"Try a foot first," Komena drolly suggested.

"Oh, we think we're funny now do we?" I muttered. "Mark my words, that one's going into the holy book."

Godly advice, my ass, I thought. Still, wasn't like there was another choice was it? I breathed out and stepped through. The rippling sensation was replaced by howling winds as my feet stumbled over Arcadia's grounds. Blinded and deafened by what must have been half a hurricane, I called on the Night and let Andronike's steady hand guide my will: a bubble of stillness bloomed around us, sudden and absolute. Breathing out, I put my cloak in order and finally took a good look around me. This was Arcadia, I was certain of it. The... sensation was the same. Which made what I was looking at all the more worrisome.

"That is not the work of fae," Komena croaked.

"No," I murmured, "I don't think so either."

Before us spread out a wasteland to make the heart of Praes flinch. Choking black dust billowing in a great storms as streaks of lightning erupted wherever they wished, striking at the ground with thundering claps. The noise of it all was deafening, even inside the bubble of stillness. I could see fractures of glowing red snaking across the ground, and liquid fire bubbling out when currents unseen made the heat rise in great geysers. The sky above us was an endless shifting tapestry of darkened clouds, with malevolent pale lights lurking behind them. This had been Arcadia, I thought, before someone broke it beyond repair.

"No," Andronike said, disagreeing with my thought. "To the very point it can tolerate breaking, and not a step more."

In the distance I could see the great storms strengthening, until what looked like the eye of the madness: a great hidden shape, the dark winds whirling around it masking the true appearance of what lay there.

"This was done on purpose," I murmured. "And you felt it too, didn't you? How easy it was to open the gate here."

The Sisters did not speak the approval, though a hint of pressure against my thoughts served as acknowledgement. It was almost secondary, now, that I wouldn't be able to evacuate my armies through Arcadia – as if I'd not lose every damned soldier, trying to march them through here. I suspected now that if I tried to open a gate leading to anywhere I'd still end up here, as if all the paths now led to this place. In a sense, I thought, they probably were. Something, or someone, had damaged this chunk of Arcadia to pry it loose from the rest. And now, if I was not mistaken, this wretched place was slowly dropping down into Creation.

"We are seen," Komena suddenly hissed.

Behind me, the still-open gate shuddered. Well, shit. I wouldn't be using that one to leave anyway, but it looked like we'd drawn the attention of something I'd rather not be in the eyes of.

"What is it that's here," I urgently pressed. "Before going back we have-"

The gate broke. The inky power it was made of shattered, and the shards started slinking through the dusty ground – towards that hidden shape in the distance, I judged.

"Tell me," I hissed at Sve Noc. "Is it the Dead King, or-"

An eardrum-breaking shriek tore through this nightmare of a realm, then four grinding cacophonies in interweaving succession. Almost like rusty metal being pulled apart, but the truth of it was much worse: in that storm-cloud covered sky, burning red circles formed. Out of them winged creatures poured, swarms and swarms of them, weaving in and out of the horrid winds. Hellgates. Temporary and unstable, but hellgates nonetheless.

"- or Hierophant," I finished, shivering. "Fuck."

"We need to leave," Andronike said. "The gate, First Under the Night."

"There's something happening," I said. "Look, under the hellgates."

Some glittering array of runes formed in a circle, at twice the height of a man, though looking upon them cut at my eyes in an almost physical way. I thought I glimpsed something ghostly at the centre of the runes, but it was there for only a moment – and then the massive detonation that followed blew me off my feet, ripping right through the miracle. I landed in a sprawl of dust, cawing crows stumbling with me, and didn't ignore the Sisters twice. The gate ripped open in front of me, though to my horror something fought me for control of it. A will pitched against my own, though that was no person's. It felt more like one of the fae, though one of royal title at least. The goddesses slid their will along mine, and that bought us just long enough to drop through the bloody fairy gate. I dropped on the ground maybe three feet to the left of where I'd entered the other gate, covered in dust and lightly smoking.

"Well," I murmured, looking up at the setting sun. "That's going to be a problem."

It never rains, it spews fire and hell gates.

naturalnuke

When it rains, it burns.

Skaddix

Goddamn Masego went Further Beyond if that him and not the Dead King.

Dainpdf

Could always be Kairos. Though I am betting on Masego.

badluckcat

Definitely Masego.

Arcadia was broken 'to the very point it can tolerate breaking and not a step more'. Indicating someone with Masego's obsession with precision.

The giant flying shadow and hellgates indicating Liesse, which we know is in Masego's hands.

Many references to eyes and being seen which is Hierophants whole thing.

His current power level and the inhumanity of his will is likely due to witnessing his fathers momentarily usurping the mantle of a god. The miracle would have been a massive power boost but almost certainly caused alienation.

Dainpdf

Yeah, I'm betting on Masego, too. Though I wonder whether Kairos may have had a hand in facilitating this particular situation.

stevenneiman

I don't think so. Not because I don't think that Kairos would drop a match onto this particular fireworks shop, but because I don't think he ever had the opportunity. His game is being unpredictable, not predicting the unpredictable, and in order to have had a reasonable chance to mess with Masego he would have had to see the fate of Thassalina coming. After that, the only way he'd have to mess with Masego would be magic, and we saw what happened to Praesi mages who tried to use magic on him.

Dainpdf

Kairos is good enough with narrative manipulation he got stuff past the Bard, and he has access to decent mages he doesn't mind sacrificing.

P

Counterpoint. Kairos is the Joker. His plans aren't really plans so much as making sure just though dynamite ends up in a mine too make sure it collapses. If we were arguing about whether he wanted the city to fall AND take the next with it, I'd be all for blaming him. But this is a result of multiple prickly personalities fighting each other, with the event that caused either their prickliness or their running against each other being at least 2 steps down _any_ plan. This is the choir taking the threads left by Kairos and trying to work around what they think might be his final goal, out, at the very least, using his chaos to deal with other 'threats'.

Dainpdf

I don't understand.

But my point was just that Kairos might have had something to do with Masego's piece of Arcadia being here, now. Just that.

Mental Mouse

Even so, Kairos is simply not in that league of sorcery, and neither is anyone he's known to have access to. He doesn't have a chance to mess with Masego magically, and IIRC the two haven't interacted at all, which makes story-fu unlikely.

With the death of his fathers, Masego is almost certainly the most powerful human mage on the continent, and we've seen him slaughter people with diabolic magic just for trying to eavesdrop on him, much less trying to manipulate him. Also, he is, if not autistic, at least something similar – and a lot of the usual tactics for manipulating people will utterly fail against autistics. In particular, Kairos' chaotic demeanor will only annoy Masego.

And what's happening in Arcadia is certainly Masego – manipulating natural law is his specialty, and he just took possession of the most powerful portal generator in history. As an aside, I'd kind of like to see him throw some portals directly from the Hells to Heaven(s). Let the angels and demons fight directly, on their own territory!

As far as that fae-noble-like force challenging the exit gate, I suspect Cat may soon be getting a delegation from the Autumn and/or Spring courts, asking for help.

Dainsleif

Not to mention a will more fae than person, noble. Much like the Sun masego saw that made him Hierophant. It isn't even a fucking question at this point.

It's him, and it scares me.

AbraKadabra

Well his father was killed by the gods above, and he is PISSED.

Liliet

...I'm betting on Cordelia's thing, currently.

Gunslinger

I'm not sure whatever Cordelia is dredging out would spawn hell gates in Arcadia. That screams of Masego and the world fortress of Liesse

stevenneiman

This doesn't seem like the Dead King's aesthetic or the Tyrant's ability. The Dead King primarily focuses on undead and generally seems to prefer minimum effort to maximum effect, and messing with an entire plane doesn't really fit that, and it seems to me like straining it exactly to the breaking point and no further is too much restraint for the Tyrant, if he even could pull this off. That leaves either Masego, or a new power. A new power almost by definition means too little information to speculate well, but Masego would fit perfectly. He just gained an unspecified but large amount of power, and I could see him setting parameters in Arcadia to the most extreme levels that would allow for sustained observation to see how it reacts.

And he knows Cat would be upset if he did it in Creation.

Liliet

That... really does sound entirely & exactly like him.

I think my favorite version actually is two actors: Masego and Cordelia's thing.

Cicero

The Dead King definitely has significant experience with Hellgates.

It's probably Masgo, but I don't think we can rule out the Dead King. After all, he would be the type to make contingency plans, and Arcadia might be a plausible staging ground for him considering his interest in Cat, who to his knowledge is still a fae noble.

Mental Mouse

By the same token, he already has his own plane of Hell, and he already got slapped down by the Gods for trying to conquer more of the Hells. I suspect that attacking Arcadia would get similar retaliation, given that he didn't even take over the echo area around Keter.

Stormblessed

I'm pretty sure Marshal Grem is thinking "The Black Queen is so very much like Amadeus. It reminds me of when we were both younger."

caoimhinh

Yep, something like "I'm not gonna doubt her instincts, the last time I doubted Amadeus on this kind of matters we had to use a freaking Dragon to get out of that mess." Or something along those lines.

haihappen

The last time I did not trust his instincts, I lost an eye...

caoimhinh

LMAO. That actually seems like a legit possibility, hahahaha.

caoimhinh

I just remembered that it was Juniper's father, Oguz Sharphand, who took the eye from Grem. Still, hilarious comment.

Liliet

"Familiar, why is this so familiar... Familiar, like someone I used to know..."

imagesbe

Was that confirmation that it was Hierophant, or her just finishing her sentence? Because that sounded disturbingly like confirmation.

Jworks

Didn't Akua's Artifact in Liesse allow her to open hellgates anywhere? It sounds like Masego brought hell to Arcadia.

Sugar Roll

Another possibility is that is related to what Cordelia is digging up. The one that the Tyrant want to have a look at.

Dainpdf

Sounded like confirmation to me. Plus, this sort of working is right up his alley.

Mental Mouse

Both. "Could it be the Dead King? [four hellgates open at once] Nope, that's Masego."

Mental Mouse

Another point just occurred to me: Masego hasn't encountered Night yet, though he might have learned something of it from scrying. He may not have recognized that the new entry to his realm was in fact Cat.

stevenneiman

I don't think it was confirmation. Just her agreeing that it was a possibility. Still my working theory considering that stretching Arcadia just barely short of breaking sounds like a science experiment of the sort Masego would do. And that it involved hellgates, which Liesse was designed to produce.

Jeremy

So... either Heirophant, or whatever it is that Cordelia dredged up! Any other guesses?

IDKWhoitis

90% sure it's Masego, as opening that many hell gates without the artifact would take too much energy. And Cordelia wouldn't do hell gates, that would be heretical.

Tom

Yeah it looks like he's trying to pull one (or both?? not sure if the Warlock ends up in a hell after death) of his daddies out of the hells, judging by the shimmering thing that almost appeared.

From his perspective he's probably annoyed at Cat for portaling in and out while he's trying to work because the portals probably mess with the metaphysics of what he's trying to do. Metaphorically she's a cat (ha) clambering on his keyboard and staring at the cursor on the screen while he's programming.

Plus he was so thoughtful that he went to Arcadia to open the hellgates rather than opening them in Callow! Really he's come so far in his courtesies with people, but Cat's just as dense as ever...

Mental Mouse

I'm not sure I buy that he's trying to retrieve his fathers. Remember the emphasis on "he did not flinch"... he did care about them, but he also knows death happens, and he is Praesi. Revenge I could buy, but the question is, against who? Given the nature of his Name and his prior comments, my guess would be that he wants to strike back against the Gods Above. Maybe he can, maybe he can't; Cat recently learned the fallacy of "I'm the baddest thing I've met so far". Or maybe he's preparing for the next such confrontation.

Kissaten

But the incubus father is a devil, and devils never truly die (or something) and can be resummoned.

Mental Mouse

Remember that whole discussion about “is Cat really Cat anymore?” This is the flip side.

If Cat is still Cat, after having her entire body replaced with magical Winter-stuff, and then again replaced with flesh (the Winter having been eaten by Sve Noc), well the only thing left to be “Cat”, is her personality and memories (the “software”).

But that implies that Tikoloshe, stripped of its memories, personality, and (in its case) the constraining magic that shaped it, is perforce not Tikoloshe anymore.

IDKWhoitis

So Masego is shattering Arcadia?

Also, I think Grem is now another believer of Cat is the incarnation of what Black and Ranger’s daughter would be like.

SpeckofStardust

No I think the Fae broke this part of arcadia off to have all the gates made to arcadia (from the hells or the mortal realm) to ah defend themselves from whatever the heck is happening.

Mental Mouse

Interesting possibility, but I see a couple of counter-indications: (1) It felt “the same” from both inside and out, even to the crows. (2) Remember there’s some correspondence between Arcadia and Creation – and her last gate to this battlefield came from an Arcadian fortress, probably one of the Autumn/Spring courts.

Mental Mouse

Actually, never mind – I see it’s Cat’s theory that the piece of Arcadia is broken off.

Miles

Wait could she be? It would explain a lot.

Mental Mouse

Amadeus (when he was Black) explicitly said that she was not his lost heir.

Agent J

She's half Deoraithe, so not the Ranger's get. Since Black is still alive, it can be assumed he didn't cheat on the bloody fucking Ranger either, so she's not Black's biological kid.

RandomFan

Ranger could be in an open relationship with Black rather than a closed one- but it's highly unlikely that Black would take a partner who isn't both a named and someone he trusts implicitly. Captain wouldn't cheat on her husband, and if Malicia had a kid we'd all know. That leaves Scribe, but- I doubt that, too.

sengachi

Yeah Black's demisexual too, Ranger is the only person he's ever been emotionally close enough to to feel sexual attraction to. Except maybe Malicia, but she's not Deoraithe and that's not their dynamic besides.

Decius

Black already explicitly denied being Cat's biological father, in the most credible way possible.

Liliet

Cheating isn't the issue, Amadeus being on the ace spectrum is XD

Liliet

"Alright, Amadeus, you win, I like this one too"

superkeaton

I'm excited to seem Pilgrim back. Wonder who his partner is, I'm guessing not the White Knight.

konstantinvoncarstein

No, the White Knight is busy fighting the deads

caoimhinh

I think it would be Rozala, since her presence would be needed if negotiation between the armies is going to happen. I wonder where Pilgrim left Amadeus, or if Amadeus is still their prisoner (although it's unlikely he escaped so easily, but anything can happen).

Liliet

I'm betting Rozala, too.

Skart

I'm calling Amadeus instead.

SpeckofStardust

Well.

So hell (1 or many) is basically invading Arcadia due to either the dead king or Masego. Ripping tears in existence while looking for something. weakening the walls in all things, and the fae are being royally fucked with here. Well I think that getting the 7 crowns + 1 might be needed to stop something truly unpleasant from happening.

Javvies

I've missed the bantering. Good to see some of it again.

Yeah ... that's a problem. Cat is still an expert at understatement.

The longer that the plan appears to be going perfectly, you know that the bigger the problem is going to be.

Sugar Roll

I personally found it out of place. You'd expect levity out of Archer in these kinds of situations but not from Catherine. She doesn't do that in serious meetings unless she's doing it here on purpose.

byzantine279

Watch what else she is doing: She's observing Grem. That whole conversation was seeing how he would react to it, since she hasn't had a chance to get his measure.

Sugar Roll

It goes both ways I think. I feel like Grem is onto her antics and is perfectly aware of what she's doing. The orc is pretty sharp. He didn't lose patience and he was asking the right questions.

Decius

Grem knows exactly what Cat is doing, and is doing exactly the same thing back, so that they can get over the early unease and lack of complete instinctive trust as quickly as possible.

Liliet

God I love their dynamic. I want that taaaaaalk

Javvies

It's also a semi-public show of confidence in and comfort with Juniper and Viv.

Who Cat had just had a sort of dispute with after they did something that looked more than a little like a (bad) attempt at a coup.

Liliet

Oh that's a super good point ♥

Juniper losing her patience and banging the sword on the table is the best way to mend what's been shaken there ;u;

Liliet

Catherine is nervous and tense and Indrani is not there to crack jokes for her, so she does it herself. It did seem a little exaggerated, likely for Grem's benefit, yeah. But the basic logic is solid: when you can't do anything more useful, might as well joke.

reismon

Now I want Cat bursting through a wall, like: "Masego! What the fuck!?"

Aston

And when the Grey Pilgrim finds Cat isn't named and mortal...his tricks don't work so well...

KageLupus

The Pilgrim still has plenty of power versus Cat, whether or not she has a Name. We have already seen that he can use his Behold aspect on mortals which means he still has that intrinsic understanding of people and their feelings.

The only thing that changes with Cat not having a Name is that she maybe isn't as susceptible to Story shenanigans like the Rule of Three or Dying for Her Redemption. And even that I am not really sold on since she is running around with another capital title. How different First Under Night is compared to a standard Name is for the likes of Masego to figure out.

If nothing else, Pilgrim is a servant of Above and Cat is currently playing captain for a Below team. If he doesn't have a Narrative lever to use against Cat he still has a Choir of cheating angels at his back.

badluckcat

I don't think it matters if she doesn't have a name. She is still in the Role of the Black Queen and that carries a lot of narrative weight.

Liliet

That's not what Role means. If she were in that Role, truly, she'd have the Name. Tariq knows that.

Liliet

I think the issue is much more interesting: Tariq might no longer have a good reason to oppose Cat at all.

Mental Mouse

Well, she's still the servant of a Dark Power. Indeed, one could say that Night is a particularly dark power. It should be interesting to see how his Light powers fare against Cat and her Well of Night.

naturalnuke

Okay so, a piece of Arcadia broken off, a fae title, unstable hellgates.

Masego grew up on an isolated piece of Arcadia, dissected fae nobles before, and has stolen the 'broken' super weapon that makes hellgates.

Hierophant lost his moral compass with both Archer and Cat gone.

Mental Mouse

Hierophant didn't really have a moral compass. However, there were four the people in Creation who could tell him No and make it stick. Two of them are now dead (modulo demonic values of "dead"), while two were not present for his breakdown.

ChillyPepper

Makes you wonder if he is -partially at least- blaming cat for their deaths, perhaps even callow and its independence.

Skaddix

Callow seems like a stretch. Maybe he blames Viv she is running an intelligence org but that is similar to Malicia missing a large number of mages and clerics going missing. Now Cordelia and the Crusade though.

Liliet

Cordelia and the Crusade are a stretch too, that's not how Masego thinks. Malicia's the first on the list, if anyone, and himself #0 for failing to prevent it.

ChillyPepper

Considering that the action is taken against the armies of callow, unless it wasn't directed and instead was a side effect. It could be a "Woe on you and I" thing as well.

Cicero

Almost certainly a side effect.

Perhaps even an intended benign action. "I need to borrow Arcadia for a while, better put up some fences so Cat's toys don't wander in and get squashed. She'd be irritated at me."

Burdi

Maybe its the consequences for breaking the story Arcadia is dimension based on story about summer and winter they stuck in story since the beginning, thats their breath of life

And when the story broken, so their existence along with their home if its true, then cat needed to became one of the title once more to weave new story for them

caoimhinh

That epigraph had me laughed loudly for a minute. I really like those fragments of the future, seems like Cat really fulfilled her promise.

When I read the "Eyes, unfathomably large, gazing at me" part, I considered the possibility of it being the Gods Below, but they don't intervene in such a direct manner. So, the list of suspects would be: Dead King, Masego, the ghost of Wekesa, the mysterious corpse that First Prince ordered to drag out of that lake, or an entirely new and not previously introduced entity.

Since the last three are unlikely, I was originally inclined towards it being the Dead King, but considering the changes of the Observatory and the use of High Arcana while trying to get something from Hell makes me believe it was Hierophant's doing.

Also, I'd say his current attempt failed given the explosion. Is he trying to recover Tikoloshe? Is he so out of his mind that he didn't recognize Cat? Maybe he did but she didn't understand his subtle hints of breaking the gate and making the fragments slither to his direction?

The meeting with Pilgrim will be interesting undoubtedly, now another reason was added, since he might provide more information about this situation thanks to Angel's whispers.

Typos found:

- wise and and all-knowing / delete one 'and'

- condescended to by a bird / condescended by a bird
- this wretched placed / this wretched place

Mental Mouse

Quibble on Typos: "condescended to by X" is AFICT the correct form.

caoimhinh

Really? That sounds really weird.

Mental Mouse

English is weird.

nick012000

Was that whatever Warlock turned himself into? I guess it makes sense that there'd still be something of him left after his Ascension.

caoimhinh

That's also a possibility to consider.
He was opening gates to Hell while using High Arcana (which then I guess failed and thus the explosion) so my guess would be that he's trying to recover Tikoloshe.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure Warlock is with the Gods Below.

It occurs to me that in the entire epic, we have seen or heard about exactly one ghost-like spirit, that being Akua. And that spirit remained only because she had made prior arrangements to separate her soul from her body. (Which backfired when the soul was captured by her enemy.)

I think the Gods of this world are conscientious about collecting loose spirits.

Agent J

It would make sense. The whole debate about how to allow for growth without being usurped debate puts this in an interesting context. What is a ghost, but another immortal?

And, having been born mortal, would likely be as free to learn and grow as mortals do rather than the static immortals.

Can't have that.

Sanctus Obscurum

Lo, opened she the uncertain gate,
Way to safety sweet, or fell and damned doom.
And to the most sacred crows,
In whose feather'd forms Sve Noc sat
'Pon her shoulders draped in Woe,
Did the First Under the Night inquire
As to what wisdom, what thoughts
They could give on how might she find
The truth of that which lay beyond her gate.
And to her was given most sage advice:
"Try a foot first" spake the Night
In crow's feathers cloaked.

Several centuries later, Ethnographers from the Royal Callowan

One day the Black Queen went riding-0

Until she came to a Portal-0
Say hey-derry-down a-down-e-o

"Oh, what shall I do with this Portal-0"
With a hey-derry-down a-down-e-o
"That stands so dark and forbidding-0"
Say hey-derry-down a-down-e-o

With her came riding Sve Noc-0
With a hey-derry-down a-down-e-o
Full of Night and black as coal-0

Up spoke Young Night to the Black Queen-0
With a hey-derry-down a-down-e-o
"Stick a foot into the Portal-0"
Say hey-derry-down a-down-e-o

JJR

The fact that she keeps thinking of Black as her father is kind of worrying me. That he wasn't secretly her father was one of the first things they got out of the way. And the way it just started happening so suddenly a couple chapters ago. I think the Bard is to blame, somehow.

byzantine279

Nah, after her trip down memory lane with the goddesses she realized what he was to her, and isn't hiding that from herself anymore.

theothin

That he wasn't biologically her father was one of the first things they got out of the way.

It's not sudden, either. Both of them made references to it as early as Book 3, and Cat kept thinking of him that way throughout Book 4. It's just that it's ramped up in Book 5.

Liliet

Honestly the very first reference to him as a potential father figure for her (not biologically) was in Book 1 Chapter Fall, when she came out to the balcony to scream after Akua's fuckery and he joined her there. She specifically comments on how he DID NOT act like she imagined a father might, went on a whole paragraph long description of how it wasn't like that between them and would never be. You know, just randomly out of nowhere decided to deny this specific idea, as one does XD

This has been building up for a while. The dam broke is all it is.

Gunslinger

Personally I think EE keeps enjoying the since when has Cat been calling Black father questions and wants to see how long that will happen.

Liliet

In the last epilogue, someone late to the party asks in the comments: "Wait, since when has Catherine been calling him father?"

And everyone just shrugs.

My guess is that's really Masego, but i'm also guessing he is turning Arcadia into his own little "miracle machine" like he is magically terraforming the place to serve a purpose, he did after all, just recently witness an actual summoning of a god, so as Hierophant his inspiration should be at its highest :3

benthelynx

Well shit.

RandomFan

Here's hoping that Masego comes out of this entire mess intact and no more insane than he was in book four... I'm asking a lot, I know.

Денис Удалов

"The cloth covering the missing eye his epithet promised..." and then "There was a dangerous man, behind those red-brown eyes." As old joke says, "It is not that Grem doesn't have one eye – in the contrary, he does have one eye".

Not_a_robot

So. What was he fighting? Because it sure as hell wasn't Masego's will trying to take over that portal. Who or what else is present in that hellscape?

caoimhinh

Well, Cat said that force of will surpassed that of a human, and compared it to the will of Fae Royalty, but we already know that Masego's will is way beyond that of ordinary mortals, leaving aside the fact that High Arcana requires great power and fortitude of mind, Masego has faced Fae Royalty, multiple Demons at the same time (even hold a piece of Corruption inside him without any apparent trouble), and even made a piece of the Gods Above shut up. His Name of Hierophant makes him grow more powerful as he witnesses more things, and things of great power; he has just come back from witnessing the descent of a sliver of Divinity and the temporal Apotheosis of Wekesa, so it would make sense that Masego's will and power have taken a huge boost.

SMHF

So this whole debacle with the Gates and Scrying isn't part of some grand plan... just side effects of somebody trying to napalm Creation with a chunk of Arcadia... That does sound like something Hierophant try after losing both his parents. Though where he's gonna drop this dumpster fire is the real question!

nipi

Nah. Im guessing the dumpster fire is merely a sideeffect. He is probably trying to get his father back from Hell.

Hastien

I'm pretty certain Heirophant is out for blood, he's here for whatever Cordelia is pulling out of the lake. Between cheating it's way out of a binding and killing his fathers the entity at Thassalina represents pretty much everything he hates.

He's not interested in Procer and he certainly isn't helping the army of Callow.

My theory is that he realized permanently binding something like that would require more power than he could bring to bear. He was bringing a Name to a god fight. So he decided to take a leaf out of Cat's book and murder his way into a fae title. But between being able to take Liesse into Arcadia thanks to Creation being weakened by the three demons, having four demons stored in his pocket realm and such an intimate knowledge of the fae from spending so much time with Cat he was able to kill his way right to the top.

As a Fae King in his seat of power he would have oomph to dictate the terms of reality and get around the entity's I win hax. Now he just has bring his seat of power to a creational anchor for the entity to successfully bind it

It would the most awesome moment in the entire story! 😊 But it is not likely, and would make him an even bigger target than Neshamah.

Furthermore, the entity at Thalassinia was a God. As in "creator of the universe". And I doubt that what Cordelia will try to unleash is in the same league.

Mental Mouse

Also, his father may have taught him not to depend on aspects for casting, but even so, much of his power comes from his Name. If he goes Fae, he risks losing that. And for that matter, the Fae and Arcadia are just a separate creation from what the protagonists think of as "Creation". They were also created by the Gods (who would later be Above and Below), and there's no real reason to think they rival their creators.

Hastien

Cat remained Squire while a lesser titled Fae, interference isn't a given. And between the nature of his name and his possibly unrivaled experience, Heiropant should be able to get the most use out of the power with the fewest drawbacks.

I think it was stated that the Fae would be powerful enough to be dangerous to the Gods if they weren't so tightly bound to their stories. I believe it was Masego who said souls in Creation have the freedom to be a threat but the lack of power or lifespan to accumulate more.

We don't really have hard limits on the power level of the Fae. They've nearly always been fought in a weakened state from being in Creation, but we can assume their royalty is nearly unassailable in their strongholds. Ranger had to wait for the Summer Queen to be exhausted and far from home and she still only managed a superficial wound.

And you're probably right, in an even slugging match the Gods above would probably win out. But with the Hierophant's will shaping Arcadia into a cage meant to hold a God... It's not a zero percent chance of success.

Mental Mouse

Also, I note that EE skipped right past the "test", which Cat presumably passed.

Liliet

Since everyone involved is not an idiot and has met her before, the test was presumably specifically for her identity, and not any metaphysical properties she might have acquired or lost in the meanwhile.

Mental Mouse

Also, imagine what this scene looked like for Cat's people observing: She walks through the gate... then the gate shatters. When a new gate appears, Cat and the crows fall out of it, "covered in dust and lightly smoking". She won't have much trouble convincing people there's a problem!

The Drow holy book is now one of my favorite texts, second only to the collective wisdom of Dread Emperor Irritant. Let's not forget the hymn about Mighty Rumena being a jerk.

Chapter 1 of Book 5.

Cap'n Smurfy

Okay so this chapter is ominous and all, but can we talk about the fact that Catherine does get to write her Drow Religious text in the future: 'Parables of the Lost and Found', disputed Firstborn religious text. How much of it do you think is just insults and lies about Mighty Ruamena?

medailyfun

it will be written BY Mighty Rumena

And not a hint of a lie will be told about the Losara Queen. Only vicious truth.

Let me guess. Masego is in the process of returning his father from a hell. Probably still looking for the right one.

Like many i am also betting on whatever Cordelia is dredging out, even if it was not evil maybe is the pattern of some good dead power coming back wrong.

Sylwoos

So Masego is causing a mess in Arcadia and the fae royalty is trying to force Cat to address the situation by redirecting gate to him and trying to prevent her from leaving.

Liliet

I think that's my favorite version, currently.

"Hellgates. Temporary and unstable, but hellgates nonetheless."

For anyone else who's read the Merlin novels of The Chronicles of Amber, does this sound suspiciously like a Guideverse version of Ghostwheel?

Mental Mouse

Eh. I like the Amber saga, but I'm not seeing the similarities here.

Raved Thrad

Remember that Ghostwheel was like a Trump-generating machine, that could open gateways into multiple shadows at once to find things. In this case, the multiple temporary hellgates looks like someone's combing through the Hells looking for something or someone.

Mental Mouse

There's a very different scale of "multiple" here. For Ghostwheel, the virtual Trumps were innumerable, and iirc were actually the substrate supporting its mind as well as its mapping abilities. In this world, the amazing thing is being able to open more than one portal at once, and there's nothing virtual about them – they are full hellgates with creatures coming through them.

Walrus

Is it just me, or does anyone else want to see Cat straight up murder Grey Pilgrim during the talks? He did break hostage bond, so his life is forfeit, even under truce...

Typo: Hakram killed the Exiled Prince, not Nauk.

Nope. Hakram carried Cat's order to Nauk. Also mentioned at Nauk's funeral.

Hmm. Is that scene the only time we've seen Masego laugh?

Pokekid01

Ah, you're right. It was Nauk.

loved the return of the snark 😊 although cat missed a chance to say something nice to her generals, that I think would be more consistent w/ her current self (i.e. i have 2 of calernia's finest, go handle that sh*t). Overall, fun as always.

Chapter 26: Civility

"No plan is beyond dreading the sound of a match being struck."
– Dread Emperor Reprobate the First

"You could change," Hakram gently suggested, "into something that's not still smoking."

I patted at my cloak absent-mindedly, irritated that even after three rounds of that there still seemed to be smoke wafting up somehow. My face was caked in dust and soot, so Adjutant was being fairly light-handed by just talking about clothes, but to the Hells with it. Who was I trying to impress on the other side, by not arriving dressed like a grimy goblin and smelling of dark sorceries? That lot had already declared me Arch-heretic of the East, the only way to go was up. A sharp whistle had Zombie trotting to my side instead a spoken answer and Hakram sighed.

"I take it you won't be washing either," the orc said.

"Got it in one," I cheerfully replied. "Now, we're just waiting on-"

Leaning against my staff, I pushed myself atop my docilely waiting mount. I settled comfortably onto the saddle, the length of ebony in my hand spinning gracefully the once before I brought it to rest against her neck.

"- a message," I finished. "After that we'll be going to have a nice polite chat with people who may or may not want to murder us."

"Is Vivienne coming along?" he asked.

I shook my head.

"Not for this, considering what it might come to," I said. "And even with you I'm hesitating."

I glanced at his latest mislaid limb.

"You still any good in a fight, Adjutant?" I asked, tone serious.

He'd known me long enough not to be offended by a question most orcs would have drawn steel over, knowing it was genuine.

"I only need one hand for an axe," Hakram simply replied.

I nodded in acknowledgement, and neither of us saw any need to belabour the subject any further. In the same way that he'd trusted I asked my question without derision, I would trust him not to be letting pride do the talking when he'd answered it. Dusk was mere moments away, but even in that spreading gloom the winged silhouettes of the Sisters were blots of deeper darkness. It would have been convenient to use them as messengers, but I'd not even bothered to ask – Komena might be somewhat amused by the insolence of it, but Andronike certainly would not. I got cawed at quite enough already without trying to use goddesses as carrier pigeons. The word I'd been waiting on came back on foot, in the shape of Lord Ivah. It knelt before my horse, head rising only at my silent inquisitive glance.

"It was arranged, Losara Queen," the drow said. "The order was received."

"Good," I said. "On your feet, Ivah, and back to the sigil. We might have a long night ahead of us."

"One can only hope, First Under the Night," the Lord of Silent Steps smiled.

It heeded the dismissal without tarrying any further, leaving no footstep and making no sound as it vanished into the depths of the camp. Adjutant had visibly been busying himself tying two bundles to the sides of my mount, but it would have been a mistake to believe that meant he'd not been closely paying attention to everything taking place by him.

"Drow are hard to read," Hakram said. "But this one seems bound more tightly to you than the others."

"It was first among my Peerage, in trust if not necessarily in might," I said. "The distinction remains even past the death of the titles they bore."

"Loyal?" the orc asked me, head cocking to the side.

"To me?" I smiled. "More than some of its fellows are comfortable with, I think. But their true loyalty goes to something I merely stand for. Best not to forget that, when making demands of them."

"And what demands will be made of them tonight?" he asked.

I hummed.

"The order I sent was a contingency," I said. "Best you don't know of it for deniability's sake. But if the Saint of Swords is there, Adjutant, I'll be making a play."

"For?"

"The thing they have that I most want," I said.

I could see in the tightening of his brow that Hakram was forcing himself not to ask more questions even as we made out of the camp. He wouldn't be pressing more over the scheme hanging in wait, so odds were he was simply still curious about the drow. It had a fond smile quirking my lips, though I hid it away. Akua had taken to the culture of the Firstborn only insofar as it involved the levers of power and other exploitable angles, Indrani had learned what pertained to her own interests and little else. Hakram, though, was fascinated by drow culture in a manner that went well beyond the immediately useful or relevant aspects of it. It was odd seeing them through that fresh set of eyes, having them taken in as strange and exotic when they were neither to me. I'd indulge him for an hour or two later, though if he intended to make a treatise on the subject I was definitely letting him pick at Ivah's brains instead. I'd refused the legionary escort Juniper had offered when I'd told her I would be headed for talks with the Pilgrim and his latest round of minions, along with Vivienne's suggestion of an honour guard of knights. They both had their instructions in case this ended with someone killing me, which I considered to be unlikely but would be arrogant to be presume impossible.

It was not a long walk, to where our enemies were waiting for us, and it was opens ground every step of the way.

The pavilion was held up by two poles, thick canvas painted green and gold descending from there in a roughly rectangular shape. The entrance, flanked as it was by truce banners, had been tied open just enough to reveal four silhouettes within without letting out the heat from inside. All of them seated at a table, with raised braziers providing warmth in the waning light of day. Hakram and I did not hurry, allowing the shadows to lengthen with our approach. Crusted with dust and ash, I must have looked to have been tarred to better match the dark: the sight of me, at least, brought a sliver of almost indulgent amusement from the goddesses still circling above. Sve Noc descended on dark wings twofold in the exact moment day turned to night, and they claimed my shoulders as perch without a word. We were close enough to the pavilion I could make out the faces of most within. Rozala Malanza, face drawn and tired after the day's battle but no less grimly cast for it. The Grey Pilgrim himself was no surprise, for he would have been drawn to a day like this sure as flies to fresh corpses.

The sight that had my pulse quickening, however, was the Saint of Swords: Laurence de Montfort's crooked frame and wrinkled face were unmistakeable. Well, it seemed I was going to be playing with fire after all. The fourth and last was a man looking to be in his early forties I knew not, though I could hazard a guess. He was built like an orc, tall and broad and thickly muscled. Add to that the deep tan and the good chance he was the commander of the Levantine part of the army, and odds were this was the Lord of Alava. One of the Champion's Blood, as they were called, though it was my understanding that the heroine who'd killed Captain was not kin to the actual blood descendants of that ancient hero. The two mortal rulers were fresh additions, not in attendance when I'd gotten my first report of this tent being raised. The Pilgrim must have sent for them before I even departed the camp with Adjutant. The hero was laying it on thick, I decided with a frown. That particular point had already been made when he first had the pavilion put up. This reeked of overcompensation to me, and that was not something I'd usually associate with an old hand like Tariq. Regardless, I had no intention of being pulled into his rhythm.

"Here," I suddenly said.

Zombie stride came to a sudden stop maybe forty feet away from the pavilion, and I stroked her mane affectionately even as Hakram followed suit. With a hard shove I planted my staff in the snow, and Adjutant mirrored the gesture with the truce banner he'd been marching under. Without a word it was made clear to the other side I would not be humouring them with a single step further. Komena cawed approvingly from my shoulder, never one to pass the occasion to stick it to someone even through ceremony. It was almost amusing watching the ripple of dismay that passed through the enemy when they realized that they'd have to leave their nice warm tent to come speak with the Black Queen. A small gesture, perhaps, but so had been their own intention in making me crawl to their table and domain before speaking to them. I intended to make it clear from the beginning, which side it was between us that came closest to being considered the supplicant. They filed out one by one, and I had to suppress a grin when I saw the Saint had gotten stuck with the duty of carrying out a brazier. Seeing the woman who might just be the most dangerous killer in the service Heavens being used for manual labour warmed the petty cockles of my heart. The Grey Pilgrim took the lead, those simples grey robes that should prove no match for the cold all he'd bothered to wear. Malanza and the Levantine let him stand in front, an implicit endorsement of his primacy, while the Saint put down the brazier near them with ill-grace.

"Queen Catherine," the Pilgrim said, "we-"

The touch was light as a feather, for the first fraction of a moment. People often said they could feel a weight to the gaze of others, when it was on them, a sort of sense for the attention – and this was the same, in a way. The crow-goddesses on my shoulders stirred, and the touch was torn through by their will like a hand through cobwebs. It came back, a little stronger, and from a myriad angles. Komena's wings spread in irritation: the night shivered around us, and only then did the attention withdraw.

"Tariq," I interrupted in Chantant, tone harsh. "If you don't tell your owners to keep their grubby little fingers to themselves, I might just decide to take offence to their behaviour."

Like tossing a stone in a pond, I got to see the ripples from that. Princess Rozala was surprised, and a little confused. The Levantine looked... angry enough to draw steel, but hiding it much better than I would have guessed. Good ol' Laurence had a hand on her sword, ornery cutthroat that she was. It was for the best, I mused, that the scheme I had in mind required me to get under the skin of most these people.

"Pardon?" the Grey Pilgrim said, what looked like genuine surprise on his face.

Andronike cawed on my right shoulder, though the true meaning she simply wove into my mind as a thought.

"Mercy, huh," I said. "That'd be the Ophanim, if I remember my theology right."

I leaned forward, peering at the Grey Pilgrim and not.

"Are you listening through him, you meddlesome old things?" I asked. "Try that again and I swear I'll take a few feathers for my cloak."

Hakram, bless his soul, had always been quick to follow through on my plays.

"This could be taken as an assault under truce banner," the orc gravelled. "What exactly is your meaning in arranging this, Princess Malanza?"

The Princess of Aquitan's face betrayed irritation, before she mastered it and it became a pleasantly smiling mask.

"This is a misunderstanding, Lord Adjutant," she said.

"They're lying," the Saint of Swords said. "It wasn't an attack, only gazing."

Years of rubbing elbows with Praesi ensured the flash of satisfaction I felt never made it to my face. Laurence was always going to be the weak point, here: she was powerful, unused to having to measure her words and hated me to the bone. Like a lot of people who'd been the strongest in their surroundings for years on years, she'd not had to really answer to anyone for too long. That led to sloppy habits.

"So by your own admission the Choir of Mercy attempted to look into my mind," I coldly said.

Rozala's face tightened almost imperceptibly. She might not have a sense for stories, this once, but she could recognize a diplomatic blunder when she heard one.

"The Saint of Swords does not speak for us," the princess said. "As I said, Black Queen, this is a misunderstanding. Let us put it behind us and-"

Suddenly, Andronike began laughing in the back of my mind. A heartbeat later I heard Tariq flinch, and from the crow-goddesses I felt only vicious satisfaction.

"Gods, child, what have you done to yourself?" the Grey Pilgrim said. "Those things on your shoulder... those are no crows. How many times can you sell your soul?"

Had he tried to gaze at them using an aspect? I almost pitied him if he had. The foundations of apotheosis for these two had been millennia of hateful murder, and the mortar had been Winter freely given – look at one of those raw would have been painful, but the two? Still, I ignored him and kept my eyes on Malanza instead. She was the angle I needed to exploit right now. The Levantine, who'd still not been introduced, was watching this unfold with wary eyes but not apparent inclination to step in.

"Your delegation has now assaulted me, accused me of lying over said assault and is now trying to lecture me like a misbehaving child," I mildly said. "Explain to me, Rozala Malanza, why I should not simply leave."

"Perhaps a recess is in order," the Levantine said, speaking up for the first time. "An hour, setting terms through intermediaries to avoid this strife."

His tone was calm, and his Chantant only lightly accented. What he was suggesting had a decent chance of succeeding, which was why I couldn't allow it to happen. This needed to have a very specific shape to it, if I didn't want it to end with a sword running through my guts.

"There has been no evidence that your side is willing to negotiate in good faith," Hakram said, tone just as calm. "A recess would change nothing. It is an explanation that is required."

"I am Yannu Marave, Lord of Alava and first among the Champion's Blood," the Levantine said. "I give my word that no assault was meant, to the best of my knowledge."

Cool-headed, I thought. That was unfortunate. Why couldn't I have gotten your average brash Dominion swordarm in attendance instead? Hells, the boy in Sarcella had been from a legacy of mages and he'd been nowhere this even-keeled.

"Perhaps the two of you had diplomatic intentions," I conceded, adjusting the angle of the thrust. "If that's the case, we may proceed without their presence. It has certainly been nothing but a distraction so far."

The earlier anger returned to his eyes. There we go, I thought.

"The Peregrine will always have a voice in the councils of Levant," Lord Yannu replied, tone grown cool.

Now we were getting somewhere. He'd taken a position, I could take offence to it rightfully and walk away from this without having been 'the villain breaking negotiations on purpose', which was rarely a situation that ended well for said villain.

"Foundling, this is getting out of hand," Princess Rozala said, with forced calm. "As Lord Yannu suggested, a recess would be best."

"She's breaking this down on purpose," the Saint said, and spat to the side. "The Enemy always schemes, Malanza, you should have learned that by now."

And it was true, I thought, but by saying it she'd given me exactly what I needed.

"That's quite enough," I said, allowing anger to seep into my voice. "We're done here. If neither you nor the Pilgrim can keep your hound on a tighter leash, Malanza, we'll settle this on the field."

Now, there was the gambit. But I'd been fairly sure the moving parts would come together just right. With the Sisters disallowing whatever it was that allowed the Pilgrim to look into people, he should be on the backfoot. Experience, for once, would work against him: when you used a tool for several decades, suddenly losing it required an adjustment. Even the finest swordman in Creation would need time to adapt after being forced in his first fistfight in sixty years. Time which I'd been careful not to give the Pilgrim, so to speak. Now, Malanza had to answer for two heroes neither of which she had any real authority over, and she was not great diplomat in the first place. That I'd be able to work around her when the chaos set in was a given. The only unknown had been the Lord Yannu, but even though he'd given me trouble most of Levant came with a usable handle: the Grey Pilgrim himself. Even the implication he was to be dismissed had been enough to harden the Levantine's position. Now, I had passable reason to leave in a huff. And I'd repeatedly slighted the Saint this whole time, when odds were she'd be opposed to this kind of conference in the first place. I was leaving with the promise of waging a battle that would be dangerous for her side, in her eyes likely succeeding at whatever scheme I'd been intent on. So, after I took my reins in hand and began to tug at them to turn Zombie around, I prepared to find out whether my gambit was going to pay off.

A flicker of movement from Saint, and just like that I had them.

"Laurence," the Pilgrim yelled, "don't-"

I wouldn't be able to avoid that, I thought even as steps almost faster than I could follow had the Saint of Swords standing in front of Zombie and swinging her blade at my throat. But then I'd known I wouldn't be able to, and taken precautions well in advance. As the steel made it a bare inch from my throat, ruffling Komana's feathers lightly as it passed, Laurence de Montfort was decked in the face.

She went tumbling across the snow, spewing out blood and even a tooth, while Rumena the Tomb-Maker followed.

The Grey Pilgrim's hands blazed with light, but a heartbeat later I had my staff in hand and pointed at him.

"You make a move, Tariq, and I'll drop you," I said, tone perfectly calm.

He hesitated, even as the two mortals on his side reached for their blades in delayed reaction to this unholy mess, and that was quite enough for General Rumena to see my will done. The Saint of Swords landed on her feet, but the ground beneath her turned into boiling shadow and her leap up as she raised her sword once more had her land in the grasp of the old drow. Who closed its fingers around her throat, and squeezed lightly once. Her hand went down at the clear signal that the drow could have killed her but would refrain if she ceased moving. In a fair fight, I suspected the Saint would kill it after some trouble. In an ambush, as I'd arranged in a sense, it might be a little more even. But my weapon here wasn't Rumena's own might, so much as the fact that the Saint of Swords was a heroine who'd just attacked someone leaving peaceful negotiations held under truce banner. There wasn't a single fucking story that would get her out of this, so long as I was careful.

"I've had better fights from jawor," the Tomb-Maker scathingly assessed in Chantant. "This cattle is blind and easily provoked, Losara Queen. How has it survived so long in the Burning Lands?"

I couldn't prove that Rumena had worked on its mastery of Chantant purely to be able to slag its opponents verbally, but I had very deep suspicions.

"Catherine," the Grey Pilgrim said. "You cannot-"

"Your Majesty," I idly corrected. "I am going to ask you questions now, Pilgrim, and if you don't answer them quickly and truthfully then General Rumena will execute the attempted murderer of the Queen of Callow."

"Queen Catherine," Princess Rozala tried, but she wasn't part of this right now and so I simply ignored her.

"Do you have Amadeus of the Green Stretch as a prisoner?" I asked the Pilgrim.

"Yes," Tariq said.

"Where is he?" I asked.

"At camp, under restraints."

"Is he alive and unharmed?"

"Yes," Tariq said.

"Is he in his right mind?" I pressed.

"As far as I know," the Pilgrim said.

"Good," I smiled. "Fetch him, right now. I'll trade him for your murderous little friend."

The Grey Pilgrim remained silent for a long moment.

"Laurence is one of the few living heroes who might be capable of slaying the Dead King," he said. "More than that, of killing him permanently. You could be dooming the continent by killing her."

I met his eyes and smiled.

"General Rumena," I said. "Squeeze a little tighter."

"Merciful Gods, Foundling, this is madness," Princess Rozala yelled. "You can't extort us-"

"Your delegation just tried to murder me under truce banner, Malanza," I snapped. "You should be licking my boots in fucking gratitude that a prisoner is all I'm demanding to let it go."

"The Carrion Lord torched entire principalities," the Princess of Aquitan snapped back. "How many thousands of dead innocents are on his head? And you think you can just ask for him back?"

"Black's the only way Praes doesn't collapse and take a third of the continent down with it," I said through gritted teeth. "So take your damned objections and choke on them, Malanza, because he might be a monster but he's mine and he's still needed."

"Don't do it, Tariq," the Saint called out. "Let them have me and then slit the bastard's throat. No truce with the Enemy."

"Tighter still, Rumena," I coldly ordered. "Pilgrim, an answer. You won't wait me into a story that turns this around."

"If you kill her," Tariq said, "I'll kill him."

"You've kept him alive so far for a reason," I countered without missing a beat. "While I have no pressing reason to keep de Montfort breathing save for this trade. Try again."

"You are gambling with matters beyond your understanding," the Pilgrim said, sounding frustrated.

"If even a single one of you had taken any of the deals I offered we wouldn't be standing here tonight," I told him without a shred of sympathy. "Instead you get this and you get me. You were warned, Pilgrim. My terms were given, do we have a bargain?"

"He's killing her," Pilgrim said, eyes flicking to the Saint.

"Best hurry then," I harshly replied.

"I only have the body," the Grey Pilgrim said. "The soul was removed."

"By who?" I snarled.

He didn't answer, and that was answer enough. The fucking Saint of Swords.

"Where's the soul?" I asked.

"I do not know," the Pilgrim replied, then glanced at the Saint again. "If Laurence dies, Catherine, we have no accord."

"General Rumena, loosen your grip slightly," I reluctantly said. "And you must be hard of hearing, Pilgrim – it's Your Majesty. How can you now know where the soul is?"

"I entrusted it to the Rogue Sorcerer," Tariq said. "And sent him into hiding."

"Why?" I hissed.

"So that the Black Knight's body could be publicly slain while his soul remains usable as leverage," the Pilgrim said.

"Have the body delivered, then," I coldly said. "It'll serve for a start."

"And Laurence?" the Pilgrim pressed.

I glanced at her, at the naked hatred on her face. Before this she had despised me mostly in principle, I thought, but now? Now it was personal. She'd be after my neck from the moment she was let loose.

"You can have her back, once I have the body," I finally said.

My eyes turned to the princess and the lord, who looked deeply uncomfortable with what had taken place – as much with the Regicide's actions as the fact it looked like I was coming out on top, I thought.

"So," I said. "I suppose we have some time to kill before I get the body. Let's have us a peace conference, then."

A great start to a peace meeting. Some more diplomacy like this and we'll get those 7 and 1 crowns to give to Larat.

Sparsebeard

I kind of wonder if to Larat the "and one" is Catherine's own crown... After all, betrayal HAS been foreshadowed...

Javvies

Hmmm.

So there's no one actually in charge in the Alliance side. That bodes poorly for their chances in the long run.

So ... what the hell is the Rogue Sorcerer supposed to be doing? Hey, maybe he's trying to hide in Arcadia and Masego is looking for Amadeus.

And Cat still hasn't brought up Pilgrim breaking hostage bond.

IDKWhoitis

I think Hostage bonds got placed at the bottom of the pile of grievances, and technically Tariq was only an observer, so he may not have been obligated to stay.

Dainpdf

It's likely to come up, though he can dodge it by pointing out Black was Praesi and thus not included in the accord.

boballab

Actually it is Saint that is in charge on the Alliance side because she is the Bards second in command and the Bard has usurped the Crusade from Cordelia. That is something the Pilgrim might not know because the Saint sent him after Black before Saint told Cordelia they were taking over and letting Procer be destroyed. Go back to Fatalism III

"Oh, we'll bleed," the Saint mused. "We'll lose badly, at first. And then we'll claw our way back up, inch by inch. Evil always wins at the start, but it's us who owns the conclusion. And from the ruins something better will rise. This empire's already a corpse, but we'll send it off with a pyre glorious enough it'll redeem the old faults."

"I will have you arrested," the First Prince of Procer said. "I will have you killed, if that is what it takes."

"You just worry about getting the armies marching," Laurence de Montfort dismissed. "Odds are I won't survive the scrap, but that's all right. It's a good war to die in. It'll be the crusade that settles it, you see: too many old monsters came crawling out on both sides. Won't be the kind of losses a side can recover from."

"You are not listening to a word I say," Cordelia whispered, aghast.

The Saint of Swords rose to her feet jauntily. The First Prince's muscles clenched, though she managed to flinch when the Chosen approached her. The old woman clapped her shoulder.

"Keep your chin up, girl," she said. "Sacrifice is always ugly business, but we'll come through in the end. To rise from the ashes, there needs to be a fire first."

The non heroes definitely do not know of the coup that Saint pulled off at that meeting. Right now Saint is in command of all the Crusader forces everywhere, she tells Cordelia where she wants them and she has to follow through or lose everything.

Liliet

What?

boballab

Didn't think on the ramifications of that meeting did we? Remember earlier in Fatalism III the scene set in the Highest Assembly?

The Conclave wasn't squashed, instead she was instructed by Saint to just make sure the armies marched. Oh those abstentions have turned into knives. Go back to Congregation II where EE talks abouts the order to Malazana:

There is the order to get the armies marching from Cordelia just as Saint ordered against Callow and away from the Dead King and the Highest Assembly backs that order.

"I have been named to the supreme command of an army being assembled in Cantal," Rozala said. "By the shores of Lake Artoise. Forty thousand soldiers, perhaps more."

Louis's eyes brightened.

"Reinforcements?" he asked.

"Not to Cleves," she replied. "I've been ordered by Her Most Serene Highness to reinforce the Dominion's armies and break the foreign armies in Iserre."

"Praesi," the Prince of Creusens bit out angrily. "Callowans. That's not the war, Rozala."

"The League as well," the Princess of Aequitan reminded him.

"We should be making peace with all of them," Louis said.

"I don't disagree," Rozala admitted. "But the seals are there, Louis."

And who did Malanza find at the end of that journey? Not just the Pilgrim but Saint as well.

Dresden 67

Can you please stop block quoting?

None of that implies that the Saint is somehow in charge of the Grand Alliance.

That meeting with Cordelia was the Saint telling Cordelia that the Crusade will be fought to the bitter end, with no compromise with Callow, which she is ensuring by having Catherine declared Arch-Heretic.

It doesn't mean the Saint is suddenly in control of Procer, much less Ashur or Levant.

The Levantine armies are under the direct control of the Majii, they only take suggestions from Cordelia and orders from no Proceran.

We saw Cordelia's viewpoint in the Prologue of this book and the only mention she made of the Saint was to say that the heroes are no longer reliable. That's not the reaction of someone who's just faced a coup.

Liliet

boballab

Those quotes don't imply nothing, Saint tells her directly what she is going to do and she did it. Now show some text quotes to back up your assertion because I went back to that Prologue and it states very clearly that she knows she should not give the order to send her armies after the Legion and Callowan armies but she signed them because she was told by the Augur there is a path through that way. The Augur who's rise was due to the Bard. Cordelia does not rule anymore, she is openly threatened by Saint who laughed at her threats to arrest her and she has the Augur who she trusts completely but only tells her what will accomplish the Bards goals.

jonnnney

The block quotes only proved that Cordelia acquiesced to a single demand of the Saint. That does not mean that the Saint is in command of Procer. Hell she isn't even in command of her heroic band. She is a rabid dog not a leader. Suggesting otherwise only reveals that you haven't been paying attention to a single thing she has said or done.

Cicero

It doesn't prove anything like you claim. The Saint is not in charge after a coup.

Rather the Saint has arranged things so that Cordelia is cornered and has to go along with the Saint's plan... for now.

Cordelia is still in control over Procer, she just is limited in her actions.

Now that she realizes that the Saint is her enemy instead of an ally, Cordelia is right now plotting how to sabotage the Saint's plan, save Procer and so on.

The Saint is not in command of the army or the Crusade. The Levant forces will follow the Grey Pilgrim over her, and the forces of Procer will follow Malanza (who will likely lean towards the Grey Pilgrim's advice).

The Saint isn't even trying to seize control. She's just following along with the Bards plan and hopes to die in a blaze of glory.

Liliet

I still think calling it 'Bard's plan' is giving Laurence too little credit and forgetting Bard's ban on direct touch. She gave Saint ideas and advice, at most.

NerfContessa

Well, shit. Amaedous didn't manage to get his new name before being desouled.

OK, so, can night maybe pull the soul out of the Saint? Setting up a. Second exchange?

Damn, this is getting tense...

Stephen R. Marsh

I had hoped they could pull souls and names like they pull night.

That would have been neat.

Liliet

I really don't think Saint is in charge of anything. She bullied the priests into doing the stupid thing, threw the match into the powderbox, and that's all she can do. She think that's all she NEEDS to do, the rest will play out inevitably according to the story she sees coming.

boballab

Saint isn't a planner we all know that but she is working off the Bards script.

Liliet

Has Bard been known to give people detailed scripts, or is her game simply to nudge them in (usually self-destructive) directions?

Steve

Bard just nudges people. I've been reading under the assumption Saint is just a war hawk. She told the First Prince to get the armies moving because that was the First Prince's only (or best?) course of action after the crap storm Saint kicked up. Saint just wants a straight up fight with Evil, but she saw First Prince was leaning towards peace, so Saint was like, "naw, I'mma make it so your only option is war, so get the armies moving or you'll lose your seat of power."

Liliet

That's my reading as well.

Maginot

I thought Black had escaped with the help of the bard?

IDKWhoitis

He effectively got Name Jump-Started, as she re-awoke Black's grudge against what is necessary, and gave him a new purpose in life. Bard fucked up, as this completed his transition into someone who might deserve to live in Cat's world after she changes it (Per end of Book 3 Stabbing).

TeK

It just may be, he will become first Emperor of Praes without a name. It's either him or Aqua, so yeah

Liliet

Still think she very much did what she did on purpose, starting from Free Cities, and no fuckups were involved.

boballab

No she admitted that Kairos beat her in the Free Cities due to what he got with the Hierarch and his Name which was an old mistake.

"So I've heard," the Bard said. "Kairos has that thing villains often do, where they confuse symmetry with humour. Probably got a giggle out of waving an old mistake in my face."

"None of this was meant for you," he finally said.

"Oh, that touch was probably just a drop of arsenic in the wine," Aoede shrugged. "But I made your Name, sweetcakes. Back in the days before I knew better."

"Aoede of Nicae, I charge you with treason," he said, rising to his feet. "Collaboration with foreign oligarchs and agitation in the name of wretched tyrants."

"You can't be serious," the Bard said.

"Should you fail to be present at your trial," the Hierarch continued calmly, inexorably, "you will be tried and convicted in absentia. As per League law, you may petition the Basileus of Nicae to request amnesty on your behalf."

He looked down at the woman.

"It will be denied," he told her. "But to petition is your right."

Remember the Bard only flees on 3 conditions and one is imminent death and Hierarch charged her with treason after telling he he wouldn't play her and the Gods game. We have now seen that power in action and so that threat from Hierarch would have ended in her death so she was forced to flee and didn't get all of what she wanted there. Remember this also Both Cat and the Hierarch have been labeled "Not of her work".

Liliet

Oh she missed Hierarch, true, but Black she played like a fiddle.

And it was quite interesting what she said there.

IDKWhoitis

Until the end, it's going to be hard to tell. We also don't know if she would play the script straight until the end even if she knew it would result in her demise (so what would we call a mistake on purpose?)

Liliet

Wait, whose script do you think it is? My interpretation is that it's Bard's plan for Bard's purposes, which might or might not align with the Gods' but she proceeds regardless.

IDKWhoitis

I think Bard gets to peek at the God's Script, with a little bit of Artistic license as to how it is done. She doesn't get a whole lot of agency as far as where she goes, or what will happen, but she does get to read the patterns emerging around her. I think this is what she means in regards to peeking at the script, she can see what things the Gods are aligning around her, and all she needs to do, is give a little push.

She is given great power, so that the show can continue. This is why Hierarch hates her, the Dead King watches her, and the Heroes only treat her as an opportunistic friend, she doesn't really have an agenda, but a directive which can help or clash with either side.

Liliet

Far be it from me to take Kairos's speculation at too much of a face value, but his point was that Gods don't actually have levers for direct interference other than Bard. Narrative "scripts" can be nudged here and there at will, by any Named or even regular people on occasion, and it's them that Bard can look at. If there are indeed instructions/purposes of the Gods that she is obligated to follow (rather than just circumstances she's indirectly caught in and is free to do whatever within the bounds of, plus occasional errands), they're far from a 'script aligning around her'. She's the only one receiving those instructions.

haihappen

The Bard was there to egg Black on, so that he would escape with Purpose. The bard implied she was unable to stop Black escape, which Black knows is not true iirc. So Black saw through the Bard's words, cold and calculating as he is. He realized the Bard made a mistake: IT needed/wanted Black to escape. And so that is what he did not do.

Liliet

I don't think she said she couldn't interfere with his escape. She said she wouldn't be there if the heroes had been able to.

But yeah, apparently Black figured that after Bard's words, actually letting the heroes proceed with their stupid plan was the smallest fuckup he could make ;u;

boballab

I think there is something we are overlooking in this: That dead body they are searching for in that lake near by

Liliet

How so?

sengachi

I think Bard wanted him to escape precisely to avoid just this situation, a rescue arc on his behalf by Cat, because that could give Cata starting point to build up some narrative momentum.

Liliet

You're assuming she doesn't want Cat to succeed.

RanVor

Which is a pretty reasonable assumption based on what we've seen so far.

Liliet

Maybe, or maybe not. I'm still looking at that League of Free Cities revelation like HMMMMM

werafdsaew

After Bard told Amadeus that he has plot armor, he decided that he doesn't need to do anything dangerous since he will be rescued.

Liliet

What about 'shoving a stone into a hero's eye'? Nobody's one-eyed or Cat would have commented on it. Sounds like he gave up on doing anything at all.

Liliet

Also, his own survival is far from his first priority. He would have been making decisions based on global positioning, not danger to himself.

danh3107

After several chapters of not much happening that we were unaware of we're finally back on track. These are the kinds of chapters that got me addicted to the story.

crescentsickle

The entire work is what got me addicted to it, and it would be inherently less in my eyes if it did not have the chapters you dub as being "off-track".

It's called subjectivity, and I and many others would appreciate you not trying to pass it off as objectivity.

NZPIEFACE

Well, I guess their world needs more edgy anti-hero stories.

kinigget

What the world needs is more anti-villains

NZPIEFACE

That's our world, not theirs.

IDKWhoitis

Grey may not be able to read Cat using Angel hacks, but he sure as hell knows she can certainly smite his ass.

Also, I love how that terrifying monster that fought it out with 12 heroes and "won" only got more dangerous. Able to swat away the heavens with an idle thought. She really is turning into a monster to put into the ranks alongside the Dead King.

RanVor

Only it wasn't her. It were Sve Noc, and they won't always be with her.

Mental Mouse

Are you sure about that? The crows are a convenient form for two pieces of Sve Noc, but Cat herself is the priestess. Sure Cat might pull off yet another reincarnation (hey, kitty's got at least 5 lives left 😊), but not yet – this is the time of the First Priestess of Night.

RanVor

Yeah, I'm pretty sure. Cat may be the priestess, but she doesn't have that much power by herself. She has some Night, but not enough to effectively block a Choir without assistance.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but breaking the crow-constructs doesn't necessarily cut Cat off from Night – if anything, it would just make Sve Noc mad. And they've got a few thousand Drow standing behind Cat, including perhaps a dozen or so Mighty who can go toe-to-toe with Named.

It also occurs to me that Sve Noc did effectively resurrect Cat. They might well be able to retrieve Amadeus's soul.

RanVor

You're missing one important detail: Cat doesn't have access to all this Night all the time. She's only given access when Sve Noc judges it necessary. In all other situations she has to rely on the amount of Night she has in herself, which isn't that much. In fact, I strongly suspect that Rumena has more of it than her.

Death Knight

No.

Cat, as First Under the Night has more Night than any other living Drow. The Drow's culture is rooted in the Mighty standing above the weak and she is First Among those ranks so it follows that she would have more Night than it. But I would wager Rumena has more ways of using the Night than she does. This is moot however because Cat has the ability to rip out the Night out of any Drow without killing them (see the time she had to discipline that Mighty that got uppity when it didn't want day watch).

But you are right, she does not have enough Night to go against Komena or Andronike since they are her source and in her own words they gave her enough Night that they could literally kill her on a whim.

Mental Mouse

Adding to Death Knight's comments, notice how Cat has been stockpiling Night in her staff (which she said will also be a sword), not to mention the Well. I'm reasonably sure that even if the crows got broken, that would at least give her enough power to reestablish a connection to Sve Noc from her end.

RanVor

Assuming she doesn't spend it before.

Cpt. Obvious

The staff/sword is specifically designed to be used against the Saint of swords. In what capacity we do not yet know.

The Pool is interesting as I don't think we've been told what purpose it is to serve. Traditional use in fantasy settings would be as a power reservoir to be used for extraordinary events.

Well I'll have to backtrack a bit. We know at least one thing that the Pool is intended to do and that is to turn day into night for the drow. And it takes a lot of night to do so which is why Akua has been tapping mighty to fill it. But that's not to say it's its only use.

And Night is the game changer where Drow is concerned. While during the day they are no stronger than mortal men, and not nearly as dangerous as legionnaires as they lack the training and discipline. Come night however and their third stringers can take on squads, second stringers can take on armies and the mightiest are able to give the mightiest of heroes a good scuffle. So Night from day is a perfectly balanced power. Which of course means that it will not go as planned.

We know from the previous chapter that they will be with her long enough for her to write the first holy book of the Night.

IDKWhoitis

They won't be more than a shoulder length away often.

RanVor

Yeah, but that's not the point. This power is not Cat's, she only borrows it.

superkeaton

Cat, you're my favorite negotiator. But remember, the First Step always works, it's the followup that gets tricky.

IDKWhoitis

Wait, what if Cat attaches the Soul to another Body? Like technically, Black's Soul is where his Name and some of his mind resides, and he has proven that cheating, necromancy, and a bit of blasphemy is enough to get things working well enough. I'm mildly intrigued if we are going to get another pseudo-nefarious-revival for Black.

Liliet

She'd need a spare body for that.

Luckily, she has his old one!

Death Knight

Why not just bind Black to the cloak in the interim until they can get the body thing sorted out? This means she will always have Black as an advisor and this basically forces the legions of Grem to be loyal to her and she gains the use of Scribe and Assassin through him.

Plus we get more Black screen time. EVERYBODY WINS!

Daemion

This is all moot since she doesn't have his soul and technically the body isn't in her possession yet either.

Liliet

You're getting confused: they have the body but not the soul.

Mental Mouse

That would be... thoroughly villainous. But as noted elsewhere, it looks like she'll bet getting his body first. Then she needs to track down the Rogue Sorcerer. Given that Name, I suspect they might be hard to track down, especially since Masego is off doing his own thing.

IDKWhoitis

I have a running theory that Black's body will be destroyed or rendered an unsuitable vessel one way or another. Either through Saint, Pilgrim, or other heavenly shenanigans.

Liliet

I have a running theory that it won't. We'll see who's right
^^

Someguy

I thought Cat would exchange Black's body for Saint's Body & soul for soul after.

Dainpdf

Taking a hero's soul sounds like the sort of story that can be turned against her.

caoimhinh

She might still do that by the end of the "peaceful negotiations".

Something like "I never said you could have her soul too."

Although that could put her again in the villain stories and Cat wants to avoid that.

My guess would be that since Saint is so temperamental and proud, she might attempt to attack Catherine again after she is set free, and either be captured or killed. Then Cat can use her again to trade for Amadeus' soul (plus adding further humiliation to Saint). Even her dead body can be a hostage if kept under conservation wards because Pilgrim needs that to resurrect her with his Forgive Aspect.

boballab

Or since they stripped Blacks soul first that doesn't throw her taking Saints soul out into a villain story. Keep in mind that the "heroes" have been acting more and more like villains, stripping soul sounds very Praesi to me. Pilgrim committed and act of Genocide against the people of Procer, Saint has now tried to murder Cat under a truce flag for a second time. Those are Villain stories and that is why Cat threw into Pilgrims face that a story wouldn't save her this time, because the story favors Cat. This is the fourth time Cat has beaten Pilgrim in Diplomacy. First time undercover before the Battle of the Camps, Second and third time after the Battle of the Camps and now here. The problem Pilgrim has is that he is trying to play the old good vs evil story on Cat and it doesn't fit and she throws it back in their faces. They do the same things the "Villains" do but they are allowed because their Gods say so. That is why when Cat threw the insult of "You're Ranger with a shiny coat of paint and a socially acceptable pretext for killing" it got Saint so angry, because she knows it's true and Ranger while a Calamity is not truly a "Villain" in the struggle between the Gods. Another example of their willful blindness was in this chapter, Pilgrim is shocked and horrified how she is tied to a Goddess, but is completely baffled about how he is tied the same way to the Gods Above through the Choir of Mercy and how they are using him.

Hardric62

My guess is that the Saint of Bitches is very much doing all of that on purpose. She does want a massive carnage destroying Procer after all. Peace or truce of any sort kinda ruin that idea. Meaning this place will actually be the Princes' Gr

Hardric62

I hate my keyboard and the lack of editing function.

So the place will be very much the Prince's Graveyard because she won't tolerate any diplomatic outcome here, even if she has to slaughter the Princes to throw the army at Catherine herself.

And I'm left wondering about the 'when' of Blac's escape. For some reason, I'm fairly certain it should have happened a while ago.

And I guess the Grey Hypocrite is less terminally stupid than I thought if that gambit he mentioned is/was real. Although I'm pretty sure soul-stealing for hostage purpose is the sort of thing cementing that name for him in my mind.

boballab

Oh I can see Saint trying something again thinking she can take out Cat, but I don't see her killing the Princes. She wants the Armies to fight so that there is mass casualties. If she kills the Princes like that there it wouldn't work because she can't be with each army giving orders. Remember it is a secret coup that Bard and Saint pulled on Cordelia, they still need them at the moment to pass the orders along. That is why they had Cordelia order Malazana's army there. Already some of the secrets are popping out ie Black, but they are not at the stage where they come out into the open to run the show. No what could happen Saint tried a second time that night of killing Cat as she leaves, thinking now that the Tomb Maker is out of hiding she can get through. Of course Saint isn't the sharpest knife in the drawer and hasn't realized the implications of having the Avatars of Sve Noc a Goddess there. She probably hasn't figure out yet that Sve Noc is blocking a lot of what the Gods Above can do for them in that area and never think if they can hide one drow, maybe there is more hidden near by and gets planted by Ivah, kicking off the Cats backup plan where the Drow eliminate all the Army commanders throwing all the Armies into confusion and now facing the 70,000 combined might of Cats army...at night. It wouldn't take much to break those Armies and thus have low casualties and achieving almost all Cat's aims.

kgyl21

I seem to remember Heiress doing something of the sort as well.

fbt

lol, that would have been epic..too easy, tho i suppose, to make a good story. great thinking tho someguy! 😊 this was decent. A lot more action-y, but at least Cat performed compently, almost like the miniBlack she is. That part I liked a lot; smart protags are so rare, and here it's got a lot of additional freight via their relationship.

caoimhinh

This chapter was AWESOME. It was full of great moments.

I knew that I would love the "child, what have you done to yourself?" scene that was inevitably coming when Pilgrim laid eyes on Catherine, I was not disappointed.

One minute into negotiations and they say "We need a recess" LMAO that's quite a display of being in the inferior position. So, Cat got them, nicely done. Things will get messy to manage to get Black's soul back, it's likely going to be part of the negotiations of Callow and Ever Dark joining the Grand Alliance against the Dead King. Cat really has more leverage over them that they would like to admit.

Also, General Rumena Tomb-Maker is quite cool, as always.

"He might be a monster but he is mine" we all know what Cat meant was "but he is my father".

Really looking forward to next chapter.

I mean he can't actually look at her soul and see she's better off now, he just sees the crows. Becoming a priestess of Evil Gods is not an obvious Good move, even though it literally was that in context god fucking bless

Dainpdf

True.

morroian

Necroposting, and how is Cat 'selling her soul' to Sve Noc any different to him selling his to the choir of mercy.

Liliet

There are multiple points to address here.

First, he didn't actually sell his soul. Now neither did Cat, but he doesn't know that and what it looks like is what it usually looks like when someone HAS sold their soul.

Second, presuming the action he did towards the Choir of Mercy and Cat towards Sve Noc can be considered equivalent... that leaves us with "what is the difference between Sve Noc and the Choir of Mercy".

And like... one of them is goddess(es) of death, blood, murder and decay.

The other is not.

morroian

I put selling her soul in quotation marks for a reason. I agree neither he nor Cat sold their soul. As for the difference between Sve Noc and the Choir of Mercy, morally very little.

Liliet

He doesn't know Cat didn't.

And I mean yeah the Sisters were just doing their best to save their people, but again, HE DOESN'T KNOW THAT.

The Choir of Mercy normally functions as disaster relief. That is not what goddesses of murder do.

haihappen

If she had said: "He is like a father to me, I want him back!", THAT would have set off all the red flags and alarm horns in the Pilgrims mind:

The classical story of a young hero(ine) that will not rest or compromise to save her mentor/father/brother/lover, and make every sacrifice necessary to get him/her back. Powerful story stuff, and funnily enough, Cat would be in the Hero-role in that story.

Also, this chapter reminded me of "just because I'm winning doesn't mean I won't cheat"

Mental Mouse

Except Cat isn't in fact a Hero, so she can't make that story work for her and Pilgrim knows it. So Cat keeps her lips tightly sealed around any comment to the effect of "I want my father back".

Liliet

Cat rides heroic stories like horses, even when holding an actual villain Name (which right now she isn't). This does NOT beat mugging a Choir for a resurrection.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, she is a villain – she found out the hard way what happens when she tries to play like a hero (got a Squire aspect eaten by a devil). And likewise, Saint just found out that no matter how powerful a hero, acting like a villain gets you hammered.

Note that it's not a matter of doing good or evil (by our real-world definition) acts, rather it's a matter of which stories you try to play out. And attacking under a truce flag is simply not in a hero's playbook.

Mental Mouse

Sorry, Devil->demon. I keep forgetting that in this world devils are the weaker breeds.

Liliet

Your info is outdated. Catherine made a heroic play at First Llesse and literally got herself resurrected by a Choir against its will. She simply didn't properly weave the story at Marchford, and of course demons neutralize narrative advantage anyway.

Mental Mouse

That was her dawning aspect of Take. She had won both the martial and the story games against William, gaining massive narrative power. She also had a freshly regained Name, with all aspect slots open – and aspects show up at a dramatic crux, providing a in-world mechanism. And then she got into the position of “the victor, who shall now be rewarded”.

It’s been claimed that creatures from outside Creation can break plot snares, but yet it’s mostly Names that let mortals fight devils and demons effectively. I see no reason why the narrative power here couldn’t enable an aspect to affect an angel, especially when the result was to enforce the active storyline.

Liliet

No, ‘victors’ aren’t rewarded. Heroes are. That’s exactly what I’m talking about, Catherine won by making herself the hero of the story. She outplayed William, yes, in the game of making the story be at her side by being the hero of it.

One other notably discussed in canon occasion was Tariq and Laurence talking in Kaleidoscope and both admitting that the shape of Cat’s story – that she’s probably going to wake up and come to her allies’ aid at the last moment – is not a villain’s.

Liliet

And the reason the narrative power enabled an aspect to affect an angel was, yes, that the story demanded it. The story that said that Cat was a hero. QED

Cicero

Actually, Cat has never held a Villain name.

Instead she held the name of Squire, which isn’t exactly a neutral Name, but is a Name that can either be Heroic or Villainous. It’s what they call a Transitional Name.

Notably, none of the Woe held a Name that was exclusively the position of either the Gods Above or the Gods Below. All of their Name could go either way.

Liliet

Transitional Names can still be Heroic or Villainous, it's a separate distinction. And Squire can be Heroic or Villainous, but it was very specifically and definitely villainous in Cat's case, as evidenced by necromancy powers. She got powered by Below explicitly, because of being a Black Knight's apprentice. It's not inherent to the Name itself, but it's inherent to the Role she claimed within it.

Death Knight

She is no longer Named, hence she cannot be classified as either a Villain or a Hero in the strictest terms of the Roles. So, just like Black, she's a candidate for the Heroic Role. EE himself said that you don't need to be sworn to a Choir to become a Hero, you're ideals just need to align more or less with what Above laid down. So in theory, she can use the Hero story. This is why mortals can kill Named; they do not have the fetters that Named have. Why this isn't more prevalent is that on average Named are an order of magnitude more stronger than mortals but they are ever at the mercy of the Story. Mortals are not.

Liliet

Oooh, the Lord of the Silver Spears~

Insanenoodlyguy

She is, at least for the moment, not named (though she could well be turning First Priestess into a name as we speak). But she's dealing with named, and that means she's still in the story. If a mundane villian acts out tropes, the hero is still strengthened. Or, in this case, if a hero acts the villain, is still weakened. Cat still has to play this careful because even if she can't make a story where she is sure to lose, she can still walk into one where Grey Pilgrim is sure to win.

Liliet

Yup ^

Mental Mouse

Hmm... adding Liliet's reasoning to Pilgrim's history, the "fetters" on Named look mostly like golden handcuffs. Yes, they can be killed by the story, but not half as easily as un-Named mortals (aka mooks).

Liliet

Named are killed by the story based on their own actions. Non-Named are killed by the story based on other people's actions. Pick your poison 😊

luminiousblu

You don't actually need to be a Hero to make a Heroic story work for you (see the Heir to the Throne gambit in First Liesse). Villains describe roles but only on the grand scale. Attacking someone leaving negotiations with their backs turned is not really a Heroic action, it makes you the treacherous dunce of a mauve shirt who gets one-shot to show off how badass and loyal the Bodyguards of the King are. The reason the SoS got fucked is because she got stuck in one of the shortest-cycle villain stories ever, it's literally a two step story: A man tries to assassinate the King, he is executed by loyal bodyguards.

Cicero

What story have you been reading? Cat makes hero stories work for her all the time. She's essentially a Hero piece that Black stole from the Gods Above.

Liliet

TBF this WAS a point made in Marchford. Cat cannot rely on heroic tropes working for her without working for them first.

David Lynch

I'm pretty sure I recall meddling with souls as having been described as pretty high on the "most people think that's evil" scale in earlier books. This might not be helping Pilgrim's case with his non-Named allies...

Dainpdf

Levantines will accept it because Pilgrim. And a lot of Procerans will accept it because of what Black had been doing when he was caught.

Or at least that's what I think.

boballab

Oh most definitely they will accept it for those reasons but the Wastelanders of the Dread Empire of Praes practice soul removal also and they accept it for basically the same reasons and they are objectively on the Evil side. Doing an Evil act for good reasons is still doing Evil, matter of fact there is an old saying that goes something like this: Only the truly righteous can plum the deepest depths of Evil.

Saint fits that category so well, she is willing to let thousands upon thousands die and be turned into zombies just to cause the people to cry out to them to be saved from what they caused.

