular fantasy series where it is revealed in a flashback, one of the main characters committed genocide, and the consequence is that he feels bad about it afterward mostly because someone they care about was also killed accidentally, and changes as a person to someone who thinks killing people for no reason is... bad.

And sure, the character comes from a culture where warfare and bloodthirst is encouraged, but the author still had a choice in creating the culture, and the character. They could have made the same kind of character where they had done something less unjustifiable.

I still enjoy reading fantasy, but the prevalence of unexamined authoritarianism in fantasy gets harder to ignore when the messaging aligns with some alarming real world political trends.

AbraKadabra

I call bullshit on that. Projecting democratic ideas into a medieval environment is just a useless thought exercise. Why? Because those people had NO IDEA that those ideas even exist or will exist in the future.

Everyton Nothington

I'm not saying that fantasy series needs to portray democratic societies. But I think it could be interesting to see a wider spectrum of systems of governance explored. As an example, fantasy often involves magic, but usually only examines how the power divide would be widened. Not that the system needs to be based on the settings magic either, but magic could also even the power imbalance depending on how and when it can be gained.

But thats not realy what I am complaining about, my main issue is whith how commonly I see having a single powerful individual in charge portraied as good and preferable whitout any critical examination. And how often larger structures of descision making, like councils are always portraied as indecisive and slow while never examining why you might want those things.

Its not realy a single work of fiction that I have a problem with, its that there is almost no alternate type of setting or worldview portraid in fantasy that I dislike.

Hargabga

I think you are... partially right. But do keep in mind that it may be just your hang ups worsening the plotline. Remember, if you are uncomfortable with how it is going now, it maybe a good idea to... take a break for a month, and return when Akua ark is finished or at least given a definitive direction.

I however, want to ask: what do you want to be done with Aqua, tone/plotwise?

KiltedBastich

There is, in the real world and in the story, a huge difference between killing enemy soldiers during a tactical engagement and massacring civilians. I mean, by that logic, do the Praesi soldiers that Cat is killing not count against Cat, too? We don't try generals for mass murder, we give them medals for a successful campaign.

The problematic part was Akua turning her coat in the first place, and we know from Cat's viewpoint this is according to plan. Akua was reacting mostly on emotion and instinct, not reason, and that was also according to plan.

From the perspective of those new loyalties, the Callowan army is the enemy, it's war, and you kill enemy soldiers during a war. That's why war is terrible. That Akua's minimizing casualties rather than engaging in slaughter for its own sake is a telling development. That she is killing soldiers that are the enemies of the faction she just joined is not. She was going to be killing people during a war either way.

This is a Contrition story. Akua is a monster who has committed unforgivable sins, who is trying to come to terms with the realization of the consequences of those sins. She will never be forgiven, and she will suffer eternally for it, but because of her new perspective, she's going to do what she can to make things a little better with the time she has left anyhow, because anything less only makes it worse for her. Her choices are suffer more by going back to what she was but with her eyes open, or suffer a little less by engaging in inadequate but not completely futile attempts at restitution. It is a tragedy that is entirely of her own making.

jamesc9

> It is a tragedy that is entirely of her own making.

The smashing of the clay figurines was her action. Her mother taught her that they were clay figurines and not people.

Zach

I don't really understand the point you're making here. It's possible for Akua to change as a person while still having committed unforgivable crimes, and it's not particularly strange that she has. Seeing the people in Ater made things hit home more than anything else because 1. they were the direct results of her own pointless actions and (probably most importantly) 2. they were her own people.

Her recent military actions against the Army of Callow are also not remotely the same as the things she did in the past for several reasons. They were essentially fair acts of war done against a military, and they were done in a very "remote" way where she didn't have to see the results up close (and even then, she still felt bad about it). Still bad, but not really beyond the sort of thing Catherine or other members of the Woe have done countless times.

Her having this sort of change is not that unreasonable or strange. She was raised to not care about other people, and had her perspective change through spending years with Catherine, etc. Unfortunately for her, she did some unforgivably bad stuff before having the opportunity to change. The whole point of Catherine's "punishment" is that, simply by making Akua grow a conscience, she has damned her, because no one with a conscience could ever be happy knowing they've done the sort of things Akua has.

Reader in the Night

I empathize with a lot of what you're saying here, but I think your primary mistake was comparing Akua's situation to anything resembling a modern judicial system. A large part of attempting to rehabilitate individuals is actually giving them the hope that if they do the time and play by the rules, they can actually earn forgiveness (if not from the victim, then from society at large). Akua gets none of that, Cat ran a years-long Gaslighting campaign designed to ultimately convince her that she isn't worthy of redemption and never will be.

So Akua does the only thing she knows how to do, betray her and go back to the only people who will tell her she's not an un-person. Only, she can't be happy there either, because Cat is still in her head.

Ultimately, in any sane judicial system, Akua would have earned either death or multiple million consecutive life sentences, and that would still have been kinder than what Cat did. Akua's punishment has no resemblance to any modern system of punishment, it most closely resembles A Clockwork Orange: A genuinely horrible person brainwashed into finding violence abhorrent, and then released back into that same evil environment, only this time to suffer and be tormented.

ohJohN

As for what changed, I think it comes down to Cat's plans for her: the betrayal was expected, as was that it would be like ash in Akua's mouth. The whole point is that she would defect, go back to old habits, and find that it was no longer bearable with her newly-grown conscience.

So she had already changed internally, and the difference now is she gained proof that – even without hope of ever returning to Cat's campfire – she can no longer stomach her old ways. That's why she decided to try healing people instead of backstabbing them, because she just learned that backstabbing feels like shit regardless.

It still seems a bit odd to me to get hung up on her marginally affecting casualties in battles between professional soldiers that would have been fought regardless; I'd be more convinced by "well, she's healing the sick, but it'll never balance out 100k civilian souls" than "well, she's healing the sick, but wasn't she recently fighting the army we care more about as gently as possible?"

Wonder

With all the rumors going around about Akua and Cat sharing a bed, It wouldn't take a long time for rumors of Cat fighting Malicia for Akua's Throne claiming to circulate. Or have they?

What name would Dread Empress Akua have after successfully being made Empress by her liver The Black Queen?

Agent J

Akua: You are my heart.

Cat: No, I'm your liver. stab

axusgrad

I'm glad we can make fun of dramatic pauses now.

nimelennar

Dread Shoemaker Irritant remains the best Dread Shoemaker.

Someperson

Considering Akua has lately been angered by the fact that everyone is supporting her when they really shouldn't be, I have to imagine her reaction to Abreha and co suddenly flocking to her cause will be... something.

Interlude: A Tower No One Could Claim

"You ask me why I never sought to claim the Tower. I ask you in turn: what great sin have I wrought, that I would deserve such a punishment as to hold it?"

– Kayode Owusu, Warlock under Dread Emperors Vindictive
I and Nihilis

Akua's shielding spell snapped in place just in time for the stone to bounce off it, rolling on the street as behind her the wall finished collapsing ahead of her. The horses had been spooked by the noise, but she was a skilled enough rider to keep her mount from acting out – some others were not, a few youths even being thrown off. A second look told her that no one seemed to have died, which made this one of the least lethal assassination attempts she'd ever been subjected to. That made it all the more ironic this had been the closest anyone had gotten since she'd come to Ater. The golden-eyed sorceress set aside the thought, shifting in her saddle to welcome the presence of the man riding up to her side.

"That seems a little too unfortunate an accident," High Lord Jaheem idly said.

"It was no such thing," Akua replied.

He shot her a considering look.

"You reined in your horse before the wall broke," he noted.

"For the same reason I know it was not an accident," Akua said. "I caught the scent of demolition charges."

And she knew the scent well. There had been a time where Special Tribune Robber had delighted in rubbing just enough powder in parts of her tent that the smell would stick and her subconscious mind wouldn't allow her to untense. If she'd actually needed to sleep as a shade, it would have driven her to a breakdown in a matter of months. The goblin had been an artist in matters of malignance, for all his generally unpleasant demeanour. High Lord Jaheem was impressed, though he should not have been or at least have hidden it better.

"Her Dread Majesty or Wither herself, then," Jaheem Niri mused. "A heady compliment."

Akua smiled, more at his reference to the famous line from 'Maleficent the Great' – if a woman is to be known by the quality of her enemies, is it not a heady compliment to be at war with all the world? – than the flattery. The High Lord of Okoro was known as a well-read man, fond of theatre and the classics. He'd continued to attend public theatre even after enemies tried to kill him at such performances twice.

"Wither. This isn't Malicia's sort of knife."

High Lady Takisha Muraqib of Kahtan had cut into the conversation with what some might consider rudeness, but though High Lord Jaheem dislike her he let the affront pass without comment. It was not the first time and he was not the first to do so. Takisha's face had grown hard and her temper foul since the Assassin had slain her husband. She'd been fond of the man, overly so by the standards of proper nobility.

"It seems the more likely of the two," Akua conceded.

Sappers had done this, or at least people with sapper training. Trying to kill her with a collapsing wall required delicate timing and knowledge of goblin munitions that few who had not been in the Legions possessed.

"You always see goblin hands behind everything," High Lord Jaheem scorned. "And no wonder why. If you had your way we'd break our armies in the Hungering Sands so your thirdborn can rule Foramen under you."

"Matron Wither was part of the rebels that seized the city and exterminated the Banu," High Lord Takisha flatly replied. "Of course she needs to be deposed, it was a mark of Malicia's decline that it was ever otherwise. And as for rule, well, who has the blood for such a title now save the Muraqib?"

Akua understood well the nature of this conversation and the hundred others like it she had heard over the last two weeks. Malicia's fall had been considered set in stone – ah, foolishness – even before two High Seats had defected from Catherine's cause to Akua's – highly dubious – so instead of scheming to seize the Tower the highest of the highborn were now fighting over another prize. Namely, who was to be Akua's own Chancellor when she became Dread Empress. It was considered natural and self-evident that a Sahelian of the old blood would end the absurd decree making it high treason to hold or claim such a Name, regardless of Akua never having made such a promise.

So now the vultures showed off their plumage with little displays like this conversation, pecking at each other's heads so that one might emerge as the natural candidate to be Akua's treacherous right hand.

"High Lady Wither can wait," Akua said, tone a tad short. "We came here for a reason."

She spurred her horse forward, keeping her irritation away from her face. Such politicking did not make her kind better or worse than any other highborn of Calernia. She knew this. It still stuck in her throat that the High Seats would continue these games without batting an eye when a battle had very nearly been lost to the Army of Callow the day before, thousands of levies been mercilessly mowed down. Some of the lords and ladies on the field had been embarrassed by the way their conscripts had broken, but it was not the farmers and traders in shoddy armour that Akua was embarrassed of.

What worth, what pride was there in dying on a field for someone who would not bat an eye at continuing to scheme before your body had finished cooling?

Yesterday's wounded had been allowed into the city against the Empress' orders, though not the rest of the private armies, and considering how undermanned the capital's defences were it had seemed sensible to both Akua and the Black Knight that empty barracks be turned into makeshift hospitals. She'd had to fight tooth and nail with the same nobles who claimed to support her to organize a rotation of mage healers that would see to everyone instead of simply each lord's own wounded – if even that – and it was only after Marshal Nim shamed the entire nobility of the Wasteland by sending Legion healers first that finally they gave in.

It would have been a public embarrassment otherwise, and once again Akua's reputation rose with the nobility for having had the 'foresight to try to spare them such a thing'. She'd bit her lip in frustration until she could feel blood against her tongue. Every time she thought she had finally found the thread she could pull at to undo the knot, she found instead that she was tightening the noose. How long would it take, before she felt the rope around her neck and there was no choice left save the drop? Her fingers closed around the reins at the prospect. They wanted to make her empress. Dread Empress Magnificent, Akua had once fancied she might be called. She'd had plans, dreams. Now it was all within hand's reach and she felt only fear for what she might have once acclaimed a triumph.

Her ever-present shadow led his horse to her side, leaning close.

"They would burn this entire city and all in it for power over each other," Kendi whispered. "It is only a matter of time until instead they burn you."

Akua looked up at the stormy skies, the clouds roiling high above around the Tower. They were never far. The honest words of a man who hated her, who wanted the worst for her, had become oddly soothing. She could count on Kendi Akaze to be exactly what he claimed to be, and that was a startlingly precious thing of late. Their party made good time to the northern districts, where a token force of legionaries kept an eye on the barracks now filled with the wounded and the dying. Akua had already spent hours there this morning, but it was not for the living she had now come. Instead she rode further still to the great plaza where oil-drenched wood rose in great piles.

Above those waited corpses, thousands of them.

High Lord Dakarai Sahel, who along with Abreha Mirembe had already been there, sought her company.

"It was cleverly done, arranging for the bodies to be brought here," the High Lord of Nok said. "There are not many occasions aside from court where we would all gather, but who could afford to miss this?"

"It might have been for the best if you did, Dakarai," High Lady Takisha cut in.

Akua's brow rose ever so slightly. Others would make allowances for grief, but Takisha was being unusually bold today. Interrupting not one but two conversations with peer nobles? Akua herself might find offence in that, not just the High Lady's rivals. You have something afoot, the sorceress thought. You are willing to risk my irritation now because you believe your boldness will pay off elsewhere soon and my memory of irritation will be transmuted to appreciation in retrospect.

"Takisha," the High Lord of Nok gently said. "My condolences."

The other woman's face slacked with surprise.

"It must be galling, owing your life to Abreha and I," he continued.

Surprise turned to fury and mentally Akua tallied a strike on Dakarai's side of the board. It'd been an elegant bit of cruelty, turning implied condolences for her husband's death to an open slap in the face. Takisha replied with a weaker barb about the Ashuran sack of Nok before beating a retreat, not because she was cowed but because she was having difficulty controlling her anger. Golden eyes turned to the High Lord of Nok, who was smiling pleasantly.

"I have a question, my lord, if you will," Akua idly said.

"I have sworn to see you climb the Tower, my lady," Dakarai replied. "I would deny you nothing, much less a question."

"That is pleasantly to hear," she smiled. "You will not mind, then, telling me what Catherine planned when she ordered you to betray her."

He looked at her with convincing surprise.

"Caution is only to be expected," High Lord Dakarai regretfully said, "but I will convince you of my sincerity in time. I had hoped that saving your cause on the field yesterday would win me some trust, but perhaps that is premature."

Akua eyed him for a moment, then let out a few rich chuckles.

"My lord of Nok," she said, "I once saw her order an unconditional surrender of her armies in the middle of a battle just so that she could win in the exact way she wanted. And Abreha's claim to have found mages that could free her of the Night is patently absurd, given that I am fairly certain to lesser goddesses intervened directly in her raising as undead."

She patted his arm fondly.

"Of course she sent you," Akua said. "Mostly likely ordered you to support me as well. So what is it she's after – opening gates to her armies or switching sides halfway through the battle?"

Seeing she would not be convinced, the High Lord of Nok changed his angle of approach.

"Even if there had been such a scheme," Dakarai Sahel said, "would I be bound to it when out of her sight?"

He glanced at the pyres and the gathering crowd around them.

"You would rule well, I think," the High Lord said. "Better than most. And we will need such a tyrant in the years to come. The world is... not what it used to be. It is larger, and much less patient of our foibles."

Akua considered the older man, still handsome for all his grey hair.

"I had thought, once, to rise from the fields of Liesse an empress of empresses," she said. "Triumphant come anew, magnificent in my wrath."

"Nothing is writ until the book is closed," Dakarai said. "I have spent over half my life failing, Lady Akua. Failing to shake off Thalassina's yoke, to become more than a second-rater among the Truebloods, to keep the Ashurans from sacking my city."

He half-smiled.

"But the book is not yet closed," he said. "The Doom did not bury you. Why give it power it did not earn?"

Because it did bury me, Akua thought. I thought even failing would be a magnificent act, that my pride would shake the Heavens for an hour and it would be enough, but our stories all end when the tyrant dies. On the last defiant, maddened cry of rage. Instead she had been made to live through her folly. To sift through the ashes of a thousand dead, to see the horror of her doom ripple across the world. She'd been made to look soldiers in the eye, to see under the helmets. And now, returned to her cradle, she could not unsee it. Death was an end, for her and them. But she'd walked the hospitals now, the crying and weeping and the pain. Glimpsed the colossal number of lives, of families, she had ruined for... what?

What would the Heavens hear, a million screams or a single vainglorious shout? It'd been empty from the start. All she had left was the enormity of what she had done, and she was drowning in it.

"I give the Doom nothing," Akua Sahelian quietly replied.

That had been the lesson of the years that followed it. Even if she saved a hundred thousand lives, it would not even the balance. What she had done to Liesse was not something that could be bought off, bargained over with angels as she had once bargained with devils. Akua gave the Doom nothing because there was nothing she could give. It was not an act that could be redeemed. And in the bleakness of that realization she had come home, for where else could she go, but she hadn't. Not really. Home was not what she remembered it to be. She had been gone too long, now, forgot the ways of the Wasteland. They were no longer sweet against her tongue.

Now it would be a prison to be Dread Empress. A lifetime of clawing at the walls around her, bloodying her fingers trying to change the nature of stone. Back in the dark, in the cloak, only there would be no way out.

"We will speak again," she told the High Lord, voice gone hoarse.

She was meant to speak to the assembled nobles and soldiers, to start the pyre personally. It was a good enough excuse to leave. Kendi watched her in silence, eyes smiling. He only kept silent when he knew she had already spoken worse to herself, smelling it out like a bloodhound. Like a petty thief headed for the noose, Akua walked forward. Unthinking, outside herself, as if someone else was moving her body. As if someone else was winning the Tower for her. Already she could be said to have control of all Ater save the Tower and the district around it, the run of the city, and only caution over the Tower's ancient arsenal had prevented an attempt to seize it by force.

Speaking here today would be the first step of her climb. Her backers were pushing for a formal session of the imperial court, which they wanted to use to force down Malicia and coronate Akua Sahelian as Dread Empress of Praes. All she needed to do was whip these nobles and soldiers into a frenzy, to get them screaming the empress to give answer to her empire. Akua climbed the dais raised for that very purpose, standing tall and hollow, but at her feet there was a scuffle. High Lady Takisha Muraqib's retinue was pushing aside everyone else, clearing a space for the ruler of Kahtan at Akua's feet. The Taghreb noble had a hard, blazing look in her eyes as came to stand below the dark-skinned sorceress.

Takisha's scheme had borne fruit, Akua thought. It was now ready to be revealed.

"My lady Sahelian, I apologize for the disorder but I have news for you that cannot be delayed," the High Lady called out, voice resounding.

Bespelled so that it could be heard even from the back, Akua noted.

"Speak, then," she idly ordered.

"As of a half hour ago, my agents seized the weather-controlling artefacts of the Tower in your name," Takisha said. "Soon the rest of the Tower will follow, and we can-"

Thunder rolled. The clouds around the Tower had turned black and were spreading out, crackling with red lightning. A heartbeat of stillness. A flash of red struck a tall house in the middle of capital, blowing it up in a flash of red flames. The winds began to howl, growing in strength. Hail like black and hardened rocks began to fall in sheets, covering swaths of the city, and in the chaos Akua looked up at the roiling darkness.

"It can be hard, Malicia, can it not?" she murmured. "To tell the difference between a knot and a noose."

"Answer me," she Spoke.

A year ago, Malicia would not have needed to make a sound. Her power had weakened, grown shallower. Or perhaps I never grasped how strongly I relied on Rule when Speaking, she thought. Unfortunate as it was that she had not been able to map out the weaknesses of her aspect properly, it was not something that could truly be tested. The young Soninke lord before her choked for a moment, but then his tense shoulders loosened and he began to talk.

"She sneaks out to drink with her foster sister every few days," he said. "They've been doing it for years. The guards let it happen so long as they don't leave the boundary wards."

Malicia flicked a glance at Ime, whose ageing face was furrowed in thought.

"We'll have to burn a sleeper to get to her there," the spymistress finally said. "Dakarai has been very careful with his camp's defences since changing sides."

The empress did not even hesitate. Now was not the time to balk at burning assets.

"Arrange it," Malicia ordered. "You know whom to implicate."

"That will be much easier," Ime snorted. "Even after Abreha's purges her camp remains a leaking sieve."

It had made Sepulchral a manageable threat, in those days where the High Lady of Aksum – illegally now, given her state of undeath – had been an empress-claimant. Malicia would not have risked allowing or stretching out a rebellion against if she had not been certain that she could not kill her would-be usurper whenever she desired. Sanaa Mirembé's failed coup at Kala had been a stinging blow, given that it might have swung the victory there the other way, but her aunt's culling of the young girl's supporters when she returned from the grave had not caught all of the empress' agents.

Even now, only the very highest secrecy in the Aksum camp remained beyond to Malicia's eyes and ears.

"I'll see if I can ease your way a tad more," Malicia smiled, crouching before the bound man.

Her aspect pulse in her, slowly gaining in power as it fully unfolded. It felt like sliding on gloves, though to Alaya's anger it was a tighter fit than it'd once been. Yet her Rule had not been toppled, and it was enough. The young lord's mind felt like clay under her ghostly fingers, but she must be careful. Carelessness would just shatter his mind. Instead Malicia shaped her will, her order, and slid it into his mind like the slenderest of needles. Never to be noticed until it was pressed against. When the Dread Empress opened her eyes, which she did not recall closing, she rose from her crouch slightly out of breath.

"He will signal one of the Eyes the moment he's aware of the girl sneaking out," Malicia said. "Focus on preparing the assets."

Ime nodded, looking pleased, but as Connect flickered to life Malicia saw that this was not entirely true. Her spymistress truly was pleased, but it was a small thing compared to her worry.

"You have concerns," the Dread Empress said.

Ime did not quite manage to smother the surprise out of her eyes.

"I do, though not about this particular plot," the spymistress said. "May I speak freely?"

Malicia glanced at the young lord, whose eyes were already focused anew. He would need either full turning or a memory scramble before he was released back to the Okoro camp, but either way it was a needless risk to keep speaking in front of him.

"Outside," the empress said. "Our friend here still needs attending to."

Ime nodded, the two of them leaving the comfortable cell in the middle levels of the Tower. The spymistress disappeared long enough to pass to her subordinates the necessary orders before returning to Malicia's side, the two of them briskly heading to one of the sky rooms. Dread Empress Sanguinia had not indulged in the sort of grandiose building projects that many of her contemporaries had, but she had liked to eat her meal with views of Ater splayed out below her. Only two of sky rooms she'd built for that purpose had survived the fall of the Tower after the First Crusade and they were no longer used for that purpose but the very skilled wardwork keeping them protected had remained largely intact.

It was a good place to speak, even if the view was... temporarily indisposed.

Baiting Takisha to make a play for the Cloud Engines had taken longer than Malicia would have liked, but it had turned out exactly as planned. The High Lady of Kahtan had spent most of her hidden pieces in the Tower and badly failed at achieving her objective. Even worse, the empress had ensured that the few survivors who'd managed to flee would report that it was Takisha's men who had damaged the Engines during the fighting and so unleashed the brutal storm still ravaging Ater and its surroundings. It had been days since the failed coup, and still the gales and lightning struck with wrath. There had been snow, hail, acidic rains and winds so scorching they burned the skin. Hundreds if not thousands had died in Ater, the entire capital grinding down to a halt.

High Lady Takisha was probably the most despised woman in the city at the moment, and that was just the beginning of her troubles. When Malicia had ordered her mages to ensure the Cloud Engines were unleashed under the pretext of some cosmetic damage, she'd ensured that the red lightning would strike a particular target: the tent of the eldest son of High Lord Jaheem Niri, the man's wife and their two children. None had survived, and so dearest Akua had spent most of the last few days trying to ensure that two of her most prominent supporters did not begin a war of their own. Had she begun to feel the weight, Malicia wondered? Had it begun to sink in that once you had the support of the High Seats, you then had to keep the High Seats happy?

The dark sky with crackling red light was only the beginning of it all, Malicia thought as she looked through the great enchanted windows.

"I feel like some of the plans we're going forward with are overly risky," Ime said the moment the door closed and the wards hummed.

"We can handle the High Seats," Malicia replied, frowning. "That they have all essentially abandoned our cause frees us to act without many of our old restraints."

It had been difficult to arrange such a wholesale desertion, but it had worked. Alaya had found it hard to bear to send out the Sentinels to brutally put down the riot she'd set up, but the results spoke for themselves: with most of the city turning against her, the High Seats had followed suit. Amends could be made to Ater after this all came to an end, she told herself. If she was to live to see a new moon, she needed Akua Sahelian put forward as Dread Empress at just the right time.

"Our operations to break relations between the High Seats are calculated risks," Ime stated. "Some of them are riskier than others – Sargon could react like a cornered rat if he figures out our involvement – but I can live with the risks. It's the other plan I have issues with."

"Working with the Intercessor," Malicia said.

"Devils make contracts," Ime shrugged. "That is the way of things. We make the bargains we must. Yet what you two have been doing is dangerous to your reign."

"Delaying until the orcs arrive is necessary," the empress said. "The Bard insists it must be threefold motif and near every scrap of namelore I have found indicates she is not inventing the requirement. We have already thrown the goblins at her and soon the separatists will make contact. We need the Clans to close the loop."

"I'm not happy about the separatists either, to be frank," the spymistress said. "There's always been sentiment in the Green Stretch, but it's never been this well organized. Too many deserters settled down there, Malicia. They have former officers and fighting men now, not just farmers. If the Black Queen takes does decide to sponsor the Green Stretch seceding, I'm uncomfortable at the idea that it might stick."

"The sponsorship of a corpse means nothing," Malicia said. "And we both know Vivienne Dartwick will not go to war over the Green Stretch."

"The lack of long-term consequences relies on the assumption of our success," Ime insisted. "Let's say both you and the Black Queen live. She backs the secession, and it happens in the months after we've thoroughly destroyed relations between most High Seats."

Malicia's brow creased.

"You worry there is a risk that more secessions could follow, given that my authority will be weak for the first few years following this," she finally said.

"It's a possibility we can't just dismiss," Ime said.

And she was right, in the sense that the risk existed, but that did not matter. To avoid taking the lesser long-term risk, a larger short-term risk had to be taken instead. And given that in the first instance trouble would be for the Empire and in the second it was Alaya's life on the line, the choice made itself.

"Lost provinces can be taken back," Malicia finally said. "Such setback would not be permanent."

"We still don't know where the orcs will fall in all this," Ime quietly said. "They have a Warlord and we know it's not Troke, so they're difficult to predict. We are looking at a very volatile situation that could potentially result in permanent losses for the Dread Empire, Your Majesty. All this to follow the nebulous plan of an entity we cannot trust and have no real leverage over. I urge you to reconsider."

And Malicia did, for a moment, but the reasons why she had made the decision had not changed. The Intercessor was a snake, but she was a snake who wanted Catherine Foundling dead – and the main thrust of that method of killing was to bury the Black Queen in regional disputes so that it would become the shape of her Role. A shape that could then be exploited to kill her in the moments that followed, though Malicia suspected around then would be when the Bard betrayed her. She had prepared accordingly. Until then, the disputes had to be put forward to the Black Queen and that meant following through regardless of the risks.

To hesitate here meant death.

"I understand your concerns," Malicia said, "but I stand by the decision."

Ime slowly nodded, face unreadable. The Dread Empress slid her will into Connect, but the aspect only flickered weakly. All she glimpsed was a vague sense of disappointment, with no real idea of the depth of it. Malicia would have to try this again later to be sure her spymistress' loyalty remained firm.

"So long as you are aware of my concerns," Ime said, bowing. "I'll take my leave, Your Majesty. There is much work to do."

Malicia nodded her goodbye, remaining before the window as the other woman left the room. The storms still raged under her calm gaze, and it would continue to do so until almost two weeks had passed. So her mages had promised. Once the Clans were close enough it would pass and the last dance could begin. Two weeks would be all that Dread Empress Malicia would need to gore the 'alliance' behind Akua Sahelian. Already Kahtan and Okoro were at odds, but that was only a start. High Lord Dakarai would turn on Abreha when his favourite daughter – Isoba Mirembe's wife – was assassinated seemingly at Sanaa Mirembe's order, as it was certain the High Lady of Aksum would not punish her favoured heir for something she had not done.

Then Sargon Sahelian would catch goblin infiltrators selling the ward schematics of his personal sleeping tent to agents of High Lord Jaheem Niri, burning two bridges at once with the spectre of Wither and Jaheem clasping hands to assassinate him. High Lord Dakarai had already begun to try buying the support of some of Kahtan's more powerful vassals in his quest to become Chancellor, it would be child's play to have him caught by some of Takisha's agents – and it would play on the High Lady's worst fear, that the grand Taghreb coalition behind her was already falling apart.

Meanwhile of them were going to have incidents with the Legions, which would be much easier to arrange now that Akua had gone 'against Malicia's will' to bring private soldiers into the city and into Legion barracks. The Black Knight was wavering, but soon enough the Legions would be reminded of why they had steered clear of the High Seats for so long. And while everyone bit and everyone bled, Dread Empress Malicia would stoke the hunger with the prize she'd put on the table by making her cause seem finished: the position of Chancellor. It was in the nature of Praesi to begin squabbling over the spoils the moment victory was in sight.

So she'd dragged it into sight.

"It will work," Alaya whispered to the storm. "Hour by hour I will pull at the knots keeping me bound, you will only know I have won when you feel the noose around your neck."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Insanenoodlyguy

"The Primal Hunter was part of the opposition that seized the topwebficition board and exterminated the Practical Guide to Evil's top slot," High Lord Takisha flatly replied. "Of course it needs to be deposed, it was a mark of voters's decline that it was ever otherwise."

Sanepastafellow

Really? Ontop of the controversial (I find it annoying among many others) practice of reframing some text into a clunky urge to vote, you're also trashing on another story (one I personally like)? That's just...lame on so many levels

Sanepastafellow

It's just not cool to be trashing on another authors work even if it's a 'rival's in the ratings. Lift each other up dude, not be annoying and while also trying to drag people down

Shveiran

This sounds like trashing to you? Good grief, man, take a joke.

I wasn't even aware Primal Hunter was a thing, and now I am going to check it out.

Miles

Primal Hunter was not a story I was aware of. Good reminder that it's been long enough for other stories to be on there.

And apparently it's good enough to maybe beat pgte for a moment too. Sweet!

matesbe

Burying her in regional disputes might not work if Catherine pulls the rug out from under them by backing her friend over the larger goblin factions. Wouldn't it be interesting if that's what undoes the Intercessor's trap?

Tenthyr

I'm not sure. The moment Catherine considered her friend, that's when the stars behind her eyes weakened. I'm fairly sure the entire plan of the Intercessor was to cause that conversation.

amit27592

Uhh...no, I don't think so. The stars were a reference to the Pilgrim's Star. That's the only reason the Pilgrim was referenced beforehand in the previous Chapter. Also, Intercessor can Influence Wither's goblins through Malicia, but she cannot interfere with non-named individuals (or rather, individuals not having a Role) so the Pickler angle for Intercessor seems improbable (Still possible, just far fetched)

Also, I'm not sure how much Pickler's suggestion will work. Goblin's are shown to have an entirely different Culture (with lots of Stabbing). It's basically extinguishing or taming/civilising that culture, which is the opposite of what we're doing with Orcs. Either way, both motives are at odds and one of them is going to be disappointed.

Onos

You realise how prevalent the stars motif is throughout the entire Guide? There are passages foreshadowing "Stars in the Sky", Cordy and Cat's "staring up at the same stars", and plenty of other references to stars as far back as Book 1.

Given how there have been several direct statements about the stars Cat's Name is currently connected to being various Named under her authority, you really ought to be less absolutely certain you have the right answer. Especially since virtually no one in the comments has ever successfully predicted the Guide.

shikkarasu

I maintain that Intercessor didn't know about Pickler in particular. She knows stories, and she knew that if Cat had to make a decision around the goblins that Fate would ensure it got personal for Catherine.

When you think about it, Intercessor can barely affect anyone at all. It only makes sense if she has gotten really good at indirect moves like that. 2-3 degrees of separation from her actual target. She probably had an Aspect for it back when she was a mere Named.

imagesbe

A fair number of people seem to have been assuming that the stars represented Cat's new budding Name.

Why? No seriously, what gave you any indication that's what the stars referred to?

Forgot_My_Name

Because she quite clearly stated that the stars in the dark when she closed her eyes were Names under the purview of her forming Name.

The stars weakening represented her authority/Name weakening.

jamesc9

One of the stars was Ranger. She could cut it off, but it only lasted three days.

Miles

No reason. People in this site's comment section jump to random conclusions all the time and then hang on to that trainwreck for dear life. I also heard something about a podcast at one point that spawned some of the more ridiculous ones.

The stars fading was a colorful way to say the night is over.

kinghaart

She was in a tent, so I'm pretty sure that it wasn't about the time of day. It could be about stress and worry clouding her vision or about her Name wavering.

Funny to me now how Cat and Akua are basically both being put through similar scenarios of having to keep a lot of people with competing concerns happy. Maybe by the end it will be Akua who ends up in the Role Bard had planned for Cat. Being a glorified mediator of snakes like the High Lords for many decades isn't enough justice for Akua but probably beats out being the Dead King's warden in sheer tedium.

Liliet

Ah, but that was the moment she asked the question if she SHOULD listen to Pickler. She considered her in the context of regional politics, and it was the possibility that she might prioritize those over the story Pickler brought her that weakened her claim

(that's my reading at least and I believe it's coherent and fits well)

Zach

This makes sense to me, and I think it will both make sense and be "thematically meaningful" if the actions of non-Named like Pickler (or Named not acting according to their role and suddenly getting a new Name, like Hakram – it's very possible Bard's plan was made under the assumption that Hakram was Adjutant) end up saving Catherine from the Bard's plot.

kinghaart

Maybe, but Hakram's decision could still hurt Cat and Bard should know about it by now. So I expect her to try for that play at least.

It will come down to whether Cat chooses to take it as betrayal/abandonment vs as a statement of how successful her relationship with Hakram has been. I could see the abandonment angle on particular – one thing we've basically NEVER seen her deal on an emotional level is her lack of family growing up, and I have always read that as hey repressing it, but it does tend to show up in the way she clings to the people close to her and has such starkly in/out relationships with them (e.g. Amadeus and their stabby history).

Insanenoodlyguy

Could be for all of them. A very similar setup is primed to go when she discovers just who her Warlord is. I'm just hoping they can admit their love for each other out loud during it, but I can't imagine it ends with her bossing the orcs around. Not sure where the out for the secessionists is though. Though more interesting is, with Malicia obviously tightening the noose she wants to avoid around her neck, How is Akua, certain of her doom, going to end up untangling hers?

RoflCat

"Crabs in a bucket."

She has the realization, the next thing she need is to act on it.

Not in the half-hearted way she has been doing where people mistook her intention, but an active rebellion against the way of Praes.

...although if she timed it poorly people will turn it into her basically revealing Malicia's plots to cause fractures and accidentally unite them all behind her...

Abrakadabra

What I see is that Bard will probably succeed in altering Cats name, but it will be probably an unexpected one.

And then as the Bard gloats about her success, Cat Just retorts that it never was about names. But about shaping the future.

Because even with a crippled name she is the Black Queen, and she will win.

RoflCat

Honestly, that certainly fits with the "This is Praes, you get what you want but not the way you want it"

Bard can play the Story, but she can't change the essence of them.

Also ironically being disadvantaged and still win IS part of Catherine's story at this point.

kinghaart

Yeah the big risk I see for Bard is that despite the plotting she is a hero, and she is now making a play in the heartland of Below – which means that in the context of Praesi stories, she is the Villain.

She will lose, but I am worried about who she might take down with her...

caoimhinh

Another thing is, it seems like the one who's dealing with the regional disputes is Akua, that might save Catherine the trouble.

Liliet

Well, Akua is quite demonstratively not dealing with them last we checked.

caoimhinh

Not making an effort in that direction willingly, no.
But it is still being done, hence the whole "Why am I succeeding in this if I'm not trying and don't want it?"
that Akua has going on for her.

Liliet

It's almost like they can deal with it themselves if they really want to!

ruduen

The Dread Empress is in the tower, talking to herself about how her plan will definitely work. Well, it was nice knowing you.

At the moment, one of the relationships that's mostly gone unspoken that I'm curious about is Ime and Amadeus. Fairly early in the series, it was stated that Ime owes Amadeus a debt. While I don't think that's nearly enough for her to betray Malicia on its own, I do think the other conversations and hints we've gotten regarding Ime's current actions now lead to one potential avenue for it.

I think Ime would be willing to betray Malicia's plans if it looks like that was the best way to save Alaya's life. And with how things are shaking out, it's a possibility.

Lox

Trust is the wager that takes your life. -The song.

kinghaart

In Malicia's case, it's the wager itself and the constant guarding against any possible betrayal that might cost her everything.

Another read of it is that the cost of building trust is willingness to lay down your life.

Insanenoodlyguy

With Betrayl being an undercurrent of this book, I'm wondering if Ime won't die before she can do this because Scribe realized a little while ago how keeping Malicia alive will be one of Amadeus' goals, so Ime's gotta go because she's the best chance of that. Scribe has made clear she didn't really learn anything from her whole "Betray them for their own good" stunt except "Don't get caught this time."

Liliet

Hakram on the other hand is sure she won't do it again.

Insanenoodlyguy

She wouldn't be. She won't betray her current employer, Cat. Cat wants Malicia to die. Scribe is helping. And will honestly believe she's helping Amadeus, for all he will hate her for it.

shikkarasu

Not another hand! He's already lost two!

Rey d`Tutto

You beat me to the pun. I gotta hand it to you

Miles

Rule of 3 BaBY

Liliet

Yeah, I'm seeing Ime knocking Malicia out, smuggling her out of the Tower and dumping her in Amadeus's waiting embrace too.

shikkarasu

That would be great symmetry with the way Amadeus' Black Knight died. (Killed by a random conscript holding a pointy stick because said Knight thought he was invincible against non-Named.) It would really drive home how little Alaya really understands the way Maddie thinks, and more importantly why he thinks that way.

Shveiran

With Malicia's paranoia about anyone betraying her, I deem more likely that Ime will try and Malicia will tragically kill her.

Liliet

Alaya's paranoia doubles with / is founded on a near-complete lack of hard power. Speaking was one, but as she is losing soft power her Name is losing strength, and overall her strength was always in being able to direct how other people act.

As Amadeus at Second Liesse demonstrated, Alaya is very vulnerable to someone close to her just suddenly behaving in a manner she didn't expect.

And she has to lean on Ime right now. There's a reason she keeps checking her loyalty with Connect – and the scenario I'm thinking of is one where Ime's loyalty is unwavering and she's doing this all for Alaya's own good.

Shveiran

Gotta say, I'm not a huge fan of the whole "sabotaging you for your own good" thing, especially when it involves one's life work.

But that may be just me.

Still; I don't really think there is an Alaya that exists beyond Malicia, by this point.

shikkarasu

I agree, but it is a very solid motivation: selfish, yet motivated by love. Very human. Much tragic. So hubris.

Shveiran

Oh, sure. It's mainly the framing that usually comes with the trope that irks me, where the saved is grudgingly thankful.

That really rubs me the wrong way, because if you were ready to give up on your life to do something, having that choice taken from you is at the very least a breach of faith. No?

Liliet

There is a point where you're dragging the person screaming and kicking from their attempt to pour gasoline over themselves and set themselves on fire, insisting that it will heal their injuries by making them no longer exist.

I don't think "Alaya that exists beyond Malicia" is a meaningful delineation or one that matters. Alaya is a person who also goes by Malicia and who I hope survives, much like everyone else involved (save for Neshamah, fuck that guy)

shikkarasu

I think this was more of a Catherine Foundling vs the Black Queen situation. Cat struggles with how to pursue the needs and wants of both women. Often one needs to suffer for the other.

Malicia doesn't seem to care what Alaya wants/needs. She let that wither and die to keep the Dread Empress untouchable. She betrayed her oldest friend multiple times, was purposefully distant with the Calamities that didn't already despise her, keeps no Chancellor and has no alliances. She uses Rule to keep her officers in line and Connect to make sure her spymistress/lover "remains loyal".

Malicia seems like where Winter!Cat was going, but without anyone to stop her from going too far.

Liliet

TBF she still kept refusing to try assassinating Amadeus, and concerns about Ranger making it impossible were NOT primary in her mind there. And she only appointed the next Black Knight after getting invaded, too.

Overall actually I would argue that Malicia is a mask created out of a subset of Alaya's desires. Specifically the self-preservation subset, so the one that's actually kind of supposed to override the others – and so it is. Both literal physical self-preservation, not getting killed or physically violated again, and more metaphorical "self"-preservation – keepign her image of herself together, keeping her ability to control herself together, being a shield against her trauma.

The problem is that trauma's going around the edges these days – the problem of trusting Sentinels, of siccing them on people – and so Alaya wraps herself in Malicia ever tighter, trading off a margin of control for blocking the exits.

TigerQuoll

So I've recently stumbled onto wiktionary (yes, this does relate to the Guide), which is a sort of multi-language wiki/dictionary thing, and theres a frick ton of inter-language references in our esteemed story. So just dumping the one's I've found here.

TigerQuoll

Keter: first one I found entirely by accident while, incidentally, brainstorming names for other purposes. In Hebrew, kéter (or z 3X) means crown, hinting at both its name "the Crown of the Dead" and the association of the Dead King with crowns overall.

'Procer' in latin is a term meaning nobles, princes or chiefs. Self explanatory.

TigerQuoll

Ater: (this one's a doozy, so with a deep breath).

In both Portuguese and Galician it means "to conform or comply", but also comes from the latin attinere, meaning "to attain". These reflect both the tyrannical nature of the Dread Empire's power, and also the perennial ambition and desire to seize that power.

But the term 'āter' also has its own meanings in latin. It can describe a) dull black, b) gloomy, dismal or unlucky, c) malevolent and d) obscure, but the last is likely not relevant. The Latin 'āter' interestingly also comes from the Proto-Indo-European term meaning fire, linking it to both passion (the fire, to obtain) and that fire dying out (as the dull black descriptor would have likely referred to dull ashes/charcoal).

TigerQuoll

Within Praes, Wolof is a native senegalese language, Aksum is an ancient Ethiopian Kingdom and Thalassina is a genus of lobsters but more likely is just a reference to 'Thalassic' for anything sea-related (hence Thalassocracy as a word for seaborne empires). Nok is the name given to an ancient culture in modern-day Nigeria while Okoro is a common Igbo last name wikipedia says means greatness (other sites give many various meanings).

Foramen is the only one that seems a little confusing, meaning an aperture or cavity in bones. Possibly a reference to it being taken over through the use of tunnels, or simply alluding to its having tunnels. The Sahelian Kingdoms were a series of empires that controlled trade routes through the sahara desert.

TigerQuoll

'Lycaonese' is clearly a reference to Lycaon, a mythical werewolf punished by the Greek Gods, yet interestingly so is the name of Antigone's wolf. 'Lykaia' is the name of a ceremony celebrating the Lycaon/Zeus myth said to involve ritual cannibalism and the transformation of the cannibal into a wolf. Just a fun word, or is there a possibility she was actually once a cursed person?

'Kairos' is an concept in oration that a good argument needs to be made with the right timing. Interpret that as you will.

sengachi

Dang. You really put the work in, thank you.

TigerQuoll

Never underestimate the power of google.

(Thanks)

Hargabga

Good work. I personally wonder more about Callow and it's cities. Seems like they're all English/French inspired, but almost totally made up.

Proceran principalities are either northern HRE, northern France or northern Spain regions. Levant is basically Spanish real and mythical cities, with a name of predominantly Muslim Eastern Mediterranean region, so the combination of the two (and Levantines being basically Arab similar to Maghrebi/Taghrebi) points to Al-Andalus (as does the fact that nearby Proceran principalities are also from Spain). League is Greek, with Helike being the name of ancient capital of what was later Sparta, Bellerophon just some guy who had a lot of hubris, Nicae also a greek city mostly known for being a place for the first christian gatherings that established the common founding principles of Christianity (and more importantly for the foreshadowing, a capital of the successor of Byzantines after the Fourth Crusade that continued their legacy while Constantinople was under Latin Empire), Atalanta also some hunter girl, you get the point.

And oh yeah, Aksum is also a prominent city where the legendary Ark of the Covenant supposed to be, Soninke are also a West African ethnicity, just like Taghreb are a play on Maghreb – a name for North-West African region that was also known as Barbary Coast, and Sahel (from which the last name of both Wolofian and Nok High Lord comes) is a long stretch south of Sahara desert (both Wolof and Soninke people at part lived there). Daoine is Irish for people, with Deoraithe being Gael for exiles, but the people themselves are apparently Iroques inspired as per WoG.

The Drow are Slavs, although which exactly is hard to pin.

hue hue

always thought, callow- > gallows

Miles

Callow is an obscure English word. It means “almost grown up” or “Adult in age but not personality” or something along those lines.

Liliet

Drow are southern/balkan slavic specifically, though at least one name (Bogdan) is iconic Ukrainian

Hargabga

That... would be a fairly accurate portrayal of Balcans to be honest.

caoimhinh

If I'm correct, Callow comes from the heroic archetype that represented that nation's relationship with Praes. "A callow youth that becomes a hero and rises to fight evil and tyranny"

Catherine even mentions a bit of it in the early chapters. Reinforced by how in the historical wars between Callow and Praes, Heroes were mostly teenagers.

amit27592

I recommend posting this on the subreddit as well. People there are sure to get a kick out of this. I knew a few of these but not all. Also, check out EE's AMA for some more stuff to add to this.

Onos

Yup, EE is on record as saying virtually every name in the Guide is a reference to a language, culture or old story. He even mentions Ater being a pun in multiple languages back in Book 1 or 2.

Breagach, Trismegistus, Aine, Niri, Kairos, Masego, Tyr (as in Tyrian Empire), Tariq, and Ivah all give you a solid idea of the person/place's role in the story. Plus a bunch of other lesser references like the Brocelian, Aisne and Levant.

Liliet

Breagach was deliberate in-universe, tbf also wait what does Ivah's name say?

Sinead

I'd presume 'Archer' given other European languages.

....And it did invent 'sidling' which Archer perfected....

Onos

Here's a thought – rather than "presume" when someone asks a question, try actually looking for the answer first.

One

So, so many interludes lately.

Sinead

I am sorry that I did not feel like searching for the etymology at the time, so I just presented what I had understood the naming convention to be (the word 'Iver/Ivar' is connected to archery and thought that they shared etymology).

"Ivar as a boys' name is of French derivation, and the name Ivar means "yew, bow army". Ivar is an alternate form of Ivo (French). Ivar is also a variation of Ivor (Scandinavian, Old Norse). Ivar is also used as a derivative of Yves (French)."

Onos

Breagach is also real world Irish for "false" (not quite the same as in-universe, but close).

Ivah is a double; it's a (female) Hebrew name for "overturning" (pretty fitting since Cat was trying to overturn the regime) and it's also the name of a city conquered by the Assyrian empire.

EE is a frickin' genius.

Liliet

Nice!

My own association was with the Russian word "willow" (which fits if you read "i" as "ee" and "h" as silent) but that wasn't particularly meaningful

Hargabga

That's a great point. Kinda ashamed that as a native russian speaker i didn't pick that up.

Liliet

can't get them all lol this occured to me FAR from immediately, i just hang out on discord where linguistic discussions come up far more often

SonOfLilit

I speak fluent Hebrew and am fairly confident that's not a thing.

Could be confused with Eiva which means something like enmity, but was never used as a name.

Dredcor

Malicia is soooo dead.

SpeckofStardust

So I'm reminded of nation/civilization quests on forms and well, Alaya is making the sort of sense I see right before the biggest meltdowns in said quests.

Robert Allaband

This right here shows Malicia's downfall, she thinks she is working with the Bard. No one works with the Bard, they are only tools for her to use and she has a habit of breaking those tools especially when she uses them on Cat (See the Lone Swordsman and Saint).

CGundlach

Don't forget the Shining Prince, whom she pretty much sent to get executed by Cat.

pagesbe

You mean Exiled Prince.

Shveiran

Did she now? I mean, she gave him a pretty solid advice; death came as a result of Dorian following it stupidly. You could argue that the Bard foresaw it all, of course, but my read was simply that she wasn't too invested in the outcome yet. I mean, back then, Cat's story wasn't really anything special. The Bard is incredibly skilled, so it's not ludicrous to say that she saw it all coming, but...I find it unlikely, personally. It stretches my suspension of disbelief, right now.

Liliet

Her advice couldn't work because Catherine was in a pattern of three and thus functionally invincible to anyone except William (and demons).

Shveiran

Oh, damn, you are right. I never noticed that.

Yeah, no, consider my comment retracted. Totally murder. Carry on.

Stormblessed

Ah the threefold nature is Praes and the Tower, the fledgling goblins' something, the the nascent Orc kingdom.

Perhaps Cat ends up winning over the Intercessor by the power of friendship!

Stormblessed

Because Cat has friends in every corner! Akua for Praes, Pikler for Goblins, Hallam for Orcs, and if the hidden knife is Callow then she's still got Vivienne there.

Of course the danger could secretly be testing friendships because that could actually be the plot all along.

dadycoool

She always did consider the Greenskins more friend to her than a significant amount of her own kind, and now she's poised to extend that hand to all of them. Orcs as rancher serfs, maybe?

Insanenoodlyguy

That's exactly what she shouldn't do. That's the meddling that lets bard win. The best solutions, it would seem, are "Hey there's some stuff I can offer here, but end of the day, you all gotta do what you gotta do." The goblins don't get a mutually beneficial alliance but they get a chance to try a new way. The orcs will not be under cat, though she might be able to convince Hakram to take her word as his path, it'd be a mistake for both, a Warlord does not serve at another's side. It should be more like a certain moonlit night (very well could be one of those cause stories), where she will ask him what he wants and he will tell her they will see what each can do with that in their new places. I'm not sure what the separatists are going to do but I do believe whatever it is, Cat won't do the thinking for them.

I realized typing this out. Cat's name. So obvious. Warden is a trap. Arbiter is a trap. Cat will provide some overall course correction if somebody's going the wrong way, but her primary focus is making situations where people can help themselves, can grow. Her father raised her this way because he honestly had no idea of any better way, but Cat is using his lessons and those of Grey Pilgrim to make a better way. Cat is learning how to be significant, even authoritative, but she's shaping the paths and marking the forbidden and dangerous areas, maybe even directly preventing entrance to such places, but otherwise not deciding the destinations for others, just helping them get there. Squire has been a practice run on how Cardinal will work, but back in Book 5 (chapter 46, Vestiblue) I think is where this path really started. Named don't need a queen or a ruler, any attempt to do so will inevitably end in ruination, and fail to make a true alliance, but especially for a villain. Becoming the opposite of the Bard as the active authority over names would almost certainly complete the inverse by giving her a very, very short lifespan. But Cat promotes autonomy but also shows how some things can be adhered to for the better of all, something villains have long lacked.

Catherine will be an excellent Practical Guide (to Evil)

dadycoool

I think I was more talking about letting it be an option, like with the goblins. Which I realize is basically what you're saying. "Hey, if you orcs are willing to abide by our laws, we have land for your herds, if you want to work it. Hey, if you goblins are willing to abide by our laws, there are cities all over Callow that would appreciate your skills."

Also, that name really is obvious, at least once it occurs to us. It is a story of a Practical Guide (to Evil) that follows Cat's path, after all.

Liliet

I don't think that'll work well. Land is valuable, Cat can't just give it for free for foreigners to use. The idea with goblins was to let them into established settlements, not to grant them land.

dadycoool

I was referring to serfdom like how it was IRL, where the land belongs to the Noble and the peasants pay a tax for the right to make the land useful. Also, I was saying that the goblins would be allowed to settle down in and contribute to Callowan cities.

Mental Mouse

Callow also happens to have a great deal of land that's been depopulated and/or magically devastated...

Shveiran

Yes, depopulated right now. If you give a good slice of it to, say, the Clans, suddenly Callow as a Kingdom is and will stay less powerful.

The difference is between opening your borders to greenskin refugees and granting land to a foreign power in your own homeland.

Clmineith

This one has been told before. Not with nearly as many explanations, but predicting Cat to become the Practical Guide To Evil was done... many chapters (many arcs?) before. Probably as a joke, but still.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh I'm not thinking I'm the genius who figured it out. Just a guy who pivoted and realized it's not a joke after all.

Miles

Warden was never going to be her Name. Even if you claim an alternate definition for a warden such as warden of the marches you still end up downgrading from "Conqueror Queen +" to "Backwater Duke".

Her Name is going to be along the lines of an Empress, High Queen, Queen of Kings or the like, unless she goes even higher and becomes something with implied godhood like Deus Ex Machina

Sinead

'Implied godhood' is not too far of a stretch when she has already crossed that threshold.

The fact that she reacted so strongly to Gigantes Spellsgiving (to me) means that she has enough of a basis to reascend those sorts of heights.

kinghaart

I don't see it being a ruler name though. More of a checks and balances thing.

Ultimately the hardest choice might be between peace and love. The deal with the Matrons grant peace but no love. The deal with Pickler grants live but almost certainly leads to war.

Burlyraven

Malicia: Mwahaha, I will turn Akua's supporters on her and each other. That will surely hinder her.

Akua: It's actually kind of charming to have so many people that are good at hating me around. Now if only they would stop worshipping me against my wishes.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yep, Akua's going to just lose it, not try to keep them cohesive at all, instead just give them a speech that goes something like "OH MY GODS WE ARE HERE, THE BLACK QUEEN IS COMING TO FUCK US IN ALL THE WAYS I DON'T WANT, AMADEUS IS COMING TO SHANK AND/OR BURN US, THE ORCS ARE COMING TO STOP US FUCKING THEM, THE DEAD KING IS COMING TO FUCK EVERYTHING, AND ALL OF YOU ARE STILL JUST FUCKING AROUND ON THIS PETTY SHIT WHICH IS MOSTLY MALICIA WHICH YOU ALL WOULD FIGURE OUT QUICKLY AS YOU ARE CAPABLE OF BEING SMART BUT YOU LIKE THE EXCUSE TO GO AT EACH OTHER. WELL LETS GO DOWN THE LINE. YOU SUCK. YOU SUCK, YOU DEFINITELY SUCK, YOU SUCK A BIT HARDER, DON'T THINK I DON'T SEE YOU HIDING OVER THERE, BECAUSE YOU SUCK AT HIDING ON TOP OF THE OTHER WAYS YOU SUCK. EACH AND EVERY ONE OF YOU SUCKS HARD. I DON'T WANT YOU ON MY SIDE, BECAUSE WHO THE HELL WOULD EVER WANT TO CONQUER ANYTHING IF THE REQUIREMENT IS HERDING OVERGROWN SHITTY CHILDREN. SO YEAH, LETS END THIS HERE YES? KILL ME SO WHOEVER'S ASS YOU SUCK NEXT WILL PRESENT THEIR BUTTHOLE, END THIS ALLIANCE, AND SPEND YOUR MISERABLE EXISTENCE TEARING EACH OTHER APART BETTER THEN ANY OF THOSE OTHER PEOPLE HEADING TOWARDS US COULD. I WOULD ACTUALLY PREFER IT THEN KEEP THIS GOING AND WIN. DO IT. C'MON I WANT YOU TO. "

Of course, then they all bow before her and she realizes to her horror that for the first time, they legitimately are doing it as a gesture of loyalty and respect.

P

Poor Akua. Doomed to get what she wanted

Yunamed

Cursed with success

Reader in the Night

It's hilarious seeing Cat and Malicia each trying to out-manuever and out-guess Akua, while Akua isn't even trying to win.

And as long as Akua doesn't want to win, she can't possibly lose. So you have the comical situation of two of the most cunning schemers in Calernia effectively beating themselves/ each other in the game thinking they're fighting Akua, while Akua is basically sitting there as a prop.

Clmineith

Actually, Cat knows that Akua's will eventually NOT want the Tower. She's not bad at predicting Akua, her timing is just a bit off.

Linnus42

In theory sure Akua currently doesn't want the job and sees it as a gilded cage. Though I don't think Akua would want Cat's current solution of sitting on a throne to seal DK into Hell for centuries lol.

The issue is I don't think Akua is going to go against the overall theme of the book so far. Which is people stepping up to do jobs only they can do because they have to not because they want to. Hakram would prefer to stay beside Cat's side and not be Warlord but he realize he has to do it to steer the Orcs to a good future. To win this war, Hanno realize he has to play politics, give orders to troops as a commander, and give advice to other relevant war front figures be they Named like Frederic or Red Knight or even no Named like Abigail and regular troops.

The theme is "If not Now then When. If not Me then Who." so I expect Akua to fall in line behind Hanno and Hakram and complete her redemption arc by taking job running Praes even if she doesn't want it. And thus usher in a new age lol.

Insanenoodlyguy

But not as dread empresss. I suspect cat will show up and realize to her horror the plan is fucked because Akua is a Hero now.

Xi Cree

An Angel of Contrition is going to come down from on high flanked with an angel of mercy and both of them are going to crown Akua the first Hero Empress...

All while the poor dear screams in denial and the whole world looks on in utter confusion.

shikkarasu

I want memoirs co-authored by Akua and Abigail. A sort of spiritual successor to On Rule which frequently devolves into complaining about their job and, specifically, Catherine Foundling for making them do it.

caoimhinh

"Why the fuck do I keep succeeding?"
by A&A

shikkarasu

@caoimhinh

They need a support group. AaAA: Abigails and Akuas Anonymous

MoreBeer

All hail the Undread Empress Magnificent!

Liliet

oh my god this is a masterpiece my fav part is 'you suck at hiding on top of other ways you suck'

Miles

I love how everyone involved is so wrong about everyone else's plans this time around.

Some Smartass

Oh, Empress... if fate had let you hear Akua's words, would you have reconsidered?

As for Akua, the Choir of Contrition vibe is real. I can just hear them screaming YOU WILL NOT BE FORGIVEN, REPENT.

boballab

Yeah I was looking at all the Akua PoV's and it is looking more and more like she is heading towards being a candidate for the Choir of Contrition.

Liliet

Cat never really did get over her brief experience with them, did she?

shikkarasu

I was reflecting a Chapter or two ago how she has become the 'otherworldly creature meddling with the minds of others.' It's an impressive parallel to her penultimate confrontation with TLS where he was the one saying "It's not mind control; they just make you see the truth."

Now she's done the same to Akua.

Some Smartass

She's at least not pretending that this is anything but torture. 😊

Liliet

TBF she's a lot more... targeted, than Contrition as led by William.

dadycoool

It's so weird seeing Above's favor from the inside, with Malicia scheming to try and tighten a noose around Akua's neck when she's already feeling like she's just waiting to drop, for a completely different reason: Contrition. Malicia thinks she's playing The Game with Akua, but the young Hero has already lost faith in it, waiting for the right time to put away the pieces.

kinghaart

Everyone trying to play each other so hard that they will end up just playing themselves.

Amadeus is the only one smart enough to stay largely offscreen :p

edrey

Akua speaking about the Heavens, and Malicia is making the world hate her (more) .

well, we all know how this end.

i am just curious how much goblin fire amadeus had? this cant end without fireworks.

ninegardens

Notice how Akua and Malicia both talk about knots and nooses? Despite never meeting or talking to one another... this could be ideas leaking between different characters via EE... but also feels like it might be weird namelore bullshit going on. Interesting.

Also: Kendi for chancellor. A+ treacherous lieutenant, would place trust in again.

And Akua being like "Lol, so Cat sent you to join me, what's up with that?"

Mental Mouse

The knot/noose thing could plausibly be a Praesi proverb or stock phrase.

caoimhinh

Kendi really weirds me out.

He feels more like a Fae than a human. He speaks like a character in a fable rather than a normal person or even the rest of the characters in this novel. The way Kendi talks to Akua giving a brief warning/mockery about how someone will turn on Akua every single time she talks to someone, it's like a character in some sort of myth or folklore tale that is told around a bonfire.

He is taking the role of being the devil on the shoulder a bit too literally.

kinghaart

Part of me wonders if Akua actually did kill him and he's just her subconscious flaggelating itself.

Reader in the Night

Huh. I wonder what the fuck the Bard is actually plotting. She's trying to invoke a threefold pattern of Catherine's involvement in Praes, ostensibly to make her forming Name more geographical instead of ideological.

But that makes no sense. Of the three rebellious parts of the Empire asking for Catherine's blessing, she is leaning the way of friendship on the goblins; she is almost physically incapable of denying Hakram his thing; and I don't know who's going to show up for the Green Stretch yet but I'm betting Amadeus or Killian, to which she will most likely cave if only to finish the pattern. And none of this would be hidden from the Bard, because stories are her domain.

So she's actually trying to force Catherine down the path of The Power of Friendship, but to what end? Is she trying to force Catherine to choose friendship over politics to set up a betrayal? Or is it just so she loses the Name of Warden and gets something else?

Lox

Like, guardian or caretaker?
The babysitter of the east!

Insanenoodlyguy

No see, Bard WANTS Warden. Warden spends her time keeping all this shit in line, a predictable role that even if Malicia can't kill is no longer a real metathreat. The big bad the other bads have to listen to. Cat will be lucky to last a decade with that story, and it keeps her contained till then.

What she fears is the woman who can show others a better path, finishing what Tyrant started and completely ending her age of wonders. The Cat who's the best aspects of her Father and Grey Pilgrim smashed together, who, as she's always done, asks you what you want and then shows you a way to do that without the usual bullshit.

"This would not disappear all their troubles, but it would give them the tools to solve them by their own hands. And all it would require of them was to follow the Black Queen's rules, to heed her Accords so that they might all reap the benefits of her peace." – Interlude: Reprobates.

I joked about the idea before, but now I really think she's becoming the Practical Guide. The title has always been about the Named Character, A Practical Guide to Evil.

Shveiran

Look, I like a name drop as much as the next guy, but if I had to point at just one reason why this seems unlikely, it would be that Practical Guide To Evil sounds absolutely awful as the name of a person.
It just doesn't work.

Have you ever heard someone say something like this?
"Hey you know Fred? Yeah, the ranger. That guy is just so clear-sighted and efficient. And he is so very good at showing people around Yellowstone. I guess he's really a practical guide! Yes, that's what Fred is, a Practical Guide to Yellowstone!"

Does that sound natural, does that sound like something a person would say?
Yuck. Just no.

Liliet

This this this this.

boballab

Also it doesn't fit with the aspects Cat had been feeling and starting to use. She was able to silence Malicia and everything has been pointing to a Name that deals with being in charge of something, hence why she stated at one point it seemed as if the Bard was trying to turn her into her replacement. Cat has been working towards becoming, unintentionally IMO, the ruler of all the Named with her Liesse Accords and the Terms right now.

Insanenoodlyguy

And when Pickler came to her it weakened. Much like Akua is about to deny Dread Empress at the pivot of her getting it, Cat will deny this name because, as she said a long time ago, she wants what she's building to outlive her. If she's in charge of all the villains there will be people who go against her rules the second they think they can out of spite, because villains need to be made to see how it's in THEIR best interest to follow along, and not just because Big Bad Arbiter or whatever she's heading towards can make you play nice.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not Practical Guide to Evil. Just Practical Guide.

Shveiran

And what guiding has she done, that it can define her to the core? This Name is years in the making, and I just don't see it.

Shveiran

Not to mention, if you drop the "To Evil" that sounds like a better fit for a ranger. It doesn't even sound like the name of a guru or sage, just a Ranger or maybe a teacher, and even that is stretching.

It's just not a natural way to use those words, even if you can squint and argue for a certain interpretation of them; it comes out as awkward and forced, and we are talking about the big payday of an author who does, quite clearly, like to play with words.

Look, I'm not saying it's impossible nor anything, but doesn't it at least sound very, very unlikely?

who says the name has to be Catherine

Who's to say Ranger is not the Practically Guide to Evil? She isn't hellgod-aligned but her philosophy is hella Below, and (minor spoiler to Patreon extra chapters but heavily indicated in main chapters) she really is a pragmatist who cares about her pupils learning. Cat hasn't really been a mentor to anyone, by choice for storyfu reasons, but Ranger has five wisened apprentices.

Shveiran

Considering Ranger has been on screen for maybe three chapters over seven books, I'm going out on a limb and say this series is not named after her.

aurikdomi

Yeah I always thought it was Black who was Catherine's practical guide to evil

magesbe

Guide anything does not fit. Her Name is about overseeing or commanding, as indicated by her already absurdly strong Speaking ability; there is nothing "Guide" worthy about her ability to order people. She has never been about Guiding. If anything, she's about dragging the continent, kicking and screaming, into some measure of order.

Eli

I think I like the idea of the name just being something like Guide.

Not a teacher or direct mentor or ruler, not someone who forges the path for you, just someone who shows you the way you can walk and lets you make the choices yourself.

It'd be a sufficiently broad and thus versatile name and great enough role that the Bard would have to worry about it.

...This is at least partially because I really like the characters in stories, particularly fairy tales, who are magical and mystical and just show up in the narrative, say something along the lines of "hey, you could do this thing. ~vague warning~ And also ~says something wise sounding~" and then just disappears and lets the main character get on with it.

Insanenoodlyguy

I do like "Guide" now that you put that out there.

ChillyPepper

I think it's something like "win goblins, draw with nobles, lose with orcs" kinda thing, personally. Or whatever fits the pattern more in such case.

Sinead

Patterns of Three in this case are very specific things that do not necessarily come into play here. By which I mean, you may still have a win draw loss pattern, but it's because of the three separate conflicts, not because of the Pattern of Three, which is rival specific.

Zach

Why do you think Bard is involved in Hakram or Pickler? She probably wouldn't have influence over Pickler (but she'd have influence with Wither through Malicia) and IIRC she hatched her plan when Hakram had a different Name and Role (and thus expected Catherine's involvement with the orcs to just be in the form of backing some orc faction, with Hakram acting as her eyes and hands like always – instead of being an independent actor himself, as he's become).

Someone else (I think correctly) commented that Pickler/Hakram represent choices that avoid Bard's plan. Leaving the orcs to Hakram and just giving the goblins an opportunity (as opposed to directly meddling in their politics within Praes through helping give them Foramen or something) directly goes against what Bard/Malicia are aiming for.

Insanenoodlyguy

My guess is the bond with Hakram runs so deep it's still there. It's why Cat doesn't know, it's still there. And because it's so deep, at some point she'll realize her authority over him is still there. That when he wants something she doesn't want she still has the pull to make him her extension, at least long enough for what matters. And she's going to say fuck that and wish Hakram the best and that's how she'll win.

Joan Lung

Oh, Malicia. You have been lead into a dead end, where your role fades and your plans do not even benefit yourself.

Juff

Typo Thread:

behind her the wall finished collapsing ahead of her (something went wrong here)

dislike her > disliked her levies been > levies having been pleasantly to > pleasant to to lesser goddesses > two lesser goddesses screaming the empress > screaming for the empress as came > as she came flash of red (appears twice in the sentence) rebellion against > rebellion against herself

beyond to Malicia's > beyond Malicia's aspect pulse > aspect pulsed

she must be > she had to be two of sky > two of the sky

Black Queen takes does > Black Queen does

Such setback would > Such a setback would

Meanwhile of > Meanwhile all of

superkeaton

Something tells me that everyone's failing to truly account for the Clans with Hakram at their head, including the Bard and Cat.

dadycool

Well, the Role of the Woe is to shake up what has stood since essentially the dawn of time. Heroes joining Villainous Five Man Bands? A Surface Dweller going into the depths and making deals with Dwarves and Drow? The utter destruction of the Summer/Winter cycle, complete with Yoinking the very sun from the sky? None of these were precedented, and this is a very small list of the weird things they've done.

Forgot_My_Name

The Bard is definitely not failing to account for the Clans. Cat and Malicia don't actually know what's going on with the orcs, but with the narrative strenght of the first Warlord in centuries, there is no way the Bard doesn't know. And that's how Bard prefers to play: when she's the only one holding a full deck.

kinghaart

Yes – but while she thinks she knows Cat, she doesn't for sure know how she'll react to Hakram. We'll see.

letouriste

A Pratical Guide to Pawn Status

onedollargum

I'm not sure what to take away from this. Is Malicia really not able to model Akua here? Akua doesn't even seem to be trying to predict the empress.

beleester

Malicia can't model Akua's change of heart because she can't believe that Akua has basically blundered her way into this. Also, Malicia thought she had Akua on a leash until recently, so her plans are probably hastier than usual.

Akua, meanwhile, has basically resigned herself to her fate, and since she thinks she's fated to win the tower she's not making any real effort to upset Malicia's plans. Instead, she's spending her time doing nice things for the citizens and being disappointed in the quality of her allies, which ironically is pushing her allies to do a pretty good job of raising her up.

Liliet

...and any hint that Akua might not be fated to win the Tower is embraced with the fervency of a woman dying of thirst in the desert...

Liliet

I think Akua has successfully modeled Alaya and her move of unleashing the storm lmao (and she wasn't even trying!)

but yeah no-one models Akua right except Kendi, and that's just by virtue of excessive exposure

Ross

I like the irony of Alaya saying she's going to be putting the noose around Akua's neck, since Akua directly compared being made Empress to being hanged.

Abrakadabra

Hah, good point!

serdar314

Akura thinks that she sees Cats plan while playing exactly according to Cats plan. To jail a immortal necromancer being is there anything better than an already raised Shade? Also thank you for the chapter.

Liliet

A-who?

Black Spiral Dancer

She is not a shade anymore for a while already...

Insanenoodlyguy

Somebody who can live a while. Akua is going to become a hero and they don't get that l.

Shveiran

I mean, we already got the Red Axe and the Exalted Poet, so I guess even sabotaging the war effort against the undead apocalypse doesn't count against being a Hero in the setting.

Shveiran

SIGH

Abnaxis

"All she glimpsed was a vague sense of disappointment, with no real idea of the depth of it. "

Oh yes, an aspect Alaya has become WAY too reliant on to the detriment of her ability to read people without it, just happens to fall on her most trusted advisor and spymaster? I'm sure that will end WONDERFULLY for the Dead Empress. The setup is so typical of a Tyrant's, it's like it came from a Praesi tragedy, and yet Alaya is still too far gone to realize it.

"And given that in the first instance trouble would be for the Empire and in the second it was Alaya's life on the line, the choice made itself."

I'm guessing this is what flips Ime in the end. I don't think she signed up out of loyalty to Malicia, I think she signed up out of indebtedness to Amadeus and dedication to the causes he and Alaya used to champion. The fact that Malicia won't hesitate to put an axe to the Empire if it helps her self-preservation is why I think Ime is disappointed. She's almost sunk as low as Nefariois at this point.

sengachi

It also says something that Alaya is using Connect to read the emotions of subordinates rather than, you know, Connecting her people together and to her. She's totally neglecting the primary utility of what ought to be a pretty powerful ruler Aspect, because she just does not believe in connections being meaningful tools of rule.

kinghaart

Ime is actually not really associated with Amadeus, and is Malicia's lover. I think she was disappointed that Malicia wasn't seeing the most obvious and safe way to live would be to just take some money/artifacts and flee. Ime would have come with her. But Malicia values control and pride more than even her life, without even knowing it.

Daniel E

I always figured that Cat's memoirs would be titled 'A Practical Guide To Evil'. No clue about her Name.

Frivolous

Took some thinking before I could come up with something to say, or even decide that i had something to say.

First, the Intercessor's stated plan for shaping Catherine's impending Name doesn't make sense to me.

It is very clear to me that Catherine is focused on defeating Neshamah. She's got her eye on the prize. Because of that, she will not and cannot be bogged down in regional disputes. It goes against her personality. She's not an administrator. She's not into fixing small things. She's into fixing huge things.

I think any attempt to make Catherine focus on small things will result in her drawing her sword and cutting the knot or knots until the dispute goes away. She is not above murdering her problems.

In this way, knot imagery is very appropriate for this chapter. Knot here = Gordian knot.

In the book 5, chapter 68: Apropos, the Intercessor tried to draw Catherine into 3 different stories. Three is an important number to her, so I think she will also try to draw Catherine into 3 different alternative Names, ones she finds acceptable.

=== Quote: I'd been sold yet another story, on the sly, and come so very close to embracing it wholeheartedly. I'd not bit the bait when she'd approached me as a smiling offeror of advice and bargains, so she'd changed the story. The immortals warring over the world I'd again refused, silently as I had, and in doing so tumbled down the most dangerous of the three stories she'd woven. Believing it was my own notion every step of the way. ===

The first alternative Name was mentioned in Interlude: Knock Them Down. Intercessor tried to make Catherine's Name one in opposition to her own. Catherine recognized it and thus defeated it.

I think the second alternative Name is the one being discussed here: regional disputes wrangler, warden of the political East.

I don't know what the third alternative Name will be. I just know it will be hidden.

=====

In other news: Malicia continues to strike me as someone who thinks only inside the box. She doesn't innovate.

The rulebook she uses is very big and full of political manoeuvres, but it is finite and thus limited. Boring.

Also, I wonder if Masego could recover his sorcery the way Akua did. Transfer his soul into a new body, one with the Gift.

Mental Mouse

Masego moving to a new body would probably leave his Aspects behind. In any case, he'd probably see sorcery as a distraction at this point.

Abrakadabra

I just realized that Alayas greatest motivation is fear. Her very aspects are centered around ensuring loyalty to her.

Miles

I wonder if the Bard is actually aware of Akua in any capacity. She spends most of her time around Named who Bard doesn't seem to appear much around.

SonOfLilit

Keter does mean crown, but here the reference is to Kaballah, like everything around Neshamah (who's name means "soul" in the sense of "immortal soul"), Keter being one of the ten Sephiroth.

plantsbeans

"What would the Heavens hear, a million screams or a single vainglorious shout? It'd been empty from the start. All she had left was the enormity of what she had done, and she was drowning in it."

Tearing up here. What is the meaning of redemption? Damn, damn, damn. Now I need to find a friend who can read fast enough to catch up here.

Interlude: Burn Away What You Once Were

"Power isn't gold or faith or oaths. Power is the moment the tip of the knife punches through. Everything else flows from that source."

– Dread Empress Massacre

Arthur adjusted his helmet for what had to be the hundredth time, trying to keep dawn's light out of his eyes. He hated to admit it, as it felt like he was being childish, but he was bored out of his mind. Normally he would have sought sympathy and conversation from Apprentice, but this morning she was... otherwise occupied. Sapan was looking at the new war engine hungrily as its wheels creaked against the stone and it was dragged forward by oxen. The Ashuran had no interest in the military applications of the great machine, he knew: the draw was that it was, in effect if not in principle, a massive magical artefact.

"If that thing were a woman, you would have gotten slapped by now," Arthur drily said.

Sapan turned somewhat amused brown eyes on him.

"And what would you know about staring at women?" Sapan teased.

Arthur politely coughed. Fair enough.

"I don't understand what's so fascinating about it," the Squire admitted. "It's a drill, Sapan. A large, fat drill on wheels."

She rolled her eyes at him, brushing back wild strands of wavy hair that no earthly amount of hairclips seemed able to tame.

"And how do drills work, Arthur?" she challenged.

He cocked an eyebrow.

"Someone moves about with their arms until there's a hole in something," he summed up.

She glared at him, very much aware he was actively trying to piss her off. Arthur hid his grin behind the thoughtful, pious expression that he'd honed against brothers and sisters of the House.

"Fine," Sapan growled. "Who's going to move about the handle to that fat drill, Squire?"

"There isn't one," he noted. "Which does seem like something of a design flaw, but I suspect the sappers might have taken ill to my pointing that out."

No one made it through more than a few months in the Army of Callow without learning that getting on the wrong side of the sappers was a costly mistake. Not even the Order picked that fight without good reason.

"That's the magical part," Apprentice said. "At the end of the drill, that large section in bronze, it's enchanted."

"It's also polished," Arthur helpfully contributed.

"I think that's purely decorative," Sapan admitted. "But never mind that. Lord Hierophant and the Callowan mage cadres enchanted the insides thoroughly, it took them days."

"Enchanted to do what?" Squire asked, honestly curious.

"It's directed kinetic force," she excitedly said. "But entirely self-contained. The excess that the Due should release is instead used in a secondary array that ensures centrifugal force won't destroy the artefact from the inside."

"So it makes the drill turn," Arthur hazarded.

The dark-haired Ashuran eyed him like he was the lowliest sort of cockroach.

"Yes, Arthur," she disdainfully said, "it makes the drill turn. It's not at all a staggering triumph of runic and mundane engineering that was believed physically impossible by most scholars until a few years ago."

She raised her nose.

"You ignorant... horse-rider fuck," Sapan tried.

Apprentice's magical talents had been found very early, she'd told him – five years old – and she'd spent her entire life either in mage schools or under the private tutelage of scholarly old mages. That sheltered upbringing had left her with no real experience insulting people, something a few years around soldiers had miraculously failed to change. It really was quite impressive how terrible she was at it.

"You're also riding a horse," Arthur mildly pointed out.

She huffed in distaste, looking away, and the Squire smiled. He was slightly less bored now, though it would be hours yet before he saw fighting. Neither of them would be in the first wave into the breach in the eastern walls of Ater, which would be preceded by an escalate to tie up enemy mages and engines anyway. They'd be going in with the second wave, with precise objectives. The Hellhound's plan was to break through enemy defences quickly and rush to seize defensible grounds deeper in the city before the Praesi could mount a proper counterattack. Grandmaster Talbot had approved of the plan when he'd briefed the Order, much as he tended to approve of Marshal Juniper herself.

Some among the knights had often resented that of the man, especially those of old nobles lines who still resented such a young greenskin holding such high command, but even the worst of the naysayers had been watching their words since Kala. Besides, it'd never been a popular sentiment with the army. The known faces from the early Fifteenth – the Hellhound and the Princekiller, Robber and Pickler, Ratface and Aisha Bishara – were almost as famous as the Woe and nearly as cherished. There was a certain cachet to having served under the Black Queen since the start, the kind that got people buying you drinks and asking for stories even if you'd only been a legionary.

Arthur had raged against his age, in Laure, listening to those stories and feeling like he was letting the era pass him buy. Now he'd caught up to the days, he stood in the thick of it, and it was so very little like he'd thought it would be.

"Look up," Sapan suddenly said. "It's starting."

The Squire's eyes sought the horizon. Apprentice was right. Atop the walls of Ater in the distance, in the light of rising sun, steel glittered as legionaries manned the walls. Ballistae were dragged into position, mage cabals began gathering power and as the vanguard of the Army of Callow crossed some invisible line all the Hells were unleashed. Rays of light and scores of fireballs, hails of bolts from the engines. Before the storm could hit the regulars in front, the House Insurgent made its presence known through great panels of yellow light that stopped the enemy fire cold.

Great iron ladders were rushed to the front, and the Battle of Ater began.

—

"They're being reckless," the Black Knight frowned. "Priests or not, the walls of Ater are not so easily taken."

The Army of Callow was abandoning traditional Legion doctrine for this fight, which made Marshal Nim Mardottir uncomfortable. She'd already been had by the Hellhound once and she had no intention of suffering a second reverse when the stakes were so high. The enemy were still at least half an hour away from landing their first ladders on the outer walls, the first of the set encircling the capital, so the Black Knight was taking the time to properly observe their formation. Which was a mess. The enemy legionaries were breaking ranks to move faster, which meant every time something passed through the shields the Callowan mages and priests had put up it was guaranteed a casualty.

"They know the longer it takes them to breakthrough the more force we'll be able to concentrate here," Akua Sahelian replied, golden eyes calm. "We've barely a third of the Legions on the wall here, their best shot at getting into the city without massive casualties is overwhelming us early."

There were two women that the city called 'empress' in whispers, Nim thought, but there was only one of them here on the wall. It was more complicated than that in truth, she knew, since Malicia would likely lose her life if she strayed too far from the Tower. And yet there was something primal and easy to understand in one being here and the other not. There was a simplicity to that, a clarity. And the Marshal had seen in the eyes of the legionaries here that it was a clarity they embraced. Amadeus had won the love of the Legions as much by fighting in the ranks with them as by the rest, and the Black Queen was no different. It was a simple thing, the Black Knight thought, but not a small one.

"It won't work," Nim said. "They'll make footholds, they've got the belly for that, but we'll take them back as soon as we're reinforced. Marshal Juniper is no fool, Sahelian. There's something else afoot."

"I have eyes on the forces of Aksum and Nok," Lady Akua replied. "If the expected treachery manifests, it won't be a knockout blow. Yet they've made no preparations for battle or sent troops into the capital as far as I can tell."

"Might be there will be a strike force of Named," the Black Knight mused. "I'm surprised the Archer and the Huntress haven't already begun returning fire against the ballistae."

It was fucking absurd that the two women could serve as a countermeasure against siege engines by virtue of being able to shoot the crews at similar engagement ranges, but Nim had considered how to compensate for that since her defeat at Kala. Now she had wooden panels to defend and replacement sappers waiting. She wouldn't be caught unprepared again.

"Catherine won't depend on Named for such a critical part of the plan," Lady Akua said, tone firm. "There's an enemy on the field that could make her pay for such a thing dearly."

"Then we're still in the dark about their plans," Marshal Nim said.

"I imagine that massive drill will have a role to play," the golden-eyed noble noted. "If Hierophant didn't enchant that I'll leap down this wall. Best to assume it will go through the walls like a knife through butter."

The Black Knight blinked.

"These are the walls of Ater," she slowly said. "There's so many wards and enchantments in these walls we can't even list them all anymore."

"And he is the Hierophant," Lady Akua lightly replied. "Miracles are his trade, Marshal. Gods know he's vivisected enough of them."

Nim had learned it did not pay to argue with the sorceress when it came to the talents of the Woe, so she kept her skepticism stowed away.

"Best hurry up the evacuation of the districts then," the Black Knight said. "We don't want citizens caught in the middle of whatever they'll unleash."

"I expect she'll go out of her way to limit civilian casualties," Lady Akua said, "but I agree it is better safe than sorry. I'll send word to High Lady Muraqib that a loan of mages capable of scrying would be appreciated, it should make it easier to coordinate the movements."

And the fucking idiot would be glad of any way to salvage her reputation, as she ought to be after having botched a coup attempt on the Tower so badly it'd wracked the capital with storms for twelve days. If the 'empress in the city' hadn't stepped in to organize emergency shelter and food convoys moved under mage shields it might have been tens of thousands that died instead of almost three. Meanwhile, to Nim's disgust, the High Seats had squabbled with each other like children and kicked up dust in the Legions' eyes while they were at it. That lot wouldn't be able to lead sailors to a whorehouse even with the fucking Wizard of the West guiding the way.

The Black knight's general staff agreed that the only reason the Army of Callow hadn't crushed them while they were busy was that it would have been charging into the storm itself and Catherine Foundling hadn't wanted to take the risk.

Nim had only barely gotten her orders out when Captain Laughable took her aside, murmuring that there was a situation. A suspicious person had been caught and made prisoner. The Black Knight took a short detour to pick up Lady Akua, who was informing the High Lady of Kahtan with a smile that surely risking her mages was worth the love of the people, and they headed out to the supply depot below the bastion where Laughable was keeping the man. Among the crates, a poorly-shaved Taghreb was bound and sporting a purpling black eye.

"Caught him sniffing about the bastion, ma'am," Captain Laughable said. "Said he was just waiting for a friend, but we think he might have been counting troops."

"I take it he resisted arrest?" Nim asked.

"You could say that," Laughable coldly said. "He knifed Sergeant Kilzi right in the throat and tried to make a run for it. We broke both legs so he'd know better than to try that again."

Nim's hand clenched, the steel of her armour creaking.

"Who do you work for?" the Black Knight asked in Taghrebi.

The man only laughed. Lady Akua approached, which had him tensing, but though she took his face in hand it was not to inflict a curse. Instead she studied the side of his head, picking at the sideburns, and snorted before releasing him.

"There is no point in speaking that tongue to him, Lady Black," Akua Sahelian said. "He is not Taghreb. That man is Levantine. It's why there are still traces of face paint in the roots of his hair, near the skin."

"Infiltrators," Nim growled.

"He won't be alone," Lady Akua said. "We should immediately-"

"Too late," the man grinned with bloodied teeth, speaking accented Lower Miezani. "You found us too late. It'll be over by now."

The Black Knight seized his torso and dragged him up, anger roiling.

"What?" she demanded. "What did you do?"

The man only laughed louder, and then in the distance there was a great grinding sound. Old gears pushing against each other, moving a great weight.

"The gates," Akua Sahelian calmly said. "They opened one of the gates."

The same enchanted gates that took about half an hour to fully open, that could not be stopped when they began without wrecking the machinery.

The Army of Callow's vanguard was a quarter hour away from setting foot in the city.

—

"They're retreating," Alexis said, sounding impressed. "Like Marshal Juniper said they would."

"Our Hellhound's got a good read on the opposition," Archer said. "It's what she's here for."

Indrani hadn't actually paid all that much attention when the plan had been explained to her and Masego had been reading under the table the whole time — he'd cunningly glued a book under with the pages hanging down and he turned the pages with a spell so he wouldn't be caught — so she had only limited idea of what was happening. She figured the Legions had decided it was a losing fight to try to hold the walls with the gates open and two thirds of their number still on the way, so they were bailing backwards to a defensive position. Made sense, kind of? Not really her problem anyway. The three of them were after a different kind of prey.

"I'm still now sure what I'm here for," Cocky complained. "In case you hadn't notice, this is inside Ater."

"No shit?" Archer mused. "I was wondering why the walls were facing the wrong way."

Alexis actually looked like she was suppressing a smile. That or she was twitching in anger. Knowing the Silver Huntress, it might actually be the two.

"We could at least get off the rooftops," the Concocter tiredly said. "It's only a matter of time until someone looks up."

That was actually untrue, Indrani thought. Most humans only rarely looked up, when something prompted them to. In her experience, skulking atop rooftops in a city was a pretty decent way to get around unseen if you put a minimum of effort into remaining unseen. She had no intention of actually telling Cocky that, though.

"Yeah, but then I wouldn't be able to stand on the ledge and let the wind do that neat flappy thing with my cloak," Archer sagely replied. "And that would be a net loss for Creation."

Alexis cleared her throat.

"Patrol's gone," she said. "We should get a move on."

Archer straightened her back.

"Let's go then," she said. "Found an old tower-shrine to Nihilis last time I came that'll be the prefect perch."

Cocky grumbled under her breath, but they set out. Neither of them had lost a step since Refuge when it came to sneaking about – the classic game of better-not-let-that-manticore-see-you truly was the finest of teachers – and they were better equipped now than they'd ever been before. Cat was always good for that, shelling out the coin for what her people needed. They were already past the Legion lines, but that wasn't what their target anyway. Juniper was confident she could take Nim in a slugfest in the streets, and Archer figured the Hellhound had it right.

It was the noble armies that Cat and the Hellhound wanted kept out of this mess as long as possible, and that was why the three of them were out here. The imperial shrine was pretty easy to find, a tower of black stone three stories high that was covered with reliefs of Dread Emperor Nihilis' victories and filled with little alcoves where people could leave offerings. It wasn't as common a practice as it'd been in older timers, making those, but Indrani saw a few fresh copper coins and fresh flowers that hadn't been there last time she came. Aterans said it was good for luck.

The alcoves made it easier to climb, at least, and when they all got up on the flat top – covered in bird shit, but they'd all crawled through worse – the sight was worth a whistle. It was easy to see far out into the city, until you hit the taller buildings of the central districts, and that meant Indrani got a good look at the soldiers and banners moving through the streets. Like Juniper had said she would, the Black Knight had called for noble reinforcements.

"Kahtan," Alexis said, frowning. "Okoro and Nok. Hundreds of smaller lords"

Ol' Abreha wasn't taking the field then. Shame. Dakarai of Nok wasn't as deep in their camp, he might actually intend to fight to defend the city.

"We've got our targets, then," Indrani said. "We kill the bigwigs and the generals, it'll keep them confused enough they'll be late to the fight."

"Archer."

"I kind of want High Lady Muraqib," Indrani mused. "You can have High Lord Jaheem, Lexy, unless you-"

"Indrani," Cocky hissed. "Look."

Archer followed the pointed finger to a rooftop to their west. Someone was standing there on a ledge, looking down into the streets. Her cloak was doing the neat flappy thing in the wind, which Indrani mentally applauded. The Ranger turned, met their stares and winked.

A moment later she leapt down into the streets.

"You wanted to know why Cat sent you with us, Cocky?" Indrani said. "You were just looking at the reason."

A cleaner story, Catherine had called it, and who was Archer to argue with her? Cat might have died a bunch of times but it'd yet to stick, and that was the kind of crazy she was proud to embrace.

"We don't know what she's up to," the Concocter hesitated.

Alexis' fingers tightened into fists.

"Does it matter?" the Silver Huntress asked. "She's our enemy."

Archer shook her head.

"It matters," Indrani said. "We do this all three of us or we don't do it at all."

The Huntress glanced at her in surprise, then slowly nodded.

"I have permission, if we want to pursue," Indrani told Cocky.

The other woman hesitated still.

"She won't hold back," Cocky said.

"Neither will we," Indrani said.

Surprise, once more.

"You want to fight her?" Cocky asked.

It was her turn to hesitate.

"I want to know where I stand," Archer finally said.

The Concocter quietly laughed.

"I don't care where I stand," she said, "as long as it's far from her. But that's something we'll have to earn, isn't it? The right to put her behind us."

Cocky breathed out, rose to her feet.

"I'm in," the Concocter said.

A silence passed between them, not quite comfortable but not unpleasant. Determined, Indrani thought, determined might be the right word.

And so the last three students of the Lady of Lake began to hunt her.

—

A torrent of flame howled down the street, forcing the enemy to huddle behind houses, and even as the roar of the fire drowned out the clamour of the fighting the Black Knight raised her voice higher still.

"Collapse the fucking walls," Marshal Nim screamed. "We need to slow them down."

Lady Akua's spell ended moments later, the fires blinking out, but the reprieve she'd bought them was well-spent: sappers collapsed two houses and a temple with demolition charges, barring the avenue with the falling stones. It wouldn't keep the Callowans away for long, but it would slow them down enough that the Fourth and Fifth Companies would be able to retreat to the fortifications in the plaza down the street. Legionaries streaming around them, the Black Knight and the Lady Warlock retreated away from the frontline. In the time they'd spent to put out the crisis here, another would have emerged somewhere else.

"How long until the drill starts working again?" the Black Knight asked.

"Half an hour at most," Lady Akua grimaced. "It's devilish piece of work."

The way the sorceress had explained it, the drill actually drained the power of enchantments it touched to harden itself and make some kind of array in its back move faster. Nim had almost doubted her eyes when the fucking thing had taken a mere ninety heartbeats to pierce through some of the finest walls on all of Calernia, stopping only because it had overheated and was at risk of melting. Worse yet was the realization that the Hellhound had never intended the thrust of her attack to be on Legion positions. While Nim had repositioned her forces to contain the disaster spilling out of the open gate, the drill had punched through the wall by another gate and the second wave of the Army had bypassed her defensive set-up entirely.

She'd lost a third of her force in an hour trying to contain that attack, which had forced her to call on reinforcements from the nobility against Malicia's standing orders. They'd hurried enough that the fighting in the abandoned districts of the southeast had erupted before the Callowans could take the Licosian Gates, one of the chokepoint of the city the Hellhound had clearly been aiming for. It was bloody enough fighting that the Black Queen was there and slinging around Night in amount that wiped out entire companies, but the nobles were still holding. The fear right now was that the Army of Callow would just use the damned drill again to open another breach behind the defensive position of the High Lady of Kahtan to flank it.

Some of the Black Knight's scouts up on the walls had signaled there were troop movements outside the city, so Nim suspected that unless that fucking drill was broken for good Ater would fall before Noon Bell rang.

"Then we need to hit it," the Black Knight said. "You and I, leading a company. It's the only way we can contain them long enough."

And if they were contained, if they were kept bottled up in a few districts and mage fire could be brought to bear? They would be routed out of the city. Already the enemy's priests were flagging in strength, and when they were out for the count the magical advantage would fall overwhelmingly in the favour of the defenders.

"Agreed," Lady Akua said. "Do you, by any chance, happen to have a disreputable company of golden-hearted rogues with a chequered past who have something to prove under your command?"

"A what," the Black Knight replied.

"It would significantly increase our chances of success," Lady Akua insisted.

The reply on the tip of Nim's tongue was set aside when a flare of red light caught her attention. Signals going up in the sky.

An attack from behind the Licosian Gates. But the drill had not yet been moved! How? Another flare went up, and another, and another. All in a straight line.

"Gods," Marshal Nim Mardottir gasped, "what is this?"

—

Arthur fell down to his knees, panting and out of breath.

"You all right, sir?"

The Squire limply gestured at the sergeant to make it clear he was in no danger. Just exhausted. Running out of that house before it collapsed after the ogres knocked down the walls would have been hard even if he weren't wearing plate armour. After a few moments to catch his breath, he dragged himself back up. Sergeant Hart slapped his back in a friendly manner.

"Back into the melee, then," the older man cheerfully said. "For queen and country and combat pay."

"The Black Knight wasn't with the ogres," Arthur said. "We need to find a scrying mage to ask for sightings again."

Running around blindly was unlikely to let him find the Black Knight, especially if she was actively avoiding him as he believed she was. That the Doom of Liesse had been seen with her only made the prospect of facing down his rival all the more daunting. Hopefully Sapan would be able to – wait, where was Sapan?

"Sergeant, where is the Apprentice?" he asked.

"We lost her when we hit that blaze three blocks back, I think," Sergeant Hart said. "She could be anywhere by now."

"Then we start by finding her," the Squire said. "We need to find an officer."

"That one looks like a lieutenant," Sergeant Hart said, pointing upwards. "Light armour, so probably in the scouts."

Arthur looked up and found a lieutenant standing atop a rooftop, looking into the distance. It was a start, the young man decided, and he asked his companion to stay behind as he climbed up the side of wall. The other man glanced at him before returning to his study of the city.

"Good morning, lieutenant," Arthur tried.

"Is it?" the officer replied, sounding amused. "You have been in the Army of Callow for too long."

"Might be," the Squire politely smiled.

He approached, enough to see that it was an older man he was speaking to: salt-and-pepper beard, greying hair. Likely a veteran. The goblin steel blade at his hip spoke to that.

"I am looking for a companion," Arthur said.

"The Apprentice, yes," the man replied. "She was headed west last I saw. I believe there's a scrying relay there three streets back, it seems her likeliest destination."

Well, that'd been faster than anticipated.

"Thank you, lieutenant," the Squire said.

"It was my pleasure," the officer replied, once more sounding amused.

Arthur began to walk away, but something was itching away his instincts. He paused.

"You never gave me your name," the Squire said.

"How forgetful of me," the man said, but did not elaborate.

Arthur's eyes narrowed.

"What is it you're looking for, lieutenant?"

"The flares," the officer replied, pointing to the southeast.

The lights were still in air, though fading. Signals warning of attacks where the Squire knew there should be no troops.

"A bluff," he said.

"Dismissing the unexpected is a bad habit, Squire," the man chided.

Arthur's hand went for his sword.

"You're not a lieutenant," he said.

"Did I ever claim to be?" the man replied, smiling.

He made no move to unsheathe his blade, which had Arthur reluctant to bare his own. The stranger had not yet been proved an enemy.

"What is it you're doing here?" the Squire pressed. "Answer me."

"Waiting," he said. "For a little while longer. You can keep me company if you'd like."

Arthur's eyes narrowed.

"Why?"

"We are relations of a sort," the man chuckled. "Besides, what else is there for you to hurry to? You won't be finding Marshal Nim."

His sword was in his hand before he even realized he'd bared it.

"Who are you?" the Squire demanded.

The stranger looked away, into the distance, and suddenly let out a quiet laugh.

"Ah, fateful timing," he said. "It has been some time since I've last been on the right side of it."

There was a ripping sound in the distance, then a furious screech. Arthur stepped back.

"What was that?" Arthur asked.

"So many questions," the man teased, "but this one I'll give you for free."

He turned fully for the first time since they'd been talking, and Arthur Foundling met a pale of eerie green eyes over a bladelike smile.

"That," the Carrion Lord said, "was several hundred years' worth of giant spiders joining this battle."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

"Do you, by any chance, happen to have a disreputable company of golden-hearted rogues with a chequered past who have something to prove under your command?"

"A what," the Black Knight replied.

"It would significantly increase our votes," Lady Akua insisted.

Bernardo

The spiders!!!!!! Yes!!!!!! Years of waiting for this moment :,)

Stormblessed

SPIDERS SPIDERS SPIDERS!

AMADEUS HAS TRULY EMBRACED HIS DAUGHTER'S WAYS!

Mental Mouse

Also, bringing a nearly-forgotten race forth from underground... like daughter, like father.

Raved Thrad

Drow + spiders == driders!

Anon

It's a book of reversals. Continuing these, Amadeus is the reckless adding fire to the fire while Cat is busy laying groundwork and cunning plans.

jamesc9

This was covered several chapters ago.

The more you have to defend, the less chaos serves you. Amadeus has come into his second teenager-hood.

Anomandris

Daddy's home!!

Oh man, Arthur is gonna get some helluva experience from this encounter...

Cicero

Squire, meet your grandpa.

Don't try to kill him, that always goes badly for the kid who meets the retired legend. Or actually, go ahead, because after the miserable losing you usually get a power up. Unless he just kills you. Hard to tell which story your in.

KageLupus

Amadeus is very explicitly not going to be Arthur's grandpa. Cat has made it a point to keep the Squire at arm's length and to not act as his mentor in a way that has narrative weight. Arthur listens to her because she is the Queen of Callow, a leader in the Grand Alliance, and in general is known to be very experienced in fighting other Named.

Arthur is never going to get the kind of close, personal relationship with Cat that she had with Black. Which is kind of sad, but necessary to stop him from becoming a narrative dagger to her heart. His only relationship to Amadeus is going to be what any good Callow boy feels about the Carrion Lord.

aisard

Cat has made it a point, sure. Though how successful she is with it is still up for grabs, given that the Carrion Lord is smirking at her efforts what with the “we are relations of a sort” comment.

Shveiran

I hear you. Although, to be fair, Arthur is also the Squire after the Squire that was the Squire after Amadeus. It might be “you are my Squire’s Squire” and not “you are my protege’s protege”, which is... kind of different in my opinion. Catherine has grown beyond the story of Squires and Knights that was her origin, by a long shot. It’s why her shadow “made for comfortable cowering” when Amadeus was down on his luck.

But she never grew beyond the relationship with her father-figure, so that story still binds her.

The point is moot, anyway: Catherine is not a mother-figure to Arthur, precisely because she kept her distance so far. And so there is very few parallelism to draw on to make that story work.

Liliet

Arthur is not Catherine’s Squire though. She’s not a knight he’s apprenticing under. He’s just a Squire working for her.

The ‘relations of a sort’ thing is absolutely referencing his ducklilng status under her, and how all the denial in the world won’t make him not Cathierne’s protege.

Ciel Morgenstern

In my book, the point does still stand that all three of them started out as Squires (while Arthur still is that and the other two just grew beyond it).

Liliet

Doesn't really make them "relations" as best I can tell from Named etiquette/culture. That specifically refers to the grand-duckling point.

Earl of Purple

It would make them relations in Levant, where Bestowal is tracked as well as Blood. Neither of them are Levantine, however, and I don't think a Squire's Blood would even be a thing, as it's a transitional Name.

Liliet

Yeah, it's a transitional Name and Arthur sure as fuck aint getting Black Knight. No, this is about Catherine 😊

Raved Thrad

Is it a bad thing that I now want to see Arthur call Amadeus "grandsquire?"

Liliet

Who call who?

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, he can still Grey Pilgrim this, in a horribly ironic way. But Cat already started that, so the echo makes it work. Another villain showing a hero a thing or two.

Someperson

That isn't quite his only relation to Amadeus of the Green Stretch.

Remember that he was also once the Squire. Regardless of the relationship between Arthur and Catherine, or between Catherine and Amadeus for that matter, Arthur now bears a mantle that was passed down from Amadeus.

Cpt. Obvious

Wait! Did you have chocolate milk this morning?

dadycool

Achievement Unlocked: The Old Master

Meet and learn from the man who trained your own mentor figure. Gain three (3) levels. Learn New Skill: Discernment (+3 to Perception, seemingly irrelevant information is kept, not discarded. Just in case.)

shikkarasu

[Squire Level 17!]

[Skill – Discernment obtained!]

[Skill – Providential Timing obtained!]

Test test test

Don't cross the fantasy streams

Trebar

I am so close to the last chapter written of that and it makes me really sad that I'm going to have to start waiting for chapters.

Sykomantis

There are so many stories with systems these days. Which one does this refer to?

Miles

Looks kinda like "the wandering inn"'s style

naturalnuke

System notification looks like A Wandering Inn to me

Ciel Morgenstern

Or, seemingly, just any "LitRPG" subtype. All I found so far reference games / are set in a game world at least partially (that often has influence on the "real" world of the setting or even becomes the "real" world).

shikkarasu

Fair point, but Miles and Nuke got it in one.

Sir Nil

And so, Amadeus for a brief moment simulated the conditions of the mythical continent of Australia.

sengachi

You know, Calernia is a small island continent. It's not too late for it pull an Australia, if it just believes hard enough!

jamesc9

I'm not sure that there's a high enough proportion of desert and biting creatures.

Sykomantis

It's not the quantity it's the quality, and the Wasteland has enough

ruduen

... Huh. So, I know there's a law against undead holding nobility, but does being turned into a giant spider and living in the sewers of Ater for centuries prevent someone from having a claim on the tower?

Sir Nil

We know that sentient creatures cannot lay claim to the Tower due to the Trial of Unexpected Teeth, if the former Dread Emperor is indeed alive as a spider I suspect the claim will be determined in court by whether or not they are still human or just a smart spider.

ruduen

Man-eating tapirs were ruled to lack sentience, which meant they were not valid claimants. However, that means that if someone was turned into a spider but retained sentience, that argument wouldn't apply.

(For reference, Book 4, Chapter 2: Alarm – <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/04/16/chapter-2-alarm/>)

dadycool

My favorite part about Praes has to be the fact that they've got actual rules and bureaucratic processes for things like undead or animals being eligible to hold titles. "She's undead. She can't claim nobility now." "Is he really still part human, or is he just a spider? Because that actually makes a difference."

shikkarasu

I actually fleshed out an entire setting with a friend of mine following one of us asking the other "Suppose the Heir Designate was accused of being soulboxed..."

jack

I think these rules only matter after the fact. If an undead or a giant spider has the strength to take the tower, it will do so, and people will just fall in line.

Who's going to tell the Dread Lord that he's an illegitimate emperor?
He'll just have you horribly killed and then go on with his day.

Liliet

I mean, "having the strength to take the Tower" generally refers to having people actually following you.
(Triumphant with her devils was special and no-one has replicated it since, even Akua the Diabolist II relied heavily on material resources provided or allowed by other people)

So agreeing "we will all not support this person" kind of does actually cut them out of competition.

Downzor

Actually, lack of sentience was given as the reason why the tapirs couldn't claim the Tower:

"In conclusion, the court recognizes the desertion of the sentient tiger army raised by Dread Emperor Sorcerous as sufficient precedent to rule that tapirs can, in fact, commit treason but that lack of sentience bars them from laying claim to the Tower by right of usurpation."

...which seems to imply that sentient beasts would have a legitimate right to claim the Tower

Jack

I believe the argument against the tapir for Dread Emperor was its lack of sentience

Shveiran

People are discussing the precedents, but they got it backward: in Ater, you don't hold the Tower because of a law. You make the law because you hold the Tower.

All those rules? The ban on undeads holding the title, or the trial of Unexpected Teeth? All those happened after Dread Emperor Revenant and the Tapirs had lost hold of the Tower. Not before.

Now, sure. Defy conventions and maybe you'll invite enmity from the High Seats, but doesn't Malicia's ban on the Chancellor Name prove that whatever the Emperor says is law so long as he is the Emperor?

If Dread Emperor Sorcerous can actually manage to storm the Tower with its brethren, all hail Dread Emperor Eightlegged.

KageLupus

Sorcerous would never be able to hold the Tower as a spider-monster, if only because the Scribe would have to off him.

There can be only one Webweaver in Praes.

Shequi

It's Dread Emperor Tenebrous that became the Giant Spider, Dread Emperor Sorcerous was the one that raised the Sentient Tiger Army.

aurikdomi

and bound his soul to the moon right?

Alex Baker

That format of levelling belongs to the fantastic (but very very long) Wandering Inn. 😊

billstewartmt

I, for one, welcome our new arachnid overlords...

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Time for Arthur to get some bonding time in with grand-dad.

megaprr

Dread Emperor Tenebrous hype is REAL

edrey

oh chaos, the mark of father and daughter
Amadeus is joining the dance, good. i wasn't expecting the spiders from him, but from cat using one of the aspects of beastmaster, still, its nice

Frivolous

Quote: The excess that the Due should release is instead used in a secondary array that ensures centrifugal force won't destroy the artefact from the inside.

My comment: Derived from Akua's accomplishments in making use of Keter's Due?

Quote: "Catherine won't depend on Named for such a critical part of the plan," Lady Akua said, tone firm. "There's an enemy on the field that could make her pay for such a thing dearly."

My comment: Probably the Intercessor.

Quote: That lot wouldn't be able to lead sailors to a whorehouse even with the fucking Wizard of the West guiding the way.

My comment: I laughed and laughed, though I don't know why Nim mentioned the Wizard of the West, given that is a Callowan Name. Maybe because he's the Gandalf expy?

Quote: That man is Levantine. It's why there are still traces of face paint in the roots of his hair, near the skin."

My comment: Unmasked (pun intended) because he failed to properly take off his MAKEUP. Talk about embarrassing.

Quote: "The gates," Akua Sahelian calmly said. "They opened one of the gates."

The same enchanted gates that took about half an hour to fully open, that could not be stopped when they began without wrecking the machinery.

My comment: When I read this, I thought the drill was just a very expensive decoy.

It turns out that opening the gates was the feint. Truly a masterpiece of military subterfuge.

Quote: Masego had been reading under the table the whole time – he'd cunningly glued a book under with the pages hanging down and he turned the pages with a spell so he wouldn't be caught

My comment: I've done this so many many times in class, only not so craftily. Well done, Masego.

Quote: A cleaner story, Catherine had called it, and who was Archer to argue with her? Cat might have died a bunch of times but it'd yet to stick, and that was the kind of crazy she was proud to embrace.

My comment: Embrace in more than one way, Indrani.

Quote: "Half an hour at most," Lady Akua grimaced. "It's devilish piece of work."

My comment: A huge compliment coming from the woman who was once Named Diabolist.

Frivolous

Addendum:

Quote: Before the storm could hit the regulars in front, the House Insurgent made its presence known through great panels of yellow light that stopped the enemy fire cold.

My comment: I believe these are copies of the Heavenly Fences used by by priests of the Tenth Crusade, first seen in Arabesques, and then named as such by Rozala Malanza in Interlude: Kaleidoscope I.

Which means that the House of Light of Callow has duplicated a Proceran technique. Very interesting.

sengachi

There's been so many military advances in the recent spate of wars it's making WWI stand up and take notice.

M0och123

I agree. Not quite there yet to WW2 levels of innovation.

However with the angel bomb, we may just get there!

Frivolous

sengachi: I wonder if Catherine simply asked for the formula to be taught to her priests, and Cordelia ordered it so.

If Cordelia did, she has to be aware that the Army of Callow would be able to use the Heavenly Fences to defend against any future Crusade. On the other hand, she is heavily indebted to Catherine.

Or maybe Vivienne's Jacks or the drow stole the formula. Or the Callowan House of Light reverse engineered it.

It feels so strange to talk about priests reverse engineering a prayer, though.

John Pratt

Holy barriers of protection aren't a new thing, Rozala's use of them in the field wasn't an advance in technology, but in doctrine. Cat doesn't need to send spies or negotiate with Procer, she just needs to have enough priests in the military.

sengachi

Yeah this is a big part of the reason I used WWI as my real-world war analogy. The big military advances which are occurring aren't really technological leaps. Sure those are there, but they're mostly just tweaking individual battles right now and their full potential won't be realized for another generation. The real innovations are all doctrinal, taking existing magics, munitions, tech, etc, and melding them together into a fast, well-communicating, and powerful combined arms force.

shikkarasu

Please, Noc, let it be Masego who saw the barriers used one time and then condescendingly explained how they work to House Insurgent.

thecorinthianman

I never considered it because Ranger would have to die, but now that fight looks like it might be a plot point here. Is Indrani going to take the name of Ranger???

Raved Thrad

On any other day I'd say that they were SOL, but it's entirely possible at this point that Alexis and Indrani are claimants. Maybe even Cocky, depending on whether or not she gets the killing shot in and the Guideverse supports the You Keep What You Kill principle.

KageLupus

Nah, this is not an Namd-evolution story, this is a personal growth story. Indrani and the girls are not going to kill Ranger or usurp her Name, they are going to prove that while working together they are stronger than working apart.

Ranger's whole philosophy was one of self-sufficiency. You have to be strong enough to survive on your own, you can be an asshole if no one is strong enough to stop you, altruism and love are just fancy words for weakness. All of Ranger's students were brought up surrounded by that thinking and they all turned out emotionally stunted and with tons of baggage. They are good at what they do, but the cost was a twisted worldview.

Now they have all seen that there is a different way and this fight against Ranger is their chance to prove to themselves that that different way is valid. Alone none of them would have a chance against Ranger, but if they work together they might. I doubt they will be able to really beat her, let alone kill her, but they can at least prove that friendship and support makes you stronger instead of being a sign of weakness.

Even if they lose it doesn't really matter though. Ultimately this story isn't about whether they can beat Ranger in a fight, it is about whether they grow past the emotional trauma they suffered under her for years. Punching her in the face would be a cathartic bonus though.

Liliet

I think they will beat Ranger but not kill her, for multiple reasons.

1. She's not really a or the enemy here. She's with Amadeus, and Amadeus is having a civilized chat with Squire. She's not there to stop them, killing her isn't a prerequisite to any military success.
2. Only the Silver Huntress is the one who is really about "remove this disgusting turd from the world" and she's a heroine. I don't think she'll insist if the cards are against it.
3. Killing defeated enemies after you've proven you are better is Ranger's thing. They don't have to imitate it.

shikkarasu

I want one of them to transition into Lady of the Lake and become the next generation of... whatever you call Ranger's schtick. Like, it isn't a Name yet, but it easily could become one. It would also keep with the theme of "member of the Woe doing what their Calamity Counterpart did, but better/with more compassion."

Shveiran

But that is not a theme.

Hakram is not doing what Captain did, at all.

Masego is not doing what his father did beyond "magical research remains most interesting"; he is aiming for godhood or at least godhead whereas the Warlock never did. Vivienne doesn't even have a predecessor, unless you count Scribe, and you really shouldn't; there were some similarities, but few and far between. And now one is a proto-queen while the other was a tool to someone else's ambition and was happy running a network in the dark.

And Archer sounds like Ranger, sure, so long as she is talking about things she doesn't CARE about. Which shows it's just her origin and not her core.

The Woe. Are not. The new Calamities.

Insanenoodlyguy

Actually not so much. Captain was going to be led by an Orc god to lead his people back to old days of Glory. Instead she simply snuffed that story out. Hakram will lead the Orcs into new days of Glory.

Warlock made a life of magical research devoid of ethics. Masego developed some of those and as you said, reached for an entirely different tier of power. Scribe/ Assassin spent her time in the shadow of another, and can't conceive of a life without that. Vivienne faced her losses and emerged as her own person on her own path.

And archer, as you mentioned, is the whole point. She is willing to acknowledge strength and companionship in a way her teacher never could.

It's not about them being true parallels, they aren't. And they certainly aren't the new calamities. Instead, they are something better.

shikkarasu

They don't need to be 1:1 parallels of the Calamities, and the story would be worse if they were. They are the New Generation. Taking from the old in the same way that the Army of Callow borrows heavily from Legion doctrine, but with a new spin on it.

Hakram can respect Catherine's wishes and stand on his own two feet in a way that Eudokia never could until the day she was fired. (I honestly barely feel any connection between Hakram and Sabah, esp. once we found out that Assassin was just an Aspect from Scribe. She kept Black alive, killed his enemies, and made sure his paper work was completed on time)

Masego is -begrudgingly- willing to work with and teach others. He may be aiming to become a god, but he isn't going to hoard his knowledge in a vault somewhere. He also doesn't, as a random example, leave a few hundred people in hell like someone casually littering.

I'm not going to elaborate on Archer, you and Insanenoodlyguy hit it on the head.

Vivienne is not was not broken by a lack of hard power and total authority. She learned to rely on others and trust in her allies, even if Hakram and Catherine had hurt/betrayed her in the past. She has a long way to go before she's on Malicia's level, and maybe she never will be, but as things stand she may never need to be. That's the important part.

My main point (doing what their Calamity Counterpart did, but better) is that, of all the ways that they are not the same as the characters who came before, the biggest and most important difference has been one of compassion. In short, the values that they instilled in Akua. The Calamities were family, but it was much more of an exception they made for one another, not a general rule.

... but that's a lot of nuance to condense into a half sentence. Sorry if I missed the mark.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Re: Gandalf expies: one of Gandalf's monikers is "Grey Pilgrim," but that doesn't mean the Wizard of the West isn't also a Gandalf.

edrey

oh chaos, the mark of father and daughter Amadeus is joining the dance, good. i wasn't expecting the spiders from him, but from cat using one of the aspects of beastmaster, still, its nice

ninegardens

Oh, Arthur tragically missing the point of who he was talking to was so so fabulous.

Arthur is fun. So is The Drill. The Refuge trio is... definitely a story well aimed at bringing ranger down (possibly even in a non-lethal manner!) and is definitely a story aimed at... entangling her for the duration of this adventure... a clever ruse.

Kpaxmaji

Did he use the goblin fire to burn the spider nests and force them into the surface? Or the goblin fire is still in play.

Someguy

He probably used smoke to drive the spiders out so the'd be extra pissed. Goblinfire would still be in play

Flameburst

Rule 73 of Catherine Foundling: Until someone has blamed me for burning down the city, the goblinfire is in play.

shikkarasu

Rule 73.5 of Catherine Foundling: "Wrong again," I replied. "I set fire to everything."

Miles

Come to think of it have we seen her use goblinfire twice in the same battle yet?

Gotta be a move she's saving for the finale.

jamesc9

She doesn't have the goblinfire. Amadeus does. We know a lot less about his rules for living with fire.

devildragon777

I have to say, unleashing several hundred years of giant spiders is...uh...a very novel starting play.

I see this is also going to be another game of "Cat has a plan stashed away somewhere in this mess, and we're going to Interlude for the Unspoken Plan Guarantee". I'm guessing next interlude might have Hakram? It seems like we're getting Akua portions the entire way through though.

Poor Nim, she's just so lost in all of this. At least Akua seems to have pulled her out of the "death by Squire" route.

...Arthur and Sapan are reminding me of baby Cat and Masego.

Liliet

Alternatively, Cat genuinely doesn't have a plan and things are too chaotic for her POV to be productive. Her plan could be "sit back and watch the fireworks, whatever the fuck they are".

ninegardens

I feel like the thing about Cat is that she plans based on peoples GOALS, not based on their methods.

She doesn't know HOW malicia, or Akua, or Bard or Black are going to do the things they do. Hence she'll sit back and watch. But she does "know" what they each want (or at least, she thinks she does). Hence, she isn't planning for the details. Its why chaos works so well from her, because she focuses on the forest, not the individual leaves and branches.

Liliet

Yep.

The funny thing is that most possible outcomes here are good enough for Catherine. She only needs to employ course corrections that will steer away from unacceptable outcomes.

Tenthyr

Kinda weird how Bardish I took Black to sound there, before he was revealed.

Liliet

He's pretty bardic!

credulapostero

I have been wondering since Cat started seeing stars if her (and/or Black, after this chapter) are potential claimants for the name of Intercessor

jamesc9

Although Cat's version will be optimised toward order-ish and justice-ish, because of the number of people who saw her being a contact person under the Truce and Terms.

Sir Nil

If Dread Emperor Tenebrous is allowed to return then I fully expect Ime to rip off a mask and be revealed the he Dread Emperor Traitorous all along.

Big I

Lol. Just as planned.

Syndic

Honestly, if the story ends with Traitorous back in the tower and everyone else too entangled with each other to do something about it, I won't even be mad.

In fact, I'd probably laugh for days every time I think about it.

The roughly three chapters of Cat grouching, complaining, groaning, cussing and complaining some more would be epic!

irritantseraphim

And her shoemaker was Irritant all along!

Juff

Typo Thread:

nobles lines > noble lines him buy > him by power and > power, and Black knight's general > Black Knight's general tired to make > tried to make still now sure > still not sure what their target > their target
It was the noble (extra space) timers > times lords" > lords."

chokepoint > chokepoints in amount > in amounts itching away > itching away at still in air > still in the air pale of eerie > pair of eerie

DemBonez665

AMADEUS OF THE GREEN STRETCH LET'S G00000000

Peter

PLEASE LET ME HAVE INTELLIGENT GIANT SPIDERS. I need the spiders to be intelligent, I didn't realize how much I needed spider-legionnaires until right now.

Shveiran

Oh my god yes.

jamesc9

The drill will have to be rearranged, so that they can salute acceptably.

Small price to pay for wall-climbing and web-leaving capabilities.

Cicero

Spiders... why'd it have to be spiders.

Steven Silver

At least it's not snakes 🤩

jamesc9

This too shall pass.

dadycoool

That last conversation was beautiful. The moment EE described the "lieutenant" the same as the Carrion Lord, we all knew exactly who Arthur was talking to. lol, Arthur goes up to him as he's watching Ater burn and says "Good morning" as if the ruin of the Capitol of the Eastern Quarter of the Continent was as calm as a meadow.

Also, I love how Akua was trying to spark a heroic band coming together to save the day, yet the Black Knight just didn't get it.

irritantseraphim

"Good morning'" – "Must have been in the Army of Callow for too long!" Is great dialogue.

jamesc9

Thank you; now I understand what he meant, which is that nobody who'd been through less would make time for civilities in this situation.

jerdenzen

I feel like the Dread Empire is lacking in heroic bands, Akua's been with the good guys (sorta) too long.

Liliet

That's not a reference to a heroic band, that's a reference to the Gallowborne.

Benjamin Huang

YESSS! THE MADNESS BEGINS!
BLOOD FOR THE BLOOD GOD!
SKULLS FOR THE SKULL THRONE!
PLOTS FOR THE THOUGHT GOD!
DREAMS FOR THE DREAM MAZE!
SHIPS FOR THE SHIP GOD!
DRAMA FOR THE DRAMA THRONE!
nurgle gets nothing

SpacyRicochet

WHAT! NURGLE IS ALL!

Earl of Purple

Nurgle has been getting far too much, this past year and a half.

Ihatemyselfforthis

"Plot" for the Thot god

john

Nurgle gets everything, eventually. There's no rush, though, he's chill enough to let everyone else take their turns.

jamesc9

For a different, but related, take on the same interaction:
<http://freefall.purrsia.com/ff3400/fc03306.htm>

Adrian_V

Spiders, giant man eating spiders possibly led by a past emeperor who had to be 1 of the best by virtue of still being alive, this will be interesting.

Also again SPIDERS!!!.....this may be the first time Erra gives me nightmares xD

irritantseraphim

Also by virtue of being possibly more insane than most of the others.

Adrian_V

Is not insane if he proved himself correct!! xD

Sugar Roll

Troop movements spotted outside the city. Was it the clans?

sengachi

Consider me sufficiently primed to go nuts about the Ateran sewer spiders.

Liliet

I think my favorite part is how this mirrors Catherine's fae stratagem at Kala.

Like father like daughter ♥

ChillyPepper

Did anyone else notice how Akua is now mimicking Cat, is this foreshadowing?

Liliet

Akua has always had enough in common with Cat to predict her reactions to a significant degree despite being overall kinda shitty at non-scripted politics (she's an expert on the script though).

This was inevitable in the best way.

kinghaart

They really aren't even that different, in the scale of things.

Cat is putting Akua through all of this because deep down she knows she has made similar decisions, most notably letting the Lone Swordsman live despite knowing how many deaths that resulted in.

It's like how Frodo had pity (and disgust) on Gollum partly because he saw his own future with the ring in that creature.

letouriste

This battle will be so much fun!!!

Tenebrous making a claim for the tower again? :p

Unrecovered

>>"Agreed," Lady Akua said. "Do you, by any chance, happen to have a disreputable company of golden-hearted rogues with a chequered past who have something to prove under your command?"

>>"A what," the Black Knight replied.

>>"It would significantly increase our chances of success," Lady Akua insisted.

I can imagine a sheer disbelief on marshal's face when she realized Akua is being totally serious. Ah...new to her name, still doesn't know what a battle of Named is. As the Barrow Sword had put it, "like shatranj for the mad, with half rules unknown and half made up along the way".

M0och123

Oh God spiders! Why is it always spiders? Giant ones too!

If I was a Callowan Legionaire, hordes of undead and fae and even crusades would fail to break me. But spiders? I'd be the first to NOPE out of there!

rouquincool

Amadeus of the Green Stretch, dripping so hard Squire can't identify him.

jamesc9

<https://www.urbandictionary.com/define.php?term=Drippin> ?

Earl of Purple

That drill wouldn't work on any other wall, not as quickly as here. Maybe on the walls of Keter, but the issue there is the dwarf moat of lava getting in the way.

I knew Amadeus was killing district mages, the ones responsible for keeping sewers warded to prevent an invasion of giant spiders. Malicia knew it, too. But she didn't connect the dots.

sengachi

Oh, I hadn't caught that that's why the district mages were being killed. Nice catch!

kinghaart

Yeah I had figured it was Amadeus but I didn't figure why.

Good foreshadowing!

ohJohN

Even worse that she didn't Connect the dots! She's really slipping.

Cold Cyberia

I can just tell this one's going to get blamed on Cat too.

Steven Silver

Nah, it doesn't get blamed on Cat until the goblin fire comes out. But what are the chances of that, eh?

Reader in the Night

LOL Giant drill. Cat just Ba Sing Se'd Ater. And then Amadeus countered with Giant Spiders. And the fireworks haven't even started yet, literally, because Black has tons of goblinfire stashed around somewhere. This is going to be an amazing gambit pile-up. Akua appears to be playing a purely defensive game, but I can't wait to see what happens when Malicia and the Bard throw their own hats into the ring.

anonymous4968

This is the second time I've seen Ba Sing Se get referenced this week. Are people just rewatching Avatar these days?

Shveiran

People are always rewatching Avatar, and they are always right to do so.

beleester

Heh, Arthur really takes after Catherine when it comes to getting a mage to explain something to you in the most annoying way.

Reaver0f

That has to be the most patient Chekhov's Gun of all time.

So much juicy forwarning and yet I truly did not see it coming 😊
!

Mental Mouse

Well, it's not quite a Chekhov's Gun, but In All Night Laundry, Jack Fractal threw a brick from the beginning to the end of the story – something like 6 years real-time.

Darkening

8 bit theater ends with resolving a joke from the very beginning of the comic lol.

Daniel E

The fact that Masego continues to find new & creative methods of sneaking books into important meetings has to be the best running gag of the entire series.

kinghaart

Losing his eyes only made him more creative – Cat could stand to take a page... ahem... from his book.

ksmvr

I just thought of this. Is Cat good at stories because she's now the canonical daughter of the Fey king of winter? She was stripped of her winter power but not of her lineage.

Sinead

She got the basics from Amadeus, which she honed against William, Akua, and the Fae (her plan for success that put her in the line of succession for the Throne of Winter was based on her particular knack for stories).

She then spent a good while refining these skills with potential Fae influence for detecting the esoteric forces and she then took the Bard's knowledge from the echo in Arcadia.

mamm0nn

Wait...

"It was bloody enough fighting that the Black Queen was there and slinging around Night in amount that wiped out entire companies, but ... so Nim suspected that unless that fucking drill was broken for good Ater would fall before Noon Bell rang."

Wasn't it established that Cat's Night powers were rather sluggish and weak during the day, ever since the Sisters' Fall? Wouldn't it make more sense for Masego to be throwing magic around right now, while Cat stays in reserve until nightfall?

Also, there's an unnerving lack of devils involved in this fight. Doesn't matter that it's not quite demon time yet for the High Lords, that there hasn't been a single mention of devil companies or flying devils covering the sky means that the High Lords haven't even gotten in third gear yet.

irritantseraphim

I'd guess that we're getting Nims perspective here, who only hears about the fighting second-hand (at least second hand), so any reports are likely to be overblown by some degree.

Darkening

Sluggish and weak by comparison maybe, but cat is still a pretty heavy hitter.

sengachi

If the important fighting drags on until noon, let alone night, the Army of Callow has strategically lost. So it makes sense to have Cat out and about slinging everything she's got now while it might matter.

Fortunately, I suspect the High Lords are all scared of blowing their true demonic arsenals so long as Malicia hasn't played her own trump cards. So far as they're concerned after all, they lose just as hard if they beat Cat and then lose to Malicia the moment Cat is gone.

Sinead

I also wonder if Cat is able to make reserves of Night like the Eclipsing Well and her Staff of Age.

Not necessarily as stable as those, but the general 'store current power for later access' comparable to Masego's tokens of stored power

kinghaart

I think no Devils for three reasons:

1. The people of After
2. Nobles might be able to stop the Devils attacking their own, maybe even from attacking the citizens, but probably not from attacking all the other Nobles and their Devils
3. Narrative law of escalation, Devils are only brought in either in response to a similar threat or at a time of true desperation and the Praesi don't think they are truly that desperate yet – they think that one of Akua or Malicia will save them.

flashburn283

Well, things are getting messy, anybody else we can bring in to up the Chaos Factor?

ninegardens

Malicia's got a tower full of sentinels and demons.

Also Bard will have... something.

Gerion

Yes!

Emerald Swords, devils, demons, enraged citizens practicing the French Revolution, fae, the veterans who offered to follow Amadeus and were told to stay at home, the sentient tigers, man-eating tapirs, the Dead King by taking possession of his envoy that is hidden somewhere in the Tower, the dwarves poking their heads out of the ground and asking where their delicious spiders had disappeared to,...

For all we know, the gnomes might show up in the minute and nuke the city.

Gerion

Also: Zombie Pirates!

kinghaart

I bet Larat will appear at least once more, though probably not here.

ninegardens

Reading "the girl who climbed the tower" again and noticed the line:

"And always devour whole a liar "... which is Alaya down to a tee. She is a liar. Not even in a bad way initially- lies were what were needed to keep the nobles in line, to keep the empire standing, etc.

BUT.

But she was a liar, and the fires are devouring her whole and... I can't help but wonder who we know that is honest enough to resist.

... Kiaros probably. Not that he would do good things as emperor, but it wouldn't devour him. Black... I honestly don't think would manage it. At least, not in his past renditions. I don't think any of the Woe are up to it (Masego is most honest, but its not just earnestness that's needed, its self awareness).

Saint of Swords might actually be one of the better candidates... but once again, she wouldn't do good things with that power.

And actually, two somewhat weird picks that might resist this particular hurdle: Robber and Rozalia... but of course, they are two people who would never try to claim the tower in the first place... which I suspect is rather the point.

kinghaart

OMG

I didn't see it before your comment but... when read out loud, it literally says

"Will devour whole Alaya"

This has been in front of us the entire series. It sounds almost too on-the-nose but now I can't unseen it. :0

Miles

Masego. Glued. A book!?

Liliet

That's a metaphorical phrasing! No actual glue was involved!

ohJohN

And (even without accounting for his deep respect for books) we know this to be true, a priori, because: when has Masego ever used a mundane substance when magic could easily serve the same purpose (but way better)? Can you imagine him spending even a few minutes asking random sappers for glue, when any scrap of magic available to him could be converted into the metaphysical essence of adhesion that perfectly obeys his will?

Liliet

Also, more importantly, HE WOULD NEVER PUT GLUE ON A BOOK!!!

(Yes, I know you specifically set that aside. I really feel like it's the more crucial part though)

Earl of Purple

Even if he did use actual glue, he put it on the bindings. That can be repaired/replaced and doesn't harm the text of the book. If the pages aren't dangling underneath the book, and it's glued face-up, eh can't turn the pages when he's finished reading them. I guess he can't just pick to read through one page when he's finished it because pages have writing on both sides.

SpeckofStardust

I am glad that Amadeus seems to think the pattern of three isn't going to happen with the current black knight and Squire.

Liliet

It's already happening, it's just not going to be resolved today.

SpeckofStardust

Then it wont happen in PGTE, thier in the middle of the final battle for the East.

Cause you know the Squire is talking to the old man that is apparently ready to engage both his daughter and his longest partner, otherwise Amadeus wouldn't be out in the open like this.

irritantseraphim

Or it happens tomorrow or the day they finally storm the tower, as they have a lot of stuff to do right now and you don't take a city like Ater in a day. They have several sets of walls, there's the demons and artifacts in the Tower vaults etc. It's gonna happen in the next chapters. Just not that specific day.

SpeckofStardust

This argument would be valid, IF I didn't believe that Amadeus wasn't planning on using goblin fire before the final assault on the tower would take place.

irritantseraphim

We'll see. I think even despite his goblinfire plan, Arthur will face Nim in the course of the siege of Ater, as Amadeus won't torch all of Ater, if Cats planning/read of the actors involved is correct.

SpeckofStardust

I mean at this rate I could see Arthur running into a Nim that is in the middle of depression round 2. (Round 1 got beat by Akua)

In other words it wont be a third fight. Which considering the first 2 (lost/tie) went means it wouldn't fit a pattern of 3.

ninegardens

Arthur shows up
NIM: I surrender.
Arthur: Wut?
NIM: I surrender. You win. Good job.
Arthur: But...
NIM: here, you want me to help slay Giant spiders?
Arthur: ...

Some Smartass

No lie, that's probably what Akua will tell her to do, since it's how Cat got out of her Patterns. Lose on your own terms. The question, of course, is if the new Black Knight is willing to put her pride aside to make use of this bit of namelore.

kinghaart

Yes, even with the Lone Swordsman it came up that converting to being a hero (if only a lower case one) was a valid way to survive a pattern of three.

Black Spiral Dancer

Excellent!! Excited for the next one. Foul Mess.

superkeaton

"And then I hit them with the spiders." – Amadeus, probably

kinghaart

Brilliant chapter. They have all been great this book but so many excellent moments.

Many of the others have been called out already but I chuckled at Sapan's failed insult and then laughed out loud when Nim's came out with a perfect counterpoint. Really helps cement her veteran status to be able to swear that creatively. 😊

DC

All hail Dread Empress Chitinous

Interlude: The Hanged All Crooning

"Would-be tyrants always snigger when a hero comes knocking, smirking at each other that if they were in charge surely they would have killed the man when he was still a callow youth. Idiots. Do you have any idea how many callow youths are out to kill me, Chancellor? If I killed them all I could make a second Tower out of the corpse pile. The best you can do is massacre here and there and hope it's one of the dumb ones that survives all the way to your door."

– Dread Empress Rancorous

A tide of chitinous vermin poured out of the sewers, disgusting eight-legged creatures the size of horses that screeched under the glare of the sun and spread out like a plague. And they kept coming out: a dozen, a hundred. How long until it was a thousand, or even more than that? Arthur turned a glare on the disguised man that could only be Amadeus of the Green Stretch, the Carrion Lord himself. The older man seemed as indifferent to his fury as he was to the screams sounding in the distance.

"You madman," the Squire shouted. "You're releasing them into the city!"

"Well spotted," the Carrion Lord praised.

Arthur suspected he was not imagining that sardonic undertone.

"People are going to die," the orphan bit out. "Thousands-"

"An entirely foreseeable consequence of giving battle in a crowded city," the Carrion Lord noted. "Is it only collateral damage not of your own making that offends?"

"Innocents will die," the Squire seethed. "Innocents are already dying. And you're playing word games with me?"

"You're letting the Book do your thinking for you," the green-eyed man chided. "Think, boy. Where did you see signals being sent up? Where do we stand right now?"

Arthur seized his anger by the neck, slowed it, but did not set it aside. Anger was good, anger was your soul telling you something was unacceptable and you ought to do something about it. But the dark-haired orphan forced himself to think. The flares he'd seen in the sky, they'd been in a broad line going south to north across Ater. A battle line, he thought. The breaches, the place where the spiders were coming through, they were all places where there'd already been fighting. Soldiers.

"You sent them after armies," the Squire said.

"I did," the Carrion Lord easily replied. "I've known this city for decades, judging where the fighting would take place during the assault was not difficult. Thought that fascinating engine – Masego's work, yes? – took me by surprise. I had to compensate with some heavy-handedness around the Licosian Gates."

"You may yet ruin this city and all in it," Arthur bit out. "Worse yet, what manner of dark bargain did you strike to get power over the spiders?"

The green-eyed man cocked his head to the side, looking amused.

"Arthur Foundling," he drawled, "are you asking me to tell you my evil plan?"

The Squire paused, slightly embarrassed at being caught out instantly. Still, he must persevere.

"Do you not want to tell anyone of your cunning?" Arthur tried. "Surely a great deal of work went into this."

Evil always liked to gloat, unless it was the Dead King and his Revenants, but Lady Alexis said those didn't really count.

"I was going to use you to funnel information to my daughter, but it would be almost unprincipled of me to indulge you after that," the Carrion Lord noted. "I'd be rewarding an unsavoury habit."

"The White Knight told me this usually works," Arthur replied, a tad defensively.

"Well, if the Sword of Judgement said so," the older man drily said. "We must not make a liar out of Judgement's favourite meat puppet, I'll tell you everything."

Arthur eyed him skeptically. Maybe taking him prisoners would be safer. The Carrion Lord was on the edge of the roof, his sword still in the sheath and he was no longer Named. Just an aging man in light mail. One who was looking at him with calm, cool eyes. The fight would be his to lose, the Squire thought. He'd been training with some of the finest warriors on Calernia. And yet under the weight of those pale green eyes Arthur found he was hesitating. His instincts were telling him it was a bad idea, and though his anger at the horror the old monster had just unleashed on Ater was far from quenched he would not let it bait him into making a mistake.

He must find out how the villain was controlling the horde, what power or artefact, so that the spiders could be forced back below.

"I am not the Tyrant of Helike, child," the Carrion Lord calmly said. "You are looking for the gimmick, the toy. There is none. I murdered the men and women warding the sewers to keep the creatures out, undid their work sent my associate to stir up the hive. The scent of blood and corpses did the rest."

The monster's face was unsmiling.

"There is no undoing this," he said, and it sounded like a nail hammered into a coffin.

"It won't only be soldiers who die, you fucking animal," the Squire insisted. "Do you think they won't spill out beyond the battle lines into the city? It's only the districts closest to the walls that were evacuated. Civilians are going to die."

"Yes," the Carrion Lord nonchalantly said. "Thousands of them. The city will be on the brink of collapse as the horde spreads. The Legions will dig in, the Army of Callow retreat. And meanwhile the High Seats will look at their household troops, their precious private armies so jealously hoarded, see them bleed and die to save people that are nothing to them. Even as we speak they wonder – is this worth it? What am I sacrificing my strength for?"

"You can't be serious," Arthur said, appalled. "You're saying they'll retreat?"

"They cannot afford that either," the green-eyed man said. "Praes needs a capital that is not a smoking hovel full of giant spiders. Neither will they be willing to weaken themselves. So they will, instead, revert to... old habits."

In the distance, the air screamed so loud that even the chittering of the horde was drowned out. Rifts were ripped open, at first only a few then dozens, and it was as if the floodgates had broken. Devils began pouring out of Lesser Breaches and sorceries fouler still: swarms of green and glittering insects, rivers of purple flame and storms in the shape of giants. And among them, things worse than any of the rest slithered. Swam amongst the spiders, turning them to horrors not of Creation.

"Takisha pulled out the storm elementals," the Carrion Lord noted, sounding surprised. "Didn't think she'd risk them with the number of demons that were just sent out. Someone's in a mood."

"Demons," Arthur choked out. "As in plural?"

"At least a dozen," the green-eyed man said. "Catherine will send out Masego to limit the spread, but the damage has already been done."

"You did this," the Squire accused.

"I've yet to take a life today," the Carrion Lord replied, amused. "Besides, you miss the altar for the corpse."

"I see exactly what you've done," Arthur harshly said.

"I am not of any particular importance today," the man dismissed. "What matters is this: in the heart of Praes, a city packed tight with men and women from all parts of the empire, the High Seats were seen to make a choice. They could have protected the people they claim are theirs, paying in blood and power to fulfill their sworn duty."

The skyline of the city boiled, wreathed in a hundred different flavours of madness. In stopping the spread of the giant spiders, in trying to break the horde, the fearsome High Lords of Praes were shattering entire swaths of the capital. How many of them had been evacuated? Too few, Arthur thought.

"Or they could do this," the Carrion Lord said. "Dread and hatred, burning the world so they can warm their fingers against the flames."

"All this so you could gloat that your enemies are as terrible as you?" Arthur scorned.

The green-eyed man faintly smiled.

"I gave them the chance, Squire," he said. "To prove me wrong, to show me that there was some truth to the stories we tell ourselves. That they are the logical conclusion of jino-waza, that their rule is more than a thousand years of fangs ripping into flesh. That they deserve the power Praes has given them."

He looked, Arthur thought in a moment of terrifying clarity, disappointed. As if he would have liked to be wrong.

"Yet here we are," the Carrion Lord said. "Before the eyes of all Praes, the High Seats have abdicated their right to rule. They have revealed themselves as nothing more than worms in the flesh. Of all that happens today, that is the only part that matters."

It wasn't about the armies, Arthur realized. Or not just about. Whatever it was the man was after, it wasn't a victory on the field. It was... larger. And, the Squire felt in his bones, infinitely more dangerous.

"What is it you're doing, Carrion Lord?" the Squire quietly asked.

"I am killing the Dread Empire of Praes," the madman replied, "one story at a time."

"Well," Archer mused, "this went to shit in a hurry."

As if to punctuate the sentence, the rooftop she was running on exploded in a pillar of blue-grey flames that smelled vaguely of saffron. She landed in a roll on the roof of the temple across the street, reaching for an arrow and halfway nocking it even as the flames across the street collapsed as if they were liquid before beginning to form into a spindly, mantis-like shape. Fortunately, Indrani wasn't going to have to waste any more arrows distracting the construct: silver Light began to glow right behind her.

"I fucking hate those things," Alexis grunted, loosing her arrow.

The missile screamed out with Light, blinding to look at even as Named, and hit the construct with a disappointing flopping sound, just sinking into the liquid-like flames. A moment later the entire construct popped as the Light's continuing presence destroyed the animating spell's framework, making the entire mass of flame drop to the ground in a smoking rain.

"Eh, after that one demon thing that was like a hundred spiders melted together it's going to take a lot to impress me today," Indrani said. "It was impressively creepy, and not just because it didn't really seem to get the difference between eyes and teeth."

The Silver Huntress snorted, not disagreeing. Alexis had significantly cheered up since they'd started killing things, although it came and went. Whenever they got close to the Lady it trended downwards, which Cocky had called 'an apt summation of our childhoods' when Indrani had shared the thought with her. Speaking of the Concocter, Archer glanced further back and saw that the now purple-haired potioneer was moving around the needles on that fancy little tracking artefact Cat had given them.

"Found her," Cocky called out. "She's not actually far, just on the other side of the Licosian Gates."

Well fuck, Indrani thought, sharing a look with Alexis. That place had been the stronghold held by the troops and vassals of the High Lady of Kahtan an hour back, but not it was pretty much Spidertown. Spiderville, maybe, considering it was pretty large and swarming with way too many giant spiders. Last she'd seen a few pockets of troops were surviving holed up in buildings behind wards they'd put up, but the highborn had pretty much written off taking it back the traditional way so instead they'd turned to the Praesi specialty: a bunch of devils and weird magical killer things.

"That place is bad enough I think even the devils would go back to the Hells if they had a choice," Indrani bluntly said.

"Are you saying we let her lose us?" Cocky challenged.

"No," the Silver Huntress growled. "Fuck that. You still have a set of those blue ones, right?"

"I do," the Concocter said. "And a full healing set."

"We go in with a plan this time, then," Archer insisted. "You don't have anything that heals 'arrow through the eye' which was Alexis almost got last time we thought we were ambushing her."

"She won't get me again," Alexis replied through clenched teeth.

Indrani felt like slugging them both in the face until either sense or teeth came out, knowing the sight of either would be a relief.

"Listen to me," Indrani said. "We're not going to beat her like this. She's better than any of us are."

"Impressive," Cocky said, "how you can lick her boot without needing it in front of you."

Archer was not going to punch her in the throat, no matter how deeply satisfying it would be.