Dainpdf

Whether evil is in the means or the goals is debatable. Some might say that doing a soul removal to a villain is fine, or that it's fine in the case of preserving a life, or any number of things.

Skaddix

Yeah people love their false equivalencies...cutting out the soul of The Black Knight is not the same as cutting the Soul out of some random.

Besides Saint leans Anti-Hero.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, but that leaves her weak in this case.

An anti-hero works best against clever but traditional Evil. When you can say "being nice doesn't work here!" and this do bad things for good reasons. You can still have support that way. But the problem is, Cat isn't traditional Evil. She was legitimately acting in good faith when she wanted to treat for peace. If, for example, Cat did have some sort of "Kill all the good guys while they thing we are treating" plan, then nothing would have stopped that blade. Because then it's Saint forgoing honor for results, even if it hurts her own standing. That's anti-heroism. And that's the mindset Saint keeps doggedly trying for even though it just isn't working with this one. Possibly because she can't concieve of any evil that isn't really traditional evil no matter how it appears otherwise. But whatever her internal reasoning, the result is the same: when you do these sort of things to a more neutral character, or at least one acting in good faith, you aren't an anti hero anymore. You've slid down the scale to Anti-Villian at best. And Anti-Villians don't get the same win rates.

Mental Mouse

The question of "what, actually, is Evil?", is the basic theme of the Guide. The in-world given is that it's the team you play for (trope: Blue and Orange Morality) and all else (story, powers, behavior, allies) follows from that. But Amadeus noticed a weakness in the mechanics and attacked that weakness; Cat has taken up his fight against the system. It may well be that their efforts are bearing fruit as the heroes lose track of the rules in play.

Dainpdf

Black is very much Team Evil. He doesn't want the teams to go away, he just wants his team to really win for once.

And as the Pilgrim reinforced earlier, those rules? They're mostly something Praesi and Callowans had in mind. Being Good does not prevent one from being ruthless. (Trope: Good is Not Nice)

Liliet

To be more precise, Black does not consider the teams themselves to be inherently a problem, and is willing to stand under the banner that gives him what he wants.

What he wants being a victory for Praes and Praesi. He couldn't give less of a shit for non-Praesi Evil, and even the more Evil Praesi specimens he'd gladly set on fire given half a justification (c) Catherine. He doesn't mind the banner, but opposes the philosophy with his entire being.

Dainpdf

He's not opposed to destroying Praes to achieve the win, either, which is an odd little paradox – unless you're looking at it from his particular perspective.

Liliet

He's not opposed to destroying the institution/government of Praes, because his loyalty lies with its population, not with its ruling apparatus. It makes perfect sense to me. Amadeus is very literally a revolutionary. C'mon, look at the shape of his story – a farmer's son gathering oppressed minorities around him to fight and win a civil war against abusive nobility?

Dainpdf

Does it? He doesn't seem to mind much when he gets people killed.

In my view, Amadeus has a point he wishes to prove, and everything else – including Praes, its people and himself – is secondary and thus disposable.

Liliet

Doesn't he? Malicia's argument to him against slaughtering all High Lords immediately was that it would lead to too many casualties. "What a waste" is his constant refrain @ people dying, including when he's the one killing them, and the reason he considers the Callow-less Empire to be unsustainable is because starvation spreads across it during lean years. "We are so enamored with bleeding our own that we have sayings about it"

Did you notice him latching on to Catherine's "better world" phrasing and then in a conversation with Ranker pretty much saying that they were going for that all along?

Dainpdf

A waste. A waste of resources. Not a tragedy.

He may have changed after he got stabbed, perhaps, but he seemed to me still more enamored with the idea of breaking the status quo of evil than with championing any cause for the common man.

Liliet

Now I want to invite you to a conversation on reddit that I started about this, this post specifically:

Answer here or there if you're interested :3

Mental Mouse

And that's what I mean by him spotting a weakness in the mechanics of story. Depending on where you stand, a revolutionary can be "a terrorist who hates our freedoms", or "a freedom-fighter standing against the Real Evuls Over There". That ambiguity is what lets him play both sides of the script.

Cat is doing something similar with "they say she's an Evil Queen, but she's our Queen and she fights for us against demons, devils, and whatnot".

Interestingly, the orcs and goblins are backing both of them up with “just because we’re green doesn’t mean we’re mean”, to the point where even under Black’s rule (when he was Black), ordinary Callowan citizens would look to orcs for protection against the local guards.

It’s getting past “you can’t tell the players without a scorecard”, to “what use is this stupid scorecard?” 😊

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

RanVor

And that is how we get people ready to commit any atrocity for what they think is right (which is not necessarily the same as what is actually right).

Dainpdf

You speak as if the philosophy of ethics were a solved subject.

There are many moral outlooks out there. Not all are so categorical as to decide morality solely by looking at which acts were performed, regardless of context.

RanVor

Unfortunately, if you ask me.

Mental Mouse

... and the Praesi will accept it because they figure that’s what it takes to hold onto Amadeus. While Cat will accept... delivery immediately, if you please. <taps foot> 😊

Liliet

It’s definitely not helping his narrative case, that’s for sure. Sounds like he’s not as good with that as Cat is 😊

Dainpdf

That was some great baiting.

A pity the Pilgrim is bound to adapt before long, but starting the conference with playing the opponent, then a show of force? Pretty great.

Though I wonder how much this does for the chances of cooperation later on...

GuidingMoonlight

The Saint of swords who can cut fabric of reality in several km radius decided run up to Cat and cut her with a sharp stick like a normie.

The Saint of swords who are the oldest hero around and was shown to be aware of narrative gets baited into cliché.

Mkay.

The Grey killed his own cousin because it's necessary, but immediately folded when Cat threaten his bff.

Mkay.

Dainpdf

As Grey said, Saint is necessary to kill the Dead King. And he's off his game. And Cat has a story at her back.

Saint also doesn't know Cat is mortal again, and she has a story against her.

medailyfun

every experienced Named should be able to smell the Name and its absence

Dainpdf

She didn't have a Name as a Fae, either.

medailyfun

her Name leftovers powered by Winter looked close enough?

Dainpdf

The power of Winter was separate and distinct from the remains of the Name. It didn't have aspects or any other trappings of a Role.

Mental Mouse

And Cat has explicitly said (OK, not to Pilgrim) she isn't committed to killing the Dead King, she just wants him to go home. His argument has even less weight because even if "it has to die", Pilgrim could only say Saint was "one of the few" who could end him. But Masego, even Cat herself, are probably also among that number. (Cat has enough plot power to Come Up With Something. 😊) I tend to doubt Pilgrim himself is in that club.

And as Fayhem points out, Pilgrim probably doesn't know what-all Saint's been up to. I'm starting to wonder if angels of different Choirs can be convinced to attack each other.

Dainpdf

I was arguing that Pilgrim backed down because it matters to him. That that matters less to Cat only worsens his bargaining position.

I am not sure Evil can kill the Dead King, associated with the Hells as he is. We already know Evil can't truly destroy Demons.

Liliet

Erratic has confirmed that, particularly based on different cultural norms in his example, it's possible for heroes to come to blows with each other, though killing's still a no-no.

Gunslinger

Saint moved so fast, Cat didn't even have time to move her horse. That was a move which would have worked 100% had it not been for Cat planning for it. And Saint might be good at reading stories but she wanted to kill Cat from the start, and figured her superior ability would trump any story disadvantages.

Muffin

True that, even if the Saint is a machete rather than a scalpel, she has intuition and even has realized that cat doesn't play by the Evil handbook. But it might have been a way to screw up negotiations. She should have known that a single hit wouldn't kill Eldritch Cat.

Remember that they're facing Cat, and not the Dead King because of the Saint orders. She doesn't want a truce.

I can't see why wouldn't accept that. Loosing the strongest fighter for the carcass of a man AND screwing up the negotiations?

medailyfun

I've got the impression Saint tried to stop Cat from leaving and force negotiations, not to kill outright

Liliet

Well a blade stopped an inch from her throat by its wielder getting decked in the face really doesn't give me that impression.

Saint is a walking cliché already. "No truce with the Enemy" is like the oldest 'he who hunts monsters' heroic downfall in the book.

medailyfun

the movement to face Cat looks a bit unwarranted in this case

Liliet

She was on top of a horse, and front is where her throat is.

Mental Mouse

> "Like a lot of people who'd been the strongest in their surroundings for years on years, she'd not had to really answer to anyone for too long. That led to sloppy habits."

And Cat would know... 😊

Liliet

Well, she didn't really have years on years herself...

...which enabled successful recovery!

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, but cat is no fool. This is the full power of her uninfluenced brain. She knows he will rally. Shes got at least a half form planned for that inevitability. And as already noted, Saint has hurt the story and she knows it. She wanted to die in that moment because it'd bail them out, she'd have paid for her dishonor and the rest are free. At the moment, she's an albatross as long as Cat doesnt get too sadistic.

boballab

She flipped the story on them, Pilgrim is now in the villains side of it and if he tries something while still there it will cause him to lose. This is something he even pointed out way back before the Battle of the Camps: Cat isn't following the Villains line but the Hero and he asked Saint what does that make them then. Thats the thing, he knows the answer, he knows what they are doing is wrong, but he just can't take the final step because then it would bring everything about his life into question. Cat has started an existential crises in Pilgrim, it is just taking a long time to come to a head.

sutortyrannus

Hoping that the culmination of the developing crisis you mention is a conversation with Amadeus about morality – Not So Different being thrown in the faces of the sanctimonious is always a fun time.

Liliet

and on Amadeus's side, him trying to veer around it like 'I am not the right person to talk to about this' but bit by bit getting provoked into revealing his sheer unbridled idealism ;u;

Mental Mouse

You mean Pilgrim and Amadeus? I imagine they already had that conversation, which might even have fed into his spiritual crisis. Cat and Amadeus are already on the same page there.

Liliet

Amadeus specifically remarked in his POV that they refused to let him have that conversation (which he very much wanted, probably both to fuck with them and out of sheer loneliness and boredom). I doubt that changed offscreen between then and now, though it'd be hilarious and wonderful if it did.

Liliet

I think he IS trying to do what's right, it just keeps slipping from his fingers. It's a bitter pill to swallow that allying with Cat is the only unambiguously Good move here (and it would literally bind her more to the side of Good because she would listen to his advice and guidance), and I don't think he has enough evidence for that yet.

boballab

No he is doing what the Choir is telling him to do. Go back and reread Peregrine II through IV. In II the Choir stops talking to him when he saves his Nephew. He placed his values ahead of the Gods Above, they didn't send him back to save his Nephew and punish his Brother he choose that. From that mistake he made the next by letting the Prince and his family live thinking he was being merciful, from that mistake he didn't tell his Nephew the why's of that and he grew bitter and hateful. That final mistake forced him into correcting his first mistake by killing his Nephew as was intended all along and once he did the choir started talking to him again. That is a painful lesson to learn about obeying your masters and Cat's remarks to him in this chapter just might break something loose.

Liliet

I mean sending him back to save his sister (not nephew) was never the job of the Choir of Mercy. And letting the prince live was very much a Mercy thing to do. Really don't think where you get that killing his nephew was anything the Ophanim intended; they'd approved of him placing the needs of the many above the needs of the few, that's all.

I really don't interpret this relationship the same way you do.

boballab

Go back and re read when they stopped talking to him and when they restarted. They stopped when he saved the Nephew and restarted after he killed him.

Liliet

Yes. And your interpretation is that this means they wanted his nephew to die. While my interpretation is that Ophanim don't give a fuck and operate on a far more abstract level: they stopped talking to him when he prioritized family above his duty as a Hero of Mercy, and restarted when he returned to that priority.

Mental Mouse

This. That was another hint that Good is not what we expect it to be.

Mental Mouse

Cat's comment about Saint that I quoted above applies somewhat to Pilgrim too. Not as much because he's not axe-crazy, but he just saw Cat casually slap his Choir's power aside, and didn't like it much. He may be due for a crisis of faith.

Dainpdf

I'm not so sure Saint was thinking in terms of narrative there, but I concur overall.

Mental Mouse

Indeed, Saint wasn't thinking of narrative. That's why she screwed it up.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think, to be fair, she was banking on the scheme narrative. Which is not all that complementary mind you, because she is doggedly refusing to believe Cat is anything but Evil pretending instead of something new.

In her mind it probably went something like this "I am the anti-hero type. This Woman is scheming. She wants this talk to fail to further some goal of hers, or maybe the talk itself is irrelevant and was just meant to last this long to be a distraction. Either way letting her go allows her to get what she wants. The 'rules' are binding us here, AND SHE'S COUNTING ON THAT. But ultimately she's the Arch-Vile and I am an anti-hero. I know she's got a real plan. Killing her here might make me look bad but the way these stories work I will be completely vindicated as evidence presents itself shortly of what she was really up to."

Of course, she didn't consider that in fact the scheme was "get Saint to attack me, leave peacefully if she doesn't" Because tricking your opponent into breaking the rules so you can take them down while honoring them is very much a hero move.

Liliet

Yep. Cat's acting like a Trickster Hero at worst here, and Saint's conviction threw her into a corner here. Gods, Laurence, you've already had the "not a villain's story" realization during the Battle of the Camps, just how determined are you to ignore reality staring you in the face?

Saint would have been right had she been up against someone like Kairos or alive!Akua. The problem is, she has enough information to surmise otherwise by now. She just... doesn't.

Liliet

...actually it sounds like Saint doesn't trust in the metaphysical judgement. Like if Hanno threw his coin, got laurels, and went 'nah this can't be right' and then killed the person anyway. Which he wouldn't do, but Laurence... has gone far, far off the rails here.

Like Cat has priests working miracles in her army, but clearly Laurence knows better what Good and Evil are than Above does, right?

...I mean I'd agree with that, if she wasn't... so... bad at making these judgements -_-

Mental Mouse

I think we can look to the Bard to see where Laurence is getting these ideas.

Liliet

Yeah, but like, Bard doesn't brainwash people wholesale, she gives them ideas within the range they already find plausible.

Laurence is 100% fully responsible for the degree of bullshit in play here.

Insanenoodlyguy

They have said Saint has a good sense for stories herself though. I think she was just following the wrong track because, as I said before, she's used to fighting a certain type and isn't adjusting.

Cicero

I suspect the Procerians are beginning to question the wisdom of the heroes, as they keep on doing things that get everyone deep into the bog.

Mental Mouse

Yes, if that keeps up, it's liable to taint their hero-stories.

Valkyria

Ah Rumena. The sneaky old bastard is back at it again. Simply can't have it's perfectly taunting words be made ineffective by a mere language barrier.

Valkyria

Also, props to Hakram. Even though he doesn't know Cat's plan or exactly how her endgame looks like, he manages to stay in perfect sync with her. Sure he has the bonus of knowing how she thinks (as far as anyone other than herself can know that) and his Name to help him with it, but he just finds the perfect words to say and moments to say them in. Just a good job.

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Mental Mouse

Especially given he probably wasn't able to perceive the psychic byplay before the spoken words.

Decius

Did the Pilgrim just say that Black was unharmed, and then admit that his soul was severed? Seems like it would be fitting to suggest that he might return from the truce negotiations similarly 'unharmed'.

sutortyrannus

"So what I told you was true, from a certain point of view."

-Another Wise Old Man

aran

From my point of view the HEROES are evil!

haihappen

Taking a hostage until the soul was returned would be the proper diplomatic solution, would it not?

Muffin

Probably the Pilgrim.

The other 2 guys aren't worth Black's soul, and you can't make a hostage from the Saint.

Liliet

And have Cat lose her high ground? She already tread dangerously close to the villain line here, Laurence being not wrong and all that. And the minute she's a villain the Crusade is righteously opposing, rather than a misunderstood hero trying to sort out the mess, she loses.

Allafterme

Ah, a classic example of over-reliance on an aspect turns on you at the worst moment.

Wry Warudo

> "Are you sure I can't recruit you?" I felt compelled to ask.
"I'll be honest, I would spend good money to see you punch Saint in the face."

I wonder how much Cat owes Rumena now

Liliet

OMG I'D FORGOTTEN ABOUT THAT SO GOOD

boballab

She owes him nothing. She didn't say she would pay HIM good money, just pay it in general.

konstantinvoncarstein

Awesome foreshadowing! 😊

sengachi

Honestly I'd pay good money to watch that. Cat can crowfund its payment off of us.

Mental Mouse

Arrggh! 😞

Tom

I feel like I should go back and re-read the whole story just to see what other predictive gems like this I've missed 😊

medailyfun

that was intense, I had to change my sweaty t-shirt after reading

Vin reisling

I find it strange heroes would be pulling souls out.

Liliet

Aotrs Commander

I think that just shows that Cat's opposition are only wearing white hats as decoration.

As if Saint wasn't enough proof.

luminiousblu

It's not exactly an evil thing to do. What's evil is generally using it for fuel or whatever.

Liliet

Depends on how you squint.

aran

Surprised they got her this easily. Laurence is one of the scariest motherfuckers on the continent.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, but the story was against her. Attacking someone under truce banner, during negotiations, is an unambiguously villainous act. She was definitely in the role of villain here, and will all know how it goes...

Exec

As much as I love seeing #1 Drow beat the shit out of #~1 Heroine, this was way, way too aggressive of a play.

I hope wanting Black back, even if Praes and the Accords might need him, hasn't blinded her to how badly this will go now.

Badly for her enemies, sure, but still not exactly ideal for her long-term plans...

Gunslinger

She knows Saint needs to die before she can get Good onto the negotiation table. All of this baiting and aggression is the groundwork needed to kill Saint.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not necessarily. If she held him indefinitely, and made more demands, it would certainly be. But she has stated that while they will get on with the peace talks, that this is a separate matter. That the pressure of her hostage looms over them is a factor is not necessarily relevant as part of the story. She has made clear that the matter is settled for the one prisoner or the execution of the truce breaker. She has to avoid sadism, but if she does, she's fine (namely, she can kill Lawrence outright or let her go, but if she say, makes to start cutting pieces of of her and that bluff is called and it's not a bluff, she's taken it into villainy and now the story can pivot against her).

Ultimately, while this will certainly end with a few crowns off one way or another, Our mortals can truthfully say that their position was significantly weakened when that one goddamn fucking hero flagrantly broke truce. And lets face it, if Rozala tells Cordelia "We had a chance here till that goddamn lunatic Saint fucked it all up!" we are in the unique position that rather than disposing of Rozala as a potential threat with this juicy failure, Cordelia is going to think this tracks. And may well feel inclined to take her aside and say "Yeah, she's going completely off the rails, whatever else we have to put aside, because the blessed seem to be trying to take the reins here and drive us off a cliff." They have the patriotism of overwhelming threat and mutual enemies to bond over now! Of course, for violating that order, Rozala still loses her crown before this can even happen. But that doesn't mean that's her end in the story.

Cicero

Yup, the Procerian mortals are going to be doing alot of bonding over all the messes the Heroes keep putting them in.

sengachi

She did mention that she would have gone for a much less aggressive play if the Saint hadn't been there. This wasn't so much a plan A so much as it was managing a worst case scenario.

Mental Mouse

Well, she was expecting a worst-case scenario, because she knows how the story goes. It's Another F-ing Critical Juncture, so she just assumed things would go to hell. "Gates barred? OK, deal with the situation here first, and while I'm at it, milk my slightly-scorched condition for effect. Saint's here? Obviously she'll try to attack me – I have goddesses defending me, but can I turn the attack to my outright advantage?" and so on.

Liliet

Yep.

Cat looks like she's treating from a position of strength here because she acts like she doesn't mind treating peace conference like a battlefield where she is sufficiently wary of getting killed to not take a non-Named associate with her and give orders in case of her death.

We're very much used to Cat being fully willing to put her life on the line for the sake of building her better world and trying for the best possible outcome. It's easy to forget that it's not actually the default, and pushing back against being forced to is... it doesn't come anywhere near aggressive yet.

Draconic

Catherine should just take the Saint's soul until Black's is returned to his body. She can even tell the Pilgrim, that the Saint is still alive, unharmed, and in her right mind.

Mental Mouse

And the left mind is reserved for Amadeus?

Again: one of the few things we know about Amadeus's story position is that he is no longer the Black Knight. Cat doesn't know that, but we do – so, "Amadeus", not "Black".

Liliet

Meh, it's a nickname.

Mental Mouse

Also: "Hey Pilgrim? The bad news is your buds at Thassalina managed to push the Son Of The Red Skies over the edge, and then he took the Liesse hellgate generator. The good news is he took it out of Creation. For now. Do you think you can negotiate with him better than I can?"

ahd

"Yes, because you are Evil and I am Good and that means...uh..."

Daniel E

Sentimentality aside; What practical use does Amadeus have that is worth a legit opportunity to kill the Saint?

Gunslinger

Taking over after Malicia and ensuring Praes doesn't descend into demon spawning chaos.

Fayhem

Literally this; Amadeus is the only power broker in Praes who both has a realistic chance of holding it together as a country and has the will/intent to actually implement the fundamental societal reforms that Praes desperately needs. With no Amadeus to take charge after Malicia gets got (which is an absolute necessity that I'll be happy to elaborate on if anybody wants), the best case scenario is another High Lord/Lady Triumphant-wannabe type takes over and drags Praes back into the bad old days of Impractical Evil that made them a permanent bane to both all their neighbors (very especially Cat's own Callow) and to their own people. The worst-case and frankly more likely scenario would be that the former Dread Empire of Praes descends into a bloody mess that would look something like the Syrian civil war if everybody in the Middle East knew how to summon demons.

Tl;dr – Yes, Cat has a sentimental attachment to Amadeus. But getting him back would be pretty much an absolute necessity even from a pure geopolitical analysis of the situation with zero sentiment involved from anybody – and that's not even touching on how pretty much all the Legions and a large percentage of the Army of Callow (including pretty much all the orcs up to and including the Marshal of Callow) have an attachment to Amadeus that is as strong if not stronger than their attachment to Cat.

Insanenoodlyguy

That last bit especially. Even if Amadeus survives but is never directly helpful to Cat again (Highly unlikely), This becomes the time that the Carrion Lord's heir saved him when for once he couldn't save himself. Most consider her to be his heir. This will make it undisputed fact. Which is pretty important if and when Praes has to be dealt with if most of it's standing army assumes by default when the order comes in to fight Callow that they are going to fight FOR Callow.

medailyfun

I doubt Cat has Saint as a killing goal, she would just prefer her fighting DK and not messing around

Insanenoodlyguy

I believe she's said already that Saint will have to die, because she understands Saint. There is no version of this where both of them live, Saint is going to force the issue till she wins or she dies.

Mental Mouse

Also getting killed by Saint would not further any of Cat's own goals.

Liliet

Cat has Saint marked as "super most likely can't avoid a kill or get killed scenario", not someone she actively wants dead (like she did Akua). If a path opens where they both survive, all else being equal, Cat'll take it.

Insanenoodlyguy

Absolutely, but that requires Saint to have anything other than a "I die or you do" approach. All signs point to her not being able to let this go... she barely did when it wasn't personal and now it is.

Cicero

All very true, but Cat might be willing to take a practical evil approach, and kill the Saint after she kills the Dead King.

Maybe. Hopefully.

Liliet

When Cat is forced to kill Saint depends on Saint and only on Saint.

Liliet

Getting Amadeus explicitly and openly backing her against Malicia is an insta-win of the low key civil war she's been having there. Not only does that flip the Legions (and activate Malicia's failsafes there, sure, but that won't help her long-term), it also grants her the Calamities – and Scribe's entire web of informants with them, – Grem's compliance (and with him the Clans), Sacker's legion as well, and Malicia herself would not make any attempt on his life.

The only fractions in Praes whose loyalty Amadeus doesn't command are goblins (who are already allied with Catherine independently) and High Lords, who can't band together even in the face of certain annihilation. Which is coming.

Amadeus is a ridiculously influential political player, even though he doesn't seem to realize the extent of it himself (he missed a couple of candidates when counting who he could be bait for). Catherine needs to at least make visible moves towards rescuing him to keep the loyalty of her current allies, too, much like how Juniper did not doubt they'd be rescuing Grem. Her authority over the Praesi core of her Army of Callow is derived from his, too, she's "Carrion Lord's apprentice" to them.

His expertise as a storyweaver is pretty much lost in the noise compared to all of THAT, but Cat's having a notable dearth of competent commanders, as well.

Insanenoodlyguy

It suddenly occurs to me that the sort of irony stories love could happen here. Emperor Benevolent or whatever he is going to become rises, and since he has very little interest in killing his best friend after having lost so many of the people he cares about, there's really only one thing to do with her: and so at last a name is restored, as Chancellor Alaya comes into being, a living testament to her own failure to destroy it completely. Like her former Black Knight, she then spends a lot of time taking the name in an entirely new and unexpected direction.

Liliet

Not Benevolent.

That's all I have to add.

ByVectron!

I was honestly giddy with excitement, reading the Saints introduction to Rumena. So very, very well written and staged, Cat truly knows how to craft a story.

TheGreatMeh

A young woman fighting a rogue sorcerer for her father's soul? That sounds like a good story to me.

VoraiTemplar

We have a soulless body. We have a bodyless spirit. An interesting combination...

Liliet

...

I hate you for saying this.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I'm loving that all of Cat's sparring with the Grey Pilgrim boils down to King of the Hill on the moral high ground. Obviously he's trying to maneuver her into a story that kills her, but his step one seems to be 'make sure she's in the wrong and then let the Narrative take it's course' and all of her ripostes have boiled down to 'no actually I'm in the right so I win'. It's been by the skin of her teeth a couple of times but it's also been consistent. All of their previous negotiations end up with her at essentially moral parity with her opponents, despite them being the aggressors, but here she managed to end up unambiguously in the right despite commanding by my count three /separate/ invading forces in a kingdom already defending itself from an existential threat. Pretty impressive for an orphan brat from Laure.

Liliet

I'm not sure that Grey is trying to kill her actually. Cat's reasoning wrt that back during Northern Crusade negotiations was "he's trying to maneuver me into a redemption story, redemption stories often end in death, therefore he doesn't mind me dying" – which is weak reasoning already, and turning it into "he is deliberately trying to get me killed" is outright paranoia. Which she was entitled to under the circumstances, but that doesn't mean we should take her words as gospel.

We know that Tariq is sympathetic to her to at least some degree. He's trying to kill her only if and to the degree that he considers the benefits of it to outweigh the costs (ah, utilitarianism).

Fayhem

Since some people said they liked it that I replicated the post in the comments the last time I did one of these on reddit, here we go again! Apologies if in fact you didn't want this.

Well, "human defeated by computer" is a very well-known story, with great power over the narrative. 😊

"I couldn't prove that Rumena had worked on its mastery of Chantant purely to be able to slag its opponents verbally, but I had very deep suspicions."

I'm starting to love Rumena more and more, they have a fantastically dry sense of humour.

Chapter 27: Overtures

"You should listen to the devil on your shoulder, my friend. I had it nailed onto there for a reason."

– Dread Emperor Abominable, the Thrice-Struck

It went like this: the opposition insisted they could not hold diplomatic talks while one of their own was being held up by the throat. In response, I somewhat politely cast aspersions on their grasp of matters such as reality and remembering who'd tried to kill me under truce banner literally moments ago, then told them it'd be rather absurd to stand there in silence while the Grey Pilgrim went to fetch my teacher's unconscious body. I spoke the word 'unconscious' with a heavy wink, because what was a little borderline necromancy between 'friends'? Lord Yannu promptly told me talks couldn't be had without the Peregrine, who in turn suggested that his word was enough for me to order General Rumena to release his personal Heaven-endorsed attack hound. He would then join my conversation with Malanza and the other Levantine.

"That's an interesting suggestion, Tariq," I smiled politely, showing a great deal of teeth. "Especially since it implies I still hold your word to be of any worth at all."

"Mind your tongue, villain," the Lord of Alava hissed. "To cast doubt on the honour of the Pilgrim's Blood is to insult the Dominion of Levant itself."

"Will the Grey Pilgrim be surrendering himself into my custody immediately, then?" I pointedly asked. "Honour might be at least in part satisfied by that."

There was a moment of pained silence, though from certain quarters there'd been understandably no surprise. After all,

Princess Rozala had been in the tent when the treaties were first drafted and signed while the Grey Pilgrim had been an actual guarantor of the terms as well as part of them.

"You overreach, Black Queen," Lord Yannu said. "Such demands are beyond your ability to enforce, to say little of your right to them."

"My right?" I curtly repeated. "Did they not tell you, Lord Yannu, that I have written treatises signed by both your Peregrine and the Prince of Iserre to this nature? Treatises including terms that placed the Pilgrim in the Kingdom of Callow's hands for a time as hostage, and that your honourable Peregrine instead fled my capital in the night last year? Oaths and promises were broken, and he's since shown no willingness to make reparations for this or even acknowledge it happened."

"There was greater need for me elsewhere," the Grey Pilgrim replied. "Duties whose call was keener than what had been arranged."

"The oaths were inconvenient, so you broke them," I translated with a beaming smile. "But that's all right, because I'm just a villain after all. Charming."

"I would make amends, Black Queen," the Pilgrim offered.

"Sure," I replied without hesitation, "surrender yourself, right now. You'll be put to trial according to Callowan law and dealt with accordingly."

"I cannot do this," Tariq said, "so long as you lead an army against the Grand Alliance."

"Ah," I mused. "It was a platitude, then, and your word remains dust to me. Let us discard this notion of my putting faith in the promises of a man who does not afford anyone else the same courtesy and move on, shall we?"

None of them liked that, but Malanza steered the conversation away from the fact that both she and the Pilgrim had already broken terms of a bargain made with me before they lost any more feathers. The arrangements ended up being kicked down the line: talks would end until I'd received the body and released the Saint, then resume with the Grey Pilgrim in attendance. A waste of time, in my eyes, so I turned my gaze on Princess Rozala instead.

"I'm willing to bargain with you without them in attendance," I bluntly said. "You strike me as the most trustworthy of the three, at the moment, though admittedly that doesn't mean all that much."

The Princess of Aquitan hesitated, while in the back of my mind I gauged her situation. There were more Dominion soldiers than Proceran ones in the western coalition army she was fighting with, so it wasn't a given that she had the most clout in whatever power-sharing arrangement made up that host's command. On the other hand, if she was here then it was with the First Prince's backing and this remained the Principate of Procer: she had legitimacy the other two did not, being foreigners.

"We can speak," Princess Rozala said, "while other matters are seen to."

The large Lord of Alava stirred, face openly displeased, but the princess raised a hand in appeasement.

"I will not negotiate, or offer terms," the dark-haired woman said. "Only speak. Diplomacy can take place when all are in attendance."

The Grey Pilgrim spoke softly, in a language I did not know – a Levantine tongue, most likely, since Lord Yannu seemed to have no trouble understanding it. They conferred softly, and I watched Princess Rozala from the corner of my eyes. She seemed as much in the dark about what was being said as I, and not particularly pleased about it. Adjutant leaned in closer.

"Murcadan, I think," the orc whispered in Kharsum. "Spoken mostly around the region of Alava city. I'm not surprised Rozala wouldn't know it, it's their least widespread tongue."

I slowly nodded. Might be true that the language had never seemed worth learning for the Princess of Aquitan. Although her principality was deep to the south of Procer and closer to the Dominion than any other foreign nation, Ceseo or Lunara would have been more useful picks if she meant to dabble in learning something of narrower use than tradertalk. Whatever the truth of it, the side conference between the Levantines did not take long. Quiet words were exchanged with Princess Rozala herself, and there must have been agreement as the Pilgrim sought my eyes once more and when denied that withdrew without another word. Lord Yannu inquired to the practical aspects of the trade, namely how the unconscious body would be carried, so I glanced meaningfully at Hakram. Adjutant moved to speak with the Levantine aristocrat, leaving Princess Rozala Malanza to speak with me alone. Well, not exactly: Komena drew her talons against my shoulder for a moment before lazily flapping away to perch herself on the shoulder of her favourite, General Rumena. The old drow showed no sign of tiring from holding up the Saint of Swords by the throat, and overall had seemed rather unimpressed by her glaring even before half of Sve Noc claimed its shoulder. The crow taking flight drew Malanza's attention to the one still on my shoulder, though she couldn't seem to gaze at Andronike directly.

"I wouldn't recommending looking at either too close," I said.

"Demons," Princess Rozala said, lips tightening into a line.

Andronike let out loud gurgling caws that might have been taken as laughter, and certainly rang of mockery.

"Sve Noc," I corrected. "Or their attention, anyway. No summons these, Rozala Malanza, bound and bargained for. Though if that makes you fear them less, I'll count you a fool for it."

The Proceran princess studied me for a moment, dark eyes inscrutable.

"What does it mean?" she asked. "Sve Noc."

"It means your learning is shallow, Rozala Malanza, while this world's roots run deep," Andronike spoke in perfect Chantant from my shoulder. "It will be amusing, to see how little of you the adjustment allows to remain. Already the cracks are showing, aren't they?"

The Princess of Aquitan turned ghastly pale.

"It will take more than brandy and poppy leaves for the digging to stop," the goddess on my shoulder laughed. "Hands and picks and tireless flesh, pulling aside the —"

"Andronike," I calmly said. "Enough."

"The clever little things would turn on you in a heartbeat, my herald, if they believed they would triumph in that strife," she said. "In their wanton arrogance they prance about, blind to their utter fragility."

"Are we not all fragile, in your eyes?" I retorted.

"Some more than others," Andronike said, but left it at that.

Wings spreading, the crow-goddess took flight and left me to face a shaken Princess of Aquitan. Her tanned visage had turned ashen, and a tremor was running down her arm. Not, I noted, the one that clutched the handle of her sword.

"What is that thing, Black Queen?" Princess Rozala croaked.

"Desperate measures made altar," I said. "Apotheosis is not a gentle affair, and they were not gentle before it."

"Riddles," she accused.

"I've given you truths," I shrugged. "What you make of them, in the end, is not my concern. I am not your keeper, or for that matter your empire's."

That last sentence had blood returning to her face, and iron returned to her spine. I studied Rozala Malanza under the gentle light of the moon, waited as she put herself back together. It was absurd, I thought, to think of her as young when she was older than me. But she couldn't even be thirty, and it struck me that in different times she would have been considered much too young for the importance of the duties thrust upon her. As Hasenbach's commander in Iserre, she was arguably on par with the Iron Prince in authority within the ever-fluid military hierarchy of Procer. Perhaps even higher. Young and worn before her time, I thought. The chorus of our age.

"Procer is on the verge of collapse," Princess Rozala told me.

I hid my surprise at the fact that she'd outright admit that. The blood was in the water for anyone to see, and here in Iserre there were ingredients enough to cook the death of empire, but there was still life in the beast.

"In different circumstances, I might have celebrated that," I frankly said. "Not, however, today."

"You cannot afford for the lines up north to break, Black Queen," the princess told me, tone cool. "Too many of the refugees south would die, the sheer amount of corpses to be raised would effectively make the Dead King unstoppable."

Gods, I wished. Unstoppable was the prelude to some adolescent in colourful clothes bringing down the flying fortress, or inexplicably stabbing a villain's soul. Unfortunately, I doubted Neshamah would make any mistake so easily exploitable by the Heavens and their chosen.

"I didn't come to Iserre to fight any of you," I pointed out. "I'm extracting my forces."

"Do so," the princess said. "You will not be hindered."

"Including the Legions of Terror," I flatly said.

"That," Princess Rozala said, "cannot be allowed to happen."

I already had a biting reply on the tip of my tongue when I forced myself to bite it instead, eyes narrowing as I looked closer at the dark-haired Arlesite. She wasn't being high-handed, I thought, or refusing to recognize the realities of her situation. There wasn't defiance or righteous anger on her face, only a sort of tired resignation. Rozala Malanza was essentially telling me, without outright speaking the word, that if the Legions left with my forces there would be dire consequences for the Principate.

"How bad?" I asked.

"Bad," she replied, tone grim.

"I can't give them to you," I frankly told her. "I won't backstab an ally and it'd make a bloody mess for me besides."

"If you were to escape with them," Princess Rozala delicately said, "after being defeated, that would be a different story. Or so I am told."

My fingers tightened around my reins and Zombie whinnied.

"That's not a small favour you're asking," I said. "Or a harmless one."

It wasn't an exaggeration to say that a great deal of my legitimacy – insofar as I had any – as the Queen of Callow came from my largely uninterrupted string of battlefield victories. I'd had political defeats aplenty, and strategic drubbings more than once, but even the worst of my days commanding an army could be argued to be at least draws. As the First Prince had once put it I was a warlord, and those only rules so long as they kept winning. It'd also put me in a weaker position when pushing for the Liesse Accords, coming from the cold as an already beaten foe instead of a victor, and that was without even getting in the practical aspects of being 'defeated'. Even if I were willing to waste soldiers over such theatre, which I honestly wasn't sure I was, this would be a risky business even if I trusted the opposition well. Which I did not. Malanza wasn't unreasonable, but a year ago she'd been invading my homeland and she'd never bothered to hide the despised me personally. That left the Levantines, which as long as the Pilgrim was around couldn't be trusted to do anything but what he 'advised'. How could I be sure that halfway through the withdrawal of my forces they wouldn't try to turn the face victory into a real one?

"I do not have room to negotiate, Black Queen," Princess Rozala murmured. "I would prefer if I did, but what do I have to bargain with save doom and despair?"

"I'd be taking on heavy risks," I reminded her. "On the account of people who are still my enemies."

"There is a greater enemy still," she told me, eyes serious. "The Enemy, and he comes for us all."

"I'm not unaware of that," I patiently said. "It's not that I'm unwilling to avoid setting fire to what's left of Procer, Malanza. It's that I'm not convinced if I try to help you your fellows won't stick a knife in my back halfway through."

She grimaced.

"I don't suppose," she said, "that my word of honour as the Princess of Aequitan would mean anything to you."

"More than nothing," I finally said. "But it only matters if you're in command of the army on the other side of this field, and I don't believe that's the case."

"I hold supreme command over all armies of the Principate in Iserre," she said.

"And the Levantines?"

"This half their forces answers to Lord Yannu, for the most part," Rozala said. "We make plans by council."

"Then you can't speak for the army," I said, not unkindly. "If the Grey Pilgrim asked the man to turn cannibal he actually might. Turning on a villain? That wouldn't even merit hesitation."

"You need to set aside your grudge against the Chosen, Foundling," the other woman told me. "Though I understand he broke faith with you, it was a shallow betrayal."

"He disappeared to hunt down my mentor, whose soulless body I've just had to trade for," I flatly said. "He'd didn't leave to take a nice stroll down a promenade, Malanza."

"The Carrion Lord killed thousand on the field, and dozens of thousands through the burning of them," the Princess of Aequitan spoke evenly. "I can only grieve the Peregrine did not simply slit the man's throat instead of resorting to such theatrics."

I could have argued this, truth be told. There was no denying Black was a monster, but he hadn't decided to torch his way through the Proceran heartlands for the pleasure of it on a sunny morning where he'd had nothing else planned. It'd been a calculated attack at the manpower and stability of an enemy nation who'd been in the process of invading my homeland and his. While I wouldn't defend his actions, or the validity of his methods even if they appeared to be working – to everyone's loss – he'd not committed that atrocity in a vacuum. It'd be a direct response to the Tenth Crusade, whose stated goal was the destruction of Praes. Black's policy had been to avoid war against Procer for decades before I'd known him, and it seemed rather rich of all these righteous folk to go out of their way declare war on one of the most infamous monsters of our age and then be appalled and surprised when he behaved monstrously. If you shoved your fingers in a brazier, at the very least you should expect to get burned. On the other hand, I was disinclined to defend an atrocity I didn't believe in and was currently screwing all of us over. Let her talk: if that was all she did, I had no issue with it. The talk was hardly undeserved.

"My point is that he's not ever going to consider promises binding, Malanza," I said. "Not if they get in the way of what he believes needs to be done."

"That is rather reassuring to me," the princess said.
"Considering he's one of the most decent men I've met."

"I'm not going to argue whether the Pilgrim's anything with you," I flatly said. "But you can, at least, recognize why I'd hesitated to trust in him given his history of both breaking oaths and attempting to kill me."

"Make your peace with it," Princess Rozala said, rather unmoved.

It occurred to me, then, that from the Princess of Aquitaine's perspective I was angry over simply our battlefield encounters and the Pilgrim's escape from Liesse. She did not know that I'd good as begged the man to make any path but going to Keter feasible only to be turned down. Or that his wriggling into a role through the treaty after the Camps had essentially been an attempt to get me killed through a redemption story, after having spent that entire diplomatic conference trying to manoeuvre me into a story that'd get me either slain or sidelined. I wondered if she'd believe me, should I tell her. Likely not. Part of that I suspected only Named could truly understand, and then not even all of that rarefied breed. As for the rest, why would the Black Queen's word be taken for anything? No, I was simply expected to take the word of my fucking betters while everyone dragged my own through the mud. I pushed down the sharp flare of anger I felt at that. It would be of no use to me here.

"There's more there than you know," I finally said. "I am not unwilling to bargain with him, but trust him blindly when the stakes are so high? No."

"You would refuse without even giving reason?" Malanza said.

"Where'd you learn what would happen if the Legions were allowed to walk?" I replied.

She didn't answer. Yeah, we all had our little secrets. Might be the Augur, I figured, but other things as well. Tariq had Mercy whispering in his hear, it seemed, and I wouldn't write off the possibility that Tyrant had offered some sort of deal – or made of threat – either.

"Trust is a funny thing, isn't?" I murmured.

I considered, for a moment, telling her about what was taking shape in Arcadia. It'd be a danger to her side as well, I figured, though not an immediate one. I knew I should tell her, because if it came out later that I had known a catastrophe was forming there and said nothing there would a price to pay in many ways. But there'd been hellgates, in that broken place. And what I believed might have been High Arcana. It was possible for it to be the work of the Dead King, who had been known to use both these things, but that wasn't where the shape of this story – Masego missing, Liesse disappeared, everything coming to a head in Iserre – was leading. If I told any of the crusaders that knowledge would make it to the Grey Pilgrim. And more dangerously to the Saint of Swords, who I'd just humiliated and used as coin in a bargain, who I'd have to release before too long lest this situation be turned on me. If Laurence de Montfort learned that the Hierophant was meddling with these kinds of forces, she'd have a pretext to kill him. And I did not doubt for a single fucking moment that she'd try. Would she succeed? I honestly wasn't sure.

But I was certain I wasn't willing to gamble with Masego's life, so I kept my mouth shut.

"There's no point in holding talks over this, is there?" I finally said. "Not unless you're willing to offer me hostages and other forms of safeguard, which you won't be."

"You know the appearances of that would make it impossible," Princess Rozala calmly replied.

"Then we appear to have nothing left to speak about," I said. "I'll be marching my armies out of Iserre, Malanza."

I met her eyes, smiling ruefully.

"I'd suggest you get yours out of my way, for all our sakes."

Javvies

This went more or less as expected.

Though, I'm not sure that there's absolutely no point in telling Malanza about what you tried to offer Pilgrim Cat. Sure, she'd be skeptical, and it probably wouldn't change anything today, but it could very well lay the seeds for the future. It doesn't cost you anything, and might help in the future.

IDKWhoitis

It would cost her Mal being more on guard against Cat for little to no pay off. If Grey doesn't do anything outright "Merciful", then she won't believe Cat and would respect her warnings less. If Mal for whatever reason started to doubt Grey, and Grey would note this, then she might be purged for being corrupted by evil. Noone would really stop the heroes, and Cat is left with one less reasonable person to talk to later on.

Mental Mouse

Note that AFAICT, neither Malanza nor Cat know about that village that Tariq wiped out to get Amadeus.

RoflCat

Especially considering how she became First of Night.

>Hypocrite to end, was I? Demanding what I would not offer.

She won't trust the Heaven and their pawns, so Pilgrim/Yannu should be out .

But Malanza? She's seen the horror, and she's mortal, while she's influenced by the Pilgrim she's also not in his inner circle as shown with the secret talk with Yannu in this chapter.

Maybe Malanza will not return the hand offered, but unless Cath is willing to offer it, that gap won't be closed.

caoimhinh

In this case, it's different from the deal with Sve Noc (where they didn't know each other and trusting the other was a leap of faith).

Here, is not that Cat doesn't want to extend her hand and trust Pilgrim and Rozala; it's that he has repeatedly shown that he can't be trusted to honor any promises and Rozala simply doesn't have the power to enforce any deal she makes. Releasing the Saint on Pilgrim's word is pointless since she could attack right away and it's a fact that Pilgrim wouldn't let her be captured again.

Trusting the Peregrine to uphold his side of a bargain without making any binding oath is also futile, notice that he immediately said that he can break promises if there are "greater needs" and "Duties whose call is keener than what has been arranged", meaning that the moment he perceives that he has an upper hand or a chance, he would strike against Cat regardless of honor, because the higher call is to defeat the villains.

If he is openly saying that he can decide at any moment to go back on his word then he can't be trusted. Cat doing so would be stupid.

Liliet

I don't think that 'the higher call is to defeat the villains' is accurate.

This is the real pivot point here actually, for the plot as a whole: is it? Because if it is, then Cat truly has no choice but to twist the world's arm until there's no choice but to go along with her demands.

But if he's more careful in his utilitarian reasoning,

Javvies

Thing is, Cat more or less has to assume that she can't trust him to give and then keep his word unless she both has sufficient leverage to make him agree to give his word and then maintains sufficient leverage to make him keep his word indefinitely or at least until she no longer cares if he breaks his word.

Honestly, though, the whole massively unreliable word thing? That sounds way more like a Villain trait than one that should be associated with a Hero. A Classic! Evil Villain trait, at that.

Liliet

This is not about his word. That's just Cat's attempts to maintain control of the situation. Which are very much not the terminal value.

Javvies

Yes and no.

Remember, Cat had previously said that she thinks she's going to need Pilgrim supporting the Accords from his side in order for them to work.

However, if she can't trust him to keep his word to her when she wants to let them fight the Dead King, he's not going to be very useful for supporting the Accords.

If he's unreliable when it comes to cooperating against the Dead King, even to such a minor extent as letting her leave to face off with Praes while the Alliance goes to deal with the far more pressing issue of Dead King and/or Kairos ... it is very hard to consider him reliable for pretty much anything and everything else.

Liliet

I think Cat plans to actually get him onboard with the Accords, like, actually supporting them and bending the rest of his plans and obligations around this idea.

She's not doing it, though.

Methinks Cat's having trouble following through on her own good ideas :3

Mental Mouse

She may be hoping to teach him to keep his word when the time comes (yeah, ironic). "Remember how much your last oathbreaking cost you? Next time will be worse."

Miles

In this case it's just a cultural thing. When making promises to Evil it doesn't count as a promise, just something you had to say to win.

ALazyMonster

I feel like the not telling her about the deal part also largely includes the fact that there is no way to tactfully say "Before I tried get the great elder lich god to burn your kingdom down, which Malicia ended up doing anyway which was mildly convenient if unwanted, I tried to offer peace but the Pilgrim decided that my homeland should burn simply because it might result in a longer lasting peace for the alliance."

I do get that every person in the alliance is skeptical of her word since they've all grown up on stories of villains being traitorous and lying but I feel like that shouldn't give the heroes a pass to break their word whenever it's not convenient. The entire point of integrity is that you stand by something even when it's not easy. If your principle is that "everything is just going to work out as long as I make a marginal effort," which is what the Pilgrim seems to be at times, then that's not a principle it's blind optimism. The heroes in this universe as a whole seem to have grown a bit arrogant in believing the story will always bail them out so they can get away with letting themselves be pushed to the cliffs.

I'm not sure if I lost my train of thought halfway through that rant, sorry.

Javvies

Ehhhh, she doesn't have to tell Malanza everything, as long as what Cat actually does say is true.

Instead of saying she tried to make a deal with the Dead King before trying the drow only to be outbid by Malicia, Cat can say that that because Pilgrim refused to make peace, Cat needed to find someone to ally with against Praes (and Procer/ the Alliance), tried to kill Malicia to prevent her from selling out Calernia to the Dead King and wound up making deal with the drow. And the dwarves.

Remember, Cat had also offered to Gate the Crusaders directly to Praes/ the Tower. It's not absurd that she might try to offer a similar sort of deal again.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately she can't gate anybody anywhere just now, except to Masego's new "workspace".

RanVor

Also, the Crusaders have better things to do than assaulting the Tower right now.

Mental Mouse

Also, even shorter spiel: Since Pilgrim wouldn't deal, I went and found some allies of my own, and here they are! Oh yeah, I made another deal on the way: maybe you noticed the Dwarves won't sell to you? That's because you're fighting me Instead of the Dead King, who, lest we forget, is doing rather worse to you than Amadeus ever did. Interested in a deal yet? Remember, things can always get worse...

Liliet

Yeah, Cat still needs to lay that card on the table, because right now it's just screwing everyone over for no real gain.

stevenneiman

Honestly, the most likely outcome is that she would view Cat as less reasonable. Between seeming sane and giving a challenge to make Malanza admit that there were reasonable reasons for Cat to keep secrets, she managed to get Malanza to think of her as a reasonable equal who was willing to at least try to find a compromise which wouldn't be ruinous for all involved, and even if they couldn't come to such a compromise they both left feeling like the other party is someone they could make a deal with in other circumstances.

If Cat had tried to convince her that Tariq was using story-fu to kill her, she would have sounded like a lunatic in a tinfoil hat, and that would mean that Malanza would assume that she was too crazy to work with even if they were in a situation where they both did have the bargaining power to come to a beneficial accord.

Javvies

Cat doesn't need to say why Pilgrim refused to make a deal, only that she'd offered one that was fairly reasonable, and been refused – and that Pilgrim hadn't refused because Above ordered him to reject Cat's offer, per Pilgrim's own words.

Liliet

Yeah. Rozala is already willing to accept that Cat might have good reasons that she's keeping secret for also good reasons. Telling her what actually happened will not work out to Cat's benefit at this point. With Rozala's current level of informedness there's no way for Cat to swing this story in her favor in any more detail than what she's already offered.

danh3107

I don't have a lot to say, just a very solid chapter. I hope the delay wasn't anything serious.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder if Cat lost her call line to Cordelia after losing Winter, or if Cordelia would even answer. Like Mal isn't a bad person, nor incompetent, but she simply lacks the power or authority to make any deals.

I would have loved hearing Cat and Mal talk more about the Dead King or what they think of the Crusade. Like they both might hate each other on theoretical principles, but I do believe they would find some common ground.

Oh well, let's see Cat break another army.

Dainpdf

I would hope the Goddesses could patch her through. Whether they would, however, is debatable.

IDKWhoitis

I doubt Cordelia would willingly put on an artifact that reeked of Night and Winter. She doesn't exactly trust Cat right now.

The God's would probably do it, but I doubt Cat is going to ask. Grey is a major pain in the ass, and any hypothetical deal would get cheapened by Grey telling the Levs to do what is "Needed"

Dainpdf

I would expect the same artifact to work, and that her priestly Light blessings would protect her from the Night well enough, at this remote a contact.

Also, Augur would probably warn her if there were danger. But yes, the Pilgrim is an obstacle to any negotiations.

Liliet

I'm guessing the call line is lost, though it'd be interesting if it wasn't.

Agent J

They're in Iserre. Scrying is a bust at the moment. Cat couldn't even reach the Observatory, she sure as shit ain't reaching ol' Cordy.

caoimhinh

True, but remember that the artifact that Cat gave Cordelia for their communication wasn't a scrying tool, but a fragment of her own Domain that could be used to access it when Cat allowed entrance, thus enabling Cordelia and Cat to appear in front of the other.

It was more like half-stepping in another dimension to converse there, rather than scrying link for communication. Of course, whatever happened to that after Cat gave Winter to Sve Noc is anyone's guess and up to EE to decide. Maybe it broke, or maybe it's covered by darkness(due to Night) now so Cordelia doesn't dare to try it on anymore, maybe Cat will try to contact her again with it after the mess in Iserre is resolved.

ninegardens

Noooo... no Cat, don't.

Malanza is being as chill as is possible.
There gots to be some other way.

Also, if you suspect that Malanza is following Auger's rules, and Auger is a tool of Bard then.... then...

Oh crap, I don't know what you're meant to do when you gain the info "The best manipulator is trying to manipulate this"- what you do with that? huh?

Dainpdf

Be extra careful?

And yeah, it is often the case in diplomacy that the absence of some trust causes the absence of more trust.

Neither can trust the other not to backstab them, and neither can trust the other to trust their reasons. Their needs aren't very compatible, neither is very willing to bend, and they're operating off of almost disjoint sets of information.

I think an agreement could be made if Cat states to them her intentions of marching against the Dead King, which I expect her to do once Pilgrim returns and talks can resume, since it's pointless to keep hiding it, if Cat wants to wait until later to state her position in the war in the North and talk with Cordelia after Cat has taken all her troops away from danger, she is risking causing enmity and damaging the relations with the other armies, which she would be fighting along against the Keteran hordes.

So Cat needs to make it clear to them that she wants to help them against Keter, because if she keeps acting like her only desire is leave the mess for the Grand Alliance to solve then she won't be admitted into it later and the armies here would still stand in her way.

She might not push for a deal and treaty made now, but voicing her intentions early would do more good than bad.

Liliet

I think it's mistrusting Tariq that's screwing Cat over here. I can very much see where it's coming from, but I think it's the weak point of her reason here.

Javvies

Except he's demonstrated that he can't be trusted to keep a deal, and outright said that he either would not or could not be assured to keep his end of the deal even while Cat kept hers. Not in those exact words, but that's what his words meant.

If you can't mistrust someone because (a) they previously violated a deal they agreed to, and (b) have as good as said that their word to you specifically (if not in general) is unreliable ...

Well, who can you mistrust?

Pilgrim has proven that Cat cannot trust him to maintain his part of a deal he makes with her. Hell – Pilgrim joining the Prince of Iserre in Callowan custody as a hostage was Pilgrim's own idea.

He can't be trusted to keep the part of a deal he makes that was included in the deal at his request/demand/instigation.

Trusting Pilgrim would be even more of a mistake than not trusting him.

Cat already tried trusting Pilgrim and he betrayed that trust, and on top of that, he basically just said that she couldn't trust him to keep his word if keeping his word would be inconvenient.

Maybe if it were only Cat that would be affected by Pilgrim being unreliable, she might (or might not) be willing to gamble on Pilgrim keeping his word, but it isn't, it's the Legions and Army of Callow being immediately affected, and ultimately Callow as a whole.

Liliet

Your points are good too.

Literally the only reason in existence to put trust in Pilgrim is to put trust in his competence and good intention from a willing position of weakness.

Cat's done that before, with Sve Noc, in a more or less self-sacrificial move. It's not strange that she's more hesitant to do it with an army and her entire political position at stake, but I feel like narratively that's the winning move that she's going to come to sooner or later.

Javvies

But it's not like dealing with Sve Noc.
Cat and Sve Noc didn't trust each other in a vacuum – they didn't trust each other because they didn't know each other or anything about each other.

Cat has very good objective reason to not trust Pilgrim's word (both his actions and his own statements just now).

Cat and Sve Noc is like somebody who is a picky eater not wanting to eat mushrooms because they're a picky eater and have never had mushrooms before and aren't going to start now.

Cat not trusting Pilgrim is somebody who doesn't want to eat something with shrimp in it because they are massively allergic to shrimp and could die if they have any.

medailyfun

Cat just needs to make the deal clearly beneficial for Pilgrim to keep it, e.g. saving more lives not just here and now but also in longer run. Also well shaped story may help

caoimhinh

But that's the issue: Cat already offered that and it's still offering that, but they didn't accept before and are still refusing to accept now. Because they don't want to save more lives, they want to defeat Evil.

They launched a Crusade on the pretext of defeating Praes and liberating Callow, when in reality they were made for purely political reasons; they invaded Callow already making plans to divide it among Proceran princes and it didn't matter to Pilgrim that Cat offered to Gate them into Praes because it couldn't be allowed that a Villain was still ruling Callow, Cat offered to abdicate in 5 years but they want it now.

And right now, Cat is offering to leave without a fight but they don't allow it because they want to eliminate the Legions of Terror and inflict a defeat on the Black Queen, because not doing at least one of those things would be a political blow for the leading members of the Grand Alliance.

It has never been about saving more lives for neither of the Crusaders members, it's about defeating Evil. That's why they refuse peaceful deals, they don't want peace, they want victory.

Liliet

>"It would smother in the crib," the Grey Pilgrim said sadly, "what is perhaps the last chance for peace in our time."

>"I'm offering peace," I hissed.

>"Peace on your terms would unseat the First Prince," he said. "She has spent years forging an alliance with Levant, fighting her Assembly tooth and nail every step of the way. For that same ally to twist her arm into making a pact with one of the most famous villains alive would see her removed within the month. And everything she seeks to accomplish vanish with her."

>A long moment passed and the only sound in the tent was his steady heartbeat.

>"You can't be serious," I said. "If you'd said the Heavens were using their veto, I would have been furious. I won't pretend otherwise. But at least I wouldn't be disappointed."

>He opened his mouth but Winter flared like half a world howling for blood and he closed it.

>"No, disappointed is too mild a word," I said, voice barren of any speck of warmth. "This, Pilgrim, is worthy of contempt."

>"The treaties she has made and would deepen will end wars in the west," the old man said. "Callow restored and Praes humbled will allow Calernia to finally turn towards the true face of the Enemy. The King of the Dead. The Chain of Hunger."

>"It's funny," I said, smiling mirthlessly. "How it's never the lot of you that have to make the sacrifices. Us, this entire fucking kingdom since the dawn of time? Well, that's just how things have to be. Someone needs to take care of Praes so the rest of the continent can kill itself in peace. But then someone else has to do the bleeding, for once, and suddenly there's all these considerations."

>"This is not fair," the old man said. "Nor it is just. I will not pretend otherwise, child. But I will not offer you succour at the price of Cordelia Hasenbach's dream. It is too great a good to be slain in this manner."

medailyfun

I believe Pilgrim/Cordelia were dreaming about bigger stronger polity in place of Procer/Callow/Levant that would stop internal wars etc. Thus still taking lives into the account, but in strategic terms

Liliet

I would say it's someone refusing to eat food that has something that's either shrimp or regular perfectly hypoallergenic meat in it, and they're not betting on the chance it's not shrimp.

Cat has a very good objective reason not to trust Pilgrim, but also a very good narrative reason to :3 (this is me going meta really – the way I see the shape of the story going)

Sylwoos

The Pilgrim already made his intend pretty clear, he wish to remove Cat from Callow more than peace or anything else. Putting her trust in the Pilgrim isn't a leap of faith like with Sve Noc, she know exactly what she'll get in return: the Choir of Mercy will made done. Because at the end, the Pilgrim is only a agent of higher being and don't have much of a agency for himself.

Liliet

This is inaccurate.

>"All of this rests on the fact that it is you who rules," the old man said.

>"And if I abdicate, can you guarantee that Callow will be left untouched?" I asked. "Will you swear on your Gods that if Procer tries to annex it, you will turn your sword on whoever is trying? Or even that you'll stay out of my way and let me take care of them?"

>"I do not rule Procer," the Grey Pilgrim softly said. "And if I take the field against them, too many would follow. It would birth a war as dangerous as this one, in many ways."

>"Do something," I asked quietly. "Intervene. Offer to arbitrate. Thief tells me you could be king of Levant with a snap of your fingers, if you felt like it. You have influence to wield."

>"Seljun," he said calmly. "We do not have kings, in Levant. And there is a reason I do not sit the Tattered Throne, Catherine. Your Good Kings have done well by Callow, but the Dominion... It is a different land. It would end the honour duels, the forays into the wilds, but it would be a call. To the kind of war best left in the past."

>"I'm not saying usurp your ruler," I said. "But Gods, you're not nobody. If you make a truce with me Levant will fall in line. That'll force Hasenbach to reconsider."

>"It would break the Tenth Crusade," he gently said.

>"So do it behind closed doors," I said, frustration mounting. "You're trying to shove redemption down my throat, and don't bother denying it. Fine. I'll fucking lean in, even if it'll probably get me killed. Just act. I'll kiss the hem, quote the Book. All you need to speak up and thousands don't have to die."

>“It would smother in the crib,” the Grey Pilgrim said sadly, “what is perhaps the last chance for peace in our time.”

>“I’m offering peace,” I hissed.

>“Peace on your terms would unseat the First Prince,” he said. “She has spent years forging an alliance with Levant, fighting her Assembly tooth and nail every step of the way. For that same ally to twist her arm into making a pact with one of the most famous villains alive would see her removed within the month. And everything she seeks to accomplish vanish with her.”

>A long moment passed and the only sound in the tent was his steady heartbeat.

>“You can’t be serious,” I said. “If you’d said the Heavens were using their veto, I would have been furious. I won’t pretend otherwise. But at least I wouldn’t be disappointed.”

Pilgrim’s reasons for doing what he did had absolutely nothing to do with the Choir’s opinions.

konstantin von carstein

Honestly, this chapter make me lose nearly all the respect I had for Tariq. I agree that sometimes you have to do horrible things for the greater good, but this is going too far. If you do not respect your promesses and say clearly you will not in the future, no one is going to speak with you anymore. There is absolutely no point, because you will act like nothing was said.

Attacking someone under truce banner is the same thing. Even if teased (like the Saint), it is unacceptable. It breaks all hope of a peaceful or reasonable ending.

And they cannot use the excuse “villains always lie”, because Catherine never, ever lies nor breaks an accord with someone. And thanks to the pilgrim, they know perfectly well that she is genuinely trustworthy.

RandomFan

Catherine does too lie. She just does it very badly, and usually only to claim that she had a plan beyond “Allow chaos to reign, Be better at dealing with chaos than my enemies, Chaos, Victory!”

She doesn’t lie when doing diplomacy, though.

Talks where neither can trust the other, because neither trusts the other to trust them.

Utterly pointless, and oh so tragic.

Mental Mouse

That sort of thing was why we in the real world developed game theory, which has become one of the Arcana of our own world.

caoimhinh

It's not exactly that. I mean, sure, they don't really trust Cat but that's not their issue. The problem here is that they have heavy reasons to want to defeat her and Cat doesn't trust them into not obeying those reasons.

Both Rozala and Pilgrim know that Cat would hold her end of the bargain (Yannu is irrelevant since he will just do whatever the Peregrine tells him to do), but they can't let her go peacefully (they need to either destroy the Legions of Terror that invaded or inflict a defeat on the Black Queen) and Cat doesn't trust them into not attempting to take her down because Rozala has no power to enforce the promises and Pilgrim already has shown and stated that he won't hold his promises if there is a "higher need" or "keener call".

Dainpdf

Rozala can't trust Cat with the information on why she needs to defeat her. She also can't trust Cat to fight by the Alliance's side.

Cat can't trust Rozala with why she has such a poor opinion of the Pilgrim, and she can't trust Rozala to inflict only a paper defeat.

caoimhinh

That too.

Liliet

Rozala has already given Cat information on why she needs to defeat her, although not the source of it.

Cat's shaping up to be the most trustworthy player at the table, and it's nice to see that develop and deepen.

Dainpdf

True. At least to the letter of the law – you can trust her not to break her word, but you can definitely not trust her not to play you.

Liliet

You can legitimately trust her to have your interests in mind and not be out to screw you over out of pure malice, too.

Which is more than what Saint assumes.

ninegardens

Wait! Wait wait wait- new plan!

Plans?

A) Zombie up some forces. Leave them zombies to "Lose" the battle for you, and then run away.

B) (more likely, given foreshadowing). Kidnap/murderize a bunch of princes, and leave the enemy force intact. Thus solving the diplomatic dispute, while also leaving the enemy forces MOSTLY in tact.

C) Surrender. Lose now, with zero fatalities.

Surrender on conditions of being sent to the front lines to face the Hidden Horror.

Just declare yourselves prisoners of war. For gods sake, have they got ZERO rules about POW's?

Dainpdf

1. and 2. Interesting, though both run the risk of hero intervention in unfortunate ways. If only Malanza would condone necromancy for this (also, if such a working wouldn't leave Cat or her casters vulnerable and spend a prodigious amount of power)

3. Gotta remember any treaties regarding POWs with the Arch-Heretic of the East would be null and void. Plus, Cat doesn't necessarily want to have the Legions on the frontline against Neshamah.

Argentorum

Remember, Cat's only remaining clout on the political scale, beyond being in possession of an army, is that she has never lost a battle.

The forces of good don't respect her crown, they don't respect her words, they don't respect her treaties, or her nation, or her even her name.

All they respect, and indeed the only thing that won her the battle today by pulling up the Proceran horse short before they could route her legions, was that very fact, that on the field of battle, the Black Queen has always triumphed. Giving that away, even if she could know it would let her pull out the legions with no losses, with no betrayal, it would not be lightly done.

Knowing that she will take losses and she'll probably be betrayed as well? She would be selling her Kingdom for a bowl of pottage.

Agent J

C) would be a terrible idea. Aiding in the fight against the Dead King is her leverage to get the Accords signed. Spending that political capital just to get the Legions out isn't very smart.

ninegardens

Okay, so those planes don't work.
Fine.

But my point is this:

You have a LARGE number of lives on the line, neither side ACTUALLY wants this to happen, both sides Actually want a peace treaty and to fight Keter.

This is the perfect time to sit down for more than ten minutes and scheme things.

Could they do it via single combat?

Could they agree to LIE about their being a battle?

Could Cat point out that she has access to a proxy hellgate via Arcadia, and that she'd really rather not use it?

The stakes are too high. They are both giving up on negotiation too easily.

with the cost of diplomatic failure this high (for both parties), it seems like a good time to sit and chat for several HOURS, not several minutes.

Sylwoos

Actually, the problem is that one side doesn't want a peace treaty.

Cat and Malanza could sort thing out between themselves, but the Saint is out for blood and the Pilgrim want Cat removed from the board. Whatever scheme those two cook out, it will be unmade when the Pilgrim decide it is. And even if they get him on board with the plan making , he'll spend that time trying to kill Cat with story-fu or preparing the terrain for a knife in the back.

Liliet

That's not what Pilgrim's aim is.

RanVor

That's not what Pilgrim said his aim is. Funny thing about Pilgrim is that outside of the Peregrine extra chapter, nothing he does on screen actually furthers his stated goals.

Liliet

Well, he did stop Amadeus from burning down more of Procer, so there's that.

John

By burning down part of it himself, and even if that was a net gain he's probably more than canceled it out by drawing forces away from defense against the Dead King.

Liliet

Tariq did not draw any forces anywhere. Laurence's bullshit \neq Tariq's bullshit, he was literally in Laure playing hostage at the time the Arch-Heretic thing hit and forced him to cut his losses there.

As a matter of fact, Tariq somewhat freed up the forces chasing the Legions around. Admittedly they still didn't catch up with the Legions for a while, but they would have had Juniper not intervened.

And one fishing village / small town \neq an entire province full of them. Pure math says Tariq saved a lot more than he killed, in those provinces on the other side of the lake that Amadeus was aiming for next.

caoimhinh

Remember what Saint told Cordelia: this isn't about Procer, Praes, Callow nor any other country, this is about Good vs Evil. So earthly matters and politics cannot stop the Crusade.

Remember the reason Cordelia, Pilgrim, and Rozala had given to Cat for refusing peace treaties with her: Callow can't be allowed to have a Villain as Queen. They won't make deals with her and will not stop trying to defeat her. Also, the Levantines and the more militant side of Procer's church will not stop making up lies about Cat to antagonize her and push for her execution.

The number of lives that will be lost does not actually matter to the Crusaders, that's their hypocrisy (and I suspect part of the reason why Narrative is screwing them, as they are actually the bad guys in this situation), they are just appalled when the dead are on THEIR side, they don't care about how many die in Callow and Praes, they were in for the invasion and partition of lands but would accuse Cat of being a cruel monster for killing the Alliance soldiers. Even right now, as Cat offers to leave without a fight, Rozala is obliged to deny that because politically it would ruin Cordelia and destabilize the Grand Alliance.

I wonder why Catherine hasn't told them yet that she wants to fight against the Dead King, she probably wants to do it from a safe and strong position, but waiting longer is dangerous. Besides she is bound to fight against him, as that was the deal the Ever Dark made with the Kingdom Under.

My hypothesis of a way to solve this issue would be Cat being honest with them about her aim (Not the Liesse Accords, but the fighting against Keter) and tell them that she has the agreement of the Kingdom Under for it (telling them that she has the Dwarves' backing would be a stretch of the word, but it's not completely incorrect), which would make everyone in the Grand Alliance reconsider their stance on allying with Callow, given how powerful the Kingdom Under is and how much everyone in Calernia fears it.

Liliet

THE WEAPONS THING.

CAT REALLY NEEDS TO BRING UP THE WEAPONS THING.

Mental Mouse

Proxy hellgate is right out, remember Cat is pushing the Liesse Accords. No devils, much less demons. Single combat would have the usual problem, which is the loser not abiding by it. "Lets not and say we did" is amusing, but probably impractical.

I think there will be at least the start of a battle. The thing is, Cat's human troops are enough to put up a real fight on their own. But if she can hold out until nightfall, the Drow will more or less own the field, pending a tussle between the heroes and Cat with her Well and staff. She may even be able to just bypass the enemy troops "under cover of Night", so to speak.

Someguy

Unfortunately this is the Princes Graveyard and not the Pilgrim's Graveyard (that would be the village that he plagued to extinction).

With the collapse of Procer as a nation, too bad it would not be feasible to re-direct the Praesi refugees into the land formerly known as Procer so they can rebuild their homes in "New Colonies"

ahd

I wonder what happened to the fae.

Did they get ingested, or did they flee?

Dainpdf

They cut off the piece of their land with Masego in it, or he did.

Decius

If Masego cut a piece of Arcadia off, it would be the piece that he wasn't in.

Liliet

Depends on what he wanted it for.

Dainpdf

Why? He might have wanted to isolate it for some purpose.

Sylwoos

Why? I bet he's in Arcadia in the first place because he can open hell gate without affecting the real world. Having a private piece of Arcadia that he can stretch to its limit without the risk of destroying ALL Arcadia would be even better.

Negotiations have failed again, fun times. Saint gets to gasp for the breath with which to stab evil with for another chapter, also fun. The knives have come out in the end, which is always going to be fun. Cat hasn't been stabbed yet, which is- fun.

Soo~ I'm no mathematician, but if my calculations are correct than we'll soon have one spare body freshly traded and one spare the next course of action seems obvious

caoimhinh

Putting Akua inside Amadeus' body is out of the question, both due to it being of no real use (as Akua doesn't need that) and because profaning his body would not be something either Cat nor Grem would do or tolerate.

On the other hand, I remember Cat's first words to the Saint of Swords, when they were fighting and Cat was in Winter mode: "Saint of Swords. You will make very useful artifacts." Let's hope after the next battle Cat gets her hands on her, since leaving the corpse behind will only let the Pilgrim Forgive her back to life.

Winter-Cat was collecting heroes at one point (book 4 prolog) and we haven't seen anything come of it.

caoimhinh

That's because Cat holding Fae title is in her right mind, but when she is actively unleashing the power of Winter she has Principle Alienation, which twists her mind into the arrogant and story-bound Sovereign of Moonless Nights. She faced multiple heroes and simply killed them, it's only when she is full on Winter mode that she starts to think, speak, and act in a different manner.

AdrianGrey

God, that bit when Andronike spoke to Malanza was so goddamn satisfying. Just imagine how that must have looked from the receiving end.

antoninjohn

Procer has a reputation for betrayal and that don't even consider it betrayal if it's the Arch Heretic of the East

Nice chapter.

Procer's side being hypocrites making demands and acting self-righteous as always, nothing surprising there. I hope Catherine tells them soon about her intentions of fighting North against the Dead King; because from the Grand Alliance's POV she just wants to get away and leave them to deal with that mess, and in that condition they can't really allow her to have fresh and rested armies while the Grand Alliance's forces are dying up north.

Waiting for longer will only lead to conflict; she doesn't have to negotiate with them now, but at least tell them clearly that she wants to fight against Keter (of course, not tell them that she is bound to do it). They might not believe her, and there might be nothing change now, but she needs to make her intentions clear. Actual negotiations with Cordelia and the rest of the leaders can wait until later (I get that Cat wants them to need her and be desperate before extending her offer, but waiting too long to at least let them know her intention is quite risky too).

I wonder if Amadeus will really be unconscious, since we have seen that people can extract their souls and still walk around without issue, but that might be because it was done willingly and with measures taken for the body to operate without the soul, and the Saint likely wouldn't do any of that for him. Then again, it might happen that he is able to awake and move his body while his soul is held prisoner (they expected to make a public execution, after all).

I'm looking forward to next chapter and the Extra Chapter on Monday.

Rozala has good reasons for acting like she does, and is acting in good faith here. She's at the point of actually putting trust in Catherine and asking her for favors, because she assumes her to be trustworthy enough for it.

Unfortunately, that's not enough 😡

And I hear you on the 'unconscious body' part 😊 a public execution is hardly fun with a soulless husk, isn't it?

caoimhinh

Yeah, Rozala wants to make a deal but lacks the power to enforce it, whereas Pilgrim has the power to do it but doesn't want to and has already stated that "greater needs and keener calls" can make him go back on his words. And there's no higher call for a Hero than defeating a Villain, so Cat can't trust him with holding his end of the bargain (I think an oath could work, but that Arch-heretic thing supposedly makes them null so I'm not sure, and submitting the Pilgrim to such binding would not be allowed politically so it's unlikely to happen), not to mention that there are other heroes who would not be bound by a promise made by him.

Liliet

I don't think we know that he doesn't want to. It's Cat's assumption, and I suspect she's wrong about that – based, if nothing else, on him keeping Black's body alive and being willing to return it.

RanVor

He specifically said he kept Black's body for public execution later on. That's hardly a sign of goodwill.

Liliet

"Later on" is very telling here imho. It's as far as he can go without breaking faith with his own side.

RanVor

"Later on" pretty clearly means "after the Black Queen has been dealt with" here.

Liliet

Yeah.

Why?

RanVor

I should be asking you why you claim an obvious thing is not obvious.

Liliet

Why is Amadeus not dead yet? Why are they putting it off until after they deal with the Black Queen, too?

RanVor

Because the Black Queen is a present threat and Amadeus is not. It's that simple.

Liliet

And that gets in the way of a public execution because?...

RanVor

That's so fucking obvious the only explanation of you not understanding it I can think of is wilful ignorance.

SAINT AND PILGRIM ARE ON THEIR WAY TO SALIA.
THERE'S EVIL TO VIOLENTLY MURDER IN VICINITY.
SAINT GOES SMASH. PILGRIM GOES WITH HER, FIGURING THEY CAN DELIVER THE BODY TO SALIA LATER. IT'S THAT FUCKING SIMPLE.

Liliet

Alright, I do see your explanation. That's one possibility, though it's not as obvious as you think – 'there's evil to violently murder in vicinity' does not strike me as something to stop them from executing their plan, especially when it brings Black's body which they have plans for closer to the people who will very much want it back.

RanVor

Take a look at Laurence and think again.

Liliet

She's not in charge of the party and can't order them around.

RanVor

She's not the only one in charge of the party. She doesn't have to order anybody around, just giving Tariq no reason to stop her is enough.

Liliet

Tariq had good reason to not want Black's body around where Cat is, assuming no goodwill there which is precisely what I'm pointing at.

Javvies

Amadeus/his body represent a source of leverage against Cat, the Legions, and the Army of Callow. One that mostly got wasted by Laurence.

Consider, what might have happened if Pilgrim didn't have leverage on Cat, and Cat did more or less the same thing – Laurence would either be dead or a huge bargaining chip against the Alliance armies, arguably one large enough to force them into allowing Cat to take the Legions with her unhindered.

Admittedly, since Cat won't be getting Amadeus's soul back right now, Laurence hasn't totally wasted the effort of capturing Amadeus. But still ... the Alliance could gotten something out of holding Amadeus, even if it was only deterrence against being pushed too hard – no way to guarantee the Army/Legions could have gotten to and secured Amadeus's body before the Alliance/Heroes slit his throat or something.

Liliet

"arguably one large enough to force them into allowing Cat to take the Legions with her unhindered."

Arguably indeed. I'd argue against that.

Javvies

So your position is that the Alliance would sacrifice Saint – one of the few Heroes realistically capable of fighting, even killing, the Dead King, per Pilgrim here – just to prevent Cat from getting the Legions and Army of Callow out of Procer without more casualties?

I don't know about that.

Malanza and the Proceran contingent's leadership would likely consider it a good enough reason to give them cover to do what they'd really rather prefer to do anyways.

And unless Pilgrim is lying about Saint's value here, which I suppose we should not completely discount as a possibility, he'd probably want to lean on the Levantines to not get in the way of getting Saint back.

Liliet

I guess?

You're not wrong, we're just into hypotheticals theory by now.

My point was just that as Amadeus had remarked back then, Tariq's plan is oddly bad the way it's presented. If a clever opponent makes an obvious mistake...

Mental Mouse

My guess is that they didn't kill Amadeus precisely because somebody back there had the brains to realize that killing him would be a really good way to put the Black Queen (that is, Catherine the Undefeated), into a killing rage, and maybe give her a limit break to boot. (You know, like Masego reacted to the death of his fathers.) They might not get time to explain that they've got his soul on ice.

RanVor

They fucking told everybody why they didn't kill Amadeus. What is so difficult to understand in that?

medailyfun

Cordelia felt completely OK to just show the body, without any public executions

Liliet

True.

Which bring us to another excellent question: why IS Black's body still alive?

caoimhinh

Because they were going to send his body to Procer's capital where it can be publicly executed, thus giving Cordelia a political victory and a boost to the Grand Alliance, while still secretly having the Soul in possession so they could use it as leverage over the Evil side (A.K.A Malicia and Catherine).

It wasn't Cordelia's decision, but Pilgrim's decision. The First Prince wanted Black completely dead immediately, Pilgrim is the one doing things behind her back.

Liliet

And they didn't send the body there already because?...

caoimhinh

It might be lack of time or simply because the situation escalated to the point they had to turn around and intervene, Pilgrim might have received whispers of the Choir of Mercy which led him to stay in Iserre.

They captured Amadeus about half a year ago, right? But crossing Procer takes months, and the Army of Callow has been in Iserre for about 2 months, so I would say the Heroes turned around and came back to Iserre (or never left).

Liliet

Half a year?

Wasn't it already autumn when they did?

I'm so confused wrt this timeline.

caoimhinh

I'm not exactly sure about the time, given that it hasn't been specified. But Cat was in the Ever Dark for about a year and five months had passed and Amadeus was still raiding Procer, so I think he was defeated around eight to 3 months ago, so half a year seemed a good stimation to me.

We might need to go back and check the chapters again to make sure.

Still, if it was Autumn when Amadeus was captured and now it's Winter, then it's less than 3 months and there would be not enough time to take Amadeus to Procer's capital.

Liliet

No, she wasn't in Everdark for a year. The previous winter was the one she spent playing whack-a-mole with the heroes, the entire Book 4 happened over the course of a little less than a year.

I agree that it wouldn't be enough time to take Amadeus to Salia. I just question...

...okay first of all why did Pilgrim take his sweet time actually going through on the soul cutting plan. Why was there a period of time when Amadeus was simply bound? Why did the events in the Epilogue happen?

The best non-Tariq-suspicious guess at the time had been "because they need tools/laboratory for it that are waiting for them in Salia".

Evidently not.

So, ??? Why has Tariq been procrastinating on every part of this plan?

caoimhinh

Hmm, perhaps it was a compromise with Cordelia's need to exhibit a victory (since Pilgrim has shown concern about keeping her at the head of Procer), his initial plan might have been to have Amadeus in body and soul prisoner but changed his mind to enable the public execution to happen. Thus the separation of his soul recently.

Liliet

At the very least, his position is not as extreme as Cat and half the readership believe -_-

And Bard said that the separation of body and soul was the plan back then already. I guess it's possible he had -just- changed his mind on that when she came 😊

sengachi

I'd guess that the Pilgrim is more frightened of what story might come of trying to (or succeeding in) killing Black while Cat is alive and in play than he is of Black getting successfully rescued.

That or he's more aware of internal Praesi politics than he lets on and he's keeping Black in reserve as a "trigger a Praesi civil war so they don't backstab us while we're fighting the Dead King" button.

Those are the obvious ones to me, but I'm guessing the real truth is something we don't have the information to guess at yet.

NZPIEFACE

Sure, but he doesn't also realize that blackmail usually doesn't work for the good guys.

sengachi

I don't think he's going for blackmail. In fact he's probably deeply aware of just how bad of a storyline that is to back himself into. I think he's just trying to keep Black out of play as long as possible without triggering a mentor's death narrative. He's not keeping Black around as a piece to play against Cat, he's just trying to not trigger a "revenge for my mentor" plot from Cat.

caoimhinh

Yep, shaping the story into "putting criminal in jail / punishing the bad guy" rather than making it "this is a hostage".

Liliet

Cat has told him with full conviction, which he sensed, that Black would be a reasonable and peaceful and agreeable ruler to Praes.

Mental Mouse

Bigger typos:

treatises -> treaties (!) They may have been making history, but they weren't writing the history books on the spot!

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Hot damn, this was a bad round for Tariq. Moral authority badly damaged.

konstantinvoncarstein

For me, it is completely gone

RanVor

I've been considering him full of shit since his last chat with Catherine before Keter, but the sight of people losing faith in him warms my heart.

werafdsaew

I don't understand this line; what is this about?

caoimhinh

The trauma Rozala (and the others who have fought the Dead King's army) are experiencing after the battles in the North. They have Post-traumatic Stress Disorder, and Andronike was mocking her for it since Rozala is an enemy still bent on opposing Cat and Sve Noc while in the goddesses' eye the princess is only a brittle mortal on the verge of mental collapse pretending that she can stand against them. Sve Noc has no mercy for an enemy, if at all.

RanVor

I mean, she's an Evil goddess, of course she has no mercy.

Micke

I think it more likely refers to what the Bard is doing to get the divine game back on track.

Caerulea

I don't believe so. Because the next thing that she says is "It will take more than brandy and poppy leaves for the digging to stop," the goddess on my shoulder laughed. "Hands and picks and tireless flesh, pulling aside the –" which is quite clearly referring to the war against Keter.

Mental Mouse

That still leaves the "adjustment" comment as a Creeeepy Hint From The Dark Power In The Room.

caoimhinh

Sve Noc practically told Rozala that she is Going Mad At The Revelation that there are great powers on the Evil side.

"your learning is shallow, Rozala Malanza, while this world's roots run deep. It will be amusing, to see how little of you the adjustment allows to remain."
Adjustment to what? To the learning of the deeper truths of the world, the old monsters of eldritch power that lurk in the dark. Facing those powers that went beyond her nightmares is something that has changed her and all others who were up there, their traumas manifesting in different ways.

Mental Mouse

Possibly to do with their own long-term plans, or with something she read out of the mortal's mind. Or maybe just messing with her head.

Aotrs Commander

The more I see of Tariq, the more I find him utterly repugant.

Qwormuli

Don't say that, or you'll have Liliet defending him and every action of his from your heinous assault (seriously, no offence meant against him/her, but there isn't one comment about him where he/she hasn't appeared in an attempt to make him into an unsung hero.) Not even suicide vests on unwitting civilians are bad with him on the wheel!

konstantinvoncarstein

Personally, before this chapter I was fond of him. He was of course no perfect et committed horrible actions, but at least he was a genuinely good and decent man, interested in peace. His refusal of Catherine's proposition was comprehensible. But here he goes way too far. When you outright say you will not hold your promises, speaking with you is like speaking with wolf: nothing can prove he will suddenly open your throat.

caoimhinh

Well, Tariq is being indirect about it, but he is simply admitting what we already knew: he is a servant of the Heavens, so his promises, beliefs, and oaths will not hold in the face of higher calling. He is bound to the Choir of Mercy, so the moment their whispers come he HAS to obey, it's pointless to be angry about it, it's not that he is simply being an untrustworthy person, it's just that he has something above his promises, same as a soldier has to obey his superior officers regardless of their own opinions or desires. The same would be true to Hanno, who has outright stated that he keeps his opinions to himself and doesn't base his actions on such but on the commands of the Choir of Judgement, if Hanno wants to go right but the Seraphim say to go left then he WILL go left, regardless of promises or common sense, he will obey. Frustrating as it is, it is still understandable.

Tariq is a decent person most of the time, and a good man who likes to help and heal people (as you have said), but that doesn't mean that he can't kill and be ruthless, just as most of Cat's group are hardened killers but loyal and really likable people to their friends.

What I personally dislike about Tariq is his hypocrisy and attitude of "I am correct and know more than you" when it's clear already that they are the ones in the wrong. Like Cat has said before, an invading force has no right to complain and cry about how evil its enemy is for killing them. He has reasons why he does things (political and otherwise), but I abhor his way of trying to pass it all as "it's for good" and pretend everyone else's reasons are naive and wrong.

NZPIEFACE

I honestly appreciate the simplicity of Hanno. Rather than moral platitudes or rampant hypocrisy, all he does is flip a coin.

Liliet

>He is bound to the Choir of Mercy, so the moment their whispers come he HAS to obey

Where are you getting this?

caoimhinh

Nothing we have seen so far indicates that a Hero can disobey the commands of the Choir they are sworn to, and we also know that Angels don't take kindly to defiance. A hero sworn to a Choir obeys the Angels of that Choir, that's obvious.

We know for a fact that neither William nor Hanno would disobey, what makes you think Pilgrim would? The only time we saw him try to ignore them for a short while, the whispers grew insistent and his lover told him to go (he would have gone anyways, but he simply wanted a bit more time to rest with her, yet the Angels wanted him to move immediately).

There is a reason the Heroes are sworn to those Choirs, and it is not to disobey them.

Liliet

>Nothing we have seen so far indicates that a Hero can disobey the commands of the Choir they are sworn to, and we also know that Angels don't take kindly to defiance. A hero sworn to a Choir obeys the Angels of that Choir, that's obvious.

It's not obvious to me that angels give commands in the first place.

Tariq has said it himself, that the Choir of Mercy just happen to agree with him – and when for a while they didn't, they just went quiet.

William never actually got any guidance from his Choir beyond the initial push.

Hanno gets yes/no answers to questions he has to actively ask.

I don't think angels have commands to give. In caring about nothing but their chosen virtue, they don't actually have opinions on anything happening in Creation except filtered through their champions.

Choirs present themselves to each of their heroes as what that hero expects them to be.

Note, again, the curious case of Hanno and Judgement, and how the angels confirmed for Hanno his point of view on "mortals cannot judge" even though that is not how heroes of Judgement have historically worked.

caoimhinh

Actually, I remembered something. You might be right that they aren't exactly forced to obey.

What I remembered is that they are brainwashed in different ways, so that they aren't forced to obey but are led to believe that the Angels' words are the most optimal course of action.

William said that "they never force anyone, they just show you things and you accept on your own accord" or something along those lines.

Contrition showed William all his sins, to the point that he turned into a repentant trying to do the right thing before his death.

Judgement showed Hanno that they had a broader scope of vision and thus their decisions were better than anything a mortal could do since the Angels had access to much more information.

Mercy guided Pilgrim with whispers that took him to places he could do more good, and he grew dependant on them, trusting them that their whispers are the correct choice.

Still, my point remains the same, if the Angels speak the Heroes obey.

Liliet

William was already wandering in the woods broken-hearted and hating himself, the angels just gave him a push to actually do something about it.

Hanno was already confused about justice and determined to find something better than mortal judgement, the angels just gave him reassurance that that better does exist and he can act on it.

Tariq has literally commented that the Choir of Mercy is with him as long as and to the degree that his mindset aligns with theirs.

And my point is not that it wouldn't work like you're saying. The Angels could give their heroes orders that the heroes would then obey. I bet if the Choir of Contrition descended into Callow and informed Willlliam that leading an army and a band of Named was a fool's affair for him and he should stick to what he's good at – lonely terrorism – he would have listened.

But they didn't and they don't.

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't care that he is ruthless, everyone in the story is too 😊 But like you say, his hypocrisy is upsetting. The other problem is that he state that he will not respect his promesses if the Angels say so, but expects everyone else to hold to theirs, and he find appalling when they break them. And he has the gall to accuse the other side of villainous treachery.

RandomFan

Everyone else likes to hate him too much, though. Yes, the Grey Pilgrim is an old monster, as much and as deep an anti-hero as any- but he's no more monstrous than Black. He's not good. But he's no Diabolist.

By now, we should know that Good is as willing to dabble in evil as the reverse, so.

caoimhinh

Actually, in one of the Peregrine Extra Chapters (I think it was on the third) Liliét and I discussed because Tariq's actions made sense to me and not to Liliét. So she hasn't always defended Pilgrim's every action.

Nevertheless, remember that each of us has a different impression of the characters, even if the narrative may present them in a certain light, and each reader likes and dislikes certain aspects of the characters, so of course our opinions vary.

Liliét

Oooh, yes, I am definitely operating on the purity culture principle that if someone is good then every single thing they've done must be good also. That's exactly my argument, good reading comprehension there.

Also lmao @ unsung hero, given that a hero is literally what he famously is. For his deeds. Like, things he's actually done over his lifetime, which is very long.

nimelennar

Two thoughts:

Cat has to be careful: the general who wins every battle, but loses the war, is a well-worn trope.

And, didn't she lose already lose the final battle against Sve Nice, pretty definitively, on every level? Yes, she still got her alliance, but only after she, Archer, and her entire drow army were defeated.

Liliet

Politics are about perception, not actual facts. Like 10 people know about that defeat, all of them Catherine's inner circle – considering that from the point of view of drow Catherine accomplished exactly what she said she was going to accomplish: get Sve Noc's attention and help.

Qwormuli

True. Not to mention that those battles didn't include a single callowan casualty. "I went to a battle and lost most of the troops I conscripted along the way" just doesn't have the same sting.

Liliet

Yup XD

John

Any battle where you've got more and better troops under your command at the end than you did at the start, most people would call a win. Didn't technically retain control of the field, but she wasn't interested in territorial expansion anyway, and managed to secure favorable trade terms with the folks who were. Not bad at all for a few months' work.

caoimhinh

"I, my hot friend, and the ghost of my fallen nemesis entered a cave. We came out a few months later with my humanity restored plus new superpowers, a pair of goddesses on my shoulders, an army of hundreds of thousands genetically enhanced and magic-powered supersoldiers, 50 thousand of which are marching with me right now, and a trade deal with the most powerful nation of the continent that also cuts their weapons supply to any enemy nation. Also, my hot friend is now my friend with benefits. I think I'll count it all as a win, thanks."

Enjou

Alright, so Cat knows that if she doesn't lose this coming battle that bad things will happen for Procer and she doesn't really want that due to the Dead King situation. On the other hand, losing puts her in a bad position politically, so she can't just allow herself to lose, especially since she can't trust the other side to keep to a bargain to minimize her losses.

IMO what she needs to do is lose while still winning. Say she loses the battle... but kills the Saint of Swords. And it's a good time for it, too. Narratively, the Saint has made herself villainous by trying to kill Cat under a truce banner, and she's madder than a bag of wet cats that she was humiliated like that, practically guaranteeing that she'll make a beeline for Cat. The Pilgrim's heroic cred has also been damaged due to the oathbreaking being pointed out. Cat's prepared something to neutralize the Pilgrim without killing him, and she's got her staff which is specially prepared to kill Saint. So she activates her trap cards, and ends the Saint of Swords.

End result? If she hasn't lost the military battle too badly, she's simply been forced to retreat. Her forces aren't happy about that, but the scary boss lady warlord is still the scary boss lady warlord because she killed the big name Saint of Swords, which is an achievement large enough to make the stain of a military loss something they can ignore. Procer gets to claim a Pyrrhic victory over the forces of evil, and losing the Saint gives them legitimate enough reason not to pursue the retreating Army of Callow and Legions of Terror.

It seems nonetheless a little risky.

I hope that Saint will die in the oncoming battle, and that it will happen at night. I can't wait to see Mighties at full force take the field! 😊

caoimhinh

That is a possible outcome for the coming battle, but the thing is that it can't be a planned thing agreed on both sides, but a natural result of their forces clashing for real.

magesbe

I think the best outcome for Cat is to win but not damage the enemy army more than she needs to in the process. It's one thing for angry commoners to hear that their Lords let the ones who hurt them escape. It's harder to justify rebellion when they tried to avenge the commoners but failed.

konstantinvoncarstein

Or their failure could ignite the rage of the commoners

matesbe

I mean it's possible. But much less likely. And by this reasoning they might get mad that the Legions were allowed to retreat at all. There comes a point where you need to take the risk.

caoimhinh

Commoners had never been of importance in Procer's politics. It's the Princes and Princesses that rule different principalities (especially the ones affected by the Legions of Terror's march) that are the determining factor, since they can switch alliances and take their support off Cordelia and back another Prince instead, which would then unseat her and there would be a new First Prince of Procer. That has always been the issue in each of Procer's army's actions during this Crusade and the thing that has led Cordelia's movements (at least until the Dead King started invading and she had to make moves to ensure sheer survival).

Maginot

I thought Black had escaped? With the Wandering Bard assisting him, even bargaining on behalf of the Gods Below with him. There is more to this than there appears.

matesbe

Not necessarily. The Wandering Bard wasn't going to directly help him, she just had a chat with him. And apparently Amadeus decided against trying to escape himself, possibly because he learned Bard has plans for him.

So, three kingdoms are tangled up in the Bard's plan to destroy at least two of them (and Levant should be nervous), while the Dead King attacks, Malicia plots, and Masego does we know not what (except it involves hellgates and completely trashing a chunk of Arcadia).

And if my calculations are correct, we should be getting an extra chapter on Monday... 😊

SpeckofStardust

3 things.

1. Pilgrim has lost points because-

- a. He broke his goddam agreement with cat
- b. his agreement as an observer was in fact as a hostage.
(Telling us otherwise was a asshole thing to do by the way)

2. Pilgrim has gained a point by openly telling cat that she cant trust him

- a. it means he isn't aiming to betray her
- b. it makes it easy to blame him for what happens next

3. There was never going to be a deal here even if Pilgrim wasn't here, Proctor has no choice at this point to not engage in a fight, There was never a way for these peace talks to work and us viewers need to remember that before blaming Pilgrim for it.

matesbe

I don't think most people are thinking that Pilgrim is at fault for the situation, they're just saying that Cat can't trust him to keep his word and since his word would lead half of her opposing forces to do whatever he asked... yeah.

konstantinvoncarstein

Of course Pilgrim is not to blame for the intransigence of the Proceran. What he is to blame is that it is impossible to trust him in any way. And that he is an hypocrite, who expects everyone to respect standards he will not hold to.

sengachi

Telling someone "you can't trust me" is, at best, a neutral point. You're not professing false sincerity and then stabbing them in the back so you're not actively losing points, but like, you're telling them you can't be trusted because you are untrustworthy. That's not something which should earn points. You earn points for being trustworthy.

bissek

An insult that Catherine could have used in the debate over Grey Pilgrim's actions.

"Did you know that Warlock is an old word meaning Oathbreaker? You broke your oath, Grey Pilgrim, right around the time the last Warlock died. Was that a declaration of intent to change Names?"

Chapter 28: Acts

"Despise not the treacherous but instead the weak, for while both serve the same purpose where treachery requires skill and daring weakness requires only mediocrity."

– Dread Emperor Vile the First

It didn't look like he was sleeping.

That disturbed me almost more than the rest. Amadeus of the Green Stretch was still alive, by the measure of most people. The signs of life were certainly there: breath, heartbeat, warmth. So it should have looked like he was sleeping, but it didn't. It looked like someone had just... torn out his consciousness and a body had been left behind. Its physical functions went on but having known the man – loved him, in our own misshapen way – I couldn't call this breathing corpse anything but the remains of him. His soul could be anywhere, by now, and combing through Procer for it brought to mind that old metaphor about the needle and the haystack.

In this case, though, the needle was a top-notch Named mage and the haystack was both hostile and on fire. I'd tell Vivienne to have the Jacks watching, and I was considering passing on what I'd learned to Malicia. She was my enemy, true, and he'd both defied and disobeyed her. Yet I suspected she'd sacrifice quite a bit to bring back to Ater and might even be willing to cooperate with me to see his soul snatched back from the heroes. I only barely grasped the nature of the ties that bound Black and Malicia, but I did not doubt the depth of them. Neither would have been quite so intensely furious at the other after Akua's Folly if there'd not been trust to break.

Was it not an irony of sorts that I was now relying on the architect of that same folly for answers? The shade of the Diabolist had only bothered with a cursory examination of Black's physical state before turning her attention to more eldritch matters. She was a healer of some talent, I knew, but it was more a result of Akua being skilled at branches of sorcery that required knowledge of anatomy and biology than out of any true affinity for the healing arts. Like Masego, she was more surgeon than physician. It was typical of Praesi to be more interested in the cutting of things than the mending of them. Fingers resting on my teacher's forehead, Akua was frowning with her eyes closed.

I could feel the quiet lapping of Night at his body, and perhaps I should have been studying her methods to learn from them what I could. Instead, though, my gaze remain on his face. He was bearded, now. It was uncomfortable to look at, though more for the sloppiness of the growth than the threads of grey within. Black had always been cleanly to a fault, austere in all his affairs but always well put-together. His hair was still dark, for the most part, but it'd grown longer and like the beard grey was now touching it. It was... distressing to see. Like a chip on a blade you'd believed forever smooth.

"Barbaric," Akua suddenly said, both hand and Night withdrawing.

Golden eyes had fluttered open, and she was looking down at Black's body with patrician disdain.

"Elaborate," I said.

"This was not even sorcery, dearest," Akua said, wrinkling her nose. "The work of that ignorant little savage the Saint of Swords, I would wager. It was the metaphysical equivalent of attempting field surgery while eyeballing the affair with a two-handed sword that was most definitely not cleaned beforehand."

"Elaborate usefully," I specified, hiding my dismay.

The body was alive, for all the lack of driving intellect within, but had it been damaged irreparably? I was intending to snatch the soul back when opportunity arose, to put it back in this very shell of flesh, but if that wasn't possible we'd have to get... inventive.

"The severing between body and soul itself was clean and sharply made," Akua said. "But near every other aspect was botched. It was done too abruptly, for one, and so in a damaging manner. Which means there will be some disconnect between the soul and body even should they be reunited, possibly permanent. Memory loss is likely as well, though proper rituals can mitigate that aspect and it is likely to be minor in nature."

"Shit," I muttered. "Masego cut up my soul a bunch of times and it was never this bad. Why is this so different?"

The look she sent me was offended on Masego's behalf, I thought, but also on hers and possibly even mine for having asked what she evidently considered to be a highly plebeian question.

"Laurence the Montfort is a murderous vagrant swinging a butcher's knife at matters she only dimly understands," Akua said. "The Hierophant was taught by the Lord Warlock himself from the cradle, and even in those days likely could be counted as one of the ten most learned Trismegistan practitioners on Calernia. You are comparing a mangy attack hound to one of the finest mages alive."

"That's nice," I said. "But what I want to know is if the Saint purposefully made this sloppy or if it was just the only way she knew how to do it?"

Diabolist mulled over that for a moment.

"Though I hate to dismiss the possibility of incompetent wickedness in our opposition," she finally said, "I believe this might genuinely have been the most clear-cut separation she could accomplish given the means at her disposal."

So, the Saint had been a bad surgeon but not necessarily a malicious one. I supposed the distinction had been academic, anyway. I would have remembered malice directed at my father when he was helpless and prisoner, but in and of itself it would not have moved me to either kill or spare her. That decision, in a way, would be making itself. If the Saint acted against me or mine even one more time, I'd get her head on a pike. If she was reined in by her allies, then I'd swallow my spite and let her be pointed at the Dead King instead.

"Noted," I said. "Which brings us to our next trick – can you track the soul using his body?"

"I cannot," Akua immediately replied.

My eyebrow rose.

"The reasons why are twofold," she told me. "The first is that, as I've already told you, the severing itself was keenly made. The... sympathy between body and soul that would remain in most circumstances is near entirely absent here."

"Near," I said.

She inclined her head, conceding the point.

"Which brings me to the second reason, namely that I've already attempted to do this and found my workings frustrated," Akua said. "Someone is occluding the soul from sight and search, and doing so with surprising skill."

"The Pilgrim mentioned he passed on the soul to the Rogue Sorcerer," I said. "Who I sadly know little about, save that he often uses fire sorcery when fighting."

"Given that the workings on his end were surprisingly apt at gainsaying Night and its miraculous nature, I would wager her him Proceran or Proceran-taught," she told me. "Jaquinite sorcery would be uniquely suited to the thwarting of the miraculous, being inspired of miracles itself."

My lips quirked into a mirthless smile. What a helpful coincidence that a Named mage from the theory of magic most suited at hiding from my means of pursuit would be sent off with what I was looking before I even returned to the surface. Fucking Heavens. It might genuinely have been a coincidence, for all I knew, but given the opposition I was inclined to gesture obscenely at the sky just on principle.

"So what can you do?" I asked.

"Establish a ritual array for resonance," Akua said. "It will be imprecise and require a great deal of power, but when employed the ritual should reveal if the soul is close."

"Define close," I said.

"A radius of seven leagues," she said. "Though that broad it will simply reveal if the soul is within that area. For more precise results, the radius would have to be significantly lowered."

Seven leagues, I thought, forcing myself to visualize it. It wasn't nothing, though I would have preferred larger if there was to be an investment of Night in every attempt. The haystack had been made into smaller bundles, I supposed, but it'd not gotten smaller in any real sense.

"Prepare the ritual array and make me an estimate of the kind of power it'd require," I finally said. "When you have the time, Akua. This is not as high a priority as our immediate threats."

It surprised me that even looking at Black the words were not difficult to speak. I'd thought, I supposed, that looking at him in the flesh there would be a sudden sprout of sentimentality that'd have me hesitating between taking risks to pursue this and taking a more pragmatic approach. I cocked my head to the side, gazing at the pale skin of my teacher, and found that aside from a faint tinge of guilt the decision hadn't brought anything out of me. And the guilt, truth be told, came more from how the decision had barely needed to me made than from the making of it. But then you'd understand, wouldn't you? I thought, looking at the not-sleeping man. That there are larger things at stake than you and I.

"You seem wistful," Akua softly said.

"I don't know what that means," I lied, "you don't need to impress me with your fancy Wasteland words, Akua, I-"

"Playing the fool did not work even when I considered you to be one," the shade said. "Why would it now?"

I shrugged my shoulders, as if to say it'd been worth a try. I could have simply left the tent, I thought, but that would have felt too much like a retreat and I'd had enough of that for the evening. After my private talks with Princess Rozala had made it clear there was no real chance of an accord being reached, I'd simply waited until Black's body was delivered to my people before taking my leave. My warning to her had been blunt, but then we were rather past subtle intrigues weren't we? The day and night had been exhausting in a way that had nothing to do with the physical, and seeing Black with a gaping hole where everything that made him who he was should be hadn't helped my mood in the slightest.

"You must hate him like poison," I eventually said. "Are you remaining civil as a courtesy to me?"

I didn't like to think of Second Liesse – or the Doom of the same, as some called it, though my own people most often named it Akua's Folly – but on that dark day I'd been allowed a glimpse into the nature of Akua Sahelian. Not through the madness she'd wielded like a blade, or the the victories she claimed over me, but when I had seen her flinched. She had bound me, title and Name both, and the binding could not lie: when Akua saw her father die before her eyes, it had wounded her. The body of the architect of that death now laid on a cot before us, yet not so much as a flicker of hatred had touched her face in all the time she'd been in the tent.

"Hate," Akua repeated, tone pensive. "I can see why you would believe so."

I glanced at her and found golden eyes watching the Carrion Lord's chest rise and drop at its own steady pace.

"Are you claiming you don't?" I asked.

"I suppose I might kill him, given reason," the shade said. "Though that would differ from duty only by the tinge of satisfaction that it would bring, like an old mistake finally blotted out."

"I was there, Akua," I said. "I know what it did to you, when-"

She turned to me with burning eyes, and my tongue halted.

"My father's death was the writ of many hands," she said. "His, it is true, but others as well. The goblins who fired the crossbows. Your own, for serving as distraction while he was taken. But most of all, the fault is mine."

She looked away.

"I waged war on villains, and did not sufficiently safeguard that which was precious to me," Akua said. "I am the mother of that murder in every way that matters."

"There's sense to that," I replied. "Logic, even."

My eyes stayed on her.

"And not a trace of the grief I saw then," I finished.

She turned to meet my gaze, and for once there was anger not mastered or leashed in the cast of her face.

"What is it you want from me, Catherine?" the shade asked bitingly. "Tears? Lamentations? Or is it pain that you demand?"

"Yes," I said. "I want you to be in pain."

She flinched back at that like I'd slapped her. Before a heartbeat had even passed, she was smiling and amused and her body beginning to angle so it would display her curves more prominently. I admired how well she'd been trained almost half as much as I utterly despised it.

"While I've certainly heard you prefer the rougher forms, I—"

Her tone was light, suggestive, there was a slight emphasis on heard that implied she might actually have heard Archer and I spending a night together — which was possible, tents weren't exactly the finest way to keep something quiet — and she'd changed tack blindingly quick. I ignored it.

"If you're in pain," I continued, "if you can feel pain, I means you value things. People. That you begin to understand things other than yourself have value."

"I have always known that," Akua said. "Your take on Praesi values, my heart, remains simplistic for all that we have spoken of the subject."

"Intellectually you assign value to other people," I corrected. "For their usefulness, potential, the pleasure or amusement they can bring you. But that's still thinking of them as assets. As objects. But if their loss pains you, Akua, they were more than an object to you."

"Should I weep, then?" the shade harshly replied. "Should I wail and beat my chest, swear revenge on all those who can be revenged upon? Should I burn half the world to assuage my grief, make Creation pay the long price?"

The Callowan term she spoke derisively, but I could hear it was forced. It had screwed my countrymen, over the years, the need to see grudges settled. But it also appealed to that vicious, childish part of us that wanted to answer pain with pain. Hurt those who'd hurt you. And anyone who'd ever grieved had heard that song, sung to one beat or another.

"Would you like to?" I asked her softly. "Weep. Wail. Bury him with no honours of mine, but what you can offer from daughter to father."

"And what would you know of that, Catherine?" Akua said, sounding tired.

My eyes flicked back to the body laid out in front of us.

"I know," I said, "that sometimes you grieve more what could have happened than what did."

Akua did not answer. The silence hung heavy in the air, broken by only two people breathing. The shade among us had no such need.

"He shouldn't have been born in Praes," Akua said. "He'd be angry with me for saying that, but anywhere else on the continent they would have let him read in peace and deep down that was all he ever wanted. But in the Wasteland, when the Gift flowers so strongly there are expectations."

"He was powerful, I'm told," I said. "Like few others."

"Like many others," Akua softly denied. "But he was clever and found angles others did not even consider. But he was not of the old blood, so his fate was death or patronage. He could have been husband to my mother, you know. He had the talent for it and if he'd tried to establish a presence at her court he would at least have been made a formal consort. But it wasn't in his nature, Catherine, to see magic as a tool for power. To him it wasn't just the Gift, it was a gift."

"He's the one who taught you," I said.

"I suppose he did," Diabolist murmured. "Though it was never a lesson in the way my tutors would have made it. He was... sharing something he loved with me. Helping me understand it so we could wonder at it together. It made a difference. I could not help but love it as well, when it was something that was ours."

I envied her that. The memories she must be peering at with that faraway gaze, the hours she'd gotten to spend with her father that hadn't been just lessons. Getting to know him as more than a teacher and a guiding hand.

"I loved him," Akua suddenly admitted. "But, in the end, not as much as I loved what my mother taught me to reach for."

She chuckled barrenly.

"So how could I dare weep, dearest one, when I chose that ambition over him?" she said.

"Because you miss him," I softly replied. "Even so, you miss him."

I heard her move and found her leaning forward. Chin against her raised palms, long hair cascading down her back. I couldn't see her eyes or her face, but the tension in her shoulders was open.

"I do not think this is a kindness you offer me, Catherine," she said, tone ambiguous.

"It's not about kindness or cruelty," I said. "It's about being whole, more than just the parts that're useful."

Silence, as she mulled over my words.

"Why?"

A dangerous question, that, for it was being asked by a dangerous woman. Akua Sahelian was bound to me still, and had been shorn from Winter by virtue of there no longer being such a thing. But my leashes on her had frayed as well. The Night was not mine, and though I could stripped her of her power that would have left her nothing but a shade. Powerless. It should have been a matter carefully weighed, the absence of many safeguards Winter had allowed against Akua being divested of her claws. It hadn't been, though, not after Great Strycht. Because she'd said some things about doing good that night that I didn't believe she truly understood the implications of. Because once you embraced a principle, you didn't get to pick and choose where it worked and did not.

"Because, now and then, I forget who you are," I said.

What matters more, Akua Sahelian had asked of me once, the conviction or the act? I still had no answer to that, no iron-bound truth to offer. But she had made her choice, and it betrayed her own belief.

"It won't matter," Diabolist said, "for you are, my darling, Callowan to the bone. It will kill me or it will kill you, but in the end all debts will be paid."

"So it will," I agreed quietly. "Did I not swear to you, once, that no place in Creation would safeguard you from me?"

"That," Akua fondly said, "and a fate that would have men trembling in a thousand years."

Praesi, I thought and did so less than affectionately. Would else would take a ruinous oath as a tender remembrance?

"And you'll have that," I mused. "It's owed. But I'll make you into a person first. Because there's no meaning to passing judgement on the Diabolist – she's just a villain. That's the sum whole of her."

"Yet you still do not believe there is difference between the Diabolist and Akua Sahelian," the shade said, cocking her head to the side. "I am bemused, dear heart."

"I'm going to claw back a person from what they made of you, Akua," I calmly said. "And then, at the end of our road, we will have justice."

"And I will submit myself to this decree," she said, sounding amused. "You seem implacably certain of that."

"It is borrowed certainty," I said. "But certainty still."

"I am all ears, Catherine Foundling," she drawled.

"What matters more," I asked, "between the conviction and the act?"

"The act," Akua Sahelian said.

She had not hesitated a moment and so I smiled.

"How long have you been acting like one of us, Akua?" I simply asked.

No answer followed, not after and not when I left the tent.

It's hard to tell with Akua, whether she's being genuine or not. I'd like to believe in this instance she was, and that makes my fascination of a character I used to hate so much sweeter.

Gian

And by playing with our fascination, she assures that she survives. Smart play.

IDKWhoitis

I think that ultimately, it doesn't matter at this point. Cat has let her guard down, and now treats Akua like a person, and is trying to remodel her in a greater way than even when Cat could actually change her appearance with Winter.

Akua could be acting or genuine, but she is going to be reformed whether she likes to or not. She doesn't actually have a reason to be around or subservient to Cat anymore, and she almost looks forward to that bad ending Cat is promising her to be immortalized in the history books. Yet she still follows Cat, and keeps trying to fit in, and Cat has just offered her an in.

The only thing she could do, is truly fit in, because what difference does it make at this point?

I think she's following this now because she knows, story wise, that there isn't another path. She isn't being kept like a tiger in a cage, so she lacks the story to break from it. Her big climax ended in failure, so she can't rise again from the ashes. All she has is the redemption, and I think she is finding some form of freedom in letting go of the ambition she once held, even if she began her current path solely as a survivalist instinct.

luminiousblu

Personally I find the process rather disgusting, partially because Catherine has officially reached the point of being a Sue when interacting with her own party for me.

Oh she gets told, once in a blue moon, that she's full of shit, but more often than not she's either right or it takes minimal effort for her to admit she's wrong by the time someone actually tells her she's wrong. The Archer fight was a non-starter, Vivienne I'd hoped would lose her shit at Catherine but instead they're all buddy-buddy, she outsmarted everyone just like that and the Heroes didn't even get a consolation prize really, and the story clearly portrays her as holding the moral high ground and everyone else as sadly deluded at best, absolute monsters at worst. You might argue that well we're seeing the story from her point of view but really it's getting tiring at how apparently the only person capable of introspection and reading other people is Catherine these days, we never get her being taken down, like legitimately taken down.

Granted the story never did that often but it tended to feel like for me that she wasn't apparently the only person portrayed as not totally fucking insane or a complete monster. William was a poor deluded fool, sure, and Akua before getting fleshed out around Second Liesse was basically Maleficent tier, but then Catherine was mostly flailing about as a minor player under Black's wing, Warlock and Masego had their own ideas and Catherine actually fucked up during Marchford (although that she apparently wasn't really set back by it at all burned a little – would've been more impactful if she actually lost the third aspect which she already had gotten to use for a while instead of losing a nebulous 'potential'), she fucked up against the Courts, she fucked up with the Council, people told her she was being a complete idiot once in a while. These days not so much and I'm not convinced she's any smarter than before. Liesse Accords sounds hilariously off-kilter considering it's essentially asking Gandalf to sign a treaty with Sauron and while the narration tries very, very hard to make her seem reasonable it just makes her seem supremely arrogant about her personal values that apparently literally everyone is harbouring somewhere deep inside and just repressing, despite Callowan 'long prices' being derided absolutely everywhere as excessive, unique to Callowans, and completely retarded in-world.

IDKWhoitis

TLDR: If you think Cat always wins, this likely won't convince you.

I mean, all named are Madmen at best. This story loves the problem of opposing sides feeling that they are doing the "Right" thing, people will look delusional. When someone, or a group believe what they are doing is "Right", they are capable of monstrous atrocities. I don't mean just the Heroes (Looking at William's Mind rape via Angel, or Grey's Plague Extermination), we see this in our Villains as well, but one side dances around the fact that they are monsters by doing what is "needed" and what's "right".

In dealing with Grey, we see he does not actually care that he has broken mortal law, because he was doing what was "right" and "needed". He only cares now because he is being held hostage by a story. On good days, Saint and Grey could smite Catherine, but this is not a good day, they have walked into a story where they are not the heroes. They just tried to assassinate a foreign dignitary under truce banner. If they try shit right now, the Heavens won't be able to leverage much power. Meanwhile Cat has the upper hand, not only in a moral high ground (which could be debated, but its hard to look the hero in this scenario.), but also in terms of raw power at their disposal. Cat has a literal god on her shoulder. You can call bullshit, but this is what you get when the opposition has Angels whispering in the opposition's ear.

I don't know who you refer to Monsters here, as from each person's perspective, they are acting rationally with information they have realistic access to. Grey and Malz know about the broken treaty, so they know what Cat is on about, and they are ashamed. They don't fight what she is saying, because they know that she is right, Grey did cheat and lie, so there's no actual reason to bargain with him. The lord from Lev thinks Cat is full of shit, because this is the equivalent of Feds busting down your door, holding your grandfather at gunpoint, and demanding he comes with them. Without any context, you are going to feel righteously angry.

Most introspection is from Catherine's view, as we get to ride around in her head for most of this story, and that's just how the cookie crumbles in regards to first person point of view. However, it would be disingenuous to say it the ONLY introspection or insight we see.

Malz has had her psyche shaken to the core, she is dealing with PTSD from fighting up north, and knows that fighting Catherine is really going to fucking suck, whether or not she wins. Malz has expressed sadness at how this is going to play out, because she is stuck between a rock and a hard place. If she fights Cat, she could lose heroes and lots of men/material that are needed up north (to say nothing about actually winning the fight). If she lets Cat go, we see massive rebellions and desertions within the army, which may rival or be greater than losses taken fighting Catherine. She doesn't want to fight, and because of that, she asked Cat to take a LOSS. Cat understands why she made the request, but she can't follow through, even if she wanted to. Cat's Legitimacy rests on Warlord fame, and the Heroes are untrustworthy variables besides.

As for the Lord, you have to remember that there is literal hero blood running in the guy. He was born to fight Damned, on principle he can't let the Villain go. He hasn't fought Cat yet, and probably has only faced small time villains if any at all. On top of that, she has constantly belittled and slandered the Pilgrim. From his point of view, he thinks Cat is full of shit. (yes, it is a repeating pattern that people underestimate Cat, but Grey and Malz are here to make sure that stupid moves remain to the minimum. Remember the Cavalry charge Cat stopped single-handedly?).

Will Cat lose? Maybe not, historically speaking she doesn't. But what's the cost going to be this time around? Another friend? She is quickly running out of disposable ones for that. And with Akua joining the Woe, there might be a metaphorical sword hanging in the air for the Woe. But that's not the point.

As for your argument about the Liesse Accords, we don't know if it will succeed. If all these victories come to nothing, if she won every battle and lost at the peace table, I think that would be the hallmark of a tragedy. If you don't see selling parts of yourself and cutting off what isn't useful as a loss, then I get why you feel cheated. Cat lost autonomy in Book 3, and was stuck in a perpetual hell of depression and self doubt in Book 4. But that's not a loss, I guess. Cat lost her Trust in Black, she lost an ally in Malica, and she had her very foundations of her role in Callow rocked and broken apart. But these are worth nothing, I guess. We see a Catherine that is never trusted, labelled Arch-Heretic of the East. Cat is unable to reason with people because she is so insane/traitorous in other peoples eyes that she hampers peace talks by being present, even when everyone who matters agrees with her. What the fuck do you call that? She's won every battle, done everything "right", and she is still the Villain.

You are right, everyone will see this as Cat being "supremely arrogant about her personal values". This is why the Liesse Accords are on such shaky grounds right now. She wants to do good, she has tried to do good, she has tried to do what is "Right", and no one will agree with her until she forces them to. It is completely retarded, but you can't expect everyone to sit down in good faith to talk it out, there are opposing definitions of what is "Right" and "Needed", just like in the real world.

Qwormuli

That was well put.

luminiousblu

I'm not really sure what you're trying to say all in all. It feels like you're talking about stuff I'm not actually contesting. Pilgrim, Laurence, Malicia, and so on certainly aren't portrayed sympathetically or as if they're not totally off their rocker, while Catherine is consistently portrayed as the only sane person who actually shows up in the story. Cordelia Hasenbach used to be portrayed as reasonable but then she both dropped out of spotlight and left on a rather sour note, while Malicia never felt as clever as EE tried to present her as but the facade is totally gone these days (Malanza is trying to replace Cordelia but she doesn't have the weight behind her hence only sane person).

Zachary

The thing that Catherine doesn't seem to fully internalize is that Pilgrim and Saint have both dealt with villains who could be empathized with on some level, but have repeatedly seen it end poorly throughout their entire lives. While they're wrong in this instance, it's reasonable for them to think that killing Catherine is the best option given their past experiences up until this point. The same goes for Cordelia; from Catherine's PoV, she's stubbornly refusing peace, but from Cordelia's PoV she's having to consider the possibility that Catherine is not being honest (which is fairly reasonable to think given the way villains have historically behaved in this setting).

Catherine is also generally very hypocritical when it comes to the way she judges her enemies relative to her allies. No matter how you slice it, what Black did in Procer is a war crime. It is 100% understandable for people like Malanza and the heroes to want him dead.

Zachary

The same is also true for the way Black and Catherine view heroes. From their PoV, it's unfair that heroes always win in the end and benefit from providence. But the other side of this is that villains nearly always manage to succeed a bunch (and generally cause a lot of harm in the process) before being killed (which is kind of inevitable due to the way villains are made immortal – Black/Malicia already lived longer than most heroes do). After all, villains rarely fail during the first part of their plan, so they have their own “story benefits.” And many heroes get killed very early in their careers – I wouldn't be surprised if the average hero lifespan is lower than the average villain one. When a band of 5 is formed, it's apparently standard for one or two members to die. And, in the end, the heroes don't really win in any kind of meaningful, long-term sense. The Dread Empire still exists, after all.

So from the villains' PoV, it seems like "my goals are doomed to failure at the hands of heroes." But from the hero side, the perception is "even if we win against individual villains, they never go away (and sooner or later our luck is going to run out and we'll be one of the deaths in a group of 5 or whatever)."

Mental Mouse

I'm flashing back to Book I, when Amadeus set Cat to studying Praesi "fairy tales". IIRC, The protagonists there tended to end in disaster or doom, but not before they'd "made their mark on the world". Akua may consider that she's in that last part of the story....

IDKWhoitis

It's what I worry about Cat too tbh, did she learn too well from Amadeus? Or did she complete her villain role, and is now a completely new arc?

luminiousblu

A protagonist who makes their mark on the world before dying doesn't mean they get fucked up and then accomplish something with their last breath most of the time, it's a Napoleon case, or a Hannibal case, where even when you lose your shadow is so long you define an era and pound culture and history like clay.

Abrakadabra

A Hitler case? 😊

Ann

I don't think he fits ultimately though he killed a lot of people comparative to the world population at the time the amount of people he killed isn't that unique throughout human history. And he was pretty much a complete and utter failure. with Napoleon or Hannibal people remember them for their brilliance. Hitler was just a raving lunatic so I don't think anyone's going to bother remembering him a couple hundred years from now. I mean from a narrative perspective how disappointing is it win the big villain is just a screeching artist.

werafdsaew

"What matters more," I asked, "between the conviction and the act?"

Just as the role is important than the Name, the act is more important than the conviction. As long as Akua is acting like she's part of the party, she's getting redeemed whether she likes it or not—the power of the trope of the Five-Man Band will do the rest.

Jonnnnz

A Villain would say the act is more important, but a Hero would not. The Choirs themselves seem to be about will rather than action. The Pilgrim murdered (via heavenly bio-weaponry) thousands of people so he could capture Black, in a move with a higher death toll than dropping a lake on a massive invading army mid-battle. The first is considered heroic, the second villainous. Conviction goes a long way here, and there's probably a case for it protecting people such as the Saint of Swords (and to an extent, Black and Malicia).

werafdsaew

You're talking about morality, but I'm talking about story mechanics. We've known for a while now that if you slot yourself into a role of a powerful story, then that story takes on a life of its own and then drags you kicking and screaming towards its predefined paths whether you like it or not. And there are few stories as powerful as the Five-Men Band.

AdrianGrey

But this isn't an example of the Five-Man Band. The Woe already has the full complement of 5 people: Catherine, Hakram, Indrani, Masego, and Vivienne. If Akua joins for real, she would be number 6, which really doesn't have any strong story associated with it. Unless one of the Woe dies or retires, the story likely won't let Akua be part of it.

Nathan Utter

I actually disagree with the strong association part. While Akua isn't one of the base members of the Five-Man Band, there IS a trope associated with defeated enemies joining the Five-Man Band: the Sixth Ranger.

So true, this isn't an example of the Five-Man Band but it is a related trope.

luminiousblu

The Sixth Ranger is a super dangerous role if you're looking for redemption though. Like the name implies it's associated with wanderers. When someone leaves the team for good or joins it temporarily, that's the role they fit into. They're like an extension of the party, and the party functions without it. Unless you want to say she's replaced Masego – which for now she has – but then Masego is currently in the role of the party member who's gone absolutely fucking insane and needs sense beaten back into him. Whether or not he dies during that fight and returns only for long enough to see Catherine's face and apologise has no strong tendency associated with it.

werafdsaew

And conveniently, Vivienne no longer has a Name. Yes Cat said that she's not kicking her out, but it doesn't change the fact that Vivienne is now 100% useless in a fight.

Mental Mouse

Akua might be a 6th ranger, but AFAICT, the Woe is not even close to a Five-Man Band. The trope page makes it clear that two or three correspondences don't make a 5MB, you need all five members by type and role, and I don't see how the Woe come even close.

caoimhinh

Yep, and we have seen that it's indeed that way even in the way that world works, that's why Cat, Pilgrim, and every other Named can shape stories and use them as weapons. The act matters more than conviction and intentions.

luminiousblu

Redemption, at least in the Christian sense of the word, fundamentally sees very little difference between the act and the conviction. You can't actually act without the conviction (saving someone so he can pay you back isn't charity – by definition the act of charity means giving for the sake of doing so) and someone with conviction can always act even if only a little (someone with legitimately nothing to his name can still perform charity by helping others carry loads or so on).

Also I honestly don't believe that Catherine's band counts as anything similar to redemption in the first place, nor that it's realistically a good thing to get caught in orbit.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, Cat is simply unable to truly grasp Akua's mind – which leaves Cat tantalized and fascinated. This is all too typical for a "normal" human faced with a sociopath.

But that dark fascination is also a trap, an adept sociopath can use it to subvert and corrupt others even after their mask is torn and their great ruse ("oh yes, I'm one of your flock, really...") uncovered.

Liliet

I don't think Akua is any kind of sociopath.

An interesting fact. Do you remember Akua's story about her childhood companion she'd been forced to sacrifice? "She was charged with taking my canings until I was old enough that it would not hamper my growth." Their strategy was legitimately to punish someone else for child Akua's transgressions and expect that to influence her behavior just as if she'd herself been punished. It worked, I'm assuming.

Akua's been traumatized through hell and back, but she's perfectly capable of empathy and attachment and human emotions. Cat understands her very well actually.

sengachi

Akua is a perfect example of the fact that you do not have to be a sociopath to commit atrocities.

Liliet

I have a theory that Akua (and Amadeus also btw) is an empath – as in, has hyperdeveloped empathy.

It, uh, doesn't help. It just means she's learned to not notice when she hurts herself, too 😞

Javvies

Of course Saint isn't as good as soul-surgery as Masego. She's muscle. Amazingly skilled muscle, but muscle nonetheless. Muscle so good at cutting things with her sword that she can cut intangibles like a Domain or souls. But still just muscle in the end.

Masego actually knows what he's doing when he tinkers with souls.

Heh. Cat is humanizing Akua so it hurts Akua more when the final hammer ultimately gets dropped on Akua.

Skaddix

I doubt it...Cat is just not that manipulative and long term of a planner. What I think Cat does need to work on is respecting other Cultures if she wants the Liesse accords to work.

caoimhinh

For me it's more like Cat is trying to make Akua into a better person so she can justify letting her live in front of the others (especially Vivienne).

Skaddix

More like only Viv...Indrani is down with it, Hakram is neutral on it, and Masego would probably like to keep another Magical mind around.

caoimhinh

Yeah, only Viv would oppose strongly, while the rest would either obey because Cat says so or not give a damn about it.

But Catherine is the type of person that needs an excuse for her actions, even when others wouldn't criticize her, and also because she isn't honest with herself about feelings until a long time has passed.

luminiousblu

Arguably, saying you're going to make someone else a better person is disrespecting their culture, and she's not even always right about it. Forget who the K-redhead mage was back in book 1-2 but the big stink Catherine originally raised was about human sacrifice of legally dead people, which didn't make any sense (they're already going to be hanged you may as well make use of them before they get dropped) and clearly isn't a universal value. I mean yeah, Catherine wants to make a declaration of human rights sort of thing, but in the first place nobody even agrees on what those rights are. People in OUR world can't agree on where the line gets drawn.

caoimhinh

I agree with you.

But this is merely Cat's excuse, it doesn't need to make sense, it's just the thing she says to attempt to justify not killing Akua.

Also, even to this day CatxKillian break-up still seems like a really forced thing in the book (it came out of nowhere and didn't make much sense). Their fight started because Cat didn't take Killian to the council room when she announced the founding of the Order of Broken Bells which was "her first step at rebellion", then Cat twisted the fight around and ended up being the one offended at Killian due to her considering the use of human sacrifice for power. Worse is how Cat in recent chapters still said that she would have needed to cross lines to keep being together with Killian, which is a lie since once Killian found that Cat was against it she discarded the idea, but Cat still pretends to be the righteous one in that discussion.

matesbe

I feel like you are simplifying their relationship breakup. It wasn't as well developed as it could have been, but there was more to it than that. Cat didn't feel like she could stay with Killian knowing that it was only her disapproval that stopped Killian from doing the ritual, not any moral fiber or objections. She openly admitted that it was hypocritical to hold Killian to higher standards than others around her, but admitted that she was having a hard time helping it. Combined with her increasing responsibilities, Cat felt that staying with Killian wouldn't be the best thing for either of them. She wasn't pretending to be the righteous one in any manner other than the fact that her partner had no objections to human sacrifice.

caoimhinh

Cat might actually be the one driving Akua towards the redemption story.

That "I'll make you into a good person before I destroy you" seems like an empty excuse to me. It's as silly as "Let's redeem this criminal sentenced to death and make him into a good person before we kill him", that's pure bullshit, she just likes her (or grew fond of her) and wants to make her a better person to have her around.

That type of story never ends in the redeemed being killed by the person who taught her to be good, she either lives on or dies saving others.

These Akua chapters are always the same formula: "Conversation starts about relevant subject of the moment, conversation steers towards Akua due to Catherine asking her questions, Akua talks a bit about her life, Akua tells an unknown info about her life plus something we already know, and conversation ends with Catherine promising again that she will kill Akua."

If Cat needs to constantly be reminding herself and Akua that she is going to kill her, she has long passed the stage where she decided to not do it, she is just in denial.

John

"Sleep well, I'll likely kill you in the morning" never ends with the cabin boy actually being killed.

Liliet

TBF every time Cat looked at Akua in Book 3 she had an inner monologue slowly and exquisitely describing Akua's appearance and then ending with a reassurance that Catherine still hates her and wants her dead.

And she followed through on that.

Sort of.

...Yeah I agree here lmao.

Watching Cat let Akua in from the Cold really made me feel something.

Winter is over, and Cat has moved on in life from what Liesse was. It's now Night-time, and Cat has left the door open to Akua. Although some of the Woe may feel worried at this new, and possibly hated individual, she does fit in. Archer respects Akua after surviving the Underdark, Masego never really had a negative opinion, Hakram will watch over her, as he did with Viv. Cat has let her in, and only really Viv may feel threatened, if not insulted. But even with that, I still see Akua as part of the Woe in the end.

It's going to be a shame if Saint or Grey annihilates her.

Jworks

I never even considered her being one of the Woe now that Vivienne is not named, that would be very interesting. I wonder what her third name would be.

IDKWhoitis

I don't think needing a Name is one of the requirements for the Woe at this point, and there isn't an actual limit to how large Cat can make the Woe. Although Fate may be tempted to keep it at 5 through the use of deaths, Fate is always trying to screw Cat over, so this is nothing new. Both Akua and Viv may be part of the Woe, but we all know Viv will have a fucking Fit when she figures this out.

Liliet

I think 5+1 is a classic trope number, and they don't have to be Named to fill the roles nonetheless.

Akua is the Sixth Ranger.

Liliet

The chapter when Akua was let out of the box permanently on the way to Keter was called "Sixth".

She's been a part of Woe since then, in its own fucked up way.

Pethrai D'arkos

Hold on, where's the extra chapter?

Mental Mouse

Go via the "Next" link, IIRC they just don't show up in the main ToC.

doominator10

Akua is easily the most fascinating character for me. I don't know about favorite, but definitely most interesting.

edrey

akua point of view is lacking here, without that you feel something is missing, this madness is two ways after all. also, there is not extra chapter, what a pity hm?

Liliet

caoimhinh

That's because EE doesn't want to confirm anything, but just keep the readers guessing and debating. Using Akua's POV would confirm her intentions in one direction or the other, thus killing the suspense. All these "conversations with Akua" chapters about her had actually been "people speculating about Akua", not "Akua talking about her intentions"

Stormblessed

I'm still waiting for the moment where Cat calls Black her father outside of her own thoughts. I thought it was going to happen in this chapter, but breaking this space to Akua would be wrong. It probably either needs to happen extremely publicly or in private with Hakram.

Liliet

Well, she's said that out loud to Andronike and Komena at the end of the previous book, which high key made me do a double take.

But yessssssss.

caoimhinh

Honestly, these "let's use an entire chapter for a conversation with Akua" chapters have always felt like filler to me.

So, there were no more attempts at diplomacy, no conversation with Pilgrim and Saint again, nor Catherine offering the same she offered to Rozala to the others. It was offed as "there was no point in keep trying so after getting Amadeus I left". Even if we knew that the talks would fail, an attempt was supposed to be made, instead who got half a chapter of Cat saying that Akua loved her father (which we already knew), that Akua was not showing her true emotions (which we already knew), and Cat saying that she will kill Akua (which she already has said lots of times, but with each time she repeats it, it sounds less likely).

I know character development is important, but these Akua chapters are really not developing much at all besides showing that despite Cat trying to reassure herself and everyone else at the end of each of these chapters that she will definitely kill Akua, it's obvious since a long time ago that she is having second thoughts. This "I'll make you a good person before I kill you" is an excuse that seems more like "I'll make you good and repent of your bad deeds so I can justify that I'm not killing you".

None of these "Catherine conversing with Akua" chapters have brought much new insight nor expanded what we knew of Akua already, more like they are displaying Cat acting in denial of her desire to let Akua live. There was development in the conversation Vivienne had with Akua in Arcadia, and the thoughts Cat had about her along the entire Ever Dark Arc as they gradually changed into a more favorable vision of Akua, the development ended with Akua saving Cat during the encounter with Sve Noc, but there has not been so much development in the conversations that use half to entire chapters, as weird as it seems.

Liliet

Mmmm I really disagree with you about the worth of these chapters.

They're buildup. They're letting us know what's going on, they're letting us see how Catherine's and Akua's opinions of the world, themselves and each other slowly mutate with time.

Or I might just be an unrepentant CatAkua shipper crying tears of joy for the author feeding me and mine :3

But I really do believe this will pay off in time.

KageLupus

I am also going to disagree with this being a filler chapter. Akua being a member of the group and having people joke around and not treat her like an outcast has been a driving conflict since it first started. Originally the justification was that she was going to be useful until they didn't need her anymore and then Akua would pay for Second Liesse.

After the big throw down in the Everdark the narrative got flipped, though. Akua declares that she is going to use the power of friendship to do Good and redeem herself. Her reasoning is that actions are all that matters so if she goes through the motions of being moral it is the same as actually being moral.

This chapter is Cat pointing out that Akua fucked up again. First she proves that Akua is not a heartless monster and does/ can care about other people aside from just how useful they are to her plans. Then she reminds Akua that she has been acting like one of the Woe, which in her own words is as good as being one.

Cat isn't going to kill Akua because she doesn't have to. Akua set herself up for a redemption story, after committing heinous crimes. We already know how that story plays out because the Pilgrim tried to set Cat up the same way. Akua is going to end up making a Heroic Sacrifice at some point, and she is going to do so willingly because that is what one of the Woe would do for the others.

SilverDargon

I really like what Cat seems to be implying about Akua's changing character. The idea that she's literally being changed into a better person because she took on the role in an attempt to play the heavens. That's just a fascinating take on how heroes and villains get made in this world. I mean part of it might just be psychology, "Becoming the mask" and whatnot, but Cat seems to be implying that morality is a literal force which is changing Akua ever since she decided to play at being a hero down underground. Which to be fair, is fairly plausible.

Liliet

I think this very much is psychology. And... sociology? Relationshipology? Pretty sure it's sociology that does that... or psychology.

Anyway, this is not a guide-specific process. This is how it works, and I'm really glad Catherine's seeing it.

And I'm really glad all the cards are on the table face up between the two of them :3

Liliet

yeah lmao

Alegio

Think of the reason why Archer is in the Woe, its a place where she can belong. That's something Akua has never had before and even if she is just acting, the simple effect of not having to worry about praesi BS all the time and having something to do where the best end scenario is not "And then the heroes killed me, but not before I fuck@d everything up!" probably does wonder for her wounded psyche.

Liliet

This fucking chapter.

Once again, somehow I didn't expect this conversation to actually happen even though I was thinking every single thing that came up there.

Also, AMADEUS =x

Someguy

Looks like Cat is shaping Akua to have actual human emotional responses just to slam the "No Redemption" cage on her and bury her forever away screaming.

Liliet

I think Cat expects Akua to go for Redemption = Death at the end.

Not the same as "no redemption".

Alegio

I'm more of the mind that Cat believes that she wants that, but in reality, all she wants is that Akua becomes more of a person so at some point the realization of what she has done hits her like a hammer.

Cat probably doesn't even wants Akua dead, she likes her too much and can see she is way too useful as an ally for that.

Liliet

I pretty much agree lmao.

Angita

I actually rather like Akua and Catherine's interactions. The redemption matters to me because Akua at the time of her defeat (and still now) is fond of Akua's Folly. She wants to be the person who inspires the next generation. It's not really satisfying (in justice or in emotional impact) to kill her and be done with it if it's her reward. By comparison, Cordelia is an exquisite moment of justice/revenge, depending on how you view it. Cordelia was fool enough to base the continuation of her nation on a Crusade, resulting in many people's deaths who had little to do with the decisions. Her comeuppance is when Saint tells her the heroes are taking over and Procer as it's currently known is going to end.

Akua being redeemed gives us that chance of her sneaking away from the rest of the Woe and crying about a failure, be it her father's death or something that hasn't happened yet. That element of "I tried so hard or I wanted something to happen so much and I failed" is a comeuppance. I won't call it justice, at that point, if Akua's being useful, but I want Akua to have a Cordelia's Cracked Crusade moment. She hasn't paid for her crime yet.

medailyfun

Good to see my worries about Akua-to-Black issues addressed, even better to see Cat approving some communication with Malicia.

Daniel E

Perception is an odd thing, when numbers transition from 'meaningful' to 'a statistic'. I sincerely hope that Cat doesn't forget those 100k souls of Liesse. If she wants to get Akua to the point where remorse is real and thus the punishment is meaningful, that's fine, so long as she actually follows through in the end.

Alegio

Cat stop trying to excuse yourself, we all know you actually like Akua and are trying to help her like any other good person would do to such a traumatized soul.

And it's lovely how Akua still probably thinks that she is "acting" her part. She already fell for that something that trapped all the woe around Cat, the feeling of actually being part of something and having a place where she belongs (especially a place where you don't need to kill the people you love as an entrance fee).

adrian1992blog

I think part of the point Cat was making is that once she really feels or changes the pain she will suffer due to her regrets will be more than anything could do. And that so long as she doesn't feel that pain Akua is just acting or rather imitating people

lennymaster

I have finally realised Cat's plan for Akua. She is taking her revenge, she is literally destroying her by turning her into a different person, or rather a person at all. Akua set herself up for a redemption story, not realising that that will destroy her as surely as having her soul ripped to shreds. In the end, there might still be a person left, but she will be nothing like her former self. And she cannot sabotage the change or stop, doing so reverts her to being the wily villain doing whatever it takes to survive, continuing makes her a hero who won't stand for sacrificing her life if it is not for some greater good. And being a person will set her finally up for feeling bad about what she has done.

Vivid

"Which is more important, the conviction or the act?"

An easy choice, when you realize their congruence. I guess it's recognizing that they're the same that sets apart Black and Akua.

Chapter 29: Retrospect

"My son, the Helikeans insist it is better to live a day as a lion than a hundred years as a sheep but as in so many things they are missing the point. Lions commonly live a decade and a half, sheep slightly less. It is not them you must emulate but instead the common tortoise, a wise creature that achieves very little but will do so for a very long time. This is the ideal state of politics."

– Extract from the infamous 'Sensible Testament' of Basilea Chrysanthé of Nicae

We got three days' march before Creation turned on us.

It was always going to, I'd known that deep down – there'd been too many moving parts sent to spin within the bounds of Iserre for my armies to be allowed to escape the grounds so easily. But I'd expected, and planned for, the Heavens putting their fingers to the scale through the local crop of heroes. My contingencies had been built to kill or cripple enemy Named, killing as few actual soldiers as was possible. If there was to be a confrontation, my thought had been, best it be contained to Named and army strength on all sides be preserved. Given that we now outnumbered the western coalition army by a fair margin, that shouldn't have been too difficult. The enemy fielded less than eighty thousand on their side, though they had us almost hilariously outnumbered in all matters cavalry. In comparison my own coalition had taken beatings but overall no dramatic losses, and that left us on rather healthy grounds: a little over twenty thousand veterans from the Legions of Terror, around thirty seven thousand legionaries of the Army of Callow and my largely intact fifty thousand drow. One hundred thousand and ten in total, more or less, so we had the enemy not only beaten in numbers but arguably in quality of soldiery as well.

It'd been the assessment of the Marshals that the enemy was unlikely to seek a pitched battle, and I'd concurred. It wasn't that it'd be impossible for the enemy to win, should they attack. If they hit us during the hours after dawn we'd be down most the drow and they'd regain temporary superiority in numbers, which might allow them to swing this around if they bled us bad enough before the Firstborn were back on their feet. It was that the costs of such a victory would be horrific, to put it bluntly. Losses would be massive on both sides, and with Princess Rozala having a seat in those war councils there'd be at least one voice to remind them that if I felt my people were being forced into a corner the gloves would come off. Whether or not we were correct in guessing the enemy's thoughts, their actions at least were correctly predicted: as the eastern coalition began a march to the northeast, out of Iserre and towards Cantal, the western coalition shadowed our advance but did not engage. Not even in skirmishes, to my mild surprise. I'd expected cavalry raids and Levantine light foot to try out screening forces, but the enemy made a point of never engaging in bloodshed.

Some of our soldiers considered this a good sign, and talk in the camps was that we might just walk back to Callow without drawing swords. Juniper had been scornful of the rumours, and passed down instructions to stamp them out, but myself I'd been rather impressed there were still any optimists left in my armies. You'd think they would have gotten themselves killed by now, just by dint of odds. Regardless, my own expectations remained dark and so when the first sign of trouble arrived I was validated instead of disappointing. It was on the fourth morning, about an hour before the Firstborn would be able to shake off dawn torpor, that a chunk of Creation half a mile wide shattered like glass in front of my armies.

"That," Vivienne slowly said, "looks like a gate."

It did, I thought, and that was not good news. The two of us had been riding to the Third Army's camp, when Creations began creaking, so it was only a short ride to General Abigail's command to order a runner being sent for 'Advisor Kivule'. I half expected a comment from Vivienne at that, but found her face to be largely indifferent. She caught me looking, though, and raised an eyebrow.

"I'm not a fool, Catherine," she said. "In Masego's absence, she's the finest magical expert we have. It would be wasteful not to make use of her."

"Haven't said a thing," I replied, raising a hand in protest.

I declined the escort the Third Army offered, as well as the offer to accompany me that General Abigail offered while poorly hiding a cringe. She hid her relief at my refusal just as poorly, to Vivienne's subtle amusement. We rode together towards the break and all the while she was suppressing a smile.

"That one's in no danger of being tempted into reckless adventures, at least," Vivienne finally drawled.

"I find the lack of ambition refreshing," I admitted. "The boldest step she's taken so far is discreetly inquiring if service months under a field promotion still count towards earning a general's retirement pension."

The other Callowan choked, swallowing her laughter.

"Well?" she asked, tone hoarse with suppressed hilarity. "Does it, Your Majesty?"

"Figured I'd throw her a bone," I mused. "It's not like she's getting a general's salary at the moment anyway."

We might have continued quite a while in that vein if the approach of the breach hadn't killed any semblance of amusement. We'd ridden close enough that I could make out what laid behind the filmy, gauze-like surface of the breach: a barren wasteland of howling dust storms I'd visited before. Frowning, I noted that the opening seemed to lead to a place different than the one I'd stood at. The great whirlwinds with streaks of lightning and the earth cracking open into geysers of flame were miles and miles away.

"Shit," I feelingly said. "This is happening a lot quicker than I thought it would."

Vivienne rode closer, as her sight was not as good as mine, and had grown pale by the time I caught up with her. I almost turned to acknowledge what I felt arriving behind me, but the breach itself was currently of greater interest,

"You told us it was slowly coming into alignment with Creation," the dark-haired woman said. "That it might take months."

"That's what Sve Noc told me," I told her. "And I had no reason to believe they were wrong."

"They were not," Advisor Kivule said.

Her presence in the Night meant her arrival was no surprise to me, but I was pleased to note that Vivienne either had grown better at hiding her surprise or she'd also somehow noticed. 'Advisor Kivule' was dressed entirely in black, her closely cut dress covering going from the hollow of her throat to her boots, and neither her face nor her hair were visible under the elaborate veils and half-hat she wore. That I had bound Akua Sahelian to my cloak after Second Liesse was rumoured, but there might be unrest if it came out I was not allowing her to walk about without chains. The false name and attire wouldn't fool anyone already suspecting her identity, but given the kind of entities I'd bound to my service in the past Vivienne had assured me that the most popular rumours had nothing to do with Diabolist. Apparently she was either a drow sorceress I'd stolen from underground – never mind that they'd seen actual Firstborn and that as a species they distinctly lacked curves – or a fae I'd seduced into making oaths to me. The slightly uncomfortable way Vivienne had spoken the word 'seduced' made it clear what kind of seduction was being referred to, which was actually rather flattering – it did imply, after all, that I was skilled enough in bed to bedazzle one of the fae.

"Cryptic," Vivienne commented. "If you'd care to elaborate?"

"The unpleasant vista that can be seen on the other side is not aligned with Creation," Akua replied. "In this, Sve Noc were entirely correct in assessing the time. Though I cannot be certain as to what caused this phenomenon, I can hazard an informed guess."

"Which is?" I asked.

"You described High Arcana runes and a detonation taking place while you visited, Catherine," the shade said. "Repeated impacts of that nature might reverberate across the boundary between Arcadia and Creation, creating temporary breaches."

"So whoever-" Masego, most likely "-is behind the mess on the other side, they're swing hard enough at the wall between us and them that tiles are shattering," I frowned.

"A more accurate metaphor would be a sword striking at a pond," Akua suggested. "The initial strike will leave a mark, in this case being the breach you see before us, before creational laws make the water return where force chase it from – in this case, the boundary pressure eventually closing this breach."

"At least there's not a permanent gate into Arcadia in the middle of Procer," Vivienne said. "Somehow I doubt Hasenbach would be too pleased about that."

"Wasn't us," I replied out of reflex. "And if it was you can't prove it, so in a philosophical sense it isn't."

There was a moment of embarrassed silence as the other two women looked at me. I grimaced.

"Well," I spoke into the quiet, a tad defensive. "Given our history, I might as well start practicing the official response early."

"Inadequate," Akua said.

"Sloppy," Vivienne said, almost simultaneously.

They didn't turn to glare at each other, though given how much of a point they were making of not doing that they might as well have for all the difference it made. The irritation from Vivi was likely genuine, but rubies to piglets that Akua was just having fun yanking her chain. It would be a much greater challenge, I thought, to wean her off pettiness than it would be to wean her off of Evil. Who could say I'd not learned to pick my battles?

"Glad we're all in agreement," I drily said. "I need practical details here, o advisor. When's this thing going to disappear? Can we expect others to appear, and if so how often?"

"Less than a bell," the shade replied, which had me sighing.

Four hours, in the winter season, was no small portion of the daylight hours already shortened by the forced slumber of the Firstborn after dawn. We'd have to march around the damned thing.

"As for your second question, there are two possibilities," Akua said. "The first is that we are looking at the initial breach, in which case we might have days before a second instance – though the occurrences will quicken as the process advances."

"And the second?" I asked, bracing myself.

"This is not the first breach," Akua said. "And they have simply been occurring in different parts of Iserre, for an unknown amount of time. We could be looking at hours instead of days for the apparition rate."

"Diabolist," Vivienne said. "What happens when the rate is so close as to be instantaneous?"

"In metaphysical terms, a repurposed chunk of Arcadia will made into a half-realm straddling the boundary between it and Creation," the shade said.

"And in physical terms?" I asked.

"I don't believe this has ever been accomplished before," Akua Sahelian cheerfully admitted. "And so I've no authoritative answer to give, darling dearest. It ought to be interesting to find out whether we are simply to be obliterated by the initial bridging or the process will closer to the forging of a permanent domain with tendrils reaching in both realms."

Certain death or probably death, then. There was a cheery thought. I closed my eyes, let all I'd learned sink in. I'd come across more than a dozen moving parts since I'd walked out the gate bringing me to Iserre, but this was it – the pivot, the fulcrum, the culmination of all this bloody mayhem. Had the Tyrant planned this far? No, I decided. No one was that good, not even the Neshamah, and for all his brilliance Kairos Theodosian was no King of Death. Now, in matters of war and politics I could grasp how we had come to this cliff's edge. The Grand Alliance could not and would not yield, neither could I and all the while violent madmen rode the carriage that was the League of Free Cities down ever slope they could find. But what was the story here? There was one, of that there could be no doubt. There were too many Named in Iserre, too many crowns and too many secrets for there not to be a tale in the works. If it were merely the western and eastern coalitions clashing, we would have the heroic and the villainous and the usual tragedies in black and white.

The League's presence muddled that, however. It was no longer so clear-cut, and after the unfolding calamity in Arcadia was brought into the mix the waters became even muddier. Kairos wants to play a trick, I thought. I want to forge a peace and wield it like a blade. I could only guess at Masego's intent, but he could not be in his right mind. That would make him, I thought, a danger or an obstacle. The sword hanging above all our heads but not someone who would influence the shape beyond that. Now, I knew what Princess Rozala wanted but she wasn't the champion for her side was she? It was the Grey Pilgrim that would bear that mantle and I wasn't really sure what the old man wanted. He should have killed Black, I thought. It would have made more sense to do that if peace was what he was after. I would have been utterly furious, true enough, but if they'd killed him while he was in the middle of burning Procer I would have had to swallow my anger. Instead he'd given me reason to... To twist arms so that I could get him back, I thought, and my blood cooled. I'd heard rumours about Black being dead or captured even in hamlets, it was a given that the moment I came to Iserre I'd hear about it.

So when I'd first encountered the Pilgrim and the Saint, I'd baited her and tricked him to go after something he'd known for certain I would want. And I'd won a victory. Oh, it hadn't been given to me, but narratively speaking I'd received a written invitation to take it. And I won from it the body without the soul, the part that actually makes Black dangerous to them. It'd been bait, and I'd taken it. A victory, I thought once more. Could it actually be that simple? I wasn't Named, not anymore, but I was the high priestess of Night and the weight of the roles I still played might be enough. And there had been growing similarities, hadn't there? I'd slipped into them without even noticing. I now bore a staff and no sword, I called on miracles to aid and protect rather than attack. I had godlings whispering in my ears, companions at my side. I was eldest in influence among the priesthood and Named of a coalition of nations, and an unequaled religious figure in one of them. I had made myself and been made into the patchwork-cloaked opposite of the pilgrim in grey, one step at a time. And now I'd claimed a win over one that might be called my rival. This, I thought, felt like a pattern of three. One I had initiated as a villain, and with a victory.

I knew well what followed: draw and then finally defeat.

Now, if I were the Grey Pilgrim, why would I go this far out of my way to kill Catherine Foundling? Because the Choir of Mercy told me to, I immediately thought but just as quickly dismissed. If Tariq were simply a murderous errand boy for the Ophanim he'd be a great deal less dangerous. No, if he was doing this and had invested so much time into doing it when the Dead King was devouring the north then it was for a reason – not necessarily one I'd considered good or decent, but one that would seem those to him. My eyes blinked open and I found my companions both staring at me in silence.

"I am the Grey Pilgrim," I said. "Why, of all the threats currently on the board, do I need to have a story-forged knife either at or in the Black Queen's throat?"

"The fairy gates," Vivienne replied, cocking her head to the side. "They can either make or break the war to the north. The ability needs to be either solidly secured or removed so it can't be a threat."

Which made sense, I thought, if I grasped the timing of it correctly. Black had been captured while I was in the Everdark, which meant the Dead King had either been mustering his armies or already on the march. The Pilgrim ended a strategic offensive that had a real risk of starving half the Principate into collapse if left unchecked while simultaneously acquiring leverage on both Malicia and myself. Snip with the soul and not only did he keep that leverage but he prepared a pattern of three. The degree of foresight that'd require was frightening, to be honest, and I suspected beyond even a hero in bed with a Choir. On the other hand, I wouldn't put it beyond the Grey Pilgrim to do all this as a contingency. Ending a threat while expanding the tools at his disposal? Yeah, that might fit. He'd know he was exposing himself to my tearing through a gate and appearing behind him at some point down the line – rescuing my teacher would have quite the weight behind it – but cutting out the soul would muddle up that story and I suspected he could do quite a bit with the ability to predict where I'd appear when coming for the soul. Was that really all it was, though? The gates had simply made me too potentially dangerous not to pull a knife on? Considering the man had looked into my soul a few times, he must have known that I'd rather avoid war if I could. I glanced at Diabolist, whose gaze remained hidden behind her veils.

"Because it is the only certain way of killing you," the shade calmly said, "and Calernia cannot survive a second Dead King."

I opened my mouth, then closed it. It seemed an absurd claim, for all the talk of apotheosis that had preceded my descent into the Everdark. Yet I trusted Akua's intellect, if less so her judgement. She wouldn't have said that without careful consideration. I thought back to my fights with the heroes, when the Tenth Crusade had come knocking. I'd dropped a lake on the enemy, to be sure, but it wasn't worse than what the likes of the Warlock and possibly the Witch of the Wilds could have done with a little preparation. Although, arguably the lack of preparation needed on my part made it – no, this was all missing the point. Feasible way of killing me, Akua had said. That brought different perspective. Sure, I'd been repeatedly slapped around by the Saint of Swords and she'd shrugged off the worst of what Winter could bring to bear, but I'd usually accomplished what I came for while going around her before retreating. The Pilgrim himself had seen me tear through a band of heroes while fumbling with the barest fraction of my mantle had been able to do. If I'd known half the tricks at the Battle of the Camps that I'd known in the Everdark, I honestly doubted anyone but the Pilgrim or the Saint would have been able to put a scratch on me. And those two, I realized, were the oldest and perhaps most powerful heroes on the continent.

Shit.

The thought that the man could have conceived of me as a nascent Dead King was ludicrous, he'd been able to see into my fucking soul. I wasn't... Gods, I'd done some dark things and not always for reasons as good as I would have wished but there were lines I'd always refused to cross. That I would have kept to. This can't be personal, I told myself, and put aside the horrifying thought that a truth teller might have genuinely believed I had the potential to become the likes of Neshamah. Stepping out of myself, I looked at the story of Catherine Foundling through the Grey Pilgrim's eyes. The past was largely irrelevant, I decided, save perhaps for a note that I'd been taught by the Black Knight and would likely draw on his manners and methods. What mattered was that I'd come into a Name as the manifestation of what Tariq had called the sin of our indolence returned to haunt us, the first time we'd ever spoken. That was important, that informed what I considered the Black Queen to be. She was a form of retribution by Creation, by the story, for a failure on the side of Good. Catherine Foundling, as an entity, was inherently dangerous to the Heavens. Still, as the Pilgrim I didn't like killing unless the situation required it and I did not yet know if it did. I should, at least, meet with this Black Queen.

What did I find when I did? Offers of truce, offers to reduce the dangers for everyone, but also a mutilated soul. And Winter encroaching on the remnants, essentially a standing temptation by a power older than Creation and by nature prone to contaminating mortal minds. I make the reasonable offer of this very dangerous person abdicating the crown and allowing others settle the kingdom she's slowly turning to Evil by simple virtue of ruling it, but mortal considerations prevent her from accepting. This is a good sign, because it means she still has good intentions. This is a bad sign, because her attachment to Callow is the kind of narrative leverage Below will use in a heartbeat to make a full monster of her. So I make a bargain about keeping the damage under control with the Black Queen, hoping that after a clean military defeat she'll be forced to reconsider the earlier offer. On the other hand, we have to be very careful not to push her so far she'll sink into Winter and become the kind of mess that gobbles up armies before it's put down. It's a delicate dance, but I've been at this game for a very long time and I have the Saint of Swords as a contingency. Then the Battle of the Camps happens.