"Cocky," Alexis warned. "She's not wrong."

Indrani glanced at her in surprise, the Huntress refusing to meet her eyes.

"She's faster and stronger and she has more experience," Archer said. "If we're going to get her, it's by hitting her with something she hasn't seen yet. That means it's not me or Alexis who brings this home, Cocky."

This time it was her that was stared at in surprise.

"She's taught us most of what we know about fighting," Indrani elaborated. "She hasn't taught you shit about brewing. What have you got that would serve as a nasty surprise?"

Cocky hesitated.

"She's resistant to pretty much all poisons unless it's ten times the concentration lethal in a human," the Concocter said. "It's an elf thing, I think. But that's for toxins. I've seen her smoke wakeleaf, which is a stimulant and nonmagical. Unless she was just puffing at the pipe for the look of it, it means her resistance doesn't apply to everything."

"You going somewhere with this?" Alexis bluntly asked.

Cocky scowled at her, but moments later she undid a clasp within her satchel and showed them a small vial with a translucent golden liquid inside.

"This is a purified version of elegy," the Concocter said.

Indrani's brow rose.

"The fun times drug?" she asked.

Cocky nodded.

"It won't harm her, but what makes elegy popular in the first place is that when you take it affects your perception of time," she said. "I strengthened the elements that cause that and took out the ones that add a sensation of euphoria."

"She'll be able to burn it out with her Name," the Huntress said.

"No quickly," the Concocter replied with a flash of pearly teeth. "Not with how concentrated it is. There's enough in there if I dropped in a lake I could see the water as the usual drug."

Indrani let out a low whistle.

"She'll need to ingest?" she asked.

"Skin contact would also work, but not nearly as strong," Cocky said.

"Then we need to cram it in her mouth," Indrani grimaced. "That's you and me, Alexis."

"I'll take it," the Huntress immediately said, reaching for the vial.

"It should be me," Archer said, and when glared at shook her head. "You're better up close, much as I hate to admit it. You're more likely to make me an opening than the other way around."

The admission seemed to mollify the other woman some, and they packed their gear again. Just in time, since one of those damned giant-shaped hurricanes was coming their way again. Indrani had seen what happened to the people and spiders that got sucked in, and she had no intention of being shredded to pieces. They got a move on, avoiding the streets that were entirely aflame and the roving packs of devils in the sky. The Licosian Gates had somehow gotten worse since their last trip thereabouts, which Indrani reluctantly accepted as being pretty impressive. The four massive ancient statues seated on either side of the gates were crawling with spiders trying to puncture the spell bubbles keeping the handful of soldiers atop the gatehouse roof, but that was almost wholesome compared to the rest.

Rival torrents of spiders and dog-shaped devils were ripping into each other in the streets around it, savagely devouring each other's flesh while still alive, and some sort of ritual had gone awry enough that balls of lightning were careening across the streets, bouncing off wood and stone but searing flesh with strikes wherever they found it. Some sort of giant snake made of ice and bone had gone wild, which would not have been as much of a problem if it apparently didn't 'eat' creatures that came too close to its body and then vomit them back out from the great maw as masses of leech-like bone creatures that liked to burrow inside the spiders and eat them from the inside. And at the heart of the mess, perched atop a tall statue of Terribilis the Second, the Lady of the Lake stood with her bow at the ready.

Looking bored, she let an arrow loose. it straight through a shield spell, taking a mage in the throat. The blue panel flickered out and moments later spiders began to pour in, screams following as the survivors inside were devoured alive.

"Well," Indrani said. "Good a place as any to fight her, I suppose."

"She's not moving," Cocky frowned. "Baiting us?"

"No, she's here for a reason," Alexis said, eyes narrowing. "Look at her face, she's already gotten bored of this."

Archer rose to her full height, cracking her neck.

"Well," she said. "Let's see if we remedy that."

—

"Our empire seems like such a fragile thing, at first glance," the Carrion Lord said. "Always warring with itself, always eating its young. Half the reason we take the sickness abroad is that there is too much of it festering in our guts. And yet, for all its many and monumental failures, the Dread Empire has stood for over thirteen hundred years."

"You've been broken before," the Squire said. "We brought it down, your Tower."

Eleanor Fairfax had answered the madness of Triumphant sword in hand, as Catherine Foundling had risen to cast out the chains of the Conquest. Evil could last, but it never prospered for long.

"We have," the Carrion Lord easily agreed. "And yet once the crisis passed the Empire formed anew. Its constituent parts came together again instead of staying parted, even though most High Seats are enemies and despise the Tower ruling over them besides. Sowhy?"

"Safety in numbers," the Squire said. "I've seen it out west, the strange alliances peril will forge."

Even the vilest sorts would come to man the wall if the sky grew dark enough.

"If external pressure was the preeminent cause for unification, once that pressure ceased the unity would begin to collapse," the Carrion Lord said. "Yet there have been long periods of relative peace with Callow and the Free Cities that saw no such thing happen."

Arthur frowned. He had never been a great lover of history writ in the large, the wars and treaties and the trades, but that did not sound untrue to him.

"Then because the people of Praes want to be as a single nation," the Squire said instead.

"Close," the Carrion Lord praised. "It is because they believe they are a nation."

"Is there a difference?" the Squire said.

"Belief is what comes after desire," the Carrion Lord replied. "Belief has foundations. The Dread Empire stands because enough of us believe in the myths of it, the stories of it. So long as those remain, like rivers going to the sea our empire will always remake itself."

"That's not what fate is," the Squire refused. "It's not some curse that can't be broken. If you do it clever, if you do it right, you can change things."

"I believed that, once," the Carrion Lord mildly said. "Then, in my old age, I looked back and found that all the terrible works of my life had been built on quicksand. It was most galling, to realize that the Tyrant of Helike was not entirely wrong when he scorned me."

The old monster did not look all that galled, shrugging.

"But we learn or we die," the Carrion Lord said. "And so once again I picked up a sword and a plan."

"You want to burn it all," the Squire accused.

"I want to take off the noose around our necks," the Carrion Lord said. "There is no kind way to do such a thing."

"Did you even try?" the Squire harshly asked. "You disappeared for years, and when the Black Queen came east to settle affairs you stayed a ghost. Now you reappear, and to do what?"

He gestured at the capital around them, the hell it had turned into.

"The first story is that Praes is a nation," the Carrion Lord calmly said. "A single realm, not a pack of squabbling fiefdoms. That one was the hardest to kill, the longest. It took years to choke it out: a fourth of the Empire became a realm of its own, Kahtan rose as a queendom of the Hungering Sands and the edges of our territory broke away."

"You didn't do that," the Squire said. "You caused none of it."

"I did not need to," the Carrion Lord said. "All that was required of me was to ensure that the hounds fighting over the carcass would never bite into the same piece of flesh. So that they could all bury their snouts in the corpse and never realize until they stood nose-to-nose."

He paused, startled, as he realized what had been implied.

"Gods, you helped them do it?" the Squire said.

"I have been a faithful friend to even my enemies," the Carrion Lord agreed. "The second was faster to kill, but it cost me more. It was... difficult, killing the Legions of Terror."

"Kala," the Squire said. "They stood and they bled and they broke."

"Lesser soldiers would have shattered years before," the Carrion Lord said, his pride without veil. "It took an ocean of brutal futility to end that story – it was fresher than the rest. A battle where three sisters fought, none believing in their cause or truly hating the other. A battle where weapons of war killed men by the dozens in heartbeats without swords even touching, where entire armies deserted to one side or the other. It ground the pride of the Conquest to dust."

"And today you burn the High Lords," the Squire said. "Half the city going with them."

"More of a quarter, I should think," the Carrion Lord amusedly replied.

"You could make a river," the Squire coldly said, "of the blood you've spilled today."

"Child, I have spilled seas," the Carrion Lord smiled.

The old monster shrugged.

"And what of it? You look at today's corpses and balk, but even if I'd put every soul in this city to the sword I would still be the lesser evil," the Carrion Lord said. "What are a few years of my bloody hands, compared to the Tower's thousand years of screams and darkness? How many more days like this one will you demand Calernia suffer before my cruelty becomes warranted? How more crowned butchers and torturers and madmen, how many more Triumphants?"

The orphan's fingers tightened around his sword. Evil always had its reasons.

"The excuses of a man who knows nothing except how to destroy," the Squire said.

"We are what we are," the Carrion Lord said, eyes smiling. "Someone charged me, once, to become a man who deserves to live in a better world."

"Only a fool," the Squire said, "would have believed that you could."

The monster looked out at the madness swallowing the city.

"You're not wrong," the Carrion Lord said. "Old dogs only have so many tricks in them. But I made this mess, you see. It's mine to clean up. So now I give you a warning, one you are to carry to my daughter."

"And who are you to warn the Queen of Callow of anything?" the Squire challenged.

"The man who forced three armies to retreat without baring his sword," the Carrion Lord calmly replied.

Arthur swallowed that, did not deny it.

"This is not yet done," the Carrion Lord said. "Tread carefully: I will not tolerate Praes to be handed out like a bauble, or its affairs settled as if you had conquered us. You do not rule here."

"Threats," the Squire snorted. "What will that do?"

"Draw a line in the sand," the Carrion Lord said. "And you I leave with a question. You have been, after all, of great use to me."

"I did nothing for you," the Squire harshly replied.

"You helped me draw their eye," the Carrion Lord said, and looked down at the street. "Did you hear me, Gods Below? I paid my dues. Three stories I burned on your altar, the pillars of an empire, and one more still lies ahead. The greatest of them, the oldest and most terrible."

Arthur shivered, looking to the sides. Nothing had changed, not even the wind or the foul scent of smoke, but the world felt... still. As if it did not dare move.

"I gave an oath," the Carrion Lord said. "I'll see it through to the end."

"The Hellgods will not save you," the Squire got out.

"That," the Carrion Lord said, "is rather the point. As for our debt, boy, I ask you this: why do you seek the Black Knight?"

Arthur frowned.

"We have a pattern of three," the Squire said.

"And this makes her your enemy?" the Carrion Lord asked.

"She's a villain," the Squire flatly said.

"So is your queen," the Carrion Lord said. "Her and many you've fought with, never against."

"She's the leader of the Legions of Terror," the Squire said.

"The army defending a realm you are invading," the Carrion Lord said. "For one of Below's, that is reason enough. I had thought your lot to require more than that."

"Don't muddle it up," the Squire growled. "She's tried to kill me too, and I survived. You want me to just let her go now that I hold her to account?"

"I want you to answer a simple question," the Carrion Lord said. "Why is it that Nim Mardottir is your enemy, Squire?"

Arthur's mouth was already halfway open when the man raised his hand.

"Do not speak in haste," the Carrion Lord said. "A squire must, in time, become a knight."

Green eyes studied him coolly.

"Consider, Arthur Foundling, what manner of a knight you are to be."

Arthur's hand stayed tight round his sword.

"You think I'll just let you leave now?" the Squire said. "That I won't take you prisoner?"

The old monster looked up at the sky. No to contemplate, Arthur realized as he followed the look, but to look at the height of the sun. The time.

"I think you are about to be needed elsewhere," the Carrion Lord.
"And that-"

The other man's voice had lowered, so Arthur leaned closer to try to understand even as the green-eyed man turned towards him.

That was when the brightstick went off in his face.

—

Northeast of Ater, on a low slope overlooking the distant camps of the nobles, a silhouette was cut into sight by the angle of the sun. The orc stroked the back of his mount, a great wolf large as a bull, and glanced back at the other riders behind him.

"Tell the Warlord now is the time," Chief Troke Snaketooth gravelled. "Ater is ripe for the picking."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Dredcor

So many stories clashing together.

Even if Amadeus fails, Praes will never be the same again, I'm sure.

Dredcor

I did not mean to reply here. Oops.

Miles

That just makes it better.

That comment was perfect

Insanenoodlyguy

He's in a full on Xanatos right now. He already one. The rest is optimization.

Andre Maginot

This ending is coming to be epic. A well-deserved dessert for a long road. Now imagine being the poor hard-working fucker who had to dream this up and write it out over years. God bless, EE.

Aptorian

"But we vote or we die," the Carrion Lord said. "And so once again I clicked the link and solved the captcha."

plantsbeans

wow

ruduen

Truly the most diabolical of subplans. People don't expect a villain to interrupt their own monologue.

dadycoool

Poor Arthur. "Why isn't this working? This is supposed to work." It's not working because you're trying to use Namelore on the man who taught the woman that most consider the mortal master of it.

KageLupus

Cat has died three times and it hasn't stuck. At a certain point "mortal" becomes subjective.

Matthew

It did work.

Amadeus called out the attempt... But then explained has evil plan anyway.

flashburn283

5 to 1 odds part of his plan involved revealing his plan to Cat.

sengachi

He said as much.

onedollargum

Squire was setting a story about Amadeus' arrogance, so Amadeus shifted the story to be about Hanno's tutelage instead.

Sorcoro

Wow so hyped to see how this all plays out.

Sir Nil

Man, seeing as how Kairo's final Below Due could have allowed him to ruin the continent, I'm afraid of what Amadeus' could do.

Sir Nil

"Only a fool," the Squire said, "would have believed that you could."

Hey don't talk about your mother like that.

Sinead

Break the Throne of Praes perhaps?

Hopefully Cat's reflection on the issue of 'future paths' with her own Name (from goblin troubles) means that she won't face another broken Name when Black Destroys the Tower.

WuseMajor

Ooof. Amadeus giving Kat the same "You have no authority here!" speech that every other noble here has given her is interesting.

Everyone else is doing it out of spite or thoughtless noble privilege. But Amadeus of the Green Stretch never does anything, save with intentionality. If he told the Squire that, then it was for a purpose and almost certainly not the obvious one.

I wonder if he's figured out the Bard's trap and is trying to warn her?

Liliet

I don't think it's about Bard's trap.

I think it's because ultimately, this is his goal. His line in the sand is his love for Praes, and it's what drives him both to break it and to prevent the pieces from being swept up afterwards. He doesn't know Cat's Name drama, he just knows what he wants and what he doesn't.

Also, him not referring to Cat as anything other than his daughter throughout the conversation and Arthur not blinking an eye at that ♥

shikkarasu

I don't think anyone sees Bard's trap, but if Catherine can reach into the deepest parts of her will and manage not to contradict her father instantly, he might just save her from it anyway.

Burdi

I think he wasn't talking about bard trap but a mistake that maybe is the trap.

"You do not rule here"

Amadeus trying to remind cat that she never intended to rule in praes in the first place, so she shouldn't act like she's in charge by settle things between power house because it would make creation see her as doing thing half measure which surely would be published.

And that could be the bard's trap, when high lord split between malicia and akua then the horde come.

Three power come together and cat who was said that the mess in praes Made it her business would tried to Make verdict for them which a mistake because she never has intention to rule praes.

Steven Silver

I got the feeling he doesn't want Cat ruling here because that would make Praes a nation conquered, thus allowing for Stories to see it freed. If it were parceled out, Stories would see it reunified. It's like the only way for Praes to die is for it to dissolve entirely on its own.

shikkarasu

Good point. Praes is used to losing -it was founded on having lost that one time to the Miezens- but has never admitted to just falling apart.

kinghaart

They have replaced the Miezen shackles with their own, yes.

Is Amadeus an anarchist? He tends to read that way, unlike say Cat who often values order over freedom.

Juff

Typo Thread:

do you thinking > do your thinking Thought that fascinating > Though that fascinating him prisoners > him prisoner
he must persevere > he had to persevere
He must find out > He had to find out work sent > work, and sent but not it > but now it eye' which was > eye', which was what take it affects > take it it affects "No quickly," > "Not quickly," dropped in > dropped it in they gear > their gear loose. it straight > loose. It flew straight remedy that. > can remedy that."

Sowhy > So why
No to contemplate > Not to contemplate

Tenthyr

I can't help but wonder exactly what Black wants to bargain for here. Or what his ultimate goal is beyond destroying the Dread Empire. What will come after Praesi?

Liliet

I don't think he wants to bargain. He wants to direct Cat away from particular courses of action, so she'll let Praesi sort it out on their own. One would imagine he has some idea about how they will.

ninegardens

Feels kind of like Grey Pilgrim's:
"Dear Cat,
plz no interfere with Hanno's name transition bullshit.
It goes bad for everyone involved if you do.
k thx bai
– grandpa T"

stars rain down from heavens

onedollargum

Thinking about it the choirs are losing a lot of their direct pawns on Calernia. Do you think this helps or hurts the Intercessor?

jamesc9

Probably helps, because she probably has more manoeuvring room with ordinary Named.

Liliet

Yup.

Sugar Roll

My money is on Amadeus steering Cat to actually conquer Praesi.

Liliet

Well, I lost my bet spectacularly. This was quite delightful!

(Waiting for the “but Amadeus just wants to spite Good” crowd to somehow fit in this one, with popcorn)

AND THAT’S A GOOD QUESTION ARTHUR DO THINK ABOUT IT

Liliet

More thoughts:

1) Seriously though, this is so sad. Amadeus)=)=)= COME ON ASSHOLE YOU HAVENT EVEN SAID HI TO CAT

2) So by how much, and by what method exactly, is Akua going to manage to reduce casualties? This has become her signature lately 😊

shikkarasu

This is about as much “hi, Cat” as he can afford.

- He has a lot to do and very few hands to do it with
- If Catherine knew how many people he was about to kill she’d never allow it
- Kind of the whole point is a Praesi doing his own thing while Callowans happen to be around.

It’s also classic Amadeus to give his daughter gifts she didn’t ask for, threats she admittedly did earn, and then beam with pride from the sidelines as she beats impossible odds.

Liliet

True, true.

I just want them to hug, though.

Shveiran

The massive civilian death toll may be some sort of hindrance

Liliet

Never has been before! Catherine was always willing to postpone the scolding for after the hug.

kinghaart

They won’t hug, they might mutually stab one another though.

Liliet

they've been hugging every time they met since the start of book 2

Insanenoodlyguy

She's going to insist she's selfishly surrounding herself with bodies between herself and this mess. What she's actually doing is forming the army that will have the highest number of survivors and save the most people.

She might become ruler of Praes simply by virtue of being the only person who could be that the people don't despise.

beleester

And then for an encore, she'll bind the rampaging demons to her service, giving herself the largest arsenal of superweapons on the field. It's such a brilliant way to eliminate her rivals that everyone will be convinced she planned it that way.

JJR

It was mentioned in the Arsenal attack that Demons of Fear can be subsumed by Demons of Excess. So subsuming each other is something at least some demons can do. Akua just needs to figure out how to get all the loose demons to eat each other in turn and become a turducken from hell that can then be banished with a single spell.

Mental Mouse

Later in some Hell: "WTF? Who ordered this?"

jamesc9

Or else, "excellent; with the poison sauce please."

(with credit to Vainquer the Dragon).

kinghaart

Sounds like they need a Hero. Handy that Squire is around and has just seen the light, literally.

caoimhinh

Typo/mistake:

"the fair-haired orphan forced himself to think."

Arthur isn't fair-haired, he is dark-haired.

irritantseraphim

Ah, the Praesi specialty. Demons and devils.

Trying to poison the Ranger with what's basically hyper-strength LSD? Nice plan, Indrani!

Oh Amadeus, you old monster. Not because you have done anything particularly evil in this battle, but because you had your finger in every wound. I didn't understand what was going on when it happened, but now I think I do.

Our boy Arthur possibly turning into a Black Knight? Sweet. He's not been quite the heroic type, lately.

dadycool

A young, impressionable Hero turned Evil by the Villainous Mentor he was given to by one who really should've known better? Personally, I'm one of those who was hoping for a Black Knight Arthur basically from the beginning.

Konstantin von Karstein

I would hate that. I want a mostly Heroic Callow, without too much Villains. Most Villains are monsters, those who aren't are exeptions.

Razorfloss

Yes but remember this is the beginning of age of order and the death Kell of the age of miracles. He may key word here being may become the black knight but there's no way in hell he is going to become monster. The age of traditional evil overlords is dead and gone. So all future villians are going to be in the mold of cat because this age is her creation and her mark on the world. They may be evil but only because of methods but not in character. If and this is a big one he becomes the black knight he will heavily lean on the lawful side of lawful evil and the only difference between competent lawful evil and lawful good at first glance is the methods used. Personally speaking I'm thinking he's going to end up somewhere in the middle with a heroic leaning neutral name.

diverstones

Grey Knight baby

Shveiran

There are no neutral Names like that.
Neutral Names are just Names that can be either good or evil IN DIFFERENT INCARNATIONS. Not Names that are neither when they are actually owned.

kinghaart

That's Bard talk right there. Cat might change that thinking which is what scares her – truly Gray names don't really work for her, as Hierarch showed.

ninegardens

Personally, it feels like Maddie is protecting him from that path.

Basically saying "If you kill Nim just because you are enemies, that's a step down the road towards inheriting her name"

irritantseraphim

Yeah, that was the vibe I am getting. Arthur being lost/not seeing the Heroic stuff lately, with Amadeus ripping open Arthurs eyes to show him the path he's been going lately.

beleester

That makes sense. Arthur's reason for killing the Black Knight is basically military – It's nothing personal, but Nim is the commander of the opposing army (and a one-woman army herself), and if Arthur kills her that will take the Legions off the board as a fighting force, which allows Callow to achieve its military objective of conquering Praes and using it to fix their Hellgate problem out west.

Now, that's a pretty righteous cause to be fighting for – probably the best thing Arthur can be doing right now – but it doesn't feel very heroic from Arthur's perspective. If he makes that into his heroic thesis, he's basically saying "I'm just a soldier in the Black Queen's army." Which is pretty close to being the Black Knight.

Shveiran

I think he is protecting him from becoming just a nother William or Hunter, basically.

I don't think Arthur is at risk of becoming a Villain, especially since his reasons for killing Nim are not Villanous: it is not power, or revenge, or anger. He is going to kill her because she is the enemy, and not think too hard about that because she also happens to have to wrong coat. Sadly, while these look like villanous reasons to me, they were proven not to be Villanous but rather Heroic. The Exiled Prince didn't have any greater reason to challenge Cat than "I want to fight evil and also she is a commander to this host". Most of the crusading heroes did not need any more reason than "they are Evil or the minions of Villains", and the ones infiltrating Callow were pretty much the same.

Hunter (and maybe even the Bumbling Conjuror) didn't seem to have any great ideal beside opposing Evil to join William's band.

If Arthur kills Nim now, it won't turn him into the Black Knight. But it will shape his new, heroic Name's story into one that is black and white.

That is what Amadeus is trying to save him (and everyone else) from.

Halinn

I'm hoping for the first Gray Knight. Maybe as the first Name of the new Age.

Miles

I think we're past the point where repeating things in exactly the same way wouldn't be super boring...

Such as the current squire becoming yet another carbon copy of Black or White Knight.

No, what we need now is not a Knight who is Grey either, but rather a ~~GAN~~-Knight Of Many Colors

Mental Mouse

I will not be surprised if Ranger puts that time dilation to work for her....

dadycoool

And so the tale of the Story-Slayer approaches its climax. For decades, Amadeus of the Green Stretch made every effort, spared no expense, turned over every stone to Destroy every story he possibly could. And it was all preparation for this moment, when he Destroys the greatest, most terrible story of them all: his own home.

Miles

In the end, there can be only one story.

The story of the story killer, who absorbs the powers of any story he kills

vuthuha912

Yeah. Destroy is always a part of creation – the first part and the the condition for creation to truly happen. Amadeus was channeling Shiva The Destroyer his entire life. A Destroyer is also the god responsible for transform, create and protect.

My god. Hinduism is really a fascinating religion.

Reader in the Night

Godsdamnit, Amadeus! Truly, this man is the finest butcher in Creation. Everyone else is playing the game, Amadeus decided to literally smash the board. He's close to butchering a nation by basically doing nothing at all and letting other people execute his plan on his behalf. We all expected his plan was to break the Tower, only that was just the tip of the iceberg. The madman wants to break down the Empire.

Though I do wonder how he could have arranged for those specific events to happen. Even accounting for his status as a Memetic Badass, Kala would have been basically impossible to arrange without being present in the scene. You guys think Scribe and Amadeus splitting up was all a long con so he could guide Cat into the position he needed?

Also, I wonder if the Bard saw this coming? Amadeus was basically hidden from the story so far, it's only now he announced his intention to the Gods Below (while also calling in his Due to help destroy the Tower, meaning he's trying to die).

Liliet

We know he arranged Kala by feeding Abreha plans through Grem. That only took care of one side, but the rest sorted themselves out as he knew they would. Abreha was a sufficient tool to shape the engagement.

Reader in the Night

That's the thing, though. Not even Grem One-Eye would have been able to predict every step of the insanity that was Kala, particularly by letter while being nowhere near and advising one of the losing armies.

It feels like Amadeus is taking credit for things he didn't really do here. At best, he watched them get done, but that doesn't give him ownership of the story. At best, he nudged some things along.

sengachi

The thing is that the desertions at Kala didn't happen because of the messy complicated nuances of Juniper's final glorious plan.

They happened simply because the Legions had fought one another for long enough, using war engines which ensure the death tolls were horrendous enough, until they couldn't stomach it any longer. The desertions were inevitable so long as the bloody carnage lasted long enough. And with the caliber of talent on all sides of the Legions, that was inevitable. After all, even with Juniper's utter brilliance backing the side with the most and best Named, and the most veteran Legions, and the best Story backing them, it still ended up turning into a hellish grind. Even that level of astonishing victory couldn't prevent the final confrontation from being a charnel house.

That was the least bloody and grinding possible outcome.

And the least was still enough to break them all, so I'd say Black knew what he was doing and can take credit when he arranged for them all to be in the same place at the same time.

Liliet

He didn't need to predict exact steps. The recipe is "all the armies at the same place at the same time", that's all he actually needed, the specifics don't matter, it plays out the same way in the dimension he's interested in.

Shveiran

TBF, he also needed "and this turns into a grinder", otherwise there wouldn't have been enough time for the sentiment to set in.

Which is... the part that I have an harder time buying, honestly. Amadeus could not have foreseen (until very recently) the actual strength Catherine would come back with.

He could not foresee the strength of her "art of war" after two years butting head with the motherloving Dead King to judge Nim's would be a match, and not flat-out superior or inferior.

He could not have foresaw the Ruination of Night, without which this wouldn't have turned into a grinder because Cat-led sigils would have flattened any fortification the Legions could build.

Come to think of it, he could not have foresaw that Catherine would have come back to Praes at all.

Now, maybe this is all on the meta-level?

Like, Maddie knows that Sve Noc upsets the balance, so something will happen to it to restore it. He knows the Dead King is not using devils yet, so he gambles sooner or later diabolism is going to become relevant again, and that means Praes rises with it. And he knows his daughter has issues to fix in Praes, so that is where the story of the most relevant player in the continent will lead her eventually.

But... yeah, this stretches my suspension of disbelief a bit.

I can buy the Bard acting this way.

But surrendering yourself to the currents of the narrative and just trust that things will eventually arrange themselves in a way that fits your predictions... it feels like a loss of control that I have an hard time matching with Maddie.

Liliet

> Come to think of it, he could not have foresaw that Catherine would have come back to Praes at all.

He kicked the plan into gear when he found out she was coming back. And he knew she would come back at least after the war's end. Her goals require it.

> Amadeus could not have foreseen (until very recently) the actual strength Catherine would come back with. He could not foresee the strength of her "art of war" after two years butting head with the motherloving Dead King to judge Nim's would be a match, and not flat-out superior or inferior.

He could not have foresaw the Ruination of Night, without which this wouldn't have turned into a grinder because Cat-led sigils would have flattened any fortification the Legions could build.

Amadeus didn't need to foresee any of it before the actual beginning of the campaign, at which point he probably had all the intel he wanted with his old Legion contacts in the Army of Callow.

Shveiran

If that is true, then Amadeus plan was to fuck around for years waiting for Catherine to come back.

If so, that means he really saw the current apocalypse as something he had no obligation to lend a hand to, and it makes the "you do not rule here, by what right etc" spiel even more galling.

Liliet

TBF, Amadeus's fucking around was also keeping Praes from being a problem to the war effort in the meanwhile (except for Malicia's Mercantis and League meddling, but he couldn't do anything about that).

...but yes, essentially -_-

SpeckofStardust

Bard see's all stories,
"Were you watching?" he teased.

A little jest, just between the two of them. She was always watching."

-Interlude:Empires

The Dead King, is a credible source for her abilities.

"Like a bird of misfortune perched atop the tower, you see it all below," Agnes said, and her own voice sounded distant.

"Stories."

"I know many stories," the other woman agreed.

"You know stories," the Augur softly laughed. "All the stories, all the time, as if they unfolded beneath your wings and you need only look down to see the lay of them. You pick, and choose, and swoop and how does it not drive you mad."

Moonlight on frost – lizard, yawning – a distant bird in the night, halfway between the lone sentinel and the weeping man. Danger, the world whispered, tread lightly. As if she needed be told. She should not have spoken so much.

"It has been a very long time," the Bard lightly said, "since someone grasped that."

-Iterlude: And Yet We Stand

The Augur also says it, and bard confirmed it.

The Bard knows much and Name are not the limit of her sight.

Shveiran

She knows stories.

Name could very well be the limit, because after all, how many stories have pivots that don't involve Names?

It's the rule of the game. Power coalesces around weight and shape.

She will always know the partsthat matter; Amadues is, I think, betting on the fact that if he can lay enough groundwork before, she will see it too late to do much about it.

Miles

OR they're going to grant him a Name. 3 stories killed without a Name, and one with.

He'd be a claimant for the Name Bard is trying to foist on Cat, giving her a better shot at the Name she earned without Bard's interference.

And like a true Genre-Savvy Mentor he is sacrificing himself in a way that doesn't involve unnecessary dying.

Shveiran

Nah. Amadeus has not been doing what she has.
He can't step in her shoes just because he wants to; he doesn't have the weight.
If he did, he would have been a claimant for a long time, because little has changed.

avikav

> "The first story is that Praes is a nation"
> "The second was faster to kill, but it cost me more. It was... difficult, killing the Legions of Terror."
> "Three stories I burned on your altar, the pillars of an empire, and one more still lies ahead. The greatest of them, the oldest and most terrible."
Wait, what was the third?

> "The man who forced three armies to retreat without baring his sword," the Carrion Lord calmly replied.
This sounds familiar but I can't quite remember it

avikav

> "And today you burn the High Lords"

Nevermind, I was conflating that with the first

Miles

>This sounds familiar but I can't quite remember it

He's talking about this current battle.

Jason Ipswitch

"Three stories I burned on your altar, the pillars of an empire, and one more still lies ahead. The greatest of them, the oldest and most terrible."

Black is definitely burning down the Tower with goblinfire. And if he's able to secretly lure Alaya out before he does so, given how precarious her hold power (and her Name) is right now, that alone may make her no longer Dread Empress. Which gives her an out (everyone thinking she died in the Tower) if she's willing to take it. She might be too far gone, but if anyone can pull her away from her Name it will be Amadeus.

Also, while I've no idea how it fits into everything going on, the Emerald Swords are still hunting Ranger. And I'm sure Amadeus has taken that into account, too. I wonder if Archer, Huntress and Cocky have?

ninegardens

I feel like....

It feels like he is trying to buy a favour off the gods below. Blood and Chaos and sacrifice and the will to change the world.

I don't... see how saving Alaya's life fits into that story. It reads as hesitation, of placing something and someone ABOVE one's ambition.

It feels like either he doesn't value Alaya as much as I thought, or he hasn't really revealed his true plan yet, and either way it feels....

I feel confused, and worried, and I wanted Amadeus to be the hero of this story.

And I don't think he is any more. 😞

Miles

I think Alaya will find a way to survive. It's her whole backstory.

Shveiran

So was the story of the Fortunate Fool, yet Keter still got his due.

Every story has an ending, and Malicia's got more opposition and bad karma than most.

kinghaart

I mean, Amadeus was never going to be anyone's hero.

At best, in 100 years people might look back and say – “well, he was terrible for everyone at the time, but in the long term or worked out OK for us so we will ignore him instead of judging him”

vuthuha912

He was Malicia's hero for her entire reign. He was there to keep Malicia in power. And I am sure anyone whose life he improved will consider him a hero.

And arguably, he is a Praesi hero – the type that country deserved and needed. The Destroyer of Evil and the person who make way for reforms, transform and creation. He is the story of Shiva. (I read about the idea of Shiva from another work and it fits quite well)

Frivolous

Jason Ipswitch: I don't think Amadeus cares about Alaya or her fate anymore. His actions are not those of a man who still loves her.

I believe he has changed her status to Acceptable Collateral Damage.

As I commented in Chapter 23: Sung; Singer, it would be difficult enough to keep Alaya alive if the Tower burns, but there would be all the captive demons that would be let loose, too.

Now we know that in addition to the Tower's demons, there are a dozen other demons running around, set free by the High Lords. I didn't expect that, but it only makes things worse for a presumably escaping Alaya.

Plus, you know, all the Praesi, both noble and commoner, who want her dead, whether from outrage against her policies or from power hunger.

I think right now the only person who might spare Alaya's life is Akua Sahelian, which is funny.

Mental Mouse

Just why are Archer, Huntress, and Cocky going after Ranger again? Last I'd heard Ranger hadn't even made contact with Cat's forces, and our trio (not to mention us) have no idea what Ranger's goals or purposes are here... so why are they picking the fight of their lives in the middle of the battle of their lives?

Shveiran

Because they want to bad enough that Alexis is going along with Indrani.

That much baggage needs no further reason.

kinghaart

Because Ranger abused them all in different ways and to grow beyond that they need to confront her (or at least, that's how they feel). And the only language she'll do that in is violence.

I think they are outclassed still, but they at least have a story behind them. I don't think anyone will die, maybe some injuries though.

Reader in the Night

Also, not really a serious comment, but anybody else notice that Amadeus is incredibly good at breaking stories by destroying pieces of Evil infrastructure in climatic moments to decide the fate of nations, while destroying a city in the process?

If he survives this suicidal gambit despite his best efforts to die (again), Cat should throw him at the Walls of Keter, see if he can't make something stick. The third time should get a nudge by Fate, to complete the pattern.

ninegardens

I ... ummm.... Maddie is like... a LOT more of a monster here than I expected. Like... a lot.

I know he wanted to end the tower.... but the fact that he wants to end the country... the fact that he sacrificed his own legions... the citizen's of Ater....

It's not what I expected from a man I expected to spare even Malicia.

From a man who KNOWS what lurks in the north.

... And what, his plan to rack up enough blood and chaos, let himself die, and then make a wish upon the hellgods, just like Kiaros was offered?

Or just try to undermine the story... using the same blood and chaos that has been part of the story for centuries upon centuries?

And the plan... it just ain't clever enough, based on what we've been told here. It's too brutish, too desperate, too reactive. It's the kind of flying fortress level bullshit Bard would have a field day with.

.... It feels out of character. It feels like it doesn't add up, which... possibly means I'm reading something HERE wrong, or possibly means that there are more secrets and plot twists I don't yet know.

SpeckofStardust

I mean Scribe said it herself, he will seek to destroy everything he thinks harms the Dread Empire, And considering the Destroy was an aspect of his once that was last seen breaking both a superweapon and a Name, should let you know that well..

""You're a monster, aren't you?" I spoke softly into the night, looking at him from the corner of my eye.

He smiled. "The very worst kind," he replied."

Nothing here is honestly against his nature.

Further more

"No longer extending trust to someone who deftly manipulated me into rebellion and undertaking a road that ends in the murder of someone dear to me?" Black said.

He never you know said that Scribe failed to put him on the path of murdering someone that's dear to him.

Honestly just cause you like him as a character doesn't mean you should miss so much about him.

Halinn

Except that Scribe got it wrong – it's not the Dread Empire he wants to save, but Praes.

SpeckofStardust

True, I can also see him giving Alaya one final chance to save herself, its just you know if she fails the test she will be killed.

Frivolous

Reader in the Night: You think Amadeus' plan is brutish, desperate, and reactive, and not clever enough? Interesting.

I have mostly the opposite assessment. To me it looks carefully planned, innovative, and extremely clever. Amadeus is so astute, he could have been a psychohistorian in the manner of Hari Seldon.

If you feel like it, could you explain why you think it's desperate and reactive? I really can't see it, and I'm wondering if I'm blind or overlooking something.

shikkarasu

At most he is reacting to the realisation that his old method was never going to work. He's taking advantage of the situation, but as we saw back in the Prologue of this book he was waiting and preparing for this day for 2 years. It feels much more 'Adopt, Adapt, and Improve' than desperate or reactive.

If the individual people were important to him, if he cared about the Tower at all aside from a means to an end, or if he valued his relationships above his motives there would be a case for 'desperate,' but he has massacred thousands before, he openly disdains everything about the Tower, and he has mused about arranging the deaths of Eudokia and even Ranger if they ever got in the way of his end goals.

This is Amadeus of the Green Stretch. This is what he looks like in his endgame. I will, at best, concede 'brutish.'

ninegardens

This is who Amadeus of the Green stretch was during the Conquests, or while fighting Dread Emperor Prequle. Yes, I agree.

But the story has kind of aimed at talking about Black's evolution and change. Cat telling him to be a better person. Him actually accepting that he hates the Grey Pilgrim for killing his friend.

Everyone going "Oh, well he killed tonnes of people in the conquests and wars", I'm like "But he was meant to change".

You say that this is an "adopt, adapt, improve", but honestly... This feels like him going for "Welp, my modern technique didn't work... so I'll roll back to the bullshit manipulation techniques of last century!"

It's the same manipulative "Trick the snake into eating its own tail" bullshit that Malicia has been playing at for the past decade (to the cost of all involved).

His aspects were "Destroy", sure, but all the successes he had in the past were the things he created (The legions, the calamities, Cat, the new order in Callow). The "Burn it down, and the rebuild in the ashes". Rebuilding is the important part, and here he's pretty much said "I'm going to be too dead to rebuild. Cat should stay out of it, and all the high lords will be hated".

When I say reactive, I mean "He sees what he wants gone, and finds a way to destroy it", instead of "He sees what he wants there to be, and seeks a way to destroy it".

It's desperate in the sense of "High risk, but I don't have a better plan"; this might not work. And even if it does work, praes* needs to be ready to fight the dead king ASAP*. He's actively crippling an empire on the eve of battle in a high risk questionable reward gambit, because he just can't accept the notion of losing.

Or waiting.

Or coming up with a plan that doesn't use his methods.

I mean, I'll put it this way: are we seriously claiming that with 2 years warning, this is the best possible plan that Black could have thought of?

Frivolous

ninegardens: To your assertions, I can only reply with the entire chapter of A Mould Unbroken.

Amadeus wants Evil to win, and he can't see it winning when it is constricted by the mould of the Dread Empire of Praes. Even Malicia fell to the temptation of Dark Days protocols and doomsday weapons.

So he destroys the Dread Empire's Story, destroys the Name of Dread Empress, so that something new and better can evolve. More fit to purpose, according to Amadeus' own judgment.

I have no idea if it's the best possible plan. I do think Amadeus is very clever, and this is the plan he thinks will get him the result he wants.

Zach

Where in the world did you get the idea that Amadeus was on some path of change? The fact that Catherine wants him to be a better person doesn't mean that it's true. And Amadeus caring about his close family and friends also doesn't make him a good person. He lost his Name because he decided to no longer serve the Dread Empress.

Amadeus also has no reason to care about the Dead King. The Dead King is not threatening Praes. Catherine is the one who cares about protecting the West, but Amadeus is ambivalent.

shikkarasu

I think he lost his Name due to being captured by Heroes. There was a line in Book 2 about how the Villain always dies or changes sides, they don't get to come back from being prisoner.

2:49 – Victory

"If I ever ended up in her position, I hoped I would be extended the courtesy. Somehow, it was doubtful I would. Villains didn't get taken prisoner, as I understood it. We turned our cloak or died, there was no middle ground."

This feels like EE foreshadowing. He only earned a continue as a token reward for 60 years of playing the game, by the way Bard described it.

As for the Dead king, I don't think he's ambivalent about it he just knows that what he wants and what Catherine needs are not mutually exclusive. He isn't ignoring the issue, he's just using it to further his own agenda. If there is no Praes, then who tells Catherine that she can't 'borrow' their diabolists? Everyone (that Amadeus cares about) wins.

... Although Cat may stab him again for this.

vuthuha912

????

The structure is still there. I mean, the legionaries aren't forgetting their training because they deserted. It is just that they will fight for something they believe in instead of someone else's dream. It may also means they get better treatment than before by staying together. I mean farmers are important but the way they were treated in history really make you ask how much they worth. I am saying that if the government can't give them adequate treatment or a worthy cause then they ain't moving. The war in Keter is not sisters fighting sisters, it is living fighting dead. They will enlisted again with greater unity after their experience.

Honestly, we need 3 things from Praes: legionaries, resources, diabolists. Most of them are intact. The veteran legionaries can be called upon with the right cause, they won't even need training. Diabolists are just the household mages – not the nobles who gather at the Tower. With their masters gone, I am sure they will enjoy a new employer. Malicia hasn't depleted the resource of the Tower just yet, she would if Amadeus tried raising his banners. He would win in a all out struggle with her but she will use everything so he refused to do that. Enough of the structure is still intact for a great mobilization. Don't be surprised. Malicia was still collecting taxes during the civil wars. The bureaucracy outside of Ater was doing okay. We just need to replace the head fast enough to mobilize. It would be easy since Cat brings Vivi and most of her officers along and if it came to it, she could take charge. Or let the legion declare martial laws and directly take control. I doubt there aren't any logistic expert left to take control of Praes war machine. It is Ater. It is filled with people. Most important people will be in the safer place especially the high ranking officers under house arrest. It will be a lot easier than you think.

Frivolous

Addendum: Sorry, the above post should have been to ninegardens. Don't know why I addressed it to Reader of the Night.

Reader in the Night

Not me, it was Ninegardens. To me, it feels extremely and excessively violent, but extreme and excessive violence is one of Amadeus's trademarks. The man is a big believer in "No kill like Overkill."

jamesc9

One grace, one sin.

sengachi

I mean, that's the thing about Black. He says as much to Squire. These are the tools he knows how to wield. And he's not willing to accept inaction of himself.

Black has a priority list behind those gears churning in his eyes. It says what is of value to him. And yes, civilian casualties are on that list. So are the lives of the Legionnaires he raised up. But you can only have one top priority. There is only one item on the top of his list.

The item at the top of his list, the thing he values most, is breaking the wheel. And if the other things he values would prevent him from doing that, they will get mulched in those gears behind his eyes just like everything else.

kinghaart

This.

Also, it's possible that the final story to break is that Villains are good for Praes. Virtually none have been, Amadeus included, and he's shown that.

Praes really needs to either separate apart into more of a league (ironic that the League is presently in path to be an empire, no?) or it needs a different system of rule. One where the strongest are incentivized to share their strength.

vuthuha912

Um... I don't know how to explain this but I don't think he destroyed the country Praes, just the governing structure i.e the story. Like the Roman Republic turning into the Roman Empire. The people was the same people, the cultural was still there. They still called themselves Roman. ...He was taking the shackles of shallow ambitious and self-destructive tendency off of Praes, allowing it to transform to something new. Destroy is the first step of create, transform and reform. Didn't his plan with Callow go down the crapper because of the story (the mind-altering power that fuck with Praesi at the worst moment)? Now, all the reforms are going to stick because the story twisting people into destroying themselves died in this chapter.

Same with the Legions – he did just destroyed it, he made it stronger with unity. Every women and men at Kala is standing in solidarity with each other. They stopped becoming a tool for the higher up and start taking power in their own hand by standing together. Just like union movement. The legion finally say enough is enough. Amadeus had teach them unity and loyalty. It was their choice on how to proceed. Is it a bad thing that these people no longer serve as a mindless soldiers for every madman and woman?

Alter is just a normal part of every great change. No change in government come without a lot of death and scheming. Compared to China or Russia or literally any other real life country, this is tame and short. The butcher had not spread further to the rest of the country or the continent. Just the capital and the army. Everybody else was doing just fine.

He had loved Malicia for 40 years until Salia even more than the Calamities because all his plan involve her outlining him and rule Praes. He saved her life from story suicide back in book 4. If you loves your lord/lady, you don't help they sacrificed 100 virgins for immortality, you slap them to their senses. Black was not blind by loyalty but his action was a greater kind of loyalty – the kind that any ruler wish to have.

Everyone was so focus on the destroy aspect of Amadeus but forget that he had built stuffs for decades. Everything he built, he built it to last. But Tyrant was right, without thoroughly destruction, everything is a line on the sand. He was swimming against the current the entire time.

Amadeus is a man of duality, destroy accompanied by reform, create and transform. Basically Shiva

Frivolous

I don't remember the spiders in the sewer being that big. Then again they were a small detail long long ago and I never paid much attention to them.

Amadeus' plan here feels a lot like the planning of Neshamah. Acting very subtly, taking advantage of exiting trends in society, moving very indirectly, giving no openings.

I suspect that in part the reason it is so oblique is that it is meant to counter any attempts by the Intercessor to notice or attack it.

Only Catherine and Masego of the Woe were there in Arcadia to witness (in Witness) the conversation between living Neshamah and the Intercessor, but they both could have communicated to others in the years since the important fact that Neshamah was able to elude the Intercessor's attention by giving her no openings.

Amadeus might have learned it that way, or he might have deduced it himself. He is after all frightfully smart.

Given the above, I believe this plan was meant to harm the Intercessor as much as the Dread Empire of Praes. It seems almost guaranteed given Amadeus kept talking about killing and sacrificing stories, and given that the Intercessor is the "patron goddess" of stories.

Destroying the Dread Empire as a story should also remove the capacity for certain Names to exist, particularly Dread Empress and Chancellor. The Intercessor needs Names to work through; removing Names hurts her.

The Names of Black Knight and Warlock might survive, though.

This plan seems to have caught Catherine by surprise. She certainly didn't plan for giant spiders. Could it have surprised the Intercessor as well? We'll see.

Did Amadeus anticipate the orc invasion? It seems likely, given he and Ranger used the Emerald Swords to depopulate the fortress of Chagoro.

Quote from Wage: "So he wants the Clans going on the offensive too," I mused. "Interesting."

Yet he probably didn't anticipate that Hakram would become Warlord, especially since Hakram himself didn't anticipate it.

Hakram being Warlord probably changes things, deviates from Amadeus' plan. I don't think another Warlord would have gone straight for Ater. The orc Horde would have visited Nok first, learned about the fighting in Ater later, and thus arrived after Amadeus' plan for Ater was concluded.

Lastly, a nice note: When you pray to the Gods Below, you look down, not up.

Piromin

Regarding the spiders... to be fair this is a story driven world that seems to relish in following tropes, and that made an abundance of terribly monstrous spiders almost an inevitability.

Just as heros survive impossible falls, the catacombs are always bigger than one thought, the monster in the deep are also a very ingrained trope, and this is on ATER, the capital of a country known for their monsters and even giant spiders in normal sewers, not counting the very high chance there are a multitude of subterranean secret tunnels or bases, it stands to reason that in this particular place the story of monsters in the deep and dangerous catacombs would be... overcharged? Sorry if i'm not expressing myself properly.

serdar314

You see my friends, you all miss a certain point. Meddie made legions desert, split up the factions and shown the true nature of the High Lords. Yes it is to destroy the story of the Empire, but this is not Age of Wonders. It is the age of Order. Remember the chapter so very long ago, focused at the crop growth of Presei and Callow? Or chapter about Hunger in Presei and their education system? At the base of every story Amadeus killed, there is hunger. Hunger that was solved with conquest sure but Callow now has the Black Queen. It will not bow. So how does bringing tower solves that? And more to the point who is the stories Hero(!)? A Callowan girl who grow up in a conquered country and who is waiting for the biggest Name ever. Remember this?

The question of who the most vindictive people of Calernia are has long been debated. Some say it is the Arlesites, who will duel to the death over the use of the wrong adjective in a verse. Others say it is those of the Free Cities, where the moving of a border by half a mile will spawn a war lasting three generations. Others yet say it is the Praesi, who indulge in political assassination the way other nations enjoy a cup of good wine. I would humbly put forward, however, that the answer is the people of Callow. Steal an apple from a farmer of the Kingdom and fifty years later his grandson will find yours on the other side of the continent, sock him in the eye and take three apples back.

Feels familiar?

Burlyraven

So I see two paths for Arthur following this: he either realizes that Cat's been using him and rebels against her corruption, or he realizes and accepts that despite his heroic goals, he fits easiest into the groove of a brutal villain (albiet with a loving side, like Captain). There was a path for him to be a hero birthed from Cat's shadow, but Amadeus just killed that story as well.

Insanenoodlyguy

To be fair though it's not really a betrayal. "Yeah, I set you up on a story where you can beat the evil general of the enemy army causing us the most problems." Like, how mad is he going to get about that?

sengachi

Yeah, you don't blame the Evil mentor for not teaching you to look deep into your heart and ask yourself why you're fighting the Evil leader of the enemy army. That's on you. And if you need your Evil grandmentor to point that out to you, that's really on you.

hakureireimu

What corruption?

jamesc9

Possibly, aiming him to further Evil on Evil conflict, rather than providing him with Good on Evil conflict.

masterofbones

I must admit, I'm not sure what Amadeus is getting at here. Arthur is hunting Nim because Nim serves Malicia, who has time after time proven willing to throw the world under the bus for personal gain.

Nim is a major power center, and the defense of the Tower leans heavily on her. This isn't a story thing, its basic practicality for the purpose of removing an utterly evil person from rule.

SpeckofStardust

I mean while Nim is believed to be on Malicia's side she isn't anymore, so killing her isn't as practical as turning her, After all cat intends to see Preas and the tower turned, just the current ruler to die.

ChillyPepper

He is implying he is killing her to become a black knight of Callow, possibly restarting the Dread Empire elsewhere, or so I interpreted it.

Xi Cree

What Amadeus is getting at is that the Squire is hunting the Blackknight BECAUSE... that's what the Squire does rather than the complex reason you gave.

Ie. The kid is letting himself be pulled around by the story rather than using the story to accomplish a goal.

There's good reason why he should be killing the Black Knight... but he's not hunting her for those reasons... which makes outcomes that might better suit those reasons null if they show up... like maybe turning the Black Knight against the Empress and thus using her as a weapon.

Amadeus is being the mentor Grandpa that dies for him...

shikkarasu

I think it's broader than that. He won't turn into the Black Knight by killing Nim for no good reason, but the Mirror Knight. Specifically, he will turn into another Christophe. Being jerked around by anyone with a faint grasp on Namelore.

He's warning Arthur that Catherine is using him as a weapon, but not trying not to slander his own daughter. As it stands Arthur can transition into any Name he likes, but won't have free will until he starts doing what he thinks is right, instead of doing what he thinks is expected.

Shveiran

If Arthur was hunting her because of that, you'd be right.

But though those practicalities exist, they are not the reason for his actions.

Cold Cyberia

The final story Amadeus wants to burn looks to be the story of Dread Empress. It would line up nicely with the chapter titles.

Imo, Akua messes up his neat story about nobility. She was always a bit of a blind spot to Black and Malicia so I like that she's a bit of a curve ball. She's now literally the noble he was hoping Praesi High Seats would turn out to be. I'm convinced Akua will be Cat's hidden blade against any upcoming story-fu as she's the only one who truly understands her.

It's good to see Black back in the bastard mode. He's been sorely missed.

Isaac Martinez

Yep. Pretty much.

Destroying the culture of Praes, including Jino-waza?
Nope. She is surely in there protecting what she can. Because she knows that rule and power is no her due, and people must not suffer anymore by her Folly.

Killing the Legions? Right now they are in process of being revived by the New and Improved Black Knight Orc Version. With Akua speeches included!

But that's not the point.

Things like nation and government body is defined by the people that inherits their culture, so the Empire can die with their Tower. Akua will save what she can, Amadeus will burn what is left and the Empress is now losing her Authority and Name. Praes will never be the same.

.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Minor correction: the current Black Knight is an ogre, not an orc.

Rumu11

Arthur made a fatal mistake trying to defeat Amadeus, he hadn't reached the final step in his evil master plan!

letouriste

So...how many sides there is in this battle? 10?

- Cat&co (including maybe Abreha)
- The High Lords (which we will put in one category to simplify)
- Dread Empress Malicia
- Wandering Bard
- Warlord and his orcs
- The spiders under their maybe stil alive Dread Emperor (Tenebrous?)
- The demons which are under nobody orders
- Amadeus and Ranger
- Akua and Black Knight Nim along with the Loyalist Legions
- The common folks
- Squire maybe, if he choose to not follow Cat after Amadeus question

Could be a 7 sides battlefield, maybe more.

Sykomantis

Seven Sides and One, perhaps?

Miles

I mean, don't forget Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return

shikkarasu

May She Never Return

Cayle

The Squire just dodged becoming the Black Knight, disappointed that I didn't see that.

Steven Silver

Er, there's lots of knights. Black knights, white knights, red knights, barrow knights, death knights, good knights, knight lights...

I think Pappy Amadeus is just helping Squire really choose his own path, as opposed to simply getting swept up in others' stories.

Miles

If Squire gets really good at stories, he might even get the fabled Name of M. Knight Shyamalan

Shveiran

We already got an Irritant, thank you very much.

not_traitorous

> "Think, boy. Where did you see signals being sent up? Where do we stand right now?"

Now I'm imagining the whole scene as an Invincible meme.

Steven Silver

Me: "Show me goblin fire if this is over. "

EE: no goblin fire

Me: "This isn't over o_o"

Miles

We've barely even seen a brightstick!

Speaking of demonic flames on the earth and goblin munitions, I wonder what Cat is up to.

nimelennar

I legitimately laughed out loud during the "Are you trying to get me to monologue?" conversation.

Amadeus' warning to Cat that she doesn't get to pick who rules is interesting, because Cat doesn't seem to care who rules, short of "Not Malicia," "Not Akua," and "Someone who will sign on to the Liesse Accords and lend us some diabolists so we can win the fight against Keter."

The first and third are pretty much guaranteed by Malicia's hubris and the necessity of the story respectively, so I wonder if the Akua gambit is going to backfire on Cat. What happens when the thing that Cat is trying to get Akua to reject as part of her redemption arc, the Imperial throne of Praes, no longer exists?

shikkarasu

I think it's the principle of her having a say in the first place. She's a Foreign Despot (if you will forgive my Belerophanian) coming to influence who gets the Tower. Like, imagine you are holding an election and this one lady with a sword loiters around the ballot box and occasionally says "change your vote." Is she picking a ruler? Gods, no. Is she rather disrespecting the entire premise of an election? I'm going to say yes, barring violent priestesses informing me otherwise.

kinghaart

Honestly I think Amadeus is just goading her. She can't interfere in Praes any more than he did with Callow already in the Conquest. If he's serious, it's hypocrisy at its finest, and he should realize that.

beleester

One thing that might put a wrench in Amadeus's plans – Akua Sahelian. She's built her claim to the tower by helping the common people of Ater, and I can't imagine that she's about to let her nobles revert to type and let the people get slaughtered. And she's a brilliant diabolist facing a problem caused by diabolism. She's got lots of possible ways to intervene.

I have a feeling that this is what puts Akua over the top – when the dust settles, she discovers that the story is "Akua was the only noble who put herself on the line to save people" and everyone is cheering for her to take the tower.

Xinci

Mm, and so the parity of shattered empires is attained and Cardinals eventual dominance at the center becomes even stronger should it be attained. The general pattern for the Accords to happen is that other groups need to either willingly cooperate or be shattered enough to be regulated to cooperate. Amadeus was aiding this path for a long time, and once its done the last resistant parts are probably Keter and the Elves.

It would be unsurprising that the Gods would like this new parity of scattered smaller realms all connected and mingling under a set of regulations. A invisible string of order allows for mixed micro-environs of conflicts between different facets of different groups to give tallies for either side of the wager without destabilizing the whole wager. It appears to fit their uses for things like Bard anyway, while allowing a far more diverse range of examples for either side.

It is still rather sad that the Praesi wont couldnt use the potential they had with all their resources to become better, but then again Akua hadnt been there that long and wasnt trying to make a reformist movement as of yet. No goal to be “ever worthy”, and Jinno-Wazza as it is, is a resource allocation framework for scarcity, without any long term view for resource fullness they naturally take the dissenting choice when presented with a risk such as this. I am sure there will be some kind of ironic echo historically when the orcs arrive with them in such a state too, especially to offer new terms of power between the Praesi and themselves(should Praes truly still call itself that at the end of this anyway).

I am curious whether Amadeus has attained a method of cruel mercy, for preventing Cat to being drawn into a lesser role. A weaver being woven so they can be the greatest amongst the chosen, sorta deal, I suppose.

Tohron

This reinforces my idea that “belief” is the answer to the riddle Hakram told Catherine about (which had been posed by an ancient Warlord, and the answer erased by the Meizans). Societies are shaped by what they believe, here, Named draw their power from their belief in their Role, and the belief of others that their Role is significant (Akua became the Diabolist, in part, by getting other people to think of her as a diabolist).

I’m thinking that Catherine’s coming Name is going to have a lot to do with guiding people’s beliefs. She may even get Believe as an aspect.

Silverking

...Could anyone please point me to the specific point in the story where the Tyrant said that all of Amadeus’s plans to “fix” Praes were for naught? I’m sure that it happened at some point, but I can’t recall the exact conversation.

Frivolous

Silverking: This could be it:

From Villainous Interlude: Stormfront:

“You’re scribbling on sand and calling it a legacy,” Kairos mocked. “Nothing that happens before or after you matters – only the decisions you make now. And those I see you make? I find lacking.”

flashburn283

So, does the sentient tiger army take over?

tmightyquinn

In East III, a couple chapters back, Malicia notes that “She’d remained ahead of them, so far, but she was a dancer with a shrinking stage to dance on. Gods, even district mages were getting murdered out in the ruined districts. With a goblin steel blade, so it was likely some Legion deserter stirring up trouble."

N o p e.

nimelennar

Isn't the Black Knight nominally the leader of the Legions? And he has certainly deserted Malicia. So, technically, sure, it's a Legion deserter.

tmightyquinn

Hah, you make a good point

Xinci

So another realization I have had is that Amadeus is committing Holy Betrayal to Below with his plan. Its a similar act of worhsip to Kaioro's but from a completly different angle of intent. Even should he succeeded they will likely be incredibly pleased.

Miles

I wonder if Akua's existence is about to ruin Addie's plan.

She's probably down there saving civilian lives and fighting off demons with a frying pan.

Frivolous

Miles: Yeah, Akua is running counter to his scheme.

But surely he must know what she is doing. He seems to have very accurate and precise knowledge of what is going on in Ater, and Akua hasn't been very secretive.

Yunamed

Erin style

jamesc9

Please may I contend the following items to your attention:
protectionofcivilians.org/employee/erin-bijl/ournals.sagepub.com/doi/10.1177/0967010612444150 from this search:

<https://lite.duckduckgo.com/lite/?q=erin+saving+civilians&kam=osm&kaf=1&kg=g>

Shveiran

You know, I didn't really agree yesterday, but some commenter really resonated with me.
This whole plan – so far at least – really feels unsatisfying.
I'm kind of mad at Amadeus now.

The whole thing about the Legions I already got issues with, but this... destroying a quarter of the most populous city in the continent with spiders and demons to prove... what, that the High Lords would use demons on their own rather than suffer a set-back?

Now I'm like... did that need PROVING? It was how Praes was presented to us. We were told this is what their stories are about, the reason why everyone in Praes knows they live at the suffering of their betters.

What's new? Did the Praesi need this to realize maybe that's a bad thing? And if they did, does this really change anything? It is nothing NEW.

And for all my distaste at Akua looking like she is set to go "no we are better than this" which already has my blood boiling, you are right: if I hold her accountable for fucking around with the apocalypse, then Maddie doesn't get a pass.

Fuck you and your charming chats with the Squire, Maddie. This is not the time to fuck about with demons, which are something YOU YOURSELF impressed upon us are not something to trifle with. What happens if this shit gets out of control, big man? What happens to the bloody continent? Or Praes down the line, for that matter, since the Dead King being someone else's problem is CONTINGENT ON THE SURVIVAL OF THE EMPRESS YOU ARE SABOTAGING.

You had to go and take a page from Kairos' book, of all people, didn't you?

And all that spiel about "this is our land, and you don't get a say?"

a), a bit rich coming from the fucking conqueror of Callow, and b), no? Just no.

Not when you, the supposed poster boy for restrained action, just fed the better part of Ater to demons! It's your mess to handle only so long as you keep it from spilling over on other people, you moron!

Damn it, I miss Cordelia.

You see what you did? You made me miss the bloody Proceran. Good grief.

ABadIDea

Did it need proving? No. But also yes. It's the story equivalent of Abraham begging God to spare Sodom and Gomorrah if he can find 10 righteous men. It's not just the past that matters, the high lords have to earn their current destruction

NOW. They have to be given the option to fail within the current story, otherwise there is no weight to it.

Also, it needs to be set up to act as a future foil for Akua.

ninegardens

>"Not when you, the supposed poster boy for restrained action, just fed the better part of Ater to demons! It's your mess to handle only so long as you keep it from spilling over on other people, you moron!"

Yeah... pretty much this.

It doesn't matter if he wasn't the one to release the demons. If he deliberately set up the dominos to ensure their release then... ummm... well, that's pretty culpable.

Mostly, I'm just confused because Maddie was the obvious choice to play the hero here. Not Akua, Not Hakram, not Cat.

Akua's redemption arc is... wiggly at best (I love it, but its wiggly), whereas Amadeas has always played pretty close to "brutal Villian sidetagonist", that was a natural fit to slide into "nurturing villian protagonist".

Showing Him understanding Praes better than Cat has been set up for so so so long, and having Cat make a major mistake here and Maddie cleaning it up for her would have been narratively exquisite.

... but EE has other plans.

I don't like this direction, I think it feels off... but at the same time, I won't fault an author for interpreting their own character in a way different to how I imagine them.

...I'm still mad though, for pretty much all the reasons you just listed.

kinghaart

I don't think Amadeus is or ever was meant to be a Hero.

And yes, I think you're meant to be angry here.

I think the final story Amadeus is trying to kill is that the one that claims Villains of any nature are good for Praes. If Warlock can nuke a major city (admittedly in war but still), Assassin can topple nations, Malicia can make Praes the enemy of the entire continent but the one place that people hate even more, Ranger can be buddies with the single most evil person on Calernia, and Amadeus's grand plan involves the death of a quarter of Ater... then WITH is the point of the Calamities?!?!?

The great thing about PGtE is that by this point one can almost forget who the Villains are. Amadeus is reminding us.

vuthuha912

I don't know but usually, when we talk about a circumstance that leads to a major change in society, it usually involves a tragedy or a very crucial moment. Did the Russian farmers and serfs know that they were oppressed? Yes, they did. Did the Chinese farmers know that during the end of every dynasty? Yes. They even have a saying like robberies at night are by robbers, and robberies during the day are by officials. Everyone knows but they keep their head down because they still BELIEVE in a bugger dream that things will get better, they can win the game, and they can wait for the disasters out. The tide has changed over the last five years. Disasters after disasters. Yet, Malicia was doing so well for the last 40 years so the trust in the Tower and the noble are quite high, tbh. When the ruler is an able one, the system kind of works. Malicia and Black have done a good job for 40 years with the system. Both of them did not change the system drastically. They went about it slowly and seamlessly. The political turmoil never spilled over to the civilian sides. Thus, it looks like the old system is working as intended. Even if the nobles are a bunch of cunts who sabotage the ones who are actually doing the work, all the people know is that the food costs have gone down, the life quality is better and whenever a noble overstepped, they were killed. Thus, people see the madmen who were at fault but not the system that keeps churning out these madmen. In a way, the spider has to happen to break the trust in the system, the noble, and the Tower. It is an event that signifies a change in public opinion. And it is a bonus point for symbolism, the biggest spider used to be a DE, they were kept under Ater by sorcery but never exterminate – the representation of all that is wrong with Praes. When the mistake finally bites people in the hide, the one who suffered is the one at the bottom. They suffered needlessly because Praesi nobles can't be bothered to do their jobs properly. They really need to SEE it.

Honestly, do you believe something like the Boston Massacre will change Ater's opinion of the whole thing? NO. They are Praesi. It is the norm for a few people to go missing or get killed once in a while. They get used to it. Thus, it would take this huge slaughter to actually shake people, forcing them to really look at the system they are following. Just like Black did when he was young. The Field of Stregé changed his entire opinion about the system. He enlisted in the legion – he probably still believed in Praes back then. Allie never saw it, Ater never saw it, and the rest of the country never really saw any of it. They don't get why he hated the system so much because they never saw any of it. He is a Duni and Allie is Sonnike. Allie was a civilian while he was a legionary. There is a fundamental difference in their perception of the system based on their own experience. The Ater residents are looking at things like Allie did back in the day, like Maddie did once upon a time. It took around 700 unarmed civilians being shot at by the Tsarist police to finally move the Russian people to denounce the regime. It took a famine and a humongous debt to kick start the French revolution and Napoleon fighting the entire continent for the system in Europe to meaningfully change. And WWI was the final nail in the coffin. How much does Ater need? How much time and people? A lot more than that. Luckily, this is a universe built on the story so Maddie just has to create a big enough event to start.

If we look at the situation surrounding the current event, we kind of see that Cat participation speed things up and shifts things around quite a bit. Maddie is fanning the fire but Cat is the gasoline. If it was only up to Amadeus, the situation would play out a lot longer with most of the high seats broken and a cleaner slate to work with. And the spider might not be the first option. He might arrange for something more controlled, less bloody to break the idea that the Tower works. But... Dead King... Cat... everything. The spider was right there. It is convenient.

And may I remind you that the Praesi legions are still fighting on who to crown as DE a few chapters ago. Nim is the problem. She won't act against Malicia like Black. When Malicia was being a dunderhead by recalling her two best generals from the border when the enemies were literally about to attack to make a political play. Black and Grem both ignored her because if they did follow the order, the Crusader would ravage Callow – the breadbasket of the East. Malicia was trying to put a leash around their neck at the worst moment possible. Malicia is not the king of Zhao but the situation Maddie and Grem facing was the same one Li Mu faced before he committed suicide. And didn't Maddie try to commit suicide with his plans for burning down Procer? He was not Li Mu but he made the same choice in the end. He survived because of GP and Cat but he fully expected to perish during this campaign. Allie has unintentionally caused Maddie to follow through with his suicidal thoughts. Yet, Nim still has the gall to call out half of the legions for rebelling. My lady, you are the one who needs to look back at who you are following. Smart birds choose the branch to perch, and a smart underling chooses a worthy master. It is best that the legionaries made the decision at that moment and not stuck in Ater when all the crazy shits go down.

M0och123

It is a cruel thing, what Amadeus is doing, yet as so often is the case in this story, a necessary one. Even Above recognizes that some things are beyond redemption and need to be excised with extreme prejudice and truthfully the atrocity being wrought on Ater is a fraction of the suffering that would lie ahead. So it is not the act that is the cruelty of Amadeus. Nay, it is forcing an entire culture to realize that for all their power and pride as a people, they are weak and cowardly. Amadeus has broken the Praes equivalent of the American Dream, or at least is on the way to doing so.

ninegardens

>>"It is a cruel thing, what Amadeus is doing, yet as so often is the case in this story, a necessary one."

No. Gotta disagree with you on this one. I know this story is pretty keen on the "hard men making hard choices" doctrine, but I don't think this checks out.

The fact that Praes is a cesspit of misery indicates that something needs to be done. That doesn't mean this had to be done. Whenever you get to a crossroads of "there is no other choice", and your choice is to burn half a city to the ground, you should assume your own incompetence and wait for someone with a smarter brain to come along.

That, and honestly: I do not think this plan will work. Which means all that bloodshed is for nothing.

He might destroy "the tower". He might break "the Empire". But who DAMN WELL CARES if all he sets up is some other carnival of misery and bloodshed. Which is where this plan is heading. Even if it succeeds, he leaves nothing behind but starving broken people and a burning crater. Ready for the next Tyrant/warlord/emperor/whatever the hell they call themselves.

Shveiran

Yes, precisely. If he had broken the mould less destructively, than maybe I could see the reforms, and the legions, and the centralization making a less diabolist, less elitist, more unified Praes; likely still not a good place to be, but, you know, an improvement and a removal of the previous rails that always led to misery.

But the beaurocracy is set in Ater, and the Legions he already broke, so... I don't see that happening.

Something would emerge, yes.

Something violent enough to force the others in line.

I don't see how that could ever be the seed of hope he seems to believe it would.

But EE is not done, so let's wait and see.

MoreBeer

I think this is the point. Maddie wanted to reform the Empire. Spent 40+ years trying to do it. The net result was Malicia, his partner in reforms, trying to take control of a superweapon in the expectation that the Empire would be unassailable so long as they never tried to use it and continued to simply murder the heroes who invaded "unjustly".

Maybe Maddie could or should have taken a different path, but he is self-proclaimed the worst sort of monster. He doesn't build, he destroys. He believes that toppling the current order will result only in a restart in a few years or decades, as shown by what happened to Alaya. He still wants to topple the Game of the Gods. His solution is to break the Dread Empire so thoroughly that there is nothing to rebuild, so something new comes in its place.

Is this the right solution? Unlikely. But it's very much in character and follows clearly from the history and situation of Amadeus.

kinghaart

Yeah I think this is pretty much Amadeus assuming that Praes is to Below what Liesse was to Malicia, and Destroying it.

vuthuha912

Nah

He destroy and build at the same time. It is just that he never seek full destruction of the story thus his creation can't last. You never let your enemies get away because they will regroup and underlined you at every turn.

He is doing the destroy right now but he conveniently left all the useful people for rebuild outside of Ater – in the countryside. The veteran and the local bureaucracy. And surely, they will come into play after the clusterfuck in Ater is over.

janngran janngran a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/uUGV8zI0X0s7V3F4Yys1r>

Interlude: Kiss Of The Knife

"Treason is a distant thing, a matter for the histories. Betrayal is where the bile is: you have to love someone before they can betray you."

– King Selwyn Fairfax of Callow, the Old

"Why Troke?"

Sigvin was frowning, leaning forward so the noonday sun would not fall into her eyes.

"For the same reason I've ordered my banner not be raised," Hakram replied.

All the way south, the place of honour – the Warlord's place – among the banners had remained empty. The order had seen warriors grumble at the lack of pride, enough that he'd spread among the horde that he would only raise his own banner after Ater was made to kneel. The boast had limited the damage to reputation, and what he'd paid was well worth what he was to get for it now. At his left, Oghuz suddenly let out a loud bark of laughter.

"Look at them, girl," the chief of the Red Shields said. "How thick is their battle line?"

Hakram's eyes returned to the field. When he'd sent out his vanguard of five thousand wolf rider towards the camps to the east of Ater, the nobles in them had understandably reacted to the threat. What troops were not already fighting in the city had been mustered and ordered out, but that effort had ceased as soon as the highborn had glimpsed the banners claiming that Troke Snaketooth was the warlord of the Clans. It was, after all, an open secret among the highest rung of the nobility that Troke was an ally of Malicia's. They were still wary, as the Clans should have gone to sack Nok instead of marched on Ater, but the tension went out of their battle line.

Troke rode forward with a few picked men, champions, and the nobles sent a party of their own. Led by a Niri, by the look of their banners.

Only the vanguard had slowed, not stopped, and the highborn realized it only moments before Troke Snaketooth's warband smashed into their envoys and the packs of wolf riders howled a charge. Some of the mages with the troops got spells up in time, turning back the attack, but not enough. Most of the enemy soldiers had never faced great wolves up close and it showed: the great mount shattered the shield wall in moments and trampled dozens, terror spreading at the violent howls. Maybe eight thousand Praesi had mustered on the field and less than a tenth of that died under the charge, but their morale broke instantly. The army shattered, entire companies fleeing the monsters and the massive horde they could see approaching in the distance.

"Good," Hakram gravelled. "Oghuz, take ten thousand shields and secure the camps. Capture all the highborn you can, I want bargaining chips."

"Warlord," the old orc replied, hand over heart.

Hakram nodded back, then turned his eye to Sigvin.

"Send word to your grandmother," he said. "I want the Split Tree to oversee the loot. We distribute only when the blades rest."

"It will be done," she replied.

Overseeing the loot was a position of great trust – the old hordes had given it a formal title, one held in great respect – but Hakram meant it as a check as well as a mark of favour. It never made a clan popular for its warriors to be the ones telling other orcs they couldn't drag away the riches they'd just won in battle. Waiting for Sigvin to finish, the Warlord watched the eastern gates in the distance. Three had been open this morning, he'd been told, but now two were closed. Not that Ater's defenders were the ones keeping the third one open: the banner hung on the gatehouses was a vulture holding a skull, Askum's colours.

High Lady Abreha Mirembé was said to have been raised as undead by Catherine at the Battle of Kala and she knew better than to cross her mistress.

Sigvin returned to his side and Hakram sent for Dag Clawtoe, the warrior he'd overtaken as leader of the Howling Wolves and who now led his personal guard. The three of them and two hundred shields set out towards the gate even as the Clans followed, columns of warriors sweeping the highborn camps and approaching the capital. His force was large enough, the Warlord knew, that Abreha would come to greet him personally. Praesi respected force even when it was in the hands of those they considered savages, and the once-Sepulchral was nothing if not pragmatic. Careful, too.

She came out to meet him near the gatehouse with two hundred soldiers of her own, but she had twice that waiting with bows up in the heights. Out of firing range, narrowly, but should Abreha retreat under their cover the ensuing fight would not go well for him. The old witch let out a little noise of amusement when they finally stood face to face.

"No longer Adjutant, I take it?" High Lady Abreha said.

"No longer," the Warlord agreed. "The city?"

"Out of control," she replied. "From the Licosian Gates to the western walls is nothing but giant spiders and things called to kill them. Maybe a fifth of the city is lost, either to flame or damages. The Legions are dug in along the Avenue of Claws and Akua Sahelian is rumoured to be mounting a counterattack, but it's not looking good. "

Hakram snorted.

"Catherine?" he asked.

"Still near the Licosian Gates last I heard, containing the situation with the Hierophant's help," High Lady Abreha replied. "The Army of Callow retreated in good order to the western gates – with civilians along, when they could."

"Quite the mess," Hakram said.

"It is," the old witch smiled. "So what is it that you've come to add, Deadhand? I must confess, it's starting to look like we might no longer be on the same side."

"Oh?"

"Had to fight Dakarai off to keep this gate open," High Lady Abreha said. "I'll need assurances before I let you through it."

Hakram laughed in her face, then let out a sharp whistle. The Aksum household troops tensed, some drawing swords, but his own warriors did not charge. Instead they turned about sharply, beginning to march away. Wary surprise found its way to Abreha's face.

"It need not be anything onerous," the High Lady said. "Just oaths and hostages."

"I won't bargain with you, Abreha," Hakram said. "What I wanted from you was news of the battle, and you have given them to me."

The old woman scoffed.

"So you dragged your horde all the way from the Steppes just to sit out the fall of Ater?" Abreha said. "Try a better lie."

"You misunderstand me," Hakram Deadhand said.

In the distance, there was a great grinding sound. One of two western gates that'd been closed was opening again. The High Lady of Askum's face went blank, hiding her thoughts.

"Why would I cut a deal with you," the Warlord asked, "when I have already done so with High Lady Wither?"

—

Indrani breathed out, nocked her arrow and jumped down.

Flashes of bright light below, scarabs the size of fists burrowing into the flesh of spiders and devils only to explode out in green flame. Distractions, all of it. At the heart of the horde, the house-sized green salamander devil was laying on the broken pedestal of some dead empress and watching it all with its jutting eyes – a spider came a little too close, mouth open in a screech, and the devil's jaw unhinged. Archer smiled. The arrow was in flight before she even knew it, her body moving by itself, and the salamander's lower jaw was nailed down to the stone. Its spiky tongue juttled out as it screamed, impaling the spider, and Indrani landed on her knees just behind the dying creature.

She snatched the spike at the end of the tongue before it could retract, to the devil's hateful screams, and rose to a run. Movement to the left, claws, but she went low and blood splashed on her cloak as a spider died in her stead. A jet of spidersilk brushed against the edge of her shoulder but she was already twisting, leaping – broken stone pillar to the side, base to leap even higher and fuck a devil. The coloured toucan the size of a man and made of ivory and fingers clawed at side, pale claws raking at her chain mail, and she was slammed on the side of a wall. She smacked the devil away with her bow, breaking the string, and fell back even quicker when the salamander devil tried to retract its tongue.

The bow went behind her back, just in time for the toucan devil to come back and get a knife in the belly. She wrapped her limbs around it, ignoring the horrid wiggling of the fingers, and used it as a base to throw herself atop the roof. She landed on her side, the salamander devil below screeching words in the Dark Tongue as its tongue kept extending. Almost there, Archer thought. She rolled to the side as a streak of fire tore through the roof tiles where she'd just been, breaking into a running leap at the next roof – in the distance she saw a flash of Light shine and wink out, the Lady shooting Alexis' arrow in flight – and landing just near the edge of the last roof. Just in time for spiders to begin climbing up that edge. She couldn't stop moving, she'd lose the momentum and then she was fucked.

So instead she sped up, and when the fat body full of mandibles went over the edge it was receive her boot in the face as she used it as a base to leap further up. Screeches behind her but she was flying, flying until she hit the wall with a gleeful laugh. The alcove in the tower was just large enough for her to stand in it after the bruising landing, and Indrani wasted no time hammering the tongue spike into it with her bare hand. Once, twice, and in it went. Deep. In the distance the salamander screamed in rage but the spike was stuck in now. Indrani reached for the vial in her bag, smashing it atop the point where the tongue went into the stone. The black good solidified in moments, making sure it'd be stuck there for good.

"Well," Archer said. "Time to get going."

She climbed up the tower even as began to shake, reaching the top and the wonderful view of the howling hell Ater had turned into just moments before there was a sinister crack down below. Indrani moved to the eastern edge, sheathing her knife and taking out a fresh string for her bow. Down below, the Lady still stood on that statue of Terribilis as she toyed with the Silver Huntress. Arrows were shot out in flight, Ranger shot her through cover – even when stone – and twice collapsed a building with a very precise missile as Alexis tried to cross them. The arrows wreathed in silver Light that headed back Ranger's way never made it close. Lexy was too slow to imbue the Light, against reflexes like the Lady's that was as good as not shooting at all.

Archer nocked an arrow, breathed out and loosed. The Lady caught the movement, swayed slightly to the left and the shot that should have gone through her spine instead caught a devil in the face down below. Ranger cocked an eyebrow at her, as if asking whether that was the best Indrani could do. She had yet to stop standing atop the head of the fucking statue she'd been on all this time. Instead of answering, Archer nocked another arrow and grinned. If she wasn't wrong, it ought to be around – a few small cracks, then a massive one as the salamander-devil finally pulled the seven-story high tower down. Which was something of a problem for Indrani, who was standing on top of said tower, but more of a problem for the Lady.

Who the tower was falling on.

Whooping in delight, Indrani loosed on the arrow the Lady had just tried to put in her throat and hit the side, deflecting it. Even as she slid down the top of the tower, she nocked and released once more – looking irritated the Lady cut it down, but Alexis had taken the opening. Silver shone bright, clipping the edge of the Lady's shoulder and singeing her cloak. For a moment Ranger looked up, but Indrani realized with a start it wasn't her being looked at. It was the falling tower. One of the windows, more specifically.

"No fucking way," Archer cursed. "You can't possibly be that quick."

Just before the tower's roof became a wall, she leapt away and to the side. Even as the building fell onto a mass of spiders and devils she landed through a broken tile roof and into what looked like pack of shelves which were – ow ow, fucking ow – full of bottles. Indrani took a moment to be in pain as the broken shelves and bottles fell on her head, bruised and bloody, and there was a thunderous sound and cloud of dust as the tower finished falling. Taking an experimental sniff the liquid drenching her, Indrani found it appeared to be wine. Ah, but the Gods did provide. She bit off the cork and took a swallow of what tasted like some red from somewhere, polishing off a third of the bottle because those fucking cuts on her face hurt like a bitch. Well, time to see if the Lady had actually pulled it off.

Indrani left the house only to find the Ranger smugly standing atop the fallen tower, next to what had been a window on the western side.

"Oh come on," Archer complained. "Are you telling me you managed to climb and cross the damn thing before it finished falling?"

"The windows on the second level faced each other," the Lady said, amused. "You girls picked the wrong tower to drop."

She paused to slap away a silver arrow.

"Fine," Indrani sighed. "Next one will be bigger, and without fucking windows. You going to say why you were standing on that statue, at least?"

"So I could literally look down on your efforts," the Lady of the Lake informed her.

"Ouch," Indrani said. "In all fairness, you're pretty hard to kill."

"Is that what you're trying?" she smiled. "I thought we were catching up."

"Sure, but we figured it'd be better to catch you then get caught," Indrani noted. "What errand is it you're running for the Carrion Lord, anyway?"

Ranger cocked her head to the side.

"You're stalling," she stated. "Why?"

"Wine hasn't kicked in yet," Indrani replied, raising her bottle.

She threw it a moment later, but it didn't work – the Lady ignored it, instead swatting the arrow without Light that the Silver Huntress had just tried to put in the side of her neck.

"Alexis," Ranger greeted her. "You seem in a mood. Rough day?"

Lexy came out of the house she'd shot through the window of, jaw clenched.

"What is it going to take," the Silver Huntress bit out, "for you to take this seriously?"

The Ranger considered her.

"For you to get out of the woods I first found you running in," the Lady said.

Oh boy, Indrani thought. That wasn't going to end well. At least their plan had worked, though. Archer wasn't hearing any devils and spiders fighting nearby, so Cocky should be about ready. Alexis took her spear in hand, Light flaring bright.

"I'm going to take that answer out of your fucking hide," the Silver Huntress said.

"You're beginning to bore me," the Ranger noted. "Cocky, won't you stop skulking around long enough say something? Crawling on your belly is no way to live, girl."

Cocky did, in fact, come out of hiding. Atop the rooftop, covered in ash and dust but grinning.

"Me," the Concocter said.

"Pardon?" the Lady said.

"You asked what she was stalling for," Cocky said. "It was for me."

She raised her hand, snapping the fingers, and suddenly their surroundings were filled with screams. Every devil and spider that'd been exposed to the charm potions came when called by their new mistress, prepared to kill at her word.

"So that's your plan?" the Lady asked. "Swarming me."

"It's a start," the Concocter said.

Ranger snorted, then glanced at Indrani – who'd been nocking an arrow, admittedly.

"I did come here for something," the Lady said. "You were right."

"And what's that?" Archer asked.

Below them the ground began to shake. Not, not shake. Something was... hitting it.

"Let her catch my scent," the Ranger replied.

The paved street in front of them was ripped open, a massive leg tearing through it. Merciless Gods, Indrani thought. No, that couldn't be. Wasn't it supposed to be just a story? Another street blew up and slowly, inexorably, a gargantuan shape rose through the foundation of Ater. A spider so large and foul it defied description, shrouded in darkness and venom that dripped like rain. Her scream, when her hundred thousand eyes found the sun, was deafening. She was sniffing at the air, looking for a scent.

"Dread Emperor Tenebrous," Indrani whispered.

The Lady of Lake smiled at them.

"Now it's a proper fight," Hye Su happily said.

Slowly, she unsheathed her second blade.

"What are you waiting for? Take your shot, kids."

—

"It won't work," High Lady Takisha said, tone frustrated. "My mages say—"

"Yes," Akua impatiently said, "that the sky is too dry because of the previous rains. Which I have a solution to."

"That offensive is suicide," Takisha hissed. "You cannot—"

"My soldiers are at your disposal, Lady Sahelian," High Lord Jaheem mildly said.

Akua passed a tired hand through her hair. It was telling that no one even seemed to notice it: they were all so exhausted and on edge that the usual games had gone by the wayside.

"I need more than soldiers," Akua admitted. "I need at least three mage cabals."

The High Lord of Okoro hesitated.

"I only have two," he admitted. "One of which is of my retinue."

Which he would not part with, considering that there had been two attempts to abduct him today.

"One would be a start," Akua said, glancing at High Lady Takisha.

Who looked away. Akua could not even blame her too much for it. The Kahtan household troops had been so brutalized by the day's fighting that there was barely a third of left of them. All of the Taghreb soldiery had been badly mauled, in truth, but the Kahtan men had led the vanguard and suffered accordingly — first against the Army of Callow, then those damnable spiders.

"I will go," High Lord Dakarai said. "I still have nearly sixty mages, a third of which can touch High Arcana. It ought to be enough, I think."

A moment of surprised silence. He was taking a considerable risk, investing so much of the last strength of his house in such a dangerous undertaking. Nok had been mauled as badly as Kahtan today, losing troops to both Aksum and the spiders. Abreha's treachery had been eminently predictable, but Dakarai's apparent change of sides was rather puzzling considering it had cost him much and might still cost him more.

"It is not certain any of us will return," Akua felt bound to remind him.

"It is not certain any of us will live through the day, if those monsters are not dealt with," High Lord Dakarai flatly replied. "We have already wrecked entire districts failing to contain them, and that was before..."

"Emperor-claimant Tenebrous?" High Lady Takisha suggested.

All of their gazes moved to the hulking shape of the spider near the Licosian Gates, which had already wrecked three fortified positions in its rampage. The lesser spiders had taken advantage to overwhelm the district, killing hundreds of soldiers in the service of Takisha's vassals.

"It ought to be empress-claimant, surely," High Lord Jaheem muttered.

"Regardless of the titles, Ater is on the brink," High Lord Dakarai said. "You have my cabals, Lady Sahelian."

They set out as a mixed force, High Lord Jaheem insisting he send his one spare cabal along with soldiers regardless of necessity. It was hard fighting block by block once they passed the fortified positions, swarms spiders attacking from streets and rooftops as the soldiers advanced with tightly locked shields and the mages returned fire. Akua led from the front, trusting Kendi's sorcery to shield her as she went purely on the offensive with the most destructive curses she'd learned as a girl. Two thousand soldiers had set out, four hundred were dead by the time the expedition made it to the massive structure of bronze that she'd been leading it to. A reservoir, one of the largest in Ater.

It fed some of the aqueducts, hence the bronze – it was the easiest metal to enchant – but many of those were now broken and spilling anyway. At the moment it was nothing but an enormous amount of water doing no good to anyone. As the household troops dug in and established a defensive perimeter under constant harassment, Akua organized the cabals into two ritual sequences. The first was easy, requiring a dozen mages only because of the power requirement. Magic was sunk into the water reservoir, then over three heartbeats turned to searing heat: a massive column of vapour blew upwards, high into the sky, as Akua followed with a measuring spell. It was barely enough water, but it would do. The hail of the last two weeks had filled it to burst, it was the only reason it worked.

The second ritual took every mage left, in hexagonal nodes as power was gathered and sent up into the sky. The clouds began to form after half an hour – almost half the soldiers were dead by then, the spiders attracted by the great bursts of power – but after that it was not long. Dark clouds began crackling with power as Akua sunk deeper into High Arcana than she ever had, finding the runes came to her as if she'd been born with the knowledge. As if she were meant to succeed.

Lightning struck the tide of spiders before the main Legion position. Once, then twice. Then four times at once. Then nine. And then a howling column of lightning descended from the sky, like the glare of some ancient god, incinerating arachnids wherever it went. And Akua moved it, power dancing under a darkened sky as the column of lightning moved along the battle lines like a pencil being dragged. Before long the power began to wane, the array began to fight her and the clouds thinned, but Akua pressed on. A little more. If she kept at it little longer, she could end this. Force the spiders to retreat, to spare Ater.

And as her pores began to sweat blood, she smashed the last of the lightning onto the massive shape of the progenitor spider. It screamed and smoked, but rose from the ground soon enough. Akua dropped to the ground, spent.

"It wasn't enough," she panted, falling to her knees.

The last wisps of power slipped through her fingers. Someone approached to help her up, but she waved them away.

"See to those that fell unconscious," she croaked out. "And prepare for the retreat. We're done here."

None gainsaid her. They looked at her with fear in the eyes, she thought, but something like hunger too. It had been a long time since Ater had seen sorcery the likes of which had just been unleashed. Within moments Akua was alone in the warm cradle of bronze, even Kendi having gone. Only the sound of her breath kept her company as her heartbeat slowed. Gods, but she wanted to sleep. To close her eyes and wake up in Hainaut, still damned but without having to look it in the eye.

"Goddamn, but she did a number on you."

Akua's eyes fluttered open. Before her, leaning against the wall, a woman stood with a silver flask in hand. Hanging off her back was a run-down lute.

"I've been around for a while, darling, and I'm still impressed by how thoroughly Cat got into your head," the Wandering Bard said. "It's fucking magnificent work, pun intended. Terrible too, but that does tend to be the way with our girl yeah?"

"Go away," Akua croaked out.

"Nah," the Bard casually dismissed. "We're going to have a talk, you and I. Her plan has been working pretty much perfectly, which is why it's time for me to tell you a few truths and send that off into the void."

"I will not-"

"We're going to have a talk," the Wandering Bard grinned, "about exactly what it is that Catherine Foundling has planned for you."

—

"I couldn't get my hands on High Lord Jaheem," High Lady Wither said. "He goes nowhere without a full mage cabal since his daughter was assassinated and my ambush was fought off."

"We captured two of his children and much of his extended family outside the city," Hakram replied. "It will have to serve."

Getting the High Lord of Okoro to cede some of his territory was not going to be easy, but so long as the Tower was kept out of it the Clans had the stronger bargaining position. Hostages would only improve that, though exacting it as ransom from the man himself would have been easiest. Still, disappointing as the failure was it was not surprising: if High Lords were easy to capture, they would not be High Lords. Hakram looked away from Pickler's mother and down to the city, where the unfolding battle could well be seen from the gatehouse where they stood. The staggering feat of magic that could only have been the work of Akua Sahelian had turned the tide.

The lightning storm had torn through thousands of the spiders and sent many skittering back to their hiding places below. There were still pockets of fighting between soldiers and beasts but much fewer, and already it could be seen that the Legions were going on the offensive to clear out the still-infested districts. Down south was less promising, where the High Lady of Kahtan held command and most highborn armies had gathered. The hulking silhouette of what had to be the progenitor of the infestation beneath Ater was rampaging around the Licosian Gates, swatting away at storm elementals and devils. Giant spiders were gathering to her, as if they were being called.

"It will be time to move soon," the Warlord said.

"The longer we let Takisha bleed the better," High Lady Wither smiled.

"Short-sighted," Hakram said. "We'll need those armies as fodder when we fight Keter and their nobles to handle the Hellgates. If it's truly the Carrion Lord behind this insurgency of spiders, he disappoints me: thousands died today that could have been put to better use."

"It's him," Wither quietly said. "And he's not done, mark my words."

Hakram did not ask how she knew. It would have been impolite and she would not have told him regardless.

"It does not change the need to act," he said. "I want the west of the capital firmly under our control by the time the dust settles."

"Abreha will take the safe passage to outside the city when you offer it," High Lady Wither mused. "She's not going to fight us for the gate, not when it already cost her keeping Dakarai away from it. She'll move her camp to the Army of Callow's side and stop pretending she ever switched sides. It's Sargon that's going to be a problem."

"On that we agree," the Warlord growled.

Sargon Sahelian had contributed to the defence of the capital, but most of his troops had stayed near the central districts that surrounded the Tower. Giving him the boot would not be trouble given the size of Hakram's army, but the Sahelian was sharing those positions with the Sentinels – and Hakram was hesitant to tangle with those at the moment. Whoever first cornered Malicia would be mauled by the Tower's arsenal, that was a role best passed to another. It was why he'd ordered his chiefs to seize the west of the city but go no further. The wealthy camps outside the city would sate the hunger for plunder for now, enough his warriors would not sack the capital against his orders.

"We'll test their will to stand their ground with a few skirmishes," High Lady Wither decided.

"I'm not above burning them out if I have to," Hakram bluntly said. "We need to hold the avenues and barricade them if we're going to keep the nobles wedged between us and the Army of Callow."

Which was the only way he'd get them to bend without outright sacking Ater, he figured. If they had room to maneuver they'd try to run rings around him, decide they could wait out his horde. But so long as they were stuck in the capital between his host and another enemy, stripped of their supplies and at the Tower's feet, they could be made to bend. It was either that or a massacre, which would weaken his army and taint the concessions he was here to force. Wither was in the same boat as him, which was why she'd been willing to ally: her title had been granted by Malicia, which meant it was worth less than dust the moment Malicia lost her throne. To ensure she was not thrown to the wolves by whoever succeeded the Empress, it been well worth opening a gate into the city.

One hundred thousand orcs were a heavy argument in any negotiation.

Their conversation was interrupted by a messenger, which turned out to be for the both of them. Letters with the Tower's seal. Already checked for poison and curses. Hakram opened his own, scanning the lines, and let out a bark of laughter. Well, let it not be said that Malicia lacked audacity.

"I assume you got the same as me?" he asked.

"An invitation to a formal session of the imperial court tomorrow," Wither said, eyes narrowed. "Malicia is playing a game again. She still thinks she can live through this."

Hakram snorted. Catherine wanted the woman's head on a pike, and given the situation she was quite likely to get it. There were few people left in Praes who wanted to keep the empress alive – it was more an issue of no one wanting to be the one to kill her. Cornered foxes bit deepest. The two of them left the wall to begin their preparations for the push into the city, but once more he was interrupted. This time by Dag, who quietly told him there was a messenger from the Army of Callow. The Warlord's hand tightened. It had only been a matter of time, he knew.

Somehow he'd still been hoping to avoid it for a little longer.

The man had been led to a house on the other side of the street and kept under guard. Hakram wasted no time getting there, finding the officer was looking outside the window when he entered. The tall orc frowned. Something was wrong here. These were lieutenant's stripes, Catherine would have sent someone higher up for an important message. The human turned, unclasping the straps of his helmet and setting it down on the table, revealing greying hair and green eyes.

"Good afternoon, Warlord," the Carrion Lord said.

Hakram's dead hand clenched.

"You are not here on Catherine's behalf," the Warlord said.

The older man conceded the point with a slight nod.

"So what is it you want, Amadeus of the Green Stretch?" the Warlord asked.

"I come," the devil said, "to offer you a bargain."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Miles

Boost for Idrani!

"to leap even higher and fuck a devil"

Aston Whiteman

PGTE Chapter late today...?

Delayed?

SpeckofStardust

Well, I think we can slot in Akua as being the next ruler. Which I think only Amadeus has planned for. Cause even bard is clearly on the back foot.

Arcwraith

#TenebrousForEmpress

john

Bard explains Cat's plan to Akua, who takes it as inspiration to generalize the concept of "awareness of your own misdeeds as ultimate revenge-curse" by restoring Tenebrous's sanity using an uplift template adapted from the sapient tiger army. Thus, Akua allies with the giant spiders – to her immense tactical advantage – and also fobs off the Dread Empress position on someone who not only actually wants the job, but has a record of "keeping her territory secure without causing too many problems for the neighbors" which is... quite possibly unmatched on the continent? Maybe Keter or the Golden Bloom or the Gigantes could match it, purely in terms of consecutive years, but they've got other flaws, and in any case are geographically isolated, rather than having camped out directly under a major city which was unfriendly for most of that time.

Estelulu

I can see it now. With the aid of her million children, the recently sane and recently titled Dread Empress Tenebrous goes back to doing what she loved most the most in life – building highways to places.

SuitorShooter

Bring back the position of Chancellor, replace the metaphorical spider at the heart of Ater with an actual spider, and justify all the atrocities with 'Spiders made me do it'. It's the perfect solution.

ninegardens

What makes you think Maddie planned for it?
Cause he is very explicitly trying to kill all the stories she stands for, and right now, she is the only thing blocking him. (also, good call on Cat for her "Black wants destruction, Akua wants reformation")

SpeckofStardust

I mean Maddie tested the high born to see if they can walk the talk of being good rulers, and currently Akua is the effective leading the faction of legitimately being noble among the high born, and he has been in the city and knows whats going on in the city. So if someone is going to rule after to wipes the slate clean she'd be his best bet.

Shveiran

Sure.

Her track records include:

- attempting to become Dread Empress through diabolism, sabotage of Imperial interest while at war, slavery and slave sacrifices, the zombification of a major city through means that would also have invited retaliation from the world, and using a millennia worth of souls as fuel;
- a few years of restraint while she was an undead spirit that could literally not go anything against her mistress' orders;
- a few months of actual restraint following the removal of her Night bonds;
- the betrayal of all her allies to the side that is allied with the undead abomination trying to eat the continent (and succeeding, as Akua well knows) and the active employment of her abilities to contribute to that side victory, including trying to save the more powerful Named in the Empress' employ from a pattern of three;
- going "oh these poor people" for about a week, using her skills to protect people that might not even be in danger if it wasn't for her (Cause, you know, after Kala, if Nim had died and there was no Warlock? Ater would be many things but it wouldn't be a SIEGE) while still happily opposing the side keeping the Dead King from eating the Continent. Which, by the way, is so very much a Praesi problem that it baffles the mind how anyone can argue otherwise. The treaty is contingent on Malicia's survival, which isn't gonna last, and even if, Praes cannot afford for no other kingdom to remain on the continent. The dead don't farm, and Praes' food production is hilariously inadequate to their own needs.

She just oozes nobility, doesn't she?

Mike E.

Akua's leaving the Woe was many weeks if not months ago in narrative time. The weather fiasco Malicia let happen was 2 weeks long on its own, plus I think there was a few weeks of army travel on all sides to get to Ater before the weather event even occurred.

I was enough time for her to realize she is entirely sick of the High Noble games.

Shveiran

And not enough to consider the death of life on the continent more than a triffling detail, apparently.

Joshua

I mean, the author is pretty clearly (to me and OP it sounds like anyway) painting Akua to be following some form of redemption narrative, albeit one that has no hope of being achieved.

I dont think it's absurd for someone to come to the conclusion that Akua being willing to drain herself magically enough to collapse in front of a group of vultures that would love nothing more than to eat her alive in a moment of weakness, just to try to save Ater is exactly what Amadeus is saying he gave the nobles a chance for.

Granted, he's testing Nobles-plural, not just one person and I doubt he would consider it a success if only Akua was willing to sacrifice herself for the Empire while everyone else goes down with the ship, but irrespective listing Akua's long list of sins as if everyone commenting on this chapter hasn't been reading just as much of the story as you have and don't remember very clearly why Akua is where she is seems a bit condescending and rude, especially since you seem to be ignoring the very real framing of the story towards her since she left Cat.

Shveiran

Is it condescending and rude to disagree with your view on the narrative and to explain why I have that view?

I certainly meant no offense to anyone, but this is a spot to discuss the chapter, is it not? I'm not sure how you'd have preferred me to act, bere.

Josh

Oh, that's my fault so let me clear, I misspoke. Rude is a bit of a exaggeration so it didn't come off as rude and sorry if the mistake made you feel a little weird about it. I just read a bit of hostility in your response to OP, and I wanted to jump in with my opinion to back them up because ai think there's a perfectly valid interpretation in their post that shouldn't be dismissed as easily as I read a dismissal in your response.

My careless word choice, so again, don't mind me and you weren't being rude.

Miles

Addoe seems completely blind to her actions. He sees what he wants to see and that's it.

jamesc9

Sorry, could you please unpack 'Addoe', 'her', 'he', and 'he', please?

I think that you mean something quite specific, but I haven't got to the start line for deciding whether I agree.

ninegardens

So, to paraphrase what you are saying here (from the point of view of the average Praes citizen)

-Continuing the rich cultural heritage of Iron sharpens Iron, by attempting to claim the tower. Attempting to overturn a Dread Empress who has since been proven to be incompetent and lacking.

-Being captured, but being too talented/useful to destroy, and managing to work your way into the good graces of your captor.

- Seducing the Black Queen, the most powerful villain of the age. (didn't happen, people still believe it)
- Betrayal of foreign oligarchs in order to rejoin the nation of your birth. Protecting a loyal general of the empire from those mean heroes, and earning the loyalty and trust of the loyal legions of terror.
- Attending to the citizens of Keter, taking care of them, and fulfilling exactly the role that they all wish dread empress Malicia was filling.

You might not like Akua's "redemption arc", but from the point of view of Praes, she is legitimately a hero, and an incredibly charismatic figure.
She is all those stories that they believe in.

Shveiran

Sure, but I have no beef with that. If you argue that makes sense from the Praesi pov, we are of one mind.

My issue is with this being presented as redemption to the audience.

Black Spiral Dancer

Well, if you're exclusively arguing about the POV or the readers of the story, a POV which shouldn't matter at all to the story per se (as in, that is a meta-story), I do have two arguments against yours:

(1) We as readers know every detail of Akua's mind that is shared to us, and exactly because of how and what was shared from her, we know she FEELS quite badly about it all, a redeeming-like trait, at least in the context of all the other nobles and of the dread empress herself. Of all the long list of her ill deeds, you could hardly find any noble in Ater who isn't worse, and if you compare her to the current (and arguably all the formers) Dread ruler, than she still win by leagues.

(2) Each reader has a different opinion, you rude skunk. Do NOT write as if you either know or can speak for all the audience. You don't. Each of us has their own fucking opinion and I can easily argue that Akua, having grown as she has, influenced by all the things she has, and still managing to understand and internalize empathy with such depth as she has now is a fucking miracle that even Bard is surprised about. So fuck off.

Shveiran

I think I made it quite clear I was speaking for myself, and no one else.

I reserve the right to have an opinion, and to share it without disrespecting other users.

If you disagree with me, I'm glad to discuss; but I'd appreciate it if you could leave personal insults out of it.

Stormblessed

What an interesting chapter. There's just so much going on it's difficult to address all let alone any of it easily. Just too many interesting elements from Akua to Hakram to Amadeus it's just jam packed with stuffff.

Sir Nil

How many damn Dread Emperors and Empresses are still hanging around? You can't go two steps without stabbing nobility. What is this Procer?

dadycool

Wow. No need to be so savage, there. I can think of three for certain: Tenebrous, Irritant, and Traitorous. It's like that "I'd have two nickels" meme: it's not a lot, but the fact that we can immediately name them off is weird.

Wabbitking

Don't forget Triumphant. If there isn't a corpse don't assume the villains dead.

dadycool

I was back and forth on including her. In the end, the fact that three is better than four is what made me not include her.

sengachi

Make it a three and one narrative. Three to set the stage and one to burn it down.

Sugar Roll

I'm half convinced Triumphant is a revenant on the Dead King's side.

Shveiran

Nah, Neshamah would not have done that.
If only because of the risks involved.

kinghaart

Would be funny if he HAD, but then she had actually offered him and decided to pretend to be him instead of becoming Dead Queen.

I also like how Tenebrous is a female Empreror just like how Cordelia is a Prince.

Gnochi

May she never return.

Nairne .01

She should totally return – just so we can have a nice chapter 😊

Black Spiral Dancer

I'm in!

Shveiran

And with Cat, not even then!

SuitorShooter

How awesome would it be if this entire time Jeter was fighting a second war against Triumphant within the Hells.

SuitorShooter

Keter*

God is there no way to edit these comments?

jamesc9

So the reward for defeating the Dead King is an even worse problem?

SuitorShooter

That seems to be how these stories go, honestly. One escalating disaster after another.

lolo96

Sorcerous bound his soul to the moon

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Me too.

jamesc9

So it's hard to stab, but still generally around.

aurikdomi

what is Irritant doing?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

His best.

beleester

He abdicated several times when he was in danger of losing the throne. I bet he's enjoying a peaceful retirement.

Sir Nil

Quick! Check all the shoe shops!

BargleNawdleZouss

We're still waiting for Triumphant and Traitorous to make their appearances.

shikkarasu

One more, always one more.

Linnus42

Hakram as a Wildcard. Malicia with a plot.
Bard and Carrion Lord about to flip the table.
The fighting hasn't really being excited but the politics and character dynamics quite enjoyable.

Alex

Possible spoiler alert

Five demon contracts and a bottle of aragh say that he's gonna burn the tower with all that goblin fire. Extra 2 bottles, that Cath is still gonna be the one blamed for that)

ninegardens

Honestly, I feel like Cat taking the blame weakens his plan.

If the Praes think "this horrible foreign invader burned our tower" they are more likely to rebuild (and conquer Callow). If they think "WE burned our tower" then...that's something different.

If they think "Amadeus the terrorist from the green stretch burned the tower" they'll probably just get more racist.

jamesc9

I'm really not sure what 'terrorist' means in a Praesi context.

Venom

Wonderful glorious violence

I need more!!!!

Linnus42

Akua on the cusp of a new name is interesting. I suppose that is why Bard can talk to her now. But its not clear what the rules are far as Bard goes as she greatly benefits from it not being explicit. I kinda think it will add to the mystery if the Bard & Akua and Hakram & Carrion Chats happen offscreen. How many potential rulers of Praes do we have running around now?

I got to say I am not really getting much from the Ranger vs her former student plotline right now. That is probably cause overall the combat be it more traditional Named fights or military stuff just isn't working for me. The character dynamics, wheels within wheels plots and politics are just more dynamic.

This to me feels like an inverse of Arsenal where the action was great and the setup/politics was lacking and dragged.

caoimhinh

For me, the plotline of Ranger vs her pupils is interesting, but it's gonna be something more emotional for them than a grand thing. It's personal, not a nation-changing event.

I doubt Ranger will die, but I think they will at least make her recognize them.

Deep down, what they really want from Ranger is for her to unsheathe her two blades as she looks at them and tells them "I am the Ranger. I hunt those worth hunting. Rejoice, for you qualify."

Which is pretty much the highest praise they can get from her as they aim to grow out of her shadow.

Shveiran

I really liked the Arsenal arc, to be honest. I think even EE went on the record saying he plans to rewrite it (unless I'm missremembering), but I must say I'm not sure why? It really worked for me.

shikkarasu

The only thing that felt weak was the game of Affray, and even then only because Raising Towers was so beautifully crafted and has come up so many times. I had a hard time following Affray, not in the meaning behind the cards, but in terms of why any of the moves mattered in a non-meta sense. It felt like laying random cards down and insisting that there's a game going on.

That said, the actual conversation and overall scene with Bard? Fucking poetry the whole way through. Do not let my one small yet detailed nitpick overshadow how much I loved that whole arc.

Shveiran

I mean, yeah, but I almost thought that was the point. They were just using the cards as props to talk about the schemes they had going at the moment. The game was a metaphor, it didn't really matter at all.

I guess if it had been established before, it would have been neater, yes. But it is a rather minor thing, in my opinion.

Cpt. Obvious

The cards were representing the resources (people to Cat, tools for the Bard) and the "game" was about weaving the strongest stories around them. Cat was battling the Bard in weaving stories, pretty much the same as a high school boxer going up against Mike Tyson at his best, and end the fight still standing. She came out of it battered and bruised. A lot of people were killed. Hakram were crippled. Discord were sown amongst the Heroes. Trust was lost between the Prince of Procer and the leader of the Heroes. Cat also lost the trust of Hano and the seed of doubt that the loss of the choir of Justice had sown in hi got more nourishment.

But the thing that bothers the Bard is that she managed to keep both Sever and the research on the Autumn Crown safe, so it was a draw.

Kind of feels like a pattern of three developing. And the third round should belong to Cat.

Now being the one put in place to safeguard the stories and patterns probably also means that the Bard is eminently vulnerable to them. So if Cat really stands at one loss and one draw then the Bard can't risk another confrontation. And yet she have done just that by confronting Cat and telling her she's done playing games and intends to kill her. Question is if it counts if they battle by proxies, or if it requires the direct personal involvement of the bard. I mean is her being in the room gloating as her chosen executor prepares to deliver the final blow enough to make it count for a pattern of three?

ninegardens

The overall arc kind of... felt like a distraction from the main front? But at the same time, if we had had an entire year of "soldiering at the main front" that would have been a real slog, since DK ISN'T an enemy you get to trick/diplomacy/weasel etc. sooo... I can appreciate the need for balance.

The "talking to Bard" scene was fine for me (I liked the Affrays), but having Cat's "name"/"title" change up EVERY SINGLE LINE was kind of... painful to read.

overall, a fun arc though, and got to highlight a bunch of fun characters (kingfisher FTW... and actually, I came to like the MK by the end of it... he tries so hard but is so bad, and he really was in a bad situation)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The Arcsenal, if you will.

Miles

I'm not getting much from Bard's attempt here either. Akua knows what Cat did. She watched it happen and is much smarter than Cat, especially when it comes to comprehending people and their motivations. There is no perspective the Bard can present that Akua hasn't already considered.

kinghaart

Narrative. Cat herself said that Akua had to be left free to leave in truth for it to matter. But by revealing here that Akua's release was just a way to get a gatekeeper for the DK, it removes the narrative weight behind the redemption arc and means that the plan narratively cannot happen anymore. It's the "explained plans fail" trope as an in-universe law.

Jury is still out though on whether Bard can predict what Akua will do with this knowledge. There's no way that Cat would want this revealed to Akua early but it might still go OK?

ruduen

I don't know if I should find it comforting or worrying that there's an answer to the question I had a couple of chapters ago, but it's still good to have. Yes, apparently giant spiderification isn't a problem when it comes to laying a claim on the Tower.

It says a lot about Praes in that the moment the appearance is made, the nobles all agree that the claim has to be seriously considered. It says more in that it's not at all a surprise. So, well done establishing Praes in the setting.

dadycool

The ground rumbles and cracks. Bells toll. The skittering of a hundred thousand massive spiders sounds as they rush out of the crevices, preceding a monstrous creature, even by Prasi standards. And throughout the land, one thing echoes in the ears of every living thing: A Challenger Approaches!

Ciara

So the reason that Tenebrous is only making an appearance now is that Ranger delivered his Smash invitation?

letouriste

I'm guessing Ranger spent a lot of time underground, annoying the big spider. She and amadeus had a lot of time before this battle and we knew they were in the city.

jamesc9

Not killing it must have required remarkable levels of restraint.

shikkarasu

I want to know what Ranger did a few hundred years back to warrant this level of hatred from Tenebrous. She routinely cuts out an eye from the Prince of Nightfall, so we know it's probably a big deal and almost certainly not "that one time" so much as "every time he X Ranger just had to Y."

flashburn283

I mean, technically Praes was ruled by a herd of Man-Eating capybaras for a good few days, and the sentient Tigers, and Traitorous. Honestly giant spider monster with sanity issues is fairly middle of the pack.

Steel and Elaborate Insult excellent chapter. you gotta wonder what amadeus thinks he can offer hakram or even what he thinks hakram wants, given that what hakram wants hasn't been explicit since about book 1. hakram's sheer disappointment in amadeus can't particularly help. tbh hakram's grasp of politicking being used for the Horde rather than for Catherine is a delight to read.

(can't wait to see how the Bard stans try to explain how she saw everything coming)

Xinci

I suppose one could say Amadeus is the metaphorical hidden knife here, even as bard pulls her own on Akua.

Also...Ranger pulled a Legolas.

dadycoool

I think Ranger might very well be what would happen if Legolas got bored for a few thousand years.

kinghaart

Does that make Amadeus Gimli?

Juff

Typo Thread:

wolf rider towards > wolf riders towards great mount > great mounts
Askum > Aksum (occurs twice)
Flashes of bright light (missing verb) was laying > was lying
She snatched (extra space) it was receive > it received black good > black goo
as began > as it began Light, against > Light; against sniff the > sniff of the it been > it had been

Frivolous

Sigvin is not very bright, I think. It was obvious Hakram sent Troke ahead as a decoy, to fool everyone into thinking Troke was still in charge.

I'm still wondering if the Intercessor is aware of Amadeus' actions, his schemes. She hasn't approached him. She may still be blind to him.

Intercessor hasn't approached Hakram, either. I suspect she's scared of him. Hakram was mentally indomitable even when he was Adjutant.

Amadeus either anticipated or saw instantly that Hakram was Warlord. Interesting. Admirable even if only the latter. To predict that Hakram would become Warlord would be practically supernatural.

Wait. Ahhhhh. I see now. Amadeus is in contact with Grem. Grem is an orc and former claimant to the Name. He might know by intuition who the Warlord was.

That would definitely have given Amadeus a big advantage over even Catherine when it comes to plotting.

Linnus42

Eh Amadeus hangs out with too many Named for Bard not to have some idea of what he is doing. He may even be close to a Name but he is clearly running a storyline and he made a public declaration to the Gods Below. Bard works for the Gods so the Carrion Lord isn't exactly doing stuff that make him invisible to the Bard.

Bard is not going to be afraid of Hakram. She has only avoided Hierarch and that cause he has some pure Hax. Bard cannot really be affected physically after all DK tied her to a lab table and cut her open and got nowhere. Bard's shtick isn't mind control, she usually shows up and gives you information where some is bs and some is true.

Frivolous

Linnus42: That's just it. Intercessor appears to give you BS, especially when you're in a moment of weakness. Her entire shtick is words meant to wound you or to move you.

But Hakram cannot be moved, and he's scarily perceptive. Look at how quickly he deduced that Rozala was under new orders to coddle Catherine, in Interlude: Concourse IV.

Any attempt to move him might just give him the information he needs to push back. That makes him dangerous to a wordsmith like the Intercessor.

Also, I do not believe Amadeus is approaching a Name. I think Hakram would have noticed it.

And just because he's running a Story and entreating the Gods Below does not mean that the Intercessor can necessarily sense him.

As I commented in the last chapter, I believe Amadeus has been using Neshamah's methods when he sought apotheosis, only acting in indirect manner, giving no openings. I believe his scheme is an attack on the Intercessor and/or meant to deny her knowledge of him or the ability to act on him.

Even the Intercessor didn't notice what Neshamah was doing until, as she said, it was too late to stop him, and Neshamah had a Name before he became Dead King. Amadeus is still Nameless.

Still waiting for real evidence proving or disproving Intercessor's knowledge of Amadeus. So far all we have is absence of evidence.

Speck of Stardust

Intercessor did notice Neshamah though, she just had no openings (or desire) to stop him.

Why else do you think she laughed when he first 'won'.

As for limitations, she knows actions she can't however read thoughts.

shikkarasu

She can't read thoughts, but she can see stories. She even went so far as to call it "peeking at the script" in Book 1.

So she sees where the plan will lead and works backwards to figure out why [Named] wants to accomplish [Thing] and what points of failure are needed to change the result into something she would prefer. Honestly it's more terrifying to me than simple mind reading. Reading someone's mind doesn't tell you if it will work.

Shveiran

For how good Hakram is, I'd not bet on him at the Intercessor's chosen game.

Even with all the disadvantages that come from people knowing what her deal is (or at least much more than usual), millennia of experience is hard to beat.

Kairos was kind of unpredictable and the oracle had the sight to help, Hakram only has his wits. And has so far been only a helper and not a player.

The Bard is not a good enemy to take your first bit at the game, plain and simple.

Frivolous

Addendum: I'd like to clarify what I meant by absence of evidence.

Amadeus is attacking the Story of Praes. He means to destroy certain Names. You'd think that would be a concern for Intercessor.

Yet Intercessor hasn't mentioned him yet. She could certainly talk to Amadeus or to Ranger, who is Named, about Amadeus' scheme in an attempt to deflect it, but she hasn't.

Instead, she's talking to Akua about Catherine, not Amadeus.

To me, if a person repeatedly fails to mention a topic that should be of importance to her, it could be she's just keeping silent about it. But the other explanation is ignorance of that topic.

Shveiran

The Intercessor doesn't really care about Praes, I don't think.

If Cordelia pulls the trigger on the Elamal, it's honestly easy to see why: it doesn't really matter if there is a change of order in Praes, because the doomsday event will change the stories going around the continent WILDLY long before those changes can achieve much.

What matters is stopping Cat, so that the elamal gets activated.

Miles

Not even sure that it's about the dead angel either. I think she's trying to stop Cat to prevent what she sees as the Dead King Version 2: Deathless Queen

Yunamed

Maybe Bard doesn't feel that's important enough...if Cat gets the name she wants without any interference she might have control over Bard or some level of influence.

dadycool

God...DAMN, Akua! That was magnificent! Not only the sheer majesty of her sorcery, but the fact that she actually called upon Above's power to save the Capitol of Evil. That right there is the power of Looking out for the Little People.

Liliet

Wait, she did what?

dadycool

When the technique just came to her, combined with everything else going on with her, that had Above all over it. Below doesn't make it easy like that unless it's the first step in a big "All According To" plan.

Providence, that's the word. Her ease was clearly Providence having a hand in it. If she had called on her own knowledge, it'd be different and I'd give her the credit, but she didn't actually try, it was basically given to her, the way it always is for Heroes.

hakureireimu

No. That's simply what filling the groove of a story or coming into a Name looks like. It's not a Hero specific thing.

shikkarasu

That said, bolts of Lightning are a much more divine method than, say, swaths of Hellflame. It may not have the substance of Above, but it has all the trappings of Above. All in all I'd say dadycool is right, but not quite for the reasons they thought they were.

Shveiran

Guys, the first Named we saw using lightning was bloody Kairos.

And even before that, we saw it used by mages, not by Priests.

Actually, tell a lie, I think the first one was actually Masego, but Kairos made for a much better point!

shikkarasu

Yes, and Kairos announced it by yelling that his Rule extended to the Heavens themselves. I feel this only strengthens our point that she used Good means to save an Evil city.

Again, I am not saying that lightning is a Good exclusive elemental force like Light(which was also soft-usurped by Scorched Apostate), just that it is symbolic of Above. It conjures up the image of the Heavens smiting their foes.

Shveiran

I think it is simply linked to above. As in, up. The sky.

Liliet

Huh? I was pretty sure that was her own knowledge, her recall / thinking was just eased by... well, yes, story juice.

kinghaart

Her leaning into that story (and strengthening her Claim) is probably what exposed her to Bard.

Hakram's Dead Hand

I think what they are saying is that it was providence that helped Akua. It does say "As if she were meant to succeed." but I think this is less of the Gods Above influencing her and more of the shape of a story.

Shveiran

Yeah, if I know one thing about those that say "this undead apocalypse I'm in no way protected from is certainly not my problem" is that the look out for the little people.

I swear to Future Masego, this arc is drawing me crazy.

kinghaart

TBF even Malicia had a solution ready for the Hellgates, it's Cat who is not willing to sit at the table anymore (with good reason but still, it's not really true to say that Malicia or Akua are working for the DK. Sounds a lot like "if you're not with us, you're against us" which has at least SOME ambiguity at a moral stance).

kinghaart

Like, if it weren't for Cat and all the events of the early books, would the DK even be out?

serdar314

Well, Fuck u Bard. Seriously. I was expecting her the moment Akua said it was like she was meant to win but non the less, Fuck u

Adrian_V

Huh glad to know i wasn't the only one having trouble deciding if Tenebrus is a He or She now xD

So many moving pieces, and Cat is central to all of them, i still think Picker's plea is what will define her story and probably save her ass and goals.

Also we were joking a lot about the spider and its dread emperor father/mother but how many of us actually thought HE/SHE would appear?

ChillyPepper

S/he can be whatever they want to be, GENDERFLUID SPIDERS FOR ATER!

kinghaart

I mean, who is going to contradict?

Though I read it more as Tenebrous always being female but choosing the masculine honorific, similar to Cordelia.

sengachi

Either way, I think we can all appreciate that on Calernia even Ye Most Evil Empire Praes says "trans rights", even for terrible indescribable monsters, and while in the middle of a multi-sided conflict for the very survival of their empire at that.

Black Spiral Dancer

Yeah, it has to count SOME points.

Kidding aside, it shows much more of the writer and the society he/she is from than anything much about Praes (in fact, of Calernia as a whole).

edrey

at this point i would be fucking impressed if cat predict half of this things, like the graveyard. the bard ruining her plans was a given but the rest its just a mess. but thinking again i wouldnt be surprised either if she can

Adrian_V

I kind of want her to appear smug all knowing while on the inside she is all "wtf did just happen?" kind of like Abigail, good enough to fool the masses (highlords and nobles included) but most everyone close to her knows she is full of shit xD

jamesc9

No, I disagree with that characterisation of Abigail.

The surface is "burghurk, what just happened? Please can I be fired now, pretty-please without being hung?" and the inside is "ok, so this event happened, so that set of options has closed, and this set has opened, and this is the optimal option, but they know that too, so here's the next best option that causes the most inconvenience to my least favourite people."

Liliet

BEST:

- Akua the icon!!! hell yeah!!! doing the thing!!!
- soooo will telling Akua about Catherine's plan actually sabotage it? I'm assuming yes, though alas this is not the way I WANTED this to go lmao;
- Amadeus ♥ ♥ ♥ also confirmation of him in fact having a stolen uniform from the Army of Callow and not just Arthur making weird assumptions;
- HAKRAM HELL YEAH!!!!!!
- Wither, Abreha and Dakarai ALL of them Hell Yeah I love them;
- Refugees ♥ ♥ ♥
- DREAD EMP CLAIMANT TENEBROUS

So fucking great.

Liliet

Oh I forgot: special shoutout to Catherine for helping with evacuation!!!

Shveiran

You mean the one character on scene that has been consistently trying to avoid civilian casualties? Yeah, sure, though honestly I thought that was kind of a given.

Liliet

Well, yes, but it's still worth giving a shoutout to?

Adrian_V

I thought you pointed it out because now the civillians also realize she isn't a murdering bastard, before this most of the population believed she cared nothing and would masacre them with a minor excuse.

I do think it will end up being important she was seen doing the right thing.

Liliet

Also it was important that she actually did it, looks in the distance at the town near the poisoned lake like yeah it being Cathering it was to be expected but its still GOOD AND WORTH NOTING that the expecctations were lived up to

kinghaart

Not sure you can cheer Amadeus AND Cat here, one is saving citizens the other has killed maybe 1 in 4 of.

Liliet

My powers are boundless.

Raved Thrad

> – DREAD EMP CLAIMANT TENEBROUS

“And as for my choice for Chancellor, skree, I give you Lolth, Queen of the Demonweb Pits. Skree.”

shikkarasu

Sve Noc: “Hold my Greyfields ’68”

sengachi

Oh thank the gods, someone finally came up with a good gender ambiguous term, Dread Emp.

Shveiran

The Dremp?

kinghaart

Dread Emprous Tenebrous?

Raved Thrad

So much happening here, I actually found myself sitting on the edge of my seat as I read through the action sequences with Ranger and her kids. All throughout, though, the one thought running through my head was, “Saint of Swords was an idiot.”

I mean, seriously, what kind of delusional dunce thinks that they’re going to be able to I-am-a-sword through the attacks of someone who routinely shoots Light-empowered arrows out of the sky?

“I am a sword!”

“Oooh, I didn’t knew swords could bleed! Neat!”

“Rargh Let me put my intestines back in my gut, again, and I’ll show you bleeding!”

“Nah, bored now.”

Also, I love the part where Ranger pulls a Zen koan out of her ass to confuse Alexis. Does this make her a Zen Anarchist? Zen Murderist? Zen Thrillkillerist?

Lastly, poor Akua. Congratudolences, you are a Hero now! I half-expected her to start shedding Light in an aura around her, and for the Hashmallim to make her an offer she can't repent.

At which point every other Praesi in the area would start running away from her in horror. Or dread. 😊

Andrew Smith

The fun fact is we have word of E that it would of been 50/50 odds in saints prime with 60/40 when we met her(in Ranger favour) because Saint got old, though yeah Saint was a idiot young named(she was still the wanderer) even she had yet to do the whole become a sword thing, where she would do things like cut concepts

Reader in the Night

Well, this update was... Underwhelming.

If whatever the Bard tells Akua is not exactly something that Cat predicted long ago I'll call bullshit, mostly because Catherine couldn't have plotted Akua's "redemption" for two years and not expected the Bard to interfere. If this isn't a trap for the Bard, it's the sort of glaring oversight that Catherine might as well turn in her scheming credentials over.

And I also agree with Hakram: I am disappointed in Amadeus. He sits pretty in the Wasteland running some kind of long con for two years while Catherine desperately tries to stave off the end of the fucking world, then after his convoluted plan that involved the Army of Callow coming to Praes despite Amadeus having no possible way to predict the Fall of Hainaut succeeds, he has the gall to tell Catherine "You do not rule here"? She wouldn't need to be here cleaning up messes if you had done your job and put Praes in order, Amadeus! Now you're here, playing story games with Praes while the entire fucking continent collapses, seemingly ignoring that whatever long-term change you're plotting for Praes is useless if there IS no long-term for Calernia anyways? Bah!

Maybe after things unveil more, the plans-within-plans-within-plans will actually reveal themselves to have been clever all along, but this chapter and Black's big plan in the last one? Subpar.

Shveiran

Agreed on all counts.

Honestly, EE surprised me so many times before that I really, really know that jumping the gun on this one is going to make me feel silly.

But Amadeus and Akua, two characters I was completely sold on at the start of this book, really give me bad feelings right now.

I'm at the point where, if they show up on screen, I go "oook, another chapter I'll feel bad afterwards then".

I want to be wrong. So very badly.
Please show me I'm wrong.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes! I'm not alone in this! I'm really disliking Amadeus here. Praes was incapable of not pissing in everyone's soup since it's birth, as Cat says. The Praesi have forfeited their right to complain about foreign intervention in their affairs centuries ago.

shikkarasu

It's less about the right to complain, and more about the Story of Praes. Invaders toppling the tower is not the end of the story, it's not even the 3rd act. It's just the backstory for the next Empress.

Amadeus wants Praes to tear itself apart and have no-one else to blame, no-one to take vengeance upon. If Cat breaks them and installs a leader then she's just another Miezani-style conqueror for them to overthrow.

"Oh, we lost, sure, but only because there was a sharper iron out there. We'll just need to build the tower one floor taller this time and make sure that the competition is that much fiercer. That way we will be the Bigger Fish next time we are invaded."

But if Praes destroys itself? Well, shit, what's the point in keeping the system going? Tenebrous, Malicia, and Sepulchral sharpened each other's iron down to nubs and the greatest city in the Empire collapsed in a heap of incompetence and petty greed. No outside force, no scapegoat to pin the blame on.

Shveiran

I see your points, and it's not that you are wrong, it's that... well, as I think Ninegardens said last chapter, who cares if the Tower is toppled, if you don't bother to put a better story in place?

Praes will be broken, and will devolve back to a scattering of hungry, desperate people that will bite each other until a big enough monster comes around that can sit on top of the pile of bones.

An Emperor by any other Name would kill as often.

It's not enough to destroy a story, you need a better one to fill the void it makes.

sengachi

And that is where Akua probably comes in.

(Also, Amadeus can be wrong. It is okay for characters to have opinions/plans about how to fix things and for those opinions/plans to be wrong. That's not a plot hole, that's a character flaw.)

Shveiran

True. I just hope it's not that because I'd personally find it personally unsatisfying as the final development of a relevant character I really liked.

Mainly because it is the last book.

shikkarasu

Very true, but the reason I am defending Amadeus is that I agree that they will not embrace said new Story until they are disillusioned with their current one. As long as they believe that biting each other makes them strong they will turn any new Story into Praes with a coat of paint. They could scrap the Tower, the High Lords, and the racism, but they still need to see that the ends have failed to justify the means. Only then will they accept the new means.

Remember Akua when she was the Diaboliost? (See Book3: Chiaroscuro) She knew that the Calamities were outperforming the Truebloods and was willing to change, but not to stop sharpening Iron with Iron. She thought that if you took parts from the Calamities' Modus Operandi and grafted it onto the Praesi way that she would become stronger.

But then Catherine killed her. So she figured Cat was just sharper.

In the Everdark she admitted that Good was outperforming Evil, but still wasn't willing to actually change. (Book 4:78) She wanted to usurp the Power of Friendship, but only to further her own goals. She still spoke of Empire as a good thing. An ideal. It took years of drinking Catherine's coolaid and being fully immersed in her ways to actually change her mind. Even still she tried to go through the motions of Evil until a few chapters ago.

The rest of Praes can't go full immersion for 4+ years with a band of Heroes willing to put up with them. It's just not practical. And if they go through the process in groups they will just reassure one another that the old ways were best and that this is all BS. Rehabilitation just won't work on Praes as it currently is. They need to see, very quickly, why they cannot just adapt their lifestyle. Why it is the core of their beliefs that need to change, not just the way those beliefs are implemented.

I agree they need a new Story. You are entirely right that it is the more important part, but first and foremost Praes needs to agree that they need a new Story.

Gabe Meadow

Well put. And also, as stated in previous chapters, the Bard and Malicia are trying to turn Cat into a Warden of the East – one tangled up in regional disputes – to control her coming Name and create the vulnerable sweet spot.

Amadeus' warning also serves to protect her from that.

And for the issue of putting a new Story in its place, perhaps this may have to do with why he's paying Hakram a visit? The new Warlord is writing a new Story for the Clans, after all...

Shveiran

Yeah. But see, this is my beef with Akua being the poster child for the new way: she is the one that, at the end of her voyage, still chose to side with the allies of the dead king. Even if she knew the dangers and had all informations. And every day she is making that choice anew.

If that's the best we have, what good could possibly come of it?

SpeckofStardust

You say allies of the Dead King, despite the fact that Malicia quite literally handed Cat a plan of how Praes would actively assist against the Dead king and hell gates before Akua's "betrayal".

Like for the belows sake Cat was willing to ally the Dead King herself, Cat actively hates the Bard/seeks to kill, the longest enemy of the Dead king.

Hell Akua's plan was to betray Malicia before her "oh gods I hate everything about my life now" kicked and like everyone else whose thinking ahead is trying to limit damage so that when the mess ends those forces will be arrayed against the dead king.
Like it's ok to hate her redemption arc, its however another thing to be wrong on what her actions are.

Black Spiral Dancer

Spot on. Shveiran's argument is moronic to me.

Shveiran

Aaaand thank you again for your kind words.

Seriously, I'm sure you wouldn't write this way if I hadn't pushed your buttons somehow, but let's try to turn it down a notch, alright?

shikkarasu

Yeah, we bicker, but opposing views are good. No need to attack the speaker just because you disagree.

Shveiran

I'm not sure that is the best way to portrait the facts, honestly.

Like, yes, Catherine went to Keter. It was more evil and more of and escalation to the crusade that bonfire would ever have been.

But comparing it to the Dread empire allying with Keter after the DK showed his true colors, or fight against the GA when the war is going as it is... It feels like apples and oranges to me.

Yes, Cat was a moron to ever think the Dk could be controlled.

Akua knows the stakes, and still switched sides.

Also, yes, cat thinks the Bard Is bad and the Bard fights the DK, but what of it? That doesnt somehow make the DK less bad himself. One is allowed to dislike both the lion and the bear.

if Akua ever planned to act as a mole for the GA, she never acted on It. I'm not sure what you mean with that.

shikkarasu

I don't think she's either extreme of "willingly working with allies of the Dead King" or "mole for the Grand Alliance." She was making a play for Praes and was under Malicia's thumb, but she has been only critical of both Malicia's ends and means, and has been subtly sabotaging Malicia ever since she switched sides

I see your point, and I wouldn't call Akua a good example of anything just yet, but let's not forget that she also isn't done her journey. I'd say she's still Refusing the Call in her own, personal story. She will continue to grow, but her most important quality as a Poster Child is that she wants to grow, not just gain power and influence.

Shveiran

I see what you are coming from, and you make some very good points.

Still, I must say that for me personally this really resonates the wrong way.

Akua first being put on probation may already have been more than she deserved (or at least, more than most got, considering how many of her own minions were simply executed and she was the ringleader).

Her not toeing the line during Calernia's bloody fight for survival feels like too much and too late in the game to ever be overshadowed by something else.

I think it's a fair assumption that the story will pivot on her at some point and I believe she will end up doing far more good than she ever did bad with that crucial choice.

But I see her now, playing with stakes she is and it's just too much for me to ever see her in a positive light again.

shikkarasu

Addendum: this logic is applied to a fictional society in a fictional world. Much like how EE acknowledges that Bellerophon would not 'work' IRL, I am not suggesting that mass murder is a reasonable way to fix any real world social issues.

letouriste

Amadeus could predict her coming in Praes because it was only a matter of time. At the latest, it would have been after the fall of Keter (he does have huge confidence in her being capable to achieve even that)

It's unlikely the Dead King would attack Praes anytime soon. Even the worst case scenario of the current fight against him stopped in effect to the mountain protecting Callow and Praes should also be out of range. Also, the Dead King look fondly on Praes and would probably keep it for last anyway.

Amadeus is perfectly in his right to not like Cat coming over to loot his country (she's mainly after men instead of gold but it's still looting)

kinghaart

I don't think he did any less to Callow though.

Regardless, Occam's Razor says he knows that telling Cat to buzz off is basically an invitation she can't refuse. So he must have said that either to goad her, or to be able to say "I told you so" later, OR because he was speaking to Squire and the Bard was listening and he's trying to catch her in a trap.

My money is on the last one, but I wouldn't rule out that it's all three.

Insanenoodlyguy

The oversight is that cat wants Akua as a self hating villain. Instead she's becoming a hero because she figured it out too early: this isn't what she wants anymore.

ninegardens

I love that Hakram just knows that Amadeus is bad news.

Also, notice how he keeps being referred to as "the Carrion lord" here, while in other chapters he is "Amadeus" "Maddie" "Father" "Black".

It's a thing. He is living up to that name.

Also, Black trying so so hard to "kill" the story that the High Borns deserve something, and then Akua... basically just totally salvaging it. Especially love the plan Cat sent her (presumably in order to ensure this outcome... or something like it).

And... Bard talking to Akua is... bad... but I can't help but think that Cat must have accounted for that. In the sense of... she hasn't built Akua's character growth on lies. Bard can damage the link between Akua and Cat, but the thing is, Akua doesn't like the person she was any more. It's just... Bard can make her hurt, and angry at CAT, but she can't exactly make her stop being the Akua that Cat nurtured/manipulated her into being.

Bard is a threat, but Akua is already very much... an object in motion.

Shveiran

Yeah, I'm not sure where that will go.
I mean, Catherine planned something awful for Akua, sure. But I... don't think Akua would feel that is undeserved? Or even buckle it that hard? She might almost feel like it is a liberation from becoming Dread Empress.

I guess Bard could lie, but... how do you worsen he plan Catherine already had for her? Especially if you want to stick close to the truth?

Insanenoodlyguy

The problem is that Cat was counting on a villian. An eternal guard needs an eternal lifespan. And Akua was heading towards that, in a bizzare hating every step of it way. She kept waiting for somebody to stop her but she didn't put on the breaks. She could have said "fuck you all I'm out" To the conspiracy, instead she said "you're in my seat." She wanted it to end but didn't know what else to do. But this clusterfuck, like her greatest teacher of stories, gave her a new option. She's just trying to save everybody she can at this point, giving it her all even before people who would capitalize on her being weak. That's hero shit. Telling Akua the plan cements that because Akua, like many others in the interludes, will look at the mess of this empire and say, "well somebody needs to fix this and who else is around to do it?" She'll have something to live for.

Gabe Meadow

And as Cat has pointed out, the Bard never has truly been part of a band. Not in the way that really matters. Akua was, even if for a tiny bit of time, and that had more than enough impact on her to make her see how shallow, how self-defeating and meaningless Praesi culture is.

I have a feeling this is going to somehow ruin what the Bard tries. Because, come down to it, that's how the Augur beat her:

"I will," Agnes said, "always, always bet on Cordelia Hasenbach."

Sugar Roll

If one hundred thousand orcs were a heavy argument in any negotiation, surely the same can be said for a hundred thousand spiders. Dread Empress Tenebrous for the throne!

Miles

Tenebrous? More like Dread Empress Weaver

Or would Taylor be Chancellor in this scenario?

Odd

Have I said yet that I love how the battle for Ater has so perfectly degenerated into "oops, all knives"?

It's so very, very Praesi.

Silverking

...Amadeus is just being a terrorist right now, isn't he?

There's no army, no unifying cause, and seemingly no actual answer to "What comes next?". He has no control over the spiders to use as leverage. He presents no real carrot to any faction, and I think he's only got one stick left: a trigger to the bomb of goblinfire big enough to bring down the Tower on everyone's head. His only real advantage right now is being a wildcard between all the different factions; he has no staying power on his own. I'm not sure what his real endgame is, but there's a non-zero chance that the other factions will try to make peace without inviting him to the table, leaving him hanging in the wind.

Shveiran

Which, knowing him, he will have considered.

But yeah, I really have no idea what his endgame actually is.

"Breaking the story of the Dread Empire" seems where the smart money is, right now, but I really don't see how he could think that was sufficient without putting a sustainable story in its place.

Practicalfanofevil

So i think i figured out bards game and how amedeus is going to destroy it. Akua is pretty much confirmed as a heroine because bard used the story of giving a critical truth at a key moment to turn the battle around and claim victory against the scheming villain. Same story cat used at the arsenal. What i think is that cats plan was that akua would be raised as the dread empress but doesnt succeed because she considers it to be a death sentence and she will use the confusion to accomplish whatever she wants. The way bard wanted to exploit this was to force akua to accept the throne by chaining her with a heroic story. She convinced malicia to basically cause chaos all over the place with the excuse of trying to kill cat but as the one who cleaned all of this up akua started to take up the role of someone that helps the poor victims of a mad villain. (Btw i think what bard is doing with malicia to weaken cats name and kill her in transition is the main blow she is aiming which will fail miserably because of that stuff with picklerand the stuff with akua is the hidden knife as cat puts it) anyways by placing akua as the dread empress she basically destroys everything cat builds because there is no way callowans allow the doom of liesse being the dread empress and they will see this as cats fault. While in the short term cat will get what she wants in the long term she will basically lose any qualifications she have to rule callow or even lead the army without causing rebellions left and right. This is the hidden knife like that stuff with white knight and first prince that takes a while to appear but causes a huge mess. The reason this will fail is because it depends on there being a dread empire after the dust settles with akua on the throne. Our dear friend amadeus however will succeed at destroying the dread empire which will end up with akua leading the survivors to form a new nation which is essentially a mix of good and evil and very fitting with the narrative of the new era.

kinghaart

I think even Akua doing that much will still make Callowans (justifiably) mad.

Abnaxis

I'm pretty sure Amadeus doesn't have a trigger on the goblinfire to use it as leverage. I'm think he fully intends to actually use the goblinfire to burn the Tower down with no diplomacy involved.

There's no way he can kill all the destructive Praesi stories without giving the Tower the Blessed Isle treatment. "The Tower endures" will never go away unless the Tower is a smoldering ruin.

Miles

I'm starting to suspect he actually wants to get at wharever Tenebrous was guarding down there. No way she lived all this time without a Name to sustain her lifespan and the only available name for a villain that doesn't do anything is some flavor of "Dungeon Boss"

Which implies some sort of treasure after the boss room.

Zach

Starting to think the “Akua headed towards heroic Name” people might be on to something. She was empowered in the process of a benevolent action.

sengachi

I mean Contrition must be absolutely salivating over her.
“Repent, you will not be forgiven” and all that.

Miles

Mercy and endurance both seem like good fits too.

Shveiran

Not Mercy. Compassion, if anything.
Mercy is about the long view and shaping the world so that less suffering happens, whilst Akua is not looking at anything but the here and now.

Frivolous

It’s a pity Beastmaster didn’t live to be there. He might have easily solved the entire spider problem by Mastering Tenebrous.

Also a pity that even after centuries not one Praesi noble house took the time and trouble to craft a ritual or artefact specially designed for killing or defending against or controlling giant spiders. It’s like they forgot they were living on top of thousands of giant spiders.

Or maybe they were proud of living on top of thousands of giant spiders. Maybe it added to the Evil cachet of living in Ater, or helped separate the true metropolitans from the tourists and provincial riffraff.

Abnaxis

They had rituals keeping the spiders in check. Amadeus just killed the nagged doing the rituals, plus any backups of there were any.

Frivolous

Abnaxis: Yes, but the Aterans just assumed no one would ever do what Amadeus did.

That was foolish of them, but I now suspect that might have been caused by the Story. It might be a trope for Evil to ignore the horrible monstrosities living nearby, so that heroes can later release them to Evil’s detriment.

Might be a subtrope of Evil turns on Evil.

Sinead

Are we going to have a callback to Cat and Akua's shouting match in the High Court but with Roles somewhat switched? Akua is the one off balanced with Cat being the manipulative one.

It'll be different because it will be a lover's spat in front of the Imperial Court. Considering that Cat can override Malicia's Rule, I wonder if this may backfire with Cat slapping her down in front of the High Seats.

BurnedGlade

Warlord, I've come to bargain!

jamesc9

Bargainer, I wonder if your eyes are tasty.

superkeaton

I was wondering when the Bard would do this, ever since the obvious Redemption Equals Death-askew angle Cat was shaping. I'm just wondering if Akua will even care. It wouldn't be the first time Bard's been rebuked by someone with strong ideals.

kinghaart

Eh, I think Bard has seen this more time than she can count. Cat did a good job with Akua but it's hardly the first time we've seen such a story, and now it's gone from "Cat was punishing a Villain" to "Cat was using a Villain" and that story isn't nearly as strong.