A full band of heroes fails to kill the Black Queen, then the Saint fails after them, and the gate trick kills a few thousand people in less time than it takes to drink a cup of tea. Then the backlash makes her fall into some sort of state – Diabolist taking the reins of the body, though I might not know that – and she faces down the entire heroic contingent simultaneously before snapping out of the fugue state and forcing a truce on the battlefield. Catherine Foundling has now proved dangerous, exceedingly hard to kill and mentally unstable. Given that she's running around with an entire fairy court's worth of power, good intentions or not she needs to be removed. The peace conference achieves that, more or less: the terms ensure I'll be around her, able to find a weakness or guide her into a redemption story that'll either kill her or turn her to good purpose in the service of the Heavens. The Tenth Crusade is repulsed in the Vales as well, but that's all right because the Black Queen is the key to settling Callow and she hasn't gone anywhere. But then the Iron Prince along my native Levant prepare for a second invasion through the Vales, and she comes seeking help. This is a very, very dangerous moment. If I do not help her, I've thrown away the story the deaths at the Battle of the Camps bought me. If I do help her, on the other hand, I might be destroying the same Grand Alliance that will be the same power bloc necessary to put her down if she gets out of control.

Cordelia Hasenbach's dream ensures peace in the west, forced restoration of Callow to Good and a unified front against the long-term term Evil threats I've spent my entire life fighting. Catherine Foundling is a young villain-trained queen with expansionist neighbours and access to power that dehumanizes her the more she uses it – the story of that descent into atrocity practically writes itself. The choice is only hard to make in the sentimental sense, and I've been doing this too long to allow sentimentality much of a weight. Only, after that, instead of running back to Praes or making Callow into some kind of nation-fortress while I discretely look for an acceptable successor, she leaves. I don't know where she's going, but there's nowhere that's not a disaster. Keter, to the Dead King? Arcadia, where she can bargain with fae? To the Everdark, where not even the Ophanim can easily look? If she went to the Tyrant of Helike that might be a relief, but months pass and she doesn't appear in the League. This is a problem, because a half-taught girl with that mantle is one thing but whatever the fae or the Dead King might make of her is a very different sort of trouble. Then Keter begins invading the north, and the game changes: no oath I took means a thing when the survival of Calernia might be at stake. So I leave, and set to shaping a story that allows me to put her down by any means necessary should she return as a true villainous Queen of Winter.

I breathed out, and it was almost jarring to think of me as myself again. The plunge had been deep and exhausting, but it'd also been necessary. Both Vivienne and Akua had been right, in their own way. Whether I came back as a monster or remained the same, the Pilgrim benefitted from having a story-wrought knife at my throat. If I was to be the Grand Alliance's gate-maker, I could either be bargained with nicely or with the reminder that a promised victory might kill me. If I was the... Queen of Moonless Night, for lack of a better name, he needed to kill me and fast or it might mean the end of the western nations. The thing was, stepping out of myself, I could finally see why he'd consider me that much of a threat. Because I did have the means, didn't I?

To tread the same path as Dread Empress Triumphant.

It wouldn't even be all that hard because the pieces were all already there, waiting to be picked up. Already I had Callowans in legionary armour and the a knightly order under my banner. The Duchess of Daoine had sworn oaths to me, and service of her armies, and from the Empire I had already stolen three legions and come to Iserre claiming more. And I could do a great deal more than that: bringing Black into the ranks of the Mighty would forge me a monster of a general who finally had the power to match his wits. I lacked mages, so while Procer bled to hold back the dead I could force the submission of the already-fracturing Praes and bring the finest sorcerers and warlocks of the continent into my forces. Malicia could kneel or be buried with the Tower, and once the rest of the east was unified the goblins would make a deal and the orcs would fall into that nascent empire naturally – I'd have Hakram, Black, and Grem One-Eye in my service, how could they not? And then we could turn west and take the gloves off. I had Hierophant and the ruins of the fortress-artefact of Liesse. I had the Wild Hunt and ties with the ruling court of Arcadia, I had the high priesthood of Night and alliance with Sve Noc themselves. Oh, he was right to be afraid I thought.

If every other choice was taken from me, it might still come to that.

"I came back," I mused as I looked up at the sky, "reeking of millennial ritual murder and fresh apotheosis, with slivers of living godhood perched on my shoulders and a sworn army of drow. I've effectively confirmed his every fear."

"He will come for you," Akua said. "I expect that to a man like him there is not a single act that would be immoral when taken in the prevention of a second Dead King's rise."

She was, I grimly thought, probably right.

"So we reach out," Vivienne said. "Make it clear that you are no such thing and offer reassurances."

"He'll still want a draw for the pattern of three," I grimaced. "Just in case."

"So what do we do?" she asked. "Because this isn't looking good, Catherine. If what I've heard about how he caught the Black Knight is true, he's not a man we want to make desperate."

I clenched my fingers and unclenched them, looking at the gate. Kairos wants to play a trick. I want to forge a peace and wield it like a blade. Tariq wants to make sure no one can end the world, or at least our little corner of it. The key would be beyond the gate, I decided. Where I already suspected the armies of the League would be marching through, and perhaps even the other Grand Alliance army as well.

"Now I know what everyone wants," I said. "So I just need to figure out how to win without making everyone else lose."

Zard

This is the best chapter I've read in a long time. A lot of times this story feels like it's stepping to the side and doing fancy spins, not stepping up and building momentum.

Barely any story makes conversation and opinions powerful, entertaining and valuable by themselves. The Guide tries a lot, almost all the time. When it pulls it off, it's something else.

ruduen

I think it's been a while since we've had that much introspection into what a story might entail. (We've had some recent thoughts on things as they unfolded, but much less speculation.) It's somehow comforting to be back to diving into just what the narrative currently presents.

Liliet

Mhm!

Took Cat long enough to notice all these things ♥ ♥ ♥

WuseMajor

Yeah, I figured she was doing it on purpose.

stevenneiman

There's kind of a sad meta-narrative as well. Tariq described Cat as the specter of Good's failings come back to haunt it, and he was right in the wrong way. Cat isn't a punishment for Good's complacency in only sending second-rate heroes to die trying to overthrow Praes. Instead, she's a punishment for Good's arrogance, and for the cycle of closing every reasonable option on a villain and then claiming that they were proven right when villains take the unreasonable option. And in trying to atone for the first failure Tariq adds layer upon layer to the second.

The extra irony is that if Tariq was willing to see past the blinders of Good and Evil he would recognize that Malicia's victory would mean peace, prosperity and a high standard of living, and he would have focused on guiding Procer to a more peaceful, less expansionist stability where they did their job in keeping back the dead and ratlings rather than invading Callow as often as Praes and with the same results.

Liliet

I think Cat's the first time the pattern of 'forcing villains to take the unreasonable option' becomes explicit.

It's something that has locked Praes into what it is, not leaving them an option better than madness on the global scale. But each madman still had choices, and it would take a very, very close look to understand that the options were bad and worse. A close look that Good wasn't taking.

Now Black has managed to somewhat... externalize it. Spread the misery around. Passing on the dilemma to a Callowan makes it visible from the outside for the first time ever.

I'm not really blaming heroes and the House of Light for this pattern having shaken out into what it was in the first place, I guess is my point. They did not have a vantage point to see it from.

I'm going to love seeing their reaction now 😊

antoninjohn

So even now the Grey Pilgrim is trying to kill Cat instead of accepting her offers to work together to stop the Dead King and bring peace, well that story probably won't work out well for him

Caerulea

To be fair, with what he knows he has a damn good reason. Cat is right that if she dove into her power as the sovereign of the moonless nights, she would be near unkillable, and not the kind of opponent you are merely defeated by. She would be similar to the dead king, but with Fairy Gates, which are a massive force multiplier. It would be devastating, and even the smallest chance of it happening must be planned for. So he starts preparing to stop her if he needs to. I think it ends mostly fine.

Stormblessed

Not just that I feel. We don't know how strong triumphant was, just that she ground the whole continent under her foot. The Dead King is horrible but at the very least limited. If his worst fears come to pass Car could be a great deal worse than the Dead King, some kind of monstrous amalgamation of both the Dead King and Triumphant.

SITB

To build on your comment, Tariq is right to fear her. She mentioned in this chapter the ways to gather power to crush the Grand Alliance, but this is just window dressing. Look at how he described Cat 'the sin of our indolence returned to haunt us'; Cat is their failures coming back to haunt them, the story is on her side!

She won't be the Dead King or Dread Empress Triumphant seeking to bring the west under her rule, she will come to seek redress and retribution for the west's faults.

Hell, she could possibly even say something like "I am the punishment of the Gods, if you had not committed great sins, the Gods would have not sent a punishment like me upon you" and conceivably get away with this.

Fayhem

My brain is now combining Akua's tendency to direct inappropriate endearments towards Cat and the quote you used into a whole new take on Catherine the Hun. Why am I like this?

caoimhinh

And also, Cat has something none of the other villains has: she can play the role of Heroine in stories. That gives her an edge the others simply don't have and makes her dangerous.

Rey d`Tutto

Framing. To put within a frame.
Viewpoint of the narrative.
Villainous Callowan Hero.

Someguy

That his every action will turn Cat into a successful Second Coming of Triumphant would be the greatest irony.

ahd

Gods Below might be playing 6D chess. Cat wants to not be the second iteration of Triumphant, so they will use the Pilgrim to take away every other choice from her.

haihappen

That makes a cruel, and ironic, sort of sense to me.
Cat: "I will not champion your cause and will work to end this game you are playing!"
Above+Below, in an eerie double voice: "Yeah, we will see about that."

NerfContessa

Well,... If they had done that earlier it might have 2orked.

Liliet

Did she actually make that offer to him? I don't recall her actually saying it at any point.

haihappen

Before the Battle of the Camps, also during.

Liliet

To stop the Dead King? 0.0

RanVor

She offered him an alliance against Praes. It doesn't require a big leap of logic to extrapolate that she'd be willing to ally against Keter as well.

Liliet

Oh, that much is obvious enough. It's in her interest, it's even in Kairos's. But that doesn't tell him what she'll want in return.

He's talked to her when she was desperate and begging, fallen back to the bare minimum she couldn't fold on.

Right now she's in a strong position – stronger, Catherine's realizing, than she'd thought. She could easily say 'anyway you can't make me abdicate if I don't want to'. If she wanted to, she could fucking conquer Procer and demand tribute – all in return for help against Dead King, because for all that she's ""willing"" to lend it, she can afford to withhold it and Procer cannot afford for her to.

Oh, in reality, Cat cannot. Between the drow and the dwarves, she's committed to this, and she's as desperate as she ever was to make things go just so. But that's the shatranj board on the ground, not the one he's playing on™. And Catherine's not making it known that she's desperate for one specific outcome, because she does need the leverage: it's just that she needs it for Liesse Accords, not for... any number of villainous plans she could, in the eyes of the Pilgrim, plausibly have.

And now that the crows are barring him from reading her, there's no way for him to know she doesn't, no matter what she says. He wasn't particularly good at reading people and estimating them based on their words and actions and general personality when he was young, before Behold, and since then he'll only have lost the skill. He hasn't needed it in what, fifty years? His talks with Catherine might as well be a text chat for all of how much he can tell how sincere she is from them.

And the worst-case scenario is very very very bad.

RanVor

Yes, because the current scenario is so very, very good.

Liliet

It is.

And he has no idea, because during the peace conference, Cat squandered the chance to come clean and offer genuine and honest and open alliance in favor of a play that ended up handing him the beginning of a victorious pattern of three, and her a soulless body.

RanVor

Procer in flames, with the Dead King invading on a scale unseen for centuries. A principality almost burned to the ground by the Legions of Terror. The Tyrant of Helike playing his games in the Grand Alliance's backyard. Half of the Ashuran fleet gone. The Tenth Crusade crumbling, completely out of control.

Think again.

Liliet

The dwarves and the drow poised to strike at the Dead King's back. Praes too embroiled in its own games to be a threat to anything outside its borders, and Callow standing guard and providing buffer for if that changes, as it always has. The most powerful villain on the continent actively looking out for the rest of it and trying to prevent bloodshed. The second most powerful one still acknowledging the necessity of not losing to Dead King and playing political/diplomatic games rather than slaughtering his neighbours. The First Prince of Procer actually a mostly-competent person who cares about her realm and greater good both.

It could be so, so, so much worse.

RanVor

And all of this would have happened way earlier (or wouldn't have needed to happen at all), with significantly less bloodshed, if not for Tariq and his oh-so-flawless heuristics. He's essentially become his own biggest obstacle.

Also, competent Cordelia? Are you sure we're reading the same web serial?

Liliet

She's not quite competent enough for the clusterfuck going on. But she did end the fucking civil war, which requires... quite a level of competence. It's just that it's like...

an actual dog <<< stupid person < average person < average ruler << Cordelia Hasenbach < a person who could actually manage the situation properly in her position

RanVor

She's not quite competent enough to not start the clusterfuck that is currently going on. And she did end the civil war mostly by winning battles and making promises. She does have some skill in diplomacy, but ultimately she hasn't achieved anything she didn't promptly fuck up.

BTW, how is it that not knowing things is not an excuse for Juniper, but it is for Cordelia and Tariq?

Liliet

I mean if I were in charge of them the same way Cat's in charge of Juniper, I'd lecture them more than Cat did her :3

Note how Cat yelling at Juniper at length didn't actually lead to her saying "nevermind I was wrong the Hellhound was a talentless hack all along"

RanVor

I can't help but notice you haven't answered my question...

Liliet

What question? Why it's an excuse for one but not the others?

The answer is, your premise is wrong. Depending on how you parse the word 'excuse', it's either an excuse for all of them (their level of competence is high but not that high), or not an excuse for any of them (their level of competence is high but not that high, and that is not high enough)

RanVor

My premise is, Juniper is shat on for making mistakes due to limited knowledge, while Cordelia and Pilgrim get a pass, despite their mistakes being much more numerous and disastrous.

Liliet

Whoever's shitting on Juniper is wrong?

RanVor

You know what, nevermind. I give up. I was a fool to think I could convince you.

Liliet

Convince me of what, to shit on characters who've made mistakes out of insufficient information? Yeah, that's a hard sell

RanVor

That there is this annoying thing called responsibility for one's actions, and it gives a total amount of zero fucks about your reasons.

Liliet

Responsibility, yes.
How does it work, in your eyes?

RanVor

How does it work in YOUR eyes? Because it seems like it doesn't work at all.

Liliet

In my eyes it works like how Bard characterized Black – suck it up and keep trying / try again. If you know what you did wrong, do it different this time. Keep going until you no longer can.

Amadeus strikes me as a character who understands responsibility possibly the best – or one of the best – in this story.

RanVor

"It was one thing to make a mistake; it was another thing to keep making it."
– Jodi Picoult, Handle with Care

Aside from the fact that what you described has very little to do with responsibility in the sense I meant it (and only slightly more with responsibility in general), the quote above sums up 90% of my problem with Pilgrim quite nicely. If he just made a mistake, it wouldn't be a big deal. However, not only does he keep repeating that mistake again and again, making things worse for everybody with every iteration, he is praised for doing so. He refuses to acknowledge that his approach failed and instead of adjusting his strategy, he tries to brute-force it over and over, with increasingly disastrous consequences.

Is it really too much to ask for Pilgrim to pull his head out of his ass, realize how much harm he has caused and back off, maybe returning later with a different approach? Like, you know, a reasonable person whose actions end up producing results opposite to intended?

Also, it occurred to me that Pilgrim is the perfect example of what's wrong with the idea of preemptive strike. Acting against a perceived threat, you often end up creating a very real threat you are not prepared to deal with.

Liliet

I think the main factor in our disagreement here is, I don't think the problems in the situation are Pilgrim's fault to the degree that you think they are. I think he was at the mercy of circumstances, and he can't looking back see a single moment where he could actually fix the situation.

Partially this is because PART OF THE PROBLEM is incomplete information that he has. We the readers from bird's eye view can invent all kinds of hypotheticals about how things could have gone better, but he doesn't know the facts that are part of our view on it.

He still doesn't know about most of the mistakes he's made. Most of the information he didn't have, he still doesn't. In fact, he has a smaller percentage of total necessary information now than he did at first, because now Cat's not letting him read her, either.

He is making rational based on incomplete information. I would disagree that these decisions have made things that much worse / are making things that much worse either. He could have done better if he had had fully complete information, true, but I'm seeing him doing fairly well with what he has.

- actually talking to the terrifying Black Queen and walking away with a largely correct impression of her and a terms of engagement agreement
- seizing upon her willingness to be reasonable and attempt to build a heroic story to follow through with it and guide her to actual redemption
- after the chance for diplomatic approach is thoroughly demolished by the Arch-Heretic thing (he has no idea how determined Catherine is to do this diplomatically, she didn't exactly tell him), he goes back to Procer to try to fix what he can
- successfully stops a rampaging villain from burning any more farmland / plunging any more of the Principate heartlands into chaos in the face of invasion
- in the face of having no idea what's going to go wrong next, makes himself a universal tool that will help in dealing with 90% of possible threats (unfortunately not Kairos)

I'm seeing Grey Pilgrim as fairly competent and reasonable. His weak points are largely evaluating/predicting people, so he acts based on "hope for the best prepare for the worst" heuristic wrt those.

RanVor

It doesn't really matter, because I no longer have any interest in discussing this matter with you. You have officially depleted my reserves of patience.

Liliet

Fair.

Isaac Martinez

We can look at the story in another way, if we look Catherine as Indolence's Reaction. When Tariq met our Queen, he should have seen already that Cat is not a old style villain, but he plans as if that were the case in the Battle of Camps, and when he is taken as hostage he doesn't react to Cat's Pain (Indolence), and Cat reacts and leave.

In the end, Tariq never shows Mercy to the enemy.

Fayhem

> In the end, Tariq never shows Mercy to the enemy.

It should be noted that it is canon that Mercy and Compassion are separate Choirs. I think that provides some very useful context on what exactly Mercy means to Tariq/the Choir backing him.

RanVor

I honestly cannot imagine how mercy could work without compassion and not be a horribly warped parody of itself.

Fayhem

I mean, it's not like it's a coincidence that Tariq gets classed under "old monster" more often than not. Heck, I mostly like the guy and I'll still admit there's a good bit of truth there – that was kind of my point honestly. I dunno if you read it, but I did a whole long thing a while back about how the Choirs defining virtue exclusively in the terms of their own narrow slice of it very strongly tends to produce warped results (which means a hero swearing to a specific Choir can be reasonably described as essentially a power boost in exchange for some dubious moral side effects – sounds almost familiar, doesn't it?). And when Mercy is defined solely and exclusively as "minimizing suffering" then it's basically just utilitarianism without any brakes and that will pretty much always take you to some real morally uncomfortable places in a hurry.

RanVor

I did indeed read it, although I didn't realize you were the person who wrote it.

Well, Tariq himself isn't completely devoid of compassion. The Choir behind him on the other hand... Let's just say this train of thought can get really terrifying, really fast.

Fayhem

Yeah, having different usernames in different places can def make it harder to track that stuff lol. And I think I'd say I'm about 1000% in agreement with everything in your second paragraph there!

kinigget

Yes

Exactly

That's the point

danh3107

This is a very weird but interesting chapter, it manages to progress the story but not really progress the situation the characters are in. huh

Also cat needs to stop going full Black, when you go full Black you can never go back.

Liliet

Wait until she starts saying "I am exactly as expendable as any other person", that's when you sound the alarm.

Like, she already more or less figures that. But when she starts SAYING it,

Novice

I see what you did there (͡° ͜ʖ ͡°)

Aotrs Commander

On the contrary, I think going Black is absolutely the best option and she should do it more. Hell, Black should go Black more.

(Pilgrim, on the other hand should just go die in a fire...)

RanVor

Dying in a fire is a waste, he should go die from the blades of the dead. Preferably right now.

Alex Straughan

Or better yet, how about the zombies of all the children he's murdered eat him alive.
Because you know, he murders children.

TwilightGlimmer

Eh, Pilgrim's a lot like Black in practice but he doesn't have as much fun at it

Liliet

He also doesn't have suicidal depression so I'd say it shakes out about even 😊

Javvies

Interesting.

Huh. I think the Alliance has been misinterpreting Augur's warning about the fall of Procer if they just let Cat walk away. The threat isn't Cat or internal revolt, the threat is the gates and the Arcadia/Creation boundaries getting ripped open and the Alliance not being able to respond in time.

IDKWhoitis

I want to imagine words about not being cryptic, and possibly a couple of slaps and punches, will follow Cat meeting Augur. I just hope Cat doesn't see her as a physical manifestation of fate, because we know what Cat promised to do to those.

Someguy

I just want to see what would happen if Augur takes a good look at Sve Noc with her Ornithomancy.

caoimhinh

Cordelia: Agnes, what do you see?

Augur: Two black crows flying north.

Cordelia: What does that mean?

Augur: That Procer is saved, but you are screwed.

Or else a string of incoherent words about doom, woe, terror, nightmare and other similar words, since that seems to be what everyone sees when gazing at Sve Noc, hahaha.

I love the first version.

IDKWhoitis

I've heard the Augar actually enjoys Bird Watching.

IDKWhoitis

I'm betting there is some horrifying Gate trip incoming. Reunion with Masego and Archer. And probably a very scary talk with Grey about temptations and threats.

Because let's be honest, when's the last time Cat did diplomacy without some threats.

ninegardens

Gate trip!
Bring Grey with you.

Break the pattern of three with a "Mutual victory".

Everything will be nice.

Also, god damn, if Cat is right, Pilgrim is a terrifying, effective, and sympathetic monster.

Hmm, if the army of Callow crossed with 40 thousand soldiers shouldn't their numbers be much less than 37 thousand after the losses they incurred during this campaign?

Well, it will be interesting how the next battle plays out, it certainly isn't on the battlefield anyone expected. It makes me wonder where is Indrani since Cat sent her to find Masego without any clue but apparently Cat found him first. Archer might appear in there since similar Gates would be appearing across Iserre right now. She might even make a dramatic entry to save the day.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I would argue it has only happened twice (one by William and another by Sve Noc) because Cat embracing Winter title didn't kill her, Wekesa was very wrong about that.

Liliet

There was a chapter called that.

And Cat did die at Liesse per se, she just didn't lose information in the process. That's the part Wekesa was wrong about, not the death itself.

Also I'm still curious wtf happened with that sword stabbing that Amadeus sent her off into the Name dream quest with way back when

ninegardens

That wasn't a death-that was just a light stabbing!

What's a light stabbing between-

Wait.

Okay, so you know how Cat "Branded" William when she let him go, and story totally backed her up on that.

And... the last time she saw Black, she stabbed him, said "Come back when you a better person", and hasn't seen him since (what did he do wrong again?).

Does that count?

Did she brand a story onto him, and is that likely to overthrow the story Bard tried to brand on him back in the free cities?

Am I correct in suspecting that either/both of these count?
Has this been discussed before?

Liliet

Yep.

I am pretty sure that happened both between Bard and Black, and Cat and Black.

I also can't unsee them as working in the same direction.

(Feels like a sin, doesn't it? / Become a better person, or else)

(Also, I'm pretty sure Cat stabbing Black at that point was the finishing of a pattern he'd deliberately started way back when, discharging the entire death flag collection he'd gotten in an impressive display of "if you treat someone well don't be too surprised when it backfires on you and they refuse to kill you")

Liliet

Also what Black did wrong was... ok hear me out: I'm pretty sure he set up the situation in Liesse to break Cat's trust deliberately, to advance the story of the student eventually turning on their mentor. He'd just seen Cat ardently refuse to accept the possibility of his death, and instead of going "you know what maybe surviving is a worthwhile thing to try after all" he went "she's wrong and I'll make her see it with blunt force if I have to".

Amadeus is convinced he's a bad person. It's what he'd told to Cat before ("I am the most selfish person you will ever meet"), it's what he told her in Reunion ("I saw it in your eyes the first time we met: the best of me without the worst of me"), it's what he told her at the post-Liesse conversation ("Not that I consider it to improve the principle of behavior").

His position is "I am a bad person therefore I deserve to die and I am not including personal survival in my long-term goals and never have".

Cat's response is basically a slap upside the head and a "If you're a bad person because you're doing things you know to be bad things HAVE YOU CONSIDERED TRYING TO NOT DO THEM"

Amadeus: "nah if you want me to not betray your trust you'll just have to kill me"

Catherine: "nice try now go and fucking fix it yourself" - kicks him out-

Jarthion1

I very much agree with you on every point except Black believing that he needs to die BECAUSE he is evil. His actions are totally mechanical and morality is just another tool for him. He may believe that he needs to die, but if he does than it's likely because that is the sacrifice that will win his game (almost certainly by pushing cat in a particular direction)

Liliet

"His actions are totally mechanical", huh.

I keep wondering how people think this works. Is there a program inputted into him by an external programmer that tells him what to do? Did he roll dice for what outcome he wants? Did he get it handed from above (lol) as a divine decree?

Amadeus is motivated by something. Even if it's at this point just pride and desire to achieve the goal he's set, that's still fucking emotion! An amoral one, but perfectly mechanical is an absurd premise. Not just "wrong for this particular character", it's absurd. Self-defeating. Amadeus is not just a machine, because every machine needs an operator to set it in motion – who's the operator of his, if not he himself?

Kairos has called him out on losing sight of his goal, failing to keep his eyes on the prize, allowing his goals to indeed boil down to pride and achieving what he's set out to achieve for the sake of achievement.

But he's still the same person who'd once set the goal. He changed, sure, trauma molds and shapes people, moral trauma in particular – doing things they do not want to think of themselves as doing. But person + trauma = person, it doesn't categorically change the state, unless it's straight to corpse. But Amadeus is alive yet.

Like... I'm not even going to argue about what emotions we've seen him express, how we've seen him react, the philosophy he espouses, not at this point. I'm just pointing out that by definition his actions cannot be totally mechanical. It's an oxymoron.

A sacrifice that will win the game. What IS the game?

Qwormuli

Yup. Or at least mostly. The currently mentally vacant ragdoll might ACT with mechanical game theory logic disregarding feelings (of his and others) most of the time and even priding himself upon it, but that doesn't mean that he doesn't feel and want. While deciding on the most meta beneficial course of action, he does have the impulses others do, but just ignores them and locks them in a box in favor of the greater drive of his -the one that made him the Black Knight (also a human want).

But, that's the but. He does feel, but he doesn't strategically act or plan like he does (towards the goal that he, the thinking and feeling human being has set, yes), so Jarthion1 isn't totally wrong, either. That is what his soulscape projects, the man made into a clockwork. His set of internal values are inherently intrinsic and the arms of the clock tick. An oxymoron, yes, but remember that the man behind it is self admittedly hypocritical. And I agree, that that hypocrisy sometimes drives him towards his own grave, because to him he NEEDS to be an unimportant piece.

Liliet

I don't think he's as good at reducing himself to a machine making perfectly mechanical judgements towards the initially-set goal as he's trying to be / as you think he is.

I love Amadeus, but he's just... not that good at it. He's still human, and still acts and thinks and makes decisions like a human.

A human who's trying very hard to be a perfect rationalist, but does NOT succeed all the way.

Ali Khan

And even if you do argue that winter killed cat, that just means sve Nov didn't kill her and she was resurrected anyway at that point.

She's been resurrected twice. There won't be a third.

haihappen

Things happen in Threes, or only work on the Third Time, aka, the "Rule of Three".

Threes: A thing works three times, not after. I think the Rise aspect was an example of that?

Third Time('s the Charm):

1) An attempted action will only work on the third try, e.g. The underdog protagonist archer that shoots 3 arrows will do crappy on the first too, and after brief introspection, will shoot true on the third.

2) An action performed in reaction to an event when it the event happens the third time will always succeed, e.g., the archery type Named that attacked the dragon in the Vale.

3) "There will not be a Third Time" is only valid if 2 actions before had no consequences, making the third fail by action of another party, and as such can be seen as manifestation of (2) from the opposite viewpoint. This usually applies to a feat that a character can perform readily, and will not work on the same enemy/obstacle a third time. This is a variation of "It Only Works Once"

I can definitely see Cat dying one more time.

Panic

Not Everything is a pattern of Three. That has been a official thing two time so far. Cat and Williams whole joust and what this is shaping up to be. But I agree. Catrine The Thrice Risen sounds much better than Catrine The Four Times Risen

Mental Mouse

I was thinking Cat would have 9 lives....

Liliet

TOOK YOU LONG ENOUGH TO NOTICE CAT.

Wow this analysis is a relief. We finally have proper perspective for this shit.

Also, Catherine Foundling is wonderful and amazing and EVERYONE IS GOING TO WIN ♥ ♥ ♥

Andrew Mitchell

So lovely to have it all laid out so nicely. The analysis certainly filled in a lot of missing pieces for me.

Liliet

Mhm!

"Pilgrim. Hey. Buddy. So like... you don't want every one to die, and I know I sure as hell don't want everyone to die, and I am no longer possessed by Winter maddness, and like... I would really LOVE to get my army up north to mess with the Dead king, so how's about you help me with this whole Arcadia problem"

"Did I mention, once we beat Namesha back I'm planning to drop my army of supersoldiers on top of Keter, shuck off this Priesthood, and retire to the country side. You can read my mind- you KNOW that I'm honest."

"Also, seriously, we're about to go vs the Dead frickin' king, do you mind giving me my Black knight back so that we can aim him at some REAL enemies, Possibly even reform Pareas a little bit?"

Also, I know Cat is scared about getting murdered via redemption story... but its also worth noting that a redemption story might cost you your life, but narratively speaking, it will also BUY you a heck of a lot. As in, it could probably buy you those accords you were hoping for.

Also also, we all know that Pilgrim is messed up... do you think she could roll HIM into a redemption arc. Because that sure as hell looks like what she's done to Black.

ninegardens

"also, if I gate north, I'm happy for your armies to hitchhike with. That's like 200,000 soldiers, showing up tactically in the middle of Skulltors battle lines, wiggles eyebrows. I mean, you don't trust me, but seriously, have you got any better ways to get a WIN here? Cause... way we're playing at the moment, both of us are just going to lose more slowly..."

caoimhinh

The hilarity of when they negotiate Cat gating them north through Arcadia will be when they find out that she needs to have overall command of those forces for the trip to be safe for them. They are going to be royally pissed off, but can do nothing about it.

Liliet

OH MAN THIS WAS THE IDEA I HAD ALL THE WAY BACK DURING BOOK 4

PLEASE LET THIS HAPPEN

Qwormuli

Yup, I've just waited and waited for that requirement of command ruining somebody's morning royally to either a hilarious or ghastly effect.

Alegio

It would be funnier if she just dropped them near the DK and then gated back with her armies, leaving them in a desperate situation to either kill/maim the dead king or die.

Good enough story leverage against the dead king, but also against herself later as a revenge story where she is the traitorous villain.

Mikasi

ahem

What time is it, DK?

It's Hoot Droop o'Cloooooock!

Liliet

This depends on Cat being able to talk the crows into the 'you can read my mind' thing. Looks to me like they're rather territorial there :3

ahd

He's not listening. Cat must die. It is known.

Liliet

I like the analogy made on Discord. She's a six year old with a nuke. It doesn't matter what she's saying, she needs to lose the fucking nuke.

ahd

Fear is like that. (:

Sylwoos

Except that she already detonated the nuke and is now only directing the explosion.

The sisters got the apotheosis he feared and now stand on Cat shoulder. Even if she die, those two are not going anywhere. The drows are coming to the surface lead by two goddess made of night and Winter regardless of what happen between Cat and The Pilgrim. Loosing Cat at this point would be disastrous, because she's the one catalyzing that mess in the good direction.

ahd

But Saint would feel better about everything after Cat was dead – for the months necessary for her to realise that the war was lost and the West was gone and the Enemy had everything and her hands had chopped down the last hope of preventing that.

And the Peregrine could put aside that annoying, all-consuming, obsessively paranoid fear about the Black Queen suddenly changing her entire set of goals and priorities and focus on losing the war with maximum style and minimum hope of saving anything from the wreck.

Surely it's not reasonable to ask them to be any better than that; surely expecting them to do the same amount of thinking as this half-taught Callowan girl is a bridge too far. They're heroes.

Jarthon1

Fear can be a very powerful motivator. In this case that fear is, if not justified, then at least rational. She said herself that if she had no other path than following in Triumphant and the Dead Kings footsteps is an option that she would take. The consequences of this are likely a victory for evil on the continent of Calernia. Massive loss of life on all sides that only eventually leads to an all out war between the fully evil and actualized Cat and the Dead king as the only two remaining surface powers on the continent. We know from the Everdark ark that fights between two forces of evil without any intervention from good is seriously bad news. The Grey Pilgrim may even know that this is an unlikely course for Cat to take, but it is a legitimate possibility that would be on the scale of or maybe even worse than WWII and the holocaust on earth. He can and should (from what we know about his character and morality) take any and all actions necessary to prevent this situation.

RanVor

Yes, except he's dooming Calernia by doing so.

Liliet

Tariq has good reasons to be wary of Cat.

And expecting anything of Saint... uhhhhh... ehhhh... how do I put this...

She's Miko Miyazaki -_-

RanVor

Tariq's good reasons have gotten thousands killed so far. How many more have to die before they stop being good?

Liliet

Arguing from Consequence is a fallacy. Retrospect is 20/20, that doesn't mean the basic heuristics he used are Horribly Stupid / Morally Wrong / whatever people are arguing. They were not well-calibrated to this situation, because he's eighty and this is the first time he's encountered something like this not only in person but probably even in story.

RanVor

Road to hell is paved with good intentions.

I'll put it this way: if a person has good reason to believe their neighbor is a terrorist, and go to great lengths to expose said neighbor, inadvertently causing deaths of several unrelated people, only to find out too

RanVor

...late that they were wrong, is the person in question innocent?

Liliet

That's what Cat knows.

Tariq has no idea.

RanVor

Well, at least that explains why Tariq has been spending his entire screentime fucking up everything he touched.

ahd

Fear's like that.

Personally, I would like to see a Peregrine POV chapter where he is going over this reasoning from his end, to see how much of it Cat and Akua got right. Maybe while he's sitting in the ashes trying to figure out where it went wrong, and why.

Halinn

It went wrong when he slighted a Callowan. He's paying the Long Price.

Mental Mouse

Here, have this Internet. But seriously: Yeah Pilgrim is a pretty good schemer, but Masego is something big that he probably has no clue about. Modulo Choir info of course, but given the level of play here, it's unclear what they know about him or his goals. The question is, can Cat deal with it, with an army at her back?

Mammon

There is one other option, one that Cat cannot consider as she doesn't know the heaven's plans like we do and is set in certain beliefs. (And which may not be the case at all considering the very title of this book series.) Tariq fears that she will redefine good and evil as the ultimate final ploy to get the last victory.

How often can a villain win? As often as they want, until they're stopped. But how often can a villain win in a scrap against overwhelming odds while keeping in mind the ethical costs and brooding over them in between adventures, before stories will turn her into a hero? How often can a villain be a justified reactionary force against the leaders of the good guys being the aggressors and initial villains?

Why is Cat a villain at all? Because she was the Squire, trained by the Black Knight. But from a different perspective, wouldn't the man who liberated and fought for equal rights of two species that have been enslaved for centuries, who fought to end the bloodshed and villainry of his kingdom and others alike, who against normal people always prefers to peacefully subjugate and recruit, be a villain? Would a Squire from the good-aligned Callow really be a villain by default, when trying to protect and liberate Callow?

Meanwhile, the part that Cat doesn't know, the heavens are planning complete continent and status quo destruction. If opposed by the right person the right way, that's a villain's plot to be thwarted by a hero. Meanwhile, the choirs are old relics controlling the world as tyrants based upon times when slavery was still good, and they've been objective villains every time in Cat's adventures. Meanwhile, Tariq is a king-killer. He knows that with the right push and the right pivot, down the road Cat can be a hero that turns the entire board and all the stories around.

It has already been defined that good and evil can change over the centuries. It has already been established that the heavens and the good are none really 'good' and pure no more. The Ebb and Tide making all others hate the Principality, Levants being war-craving barbarians, etc.

Meanwhile, Callow is practically at war with all the active evil forces; the Dead King, the Free Cities, Preas. But the neutral dwarves are now allied to them (and no longer to the Principality), and the former drow are now neutrals by centuries of isolation from the course of political events, who assume a roll of the greater good by sealing the Dead King.

Looking at the playing pieces, the northern principalities are definately still good. Fighting the ratlings kept them good, and the first prince is currently one of theirs unlike all the first princes of previous generations. That's one piece on the board perfect for this move of redefining who's good and who's not.

And then there's the Hierarch, a piece literally able to make this redefinment of Good and Evil stick lawfully. Accompanied by a Tyrant that corrupts and exposes all the villains amongst the good guys.

My prediction: Cat sneaks up on Tariq, says Joink and snatches the hero title away from the good guys to save the world and overthrow the tyrannical Choirs in their almost cartoonish plot to destroy the continent.

Liliet

The heavens aren't planning shit. The heavens aren't even interfering to make it clear to the House of Light which side of the war they're backing.

Saint's a solo lunatic, possibly egged on by Bard for Bard's own purposes.

Daniel E

I'll just throw this out there for everyone who didn't; ahem nods "May she never return".

haihappen

That would be the ultimate twist: The Bard setting up all the pieces on the board to produce a second Triumphant.

Speaking of Which:

What does the Bard want? What is it's End Game? No one knows, maybe not even the Bard. Probably not the Bard.

Only One thing for sure: The bard plays a game, and Cat very much wants to flip the table, board and all.

Riaan Theunissen

Considering that the Bard has been the tool of both Above and Below for so long... I expect that she either wants freedom or to totally derail the plans of whichever side denied her the choice of joining.

Qwormuli

I think that she wants out. Whether it's by ending the world or without it ending is pending.

Andrew Mitchell

IMO the Bard's role is to keep the game going forever. Sometimes working for Good, sometimes Evil, but always stirring the pot to keep the stories going.

As to what she wants personally? I suspect that she doesn't want to do it anymore but she can't find a way out.

Alshain

Id love for her to return and help Cat as an advisor. That would be a good board flip move.

Mental Mouse

Also: It's a pity for Cat that she sent off Archer before she found out where Masego was....

I suspect she's going to become a brick joke... maybe as Masego's emissary.

Alegio

1. May she never return

2. That sounds like a neat plan so... Come on Cat, just do it! It's not an evil empire if you treat your people well and keep the ritual sacrifices to a bare minimum.

Fayhem

My issue with the term "evil empire" is that it's redundant. Empire is evil. The core of the concept is forcibly putting disparate peoples under a banner they didn't accept, and there just isn't a version of that where it doesn't regularly produce atrocities of varying scale as a byproduct of the maintenance of that power structure. There's a reason everybody on Calernia hates Procer, and that reason boils down to it keeps attempting empire.

RanVor

Except in reality it's more complicated than that. Many empires, both historical and fictional, provided safety and stability to the people under their rule. It is often more beneficial to join the empire than to fight it. Of course, it greatly depends on how it is governed, but empires that keep people in check only by sheer military force tend to fall very quickly.

Fayhem

It's certainly correct that history is a large and very complicated place. I don't think there's much of anything you can say in a sentence or a handful of sentences that's going to be 100% true about history at large. It's true that there have certainly been a number of times/places where some version of "well, they'll brutalize you if you try to leave or make too many of your own decisions, but as long as you don't feel like any of that it's better than getting turned into ground beef by some barbarian raiders or that even worse empire across the river or something" is the smallest evil on offer. It's true that very few empires stand on the mere use of force alone. It's also true that even fewer respond to "dissension" (thinking for yourself) and "rebellion" (wanting to rule yourselves) with anything else. I don't think it's unreasonable to consider that morally problematic at the minimum; or, you know, evil.

Put another way: not every empire is King Leopold in the Congo. Pretty much every empire insists on the right to become that if they ever feel like it, because that's what it means when you don't accept the concept of the people you rule having a say in how they're governed or in whether you rule them at all. I'm not good with that.

Democracies are certainly fully capable of some real fucked-up shit even when they're not engaging in projecting their own version of empire (see: Bellerophon, for a relevant fictional example), but I still pretty strongly believe that it is inherently a superior form of government in the general sense. The kind of monarchies that are what are realistically on offer on Calernia (to bring this back towards the Guide) are pretty goddamn far from what I'd consider ideal, but when they're ruling over their own respective peoples who generally accept their legitimacy that's a damn sight better than when any of them go out and start trying to murder their way into an empire.

Not sure if this actually stayed on point the whole way through, but I'm almost at the end of my shift and I don't really have the brain cycles left to edit this. Here's hoping it made sense!

Liliet

I would say: Good Empire is an oxymoron (hi Procer yes we would like to have a discussion), but there's still distance between 'meh Empire' and full on 'Evil Empire' XD

There's a lot of intermediate steps between what empires inevitably are and fucking Praes.

"Evil" vs "Evil Evil" so to speak D

Fayhem

That's a fair distinction! There's definitely a difference between empire as "this concept inherently requires morally defunct actions to establish and maintain it" vs empire as "did you guys paint numbers past 10 onto your Evil Dial"; e.g., Rome, where they pretty regularly committed atrocities but usually had good-for-the-times governance for those under their rule + most of the people they were fighting weren't real nice either vs. (infamously) the Nazis and pretty often the Soviets (especially under Stalin) IRL.

Liliet

Yep.

Qwormuli

I'd say evil vs Evil, but in this particular place that has different connotations...

Liliet

yeah lmao
ah, terminology ;u;

Alex Straughan

It's been stated many times that Cat can't kill Tariq. It's not quite true though.

If she actually exposed the many unforgivable crimes he's committed even Levant would turn on him.

Even classic villains would be jealous of his Evil resume.
Killed family? Check
Abandoned loved ones? Check
Murdered entire innocent villages for power? Check Broken his word? Check
Used a magical plague on his own allies? Check Burned thousands of people alive? Check
This is just we know about.

Liliet

Wait, that last one?

Also you're double counting at least one lmao

Liliet

(and have a really fucking wild definition of 'for power')

RanVor

Actually, just murdering the Holy Seljun would probably be enough to turn Levant on him. Shame Cat doesn't know about it.

Qwormuli

No it wouldn't. In essence he IS the holy Seljun and the nation would be willing to murder him on the spot, if Tariq started fancying the seat. Historically, Seljun was the closest seplacement to pilgrim. That now exists.

RanVor

No, he isn't. The original Grey Pilgrim was the first Holy Seljun of Levant, and the royal line is descended from him. But it has since become its own position, and I do not believe Tariq is the second Grey Pilgrim ever.

Qwormuli

"The Lady of Tartessos discreetly made the Mark of Mercy with her fingers, as he did, for while she might be vicious wretch even she knew the respect due to the living breath of the Pilgrim's Blood. Even out on the outskirts of the Brocelian Forest it was known that the man who should be the Holy Seljun of Levant was not the one sitting the Tattered Throne." -Interlude: Congregation I

Is this enough of a proof? A character saying in-story, that it is an ubiquitous agreement across the country, that Pilgrim is the Seljun that should be?

konstantinvoncarstein

- 1: Killed family? Check
- 2: Abandoned loved ones? Check
- 3: Murdered entire innocent villages for power?
- 4: Broken his word? Check
- 5: Used a magical plague on his own allies? Check
- 6: Burned thousands of people alive?

1: Only one member, who would have started an hopeless war, wich would have caused thousands of senseless deaths. It was the only reason for it, and absolutely not a villainous one.

2: Yes, because he had a greater call. So, a typical heroic characteristic.

3: For power? Have you read the story? He did it to capture Amadeus. Okay, it was horrible and inexcusable, but it is clearly not for his own benefit, and more for the common good.

4: Yes, and inexcusable. He makes it impossible to ever trust him.

5: Cfr 3

6: When? I honestly don't remember.

So I don't think he is villainous per se. More of an anti-hero, or as Catherine described herself, "the one prick in every heroic band that crossed lines for the Greater Good".

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Reqqe

"and bring the finest sorcerers and warlocks of the continent into my forces"

Do we have any clues on what the difference is between a sorcerer and a warlock?

Maybe "sorcerer" is another word for "mage"? And "warlock" about treating with devils?

Liliet

I think they're near-synonyms that are put together for the stylistic effect of amplification here.

Chapter 30: Weaver; Woven

"Just as planned."

-Inscription on the front gates of the mausoleum of Dread Emperor Traitorous

The locals called them 'Mavian prayers'.

Centuries ago, before these were lands of princes and plots, what was now called Iserre had been the cradle of a war between the Arlesite regales of the south and the proud Alamans chieftains of the heartlands. The few respectable books written on the subject in that era – penned by Atalante or Stygian scholars, when not by Ashuran officials – agreed that the Arlesites had been on the winning side more often than not. The current lay of Iserre itself spoke to those victories: though many of its people spoke Chantant, it was Tolesian that was the most common tongue and Arlesite customs that were most kept to. The land has been won by the aggressive southerners leading warbands out of their stone keeps, Alamans tribesmen slowly forced out of their ancestral holdings by a thousand lost skirmishes. Those old tribes must have had a hundred names, but as a tapestry of tightly-knit kin and cultures they'd been colloquially known as the Mavii. And though eventually forced into flight further north, these Mavii had left behind the marks of what had once been a powerful and wealthy confederacy. The so-called 'Mavian prayers' were more common sight in northern Iserre, it was true, but even in the rest it was not uncommon to see long rows of grey raised stones sketching out some symbol or meaning now long lost.

Iserrans now insisted those stones had been raised as prayers to the Gods Above, each representing a passage from the Book of All Things, but the Wasteland books I'd read on the subject of Procer had expressed a great deal of skepticism on the subject. For one, the Alamans had not kept to the House of Light as it was now known. Every tribe had elected priests and kept faith to the Hallowed, as in those days they'd called the Heavens, but personal worship of great spirits and angels nominally beholdng to them had been just as prominent. Some of these spirits, I now suspected, had not been lesser gods or remnants of wilder ages but instead wandering lords and ladies of Arcadia. The suspicion had grown from the shapes I glimpsed of these raised stones, how they had been pleasing to my eye in some ineffable manner even now that I'd broken ties to Winter. It had been good as confirmed, however, when I'd found this particular 'prayer'. It was a barrow, or a tumulus as those were called in Procer, though one larger than any I'd ever heard of in Callow and crowned by a strange pattern of great stones. Three concentric rings, the stones of them interlocking to give the illusion of a full and complete circle when one stood at the foot of the barrow.

Standing at the centre of it, I'd felt a whisper of the sensation that had once filled me when shaping gates into Arcadia with the strength of Winter. This had been a thinning of boundary once, I thought, a place enshrined in some eldritch manner. Whatever power had coursed through these grounds vital and vivid in olden days had long died out, but it had left behind a taste of itself. Like a desiccated ancient riverbed, I decided. I could have run my fingers along the traces of the old currents carved into what was now stone and dry sand, charted their shapes and guessed at the intents, but there would be no bringing back the old waters. The world had moved on, the stars were no longer aligned. Whatever patron the Mavii had once bargained with had abandoned the game for fresher ones. Still, there was something about the place that appealed to me. It would serve for what I intended.

"There," I said, idly pointing with my staff. "Gently."

The four legionaries awkwardly moved to the side. All were orcs and warrior-fit, so the large table they were moving might as well have been a sack of feathers, but amusingly enough they were having to be careful of not wrecking the table instead of labouring under the weight of it. They set it down in the snow with a muted crunch and I met their salutes with a nod before they retreated to the bottom of the barrow. Where more work would await them, for it was a veritable procession that was setting up my headquarters at the heart of this Mavian prayer. Chairs and smaller tables, along with precious maps and a library's worth of scrolls and reports. A writing desk, with quills and ink and all wax for seals. Last of all, the same sinfully comfortable armchair I'd stolen from the Count of Old Oak a few years back. Hakram had proved, as always, that he was a prince among men when he'd revealed he'd had that little piece of furniture brought along for the Proceran campaign. It'd been kept with Juniper in the First Army, whose supply train was the largest, but now that all four of the divisions of the Army of Callow were reunited I had wonderful cushions to sink in once more. Vivienne wandered in with the last of the additions, seemingly amused at the burrow I'd had assembled.

"And when it starts snowing or raining, shall you bravely retreat?" she drawled.

Leaning against one of the tall stones, long skirts swishing against her boots as she tread through the snows, Vivienne looked like some noble's daughter gone on a ride more than the former Lady-Regent of Callow. The pales shades of her blouse and dress made the laughter in those blue-grey eyes seem lighter, somehow, more innocent. Or perhaps simply less weighed upon, I thought.

"I've already had the outskirts of the barrow warded by our mages," I said. "For wind and quiet."

"One of Masego's patterns?" she asked, idly pushing off the stone.

"Yeah, though I'm told they can't get it to work the way he said it should," I noted. "He has a very unique definition of 'elementary knowledge', our Zeze."

That some of our senior legion mages had outright admitted the scrolls Hierophant had left on the subject of warding might as well be gibberish had served as a fresh reminder that I'd been dealing with some of the finest mages on the continent since becoming a villain and I that I should temper my expectations accordingly. The rituals he'd taught my mages lines in the days of the Fifteenth had since become the standards large-scale sorceries of the Army of Callow, but not all of them could be used without him guiding the casting and there was no real replacement for Masego to be had. Talented mages were costly and time-consuming to raise, and unlike the Wasteland I didn't have centuries of teaching methods and arcane knowledge to dole out to raise any even should I find talented individuals – which I couldn't, because unlike Praesi I didn't have well-trained agents out there looking for the signs of young children with the Gift. Add onto that the fact that the Legions of Terror had picked clean the most obvious magical talents in the kingdom after the Conquest, and it was no wonder that so few of my mages were of Callowan stock.

"And for the wet wrath of the Heavens?" Vivienne idly asked, leaning over one of the tables to have a look at the scrolls stacked on it.

"I dabbled," I shrugged.

It was one of the more abstract uses of Night I'd resorted to, which had been interesting in its own way. Spinning threads of a miracle I had seen before – the bubble of stillness the Sisters had forged around me when we'd tried to gate out of Iserre – I'd crafted a sort of intangible roof and bound it to the stones. Komena had perched herself atop one long enough to call the work 'clumsily-executed but clever in principle', which was the closest she'd ever come to complimenting something I did with the Night. Vivienne hummed, and pursued it no further.

"So," she said. "Are you going to tell me why you've called a halt to the march and ordered the Hellhound to establish a fortified camp?"

Leaning on my staff, I began slowly limping around the edge of the raised stones. It was a fascinating thing, the way the interlocked slabs allowed me to glimpse down at odd angles. Revealing the sight of my armies camped below, raising palisades and digging ditches.

"Because we'll be fighting a battle soon," I said. "And there's no point in running around until we know we can win it."

"How do you know we'll be fighting a battle?" Vivienne asked, brow furrowing not in disbelief but in curiosity.

Wondering what she'd missed that I had not, how she could remedy that failure when the chance next came. It had not escaped me that she'd taken my tongue-lashing differently than Juniper. My Marshal had judged the fault to be in herself, and so that the mending of it must come from herself as well – Juniper had turned back to books and discussions with other commanders, the familiar whetstones of her mind. Her art of war had been found insufficient, and so she would better it until this was no longer the case. Vivienne, though, had been harder to gauge. She was... learning, if there was any word that could be used for it. Looking at the successes of others like she was trying to squeeze out the essence of them to make it her own. It was a little unnerving, at times, and at others frustrating. Mostly for me, when I found the whisper of my instincts a hard thing to explain.

"Because we are headed to a pivot," I said, "and this... isn't enough. Our army and the Pilgrim's, that's too small a scale compared to the magnitude of power gathered. It might be that it starts with simply us, but it won't stay that way."

"Because the story," she slowly said, "requires more than simply us and the Pilgrim. Yet you have fought battles before where-"

I raised a hand to interrupt her.

"The breaches, Vivienne," I said. "They make a lot possible and therefore those things will happen – because once the groove is there, the possibilities will flow into it like water."

I cleared my throat.

"We can have that talk later in more detail," I added. "Council won't be for hours yet and I don't want to have repeat myself."

She nodded.

"I should see to the Jacks, anyway," Vivienne said. "Adjutant's coming to join you?"

"Eventually," I said. "I've sent him to get me a proper suit of plate fitted."

"It has been odd to see you limping about without one," she admitted.

I snorted and waved her away. As she walked away I propped up my staff against the side of my armchair and lowered myself onto it with a sigh of pleasure. I sat facing rings of stones with an unobstructed view, tables at my sides groaning with the documents I'd sent for. It wasn't long before I caught the slight sound of leather on snow, my only advance warning that I once more had company.

"You have the supplies?" I called out.

"And you claim you don't have the fae hearing anymore," Robber complained. "Bullshit's what I say."

My minion popped into sight, leaning against the left arm of my chair. I was rather impressed he'd made it that far without my picking up on it even when I'd known he would be coming.

"You're just getting old," I mocked, because it was always a bad idea to give so much as an inch to a goblin.

He should be around sixteen now, I thought. Goblins rarely made it beyond forty, and that was for the better bloodlines – of which Robber was not, and that was setting aside the harsh lifestyle of service in my armies. Thirty was likely when his body would start breaking down, barring rituals to stretch out his lifespan, and at that thought I suddenly regretted the quip.

"You're telling me," the Special Tribune complained. "Only cowards make it to fifteen, but I just can't seem to croak. I've had to make my peace with the fundamental truth of this world, Cat: I am simply too good to die."

I smothered my grin, the earlier regret chased away as quickly as it'd come.

"A heavy burden to bear," I solemnly agreed. "I know it well."

He eyed me rather skeptically.

"Didn't you die that one time?" he asked.

"I think I'm on three now," I muttered. "It's not one of my better habits."

He snickered.

"No wonder you sent me after these, then," he said.

I had sent off Special Tribune Robber on a most important errand, and as I pawed through the knapsack he'd brought me as tribute I had to concede he'd done his duty well. Two bottles of Vale summer wine were set on the table to my right while I squirrelled away the satchels of wakeleaf into the many pockets of my cloak. Save for one, which went to stuff my pipe. Passing my palm over the herbs had them lit with the slightest touch of Night, and I inhaled with pleasure before lying back in my seat.

"All right," I said. "Serve as my hands."

"I figure Archer might object," the little wretch cackled.

"You might notice I didn't send for a footrest," I warned him.

He hurriedly made elaborate apologies that coincidentally happened to insult Indrani more often than not, but I put him to work. Against three stones, three sheets of parchment were put up: one for the Grey Pilgrim, the Tyrant of Helike and the Black Queen. Robber skittered around with ink as I dictated to him, his handwriting godsawful but honestly not that much worse than mine.

"The Pilgrim wants a draw with the Black Queen," I said. "The Pilgrim wants to preserve the Grand Alliance armies. The Pilgrim wants Procer at war on only one front."

Robber's sloppy drawing of the Peregrine as bearing a heavy mustache and a crooked nose was physically inaccurate, but in the interests of morale I allowed the misrepresentation.

"The Tyrant wants leverage on the First Prince," I said. "The Tyrant wants the means to position the Hierarch. The Tyrant wants there to be no victor in Iserre."

Kairos' illustration had him either bearing horns or with his head on fire, it was hard to tell, and I was fairly certain that his arms ended in fingers and not crablike pincers. Still, I decided it wouldn't do to infringe on the vision of so accomplished an artist.

"You going to tell me what you're after now?" Robber asked, sounding genuinely curious.

"That doesn't matter," I said. "It matters what they think I'm after, because that's what they'll plan according to. We're not the only ones scheming here – if we plan assuming that everyone else will be passive we'll just be wasting ink."

"So what do they think we're after?" the goblin said.

"The Black Queen wants to preserve her armies," I said. "The Black Queen wants leverage over the Grand Alliance. The Black Queen wants the soul of the Carrion Lord."

Which were all things I did want, but not necessarily in the manner they'd think I did. I wanted Black back not to make him my foremost general or use him against Malicia, but because he was my father in all but name and I'd not allow his fucking soul to be snuffed out by the blind machinations of the Pilgrim. I wanted leverage over the Grand Alliance not to force treaties advantageous to me but instead to get everyone at the table for the Liesse Accords: the intent wasn't hostile, and to be blunt if there were other ways of getting there I'd much prefer using those. As for the preservation of my armies, while it was true whether that assertion came back to bite them or not would depend on how well they'd assessed my degree of ruthlessness. I didn't want to get any of my soldiers killed if I could avoid it, but that didn't mean I'd shy from battle either if it was the best means to get what I wanted. Sadly, I was dealing with the Peregrine and a madman who'd tricked the likes of the Wandering Bard. I'd assume, at least in principle, that they had a decent read on my personality.

"And now one more parchment," I said. "The pitfalls we have to avoid, how we'd lose."

"Folding on those wouldn't be losing?" Robber asked, skeptical.

Nimble fingers flicked 'my' parchment, though mercifully there was no representation of me sketched aside from a hastily filled-in crown.

"It'd be a defeat, certainly," I said. "But put that parchment above the others, because botching any of those would be the defeat."

It went above Kairos, and to my amusement the goblin had to drag a chair and climb it so he could both hang it and write on it. Dipping the quill in an inkpot, he turned to me with an expectant look.

"The Grey Pilgrim cannot die," I said.

Inconvenient as that line was, it needed to be drawn. If Tariq died and we'd killed him, a death feud was struck with Levant. If Tariq died and the League killed him, eighty thousand Levantine troops would be marching east instead of west. If Tariq died by accident, well, likely I'd get blamed somehow. I pulled at my pipe and spat out a mouthful of smoke.

"The western and eastern coalitions cannot lose more than a fifth of their forces," I said.

He let out a low whistle at that. The quill scratched, though his gaze kept flicking back to me curiously. I sighed, and explained after another drag of wakeleaf was released.

"For us, a fifth would be about twenty thousand dead," I said. "For them it'd be somewhere between fifteen to thirty, depending on whether or not they can merge their armies before the fight. If either of us loses more than that, we're crippled as a field army for at least several months. We can't afford that, given the situation up north."

"And the League?" he asked.

"Can't be considered reliable in any sense so long as the Hierarch and the Tyrant are running it," I said. "Preserving its armies isn't a priority – to be honest, I'd feel safer if we carved away them by at least a fifth."

I drummed my fingers against the arm of my seat, staring at the fresh ink on the parchment. I worried my lip thoughtfully and only after a long silence did I speak.

"The Grey Pilgrim cannot have get a draw against the Black Queen," I finally said.

I could not, in the end, trust him with that kind of power over me. Not even for the sake of making an alliance. Robber finished the words with a flourish, as if a twist of the wrist could make his calligraphy look anything other than cramped and sickly. I had not exactly picked the most able of scribes.

"Finished?" Robber asked.

I nodded. He scuttled down, quite blatantly pilfering the quill and inkpot before putting away the chair.

"And now?"

"Now," I murmured, "I think."

The parchments, those tidy little triumvirates of desires and pitfalls, hung in front of me but I did not need to look at them. Putting them up had served the purpose I'd had it done for, allowing me to place it all together as a structure instead of a series of abstractions. I closed my eyes, let it all fall together.

"I can leave, Boss," Robber quietly offered.

"Don't," I said, chewing on my pipe. "We're going to play a game, you and I."

"Ominous," the goblin praised.

The wakeleaf burned my throat, filled my lungs, and for a moment I felt a strange joy go through me like a spasm. I was enjoying this, I realized. This feeling, like my mind was full to burst and empty at the same time. Like I'd been filled with jagged edges, glittering pieces of madness and brilliance and that there was a solution to the crawling chaos, a twisting and winding formula that would bind it all to my will. I breathed out, smoke and heat leaving my lips, and smiled. Eyes fluttering open, I snatched the staff and hobbled to the parchment-bearing stones with feverish energy.

"Now," I said, "to a layman's eye, it might seem we're in a spot of trouble."

"If have a few of those, if you need spares," Robber offered.

"But if you look at it closely, we have angles," I continued. "For example, though the Tyrant will stab anyone who looks about to win in the back he is in fact our ally."

The goblin choked.

"What was that, Boss?" he said. "I can't believe I heard it right."

I knocked the butt of my pipe against barely-dry ink under the drawn caricature of the Tyrant.

"Kairos can't accomplish what he wants if there's no truce," I said. "Think about it, Robber – if his whole reason for getting into this war is getting leverage on Cordelia, then he needs room to actually use that leverage. He can't do that from Iserre while openly at war with her. If blunt coercion was all he needed he could have gone after her armies to force her hand, but he didn't. You know what that tells us?"

Robber's eyes narrowed in thought.

"The cripple's not willing to hand this war to the Dead King," my Special Tribune said. "He'll duck and weave, but these are matron games – a knife here and there before we all sit smiling."

"Aye," I said. "And one thing more: he needs me at that table, the wretched little bastard. If I don't agree to truce talks then all his schemes are dust. He can't make a separate peace with Cordelia, not when he's trying to twist her arm. He needs to be the kingmaker in this threesome of ours, not the sole enemy, and that means having all of us at the same conference where he can play us off each other."

"What's he mean to use the Hierarch for, anyway?" Robber asked.

"I'm not sure yet, but it doesn't matter right now," I said. "What does is the fact that the moment I try to push for a peace conference he'll back me to the hilt regardless of all other considerations. See, no victor in Iserre is only important for him insofar as it'll affect the conference that follows the fight here. Balance of power and all that. But if I make it clear that the only way he gets that conference is walking my line, you know what follows."

"He walks, like it or not," the goblin finished. "He's our borrowed knife."

"So he is," I grinned. "Now Tariq, Tariq's what Black would be if someone ripped out the part of his mind that itches to fix things and shoved a Choir in there instead. If a situation goes south on Tariq, he won't double down or throw a fit: he'll measure the risks, and if there's no worth to the strife he'll cut his losses and prepare for the next round."

"Hate to tell you, Boss, but the situation hasn't gone south on him yet," Robber reminded me.

"It doesn't need to, that's the beauty of it," I told him.

I spun on myself, lightly tapping the Pilgrim's parchment with my staff.

"See, the only thing in there I can't allow is the draw," I said. "He wants to preserve the Grand Alliance armies? So do I. He wants Procer to be able to turn north? So do I. To get what I want out of this, I don't actually need to screw him out of most of what he wants."

"As I've been given to understand," the Special Tribune mused, "he also wants to slug you in the story real bad, so to speak. And he's really a bastard kin of the Carrion Lord, he'll have schemes afoot and blood that's lizard-cold."

"Ah, and so we get to the tricky part," I conceded. "If I walked up to the Grey Pilgrim right now and offered him everything he wants save for the draw, he'd refuse. But that's not because he's a fanatic, Robber, although he is. He's not your average screaming, barn-burning zealot: he's the exemplar of the long view. The Pilgrim is what the Heavens use to make sure the forest fire doesn't become like, well, the last few years essentially."

"He'll come after you quiet and sudden, Boss," Robber said. "And you're good at the second, but the first famously ain't your wheelhouse."

"You're missing the point," I said. "He's the broad view hero, Robber. They don't have another one of those, it's the entire reason he's so influential in the first place. Fighting him at all is a mistake. The key to handling Tariq is twisting his arm in that same broad view: making it clear to him that if he actually takes a swing at me, the costs will make even a success so utterly ruinous it'll defeat the entire purpose. And the moment he knows that..."

"He takes the wins he can," the goblin said. "And cuts his losses on the rest, drawing back for the next round."

I drew back myself, coincidentally, emptying the ashes of my pipe onto the snow and gazing at the loose constellation of sentences.

"You know, Robber, there's a story back home that in the old days there was an Alban king who went mad," I said. "Thought he was made of feathers, so he ordered all the palace windows nailed shut and all the doors closed. Wouldn't even take off his cloak, since he was convinced without it the slightest breeze would disperse him into a million tufts."

"So he 'fell down some stairs' and an ambitious daughter succeeded him?" Robber snickered.

"He was an Alban, even if mad," I chided. "No, they suffered his whims intent on waiting him out. Until one day a window broke in a storm, and he dropped his cloak in fright but did not dissolve. The old king, the morning after, summoned the court and announced he realized now he had been mad and was cured of his madness."

"That's distastefully uplifting," Robber opined.

"Story's not over," I said. "You see, the king had realized he was not made of feathers. He simply had a coat of them, for he was in fact a bird."

The goblin grinned.

"So what happened to him?" he asked.

"Oh, they settled him down," I said. "But a few weeks later he climbed the highest tower in the palace and leapt down to take flight."

"Did he?" Robber asked.

"We have a saying about it," I smiled. "A king can fly-"

I shrugged.

"-but not for long."

Amused, the Special Tribune bared needle-like fangs in approval.

"See, the thing is," I murmured. "I always thought that he must have deep down known he was mad. Because if he hadn't known, if he'd really believe that with all his heart..."

I chuckled.

"Now and then, Creation has been known to grant the mad a pair of wings," I said.

"So what's your Callowan folk wisdom leading to, Boss?" Robber asked.

"Let's find out, my dear minion," I said, "if we are mad enough to fly."

Cat. What are you doing. You're heading for crazy city again. You always seem to come out of crazy city on top mind you, but you're still headed there.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think in answer she would nod and agree

Liliet

I mean, she prefers the word "mad"

Stephen R. Marsh

Tariq... you forced me into a draw last time, robbed me of victory by giving me only my mentor's body with his soul butchered past complete healing.

Now I offer you your victory.

I will commit the Drow to my own lands and the containment of the Dead King.

I will abdicate in favor of Vivian.

Has.... I offer you the victory. I will withdraw without slaughtering you and will revise my covenants with the kingdom below so that you may purchase dwarven steel.

Tyrant, for you I offer that I will put no candidate forward for dread empress other than Akua. Think. No empress has ruled but that her fate is still remembered.

All, you need merely covenant that none will seek my life or hinder our withdrawals to face the Dead King.

And Tariq, should you become threefold foresworn I will demand of the heavens that they foreswear you.

Stephen R. Marsh

Obviously not even close... but it kept nagging at me.

RanVor

Cat has offered Pilgrim victory before and he refused for political reasons.

Decius

Pilgrim claimed political reasons, but in fact refused victory and/or created those political reasons in advance because the next encounter would be a draw.

Big Brother

Mad Cat antics are amazing! I love how critically she's thinking now!

Liliet

Remember Seek? 😊

Gunslinger

We should all thank the demon she didn't have that for a crutch

mavant

In the AU where she does get that aspect, her Name transitions to Contessa.

NerfContessa

No, to Mi e own name, as ee would never write a hack of a plot device as Contessa.
Even in a setting where it would make sense.

Yes, he's that good.

Aston W

Is Robber Named?

I never knew....

Jecherio

These last chapters have been on point even more then usual

Stormblessed

God I love Robber. Robber is the best goblin ever and the best minion ever and I'll be devastated when he dies.

Fayhem

Uh, I feel like you haven't been paying attention if you think that.

Robber can't die.

Mental Mouse

Sorry, him saying it himself is near a death warrant, especially for a villain.

LokeshC2

Except well, he isn't the villain, he's the madman.

danh3107

I need a meme picture of cat leaning real close into robber saying "jesus christ how cryptic"

Skaddix

I am not sure Cat is reading Tyrant correctly. The Pilgrim read is probably pretty correct but that is more post this battle Cat and Pilgrim have the same goal put the Dead King back in his cage or end him for good. its the post game they disagree on most likely.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, I feel that leaving the Heirarch is a bit of a wild card for the Tyrant to play when he wants to.

Insanenoodlyguy

To be fair, she said he's not important at the MOMENT. I think shes fully aware he will be very much so in the long term

Hardric62

That, and i'm not sure ignoring the Saint of Bitches is very wise either. This one very much wants to see the Alliance armies mauled, or at least the Proceran ones, and I'm not sure you can exclude a meltdown of her if things go south for her plans leading her to correct the situation as bloodily and brutally as she can. Scratch this, she'll totally do that.

caoimhinh

I think that's because Cat is planning to kill the Saint of Swords.

Liliet

I think it's less that she wants that, and more that she thinks it inevitable. She's mad in her understanding of the world, not in her objectives. Still a hero.

Mental Mouse

I'm with caoimhinh on this one, with the elaboration that at this point, the Saint is just a rolling sharper. She's not going to take direction, let alone give up, so Cat probably needs to kill her. Possible exception would be if Cat can find some way to bind the Saint until they can throw her at DK. That said, I'm not sure sending Saint against DK is actually wise. Yeah, she's a badass, but the flip side of her being an old and experienced hero, is that DK has had plenty of time to analyze her powers and set up a scenario against her. And it's possible he could end up raising her as one of his undead Named...

Javvies

Point. Actually, since it's the Dead King, you want to make sure her corpse is not in a condition to be raised after she goes down.

So ... kill her, reanimate her, stuff her full of goblin munitions, then throw her at the Dead King.

Valkyria

Still liked the goats better but Undead Suicide Heroes sounds like a profitable upgrade.

Auxert

I think sending undead at the dead king is a Bad Idea, and would probably result in the undead turning right around

Kissaten

Dead King's undead is magical, Cat's undead is a result of Name/Winter. It's safe to assume that Dead King would create safeblocks in his theory of magic so that it won't bite him back one day, but Black Knight's shadow or Winter should be coming from entirely different source.

Mental Mouse

Well, "generic villian" undead is what Black Knight and Squire (mostly) were using, and is probably the base that DK built on. Winter produced a notably different, more "lively" result, which was foreshadowed by Cat's own earlier animations (though starting with an Arcadian flying horse might also have had some influence!). That said, best not to assume Winter is anything new, to a guy who already had a captive elf as a door guard!

Night seems to produce a more "normal" undead, which at least couldn't stand up to the flying horse.

shieldredblog

The Heirarch makes a great conversation piece at diplomatic parties though.

Especially since his seer and anti seer powers.

I really want the next diplomatic meeting to include him and the Tyrant.

Naeddyr

Stealer, stolen? Chooser, chosen? Waker, woken, baker, boken?

caoimhinh

Hunter, hunted. Player, played

Seriously, what is the name of the chapter referencing?

caoimhinh

I think it's referencing the phrase "The hunter becomes the hunted"

And more directly the situation in Iserre where everyone is scheming and planning. Pilgrim and Kairos are "Weavers" since they are pulling strings with their strategies on multiple levels, but in Catherine's plan, they are the ones "woven"; because that has always been Cat's style, she plays the players not the game.

Liliet

I read it as "Catherine is both weaving her own plot and getting woven into plots of other players"

Aston

I really like Robber being a part of the storyline.

It makes Cat less Meta.

naturalnuke

Meta is her bread, butter, oven, mill, and fields.

Liliet

I love his perspective.

"these are matron games"

Mental Mouse

Yeah, every so often we get a glimpse into goblin culture..

Javvies

Ah. Cat's running a completely different game than everyone else thinks they are.

Nice.

I'm not sure Pilgrim really is a long-view Hero. Otherwise, I think he'd have done something about the Conquest or the Occupation of Callow before a Crusade was called.

Hitogami

He expected the conquest to fail eventually. It was Cat that made evil stick in Callow, the Praesi would never get the backing she did. One generation or two generations later and Callow would have reverted to Good after overthrowing the Legions

IDKWhoitis

Grey still hates himself for letting Callow go alone for too long. With a shift in a new brand of Evil (Black), old stories were halted or literally killed in the crib. No hidden bloodlines, no starving orphans, no atrocities after the war even. It's like everyone seeing a house on fire, expecting someone else to call 911. Cat is the creature that crawled out after the ashes have been smoldering.

Liliet

This!

Qwormuli

Yup, remember, when Black anticipated the heroic critical point to a flip closing in from the exponentially multiplying heroic bullshit. Then remind yourself, that that seemed to stop with Cat, for some godforsaken reason...

caoimhinh

Well, it didn't really stop with Cat. Remember that by the Prologue of Book 4 there had been 6 bands of Heroes that had emerged or infiltrated Callow in less than 2 years. Since Catherine managed to unify public opinion under her rule and they all accept her (plus the fact that Callow broke free of Praes' yoke) there had been no more Heroes born from Callow as they have embraced their Villain Queen. Vivienne, who was the last of the Heroes from Callow, swore service to Catherine and lost her Heroic Name (even if hers wasn't the most Good-aligned of Names).

Point is, narratively it all makes sense since their society is truly changing without the resentment that the Conquest had left in them, so Callow's story is a different one now. Callow is no longer "a conquered country that needs a Hero to save it and free it" but rather "a country following a new path in his history and culture, needing strong leaders to fight against foreign enemies", so if any Named start appearing under Cat's rule they are most likely going to be Neutral Names or traditionally Evil Names repurposed.

Mental Mouse

At this point, Cat might well end up with Heroes fighting for her. Certainly the outside forces of heroes are not popular, but she's got friendly Houses of Light and a Knightly order, plus whatever Long Price gets offered for the various invasions of Callow.

Liliet

I want that SO BADLY.

SITB

All the heroes that came to fight Cat were seemingly foreign. It was mentioned how most of them were caught before dispersing into the countryside.

No Callow heroes were created since the end of book 2 when she won against Wiilliam.

(And honestly, if a Callowan hero pops up and doesn't go after Cat's rule it means that she is the new status-quo now)

Qwormuli

Well, while I might have worded it a bit poorly, that is pretty much exactly what I meant.

Kissaten

So... Cat's going to believe herself into flying away her entire army on the wings of Night?

Mental Mouse

Power-wise, there should certainly be some way they could at least sneak away using the power of Night. Story-wise, that gate in their path makes it clear that they won't get away without some sort of resolution to the conflict of kingdoms and armies, and perhaps some progress on other tracks such as Masego.

Kissaten

Yeah, story-wise it can be like Masego's nuke dropping on their heads and only Cat being able to carry them all to safety. If we are talking about madness, maybe Cat will open a portal straight to Serenity.

Andrew Mitchell

Nah, it's probably too early for that. IMO it's book six that will focus on the battle with the Dead King.

Mental Mouse

Besides being too early to face the Dead King (I agree, that will mostly be book VI), Masego seems to be in charge of portals at the moment, and he just stocked his piece of Arcadia with devils or worse.

Mental Mouse

Note also that she's notharing off to explore Masego's domain, despite it literally being in her way. Because there's no guarantee she could deal with it in timely fashion, and abandoning her armies at this juncture would be doom. And a lot depends on what Masego is actually up to.

Skaddx

He is not omniscient. He probably expected Malicia and the Calamities to screw it up like previous Praesian Regimes screw it. Turns out this was a new breed of Villains. This is also way earlier in his career.

caoimhinh

True, although I would put the blame on the Choir of Mercy for not sending Tariq with their whispers, the Heavens sent other agents though, and they all failed.

Also, Tariq wasn't young when the Conquest happened, I mean, he was the Grey Pilgrim since his teenage years, he was already a full formed Hero with many deeds when Dread Emperor Nefarius ascended to the throne, and Nefarius ruled for decades before being poisoned by Alaya, then came the civil war that had her crowned as Malicia and THEN the Conquest, so Tariq was in his fifties-sixties at the time.

Pilgrim wasn't involved in the Conquest not due to inexperience, but rather because he was doing something else at the time, don't forget that Procer was Malicia and Amadeus destabilized the other countries before launching the Conquest.

Liliet

>although I would put the blame on the Choir of Mercy for not sending Tariq with their whispers Blame, of a sort. I think Choirs are limited by their nature tightly enough that there's not enough there to 'blame'.

It's like blaming a program for not having more functions than it's been designed to have.

Qwormuli

Exactly.

Liliet

That is, flat out, Black's victory.

He worked non-stop for 20 years to keep the Conquest from sticking out like the rusty nail it was.

And it's worked. No big time hero noticed and came, because the mechanism by which they would ordinarily notice and come requires atrocities to trigger it, of the very kind Black was actively and tirelessly disallowing.

There's a reason he was this pissed off at Alaya with her superweapon scheme. This, this shield of invisibility is exactly what she'd shattered.

Mental Mouse

Oh yeah. Black was pitching "We're the new kinder, gentler Praesi", and Alaya busted out with "the Hells we are, wimps".

Liliet

And his response was "No, WE actually are. SHE is no longer invited to play in our sandbox" XD

Mental Mouse

Oh, he was a little more severe than that! 😊 Breaking the weapon at least made a point, even if it didn't hold against the most powerful mortal wizard on Calernia. And the crucifixions helped demonstrate to the public that Cat was Not On Board with that stuff. But even so, Akua did make her mark, and Cat was left to pay the price of that.

Liliet

Mm.

I'm thinking more of the whole 'fucked off to Vales with Grem and ignored the summons to the capital' thing, which more or less broke Malicia's power base in Praes.

Liliet

(Because shield of invisibility was just one of the benefits of refraining from atrocities, and not Black's main reason :D)

IDKWhoitis

I'm feeling that this may be the first time in a long time, that if Cat loses, she wins. If pilgram burns his victory early, he can't kill her at the end.

Also, I expect some haggling and ultimatiums about Black are soon to follow. I even wager that Tyrant is going to secure the soul first.

caoimhinh

It would be quite a twist if the Rogue Sorcerer is intercepted by Kairos and he got Amadeus' soul.

IDKWhoitis

Kairos has a penchant for finding, setting up, and intercepting meta-patterns. For all we know, both the sorcerers and Blacks souls are currently in his possession.

I would imagine a wish spell would be included, or a trial by Hierarch, which may have pushed the sorcerer to do something stupid storywise, attempting to escape, only to be caught by Kairos when the story had turned on the Hero.

shieldredblog

That sorcerer seems a bit sketchy to me. He's the Rogue sorcerer and yet hes never been shown to be rogue-like in any way. The opposite in fact. I half expect him to gift the soul to Malicia and become the next Warlock.

Fayhem

We have very little context/information on the origin of that Name. For all we know he was a sorcerer sworn to Prince Bumblefuck of Malfeasanceton who turned on his employer and went "rogue" for the sake of Great Justice and got Named for it, or something like that.

IDKWhoitis

I would love for this to play out. Unlikely as Pilgrim can literally read intentions, and could smell a rat. But a high caliber sorcerer might be able to cook up some defense, so who knows...

Mental Mouse

As someone else noted, Scribe is currently unaccounted for, and has been for some time. She might well have been able to locate the Rogue Sorcerer and reclaim the soul.

caoimhinh

I think that saving the Win for later in this Pattern of Three is a knife that Tariq wants to wield against the Dead King; after all, if Cat and Tariq can only die by each other's hand, that would give them a huge boost when fighting any other opponent.

I like that this chapter discussed the number of Cat's deaths, and even more the bits of cultural references in the discussion, like the mention of "Matron games" and the assumption that a stupidly mad king would get an assassination with a good cover to save his honor "falling from a flight of stairs" (Praes style) while in reality his court bore with it and waited until he either passed away or he was cured (Callow style).

I actually thought the chapter would end with the "A king can fly, but not for long" phrase, seemed very fitting. That last bit reminds us that unshakeable faith is one of the things that Names and Aspects are made of, so if the king could convince not only himself but others that he could fly, maybe he would have (an old Emperor of Praes became a spider because he believed that strong enough, so it's not unheard of either. Granted, he might have used sorcery and Warlocks, but let's not quibble about details).

Well, let's find out what Cat's plan for flying is.

Typos found:

and I that I / and that I to have repeat myself / to have to repeat myself Pilgrim cannot have get a draw / either 'have' or 'get', not both
If have a few of those / I have a few of those

Liliet

It took me several minutes to figure out what was the point of the earlier part, with him believing he was made of feathers, in Cat's fable.

The point is that she thought her position was a lot weaker than she realized it really was, looking at it from Pilgrim's point of view. She got so used to thinking of herself as an underdog, with only one road to victory she needs to claw her way through, she didn't realize she could open the windows and let breeze in. She's covered in feathers, not made of them.

Let us now see what the substance of this metaphor is going to turn out to be 😊

Mental Mouse

Actually, I don't think they can use a Pattern of Three against DK. Remember, powers from outside Creation can break those, and even if DK doesn't qualify himself (arguable, as he has set up shop in a Hell), he certainly has access to servants who clearly qualify.

Einhandler

I think I know what Cat is doing. Everything's hitting the fan, enemies at all side, and the outlook is grim. Throughout history these situations have been approached in many ways but one way stands out more than others.

There was a story of Napoleon where he walked into an enemy fort, crashed a ball, then walked back to his lines afterwards.

Erwin Rommel did something similar when he got lost in the desert and stumbled upon an allied triage tent, where he consoled the injured.

There is the story of the Scottish soldier on the beaches of Normandy in a kilt and playing a bagpipe that didn't get touched by enemy fire.

It's the reason a well dressed person with a clipboard can walk into just about anywhere and not get questioned.

My good friends, I believe Cat is about to pull the most classic of badass moves known in story and history. Grab your popcorn, hold onto your seats, and get ready.

Cat is going to take Refuge in Audacity.

Mental Mouse

Wouldn't be the first time...

Dainpdf

Name is coming. No two ways about it. Hopefully for Cat.

samshadar

I've always wondered what Robber would be like if he had a name...

RanVor

The Footrest?

Rynjin

Woah woah hey, you can't just give him two promotions like that.

RanVor

I mean, Names usually come with a status upgrade...

caoimhinh

The Robber XD.

It would also be interesting to find out whether Goblins have Names but keep it in secret, the fact that one of the claimants of Squire was a Goblin would lead me to believe that yes, they do.

shieldredblog

Of course they do. Why wouldn't they? All cultures produce names and the goblins definitely have their own culture. The only reason they wouldn't is because they somehow designed their own culture to not produce names.

It would be funny if they produced heroes though, hence the lack of ageless goblins and the lack of heroes wandering into their caves.

Qwormuli

Not all cultures produce names. Free cities have nameless parts in them. As a slightly lesser proof, orcs had a dry spell of names due to the lack of cultural support for them after being broken by Praes. So, all cultures (most likely) have a potential to create their own names, if they have a footrest for it. As even less reliable proof, Chider was pretty well in the know about goblin goings and was utterly convinced to be the first named in goblin memory. But alas, each and every matron could be some sort of fucky named and we'd be none the wiser.

Liliet

(Ranker Ranker Ranker)

Stephen R. Marsh

Good point. I hear thief is open ...

caoimhinh

Indeed, but he would make that Name nor Thief but Robber, because our Special Tribune is not one for silent and peaceful thievery, but rather violent armed robbery. You know his motto: "Kill them, take their stuff", hahaha.

crysjal

He does, it's just that Goblin Names don't act the same way other races do. The goblins are about secrecy and trickery. Robber got a name and the matrons, having set up a system already to deal with rebellious names sent him to the surface where he couldn't affect their society.

samshadar

That would make a lot of sense.

Insanenoodlyguy

I feel like most Gobin names, in fact, will be lost specifically if you don't at least try to keep them secret. This is more secure than you think since when somebody does discover you are named, they are far more likely to deal, ally and/or blackmail you rather than let out the secret. And there's plenty of cases where it's strongly suspect by a larger group but nobody can prove anything, which is a kind of maybe yes/no dread that is more likely to strengthen a name than anything.

Riaan Theunissen

Something Catherine isn't considering is the Pilgrim's possible reactions to Sve Noc now that he has "seen" her / them / it. The base of her power is power provided by the Gods Below. That has been maintained and grown through millennia of murder. It should be a horrifying sight.

If Akua and Catherine were somewhat correct in their reasoning in the last chapter, then Catherine should not be the main focus of the Pilgrim anymore, being the mortal servant of the new evil god. You know, the thing that might match the Dead King in power.

Liliet

I think Cat's taking that into account.

Mental Mouse

Naah, Catherine is the representative and "point man" for Sve Noc. We don't even know where the goddesses' original bodies are hanging out anymore, and their last known address is now a dwarven colony. As far as Pilgrim is concerned, Sve Noc is represented by the Drow and their Priestess/Black Queen.

Sylwoos

The Underdark hasn't been fully evacuated yet.

The Drows currently with Cat are just the one that were in the city where the battle happened. The rest are still preparing the large scale migration and that's probably where the sisters are.

caoimhinh

Cat mentioned that the rest of Empire Ever Dark is migrating towards Keter territory to fight against the Dead King and supplied by the Kingdom Under. That's why Cat's troops of 50 thousand Drow are called "the Southern Expedition".

Mental Mouse

Regardless, the Drow remaining underground are not visible to the other Calernian factions, and probably won't be until someone notices he's having to fight an underground force.

Riaan Theunissen

It hasn't been mentioned. Which does make sense as Catherine has become used to the focus of those she faced being on her, because she was usually the biggest immediate threat to those she faced. Unfortunately for her the Pilgrim apparently thinks long term, which would make Sve Noc the bigger threat.

Liliet

On the other hand, Sve Noc is a drow goddess.

She doesn't affect human politics any more than the orcs' old gods (like the one Captain slew the last echo of) did. What matters about Sve is the might of the drow that she's backing...

...and Catherine Foundling, representing the breach of that limitation.

Riaan Theunissen

No, this isn't about politics. And the Orc's old gods would have affected human's (not necessarily politics) a lot back in the day, what with the wars and cook pots, if they supported their followers, merely by supporting their followers.

So this isn't about politics. This is about the Pilgrim looking at Sve Noc and seeing what she / they / it is, or at least some of what she / they / it is.

"Gods, child, what have you done to yourself?" the Grey Pilgrim said. "Those things on your shoulder... those are no crows. How many times can you sell your soul?"

Had he tried to gaze at them using an aspect? I almost pitied him if he had. The foundations of apotheosis for these two had been millennia of hateful murder, and the mortar had been Winter freely given – look at one of those raw would have been painful, but the two?"

The Pilgrim can't know what Sve Noc is planning. But if he can see some of what she is, that which empowered her, and if he heard about her casual sadism can he believe her not to be a monster?

"It will take more than brandy and poppy leaves for the digging to stop," the goddess on my shoulder laughed. "Hands and picks and tireless flesh, pulling aside the —"

Liliet

So what you're saying is that the Pilgrim ought to seek to ease the drow's unnecessary suffering from having a monster as a goddess?

shieldredblog

Bonus for him because it might wipe out the entire species.
Which he would do because he assigns no value to mortal life. All he cares about is minimizing suffering.

Liliet

I don't think you're quite correct, I don't think he's that far down the utilitarianism failure mode hole. I think he does value life.

Riaan Theunissen

No, I'm saying that given what he knows the Pilgrim should see Sve Noc as a bigger long term threat than Catherine, because Sve Noc is the evil goddess and Catherine is her priestess.

Liliet

But is Sve Noc a relevant threat at all?

Keep in mind that Pilgrim is more medium term view than long term view, compared to e.g. Black. He's about solving immediate messes, not revolutionalizing way of life for generations down the line.

Valkyria

I really hope her plan somehow involves goats.

Aotrs Commander

The more Levant appears even in passing mention, the more I regret that Keter wasn't parked next to [i]them[/i]. I think Levant worse than the Procer,.

Kissaten

Well, Keter may yet border them, that Serpent exists there for a reason plot-wise.

RanVor

Well, Procer is actually one of the less disturbing Good societies. Which kind of says a lot about Good societies, which in turn says a lot about Evil societies...

Liliet

shieldredblog

So her analysis is that she hasn't been dropping enough lakes? I could have told her that. Trying to work nicely with someone who can't be trusted like Tariq is pointless. She needs a line in the sand, you raid my army or position yourself advantageously storywise and a thousand of your men go missing in the middle of the night. Otherwise, he's just going to smile and position himself to stab you in the back.

Honestly, I've been very disturbed by her willingness to sacrifice her soldiers to preserve her enemies. Especially when she made it so obvious. She basically strapped an expendable sign on them.

Vivid

I think I finally get what the core of the beauty I see in the Guide is. The myriad perspectives visible and the ocean of validity lent to them create a painfully beautiful picture, and piecing them together by defining all the lessons, the truths held by the cast in terms beyond their individual views gives a rush of satisfaction unlike any other.

Realizing what a character means by something (a thing they're aware of) as well as what it means to them (that they're unaware of) lets you pinpoint what the character is as a person when you contrast those meanings with the character's actions and the actions and minds of others.

I guess it could be done with other narrative works too, but only the Guide is written with enough sense to it that you can go past the first few layers and not have everything fall apart. Really amazing work, EE.

Andrew Mitchell

Bravo, well said. I appreciate you putting my feelings into words.

Liliet

Guide is Really Good.

Daniel E

And so we reach the Pivot battle of this book. Exciting times 😊
Story is being wielded full-force by both sides. The setup here lends itself to many possibilities; a new Name or Transition, fulfillment of 'Seven crowns plus one', the death of a major Hero for the first time since Lone Swordsman. I wager a case of Vale wine that when all is set and done, Cat's memoirs will be titled 'A Practical Guide To Evil'.

Andrew Mitchell

I think this has __got__ to be the fulfilment of seven crowns and one. But I've got NFI how that's going to come about.

Hopefully, the major hero to die is the Saint of Swords but I will have to disagree with you that the Lone Swordsman was a major Hero.

Alegio

The "Just as planned" of Traitorous made laugh WAY too much.

konstantinvoncarstein

Me too. It is by far the funniest character in the entire serie, after Irritant

Whiteeyes

Best part? You don't know who he is you think it was a pithy insult by one of his foes to mock him in death. You do know who he is however and you instinctively check to make sure you have your wallet. I mean sure he's been dead a while but I'm not sure if that's going to stop him.

Liliet

So good

Fayhem

Something I meant to comment on the last chapter but forgot to: with all the parallels Cat was seeing between herself and Tariq, can we take that as meaning that Cat's "retirement" plan post-abdication is going to be becoming the Black Pilgrim? Just wandering around Calernia teaching baby villains how to get shit done without fucking it all up and becoming an unfixable monster.

Alegio

I can't really see her doing that, more like finding named people who want to do good and helping to teach them the practical way to do things no matter if they are working for above or below.

Either way, Cat is not really made for that kind of role I believe. It is just not her thing.

Fayhem

Are you sure? Last chapter was her seeing the parallels between her and Pilgrim, and now this chapter has her teaching/explaining things to both Vivienne and (gods help us) Robber. It certainly hasn't been her kind of Role. But I think we're seeing the shape of how it could become a Role she could occupy, in her own terrible way (to paraphrase Indrani).

And it's not that I think she'd inherently object to teaching heroes as well as villains to be practical, but even post-Liesse Accords I think that most heroes would balk at taking career advice from Catherine Foundling, especially and specifically the impractical ones who would be the ones who'd actually really need advice anyway.

Andrew Mitchell

You might have a point. As far back as book one, I think she was trying to get William to be more practical about achieving his aims.

Mental Mouse

Well, Ranger represents a possible model.

Fayhem

If you mean a model for someone teaching both heroes and villains, that's true but it's worth noting that Ranger had spent IIRC literally centuries establishing a reputation for herself as someone who dgaf about the whole Above vs. Below thing before she decided that Amadeus was her murder bae and hooked up with the Calamities long-ish term (and the more uncompromising/impractical heroes still hate her guts). Catherine as Squire to the Black Knight/the Black Queen has been slotted into Below's roster from day 1; we've seen her internal monologue/dialogue (hello, Dickish Twin) so we know she's never exactly been a true believer but no one else has seen that. So for the rest of the world her reputation starts with "burning down half of Summerholm with goblinfire to flush out a hero" (again, see what we know vs. what the world thinks they know) and only escalates from there for the most part.

It's not impossible for that to change over the course of her helping turn back the Dead King, tbf. That depends on a lot of things though, so unless/until we start seeing that happen I'm staying in the skeptical column.

Mental Mouse

Assuming she stays as Priestess of Night, I suspect her big job will be integrating the Drow into Callowan society (and politics). That will surely involve a certain amount of traveling around and talking to people, so she'll have plenty of chances to influence things.

Javvies

IIRC, the plan is to park the Drow on top of Keter. To drive the Dead King and his forces back through his Hellgate to Serenity, and then try to seal it up/establish a permanent guard upon the Creation side of the Gate, using the Drow.

Not bring the Drow to Callow.

It gives a reason for Procer/the Alliance/Heroes to not go after the Drow too much because, well, they're bottling up an even greater Evil.

Mental Mouse

MMM... where is this from? My initial reaction is "she's not asking for much, is she? /s". Remember. DK has a city that's mostly in Creation, and and it's well-stocked with unholy terrors.. Getting him to retreat within that probably counts as a win condition.

Fayhem

It's from when Cat was dreamwalking with Sve Noc in Book IV and they asked her what her long-term plan was for the drow. She described literally exactly this plan beat-for-beat.

mr donaer92

Alegio

Oh cat, you are finally back in your forte, when losing the game you take the board and hit them with it in the face!.

RanVor

I have a confession to make and an unpopular opinion to share.

I do not like Book 5.

I can't even point to all the things that annoy me in it. The list is long and includes items like:

- Grey Pilgrim.
- Grey Pilgrim apologists.
- Cat's moralizing.
- All of my favorite characters being absent (except Akua, who is irrelevant instead).

...And many more. It's still pretty well written and entertaining at times, but for every chapter that makes me want to go back to regular voting (which I haven't been doing since the end of Book 4), there's a chapter that makes me reconsider. This is not something I would normally comment on, but I've been looking for a specific chapter header earlier today and it reminded me how much more entertaining the Guide used to be. I will keep reading – maybe once the Grey Shit is gone and Black is returned to life, the series will return to its former glory – but I do not like the direction EE is taking his web serial in.

I know you will hate me for this, and I don't care. Bring it on.

matesbe

Why would we hate you for having a different opinion? Everything you've talked about (well most of it) is your opinion. Just as I greatly disagree with pretty much everything you've said, I think most people will acknowledge that you are completely entitled to your opinion of the book even as they disagree (or agree, you're not actually alone in your opinion).

Andrew Mitchell

As matesbe has already said, you're entitled to your opinion. And thanks for stating it because you made me think more about why I'm having a different experience.

For me, I think it comes down to disliking book series where each book is just the same but bigger/more than the last. [Yes, The Inheritance Cycle and The Belgariad, I'm looking at you.] I'm loving the fact that EE's characters and situations actually develop and change in significant ways that are much more nuanced than the protagonist just getting better at wielding a sword and/or their magic. I know others like those types of book series, but they're just not as enjoyable to me.

burdi

well, sometimes i feel like that too i think its because cat no longer badass villain, she struggle..begging, yet her win never clear and after became immortal winter goddess she goes back to mortal again, without a Name and limping leg that keep on my nerves.

In some term she became more powerful because she has 2 goddess on her side but in some other term she became weaker because she no longer hold her own power, plus the limping leg make her look disappointment somehow i think like the Catherine Foundling being downgraded

Liliet

This is entirely consistent with my impression of how you're reading this series, yeah.

You could stop reading in an ongoing manner and catch up later on whole chunks? It might flow better that way, and at least will reduce the amount of ongoing frustration. There's plenty of fish (webserials) in the sea :3

(Though at this point, I'd probably miss you in the comment section...)

caoimhinh

You know, I have been wondering for a while, but where is Scribe? I expected her to be with Grem, although not in the command tent she might have been around, but Cat has gathered the entire army and joined with Black's legions, yet there has been no mention of Scribe (partly because Cat's meeting and interactions with Grem were mostly skipped).

I think some mention of Scribe is necessary, given how influential she is and how Cat is aware that Scribe was always with Amadeus; at least a comment like "I asked Grem about Scribe and he said that she disappeared, probably to find a way to rescue Black" by Catherine. Because simply ignoring her seems very weird.

Mental Mouse

She may be the one to retrieve Amadeus's soul.

Liliet

I mean one of Eudokia's Name things is that no-one other than Amadeus notices her when she doesn't specifically draw attention to herself,

Relyt

I almost feel bad for Cat's opponents. It starts out like playing chess; with decades of experience and dozens of moves, they maneuver her firmly into checkmate.

The she smirks at the game and they realize that the chessboard is actually shoots and ladders and Cat's one turn from victory.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Prediction: Cat is going to give Robber some Night.

Reasons I Think This: Every time Robber has been referenced in the last two books special attention has been paid to his age. He's slowing down and will continue to do so quickly. Cat, who has had two good friends die in recent memory, will lose another friend if she doesn't act soon to keep this one alive against an enemy that no goblin can escape for long. Old age.

And oh look, Cat happens to be the final arbiter of the disposition of a magical resource whose earliest and easiest effect is to functionally remove the cap of the users lifespan. She's demonstrated facility with moving the Night around and she is down a stealth monster, her main bruiser, and her original mage.

She's got a fuckload of drow, but they are a big and imprecise stick. She needs eyes in the area and scrying doesn't work. What better solution to that than a fearless goblin with the sort of Night tricks a stealth killer would develop. Without even waiting for a goblin to come into a Name she can get one of her caliber basically out of nowhere and all it would take would be preserving the life of a friend.

Now, I'm well aware that Nighting Robber would fall under the same problem as handing out Winter titles in terms of Narrative escalation, at least in the eyes of the armies around her, but I think circumstances will force her hand.

Because all this, were she duels for her life and the lives of those in her service with a kind old man who firmly 'knows' that destroying her is the right thing to do, all of this is a side skirmish.

At some point, whatever her success or failure at building the future she wants for Calernia, she has to fight the Dead King.

And we've seen what that's like. I've loved the Interludes and Extra Chapters about the doomed defense of the north, because they're full of really cool characters and lorebuilding, but they've also been telling us exactly what we need to know about what kind of threat the Hidden Horror presents.

Cat will need more allies at her level soon, and my gut says she'll go for Robber.

Mental Mouse

There's also the question of provoking jealousy among both her human and Drow servants (for different reasons). Not to mention what that might mean to his relations with the Matrons.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

True. The action would definitely have a lot of fallout, but I think she's going to go for it anyway.

Also, totally unrelated but reading back over this chapter made the part about the old inhabitants of the region worshipping Far really stand out to me. I think I have a guess at what kind of thing Cordelia might be digging up.

Vivid

Anyone else in favor of Guide merch? I don't think a t-shirt rendition of Cat's banner "Justification Matters Only to the Just" would be too expensive, and I'd be first in line to buy it.

Mental Mouse

That would be cool (and Zazzle or suchlike could do it easily), but I'd suggest not using the image from the wiki. Ironically, the text needs to be better justified. (among other faults 😊)

Vivid

Yeah, I meant getting a solid new design done. The simplicity of it should keep it from being too difficult, though..

Miles

So cat needs to lose to the grey boy while still keeping most of her armies intact. Probably give him Black's body back again to make it happen.

Aston Whiteman

Robber is actually Scribe in disguise.

The real Robber died a while back of old age.

Mental Mouse

Unlikely, but it would be hilarious!

Chapter 31: Fall or Flight

"In boldness find salvation, for stillness is the herald of death."

– Princess Beatriz of Salamans, most famous for turning her trial for high treason by the Highest Assembly into election to the office of First Princess

"I need you to write three letters for me," I told Hakram.

Three letters: one was a knife, one was a bet and one was a lie. Wielding those like the sword and board that had once been my favoured armaments, I would win or lose before the week was out. Comfortably settled in my perch atop the barrow of a people long scattered to the winds, I poured myself a cup of wine and kept a steady eye on Hakram. The writing desk I'd had hoisted up here had not been built with orcs in mind, that much was evident. My second was broader than the wooden frame, and could not lean his armoured elbows against it without the whole thing starting to groan like a dying calf. It was a rather amusing sight, the tall orc bent over the desk with a long quill in one hand and looking for all the world like he could be lifting the whole thing with the other. The oil lamp atop the frame was an island of tangible flickering warmth in the surrounding glow of the magelights that had been brought here and hung from the raised stones. The sight of the Mavian prayer wreathed in that pale halo was an eerie one, a reminder that once upon a time fae had tread these grounds and made bargains with those who had raised this strange work. It felt fitting, in a way, for like my old friends of Summer and Winter tonight I intended treachery.

"Which first?" Adjutant asked.

I sipped at my cup, let the warmth of the wine pool in my belly.

"To the Tyrant," I said. "As follows: Kairos, you misshapen treacherous weasel, you should have been drowned at birth. I expect whatever spawned you tried but already the Gods had grown gills on your neck, foul monster. Sadly this must have allowed you to crawl out of the refuse pile they tossed you in to come trouble me today."

The sound of the quill dipping into the inkpot followed by the scratch of it against parchment filled the silence that followed. Hakram's admittedly superb calligraphy should lend a touch of elegance to the whole tirade, I decided.

"Therefore," I continued, "in the spirit of our close and cordial alliance, I offer my support for the demand that will be made by the League of Free Cities in exchange for its acquiescence to a peace conference. That support will have the full weight of my force and influence behind it."

I drummed my fingers against the arm of my chair as I waited for Hakram's hand to catch up to my words, only resuming when his scrawl stilled.

"Naturally, this is contingent on your own support in extricating the Army of Callow and its allies from their current difficulties," I said. "Should you refuse, I will be forced to withdraw from Procer entirely and begin preparing the east for the wars that will come in the wake of the Principate's destruction."

Adjutant finished writing before raising a hairless brow at me.

"You think he'll believe that?" the orc asked.

"He will," I simply said.

After glancing at the certainty on my face Hakram did not argue the point any further, simply conceding with a small dip of the head.

"And add one last thing," I mused. "Lower down, like we're trying to be discreet. 'I have heard that recently you lost a great many horses, which is a tragic happenstance. As I would not have such a dear and noble friend without a mount, I offer you this purebred Liessen charger to ride into battle instead. May he serve you well.'"

Adjutant looked at me oddly.

"We don't have any purebreds," he told me. "They're too costly to field. The Order uses mostly halfbloods and Vale breeds."

"I'm aware," I said. "I need you to find the shoddiest, sickliest goat we have and paint it white. Not well, though, just kind of half-heartedly. Try to make it a female one if you can. Send it along with my letter, when the time comes."

The orc cleared his throat a little too quickly for me to buy him looking at me this disapprovingly.

"This is how you deal with Kairos, Hakram," I told him nonetheless. "He's not like Malicia or the Dead King, he doesn't give a damn about respect or rules or making deals that'll last longer than a moon's turn. I offered him steel and honey and an elaborate insult – it should do the trick."

"We're not made of goats, Catherine," Adjutant reproached.

"Fine," I sighed, disgruntled. "If you can't find a suitable one just find a stray dog and glue horns on. Diplomacy isn't cheap, Hakram, you should know this by now."

"As you say, my queen," the orc serenely replied.

I gestured obscenely at him before watching him blow the last lines of my letter dry, fake my signature without missing a beat and finally roll the parchment when it was all done. It went into a small leather sheath, and a red wax candle was lit from the lantern's flame before he dripped it atop the scroll. The royal seal was pressed until it made its mark, my sword and crown on a balance, and it was put away. His eyes returned to me and I put down the cup I'd finally managed to empty.

"To the Pilgrim," I said.

"Full honorifics?" Hakram asked.

I mulled over that a moment.

"No," I finally said. "Grey Pilgrim will do, it's in that function I'll be addressing him."

The tall orc nodded, and began writing anew.

"I, Catherine Foundling, first anointed Queen of Callow of my name," I said, "formally offer the unconditional surrender of all forces under my command to the Grey Pilgrim, Tariq of Levant, also known as the Peregrine. Let there be no further bloodshed between your armies and mine, and through that surrender peace be obtained for us all."

It was with a low whistle that Adjutant finished writing the last sentence, with a practiced hand adding signature and seal when I shook my head to make it clear there would be no other addition.

"The third?" he asked, afterwards.

"Addressed to the full war council of the Army of Callow, including summons for Vivienne Dartwick," I said.

Hakram went still, for a moment, and when he moved it was to eye me warily.

"In your formal capacity as queen?" he asked.

"That's the one," I casually agreed. "Put up the formalities, make this an official decree with my seal, and take one of the larger sheaths. I want to write to them about Theodosius' Dilemma, the whole story."

Adjutant cleared his throat.

"Those of us who went through the officer track at the War College have already heard it," he said. "There was a tactics class on the subject."

"Some of them won't know it," I said. "So we'll be thorough, yes?"

"Yes," he gravelled in agreement.

For the longest time there was only my voice cast over the scratch of quill against parchment, as I told the story mostly the same as I had read it. There was, however, to be an addition afterward. Hakram's hand stilled, and when he looked to me for instructions I gave him one last sentence.

"I grant to Vivienne Dartwick the title of Lady Dartwick, with all assorted honours and privileges;" I said, "in addition I name Lady Dartwick the heiress-designate to the crown of Callow."

I hadn't gone as far as naming her a princess of the royal house as that would mean, legally speaking, that she was either my adopted sister or daughter. Both thoughts were rather unsettling for all sorts of reasons. But by first granting her noble title, even if that title was landless, I could make her my successor without breaking Callowan law. Didn't much like the thought of expanding the aristocracy, even for Vivienne, but the only two ways to make her heiress-designate without making a bloody mess of feudal law had been that or bringing her into the royal house. The two ways of doing that were adoption and marriage, neither of which I believed to be palatable to us, so Lady Dartwick it was.

"It's a dangerous game, Cat," Hakram warned me.

"It's the only kind we ever play, Adjutant," I said. "And the letters are only to be sent when I say, so don't worry."

"That would be a first," the orc drily replied, but his hand moved nonetheless.

Three sheaths of leather were hidden away after he finished, bearing my seal, letters awaiting within. A knife, a bet, a lie. Instead of crawling into bed afterwards I spent half the night gazing at the stones where Robber had hung parchment for me. All the while silently feeding Night to the staff in my lap that was not a staff but a sword, a sword that was not a sword but a prayer.

When I finally fell into slumber I slept only fitfully, dreaming of laughing crows.

Years ago I would have been in the thick of it. Tripping over every discovery, blood going warm and cold with the twists and turns of Fate as I struggled to bend it to my will. I was older now, though, and though perhaps not all that much wiser I was at least more patient. I'd learned the value of not tipping your hand too early when playing these sorts of games. And so it was sitting in my stolen chair, pulling at a mug of steaming tea, that the news found me. It was Vivienne who carried them up the barrow, steps quick and alarmed.

"A breach had opened to the southeast," she told me. "An army is going through, its banners from Levant and Procer."

I inhaled the fragrance of the tea and did not reply, letting her pace back and forth. So it was finally starting.

"Who was the first out?" I asked out loud.

"Our outriders weren't close enough to-" she began.

I raised a hand.

"I wasn't asking you," I gently said.

Larat stepped out of the circle of stones with the languid grace of a hunting cat. The huntsman who'd once been the Prince of Nightfall walked against what I instinctively felt to be the cast of this circle, the way its power had once been leaning. It was like watching a man stroke a cat the wrong way, only I could almost feel it in my bones. Truly, my treacherous lieutenant had taken to petty vexations the way fish took to water. His long cape streamed behind him lazily, dark as night and sewn with jewels. The furs and leather he wore were fastened at his waist by a sash of scarlet cloth, from which hung that sheathless sword he favoured.

"A hero, most tenebrous of queens," Larat smiled. "Named and finder of paths, strutting for the rest of the cacophony to follow."

"His actual Name, Larat," I said, unimpressed.

"A sorcerer of roguish inclinations, my liege," the fae replied, raising hands to appease me. "Fleeing, then finding and now all aflutter from the sight of us."

"The Rogue Sorcerer," I grunted. "Yeah, that sounds about right. They'll need a mage for this, and last I heard the Witch was up north."

"That's all you have to say?" Vivienne said. "Catherine, the situations is getting grim. It's an army of nearly sixty thousand that crossed, and already Malanza's own host is sending riders to make contact."

I sipped at my tea.

"How long before the pursuers come out, do you think?" I asked Larat.

"Within the hour there will be a break," the huntsman grinned, a slice of pale malice between red lips. "And the parade of fools will merrily stumble out."

"Cat?" Vivienne slowly said.

Her eyes were moving back and forth between us, like she couldn't quite decide who to look at.

"Kairos is crazy enough to take a shortcut through a crumbling half-realm likely run by Masego having a breakdown just to get here earlier," I said. "On the other hand, are the crusaders? Would they take that risk just to go quicker? No, they wouldn't. But Kairos wants them here as well, and he dictates the military strategies of the League. Which means..."

"He cornered them," Vivienne said, eyes alight with sudden understanding. "To give them the choice of a battle where they'd likely be annihilated or taking a chance on a path through Arcadia."

He'd been able to do this not because he was a peerless military genius, I knew, or because he had some oracle at his side. It was simply that the Tyrant of Helike had most likely been trading information with near every other army out in Iserre, and so alone of all the commanding generals he'd had the bird's eye view of what was happening in the region. Given that, and the cadre of skilled warlocks that the Stygian Magisterium was made up of, it was far from impossible to both corner the other Grand Alliance army and ensure there was a breach nearby when he did. Desperation would do the rest.

"And the crusaders got a guide for the journey, perhaps the only wizard that could truly help them in all of Iserre," I said. "That is Above's due, the cast of providence. But that wizard also carries something I want, because Below always gets its due. It all comes to a head here, Vivienne."

My friend rested her hand on the back of her neck, pressing back a few curls of hair that'd not been brought into her crown-like braid. I'd caught the twitch in her fingers with muted amusement, recognizing it as Vivienne wanting to pass a hand through her hair before remembering it'd been styled.

"What are you actually up to, Cat?" she finally asked. "Juniper's been on edge."

"Because I've left her to decide how an engagement should be fought, if it happens," I said.

"Because you haven't been part of the planning," Vivienne frankly said. "Until now, you've been at the table for every campaign."

That you'd take a step back after chewing us out has us a little perplexed."

Larat's lone eye was on us, the huntsman nonchalantly leaning against a stone as he listened to our conversation. I debated dismissing him, but I'd been the one to send for him in the first place and I still had a conversation due with the unofficial captain of the Wild Hunt.

"If I didn't believe the two of you capable of discharging your responsibilities, I would have demoted you," I replied. "It's that simple."

Blue-grey eyes narrowed as I gave answer to only the least important part of what she'd asked. I sighed and raised a calming hand.

"You can't be in the know for it," I said. "It wouldn't work if you were."

"We don't have a great history with complicated plans," Vivienne reminded me.

"It's not complicated," I said.

She looked skeptical, which only served to irritate me.

"It isn't," I sharply said. "It's not a series of events building on each other, it doesn't fail if there's a part that doesn't happen. It's a set of counterweights that only move if there's a push."

"I don't mean to question you," she delicately said.

Larat snorted, too loudly for him not have meant for the both of us to hear it.

"That's exactly what you're doing," I flatly said. "And in principle I don't mind, but in this instance your having incomplete information is part of the design. Which makes it all the more pointless when you press for answers that I can't give you without making the plan irrelevant."

"That is mildly polite way," Vivienne said after a moment, "to tell me to shut up and move along, isn't it?"

"I understand you're worried," I said. "But I'm telling you this has been accounted for."

A mirthless smile quirked her lips.

"So either I trust you or I don't," she said.

Part of me wanted to sharply point out that Hakram was almost as much in the dark and he'd not needed this kind of coddling, but I held my tongue. I did not mean Adjutant for the same kind of purposes that I meant for Vivienne, and so it was unfair to both to try to expect the same behaviours of them. I could not put the dark-haired woman in front of me in positions of command and authority repeatedly and expect her not to act like someone in them. She, and Callow itself, couldn't remain under my shield forever. One day I would have to abdicate, and when that day came I would not brook chaos and disorder in my wake. That meant there had to be a worthy brow for the crown to be settled on, and that brow would not belong to someone who feared to ask questions when it was inconvenient. So I held my tongue, and let my irritation bleed out in the silence that followed.

"The Everdark changed you, didn't?" Vivienne finally said.

My brow rose, but she did not elaborate.

"I'll talk to Juniper, make sure she understands there's nothing to worry about," she continued. "Good hunting, Black Queen."

"You'll know what to do, when the time comes," I said. "I trust in that."

She sketched a bow before retiring, and it had my fingers clenching. How was it, I wondered, that losing her Name had made her harder to read? Larat's lone eye had been watching us eagerly that entire time, drinking in the complexities of the relationship hungrily. It was the kind of thing Winter fae had delighted in, and my huntsman might no longer claim any allegiance to that dead court but roots were not so easily discarded. That vicious coldness would always be at the heart of him.

"Larat," I said. "Approach."

"My queen," the fae replied, bowing after a flicker of a smirk.

The raven-haired huntsman stepped forward, light-footed and sure, and smoothly knelt before me. I drummed my fingers against the staff in my hand, idly wondering whether I'd gotten to the point where I should kill him. Did he suspect my thoughts? I couldn't be sure, but it was with interest he looked at my ebony staff.

"Curious?" I asked.

"No threat to me, that softest of deaths," Larat said.

I leaned forward and smiled.

"Are you sure?"

The urge to deny me flickered across the fae's pale face, but a moment pass and that denial never left his lips.

"You make sport of me, my queen," he said.

"Clever little fox, you are," I said. "But not as clever as you think. We made a bargain, and it's your way out, but we are bound by more than that."

"To my oaths I will remain true," Larat said.

"Of course you will," I said. "You don't really have a choice, do you? It took me a while to understand, but the details put it all into place."

"We gave our word willingly and without qualms, my queen," the one-eyed fae reproached me. "Why do you now remonstrate?"

"Remonstrate," I laughed. "How offended you are, now that I know I own you body and soul. Winter – my Winter – died and suddenly your gates are a spinning wheel of destinations. Come now, did you think I wouldn't learn of it? I am more than you liege, Larat, this entire time I've been your patron. The source of your power. You took a chance when you left Arcadia reforged, made yourself into a Wild Hunt that was not matched to a Spring and Autumn. So to stay here in Creation, you needed a little more than just calling yourself that. You needed an anchor."

"Have we not served you faithfully, O Queen of Night?" Larat said.

"It must have been terrifying," I mused, "to realize one day that your oaths bound you to more than the Winter in my veins. That there was an ocean of darkness, now, and that within it swam creatures in every way your superior."

"Superior?" Larat hissed, and the anger was bare and terrible. "These-"

I smiled, inviting him to continue, but the former Prince of Nightfall curbed his tongue. Too late to avoid confirming what I'd suspected yet not known for certain. Ah, pride. Of all the weakness of the Fair Folk it had always been my favourite.

"Seven crowns and one, laid at your feet," I said. "That is what I promised you, and that is what you will receive. Rise, Larat."

I rose, and let a sliver of Night pulse through my veins. The Wild Hunt was summoned, and my own mount with it.

"Don't worry, old friend," I told the fae with a warm smile. "I'll see to it that you get everything that you deserve."

I wondered if it was a trick of the light, or if I was truly glimpsing fear in that sole eye. No matter. When night fell I would ride with the Hunt, and the three of us – Pilgrim, Tyrant, myself – would find out whose cunning would cut deepest.

Why can't Robber die?

Necause he is a magnificent bastard and will either rise in notoriety to a point were Creation itself twists itself to keep him alive leading to the most ironic/heroic/glorious death of all, or he will anticlimactically die, probably off-screen.

A subversion would be that he leads his band of misfits to a ripe old age past his natural lifespan, only to vanish into the night one day, no body ever to be found. And the remainder of his "Tribe" will continue to whisper of the one Goblin that defied the Matrons and the Tower both, of His glorious exploits and vicious ruthlessness. How he joked in the face of the Black Queen himself, drawing not blood but laughter. They will lower their voices even more when they speak of his True Name, barely inaudible: "The Lesser Lesser Footrest".

(Yes, I have described Robber becoming a Folk Hero here... for Goblins, anyway)

Liliet

I am in favor of this last possibility

Ashen Shugar

Ooh yes, the epilogue. Cat has disappeared after settings things right and within a month or two, a cohort of goblins also disappears. "Some years later...", a group of heroes comes upon a hidden manor and carefully enters. Going down a quiet hallway, clean but empty, they come to a large room and across from them sit's Cat on her Fae Chair, in front her kneel's a goblin facing the heroes with Cat's legs crossed and resting on his shoulder.

whlindsa

For goblins, nothing. My money is on Robber eventually becoming Governor-General for Callow, and/or the commanding officer and founder of Catherine's special forces units, as well as the officially recognized leader of the Grey Aeries, who will revere him to almost the same degree as the Levantines revere the Grey Pilgrim. "Lesser Lesser Footrest" will become the only goblin term known to all races, as it will be too revered a title to ever be changed, one that verges on being a Name in its own right.

In the decades after his death of extreme old age at about 70 or so, the Name Robber will become one of the most revered of the villainous folk-hero Names, and will command fear and respect in equal measure throughout Calernia, and, after the inevitable kidnapping of Black and Ranger's children—because that's what Fate demands when two major Names like that have kids—and the absolute destruction of at least one global super-power that follows (and that's BEFORE Black and Ranger show up to...express their displeasure), the Name of Robber will become one of the most feared Names in the world.

Of course, this is only the least of the achievements that the goblin known as "Robber" is fated to accomplish while in service to Catherine Foundling and/or the Callowan crown, but many of those deeds of derring-do are highly classified, because nobody wants to admit that they're possible, lest somebody accidentally over throw a kingdom, possibly while drunk.

Michael

C'mon people! We're barely keeping ahead of Wildbow. At this rate he'll take back top spot in a month, imagine the horror, the TRAVESTY!

Oh hell yes. Now we're going to see some real crazy shit.

matesbe

So, assuming "knife, bet, and lie" weren't in that exact order, which one is which do you think? I think the letter to Kairos is the knife, the appointing of Viv as heir apparent the bet, and the surrender the lie.

Someguy

The Obvious Lie that Pilgrim cannot ignore even when he knows it's an "I Surrender, Suckers" because it is part of the pattern.

beleester

Be careful – Pilgrim has already shown Black what happens when you assume the story will force a hero to do something.

Sparsebeard

I mean, if she's no longer the queen, surrendering "the forces under her command" doesn't require much sacrifice...

ninegardens

"The forces under my command" – the wild hunt? That would be amusing.

Oh, and heck, she has recused her self from command by leaving Juniper and Vivi too it. clever.

Mental Mouse

It depends just when she sends the respective letters. I'd worry more about the Drow, since she does seem to be in command of those.

The thing is, she's betting her crown against strange stakes, but she's not all that attached to the crown; if she loses it, she'll just continue operating as the First Priestess of Night, and still the one human all those Drow will actually answer to.

Gunslinger

Aah but Rumena is in command of the drow army. Cat is only the advisor and mouthpiece of the the Sve Noc. At least on paper and the Pilgrim has no way of knowing that

Isaac Martinez

A perfect mirror. Tariq is also just an adviser after all.

More importantly, that sacrifice includes Larat

Oh, and her "full force and influence" that she promised to Kairos now will also mean bugger all.

SilverDargon

mmm, I can see that. Unfortunately, I can also see it a different way.

It seems to me that the Bet is the letter to the Grey Pilgrim, because she's betting that he won't take the bait. Like she said last chapter, more than anything he want's a draw, and by presenting him with a victory, she's betting that he won't be able to take it.

If that's the bet, then the lie is almost certainly the letter to Kairos. Since his whole setup right now relies on having perfect information due to the numerous deals he's made with everyone around him, I can't see a reason to tell him anything but a lie.

That leaves the appointment of Vivienne as heir the Knife. That's probably a knife aimed at the hero's faction if I have all this correctly. Because if the Grey pilgrim commits to a fight on the basis that Cat is a big bad evil person who can't be allowed to lead Callow, then having a ready made heir who isn't named or even all that evil cut's straight through his argument.

That's my take anyways.

Liliet

Nice!

I can also see the version that the surrender of forces is a knife (bc Wild Hunt) and Vivi is a bet (because Catherine hopes she'll act correctly under the circumstances)

Aphorism

Just for shits and giggles I'm going to assume that it's her message to pilgrim that is the knife. Her surrendering to him lawfully may make actions he takes against her a narrative vulnerability.

Nafram

I believe you to be correct. The letter to Kairos appears to be meant to make him fall in line for this particular operation, threatening to endanger his interests. This is the knife. The letter to the General Staff cannot be the lie, for Cat truly intends for Vivienne to rule and furthermore has no reason to lie to them, therefore, it is the gamble. And the letter to Tariq specifies the armies under Catherine Foundling, First of her name, are surrendered to him. This means that, should Cat abdicate, Tariq loses command of her armies because they are no longer her armies, and thus he must negotiate with Vivienne in order to get them to fight the Dead King. This is the lie, a temporary victory for the Grey Pilgrim that can be turned hollow at will by either her or the Callowan War Council by means of abdicating/deposing her.

And now that I've said this, I look forward to Erraticerrata either proving me wrong or in a twist, confirming my theory.

On a sidenote, does Theodosius' Dilemma get explained at any previous point of the series? Because for the life of me, I can't remember it.

ATRDCI

I can't recall it being called out by name before now. But the only context Theodosius has been brought up in up to this point has been his being Unconquered and his defeat to Isabella the Mad. (Whose love of chaos is shared by the Tyrant and whose written work is the only legal military guide in Bellerephon.). So I presume the Dilemma involves that fight.

This epigraph is of particular relevance given the Auger/divine guidance behind the Grey Pilgrim.

"It is said that on the eve of the Maddened Fields, the Tyrant Theodosius consulted with the many Delosi soothsayers among his host. He asked them if he would find victory or defeat, should he give battle at dawn as he intended. The Delosi squabbled among themselves for hours, until the eldest among them looked the Tyrant in the eyes and spoke his answer: Yes."

werafdsaew

There are a few epigraphs from Theodosius; this one is my guess as to what Theodosius' Dilemma is referring to:

whlindsa

Hmmm...this puts things into a different perspective—I'd always imagined Isabella the Mad as beating Theodosius simply by dragging him down to her level, and then beating him through sheer experience. That quote implies that there was an actual sound, reasonable methodology behind her victory.

RoflCat

IMO:

Knife – Vivienne

Bet – Kairos

Lie – Pilgrim

The Knife with giving Vivienne title is that it cut down basically every arguments that's made against Cath (Viv is former Heroine, is working hard to recover Callow without being a warlord, and is no way heading towards being a new Dead King/Triumphant)

So when Cath abdicate and Vivienne take the throne, not only Procer have to stop their Crusade (or at least can't sack Callow using excuse of it being Evil), even Heaven have to stop because otherwise they're basically ruining a Callow that's turning back to 'Good'

The Bet on Kairos is her trying to bet on Kairos's crazy plan, after all she doesn't know his true thoughts.

The Lie to Pilgrim is her 'threatening' him with a 'lose' to break his Pattern of Three with that surrender. Remember that her goal is for all forces to have a peace conference on equal ground.

But the Pilgrim doesn't know that, to him what he'll see is her trying to get a lose in without too much actual loss on her, much in the same way he's trying to get a draw against her for the eventual guaranteed win.

spencer

When she reiterated the knife/bet /lie I felt out was conforming they were in order (kairos/pilgrim/Vivienne)

caoimhinh

This is like that warlock Schrodinger's magical experiment with a cat, he put it in a box warded with High Arcana and claimed that due to "thaumaturgic wave function collapse" until the box was opened and the cat observed, the cat was both dead and alive.

Of course, it turned out that the cat was undead in the end, but I digress.

These letters are Foundling's Cat: all three of them are simultaneously Knife, Bet, and Lie until they are observed by the world, and the story places them into place. They serve multiple purposes while unreceived, and only when they are read do they turn into a specific Role.

XD

Andrew Mitchell

I like this. A very interesting thought indeed.

Decius

The letters go where she wants them to. The letter to Kairos goes to Kairos, the other two letters go to the Grey Pilgrim.

The letter addressed to the general staff is the lie, but it doesn't contain any untrue statements- it's there to make him refuse the surrender of 'all forces under my command', because of the new 'loophole' he just found out about. The bet is that the Grey Pilgrim will decline the surrender for a combination of narrative reasons and an abundance of caution; but he cannot abide unnecessary suffering, so if he declines the surrender he must let the armies leave.

That leaves the knife as the letter to Kairos. It's there to create a chaotic multiparty parley which Cat can win.

Mental Mouse

So, assuming GP can scry her letters, and planting one to troll him?

Insanenoodlyguy

The bet is Viv as heir. She intends it for real, at least one day, but she says she has trouble reading her lately. She doesn't expect Viv to intentionally ruin her plans, but it's possible she'll step into the wrong story or just plain react at the wrong time to something.

The lie is Kairos, she has nearly no intention of backing whatever crap he says once they get there, and if he proposes something she wants, will probably at least seriously reconsider wanting that thing. Because she can turn to him, look him in the eyes say "Yeah, turns out I lied" and odds are good at least part of him will want to propose marriage. He'll certainly still consider them friends.

The knife is pilgrim. He wants a knife to her, so she's pointing one back at him. And it's got two sides, and goes in one way or another no matter what he does. If he accepts her surrender, there's rules for that, she's giving up less than it might seem, as Callow is under her designated heir that is probably going to re-appoint her as soon as she goes home anyway, and a fallen hero being in charge is going to at least leave a bad taste in his mouth, and none of it can be considered a draw, she said he won and he acknowledged it if he accepts. Meanwhile they have to sit down for peace talks now and the Tyrant is backing her?! which means his options are limited. Even if Cat herself is part of the bargain, if he just kills her or destroys Black's Soul or whatnot Viv is taking her army and going home at best. The one real option that tracks is to make the villain find redemption by fighting for good, and march her north: Exactly what cat wants to begin with. And he knows full well once the wars over, Callow becomes much harder to fight. You don't call yourself the side of good and march against your allies, and more practically the army, of which a vast majority part of the population is or is friends and family with, now has a story where Callow came up north to help out and probably is noted for turning the damn tide. War with them for anything short of Cat going full traitorous and having everybody killed during the victory parade is going to be met with revolt.

If he doesn't accept her surrender, he spurned (thrice over, even) a woman who came to him with entreaties to peace and chose war instead. That's stabbing yourself as these things go. Cat has enough narrative weight to start whooping his ass. Malzana will eventually surrender herself: since she will see her troops losing and see Procer's death, Grey is down, probably even captured which means Levant is not going to keep the fight going on it's own, Saint is probably dead, oh and the Legion just showed up declaring itself in alliance with Callow. They have to sit down at the table now, and that goes mostly the same as what I said above.

There's ways it can fall apart, and at least one will be in danger of happening because stories, but that's what knives are for. Her footrest knows this is "Matron Games" and will probably take it upon himself to stab at least one of the lesser threats without even having to tell her.

caoimhinh

Yep, I agree with you.

Kairos can be lied to and he won't even be bothered by it as long as it's done with style, he might even like it when it's so magnificently blatant.

Cat is betting on the Army of Callow and Vivienne's behavior and reaction in her absence once Viv is officially designated as the heiress to the throne.

The letter to Pilgrim is only an offer to surrender to him, not to Procer nor Levant, and only affects Catherine and the forces under her command, which would be only the Wild Hunt, but they could be liberated once Larat achieves his promised seven crowns and one. Letting the Pilgrim win now would ensure a draw on their next conflict.

Of course, that lie to Kairos works as a knife against the Grand Alliance armies if he acts as if it were a true thing (even if it's ultimately an empty promise), and offering her surrender to the Pilgrim now is also a huge bet, Vivienne as heiress of Callow is a knife against their enemies' excuses for invading Callow, too.

We have seen that Narratively multiple stories can be at work at the same time in the same place, and a single object or act can serve more than one purpose when looked through different angles. This will be a very interesting development.

Insanenoodlyguy

No draw, rule of three works to flip. Its loss, draw, win or vice versa. If she wins or loses now it's over and done, pattern broken. He could still take her out with another story but that one will be lost.

Firstly, let me preface this by saying that I absolutely love the guide! It's become a delightful addition to my morning routine (I live in the EU, hence the 'morning' bit).

However, because it has become so ingrained in my way of life recently, I can't help but notice that the chapters have been posted later and later recently. Is there a reason/explanation for this that I've missed?

Andrew Mitchell

I don't know for sure. But it may be changes to daylight savings time. I read several web serials where the authors live in countries other than my own. So jumps of an hour (or two jumps in short succession) do happen and, in some cases, the timing does change from year to year. My timezone AEST recently finished daylight savings a week or so earlier than usual.

I wonder just what is Cat learned about Larat, the Wild Hunt, and seven crowns and one. If the wild hunt pledged itself to the queen of moonless nights, shouldn't the old oath be null and void?

naturalnuke

Basically Cat slipped the chains of the Oath by tying them to a big rock(The Night) in her place. However Larat is still attached to his side of the chain(oath). While Cat is no longer limited by the Oath she does own the rock and so holds power over Larat.

Mental Mouse

Actually, what Cat has discovered is that they weren't in fact pledged to Winter; they were pledged to Cat personally, and she was the source of their power. She knows this because when Cat's Winter was taken, Larat &c. weren't freed, nor transferred directly to Sve Noc, but they lost their gate control, because now Cat gets that as-needed from the Twins. They apparently can still contact what's left of Winter, but not tap it directly. And I'd assume Cat arranged with Sve Noc for her Wild Hunt not to be drained into nothingness.

Ah, the Rogue Sorcerer appears. Hopefully, he'll still have Black's soul with him, not stashed somewhere.

Interesting. I wonder about the timing of things here, and Cat's plan. How much fighting does she plan for before sending the letters and engaging in talks?

An open ended commitment to back Kairos's demands, whatever they are? That might be a mistake, especially since you don't know what they'll be.

Skaddix

Yeah giving Kairos a blank check is a bad idea

Then again, with the Wild Hunt being the only force under her actual command and its leader about to get what he deserves, that would basically mean the support of one murderous vagrant that recently stole eight crowns from the princes of Procer.

Skaddix

My issue is more Cat is way too confident in her read of the Tyrant despite not really knowing what his endgame is at all. Thus its dangerous to build a plan that requires the Tyrant to act exactly how you want for things to work. With Pilgrim at least Cat understands his current goal and they both want to take down the Dead King.

Fayhem

No check, regardless of the value written on it, is worth more than what it can be redeemed for. Put another way, Cat might have given the Tyrant a blank check but it's made of rubber and if he slaps that down on the bank counter to cash it in it's going to bounce so hard it'll ricochet around the room and out the window.

Liliet

Probably that one's the lie.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately, it's likely in a domain. Which might turn out not to be the best idea for the rogue, but up front it forces them to negotiate with him.

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, now that's an interesting thought. The need to get Uncle Amadaus' soul back may be just the think to help get Masego back from the dark place he's currently inhabiting.

Liliet

I think that if what Masego is doing is any of the options commentariat has predicted specifically, it's already this – trying to find Amadeus.

And getting 'target not found' because he's currently in two pieces probably -_-

caoimhinh

That title and the epigraph reminded me of an awesome quote from Neil Gaiman's The Sandman comic books.

"It is sometimes a mistake to climb; it is always a mistake to never even make the attempt. If you do not climb you will not fall. This is true. But is it that bad to fail, that hard to fall? Sometimes you wake up. and sometimes the fall kills you, and yes, you die. But there is a third alternative: Sometimes, when you fall, you fly."

Naeddyr

I have no idea what is going on and I love it!

And how about the additional letter?

True Catherine Diplomacy, pointing out that the terms suck, but suck less than a chest wound.

HardcoreHeathen

I would like to note that Catherine's offer of surrender mentions no prohibitions about bloodshed between her, personally, and the heroes. Hopefully that trick (if that is the trick) doesn't end up with every bone in her body broken, like it did for Akua.

HardcoreHeathen

Also, quoting the earlier piece where the deal with Larat was first revealed, in conversation with the Princess of High Noon:

"I will take the crown of seven mortals rulers and one, to lay them at the feet of the Prince of Nightfall," I said.

Her face went still. A glimmer of something like fear passed through those shining eyes, and shit that wasn't good at all.

"You know not what you have promised," she said. "This must not come to pass."

Are we finally going to find out why a Princess of Summer was fearful of Larat earning his crowns?

Kissaten

Larat was a duke or whatever, and Winter King was chosen amongst the most powerful vassals every new year. Maybe he was cursed to never take the crown of Winter until he fulfilled some obscure prophesy regarding crowns. As Winter is already consumed by the Night, maybe it means he will get swallowed into the Night the moment he gets the crowns.

Liliet

Larat was a Prince.

But yeah.

Agent J

The Crown of Winter was passed around by the Princes and Princesses of Winter. A rank Larat did, in fact, hold. Larat, the Prince of Nightfall was, at some point, the King of Winter.

Whatever's had the the Princess of High Noon pissing herself is likely a great deal more frightening than Larat being the next King of Winter.

Mental Mouse

What happens if he becomes King of Winter now, with the Courts merged?

Agent J

He can't. Winter's already been devoured by Sve Noc.

skovbenjamin

Of note the 7 princes and 1 was mentioned in the 4 fold reflection trap akuma caught Cat in back during Second Llesse. In the timeline where Cat was a hero the Conjurer used them to close the red vales with a massive spell.

I feel like it's some older story he was part of. The sort of thing thatd turn him into a minor God if he fulfilled the impossible conditon.

Cat is horrifying. If Pilgrim even dares to think of accepting Cat's surrender (as if it was in his plans in the first place) it will immediately turn the whole situation into some kind of Night-sanctioned Crusade with heiress pulling a sword out of stone (staff is made from obsidian?) and a free resurrect (Pilgrim Forgiving a VILLAIN?) for someone on top of that. Kairos will totally go for it as he gets to place a crown on Vivienne's head and this is a much more fun than a useless peace treaty.

But that is just an initial, obvious thrust. Even Vivienne knew that Cat is trying to become enemy's hostage since Cat didn't want to know her side's plans. My guess is Pilgrim letter is a bet – whether or not he accepts the conditions it makes Pilgrim lose or lose, letter to Callow is a lie – most likely to somehow fall into Kairos' hands as a bluff against both Pilgrim and Kairos, and letter to Kairos the knife since it somehow allows Army of Callow (and allies) to run away unscathed, and that is the real goal of whole thing.

Ein

Lets game this out a bit...

If Cat surrenders to GP, Kairos cannot get his compromise and as such loses. He has to do everything in his power to stop GP from accepting it or forcing a the loss. Cat wins

If Cat is killed in the ensuing battle, Larat's oath falls on to Sve Noc (who recieved the crown as a gift freely given) and I really doubt he wants to be sworn in debt to a bunch of psychotic murder elves. Remember, she is the only one who can release them from service. Larat, like Kairos, has to keep her alive at all costs. Cat wins.

If the surrender is not accepted, and Grey forces the fight, Cat can then abdicate and take the wind out of his narrative sails. The Army of Callow is in agnostic, mundane hands and Cat takes herself off the board. Grey loses any handle on the situation and is now facing two armies against one. Cat wins.

If the surrender is accepted, Cat abdicates like above, the drow return to Sve Noc's service (they are loaners iirc), and Cat essentially surrenders nothing. Kairos loses, Grey loses, and the Armies are still pointing at each others throats and 600k drow run rampant over the north. Everyone loses big.

I don't see the win condition though. Grey backs off, peace talks start, and Kairos wins? Cat abdicates during peace talks and as such does not have weight behind her to enforce her side?

Mental Mouse

> Larat's oath falls on to Sve Noc [...] and I really doubt he wants to be sworn in debt to a bunch of psychotic murder elves.

Pot, meet kettle. Also, the Drow would object to your description of them... they're no relation to elves! But seriously, I think Larat needs a living, or at least material, person as anchor.

caolimhinh

It's very cool how Catherine is predicting everything that's happening by simply knowing what kind of story is being built, while the rest are stunned, surprised, confused and even a bit scared. Her serenity in the face of what is to everyone else unexpected circumstances, allows her to appear like the one who is in control of the situation, which also gives her a weight narratively.

Nice to see Larat's elegant and ambiguously treacherous semblance again, hahaha. Well, Sve Noc are now goddesses so it makes sense that they are more powerful than Larat. It is an interesting thing that Larat is bound to Cat, not to Winter, so even now that Winter has been consumed by Night and Sve Noc probably holds some influence in the Wild Hunt they belong first and foremost to Cat. That hints at Larat being still under service of Catherine even if he obtains the seven crowns and one, which now is confirmed to be "his way out" and might make him a Fae capable of standing on his own without needing Arcadia. That would give Cat a very powerful servant in the future, obedient to her beyond circumstances, station or place.

I'm really hyped for next chapter.

Well here's the thing. The surrender went smoothly. Inviting Kairos went smoothly. Given Cat's luck, what do you want to bet there's a hitch with the abdication?

caoimhinh

Hmm, I doubt there would be much trouble there. The problematic situation will be in Arcadia when they go to try to get Masego back to his right mind. I would bet Pilgrim and Saint aren't simply going to let Cat reunite with him without obstacles, since he is a powerful threat.

Mental Mouse

Pilgrim and Saint may not have a choice. Cat can deal with him, they can't.

caoimhinh

They probably can kill him or at least wound him, though. Remember the times they clashed in the past: Laurence cut through everything Masego threw at her and Tariq's miracles matched Hierophant's sorceries. Cat is the only one in the region that can talk things out with Masego (although Indrani might be on her way here), the Heroes would enter combat against him. That's going to be one funny discussion, since Saint is going to be really pissed after this fight.

Ravin

Join, hide, or die. That's all you can do when the Wild Hunt comes to call.

Valkyria

So... GOATS!

Hah, just perfect.

stevenneiman

I don't understand Hakram's concern. It sounds like they've already got more goats than they have explosives for.

Valkyria

Well, apparently they also got the odd stray dog with glued on horns should the goats not be available en masse. Also night shinenigans can be explosive if used by the right wrong hands I'm sure.

stevenneiman

I could barely breathe for a couple minutes after I read that line about her cordial alliance with the Tyrant.

As a side note, there was a little inconsistency near the beginning of the chapter. It mentioned Hakram writing with one hand and looking like he could lift the table with the other, but he doesn't have another hand at the moment, and the one he does have is a skeleton.

Dainpdf

So much suspense. And trying to find some reference for Theodosius's Dilemma landed me in a land of Christian Theology and Roman History I was definitely not prepared for.

Can anyone remind me where Cat offered the seven+one crowns to Larat?

Atagan

When she needed help in the battle of five armies and one, she offered the crowns to get Larat to help

raimn

if i remember correctly she made that promise during the fae arc before or during the fight against summer. i think it was for his help(+winter troops) against the army of summer in arcadia, the battle that ended with the summer queen naming them the "woe" and the princess of high noon prisoner.

caoimhinh

Exactly what the two comments above have said, the bargain was struck when Cat was marching across Arcadia in order to get Winter Fae's help in fighting Summer's troops.

However, the terms of the bargain were only known afterward, when Catherine was interrogating Sulia (the Princess of High Noon), to get information about Summer and the reasons and consequences of the Fae Incursion into Creation.

Geoff Burns

Cat is using the Oracle against Pilgrim. Using the fact they will always choose the best option against Pilgrim and Oracle.

Vivienne's letter is aimed against Oracle since Oracle is the only way the other side will know about it. Cat can't tell them because they won't trust her. What do you want to bet that Theodosius' Dilemma is a precedent for an heir to take over if a king or queen is captured?

Neither Vivienne's letter or Pilgrim's letter can't be a lie since the Oracle would be able to tell, so the Tyrant's letter is the lie.

I am thinking Vivienne's letter is the bet since she is trusting them after they have just stuffed up. She has the Adjutant spell out the right answer for them in baby talk, further showing a lack of trust.

Pilgrim's letter is the knife threatening to break the pattern and plunge three armies into costly chaos for no purpose.

She is playing chicken, except the people in other car can see the future and she is putting a brick on the accelerator and tying herself up so she can serve.

"It was a rather amusing sight, the tall orc bent over the desk with a long quill in one hand and looking for all the world like he could be lifting the whole thing with the other."

Did Hakram keep his other hand? Does he wear it on a necklace, or is it autonomous?

Aotrs Commander

So, does anyone else think Kairos is going to treat Cat's letter as tantamount to a marriage proposal? (Regardless of the actions he takes over it?)

'Cos I can just seem him waiting until he's all alone, and then cradling it and staring off into the distance, sighing dreamily and going "she really gets me..."

I mean, the badly-painted goat-slash-dog-steed. It's such a thoughtful insult.

Anyone want to take a bet, next time see see him,he's got the goat/dog skull and a chain around his neck or something as a keepsake...?

caoimhinh

If they actually send Kairos a dog painted and with horns glued on its head, odds are he will present himself to the international talks while carrying the dog with him and introducing it as a purebred Liesse stallion gifted by the Black Queen herself.

No one will dare deny it, hahahahaha.

My bet is, if Halram splurges and sends an actual painted goat, Kairos will ride it with all the pride and noble grace of a purebred Liessen charger.

Alright, not sure which letter is which exactly, but I do think that Cat is basically setting the Wild Hunt up to be surrendered to the Grey Pilgrim. And he'll accept. He'll have no choice.

Why? Fairy gates. Right now, Cat has them and nobody else does. It's one of the things he fears about her, an advantage so big that it might make her the next Dread Empress Triumphant if she gets things rolling enough. But if he's being handed the Wild Hunt on a platter, it evens the scales massively. What's more, he can use those fairy gates to move troops against the Dead King, which is something the forces of Good would really, really need.

It narratively moves Cat away from being the Big Bad, which makes it less likely she'll get killed. Also, tipping the scales in a way that favors the heroes like that means that the Heavens are less able to interfere by putting a finger on the scales, which would disrupt whatever the Heavens have planned. They can't give the heroes whatever counter they had planned to her advantage of having fairy gates if it's no longer an advantage she holds over them. If the scales are eventually going to be made even, then better to even them on her terms.

The bet is the letter to the Tyrant—he's the wild card, and he's the one with the plan. The knife is the letter of resignation, and it is aimed at the Bard—she's the one who a resignation will most cripple, because it puts a non-named in charge of Callow, and thus makes the kingdom effectively immune to her meddling. And the lie is her surrender to the Pilgrim, because he gets everything he wants, and absolutely nothing that she is claiming to give him, except that now he has to listen when she says "let my people go".

As for the Wild Hunt...there are two crowns belonging to villains in play, seven Princes of Procer, and at least three crowns of the Levantine kingdoms. Once that oath is filled, only Catherine, herself, can command the loyalty of Larat and those he leads, which has to be freaking Larat out big time.

Agent J

I'd also like to note that the Fae are immortal. If she, as the head of the Army of Callow and Legions of Terror surrendered, then the Procerans would slaughter Grem and his troops at the very least. But if she's only the Queen of the Hunt, then what're they gonna do? Stab a fae? Big whoop. Ranger does it every season.

Phoenix

"One was a knife, one was a bet, and one was a lie."

First off, I love how she saw the letter as a knife as a callback to how her story started with Black handing her a knife.

Last chapter, Cat planned out what everyone wanted with parchment. One for Tyrant, one for Grey Pilgrim and one for the Black Queen, and above those three was one for her actual lose conditions. Interestingly each, paper had three goals/conditions. At the time, it struck me as odd that Cat included the Black Queen on there. What she put under Black Queen was what her read of Tyrant and GP thought she was after. During that conversation, it was also mentioned that Tyrant was her borrowed knife.

Looking at the three letters, when Adjutant asked which letter was first, Cat had only told him that there were three letters, not that one was a knife, a bet and a lie. She told began dictating what was to be in the first letter to Tyrant. The contents of that letter was an offer to back Tyrant's demand at a peace conference in exchange for being willing to agree to a peace conference, as well as a threat of retreating entirely. The most interesting part of the wording here was that her support would have the full weight of her force and influence behind it.

The letter to the Grey Pilgrim was an unconditional surrender, that Cat had mention herself by name as 'first anointed Queen of Callow of my name' and not as the Black Queen or the Queen.

The last letter was to her entire war council and it was of a story that most of them should have known, however the story ended with making Vivian Dartwick a Lady and then naming her heiress-designate to the crown.

On the surface, it seems like the letter to Tyrant was the knife, the letter to GP was the bet and the letter to the war council was the lie. And that may be true, but the second half of the chapter made me realize that the letters do not need to be sent for them to act as their function. Cat has intentionally made her headquarters in the center of this Mavian prayer, a weakened boundary to Arcadia. After having Adjucant write her letters, an enemy army comes through a breach the following morning. Without sending for him or any surprise, Cat speaks out into the air and Larat answers.

I believe that this is the twist that Cat is making, for she prepared this place with the knowledge that Larat would have been listening to Cat's conversation for a long time. Cat planned and explained what she was after as well as what her enemies were after and what conditions she needed to meet all with Larat able to listen in. Her twist is a knife for Larat. This is likely the Prince's Graveyard and Larat was once the Prince of Nightfall.

Walter

Perhaps im mistaken – but do members of the Wild Hunt qualify as possessing Crowns? Or possibly something qualifying as “one”?

I don't think they do being, iirc, members of the fae court, but it would ironic to if Cat would be able to qualify members of the Wild Hunt as “Crowns”, thereby sacrificing them to satisfy the promise she had made to Larat.

Foundling and the Duchess

Said Foundling to the Duchess

“I must make a man out of you

That will stand upon her feet, and play the game that will butcher his oppressor as a Praesi ought to do

And she sent the Duchess Sergeant Whatshisname

Not a Count or Lord, nor yet a legate,

It was not a big brass general that came

But a man in Legion kit who could handle men a bit

With his armor labelled Sergeant Whatshisname

Said Foundling to the Duchess “Though at present singing small

You shall hum a proper tune before it ends,”

And she introduced the Duchess to the Sergeant once for all,

And left 'em in the desert making friends

It was not a Royal Palace nor the Tower;

It was not a public-house of common fame;

But a piece of red-hot sand, with a valley on either hand,

And a little hut for Sergeant Whatshisname.

Said Foundling to the Duchess, “You've had miracles before,

When the Fairfaxes turned demons into prey;

But if you watch the Sergeant, he can show you something more.

He's a charm for making legionaries from clay.”

It was neither Miezán, Callowan, nor Kharsum;

It was odds and sods and leavings of the same

Translated by a stick (which is really half the trick),
And the Duchess harked to Sergeant Whatsishname.

(There were years that no one talked of; there were times of horrid doubt—
There was faith and hope and whacking and despair—
While the Sergeant gave the Cautions and he combed the Duchess out,
And Foundling didn't seem to know nor care.
That is her awful way o' doing business—
She would serve her will or vision just the same—
For she thinks her reach ends with Vale and Isle.)

Said Foundling to the Duchess, "You can let my people go!"
(Foundling used them hard and often from the start),
And they entered 'em in battle on a most astonished foe—
But Foundling had hardened the Duchess's heart
Which was broke, back when Callow fell
Twenty years before the Sergeant came
How they mended it no man can tell
Save for Sergeant Whatshisname

It was wicked bad campaigning (cheap and nasty as they marched),
There was cold and snow and endless work and ice,
There were fires and armies and lands that endless flame had parched
But the Duchess marched across Procer twice,
Cross Orne, cross Issere, and cross Salamans
Like the Praesi had come just before
Tween the armies of dust and fire to the land of their desire
And their guide, it was Sergeant Whatshisname!

We are eating dirt in handful for to save our daily bread
Which we have to buy from those that hate us most,
And we must not raise the money where the Sergeant raised the dead,
and it's wrong and dangerous to boast but he did it on the cheap and on the quiet, and he's not allowed to forward any claim—though he drilled a green man to Callowan, though he made a goblin fight,
He will still continue Sergeant Whatshisname—
Private, Corporal, Sergeant, and Instructor—
But the everlasting miracle's the same!

With many, many, many apologies to Rudyard Kipling, but this seemed like such a great fit!

"Note: investigation in why sharing a problem is said to halve it remain inconclusive. Perhaps more varied trials are needed, as the tiger always ends up killing both subjects no matter the order they're put in the cage."

– Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II

Lord Akil Tanja of the Grim Binder's Blood crouched over the thinning snow and passed a hand through it, the twinge in his knees a reminder that this was not his first war but it might just be his last. He was not so old as to crumble into dust at the first touch of wind, but life away from the comfortable confines of Malaga had taken a toll on him. There were practices for a binder of his talent that might allow health to seep back into his flesh but the Lord of Malaga had always disdained their likes. He would not play chasing-games with his age by binding and devouring creatures, not even those that would survive such a perverted act. The rueful reflection on his age was forced to the side by the calm voice of his sworn enemy and ally.

"And?" Lady Aquiline asked.

"The earth beneath is still frosted," Akil said. "These are war-grounds. Let there be blood."

"Let there be blood," the Lady of Tartessos agreed with a crisp nod.

Neither of them considered giving the Proceran captains marching with their host a voice in this decision. Had Prince Alvaro of Salamans survived the battle with the Stygian army there might have been need to do so out of courtesy but the man had died to the Magisterium's dark sorceries – after taking a wound he'd melted from the inside over the night, Akil had heard – and the remaining commanders were neither highborn nor powerful enough to force the issue. They would follow the Dominion in battle, like it or not.

"They say the One-Eye will be there," Lady Aquiline Osenia of the Slayer's Blood said. "That would be a worthy head to claim, do you not agree?"

The Silent Slayer's quarrelsome brood, Akil thought, had always shown a distasteful obsession for the killing of famed foes. The one-eyed greenskin who had been named Marshal of Praes many years ago was perhaps the most famous alive of his kind, but if Akil understood correctly the orc must also be an old beast by now. Hardly a challenge for a sharp young killer like the Lady Aquiline. That she had spoken of an aged orc but not of the Hellhound or the Deadhand was telling, in his eyes, for while those two's fame was fresher the ending of it would have been worthier dead. Fairer. The Lord of Malaga spat to the side before rising from his crouch.

"Shake the bushes before shooting at the sparrow, Osenia," he replied. "Marshals do not fight from the front and they have raised a fortress from nothing, these easterners."

The lair of the Black Queen's armies had been an impressive thing to behold, when Akil had first taken stock of it. Beneath a tall barrow crowned by raised stones a maze of death had been raised from wood, steel and earth. A deep ditch led into a palisade – a base of beaten earth, topped by spears – where legionaries kept watch night and day. Behind that first line flat grounds spread into flat killing grounds, ending in another palisade that prevented easy access to terraces filled with siege engines and crossbowmen. Deeper behind that walled camps filled with tents and protected by teeth-like bastions of earth and wood jutting outwards made up the last line of defence that would be manned by mortals. Lord Marave's messengers had spoken of strange lights above the barrow, after nightfall, and so Akil did not need to be told where it was that the Black Queen had made her den. These would be hard defences to crack, he knew, and Lady Aquiline's loose talk of claiming heads displeased him. Marshals of Praes were not easy meat, nor were the villain queen's own champions.

"Now is not the time to lose your stomach, Tanja," the Lady of Tartessos chided. "You heard Careful Yannu's stratagem same as me, and did not speak against the soundness of it."

That it had been the scheme of Lord Yannu Marave had only made Akil hesitate all the more. Aquiline Osená had not shared a border with the Champion's Blood for most her life, unlike Akil himself, and so she could not understand why the way they called the man not Reckless or Brave but Careful Yannu should be troubling. The Lord of Malaga had fought two honour wars against Lord Yannu's predecessor and found him a hard fighter but no great trouble. He'd sent a war-party into Alavan territory under Careful Yannu only once, though, in the moon that followed the man's ascension to lordship.

His own cousin and boyhood playmate Jaira had led it, for she was skilled with sword and bindings both and clever in the ways of war. Yet unlike his predecessor, Yannu had not fought the raiders as they passed through the flatlands taking riches and honour. No, he'd waited until they were returning north laden with loot and prisoners. Then he'd caught them while they were fat and slow under cover of night, butchering them wholesale. Without warning, without honour duels, without anything other than death weighed and measured. Jaira had been the only survivor of the night, and Lord Yannu had dragged her to the border before opening her throat in sight of the warbands Akil had sent to reclaim his cousin. He'd then left without even hearing out the calls to duel by the warriors of Malaga.

The point made had been harsh, but so was the man: Careful Yannu was willing to let his holdings bleed if it allowed him to position himself for a killing stroke. And once crossed, he would not stay his hand in retaliation no matter who had first given insult. The Marave were steel-cast madmen who answered to only Gods and Pilgrim, and barely even those. The notion of one blessed with both their line's talent for killing and a good mind for strategy was worth respect and wariness both. Madness and cold method were dark mothers to dark days. Lord Akil Tanja had not fought a second honour war against Alava since that pointed lesson and slept easier for it.

And now he was being told to place the fate of his captains, of his soldiers, in the hands of the Lord of Alava. A man known to sacrifice for the killing stroke, and do so without hesitation. He was tempted to refuse, to force a conference where another plan would be laid out before battle was given, but Lady Aquiline was watching him with those cold eyes. Waiting, patiently, for a misstep that would allow her to wrest command of the host from him. Razin's mistakes had been paid for, but the taint of failure still hung over the Tanjas. If the Lady of Tartessos went to the unsworn captains, claiming he had lost his nerve, Akil could not be certain of the outcome.

"I have already said," Lord Akil replied, "that there will be blood, Lady Aquiline. We will follow the stratagem of Careful Yannu and make war on the Enemy."

And still, he could not help but glance at the pale and empty vista behind his host. That long expanse of snowy plains, which had until morning been broken by the eldritch sight of a passage leading into Arcadia. It was gone, now, though the remembrance of the harrowing journey through that storm-wracked hellscape would haunt them all for years to come. The League of Free Cities had not followed them through the breach, after hounding them through it, yet Akil could not help but wonder if they had not taken another path after. If there might yet be more to this battle than the armies of the Black Queen and those of the Grand Alliance. Lady Aquiline had sent for the horn-bearer granted to them by the Holy Seljun while he looked, and though she looked hungry for the honour she did not overstep.

The young boy passed him the strange carved horn inherited from days long before the Dominion, an old artefact said to have made from the tip of a guisanes' horn. The legendary gargantuan bulls whose stride had shaken the world and flattened hills into plains were perhaps more myth than history, but it was said a shadow of their thundering might remained in wonders crafted from their remains. Whatever the truth of it, when Lord Akil Tanja of the Binder's Blood sounded the horn his magic shivered inside him as the deep call echoes across the plains. In the distance, after a long moment, the sister-horn in the hands of the other Dominion host offered a shuddering call in reply.

Banners rose and without further ceremony the battle began.

Marshal Juniper of the Red Shields watched her enemies advance in silence. The sight of so many soldiers on the move would have been impressive for someone who had not fought in the Arcadian Campaign or slogged through the brutality of Second Liesse, but after these Juniper had found it took much to awe her. Yet for all that the armies before her lacked the ostentatious wings and sorceries of the Courts or the relentless horror of the Diabolist's wights and devils they were no less dangerous for it. Flesh and steel did not splash so colourful across the pages of histories as the means of monsters and villains but they worked. And the Grand Alliance had brought much of both to bear on this field and this day.

"They don't seem to have organized beyond attacking together," Grem One-Eye said.

The sound of Kharsum spoken crisp and clear was like a breath of fresh air straight from the steppes. Juniper let that taste of home settled in her bones before growling in agreement. The armies of the Grand Alliance had not joined before moving against her fortifications, to her relative surprise. It might have taken them a few days to restructure after merging ranks, but they would have been stronger for it and there was not much she could do to better her own position with the means at her disposal. Her warlord had hinted that the League might be on its way to join the melee as well, Juniper noted. If her foes believed that arrival imminent, it might explain this hasty assault. This was speculation, however, and ultimately of no import to her. It was the facts that mattered. An army of eighty thousand was approaching from the northwest, under the command of Lord Yannu Marave and Princess Rozala Malanza. An army of sixty thousand was approaching from the southeast, under the command of Lord Akil Tanja. The first two commanders were known to her, and their armies as well. Of the latter commander, however, almost nothing was known save for his name.

"The northern force is the weaker one," Juniper said. "Much of the foot from Vaccei is light and Malanza fields mostly levies. If a rout is to happen at all, it will be from there."

The orc at her side grunted his agreement. They watched the enemy form up, and with cold eyes the Marshal of Callow sought weaknesses. The northern army advanced cautiously, which did not surprise her – she'd traded blows with them before. The Vaccei skirmishers advanced in a deep but loose screen ahead of the Proceran foot Princess Rozala had brought: a hodgepodge mixture of levies, fantassins and principality troops. Dartwick's spies had brought back word that as much as six tenths of the Principate infantry should be levies, which was promising, but thoughts of an easy rout were put to rest by the two wings of infantry flanking the Procerans. The Lord of Alava, Yannu Marave, had brought to the crusade some of the finest heavy infantry Juniper had ever seen. Only four thousand in whole, at least, but it was marching ahead of lighter armsmen from Alava and Vaccei in much greater numbers. A sharp sword to open a breach, Juniper thought, after the skirmishers found a weakness.