Interlude: Strangest And Most Solemn

"It is true it would be safer, Chancellor, to refrain from gloating. But then why even bother? If I can't crucify whoever speaks in accidental rhyme or throw heroes to three-headed snakes or feed a baby to another baby, then why should I even want to be Dread Emperor?"

– Dread Emperor Revenant

The Carrion Lord was a greying swordsman without a sword or a Name, trapped in a small room with an armed Named orc almost twice his weight. The warriors outside the door held no loyalty to him and this entire district of Ater was under the rule of the Clans. He was completely at the Warlord's mercy by almost every way of measuring the situation that the tall orc knew.

Hakram had not felt this wary of someone in years.

"A bargain," the Warlord repeated.

"Indeed," the green-eyed man agreeably replied.

There were no windows to the room, only a ragged tapestry of black and white hung on the wall and a faded magelight set in the wall – old enough its glow dimmed for stretches of time before burning bright again, moving shadows across the wall. Back and forth, like fingers clawing at stone. Amadeus of the Green Stretch looked calm, but then that was his legend. The story went that Istrid – not yet Knightsbane – had bit down on his wrist until her fangs tasted blood to see if he'd flinch and he'd not batted an eye. A hand for you would have been a worthwhile trade, the Carrion Lord had claimed. What was there to flinch from?

No wonder the Red Shields still loved him like a fucking lost son.

Hakram's first instinct was to kill him, here and now. Lunge across the table and smash his soft human skull against the wall, rip out his throat and let the lifeblood spill red on that mangled weave of black and white. But that was the red in him, the part that hated feeling wary of a man in his power and wanted to destroy the source of that discomfort. The Warlord picked the sentiment apart, looked for the sliver of sense at the source of it. It was, he eventually decided, that he did not like or trust the former Black Knight.

In a distant way he recognized that the Carrion Lord was half of the pair that'd done more for his people on half a century than their predecessors in a millennium, but that was not something he could connect to the pale-skinned man in front of him. The deed was too large, too looming, to be tied to someone of flesh and blood. Instead the parts that came to the fore were the human ones, the glimpses he'd had through Catherine over the years. None of these particularly endeared Amadeus of the Green Stretch to Hakram. Yet that dislike was his own, not the Warlord's, and so he swallowed it.

He would not close the door, listen to the fear. But neither would he pretend to be deaf.

"We have not spoken much over the years, you and I," Hakram said.

Maybe a dozen conversations when Catherine was not there, none longer than the time it took to boil a cup of tea.

"You were the Adjutant," the Carrion Lord simply said. "It was not my place to trespass."

Hakram bared his teeth.

"I always did despise it the most," he said, "the way that you always give her what she wants, but only ever in ways that benefit you."

When she'd been a girl still, all swagger and distrust and fear, Catherine had wanted... room to grow. Support but from a distance, the kind of help that would allow her to still believe herself bound to nothing save her own ambitions. And she'd gotten it: her own legion, Masego and Indrani, opportunities to prove herself with no one standing above her. Only the legion had bound her to Praes, the children of the Calamities to their legacy and every victory had advanced the plans of the pale man seated across from him. A hook in every gift, and there had been many.

"That is who I am," the Carrion Lord replied, neither proud nor ashamed. "I am long past the days of fighting it."

"It would not be as obscene, if you did not genuinely love her," Hakram said.

"I did not mean to," Amadeus of the Green Stretch admitted. "But once I saw the anger that burned like a torch, it was water down the slope. Inexorable."

"What you did today will rip back open the wounds you left after the Doom," Hakram gravelled. "How many thousands did you burn today? So much for the coming of the Age of Order."

Green eyes studied him coolly.

"Are you certain that is a conversation you wish to have, Adjutant?"

The tall orc clicked his fangs. He had not forgotten what Tariq Fleetfoot had told him as Hainaut broke around them, but what had once been a comfort was now a noose around his neck. Not that he would allow himself to be cowed by the other man's turn of phrase.

"What must be settled between she and I will be," Hakram said. "Do not pretend understanding of it, any more than I could claim understanding of what lay between you and Scribe. It is... personal. Your madness is not."

The green-eyed man leaned back in his seat, looking amused. Hakram itched to take an eye for it, just so that he'd be forever half as nonchalant.

"My madness?" the pale man asked.

"You fed thousands of civilians to blood-mad critters," the Warlord said. "You weakened armies needed against Keter and broke the capital. You sit here as if it makes you a victor, but all I see in you is a Dread Emperor as this land has known by the hundreds. Why should I bargain with the likes of you?"

"Because none of these were accidents," the Carrion Lord calmly replied.

Hakram paused. Killed the scorn on his tongue, the easy comment that if anything that only worsened his impression of the other man. Perhaps that would still be true later, but first he would think it through. See why a largely intelligent man would think this reasonable to say here and now. That meant looking at the deeds and going back, methodically. What is there to gain by today? Hakram considered the blood, for often that was where the truth of things lay. And from a cold eye this Battle of the Spiders, not quite yet finished, had bled the High Lords and Ladies the most.

Of soldiers, yes, but not so many as that. Of the thirty thousand that had first gathered outside Ater at least twenty thousand should still remain and most the dead would be levies. The household troops had lost but not been crippled. No, the cost had been subtler. The High Seats had ruined their reputation with Ater when they sacrificed almost a quarter of the city to contain the spiders, their devils and wonders killing almost as many as the monsters come from below. If any of them tried to claim the Tower, the city would riot. That would not necessarily stop them from trying, but history taught that a tyrant without Ater's affection rarely lasted long in the Tower.

Only Ater is half a ruin now, Hakram thought, so that doesn't matter as much. Love could be bought with food and shelter provided to refugees and the disposed, not that it would be sustainable in the long term. Hakram had experience with matters like this, having once handled the masses of refugees in southern Callow after the Doom and Summer's depredations. The tent-cities had eventually broken up, leaving smaller towns behind as the people moved away to – Hakram paused. Not an accident, the Carrion Lord had claimed. Not the destruction, not the deaths, not even the gargantuan spider unleashed on the Licosian Gates.

"You are destroying Ater," the Warlord said. "Emptying it for good."

"Are you familiar with the Haunted Scholar's works?" the Carrion Lord asked.

Hakram was and admitted as much with a nod. The man had claimed in his treatises that the instability at the heart of Praes came from the weakness of the Tower relative to the High Seats. Three burdens in particular had been identified. The Legions of Terror, which were dependent on taxes paid by nobles for their upkeep, the asymmetric accretion of power – Dread Emperors were individuals, had to build their power as individuals from scratch when they rose, while the High Seats were dynasties with permanent seats of power – and most importantly of all the capital itself. Ater, the behemoth city that could not feed itself or pay for its own upkeep or close its gates to its enemies.

“I suppose it is a sort of madness,” the Carrion Lord conceded. “But it is a methodical one. Ater must be reduced to a sustainable size if Praes is ever to be free of constant civil strife.”

The Haunted Scholar’s thesis on display. If Ater could not be held without the support of a High Seat then civil war was inevitable because the Tower was certain to be bound in the dynastic disputes of its backer.

“You haven’t solved the other two,” the Warlord said.

“The days is young,” the pale man smiled. “Shall we discuss a bargain, then?”

Hakram wanted to deny him. The Warlord considered it. It was an intricate plan, weakening the High Seats in several ways and attending to a deeper issue with a single stroke. Not the kind that someone lost to the old ways would be capable of conceiving. And that meant, regrettably, that Amadeus of the Green Stretch was still worth hearing out.

“Speak,” the Warlord ordered.

“There are three plans afoot in the capital that are not ours,” the Carrion Lord said. “Your intentions for the Clans cannot cohabit with any of them succeeding.”

“Bold claim,” Hakram growled.

“Malicia intends to stand as Dread Empress when the ashes have cooled,” the pale man calmly said. “To do this, she has driven every High Seat to such hatred of the others that none will tolerate another to rise to claim the Tower. All the while, she sunk a great deal of her remaining resources in ensuring that Akua Sahelian would be crowned empress in her stead. She intends, I imagine, to peacefully abdicate.”

“Even if Sahelian spared her, her supporters wouldn’t tolerate the loose end,” the Warlord pointed out.

“Which doesn’t matter, because Malicia believes that Catherine will kill the Doom of Liesse the moment she dares to claim the throne," the Carrion Lord said. "Putting the empire in an... interesting situation."

It took a moment for Hakram to put all the pieces in place properly. Sahelian dead, the High Seats livid at the offence but too deeply feuding to be able to raise one of their own instead. It would leave only one person with enough prominence to fill the seat, wouldn't it? Malicia herself, not an hour gone from the throne and yet somehow made into the compromise candidate. And Catherine might want to kill her, but would the High Seats stand for it? Killing one empress would have them furious enough, two would be beyond the pale. Subjugation in all but name.

It might cost her the armies she'd come here to claim, the diabolists she needed.

"It won't work," the Warlord said.

"No," the Carrion Lord agreed. "It is an outstanding piece of scheming on Malicia's part, but it falls apart because she failed to properly grasp the nature of Akua Sahelian."

"And you have?" Hakram derided.

"No," the man easily replied, "but I understand Catherine and that is quite enough. She would not tolerate the owner of the Folly to rule Praes, no matter the nature of the deeper game she is playing with Tasia's daughter. Which brings us to my daughter and her own plan, beginning with the crucial moment where Akua Sahelian will refuse the throne she is offered."

He'd never heard the man claim Catherine as his daughter so openly. It felt like nails on chalk, for all that Catherine returned the favour from her side regularly. Somehow Hakram doubted either had ever spoken the words face-to-face.

"I know what Catherine plans," the Warlord said.

He had no need to hear out a plan he'd helped make, though he was certain changes would have been made since he'd left for the Steppes.

"Which is why you are not acting hand-in-hand with her," the Carrion Lord calmly noted. "You already know that your leverage against the Tower depends on being someone whose support can be courted against her."

The Warlord did not deny it. If he entered the Tower as Catherine's ally, he lost all bargaining power. The Clans became a chip on her side of the table, not players in their own right. It lost him the great influence he would be wielding in there as the only person left in the empire with an army on the field that could give the Army of Callow pause. Beyond that, he would lose the influence he would need to bend the Grand Alliance to make the concessions he needed. Much as the pale man irked him, he was not wrong. He could not go along with Catherine tomorrow.

"And the third?" the Warlord grunted.

"The Intercessor wants Catherine dead and Praes a pit of civil war, as far as I can tell," the other man shrugged. "Her means are still opaque to me, save that she will moving through Named and pivots. Still, I don't believe that you could ever ally with the Wandering Bard."

"And so that leaves you," the Warlord said. "Or so you would like me to believe."

"Indeed," the Carrion Lord cheerfully replied.

"Only I could speak with Malicia instead," the Warlord said. "Or back a High Seat against the others."

Malicia was the best candidate, save in the sense that Catherine would set fire to the Tower rather than to allow her to rule a latrine pit, much less Praes itself. Hakram was still deciding how heavily that should weight on the scales, given that he might be in a position to strongarm the issue. He was not alone in this. High Lady Wither, his closest ally, had been clear that she would personally prefer Malicia as ruler even if she was open to other candidates. Neither of them were eager to lend a hand to the man seated across the table, even knowing he was likely the most acceptable candidate to the Grand Alliance.

Hakram was able to separate his dislike from the necessities of the situation, so his reluctance was not personal. Amadeus of the Green Stretch, while popular with the Legions and the people of some regions of Praes, would not be uncontested as ruler. He was a Duni and he'd spent most of his career as the Black Knight rabidly at odds with the same nobility whose support he would need to govern, which was far from ideal. The Carrion Lord was an able enough man that Hakram believed he would be able to make the High Seats fall into line, but he also believed that achieving this would take several years and a fairly brutal war.

A war they did not have time to wage and which would draw heavily on the resources of his supporters. Neither Hakram nor Wither were particularly eager to bleed their people for that purpose. Jaheem Niri was likely their best bet, like it or not – they could trade the territorial concessions Hakram wanted and the assurances Wither wanted for their support, which he could not claim the Tower without.

"You could," the Carrion Lord said. "Only it won't get you what you want for your people."

The Warlord bared his fangs.

"And what would you know about that?"

"Enough," the pale man said. "You were seen to use both the Red Shields and the Split Tree as lieutenants outside the city, which means you're threading the needle between the clans that want closer ties and those that want to distance themselves. You're after major concessions from the Tower while aiming to remain part of Praes."

Hakram's dead hand clenched. Only a handful of people in all of the empire could have derived the same conclusions from seeing what the man had, he reminded himself. His intentions were not obvious for everyone to see.

"You tread dangerous grounds," the Warlord warned.

"It's habit by now," the Carrion Lord smiled. "My point stands, regardless. Even if you can back someone to seize the Tower and they fulfill the bargain you struck, it won't get you what you want."

"And why is that?" the Warlord gravelled.

"Because their successor will have no incentive to keep the bargain," he replied.

"War against the united Clans-"

"Will be the selling point of breaking faith," the Carrion Lord coldly cut in. "You know your histories, Warlord. How many tyrants continued the policies of the predecessor they murdered? How many of them immediately threw themselves into a war with Callow or the Free Cities or any enemy at hand because a fight against a common enemy would solidify their grip on the empire?"

It had the sting of truth, but also of the inevitable.

"That is Praes," the Warlord said.

"That is the Dread Empire," the Carrion Lord challenged.

Hakram almost laughed.

"What else is there?"

"A bargain to make," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said.

The Warlord scoffed. Arrogance.

"Why would your successor be better than anyone else's?"

"Because I do not intend to be Dread Emperor," the pale man calmly said.

The Warlord paused. Narrowed his eyes.

"So what is it you do want?" Hakram Deadhand asked.

"Your help," he said, "and a single favour."

It sounded too good a bargain, the Warlord thought.

"Do not be relieved," the Carrion Lord mildly said. "The favour, I think, will be for you the heavier of the costs to bear."

Dead fingers made by a now dead man clenched.

"Tell me," the Warlord ordered.

—

Archer fainted to the left, then hastily drew back when the blade came a hair's breadth away from her neck – she felt the very point scrape her skin – and shifted to the side only to eat a pommel in the stomach. Even through the mail she bent, gasping in pain as the Ranger moved around her so the Silver Huntress blow would go wide.

"Indrani," Alexis hissed, "get out of—"

She never finished the sentence, the two of them seeing the movement coming from the corner of their eye. The leapt away before the leg tore through the house whose roof they had been fighting on, Tenebrous scattering the stone walls like they were made of parchment and dripping darkness everywhere. Like pools of ink the dark tainted whatever it touched, spreading down slopes and through crevices. Twice now Indrani had seen devils fall through a large patch as if it were a hole. Cocky had said that Tenebrous was living domain, but Archer had her doubts. Althea Maronid's research in Ashur had decisively proved that a domain must be internal if it belonged to a living creature, else it would cause uncontrolled creational cascades.

More likely Tenebrous' domain was physically incarnated and static, somewhere far below Ater, and she was trying to bring it up here by spreading around that darkness clinging to her hide. On the bright side, that meant climbing on top of the spider wouldn't be like stepping over one of the pools: if the domain was external it wouldn't work on the creature herself.

Looking through the clouds of dust and raining darkness, Archer looked for the Lady's shape. Alexis had gone the other way, but neither of them were getting – oh, shit, she'd climbed the leg. And ol' Tenebrous wasn't liking that at all, by the deafening sounds of her screeching. What few windows in the neighbourhoods hadn't been broken all exploded, and a few devils actually died. Indrani fought through the pain, then blinked as a large, winged devil with purple veins landed before her in a crouch. Cocky was offering a ride, huh? No point in declining. The devil needed a knife in the side to be guided properly, but even as Light lit up the sky and flew out in an arrow – the Lady had to stop and shoot it down – Indrani flew ahead.

The Lady killed her mount with a second arrow a heartbeat later, but Alexis had bought her long enough: she leapt off the dying devil, landing on Tenebrous' back. The monster did not like that at all, not only starting to screech and trying to shake her off but doing... something with its body. The thick darkness she'd been stepping through turned from a misty cloud to something thicker, like mud, and the hair beneath her boots hardened like iron into a forest of needles. Fuck, that wasn't going to be fun to fight on but it wasn't like she had a choice: in a matter of moments the Lady had finished climbing up the leg and was looking at her from her a hundred feet away.

Now Archer just needed to distract her long enough that Alexis would be able to make it up here without getting shot.

Rolling her shoulders to loosen them, Indrani took calm steps forward. The longknives the same woman she was not fighting had gifted her in hand, the scarf they had taken together in Mercantis around her neck, she began to move quicker. Indrani didn't like thinking when the blades were out, not more than she needed to, but her mind was ajar. Asking questions like why she was doing this, what there was to win. Alexis wanted to kill the Lady, that was no mystery, and Cocky wanted to... get even somehow. But why was Indrani here, dragged into this? Cat had asked her to find out what Ranger would be up to, and she'd found out: baiting out a huge fucking spider monster near the fortified positions of the High Lady of Kahtan. Job done, not great but still done.

So why was she breaking into a run, measuring the distance between her and her teacher?

The blades sang, steel on steel. Parry, riposte, spin. The footing shifted on them, Tenebrous raging at their presence, but even as the world shifted and great towers crashed around them they kept striking. To miss a beat was to lose, perhaps even to die. Indrani found she was smiling through her scarf. So was the Lady, for a while, but it did not last. Indrani was falling behind. She kept coming in close to make her knives count, to go against the length of Ranger's swords, but it wasn't enough. The Lady did not fall for feints, and when Indrani ignored what she had thought to be one she nearly lost an eye. Blood began to pour down the side of her head, kept out of her eye only by her eyebrow.

"You've improved," the Ranger said.

"I don't know if you have," Archer admitted.

It might, she thought, be why she was fighting in the first place. To see if she could reach the end of Ranger's skill. Whether or not she beat the other woman didn't matter that much to her. It wouldn't really mean anything, even if it ended in death. But knowing where she stood compared to the only person she had really wanted to measure herself up against? That was worth the blood. The Ranger studied her for a beat, slapping aside a cut from the side and forcing Indrani back with the riposte, then scoffed.

"Your mindset is still lacking," the Ranger said.

Archer grit her teeth, feinted to the side – ignored – and with the flat of her other blade tried to throw darkness in the Lady's face. It was cut through, and only a desperate half-step kept Indrani from losing half her face. The cut went deep, from just below her right eye to her jaw. If it'd been any deeper bone would have been scraped.

"Light as a feather," the Lady of the Lake said.

Indrani licked away the blood pooling against her upper lip and went on the attack again. Aggressive, forcing a lock of blades and when Ranger pushed her back she tried to slide under. It got her a kick on the chin for her trouble, but she'd expected that – Cat did the same, because the Carrion Lord did the same and he'd learned it from the Lady – and she caught it with crossed blades. The Lady was forced back, one leg in the air, and Indrani lunged forward with both blades. Only to take another kick on the side of the head, tumbling against the ground with a grunt of pain.

The Lady stabbed down at her shoulder, chipping the mail and finding flesh beneath before withdrawing so Indrani's swipe would hit only air.

"Heavy as a mountain," Ranger finished. "You must be one or the other. Anything in between is wasted time."

"That one's an old lesson," Archer rasped out, rising to her feet.

"Yes," the Lady coldly said. "You should have learned it by now. I thought going out into the world would temper you, but I seem to have been mistaken. Instead you've spent your time fucking Amadeus' apprentice and playing house with Wekesa's boy. It's disappointing."

Indrani held back a flinch.

"I've done more than that," she bit out.

"You have done things," the Lady dismissed, "but you have not improved. Your mindset was not refined, your experiences did not broaden your horizons. Do you even have a reason to be fighting me?"

Archer opened her mouth.

"Do not offer me empty words, Indrani," Hye Su warned. "Those I would take an insult."

Archer's mouth closed. It felt childish, while facing those eyes and those blades, to speak of understanding where she stood. Of comparison between them. Like she was a child going around in adult's clothing.

"I thought as much," Ranger sighed. "Go on, get out of here. I will see if the others have grown and deal with you later."

Fuck, Indrani thought. Was the Lady right? It felt like she was. What was Archer even doing here? She'd just let Alexis and Cocky talk her into this because she felt bad about how they'd been back in Refuge, gone along with this stupid idea because of guilt she should have left behind long ago. Baggage like that was best left behind, she'd known that for year. Why was she saddling herself with it now? She'd been with Masego and Catherine too long, gotten too comfortable. She was forgetting what the real world was like.

"I-"

The silver arrow of Light thrummed with power, but it was not so swift that the Lady did not bat it aside. The Silver Huntress was already putting away her bow, short spear in hand with a snarl on her face. Indrani, though, did not move. The image had been seared into her eyes. The Lady of the Lake, knee-deep in darkness and armed with nothing but steel parrying that blinding burst of Light. Casually, as if she had never even considered she wouldn't be able to do it. No delay, no hesitation, no questioning. Indrani had forgot what it was like, seeing the Lady in her element. Seeing who she was.

Action without doubt.

Archer attacked. She could not leave, even if she struggled to articulate why. To think of it. Blood went down her face, down her neck, but her knives did not slow. It was flashes of movement, of sight. Ranger parrying a spear and blade with a hand each, spinning to carve through Alexis' skull – hitting hair instead, cutting through, but only narrowly. Strands of red flew as steel shone in the sun, Indrani's knife finding mail and skidding against it as an elbow snapped back her chin. She fell but Alexis struck, hammering down, and while Ranger caught the spear burning with Light she had to take a steadying step back.

Devils began to land around them, croaking dark calls.

Tenebrous tried to shake them off again, so Indrani caught a glimpse of the blade as it came down. The elf stood behind Ranger, hacking at her neck, but she went low. A jab at the Emerald Sword's chest as the strike went wide, their silhouette shivering. The blow touched nothing but mist, but as it reformed a step back it lost an eye to a perfectly timed follow-up lunge. The elf retreated, another shimmering into view at their side to cover them, and Ranger let out a laugh.

"Where are the other rest, Noon?" she asked. "It'll take more than you two to make this interesting."

"Careful what you ask for."

A vial hit the ground and there was a small tinkling sound, like a bell being rung, that shivered across the darkness. Above them, riding a scaled devil with great wings, Cocky was glaring harshly. The darkness on Tenebrous' back began to thicken, then move. Spin and roil, like angry snakes.

"Concocter," Ranger greeted her. "Still relying on others to do the heavy lifting, I see."

"Freeze," Cocky answered.

Nothing was happening, Indrani thought, but a look told her that neither the elves nor Ranger seemed to agree. They were all having to rip out their feet from the darkness, as if it'd suddenly turned solid. The Concocter grinned.

"Burn," she hissed.

The great spiders let out a scream that sounded like a laugh, and darkness billowed up in great columns of smoke. Indrani cursed, since it might not hurt her but the dark sure as Hells broke her line of sight, and broke into a run. She found Alexis, whose Light-wreathed spear was keeping the darkness at bay and they set out in pursuit together. They found an Emerald Sword, entirely by accident: they were looking the other way swung blindly backwards at Indrani's head when she approached. She parried the blow narrowly, gritting her teeth as she was somehow driven back one-handed from behind, but the moment Alexis stepped in the fight was over.

The elf stared at her with their too-wide eyes, wrinkling their nose in distaste, then vanished into the darkness.

"Right," Indrani breathed out. "They say they're Good, so they don't fight heroes."

"Doesn't make them less pricks, but at least they're fighting Ranger," Alexis grunted. "What was she talking to you about anyway?"

Indrani hesitated.

"Nothing," she said.

Alexis frowned, then went for her side and pressed a cloth against her hand.

"Wipe your face," she said. "The blood's everywhere."

Archer's teeth grit. She knew the gesture was not condescending, that she was not being coddled. And still she curtly threw the cloth back at the Silver Huntress.

"I can handle myself," she bit out.

Without waiting for an answer she pressed forward. They found Ranger only when then burning darkness began to disperse, already fighting two Emerald Swords. The same, different ones? It was impossible to tell, quick as they moved. Indrani glanced at Alexis, whose face was hard-set, and without a word they attacked. Archer's hand went for the vial Cocky had given her earlier, staying back as the Silver Huntress joined the melee. It was hard to follow the movements, but Archer steeled herself and waited. When she did strike out, it was a wild blow at Ranger's back – who parried the blade, frowning, but only too late saw the other blow.

Smashing the vial against the Lady's neck wouldn't have worked, so Indrani instead crushed the glass in her hand, ensuring most of the liquid within sprayed on the back of Ranger's neck. Almost as much soaked her hand and arm, though, and immediately she began to retreat. Already she could feel the world quickening around her, her pulse going wild.

"Cocky," she screamed. "I need an antidote."

She felt something burn across her belly, her chain mail giving, but it was all... distant. When she came back to herself the Concocter was feeding her something from a green vial, frowning. Indrani swallowed, throat gone dry.

"Did it work?" she asked.

"Almost," Cocky sighed. "I took enough that Alexis almost cut off her arm at the shoulder, but then she retreated."

Archer looked down, realized that she was still standing on Tenebrous' back. Only it was no longer moving.

"Is it..."

"Not sure if it's her or the Emerald Swords that killed it," Cocky said. "Either way it's dead. I had to lift you off with devils while it trashed, it got ugly."

"And the Lady?" Indrani asked.

"She cut out the drug from herself," the Concocter grimaced. "The concept of it. I had no idea she could even do that. Seems to have cost her, though, she's been slower since."

"Good," Archer grunted. "I can head back into the fight, then. Is she handling the elves?"

Cocky shook her head.

"They retreated after she wounded a few," she replied. "They'll be back, I'm sure, but it's supposed to take them a while to make their wounds disappear. My bet is we'll get all ten when they reappear."

"Lovely," Indrani drawled. "Which way?"

"Follow me," Cocky said. "I just held back to take care of you."

Indrani bit down on the sharp answer at the tip of her tongue. Cocky hadn't meant it that way. It was not a difficult trip, now that Tenebrous no longer move. The two of them were righting atop at tower against which a great leg was resting, flashed of Light searing the afternoon sky. Alexis was looking worst for wear, bleeding from her gut and a leg, but the Lady still had a grievous wound on her right arm. That had to slow her down, even if it looked like she could still use it some. Indrani went in straight while Cocky took a long war around, aiming to keep out of sight. Alexis was driven back with a cut on her face while the Ranger cast a look her way, cocking an eyebrow as Indrani arrived.

"Back, I see," the Lady said.

"Yup," Indrani shrugged, limbering her wrists.

"And more settled," Ranger said, eyes narrowing.

"I guess it's just clicking into place, now that I've seen you again," Archer said.

The dark-haired woman, after a long moment, smiled.

"You have found something," she said, sounding pleased.

"I used to think I wanted to be like you," Indrani said. "But that's not it, not really. I get that now."

"So what is it you do want?" the Lady of the Lake asked.

"I want to be the Ranger," Indrani said. "I think I've wanted it for a long time, actually. I just couldn't admit it."

"It's not something just anyone can claim," the Lady of the Lake calmly said.

"That's fine," Indrani grinned. "It just means being better than you, and that's the point in the first place."

"Indrani, what the Hells are you talking about?" Alexis snarled.

"It's not wrong, how she raised us," Archer said, to the Huntress' visible fury. "It's not right either, though. And I think I'd do it differently in her place, so I will."

The Lady laughed, sounding genuinely amused.

"You've claimed, Indrani," the Ranger smiled. "Now follow through."

It was the storm, after that. They were all bleeding and tired and slowing down, but one would not have known it from the blades. Indrani had never fought more aggressively, not even against the Saint of Swords, but she could feel it. The Flow. It was in her blood, in the pounding of her feet against the tiles. And it came to her as naturally as breathing, so easily she'd not even noticed she was slipping into the aspect. Ranger struggled with that, to the extent that she focused on Alexis in an effort to take her out first. Indrani cushioned the first blow for the Huntress with her own shoulder, letting the mail eat it, but the second was at the wrong angle and... a devil took it instead.

Cocky's eyes were wild as she stood behind Ranger, hand moving as she threw a red vial at her back, but the Lady must have heard her. The devil had tipped her off. She was swinging backwards, through the vial but Indrani's Name pulsed. It would be more than that, the angle of it and the strength... Cocky would die. It would go through her skull. But through the kill the Lady was making a mistake – there would be no coming back in time, no last moment parry. If Indrani struck now, struck at the right place, then she could win. Not a kill, maybe, but enough that Ranger would be forced to retreat. And in the heartbeat where that all sunk in, she saw the same realization harden in Hye Su's eyes. There Indrani saw the expectation of defeat. Would it be enough to claim the Name, to make her the Ranger?

No, she thought. But it would be the first step. The most important one.

Indrani felt like screaming. She wanted this. Wanted it badly enough to fight. So why was Cocky getting in the way? She needed to think, to weigh it up, but there was no time and her body moved on its own. The blow went for the arm, the one that would have carved through the Concocter's face, and Indrani froze in surprise even as Ranger spun away and threw Alexis at her. They fell in a tangle of limbs, pushing each other off even as Cocky backed away from the Ranger with naked fear on her face. She'd gone pale as snow.

"Disappointing," Ranger sighed. "All three of you. Anger but no control. Hatred but no discipline. And most disappointing of all, desire with no will behind it. None of you learned a thing."

Indrani offered her arm, dragging Alexis up, and the two of them moved shoulder to shoulder.

"Cocky, stay behind us," the Huntress said.

"She's done playing around," Archer agreed.

"I am," the Lady of the Lake agreed. "And if all these years have not made the lessons stick, this time I will have to leave a permanent reminder."

Well, that didn't sound great, Indrani thought. Only before anyone began to move, the sun dimmed around them. Something enormous was looming just at the edge of their senses as Indrani heard the distant cawing of crows. Besides them, Tenebrous shivered. Still dead. No longer unmoving. All of them glanced to the side, to the rising gargantuan shape of the creature, and found a woman standing atop it. Looking down at them as she leaned on a staff of dead wood. Her cloak was one of many colours, and Catherine Foundling looked down at the Ranger with a hard smile.

"Dodge," the Black Queen said, and the Lady's eyes widened.

A heartbeat later half the tower was gone, Tenebrous' leg gone straight through it, and Indrani found that she couldn't help laughing.

This wasn't over but, Hells, at least they'd all live to see tomorrow.

—

"You know," the Intercessor said, "I always kind of liked you, Akua."

Ah, the familiar grounds of being lied to by an eldritch abomination with sinister intentions. If there were comfortable cushions, candied dates and a dozen dead bodies it would be her eighth nameday all over again.

"You once threw sand in my eyes after calling me a self-important megalomaniac," Akua noted.

"And both of those things were well-deserved," the Intercessor cheerfully replied. "Isn't that what friendship is, darling?"

"Sand in my eyes?" the dark-skinned mage drily asked.

"Shit, you actually have a sense of humour now," the Wandering Bard said, sounding impressed. "Like a functional one, not a 'hahaha down into the tapir pit you go' kind. You're mostly a person these days, it's kind of fucked up you managed that."

"Yes, well," Akua smiled, "have you considered-"

She was still only a thimble of power away from collapsing, but it was all about focus. There was plenty of water in the air and it was child's play to shape some into a nail that she threw right into the Wandering Bard's throat. Only the pest didn't die naturally, gone before the ice even broke skin as Akua fell down to her knees. The wave of nausea had her retching wetly as she leaned a hand against the warm bronze of the reservoir walls. A heartbeat later the Bard was there again, picking up the silver flask she'd dropped fleeing.

"Aw, you made me spill some of the mignolet," the ageless monster whined. "Do you know how rare it is for me to get the good stuff?"

Akua forced herself back up to her feet, leaning heavily against the wall as her vision swam. Gods, she was close to falling unconscious. Worse, another spell like that and she was at genuine risk of burning out. Overdrawing on one's magic was a particularly painful way to die even by Praesi standards.

"Yeah, I only came when you'd be in no state to stop me," the Bard easily said.

Akua managed a glare towards the fair-haired woman. This incarnation was tanned and blue-eyed, and shapely in a lowborn way – the kind that came with the frame one had been born with, not proper meals and comfortable living. The Intercessor seemed uncomfortable with the body, though, she noted. The movements were not as smooth as they had been when the two of them last met, with none of the certainty behind the casual laziness in sight.

"Teehee," the Intercessor deadpanned, batting her eyes. "What a coincidence."

"It's been some time since I've last wanted to kill someone this much," Akua admitted.

"Come on now, love," the Bard grinned. "That's not quite true is it? You haven't been standing on all those ledges 'cause you like the view."

Two words in the magetongue and a single runic line, but before the curse of silence could fly out the backlash rang up her arm. First a shiver, then a sensation like every vein was bursting as Akua swallowed a scream. She fell back down to her knees, sweating and trembling. If she'd finished the spell, she thought as her arm pulsed with pain, it would have killed her.

"So," the Intercessor happily said, "we were talking about Cat, yeah?"

"Fuck you," Akua hoarsely said.

Not the finest retort she'd ever managed, but her arm felt like it was bleeding acid from the pores and she once again felt like throwing up.

"My heart," the Intercessor gently said, "if she wasn't game to get naked, why would you think you'd meet my standards?"

Her fingers clawed at the bronze wall. There was a pause, then a fat chortle.

"That one was a little mean even for me," the Bard admitted. "But hey, you're still pretty terrible so I don't actually feel bad. The important thing, though, is that you're trying to redeem yourself! Kind of."

It was difficult to think through the pain, to focus, but she had been trained in this. She gathered herself, got back on her feet.

"You are here because I threaten you and your designs," Akua said. "The why or how is not particularly important, I imagine. You are trying to sway me from the path I am on, whatever that might be. You will fail in this."

The fair-haired woman snorted.

"See, this is why I actually do like you," the Bard said. "You're a tragedy, Akua. But the thing is, when you watch a tragic play usually you feel kind of bad for the lead. They're put through some pretty dark shit. But that's the great thing here! You are – and I think I might have mentioned this before but whatever – actually pretty awful. So I can watch the tragedy and not feel bad, because you kind of have it coming. It's the best of both worlds for everyone."

A pause.

"Except for you," the Bard helpfully clarified. "You definitely get the worst of both worlds. I thought that went without saying, but sometimes you're a little slow on the uptake so I figured I'd throw it in just to be sure."

"Considering I also have to put up with... whatever this is, my situation truly is a tragedy," Akua mildly replied. "Of course, I-"

She lunged forward, but the Bard was already moving. Not quite quickly enough to avoid the sorceress' hands around her throat, she thought, but then she tripped on something – the lute, the damned lute – and she was on her knees, swallowing a scream as agony shot up her arm. The Bard patted her shoulder amicably, leaning against the wall. Her lips were wet from the flask she kept pulling at, pulling into a condescending smile.

"This is actually for your own good, sort of," the Intercessor assured her. "See, you've been going down this road since you got out of the cloak and it's coming to a head. And there's a bunch of interesting ways it could end, which aren't unique – you're not that special, darling – but I'll admit that some are pretty rare. Only someone's been paving this road for you, so you're not actually going to the end of the road: you're going to be yanked away just before getting there, 'cause our Cat has a plan for you."

"You are not nearly as interesting as you seem to believe you are," Akua hoarsely said. "Or clever. Do you think I am unaware that she let me go? She did it because it does not matter whether I am at her side or on the other side of the Tyrian Sea. I carry my cage with me wherever I go."

"This is the sweet spot," the Bard enthusiastically said. "First you had to lose. Then you questioned your beliefs. Then you pretended you believed what other people do, until you'd been lying long enough you had a hard time telling if you were lying – that one's a pattern with you, love, you should really work on that."

"You know nothing," Akua hissed.

"Sure, sure," the old monster insincerely said. "Anyways, now you've been freed and cut loose but you're finding you kind of still buy in those things you insist are lies. And it's chewing you up, 'cause you're horrible and for the first time in your life you actually know that. But this is the fun part! Because you're failing at dying – also a pattern in your life, have you ever considered not failing at everything of import you've ever tried? – so you're not going to be able to take the easy way out. You're actually going to have to change. Find a path forward you can live with."

Ah, so that was her game.

"Are you to be my personal angel, Bard?" Akua mockingly smiled. "My guide to the embrace of redemption?"

"Call me Yara. And of course not," she solemnly said, face serious as a priest. "I would never dare meddle in the story of another Named, I'm a firm believer in the integrity of..."

The Wandering Bard cracked up, laughing until her breath was choked up.

"Oh man," the Intercessor wheezed. "Good times. Yeah, I'm here you actually end up somewhere. Anywhere, really, I'm not super picky about what happens to you on account of not really caring about you as a person. Cat's not interested in you having ending, my sad little friend, which does pisses me off a little. Screwing around with fate like that is my shtick, you smarmy one-eyed drunk. Can't you go original for once?"

"Your only interest is in using me to kill her," Akua calmly said.

The Bard grinned nastily.

"Which you don't want," she said in sing-song voice, "cause you're in luuuurv."

The kissy noises that followed were not even the worst part.

"Oh, Catherine, won't you find a stool to stand on and kiss me," the Intercessor continued in a high-pitched voice, then lowered it to a gritty one and closed an eye. "I can't, Akua, even though I've been hinting I want to for years. Staring at your tits is definitely part of a grand master plan, and not just something I enjoy doing."

The Wandering Bard closed her mouth, then turned to meet her eyes and pointed an accusing finger.

"This is you," she contemptuously said. "This is what you sound like."

Akua's jaw clenched.

"Are you quite finished?" she asked.

"Nah, I mostly did that because kicking you in the belly emotionally is kind of fun," the Bard easily admitted. "The thing is, Akua, this superbly accurate rendition of your innermost thoughts I just treated you to is actually kind of nonsense. It's what you like to think is happening, because it's a comfortable idea that you're tortured and in love and it's all very tragic and o Heavens, what could have been if only you weren't just, kind of appalling!"

The old monster thinly smiled, revealing crooked teeth.

"Only what's actually happening is that she's fucked with your head pretty thoroughly because she doesn't believe she can kill the Dead King so she needs someone powerful to step up and contain him," the Intercessor said. "Used to be she was going to lean on Masego to make a seal on the Hellgate that you'd be stuck maintaining forever, but she's gotten a little more ambitious since. She figures she can destroy the undead threat with that little Arsenal project she got Hierophant to cook up and then toss Neshamah himself into the Twilight Ways where you're going to serve as his prison warden forever."

Akua stilled.

"Yeah," the Bard said, smile broadening into a grin. "That's right. She's going to offer you Larat's sloppy seconds of a crown and then drop you in Liesse so you can think about what a bad girl you've been until... well, pretty much the end of time really. She's been priming you to accept that role for years, my heart. I've been following the whole thing, not because I need to but because it's like reading a Proceran romance serial where everyone is terrible and pretentious and you don't even get to fuck. It's been great, so thanks for that."

Part of Akua felt like being angry, like accusing the Intercessor lying and being indignant. But she'd spent the months since she had left the starry cave on the outskirts of Wolof running away, and now she was simply... tired. It was true, because Catherine loved the sort of cutting irony that the punishment described here would carry and because this had all been coming for a while, hadn't it? Maybe not this specifically, but something like it. A long price for her folly. Nothing she'd done since leaving that camp had mattered, had it?

She'd killed and saved lives, she had fought and bargained and now she was finding that the Tower itself was in her grasp – but she did not want to be here. Not in Ater, not in Praes. Not anywhere, really. Akua knew that the Intercessor had not lied because here and now, on her knees with a broken city around her, going to the Twilight Ways sounded restful. It would be a relief, to leave it all and take on a duty that was grim but also for the greater good of Creation. Not something to even the balance against the evil she had done, but something she could take some satisfaction in nonetheless.

Scratching the edges of the itch, but was that not the best she could hope for?

If that offer had come tomorrow, after the Tower all but fell in her grasp and the great lords of this empire all looked up at her with hopes in their eyes like she could save them, save anything at all, then Akua Sahelian knew deep in her bones that she would have accepted it without a second thought. And this terrified her, not because of how deeply Catherine had come to know her – even now that thought was a thrilling anguish – but because the moment had already come to her. Just now. But soon it would fade. Soon the exhaustion would leave her, and with rest the last of this sudden clarity would be gone to never return.

“You didn’t come here to convince me,” Akua quietly said. “The only reason you’re here is to spoil a piece before it all comes together.”

“Got it in one,” the Wandering Bard smiled. “But since it’s the end times, my sweet, I’ll offer you one on the house. The truth is, you don’t owe shit to Catherine Foundling. What did she lose at the Doom, except for soldiers? It’s the foundation of her reign. No, that day gives her no claim on you. It’s the people you murdered that you’re indebted to, and what the fuck do any of them care about the Black Queen?”

She shrugged.

“You probably don’t have much longer left to live,” the Bard said. “Maybe none of us do, if Nessie gets his way. So for once in your life, Akua Sahelian, won’t you actually make a decision?”

The old monster met her eyes.

“Not do what your mother burned into you,” Yara said, “or Praes or Catherine. Something that you think worth doing.”

Her jaw clenched.

“I will not be your puppet,” Akua said.

“That’s the beauty of it,” the Intercessor smiled, raising her flask in a toast. “I’m the only person in this entire empire of the damned that does not need you on strings.”

She drank deep, looking unspeakably satisfied, but Akua knew the look in her eyes. She saw it, sometimes, in her own looking glass.

“How long have you been doing this, Yara?” she quietly asked.

The Intercessor studied her.

“I remember when the first boat touched the beach,” the other woman said. “The sound their boots made on the wet rocks, the way my little brother kept tugging at my tunic in excitement. It wasn’t called Ashur, would not be for many years. The men were not yet called Aenian.”

“What happened?” she whispered.

“The same thing that always happens,” Yara of Nowhere said, “when men with swords are greeted by songs and gifts.”

"You survived," Akua said.

"Survived," the other woman smiled. "There's a word that means nothing. You can keep breathing and have most of you waiting in a grave, Akua. If you learn anything from me, learn that. There's no worth in just existing. You have to make it count."

"Don't you?" Akua asked.

The Intercessor smiled.

"We'll meet again," she said, "before this is over."

She rapped a knuckle against the bronze wall, a loud ringing sound, and the moment Akua blinked she was gone. Silence lingered in her wake. Eventually, the golden-eyed noble left the reservoir. Below her vultures were waiting, circling. High Lord Jaheem was the one who handed her the letter with the Tower's seal. They'd had one of their own as well, he told her. Summons to a formal court tomorrow. Offers to allow in household troops for security.

"It is an abdication in all but name, Lady Akua," High Lord Jaheem said, tone tight with excitement. "Malicia only seeks to preserve her dignity by being properly defeated before the greats of Praes before she surrenders the throne."

Akua thumb slid across the smooth writing on the parchment, the words that gave a time and a place and a knife. Malicia chose this, she thought. For herself and for me. And still, looking at the letter was the first step up the stairs of the Tower, Akua wondered. It was rope she held, she recognized.

But was it a knot or a noose?

generalchaos327

Droughtbringer can't do it today, so go vote! <https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Matt

All hail Amadeus Warden of the East

Linnus42

Yeah I still think the whole Ranger plot just isn't working and Ranger hit the nail on the head. Indrani doesn't have motivation for the fight, it doesn't even feel she has it in say the classic Zoro vs Mihawk way where I want to be the very best. The student must surpass the master.

The Amadeus & Hakram, Malicia and Bard & Akua plots are far more interesting. Hakram is stepping out behind Cat as an independent player. Akua is actually going to make a choice. I do think Bard did tell Akua the truth in some much as she just needs Akua to make a move and not walk into the trap. Even Amadeus is doing some fresh stuff but I still think he is lack of respect for cultural norms is going to screw him in the end. Its simply not purely academic overturning cultural norms and the like unless as Hakram notes you want to do a whole lot of killing to make it stick.

Albert Wen

Yeah. Cat set up a pretty blatant Rule of 3 there (a loss, ending with a last minute save by the mentor), but that plan might be destined to turn on its head like every other so far. I think that, just like with the goblins, and Hakram, and Akua, Indrani's story is going to become interesting in a completely unexpected way. The final payoff will probably be Cat having a nervous breakdown before ditching the plans and diving the chaos like she did at the very beginning.

dadycool

Oh, I really hope she goes back to her roots as chaos incarnate. Times were funnest when she was Chaotic Evil as opposed to trying to be Lawful Neutral or whatever.

Miles

Epilogue:

The Warlord, Hierophant, Conqueror of Ranger, Fair Queen, and Brawling Tavern Wench walk into a bar...

Miled

NO I MESSED UP! THAT SHOULD SAY POWER RANGER!

What a missed opportunity!

shikkarasu

The bar apologises profusely

Liliet

TBF Cat was never Chaotic Evil. She's been fluctuating uncertainly between Lawful Evil and Chaotic Good, with occasional forays into Lawful Neutral and Neutral Good when she's confused, but Chaotic Evil is about as outside of her domain as Lawful Good is.

Cicero

Nah, I like the Ranger-Archer subplot.

It was a big step for Archer, she had a chance to take what she wanted and decided she wouldn't pay the price. That's it's own kind of story. A different one than the story Ranger had laid out for her, so Ranger is all pissed and disappointed about it, but notice that Archer isn't.

It's the moment when a mentor loses her power over her student. Win lose or draw, Archer will never be the same again.

Liliet

Yep!!!!

Indrani is there for multiple reasons. She doesn't have to pick the one Hye Su approves of.

Orm Granskau \(@GranskauOrm\)

Surely someone called the Carrion Lord would shy away from doing a whole lot of killing.

Stormblessed

I really hate the Bard.

Sugar Roll

No one likes spoilers and the one who delivers it especially so.

Abrakadabra

It is not the spoilers. Sadism is Just disgusting.

SuitorShooter

The Bard never does anything for no reason. All those jabs and insults were to goad Akua, not because the Bard enjoyed it.

Or, not just because she enjoyed it, maybe.

Abrakadabra

Jabs, eh? I Say emotional torture. And basically unnecessary. What is relevant to her purposes is to reveal Cat's plan.

Shveiran

It was emotional manipulation.

That doesn't make it acceptable (or any more acceptable), but it was not sadism for it had an objective. It is a different thing.

When someone that skilled manipulates you, nothing they say is unnecessary, even if the only achievement is to cloud your judgment for the part that matters.

Abrakadabra

So it is emotional torture 'for a reason'. I kicked the sick dog to make it feel worse, for my own sake. And it even felt good.

kinghaart

What specifically was sadistic here? I saw gloating and very dark humor. Bard has seen Akua do much worse than this to actually innocent people. I don't think anything Bard did to Akua is worse than the things Cat has done.

And the stool thing made me laugh out loud TBH.

jworks17

I feel like by the end of the series, when we finally know about all that the Bard is really about, she's either going to be an extremely compelling character or an extremely disappointing character.

Like why does she refuse to genuinely work with anyone else? Why is every other character just a tool to her, with her being unwilling to accept any plan not her own making? Why doesn't she cooperate with anyone?

How that's answered could make her an awesome character or ruin her character.

Nairne .01

I think she said it in this chapter – "You have to make it count."

And I she isn't the one who saves Celernia then what did her life matter?

Liliet

I mean, tbf, I consider "i am multiple thousand years old and 99.99% of all people I've ever known have died and the 0.01% includes the Dead King and the Forever King who are NOT the people I'd have picked for that" to be a legitimate reason to not be much of a team player. Just, accumulated trauma eventually makes the limb not work, where the limb in this case is the ability to genuinely connect to people.

kinghaart

I think it's also fair to say that the interactions (subservience?) with Above and Below are also pretty likely to have warped her well beyond the point of insanity by now.

Liliet

i mean, 'sanity' is a nebulous concept. i do not think anyone in the cast is currently 'sane' as in 'perfectly neurotypical without any degree of trauma based mental shit'

Cpt. Obvious

Given what we already know she's a tragic character.

We've known for a long time that she's incredibly old, but now we have kind of a timestamp. We also learned that she's not a god, though her powers certainly toes the line. Another thing is that her story as the Intercessor starts with the death of everyone sh loved at the hands of men with weapons. Note that I did not write "Evil men" as the may very well have technically in the service of the gods above.

Somehow these experiences formed the Name she acquired.

Now she's spent millenia using Named to manipulate the stories. We do not know to what degree her Name or Role dictates what she does, but I feel it's pretty safe to guess that at first she was fanning a hate for the invaders who murdered her loved ones.

But once they had been driven back to whatever continent they came from, and she's apparently not able to pursue beyond the borders of Calernia, that hate must have felt empty.

Over the millenia that followed it's likely she's wavered between trying to stomp out evil to nurturing good, within the limits of her Name and Role. But all with very little good to show for it.

Whenever she tried to stomp out evil new evil rose. And just because someone technically belongs to Good doesn't mean the can't be murderous bastards. The situation in Praes is a good example of how Good rulers can trample over scores of corpses of their subjects in order to enrich themselves. And for every truly good ruler there's 50 or more Good rulers who will backstab, cheat and throw away the lives of their subjects if it net them some gains.

To say that the Bard is disillusioned by now is probably the understatement of millenia.

From the first time we learned that she's incredibly old I've thought that she's trying to find a way to truly die. And I'm still pretty sure that's at least partly true. However now I believe that her loss of faith in Good and in humanity's capacity for good has driven her to consider just wiping the slate clean. And there's where that corpse of an angel of Justice comes in.

It's been shown that Justice doesn't do Grey. It only knows black or white. Either you are guilty or you are innocent, and if you're guilty you die. The level of guilt or the severity of the crime is unimportant. If guilty, die!

If she can manipulate the situation so they use Justice trying to stop the Dead King, and she's able to pump up the power (manipulating angels remember?) then she might be able to wipe Calernia clean. Well clean of those Justice finds guilty, which probably is something like 70 – 95 %. Remember Justice isn't choosy and doesn't do mercy.

With any luck Justice will find her guilty and put an end to her existence.

Now I'm not sure what her main driving force is, but I'm guessing it's the hope of finally dying. But even if she doesn't get that then at least she'll have a clean slate to work on.

It's pretty much a Thanos move...

Earl of Purple

My interpretation is that the invaders weren't driven back to where they came from. She said 'they became the Aenians', which is the main ethnic group of the Free Cities, and whilst she could be talking about her own people in that, I'm not sure enough survived to settle elsewhere. The island, however, became Ashur, so I think the invaders were forced off and settled in the area around Helike before spreading into the Aenians of today.

Onos

Awesome stuff. Nice to see little Indrani growing up at last. Hard to believe there's more story after Praes is sorted out!

devildragon777

...Hrm. I guess the theme of this one is in finding a different path than you thought you were going?

I think Indrani's made her first step towards becoming a better person/Name than Ranger. When the time came, she chose not to sacrifice her sister on the altar, and that's not a choice Hye Su would have made.

Poor Cat, though, she's getting betrayed from a bunch of angles
=/

The Pickler decision feels like a boulder going downhill right now, that feels like it'll make a splash and blindsides everyone.

So Yara was Meiezen? That...feels right, actually, she's like the fading remnant of the group that oppressed basically everyone, and still conspires to keep everyone in chains...

Also, a lot of Yara's sentiment towards Akua can be turned right back around on her! Bard is just as unsympathetic and has caused even more damage!

ninegardens

"Also, a lot of Yara's sentiment towards Akua can be turned right back around on her! Bard is just as unsympathetic and has caused even more damage!"

And I suspect that WB knows this full well.

Liliet

Akua recognized the look on her face from having seen it in the mirror.

yeah.

kinghaart

I wonder if this is just Bard's death wish at play. She tried to have Cat kill her as a Hero and that didn't take, so she's now playing the Villain, gloating and all?

Though I still don't know if Bard has just been acting like this to prod Cat etc. towards success, or if she wants the world to burn with her.

Liliet

mood

Apollo

I believe she was actually Baalite since that's who colonized Ashur

Liliet

She was from the people who welcomed, not from the people who invaded.

Also, the Aenians seem to be the people who invaded, and Baalites were later, so yeah. We've never heard of people who were Yara's.

Liliet

I don't think Miezan? I think she was from whichever people lived in AHSUR before BAALITES landed there.

Earl of Purple

That's probably a better take than my first one, where Bard was on the boats. They weren't yet Aenian, and it's the Empress of Aenia that Basilia is going for, so her people survived. At least some of them.

Liliet

Oh no, it was the people on the boats who were Aenian. Bard's from the people who were there BEFORE them.

Earl of Purple

The Miezens were the other side of the continent. And much later, they arrived long after Neshamah's play. The Aenians live in the Free Cities, but they weren't Aenian yet. For one thing, they don't live in Ashur, yet that was where Bard made her first footsteps on Calernia. Her people brought song and gifts, and were met by swords.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think it was the reverse: Bard's people was on Calernia when the not-yet-Ashurans appeared.

greycat

Yes, Bard's people were the natives, and the invaders on the boats came with swords. Bard's people met them with songs and gifts, and... somehow the Bard survived. It's implied that nobody else (or very few others) did.

Estelulu

The men were not yet called Aenian. Presumably the slaughterers were men, from mainland Calernia where the Free Cities now sit. Ashur is an island.

kinghaart

Or were like the Baalites from overseas. Calernia may well be populated by almost entirely non-natives now, with the possible exception of the Riddle Maker.

kaldurak

And now she is a sword.

Estelulu

Sounds like she was indigenous Ashuran, and when her people spotted the ships of the proto-Aenians, they excitedly prepared to welcome them.

The proto-Aenians slaughtered them, but the Bard survived the attack.

Clmineith

It assumes it's the truth rather than yet another lie. I'm not convinced.

Liliet

I get the impression Bard usually tells the truth when she says things about herself – what she likes, dislikes, etc. She revealed a lot about herself to William that was later more or less confirmed true by what else we learned. Her intentions are something she will 100% lie about, but the small details? She tells them with the purpose of manipulation, sure, but that doesn't mean they're not true.

Truth makes as good a hammer as a lie, and less effort to think up.

kinghaart

Have we actually caught her in an outright lie yet (beyond where she's joking and admits it in the same conversation)?

Liliet

i cant remember out of hand unless you count lies by omission which i do for most purposes but not this one

Liliet

Yep.

Zggt

The Bard sure spends an inordinate amount of time gloating and being generally spiteful, which makes her seem above such petty things as "consequences". Seriously, if there is one character here that is repeatedly asking for the literary fate worse than death, it isn't Akua... and I think she knows this (at least on a certain level).

Eris

I wonder... will the Wandering Bard take Akua's place as keeper of the Dead King? It would make sense.. they've been fighting each other for so long, and both of them have committed so many atrocities. It would also make room for the new Age.

Mincheriit

Consider this. Is her role a fitting punishment flr itself? She is somewhat forced to act in certain ways to carry out plans for both above and below. I see this as a 100% mental suicide job eventually. She cant even die, shes been trying to get herself killed too. If she did t have a choice but to keep carrying out these plans or act on behalf of the two forces, she is pretty much guaranteed to end up the warped being she is now, doesnt matter how she started. Part of the job pretty much.

Ok i know i conveyed this wrong but j think someone will get something of what i was trying to say, i was supposed to be asleep 4 hrs ago my brains asleep already.

Liliet

That. Actually makes perfect sense

kinghaart

Yeah I think this is the right call.

I do wonder if maybe early on she and all others were wiped out by the invaders and Above and Below offered her soul the chance to get back at the invaders (ie Calernia) by binding them to cruel fate. And revenge list meaning over time even as the spite and bitterness stayed.

Cicero

I thought she was already suffering a worse fate than death. Isn't that why she keeps hoping she'll die?

ninegardens

... This may be the first moment I feel like I've really seen the Wandering Bard like... completely off her rocker. Derranged. Out of control, talking about her original life (perhaps), just... this line:

>>"I would never dare meddle in the story of another Named, I'm a firm believer in the integrity of..."

>>The Wandering Bard cracked up, laughing until her breath was choked up.

>>"Oh man,"

This is the first time I've looked at the WB and thought "Holy fucking shit, you are losing it. You are the villian. Like, actually the villian. Holy shit this lady is scary."

Maddie's plan is.... making more sense now, but still seems monstrous, and I still don't buy the idea that it was the best plan, as opposed to the plan which best advanced the plot.

The fight with Ranger... just kind of doesn't seem that interesting? We get some good fighting beats, but at the end, everyone is still alive, and the storyline of "ranger tests her apprentices" is still going.

We get Archer foregoing her victory to save Cocky, but... that isn't new. Archer has been a better person for a long while. Which I love her for, but also, feels like the Ranger fight isn't going anywhere (so far).

Apollo

I think she's trying to be a villain and to get herself offed by either cat or akua. In this chapter akua says she wants nothing more than to kill the wandering bard and then the WB is like "do something about it, don't just be someone else's plot puppet"

Gabe Meadow

See, I don't agree with how everyone is assuming the Bard wants to die for good. Everyone is forgetting something important. Kairos Theodosian's Wish aspect allowed him to see what people want, and this is what he said in Interlude: A Hundred Battles about the Intercessor:

"It would shed the chains binding it for a set more pleasing, if you let it." He met the Black Queen's gaze, with his bloody red eye. "Don't let it, Catherine," he said. "It does not deserve this."

That definitely doesn't suggest death to me. Whatever her game is, it's something else entirely. Probably having to do with the fact that she's constantly been interfering or meddling in ways that undermine the Grand Alliance's chances of success, and pushing them towards the use of the ealmaal.

Liliet

I'd argue Bard can want multiple things. You know, Plan A, Plan B, Plan C...

kinghaart

Hm, maybe she WANTS the role Cat envisaged for Akua, but for herself?

john

" I still don't buy the idea that it was the best plan, as opposed to the plan which best advanced the plot. " Plot is literally how the magical physics of this setting work.

Shveiran

The narrative force in the universe and the one driving the book are close but not actually the same thing.

Deworld

A very good notion. The best example of this is Cat: for us, she's the main character, we know that she is bound to succeed at least in some way. But it isn't true in-universe. Every Named is an MC of their own Story, and when those overlap, a ton of outcomes are possible.

shikkarasu

Maddie's plan: I think it's the best plan that anyone has tried thus far. Still atrocious, but he makes a good point that the Dread Empire churns out so many corpses each decade that there are precious few means that cannot justify its end.

Reader in the Night

I think Amadeus' plan might not be the best plan, but it's the best plan someone like him is capable of coming up with... Or at least, that's the narrative he's selling.

I will admit to being disappointed in Amadeus: coldly-calculated destruction has always been his way, but Catherine had challenged him to be a better person, and he seemingly gave up on that challenge...

But I'm not convinced this isn't all according to keikaku. Amadeus has been dropping pearls like "you can't teach a new dog old tricks", and "I am what I am, I'm too old to change" near constantly ever since he's shown up.

But the thing is, he's a storysmith with nearly 50 years of experience under his belt, he KNOWS that the aging mentor with salt-pepper hair admitting that he's seen too much and done too much to fit into the new world they've helped create is basically a death sentence. And he's actively inviting it.

I think he's setting himself up to fail and die here (in a way that still accomplishes his goals and so is almost indistinguishable from winning). I think, like Hakram said, he's going to set up one last gift for Catherine that still forces her to do exactly what he wanted, so it's as much a genuine gift as a manipulation.

ninegardens

The whole ageing mentor thing is a VERY different story for heroic as opposed to villainous characters. They may both be a death sentence, but the "mentor heroic sacrific" vs "oh no, my manipulative mentor/trecherous apprentice has finally betrayed me" is VERRrrrrry different things. And while we all love maddie (except Hakram), he isn't exactly leaning in on the heroic version of the story just now, is he?

Ain't saying your wrong to call it, just saying that, for a heroic mentor, the interpretation is pretty clear ("three days from retirement"). For Amadeus its... murkier.

kinghaart

Thing is, that actually helps here.

By being a monstrous Villain mentor, Amadeus is ensuring that Cat can pivot away from that instead of leaning in.

We know Cat is capable of brutality when she deems it necessary. Seeing Amadeus do the same might be a wake up call of sorts.

Ravenking

Come on! Tenebrous Zombie Mount! How epic is that?

Black is Killing the DreadEmpire with stories! He is moving around and talks to Named like the Wandering Bard! Let him eat that Role!

And Indrani is becoming the better Ranger, one who is part of a band. One who is having a path instead of a pure thrill seeking half goddess. She already grasped one of the Aspects. It's just now about not becoming what you replace.

No damn idea what Akua becomes, but we all knew, it's not the Twilight Guard on the DK. It will surprise us all. Not Dread Empress as Maddie is going to burn the Tower and Ater in Green Flames. And he even destroyed a potential Claimant with Tenebrous.

RoflCat

It's also 8-legged grey(?) mount...

We've got the crows, the missing eye, and now the ride.

What else are we missing to complete her Odin-ness? The last famous story about Odin would be Ragnarok where...oh no.

Darkening

Don't forget the bodyswapping trickster with a grudge against her. Maybe we'll get to see WB tied up in a cave with a snake dripping venom in her eyes.

Abrakadabra

Zombie the ninth?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Dread Emperor Zombie.

jamesc9

Except, unfortunately, that it probably no longer has the legally correct relationship to its soul, and Cat would have to stay around to pilot it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Cat can rule very briefly as Dread Empress Arson the First, change the law to include an exemption for undead spiders, and then abdicate in favor of her faithful steed.

kinghaart

Actually, very good point here that Cat has now killed at least two Dread Emperress Claimants and resurrected them in her service (three if you count Akua). Pattern forming?

Cat also seems to be able to bring back most of a person's identity, I wonder if she might be able to Wrest the undead from the DK once her Name settles. Might at least be a way to give some closure to some of those who lost loved ones in Procer. 😞

Black Spiral Dancer

Impressions:

(1) Interesting behind-the-curtains politics. Cat being blindsided.

(2) Felt that the Ranger fight was dragged, only for that specific moment. However, the story needed to go there, Archer going from 0 to hero without a mid-point would feel even more forced.

(3) Akua and the Bard delivered. Also, Akua is clearly climbing the tower, just like that first Girl who was the FIRST to climb the tower, back then. That's why the Bard said her fate wasn't unique, but might be RARE. Akua will somehow be the FIRST to do... something. So, like the founder of the Tower, she will be the Founder of... something else.

shikkarasu

New song: The Foundling and the Founder

Juff

Typo Thread:

people on half > people in half to took to > it took to most the dead > most of the dead disposed > dispossessed days is > day is gone form > gone from will moving > will be moving should weight > should weigh Huntress blow > Huntress' blow
The leapt > They leapt was living domain > was a living domain was not fighting > was now fighting take an insult > take as an insult that for year. > that for years.
other rest > others way swung > way and he swung then burning > the burning trashed > thrashed longer move. > longer moved.
righting atop at > fighting atop a flashed of > flashes long war > long way its was > it was to I figured > so I figured I'm here you > I'm here so you having ending > having an ending does pisses > does piss Intercessor lying > Intercessor of lying raped a > rapped a preserver > preserve

Benjamin Huang

Broken melody on tired lute,
A garden rotten, stem and root,
A glass of wine and gameboard set,
Sacrifice and madness, gambit met,
To persevere through aeons fair,
And ages past- spun into air,
Puppeteering puppet on broken strings,
Dancing to the tune that madness sings,
Crooked smile and glass of wine,
Knowing not death, nor true life

burnsy

"She was forgetting what the real world was like."

No, Archer. You've been learning what the real world is like. Where people do care for each other, and form emotional, and do things purely for altruistic reasons sometimes. Not the hyper-violent, pseudo-darwinist ego trip that Ranger thinks the world is because she actively enforces it wherever she goes.

God I hope Cat absolutely fucks Ranger up.

Liliet

YOU SAID IT

THANK YOU

Steel and Elaborate Insult

> The truth is, you don't owe shit to Catherine Foundling. What did she lose at the Doom, except for soldiers? It's the foundation of her reign. No, that day gives her no claim on you. It's the people you murdered that you're indebted to, and what the fuck do any of them care about the Black Queen?

this is the core. this is it.

what matters are the victims. the people whom akua murdered. justice is not retribution, and it's not redemption. justice is reparation. and without the victims involved in the process of justice, there can be no reparation. it's not about whether or not akua deserves to be tortured forever. it's about whom the process of her sentence involves.

i really think akua's going to transform the tower. i don't think she's going to die. i think she's going to change – herself, and everything else. it's not going to redeem her. it's not going to torture her. i can't speak to what it is. all i can hope for is that it's going to be what indrani wants, too – it's going to make things better.

time to drag praes kicking and screaming into the century of the fruitbat.

Liliet

Tbf, Cat's idea would kinda have Akua help fix the world. It's not THE best way though :3

Sinead

I also find it interesting because Cat would also agree with that assessment of the Doom, though her priorities would be different.

As you have pointed out before, Cat's pursuit of a long price for her and Akua is her penance to that failure of rule (in her eyes). I'd argue that Malicia and Amadeus were the rulers at the time, but that's not how guilt works.

nimelennar

Wasn't fruitbat /last/ century, though?

john

All the more reason to get it started – and then over with – quickly.

ruduen

From a meta-plot/story perspective, I think there's a possibility for something along these lines. It's kind of interesting to think about what will happen due to the Bard 'spoiling the story' in this manner. The original plan is unlikely now, but unlike some dramatic reveals, the revelation doesn't change the core of the character involved.

That is, Akua may not accept Cat's plan because the 'weight' of that plot was spent – when Cat actually makes the offer, it will lack impact. However, Akua also still wants everything she wanted before – as Cat stated, she's still looking for whatever redemption she's able to find. And though the weight of that revelation is spent, the weight of the character arc still exists.

Now, the tricky part is trying to find out what form that redemption will take now – whether it's something related to the tower, or going in a different direction in terms of plans for the war or the Dead King, or even something related to the Bard now.

I wonder what the options and the choice will be now.

jamesc9

I wonder if there's an option where Alya gets left in the tower, with Amadeus as her warden, and the political centre of gravity of Ater shifts to wherever Akua has been living.

Liliet

Oh man.

First: we actually did get to see both of these conversations I loved it and I 100% did not expect that.

Second: YES HAKRAM NEVER LIKED AMADEUS I KNEW IT. Also love how it's just personal bc of how he used Catherine, fucking best ♥

Third: so Hakram specifically plans to be confrontational with Catherine, huh. Good thing Catherine has already admitted she basically doesn't care who has the Tower so long as it's not Malicia, huh? Nothing he asks should be too arduous for her to concede to.

Fourth: I'M SORRY TENEBROUS WAS/IS HOW BIG. Holy shit. I love this story

Fifth: SOMETHING is definitely happening with Ranger and her kids, and I think I'm liking it. She dug her own grave by treating them like she did, Indrani COULD have killed her there, but what she DIDN'T teach them was her salvation – Indrani's choice. And now that the gloves are off, they get to capitalize on the advantage they have and she doesn't – allies. And it's... Archer might or might not transition into Ranger (kudos to people who called this holy shit yall were right), but Hye will lose and she will remember the loss.

Sixth: never have I wanted to sock a fictional character on the mouth quite so much. Genuinely, not Bard, not Akua in her early smarmier moments, just Ranger here and now. Holy shit. She really does know how to target weak points, and that includes mine apparently, because I want her smeared on the ground – alive, so she'd get to KNOW she lost. To children playing house.

Seventh: I find it interesting where Catherine is in all this – and where she, by inevitable consequence, isn't. What she is doing and what she is leaving to resolve itself. It's... interesting :3

Eighth: I love how Hakram considered killing Amadeus on a yes/no question of whether he's mcfucking lost it like Malicia did. Wonder what the favor is going to be!

Ninth: Akua trying to kill the Bard but stopping half a spell short of actually directly killing herself? Bard taunting her about how suicidal she is? That entire fucking conversation? Akua going for strangulation? Bard remarking how she's learned an actual sense of humor? As horrible as it is glorious, every bit of it.

Tenth: so yeah, Cat's plan would have worked. Akua would have agreed and she knows it. I'm really curious where it's going to go instead.

Eleventh: so let's count up the clusterfuck. Amadeus is confident Akua will refuse the throne. Malicia is confident she will accept and then get immediately killed. Catherine is confident she will accept and then immediately abdicate at her offer. Akua meanwhile is playing the role of the HORSE IN THE HOSPITAL. What's going to happen? ♥

Twelfth: I love how Amadeus is like "I don't fucking know what Cat thinks she's doing with Akua but I know she knows what she's doing" ♥ ♥ ♥

Thirteenth: Hakram's deep skepticism of the cutest father/daughter arc is fucking great. As much as I love it he's not wrong. THEY REALLY HAVE NOT CALLED EACH OTHER THAT TO THE FACE FOR ONE Fourteenth: yeah I also can't believe I haven't run out yet. Anyway BARD BACKSTORY. The peoples the Baalites conquered, it seems! And a little brother...

Fifteenth: special shoutout to her feeling most uncomfortable and awkward in her own body and yeah I think it wasn't stated outright but yeah. It is. I know that, yall know that. It is.

Sixteenth: UNDEAD SPIDER TEN ELVES THREE SISTERS RANGER FIGHT!!! heavy metal blaers in the distance

Liliet

P.S. EIGHTEENTH APPARENTLY: Akua did figure out that Catherine let her go! Or knew from the start. I mean Catherine releasing her from the soul leash and telling her she has her blessing to leave was not super subtle. How and when did the thought come together though I wonder? 😊

Black Spiral Dancer

Shouldn't it be Seventeenth?

Miles

Seventeenth: The hidden knife

Liliet

...I also lost count. Fantastic lmao

Liliet

P.P.S. I... sympathize with the Bard? I want her bullshit with Akua to succeed? I, also, want to see what the horse will do in the hospital? BLASPHEMY, and yet,

Liliet

Like, I legitimately like that she did this, I love the idea, even if Akua just turns back and does what Catherine says it's 100% better than if Bard hadn't interfered here. I even loved the (horrible, awful, don't ever talk to people like this) banter.

Oops?

SpeckofStardust

Wow Liliet you've gone full madness here,
Now my list

1. Utterly wrong about Black reading Akua.

2. Amadeus plan is to make it so that whoever holds the tower doesn't need noble support to keep the city running is the only part we didnt pick up on,

3. Bard is just... its wonderful.

4. Cat misread all of Bards plans

5 Bard plan

a. Die

b. Set up Praes for the next fucking age because that's what Akua + Amadeus plan will get to happen.

c. let Cat win everything she needs while thinking she failed.

Nairne .01

Hmm... that last thing caught me off guard...

Liliet

I mean, that Amadeus wants to make it possible to hold the Tower without noble support is Hakram's conclusion, and it's the conclusion from BEFORE Amadeus tells him he doesn't want DEs anymore (presumably). We didn't pick up on it because our presumption is that Amadeus doesn't want anyone to hold the Tower period, and it has yet to be proven wrong actually.

To be fair, Cat read Bard's plans as Bard presented them to her!

ninegardens

>> "I love how Hakram considered killing Amadeus on a yes/no question of whether he's mcfucking lost it like Malicia did. "

Mostly, as some might have guessed from my comments on the past few chapters, I just really appreciate having a character in story who is calling Amadeus on this- its super cool having the story address the question of "has Maddy gone cray cray", and having that verdict be given by a character who specifically never bought into his legend. Love it. Still not convinced on how Maddy has done things here, or about it making sense in character, but am happy the story is interrogating that, so oh well, close enough.

>>Akua trying to kill the Bard but stopping half a spell short of actually directly killing herself? Bard taunting her about how suicidal she is? That entire fucking conversation?

I was so hoping Akua would get three kills in, pattern of three the bard far way.

And also, I was wrong about something from earlier. In previous chapters I questioned whether Bard could break Akua's momentum. In the sense of "even if Akua here's the plan, she'll still go for it"- and we see that play out perfectly here.

Akua hears Cat's plan... and DOES go for it, accept it, etc etc etc.

But then, the momentum isn't broken or deflected, its just... spent at the wrong moment. Which, for a story, makes all the difference. Very clever, well done EE.

Liliet

YEP. Happy the story is interrogating that about sums it up for me too, for that entire exchange.

As much as I love Amadeus, I do derive a certain mean kind of satisfaction from there being someone who actually knows the stuff he's been doing his whole life AND dislikes him on a personal level, NOT for asshole reasons (ie hes a duni etc).

YES! I loved the momentum thing too. And Akua is just kind of left questioning what she wants to do now that she knows.

THERE'S A HORSE IN A HOSPITAL!

Reader in the Night

> Fifteenth: special shoutout to her feeling most uncomfortable and awkward in her own body and yeah I think it wasn't stated outright but yeah. It is. I know that, yall know that. It is. <

I'm pretty sure she felt uncomfortable because she picked a body similar to Catherine's to appear before Akua, which is why we get a long and loving description of it. Akua just did a Cat by openly perving on her enemies. And then Akua is annoyed and the Bard comments that yeah, it was a bit heavy-handed of her.

Shveiran

Wait, I thought so too, but she is described as “tanned and blue-eyed, and shapely in a lowborn way ”

Cat is brown-eyed, and definitely not shapely. So...

Liliet

Yeah, this isn't Cat-like at all. This is the Yara body Cat saw her in too, and it's most likely her true body.

Liliet

I... no. Bard doesn't pick bodies. We know for a fact she doesn't. She gets a body+name for a storyline until it's over, and she's still Yara.

(The only part of this that's speculation is that storyline specifically is the limit. It's heavily implied and how it's worked so far, but it's technically possible there's another demarcation)

(Another factual limit that's been observed is that she keeps the same body+name from death to death – not teleported-away-at-the-last-moment death, actual death)

Black Spiral Dancer

What's a horse in the hospital Role?! Tried to google it but nothing came up.

Liliet

Black Spiral Dancer

Man, how have I never heard of this guy before?! He's a genius!

Yunamed

I love what Bard did for Akua, gave her a choice. No one seems to have any sympathy for her...just a pawn in other people's plans...I want her to choose to do good and not have it crammed down her throat.

Black Spiral Dancer

Actually, I want just her to choose. Choose evil, as long as it is her own choice, is still something to be proud of.

Liliet

TBF, she's been choosing it fully voluntarily and also to spite everyone else present (except for Nim, Nim is cool) ever since her arrival to Ater. Cat let her go for a reason (this reason).

kinghaart

Not for me. Her choices can't be her own because she has to bear the Doom. She can't run from it. Maybe you can call it choosing it herself but the reality is that with her personality and intelligence the only viable thing she can do is go and figure how to rebuild what she destroyed.

That itself can never really be done, but she must keep doing it anyway.

Heriaks

Thanks for the chapter.

Cat has a new MEGA zombie ! The war campaign against Praes is not without rewards

Shveiran

I mean, she cannot bring it north, but still... it's god damn cool.

Liliet

Can't she though???? Can't she really???

Who's going to tell her not to

Shveiran

Common sense? Paranoia? An Amadeus-shaped devil on her shoulder?

It's an undead eldritch abomination the size of a fortress, you just don't bring that shit close to Keter.

Liliet

Their current plan includes MULTIPLE ways of making DK lose control over his undead.

Also, Zombie III was fine.

letouriste

Gods, Yara mocking Akua feelings in that particular way was REALLY excruciating. I didn't feel that particular "mean" way since...high school i think.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

It was gloriously uncomfortable, wasn't it?

Nairne .01

I agree.

kinghaart

To be fair, Akua's feelings for Cat are very Stockholm-Syndrome-y and mocking them kind of serves to point that out in a less direct way (whereas saying it directly would probably just have been met with denial, this way it will dig at Akua and she will Doubt).

Sugar Roll

I never liked downsizing but after seeing how it's done in Praes, I guess what I've seen isn't too bad.

Frivolous

I had this great idea for a commercial that would work only in Calernia:

Cast: Person A and Person B, and maybe some others to serve as contrast. Person A wears the product.

Action:

Person A turns around and Person B stares at Person A's shapely muscular ass and announces, "I'd like to tap THOSE ass-pecs."

Person A looks over their shoulder at Person B and smiles invitingly.

Then a close-up of the shapely muscular ass clad in denim showing the brand's name and/or logo, and a disembodied voice says, "Ranger Jeans. Rejoice, for you qualify."

What do you all think?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hello yes I'll buy 20 pairs.

Abrakadabra

That is working.

nimelennar

> "Because I do not intend to be Dread Emperor," the pale man calmly said.

Note that, as he's said he wants to end Praes as a Dread Empire, he's explicitly not saying that he doesn't intend to rule Praes.

Liliet

Fun, isn't it~

Cold Cyberia

I hope Malicia opens up a shoe shop as part of her abdication. Wouldn't feel right otherwise.

Deworld

Nah. She isn't smart enough for that.

nimelennar

I think she's gone slightly beyond being an Irritant at this point, though.

Shveiran

Also, I think that only works if you ARE an Irritant.

Not if your shtick is, like, manipulating world politics and the fate of kingdoms.

I can see heroes falling for that... not world leaders, though, you know what I mean?

nimelennar

Yeah, I agree. If you perform a few raids across the border into Callow, steal a few sheep, empty a few granaries, but refrain from burning too much down, then the Hero who leads an army might accept the whole abdication deal. If you slaughter armies, occupy Laure and declare Callow to be part of Praes, then when the Exiled Prince comes back to reclaim his throne, he's probably not going to be inclined to be so lenient towards you for being atop the tower when the conquest happened.

kinghaart

Shame she doesn't have a Chancellor handy to hand the scepter to.

sidehammer056302

Wow, I didn't think I could hate the Intercessor anymore than I already did. Poor Akua.

And the Lady, I'm not much of a fan of her's either. Poor Indrani.

And if what is happening is what I think it is, I'm pretty mad at Hakram, too. It was heartbreaking already that he and Cat seemed to really have fallen out, but to think he's willing to play some political game against her, after all they've been through together. No one has ever been closer to her heart, none of the lovers, not her Father, not even the Sisters, Cat's life really is a tragedy. Her refuges of light and warmth are winking out one after the other; if this goes on, I don't see her outliving the war on the Dead King. She's lost Callow to Vivian, Zombie to the Dead King, Hakram to pride, Akua to principal, her Father to ambition; all she has left now is Indrani, Vivian and Masego, and all three of their hearts belong to others, if Indrani doesn't manage to get herself killed protecting her foster-sisters. 😞

Xinci

Bard told her that love always fucks you over. She wasn't exactly wrong. All connections may lead to conflict of interest in time, one way or another.

Zach

But Cat is the one who is essentially ambivalent about Hakram's people. As much as Hakram loves her, he realized that she will never care about the Orcs in the same way she does her own people (and that he needed to step up and become Warlord to do what was best for them).

Catherine had basically ended up with a mindset where she was just thinking of the different peoples of Praes as "game pieces" towards accomplishing her broader goals (namely defeating the Dead King and later passing the Accords). Hakram and Pickler are both highlighting this and represent paths where Catherine isn't unilaterally making all these monumental decisions for entire races (and I have a feeling that the same is true for the humans of Praes re: Amadeus's plan).

Catherine is ended up in conflict with these people because she had taken it upon herself to decide the fates of all these large groups of people (understandably give the stakes, mind you).

Shveiran

I wouldn't go that far, personally. Ultimately, Cat wants to push the Accords precisely to protect and help all these people, orcs and Taghreb and goblins and Sonike and Duni included. It's just that when you are working toward something this large and this game-changing, there is a lot of compromises and even more long-term perspective needed.

It can be rather hard to see what good this does for, say, the orcs in particular, right now; and so on.

Cat is looking out for the continent, Hakram is looking out for the orcs.

And, like, there is nothing wrong with either, really. They are not even opposed.

But they are not the same thing, and Hakram can't actually throw his full weight behind Catherine because he was the Adjutant until yesterday: if he does, and everyone is given reason to assume that he is just an extension of the Black Queen, there would be consequences.

Either he would stop being the Warlord altogether, or no one would take the orcs seriously.

Liliet

I mean, Hakram's dynamic with Cat as her Adjutant was getting increasingly toxic over time for the last several books. They were a perfect match in books 2 and 3 when Cat was leading an army, but ever since Cat started leading a nation... an Adjutant just stopped being what she needed. But they both kept playing the role, awkwardly fitting themselves into the confines and pretending Hakram wasn't much more than that and at the same time more distant than that.

Like, one of Catherine's two spymasters competing with her new personal guard over who gets to fetch her her cloak? That's really a sign that something has gone wrong.

This is better. Sure, they're going to miss each other, but they'd kind of already been spending a lot of time apart BECAUSE HAKRAM'S EXPERTISE WENT FAR BEYOND BEING CATHERINE'S PERSONAL SHADOW.

This is actually genuinely better for both of them, and in the long run I suspect Catherine is going to appreciate having an orc leader who knows what she's doing and agrees with her most important long-term goals very much.

And they will continue to be friends. Of that, I'm certain.

sidehammer056302

I agree with your account of the political situation, a Warlord is by far more powerful than an Adjutant and will likely prove beneficial in the unification of the continent, but to be honest, I care more about Cat's well being than the continent's. The more isolated she is, the more likely she does something drastic near the end. I don't want to see her martyr herself because she has nothing left. I don't want people thinking back on her fondly or bitterly, marveling at the world she created. I want her to build her city and rule it like the stone cold magical badass she is, ensuring its success not just because it was a good idea and her followers made it happen in her honor, but because she grabbed it by its neck and beat it into submission.

I'm being a bit dramatic, but I feel a sacrifice plot looming, and I'd rather Cat get to have a happy ending. If this really is the final book in the series, I'd rather it being spitting in the eye of the gods and narrative convention than succumbing to the fate of a tragic hero.

Liliet

Honestly mood.

I do however genuinely think that FOR THEIR RELATIONSHIP, FOR THEIR FRIENDSHIP it's much better that Hakram be her equal as another ruler than whatever THAT had been. Seriously, it was rotting.

Steven Silver

Malicia thinks Cat will kill Akua if Akua takes the Tower. Amadeus thinks Akua will refuse the tower outright. So, from this, we can deduce one thing: none of that's happening 🤪

dadycool

Akua: "Cat, I'm taking this tower and taking up the arduous and painful task of reforming Praes for the better. Sorry I can't be the seal, but I'm not ready to rest yet."

Cat: "K. Can you send the stuff I need back west?"

Akua: "Sure. Scribe, make it happen."

Basically everyone else everywhere: confused screaming

Regret

I think that will become more and more the plan, until in a final twist Amadeus is assassinated and then Cat and Malicia burn the entire city down to ash looking for the culprits, effectively achieving Amadeus's goal. In addition to the current blow to the reputation of the High Seats, the Nobles are all killed as well. Their armies unconditionally surrender to Cat via The Princess for protection against Malicia (who is even more angrily unhinged), giving Cat the diabolists she needs to take out the army of the dead. Since she has almost nothing left to live for, she becomes the seal that holds that undead bastard locked up.

Akua dies saving a part of the civilian population by using all the surrounding death to turn a neighbourhood into an improvised flying fortress that moves away to an abandoned edge of Praes, starting a religion amongst those civilians which of course has zero overlap with her own morals.

Liliet

Amadeus ""is assassinated""

Liliet

HOLD THE FUCK UP

> "I remember when the first boat touched the beach," the other woman said. "The sound their boots made on the wet rocks, the way my little brother kept tugging at my tunic in excitement. It wasn't called Ashur, would not be for many years. The men were not yet called Aenian."

IT WASNT BAALITES

IT WASNT MIEZANS

IT WAS THE ARRIVAL OF THE CURRENT DOMINANT ETHNICITY OF THE FREE CITIES

THAT is how far back the rabbit hole goes

Adrian_V

Yeah i was trying to figure it out too, do you have a cronology of ancient events lying around? xD

Liliet

Not me, but people have it!

This is the first we're hearing of THESE events though. We do know Aenians are the (current) people of the Free Cities. Otherwise, this is just me parsing the text as presented.

kinghaart

So, does Bard actually have it out for Basillia and the Free Cities? Consolidating them so that she can somehow use the Praes and/or Procer situation to end them?

Could all this stuff with Cat and Akua just be misdirection?

Liliet

I... genuinely don't think that's her motivation, no.

Xinci

Hakram's goal is quite precipitous, as he must balance the two differing groups and indeed, two differing realms(of steppe orcs and "town" orcs) while avoiding the already solidifying cracks that would allow a unified enemy leader to enact a divide and conquer strategy on them down the line. The orcs have to be sustained with a steady flow of conflict and food, and a smaller sustainable solidified Ater with semi-independent holdings of Praesi around it actually work quite well for this. As it allows select trade deals for resources from each holding, with the orcs own standing being fairly secure in comparison. The territory taken can be a nexus point for these trade routes in Praes while also connecting to the routes of trade and herd migration in the steppes. Which aids mitigating an eventual split due to cultural drift between the sedentary and nomadic groups of the clans. Given he is going for a mercenary style their trade in orcpower can be used to further align cultural imperatives for the orcs while also bringing back food and resources to the clans, but it still all relies on Praes being in a state a independent troupe of mercenaries is seen as useful rather than a threat to be used as a unifying sharpening stone for the Praesi.

Idrani wanting to be the Ranger makes sense, though given she didnt take that first step, I am curious if she and her sisters will manage to make a Band as she goes on a different route to becoming so. Teamwork did aid them in ways that Ranger couldnt quite get around at times.

Rangers comments very much echo the whole "you painted with too much black", since other elements could have aided them growing further.

Also, Ranger seemed to show that elf-killing tactics rely on being able to sense the "displacement" they have when they decide to not be affected by a rule, which fits given a elf was training her how to do it and her own senses are those of a elf. May or may not have also been touching on the concepts they were affecting to disrupt them and then go for a killing blow. They are akin to living domains, so its entirely possible, given she can touch concepts.

Relatedly, a domain not being internal causing a cascade seems rather logical given things like Skeins cage. A domain is just a set of rules on what reality currently is, so when they run into other rules that all interact it eventually causes a huge chain of cause and effect. I do wonder then how Sve will react to that Tenebrous's, looks like she will probably claim it by the end of this? Also logically under this parts of a soul are "internal" due to having a more stable set of rules for itself? So a domain could go around so long as its inside of a soul?

Also, guess that does indeed mean that, that early reference Bard made about her deal was likely for vengeance.

Nairne .01

Actually, isn't she a half-fae not half-elf?

Shveiran

No, her father was a human captain from a different continent and the mother was an elf.

Her “mudblood” status appears to be a good chunk of the reason why the “good” racist elves come after her, give or take a few centuries of mutual harassment.

Miles

Iirc elves are a type of fae.
Mentioned back in ch 1 or 2 or something.

Liliet

No. No, they are not.

Mental Mouse

Actually, that darkness was acting a lot like Night already.
And Night is among other things a domain of sorts.

kinghaart

Maybe Indrani and Alexis and Cocky gain a shared name by defeating Hye and become the... Power Rangers?

Sinead

While I love this chapter, I am left wondering if ‘Cat takes the crown of Twilight’ is going to be how Cat breaks this knot.

The value in what Cat championed is in the idea of institutions over individuals, and too many other people want that to succeed. She has arguably put herself in a position that means her planned obsolescence of her Role is inevitable.

The impression I have is that Hakram and Akua are the only ones who know the full plan. And Cat a) has very limited options on who could be a seal. and b) only two of them are acceptable to her (Akua and herself).

Alex

The Warden of the East would make an excellent jailer for the greatest evil on the continent.

nimelennar

Isn't Keter in the West, though?

If so, would it be Cordelia jailing him, or Hanno?

Xinci

The East is symbolic of all of those old horrors of Evil. The invading horde, the sealed demons, the dragons coming in to burn etc. To be Warden of the East is to be the warden of Evil. Just as the West is the Good Kingdom, defending by a shining royalty, White Knights, heroic defenders against the rapacious hordes. Its more conceptual than topographical.

Steven Silver

I saw a map of Calernia once. A long time ago >_> Ater is like, the Eastmost part of the continent. Callow's to the West, then Procer is west of that and a little North. Procer is big so it kind of wraps around Callow. The Dead Kingdom is North of Procer, though.

Shveiran

I agree. But becoming the warden of Keter seems like an all-time job.

Like, I don't think you can do that and still have a Name that's not Jailer of the Dead, or something like that.

I mean, it's like Rocky becoming a trainer, right? You know he can teach you to punch things right because he was the champ. You know he is qualified.

But he becomes a trainer after stopping being a champion. He doesn't do BOTH.

I can't really see Cat being WotE and also going "By the by, I also keep the greatest evil of the continent sealed up. No biggie."

Soronel Haetir

I would almost rather WB get stuck as DK's Twilight jailer. Akua us – yes –, terrible, but WB has her beat by entire boat-loads of bodies. Akua, on the other hand, could still be useful out in Creation.

I do not, however, believe that Cat's plan was ever anything like kill Akua after Akua becomes Dread Empress. Malicia's death is simply too central too all of Cat's plans, abdication may once have been acceptable but I do not believe so any longer.

kinghaart

Ooooo I wonder if Akua will run into one of the Emerald Swords who will ask why Bard spared her to cause the Folly.

That actually DOES make all of Bard's statements about choice a load of BS because Bard had chose to stop Liesse from happening.

Though a counter argument is that maybe the Emerald Swords really just wanted to get at the Deoraithe spirits in an even more destructive way, so maybe that would have been a terrible outcome too. But we only have circumstantial evidence to suggest that.

Adrian_V

Me reading Tenebrus died: "Ñ000000000000"

Me later reading Cat's intervention and the raising of the giant Spider: "Hell yes, bring the rock'n'roll music baby!!!"

Seriously i loved that, it is a awesome weapon to have around and it was a former emperor turned monster but i bet the sister regained a lot of night with that move, that domain thing it had was intriguing.

"You're mostly a person these days, it's kind of fucked up you managed that"

As good a description of Akua's whole plot int the story as any, and between Amadeus and the Barb interferences we have no idea how it all will turn out, we still don't even know if Cat is going to help Pickler yet or is undecided.

kinghaart

Cat supports all three, leading the Matrons to duke it out in Foramen while the rest of the Goblins move to Callow.

nick012000

Now that the Bard's spoiled Cat's plan, I'm half expecting Akua to be like "Sorry, Cat, that sounds lovely and restful, but I don't have any time to rest because I've got too much self-flagellating atonement to do" – and unlike what Amadeus or Alaya think, I think that Cat would be totally fine with that.

dadycool

Wow, the Woe are graduating in their own ways. Adjutant, now Warlord, is growing into the name and learning what it really means, Archer is beginning to take the Final Exam of Refuge Academy, and Akua is about to make her own decision for the first time. It's interesting to see that they're all growing alongside Cat, not getting left behind in any way. The only one we haven't seen start to grow is Masego, but he's already basically at the top. Without getting new magic, there's not anything I can see him evolving into.

kinghaart

Maybe he can get the Gift back somehow?

Though I think Masego's arc is with Neshamah, who forced him to kill Indrani. Masego may learn more about the trick of perspective which makes us Above and Below too.

Frivolous

This chapter is very complicated for me, but I think I'm ready to comment now.

First, the plan Amadeus told Arthur Foundling is very different from the one he told Hakram. No mention of Stories in this chapter, just of economics and politics. Why?

Is he lying to Hakram, or just giving incomplete information?

Second, Amadeus claims that Malicia believes Akua will climb the Tower, and then Catherine will murder her. Is this the essence of the story about the wedding (but really a funeral) that the Bard told Malicia in Interlude: East III?

We all know that the Intercessor is a lying liar who lies, but if the plan she told Malicia was a lie, then what is her real plan?

I wonder if the Intercessor is uncomfortable with her body (according to Akua's observation above) because this incarnation is right after Catherine killed her in the Arsenal.

Still don't know what the hell Intercessor was doing talking to Akua. What was the point?

And why not talk to anyone else? Amadeus, Hakram, etc. all left alone. Was it just because Akua was the lowest hanging fruit?

Black Spiral Dancer

What do you mean? Read the other comments, it's simple to see why talk to Akua: to fuck up Cat's plan by making it get spent earlier at the wrong moment.

Now, if you mean HOW that fits with her whole bard-plan and catherine-death plan, well like we would know THAT.

Frivolous

My problem with the Intercessor attacking Akua at this time is that it's so trivial.

Akua is supposed to be the gaoler of Neshamah in the Twilight Ways, and this scotches that. Fine. But that presupposes that the Grand Alliance win the war against Keter and defeat Neshamah.

Until then, Catherine's choice of dooms for Akua doesn't matter.

The Intercessor can be anywhere she needs to be, but even she can't be in two places at once. So why is she wasting time on Akua? That is what bugs me.. She could have been distracting Catherine, distracting Indrani, distracting Amadeus, distracting Hakram.

If I didn't know better, I'd say that the Intercessor has given up. She's wasting time with Akua because she's already lost, and since she can't prevent Catherine from succeeding, she's just being petty and vengeful by screwing with Akua.

ABadIDea

Because she wants to force the Angel Corpse to be used for whatever reason. Without an Eternal Jailer, Quartered Seasons isn't a permanent solution just a stop gap. Removing Akua removes Catherine's eternal jailer, and leaves Hasenbach's angel bomb as the only option. Or at least the only viable option for Hasenbach in a reasonable time frame which means Cordelia WILL use it.

If Cordelia and Catherine fight over whether or not to use it, well that's just a bonus.

Frivolous

ABadIDea: I'm pretty sure that's not logical.

The reason Cordelis is contemplating using the ealamal is because of Keter's armies, which are all undead.

Giving Neshie the crown of Autumn takes away Neshamah's control of the undead. Once the undead stop marching, Cordelia's desperation evaporates.

The eternal jailer part is just a coda. And anyway they can always get an eternal jailer later.

ninegardens

Hell, you don't even NEED an eternal jailer. Just form an order of monks or something- IDK. Shouldn't be too hard.

At the very least, put someone as temporary jailer and then figure the rest out in time.

Not. Too. Difficult.

(once you've got the dead king defeated and shove him in a can, that is)

Miles

Not lik Cat's ever gonna die anyway. All she needs to do is pick up an Evil Role every couple years to reverse her age a bit and then be defeated in a way that lets her give up the powers to escape alive. Easy. She's done it like 5 times already.

jamesc9

I think that I recognise this plan.

I wonder what happens when the Gods Below notice it and develop a sense of humour.

Shveiran

Yeah. I mean, once he doesn't have an endless army of undead monstrosities and access to millennia of ritual arrays in Keter proper, he is just one powerful entity.

Not nearly as much of a threat, even if he was invulnerable to everything and anything and pooped nukes.

Black Spiral Dancer

Well, you DO know that Amadeus and the Warlord would kill her 3x if she got anywhere near, right? Just like Akua tried to do, but couldn't. So there it is: it was the only named she could screw up with and not get 3x killed.

beleester

I think his answer to Hakram was the more truthful one – a recurring theme in this story is that “great forces” like politics and economics matter more than the individuals acting in them. The reason the Dread Empire tries to conquer Callow isn't just because that's a classic story, it's because the Empire will starve without Callowan grain. The story that he told Arthur is just the means to that end – something big enough to change those forces for good.

I think Amadeus's take on Malicia's plan is mostly accurate – that sort of “I win by making everyone else lose more” scheme is her trademark. But I think the Bard's plan is to build off the story it creates – everyone coming together in one place to make their demands, forcing Catherine to play the role of arbiter/warden/whatever her Name will be. And once she comes into her name, she's vulnerable in some way? Still not sure where it goes after that.

Frivolous

beleester: Interesting answer. I hadn't expected that.

Other commenters have in the past responded about how only Amadeus' ability to craft a good Story matters, rather than his ability to attend to a large number of tactical, strategic, and logistical details.

Your idea about what the Bard's plan is makes sense. Thank you. I'd been wondering what Malicia's invitations to everyone of note were about.

My own opinion is that the Bard might hope to fool Catherine into taking up the Role of warden for the political East, rather than the Story East, but that the scheme will fail because Catherine is mostly indifferent as to who rules Praes. She's too canny, and she just wants a lot of diabolists.

In other news, I think Hakram is foolish to be so insecure about Catherine's love for him. I'm increasingly hopeful that Catherine to some extent anticipated all his moves.

She may even have intended for him to become Warlord, because she knows how he likes to fix things, and the orcs' relationship with the rest of Praes and with Calernia could not be fixed by anyone but the Warlord.

Liliet

Honestly yeah I'll be surprised if Hakram the Wardlord was not an outcome Catherine had considered.

Liliet

He hasn't actually told Hakram the whole of his plan yet, the actual bargain/plan is left offscreen.

And he had no reason to tell Arthur the economic implications. Arthur wouldn't understand/care, and Cat can figure it out on her own.

Frivolous

I think that translates as the Intercessor has given up.

She can't talk to anyone without eliciting attacks that banish her, so she wastes her time and actions with Akua.

Theoretically the Intercessor should be acting in a way that helps her regain some credibility with the heroes and villains of the Truce and Terms, or that advances her aims. Being mean to Akua doesn't do any of that.

Frivolous

In other news: I wonder how smooth a ride is the Dread Conveyance Tenebrous.

I can envision Tenebrous becoming a fashionable travel method. But only if the ride is smooth.

If the ride isn't smooth, Tenebrous can still haul freight.

beleester

I still can't figure out what Amadeus's goal is. He's all but said that he wants to destroy the Tower and its institutions, but I don't think he simply wants to split Praes into its component parts. That wouldn't end well for anyone – it would either turn into civil war or get carved up by the Grand Alliance the moment the war is over. So how do you hold Praes together without the Tower? Move the capital somewhere else?

Also, I note that he's made very different pitches to Arthur and to Hakram. To Arthur he basically said "Here's how I'm destroying Praes's national identity, army, and leadership in one fell swoop", but with Hakram he's taking a more measured view – "We know there are three main problems with Praes. I solved one by blowing up Ater. Now we need to solve the other two, or the Dread Empire will turn on you like it always does." Neither Hakram nor Amadeus seem to believe that Praes is as crippled as he made it sound to Arthur.

(Amadeus's original plan was not to destroy the Empire, but to make it so secure that the Emperor no longer needs to wage pointless wars to keep his position. I suspect his goal still involves some sort of independent central authority in Praes, just one that's not tied to the Tower and its accompanying love of stupid evil schemes.)

Liliet

"That's the Dread Empire"

"What else is there?"

Amadeus very much implied the destruction of the story to Hakram.

Someperson

Even odds the endgame with guarding Neshamah in the Twilight Ways is just a straight up lie that Catherine told Just to screw with the Bard. Yara of Nowhere isn't omniscient, I have to wonder where she learned the specifics of a plan Catherine only seemed to have uttered once and to a limited audience...

Liliet

I imagine she talked about it more with Hakram.

And she didn't actually explain it to Masego. The explanation was internal monologue, audience-only.

And yall are forgetting that Yara of Nowhere sees stories, all the stories, all the time. Not stories being told, stories happening and about to happen. What Catherine was doing with Akua was a story whether anyone knew about it or not, so Yara knew. Catherine herself could have been ignorant of what she was doing, and Yara'd still know.

Someperson

Sure, but the outcome of Akua shoved into the Twilight Ways with Neshamah to create a Sealed Evil in a Duel is just... Pretty specific.

It doesn't honestly take an immortal dedicated to understanding stories to figure out that Catherine is preparing Akua for some sort of sacrifice for the greater good, or even that it would be a long price and not a quick sacrificial death at a critical moment, but stories have some points of flexibility. Seeing the shape of a story doesn't necessarily fill in all of the details. The bard acknowledged that there were many ways Akua's story could end but professed specific knowledge of what Catherine was planning.

Sure, maybe the Bard is just that good. But I have my doubts.

Liliet

I don't think it's about her being good. It's that Catherine having that plan in mind made it so this was the story that was happening: Catherine was grooming Akua for that role. That was a fact. Bard gets to know that sort of fact.

SuitorShooter

Literally anything: Dies

Catherine: It's free real estate.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The best part is that this also applies to Catherine herself, as you know.

Frivolous

While we're waiting for the extra-special extra-long next chapter:

Just now and belatedly realized that Amadeus's plan all along had to do with the orcs. I feel stupid for taking so long to see it.

It was Amadeus and Ranger who caused the Emerald Swords to attack and depopulate the fortress of Chagoro, which in turn led to the Horde invading Praes.

It was Amadeus who all along was conspiring with Grem One-Eye, who is an orc and a genius.

I think Amadeus always intended to speak to the High Lord of the Steppes and/or the Warlord who came as the leader of the Horde. If not Hakram, then Troke.

Whatever Amadeus's plan it, it needs the Horde as a vehicle or instrument.

The good news, from my point of view at least, is that Catherine knows at least some of this. She was the one who deduced that it was the Emerald Swords who killed every soldier at Chagoro.

She might therefore have been able to anticipate Amadeus's moves.

Also, I wonder where Grem One-Eye is. Still in his house under arrest, or has he gotten loose by now?

Liliet

I mean, his house with a bunch of guard is probably the safest, comfiest and coziest place for him to be rn. Gives him a front row view, too.

Hakram's Dead Hand

What a great chapter. I love the Ranger Sub-plot. It has some really cool action scenes, like them fighting on top of Tenebrous. I also love the reminders that Indrani is still incredibly intelligent, and it's nice to finally see her discover more about herself. It's just right that Ranger's apprentice does this by fighting.

kinghaart

Yeah I liked the little segue into magical theorumms in the midst of a battle.

Interlude: A Girl Without A Name

"Fate is a stone made up of your every deed and hung around your neck. If it breaks your back, there is only one soul to blame."

– Queen Eleanor Fairfax, founder of the Fairfax dynasty

Sitting on the edge of a rooftop, looking down at the long stairs of stone, the Wandering Bard began to tune her lute. This, she knew, was to be the place.

–

Ater was still as a grave.

Vivienne had last seen a city so injured in the wake of First Liesse, as she ghosted through the fallen city avoiding the Fifteenth's goblin hunters, but the tone of the streets was different here. In Liesse the people had been happy in a bittersweet way, for though the rebellion named after their city had died within its walls the people had been spared a dark fate at the hands of a horde of devils. Here there was no joy, the Princess thought. Ater was huddling in its houses, averting its eyes even as the last ashes of the Battle of the Spiders began to cool. But underneath that fear, Vivienne thought, there was anger. Furious, desperate anger.

The High Seats had massacred thousands to contain the spiders, and while there were many who'd argued much worse would have happened if they hadn't the opinion was not popular. Not when everyone had a cousin or a daughter or a husband who'd seen the household troops of the great nobles retreat to their barricades in good order and leave the rest of the city to burn. Reports had come overnight from the Princess' agents that it was Malicia that was being blamed for the spiders themselves, seen as some kind of desperate attempt to destroy the capital's current favourite: Lady Akua Sahelian.

The Empress in the City, they called her.

There had been no riots since the end of the battle, no mob had taken to the streets as the Legions moved to clear out the last of the giant spiders and seal the openings, but the anger and fear hung in the air like poison. The stalemate in eastern Ater behind the horde of orcs that'd seized the city and the noble armies that'd entered it illegally kept the people behind closed doors, afraid of another battle erupting, but it wouldn't last. Like all leashed monsters, it would shake its way loose eventually. Someone was going to pay for the Battle of the Spiders, but the part worrying Vivienne Dartwick was that she wasn't sure who.

"Gods," the Squire muttered. "The city looks empty. Not a stray cat out in the streets."

"Assuming there are any left, after the spiders," Vivienne drily said.

It was not yet dusk, but on the horizon the sun was dipping low. They would make good time, she thought, as their party had yet to even be hailed as it passed through the ash-strewn streets of the city. Not that many would dare make demands of the force the Princess was leading into Ater: only twenty knights of the Order of the Stolen Crown rode with her, but a cohort of legionaries from the once-Thirteenth marched behind them. Wind picked up suddenly in the distance, making strands of some sort of iridescent cloth spin under the sunlight, and half her men reached for their swords. They had come invited, but most her soldiers were Callowan: no one here put much stock in the Tower's word.

Arthur Foundling grimaced at her answer, soft-hearted boy that he still was. Catherine had been adamant that he come with her even though Vivienne would have much preferred Indrani as an escort, but the Princess understood why. The pattern of three between him and the Black Knight was a tool that would be very precisely used so the day could be brought to the right ending.

"The Carrion Lord is a monster," the Squire cursed.

Vivienne cocked an eyebrow.

"Water is wet," she answered.

The young man had the grace to look somewhat embarrassed. He had an expressive face, young Arthur. That was for the best. Vivienne preferred knowing where she stood with him: the heroes that were most controlled, like the Pilgrim and the White Knight, tended to be dangerous and unpredictable. That expressive face flickered through hesitation, then the steel of determination.

"Did she know, Your Grace?" the Squire asked.

Vivienne kept her eyes from glancing at the broken districts they had left behind her. Ravaged by devils and demons and monsters of all stripes. Did the Black Queen know her teacher was going to do to this? Did she allow him to consign thousands of innocents to death for some mad plan? The Princess met his eyes squarely.

"No."

The dark-haired squire looked guiltily relieved and Vivienne was again reminded of how young he was. Young enough he'd not thought to ask the right question. Would Catherine have intervened, if she knew? Vivienne was not sure, and the thought worried at her.

There had been a time where her friend would have executed someone guilty of something like the Battle of the Spiders without a second thought. Cut their head off where they stood. But that'd been before the Everdark, before the war on Keter and the dark choices it had demanded of them all. Catherine sacrificed people more easily than she once had, and it did not eat away at her so much afterwards.

It was something she'd had to learn to keep them all alive, Vivienne reminded herself.

And yet the Princess could not shake the thought. This entire campaign, beginning with the attack on Wolof and then moving through the bruising battle at Kala and now this bloody wrestling match over Ater, it felt... different. It was not being waged like older campaigns. Lives were being sacrificed for Named victories, for schemes that used the very currents of Creation, and there'd been a time where Catherine had balked at such things. If the way she'd been going about it had reminded Vivienne of the Black Knight or Tariq Fleetfoot she would have set the worry aside, but it wasn't either of those men that came to mind sometimes.

Vivienne Dartwick was one of the few people alive to have been in a band of five with the Wandering Bard, and dreaded that sometimes she saw glimpses of one woman in the other.

"Thank the Gods," Arthur Foundling murmured. "That would have been difficult."

An understatement. The boy cheered up soon enough, fears alleviated for now. Lucky him.

"So how did was our invitation secured, anyhow?" the Squire asked. "I'd heard that Dread Empress Malicia wanted the Grand Alliance nowhere near her court."

And there was the counterargument to Vivienne's fears, brought out by the same young man who'd raised them. She slowed the gait of her horse and flicked a glance behind them. Arthur followed her gaze, both of them taking in the massive shape of the great undead spider that loomed over the eastern walls.

"I asked her why she chose to raise Tenebrous," the Princess said. "It seemed wasteful and slow, if she only intended to fight Ranger. But it was never about that fight – she was forcing Malicia's hand."

Arthur looked surprised.

"The Empress is hiding in the Tower," he said. "I doubt a simple undead monster is enough to topple that abomination."

"Malicia herself is out of reach," Vivienne agreed, "but what about everyone else she invited?"

That'd been the unspoken threat. If the Grand Alliance were not invited, it would have to knock. And maybe the empress could ride out that storm, but all the other guests had assets that mattered to them in the city. Would they stay and humour Malicia at court while their armies and kin were being trampled? And so Catherine had raised a city-sized spider so that she could then refrain from using it, still getting exactly what she'd wanted all along. That was the answer to Vivienne's every fear, every worry about her friend and queen growing harsher and more ruthless by the years. She was all those things, yes.

And it worked.

The Princess breathed out, spurring her mount into a trot. It would have to be enough. After the war there would be time to learn kindness again. For all of them, not only Catherine. Until then, she would silence her doubts. And continue to carry into the heart of Praes the two deaths she had been charged to bring, one hidden and one due.

"Let's hurry up," Vivienne Dartwick said, looking up at the looming shape of the Tower to the east. "It begins at dusk, and it would not do to be late."

—

Dusk was coming and with it the end of Alaya's reign.

The Dread Empress of Praes leaned against the balcony, watching night crawl over her capital. There was no wind here, enchantments prevented it, but high above the perennial storm clouds that haunted the Tower's heights were roiling. Five years ago she'd been the law of this land: her enemies had been broken, her influence spread to every nook and cranny of the empire. How quickly it had all gone wrong. Now she struggled to find the decision that had begun it all. Letting Akua Sahelian loose to build her weapon instead of having her decapitated head tossed into the Hall of Screams, maybe. Yet the thought was cowardice, the avoidance of a less pleasant truth.

There was no 'one decision' to point at because she'd been losing her grasp for years.

Alaya was not yet certain it had been a mistake the doomsday weapon. Had it not been broken during the Folly, had she had more time to lay the foundations abroad... Well, the world would never know. But looking back, it had been foolish of her to go about it the way she had. She should have sat with Wekesa and explained her reasons, asked for his help. She should not have gone behind Amadeus' back to get it built either, for though it was her right as his empress it had also been a betrayal of their partnership. Too many things between them had been left unsaid over the years, the weight of too many private disappointments coming to crush their backs.

"I became comfortable," Dread Empress Malicia quietly told the horizon.

And though the Tower could forgive a hundred thousand sins, never once that. No, she had made mistakes. Others had as well, but those were not hers to answer for so what point was there in listing them for the Gods to hear? Ater would need to be rebuilt, and this time Alaya would see it done right. As a capital of a great empire should be, not the horror it had been. Those who had supported her she would reward, those who had betrayed her she would bury, and beyond that there were... affairs to settle. Mistakes had been made on both sides but from them she would salvage what she could.

Though Amadeus' stroke of madness with the spiders had become a stone around her neck, the city being convinced it was her doing, Alaya held no grudge. Even in the years of their parting, they had never struck direct blows at one another. That hope she cradled still, for all the cold of the night, and though it was not an answer for their years of bitterness it was not nothing either. A foundation, perhaps, for something new. A different understanding of who they were to each other. It would have to be revisited when she reclaimed her throne. If she reclaimed her throne.

This game was now long past certainties.

Ime's soft footsteps shook her out of her reverie, though she did not turn to look at her spymistress. The other woman came to stand at her side instead, sharing in companionable silence for a moment before the demands of the evening forced an end.

"It is all in place," Ime said. "They are beginning to arrive."

Far below, Malicia could make out the distant banners of Takisha Muraqib and her many vassals. Like a river of colourful silk they streamed down the avenue, preparing to enter one of the formal gatehouses that would allow entry into the Tower.

"I might well lose, tonight," the empress admitted. "It's been a long time since I was so close to complete defeat, Ime. I cannot help but think it might be one many years in the making."

A moment of silence.

"It has," Ime finally said. "You have been making mistakes, Alaya. Embracing schemes more convoluted than they need to be, using the same tactics that put you in a corner to try to get out of it. It got worse after Amadeus left, but the tendency was there even before."

The spymistress grimaced.

"But you kept winning anyway, so who were we to argue?" she said. "Only the victories became narrower, costlier. And now here we are, at a crossroads where there is so little difference between victory and defeat they might as well be the same thing."

The words stung, but Alaya did not flinch away from them. She was not in a position to close her eyes.

"There will need to be changes," Malicia quietly admitted.

Ime nodded.

"It will not be the same, after tonight," she said. "But I would not have you forget, Alaya of Satus, that you ruled ably for forty years. Longer than any tyrant before you, perhaps longer than any tyrant ever will. Your reign waned, as all crowns do, but that does not lessen the achievement."

"I'd thought to have eternity, once," Malicia smiled. "Forty years seems all too few."

"It has been a worthy reign," Ime softly replied. "And I am proud of the part I have played in it."

Alaya's eyes moved to woman at her side. It had been many years since the two of them had shared a bed, and even when they had there'd been nothing more than attraction behind it. That weighed as much as dust in the wind. But the years themselves, Ime standing at her side, those mattered. More than she had ever spoken out loud, and perhaps that should end. When would she speak the words, if not now?

"You are the one who stayed," Alaya said. "I will not forget that, Ime. It..."

She hesitated, tongue stumbling over the words.

"I am grateful," Alaya said. "That you are with me. That you have been for all these years."

Ime smiled, her face worn with age but her eyes still so bright as they had been in their youth.

"I don't regret it," she said. "Even should we lose, I will not regret it."

Connect bloomed to life as the Dread Empress smiled back at her spymistress, a reassuring pressure against her soul. It was not a lie. Ime would not turn on her, not even now – the loyalty she felt had not lessened. Both of them looked down below, beholding the City of Gates.

"I must go," Ime finally said. "I'll see you on the other side, Your Dread Majesty."

"Gods willing," Malicia smiled.

And if not? Hang them all. Ime disappeared into the Tower, the sound of her footsteps fading away, and Dread Empress Malicia was left to her thoughts.

Somewhere below her the girl come to take her throne was taking her first steps up the Tower.

—

Akua Sahelian looked up at the dark clouds above, breathing in the evening air.

The stairs beneath her feet were smooth stone, carved into the likeness of twisted and weeping souls. Every step she took was on their backs. The Sentinels stood on the sides in eerily still rows, garbed in wrought steel as their eyes followed her from beneath the black iron masks covering their faces. Akua had been in the Tower before many a time, but this was the first time she had ever been invited to take the Tyrant's Gate. The dark-skinned sorcerers breathed out and resumed her climb, Kendi trailing behind her like a shadow. He would not be allowed in at her side, but he would accompany her every step of the way until then. It was reassuring weight to have at her back, his hatred. Like a knife at her throat. There was not a sound to be heard save for their boots against the stone, and under unblinking stares they reached the summit.

Before them stood before an intricate puzzle of obsidian, shifting pieces of it inscribed with runes. The gate was tall as three men and half as wide, thrumming with ancient power. The brother of a woman she'd led to her death at the Folly stood by her, eyes hooded.

"It means nothing," Kendi quietly said. "That is the secret of this place. It is an altar to Below, and you may think yourself the mistress but all you can ever be is the sacrifice."

He leaned closer.

"Climb and bleed, Akua Sahelian," he whispered into her ear.

She did not turn to watch him leave, disappear into the deepening shadows. She would meet him again tonight, but the crossing would be hers alone.

"I come summoned by the Tyrant," Akua Sahelian called out, voice calm. "Gatekeeper, grant me entrance."

The obsidian pieces shivered, twisting and turning as if it were living flesh. A terrible face emerged, its great and burning eyes the ancient runes for order, and the ancient demon that Dread Emperor Sinister himself had bound to the gate began to laugh. The sound was like rust swallowing a precious thing, the death rattle of a hundred babes.

"You," the demon said, "are of the master's blood."

"True to it, my mother liked to say," Akua replied.

The old abomination laughed again. Every instance was a fresh horror.

"I grant you entrance, Akua Sahelian," the demon said.

She shivered. The face shattered, breaking apart in tiles of obsidian, and locks unseen began to open one after another. The gate slowly opened, revealing a floor of dark marble leading into an antechamber. Akua stepped through the threshold, eyes growing accustomed to the gloom, and as the gate closed behind her she found a lone Sentinel waiting for her. They stood at the edge of the high-ceilinged room beyond the antechamber, not far from mosaics enchanted with curses so hateful that she could almost taste the emotion in the air. Akua approached, cocking an eyebrow at the soldier.

"A lone soul to guide me up the Tower," she said. "My own personal psychopomp, is it?"

She offered the Sentinel a smile.

"Elegant to the end, Malicia," she said. "Shall we?"

The Sentinel nodded. Oh? Unusually expressive of it. They led the way through the large room and up the spiralling stairs, not that Akua found it hard to keep up. She ran her finger against the scaled railings, the sculpted serpents shivering at her touch. The sorcery in the stone was older than Procer, but it purred maliciously at her touch.

"So how did you end up chosen for this, anyway?" Akua idly asked. "Picked the short straw?"

An amusing thought, a pack of eerily Silent sentinels staring at each other through the iron masks while drawing from another's hands.

"I volunteered."

The golden-eyed sorcerers almost missed a step. A man's voice, that. She could make out as much even through the mask. And a very unusual Sentinel indeed.

"Alas, if you intended to seduce me then I must warn you that my heart has already been taken," she easily said. "It should be somewhere north of Vale, assuming a wight didn't eat it."

The Sentinel did not betray amusement, thought it was hard to tell through that armour.

"I will have to live with the disappointment," the Sentinel replied.

Akua's fingers clenched. No, that wasn't a Sentinel at all. The same sorceries that made them so unflinchingly loyal to whoever held the Tower did not allow for anything as delicate as a sense of humour to remain. Her steps stuttered, stopped. She laid a hand on the railing.

"Who are you?" she coldly asked.

His hand went up, reaching for the top of the helmet. There was a little click, then another, and with the deft fingers the man took off the iron mask. Below were pale green eyes she had seen before, though the face around them had aged since she last saw them.

"Akua Sahelian," the Carrion Lord said. "We are overdue a conversation."

A flash of rage seized her by the throat, clenched her muscles.

"We have more than that overdue," she snarled.

Sorcery came to her harsh and eager. The fireball she tossed at his face was cut through – a single smooth movement from draw to strike – but she'd known it would be. It had bought her the moment she needed to sink her hooks into the railing through her hand, part of the stone smoothly coiling around arm as a fanged head emerged behind the Carrion Lord and struck. He parried it somehow, reflexes inhuman even without a Name, but it was a sword against stone. The steel broke, and when he avoided the snakes' second attack the Duni found that the wall behind him had turned into a nest of snakes. The Tower sought her commands hungrily, like a hound starved of affection.

The snakes in the wall caught the Carrion Lord's limbs, and as he struggled to rip himself free Akua coldly smiled.

"Rip," she ordered in Mthethwa.

The snake come from the railing hit the side of the armoured man like a scorpion bolt, fangs sinking in and wrenching out an entire armour plate as well as chunk of the aketon beneath. The Carrion Lord's jaw clenched in pain but that was only a start. Releasing the railing, Akua strode half a step and sunk her knife deep under his ribs. In the stomach. The man gasped and she felt a spurt of satisfaction.

"I could have aimed for the heart or the lungs," Akua told him, tone even, "but you don't get to die that quickly."

She twisted the knife cruelly before ripping it out, enjoying the way his face drew tight.

"Did you think I'd forgotten my father's death?" she harshly said. "The goblins might have pulled the triggers, but the kill was yours from beginning to end."

Feeling like she wanted to rip out his throat with her own teeth, she stabbed him in the stomach again and ripped it free in a spray of blood.

"You are no longer under Catherine's protection, you old fool," she hissed. "And I am no longer at her side. Did you really think that without her in the way there was anything stopping me from killing you?"

To her utter fury, the man hacked out a wet laugh.

"No," the Carrion Lord said, lips flecked with red. "But I knew you'd go for the slow death."

"And what does that give you?" she mocked.

"Until I bleed out," the green-eyed man replied, "to convince you to heal me."

Akua blinked at him, silenced by surprise and utter disbelief.

"Mother always said," she finally replied, "that you were just as mad as your predecessors. Just better at hiding it."

The Carrion Lord slumped down against the wall, armoured boot slipping against the stone with an ungainly sound. He was, she noted, positioning himself so he would bleed out more slowly. A methodical lunatic to the end.

"This is the Tower," the Carrion Lord said. "Where are the mad to go, if not here?"

He looked amused. Akua sliced him across the face for it, deep through the nose and both cheekbones.

"I've always used torturers instead of my own hands," the golden-eyed mage said. "But for you, Amadeus of the Green Stretch, I will make an exception."

And maybe his screams would drown out the sound the bolts had made when the volley had pierced through Papa's flesh. A thump, she thought. Almost like biting into an apple. She cut him again, stabbing deep into his cheek until she felt bone.

"I imagine you'll get practice enough," the Carrion Lord rasped, "as Dread Empress."

She laughed in his face.

"Is that what this is all for?" Akua said. "You cower at the prospect of my taking the Tower?"

What a stupid way to die, she thought. He chuckled wetly, tongue flicking across his lips but only spreading the red.

"So which was it the Bard pushed you towards?" he asked.

Her eyes narrowed.

"She wants me to take the throne," Akua said after hesitating a moment. "I think. But as a Dread Empress Benevolent the Second."

Dread Emperor Benevolent, the first and only hero to have ever reigned over Praes. At war with over half the realm from the moment of his coronation to the last gasp of his very grim end. There were few tyrants who could boast of having beaten Dread Empress Massacre at her namesake, and Benevolent was hallowed even among those. He'd come terrifyingly close enough to winning that he had been purged from every known record, demons of Absence being put to work to tie up loose ends. Only private libraries like those of the Vault still had mentions of him.

"Always a game behind the game with her," the Carrion Lord said. "We haven't seen the end of it."

"You have," Akua smiled.

His face had grown even paler. The internal bleeding must have been excruciatingly painful, she thought with satisfaction. May at least one of the screams he was swallowing make it to the feet of the Gods Below, so that they might pass it on to Dumisai of Aksum as his daughter's funerary gift.

"Maybe," he shrugged, hacking a cough after. "But that matters little. I am an instrument. If purpose is served, the outcome is acceptable. It's you that concerns me now."

"Oh?" Akua smiled. "How novel. Won't you Speak to me, Carrion Lord? Ask me to knife my hand again. See what happens."

She stuck him in the stomach again, just because she could. He gasped in pain.

"Have you decided I am not fit for the Tower?" she mocked.

He laughed.

"Worse," the man said. "I put the nobles of the Wasteland to the test, Sahelian. Only one passed."

Even though the implication was obvious, the sheer absurdity of what he'd said meant it took her a beat to realize. It was unthinkable. His hatred of the nobility was a keystone of his reputation, his legend. It would have been like Catherine staying sober for a month, or Vivienne Dartwick not being a disappointment in every single way she could be. Still, the sentence had her lips quirking into an unpleasant smile.

"My, but that must sting," Akua purred. "Though if this was meant to silence me, I must say-"

"Do you want to rule Praes?" the Carrion Lord bluntly cut in.

She blinked. Hesitated.

"What is your game, Duni?" Akua finally asked.

"You could," he said. "Maybe even well. I don't like it, wouldn't like what you would do with it. But you could."

"Are you offering me your support?" she asked, voice thick with disbelief.

At least the blood loss was making him entertaining. Akua did hate a humorless bleeder.

"You remind me of Alaya," the Carrion Lord noted. "When we were young. The best of her, and some of the worst. And there are rules. So you could claim it."

"And what would that have to do with you?" Akua scorned.

"Is it worth keeping?"

She paused, studied him through narrowed eyes.

"You are trying to talk me out of taking the throne," Akua said.

It was the best reason she'd heard to climb the Tower so far.

"Heh," the man said. "No. I want more than that. But this first. You've been out of the cage, now. Seen the world. The Dread Empire of Praes, the way it is, is it worth keeping?"

Akua's lips tightened. If it were, would she be so horrified at the thought of being forced to rule it?

"What do you want from me, Carrion Lord?"

"Nothing," the man laughed, his green eyes bloodshot. "I already know your answer. Wouldn't have passed otherwise. You see it now, don't you? The sickness."

"And you think yourself the man to excise it?" she laughed. "Oh, the cold man with the hard hand here to teach us his better ways. Praes is not a young widow looking for excitement, Carrion Lord. There is no appetite for Dread Emperor Amadeus."

"It's not about me," the dying man said. "Or you. Look around, Sahelian. Why is this still standing?"

"There is nothing else," Akua said.

"Maledicta the Second," he said. "After her assassination-"

"Haider's Reign," she frowned.

"The Throneless Years," he retorted.

Both referred to the same two decades after Maledicta II's death, though his term was the one used by the Tower's formal chroniclers.

"You want to change Callow for Keter," she realized.

She was reluctantly impressed by the boldness.

"No," he coughed. "Not just that. It ended with Vindictive the First. It shouldn't have."

Akua breathed in sharply.

"That would not be an empire," she said.

The man offered a sharp, bloody smile that split his face in two.

"No," he agreed. "It wouldn't be."

"You talk in circles," Akua said. "What is it you want, Carrion Lord?"

He moved and she almost slashed him against, but he didn't even have his sword in hand. It was further down the steps. Instead he was pawing at his belt with armoured fingers, and what he presented her he was holding between his thumb and his forefinger. Akua stilled.

"Take it," he said.

"This is a trap," she replied.

"The trap is in not giving it to you," he rasped. "I see that now."

He coughed out a laugh, red trailing his face, but his eyes were clear.

"I always thought it'd be me," Amadeus of the Green Stretch confessed. "That it was what I was for. But that was arrogance, Alaya was right. I never loved this place enough to have the right. It has to be you."

"You despise me," Akua said.

"Yes," he smiled. "But it has to be you. Because you passed. Because it's in your blood. The original murder, Sahelian, isn't that your family's favourite boast? You began it all."

She snatched it out of his fingers, as if expecting to be bit, but there was nothing. No trap, no trick.

"And that's all it takes?" Akua asked.

"A choice," the Carrion Lord rasped. "What more could you need? It's the only true gift the Gods gave us."

"You don't know which one I'll make," she said.

He grinned, blood-streaked and nasty to the bone.

"Mile thaman Sahelian," the Carrion Lord mocked.

Her fingers clenched.

"Were you not going to convince me to heal you?" she sweetly asked.

He shrugged.

"Win some," he began, "lose-"

She stuck the knife back in his belly.

"There," Akua hissed. "You'll bleed out slower, and that's the only mercy you'll ever have of me."

Let him die here at the bottom of the Tower, forever reaching beyond his grasp. She kicked him away and he fell down a few stairs. She breathed out, looked down at the small thing still in the palm of her hand. She closed the fingers, breathed out and settled herself. She rose, to the distant sound of a dying man whistling the tune to an old song.

It was, Akua realized as her blood ran cold, The Tyranny of the Sun.

—

Breaking into the Tower had been shockingly easy.

Archer had felt a little cheated, even though it stood that things should be pretty much stacked in their favour. The three of them had Scribe guiding them for one – well, arguably this was about them escorting Scribe but eh – and the great difficulty in accessing the Tower from underground was gone. The giant spiders lurking in the tunnels were, you know, already topside in dead. Which meant the tunnels were moist and stinky but not actually all that dangerous and they'd made it to what Scribe claimed to be the lowest levels of the Tower, the 'underpinnings', without much trouble.

"The haven't been many guards," Cocky said.

Which was all well and good to say, when she hadn't been doing any of the killing. That'd been Indrani and Alexis, yeah, as usual doing the grunt work.

"The Tower is as a city within the city," Scribe replied. "Most parts of it are like small villages that rule themselves with only occasional intervention from the tyrant. I've had us skimming the edge of where the latrine men live. They post few guards, and the Sentinels are spread too thin to plug the gaps as they usually would."

"I'm not complaining," Alexis grunted. "Hopefully it'll be just as easy getting to this Ime."

"We've been lucky," Scribe said. "She'd be much harder to get at if she hadn't gone to the underpinnings."

It was nice of the Huntress not to be the kind of heroine who asked too many questions when Catherine sent you to capture, interrogate and execute the leader of the Eyes of the Empire but unfortunate since Indrani did actually have questions about that. Now she was going to have to ask them herself, like an asshole.

"Do we know why she's down here?" Archer asked.

The corridor ahead of them was empty, as the last two had been. They were large, windy and winding things that snaked towards a distant centre. The grounds above which there was an actual giant tower, presumably. The Tower was kind of like a tree, the 'roots' that were the underpinnings actually spreading out much further than the structure stood.

"There has been activity from the Eyes down here over the last two days," Scribe said. "Presumably Malicia is preparing something for her guests upstairs."

Which was presumably one of the reasons their buddy Ime was going to be interrogated before the execution. Might be useful to know what Malicia was up to except for going crazy and pissing everyone off. They switched corridors twice before finally running into people, which happened to be a pair unarmed messengers. Alexis was a softie so she knocked hers out, but Indrani wasn't in the business of letting liabilities get up. Hers wouldn't. They were close to the centre, Scribe told them, and it checked out: moments later they ran into the first checkpoint manned by Sentinels. Only ten of the, though, so before long the four of them were wiping their blades. and moving on.

Another two checkpoints with Sentinels, but after that it was only Eyes manning the gates and they honestly weren't much to write home about. Like, even Cocky could handle them up close and in Indrani's humble opinions there were some trouts in the Hwaerte that would give the Concocter trouble in hand-to-hand.

"It's unusual," Scribe noted. "It should be Sentinels handling this, not Eyes. Ime is trying to keep something quiet."

"Quiet from who?" Indrani frowned. "The Sentinels answer only to the Empress, right? They're supposed to be all brainwashed to be loyal."

"Exactly," Scribe replied, sounding fascinated. "So what is it that she's trying to hide from Malicia? And more importantly for who?"

There wasn't time to stop and interrogate a prisoner even if they took one, since if they stopped pushing in there was a decent chance someone would find one of the older corpses and send a warning ahead, so they pressed on urgently. It went pretty smoothly until they hit a real blockade with crossbowmen and a few legionaries – unmarked, so they were likely Eyes too – that made it a proper fight. Alexis took a cut on her face and Indrani had to ask for a healing salve for her hand after she made a mage eat his own fireball. Hilarious, but she wasn't made of fingers. Unlike that fucking toucan yesterday, there was an image that'd stay with her for a while.

Behind the blockade Scribe had told them there was one of the main water tunnels for the Tower, but the large room they entered past the corpses had a lot more than water in it. It also had what was at least a thousand magically sealed barrels, not a single of which was stacked over another. There were even little palisades between sections: whoever had put these there had been real careful about it. That smelled of danger to Indrani, but she didn't get to spend much time thinking on it because there was also an old woman inside the room and Scribe was looking all pleased.

"Just a guess," Indrani called out, "but would you happen to be Ime?"

The old lady was Soninke and pretty clearly getting long in the tooth, but she was keeping it tight. Probably highborn, they tended to age better than most out in the Wasteland. The older woman glanced at her and then sighed.

"And I take it you three are the Ranger's pupils," she said before her eyes moved to the fourth among them. "Scribe, I see you've stopped clutching the Black Queen's skirts long enough to make act of presence. We're all very grateful, I'm sure."

"I might clutch them," Scribe mildly replied, "but at least, unlike some, I can claim never to have been under my patroness' skirts."

"Savage," Indrani appreciatively said.

On the other hand, while Malicia was terrible and kind of evil but she was also ridiculously good looking so, you know, respect.

"I suppose it is harder to get into pants," Ime smiled pleasantly. "Though certainly not for lack of trying."

Indrani shared a look with Cocky, who was also smothering a grin. It wasn't often they got to hear the old guard air their dirty laundry, this was to be savoured. Only, Gods forgive her, Archer was actually kind of in charge here and they had a mission to get done. Once they nabbed Ime and got her singing, they'd finally have an idea of what the Hells was going on here on top of neatly ensuring Malicia wasn't going to see Vivienne coming. There was a reason they'd brought Scribe here: once the current mistress of the Eyes in Praes had gone to join her agents Below, the old one could step back into the role.

And it some of the officers hesitated, well, that was why they'd brought knives.

"It genuinely breaks my heart to stop this," Indrani told them, "but we're going to have to wrap this up. Ime, congratulations, you have been taken prisoner. Please don't resist, we're trying to wean Alexis off kicking people and it only encourages her."

"She's lying," Alexis flatly said. "They're not actually trying."

"Charming," Ime drily replied.

Scribe suddenly hummed, stepping back from a barrel.

"These are goblin-made," she said. "Straight from the Eyries. What is it you're doing down here, Ime?"

"You don't know," the old woman mused. "Interesting. So why are you here, if not to interrupt me?"

"It doesn't matter," Scribe said. "It's finished."

There was a long moment of silence as the two women stared each other down. Indrani awkwardly cleared her throat to get their attention and was entirely ignored.

"You're here for me," Ime quietly said, "because you're trying to blind us. You smuggled something into the Tower you're afraid I'll catch."

"You're losing your touch," Scribe smiled.

"That's enough of that," Archer sharply said, baring her blades. "We're done here. Scribe, shut your mouth and Ime-"

"Assassin," Ime hissed out. "You brought Assassin in here. You're trying to kill Malicia."

Fuck, that wasn't great. She put a spring to her step even as Ime began to move away, past rows of barrel and close to the large water-filled tunnel flowing behind them.

"I'm sorry about this," Indrani said, halfway meaning it.

"I'm not," Ime said, then glanced at Scribe. "Do you think you're the only one who can bargain with devils?"

Oh boy, that did not sound – Archer ducked, the arrow brushing through her air. On a balcony above, the Ranger nocked a second arrow before leaping down. She landed at Ime's side, looking amused.

"Devils, are we?" the Lady asked. "Ime, you're getting rude in your old age."

"Well, we can't all be born ageless bitches," the spymistress flatly replied.

Cocky swallowed a laugh behind her.

"I'm calling in my marker from helping Grem get his letters out," Ime continued. "I need to get out of here."

"I needed to be here for the barrels anyway," Ranger shrugged. "Go ahead."

"That's not happening," Indrani flatly said.

Behind her, Alexis nocked an arrow. Tension rose.

"Hey Scribe," Ime called out.

The villainess in question stared at the other spymistress.

"Yes?" she reluctantly.

Ime glanced at Ranger, then at the three of them.

"Mine's bigger," she said, and broke into a run.

It went downhill from there.

—

The twenty-fourth level of the Tower was large enough a scream would echo, the Warlord thought.

It was a striking place, as befitting of the hall that hosted the imperial court. Black marble walls rose tall, touched by plume of colours: makeshift pillars of cloth hanging from the ceiling in red, green and gold. The floor beneath their feet was a great mosaic depicting the history of Praes. It went as far back as Subira Sahelian murdering the founder Dread Empress Maleficent in order to become Dread Emperor Sinister and stretched out to events as recent as Wekesa the Warlock immolating Thalassina – the only event of Malicia's reign depicted at all. Everywhere jewels were set in walls and furniture while gold veins dripped down stone as gilded ornaments.

The two orcs at his side, Oghuz the Lamé and Hegvor Allspeak, looked intimidated by the luxury. There were benches here set with enough rubies to feed either of their clans for a year. And some of the nobles wore on them more wealth than any of them would spend in a lifetime: enchanted cloths that looked like shadows, rings made entirely of rubies and even a woman in full dragonscale armour.

"There is nothing to be impressed of," Hakram spoke in Kharsum. "What is there here that was not built on our backs?"

"Ha," Chief Hegvor snorted. "Well said."

"Should have taken the court instead of the camps, Deadhand," Oghuz grinned, baring fangs at noble who'd come a little too close. "More loot here and fewer swords to defend it."

Few of the nobles had dared approach to talk since they had come, and none since a young lady vassal to Okoro had tried to needle Oghuz and gotten an eye ripped out for it. High Lady Abreha had visited before, courteous for all that she might well be their foe now, but High Lady Wither was keeping to another part of the hall. They'd traded nods but nothing else. Nothing more was needed, in Hakram's opinion. They were allies, not comrades.

"When is Malicia meant to come out, anyway?" Hegvor asked.

"When everyone's here," the Warlord grunted. "She's taking her time, reminding everyone she's important."

"Can't be many people left," Oghuz opined. "The Callowan princess was invited into the back just now, and she was one of the last to arrive."

Vivienne had not stopped to talk, but Hakram hadn't expected her to. She... would not take the choice he had made up north well, he knew. Perhaps worse than Catherine would, though that might be wishful thinking on his part. Either way he'd known that she'd avoid him beyond the necessary until there was opportunity for them to speak in private. She preferred to vent her anger away from prying eyes.

"Company," Hegvor said.

The Warlord followed her gaze, finding an old companion at the end of it. Akua Sahelian was dressed simply, for a noble, but that was a statement of power too: she needed nothing more than dress in white and gold to draw the eye. It was easy to forget how powerful a mage she'd been, but now it was impossible to ignore: even from across the room, her power filled the air. Behind her trailed a dark-skinned man with a short beard and golden earrings. Mage too, by the robes. Mfuasa? Might be someone High Lord Sargon had sent to spy on her. The hall did not quiet when Akua came to stand before him, but eyes followed. They were of interest. They were watched.

"Warlord."

Hakram considered her. The face was a mask, as it always was, but below that he smelled... unease. Something was unsettling her, and for once it was not him. What kind of trouble had she found, that she might then find him preferable to it?

"And what am I to call you, Akua Sahelian?" he asked.

The mfuasa at her side smiled.

"The name is enough," the golden-eyed noble said. "It has been some time, Deadhand. We stand on grounds much changed."

"The trick is to change with them," he gravelled.

He stepped forward, she to the side. It was almost as if they were to begin a walk together, an illusion of companionship.

"Have you?" she asked.

Hakram studied her a moment. She seemed sincere. Not it was his turn to be unsettled.

"More than I thought I would," he admitted.

A pause.

"You?"

"I," Akua Sahelian, "am trying to decide."

"That was always your trouble, Sahelian," Hakram gravelled. "Too much red where the thinking should be. Too much thinking where the red should be."

She grimaced.

"I've suffered many a skewering this week," she said, "but not one of you has had the decency to at least stab me as well to distract from the ignominy."

His gaze sharpened.

"Visitors?"

"An old friend," Akua easily said. "The one who talks too much. And another since, whom I left bleeding to death in the stairs."

Hakram clicked his tongue.

"You know better," he said. "Unless you take the head..."

She smiled.

"Then I will get to kill him twice," the sorceress said. "Hardly an imposition."

The Warlord was more impressed that the Carrion Lord has survived a run-in with that one after killing her father than worried about his accomplice's survival. Like as not, he'd planned for it. The man was the kind of clever that thought receiving stab wounds was an acceptable step in a plan, which was by far the stupidest kind of clever.

"And what did our old friend want?" he asked.

A long silence.

"I am less sure," Akua admitted, "the more I think of it."

That was the curse of facing the Intercessor, wasn't it? Your reaction to her prodding might well be part of her plan in the first place. It was like facing an oracle out to get you.

"That tends to be the way with her," the Warlord conceded.

She glanced at him, seemingly amused.

"And if I ventured to ask you for advice, Hakram Deadhand?" Akua said.

He considered that a moment and chose honesty.

"I don't like you," the Warlord said.

"It's actually rather refreshing," she admitted, "for someone to say to my face."

"I don't like you," Hakram repeated, "but I did respect you, once."

"No longer?" she asked, sounding more curious than offended.

"When you were the Diabolist, you were terrible," he said. "But you were truer to yourself than most people ever are. That, if not the deeds of your hands, was worthy of respect."

She chuckled.

"You've always had a knack for surprising me," Akua said.

He snorted, dismissive. She'd just never learned what to expect from him.

"She only has the power we give her," the Warlord said. "That's her trick. Be who you are, Sahelian. Right or wrong, at least it will be true."

Her face closed, eyes looking away. The silence stretched out.

"I never liked you either," Akua confessed. "It was the loyalty as much as the lack of ambition. There was never a lever to pull with you, so I could never be comfortable."

"And yet here we are," the Warlord said.

"Here we are," Akua Sahelian softly agreed.

She breathed out shallowly.

"Do you know what the difference is," she asked, "between a knot and a noose?"

He laughed, to her visible surprise – which in turn surprised him. He'd thought she was making a reference.

"It's the setup of an old joke in Kharsum," Hakram told her. "Because the words are the same, only with a suffix added."

She cocked an eyebrow.

"So what is the difference?" she asked.

"They're the same thing," the Warlord told her, "until there's a corpse."

Her face was a blank mask, for a moment, until to his utter surprise and that of most the hall she burst out laughing. Long, throaty and loud. She laughed and laughed, until she trailed off into giggled as she held her ribs loosely.

"Until there's a corpse," she repeated, grinning and shaking her head.

Unsure what had set her off, he settled for eyeing her warily instead.

"I thank you for the advice, Hakram Deadhand," Akua said.

"Found what you were looking for?"

She flexed her palm, smiling.

"Close enough. Fare well, Hakram."

Het met her eyes. Moments passed.

"And you, Akua," he replied.

She left, still shaking her head and smiling. Her attendant, who she'd never introduced, waved a cheeky goodbye. The Warlord flexed his dead hand, wondering if he'd just made a mistake. Whatever the truth of it, though, it was now too late. Events were in motion, even those that had nothing to do with the sorceress. From the corner of his eye he saw that a warrior with a painted shield had come from below to speak to the chief of the Split Tree Clan in a low tone before being dismissed. The Warlord glanced at his adviser, who came closer. Hegvor leaned his way so she could whisper into his ear with her lips hidden from sight.

"We have word," she said. "We've taken everything we need out."

Hakram nodded, satisfied. On schedule.

"And our way out?"

"Waiting for the signal," she said.

Good. Everything was in place, then.

There was nothing left but seeing how the dice fell.

—

Arthur wasn't sure what in the Heavens he was doing here. A trophy hero, maybe? No, that thought was unkind to the Princess and she'd done nothing to deserve that. The Woe had their reputation, but he'd never seen Princess Vivienne be anything but roughly decent. Even Grandmaster Talbot spoke well of her, and when wariness was in order it was not tinted with the kind of fear that the Black Queen commanded. No, the Princess earned rue instead. Arthur would not be surprised if the barracks tale of the Thief having stolen every pair of shoe Brandon Talbot owned after he misspoke in court were actually true.