"Malanza has the horse again, looks like," Marshal Grem said.

The banner told it true, though she found the other orc made as wary as she felt by the way the near ten thousand horse – mixed Proceran and Levantine horse, though vastly more so Proceran than the other – the Princess of Aequitan led was peeling off from the rest of the army and moving towards the south. The mass of cavalry was moving slowly, but in good order.

"She didn't make the plan for this," Juniper said. "She's much more aggressive a commander than that, she'd keep the horse close on the flanks to try a charge if opportunity arose."

"Lord Yannu then," Grem said. "Shame. He's a hard one to bait."

"Too much to hope for he spends the Vaccei foot against the palisades, I suppose," Juniper muttered.

The older man twitched in amusement. The daring raids and ambushes from the Vaccei warriors and their vicious warleaders of the Bandit's Blood had not endeared the Levantines to either orc. Juniper found her eyes drifting south, to the other army, and found her back prickling. Most of what she saw there she had expected. The enemy was moving with skirmishers ahead, though the screen was much smaller than the northern army's, with two massed forces of infantry behind it. One Proceran and one Levantine. The Principate foot here should be mostly professional soldiers, Juniper thought, which explained why unlike in the northern army's formation they'd not been placed between steadier soldiers to hold up their spine. The detail that had her hackles raising was the detachment of cavalry splitting off from the army, a solid seven thousand moving north. From a bird's eye view, the Hellhound considered, within the hour there would be a point where her camp was as the centre of a neat square.

"They think they have a way to breach the palisades," the Marshal of Callow said. "Interesting."

The Marshal of Praes squinted his one eye, gazing at the moving cavalries. He arrived, she suspected, at the same conclusion she had: they were being positioned to hit forces defending the palisades from sudden angles after a path suddenly being opened for them.

"The reserves are readied," Grem One-Eye said, baring his fangs. "Let them try."

A moment later the skirmish lines of the northern army entered the first killing yard the Marshals had prepared for them and the slaughter began.

Moro of the Brigand's Blood had lost thirty warriors in the time it took to drink a skin of water. He was not stranger to death dealt and received, but the sheer suddenness of it took him by surprise. The traps had been cleverly hidden, he thought, covered with a thin layer of snow and earth. And they must have been dug at night, for even with watcher his mother's had not known of them. Not all warriors who'd fallen in the pits had died to the sharp stake at the bottom, but all had taken wounds – and their screams had brought hesitation where before there had been only courage. The warriors of his lands, Moro would admit to himself, were not used to being on this side of the traps and were not taking it well. The heir to Vaccei had called a halt, and sent for what he thought might just be the solution to the troubles. It wasn't long before the priests answered his call, for the Lanterns were never far from the vanguard of strife. A full battle-party of thirteen had come in answer, to his pleasure, and the eldest among them sought him out.

"Honoured Son," the woman greeted him. "You seek illumination?"

"I seek to walk within the Light," Moro agreed. "For me and mine to follow its paths."

The woman's face-paint, golden and pale, hid her expression well. He could not tell whether she approved or disapproved of his request, which while not presumptuous was still a request – for some of the Lanterns just that was enough to give offence. They were a touchy lot. Regardless, after a heartbeat she suddenly whipped around and a lance of Light struck out. Twenty feet forward, it broke through a thin layer of snow and earth to reveal the trap under.

"Follow, then, Moro of the Brigand's Blood," the Lantern said.

Her companions spread out, and at the fore of Moro's own warriors came men and women bearing long perches. They would reveal these traps, he smiled, for the Enemy had been foolish enough to lay them far out of crossbow range.

General Hune Egelsdottir waited until it was clear no more of the warrior-priests would reinforce the frontlines. She glanced at her senior mage, mildly amused by how eager he seemed to be to act.

"Fire," she ordered. "On special assets only."

Behind her, rituals bloomed as the mage cadres finally received the authorization to act. One, two, three, four, five: she long spears of flame formed and were sent out like massive arrows. Without scrying to adjust the trajectory it was unpleasantly imprecise business to use these sorts of rituals, as shown by the rituals. All were impacts – the ogre made a note to commend the officers leading the rituals – but only three of the priests were turned to cinders.

No matter, it was only the first volley.

"Again," the general of the Second Army ordered, the faintest trace of a smile on her face.

Lord Yannu Marave sat atop his horse and thoughtfully chewed the mouthful of bread he'd ripped from the loaf, eyeing the falling javelins of flame.

Princess Rozala had told him the Army of Callow had used such ritual sorceries before, though allegedly it had not since the Hierophant had left its ranks for destination. It would have been sloppy, however, to assume that meant without the Bestowed they could not. So he hadn't, instead preparing the same manner of defences the Proceran armies had at the Battle of the Camps. The priests from the House of Light, that tame Proceran breed, were shuffled to the front and ordered to form protective panes of Light. The Vaccei warriors were not yellow-bellied, and so did not need much haranguing before their advance resumed.

Grem One-Eye leaned forward and Juniper grinned, broad and fierce. They had, she believed, noticed the same detail. Though the ritual sorcery had been checked by priest intervention once more, there'd been a departure from the way that trick had been used at the Camps. Instead of massive layered shields covering the entire frontline, this time the Grand Alliance had resorted to a mere half dozen large panes protecting where the rituals had been striking. Dartwick's spies, the Hellhound was forced to admit, had actually provided useful military intelligence.

"They're spread thin on priests," the Marshal of Praes laughed. "Too many wars, Hasenbach, too many wars."

The Marshal of Callow did not reply, for her gaze had turned south where battle was finally being joined. General Abigail, the Hellhound had decided, was in need of thorough tempering. Her command at the southern front should serve, for a start.

The pit traps had not been part of the warnings Lord Marave had passed, but Aquiline Osega was not moved by the loss of a few dozen skirmishers. In the hunting of a foe strong and cunning, such deaths were inevitable. The Lady of Tartessos had been riding behind the last of the slingers and javelinmen, a handful of captains at her side, when she ordered the assault to be halted. Inevitable losses or not, she would not countenance simply throwing soldiers at the traps until a safe path emerged. Her favoured captain, dearest Elvera – who had such a dark reputation, with some, but to Aquiline remained the smiling woman who'd taught her how to reply to scraped knees with broken teeth – quietly reminded her that with Lord Yannu's force advancing there could be no long halt without leaving his army exposed to the full attention of the enemy. Feeling out the traps with perches would take too long, Lady Aquiline had decided. No, it was time for bold steps. The rider she sent to that hard-eyed old monster Akil Tanja returned with the answer she'd wanted: the binders of Malaga would take the lead.

Reining in her horse, it was an effort for the Lady of Tartessos not to show the thrum of excitement she felt at the notion of seeing the finest sorcerers of Levant in the fullness of their war-making. When had been the last time Creation witnesses such a thing, she wondered? Not since the Sepulcher War, at least, and perhaps not even then. A mere hundred men and women in thick coats of leather and iron grey cloth marched to the front, skulls and bones and claws bound by fine brass chains. The spread out in a line, and one of them raised a hand. There was a grinding scream, like a hundred blades being scraped against each other, and a translucent drop formed in the air a few feet in front of the binder. The ground beneath it, snow and earth and snow, was sucked upwards by some invisible force that broke it all down to grains. The other binders followed in the first one's wake, drops forming one after another and the scream becoming utterly deafening. And still Aquiline did not look away for a moment, for in front of her spirits were being given shape.

The first one shaped a wyvern, the winged creature with the long stinger-tipped tail letting out a scream all too-real before it began to advance and strike at the ground to reveal traps. The snow and earth it was made from shifted like true flesh and sinew, for the spirit the binder had called forth still remembered the body it has once worn. It was a company of beasts that was brought forth, manticores and griffins and culebron. Even a few creatures she did not recognize: her, the Lady of Tartessos, whose true domain was the savage Brocelian!

The beasts of snow and earth sprang forward, implacable and relentless.

General — despite her best efforts — Abigail of Summerholm idly wondered if you got a worse penalty for deserting when you were a general. She'd assumed it couldn't get worse than hanging, and that could only happen the once, but considered the amount of Wastelanders enrolled in the Army of Callow she just couldn't be sure. Well, there was nowhere to run to anyway so it was all academic in the end.

"Burn those up, boys," she called out.

Krolem relayed the order more proper-like, wonderful aide that he was. Behind the generals rituals bloomed, but Abigail just had this sinking feeling it wasn't going to be enough.

It wasn't pessimism, she told herself, if you were part of the Army of Callow.

pagesbe

The battle begins. I can't wait to see how this will play out. Also, can someone more observant than me tell me what time of day this occurred? I think it's daytime judging by the fact that everyone can see well.

Caerulea

And also the drow aren't wrecking the Allied forces.

pagesbe

They could be being held back as a trump card of sorts, so while this is true it isn't precisely evidence either.

On a different note, is it morning? By that I mean, are 95% of the Drow currently snoozing? Probably not enough information for that one.

TeK

So, is this Prince's Graveyard or not, what are you bets?

Andrew Mitchell

95% sure it is.

caoimhinh

Like Hune said: "Fire, on special assets only".

Most of us expect this to be the Princes' Graveyard, of course, this could be another battle and the Princes' Graveyard be actually one of the battles of the Grand Alliance + Callow against the Dead King where Procer lost a lot of their princes and only won due to Catherine's crazy strategies (which would make sense and be quite a plot twist at the same time).

Given the relationship between Callow and Procer, when we were given the name "Princes' Graveyard" for a future battle of Catherine, we immediately jumped to the assumption that it is a battle against Procer (how could we not, given what we had seen and what we saw afterward in the Crusade?), but we have to remember that there WILL be battles with the joined armies against Keter, and honestly I don't believe Catherine would be completely open about her plans to the other nations when she isn't to her own Generals.

Organizing the Grand Alliance forces so far hasn't been any ordained and clear chain of command with one General giving orders to the others but rather "You, take your forces to this position and then make plans on your own to hold that ground, kill the enemies there, and recapture lost territory", this is due to political issues and also because of the sheer size of the battlefronts.

My guess is Callow will be assigned to one of the Northeastern principalities where they can be the closest force to the Eastern front where the Drow are, which would let Klaus Papenheim free to give aid to the Lycaonese principalities that are fighting alone. I still believe that when the war is over the ones who will actually be grateful and remember Catherine's actions will be the Lycaonese.

So, while this is likely to be Princes' Graveyard and all the hints are there (even the thing with Larat getting his Seven Crowns and One), the Princes' Graveyard might still be a future battle against Procer, or even a battle alongside Procer against the Dead King.

IDKWhoitis

Yeah, the Alliance armies don't have many people who can see in the dark well, versus the Army of Callow that has Drow and Goblins. It's most likely in board daylight.

Larat said that the League would follow within the hour, and there's no sign of them so far. It could be that Kairos is hanging back and waiting for the casualties to rack up, but given that they didn't have the time to form up, they might have actually started marching immediately.

Larat merely said there would be a break within the hour, through which the League troops would come out, but that doesn't mean the break would be close to them. Akil confirmed that despite the League pursuing them through the hellscape they did not pursue them out of the break (which stayed open until the morning).

Also, it's not that they didn't have the time to form up,

Juniper said that if the two armies joined they would need days to reorganize, so they attacked without joining.

caoimhinh

I think it is close to noon, given how Akil said that the breach was open until morning came. They arrived the day before through the gate Vivienne and Larat reported to Cat, given how they needed to rest after crossing the hellscape that Masego made from that shard of Arcadia, contact with Yannu and Rozala's forces, check the plan, inform their captains, make their own camp, eat and organize for the fight, etc. it's likely they used most of the morning to rest and prepare. So my estimation is around 10-11 a.m.

By the way, this also means that Cat is gone already, riding with the Wild Hunt to engage Pilgrim and Tyrant, since the end of last chapter Cat said she would ride with them at nightfall.

Andrew Mitchell

Your comment about Cat being gone with the Wild Hunt is a good one although I think it's just about Pilgrim & the Saint and not (yet) the Tyrant.

If Cat has engaged then I'm surprised that the Levantine leaders haven't heard about it yet.

caoimhinh

Well, Cat expects Kairos to show up or influence the things happening, but I agree with you, Kairos is likely to show up right after the battle is over, which is when the letter Cat sent him will come into action.

I'm not sure that the Levantine leaders can find out what's happening in Arcadia, it's more likely that Pilgrim and co. are over there and whatever happens there will only be known to the armies after Cat and Pilgrim return.

ChillyPepper

Not to forget the well, she -most likely- would cause an eclipse to put a halt to pilgrim's miracles.

ChillyPepper

And could also work to strengthen the Drow during day time, I suppose.

Daemion

Abigail needs more exposure to Robber to get the real authentic "Army of Callow" experience.

danh3107

I feel like I should've extrapolated from the name, but the binders being summoners of monster spirits really is the coolest. Also I kinda wish we had seen that bandit's blood guy's face after seeing several lanterns incinerated in an instant.

Javvies

Hmmm.

Just how coordinated can the Alliance armies be? There's apparently a shared plan of sorts, but how detailed can that be?

Heh, Abigail keeps trying and failing to avoid increased responsibilities and danger. I expect she's going to have more to complain about by the time this is over.

IDKWhoitis

They might be relying on captains more, with a general plan set up on the larger stage. If the situation goes FUBAR, they might not react well, and could possibly see a Rout.

antoninjohn

The Army of Callow should have Pickles war machines and they are built for sieges

Mental Mouse

They may not have brought those along, but in any case the troops probably aren't close enough for war machines yet. It's a bad sign for the attackers when they had to play their summoners, and started losing priests, at the outermost defenses.

benthelynx

It's part of the trap of careful Yannu i'd bet.

IDKWhoitis

I don't see much mention of the Drow, so are they the reserve or are they a detachment that is hiding elsewhere?

I'm wondering if Cat will make an appearance at the frontlines like good old times, she could close a breach. But she might be out and about hunting with the Fae, so they might have unconventional tactics planned.

danh3107

They probably have a stratagem that lets them deepstrike on turn two like devils. It's smart of the marshals to use their allied detachment's strengths while reserving their command points for other important situations. (sorry for the dumb 40k joke)

caoimhinh

Given that this is happening somewhere between late morning and early afternoon, the Drow are still weakened. They will likely be called on later.

Cat left the night before with the Wild Hunt, so it's unlikely she will appear on the frontlines until much later on, she is probably within the hellscape Arcadia shard that's Masego's current mad lab, and Pilgrim and Tyrant are likely there too.

IDKWhoitis

I would like to imagine they are having a very livid discussion on several topics.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think they really talked at all about the disposition of Juniper and Grem's forces so it's not surprising that there hasn't been a mention of the Drow.

apperatus27

Hahaha, Our new protagonist in training has found herself a Hakram!

Mental Mouse

Or rather, a (lower-case) adjutant. As I've said previously, the appearance of Hakram's Name implies that "the orcish Hyper-Competent Assistant" has become enough of a tradition to appear as a Name.

Dainpdf

It's not paranoia if the Gods are out to get you.

Now, when will the battle be joined for real? Hoping for next chapter, but alas...

caoimhinh

We are likely to have a huge cliffhanger next chapter, hahahaha.

Dainpdf

Yeah. It's not EE if there isn't a huge cliff to hang from.

TeK

In his defence, this is the only way to write a running series. He does intent on publication, so all those cliffhangers will be reworked, as well as many, many inconsistencies and typos. We are basically reading beta version, and not even as editors, those guys will not even start rummaging through our comments and 'll be smarter for that.

Dainpdf

I was not criticizing. The cliffhangers, grating as they can be at times, make the story sweeter to read.

caoimhinh

Nice interlude.

It's cool to see the different perspectives of the Generals trying to outsmart each other:

A: Makes a move

B: "I see your move and raise you this move!"

A: "Ha! I knew you'd do that, you fell into my trap!"

B: "I knew there was a trap, so I prepared this countermeasure!"

A: "Fool! I knew that you knew there was a trap, so I prepared a second layer to counter your countermeasure!"

And then the winner will be the one who can see the furthest down that path of iterations. At least until the whole Tariq vs Catherine vs Kairos thing is resolved, given that their 3-way battle of wits and Story Fu is what ultimately will decide things on the bigger picture, though the battle between no Named is also a huge determining factor and the result of it will be used as a blade for the aforementioned Named in their own triple chess.

It's interesting to contrast the attitude of Lord Tanja and Lady Aquiline, while he is paranoid and wary of her at every time thinking that she is scheming against him and trying to take command from him (which she actually might be doing but not in the personal way he seems to think she is doing it), Aquiline seems to actually respect him and made no further mental comment about him than "cold-eyed old monster" and it was made evident she holds the binders in great esteem and maybe admiration, given how fascinated she was when seeing them in action.

Abbigail really is like Catherine in a lot of ways, eh? It's more evident with each chapter that she is Cat's spiritual successor. She even has her own wonderful and efficient Orc aide to relay her orders in a proper manner. I wonder if she is walking the crevice in Fate (you know, the one Roles are made from) that Catherine started "Callow military girl with an efficient Orc adjutant, rising through the ranks by displaying skill in troubled times, to defeat the enemies of her country". Whether she gets a Name or not is not that important, but Cat forged a new story and Abby is continuing it.

P.S: I'd like to see Grem's POV. And the Drow, because everyone in those armies is going to lose their shit when they see the Drow wielding Night.

Not a typo, but rather a suggestion of adding commas:

-Deeper behind that walled camps / Deeper behind that, walled camps

-with Lord Yannu's force advancing there could be no long halt / with Lord Yannu's force advancing, there could be no long halt

Typos found:

-mad up / made up

-for even with watcher his mother's had not known of them / I'm not sure what this sentence is supposed to be, maybe "for even with his mother's watchers, he had not known of them"? Or perhaps "for even with watchers -his mother's- he had not known of them".

-she long spears / the long spears

-the last time Creation witnesses such a thing / the last time Creation witnessed such a thing

-The spread out / They spread out

-considered the amount of Wastelanders / considering the amount of Wastelanders

I prefer Belisarius' approach to battles. You don't have to fight a battle conquer/slaughter the enemy population, you just have to purposefully win/lose various battles to stretch out a campaign until the political situation sorts out itself.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Belisarius_series

caoimhinh

Indeed, and if we have seen anything of Procer and Levant is that their political situations are always a shit storm, with people of power making nation-wide messes out of personal grudges and ambition.

TeK

Show me a human nation not plagued by this, and I will kiss you, and give you a candy.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, I want to see those arrogant Levantine humbled by the Drow.

Sean

Oh, that is a great theory! It's been remarked countless times how similar Abigail is to Cat, but I never considered she might be following the groove Cat carved into creation. It will be interesting to see if she ends up as Squire or Black Knight (depending on what happens to Asmodeus).

TeK

She ends up a Marshmallow of Callow after Juniper. Names are a desire, and the only desire Abigail has is to not have anything to do with Names and that stuff.

Kissaten

Hierarch became Hierarch despite wanting to be Servant To The People (Glory To Bellerophon). This Wicked Foreign Oligarch may be in similar predicament.

RoflCat

Names come from desire to change, the thought that the world is wrong and you have an idea of what it should be.

Abigail is like the opposite of that, she's aware the world's fucked, but she just don't care to change things, she simply try to do her best to not get hit by the debris in the river as she flow along with it.

Hierarch became that because Kairos basically broke him by putting him into environment that constantly trigger his "you people are wrong" thoughts.

TeK

Nah, the Hierarch did have a strong belief into how the Creation should be run, as well the willingness to see it through, it's just that his particular set of beliefs took the right to make decisions from his own hands and into the hands of others. He is a Named to end all Names, which is still a Name, as is a story to end all stories is still a story.

And best girl Abigail does not have any strong beliefs or desires. I mean she doesn't want to die, or work in tannery, or well really, work earnestly, and is everything wrong with current generation, but she doesn't really WANT it, it's more like a preference: "Welp, it'd be good not to die before supper, there is some mystery stew to be had, but if I die, not a big deal, soup's going to suck anyway"

Mental Mouse

"Marshmallow" as in crispy on the outside, gooey on the inside? 😊 A natural hazard of hanging too close to the fire...

Whiteeyes

Or, to quote one character in Yu-Gi-Oh "I counter the effect that counters the effect that counters the effect that counters the effect that counters the effect that counters the effect!" Yes, that was actual dialogue.

TeK

Oh, Yu-Gi-Oh, the game that best represents Guideverse (TV version, not that abomination that some people birthed into our world), where the rules only really exist to show how strong and smart the protagonist is, while ignoring both itself, continuity, and general common sense, and of course, blissfully unable to count to save itself.

Zim the Vixen

Calling out a second interlude, called something like "East, ever ____".

caoimhinh

Yep, after all, the interludes and chapters' names are always related in some manner or theme (ballet techniques, chess moves, theatre terms, etc).

I wonder what it will be this time, "East, Ever Dreadful" perhaps? Maybe we'll get a third interlude and it's called "North, Ever Dark" with the Drow showing Night's prowess.

caoimhinh

Maybe "East, Ever Defending" given how they are on the defensive in this battle and Callow's history of repelling Procer's invasions.

TeK

Yeah, or how Praes is always defending from those war-mongering Callowans. Uh, those Callowans, always looking to conquer stuff.

Nairne .01

I sense sarcasm...

SITB

Wouldn't the second interlude be titled "Fate, Writ In Dread" as per the lines of the poem?

caoimhinh

Oh, right! This is from the final verse of "Tyranny of the Sun", I had forgotten about it, thanks.

And "Fate Writ In Dread" is an awesome name for next interlude, because before the Alliance forces get wrecked by the Army of Callow and Drow, there needs to be a moment where the Alliance looks like it's gonna win.

Aotrs Commander

The Dominion, ye gods. And this is where so many of the quote-unquote heroes come from?

I'm sure the Klingons would approve.

(That was not a complement.)

caoimhinh

The Dominion of Levant has been shown to be ruled by madmen obsessed with honor, fame and bloodlines, they are also very hypocritical because they have a King and a royal family (the Holy Seljun from the Pilgrim's Blood, they even call it their seat a throne) yet claim they don't have kings, and believe they are better because of it. And their nobility, the descendants of the Heroes who founded that nation, have brainwashed the rest of the population into adoring them for their bloodlines, at least in other countries the nobility can be overthrown and a new house emerge. This is impossible in Levant.

TeK

I don't know where you get that, the Holy Seljun is literally a Caliph, the whole Levant and Majilis should've tipped you off. And Sunni Caliph is no king, but merely the overseer of sharia. He can't really change laws, tor the laws were given from above, but merely ensure that everyone follows them. And Dominion is even more liberal than actual Caliphate, because there were basically five Muhammeds (plz don't blow me (unless you're a pretty woman and have no explosives)), and while Pilgrim's Blood is technically acknowledged to be superior, it's more the case of [i]princeps[/i] or "first among equals". The name Dominion reflects the semi-independent nature of the relationship between the various Bloods.

Just just read this:

"a Caliph or ruler who becomes either unjust or severely ineffective must be impeached via the Majlis"

A Holy Seljun is repeatedly stated to be a religious leader first and foremost, and it is basically proven by implied regular wars between various factions inside Dominion. Now, about whether other bloods can be considered to be kings or not, well, while nobles, the kings they are not. Let's start with the fact that religious authority is both superceding and detached from their hands, as interaction with Lanterns clearly demonstrates. But absolute authority and independence those Lords have not. They much more reminding of tribal leaders.

Cap'n Smurfy

This really explains the whole political structure of the Dominion really well, thank you. I was curious about how they were different from traditional monarchies.

TeK

It really does not explain it as well as I want, but alas, both my academic knowledge of caliphates and my linguistic abilities conspired against me.

caoimhinh

You are partially right. Just because the Holy Seljun of Levant is inspired by the Caliphate does not mean that it is the same or that it works in the same manner.

The Caliph worked as you said (although I disagree on the matter of Caliphs not being able to change the law; they couldn't change the Islamic precepts and their state laws were mostly based on the Qoran and those could not be changed, true, but not every law in the country came from the Qoran and those could be changed), but the Holy Seljun seems more inclined towards the Shiite version of Caliph (Blood descendants of the Prophet, in this case, The Grey Pilgrim), rather than the Sunni vision (elected by votes), in the Guide, they are a mixture, the Seljun can appoint a successor and there will be votes in case there isn't a clear designated successor as we saw in the Peregrine extra chapters, but in every case they are from the Pilgrim's Blood.

Similarly, not always the eldest child inherits the throne in a kingdom or empire, but the one who has the most backing, either by the previous ruler or the nobles (it is for this reason that there were so many internal fights and assassinations among royal families, as they fought for succession, both in our world and in the different countries of the Guide, including Levant as we saw in Peregrine Extra chapters).

It is also true that the four bloodlines of the Heroes that accompanied the founding Grey Pilgrim enjoy a great deal of independence in their decisions and have the right to "honor wars" for whatever stupid excuse they come up with (this is, as you have pointed out, due to something akin to a religious belief), but not even the King of Callow nor Dread Emperor of Praes held absolute authority over everything their nobles did, and they even suffered impeachment, rebellion, and execution if they stepped too much out of line.

Point is, just because the name is different and the nature of the family's ascension to power is different doesn't mean that they aren't royalty. Seljuns are kings with another name, and their title is passed down through their bloodline just like any other royal family, that it is thought of as a Gods' given title isn't that much different from the Catholic Kings.

Different culture and reason, but they are still undeniably royalty.

TeK

I agree with you on corrections, but the exact amount of authority Seljun is able to project is not clear from what we know in the books. The inheritance through blood is not the only, or indeed, most important part of monarchy. And I thought Sunni caliphs still supposed to be blood relatives of the Prophet, no? Anyway, I suppose they do technically fall under a broader definition of monarchy, but I also think that their boast about having no Kings meant that they don't have a specific kind of more centralised monarchies of the east. In my eyes, Dominion is more a confederation between five nobles, with highest legislative organ being the council of those five nobles with equal voting rights and the right of veto.

"The current Seljun, the figurehead ruler of the Dominion, had officially deferred the decision of whether or not to join the Tenth Crusade to the Majilis. Though literature often drew comparison between the Highest Assembly and the Majilis, for they were both councils composed of the highest nobility in their respective nations, Cordelia had never found much similarity beyond the surface trappings. The Levantine council was a toothless and ineffectual beast, with every lord and lady among it having right of veto and every interest in ensuring power was never centralized within the Dominion lest their own privileges be curbed. Princess Eliza of Salamans had fought two wars and died an attainted traitor to ensure the Highest Assembly would never be such a plague on Procer, or the First Prince relegated to being little more than a first among equals. As it was, the entire Majilis had come to Salia to treat with her. The five lords and ladies of Levant, all descended from heroes. Cordelia's agents suspected every one of them had applied veto if a smaller delegation did not involve them personally, and she was inclined to believe it."

caoimhinh

True, what we have seen of the inner politics of the Dominion is limited, the most insight about the position of Holy Seljun is provided by the Peregrine extra chapters. In those, we see that the Seljun is always from Pilgrim's Blood but to ascend to the Tattered Throne they need to first be elected by the Majilis, a council composed by the heads of the other four families descending from the founders of Levant.

But those chapters also showed us that a Seljun is very influential and their decisions obeyed by the lords and ladies of the Dominion, this allowed Yasa Isbili (Tariq's older sister) to bring great changes to their country such as raising more soldiers to strengthen their armies, fixing roads and getting the lords and ladies to put the coin for it, and it was also the reason Tariq killed his nephew, because if Izil Isbili ascended to the Throne then there would be war against Procer (if, as you imply, the Holy Seljun was a mere figurehead without real power and influence, then Tariq wouldn't have needed to kill his nephew to stop an imminent war against Procer).

So the Holy Seljun of Levant IS capable of making and changing laws, declaring war against other countries, even holds influence over the historical records (when Tariq was expelled and disowned by his mother, his presence was removed from all records in the Dominion, not only in the capital ruled by the Seljun), and is the one who rules trade and signs treaties, although those decisions can be deferred to the Majilis and there is one thing that must always be safeguarded: Honour. The thing that the Lords and Ladies of Levant have as paramount is Honour, and they will do everything and anything to earn and protect that (wage war with each other, kill the ones who have slighted them, keep courtesy at all times, follow tradition, hunt dangerous beasts, search for a glorious death, etc.). And while the position of Holy Seljun is only attained with the votes of the other four lords and ladies, once on that position the Seljun is treated as a powerful and influential figure with real authority.

Now, as you pointed out with the extract from Cordelia's thoughts, they could be an ineffectual lot and keep bickering and backbiting (this is, as I have said above, due to their obsession with honor, which perpetuates feuds among the lords and ladies and thus prevents them from real cooperation) but Cordelia tends to be a bit of a hypocrite when it comes to Procer, its politics, and the way it acts.

The Highest Assembly has been proven to be a bunch of people who only care about money and always make political schemes to obtain this (except for the four Lycaonese principalities, as their primary concerns are always about fighting Ratlings and the Dead King, sacrificing themselves protecting the realm while watching their southern compatriots' petty schemes), and Cordelia in that extract claims that the First Prince is not just first among equals, yet we know that it is in fact exactly that; in almost every single chapter that shows Cordelia's POV, she is worried about being removed from her position (it was even the excuse that the Pilgrim gave Catherine for not using Levant to force Procer into making peace with Callow, as doing that would have Cordelia impeached within the month).

The way each country elects its leaders has its own advantages and disadvantages: Levant is more stable since the Isbili family will always be the rulers given the religious fervor every levantine holds for the Grey Pilgrim and his descendants, but the Honour issue keeps the other four families constantly at odds with each other; Procer is unstable due to them changing leaders constantly as the Princes fight each other all the time "The Ebb and the Flow" as they call it, and have come to treat it as petty games where a principality gathers armies to fight another and the winner gets to impose a treaty to the loser, in exchange, the ruler of the Principate is always the Prince or Princess with the most influence over the country, but the Highest Assembly (by Cordelia's own words with Catherine) keeps the First Prince in check (allegedly from abusing their position and perpetuating in office), and every big decision of the First Prince must be supported by the Assembly before it can be made effective, and getting the new decrees accepted can cost them influence, favors, debts, and money, which down the line can be needed to prevent being removed from the position (we have seen Cordelia hesitate when acting EVERY SINGLE TIME due to this).

So I stand on my initial point, the Holy Seljun is King of Levant in all but name, the Isbili are a royal family, and their right to rule is considered a Gods' given thing in the Dominion; the only thing the Seljun must always keep in mind when ruling is the Honor of the other four family heads and they will obey, because that same honor compels them to follow the decrees of the successor of the Grey Pilgrim's Blood, who they revere with religious fervor. Of course, that is a tricky and complex matter, given that anything can be a slight to those nobles and each family has their own eccentricities (even during this Crusade it was explicitly said that there are some families that can't be put together in a joined army because they would be at each other throats).

So, how the battle is going to proceed? The first important part of that prediction, is a name. Is it an already alluded to "Princes' Graveyard"? On one hand, there are seven anointed rulers of Procer, and this is supposed to be the last battle of Callow and Grand Alliance, so there likely would not be any more Princes to fight. On the other hand, such a wholesale destruction needed to get to the Proceran rulers is not in the interest of either side, there are at least two Princesses (which may indicate though, who will survive the battle), and it seems strange that only a slaughter of Proceran rulers will influence a name, since that either implies that Levantine Lords survived (perhaps leaving the fight under Pilgrim's orders or getting captured) or that it was not important enough to garner attention, which seems unlikely. Most importantly though, Cat needs to lose in the incoming battle, and the losses are required to be nonexistent, although, perhaps, only she has to lose, and not her armies. And the lose may be a necessary leverage for both Tyrant and Cat.

Personally, I have a feeling that this is not a Princes' Graveyard, but the rate of my predictions about PGtE suggests that I am wrong. So I can safely concluded that this is in fact, a Princes' Graveyard.

Now we got many factors for this battle, so let's start with numbers:

In terms of sheer numbers there is basic equality, GA has 120k troops, 40 of which is Malanza's army, consisting mostly of levies and being generally disunited due to many Princes on the field, two 40k Levantine armies, and 20k of professional Proceran soldiers, separated into 80k and 60k hosts. 80k host has 4k of apparently amazing heavy infantry and has 10k in horse, while 60k host has at least 7k of cavalry.

Callow has overall 110k troops, of which 20k are Praesi Legions (or anywhere between 15 and 18k, the number are notoriously inconsistent), 40k (37, really) of Army of Callow, and 50k drow auxiliaries. The knightly order bring about an unknown number of cavalry, but given that it's both hilariously outnumbered by Proceran 17k and based on previous numbers, I'd put it anywhere between 3 and 5k. Oh, they also have a dragon. And necromancing legion.

Now from what I understand, this is broad daylight, probably closer to the morning, so drow are almost entirely incapacitated. That brings effective number of Callow to be around 60k, which is now outnumbered by GA by 2 to 1.

Now, Callow has a terrain advantage as they are on the defensive, and had time to prepare the grounds. They have camp surrounding a barrow, which is, as we well know, a male hog castrated before sexual maturity (look it up!), surrounded by an alledged bastion, and then, two more polisades, with killing fields in front of each. Now there, ya have ta correct me if I'm wrong.

Now there are three outside hanging swords. First, there is a lake Artoise where Cordelia dredged up some corpses and look at that, it's conveniently near. The second is Masego's falling piece of Arcadia. And the third is the Tyrant and his cronies, ready to pop out on the earliest convenience.

The third one limits time of the engagement, for both, really, but particularly for GA.

The drow will be held back until dusk, for they are an unknown quantity and as such, have an element of surprise at their side. At night they're most powerful, so this is where they will be used, maximising their potential.

So legions have to defend till dusk, which is around 8 hours. They have more than enough walls to cling to and space to give up, all of those in exchange for time until the counter-offensive.

The GA have a stratagem, but I got bored halfway through.

It is still possible that the Princes' Graveyard is a future battle, or even a battle of the Grand Alliance + Callow against the Dead King, just that in said battle Procer will lose a lot of princes, but yeah, odds are this battle here is the Princes' Graveyard we are all expecting.

I wonder where the Dragon is, it might have flown away given how it doesn't really care much about what happens to others, how something as notorious as a Dragon would have been mentioned at least once since Cat joined with their armies, and it also apparently didn't fight when the First Army was on the brink of defeat. So I believe it is no longer there and just flew to somewhere else to sleep, the Necromancers are likely still there with the army, though.

As for the corpse that Cordelia ordered dragged out of the lake, remember that Lake Artoise is so massive that it has shores with 7 principalities (Salia which is Procer's capital, Lange, Cantal, Creusens, Aequitan, Salamans, and Iserre where this battle is being fought), so my guess is that whatever she dredged out was taken via Salia and is on its way North to be used against the Dead King, as Cordelia said: "Fire against fire".

Masego's situation will be solved in Arcadia through the encounter of Cat and Pilgrim, while I believe the Tyrant will appear after the battle is over to serve as the safeguard of the Army of Callow when it is leaving Iserre.

Mental Mouse

"...but the rate of my predictions about PGtE suggests that I am wrong. So I can safely conclude..."

LOL! But yeah, I'd expect the Legion troops will be turtleing up until the Drow come online. I don't think Cordelia's find is going to be immediately relevant. Masego may intervene but probably not during the main fight; those troops did get through without being swarmed by demons, and if that wasn't by his will he's likely to take an interest. If he does intervene in the battle proper, he's likely to mess up Catherine's plans. The Tyrant himself probably isn't present, and his troops are basically more currently-warm bodies on the field. Enough to make trouble for the Legions, but I doubt they can stand against the Drow at night.

Mental Mouse

And if Tyrant's troops fight on Cat's side, that will probably further upset Cat's plans. Or the Pilgrim's, or both.

Mental Mouse

Also: The Drow aren't just 50k of troops, they're also half an empire's worth of Night's answer to Named. Meaning they can eat the Procerans for lunch, and probably the Levantines too, binders or no. The question is, do the attacking troops realize they have a time limit?

After the battle, there are also those dire hints about what may happen if Larat gets their seven crowns plus one... even the Summer Princess was scared, and oddly, so was Larat. So it's not as simple as "Larat becomes Fae Lord Of The World".

Also: "manticores and griffins and culebron". That turns out to be Spanish for a soap opera, but I also got this mythological reference: <https://www.scribd.com/document/314609867/Culebro-n#>

I'm from Colombia, a Spanish-speaking country, so that term caught my attention.

I mentioned it in a comment back in Yannu's first appearance, when he was reminiscing about his instincts saving him from a Culebron years ago, the word in Spanish is “culebrón” with a tilde, and means “big snake” in a bit of an informal way, with “Culebra” being the Spanish word for a non-venomous snake. It seems Levant has quite a huge and prolific fauna of magical creatures.

Interlude: Graves We Have Yet To Fill

“The middle years of the Uncivil Wars can roughly be described as a series of conflicts fought to determine peace terms. The tragedy of those years, in retrospective, can be said that while the overwhelming majority of them desired peace no two Calernian powers could agree on what exactly the terms of it should be – and so to war they all went, convinced every step of the way that the others were at fault for it.”

– Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara

The third volley did not work better than those before it.

The spears of flame rose into the sky like quarrels loosed, before the guiding sorceries of the legion mages who’d performed the ritual pulled them down. The arc was sudden but graceful, the crackling fire in red and gold tearing straight through the five largest apparitions the Dominion had sent forward. Earth and snow dispersed at the explosion of heat and light, the grounds beneath what had been the shape of strange creatures scorched through a vaporized layer of a frost. There were about a hundred of the damned things, General Abigail thought, but it wouldn’t have been too bad if a ritual volley actually put the abominations down. Instead she winced as she watched the flames of her mages disperse in turn, leaving behind only small droplets of eldritch power hovering in the air. A heartbeat later the ground beneath the droplets began breaking up and the creatures that’d been broken began reforming.

“I can see that, thank you,” she acidly replied.

Fuck. At this rate the entire web of traps the army’s sappers had worn themselves to the bone digging during nights and hiding before dawn came would be trampled into irrelevance by some strange godsdamned Levantine magic. She squinted at the creatures again, noting how the massive manticore in the lead acted like it was actually hungry. That had to be blasphemous, right? It was all looking a little too much like necromancy, and you weren’t supposed to do that if you were on the side of a crusade these people were on.

"I'm not arguing the House Insurgent is right, mind you," she muttered. "But this needs looking at, is all I'm saying."

"Ma'am?" Krolem asked, sounding confused.

Had he been talking? Abigail had no idea, but now was not the time to look like she was losing it in front of the troops. The Black Queen's barn-burning oration at Sarcella had riled them up like young dockworkers who'd just gotten their first pay. If they thought she was the weak link in this army, Abigail thought with a sudden urge to grimace, they were going to tear her apart. Possibly literally given the amount of orcs there were in the ranks. Look calm, Abigail, she told herself. It's all under control.

"Quite right, Krolem," she slowly said. "Spot on. On that note, I need you to request a deployment order from Marshal Juniper."

She sent him off after a quick elaboration, fairly sure the Hellhound would refuse her request and so in the after-battle reports she'd have an excuse for her failure to perform. That it would put her straight at odds with the Marshal of Callow would be even better, she giddily thought. Marshal Juniper might even demote her, or drum her out of the army.

A girl could dream, couldn't she?

Forward, Akil Tanja had ordered.

The Lord of Malaga was no fool, to send his binders forward unprotected, but neither would he spare them contribution. After Lady Aquiline had requested the deployment of his finest war-sorcerers to clear the approach of traps, he'd immediately sent for his son. Razin was in need of deeds to redeem himself, if he was to remain the heir to Malaga, and opportunity would arise soon enough. For that purpose Akil had ordered the boy to gather captains enough for two thousand warriors, all bearing shields, and appointed him to command before sending him to reinforce the binders. They would need that protection soon enough, the Lord of Malaga knew, for the bound spirits that had been sent forth were reaching the end of their leash. No other power of Levant had made as deep study of the arts of binding like the Grim Binder's line, and though Malaga was hardly the only city to send binders to war for the other families such a thing was rare and always in small numbers. That had obscured some of the limitations of their craft, which would become clear very soon if Akil was not careful with his orders.

The binding of a soul or spirit was done with one's own blood mixed with the ancient flower-dye, tattooed on one's skin with needles of barrow-bone. The patterns of these bindings had been refined by Akil's ancestors, to require less breadth and shackle the bound more tightly – and cease sickening the blood of those who used them recklessly. The sharing of those secrets with those who entered the service of the Tanja was why so many practitioners came to Malaga, with the finest among them allowed to read the tomes of the Obscure Library in exchange for oaths to answer calls to war by the ruling lord or lady of the city. Yet since the founding of the Dominion, no binder saved those Bestowed had ever succeeded at sending one of their bound entities further than three hundred feet from themselves. Akil was talented in the art, as befitting of his blood, and so the silver-winged hawk he'd bound as a boy he could send as far as two hundred and twelve feet without the shackle turning on him. Yet it was a rare thing for any binder to reach more than two hundred feet, and even most of those allowed to peruse the Obscure Library remained in the antechamber of that hurdle.

This mattered today, if only because soon the spirits of his binders would have to halt their advance. Ordering them to advance would remedy the issue and allow them to clear the entire field all the way to the enemy fortifications without further casualties, but it would also leave them vulnerable. Razin and the shield-bearing warriors he'd assembled would see to that vulnerability, he'd decided. It would leave his son close to the front, too, and so able to lead the assault against the same force that had humbled him at Sarcella.

At the head of his host the Malaga binders were surrounded by rings of steel, and as he had ordered forward they all went.

"Why?"

Marshal Juniper of the Red Shields was frowning. General Abigail's tribune – a good Hoaring Hoof Clan boy by the look of his jaw, she'd noted with approval – cleared his throat in that way young officers always did when they had no good answer but had to answer anyway. Silver-quick, the wistful thought that Nauk truly had ruined that army down to the bone came and went.

"So she didn't say," the Hellhound cut in before he could reply.

Tribune Krolem sheepishly flared his teeth, and did not deny it.

"Only a thousand?" Juniper asked again, to confirm.

"Yes ma'am," Tribune Krolem agreed.

The Marshal of Callow's instinct was to send him back with an order for General Abigail to make a proper proposal including for what she wanted the soldiers, but she held her tongue. Catherine had raised the other woman up for a reason, and it would not be anything as simple as birth. If her warlord had simply wanted to put Callowan hands on the reins of her armies, Juniper suspected Brandon Talbot would have been the chosen candidate. Instead, though, she'd chosen an enlisted legionary who'd shot up the ranks. Not someone with ties to nobles or fame in the kingdom. Catherine had seen something in the younger woman, and though Juniper of the Red Shields did not she'd not long ago had reminder of the value of trust.

"She has them, then," Marshal Juniper said. "See Tribune Bishara for the proper writ and be on your way."

The boy moved quick, like she'd stung him, but Juniper had already put him out of her mind. Marshal Grem's curious eye on her she ignored as well, her own attention now solely turned to the southern front. What was the first commander Catherine had handpicked since Juniper herself scheming, exactly?

Shit, Abigail thought, look at the writ Krolem had just handed her with a sinking feeling in her stomach. The Hellhound had actually agreed? Why would she — no, don't panic, she told herself. This could still be salvaged if she watched her step. On one hand, she'd actually be expected to produce results now. On the other hand, as long as she tried to pull off a vaguely coherent plan and failed she'd probably still manage to avoid the noose. Gods, Abigail knew she should have made her request more unreasonable, if she'd gone overboard the Marshal would have refused. But no, she'd just to had hedge her bets and make it look like her theoretical plan had been reasonable just to improve the chances the Black Queen wouldn't feed her liver to buzzards after this was all over with. Her mother was right, she'd never learned to quit while she was ahead. Sure, Ma had lost an eye and a finger brawling with Annie Sutherland over who made the better beer, but just because she was a lunatic didn't mean she was wrong. Fucking Sutherlands, anyway, strutting around like Annie having been in the Royal Guard meant she knew anything about brewing.

"She did know a thing or two about knives, though," she conceded in a mutter.

"It is a great honour, ma'am," Krolem, who was still there, rumbled approvingly.

"Yes," Abigail echoed with a stiff smile. "Honour. Just the word I was thinking of."

The Callowan general hid her rising horror with the practiced skill of someone who'd been forced to be around the Queen of Callow and pretend not to be terrified the whole time. All right, so the damned Levant magic beasts didn't die to fire and that probably meant they wouldn't give a damn about siege engines either. Munitions, maybe? Couldn't really do that without using sending sappers in, which seemed ill-advised, but it was only the First Army that had the 'spitters', those strange devices Sapper-General Pickler used to lob munitions over long distances. Goblinfire was a restricted substance as of last year, though, so Abigail would need authorization from the Hellhound to send for any and that'd be suspicious as all Hells since Krolem had just been there. Options, she needed options.

"Where's our Senior Sapper?" she asked Krolem.

"She's checking in on our engines," the tribune gravelled. "Though she asked me to pass her continued protest as to the amount of munitions we passed on to Special Tribune Robber."

"Why?" Abigail said, feeling another spike of fear.

"His cohort isn't part of the Third Army, it's detached," the orc said.

"Why did we pass munitions to Special Tribune Robber?" she clarified.

"You don't need to test me, ma'am," Krolem reproached. "Your signature was on the forms, the general staff is aware you planned some contingencies – just not what they are."

Oh Gods, Abigail thought, realizing that the Black Queen's favourite goblin assassin had forged her authorization for something involving munitions and she had absolutely no idea what. O Gods, Abigail silently repeated, turning to prayer in her hour of need, I know I'm in the service of a villain but isn't this still a little much?

Razin Tanja crouched down to the side of the pit.

He'd return to the front of the formation soon enough, but for now he... Well, he wasn't sure exactly what it was he was doing. There was something about this situation that felt like a stone in his boot. The Third Army had defended Sarcella with dogged viciousness, making the Dominion pay in blood for every street. They had done so even after being taken by surprise in the middle of the night after the assassination of their commanders, which while Razin still thought little of Callowan heresy had nonetheless impressed him in regard to that people's discipline. Now that same army was facing them from a tall palisade after having days and night to prepare, and all they had prepare was a few pits with stakes at the bottom? No, he could not believe that. Certainly the fighting would harden the closer they came to the rampart, but this was too little.

It was not a complicated trap to build, Razin decided as he studied it. A stake at the bottom, the slopes inclined so anyone falling would be led towards it. Some sort of thin weave had been used to keep the hole covered, but it'd been crumpled by the claws of a bound wyvern and the weave had fallen below. That part was the most cleverly made, the heir to Malaga mused, for the weave had made the grounds look perfectly untouched until it was touched. Now the rings of shield-bearers escorting the binders were going around the revealed traps, advance slow but steady. The two sworn swords behind him were shuffling impatiently, but Razin refused to be hurried. He rose just enough to move, circling around the rim of the hole, and wrestled down the embarrassment he was starting to feel. It was a simple pit trap, and he might be making a fool of himself by insisting on taking so long a look at one.

The man's fingers clenched. No. He would not bend so easily as that. Pride had already led him down a dead end once. If a little humiliation let him make certain there was no deeper trap then he'd suffer the bite and do so unflinchingly. The sun shining from behind him – the afternoon at his back warmed him even in his armour – gave him half a breath's worth of warning, and that meant he survived the first blow. Coming out in a spray snow and earth from a hidden nook within the pit, a howling goblin tossed something at Razin's sworn swords while leaping up with a knife bared. The heir to Malaga caught the blade with his shield even as he tumbled backwards, the wildly cackling creature continuing to stab away as it landed on him. There was a loud crack behind them and something wet landed on Razin's cheek. The yellow-eyed monster bared needle-like teeth and slid the knife between two armour plates, but the Levantine socked it in the mouth with an armoured fist. Wincing at the shallow wound, Razin Tanja rose even as the goblin spat out blood and laughed, reaching for something in its leather satchel.

It never got to finish the movement, for the heir to Malaga rammed the hunting knife he'd adroitly palmed through its left eye.

Back on his feet a heartbeat later, Razin grimaced when he saw the bloody mess the thrown munition had made of his two escorts from the shoulders up. Blood and bone and brain fluid stained the snow around the two corpses. Gaze turning to the rest of his command, he heard the crack of further munitions and grimly admitted to himself the Third Army of Callow had once more succeeded as springing an ambush on him.

Special Tribune Robber assessed the situation with a proud stare.

Sure, they'd been forced to come out early when one of his minions had revealed their presence before the enemy was fully past their force. On the other hand, even springing this too soon they'd gotten a full two dozen of those Dominion sorcerers. Dipping low, Robber leaned forward a bit to better slit the throat of the blinded warrior he'd caught with his brightstick. Popping out of the holes and hitting fast with munitions, his cohort had done a lot damage in the span of thirty heartbeats. But not, he mused, enough to secure a comfortable retreat. The strange spirits the Dominion mages had sent ahead to continue ripping up traps were hurrying back, and between those and the warriors recovering from the surprise two hundred goblins all spread out had no real chance of fighting their way out. He whistled, loud and clear, three times. Scatter, it meant. Smothering a grin, the Special Tribune began the run back to the tender embrace of the palisade held by the Third Army. A great day's work, if any of them survived.

Still a good day's work, if they didn't.

"They won't make it," Krolem said.

They most definitely would not, Abigail silently agreed. Already more than twenty goblins had been slain by warriors running them down, but those had been the few whose hiding place had been within the Levantine formation. The rest has scattered to the wings with that insolent goblin aplomb, not that it would save them. They were quick, Special Tribune Robber's sappers. Far quicker than humans on foot, especially on trickier terrain like snow. But they were not quicker than the enemy's creatures, not even close, and with more than seventy of those left there was no doubt about the outcome of the chase. The monsters were drawing back already, closing the gap with inevitable haste. Maybe ten would make it out alive, General Abigail guessed. If that.

"Brave man, Special Tribune Robber," her aide added, tone thick with respect.

Fuck, Abigail thought, with a fresh well of horror. The Black Queen's favourite goblin assassin was about to get himself killed, and the only parchment trail there would be of it bore her signature. Faked, sure, but who'd ever believe that? She was going to get blamed for this wasn't she? She was going to get blamed for this and some godsdamned buzzards were going to eat her liver. She needed to get at least that one goblin out alive. Striking with rituals again? No, wouldn't work. They'd gotten quite good at avoiding those, and there were too many beasts anyway. Slowing down less than ten at a time wouldn't get her anywhere. What did she have? Siege engines, which wouldn't do anything more than the rituals, legionaries and – oh, oh. Abigail might just survive this yet.

"Still got that writ, Krolem?" she nonchalantly asked. "Send them out now."

"Ah," the orc breathed out, looking at her with shining eyes. "I understand now, ma'am. You've played the Dominion like a fiddle."

"That is absolutely what I did," Abigail baldly lied.

Akil Tanja's fingers had begun clenching with the first explosion and had not loosened since. He had not anticipated that the goblins in the Black Queen's service would burrow like worms within their own traps, and neither had his son. Malaga had lost nearly thirty binders for that mistake, men and women whose powers had each taken decades and a fortune to forge. Dead, faster than it took to drink a cup of wine. Now the wretched creatures were fleeing, but they would be run down. If any of them was taken alive, he would have the damned creatures hung from his battle-standard after personally crushing their malevolent skulls. At least Razin had drawn the enemy's blood and asserted control swiftly, which should prevent his reputation from being tarred too much by this unpleasant turn.

"Movement by the enemy, my lord," one of his captains announced.

The Lord of Malaga followed the man's gaze and found the Army of Callow was opening the southern gate of the camp. Reinforcements to extricate the sappers? They would arrive too late. Akil rather hoped the enemy commander was fool enough to send legionaries forward. The spirits bound by his war-sorcerers could kill soldiers as easily as they could clear traps, and any legionary killed down on the plains was one that would not be fighting from atop the palisade. The wooden grate opened, and Akil Tanja's lips thinned at what he saw. Horsemen, the first of the column carrying a tall banner: a bronze bell with a jagged crack going through, set on black. Lord Akil had read of these: the Order of Broken Bells, the sole remaining knightly order of Callow.

"Call them back," the Lord of Malaga said. "Now. And hurry the skirmishers forward."

Two of his captains peeled off like he'd swung at them with hot iron, both bearing orders. From where he sat astride his horse, Akil was forced to watch it all unfold without being able to intervene. The Callowan knights thundered out of the fortified camp without missing a stride, forming up as they advanced. There must have been at least a thousand, Akil saw with rising dread.

The skirmishers were on foot, the binders and their escort too far ahead. They would not arrive soon enough. The only hope of the binders – of his son – was that the bound spirits would slow the enemy knights long enough for a retreat. Razin must have understood the point as keenly, for the bound creatures abandoned pursuit of the goblins within moments and turned sharply to the side. Facing them, the knights of the Broken Bells slowly lowered their lances and quickened from canter to full gallop. The sight of it, Akil thought, was moving. Callowan knights in their prayer-carved armours, charging a host of beasts. The Lord of Malaga tensed for the impact, eyes fixed on the lances.

He flinched in disbelief, when the knights rode through the spirits like they were mist.

Sorcery sliding off their armour like water off a duck's back, the Knights of the Broken Bells broke through and kept charging.

There was something deeply satisfying, Abigail mused, about watching Callowan knights trample enemy foot. It scratched an itch she hadn't known she had. The enemy mages tried other sorceries, after their nasty little trick failed, but flames and curses were nothing new to the cavalry of Kingdom of Callow. Compared to the Praesi, she thought, these Dominion folk were fumbling amateurs. The commander of the Order's detachment had split his horse into two wedges of five hundred and rammed them straight at the enemy shield walls, shattering men and shields alike. The knights had then withdrawn in good order, after the initial momentum of the charge was spent, and formed up as they turned the enemy flank and simply charged again. The Dominion had sent two thousand foot to escort its sorcerers, but by the time General Abigail sounded the retreat for her cavalry more than half that number was lying dead on the ground. It might have been more, if enemy reinforcements hadn't hurried. Where sorcery would fail javelins might just succeed, so reluctantly she'd pulled back the Order. Abigail was leaning against the top of the palisade with her elbows and watching the cavalry retreat in good order when she heard her tribune return.

"Special Tribune and his cohort have been settled, ma'am," Krolem said.

She nodded absent-mindedly. The goblin she'd needed to keep alive as alive, beyond that they were hardly her concern.

"It's about to get ugly, Tribune," she said, gazing at the massing enemy.

The skirmishers remained spread out, but the foot behind them was now locked in thick formations. They were getting ready for a run at the palisade.

"Ma'am?" the orc said.

"Get the engines aimed," Abigail of Summerholm grimly said. "They have a path to us mostly cleared, now they're going to take it."

Lord Yannu Marave patted his horse's mane, and fondly held out his palm to feed her the last piece of bread from the loaf when she turned. He'd been told of the debacle to the south by the outriders he'd left to keep an eye on the situation, and it had darkened his mood. A few hundred warriors were a drop in the sea of what would be lost before this was all done and over with, but binders were a rare breed. They might have been of great use in the war to the north, had the Lord of Malaga's blunder not effectively pissed away half of them. Yet there was no point in losing his temper, he knew. This was merely the first movement of an intricate dance, and his side had never been meant to win it. In the distance he watched the skirmishes of Vaccei and their Lantern guides make it to the edge of the slaughter yard, and only then raised a hand. One of the lesser horns was sounded, and the warriors came to halt. As well they should – any further and they would be in what he suspected to be the outer range of the enemy's engines. In truth he should probably should have let them continue advancing until that suspicion was confirmed, but in the end he would rather overestimate enemy range than throw away lives on such a petty confirmation.

He had what he needed of this northern front and if any of Akil Tanja's captains had eyes they would have what he needed of that front as well.

"I would have your judgement, Peregrine," he calmly requested.

The Grey Pilgrim did not answer immediately. Instead the holy man gazed at the distant ring of raised stones, that incongruous crown atop a tall barrow.

"She will not step in even if the palisade is assaulted," the Pilgrim finally said. "Perhaps not even if the camp is breached, as you had arranged."

And so, Yannu knew, this meant the Peregrine would not intervene either. It had been made clear to the Lord of Alava what the consequences of the Grey Pilgrim acting first might be, and he would not have such disaster brought upon them all.

"Then the offensive I had planned is doomed to failure," Yannu of the Champion's Blood said, unruffled. "And we must resort to the second string to our bow."

A shame. He'd enjoyed the cleverness of the scheme, the use of the Saint and the Sorcerer to take the cavalries through crumbling Arcadia and strike at the heart of the enemy camp while assault on the palisades tied down most of their troops. Yet one must now grow too fond of plans, lest they be followed even when they no longer suited. As was the case here, to his understanding. Neither the Grand Alliance nor the Black Queen wanted to risk the heavy casualties of a committed duel to death, which meant every manoeuvre on this field was in fact was a jostling for position in some greater game. One where the victor could twist the arm of the defeated without having sown too great a field of corpses first. It was Yannu Marave's duty to help the Peregrine triumph in this struggle, nothing less or more.

"Sound the retreat for all hands," the Lord of Alava ordered his horn-bearer.

The Peregrine looked at him strangely, as if the holy man was watching someone both a stranger and an old friend. It might truly be so, Yannu thought, if the old stories about his distant kin Lady Sintra were more than merely that.

"You will be challenged over this," the Pilgrim said.

"I have been challenged before," Yannu Marave said, neither boastful nor wary.

He might have to kill Akil Tanja, the Lord of Alava mused, or at least the man's champion. The Lord of Malaga had taken enough losses today anger might lead him to such a blunder. Perhaps even a second champion would need killing, when he told the others that they would resume the attack during the night now that the safe paths to the palisade had been cleared. Ah well, these things happened. Nothing for it but swinging the blade.

Victory was born of blood, and only ever earned through it: this Yannu Marave knew true as any other child of Levant.

God damn cynical Abigail is an absolute delight.

Jeffery Wells

She had quickly become my favorite tertiary character, by far.

I love that she keeps blundering into success, no matter how hard she tries to fail. She'll be the second Marshall of Callow soon enough at the rate she's going.

Javvies

Foiled again, Abigail. You aren't going to get yourself demoted/discharged. Might get promoted again.

Heh. Plan B is attacking at night. That's going to backfire on them.

sengachi

Plan B is going to be an unmitigated slaughter.

Andrew Mitchell

It certainly __could__ be, but Cat wants to make sure the Alliance is mostly intact. Was it maximum of 15% casualties she said during her planning session with Robber?

konstantinvoncarstein

It was 20%, and they will lose this percentage in 30 seconds maximum, 😊

Liliet

That's if drow aren't given specific orders to keep everyone alive and just tie them up or something though

konstantinvoncarstein

Maybe, but the coalition will certainly bleed a lot

Liliet

hopefully in injured more than dead :3

caoimhinh

Yep, and considering that 20% of the GA army is over 24 thousand people, even if the casualties don't reach half of that number, it would still be a huge slaughter numbering in the thousands.

The only thing she needs to go full Tanya Degurechaff are some war crimes (suggested if not committed).

Henry

I will have you know that major degurechaff Never violated any of the international laws of war. Cease with your blatant lies against our glorious empire

Michael Sanders

Not a warcrime the first time!

AVR

Abigail so obviously has a story on her side. I wonder if Cat figured that out?

caoimhinh

It seems Cat hasn't figured it out yet. As far as we have seen, Cat only sees her as "the first truly Callowan General in the Army of Callow" so she wants to train Abigail so she can be skilled enough to maintain the position. And given that Abigail's success looked like quick-wit and improvisation in the face of danger before, and in this chapter it looked like deep planning and cunning anticipation of enemy movements, it won't stand out as a story yet.

I think it will take a bit more before Cat notices it, and it will be quite a shock for her when she realizes Abigail is following Catherine's own groove in the workings of Fate.

Amadeus would probably quickly figure it out when he wakes up, though.

antoninjohn

A night attack when the other side has Drowning, what could possibly go wrong

antoninjohn

Drow not Drowning, stupid autocorrect

SpacyRicochet

To be fair, for all they know Cath still has plenty of Drowning to go around.

M0och

Yet another interesting application of lakeomancy!

danh3107

Death by cackling goblin is a hell of a way to go...

Also Yannu is deeply, deeply, deeply underestimating the two brightest military minds on Calerina.

ATRDCI

And deeply underestimating how familiar the drow are with victory born and earned in blood

Skraeling

When all your magic fails in comparison to a big man on a big horse holding a big bloody stick.

sengachi

Admittedly, a big man on a big horse backed up by the best anti-sorcery miracles a thousand years of grinding attrition against the greatest empire of casters on Calernia can produce, but eh, semantics.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Mostly he's underestimating the Drow. It seems they still haven't figured out how the Drow work.

RoflCat

To be fair, the only Drow they know of are the exiled ones, like Ivah initially.

They've yet to ever face the Firstborns, and while I think the Pilgrim knows what the crows are, he might not be aware that the relation between Cath and Sve Noc is....unusual.

"Try a foot"

Liliet

The relationship being unusual is utterly irrelevant here.

The drow are like... like if Levantine forces were actually secretly all Lanterns if engaged exactly at dawn. You wouldn't GUESS it from knowing about the existence of Lanterns, or absolutely any data on their Named.

konstantinvoncarstein

They never fight them at night, but Pilgrim saw Rumena

Liliet

When you see a borderline-Named super powerful priest who also happens to be the general of the force, you don't just jump from there to the assumption that the entire force is secretly also priests.

The drow are pretty fucking out there by Calernian measures.

Insanenoodlyguy

Plus Rumena was fighting during day and pilgrim packed Devine hint system for once. He can assume sensibly that cat brought up a drow heavy hitter, and that theres gonna be a few more drow with that same kind of mojo in her army. He has no reason yet to believe he and the rest get spinach when the sun goes down.

konstantinvoncarstein

The confrontation happened at night, by you are correct for the rest 😬

Liliet

Yeah.

konstantinvoncarstein

*but

Gunslinger

Rumena should have made the drow's strength clear but they might be thinking he must be a drow Named.

Javvies

Well, Rumena was clearly carefully selected by Cat to be a hidden contingency, so it is a safe bet that they were chosen for their skill and power.

Plus, all other known encounters with the drow in recent times? They've been the exiles even more devoid of Night than Ivah was. The mercenaries that even Akua could tell were unimpressive crap troops.

Sure, there were some drow with Cat when she extracted Third Army, but they were thought to be demons initially(not sure if that misconception has been corrected or not) and were fighting as skirmishers in broad daylight.

They do have legitimate cause to be fairly dismissive of the average Drow grunt.

They're hilariously wrong, probably, unless they got an infodump from a Choir or something else linked to Above, but they genuinely don't (or shouldn't) have the information to accurately assess the capabilities of and threat level of the drow.

Liliet

Yeah, I think we can assume they didn't get a Choir infodump here lmao.

Kissaten

Maybe he's just baiting her trump cards out. It seems like he's operating on yu-gi-oh logic of having a counter to a counter, so by taking out initial surprise of the drow in the dark in a controlled battle he aims to deny his enemy a surprise.

crysjal

That's assuming he's even aware that there is the potential for that. Pilgrim might not have given him enough information to make that kind of assumption.

Cicero

Now now Abigail, you were not completely surprised by your success. You did suspect that the Broken Bells holy runes would negate or lessen the effectiveness of the binders familiars.

Even if this wasn't planned, you had good instincts and exploited the opportunities you got. Luck is a horse to ride like any other, and just like any horse, riding it does require skill.

jalexanderb

My gods, she's fallen into the Role of a comedy protagonist.

Aotrs Commander

Fast forward, like, twenty years, and we see a confused and quietly terrified Supreme God-Empress Abigail sitting on the Combined Throne of Calernia, Above And Below wondering where the FUCK she went wrong...

DD

Abigail Cain, Hero of the Imperium!
What does Krolem smell like?

Mental Mouse

Or rather, "where did [she] go right?" Ever see the play The Producers?? The title characters are lamenting the success of their play, which was supposed to be a tax dodge or suchlike.

Yeah. The only thing that could backfire with using the knights as a go-to anti-sorcery measure would be lord Tanja leaving the priests with the mine-trawling group, but that would be:

- a) excessive, considering thae different manner of clearing the traps and possible interaction of sorcery and miracles;
- b) putting too many eggs in one basket, which even Razin was wary of;
- c) a bad move overall, considering that nothing was stopping Abigail from ordering another ritual.

Liliet

Knights were p much designed to be a go-to anti-sorcery measure, and Levantines have never needed an anti-knight measure before. It took Amadeus&Grem for Praes to come up with anti-knight measures with centuries of history behind their backs, I don't think Levantines can figure out a counter easily 😊

The real issue here is that Cat really doesn't want a war of attrition...

shieldredblog

They don't really need a counter to the knights, they can just match them with heavy horse of their own, they've done it before. As long as they can keep the knights away from the binders, it's all good.

Traditionally in their fights vs Praes, they were so devastating because Praes had no real cavalry. They depended on massed foot and sorcerers.

Liliet

Makes sense.

Liliet

I think Abigail did know about the anti-sorcery plate, yeah. She just didn't quite have a full plate in mind beyond "oh boi I could sure use some knights here"

Liliet

* full plan, geez

Naeddyr

A Ciaphas Cain will never admit to themselves they're competent. That would only invite destruction!

Alivaril

Waiting to attack until after nightfall, eh? Brilliant move. Nothing could possibly go wrong. I'm sure there will only be minimal casualties taken during the assault.

RandomFan

I completely agree. There will only be minimal casualties during the assault. Everyone else will be captured while still alive.

Liliet

^^^

XD

Sugar Roll

Well to be fair, they don't know much about the Drow. It's high time the Drow shows everyone what they're made of.

Someguy

Ah, the Levantines are a society of Blood Mages with less sense and competence than Praesi Blood Mages.

Yavandir

Most of their incompetence worked as well as Abigail's plans thanks to the guys above.

Cap'n Smurfy

I think this chapter can be best summarized as Abigail tripping over her own feet and accidentally performing a triple front flip, making it look like she meant to do that.

Hilariously blundering her way through her problems and somehow coming out looking the better for it really sums up her story.

Insanenoodlyguy

It is a little known fact that the Name "Peerless Tactitican" does not exist. Oh, it is a name that has come up a few times, but the bearer knows the real name is "The Serendipitous". To allow the truth of the name to be revealed is to lose its potency, often at cost, though holders are tempted as their victories magnitudes and thus the threats they face inevitably escalate.

Andrew Mitchell

This is now my head canon.

Raved Thrad

In a weird way, doesn't this mirror exactly how Catherine learned how to wage war? "Huh? That actually worked. I must remember that."

taliesinskye

"Release the goat!" comes to mind. XD

Liliet

I would say it's a little more than blundering.

Abigail looked at the field full of magical summons and thought "this is what knights are for, my effectiveness is at like 10% of maximum if I don't have knights".

So she sends for knights, despite not having a detailed plan for what to do with them in mind. Her logic is just that she can do nothing without knights, ergo, sending for the knights is the right thing to do.

Then the knights actually come and she starts panicking because she's not used to the idea that improvising is a valid approach to the situation and think she was "supposed" to already have a full plan in mind.

Then she improvises successfully, because actually she's genuinely good at intuitively assessing what resources she needs to handle the situation and then coming up with solutions on the fly once she has the toolbox.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm not sure what happened. Why did the calvary no-sell the binders constructs?

Insanenoodlyguy

To clarify, I know their armor is enchanted, but it worked exceptionally well here. Is binding considered an evil magic?

Yavandir

They literally bind the souls of the beasts they hunt... Of course binding doesn't have anything to do with necromancy they are the good ones after all.

Insanenoodlyguy

So Abigail was right and thus looks exceptionally brilliant for realizing the priest blessed armor would be an excellent counter. She was even heard mumbling about it before her brilliant execution! That's good.

sengachi

Ohohoho, I hadn't even noticed that. Oh she's dug herself in deep with this one hasn't she?

Insanenoodlyguy

Krolem later to his fellows (I figure from what we know, orcs LIKE Abigail, shes drinks fae blood in the middle of a fight. Nice to know one of the humans gets it.)

"So I'm thinking it looks pretty bad, then she mumbles something about the priests on our side. I don't get it, but she rushes me off to the hellhound to ask for some knights. Hellhound figures it out faster then me and I'm sent off to get the writ. I come back and she asks if I've got the plan figured out, cant say I did yet. Then the sappers trap was sprung! I'm thinking this is it, but it would be a good death for them, yeah?But that's when she let's loose the trap within the trap within the trap! I finally get that why she was mentioning the priests when those knights ride out and go through those monsters like fog! I tell you, the look on her face would belong on an orc if she just had better teeth."

Sparsebeard

Hell, she even predicted that sending Robber would lure the enemy in for the blow...

What a genius!

Cap'n Smurfy

Binding the spirits of defeated beasts to oneself to use in battle seems more like a morally grey area, especially compared to the outright evil magical zombie army of Praesi

Necromancy. The prayers on Knights armours are designed to turn away sorcery in general however. Morally grey spirits with bodies literally made of sorcery? May as well be paper in front of a good holy charge.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm not complaining about this, since it has been pointed out to me that miracle reinforcement would work especially well on what is essentially necromancy, but I would have thought it'd provide less benefit since they are still constructed from physical materials. But, it's still all held together by blood magic, so there you are.

Someguy

It's blood based (tattoos) necromancy (spirits) no matter what the Levantines re-label it as, so the knights were Super Effective.

Javvies

The Callowan Knightly Order armor is more than just protection from evil/dark magic, it protects from all, or at least most, magic in general (fireballs, even if the mage is evil, aren't exactly necromancy).

werafdsaew

Outside of Diabolism, there's no inherently evil sorcery—things are evil or not according to their cultural context. This even includes necromancy, as Daoine's ancestral worship is a form of it.

Someguy

Daoine is less Ancestor worship and more Ancestral/National sacrifice to fulfill their goal of Revanchism against the Elves of the Golden Bloom.

konstantinvoncarstein

The constructs were creatures entirely animated by magic, it is probably why they just go through them.

Liliet

I don't think this qualifies as 'exceptionally well'. It's good old regular well, the minimum necessary to deal with Praesi successfully. It's just that the Levantines did not expect it, and that they aren't friggin Praes. Praesi mages are best on the continent and have been engaged in an offense/defense arms race with Callowans for centuries while Levantines were perfecting beast killing tactics. Sabah got surprised by Champion; binders are getting surprised by Callowan fucking knights.

Andrew Mitchell

Still gutted about Sabah. 😞

Liliet

Well written character death 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Sure was.

Fayhem

Seriously. I mostly liked Champion and trying to kill each other is kind of the point of war, but when I read that bit about her cloak in the later chapters I saw fucking red.

Liliet

I think that's just Sabah's cloak she took, nowadays, judging from Hanno's non-reaction.

MagnaMalusLupus

Hanno explicitly said that she was more savage and prone to taking trophies. Then there's this bit:
>"She was not wearing, for once, the wolf fur cloak she'd claimed from someone that was no wolf at all." - Interlude: Red the Flowers

That's not Captain's cloak.

Andrew Mitchell

For sure.

Liliet

Yathink?

Hanno referred as 'savage' to cutting off sword points.

And Captain was referred to as wearing a fur cloak at lest once.

Qwormuli

I don't think, that Sabah wore a rawhide pelt made from a large wolf, sadly.

Liliet

Where's the "rawhide pelt" part from?

byzantine279

They tried using necromancy against Knights of Callow, who have been fighting the wasteland for centuries. Of course it failed spectacularly.

Ein

"...when he told the others that they would resume the attack during the night now that the safe paths to the palisade had been cleared. "

Ohhh Yannu, you just done goofed.

medailyfun

I wonder what was the logic behind this decision? He should know goblins and possibly orcs can see in the darkness, plus all the dark magic prefers the night time.

Liliet

"All the dark magic prefers the night time" – factually incorrect in this setting, Praesi necromancers don't give a fuck. Drow are the only ones getting powered up by the Night, and they haven't been in a single nighttime engagement on the surface yet.

Goblins are a good point, but they're a minority of the forces. If the Levantines have a reason to assume their own forces aren't going to be hindered by the dark, then without knowing about drow specifically it's a pure win: some of the opponent's forces, while not all of them, are going to be incapacitated.

The drow are just... a lethal joke.

caoimhinh

He probably wants to take a short rest before pressing on with the attack, taking advantage that the safe path to the palisade was found. Yannu reasoned that he has to use it before the Army of Callow puts more traps during the night, so he attacks at night.

His reasoning is sound and valid with the info he has, but none in that Alliance joined force has experience fighting Praes, barely a few have experience fighting Cat's Army, and none can even imagine what the Drow can do during nighttime. Of course, we know that Yannu is screwed and thousands of soldiers will die at night (the limit line set by Cat is 1/5 of their army, but that's still over 20 thousand).

Personally, I think he should be aware that Goblins have night vision and are the ones who are pointing the siege engines, catapults, scorpions and ballistae, but then again this guy might just let a few hundred of his soldiers die to take the palisade.

Clint

I think the plan is like what they did earlier in the same campaign – use their numerical advantage to keep the other side from sleeping. (Or am I thinking of the Arcadian campaign?)

If they hit the Callowans at night, raiding with a small fraction of their troops, possibly through Arcadia, they can keep the whole Callowan force from getting any sleep. Then tomorrow, when rest of their force wakes up from a good night's sleep, they attack the exhausted Callowans.

Of course, I'd imagine that the drow will be quite a surprise – and in the morning, Cat will be offering to trade a few thousand prisoners, including a few named, for Black's soul.

Between Holy knights riding down the Crusade's necromancers, begging for peace again, and trying to trade prisoners for the extracted soul of her mentor/father-figure, Cat's building a really nice story line – can you just see Grey Pilgrim's face when she tries to build a redemption story line against him?

Fayhem

> Ohhh Yannu, you just done goofed.

This is one I've been seeing a lot, and at least at this point in scrolling down the comments page nobody's made what I think is the relevant point here. Which is:

It's probably true that this won't ultimately work out for Yannu, but a night attack would be sacrificing a lot of advantages for no apparent gain even with only what they would actually know. They don't have anything we've seen or know about that gets better at night, and it's already widely known that goblins can see in the dark and it would hardly be an unreasonable inference that the drow skirmishers who proved themselves useful in Sarcella have nightvision even if you haven't figured anything else out about them (seriously, they're from a place called the Everdark). Shifting the engagement from day to night is already apparent as a straight loss based on what we know of the Levantines' capabilities and what we can infer they likely know of the eastern coalition's capabilities. Since this is Careful (AKA Cold-Bloodedly Competent) Yannu we're talking about and not Blundering Dipshit Yannu, that means he's got something planned that we don't know about, probably based on a capability we don't know about. And you know the narrative rule about plans that are revealed in advance vs. plans that aren't, right?

Tl;dr – I think drow Night powers + Cat's scheming means that the forces of FUN Cat (FUN = First Under Night ofc) will come out on top, but it will be a closer thing than it looks like it will be to us right now.

Liliet

I mean I'm definitely assuming that they've got some trick to attacking at night that will negate the obvious disadvantages – that they will be able to see at the very least – I just think it won't come anywhere close to seriously challenging the drow, simply because they don't know what the drow can do yet.

And the obvious counter, Cat's got a counter for.

Yavandir

Yet another successful scheme of brilliant general Abigail

konstantinvoncarstein

Oh, my poor summer child... Requiescat in pace

Jworks

I cannot wait to see the drow obliterate them at night.

JJR

As much fun as that would be, they do have to be at least a little bit gentle with the alliance army. Remember, no more than 1/5 (I think it was) can be allowed to die so they can still fight the Dead King.

Makes me wonder if Abigail's accidental brilliance was maybe not actually a good thing in the long run. Those dead Binders would have been great up north. Not that there were any other options.

Oshi

pROBABLY NOT AS MUCH AS YOU THINK. I KINDA DON'T WANT TO KNOW WHAT THE DEAD KING WOULD DO TO BOUND NECROMANTIC SPIRITS..

Oshi

Fuck me caps lock

JJR

No, caps lock is exactly the right tone for that thought.

=P

sengachi

Yeah horrified shrieking is exactly the right response to the idea of using spirits against the Dead King.

caoimhinh

1/5 of that army is still over 20 thousand soldiers, they will be under the red line even after the massive casualties they are undoubtedly going to get during the night.

Sparsebeard

Well, they can still injure or capture them.

I wonder if the heroes will keep their cool when the fully rested up Mighties start their rampage. After all, the strongest ones might be in the same category as Pilgrim and Saint... Which is pretty reasonable since they've been consuming the talents of their foes for hundreds of years or more... Heck, I'm not even sure if the old drows will even have to take the field unless the heroes show up too...

P

I would like to bring up the fact that wounded outnumbered dead by a 2:1 ratio in WW2, and during the Napoleonic era wounded outnumbered dead 5:1. 15% dead means another 30-75% wounded, who will presumably be healed by incredibly overworked clerics for weeks after the battle. Having up to 90% of your force be rendered incapable of marching under their own power is pretty much the definition of a slaughter.

Aotrs Commander

Also worth noting that 50% or more casualties (which, as noted, is not 50% fatalities), for that matter, of an army, is sufficiently rare as to be occasions of notable historical catastrophic defeats (Cannae – Hannibal's famous victory over the Romans) or slaughters (e.g the Somme.)

Jarthon

There is an excellent quote at the top of one of the Chapters (possibly in book 3) that goes something along the lines of "anyone who thinks that genocide is an acceptable military strategy for defeating an enemy needs to be removed from command immediately." That of course doesn't capture the eloquent humor of the actual quote, but it gets the point across. Winning a battle or war by means of total elimination just isn't feasible. Even the NAZI's ran into this problem with killing huge numbers of people and those were unarmed and broken captives for the most part. Twenty percent casualties will absolutely cripple an army for potentially months since they will be unable to move anywhere and will have lost primarily frontline fighters (since, you know, people on the front lines tend to die more than the noncombatants that need to accompany an army).

byzantine279

Frankly I get the feeling the Dead King can usurp control over those spirits with a snap of his fingers. It's very obviously necromancy they renamed to shake off the "Evil" vibe.

James Ware

While Abigail fumbling her way through being a general is certainly entertaining, it reads so much like Cat's same fumbling in books 1 and 2. It's been done, and it's lost its novelty value to me.

caoimhinh

Emm... that was kinda the point, you know? Abigail has a lot of similarities with Cat, they increase with every chapter and it's purposely done that way. Also, Abby is luckier than Cat, because Catherine was a Named villain that had to use cleverness to beat the odds, yet Abigail is a Callow girl that can be blessed by Providence and good luck.

ChillyPepper

Reminds me of the visions Cat had while kneeling in front of Diabolist, where she was aiming for a general- albeit not so willingly in this case.

Pilberyy Toeby

Attacking the drow at night? Yes nothing can go wrong there.

werafdsaew

Oh come on, I would be so disappointed if Cat's army basically won due to enemy foolishness.

IDKWhoitis

Well they dont know about the Drow, or the rules regarding their deployment. Most of Callowan army is human at this point, so while there is an advantage, it's not overwhelmingly so.

The alliance is trying to wear down their endurance and munitions, the safest way possible, through expending time. The Lev commander knows about the MetaGame, so he's not trying to win exactly, he just wants a stronger position in the long run, which sees Callow only weaken overtime gradually as both space is lost, traps expended, and even missiles are fired.

Liliet

It's not enemy foolishness, it's a hidden knife.

RanVor

It's the enemy foolishly assuming there's no hidden knife.

Javvies

To be fair, they might well have some sort of plan that they think will work.

On the other hand, it's entirely likely, probable even, that they are badly misjudging the capabilities and threat level of the drow. However, they have entirely legitimate grounds to be dismissive of the average drow and utterly clueless as to their actual capabilities.

Liliet

I mean the enemy's probably assuming there's some kind of hidden knife, they just have no reason to guess specifically that it's a nighttime powerup. AFAIK there's no precedent for that kind of ability on Calernia.

Mental Mouse

If anything, they might be thinking their own binders are scarier at night. Me, I think they're likely to find themselves facing Night-materialized manticores and such. In fact, the Twins could pick up quite a little menagerie of subject spirits for later use.

Miles

Well she can't actually win this so there's that.

Mental Mouse

Sure she can. If she can score a solid win or loss against the Pilgrim, she breaks his Pattern of Three, but as far as the overall fight, she's limited only by her objectives.

ALazyMonster

Well attacking at night... they're dead men. I am currently expecting the Tyrant to appear when plan number 3 comes from the alliance since plan B is going to die screaming. It should be interesting to see the mess he makes.

I like how Abigail and Cat both have a habit of only speaking the last part of their internal monologues. It's really funny.

IDKWhoitis

I imagine either Cat and Saint are having one hell of a duel in Arcadia right now, or Cat and Tyrant are haggling terms.

Either scenario, I believe Tyrant will "Betray" Cat.

Mental Mouse

"General?" "Never mind, I'm just foreshadowing". 😊 But yeah, where Cat uses skill, planning, and bloody-mindedness, Abigail has a mischievous Providence. Some planning too, because Cat has been training her, but the way her impulses just happen to be "the right thing"... yeah, it's nice when one of your Generals is favored by the Gods Above, especially when the rest of your folks aren't much.

fbt

1) i still love abigail soooo much
2) wait..was there anyone else in the chapter?...erm.. :p more seriously, kudos to robber for schemeing when the generals didn't (afawk).
and it's Abigail's deadpan manner and inner dialog that i love so much. Plus, her sections are always beautifully clearly written. honestly, the vague flowerly language used in the narratives from the pov of some of the enemy is pretty opaque and unrewarding to me, idk about anyone else. Still, btwn Cat and Abby and Black I loooove this story!

Andrew Mitchell

I really hope we get to know the details about Robbers plan. Who's idea was it? And who (if anyone) helped to execute it? We know Robber's hand-writing is poor so my guess is that Hakram helped.

medailyfun

Maybe Robber's writing is poor, but why the tanner's daughter should be better?

Andrew Mitchell

Great question!

I was assuming that with poor handwriting it would be difficult to copy a signature. But maybe it would be easy if it was so badly written.

crysja1

Or maybe him having poor handwriting is exactly what he wants you to think...

taovkool

So Abigail is pretty much the Ciaphas Cain of this series.

Good to know.

Novice

So, will she have her own Amberley Vail (probably gender-bent)?

caoimhinh

She will quest for him, that much is certain. I remember Abigail said she would only give silver in the House of Light if she "got her hooks on a pretty boy who was supernaturally flexible in bed".

Gunslinger

Krolems eventual memoir of Queen Abigail would be the thing to read.

Insanenoodlyguy

I am not super great with the comparison, only because Cain, in his own words, is a bumbling coward (there's a lot of facts to debate he's wrong, but he'd say that about himself). Some of his greatest victories were achieved literally trying to run away and abandon the fight entirely.

Darkening

I mean, to be fair, a lot of his more heroic actions are done entirely because he believes he has to keep up appearances or get shot by his own men, and the line in this chapter about how the orcs might tear her apart if she seemed to be the weakest link in the army really has a similar tone to him, so I can see why people make the comparison. And really, if somebody offered her a comfy garrison position with no combat, I'm pretty sure she'd take it in a heartbeat to get away from all this.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Also crossover with Tanya from Youko Senji in her quest for a cushy position...

IDKWhoitis

I love how both sides were scared of each other and always assumed the other side knew what they were doing. But we see Abby pull off a Foundling Special, taking advantage of any unforeseen chaos and exploiting it into a brutal victory.

Trading 50ish special sappers and a handful of cavalry for a full thousand men and 50 binders.

Let's see if Abby picks up any more of Cat's bad habits...

sengachi

Honestly even if Robber's plan had gone as intended and he and his 300 had died taking some 30 binders with them, that still would have been a very good trade so far as raw numbers are concerned. The fact that Abigail leveraged that into more dead binders and one thousand dead infantry turned the whole thing from a bad exchange for Levant into a ruinous one.

sengachi

Robber is really trying not to make it to fifteen isn't he? Like really, really trying. 'Forged a signature so he could lead a suicide mission to sandwich himself between a group of enemy casters and enemy infantry and attack the enemies most capable of retaliating with extreme prejudice' trying to not make it to fifteen.

WuseMajor

Unfortunately for him, the Lesser Lesser Footrest is too good looking to die.

samshadar

I am starting to wonder if it is really death that is creeping up to him with "old age", or if something else happens... And he's trying to get himself killed before that comes to pass.

haihappen

me imagining Robber as 30-ish years old, playing with little goblins in the hills outside Marchfort, as he teaches them the ways of the Goblin, when a Middle Aged Cat walks up to him.

"One more time?" He asks hopefully

"One more time.", she confirms sadly.

The his slightly grayed eyes clear up, revealing pure malice.

"Finally!"

Andrew Mitchell

Hopefully EE's planning some extended Epilogue's for this series. This would fit right in.

Insanenoodlyguy

I honestly believe he's getting or has gotten a goblin name. We don't know about it because in a culture that works like this, a name is suspected but not proven. If you get a name, you in fact try to hide it as much as possible, openly presenting it would probably cause you to lose it immediately, or at least cripple it. If one or two people can prove it that just results in secret alliances, or blackmail, or the named turning around and doing the same to you or just killing you, which is all fine in goblin culture so that's okay. Robber, like Ranker before him, has one now or is getting one, and like any good goblin isn't saying shit.

Mental Mouse

Perhaps the "something else" is decaying sense of self-preservation....

medailyfun

I don't know why everybody is praising Abigail, it clearly was a set up Story, the workings of Special Tribune Robber pulling the strings of the generals

Liliet

Was it Robber who thought to send for knights? No! 🤪

RanVor

Except Abigail was only able to deploy these knights thanks to a random request intended as a cover-up.

Cicero

Not completely random, she was obviously thinking that the cavalry might have particularly good effects against the sorcerers.

RanVor

She obviously wasn't thinking of that when she requested a detachment of thousand from Juniper.

Liliet

Don't put too much trust in the narration of a terrified person utterly convinced they were promoted past the limit of their competence while everyone else disagrees.

Abigail was thinking about plausible deniability and failing, yes. But it wasn't the only ingredient in the stew.

RanVor

I think I have made it abundantly clear what my opinion on your interpretation is.

Liliet

Do you think that Cat is wrong about Abigail, or that she's banking on providence?

Or that generally Abigail is competent, but just this one time it played no role at all?

RanVor

I wouldn't say it played no role at all. She did make the right decision when it mattered. It's just that she ended up in the position where she was able to make that decision purely by accident.

Liliet

I just don't see such a thing as 'pure accident' there. It was like 90% an accident, but the other 10% were due to her basic competence that she couldn't not have even when trying to fail.

RanVor

Expect the text says otherwise. She aimed to request something unreasonable enough to get dismissed, but not enough to get her executed for intentional obstruction of war effort. Judging by Juniper's initial reaction, she wasn't far off the mark.

Besides, 90% accident is still very, very far from intentional, which is a prerequisite for the outcome to be considered a product of competence. In other words, you're contradicting yourself.

Liliet

Okay, so it's unfair to call the outcome 'product of competence' even if competence was a part of it, because it's a small part.

Is that the core disagreement?

RanVor

Partly. The other part is that you're talking nonsense while being explicitly contradicted by both narration and characterization of Abigail.

Liliet

Ah, so you're just being rude then, gotcha.

RanVor

Yes, I'm being rude, because I'm sick of your bullshit. I couldn't call you out when we were discussing Pilgrim because it was a largely philosophical debate, but here you're arguing with hard facts

You're dismissing the fact that Abigail's core motivation is her desire to get demoted. To avoid responsibility. She focuses all her cleverness, competence and knowledge of the hierarchy and protocol of the Army of Callow on achieving this objective. But she also lives in fear of Catherine, who she imagines to be a murderous tyrant. She feels the need to preserve her life by not giving the Black Queen a reason to blame her for failure. The conflict between these two motivations limits her options to merely a handful. She constantly tries to walk the fine line between failing too much and not failing enough, and sometimes comes close to achieving her objective, but gets thwarted by factors she has no knowledge of (in this case, the relations within Cat's inner circle). All of this is in the text, so stop ascribing Abigail motivations she doesn't have.

Liliet

I am not?

RanVor

Now you're contradicting yourself. You claim Abigail requested knights because she judged them necessary for success, and yet you deny claiming that she wanted to succeed (which is patently false).

Liliet

Levels of abstraction.

"I need to give the impression that I want to succeed. If I was, what would I need for it?"

RanVor

No, it was more like

"I need to request something I won't be given, quickly. What could that be? A thousand knights should do the job."

And then

"Fuck, I should have requested ten thousand knights."

The Broken Bells are the most elite formation within the Army of Callow, and a detachment of thousand is a force that would normally be deployed only in dire circumstances. Abigail didn't overestimate the ridiculousness of her request, she underestimated the level of trust Juniper has in Catherine.

Liliet

We're quibbling over subconscious process, at this point. I'm asserting that there was one, non-narrated because Abigail didn't actually consciously think it. You're asserting the knights were chosen purely by accident, even though Abigail was at least motivated to look like she had a plan, for after the battle.

RanVor

The knights weren't chosen by accident. The knights were chosen because of probability of denial.

Also, that's your argument? If the text is contradicting you, the text is wrong? I think I need you to remind me why I'm wasting time on arguing with you.

Liliet

I am saying that I do not consider the text to contradict my version.

Also, I think there were other things Abigail could have chosen with high probability of denial, and she went for knights as the ideal balance of probability of denial and vaguely plausible as something she could use.

RanVor

Like what for example?

Liliet

Extra munitions, siege engines, sappers, drow.

RanVor

All of which, except Drow, have higher likelihood of being accepted than knights. And I highly doubt Drow would be the first thing to come to panicked Abigail's mind.

Sparsebeard

It's pretty clear that Abigail knew that knight where a good choice since she thought that it might hold some scrutiny under the Black Queen's investigation of the situation.

Still, it's much easier to say in hindsight that you had a plan involving knights, then to actually pull it off.

Liliet

Yeah.

caoimhinh

Lilliet, you are putting too much of your own imagination into the text and thus not only see things that aren't there, but you are also even contradicted by what the text explicitly says.

"We're quibbling over subconscious process, at this point. I'm asserting that there was one, non-narrated because Abigail didn't actually consciously think it."

So your argument is not only NOT on the text, but also on the unexplored subconscious of the character that you are making up in your mind? That's purely YOUR IMAGINATION, that's not a valid argument in any way. Besides, it's contradicted by what's directly on the text of the chapter. FanFic can never beat Canon.

From Abigail's POV: "She sent him off after a quick elaboration, fairly sure the Hellhound would refuse her request and so in the after-battle reports she'd have an excuse for her failure to perform"

From Juniper's POV: "The Marshal of Callow's instinct was to send him back with an order for General Abigail to make a proper proposal including for what she wanted the soldiers, but she held her tongue. Catherine had raised the other woman up for a reason"

Then again from Abigail's POV: "Shit, Abigail thought, looking at the writ Krolem had just handed her with a sinking feeling in her stomach. The Hellhound had actually agreed? Why would she – no, don't panic, she told herself. This could still be salvaged if she watched her step... she should have made her request more unreasonable, if she'd gone overboard the Marshal would have refused. But no, she'd just had to hedge her bets and make it look like her theoretical plan had been reasonable just to improve the chances the Black Queen wouldn't feed her liver to buzzards after this was all over with"

RanVor is right in this discussion, Abigail chose to request the deployment of one thousand Knights of the Order of Broken Bells because it was what she believed to be a request outrageous enough to be denied but not too outrageous that she would be treated like an idiot and killed (this is her panicked imagination, because the Army of Callow doesn't feed people to the buzzards nor kill their officers for failure, but most of the people, even the Callowans, think that Cat is a murder-happy tyrant that commands respect and obedience at all times and punish failure severely).

It was explicitly said by Abigail that she hoped the request would be denied, she only lamented afterward that she didn't make it even more unreasonable so that it would be denied, and we also know from Juniper's POV that the request was both unreasonable and improperly made, the only reason it was accepted was because Juniper believes in Catherine, so if any other General had asked for the same thing in the same way as Abigail did they would have been denied and their messenger yelled at.

Abigail was quick-witted enough that she deployed the knights to save Robber's cohort, this is true, but not the matter of this discussion. This victory is the work of Providence not because Abigail had somehow won miraculously, no, it's the work of Providence because the only reason the tools for her victory fell into her hands was because of luck (A.K.A causality, factors outside of her knowledge and control) and she had no plan until all the pieces fell into place together. To outsiders it will look as if it was all planned by Abigail (her signature in the permission to grant munitions to Robber's cohort, that cohort hidden ambush, the request for knights to counter the spirits bound by the Binders from Malaga) but we as readers have access to Abigail's thoughts, so we know for a fact that this is not the case.

Liliet

I am not saying she had a plan??? I am saying her basic competence was one of the bricks Providence used to build this victory.

Liliet

I don't think the request is random is the thing. She was like "I cannot do anything here without knights, if I'm not given them I'm not responsible for losing".

And then she was like "shit, I didn't actually have a specific plan for knights, I just wanted to have them, I didn't think further than that"

And then she saw a tactical objective that the knights were indeed perfectly suited for, and was proven correct in wanting them in the first place.

A broad toolbox rather than an overarching plan; we're having a discussion about maneuver warfare on discord right now and I'm learning a lot, and that's basically what happened here. Abigail moved in accordance to a higher level mojo than is commonly accepted in guideverse, and Juniper accidentally moved in accordance to it as well, and the result was a smashing success – just because nobody actually expected it to work out this way, doesn't mean it was an accident or somehow Robber's achievement.

RanVor

I have no idea where you got all of this from. It's very, very clear from the text that she requested knights specifically because she didn't expect to get them.

Liliet

Yes, but that doesn't mean she rolled the dice for what kind of unreasonable thing to request. She at the very least tried to make her theoretical plan sound reasonable.

>Gods, Abigail knew she should have made her request more unreasonable, if she'd gone overboard the Marshal would have refused. But no, she'd just to had hedge her bets and make it look like her theoretical plan had been reasonable just to improve the chances the Black Queen wouldn't feed her liver to buzzards after this was all over with.

Which means she thought a request for knights in this situation was reasonable. And oh look – she wasn't wrong, was she?

RanVor

Sorry, but your interpretation is 100% pure bullshit.

Novice

Harsh words when you've not given an appropriate counter-argument.

RanVor

My counter-argument is the text. It's not my fault that some people interpret it in ridiculous way.

Morgenstern

"she'd just to had hedge her bets and make it look like her theoretical plan had been reasonable"

"she'd [...] had [to] MAKE IT LOOK LIKE her theoretical plan had been REASONABLE"

Those are the very words the other two depend on for their interpretation and they are in the text. There is no fucking way you can make that go away and see her demand was ALL UN-reasonable, because it fucking had to at least LOOK just that – REASONABLE.

So there is actually quite enough text to at least form an assumption that she did have some subconscious process about what over-demanding request WOULD, on the surface, LOOK REASONABLE. Which means she can judge what COULD BE reasonable. Which was all the other people ever argued...?

I really don't get why you're being such a dick about your interpretation of the text, as you are, as far as I can see, BOTH just interpreting the text – as if yours were the only one possible. While outright ignoring that passage the others did post that is the base for their interpretation, instead attacking their character / intellect, whatever. All the while claiming this very ignorance about the other people taking a SLIGHTLY different side in this discussion. Which is only that she has SOME degree of competence, on TOP of her motivation overall being to get demoted, still favoring to get her head out of the sling by making at least SOMEWHAT tactically feasible decisions, BECAUSE SHE CAN; as far as I followed. o0

Really, sometimes I'm just confused about commentors on the internet. Does anonymity really always have to end up in un-logically heated emotionally-turned arguments about INTERPRETATIONS of a text that are well possible by the very text itself...? o0 Guess I'll never really get "normal" people... *rolls eyes

Morgenstern

Or in fewer words: Well, this escalated quickly... I guess I'll never understand why such escalation happens over and over again. o0 And about only SLIGHTLY different viewpoints. o0

Morgenstern

(And sorry for the swear words in there... reading the mood in those last postings just kinda got me switching into slang-humorous movie swear word use *ahem ... it was meant cynically, nothing much else.)

caoimhinh

LOL

caoimhinh

It was explicitly stated that this wasn't planned in any way.

-Robber's cohort was acting alone and in secret, having gotten munitions via faking Abigail's signature.

-The request of knights was entirely a fluke that Abigail expected to be denied, its purpose was to make it seem like she had tried to do something and due to being denied the knights she couldn't do it, thus avoiding responsibility for the failure.

-She actually got the knights, which neither Abigail nor Krolem expected, because Juniper reasoned "Cat chose this girl, so she might have something in mind, I'll trust my Warlord's instincts".

-Abby had no idea what to do with the knights, and lamented not having made an even more unreasonable request that would have been denied.

-Robber's cohort acted, creating a opportunity

-The 1000 knights were ready to be used, thanks to the purposeless request and the unexpected acceptance of that purposeless request.

This was the work of Providence. Abigail simply happened to gather the moving pieces thanks to luck and quick-thinking to take advantage of an opportunity.

Kissaten

Knights would have seen use even if Robber didn't have a trap set up. It's less of a providence and more of a rolling natural 20 where 2+ roll would be enough to keep the binders away.

Did Robber knew beforehand that he would attack specifically binders? No, his trap was set against any valid target, maybe targeting officers, but not specifically that one enemy's move. Knights are a generally good move against pretty much anything. Just like Robber's trap, they would do their job regardless of providence. Even if it was work of providence, she wouldn't be screwed if she was unlucky.

caoimhinh

But that's the thing: Abigail didn't expect to get the knights, and she even requested them improperly. The knights shouldn't have been granted, they only reason the request was accepted was that Juniper trusted Catherine's instincts and thus chose to believe the new General that Cat had elected had some plan for the Knights (and we know for a fact that Abigail actually didn't and was even hoping they would be denied so she could avoid responsibility for failure).

It's the work of Providence because the only reason the tools for her victory fell into her hands was because of luck (A.K.A causality, factors outside of her knowledge and control)

Liliet

Absolutely true wrt Robber.

Morgenstern

Thank you. Finally a reasonable ARGUMENTATION about that position instead of emotionally heated “you’re dumb” and “it’s not in the text (ignoring the other text)” non-arguments. oO

Even though you still seem to ignore that one point of text about making her request LOOK REASONABLE that the others draw their argumentation from... thus pointing out, in their view, that she knows just what MIGHT BE rather reasonable, after all.

caoimhinh

Thanks, I believe that one must defend one’s position with arguments and providing facts as much as possible with respect. That been said, RanVor is right in this, even if he lost his patience.

I actually did not ignore that bit of text, I simply used the other bits of text to counter the argument arising from the use of that fragment of the chapter. Also, that bit of text is actually AGAINST the view of Abigail having a plan or knowing what she is doing.

{On one hand, she’d actually be expected to produce results now. On the other hand, as long as she tried to pull off a vaguely coherent plan and failed she’d probably still manage to avoid the noose. Gods, Abigail knew she should have made her request more unreasonable, if she’d gone overboard the Marshal would have refused. But no, she’d just had to hedge her bets and make it look like her theoretical plan had been reasonable just to improve the chances the Black Queen wouldn’t feed her liver to buzzards after this was all over with.}

This is the bit of text used to justify that Abigail somehow had a plan and that she made the request look reasonable, right? Nothing in there provides defense for that argument, it just tells us that Abigail hoped she could use that as an EXCUSE in case of failure. She only laments she didn’t make it more unreasonable because maybe she thinks that then it would have been denied.

In fact, just two paragraphs above that bit of text, it was stated that the request DOES NOT LOOK REASONABLE. It was noted by Juniper that it wasn’t even properly made and didn’t explain what the purpose of the deployment was (Because there wasn’t a purpose, and this was explicitly stated many times: Abigail had no plan or purpose for the Knights, she made the request with the purpose of it being denied, in order to avoid responsibility for a failure). It just wasn't too much of an outrageous request that would get Abigail treated like an idiot asking for too much (as if, for example, she had asked for the whole Order of Broken Bells, all the Goblin Fire, or other such obviously to be denied requests) and not too small so that could be used by Abigail to excuse her failure (she couldn't use it as an excuse if she had just asked for a single Mage, a small group of Goblins or a single tenth of soldiers, for example), she planned to say "I asked for reinforcements, I was totally gonna do something and had a plan, but the reinforcements were denied so my plan couldn't be used, it's not my fault I failed". And the ONLY REASON that such unreasonable and improperly made request was accepted was that Juniper trusts Catherine's instincts when choosing Abigail, so she chose to believe the new General had a plan (she didn't have any).

From Abigail's POV: "She sent him off after a quick elaboration, fairly sure the Hellhound would refuse her request and so in the after-battle reports she'd have an excuse for her failure to perform"

From Juniper's POV: "The Marshal of Callow's instinct was to send him back with an order for General Abigail to make a proper proposal including for what she wanted the soldiers, but she held her tongue. Catherine had raised the other woman up for a reason"

One can't just add our own thoughts into the text and justify our own interpretation by thinking that both Abigail and Juniper are unreliable narrators, because A) Abigail's POV shows us the reality of her intentions and thought process, so there is nothing to interpret or see further, she can be unreliable narrator about external matters but not to her own thought process B) Juniper's POV shows us how the request looked like from the outside.

Mental Mouse

Yes, this. She was trying to cover her ass against charges of incompetence or rebellion. Between her actual knowledge of the milieu and her "natural" luck, she managed to instead cover her army, against the enemy blowing past the defenses and also wiping out the army's top dirty-tricks squad with its leader. Great work, Abigail! (<Abigail cringes inside> 😊)

I will note that if she does end up getting a Name out of this, she probably loses her No.2 slot in the succession. That's assuming Cat doesn't need to back down on the "no Named rulers" point, which she might well have to; arms control is one thing, but Names are less subject to political constraint. Especially when several of them apply specifically to rulers.

Oh RanVor... This story is multilayered, with a lot of foreshadowing, multiple layers of intrigue, and non-causal manipulation (that is, story-fu) in play. There might even be an unreliable narrator or two. Events and even motivations are not the whole story, and "why did this happen" is very much a topic of discussion. Also, remember what I said before about taking anything less than enthusiastic agreement as a personal attack?

caoimhinh

Indeed.

But RanVor is right is this. One can't just add our own thoughts into the text and justify our own interpretation by thinking that both Abigail and Juniper are unreliable narrators, because
A) Abigail's POV shows us the reality of her intentions and thought process, so there is nothing to interpret or see further, she can be an unreliable narrator about external matters but not to her own thought process
B) Juniper's POV shows us how the request looked like from the outside and explained that the reason for accepting the request was a personal matter, not any validity in the request nor a tactical judgment. It was pure trust in Catherine.

Mental Mouse

Hmmm... Consider how the fantasies of escape are only at the beginning. And if you take away the "scheming to fail", the lead up to the knight request comes out to "damn we're so fucked... we're gonna need an edge, Juniper will probably turn me down but I gotta ask". Followed later (after she's put aside the "scheming to fail" stuff) by her going "well, that's going to the Hells, what do I have that might help? Oh yeah...."

That doesn't read like a genuine coward to me, it reads like someone who likes to think she's a coward. Remember, bravery isn't about not feeling fear, it's about feeling the fear and going ahead anyway.

caoimhinh

This has nothing to do with bravery, nothing in this chapter makes Abigail seem like a coward. What we are discussing is whether this was a plan or happenstance.

Mental Mouse

Providence shapes happenstance and mortal plans alike. "The gods help those who help themselves", so when their favorite Abigail thought to call for reinforcements, Providence made sure that what she called for would be exactly what she needed.

caoimhinh

Yes, and that has been my point and RanVor's point too all this time. This was the work of providence, not the fruit of Abigail's planning, and she had absolutely no idea what to do with the knights (she made the request not only expecting to have it denied, but actually made it with the INTENTION of it being denied so she could avoid responsibility).

So those comments above claiming that Abigail called for knights with even a remote idea of thinking to use them are absolutely mistaken and the text states it beyond doubt.

caoimhinh

Also, you CAN'T take away the "scheming to fail", because that's the entire reason for this whole situation and the motivation behind Abigail's actions.

The lead up to the request of knights isn't "damn we're so fucked... we're gonna need an edge Juniper will probably turn me down but I gotta ask", rather it is "damn we're so fucked... I gotta avoid being blamed for this, let's ask for something Juniper will probably turn down, so I can claim that I tried but she didn't help me and put the blame of this shit on her"

Abigail's moment of quick-wit came afterward, when Robber's cohort had caused a disturbance in the binders and Malaga soldiers' ranks (in an operation she didn't know of), and she had the knights (which she didn't want, had even hoped to be denied, but got due to Juniper's trust in Cat).

Mental Mouse

Also, the request may have been out-of-the-blue, and Juniper suspicious of the "greenhorn general", but still: "Hey, could I have some of those knights over here?" was not an unreasonable request.

caoimhinh

It is, actually. It's the equivalent of making a call for 1000 S.W.A.T members or perhaps something like the deployment of 100 fighting jets, 100 helicopters, 100 tanks, or 1000 Special Black Ops soldiers. Special units like the Knights of the only Chivalric Order in current Callow are not something that moves on a whim, they aren't casually deployed.

Abigail is a General, so she CAN ask for them, but she needs a reason, which is something she didn't have. Also "Hey, could I have some of those knights over here?" is not a proper request for them "Marshall, I need 1000 knights to send against enemy units" is the way a General should do it.

More importantly, what we discuss here is that the purpose of the request was (as explicitly stated by Abigail over and over) not to receive the knights but to be DENIED the knights and use that as excuse to avoid responsibility.

Mental Mouse

There's an old slogan I've seen on buttons and such: "Don't believe everything you think". I think that slogan applies to Abigail.

Also, asking for the knights here isn't like asking for SWAT teams to be mobilized from scratch. The knights are already present and waiting for action, even if they weren't originally assigned to her front. And she wasn't even asking for all of them. If a General says they need something in particular, you at least think about it, and note that Juniper did in fact grant the request. (I also note that there's no reason Providence couldn't affect the orc's thinking as well.)

caoimhinh

It's weird that you mention that slogan. Do you not know what the phrase "Don't believe everything you think" means and its usage? That phrase is not applicable here. It means to question one's own ideas and preconceptions, to break free from limiting beliefs, It's not to say "what I believe I'm thinking is not actually what I'm thinking" as you are implying.

There's no misconception or lack of belief in oneself here, we read Abigail's thoughts and she clearly states her intentions, her reactions to what is happening, and her decision-making process without sarcasm or ambiguity, there is no space for hidden meanings, there's no second interpretation or deeper thoughts in her actions.

The text also explicitly states both Juniper's initial intention to deny the request (it was improperly made and stated no purpose for the knights) and the reason why she accepted it (Abigail was chosen by Cat, so Juniper believes she must be someone talented who might have a hidden purpose and a plan) and Abigail's reaction for when the request is accepted is "shit, why did she agree?". It is not open to interpretation, it is clearly and unambiguously stated.

Also, asking for the knights is like asking for SWAT or any other elite military unit; in our world on an ordinary day even when police officers are called to a scene they are informed what their purpose is and what the situation is at their location. This is specially true in a state of emergency, and that's exactly what this is, with the Army of Callow under siege and surrounded by hostile forces on all sides, so if you call for 1000 of the elite units you need to state what you intend to do with them, because they need to be ready to respond to any situation that may arise. They aren't, and can't be, deployed on a whim. They only move with a purpose. Juniper made an exception and broke protocol to authorize the deployment despite there been no clear purpose because she trust Catherine and believes that the General chosen by Cat wouldn't make a deployment request without a battle plan (turns out she would, but Juniper doesn't know that).

Mental Mouse

We're down at the reply edge here and the new chapter's up, but I'll just say that I think you have undue faith in EE's literalism here. And while the Army of Callow does have some formal procedures, it's still operating under an essentially feudal system, so most of the time Persons will take precedence over Rules. In particular, the only authority Juniper and Abigail ultimately answer to, is their queen – even if she calls for a military board, they are meeting by and under her authority.

caoimhinh

Yes... that's why Juniper's trust in Catherine led her break of protocol to allow Abigail's request despite it being improperly made and not giving any reason for the deployment.

What you just said doesn't contradict my point in any way.

I'm not putting undue faith in the literalism here, I'm simply not making stuff up. There's a difference. We can make assumptions and especulate in lots of things, and narration is sometimes sarcastic, but IN THIS CASE it was unambiguous and serious, so what's stated there can't be denied by a reader's imagination.

GH

Another great chapter, as per usual! Nice to see the Order of Broken Bells getting some action.

caoimhinh

That epigraph was amazing, and it indeed sums up the current conflict of this Arc.

Oh, a chapter dedicated to Abbigail, nice. Providence is on her side, even if no one has realized it yet.

"A girl can dream, right?"

Yes, Abby, but unfortunately your lessons with Cat haven't yet reached to the point of teaching you the power of PLOT, otherwise you would see that your Fate is success, just probably not the way you imagined, hahaha. Just take a look at the way Robber falsified the signature and got materials to mount his secret operation. He succeeded in happily killing enemies and now the credit for it is Abby's. Just as planned.

Sure, if he had failed the blame might have gone to Abby before someone (probably Cat or Hakram) realized that it was a fake, but hey, that's just honest goblin friendship, right?

"just because she was a lunatic didn't mean she was wrong."

True words, and this applies to almost every major character in this series, too.

Mentions of honor duels and killing among Levantine nobility, a good reminder of how obsessed they are with that concept. Kinda reminds me of the villains in Chinese Xianxia stories and their obsession with being given “face”, they can kill someone just for not greeting them in the appropriate manner. They usually end up being killed by MC.

So, Yannu wants to attack at night, eh? He’s sooo fucked and won’t even know what hit him, that army is gonna get a nightmarish surprise via the Drow’s Night Miracles.

When they make the TV series, Abigail has to be played by Tig Notaro.

Honestly, I am -so- looking forward to the Mighties kicking the Grand Alliance’s rear!

Not EE's fault, just the ad network (WordAds, in this case) failing to filter a script inside an ad. It happens from time to time to every one of them, including Google. (Yes, this does mean blocking ads decreases your risks of a malware infection; just another term in the cost-benefit calculation.)

Damn you WordPress, wrong parent. Sorry about this.

It got me really confused for a moment. xD

"Lord Yannu Marave patted his horse's man, and fondly held out his palm to feed her the last piece of bread from the loaf when she turned."

All of this is now canon and should be preserved for prosperity!

Aotrs Commander

Pahahahahaha!

I hadn't noticed that, but now you mention it, I can't unsee it...!

SITB

The 'obscure library'? Is it also manned by an ape? It seems like EE slipped another reference (though I doubt anything would beat the Bumbling Conjuror).

Regarding the GA attacking at night, I am going to assume that Yammu isn't an idiot and even if he doesn't know about the drow's particularities everyone know about the goblin's night vision. Merely attacking at night is foolhardy so I assume he has another trick planned. We would probably see the army of Callow+Drow unveiling the well that Cat created as a counter to it.

Morgenstern

He's planning to do the Pilgrim's bidding, wanting a DRAW for this one. So yeah, I'd personally assume he has good reasons why he chooses to wait until nightfall, not only mundanely tactical ones. Also, he was explicitly mentioned as someone who does NOT flinch from offering up a lot of "sacrificial lambs" (aka deaths of his own people) for getting what he wants.

RanVor

Abigail fails to fail: the chapter.

Morgenstern

Nice one, thanks for that.

Aotrs Commander

Question, seeing as the wiki does not seem to have it, nor was a google search helpful... Where did Abigail show up first and where (if anywhere) did we get a description of her? I think the former part may have been Skirmish I (as far as my own investigation goes) for her first appearance, but that didn't seem to have a description.

Just struck me as one of those things that sometimes, your mind associates a sort of feel, rather than an image to a character and I wanted to sort of reinforce her image i my head, if you know what I mean?

Andrew Mitchell

Skirmish I was the first we saw of Abigail (at least I'm pretty sure that was the first). We got to read a little more about her every time she had screentime. I don't recall seeing much of a description of her appearance through.

Mental Mouse

Speaking of appearance, there's something about Cat: The wiki (and the images there) describe her as having the "slight build" of the Deoreithe (though she's only half that). I'm not sure where that's mentioned, but even as the series kicked off, before she had any powers, she was fighting people considerably larger than her, and if she didn't always win, she wasn't getting squashed either. That certainly implies she's pretty muscular, and it makes more sense to me that she would have a brawnier build. (I am likely influenced in this by having short, brawny women in my own family. 😊)

caoimhinh

Yeah, Skirmish I was Abigail's first time in the series, but we never got to see any description of her appearance until Catherine arrived to Sarcella to save the Third Army in Chapter 12: Relief in book 5, Abigail was described by Cat as "younger than me, black hair slightly longer than Legion regulations but acceptably so for a foreign campaign. Sunburnt cheeks, watery blue eyes and a delicate nose." She is also taller than Cat, but who wasn't? Only Goblins and Amadeus are shorter than Cat XD

Aotrs Commander

Excellent, ta. I had a feeling it might have been something around then, but I couldn't remember exactly where or if there was anything else previously.

mental image updated properly

caoimhinh

I was surprised by Abigail's age being younger than Cat (and Cat is less than 22), since initially she gave me the impression of an older woman, in two occasions mentioning that she wanted to find pretty and young boys to take to bed.

It's also worth noticing that the reason Abigail is so high in the ranks is because she is a member of Nauk's division, which always acted as vanguard and thus suffered heavy casualties, so everyone around and above her rank just kept dying until she ended up in her current position as General and her orc aide (a young boy according to Juniper) is a Legate now.

SpeckofStardust

Anyone else noticed this amusing thing.

"The Grey Pilgrim did not answer immediately. Instead the holy man gazed at the distant ring of raised stones, that incongruous crown atop a tall barrow."

Its the exact same thing as Catharine did.

Liliet

Where?

SpeckofStardust

"Callow and crowned by a strange pattern of great stones. Three concentric rings, the stones of them interlocking to give the illusion of a full and complete circle when one stood at the foot of the barrow."

In weaver woven its where cat had her thinking out loud about everyone's likely plans and movements and what they know about each others plans and movements in order for people to plan how to get what they want out of this mess.

Abigail tries to lose and be demoted or fired without being executed.

Abigail, who's good, sees that the enemy is sending forth necromancy rituals.

Abigail tries to lose, using that grand overpowering force of the enemy.

Hellhound: Nope. Misunderstanding will see to it that I aid you.

Robber: Nope. I've already ensured that you will be forced to win.

Abigail sees to her horror that a masterplan is coming together.

You know, this sounds a lot like providence. Like a hero's coincidental success against villains despite the odds being against them thanks to coincidence and optimal performance and compatibility of a select few troops. Like Levant is experiencing being the evil side.

Whiteeyes

Oh my god that's hilarious. If Abigail gets a Name it should unambiguously be Heroic. Then she tries to use that as grounds to be fired, Cat goes "What? No. I am 100% willing to employ heroes, remember? It's just that nobody ever took the job before. Anyway you deserve a pay raise."

And so the Blessed General sighs as she gets a bigger paycheck.

caoimhinh

And she is going to be the new poster girl for the Army of Callow and Cat's upcoming advertising campaign of "We are the good Evil" hahaha

Andrew Mitchell

Funny.

And a small correction: I'm pretty sure Vivienne was still a Hero when she joined Cat.

Liliet

That's the point where you start realizing that a certain part of the 'hero/villain' dichotomy is arbitrary political bullshit.

Absolutely nothing about Vivienne's goals, methods, approach or deep allegiance changed the minute she decided to take Cat's offer.

There was no metaphysical change, either.

But that was the moment she changed from "heroine" into "villain"/"fallen heroine" in the narrative the West has of this story.

werafdsaew

To be fair, she did start cursing at the Heaven at some point afterwards. But it's not a sudden change.

Kissaten

Vivienne stopped pilfering her allies' stuff when she changed sides.

Liliet

Did she? Because on the way to Keter Cat found out that Indrani never saw any of her assigned pay ;u;

Mental Mouse

Actually I think she was still pilfering table knives and such for a while even after joining up; Cat rolled her eyes but tolerated it as a eccentricity of the Name.

Liliet

Hierus

Thats what i have been thinking too. Would be a really interesting route to take, but i somehow doubt that is going to happen.

["That is absolutely what I did," Abigail baldly lied.]

Abigail feels like a second Catherine. =D

Whiteeyes

And so Abigail becomes Hideyoshi of the Sengoku Jidai. The peasant who rose meteoric through the ranks and became one of the top generals of a warlord who would go on to rule a nation. Like her counterpart Abigail isn't the greatest warrior or most brilliant commander. What they are known for is outside the box ideas and pulling off victories with minimal resources.

The difference between them is that Abigail only sort of deserves her reputation, but that can be improved with time.

Daniel E

Poor Abigail, lol. Figures that she would get stuck with Robber's group. A few battles with him "under her command" (and I say that very loosely), and she'll have learned improvisation enough to make her a match for Hellhound.

Lumin

When Abigail prayed to the gods, did above listen, or was it the sisters? Might we see the beginning of human worship of the Crow sisters (whether intentional or not)?

Liliet

Well she was definitely praying to Above.

Mental Mouse

The results look more like Above's style. Also, we don't really know what the new "kinder, gentler" Sri Noc ask of their followers.

Mental Mouse

> "She will not step in even if the palisade is assaulted," the Pilgrim finally said. "Perhaps not even if the camp is breached, as you had arranged."

Because she's not there... should be interesting when Pilgrim (and we) find out what they're up to.

Liliet

She's at the top of the barrow right now, if I've read the text right.

Mental Mouse

You're thinking of the scouts reporting "strange lights above" the barrow? But those scouting reports were from earlier – since then, she's set her generals and marshals to fight on their own, while she went off on one of her own missions.

The Gray Pilgrim was very clear that Cat wouldn't be getting involved in this battle; that said, I suspect he either failed to ask his Choir the right question, or is being cagey (and nervous) about the answers he did get.

Liliet

Catherine said in her own chapter that she would wait until nightfall, then ride with the Hunt.

Morgenstern

Hmm... you know, you saying that makes me think that this might be the actual reason for the Plan B Yannu is implementing – his goal is, after all, to help the Pilgrim achieve his goal. And the Pilgrim only comes into play when Cat comes into play, after, not before, because he wants a draw. It might not mean, he's getting that. But it's a perfect reason for plan B being to actually attack at night, despite everything. Yannu is, after all, ready to make big sacrifices for his chosen goals. In this case, the Pilgrim's goal(s),

Liliet

I've thought that too tbh!

caoimhinh

Yes, and that happened yesterday, when the Rogue Sorcerer, Lord Akil Tanja and Lady Aquiline were crossing the break from Arcadia. In the previous chapter Akil stated that the passage had been there until morning. Now the armies rested, made camp, organized their battle plan with Yannu (actually listened to Yannu's plan and obeyed) and are launching the attack. So by the timeline given Cat should have ridden with the Wild Hunt the night before this fight.

Liliet

I thought that too, but other people have convinced me that it's more plausible that the crossing both opened and closed this morning, with a few hours' gap for the army to get through.

caoimhinh

Yeah, that seems to be the case, even logistically weird as it is to not take any rest after crossing that hellscape and only using few hours to coordinate plans with the other army (admittedly it was only Yannu ordering them what to do). After all, that seems to be the only explanation that fits with everything else.

Liliet

mhm 🙄

caoimhinh

Why the angry face? It is weird! Those people had practically no rest. It would make more sense for them to wait until the next day to engage, but they seem to be in a hurry to fight.

Not so lovely that I've. Caught up. Again. Dang I intended to leave another 2.chapters before. That happened....

Ah well.

An attack at night. Hahaha, oh my.

Walter

I wonder if this is going to involve some type of Chess.

The Grey Pilgrim can't intervene first – but Ivah and the other senior Drow have been shown to be in the same ballpark with him and Peregrine,

So im imagining that if the senior Drow engage with the Dominion forces, GP and Peregrine may take that as an invite to reply in kind, but “technically”, they would be the first Named to enter the fight, and thus dooming the Dominion to lose the fight.

Speculating even further, this would allow Cat to continue her winning streak, and allow her to negotiate/dictate terms that allows her to absorb the Dominion forces / take them prisoner, and then head North to fight the Dead King.

simeraz

just a thing I think you mean Grey Pilgrim and Saint because Peregrine is another name for the Grey Pilgrim

Guys this is my first ever comment but did no one pick up that Abigail has a loyal orc second who ties up all her loose ends One who calmly follows her blindly since we were 1st shown Abigail in the battle of the camps .

Mental Mouse

Yup. Hakram's Name of Adjutant implies that "loyal orc second" is an in-world trope already, common and well-known enough to warrant a Name to represent it. Note that's another of Black's victories, since by Hakram's account, orcs simply weren't officers before Black's reforms.

Interlude: Trust Is The Wager

"War itself has no worth, as it is a temporary state. War ends, and therefore its fundamental purpose is to shape what comes after it. It then follows that a war fought without the ambition of a planned peace is inherently a mistake."

– Extract from the treatise "On Rule", author unknown (widely believed to be Prince Bastien of Arans)

Yannu Marave had been taught, as a boy, to make a spectacle of honour duels. There were some who might have called such a teaching arrogant, a presumption of superiority in all matters of steel, but those people were not of the Valiant Champion's Blood. The Lord of Alava had followed those ways as a young man, let the crowds roar with thrill and fear as he made sport of warriors. He had done this while master of the field from the first stroke to the last, and taken much too long to understand the sickness and cruelty of the act. Yet a duel fought for honour, for decision, could not be a dull affair. The resolution must be striking, the victory evident, lest other warriors wonder if their own blade would have served the cause better. And so Yannu Marave had left behind the ways of the champion, of a duellist, and instead learned the arts of killing. As his forbears had mad study of the slaying of armies and beast, he had learned to take apart men of all stripes. Warriors in plate or leather, hunters and Lanterns and even the strange-stepping slayers of the Brocelian's outskirts. All these, and binders as well. He had learned to kill these, kill them quick and clean and without a fuss.

And so he'd opened the throat of Akil Tanja within eighteen heartbeats of their duel beginning, flicking his hooked blade free of blood and sheathing it in the same smooth gesture.

Even as the corpse of the Lord of Malaga finished tumbling backwards and life left the man's eyes, Yannu of the Champion's Blood had calmly asked of his fellow lords and ladies of Levant if any other wished to contest the decision to attack again after nightfall. From the corner of his eye he'd seen Aquiline Osega's hand dip towards her own blade, her Slayer's Blood boiling at the thought of the match that could be had there, but the young woman mastered herself. The Lady of Tartessos was a dangerous woman, for her age, and would only become more so with the passing of years. She bore watching. The Lord of Malaga's son and heir, Razin Tanja of the Grim Binder's Blood, was not so patient. His sword ripped free of the scabbard, cutting through the silence that'd followed Yannu's question.

"By smoke and dust, I vow enmity between us," the boy rasped out, his voice cadenced with old words. "'til steel has sung and shield splintered, let there be no truce nor breaking of bread by our hands. On the blood of my father, I swear the last abjuration: by my hand the earth will spit you out from your grave, denied rest in barrow and shade."

Razin Tanja's face was still streaked with the iron and red of his line's facepaint, and though tall and well-formed the boy was in no state to fight the duel to the death he's just forced. He'd taken a wound today, Yannu noted, which had torn muscle near his shoulder. The healing done had been later and lackluster. Still, a murmur of solemn respect shivered through the assembled captains and Blood of the war council. Though Razin Tanja was said to have blundered and overstepped at Sarcella, that he would be so unflinching in swearing revenge over the same man who'd flogged him was garnering respect. From his own captains most of all, Yannu thought, and that was for the best. Razin Tanja could not formally become Lord of Malaga until his foremost kin gathered to acclaim him before Gods and men: respect and prestige would be his only true claims to command of the war captains of Malaga.

"So be it," Yannu replied, dipping his head. "When your wound is fully healed, I will meet you on duel-grounds."

"Why wait?" Lady Aquiline mildly said, eyeing the two of them smilingly. "Send for Proceran priests and have it done and over with. Let us settle all our affairs before battle is given."

The Lord of Alava met her gaze with clear displeasure. So clever she'd cut herself, that one, and too eager to see her last remaining rival to command of the other Dominion force dead on the ground.

"Shut your fucking mouth, girl," Lady Itima of Vaccei said, tone conversational.

Aquiline Osen's stare turned poisonous, when she faced the woman who'd had her two younger brothers killed. Itima was an old hand, and of the Bandit's Blood, so she was unimpressed by the sight and spat to the side in disdain.

"Yannu, confirm that little bore from Tartessos in command of her army and let's get this over with," the Lady of Vaccei said, glancing at him. "The longer she talks the more I feel the urge to make another cup out of an Osen's skull."

"Remain civil, Itima," he chided her.

"There is no civility north of Tartessos," Lady Aquiline angrily said. "Only poison and-"

"Fewer of your siblings than there used to be, eh?" the older woman grinned.

"Enough," Razin Tanja hissed.

The two women turned to him with barely veiled surprise.

"My father lies dead on the ground, his corpse not even cold," the boy said. "And you bicker over old feuds? I will wait until the end of this strife to exact my due from the Maraves yet you cannot even curb your viper tongues for an hour? Shame on both your lines."

"Not yet lord," Lady Itima drawled, "and already making enemies. Truly Akil's boy, though with half the sense and none of the—"

"I name Aquiline Osen a war leader of the southern host," Yannu calmly interrupted. "Do any contest this?"

"Agreed," Razin Tanja rasped.

"Agreed," Lady Aquiline coolly said.

There was a pause.

"Agreed," Itima Ifriqui conceded, reluctance purely for show.

They put it to the captains, afterwards, but with the Blood having spoken the matter was good as settled. Even the Malagans kept to the word of their young heir without qualms when enemies were there to see, though Yannu knew better to think Razin would not have to make private bargains with the most powerful to keep them following his orders.

"Then we are bound with common purpose of war," the Lord of Alava said. "Let none stray until our enemy is broken."

Already the sun was beginning to set, he thought. It would be a long night before their armies would be ready to strike at the Black Queen's host, for soldiers were in need of healing and rest. Yet the time would come, and for the first time in many years an army of the Dominion of Levant would march out with the Peregrine among its number.

"The savages are cutting each other up," Prince Arnaud of Cantal said with open disdain. "I believe one of their great lords was freshly butchered and even now is being set to flame."

This small pavilion of hers, Princess Rozala thought, was near filled to the brim with royalty. She would have preferred to cut out near everyone here of the council being held, but with the situation what it was that would have been more trouble than it was worth.

"I have spoken with Lord Marave," the Princess of Aequitan evenly said. "There was disagreement over strategy, and it was settled by an honour duel ending in death. Lord Akil Tanja was slain, and his heir Razin has taken lead of the captains of Malaga. He has been placed under command of Lady Osená, who is well-learned in the ways of war."

"They're Levantines," Princess Bertille of Lange drily said. "How learned can they possibly be at anything?"

The ripple of laughter that went through the tent at the quip was enough to begin scraping at the bones of Rozala's patience, which boded ill for the rest of this council. She was disappointed to note that the slightest trace of a smile had quirked Louis' lips. It should not be held against him, she ultimately decided. Prince Louis Rohanon was a clever and decent man, but he'd still been raised Alamans. His ancestors had not fought a hard war to take Levant, unlike hers, or an even more brutal one to keep it. Rozala glanced at Princess Bertille and found the older woman watching her, an assessing look on her face. She was pushing, the Arlesite princess thought, to see how far she could go without being called to order. The temptation was there to immediately put her in her place – it would be as simple as ordering the other princess to take a walk, dismissing her before all the others – but Rozala knew this was not the hour for it. Bertille of Lange was useful to her, and would remain so for a long time. Best to only bare the knife when there was something to hold over her head.

"We will of course defer to your judgement in this matter, Princess Bertille," Princess Sophie of Lyonis calmly said. "As is only natural, given your distinguished military record and extensive knowledge of the Dominion."

The Princess of Lange reddened and Rozala Malanza had to smother a smile. Both at the harshness of the reply – Bertille had no military achievements to her name, and was not known as a great scholar – and the fact that Princess Sophie's continued open dislike for her fellow royalty kept pushing them ever further into Rozala's camp. Cordelia Hasenbach had picked her watcher for skill at arms and loyalty, not diplomacy. A mistake of some scale, as it turned out, for protracted campaign had tired the patience of everyone and tempers were beginning to flare more and more frequently.

"The Dominion is worrying me, all jests aside," Prince Rodrigo of Orense spoke up. "They seem most unstable, Princess Malanza. Lord Marave's scheme to attack the enemy camp was a failure, yet we are now expected to heed his plans once more?"

Rozala inclined her head in acknowledgement of his words, not in the least troubled by the question. After all, they'd arranged before the council for him to ask it.

"He spent only Dominion soldiery, if you'll recall," the Princess of Aquitan said. "Not ours. And this is not merely his own design – the Grey Pilgrim is at his side, preparing to fight the enemy we cannot."

Even an oblique mention of the Black Queen was enough to chase any trace of mirth out of the tent. There were some here who'd not been at the Battle of the Camps, who'd not seen the crowned warlord of Callow split the clouds and drown men like flies or make sport of entire bands of heroes. There were some here who'd whispered behind closed doors that Prince Amadis Milenan and his armies had simply been cocksure and caught by surprise, and in the wake of that sloppiness tried to weave wild tales to avoid the blame. No one whispered such things anymore, Rozala thought. Not since half the people in this room had seen that spit of a girl tear out of the sky in a ripple of darkness only to nonchalantly set herself in the way of an army thousands strong without ever baring a weapon. Without raising her voice, or doing anything but smoking her eerie bone pipe and giving calm warning. Princess Rozala still thought of that afternoon, sometimes, of the death she's seen in the other woman's smile. It still had her shivering. The Black Queen was mad, but hers was a madness that had broken every army in her path. The Princess of Aquitan would not test her again without great care and many preparations.

"It's still a fool's notion, this night attack," Princess Leonor of Valencis opined. "Chosen don't hold ground, Princess Rozala. They can't be relied on. When we take a swing at that palisade, the enemy will have goblins and drow waiting for us."

Arnaud pompously cleared his throat.

"We don't know for certain if drow see in the night, Leonor," the Prince of Cantal chided, tone condescending. "Let us not make unwarranted assumptions."

"They live underground, Arnaud," Prince Louis sighed. "We can assume they see in the dark without it being unwarranted."

"They could have very fine hearing," Princess Bertille drawled. "Or mayhaps like bats it is their cry that is their sight."

"Indeed, Bertille, indeed," Prince Arnaud enthusiastically agreed. "My point exact."

Sometimes Rozala wondered what it was like to be Arnaud Brogloise, the kind of person whose triumphant vanity would allow to take anything but the most obvious of mockeries as affirmation. It wasn't like the Princess of Lange had even bothered with much of a pretence.

"The Chosen will be sent to match the Damned, Princess Leonor," Princess Rozala said, dragging the conversation back to the earlier path. "We will not be relying on them for the fighting. I assure you, we have accounted for the draw."

"That'd be why our priests have been in talks with the Lanterns for the last sennight, I take it," Princess Leonor replied, eyes narrowing. "You won't be saying more?"

Rozala flicked a glance at Louis.

"Lady Dartwick, the Black Queen's spymistress, has agents in our camps," the Prince of Creusens said. "We've caught and hung ten of these 'Jacks' already. As a result, it was decided that secrecy is to be paramount. If the enemy catches wind of our stratagems beforehand, I need not detail how much of a disaster this could become."

"But you are aware of the details, Prince Rohanon," Princess Leonor pressed. "And consider the notion sound?"

"I do," Louis replied without hesitation. "Risky, but soundly planned and perhaps our only chance at winning this without tossing away fifty thousand foot taking that palisade."

"Gods be merciful, then," the Princess of Valencis sighed, "and ward us from the reaching claws of Below."

"We will begin our advance two hours before dawn," Princess Rozala informed them. "Camp fires are to be kept alight to mislead the enemy, and there will be no horns sounded for assembly. You will all be tasked with seeing to your own soldiers, while I've appointed Prince Louis to command over the levies furnished by Her Serene Highness."

"Glorious command indeed, my prince of Creusens," Princess Bertille smirked.

The Princess of Aequitan's eyes narrowed.

"As you've shown such spirit tonight, my princess of Lange, I expect you will have no trouble leading the tip of the wedge," Rozala calmly said.

The other woman's smirk vanished.

"There will be use for our horse then?" she said.

"We're sending everything we have," Princess Rozala grimly replied. "So is the Dominion. We'll win or lose on the knife's edge that splits night from dawn."

Dark tidings, that, but they were Proceran and so they still toasted to the madness before dispersing to their duties.

Juniper, fresh awoken and only half-dressed, did not bother to ask Aisha if she was serious. Her Staff Tribune would not jest about such a thing, or wake her without being entirely sure it was happening.

"Their military intelligence shouldn't be this bad," the Marshal of Callow said.

She wordlessly leaned back to allow Aisha to tie her aketon, letting the Taghreb's deft fingers handle the delicate clasps she could not reach. The touch was not distracting, but not enough that Juniper could not concentrate through it.

"Catherine's readings of the Grey Pilgrim have been inaccurate before," Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara noted. "It might be that these... goddesses from the Everdark have obscured the truths of the drow from our opponents."

"If we're lucky that'll be the case," Juniper grunted.

With the aketon properly on and no need for full armour quite yet, distance between them resumed and the Marshal of Callow's mind turned to safer avenues than the golden glow of her old friend's cheeks in the light of the torches.

"If we're not lucky," the Hellhound continued, "and that is to be our working assumption, they have a hard counter to the drow."

"We are not without cards of our own," Aisha reminded her.

"It's still playing to the enemy's tempo," Juniper said. "I don't like giving them what they want, Aisha, and that would be what we're doing."

"Should I order the Fourth Army and the assigned Legions to hold the palisades instead?" she asked.

The Hellhound breathed out, considering the lay of it. Would keeping the drow in reserve until the enemy had engaged better the situation? There was no way to tell, honestly. It'd be more prudent to bait out whatever plan the Grand Alliance had prepared early so that a defence could be mounted with it out in the open. Her warlord had made it clear that the tribes of the 'Firstborn' were heavies in the league of a Court's field army, after night fell, but that kind of strength tended to be unreliable in Juniper's opinion. She put more trust in overlapping lanes of fire and steady shield walls than in powerful but disorganized hordes.

"Keep them in reserve near the front," Juniper finally said. "We'll let the drow take the first crack at the enemy. But Aisha?"

Her Staff Tribune smoothly turned, eyebrow cocked.

"Sound the full muster," the Marshal of Callow said. "Everyone in gear. This is it. I can feel it in my bones."

Moro Ifriqui of the Brigand's Blood, heir to Vaccei, checked on the leather strap keeping his javelins from jostling around his back with every step. It needed tightening, and though it was awkward to paw at the strap while keeping pace with the other skirmishers he forced himself anyway. Better a small embarrassment now than a mistake that might cost him his life in the heat of battle. The Vaccei warriors around him slowed when they approached the edge of the enemy's range, where the spears of flame had been thrown at them from a great distance during the day. Knowing his role in this, Moro took the lead and bared the serrated sword that was sheathed at his hip.

"Honour to Levant," he screamed. "Honour to the Blood. Honour to Vaccei!"

Screams repeated his words back at him, and twice more he repeated the ritual to fray the edges of fear and replace them with ardour instead. Only then did he scream for the advance, and the warriors marched into the field. Above them the Proceran priests wove miracles, globes of Light that cast down a glow over the stretch of plain leading to the palisade. Moro kept the beat of his warriors' march steady, knowing it was not yet time for the charge proper, and as he moved forward cast wary looks at the pit traps the day's fighting had revealed. Grimly, he thought to himself that without those being unearthed and the Proceran miracles lighting the way his charge would be little less than hurrying to honourable death. When the same massive sorcerous spears of flame that had been used during the day lit up the enemy camp, the heir to Vaccei felt a thrill of excitement and fear both running through his veins. Fear, for if he were to be touched by one of these his death would be instantaneous. Excitement, for there were no more spears now than there had been during the day and that meant...

Spread among the Vaccei warriors, the Lanterns laughingly called out their battle-hymns and jagged arcs of Light sprung upwards — fifteen, seventeen of them scything through the darkness of the night. They impacted the enemy's sorcerous flames with a sound like claps of thunder, and though the miracles broke so did the enemy's magic. Moro laughed, the battle-joy lending his feet wings, and picked up the pace. Behind him his warriors followed suit, the dauntless vanguard of the Dominion, and it was singing couplets from the Anthem of Smoke that the heir to Vaccei passed into the killing yard: the suspected outer range of the enemy siege engines. And it was true, for a mere two heartbeats later projectiles near invisible in the gloom began scything through the lines of his men. First the long darts and round stones of the ballistas, skewering flesh and shattering bones before a scream could even rip free of the throat.

"Scatter," Moro yelled.

Had they been the lumbering, heavily armoured armsmen of Alava his warriors would have broken and died. But they were the followers of the Brigand's blood, light-footed and fleet, ghosts in the dark and killers in the wet earth: the formation vanished in a heartbeat, becoming a loose mob of warriors charging forward at backbreaking pace. Moro laughed and veered wildly to the left, barely avoiding the geyser of snow and earth that was the introduction of the first enemy trebuchet. A woman behind him screamed when the large stone kept rolling and caught her, though the sickening crunch that followed told of a merciful quick death in the heartbeat that followed. The paints on his face running with sweat, Moro of the Brigand's Blood forced his aching limbs to quicken and with another shout urged his warriors onwards. Through the first hail, and the most vicious. The enemy scorpions fired their long javelins with deadly accuracy that only cursed goblins would be able to muster in the dark, snuffing out lives wherever the whim took them. But beyond that, the warrior saw, there was open field.

At too odd an angle for the engines to be able to kill, too close to the palisade. In the glow of the Light globes he could glimpse the dry moat before the enemy's rampart, and with a proud shout he ripped one of the javelins clear of his back. It was time to have the enemy taste Vaccei's steel. Yet above the palisade, he saw, it was not legionaries that awaited but instead the grey-skinned devils his mother had told him were truly drow from the Everdark. Their gear was shoddy, he saw with a sneer, and would be no proof for a good javelin. Even better. One more step he took, and then a hand was laid on his shoulder from the front.

"Chno sve noc," a guttural voice said.

Before the words were even fully spoken, his arm was gone up to the shoulder along with the javelin he'd been holding. Turned to dust, already gone in the wind. Moro opened his mouth to scream as a cold silver-blue pair of eyes contemplated him. The drow, for Ashen Gods it must be a drow, smiled and he saw a flash of obsidian before – before there was a spray of grayish blood all over him, and the creature fell split in half.

"Look alive, boy," the Saint of Swords idly said, flicking the blood off her blade. "We're just–"

Moro did not see her move, but suddenly her sword was angled differently and she was flying back, while a ringing sound like another blade had hit her echoed. Not, he saw with dismay, not another blade. The grey palm of a drow's hand was extended where the Saint had stood, and slowly the creature straightened its back. The abomination was ancient, Moro realized, its skin horridly creased and its thick black veins visibly ridged. It wore a strange tunic of obsidian rings, belted at the hip, and its hair was snow-white and long.

"You again," the Saint of Swords snarled.

The drow glanced at Moro.

"Boring," it said in broken tradertalk. "Boring south cattle, no better Procer cattle. Run now."

In the distance the rest of the drow began a strange ululating prayer. Rumenarumenarumena, they went, some sort of heretical hymn offered up to the sky. As the ancient drow turned its attention to Saint of Swords, Moro took the advice he'd been given.

He ran.

Sitting on a stone, legs folded, the Grey Pilgrim watched the battle and waited. For now, all was unfolding as he had foreseen.

So why, Tariq wondered, were the Ophanim murmuring so worriedly in his ear?

I'll always vote for the non-interlude chapters. So my vote goes to Ward.

My very own name

You can always vote for both 😊

Wow

...WOW...

Jacky Tio

Agreed. Will vote after several more expected interludes.

Nuke_The_Earth

The link's broken for me, anybody else seeing that?

Andrew Mitchell

It's not recognised as a URL because it doesn't have the HTTP. But it worked for me once I cut and paste it into my browser.

Owyn Beleforte

Heresy! We must win back the first place! For the Glory of the Black Queen!

Ninith settler

I mean Ward's last two arcs have been extremely good. Tattletale is carrying.

Stormblessed

I love the final paragraph. Cat vs Tariq in schemes that could decide the fate of creation!

Insanenoodlyguy

So far it looks good for Cat. Tariq thinks this is going just as planned. Normally, when you are the good guy chess master, that's a victory, and so he's comfortable in this.

The problem is, he hasn't realized how far he's stepped into the villain narrative yet again. His side attacked during truce. His side turned down entreaties for peace, twice now. He personally broke an oath to the other side, and has helped to kidnap her father and split his body and soul. None of these things are how the hero's roll, and his justifications just won't get away with it because that only works when the other side is so "evil" you have to bend the rules.

The angels are worried because they know when the bad guy thinks it's going just as planned is when things get real bad for the bad guy.

The next chapter is a Wednesday one, I'm going to assume the things will become dire at some point.

antoninjohn

Bad guy, you think Pilgrim is the bad guy. "All is unfolding as I have foreseen" ok keep copying Darth Sidious Pilgrim there is no way that could backfire on you

Someguy

So Hanno is going the whiny Anikin route on Mustafar.

Mental Mouse

"Nobody panics when things go according to plan. Even if the plan is horrifying!" – the Joker.

So, Rumena versus Saint, which is basically Dragon versus Dragon – the respective power-brawlers facing off. Pilgrim is waiting on Cat, and his angels are... nervous? This is promising....

Jarthon

I think SoS will have a bit of an upper hand here, but it will definitely be fun to watch. My hope would be that the rest of the Mighty get involved in the same fight. Probably won't happen, but that would be a fight on the level of Cat v Heroes at the battle of the camps.

Halinn

The reason that dealing with Black went so well? That's because it was the first step of his plan, and we all know that those always succeed for the villain.

NerfContessa

Honestly, I would LOVE for it to. Turn out like this, though I doubt it will. He has too close a connection to Good via his whispers to make that mistake. As evil as they may be...

Rook

Most likely Sve Noc is obscuring the well from the sight of divine providence.

There was foreshadowing there from the proceran side, where Rozala mentioned they'll "win or lose on the knife's edge that splits night from dawn"

So pretty likely the ophanim understand exactly how weak the drow are at dawn and the plan is to force dawn to break at a critical moment. It'd shatter half the Callowan army and it'd be a perfect chance to take out a lot of their heaviest hitters like Rumena.

Only thing is the well Cat made is likely a contingency for that exact scenario. Something that forcibly creates localized night in a large area to ward off day or dawn.

The Ophanim would and should be worried there, since it's impossible to not notice a power source of that magnitude but it's likely that Sve Noc's interference won't let them understand the nature of the well or how it'll be used, meaning that all they know is that their foresight is currently not as reliable as it usually is.

Euodiachloris

Part of me wonders if Pilgrim's friends on the upperside have finally noticed that 1) Cat doesn't have a Name, 2) the drow have been doing their own story things in isolation for so long that their plot weight tugs in non-standard directions (I doubt that the Bard has even bothered planting or updating any plot hooks in the Everdark for centuries to keep in reserve for a rainy day) and 3) that Below isn't really invested in this particular fight (the one further north, sure – so, yoink: we'll take that distraction, thanks... but, we didn't need it...), since Sve Noc aren't directly affiliated with any side but their own – and that's basically “survival for me and mine”.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for sharing your thoughts. You've given me a bit to think about; especially your last point. I think we've already had indications that Below isn't unified, so the question of how much much they're invested in this fight is an interesting one.

Mental Mouse

It's not clear that Below “invests” in plans, or fights, at all. Above probably does (Augur, – note they apparently have a near-lock on genuine oracles, the Crusades in general), but Below seems to invest in people (of various species), and lets them make their own plans and fight their own fights.

Insanenoodlyguy

Because Tariq, your enemy is the master of doing things where/ while you can't see shit.

antoninjohn

When you fight to kill someone who wishes to aid you against evil and bring peace as a hero the story is no longer on your side

Whiteeyes

Well damn, good job crows you sunk their spyware. And the Pilgrim isn't used to not having a wiki to check for the answers.

Liliet

No, Pilgrim hasn't been surprised yet so I think he's still got intel on this part – what the drow can do at night.

It's more likely that he does know, since Cat specifically let him Behold Rumena's fight with the Saint (that happened just after nightfall). So he has a good idea of what peak Night looks like, and probably how it operates, but since Cat started building the well way before that, all this amounted to was letting her decide when does the decisive engagement happen.

She may now actually use her ability to control the tide of the fight to play up the "surrender" angle. Unless sun miracles outright destroy the Night in drow corpses, she can limit the effective casualties, and Kairos is still not in the picture.

caoimhinh

Notice how Pilgrim didn't notice Rumena before it appeared punching Saint in the face, the Ophanim are worried now. It was stated that everything that happened in the Everdark was outside of the Angels' vision. It seems more likely that they are reacting worriedly now because they are finally seeing the Drow in action, so the Angels have realized the Drow's strength was beyond the expectation, otherwise they would have warned Tariq before.

Shequi

Rumena Tombmaker Vs The Saint of Swords

This promises to be epic.

Andrew Mitchell

That's what I've been looking forward to.

Andrew Mitchell

Can't wait!!

konstantinvoncarstein

Even if the arrogance of the Proceran indispose me, they are write concerning the duels. It means that the chain of command can change in the middle of the campaign, and not even according to tactical and strategical competence. It seems pretty stupid to me

IDKWhoitis

It's a way to end disagreements quickly, and prevent political bullshit at higher level decision making.

Luckily the strongest man is smart, and is willing to listen to men smarter than him (Grey).

Although this system could definitely fail with one incompetent musclehead.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is bound to happen regularly

caoimhinh

It happens so regularly that Yannu accurately predicted it would happen and about what the honor duel would happen. A twisted sense of Honor compels the lords and ladies from the Dominion to do stupid and deadly things.

konstantinvoncarstein

And we see it started a blood feud between 2 provinces of Levant, who probably will end in a war (if they are not all killed before the night is over)

caoimhinh

I bet Yannu will be killed by a Drow and bound by Razin with necromancy/bindings. Although I think he doesn't have the Gift, or was he just not that talented? His father mentioned that as a reason for why Razin worked harder and thus was a worthier heir.

konstantinvoncarstein

He does not have the Gift, but I think one of his brothers have it.

Liliet

I think binding people is a hard 'no' for binders.

caoimhinh

Perhaps, but it's an oath, so they might get away with it in such a case. Honor seems to dictate pretty much everything in the Dominion.

What I actually find weird is that Razin doesn't have the Gift, so he is no practitioner of magic of any category. His vow seemed to imply that Razin would cast the necromantic magic personally, but he would need assistance given that he can't actually do magic.

Liliet

wait, what? where'd you get anything about necromancy from his vow?

caoimhinh

"I swear the last abjuration: by my hand the earth will spit you out from your grave, denied rest in barrow and shade"

That screams Necromancy, whether as an undead or binding his soul in some other way is up to guess, but that's definitely Necromancy.

Liliet

I am pretty sure he is being flowery about taking revenge in a regular way? I mean I don't think Levantines practice anything they would themselves identify as necromancy.

caoimhinh

Hmm, no, I don't think so. The first part of his vow ("By smoke and dust, I vow enmity between us. 'til steel has sung and shield splintered, let there be no truce nor breaking of bread by our hands.") is an enmity to the death and an oath to kill Yannu, the second part explicitly states his intention to bring him out of his grave to not let him rest in peace.

The first part is flowery language for murder, the second is flowery language for a promise of using Necromancy.

I don't know about the rest of Levant, but the practitioners of Malava (soul binders) could very well be exempt from public scorn for that.

Remember that Razin is from the line of the Grim Binder, there's no dishonor for him in using the arts of his ancestor, just like there's no dishonor for those of the Brigrand's Blood to use hidden blades and poison.

Another exception to the rule, like I said before, could be that he is only gonna use that necromancy on a sworn enemy with whom he had a blood feud for the killing of his father. Honor, or rather the restitution of honor, might exempt him from public scorn from other Levantines.

Liliet

Possible.

I don't think so, but possible.

Miles

Nah the incompetent one just gets challenged in quick succession to the point where he won't survive another fight even if it's against a literal twig

Qwormuli

It's a death sentence to an army. Dueling for honor(even not to the death) was banned by royal decree in quite a few European countries(like France, for example) for the sole reason, that it absolutely fucked their armies from top down.

Fantastical story elements aside, it does not work, it hasn't ever worked and it will most likely never work.

naturalnuke

When the society favors warriors over soldiers much less thought is put to things likes officers. They're also better at handling it because the only strategy they have is 'follow whoever at the top is' and that doesn't change even if the guy at the top does change.

Mental Mouse

Cat has remarked on that with respect to the Drow – in the Everdark they were purely warriors, with zero army discipline. I assume she's been working on that, but I'd bet they still aren't army regulars. That said, there's a long scale for that sort of thing, and even the human armies here are basically feudal. They are not national armies where everyone is part of a single force sworn to Our Nation.

Troops are loyal to their House nobles or even their own officers, rather than "The Principiate" or "The Levant". (Cat has to worry about that too, but so far it's mostly worked in her favor.) That means that when there's disagreements at the top, especially on the battlefield, there's no higher authority to pass them to. So, the beef gets settled by the principals there and then, and settled permanently.

Liliet

I think Black specifically changed that particular problem in his Legions restructuring, and Cat has inherited the structure along with everyone in Callow understanding that fuck, this is the effective version, after how badly they got beaten by it.

We are witnessing military progress right on the pages :3

Mental Mouse

Progress yes, but they're not at modern levels yet.

luminiousblu

The point is to settle any dispute without any real recourse, since everyone saw you lose. Also, whoever lost is dead, so you can't start shit during campaign to try to get back at your commander.

RanVor

You can't, but your relatives can.

luminiousblu

Doesn't really matter immediately, and it's a lot less risky. Someone you humiliated in front of basically everyone who matters is going to come after you, his son may or may not.

Rogos

Well, the Levantine way of resolving disagreements still seems idiotic. I mean, they just lost an experienced general who was also one of their most powerful binders (doubly stupid since we saw Yannu complain about Akil "pissing away" so many binders in the last chapter). And even if it had gone the other way, well, the Levantines would still have decapitated their own army by losing an even better general who is also a great warrior (though there are plenty of warriors to go around so they aren't as much of a tactical asset / limited resource as binders or Lanterns). It's a lose-lose situation.

Liliet

Agreed. And I think they'll notice that sometime soon.

Mental Mouse

They can... if they think they have someone who can take on Careful Yannu.

Naeddyr

I think the Levantine Blood knows this. Notice how political the whole duel thing was? The first duel was the due they pay as Dominion leaders, but I think it was a kind of strange formality, because you notice how everything kind of slots into place right afterwards: the postponed duel, the choosing of the southern commander, etc. etc. They're making the best out of a bad tradition, in a weird way.

Liliet

Mhm!

Bet that tradition's on its way out.

RanVor

Considering a new blood feud has just been declared, it's rather unlikely.

Liliet

I don't mean right now this second, I mean over the course of the next couple of generations.

Note how Tanyusha is already willing to postpone it.

RanVor

Yeah, and coincidentally he knows that he can't beat Yannu right now. Blood feuds aren't trivial things, and one not leading to escalation is almost unheard of.

caoimhinh

It has been going on for generations, and it's not going to stop unless something big happens. Nothing short of the extinction of a whole line of the Blood or the Grey Pilgrim declaring it is going to end it (and Tariq said he won't make that kind of call). The honour duels are so common that Yannu predicted not only that it would happen, but what the subject that would trigger the duel would be.

Two of the Ladies have grudges with each other, Itima of the Brigand's Blood killed two brothers of Aquiline of the Slayer's Blood, and it was stated by the recently deceased Lord of Malaga that those two lines had a bad relationship spanning to the founding of their country. They have "honour wars" over this kind of things (and many others). Just because Razin (who I assume is the one you called Tanyusha, for some reason, LOL) is capable of waiting until the campaign is over to attempt his vengeance is no signal that this tradition is over. The head of a noble house killed the head of another, in a world ruled by stories like this, it only leads to a conclusion: war. Made more likely by the fact that such wars are part of the culture of their country, further strengthened by the oath that Razin just swore (It will be interesting to see if he actually binds Yannu's soul after Yannu is killed in this campaign. Likely by a Drow, since I personally doubt Razin can kill him).

konstantinvoncarstein

"Honor" wars seems to be exactly the kind of wars the opening lines warned us about.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point.

caoimhinh

Indeed.

It is also interesting that Procer, Levant, Praes, and the Everdark (and allegedly the Rattlings, too) have suffered a lot due to the kind of wars that the epigraph warned us about: "Wars without planned peace".

Liliet

I think the tradition is on its way out not in the way that it'll suddenly just stop happening, but that it'll slowly decline in prominence, generation after generation. More limit of tolerance before declaring a blood feud, more willingness to set it aside for the moment under the circumstances, less actual viciousness and more showing-off in the process of pursuing it, eventually maybe acceptance of ritualistic outcomes other than 'one of the two people is dead' (surrender, injury beyond capacity to fight, etc).

At some point during the decline likely outlawed by a ruler who sees the whole thing as stupid and disadvantageous and thinks they have enough clout to at least try to make it stick.

Liliet

Tanyusha is bc Tanja sounds like Tanya to me – a female Russian short name, see Tanya the Evil. Tanyusha is the next level of familiarity, like Bob->Bobby. I started calling Razin that since Beheld and it just stuck in my head as an affectionate nickname for him.

caoimhinh

I see, hahaha.

Did you like Youjo Senki? It's been a couple of months since I recommended it to you, never got around to ask if you had actually watched the anime. It also has a light novel, though the updates of the translated chapters from Japanese to English takes a long time and Yenpress got the rights for official translation, so they scared the free translators away.

Liliet

i remember trying the manga bc the premise interested me and quickly realizing just HOW uninterested i was in everything that it was actually about at first at least like i dont care about – evil protags (legit evil not like Cat or Amadeus lmao)
– depressing shit happening
– ww2 era tech

caoimhinh

Ah, you should have tried the anime, it's way better than the manga adaptation.

I would argue that Tanya isn't so much evil as ruthless (she doesn't commit any crimes, never harms others without a reason, and legit only wants to live comfortably without participating in the mess that Being X threw her just to make her a worshipper) and she is fighting for the good guys too (The Empire was attacked first, due to jealousy and fear from the other countries because it is too strong, and when one country wasn't enough the others started intervening, so the entire conflict is the Empire fighting in self-defense) and the focus of the series isn't so much in depressing shit but the battles of Tanya and in that world people fly with magic, so there's actually very little mention of ww2 era tech.

But well, everyone has their taste.

P.S: Amadeus is way more evil than Tanya and has done way more wicked things, both in number and scale, lmao.

Liliet

Hmm, I'll try the anime maybe then.

Not now 'coz I have a backlog the size of the moon already, but... noted :3

(Amadeus is a precious selfless puff of empathy thrown into an absolutely horrifying position, is Tanya?)

caoimhinh

Kinda, there are similarities in them, but also lots of differences.