"I'd expected Queen Catherine to attend personally," Dread Empress Malicia said. "One must wonder what preceding claim there might be on her time."

The Squire had heard the empress was the most beautiful woman in the world and he supposed she was graceful enough, but it was a kind of put-together that put him ill at ease. Like a man too handsome and well-groomed, it hinted at artifice or vanity. Princess Vivienne had taken it in stride, though, and looked calm as a pond on a windless day.

"She likes to delegate minor affairs to me," the Princess mildly said. "I'm sure you won't take offence."

It wasn't a question. While those two continued to spar, Arthur let his eyes and attention wander. There were few people in the antechamber where they had been invited by the servants and fewer still who talked. The Princess had been allowed two guard compared to the twenty Sentinels in here, and to match Arthur himself an old foe had been summoned. The Black Knight loomed so tall he had to wonder how she'd even been able to enter the room, her heavy plate dark as pitch and polished like a mirror. The warhammer whose head rested on the ground was almost as tall as a man, and Arthur knew from experience that to take a blow from it without Name strength was to lose whatever limb was struck. She'd plowed through a line of legionaries like they were kindling back in Wolof, never even noticing that they fought back.

While their rulers talked, the two of them stood to the side like ornaments. He'd felt the Black Knight's gaze on him several times and returned the favour when it moved away. He could not help it. Why is it that Nim Mardottir is your enemy, Squire? The Carrion Lord's words were like a fly nipping at his neck. The man had been playing a game, pretending they were not at war and the Black Knight not Malicia's greatest servant, and yet the hesitation remained. Because Arthur had never really questioned that he was going to kill the Black Knight before this all ended, and that admission shook him. It'd just been a given. He was the Squire and she the Black Knight.

What other way could it end?

Only now, without violence between them, he was standing next to her and noticing things. That she seemed as bored with the talk as he, that she liked to drum her fingers against the grip of her warhammer. Small, meaningless things. But it made her less a force of nature, of Evil, and more a woman in black armour. Maybe she was both, Arthur thought. Maybe that made it even worse, that she'd had a choice and still made this one, but the words felt weak. The resolve behind them was fragile and Arthur Foundling had not become a squire so that he would grow into the kind of knight that swung a sword weighed down with doubt.

So he asked.

"Were you in the streets, when the spiders came?"

His voice was quiet, so that the two rulers by them would not be drawn into it, but the Black Knight heard him. Her armoured head moved to study him in silence. After a moment, she nodded.

"I looked for you," the Squire admitted.

"I know," the Black Knight replied. "Our pattern is not yet finished."

So she knew, he thought with surprise. He wondered what it must be like, knowing that the very currents of fate had worn into Creation the promise of your death. Looking to the horizon and seeing only darkness ahead. It must feel, Arthur Foundling thought, a little like being alone on a shore and knowing nothing you could do would change anything. That the man you loved would still be dead even if you swung your sword until the Last Dusk. It must have had the bitter taste of futility to it.

"I wish it didn't have to be this way," the Squire said and found he meant it. "That it could be... fair."

"Fair is not what we bargained for, Squire," the Black Knight said. "We took on the mantle knowing there would be days when we taste blood, when ashes sift through our fingers. My people say that on the day we are born, our death is born as well. We run towards it, it runs towards us, and the most we can take from life is to steal a march on it before we meet."

She sounded calm. Serene, almost, and Arthur felt a surge of disgust clog his throat. Not for her but for him. Nim Mardottir was the one with the sword hanging above her head, and yet he was the one babbling like a sentimental child. It was shameful.

"I'd thought you would hate me," Arthur quietly said. "I almost wish you would."

The Black Knight chuckled.

"Black and white," she said. "That's always been the game. Hate it or laud it, nothing changes. So why burden yourself with the hate?"

He swallowed drily. There was an answer in him, but he did not know how to voice it. Could not, and suddenly he realized there was a silence in the hall. For a moment he feared that their talk her interrupted that of their rulers, but when he looked it was not there that their attention laid. Someone had come up stairs in the back of the antechamber and was forcing their way through the Sentinels. It was an old woman, dark-skinned. Princess Vivienne went still.

"Assassin," the old woman called out. "Assassin is here, Malicia. He's coming for-"

One of the Sentinels behind the empress moved jerkily, blade coming out as the Callowan guards shouted in alarm and reached for their swords. Only the killer was too fast, too smooth, and even as Malicia's eyes widened and she began to turn the point of the steel touched her back – only for a great hammer to smash through it, shattering the blade.

"Behind me, Your Dread Majesty," the Black Knight said, moving the shaken empress.

The Assassin, still faceless and garbed as a Sentinel, immediately began attacking again.

"Treachery," the Princess called out as she drew her own sword. "They're attacking us. Squire, face the Black Knight."

Heart in his throat, Arthur drew his sword. Was this it, then? Their ending. The orphan was not a fucking fool. He'd been sent here so that he could kill the Black Knight and clear the way for the assassin his own queen must have sent.

"Why?" he heard the empress ask her champion. "You-"

"I cannot tolerate the way of the world," the Black Knight answered, sounding as if she was smiling. "So I must change it. I will not compromise who I am."

It was like a punch in the gut. Why is it that Nim Mardottir is your enemy, Squire? Gods, was that who he was? The kind of knight he was going to be?

"No," Arthur Foundling answered, biting down on his indignation. "No."

He moved, Name pulsing, and struck. The blade ripped through the Assassin's hand as he jerked in surprise. The killer drew back to flee, Sentinels converging on them all as the Princess watched them all with cold eyes. But it was the Black Knight's gaze he met, finding the silent question it held.

"Not black and white," the Squire answered. "Right and wrong."

It was just words, but they burned in him. Scoured his veins clean, cleared his gaze. It felt like he could breathe again, stand straight. It would stay with him, the answer. He would carry it with him wherever he went, sword in hand if he must. Because it wasn't a game, never had been, and if for just a moment people could believe that the graveyard might stop devouring the world.

"Right and wrong," the Black Knight quietly repeated.

And as they stood shoulder-to-shoulder, facing the assassin, the Knight Errant finally found he could smile.

—

The Lady had healed up but so had they.

Scribe disappeared early, which was for the best because she'd only get in the way. Yesterday it'd been half a game, at least until the end, but today there was nothing playful about it. There was no tide of devils to put in between, no spare breath to be squeezed out as the world whirled around them. Down here there was only the stone and the water and barrels around them.

That and the years of poison they'd brought in with them.

"He was still wearing those fucking bells when he died," the Silver Huntress snarled. "Did you know that? Did you even care enough to ask?"

Her spear skidded along the Lady's blade, the tip exploding with Light, but she'd already shown that trick before. Creation narrowed to an edge as Ranger cut through the burst of Light with her other sword, flipping her grip to ram the pommel into Alexis' mouth. Teeth broke and the redhead rocked back, might have gotten her throat cut if Indrani didn't leap over a barrel to stab at the Lady's back. Her wrist was caught and Ranger was angling to spin and tossed her into the water when Indrani leaned forward to ram their foreheads together, buying just enough room not to get eviscerated when the Lady's blade came up towards her belly.

She was still thrown, rolling on the stone until she got to her feet. Alexis has spat out blood and teeth, her spear alight in silver as she circled around a pack of barrels to bring the fight to larger grounds. Good call. Space was better for them than Ranger, especially when Cocky was cooking up surprises behind them. A glance told Indrani she'd opened a barrel with a knife and was studying the contents with wide eyes. Archer cleared her throat, trying to draw her attention so she'd actually toss the concoctions she'd prepared for this fight, but she was ignored.

"John had promise," the Lady calmly said. "He was sharpening. If he'd stayed a few more years instead of run off to play the hero against my instructions, he would still be alive."

"Of course he ran off," Alexis snarled. "You fucking hammered into his head that he wasn't as good as the rest of us, that he needed to prove himself. If it hadn't been the Liesse Rebellion, it would have been any other of a dozen wars. And he would have died in all of them."

Ranger seemed amused.

"If you were so concerned, why did you not accompany Indrani when she went to fetch him?" she asked.

The Huntress' answer was inarticulate rage, leaping forward over a barrel instead of completing a circle. Indrani cursed under her breath, hurrying up. Alexis had gotten baited and paid for it, Ranger on her before she landed on the stone and catching her by the throat. The Huntress was slammed on the floor, hard enough that her bones cracked, and would have gotten a blade through the eye if Indrani hadn't thrown one of her longknives at the Lady's back. Hye Su snatched it out of the air and threw it back without batting an eye, but the heartbeat was long enough for Alexis to wriggle out of the grasp and kick the Lady away. Archer caught her own blade before it could carve through her throat and breathed out in relief, hurrying to the Huntress' side so she would be able to get up without getting killed.

"You need to stay in control, Alexis," Indrani harshly said. "If you get angry, get stupid, you'll die."

Ranger sighed.

"This is sickening," she said. "You need to make a decision, Indrani. Are you trying to win, or are you trying to be liked? Because now you're trying to do both, and you are failing."

"Yeah, she's trying," Alexis growled, spitting blood to the side. "It's why she's already better than you. Did you ever find out how Lysander died, Ranger?"

"Disappointingly," the Lady said.

"Alone," Alexis said. "He died alone, not even forty feet away from someone who would have fought at his side. That's what you taught us. That's your fucking legacy, Ranger. Dying alone, just like you will."

"The difference between us, child," the Lady of the Lake replied, "is that I do not fear it. And that's why you'll lose."

And the thing was, Indrani still admired that answer. It made her blood sing, it was everything she'd decided she wanted of the world as a child. But that couldn't be her, not anymore. Because it'd mean leaving behind Masego, never again curling up by his side to read. Never again talking late into the night. It would mean leaving Cat for good, the laughter and the warmth and the home she'd made herself into. It would mean no more rooftop skulking with Vivienne, no more dicing with Hakram. Hells, she'd even miss Akua and the way they talked trash about everybody else.

Indrani didn't want to stand alone anymore. And maybe she'd die that way anyway, but she wouldn't make herself pretend it'd be a good thing.

"You didn't need to be," Archer said. "Alone. That was a choice."

She'd made it. But had any of them had, or had she made it for them too?

"You'll learn otherwise," Ranger gently said, then her eyes hardened. "Or you'll die. One last lesson for the three of you."

"Here's one for you too," Cocky said.

The thrown vial broke against the floor, small puffs of grey smoke taking to the air and then wildly swelling. The grey began to billow in every direction but neither Indrani nor Alexis hesitated to charge in. They knew exactly what this was, and they were in no danger from it. Ranger was better than either of them at fighting sightless, but there was something to even the odds: the moment she took a swing and Archer parried it, the Lady let out a soft noise of surprise and backed away. Yeah, the smoke was eating away at her gear. Figured she'd notice when blades clashed. The Huntress pushed but had to draw back when she almost lost an eye.

Indrani tried to flank, blades high, but Ranger backed away entirely out of the smoke and it dispersed after a few more moments.

"That explains the smell," the Lady frowned, eyeing her dulled blades and eaten at cape. "You coated all your equipment in a solution to prevent it."

"I still remember when we first met," the Concocter said. "Do you recall the first question I ever asked you?"

"Could you have stopped it," Ranger quoted.

"You didn't," Cocky said. "You let them die, because you didn't care. And that's all you are, isn't it? The absence of caring. That's the sum of you."

"How far you've travelled, Concocter," Ranger said, "to still be standing by that campfire, looking for someone to save you. Is that all you learned of your years as my pupil?"

A glance was flicked at Indrani and Alexis.

"Different saviours to beg salvation from," the Lady of the Lake scorned.

"No," Cocky snarled. "I learned too much from you, Hye Su. Let it sink into my bone like a fucking disease. But I've given you that for too long."

The Concocter smiled, hard and proud, and looked away from the Lady. At the two of them.

"Constanza," she said. "My name is Constanza."

Indrani went still. The Concocter breathed out.

"Let's finish this," she said. "All three of us."

Alexis breathed out, hands shaking.

"Yeah," the Silver Huntress got out through her broken teeth. "Time to end it. Indrani?"

Archer met the Lady of the Lake's eyes.

"One last lesson," Indrani agreed. "For us, and for those we left behind."

Violence ensued. Steel sang and Cocky – Constanza, she thought with wonder – unleashed all she had prepared. The poison cloud that hurt only elves, the sentient drops of hate that hunted the sole person who'd not drunk an obscuring potion, the fumes that turned to glue and the glue that turned into acid. Ranger came for her, seeing her as the weak link, but none of them minded. It told them where the fight would be. Indrani took the first wound, a slice across the face. Cocky the second, an arrow that went through her shoulder. The Lady went third, losing her cloak and the edge of her eyebrow when Archer setup Alexis to detonate her spear next to Ranger's head.

There was no elegance to it. It was simple, brutal attempts to kill. And Gods forgive them, but they were losing. Even with all the tricks and the rage, she was just too fucking good. No pass worked on her twice, and every time a sequence did well against her the Ranger learned in the moment that followed and turned it back against them. It was like fighting a mirror, only the reflection was better than them. Archer fell first, to a kick in the stomach as she parried her death away, but Alexis had overextended. She took a slice across her face, across her right eye, and as she drew back in pain the opening was made. Indrani felt a shout rising up her throat as the Lady darted forward past the two of them.

To Constanza, whose fingers were fumbling over a vial. The sword was swung, the arc smooth and perfect about to take the head of a girl Indrani had known since they were both children. Only it was the Lady that fell instead, taking a hit in the side as a cloaked figure stepped out of nowhere to her left. The Emerald Swords, Indrani thought as she rose to her feet. They must have used the same tunnels. Ranger swatted one away but three more materialized in the heartbeat that followed and there was no room to manoeuvre down here. Another appeared by Alexis's side, striking her knee behind so she'd fall, and Indrani rolled to the side just in time to avoid being skewered by a sixth.

Evidently, the Emerald Swords were done fucking around.

"Cocky," Archer shouted across the din. "This is done. We need to leave."

She backed away from the elf pursuing her, the slender sword seemingly made of wood biting into her longknife like it was made of cheap tin. Fuck. Alexis had gotten away from hers and they came back to back, safe enough that Indrani could spare a look away. Cocky hadn't been targeted, they weren't seeing her as a threat, which meant there were eight of the fucking Emerald Swords fighting the same woman. And, terrifyingly enough, though Ranger was losing it wasn't by a large margin. She was being pressed back, not overwhelmed.

"We grab Constanza and go," Indrani said. "Agreed?"

"Agreed," Alexis grunted.

They moved in unison, ducking beneath a blow as Alexis lit up her spear and used the flare to blind their opponents for half a heartbeat. Indrani used the delay to leap over a row of barrels, landing in a roll on the other side as a sword cut through where her belly would have been if she'd been standing. Fuck, she hadn't even heard the elf move. Cocky was, inexplicably, dipping what looked like a long thin stick into the barrel she'd opened earlier instead of fucking running away. Another flare of silver light, then Alexis was with them. Half her face was covered in blood from the cut Ranger had left her with, and that eye might well be a permanent loss.

"What are you doing?" the Huntress snarled, "we need to-"

Constanza reached into the pouch at her side and took out a red gem, idly throwing it at a barrel to their right. The stone hit and got stuck on the wood, then began to shine.

"Fuck," Indrani swore, throwing herself down.

The world exploded in green. Goblinfire. Merciless Gods, the place had been loaded with the largest amount of goblinfire Indrani had ever seen. And there were explosion in the distance, like there'd been other stacks out there. She got back to her feet as Cocky smiled smugly. The roar of the flames had surprised everyone, but it looked like the Lady had been the one to pay for it. She'd gotten run through from the back, Indrani said, and another Emerald Sword had just broken her jaw. A third was about to put his blade through her heart when he suddenly backed away, a chandelier writhing with green flames falling where he'd just been.

The goblinfire was spreading everywhere but nowhere more than near where Ranger still was. Lying on the ground and bleeding out, the elves struggling to get close enough to finish her off.

"All three doors are on fire, you fucking idiot," Alexis said. "How are we supposed to get out of here, Cocky?"

Even the water wasn't an option. It was on fire too, because goblinfire was a goddamned horror.

"By following me," Constanza smugly replied.

She still had that slender stick in hand, and when she pulled away she kept it high. What had to be the goblinfire from the barrel followed it, like a strand of glue, which was weird. Goblinfire wasn't supposed to do that when inert, Indrani was sure of it. She must have done something to the substance while everybody else was looking. They followed her, and as if that stick was a magic wand the Concocter used it to part the flames in front of them. Every time she touched the green fire with the coated end of the stick, it was sucked in up the strand and towards the barrel. Which was not, as far as Indrani could see, burning yet.

"Straight path," Cocky said. "I can only divert so much before the threshold is passed and my barrel blows too. That... won't be pretty. Dragon blood is something of an amplifier."

Oh, that did not sound good at all. Still better than dying in a fire, though, so on Indrani went. And the straight path they were taking through a cage of flames was, inevitably, one that led them straight to the Lady. Still lying down there, bleeding out. There was movement, the Emerald Swords coming, but Cocky was quicker: she flicked her stick, snapping the strand, and a curtain of goblinfire closed behind them. There was a thundering sound inside a heartbeat later, the barrel finally exploding. But that felt another world away, when they were here looking down at Ranger. The three of them shared a long look.

An understanding came, eventually.

"We could leave you to them," Alexis said, crouching by the Lady's side. "Toss you back in there to die."

"It'd be deserved," Constanza said, crouching on the other. "A long time coming."

"It's one way to end this," Indrani said, meeting her teacher's eyes. "To make sure you don't come for us to even the scales for today. That you don't decide it makes us worth hunting."

"But I still remember when they sent me into the woods to die," Alexis said. "The look on the elderman's face. He thought he was doing right by the village. One girl for all of them. And I never got angry enough to forget that look, Ranger. To remember I swore I'd never be like him."

"I could let them kill you," Constanza said. "Like you let those bandits kill my family. But that's just you winning, isn't it? Me still living by your rules. And I won't have that, not anymore. I'm going to be better."

"There's dues, though," Indrani said, knife in hand. "And I have learned a thing or two about long prices. So here's your ending, Lady of the Lake."

The hand came down, the knife slicing deep across the nose. She passed it to Alexis, who cut deep down the left cheek. And she passed it to Constanza, who cut the last down the right cheek.

"They'll scar," Indrani said, knowing it to be true.

"Every time you look at them, remember that you once had pupils," Constanza said.

"And that you might have left marks on us," Alexis grinned through broken teeth, "but we left those on you."

A strange expression passed in the Lady's eyes as they rose, one after the other. Indrani did not dare put a word to it. They left her there, lying on the stone as the goblinfire burned behind her. Maybe she'd get up, maybe she wouldn't. Either way, it was on her alone. The three of them left the same way they'd come.

Together.

—

The Dread Empress looked troubled.

Akua was not the only one to have noticed, and all who did were troubled in turn. All of the city knew that Malicia had gathered the court here tonight so that her reign could end in dignity, so that she might try to become Chancellor under the new rising power or otherwise seek mercy. Most would be disinclined to grant it, but Akua Sahelian was said rising power and it would be her decision to make. If she sought to become Dread Empress. If she cared to sit the throne that Malicia was going to empty.

Yet here the empress was, looking troubled. Something must have happened in the receiving room out back. Vivienne had left it in a hurry, and looking harried, while the young man who was the Squire these days had looked oddly serene. Power now wafted from him stronger than Akua had ever felt it, which smacked of a transition – as did the even look of respect he had traded with the Black Knight before they parted ways. A Squire no longer, perhaps. For the best. Akua had struggled to pair the Name with anyone who but the last woman who'd worn it.

What had happened in there? Akua considered her curiosity, then set it aside. It was of no great import. Events were precipitating, and after the empress glanced away her face returned as a lovely mask of control. The doubts gone, and the tension went out of the nobles. All was as it should be. The Dread Empress of Praes would present one last play, and the fate of Praes would be decided by the worthies of this great hall as it had been for centuries.

"She schemes your death," Kendi whispered into her ear. "They all do, or will. One day they will see the truth of you, and all of Praes will recoil."

She considered that.

"Do you like singing, Kendi?" Akua asked.

"My sister did," he smiled, without a single speck of warmth.

"Have you ever heard The Tyranny of the Sun?"

He cocked his head to the side, nodded.

"What would you say it's about?" Akua murmured.

The dark-haired man held his tongue, chose his words.

"This very hall," Kendi Akaze finally said, "seen from below."

The Carrion Lord, she thought, really was such a terrible prick. She'd liked that song once, for all that it was maudlin and banned by decree. It had such a pleasant melody. Only now all that she could think of was that it dated back to the Sixty Years war, nearly five hundred years ago, and already the singers sounded... tired. Of all this around her, of the empire writ in dread. Of the dooms sought to the west, a hundred apiece for every ashen victory. A servant came to her, offering a golden goblet, and she almost smiled. Ah, there it was. She took it in hand but did not drink, dismissing the man. Akua waited in silence, even her supporters standing far from her now that Malicia was seated on her throne.

Out of fear, yes, but not of the empress. None wanted to steal from her moment and earn her ire for it.

"Akua Sahelian," Dread Empress Malicia said.

Silence fell like a blanket over the court. Not a soul dared to move.

"Malicia," she replied.

The older woman smiled.

"Am I not your empress, Lady Akua?"

Akua gently smiled back.

"Are you the empress of anyone at all, Alaya of Satus?"

A shiver in the air. Sharks smelling blood in the water.

"A bold claim," the empress said. "Empty, if no one speaks for you."

And that was the part where her backers were to step forward, speak on her behalf. Make boasts and promises, praise her deeds. It was rare for the throne to be abdicated with a semblance of peace, but hardly unheard of. Some tyrants could grasp that it was over before they found themselves bleeding out on the floor with a knife in the stomach. Some had even spared their predecessor instead of ordering their death as their first decree. All very civilized, an old play put on with fresh colours. And no doubt Malicia had a scheme at work. Malicia always had a scheme, it was her blessing and her curse.

But Akua had not climbed the Tower and walked through the Hall of Screams so that she could dance to the empress' tune.

"No," Akua said.

Surprised silence. She swept the hall with her gaze, saw wariness and greed and hate in the eyes of those around her.

"I am tired," Akua said, and then forced herself to say more, "of this, Malicia. This... play we are to put on. The pretence that you leave this throne willing, that I take it up instead of seize it."

"All of the empire is a stage, Akua Sahelian," the Empress replied. "We play our roles."

"And where did that get you?" Akua asked. "Playing along."

Malicia's face, so lovely and so cold, hardened.

"Those graceless in victory," she said, "are uglier still in defeat. Take care to remember that."

Only, Akua realized, the empress' attention was only half on her. How delightfully insulting. Malicia was looking around, scanning the room under the pretence of matching eyes with highborn. She was looking for someone and Akua happened to know exactly who.

"She's not going to come," the golden-eyed sorcerers said.

Malicia turned to her. Now she had the full attention.

"All that cleverness," Akua mused, "turned to waste by a single mistake."

"You-"

Gods, but she was tired. As if the Tower had eaten the marrow of her bones, left her to walk rattling. Tired and irritated, because what was even the point of this?

"Step down," Akua cut in, "or be made to."

The empress looked as if she had been slapped. Akua took a step forward, then two. Malicia looked so utterly at a loss that she almost laughed. The dark amusement running thick through her veins, she raised the golden goblet she'd been handed and tossed it at the Dread Empress of Praes. Who looked like she'd just swallowed a surprised yelp as she ducked out of the way. The goblet clattered against the throne of the Dread Empire, that ancient ghastly thing. The dark liquid dripped down the welded stone and iron, the ancient seat little more than a squat, ugly pile of stones.

Akua advanced, passing by the aghast Malicia without a word. She came to stand by the old thing, trailing a finger down the arm. She turned to offer a smile at the nobles below the dais.

"My ancestor," she told them, "murdered a woman here. Before this very seat."

Her hand left the stone.

"She trusted him," Akua said. "And he plunged a knife in her belly. Left her to bleed out on the floor. And when the life left her eyes, he sat down on the throne and named himself Sinister."

She had them, she could see it in their eyes. The hunger, the want. To be her, to serve her, to fuck her – to eat her whole, swallow up everything that had made her rise and make it their own. What was this empire, if not a covenant of the hungry?

"My mother used to say that Maleficent made an empire, but that it was Subira Sahelian that made it the Dread Empire," Akua said.

"She was not without wisdom. And that legacy, that blood, it carries with it a duty."

You have the master's blood, the demon bound to the Tyrant's Gate had said. Her line had been there since the first stone was set over another. Masters of dread, makers of horror.

"And so here I stand, where Subira once stood, beholding his work," Akua idly said. "And I wonder – would he still have plunged the knife, knowing what we'd become?"

The crowd shuffled, uneasy. These were not the words they had come here to hear. That was not her role in the play. They should have listened to her more closely.

"There comes a time where one must look back and ask: what purpose does this serve?" Akua said. "One thousand and three hundred years the Dread Empire has stood. Through triumph and disaster, through the darkest pits and the tyranny of the sun. And now, looking back, I ask you: what purpose do we serve?"

Unease thickened. She was mad, they thought. They had chosen a madwoman to lead them. The dark-skinned beauty laughed.

"I struggled with the question," she admitted. "But we do find answers in the strangest places."

What was the difference, between a knot and a noose? Nothing, Hakram Deadhand had told her, until there is a corpse. And that was the balance of it. The Dread Empire of Praes, was it a knot that could be undone or a noose strangling its people?

One need only look out the window to know the answer.

And so Akua Sahelian touched her sleeve, taking out the terrible gift her enemy had given her. Such a small thing, for the power it held. She touched it to the arm of the throne, the rough stone.

"Nothing," the blood of the original murder told them. "We are not the masters of this place, we are the sacrifice. And so I tell you now: this Dread Empire is at an end."

Smiling, Akua Sahelian struck the match against the throne. It burned bright and, feeling as if finally she could breathe, she dropped it on the throne. Where the goblet had spilled.

There was a heartbeat of utter stillness, as if the world itself had ceased spinning.

Then the throne burned green.

—

The world had been shattered under their feet.

Alaya was a fool. The Intercessor had never even been an ally of convenience, the old monster had known from the start that her scheme was fatally flawed and not said a word. All because she had thought she understood Akua Sahelian, that the girl was her mirror in the generation that followed. That she would want the throne, if only to mend it all. How terribly, utterly wrong she had been. Praes was a game that could be won, but Alaya had not won it. She had lost it, along with her throne, and now she was fleeing with the rest of the crowd like a rat leaving a sinking ship.

The orcs had known, she thought. They had been part of it. How else would they have a gate to Arcadia ready, would they know to herd the panicking nobles through it. They left Creation with a shiver, treading the realm of the fae to breathtaking sight. Higher than a mountain, a great tower of stone and bone rose through clouds and sky until it disappeared into the dark. The Tower's mirror here, seeping malice and madness out of every pore. They all fled from the sight of it, hurrying along a winding path of stone, and at the end awaited a way out.

They returned to Creation as a pack of huddling refugees, eyes drawn high to a sight none of them would forget as long as they lived. The Tower was burning. Like an emerald candle in the night, green flames rose from the bottom to swallow it whole. There was not a soul in the city who would not see it. As far as the Blessed Isle, Alaya thought, they might see the green light searing the sky. Her eyes lowered, finding a silhouette awaiting, and suddenly it fell into place. They were not just below the Tower, they were at the very bottom. At the foot of the sculpted stairs that led to the Tyrant's Gate, and atop those a man was waiting.

The tunic was a simple grey, its belly covered with bandages stained red. But there was no mistaking the man himself, for all that his hair had greyed and he had grown a salt and pepper beard. He watched them, they'd who'd been brought down below the first step one might take to climb the Tower, and smiled. His eyes were green as the flames behind him, the emerald blaze wreathing his silhouette and casting his shadow down over them all.

It slowly sunk in for everyone, as it had for Alaya, that he'd played them all for fools.

"Praes," Amadeus of the Green Stretch calmly said, "is a mould that must be broken."

And now everyone was there, the Wandering Bard smiled as she tested the string one last time. Perfectly tuned. She'd had the place from the start, but now she had the time and the officiant. All she needed was – ah, and there came the last missing guest. Catherine Foundling walked out of the dark, power still clinging to her cloak, and looked up through the gloom. Their eyes met, a moment, and she offered Yara a wink. She winked back, making herself comfortable on the stone, and strummed her lute with a practiced hand.

It was time to kill her and doom the world.

"There was once a girl," the Wandering Bard sang, "without a name."

Someperson

Well. That was quite the interlude.

Rest in pieces, Dread Empire of Praes. Long live the Not-Quite-Dread Not-Quite-Empire of Praes.

serdar314

Is it weird I hear bards song like Ragnar the Red?

Blue1ao

This was beautiful

Raved Thrad

Gah, now I'm going "Catherine! Catherine! Naal ok zin los vahriin! Wah dein assholes mahfaeraak ahst vaal!"

To the tune of "Sovngarde," of course, which I like much better than the other song. 😊

Raved Thrad

Blegh, that was meant as a reply to serdar314. >_>

SpaceDorf

I think the „Bards Song“ by Blind Guardian is more fitting, both in melody, context and name.

Meela

Amazed that I have not seen a single person mention this, but as soon as Indrani saw the barrels my mind started playing the music from Game of Thrones during the destruction of Baelor's Sept. Quite a lot of parallels here to mid-series GoT with wine-sipping Balcony Queen and the capitol that can't stop infighting even with invading armies at the gates.

One thing I don't understand is why Cocky set off the barrels in the basement. They would have been able to get away anyway and it looked like Ranger was already losing against the Emerald Swords even before the distracting explosion. So she didn't get any benefit from doing that and should have assumed that Cat did NOT want the Tower burned down, since part of Cat's scheme was taking place inside it.

kinghaart

It seemed pretty clear that Cat was fine showing up outside the Tower so I wouldn't be so sure.

She probably also figured they were rigged to blow anyway so she prepped that one barrel as a way out for them.

Metalshop

Oh man, that epigraph hits real different on the second read through.

Here's where we find out if Cat is bad enough to still triumph after this level of not compromising with anyone.

morroian

Broady this went pretty much as I expected and have so for a couple of chapters now. Speaking in 2022 with no spoilers now that we're near the end of this arc I'm being disappointed with every climactic moment since Kairos being a series of interludes with almost no Cat chapters. I really wanted at least 1 Cat chapter in the middle of these. Yes I can see that the interludes are now at an end but I still wanted a Cat chapter as all the events in Ater were unfolding as I have in the climaxes since Kairos.

Daniel E

I thought this would have been mentioned, but saw nothing in the comments. We've seen Knight Errant before; Book 6, Interlude 'Reprobates' – "And so Dread Emperor Irritant did shout thus: 'Leave him to me!' And then he did ignore the Knight Errant, and brawled with a common soldier instead, and triumphed over him."

Chapter 26: Singer; Sung

*"There was once a girl without a name,
There was a tower no one could claim
No one remembers why she has climbed,
Or all those she must have left behind*

—

*The first step is hardest, they told her You'll have to walk into the fire
It will burn away what you once were,
And always devour a liar*

—

*The second is the longest, they said
You will walk under the restless dead
The hanged all crooning from the gallows —
To join them and rest in the shadows*

—

*Taking the third step is the cruellest —
Walk when the moon is at her clearest:
Love will end with the kiss of the knife,
Trust is the wager that takes your life*

—

*The last is strangest, she said to them
The easiest and the most solemn
For when the tower is yours to claim
You will have forgotten why you came*

—

*There was once a girl without a name,
There was a tower no one could claim
No one remembers why she has climbed,
Or all those she must have left behind."*

– "The Girl Who Climbed The Tower", author unknown

The moment Scribe had first lied to me I'd known I was in mortal danger.

That lie, the refusal to share something with me she had grasped, was the crack in the stone. It didn't necessarily mean that Eudokia was meant to be my enemy or even the instrument of my downfall, but because of that night I had a blind spot and the Intercessor meant to kill me with it. The trouble was, of course, that knowing I was walking into some sort of trap didn't tell me anything about what that trap was. For all I knew, not walking in was exactly what would get me killed. Guessing games with the Wandering Bard were a good way to lose your fingers, if not outright your life, so instead of sitting in a dark tent to brood and try to make out what her plan was I'd gone on the offensive.

Even when you couldn't find the snake in the grass, you could still set the grass aflame.

So I'd thrown my torch. I got things moving in Ater by ordering Abreha Mireembe and Dakarai Sahel to betray me then throw their support behind Akua. It was a risk, of course. I did not believe that the same woman who had once been the Doom of Liesse would now claim the Tower, but I couldn't be sure. Not when the Intercessor was out there and circumstances in the capital changed by the hour. But it was the lesser risk, so it was the one I took. Then, 'lo and behold, after the grass took fire the snakes came slithering out. There was some sort of botched coup attempt against Malicia – by High Lady Takisha, apparently – that resulted in the Tower's weather artefacts going wild and covering the capital in vicious storms.

On the surface that was just highborn doing as highborn did, but there'd been one telling detail: the Bard had not intervened to prevent this. Which meant she wanted the storms to delay the resolution of everything in Ater, since little would get moving before my army breached the walls and I wouldn't attack while the capital was a deathtrap. From that I learned that the Bard's game was about the Tower and that she wanted to delay until certain conditions were met. The next step was, naturally to try and figure out what those conditions were. I had almost two weeks to see to that while hailstorms and other unnatural weather ravaged the capital, but immediately I began to feel like I was making a mistake.

It wasn't that we didn't find anything. Between Scribe's contacts and the Jacks I found out quite a bit, including what was to my eye a pretty clear campaign to make sure the High Seats were on the verge of open civil war. Over those two weeks pretty much every High Lord and Lady in Praes was given a visceral, personal motive to despise the others. No way that was a coincidence, and again it pointed at the Towe – and whoever climbed it – being the lynchpin of the Bard's game. Only that wasn't going to work, and I grew increasingly sure none of that was actually the Intercessor's doing at all. This was someone else. Malicia, probably, though I wasn't sure what she intended to get out of it.

It wasn't like the High Seats hating each other would make them like her more.

So the conclusion was that I was being had, and all these games surrounding the Tower were the red herring the Intercessor had laid out for me to pursue. I'd just arrived to that conclusion and was wrestling with the need to second-guess it when I received a gift: my camp was approached by a dozen people from the Green Stretch who claimed to be envoys. Envoys from what, was the natural question, and the answer turned out to be that many of the freeholders – swelled in numbers and skills by deserters from the Legions – had gotten tired of the Tower's shit and they wanted to secede. I was the natural interlocutor for that, it was hard to deny it.

I was still Queen of Callow, the kingdom the Green Stretches was only parted from by a river, and my army was besieging Ater. If I didn't back their play for independence, all they had to look forward to were a few early successes while whoever held Ater was busy settling the empire and then a brutal crackdown when the Dread Empire decided to put its breadbasket back in its place. On every level it made sense that they would come to me, but the timing was what drew my attention. I'd already been approached over the state of goblinkind, and now another chunk of Praes was looking for me to decide its fate? I smelled a rat. Someone had a hand in this.

So I heard out the envoys and then put them off, which they didn't like but couldn't really do anything about. Who else were they going to go to? They needed me to settle it for them, I told Vivienne when we discussed it, else nothing would change. And that was the moment it struck me. I looked for the stars again and found them faded. Grown even more distant. So that was the trick. The Role I had worn into the fabric of Creation, year after year, was that of a wrangler for Evil. I was the commander of Below's Named, a leader of the nations that kept no faith with angels. And looking back now, when was it exactly that the Intercessor had first seriously tried to kill me?

The Arsenal, once the Truce and Terms had been in place long enough they began to have the taste of law. The Intercessor did not care in the slightest if I was influential with nations. I could be Queen of Callow or First Under the Night and she'd shrug. Kingdoms weren't the weave for her loom. But when I'd become the representative for Evil, when Hanno had become one for Good, we'd changed things. It used to be that there were only Gods and Named, with the Intercessor in between, but that was no longer true. Now Named looked to either the White Knight or the Black Queen when they had grievances: there was another intermediary.

And how could such a thing ever be acceptable to an entity that the Original Abomination himself had called the Intercessor?

We were infringing on her power. Reducing it in a real, practical way. Just spreading about the knowledge of her existence had been enough to hamper her severely, hadn't it? There could be no more sneaking her way into a Band of five to tug at the strings up close and personal, not when her Name was known to everyone in our charge. Only it was even worse, because now I was directly claiming power that'd once been hers alone. More than once I'd called her the goddess of stories, but my Name was already beginning to steal fire from her hearth. I could already feel Named and I'd not even come into my mantle properly. How much more would I to do when I did?

So I must die, that much was a given. But that wasn't enough. I had to be killed in a way that undid the groove I'd worn into Creation, otherwise she was just kicking the trouble down a few years. If someone else took up my Role it'd be just as unacceptable, so more than just slitting my throat she had to undo the very Role I'd cobbled together. Which was why suddenly everyone was knocking at my door, bringing their troubles with them and asking me to fix it all. The Intercessor's power was not in destruction, it was in the nudge – so she was trying to nudge my Role. I was on the cusp of my Name coming together and if I settled the goblins, settled the Green Stretch, then I was forging my Name into a tool to move those forces.

About the disputes of borders and kings, the lands that had forged me into the ruler I was today. I would not be the Black Queen, that Name had been destroyed too thoroughly at the Folly, but it would not be so far. I would be a ruler over Evil. But not over Named, save those sworn to me. That was why I'd been able to feel Vivienne even though she was a heroine instead of a villain, I suspected. I would rule over some Names in the same way that a Dread Empress did, based on authority. But the sight of the stars in the dark would fade entirely away, that door closed. So I avoided speaking so much as a word to either goblins or the Green Stretch envoys, knowing it would give the Bard her victory, and looked for the final blow. There would be a third., because there was always a third. And looking back at the storm over Ater, I found my answer: the Bard had not stopped that disaster. She wanted the delay, because her third had not yet arrived.

It'd been two weeks away, the very orcish horde we'd all been following as it marched south on Ater. There was a Name among it, a powerful one, and I had thought it to be Hakram but it shone too brightly for that. Or perhaps, I'd thought, it just shone too brightly to be the Adjutant. Either way, there was only one thing to do. Against Juniper and Vivienne's protests, I refused to send envoys to the horde as it approached and forbade the Army of Callow from approaching the Clans. If it truly was Hakram leading the orc clans, then I could not risk conversation with him. I knew myself well enough to be aware that I'd be sucked in the moment we sat at the same table and that might very well be a disaster.

To beat the Bard, I had fight the same instincts that'd kept me alive all those years and take a step back. Do nothing. How restless and unhappy that made me ended up making me more certain than ever I'd finally caught my enemy's tail. And though there was a price to my abstention, there was also a prize. I had abandoned a path for my Name to take and embraced another, how could that be without consequence? After the Battle of Kala I'd come to see some Named as stars shining in the black, but my own Name was precipitating. Strengthening. It was more than just the stars, now, I could see trajectories. Objects in motion. And those paths were the paths their stories would take if they were not meddled with.

I'd seen only villains this way and earned splitting headaches trying to go further, but it'd opened doors for me.

When the storm ended, when the orcs approached and the confluence at the Tower neared its resolution, I acted. Regardless of the Bard trying to break my Role, she'd be using a knife to slit my throat so I set about removing them from the field. I sent the Ranger's three pupils out in the city to face her, knowing one way or another that confrontation would remove her from play – either she'd lose and be defeated or she'd defeat them and lose interest. I sent out the Squire to collect the Black Knight's head, but she slipped my noose after my own father let loose thousands of giant spiders into districts still full of civilians. The chaos that act of lunacy unleashed on Ater flipped the orderly board I'd been setting up.

Fine, so that round was a wash. I bailed out Archer and her companions when Ranger looked close to a win, knowing my side would benefit from there being a rematch – she struck me as unlikely to learn a lesson or come to an understanding that'd sharpen her Name, while I'd made a career out of betting on angry young women bringing it home. It wasn't a total wash, even though the Clans stumbled into the mess and the Army of Callow had to pull back all the way to the eastern walls. I finally knew where my father was and I got an idea of what he was after through Arthur's report, which had me adjusting my plans. I still had to avoid the Clans, and avoiding thinking about why lest I falter, but I knew where the fulcrum was now.

It wouldn't be the battle for Ater but the Tower itself, all signs pointed to it. So far I'd avoided the Intercessor's knives, so all I needed to do was ride this out to the end and I would get what I wanted. Which was more than just getting the East in order. Oh no, after all this I wouldn't be settling for so small a prize. Masego and I had already faced the Bard once, in the Arsenal, and this time she would not be getting away so lightly. And what we'd get out of her might well win us this war. She had set a trap for me, but I would turn it into a trap for her.

If the Tower was to be the battlefield, then I ought to take care of loose ends. Following Malicia's trajectory in the dark told me she was about to kill herself. Not with her own hands, but by following through a plan that'd kill her because of a fundamental mistake. I couldn't what mistake exactly, just that the groove would be 'villain fails to understand the other and gets her comeuppance'. Had to be either Akua or my father, I figured, but hard to tell. More importantly, it was a stable trajectory – and that meant the odds were good the Intercessor would be using it for something. I didn't need to know for what to know it was better to disrupt it.

She was best removed from the board before the resolution came, so I sent in Assassin and then threw in Squire as well when I saw that the Black Knight had hit the resolution of staying true to her ideals. That likely meant protecting Malicia, so I could call in Arthur's last part of the pattern of three to allow Assassin its clear shot at the Dread Empress. With Vivienne riding herd on the situation, the matter should be handled. I couldn't step in myself, much as I wanted to. If my boots were on the ground, the chances were too high that the Intercessor would be able to entangle me. I had to keep away until the end, act through intermediaries.

The irony of needing to fight exactly like the Intercessor to beat her did not escape me.

I disliked the idea of being blind in the Tower when it was where it would all come to a head, so I sent Archer and the other two after Ime. They were escorting Scribe, who I meant to take over the Eyes after their current mistress was eliminated – once she had, I'd get the stream of information I needed. Even better, I'd know more than the Intercessor in some ways. We could both follow Named, but I'd be the one with actual spies. It was the edge I needed, and it couldn't hurt to blind Malicia anyway. Masego I kept on task, I couldn't spare him for anything else, and Ishaq I had another use for. Apprentice I sent out to have a look at something else, an errand to keep her busy and away from what I didn't want the Bard to see.

With all that loosed, I found a rooftop to stand on the edge of. Waited for moving parts to come together. And my Name sang in joy, coiling around me. Began to bloom inside me. I already had an aspect almost fully formed, I found. Something I'd done again and again, something that aligned with what I saw as my Role in the great machine that was Creation. It felt deep and quiet, like the bottom of a well. But it wasn't even that revelation that had me smiling. I could see, now. Just small things, but it was a start. I caught pieces of Malicia watching the city from above, of Archer leading her companions through the tunnels beneath Ater.

And when the conflict came, I saw that too. The trajectory of my defeat: Ranger stepping in before Ime could be taken, freeing her to arrive just in time to derail Malicia's assassination. But I scored a victory as well, when the Lady of the Lake's three pupils left her bleeding on the ground. She'd survive, but she was done for the night. And Archer had created an opportunity for me without knowing it, one I took even knowing it might cost me my throat. I dipped out to see to it, returning just in time to see the last pieces coming together. The Tower was burning, my father was triumphant and the last test had come upon us all. Everyone was there, nobles and orcs and goblins and even the Black Knight. I came out of the Ways in a whisper of darkness, catching a glimpse of the Bard on a darkened rooftop and offering her a wink.

I had brought three knives here tonight – one up my sleeve, one waiting and one veiled. Time to see which of us had the sharpest blades.

Scribe was waiting for me in the dark of the street, eyes patient. I pulled my cloak tight, watching the nobles huddled at the bottom of the stairs that I could see from the side.

"Report," I ordered.

"Malicia abdicated, Akua Sahelian refused the throne and struck the match that set the Tower aflame," Eudokia said.

I kept the triumphant smile that itched to break out away from my face. So close to the end, gloating would be dangerous. Even if I'd been right, even though I'd seen the truth of her. It had not been a mask. It had been her, and now we would begin the last part of our journey together.

"Where is she?" I asked.

"Malicia's in the crowd," Scribe said. "We lost track of the other one. She left the Tower, though, that much I'm certain of."

"She won't die like that," I quietly said. "She'll be here. She wouldn't-"

Movement caught my attention. She was stunning, I thought, it pale and gold. Like some ancient goddess of dusk come to witness the death of empire, a wisp of impossible beauty unmarred by the grime of Creation. And Akua, eyes hooded, gracefully folded her legs and sat at the bottom of the stairs. Lower than my father, but still higher than anyone else. And with that, the end had begun.

"Is this all your doing then, Carrion Lord?" High Lady Takisha called out. "You burned and bled us so that we would kneel to Dread Emperor Black?"

"Did you not hear?" my father smiled. "The Dread Empire is dead."

I glanced at Scribe. I'd had my doubts his plan would work, but just in case I'd set Apprentice to look for one of the indicators that'd follow if he had succeeded.

"What did Apprentice report?" I whispered.

"Last word is that the Tower in Arcadia is aflame too," she murmured.

I grimaced. Amadeus was calling it too early, then. Until the monstrous mirror of the real thing was broken in Arcadia as well, I wouldn't bet on his work destroying Praes lasting too long. If he wanted to stick the landing, he still had to sell his story. To these people and to Below.

"No one here will kneel to you," High Lord Jaheem scorned. "This is nothing more than the tantrum of a man knowing he could never claim the Tower himself."

"What Tower is there left to claim, Jaheem Niri?" the Carrion Lord gently asked.

The sky was burning green behind him and they shivered.

"The Dread Empire failed," he said. "And so it died. It will not return."

"And what would you have instead?" High Lady Takisha challenged. "King Amadeus is no better than Dread Emperor Black. I'll not have it."

Murmurs of appreciation.

"There is a precedent," my father said, sounding faintly amused. "This land has been ruled without a tyrant before."

Sure, before Maleficent the First and the Miezans. It'd been a pack of squabbling petty kingdoms, much like Callow. Only somehow I doubted that was his plan, given that I'd inherited my tendency for centralizing authority from the man. Similar skepticism came from the crowd. A few scorned him out loud for wanting to split up Praes into lesser kingdoms.

"Are you so unfamiliar with our own history?" Akua laughed. "He does not speak of the Many Kingdoms. Or has Haider's Reign already faded from all your memories?"

That was vaguely familiar, but not. I glanced at Scribe.

"The Throneless Years," she murmured, looking spellbound as she watched the discussion. "It's what highborn call it."

Ah, I thought. That was why the name was familiar. Haider had been the Chancellor's name. It was old history from the Sixty Years War, which Dread Empress Regalia II had begun by invading Callow while it was still occupied by Procer. She'd died long before its end, even as the Fairfaxes reclaimed parts of the kingdom and it became a three-way brawl, and her successor Maledicta II's early victories ended in defeat and then assassination after repeat purges of the imperial court. Maledicta had killed most of the leading nobles that could easily take the throne, though, so it turned into a messy civil war around Ater as Callow took the time to force the last Procerans out. With no clear winner in the civil war, the Chancellor – Haider – proposed a compromise.

The lords and ladies of Praes would instead march west against Callow, and whoever distinguished themselves the most in the conquest of the kingdom would climb the Tower when the war was at an end. Haider would, meanwhile, rule as Chancellor much as he would have had Dread Emperor gone to war westward and left him in charge. The High Seats had accepted the compromise and the 'Throneless Years' lasted for two decades while the Praesi fought my countrymen as well as each other. As a military strategy it was a failure, since the Praesi made alliances with Callow against their rivals, but it did keep the civil war out of the Wasteland until the lord that would become Dread Emperor Vindictive I seized the Blessed Isle.

He cut off the supplies for the armies still west and closed the gates. Once his last rivals were dead beneath his walls, he marched on Ater and took it by force before crucifying the Chancellor. A charmer, that one.

And though it was thin grounds, I thought, my father was not wrong to bring it up. It was a precedent for rule by someone else than a Dread Emperor with no higher authority above them. Only what was the point of all this, if he was just going to torch the Tower and then replace one title by another? So long as the Role beneath did not change, nothing would. And the Tower in Arcadia would keep burning, but in time the flames would fade and the old abomination would rise anew.

"There have been Chancellors before that were Duni," Sargon Sahelian mildly said.

A wave of surprise. It was not endorsement, but it was not dismissal either. I frowned. Why? When I'd spoken with him in Wolof, he'd made it clear that he wanted my father nowhere near any sort of throne. What had changed? My answer came in the form of a shadow standing behind the green-eyed man, an aged woman finally arrived. Ime, still mistress of the Eyes of the Empire. Who was, by the gesture, declaring the Eyes supported him. My fingers clenched. Ah, so that was why. Ime had taken out Sargon's soulbox when the Tower burned out. It was now my father who held his leash.

"Are we going to entertain this masquerade?" High Lord Dakarai scorned. "It is becoming Dread Emperor in all but name. Just a fig leaf."

"The days of tyrants who ruled until death are behind us. The Chancellor will rule for seven years and one," the Carrion Lord replied. "Not dawn longer."

My eyes narrowed. There were flaws with that, obvious one. How would the Chancellor be chosen, what would keep High Seats from starting civil wars to depose them? My concerns were shared by some. High Lady Takisha let out a mocking laugh.

"And why should any of us obey such person?" she asked. "We would be the greater in every way."

"Because on this very night," the Carrion Lord said, "every army in Praes save the Legions of Terror will be disbanded."

Pandemonium. Half the nobles were screeching in anger, the rest jeering.

"A jest in poor taste," High Lord Jaheem said. "You have gone mad in your old age, Carrion Lord, to think we would meekly bend the knee to this. Why should we?"

The green-eyed man grinned.

"One vote," he told them.

Oh, I thought, you wily fucker. And he'd got their attention.

"Every High Seat will get to either name a candidate for Chancellor or cast a vote in the election," the green-eyed man said. "So will Ater, the Clans and the Confederation of the Grey Eyries returned to the fold."

And I saw it in the crowd, the hunger. Taking the Tower by force, it was tricky business even if it went perfectly. Tricky and costly. But here he was, offering them an easier way. The High Seats would have the majority of the votes – Wolof, Okoro, Nok, Aksum and Kahtan. Assuming Foramen kept its vote, there would be two goblin votes and one for the orcs. Ater would be loose vote, a ninth one to ensure there could be no ties. They had a clear majority, but that was where he'd been tricky: you could either nominate or vote, but not both. Alliances. He was forcing whoever wanted to be the Chancellor, the power in Ater, to earn the support of a majority of Praes.

And if anyone tried to go against the result, the sole army in Praes – the Legions of Terror – would grind them into fucking dust. They didn't get a vote, and I'd bet rubies to piglets that being part of the Legions would disqualify you from being nominated. My father was leaving enormous power in the hands of the High Seats, which had to gall him, but realistically speaking he couldn't break their influence without twenty years of brutal civil war. Instead he was consigning their influence to the political, which there was no taking away from them without extermination anyway, and making sure they had no military power. It was the kind of compromise I'd honestly not expected him to be able to make.

"And you support this, Lady Akua?" High Lord Dakarai asked.

Vivienne believed he'd genuinely flipped to become a supporter of Akua, this one, and I was beginning to be convinced as well.

"The Age of Wonders is dead," Akua Sahelian quietly said. "Are we to follow it into the grave? Scorn him if you wish, but I hear none offering a brighter tomorrow."

And that was another hit. It shook them, enough that the crowd began to hesitate. They didn't like him, didn't like this, but what else was on the table? And they had to know that if they didn't come to an accord, if they all fled back to their cities, Praes would collapse. Without something to bind it together, a new heart, the High Seats would turn into kingdoms and make war on each other once more. And after years of civil war, no one hear was hungry for more slaughter. Many began to discuss it, but it was High Lord Sargon who broke the stalemate.

"Wolof nominates Amadeus of the Green Stretch for Chancellor," Sargon crookedly smiled.

It was a challenge as well as a statement. Speak or walk away.

"I nominate myself for Chancellor," High Lady Takisha replied through gritted teeth.

Ah, and there went the southern half of Praes.

"The Clans vote for Amadeus of the Green Stretch," Hakram calmly said.

My fingers twitched at the sight of him. There was no denying it now, was there? He was the Warlord. He was lost to me. I forced it down. I could not afford distractions right now.

"Foramen votes for Amadeus of the Green Stretch," High Lady Wither said, then cackled. "So does the Confederation of the Grey Eyries."

Surprise and fear. Ater could have no vote, not in this election, and so four of the eight who'd speak already had. One more and my father would be the Chancellor of Praes.

"Your opinion on the right to rule of the undead, lord?" Abreha Mirembec called out.

He grinned, all teeth and malice.

"Acceptable," he replied.

The old corpse grinned back. I could have stopped her from speaking, I knew. Pull at the strings. But not now, not when I was so close to getting the outcome I wanted – my father on something like a throne, Praes in hands I could trust.

"Aksum votes for the Carrion Lord," High Lady Abreha called out.

And just like that it was over. Dakarai Sahel voted for him as well and Jaheem Niri nominated himself, but it was already settled. Rising to his feet, the bandages on his side flecked with red, my father smile.

"Then for my first decree I dissolve every private army in Praes," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said. "And charge the Legions of Terror to enforce the result of any and all elections."

Nim stood high above the crowd, and through her helm I thought I glimpsed eyes gone watery. She was moved.

"We will take up the duty with pride," the Black Knight replied.

He offered her a fond smile.

"As for my second decree," the Chancellor, "we will begin negotiations to sign onto the Liesse Accords. We will bargain with the Grand Alliance."

I swallowed a grin. I was still furious at him, deep down. What he'd unleashed on the city... But he'd always been a monster. I'd known that from the start. The reason I'd come to love him anyway was just before my eyes. He was going to do it. He was going to get Praes in line and join the war.

"Are we to bleed for Procer, then?" High Lord Jaheem coldly asked.

"We earn our place at the table, so that we might bend the terms," he easily replied. "And if you worry of the costs, perhaps you should remember the last Throneless Years."

Puzzlement.

"Callow was meant to be the proving grounds deciding who would claim the Tower," he reminded them. "Let Keter serve the same purpose. When my eight years come at an end, who better than the victors of the war against the Original Abomination himself?"

Ah, the appeal to pride. No lack of that here to use. There was some back and forth, questions and answers, but my attention was elsewhere.

"So?" I asked.

"We'll know soon," Scribe replied.

The runner came back with word from Sapan quick enough. Scribe grimaced.

"The Tower is broken," she said. "But it still stands."

Fuck, I thought. It wasn't over yet. It was exactly what I'd been afraid of: I was going to have to bless this. Like a queen kissing a baby, I'd have to signify my approval before it came to an end. And that meant stepping into it. I breathed out. Not too far from here I could feel the Night I had invested, the knot of smooth power. I'd taken the precautions I could, I reminded myself. Now I just needed to wade in and see if I'd beaten the Bard or if this was all going to turn to ash. I steadied myself, patted Eudokia's shoulder and strolled out around the corner.

It took a moment for people to notice me. It was dark out and they were talking and there were many of them. But in time they did, and the sound of chatter died. Soon not one of them dared even to breath too loud, leaving only the sound of my deadwood staff clacking against the stone as I limped forward. Some part of me gloried in it. In the terrifying figures of my youth now going still at the sight of me. At the fear in their eyes. Once, as a young girl, I had seen my father silence an entire banquet hall simply by entering it. I'd sworn, that night, that one day I would have that power to.

I'd kept my oath.

"Black Queen," my father greeted me.

"Carrion Lord," I replied. "Or should it be Chancellor now?"

"Either will suffice," he said.

"Chancellor, then," I mused.

I swept the assembled nobles with my gaze. Only one met it: Akua's golden eyes met mine. She was on her feet now, but her face distant. As if unconcerned with all this. Waiting for it to end.

"You speak for Praes now," I said.

"I do," he replied.

"Then you answer for Praes as well," I mildly said.

He conceded the point with a half-nod.

"I am not unaware that we have earned enmity," my father replied. "Reparations will be offered."

"It will take more than gold to even those scales," I coldly said.

"And I offer more than that," he easily replied. "Our signature on the Liesse Accords, yes, but a more immediate boon as well."

I cocked my head to the side.

"I'm listening."

"I have a way to even the odds against the armies of Keter," he told me.

I stilled. Well now, there was a princely offer. Below us both, some of the nobles smiled. For people who largely despised him, they were warming up to the regime rather quickly.

"A worthy price," I said.

He cocked an eyebrow.

"But?"

"There is one thing more," I said. "One among you allied with the Dead King even as he sought to destroy all of Calernia. One of you sabotaged and attacked the Grand Alliance at every occasion. That offence needs answering."

"Careful now," the Carrion Lord softly warned.

I met his eyes with my sole one, undaunted.

"Give me Alaya of Satus," I evenly said. "Who was once empress. Give me the hand behind the Night of Knives and a hundred enmities since."

Give me Ratface's killer, I thought. Give me the reason I had to come to the Wasteland when the world is dying.

"The Grand Alliance," he said, "does not get to make such demands."

My fingers tightened.

"Careful now," I echoed. "Do you think that, after these last few years, Praes can make any demand at all?"

"It does not have to be this way," he quietly said.

"It does," I coldly replied.

Because Praes had gotten away with this for too long. And I loved him like a father, even after this latest monstrosity, but that did not mean he got a pass. That burning the Tower would end it all. Praes would pay one last price in blood for the horrors it had unleashed on us all. Let the slate be called clean after that, but not before. I glanced down into the crowd and found the woman who had been the Dread Empress of Praes this morning. Alaya of Satus looked... tired. Her beauty had not waned, but the elaborate green dress hung loosely on her. She looked tired and afraid, I thought. She met my eyes with resignation. She saw her death in me.

I had thought I would take pleasure in this. Now I felt almost ashamed. It still needed to be done.

"Then I'm sorry," my father told me.

He descended a few steps and my eye followed him down. Hakram had risen up a few steps until they stood side by side. Their heights made it look almost comical, but there was no humour to be found now. I had a sinking feeling in my stomach, like I'd just made a mistake.

"No," the Warlord said.

My face turned into a blank mask. I set aside the feeling of betrayal, raw and bloody as it was.

"Warlord?" I flatly asked.

Hakram's face was as carved out of stone.

"I have sworn an oath that the Clans will not march against Keter if Alaya of Satus is taken," the Warlord said. "I will stand by it."

My father's face was not apologetic, but there was not a speck of joy to be found in it. Behind them, I found the mood was matching. Some of the nobles were smiling, once more, and when I looked at the others – well, the orcs were a given but I found no purchase with Wither either. I had not struck a bargain with either her or the Grey Eyries, and now that decision was coming back to haunt me.

"The way to even the odds against Keter for her life," Amadeus calmly said. "That is the bargain."

And I considered it, for a moment. Maybe if I made a compromise, then – and immediately I let out a soft gasp. The stars were dying. The black was fading. The Name itself, after all this time, was waning. And in that moment, I finally understood the trap that the Intercessor had laid out for me. I'd told dozens of people I had come here to kill Malicia. High nobles and Named, rulers and simple soldiers. It was one the thing about this campaign I'd never wavered about or hidden. I had staked my reputation on it. And now, on this final night where my Name was to form, I was being forced to walk back those words. I had come here to assert power over the East, and now the East was throwing that claim back in my face rejecting it.

It was never only Named or nation, I realized with dim horror. I'd always needed to have both. I'd just been tricked into thinking it was a choice. And so now that I was on the verge of losing one entirely, I was on the verge of destroying my own Name before it could form. I'd understood what the Intercessor was after all this time, but I had been entirely, terribly wrong about how she was going to do it. It'd been about this the whole time. She had made sure that my father would win and Malicia would survive just to ensure that this very moment would come about. And now I had the choice to either throw away a Name that might win us the war tonight – Gods, what Masego and I had planned! – or... I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. Or assert my authority over them the hard way.

Kill them.

I had been a hard girl and I'd become a harder woman, but I still flinched at the thought of that.

"If she dies," I quietly told them, "the war could be won tonight."

I saw that sink in, and even as in their eyes the realization of a mistake bloomed I felt my stomach clench. How very deeply I had been manipulated. I'd kept my distance from all of them for fear of them being used as a knife against me, but that'd been nothing more than a shadow on the wall. Now the knife was being pointed at my throat precisely because I'd not spoken with either of them. I the distance I heard notes of a hauntingly familiar tune, sung by a heartbreakingly beautiful voice. The only person who'd had all the information was up there on that roof, smiling as we all stumbled in the dark. I closed my eye, then opened it. Breathed out. Found the frozen calm at the heart of me, the ice.

"Step aside," I said, and it was nothing less than an order.

"And who are you to demand that?" Amadeus asked. "It is a conqueror's demand, and you have not conquered here."

The wants of the woman, I thought, and the needs of the queen. Hakram saw it in me first, took half a step back. I loved them both. Hakram more than my father, perhaps, but both deeply. But that was just me. I could make another Warlord. I could force another Chancellor to kneel. But to gain my victory over the Bard, there was only tonight. And that victory, I thought as I felt like weeping, might save millions. What we'd planned, Masego and I... What did two lives matter in the face of that? I could love them all I wanted, but I had buried people I loved before. Two lives against millions.

Gods damn us all.

"I am," I replied, "your keeper."

It rang out, loud and clear, without my ever having raised my voice.

"There might come a time where you earn a kind hand, a protector, but not tonight," I coldly said. "Instead you earned me. You dealt out evil and it has been returned to your gate, but you think that at this hour of reckoning you can flee from your dues?"

I struck my staff against the steps and the stone cracked, split as if the very earth knew my anger. They backed away, both

"Who am I?" I hissed. "I am Below's watchman, the enforcer of the black laws, and I tell you now that if you do not settle your debt in full then I will cast your shivering souls out into the darkness from where is no return."

Power coursed through my veins, the open maw of a great beast just my ear. If could feel its warm breath, the eagerness in the fang. It wanted blood. An old friend returned at my side.

"I am the Warden of the East," I told them, and it became true. "Step aside."

My words rang with power and Hakram had to fight it, but my father only froze half a beat. I met his eyes then. That eerie pale green, and behind them I saw fearsome thing I always had. Cold gears of steel, turning. Grinding. And the mind behind it, as he had once told me, worked only one way. In the face of conflict, he'd confessed that night, I will reduce all individuals involved to instruments, and seek what I consider the best outcome. I'd never seen it happen before, him finding its path and committing to it. Power pulsed heavy in the air. Something old and deep, something beyond even the Sisters. He was calling in his dues to Below, as Hune once had.

A heartbeat later he had a knife in hand and I flicked my wrist, the leather contraption Pickler had made me bringing his first gift to my palm.

He took half a step up, and flush as I was with the power of my Name I saw him move. My neck, the blade would bite into my neck. I took half a step down, already seeing it happen in my mind's eye. The blow would draw blood, but not deep enough. Mine would not miss. I let out a ragged breath, half a scream, and as we embraced steel found flesh. My knife, my gift, bit deep found the heart. And I felt a cold edge against the side of my neck. No, I realized dimly. Not the edge. The side. He'd not so much as pricked my skin. I broke away, but could not part too far. He was slumping already, but on his place face I found a twitching smile.

In the distance, a lute made a false note.

"No," I whispered. "No, no, no – Father why did you do that."

"Forced your hand," he murmured. "You have to spare her now. There's no one else who can replace me."

And he was right. The High Seats all hated each other now, there was no one else left who could possibly rule except Akua. And she would refuse it. We slumped to the ground together, my leg throbbing with pain, and I reached for Night. Tried to stop the damage. It did nothing, as if some force was devouring the power. He had, I remembered with horror, called in his dues to Below.

"It didn't have to be this way," I croaked.

"It'll take blood to finish it," he rasped. "It always does."

"You hate martyrs," I cursed him.

"This is Praes," he smiled. "What is one more sacrifice?"

"You fucking fool," I wept.

Tears. How long had it been, since I had wept tears? The lute again, in the distance. The melody was smooth.

"Proud of you," he got out. "So proud. My daughter."

And what kind of a man would say that to the girl whose knife was still in his heart?

"Monster," I accused.

The green eyes softened.

"The very worst kind," he smiled.

He clutched my hand.

"Please," he asked. "Goodbyes."

Face grimly set, I rose away. The knife I left in him. It was the only thing keeping him alive. Alaya of Satus came without needing to be called. There were tears, I saw at the corner of her eyes. She knelt by his side, all of us watched by a hundred eyes, and what they whispered at first I did not hear. But the end I did.

"It was both of us," my father got out. "Both."

It was getting harder from him to talk.

"It shouldn't have come to this," Alaya whispered.

"Do better," he said. "Do it right, this time. For the both of us. Make it as it should have been."

"I, I can't-"

"Do you trust me?" he asked.

Her face, I thought was the picture of anguish.

"Always," Alaya of Satus hoarsely replied.

"We'll win," he promised, threading their fingers. "Be free."

In the distance, the empire burned green. With a last rasping breath, he laid down on the steps of Tower and died. I'd killed my father for the third time, and this time it was true. And I knew, without asking or knowing how I knew, that when the message from Apprentice came it would tell me the Tower in Arcadia had broken. I breathed out raggedly, and the sound of it covered the footsteps.

The knife sunk through my ribs, but it stopped before it could reach my heart.

Not because Scribe had stopped striking but because she was dead. The sword, shining red and wetly in the light of the half-moon, ripped clear out of her skull. The last wisps of the veil faded as the Barrow Sword flicked away the blood from the edge. Eudokia slumped to the ground, eyes lifeless. The moment Scribe had first lied to me I'd known I was in mortal danger. And now I knew what it was that she'd kept from me. That my father would, whatever the cost to him or anyone at all, keep Alaya of Satus alive. I put a hand against my side as I limped away. It came away red. I seized Night, slowed it down, but I could not heal. It would have to suffice.

Of the three knives I had brought, two had found blood. Only one remained.

"He didn't buy you your life," I said.

Alaya of Satus, once-empress of Praes, met my eye unflinchingly. Hers were as red as mine, but what did that change? I had loved him, but I was still the Warden of the East. I would still collect the dues.

"I thought as much," she said. "Seven and one?"

I nodded.

"And when the first dawn of the ninth year comes," I quietly said, "I will come for you."

She did not answer for a long moment, looking down at his corpse.

"Eight years will already be too long," she quietly said.

I stood in silence as I watched the greats of Praes gather again for the election of their Chancellor. The votes, this time were unanimous. It was done. Only one last thing remained. I took back the knife from my father's corpse.

"Won't you come out?" I asked. "You failed, Yara. I still live."

A snort from behind me.

"Well, you're already well on your way to being dead inside," the Intercessor said, frowning down at my father's corpse. "Gods, what an unreliable prick in the end. Didn't think there was that much of a person left in him."

"Your mistake," I said.

"If he'd been Named it would have worked," she sighed, "but you don't have that many blind spots left. Balls. Next one will be our last, I think. You can have this one – you've got to be getting used to the taste of ashes in your mouth."

"No," I quietly replied.

"No?" she repeated, amused. "Then why do you keep swallowing them?"

"There won't be a next time," I said. "This ends tonight."

She rolled her eyes. Then a heartbeat later, she cocked an eyebrow.

"So that's why you kept Hierophant back," the Intercessor said, then shrugged. "You're getting repetitive, Cat. You gonna try your Arsenal play again? You ought to-"

The silver harpoon took her in the side. It didn't break flesh, but it sunk deep. Eyes shining under the eyecloth, Masego ripped his way out of the Twilight Ways and strode onto Creation as the barrier between realms screamed in pain. The glass eyes lingered on my father's corpse, then on Scribe's.

"You-"

His long, clever fingers closed around the harpoon and he tugged. The Bard's scream interrupted her own words.

"When I am done with you, Intercessor," the Hierophant said in a calm, even tone, "there is nothing Above of Below that will be able to put you back together."

I shivered, as much because of the mildness of the delivery as the words.

"You can do nothing," the Wandering Bard hissed. "You think it's not been tried before? I can't die, you fools, and pain just-"

"This isn't about death," I said. "It isn't even about pain. This is about loss."

I glanced at Masego and he nodded without turning. I put a hand by his own on the silver harpoon's shaft. The sorcery he held washed through the both of us, thundered through our veins. And I glimpsed it, just for a moment, what she saw. The lay of it. Like a city seen from the sky, a maze of turns and twists only they were all stories. People. All the stories in the world.

"As I thought," Hierophant said. "It will take two."

"Better this way," I spoke through gritted teeth. "I'll finish it myself."

He ripped out the harpoon, and even as the Intercessor hoarsely shouted I saw half the world disappear. We'd stolen it, Hierophant and I. Half the stories in the world, we'd stolen them from her. Above's stories were gone from her sight, from her soul. They'd make a decent enough present for the Warden of the West, but before that it was time to take my half. I took her by the throat and my beast laughed, laughed in a way that sounded like a howl.

"Can you taste them yet, Yara?" I whispered. "The ashes?"

And she opened her mouth to answer, or so I thought, but I saw only red. She'd bitten off her own tongue, I realized. And she was choking herself to death. I tried to save her, keep her alive longer, but the moment the Night touched her she was gone. I could almost feel her, feel her eyes on me. Feel the utter, absolute fury. And when I reached out for my Name, for the stars in the black and the stories they followed, I saw a shiver go through the world. They stopped. All of them, stopped. The Names still existed, but they no longer moved.

"Oh Gods," I whispered.

We had stolen half the stories in the world from the Intercessor. And now, in her wroth, she had killed the other half. It was gone, like vanished in the air. Below's Named were no longer bound by stories. And Above's had been wrested from the Intercessor, but we didn't know how to use them. I found one star brighter than all the rest, followed, and glimpsed what lay within.

A dead man sat on a throne, still as the corpse he was.

"Interesting," the Dead King said, and if a skull could smile he would have.

Oh Gods, I thought again. Villains no longer had stories. There was no longer anything holding him back. The sigh faded, leaving me to stand alone as the sky burned green above me.

I had just doomed us all.

Golden Lark

Guys.

Guys guys guys guys guys.

I can't believe no one has mentioned it yet.

TRIUMPHANT.

Raved Thrad

Don't you mean "She Who Has Returned?" 😊

dadycool

Oh yeah, without Stories, there's nothing keeping her away, just like her friend and ally the Dead King.

Shawn DeLuca

Not gonna lie, while I loved so much of this chapter, I found Cat's new name pretty anticlimactic. I was thinking Black Queen of the Damned or something big and new. Warden of the East feels lackluster after all the build to it.

But everything else in the chapter was amazing!

Thanks!

Shawn

dadycool

I was imagining her Name to simply be "Black", as in representing the entire Below faction. In some ways, a Name is what the Named makes of it. Think of the two times Cat was Squire. First, she was, pure and simple, Amadeus' student. Second time around, she was a Queen in her own right with vastly different goals, and Aspects to match. Even Names with predefined functions, like Black Knight, have a lot of wiggle room, like letting Amadeus be Chancellor in all but name and rule Callow all by himself.

kinghaart

But Amadeus ISN'T the Black Knight anymore?

Noldere

Now that the tale Catherine- master of story-fu- is done, maybe we can get back Catherine of the flipped shatranj board?

kinghaart

I think she just flipped all the boards and found the DK waiting on the other side.

I wonder if the DK saw this coming based on third Liesse?

ISiejek

Well the specifics with the story's was interesting and I didn't see that coming but the twist of the knife went just as I thought, and I still can't articulate properly what I expected but it is exactly that slow twist with a sharp edge

broadaxe

sounds to me like its more of a reset, i mean all these stories and grooves were created at some point, so presumably new ways of being of below will be created as belows lot do things, making stories anew?

Idunno i'll be interested to see where this leads, though i am a bit scared of disappointment here :3

AceOfSword

I think you're right, but the problem is that while Below is free to create new stories they've also lost all the momentum associated with the established plotlines.

Remember how the Tyrant kept going at some point just by always having plans starting one after another because the first step of any villainous plan is always successful? Well, now that the stories are gone that might not work anymore.

kinghaart

But more importantly, nothing stops the Villain from totally winning anymore which is Bad News for the GA against the Dead King.

One Comment

I've seen comments guessing the Name that Cat would receive awhile back and I always rather disliked Warden of the East as an option, not because Cat doesn't fit the role, but because it is so limiting. There is not a single person alive that has half the accomplishments that she has nor has she been limited to just the east. She fundamentally changed the course of an entire race as well as become their leading religious figure, she also was directly responsible for twinning of two fae courts and the birth of an entire realm, while Hasenbach has been able to keep the west limping along that has only been because of Callowan gold and grain and the deals Cat made with basically the entire continent; none of those were in the east and are arguably bigger accomplishments than anything she did in the east. Hasenbach might be warden of the west but she was only able to do that thanks to Cats actions. Sure, Hasenbach or Hanno can be counted as stabilizing the west, but why is their Name and Role equal to what Cat's Role has been or what she has been able to accomplish in her life. It's depressing that even one of Cats accomplishments since she graduated from the college would be enough to earn anyone else a name, and she has dozens of them, and somehow her Name is equal to what either Hanno or Hasenbach can reach? I get that the Role she has been in recently is getting the east in order, but she's basically been soloing the entirety of the continent; She's gotten in order and is the keystone of the alliances between the Drow, Dwarves, Levant, Callow, and Procer. Why is her Name defined on her bringing in one more in the form of Praes?

Abrakadabra

She did not Just bring in Praes. She brought in Callow too. Both is the east.

kinghaart

Also the Drow were in the East when she first got them. She's also taken steps towards bringing in the League of Free Cities.

Not sure about the Golden Bloom however.

Zach

The "East" here is shorthand for Evil/Below. The Name in this case means she has authority over Evil Named in general (well, in Calernia at least).

Sinead

'East' is a poetic touch. Think of the Ministers of Left and Right already mentioned for the Yan Tei.

Burdi

The Name is the same but there are a fundamentally different, Warden of the West was a Name created by Wandering Bard. It was a political name, govern over Border and political thing. Warden of the East is created by Cat govern not only over Border, area and political thing but also over Villain.

Hasenbach has political power while hanno has Named power. Meanwhile Cat has both of it.

Though it looks the same, Warden of the East is more powerful because She has both of it.

green

once Cat settles down I hope she realizes what a fantastic last gift the Bard gave her. she's just been given the knife that will save Calernia. maybe she'll start to realize it when she gets a good look at the Knight Errant.

let Good have their worn-in-the-groove stories. Evil is now officially off the leash, and the Age of Wonders is dead.

tmchin75723

Right? Most of Amadeus' teachings are how to circumvent stories. Most of the Grey Pilgrim's teaching is how to lean into stories better.

Unless you're a Tyrant, stories are usually bad for those below. Cat often wins by coopting hero stories.

Horrible demon plagues and full on destruction might be coming, but if they win then this is overall a very good thing.

Insanenoodlyguy

That's a big iff.

green

everything about this development is a big if, frankly. it depends on how this "Evil stories are dead" thing works. does it mean that Evil Names don't work anymore? bork goes Calernia! does it mean that Evil Names aren't bound to stories any more? Evil's off the leash! does it mean something else entirely? who knows!

I see the Knight Errant as spearheading the Gray Names: not bound to Good and stuck in their stories, or bound to Evil and loose/depowered because of it. Ranger and Archer also seem to be in that category, despite their current leanings towards Dark. I was really hoping Cat's new name would break the Light/Dark dichotomy, and in a way the Bard did it instead.

though if Evil Names were all borked, I have to imagine that the Gods Below would have quite a lot to say about it. imagine the hissy fit the Choirs would pitch if it was the Good stories that got "killed." Below doesn't seem to intervene directly in mortal affairs as much as Above does, but I can't see them simply sitting back and being cool with that much of a loss.

I know, this is all kind of incoherent and probably self-contradictory, I'm still thinking about this chapter.

Liliet

P sure Knight Errant is a TYPICAL hero, just one in response to unusual circumstances.

MoreBeer

I assume the loss of villain stories means the grooves are wiped away. Villains will no longer be compelled to monologue etc, nor are their short term successes and long term losses guaranteed.

Probably new villains can't come into being either, since Names are the ruts in the road worn by the stories. I'd expect that until new stories form somehow, the current villains are the last.

tmchin75723

Well, no groove means less Squire -> Black Knight, but it shouldn't have much effect on the process of coming into a new name.

There weren't grooves in the beginning, after all.

Raved Thrad

Took me a moment to reparse that as "if and only if" instead of "identify friend or foe." Confused me there for a bit. 😊

mavant

Amadeus 😞

David Stone

The feeling I get from this is that the Wandering Bard is more important than we realized, and I think this explains why the Dead King saw her as the enemy. She didn't see stories and interfere with them, I think she was the reason stories exist. The Dead King didn't fear her because she could meddle with his plans and he didn't want to kill her to prevent that, he wanted to kill her (for real) so that he would just be an immortal entity who could slowly plan his way to victory rather than "Evil that eventually gets defeated no matter what". The Wandering Bard doesn't understand the stories, her power is to cause the stories to be powerful.

MoreBeer

Been thinking something similar for a long time now. That the WB is the reason for stories having such power in the Guideverse.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I believe you're correct, but it still feels like kind of an asspull.

Before the Gods wrought Creation, they made Arcadia, a world in which narrative is the only meaningful force in existence. Yara of Nowhere was formerly Yara of Some Place or Another, a random mortal in the right place at the right time with the right personal qualities for the Gods to make her an offer she either couldn't refuse or was fooled into accepting; so how did narrative causality work in Creation before there was an Intercessor? Did the Gods have some power that they gave up unto her? Are we to believe after all this time that the Gods waited for ages of Creational history (from the age of Titans and the divine beasts that became dragons 'til the advent of sovereign human civilizations, then from that advent 'til Yara's predicament) to reintroduce the mechanic their previous game was centered around? I honestly suspect that Bard having this level of importance is a retcon.

I'm still committed to seeing this story through, mind you.

kinghaart

If it's a retcon, it began at least 5 books ago.

Though I think your premise is off. Bard isn't important, per day. There were others veggio and more will come. It's more that Bard had POWER, since she is the one who tells the stories she can blot them out.

Really, this all came to prove that the Age had ended and with a new age, new stories too. Heroes need to find their grooves again, but Evil can now chart a new course.

I don't know how much of an inkling Amadeus had about how this would shake out with Bard, but I think daughter just outdid father as far as "breaking the mould" that binds Villains to losing.

Leblanc

Oh baby the good old victory fallowed immediately but greater defeat as is Practical guide to evil law, I wish I could say i was didn't see it coming the moment Cat won something.

Christian Oaks

The dead king can finally go all out that is terrifying.

Mental Mouse

At the same time, he's lost the stories protecting him too....

kinghaart

From what, really? The only forces left to challenge him are Good ones that are still stuck to their stories.

He can now open permanent he'll gates anywhere with no consequences.

Salt

The stories probably aren't gone for good. Catherine, quite literally the "Queen of Lost and Found", just got a role making her warden over Villains as a whole. Villains who just Lost all their stories.

Pretty high chance, imo, that one of her aspects lets her do something along the lines of forcibly applying stories to Villains or dredging up lost stories back into relevance. It'd cement her wardenship over Villains even further, if she could either empower or kill villains by forcing the right story on them. She wouldn't be directly controlling them or anything, but her authority as a warden would be unquestionable and nigh-impossible to challenge.

Person

I feel like Warden of the East is a little anticlimactic as well. Cat may have been trying to set up a sort of 2 Wandering Bard like names (but a little more human) for evil and for good (Warden of the East and Warden of the West respectively) that would keep each other in balance.

Zach

I feel like this chapter did a good job of explaining away my misgivings about Warden of the East. Like Cat mentions, she's only had authority of heroic Names that she's been in a position to have authority over through her position in the Grand Alliance (mainly due to the other side of the coin – Hanno – not really taking up the mantle of being a leader of Named to the same extent that Catherine did).

But she does not personally have an ambition to have authority over all Names. She always wanted to let someone else handle the Good Named.

gibsonstratocaster

Interesting chapter, but I somehow feel too much happened too quickly. Let's see the aftermath in the next chapter.

Richard Tweeddale

Who was holding the Barrow Sword? Has that sword appeared before? I've kind of lost track.

Deworld

Borrow Sword is a Name of a person. He was around since previous book.

Ragnarok Ascendant

Yeah, no. This is just...look.

Cat came here to deal with the problem of the Dead King and to get diabolists for sealing the breaches.

This? This is just piling more shit onto the shitpile and quite frankly I'm tired of this entire 'Cat can't ever win straight on' dynamic that keeps popping up. There was no reason for her to so firmly grasp the Idiot Ball when it came to her father and there's no reason for Bard to have such power as 'yeah I can insta-kill all the stories when I feel like it'. It's an escalation that was never foreshadowed and, like a lot of this chapter, feels a great deal like authorial fiat.

This chapter would've been a lot better if it'd been 2 or 3 chapters instead.

Sinead

To be honest, I do not know why Cat could not see this come to pass, unless she was working from the basis that Amadeus fully broke ties with at the Peace of Salia.

As for Yara, I read that as her using the fact that Maseago was pulling the power out of her to give her the chance to wipe the villainous grooves out of Creation.

If we had a chapter or two where they set up this plan and foreshadow the spear (it's a bit of Take and Wrest) there can then the general strategy could have been laid out ahead of time.

Person

Agreed. I would honestly have liked Cat to just win here. She's going to be facing up against literally the most powerful Name to ever exist on the continent, she doesn't need more shit thrown her way. Especially in a way that feels kinda arbitrary.

therealgridlock

It's been foreshadowed since the very beginning of the book.

Father figures die. They're expendable, in this world and any world, and if they die for a cause then oh well.

As soon as Amadeus was her father, he was always going to die to do something, either prove a point or save her or teach her a lesson, and he died destroying the last story of Praes.

This has been very well foreshadowed.

As for the bard? We've always known she had a big role to play, just never what that role was so the revelation that she can wipe the trajectories of stories clean entirely? That doesn't surprise me.

Yes, the escalation is new, but the trend isn't. They brought out the pilgrims star and then neshamah went "well now I get demons too, cuz you did it first" and here we see the bard doing the same thing.

They use a magic harpoon that frankly I don't remember but was probably mentioned before, to rip half the stories out of the wandering hard, and before they can rip the other half out, she escalates to the same level of force. Even if she wasn't able to do it before, she can now because Cat did.

Rip out half the names? She can equal that and rip out half the stories.

But, everyone is right, this can be a good thing or a bad thing.

The age of wonders is dead, the age of order is beginning. Heroic names have set stories now, and villains do not, meaning how they act in this upcoming war will decide their fate for the next age.

This is their opportunity to fight back the greatest evil that ever lived, and then abide by rules of conduct. To stop making flying citadels and sacrificing masses of innocent civilians. Once they reforge their trajectories through the fabric of story? They can act orderly and all go to college and learn to read and write and do math and magic 🤪

The good guys won't be able to do much to them any more, because they don't go after civilians, so the knights can't go slaughtering evil hordes, they just send them to supervillain jail 🤪

And then, we get the gnomes. After Cat has her victory over the whole continent, and an age of order, research into magic and technology and society, the gnomes.

Others have mentioned we have pacts with dwarves, fae, Drow, I don't know if the elves will ever get involved or not, but at this rate, the elves and the gnomes are the only stories left untold. Likely the gnomes will applaud them getting their shit together, since they keep giving red letters for inventing technology before their society is ready to handle it, now that they have society, maybe they can get farming tech to save their people.

We get one more book, if I remember right, so my bet is this book ends with the death of the undying, and then next book, either triumphant, or the gnomes. There's always a bigger fish, but I look forward to it.

MoreBeer

I don't get the impression the gnomes are altruistic here. They're not wiping out civilizations for having tech before they're ready for it, they're killing civilizations who learn to industrialize and therefore free up their people from primarily engaging in farming and warfare. From presumably gaining the freedom to actually begin to be a threat.

therealgridlock

We actually have no idea why they do it, we just know they stop technology and have fortunate son helicopters.

I'm choosing to believe that a technologically advanced civilization would see that calernia is covered in savages who would destroy the world, and are keeping them there until they civilize.

It is entirely possible that they really are evil and just rule the world by denying technology, but we have only one way to find out.

Mental Mouse

The elves have had their story dribbled out – they have the Spring Crown to restore their fertility, but are likely to take it (and perhaps the Golden Bloom entirely) to another shard of Arcadia.

This is meant to be the seventh and last book, but given the “seven and one” pattern, some of us are hoping for an epilogue book, likely featuring Cardinal.

kinghaart

After the last few chapters I don't foresee needing a “scouring of the Shire” equivalent but if Cardinal eventuates, a short book there from maybe another POV could work.

kinghaart

The Bard part made sense to me, though I was a bit unclear on the harpoon.

Neshamah and Amadeus have both dropped hints about wanting to be free from stories and the death of the Bard achieving that.

For all we know, she didn't do it herself, but rather Below decided that if there's a new Intercessor (or equivalent) there should be new stories.

I am actually really interested to see what happens between Cordelia and Hanno now. Cordelia had obviously gone to extremes and doesn't seem that unlike Malicia but on the flip side she is just so much more driven and hardworking than Hanno by virtue of not having a Name to coast on. I don't think she's perfect by any means but I don't really see many choices I would have wanted her to do differently either.

samshadar

Wow.

I suppose the bard was the repository for the stories. Which makes sense. She may have shown up before writing, when there were only the oral traditions. So you've got to use an "immortal" library to store them in.

The stories of Below have now been whiped clean. But I'm sure new ones will form.

dadycool

And after everything, Yara still wins in the end. That is honestly frustrating. Everything Cat has been working towards since her first murder in the alley of Laure, reduced to ash? I get that any kind of victory against someone like the Intercessor can't be without sacrifice, but this is actually bullshit.

I glanced up at samshadar's comment and have slightly calmed down since this does present an opportunity for Cat to remake Creation, or at least the dark half of it, in her own image. In the meantime, she never lost the ability to rule Named, or at the very least Villains, so I suppose she only lost the Bard's arsenal. And now that the world is officially ending, she can Struggle helplessly, which is the only way she ever wins anyway.

I stand by my initial reaction, but it is tempered by my second thoughts.

Lyna

Is it Bard's win? She wanted Catherine's story to die. I thought it was Amadeus'.

"You asked me what I want. This once, just this once, I want us to win.

To spit in the eyes of the Hashmallim. To trample the pride of all those glorious, righteous princes. To scatter their wizards and make their oracles liars. Just to prove that it can be done.

So that five hundred years from now, a band of heroes shiver in the dark of night. Because they know that no matter how powerful their sword or righteous their cause, there was once a time it wasn't enough. That even victories ordained by the Heavens can be broken by the will of men."

-Black, Book 2, Chapter 36: Madmen

It was Bard's action, yes. It was her strike at them when she died, yes. It was her contingency, yes.

But Amadeus paid his dues. Catherine was told so many times by the Calamities that Amadeus did not value his own life. So he called the dues in.

He saved the girl, he changed his country for the better, and broke the villains' destined loss. Amadeus, both the part of him that was the Black Knight and the part of him that was a loyal friend, won. In the end, I don't think he could have gotten a better send-off.

Someperson

Yeah tbh when the dust clears the only person who really came out of the chaos in Praes who could be said to have won is Amadeus of the Green Stretch. He is the one that set the pattern for the nation to come more than anyone else. He is the one who achieved all of his main goals.

Only living to see it was never one of them. Rest in peace.

N/A

Honestly, I feel like this was a fantastic step in the story... Until that last development. That last bit does not enthuse me.

The idea that the Bard holds actual mystical power or authority over the narrative laws of Named is something that follows from what I've seen before, or is narratively necessary, or is all that compelling. The impression I've gotten has always been that the Intercessor was familiar with the scripts of stories, in a like manner to Cat and her namelore, just an order of magnitude more experienced and coming at it from the perspective of being a 'behind the scenes agent', rather than that of somebody living on the 'stage' so to speak, who's had to learn it all the hard way. That stories having power is a phenomenon of the world, not discrete things that can be stolen or destroyed.

And this would be fine if, as an unexpected reveal, it portended cool turns for the story, but I don't think it actually does.

For one thing, it's a considerable escalation jump, and those make me wary. Stories are not automatically made better the more you climb up the power scale – Worm, I think, demonstrated this well in that the further it ventured from its street-level roots, the worse and more incoherent it got. One of the reasons I like Practical Guide so much is that EE has consistently demonstrated a solid sense of when to step the power scale back a step, as with Cat losing the power of Winter, going from a nascent deity to the high priestess of another power. The Praesi campaign worked best, I think, when it was motivated by worldly concerns and temporal power; about acquiring the diabolists and expertise to neutralise the hellgates the Dead King had opened up, and removing the Dread Empire as a source of support for Keter. And, of course, the character motivations, but I'll get to that in a bit.

For another, well, does the Dead King really NEED another win? Does he need, does he even benefit from, this kind of win in particular? He was, after all, already winning. He's been winning for a while now. He's won literally every major battle – Hainaut was supposed to be the turning point, where the Grand Alliance took the initiative back and went on the offensive, instead it was a humbling defeat that killed multiple recurring characters, devastated Procer, and allowed Neshamah to deploy a bunch of superweapons that can't be stopped by intervention from Above because they were his ANSWER to intervention from Above. Since then we've had multiple interludes covering how the defence lines are collapsing and Procer is months, maybe weeks, from collapsing entirely. The story has built plenty of heat for the Dead King, is what I'm getting at – there comes a point where it starts to feel excessive.

The way that Hainaut turned out is especially important though, because it illustrated one of the Dead King's biggest qualities that make him not just threatening, but interesting; that like Amadeus and Tariq and Cat, he's canny enough to make the story-logic of this world work for him. That's vital to him, because from a narrative perspective he and his have to struggle uphill to be interesting to read about, simply by dint of the fact that he's a mostly-offscreen villain who presides over a faction which primarily consists of mindless, faceless undead. He can't carry the drama the way that Praes can, filled as it is with conniving schemers and energetic personalities undergirded by the realpolitik of crop yields, and history, so much of the history of places and people that we've been with and been getting invested in all the way back to chapter one.

Which means that unbinding the Dead King from the chains of stories is playing with narrative fire, because while it makes him more threatening (when he was plenty threatening already) it does so by removing one of the few narrative tools he had to do anything really sit-up-and-take-notice cool. It could work out; it could be that taking that sword of damocles away from over his head is what he needs to take the stage in a way that drums up drama for him, but 'partway through the final book' feels a little late in the plot to get us really enthralled with him.

N/A

"The idea that the Bard holds actual mystical power or authority over the narrative laws of Named is NOT something that" wrassin frassin, that was a typo and a half...

MoreBeer

It's in Yara's Name. She's not the Sage, knower of lore. She's the Bard, the maker and singer of stories! That she knew so much about Names is because she is the one making the Stories, and those who thought she was just knowledgeable without true power seem to have been fooled.

This was foreshadowed for books, IMO. Since book 1. If stories have so much power, what of the story teller?

kinghaart

I dunno, I think he's interesting because we still don't know if he's evil or just Evil.

I mean, yes, obviously very evil but he can make the same argument as Amadeus – he might have eaten Procer and opened the Hellgates to force Cat back to Praes to kill Bard. He did foresee something back after 3rd Liesse after all.

So if he planned this, for all we know he just wanted to have stories end so he could not have to worry about all the bottled evil tropes and can just do his thing, and can now go back to leaving Procer alone. I don't THINK that's what he'll do, but if stories are broken – we don't know.

Also, while stories may have lost their power, Cat still seems to have her Name and I suspect it will still be effective against Neshamah. She might also have supercharged necromancy against beyond what Night provided.

Darkening

Well, bright side. Alaya will probably be a better chancellor than a dread empress! It's what her Role always was after all, even if she didn't take the Name.

Steven Silver

Yo, someone with a good memory: is this the second time Cat and Bard have butted heads directly? 'Cuz this encounter with Bard was a Draw. Suuuper bloody, but still a Draw. The only other clash I can remember was at the Armory, and Bard got what she wanted out of that. Are they in a Pattern of Three, now?

Xinci

Honestly they more or less seem to be in one, yes. If not a pattern of three specifically, they are still in a death struggle over who gets to have the role as a stabalizer of the board.

therealgridlock

They've clashed more than three times, but I don't know in what order.

If the arsenal was a win for the Bard, and this was a draw, then the Bard loses next time.

If the arsenal was a draw, when was the win or loss before? Does this mean this is a loss? Or a victory?

If the arsenal was a win for Cat, and this is the draw, then Bard wins the next one.

Arsenal is what I'd call the first conflict between the two on equal footing, I just don't know if you can call it a win or a loss, they both didn't get what they wanted. Bard was still alive and Cat wasn't free of the Bard.

Maybe three draws? If win-draw-lose means you always get a reversal, maybe three draws means you get a subsumation? A replacement?

Maybe they're acting out all 9 patterns of three? 3, 3, 3? I don't know enough about the numerogy of this world, for all I know they could be going for 7 and 1. Idk what makes 8 more interesting than 9, or why making it out of two primes makes it interesting. This is all probably eastern Europe stuff.

Tiranu

That is if the pattern of 3 still works. Bard just killed all the stories of villains. Cat is a villain and the pattern of 3 falls under story (grove).

therealgridlock

Yeah but it would still exist from the hero side. Technically WB is probably evil anyway, so it wouldn't matter because I don't think you can pattern of three your own side, but we shall see.

kinghaart

Bard tried to kill Cat at Liesse, failed.

Was killed by Cat again at Arsenal.

And was just killed again now.

Hard to say if there's a win-draw-loss there.

Black Spiral Dancer

I still don't understand... why couldn't the Black Knight let a single person he knew die? They weren't even lovers! In fact she tried to assassinate him over and over the last few years. I don't get it. He ended up as a fucking martyr, self-sacrificing for someone not even worthy. Talk about stupidity! And I guess Ranger rolled the dice to die the same way.

What has gone with the story? This chapter makes it unrecognizable for me. All of a sudden the bard can make evil and good names disappear by choking on her own tongue? Wait wait wait... but we had established she couldn't die at all! You mean to say All gods above AND below are less powerful than some magical artefact Hierophant devised? Because they were the ones enforcing her continuous life, so I heard.

And Catherine gets a Name, only to make the wrong move and LOSE HALF THE NAMES OF THE CONTINENT, her new one included. But wouldn't that mean that every aspect should be gone from every evil character (and good, I suppose, since that's somehow "kept" in the artefact)? How come the Dead King still seems all-powerful even after this whole change?

It doesnt make sense for me.

Deworld

1. Amadeus' close connection to Alaya was well-known for a very long time. Despite the fact they parted ways by the end, they still deeply cared about each other. "They are not even lovers" sounds funny. As if bedplay is the only way love can manifest. They certainly loved each other, and with villains like them, it's the kind of love that persists despite everything they do to each other,
And no, I don't remember a single time when Alaya tried to assassinate Amadeus.

2. It's not clear what exactly Bard did and what are consequences of it are. Maybe she just stopped current stories, maybe she destroyed villain stories as a concept, who knows? It seems like Bard, as the emissary of Gods, was given authority over those stories by them, and she, well, used it. It isn't that she is more powerful, it's just she is in a position when she can do something like that.

3. No, Bard didn't destroy Names, she destroyed Stories. Those are different things, despite being connected. All Names, Aspects, and other Name-given powers still exist, Cat's included, just villains are no longer bound by patterns and rules of narrative. Or so it seems. As I said, it isn't clear yet.

Black Spiral Dancer

Well put. I find the idea of the namelore getting destroyed but names themselves remaining quite odd, it's like the past being erased – how the hell can the present exist without a past? One shouldn't exist without the other. In the same way, names should exist BECAUSE they have stories backing them up. Or so I thought.

Even putting that aside... how come you can have HEROES stories still existing without any villain story existing? What about the many many times such stories are intertwined? How can you tell a hero's tale where there is a villain without AT THE SAME TIME telling indirectly the villain's lore/story?

The second part bothers me more rationally than the first.

kinghaart

I think this is Read And Find Out territory, but those are good questions.

My guess is that Heroes will still get things like Providence, but can't rely on Villain story weaknesses like monologuing (which might actually be safe to do now...!). And Villains will need to expect that Heroes will still get a last wind before going down, but that might not be enough. On the flip side, the first part of their plans could fail, and they also won't necessarily get to spite their killers with a final revenge curse etc. (which is actually super important because imagine what that would have looked like for the DK vs Cat).

ninegardens

"I still don't understand... why couldn't the Black Knight let a single person he knew die? They weren't even lovers! In fact she tried to assassinate him over and over the last few years. I don't get it. He ended up as a fucking martyr, self-sacrificing for someone not even worthy. Talk about stupidity!"

Wut?

What has them being lovers got to do with it.

Despite all their anger, despite all their arguments, Alaya never ONCE tried to assassinate Maddie. Hell- she was at some point willing to go on the warpath against cat, and all of Procer for daring to lay a finger on him. Even when he turned against her, and named her unsuitable as dread empress... who one desire was for him to "Come home".

And even ignoring all that...

The story that Black wants to build is not one that wants betrayal and trechery at its foundation. "Kill the previous empress and claim their place" is a story told a million times over. He is trying to build something new, and that, by its definition needs love at its basis.

... there's also the fact that, despite all her flaws, Alaya probably IS a better Chancellor than Black. She probably is one of the best people to attempt to redeem/reconstruct Praes.

Black Spiral Dancer

Fair points, actually. Kudos.

Black Spiral Dancer

also, just pointing out, I probably didnt read their backstories so I had the sense that Amadeus was this cold, calculative guy who would never sacrifice himself for anyone else (like most evil people in fact, and for good reason). I'm not really sure how gaining Alaya 8 years of life helps anyone, but after reading all comments I find it more likely all this was planned so he could WIN in his fight against heaven or something. Also Amadeus kinda seems to be wanting to kill himself for a long time.

kinghaart

Read the Seed chapters. Also Cat's Name dreams of Black show clear ties between him, Alaya and the Calamities.

Interesting that Ranger is the only Calamity left alive... truly alone.

superkeaton

All this time worrying about an angel corpse, only to do so much the same.

Well. Here's to new beginnings.

Rabblrouser Storyteller

Fuck fuck fuck fuck fuck fuck.

SaveOurSquirrels

And then Neshamah quit his job and took up pottery

kinghaart

See you joke but now he CAN. He actually couldn't before, he works have lost his Name and died without acting like the story demanded.

So he can go from Big Bad who had murdered millions to Irritant-copycat and while that made no narrative sense before, there's no grooves to stop that now.

SaveOurSquirrels

Yes that's the point of the joke

Someperson

Rest in peace Amadeus of the Green Stretch 😞

Yara shouldn't have bet against Catherine carrying out a price to the bloody end... That is what Catherine does successfully over and over and over again and I really would not be surprised if it became one of her Aspects.

And Catherine probably should have realized that being the villain who uses "the ends justifies the means" as a way to pursue personal power was a losing proposition, narratively speaking, no matter how well intentioned it may have been and no matter that there is a hint of a plan to use that Name to beat the Dead King. On a deeper level, threatening to topple the entire resolutuon of the state of Praes for the sake of a single powerful Name is kind of the opposite of what Catherine stands for, and there are few ways that could have ended other than in tragedy.

Anyways, the loss of stories guiding villainy will have an absurd number of implications, and not just for the war against Keter: also for what comes next with Cardinal and the Accords. I'm not even sure I get how that works, because heroes and villains stories are often so closely intertwined, and because some few Named don't even fall neatly into one of those two categories. Find out next time on A Practical Guide to Evil, I guess.

Frivolous

I wonder if Alaya will have to sign onto the Truce and Terms.

The Name of Chancellor still exists, right, or is it burned up with the Tower, becoming only a mere title?

Mental Mouse

Yup, that's part of the deal with Cat.

Odd

"So close to the end, gloating would be dangerous."

Followed shortly by,

""Can you taste them yet, Yara?" I whispered. "The ashes?""

Oh, Cat. Still human.

Black Spiral Dancer

Good catch!

Tenthyr

You know it only just occurs to me the brilliance of Cats choice of name. Because by doing it she DEMANDS above answer her in kind. Because there has to be symetry. Every white knight has a black, every destroy a protect. And so if belows worst impulses are leashed by a Warden of the East, the role of Warden of the West must be taken up in answer, Hanno's budding transition, to do the same for Above. Creation has no choice but to conform to the shape of the Liesse Accords.

I mean obviously the Dead King unleashed is probably gonna ruin it all but the sheer balls of it, lordy.

Catastronaut

Just wanted to point out that it seems like the Mantle of Woe might become the Mantle of the W.O.E.

This is probably just a coincidence, but an amusing one.

Black Spiral Dancer

OMG, I just realized...

The Bard is just like Atreyu from the NEVERENDING STORY. It is repeated there that every story begets many others, and someone has to take care of them. Atreyu offers himself to the task so that the protagonist can return to his world, otherwise he would have been trapped in the book forever.

My gosh, did EE also has The Neverending Story as major inspiration? It remains my Favorite Book of All Time. And TPGTE seems awful like one story inside the neverending story book-universe.

Black Spiral Dancer

So many similarities...

Keep in mind in the Neverending Story, there is A Tower, a girl atop said tower, an evil werewolf, an akua-like sorcerer, a Dread Emperor (the protagonist for a time, as well as other long-maddened aurnyn-starved "emperors")...also, a band of five or something?

I finally found the primal Source. Though I likely never will get confirmation from EE, I know it in my "heart of hearts".

nipi

Im guessing Cat cant raise Amadeus as an undead because he called in his dues

Pog

Cats name sucks ass, damn. Why does the intercessor have the power to destroy the control the rules of creation have over named ????? Seems like

Interlude: End Times

"Better the tiger atop the mountain than the wolf at your feet."

– Praesi saying

Antigone had been just a little too slow to stop it.

That would have been enough to unsettle Hanno even if he'd not just seen the Tomb, the great lake that separated Hainaut from the Kingdom of the Dead, freeze over. A horde whose numbers dwarfed the stars in the sky had already begun to march across the thick ice, a tidal wave of death advancing without anything as careful as tactics or strategy: they marched in a straight line, killing every living thing before them. Hainaut was lost, Hanno of Arwad had known in that moment. It could not be held against this, even though the Dead King might well have doomed himself with such a bold stroke. And yet, even as the dark-skinned man watched the inexorable crawl across the horizon, it was not the sights that had his attention. Or his worry.

Antigone had been just a little too slow to stop it.

It was not that providence had abandoned the Witch of the Woods, for it had not. She'd been awake and out in the hills when it happened, at Hanno's side as they discussed whether a raid to break up the army gathering north of the Cigelin Sisters was feasible. Antigone had been, relatively speaking, in the right place and at the right time. She could have prevented it, feasibly. Looking back, Hanno was certain of that. The opportunity had been provided. And yet Antigone's answering stroke, her attempt to inflict a flaw on the enemy ritual, had been just a little weak and too slow. She'd misjudged what was needed by a hair's breadth, which against the likes of the Dead King was more than enough to lose.

It'd been just slightly off, and that was what disturbed Hanno. The Witch of the Woods had been nudged towards a victory, yes, but Hanno feared that her enemy had not been nudged towards defeat. That the grand scheme of freezing an entire lake through a great ritual had not been marked with doom. And the implications of that... He struggled to even grasp the scope. Had the Gods Below chosen the King of Death as their champion, intervened to protect him from the promise reverses? And if they had, was today even the only time they would step in? He almost shivered at the thought. The Dead King had been monstrous enough when he had been, if Catherine was to be believed, in disfavour with the Gods Below.

If he was the favourite son again, the war had become a manner of desperate that begged for a stronger word.

"The clouds are not receding, Lord White," the Mirror Knight said.

Many had taken to calling Hanno by the title of Prince White, and he no longer bade otherwise, but Christophe had never been one of them. The other man had been scalded by politics, the dark-skinned hero thought, and now avoided them like the plague. And it was a manner of politics to call Hanno any sort of prince, he would not pretend otherwise. A line was being drawn between here and Salia, all of the west deciding on which side it preferred to stand.

"They're expanding," Hanno softly agreed.

Dark clouds had appeared in the far distance, above what he knew bone-deep to be the Crown of the Dead without knowing how or why, and they had only been expanding since. A mile every hour, perhaps? It was hard to tell from so far away.

"I fear the Dead King means to cover the entire sky," the Mirror Knight said. "And that we've few means to stop him."

Hanno could only guess at the truth of that, but it rang true to him. It was a way to block out the sun, to wither crops and force soldiers to fight in the dark. It would spread fear, too, at the simple sight of it. How many would flee just for being convinced that the Gods were abandoning them all?

"Antigone will slow him down," Hanno replied.

Christophe turned green eyes on the once-White Knight, face grim beneath the helm.

"And how long will that hold?"

Hanno did not answer. Silence lingered.

"Hainaut is lost," he finally said. "We cannot hope to hold it. Let's head back to camp, Christophe, a message needs to be sent to General Abigail."

The Mirror Knight rose to his full height, sun glinting off the polished armour.

"And what will it say?" he curiously asked.

"That she is to retreat," Hanno of Arwad said. "As we will."

A line of defence would be left behind, but already he knew what must be done. Most of his army would go to the muster Cordelia Hasenbach had called for, the great host being assembled for a desperate last strike at the heart of the Enemy.

To Salia they would go, and after that only the Gods knew.

—

Henriette had done well, Prince Frederic Goethal thought as he beheld the walls of Courtial.

His cousin and heiress had been charged with preparing the defences of Brus while he fought abroad and she'd seen to the duty with skill. The last wave of Lycaonese refugees from Neustria was being ferried south into Segovia even as the evacuation of his own Bruseni began, emptying the north of his principality in anticipation of the war reaching it. And it soon would: Princess Rozala had sent word that Cleves was lost and she was retreating into Lyonis, which was the beginning of the end for the defence of that front. Unlike rocky, narrow Cleves the lands of Lyonis were fertile flatlands. There were no natural defences to use against the dead and too few fortresses to stem the tide.

It was only a matter of time until the northeast of Brus began to see raids from the Enemy, probing the defences, and it already was from the northwest. The retreat from the Morgentor had been a march through nightmares, Neustria falling apart around them as the dead butchered thousands and swelled their armies with the slaughter, but the armies had made it. Frederic had risked a raid against a Crab to buy the army time to pull ahead of the tireless armies of the Dead King, but Otto had decided to blithely walk back his agreement and pull him out of the fire at the last moment. It'd been a miracle they'd made it back, much less losing as few men as they had.

But now here they were, their rearguard even now making its way through the hidden paths that led through the great marshlands to the northwest of the principality. Frederic himself had ridden with the van, as was his preference, and that'd led him to the low hill where he'd reined in his charge. In the distance the walls of Courtial, the great fortress the predecessors of the House of Goethal had raised at the edge of the swamps, rose in pale stone. There was a walled city at the foot of the fortress, a mere four thousand souls or so, but that made it the largest gathering of people in the region by far. It was why Frederic had decided on Courtial as a supply base, knowing that a host as large as his own would need the spare hands.

Of the nearly one hundred thousand soldiers that had once stood on the walls of the Morgentor only thirty-seven thousand had made it south, and of these only twenty thousand would keep marching south. Brus' borders could not be held with only the garrisons now defending them, even if Henriette had moved Heavens and Hells to swell those ranks. Twenty thousand would have to be enough when he answered the First Prince's call to muster. It will have to be enough, Frederic thought, for there are no more men to spare. The thought was grim but no less true for it. Passing a tired hand through his hair – the helm had ridden tight against a ribbon, tugging at it – the Kingfisher Prince allowed himself a short moment of peace.

To feel the wet wind coming from the marshes, enjoy the sight of the distant green of the rolling plains to the south. It had been years since he was last in the land of his birth. He almost felt a stranger to it.

The peace was ended by the sound of approaching hooves. Frederic felt his retinue stir at the bottom of the hill, but none called a warning. A friend, then, and not unexpected. It was not long before a dozen heavy horses barded in steel joined his retinue below, parting to allow through their prince: Otto Reitzenberg of Bremen, who men called Redcrown. Perhaps the finest friend Frederic had ever made, the man who had saved his life more times than he had fingers to count. Otto deftly guided his charger up the slope, slowing when they became of a height.

The Prince of Bremen was dark-haired and dour, with that unfortunate Reitzenberg nose and a chipped tooth he'd never gotten around to getting fixed, but you would not have known it from the way his people reacted to him. Cordelia Hasenbach was still held in high esteem among the Lycaonese, but she had not fought with her people – not the way Otto Redcrown had. When word had come that Mathilda Greensteel and the Iron Prince had died in Hainaut, the prince of Bremen had become the living banner of the northerners. So long as he stood, they would not falter. Frederic much feared what would happen were he slain, and not only because it would feel as if half his soul were lost.

"Otto," the Kingfisher Prince lazily said. "Come to see the sights?"

"Not a mountain to be found," Otto grunted. "It is troubling, Frederic. Like walking around with the back of your trousers missing."

Frederic laughed. Otto had never set foot out of the Lycaonese principalities before the war, and rarely out of his native Bremen. This was the furthest he'd even been from home. A home now little more than ashes and undead.

"I'm glad you will be able to see the plains before the war reaches them," the Prince of Brus said. "It is not the right season for the flower fields, but-"

There was a sound like a scream, if the world itself could scream. Frederic froze in surprise, but a heartbeat later his sword had cleared the scabbard. It was not only him who'd heard the noise, he saw, for Otto and both their escorts were arming themselves. The scream died as suddenly as it had come, but it left behind thick unease.

"That did not come from the swamps," the Kingfisher Prince decided.

"Heaven's ward," Otto quietly said.

Frederic followed his friend's gaze, across the distance and all the way to the pale walls of Courtial. At first he thought it was a heat haze, improbable as it would be, but it was not. The stone was twisting and slithering, spinning out in strands. All of the madness orbited a single form, a great eye of sickly green light set in a pulsing haze of purple flames.

"Demon," Frederic rasped out, coldly furious. "The Dead King seeks to destroy the city before we can hold it. I will not suffer it."

He cast a look at his riders.

"Raise the banner," the Kingfisher Prince ordered. "Lord Gontrand, you will ride in haste for priests and mages. There is no time to-"

The world screamed again, wracked in pain. There was a splash of murky darkness in the heart of the fortified city. Within a heartbeat, screaming began. Terror, Frederic recognized. They were screams of utter terror. His Name flared in protection, burning away the sliver of corruption carried by the distant sounds.

"You will need the Stained Sister and the Astrologer," Otto evenly said. "It is nothing but throwing away lives otherwise."

Frederic bit his lip until it bled, but curtly nodded. Getting himself killed would help no one, besides – the world began to scream again. Not the city, this time. In the distance, the green rolling plains to the south lit up with red. Fire was spreading through air and ground alike, like baleful tendrils. There was another scream.

And another.

Another.

Another.

This, the Kingfisher Prince dimly realized, was no longer a war. It was an extermination.

—

It was madness, Roland thought. Impossible.

He was in Aisne, looking into the rumour a Revenant had been seen. There was all of Brabant between him and the fronts. Aisne was not safe, for nowhere was safe in these dark times, but the principality had been spared the swords of the Dead King. Even after the Carrion Lord's depredations during the Tenth Crusade, the land here remained some of the finest in the principate: great golden plains as far as the eye could see, vineyards and orchards and merry streams. These were the heartlands of the Principate, only Cantal and Iserre fancied as richer in harvests.

And now Rogue Sorcerer was watching that same harvest die.

Entire swaths of the sunny blue sky above had broken like panes of glass, sights from the eerie horizons of Arcadia shown through the rifts, and great stones had fallen down. One through every rift, and though they fell without regard to where they might land Roland did not think that this was a mere bombardment. He hurried the closest fallen stone, riding a horse half to death, and found that death had arrived long before he could. The stone, a massive thing of granite the height and width of a dozen men, had shattered a barn that mercifully looked like it'd been abandoned. But it was not the stone that struck fear in him.

Out of small holes in granite, almost like pores, small critters were pouring out. Hardly any larger than crickets, they had a glint of copper them in the glare of the sun as they spread out like a cursed plague. They fanned out like a curtain and, instead of any sort of terrible curse, they simply spoiled all they touched. Like ripples going through the field before him, Roland watched with muted horror as in a matter of moments they made half a mile's worth of grain uneatable. Half-rotten, perhaps even poisonous. Gathering himself he pulled at the most destructive of magics within him, spraying flame and whipping up a storm of it.

Thousands of the undead critters died in moments, leaving him panting and already half spent. There were still a few out there that he could see and he took the time to clear them out, but his mind was already awirl at the implications.

"This will kill us all," Roland de Beaumaraais whispered.

How many of the stones had fallen? At least six here in Aisne, and the Dead King would have done much the same across all the lands that serves as the breadbasket of Procer. Cantal, Iserre, perhaps even as far west as Aequitan. He was killing the infestation here, but how many of these abominations would land days of travel away from anyone who might end them? The great stone pulsed with power, but the Rogue Sorcerer snarled in rage and snapped his wrist towards it.

"Confiscate."

The magic invested in it was foul, handling it felt like licking pestilence, but even as the stone went inert Roland forced himself to study the sorcery. It had been meant, he decided, to release another swarm. It had been gathering power from ambient sorcery ever since unleashing the first. Likely the stone itself was being converted into the foul critters and the spell would run out when there was no longer enough granite to sustain the enchantments. Four, five swarms, he guessed. And, even as his heart clenched and his blood turned to ice, Roland de Beaumaraais corrected his words.

"This has killed us all," the Rogue Sorcerer whispered.

Procer did not know it yet, might nor for days or even weeks, but it was starving.

—

Princess Rozala watched in mute horror as the wave washed over the rampart, sweeping men and engines away in a murderous crash.

She'd thought they had longer, that though the defensive line around Peroulet was good as fallen the city itself might hold a while longer. That it might slow down the advance of the Enemy before the army holding it was forced to retreat through the Twilight Ways into Lyonis. And was she not right to hope? The Dead King had thrown devils at these walls, and when that failed a pair of demons, but they had held. Gods, it had cost them but they had held and sent the beasts screaming back into the Hells. They'd tied down an army a hundred thousand strong by keeping the city, buying time for walls to be raised to their south, and even as the dead assaulted the walls day and night the defenders held. Exhausted and bleeding, but so very proud. Had they not held against the Enemy's worst?

So the Dead King began to drown them all.

It was said that the Black Queen's most fearsome spell – the Deluge, singers called it – had been used against her in Hainaut, but Rozala had not thought her own host at risk. The Enemy had never used it elsewhere, perhaps out of fear that he would be caught and the spell would be turned against him. Whatever the truth of it, such restraint was gone: a great gate had been opened at ground height facing the gates of Peroulet and within moments the blast of water had smashed them down. Water began pouring into the city, tipping over soldiers and horses, breaking houses. It had not stopped there. Another two gates were opened on the city's flanks, higher up. The tides there were now sweeping over the ramparts, crushing whatever men had manned them.

Rozala had been commanding from the summit of the keep at the heart of the city, as she liked the vantage, but now she was being forced to watch the city drown and her army with it.

"Louis," she said, forcing herself to be calm. "The outer city is lost. Order our priests to form shields across the streets from the height of..."

She paused, searching through her memory.

"Therrien Avenue," the Princess of Aquitan finished.

"That's abandoning a third of the city, Rozala," her husband quietly said. "The one where most of our soldiers are."

"It is either that or losing all of it," she evenly replied. "Send the order, along with that of general retreat."

The moment they had lost the walls they'd lost the siege. All she could do now was salvage all she could of the army and pray it was enough. Louis Rohanon grimaced, but did not argue. He'd been in this war just as long as she had, he too knew the looks of a city lost.

"It will be done," he promised, then hesitated.

She smiled, laying his hand on her belly. It had swollen, but she was still months away from birth according to the priests.

"Go," Rozala ordered. "We'll live through it, all three of us."

He laid a kiss on her hand and left. The princess avoided the amused gazes of her personal guard as her husband and secretary left. She had never been much of a romantic herself, as they well knew, but she did appreciate her husband's continued tenderness. It was terribly Alamans, but it'd grown on her. Shaking off the thought, Rozala brought up her Baalite eye again and continued to preside over what was already promising to be one of the greatest defeats of her career as a general. The battle was lost, there was no denying that, but she must learn all she could of the Enemy's tricks before her army retreated.

The Dead King was in fine form today, it seemed. The water pouring out of the gates had not stopped, filling the outer city so much it was not spilling over the walls and the shields raised by priests and mages were buckling under the weight. It was not the end of it, though. Great war engines not unlike oversized ballistae had been dragged to the fore of the undead army outside the city, a dozen of them, and bombardment began unceremoniously. The projectiles they shot arced upwards, above the shields her people had raised, and tore through the hasty attempts by her last spare mages to bounce them off. Great monoliths of obsidian tore into the paved roads, cleaving through the stone, and began pulsing with sorcery.

"All Named on the monoliths," Rozala ordered. "The water was merely a strike, these are the killing stroke."

The messenger went off at a run, but few things were faster than sorcery. Rozala had read the reports of the Black Queen's battle at Lauzon's Hollow and she recalled mention of pillars of black stone with a similar look, but the difference in size was stark. No mere pillars, these: they were large enough that the war engines that shot them were made of steel and large as houses. The effect, though, seemed to be similar from the description she had read. A pulse of crackling lightning slew all men in range, and then a few heartbeats later a second pulse raised them from the dead. The size, Rozala decided, was a mere consequence of the power of the cursed things having been increased. It was still fundamentally the same trick.

Cold comfort, when she saw near a thousand soldiers die in the first pulse.

Practically speaking an enemy bridgehead had been established behind her lines and, more importantly, her shields. If the dead began killing priests... If Louis were here, with his head for numbers he might hazard a guess at the strength that the great volumes of water held back by the shields might bring to bear. Rozala did not have that particular gift, though she knew enough to suspect it would be a merciless slaughter.

"Full retreat," Princess Rozala ordered, the words like ashes in her mouth. "All forces are to immediately begin making their way towards Gueridon Plaza. The wayfarer mages are to open the gates into the Twilight Ways."

Maybe half her army would make it out of the city, if she was lucky, and this did not seem like a day for luck. Peroulet had held for weeks only to now fall in hours, and deep down Rozala was beginning to wonder if she'd not simply been allowed to remain here for some deeper purpose. She grit her teeth, putting away the Baalite eye. It did not matter. There was only one place left for her army to retreat to.

Salia, where Cordelia Hasenbach had called for a great muster.

—

After Brus fell, it was finished.

It had taken the Dead King years to take the Lycaonese principalities, and even Neustria's fall had come mere months ago, but now it seemed as if the Enemy was no longer restraining himself. The principality of Brus still stood in the sense that most of its lands were intact and over half of its people remained, but as a state it was finished. All its major cities had been struck by demons and only the most heavily warded of border fortresses still stood, meaning that Prince Frederic now ruled over farmland being overrun and a panicked mass of refugees.

Lyonis was being swept through, its defences overrun, and now that the White Knight had withdrawn from Hainaut the lands it had defended were beginning to break as well. Prince Ariel of Arans was negotiating with the regent of Callow for his people to be allowed across the Stairway, having been refused by the Prince of Bayeux to his south, and the Brabantine refugees that Cordelia had not welcomed into Salia had armed themselves so they could force their way into Aisne even through a closed border. The moment word of it all had spread, the First Prince of Procer had lost the last power she held over the southern Principate.

No royalty south of Creusens still answered her letters, save those who had invited her to flee to their realm and continue her rule under their protection. Cordelia had declined the offer, even when made by those who genuinely meant the words. Her duty was in Salia. She had left her own Rhenia to burn for that duty and she would not forsake it now. She could feel it in the air, the way that all the winds were blowing towards the capital. The last gasp of Procer would be exhaled here, in the same city where it had been founded centuries ago. Agnes had agreed, though the predictions she shared afterwards were troubling.

But Cordelia Hasenbach would not go gently into the night, and so she had prepared.

Salia could not be evacuated. Even if her increasingly tenuous hold on the city could be used to bend the people that way, there was simply nowhere for them to go. With the refugees pouring in from the north, there were likely now as many people in Salia and its surrounding towns as in all of Brus. If the people were dispersed in every direction most would die from lack of means, and if they remained together they would be a crushing burden to whichever principality they fled to. Cordelia, much as the thought disgusted her, knew that armies would be mobilized to massacre them before they crossed the border if need be.

A decade ago that would have been unthinkable, but after the Great War and the brutality of the conflict with the Dead King? Desperation would make for ugly deeds.

And so Salia must stand, lest Cordelia condemn hundreds of thousands to death. Her duty decided, she had set to prepare the defence and even what would come after. Armies would gather to the capital so that they might set out against Keter, but those armies would need food and steel and supplies. She bargained and begged and confiscated – stole with the fig leaf of law – to scrap together all she could, and still Agnes told her that doom was coming. The armies would not be there in time. The Dead King would strike first. And so the First Prince of Procer turned to the sole recourse left to her.

She sent all villains east into Aisne and sent Agnes away from the city, where her sight would be needed, then dismissed her servants and headed towards the Chamber of Assembly.

The seat of the Highest Assembly had little changed since the day Clothor Merovins had been elected as the founding First Prince of Procer. In a city that every ruler wanted to grace with another fresh thing of beauty, another layer of glamour and glory, the ancient hall remained untouched. Walls of whitewashed limestone, rafters of ancient creaking oak and that faint smell of wood smoke come from the fire that had caught during the second Liturgical War. In a city heavily laden with gold and marble and jewels, it was a stark and bare place – save for the twenty-four thrones that filled it. Twenty-three on the ground, one for each principality, and one for the First Prince on the dais above.

Cordelia sat on Clothor Merovins' old throne and close her eyes. She could feel the grey granite beneath her, polished by a river but otherwise unadorned, and she set her palm against the coolness of it. In a way she had never been close to that seat, she mused. Cordelia too had been worn to smoothness, stripped of all her affectations. The fair-haired princess smiled at the thought, then in the pale light of the single lantern lit she waited in silence. It would come soon, Agnes had told her as much, and it would come here. And when her answer was given, well, she would learn something as well.

She was half asleep when the scream sounded, but ice ran through her blood and she was wide awake before the roof atop her was ripped off. Cordelia looked up at the night sky, the stars and the half-moon, but they were marred by a great gate spewing out winged abominations. A Hellgate. That was the Dead King's bow, then, a Hellgate above the very beating heart of the Principate.

Yet there was more. Ugly, unspeakable things that came creeping through the dark. That bent wood as if it were water and made of tiles wriggling snakes. How many were there? She could not tell, in the dark, but there had to be more than one.

It was a great winged devil that dared to first enter the Chamber, landing in a crouch before her. Shaped like a horned man, though broader than any man she had met, and covered with thick dark fur. Bestial and with a mouth full of fangs that it dared to grin at her with. She leaned forward, her dress of Rhenian blue pulling tight on her shoulders.

"Can you hear me, Dead King?" Cordelia asked.

The creature milled uneasily, then stilled.

"In a manner of speaking," it replied, its voice not its own.

"Ah, I had hoped you would," the First Prince of Procer smiled.

"You struggled mightily," the Dead King said. "But there is no turning back the inexorable."

"It may well be that we will fall," the First Prince acknowledged. "But until then, Trismegistus King, do not forget one thing."

She smiled, cold and hard and with every once of scorn every Hasenbach had ever felt for the old monster.

"This is Procer," she hissed. "You tread here at your peril."

Pale light washed over them all.

An eternity passed. The Light had seared Cordelia's skin but left her strangely invigorated, and when she opened her eyes again she found... nothing. Not before her, not in the sky above, not anywhere at all. There was only Salia and her people. The ealamal had worked as the priests as sworn it would, scouring all of the principality from the Dead King and his works. It had been weakened, they told her, both in stringency and in scope. Power had been limited and been made less discriminating. Cordelia had still likely killed a hundreds if not thousands of people in Salia through that order, she did not delude herself otherwise. People who had not been tried, been judged under the law.

They had only been judged as taints on Creation by the Choir of Judgement even through all the priests had done to force mercy onto that judgement. No Damned could have hoped to survive were they present, which was why Cordelia had sent them to Aisne, for in the eyes of the Seraphim villains were scarcely better than devils or demons.

Even though there was a sliver of guilt at the deaths she had ensured, Cordelia knew that the fate her decision had spared Salia would have been incomparable. And, deep down, a part of her felt deeply vindicated. Many had tried to warn her off the angel's corpse, called it madness or stupidity. Yet it had just saved every soul within the borders of Salia, and likely would again. Alone in the silent hall where the princes and princesses of Procer ruled but now she alone sat with silence for sole company, Cordelia Hasenbach looked up through the torn roof at the night sky. The pale stars set against the darkness, like candle lights never more than a breath away from being snuffed.

The Lycaonese princess raised a hand, as if to pluck them from the sky, and smiled.

"One more night to live," Cordelia told them. "Dawn has not yet failed."

She would win her people as many nights as she could, whatever the cost.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

One more night to live. One more night to read. One more night to vote.

Linnus42

Cat let DK off the leash and apparently didn't bother scrying to give anyone a heads up that she did it. That is pretty typical for Cat though I suppose.

Sir Nil

For all we know Scrying just became impossible through half of Calernia.

Sir Nil

That or all this happened within a few moments of 'Interesting.'

Liliet

It definitely STARTED happening within a few moments of "interesting", Cat couldn't warn them of shit BEFOREHAND.

Deworld

Probably both.

nick012000

IIRC it was confirmed a while ago that scrying across mountain ranges and bodies of water is difficult-to-impossible, and Praes and Procer are separated by both.

Cheet4h

It's still possible via the Observatory – early in the Praes campaign we already saw Cat talking with Cordelia by scrying. Although the ritual probably needs more preparation than regular scrying.

Mincheriit

It is possible that all these events are happening simultaneously or close to each other very soon after Cat's vision of the Dk, meaning she doesn't really have time to warn anyone or didn't get the chance; doesn't the scrying or w/e letting them talk require a recipient? They might not be expecting a call or able to receive due to interference, don't know if the dk is doing some shit he couldn't unleash before. I assume the dk has all this shit ready or close to ready as possible and has just never touched/used any of it due to restrictions promising him a return stroke. Such is no longer, meaning he gets to use the armed nukes in his display cabinet.

Zggt

>Cat let DK off the leash

No, the Bard did. Her plan has always been to scour Calernia clean of all life. This has been repeated in her last quote in the chapter before her "death". Cat and the Tyrant actually managed to stop her doing that the first time. Her goal has pretty consistently been the extermination of human life on Calernia for reasons.

> and apparently didn't bother scrying to give anyone a heads up that she did it

We don't know the timeline, as far as we know, this is happening the moment the Bard died. We also don't know if scrying is possible, or if the scrying happened but just didn't reach the recipient in time, et cetera

Hargabga

What quote exactly points at her wanting to do that?

Jonnnney

I believe her justification is the life that replaced it would be solely on the side of "good"

Zach

Yeah, I have no clue what the person is talking about. If Bard had the ability to eliminate all the stories, she could have simply chosen to do this before, since unleashing the Dead King is basically a death sentence for the realm. Bard has always seemed inclined towards just preserving the status quo.

I think the one character whose motivations kind of confuse me is the Dead King himself. Like what exactly is he wanting to do? Just continue sitting around coming up with new horrifying magic, but without the distraction of all the humans on the continent?

ninegardens

Everything we've seen so far indicates that DK has sort of... Masego's goals, but with Black's means.

In that "Apothesis" appears to be the goal. Godhood. A change in perspectives, possibly even a sneaky enough change to escape the system the Gods have created.

... but, that requires time, and patients, and never ever ever making a mistake that leaves him open to being killed.

It requires power and resources, so DK accumulates those. It requires eliminating threats, and destroying assets that the bard might use against him.

But yeah- Black was okay, because even though his means were ruthless, his goals were relatively noble (and this naturally limited his means). Masego is "safe" because even if his goals are terrifying in their ambition... he just doesn't have the ruthless streak- he isn't interested enough in winning.

DK (from what we have seen), is very much a servant of "One Sin, one Grace"... except without Black's love of his army, of his friends, of... anything outside of himself. ... honestly, the Black-DK parallels, have been some of the most interesting and fascinating parallels in the story for quiet a while, and mostly just serve to illustrate the many ways that black doesn't believe the things he claims to believe (back in book one). Because we meet someone who believes those things, and he is an utter monster.

Snappy270

Basically he wants to be an actual God. Big G. But he could only do it slowly due to WB fighting against him and the limits of being a villain. He knows that if he didn't kill Procer now it would grow stronger and bigger with the continent would continue to unite. So he is trying to nip it while he can.

Remember undead can't truly learn new things, he can only become the master of the skills he has. Unfortunately he created the modern form of magic.

Hargabga

He calls himself a pupil of Gods, stabbed them in the back so hard they stopped supporting him, and tries to recreate Creation. I say he has far more ambitions than we were shown, it's just that he's patient enough to wait a few hundred or thousand years no biggie.

Borut Bracun

Sub

Some Smartass

Not so much a specific quote as that's the only possible goal that could be served by her observed actions.

Hargabga

There are so many goals that can fit into that bag of infinite cats. She may want to die or just escape her prison, spite the Gods by turning the story against them, free Calernia from the stories while not dooming them by it, ensure that Calernia stays in the Age of Wonders without going into something new, to get into Triumphant's pants, to get into Neshamah's pants, to combat her alcohol addiction and so many more. Sure, killing everyone on Calernia may be one of those things, but it is far from the only one.

Zggt

The quote wasn't by her, it was (if I remember correctly) discovered through the Tyrant and then an expedition that the usage of the Judgement-Angel-Body-Thing as originally intended would basically kill everything on the continent and start anew. From the last interlude, "It was time to kill her and doom the world” hints that up to her very last moment, the Wandering Bard was still on that plan.

She failed, but only because Cat and friends have been looking for ways to try to kill her for ages now, and the Bard did get careless with all the taunting, monologues, betrayals and the such.

Mental Mouse

I still think that “time to kill her” always referred to the Bard herself. We certainly know she’s suicidal!

onedollargum

I’m not quite sure what Zggt meant either, but Bard was waiting at the tower to “kill [Catherine] and doom the world.” (last few lines of Interlude: A Girl Without a Name)

kinghaart

Kill The Girl. Yara was also a girl...

Barthumphries

She’s bored and wants to die. If everything is dead then there’s nobody to reincarnate into and she finally, so she hopes, will die.

Just before Cat arrived, the Bard thought to herself, time to destroy the world, or something like that. She’s had many thoughts like that.

Miles

Stop blaming Cat this isn’t even a fire.

Sir Nil

And we enter the belly of the whale.

imagesbe

Welp. This is just too much despair for me honestly, compared to how much the dramatic struggle from previous war scenes moved me, this barely warranted more than a sigh. Unhindered as he is, the Dead King is essentially invincible. How will EE write himself out of this corner? He has a good record in the past, but I’m really having difficulty seeing this going anywhere but everyone dead by angel.

Linnus42

Yeah DK didn’t need a power up also kinda found it more entertaining when he had to play around constraints.

hue hue

DK after killing all of procer: what will you do little cat?

Catherine: you got gnomed

Warships fleet warps on top of her

Aston Whiteman

Depends on EE.

Maybe an alternative reality chapter from EE?

Good choice of Gnomes..

KageLupus

That is because the Dead King having to play around his limitations made for a better story, which is why he was willing to do it in the first place. But the Wandering Bard has killed that narrative constraint and the story is broken, and now we get to see what a monster of that caliber would look like if he behaved "realistically".

yty

EE has a ton of good polities left hanging that he can draw on. Despite the reluctance of the dwarves, they won't survive if the dead king is allowed to scour the surface clean before turning to them, so they'll have to march. The golden bloom is still there. The death of below's stories will empower the drow just as much as it'll empower the dead king, same for the chain of hunger, and since northern procer has fallen the kingdom of the dead is the only target left for it to raid. Heck, he still has the gnomes in his back pocket if he really needs it.

Shveiran

And the intervention of nearly all of them would have no link of causality with the previous events of the protagonist, making such a resolution completely unsatisfying.

Hakram's Dead Hand

Hello, I disagree! I think that Catherine has had a hand or can feasibly have a hand in all of these (except maybe the Chain of Hunger). Other than Merchantis, Catherine has been the main arbiter to both the dwarves and the drow up until now, and it doesn't seem too far fetched knowing her character to have her bust directly into the Golden Bloom and demand assistance. Catherine could possibly even force the Gnomes hands, by tricking the right type of technology into the DK's grasp. That all depends on what the Gnomes actually are though. I'd love to hear more of your thoughts, though.

eh

A few things are still in play:

A) Calernia is an undeveloped backwater, and if the DK starts to pose a world-ending threat to anyone outside the continent Keter will be carpet-bombed by angry gnomes, eviscerated by the main body of non-racist elves, or demolished by any other great power. The dwarves are fine and still a regional power, so far as we know. He's constrained by the playing field he's on, and additionally...

B) He's still constrained by narrative. A massive unstoppable undead army assaults a battered remnant of a nation after fantasy-nukes fail to stop him, while vulnerable civilians cower in fear in their capital, as our valiant anti-hero "villain" struggles to find a solution? That was fine when he was Malicia's catspaw, but now she's on the ropes and he's the big bad it's going to turn on him. He has to be aware of this, which leads to...

C) What does the Dead King want out of all this? He doesn't act with no reason. Some goal of his has prodded him into action, probably related to risk mitigation for him and his immortality, possibly related to the intercessor or other long term threats to his life. It's possible that his end goal is to get her killed, and he's planning to be beaten back by the cornered heroes. It's possible his end goal was something related to the twilight ways, or hell. It's possible he's after a relic from the Tower. It's possible he wants something else entirely.

knockoffnikolai

The Dead King being the big bad doesn't matter anymore—villainous stories no longer have ontological force.

broadaxe

THAT is an extremely good point, there is absolutely no plot armor for him, you could assassinate him without having to beat any of the things the plot would usually require

Miles

The DK never had plot armor. He had minions

kinghaart

He definitely had plot armor.

I bet he will die to a no-Name now like Abigail.

Albert Wen

We were literally just told why he's moving: villain stories don't do anything now.

Alexander

Previously existing villain stories don't mean anything. Doesn't that mean though that new villain stories are being written right now?

Albert Wen

Yeah, stories like "the great evil unleashes all his plots at once, overcoming the heroes". Whatever happens now is the story going forward. That could very well be the reason: he wants to rewrite villain stories to be as favorable as possible, which means he needs to win as hard as possible, while the iron's hot.

Snappy270

Too my knowledge he wants to be an actual god but need time. So he needs to stop them from posing a threat to them, as they have started to unite and creat bigger bigger armies.

KageLupus

Pretty sure your second point is completely reversed. The reason the Dead King didn't do any of this before is because he would have been making himself too big of a threat and the narrative weight of that would have let the Good Guys fight back and eventually kill him. So instead he had to sandbag his fights and keep things on a slightly more even footing so that the story only lead to his defeat in the short term and not death (or re-death, or whatever you want to call it).

Those story chains are broken now, though, and so we get this chapter showing off just what happens when DK stops holding back and doesn't have to worry about the Story balancing the scales against him.

The Green

Don't forget, every villain under the Truce and Terms is as similarly unconstrained as the Dead King. This includes Cat, Masego, Hakram, the three most powerful villains in the story after the Dead King, and of course Sve Noc.

Frivolous

The Green: Agree.

Albert Wen

Why would EE need to write himself out of anything? The whole thing's obviously planned from start to finish. Never have we seen a sign that EE is doing anything by improv.

magesbe

You misunderstand me. I don't actually believe that EE is going by the seat of his pants by any means. I just don't see a logical way out of this situation. EE could very easily have the Dead King lose by any number of contrived plot devices, or by calling in the Gnomes or something as suggested by a couple of people. But I do not see a satisfying way out of this situation. Even Cat coming back to life her third time seemed less contrived than the Dead King losing at this point.

Darkening

Well, cat supposedly has a massive pile of dead hero aspect artifacts she's never used because relying on magic stuff gets you killed by story. The tower burned, but all the high lords have vaults of artifacts and such. And now all of that isn't going to get a villain killed for relying on them. So they can pull out all the fantasy nukes and such and start using them on the dead king. Masego probably knows where to find some of his dad's old stashes of doomsday weapons, I doubt it was all in the tower.

kinghaart

Well we just saw one way the DK is vulnerable. And previously using the Ealamel would have been a terrible idea narratively but now Cordelia can do it with impunity too.

He has other flaws too – with stories dying it doesn't necessarily have to be that hard to kill him since he's no longer the Big Bad, just a bad person.

And Cat's Name is about wrangling Villains, I worksheet be surprised if she can do something like Confiscate but apply it to a whole Aspect of his.

Masego doesn't have a revenge story assured anymore but he will try to write a new one anyway and when Neshamah stole the Gift from him I bet he figured out how to return the favor.

shikkarasu

It's not a corner, it's the final act. EE has clearly planned for the events of the past two books since Book 1. I recommend a reread; the foreshadowing was always there, even if it felt random the first one or two reads through. On my 4th reread I started taking notes of the foreshadowing and Sweet Sisters of Night, the sheer number of pivots that were quietly alluded to in Books 1 and 2 is staggering. Princes Graveyard, Battle of Camps, Night of Knives, the Everdark, and even the 10th Crusade in general. All set up by the time Cat offered Juniper a job.

I have absolute faith that this will be addressed with the same feeling of "what else could possibly have happened?" that the rest of the books have had.

matesbe

I don't appreciate this perspective, where as long as I've been reading carefully I should be able to predict exactly what happens next, when by your own admission you have no idea yourself. You are literally running off of faith right now, which is fine, but don't assume that anyone who doesn't see how this is going to end in anything but tears is missing something.

I say EE is in a corner, because this is basically the end. Procer is done. Even more done than it already was. The entire realm will starve to death even if the Dead King and literally every minion just drops dead right now. And they're not going to do that.

It is possible for the Dead King to still lose if the Gnomes come in, or perhaps the Dwarves. But the realm they've spent two entire books fighting to protect is just basically gone. These outside factions are also narratively unsatisfying if they just come in and solve everything, in my personal opinion.

The only thing I can think of other than mutual annihilation by angel is time travel shenanigans.

And maybe you're right. Maybe EE will come up with some brilliant twist that is not at all contrived and makes perfect sense in hindsight. But it is hard to have faith when this chapter is basically one nonstop "bad end" where the only ray of hope is the mutual annihilation angel.

Shveiran

Honestly, It feels like just the food and refugees situation is unsolvable through conventional means.

Like, if the war ended now? Most of the continent would still starve because so much of the harvest has been lost.

EE has a very good track record about keeping these things under control, and he is putting a lantern on it besides, but...

I mean, there aren't many established options there.

I can see only some shanenigans with the Crown of Spring leading to plentiful harvests everywhere, which honestly feels contrived to me, or the elamal actually killing 9/10 of the continent, making scrapping up a meal for everyone a lot easier.

Either feel... Kind of unsatisfying. Maybe I'm missing something.

Miles

Srnd a diplomat for foreign aid. Xanxares is not dead yet and the angel whose seat he took is returning to the fold.

The people of Bellophron have put it to a vote and wish all foreign despots to know that this is why foreign despots should never be negotiated with.

kinghaart

There are new Villain stories to write though, and we could see Villains decide to use Aspects to solve the food crisis for selfish reasons like crazy loans etc.

The Dwarves could also feasibly solve the food issues, and maybe Callow can to if Praes will leave them alone for a bit.

Plus the League, plus Levant. Plus Cardinal, where the agricultural Magitech of the Arsenal will be copyright free to all.

Onos

Ever predict where the Guide was going? Did you so much as call a single Name transition or character arc? 'Cos >99% of the comments section is utterly ludicrous.

As Shikkarasu mentioned, this has all been planned for a very long time, and it's super clear on a reread. I don't suppose you recall all the interminable bitching about Cat crippling her Name against the demon way back when? Or about how Hainaut "was such bullshit," or any of the other (many) times our dear readership has thrown a hissy fit because we consistently fail to predict where EE goes?

If you don't like it, don't read it. It's only kept you entertained for six and a half books, it's not like the author has earned any sort of trust – no wait, that's exactly what's happened.

Mental Mouse

> I don't appreciate this perspective, where as long as I've been reading carefully I should be able to predict exactly what happens next,

I don't think that's what shikkarasu is saying... rather, EE has hit us with these "all is lost, how could they possibly survive" scenes before... and followed them up with resolutions that leave us saying "of course!". That's part of his skill as a writer. Yes, it's running on faith – faith in the writer's ability.

ragnarok628

Not seeing why Procer falling is 'basically the end.' Procer is not the story. "Sometimes, you just lose" has now been fully hammered home, it doesn't just apply on an interpersonal scale but on the scale of nations, nay, entire populations.

So how's he in a corner? Procer is done... And then what happens? The rest of the story, that's what. Plenty of ways it could go, unless you assume he's going to try to un-screw Procer.

BarthHumphries

"I say EE is in a corner, because this is basically the end."

Yeah, EE has said that this is the last book, that this is the end.

MoreBeer

I don't think you're supposed to be able to predict the exact outcome of the story. I doubt anyone can, not right now, unless they are EE.

But there has been plenty of foreshadowing, plenty of dramatic reversals of near- certain failure before. They couldn't be easily foreseen but they followed from the story and were consistent and enjoyable. I assume you enjoyed them anyways because you're still reading.

My mind boggles at the thought that someone could get to this point and think EE doesn't have a satisfying conclusion to this epic in mind. That because they can't see a way out that satisfies them, the author is somehow going to disappoint.

If Calernia weren't on the very edge of catastrophe now, I'm sure a lot of people would be let down. Too easy of a win is no fun, right?

nipi

Not to mention that the Dead King eyeing lands beyond his borders has been part of the summary for a long time

Christian Oaks

Or how cat has always been stealing aspects culminating in her stealing half the bards aspect! Or trying to at least :p

Xinci

Hm, honestly I was laughing during it. For all the despair, it also showed potential. Reminded me of Irritants epigraph.

"Now, luck it always turns. Nothing you can do about that. But that's the trick, you see – wait long enough, and it turns all the way around."

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful

Christian Oaks

Yeah its also building up to the final Harrah. Night is darkest before the dawn, the last stand and all that

Eleron Pfoutz

If Villains are no longer bound by stories, then Heroes can redefine their own, make new ones.

Miles

Corner? Nah this is just the setup for book n+1.

The Errant Knight and Warden of the godsdamnitallthisstupidname just got their Names and are primed for new Aspects. Warden of the mice can't get aspects since she's a villain and they don't have stories any more but that's never stopped her before. This isn't dreadful, it's exciting.

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't assume that aspects are kaput. One of the takeaways from prior stuff in the story is that despite the gaudy labels, Heroes and Villains aren't fundamental, they're subspecies of Names with a line drawn across the field..

Frivolous

Miles: Last book.

Miles

Frivolous: Not necessarily.

Seven and one.

Deworld

If villain Names are still a thing, why wouldn't be Aspects? They come mainly from the person, not from the story they're in. The time they appear can be influenced by the story, but Aspects themselves are parts of the Name.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, those stories were also part of his arsenal and his protections. But for example, he no longer gets sequel-hook immunity from total extermination. And there's at least two more weapons out there, which were specifically made to bind or destroy him. Neither dependent on villainous stories.

kinghaart

Yeah the Severence can now be used as many times as they won't and it won't fail in the critical moment!

aisard

Yea, really hope whatever EE is planning was worth this..

Unhindered Dead King just sucks all the tension out of the story. The theme of this arc is very quickly narrowing down in to a pyrrhic victory at best, suffer porn at worst. Regardless of the path they'll take to get there.

Killing off half the stories, the constraints of which provided the majority draw of the story as well as a good bit of tension, doesn't help. Might turn out to be not horrible? But introducing it through the extremes of the Dead King, just makes it seem like even stories don't matter much now. Not in the face of the Dead King. Nothing really does at this point. Not even beating him.

So really hope EE has a really good plan for how this goes..

DC

Well the gloves are off for every other villain on the continent too, and Cat's in charge of them all.

Tenthyr

You know, it's one thing to KNOW the dead king could finally unleash his millennia of accumulated atrocities without limit or care, but god it didn't prepare me for this bleakness.

edrey

well, i was expecting continental type weapons but the heavens would have intervened otherwise right?

Tenthyn

The heavens cannot interfere overtly without Below having the same right. Neither side is going to be willing to do something mighty enough to stop Neshamah because the sheer leeway it would give the opposition would probably ruin the wager, now.

ninegardens

"So, did Above win the bet, or Below?"

"Nope."

"..."

"Everybody lost."

"It was a two sided bet!"

"WAS a two sided bet."

tmchin75723

Ah but what if they both pull out the stops together.

It doesn't ruin the integrity that way— just takes a lot of tableside arguing before it happens.

Hakram's Dead Hand

From what we have seen of The Gods Above and The Gods Below, having them both pull out the stops seems like a terrible time for anyone living in Calernia.

dadycool

Like knowing about a forest fire compared to walking through the inferno. It hits different when you're watching each person individually despair.

Soronel Haetir

I actually had a different thought about Tuesday's chapter. The stories are gone, but one of those stories is the Dead King's survival, that no matter what happens he'll be back for another go. Sure, he's off the leash now but I think breaking the board is actually what was needed to break DK.

Liliet

I kind of think the same.

Too bad for the, uh, that -waves hand vaguely towards this whole thing-

dadycool

Yeah, well, you can only chop off a hand that has been extended away from the body, or something.

Liliet

Nice metaphor.

shikkarasu

I've been wondering for a while now what villains will do without stories to lean into. DK is an exception because he's been investing power in himself for, what, 13 000 years or some shenanigans? Too [EXPLETIVE DELETED] long. Everyone else has lost not only their 'doomed to die in act 3-itus,' but also the bullet proof nature that the Tyrant survived on for 10 years. I'm genuinely not sure how well this works out for Evil on the whole.

... That said if villains can start calling on their dues to Below before the day they die that will have some heavy utility. I hope that happens.

Darkening

Yeah, this is probably gonna make it a lot harder for new villains to rise since their initial guaranteed successes and empowerment are gone. Old villains are gonna be intensely more terrifying though without their forced doom waiting in the wings.

Mincheriit

I agree, it does help with the goal of killing him permanently instead of just permanently sealing him away, however i just think that breaking the board as you say benefits the dk more as hes the one more heavily restricted by the rules.

LarsBlitzer

I think that's the one saving grace of Cat's action (really, it was the Intercessor's but everyone will blame Cat) in all of this. All the villains are off the chain now, the board has been well and truly flipped, and all the villains are well and truly not playing chess anymore; it's Calvinball. Once Cat's done with cursing herself and bemoaning the renewed hostilities I think she'll come to the same conclusion and set loose all the Villains she has left. The question now remains: Who's going to be other Warden? Masego has a swath of stolen Name lore for the Heroes and nowhere to put it.

Christian Oaks

Well so we know its between Cordy and Hanno. Personally I want it to be Cordy because I think it would be a better parallel. She dislikes the heroes in the same way cat dislikes general villains, she has been ruling the west like cat is ruling the east, Hanno doesn't want to take up a position of ruling but is obviously being pushed towards it and I think is beginnk.g to realize the importance of doing so. I think cat will have a massive impact on who gets it if she decides to interfere because she is the one in possession of the stories of good at the moment and can give them to her favorite pick.

KageLupus

I had a similar thought, but about the Heroes still having their stories available. The Witch of the Woods had everything going for her as far as being where she was needed and when, there just wasn't a corresponding balance on the other side of the story that made sure she would win.

But Providence is still a pretty powerful force, even if it is only boosting one side and not weighing down the other. The Heroes just need to adapt and adjust to being given slightly less of a helping hand. They were caught flat-footed this time around and it really sucked, but once they know what is going on they can start to plan around it.

kinghaart

Yeah I thought this chapter spelled it out well.

Heroes retain their powers without those being impenetrable plot armor.

Juff

Typo Thread:

promise reverses > promised reverses
He was in Aisne (extra space)
now Rogue > now the Rogue hurried the > hurried to the copper them > copper to them Like rippled > Like ripples serves as > served as not spilling > now spilling been close > been as close every once > every ounce priests as sworn > priests had sworn

edrey

well, that is a show, i bet it only took a few minutes to prepare all that and he should have continental weapons, so he's still cautious.
now this is the end of an age and its just starting.

Mincheriit

Wow thats a "my turn" moment. Being the DK, i think he has to have more stuff in reserve. He hasnt gone all out just yet. Also the irony, the reasons that Cordy can 'safely' use the angel corpse is also the reason it needs to be used

letouriste

yeah, all these attacks (save the critters one) were things already seen before in some fashion.

It's like the time he sacrificed the Revenants Cat knew of. While effective, it also serve as milking them to death one last time before discarding them narratively.

Adrian_V

Well this is a fitting title indeed, Nessy isn't messing around anymore, i can imagine him acting like a gleefull kid finally able to use all his toys without adult supervision xD

Frivolous

I thought it was so sweet that Frederic thought that if Otto Redcrown died, it would feel as if half his soul were lost.

I would have left it at sweet, but then Otto talked about walking around with the back of his trousers missing, so I can only think of their relationship as bordering if not trespassing on steamy.

Ah well, at least Otto is now confirmed to still be alive.

Alas, my guess that only the telemetry of Evil's stories had been destroyed was wrong. It was the Stories themselves that were erased.

I wonder if the Intercessor really meant to do that, or if she just lost her temper.

Either way, is the Intercessor really still a hero? I have to wonder about Above, if they still sponsor her.

Also wonder what the wipe of Evil's Stories has done to the other great forces of Evil. For instance, Sve Noc and the drow.

dadycool

The stories were what informed the trajectories of the stars, which were representations of Named lives. Once the "paving stones" were ripped out, the stars had no clear way to go, so they all stalled out. DK was simply the only Villain alive who could recognize the opportunity and seize it to do whatever the Hells he wanted without consequence.

Frivolous

Not sure I understand what you're saying, dadycool.

Are you asserting that the map was the territory, as far as stories were concerned? That removing the ability to perceive stories was equivalent to removing the stories themselves?

Hargabga

The ability was not removed, the stories were.

dadycool

She specifically said that the stars were motionless in a way that they never were before. When she tweaked a story, she tweaked the path of their motion, but Bard straight up killed all Villainous stories. That's why DK is suddenly going all-out, he doesn't have to worry about the Escalation Story or any others that keep him in line. I'm not sure what map you're talking about.

Frivolous

The stars were motionless, yes, but that was only Catherine's perception, via an aspect. Perception isn't always reality.

It would be like, for instance, a computer program coded to chart the motions of planets of the solar system. If someone arrested the program, that wouldn't mean the planets would stop revolving and rotating.

Stories = actual physical planets with trajectories. Stars seen via aspect = astronomy computer program, data only.

That's why I used the word telemetry in the first place. Telemetry != trajectory.

Snappy270

But thats not what happened. The intercessor actually wiped out villans stories. Thats why DK is able to go full out without heaven or worrying about empowering heros.

Remember what hanno said. The witch did everything right. Right time and place able to try to undo the freeze in the last minute, but she didnt. She had her story to win this at the last second, but DK didnt have a story that daid he would lose.

The gods cant step in directly thats why they invented stories and named to begin with. On the otherside DK should be killable now.

Frivolous

Yes, I know that.

I think this will be my last response on this topic.

Hargabga

I think Intercessor always meant to do this, she just had to remove the one entity that would severely capitalise on the lack of stories (i.e. Dead King) first.

Albert Wen

The Intercessor has never been a hero. Originally, she equally represented Above and Below. It's only the existence of the Dead King that's forced her to lean Above for the past thousand years, in order to provide balance.

sengachi

.... you know what, I no longer have any reservations about the ealamal. Fire away.

I hope it hurt when the Dead King was present in that devil for its activation, enough to make him pay for some sliver of the lives which were lost to push him back in just this one place.

Darkening

I'm pretty confident he lost another sliver of soul to that. Makes you wonder how much he's got left.

nick012000

Huh. Confirmation that Cordelia hasn't become a Villain, then. That's sort of surprising; I thought that her last interlude strongly implied that she had been. Surely she didn't throw away her Name, right? She's still the First Prince.

hakureireimu

Having disagreements with other Heroes, even many of them, doesn't prevent you from being Heroic; see Mirror Knight, Saint, Red Axe, etc.

Konstantin von Karstein

Come on, she never had the Name First Prince! The title of First Prince (like Holy Seljun and Black Queen) was always capitalised, from the first time it appeared in the story, while not being a name. And it was heavily implied Cordelia was the rival claimant to Warden of the West.

Abrakadabra

Hey I just realized that Cat needed to be Both the politicál east and the named east, right? So that is why warden of the west is not decided yet. Because Hanno and Cordelia Both represent half of the name.

Steven Silver

Hanno might be becoming Warden of the West, but Cordelia is no longer a claimant. She rejected the Name in a previous interlude.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes, in book 5. But we saw in the West chapters that there was a Claimant to the Name in Salia. Appart from the fact that no one else there has the narrative (both in and out of universe) weight for it, Cordelia and Hanno are constantly described as opposed by the narration.

Mental Mouse

She may have rejected the Name, but the Name isn't listening to that. We've seen that before, notably with Grem who was still a Warlord claimant.

Darkening

Yeah, cordelia's the ruler of the nations but she's acting like a named in this chapter lol, whereas hanno is the leader of named but he's acting like a leader in this chapter. Fun patterns.

edrey

Cordelia is a claimant to the warden of the west, and that last line could be like the dark stars that cat see with her name, who knows? but hanno will meet her soon so let see what happens

dadycoool

Welp, Procer's boned. No idea how far he'll go, if Levant or Callow are in danger, but Procer's gone. The Dead King has released all the restraints and, try as they might, the Heroes aren't enough. This is the dream of Amadeus of the Green Stretch realized. I'm sure Cat has, by this point, already started trying to contain him on the Meta level, but until she stops him, he's going to push as hard and as fast as he possibly can.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, Amadeus' speech sounded like righteous indignation, but in practice most Villains are monsters deserving only of death. Not all of them, but a good chunk. Heroes being assured to win is (or was) in fact a very good thing.

dadycoool

Yup, think of that whole business with the Red Axe. The villain she killed, whatever his name was, was a serial rapist. She was honestly right to kill him, it was simply against the law and politically inconvenient. We could go on for days listing more examples, but the Saint of Swords was actually doing a good thing for a long time.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, if Red Axe had bided her time she could have found a slower way to bring the villain down and make him face justice. But legwork and waiting for him to slip up... well, it's not that they aren't potentially heroic, but they weren't her kind of heroism.

kinghaart

What if he hadn't slipped up? He's still guilty of the crimes.

Cat's first notable act was to kill a would be rapist (well two). So it's fair to say Red Axe was within her rights to tear down a system predicated on the opposite notion.

Mental Mouse

It's worth noting that despite the black flag, Cat was acting under the direct auspices of her country's ruler. She was not violating laws nor oaths, much less challenging a multi-national treaty.

jamesc9

With an open question about what passes for a law, in the middle of military/colonial rule by a foreign empire.

Mental Mouse

As governor, Amadeus certainly made laws and enforced them – and as noted early on, by the time of our tale, the Callowans generally accepted and often supported his laws.

Declaring a country's laws invalid because you don't approve of who's ruling it is a slippery slope.

jamesc9

> Declaring a country's laws invalid because you don't approve of who's ruling it is a slippery slope.

As is deciding that anyone with sufficient brute power to make a decision stick was entitled to make it.

I'm told that 'legitimacy' in political science is a theory of this edge.

Bart

Just noting, that's how the world works. That's why countries like North Korea get a seat at the bargaining table, because it has some measure of power (albeit largely by proxy through China, although North Korea's burgeoning nuclear program is growing their own power).

Hargabga

Except how much of Villains carnage was caused by them being Evil and how much was sheer desperation because they didn't want to die?

Konstantin von Karstein

Akua, Triumphant, Neshamah, Traitorous, Wicked Enchanter, most of Praes' Dread Emperors, Poisoner, Kairos, ... Should I continue? Most of the Villains were or are evil monsters, who did everything of their own volition.

Abakadabra

Or did they? What if stories forced into them becoming more monstrous than they originally wanted to be?

As with the Tower once you reached the top, you forgot Why you came.

Serious sidenote.:even in our world rogue states are being pushed into being allied with north Korea and the like for the simple reason that they are the only ones who trade with them... Even though without pressure these same states would strangle each other in a cup of water. Serious sidenote over.

Konstantin von Karstein

Maybe? But that doesn't matter for my argument. Even if (and that's a big if) it's the Story that makes them so monstrous, the fact is that they are, and that the Heroes are trying to stop them.

Shveiran

Yeah. Just look at what the poster child of practical evil ended up doing. I can't even...

Right now, nothing short of the current apocalypse would count as a counterargument to the Saint's philosophy.

Hargabga

That is not even half of all the Villains, much less a majority. A prominent majority does not equal causation, especially if the pattern of despair and escalation is so culturally ingrained that preemptive escalation seen as a good idea. Most Villains try to do their own thing, even if they have a looser moral compass than most people. I do not try to justify their crimes, I just point out that it's not unreasonable nor unfounded.

Konstantin von Karstein

That's just ridiculous, was i supposed to list every single Villain we saw that conformed to the description? Most Villains we saw do, especially historically. And even if a majority isn't causation, it's still extremely suspicious.

Villains (Named in general) receive their Name because among other things they have a certain personality already and we're doing horrible things even before getting their Name. For a lot of them, « doing their own thing » means « harming innocent people ». They don't just decide to do so because the world is hunting them, the world is generally hunting them because they began harming others.

vuthuha912

Maleficent I&II were 'normal' Villains, especially Maleficent I who united a country and got stabbed for her trouble. Terribilus I&II were decent rulers for their country, liberating Praes from foreign occupations and generally trying their best to improve Praes. Though I think it will be better if the Crusaders just help the locals by blessing their fields, creating jobs, and generally being better rulers than Praes might have a chance to become something like Helike having both Evil and Good rulers. I guess we can't ask outsiders to care for the well-being of the natives but I do think that the Crusaders were too preoccupied with their justice and forget about the actual human. Compassion is a truly powerful force of Good. It is not a coincidence that currently there is no Hero sworn to Compassion.

Praes top positions are Villain Names. It is the only way for anyone to have enough power to actually do anything meaningful. Yet, by the time they get to the top, their wills got twisted. Black & Malicia can't be the only ones being twisted by their Names. They do love Praes and each other and we all see how their story turned out. The farmer boy became a killer while the tavern girl became a tyrant. We have to remember that they start out wanting to make things better. Amadeus tried to make friends and help the lower classes. Alaya was a policy nerd wanting to use diplomacy to win. They both studied history out of the desire to understand and better govern their country. Their original goals were good ones. Yet, how can a farmer boy and a waitress change their country? By being the Dread Empress and Black Knight. As they both become Villains, they are more susceptible to corruption by Name. Black became a cold fish only fighting to win and has an unexplained distaste for heroes – fitting for a hero killer (we see that he is perfectly capable of accepting defeat and appreciating their good qualities) while Malicia was unable to trust even her best friend and commits worse and worse atrocities just to keep her power – just like a tyrant.

Tyrant was a disabled boy wanting to make something out of his life. The wish is not something sinister at face value. He could be someone like Stephen Hawking and such but he went the Tyrant route so all of his brilliance just got perverted into being the biggest cunt on the continent.

Even Sinister – the guy that stabs Maleficent might be twisted by his name (I think any Sahelian is more likely to be Heir). He might also start out wanting to serve the Empire but ended up stabbing his Empress to either promote the iron shapes iron philosophy or try to stop the Sonnike from leaving the Empire. He chose the worst possible way of achieving it but ... we never know what is his reason or if that was the influence of his Name.

That is the sinister part of Villain Name they just twist you subtly so you can't even recognize it. Not every Villain in the series is a Villain that wants to do bad things just for the sake of it. They all have some sort of twisted logic to their madness. A possible explanation is that they are normal human beings whose worse quality got enhanced and whose best quality got perverted.

sigh Humans aren't meant to be tested.

Silverking

Turns out when Good and Evil are no longer bound to their narrative constraints, the side that has the most accumulated power in reserve just...wins.

If I had to guess how the story ends, Cat is going to find herself in a position to effectively "write" the new rules of Evil. This is great power AND great risk, as she's going to be setting them not just for today, but possibly for centuries to come. She'll be walking a tightrope to figure out how to a) punish the Dead King for overextending, b) reducing the self-destructive tendencies of Evil that made Praes such a crab-bucket, c) granting future villains enough power to resist the forces of Good, and d) limiting the power of future villains so that another Dead King can't come to pass.

Kletanio

One interesting option here (I like this idea, thanks!), is that the new Story Grooves will be those of strength and self-reliance, but not necessarily villains anymore.

Zach

I kind of doubt this, since it directly conflicts with Catherine's own philosophy. Remember the scene where she's talking to Arthur and Sapan (I think that's Apprentice's name) about how important cooperation is? The last thing she wants is a bunch of Rangers running around.

hue hue

DK after killing all of procer: what will you do little cat?

Catherine: you got gnomed

Warships fleet warps on top of her

hue hue

A shit I wanted to post a comment not reply

NerfGlaistigUaine

Wow. So this is what they meant by Neshamah not being scared of Cat or the rest of Calernia, only the Bard. As soon as he doesn't have to worry about story nooses he just steamrolls the opposition from halfway across the continent. In this chapter alone we have: freezing lakes, demons, floods, death bombs, famine, darkness, and hellgates. This is like if you were watching an epic boxing match and in the ninth round one guy suddenly whips out a machine gun because the other guy punched the ref and made him rage quit.

kinghaart

That's a... surprisingly good analogy.

Cat is still the premier Brawling Tavern Wench in Calernia though so she's still in with a chance.

WuseMajor

I suspect that Cat claiming the stories of Above is what let the Angel's Corpse work without the Bard turning it into something that destroys the continent

Matthew

The worry about the angel was that the Bard would be able to control it.

The bard is dead now.

Fire away.

Zach

I don't think that's why; it's probably the "destroying the stories of Below" that caused that. The reason why using the angel corpse is a bad idea is that it would give Dead King "story clearance" to respond with similar force (like what happened when the Pilgrim used his ability and Dead King responded with all the hell-gates).

kinghaart

Yeah it's certainly safe now either way because it brings story balance so Above can allow it.

Doesn't mean Bard's (presumably?) bad intentions for it won't play out at some point though.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I hope the author has a plan here because if this wasn't a story I'd just assume Neshamah would win. I'm a bit afraid this will turn into an Aizen or Madara situation b/c I haven't seen a villain this far above the protagonists since Scion decided omnicide sounded fun. On a related note, in just two chapters I went from thinking the ealamal sounds like a terrible idea to worrying it won't be enough.

Hargabga

See, the thing is, Nessie started to bring out out te the big guns, and the other side didn't. The Riddle-Maker and the Titanomachy, the dwarves, the eamal, crown of Autumn, Good Stories, and maybe elves (though I honestly don't know if they intend to do anything besides breed again, but I assume letting DK win is not what they want). He escalated first which is entirely too reasonable as now he does not have any ramifications for escalating first, but this is far, far from over. The orcs, Callow, Praes, League, Ashur are also still not on the scene. I am morbidly curious about the drow too. My point is, the situation is scary, it should be scary and it should drive home the realisation that this is really the end times. But do not forget hope.

Mental Mouse

Except that even in this first round, he already got slapped down once. And there's two more weapons in the wings....

Darkening

Oh right, this probably is enough to push the Riddle Maker to make a decision and lead the giants to war. That would go a long way to countering a lot of this bullshit.

miles

Maybe what the Bard did to all the stories required intervention from the GA

kinghaart

Yeah even if Above won't auto-retaliate they won't stop Good from doing so.

I take this chapter as saying the gloves are off.

ninegardens

Welp, I will say this: this chapter really did live up to its title, End times.
That was ummm... Harrowing.

And... Cordelia unleashed the angle corpse, and honestly? Not so bad.

Left a bit of a tingling sensation, but overall, pretty good; nice superweapon. Would red-button again.

Why were we so worried about it this whole time? Seems pretty legit.

knockoffnikolai

Because there were credible reasons to believe Bard was setting it up to destroy the entire continent. Now that she's out of action, there's no one pulling the strings to make it not do what it's expected to do.

ninegardens

So, just to be clear to folks "Why were we so worried about it this whole time? Seems pretty legit." was only meant as a flippant pithy remark. In the same sense as "Why didn't we try crack cocaine earlier?"

This obviously didn't come through, and I'm actually kind of happy with the resulting discussion, but y'all don't need to be taking me too seriously. 😊

Black Spiral Dancer

Because its activation effectively MURDERS an untold number of people that you actually have no knowledge of to actually evacuate them (only the named Villains can be warned – you never know who among the populace is good or evil – and even if they are evil, should they be murdered without a trial? One can argue easily that you can be evil without ever doing illegal things, and be an important helper to the government or other institutions. Is it ok to simply murder fathers, mothers and children if they're evil? That is what just happened.

Now that it has been used, though, the damage is done, I'm all for using it again at least as a sort of nuke-level card until the Dead King stops attacking.

Black Spiral Dancer

Actually I would argue that if she had activated the angel corpse AT ANY MOMENT before that would certainly be an Evil act (at least by OUR current standard, not in-universe-angels). The only possible justification to murder such amounts of fathers, mothers and children who happen to be more evil than good is if it prevents an even worse outcome – such as Undeath winning.

kinghaart

My fear is that like Keter's Due there will always be a price – it will "cull" the worst % of whoever is impacted.

So over time, the people who sure are less and less obviously evils ones...

Black Spiral Dancer

I'm... pretty sure that's not how good and evil works in this world. It is not relative. You're not evil to someone higher on the good scale.

Reader in the Night

Truthfully, I just skimmed. This answers none of the questions of "How?" and "Why?" we were left with last chapter. An entire update of DK just steamrolling the opposition just seems meh.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

The question it answers from last chapter is "Exactly how bad is the situation?"

To which the answer is "Pretty bad, but these cool characters are still alive and pissed about it."

That's worth reading about.

ninegardens

I dunno.

One of the main questions I had after last chapter was "If you kill the villainous half of a hero-villain story what does that even MEAN".

Hanno's section at the start did a pretty good job of communicating and explaining that, so that's cool.

kinghaart

Yeah I think this was quite an important follow up. We needed to know this sooner or later and after the last chapter it would have felt cruel to tease this out any slower.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Nessie is breaking out the hard shit now.

The boss rush has begun.

Hargabga

It's the absurdity of the scope that really strikes the sinking realisation of horror. The deeds themselves don't really impress much because they are beyond what we can comprehend, but as we scratch the limits of our imagination and realise how reality can be both so utterly brutal and grand, something so terrible we can't even feel terror at the sight of it, that really brings it all home.

Black Spiral Dancer

Your comment made me think of something... about our own reality. About how reality could be a lot lot worse, devoid of life, if small paremeters were changed... and how we are "lucky" that it all happens as it does.

What if is not by chance? Some scientists try to resolve this problem with an Infinite Parallel worlds theory (if I'm not mistaken based on string theory, which itself is non-falseable and can make no prediction about anything we don't already know), but I find it a really unlikely to be the real "answer" to reality.

Other options use the idea of a designer, either a kind of God or a Matrix-creator (for virtual reality proposers), and what I felt reading your comment is that, perhaps, if reality wasn't "guided" by anything, life shouldn't exist, least of which intelligence/conscience as we know it.

We now know aliens exist, and that they have been here thousands of years. Seems like they did intervene when our crazyeness level got a bit over-the-top with nuclear weapons, making a point that we wouldn't be allowed to simply nuke it out if one U.S. president or URSS leader simply became deranged one day and decided to press the red button. The main reason I actually believe this has had to happen (besides all the government – US and URSS – official documents stating that it did happen) was because the Cold War ending without one side nuking the other (and destroying the world) was so unlike our history for the last thousands of years. Like something was "nudging" towards it not happening. Me? I'm not believer in humanity. We don't seem to change much on the whole, still very much the same tribal mind, aggressive mysoginistic rapists of old. Perhaps we hide it better now. But that's what's hidden when one looks through the cracks of the mask mankind wears. And cracks always appear anew.

My point is that... perhaps either God/Matrix Devs or even Aliens are like the bard in a way – nudging either reality or mankind towards a positive outcome that wouldn't be likely if fate was purely randomical and "stories" didn't exist. At another level, perhaps the fact that our Consciousness "defines" quantum reality means that conscience – or life, in a broader scope – gives "weight" to things. This "weight" is story-like.

Keep in mind I'm not advocating for a "good" God(s) or Matrix Creator(s), except perhaps for it/them being on the side of "life". Which means that, in whatever universe (or creation, if anyone or anything did create it) statistic will always side with Life and Conscience – the dice will always be heavily weighted towards it, probabilities will favour that outcome instead of, say, a comet being able to anihilate mankind – that chance would be 0% if the universe uses loaded dice. Even if catastrophes happen, mankind – or conscience- would always survive, do a comeback.

Of course, perhaps it's aliens who are re-directing dangerous asteroids away from collision courses for thousands of years without our knowledge. Once one accept they do exist, that chance jumps to more than 50%, perhaps even higher, and a lot of things we suspected was "luck" in our part was not really so. I mean, for all we know, aliens could have actually genetically engineered our primate-like ancestor, and aside from keeping tabs so that their "children" would not be snuffed out, let nature take its course. This is kinda deep down the rabbit hole, and I'm not arguing for Aliens-of-the-gaps as a good explanation for everything, but the possibility is there, and it is (much) higher than 0.

If

1. Aliens are here
and

2. They have been around for thousands of years, then

3. Interference in some level seems very probable, (heck, they do intervene nowadays, minor but it happens, just look at the 11 near-misses with U.S. aircrafts, and the Nimitz encounter – so why wouldn't they have intervened long ago?).

Also, it's not really hard to escape the sight of (most of) our lenses, looking at how our "science" still refuses to accept what dozens of millions have actually seen first-hand in the sky, and we all suspect heavily (and has been said by whistleblowers) that at least the U.S. government has much stronger proof but have chosen (for whatever reasons) to keep it classified. George Bush is on record saying that we wouldn't be able to handle the Truth (IF there was one), and that he wouldn't say anything IF he knew something.

Anyways, here's hoping the Galileo Project will correct that shameful history we have of secrecy instead of transparency to the public.

I seem to have ranted longer than I thought I would... just like me, to go off on a tangent, but usually I do this only inside my head while contemplating possibilities. So yay, welcome to my head tonight. Take a beer while you're there, but don't forget to shut the lights on your way out.

Zach

lmao what, we do not "not know aliens exist and have been here thousands of years." I'm guessing you're referring to the handful of recently released videos of dots/disks appearing to move fast, but that's not even remotely some sort of proof of aliens being on earth.

You're basically making the same logical fallacy of someone that says "My license plate is EB3-Y29 – the chances of that are billions to one!" There is nothing uniquely good or strange about life on Earth. The fact that there are countless possibilities for a situation doesn't mean that any one of those possibilities must be impossible. And the idea that it's nearly impossible for complex life to arise has essentially been debunked; there are many planets where it'd technically possible.

Black Spiral Dancer

I will just assume you haven't really researched the subject at all. It's ok, I've been there, done that. I find it unlikely anything I say will be able to change what you believe to be true, so instead I will share what I consider two very compelling documents that explain in detail everything we were (unfortunately) not taught in school and instead even nudged to ridicularized, when we were the clowns the whole time.

1. The first is a Australian Intelligence Report, decades old, made only for government sight, which directly and in no uncertain terms clarifies what was really going on about the UFO topic then. This was a classified report that has only become available for the public in 2008. You can start and read the 50+ pages in this link below, which is the National Archives of Australia. I do urge you to at least read the 2-page Summary, which gives an overview of what was actually already know by important people 40 or 50 years ago (while the U.S. had decided for the strategy to hide and confound this subject):

<https://recordsearch.naa.gov.au/SearchNRetrieve/Interface/ViewImage.aspx?B=30030606&S=7&R=0>

(...yes, these documents are real. In doubt, search and you will find only confirmations that this is truly so. Not a hoax or a fabrication of any sort. Yes, I also find it appalling that even knowing this is publicly available, the U.S. still have the gall to lie to our faces – then again, things have finally reached critical mass recently, it was slow but inevitable).

2. The second is a scientific article that argues that for the first time, we find ourselves in the peculiar position...

Quote: "While the 'We are alone' solution to Fermi's paradox was once a seemingly valid one, this answer is now incompatible with the infinite universe and random self-sampling assumption consistent with inflation theory. We thus find ourselves in the curious position that current cosmological theory predicts that we should be experiencing extraterrestrial visitation. At the same time, current physics and astrophysics suggest that such visitation may not be as impossible as had been thought.

Inflation-Theory Implications for Extraterrestrial Visitation

J. DEARDORFF¹, B. HAISCH², B. MACCABEE³ AND H.E. PUTHOFF⁴

Click to access JBIS.pdf

Bonus

Check these interviews from the physicist Kurt Jarmungal, where he asks both scientific questions and more history background about this reality.

Channel: Theories of Everything with Curt Jaimungal <https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCdWlQh9DGG6uhJk8eyIFl1w>

(Recommended) Interviews:

Astrophysicist Kevin Knuth – https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=atntnU_baHc&pp=sAQa

Former Pentagon Director of AATIP (Advanced Aerospace Threat Identification Program), Luis Elizondo – <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aAmFLLfsZKM&pp=sAQa>

Extra Bonus

As recently as of this week, Project Galileo, led by Avi Loeb, famous Harvard Scientist and longest-holder of the Astronomy Chair, was launched with the specific intent of collecting new and government-free data to clarify what are the UAPs. Avi has gathered a team of highly-qualified astronomers and is very interested in the possibility that whatever they find has the possibility of forever changing our view of the world and our place in it.

Launch of Project Galileo: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Q3NqRak2tjc>

Website: <https://projects.iq.harvard.edu/galileo>

They also will try to (possibly) collect direct, multiple-sensor evidence of exceptional flight characteristics extensively and repeatedly observed by credible military pilots and radar operators, such as supersonic speeds without sonic booms, instant high velocity without acceleration, movement without any noticeable means of propulsion, etc. These and other traits, which are stated very seriously in the Preliminary UAP task report to the congress June 25th (the declassified portion available to the public), may possible hint at new rules of Physics currently unknown to us, possibly from technologies hundreds of years ahead, and which we may perhaps be able to replicate or deduce if we have enough high-quality data.

Miles

And to think I almost believed you about string theory. But no, it wouldn't be theory if it weren't falsifiable.

Black Spiral Dancer

Right now, there are no experiments you can do to that would make it falsifiable. That's exactly why many scientists criticize it. Dr. Avi Loeb even said in many interviews that when he approaches them to put forward some ways in which they could actually falsify it, they make it so that whatever happens, the theory has a way of "predicting" it, and thus it keeps being not falsifiable.

But I might be wrong actually, I'm not a very deep scholar of the theory. Prove me wrong, which were the falsifiable predictions it has made in all these years and which predictions does it make right now that we can go out to prove?

Miles

No those experiments have been done. Repeatedly and successfully for decades. That's what "theory" means.

"Prove me wrong" nobody's going to bother if you can't do that basic bit of legwork yourself. I'm sure you learned how to use a library in grade school. If not, ask a librarian nicely and they might just show you.

Black Spiral Dancer

Well, then I am wrong on String Theory. That's not really the point of my text. I know it is very polemic, not something that is accepted as the scientific standard. Also it is not the single theory out there. And I have seen several String Theory defenders who admit that there are no TRUE predictions from the String Theory.

Oh, and I can prove what I'm saying. Here, Cumrun Vafa talking about it:

I found it funny that this minor point that I didn't even delve much into is what you chose to focus.

Mental Mouse

Also, there's the Anthropic Principle, which is that the universe we see around us is necessarily one where we could evolve, because if it wasn't, we wouldn't be here to observe it. Which plays merry hell with the usual logic of science, but we regularly see similar principles when we study evolution in general.

Vertaco

Well, it's bleak. But even if I don't want DK to win and all of Procer to die, I must say that Hanno realising that DK was not nudged to lose was ... a good moment. Because yeah, the good winning just because they are good, it's what this entire story is against.

Onos

This is fucking awesome. Really looking forward to seeing the final arc of the story with Nessie fully unleashed. Shame the Tower just got burned down, some sweet artifacts could probably have been pretty handy for the Villains.

Autochthon

I feel that both the destruction wrought by the Dead King and the Ealmal itself felt underwhelming; the chapter felt a bit rushed. I feel bad criticizing it straightforwardly like this but when I know how brilliant the author is, I cannot help but see the potential of what could have been. The chapter feels like it was written under pressure and could benefit from a rewrite later.

Autochthon

Now that I think about it, it might actually be "fridge brilliance". We saw what amazing stories the Interludes depicting the classic heroic defiance against all odds of the Lycaonese against the Dead King could be. They literally brought tears to my eyes.

This is no poetic story that flows up and down. This is just flat, mundane extermination.

Rynjin

This can't be the End Times, the Skaven...er, the Chain of Hunger haven't started killing everyone yet.

knockoffnikolai

Dead King is secretly three rats in a trenchcoat, yes-yes!

Snappy

Thats kinda what I thought. With no stories theres no banter or awe inspiring last stands. This is what whould happen in our world if the undead were here. Entire cities wiped out and all we can do is retreat.

Its horrifying how many tricks we seen DK use that were overwhelming when used against Catherine every so often. But now he is spamming all of it.

I can agree with the shortness, they were really quick snapshots, just needed a longer chapter. But then again i say that about all his writing cause i just want more !

yentris

> This is what whould happen in our world if the undead were here. Entire cities wiped out and all > we can do is retreat.

I guess you're exaggerating a bit here, but even accounting for that, you're forgetting that if this were our (modern, 21st century) world, we would essentially be the Gnomes. IMO, there's a reason that nearly all "fantasy/magic/zombie" type stories always begin with humanity on the brink of extinction, or in a medieval setting, or else with the science hand-waved away: every time one brings modern science & technology into the mix, we all know how it will end.

The Dead King in our world? I give it anywhere between a couple of weeks to a couple of months before Keter is a burning hole in the ground, depending on how many casualties the DK manages to make with his first attack.

If it were standard 15th century or whatever, then probably we'd all be dead in a couple of decades 😊

David Stone

I don't know about that. Dead King summons a Demon of Madness on top of Moscow, Beijing, and Washington D.C. Or, for something more subtle, body snatch Secret Service and their equivalents in other countries to get close to world leaders, body snatch world leaders. Game over humanity.

yentris

Re Demons: If the Dead King could manage to summon that many Demons of Madness, he should've done so in this chapter over all the major cities in the Continent. After all, he's no longer limited by the story and it would cut off the enemy leadership in one blow. Given that there are no story repercussions to be had, unleashing an army of demons would be even better.

Also, if an army of medieval soldiers + few demigods can hold a castle against 100k undead, devils, AND a pair of demons; I see no reason why a modern force half the size with artillery and air support cannot utterly destroy the same. In fact, you don't even need an army to do that: drop a bunch of ballistic missiles on their heads and see how they like it!

Going back to the issue of demons, if the Dead King really could use them as easily as you're implying, at this point all he had to do is release them at major population centres in Calernia as well. Southern Procer, Laure, anywhere where there are lots of civilians and just a few Named. Kill enough of the other species and then he could just literally throw bodies at the main characters until they died of suffocation. Problem fixed. If he can't even do that across one continent, I shan't even entertain the notion that he's capable of doing that across five continents.

"Body snatchers" requires that there are no safeguards in military or political systems in our world. Or the fact that no one will notice that the leader of their country doesn't have a normal body temperature (I presume undead are not exactly operating at 38C) and is ordering the military to not fire on the giant portal to Hell? Questionable.

David Stone

He did do basically that. I think it was implied that there were at least 5 Demons of Terror summoned within earshot of Otto and Frederic, which makes me think they showed up in every population center in this region.

Bart

No, the Dead King would bide his time, go take over North Korea or somewhere that nobody cares about, build his own secret nukes, then have undead simply carry the nukes to surround every major military place while arming all of his regular people and undead with military rifles, etc.

The Dead King is a smart person and would not hesitate to sit back and not attack, all the while building up his strength with this new modern military tech.

Mental Mouse

It occurs to me that DK might have thought that all stories were gone... and gotten a nasty surprise when Cordelia's heroic stand worked perfectly.

kinghaart

I think that's what he's probing.

ninegardens

See, I saw it more as a montage chapter. It's "rushed", because the things we are looking at aren't (individually) all that important to the plot. We don't really care about them, or the outcome (except maybe Cordelia).

What we care about is the overall "tone".

It's a disaster montage. It's not meant to be crowning moment of awesome for anyone.

kinghaart

I was expecting at least one named (lowercase) character to die though. Otto has some serious death flags.

Black Spiral Dancer

It feels short because both last chapters wer 2x, 3x longer than usual lenght, was it not?

hue hue

DK after killing all of procer: what will you do little cat?

Catherine: you got gnomed

Warships fleet warps on top of her

Shveiran

And this chapter here is why the last arc made me so mad at nearly every character I couldn't bear to write about it.

This is not new.

Procer was already collapsing, with the GA behind it. A famine is not something that gets fixed because you killed the big bad, and food production had already been crippled.

This is not new.

And though I do think they have a point, I'm not trying to add my voice to the "no escalation was needed" crowd. What I mean to say is that throughout the Praesi arc this was in the back of my mind, all the time.

Every time people made egoistic, stupid decisions that supposedly made sense in character, all I could think was " yes, but just a few miles North...". Every single time, because this is not really new.

We opened this book saying doomsday was what, a couple months after the expected timeline of the siege of Ater?
This is not new, AND YET, smart character after smart character acted like it is.

Malicia. Akua. The Matrons and Sacker. Arthur and Nim. Amadeus and even bloody Hakram.

All pursuing their petty little goals as if it was a given that the damned apocalypse would be handled without not only their assistance but even their restraint from actively, purposely rocking the boat.

Could they have predicted this? No, of course not! But my point is, they didn't need to! The situation was well on it's way to the litteral Hells, and they are all smart and in possess of all needed informations.

And yes, petty goals. Because everything is petty compared to this, and this IS NOT NEW.

It's just so very disappointing. Am I supposed to think all these characters are all suddenly idiots, or malevolent idiots?

Steven Silver

They were getting their ducks in a row so they could turn North. Can't do that if there's a bunch of pretty factions who don't see the Dead King as a problem.

And yeah, refugees are going to starve, but there will be more and more with less and less land to feed them if DK isn't stopped. Gotta cure the disease or the symptoms will just get worse.

Shveiran

Really now.

Akua had the war in the North as her priority.

And Malicia.

And Amadeus.

And the goblins and the Black Knight and bloody Arthur.

That was their priority, uh? I guess them never talking about it was just a coincidence.

Even Hakram, godsdamnit, deciding to side against Cat while she was battling the BARD... And to do what? There is no love for Praesi joining the GA beyond Cat, let's possio her off before joining!

Zach

Hakram and Amadeus both intended for Praes to end up contributing to the war effort in the end. Amadeus specifically engineered Alaya becoming a chancellor who would aid in the war on Keter, while also accomplishing his own personal ambitions for Praes. And Hakram also directly planned on getting his people to join the war.

Catherine had a poorer understand of both Praes and the Orcs than Amadeus and Hakram respectively. Catherine's plans would have, at best, resulted in a less stable Praes joining the war effort and (at best) reverting back to all its old bad habits immediately after the war.

vuthuha912

Or worse, reverting to old habits IN THE MIDDLE of the War. With the bullshit that Praesi highborns had pulled in the past, I won't be surprised that they think they could negotiate with Nessie and stab their allies to save their own skins (temporarily). We all see how much power story and name have. Anything that can go wrong for or with Praes will go wrong and even worse.

Honestly, that country was cursed with shortsightedness and treachery, it is not even funny. Malicia betrayed Amadeus. Amadeus and Ime both betrayed Malicia. Amadeus went from a guy trying to implement a long-lasting system (the reforms and strategies for Praes) to a person who just tried to kill enough people so that Praes can survive for a little longer (killing heroes, foreign rulers, rebels, etc). Alaya goes from Miss "forging a common ground and achieving benefits together" to Miss "if my subordinates aren't mind-controlled/dependent on me, they aren't worth keeping".

I am convinced that just by being involved in Praes, the 'curse' of Praes applied to all of them.

beleester

I disagree about Amadeus and Hakram – while they weren't willing to bow to Catherine, they were both working to bring their people into the war on Keter. They just needed a way to make it valuable to their people, because obviously "let's put our entire army under the command of our ancient Heroic enemies to save people on the other side of the continent" wasn't going to fly with the Praesi or the Orcs.

Everyone on the side of Praes assumed that the apocalypse is going to be localized to Procer, because that's how these stories normally go. Procer would have collapsed and then a band of heroes would have risen from the ashes to challenge the Dead King, possibly using the help of angels to restore the ruined wasteland. And this wasn't even an exclusively villainous perspective – the Saint of Swords predicted the same thing. "The situation is going to literal Hells" is, from a certain perspective, exactly what it's supposed to look like before the heroes win.

And sure, you can call it malevolent idiocy to ignore the fact that hundreds of thousands of people die in the process of that "rise from the ashes" narrative, but they're villains. Malevolence was always part of the package.

Shveiran

Both Hakram and Amadeus know that what seemed likely two years ago is not anymore.

Both knew the Bard would be involved.

Both knew there was no surviving for their people once Keter beat the GA.

Nothing else really matters.

If they can't sell survival to their people, they shouldn't be leading them right now.

beleester

First of all, they did sell it. Their respective plans worked, and the orcs and the Praesi are both fully on board with the war now. What more were you expecting them to do? Did you think that Amadeus would be able to waltz into the Tower, say "We need to go to war with Keter or everyone on the continent dies," and the High Lords and Malicia would respond by saying "Yes, that seems like a reasonable strategy and is definitely not going to get us all killed"?

You can't move an entire country to war on the other side of a continent with nothing but "because I said so." Not even Dread Emperors get that sort of obedience. And in case you've forgotten, Amadeus and Hakram weren't Dread Emperors. They worked their way up with what they had, and that meant diplomacy rather than ordering people at sword-point.

As for the Bard, even if the High Lords or the Clans knew exactly what she was planning, her plan was to use the angel-corpse to nuke everything west of the Whitecaps. Which doesn't include Praes. From their perspective, their survival isn't at stake – they could just sit on their hands and watch as their problems nuke themselves off the map. That's why the sales pitch from Amadeus and Hakram wasn't "we're all going to die," it was "The Grand Alliance is going to be the new world order, and we need to get in on that."

ninegardens

>>“We need to go to war with Keter or everyone on the continent dies,” and the High Lords and Malicia would respond by saying “Yes, that seems like a reasonable strategy and is definitely not going to get us all killed”?

... Honestly...

Yes, I think this would have worked.

Malicia OFFERED Cat support for the war on Keter, right back at the start of this Arc. That literally happened.

And Malicia, LOVES Black. She wanted him to “come home”. If he had showed up and said “Alaya, shit has got really serious... we have a way of being treated like a serious part of the continent, having all your dreams taken seriously... we only have to kill the dead king” – then yes, I think he could have talked her into it.

I don’t think they would have got all of Praes... but I think the extra speed, and reduced casualties would have more than made up for the reduced commitment.

I’m not convinced Black could have done that 2 years ago... but I do think that if Black was in play and communicating, he could have convinced Cat to accept Malicia’s initial deal, and he could have convinced Malicia to sweeten it even further, and He could have led the Legions (+1 general).

I don’t really understand why people think the “non-escalation” path was so untenable, given that it was something which was literally on the table earlier on.

Frivolous

ninegardens: Too many atrocities on Malicia’s part: the Night of Knives, attempting to use Akua’s Flying Liesse Artefact, the use of Still Water, replacing Merchant Prince Mauricius with a devil.

Acceding to Malicia would have been too revolting. The GA would have splintered.

And besides, Praes was not threatened by the DK. Only Procer was. Malicia would have kept leaning on that fact to force the Principate to keep giving her incentives to help. She was that kind of person.

So non-escalation was indeed untenable.

ninegardens

Let's turn the question round: given where we are now standing, do you believe that Procer would have been better off escalating, or giving in to a few of Malicia's demands (which mostly included "don't kill me" and "we want in on the accords").

Do we seriously believe that Malicia was a LESS reasonable actor than the DK?

Also: I do not give a shit about the night of knives, or merchant prince whatisname.

This clearly falls under the category of "The queens got to do what is good for the kingdom, even if the woman abhors it".

If you are going to crown yourself "black queen", then you need to get over your personal vendetta. In particular, each single action that we saw this chapter was measurable worse than everything we saw Malicia do combined.

Honestly, in terms of diplomacy: Cordelia would have taken the deal offered. Tariq would have taken the deal offered. Vivienne would have taken the deal offered. Hakram would have taken it, The Iron prince would have taken it. The Lone fucking swordsman probably would have taken it. Hell the only people who I can think of who wouldn't take it are; Kiaros, Saint of Swords, and Cat.

I don't care about the past, I care about the fact that refusing out of pure stubbornness and spite while the world is on fire is a supremely selfish act, that does nothing to serve the dead. Not Ratface, not those dead in liesse, no one.

Frivolous

ninegardens: Heavy disagree.

I do care.

So that is that.

ninegardens

Fair enough.

... that was a heavy enough "We are done here" that I feel like I offended you in some way... or maybe you just done with the conversation. shrug

If offence was given, I apologise.

Frivolous

ninegardens: Don't worry, not offended by you.

Just decided that talking further about it would have been pointless as well as being a temptation to write essays about it.

vuthuha912

Somehow, I don't think it will be that easy. Malicia was under the influence of her Name. If she joined the GA then, I always think she would keep some cards to ruin it for everyone at a later date. The only type of alliance she accepted was the one where she holds the leash on everyone. Isn't that the reason she put hook into Black's officers despite him being the only one who loves her unconditionally (or as close to unconditionally as possible for him)? She stabbed Callow in the back for NO FUCKING REASON Like, lady, Callow is your bread basket, the only willing trading partner that your country has, and the defense against your enemies. Couldn't you just wait a little longer to backstab them? And Malicia was like: No. It has to be right now. And, recalling the leading generals (Grem and Black) from the border (in book 4) while they were fighting the enemies was a stupid move. I know she does that to gain leverage on them and she was not planning to act on it (maybe) but won't that mess with the morale of her army? Why should I fight this war when I know that I might get killed after I outlive my usefulness? No amount of patriotism is going to negate the thought that my rulers want to kill me while I am defending her country.

What I am trying to say is that Malicia was dangerous to everyone even her allies. She might not even recognize it herself. Her Name was wrapping her vision. How safe is Amadeus in her hand? You and I both think that she would never harm him but keeping him safe and listening to him are 2 completely different things. If 'keeping him safe' means chaining him up, she would do it. He might suffer mentally but as long as he is physically safe, it is okay with her. Honestly, anything goes for these 2 people, they obviously love each other but their understanding of love is really weird.

vuthuha912

Can't we just explain this by saying that the Dread Empire of Praes is a Name and Story of its own? All Praesi are characters in the story of Praes – the story of shortsightedness, backstabbing, horrible people who doom both themselves and their enemies. Their people being ignorant of the nature of the war are perfectly in tune with the story of Praes as a whole. The story is probably brainwashing the mass into underestimating the consequence of DK and keeping them apathetic to the struggle of others.

anonymous4968

It'd take way too long to deconstruct this. Just remember two things:

1. This is a tone setting chapter, all YA novels have the "end times" or "mind f" moment at the end. This isn't exactly new and it doesn't exactly ruin the moment nor the novel.

2. Before the Bard released the Dead King, the dread empress was the one thing keeping them in a narrative role that could act as freely as they have. Fighting over Pres and all of the factionalism was really over that point. The whole plot point here is that none of it mattered in the end, the narrative win that should have meant a group of five easy access to Keter is gone. They weren't idiots, it's just that the situation has changed.

Shveiran

1, speak for yourself there.

2... What? What narrative win that gets people into Keter are you talking about? And even if there was one, half those on that list know nothing about namelore to begin with, so that would be no excuse for them.

anonymous4968

Do I really, really have to sit here and deconstruct namelore bullshit for you? I'll be here all day, I don't want to do that. Very, very long story short: It's narrative causality at play. How you've gone seven volumes and close to 600 chapters without learning this stuff, but it makes sense when you look at everything.

ninegardens

No need to be condescending anon.

Shiv knows that name lore exists, but presumably wants to know precisely which "band of 5" namelore bullshit gets activated with Praes on board that somehow couldn't have worked without Praes. If you were going to band of 5 this shit, was there any real requirement for Praes to be part of that?

vuthuha912

I thought we need mages and such to keep the rest of the continent from collapsing when our band of 5 was fighting the DK.

The band of 5 will succeed (I am mostly sure) but the real question is where are they returning to after the war.

Miles

It's not new. It's early. They were supposed to have a whole nother season by the most conservative projections.

kinghaart

Replace "Calernia" with "Earth" and "Dead King" with "Global Warming" (or any number of modern issues).

Are you honestly surprised that people focus more on their immediate concerns than the death around the corner? It's everywhere today.

Bloop

I have read this story since the beginning and at this stage I'm genuinely considering giving it up.

The last two books and now this one have just been nothing but misery. The living have had no victories at all. Every Tuesday and Friday, it's a case of "What disaster will befall the living today?".

And maybe it has been explained but I simply do not understand Praes and Malicia. She allied with the Dead King and I don't know why. Thinking about the situation purely selfishly, if the dead win she dies. If the living win, she now will also die (and of course now Catherine has said that after Malicia's 8 years are up she will be killed, guaranteeing it). Because she sided with the bloody Dead King.

And the political bullshit in Procer is no better.

I suppose fundamentally I just struggle to see that people when faced with an existential horror like the Dead King would resort to playing political games. It is inexplicably stupid.

countyxenon

...Really? You struggle to believe that people, when faced with an existential threat, would play at politics?

Guess I won't mention the Cold War, then. Y'know, the 40-odd year long struggle that could have literally led to the end of modern humanity, that nearly did so (there were literally moments where a kicked wrench, or a flipped sensor, or that one guy in a submarine in Russia who could have personally started the apocalypse when he saw a credible-looking threat in the air and chose to have faith it wasn't missiles) multiple times... and that was also essentially exclusively politics, escalation, propagandizing, and proxy wars the whole time.

Or, y'know, global warming. Or certain countries' reactions to a global pandemic (admittedly that one's just a nature-driven massacre, not apocalypse-level).

Politics is the human race's only response to existential threats, as far as I can tell – at least, those threats for which a little bit of politicking and maneuvering would improve short-term returns while hurting long-term gains. Cooperation is hard, some people are greedy, and most people are stupid.

ninegardens

Malicia allied with DK way back when, because she was like “Procer is united, and Cordelia needs a war to unite her kingdom. If I give her a big juicy DK to fight against, she won't be fighting me”

This was all well and good. Previously, DK has launched many tiny wars, and then zooped back into his Serenity, and nothing “bad” has really happened. Hence, Malicia assumed the same thing would happen here.

... the problem was, things escalated.

Unbeknownst to Malicia, DK is actually on a timer-technological progress means that at some point the rest of the continent will be able to defeat him. Hence he needs to kill all other life first.

Bard had a weapon, but Kiaros destroyed it.

That lead to one step of escalation (outside of Malicia's control). This was directly after Malicia and DK offered the grand alliance a peace settlement. She was in the process of putting the evil back in the can (all according to plan).

Except them Kiaros broke the choir of judgement, DK said “Sweet, now's my opportunity to break everything”, and things went to hell in a handbasket.

Okay, fine, cue two years of war, and then Cat showing up at Malicia's doorstep.

Malicia: “I will give you everything you need to fuck with the Dead King.”

Cat: “Fuck you bitch, I'mma take your head.”

Malicia: “Wut?”

Malicia sided with the DK back when she thought he was containable... and has taken action was available to contain him ever since.

She's still an idiot, and totally underestimates him, but then again, so did everybody else.

Abrakadabra

Not true. She sided with the Dead King way beyond the conference. She sabotaged the GA to get funds from mercantis. She taken over Ashur and practically destroyed it. She sabotaged a great many things, even tried to assassinate Cordelia with the eyes. I cannot fathom why you are so forgiving towards her when she stabbed the GA repeatedly in the Back while it lost lives in the hundreds of thousands.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The purpose of the peace settlement was for the countries led by people who don't age (Keter, Praes) to wait for generational exchanges of power in other lands to weaken their enemies' commitment to fighting them and unity towards that end, and then restart the conflict.

Sure, Malicia doesn't want Keter to win any more than Cat does, but the offer of peace was made in bad faith to set up one of Malicia's (and DK's) trademark "you lose or I win" moments: either the GA leadership looks stupid in the eyes of people who don't understand the ploy, or they actually go for it and, as mentioned, come to further harm down the line as a direct result.

take realism out of my fiction please

"I struggle to see why people faced with existential horror would resort to political games." See: COVID, climate change

Miles

Everyone who watches fox knows those are just hoaxes made up by the left to seize power away from hardworking citizens.

And everyone who is on the left knows that everything fox says is true, because those stories are manufactured in England.

kinghaart

Case in point.

Dr.Dragon

I don't know if this was brought up last chapter but I skimmed the replies this time and didn't see anything about it so I hope not.

After thinking about it for a while, I think it's actually incredibly fitting that the Villain stories alone were deleted. The whole wager between Above and Below was over whether it was best to have free will or determinism. Well, now Below's champions have free will for real instead of just the illusion of it, still being forced along certain paths and grooves. Above's servants still have their determinism of being in the right place at the right time but as seen above, that means nothing if their opponent is simply better than them.

Let the wager begin properly for what might be the first time since creation.

Abrakadabra

And you have won the internet.

gbevis

The Dead King, when alive, learned to work with his story to make himself invulnerable to great defeats.

The dead cannot learn anything they did not learn in life.

The Dead King's story has been erased. He is now "learning" to "live" in a world without rules.

It's not the greatest weakness, but the only way I can see to stop him is to exploit his never having learned to protect himself without plot armor.

j

The dead king's motivation for killing everyone and everything was to deny the Intercessor angles/tools to attack him with.

Now that the Intercessor is effectively disabled, why is the dead king still intent on killing everyone and everything?

Hopefully we will find out.

Darkening

Sure he lost a lot of possible story deaths, but he also lost his protection as the looming inevitable evil that will always return. His plot armor's gone. The normal story is that he causes a bunch of damage, but if he loses he gets driven back to Keter but they break on his walls there and the stalemate resumes. So now he needs to slaughter everyone before they walk through the twilight ways and raze keter to the ground. He's not gonna be easy to kill obviously, but it's possible now.

Detton

Here's my question..

Evil is no longer constrained by stories; this means that, if the Dead King goes all-out, he will no longer get reigned in by narrative counterweight.

However, good is still constrained by stories – but do they not have a similar power boost, by no longer having an evil counterweight to fight against?

The way I think about it: The only reason Good never wins totally, is because the bad guy always escapes at the end; the chancellor escapes. The story goes on because BOTH sides are countering each other.

Good WANTS to win, and win totally, but they cannot because Evil got a measure of protection from complete defeat – a measure they no longer get.

So what is to stop Cordeilia from unleashing Angel WMDs everywhere again? Other than having to water it down so it doesn't screw everyone over, it sounds like good can go all-out ... AGAINST EVIL

We saw a glimpse of this with Hanno – Good was being nudged towards victory, but evil wasn't being nudged towards defeat. Accordingly, one can say that Good will still be nudged towards victory, while evil won't be protected FROM it.

... this is all just a long-winded way of saying that Good can go as all-out as Evil can because there's no counterweight; the destruction of Evil's stories prevents the traditional narrative protection they had.

One might even say that the Dead King HAS to go all-out now, because if he doesn't, he would be crushed under Good's feet.

It's just a matter of finding out what all Good can bring to the table.

Detton

Or another way: Good still has some plot armor. Evil doesn't.

beleester

I think the concern is that the plot armor isn't strong enough. The Witch got nudged towards success, but that turned out to not be enough of a buff without the Dead King being nudged towards failure. They have to think of providence as more of a guideline than a certainty.

It'll help if they can predict the Dead King's "step one" and forestall it, and it'll help with ensuring total victory at the end, but setting up those situations will have to rely on mundane strategy and planning. And the Dead King is really good at not leaving openings.

Alexander

He's good at not leaving openings with stories. When it comes to purely military strategy, he's good but not unbeatable.

kinghaart

He beat plenty of great military minds in Hainut in the last book. It was only really narrative that let any of them escape and there was a greivous price.

About the only extra strategist the GA has is Juniper, maybe also Grem.

Firstname Lastname

Time for the Chain of Hunger to finally shine. They'll sweep in and heroically-uh...villainously eat the undead hordes.

And the devils.

And the demons if they can figure out how.

Xinci

I must admit, I was chuckling at the grim absurdity of this. Villains are off the leash, and as such there is much potential here. Villains wont get their own perfected timing now, for good or ill. Resources will likely be harder to acquire and in general they may fail more due to their own inadequacies, but in this new pit there are far less limitations. The Drow can likely change far more, if they dont die, Cats own plans may be formented with far less fear, and stuff like using a super weapon can likely happen without it being turned against you later. Now the question is how the tide will turn if the Warden of the West(Regardless if it in the end Hanno or Cordelia) can have access to the full force of Above.

Also, I am happy that this did confirm that demons can and will use any matter for their shapings.

Lurker

Y'all, the Dead King is far from the only villain who can now take the gloves off. Hierophant can Wrest energy fields larger than his head now. Pretty sure a dead angel counts.

broadaxe

Thinking about this now, hindsight being 20/20 and all that, its actually very predictable that DK would let loose at some point in this story. Much as this story subverts the tropes by being the tropes, it still follows some of the many rules/laws/whatever that makes stories interesting. Showing how much these tropes held him back, actually gives us a very valuable and important perspective, both for story cohesion/understanding, but also of the dead king and he's actual capabilities.

letouriste

I just had a thought...it could be the return of the age of wonders. I mean, the stories about flying superfortress not working? gone. Cat's plan for making future Villian vs Heroes fight less dangerous for locals is dead now

Abrakadabra

Not dead. She can remake villains into whatever she desires. Now is the time for it.

Darkening

Eh. The stories being gone doesn't do anything to kill her plan of, "If you go over these lines we all agreed to, everyone gets together to kill you specifically."

Frivolous

I think one more reason why the Intercessor may have made a mistake destroy all of Below's stories is that it screws her in the event of any confrontation with any villain.

I mean, she's a hero, too, right? Still? Even now? For some incomprehensible reason?

If she ever meets Catherine or Masego again, Providence will no longer help her quite as much, or keep them down quite as much. Same if she ever meets Neshamah again.

That won't save Procer, but the Intercessor has no choice but to look to the long run. She may have doomed herself, too.

And if I know Catherine and Masego, they might decide to give her fates far worse than the death she craves.

Mental Mouse

I think that the Intercessor has actually been killed for good this time ... but even so she was able to make one last intervention – perhaps tapping her own dues from the gods Above and Below. That business of “the superweapon works halfway, leaving everybody screwed – that's a classic trope itself, and primarily a Villainous one. That makes it clear that at that moment, story-logic was still working... and suggests a reason why she might have wanted to kill the Villainous stories. As others have noted, the DK is off the leash, but so are Cat and her people – now their own superweapons can simply work. And once she delivers that lance to Hanno, the Heroic stories will have a new custodian, while Cat can write new stories for the Villains.

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: Interesting possibility.

I hope the opposite, because I wish to experience the abundant schadenfreude of reading Interludes from the POV of the Bard, wherein she is confused about what to do and full of despair and fear.

I mean, surely EE will gift us with Interludes from the POV of the biggest and most enigmatic Bads of the story, like Neshie and Yara, right?

I am still aggrieved that we never got any mentions by Kairos or Tariq about what the Intercessor wanted. They had aspects that gave them direct insight into her character, and they never shared. It's very annoying.

Frivolous

Just remembered that Hanno has Recall, at least for now, while he's still White Knight.

He could, if Catherine prodded, Recall Tariq's memories of the Intercessor and what his aspect of Behold told him about her.

Miles

I don't think that would be useful. We know she can tell the choirs stories to influence their behavior. She almost certainly told them some to influence what they told Tariq about her.

Frivolous

Not Mercy. Tariq's aspect of Behold, which is, you know, different.

Miles

This aspect was literally just a way to let them tell him stuff.

Mental Mouse

He's previously noted that the recent dead and particularly strong personalities are difficult, prone to taking him over. Tariq was both, and also personally known to him. So, it might not be the best idea.

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: Hmm, possible.

Anyway, it might not be necessary. It may be Tariq already told Catherine his Beheld insights into the Bard. I think it unlikely, though.

I think it more likely that Tariq confided in Hanno but not Catherine (because Catherine just kept threatening to crush him), and Hanno stopped trusting Catherine after she raised the Red Axe, so he never told her either.

I am not sure many people the Heroic side of the Truce and Terms ever knew or learned that the Bard specifically wanted Catherine dead, so they might not have known how badly she needed to know everything possible about the Bard.

jamesc9

And there's a question here, of whether the Bard wanted Catherine dead, or Catherine preset toward conflict.

N/A

Ehhh. So far this is kind of what I was worrying about. Unbinding the Dead King from the shackles of stories lets him cut loose, but 'cut loose' basically just means lots of undead, big monsters, and big spells. He was already doing all that, at such scale that he was already winning the war. Now he's just... winning harder, with less interesting step-counterstep thinking involved.

Onos

That's pretty much exactly the point. The closest thing we had to a win was Hainaut, which... yeah, not great. So if we kept "counterstepping" we'd end up... oh right, at this exact point but over the course of several years and down however many people, Named and countries.

Clearly the war cannot be won. Sending a hit-squad after Nessie himself could still work, but beating him in war was never going to work.

Abnaxis

It just occurred to me:

Amadeus spent his whole life raging against the system that preordains Villains to lose. Then, literally minutes after he dies the Bard goes and destroys that same system.

Irony, yo.

AbraKadabra

Good point.

Leblanc

Ya I dont know not really into torture porn, umm looking foward to the next chapter I guess.

David Stone

“Where are the devils, Catherine?” the Intercessor said. “Where are the hosts that darken the skies, and the demons he has kept leashed for centuries? Where are the rituals that poison the land and the sorceries never before seen?”

Personally, I really liked this chapter. Up until this point, it was obvious that Catherine will beat the Dead King, in large part because that is the story in a story about stories. With “evil always loses in the end” gone, the Dead King might just win, and we needed a chapter like this to take the threat seriously. I still think Catherine wins, but maybe she doesn’t?

Chapter 27: Recoil

“He is never lost who has no home.”

– Orc saying

Bayeux had a reputation as one of the most beautiful principalities in Procer.

The western parts of it fed into the great fertile plains that were the heartlands of the Principate, but the eastern stretch was vividly green. It was because of the Whitecaps, I’d read, as the ice on the slopes of the great mountains melted come spring and fed a myriad of small rivers. It was all valleys and hills, greenery shining like emeralds. Even now that the Dead King’s grasp had reached as far as mere miles away from the border of Bayeux, the land had lost none of its beauty. There was probably a turn of phrase to be squeezed out of that, something about how there could be beauty even as the world darkened. My fingers clenched. Unfortunately, I'd used too many of those platitudes to still put in stock in them.

So instead I wrenched my eyes away from the distant beauty of the valleys and put my attention where it belonged. Which happened to be a tall silver mirror bordered by runes, whose surface shimmered for an instant before revealing a still eerily beautiful woman. Alaya of Satus' beauty had not been entirely an artifice or the result of her Name. Even stripped of both and touched with the marks of aging for the first time since I'd known her – small wrinkles at the corner of her eyes, her skin being less than perfect – she remained perhaps the most beautiful woman I'd ever seen. It did nothing for me. What I felt for her was hatred's tired cousin, and it swallowed too much ground for anything else to ever be able to grow there.

"Report," I flatly ordered.

Standing at my side, High Lady Abreha shuffled slightly on her feet. As always, she was straddling the line between being glad that I was able to order the once-empress and discomfort at the leader of Praes being ordered by anyone at all. Abreha was not such a complicated woman, once you learned to ignore the labyrinthine thirst for schemes and utterly amoral ambition.

"Your Excellency," Chancellor Alaya of – well, that was still being debated – greeted me, bowing her head. "The third wave will be setting out earlier than we had planned. Marshal Nim's efforts to reassemble the Legions have proved successful beyond our most optimistic estimates."

I kept my breath steady. Every week, every cursed fucking week, we found another way that my father had played us. The Battle of Kala had ruined the Legions of Terror, broken their spirit, but it'd also kept the soldiers out of the significantly more brutal throwdown in Ater. There had been masses of disaffected soldiers for the Black Knight to recruit under her new banner. That wasn't even entirely a metaphor, since the old banner of the Dread Empire had been the Tower in black on crimson.

"They'll need to set out directly for Keter," I said. "I've been in contact with the First Prince and the situation on the ground over here is... not promising."

Something of an understatement, that. The Dead King had stopped pulling his punches, unveiling his full arsenal of horrors. The fronts that'd held him back for almost three years had been torn through like wet parchment in a matter of hours and Procer had effectively collapsed as a nation within two days. The only thing slowing down Keter's armies was the sheer amount of land being set aflame, it was a full retreat everywhere. Only in Salia was there a semblance of safety and considering how Cordelia was managing that I had somewhat mixed feelings about it.

"How bad?" Chancellor Alaya quietly asked.

"Militarily, Procer is done," I frankly replied. "The generals did the smart thing and pulled back their armies to Salia to preserve forces for the assault on Keter, but that was at the cost of effectively surrendering the country. There's not a force left north of Iserre that will be more than an afternoon's work for the dead."

She nodded, once and sharply.

"I will accelerate the preparations as best I can," Chancellor Alaya promised. "I have news from the Free Cities that I suspect have outpaced the reports from the Jacks."

"I'm listening."

"Empress Basilia took the armies of the League into the Twilight Ways a month past," she said. "For war against Keter, she claims. They've been seen in Salamans since, but I could not obtain more. The Eyes have increasingly large gaps."

"Let's hope she lives up to her letters, then," I grunted.

Basilia had been sending us – myself and the First Prince – those regularly until she marched out, to me as her former patron and to Cordelia as a fellow ruler. Most of it was just assurances of friendship and peace, but she'd also been promising to bring the armies of the League into the war. Didn't sound promising for her to have emerged in Salamans, considering half the southern princes were considering petition for entry into the League, but I'd reserve judgement for now.

"Indeed," Chancellor Alaya mildly replied. "May I ask as to the progress of the second wave?"

I'd been part of the first wave out of Praes. Gone from Ater before they even burned my father. Pressed for time, I'd claimed, and Procer was falling apart. Fleeing, my mind had called it, and it was the truer of the two. I'd taken with me the armies I'd brought and the vanguard of the Praesi reinforcements, a few thousand former household troops with cabals of diabolists and the first few... assets we'd raised after the dust settled in Ater. All of them led by High Lady Abreha. The second wave had set out two weeks later, the rest of the household troops – all currently auxiliaries in the Legions of Terror – and a ninety-two thousand orc warriors. The full muster of the Clans, led by their Warlord.

"High Lady Abreha has been handling communications with them," I said, flicking a glance at her.

Abreha cleared her throat, an amusing affectation considering she no longer needed to breathe. Of all the undead creations I had made of Night, she was by far the most lifelike. Sometimes I even forgot she was dead.

"Their pace has been steady and the resupply in Laure did not slow them down," High Lady Abreha said. "Duchess Kegan had the cattle ready to join the horde. High Lord Sargon swears that the Old Mothers will last until the offensive against Keter."

"Good news," Chancellor Alaya said. "If the armies around Salia are properly arrayed for war, it might be possible to begin the march north within days of the second wave arriving."

"I'll not count the cat skinned until I wear the skin," I snorted. "Proceran armies are terrible at handling supplies and Hasenbach can only fit so many miracles up her sleeves. I'm still awe at the quantity of grain and feed she's put together."

She must have emptied half the granaries in the Principate for it, which would have been impressive even if half the realm hadn't already seceded in all but name – and sometimes not even that.

"One hopes that the threat of annihilation will inspire unexpected competence," Chancellor Alaya said, a hint of asperity to her tone.

I doubted it. Fear sometimes made people sharper, pushed them beyond their limits, but most of the time it just made them sloppy and stupid. Juniper and I were already counting on two weeks stuck near Salia after the second wave joined us.

"We'll see," I replied, then my gaze hardened. "So what's this I hear about changes to the electorate?"

The Chancellor of Nobody Could Agree On What Yet dipped her head.

"The Green Stretch has been pushing for a vote of its own instead of being considered a joint territory with Ater, but there have been disagreements," she replied. "The argument was made that procedurally speaking an even number of votes might lead to deadlock, which led others to argue the Clans should be granted a second vote."

Which the High Seats would find unacceptable. Leaving what was effectively two votes in goblin hands – one for the Eyries and one for Foramen – was acceptable because Foramen still had a population that was human in majority and there was no guarantee Wither's dynasty would keep its seat, but if the Clans got a second vote the greenskins would become a power bloc as powerful as the Soninke. Throw in another vote for the Green Stretch into this and the High Seats in human hands would make up only five of the eleven votes choosing the Chancellor of Praes.

"I won't ride your back about this," I said, "but I shouldn't need to tell you that if this comes to blows my patience is more than spent."

"I will not," the once-empress calmly told me. "Negotiations are ongoing, but there is progress. Alternatives for tiebreaking are being considered."

I sighed and let it go. I had neither the time nor the inclination to look over her shoulder while preparing for a campaign halfway across the continent. I'd have to trust that she knew what she was doing.

"It might be of interest to you that majority vote has narrowed down the name of our nation to either the 'Confederation of Praes' or the 'Republic of Praes'," Chancellor Alaya continued, changing the subject.

I cocked an eyebrow.

"Republic?" I skeptically asked.

"There have been other republics than Bellerophon," the Chancellor replied. "Though I lean towards Confederation myself, should the Grey Eyries be convinced to relinquish that name themselves in favour of another."

I supposed it would be a tad awkward for the Confederation of the Grey Eyries to be a member-state of the Confederation of Praes.

"So long as it is not the League of Praes," High Lady Abreha fervently said. "Dakarai must have been drunk when he suggested it."

I thought, somewhat unkindly, that it was a bit much for the High Seats to look down at the League's squabbling when the Dread Empire had managed at least as many civil wars while claiming to be a single state instead of a loose coalition.

"A conversation for another day," I curtly said. "I believe we're finished here, Chancellor, unless you have anything else to bring up."

Alaya of Satus inclined her head respectfully.

"I will be arriving with the third wave," she said. "Arrangements were made."

My eyes narrowed, but I did not contradict her. I was not sure whether I was angry she was insisting on risking the life my father had died to preserve or pleased that for once the former empress would be getting a closer look at what a real war looked like. It was a different beast, when you weren't looking at it from atop your tower.

"Then we will meet beneath the walls of Keter," I said. "I'll be expecting your report next week at the same hour."

I met her eyes.

"Chancellor."

"Your Excellency," she replied, dipping down in deference.

The formal address that had been adopted for the Name of Warden of the East in Praes was the last thing she spoke before the silver mirror dimmed. I rolled my shoulder, cracking it. My limbs always felt sore these days. From too much twisting around as I slept, I figured. I'd not been sleeping well since... I'd not been sleeping well, was all.

I could not, would not look back. The moment I did the pit awaited.

"Our confederation is beginning well enough," High Lady Abreha mused. "To think I'd see the day the Dread Empire was replaced."

I eyed her skeptically, hiding my amusement at the way she'd avoided the more common turn of phrase of 'living to see the day'.

"It will change," I said. "It'll have to. Power's being pulled in too many directions."

I was personally of the opinion that the High Seats would start by acting as I was sure my father had thought they would, by clashing against each other and bribing the greenskin and Ater votes with positive reforms, but it wouldn't last forever. At some point they'd either close ranks and try to keep the office within their families – which I couldn't see working long, given how often their dynastic interests were at odds – or they'd turn to other means to take power. That'd lead to war, one I wasn't sure the High Seats would be able to win, and in the vacuum after that defeat my bet was that the Legions of Terror would step in. Nim was zealously apolitical, but how many of her successors would be?

Maybe if she stuck around long enough preserving the sanctity of the elections would become part of the story of the Black Knight, but I wouldn't hold my breath. Besides, the Intercessor had put an end to that sort of thing. Forever or for now I could not know, and so I'd set Hierophant to the task of finding out.

"There will be adjustments," Abreha dismissed, "but the skeleton will hold. It answers a need."

"And what would that be?" I asked.

I wasn't even being snippy. Abreha Mirembé was a reprehensible excuse for a human being, but she'd stood near the apex of Praesi politics for decades. Her understanding of the Wasteland was equalled by few and surpassed by fewer. I belonged to neither category.

"Seizing the Tower by force was costly, Your Excellency," the undead aristocrat said. "In soldiers, in coin, in contracts called upon. And it was ever a risky enterprise, even when one's family stood strongly behind them. Holding the Tower was even more difficult: most tyrants were part of the Dark Council or at least the imperial court before they climbed the Tower. Ater has been the grave of many a High Lord."

"So you'll stick with the votes because they're cheaper than war," I skeptically said.

"Because eight years is not so long a time to wait," High Lady Abreha smiled, baring yellow teeth. "Why raise an illegal army and risk battles and ruination when the coming election is a better way to usurp rule from your rival? No longer are we ruled until death, Your Excellency, and we live longer than lesser breeds. We have years enough that we can afford patience."

I paused, forced myself to consider that. I'd noticed, when facing Sargon Sahelian in Wolof, that the great families of Praes tended to think over long spans. That when a High Lord could not climb the Tower, they turned instead to strengthening their dynasty. This system, with the votes, it played on that an instinct. Why should you rush into a hasty war when waiting a mere twenty years might see you elected Chancellor? Better to bide your time, forge your alliances and save up for the right bribes. You'd get your eight years, and without having risked your family. It was a system that would weed out the reckless, I realized.

Ensure the same kind of people who'd once claimed the Tower through orgies of bloodletting would never end up anywhere near the rule of Praes.

"The Carrion Lord was a vicious little shit," Abreha said. "But brilliant too, in his own twisted way. He understood the old families better than we ever knew."

I sighed. I was still unconvinced that this would not eventually turn into military rule by the Legions, but then I wasn't sure that wouldn't also be part of plan. The thought might well have appealed to him.

"We'll see," I finally said.

"They will be interesting times," the undead noble. "Should we make it through the end of the world, anyhow."

"How very hopeful, High Lady Abreha," I drily said.

"That is-"

She was interrupted by a sound I was unfortunately familiar with: a detonation. It was easy enough to tell where it was coming from. We were standing on the outskirts of a nameless village, atop a flat slope that'd been judged a good place for receiving the Chancellor's report, and from up here I could see a plume of smoke coming up from a large barn. Broad and dry and in good state, it was where Masego had set up for the half-day we would be spending in Creation before rejoining my army in the Twilight Ways. He'd had tests to run, he said. My heart clenched. Gods, let him not have gotten hurt. Already I had... my fingers clenched around a knife I was not holding.

Do not look back, I ordered myself. Else the pit awaits.

Masego would be fine. He wasn't a fool, he'd have taken precautions before attempting anything risky. I still parted ways with High Lady Abreha after only cursory courtesies and hurried limped my way down, my personal guard falling in around me. The village was little more than a hole in the ground with dusty streets between the two abandoned shops and handful of houses that made it up, so there was nowhere to get lost. I found Apprentice outside the barn and on her knees when I got there, coughing profusely. A glance through the open door revealed the shape of a tall man in dark robes moving around, which released a knot in my stomach.

I stopped to speak with Sapan, whose coughing had turned into wheezes.

"You all right, kid?" I asked.

"Fine, Your Majesty," she rasped out. "I just swallowed a mouthful of Light."

I blinked, then cocked to the side.

"And it didn't burn you?" I carefully asked.

"Scalded," Sapan admitted. "It will teach me to always double-layer my shields."

"Always a good idea," I sagely agreed.

I patted her shoulder comfortingly, satisfied she was in no danger, and entered the barn. Immediately my steps stuttered, and not because of the limp. I'd not been able to see it from up the hill, but something a blown a ring hole right through the barn's ceiling. By the looks of the burns around the ring, had to be Light or something like it.

"Tell me," I said, "that it wasn't the artefact that made this mess."

Hierophant was leaning over a scorched stone table that'd survived the explosion and on which rested a leather-bound book. Half the barn was filled with various instruments and the enchanted trinkets he'd used to measure emanations back in the Arsenal, and a few of the former had been brought to the stone table. He was handling it with a pair of pincers, carefully turning the pages as he inspected them.

"I could," Hierophant noted. "But you always get inexplicably irritated when you ask me to lie to you and I do."

I sighed.

"Yes," he happily said. "Just like that."

"Tell me it's not broken at least," I said.

I limped deeper into the barn, making my way to his side.

"I do not believe that a single means at my disposal would be able to so much as notch the binding of the Book," Hierophant said, sounding fascinated.

I narrowed my eyes at his back. I'd felt the capitalization in that.

"We're not calling it that," I said.

"It's an appropriate and endearing name," Zeze insisted. "I have this on good authority."

"You mean Indrani," I said, unimpressed.

"I have this on authority," Zeze conceded.

My lips twitched, but slagging on Archer wouldn't be enough to win me over.

"It'd be blasphemy," I reminded him. "And we're already treading pretty narrowly there considering we've stolen all the Good stories of Calernia and made a book of them."

"I did that," Masego objected. "Which means I get to name it. It's the Book of Some Things."

Because calling the godsdamned thing a joke about the Book of All Things was going to go great with the Procerans. I could already feel the migraine in my future reaching backwards to me now, having grown so catastrophically large it had shattered the very laws of time.

"We can discuss it later," I lied.

He turned to glare at me, which – wait what?

"Masego," I said with forced calm, "what the Hells happened to your eye?"

Not only was his usual black eye cloth gone, one of the glass eyes he'd earned when transitioning into Hierophant was gone. I would ask where, but the bloody blackened mess that'd been made out of his empty eye socket answered the question well enough. The other eye had survived, but the glimmers of Summer sunlight in the glass had noticeably dimmed.

"Ah," Hierophant said, sounding somewhat embarrassed. "That."

I took his chin in hand and moved him around to get a better look at the wound. Shallow stuff. I frowned.

"Did you enchant the inside of your eye socket?" I asked.

"Of course not," he replied, sounding offended. "Enchantments laid into flesh are notoriously imprecise and prone to mutation."

His chin was released. I waited, staring at him expectantly.

"I inserted chips of bone into the flesh, which I then enchanted," Masego proudly told me. "In anticipation of an eventuality just like this one."

Yeah, there it was. He looked at me, eyebrow cocked.

"You may praise my foresight now," he encouraged.

"New rule," I said. "Before you stick stuff in yourself and enchant it, ask someone about it."

"I asked Akua when designing the enchantments last year," he informed me. "She was quite helpful. Is she our friend again now, while I remember to ask? I was never quite clear on whether we are meant to despise her or not."

"I'm changing the rule to asking me," I noted. "If I'm not there you should ask-"

I swallowed the answer. He was not here, he'd left me. Do not look back, I ordered myself. Else the pit awaits.

"-Vivienne," I finished. "And for Akua, use your judgement. You don't have to hate her if you don't want to."

"I don't," Masego informed me. "Useful to know, thank you."

"Speaking of useful," I said, forcing this back to the here and now. "Am I to assume you got something useful out of the hole in the ceiling?"

"That is how I lost the eye," Hierophant admitted. "It appears the Gods Above were disinclined to allow me to peer too closely at their work. They seemed quite cross."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"Well, at least you didn't get smote," I forced out. "What did you learn?"

"Several things," he noted. "The first is that the Intercessor still lives."

I cursed in Kharsum. I'd figured she did, even after losing the stories, but it was not pleasant to have my suspicions confirmed.

"How do you know?" I asked.

"The readings I have of the artefact leaving dormancy allowed me to establish that they shouldn't have interfered with the secondary enchantment we laid on the Spike," Masego said.

I frowned at him. The silver harpoon he'd used in Ater, the Spike, had been meant to do exactly two things. Extract an aspect from the Bard using the same principles that Zeze had used to cut out my corrupted aspect in Marchford all those years ago, and then ensure that even if the Bard died she would not escape. Our solution to her disappearing at every time she bought it had been, well, necromancy. If she died with the Spike in her, she was supposed to be raised from the dead immediately. Only the enchantment had failed, because when she'd bit off her tongue she'd disappeared.

"The enchantment failed, though," I reminded him.

"Not because of interference from the process of extraction, as I had originally believed," Hierophant said. "Which has fascinating implications, Catherine, because it means the necromancy was beaten out by a stronger will."

"So she refused real hard to become undead?" I asked.

"I mean will in the magical sense," Masego clarified.

Ah, so the same exercise of willpower that allowed a mage to use magic. The Trismegistan theory of magic preached that usurpation was the essence of sorcery, that a mage was stealing dominion over the laws of Creation whenever they used magic. Which meant he was implying a stronger mage than him had fought the enchantment.

"She can't do magic," I frowned. "I'm nearly certain about that."

"There are always at least two will when magic is used, Catherine," Hierophant reminded me.

I blinked.

"You mean Creation?" I hissed.

"I believe it is a creational law that the Intercessor cannot die," Masego agreed. "Only conflict with a fundamental law would be able to kill her, should this theory be correct."

Which meant sorcery wouldn't do it, and neither should Names. Not Light or Night either. Fundamental laws were supposedly laws that applied to even the Gods, things like 'something cannot come from nothing' and the like, but those were more like limits. Not the kind of law you could exploit.

"Fuck," I said. "That complicates things."

I'd thought of stripping stories from her as the first step to getting her head on a plate, but that no longer looked feasible. I was going to need a new way to deal with the Wandering Bard.

"Containment might be a more realistic solution," Zeze suggested.

"We're already planning that with the Dead King," I said. "I'm not comfortable with the number of ancient evils we're going to be shoving into lamps. At the very least, at this rate we'll run out of lamps."

"I imagine given long enough I will be able to find a way to kill her," Hierophant mused. "It is only a matter of being thorough."

The mildness of that tone contrasted with the words sent a shiver up my spine. It was always good to remember how very terrifying Masego could be, given reason.

"Regardless," he continued, "before the Gods Above took offence to my polite and legitimate inquiries-"

On the other side of the table, hastily swept into a mess of hay, I noticed what looked like a set of long silver needles burned and melted by Light.

"- I did succeed at part of what I was attempting," Masego continued. "Namely, discerning the nature of what we stole."

"Her aspect," I said.

"Yes," he patiently replied, "but what does that mean, practically speaking?"

"Stewardship over stories," I suggested. "The ability to seen and influence them."

"Yet you've claimed she killed the stories for Evil in Ater," Masego noted. "That goes beyond mere stewardship."

"We don't know her limits," I reminded him.

"Indeed," he agreed. "Which made ascertaining the nature of what we stole all the more important. How powerful is she, to be able to kill half of it?"

I hummed. That would be useful. Strength in a certain way didn't necessarily translate in others, but it'd help scope her out.

"So?" I pressed.

He wrested sorcery from a small gem sown into his belt and began to draw in the air, golden lines like his runes, but I caught his arm.

"I don't need the equations," I said. "They're beyond me. What did you conclude?"

"That even assuming the Intercessor ended stories for Below only in Calernia, which has been your insistence," he said, pausing to allow me to interject.

I simply nodded in confirmation. I'd not been able to feel stories further than Calernia, and I did not believe the Intercessor had either. Our aspects had been similar enough she'd felt threatened, that I'd been close to stealing hers. The scope had to have been similar for that to be possible.

"Even then," Masego continued, "the amount of power involved can mean only two things."

He paused again, which was purely for dramatic purposes and I probably had Indrani to blame for.

"The first that this there is no reason to be concerned," Hierophant pleasantly said, "because she is one of the Gods and can destroy this continent with a wink of her eye."

"Grim," I appreciated. "What's in box number two?"

"She did not destroy anything at all," Masego said. "She has only halted the stories."

I let out a low whistle. If that were true, then we still had a shot at killing the Dead King. If that were true.

"And what do you base that on?" I asked.

"We have only seen one instance of the Intercessor manipulating power on a large scale," he said. "The incident with the original Grey Pilgrim in Levant that was investigated by your minions."

My eyes narrowed.

"The White Knight smote him, but the Bard stepped in and tinkered with the angel's power so it wouldn't kill him," I said. "She changed some properties, yeah, but mostly she lessened the power."

"Exactly," he replied with a grin. "That is a precedent. I believe that the stories are not dead so much as lessened to zero."

I grimaced.

"That's useful information, I won't pretend otherwise," I said. "But it's not a solution, Zeze. We can't kill her, so her death isn't a way to end her interference."

Masego laughed.

"That's the beauty of it, Catherine," he told me. "This is not an act of the Gods that happened, or an irreversible destruction. It is an act of will. And what does Trismegistus sorcery teach us about these?"

My fingers clenched.

"Will can beat will," I quietly said. "What one does, another can undo."

He nodded.

"Should we find the right lever," Hierophant smiled, "we can get those stories back."

Tohron

Something people might be interested in: after getting all the verses to The Girl Who Climbed the Tower, I wanted to compose a suitable melody, so I went and did a rendition of it:

It could doubtless be improved with further practice, but I think it turned out pretty well.

Kletanio

I love it 😊

Here's my very different version, to consign to the goblinfire inferno 😊

aurikdomi

Props to both of you, fanfic stuff is great!

Kletanio

You have a really strong melody running throughout!

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Tenthyr

Oh boy, Catherine straight back to her old and trusted habit of bottling up her pain until it explodes out.

And with Hakram untrusted by her, Tariq dead, and White Knight maybe not really in her wheelhouse anymore? Let's hope the climax of the ranger story has boosted Indrani's ability to handle this kinda nonsense!

Insanenoodlyguy

No. Now is Akuas time to shine! Their weird tradgedy is on pause, which means they can snuggle.

Insanenoodlyguy

It'd be blasphemy," I reminded him. "And we're already treading pretty narrowly there considering we've stolen all the Good stories of Calernia and made votes of them."

Linnus42

Typo: EE you mean Warden of the East, Not West.

I did originally think Warden of the West would get settled before Cat got back from the East. Be interesting to see how Cat impacts the story line given that doing anything messes with one of he three agreements with Tariq.

Well that is good I am glad Bard didn't delete Storylines that seemed too powerful and too much of a game changer.

RoflCat

West is correct here, they're adapting the formal address of Warden of the West when Praesi talk to them to apply to Warden of the East as well.

Sir Nil

Don't call it the Book, call it a Guide.

Nyx

"Thanks" for making me realize EE has been stringing us along for seven books to land a title drop pun.

Crash

'Two Hundred Heroic Axioms', author unknown.

Flameburst

The unpractical guide to good?

Insanenoodlyguy

I was sure her name would be Practical Guide. But yeah, she's probably writing it.

shikkarasu

Would be a good successor Name to Wandering Bard. Just shows up a pivotal moments, half drunk, and advises Named.

"I say just set it on fire. I know, I know, it's a concept, not a thatched roof. I'm just saying anytime I had a problem I'd toss goblin fire at it and fwoosh, right away I had a different problem."

amit27592

Cat's back to playing with Napalm again.

Tenthyr

So I think we kind of have the Bards three aspects now. The first that lets her Wander, the now bisected story map, and the final aspect that lets her change something in creation.

Oh, and we have it confirmed that the Gods wove the story of the Bard and that she's hardwired into Creation. Catherine vs. God's when?

WuseMajor

I mean, she's already Heaven's Babysitter.

edrey

so my bet is Wander, Read and Narrate, the last one creating pivots and changing the narrative. that would explain a lot.

dadycoool

So much like a classic D&D series, where the characters level up to general, king/queen, High King/Queen, and eventually god level and replace the prior deities.

Juff

Typo Thread:

my eyes > my eye (occurs 4 times. unless she grew it back in the interim) Cordelia has a > Cordelia as a and a ninety-two > and ninety-two still awe > still awed thatshe > that she that an instinct > that instinct parted wats > parted ways something a blown > something had blown exactly tow things > exactly two things two will when > two wills when seen and influence > see and influence that this there > that there daniel possibly,

labyrinthine thirst for schemes => thirst for labyrinthine schemes

Silverking

Well, I don't know what other nasties the Dead King is pulling out of his vaults, but if he really wants to kill Catherine, all she has to do is stick her in a room with Hakram with a magical lock that easily opens once she chooses to speak to him.

She would starve to death in there out of spite.

WuseMajor

Pretty sure the right lever is either a swimming pool of booze or a crowbar to the skull.

Also, thinking on it, if the Bard being undying is an immutable Law of Creation...Wouldn't Demons be potentially something you could use there?

Alternately, what if you strengthened the law? And made it so her current body couldn't die *at all?" Keeping her stuck in one body and unable to Wander...Well, at least you could get the other set of stories out of her.

shikkarasu

I think strengthening the law was covered under the "too many lamps" clause.

Gabe Meadow

I consider this yet another piece of evidence that the Bard's goal isn't to die for good. As her existence is a Creational law, there's really nothing save the Gods Above or Below that could kill her, and if a demon could do it, she could easily have flung herself into the nearest band going up against a Demon of Absence.

No, I'm pretty sure she's angling to, as Kairos said, "shed her chains for a set more pleasing," namely a preferred apotheosis.

jamesc9

Thank you; I had forgotten Kairos's phase.

dadycool

Well, apparently there really is a light at the end of the tunnel, one that uses efforts that they'd previously expended.

Masego is a gem. An honestly terrifying one due to his utter lack of empathy, but a precious one. "I just wanted a peek!" "NO!" minor smite Wait, he's trying to steal her image, also being one-eyed. We've fanon-established her as Odin, but what would Masego be, as a one-eyed mage?

The Book of Some Things. It absolutely has to be called that now.

Insanenoodlyguy

This, long term, might be a boon for them. The heroes do don't take things too seriously often have more advantages.

Abrakadabra

Or the two hundred heroic axioms perhaps?

RadiantSpren

It won't be two hundred heroic axioms, because, correct me if I am wrong, I believe that we heard Saint talking about that book being an interesting read for heroes, meaning that it has already been around for a good while.

Burdi

soon High Lady Abreha would become The Secretaries or the Left Hand because Cat now is in needed of another assistant since Hakram gone and scribe dead. Because of her station as Warden of the East her business now would be very large and lot of problem would arise. even cody has Forgetful Librarian at her side

nick012000

Pretty sure that Abreha can't become any sort of Named, because she's undead, and the undead can't truly grow or learn.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Barrow Lord is a Levantine Name that undead can wear, and there was a Praesi Name called the Liche.

Burdi

So it is possible

shikkarasu

Chider was undead when she stole the Name of Squire from Catherine, and Cat was undead when she stole it back. There was also a Dread Emperor (Revenant?), who ruled a second time after they died. Has a second DE title and everything, since they lost and regained the Name.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

This whole time the story was actually about the transition from an oral tradition to a literate one.

edrey

so the Bard cant die because creation doesnt want to but wasnt the saint able of cutting creational laws, so that sword should be able to do it too right?
so what lever can be used here, the hierarch is my bet, because is utter madness to call him.

Reader in the Night

Huh. So Bard put all the stories on pause. When the stories come back, do they account for all events that happened while they were paused, or do they start anew? Because DK has accumulated shit-tons of negative story karma, if that gets taken into account...

ninegardens

I love that this chapter sort of... winds down the apocalyptic power level on the bard in a way that feels... natural? Consistent?

It successfully feels "Science", not just technobabble. Masego delivering the punchline, along with a bunch of alternatives ("Maybe she's just a God, and can destroy the universe"), is kind of great.

This was really well done.

kinghaart

Yeah it was nice to get to see Masego the scientist again. In Praes he was mostly a combat mage onscreen which made the harpoon thing come a bit out of left field for me; scenes like this make it feel more organic.

Shveiran

This... this just raises so many questions.

> If the Gods made it a Creational law that the Bard cannot die, why not make her stewardship over stories a creational law? If they could only do one, why THIS one? Why is keeping her in the game more important than safekeeping stories, when her nudging things is the whole reason for her to exist?

> Admittedly the Bard being able to destroy the stories never made sense to me; why would the Gods give her a power such as this? It runs against her role. And let's say she actually can stop them. Fine and dandy, they gave her that tool as weapon of last resort.

HOW IS THE DK ALIVE THEN?

I mean, if they are NOT destroyed, that means the Bard can jumpstart them again. Why didn't she do so before, if killing the Dk was such a priority? All she had to do was pretending he got one over her (say, while he lobotomized her) and alt the stories of Evil. It is CLEAR from his reaction that he has never seen something like that.

He commits to BBEG stuff, then she brings them back, the handsome peasant with the magic sword she groomed for the job stabs Neshamah. Boom. Easy.

> If Cat and Masego could Spike an aspect, why the hell didn't they go for Wander or whatever it is first. I mean, come on people. You could have gotten all of them if you only started with the right one. This is basic stuff.

Don't tell me her popping this way and that is not an Aspect, because that shit sure doesn't look like anything less than that. We have been told how teleportation is not a thing since book one, FFS.

> If the DK is Demons-happy now, why isn't he targeting the 100000 orcs marching north? We know what he did in Brus, we know how few Heroes there were in Praes.

If Cat is smart and played it safe, she will have divided her heroes and diabolists, but even then... how many heroes is that? Princess, Apprentice, Silver Huntress and Errant Knight? Even two Heroes are not nearly enough. And we saw in Second Liesse that cabals of diabolists are not enough to bind three demons. Why doesn't Neshamah just pop ten demons in the middle of the horde and calls it a day? The Warlord can't kill them, and before the diabolists are done you have half the Horde made into corrupted spawn. How many orcs can you possibly be left with at the end, a third?

What about a cattle-plague, or frost? The horde has almost no magic and poor technology.

And sure, they use the Twilight Way. So what? Demons are not undead, and stories no longer bind Villains. I don't buy he cannot use a ritual in the Pilgrim-sacrifice-shaped realm anymore, because that weight no longer matters.

Even if, why isn't he targeting the cattle they send along the way to force the orcs to come out?

We know Neshamah can strike, we now he can see as far as Ater no problem... by this point every time he doesn't outside Salia it feels contrived.

I'm sorry, it just... doesn't work anymore? I don't think it does, at least. The limiter is off, and he is not bound to the logistics of walking armies anymore.

I can't really buy the "oh, he is winning just slowly enough we can cross the continent in the mid time" now.

This is Scion all over again.

Snappy270

I think it might be to do with how the bard was the first named. And all other named were imitated by that template. Basically the gods might not have known how a aspect can be usurped. They allowed it to happened cause its doable, but didnt allow mesago to look through it cause its not meant for him. Or this was their plan all along for answering the question.

The DK isnt dead cause noone Good has made it past the walls on Keter. If the heros made it to DK's throne room the sure maybe the bard might pop that to kill him. Otherwise its just letting of the chain to destroy everything without repercussion.

Well the plan was to revive the bard as undead, which has shown to be able to damage an aspect from previous undead. So i guess they wanted to quickly get what they needed before undeath started. Plus if she was undead theres a chance she would juat do what Catherine said. Also if nothing worked and they stole Wander, the bard could have died and popped to another body and they would have nothing.

DK hasn't shown to be omniscient. He had to send an undead by foot to invite Catherine to Keter. He could have agents in Ater to watch things. But there's a good chance Malicia would keep them out cause she was always going to backstab him anyway. So he might not have known what's happening in Praes. Also he could unleash his arsenal in Procer cause he had armies there to do it, doesn't mean he can do things across the world now. He ain't a God yet.

Since when did the twilight ways stop working on him. It's a land made from the grey pilgrim, if anything it's a good story. Otherwise it's just a land that hates undead, wouldn't give DK free reign in them.

Heriaks

>Because as you say, it's a game. They can start it over or abandon it if they want to, and I don't think anyone would want to make a game invincible, immortal and indestructible. Plus I think there's a lot we don't know about the Bard and its history.

>Bard can't destroy a story, but she doesn't have to stop them to kill the DK, she must have had several dozen plans for that. And she was looking to kill Cat when she is one of the pillars in the war against the Dead King, which shows that she has backup plans because of her aspect of seeing the Stories. Recall that if Cat had failed, Cordelia would have used the angel's corpse and with Bard's amplification, goodbye DK. So DK wasn't a big priority, no need to stop the Stories for that.

>It's true that Cat could have pulled off the Wander aspect, but what do we know? We're not even sure if it's an aspect (I think it is) and how it will react. And we have to find it among the 3 of Bard. Also it's possible that Cat could have helped Masego to create a weapon against the aspect of Bard's story because she is linked to it by her Name, unlike Wander. Otherwise it is indeed a beginner's mistake XD.

>The Orcs and the whole army don't go directly to Keter, but first to Salia and they are still on the other side of the big mountain range that prevents the magic from working so the DK can't attack Callow with his spells yet. But it's true that once they get out of the twilight ways in Procer, they're going to get some demons. On the other hand as long as the army is marching there, demons and undead can't attack them, even if the Evils' Stories are gone, the Goods' is whole so the Pilgrim's magic works. And the Ways will always prevent the demons from going there, I don't see the Pilgrim stopping the undead but not the demons in the Ways

Everything makes perfect sense, and even if DK has an advantage, we haven't seen the elves, dwarves, giants, drows, the Titan, the secret of the gobbelinfire that the goblins could use, the assets found in Praes, the hierarch (and maybe the dragons).

Shveiran

I'll answer to both here: aside from some nitpicks, most of what you both point out could be an explanation.

The problem is that "could".

I really feel like I don't understand the rules anymore, that I have no way to foresee what will happen. And that is a problem, for me; there is a key difference between watching random images and being surprised by a twist, and the difference is that you are blindsided by the twist and not by everything else.

Now, make no mistake: this is subjective. This is a personal problem: I no longer feel like I understand the world.

And... it honestly hurt to say, because I have a hard time coming up with a series that has hooked me more than the Guide. Or shown me more new perspectives, stimulated more thoughts; not about elves and magic, but about society, prejudice, people.

Or just plainly made me cry more than the Guide, when it comes down to it.

And now... I don't know anymore. This chapter made me feel nothing, and that's the best I've felt after reading one in a month or so.

I don't know. If you enjoyed the chapter, more power to you. But maybe I shouldn't stick around.

shikkarasu

I am super sorry to hear that. I hope, if you do take a break, that you come back. Even if it's just to binge the last 30+ chapters and see how it ends. It would be a shame to lose a long time reader just before the final arc!

The story is definitely different than it ever has been, but I have faith that it will make retroactive sense.

ninegardens

Peace out for a bit. Often with stories, there's a bunch of stuff that is kinda janky if read chapter by chapter, but works better (or at least faster) when read in one binge.

Also, if you are looking for something to read in the mean time (and haven't already tried them), I might suggest "All night laundry" webcomic, or "Pale" webserial. They are both just... kind of great.

Heriaks

I wanted to respond to the comment above. Sorry

ohJohN

I think for your first two points, you might be inferring motivations for the Gods & the Bard that are different from their (currently unrevealed) actual motivations.

Why isn't the Bard perfectly omnipotent? Why does she almost entirely play by the rules of Creation (her power comes from a Name & aspects, she inhabits physical human bodies), with only "no permanent death" tacked on? Why would the Gods empower a human woman to intercede some time after Creation was set in motion (if her talk about her origins as Yara are actually true), when they could have created a perfect, indestructible, unsurpable automaton to fill that role from the beginning? That, to me, speaks of either a lack of ability – they didn't predict the need for an Intercessor ahead of time, and this was the best patch they could make with their limited ability to act in Creation – or an ulterior motive: perhaps her nudging things is NOT the whole reason for her to exist, just a side benefit, and the only thing the Gods absolutely insist on is that she sticks around.

Why do you think the Bard wants DK dead? Soon before his apotheosis, she convinced Neshamah that, oh, she tried to stop him, but he was just too clever and never left her an opening – but she's the finest liar on the continent, and her laughter at the moment of his ascension certainly seems suspicious. And with her trying to destroy artifacts that could potentially kill or contain DK in the Arsenal, leaking their plans to DK in Hainaut, and generally fucking with the war effort, it doesn't really seem like his death is her main priority. And now she's completely let him off the chain – if he wins the war and there's not a living soul left on the continent, who tf is gonna kill him then?

I also think you're greatly overestimating DK's powers. He's no longer bound by Evil stories, so he can unleash his full strength without narrative reprisal, but he's not, you know, suddenly omnipotent!

- He can't open Hellgates at will anywhere on the continent. It was mentioned that he sent forces into Procer through Arcadia, which can make long journeys shorter (but it's fickle and not as fast as using the Ways). In the time it took Cat to get back, he could believably manage to get some undead diabolists to relatively-nearby Salia so they could pop out and unleash demons, but not Laure or Ater.

- I'm also not convinced he can even see Ater; I interpreted his "interesting" as him noticing a shift in the fabric of Creation as the Evil stories shut off, not him directly observing the other side of the continent. Masego would likely have noticed a spell massive enough to overcome the geological barriers, at least.

- The Twilight Ways are inherently, foundationally inhospitable to undead. Not because of story weight, but because that's how the realm was shaped at its inception. If there existed the story "villain falls into a fire and dies" before the story shutoff, villains aren't now immune to fire – Fate just stops nudging them to lose their footing around open flames.

So I don't think he's had much of a chance to attack the orcs yet. (Also I'm pretty sure they're bringing cattle through the Ways with them, having briefly popped out in Laure to pick up some more. Like, why would they send the army's food supply via Creation?? The last leg would be crawling with undead, and it'd get there 4+ months after the army itself!)

Daniel E

'The Book Of Some Things'. I wholeheartedly support this and will subscribe to your newsletter.

Xinci

Black did play it right with his scheme for Chancellor, the High Lords have a highly in-group investing methodology and if the risk of conflict is lower by following the institutions already built, then they will do so. The only question is how to restrict them and bleed off their power so it remains as such. A probable opening for Cardinal as a school for mages, influence and general education and thus a vector of stabilization.

Mhm, yep, logically given her position, the Bard can modulate things(possibly so long as they are on/in the skein of Creation). Seems similar to Angels "deaths" then, she modulated something that cannot truly die to a state of being dead but not quite dead. Given the whole deal with Creational cascades, this seems good as more than Named would presumably be involved in Belows stories. I am curious how ripping out Aboves half has affected her and what it would enable a Hero to do with its work.

Secondarily, it would appear that Masego too will have to grow further again, as he has lost some of the power of Summer now. I still don't quite understand what happened to his eye though. Did the sight make it burst? Were the bones being used to help deal with the potential backlash of such?

OmniscientQ

So... how the hells is Abreha keeping up with Cat and the first wave? I thought the Twilight Ways were supposed to be so fundamentally opposed to the existence of undead that they straight up murdalized any who dared try to cross a gate. The opposition of the Ways to undead was so complete that nobody was worried about Trismegistus himself finding a way to corrupt it.

shikkarasu

I'm guessing since Twilight was formed (partly) by the leader of the Wild Hunt, and since the Crown of Winter was subsumed by the Night, that Abreha is inherently a little Fae. She is therefore allowed to walk Twilight.

Nessie is animated by Trismegistion sorcery, and so is fundamentally different. He and his can't access the Ways, but creations of Catherine and any necromancer Drow that may pop up can. Her undead have always skirted the rules a bit, starting when she gained the title Duchess of Moonless Nights.

hakureireimu

No. Twilight is opposed to the Dead King and his works, not undead in general.

Miles

"I'll not count the cat skinned until I wear the skin,"

You say that, yet you are a Cat and you wear its skin.

"So long as it is not the League of Praes," High Lady Abreha fervently said. "Dakarai must have been drunk when he suggested it."

I suspect anything with "Praes" in it would have been deadlocked if story shenanigans were in play. That said, for the sake of futureproofing (whenever the Bard's thing gets fixed) I would suggest an Naming this country with an old Villain's favorite trick: call it "The land of Searp."

I could not, would not look back. The moment I did the pit awaited.

As I remember, you were quite the brawler in the pit. You'll have to make this pit your own as well, if you want to get started healing. Or is this your new Evil Scar?

I cursed in Kharsum.

She's been doing this for years and I still get otaku vibes every time. This isn't a language that you speak often enough that the ol' kuso is more instinctive than a plain f-firecracker. It's an obvious affectation that screams of childishness. It's as if she's not cursing because she feels the need to let the pain out, and as if she's cursing because the word sounds cool and a halfway plausible excuse to hear it has presented itself. Not a good trait for a leader. At least that's what I get from that. I'm wondering if it's intentional on the part of EE because I don't get the reasoning for making her character seem fake in this one singular aspect.

"Will can beat will," I quietly said. "What one does, another can undo."

He nodded.

"Should we find the right lever," Hierophant smiled, "we can get those stories back."

Is this foreshadowing of how you're going to beat the DK? Turns out all it takes to win is getting all the mages ever to pool their wills. Hopefully some Heroic Providence will manifest among them, because you can bet that the DK has his own army of mages boosting his own will too.

Miles

Sorry, did not mean to reply to a comment.

I humbly request assistance deleting this please.

shikkarasu

I think the fact that she has been cursing in Kharsum for years is a good indication that it isn't an affectation, but a genuine character trait. She also clenches her fist for a moment while weighing difficult choices. It might have been childish when she was 15, now it's just who she is.

Bear in mind the following:

1. Cat speaks 6 languages I can think of off the top of my head, albeit with a Laure accent, and would need to practise them occasionally to avoid losing them (especially after losing Learn)
2. Cursing in Dwarvish/Orcish/Giant is a staple fantasy trope, often explained as the harsh language feeling more satisfying.
3. Catherine is a connoisseur of cursing. She went through a Tagrebi phase before noting that it's all goat related.
4. Kharsum is a very evocative language, "well suited to poetry," and likely has some very interesting ways to be crass

All in all it feels very Catherine, to me.

Miles

>Bayeux

I hope someone takes this city name as inspiration for fanfic, to tell the story of one Named Bayeux-Wolphe

>"I'll not count the cat skinned until I wear the skin,"

You say that, yet you are a Cat and you wear its skin.

>"So long as it is not the League of Praes," High Lady Abreha fervently said. "Dakarai must have been drunk when he suggested it."

I suspect anything with "Praes" in it would have been deadlocked if story shenanigans were in play. That said, for the sake of futureproofing (whenever the Bard's thing gets fixed) I would suggest naming this country with an old Villain's favorite trick: call it "The land of Searp."

>I could not, would not look back. The moment I did the pit awaited.

As I remember, you were quite the brawler in the pit. You'll have to make this pit your own as well, if you want to get started healing. Or is this your new Evil Scar?

>I cursed in Kharsum.

Hmmm... She's been doing this for years and I still get otaku vibes every time. This isn't a language that you speak often enough that the ol' kuso is more instinctive than a plain f-firecracker. It's an obvious affectation that screams of childishness. It's as if she's not cursing because she feels the need to let the pain out, and as if she's cursing because the word sounds cool and a halfway plausible excuse to hear it has presented itself. Not a good trait for a leader. At least that's what I get from that. I'm wondering if it's intentional on the part of EE because I don't get the reasoning for making her character seem fake in this one singular aspect.

>"Will can beat will," I quietly said. "What one does, another can undo."

>>He nodded.

>>"Should we find the right lever," Hierophant smiled, "we can get those stories back."

Is this foreshadowing of how you're going to beat the DK? Turns out one thing it takes to win is getting all the mages ever to pool their wills. Hopefully some Heroic Providence will manifest among them, because you can bet that the DK has his own army of mages boosting his own will too.

Frivolous

I'd like to thank ErraticErrata for answering my question in the comments of the previous chapter about whether the Chancellor of Praes was still a name. Alaya's aging means it isn't.

Black Knight might be a goner, too. I wonder about Warlock.

I applaud Masego for continuing to be the epitome of his Role of delving into and dissecting the secrets of the Gods.

I wonder if the Bard's stopping the stories of Evil was a single act of will or is a continuing act of will, something she has to concentrate on.

sengachi

It might also still be a Name, but because Alaya is thinking of her life as ending in 8 years when elections and Catherine come calling she's aging now. She doesn't think of herself as eternal anymore, but as living on borrowed time.

sengachi

... oh shit they might actually be able to kill the Dead King. If the stories are still active, but their effects are just lessened, that means turning them back up will see the Dead King eat the backlash of all the stops he just pulled out.

The Gods Above are going to boil him like a crab and eat him with butter and salt.

Reader in the Night

Between DK setting himself up by doing a speed-run of everything the The Overlord list tells you not to so, and the GA having the literal Book on Heroic Providence... Yeah, I feel like the DK is going to eat a lot of punishment if the Villain stories turn back on.

308924810a

-“Will can beat will,” I quietly said. “What one does, another can undo.”

He nodded.

“Should we find the right lever,” Hierophant smiled, “we can get those stories back.”-

So it seems to me that the obvious solution is that, having set this problem down in front of a new Named(Cat as Warden of the East), is that the new Named with influence over villain stories could get an aspect to overcome this problem in their path. The issue with that is that it's too obvious of a solution, it seems fairly likely that the purpose of this story stoppage to cause exactly that effect in Cat, likely to prevent her from getting a different type of Aspect.

Chapter 28: Grieved

"Friendship is the sole gift both given and received."

– Free Cities saying

Even nameless hole-in-the-ground villages had a temple, in Procer.

A bare bones arrangement, of course. It wasn't like the people who'd once lived here had been able to afford bringing in stone. The House of Light was a glorified barn, with shuttered windows on the sides and a surprisingly nice thatched roof. The angle of it was gentle enough I was able to lean back into the prickly straw and leave my legs dangling over the edge. My deadwood staff I left at my side, keeping against my ribs an open bottle of wine as I looked up at the clouds. The day was waning but it was still a fair afternoon, the sun warm and the breeze lazy. I had the third of a bottle warming my belly, the taste of the red sour against my tongue, and I was half asleep already.

I'd taken to sneaking in naps when I could afford to, which was less often than I'd like. My hours were spoken for even on the road. It helped even out for my nights when I could, though. There were only so many times in a row you could wake up halfway to Early Bell and find yourself incapable of falling asleep until the lost sleep caught up to you. My Name was taking the edge off some, but it could only compensate so much: just like when I'd been the Squire, it did not prevent tiredness so much as help me work through it. Sooner or later the dues had to be paid. My fingers clenched around the neck of the bottle. And that was the very thing keeping me up at night, wasn't it? The dues I'd paid in Ater.

There were some dreams even exhaustion was preferable to.

I brought the bottle to my lips, drank deep and forced myself to close my eyes. The nap would do me good. Only there was a scent on the wind, the last wisps of smoke from Masego's work, and it had my jaw clenching. I would not be able to sleep here, I realized. At least not without that fucking nightmare, the way his eyes had widened just the slightest bit as the knife sunk into his chest. The shiver of pain as the mortal wound was inflicted. It'd been burning that night too, a pillar of green death going up all the way to the clouds.

It was a relief when I felt the magic thrum in the air. Masego had always been a prodigy when it came to controlling his sorcery, the impressively small amount of power lost when casting a spell, but he'd become something else entirely since losing his magic. Not there was not a drop lost, I thought. The only signs he was using magic were immanent – inherent to the formula, inevitable – with not a single emanation phenomenon. I suspected that his spells were now as close to perfect as was possible for a human when he was allowed to take his time.

I did not open my eyes to look at how he was coming up, but I heard him slump down into the thatch and wiggled around until he was more or less comfortable.

"I'll need thicker robes," Masego noted, "if we are to keep doing this. The straw bites at my back."

"Send a requisition request to Vivienne," I snorted.

I was going through secretaries quicker than I was going through swords, these days. I'd lost one to the Clans and the other to a blade in the back, leaving Princess Vivienne Dartwick to settle awkwardly into the role. She had duties of her own and she'd never been quite as good with details as either her predecessors, so the adjunct secretariat was having to pick up the slack. I'd have tried to borrow Aisha from Juniper if I weren't so likely to lose a hand to those pearly whites in the attempt.

"We could avoid thatched roofs instead," Masego flatly suggested. "I'll not begrudge you the habit of finding a perch, Catherine, but you could at least find a comfortable one."

"Slim pickings here," I amusedly replied. "I'll take it under advisement for the next time."

"That is all I ask," he replied, pleased.

There was a moment of comfortable silence, then finally I sighed and open my eyes.

"What brings you up here?" I asked.

"I've done as much to find our leverage as I can without my proper equipment," Masego told me. "A purely magical ritual is not a feasible solution, as I had suspected, so I am broadening the search. The mathematics are rather challenging, it is an interesting area of theory."

I glanced at the dark-skinned man lying at my side, the first Named who had joined me. He'd been Apprentice, back then, but that was no longer the mantle he bore.

"Who am I to ask about the arithmetic of deicide if not you, Hierophant?" I half-smiled.

I glanced to the side, finding his lips quirking, but my brow furrowed. His eye was still missing, the one he'd lost earlier. The skin of the socket was healed, but only one glass eye remained.

"Haven't had time to repair it?" I asked, tapping my own missing eye.

He looked surprised.

"Repair it?" Masego said. "That is not possible, Cat. It is not a crossbow whose parts can be swapped out. My eyes were unique, artefacts in the truest sense of the word. No, it is permanently lost to me."

I started in surprise.

"Shit," I said. "I'm sorry, Zeze. I had no idea."

He shrugged.

"You don't seem all that broken up about it," I slowly said.

"One will suffice," he said. "It serves my purposes well enough."

"You've had them for years," I pointed out.

"The loss of my eye was well worth what it allowed me to Witness," Hierophant said. "It is not without reason Above guarded the sight so jealously. Did I not tell you, once, that the godhead is a mere trick of perspective?"

I nodded. Hard words to forget when they'd come in the wake of him becoming the Hierophant and binding a princess of the fae standing in the fullness of her might.

"Apotheosis is not a matter of power, Catherine," he said. "Else as the Sovereign of Moonless Nights you would have been as terrible as a great queen of the fae. It is the perception of the laws of Creation, of its underpinning, that sets aside a god from the rest."

"And this helped?" I asked.

"I had a glimpse of work laid down by the Gods themselves," Hierophant said. "It did more to broaden my perspective in an instant than twenty years of uninterrupted research would have borne. Once again, you have given me a great gift."

"I know what I'm getting you for your next nameday, then," I drily said.

He looked at me, surprised but expectant.

"I'll pluck out the other eye," I grinned. "See if you learn from that."

He rolled his glass eye all the way around, which even after years of war against Keter I had to admit remained an unsettling sight.

"Lucky me," Masego sighed, and extended his arm towards me.

I cocked a questioning eyebrow.

"The bottle," he asked. "Unless you intend on drinking alone. Which is a habit common in drunks, I'll remind you."

"Well," I grunted, "if you insist on putting it that way."

He caught the bottle when I tossed it, because I'd yet to figure out how to fake out that damn eye. He wiped the rim carefully with his sleeve and took a careful sip, getting a smile out of me. He'd been overweight when I first met him. Hard to remember that now. Even through his high-collared robes – black, as always, but bordered in sharp patterns of yellow and green – I could see he was lean, though with barely any muscle to him. He was still very much out of shape. His long braids were woven tightly with enchanted trinkets whose magic he could wrest. His face had changed as he grew old, sharpened as the last of the baby fat melted away and his nose stood out more starkly, so now the braids made his cheekbones look longer.

"I think I prefer red wines," Masego noted. "Though brandy cut with pear juice remains the finest of drinks."

The Grey Pilgrim had introduced him to it while they were working on smiting ritual together. Tariq had been very fond of pear brandy but known it was rather rare outside of the Dominion and so finagled a little recipe with Proceran brandies and pears. It was so horribly sweet I almost felt nauseous just standing near a cup, but Zeze was very fond of the brew. And Indrani liked it when he drank, so no doubt in some supply wagon of the Army of Callow there would be the ingredients for it being smuggled along with actual supplies.

"Good luck getting that in a tavern," I snorted.

"Never again," he darkly said. "There was a rat, Catherine."

"Come on," I complained. "It was once and years ago. We'll take you to a nicer place next time."

Indrani and I had taken him to a tavern Docksideside in Laure before the Tenth Crusade, one of those dives we both loved. We'd yet to hear the end of that rat.

"There won't be one," Masego helpfully informed me.

I threw a few barbs his way about tender Praesi palates, he reminded me that in truth it was Callowans who had difficulties with spices, and after a while we settled into a comfortable silence as we passed the bottle of wine back and forth. I felt lighter already. He'd always had a knack for doing that, perhaps because he usually wasn't trying to. If someone were trying to move me I'd dig in my heels, but his sincerity had a way of going right through.

"Got anything else to do before we leave?" I lazily asked.

"Sapan is overseeing the last of our packing," he said. "But yes, as it happens."

"What's that?"

He turned to look at me fully instead of through his own skull, which had me frowning already.

"You need to speak with Hakram," Masego said.

My fingers clenched. So did my guts.

"It's handled," I curtly said.

"It isn't," he replied, shaking his head. "Which is why I bring it up. Indrani tried to before you sent her off to Salia, but you distracted her with sex."

I paused, surprised enough by the bluntness of that to be at a loss for words.

"She says you only do that when you really want to avoid talking about something," Masego frankly said. "Which is why she let you do it. But she was worried, and so am I. You've been putting it off ever since you left Ater."

I'd left before him. He'd stayed to watch my father and Eudokia be put to the pyre before catching up. I'd not asked what would be done with the ashes. I wasn't sure I had a right to.

"I have no time for the personal," I said, but it was a lie.

I did. I just didn't want to deal with it. Masego wiped the bottle, then had a long sip. He set it down into the thatch carefully. He folded his knees close to his chest, like a child pulling close.

"I ran, after Thalassina," he quietly said. "I could not face the enormity of what had happened there. I had swallowed up hundreds of thousands of souls, swelled with power the likes of which I had never known, and yet I still ran. There were... whispers in my ear. Procer would be where I found how to Papa back, where I could break the crusade that killed him. But deep down, I believe knew I was running."

"It's not the same," I murmured. "You know that. They died, your fathers, but you didn't..."

Kill them, I could not quite bring myself to say. You didn't kill them, like I killed mine.

"An argument can be made that I did," Masego said. "If I had not insisted to be out in the Maze, Father might never have reached for the powers that killed them."

Them and a city, I almost said, but held my tongue. Grief didn't work that way. You could know, in principle, that the death of a city of thousands mattered more on the scales than the pair of people you had loved. But it didn't weigh the same. Grief, it was like a wound. It hurt when it was on you, when it was your flesh split and your bones cracked. You could see someone else's wound, feel for them, but it wouldn't be the same. Our pain always mattered more than other people's because it was the only one that felt real.

"It does not matter, in the end," Masego quietly continued. "Even if I claimed all the guilt as my own, it would not bring them back. It is just digging to make the pond deep enough to drown."

"It does matter," I harshly replied. "Of course it fucking matters, Masego. I put a knife in him."

My hand swept up and I flicked the wrist, some vicious part of me hoping for a flinch but finding only unruffled patience. I stabbed the knife into the straw, felt it rip through strands of straw. Like killing a scarecrow.

All men became like scarecrows once you killed enough of them.

"That knife," I told him, knuckles turning white from the grip. "Right into his heart. He was dead faster than a prayer, Masego. And he gave me the fucking thing the night we met, did you know?"

I could still hear his voice, the way the blade had glinted in the firelight as he spun the handle towards me. How far are you willing to go, to see it done? Far enough to kill him. Had he known, even back then? That it would end with his gift returned in red. Masego's father had hated me once, because he thought I would be my father's death and he had loved the man deeply. Wekesa the Warlock had always been clever. Masego shook his head.

"You never told me the story," he said. "And when I asked him, he was..."

"Himself," I finished, tone rueful.

My friend nodded.

"I was going to die," I said. "I was heading back to the orphanage and I saw a guard assault this girl. I stepped in, tried to stop it, but another guard got me. He was choking me, then the Black Knight appeared."

What a terror he had seemed, back then, death in unadorned plate. Not even Sabah, for all that she stood heads taller and broader, had filled the alley quite so much.

"We took them prisoner," I said. "And they were going to be turned over to the city guard, only it wouldn't stick. They'd tried to rape and murder, but they'd still get out."

I swallowed.

"So he offered me a knife," I said, "and asked me what I thought was right."

That was the moment that'd begun it all, wasn't it? There had been many crossroads in my life. That night in Summerholm where I became the Squire. The end of the Folly, when I'd embraced the depths of Winter. The battle for Great Strycht, the plea I had made to an enemy with every right to kill me. Even that nightmare in Ater, the sky burning green as I became the Warden of the East. All great pivots, days and night that had decided the lay of my life. But at the source of them all, the origin, it was that evening in Laure. The weight of the knife against my palm as I made my choice and slit two throats.

I'd begun it all in blood, and in blood was carrying it out.

"Did you find it?" Masego asked.

I was silent for a long time.

"I found something," I murmured. "I don't know if it's right, but it's something that made it worth the knife."

"He would understand."

I looked away from my friend.

"He did," I said. "Does that make it any better I murdered him?"

"I loved him too, Catherine," Masego reminded me.

The tone was calm, but there was iron beneath it. A warning to tread lightly.

"Loved them both," he continued. "Aunt Eudokia was never close to us, to anybody but him I think, but I've known them since I could remember."

My gaze was drawn to him and I found him looking east. At the distant peaks of the Whitecaps, through green valleys and heavy mists. The afternoon sun was dipping, falling out of sight. Masego's long, lean face was composed but that was only skin deep. In the depths of the east laid the graves of the only family he'd ever known. And still he looked, with an eye of shadow and an eye of gold.

"Father once told me the day might come one of them killed another," Masego said. "That they had won against the odds for long, but it would not last forever. That perhaps Aunt Sabah would fall too deep in the Beast, that Father would delve into things best left buried or Uncle Amadeus cross one line too many. And he made me swear, that day, that I would forgive whoever survived."

My breath caught in my throat.

"He said," Masego continued, "that I must. That he did not want me to lose all of my family for one death."

"Praesi," I said.

It was neither praise nor curse. Maybe a little of both.

"These are the lives we live, Catherine," he gently said. "We kill and we win until we lose and we die. We are the children of the knife. And so I still love you, even though I watched the woman who used to bring me lemon tarts bleed out on the stairs. Even though you killed the man who taught me it was all right to be as I am, that I should not be fearful of it."

It was perhaps the most loving thing anyone had ever told me. The obscenity of it made me want to throw up. I felt my fingers shaking around the grip of the knife. I'd yet to let it go.

"I thought we would win," I croaked. "That I'd get to keep him. That we'd all get to go home. And instead, Gods..."

He laid a hand against my arm, fingers warm even through the cloth.

"I know," Masego said.

"Fuck," I snarled, fearing myself tear up. "We were so close, and he just didn't give me another way. It was all laid out in front of me: him, them, or everyone else. We were going to end it all in one stroke and he just wouldn't get out of the way."

I tried to stay angry, but it came out more like a sob. Slowly, delicately, Masego unclasped my fingers from around the knife. I let him and left it in there. Stabbed deep in the straw. I felt like swinging at someone, like hitting the roof or Zeze or even the fucking sky if only so that momentary satisfaction of the hit would drown this out for just a heartbeat. Instead I choked on a sob and his hand on my arm gently tugging me forward until my head was dragged down against his leg. He ran his fingers through my hair, soothing me like a child as I bawled my eyes out. He was dead. Truly dead, no trick or scheme or last laugh. In that cruel moment on the steps we'd made our choices and I'd killed him.

I was never going to see him grow old. I was never going to share a drink with him again, sitting in a tent after dark and talking about the way the world should be. I was never again going to know someone who got the anger. Who'd felt it too. He was just gone.

When I came back to myself, throat raw and nose dripping, it almost felt like I'd fallen asleep. But I was still here, head on Masego's lap as he gently combed my hair with his fingers. No one had done that for me before, I thought, not like this. Kilian had massaged my back, sometimes even scratched it, but never this. And Indrani had never tried it either. It wouldn't be from her he'd learned that, I thought. It'd have been one of his fathers, both lost in Thalassina. I'd never met Tikoloshe and disliked Wekesa, but never had I doubted they loved their son deeply. I'd known that about them long before I heard of the sacrifice that had broken a city and a fleet, and their love echoed through their son still. Through the fingers combing my hair.

"There," Masego said, sounding awkward as he patted my head. "Better, yes?"

I dragged myself upright, tugging my clothes and wiping my nose with my sleeve. I would have cleared my throat, but it still felt raw.

"Yeah," I rasped. "Better. A little."

He withdrew from me, not out of dislike but because he'd never been all that fond of touching. It knew it to be a mark of great fondness that he'd kept me close for this long.

"It doesn't stop hurting," he said. "It merely... takes a step back. It will always be there, I think. That it what it means to have loved them."

I exhaled.

"Thank you," I got out, even though I didn't want to.

Even though it felt like weakness.

"That is family," he smiled.

And it was. I'd taken me years, but I had found a family of sorts. Made it, greedily clutched it to my breast. Masego and Indrani and Vivienne and all of Rat Company, the Fifteenth. I held as many ghosts as I did living, but they were still mine.

"So return it in kind," Masego said. "Hakram, why is it that you won't speak to him?"

I looked away. It was easier, when you had only the one eye.

"Vivienne thinks it's because you're afraid of ruling without him," he said. "That speaking to him will make it true, permanent."

"Talk behind my back, do you?" I said, but the anger was half-hearted.

"When you turn it," Masego said, "where else can we?"

I winced. From someone else I'd been able to take the lick and move on, just call it a good line and dismiss it, but he didn't play those sorts of games. Sincerity was harder to ignore. So I kept silent for a long time, choosing my words, as he patiently waited. The poison came to me first. It always did, for better or worse.

"He was supposed to be the one who stayed," I admitted. "When all this comes to an end."

"I don't follow," he said.

"You'll disappear into a tower, Zeze," I tiredly said. "And Indrani will keep a home wherever you are, but she'll leave. It's not in her nature to stay. And Vivienne, well, neither of us ever pretended we'd choose the other over Callow. She'll have a kingdom to rule. But Hakram, he was going to stick with me. We were going to build Cardinal together, usher a new age under the Liesse Accords."

I laughed, not hiding the bitterness.

"Only he's bound to the Clans now," I said. "If not for life, then for a very long time. Maybe he'll help, and I'm sure he'll write, but it won't be..."

I hesitated, not quite finding the words.

"It won't be us," I said. "It'll be me and him. And I'm not sure that's enough."

Because I was looking forward, into what lay beyond Keter, and what I saw terrified me. They'd be gone, all of them. Not only the Woe but everyone. Juniper and Aisha and Pickler, they weren't going to leave the Army of Callow for a city being built. Not when they'd given years of their lives building that army up from nothing. So one day, after they feasted me in Laure and patted my back and were well rid of the queen that had been necessary in the pit but was embarrassing now that peace had come, I'd begin walking west and found I was left only with ghosts. That, like my father before me, when it came down to it I stood alone.

"You are afraid," Masego slowly said, brow cocked.

He spoke the words like they were the most absurd thing in the world. Like he'd just said water was dry.

"I think I'm past that," I said. "I've seen it on the horizon for too long. Resigned, I think, is the better word."

"Why would you think that?" he asked, frowning. "That we'd leave?"

"Because they left him," I harshly said. "After the Conquest was done, when the stories were finished, they split. Captain to her family, your father to his tower and Ranger had already fucked off in the woods long ago. Only Scribe stayed, and my Scribe was supposed to be Hakram. So much for that."

"We're not them, Cat," Hierophant said.

"We carry the legacies," I tiredly said. "And the writing's on the wall. I'm not angry, Masego. I just didn't think it through right. I carried the mistakes down a generation. Maybe the next one will do better."

"Catherine," he said, a hint of iron in his tone. "We are not them."

It was easy to say this now, I thought, but it would not last. He was who he was. Here and now my fear brought him guilt, but guilt so rarely won out against desire.

"Doesn't matter," I said. "You want to know why I can't stomach looking at him? Because he knew all this, Masego. Everything I just told you. He knew it and made his choice anyway."

My lips quirked mirthlessly.

"It wasn't the wrong choice," I said. "He did a great good through it. And I should not begrudge him that."

But I did. Because he'd left me, and I knew hundreds of thousands would be better off for it, all of the Clans. But the Clans were far and it was my flesh split, my bones cracked. The queen saw nothing to forgive, but it was not the queen who loved him. Masego studied me for a long time.

"You are keeping something back," he said.

My eye found the knife stabbed into the straw. I reached out to touch it, but my fingers flinched away.

"That night," I said. "In Ater."

The golden eye watched me but the shadowed one allowed me my shame in peace. An even-handed stare.

"On the steps, I made the decision," I murmured. "Them or Calernia. And I hesitated, I did, but it was..."

I bit my lip.

"I knew from the moment I stood at the crossroads," I said, "which choice I would make. I hesitated the same way you hesitated before putting your finger against an open flame – knowing it'd hurt. I knew I'd kill him if it came to that. It was inevitable from the moment the choice was asked of me."

"And you think he'll not forgive you that," Masego stated.

I shook my head.

"I don't know if he will," I said. "But I think yes. Because it took the two of us to end up standing on those stairs with a knife between us. It's not about that. I guess it's about me."

The golden eye watched, impassive.

"Every time I'll look at him," I said, "I'll know. That he's probably the most important person in my life, the first and closest friend I ever made, and I still chose to kill him."

I'd have to live with that, with the scent of it hanging in their air every time we were in the same room. I'd chosen to kill him and we both knew that. How little love mattered to me when there was a war to win, an enemy to beat.

I'd thought I had lines I wouldn't cross.

Masego reached for the bottle and I handed it to him. After wiping it clean once again, he swallowed the last mouthful of the bottle. He grimaced after, for it had been a middling bottle and so the bottom had tasted strongly, and set it down into the thatch.

"It is you who is ashamed," Masego said.

He added nothing, as if waiting for confirmation. Slowly, I nodded.

"Yet it is him confined to distance, even should he wish otherwise," Masego noted.

I grimaced, echoing his own. It was as bitter a mouthful to swallow. My friend waited for me patiently, until I had finished going through all my denials and delays and settled on something I would live with.

"Salia," I said. "I'll join the briefings with Abreha until then, but I'll speak to him alone in Salia. When we can be in the same room."

"That is all I ask," Masego said.

I slumped back down into the straw and so did her. Dusk was approaching, and with it the time of our departure. Three weeks to Salia now, perhaps one more if there were troubles on the way. My fingers found the handle of the knife and closed around it. I wouldn't leave it here, much as a part of me wanted to. Children of the knife, Masego had called us. We'd wield them until they killed us all, that was what we'd been born to. All you got, I thought, was to choose what you did with it. If you tried to make the world bright or you tried to lessen it. It wasn't much.

But it was something.

We lied there on the roof in silence until the sun came down.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Sinead

Short and sweet.

I love it.

Metalshop

Catharis. Perfection.

GoodGirlJW

Catharsis more like Cat-tharsis amirite

ruduen

I'll admit, out of the people who would potentially talk to Cat about this, my money wouldn't have been on Masego for it – but his sincerity probably does a lot more to get through to her than others can manage.

It's a rough situation to read into. Honestly, I don't know if Hakram would take it personally, that Cat would be willing to kill him for her goals. Even if the oath is broken, it doesn't mean that everything they knew and understood before is gone. I wouldn't have been surprised if Hakram was willing to die to help fulfill Cat's goals, and though the clans are likely at the forefront of his mind now, I wonder if that's still true.

Things will remain a mess until they actually bother to take the time and figure out what they are to each other now. And, the same as with Vivienne's original name loss, I imagine a name change like that will need them to think about what it means, if Hakram remains one of the Woe.

KageLupus

I didn't see it coming, but Masego is the obvious best choice for person to really push Catherine to start dealing with her grief. He has also lost his father recently (and blames himself for it even if it wasn't as direct as Cat), so he can relate better than any of the rest of the Woe probably could. And while a lot is made about Masego not showing emotions or affection in the same way as most people the point is always made that he does still feel them.

Most importantly, Masego is smart enough to see that his friend is in pain and ruthless enough to force her to confront those feelings for her own good. This chapter is Zeze wielding grief like a surgeon wields a scalpel. The process might hurt but it is better than leaving the injury to fester and rot. Here we see the emotional equivalent of him carving up Cat's soul to remove the demonic corruption from it.

ninegardens

See, to me its almost the opposite of ruthlessness. It's gentleness, it's compassion. There isn't a moment of ruthlessness in their. It's not a scalpel, it's candlelight.

Something soft and warm, nudging CAT to get where she needs to go.

Notice how its less him saying things (precision,scalpel, all that jazz), and more him asking things; questions asked with compassion and innocence. It's... very very different to the ruthless scalpel (which would be more Maddie's approach)

Juff

Typo Thread:

Not there was > Now there was wiggled around > wiggle around open my eyes. > opened my eyes.
on smiting ritual > on the smiting ritual yearsago > years ago to Papa back > to bring Papa back believe knew > believe I knew loved echoed > love echoed
That it what > That is what I'd been able > I'd be able and found I > and find I in their air > in the air did her. > did he.
We lied > We lay

Sinead

Cat still also only has one eye.

Perhaps she can talk to Masego about the bone chip enchantment for binocular vision.

Unrecovered

Artifacts fail you at the most inconvenient moment. So she won't.

dadycoool

She doesn't have to worry about inconvenient Stories at the moment, so she might.

gbevis

That story about artifacts is just that. Is she still bound to such clichés?

Cpt. Obvious

Currently? Probably not.

The way all stories are on hold for villains but not for heroes is making it hard to evaluate the impact. But in this case, as it is something that effect only Cat i think it's probably safe.

Where it get tricky is when a hero gets involved as they are still at the mercy of the old stories.

I mean what happens when a hero attack say a revenant but gets handed their ass before managing to break off and survive to fight another day?

Before "the freeze" that would be an invitation to start a pattern of three. But now?

On one hand villains has been freed from the constraints of the stories but they've also lost a powerful tool. Question is if they are more vulnerable or less vulnerable to Heroic stories wielded by heroes with a good understanding of Name lore?

Tenthyr

This was really well written. I didn't expect Masego to be the one to pull Catherine a little bit out of her pit, but I'm glad it was him. That monent of grief was heartwrenching.

dadycool

Who'd have thought the Hierophant would be the best therapist available? But Truth is what she needed and Truth is what she got. His special ability is to see right to the heart of any matter, and he used it perfectly. You know you're doing it right when your patient falls on you crying.

But all the catharsis in the world won't restore what was lost, and they both know that. It'll take a legion to replace Adjutant, but that's what she'll have to do. She has run out of Named secretaries, having been stabbed in the back by both of them.

I think Masego always intended to follow Cat wherever she went, only leaving her side when she points to a building and says "This is where you'll do research until I call for you." She was the first person his own age to be a genuine friend to him, allowing and working around his quirks, not looking at him differently for them, and even giving him a way for her to kill him if he started slipping/getting corrupted, which basically told him "I care enough about you to not let you exist in a lesser state, your body controlled by something else." Her just being her father's daughter bound Masego to her in a way that even, in the end, was stronger than his bond to his own fathers. Hakram may have loved her more than anyone else, and Vivienne may be a fellow Callowan who loves the country as much as she does, but Cat, Masego and Indrani are cousins. The Children of Calamity share a unique bond that will likely transcend Transcendence. In several ways, Cardinal will be perfect for the three of them almost to the exclusion of the others. Starting with Cat and Indrani wanting to be better teachers than their own and Masego wanting to improve the capabilities of as many mages as he can. Wow, this was long.

Gabe Meadow

It makes sense though. "We are not them." That's the key to it all. The Woe is not just a family like the Calamities, but they have learned from the mistakes of their forebears.

Indrani learned to truly commit to the value of bonds. Masego took up a measure of ethics and isn't going to be completely wrapped up in his own pet projects – or at least, use them to aid the broader world. Hakram, well, it may seem painful now, but honestly, better a Warlord than a male Eudokia, dedicated to her leader in a way that utterly warped her. Cat learned to surf stories, rather than the cunning, but ultimately inflexible exploitation of Amadeus.

And a key, previously unmentioned but always implied part of that, was learning to open up and communicate to each other on an intimate level. Look at the clusterfuck between Amadeus and Alaya, never really addressing how their fundamental models for Praes were increasingly diverging before they reached the point of no return.

dadycool

You didn't include the last parallel, though you mentioned it: Amadeus and Alaya, Cat and Vivienne. Rather than "I know I might be a better ruler than you, but I'm letting you have the throne anyway", Cat went with "Here's how I rule. Learn from my reign as my heir and now slowly start taking everything over while I rise above this position." Cat was also able to see where she fell short, especially regarding Nobility, and letting Vivi shine in those aspects, personally making plans and deals for the future.

Frivolous

Masego has conquered Keter's due. Amazing. Even more amazing that he only surpassed that limitation when he lost his magic. It's as by losing, he gained.

I wonder if Neshie knew he'd be strengthening the Hierophant when he ripped away his magic. He's probably regretting it now.

I wonder if Hierophant himself is aware of how much greater he has become.

And he is now that much closer to apotheosis. Twenty years of research distilled into a moment of peeking into the code book of the Gods Above.

At least now is explained why he hasn't Catherine a prosthetic eye yet, like the one he has. Explanation: He can't. Irreplaceable, unique.

I suspect that Masego really will lose his remaining Summer glass eye on the way to apotheosis, and count it cheap at twice the price. That's the theme of his Story: Gaining by losing.

He'll Sublime blind but smiling.

You could say that it's the theme of all the Woe: Gaining by losing, with no one doing it more often or with more sadism and suffering than Catherine.

Indrani gained by giving up the self-reliance she'd learned from Ranger.

Vivienne gained by losing the Name of Thief.

Hakram gained by losing, well, we'll see how much more he's going to lose.

Masego gained by losing his eyes and then his magic.

Catherine gained by losing her life over and over again, surrendering to Sve Noc and then to Tariq, then losing her eye, and probably much much more to come.

Reader in The Night

He didn't surpass Keter's due, otherwise Cat couldn't have sensed the spell. He simply reduced the Due to the smallest mathematically-possible amount of loss, the "immanent" loss of power.

Frivolous

Reader in the Night: Masego did surpass the Due.

My interpretation: Keter's Due is the inefficiency of each spell or ritual or artefact. It usually wastes at least 10 percent of the power, and often much higher than 10.

Masego has clearly trimmed away the waste of his spells so that he is getting 95 percent or more efficiency. Maybe even 99 or more.

Source: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/04/19/villainous-interlude-chiaroscuro/>

Quote: Though advances in spellcrafting and the theft of the entirely different Baalite spell formulas inherited by Ashur managed to lower that proportion, no spellcaster had ever managed to get the waste under a tenth in any form of sorcery. That tenth was colloquially known Keter's Due.

Tenthyr

That's not what Keters Due is. Keters due is the magical equivalent of entropy. Like how all mechanical systems must lose energy, usually as heat, all trimegistusan magic will lose some of the energy put into the system, the absolute limit of efficiency of a spell is stated to be around 10%, and it's also implied that the larger the spell/greater the input of power the greater the absolute percentage of waste will be.

Frivolous

Yes. I agree with most of your post. I just have doubts about your assertion that the absolute limit of efficiency of a spell is 10%.

Quote from above: Masego had always been a prodigy when it came to controlling his sorcery, the impressively small amount of power lost when casting a spell, but he'd become something else entirely since losing his magic. Not there was not a drop lost, I thought.

My comment: Does not a drop lost sound like 10% to you? It does not to me.

It sounds to me like Masego has developed his skills to become the magical equivalent of superconducting fiber. His waste would have gone below 10%.

ON THE OTHER HAND, also quote from above: I suspected that his spells were now as close to perfect as was possible for a human when he was allowed to take his time.

My comment: I admit that 'close to perfect as humanly possible' does not really go against the idea that the lowest inefficiency is 10%.

So I could be wrong. But it's fascinating to speculate. What if I'm right?

Against all precedent, Akua Sahelian made use of Keter's Due when she developed the Liesse Artefact. Maybe Masego has conquered the Due itself.

kinghaart

She said: "NOT that there was not a drop lost".

Double negative, implies there was at LEAST some loss. She goes on to say he's reached the theoretical limits of what a human spellcaster can do.

Masego paid the Due, but ONLY that.

jamesc9

> Not there was not a drop lost, I thought.

I'm reading the first word as a typo for 'now'.

Brian Cong

It may be a theme of the story, but it's also a truth of the world. Only through great loss or great gain do you really see a change in a person's character and being; more often through loss than gain, I think. (See: people winning money, gaining titles vs breakups, divorces.) That's just how people are.

Frivolous

Brian Cong: Hmm, that's true, but on the other hand, the Calamities didn't lose much, except towards the end. They just went from victory to victory.

I can't really think of any or many major characters, especially Named, who gained by losing, because mostly they didn't survive their major losses.

I think one of the truest reasons why Akua Sahelian remains the unofficial sixth member of the Woe is that she did gain by losing. Or lost by gaining. it's hard to tell with Akua. Her status tergiversates so often.

I think her current phase is losing by gaining, because she could have become Dread Empress but hated the very idea of it, but that could change again and soon.

Mental Mouse

TIL a new word! "tergiversate"....

Mental Mouse

> I wonder if Neshie knew he'd be strengthening the Hierophant when he ripped away his magic.

It does seem like a muff from the story-fu stance. But I suspected even back then that he was set up for it by the Bard.

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: I was going to say that seemed unlikely, since Neshie was working to unveil the Bard's plans using Hierophant's aspect of Witness, and scheming to have your oldest biggest enemy spy on you seemed counterproductive.

But it's the Bard we're talking about, so I guess it's possible.

Maybe the WB arranged for Neshie to kidnap Hierophant, knowing that Catherine and Indrani would do their Damnedest to get him back alive, and that Sve Noc would help, and thereby hit the infinitesimal gap between Hierophant is killed and Hierophant is rescued alive and unharmed.

In other news: I've been thinking about apotheosis.

It's becoming clear to me that, just as there are different paths to apotheosis, there are different flavors of apotheosis. In other words, gods don't necessarily have a common set of abilities. Sve Noc can do things Neshie cannot, and vice versa.

It's also clear that Neshie needed Hierophant to spy on the WB. He couldn't do it alone, at least not easily. Hierophant wasn't just a hostage.

Hierophant's powers seem to focus, as per his aspects and his history, on dissecting and replicating miracles, and combatting gods, and on divination and scrying.

I'm really curious to find out what brand of godness Masego will display once he transcends.

I also wonder if Masego will reach apotheosis even before the ending of this story. As in, it might become relevant to the wars.

ninegardens

Zeze reaching godhead during the current war seems... unlikely? In that, Nessie has had a lot longer to work on it, and was a lot more dedicated. At best, Zeze might hijack/hax one of Nessie's plans, but even then... Nessie's books and knowledge are a known memetic hazard, so... gotta be careful with that one.

Frivolous

ninegardens: Neshamah achieved apotheosis over decades, and Sve Noc over centuries. Both made great use of necromancy.

I'm not sure anymore that Masego will go the same way. He keeps talking about how godhead is a trick of perspective.

He has no particular interest in necromancy, though lots in dissecting.

If we are to believe all he says, and we know Masego does not lie, Enlightenment comes to him in epiphanies. All he has to do is learn enough, understand enough, and ways to understand more keep presenting themselves over the course of this story.

I agree that Nessie's books and knowledge are a known memetic hazard, but I don't think Hierophant is ever going to fall for that again.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, having lost his sorcery makes Heirophant basically immune to Nessie's memetic trap.

The thing about Sve Noc – they didn't actually reach apotheosis over those centuries – not quite, until Cat showed up with the windfall that let them cross the line. In any case, Sve Noc and Nessie are both little-g gods, and I suspect Masego has higher ambitions.

Gret

Gods, this is gut wrenching stuff. I love it.

ninegardens

It was always going to be Masego.

Cause... this isn't the first time he pulled her out of the pit (can't remember the last time... maybe around the princes graveyard?).

Because... he believes in Truth. Everyone else she knows holds something higher than truth, but Zeze holds only truth, and that makes him perfect for this, and god damn, I love this boy more than anyone else in the story really.

And honestly, chapters like this? The Woe are full of heavy hitters, and all the rest of them are fabulous, but seeing Masego "Algebra for Deicide" just casually chilling... I love it. There are very few stories I've seen that appropriately capture the roll of a scientist in a war effort... or hell, even in any larger enterprise... and to also play on the personal strengths that that devotion to truth brings? Beautiful.

Letouriste

I didn't expect masehgo to fill that role but it fit. I gotta, I'm always grateful of the way of the way you portrait grief and the way the characters manage to deal with that.

It's so rare to see grief portrayed as something else as a prelude to violent revenge etc...

For men, it's usually a matter of seconds and then somehow magically forgotten while for women... it's as bad given they have that cliché about being crybaby and tend to bottle up things inside too as a result.

We need more authors doing like you

sengachi

Thank you for this chapter. So much.

Burdi

I believe that Catherine now has some influence to choose someone to be her adjutant and whoever it is soon would become the Adjutant. Of course after she has some closing with hakram

anonymous4968

Would it still be Adjutant? Adjutant is a distinctly military term, and compared to when it first appeared as she was a Squire. As a warden, it would be something else I feel. Also, another term would fit her dreams of Cardinal better. Something more properly administrative than it, Provost or something would fit as well.

shikkarasu

And even if she could, I don't think she would accept it. There'd be some degree of "That is not your Name" in all her interactions with a future Adjutant which would keep them from ever being close to her.

Zach

That isn't how Names work. Otherwise there would have been a bunch of other historical Adjutants. The thing that made Hakram Adjutant was his complete devotion to helping Catherine achieve her goals. No one else is going to fill that void, at least within the scope of this story.

kinghaart

There is one name we haven't seen in the last two chapters that might, one that was quietly sitting on the steps during the final fall of Ater.

Bad@games

I love zeze so f*ing much. Who else could so perfectly call cat out of her bullshit and be so perfect while doing it.

JRogue

Grief is a funny thing. It never really goes away, always lurking, like a predator waiting for you to turn your back. You have to accept that, that it is a part of you now. Part of what makes you who you are since that event. If you fight it, you are literally fighting a part of yourself, and that never ends well.

Acceptance is hard. Because even after you recognize it and accept it, know it, the predator that is Grief will still leap out of nowhere from time to time. If you are fighting it, you end up with scratches and bites and worn out and angry from the fight. If you have accepted it you open your arms and hug that predator, know it is a part of you and while there is a struggle, in the end, the predator calms down and slowly walks away. You may be tired, but it is the kind of tired that leaves a smile on your face.

This was beautifully written. It was wonderful. Thank you again for this gift.

Hargabga

Interesting, how a personal grief of a character strikes people so much more deeply than the description of the end of times.

AbraKadabra

Because people are generally emotional.

kinghaart

Both did. But Cat said it perfectly – she's the story we've been following, here's is the flesh that we feel wounds most deeply in.

gbevis

" We lied there on the roof in silence until the sun came down."
Grammatical error or dark truth?

rwil02

Pretty much what I was going to ask.

Besso

I caught up N000000

Someperson

That really was a very good chapter.

Ashley

I lost my mom last year and this line

"It doesn't stop hurting," he said. "It merely... takes a step back. It will always be there, I think. That it what it means to have loved them."

Had me bawling. What a quote. That's gonna stick with me for the rest of my life. Thank you.

Chapter 29: Foundation

"Who sows without wisdom reaps a field of sorrows."

– Alamans saying

Travelling through the Twilight Ways was often as a hazy dream, but two days before we reached Salia the world caught up with me.

Archer found us an hour before Morning Bell, as the army prepared to decamp from the riverside where it'd passed the night. I decided to stay behind, passing command of the van to Vivienne, and asked the phalanges to prepare a decent meal for her while she went to bathe in the river. Indrani was in a fine mood for having washed off the stink of the road when she returned, her hair in a braid and her gait loose-limbed. She took her plate – bread and cheese with some cuts of pork – and brought it with her to the ground as she sat by the side of the carved table with a knife in hand. I got a look at the shape of the relief she was starting to carve when I brought her a glass of wine.

A tower aflame, with a man sitting on stairs below and two looming presences on the sides.

My jaw clenched but I said nothing. I ought to be getting used to talk of that night, anyhow. Gods knew my ear would be filled with prattle about it soon enough. I'd had a terse conversations about it over scrying ritual with both Cordelia and Hanno, the Bard blacking out half the stories of Calernia had made that necessary, but those had only been barebone talks. The meat of the information I'd passed on had been through written reports, so it was inevitable they'd want more out of me. I'd been there that night and known more about what was unfolding than perhaps anyone save the Intercessor. Would that it had been enough, instead of a bell being rang for the death of all the Principate north of Salia.

I waited for Archer to have crammed a few mouthfuls and washed them down before the questions began, which she seemed to appreciate.

"So," I said. "Salia."

"I handed back our little heroes to the White Knight safe and sound," Indrani said. "But he was more interested in having talks with Alexis. He's trying to get a grasp on the details of what happened out east, I think."

The Silver Huntress had been involved in nothing I'd not already passed on word about, so if Hanno was looking for an angle he'd be disappointed. He'd already politely asked about the artefact that had 'wounded the Intercessor', but I'd given him nothing. As was my right. Hierophant had built it from scratch, refining the lessons we'd learned trying to trap her in the Arsenal, and he had no claim on any part of it. Even the... Book of Some Things – ugh, that name – wasn't something he had a right to, strictly speaking. I'd set plenty of precedents for stealing aspects and making artefacts of them without anyone else having a claim on them.

No doubt he'd try to ask Sapan as well, if he hadn't already, but that would be another dead end. Masego had kept his temporary pupil far from the work, and though an increasingly skilled mage the girl was nowhere near close to the league needed to understand sorcery of such calibre. She wouldn't be until she either grasped High Arcana or transitioned into a Name that'd bridge the gap of her understanding.

"Let him," I grunted. "He's going fishing in a desert."

There had been a time where I would not have been so wary of Hanno of Arwad, but that time had come and gone. Calernia was falling apart, that was part of it, but there was more. While I had sworn to the Grey Pilgrim that I would reconcile with the man, the word I was getting out of Salia was making that task out to be increasingly difficult. I leaned forward towards Indrani, even as she began carving out the sides of the Tower.

"And the rumours we heard?" I asked.

She grimaced, brushing back a strand of wet hair sticking to her brow.

"You know I don't have the touch like you and Zeze do," Indrani began. "The knack for telling if someone's a claimant, how their Name is coming along."

"You've been around Named," I said. "You're familiar with what mantles feel like."

"Sure," she waved away, "but I don't have fancy eyes or whatever the Hells it is you use to get it right so often. It's just impressions for me. Not saying I don't have a guess, just reminding you it's that."

"Consider me warned," I drily said.

She rolled her eyes at me, but the levity was short-lived.

"Only met with him twice," Archer said, "but I don't think he's the White Knight anymore."

"Fuck," I said, with great feeling.

I'd been afraid of that. The point of the knife scratched against the tableside, shaving off small slivers to outline flames.

"He a claimant?"

She raised a flat palm then wiggled it, equivocating.

"He can definitely still use Light," Indrani said. "And he's got something. But I can't tell if it's the favour of the Seraphim sticking close to him or something else. My nose isn't fine enough to be able to tell those apart."

I sighed, sipping at the cup of lemon water I'd poured myself and wishing it were wine. There was still a day of riding ahead of me, though, and a bellyful of wine would it that a bloody chore.

"He's a claimant," I finally said. "Has to be. If it were Judgement, they'd have done something one of the three times Hasenbach used the ealamal."

Salia had been beset with demons and devils multiple times until enough mages and priests were scraped together to ward the capital and begin layering the countryside with expanding protections. The First Prince had used her angelic weapon thrice to shut down the Dead King before the need passed, when the Witch of the Woods had arrived and set down a great working that would greatly hinder diabolism within the principality's borders. Now word had it that priests were gathering to the fortified town where the artefact was kept in flocks, Light filling the sky day and night. When the ealamal was next used, Cordelia Hasenbach did not intend for its power to spread no further than Salia's borders. Given that such a power was all but guaranteed to slay any Named sworn to Below, it should be no surprise that I was less than enthusiastic at the prospect.

"So the Hierarch is still tying them up," Indrani noted, sounding admiring. "It's been years, Cat. Didn't think the man had it in him."

"Kairos always had a knack for putting the right madman in the worst place," I acknowledged.

Indrani set down her knife to drink and I sighed, massaging the bridge of my nose. If Hanno was a claimant to the Name I suspected that he was – and the First Prince had implied as much through her last letter – then we had trouble on our hands. I was dead certain that Cordelia Hasenbach was a claimant to Warden of the West as well. It was the Names of my lot that commonly saw claimants kill each other in a competition for the prize, with Above's works having a reputation for being comparatively gentler, but it was a little more complicated than that.

I doubted the two of them were at risk of swordfighting in the streets, but the growing divide between them was turning into a dangerous fault line for the Grand Alliance. The competing claims over the Name were the manifestation of something altogether more dangerous: competing visions for the West. I had been made the warden of Below's works, the guide of its champions and the arbiter of its faithful, but there would need to be another. An equal for me, someone standing on the other side. And it was beginning to look as if the claimants to the Name had very different ideas about what the Role behind it. Ideas that might be mutually exclusive.

I knew the two of them passing well, and neither of them were particularly good at bending when they thought they were in the right. The feel of the region was said to be reflection as much.

"How was the city?" I asked.

"Hasenbach is still beloved in the capital proper," Indrani said. "She's kept them fed while the world goes to shit and she closed the doors on demons. The streets are in her corner, even if there's the occasional riot. But outside? That's where the soldiers are, and there it gets muddled."

I drummed my fingers against the tabletop.

"Hanno's been out on the fronts," I said. "Several of them and from the start. He's been a lot more visible than her."

"He's been pulling miracles out of his ass left and right, you mean," Archer bluntly said. "He's popular even with your folk, Cat, and I don't need to tell you how impressive that is."

I nodded. Hanno had been part of the Tenth Crusade, fought at the Red Flower Vales under the Iron Prince, and my people were not the sort to easily forgive that. Not even in a hero. That he'd won so many of my countrymen over might have been a subject of genuine worry for me if Vivienne hadn't become the Princess. I need not worry of him having undue influence when there was a Callowan heroine for my people to look to for orders.

"This 'Prince White' business," I said. "How widespread is it?"

"Most soldiers call him that, and a fair few even in the city," Indrani bluntly said. "Nobody gives much of a shit that Hasenbach rustled up a few folk to sit in the Chamber and vote that a foreigner can't become the Prince of Brabant even if the crown is offered."

A foreigner, a growing political foe and one Named to boot. It was like some malicious deity had cobbled together a mess whose very nature was bound to make Cordelia Hasenbach see red. I'd seen her get increasingly angry at the 'Chosen' for complicating her efforts to save Procer as the war progressed, and now that the realm had shattered under the weight of horror the leader of the Chosen was being acclaimed as a prince.

"There's no longer a Brabant," I said. "The dead hold everything but the southwestern corner, and it's only a matter of time until those fortresses fall."

"It's not Prince White of Brabant they call him, Cat," Indrani said. "It's just Prince White. And they don't seem to be concerned about where his borders lie, you get me?"

Hellgods, I did. Cordelia was right to be both incensed and worried. If Hanno wasn't the prince of anything in particular, then he was the prince of everything. If people, nobles and armies, started acting like he really did have that authority? My lips thinned. That was not an authority that could live side-by-side with that of First Prince. One of the titles would strangle the other.

"This is more than just a heap of trouble," I finally said. "It's a lake of it deep enough for Calernia to drown in."

If either of them made a move against the other, there was a very real chance that the Grand Alliance would implode before we even began the march on Keter. It wasn't the thought of either left dead on the ground that worried me, since I doubted either would go that far. But if there was a confrontation there would be a clear winner, and while most of the forces would likely follow that victor the most ardent partisans of the defeated would balk. There would be a split, and we simply could not afford that if we wanted to live through the year. They'd be pushing over who got the Book of Some Things, too. Both of them were intelligent enough to know it'd be a boon for their claim and that I'd been intending it for the Warden of the West regardless.

My fingers clenched at the realization that staying out of it was not an option.

"It's bad," Indrani agreed, "but you had to be expecting it. We were never going to march north without an equal for you, Cat. This was always going to have to be settled."

"It's a choice with no good answer," I flatly said.

"Sure there is," Archer disagreed, cocking an eyebrow at me. "Put Shiny Boots in charge."

I blinked in surprise.

"You're in favour of backing Hanno?" I asked, not hiding my surprise.

"He's a twat," Indrani said, "but he's the one with the sword and the cause. I know you like Hasenbach, Cat-"

I made a noise of protest that she pushed right through.

"-but she's a peacetime queen and this isn't peace," Indrani continued. "Diplomacy's done, talks are done. We're going for the Crown of the Dead with a big fucking army and a boatload of Named, and Hasenbach's about as useful as tits on a sparrow for handling either."

"The reason we have armies and food and weapons is said titted sparrow," I reminded her. "I won't argue she's no warrior queen, but she's then queen that's kept us in this war. It's maybe not as pretty a picture as riding in at the last moment with the sun at your back, but it's done a lot more to keep us alive."

Indrani eyed me curiously.

"You like her more than I thought," she said. "Which is fine, Cat. And I know you've never liked turning on allies, that after..."

My stomach clenched. Indrani grimaced.

"Well, you won't be hungry to leave her out to dry is all I'm saying," she hurriedly continued. "But come knocking at Keter's gates, I know I'm going to feel a lot better about having the fucking Sword of Judgement in charge than I would the Queen of the Highest Assembly."

She met my eye squarely.

"And I think, deep down, so would you," Archer said.

I sighed. It was a fair speech, and she wasn't wrong. But she was looking at it through the lens of winning this war and only that.

"They stand for different things," I said. "Different Roles behind Warden of the West. And I'll need to have a closer look, feel out the shape of it, but I'm pretty sure that Cordelia's my bet if I want the Liesse Accords to be what they should be."

Indrani drank deep of her wine, then sucked at a tooth.

"Maybe," she said. "Might be you're right there. But for any of that to matter we have to survive this war, Cat. And I think he's a better bet for that than her."

"It's how we got into this pit in the first place," I quietly replied, "winning wars and then losing the peace."

We spoke of it no further than that. She'd said her piece, and as far as Indrani was concerned that was enough. The talk moved to lighter things as she finished her meal, travel stories and scurrilous gossip. Apparently the Concocter was scheming to get the Silver Huntress laid and failing rather spectacularly, a very handsome fantassin captain having gotten sent to the healers after an offer for a 'spar' was taken a lot more literally than anyone had expected. Indrani washed down the last of her bread with cold water from the river, then gracefully rose and stretched like a cat. It did interesting things to her figure, since she'd taken off her mail.

She was hesitating, I noticed.

"Did you, uh, have a talk with Masego recently?" she asked.

I half-smiled.

"Yeah, something like that," I replied.

A pause.

"Did it help?"

I looked down at my hand. My fingers clenched, then unclenched.

"As much as it can be helped, I think," I murmured.

When I looked up there was no pity in her eyes, which was a relief. I would not have tolerated it. She was pleased, but there was nothing condescending about it – she was just happy to have been of use. I hummed, considering her.

"I suppose good behaviour does deserve reward," I mused.

"Is Vivienne going to stop stealing my salary?" Indrani drily asked.

I tugged the collar of my cloak, loosened it until it fell to the ground. She looked at me with wide eyes.

"Isn't the army leaving already?" Indrani asked.

And yet she did not look away as I began to pull at the laces of my tunic.

"We're already late," I smiled. "A little later won't matter."

I got no further argument after that.

—

I woke up drenched in cold sweat, choking on smoke and feeling warm blood on my hand.

My breath was uneven, panicked, and my hair matted against my head. I forced myself to steady my breathing, in and out until my heartbeat was not so wild. I tossed aside my covers and slid out of my coat, careful not to put my weight on my bad leg. A few limping steps led me to a cabinet where a bowl of tepid water and folded clothes awaited. I splashed my face and my hair, trying to get rid of the sweat, but it was a lost cause. I'd need a bath when we entered Salia tomorrow, I felt like I'd drenched myself in filth. At least my monthlies had stopped again since I'd become Warden of the East, we were right around that time and I'd always hated riding a horse while bleeding.

The Intercessor hadn't managed to steal that particular comfort away from me, at least, which was a close to a victory as I'd found in Ater.

The gift of the Sisters told me it was past Midnight Bell, not quite halfway to Early Bell, and I sighed as I dripped water down on the cabinet. There was no point in crawling back into bed, sleep wasn't going to come. I felt wide awake, like I'd just been in a battle for my life. I slipped into trousers and loose green tunic, belting on a sword and a good pair of boots. My hair I left loose, for once, but kept I beneath the hood of a simple grey cloak. If I lit a few candles in here the phalanges would be there in moments, asking if I needed anything, but I did not feel like answering them. Neither did I feel like reading through my correspondence for the dozenth time, so instead I veiled myself in Night and slipped out into the sleeping camp.

Even in the middle of the night there were people out and about, patrols and sentinels, but they were easy enough to avoid. We'd encamped on the shore of the same river where Indrani had found us, but much further down: it was narrower and shallower here. And a greater distance from the paths we used during the 'day' — as much as it was ever day in the Twilight Ways — but losing another hour setting out come morning was well worth access to running water. I slipped through the wards and headed for the riverside, following the light of distant stars. I found a pleasant nook there, a flat stone nestled in a dip between hills that overlooked the water.

The flowing water was a soothing sight, the way the light of the stars touched the water. It almost looked like fish swimming in the water, the way I'd sometimes glimpsed them near the shores of the Silver Lake back home. The wind was slow, gentle, and I could hear it move the tall grass like a finger stroking a spine. It was warm out, even with the breeze, and with a long sigh I closed my eye. Let the tension that had tightened my shoulder since I woke up leave with the wind. Tariq had made a beautiful realm. I thought of that, sometimes, when trying to understand what kind of man the Grey Pilgrim had been. He'd done dark things, crossed lines even I had balked at.

But the Peregrine had been a man capable of great beauty as well.

My sword belt was pressing against my side uncomfortably, so I unclasped my sheath. Opening my eye, I laid both palms on the pommel of my sword and leaned forward to rest my chin on my hands. I waited, patiently, for the last dregs of the nightmare to leave me. I did not hurry it, fight for it, knowing now from experience that only made it worse. I breathed in and out, letting the wind carry it away like smoke. And that was when I saw her.

I had been, you see, haunted by a ghost ever since Ater.

Not an apparition or a phantom of guilt, but rather a creature of flesh and blood. She had not followed me immediately out of the city, but she'd caught up when the Army of Callow halted in Laure for resupply. Vivienne had told me as much. But while the ghosts had never been far, she had not sought me out either. I'd left opportunities, made them even, but no implicit invitation was ever accepted. Whatever it was that had driven Akua to follow me into the Twilight Ways, she was keeping it to herself. But the journey was coming to an end now, as by midmorning tomorrow we would be gating out near the outskirts of Salia, and so at last my ghost found me.

She was no longer a shade but her steps were still so very light. Her dress was in gold and red, a riding cut for travelling but still ornate in that Praes highborn way – the collar and sleeves were touched with pearls. The cloak over it was grey, almost the same shade as mine, and her hair was kept in place by a hairpin of chalcedony. Shaped like a swan. She turned to me and my heart caught in my throat. How long had it been since I'd seen those lovely golden eyes in a face of flesh and blood? It made a difference, knowing the creature before me was more than smoke and mirrors. Made it more real. More dangerous. She approached in silence and I did not contest it.

My eye returned to the river even as she sat on the stone. By my side but not touching. I could feel every inch of the distance without needing to look. I kept to my silence, listened to the breeze stirring the grass.

"Nightmare?"

I could have lied.

"Almost every night since Ater."

Sometimes I slept through them, but this was not one of the good nights. I breathed out.

"You?"

"I no longer dream."

A moment.

"It reminds me too much of the Mantle," Akua said. "Nothing, then colour again."

I'd never asked her what it was like, being kept in the Mantle of Woe. Never quite dared to. I had known she was not truly awake but not much more than that. A lucid dream was curse enough, I thought, if you knew you could not wake from it. Silence continued in the wake of the words, but it was not comfortable. We had said so many things, the two of us, been so many things to each other, that there could be no such thing as an empty silence.

"I am glad he died."

I snorted.

"I never quite believed you, when you said you didn't blame him for your father," I said.

"It was what you wanted to hear," Akua replied.

I cocked my head to the side, a concession.

"I wish I had killed him myself," she finally said.

I looked at the water, at the silver glint of stars.

"I wish anything else," I told her.

"It wounded you, to wield the knife," Akua said, considering me. "Good. Good."

I breathed out a laugh.

"I don't think that's one I'll get over," I admitted. "I think it'll be one of those scars that stay with you, never quite healed."

"You have dealt out many," she said, merciless. "It is only fair, Catherine, that you would bleed in turn."

And how strange was it, that I found comfort in that? In the lack of sympathy, of pity. Stone was hard and cold, but there was a constancy to that. You could make walls of it, rely on it for shelter.

"The world might be ending," I said. "Or at least our little corner of it."

"The world is always ending," Akua replied, indifferent. "The First Dawn promised a Last Dusk."

I chuckled.

"Quoting the Book, Lady Warlock?"

"Even the Book of All Things has its truths," she said. "I no longer have the luxury of blindness."

"Did you ever?"

I felt her smile without turning.

"If I had died young," Akua said. "But you took that from me. You made me a prisoner instead."

"Imprisonment was the least of what was owed."

"You made me a servant."

"You did that to yourself. There only so many fates your people allow for scrapped iron that is not discarded."

"And then you freed me," Akua quietly said.

I kept silent.

"Only you did not such thing," she said. "You taught me the prison, so that I might carry it with me everywhere I went."

I cocked my head to the side.

"Have you?" I asked.

She did not answer. She didn't need to. I had wanted, once, to make her the offer the very night she spurned the Empire. To offer her a way out, a way not to even the scales but put weight on the right side of them. To be enthroned in Liesse, keeper to a greater evil. That night in Salia had not allowed me the luxury, but it did not feel like a defeat. It was not scheme I had laid here. It was not a trick or a play or something that would need to rely on surprise or luck. I had laid a foundation, stone after stone, through years of patience. What did it matter, that a fateful moment had passed?

Fate was character, and I now knew Akua Sahelian's.

"You mean me to hold the Dead King prisoner."

I was not entirely surprised. I'd kept that almost silent and never once spoken the full intention out loud, but against the Intercessor it wouldn't have been enough. She would have been able to follow the thread of the story that was Akua Sahelian and learn it anyway. But only, I thought, if it was likely to work. If the groove was there.

"To take a broken throne in the depths of Liesse," I said, "and hold back the tide."

"And should I refuse?"

I shrugged.

"Nothing. It needs to be taken willingly."

Silence stretched out. She watched the river as well, her breathing quiet.

"I would have seen through you," Akua said, "if you were not in love with me, at least a little."

I kept my eye on the river.

"You do not deny it," she murmured. "I almost wish you would."

Then she quietly laughed.

"Will it be a wound as well, Catherine?" she asked. "Will the scar stay with you?"

It would have been wiser not to answer.

"Yes."

I'd never quite got the hang of wisdom. Neither had she. Soft fingers – warm now, flesh and blood – cupped my cheek and I did not fight it, let myself be turned to face her. I met her gaze, felt her breath against my lips. But I had my lines and she knew them, read them anew on my face.

"In matters of self-mutilation," Akua Sahelian murmured, "you truly have no rival."

Her fingers released me. She rose to her feet.

"I will see you tomorrow," she said.

I looked at the river but listened to the sound of her steps until it faded. She had not agreed, I thought.

She had not refused either.

Linnus42

Don't very much want Akua sealing DK for eternity. I only trust Saint to hold the line forever lol so its not really a moral judgment on Akua per se. But it tends to go poorly holding the Evil down as far as storylines go and I don't like it as an arc. Cause I don't especially think Akua is uniquely evil. Akua is actually Warlock now?

It will be interesting to see how Cat impacts the fight over Warden of the West. I am not sure her being Pro Cordelia does anything to help Cordelia though. I tend to agree with Indrani though better to win the War and sort out of the aftermath later then lose the war for extinction and not get a chance to sort it out. Also Cat's analysis has a flaw besides Angel Laser, the reason this clash started is cause Cordelia could no longer keep the food and weapons arriving.

Lictor Magnus

Yeah I could see how having the second most well known villain as your character reference on your hero name application might not be the best look 😂

Linnus42

Especially after her recent failure with the Bard that resulted in DK rolling over the lines. So she is not exactly popular right now I would hazard to guess.

nimelennar

While Hanno and Cordelia know about that, I don't know that anyone else would, or would even understand enough Name Lore to get why failing to kill the Bard properly has had such an impact on the Dead King's strategy.

Linnus42

The bard screw up resulted in DK smashing through their defensive lines, unleashing plagues like the one Rogue fought, trying to choke out the sunlight by making a land of eternal darkness, and forcing Cordelia to fire her laser to seal Hell portals which killed Civies. Ergo its not liable to make people to happy. I don't think anyone needs to know the details to not be fond of Cat.

Flameburst

Except that the bard screwup is known to maybe two dozen people in all of creation, if that. Maybe a hundred more saw her stab the bard, but that's not the screwup. As of now, less than a dozen people even begin to grasp the implications of what happened.

nimelennar

Why would they blame Cat for any of that, though?

We know it's because of what Cat did, because we watched it; Cat knows it's because of what she did, because she saw it happen; a few of Cat's closest friends, allies, and advisors know, because she told them. Who else would possibly connect "Cat killed the Wandering Bard" with "the Dead King smashing through their defensive lines, unleashing plagues," etc.?

Even if the secret leaked out, maybe some few people would be able to understand that the Bard was somehow keeping the Dead King in check and Cat screwed that up by killing her, but, IMO even that would sound far-fetched to someone who doesn't know a lot of Name lore.

Imagine someone telling you that the Chicago Cubs had caused Donald Trump to be elected by defeating the Cleveland Indians, who had been holding his power in check, in the 2016 World Series. Sure, the timing more-or-less lines up, but there just doesn't appear to be a mechanism by which A could cause B to happen.

Insanenoodlyguy

Plus you can beat this one with the truth, even without the details.

"We've all known for some time Bard was a great enemy who's trying to destroy the alliance. Cat set a trap for her, and it hurt her but she was able to get away. Then the bitch did something and made the Dead King even stronger. The Black Queen was obviously right to try and kill her, only thing wrong with that is she couldn't quite finish the job. It's Keter all over again, shits on fire and the bad guy wasn't quite dead, but it's a good effort."

Shveiran

I mean... that is pretty much the truth. Stopping the Villains' stories was something Bard did as retaliation and out of spite, not a direct consequence of Masego's actions. It was a choice on the Bard's side, I mean.

nimelennar

Sure, but if it gets that far, you kind of have to take Cat's word for it. The Bard is (ostensibly) a Hero, and no lesser a personage than the Grey Pilgrim himself has stood up for her in the past (even if he later recanted that support). Contrast this to Cat, a known Villain; if it looks like Cat tried to murder the Bard, and then lay the blame on her for the Dead King's sudden resurgence, that could backfire if the Bard is, even in silence, deemed more credible.

I really don't think anyone is going to make that connection between "Cat attacked the Bard" and "the Dead King ramped up the slaughter" unless they're told by someone already in the know (which is mostly a circle of people who Cat trusts), and then gets a hefty dump of Name lore to make the connection make sense. Especially when a seemingly much bigger event happened at just about the same time (the end of the Dread Empire of Praes and the fall of the Tower) for the Dead King to react to.

Insanenoodlyguy

Except at this point every hero in the grand alliance knew her as an enemy.

Link Ness Monster

I don't think Cat's going to be able to nudge this story, regardless. She might not even have a chance to announce support or make any moves.

I believe that the Warden of the West will be the one that realizes that there's no value in the Good half of the stories and destroys the Book of Some Things.

kinghaart

I'm not sure there's NO value, but yeah I could see someone trying to destroy the book.

But the problem then is that Above doesn't really care for that since in their Wager, they are the side that represents following rules.

The more I think of this – I think Neshamah is trying to win or break or outlast the Wager, but maybe the answer for Cat/

GA is to convince both Above and Below to start a new, different Wager in the current world, without having to wipe the board first. A Wager that's more about Calernia's ability to regulate itself.

stevenneiman

On the subject of Warden, I think Hanno is the better choice because he's the one who has relevant expertise and competence, where Cordelia is clueless about stories and seems to treat them as a superstition to indulge in to keep her Named happy, the same way a skeptical theater manager wouldn't say "Macbeth" in earshot of their performers. Much like Malicia she's great at politics but doesn't really understand the depth, importance, or non-transferability of her skillset for story-fu or the wrangling of uncooperative Named.

On the subject of Akua, I think it's a bad idea specifically because Akua got into this situation by being psychologically malleable. Her current state might be more stable than she was before (maybe), but I wouldn't bet ten bucks of my own money, let alone the fate of the world, on Neshamah not being able to manipulate her into abandoning or failing her duty given an unlimited period to work.

ISiejek

No this all started back at the Arsenal where, as it tends to, good as written by a story refuses to bend and makes everything worse than it needs to be (in other words Hanno was an arse based entirely upon his beliefs and then failed to keep to those beliefs and so now he's being an arse in a totally different way)

kinghaart

Agreed that Hanno has broken down over time but at the same time people are allowed to change. The question is whether it's a helpful change.

Now, back at Arsenal he was bad from Cat's PoV but I personally agreed more with him that executing someone who killed a serial rapist to attack the system that protected said rapist, and then resurrect them for pure political theater was unambiguously Evil and worth fighting against. What sort of future is the GA really fighting for if that's the sort of thing that's acceptable?

Yes, those horrible actions may save the world. Or they might not have, and they just did horrible things out of fear. Kind of like how Neshamah does horrible things for a "greater purpose" in his own mind – yes, most of Calernia might die but he can make it all better after so it will somehow be worth it. Or like that Villain Saint let go who was experimenting on people to find a way to make people immortal.

Linnus42

I argue it started when Cordelia put her Ideals first by turning down Warden of the West. She refused to give up her ideals to save a Nation, she claims to love. If she won't do it to save Procer then quite frankly why should Hanno give up on his to save Procer?

Hanno's position has changed on Civilian Leadership because Civilian leadership has failed to deliver the stream of troops and resources to win this war. Cordelia has a hate boner for all Heroes except her cousin because? Well so far it seems because Saint was mean to her once and told her Procer was rotten. And also cause GP solved a problem in a way Cordelia didn't like despite Cordelia having no solution of her own to the Black Knight Problem. Ironical given Cordelia's angel laser is also killing civies left and right lol. And Hanno wouldn't put Procer over his Ideals despite Cordelia doing the same.

If the argument is pragmatism then I am all for it but let's apply that consistently.

Dredcor

I'm pretty sure Cat is just using the Praesi title of Warlock here. Not the Name.
Akua hasn't done anything particularly worthy of the Name Warlock recently.

Shveiran

I'm with you there, but she is the Warlock nonetheless.

Snappy270

I mean stripping the twilight ways, paralysing an army, homing in on night when used, being a match for heirophant and that lightning spell that took out spiders yeah she has done some things.

DC

You know, there's one other person I'd trust. I'm just not sure how to get Anaraxes of Bellerophon sufficiently pissed off at the Dead King.

Sir Nil

I swear Catkua is a ship that just refuses to sink.

erebus42

It has the tenacity of its component parts.

sengachi

What is dead can never die. XD

Raved Thrad

And with strange aeons, stranger loves may together lie. 😊

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Politics and then a brutal emotional gut punch, it's perfect.

Liliet

Dang.

Well, this is not what I WANTED, but it's most definitely better written than my fanfics, so.

Hell yeah.

ruduen

Looks like it isn't up yet, sooo...

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Benjamin Huang

oh god the catkua fans are coming. HOLD THE LINE!!!
H00000LLLLLLDDDDDD!!!!!!

burlindw

No southern song for your ear
No pretty lass or merry cheer
For you only night and spear

Hold the wall, lest dawn fail

Axel Rafael

Shield Wall, Activate!

Miles

The warden of the West should be Abigail. She's way more qualified than these 2 twaddle dees and both being retired(-ish) Callowan military leaders has a nice symmetry to it.

erebus42

I always do enjoy an amusing dark horse victor. It would be particularly funny since it would be the logical conclusion to her story -every attempt to escape only digs her in deeper and further up the ladder until she's left in one of the most prominent and dangerous positions around despite her intentions.

kinghaart

She tries so hard to escape her prison that she ends up as its Warden, I like it. 😊

But there are other options too, like one of the Levantine lordlings since Levant is basically half of the west at this point with Procer so devastated.

nimelennar

That's too humble an ending for her. She's going to end up the unwitting, unintended target of Masego's apotheosis spell and end up as a new deity. If there isn't already a Choir of Providence, she'll create one.

Bad@games

No it'll be the Choir of Practicality.

Jokes aside i think that if Abigail does get a name it'll have something to do with foxes. We know Callowans like their foxes, even have a whole song about it.

kinghaart

She's already being referred to as Abigail the Fox so it's really busy a matter of time plus whether or not Names keep working.

Mental Mouse

That would be hilarious, but alas, it's the wrong story for a Callowan.

sengachi

I mean, a Callowan is currently Warden of the freaking East.

therealgridlock

Yeah but they're east of the dividing line, east of where cardinal will be built.

Not to mention they've been part of the dread empire for, what, 20 years?

I just think your confusion arises from assuming "good" and "east" are exclusive terms, they're not.

It's like saying someone from the east most province of the principate couldn't become warden of the west, when ultimately it doesn't matter even if it was the west-most province.

I agree Abigail probably has something in store for her, warden would be hilarious, but everyone is right. Callow is in the east, not the west.

Actually, now that I think about it, isn't white from the south? The DK is in the north...

What if we made akua warden of the north, forever trapping the DK, made Cordelia warden of the west, and Hanno warden of the south?

Then all the Cardinal (hur hur) directions would be covered

kinghaart

I think Basilia is making a strong claim for Warden (and Empress) of the South.

Mental Mouse

Yup, that's it exactly.

Mental Mouse

Right... and as other have noted, Callow is part of the East! Even before the Conquest, their national story featured that cyclical war with Praes, binding them together...

aurikdomi

Oh man what an upset that would be. But I can't really see it happening. well I guess maybe I could but the chances are so slim

kinghaart

Like 1 in a million you mean?

In other words, all hail Warden Abigail.

nimelennar

I think Hanno is the right choice, but not Hanno as he is.

Hanno, as he is now, is an arrow pointed at the heart of Cat. As soon as the Dead King is pent up again, he'll flip a metaphorical coin and find that her usefulness no longer excuses her misdeeds. He may not intend to kill her, but he won't stand for her continued exertion of power in Calernia, and that'll put the two of them on a path to a fight to the death.

But Hanno still hasn't had the turn that the Grey Pilgrim foresaw; he hasn't learned the lesson he needs to learn to become a true hero again. And I think that the lesson that he needs to learn is the same one that would allow him to coexist with the Warden of the East, to support the Liesse Accords. I don't know that I can put the lesson in words, but something to the effect of "The ends don't always (or even usually) justify the means, but sometimes lesser evils need to be chosen for the greater good."

A Hanno that can internalize that idea, THAT Hanno will not just march with Cat into Keter, but would stagger back out supporting her, and help her realize her dream afterwards.

But we may not meet that Hanno for a while.

Reader in the Night

The problem is, that's already the Hanno we've been seeing. The Hanno who is willing to sacrifice his personal ideals for pragmatism, who's paving a road to hell with good intentions.

But that won't make him more willing to bend or compromise with others, only with himself. The moment he decides Catherine's or Cordelia's evils are unacceptable, he will do however many lesser evils he needs to to see them gone. Because the nature of Named is being a bunch of uncompromising jackasses with their principles, and Hanno's principles at the moment seem to be "winning whatever the cost".

nimelennar

So it's not the lesson itself that he needs to learn; he just needs to learn how to apply it non-hypocritically. That tracks.

Gabe Meadow

It might also be fair to say that he's figured out that his habit of disengagement and lack of pragmatism will do way more harm than good in the current situation. He has not, though, appreciated or acknowledged that it did just as much harm before – instead he figure what he did at the time was the right thing.

shikkarasu

I think what he needs to learn in forgiveness and a different type of humility than the one he normally has.

For forgiveness, he needs to get over the Red Axe trial. He trusted a Villain and a Politician and while he needs to keep trusting them he did get bit for it. Once bit, twice shy. I can't blame him, but if Calernia perishes due to him not working with Catdelia I think Judgement will be very disappointed.

For humility, he thinks his opinion is always right, even when that opinion is 'I cannot possibly make the right choice.' Like Reader/Gabe were saying, he went from upholding the Law without interpretation to deciding that only he can do it right. It wasn't a fast change, or unwarranted, but is doing just as much harm.

He needs to admit that he can't do this alone, but that doesn't mean that he can pick a few Laws and stand by them rigidly. Rules are guidelines, they can't predict future circumstances nor account for them. That is what the Sword of Judgement ought to do: Judge the Laws, not the people. If he can get to that point? Warlord.

kinghaart

To be fair that's exactly how Cat things and acts too. She stabbed her own father and would have done the same to her friend to achieve her personal view of what would be best.

Arguably the Liesse Accords will only be able to stick around if she abdicates this role too after Cardinal is up and running. I vote Keegan for next Warden because she has run Callow as regent for years now as a wartime recovery ruler while Cat and Viv are off playing with Swords and the whole East needs someone more like her once the DK is dealt with. Also Daoine is meant to become more independent and her being Warden would help ensure that.

john

To be fair to Cat, she didn't exactly set out intending to stab Amadeus as Plan A. He put a knife in her hand and then more or less threw himself onto it.

Juff

Typo Thread:

being rang > being rung
have crammed > cram washed them > wash them would it that (something missing here) spread no further > spread further about what the Role > about the Role much of shit > much of a shit

It's lake > It's a lake she's then queen > she's the queen tomorrow, I > tomorrow; I West, we > West; we bed, sleep > bed; sleep and loose green > and a loose green kept I beneath > I kept it beneath
I woke up leave > I'd woken up leave now form > now from There only > There's only did not such > did no such night in Salia (should this be Ater) was not scheme > was no scheme

Xinci

Hm, honestly I can sorta see why Cat would overtly think Cordelia would be better for the Liesse Accords, since she is a pact maker. Ironically though Hanno is likely the best possible diplomat, institutional law checker, and general aid to planning long term institutions on the continent, with the addendum of him needing time to properly build up perspective with Recall. The question I suppose is if he lost that ability completely as a claimant or not. If the strength of Above is coalitions then one can see how either would be useful in making and growing ties amongst Good. Perhaps it just comes down to who can make such ties with more immediacy?

Also given the Bards earlier comment on the Accords, Cordelia would probably help make em end quicker but be more practical while Hanno would probably help em last longer but potentially be more risky. Very similar to what happened at the Arsenal.

It is good to have further confirmation on what being inside of the Mantle was like for Akua. I had presumed that her training aided her greatly in dealing with it, presumably alienation training especially given the description of consciousness in it.

ninegardens

So... fun chapter, but also it draws attention to something that makes me feel confused. Not in a bad way just in... a way.

Back in book 5 (five?), Cordelia refusing the name of Warden of the West was a huge fucking deal. It was kind of a defining character moment of awesome, for both her, and her cousin. And it was super important, because it kept the angle weapon from being used, and out of Bard's hands.

Cool.

And Kairos breaking the angles, and thus "saving" them from Bard, while dooming them to the Dead King was also a HUGE FUCKING DEAL. And one of his dying lines "What happens if an angel weapon is used while the choir is unavaliable?" "That's the point Cat, finding out?"

Cool. I loved those character beats. Great.

Now, we have Cordelia grasping for the name, and the angel bomb going off once per week, and we have Kairos's final question answered, and well... we have found out now, and I mean, the answer seems to be "The weapon kind of works how you'd expect". Cool. I get that circumstances have changed, and Bard is... off (???) the board and hence can't (???) mess with the angel weapon, and Hasenbach is getting desperate. I do get that.

But it just feels weird from a storytelling perspective having multiple major character moments, and then the Arrival of the DK just sort of... crushing all that stuff into irrelevance.

Or, maybe that's the point. The story prior to this shit literally isn't relevant any more. I don't know, it just feels weird, because a bunch of those moments were like literally some of my favourite parts of the story, and now it feels like there's this big shrug. I'm not sure if this is a bad thing, or just like... just a thing, but it's something that sticks out, and I'm trying to figure out how I feel about it.

Shveiran

You and me both, mate.

Reader in the Night

I totally get it. In hindsight, I think one of my biggest complaints about Amadeus' plotline at Praes was how he absolutely won everything and crushed everyone else into irrelevance.

For example, the Battle of Kala was supposed to be this huge thing where the brightest military minds of Praes gathered and Juniper cemented herself as being a military commander on par with Nim...

Except that Amadeus completely overshadowed them by predicting the outcome of the entire battle plus the mass desertion at the end that no one else managed to predict, while acting through two layers of proxies, via correspondence, from hundreds of kilometers away.

Then again at Ater, where he ran circles around every big schemer in Praes, from Malicia, to Cat, to Hakram, and even the Bard, predicted their every move, and maneuvered them like chess pieces. It's not like anybody underestimated him, he was just that good.

What was the point of the rest of the book if Amadeus rendered everyone else's efforts meaningless at best and all part of his master plan at worst?

Snappy270

See I don't think Amadeus predicted who would win Kala. He expected it to be a shitshow the legions will kill too many of their brothers and sisters. That was what he needed to get them to give up fight too much death for no real reason. Anyone could of predicted that given there was always going to be a confrontation, he just spurred on the legions under "his" command to make the situtaion worse.

ninegardens

Eh- yes and no. Like... the story has always been about gambit chess and all that jazz.

The Princes graveyard was 3 way gambit chess, and the end of that didn't feel bad, it felt awesome. Salia was gambit chess, and Auger beating out Bard was glorious.

Gambit chess is a central part of the story, and I am totally okay with it, and honestly, kind of expected Amadeus to win the gambit chess in Praes. Him playing Cat, and the rest of Preas makes sense: he knows cat, and he knows his homeland. I have reservations with how he went about it, (discussed previously, and hence will not go over them here), but I'm honestly totally okay with Maddie outgambitting everyone and everything when on his home turf, dealing with known enemies, with 2 years to prepare. Especially given that his opposition was Malicia (slowly going crazy), Cat (who doesn't ACTUALLY understand what she is dealing with) and the Nobility (who aren't even playing the game).

I also wouldn't claim that he "beat the Bard". I mean, he got dead, which to me is a pretty strong sign of losing to me. The Bard got (most of) what she wanted, which was fucking over Cat. And, right now, Cat is well and truly fucked. Unfortunately(?), Bard also got messed up, so we got a two way loss.

In some sense I would argue that Maddie won in the "Soul of Preas" game, but then got killed as collateral damage in the entirely seperate "Bard vs Cat" game... which was a game he wasn't even really involved in or playing, and just happened to be standing next to at an unfortunate time.

ohJohN

Huh, good points. I'd forgotten about Kairos's question, but that was definitely a great moment and the payoff is pretty anticlimactic (at least for now – there could be subtle or imminent consequences, or even just a more satisfying in-universe explanation). And, tangentially, with how the Name of Black Queen got permanently wrecked after Cat refused it once, it's kinda strange that Cordy gets another crack at hers, after arguably refusing even more adamantly than Cat.

With the sheer size of the Guide and it being released serially, I think this class of problems is near unavoidable. I'm constantly impressed by how many plot threads EE is able to pull from previous books and tie off satisfyingly, but like, there's a limit to how many things a single person can juggle without dropping something – especially across multiple years! I'd imagine editing passes in a more standard publishing process would make it easier to notice and fix these, but that's got its own downsides (namely, not getting multiple chapters a week).

shikkarasu

I have to disagree. Cat did not refuse Black Queen, the Name was Destroyed along with the Hellgate and the deal that she was making with Malicia. No deal, no formal recognition from the Empire: no Name. She was pissed that she was un-Named, even if she later changed her mind and thought of it as dodging a bullet.

The Black Queen's whole story was about an orphan becoming Queen by trickery and guile, very Callowan, but with an Evil twist on the classic formula. Once diplomacy was off the table she was just another rebel and lost the Story.

Cordelia was offered a Name twice in 30 seconds and told literally every God in Creation to get off her lawn. She's still in demand, but it was only when she took Augur's advice and started acting like a Queen instead of a First Prince that she started inching toward being a proper Claimant.

shikkarasu

I think we are still waiting for the other shoe to drop, here. There is going to be something wrong with the Angel weapon, but like most Artefacts it works well enough for people to become dependant on it before it hecks up its wielder. We are not in the 'well thank the Gods that nothing went wrong' part of the story, the noose is closing around Cordelia's throat and she hasn't noticed because of all her other desperation. (cough and her Namelore illiteracy cough)

It's worth noting that we have only a general idea of what has happened over the past month in universe and we also don't know the ramifications. Maybe Judgement gets free and kills all the Priests who dared shackle the corpse of an angel? That would explain why Bard didn't want the seal on Judgement as well as why DK would see this has a boon for himself. House of Light crippling itself? Yes, please.

Not saying any of this is correct -we never know what EE is up to- but I'm sure the answer existed in their notes as far back as 2016 and just needs to be written out in detail.

kinghaart

I think Bard is still around, turned off the stories to make the Ealamel seem safe to use and also required, but will turn them back on at the end once it's fully charged and use it to literally glass Calernia to wipe the board and start over. Like an emergency reset button.

She basically turned off the traffic lights, the DK is speeding and she has road blocks set up ahead... Shame the resulting collision will be explosive enough to wipe out any pedestrians the DK didn't already run over.

I think Bard is a creational law, safeguarding the Wager, and she's trying to call it in early.

Reader in the Night

I realized something about Cat's thoughts on the Book of Some Things, which led me to realize that Cat may have shot herself in the foot by succeeding too hard:

The Book should obviously go to Hanno. He's the ultimate authority on Heroic Named according to the Truce and Terms, so giving the book to anyone else would basically be undermining Hanno's authority and weakening the foundations of the Accord.

However, if he gets the Book, he gets closer to being the Warden of the West, and the Warden is a role that is responsible for both the geographical West and the Heroic stories. Only, the Truce and Terms has no provision for that, because it was designed to separate political authority and Named authority.

Except that Cat had both, so her Name formed with both, and now her counterpart's Name needs both, and neither Hanno or Cordelia can have both without running roughshod over the other's office. Basically, the very nature of the Name "Warden" fucked over the T&T.

Personally, I think the best idea would be just giving the Book over to the Oracle as a compromise option (nominally under Hanno's authority, Hasenbach's family), because the Oracle actually has the best godsdamn shot figuring out how to use the damn thing and doing it effectively to boot, but... That's probably too convenient a solution when the Hanno X Cordy fight has been set up for an entire book.

AbraKadabra

There is ONE solution to all this.
A dangerous one.
Political marriage.
Hannelia forever!

kinghaart

But poor Antigone 🙄

ninegardens

I am all for Agnes Of All Things.

Supping her up with the book would be a MASSIVE power boost... but at the same time, I wonder if she would accept it? She kind of hinted that one day she would look too deep and then not come back and...

Oh.
Ohhh....
Oh fuck.

Okay, here's a question: Kairos described the role of Bard as being a "trap" in reality- yes? (see chapter Book 5, Chapter 8 "Poison made into remedy. A trap inherent to the lay of Creation. It made, I thought, a horrifying amount of sense.") What if Bard can't give the stories to Cat without turning Cat into the Bard.

I don't know if it makes sense or checks out, but what if allowing Cat the stories would have instantly imprisoned her the same way Bard is imprisoned.

... at which point the only choice is to "destroy" all evil stories, so as to prevent this.

The good stories are preserved so as to give Cordellia and Hanno some hope of survival, and because Cat has no candidate to give The Book to, but the moment she hands over that book... I don't know, all this could be wrong (Bard did try to shunt Cat into the role last book... probably), but...

Kairos's theory about the role of bard being a trap should perhaps be a warning to Cat to not steal too much from that particular well.

Shveiran

The problem I have with this (and all the “Bard is secretly a good guy” theories) is that apparently the Bard has the power to stop stories at will.

Her having this much control over the “trap” really doesn’t sound like someone stuck in a cage.

After all, the main difference between a castle and a prison is who controls the door.

Deworld

I don’t think Bard could stop stories “at will”. She had done it as her last act of spite, only after she lost to Cat and the latter started bragging about it. Remember: Named power and capabilities is heavily dependent on the story they’re in right now, and Bard is still Named, even if she stands above others. I believe it were circumstances around her loss in Ater that allowed her to do something like this.

kinghaart

I don’t think she wanted to do that; I think she planned to have Cat killed to doom the world (via Scribe) and deleting the stories was a contingency (since she is described as being in a rage while doing it).

I don’t know that Bard is good or evil per day, she is just the show runner for the play that is the Wager. Kairos probably did it best, playing along for the most part with just a few minor tweaks to set up his own show; with himself being insane and playing HARD into stories, and Anaxares being fully mad, he basically did a Trojan Horse on the whole thing.

Frivolous

I enjoyed Indrani referring to Hanno as a twat. Delightful.

Now if only she could be persuaded to say that again in front of people not of the Woe.

I find it interesting that Hanno can still use Light even though he may not be White Knight anymore.

In contrast, Hakram lost every power granted him by the Name Adjutant during the short time he was a claimant for the Name Warlord.

This chapter reminds me a lot of Interlude: Paragons. Conflict between heroes, but different because in Interlude: Paragons, Hanno was the steady moderate, whereas here, Hanno is almost the active upstart.

Shveiran

I can't believe I'm doing this. But every time Amadeus is mentioned, it makes me actually, physically angry.

His plan for Praes has so many holes I could mistake it for a sieve, and that makes it impossible for me to buy the green-eyed, gear-brained monster angle.

In no particular order,

A – Now that military strength is concentrated, what prevents the Legions from playing kingmaker? Even if one trusts Nim, the conflict of interest is there. As soon as we have an ambitious, charismatic Black Knight in charge, the system will be overthrown.

B – The clans have one vote and the largest army besides the Legion. It won't be long before a Warlord (maybe even Hakram!) decides to grab himself a new seat and vote. As soon as that happens, the civil war will spark anew.

B2 – Even if that doesn't happen, the High Lords won't stand for Withering Foramen, so yeah, civil war is a certainty.

C – The system does nothing to address the hunger problem.

Amadeus being Chancellor could have maybe set the foundations for that, but Alaya? The Grand Alliance will not say "welcome to the table" after the war, because they have no reason to and several to do otherwise. That leaves a private treaty with Callos to regulate trade of foodstock. But Procer is starving too, and I have a hard time imagining Vivienne telling the Procerans the food they need is going east instead. Even if they manage, the problem is still there for the future Good Kings and Chancellors: as soon as relationships break down and famine strikes, Praes will invade again and the wheel will keep on turning.

In the long run, it really feels like nothing changed aside from Ater's skyline and maybe a few titles.

And I could buy that the monster lost to the man and that is plan was informed (and flawed) by love, if only I... no, sorry, buying that for a moment actually hurts.

NO ONE THAT LOVES SOMEONE ELSE WOULD DO THIS TO THEM.

Forcing your daughter to kill you, and depicting this as an act of love on your side? I can't even... that's so fucked up I'm at a loss for words. Oh, he told Catherine he's proud, didn't he? Oh, that changes it then. It's not like this will haunt her as long as she lives!

Which might not be long, considering you put her on a collision course with A) the Scribe and B) the Ranger, AKA, supposedly, two more people Amadeus loved!

MY CROWS. Bleeding-heart Amadeus ensured the outcome of his plan would be either Catherine's death OR the death of his lover and of one of his last remaining friends. Can you feel the love tonight?

And it would be ALRIGHT if this was depicted as the act of the same man that back in the Free Cities begun to plot how to kill his loved ones to ensure his legacy, but supposedly that changed when he lost his Name. If this is described as motivated by love it becomes actually grotesque. This ending retroactively turns one of the best mentor-apprentice relationships I've ever had the blessing to read into something disgusting.

That is where my biggest problems come from, but honestly, it's far from the only one.

I'm supposed to be interested about who becomes the Warden of the West, and I'm just... not. What does that matter? It's the mirror to Cat's Name, and Cat's Name has no weight whatsoever.

After two narrative years and over one Book of build-up, we get Ater. The coalescing of her Name is a gigantic failure, where she gets everything but what she wanted. Her enemies survived and are beyond her reach, and what they lost or changed is because of Hierophant or Amadeus and not Catherine; Ater either hates her guts or thinks she was repelled by Alaya or Amadeus or Akua; the high lords laughed in her face and lived to tell the tale; she lost or killed two allies (Amadeus, Scribe) and two more buckled her authority hard (Arthur, Hakram); the Black Knight certainly doesn't acknowledge her authority and even the Warlock now feels entitled to chastise her.

Does this look like Warden of the East mean anything, to you? Not to me, sorry. Catherine has been failing ever since the Arsenal; that she has enough authority now to coalesce her Name is... something I can't buy.

So yeah, Hanno and Cordelia need to be addressed. But the Name is an afterthought. It doesn't feel like it matters, because Cat's certainly doesn't.

And yes, Villain stories are on pause. But so what? This is the first instance of the WotE: if it weights this little, I doubt it can get us a grove.

Akua... I've ranted enough so I won't start over, but suffice to say I was on board with this redemption story when it was, apparently, fake, and I can't buy it for a moment now that it is supposedly real.

I really don't like seeing every villain of the story getting away with it in the end, when the story started with Catherine wishing for a sword to cut down the bastards.

I really don't like reading a story that feels more and more only about the named characters and not the unwashed masses in the background, because I was sold in the first books by the large scope of the perspective and the long term view over the issues. And I really don't like alternating between the chapters where I'm hit over the head with how dire the situation with the Dead King is, and the chapters where nearly every character can't be bother to contribute, as if this was just Catherine's, Cordelia's and Hanno's problem. Random people being egoistic and blind, that's realistic; smart characters with all the information doing as much and systematically not being called out on it, is not.

I guess what I'm trying to say – beside venting – is that I'm leaving.

This webserials meant more than I can possibly explain to me, for several troubled years.

It was a refuge, and a spark for my imagination.

It was food for thought, helping me see several things in a light I'd never considered.

And it made me feel so very invested; it moved me to tears and to exaltation, and it gave me so very many characters I love to hate.

I couldn't be more happy that I've read it.

But the current book is affecting me in an unhealthy way. And honestly, that is on me.

But even if I never thought I'd get to this point, I can't deny the writing on the wall: leaving is the only healthy thing to do.

Good luck, everyone. And thanks for everything, EE. I really mean that.

Linnus42

Yeah the Praes plot was a mess. Cause Cat basically got the deal she could have got at the start lol if she wasn't hellbent on revenge. Amadeus showed up everyone and Akua had a truncated arc. But yeah what stands out to me is none of Black's Reforms addressed the core issue with that issue being not enough arable land to feed the population. That is the root cause of a whole lot of Praesi Issues in scarcity.

medailyfun

I suppose they will "steal Callow's weather" right second time, as was foreshadowed, but I agree with you in general

agumentic

Because it's not the core issue, as Amadeus learned over the years. Praes had forty years of solid food supply, it remained a murderous shithole that distorts everything in it to the point that one of his best friends decided that wiping a city to get a superweapon is a good foreign policy. It became clear that as long as you do not destroy the Dread Empire, it doesn't matter whether they have enough food or not, they will remain the same stain on the world that either takes or is taken. So, destroy the Empire first, then what's left will have a chance to secure a food supply through better field rituals or trade or whatever.

Shveiran

If I read you correctly, you think the hunger issue was no longer a priority.

I would refer you however to the points made above about how the plan doesn't prevent civil war (B, B2) or the Legion from electing a new de-facto emperor in a couple years (High Chancellor? It worked in Germany...)

Your perspective may be valid, but I just don't see how a starving, ram-shackled collection of people biting each-other in a civil war can end up as anything but a new Dread Empire.

Abreha explained the high lords may have an interest in keeping the game going, but the high lords are no longer where the power is.

Why would an ambitious Black Knight not choose to conquer it all, or a Warlord for that matter?

A Dread Emperor by any other Name...

agumentic

If you do wish to argue instead of moving away from the story, alright.

B: First, a lot of the strength of the Clans will be in the Legions in the first place, plus a lot will be in the mercenary armies all across Calernia. Both of these would not be all for waging a war against Praes for the ambitions of one Warlord. This flows into a second point – even if the Clans were all united, they don't have the strength to win against the Legions, especially when they are backed up by the mages of the High Seats. They might have the numbers, but they lack equipment, mages and munitions, which means they would be defeated on the field even without accounting for various magic WMDs. Taking this into the account, the Clans are very unlikely to try and grab a seat through war.

B1: I am not seeing why they wouldn't accept it. And even though I am sure they are not fans of the arrangement, the High Seats also no longer have the armies to wage an offensive civil war with.

A: Nim will shape both the institute of the Legions and the Role of Black Knight in her image – very apolitical, not interested in grabbing power. Besides that, even though the High Seats no longer have armies, they are far from powerless – they have enough wealth, mages, old artefacts/contracts and such that should a Chancellor/Black Knight try to override the elections, they can force a very brutal civil war that no one would want.

But even if the combination of Nim's influence and the strength of the High Seats (and other electors, let's not forget them) fails and Praes turns into a Legion-backed dictatorship, it will still be a very different beast from the Dread Empire of old – Legion-ruled Praes means Legion's philosophies, means and approaches become the ways of new Praes – and Amadeus was the one who created all those. As Cat said in the last chapter, it is far from impossible that he considered this outcome a good one.

Shveiran

I started a discussion; I'm not going to leave until it's over. That feels kind of rude.

Regarding A and B, I don't mean to sound argumentative, but you can't have it both ways: either the High Seats are powerful enough to oppose the Legions backing a dictator, or they are weak enough that the Legions could curb-stomp them if they tried a civil war. It can't be both.

Of course, I'm not saying that the Legions couldn't be a powerful powerbloc, I'm just saying that even if there is a power invested in neutrality in a civil war, it either is strong enough to keep all others in check (and thus powerful enough to elect its own chancellor if they want) or another faction in the game of thrones that could, potentially, be cornered by a strong enough opposition.

As for the neutrality of the institution and Name of Black Knight, that is clearly Amadeus' gamble. It just sounds like a very poor gamble.

Institutions can change; Callow was occupied for twenty years, then changed everything under Cat, and now will be de-centralized by Vivienne. What the Legions will be in ten years, no one can say.

And Roles can't be curtailed like that. Alaya was the first Dread Empress of her kind, so was Amadeus for Black Knight. It doesn't matter what kind of grove Nim leaves, her successor could change course dramatically anyway.

Sure, these things could help, but it is not a guarantee even if nothing else happens; and things will happen, that's true in our world, let alone a narrative-driven one.

As for the Clans, again, is possible, but far from granted. I certainly don't think it's likely. Most orcs deciding they'd rather raid in a far-off land for money, rather than fight the neighbors they hate for the direct gain of their kin? Sure, it's possible.

The orcs in the Legions being more loyal to the Legions than their people and sticking the course in case of a conflict? Sure, it's possible.

Every Warlord choosing not to conquer, or the Name just dying out after being reborn after who knows how long? Sure, it's possible.

It's just that the chance of it all happening seems frankly slim.

agumentic

I can have it both ways because I am talking about different kinds of civil war. Without armies, High Seats can no longer easily march on Ater to climb the Tower, or suppress their political enemies by defeating them on the field, or landgrab from their neighbours. All those mundane things need mundane troops to occupy territory and take the prize without burning it down. However, if the Legions go to support a lifetime dictator, then the High Seats are suddenly in existential danger, which means all stops go off – all those ancient contracts and artefacts and rituals that every High Seat was preserving for the dark days go out in the open and they start causing massive damage, which, even if can't bring them victory, can cause untold damage. Considering that every other elector will also back the High Seats and the possibility of the Legions splintering over the betrayal of their cause, that war suddenly looks much less winnable.

Institutions can change, but let's look at what it took to change the institutions of Callow – complete defeat and decades of brutal occupation, then wartime measures that concentrated powers in the centre behind a popular dictator and still the heir of said dictator will reestablish some of the institutes of old Callow. Should an institute be properly established, the change becomes quite difficult, and the same goes for Roles. Neither Amadeus nor Alaya went against their Roles all that much – he still murdered heroes and lead Praes's military to victory, she still ruled the Dread Empire in pursuit of her ambition. The details were unusual, true, but the core was largely the same. If Nim manages to establish non-intervention in politics as the core of a new Role of the Black Knight in the new Praes, going against it would be quite difficult for any holders – not in the least because anyone likely to do so wouldn't become a Black Knight in the first place. And, in the end, "maybe things change and Amadeus's solutions become untenable" is a largely meaningless argument. Sure, it's possible, but it's possible for every solution one can offer. I don't think it's very likely to happen for this one.

I don't see the chance of it happening as slim at all. In the end, the Clans can't win against the united Praes, and it doesn't take a military genius to understand that. So why would the Warlord lead them into an unwinnable battle, and why would their supporters follow them? They now have better ways to both earn glory in battle and increase the wellbeing of their race.

Modgor

For your issue about the comparative strength of the Legions and the High Seats, I would think it goes this way :

- If one or two High Seats take arms, the Legions stomp them into the ground, so no High Seat can try a coup.
- If the Legions try something, they get in a hard civil war with ALL the High Seats, so it's not sustainable, especially in Praes, where almost all the wealth is in the cities.
- If all High Seats try something together, well, they have majority, it's actually democratic...

Zach

The argument against a civil war arising is that all the other factions in Praes will unify against any faction that tries to seize power, and that "attempting to win the election in <7 years" is far less costly than attempting to directly seize power. If any particular power decides they want to take over the country, they'll be facing recourse from all the other powers.

The Legions can't seize power themselves because they don't hold enough power to defeat all the other major Praesi powers (who have their own armies/cities – the Legions would need their cooperation for the country to continue to function) and are comprised of people from all those powers.

Also, unlike in real life, in the world of this story patterns reinforce themselves. Creating a new "pattern" for Praes will cause that pattern to preserve itself as long as they can both destroy the old pattern and maintain the new one for a while. Amadeus/Alaya attempted to do this with the Reforms, but it wasn't enough to redefine "what Praes is." Amadeus ended up coming to the realization that it's necessary to make Praes into "something that isn't the Dread Empire."

The rest of the complaints seem to be variants on "I'm mad that characters do bad things and don't get their comeuppance," which seems to be a mindset that plagues the readers of YA fiction. Amadeus is not a good person and anyone who is confused at him doing what he did had a poor grasp of the character.

Shveiran

If any particular power decides they want to take over the country, they'll be facing recourse from all the other powers.

Yes, aside from those they bribe or otherwise coerce into joining their own faction. Which is kind of how bids for the Tower worked to begin with. If you can get a majority, you have an election; if you can get a majority of the strength, you have a civil war. I'm not sure a lot changed since before, that is my point.

Regarding groves, you are right. But groves can be escaped or broken. It happened regularly in this story, and I don't see why this one will hold. Whatever happens up north, I think it's fair to say that the next century on Calernia will be very different from the one before, no?

*The rest of the complaints seem to be variants on "I'm mad that characters do bad things and don't get their comeuppance," *

Let me clarify it, then.

My problem is not that there isn't karmic justice delivered to all bad characters.

My problem is one of tone.

The number of characters that are actively orienting their choices to counter the apocalypse are not the majority. When the other characters don't call them out on it, even in their thoughts during POV chapters, creates an emotional dissonance when one reads about how the continent is ending.

This is a tone problem. It runs contrary to the theme of personal responsibility that is one of the foci of the books.

Amadeus is not a good person and anyone who is confused at him doing what he did had a poor grasp of the character.

Indeed. Which is why my problem is not with what kind of person he is.

He is being presented as a good father.

It is not the same thing, and that is the part that disgusts me. The "I love you so much I'll let you kill me" doesn't work if the father figure organizes things to ensure his daughter HAS to kill him. Then it's just a very weird suicide crafter to emotionally scar your loved one. Which is FUCKED UP but still being depicted as an act of parental love.

kinghaart

Who aside from Cat (who is obviously unfit to judge) has called Amadeus a good father?

I mean Masego liked him but Masego is maybe the only other character with as messed up a parental bond.

I get where your posts come from, but to me it reminds me a bit of the same concerns with Romeo and Julie, which when you look at it fresh is clearly a cautionary take about how young love is fickle and dangerous but has been twisted into somehow being "romantic". I don't think we can blame Shakespeare for the gross misreading of his works when frankly it's just so OBVIOUS that it's loaded with criticism not just of the wars between houses but of the shortsightedness of the protagonists. Tragedy often plays out in a way where we feel like there was thoughtless or needless waste of life or resources but that's really the essence of what Tragedy IS.

Abrakadabra

It was solved by the Conquest, and is addressed by the Dread empires death, since it won't be in constant war with everyone who could provide its people with food anymore.

Shveiran

Whyever Praesi suddenly won't war with their neighbors, exactly?

And the Conquest is... over? They can't import food from Callow, they need to trade it. Only Callow can trade food with its allies instead, and a limited stock now. The bloody Green Stretch is considering secession by this point.

If the food situation is handled, that sure is news to me.

shikkarasu

I wouldn't say handled, I agree with you there, but Callow is normally in the hands of a King or Queen with more grudges than sense. Occupational hazard. They have clearly refused to trade with Praes and/or Praes has refused to trade with them. (I'm going off of Amadeus' notes that he gave to Cat, but admittedly the finer points of Calernian Economic History are not spelled out in great detail) Otherwise there would be more food in Praes and luxuries in Callow. They may both trade with Mercantis, the 'necessary fig leaf' of international embargos, but that isn't sustainable for either party.

More than the new election, having Alaya and Vivienne willing to give each other less than highway robbery rates is what will start mending both countries. Future Chancellors may suggest returning to Conquest, but once the people see how expensive it is, and how hungry they get until the war is over, there will be riots in the streets until a new Chancellor is chosen.

Handled? No, not for another 10 years at least. Certainly not until Procer's fields start to recover from DK's blight. But I truly think it is a solid Step 1, and enough that the Conquest will become an outdated model in time.

MoreBeer

I think it's dealt with by inclusion in the alliance. The story of Praes' hunger was solved by conquest and blood. The new story can solve it with trade with more than just the Free Cities. Praes is rich after all, but few were willing to countenance trade with a nation of literal backstabbers.

Abrakadabra

Amadeus sacrificed himself because that is the bargain he struck with the gods below. He killed the stories of Praes and sacrificed himself to make the new pattern stick. There is some thing called paying attention. It is out of fashion these days, I know.

Shveiran

Sick burn. Only, we don't really know what Amadeus asked the Gods Below. And we never saw an instance of the Gods intervening directly to "make patterns stick", especially in the.

Maybe, instead of being catty, you could explain why you came to your own conclusions; the text only confirms that the Gods were involved.

Abrakadabra

What else could he have asked for? An appleuse? That was Kairos.

AbraKadabra

Anyway, the KILLING STORIES part is a pretty big thing in my view, that is almost the same thing the Wandering Bard did. Only he killed the stories of the dread empire. At least that is what he claimed.

shikkarasu

On the topic of paying attention:

"I reached for Night. Tried to stop the damage. It did nothing, as if some force was devouring the power. He had, I remembered with horror, called in his dues to Below."

We don't know what he asked for, but it seems much more narrow than 'break Evil's stories'. There was a flippant comment an update or two ago that he just said 'please let this work' and I really do think that was the meat of whatever he requested.

If you want to disagree with someone, and Crows know I've needed to be corrected countless times in these comments, please try to be respectful.

AbraKadabra

Eh. I saw literal pages of hating on this story over several chapters. Let me be a little less objective, since my respect already is lost towards such tendencious, 'everything is bad' even the way the characters are breathing hot air wasting.

shikkarasu

Yep, and you probably noticed me disagreeing with Shveiran in those threads. Politely, and with points that are grounded in the story. Lashing out at someone who is lashing out accomplishes nothing except starting a flame war.

And again, not to belabour the point, but you can't ask someone to pay attention and then make wild speculations. If your headcanon is that Amadeus asked for the stories to break? Cool. I won't begrudge anyone their personal take. If you want to tell someone else that it is clearly what happened? Prove it.

Based on the text he asked that no-one be able to save his life to put Catherine in a corner. His reflexes might have been part of that, or might have been from being a Claimant. Killing the stories? That is pure Bard and I'll want proof otherwise.

AbraKadabra

I could quote the relevant lines for you, but Why bother... You know I am right whether you admit it or not. And matters to me not that much Anyway, so I just end it here.

ninegardens

"And I could buy that the monster lost to the man and that is plan was informed (and flawed) by love, if only I... no, sorry, buying that for a moment actually hurts."

His last act was an act of love... for Alaya. He knew it wasn't a loving act towards Cat. He knew it would hurt her. He simply viewed it as the only way to keep both Alaya and Cat alive, a sacrifice worthy of the goal. Honestly, I don't even think he gave a damn about Cat's name bullshit at the time, he was purely going with "How do I force Cat's hand to preserve Alaya's life".

>>"Catherine has been failing ever since the Arsenal; that she has enough authority now to coalesce her Name is... something I can't buy."

This is... actually a really good point actually. I hadn't thought about it that way. And, in some sense part of it was because throughout the entire book so far, I've been running on the assumption that Cat losing "authority" was THE POINT – and not in a bad way. I was reading it as her being an enabling name, building up Hakram, building up Akua, building up Arthur, and all the rest of it. I was reading the story as being a story of Cat realizing that she has no authority here, and isn't supposed to. With Maddie and Akua and Hakram, the actually people of Preas being the ones to choose their own story. And that was a story I was so down for. I was okay with Cat losing, because I thought that that was the lesson we were aiming for.

Hmmmmmm..... Thinks thinks thinks...

>>"I guess what I'm trying to say – beside venting – is that I'm leaving"

Oop. 😞

Sorry to hear that? But also glad that you are doing good things for your health. Take care, stay well, hopefully you find more things to read in the future.

Gabe Meadow

I think that's rather the point though. Cat – fueled by revenge and Name-obsession to beat the Bard – missed the emerging story, the indications that it would have been better to let Praes decide for itself.

Basically, she literally defied the meta-story of the arc, where she should have lost and acknowledged a lack of authority. Instead, she won, but paid a high cost for doing so. That's it's all so messy.

kinghaart

Yep she climbed her own tower and forgot why. She is definitely having control issues not unlike Alaya did.

Tuvarkz

Honestly, Rogue Sorcerer should be Warden. He knows about magic and politics, keeps a composed demeanor, and is simultaneously 100% Good and willing to deal with those on the Evil side.

Mental Mouse

But he's not driven to "take care of everybody", and neither his current Name nor his actions feature that level of leadership.

Sinestere

As Cat has a history of joining in matrimony opposing forces, as she did with the Fairy Court, one would think she would join these two in a shotgun wedding. The fact they might privately hate each other would only add to the sacrifice they would both be making "for the good of the East". I can't remember if she has forced any other marriages to make this a pattern of three. Either way, it would unite the East and resolve a lot of political issues. Being familiar with nobility, both of them would see the benefits even as they might just unite in resenting Cat as she stands over the union ceremony. Cordelia and Hanno, Lady and Lord of the East.

ISiejek

I like the not so subtle reference in this chapter that the grey pilgrim was just straight up the most ruthless fucker in this entire story, hell if ever there was a hero that should've been a villain

kinghaart

I don't know if he is strictly more ruthless than Amadeus or say Saint, but yeah he's a good study of how Good and Evil can become indistinguishable at the extremes.

WuseMajor

"A foreigner, a growing political foe and one Named to boot. It was like some malicious deity had cobbled together a mess whose very nature was bound to make Cordelia Hasenbach see red."

Bard very much did that on purpose, yes. Glad you're paying attention.

kinghaart

I thought this too though I also like the idea that is really creational laws doing all of this, and Bard is sentient but not fully in control of how her nature interacts with stories.

Tom

> "He's been pulling miracles out of his ass left and right, you mean," Archer bluntly said.

Great mental imagery

I vote Akua for Warden of the West

KiltedBastich

OK, so this is sort of random, but Cat's comment about her menses stopping got me thinking. If becoming a Named Villains stops a woman's menses, how did Captain have children? It's rather directly related. No menses, no ovulation, no children. Seems like a plot hole to me.

Darkening

In much the same way that a named's appearance is a matter of self image, I imagine that sort of thing is related to intention and desire. If a named wants kids, it's very likely they'll resume being fertile, whereas if they don't, like cat very very much does not, then their body won't bother with it.

john

Same way Named can burn poisons out of their own bloodstream but also still voluntary get drunk.

setrein setrein a0814cc162 https://wakelet.com/wake/HQbx5Qzse_I32YqVuYEup

GoodGirlJW

I really hope Catherine and Akua become a couple at some point before the end of the series. 😞

Chapter 30: Salute

"It is tempting to think of history as a tide, for it excuses our being swept by it. I cannot agree to such defeatism, and so instead I will claim that history is a rope. It may be pulled the other way, despite the labour of your life, but that is never a reason not to try."

– Extract from the prisoner's memoirs of Princess Eliza of Salamans

Some dark, petty part of me enjoyed that the war had finally reached Salia.

The First Prince had rustled up a proper welcome for us, cheering crowds and soldiers in shining armour, but it was like painting over a cracked wall. The impressive numbers that'd turned up were not enough to hide that the streets beyond them were deserted, that people barred their doors and closed their windows. Fear had finally reached the capital of the mightiest realm on Calernia and it was making its people hunch. Huddle in like a child awaiting a blow. I allowed the vicious little twist of satisfaction to linger a while before chasing it away. I had not forgotten the Tenth Crusade, but these days Procer was probably my closest ally. Creation liked its little ironies.

I smiled and waved as we rode down the broad avenue, a company of knights around us. A fourth banner had been added to the three that were customary – mine, Vivienne's and the Order of Broken Bells – as my heiress had formally founded her Order of the Stolen Crown and ordered its banner sown. I rather liked the look of the heraldry – a golden crown clasped by a white hand, set on Fairfax blue – as it contrasted nicely to my own silver-on-black as well as the Broken Bells' bronze-on-black. The Order of the Broken Bells had been my creature, forged out of rebellion and the compromise of traitors, and so it bore my marks. My shadow.

Let the Stolen Crown take after their mistress' instead, sharing the same gold as her Summer sun resting on the same Fairfax blue. Let them be to her what Brandon Talbot and his unflinching knights had been to me: a sword and a shield, my will made into a thousand thundering hooves.

"Huh," Vivienne murmured. "Would you look at that? She came out personally."

I abandoned the almost maudlin thoughts and returned to the here and now, following the Princess' gaze down the avenue and to a grand plaza. My brow cocked. As Vivienne had said, Cordelia Hasenbach had come to bid me welcome in person. She was astride a horse of her own, one of those great chargers Lycaonese were fond of, and dressed as regally as if she intended to hold court here in the streets. She'd chosen a sweeping gown in dark blue, her riot of golden curls going down her back and held back only by a circlet of white gold, but it was the ermine-bordered cloak over it all that drew the eye. It was almost entirely cloth of gold, bright in the noonday sun.

Clever, that cloak. It drew attention to her height and straight back while hiding away the squareness of her shoulders. I'd never considered the First Prince to be particularly beautiful, but she'd certainly mastered dressing to her advantage better than anyone I'd ever met.

"A beautiful cloak," Akua Sahelian mused. "Yet chosen, I think, more to contrast the other being worn than to add lustre to her hair."

When the Doom of Liesse had returned to stand among my council this morning and I had not cast her out, none had spoken a word of it. Vivienne made it a point to rarely speak to her directly and never offer more than frosty hostility, but this once she let out a small noise of agreement. I could see why. Taking in the party that inevitably followed someone of Cordelia Hasenbach's rank should they go anywhere in public, I saw more than just the expected assembly of nobles and generals. There were Named, too, and only one of them wore a cloak.

Hanno's suit of plate was simple but beautifully made, the work of his Bitter Blacksmith, and the cloak pale as driven snow that he wore over it only added to the elegant austerity of him. His dark hair was cut even shorter than usual, little more than stubble, but it suited his plain and honest face well. With the sword belted at his hip and the ease of his carry, he looked like a warrior-king of the old breed. I could easily understand why people had come to call him Prince White. A man like that would have drawn a following even if he'd not whelped miracle after miracle in the defence of Procer as Hanno of Arwad very much had.

I could not help but note that while there were two people just behind the First Prince – dear Frederic of the pretty curls and skilled hands was one, so the solemn man whose helmet was painted with a red crown had to be Prince Otto of Bremen – the Sword of Judgement was not one of them. He'd been left in the general party, a dozen feet behind.

"By rank, he should be standing at her side," I murmured. "He's a high officer of the Grand Alliance."

"What Grand Alliance?" Vivienne asked. "Procer is divided and dying, the Dominion is far and spent. This coalition lives or dies on our say. If it does not offend you, Catherine, what can anyone do about it?"

I grimaced. Razin and Aquiline were further back in our column, leading their company of riders, so at least there'd been no risk of them hearing that. It wasn't that the Levantines had taken that many casualties, since practically speaking Procer alone had lost more soldiers in the first year of the war than the Dominion had fielded throughout it. It was more that, unlike my Army of Callow and the wealthy principalities of Procer, the Levantines had not reinforced the forces they sent north. It was a large army by their standards, involving most of their trained warriors, and if Cordelia hadn't begun feeding them and paying for their equipment halfway through the war they would never have been able to afford fielding it this long.

Lacking reinforcements and grounds to recruit, their losses had accumulated even as their fund ran out. The end of the Isbili dynasty had only worsened their internal issues, according to the Jacks – who had stolen Proceran spy reports, since we had no eyes that far south – since even though they'd essentially been figureheads they'd still been a stabilizing influence. Now the Dominion of Levant lacked a reason to be anything more than a pack of squabbling petty kingdoms and it was only the First Prince's intervention that'd both prevented civil war and kept some manner of commerce going on even as tensions rose. While it was underselling the Dominion to call it spent, in my opinion, Vivienne wasn't exactly wrong either.

With every battle they had less strength to bring to bear, and there was no realistic way that trend could be turned around.

"That is the very reason such a pretty trick will fail," Akua idly said. "When the order of things collapses, what does a man like the Sword of Judgement care for traps of courtesy?"

Her words turned out to be prophecy. I spurred on my horse, my knights parting for me, and Cordelia broke away from her two companions in the same gesture. So did Hanno, riding past a glaring Prince Otto and blank-faced Prince Frederic to catch up to Cordelia as she approached me. I rather admired that the First Prince's face betrayed not a hint of her feelings, though I'd bet rubies to piglets that she was coldly angry. The people in the cheering crowd, shouting her name and mine and Hanno's, they wouldn't realize what had just happened. The nobles would, though, and they'd also see that there was nothing Cordelia could do about it. Some would instead choose to take from the sight that Hanno was rude and gasping beyond his rank, but this wasn't peace time.

Like Akua said, courtesy mattered a lot less when the world was ending.

"Your Majesty," the First Prince greeted me, a warm smile on her face. "Salia is brightened for your return."

Her voice carried, all the more since the crowd had been made to settle since she'd begun riding forward. I'd never actually seen Cordelia have a genuine warm smile about anything, certainly not one that wide, so it always amused me to see how she used their like to play up our rapport in public. It helped her keep her princes in line, though, so I didn't particularly mind.

"Your Most Serene Highness," I replied in Chantant, smiling back and pitching my voice to carry as well. "I return with good tidings: Praes is settled, and now joins us in war against Keter!"

There was some surprise, but soon after the crowd began roaring in approval. Ah, the times we lived in. Who would ever have thought that a mob in the streets of Salia would ever shout themselves hoarse celebrating Praesi? Not me, and I'd lived a stranger life than most. Under cover of the shouts I nodded my greetings to Hanno, who had been waiting for us to finish tolerantly.

"Lord White," I said. "I hear you helped General Abigail pull the Third Army out safely. My thanks for that."

"Your Majesty," Hanno replied, offering a nod. "I could not have held Hainaut had she not been the anvil to my hammer. It's me who thanks you for lending such a sharp sword to our efforts."

His own friendly smile was not fake in the slightest, I thought. He was not the sort of man to feign amity where it was not. I offered him a quirk of the lips, but little more. We had yet to reconcile from the aftermath of the Arsenal, the odd friendship we'd once had long in disrepair. I had sworn an oath to Tariq to mend that bridge, but I had to be careful of how I did. A misstep here in Salia could have grave consequences. With the first round of greetings done the ceremony could proceed and it began in earnest. Under the eyes and cheers of the crowd the great nobles and commanders in Salia greeted the ones I had brought, Razin and Aquiline reunited with their fellow lord and lady of the Blood for the first time in over a year.

It was all very civil and friendly – I winked at Frederic when he caught my gaze, getting a roguish grin in answer – and every inch of it had been put together so the sight of us would reassure the people of Salia that the world was not ending. It very much was, of course, but considering that with the amount of refugees we'd seen camped outside the capital had likely swelled to entail a million souls the last thing we needed was a panic. However deserved it might be. The procession continued on together, showing off how friendly and allied we all were, until we began to approach the Lineal and its bevy of palaces. There we parted ways, though not before Hasenbach took me aside for a short talk.

"I have had word from the dwarves," she told me.

My fingers tightened.

"About time," I angrily bit out.

The anger was not directed at her. It was the Kingdom Under that'd been taking its time, its representatives insisting that the Grand Alliance's request for talks was not within their mandate to arrange. While it was true that in principle the half-dozen dwarves were there only to negotiate sales of arms and the granting of loans, in practice they'd been ambassadors of the King Under the Mountain. Vivienne and I suspected they'd been putting us off because they were waiting for the result of some military push they'd made underground, while Cordelia had instead suggested internal divisions.

"Indeed," Cordelia tightly said. "Though they now act swiftly. This morning I was granted an audience with a formal emissary at noon tomorrow."

I frowned.

"They knew I was arriving," I noted.

"Most likely," the First Prince agreed. "Naturally, I would request your presence."

"Naturally," I echoed with a smile. "I'll dust off my courtesies in preparation, then. We doing this with a full Grand Alliance roster or appointed representatives?"

"Lady Itima and Lord Yannu have agreed that representatives would simply the talks," she said. "It will hold, unless the other half of the Blood disagrees."

"They won't," I said.

The lordlings trusted me enough to speak for the Grand Alliance, at least, though no doubt the Dominion would want a seat at the table the moment things began to get formalized. The First Prince nodded. There was a short moment of silence.

"You have, I think, grasped the lay of our troubles from that scene at the greeting," Cordelia finally said.

"I had something of an idea even before," I neutrally replied.

"Perhaps we ought to have tea tomorrow evening, then," the First Prince lightly said. "It has been too long since we talked."

It'd been like a week, actually, but I got her drift. She wanted an opportunity to speak a little more freely in private, and she wanted it as soon as possible.

"It better not be that horrible bitter stuff you love," I warned. "I've drunk actual poison that tasted better."

She smiled the smile of someone who was going to thoroughly enjoy trying to bully me into drinking it again.

"Of course, Your Majesty," Cordelia Hasenbach smiled.

Lying, like a goddamned liar.

—

It was not unexpected that I'd get visitors not long after settling into the palace, but to be honest I'd expected it to be either officers from the Third Army or Procerans. Instead I was genuinely surprised when a servant announced the name of my first visitor: Secretary Nestor Ikaroi of Delos. Considering that as far as I knew the League of Free Cities did not yet have a formal presence in the city, I hadn't anticipated anyone from there calling on me. Last I'd heard, the armies of the League had just begun to reach northern Iserre. I'd always liked the old man, though, and since I had no reason to turn him away I had him brought to me.

I'd been granted this palace as my lodgings every time I visited Salia and Vivienne had used it in my absence, so I had a place in mind to receive him. It wasn't actually one of the dozen salons that infested this place, a winter palace meant to accommodate large balls, but rather one of the smaller rooms adjoining the great ballroom. See, all these fine Proceran folk come here for dancing and debauchery liked a drink. It was only natural there'd be a bar in one of the side rooms, where a wild spread of wines and liquors could be asked for. The place wasn't fully stocked, since Cordelia had been cutting costs everywhere, but it had enough left to make it worthwhile.

Besides, there was something pleasantly familiar about standing behind the counter with the drinks.

Nestor Ikaroi was announced by a Proceran crier and allowed in by legionaries, giving me my first look at the man in quite a while. His hair was striking: long and pure white, it was kept in a ponytail going down his back. The pureness of the colour contrasted with his wrinkled skin, which had the look of old leather, and made his blue eyes stand out. On each cheek he bore two tattooed stripes, one blue and one black. The old man was a Secretary, as high as one could rise in the ranks of the Secretariat. There were only ten askretis of that rank in all of Delos and he was said to be the oldest. He looked, I thought, rather vigorous. Like the war had spared him, unlike the rest of us.

"Secretary Nestor," I said, leaning against the counter.
"Welcome."

"Queen Catherine," he replied, bowing low. "It is a pleasure to be in your presence once more."

I waved that away, but I was smiling. His genuine friendliness had long kept him my favourite of the high-ranking League diplomats.

"Can I offer you a drink?" I asked. "There's a bit of everything in here."

"All the more luxurious," the old man said amusedly, "for having a queen pouring them. Is it perhaps true, as your subjects claim, that you once ran a tavern in Laure?"

I scoffed. Ran a tavern? I'd been much too young and poor to own anything but the clothes on my back and the coin I'd saved up for the War College.

"I asked first," I said.

"Are you perhaps familiar with isitos?" he asked.

"Heard of it," I said. "Fig liquor, usually cut with water and leaves of mint."

"The custom in Delos is to use a quarter orange instead of the lime," he replied, "but either way would be fine."

I went looking and though there were lemons there did not appear to be limes. There was mint, however, and two bottles of isitos. I presented them to the old man, who without hesitation chose the smaller one. From Penthes, he told me, which for all its many sins made excellent liquor. I made two tall cups of it, one for each of us, and handed him his own.

"I was a waitress, at a place called the Rat's Nest," I told him. "The first roof I ever owned was when Malicia granted me Marchford as my demesne."

Blue eyes brightened. Nestor Ikaroi has close ties to the scholars of Delos' famous libraries, particularly those whose duty was to chronicle the history of Calernia as accurately as possible. Their histories were said to be the finest of the continent bar none. As a result, rather like a magpie the old man tended to be delighted whenever I tossed a few details about either my life or my campaigns his way. He sipped at the drink and smiled, praising it, and I tried it myself. It was actually pretty decent, I thought. Not smooth in the slightest, the burn was still felt in the throat, but the water and mint eased the taste of liquor. I could almost taste the figs.

Some idle talk was had, but I was a busy woman and he knew it. Soon enough he got to the reason he'd come here.

"I was instructed by Empress Basilia to approach you in private," Secretary Nestor frankly said. "With the assent of the League."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"That sounds like foreign politics," I said. "Which are the sole province of the Hierarch."

The Republic would be furious if they learned Anaxares the Diplomat was being circumvented. Not that, as far as I knew, they were ever not furious.

"Ah," the white-haired man smiled, "but this is a different matter. On the behalf of the Protector of the League, I am approaching an ally to discuss a common enterprise."

Meaning they'd finally found a way to work around the absence of the Hierarch that wouldn't send Bellerophon on the warpath and damage the foundations of the League. Basilia, as Protector, was charged with the defence of the League of Free Cities. Anything that could be made to fit under that aegis was fair game, even if it meant walking a very narrow line with the powers of the officer of Hierarch.

"That's a lot of power you're giving a hereditary office," I noted.

He smiled like an old, patient shark.

"Should she overstep, a majority vote is all that is required to declare a matter under the jurisdiction of the Hierarch," Secretary Nestor said.

Ah, so that was how they were going to keep her in line. The League wasn't a kingdom like Callow, its laws didn't really care for precedent. If a king was allowed a power in Callow once, it pretty much became a power of the royal house unless civil war pried it out of their grasp. In the League, though, all that was needed was enough of the cities agreeing a right did not exist for it not to. No doubt common ground was already being found behind closed doors between cities worried by Empress Basilia's ascendancy. It'd be a struggle to the death, I thought, until either the office of Protector was reduced to a ceremonial title or the opposing cities were slowly stripped of their independence.

It was also, at least for now, not my fucking problem. For once.

"That'll get interesting," I said, meaning it. "I'm all ears, Secretary. What can I do for my friends in the League?"

"Given your understanding of the powers and prerogatives of the Hierarch," he said, "you will understand, I think, that it is not possible for the League to sign onto the Liesse Accords."

"Not at present, yes," I said, frowning.

It'd count as foreign policy, so only their long-lost madman could actually put a quill to parchment to bring the League into the fold.

"That is an unfortunate situation, given that Empress Basilia is an ardent partisan of the Accords and many of us share her opinion," Secretary Nestor said.

I almost smirked. Say what you would about Basilia Katopodis, but she'd not forgotten who had backed her when she'd gone off to campaign around the Free Cities. I'd been her patroness and while my leverage had weakened with her rise to prominence she had not cast aside her old debts. She'd back me for the Accords and the war on Keter, which had been what I wanted most from her.

"I do not have a reputation for patience, I know," I said, "but you would be surprised."

The old man bowed.

"Yet we would offer a gesture of goodwill within our means," he said. "The members of the League, save for Bellerophon which is still putting the matter to vote, have adopted laws of the same text."

I hummed, reluctantly impressed. That was certainly an alternative. It'd lack the teeth of the actual Accords, of course, which laid down provisions for its enforcers to be able to hunt Named breaking the terms across the territory of all signatory nations, but it would still be a great step forward. Neither villainy nor heroism would be allowed to be made illegal and there would be limitations on the use of both diabolism and angel-calling. I was, I decided, being courted. Or my goodwill was, anyway. Which meant the League was now going to ask me for a favour.

"A greatly appreciated gesture," I said. "It shows adherence to the spirit of the Accords, which is perhaps even more meaningful than ink on parchment. Though it seems it my friends from the south helping me, instead of the other way around."

I ended that on a smile, thin as it was. Nestor Ikaroi took my hint that I'd like to see the bill for the goods now and did not dance around, which I appreciated.

"While the League is committed to ending the threat of the Dead King," the old man said, "concerns have been raised about the feasibility of such a deed."

I sipped at my drink.

"I won't pretend it will be easy," I said. "You know better. But I wouldn't be leading my armies into the storm if I did not believe victory possible."

If it came to that, if all was lost and Calernia beyond reclaiming, I'd hole up behind the Whitecaps as long as possible while building a fleet to lead an exodus across the Tyrian Sea.

"The concern," he delicately said, "is not of a military nature. It is our understanding that you have mustered great armies in the east and brought back the greatest sorcerers of Praes."

I nodded, frowning.

"It is a political concern, then," I said.

"Swiftly tires the horse with two riders," Secretary Nestor quoted.

I kept my face calm. Yeah, perhaps it'd been too much to hope that the League wouldn't have noticed the tensions rising at the heart of the Grand Alliance. Now they were wary of bringing their armies in what was beginning to have the shape of a schism just as the Dead King began devouring the Principate. That was, I grimly admitted, a fair concern to have.

"A temporary state of affairs," I said.

"We share the opinion," he said. "I am simply charged to express the Empress' curiosity."

"About?"

"Who you believe will be sitting the saddle," the old man said.

Gods. That was what the entire reason he'd come here today, wasn't it? They wanted to know who I'd back, if it came down to it. The First Prince of the Sword of Judgement.

"That's not for me to decide," I said.

A pause.

"May I be frank, Queen Catherine?" Secretary Nestor said.

I waved him on.

"While you show wisdom in not standing too close to the flame," he said, "it is an undeniable truth that it is not possible for either to rise with, if not your support, then at least your tacit approval. Your influence is too deeply entrenched."

And he wasn't wrong. I'd done it on purpose, too. Being the representative for Below under the Truce and Terms, standing as Queen of Callow and First Under the Night. Warden of the East, now. I'd accrued so much authority that, while I might not be able to make the choice of who rose to command Good for the end of the war on Keter, I would be able to refuse that choice and very possibly make it stick. I'd seen this as a conflict between Cordelia and Hanno, but in the eyes of everyone else I was just as much of a danger. If I refuse to work with whoever won and took my armies home, it would not be a stretch to say that the war was lost. And trying to approach either of them might be seen as a foreign nation back a horse, so I'm actually safer for the League to talk to. Ikaroi was not, I realized, the last envoy who would approach me over this. There would be others, and beyond all the courtesies and the flattery all of them would be addressing me using the same title: kingmaker.

I sipped at my drink, hiding my dismay. I'd wanted to keep my distance as much as was possible, but it was now clear to me there would be costs to that. Would the League keep supporting the war if Procer seemed about to tear itself apart again and I was unwilling to step in? That Nestor Ikaroi was here at all spoke to hesitation. He was not so much invested in my answer as in my having an answer: someone I'd back, a designated winner. That was what Basilia and the League really wanted, the assurance that this would not get messy. Who long before Praes asked the same, or the Clans? I set the drink down.

"It has not come to that," I finally said. "Nor will it. I intend to mediate."

"Of course," Secretary Nestor said, politely unconvinced. "Yet, I must ask, should mediation fail. If a choice must be made?"

I clenched my fingers, unclenched them. It was playing with fire to get too deeply involved. But I wasn't sure it was an option not to.

Necessity, as always, was queen.

"If it comes to that," I quietly said, "I will let you know who's to sit the saddle."

Anomandris

Let you what, Cat? "know"? "decide"? "choose"? "lick"?

I have to know!!!

Liliet

I think it's "know", since that's the least committing option.

edrey

lick, the mental picture of that....you dont need to know

lsdf

Lick, of course. The secretariat must have the flavor of the Warden of the West for their histories.

Flameburst

Gods below, I can just imagine the secretariat ranking world leaders by taste...

Mental Mouse

That sounds more like a greenskin standard of diplomacy.

MrRigger

The Secretariat is desperate to record some of their only direct and official knowledge of orc governance, and it's a ranking list of how good various orc enemies taste. All the breeds of Praesi, Callowans, Deoraithe, Procerans, Free City Leaguers, Fae, etc.

Bruh

Number 15, Dead King's foot tastes like lettuce

jamesc9

Number 16, the Dead King's hand tastes like chalk.

SaveOurSquirrels

"Be"????!?????

*Daniel E
Miles*

Neither. Abigail for warden!

Linus42

Setup. Though I am not sure why Nestor would think Cat would tip her hand on the matter.
The Dwarves are finally going to do something about time lol.

Though I am not sure the analysis holds, I am not sure active support is good for Cordelia (makes her look like a puppet) but it might be the only way she can win quite frankly. Whereas tacit support alone (as in Cat will stay out of the way) probably carries the day for Hanno. Do we know the consequences if Cat breaks her Oath to Tariq? I assume it be bad in normal times but with story-lines paused for Villains ...though a death Oath might transcend normal story limits. Good luck on mediation Cat.

If it comes down to a fight though I don't think that is a win route for Cordelia. If Frederic the best you got. Well this is man who wouldn't even kill the Red Axe after she tried to murder him so if it comes down to a fight that is not a Horse I bet on. Maybe her cousin can weave a route through for her. But I don't see a way Cordelia wins a combat situation.

Anomamdriis

Have Hanno mate with Cordy – declare the unborn child new Warden....easy peasy...Hell, throw in Cat in the process for good measure.

Though that brings a question – do Names work on babies or kids? I am thinking something like a prophecy which clearly applies to a specific child to born – would said child have a name from conception?

Reader in the Night

Pretty sure Captain was born as The Cursed, so I think yes, you can be born with a Name.

Mental Mouse

The more serious problem is that the Warden title has never been even close to hereditary, so the Name certainly shouldn't be.

kinghaart

Though it's a Proceran Name and even though First Prince isn't hereditary, regular Prince titles definitely are. So there's SOME precedent.

Biggest issue is they need a WotW like, yesterday.

Liliet

I think Cat won't want to break the word she gave to Tariq for non-supernatural-consequences reasons. Every choice one makes defines who they are as a person, and Cat has been cognizant of that wrt herself for a while now.

I think the point might not have been to ACTUALLY get Cat's opinion here, but to signal that they would like to hear it and, ah, put themselves in line on who gets to know. Besides, for all they know Cat's already decided and wants to inform everyone who'll ask. No downside to asking, all in all.

Did Frederic every say no to holding the blade to kill Red Axe? He refused to file a complaint about her, but he never said no to being an executioner – he was never asked I believe.

Linnus42

Its defacto I don't think he can swing the axe to execute her if he doesn't bring charges in the first place. He have a lack of standing.

nimelennar

"Though I am not sure why Nestor would think Cat would tip her hand on the matter."

I don't think it's tipping her hand they want: "He was not so much invested in my answer as in my having an answer: someone I'd back, a designated winner. That was what Basilia and the League really wanted, the assurance that this would not get messy."

This wasn't about learning who the winner will be, IMO; this was about making sure she was ready and willing to intercede, one way or the other.

shikkarasu

Greetings your Majesty, lovely bar. We were looking forward to joining you in Grand Enterprise -fast friends, us- but just wanted to inquire, a trifle really, as to whether there is, in fact, a plan?

In the works? Yes! Of course, we don't want to rush these things. Takes time, plans. But, erm, without putting too fine a point on it, you do plan (heh) to share the plan? After due consideration? Please?

Liliet

Blessed and accurate.

Zach

As mentioned in this chapter, Catherine is essentially a kingmaker here and can, if not outright decide the winner, at least prevent one side from winning if she wants.

So there will never be a direct White Knight vs Cordelia fight. Catherine (and allies) will be involved if it comes to that.

I'm genuinely curious how this situation will be resolved. I'd normally assume that Cordelia ends up with Catherine's support and ends up winning in the end, but it's hard to imagine that Catherine doesn't manage to reconcile with Hanno in some way (since she pledged to Tariq that she would do so and I just don't see a situation where he becomes 100% antagonistic and is killed or something).

Linnus42

Sure my point is more this. Cordelia is going to need far more active help to win this clash than Hanno is. Cat is going to have to invest capital to get Cordelia over the line whereas if she stays out of the way then Hanno is going to cruise.

Liliet

SO PRIVATE TALKS WITH CORDELIA AND HANNO NOW PLEASE

AND THEN A PRIVATE TALK WITH ALL THREE OF THEM IN THE SAME ROOM, FEATURING A ROLLED UP NEWSPAPER

Anomandris

Rolled up newspaper? Thats what the kids are calling it these days?

Liliet

Insanenoodlyguy

I forget you also come from homestuck sometimes. God how the mighty fell there.

Liliet

Honestly, the mass fandom freakouts were kind of fun to eat popcorn to.

The vriskourse, not so much.

DC

Bad Dog. Worst Enemy.

Insanenoodlyguy

A few more details. The room needs to have a bed, scented candles, and Akua in the corner playing a saxophone. It's time to settle this the fun way.

The newspaper should still be there though.

shikkarasu

Hellgods, but the irony of former Praesi nobility playing Careless Whispers.

Miles

Should have known better than to leave my friend.
These guilty thoughts have got no rhythm.
Now I'm never gonna scheme again, unless I scheme with youuuu boo hoo

Liliet

Yes.

tithin

““If it comes to that,” I quietly said, “I will let you who is to sit the saddle.”” seems to be a word missing here

Mental Mouse

“Sit the saddle” is perhaps a bit archaic, but valid phrasing.
And especially apropos for a “saddle” that’s pretty close to being a throne.

irritantseraphim

Nah, the word that is missing is behind “I will let you ...”.

A “know” or something is missing there.

nimelennar

Maybe not. “Let” can also mean “Lease” or “Loan” (e.g. “Room for Let”).

So, maybe Cat is saying that she will allow Nestor to borrow the Warden of the West. For a fee, of course.

Sir Nil

Welp, crabs in a bucket once again.

Sir Nil

I’ll have to admit there must be a sick sorta of irony for Cat to now hold the power of deciding which crab gets to escape the bucket.

Jay

Awww the missing word in the last sentence really matters. Is it “I will let you know who is to sit the saddle.”

Or

“I will let you decide who is to sit the saddle.”

edrey

now i want the hierach madness and force elections, just for the laughs of it.

erebus42

He's not the most exciting or influential character in regards to the story's plot but I must admit I've always quite liked Secretary Nestor.

letouriste

An old learned man with wisdom, keen understanding of social cues, no real arrogance seen and knowing more about history than anyone in the books? One open to entertain anyone to get to know more about...anything?

Yeah i love him too

ohJohN

I want a chapter that's just him desperately trying to squeeze any nugget of drow history out of Rumena, who is characteristically obtuse about it.

Ethan Lavene

"If it comes to that," I quietly said, "I will let you [—] who is to sit the saddle."

Missing word here.

Kiara

I don't know how many Salia chapters I can go without the Hakram conversation...like this was gold, but under appreciated because I can't handle the tension of Cat continuing to avoid this convo.

letouriste

Given prior similar situations (killian,vivienne), it will take a while

letouriste

And i personally can't wait to see Abigail report after so long 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Speaking of her, Abigail should be the Warden of the West. Just because.

shimizubad

It's Callowans all the way down

nimelennar

"She smiled the smile of someone who was going to thoroughly enjoy trying to bully me into drinking it again."

Well, I guess Cordy is about to make Cat's decision for her. One sip, and then she'll put her backing for the Name behind Hanno.

I mean, there may APPEAR to be more important considerations, like leadership qualities, political reputation, combat abilities, but what is any of that next to the integrity of one's tea?

Liliet

God, Catdelia friendship. Of course it looks like this, and it's the utter fucking best.

ohJohN

Put them in a room with Akua and Indrani and you risk it collapsing into a singularity of pettiness.

Liliet

To be fair, Cordelia would be distracted by, ah. Watching.

Juff

Typo Thread:

banner banner > banner banner sown > banner sewn entirely cloth of gold (strange wording) fund ran out > funds ran out simply the talks," (missing word) folk come here > folk that came here Ikaroi has > Ikaroi had seems it my > seems like my refuse to work > refused to work back a horse > backing a horse
Who long > How long you who > you who (missing word)

pirateddesigns

"simply" should be "simplify", I believe.

Reader in the Night

Really, at this point, I think it almost doesn't matter who Cat picks, as long as she picks quickly? Dragging out this matter and letting people see the internal divisions only hurts everybody, so just pick one, tell the other one that they can settle this between themselves after the War is done, and get to work. I don't think either Hanno or Cordelia would actually pull their support at this point if Cat picked the other one.

Reader in the Night

Huh. I guess the decision ends up being of how much absolute control she wants to have over the push at Keter: At this point, it is almost guaranteed that whoever gets the Name of Warden gets the Book, and the heroic stories are basically their only weapon against Keter at this point.

If Cat gave the Book and command over one of the most powerful and complicated Names in the continent to Cordelia, who is a complete story virgin, it is almost certain that Cat herself would be the one dictating the plays.

Cordy is smart enough to know when to delegate, and she wouldn't go to Hanno for counsel because they hate each other's guts, basically ensuring Cat has even more unlimited authority.

On the other hand, if she actually wants her opposite number to be capable of helping her when shit hits the fan, then the answer is Hanno, 100%. Hanno is probably the greatest living expert on heroic stories, even more than Cat who only ever subverts them or hijacks them on occasion.

Snappy270

Surely that's the auger so most knowledgeable hero of stories. Who I would pick as she helps Cordy and Hanno respects her abilities.

Bad@games

We need to remember that heroes have access to the axioms I hope they make an actual physical appearance as a book.

Liliet

The problem is, the best solution is for them to reconcile somehow, with Cat's pushing or without. Cat ordering one of them to withdraw their claim, while she can do that, is an inferior outcome immediately.

Xinci

The obvious solution here is for Hanno to become the Arbiter since he actually has a extremely broad understanding of various cultures laws and their precedents. Then let Cordy be the Warden of the East and make some laws with his aid.

stevenneiman

Should that say "let you decide?" The last sentence is unclear.

Earl of Purple

How did Cat wink at Frederic when she has one eye? Named bullshit?

Mental Mouse

Deniably. 😏

Bad@games

She had zeze put an illusion of a eye on her. Or she kept her promise and took his other one already julienbrightside

Or Indrani painted one on the eyepatch.

shikkarasu

I feel that she has enough sass in her minuscule frame to wink without having eyes in the first place. Like how the Dead King grins evilly with a bare skull, or Masego glares at people through the back of his own head. A lifetime of practise let's one's signature expression transcend the traditionally required facial features.

Bad@games

All im saying is that after what cat called him fredrics name should change to the King-Finger Prince

Alex

> I'd never considered the First Prince to be particularly beautiful Really now? I'm pretty sure Cat was was caught looking at Cordelia with too much interest before. =)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

No one has ever accused her of having stringently high standards, it must be said.

Liliet

That specific phrase is also something Cat used to say about Indrani, so really, if anything, it's a tell.

Insanenoodlyguy

Remember this girl stares at Akua all the damn time, who cannonly only loses to Malicia as far as looks go. But just cause it's not that pretty doesn't mean Cat wouldn't hit it.

Miles

Cat ogles pretty much everyone, all the time. Akua called her out on it at some point.

Vetrom

Just waiting for Cat to bop Hanno AND Cord and make Arthur do it. (... or Abigail! Ha ha ha ha!)

Rey d`Tutto

Barrow, Bradley, an Napoleon all agree, "Amateurs discuss Tactics, Professionals discuss Logistics."
Cordy-Cat.

kinghaart

Not for this chapter, but it just hit me... Amadeus rescued Alaya from a Tower. Where she was prisoner (to the Name, "will devour whole a liar, aka Alaya, and we all know that characters who are devoured whole can be saved sometimes by cutting open the beast). Some real chutzpah to ride a heroic story there... :0

On this chapter, one big question is whether the WoTW Name will make either Cordy or Hanno do something dumb with the Ealamel. Cordelia is kind of on path for that. But Hanno might destroy it to try and get Judgement back which could be even worse...

Liliet

Amadeus has been Alaya's white knight from the start.

kinghaart

And the Tower was his fire breathing dragon.

Which does make me wonder where that one draconic general ended up... If we have Titans joining the final push, will we get to see them talk to and make alliance with their foes of yore?

Insanenoodlyguy

I mean from what we've seen of the dragon, they can probably just tell him "you conquered your enemies of old sir, now they fight for you." And he'd probably just figur "yeah that tracks."

shikkarasu

General Catastrophe also had the highest density of necromancers in her Legion, on account of killing so many of her own legionaries and needing to raise them from the dead to remain an effective fighting force.

I feel she would be very valuable right about now.

Insanenoodlyguy

I mean from what we've seen of the dragon, they can probably just tell him "you conquered your enemies of old sir, now they fight for you." And he'd probably just figur "yeah that tracks."

DC

Every time someone praises Abigail the Fox's military ingenuity I have to hold back a laugh.

Combined with the DK victory contingency plan, I am now imagining a future where Cat is forced to evacuate Calernia and Abigail's contingent is cut off and presumed dead...then they return years later in a reclamation effort, and she's just still holed up somewhere and has somehow managed to keep a pocket of the continent running despite literally everywhere else being overrun with the dead. Probably because both her own attempts to flee overseas run into hilariously improbable setbacks and not even the Dead King's attempts to stamp her out can undershoot her relentless pessimism.

An army attacking from literally every direction at once, with fliers blotting out the sky, tunnelling undead collapsing the ground as they advance, the biggest land army in Calernia's history and a new breed of zombie specialised for emerging from the ocean at her back? Well they're not attacking out of the Twilight Ways too so that's better than we expected, really. Plus there's only one hellgate, and Dread Empress Triumphant isn't even emerging from it!

I'm also interested in that we haven't gotten her POV for a while. I wonder how she's feeling about the whole situation now.

(On a completely unrelated note, I have a soft spot for the idea that Triumphant turns up at some pivotal moment and saves the day, whether intentionally or not, perhaps by attacking the Serenity or something, then disappears again...and "may she never return" gets changed to "may she ever return")

KiltedBastich

So, random thought unrelated to this chapter, what did Cat do with the undead city-sized spider? Seems that might be handy for the assault on Keter. Undead Kaiju battle, anyone?

Miles

Zombie the and first.

Kept in the stables until the right moment, when Cat finishes going through 8-11

Theo Allen baptista

So, the end begins.

Chapter 31: Premises

“Thirty: while it is a viable tactic to swing using a chandelier or a rope, it is significantly less viable to wear armour when doing so.”

– “Two Hundred Heroic Axioms”, author unknown

You couldn’t use the usual sort of table when entertaining dwarves, not unless you wanted to offend them by stacking cushions on a chair.

The First Prince was a graceful host and unlikely to be the first of her office to have received envoys of the Kingdom Under, so the neat little salon where we were seated did not make that elementary mistake. Over a floor of warm-coloured wood, thick and plush Arlesite rugs had been thrown for us to sit on. Even with my legs folded – I’d drunk a brew to take the edge off my bad leg – I wasn’t all that uncomfortable, and the low table we were both seated at was a work of art. Intricately carved and painted, it depicted the making of Creation as described in Proceran texts. The scenes spiralled inwards, ending in the moment where the Gods had taken their rest.

Unlike the people of the Principate, Callowans put no real stock in Arianna Galadon’s ‘Truths of the Shore’. Which she hadn’t even written herself, anyhow, as they were a collection of her teachings written down by her followers. Callow’s own House of Light was the oldest on Calernia the way most people saw it, with only the priests of Atalante having a legitimate claim otherwise, so my people tended to dismiss anything come out of Procer as empty posturing. I largely shared that opinion, even though many of Galadon's teachings had been sensible, but for all that skepticism I would not deny that some of the hymns written down in the book were quite beautiful.

The painted depiction on the table did them justice, not that the two dwarves seated across from us seemed to care in the slightest.

I could tell because I'd met the pair of them before. The Herald of the Deeps remained the tallest of his kind I had ever met, at least an inch over five feet and bare of armour. He yet wore the same dark green – so deep it was nearly black – colour I had always seen him in, but his clothing had grown more elaborate. I could see five different layers to the folded cloth, one almost like a tunic at the bottom while the others crisscrossed over each other at different angles and cuts. I could not quite tell where it began or ended. His beard and eyes matched the cloth, unlike the braided dark hair, and looked like strands of green set in a craggy face whose skin was as hide. In the light of the day, his eyes were unsettling large.

It was the lack of iris, I thought, it made them look even larger than they were. Owl-like.

The lieutenant seated half a foot behind and to his left hadn't changed in the slightest, though. The deed-seeker I knew as Balasi still had so many skulls hanging off him that I could hardly see the armour beneath them. Some taken, some earned, all trophies to raise his rank. His hair and beard were yet blond, though the elaborate thick tattoo – I'd once thought it face paint, but now saw otherwise – looked different in daylight. It depicted a Horned Lord's head and fangs, the ink still black but looking iridescent when sunlight hit it at the right angle.

I'd learned they would be the envoys within half an hour of Cordelia learning it, this very morning, which had been long enough to share what little I knew about the pair before the talks were had. The Herald of the Deeps, whose name was Sargon, had been the leader of the dwarven expansion into Everdark in both a religious and military sense. He definitely had enough pull to talk for the entire Kingdom Under, since he had when striking a deal with Sve Noc through me, but there were limits to his influence. I'd long suspected he had volunteered to lead the Fourteenth Expansion in part to get away from internal enemies, heading out to the fringes where there'd be no rival.

Unfortunately for us, that was very little to go on. The politics of the Kingdom Under were not so much opaque as fucking invisible to the nations above. We heard of it when they were making war against other underground nations – though with the drow exodus, there were now none left – and they visibly kept an eye on affairs near dwarven gates, but no one had eyes below the ground. We didn't even know if there was truly a King Under the Mountain, whether it was a ceremonial title or one of genuine authority. Even the span of their empire was mostly speculation, with only the wildest of guesses made at their total population.

What we did know was that the Kingdom Under fully mobilized would almost definitely win a war against even a fully united coalition of surface nations. When my father had once called it the only nation of Calernia that was more than a regional power, he'd not exaggerating. Even Triumphant had been satisfied by token gestures of submission and promises of tribute when she'd been conquering Calernia. When it came down to it, if we wanted to have a real shot at beating Keter we needed the dwarves. Their armies, yes, but even more importantly their supplies.

The only way it would be possible for an army the size of the one needed to take Keter to be fed was through their tunnels, and to be honest they were probably the only nation capable of moving that much food so quickly anyway. We wanted their soldiers badly, since they had creations up their sleeves that made goblin work look like children's toys and the heaviest foot this continent had ever known, but the supplies were even more important. We could possibly win without the help of their armies. Without a deal for supplies, though, our only choice would be storming the walls of the Crown of the Dead repeatedly until our food ran out. Formalized suicide, in other words.

So we needed the Kingdom Under and they knew it. The question that remained was, what would they ask in exchange for their help? That was the question on my mind and Hasenbach's as the Herald set down the cup of Merovins golden wine he'd been served. There was exactly one vineyard in all the world where that wine was made, the same one where most of the ancient rulers of Salia was buried. The handful of bottles it made every year were worth a small castle each, and by custom only drunk by royalty.

I actually thought it tasted kind of sour, but it would have been impolitic to say as much.

"A rare drink," the Herald of the Deeps said.

In Chantant. Mine had gotten good enough I was comfortable even in talks like this, and theirs was better than their Lower Miezan. It always startled me to remember that Chantant wasn't the First Prince's native tongue either. Lycaonese spoke Reitz. Mind you, as a princess she'd probably been taught the language as a child anyway. I'd been my own mistake to start picking up languages so late in my life.

"Bettered for the company it was poured in," Cordelia Hasenbach replied with a distant but friendly smile.

I put my elbow on the table and rested my chin against my palm. Hopefully we'd stop with the courtesies soon, I felt like we were all more than ready. Balasi must have agreed.

"It is our understanding the Grand Alliance has been seeking to come to terms with us," the Seeker of Deeds said.

"The Grand Alliance desires to negotiate several arrangements," Cordelia smiling corrected, "regarding the war prosecuted against our common enemy, the Dead King."

Balasi was unimpressed.

"We see little war," he said, "and much retreat."

"We've done a lot of dying, it's true," I said. "Tasteless of you to complain, Seeker Balasi, since it will have bought your people time to make your move below."

The dwarf turned to match my eye, but I stared him down. My face was blank as a mask. After a moment his jaw tightened and he looked away.

"We have achieved much these last few years," the Herald said. "Absent conflict in the Everdark, the Fifteenth Expansion began early and colonization has begun. After a thousand years of trials, the great encirclement is finally finished."

I breathed in sharply.

"You've surrounded the Kingdom of the Dead entirely," I said.

He looked pleased, green eyes wide.

"The fortresses still lack cities, but the circle was closed," the Herald of the Deeps said. "Seven rings of stone and steel now contain the Dead King and his works."

Fuck. That was bad news. Part of why the Kingdom Under had been selling us cheap weapons by the wagonload and keeping the Firstborn fed had been that we were useful to them: by drawing the Dead King's armies to them, we allowed them to expand and fortify around him uncontested. Only my calculation had been that they'd not finish the encirclement this generation, not when their current expansion – the Fourteenth – was aimed at the Everdark. I'd badly miscalculated how capable they would be of taking advantage of Sve Noc ceding their old territories. And now, with their circle of rings of steel in stone standing, they were coming to speak to us again.

Having significantly less use for our continued survival.

"If I were to ask," Cordelia mildly said, "when the last fortress was finally raised, I imagine it would be a recent day indeed."

"Eight days," Seeker Balasi said.

Yeah, the First Prince had seen it to. They'd put us off until they were sure their defensive position was solid underground, and now they were coming to talk when they had the upper hand. Hells, more than the upper hand. As far as they were concerned they had all the fucking hands, and they weren't entirely wrong either.

"What a strange happenstance," Cordelia said. "I must congratulate our ally on the swift completion of its defensive works."

"All is possible in the service of the King Under the Mountain," Balasi replied.

"Indeed?" she said. "How pleasing to hear, as we mean to discuss a bargain regarding the sale and movement of supplies."

"You want us to feed your desperate offensive against the Crown of the Dead," the Herald said, voice even. "Without coin to pay for it, even as your empire falls apart around you. A bold request. Some would call it insolent."

"Nah," I smiled, wide and without mirth. "Insolence would be offering meat to the butcher and then whining it got chopped, Herald. Surely that's beneath everyone here."

Cordelia's shoulders tightened at my side, but she did not try to intervene. She trusted me to back off if I pushed too far.

"The efforts of the Grand Alliance in fighting our enemy are remembered," the Herald finally said. "Yet much is demanded while little is offered."

"If payment is the trouble, then there is no trouble," the First Prince said. "Though the Principate may lack the immediate means to pay and I cannot speak for our allies, we are willing to sign a treaty of repayment and even give you access to our books so that an agreeable number of years can be found."

"That is-" Seeker Balasi began, but she cut him off.

"Which leads me to believe, Your Eminence, that it is not coin the Kingdom Under wants of us," Cordelia Hasenbach continued, staring down the Herald.

It my turn to tense. I could feel the Herald of the Deeps through my Name. Only dimly, and I could not trace out the manner of stories that were his bread and butter, but what I could tell was that he leaned Above's way. Not that I was certain I would have authority over him even if it were otherwise. His Name felt... strange to me, as if it was made of crystal instead of the usual starlight. Either way, even if he was one of Above's that did not meant he was not dangerous. When the Fourteenth Expansion had been planned, the dwarves had thought they'd end up needing to kill Sve Noc.

And they'd sent the Herald of the Deeps without another Named, which meant they had thought he had a genuine shot at killing a pair of goddesses.

Power like that married to the dwarven contempt for other races was for an unpleasant interlocutor to deal with. The green-eyed dwarf studied the First Prince for a long moment, then snorted.

"It is so," the Herald said.

This time when Balasi spoke up, Cordelia did not interrupt. There was no reason to, since she'd already made her point: the deed-seeker might be subordinate to the Herald, but she was not subordinate to me. She spoke for the Grand Alliance just as much as I did, if not more. Sargon did not seem convinced, but he'd seemingly not wanted to argue the point either.

"There are no guarantees that the attack on Keter will end in victory," Balasi said. "Or that nations signing treaties now will survive the coming decades. A considerable expense would be undertaken on uncertain grounds. The Kingdom Under requires more practical and immediate payment."

Whether they actually thought Procer would splinter even if we won or if they were just pushing I couldn't be sure, but I honestly couldn't argue with the uncertainty there. The Principate had lost massive amounts of farmlands and been depopulated in a way that'd shift around where its traditional centres of power had been. It might very well blow up even if we did beat the Dead King.

"And what might its nature be?" Cordelia calmly asked.

"Creusens," Seeker Balasi said. "Holden. Penthes."

I'd been a long time since someone had surprise me so utterly I could not even begin to think of an answer. They were serious, weren't they? The Kingdom Under was asking for cities. Creusens, the capital of the principality of the same name out in western Procer. Penthes, to the very east of the League and already near a known dwarven gate. And Holden, the seat of the former barony of Holden. A city in Callow. My fucking city. After it sunk in, it was not surprise that held my tongue. It was the certainty that if I began if I opened my mouth, I would say things and it would only end when there were corpses on the floor.

"You require that we cede three cities," the First Prince said with admirable calm. "One of which is, I might remind you, not from a nation signatory to the Grand Alliance or in our power to deliver."

"Yes," Balasi replied without batting an eye. "We will provide formal terms, but I can give you the essentials before then."

"Please do," Cordelia smiled, hate cold in her eyes.

"The cities and attendant lands will be ceded to Kingdom Under and annexed to the territory of the nobles ruling below them," the deed-seeker said. "Their inhabitants may stay as sworn subjects or leave. There will be no restriction of goods coming in or out."

My eye narrowed. It wasn't even a loose protectorate like Refuge or a close relationship like with Mercantis they were aiming for. These were permanent footholds for them on the surface. It occurred to me, suddenly, that the Kingdom Under might be thinking further on than any of us. Should the Dead King be destroyed, would it not be the master of all the underground? It would take generations to settle it all, I thought, but in time they would. And when they did, where else was there to go but up? My fingers clenched.

"A straightforward affair," the First Prince said. "We thank you for bringing the offer."

Balasi looked like he might have wanted to stay and talk more, but the Herald's eyes had found my own. Whatever he found there convinced him not to linger. They briskly made their goodbyes and were ushered out. It left the two of us seated together. My fingers closed around my cup of wine.

"Do you have any particular attachment to the cup?" I calmly asked.

She shook her head. I smashed it against the table, crushing crystal and spilling gold on the painted wood. I would have torn the fucking table apart too, but it wasn't the furniture that was responsible for the rage in my belly.

"Those fucking rats," I coldly said. "I ought to have ripped their goddamned heads off."

"For the better you did not," Cordelia noted. "It would have taken them at least a sennight to replace the envoys."

The petty act of destruction had brought just enough satisfaction that I mastered myself. I breathed in and out, pushing down the anger. It wouldn't help me here.

"They can't believe we'll accept that," I said. "That the League would accept that."

"I imagine they believe we will refuse them at first," the First Prince said. "And then we will lose another third of Procer as well as a few armies and return to them appropriately chastened. Time is on their side, Catherine. The longer the Dead King devours us, the longer they have to prepare their defences against him."

"He's also getting stronger," I curtly pointed out.

"It does not matter," Cordelia tiredly said. "They are calculating, accurately so, that we will bend to their terms long before Keter becomes beyond them. I imagine they will offer to send troops as well in exchange for a fourth city, either Bayeux or Vaccei."

Eastern Procer, right up against the Whitecaps, or the northernmost city of Levant. A loose line across Calernia, allowing them to trade for what they wanted without any possibility of a common front to check them emerging between the powers of the surface. Fuck.

"I cannot accept that bargain," I honestly told her.

There was a long moment of silence.

"We have not yet seen the full terms," Cordelia finally said. "They have promised to provide them promptly and I see no reason to disbelieve them. Let us not speak of this blindly or in the throes of anger. We are meeting for tea tonight, it can be seen to then."

I jerkily nodded. She wasn't wrong that angry as I was there'd be no point in actually discussing anything. We parted ways soon after, and I had to put a spring to my limp.

I'd gotten a lunch invitation.

—

I got ambushed.

Didn't almost get shot this time, it wasn't the assassin kind of ambush, but I didn't see it coming either and I should have. When I was invited to have my midday with Razin and Aquiline, I'd expected that a couple of their captains would be there but no more. We'd had similar enough meals on campaign, they bringing their officers and me mine, and I'd thought it a nice gesture of the lordlings to do the same even here in Salia. A sign of continued fondness even now that they were no longer under my direct command. Instead, just past Noon Bell, I found myself seated with the full roster of the ruling Blood and two Bestowed.

My ducklings I knew well enough by sight. Lord Razin Tanja of the Binder's Blood, dark-haired and sharp-faced with the last touches of youth to his cast burning as he turned into the man he wanted to be. Lady Aquiline Osen of the Slayer's Blood, every inch of skin painted in green and bronze as she moved with the grace of an exceptional killer. The other two I knew less, but of the pair it was Lord Yannu Marave of the Champion's Blood I was more familiar with. Careful Yannu, they called that mountain of broad-shoulder muscles. At least in his forties, and his unnatural calm put truth to the sobriquet. Lady Itima Ifriqui of the Brigand's Blood was the last, oldest and lean and whip-harsh. She and her sons were a cunning and vicious bunch.

That left only two. The Barrow Sword, Ishaq, who stood not much taller than me but much broader. His dark and well-groomed beard was as much a signature as the two streaks of ash-grey beneath the eyes that were his face paint or the ancient bronze scale he'd robbed from a barrow along with the sword that had seen him Named. And a woman I still hated like poison, for she had killed Captain: the Valiant Champion, Rafaella. Tanned skin, like all the others, and with a braid of brown hair going down her back. She had the face of someone who smiled often and easy, like Ishaq she was a picture of classic Alavan good looks: short, stocky and built like a brick wall.

The lordlings were the ones hosting, so they were the ones to greet me and offer hospitality – which was probably the only reason a fire was lit in the hall. Like the Taghreb equivalent, Levantine guest right was heavily bound to the symbolism of sharing a fire. The serious, formulaic greeting that Razin and Aquiline had offered petered out into silence as I kept standing and did not answer. Tension rose, then I sighed. I raised a finger, telling them to wait, and went fishing through the pocket of my cloak until I had my pipe in hand. I smoothly stuffed it, passing a palm over the wakeleaf to light it. I breathed in deep, the acrid smoke burning my lungs pleasurably, and blew out.

"All right," I finally said. "Lay it on me."

A moment of silence.

"Can I offer you a drink?" Aquiline tried.

I flicked a glance at the Valiant Champion.

"No."

It would be a cold day in Levant before I drank with that one. The lot of them was seated on the other side of the long table, and I drew back my chair with an eye to scraping the wood against the floor to make as much of that horrible noise as possible. Whatever their intentions might be, I'd make it clear that springing this on me by surprise was not putting me in the finest of moods. Dropping into the seat, deadwood staff leaning against the side, I leaned back and blew out a puff of smoke.

"Lords and ladies of the Blood," I mildly said. "Ishaq. The rest. It appears this is a larger gathering than it'd been implied to me I would be showing up for. Should I have put on a crown?"

Lord Yannu shook his head.

"It is not as Queen of Callow that your presence was sought sought," the Lord of Alava said.

They wouldn't care about my being First Under the Night either, so that left only one hat. I rolled my shoulder and smiled. Night came to me, the power sluggish and slow in the day but never entirely beyond reach. The room cooled, its shadows deepened.

"Then standing courtesy for the Warden of the East," I calmly told him. "Is 'Your Excellency'."

His eyes met mine, but I'd chided harder men than Careful Yannu. He conceded with a nod.

"Good," I cheerfully said. "Now what can I do for you fine fellows?"

Eyes flicked to the left end of the table, where the Barrow Sword sat. Opposite of the Champion.

"I asked for your arbitration, Your Excellency," Ishaq said. "The Dominion has agreed to entertain my demand for my deeds to be added to the Rolls, but I have some... concerns. As my representative under the Truce and Terms and a trusted mediator, you are uniquely suited to help."

I cocked an eyebrow. The one on my dead eye, though sadly the people here were all too hardened to be moved by anything like that.

"It would be pointless for me to accept the role if all parties involved don't agree I should hold it," I said, an unspoken invitation.

"Malaga endorses your presence," Razin said.

"So does Tartessos," Aquiline dismissed, as if it had been a given.

My gaze moved to the right side of the table. Lord Yannu inclined his head.

"You have always dealt in good faith with us," the Lord of Alava said. "Alava agrees."

Itima Ifriqui, to his right, sucked at her teeth. The Brigand's Blood were known for their viciousness and dislike of foreigners, though ironically enough Lady Itima was Cordelia's closest ally in the Dominion. There was no love between us, though, and if a no was going to come it'd be from there.

"You carried the Peregrine back to us," the Lady of Vaccei said. "Honour was earned. Vaccei agrees."

And that left only one. Rafaella of Alava, the Valiant Champion. The woman holding the same Name as one of the legendary founders of the Dominion, what they called an inheritance in Bestowal – as opposed to the inheritance of Blood, which all here carried as descendants of those same heroes. The rare few who inherited both Blood and Bestowal were raised above all others by Levantines. Tariq had been the last, and of the greatest of the lines of the Blood too. The Valiant Champion was, in principle, Lady Rafaella yet I'd never heard the title granted to. I'd never heard of her being close to Yannu, the lord of that Blood, either and I could not recall ever seeing her wear face paint.

That did not speak to influence, I thought, but with Levantines you never knew.

"The White Knight should here be," the Champion said.

Not a trace of a smile to be found on that face.

"That was not the question asked," Lord Yannu said. "Answer, Lady Rafaella."

The broad-faced woman grimaced.

"Not my placement to argue," she said after a moment.

And that was that. Only she wasn't exactly wrong, I thought. If I was here as representative for the villains, then it would be proper for Hanno to be here for the heroes. That he was not was... interesting. And worrying in some ways. Ishaq wouldn't have the pull for that. I'd thrown him at the lordlings repeatedly during the Wasteland campaign, forcing them to work closely together and share dangers, but while relations there had definitely thawed there were limits. Asking to toss out the Sword of Judgement on his behalf would be crossing those, which meant it was coming from somewhere else. More interesting yet, wherever it had come from enough of the Blood had agreed that it'd actually happened.

We'd all missed some undercurrents in the Dominion.

"Then we are in agreement," Razin said. "And the talks can begin."

He offered me a nod, ceding control of the proceedings. If Procerans had done that I would have hesitated, but Dominion ways were refreshingly blunt. So long as I wasn't too rude, I didn't have to worry about fucking up some kind of obscure point of etiquette.

"Barrow Sword," I said. "You made a demand of the Blood. State it fully and without deception."

Ishaq's face was calm, but his eyes kept flicking to the others. It was telling. He doesn't know how this ends, I thought.

"I ask for my deeds to be added to the Rolls," the Barrow Sword said. "For my honour to be seen as honour in the eyes of others."

Except it wasn't that simple, of course. Sure in theory all he was asking for was to be recognized, but in practice he was asking the Dominion to make him a noble. Not a high-ranking one, more a landed knight than a duke or even a baron, but still very much a noble still. And, there was the pinch, while openly keeping faith to Below. There wasn't a way for him to be on the Rolls and not a noble without the Majilis, the ruling council of Levant, to change the laws of the land. And there was not a way to change those without violating the Liesse Accords, which forbade nations going after villains simply for being villains.

"When this matter was last brought to me, in Hainaut, it was decided that a record of the Barrow Sword's deeds in Hainaut would be sent to the Blood for consideration," I said. "Was this done and was it read?"

Nods all around. Good.

"Now," I said, "before we continue, I require classification. In the absence of a Holy Seljun, are the people in this room – the four sitting members of the Majilis – able to settle this matter lawfully?"

"They are," Aquiline said. "There may be challenge-duels, but our decision will be as law."

"Good," I said. "Then we can continue. The Barrow Sword's request has been aired. Which of you would answer it?"

Some glances were traded, then Lord Yannu spoke up.

"Worthy deeds were done, this is not denied," the Lord of Alava said. "Lord Razin and Lady Aquiline speak to yet more honour being earned out east."

Ah, so that very blunt ploy had paid off.

"Yet it remains that you do not keep to the Ashen Gods," he said, "and no man or woman was ever added to the Rolls who kept to the darkness."

I cleared my throat.

"On what basis would you deny him addition to the Rolls, if he has done worthy deeds?" I asked.

That would be where this conversation would make or break, because the Liesse Accords only gave so much give there. If they dug in their heels and said worship of Below was the problem, then this was going to get nasty. Yannu glanced to his left, passing the torch.

"To be Blood is to be more than simply Bestowed," Aquiline said, straight-backed.

I knew that look on her face, I thought. She meant every word of this.

"It is a burden and a blessing, a duty to the Dominion," the Lady of Tartessos. "Through the Founders we inherited the charge of protecting Levant from all that would see it destroyed, and though lesser lines have since sprung they too took up that duty."

A very idealistic way of looking at it, I thought. Mostly Levantine Named stabbed each other, went adventuring in the Brocelian and sometimes joined bands of five wandering the greater continent. When a villain became very famous some of them might try to go and claim their head, as a few had tried with my father after the Conquest, but that was not frequent. Aquiline, though, put a lot of stock in both blood and Blood. She was known as being pretty cutthroat in Levantine politics and supposedly had once almost gotten Razin killed, but that didn't mean she wasn't an idealist in some ways. On the contrary, it meant she was the most dangerous kind: the one with a fucking sword.

Ishaq was visibly itching to talk and the other side had been doing so for a while, so I gesture towards him.

"I have warred in the defence of all Calernia, and done so ably," he said. "What is this, if not protecting Levant?"

It was Razin who spoke up this time, a good sign for the Barrow Sword. Razin was a lot more sentimental than his fiancée, he kept strongly to friendship when it was given. Aquiline was colder, but that wasn't always the right choice. Razin was better at making allies for a reason.

"This question was asked of us, of the Majilis," Lord Razin Tanja said, "and we had no answer. In shunning the Ashen Gods, did you become less a son of Levant? We cannot know your heart, and so cannot speak to that. There is only you deeds to behold, and they speak in favour."

I cocked my head to the side. It sounded like they were going to agree to add him to the Rolls, but they weren't actually going to do that. It would be a deeply unpopular decision back home and they'd need to allow the same of every villain who came after Ishaq. People who were likely to be a lot less reasonable and controlled than the Barrow Sword was. So what was the workaround?

"There is a lack," Razin said. "Yet it lies not in you, Barrow Sword. It lies in those whose lesser deeds filled pages in the Rolls without ever living up to the charge they inherited. We have lessened what we are for not asking more of those who would stand high among us."

Ah, I fondly thought. I underestimated you, Razin Tanja. Not just you but your fellows as well. I thought you lot would either bend or break, but you found a way out of it that gives him his dues without breaking what you are.

"No longer will the Rolls be open to all of the Blood, all who are Bestowed," Razin said. "Only to the worthy, those who prove willing to take up the charge that raises us above others."

"You would make access to the Rolls conditional," I said. "Am I to understand this would be for all of both Blood and Bestowed?"

"It is so," Lord Yannu calmly replied. "It was once the duty of the Isbili to keep the Rolls, but the Isbili are ash. It is the duty of the Majilis now, and so this is our decree: all who would enter the Rolls are to stand before the Majilis and ask for a duty to discharge for the good of all Levant. Only when that duty is fulfilled will one be added to the Rolls."

The four of them and their descendants were going to send all those hotheaded killers, Named and not, to go on glorious adventures. And those that returned, that proved worthy and capable of protecting the Dominion's interests, those few would get to be nobles. They'd not lowered the bar to become one of them, they'd raised it for everyone. Including their own families, so Ishaq had no leg to stand on if he wanted to object. Sure the children from the great families could inherit rule of their territory without being added to the Rolls, the matters weren't legally bound, but if the choice of succession was between someone in those and someone who wasn't?

Yeah, that decision would make itself for most Levantines.

"Do you propose to set such a duty for the Barrow Sword now?" I asked.

"We do," Aquiline said. "And request your arbitration in doing so, that the charge might be fairly chosen."

Meaning they didn't want to get accused of asking something impossible of him so he'd get killed and they wouldn't have to add him to the Rolls. Fair enough. There was one detail here that might come back to haunt them though.

"You set a precedent in doing so," I warned them. "Those who follow in my wake, bearing my Name, might claim the same right of arbitration I was granted today."

Meaning someone unlikely to be a Levantine might get a say in their affairs, which they were unlikely to like. None of the Blood seemed particularly eager at that, but Ishaq wanted a word.

"I believe in the good faith of all here," he said, "but I won't extend that trust to all those who'll come after you. The Warden spoke it like a warning, but I say it is instead a promise: should those who come in my wake be cheated, they will have someone to appeal to."

Ah, cleverly done. If the Warden of the East could be appealed to, it implied I wasn't in the room when the duties were given. Which, to be fair, I would not want to be and my successors were likely to feel the same. Levante wasn't where I wanted to spend the rest of my days. No, instead villains would be able to complain to me if they thought the Majilis were being unreasonable. Which was fair, and difficult for the Blood to argue with. They discussed among themselves, but I was given a reluctant agreement. Which took us to the last part of it. Itima Ifriqui broke her silence to offer the first duty that might get the Barrow Sword onto the Rolls.

"Avenge the Grey Pilgrim," the Lady of Vaccei said. "Slay the Dead King."

I almost rolled my eye.

"That sets too high a standard for those who come after him," I said. "Who could match such a deed? It is not reasonable."

The older woman didn't look entirely displeased, though. I wondered what it was she'd actually been after. Was she softening me up for another ask, or had she just tried her luck at making it pretty much impossible for anyone to ever be added to the Rolls again? Razin suggested killing a Revenant, but it was considered too easy by the others. Aquiline instead suggested that one of the Scourge be slain, and that resonated with the others. It was, Yannu noted, not dissimilar to asking the slaying of a champion from a nation the Dominion was at war with. Honestly I thought it was a little costly, and unlikely to be matched by most who'd follow Ishaq, but he pulled me close.

"I would agree to the terms," he murmured.

I raised an eyebrow.

"Could lower them, I think," I told him.

"I am to be the first, Black Queen," Ishaq smiled, showing teeth. "The honour I earn must be beyond question. I break the path for those who come after."

I studied him, making sure he was certain, and when I was satisfied I drew back. It'd do.

"These are good terms," I said. "I have no objection to them."

Good humour all around, save for the Valiant Champion who had been seated at the right end of the table and not spoken a word all this time.

"Though I am pleased with what was done here," I idly said, "is there a particular reason the matter had to be brought to me this way?"

Rafaella laughed, a harsh bark.

"Fool," the Champion said. "You help them, you be part of it. Now you have to make Hanno and Grand Alliance accept it for them."

Shit, I thought. I always hated it, when someone I despised was right.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Linnus42

We are building the setup, I guess next for Cat is that meeting with Cordelia? Or does she have time for one more meeting... On the actual chapter, Hmm interesting this just makes Cat's job harder.

I am not sure how Cat really extracts much of anything from Hanno. She needs a whole lot of favors (especially given Cordelia's weak position) and she wants Cordelia as Warden of the West. What is she offering in the exchange to Hanno that he give a crap about?

Also I be surprised if Barrow did much against DK, his narrative relevance is lacking. Barrow is lucky Hanno turned down his offer to duel though that could have ended his chance at this a long time ago.

As for the Dwarves they might be the next big threat. I wonder how the Giants or Elves making moves would impact their decisionmaking. Interesting DK has not bothered to attack them but I suppose he is not worried if they are mostly in a holding pattern. Also once again Cat and Cordelia not willing to make the major sacrifices while wanting others to do so. I don't think three or four cities is all that high of cost in the face of extinction.

I do like Champ being much smarter then she lets on its a nice though. Funny enough Indrani and Rafaela seem pretty similar. And Cat is still salty I see. I should state again for the record her father opened those hostilities not the other way around. But Cat is a hypocrite so nothing new there.

dadycool

It's not so much that they're not willing to sacrifice three or four cities, it's that each of those cities belong to a different nation/federation, so the cost isn't actually on just them. Not only that, but those cities are a way for the Dwarves to finally have actual territory on the surface, granted to them willingly by the surface-dwellers. If they give up those cities, they're gone forever.

They're not attached to the buildings or locations, they're attached to the "Dwarves belong beneath the earth" concept, which is at this point the only thing keeping them from ripping everything out of the ground and saying "Everything belongs to us now!"

Zggt

> Also once again Cat and Cordelia not willing to make the major sacrifices while wanting others to do so.

I don't know if you've been following the story, but Cat specifically has always been asked to make painful sacrifices, from as early as the first book, and has always done so when required. Cordelia, once the Crusade failed, has been making sacrifice after sacrifice in order to do the best she can for her people. We're talking major ones; friends and family, self-respect, hopes and dreams, and their / the nations / the people's own future.

There isn't much left to sacrifice anymore – they've already sacrificed nearly everything they can in order to survive, which is why something like "conquer a human nation to fork it over once the war is over" is so horrible. The Dwarves have basically been sitting back and profiting from these sacrifices, and if they give in to this, then what future exactly are they offering their people? Serfdom to the Dwarves in all but name?

> And Cat is still salty I see

The Valiant Champion is wearing the skin of her cool aunt. What is wrong with you?

Liliet

Well, she hasn't been wearing it since apparently the first time Cat met her. Went over it at the start of Book 6.

But yes.

shikkarasu

Yeah, Cat gets to be salty until Rafella has no longer killed her aunt. Since time travel is beyond even most Named I feel that is unlikely to happen. Like how Malicia is still on Cat's s list for Ratface and the others who died on the Night of Knives.

I maintain that Rafella is no worse than Sabah was, just on a different side, but that doesn't make Sabah less dead, or Catherine grieve any less.

Linnus42

No worse? Sabah was massacring civies lol. Raf has never done that to our knowledge. Not equivalent at all.

shikkarasu

I didn't say they were equal equal, I said Raf is not worse than Sabah. I am 100% agreeing with you on that. My point is that, as Cat said herself, it always hurts more when it is your own loss. It always feels more real.

Sabah was a monster, not because of the Curse, but because of her actions as a Calamity, but that doesn't make her death any less tragic for her family, Catherine included.

(Although, now that you mention it, Raf did insist that the Book of All Things permits drinking the blood of your enemies. "...maybe not in lame Free Cities version..." That might have been her trolling, it's hard to tell, but if she was serious then the conversation gets slightly murky.)

Liliet

Yep, agreed.

I HOPE that Cat starts acting otherwise, but like, she 100% GETS to not.

Raf is a treasure and I love her, but Catherine is under no obligation to see any further than the skin cloak.

Sinead

"Hey while you all fight for your survival, just give us a few cities so that we can further manipulate all of you because you are all a bunch of insects to us."

And before you state that this is hyperbole, Dwarves have casually robbed people and had to have their stuff bought back by the people they stole it from because 'nonDwarves cannot own property'. At that point, the Dwarves want to be treated with high honors, but see no need to extend anything other than paper thin regards to others in return.

They are all fighting the same enemy, and they already have a strict upper hand over the surface nations when they just destroy a city for mining 'too deep'.

As for Cat hating Champion, I think she could probably swallow killing Captain in time (even though Sabah seemed to have been a dear aunt figure for Cat). However, Rafella walking around with the wolf pelt is probably what took that grievance over the edge for her. Yes Cat wears the banners of her enemies, but that is still a symbol rather than anyone's actual skin.

Yes Cat has also done terrible things. But choosing only bare courtesy is still not a crime.

Linnus42

Dwarves not doing anything special besides trying to get the best deal for themselves.

Cat put Akua's soul into her mantle and tortured and had her as slave. So yes I grow tired of Cat complaining about Captain because she done far worse to enemies who have wronged her.

Sinead

People do not change emotional trajectory once they are set.

The fact that she doesn't state that Valiant Champion must leave (as in Book 6) is probably going to be the best of what she will ever be with Rafella unless Cat does any explicit work on that. This issue is going to be the fact that we are in Cat head so we will always catch that association.

As for the Dwarves, the frustration I have is that they already have a shit ton of advantages with regards to the surface if they can just undermine an entire city if motivated.

To me, them getting the surface cities is the start of them conquering the surface, since I cannot see what else they get out of this that they do not get with original trading arrangements with the surface.

Reader in the Night

Yeah, and the Dead King is not doing anything special besides trying to get the best deal for himself, either. Sometimes, the best deal for your enemies means your people stop existing.

And sure, Cat has done some awful stuff. Does it somehow make her a hypocrite for being angry at Raphaela? It's not like Cat has hard feelings against the people trying to kill her for the things she's done either.

Abrakadabra

These are not just cities. They are states with their own adjoined territories. It is like they were asking for New York state, Ireland, and Florida. Though I agree, better robbed Than dead.

Halinn

Ireland, Florida and Quebec more like. Land from three separate nations

shikkarasu

I'd offer them one of two options:

1. Treat with us so that you never need to face the Dead King.
2. We will die on his walls. We will not flee. And then you will face us on his lines. Our bones part of his war machines. Our Goblin Munitions spewed from his Drakes. Our Aspects wielded by his newest Scourges.

It is not an investment, it is a wager. Bet on us, because the thought of losing that bet should haunt your every thought.

Mincheriit

Well... does it really matter who started it when it comes down to people being dead? The valiant champion killed captain, its not unreasonable for Cat to hate her for that, doesnt matter who started it, also its not like captain started that fight either as you said.

Frivolous

Maybe Catherine and Cordelia can foist the problem with the dwarves on Hanno. Let him talk to Sargon, hero to hero.

dadycool

Is the Herald a Hero, though? I always figured the Dwarves were essentially as neutral as a Calernian civilization could be, with Above leanings. Simply leaning towards Above doesn't make them or their Names Heroes any more than the Drow's Below leanings giving them access to Villainous Names.

Liliet

Yeah, that's how I read it too.

shikkarasu

Known:

- He has a title with political/military sway. Herald of the Deep sounds very much like the Dwarven equivalent of the Black Knight. Whether as General or Ambassador, he is responsible for the the first impression made on outsiders.
- He also gives the impression of a crystal to Cat; something rigid and inflexible, but considered beautiful and valuable.

Wild speculation:

I think they value efficiency and Law over individuality and Chaos. Blue-Orange morality. They likely have 'Heroes' and 'Villains', but they are simply not aligned with Good or Evil. Much like how Cat gets on well with Lawful Heroes, but not the Chaotic ones. She, herself, values order and farsightedness more than what gods you pray to.

Conclusion:

Herald of the Deep is a 'Hero' to the dwarves because he epitomizes Order. This makes him culturally one of Hanno's, but unlike any Hero on the surface of Calernia. Cat can register that he isn't one of hers, but can't quite place what he is.

Frivolous

I must admit I'm a little surprised. The reason I believe Sargon is a hero is right in the chapter above.

Quote: Only dimly, and I could not trace out the manner of stories that were his bread and butter, but what I could tell was that he leaned Above's way.

Leaned Above's way = hero. Yes?

Frivolous

Also, I don't think Order versus Chaos really applies to the Guideverse. This isn't Elric's universe. It's all Good and Evil. That's it.

aurikdomi

on Calernia. It's been pretty heavily implied things are different elsewhere.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Then let us say instead that the principles of Good and Evil seem to be filtered through culture to a certain extent— not totally, but there is a clear effect. And dwarven stories are as disconnected from surfacer stories as they can be without a total absence of interaction. Thus, dwarven manifestations of Good such as heroic Names differ more from human ones than those human ones do from one another. Make sense?

shikkarasu

Yep, I am 100% confident on that part. The bit that is wild speculation on my part is that the Dwarven version of 'Good' is more to do with order, efficiency, and industry, as opposed to Callow's righteous vengeance and charity. That what Dwarves consider Good and Heroic would not be recognisable as such to surface folk.

Sargon is definitely what Dwarves call a Hero, but Cat's difficulty placing him makes me think that he is not what she would call a Hero.

dadycoool

Wow, Cat must be feeling claustrophobic, with the floors and ceiling joining the walls in closing in on her.

jamesc9

This was a meeeting with the floor people. Have we had a meeting with the ceiling people?

Liliet

This is beautiful.

Technically, by asking for Hanno's presence, Raphaella was being easy on Cat!

Kind of want these two to interact peacefully more. Might this be a sign?...

dadycoool

Ah, if only Cat weren't so stubborn.

I keep hearing from others about how bad Cat is for holding onto Captain's death, but I'll say here that Captain was the subject of many firsts for Cat. The first trainer she had, the first friend killed abroad, the first of her father's friends killed, and the first break in the illusion of the Calamities' untouchability. And people hold on to their firsts more tightly than all the others combined.

Sorry, you weren't the real target of that rant, but it was triggered by my initial reply.

Liliet

Yeah I honestly agree with you.

I do WANT them to start getting along, and I'm hoping this might be the start of that, but it's not like... because I'm JUDGING Cat for having found it impossible so far.

Zggt

That ship sailed when Raphaella skinned the Captain in order to make a cloak which she wears everywhere

sengachi

Yeah there's some room for forgiving, or at least looking past, the killing of one's friend in battle. When someone important to you goes off to make war on a people and one of their enemies kills them, that anger is not a torch easily set down but it can be set down.

When your friend is slain in the manner of an animal, and then their killer skins them and wears their skin as a trophy and denies their humanity, that's a bit harder to let go of.

Frivolous

I wonder if the stories of the underground were under the control of the Wandering Bard.

Catherine as Warden of the East doesn't seem to have any authority over any possible dwarven villains, but the Intercessor went to talk to Sve Noc when they were still mortal, so there is at least a chance that she has authority over dwarven stories, too.

Given that, when she suspended all the stories of Evil, does that mean that dwarven villains are empowered in a similar fashion as surface villains are?

I'm considering this because I'm not so sure that the Herald of the Deeps would be such a powerhouse in any confrontation with a villain. Not anymore.

And the situation is pointing towards a confrontation.

ohJohN

Thank you for articulating this, I was wondering exactly the same!

Cat's ability to sense villains doesn't seem to be limited by distance, region, or recognized authority over them: she could see DK's star in Keter, which is very far away, decidedly not in the East, and he's currently winning a war of extermination against her side. And if she could sense dwarven villains it would, almost definitely, have come up this chapter. That's too useful an insight into their society to not mention, either to Cordelia or just in narration, especially since she bemoans the fact they have essentially no information on the dwarves.

So why can't she see them, and does that mean they weren't affected by the shutoff? I'd expect it to cause great upheaval in any affected mixed-alignment society not currently fighting a desperate war for survival (which at this point is, like, basically just the dwarves), so I was surprised they didn't come into the talks really pissed off about that. Perhaps there's a lot of dwarven politics happening that we aren't aware of, and the Herald, who leans Good, is making these demands in part to address newly-uninhibited villains?

ninegardens

I'm sorry, but I don't speak Rafaella;
What the heck is Champion trying to say with that last line? Why would Hanno or Grand alliance have to accept anything? Its Levantine business: they set the task, Barrow sword accepted it, that's all there is too it.

Presumably, once they have a warden of the west there might be a "Oh, btw, Levantine heroes might come to you for appeal".
But, ummm... that's it.

Also: dwarves are bastards, and I kind of love it.

Reader in the Night

This, basically. What do the Grand Alliance and Hanno have to accept here? They don't actually have any particular reason to care what Levant does with their Rolls.

King G

If this method is to be the standard going forward, future heroes of Levant will no longer be granted noble status and a place in the records simply for having a Bestowal. That's a marked step down for them, from the previous policy; leader of the heroic half of the grand alliance's Names will need to sign off on it.

Grand Alliance needs to be approving of it for the point Abrakadabra makes; it's an expansion of influence for the Wardens; they'll have some say in the affairs of nations, and that's going to fall under some part of the Accords that's meant to protect a nation's right to self-determination independent of foreign Named influence.

Loin

Yeah, I got nothing. If someone could explain this one to me as well, I'd appreciate it.

Martin Hrádela

Same here, I don't understand Raphaella's line. I appreciate that in this story there is an effort to present the character conversations similarly as they would have been, not saying things that would be obvious in context, you know, doing the Captain Exposition schtick. But when it comes to complex implied political implications of a fictional world in the midst of big transformative events, it would help to have those explained a little more.

Martin Hrádela

shikkarasu

My read on it:

The entire Grand Alliance is barely on board with Villains having rights, and now Cat wants to make precedent for any Villain who is discriminated against being allowed to come to her for arbitration.

Cordelia already had trouble with that regarding the Red Axe case, where laws around Named came before laws around Nobility. Now if anyone wants to kick out Villains from their ruling caste the Villain in question gets to make an appeal. It's like trying to introduce an entire continent to the concept of an HR department. No-one currently in power is going to like it.

Rafella is smug because if Cat had listened to her at the start it could have been an open conversation instead of "Hey, Hanno, I took this authority while you weren't looking kthxbye" which is going to be harder to sell while she is mending bridges.

It is, all around, a complication for whoever she wants to become Warden of the West and will sour relations with both candidates.

MoreBeer

They have to accept that heroes can be refused in the rolls now and they can appeal to the leader of the heroes, by virtue of Villains getting to appeal to the warden of the east. And that they had absolutely no say in this process. That their consent was literally taken for granted when a major precedential decision was made. That they weren't even notified before it was a done deal.

Cat is speaking for the GA and the heroes as if it's her right, making decisions they might agree with but not considering their situation because it solves her personal crisis of accountability to Villains. It's the Red Axe all over again and Hanno's going to be pissed.

Liliet

I mean, they could raise a stink about it, say it goes against pre-existing agreements, etc. They have no LEGAL ground to stand on here, but Hanno has long gone past legal ground with his whole Lord White career. Factually they could push back, even if it's not a "right" they have.

ninegardens

I mean yeah, sure, he COULD push back here, but what's it going to be:

"Yo, Hanno, Cordy, this Barrow sword dude who has been an exceptionally reliable villain for the past two years and has defended multiple cities asked for recognition"

"Okay...."

"Yeah, Razin and Co are giving him recognition, once he stabs one of the scourges. Thought you should know."

"Cool. Sounds like you have everything under control"

MoreBeer

If it was just giving the Barrow Sword recognition then no one would complain, true. But it also affects all Levantine heroes going forward too. And those heroes will be coming to Hanno to protest.

Evgeny Permyakov

If Barrow Sword succeeds, part of the metaphysical weight of the story of the Dead King will be added to the story of Barrow Sword. Besides, dealing the final blow would be a matter of political prestige, surrendering it to Barrow Sword will grant him heavy political weight.

Lady Serpentine

No, they went down to just killing a Scourge.

And it's not like you can exactly whinge about "Agreed to kill the dude we are literally fighting a war to kill" – if Hanno makes any noise about it, Cat would be entirely in the right to point out that SOMEONE has to get the boost to their story, and insisting it has to be a hero completely undermines the entire premise of the Accords. Not to mention using it for politics is not remotely practical, his cup of tea, or sane.

billstewartmt

But if somebody else has a shot at the Dead King, for instance whoever holds The Severance, does Barrow Sword lose his chance?

Alex

Because now Levantine heroes will have to rise to the higher standards to be added to the Rolls without a free pass to becoming essentially a minor noble. Cat has to sell that to Hanno and the rest of the heroes.

Abrakadabra

What Cat probably missed is that she also made a precedent for the warden of the east to speak up for villain in non-villainic nations.

Which also implies that the warden of the west will be allowed to do the same for heroes in Praes for example. She just expanded Both of those authorities.

Reader in the Night

She was invited to participate by the people in charge, though. Even if it does set a precedent that Villains in Levante might ask for arbitration from the Warden of the East; and by proxy, that Heroes can ask for the same from the not-currently existant Warden of the West, that's a matter of Levante politics specifically.

Though I do guess that Cat's heavy-handed and unsolicited interference in Praes means that the authority of the Warden of the East effectively extends as far as they can force it to extend.

Sinead

The basis of the Rule of Law is in the violence to enforce it, so I don't think the last point is particularly groundbreaking as far as the extensiveness of her Role.

Liliet

I mean, broadly, that was the entire point.

Juff

Typo Thread:

thought, it (should be semicolon or em-dash)
I'd been my own > It'd been my own Cordelia smiling corrected, > Cordelia corrected, smiling, to them, we > to us, we seen it to. > seen it too.
It my > It was my was for an > made for an I'd been a long > It'd been a long broad-shoulder > broad-shouldered easy, like > easy, and like sought sought > sought him. "Is > him, "is
Rafaella yet I'd never heard the title granted to > Rafaella, yet
I'd never heard the title granted to her
Sure in theory > Sure, in theory
Levant, to change > Levant, changing
I gesture towards > I gestured towards fiancée, he > fiancée; he you deeds > your deeds
Sure the children > Sure, the children
Levante > Levant considered too by (missing word)

Sinead

'Levante' is the capital city of Levant, so I think that works here.

Bakkasama

Wait, when the dwarves said that there would be no restriction of goods coming in or out of ceded cities, did they mean that those surface cities would be as advanced as the Kingdom Under or did they ask that trade with those cities must not be restricted?

anonymous4968

This chapter was like a sucker punch to the gut. Particularly the dwarves. Never liked them in fantasy stories.

Silverking

In a perfect world, the Dwarves would eventually, for the first time in forever, encounter a problem with the Dead King that they can't solve on their own. Maybe the Dead King sends out a plague, or causes gold to evaporate, or just destroys the ring of fortresses around him because he's got nothing holding him back anymore. Cat says that she has a Crown that will make the Dead King limited, but they need time and supplies to prepare. The Dwarves are willing to throw money at the problem, but then Cat smiles and tells them that she wants the cities back.

As for the implied issue with Hanno, I think the matter is something like "When you're accustomed to privilege, equality feels like tyranny/" Up until this point, getting a Name from Above was an automatic win in Levant, getting a noble title just for showing up. However, these new rules mean that a Hero's entry into the Rolls requires completing a quest (which Hanno probably has no problems with) whose target and difficulty may be influenced by squabbling politics (which Hanno may have VERY big problems with). As the representative of Above under the Accords (and potential Warden of the West), Hanno may have a few words about this arrangement.

Reader in the Night

But Hanno's opinion really shouldn't matter. I get that Levantine Heroes are getting a stepdown (unless they actually put in the work), but who the Levantine government decides to ennoble really isn't up to discussion by foreign authorities. Hanno has no actual grounds to argue in.

If Hanno were a Levantine named, that'd be a different story, but he isn't and that's exactly why they had Raphaela sit in on the meeting: to represent Levant's Heroes.

shikkarasu

Rafaella was not representing Heroes, in this context; she was joint representing the Champions, along with Yannu. he is a descendant of the original, she has the Name. Hanno is still the Representative of all Heroes under the Truce and Terms.

If he or Cordelia winds up Warden of the West it is their right to object to anything Cat says or does. As it stands Cordelia gets to object on the basis of a Named influencing politics and Hanno on the basis of a politician influencing Heroes.

Sinead

It'll be interesting because a 'council' to sell this idea to the GA and T&T is just a meeting between Hanno and Cordelia, as those two encompass all of Cat's sphere of influence between them.

Abnaxis

"Fool," the Champion said. "You help them, you be part of it. Now you have to make Hanno and Grand Alliance accept it for them."

Wait, why does the Grand Alliance care and/ or have any say about the Rolls?

RoflCat

Levant is part of Grand Alliance, and it's also a Good nation.

The new rule would allow for even Villains to be glorified by being recorded in the Rolls, which in the eyes of the Gods would shift its standing from overall Good towards being more neutral.

Which obviously means both Grand Alliance (or rather, the other nations of it) and Above won't be amused at that.

Someperson

It did seem like everything was going really very smoothly for Levant. Of course there was a catch. Of course Cat now has to go explain to Hanno all of the Important Decisions that got resolved while he was absent.

aurikdomi

I think a pretty good counter offer to the dwarves is we will retreat and set up a defensive barrier outside of what you have sealed up, essentially giving the DK access to your area outside of your fortifications. Thought I guess that would require more knowledge of the Kingdom Under than they actually have.

shikkarasu

Use the same Miracles that made the Stairway (modified with Masego's help) to carve a tunnel down to the Dwarves in the Everdark and/or Chain of Hunger. Let the Dwarves enjoy the War on their own fronts if they don't want to pay the surface to deal with it for them. Toss some goblin fire down the hole when you're done as a 'to whom it may concern.'

No chill for Praes; no chill for Dwarves. We are all in this together, like it or not.

Someperson

Counterpoint: possibly this persuades the Dwarves to join the war on the Dead King, but once that war was more or less over, they would have every reason to declare war on the surface nations of Calernia. And in the course of said war, they would potentially succeed in taking over the lands they asked for in the first place, plus interest. If only by sheer dint of numbers compared to the already decimated surface armies.

Mind you, I am sure the Dwarves aren't quite as strong as they think they are. Clearly they are threatened by the Dead King, otherwise they wouldn't build a fancy barrier to protect themselves. And if the surface nations of Calernia defeat Keter in one last desperate push on their own, well... I am pretty sure what's left of the armies and Named of the surface nations would not be defeated easily.

ohJohn

I don't think the dwarves' position is as strong as they're making it seem: if the DK takes over any appreciable chunk of the surface, they are at serious risk. They just finished the Fifteenth Expansion and finally encircled Keter, after a millennium. But those circles of stone and steel, those centuries of work, are pretty much worthless if he can just pack up his terrors, waltz on over to Salia, and start digging there. And also in Rhenia. And Tenerife. And...

Like, sure, that takes time, which they could spend preparing. And, as Cordelia says, they've correctly assessed that the GA would most likely take their deal before it got to that point. But they clearly see containing the DK as a strategic goal, and that'll be impossible if he can get to them from an arbitrary number of points across a third of their empire, his ranks freshly swelled with millions of corpses and some exceptionally powerful Revenants. (Frankly, even if the war ended tomorrow and DK kept only the territory he currently controls, I'd say that's more than enough to kill the notion of containment for good.) They really need him either destroyed, trapped in the Ways, or pushed back into his kingdom on the surface.

So essentially, they're wagering that the GA is not suicidal enough to call their bluff. Funny thing about Cat, though...

Chapter 32: Claimant (Redux)

"Love is a powerful thing, Chancellor, but it only moves you when it is threatened. Hate is ever the bloody spur of progress."

– Dread Emperor Vindictive II

"Not that I'm complaining," I said, "but I'm not sure that counts as tea."

The First Prince emptied the bottom of the flask into my cup, leaving it filled almost to the brim with the pale liquor she'd called bergmilch. My Reitz mostly wasn't, but I was pretty sure it meant something like 'mountain milk'.

"There are tea leaves at the bottom, Catherine," Cordelia serenely said. "Ashuran greenleaf. It adds a bittersweet tang to the taste."

I cocked an eyebrow at her.

"Didn't take you for the liquor type," I said. "Much less going for exotic stuff."

"I am not," the fair-haired princess admitted. "It was my mother's favourite drink."

I hummed. It was rare for Cordelia to speak much of herself during our little talks and even rarer for there to be a mention of her family. Rumour had it she was fiercely protective of her cousin, the Augur, and had been like a daughter to her uncle Klaus Papenheim. I'd only met Agnes Hasenbach the once and been closely supervised by her all the while, which put true to half the talk, but I'd only ever known the Iron Prince as keeping some distance from Salia and his niece. Her mother and father, though, I'd heard almost nothing about save their names and causes of death as written in ledgers. Going by the dates her father had died while she was very young and her mother while she was still shy of womanhood.

Even royalty had a way of dying early, in Lycaonese lands.

"Must have been expensive to get the tea leaves all the way up to Rhenia," I mused.

"Princess Mathilda have her a large bag as a wedding gift when she wed my father," Cordelia said, eyes faraway. "They were close friends as girls, rode together against the Plague."

That'd be Mathilda Greensteel, I thought, the Princess of Neustria who'd died at the Battle of Hainaut. The Hawk had gotten her. I'd not known the woman all that well, having dealt mostly with Princes Klaus instead, but she'd been popular with her soldiers and fairly pleasant in war councils. Still, it was strange to think that all these people I'd only ever known as allies against the Dead King, soldiers sharing my war, had lived entire lives before we crossed paths. That there'd been invisible ties between people I knew I'd never even thought might exist. I leaned forward in my seat, tasting of the drink, and hummed in pleasant surprise.

Creamy and a little sugary for my tastes, but the tea did add a pleasing twist to it.

"Your mother had good taste," I complimented.

Cordelia laughed.

"Mother had absolutely horrid taste, Catherine," the blue-eyed princess denied. "Her notion of a ballroom dress was rabbit fur lining instead of bear, and she was obsessed with cabbage soup. She had tried one in a Lyonis roadside inn that she insisted was the finest soup ever wrought by mortal hands, so the poor cooks had to try a different recipe once every month."

She was smiling, I thought, more genuinely than I'd ever seen her. Her eyes still had that distance to them, almost dreaminess, but there was joy on her face as I'd rarely seen in the First Prince of Procer. What kind of a life she must live, I thought, that she found more to smile among the dead than the living. Best to change the subject, perhaps. I squinted at her.

"So that's why you're so tall," I accused. "Years of cabbage soup."

A glint of amusement in her eyes.

"Our family physician used to tell me fish made people short," she idly informed me. "Something about their oils and the Gods having cursed them to live on their bellies."

"I didn't even eat that much fish," I noted. "Bread and soup in the morning, meat and beans once a week and fish from the docks whenever it was under a silver the pound."

She looked at me in fascination, which might have been interesting in different circumstances but in these served to remind me that Cordelia Hasenbach had never been anything but royalty. She'd been born to rule, and her silver spoon might not have been quite as silvery as those of southern princes but no piece of it had ever been broken off to buy fish.

"Besides, fish oils? Ridiculous," I snorted. "Everybody knows it's horse meat that does it. Atrophies the muscles, you know, bunches you up like a goblin."

I was joking, but it was an old and common superstition. It was bad luck to eat a horse, even at war.

"Your people and horses," Cordelia drily said, "have a most interesting relationship."

"Please, like you Lycaonese won't slap a wolf onto anything given half a pretext," I snorted. "I once saw a soldier from Hannoven use a laundry stick with a wolfhead on it."

He'd gone after that tent cloth like it owed him money, half the reason I even remembered it.

"I am told," Cordelia said, arching an eyebrow, "that Callowans do not eat poultry when geese are flying overhead."

I glared at her. That was only once a year, when they headed back north to Daoine after winter.

"The soul might go up and entreat its cousins to vengeance," I replied, a tad defensively.

She eyed me a long moment, then her lips quirked.

"If a woman eats a billy goat on the last day of the year, a son born in the new year will have horns," Cordelia shared.

I let out a low whistle, impressed. I sometimes forgot that Cordelia Hasenbach wasn't Proceran because there was really no such thing as a 'Proceran', practically speaking. She was a Lycaonese princess who'd adopted many of the ways of her southern subjects to better ruler them, but it wouldn't do to forget she'd been born far from the places she now ruled. Places now all fallen to the Dead King, even if many Lycaonese had fled south to temporary safety. The King of Death's long shadow once more soured my mood, bringing me back to the tasks at hand.

"My thanks for the tea," I said, "but we will have to spoil it by talking of grimmer things as it is drunk, I think."

"The curse of all affairs, these days," the First Prince sighed. "I assume you have read the terms as proposed by the dwarves?"

I made myself drink. It was either that or cursing and I'd already lost my temper in front of her once today. The silver cup went down and I licked my lower lip clean of a droplet of creamy liquor.

"I did," I said, tightly controlled. "They're not asking for the entire barony of Holden, just a few miles of land around, but that's already bad enough. It's coppers to the gold they're asking for Penthes and Creusens."

Holden would barely qualify as a city in Procer, barely fifteen thousand people lived there. The amount of land needed to feed them was nowhere as much as a city the size of Penthes or the capital of Creusens would. The Kingdom Under had, accordingly, demanded much more of their surrounding countryside.

"They want Penthes for the water," Cordelia said. "That is my conclusion. They want the trade up the Wasaliti and access to the sea. Dwarves do not sail, but they will have a large population of human subjects to draw on for the work."

"Creusens so they get the western roads that go all the way down to the Dominion," I said. "And Holden for Callow. That's one a weaker gain for them, all things considered."

"They want Callowan grain," the First Prince said. "Though I would not be surprised if they began tunnelling through the Whitecaps within moments of owning Holden. A pass through the mountains would open eastern Procer to them."

And do so right at the height of some of the richest parts of the heartlands of the Principate – Cantal and Iserre – which also happened to be regions of Procer the Dead King hadn't reached yet. They wanted their finger on the pulse of the surface trade.

"This is a foothold," I bluntly said. "They're looking upwards."

"In the long term," Cordelia noted. "The preoccupation with commerce implies that in the immediate they will seek to consolidate their gains underground. A massive undertaking, one that would be made much easier should they have unrestricted access to all our markets."

They'd hit us up for resources, food and cattle and wood, and when they'd drained us to expand their empire they'd turn their gaze in our direction. They weren't even being subtle about this, though from where they stood I supposed they didn't need to be. What we were going to do about it, let the Dead King kill us out of spite? We had no real leverage on the Kingdom Under to speak of.

"I'm not comfortable with kicking that problem down the line to our successor," I said. "Look, I know that first we need to be able to have successors-"

"I absolutely agree," Cordelia cut in. "I do not need to be sold on this, Catherine. I would have swallowed being taken advantage of in a time of crisis, as indeed the Principate has done to other nations many a time. It would have been legitimate, if infuriating. This, however, is beyond reason."

Tension left my shoulders some. Hasenbach was arguably more farsighted than me in many regards, but Procer's back was a lot more against the wall than mine. I'd been afraid that it might make her inclined to folding whatever the terms, figuring that anything was better than annihilation.

"I wouldn't be able to sell it back home anyway," I admitted. "Even if Vivienne backed me, which I'm not sure she would, a lot of my people would rather see everything west of the Whitecaps burn rather than surrender a city."

"My grip on Creusens is loose at best," Cordelia replied. "And I would lose all influence should I agree to these terms. No doubt they are aware of both these facts. Their interest is in having the signature, the right. They will then have leave to exercise it at their leisure."

A pretext to swing at us if we didn't roll over whenever they got around to taking control, huh.

"That makes more sense than them expecting us to be able to surrender those cities right now," I admitted. "I'd figured they might expect us to keep the treaty a secret until the war was at an end, but if they're mostly after the signature that explains why they're comfortable pushing so hard."

Cordelia nodded in agreement.

"Though that does raise an interesting question," she said. "Why would the Kingdom Under need such an excuse in the first place?"

I sipped at my drink, considering that very thing. I had never particularly got the impression that the dwarves were more than slightly wary of surface powers, and only distantly worried about the prospect of a unified front emerging to face them. Which meant it wasn't about us at all.

"They want it to overcome internal problems," I murmured. "The Herald is an expansionist, but his faction might not have the pull to just drag the Kingdom Under into war with the surface without something solid to brandish as a pretext."

Like a treaty promising three cities that was never fulfilled and which Cordelia and I's successors might not be all that interested in honouring after the horror of the Dead King had passed.

"It might also be that a war of unprovoked aggression against us would be unpopular with their commons," Cordelia noted, "but I share your conclusion. Which is good news in the sense that it shows their position is not as strong as they have been pretending."

"If we had another interlocutor on the dwarven side we could try to go around them," I suggested.

"It might cause the very sort of diplomatic incident that would sink our chances," the blonde princess replied. "I am not dismissing the idea outright, but we should acknowledge the risk."

I grimaced. Yeah, it might be the dwarves would react very poorly to even the perception of us uppity humans trying to play their internal factions against each other.

"I'm not seeing a lot of other options on the table," I said. "We don't have a lot to bargain with."

Cordelia smiled.

"I have heard diplomacy compared to a game of shatranj, Catherine, but it always struck me as weak comparison," the First Prince of Procer idly said. "I have found cards a much more fitting game."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"I'm not great lover of shatranj comparisons," I said, "but I'll bite. How are cards the better fit?"

"Because at cards there are two ways to win," Cordelia said. "By reading the cards, and by reading the players."

My brow rose even further.

"You think the Herald is their weak point?" I asked. "I might be able to take him in a brawl, Hasenbach, but it'd not be an easy ride. I'm pretty sure that unpleasant type that gets stronger the longer they're kicking around."

"Use of force here would be a defeat already," she said. "What draws my eye here, Catherine, is that you told me this Herald was appointed as the head of the Fourteenth Expansion."

I nodded.

"Which must have been a feather in his cap after I mediated Sve Noc's withdrawal," I said.

"Indeed," Cordelia agreed. "And his influence must have further spread with the success of this Fifteenth Expansion, the ring of fortresses around Keter. Yet both of these are massive, generational works rather far from finished."

I cocked my head to the side, following her line of thought.

"So why is he here?" I murmured.

My first thought was that he'd dealt with me before so he was a good fit, but that was the wrong way of looking at this. For a surface nation, in all humility that'd be a valid reason to choose a diplomat if it were certain I'd be part of the talks. I had enough power and influence to warrant that. But for the Kingdom Under to make its choice because of that reason? No, that would be hubris. I was not nearly important or powerful enough for the dwarves to bend their politics around me.

"If these talks are viewed as important," I slowly said, "then his appointment might be a reward for those two successes."

"There is likely a degree of that," Cordelia considered, "but it seems backwards to my eye. Why reward success at the frontier by a diplomatic assignment in the heartlands? Especially when the work is not finished. No, Catherine, I don't believe he was appointed to this assignment at all."

I frowned.

"You're betting he fought to get the position," I sussed out.

"That is my instinct," the First Prince agreed. "And there may lay our lifeline."

"If he burned favours to get this position, it's to get something out of it," I said. "So if we figure out what..."

"Then by finding a way to deny it, we gain leverage," Cordelia finished.

How many people in all of Calernia, I wondered, would have been able to figure this much out from less than an hour sitting across from the dwarven envoys? A handful at most, I thought, and most of them long dead. It was easy to look at the way that Procer had spent the last few years breaking apart and take from the sight the lesson that the First Prince was not so skillful a woman as her reputation implied, but that was looking at it the wrong way. Cordelia Hasenbach was the very reason the place had spent years crumbling in good order instead of brutally snapping after six months.

It would not do to forget how dangerous this woman actually was.

"I don't even have a decent guess at what he might be after," I said.

"I have some notions, but I would not venture them in haste," she mused. "Best to let time pass and consider the possibilities with a rested mind and the help of advisors."

I conceded with a nod. I wasn't sure it would help, but given that I was currently drawing a blank there was no harm in trying. We weren't supposed to meet with the envoys again for a few days anyway.

"You'd think with our armies routed on every front there'd be less of this song and dance," I sighed. "But ever since I've set foot in Salia it has been all schemes and politics."

"Indeed?" Cordelia idly said. "Then which of these did your luncheon with the Blood happen to be?"

I rolled my eye at her.

"You could at least pretend you're not spying on me," I reproached.

"We came by that information coincidentally, I assure you," Cordelia politely lied.

I weighed my options for a moment. I'd need to get her on board with what the Blood wanted anyway, and there was no real point in not beginning those talks now. My only reason to hesitate was that the matter smelled to me like a pivot. So did this business with the dwarves, for that matter. While it might be true that I was leaning Cordelia's way in the matter of the Warden of the West, giving her the first bite at two pivots out of – well, I couldn't be sure but three was usually a safe bet – might be seen as openly backing a horse in that race. If I bring in Hanno quickly enough it shouldn't matter, I finally decided. Both issues were large enough that a single night of forewarning wouldn't make all that much of a difference.

"I was invited to mediate a dispute between the Blood and the Barrow Sword," I said.

She straightened in her seat.

"The request to be added to the Rolls," the First Prince immediately replied. "They agreed?"

"In a manner of speaking," I hedged.

I laid out the compromise that'd been reached out for her. That Ishaq as well as all Bestowed and of the Blood after him would need to undertake a trial assigned by the Majilis to be added to the Rolls, that the Barrow Sword's in particular would be the slaying of a Scourge. And she knew, without my needing to spell it out, that by mediating the solution I had tacitly endorsed it – and so it was now on me to sell it to the Grand Alliance and whoever ended up filling the seat of Warden of the West. Because whoever that was would very much need to consent. If villainous Bestowed could appeal to the Warden of the East over unfairness by the Majilis, then it became necessary that heroic Bestowed would have the same right of appeal to the Warden of the West. If they refused to take up that duty, then it would sink the entire compromise by making it unacceptably uneven.

I had wondered, in private, if that was not Itima Ifriqui's gamble here. Her silence had not betrayed open dislike of the arrangements, but it had certainly not been a strong endorsement. She might have been hoping this entire affair would collapse without the Blood ever taking the blame for it, keeping good relations with myself and Ishaq without needing to actually let him into the Rolls.

"Ah," Cordelia murmured, eyes glinting with interest. "An interesting manoeuvre on their part. It solidifies the power of the Majilis by taking over a responsibility that used to belong to the Pilgrim's Blood. They are aware of the risks of Levant splintering and acting boldly to prevent it by filling the hole left by the end of the Isbili."

"It's also a way to harness Named in ways that will be useful for the Dominion," I said. "Which I don't particularly mind, so long as it doesn't get out of hand."

If anything, it'd serve as a check on the excesses of more powerful Named. If you wanted to get onto the Rolls you'd need to at least not irreparably piss off the four most powerful people in Levant, which ought to provide a measure of restraint.

"I do find it fascinating that you speak of Named as oxen best put to harness when you are one yourself," Cordelia said, studying me.

"Most of us aren't all that more powerful than other people in most circumstances," I said. "It's the tenth that has too much power and too little sense that needs checking. I can live with another Fields of Streges, but I will not leave behind a world where another Folly would be tolerated."

"Arguably you are of the tenth," the First Prince calmly said.

"So I am," I frankly replied. "And I have done monstrous things, I won't pretend otherwise. Were I facing another woman like me instead of standing in her boots, I would want her dead."

I snorted.

"And that's why we'll have Wardens," I said. "One in the East and one in the West. To curtail the worst of both sides, to keep the Game of the Gods a matter for the Gods and Named."

"The proposal of the Dominion would grant the offices more authority than that," Cordelia said. "It would allow either Warden to overturn a decision made by the ruling council of Levant."

"Only regarding Named, and not even in a general sense," I argued. "The right of appeal would be specifically over the matter of the assigned trial."

"It sets the precedent of an authority standing above nations regardless," Cordelia said. "And puts that power squarely in the hand of a pair of Named."

She wasn't wrong, I grimly thought. I wouldn't be able to assign a trial of my own to another villain, but it was pretty much giving me right of veto on a decision that'd be made by literally the four most powerful people of Levant. The thing was, I was comfortable with that principle. I liked the idea of being able to step in if the Majilis were shafting a villain for no good reason, and the more subtle power that there would be in not stepping in should they assign something suicidal to a truly horrid Named. But that comfort came from being raised in a land where Named had the run of the roost: Good Kings and Dread Empresses, Black Knights and Shining Princes.

Cordelia had not been raised in such a land and she did not share the comfort. Procer was the land of the Highest Assembly, but also the realm where people taking to the streets could end a prince. Where priests had told royalty their wars must be just or never waged at all, where Named were honoured but never allowed to rule.

"It grants Named power over Named," I replied. "And only influence beyond that where it intersects with more earthly powers. The Principate would not be affected."

"I have not sold the Kingdom Under three cities for salvation, Catherine," she gently said. "Why would I then sell you all of Calernia for the same?"

Yeah, I'd been afraid of that answer. Pragmatic as she was, Cordelia was no less an idealist than Hanno. It just showed in different places. If she had no principles she held to, I thought, she likely wouldn't have been in the running for Warden in the first place. Above had little love for those without conviction. The Sword of Judgement, I thought, would not so much as bat an eye before accepting the deal I'd laid out. Of course he wouldn't. Hanno had broken with me – with us – when defending the independence of heroes in the face of what he saw as encroachment by the Principate. To him, giving that power to the Wardens would only be a natural extension of what we'd begun with the Truce and Terms.

"The days where I could worry first of Procer are coming to an end," Cordelia said, finger tracing the rim of her cup. "I have worried and worried until it all came to ash, and I regret not a moment of that. Yet I will not slip into the depths of my grief and drown. If these are the end of days, I will spend my last trying to leave behind a better world than I was born to."

"We've been leaving the duty of checking Named to kings and emperors for centuries," I said. "Millennia, even. It hasn't worked. Maybe you can pretend otherwise in Procer, where so few of the great monsters rise, but that's not a luxury Callowans and Praesi ever had. There needs to be a check, Cordelia."

"And so you would hand the keys of the madhouse to the mad?" she smiled.

"Is that really," I said, "something someone trying to become one of the mad should say?"

I saw no point in trying to pretend this was not a conversation about her being Warden of the West just as much as it was about my talks with the Dominion. Maybe even more the former than the latter.

"If it must be done," she quietly said, "let it be done right. Let us not unleash a creeping calamity on our children and their children after them."

I gestured curtly, irritated at the implication I'd want that unleashed.

"I hear much disapproval," I said, "but little alternative."

"Keep the Wardens out of it," Cordelia said. "Let the hopefuls be given the right to appoint an advocate when seeking a trial that can serve the same purpose as the Warden would have. Better yet, let the hopeful and the Majilis agree on an impartial arbiter should there be disagreement. The power does not need to be in your hands, Catherine."

She met my eye with her blue ones, unflinching.

"It is simply where you prefer it to be."

I tamped down on the flash of anger. Instead of leaning into it I made myself consider what she'd proposed. It was, I thought, our differences laid bare. Cordelia Hasenbach, the princess who believed in good and rightful rule, in the might of laws and the virtues of order. Me, I recognized the power in those but I just didn't trust them the way she did. She'd been born on the good side of them, but I'd not had that luck. My world had been a crooked city watch and a governor strangling his city, an occupying army more likely to give the people a fair shake than our own guilds. So when I had the choice between putting the power in the hands of a Role instead of a pack of greedy princes and their descendants, the choice was clear.

Cordelia believed the Majilis and the arbiters would do right by the people, because she believed that good governance was the rule and corrupt rule the aberration. I believed the same lot would fuck it all up because that was what people did, when they got to wield power without having earned it the hard way. So she put her faith in the Blood, and I put mine in the Wardens.

I didn't argue with her. There would be no point, not when where we came from was so fundamentally apart. I could sense, dimly, that this was it. The bone that we would spend our lives picking if she ended up in the seat opposite mine, the prize we'd be fencing over so long as we had blades: where power ought to lie, between kingdoms and Named. So it would not do, I thought, to begin this half-heartedly. If she was going to lay her claim, to draw her line in the sand mirroring my own, then it must be done properly. Let her speak her words and Creation hear them, that she might stand or fall on the merit of her convictions.

"And what is it, Cordelia Hasenbach, that you would make of the Warden of the West?"

She felt it too, I could see it in her eyes. In the way that pale face hardened, those cool blue eyes burning with the same implacable that had once seen her refuse a Name. Her fingers touched a small bracelet hidden in her sleeve, a simple slip of leather set with sharp teeth. I saw them dig into the skin of her wrist, like an apple about to be bit, and she straightened to her full height as tresses fell down her back like a shower of gold.

"The First Prince of the Chosen," Cordelia claimed. "The court of their justice, their captain in the war against ruin. And when that is not enough, when right bends and the way is lost, the wielder of the blade of mercy."

The world shivered and I with it. And somehow, somewhere, I heard it begin. A flicked thumb, the coin going up. Spinning, spinning, spinning.

Gods help us all when it landed.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Linnus42

Ah so its finally started. The coin flipping has interesting implications.

I am still impressed Cordelia thinks Names especially Heroes need to be checked when one looks at the state of Procer. I argue the Princes and Nobility have been the far bigger problem in Procer then the Chosen. If anything one could argue that the problem in Procer is that the Princes have not been checked enough. I suppose growing up as a Noble and Saint being mean to her is what started her down this path. But I don't see how anyone looks at the state of Procer and goes yeah the real issue is that the Heroes (Named) have too much power. That is a decent thesis in Praes but in Procer that is rather laughable.

Liliet

I mean, Procer was brought to this state by villains having too much power.

Linnus42

I have the advantage of the real world Lil so with or without Names I think smart political leaders would absolutely say foment a coup and civil wars in a rival nation? Do you disagree? Granted DK is a bit beyond the scope of the real world but you could liken him to a certain leader of a certain European country from the 1930s to the 1940s....

Also she is in charge of the Heroes not the Villains so she need to point to examples of Heroes being the main issue and not the Princes and Nobility. The way I see it Cordelia by dent of being a Noble thinks the system has it is works pretty well. So she is doing everything she can to limit Heroes especially from challenging powers of the Nobility. Cause you know inherited privileges is great when you get to be at the top and the one inheriting.

dadycoool

She was also born with the privilege of having a positive light shown on nobility. She never really interacted with someone the system had failed until she was an adult, so she naturally expects the failing to be the the exception rather than the rule.

"Oh, the system works for me, so anyone for whom it doesn't just needs to git gud. Hey, stop waving that sword around, you might damage the way of life that benefits me."

caoimhinh

Ehmm... sort of, she actually grew up being shown how the southerners schemed and abandoned the Lycaonese in their fight against the Dead and the Ratkin, and became First Prince after seeing the whole Principate eat at itself in a civil war for nearly two decades.

She knows firsthand that the ruling class of Procer is corrupt, selfish, and scheming, only ever brought to heel and behave by greater force and necessity.

So this is just her being a hypocrite and defending her way of life because it benefits her, Cat is just thinking too highly of Cordelia given her impressive record of keeping order in the middle of the apocalypse. But Cordelia is doing what she has always done: defending the system that benefits her while proclaiming it a beautiful and effective thing, despite knowing full well that it's the opposite.

Rey d`Tutto

You only lose (per Godwin's Law) if you state your interlocutor is Hitler, or a Nazi, not just by mentioning those reprehensible b@stards.

If only he were as short sighted as those losers.

shikkarasu

Not how Godwin's Law works.

a: "Sooner or later in any online argument, someone will bring up Hitler." Godwin posited that any debate slowly approaches the point where someone references Hitler, that it is just part of our culture now, but should not be. His Law was never about losing arguments be technicality, that was appended to him after the fact.

b: While Godwin did think that comparisons to WWII made light of one of the greatest tragedies in history, and certainly of the past 100 years, he fully admitted that such comparisons need to be made when they may sense.

Quote: I urge people to develop enough perspective to do it thoughtfully. If you think the comparison is valid, and you've given it some thought, do it. All I ask you to do is think about the human beings capable of acting very badly. We have to keep the magnitude of those events in mind, and not be glib.

The comparison by Linnus42 was not being glib. The Dead King has a fascist (dis/u)topia and is waging war on the world to expand it. This is a parallel, likely intentional on the author's part, and it deserves to be brought up

Sparsebeard

Ok, I'll bite. How is Keter a fascist utopia?

shikkarasu

Not Keter as a whole, but the Serenity in whichever Hell it was that DK took over. I mean, we later learned that the guide describing it was Malicia in disguise, but I don't think she was lying about it, so much as repeating what she had learned from either the Tower's records or in her stay before the Woe arrived. The parts of Keter in Creation is more analogous to the frontlines of the war.

You can compare this to a lot of IRL locations. There is the Good part, where the rich and/or tourists are found, and the Everywhere Else. Nothing is a 1:1 comparison, of course. This is a fantasy setting.

caoimhinh

Yeah, the Augur also mentioned how even more horrifying than the madness of death that surrounded the Dead King, was the voices actually worshipping him as a god.

Sykomantis

The correct phrasing, fyi, is "As an online debate goes on, the probability that Hitler will be mentioned approaches 1." which is a slightly weaker assertion, in that the small amount of probability still left on him not being mentioned means it's still possible he won't be, though increasingly unlikely.

caoimhinh

Ironically, the names Keter, Sephira, and Neshamah, are Hebrew

Rey d`Tutto

True, dat.

The Dead King is deeply anagolulous(sp?) To the Nazi regime.

I was being "Glib". He vaugebook referenced 1940's Europe. I grokked his take, and then joked about Godwin's Law.

I appreciate your feedback. It's always nice to read a well thought out response to one of my flippant/intoxicated posts. And I know a little more about our consensual hallucination (reality) as a result.

Yay! Non-zero-sum interaction! Everybody wins (ymmv!)

therealgridlock

The difference in this argument is fundamental to the experiences of Cat and Cordelia.

Cat grew up where the government was evil, where everyone was evil, (or morally grey) and only the individual could be good or justified.

Cordelia grew up where the government was good and all the people were good, and the governments were therefore held to higher standard and could be good or justified.

They're technically both right, and that's why this dichotomy exists.

On the east, evil reigns, and the maliciousness of government is apparent, hence why Cat expects a single person to have a better moral compass than an entire country.

On the west, good reigns, and the government is held to a high standard by the people, because every single person has a good moral compass, and that system is inverted from the East.

Democracy works when the majority are good. When the majority are evil, only a sufficiently good tyrant can change things.

I do not have any idea of what a third form of government would be, there is only ever either democratically elected positions, or autocrats, so short of forming Cardinal and giving it a constitution and a tripartite governmental system (judicial, executive, legislative) I have no idea how this conflict will be resolved.

—

Furthermore I don't think the DK is a certain national socialist, because it would be easier to describe him as an allegory for the other branches of socialism. He might run a fascist regime, all within the state, nothing outside the state, everything for the state, or however that goes, but his universalization of resources and use of a serf class (the undead) sounds more like the USSR or Mao's china than a racial socialist expansionist empire. He might be putting on a show, like Mussolini though.

He's only technically expansionist because he wants to achieve some goal of world domination, and kill everyone to do it. I don't believe for a second he's doing it because he thinks undead are a superior man than the living. There's no untermensch for him to persecute, he doesn't even hate man I don't think, he just can control undead, and therefore all must die who do not follow him/worship him (and being dead you still follow him, perhaps more useful dead even)

Besides, theres too much roman history involved in this story for me to see recent European conflict. All the characters, places, conflicts, and stories are all Greek and Roman etc.

I mean, they literally march footsoldiers in legions and envy cavalry 😊

The place with the democracy may as well be Athens lol.

Sinead

Also, is the undead really an 'underclass' or more akin to mechanisation? It does depend on your perspective on what undead are, but my read is that the only undead that seem to have sentience are the Revenants, with the Binds being a shade with limited sapience similar to a lesser version of Assassin, and the Bones being essentially automatons.

aurikdomi

Do you mean the dead king specifically or other villains generally?

Liliet

DK and Malicia, most specifically.

erebus42

Those were outside actors taking advantage of the flaws inherent to proper though.

caoimhinh

Yeah, let's not forget that the Princes of Procer have continued to bicker and scheme even while the sky is collapsing over them and the world burning around them.

Liliet

They were actors internal to the system that is the continent.

Gabe Meadow

Well, it means Cat's going to have issues either way with her potential candidate. On the one hand, Cordelia isn't going to hold a bias in favor of Heroes. On the hand, it just means Cat will have a different kind of problem than she would with Hanno.

She'll have to decide which is more manageable in the long run.

shikkarasu

I like Cordelia's issues, though. She is cordial with Catherine, but also has very opposing viewpoints. This is good. The Wardens should always try to see eye to eye, but must always require each other to compromise. Otherwise why have two Wardens?

Hanno seems like the sort that would gleefully work with Catherine to consolidate power right up until it was time to wage a holy war on her. I could easily be misreading him, and I'm not fully convinced until we get to see the next meeting, but I am afraid of what the Name would do for him at this point in his life.

I will also call out that this isn't fair. That Hanno has been very tolerant of Cat, and genuinely wanted to work with her as early as their first meeting. My hesitation comes from the fact that he is in a dangerous headspace right now and we haven't had a lot of concrete statements about his plans going forward. I think he is a good person and may very well become a great Warden. I'm just not convinced he will become that in the next 2 months. Not yet.

Salt

It doesn't really make sense to attribute holy wars to Hanno, when the only holy war we've seen so far was started by Cordelia, and for no other reason than political convenience at that. It's the other way around – Cordelia is the one that'll work with you when there's a common enemy and start a holy war on you if it's convenient for her.

IMO the main difference between the two is that Cordelia is all about big picture systems. Nations, laws, armies, politics, but not so much the individual people affected by the systems. She sees numbers and concepts, she sees prominent figures, and the people close to her. She doesn't see the nameless soldiers or faceless civilian, and doesn't care about them the way she cares about bigger things.

Hanno sees each individual person, and sees systems in terms of how they affect individual people, not the other way around. He lived his whole life with his feet on the ground, seeing firsthand how those systems affected the people living underneath them – from his time in the courts, to his mother and father's tragedy, to Judgement looking through the lay of each individual person's past, future, and every possible branch in between for every choice before passing a sentence.

If you are a noble, a ruler, or if you care about nations or overarching systems, you want Cordelia in charge. Because she cares more about those than people, and will sacrifice entire nations full of people to get to an ideal – just like she tried to do with Callow. The nation will endure, but she might sacrifice you to do it without your consent.

If you're an average civilian, a powerless orphan, or anyone who isn't rich or powerful, you want Hanno in charge. If politicians and rulers want to harm you for the sake of the nation, their own convenience, or some nebulous greater good, Hanno is the one that'll step in to hold up the sky from falling on your head. He'll watch those greater nations or systems burn, just to make sure something so Unjust won't happen to you – the person.

Cordelia is the kind of person the current Catherine would feel more at ease with, near the end of the journey. Hanno is the kind of person the original orphan-Squire Catherine wanted in charge, when she set out in the first place.

sloodles

I love this summary of their positions. I'll just comment, since it seems to me (and this judgment may just reflect my own bias) that you favor Hanno's way of thinking: Cordelia's way of thinking does sometimes produce better gains for the common people than Hanno's.

Now, Hanno has been seen to be on a path toward making greater choices of his own in leading men, etc, but even presuming some progress in that direction, he thinks on the individual level and sometimes that's a problem. "If you care about overarching systems, you want Cordelia" – okay, but overarching systems matter, and they matter to people. Hanno thinks of the destitute orphan, but I don't think he'd be willing to choose between policies that balance orphans made, crops harvested, money gathered and spent. While I won't go so far as to say anything can be justified for the sake of a minor gain spread over a million people – I'm sympathetic to utilitarianism, but not really willing to give it that much slack – I will say that I think Hanno wouldn't even be willing to consider the choice. I trust Hanno's judgment on a low-level, but I don't think he'd be willing to really think about the broader good at a scale of nations.

Sacrifices for the good of the many are sometimes necessary. Really, I think that summarizes best the positions of the three Wardens: to make overdone chess analogies, Cordelia sacrifices others, like chesspieces to keep the king (or queen) alive; Hanno would sacrifice himself, or those he knows, but is unwilling to look at the broader game; and Cat mutilates herself but has grown increasingly willing to sacrifice others as well.

Salt

I actually do like Hanno a lot more as a character, but I agree Cordelia is a better ruler. She has the necessary skillset to be a queen or a prince in a way that Hanno simply doesn't, simple as that.

However, I don't know if that's the most relevant question when talking about how fit they are for the position of Warden. From what I'm seeing, the Wardens aren't kings and queens, reigning over the land like an emperor of the west. They're similar to how the Bard was describing it – holding wardenship over good and evil – the concept of it, not the nations, politics, or armies. They're holding dominion over what, conceptually and morally, Good actually is, as well as how Above's ideals translate in practice. They're not so much planning economies or balancing the budgets of nations.

At which point for the Warden of the West, the question imo ends up being what matters more, when push comes to shove? Maintaining the individual rights of every person, regardless of status, or sacrificing those rights for the greater good of society, even if the means may sometimes be unjust?

It's actually kind of an interesting question with strong arguments on both sides, my personal preferences aside

jamesc9

One way of focussing the question: in a sufficiently bad crisis, which of these do you sacrifice first:
<https://www.greens.org.nz/charter>
Social responsibility, ecological wisdom, appropriate decision-making (subsidiarity; non-facism), non-violence.

caoimhinh

Yeah, I can't help but get the impression that Cordelia has been a massive hypocrite in her actions and statements for quite a while now. For all that she is portrayed as different than the rest, she's still defending Proceran political bullshit the same way Malicia kept idolizing the madness of the Old Tyrants despite portraying herself as a new breed. Even now as Cordelia argues Catherine wants to keep power in her hands, she is being a hypocrite. Cordelia has spent her entire time in the story scheming and political maneuvering to keep power in her hands, every single one of her interludes showing her worrying about being deposed from the position of First Prince.

In the end, Cordelia's Role would be marked by stubbornly refusing to bend while being strangled by the letter of the law instead of enforcing its spirit. Arrogantly claiming to have authority due to birthright and political moves while pretending that the law is just and is executed in its theoretical perfection, even when she has spent her whole life seeing otherwise.

Linnus42

I don't think Cordelia is a hypocrite. I think she is what she is and that is a Noble whose main concern is protecting the power of her fellow Nobles from ever being checked. Inherited rights are great when you are the one doing the inheriting. Not only would her wardenship put Named under the thumb of their local governments much more directly. It would massively raise the bar of difficulty for any peasants protesting and trying to get reforms because a government of Nobles can just vote to send a Named Strike Force. You want to be the mob staring down some of the more powerful Named during a protest.

I argue if Cordelia's Wardenship was a reality some Damned would do what the one Saint killed tried to do and succeed. I think there is enough corrupt Nobles to bribe with immortality and other concoctions to get some pretty good protection since Saint thought he end up running at least half of Procer. And even if you get one Rogue Named like Saint well they be staring down the barrel of some sort of Elite Named Strikeforce trying to rectify that issue. That seems like a tall order even for Prime Saint.

Abrakadabra

Wut?

Sinead

Laurence gained the epithet 'Regicide' when she killed a Prince that was under the control of a Damned that brewed life giving potions. The idea that the overwhelming shows of force like Laurence did with killing the Prince in his throne room would be retaliated against (since the goal of the Articles of Strife is to keep the battles between Named focused on Named). In this case, said Damned would have political influence from said Prince to vote in their favour in said institutions.

AbraKadabra

I get that part. What I dönt get is where the speculation about nobles using the named to suppress the proletars come from?

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, that's bound to make a « Protector of the Smallfolk » or whatever appear.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Yeah, Chosen aren't Procer's problem. The Heroes are the only reason Procer held on for as long as it did. The problem was the rulers.

caoimhinh

Agreed.

I mean, remember the Arsenal Arc? Cordelia was angry at Mirror Knight when he was just a pawn of the Prince of Cleves and his daughter scheming to use him against the Drow, or hating Hanno for not agreeing to let her break the agreement she had signed of letting Named be judged by Named, a hatred that still persists to this day and in Cordelia's head likens Hanno to the Saint of Swords. Hypocritical, selfish, and ridiculous to an impressive degree.

Konstantin von Karstein

Her problem is with Named having too much power, not just Heroes. Here she opposed Cat, a Villain, having power over another nation.

AbraKadabra

Oh, but besides Saint, there are Chosen like the Mirror Knight, and his little group in the Arsenal and the Red Axe and let us not forget our grandfatherly Grey Pilgrim WHO killed a village with a plague to stop the Black Knight.

Besides there is historical precedence too. There was a hero that decided it is acceptable to kick off a crusade by mind rapeing the city of Salia by the help of an angel, and making hundreds of thousand man woman and children take up a sword and fight against the Dead King and his armies. That is the thing Cordelia fears. Named above the laws by way of their overwhelming power.

Linnus42

I mean Saint got her career started by stopping a Prince who was letting a Damned experiment on peasants for magical concoctions. Under Cordelia's system who stops that? Red axe got recruited by Bard at the very start. Cordelia didn't have a solution to stop the Black Knight so its a bit rich of Cordelia to complain about GP when the other option was Amadeus starving the populace. Lets not act like GP much like Saint hasn't stopped plenty of monsters. Mirror's Knight main issues were also caused by Nobles who had a plan to backstab the Drow and take all their land. An issue on which Cordelia slow rolled Cat and Sve Noc and had no plan to stop without MK's folly at Arsenal.

Abrakadabra

Salia mind raped?

Sinead

The reason they know what the effect summoning Contrition into the city will do is because a Chosen had done that previously to start a Crusade against the Dead King.

Abrakadabra

True. So?

erebus42

I believe the point they're making is that the act was truly monstrous even if it was perpetrated by a Hero and as such is an example of the horrific ruinous consequences of leaving Heroes entirely unchecked.

caoimhinh

No, what they are trying to show is that those things happened in extreme cases, scenarios where there was little to no other option. Desperate situations where the authorities had failed to give an appropriate response to the problems.

Salt

Seems hypocritical of Cordelia, since the Tenth Crusade that she started for the sake of political convenience has caused more deaths than every Hero that was mentioned combined.

Cordelia fears individuals having too much power and too little reason, but thats exactly what essentially all of Proceran ruler ship is – herself included. Individuals with too much power and too little reason, concerned more with etiquette and political maneuverings than the fact that their own petty actions are piling up civilian bodies faster than most Villains, let alone Heroes.

The Saint, while being an unreasonable cunt, got the title of "Regicide" in the first place because she never put rulers above the common people as somehow having more worth. Even during the Princes' graveyard, her motivations were completely pure and selfless – she genuinely believed (regardless of whether her belief was correct or not) that taking a stand would simply lead to less people suffering in the long run.

The Pilgrim is similar, in that whatever deaths he caused were all for the sake of preventing greater deaths. He killed a village to capture Black yes... while Black was quite literally in the middle of burning and pillaging his way through the heart of Procer for the explicit purpose of causing as much damage as possible. Black wasn't innocently taking a stroll on vacation.

At the end of the day, both rulers and named tend to be extremely powerful individuals that cause a lot of collateral damage and often make gigantic mistakes. The difference is that heroic Named at the least always have positive motivations, which is more than you can say for politicians and rulers.

Hargabga

Because in the end of the day, in Procer and to a smaller degree everywhere, the noble is a subordinate to his subjects. His rule is a compromise between what he wants and what the people he rules over will allow. Did you miss the bit about "where people going to the streets can end a prince"? That is the core of the issue. She is against leaving power in the hands of a position which is decided by the eldritch entities that are out of contact with reality, literally. In a way, she really is more like Hierarch's Above mirror, like Hanno is to Cat.

Which is why, I believe, in the end she will be the Warden. Not just to contrast Cat's claim on the Villains, but her views on where the power should lie.

erebus42

I mean attempting to basically sacrifice her entire nation on an altar to Good is admittedly a little more than "mean", so it's a bit understandable that she'd be wary of the excesses of Heroes and Named in general.

Cicero

The Sword Saint.

That's pretty much all that needs to be said there. I mean, Cordelia didn't become hostile to Heroes until a hero decided to use her trust to back a plot to destroy Procer. (In the belief that through that destruction the seed of a better world would be planted).

I think it's pretty obvious why Cordelia thinks there needs to be a check on Heroes.

Dredcor

In Cordelia's eyes, rulers can be checked by laws and courts. If you give Names authority superceding that of rulers, the Named would have nothing checking them.

In her eyes, presumably.

Salt

I think the main counterpoint to the idea that rulers can be checked by laws and courts is Cordelia herself. There isn't a court or law in existence that can truly check her, if she really felt like overturning it or getting around it. Ironically, she herself is the best proof that mortal rulers need a check on them that goes beyond mortal systems of government.

Arguably that's also why so many name tropes come from orphans, or people of otherwise humble stature; because normally the system doesn't actually work. Most of the time, people with political power do what they want despite what laws are in the way, and everyone else has no recourse. The very few people of average origin that actually manage to rise above their station and challenge that trend are so unbelievably rare and exceptional, that it's an origin story worth being Namelore in and of itself.

onedollargum

Ohhhh no. Not Mercy.

dadycool

Well, Mercy seems reasonable, especially in comparison to the other two choirs we've seen so far. They're still Angels, but they're the best of the lot presented.

Hargabga

It really doesn't give much credit to angels that the "let's suffocate a child in their sleep or kill a village to catch a villain" are the best of the group.

shikkarasu

Yeah, never mistake Mercy for Compassion. You can justify anything with Mercy, just look exactly far enough into the future to the day where your actions will have a net positive on the world. No earlier, no farther.

Mental Mouse

Huh. You just pulled out the fundamental flaw with utilitarianism.

erebus42

I suppose it would still be better than Contrition. At least Mercy will still choose the lesser evil instead of spreading pointless suffering. Granted, it would be more ideal if the Choirs would fuck off and stay out of Creation where they don't belong but I suspect that would be a hard sell.

dadycool

Mercy: wielders of the coup de grace.

caoimhinh

Mercy definitely has a better advertisement department than other Choirs, but let's not forget those are the guys that will not move unless there's a sacrifice already.

It's like a Catch-22. They abhor unnecessary suffering, but it's necessary for suffering to be happening for them to act. At least if we go by their interventions through Tariq, each one of their interventions demanded a lot of suffering and sacrifice before they got to move.

erebus42

To be fair, traditionally the side of Good tends to be a bit more reactive than proactive in general.

Forum Explorer

Well because in an ideal world, no one would ever call on Mercy. Same with Contrition. Or even Compassion. When people are being good, when things are going good, people don't need Angels, so the Angels don't act. It's only when things have gone wrong that it is time for Angels to step in.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think it's just a way of saying that the WotW will kill Heroes who step too out of line. Mercy wasn't capitalise like the Choir is.

Rey d`Tutto

True, mercy, not Mercy.

The coin flip being caught is what almost gave Cordy the wife Name to begin with. Then the whole Choir was Stalled by two Mad Men. Is That the Coin flipping now? Judgement?

Rey d`Tutto

Damned Autocorrupt!

WotW, not wife.

Hargabga

She is the best waifu though...

Konstantin von Karstein

I think it was just a figure of speech, not foreshadowing 😊

shikkarasu

It is, ironically, Hanno's coin. Swords on one side, Laurels on the other. They just represent different things, now.

The Sword of Judgement versus the First Prince's Crown.

Rey d`Tutto

And I think her palm was branded by the Laurels.

Anybody care to check?

beleester

"Killing the corrupted to prevent them causing further harm" is very much a Choir of Mercy sort of thing, so it could be either.

Konstantin von Karstein

It wasn't capitalise, so I doubt it it. Guess we shall see.

caoimhinh

Ironically, we already have a Blade of Mercy (the young man with huge sword that acts like Mirror Knight's sidekick) who is not associated with the Choir of Mercy.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Mathilda have > Mathilda gave Princes Klaus > Prince Klaus smile among > smile about among

A glint > There was a glint a silver the > a silver a ruler them > rule them
That's one > That one's
What we were > What were we successor," > successors,"
"I'm not great > "I'm no great that unpleasant > that unpleasant > that he's the unpleasant didn'tttrust (missing space) same implacable (missing noun, or implacability)

Liliet

...kind of don't like that Catherine didn't lay out her arguments about not trusting law and about Cordelia's privilege making her see otherwise then and there.

Sinead

Fair point. I wonder if Cat is doing private audiences with the claimants, and then we will have meeting with the two of them where she lays out her arguments to both their positions and mediates the final outcome.

I think Cat's trying to be a bit hands off here in the spirit of Tariq's warning during Hanno's crisis of faith.

aurikdomi

Tariq's warnings and I feel another hidden reason to be revealed later.

ninegardens

Yeah- this doesn't feel like an argument between Cat and Cordelia in some sense.

Like... the battle like Cordelia just put down is a... point of debate, (probably an implacable one), but it isn't a point of violence.

Cat is really saying "Okay, here's a problem, as warden of the west, how would you go about resolving this problem"

She isn't interested in winning the argument, this is simply part of the exam.

Sinead

Exactly. Cat isn't choosing who is Warden. She is attempting to facilitate a peaceful enough resolution of this conflict. So if she collects the first reaction that the claimants would have to an issue that would fall within the sphere of influence of the Warden of the West.

If Cat keeps her thumb off the scale it should be well enough.

Liliet

Mhm.

agumentic

Cordelia knows Cat's opinion and arguments perfectly well.

Liliet

Does she though? Does she really? This is the kind of thing where a timely reminder goes a long way.

Hargabga

Yeah, she does. In so far as words can convey, anyway. To repeat those would change nothing, it's their experience that differs.

Rey d`Tutto

One was an Orphan Pit fighter in a conquered land, raised in the City where Good was pious healers and Evil kept the Streets safe-ish.

The other was Royalty in a Land Besieged. If the Dead King was quiet, the Ratlings would be around by Spring, unless it was Spring, or Summer, or Autumn...

One lived with a corrupt governor, and the other lived where the nobility kept their folks alive.

It doesn't get much more different.

hakureireimu

If Cat can figure out Cordy's position and where she came, so can Cordy with Cat's positions. They have a fundamental difference in value that isn't amenable to debates.

Liliet

Not quite. This is a matter of privilege, aka, Cordelia simply hasn't had the same life experiences as Cat and doesn't have the same perspective. We got a vivid reminder of that during the "I didn't even eat that much fish" part of the conversation.

She actually genuinely cannot easily get into Cat's mindset the way Cat can get in hers.

Hargabga

I feel you are mistaken about Cat being able in any way to get into Cordelia's mindset.

Liliet

Perhaps.

Linnus42

I think ideally Cat should explain her world view and really flesh out where she and Cordelia stand. She made assumptions about Bard and that really messed things up in Praes.

Granted I think she doesn't want to talk too much to Cordelia right now because she doesn't know who she wants to win over Warden and doesn't want to tilt the board too much without sketching out both sides.

shikkarasu

This. Liliet's conversation needs to happen, but only with the Warden of the West. I think arguing (in the sense of debate, not a shouting match) about the nature of Wardens would be good for all of Calernia, with Cordelia having Cat's old "keep Names out of our politics" stance. The problem is that having that argument is effectively tipping the scales prematurely, and picking a Warden is also picking struggles between the two Named.

She CANNOT have that conversation before feeling out her alternative. For all Cat knows, her struggle against Hanno would be a better fit for the world, even if it he would be worse for the Name. The pair of her and him might be better for the Role, even if she hates his politics.

Liliet

Yeah, true.

I just wish Cat would assume less and talk more, yeah.

SpeckofStardust

Eh Cordy cant be the warden, if only because the point of the Wardens is to control and have final authority over Named, and her argument is that they shouldn't have that. It's a decent argument to be made, butt her argument leads to that wardens shouldn't be needed in the first place.

So Cordy shouldn't be one in the first place.

Liliet

Cordelia thinks that they SHOULD have authority over Named, but not over EVERYTHING THAT MIGHT HAPPEN TO A NAMED, aka over actions of civic governments

sengachi

Eh, this is the kind of thing with webserials where I always see it resolved eventually, so I don't bother picking a bone over it. Sure it's relevant to this chapter and not in this chapter, but it'll still be discussed eventually.

aurikdomi

Coin flipping huh? so likely no surprise candidates for Warden of the West unlikely though that may have been.

Sinead

Alas, I won't get Razin stabbing chucklefucks to establish order.

Best dark horse Warden of the West in my opinion.

Linnus42

I don't think this will be decided by swordplay but if it was at we are looking at Cordelia, Frederic, Hanno, Razin and Rozala as the prime candidates. Well Hanno is washing all of them in combat.

Sinead

I was more meaning Razin walking into a Council of the Chosen and stabbing people who get out of hand.

One can dream, though.

Rey d`Tutto

There may be Deputies...

Bad@games

Forgot Abigale as best dark horse candidate

Rey d`Tutto

Abigail is best!

Darkening

The coin will land on edge with Abigail as the warden obviously.

shikkarasu

Abigail: Wakes up in a cold sweat as Warden of the North

"WHY WHY WHY"

receives correspondence from Empress Basilia, protector of the league, and Claimant for Warden of the South

"NO WHAT WHY NO"

dadycool

The difference between these two calls to mind many other complimentary pairs. The one I feel is most accurate is Magneto and Professor X. One born in luxury and granted the privilege of believing in the best of people, while the other was born low in the streets and only shown the worst in people, especially authority figures. Cat wants to be an advocate against authority because she had none growing up, while Cordelia doesn't believe that such an advocate is/should be necessary, especially if it grants that advocate any power over state authority.

Abrakadabra

A good point.

ninegardens

I mean, I think Cordelia makes a valid point of "You don't trust authority, but then you trust in giving yourself authority"... the issue is that that argument can be thrown back at her "You are still giving people authority, just people who are similar to you".

Neither one of them is proposing a situation where authority ceases to exist. It's just... Cordelia claims to trust that, Cat claims she doesn't, so her position is harder to defend.

Abrakadabra

Yeah, that is the thing. There has to be some kind of authority. Even if they both let it go and raise up a medieval peasant democracy (as Linnus seems to prefer) there are no guarantees that the power will rest in competent and uncorrupted hands. Because there is no such thing as guarantees.

Linnus42

Oh I don't think Democracies are incorruptible or anything far from it. Just that the corruption is inherently built into the system in my book if you have Nobles inheriting Power, Prestige and Wealth because they have the correct Parents. Democracies needs safeguards.

dadycool

I once read a YA novel where one of the protagonists, a young noble raised to inherit control of the city, visits a democracy and basically wonders how anyone can know how to rule without being trained for it the way an inheritor is. I mean, think about it. A king has a son, he shows the new crown prince how he rules, shows him why things are the way they are, teaches him not to abuse his power, basically apprentices him, handing off more duties the older and more responsible he gets, eventually the prince is the real ruler with his father as an old figurehead, the king abdicates, and the new king takes care of his kingdom until his own son is old and responsible enough, and the cycle continues.

Granted, this scenario only works in a vacuum and doesn't account for outside influence or personal greed or other corruption, but that's the biggest problem of any system of government. People like having power and not sharing power. The only real difference democracies make, or at least democratic republics like America, is spreading the corruption to hundreds as opposed to just the king and nobles. There's a reason why everyone associates politicians with corruption, after all. And true democracy is simply mob rule, which is honestly worse in a group of more than a few dozen to a hundred. Bellerophon, anyone?

Hargabga

This is why we have bureaucracy: why train a man to do everything he may not even have the drive or talent, if you can just sharpen each person into a smallest cog in the service to the whims of the public?

AbraKadabra

But burocracies were built up by the monarchs, to manage their lands better, that is to say, damocracies just chose to keep them around. And sadly this is still dont give a convincing answer to incompettent people getting to the top.

Hargabga

Sure, they were birthed as an apparatus to realise the unlimited power of an absolutist monarch, but they are also the only reason republics can function at all, as they allow the whims of the public to be realised with the same unerring certainty as they realised the whims of the emperors. And yes, it is the best current solution to incompetent people rising on top, because bureaucracy is meritocratic – if utterly divergent from whether the merit will actually help the people it governs.

Rey d`Tutto

And then we get a paper government ruled by the bureaucracy, with voting and elections that work to put folks in power who are powerless before the unelected bureaucrat who knows the rules a department instituted because congress couldn't be arsed to write laws about some piddly bs.

Hargabga

Yeah, but it is also the only reason even the appearance of democracy can be achieved. Or just go all the way back and break down into anarcho-syndicalist communes.

Konstantin von Karstein

What I think makes democracy superior to monarchy is the fact that if a leader is bad you can just vote for someone else next elections. Sure it's not perfect, but that's better than having a tyrant ruling alone and doing whatever.

And you can't compare Bellerophon to a real-life democracy. It would have collapsed or be destroyed already.

dadycoool

Another fiction I read where the protag was royalty was of the opinion that all those elections also mean that 30-year plans never happen because, in the US, that would mean eight elections where four to eight presidents each have to decide to go through with it, which doesn't ever happen. Contrast that with a monarch that either rules for forty years or teaches their kids how important that 30-year plan is. "Why should I spend money on this loser's pet project" v "How's the progress going on my important project that I've been putting time and money into for half my life?" It goes double if the project is about the environment, education, or any public works.

Konstantin von Karstein

I never said democracy hadn't its downsides. What I'm saying is that those downsides still don't beat the fact that it's much more difficult for someone to abuse their power in a democracy. Sure if the ruler is very good that's a bad thing, but if he is bad (#Caligula, Nero) or outright mad he can't do too much damage.

jamesc9

My impression is that big things can be done, but only if each step is incrementally beneficial.

My public works example is the federal highway system.

My success and failure example in telecommunications is wireless/cellphones vs airline seat phones:
<https://web.archive.org/web/20121009095140/http://shirky.com/writings/permanet.html>

Xinci

The main advantage of democracy is honestly variantiability in method due to so many people being in it. Generally its goal is supposed to be, being far better at bouncing back or having contingencies if parts of its institution are hurt. Whereas Monarchal types tend to have the weakness of a singular method and being fairly easily snuffed out(not that it cant be effective but a lot of focus is on the individual steering the ship actually being there and being somewhat effective plan wise).

Kletanio

I think there is something being missed about Cordelia's focus on mercy. It seems to suggest she will be the type to choose when not to wield the sword. Both Hanno and Cordelia will do what they think are necessary. But justice and mercy are not the same thing at all. And this is where I find things really interesting. Cordelia, the believer in the power of the System to do the right thing, is the one supporting the importance of the System not always punishing the guilty. It is a much less absolute way of doing what is right. Hanno is learning the same lesson, but he will be more inclined to do the right thing at all costs. Both will protect the West and Good.

Bad@games

I don't think she meant Mercy in the way some think. She said mercy, not capitalized, basically saying that she would do what she can to save people. She also said she would be "the court of their justice" but that doesn't mean shes in with the Sepharim; just like how her wielding the blade of mercy does not mean the Ophamim have their hooks in her. I dont think WotW will be tied to one Choir, because it would kinda be like, oh all heros answer to this one power now over the others. The warden is separate from those powers, the middle ground, and therefore cant or wont chose one power over the other as far as the goodly powers go. I jist don't see it happening. If it did tho I would love to see more of the other Choirs

AbraKadabra

On a side note, HannoxCordelia= Hannelia is still a possibility, for Political reason, which for Procer is in keeping with the traditions.

Hargabga

I mean, Cordelia is right. You can't wield supreme executive power just because some nebulous entity threw a sword at you. Supreme executive power arises from the mandate of the masses, not some farsical narrative ceremony bending reality to the rule of cool. Granted, the accident of birth is a poor replacement to the anarcho-syndicalist commune, taking turns to acts as an executive officers, but at least actual people have some degree of say in who happens to be the big guy, unlike with Named.

Rey d`Tutto

The quote is "watery tart", as in a moist maiden, or a spoilt dessert. I mean, all the tarts I've had were flaky and moist, be they sweet or savory, but " watery" implies tastelessness, bland, mush. Like a mouthful of nope.

Hargabga

I know the quote...

Konstantin von Karstein

I should watch that movie!

shikkarasu

Everyone should watch that movie, at least once to get the references. I recommend the subtitle option for "translated to Japanese and then back to English". It's hilarious to see what makes it through the the double translations.

Konstantin von Karstein

I watched the peasants scene and the vache, but that's all. Incidentally, as a French speaker it was hilarious to hear 😊

Rey d`Tutto

I didn't know that existed. Now I must find it!

Thankee Sai.

Xinci

It is interesting to note Catherines dietary regime. Not too many vegetables other than beans, which is mildly surprising given the orphanage but then again they had limited resources and beans are cheaply grown year round.

Cordelia reminds me of Cleopatra. A ruler from a foreign bloodline who adapts to their subjects traditions enough to be thought of as one of them. The reformation tendencies are there too. I suppose both are brilliant, the question is if it will be enough for Cordelia to shape things as she desires.

The Callowan practice of not disrupting a geese migration is actually just good ecological sense. If one wants to eat well over time one doesn't disrupt major cycles of renewal. Given the nature of souls I do wonder how hard it would be for enough deaths to spread behavior amongst the living of an animal population. How many would need to die without moving on? Regardless it's nice to learn more of their superstitions. Does it make me curious about how often Cordelia got access to fish though and if that was a joke or not by her physician.

It is good that Cordelia is looking outward beyond Procer even if she doesn't quite grasp how big the currents of fate are still.

I would also say I still find it hilarious that Cat thinks the Game of the Gods can and ever will be limited to just Named.

An interesting difference between Cat and Cordelia is their use of advisors. Cordie seems generally have a wider panel of advisors in institutional roles what she may use for long term planning. Cat is similar in that she will brainstorm with a personal troupe for ideas along with various other entities who are part of the plan. However she is far more freeform in that she looks at it through the Roles and how the situation has been shaped by and shaped those Roles in turn. Both can calculate based on the objects in motion of the system they are in but one focuses on mortal institutions while the other goes for a wider view. If Cordie makes a Court of the Chosen then she will need adjudicative Named to act as her interlocutors to arbitrate the various stories that will be a part of it. It seems to have potential Summer Court vibes where a malfactor infiltrates and drives them to ruin.

Given Procer's term for effects of the Due was the Desolation her being the blade of mercy seems quite symbolic.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, we got a Folklore Episode here... but in a magical world, you don't want to be too confident that "it's just a superstition". Especially when the magic includes a version of Niven's Third Law Of Magic (The Law of Poetry: If everyone believes something is so, it is so).

john

Citation for that one? I've never heard of it before, at least not formatted that way and attributed to Niven.

Mental Mouse

My wording probably isn't exact (I have trouble with that), but Niven introduced it in his classic novel "The Magic Goes Away", and I think discussed it in one of his essays as well. (Yes, Niven has done fantasy too.)

jamesc9

I would love to have a link to all of Niven's laws of magic. I have failed at searching for it on the Internet.

Zach

I'm confused about why Catherine is so confident that future Wardens of the East will be more reasonable than random countries' leadership. I'm inclined to agreeing with Cordelia here, mainly because the harm caused by a bad Warden of the East would be much greater than the harm caused by the bad leadership of a single country.

I imagine she probably thinks that future Wardens will be regulated by the Roles established by her and whoever ends up Warden of the West, but it's not like Roles can't change over time. Catherine would be putting a lot of power in a single position.

The whole idea behind the Accords is for the affairs of Named to be separated as much as possible from those of non-Named (and for their potential power to be limited by the institutions set up by said Accords). Cordelia's idea is actually more consistent with this than Catherine's. The institutions (the Accords themselves + Cardinal) in question would already exist to deal with situations like the Folly.

Xinci

Considering Role changes in many ways stay the same or to have a exact shift have to happen over centuries, one could honestly say they tend to be a more solid model than mortals alone. Especially if one applies the logic on frameworks Akua noted, so long as everyone benefits from a particular mode, it will be continually reinforced by most parties, so anyone trying to shift would likely get crushed or simply have it reoccur. Similar to what happened with Amadeus's attempt at breaking the story of Callow and Praes.

jamesc9

@Zach, I wonder if that's the right solution; that the arbiter has to have the right connection to Cardinal, so it will be hard to find an arbiter who is as biased toward the Majlis as the Majlis might sometimes want.

Abnaxis

Cordelia's idea doesn't work on the face of it. If the Majili's don't want someone to be added to the Rolls, they just have to assign them an unreasonable quest, put forward an arbiter they know will rule on their favor, and refuse to agree to compromise with the person seeking admission on who the arbiter will be.

If both sides have to agree for an appeal to happen—and only one side benefits from the appeal being granted—then there is no real appeal process.

SuitorShooter

In Cordelias mind, Catherines way doesn't work either. If the Warden of the East, a villain, gets to veto judgements made against other villains, it's easy to imagine someone less idealistic than Cat playing favourites.

Someperson

This may be a backwards way to make the decision, but in some way I feel that a decision for Warden of the West could be made on the basis of what sort of future struggles will come to define the peace after the Dead King.

Struggle over the boundaries of Named compared to mortal authorities is honestly a very valid subject of debate, and I don't think it would necessarily be a bad thing for this to be a recurring point of contention in the future.

Judging by the way things are going, I would expect we will get to see more of Hanno's side of things soon.

DC

It is impressive that she manages to want to be a jailer so much more than Cat does that it functions as a breaking point between them.

Sylfa

She can't be both "The court of their[Chosens] justice" and not allow the chosen to appeal to the warden at the same time.

When the Barrow Sword succeeds he'll be in a great position to make a power grab, being the strongest to be added to the rolls, the first who proved themselves, and the first villain on the scrolls.

What then will the Warden of the West do if a villain controls the trials? When she comes to check why so many heroes have died they say, "oh but they asked my friend The Undertaker to choose their task, and they chose that they must survive being beheaded and burned on a pyre. They failed."

While if the warden is the one to receive the appeal they can ensure a suitable task. Or confirm that they are killing the chosen since the task was impossible and would have been appealed.

At the very least the wardens must be present when an appeal is made or they lose all control to the current leaders, leaving the worldly leaders, again, in control.

Chapter 33: Claimant (Repeat)

"Eighty-three: while it is true that tiger pits and acid floors are generally laughable, that does not mean they stop being lethal when stumbled into. Ludicrous does not equate harmless."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

I'd had enough to drink that I didn't want to head to bed immediately.

I could have burned out the last bits of inebriation with my Name – and what a luxury it was, that I could do that again – but I preferred leaving things to run their natural course. It did things to your mind to habitually ignore your body's limits. Whether it was no longer sleeping or going from drunk to sober in a heartbeat, I suspected that the more Named estranged themselves from their mortal foundation the more their Name gained purchase on them. You couldn't use that power constantly, bathe in it, without being changed by it in turn. Better to grow used to the occasional bout of patience instead, even when it felt like all the world was running out of time.

The palace had beautiful gardens, one of which the servants had called a 'night garden' in Alamans, and curiosity drove me to limp my way down that very path. The air was fresh but pleasantly without bite, which made the stroll a pleasant enough way to let the last of the drink fade away. Like so many beautiful things in this beautiful city, the night garden was a work of art. Small glass lanterns in purple and blue had been lit, revealing perfectly cut green grass and low hedges. The paths were circular, half-hidden by deep flowerbeds in wine red and golden yellow. They led to a gazebo that was all wrought iron.

Even the chairs, which seemed made entirely out of a single exquisitely folded piece of iron wire. The skill that must have taken attracted my eye just as much as the plush cushion someone had laid out on it, which spoke sweet nothings to my aching leg. Sitting at that low table with the dwarves this morning had taken a toll and the herbal brew I'd drunk only worked for so long. I still took the time to enjoy the strolls before sitting under the gazebo's roof, looking out over the edge of the garden and onto the still-lit streets of distant Salia. I'd laid my staff against one of the iron pillars, but that didn't mean I was unarmed.

When I felt the attention settle on me like a pinprick between my shoulder blades, I discreetly flicked my wrist under the table and felt my knife, the knife, fill my palm. I pricked my ear to try to pick up on the footsteps, but what I heard instead was a sigh.

"Fresh back to the Name, and already you've picked up all your old tricks," Vivienne said. "It's a mite unfair, I must say."

"Fair is for children," I quoted, watching as she came into view.

Slinking out of the shadow with the grace of the thief she had been for many years, Vivienne Dartwick did not cut a figure so different as before she had taken up her Name. She had grown no taller since becoming the Princess, and though perhaps the cut of her chin was a sliver sharper and her eyes grown a little more grey than blue, I could point to no other visible change. It was just in the way she carried who she was. The milkmaid braid on which her circlet rested could no longer be thought of as anything but a crown, and the calm she had found while I trawled the depths of the Everdark had gained... weight. Gravity. She no longer needed to frown to look serious, it was something she wore as much as her clothes.

"We're in a pleasant mood, I see," Vivienne drawled, drawing back the chair across from mine before sitting. "Did it go that badly with Hasenbach?"

I grimaced.

"It went well enough," I said. "She pushed back on the Dominion's proposal, but she did it in a way that can't possibly be seen as Procer meddling in their affairs – she's making sure they have more power, if anything."

Not that a diplomat of her calibre would have made so elementary a mistake.

"So it's the grass under your feet she wants to cut," Vivienne mused. "Not exactly a surprise, Catherine. She's been an advocate for keeping Named away from the levers of power since the start, and the Wardens as you're pushing them have their hands on more than a few."

I grunted, waving it away. I wasn't interested in going over my talks with Hasenbach when they were still so fresh. Better to divorce myself from the moment first, let the emotions calm.

"You were looking for me?" I probed.

She nodded.

"I've received reports," Vivienne said. "Masego and the Rogue Sorcerer sent word."

My eye narrowed.

"And?"

"They've 'proved the fundamental principles behind their theory to a satisfactory extent'," the Princess quoted. "Which is a relief, I'll admit. I don't see a way for us to win the war without setting loose Below's stories."

Neither do I, I thought.

"If they proved the principles it just means that Zeze's theory that the Bard is muting Below's stories is true," I said instead. "Not that they've figured out how to undo the muting. Did they get any further?"

She shook her head. Not good news, then, but far from bad news.

"Reports, plural," I invited.

She half-smiled.

"The Severance is in the city," Vivienne said. "Unless Hanno has another artefact that needs to be carried around in a sealed enchanted coffin."

"Official correspondence did mention he'd sent for it," I noted. "Best to have it here, I agree, with the Arsenal being closed."

"I thought I'd mention it," Vivienne idly said, "because an old acquaintance is on his way to Salia as well. Christophe de Pavanie was seen on the main northern road, summoned south."

I drummed my fingers against the iron table, the cacophonous clang of it oddly satisfying.

"Let me guess," I mused. "The Jacks also caught sight of the Blade of Mercy and the Bloody Sword obeying the same sort of summons."

She smirked, I sighed. With the Valiant Champion already in the city, that meant all the heroes most likely to be able to survive wielding the Severance were soon to be gathered in Salia. Hanno was looking to settle who was to wield it, I thought. And he'd decided to spring that on me without warning. Anyone but a hero touching that sword will lose their hand and maybe their head with it, I reminded myself. He might not have seen it as something to warn me of because no villains can be considered candidates. I'd be brought in when the decision was to be made, not for the footwork. Or so the most charitable spin I could put on this went.

"I'm not pleased he's looking to surprise me," I admitted.

Vivienne studied me a long moment, loose-limbed but sharp-eyed.

"You sound almost resigned," she finally said. "Like you're preparing to make your peace with that and a hundred more insults."

"There need to be a Warden of the West," I sighed.

"And it's either Prince White or Princess Blue, yes," Vivienne frowned. "Yet they're both in the running for the prize, as I understand it. So why does it sound like you think Hanno already has the bird in hand?"

"We need to win the war, Viv," I quietly said. "And I like Hasenbach for the peace, I genuinely do, but I don't think she's the woman to get us to it. Indrani was right when she put it to me: when we hit Keter, it's the Sword of Judgement we'll want leading the charge on those walls. Not the First Prince."

I believed, honestly, that for all my differences with her Cordelia might make the better Warden of the West. She was better suited to the role in a world where the Liesse Accords had been signed. But now that I'd walked away from the room where I had shared a drink with her, I could see the... fragility in her candidature. Cordelia was too bound to Procer and its ugly games, was not respected as a military leader and most of all she knew too little of namelore. The Book of Some Things might help there,

I thought, but giving it to either claimant would be an open endorsement on my part. Something I was rather hesitant to risk.

"Indrani's smarter than she pretends," Vivienne finally said, "but she still thinks through Refuge."

I cocked my head to the side.

"I don't follow," I said.

"It's about the individual for her," the Princess said. "What they can personally do. That's enough to assess most Named, and I think she's sharper than either of us when it comes to reading people, but it doesn't apply to something like the Warden of the West."

"They're in opposition, Viv," I pointed out. "They bring different things to the table, and when one is chosen what the other would have brought is lost. It's the same as when I became the Squire, only with more politics and a lot less stabbing."

"You're underestimating the both of them," Vivienne bluntly replied. "They aren't villains, Cat. They're too proud to take a loss easy, either of them, but this doesn't end with a tantrum or a corpse. If Hasenbach takes the Name, you still have the Sword of Judgement leading the charge against the walls of Keter. He'll just be doing it at her order."

My lips thinned. My experiences might have coloured my understanding of this, I thought, she was right there. But she was giving too sunny a shine to the whole affair.

"That's not how pivots work," I replied, shaking my head. "If you don't really lose anything by the choice then there's no weight and it's not a pivot in the first place. Something's at stake, Vivienne. Maybe we won't see it immediately, but the choices we make always come back to haunt us."

Two Wardens, I thought, and the Dead King. Trying to end the Hidden Horror and use his bones as the foundation of a new age. That story would not end the same way for Hanno and Cordelia, my instincts told me. It felt like I was trying to catch a fish swimming underwater, seeing only the faintest hint of a quick-moving thing in the dark. I was afraid, I could admit it in the privacy of my own mind, that making the wrong choice here might lose us the war long before we ever saw the walls of Keter.

"Fate will not change their character," Vivienne quietly said. "Don't throw away the peace for fear of losing the war, Catherine."

I drew back in genuine surprise.

"You think it should be the First Prince," I said, taken aback.

My friend had never been all that fond of Cordelia Hasenbach, and though there was respect there it had always been tempered by the memory of the Tenth Crusade and who had instigated it.

"Even for the war, it should be her," Vivienne said. "We've plenty of people who can lead the charge, Catherine, you not least among them. What the Grand Alliance is though, what the armies being led against Keter will be, is a continent-wide coalition."

She paused, choosing her words.

"Most of the nations involved have been at war with each other in the last decade," the Princess said. "Leadership will not just be swords and hope, it will be keeping the army from collapsing under the weight of its own feuds. Hanno of Arwad is respected, and even beloved by some, but charisma will not be enough to keep the wheels from coming off the cart after we take our first few punches in the stomach. His way is to lead by example, but what we're going to need is someone who can bring disparate forces together, wrangle and move them."

And it was not the Sword of Judgement, she did not need to say, that had spent the last decade and a half doing that with notable skill. The Grand Alliance wasn't something I'd made, after all, it was something I'd joined. I hummed, eyes returning to the distant lights. She wasn't wrong. Not entirely right, either, but her words rang true.

"It is all wind before I've seen Hanno," I finally said.

This was too far-reaching of a decision for me to make it in haste. But if I did end up choosing a favourite... well, there were ways to nudge while mitigating the risk. Like, for example, giving the same boon to both while knowing one would benefit more than other. Vivienne softly laughed, drawing my attention. She was looking almost wistfully at the city.

"Even five years ago," she said, "who would have thought we'd ever sit here? Scheming the fate of nations, dreaming a new order."

"We've come a long way," I smiled, "since the Thief and the Squire."

And, I realized in a moment of aching clarity, those same paths would eventually see us part. After the war, should we win, she would reign in Callow and I would sit in Cardinal. I'd have to leave the kingdom for years, I knew that. Too many people would look to me over Vivienne for orders otherwise, no matter who wore the crown, and she must have the chance to begin her reign without standing deep in my shadow. My smile turned bitter as we stared out at the city. It was not the last night we would sit like this, scheming and dreaming, but time was running out.

Sometimes I feared the peace more than the war.

—

Cordelia Hasenbach had called me to palaces, but I found Hanno of Arwad in a small farm.

It'd seen better days, the paint on the wooden shutters flanking, but it was not there that my eye lingered. The muddy path led me around the house to a cattle-wall, one shoddily made. More stacked stones than anything, and unsurprisingly large swaths of it had collapsed over the last two winters. A tall man was kneeling in the dirt, the sleeves of his grey tunic rolled up to the elbows as he stacked the stones anew. Hanno of Arwad was tall and built like a working man, muscled and calloused. The fingers he'd lost to the Severance had been severed at the phalange, leaving stumps, and he had to be careful when gripping with them.

He must have heard me coming, since I'd been hailed by soldiers in a mix of colours – Brabant and fantassins, mostly – before getting anywhere near the farm, but he kept working as I hoisted myself up on one of the parts of the wall that still stood. We'd been here before. I had first met him here at this very farm, though it had been night and instead of a white cloak hanging on the rusty hook outside the house it had been a lantern. There was another change, though, one that surprised me. As Hanno stacked the stones, he reached for a wooden bucket at his side. Wielding a spade with surprisingly skill, he slathered mortar between the stones as he rebuilt the wall.

The barest trace of a smile quirked my lips. That first night, in the dead of winter, he'd just been stacking the stones again. I'd warned him that it wouldn't stick without mortar, that he was wasting his time. Say what you would about Hanno of Arwad, but he was not one to repeat his mistakes. I waited as he finished a row, settling the stones in the mortar carefully. When the spade went back into the bucket, at last I cocked an eyebrow and spoke up.

"So, is it me or you definitely used Recall to pick up some masonry?" I teased.

A small laugh as he rose to his feet, dusting the dirt off his knees. The Sword of Judgement was more than simply tanned, darker in skin than a Taghreb but still short of the Soninke. His mother had been one, he'd told me, but his father had been Ashuran. Hanno's brown eyes had always given off a sense of steadiness, all the more reassuring when paired with his plain but honest face, but while they still did there was something missing now.

The calm, I thought, that'd always lurked beneath. The serenity born of certainty. It was gone.

His gaze, I thought, was warmer for it.

"I asked the Sculptor," Hanno told me. "He spent half an hour reminding me he is an artist and not a mason, but he had some very useful advice about mortar anyhow. Good man."

He wasn't. The Arlesite was very much one of mine. Murdering the woman who'd killed his wife had been somewhat excusable, sacrificing half a dozen people to animate the impossibly lifelike statue of her he'd sculpted significantly less so. He probably did know his way around the mason trade, though, I wouldn't deny that part.

"He is certainly a man," I casually answered, then cast a scrutinizing look at the wall.

Hanno smiled.

"And?"

"Won't be holding back a Crab anytime soon," I said, "but it looks solid. Should hold."

He looked pleased.

"I have been meaning to repay the lending of this house," Hanno said. "A few afternoons of work and I should have the entire wall back up."

I snorted.

"Do make your guests help," I suggested. "You're bound to be swimming in nobles by now and I'd pay good silver to see their like kneel in the dirt."

"A fine idea," Hanno said.

His eyes were amused, I noticed.

"You can hang your cloak over mine, if you'd like," the dark-skinned hero continued.

Ah, I grimly thought, the classic Callowan blunder. Shot in the foot by my own spite. I coughed.

"I have a bad leg," I argued. "Surely you wouldn't make a sickly maiden like myself kneel."

He eyed me consideringly, as if deciding whether or not he wanted to unpack any of that.

"You can hold the bucket," Hanno finally said.

"Eh, I'll take it," I shrugged.

It was pretty heavy, so naturally I cheated. I put my staff across my shoulders and hung it off the edge, moving around the angle until it was easier to bear. Hanno looked more amused than anything, beginning to work again as we talked.

"Rafaella tells me you've helped the Blood come to terms with the Barrow Sword," Hanno said.

His hands moved deftly to spread the mortar, but I knew better than to think that meant he was not listening to my words.

"It's a little larger than that," I said. "But it went well, I would say. They've kept what matters to them while giving Ishaq and the others enough rope."

"Rope?" Hanno asked.

"Rope," I repeated. "Whether he uses it to hang himself for pull himself up is for him to decide. Either way, he has his shot now."

The short-haired hero – it was cut even closer than last time I'd seen him, barely more than stubble – let out a noise of agreement.

"It is a reasonable compromise," Hanno said. "And holds all those who would enter the Rolls to a higher standard, which the true gain of it all as far as I'm concerned."

"Are you?" I asked.

He paused, turning to meet my eye.

"Concerned, that is," I elaborated.

A moment passed.

"You wield ambiguousness as deftly as Tariq ever did," Hanno finally replied, which was not entirely a compliment. "It was fairly bargained and no law was bent. I would have liked to be seated at the table, but I understand why I was not."

"That is your own doing, Prince White," I mildly said.

His growing conflict with the First Prince was, I had come to suspect, why he'd not been invited. The Blood liked him, I knew that well. As was only natural considering he was a famous warrior, Bestowed and the Tribunal's own champion. But Cordelia had done much for them, and they had sworn oaths of alliance to her. It would have toed the line of dishonour to turn on her now and bringing in Hanno would have been an endorsement of him. Too close to betrayal for comfort, I figured. He'd begun working again, but at my words his movement stuttered.

"You disapprove?"

A simple question, calmly asked. It carried more weight than any two words should bear. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them, balancing the bucket against my shoulders.

"Haven't decided yet," I said.

Which was, if nothing else, true. His hands began moving again.

"I did not seek it out," Hanno said.

"Didn't fight it either, the way I hear it," I noted.

He breathed out a laugh.

"No," Hanno frankly admitted. "I did not. I could do more, so I did. I will not put on a crown, but neither will I refuse the authority when I can use it to do good."

It was my time to pause, taken aback. The once White Knight had spent the last few years making a point out of staying out of anything resembling politics unless dragged into them. It was a very different song from the one I'd heard in the Arsenal that he was now singing. I had not, I'd admit, expected this much of a change in him even though the reports from the Jacks had hinted otherwise. Named were, for better or worse, set in their ways. Was that why he was no longer the White Knight and instead claimant to another Name entirely?

"It's not just doing that," I finally said. "You're not a fool, so let's not pretend that the struggle between you and the First Prince isn't a crack spreading across the Grand Alliance."

"Our differences can and will be resolved peacefully," Hanno said. "But they exist for a reason. I do not believe that Cordelia Hasenbach should lead us against Keter, and even less that she should shape the nature of Good in the coming era."

"That sounds," I mildly said, "rather like a judgement."

A pause.

"Yes," the Sword of Judgement said. "It is. My own."

Not the same song I had thought, like a fool, finding only the shallowest part of that. It was hardly the same fucking singer, by the sound of it. No wonder he'd lost his Name, he'd essentially discarded the central tenet of the beliefs that'd turned him into the White Knight. I bet you couldn't even use

Light for while, I thought. Until Fate could decide if you were turning villain or not. I rolled my shoulder. This wasn't a claim, not quite – I'd not given him that opening the way I had Cordelia, the opportunity to define himself in the face of the Other – but we were on the road there. Best I even the grounds before we got there, though, else I would be seen as backing a horse.

He'd need to be brought in on the pivot the First Prince knew and he did not. He'd taken the talks with the Dominion as I thought he would, but there was another conversation happening in Salia that he'd know very little about.

"There's something you need to know about," I finally said.

Almost reluctantly. I knew, objectively, that I was not breaking Cordelia's trust by speaking of this. He was a high officer of the Grand Alliance, he had a right to the information. And still the reluctance lingered. I forged through it, laying out the demands the Kingdom Under had made in exchange for supporting our attack on Keter. He listened carefully, finishing another layer of stones and beginning the mortar work. When I finished, he kept silent for a while. Considering the situation.

"The treaty you brought back from the Everdark includes an obligation for them to provide foodstuffs at cost for any force engaged in warfare against Keter," Hanno noted. "Are they not breaking the bargain?"

"Toeing the line," I replied. "We need reserves of food with the armies before we set out for the Twilight Ways, and they're not technically obligated to provide that even if we could pay for it. Which, for the number of troops we're marching north, we cannot."

It would be the single largest army fielded on Calernia in my lifetime, if the League truly joined its forces to ours. Largest living army, anyway.

"So while they might be bound to provide foodstuffs at cost should we lay siege to Keter, by then we would have consumed our own reserves and stand completely at their mercy," Hanno summed up.

I nodded.

"So it needs to be seen to here, before we march out," I said. "At the latest a few days after the second wave of reinforcements from Praes arrives, which is in a week and a half. Any later than that and we begin damaging our chances of taking Keter."

We'd be eating through our reserves without being on the march, making us ever more dependent on dwarven help which they would charge us all the more for. That and with every day another few miles of the Principate were lost, the Dead King's armies swelling with the dead they had butchered. If he devoured enough of Procer, there was a real chance that even if we mustered the entire continent against him we'd still lose in a pitched battle. Keter was our only real shot at ending this in time, decapitating the snake. Neshamah knew that as well, of course.

He'd be waiting for us, and every day we waited his defences grew more terrifying.

"I agree that the Herald is in opposition to others in the Kingdom Under," Hanno slowly said. "You are certain he is of Above?"

"Leaning that way, at least," I replied. "Dwarven Names are harder to read."

"Indeed," Hanno gravely replied, eyes dancing, "how dare your largely unprecedented and very useful power not be universally applicable. Most unfair."

It was hard to flip him off while holding the staff and bucket, but I was motivated enough to manage it. He laughed but turned serious soon after.

"The Herald is acting boldly because the odds are against him," Hanno said. "I recognize the instinct, I've seen it many a time. By striking first and early you prevent the greater force from mustering against you. There is our solution, Catherine."

"Going over his head?" I said. "It's been considered. There's a risk of pretty brutal backlash if the dwarves take offense to our trying to play their factions against each other."

"There won't be," Hanno firmly said. "Already the Herald is using great misery to bring about some design, which must be benevolent if his Name has not balked. For him to turn to vengeance after being caught out abusing his power would surely see him fall from grace."

"Those are thin grounds to make so important a bet on," I frowned. "Not all heroes are saints, and they're certainly not all above burning those who burned them."

"You assume he cannot be reasoned with," he pointed out. "I would speak to the Herald myself. Whatever work this is all in the service of, I am sure he can be helped to find another way to it. And if he will not compromise, then there are those standing against him."

I sucked in a breath.

"If he's warned we've figured out he's after something, we lose our only advantage," I said. "He'll cover his tracks, maybe even poison the well with the rest of the Kingdom Under to make sure we can't go above his head without paying for it. That's a lot of things risked on faith in a man who is actively using the prospect of the annihilation of the entire surface as negotiating leverage."

"If he did not intend the betterment of Creation, the fighting of an Evil, he would not be a hero," Hanno calmly said. "I understand your hesitation, for you have fought heroes for much of your career, and the Herald of the Deeps has not earned trust."

He laid his hand on a stone, turning to meet my eye.

"Yet does not mean it should not be given," Hanno of Arwad said. "Plots will not see us through this, Warden of the East. The answer lies not in forcing his hand but in freeing it to do good."

Hanno knew his namelore well. I had not needed to offer him the opportunity: he had made it himself, by bringing my Name into this. And in the same breath, as Cordelia had revealed where she and I would struggle should she rise, Hanno had done the same. The man who had once been the White Knight believed in Good. In heroes, in the champions of Above. He believed, genuinely and deeply, that they were forces for good and that their good was a force of nature as real as the wind or the tides. It wouldn't be over laws and rules and treaties I fought him, because Hanno didn't particularly care about any these.

If he believed a law unjust he would not follow it, and would not expect anyone in his place to do otherwise.

That was not something he had it in him to compromise over. When he said he would speak with the Herald of the Deeps, it was because he because there was not a doubt in him that the dwarf would do the right thing once helped into it. And even if that failed, Hanno would not abandon that principle. It was the bedrock of who he was, the belief that people wanted to be Good. That they would do it if you helped them. And the thing was, he was right often enough that I couldn't just call him wrong. I'd clash with him a fraction of how much I would clash with Cordelia Hasenbach, I thought. But on those occasions where he did choose to fight?

He would not bend. Not a mile, not an inch, not a hair. Every single time we faced each other it would be a fight to the knife, bloody and raw, a chance that the whole edifice might come falling down on our heads.

"That is," Hanno of Arwad said, "what the Warden of the West must be. Not a king or a judge but the intercessor between necessity and faith. Neither leash nor lash, a guide to the lost and hand to faltering. And, when there is no other recourse, the sword against Evil."

The world shivered. He would not rule them, I thought. The heroes. He would not bind or marshal them to a cause or purpose, because he trusted them to follow their own. Hanno trusted heroes, believed in them in a way that I simply could not. I had cut too many of them open to believe them anything more than men. There would be no centre under him, no throne. The Game of the Gods would have rules of engagement, but it would not change: the same old war would be fought, a hundred obscure skirmishes at a time. Hanno of Arwad stood tall in the morning light, calloused hands resting on stone. Workman's hands, tireless in their work.

And the coin kept spinning, spinning, spinning.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

KiltedBastich

Well now. Hanno's just sunk the whole project as far as Cat's concerned. Now the question is whether she chooses to meddle.

Frivolous

I don't think Catherine can meddle directly. It would be seen as intruding upon something not her purview.

If Catherine does meddle, it will be through Vivienne, who does have a say and a stake in the matter.

I wonder if Warden of the West might end up a shared Name, with Cordelia handling executive functions and Hanno handling pastoral and battlefield functions.

It would be unprecedented for two people to share the same Name, but the Warden Names are pretty unprecedented.

Also, I have a lot of trouble believing Hanno is still trusting enough to believe in the essential Goodness of heroes, even after the horrible fiasco of Interludes Paragons and Epitomes.

Liliet

I'm thinking shared, too.

They both suck at this! At different parts of this. Badly.

dadycoool

"You don't see the world for ho it is!" "Well, neither do you!"

It feels like that one metaphor where five blind men are asked to describe an elephant, but they're each only able to see a small part and completely misinterpret what's in front of them.

M0och123

I believe they made a song of that, a good one too!

Liliet

Mood.

Hargabga

Wait, if they are able to see, how are they blind?

shikkarasu

They touch the elephant and "see" with their hands, but no two of them touch the same part. It's a colloquialism, like how people still refer to Sign as "speaking," even when speech and sign are considered distinct in both languages.

Snappy

They could only describe what they feel. And since an elephant is big they each felt very different things.

Albert Wen

They don't actually see, they just feel what's in front of them with their hands.

Rey d`Tutto

The blind men find an elephant, and each one feels something different. The one feeling the tail describes a snake in his hands. The one feeling a leg describes a tree trunk. The one feeling the ears describes a palm leaf (just go with it.) etc. Etc. Etc.

Bad@games

Ah yes. The classic have multiple good guys to match the singular bad guy approach

Big Brother

It's not unprecedented for two people to share a Name. The Bitter Blacksmiths are siblings, one Heroic, the other Villainous.

shikkarasu

True, but there is already a split of two Wardens. Splitting the West as well waters down the broth a bit much. I'm still waiting for the Dark Horse candidate that shows up and steals the show, probably while Cat curses loudly.

Vetrom

Abigail, Warden of the West, HERO OF THE ALLIANCE!

Mental Mouse

The thing is, Warden of the East is new... but Warden of the West is not, I don't think it can be shared.

Konstantin von Karstein

Warden of the West as a Name is new. It was a title of the First Prince, but no one was Named WoTW yet.

therealgridlock

Actually, they've both been names before. We heard way back at the beginning of this story that there hasn't been as Warden for decades, and that's the most comment we got for a long time.

It was later revealed it was a really old wizard guy someone killed, but I could swear he was from Callow, so idk if it was East or West but I remember them being names before.

braxen1

I would have to double check this one when I have the time. So can't say for certain. But I'm pretty sure you're thinking of the Wizard of the West who got killed at either the field of sterges or when summerholm fell during the conquest.

Arror

That was the Wizard of the West, not a Warden.

Definitelyagoblin

You're thinking of the Wizard of the West, that was the name, not Warden.

Konstantin von Karstein

What? No, they weren't any Warden before. Cordelia never was.

It was the Wizard of the West, not the Warden! And he was killed by Wekesa.

Mental Mouse

Not currently, but ISTR there was mention of prior Wardens of the West.

Konstantin von Karstein

No, there weren't, not Named anyway. It is a traditional title of the First Prince, like Tyrant for DE, but was never a Name.

Linnus42

I don't think Hanno's wrong about the Herald. Even if the Dwarf was a Villain. It's hardly in the Dwarves' interest to be the only force left around fighting the DK. That just raises their casualties and the risk for them.

Fundamentally, the issue with Cordelia's approach is she doesn't get Named or Heroes. Being the Judge and trying to bind them to government is not a good approach for all names. For some sure who are tied into countries but saying well the Civilian law says this ain't going to stop them. Because well I don't think I need to make a list of bad laws that historically people were right to ignore.

dadycoool

Cordelia being Warden almost seems like what would happen if Cat was Dread Empress. She doesn't come from that world, so she simply doesn't have any clue as to how it works. She looks at what they're doing and sees problems to be fixed when all they're doing is living their lives in a way that works.

KiltedBastich

Remember that the bigoted, genocidal elves of the Golden Bloom are counted as Good, too. There's a lot of wiggle room in Good. It could very well be that the Herald honestly believes all those poor simpleton surface dwellers would be better off being guided by the benevolent will of the Dwarves, to keep them from all the silly mistakes they keep making as free people. Why, being enslaved is for their betterment! (retch)

Remember that was an actual real-world ideology held by people who believed themselves to be good, moral, righteous, upstanding people.

Hanno is making a very large mistake here, assuming that Goodness is a consistent enough thing not to contain a multitude of conflicting ideologies. It's a shockingly naive position, considering what he's been through already. I mean, just the fight with the Mirror Knight where he lost fingers should have been enough to disabuse him of that bit of simplistic nonsense, yet here we are.

Sinead

He has commented on having the perspective through Recall to not have this view of Good. This reads that he believes those that have not proven themselves entirely faithless (the worst of the Damned and the extremists Heroes) are worthy of an extended hand. Not saying there isn't any issue for what Hanno is doing, but there is a very solid core to his reasoning. His faith and ability to trust still has the elements of striking out at the faithless. Contrast with Cordelia who would keep the large waves from forming in the first place, but cannot do anything if something blows up out of nowhere (to the same degree as Hanno).

Zach

But part of the point Catherine makes in this chapter is that, under Hanno, nothing would fundamentally change about the "game of the gods." What constitutes "understanding Named" can change.

I don't think Cordelia is wrong in her objection to the Wardens having power in the relationships between Named and nations. It's one thing for the Wardens to have authority over the Named in their purview, but Catherine's idea (in the context of the proposal arrived at with the Dominion leaders) would effectively give the Wardens indirect authority in matters of nations (in situations where Named influence nations/governments, such as being added to the Rolls in the Dominion).

I think Catherine's current preferences would give too much power to future Wardens (and Hanno's preferences would just take that even further). Under Cordelia's ideology, the main problems the Accords are meant to address would still be addressed (since Named that are trying to build doomsday devices, etc, would still be cracked down upon; all the "regulating the behavior of Named" elements would be unaffected). I feel like Catherine's objections to Cordelia are largely outside the scope of the Accords themselves. Hell, Catherine is the one who initially wanted the Accords to have a "no Named heads of government" rule (and only accepts it now as a necessary compromise). Giving the Wardens indirect authority in matters of state goes against that principle.

George host

Not all Names are created equal. Cat is okay with the Wardens having that power because she fully intends to shape the Roles those Names represent. If she gets her way, the people with those Names are going to be some of the most trustworthy people to hold that power on the continent by virtue of their capacity to become the Wardens in the first place.

Cat is against random names with doomday-weapon-making Roles getting to express that Role, not the raw concept of Named having power. Random Names getting to rule creates that risk, giving Wardens a degree of power is very unlikely to.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I get where you and Cordelia are coming from, but consider: should the Names of greatest sway over how Named and Nameless treat one another, those Names which concern rulership in some way, really be exempt from the primary check and balance in the system? How exactly is a Name defined by the desire to protect the interests of the Nameless a less reliable influence on politics than a Name defined by whatever desire happens to motivate someone to claim a throne?

Let me put it this way: for every Kingfisher Prince or Good King, there are a lot of Tyrants.

elanevensong

Omg it's happening

Linnus42

As for Viv's Analysis, Cat pointed out one flaw. I say the other is how likely someone is to compromise also depends on how close they think they are to winning. Given the forces behind them at this time and the state of Procer. I argue Hanno is in the far stronger position than Cordelia. Ergo that is going to impact how the compromise works out. Still Cat gets most of it right in that you are not going to get the best from both. Though I don't know I have seen this world, a high CHA score goes a long way and well when you add military prowess lol historically that is an effective plan.

Anomandris

You know, I cant help but think that if Tariq were still alive, there would have been no issue.

So on one side of the decision, you have pragmatism, on the other side idealism. Both anchored in Good.

It is an impossible choice because ultimately the weight one has on either side of the scale is a personal choice. Not a universal one.

The pragmatic might argue that what is the point of ideals if they don't end up working, the idealist might argue whats the point of working if you aren't aiming for an ideal.

Also, Cat seems a bit heavily biased (at least from the last 3 chapters) by her own experiences. I get PGtE is where Heroes are 'bad' and Villains are 'Good', but that is not the case in a vast majority in Calernia. I actually don't think her hand should be on the scale (and if not for the kerfuffle with Bard, one that Angels would have shut down hard already)

'Ladi Williams

No.

PGtE is where we are shown that there is good in Evil and there is bad in Good.

That no one has the monopoly on being good or bad.

Hargabga

It's almost like inhuman eldritch entities have no business defining human morality.

dadycoool

It's so nice when Cat and Hanno are friendly. They have such fun banter. The trouble comes from when they get even the slightest bit misaligned. I don't know how she'll make the choice, but then again, she might not necessarily have to. What if she makes the Hierarch do it? Have Alaya summon him as the elected ruler of Praes, hand him the book, and follow Hanno's example, letting Judgment make the call.

Anomandris

"We need to attack the Dead King and save Calernia!!"

"Not without filing Forms 16B and 19-2a in triplicate and waiting for the mandated 3 month opinion-canvassing period, you don't."

Liliet

Oh my god they both fucking suck. So much. They're both idiots!!!
Get the both of them in the same room and make them talk TO EACH OTHER and not just to you Catherien!!!

dadycoool

But then the coin would land on its side, and she thinks she needs to make a heads-or-tails decision!

Liliet

Oh noes, what Catherine thinks is a problem! What a NEW, ENTIRELY UNPRECEDENTED situation!

stares at the Ater arc

shikkarasu

lol, so true. This is a Claimant situation. Even when Black had a favourite Squire he didn't just go around knifing Cat's rivals; he gave her a knife -the knife- and trusted in her abilities. Come on, WotW, learn from Dad's example one last time.

'Ladi Williams

You mean WoTE right? Cos Black was dad to her and no one else.

shikkarasu

Yep, ignore me. I am very bad at proofreading.

Anomandris

I have mentioned this elsewhere, but Cat seems being dragged by her own bias here. I mean from a Villain perspective, it basically flows that two claimants can't co-exist peacefully and resolution cant be short of blood. She is doing what seems to be in front of her, not what a reader of the story would. In many ways, this is quite similar to the Saint's story – doing what HER experiences have taught, not what is blindingly obvious to the reader.

Hanno's belief of inherent goodness would surely extends a lot towards Cordy.... And likewise for Cordy believing Hanno can pull her people out of this gigantic apocalypse.

hakureireimu

I dunno, Cordy isn't Named right now...and why would Cordy believe that Hanno can do anything he's not already doing?

KiaraTurtle

I endorse this plan. And while they do that Cat can finally go talk to Hakram.

Hargabga

Wait, you mean calmly discuss and sort out your differences like some kind of... adults? Get out of here. What if they accidentally cooperate and it turns out they never needed Catherine in the first place?

Liliet

Catherine jolts up from the nightmare, then realizes she has to make it come true.

Anomandris

Why would she dream of negotiations and problem-solving with Hanno and Cordy, when she could, ahem, be dreaming of something else with them?

Why would anyone?

Hargabga

Hey now, don't kinkshame. Geopolitics is sexy.

Liliet

I said it's a NIGHTMARE.

Zach

The problem is that Named don't "sort out differences"; they're defined by their convictions. As Catherine mentions in this chapter, Hanno will never be willing to bend on any issue that overlaps with what he considers just or unjust.

I think that Hanno is unacceptable as WotW because he'll inevitably end up directly conflicting with nations and likely even the Warden of the East. His principles won't allow him to limit the scope of his Role to "regulation of Named affairs."

Cordelia, on the other hand, has a set of principles that don't really conflict with the Accords. She is firmly opposed to Named having power in matters of nations. Catherine is unhappy with this because there will always be a part of her that wants to be able to take action to right wrongs (she's even admitted to this desire to "be in control"). But the point of the Accords isn't to prevent all bad things from happening; it's solely intended to limit the harm caused by Named (and Cordelia's convictions don't conflict with this in any way, while Hanno's do).

KageLupus

Unfortunately I feel like the time for getting in a room and talking has long passed. If that was going to work it would have been months or even years earlier, before the pivot came to a head. At this point there is too much narrative weight behind one of them getting a new Name for mundane conversations to really solve anything.

That said, I feel like Hanno and Cordelia were never going to be able to resolve this on their own. They are both just too different with their fundamental world views. Hanno thinks that Heroes just need to be guided and they will do Good naturally on their own. He also think that objective morals are more important than any rule or law. Cordelia is the exact opposite, and thinks that Named should not be able to hold themselves above the law. She has also seen what can happen when a "Hero" goes off the rail, since she was present when the Saint of Swords decided it was better to torch the entire Principate rather than work with Cat.

As much as I agree that getting in a room and talking things over is an underutilized solution, in this specific case I have a hard time seeing how those two are going to come to an agreement when they are polar opposites on how Named should be governed.

Liliet

Well, they do both respect and like Catherine, so there's that.

Juff

Typo Thread:

I trawled > I'd trawled
There need > There needs you still > you'll still have the change > have the chance flanking > flaking himself for pull > himself or pull which the true > which is the true
"Yet does > "Yet that does

nick012000

Calling it now: the issue with the Dwarves is going to be the pivot that selects the Warden of the West.

Hargabga

We have probably three pivots like what someone said. Probably one would be won by Cordelia, one by Hanno, and the final one breaks the tie. Could be Hanno wins dwarves, Cordelia wins Levant, and Cat makes final call.

edrey

they both fuck at this and their lack of experience is so obvious that is painful, cordelia doesnt understand how Named and stories work because Procer lack the history with those monsters, and that can backfire in a very ugly way. Hanno simply cant understand how normal people act, that they act on concor with their own personal concept of good and morals, and normaly for petty reasons, not ideals. he simply loss contact with normal people outside the war.

in one side we have a person that think law can stop an angelic brainwash, and the other side a person who think the good of the nazy elves, the greedy dwarfs and petty humans can be guided to the greater good.

so we have three pivots, the warden of the west, the dwarfs and below stories, so how can they be solved with one move?

Kildare

Oh yessss they would both fuck. That would be a way to end this

Rey d`Tutto

Nope.

Autocorrupt. Suck and Fuck are only a D away.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's clear now, Cat has to take both Jobs. And in doing so, becomes the Arbiter Dread Empress Benevolent the Second Practical Guide.

Someperson

Guys guys guys I've figured out the big brain move to deal with Wandering Bard's last act of spite.

Catherine needs to write her own book. A second book. Like the Book of Some Things, but a guide to villains instead of heroes.

She can call it...

The Practical Guide to Evil.

Sugar Roll

My money is on Hanno. I think he's going to be the Warden of the West.

Rey d`Tutto

Taking a stand! Yay!

masterofbones

So either way we are going to have a massive thorn in Catherine's side.

Cordelia will always put Procer first, will always choose her own power over any other concern, but knows how to compromise. She would be a constant annoyance to Catherine, but threaten her enough and she will give ground.

Hanno is an actually good person, which creates a different set of problems. He will work with Catherine for the betterment of the entire world, unlike Cordelia. However, he isn't okay with being evil to do so, also unlike Cordelia.

—

Personally I think the choice is easy. They will both be annoying and frustrating, but only one of them actually cares about the world aside from Procer.

'Ladi Williams

The problem is whenever they do have a single misunderstanding....Hanno would rather burn the house down than give an inch.

Hargabga

I don't think this is the case? Like obviously Cordelia cares about the Procer, but not to the degree you describe. I struggle to see where your opinion of Cordelia as "not a good person" comes from, honestly. Her core idea is to ensure that Heroic principles are actually good, besides being Good. Like William calling onto Contrition to brainwash a city. Like Pilgrim killing a village. Like Saint of Swords writing down hundreds of thousands of people for the sake of better world. Like Red Axe putting her personal vendetta over literal apocalypse.

She wants to curb the worst excesses while Hanno wants to nurture the best intentions. It's the typical statistical dilemma of quality control. Only instead of products we have Heroes. She trusts in law and rules, while Hanno trusts in people and Heroes.

Zach

The key difference here is that only one of their goals is actually connected to the supposed goals of the Accords. The whole point of the Accords is to limit the harm caused by Named and to prevent normal peoples' lives from being completely at the whim of the big pieces in the Game of the Gods. Cordelia's goals are 100% consistent with this. Hanno's are not; his principles will require that he directly endorse or oppose Named action on the basis of whether he thinks it's good or not.

Catherine is falling into the trap of thinking "but if I don't have this power, I won't be able to stop bad things from happening." But that has nothing to do with the Accords, and this desire "to be in control" is something Catherine has acknowledged herself.

Mental Mouse

> So either way we are going to have a massive thorn in Catherine's side.

Well, yes. The Warden names represent moral, theological, and political divides. Conflict is fundamental to the arrangement. And even before the WoTW Name came in, neither Cordelia nor Hanno could avoid deep and significant conflicts with Cat; this despite the fact that she actually likes and admires both of them, and vice versa.

beleester

Yeah, I kind of think that Hanno would make a better fit for the Warden of the West because he's more opposed to Cat's philosophy.

Cordelia and Cat have a little bit of debate on "what's really more important, Named or mortal institutions?" but Cat is a big fan of institutions too, she just doesn't trust Procer's specifically. Her split with Hanno is much more fundamental – "How do you improve the world, by compromising on the things you can't change or by trying to change them anyway?"

sengachi

Cordelia just recently made a series of decisions which guaranteed Procer would end up dissolving as a political entity in the long run to ensure she could keep the war going against the Dead King. I don't think she's as married to the idea of Procer over everyone else as you think. She just takes her responsibilities, whatever they happen to be, very seriously.

Tenthyr

I like that I can't decide either. Because Hanno is right, people are essentially decent when given the chance, given a good place to grow in. But Catherine and Cordelia are right that there's always someone who will abuse trust, always. What is more important to enshrine for good now? The trust that people can be good, or the assurance that abusing the power of Good will be punished properly?

frederic

Given the rule of three, I wonder if there will not be a surprise candidate for the post of Warden of the West. A surprise, Dark Horse candidate not one is expecting, which will step in at the last moment.... I know we haven't seen rule of three apply to competition for names before and it doesn't apply to everything (for example, there is Heaven/Good and Below/Evil but no Neutral side and only 2 wardens, it seems) but given the importance the post...

Mental Mouse

Indeed, not everything is is threes! The Wardens are an old-fashioned duality, Above versus Below.

A third Warden candidate would technically be possible, but there's been no foreshadowing whatsoever of such a thing, and that by itself argues against it.

Anomandris

I vote Abigail!!

Xinci

Mm, so unless theres a twist and it becomes a situation where the Warden of the West has a adjutant or a split in power held its probably going to be Cordelia. Unless the other Named vote on it maybe, but then still may be her. She wants to make a centralized powerstructure mirroring somewhat what Cat already says she wants to make for Villains. While Hanno wants to make a decentralized one with dispersed Heroes, focusing on nurturing Good. The issue though is that the Age of Order isnt a victory for Good. Its one for Evil, where the regulation of powers for stability is its key focus, and if a power or structure can't be regulated it must be expunged.

It is easier to see how Above supports Cordelia as a prospect here, her methodology is a Good mirror, to Cats own when it comes to regulation. She preponizes their notion to rule instead of guide(it is funny that Hanno's line is the actual one to mention guidance), compared to Hannos proponence of decentralized guidance. Both support their philosophy since in either case they both support the creation and continuation of fascimiles of Good at various levels, but one iterates a more "contemporary" approach.

I do admit Cat thinking about Name alienation is fair, if possibly somewhat shallowly wrought in how it was framed, given the nature of their power compared to things like Devils.

Mental Mouse

“preponize”?

Xinci

Ah, I meant propounds. I messed up the grammar

Reader in the Night

The Age of Order is a win to the common people that have to live in a world where Good and Evil duke it out. If one side can be said to be more limited by the Accords than another, it's not Above: Below is the one that loses most of it's oldest, most powerful stories. Stories that usually end with them losing, it's true, but their stories nonetheless.

jamesc9

So loosening those stories might lead to winning more.

MoreBeer

I suspect it'll be Hanno. Agreed with the first bit but I don't believe this will resolve based on the accords. I think it can't, and that this being framed as which is better for the accords is a red herring which confuses the true issue.

WotW is the mirror to WotE. It should rule the heroes the same way Cat rules the villains. By understanding their nature and wielding a big stick. As the former sword of judgment, Hanno understands this and would be accepted by the heroes. Cordelia wouldn't.

The accords will come or they won't. Hanno's stubbornness doesn't sink them, though he will make compromise difficult. I can't see him going to war against the continent though, not to defend a hero that violates them. He already executed the Red Axe. He made the right choice, but did not bend on the political expediency of her sentence.

Likewise though, the war against Keter doesn't turn on this. Hanno won't fail to lead if he isn't the WotW. Cordelia won't fail to do what she must either, even if not WotW.

The final factor for me though is Hanno is transitioning. He will have a new name soon. Cordelia will either become WotW or remain unnamed. Either is possible but it seems far more likely Hanno becomes WotW than that he reverts to White Knight or assumes some other unforeshadowed name.

Daniel E

At a base level, I feel that Hanno's differences are easier to work with. The Warden deals with Named, simple as that. Trying to intertwine the Role with mortal laws is just asking for trouble. Which is not to say there can't be some overlap, but I don't see how the latter can ever supersede the former to the degree that Cordelia wants.

JRogue

I think that is part of the problem, and maybe one we are overlooking.

Cat found out when she was becoming Warden of the East, that it was not just authority over Named, but also over the East, over the nations themselves. That is what a Warden is, they are more.

Here we have Cordy wanting Nations over Named, and Hanno wanting Names over Nations. There is no balance, they lean heavily toward one or the other. Cat balances both and knows that. Cordy and Hanno have no interest in balance.

Regret

Maybe the solution is for Cat to cease being balanced, thereby creating space for both a Names-Warden and a Nations-Warden in the East. Then, for balance's sake, the Warden of the West must split too.

Or maybe Hanno and Cordy need to marry, and "become one". If any story has power, it's that one. Or maybe magically merge them? We haven't seen any magical atrocities in a couple chapters, we're about due.

SpeckofStardust

And that comes from the fact that nations in the east normally have Named rulers.

Preas was quit literally ruled only by Named.

Callow for most of history was also ruled over Named.

The west dont.

Procer which rarely has Named in positions of ultimate authority.

Levant which has Named rulership but not nearly as constant as the east. After all the four current rulers not 1 is Named.

This further matches the biggest divide in Good and Evil.

Evil might is right. Good right is might.

As such the warden of the "West/good" doesn't need to hold authority over all in order to be the influence to do the job.

While the warden of the "East/evil" needs to be the biggest stick to do the job.

Zach

The problem is that Hanno wouldn't avoid mortal laws – he'd ignore them (and inevitably come into conflict with them). He considers morality to be above laws/institutions, and this means that he would directly conflict with nations/leaders that he thinks are bad.

Cordelia wants nations to have authority in situations that are directly connected to them (like the current situation with adding Named to the Rolls in the Dominion). This is a problem under the Truce and Terms (since amnesty needs to be enforced, meaning you can't let nations punish Named – this was the problem in the Red Axe situation), but as far as I'm aware the Truce and Term are a temporary thing during the war and will give way to the Accords after it's over. I don't see any problem with letting nations judge Named for their actions post-war (which is what Cordelia would want and Hanno would be strictly opposed to). It's only a problem currently because they need to ensure high Named participation in the war.

Reader in the Night

The main problem I see with Cordelia is that she fundamentally fails at Namelore. Heroic Names aren't built of people who will respect the law if they feel the law is wrong. Cat puts the differences between Hanno and Cordelia in terms of what conflict they would have with her, but she really should be thinking about what conflict they will have with their charges.

Cordelia wants to be a Judge to the Heroes, like Cat is for the Villains. Except that that's not gonna work quite as well for her; when Cat was working up to the Name of Warden, she essentially got asked multiple times "By what authority do you boss us around?" And her answer was: "Because I'm stronger than you." And that's fine for Villains, since they already function on the premise that might makes right anyways. If Catherine can quash all challenges to her authority, then she deserves to be in charge, right?

But that's not how Above works. Most of them would rather break than bend on their principles, and there's very little Cordelia can actually do short of killing them to dissuade them from doing what they think is right. Do you think the Saint of Swords, the Pilgrim, heck, the Mirror Knight, even Hanno himself, would stop ignoring any law that gets in the way because Cordelia asked them to, Warden or not? Cordelia's reign as Warden would be, frankly, very messy.

Zach

This isn't really true, though? All Named have strong convictions and things they're unwilling to bend on, and both Above and Below have examples of people who are more or less accommodating. It's important to remember that the more "pragmatic" villains like Black or Catherine herself are exceptions (in the same way as someone like Rogue Sorcerer is an exception among heroes in terms of his attitude).

Also, Namelore is something you can learn and there's no reason that Cordelia wouldn't be willing to learn it. She just grew up in a situation where she wasn't exposed to it and the only Named she knew personally was her cousin who has trouble communicating.

The most important thing here is mostly unrelated to the skill/capabilities of the people in question – it's their ideology. Hanno's ideology fundamentally conflicts with the goals of the Liesse Accords. The main intent of the Accords is to divorce the affairs of Named from the rest of society so that normal people aren't at the mercy of the players in the Game of the Gods. Hanno's ideology would force him to directly intervene to whatever extent necessary in order to uphold his ideas of right and wrong; he would only cooperate with the Accords to the extent that they didn't interfere with this. Cordelia, on the other hand, has convictions that are consistent with the Accords.

Catherine herself originally wanted to ban Named from being rulers (before realizing it wouldn't be practical). The current Dominion proposal would essentially give the Wardens authority in situations where the affairs of Named intersect with the affairs of nations/governments. This is something Cordelia is opposed to (and correctly IMO). Catherine would prefer to give the Wardens more authority so that they can circumvent poor decisions on the part of nations, but this is short-sighted (albeit short-sighted in a way that is 100% consistent with Catherine's character – she's acknowledged herself that she has a tendency to fear losing control). Deciding how to deal with this "grey area" is important to defining the post-war society, and the choice about who becomes Warden of the West will essentially answer that question.

beleester

I don't think Cat has an accurate read on Hanno at all. She's saying that he absolutely not bend to a law he considers unjust, but that's like... a central character trait of his. He's willing to bow to the law of mortals, even when it ties his hands. Even now, he expects that this dispute with Cordelia is going to be settled peacefully. He'll take the crown if it's given, but he won't take it by force if the decision goes against him.

And sure, the change to Prince White has changed his views on justice quite a bit, but that makes the idea that Heroes Never Compromise seem even more bizarre. Cat is literally seeing Hanno explain how he changed his mind and saying "this is proof that Hanno will never bend."

Shade

I agree. It doesn't seem like Cat is seeing this through a clear, non-villainous lens. It's almost like how she perceives villains and her role with them will directly impact the shape of heroes that contest them because she won't see otherwise. I hope she learns to.

I really think this chapter is partly about showing how much Hanno has been willing to change. Fixing the wall with brick and mortar being an example of his willingness to change after mistakes are pointed out and also as an example of his resolve to continue the course. He will do right, he will do good, and if he's wrong he'll learn from it and try again. What was the use of Recall without the willingness to learn from mistakes and change? Hanno even talking and working with Cat after the Red Axe incident is a show of faith and willingness in change, I believe.

AbraKadabra

My take on this is that Cordi is too grounded in reality to be a named, not idealist enough, while Hanno is the opposite, he is not grounded enough in practical matters. They are good for each other.

I can just imagine that Cat (or Robbers ghost 😊) would separately inform the two that the other is marrying before the attack on Keter, and they would only realise before the altar that everyone expects them to marry, only they were not informed. 😊😊😊

jamesc9

So this is a sort of geopolitical shotgun wedding.

What is the appropriate shotgun for persuading each of them?

Sulo

#TeamHanno

Sykomantis

Hmmm... you know, there's another "ruler" Named kind of hanging around that a lot of people look up to, and whose story is all about protecting the people from the evils of both people AND nations, and who got along pretty well with Cat. I bet if she gave him the Book, he'd get caught up fast enough to be worth it. I'm talking of course of the Kingfisher Prince. He also displayed a great ability to control himself while escorting the Red Axe in Arsenal, and showed the ability to bend to custom in that mountain pass with all the nails. Dark Horse anyone?

Amostyx

I think it's safe to assume that whoever is Warden of the West will also have the Book of Some Things, either because they get the Name and then the Book or getting the Book gives them the Name.

So what does that do to each of them?

If Cordelia gets the Book, then that would cover up her weakness on Namelore by giving her direct access to 50% of all stories. You can't ask for a better crash course on Named.

If Hanno gets the Book, that would make Recall stronger and firmly push him into the "wise mentor" role – he knows everything about everything.

From that perspective, I don't think it's good to dismiss Cordelia because of her weakness with Namelore, and I think that she would push the Wardens into a closer mirror of each other, which would be better for both Names. Two Wardens, equal but opposite.

If Hanno turns into a Grey Pilgrim v2.0, then it feels like the Warden of the East is more likely to slide into a Dread Emperor/ess v2.0. Opposing, powerful but in different ways.

ActionKermit

Abigail for Warden of the West \o/

Forum Explorer

Someone brought up Rozala as a better candidate than both and I have to agree on that. She's got the experience with politics to handle that level of things, while also having the idealism to just say flat no to stuff that goes too far.

Cordelia is way too flexible. She was willing to sacrifice Callow as a nation to ensure peace by starting the Crusade in the first place. Or to take whatever action necessary to keep Procer in the fight against the DK. It's useful in the short term, but I feel like Cat needs a hard mirror, someone who draws a line in the sand and say 'you're going too far'.

Also people don't give Hanno enough credit. He handled the Mirror Knight. Yeah, it cost him a few fingers, but considering the mutilation Cat goes through in order to win, that's nothing. He did agree to the Red Axe being executed. His disagreement was in letting the Princes of Procer get their pound of flesh to assuage their pride.

RoflCat

Reminder:

"It was never only Named or nation, I realized with dim horror. I'd always needed to have both."

This is where the current Warden of the East stands, and to be that equal Warden of the West must wield at least similar capability.

Both Cordelia and Hanno are currently failing to be an actual equal to Catherine's Warden of the East because they have only Named or nation, not both.

This means either they need to share the post and split their focus (i.e. pretty much how they functioned before the crack at Arsenal) or someone else who can handle both need to step up to the plate.

A certain Named prince comes to mind...(some people have mentioned Rozala, but I feel she's on her way to a different Name from that declaration she made at the Graveyard)

Chapter 34: Movements

"At this point, it's a matter of principle."

– Dread Emperor Abominable, the Thrice-Struck

I knew myself to be dreaming the moment I saw the tall trees of the Duskwood.

The city stolen from the depths and brought to the surface like a haphazard pile of loot still stood, I saw, but it was no longer the spirited lakeside capital I'd once glimpsed. The labyrinthine streets that snaked through the finest pieces of half a dozen of the greatest cities of the Empire Ever Dark were no longer filled with busy drow, its rough canals nearly free of the strange stone barges that had sailed them. Serolen was not empty, behind the half-empty streets there was still life and energy, but its vigour had been muted.

"Too many went south," Andronike murmured in my ear, voice deep and smooth as a sleep from which none woke. "We are bleeding dry."

I breathed out shallowly, the presence of half my patronesses grounding the loose dream into something altogether more solid. My feet touched the air, which was as solid as if I stood on a pane of glass, and my fingers closed against my yew staff. The length of dead wood followed me everywhere, even in my sleep. Andronike stood at my side, draped in the long shimmering silk robes that had once been the mark of the Twilight Sages. Her hair was long and dark, and at her hip rested a silver mask. We stood side by side, my gaze following those silver-blue eyes in contemplating the city below.

"You still hold the outskirts of the forest," I said.

"We lose more every day," Komena scorned from my right, voice ringing of steel on steel. "The Gloom will not hold."

Where the eldest sister wore the mark of her days as a sage, the youngest had kept into apotheosis the marks of her years of war. She wore the ancient ornate armour of the soldiers of the Empire Ever Dark, and at her hip a long blade of obsidian lay sheathed. Her grip on it was tight, her long fingers almost as claws.

"The demon-traps have not served?" I asked.

After the Arsenal, where the mere presence of a demon of Madness had been enough to send the Night into disarray, Sve Noc had understood the dangers in what they might face. Much sweat and blood had been spent finding an answer to the abominations, many weapons being made but none half as useful as the demon-traps. Simple cubes of obsidian, they had been crafted using the memories of the finest enchantments of the Twilight Sages with the sole purpose of entrapping and containing demons. They would only do this for ninety-nine years, but that was quite enough. We would be victors or dead by then.

"After we caught the fifth demon the Dead King ceased using them directly against the Gloom," Andronike said. "Yet it does not matter. He has found ways to pierce it, built bridges through. It is a war of attrition now, Catherine Foundling."

And no one won wars of attrition with Death.

"There are no reinforcements to send from the south," I admitted. "Things have taken a turn for the worse here. We're gathering all our strength for a strike against Keter but there's trouble. The dwarves are turning the screws on us."

I didn't bother to spell out exactly how, knowing that the feather-light touches against my mind were the Sisters taking up my invitation to have a look.

"Greed is set in the bones of the nerezim," Komena darkly said.

"We may be able to free a sigil for the assault on the Crown of the Dead," Andronike said, "but do not expect much of us. Enemies beset us from without and within."

I grimaced.

"Kurosiv hasn't been brought to heel?" I asked.

Komena's anger was like an open flame, warming the world of the dream around us. It was not her who answered, unsurprisingly.

"The leech learned more of power than we ever knew," Andronike said. "It cannot be destroyed without bringing about the collapse of a great part of the Night."

Which would be disastrous, after having lost so much of it in Hainaut already. Frankly it was a miracle that the Firstborn were holding off so well against Keter so far. Mind you, part of that had to be sheer numbers and the fact that the Dead King had to march his armies north. In time he'd mobilize strong enough forces to overwhelm Serolen, none of us were deluded enough to believe otherwise. It was just a question of whether or not we could bring the war to a close before that.

"Kurosiv refuses to fight," Komena harshly said. "The insipid maggot. It will know agony without end for this."

"Yet we will not strike first and begin a civil war as we fight for survival," Andronike said, her anger subtler but no less deep. "Its sigil is as a kingdom, now, and worships it as a god equal to us. It would be costly to end them."

I nodded. I'd taken the same gamble they now balked at, but that made me understand their reluctance all the more. It had been an... expensive thing, settling the East. I forced aside the thought before my fingers could dig too deep into my palm.

"Is there word you would have me pass to the rulers of the south?" I asked.

I fell, not fearfully but into a warm and welcoming darkness. I felt arms wrap around me, great wings flapping around us, and the whispers were spoken into my ear.

"Hurry," Sve Noc said. "Else you will face the armies of the north as well as the south."

I slept deeply, after that, and without dreams. It was the best night of rest I'd had since Ater.

—

"You know," I said through a mouthful of pastry, "it's a little screwed up that the best breakfast I ever had was when I was a prisoner in Wolof."

Vivienne aristocratically wrinkled her nose at me from across the table.

"It's a little screwed up that the Queen of Callow never learned not to talk with her mouth full," she retorted.

In the spirit of love and friendship, I crammed another pastry into my mouth and leaned over so my chewing would spill crumbs all over her plate. She forced me into retreat by swatting away wildly at my head with official correspondence from Duchess Kegan, which I magnanimously allowed since I was busy choking. I swallowed it all down with cough, then drank down a mouthful of water. Alamans loved to have flaky little pastries for breakfast, often with fruits and fresh cream, but I usually found it too sweet a fare. These had been good, though, maybe baked without honey. The palace's cooks had remembered my tastes.

It was characteristically Proceran to provide fine cuisine even in the face of the end times, I mused.

"Now that you've returned to pretending to be civilized," Vivienne tartly said, "can I brief you on yesterday's reports?"

"I was waiting for you to," I smugly smiled.

I saw in her eyes that she considered throwing cutlery at me for a moment before reminding herself that she'd probably be seen doing it. She settled for a glare instead before she began speaking.

"The First Prince is behaving unusually," Vivienne told me.

I cocked an eyebrow.

"How so?"

"She spent nearly all afternoon yesterday cloistered with every prince and princess in the region," the dark-haired woman said.

"Which is only to be expected, considering her position," I pointed out. "She needs their support if she's to keep her hands on the reins of the Proceran armies."

If it came to popularity with the rank and file, Hanno would likely win. That wasn't how it worked, though. While he was popular with soldiers and officers, ultimately these were still very much private armies. Those men and women had sworn oaths to serve a crown or a company, and many would balk at following the Sword of Judgement if it meant breaking faith with their prince or captain. If the remaining royals publicly backed the First Prince, it'd turn the tide of opinion. It wasn't like Cordelia was unpopular with the soldiers. She just hadn't won the kind of loyalty you could only get from fighting with them in the thick of it.

"The meeting is nothing surprising," Vivienne agreed. "The amount of time she spent on it though, is."

I let out a noise of belated understanding. While I'd seen little of it myself – in all humility, these days when I needed to speak with someone they made the time – all reports from the Jacks agreed that Cordelia Hasenbach was an exceedingly organised woman. She measured the hours of her day and doled them out with as much precision as she could. It was out of the ordinary for her to just throw an entire half day at anything.

"You think she's having a hard time wrangling them?" I asked.

"Maybe," Vivienne frowned. "She's got loyalists in that crowd, but it's true there are those with little love for her and she has much less leverage to keep them in line now."

"Otto Reitzenberg and the Kingfisher Prince will back her," I said. "Our people in their army are sure and I've no reason to doubt Senior Mage Kilian."

Vivienne gave me a look as she decided whether or not to make something of that, then wisely decided not to.

"They're her only two solid supporters," Vivienne said. "Beatrice of Hainaut has been fighting side-by-side with the White Knight for two years now and has warm relations with the man. It's the same with the rest of the lakeside crowns: Cleves and Hainaut see him as the best bet for getting back their lands."

That and the current Princess of Cleves, Carine Langevin, had a history of enmity with Hasenbach. She'd been the Mirror Knight's lover, part of the plot to backstab the Firstborn after the war, and that'd been before both her father and older brother were buried by the First Prince. For good reasons, mind you, but that knowledge wouldn't anything to lighten up the graves.

"They're also the weakest and least influential," I bluntly said. "They've lost their lands, their troops got mauled and they're reliant on the supplies Hasenbach gives them to keep eating. They're not going to strike out on their own to back Hanno, not if the actual players are leaning the other way."

Partisans of the Sword of Judgement or not, they'd side with whoever had troops to pledge to get them their lands back. If that was Cordelia, like her or not they'd kneel and kiss the ring.

"And I am not convinced they will," Vivienne said. "Rozala Malanza might have a working relationship with her, but there is no fondness there. Alejandro of Segovia will follow wherever Aquitan goes, and between the two of them they command the loyalty of the army that defended Cleves."

There were other principalities that were still part of the Principate, of course. Arans, Bayeux, Aisne, Cantal and Lange. But those crowns were pretty much weathervanes. All of those princes and princesses were currently in their own lands, preparing their defences when they weren't already fighting the dead, and their interest in the going-ons in Salia was minimal. Meanwhile further south Iserre, Creusens and Salamans hadn't officially seceded, but they had stopped listening to any orders coming out of Salia so they were effectively nonentities. No, the power here laid where the armies did: on one side Prince Frederic and Prince Otto, on the other Princess Rozala and Prince Alejandro.

If those four couldn't agree on supporting the same Warden of the West, this had the potential to get ugly.

"They have to know how fragile the situation is right now," I said. "I have serious doubts Rozala Malanza would gamble with the fate of Procer just because she hates the First Prince."

Vivienne grimaced.

"It's not that I think you're wrong," she said, "but that I have no other explanation for why that meeting kept going for so long. They had two meals, Cat. Something was happening there."

I grunted in assent.

"We're missing something," I said. "What has she been up to since?"

"Going through the Salian archives," Vivienne said. "Or so we're assuming, the Jacks don't have eyes inside. She went in there and hasn't come out."

I couldn't actually recall ever seeing Hasenbach read something for pleasure, so I doubted it was to indulge curiosity she'd gone in there. She must be looking for something.

"She take in anyone with her?" I asked.

"The usual servants and also the Forgetful Librarian," Vivienne said. "The two have developed something of a rapport over the last few years, I'm told."

Mhm. I'd left the Librarian in Salia for a reason: she had prodigious capacity to read and piece together disparate threads of information that would be but to better use in the Principate's capital than anywhere else. That and the scope of her talents was narrow, for all that it was deep: there wasn't much else she was useful for. So Cordelia was definitely looking for something in those archives, not using them as cover for something else she was up to. Or at least not just that.

"I want to know what she's up to," I said.

"As would I," Vivienne said, "though we must be careful. Now is not the time for a diplomatic incident."

"It's not the time for timidity either," I replied. "She's beginning her move to become Warden and I need to know if the method is a problem. We'll pull at the thread from both ways, Viv."

I paused.

"I'll look into what was discussed that afternoon with the other princes," I informed her, "but I need you to find out what she's doing in the Salian archives."

"Those are very well guarded," Vivienne reminded me.

I smirked.

"I'm sure they are," I said. "Why, if only I had a professional thief I could pawn this off to."

"Former professional thief," the Princess objected.

"I'll take your word on it," I replied with a pleasant smile, "what with you being my royal expert on theft and all."

Our conversation devolved into name-calling for a bit, but it was eventually settled that she'd handle looking into what the First Prince was looking for in those archives. We were both done eating by then and our tea had cooled, so before we parted ways I heaped one more task onto her plate.

"If Cordelia is making a move," I said, "then Hanno will be doing the same. I know he's much harder to follow around, but..."

"I'll have the Jacks look into it," Vivienne seriously replied. "I don't want to be blindsided by him any more than you do."

Good, I thought. Now I just had to look up an old friend and see what I could get out of him.

—

It took me a while to find where Prince Frederic Goethal was, though after I did getting to him didn't actually take all that long.

Like all the royal lines of Procer, the House of Goethal had a luxurious manse in the nicest part of the city that wasn't the Lineal – which was mostly palaces and old Merovins holdings, and as such could only be entered at the invitation of whoever then ruled Salia. Frederic's ancestors had been rather tasteful, I decided when I got my first look at the manse. Though it had that inevitable Alamans dip into the ostentatious, the property was essentially a large four-story mansion in stone surrounded by beautiful gardens. Sunny ponds and carefully tended wildflowers were the order of the day, with the touch of luxury being half-hidden sculpted kingfishers made entirely out of precious stones.

They were startlingly lifelike, I found. Also each was probably worth enough to arm a company of legionaries, which I suspected the Principate would much rather have than the pretty birds right now. There were wards in place, old magic deeply anchored in the stone wall around the property, but they were nothing too tricky to get around. The easy way through was to dump all my presence into the Night so I wouldn't even register to most boundaries, but the top of the wall actually had a nasty little enchantment set that'd burn anyone touching it so I had to slip in through the front door. Counter-intuitive as it might seem, that was actually where most wards tended to be weakest.

You couldn't have people going through a place all day and expect the boundary to be as firm.

I slipped into the gardens in the wake of a messenger boy leaving through the door, veiled in shadows, and took the time to enjoy the walk through the little coves. It was a restful place, all water and shade under tall weeping willows. Frederic himself was outside, on a small terrasse by the side of the manse. It was beautifully done, all sculpted wood under a roof that was a grid of wood covered in climbing ivy. The sun peeked through in dappled spots and even the slightest wind had the leaves shivering. The Prince of Brus was not seated at the glass dining table but instead in a long seat by the edge of the terrasse, overlooking the gardens.

There was a small wooden table at his side, redwood, and on it there were three things: a thick sheaf of parchments, a glass and an open bottle of brandy. To my surprise, as I slipped up the stairs and got a better look at him I found that he'd just knocked back a glass and was already pouring himself another. The papers lay abandoned as he pushed back his long blond curls, hand coming to rest on his forehead. He was just as handsome as he had been in the Arsenal, but he looked tired. Tired and haggard. I quietly limped my way behind him, hand on my staff, and leaned forward to speak into his ear just before dropping the veil of Night.

"Rough day?"

Sadly, he didn't drop the glass. He almost choked on the brandy he'd been sipping, though, which I took as sufficient entertainment. Prince Frederic coughed, then half-turned to offer me a woeful look.

"Was that entirely necessary?" he asked.

"Nah," I grinned, drawing back. "Just keeping you on your toes."

I limped my way around his seat, at which point Alamans manners kicked in and he realized I did not have a seat laid out for me. The blond prince rose without batting an eye and insisted I take his seat, which was an even split of charming and annoying. Instead I nudged him back into the chair with the tip of my staff and stole his glass of brandy.

"I'll take my tribute differently," I said before taking a sip.

If my voice had come out a little flirtier than usual, well, there were no witnesses. He was graceful enough in defeat not to argue the point any further.

"It would be as heresy to deny any whim of yours," Prince Frederic easily replied, a smile tugging at his lips. "You are ever welcome into my home, Queen Catherine."

Last time he'd called me that he'd been on his back and rather dishevelled, so I probably enjoyed it a little more than I should. I sipped at my drink again. Best not to get too distracted, I reminded myself. I had come for a reason.

"Don't make promises too quickly," I warned, wagging a finger. "I didn't come here just to have a look at your pretty curls, Goethal."

"Sweet flattery by a black-cloaked woman come in secrecy," Frederic grinned. "I do believe you might be the very sort of woman my uncle warned me about, my queen."

I grinned back, though in the back of my mind I did not he'd said his uncle. Not his father or mother. I'd known him not to be the son of the last Prince of Brus but instead his nephew, but the exact circumstances that'd seen him rise to the crown remained shrouded. He'd been the formal heir to his uncle even before Cordelia forcefully put him on the throne after smashing through Brus during the Great War, though, which smelled of an interested tale. Maybe another day.

"I was Arch-heretic of the East for a bit," I conceded.

He laughed.

"Knowing my uncle, he would have minded that less than your being Callowan," Frederic ruefully admitted. "He was an admirable man in some ways, but he did have... arrested ideas."

An opportunity to moved the conversation towards what I'd actually come here for, and smoothly offered enough that I had no doubt he'd done it on purpose. I had a lot of unflattering things to say about Alamans highborn, but I did have to conceded that they exquisitely trained in certain regards.

"Lots of those going around, these days," I nonchalantly said. "Makes a girl curious."

I sipped at my drink. Blue eyes considered me. Frederic Goethal had never been one of the greats of the Highest Assembly, but he'd been far from inept at the Ebb and Flow. He was a fair hand at games far subtler than those I played.

"Curiosity is no sin, I would think," the Kingfisher Prince said. "Especially between friends."

"Good," I smiled. "Because I have been wondering, you see, at what might have kept so many of my... friends busy for half a day in a room where no others were allowed to enter."

The fair-haired man looked faintly amused.

"Princess Rozala," he said, "believed you'd wait at least two days before approaching one of us. The First Prince replied she could not be certain she would not be visited that very night."

"Had other irons in the fire," I said. "Went to have a look at the latest prince of Procer."

A pause.

"You know, the one in white."

"Hanno of Arwad," Frederic said, "is a good man. One of the pillars keeping this war from coming down on all our heads."

But not, I read between the lines, someone the Kingfisher Prince wanted to follow as Warden of the West. Considering the Prince of Brus had been one of Cordelia's most ardent partisans since the Great War, I was less than surprised.

"Takes more than a pillar to keep the roof up," I agreed. "Thing is, we're all riding the Principate these days. It goes, so do our chance. So when that many crowned heads disappear for an afternoon, questions need to be asked."

"The First Prince availed us of the situation and shared her intentions for the future of the Principate," Frederic candidly told me. "Though her claim on the Name of Warden of the West was discussed, it was not the heart of the matter."

My eye narrowed. I'd used that trick before: speaking the truth, but just the right angle of it. Something was being left out. They want to keep something from me, I thought. Which meant something in that room had been agreed to that I'd object to. I sipped at the brandy, considering how best to wheedle this out of him. Concern, I decided. That it was a genuine concern would make it all the sharper a tool.

"I need to know if there's going to be a split in what's left the Highest Assembly," I bluntly said. "We can't afford the three largest Proceran armies left being at each other's throats."

He opened his mouth, but I raised my hand to silence him.

"This isn't me being nosy, Frederic," I said. "I've been approached by others who are worried about this mess blowing up in all our faces, and it's not going to help when your people disappear for half a day and I have no goddamned idea what was being discussed."

Secretary Nestor had been more concerned by the potential blowout of a confrontation between Hanno and Cordelia, but I wasn't even stretching the truth all that much: we were all concerned about the Principate. We were well past its breaking point and it was not the kind of realm that would make for a peaceful corpse. Grimacing, the fair-haired prince conceded the point with a bob of his head.

"Your unease is understandable," Frederic said. "There is, however, only so much I can say without breaking confidence."

I eyed him for a long moment, then nodded. He wasn't the kind of man who bent his morals even when it might be convenient, which I tended to admire more than not. There was only so far he could be pushed. I let him choose his words carefully.

"Accord was reached," the Kingfisher Prince finally said. "We are of one mind."

I did not hide my surprise.

"My people weren't sure Malanza would stick with you," I admitted.

He looked, I thought, ruefully amused.

"Princess Rozala is respected among her peers for good reason," Prince Frederic said.

I hummed.

"So I can expect a common public front?" I asked.

He nodded decisively.

"As I said, accord was reached," the fair-haired man said. "The main concern of the talks was how Procer must be forged going forward, which is not something I can share with a foreign crown – however charming the head on which it lies."

Well, I did like the occasional bit of flattery. Especially when it was matched with the kind of genuine attraction I found in his gaze when he looked at me. That said, I was not so easy to distract. He was talking of Procer being reformed, but it could not have been a small sort of reform if it'd swallowed up an afternoon of the most powerful people left in the Principate. And it did nothing to narrow down what it was that Cordelia was trying to find in the archives. Some kind of precedent for the Highest Assembly? She shouldn't need one, if she had the right people behind her. A simple vote would get anything she needed done.

So what was it that'd been decided in this room and they were keeping from everyone else?

Yet I had pushed Frederic, I thought, about as far as I could. If I tried to get more out of him he'd start pushing back, or more likely simply change the subject. Mhm, I'd not gotten as much as I wanted out of this conversation but I had gotten enough. The First Prince wasn't about to lose her seat and key royals of Procer were willing to back her openly. That'd put Hanno on the backfoot, considering how much of his strength as a claimant came from popular support. It's also not what she's actually up to, I thought. Hasenbach would not be satisfied with just cutting the grass under his feet. She'd want to go on the offensive, push her claim.

I still had no idea how she'd do that, but it wasn't here I'd find out. Time to make my exit, then, I figured. I sipped at the cup again, noting a third of it was still full. He must have filled it nearly to the brim when he'd poured, which seemed unlike Frederic.

"Dare I ask what kind of reading was enough to make you drink brandy like water?" I asked, gesturing towards the papers.

He looked startled.

"You have not heard, then," Prince Frederic slowly said.

I cocked my head to the side.

"Heard what?"

"I only just got word from the First Prince," he said. "Segovia has fallen."

My fingers tightened.

"How bad?" I quietly asked.

"They had enough priests gathered in the capital to hold back the demons and evacuate," the Kingfisher Prince said, "but this morning the army lost a pitched battles in the northern plains near Leganz. It was disaster: they were encircled, then slaughtered and raised to the last man."

Meaning the principality was effectively finished. Even more worrying was that a great many of the northern refugees – more than half of the Lycaonese that'd escaped the death of their lands – had been sent there.

"The refugees?"

"Fleeing further east, towards Creusens," he said. "They mean to reach Lake Artoise and take barges further south."

I let out a small breath. Cordelia's entire people were not to be ground to dust yet, then. Thank the Gods. Still, Segovia. Fuck. That was one principality away from the northern border of the Dominion. The Hidden Horror was moving south even quicker than we'd thought.

"We're running out of time," I murmured.

The Kingfisher Prince sadly smiled.

"We already have, Catherine," Frederic said. "Now we can only hope that victory will buy us back a dawn."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Reader in the Night

We already have, Catherine," Frederic said. "Now we can only hope that boosting will buy us back a dawn."

Linnus42

We finally got a Drow Update. And its predictably not going great.

I am going to assume Dawn is some reference to Cordelia's Super Weapon.

I am not sure Frederic is right to think its going to work that way or that Cat is right we are that point where Nobles telling you do something matters much. I see Christophe's Ex is relevant. As for Frederic well lets hope he doesn't need to fight a rematch with Christophe lol. Frederic was never going to be a third candidate in my book. I am getting the distinct feeling the swords are going to come out eventually.

WuseMajor

I think Dawn is just a metaphor for a new day. Another day of life. Another chance to rebuild their kingdom.

Because they've already run out of time. Unless the Dead King is destroyed or contained somewhere without access to magic/dead bodies, the whole content is fucked.

aurikdomi

I think dawn is literal. They are out of time, and are hoping killing/beating the dead king will let them survive.

nimelennar

There's a Proceran song with the refrain, "Hold the wall, lest dawn fail"

I think that's the kind of dawn here talking about, not a weapon.

asazernik

IIRC it's a reference to one of the bonus chapters about his years on the walls – I think his inspirational speech was along the lines of "we're all due to die by sundown, but if we win today we buy another dawn."

Liliet

And the pace slows down again, bringing us a whole chapter without overt development of the central local plot.

We do, on the other hand, get some flirting between Catherine and Frederic!

Linnus42

You think its a deathflag for Frederic. If Cordelia, Frederic, Otto and Rozala push too far the swords can absolutely come out. And Dear Frederic aint going to do much in a fight. If there trying to do something that Cat would balk out well it raises the stakes.

Liliet

"Is X a deathflag"
For any X, no.

Anomandris

How about for the.....Dead king??

I imagine he has a literal deathflag...

Isi Arnott-Campbell

If that pun were any worse Cat'd punch you through the fourth wall. Well done.

Anomandris

Mark of good writing that – make you waddle through pretty much nothing and still leave you just as eager as you were at the start of the chapter for the next.....

I don't mind padding books out if writing them is done well. Sub-plots that pretty much lead nowhere or are threads of their own end up still being fun to read. Prolonging my entertainment (which is basically why I read in the first place)...

Just don't go full Robert Jordan....

dadycool

I like sub-plots. I just personally have less to say about them. "Drow, ooh! Cordelia's plotting something, ooh! Cat and Freddy and flirting, kappa!" Chapters like this are like small-ish puzzle pieces. As part of the whole, they're important, but as themselves there's not much there. The edge of a leaf and a glimpse of asphalt, enough to leave the picture wanting if absent, but just another piece.

Santiago A Duarte

Although i like these chapters, I think they would be significantly less frustrating in a traditional novel. If a chapter is a puzzle piece with little value on its own in a regular book, you can just...turn the page and get to where it matters. Here we have to wait 3+ days for a chapter that's likely to be unrelated to this one

Rey d`Tutto

Hey, some of us love Tolkien-esque style super-epics. I mean Battlefield Earth is only 1600+ pages, and that took me 3 days when I was 16.

Thank Deity I found web-seirials.

Cpt. Obvious

1600 pages? I had to check that. Turns out it's more like a thousand pages, and even that's far more than I expected. I could have sworn it was closer to 600 and was dead certain that it couldn't be more than 800...

But then I guess that depends on the format. I have a paperback edition. A hardcover edition might be a lot thicker as they tend to use larger typeface and more generous line spacing.

Frivolous

I've been wondering what Kurosiv would do. Long ago at the beginning of book 6 I predicted either betrayal or flight.

Inaction is an interesting and odd compromise. I wonder if it's out of fear of Keter or desire for power over the Night.

In Kurosiv's place I wouldn't want the Night very much. It's been proven to be weak in the face of Keter's magic. Thus I'm guessing fear is its main motive, but I've been wrong before.

Demon-traps are a fascinating innovation.

So Carine, Princess of Langevin, the Mirror Honey Pot returns.

Raved Thrad

I laughed at "Mirror Honey Pot." It's so very accurate, and yet it also speaks to the worst parts of Christophe. Cordelia probably wants to tear her hair out at even the thought of him. Sure, he's one of, if not the most high-profile Proceran Chosen currently, but he's also a walking, talking diplomatic disaster waiting to happen.

naturalnuke

Hopefully it was a reminder of the Mirror Knights character in the past so we have a reference for how he's changed

Frivolous

It must have been really weird for Christophe when he learned and assimilated the fact that he lost his virginity, and thus broke the oath that protected him from glamours and illusion, only because his girlfriend's father wanted land and political power.

And then he got reamed out about his sex life and poor choices by the high officers of the Grand Alliance.

Juff

Typo Thread:

their reluctant > their reluctance down with cough > down with a cough wouldn't anything > wouldn't do anything be but to > be put to it to I > it so I did not he'd > did note he'd interested tale > interesting tale to moved the > to move the conceded that they > concede that they were availed > apprised pitched battles > pitched battle was disaster > was a disaster

WuseMajor

Given how useful Cordy has found the Librarian to be, you should be amazingly worried right now Cat.

The First Prince has a plan at this point and managed to make the most important crowns in the nation fall in line and now she's gone looking for something with a living compass.

She's gonna find what she needs and she plays procedural tricks in a way that few others can.

Hopefully it's some kind of precedent that she thinks she can use as leverage against the Dwarves, because that's probably the least dangerous thing she might be looking for.

Frivolous

I would agree that Catherine should be worried about the Forgetful Librarian, except for one thing: She can command the Librarian, and the Librarian can't hide from her.

I suspect Catherine can, if she tries, even communicate with other villains across a distance.

Speaking of villains: I wonder what the Pilfering Dicer is doing. He's dangerous, too.

re: Cordelia's gambit: I wonder if she has schemed for all the princes of Procer to submit completely to Hanno. It might be the her Good choice, especially since she once knelt to Catherine.

Liliet

Catherine is, right now, full on shared primary objectives ALLIES with Cordelia.

There's only so much worry she has to spare on something Cordelia is plotting.

jamesc9

Depending on how badly it blows up, and in whose direction.

edrey

i really was curious about the drow, if kuroisiv gets too problematic, just send ranger, she would gladly have a conversation with him and solve the division.
so now its time for a reversal, i have some ideas but all are nucear-type, i welcome theories

Anomandris

Yep, Ranger would definitely work with Cat. No questions asked.

Specially about the knife in her dead lover. Or kinda leaving her for dead.

aurikdomi

work for absolutely not. but I suspect she will show up again in the final charge against keter in some capacity.

edrey

your sarcasm would have worked in any other topic really but here i would say is foolish.

you are putting your modern point of view on ranger, if Ranger wanted cat dead, she would be dead, ranger expected the possibility of amadeus dying, i wont be surprised if ranger want to make contac with.

i would say this dont put your modern point of view in a middle-age fantasy story. its foolish

Anomandris

Thanks for the kind words! Makes the start of my day so better.

Still, if you want to continue the discussion aspect, my sarcasm was based on what has been established in story already. You know, the chapter where Malicia and Ime discuss Amadeus being captured by the Heroes in Procer, and where they didn't outright kill him cause it "would have Ranger come out swinging". I am very surprised that Malicia & Ime too have such a modern viewpoint of life, mirroring my own.

Look, if you still think my earlier sarcasm was more malicious (pun definitely not intended) than funny, then apologies. Costs me nothing.

edrey

you are a very sensitive person, i don't feel that my words are too harsh, really. and your reply didn't offend me either. but that is the problem of internet and different cultures. anyway, i welcome any kind of reply that has a good argument and logic. and i apologize for any misunderstanding or cultural shock.

dadycool

The biggest problem with text-based discussion is that conversations, debates, and sarcasm are verbal languages, not written ones, and so the tone of voice, inflections, and all nuance are erased, leaving nothing but the words and their face value. It's also why comment sections like this one are the worst places for them. And I mean that at face value, no subtext.

Anomandris

Cheers, mate. Ditto from my side – any misunderstanding is definitely not intended.

Let's keep this fandom nice and well, as it deserves!

Anomandris

So a rather wordy query, but why is the Dead King still fighting? Or continuing his invasion/genocide? I doubt he is an expansionist, nor is he like a typical "Evil" with a capital E that exists in most books without needing any rationalisation.

I mean, I earlier chalked it to the whole Nameiness of being, well, The Dead King and therefore not liking life + his animosity towards the Bard and how she would use the Living Heroes and Villains against him.

Now, though, aren't the stories of the Villains shattered? Or did I read too much into what happened and it's only the Story structure that got broken for the Villains (and not any compulsion/effect of the Names themselves). Also the Bars has been pretty much outed AND dealt a huge blow, so shouldn't he, you know, try to work via back channels with the others who want her gone forever too?

Basically ELI5 DK's current motivations, anyone?

dadycool

Control? It'd be my motivation, in his place. If I had a Realm of people who adored and worshiped me and a continent full of people who wanted to kill me, I'd wipe the continent clean and let my worshipers loose on the place. Even pre-Mute, the more land he had under his control, the more defenses he could erect, the more resources he could harvest or otherwise exploit.

I think some of the Villain's "nature" was story-driven, but Names like Warlock tend to be researchers simply because mages are intelligent enough to be curious about the world and what they can do in/to it. Contrast this to Palpatine-esque cackling and saying "All according to plan" on the edge of a cliff in a third-act darkest hour scenario. A Big Bad like that should be smart enough to follow OSHA guidelines regarding safety railings, but the story drives them to either go insane or get worse, painting a giant "Weak Point" poster where they're most vulnerable.

Anomandris

It fits. Although it is asking for more opponents, not less – one tends to be in more danger perpetuating war than peace. Maybe threat levels plummet post afore-mentioned eradication, but they spike so much during that it actually might even out on a net basis.

dadycool

A million gnats isn't that much more dangerous than a hundred gnats, especially if you have a flamethrower.

lolo96

DK knows if he does nothing, he will lose eventually as both Bard and Tyrant said. Calernia will progress enough that a crusade will manage to kill him. He's attacking now to kill off the entire Calernia. If he leaves in the middle of the war after conquering enough territories and dealing enough damage, there's a risk that Grand Alliance / Nameds are gonna follow him back to deal with him.

amit27592

I'd recommend subscribing to Patreon to read the Neshamah chapter for more insight on DK's motivations. The side chapter expounds on it quite a bit.

RoflCat

The way I see it, it's because now he is the only actor on Below's scale.

See, above all the life stuffs happening, there's the balancing game of the Gods in the background affecting things.

Like how Amadeus hypothesized that his career as Black night was so successful because the scale was tipped to Above from all of Pilgrim's successes (And later Catherine was supposed to be Heroine to balance it back but then she went and gone Villain so...)

The balancing of the scale can happen on both the bigger picture (Amadeus and Pilgrim) or in the immediate (Pilgrim's sacrifice tipped the scale for Above, so DK get to unleash Hellgate unimpeded as a balancing act)

This push is basically DK doing the same thing as the battle of Hainaut but on a bigger scale.

He pushes with the technically 'low stake' army of his that's he's built over time (clearly evil overlords are expected to have an army of minions)

If Procer crumbles, the rest of the continent will follow, and they can't win with just armies because DK's armies have been built over his long reign + necromancy to make even trade still favor him.

And when Above side get to use their superweapon (Cord's angelic bomb), he will get to unleash something equally nasty of his own.

Especially now that he is the sole beneficiary of it since other villains can't cause any Story weigh to change.

tl;dr – DK is basically trying another battle of Hainaut but on bigger scale now that he's the sole beneficiary of Below's balancing power.

Faye Kiname

His motivation is laid out pretty clearly in a patreon only interlude. I won't say what it is for obvious reasons.

ninegardens

Frederick is as excellent as always.
Such the goodest boy.

I love how he know exactly how much he needs to say to keep Cat (and others) satisfied, while giving no more.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. Did I miss something, or has Catherine still not been formally introduced to Prince Otto? I'm interested to read his reaction to all the help she has provided to his people.
2. Too bad this issue can't be resolved by marrying Cordelia and Hanno. As it's a question of policy, a wedding wouldn't resolve anything.
3. At this point, I believe the only political entities on Calernia not in play are the ratlings and the elves. I'd love to see Catherine leveraging one or both against the dwarves to move them in the right direction, somehow.
4. What was the resolution of the goblin issue? AFAIK, this is still hanging out there.
5. Cat previously mentioned something about a possible evacuation across the Tyrian Sea; has there been any previous political contact between her court and any entities over there?
6. I want my Catherine & Hakram reunion!
7. Where are all the funds and materials that Pickler was promised for the assault on Keter (back when she introduced the copperstones to Cat)? Will she get to produce her ultimate artillery array of awesomeness?

ByVectron!

"Accord was reached," the Kingfisher Prince finally said. "We are of one mind."

I did not hide my surprise.

"My people weren't sure Malanza would stick with you," I admitted.

He looked, I thought, ruefully amused.

"Princess Rozala is respected among her peers for good reason," Prince Frederic said.

Am I wrong, or is that exactly the sort of precise and clever phrasing of a reply that would be used if they had decided the other way? Especially given the rueful bit, it seems to me that he is neither confirming nor denying the direction, merely that they all agreed.

ninegardens

... Has Cordelia handed her kingdom of to Rozalia?

Hear me out on this: Cordy was really insistent back during the coup that there would be no grey clad warden to rule from above; that Procer would not be ruled by named.

IF she is going to claim a name, there has to be a clear line of succession for who rules procer next. The obvious candidate is Rozalia...

Is that her Gambit? Or does losing the Title undermine the name??

ninegardens

It would also act as a way of not splitting the armies loyalties: if she loses, those most loyal to Hanno will still cooperate with Rozalia, and those loyal to her (fred and Co) will also follow Rozy as the appointed First prince of Procer, endorsed by Cordelia herself.

If she WINS and becomes warden then the front line troops will follow the new First prince (Rozalia, front line general) and those loyal to her will still follow her (the new warden of the west).

Rey d`Tutto

How to win even if one loses...

nick

Thanks for the chapter! "would be but to better use in the Principate's capital than anywhere else. " -> put to better use

nick

Not really a comment, so consider deleting after reading... "An opportunity to moved the conversation towards what I'd actually come here for, and smoothly offered enough that I had no doubt he'd done it on purpose. I had a lot of unflattering things to say about Alamans highborn, but I did have to conceded that they exquisitely trained in certain regards."-> to move , to concede

Xinci

Decentralizing themselves while setting up clear cooperative channels of information has been a effective method survival for empires in the past. Especially when cooperation between different parts is highly contentious or the flow of information from them to the center is highly variable.

Sve really does need a plan for Kurosiv(too bad they dont have a Longstride analogue that they could use, unless Ivah or Rumena makes a new one). Their previous statements on Night and them being it likely tie their hands to some degree, but Cat probably should work with them to understand the narrative they are on currently probably ends with them as barely sentient scraps at best.

It is good that they managed to advance means to mitigate demons at least, though given they have a timespan for containment(perhaps like Masego's own acts in his pocket dimension) they still likely need to make some intrinsic method to resist the Demons or need to trust a Heroic faction/group of Light users.

Someperson

The things with the demon traps that release the sealed evil after 99 years, and also the permanent hellgates that open every X years to release waves of darkness on the world, all sound like the makings of a sequel story :]

Not that I am expecting a sequel, but it does give us a glimpse of what some of the aftermath might look like.

Zach

I just realized something that is bugging me.

Why isn't Dead King releasing demons on Procer right now (like he did when the Below stories were first removed)? Now that Catherine is in Procer, the angel weapon can't be used without also killing Catherine (and any other villains in the city).

Actually, why is Forgetful Librarian still alive? She's a villain who presumably would have been in Procer (though I suppose it's possible Cordelia sent her away in preparation for using the weapon, though seems like it would have been on very short notice).

hakureireimu

The Witch set up a Ward over Salia. You can travel fast through Twilight.

Zach

Ah, forgot about the Ward, thanks!

Twilight is also a pretty good explanation for temporarily removing people from Salia (though I feel like Cordelia or someone else mentioned "the angel weapon kill all affiliated with Below" as a potential problem for its later use, which wouldn't really be the case if you could easily just shunt all Below-affiliated Named into Twilight before using it).

Someperson

In a weird way, I guess the (maybe temporary?) abolition of villainous stories was actually necessitated by the logic of the story.

The Dead King invaded under the pretext that Malicia invited him. With Praes getting forced in line, that invitation would effectively be nixed, so the Dead King's invasion no longer works storywise. There is a very real possibility this might have forced things into an anticlimax where Neshamah just retreats to Keter and holes up for another couple of centuries, and most of Calernia's fighting forces elect to take some extremely needed breathing room instead of going forward with the desperate showdown in Keter.

Only the story demands an actual confrontation with the Big Bad. A story can't really just say "oh, nevermind" about the most climactic conflict that is brewing. So... something had to get rid of the limiter preventing the Dead King from waging all-out war.

In a very real way, the villainous stories might have actually offed themselves.

I'm not sure how this is related to the chapter beyond just that the war against Keter is getting more and more dire, but it's what I was thinking about as I read this chapter so anyways thank u for coming to my TED Talk.

Rey d`Tutto

Those villain stories are Suppressed.
Backlash is a bitch...

Chapter 35: Catch

"Great Ones, the evidence is clear: we have been betrayed by the Cruxis Cabal. They mean to sell us out to the Emperor, and so we have no choice but to silence them before they can destroy us."

– Archlector Analphagor of the Temple of Crespuscum, addressing the inner circle (later revealed to have been Supreme General Mendacius of the Cruxis Cabal all along, and also Dread Emperor Traitorous).

My first warning it was about to come to ahead was my being told the Warlord was about to arrive.

Hakram Deadhand, Warlord of the Clans, had decided to ride out ahead of the second wave and arrive in Salia the better part of a week ahead of the armies. He'd be there, Vivienne's messenger told me, by early afternoon. Tomorrow. I spent an hour chewing on that and going through a bottle of wine, unsure how I felt about the surprise and how I should be feeling about it. I'd promised Masego I would talk with Hakram when he came to the Proceran capital, but it'd been a faraway thing when I'd spoken the words. Not it was at the front gate, knocking to be let in, and I had never sympathized more with the deer that froze before hunters.

I was not to be allowed to nurse my wine for long, though. I got a visit from Secretary Nestor Ikaroi, though it was not official and it was dealt with briskly. He'd come in person because my rank demanded it, not the message itself. It was certainly short enough that the walk to the Lineal from the city must have felt like a waste.

"Empress Basilia will be arriving in the capital within three days," Secretary Nestor said. "And with her the rest of the League council."

I made some expected noises about how I was looking forward to it and it would a pleasure to sit in the company of such an august council once more, but even as my lips moved my mind was racing. One was an oddity, two could be coincidence, but if I found a third... This was starting to look like a confluence, power calling to power, and there was only one thread of story in Salia that would demand so great a gathering to be resolved. Cordelia and Hanno had made their choices, begun their paths, and now water was flowing down the riverbed. Fuck, I'd thought I had more time. I sent away the Delosi with courtesy, polished off the rest of my glass and immediately went fishing.

If we were on the last stretch, as I was beginning to suspect, I needed to know how much time I had. Vivienne had hinted to me that she'd be trying her hand at the Salian archives tonight so she might find out what Cordelia was up to, but Hanno was proving unfortunately difficult to find for such a public figure. But first, I thought, I needed to find my third. My proof that events were in motion. And though it was tempting to think that the last part would be another surprise arrival, I dismissed the thought. Everyone that needed to be there for the resolution was already set to be, which meant I needed instead to be looking for a nudge.

One of Above's since my half of the Gods had fallen silent. Thankfully, I had seen to that contingency already and all I needed to suffer was to limp my way up the damnable set of stairs up the eastern wing of the palace where my scrying mages had set up. I dropped down into a sinfully comfortable plush seat after having given my order, massaging my bad leg. The entire length felt like a single throbbing bruise. My mages were good at their business, and so it was only moments before the Observatory connected us to the silver mirror on the other side and Masego's face was in front of me.

"Hierophant," I said.

"Catherine," Zeze enthused. "Very fine timing on your part."

My eye narrowed.

"Let me guess," I said. "You've just had a breakthrough and Roland had a significant role in it."

He looked surprised.

"That is broadly true," Masego conceded. "He had a stroke of inspiration this morning and we just had our first results."

My fingers clenched. Three for three, damn me. There was a reason I'd wanted the Rogue Sorcerer with Hierophant as he looked into returning Below's stories, and it wasn't just because Roland was one of the most learned people on Calernia when it came to magic. He was also a hero, and while my Gods had been silenced the opposition's could still give a nudge here and there.

"Tell me," I ordered.

"We believe the Intercessor is exerting the full strength of her aspect at all times to keep the stories muted," Masego said.

"Theoretically, with sufficient power directed in the exact right manner we could break the effort – and perhaps shattered the aspect itself in the process."

"And we've got a source for that power?" I asked.

"Possibly one," Hierophant said. "I need more time to prove it conclusively."

And there it was.

"How long?" I asked.

"Five days."

So that was my timeline. Five days, more or less, the Gods expected that there would be a Warden of the West seated opposite of me before we entered the last stretch of this war.

"Do what you can," I said, and the ritual began to fade.

Five days, I thought, massaging my leg. I was not ready, but then neither were either of the claimants. And that was the part that was bothering me the more I thought about it. Hasenbach had the skills and the will to make a great Warden in some regards, but in others – direct strength, namelore – she was sorely lacking. It was the same for Hanno, whose weaknesses as a candidate were less direct but arguably even more dangerous. Neither of them seemed like a perfect fit for the Name, and though part of that might be blamed on the Role itself not having been settled yet it felt like too weak an explanation.

I'd been going back and forth between them looking for who should be backed, the rest of the Grand Alliance peering over my shoulder and wondering the same, but I couldn't shake the impression that somehow both the choices were losing ones. That this should have been cleaner, that the angles of it were... slightly askew. My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched. It would not do to start seeing a devil in every shadow, I reminded myself. And yet. I closed my eye, calmed my breath. My Name shook itself away, a great maw looking over my shoulder. I looked for the stars inside and found nothing, only darkness, but that was all right. The sight of them had been my Name recognizing a skill I already had and crowning it, not a gift Below had given me.

I could do it by hand, if need be, as I always had before. I would find out where the objects in motion were headed and what it meant, then lay the single finger on the scales that I was allowed. And since Vivienne was already looking into Cordelia Hasenbach, my task was clear: I was going to unearth the plans of the Sword of Judgement.

—

I went about it the polite way first, sending a rider to his war camp to ask where he might be and how soon we might speak.

The answer I got was a polite workaround giving me an actual answer, which told me that they didn't actually know where he was right now. That was fine, as I'd not actually expected them to lead me to him: what I'd wanted to find out was whether or not they knew where he was. It did not seem to be the case, and that meant he was nowhere official. He'd gone to ground to get something done, which smacked to me of Hanno preparing his move to become Warden of the West. I'd not spent the hour waiting on the messenger idly, using it instead to cross off another possibility: more than half of the possible wielders for the Severance were in the city, so he couldn't be holding a council of heroes over who'd get to wave it around.

I'd narrowed down the possibilities, but Hanno was still in the wind and I had no real idea of where he might be. Thankfully, in the process of finding the potential wielders of the Severance I'd also gotten my hands on an avenue to solve that lack.

"That's a new kind," I noted. "And I can almost smell the power coming off it."

Adanna of Smyrna, the Blessed Artificer, looked at me smugly through her spectacles. It was a little unsettling to see those highborn golden eyes in the face of someone who wouldn't spare a thimble of spit if every Soninke were on fire.

"The Hierophant is not the only who learns through facing opponents," Adanna said, straightening proudly. "I have reached a deeper realm of understanding regarding the Light."

I had no trouble believing that, looking at her newest receptacle for Above's power: it looked like a wooden pillar about half a foot wide and seven tall, heavily sculpted and crisscrossed by rods of copper. It stung my eye to linger too long on the sculptures, which I took to mean they were sacred in some way. The Blessed Artificer's entire workshop in the city reeked of the same uncomfortable power, but I kept it away from my face.

"I'm impressed," I honestly said. "Has the White Knight seen it yet? He has final say over your artefacts before they become war assets."

"Not yet," the Blessed Artificer peevishly said. "He's been busy of late."

I cocked an eyebrow, making my disbelief blatant enough even she would pick up on it.

"It looks like a good shot at blowing through one of the gates of Keter," I said. "What is it that's more important, exactly?"

Just the right amount of disbelief and flattery, which should...

"My very opinion," Adanna irritated said. "As if anything the Blacksmith could make would..."

Her mouth snapped shut and she eyed me warily.

"Why is it you came to visit again?" the Blessed Artificer asked.

"We need war assets accounted for before we move out," I lied, "so we can assign them properly."

Her eyes narrowed ever so slightly more. She didn't call me a liar, though she was clearly suspicious, because that was very much a legitimate reason for me to be here.

"I am sure Prince White will inform you when my work is ready for such considerations," Adanna said, emphasizing Hanno's recent title.

Well, no need to ask who she thought should be Warden of the West. I 'reluctantly' conceded that she was right and I really ought to wait for him, which gave her the pleasure of having caught me out trying to go around Hanno instead of figuring out what I was actually for. I let myself be ushered out without protest. I'd got what I needed from her: my next lead. The Bitter Blacksmith was involved in whatever it was that Hanno was up to, and while the Sword of Judgement was surrounded by people who'd obscure his movements should he ask the Lycaonese heroine would be much easier to track.

There were two Bitter Blacksmiths, a brother and a sister who were respectively a villain and a heroine. Helmgard Bauerlein was the eldest of the pair and though unlike her brother she was not a mage and did not work magic into her blades she'd still been the one picked to work on Severance in the Arsenal since she was better at handling exotic materials. In a time without the Truce and Terms, I was pretty sure one of them would have killed the other by now, but instead they'd both been recruited and kept in different theatres of the war – the north for the villain, the Arsenal for her.

Going by memory, we'd sent her Rozala's way after all with another batch of Named from the Arsenal. The Princess of Aequitan's armies saw a lot more siege warfare than Hanno's did, so it'd been a natural fit. That was a good turn for me, since it meant the horse the Bitter Blacksmith would have saddled to get to Hanno's camp would be from Princess Rozala's spare horses. Something I was well within my right to ask about as a high officer of the Grand Alliance. Took me another hour to find out, but not because I was being put off: it turned out the Bitter Blacksmith hadn't actually ridden out from Rozala's camp but from Salia instead, presumably using a different stable.

I picked up her trail after remembering that the First Prince had once mentioned to me in passing setting aside a dozen stables and attendant horses for Named and dignitaries, when asking me about how many villains could actually ride a horse. One of those, I found out, had loaned out a horse to Helmgard Bauerlein. I wasn't going to get lucky enough that the Blacksmith would conveniently reveal to a stable hand where Hanno had disappeared to, but I did get something out of investigating there: the horse had been taken yesterday afternoon and wasn't expected back until tomorrow. I thanked the girl and limped away with two answers.

First, the Blacksmith had been headed out to the countryside outside the city. This wasn't in Salia. Second, her usefulness to whatever Hanno was up to would end around tomorrow. Meaning whatever it was it was both ongoing and incomplete. It made sense, I grimly thought. Cordelia's own mission in the Salian archives, whatever it might be, was not finished either. Claimant symmetry.

I hit the northern gate of Salia and had the watch captain there rustle up the commander for the evening shift yesterday, but it wasn't through there the Blacksmith had gone. I tried the eastern gate instead and found her trail there. Good. Rode straight to the Army of Callow's camp afterwards, to get my hands on the finest map I had of the region. There I ran into a dead end, because as far as that map had to say there was fuck all east of Salia. Townships and grain fields, but the closest city was two days' ride away and that was too long for what I'd found out. Had Hanno just been looking for a quiet place to gather heroes and solidify his backing there like Cordelia had done with her princes?

No, it couldn't be that. Whatever he was up to was ongoing, I'd already established that. He was actively doing something out there, not just looking up a place to do something later. Which meant my map didn't have the right information, or at least the right kind of information. So what was it the Sword of Judgement had been looking for that wouldn't be on my campaign maps? It wasn't like Hanno actually knew the principality, he'd spent even less time here than I had. I went through a glass of wine thinking of that until I realized the obvious: Recall. The aspect, which I suspected him to still have to some extent, gave him access to anything a human hero had ever learned about Salia.

"Something old," I murmured. "Old enough it wouldn't be on our maps anymore."

Hanno wasn't a ritual sort of man, so it wouldn't be a forgotten place of power. The Bitter Blacksmith was the key, I decided. It was a sort of place he'd need her expertise for. The odds were decent it'd be a structure of some sort and I was out of my depth, so I went to find an expert of my own.

"You're looking at this wrong," Pickler said.

"That's why I'm here, yes," I drily replied. "Now tell me something I don't know, if you would."

"Male goblins lose their teeth easier, but they grow back until much later in their lives than most women," my Sapper-General helpfully said.

I actually hadn't known that, but I still gesture obscenely at her out of principle. After having taken her amusement at my expense, she then bothered to actually help me.

"He's not going to need a blacksmith for a structure," Pickler said. "It's too far out her expertise. It'll be something smaller, Catherine. Like a trap, or maybe a lock."

I paused, going still in my seat. A lock. Fuck, I thought. Let me be wrong. The lock wasn't so important as what you found those on. Pickler cleared her throat loudly. I cocked an eyebrow at her questioningly.

"You're going the I-figured-it-out face," the Sapper-General told me, looking irritated.

"Eh," I said. "I might have. Maybe. Why's it making you cranky?"

"Because you didn't tell me what you figured out, you rude fuck," Pickler said. "Do you expect us to just read your mind?"

I considered her for a moment, cocking my head to the side, then smiled beatifically.

"Thank for your teaching me about goblin teeth, Sapper-General," I sweetly replied.

She cursed me all the way out of her tent, as was only just. Smiling as I was, my mind raced ahead. I needed another set of maps, but that wasn't the kind either the Army of Callow or the Legions of Terror would have. The Blood, maybe? I grimaced as I limped my way through the camp avenues. No, Levantine maps were infamously terrible. They'd actually used Proceran ones when fighting the Legions in the central Principate. The Dominion was close enough they should have the maps, but unlikely to have them. I needed people who'd been recording history for long enough that... Ah, I grinned. It happened that I did know a historian, and a pretty good one too.

Secretary Nestor Ikaroi of Delos, though in practice an ambassador from the League of Free Cities, was not officially that. So while he fulfilled the functions, the First Prince had not lodged him in one of the empty palaces of the Lineal: if she did, it'd be something of an insult when the formal diplomats arrived since they'd be put on even footing. It was already mid afternoon by then so it was with slight impatience that I found the officer of the Jacks that Vivienne had left in the palace and found out where he was being lodged. Amusingly enough it was only four streets away from where the Goethal manse I'd visited that morning was, so I rode back to the neighbourhood.

One a horse. It made Zombie jealous, but she was just a tad too noticeable and I was trying to be discreet.

Secretary Nestor received me with all courtesies, visibly expecting me to be about to tell him which claimant we should back, so he was rather surprised when instead I asked him a question as a scholar. Surprised and rather flattered, by my estimation.

"So the Secretariat does keep extensive records of the lands that became Procer even before the Principate was founded," I said.

"We do," Nestor said. "Nicae had extensive trade and marriage ties to many of the great reales of the Arlesite south and most of the League imported spelter from what is now Orne before it became cheaper to buy it from the Empire instead. We have a great many contemporary firm and weak sources for the chronicles, though we ever seek to refine our knowledge."

"And what have you got on Salia?" I asked.

"Less than we'd like," Secretary Nestor admitted. "We tried to reconcile the stories from Chansons des pierres et du vent with contemporary tribal conflicts, but there is not much to use. The region only began to rise under the Vezelons and then the Merovins, fairly late in Alamans history."

Well, it was worth asking anyway.

"In any of your histories," I said, "is there ever mention of a dwarven gate in Salia?"

The old man leaned back into his seat, looking very interested.

"It has been alleged," the white-haired scholar said. "As I'm sure you know, the Kingdom Under rarely keeps a gate for more than a century or two – with the exception of the Mercantis gate – so the location of many have been lost."

"Of course," I smiled, not having known that in the slightest. "But there are indications there might have been one in what is now Salia?"

"In a manner of speaking," Secretary Nestor said. "There are repeated mentions of the 'Carrouges fairgrounds' in different chronicles, which drew some skepticism as fairgrounds were sacred to early Alamans – it was forbidden to fight there – but there are no Mavian prayers in the region that would explain such a truce being observed."

Dwarven presence certainly would explain the tribes being reluctant to fight. The dwarves were not shy about enforcing civility on everyone else. I leaned forward.

"These 'Carrouges fairgrounds', were they ever found?"

"I don't believe so," the old man said. "There is a town of the same name a few hours to the east of the city, I believe, but the existence of such a gate was never proven."

Fuck, I thought, even as I felt a swell of triumph. I was pretty sure I'd just found Hanno, but what I'd found was not exactly pleasing. I took my leave from the white-haired askretis, avoiding answering when he obliquely brought up what he'd last come to me to discuss. He took that well enough, declining to press the matter once it became clear I was not ready to commit either way. I rode back to the palace and unfurled the maps there, finding what Nestor Ikaroi had mentioned: a small village to the east of Salia called Carrouges. It shared the name with a nearby swamp.

The afternoon was getting long in the tooth but there was nothing to gain by waiting, so I was back in the saddle within moments of getting some food in my stomach. I took Zombie, this time, to her vocal pleasure. Having bored of terrifying stable hands she cawed triumphantly when we rose into the sky, uncaring that I had first veiled us in Night. The roads were very good this close to Salia so I didn't gain much time by flying instead of riding, but I did get a much better view of what lay ahead from the heights.

We were just past dusk when I led Zombie into a circular glide over what had to be Carrouges according to the map. The village was both unimpressive and empty. Parts of it had also burned down at some point, most of them around the House of Light. Considering the broken tower that'd once topped the temple was at the heart of the burnt-out husks, I was inclined to blame a lightning strike and everybody being gone for that. The Carrouges swamp, though, was swarming with activity.

It was hard to tell how large the swamp would originally have been, as it'd since been drained. What had to be maybe two hundred soldiers, by the look of the banners a mix of Brabantine conscripts and fantassins, were digging out of the dried mud a massive steel trapdoor. I saw remains of a large stone structure as well, pillars and maybe parts of a roof lying around, but that was broken. The trapdoor was still pristine, and I risked flying even lower under the cover of night. Just as I'd thought, over the steel door a solitary figure was moving around.

Trying to force open the lock in the middle, using long iron poles and what looked like a complicated system of counterweights. I had found the Bitter Blacksmith.

I did not bother to land, instead spurring on Zombie to rise back above the clouds and head back to Salia. I'd already learned everything I needed to, all that showing up there would achieve was a confrontation. When I'd spoken with Hanno, he had stated he wanted to have a conversation with the Herald. That, should an appeal fail, he then wanted to speak directly with the Kingdom Under. For both those things, though, he would need the First Prince to arrange the conversations. Now it seemed he might be digging up an old dwarven gate so he could cut out the middlewoman and make his move no matter what anyone else thought. Something had begun to feel wrong this morning and the feeling was only increasing as the evening went on.

I chewed on that all the way back to the palace, arriving near Midnight Bell, but was no closer to an answer when I found Vivienne waiting for me in the solar. By the look on her face, though, that was about to change. She had a glass of wine in hand and she drained it all when I arrived, slumped bonelessly in her seat.

"Did you ever wonder where the Tyrant learned his gargoyle trick?" the Princess asked me.

"I'd assumed Helikean mages," I replied, sitting across from her. "Was I wrong?"

"I have my doubts," Vivienne drawled, "since I just spent an hour avoiding squealing warthogs made of stone on the roof of the Salian archive. Have you ever seen a stone warthog, Catherine?"

"I have not," I replied, trying and failing to keep the amusement out of my tone.

"You wouldn't believe how quick on the hooves the bastards are, given the weight," she muttered. "Or how goddamned loud they squeal. If I hadn't followed Southpool tripward rules and brought two pigeons to let loose as a decoy the guards would have caught me and we would have had a very awkward diplomatic incident to deal with."

"But you came through," I grinned, "as I never doubted you would."

I received an obscene gesture we'd both learned from Indrani in answer and only then did she begin aggressively slapping down books on the low table. One, two, three – seven all in all, and then one scroll she pressed directly into my hand was not a copy of something but a list. Of all the things Cordelia Hasenbach had been reading for which we did not have a tome of at hand. It was the overwhelming majority, but that wasn't exactly unexpected. My eye scanned down, brow creasing as it did.

"Yeah, couldn't make too much of it myself," Vivienne said. "I got the common books, they're the ones we have in this palace's library."

I hadn't even known we had one of those, but then I'd seen barely a third of this place.

"Any common thread?" I asked.

"The books I did find in the palace are the easy part," the Princess said. "They're all about coin."

I let out a contemplative noise. Huh. Hadn't expected that.

"How so?"

"Apparently back in the early days of the Principate, the First Prince that talked the Highest Assembly into having a common currency and giving the officer control of the mints was saddled with a condition," Vivienne said. "The princes were afraid that First Princes would just debase currency whenever they needed quick gold for a war or a palace and fuck over the rest of Procer doing it. So all the mints were to keep count of how many coins were minted and it'd be written on scrolls that the Highest Assembly would be given a copy of at the beginning of every year."

I blinked in surprise.

"Five of those seven books are compendiums of those scrolls," Vivienne told me. "The other two are about currency as well, but not Procer's. It's about foreign coinage and how much metal there was in it, how much it was worth."

I hummed again.

"Anything that stuck out there?"

"Callow got fucked by the way the Fairfaxes kept allowing other nobles to mint their coins," Vivienne said. "Meant no one outside our borders ever wanted to take it. The Dread Empire's aurelii were considered more reliable even during periods when the Tower was at war with half of Calernia."

Yeah, I grimly thought, that sounded about right. Ratface had been appalled at Callowan coinage, back in the day, and though we'd never finished edging out the other Callowan coinage I suspected that Queen Vivienne's reign would see that work thoroughly finished.

"So she's looking at the old finances of Procer," I mused.

"Not just that, though," Vivienne said. "The list casts a broader net."

It really did. The books in there were all over the place. Going by the tiles there was stuff in there about voting rights in the Highest Assembly, Proceran trade with the League – particularly Mercantis – and more historical stuff. Like the old Lycaonese states before they were turned into principalities, chronicles about Penthes in the last two centuries, precedents for royal land grants in Procer, Highest Assembly records from Orne and Bayeux, and most strangely of all a book about the wars waged by the Republic of Bellerophon. Vivienne was right, it was a pretty broad net that the First Prince had cast.

"I'm not seeing a pattern," I admitted.

Somewhere in this was the foundation of Cordelia Hasenbach's attempt to become Warden of the West, but I wasn't seeing it.

"From the list there are maybe seventy of the named works that are about trade," Vivienne said. "Either inside Procer or with the League of Free Cities. If I had to guess, that's the unifying thread. The coinage books are just to understand what the coin was worth, it's all about where the gold has been going."

Only that didn't explain the histories, I thought with a frown. Or the sudden preoccupation with voting rights when at the moment the Highest Assembly was pretty much an empty formality. Why would she-

"Fuck," I swore. "Merciless, bugging Gods fuck."

Vivienne poured herself another cup of wine but didn't even offer me the same courtesy, the ungrateful wretch.

"I take it you've realized something?" the Princess drily asked.

"We're not seeing a pattern because those books aren't about one thing," I said. "They're about two things."

I rapped a knuckled atop the books.

"She used those to know what Procer's coin was worth," I said. "Then the trade books and the foreign currency books are about finding out how large the wealth of other nations was. Specifically nations that were trading with the dwarves."

"That explains the Mercantis books and the Penthesian ones, they both have gates," Vivienne said, "but Bellerophon-"

"Hates Penthes to the bone," I said. "So most of the time, when they declare a war it's attacking Penthes. That weakens trade in the region, even if they lose the war."

She was a smart woman, Vivienne, so she caught up quickly.

"That's what the records of Orne and Bayeux in the Highest Assembly are about," she realized. "They used to trade raids with the Counts of Ankou through the Red Flower Vales, and whenever their holdings were hit-"

"-they complained about it in the Highest Assembly, trying to get backing from the First Princes," I finished. "And when Cordelia sees those complains, she knows that trade with Callow was drying up since the Vales used to be our only land path to Procer. It's about their wealth, not us."

"It's insane, Catherine," Vivienne grimaced. "I know she's an intelligent woman, but trying to figure out entire treasuries from just these records? To have even a chance, she'd need..."

"Someone capable of reading through an entire library in a day and remember every word," I interrupted. "Like, say, the Forgetful Librarian."

I saw the understanding sink in. Cordelia wasn't reading those books herself, at least not most of them. She was using the Librarian to do it and then using her as a living reference book to work with. It was insane, just as Vivienne had said, but if there was one woman in Calernia who might be able to pull it off it was Cordelia Hasenbach. Who was, for all her flaws, a remarkably brilliant woman.

"She's putting hard numbers to how much trade with the dwarves is worth," I said. "That's what she's doing. She's figured out something about what the Herald wants and she's following the trail so she can figure out how to flip the negotiations around."

"That's good," Vivienne slowly said. "Isn't it? We're in favour of getting the best of the Herald, aren't we?"

"No when Hanno is going all in on a fundamentally incompatible path," I cursed. "He's digging up a dwarven gate to approach them on his own."

"Cordelia's position could accommodate that," the Princess frowned. "She's not committed yet, she-"

"She is," I interrupted. "Because of the other thing she's doing, the one you couldn't figure out because you didn't have the conversation with Frederic Goethal I had this morning."

My fingers clenched.

"Old Lycaonese borders, voting rights?" I said. "Look at the shape of it, Vivienne. Hasenbach was the Iron Prince's heiress, in principle she's Princess of Hannover as well as Prince of Rhenia right now. Mathilda of Neustria died in Hainaut and word is pretty much all the Siegenburg of Neustria died defending their lands. That leaves two people to hold all the north: Cordelia Hasenbach and Otto Reitzenberg."

And Otto Redcrown had been in that closed council.

"The only reason voting rights would matter," Vivienne slowly said, "is if she believes that there is about to be a change to the borders of the principalities."

"The Kingfisher Prince told me this morning that the princes would stand behind her united," I said. "I think we've just found out how she bought that."

"She's going to abdicate," the Princess said.

"Not just as First Prince," I said. "As Prince of Rhenia and Princess of Hannover as well. She's uniting all Lycaonese lands under Prince Otto."

"Princess Rozala would dare ask as much," Vivienne said.

"No," I said, "but Hasenbach is smart. I underestimated her."

I let out a sigh.

"She's realized she can't be a ruler and the Warden of the West at the same time," I said. "So she's settling all her affairs before she goes all in on her claim."

And there would be no room for retreat, I realized with horror, after having cut away so much of what she loved. She would be in it to the knife. And so would Hanno, who fought for nothing except what he was willing to die for: he would not bend, not now that he believed he'd found a way to save us all. Wasn't that the lesson he'd learned from the silence of the Tribunal: that sometimes you had to take it on your own hands, because no one else would? Fuck, I thought once more. I still wasn't sure what that royal land grant book was for, but it didn't matter.

Not when I'd just become clear that the two claimants to the Name of Warden of the West had just begun to plod down path that could not be reconciled. The differences of opinion over the Blood, they'd just been a pivot that differentiate them. The dwarves were the pivot where the knives came out and neither of them were leaving any room for retreat. Hanno was staking his entire soundness as a leader on the gambit of levelling with the dwarves, risking disgrace if he failed. Which he would if Cordelia found her solution and got to the dwarves first. If he lost there, he was done as a claimant.

The entire philosophy he'd adopted in the wake of the Choir of Judgement falling silent would be proved wrong. The judgment he'd finally begun to venture would be proved wrong at its first real test.

On the other hand, Cordelia had burned every bridge behind her before taking her leap. She was renouncing titles and wealth and rule of the most powerful nation of Calernia to become Warden of the West, which she'd prove worthy of by bending the Herald of the Deeps to her will. Something that could be rendered completely worthless if Hanno got to him first and succeeded with his appeal on emotion. All those sacrifices rendered into nothing in the span of a single conversation. My stomach tightened just thinking about it.

"They're not just rival claimants, Vivienne," I quietly said. "If one of them wins, it fucks over the other. Strongly. Permanently."

She studied me with hooded eyes.

"You told me," the Princess said, "that a pivot cannot be had without a cost."

It's too high a cost, I thought. Their trajectory was a collision from which only one would walk away, and I was not certain we could afford to lose either of them. Slowly I shook my head.

"This is not coincidence," I murmured. "Or fate, and least of all providence."

And that left only one possibility: enemy action.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

*arcanavita*15

The bard is up to something with this as noted by the last statement, also I did not expect for Cordelia to ditch being First Prince but when you look at it by abdicating she solves a lot of her problems and maintains her ideals.

caoimhinh

I mean, there was a whole mini-arc about the Bard trying to make Cordelia Warden of the West, which only failed because of the Augur's intervention.

Cordelia getting the Name now is just doing what the Bard wanted, with a delay.

*Linnus*42

I mean does relying on a Villain as Cordelia does to get a win, help or hurt her claim. Honestly, that is her biggest problem she has little support among Heroes. I did kinda predict that Procer would get split into three parts so that checks out. Still Cordelia reliance on a Villain does mean Cat has a much easier time throttling Cordelia's plot whenever she wants.

Indrani's hint that something was still up with Hanno bears out. Hidden Dwarf gates eh. I am going to guess Hanno also bothered to look up how to speak and read Dwarfish.

Enemy Action eh that sounds like the Bard up to no good... I suppose it could be DK though not sure how he execute that one. I don't think there is anyone else relevant enough to factor in or have the knowledge to execute.

I am thinking this might get bloody if its all or nothing there is no point in Hanno not leveraging his superior martial and magical power.

Anomandris

Cordelia seemed to be relying on something even more evil than Villains here – Financial Analysis!!

Miles

Turns put the Gods Below were just algebra all along.

ninegardens

“The real gods were the equations we solved along the way” - Masego, probably.

The Ignorant Student

The means of gathering information are not important, if anything they might strengthen it since “villain explains their evil plan” is an old story. But it doesn’t matter either way since the Bard is suppressing Below’s stories. As far as creation is concerned, Cordelia is just getting her information from a very reliable librarian.

Honestly, I’m just surprised no Villains have figured out they aren’t bound by stories any more. I mean, Dead King figured it out in about five seconds. Plus, doesn’t Cat still have Above’s stories in her possession? She should be able to do something similar to what the Bard is doing, or at the very least, put a finger on the scales so Cordelia and Hanno are quite on quite so spectacular a path of MAD.

Miles

Speaking of story weight there should be a third claimant. Thus I vote Abigail for Warden.

She doesn’t want it. She doesn’t even see it coming. If she did see it coming she’d run screaming for the hills at the thought of being opposed to Cat.

Combined with her talents of moonwalking uphill, all of this makes her the ideal candidate.

M0och123

You know, I had that thought as well...

Since neither option is palatable for Cat, she may go with option C.

I love the nomination of Abogail for that role, though it would leave two Callowans as the wardens.

caoimhinh

I believe Rozala would be a better middle point as Warden between Cordelia and Hanno.

SpeckofStardust

...
"I still wasn't sure what that royal land grant book was for, but it didn't matter."

Well I think I see how this is going to be handled because Cat is dum.

How many people were for Cordelia X Hanno pairing again?

Liliet

Oooh? How?

Badziew

I guess the shipping plan is that she will be granted some land as a "reward" for abdication, then married with Hanno, and then they both become Wardens (similar how the Bitter Blacksmiths are) and live happily ever after.

Another scenario is that after one of claimants is defeated they become a Spiritual Advisor (or some other assistant Name) to the Warden, perhaps even literally if the defeat will be physical and not just political.

And yet another crazy scenario it that some kind of magic clusterfuck happens and they both fuse (physically and mentally) into a single Named person, the new Warden, able to switch between their two conflicting philosophies as needed.

ohJohN

I don't understand the logic behind that first scenario – if Cordelia abdicates, what could she possibly gain from marrying someone she despises? A political marriage is worthless without a crown, and there's no reason to think it would improve their chances of becoming joint Wardens of the West – the Bitter Blacksmiths are siblings, not married.

SpeckofStardust

No you misunderstand, everyone can see that the warden position has 2 people to fill it.
Rather much like ending a feud of noble families merging via marriage well.
The land grants is to given directly to Hanno a tie that can help control him, on the other hand as Cordy has shown this chapter she has zero problems with using people effectively and 'kindly?'

If she becomes warden she'll need a heroic adviser aka White Prince, while Hanno becoming the Warden needs a political adviser aka former first prince and maker of the diplomatic union between everyone currently here.

Only reason why I didn't considering as a given is that frankly one of the 2 of them needed to make a move in that direction but the royal land grant fits it perfectly.

Mind you a conversation between the 2 needs to happen before a plan fails for it to really work.

Which means all Cat needs to do is kidnap both of them and shove them into a room for an hour.

Tenthyr

The Bard is bending all of the power of perhaps her most terrifying aspect to allow the Dead King free reign, entirely to set up this disaster. She couldn't prevent Catherine's Name being born, but her name is one that requires an equal. It can't stand at its most powerful without an opposing force. So she's attacking here, and now, by turning the birth of the Warden of the West into the death knell of the the war that would cement the Wardens into the zeitgeist.

The Ignorant Student

Eh, I don't know about that. The Bard managed uncontested dominion over Above and Below for thousands of years. It would make more sense to me that Cat can turn this around to becoming Warden of East and West, or just Warden I guess. This conflict actually helps her claim if she wanted to push it. Firstly, she is the one in possession of Above's stories, which already gives her more authority over Heroes than Cordelia or Hanno can muster. Plus, it's setting up a great "blinded by greed" in action if not intention for both as each of them are throwing people under the bus in order to advance their own power.

I don't know much about Procer geography, but Cordelia is promising at the very least to TRIPLE Otto's holdings, AND, since the Dead King is to the north, once he's dealt with, a big chunk of that will be come de facto territory of Otto. Hanno, on the other hand, has always insisted that "I do not judge" and claimed he's just a servant of Judgment, but while he can play the humble Hero not afraid to commit to menial labor all he wants, the fact is that every time his power and authority is challenged, Cat and everyone around him has to defuse a hissy fit, and he is actively getting involved in political matters he has no standing to meddle in.

NEITHER of them deserve to be Warden of the West, because while Cat has earned her Name carefully deescalating the collapse of an Empire and has spent months preparing for her Role, Hanno and Cordelia are blundering ahead trying to grab at this shiny new Name without considering the consequences. They KNOW that the other is aiming for the Name, and instead of trying to take a diplomatic stance on the issue, they're focusing on screwing the other as hard as they can

P.S yes, I know it's full of spelling and grammar mistakes, I'm writing this in a tiny text box on my phone.

Liliet

Cordelia and Hanno have actually been collaborating on defense of Procer quite successfully. Sure, they won't talk to each other, which is stupid, but the only reason they're sabotaging each other here at all is because both of them are unaware the other has staked all of their self-worth on being THE ONE to solve the problem. Hanno's solution failing won't even ruin Cordelia's attempt!

MoreBeer

Free reign for the Dead King? Was that a deliberate pun?

flashburn283

I have to wonder, is this DK being evil, or is the Bard really really screwing everybody over just to prove a point

Liliet

Cicero

Could Cat be in a pattern of three with the Bard?

Her first confrontation a draw? The second a loss?

Liliet

It only works win/draw/lose (or lose/draw/win from the other side). If the first confrontation is a draw, a pattern is not initiated.

Of course, there's plenty of three-beats out there, but please, please,

ruduen

Any guesses on what the Aspect's term would have to be for the Bard to have that granular control over stories? My guess is Narrate.

It's good to have confirmation that Cat's recognized the fact that neither of them feel like claimants that are good fits for what the Warden of the West will be. But it seems the stakes have been raised by the fact that it's been identified as enemy action – and unfortunately, when it comes to name manipulation, I'd put my money on it being the Bard. The Dead King, while knowledgeable, doesn't seem to dip into namelore to the same degree, and seems much less likely to have a role to interfere with claimants through methods outside of... Well, killing them.

So, we've officially gone from politicking to political name fights. Though if that's the case, the good news is, there's a good chance it'll be possible to take a retaliatory swing at the Bard at the end of that line. Of course, it's going to be tricky getting there – this time, she doesn't have the information necessary to take a swing or identify where she can place a hand, so we're back in the theater of improvisation and hoping to find the necessary pieces in time, as well as identify the third option between choosing either of the claimants. If the timeline is five days and there are two 'checkpoints' between with Hakram and Basilia's arrival, here's hoping she can get things in line and can prepare to incorporate the surprises they're bound to bring.

Liliet

I'm guessing the Aspect is Tell.

shikkarasu

And this is why the Aspect needs to be passed on to the Wardens. Any good Bard knows; Show, don't Tell.

Relai

My guess/ hope is that this arc will be the opposite of the last arc. In the Praese arc Cat course of action was to do nothing even when she was surrounded by allies and could have probably manipulated the entire course of actions to a better outcome, but didn't and got bitten for it. I think this time she is going to turn herself into an opposing force against both Cordelia and Hanno. The 3 factors, the League, the Orcs, and what Roland and Masego are doing,.. Cat has power and the ability to influence all three and their decisions while neither Hanno nor Cordelia has the same military prowess or political leverage by themselves to oppose her on each of those factors. Thus instead of Cordelia and Hanno being directed at each other they will be forced to both change course and oppose Cat like how it is with the Bitter Blacksmiths.

Frivolous

Hah!

Thank you, EE, for answering my question in the comments of Recoil, about whether the Intercessor's act of halting the stories of Evil was single or continuous. The answer is apparently continuous.

Now that we know, I'm a bit amazed that she was able to keep on doing that even as she was dying and being reincarnated.

Also: Happy to see that Vivienne's still got it.

I wonder how it was possible that the Intercessor was able to attack both Hanno and Cordelia in this chapter. That's even more subtle than usual. Who did she manipulate?

Or did she visit them directly? That would be scary, if so.

Frivolous

Also it looks like the Intercessor is doing even when she's sleeping. I don't recall ever reading before of an aspect that works even when asleep.

Or maybe she just doesn't sleep? Awake all the time? I feel pity for her if so.

shikkarasu

She told William that when she vanishes she goes 'nowhere,' so I think she only exists while actively necessary to the 'plot.' She therefore wouldn't sleep, since that does not progress any of the stories that she is part of.

As for keeping Aspects active while she literally doesn't exist? Yeah, that's still really badass, but if Scribe could turn Inscribe into 'Create Murder Golem' after a few decades of practise, I have no doubt that Bard could learn to exert will while not existing.

dadycool

Cat has many enemies. It could be one of Bard's plots coming to fruition, it might be Malicia being sneaky, it might be Ranger doing something out of character, it could be DK pulling strings, or it could be someone we don't think of as an enemy of the Grand Alliance sticking their nose where it doesn't belong and messing things up accidentally.

nick012000

Pretty sure it's not Alaya of Satus. She's not Malicia any more, after all, and the army she's leading is still days away.

Liliet

This is an Arsenal play.

Anomandris

Well then it's doomed to fail (Looks at current status of Arsenal F.C.)

Anomandris

Seems extremely OOC for Ranger though. And Alaya has enough, well, humanity? in her to respect Amadeus's last wishes.

Anyone thinking it's the dwarves? Might be the Herald playing the two sides against each other to get better concessions

Reader in The Night

>I wonder how it was possible that the Intercessor was able to attack both Hanno and Cordelia in this chapter. That's even more subtle than usual. Who did she manipulate?<

The dwarves, maybe? They have Named, they are in Calernia, it follows that they're within Bard's reach. Also, the dwarves are at the center of this conflict, particularly the approximately-heroic Herald of the Deep.

Liliet

(This is all the way from the Arsenal, Cat's just only now catching it)

Jason Ipswitch

This was a great chapter. Making library records and a conversation about trivial history riveting is an amazing talent.

It also seems to strongly follow a thought I've been having for a while: Cordelia and Hanno are the wrong people to be Warden of the West. Their needs to be a third claimant. Hackram's swift ascent to Warlord recently showed us that the right claimant can rise suddenly, so there's absolutely precedent. Up until last chapter, I would have thought the Kingfisher Prince, but he does not seem interested. And, while it may just may be my memory, I don't see any other particularly obvious and appropriate choices. I have a few crazy theories, though.

One: The Mirror Knight.

We know who he is, he has both fought and dabbled in politics. The last time we saw him he was being apprenticed to the Pilgrim. Perhaps he's grown and is now a good claimant for the role. Heck, maybe even Cat has misread things and Hanno is going for a Heroic Mentor role and everything he's doing is intended to help Christophe, not elevate himself. It seems like reach, and the MK's current character is effectively a cypher, but it could work. And Cat would hate it.

Two: Cat

I've wondered if Cat was originally supposed to be the Bard's replacement, with a role more like Arbiter or Judge than Warden of the West. If that was the case, then the Bard successfully played Cat into ended up in a lesser (but still potent) Role than she might have had. In which case, Cat isn't really a claimant to Warden of the West, but would be shedding or transmogrifying her new name into simple Warden or Warden of Calerina, the ultimately authority over both Heroes and Villains. I don't think it really fits, but it seems at least a little plausible.

Three: Akua

If I had to make only one guess, this would be it. She'd almost completed a full turn to Good, she's still around, she has no real role in the East any longer, and she has no ties in the West to interfere with local politics. Also, becoming Warden of the West would make her Cat's opposite number, which may appeal to her personally, and has a strong Story theme to it, both in Calernia and in the ongoing story we're reading.

The only question is how she gets there. My prediction would be that it's much like her near-ascension to Dread Empress – almost entirely unwilling. If Hanno and Cordelia realize what's happening, and if they can be freed from their Story ruts (and Akua would be a great person to help do that, based on her own experiences if nothing else) they might very well empower Akua as a compromise candidate.

Extra Bonus Crazy: Cordelia and Hanno have both been planning to make Akua into Warden of the West for weeks, and there is no actual conflict, just the two of them doing necessary preparations for negotiations with the dwarves and not telling Cat what they're planning because they think she'd stop it.

dadycool

I think MK's actions in the Arsenal kinda closed the door on any leadership role. It is possible he could learn, but probably not this quickly. Even though he was set up to be Cat's opposite early on.

Cat is more likely, but that also feels too much like "Wandering Bard, just slightly off".

Akua is absolutely the perfect candidate. She's been Cat's opposite since the beginning, has been turning into a Heroic Leader, and would absolutely stumble into the role kicking and screaming. If Cordelia and Hanno have been preparing to make her Warden, I'm pretty sure it'd have been unknowing.

Sykomantis

The correct answer is Abigail the Fox out of fking nowhere. It's just the logical conclusion to her story arc: "failing" upwards so hard she gets to be the leader of the Heroes and having to be in near constant conflict with the BLACK QUEEN!

All the Namelore benefits of being a comic relief character combined with the ungodly luck that comes from being the epitome of imposter syndrome. She wouldn't even need to know anything about how things are run, she would just bumble into doing the correct thing every time a problem comes up! It would very much piss Cat off to no end, and you can't tell me we all wouldn't love seeing it.

PeteKay

This makes no sense, has not been set up in any meaningful fashion and contradicts the basic tenet that named are made of Intent and Belief. BUT I AM STILL ALL HERE FOR IT. ALL HAIL ABIGAIL THE FOX, FIN WARDEN OF THE WEST.

Liliet

"Named are made of intent and belief" no, they're made of story.

Proof: newborn baby Sabah, who had a Name even though I'm pretty sure newborns are incapable of either intent or belief.

Liliet

Cordelia and Hanno are each half a Warden. Unmatched in their own area of expertise, utterly bumbling in the other's.

shikkarasu

"I'll have one Nakamakua, please."

'Would you like Extra Bonus Crazy with that?'

"I'm offended you have to ask."

dadycool

Traitorous Strikes Again!

The first part of this chapter, until she found the Blacksmith, felt a lot like a quest, but in a rather organic way, which was nice.

The second part felt more like her old habits of Sherlocking her way to the answer, which was also fun.

Hargabga

She's going to make them, ugh, talk to each other, wouldn't she?

Liliet

I bloody well hope so!

Anomandris

Imagine if they had already done so behind Cat's back – I mean neither of the two are idiots. It would be hilarious .

Cat: "I, as your savior, have a solution to your problems!!".
Them: "What problems?"

This might be a two pronged approach to force the Dwarven hands. Cordy is ready with a more reasonable trade while Hanno appeals directly to the Name. Herald ends up taking the offer.

Liliet

That would be nice!

Hargabga

But there is so much drama in the misunderstandings! Entire genre were build on less.

Raved Thrad

Two claimants enter, one warden leaves. Former claimant left to bask in the afterglow. ;P

medailyfun or get laid

Juff

Typo Thread:

come to ahead > come to a head
Not it was > Now it was would a pleasure > would be a pleasure up the damnable set of stairs up (two ups) perhaps shattered > perhaps shatter workaround giving (missing something like "in lieu of") face if someone > face of someone but form Salia > but from Salia still gesture > still gestured
You're going > You're doing have the maps, but unlikely to have them (sounds odd)
One a horse. > On a horse.
Having bored > Having become bored those complains > those complaints
No when > Not when when I'd just > when it'd just differentiate > differentiated

Forum Solipsist

Analphagor...
Still laughing at that.

ohJohN

My Old Miezan is a little rusty, but Traitorous is basically undercover as “Professor Ass-Eater”, right? 😂

“archlector” (from Latin archi- “highest, most important” + lēctor “reader”) ≈ “eminent scholar”
“anal” (from Latin ānus) is... obvious
“phagor” (from Latin -phagus “eating” + -tor “one who does”) ≈ “eater”

MoreDakka

That is a epic mix of rare knowledge and childish glee

Fits Traitorous like a glove

Shawn DeLuca

This chapter is so good!!!

Xinci

Mm, so Hanno still having potentially having recall does strengthen two propositions I had on it.

1) It uses Light as a medium of storage and interaction. So if he can figure out where to go, he can feasibly still use it to search for things. This is logical as Light in of itself must contain a high amount of information to categorize things as unnatural or not.

2) As it was made from a artifact, the “shape” of its interactions on Hanno’s soul remains even if he no longer has the previous mantle of White Knight. Similarly to how Cat retained qualities of Take, as she went on. She had learned the shape of the ability even if she lost a particular source of power.

This does indeed feel kind of like the continuation of the seeds sown in the Arsenal. Perhaps this time properly clear and complete information sharing will be done so no one feels the need to dissent.

Liliet

> This is logical as Light in of itself must contain a high amount of information

That’s a completely unwarranted assumption. Light does not need to “contain” information. It can instead:

- 1) have access to an external source of information that it can draw from on demand;
- 2) contain an algorithm that differentiates natural from unnatural easily in context and is concise;
- 3) have access to an external algorithm, combining the two above options;
- 4) contain an algorithm that includes accessing external information, combining the two above options in another way.

shikkarasu

Do we know that Recall uses Light? We know that Ride does, and I'd be surprised if his coin flip didn't use it, but Recall seems to be a way to google the sort of information Names store up over time, like how some Named dream the memories of their predecessors. If that's the case those memories shouldn't require Light, since not all Heroes seem to wield it and more than just Heroes have those memories.

Obviously it's more powerful than that, giving Hanno their fighting styles and skills in addition to information, but it still fits as the core ability that Recall is strengthening.

Liliet

I don't think we know that it's Light either.

TrustiestRaptor

So as I read through, I saw the obvious pattern of seven and one in the books/scroll Vivienne brought to the table regarding Cordelia and I wondered if there was a seven and one pattern regarding Hanno. Maybe I'm just seeing things, but this is a story about story repetition, so there's that.

Catherine went to find Hanno,

- 1] Checked his camp, ruled out Severance council.
- 2] Visited Blessed Artificer, found out about Bitter Blacksmith.
- 3] Went to check horses to find her, Rozala's camp and then Proceran stables, found a worker pointing to them leaving yesterday.
- 4] Went out the eastern gate to the Callowan Army camp, maps are very bad, looking for someplace incredibly old.
- 5] Spoke with Pickler, realized she was not looking for a structure, but something like a lock or trap.
- 6] Visited Nestor Ikaroi, learned about Carrouges [no fighting allowed], rumors of Dwarven Gate.
- 7] Flew to Carrouges, nothing present, but the swamp has activity and has been drained.

One] There is the Bitter Blacksmith, picking the lock that's been dug out of the muck. Alongside them are two hundred Brabantine conscripts and fantassins.

Now, I have no idea if this actually means anything to the current plot at hand, and I might have missed an event or gotten this all wrong, but it does look to me like a pattern of seven and one.

Lord Haart

Well spotted! I buy it.

ohJohN

The Bard is almost definitely responsible, given her surreptitious final play during the Arsenal affrays. But I wonder if she had already set this all in motion then, or if she needed to give another nudge in the time since then – e.g. by influencing the dwarves before their meeting. They might not have received (or heeded) the Grand Alliance's warning about her, making them one of the few major players she might still have traction with, and they're at the crux of this brewing catastrophe.

It seems like she's using the exact same strategy she tried to hamstring Warden of the East with: present a false dichotomy of Named (Hanno) vs. nations (Cordelia) and make Cat think she has to choose one, when the correct answer is she needs both: two Wardens of the West.

Hanno has ample experience with being Named, he's well-versed in Namelore, he's the heroic representative under the T&T, and he's widely trusted and respected by heroes (and even some villains). But, while he's starting to gain some political influence, it's still limited and he doesn't seem particularly skilled at or temperamentally inclined to ruling.

Meanwhile, Cordelia has spent most of her life ruling the most powerful surface nation, is an expert cat-herder, diplomat, and intriguer, and has somehow held together both an international coalition and a dying Principate during a near-hopeless war. She has some Named support, but isn't widely trusted to lead them – and she doesn't have the experience, lore, and mindset to do so effectively.

Cat has a long history of consolidating disparate power and authority in ways that others simply can't: Squire, head of the Fifteenth Legion, Queen of Callow, Sovereign of Moonless Night, Queen of Lost and Found, First Under the Night... Particularly within the Grand Alliance, she's both the leader of a signatory nation and the representative for villains under the T&T. Hoarding titles like a magpie has become part of her story, and it made her uniquely suited to fulfill both necessary elements of WotE.

So... why does she think that either Hanno or Cordelia alone can meet similar requirements for WotW? She's aware of their strengths and weaknesses, and the lesson about Named vs. nations should be fresh and deeply learned, given what it cost her. In this chapter, even, she idly thinks about how the Bitter Blacksmiths share the same Name! She's SO CLOSE to getting it.

Is it just that she's failed to recognize that she's special, that nobody else has the same breath of authority? Humility is all well and good, but, uh, now Cordelia is renouncing rule and Hanno is trying his hand at diplomacy 😞.

Liliet

TBF, all precedents for a shared Name we know of have been siblings, which Hanno and Cordelia are not (to the best of our knowledge lol).

It's a bit of a leap, and Cat only just caught up to the audience on the dichotomy being false and Bard-engineered.

superkeaton

Cat's playing the endgame of New Vegas now.

Tohron

One thing I noticed – Hanno and Cordelia are currently approaching the matter of becoming Warden of the West in the way that villains fight over getting a Name – assuming they have to defeat their rivals in order to claim it for themselves. It feels like claiming what's supposed to be a heroic name in this manner would have some pretty bad consequences...

Archange

Traitorous is just the absolute best.

Chapter 36: Reiterate

"If you cannot forgive, forget; if you cannot forget, forgive."

– King Jehan the Wise of Callow

The morning of Hakram's arrival, I got a visit from Archer.

Though Indrani enjoyed a good pampering most out of the Woe, she was too restless to actually stay in a palace for long. It'd been the same back in Laure, where she'd spent more in dives by the docks than in her suite. I trusted her not to get into too much trouble, and once in a while she did stumble across an interesting tidbit. Sometimes she even bothered to share those. This morning, by her sunny smile, was to be one of the lucky ones. Indrani only got that manically pleasant when she figured she'd found something of sufficient value to ask something of me in turn.

"Tell me I'm good," she demanded, sitting on the table just to the left of my eggs.

"You're sometimes slightly to the north of decent," I helpfully replied. "Like, once every few years. It has happened. I'm told. In rumours. But not, like, very reliable ones."

She wagged a finger at me.

"If I don't get honey, you don't get your treat," Archer said.

Leaning forward, I offered her a widely pleasant smile and snatched a little covered porcelain bowl which I then put on her lap. There was a pause.

"There's honey in that, isn't there," Indrani resignedly said.

"I think we should be talking about where my treat is, if anything," I replied, taking a bite of my eggs.

Good eggs. They tasted like salt and a little bit of victory at someone else's expense. She sighed, stealing a fork and then a bite of her own. Magnanimously I allowed this raider-like behaviour, even though taking breakfast from her rightful queen could be seen as treason in a certain light.

"Our little hero friends are about to meet for a Good talk," Archer told me. "Tonight. A buddy told me it's mandatory for any of their kind that're in the region."

I let out a low whistle. That was a lot of heroes. Maybe the most there'd been together in more than a century: even when we'd started the Truce and Terms, most of the people who'd signed it hadn't actually been in the same place. There had to be at least forty heroes around Salia at the moment, since all those that'd been on other fronts had retreated to the capital with their parent army.

"Hanno called that?" I asked.

"I didn't get told that outright," Archer admitted, "but there's really no one else who could give that order and expect it to work."

Well, she wasn't wrong there. If the Grey Pilgrim still lived he would have made a second, but since Tariq had died there'd been no potential rival for leadership on Above's side of the fence.

"How reliable would you say your friend is?" I asked.

"She wouldn't lie," Indrani firmly said. "I trust her."

Either the Silver Huntress or the Vagrant Spear then, I thought. I wasn't sure that Alexis would come to her with something like that even after they'd buried the hatchet, though, so most likely the Spear. I took another bite of eggs, swallowed.

"Why'd she tell you?" I asked.

"Because the Blood are worried about this little tiff between Cordy and Shiny Boots going bad so they've had a talk with their Bestowed," Indrani said. "Congrats, Cat, you're now the adult in the room the rats go tattle to."

"Ah, everything I ever wanted," I thinly smiled.

The thought that even the Blood, whose idea of diplomatic subtlety was painting the cudgel black before hitting someone with it, could tell the situation was getting volatile rather soured my appetite. I needed to ask one more thing first, though.

"You find out where they're meeting?"

I'd set down my fork, so Indrani did not miss a beat before helping herself to my breakfast. Refuge had taught her some very firm ideas about unattended food being up for grabs.

"Some place out in the country," Archer said. "A village in the middle of nowhere."

"Let me guess," I smiled, "is it called Carrouges?"

She shoveled in the last mouthful of breakfast and eyed me balefully.

"How would you even know that?" Indrani complained through her chewing.

"I was just there last night," I sighed. "Shiny Boots is digging up a dwarven gate there."

And then dragging everyone there. That was telling: he'd get the Bitter Blacksmith to open the lock for him and then, with that open gate in sight, make his case to the heroes that the Kingdom

Under should be appealed to directly. Going around Cordelia. I grimaced. Even if he didn't get to it immediately after, if he let a few day pass, the simple act of having gotten most of the heroes to back his solution would kneecap Cordelia's claim. Their Name was about handling heroes, and the heroes would be making their preference pretty clear. I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"I might have to do something about this," I admitted. "If he goes through with it there's only confrontation left."

I wouldn't need to warn the First Prince about it happening, not since the Kingfisher Prince would be part of the gathering and I did not doubt he'd inform her the moment he got the summons, but I wasn't actually sure Cordelia could do a lot about this. She was a high officer of the Grand Alliance, for all that now the authority was fraying along with all authorities more parchment than steel, so it could be argued that she had a right to attend and make to them her own case. And Hanno would let her, I thought. He'd respect the right, even if it opened the door to a rival claimant.

It wouldn't be a good battlefield for her, though. Hanno had fought alongside most those people and he was still the Sword of Judgement, two things that'd weigh the balance of opinion in his favour. And should the First Prince's support come mostly from Proceran heroes, which I suspected it would, then it would be final nail in the coffin of her claim: people could live with a Warden who was Proceran, but no one would want a Proceran Warden. I sighed, lost in thought, and came back to the sound of Indrani slurping down the last of my tea.

"I need to find out what Hasenbach will be up to," I said. "She's been looking for her slayer's arrow, but now she needs to give answer or she'll get knocked out of the race."

"Would that be such a bad thing?" Indrani asked.

I cocked my head at her.

"Did Vivienne talk to you about what we found out?"

"You two think this is a Bard plot," she said. "That she somehow nudged things a while back so that it'd get ugly when they fought it out."

"There's something off, 'Drani," I said. "I can feel it. They're both better than this, but it's like every action one takes scrapes the other raw."

Archer chewed her lip.

"I've learned not to bet against you when it comes to this stuff," she said. "So do what you think you have to, Cat. But if you're worried that time is running out, then you need to be careful about something too."

I leaned back, giving her my full attention. It was rare enough for her to venture advice that when she did I always felt bound to take it seriously.

"You need to get your own house in order, Cat," Indrani said. "You're worried about the two of them fucking it up when someone becomes Warden of the West, but you're not done either. You need to clean up your loose ends, otherwise it's you that becomes the weak point."

My lips thinned.

"You're talking about Hakram," I said.

"Not just him," she replied. "Whatever the Hells you have going with Akua these days, that needs seeing to. And you made a promise to the Pilgrim before he died."

I had made three, but I knew which one she meant. I'd sworn to Tariq that I would reconcile with Hanno. Which I very much had not, for all that our last conversation had been cordial. That'd been a veneer, a surface thing. Nothing had been aired out or fixed.

"I don't have a lot of time, Indrani," I quietly said. "Four days, maybe less."

"So you best get a move on," Archer mercilessly replied. "And one last warning, since I know you."

She met my eye squarely.

"You like to just dip your toe in and retreat," Indrani said. "Like you're gauging the temperature of the water. It's a thing you do when you're afraid of dealing with a hard conversation, Cat, and you've even got the excuse of all that's going on right now to justify being half-hearted."

Her eyes narrowed.

"Don't," Archer said. "You might be pissed, but Hakram's one of us. Don't botch this because it stings."

My fingers tightened around the arm of my chair. She set down my empty cup and hopped off the table, throwing me one last look over her shoulder before walking out of the room.

That I wasn't sure who it was I was angry at only made the anger burn more harshly.

An hour before Noon Bell I learned that my tentative steps to find out what the First Prince was planning as a response to Hanno's summons were pointless. I didn't have to rely on spies because it was at my own damn door that the knock came: Cordelia Hasenbach wanted to meet.

I offered to head to the archives, but she'd taken the lead already. She was out, had gone by her palace and was ready to receive me as soon as I could make the time. I didn't bother to play coy or string it out. The sooner that talk was had the better. Word had come by scrying ritual that Warlord Hakram and a band of wolf riders were out of the Twilight Ways and making good pace, expected half past Noon Bell. I figured that the other half of the reason Hasenbach had left the archive was that she wanted to have a look at the preparations to formally receive the Warlord of the Clans for the first time in Proceran history.

So I limped my way through beautiful old Merovins halls again, led by servants to another of the pretty little parlours that seemed to grow like mushrooms wherever Cordelia Hasenbach stayed for more than a few days. I was ushered in quietly, my visit not secret but definitely less than official, and I found that the First Prince of Procer looked tired. She was impeccably dressed in grey and green, hair in a Lycaonese braid, but even though she'd tried to hide it under cosmetics I could see the rings around her eyes. Someone had been reading instead of sleeping for too long.

We got through a single round of the usual courtesies before she brought up why she'd asked me to come, which by Hasenbach standards was positively brusque. She, too, was feeling time slipping away through her fingers.

"When we first began discussing the Liesse Accords, one of the central principles was the founding of a city in the Red Flower Vales," Cordelia said. "A centre of learning and a seat for the Accords."

Also a way to discourage war between Callow and Procer, since it'd be standing right in the middle and sworn to neutrality. The Stairway was a second land path between our nations, but it was also ridiculously defensible and easy to close off. Geography always had a seat at the table when war was discussed, whether we liked to admit it or not. I intended to have ours strongly arguing for peace.

"As Queen of Callow I have the right to grant lands on the kingdom's side," I said. "My successor has sworn to abide by the grant."

If there'd actually been Counts of Ankou around left this might have gotten messy, but they'd been unseated with the Conquest.

Telling a governor I'd appointed myself that the map would get redrawn was much less complicated.

"Indeed," Cordelia said. "Princess Vivienne was most eloquent in arguing in favour, arguments I passed to the Highest Assembly. Not enough, unfortunately, were swayed."

If the ceded lands had come from just Orne or Bayeux it might have gone through, Vivienne had written me back then, but with two principalities losing a slice it'd turned into a slog. Ceding territory through anything but a peace treaty needed to be ratified by two thirds of the Highest Assembly and the First Prince just hadn't had the votes.

"And you're telling me that's changed?" I asked.

She smiled and set a scroll down on the table between us. I popped the seal and unfurled it, reading through the dense lines carefully. Most of it was legalistic nonsense, but the gist of it was pretty clear. Since some principalities had formally seceded and some summons to emergency sessions of the Highest Assembly refused, the First Prince was exercising ancient prerogatives to establish a new principality. The Principality of Cardinal. Its borders had been decided this morning by vote in the Assembly, but there I tripped over a phrase.

"What is a 'vote présentiel'?" I asked.

"Only princes in attendance or their representatives may vote, and there is no quorum to any decision so taken," the First Prince said. "The decisions are not binding until a second vote has been taken over the matter, but to be fully overturned it would need a two thirds majority or the consent of the First Prince."

Meaning that this morning, Cordelia Hasenbach had created a principality out of two chunks of land – one in Orne, one in Bayeux – and been made princess of them. She had then, I saw in the following lines, declared independence from the Principate of Procer. In practice the land wasn't actually in her hands yet, but the legal foundation was there and if Rozala Malanza backed this, which by the roll count of the votes she did, then it was a done deal. So long as she held firm and refused to let the decision be overturned, the land was split from Procer and ready to be added to the city-state of Cardinal.

There had been two things I wanted most out of Cordelia Hasenbach: Cardinal and Procer's signature on the Accords. She was already halfway to delivering that.

"That is," I frankly said, "a very good bribe."

She didn't take offence, even though her nose wrinkled ever so slightly at the bluntness. We both knew that this was. I closed my eye, thinking it through. The First Prince was giving me this but she'd not asked for anything in return. So what was it that she got? I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. The timing made it clear that this was her answer to what Hanno was up to, but this wouldn't help her with the heroes. It wouldn't – no, I was looking at this wrong. Hasenbach was never going to win this by heroic backing, she already knew that. Her angle, her strength, it was on the great scale. The nation game, not the boots on the ground where Hanno thrived.

She hadn't asked anything of me, I realized, because my signature was what she was after. What she wanted was the two of us working together to make the Age of Order so that she was already pretty much filling the shoes of the Warden of the West. Hanno's opening stroke was gathering support, Cordelia was going straight for the authority. She wanted the wind in her sails before she ever stepped foot in front of the heroes, providence nudging things her way.

"Someone's been teaching you namelore," I finally said, opening my eye.

The blonde princess' austere face turned anguished, for a moment. It was gone in a flicker, like it'd never been there.

"Owls are terrible gossips," the First Prince simply said.

The Augur, I thought. Hasenbach wasn't learning namelore so much as brute forcing through prediction what might and might not work. Gods, that must be rough on her cousin. Especially the parts that had anything to do with me, because I had it on good authority that the Augur had been unable to predict me since I became First Under the Night. Sve Noc had seen to that. So she doesn't know if I accept this or not, I considered. She just knows that if I agree, she might be able to beat Hanno.

"I see you have concerns," Cordelia calmly said. "Perhaps I can allay them."

"I'm not sure you can," I honestly said.

Her calm did not waver.

"Then perhaps it is a matter of tightening our alliance," the First Prince of Procer said. "Let us sign the Liesse Accords."

I paused for a beat.

"You're serious," I said.

"I am," Cordelia said. "I believe the Blood is so inclined as well, and should have the hour free. It has waited long enough, Queen Catherine. Let us sign the papers."

Fuck, I thought. I wasn't sure it'd make her win, if I went through with this. If my instincts were right every time, I wouldn't have murdered my own fucking father. And this, the offer on the table right now, wasn't it what I'd been after for years? I could get the world I'd been after today. Not tomorrow, not in a year, not on the horizon. Today. Wouldn't it change what this war was, to be fighting for something? It might even help. And it wasn't like I'd be fucking over Good, one of Above's own claimants was asking me for this. It wasn't a plot or a scheme, there was no reason it should...

I breathed in, breathed out. Forced the thoughts back into line. I knew myself just well enough to be aware that, given long enough, I could justify nearly anything to myself if it got me something I wanted badly enough. That'd gotten me through some hard decisions, but it'd let me make some bad ones too. And, setting aside all my worries about one claimant winning against the other, there was still one warning fresh to my ear. Archer had been right, when she'd told me I needed to see to my loose ends. Going into this half-cocked was potentially disastrous. I licked my lips. I'd not noticed them going dry.

"I'll have to consult with my successor first," I said, tone even.

Her control slipped just enough that I saw her eyes tighten. Dismay. Fear. She thinks she loses tonight if she doesn't get this, I realized. That she'll have abdicated for nothing, thrown her life and her life's work away pointlessly. And I feared too, knowing that, as much because I was not sure I could stop Hanno as because I was afraid of what Cordelia Hasenbach might yet do, cornered.

"I see," the First Prince replied, tone just as even.

I rose to my feet, then hesitated.

"What is it about him that you find unacceptable?" I asked.

Her face was a mask, pale and unmoving.

"Hanno of Arwad is the culmination of personal power," the First Prince said, tone hard as steel. "He derives authority from his personal virtue, his personal strength of arms, his personal ties to a Choir. And for all his flaws, I recognize the man to be exceptional. Which is the very issue: he is an exception."

The Lycaonese princess rose to her feet.

"He has not method, no system, because he does not use them," she said. "His judgement, when it is not that of angels, is entirely personal. Circumstantial. And perhaps, for Hanno of Arwad, most of the time the answer will still be correct. But ask yourself this – will the same be true of his successors?"

Her blue eyes burned.

"That is why we partition power, why we share it," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "Why we make rules all have to obey. His flaw is the same was yours, Warden: he believes, deep down, that he is capable of wielding power without misusing it. That others after him will do the same."

Her jaw clenched.

"I have seen what that mistaken belief did to Procer," she said. "Even when the power was in my hands. And I would not see that mistake repeated for all of Calernia. There must be rules for Named as there are for men, and I cannot brook anyone who would do otherwise."

The queen's judgement, I thought, against the assembly's law. Of course she didn't trust heroes, while she was trying to keep Procer from falling apart they kept... getting in the way, from where she sat. The Mirror Knight emboldening a prince to make a scheme that nearly pulled the Firstborn out of the war, another trying to kill a prince of the blood and then the Kingfisher Prince refusing to ask for her death. All of it, that expanding mess dropped in her lap, culminating in that moment where the White Knight looked her in the eye and refused to compromise.

A disaster that the First Prince traced back to the Chosen, and their leader had just refused to consider helping fix it.

It'd not been that that happened, at least not exactly. Not entirely. But I could so easily see how she'd come to see Named as needing to made subject to rules, and how fundamentally she would never believe that Hanno of Arwad would ever do it. If he had it in him, wouldn't he have done it back then? It was the harshest light possible to look at the past in, but no part of it was entirely wrong. That was the problem here. When I was going to speak to Hanno one last time, and I must, I expected his troubles to be just as grounded in truth. Neither was wrong.

One must still lose, though, and so that damn coin was spinning.

"You're not out of this yet," I said, and left it at that.

—

I wasn't part of the party that greeted Hakram when he rode into the capital.

Procer was the host, it wouldn't do to step on their toes. The two of us were rulers now, I no longer had a claim on him beyond what the Warden of the East could stake. Instead of moping in a palace, I went down into the city and found a nice little butcher's shop. They killed the pig out bad, clean and quick, and I bought a bag of salt from the owner's brother just down the street. I put the dead pig on my borrowed horse's back and headed back up to the Lineal. There were plenty of empty parks and palaces, so I found myself a nice little thicket of trees and hung my cloak on a branch.

It'd been a while since I'd dug a fire pit, but I still remembered how. I put my back into it, and it when it was done I went back to the palace to snatch up a spit and firewood. Blackflame would spoil the taste, so I struck Legion pinewood matches and struggled with the feeble breeze that'd shown up to fight me. I should have brought oil to quicken that up, even if it would have been cheating a bit. The pleasant thing about Name strength was that I needed no Night to shove the pig onto the spike and begin to roast it. I rubbed salt on sparingly. Orcs preferred the meat without spices.

It was halfway to Afternoon Bell when I heard the first footsteps. Vivienne had taken longer to tell him where I was than I'd thought she would. I didn't need to ask who it was, or even turn. I might have temporarily lost the knack I'd had as Warden of the East, but I could still pick out the sound of that gait out of a thousand. There'd been a time where it had been just as familiar as my own, almost an extension of my own body. Those days were over. I still remembered.

The steps stuttered as he entered the thicket.

"Smells good," Hakram Deadhand said, voice hesitant.

Careful. I glanced at him, turning the spit. He looked, I thought, much the same as he had in Ater. Oh the armour was off, the same plate that'd been burnt by Summer flame and he had never left abandoned, but the clothes didn't matter much. He was still one of the tallest orcs I'd ever met, broad-shouldered and built. The arm and leg he'd lost in my service were now in steel, the finest prosthetic work Hierophant had ever done, and the hand he'd lost to the Lone Swordsman remained in bone. Deadhand they'd called him, even before they called him Adjutant.

There was still a song about it. Dead the hand and dead the man, I almost hummed. But it was a Legion song, and he was no longer of the Legions. Or one of mine at all. I had not yet said a word, and already that knowledge hung between us like a funerary shroud. I took my hand off the spit, rubbing the bridge of my nose.

"I thought," I said, "that this would be hard in the way that picking at a wound is hard."

Hakram stood in a tall oak's shadow, the sun not reaching any of the limbs that would reflect it.

"But it's not?" he quietly asked.

I smiled, a tad bitterly.

"I just don't know what to say," I admitted.

In a way, that was even worse. Six months ago he'd been the only person in my life I'd ever found it hard to understand. Now it was like there was a pit between who we'd become and who we'd been and anything I said would just be shouting to the shadow across the pit rather than the man in front of me. Pointless. Slowly, Hakram moved out of the shade. Eyes watching me every step of the way, as if waiting for a storm or a refusal, he made his way to the other side of the fire. There he sat, lowering himself to the forest floor.

"Then," Hakram Deadhand said, "perhaps you should let me start."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Sir Nil

That is a respectable counter by Hasenbach.

Zggt

It's the classic counter-argument for nationalist dictators. This is of course something that we (who know world history) can easily recognize. The "single competent ruler" attitude will very rarely get a competent leadership and over time they will not be the single ones in the job. What eventually will follow is a single incompetent ruler, usually followed by others, where by the time another competent ruler gets in place all they can do is delay the inevitable end.

The fact that Cordelia recognizes this before a set of disastrous and repeated collapses makes her quite frankly brilliant. In the context of a world which bends reality to justify heroes, this is an incredibly deep realization.

Vicos

But the problem with the argument is The Warden is directly selected by gods, real verifiable gods, which mean that is factible they are always "exceptions"

Rynjin

It's also...dubiously accurate in this world. They're literally shaping the role right now. If the role is hard-shaped to require someone impartial, fair, and wise of judgment then it will likely be acceptable for only a single person to hold all that power.

If, instead, the role is coded with political maneuvering required and encouraged...things get messy.

Zggt

If someone gets a Name, it does not ensure they are good at it. There are long lists of heroes and villains who suck at their job and get murdered in the story. Praes had Triumphant (the ordained victor) just as much as Procer has Cordelia (the pragmatic political operator), both extremely successful rulers despite being opposites of the norm for their respective states. The fact that the role is being set for "single great ruler" does not make that single great ruler infallible, nor does it even mean all who will pick up that mantle will fulfill that role well.

Ranger lost, Black died, Triumphant was defeated, despite all the Crusades it doesn't look like the Heroes are any closer to achieving any of their goals, and Cat still lives despite the Bard having all the lore in the world at her disposal and repeated attempts. The only exception we know of in the story is the Dead King, the proverbial biggest bad, whose strength that allows him to do this also means that he can never become more than he is currently, only less.

So, I'm not sure that just because it is set to work that way it can overcome human nature in general. One of the earliest motifs of APGtE is that the nature of people themselves can be stronger than names and stories.

Xinci

I mean one can note the point of Black's whole view of Praes and its Dread Empress's/Emperors was that, it was shaped in a fashion that the actually competent rulers were the exception. Its Role wasn't cemented under some great ruler, who managed to shape Praes out of scarcity, it was shaped by such a person promptly being murdered at the inception point of their reign. If anything Praes shows how important the fomenting parts of a Name are for future generations.

Even with other Heroes, we get it noted that those participating in the Crusade are outside of their story protections(one could honestly posit that Christophe may have not been in such a bad place in an alternate timeline where he was just guarding his lake and learning from the Elfen Dames). By the nature of this lack of protection, Cat and Black were able to beat them back(and from a doylist sense must do so if we are going to have a story where our protagonist is successful), specifically, because they lacked some of the protection their Roles likely would have given them in their original narratives. The Role definitely doesn't guarantee survival or the like, but it is definitely something that can set the pattern for centuries after the first iteration.

Salt

Respectable, but far from completely accurate.

The problem with law is that it's only ever a framework, and can easily be abused. That's why the judicial system exists, and why jurisprudence is so complex – what a law actually means tends to be completely circumstantial, and whether a law does what it's actually intended to do is even less reliable. Complaining about circumstantial judgements and then advocating for the rule of law, is like complaining about water and advocating for scuba diving.

There is an insane amount of personal judgement involved in the interpretation and application of law, and the idea that the law by itself could ever come close to being in any way shape or form fair or just is a joke. Proceran politics and every personal skill Cordelia has is the best example of this problem – Proceran laws almost never did what they were intended to do, rarely served the people they were intended to serve, almost never in the way that they were intended to function, and regularly was twisted into allowing whatever outcome a clever enough person like Cordelia wished.

At the end of the day, wholly trusting in law as objective or non-circumstantial is just as flawed as wholly trusting in the goodness of people as innate and inevitable. It's a really nice sounding ideal in theory, but it doesn't work by itself. At all.

Agent J

“Proceran politics and every personal skill Cordelia has is the best example of this problem – Proceran laws almost never did what they were intended to do, rarely served the people they were intended to serve"

I'll remind that it's been canonically stated that the Proceran peasantry is the best treated and have more liberties than any other on the continent.

jamesc9

So there's a question: whether the outcomes for Proceran peasantry are because of or despite the law under which they live?

If it's despite, then I'd be looking to:

- what the Proceran House of Light expects, teaches, and won't preach against
- the rural version of no Prince surviving a whispering campaign
- wealth

If it's because, then I'm looking for ways in which princes are punished, who try to use brute force to smash through any of those constraints.

Linnus42

I find it hilarious Cordelia is blaming the Chosen and Heroes for Mirror Knight and Cat's nodding along when she got the report. That it was the Princes and the nobles poisoning Christophe against the Drow not the other way around. And Christophe had not even signed off the plan anyway. Cat got that info directly from Sve Noc. But Cordelia is delusional and doesn't believe in personal responsibility apparently. I should also note Cordelia didn't have a solution to that Prince going rogue until Arsenal went off.

And I don't think getting the top jobs cause you are related to right person is some grand fair system either quite frankly. But I don't see Cordelia massively overhauling the Noble system. At least Hanno earned his power and it wasn't served up on a silver spoon.

Sinead

I don't think describing Cat as 'nodding along' is correct. I think it's that she sees and understands Cordelia's frustrations and issues with Hanno.

Linnus42

Maybe but its funny Cordelia talks about the importance of Law and Order. When she has assassinated political rivals and the reason the Red Axe spiraled out of control was because Cordelia didn't want to follow the laws she agreed to because she had a political crisis. So its kinda rich she talks about the importance of Laws and Order when she is a Noble (who was born with special privileges) and has violated said rules herself. That is mighty Hypocritical.

caoimhinh

But... that is what Cat did.
Because Cordelia is wrong in a lot of things, if not all of those that were mentioned. And Catherine is just nodding along mentally and saying Cordelia is not wrong.
Just because it's understandable that Cordelia would hold a grudge since she was screwed by what happened in those occasions does not mean that she is not wrong in her stance and her actions.

Salt

They're (Hanno and Cordelia) are both a little wrong to be honest. You're never going to get anywhere if you just trust in the goodness of people or exceptional individuals, but on the other hand the law by itself is absolutely worthless if the people interpreting and applying it don't have exceptional moral backbone. At the end of the day you need both.

You need the structure and universal basis as a framework that Cordelia is advocating, not the total lack of oversight that Hanno wants, else you just get endless squabbling based on personal and often ignorant ideas about what's right and wrong. It's not wrong to say that Heroes as a whole are dysfunctional at best and horrifically flawed at worst.

You also need to rely exceptional people like Hanno to make circumstantial judgements and make sure the law does what it was intended to do, instead of leaving power to people like Cordelia who would abuse the law for their own goals. No one wants a Proceran Warden because well-crafted laws piloted by clever people with lackluster ethics is an irredeemable horror show, as Cordelia and the rest of the highest assembly spent their entire lives proving.

Sinead

She's saying Cordelia is not entirely wrong because the heroes are causing issues in Cordelia's effort to maintain peace or settle the War on Keter from the side of logistics.

-Laurence poisoned the well of diplomacy with the Western House of Light's conclave

-Christophe was used as a political shield against early retribution against the drow plot

-The Red Axe attempted to assassinate a Prince

-While Hanno is correct in that the treaty gave him jurisdiction over the Red Axe trial, he couldn't have acknowledged that perhaps an international treaty didn't foresee treaty members attempting to assassinate each other? And that some discussion is warranted.

Her experience is that Heroes are the bane to any attempts at large scale diplomacy and organization and need to be corralled. This is in part because Cat has really kept her side in line, so Hanno's off hand approach stands out in contrast. This is more than a grudge and the idea that one office cannot hold absolute authority. And I do not read Cordelia as absolving herself of this criticism with 'I have seen what this power has done, even when I've held the office.'

That is why Cordelia is as described by Cat right from where she sits. Cat is not speaking in these meeting to strongly for the exact concern of weakening the Role of Warden of the West.

Hargabga

Funny how you can berate blindness while being deaf.

Liliet

I mean, it's not like Cordelia is advocating for Princes to have all this individual power either? She's been curtailing nobles ever since she first became First Prince. Her problem is not that the Chosen are WORSE, it's that they are NOT BETTER ENOUGH.

Zach

I don't know where you're getting the idea that Cordelia only blames the Chosen.

Cordelia believes in institutions above individuals, whether that individual is a non-Named Prince or a Chosen. And she's not wrong about this.

It really confuses me that this decision isn't more simple for Catherine (or at least that Catherine doesn't lean towards Cordelia). One of the big goals of the Liesse Accords (albeit one she was forced to compromise on) is having Named in places of high leadership. Hanno would essentially just be a very powerful Named leader (arguably more powerful than any Named leaders in the past). He might be a really good one – Cordelia herself acknowledges this. But it's not a good precedent and is one that is very likely to cause a return to the ways of the past. Cordelia, on the other hand, wants to create institutions that don't rely on a single charismatic individual.

And Cordelia has no opposition to the Liesse Accords, even being willing to sign onto it and facilitate the creation of Cardinal. Hanno, on the other hand, is fundamentally incompatible with the Accords. He has no real commitment to them and will only uphold them to the extent that doing so never conflicts with his own personal moral convictions.

Abrakadabra

Exactly. Even in reality, people undersell the institutions and overstate the role of individual leaders. Case in point: all the Potus in the states generally does not matter. Whether they are knowledgeable or ignorant buffons makes little difference, they cannot reform the failing institutions.

Reader in the Night

>"If you cannot forgive, forget; if you cannot forget, forgive."

– King Jehan the Wise of Callow<

You call yourself King of Callow?! You should have your Callowan license revoked, is what. Callowans don't forget, and they definitely don't forgive.

Also, why did Cat have to hear about an assembly of Heroes through Indrani, was the Princess not invited? Vivienne is one of Above's, is she not?

And on the matter of Cordelia, I do get that Author-san is trying to have her and Hanno be foils to each other, but... She's just not that convincing for the role of Warden, compared to Hanno.

She's trying to politic her way into the role and cheating by using the Augur to substitute actually knowing her business.

Katreus

Eh? I find Cordelia more intriguing as a Warden. Her points are correct – Hanno may be exceptional as a good person and decent small group leader and warlord in military settings, but he's not a good manager or representative to others on behalf of heroes. Hanno's ethos seems contradictory to what a Warden has to be. He abdicated his duty as Truce representative previously, leaving Cat to do all the management, and he basically just shows up to unilaterally pout and veto things when Cat inevitably makes a decision that he doesn't like. He does the same thing here when he runs off on his own to unilaterally negotiate with the dwarves rather than work with the Alliance representatives on this issue. I still find it a farce that his long personal journey from him not judging is to arrive at the conclusion his judgment is he doesn't judge heroes.

caoimhinh

Not really.

Cordelia is a hypocrite in her statements and actions; while she claims to be protecting society she is just defending noble privilege.

Hanno being exceptional is exactly the point, Cordelia sees it as something wrong, but that's the whole point of getting a Name and being qualified for a position. Cordelia speaks as if she is not gonna make the Name of Warden of the West be in a person but a system, when by its very nature the only one to get the Name will be an exceptional person who earns it in some way.

Plus, Hanno is exactly the adequate person to lead and represent Heroes. Above's Chosen cannot be reined in and forced to behave by force of arms like Villains. The Role of the Warden of the West is different than the one of Warden of the East because they must deal with different issues. They are both to restrain the worst impulses of their respective side, but the methods MUST be different because those impulses are different too.

Villains can be brought to heel by schemes and force, they can be beaten and made to behave; but Heroes need to be swayed by morals, virtue, or a cause, if you try to force them they will just dig in their heels and die making a stand for what they believe.

Hence Hanno's approach of being a guide and counselor for them. Which is a similar take as Tariq took, and it's what worked on Heroes and made the Pilgrim be the leader figure along with the White Knight.

Abrakadabra

Eh, to me Hanno is still Othar Triggvassen (gentleman arventurer).

caoimhinh

Could you elaborate, please?

Reader in the Night

Like, Hasenbach was just trying to bribe Cat into giving her the ultimate authority. Which by itself isn't Evil, but by contrast if you have Hanno being his usual earnest self and not compromising anything to care about to get his way.

Cordelia: Hanno doesn't respect democracy

Hanno: Is assembling a gathering of Heroes to put an important matter to a vote. Cat's inner narration even says he would have welcomed Hasenbach and let her participate Hasenbach: Just spent the last day wheeling and dealing and using her personal charisma to convince the Highest Assembly to give her a Principality.

Linnus42

Yeah its weird. I mean if Frederic is getting invited and he regularly goes behind Hanno's back. I am not sure why Viv would not. I mean Hanno doesn't expect Cordelia and Cat to miss all these Heroes traveling anyway.

But yeah its funny Cordelia talks about the importance of power not being in the hands of the few and following all the Laws like she believes in Democracy. When the Red Axe mess was caused by Cordelia refusing to follow the Law she agreed to personally because it was inconvenient. When Cordelia has assassinated political rivals. When Cordelia is concentrating more power into the hands of less Nobles and is a Noble herself so didn't earn her place like Hanno. Does everything behind closed doors while Hanno calls assemblies and invites even Heroes who don't support him to get their moment to talk.

Cordelia really is the typical elite who wants one set of rules for her people and different rules for the peasants. She is a hypocrite of the worst kind.

Abrakadabra

It was not Just inconvenient. The Red axe case. It was keeping the fucking principate working. It is political reality, about which the big damn heroes either a) clueless, b) doesnt give a shit c) actually stirring the shit.

Liliet

Cordelia was literally the first claimant, and Hanno would have backed her back then, too.

Linnus42

Yeah and Cordelia showed then in my book she is not worthy. She put her personal desires above the lives of every living being on the continent. Why because she personally thinks a Name should not run Procer. Not because she believed the Name couldn't do the job or she was afraid of Bard intervention. She expects others to sacrifice their cores principals to save Procer. But refuses to do the same when the moment calls.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I don't think it's entirely fair to characterize Cordelia's refusal of the Name as putting herself ahead of others. She took a moral stance on an issue of extraordinary importance: that random weirdos who have authority for no other reason than that they're so intensely weird shouldn't run roughshod over everyone else. Your dislike of her philosophy doesn't invalidate it, and the fact that she's hypocritical in various ways doesn't make every decision of hers you dislike an example of hypocrisy. Who isn't a hypocrite? If absolute internal consistency is required to be able to say that you stand for something, then no one has stood for anything in history.

Also, where has she been demanding others bend their principles, other than her efforts to check the more stupid among Proceran nobility and when she asked Hanno to do his job as an officer of the Grand Alliance and it turned out that doing the job he agreed to was in itself against his principles? I'm not saying that it hasn't happened, but all I can recall that might fit the bill is doing normal feudal political stuff like having her enemies killed before they can destroy her life and trying to make Procer less bureaucratic on a temporary basis so that ultimately vacuous pencil-pusher issues don't hand victory to Keter.

Speaking of Hanno earlier: he's equally hypocritical, being unwilling-bordering-on-incapable of considering viewpoints that spring from different priorities than his own. They're both flawed in what I think are quite interesting ways, though in the end you're certainly entitled to your dislike of her.

jamesc9

> authority for no other reason than that they're so intensely weird

Yes, I think that's a good characterisation of how a person gets a Name.

ninegardens

I mean... its also worth remembering that when she did that, the war against DK was in low gear. Like, Cat had bought them all a 3 month a truce, All of Cordelia's new allies were about to show up, the angel gun was going well. Even we the audience didn't really get what an utter terror DK really was.

THEN we had 2 gruelling years of war, and THEN Nessie got completely let off the chain.

Cordelia didn't compromise her principles, because back then, success did not look so utterly unattainable. MANY of the characters were sticking more to their principles back then (Hanno included).

They've since been forced to adapt... and do not that Cordelia has since found ways to take the Warden roll while maintaining her principles (namely, by abdicating).

Abrakadabra

Nah. You are Just biased. End of story.

Lord Haart

Viv is a ruler of the East though so would not necessarily have the right to vote on a matter of the West.

nick012000

>One must still lose, though, and so that damn coin was spinning.

Unless neither of them loses, and they wind up sharing the post because each of them is half of what Cat is.

boballab

People keep making a fundamental mistake when it comes to a coin flipping (or spinning in this case) ... there is 3 sides not 2. When you flip a coin and let it land it can go heads, tails or stop and land on its edge. Cat needs the coin to land on its edge.

Abrakadabra

Good catch, I did not think of that.

ninegardens

Cordelia raises great points, very Lawful Good.

Cat: Why did you not tell her this is a Bard plot? Why did you not tell her why you were being really fucking careful, every single step of the way? Why did you not tell her that anything you do will sink into the roll of Warden of the East, and hence... you couldn't do what you wanted, what you thought is right, you had to be very very careful?

Cordy AND Hanno both deserve to know that the situation has likely been manipulated by the Bard, and thus they both need to be gentle with one another. Assume that their own intel has been tainted, even if only slightly, in order to produce this conflict.

That is information Cat needs to deliver, and I'm surprised she didn't do so just now.

Sinead

My honest suspicion is that it's because Cat's still bracing for the conversation with Hakram to come.

I suspect that her settling accounts with Hanno, and all other information will be at a pivotal moment. Because Named are all drama kids.

Linnus42

Looks like Cordelia doesn't really have any cards left to play and is all in on Cat bailing her out quite frankly. Unless she does something crazy.

Support from Frederic and Augur doesn't seem liable to carry much weight. Also I don't think its public knowledge what Cordelia did to poor Red Axe. I would hazard guess that is not liable to help her poll numbers. And I am glad Cat acknowledged that Cordelia is to Proceran.

I don't see how Cat backs Cordelia hard and fixes things with Hanno like Pilgrim and Archer want. Good to know though we are going to clean up the Hakram and Akua Stuff. Also shouldn't Viv have gotten an invite to the Heroic Meeting, she is officially a Princess now right?

Liliet

This isn't "bailing her out". Cordelia has made a play that Cat would 100% have backed without second thought if the Warden thing was not going on. She showcased, and used, her mastery of politics both internal and external – knowing how to get other people to go along with what she wants.

Linnus42

I prefer the Dwarf Issue being the decider where Cordelia could also show her Political Savvy. The victory in this contest for Warden should not be decided by Cat if the Roles are suppose to be Equal. Cordelia needing a massive amount of help from Cat to get over the line, narratively poisons the balance by setting the imbalance in the very narrative bedrock of the Names. Creating a dangerous precedent.

Earl of Purple

There's more Proceran heroes than the Auger and the Kingfisher Prince. There's also the Mirror Knight, Blade of Mercy, Bloody Sword, Rogue Sorcerer, one of the Bitter Blacksmiths, and those are just the ones in the forty or so heroes I know to be in the area. The Relentless Magistrate is also Proceran, last seen in Mercantis.

That's all the heroes I know to be from Procer, actually. The Silver Huntress might be, too, and the Blind Maker.

Earl of Purple

I forgot the Page, the Grizzled Fantassin (who is a fence-sitter, but had retired which villains don't do), the Merry Balladeer and the Swaggering Duellist as Proceran heroes. That's eleven potential Proceran heroes out of the forty heroes in Salia right now, though two of those might still be in Mercantis.

AbraKadabra

Poor Red axe? Poor.? Wow.

jamesc9

Well, in the common-law legal tradition, I think that being executed, then being resurrected and tried again for the same crime in the same jurisdiction, would count as double jeopardy. The most readily available encyclopaedia tells me that multiple trials in different jurisdiction, as is the case here, are not reliably prohibited.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Double_jeopardy

Lord Haart

Red Axe was literally doing what Cat did in the first chapter of PGTE.

I am at least somewhat sympathetic to the view that if the Truce and Terms allowed the worst Villains to not have to pay for their crimes, then maybe the Truce and Terms was rotten enough to need challenging.

One can justify a lot for the sake of survival but it's fair to say that at some point one has to then justify survival itself if it comes at such cost.

Reader in the Night

This is my third post so far (cursed lack of an edit function), but I just keep thinking about this:

Hanno is trying to get the title of Big Good by convincing the other Do-Gooders that he's the right man for the job;

Cordelia is trying to get the title of Big Good by bribing the Big Evil into recognizing her as an equal;

One of them just ends up looking more Heroic than the other, you know? Or is that just me?

Sinead

It's the magnification of what is at the heart of their differences.

And Cat uses both now, especially after Book 4. She may have the personal charisma to draw people to her like Hanno does, but she does know the value of systems and contingencies that Cordelia focuses on.

Hanno is the Big God Damn Hero of the BGDH Moment, but Cordelia tries to build proactive systems so that such moments are not as required. Cordelia is probably closer to a Good Monarch of Callow that had to deal with the reality of politics as well.

Abrakadabra

Good point. Cordelia in Callow would have been the best of their rulers. Especially since we know from Cats history lessons that there were quite a lot of inept Callowan rulers.

Juff

Typo Thread:

said. "I trust (extra space)
Nd then dragging > And then dragging day pass > days pass not method > no method same was yours > same as yours
The queen's judgement, (extra space) it when it > when it only person in my life I'd ever found it hard to understand (is this right?)

aurikdomi

it should be never especially with the words that come after and what we know of the relationship between them.

frederic

The more we see that the 2 claimant to Warden of the West title have complementary strength and that neither is good enough on his own, the more I believe the Name will either be split or go to another candidate....

mlissa

I vote Cordelia.

I like Hanno too but Cordelia's take on the Warden is better. Also Cat x Cordelia is hotter than Cat x Hanno.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I prefer the Catkua misery-ship but I like how you think.

Abrakadabra

Yep. Cordelia's warden involves a lot of work on her part, while Hannos let the heroes do what they want is Just... Lazy.

sengachi

I feel like, ultimately, what this choice is coming down to is if the Wardens are bickering but cooperative, or amicable but violently opposed.

Cordelia as the opposing Warden would never let Cat have peace. Every single decision would be discussed and litigated and used as a negotiation point. But, ultimately, they would have the same mutual goals of minimizing the negative impact of Named on Calernia.

Hanno, on the other hand, I think would mostly live and let live with Cat. He'd let her govern her sphere of influence as she wished, and he would guide his by example. For the most part they'd get along. But then on the big issues, where they disagreed, he would literally fight her over it, to the death if he thought it necessary.

What I think is going to resolve it though is Hakram. That's what Cat needs, and why she's floundering. She needs the help of her oldest ally. However it turns out, he's going to be needed to make it work.

Black Spiral Dancer

These are all great insights in the comments. I'm humbled, and it is rare. What a great following you have here, and may I say it only matches the absolutely stunning storytelling, something of the highest caliber in fantasy.

Joan Lung

It has to be both of them. Neither Hanno nor Cordelia alone can shape the Name into something that can last, even if they could bear to surrender it to the other.

That's what makes this such a Bard plot. Heads, she wins, Tails, you lose.

Chapter 37: Bygone

"The past is best yearned for with one eye closed."

– Free Cities saying

"I didn't leave Wolof meaning to become Warlord," Hakram said.

The pig on the spit between us crackled as the woodsmoke rose, sometimes veiling parts of his face. Light moved across his skin and steel in spots, the branches above swaying to let the sun pass at the whims of a lazy breeze. This felt, I thought, like a conversation best had at night. In a dimmer place, where the dark would smooth sharp edges and the stars would give only the kindest of lights. Not on a sunny afternoon, where I could read every slight expression. Where I risked learning things I would not be able to unlearn. But that was not what the roll of the dice had given me, and I knew I could not put this off even if part of me craved to.

In the back of my mind the coin was still spinning, and tonight Hanno of Arwad was making his move. It was sunlight or nothing, and nothing may cost more than just me.

"I didn't think you did," I replied. "I'm just not sure if that makes it better or worse."

That he'd planned it and not told me, that would have gouged deep. But in a way that all our years together would be tossed away on, what, a fucking whim? My fingers clenched down on the spit until the knuckles turned white and I reminded myself that I wasn't being fair. That I was just getting angry because it was easier that way. Anger was an old friend, and it was a lot more pleasant than feeling betrayed.

"I say it not to excuse but to make it clear that I was not deceiving you, before I left," Hakram evenly said. "That it was not false."

My hand twitched. I released the spit, stepping back and playing it off as if I were getting away from the smoke and heat.

"Just because you weren't lying doesn't mean it wasn't false," I harshly replied. "It just means you weren't admitting things to yourself. And maybe that I wasn't either."

He watched me through the smoke, then his jaw tightened.

"Say it out loud," Hakram gravelled. "It's already stuck in your fangs, don't choke on it."

How like him to not even leave me my grievances to chew on.

"You wouldn't have made this decision," I said, "before the Arsenal."

And there it was, the plain truth that I knew deep in my bones. I'd spent him too sorely that day, crossed a line, and it had changed things for good. Maybe he didn't regret it, like he'd insisted since, but we'd both had a good look at what it actually meant for us to be as we had been. That there were costs, that it might get him killed. We'd seen in practice how someone giving unconditionally, trusting without reservation, would end. At least when the other half of it was me. He'd die, one piece at a time, until I'd spent every last limb of him.

"You didn't listen then," Hakram harshly said, "and you're not listening now. It's about what put me in the chair. It's about how you treated me when I was in it."

"Like I didn't fucking want you to die?" I incredulously replied.

I'd have bitten back on that answer, before, been careful. Given ground because I was afraid to lose him. But he was good as lost anyway now, wasn't he? He couldn't just turn around and become the Adjutant again, call the whole Warlord thing a lark. So this time I didn't bite my tongue.

"You lost an arm and a leg," I said, "and you wanted me to just send you back into the melee like nothing happened. Like it was just... cosmetic."

I spat in the fire.

"But it really did happen, Hakram," I bit out. "And if I let you keep on pretending it hadn't you were going to lose your head instead of a limb."

"You lost trust in me," he growled. "An aspect was withering like a sick plant because I put my soul in your hands and then you dropped it. Can you imagine what it felt like, to bind so much of yourself to someone else and then feel them turn away?"

The orc scoffed.

"You can't," Hakram said, flashing fangs. "Because you don't do that, Catherine. When you're afraid it's going to end, you look away first so it ends on your terms. Like you did with Kilian."

My stomach clenched. It had just enough truth to it to sting. The kind of barb only someone who knew me would know to throw.

"I'm not without fault," I said. "Hells, I'm mostly faults. But you know what I did, Hakram?"

I gestured around us, at us.

"I fought for this," I said. "You were unhappy and I tried to understand why. To fix it. So I don't want to hear a sermon from the man whose idea of mending the gap was putting me to secret tests in the middle of the most brutal campaign of either our lives."

I'd not forgotten those evenings in Hainaut when I'd agonized over the bad plan to deal with the Clans he'd pushed for me to read. How many hours I'd wrestled over it, trying to find a saving grace, only to learn that it'd been a test the whole time. That he was finding out whether I'd take bad advice from him out of guilt. And I understood why he'd done that, I did.

It hadn't made it any less hard to be on the other side of.

"You didn't fight," I harshly said. "You stood back to see if I would. And maybe you needed to see that I really would, that it did more to help than anything I said."

I leaned forward, eye hard.

"But it also means I'm not going to take shit from you about turning away first, Hakram," I said. "I still had both eyes back then, and you wouldn't meet either."

I was panting, my muscles clenched tight. Smoke wafted up, the crackling fat of the roasting pig. The thick green skin of his face was taut around his lips, like he was fighting the urge to growl and shout.

"I didn't come here to fight," Hakram finally said.

"Maybe we ought anyway," I grunted.

Dark eyes mulled that over, with that usual careful thoroughness.

"Maybe we ought," he acknowledged.

I hid my surprise, but he knew me well enough he caught it anyway.

"Even when we reconciled," Hakram said, "it was half-done. The wound was bandaged but neither of us would speak of the sword."

I rolled my shoulder, easing the muscle that had begun to cramp.

"And what sword is that?" I asked.

I knew better than to think he meant the Severance, though it was the blade that'd cut him.

"You and me," he said. "The Woe. We let rot set in."

I almost flinched back. There were precious few havens left in my life, places where I could feel safe and at rest, but the Woe were one. That I might get that stripped away from me now felt like too ruinous of a cost for this sunny little afternoon.

"It's in your teeth," I said, echoing him from earlier. "Get it out before you choke."

His jaw clenched.

"I remember a night in Laure," Hakram said, "when Vivienne almost died. Where it took a knife through my wrist to wake her up from the terrified decisions she was about to make."

I'd never got the full story of what had happened in Laure from either of them. Hakram had called it an investment in the future, she'd called it a debt. What I knew was that when I'd returned from the Everdark they had been friends instead of foes and Hakram had lost a second hand.

"Part of it was my fault," the orc said. "Mistakes I made. But the source of it is that you don't take advice, Catherine"

I glared.

"Hell of a thing to say, coming from someone whose advice I took for years," I bit out.

"You take it on lesser matters," Hakram said. "Details. But when the crossroads come, it's always a decision you make alone. By the time we're all at the table talking, the choice is already made in your head. It's dress-up."

I tried to answer but he rode over my voice without hesitation.

"It was like that when we turned against the Tower after the Doom," he said. "When we headed for Keter. When you decided to go to the Everdark. When you decided to make peace with the Grand Alliance."

A pause.

"I'm sure it was the same when you decided to have Masego cut up the Intercessor to steal her power," Hakram said. "Another decision that affected millions. Maybe you heard some people out, Catherine, let them move around a few pieces on the mosaic, but you make these calls alone. There is no question of you being swayed."

My fingers tightened.

"Are we getting to a point?" I said.

"You made Vivienne your conscience," Hakram said, "then like your actual conscience you browbeat and ignored her. I put some of the fear in the woman I saw that night in Laure, but not the most. What did you think was going to happen when you gave her a role only to immediately make it worthless?"

"I did not think that," I hissed. "Because apparently I'm not perfect, Hakram, who fucking knew – except goddamn everybody!"

The more I spoke, the more furious I became.

"You drag up things that happened years ago and parade them up like they were acts of deliberate cruelty," I said. "Like I don't make mistakes. Of course I made fucking mistakes, and of all people you ought to know: you were standing to my right while I made most of them."

I smiled thinly.

"Where was this cutting insight then?" I asked. "I don't recall ever hearing it."

I let out a scoff, stepping away from a curl of smoke.

"And maybe I don't get swayed easy," I said. "I'm hard-headed, that's on me. But I don't recall ever forbidding anyone to try. Did I ever close the door on any of those decisions, forbid someone to argue against them?"

His face was calm, but I knew him. I could see the anger in the cast of it, in the careful way he moved – as if he were afraid that going too quickly would see him lose control of his temper.

"I don't stick a course when someone shows me I'm wrong," I challenged. "If I didn't get convinced, it's not because I'm some sort of fucking legendary mule: I simply didn't get convinced."

"Because we can't," Hakram said.

I glared at him, gesturing for him to get on with it.