They are both cold rationalists and combat pragmatists in a fight against the world and do what's required to achieve their objective. Both are madmen who won't bow to the gods. But while Amadeus is a nationalist who picked a fight against the Gods for the sake of his homeland and is ready to selflessly die to win, Tanya is a selfish person who got dragged into her current mess simply for being an atheist who didn't bow even after meeting 'God' thus was punished for it, forced to fight for her new nation and achieve victory if she wants to survive, when the only thing Tanya wants is to be left alone and live her life in piece but the God that pick a fight with her will just not let her be, throwing her into a horrifying situation after the other to try to force her to submit and pray to God.

Liliet

Amadeus is a utilitarian, I'm guessing Tanya isn't?

I will admit the 'selfless' vs 'selfish' part is a big point for me. I like heroes :3

(But yeah I'm going to watch it sometime)

caoimhinh

She is kind of utilitarian in her decisions, but her life is still above everything else.

She is honestly not much of a good person, but she isn't a villain either (although other countries see her as a devil of destruction), she's an anti-hero at most, but she is an outright hero for her country (the Empire aren't the bad guys, they are fighting in self-defense). Tanya is extremely lawful and makes a point of obeying rules, as she considers that a pillar of society.

Tanya is a bit similar to Cat in that while for her people and subordinates in her homeland she is a respected leader and a hero with a bit of harsh attitude who demands discipline, to the other countries she is seen as a ruthless psychopath who brings carnage to the battlefield. The perspective varies depending on what side of her gun they are XD

Liliet

Interesting.

Liliet

Tanya is however a regular person name (short for Tatyana/Tatiana/ Tetyana in Ukrainian) that I encounter regularly in the world around me so

Mental Mouse

Why wait a couple of generations? They're facing a basically apocalyptic war, and screwing it up by focusing on the leader who would happily have taken those rowdy legions and gone home, instead of the one that's wiping out their cities for real.

The question is, when this war is done with, will there be anything left of the Levant nobility? We already know that if there's anything left of Procer, it won't be by the Angels' will; I imagine Cordelia and a few other Proceran notables might end up taking sanctuary in Callow.

Liliet

>We already know that if there's anything left of Procer, it won't be by the Angels' will

What? How so? Tariq certainly seemed intent on preserving Procer when he weighed in on the problem, and he's the only Choir hero who did.

Mental Mouse

When Saint was talking to Cordelia, she was quite clear that the plan from her side, was complete destruction and "build something better" on the rubble. Influenced by the Bard... (hmm, I wonder if Augur's rebellion would have been Saint upsetting the applecart if the war didn't pan out) Together with her story-fu-ups, I'm starting to wonder if SoS might have become a loose cannon on Above's ship.

Liliet

i have 0 doubt SoS is a loose cannon with ideas no-one else shares and POV no-one else supports tbh

Kissaten

Cordelia is told by the Augur that there will be a rebellion that will end Procer regardless of Dead King if callowans-praesii aren't beaten in a fight, so procerans are led to believe that there's a certain defeat in letting Black Queen go while fighting her may mean salvation. It is assumed that Augur is a pawn to Above.

Dominion is led by Gray Pilgrim, who is also a pawn to Above. Levantines are just fanatics, nuff said. Maybe some of them may be reasoned with, but not all of them and not when GP is watching them so closely.

Liliet

>It is assumed that Augur is a pawn to Above.

Love the passive voice here. Who assumes that? On what basis?

Augur was likely chosen by Bard for her position because of how her prophecies are vague enough they can be interpreted to mean a lot of things with the right push – which Bard is an expert on supplying.

Kissaten

Cat assumes so when she talked to Rozala last time. Tyrant thought (or lied/assumed it to push Cat in needed direction) so too when Cat talked to him.

Liliet

Cat assumes Augur is influenced by Bard. That isn't remotely in the vicinity of "the same thing"

caoimhinh

Not political, cultural.

The fact that it is a duel to the death is what settles this apart from the political way Proceran princes wage war in their game of "the Ebb and the Flow" between principalities. In Procer they beat the other prince's army and the loser needs to make concessions to the winner, it is rare that they kill the princes, although that happens sometimes. Whereas in Levant everything revolves around honor, from the way they speak, the courtesies to guests from a host, the way to make war and the way they live. Honor compels them, so their duels ends in death.

It's simply that it has happened for so long that they are accustomed to it. Yannu accurately predicted that he would be challenged by Akil or and would have to kill him or one of his champions, either for halting the attack or for ordering an attack at night. Notice that Itima stated that the reason Aquiline wanted Razin to fight immediately against Yannu was to have Razin dead and thus her command of the southern army uncontested, so Itima prompted Yannu to declare Aquiline the commander before things could be complicated (likely with another honor duel, this time between Aquiline or her champion vs Razin or his selected champion).

The duel between Razin and Yannu was postponed because Razin is level-headed enough that he knows now is not the moment for it, either because he knows he can't beat Yannu yet or because he doesn't want to further mess up the upper echelons of the chains of command. Yannu, on the other hand, simply said that he would fight Razin when Razin is in healed so it can be a proper duel of honor.

beleester

Historical armies had rules against dueling, probably for exactly this reason.

(Although this sometimes meant that the officers simply fought the duel in private and lied to their commander about what happened.)

Liliet

Yup.

I'm predicting a couple of generations, and Levant will start having those too.

Daemion

So... Juniper and Aisha? I ship it.

caoimhinh

Almost every time we see Juniper's POV there's a bit dedicated to Aisha and how lovely she is. This is more intense and detailed when Aisha is in the room with her.

Liliet

Yup.

I only remember explicitly shippy gushing from way back when in Greenskins, but it's also obvious from the side that they're a lil bit married.

Kind of want to see Aisha's POV on the matter, I don't think we've heard from her since Conspiracy

Mental Mouse

For this chapter, I note "the Marshal of Callow's mind turned to safer avenues than the golden glow of her old friend's cheeks in the light of the torches."

Safer avenues indeed! I get that interspecies fertility isn't an issue here, but still...

caoimhinh

The thing is that Juniper's attraction towards Aisha has to battle with her Orc hunger and those two kinds of lust sometimes mix together. The most dangerous avenue of thought I remember Juniper having towards Aisha is in Kaleidoscope III:

"The two of them were alone in the tent, at least until the rest of the general staff arrived. Juniper cast a look at the Taghreb, eyes lingering on the soft skin of her bare wrists. Such delicate appearance, for such a dangerous woman. The urge to sink her teeth into the warm veins warred with the urge to feel the softness with her own rough hands."

She wants to eat her in more ways than one (͡° ͜ʖ ͡°)

Liliet

Oh man it was in Kaleidoscope? I thought it was in Greenskins, ty ♥ god Juniper is a true disaster gay ♥

Mental Mouse

Yeek!

Mental Mouse

Also, since Liliet mentioned the chapter "Lest Dawn Fail" (back in Book IV), I turned up some lusting after Amadeus, or at least his vicious rationality: "Had he been born of her people, Ranker would have killed anyone with the slightest claim on him and made the man her consort. There were still matrons in the Eyries that whispered he was utterly wasted on humans"

Also, <snicker> that while the dragon's personal name is Nekheb, in the next breath it's reintroduced as General Catastrophe. (I can't believe I missed that first time round). And given the discussion there, his absence is probably because he has (again) flown somewhere and gone to sleep, eating anyone who tries to wake him.

Liliet

God fucking bless ♥

Jworks

Sooo did saint just kill the lord of Silent Steps or are there other drow with blue eyes?

naturalnuke

I think any of the original vassals have blue eyes.

Daemion

We also never saw the drow die. It might know the secret of regeneration or similar stuff to survive even lethal wounds.

I also assume that the Lord of Silent Steps won't attack from the front or play with its targets. It seems to be a rather competent assassin.

konstantinvoncarstein

Agreed on both accounts. And he seems slightly more loyal to Cat than the other drows, so it would make sense to not send him first in the meat grinder.

Liliet

plural of drow is drow

konstantinvoncarstein

Ok, thank you 😊

TeK

And their preferred pronoun is "it"

mavant

Just for my own recollection – that's only for Mighty, right? I vaguely think the first conversations with Ivah implied that dzulu have genders, but I'm not sure anymore.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

As I recall, Mighty /is/ the closest thing they have to gender. If you're Mighty you're a person so no other consideration matters and if you're not Mighty you're meat so nothing else matters.

Add to that the fact that most of the current crop of Mighty (other than the old monsters like Rumena) would have grown up as Dzulu so by the time they become Mighty they're probably used to not using what we'd recognize as gender.

Which makes me wonder, have we ever heard of a Mighty referred to by pronoun by anyone other than an outsider? I could easily see their sigil names function as their closest analogue to pronouns in an internal context.

(Speaking of Rumena, I can't believe it took me this long to figure out what his archetype is. He's a Pair Mei type, the peerless old martial artist who has outgrown social mores and morality. Makes him the perfect foil for the Wuxia protagonist Saint.)

caoimhinh

True. Back then Ivah said that gender pronouns are cattle-terms and the Drow are merely classified by power.

Notice that when Jindrich refers to Catherine in Beheld I, and when Ivah refers to Archer and even to Akua in, they use \It\ as the pronoun, even in their minds.

There's also one instance of Catherine talking about a female Drow, they are called Womb-bearers, but there's not much distinction, that Drow was Mighty and that was all that mattered.

mavant

Isn't Ranger the Pai Mei of this setting? Cruel tutelage and whatnot.

Liliet

Nope, all drow are 'it'. They have anatomy similar to humans that could be used to divide them into biological sexes, but their society doesn't have social categories based on that.

The sisters are the only ones we've ever heard referred to with a human-like gendered pronoun.

Javvies

Heh. The Ophanim are being worried at Tariq. This seems like a bad sign for the Alliance's plan(s) here.

Two hours before dawn? I mean ... if they drag it out, the drow could have issues ... but that requires having a way to keep things going.

Seriously? You're skeptical about drow being able to see in the dark? That really shouldn't be something you should be arguing about. Even if you don't know for sure, like was said, they live underground in a place called the Everdark – darkness or a lack of light/illumination is not a thing that's going to hinder them enough to notice.

RumenaRumenaRumenaRumena!

Here's hoping Rumena either kills Saint outright or gets out of this without risking being on the losing end of a Pattern of Three.

IDKWhoitis

Their plans may be exactly that, keep the fight going all morning long. I call Angelic schenaigns, like maybe Tariq was told it would be beneficial to fight during Dawn.

Then turn up the heat right at dawn, with a potential heavy artillery or some sort of shock.

Callow would get picked apart, as the fight gets too close for seige weapons to reliabily work.

Kissaten

Maybe GPs plan is to get involved into the fight (like Gendalf bringing cavalry with the Dawn), and to get involved he has to see enemy's Named intervening into the fight. Drow not being Named (and he must have assumed Rumena to be Named) at all foils that plan. Also, hopefully this kills the Saint.

konstantinvoncarstein

But we don't know the effects of the well that Akua build. It could be something to prolong the night, or a way to block the use of Light.

AVR

It's not like the Callowan Army or the Legions of Terror will vanish, and that's slightly more numerically than the drow. Keep the humans and orcs fresh and change over in an hour and a half... even without the drow crashing at dawn it's not a terrible strategy. Tricky to execute but they've got good generals.

Probably Yannu and Tariq have some cunning plans on top of fighting at dawn but it seems the Ophanim are worried anyway.

Liliet

>Seriously? You're skeptical about drow being able to see in the dark? That really shouldn't be something you should be arguing about.

I mean absollutely everyone other than personally Arnaud is thinking the same thing you are lmao

caoimhinh

And I would argue not even Arnaud is actually thinking that, he just say that to maintain his facade of being an idiot, which we know he is not. Everyone in Procer has been fooled by him and believes him an idiot, but he's steadily winning influence, or at least never loses it. He even sends "cards to his bastard son" telling him about his travel and the situation in campaign, the last of that cards was shown in Fatalism III being in Cordelia's hand and was what warned her of what the motion of an upcoming season of the Highest Assembly would be.

So that guy is the most dangerous of the Princes of Procer, this is agreed by Catherine, Pilgrim, and Saint. It must not be forgotten that every stupid action of his is just an act.

Rook

Arnaud is by far the smartest person in that room, I suspect.

If he was trying to dissuade people from the night attack, that idiotic suggestion he made is actually brilliant. It gets everyone thinking about the topic – how much of an advantage the drow have in the dark – and when they correct him they're likely to 'realize on their own' how stupid it is to disregard that factor.

At the same time, they don't dig their heels in because it's not someone correcting them and undermining their authority, and he doesn't make enemies because they're too conceited to think maybe Arnaud the "idiot" led them by the nose to that conclusion.

Even in general, his reputation for straightforwardness and downright idiocy is a pretty safe position to be in. His enemies don't want him out of the picture because you'd rather face stupid opponents than competent ones, and his potential allies rivals don't want to displace him because they see an easy puppet to manipulate. If you're competent enough to leverage that to shift public opinion without being noticed, it's a damn good advantage.

caoimhinh

Indeed, that guy has kept himself as the third seat of the coalition that threatens Cordelia's position (initially Amadis, Rozala, Arnaud and now it's Rozala, Louis, Arnaud). He keeps himself in a comfortable position from which he is important enough to not be eliminated but not so important as to be seen as a threat. He is a master at manipulation and everyone around him thinks of him exactly what he wants them to think.

The fact that he sent the card to his bastard son describing Amadis' plan to make a motion in the Highest Assembly makes me think that he knew it would end up in Cordelia's hands, which means he was conspiring against Amadis, probably because he figured Amadis would turn his back on him after becoming First Prince.

Now Arnaud has not only participated both times in the Crusade against the Army of Callow (both times in positions were he avoids responsibility for the failure) but also has made meritorious deeds in the north against the Dead King, even making the other princes be on his debt.

He is gathering force slowly but steadily, biding his time.

Unless he is killed, Arnaud will be First Prince of Procer eventually, probably not right after Cordelia, but after her successor. He is a smart, cold, and very patient man, after all.

Liliet

Not sure about the “everyone in Procer” part. Cordelia might just know what’s up with him.

But basically... yeah 😡

RanVor

I don’t think Rumena has enough narrative weight to get into a Pattern of Three with anybody.

Javvies

Hopefully not, but Rumena Tombmaker is something of a well respected iconic figure amongst the drow, and has the personal might to contend with Named on an even-ish field. Plus was personally acquainted with Sve Noc before they became Sve Noc.

It may not be particularly likely, but I don’t think we can completely rule it out.

Point is, I’d far rather see Rumena kill Saint or beat her ass like a drum than see Saint kill Rumena.

RanVor

Remember that a Pattern of Three can only happen between rivals.

Javvies

Saint might view Rumena as something of a rival due to being shut down hard and humiliated the way she was. Hard to say about Rumena, but it might (probably does, actually) consider Saint unfinished business.

Still, as I said, the main point is, I’d rather see Rumena kill Saint, or at least thoroughly beat her ass, instead of Saint killing or beating Rumena.

Kissaten

If they are rivals, they will get a draw now since last time Rumena got a win. And a draw now might mean that Saint won't be able to do whatever was expected of her in that plan of Grey Pilgrim.

Fayhem

From what I understand, Step 1 and Step 2 are required in order to solidify a Pattern of Three. In other words, if two rivals clash and one of them wins outright, it doesn't guarantee that the next time they meet it will be a draw. But if the next time they clash it is a draw, then it all but guarantees that the next time they meet whoever lost the first time has a guaranteed win (although as Cat has shown that can be subverted with the right planning, luck, and/or story mojo).

Which means that if Rumena can't win, it would actually be better for it to lose so long as the loss is nonfatal. Because Saint would be keen enough to turn a regular win into a lethal win, if she's got a story-guaranteed win there's almost no chance she wouldn't capitalize on that for an outright kill. I would consider it plausible that if Rumena can't finish off Saint then Cat plans to let it lose before she intervenes and saves Rumena's life to protect it from a draw that would solidify an unfavorable Pattern of Three. Hell, Rumena's cold-blooded and strategic enough it might actually agree to that in advance and lose on purpose if it can't win outright.

Fayhem

Forgot to add – IIRC, an extant/unresolved Pattern of Three also provides the participants with some story-based shielding against external parties. Since Cat definitely wants to keep the option of killing Saint on the table, I think she'd be keen to stop a draw between Rumena and Saint for that reason as well.

Euodiachloris

And, even if Saint thinks in the terms of rivalry, Rumena very much isn't. Cats don't view a pingpong ball as a rival, after all. Source of fun, yes. A challenge to get out from under the dresser, sure.

But only another cat can be a rival. Saint is cattle. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Good point.

IDKWhoitis

Only Catherine would create a field of death where Angels fear to tread.

I'm guessing that whoever reveals last, wins.

We have accounted for the Goblins, Traps, Drow, Lanterns, and 90% of the named on the Alliance side.

Only that sorcerer, Cat, and the Woe are hiding at the moment. And I have a feeling that Cat and that Sorcerer are in the same place.

Rumena Rumena Rumena Rumena Rumeana!

Cicero

The Ophanim are worried.

That pretty much sums it all up.

This is a stupid fight, everyone ought to be focused on the Dead King.

Clint

Even in the short term, they should all be worried about what Tyrant will do to whittle down their armies while they're fighting each other, and even more about what Heirarch will do to the peace talks after.

Neuromute

And remember that Rumena was still concerted to be only mid-tier in the Everdark.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, he is in charge only because he is the only competent drow general. The kabal trying to kill Catherine in Great Strycht was composed of even more powerful Drow.

Liliet

Not so sure. He did challenge the entire Longstrider Cabal in Everdark.

konstantinvoncarstein

I think I recall they said something about hunting him later. And they seemed not very worried by his boast.

thearpox23

They had the numbers on their side and worked very well together. So we can't conclude from their comments how powerful he was.

Liliet

I mean. He seemed not very worried about challenging them either. I don't think "worried" is an emotion drow ever express in these situations :3

shieldredblog

Mid tier amongst the Everdark's greatest Mighty. He was the ruler of a mid-sized city. I'd imagine only the few larger cities were home to greater mighty. My guess is he was in the top 20.

sengachi

Juniper: Worried that the Procerans have some counter for her having the equivalent of hundreds of Named and thousands of troops who are individually worth ten of the enemy.

Procerans: Worried that maybe the drow have night vision.

Liliet

God, everyone keeps misinterpreting this.

Pilgrim is the one with the counter, which most Princes and Princesses don't know about. Arnaud is playing at being the stupidest of them, and none of them actually seriously think the drow might not have night vision.

caoimhinh

1) What Lilliet said.

2) Juniper is doing the sensible thing: assuming their side isn't lucky. Pilgrim has a counter prepared, just that it probably won't be much effective, and Catherine also has a counter for that counter.

3) They aren't Named equivalent, they are equivalent to battle priests and warlocks. Only the strongest of the Sigil holders are mighty enough to be considered Named equivalent. But yeah, the Drow are going to beat up the Grand Alliance army. Hard.

RanVor

"the equivalent of HUNDREDS of Named". Sengachi obviously didn't mean all the Drow.

konstantinvoncarstein

In Great Lotow (not a particularly important city), Catherine fought one of the weakest sigil-holder and barely win. She said that William could have won only with a really good story. So practically speaking, any sigil-holder worth their salt would be a Named.

Liliet

This comparison is inaccurate, IMHO, on a very basic level. It's like comparing mages to priests, or siege engines to infantry: they're different things to begin with.

Named are empowered by the story and driven by the story. Their matchups are not determined by power level numbers, like, at all. There aren't any numbers that aren't subject to the dragon vs peasant with sword principle. Yes, power levels do come into it somewhat as part of the story, and that's what Catherine evaluated, but...

1 Named + 1 Named \neq 2x the power of Named. And while normally 1 rylleh + 1 rylleh = 2x the power of rylleh, there's no guarantee the math will hold against Named on the other side. Rule of Conservation of Ninjutsu is not something that works in drow vs drow fights, but once Named enter the picture, it very much starts working.

So the same story that would need to be very good for William to beat someone on the level of Mighty Urluk (or whatever its name was exactly), might, once it is, be also good enough for William to beat 100 people on the level of Mighty Urluk, too.

By "practically", I mean in term of firepower and destructive capabilities.

I totally agree with you, Named have Fate influencing their actions. But Mighties against non-Named is not the same thing. And story or not, a truly overwhelming firepower or number can tip the scale. As examples, we have all the heroes that Catherine and Black killed in Callow, and those who died attacking Keter.

Liliet

I mean, firepower and destructive capabilities differ from Named to Named to a ridiculous degree.

As for heroes vs Cat and Black, don't forget that they had quite a bit of a story at their own backs. And in Keter, too, the firepower factored into the story, not overwhelmed it. Stories bend, not break, unless people make choices incompatible with them.

Liliet

...all that aside, "how many non-Named can X or Y mow down" is a more fair comparison to make than "who will win between X and Y". And even then my point is that Named work differently enough than drow that it's still comparing '100' to 'the interval between 10 and 1000'

Dainpdf

It was then that Tariq knew that he had ducked up.

Also, nice to see Razil standing up there. Cat definitely saw potential in him. Now let's hope he doesn't become a pebble in her boot.

RoflCat

Yep, Rumena definitely pick up languages just to trashtalk all of his opponents.

I'm also 90% sure he can speak fluently, but is speaking this way just to add more savage touch to it.

sengachi

I mean when you're 3000+ years old and you've lived through a couple dozen linguistic shifts or so, I figure picking up new ones becomes just something you resign yourself to doing on an irregular basis. "Ah darnit, no one's getting my piercing witicisms anymore, time to brush up on whatever this new grammar is".

werafdsaew

Why would he bother to do that? Just find someone with that skill already and take it from him via Night harvest.

Valkyria

I bet it was just like shopping for him.

"Hmm... what to get today... seems my grammar is a little outdated... let's pick up some fresh vocabulary on the way home!"

sengachi

Rumena hears a youngster use a new slang term: "Oh, huh, is it time to go shopping for a new language package already? Hmm, I think I'll go for someone with a nice drawl this time."

superkeaton

"all was unfolding as he had foreseen."

Oh Pilgrim, Victory is never so in doubt as when it has been Prophesized.

sengachi

Tariq just walked face first into an "all is as I have foreseen" trope against an opponent who is shielded from his piercing gaze by divine aid, who is attempting to take her father's soul back from him and unify the land in a war against a great evil.

Hoo boy, our poor Pilgrim really has gone full villain narrative hasn't he?

caoimhinh

I agree with the extract from On Rule. There must be a clear purpose for war and it must be fought with sights on future peace, waging war just for the sake of it is stupidity and a wicked thing.

They are fighting two hours before dawn so it will be a race against time to beat the Alliance enough so they retreat before the Drow get weakened, unless the Well of Night (proposed tentative name) can actually delay dawn or prolong the time of Night strength for the Drow.

Heh, Rumena even knows a bit of Tradertalk? This Drow is on a quest to be able to trash talk and verbally burn people in every language, LMAO.

No, Pilgrim, NOTHING is going as you have foreseen; it is going as WE, the readers, have foreseen, which is you getting your ass kicked and slaughter for the Grand Alliance army.

The Angels have no vision in the Everdark, your Aspects can't see Sve Noc, you couldn't even detect Rumena when it was standing in front of you guarding Cat before it revealed itself to beat the Saint of Swords. What makes you think you can foresee what your patron Choir can't, Tariq?

Arrogance is the cause of fall for the mighty, be they Evil or Good.

This is gonna be awesome.

Valkyria

While it's true that there will be a race until dawn hits, it may be good to consider that when dawn comes, the legionairs will gain there sight back as well.

So it's likely the drow trying their hardest to get rid of as much enemy forces as possible (keeping in mind the limit of acceptable losses Cat set) and just before dawn they'll be called back and switched out for human fighting forces.

Even if the enemy isn't 100% certain of the _dawn is the limit_ thing, Cat and Juniper are so they will have measures in place to get the most out of this situation, should the fight really be dragged out until dawn.

caoimhinh

True, the Drow must now act as a tactical squad or a fast assault unit. Taking down as many enemies as possible before returning to the inside of the palisade. If dawn is in 2 hours, the Drow have about one and a half hours to act.

The problem would be that without the 50 thousand Drow, the Alliance army outnumberes the Army of Callow.

This is of course, if the Well of Night doesn't actually extend the duration of their effective time.

My expectation is that the Grand Alliance army will suffer thousands of casualties and call for a retreat.

Valkyria

I think it would've been nice to see how many casualties the Allience took in the last battle. They lost a ton of "special forces" and also a lot of skirmishers to the rituals, pits, goblins, etc.

Cat's side lost a few goblins and maybe a few knights? (not sure if you can just charge with cavalry without a single casualty though I expect them to be very small)

Would be intresting how much superior the Allience really is in numbers.

caoimhinh

The casualties should have been minimal. The alliance advanced slowly using their priests to find the traps and open a path in the northern army and using the binders and their constructs for the same in the southern army. We only got the casualties from the southern army, around 1000 soldiers and 30 binders. It seems like there wasn't much of a fight in the north either because Moro (who is from the northern army) mentioned that the range of the siege engines was suspected (not confirmed) so the northern army advance didn't reach the range of the siege engines during their previous fight, which also means that there were no legionaries dead. It seems Yannu halted them and ordered to fall back as soon as a safe path to the palisade was found.

AVR

300 binders. Robber got 30, then Abigail's 'playing the Dominion perfectly' with the goblins as hated bait got the rest.

No, there was 100 binders and half of the die

mavant

I am delighted by Rumena's dedication to self improvement.

Andrew Mitchell

So, a lot of us here have recognised Pilgrim's "everything is going as I have foreseen" as flagging that things AREN'T going to go the way he thinks. I'm cheering for that too, and I'll enjoy it when I see it.

I'd also like to point out an area that gives me cause to think he's still got a chance to realise his mistake in time to mitigate the looming CATastrophe. The closing sentence is what's worrying me:

"So why, Tariq wondered, were the Ophanim murmuring so worriedly in his ear?"

If Tariq REALLY thinks about this, it looks to me that he's got the chance to turn things around.

Valkyria

What I think about that is that the Pilgrim might be too focused on his way being the only right path. He believes himself in the right way more often than not and I think Cat's using that to blindside him.

I'm not saying he's stupid because, duh, he is not. None this stupid could stay alive this long.

IMO the Pilgrim is too deadlocked in his own Name and Role, too see the broader picture for exactly what it is.

Also, Cat's been a thorn in his side for quite some time now so no matter how much serene wise old mystery man he is, he is also bent on fitting her into his plans to make the world like it should be.

I'm saying that I'm not entirely sure that the Pilgrim hasn't lost a lot of reason focusing too much on a single stone in his way.

Andrew Mitchell

You may be right. I can't wait to see what happens.

caoimhinh

And still, he's screwed because he isn't supposed to enter the fray before Catherine does, but with the Drow kicking the Alliance army's collective ass he is going to have to reconsider his approach.

It might even be Tariq who calls for their armies to halt the attack and retreat (thus mitigating the damage from the CATastrophe), and maybe bet it all in his encounter with Catherine in Arcadia, which in turn will make the allied army's command to fall into Rozala's hands, given the repeated blunders of the Dominion lords' plans (I'm also guessing Yannu will die in this fight, although he is an interesting character).

Tom

Hoping for a Jindrich perspective in the next interlude 😊 though since the Saint and Pilgrim are both occupied I'm not sure he'll have anything to get really angry about... And there's no towers nearby to rip up and use as a mace either 😞 maybe Robber can help him come up with something.

konstantinvoncarstein

Who is Jindrich again?

shieldredblog

A drow famous for going berserk, being Rumena's main competition and essentially transforming into an armored giant. He was a tentative ally of Cats because he hated Rumena. Rumena mentioned he was the only other Drow that remembered the time before Sve Noc in their city, he was just a child then though.

As far as I know, he probably died when Winter went out of control. The only confirmed survivors of named Drow (as in we know their names not Named) are Ivah, The lord of Shallow Graves and Rumena I think?

Ultimate_procrastinator

If I recall correctly, we had a Jindrich perspective in the interlude when Cat rescued Abigail's army. He had a great deal of respect for Robber's ability to mouth off at everyone, and took Cat's advice on madmen making miracles very seriously.

shieldredblog

You are correct. I thought that was the Lord of Shallow Graves because he acted nothing like you'd expect from a berserker.

Apparently he is called Lord Soln, not sure how I mixed up those names.

I really hope we get some perspectives from the surviving Peerage.

caoimhinh

You really should go back and read those chapters again to check the Drow names, most are hard to remember since they aren't mentioned often.

Soln is a different Drow, one of the nine members of the Peerage that swore oaths to Catherine in Great Lotow, whereas Jindrich is (as was pointed by Ultimate_procrastinator above) the berserker that made an alliance with Cat when she was in Great Strycht and was the Drow POV we had in Interlude: Beheld I.

In case you are curious, according to Book 4 chapter 69, the nine original members of the Peerage are: Ivah, Soln, Slaus, Sagas, Nodoi, Vasyl, Losle, Zarkan, and Kanya. But others were added when she reached Great Strycht and some died during the battles there.

sutortyrannus

He's alive and raging – his POV was part of the Catherine taking the turtles through the fire at Sarcellla.

caoimhinh

And he is absolutely loyal to Cat because she is FUN (First Under the Night) XD

Lkojk

Only after reading your comment did I realize that First Under the Night is FUN.
Really suits Cat as she's short, or should I say Fun sized.

Cold Cyberia

Surprised nobody mentioned this but the chapter title is the reference to the last line in The Girl Who Climbed The Tower: trust is the wager that takes your life.

Might refer to the armies in general since both put their trust in their leaders. I was thinking it could also be Pilgrim and his dependence on Ophanim but his significance to Levant makes it unlikely he will be killed. Probably not Cat, dying the fourth time would be in poor taste.

RanVor

I wondered which song it is from, but forgot to ask.

Thank you.

caoimhinh

Thanks!

So we have one from The Tyranny of the Sun (West, ever pursuing), one from In Dread Crowned (Graves we have yet to fill), and now one from The Girl Who Climbed The Tower (Trust is the wager).

Which song would be next? Maybe the Chant of the Dead, that old Kharsum song? If so, then the chapter is likely to be called 'Come to Die'. Hmm, ominous.

Mental Mouse

Or "Lest Dawn Fail", which would be ominous for the Procerans.

Liliet

We've already had one named that, we're most definitely not going to have a redux here without a stronger thematic tie. It'd be another line from the song.

Bhale

Okay, so my guess is Pilgrim is trying to bait the drow out. That's why he chose to fight over the night so the drow would feel overconfident and head out. Then, when they're all good and engaged, he makes the sun to weaken them and attacks with priests and Lanterns. He probably isn't accounting the well that's been made to counter the sun.

Second, as much as I'm looking forward to the fight between Rumena and Saint, I don't think Rumena will win it. Either he's not gonna try or he will but won't succeed. Catherine has been praying every night to the staff that isn't the staff but a sword, and sword that isn't the sword but a prayer, all to kill Saint. I doubt that action will just fall through. Unless Rumena has her staff.

konstantinvoncarstein

It will probably end in a draw, or he will retreat to let Catherine handle it.

And what could the staff do? A super-Night-death-ray seems a bit too unoriginal to me.

Jason Ipswitch

My guess is that it's going to be enough of an obvious super-potent sword and/or metaphysical weapon to get Saint to try her usual headlong "I kill it /I cut it" tactic, when will in turn end up feeding her directly to Sve Noc. Forewarned and prepared, the goddesses who ascended with Night and devoured Winter will finish Saint utterly before she even knows what's happening, and give her a fate far beyond Pilgrim's ability to resurrect her from.

Euodiachloris

"Oh, look! Another Demense that fits both of our current ones like a glove. All pretty and served up in a gift basket, too! You shouldn't have! No, really: big mistake."

Douglas Johnston

She mentioned that shes using miracles for support instead of attack now, right? Maybe she's using it to buff Rumena for his fight with Saint

Andrew Mitchell

Nah, that does not feel right to me. I'm pretty sure she's going to wield the swordprayerstaff herself.

Agent J

Honestly, that prayerswordstaff is way too epic to waste on Saint. I mean, when Kairos asked Cat who it was meant for, how do you think he'd have reacted if she said it was to rid herself of some low grade bully? Disappointed, I say.

I hope Rumena kills the dim brute and Cat gets to use her sword on the god they dug out of the lake instead. Let her earn the epithet "the Godbutcher". Much better than "the Saintslayer".

Catherine Fucking Foundling, the Black Queen of Callow, the Arch-Heretic in the East, the First Under the Night, the Lakeomancer, the Godbutcher.

Why yes, that is her legal middle name.

Lkojk

Wouldn't it be Godslayer?

Andrew Mitchell

Love it!

Valkyria

I can't keep the image out of my head since that Princess said it:

Guys, it is too good to be true, I am waiting to find another shoe to drop. There is no way Cat will just... Win?

Andrew Mitchell

The other shoe will drop, for sure. Cat's never had an easy win and this one will be hard-fought as well.

TeK

But it all seems as though it will be easy, which feels me with dread at what's to come.

TeK

Also, I don't want Saint to die. She is not a good person, but she still better taking swing at DK.

Draconic

This chapter reminds me of the song, Lest Dawn Fail. Because I seriously suspect that the dawn Yannu Marave is waiting for, might fail to arrive...

erebus42

Awsome, and as always the procerans are such pricks. They really should be grateful for the Empire because without it they'd probably be the ones getting saddled with all the villainous roles.

Aotrs Commander

So, remind me in any other context where the leaders of one side are all law-aiding and professional and the other are fractious, argumentive and playing for power who will kill each other for honour duels (LITERALLY in the middle of a major battle engagement, the lull between day and night clash is still the same battle), which one would be wearing the white hat...?

'Cos I don't think in any other context, it's the latter...

Aotrs Commander

Oh yeah, also... What part of "night attack" includes "hey, let's light ourselves up so that we can see, so that even the HUMANS who do't have night vision have a load of nicely lit silhouettes to shoot at!"

The point of a night attack is to NOT BE SEEN while you creep up on the enemy. Giving away you're making a night attack by stomping in with all the light sources (highlight your clerics for sniper fire, no really, that can't possible go wrong) is defeating the ENTIRE POINT.

LICHEMASTER, these people are stupid.

shieldredblog

It would be an amazing move if they just focused the light like flashlights at the people on the palisade. Blinding and revealing the defenders.

Liliet

I mean they kind of high key had 0 chance of that and knew it, because of goblins.

And another point of night attack is to have the other army SLEEPING while you're doing it.

Mental Mouse

Also, Named apparently get night vision for free, but there's gotta be a spell for that.

shieldredblog

My bet is the priests are going to try and summon dawn like an hour early. They will have limited power without the pilgrim so they can't be too ambitious in their miracle.

This will be easily undone by their Well of Night, forcing the Pilgrim to throw his weight in behind the miracle to save their army.

This will let Cat pull off whatever shenanigans shes aiming for. Then Portal f*ckery will occur and reset the board.

Xinci

Truly what a waste, Akil could have been just as important as saint for actually locking away Dead King.

A weakpoint of the Blood system vs the Night definitely seems to be conservation of the power potentially lost in internal strife. They can bind their enemies but every Levantine death weakens their system(Even if strife does give some form of offering to the Gods Above which may help the Levantines or Good's greater system).

Interesting that Rumena went against Saint alone I would think a pack of Drow in the dark would work better but the Longstriders are unfortunately dead or depowered. I do suppose they aren't supposed to kill her so fair's fair.

Was still nice to see the Levantines in battle. Though specialized and thus fragile alone they could be so much better together. Like a heroic band but with each member an army, working like limbs for their goal. It's really too bad that kind of story isn't around at the moment.

So the Lanterns and Priest probably were informed or felt the changes in Creation due to the Night at some point and were holding meetings over it. So I wonder if those orbs of light will effect Drow negatively or they will use other tricks. Also interesting to see the Lanterns' tricks. Did they learn after their previous "hunt" and adapt similar tactics from the Light?

Dresden 67

Er, Akil wasn't Named.

He was a moderately powerful mage and a talented binder.

He wouldn't have lasted five seconds against the Dead King.

Xinci

The most powerful, experienced and influential binder of souls. Didn't matter if he was Named. He would be invaluable for sectioning off and imprisoning the parts of the Dead King's soul Saint cuts off.

nineran

Akua is/was the most powerful Binder about. That's literally what the Diabolist does.

Xinci

Somewhat, as her ability to bind kind of relies on her being in a position of power. Diabolist make deals, contracts and bindings but not like a Binder. Diabolist doesn't deal with keeping souls whole. Not mentioning some of the issues with using her like that while cooperating with the Alliance.

Daniel E

All this discussion about Story coming to a head between Black Queen & Gray Pilgrim got me thinking: Isn't the original wager between Above & Below about the degree to which mortals should be ruled? Above favors a hands-off guidance approach, while Below thinks they need 'direct supervision', as it were. I wonder if the Pantheon is subject to the 'grooves in the road of fate creating Roles/Names' principle. Like the purpose of the original bet has been lost to the eons, and now they are simply vying for traditional Good & Evil principles.

Javvies

You've got that almost exactly opposite.

Above is order, blind unquestioning obedience to their directives.

Below is meh, do whatever you want, as long as you can deal with the consequences.

Daniel E

That sounds typically right, but the prologue isn't so clear: "The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made. So, we are told, were born Good and Evil.". Based on this, it seems that Above wants to encourage mortals to evolve naturally (guidance), while Below wants strict adherence (rule).

Javvies

The point of the prologue is ambiguity.

Nobody has clean hands or a monopoly on rightness or on good or evil.

The labels are just PR. And the guys who actively direct their agents in a loosely concerted strategy have better PR than the ones who don't care about what those who follow their beliefs do or how they follow their beliefs.

The Heavens have demonstrated that they require their selected Named obey their directives, and if you're linked to a Choir, you're liable to be micromanaged in pursuit of their interests.

Below doesn't micromanage their Named. Below gets reached out to be people, they don't force their message or influence on people.

Kissaten

Above wants to rule, therefore they get to decide what's called what, even before the battle's done. They are the Good guys, their enemies are Evil guys, and we know who always wins.

Below doesn't care for names, they let their champions to strive for whatever greatness they want, be it Massacre, Irritant or Benevolent. So they get to be the losing side, but oh how glorious their loss would be.

Euodiachloris

Something to keep in mind: while both Above and Below were sitting back and waiting for the drow to implode/ get wrecked by the neighbours... The sisters were trying to turn into hands-on, ruling, local, fuck-up-reversing goddesses.

In short, Below peaced out because turning Godkinglet to shake one's fist at the heavens before your fantasmagorical end (however long that takes) might be their thing, but just sucking at "self-cannibalising survival, governance and generally trying to steer clear of others until the books get balanced" ain't. Yet Above didn't adopt them, mainly because they didn't try to redeem themselves using the correct obsequious paperwork... Which likely nobody thought to tempt them with. Because Evil is Evil is Evil and Good doesn't negotiate with... well, anybody. 😊

shieldredblog

Look to their servants, nations and the names that serve them to see the nature of Above and Below.

Above: Kings who rule by divine decree or inheritance and Priests who deny other powers and return things to normal. Angels that control people. Good nations are all about humans being judged by gods and knowing their place. Peasants and kings till you die and your children assume your role.

Below: Tyrants that seize power and Warlocks that unlock secrets. Demons are dangerous tools who only come when summoned, not meddlers like Angels. Evil Nation's are all about people judging each other, either through voting or meritocracy.

Liliet

Above thinks mortals need guidance and a rule system; Below thinks mortals need to fight it out and whoever wins rules.

StarlightGlimmer

Good must lose to Evil at first before Good finally triumphs. The earlier Evil defeats good, the less unnecessary suffering. And I hate unnecessary suffering.

kotekj

So, this was bothering me since the meeting with GP... but he's trying to force Cat into a story of 3, yes?... can't Rum and SoS supercede that? If Rum forces a draw here, as his "win" against her earlier wouldn't that supercede Cat and GPs and render it null?

Andrew Mitchell

Probably not IMO. For a couple of reasons.

1. There are factors that may be a barrier to Rumera and the Saint establishing a story pattern. There's the question of whether Drow can actually be a major actor in a story given they haven't interacted with the rest of creation for so long they may not have worn any grooves in creation to fit a story. In addition, some commenters have mentioned that there needs to be a rivalry for a pattern of three an questioned whether Drow can actually have that rivalry with "cattle".

2. If Rumera and the Saint do get into a pattern of three that would be their own story and I think that means it's separate to and different from the pattern between Cat and the Grey Pilgrim.

Snowfire1224

Yay, I'm caught up again.

No update yet?

More interlude..

Andrew Mitchell

These Interludes have been moving the plot along just as well as a Chapter would have IMO.

Liliet

Seriously.

Aston

Seriously looking forward to a new update?

Yes we are.

Interludes are understandable.

Andrew Mitchell

Not just understandable but, I would argue, in fact they are an essential element of EE's story-telling. When I try to imagine what this story would be like without the POV's of Hakram, Vivienne, Juniper, Cordelia, Tariq, etc. I see a story I would have stopped reading a long time ago.

Liliet

Interludes that show major battles from the POVs of other players than Catherine whose plan is unfolding beat by beat are the BEST thing in Guide.

Sturmii

The last sentence put the picture of cat and the pilgrim playing chess, like the old AoE2 intro

Interlude: Death They Cannot Steal

"Ah, the classic imperial dilemma: which caused the other, the rebellion or the tiger pit?"

– Dread Emperor Callous

There were two kinds of horror to be found in war, Razin Tanja had learned.

The first he had met and fought in the streets of shadowed Sarcella, the dark dismay of loss being dealt by the hand of a surpassing foe. Even outnumbered and ambushed, thrust into the backfoot, the Army of Callow had snapped out with jaws of steel and turned what should have been a dazzling victory into a brutal and exhausting slog of death. The heir to Malaga had seen that same skill put to work tonight, when the foot of the Grand Alliance had tried the enemy's fortifications. Volleys from myriad engines of war scything through warriors of Levant and Procer alike, long darts skewering even the most heavily armoured of soldiers. Worse than those had been the stones of the trebuchets, whose frightful nature lied not in the first impact but in the skill of the engineers using it: most the time, the angle let the massive stones bounce and keep rolling, crushing ten times the warriors even the best-aimed of collisions would have reached. No, this Razin had all watched from atop his horse with clenched fingers and clenched jaw but he would not dishonour the bravery of the dead by mourning the necessity of their deaths. They had known, these warriors, what it meant to charge a position held by the armies of the Black Queen. That no one of the first wave would ever make it to the palisade, and likely none of the second either.

They'd come forward anyway, though. Captains of Tartessos and Malaga first, and the pride of that last one had choked him for those armsmen had fought the Black Queen's own favoured army before, they understood exactly what awaited yet they'd come forward without flinching, without hesitation. Both Lady Aquiline and he had swallowed unkind words on the subject of Proceran courage when they'd found the commanders of their Proceran allies gambling over which of theirs would take the lead, taking it as attempt to pass off the duty. It was good that he had kept his tongue from wagging, though, for he learned moments later he'd had the wrong of it. They had all volunteered, every last one. The officers, men and women from half a dozen principalities, had turned to the dice to settle the matter for none was willing to concede the honour of the vanguard to another. Arlesites, Lady Aquiline had murmured in an aside to him, praise and condemnation both. These were of the same breed of soldiery that'd once invaded Levant in a relentless tide of butchery. But the two of them, one of the Slayer's Blood and the other of Binder's Blood, could understand looking at these people why Levant had been taken at all. Why their forbears had been needed, to humble an empire that could boast soldiers like those. Razin was certain he'd caught one of them – a tanned woman of southern stock, not even thirty but already high officer with a face that was a ruin of scars – cheating at the dice game used to determine who would lead.

It was such a small detail, he thought, and yet as he watched the horror ahead he could not help but fixate on it. That woman had gone as far as using loaded dice to claim the honour, and now she might very well be dead. To the second kind of horror, the hateful one. The dreadful, animal fright that came from witnessing something so far beyond you it could not be fought. Couldn't be bargained with, or even fled. All that was left was to kneel and pray, to hope for its own reasons it would deign to spare your life. Razin had known that terror once before, truth be told. It had watched him from a river's bank, wreathed in shade and might, and judged him with cold eyes. There had been no doubt, in that gaze, that his life could be snuffed out with a thought. No fear that the hatred burning in his blood could ever be a peril worth regard. No, in that moment that was the wake of death, the air still filled with the screams of the drowning, the Black Queen had for her own unfathomable reasons decided to spare Razin Tanja's life. The heir to Malaga had clung to that, while his father took the Blood's Scourge to his back, for what earthly torment could be half as shameful as the knowledge the greatest villain of their age had not found him worth killing?

Yet it was of that woman whose name he'd never learned cheating at dice Razin thought of, when the drow unleashed their malevolent works, and not of the frightful Queen of Callow. For a heartbeat it had seemed like the assault on the palisade would be a siege as that kind of battle was known to them: harsh and costly, but not beyond victory. Then the devils of the Everdark had struck, and not from the palisade. The drow did not sally out like warbands or armies. Instead they rose from the shadows among the ranks of the Grand Alliance's warriors, and without warning or mercy they began to slaughter. There could be no other word for it than that, Razin thought. There were not so many of the enemy, perhaps a mere hundred, but they were tearing through warriors like an axe through kindling. Darkness rose in shapes and armaments, rained from above and swept from below, a hundred different sorceries for a hundred different drow, but whatever the singular craft each was an exquisite art of war. Polished and without flaw, for even when dozens and even hundreds charged at the enemy all that changed was the number of corpses made. Within the first quarter of an hour, Razin Tanja thought, almost two thousand warriors must have died. Not, not died.

Been swatted out of existence, like bothersome insects.

That quarter of an hour was what it took for the Grand Alliance's answer to be brought to the fore, and all Razin could think was that it was a quarter hour too late. The sight should have moved him, and he could feel the sharp breaths and fervent prayers of those awed by the sight, but even as a scattered line of priests opened shuttered lanterns the sight of that casual slaughter stayed with him. And with the worry of how easily they could return to such horror, should their answer fail. It didn't, Razin saw with relief. No, instead across the entire strip of night where the golden Light kept within the lanterns was revealed the drow flinched. Their strange sorceries weakened, lessened in scope if far from broken, and the Dominion of Levant began its counterattack. Slayers, the tempestuous retinue of the Lady of Tartessos, strode forward. Fewer than five hundred, all in light leathers and bearing the sharp tools of their trade and their ghastly face-tattoos of green and bronze. The Silent Slayer's own colours, and those of her Blood after her. Above perhaps all others, the slayers of Tartessos espoused the most ancient and honoured tradition of Levant: the killing of monsters.

Even as the deathly gifts of the Praesi engines kept raining down on the advancing warriors, the beast-killers spread out in bands and began plying their trade on the darkness-wielding drow. Razin's fingers had begun to loosen, though they tightened again when one of the enemy's trebuchet stones landed far beyond what should be possible. Then out of the spray of earth and snow came blood-chilling laughter, and massive figure wearing a carapace of darkness strode out. It batted the head off a soldier almost casually, and without missing a beat began tearing through the centre of the army's lines. This would break them, Razin realized, mind racing as he saw what would follow. Lantern-bearing priests retreating to weaken the monstrous drow, only to leave a hole in the line at the front that the lesser monsters would take advantage of. After that the slaughter would resume, and...

"Captain Elvera," Lady Aquiline calmly said, turning to her second. "You have command."

"My lady," the old woman said, "you cannot mean-"

Aquiline Osená removed a lantern from the saddlebag at her side, and hooked it on her belt without opening it. There would be Light within, Razin decided.

"I am of the Silent Slayer's Blood," Lady Aquiline replied. "I cannot mean otherwise, Elvera."

Foolish, Razin thought, for she was not just a fleet-footed slayer but the commander of this entire host. Still, Aquiline's line was not one known for wits. All the founders had granted different gifts to their Blood, Akil Tanja had once told his son. Valour for the Champion, cunning for the Brigand, skill for the Slayer, wisdom for the Pilgrim – and that grandest of bestowals for the Binder's own, that privilege known as knowledge. Or so the heir to Malaga thought, until he caught the high esteem all of Aquiline Osená's captains were not watching her with. They not only approved, Razin realized, but they had expected it. Let neither queen nor prince rule over our dominion, Farah Isbili had once said. The second of the Holy Seljun, and first true ruler of Levant, for her father had not lived to reign for long. For while crown devour honour, one's blood is not so easily gainsaid. Razin had been raised to understand this as the truth of blood being the true nobility of Creation, what set apart the wheat from the chaff. In having a past to measure up to, a litany of deeds, the great families of Levant were made worthy to rule. They must prove this worth anew with every generation, true, but they always did for blood was not so easily gainsaid. Yet now Razin thought of a woman who'd cheated at dice to earn the privilege of being among the first to die and wondered.

Would you be proud of us, Honoured Ancestor? the heir to Malaga silently asked the night sky. Of the works of my father, of his father before him and his mother before that. Will you be proud of mine, you who stared down an empire with nothing but death and indignation tattooed on your back? He thought of the legends he'd been raised to, of the five heroes who'd snapped the arrogance of Procer over their knee. He thought of that day's own council, of Yannu Marave's blade opening Father's throat and the vicious barbs traded by the others. Would any of them truly be proud, Razin wondered, of what the Dominion had become?

"Captain Fustan," he said. "I give you command in my stead."

The bearded man, most respected of his father's captains, looked at him in surprise. So did Lady Aquiline.

"Your intent, Tanja?" she asked.

Razin inclined his head towards the dark-clad creature in the distance, scything through men like a sickle through wheat.

"It took five to topple an empire, Osená," he simply replied. "Two ought to be enough for a single drow, no?"

No, he echoed in his own mind. They would not be proud, not a single one of them.

That creature, Laurence de Montfort mused, was going to take a lot of killing.

"Bring out your weapon," the Saint of Swords said. "I'll even let you, to even things out."

A lie, that. She fully intended on sending the drow's head rolling on the ground if it got even slightly distracted. She spoke the untruth without hesitation, for she'd never been encumbered with the delusions of fair play that plagued some of her peers. The moment you bared a blade on someone with the intent to kill, there was nothing else left to consider. Honour was just a way to pat yourself on the back, a pretty face put on the ugliest of all weaknesses: uncertainty. Her opponent face creased with amusement when it bared its teeth, putting in relief the painted stripes of ochre and gold radiating from its lips.

"Why would I need one?" it spoke in guttural Chantant. "Children are disciplined by hand."

The Saint looked into the thing's silver-blue eyes and recognized the glint within. It had fury waking up her blood. She'd last seen it on that woman's face, when she'd glanced at Laurence's spilling entrails and sighed without even bothering to say a word. Is that all, the glint whispered. Is this the sum of you? It was the gaze of something ancient and fearsome taking it the brief glow of a firefly before it died, only to dismiss it as of only passing interest. She was going to enjoy cutting this one very much, Laurence admitted to herself. Without another word, the Saint of Swords struck. Two steps forward, half-step to the side, her entire withered frame coiling to put full weight behind the blow at the end. But the drow, this Rumena, it moved just as swiftly as her.

Its hand slapped the side of her blade, and it spun low – Laurence, without missing a beat, leapt up. The open palm that would have slapped her knee passed through only void, and she twisted so she could angle her body in midair and strike once more. Instead of having its skull split in two, the creature dropped even lower and waited a beat for the tip of the sword to pass it. None of that, the Saint thought, and this was not the first time she was tasked with killing something with better reflexes than her. The slightest piece of her Name's power had her kicking at air with enough strength for her swing to swing back just as Rumena began to rise, the drow immediately sinking into a puddle of shadow and vanishing from under her. It rose again half a dozen feet from Laurence, just as she landed lightly in her feet.

In the distance, its fellow abominations were singing its name. Behind her, the Saint's crusaders were opening lanterns filled with golden Light. Neither of them paid any heed to the audience, for they mattered less than dust.

"Have your godlings taught you anything but how to flee?" Laurence mildly asked.

"Your pale idols are worse than wrong," Rumena replied just as mildly. "They are prey."

They'd gotten the measure of their opponent with the first pass, so there was no caution in how they began the second. The drow foot tapped the ground, once, and beneath the Saint the ground blew up. She was already in the air when it did, leaping forward, and over what felt like hours but took less than a heartbeat she sunk into her aspect. Listen, she thought, and the word reverberated through her. And she did, the same way she had when straddling the line between life and death all those years ago. Hearing the Ranger's footsteps as she walked away, and only then understanding how deaf she had been all her life. Moving against the rhythm of Creation, when she should have been moving with it. The Saint of Swords pricked her ear, and heard the dissonant cacophony of the drow striking at her.

She moved with purpose. A flick of the wrist created a wound for her to push off of, angling her descent so Rumena's extended hand would pass her flank, then another to take the arm off before the shoulder and even as it drew back – quick, strident tempo – she leaned forward so the next stroke would slice neatly through the neck. The head tumbled on the ground half a heartbeat before she landed, but she did not sheathe her sword. There had been no silence, no precipitous fall. The drow was not dead. A wild, discordant slide, like a fiddle being struck, and the Saint was almost too slow. A prick against her shoulder, like the touch of a needle, and through that fine vessel she felt a sea of death and decay. Millennia of red slaughter and careless rot made into a gnawing bite. Laurence's blade cut through just enough skin for blood to gush out, and just in time. Even half an instant later and her entire body would have become a pile of blight and bile.

She took the drow's eye on the backswing, for its impertinence in trying an ambush on her. Carved through the insolent blue stare with relish, and smiled as the roiling darkness in Rumena's socket failed to heal her cut.

"Careless," the drow smiled.

The song hacked out a tempo like crows cawing, and before Laurence could move the air in her lungs turned to acid.

Ten of them, armed and readied and bearing a golden lantern, struck at the beast.

Seven slayers, a binder and two of the Blood. Not even drakes and manticores could have lightly ignored such a war party, but the darkness-clad drow tall as an ogre moved like lightning and struck like thunder. Razin's sword was in his hand, his breath steady, and as his binder baited their foe he waited for his moment. A screaming salamander made of starlight and snow screamed at the enemy, and within a heartbeat its large head had been dispersed by a massive fist. The darkness-clad arm went straight through and hit the ground, which was the signal. Lady Aquiline opened the shutter and the golden Light touched the enemy. It screamed in pain, and its carapace visibly thinned. The slayers moved, then, feet whispering against the snow. One, two, three – the harpoons tore through the weakened darkness, giving solid purchase to the long ropes tied to them. In woodlands like the Brocelian, Razin knew, these would be fastened to trees to trap the hunted beast and restrict its movements. Open grounds like these, though, required different tactics. All three slayers pulled at the arm, to trip the creature forward, while the remaining four smoothly split into pairs and moved to flank it.

"Attack," Razin ordered his binder, gauging the time to be right.

The woman gave no sign she'd heard him, but her horse whinnied in fright and cold and the bound soul of the salamander dispersed, slithering back to the tattoo it was bound to. The sorcery was replaced by an arrow-like burst of translucent magic that flew for the drow's head, leaving the darkness shuddering on impact. Even where he was seated, the heir to Malaga felt a ripple go over his skin. He wondered how many thundering roars had been stitched together, to make that curse. Whatever the number, the spell distracted the drow even as it was beginning to recover from its surprise. The rope-holding slayers dragged it down and forward, and then the others struck on the exposed flanks. Long barbed spears were thrust into the sides and cracked through the carapace. The drow screamed again and without needing to be ordered the binder tossed at it a blinding orb – sunlight caught and woven. Sniffing a kill, the slayers on the sides unsheathed their straight long sword and prepared for killing blows.

With a deafening wail the drow's carapace of darkness detonated outwards.

Razin paled as he saw what the wave of sorcery had wrought: the four slayers who'd been closest were half-gone. Their leathers and armaments untouched, but flesh and bone outright evaporated where the drow's darkness had touched them. A grey-skinned silhouetted landed in the snow, harpoons still in its arm, and fresh darkness bubble out of its skin as it laughed. Blood cooling, Razin Tanja sheathed his blade and dismounted. From his horses' side he claimed three long knives, which he hooked to his belt, and a small orb of ivory. The binder glanced at him, face tainted with worry at the way their hunt had turned debacle in the span of a single breath.

"Distract it when you can," Razin simply said.

He rolled his shoulder – still tender from goblin steel – and approached at a measured pace. The remaining three slayers were struggling to bring down the creature before its armour-like darkness could be formed anew, two abandoning their rope for barbed javelins to be thrown. The drow snapped out to catch one with its teeth, breaking the steel tip with a loud crunch before spitting out the remains, and the other javelin went straight through. Or so it seemed, for it never emerged on the other side. A heartbeat later it was spat back out the drow's chest headfirst and took the slayer who'd thrown it right in the eye. Razin winced at the sight.

"Ready, Tanja?" a voice spoke at his side.

The heir to Malaga glanced there and his brow rose. Aquiline Osenia wore no mail not plate, only a tanned vest of leather going up to her throat. Trousers of thick dark linen with small plates of steel sown on went down into good leather boots, though it was not the clothes or even the slayer armaments on her back that were the most striking part of the ensemble. Beautiful patterns of green and bronze war paint covered not only her face but every inch of her skin. Lady Aquiline looked half a fae, though one born for the hunt. Razin calmly unsheathed his sword.

"Shall we, Osen?" he shrugged.

The barest trace of a smile touched her lips.

"Let's," she agreed.

The drow roared, and under the golden Light of the lantern they advanced.

Laurence de Montfort stumbled.

She fell to her knees, hands trembling, as she began choking on the acid filling her lung while it burned her from the inside. Her sword slipped her fingers, and Rumena smoothly closed the distance. Its sound in the song was too light, the Saint thought. It was another fake, like the one she'd killed earlier. What a cautious bastard. Mind sharpening through the atrocious pain she was in, the Saint of Swords joined her will to the current of Creation. Decree, act and outcome in the same word. Tariq had told her this was a domain, once, but he did not understand it like she did. It was simply her own faith, a tenet made absolute and so perfectly harmonized with Creation. She had decreed that 'Laurence de Montfort is a sword', and so she was. It'd taken her decades, to make this as true a part of her as flesh and breath, but in the far north fighting the rattlings she had shaped that decree so that it covered every part of what she was. She could have decreed more, she knew, other rules and laws, but the purity of a single truth would have been lost.

A sword did not need to breathe, neither did Laurence de Montfort.

A sword did not burn or dissolve, neither did Laurence de Montfort.

But a sword cut, and so did Laurence de Montfort.

The shadow-thing that the drow had sent to approach her was split in two by a finger and she rose with her fingers steady and holding her sword. What had once been within her was gone, for it no longer aligned with the decreed truth of Creation, and as it had never been there no wounds were taken. Standing in front of her, hands folded within sleeves, the painted drow waited patiently. The eye she'd cut out was growing back – it'd ripped out the wounded flesh so it would, the song told her.

"Come, drow," the Saint of Swords said. "Let's see if your faith is strong enough even I cannot cut it."

"Come," Rumena replied, "before one of us dies of old age."

Razin's knife slid uselessly against the dark obsidian-like carapace, failing to find purchase even after the third time he stabbed at it. The drow beneath shook him off effortlessly, not even paying attention, and the dark-haired warrior only half-succeeded at landing on his feet: he fell backwards after touching the ground, cursing, and the only thing that saved his life was that without a pause he rolled to the side. A bladelike appendage punctured where he'd been a moment earlier, leaving a smoking hole in the ground.

"The eyes," Aquiline yelled. "Aim for the eyes."

She was not speaking to him but to their binder, who tossed a bolt of hazy heat close enough to the drow's eyes that it drew back. Razin rose to his feet, rolling his still-tended shoulder to limber it. What had once been a humanoid carapace silhouette in a carapace, if a large one, had since grown into something rather more monstrous. Two crablike legs made of a strange hardened darkness not unlike obsidian now held up an armoured torso of the same, while what had once been arms had turned to something reminiscent of an insect. Like a mantis, Razin thought, and damnably quick. Of the three harpoons that had first stuck the drow, only two now remained though with the way it has shifted they now protruded from its shoulder instead of arm.

Aquiline Osená ran across the snow, a flicker of fluid movement and even as the drow struck out she caught the end of a rope in hand. Slayer, silent-sworn, he thought. Moonlight and miracle's cast caught on her clenching arm, painted bronze and green, as she tugged at the monster and threw a barbed javelin at its eye. Grace and terror, peerless in hunt, Razin remembered from the Anthem of Smoke, and the sight was as burned into his eye. It had not occurred to him, until then to find beauty in either the act or the woman. Now he could not unsee it, and something in him trembled at the knowledge. The javelin caught the corner of the drow's eye, and it screamed in pain, but there was a cry — the last of the remaining slayers was torn through, and thrown at Aquiline. The rope slipped her grip, and Razin began moving without thought. The lantern had fallen off her belt so he tossed his knife aside and snatched it up even as she rose to her feet behind him.

"Take the kill," he called out as he passed her.

The drow's obsidian eyes turned to him and it struck without hesitation, bladed limb tearing at the ground as Razin laughed and danced to the side. No binder he, even if the Binder's Blood, but he had spent hours in the training yards to make up for that shame. Now those hours were sparing his life. It leaned forward to strike again, and this time they were so close there could be no true avoidance – the drow ripped through bone and shoulder flesh, but the heir to Malaga had avoided just enough to...

"Honour to the Blood," Razin Tanja hissed, and smashed the Light-bearing lantern in its face.

A heartbeat later, Lady Aquiline's sword went straight through the heart of the flare of light as she screamed a war cry, and wet black blood sprayed on Razin's face. The creature fell back, its darkness collapsing on the snow to reveal a slumping corpse with a sword through the forehead, and the lord and lady fell exhausted on their knees to each other's side.

"Lady Aquiline," he greeted her. "You made a good kill."

"We, Lord Razin," she replied, eyes hooded. "We made a good kill."

The look shared overshadowed even the bleeding pain of his shoulder, for a moment, but it turned to horror when with a wet squelch the drow's body began to heal and spat out the sword. It began to rise, as did they, but it paused as if struck

Far above them all, light had begun to bloom.

It was time.

The Grey Pilgrim could feel it: if he acted now it would be an intervention safeguarding those in his charge. Sitting with his eyes closed, he could still feel the growing weight on his shoulders. The vigor – always sweet, always passing – of a younger man filling his body. The writ of this had not been offered to him by the Choir, it was no tragedy unfolding caught by Mercy's myriad eyes and made known to his own. This tale had been of his own making from beginning and it would still be that when the end came, Gods forgive him for it. With every death the burden on his Role, the stakes of his existence in this story, had increased. Now, though his spirit felt like a spine on the eve of cracking, he had the necessary reach. It was a bitter irony that the deaths of soldiers had been the balance's harsh swing in his favour yet the true burden he must bear had been of no consequence at all. Catherine Foundling had given the slip to every story that could bind her to an ending, and so left herself only one path: reign eternal, consumed and consuming, a herald of long prices and hard measures having made mantle of the woes of Creation.

The Black Queen had wriggled out of every binding and shackles, broken the sole irons he'd once set around her wrists. No redemption could be demanded by one who had forsaken her, not even for a greater good, and the broken oaths between them were yet another finger on the scales. Not so heavy, he knew, that it would doom him. But she'd be always a little luckier, a little harder to reach so long as that imbalance stood. In a less dangerous villain that would be merely inconvenient, but this one? She'd always had an astonishing intuition in those matters, and whatever else the Everdark had made of her it had also made her cautious. Patient enough to take a step back and let others take the lead if it meant offering fewer openings to foes like the Pilgrim.

"I wish that you had answers for me," he said. "That you knew whether in my efforts to prevent our doom I am forging the very instrument of it."

The Ophanim murmured in his ear, mournfully contrite. Before, in Callow, the Choir of Mercy had been able to see through the skein of her. Where threads may lead, choices that may or may not be. And with his own eyes, his sight of what moved the Queen of Callow, together they had considered what she might yet become. Now, though? There were entities at her shoulders that did not brook such perusals. And what entities they were, colossal towers of misery and murder stitched together with prayers to Below. Goddesses of wails and horror, swimming in a shadowy sea of their own kind's blood. The Black Queen had clasped hands with these abominations, and from what he could tell done so willingly. Knowing what he knew, not knowing what he did not, what choice was there but the ugly business of this night? If there was even a single chance that Catherine Foundling would be the keystone to the death of Calernia, Tariq must ensure it would not come to be. And so now Tariq was forced to countenance this hour of barren deaths, lest a thousandfold worse might be allowed to pass.

The Grey Pilgrim opened his eyes, looking up at the darkness before the dawn.

"We have sung together before, old friends," he softly said. "Will you sing with me, once more?"

Murmurs, worried.

"I will not die," he reminded them. "It will hurt me, this is true."

His gaze moved ahead at the battle where so much blood was being spilled.

"Yet so does that," he said. "And this will end it."

Comforting hands on his shoulder, and with that assent he let out a weary breath.

"Pilgrim of grey," Tariq sang.

The Ophanim hummed along, a choir distant and melancholy. A chorus of ever-weeping eyes who were charged with ever seeing the worst of Creation, yet still ground their fingers to the bone saving what they could. The hummed along to the Anthem of Smoke, that song that was the flesh and blood of Levant.

"Fleet-foot, dusk-clad, the wanderer,
His stride rebellion and stirring ember."

It did not feel like peace, when they hummed with him. They were no servants of that, neither Choir nor man. Theirs was the duty of steering the world away from the brink, and none could be spared in the observance of that work. It was an endless procession of bitter choices, of lesser evils in the service of greater goods they might never witness. It felt like a lullaby, gentle and wistful but never without disquiet.

"In his grasp the light of a morning star, Tattered his throne, tattered his war," they sang together.

They called it the dawn star, in the Free Cities. In Procer it was morning's herald, in Ashur the sun's prow. In Levant, though, in the land of Tariq's birth, though it had once been known as the morning star it was no longer called that. It was said that the Proceran prince who'd ruled the southern reaches of the Dominion had laughingly told the people that naught by the sky falling would ever make the Principate surrender its conquered prize. It was said, too, that the first of the Grey Pilgrims had been among those listening. A mere boy, when he heard, but he never forgot. And after Above clad him in grey, the boy become a man returned to that laughing prince and, plucking a star from the night sky, lit the first bonfire of rebellion from the tyrant's palace. In Levant for many years now it had been known as the pilgrim's star: the peregrine. Tariq was not the first Grey Pilgrim to wield it, and he would not be the last. From the first of his Bestowal, there had been one inheritance and in the wake of the song the old man softly offered it up to the sky.

"Shine," the Peregrine said, and the peregrine did.

Blood burning from the Light coursing through like a river, Tariq gasped out in pain and only the merciful hand on his shoulder kept him from collapsing. Miracle and aspect wove themselves together, the single greatest working of his life, and his vision dimmed with exhaustion. Above him the morning star hung in the sky, and with it dawn had come. The drow broke, creatures of the night that they were, and the battlefield held its breath.

"Now," Tariq croaked. "Now you have no choice, child, lest they sweep through your servants."

She would bring nightfall where he had brought dawn, and their powers would find each other matched. It would be neither day nor night but an eclipse in passing, and the Black Queen would be as shattered by the scale of it as he was. It would be a stalemate, a draw, and Gods willing the pattern of three would be set in stone – as would be the victory promised to him, so grimly earned.

Instead the air tore open in front of Tariq and a man rode through.

No, not a man. One of the fair folk, astride a steed that seemed half marble and ice, and that fae's eyes were cold where his smile was warm and friendly. His red hair was like a streak of flame as he inclined his head in greeting, hand never nearing the sword at his belt.

"Pilgrim of grey, I bring to you greeting and missive from my most tenebrous of lieges," the fae said.

The Pilgrim rose to his feet, slowly, and took the scroll being offered to him. It carried the royal seal of Callow, he saw. He broke it, took the parchment from the leather and after reading the single paragraph rocked back like he'd been hit. Surrender. Catherine Foundling was offering unconditional surrender. It would be a great victory, if he accepted. Victory.

Gods damn that vicious child.

I commented before about this chapter being in the wrong spot on the sidebar, you guys fixed that but now the Congregation I chapter is at the bottom with the most recent chapters lmao! Something weird must have happened with the site formatting, wanted to give another heads up.

Tim Dempsey

That was hilarious and very good timing

dalek955

I'm sure the irony is not accidental that Pilgrim sees Catherine evading every story that could remove her from the throne and surviving to rule forever as a villain queen, when her own goal is to kick the Named off of every throne and take away many of the tools of villain rulers.

Oh, and the people wondering which of Saint and Ranger is a knockoff of the other have their answer now.

mavant

Well, we already knew Ranger was a few hundred years older...

dalek955

You know that and I know that, but I've seen commenters stating confidently that Ranger learned everything she knows from Saint.

tynam

Part of Pilgrim's defining flaw is that even though he's furious at Cat evading every single story the Good team tries to throw at her, it hasn't even occurred to him that she might be doing the same thing to team Evil.

Luis

This is the bet not the knife.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, it's the knife. There's no bet here. No matter what decision he makes, she wins.

pault52

This is one of my favorite chapters to date. The combat between the drow and the saint was so epic, the further development of cat's plan is awesome, and that grey pilgrim scene is so great.

Andrew Mitchell

What a great chapter this is. There's now 434 comments which is an amazing level of positive discussion and engagement.

Interlude: And Pay Your Toll

"Oh no, please stop wrecking everything! Like that urn in the corner, with the djinn bound inside. No, the other one, with golden – oh, woeful day, this wanton destruction of priceless artefacts is so inconvenient to me personally and absolutely no one else."

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, ‘defending’ the palace of the High Lord of Aksum from heroes

Tariq did not reply. He knew hesitation was herald of defeat, in contests such as this, yet he could not hasten to answer. Not with the stakes at play here – he, this army, this entire continent, none of them could afford a misstep here and now. A surrender had been offered, but could still be either accepted or refused.

The Pilgrim’s first and deeper instinct was to accept. If it was a lie she’d offered, a trick being played, then accepting would allow him to turn this spin of the yarn on her. A false surrender, when he still had the forces in motion that he’d sent out? The backlash of such a ploy would be bloody for the villain who’d played it. But that was the wrong way to think about this, he decided, because it assumed that Catherine Foundling was a fool. And she wasn’t, unfortunately. She was reckless often and at times arrogant, but also frightfully prone to learning from her mistakes – those, at least, that were not born from the flaws at the very heart of her. It was possible, he considered, that she’d pit providence against the weight of his broken oath. Wagered that events would not tumble forward in a way that allowed him to uncover the conspiracy, should there be one. Yet it was not a good wager, for her, since taking it at all meant she’d fallen into the role of the Grand Alliance’s villainous adversary. No it was nearly certain that the offer of surrender was genuine, which only made it all the more dangerous.

It would break the pattern of three, if he accepted. A victory for her, in claiming back her teacher’s body through ploy, and then a much greater victory for him this night, in scaring her into surrender – that would be the end of it. It was a draw that would take Tariq where he needed to go, arm him with the only blade left that might still be capable of killing Catherine Foundling should it prove necessary. If she’d opposed him more directly in this battle, even made act of presence, the Pilgrim would have come forward as well and leaned on the weight of their pattern to nudge events towards the certainty of a draw. But she’d remained veiled, hidden and plotting. And she saw right through me, Tariq thought, abashed. For all that he had told himself he had the measure of the Black Queen, evidently he’d been wrong. If he was to avoid compounding his mistakes, he must discard that belief and approach the situation with fresh eyes. Catherine Foundling had caught sight of the pattern of three he’d spent so long arranging, and most likely suspected the importance of it to him. Should this, then, be seen as an olive branch?

She would not allow a foe the power over her Tariq had sought to obtain, yet she understood why he found the need for it. And so a concession was made, surrender unconditional on the field, offering to his old hands the thread that might just untangle the thorny knot that was the confluence in Iserre. A knife bared, his purpose denied but then a lesser prize offered. It fit, as it would not be the first time that the Black Queen dealt with others using that blunt but potent approach.

Like an old mule he'd been approached, and this was the apple dangled: an end to Iserre that would be to the benefit of the Grand Alliance, in matters earthly. With refusal, then, would come the stick that would be used to thrash him. A more provisional offer might have allowed the Pilgrim grounds with which to refuse, but unconditional surrender meant that the burden of consequence had been passed entirely to him. There could, to be put it bluntly, be no better offer. If it were a trick that would not matter, for to be Good was not to be the kind of fool that fell into every trap: even devils could cite the Book for their purposes. But if it was not a trick, as he believed, then by refusing Tariq would be tossing to the side every sacrifice made tonight. Every death that had pressed down on his shoulders so he could bring morning's light to the sky. Would the miracle wane and die? The Ophanim murmured uncertainly in his ear, even they unknowing. He suspected not, but it would at least be made fragile. Judged hollow by Creation, and so become exactly that. The Black Queen's answer, the coiling darkness that lay at the heart of her camp and had been carefully woven into a theurgic ritual, would rip through it. Perhaps reverse the situation entire, unleashing her drow anew in the fullness of the might.

The Grey Pilgrim was no leader of warbands but he had known wars and felt the power of the Everdark's children fill the night. If they struck out again with their strength restored, the battle would resume with her forces at a distinct advantage. A second victory for Catherine Foundling would end the pattern of three just as surely, which meant his choice was now effectively between two different unmakings of a plan that had taken more than a year to carry out. Exasperation welled up at the thought. All that toil, broken within months of her return to the surface as if on a whim. Tariq leaned into the emotion, let it course through his veins and then pass out of him. There was no use to growing angry at being outplayed: on the contrary, that kind of fragility tended to lead Bestowed into a spiral of decline. He'd seen too many times to count. Mind clear again, the Grey Pilgrim considered what the Black Queen wanted him to believe was his choice. Victory for him, on her terms. Likely victory for her, still on her terms. The old man's brow creased as he considered it. There was something about this... theatricality that rubbed him wrong. For a villain, he thought, Catherine Foundling had always been admirably reluctant to sacrifice soldiers on false pretences.

What she considered those to be was where the villainy began, but that was another story. Ah, Tariq hummed. So there it is. The Black Queen had spent lives in her service, those of the drow, by sending them into the fight suspecting a miracle would snatch away their powers and leave them exposed. Unusual for her, and she would not do it without a reason. So why had the drow been sent, he mused? To force his hand with the bringing of dawn, certainly, but there'd been no need for such a brutal display as what had taken place. Thousands dead, so quickly, was not war: it was a point being made. They had been sent to make an impression. To swat down multitudes like flies and add weight to the choice the Pilgrim must now make. To create, in a word, urgency. Such a thing would only be necessary, he decided, if there was a deception afoot.

"Where is your liege, Hunstman?" the Grey Pilgrim asked.

"Another question was not the answer sought, Peregrine," the fae languidly replied. "Your verdict?"

She wasn't in Creation, Tariq grasped then. Admittedly the surrender offered had only been for those under her command and not the Queen of Callow herself so her presence was not strictly required. But if she wasn't here, how did she expect to bring down dawn should he refuse her surrender? There might be other drow with power enough, but none with the requisite weight to carry it out. If the Hierophant had still been at her side then Tariq would not have considered the matter further, but the boy currently was in the depths of Arcadia making a ruinous altar of his grief. The Wild Hunt could not wield miracles of darkness, and who did that leave? No one but Bestowed or the most powerful of warlocks should be able to weave a working rival to his, leaving the confines of story, and the only place where the Black Queen would have been able to encounter such a helper since her disappearance should be the Everdark. It was, he reflected, deeply unlikely anyone but Catherine Foundling on her side could bring an end to his dawn – her patron murderesses notwithstanding, for should they intervene directly so would the Choir of Mercy. Old mule that he was, he'd been offered the apple and the stick. But it appeared that the stick might be little more than glamour, a shadow on the wall. If he refused, and dawn held, then...

That would be contingent on her failing to return, but her absence was telling: whatever her scheme, it required her to see to something else. Instead of an olive branch extended, he thought, this might instead be the affected nonchalance of a villain raising the stakes on a bad hand. Trying to scare the opposition into retreating by displaying unflinching certainty. The pieces were there, Tariq thought, for this to be the answer. Yet it was not certain, and in assuming that the Black Queen was gambling he would be doing the very same thing. If the only consideration was whether it was possible to obtain a promised victory on Catherine Foundling, then this was the choice to be made. Refusal, and pushing through. That was not, however, the only consideration. He could it be, when Keter was on the march? Could he truly justify, the Grey Pilgrim asked himself countenance refusing such an offer of peace? Refuse it when it delivered all he asked save for a knife at the throat of the very woman offering it – a knife, it must be said, that he now stood little chance of obtaining no matter his decision. The scope of the scales, Tariq thought, were close to beyond his ability to grasp.

The Black Queen that could be would be the end of Calernia. Between the Kingdom of the Dead and the Kingdom of the East, the continent would be made a ruin of endless war. Yet in combating the Black Queen that could be, was he blinding himself to the truth of the Black Queen that was?

Could there be any justification for the tossing away of the only pattern of three he would ever have with Catherine Foundling? There might not be another way to kill her if she further grew beyond Tariq's means. By staying his hand he might be letting slip an entity he could no longer put down.

In refusing an offer of peace from Callow when the Dead King was on the march, was he not aiding the Hidden Horror regardless of all other concerns?

Innocents were going to die.

Innocents had died, some by his own design.

The Ophanim were at his side, helping his tired old bones stand straight, and though in their whispers there was sorrow there was also something other. Trust. They trusted him, the murmurs said, to make the choice. They had seen as he saw, tread in his wake for the seemingly endless days and night he had been the Peregrine. They'd been at his shoulder for his every mistake, his every bitter triumph, and still they trusted. Sometimes that was the only reason he woke with dawn, the knowledge that hand in hand they could still do more. Sometimes that was the weight that pressed down on his chest and choked his lungs, the strain of that unearthly trust. Tariq had tread with angels in his wake for so long he'd forgot how it had felt before.

"Should you not have answers?" he asked, voice choked. "Are you not the Watchers Kindly, the burning wisdom of many eyes?"

Old friends, he thought, help me. Help me see, for once more I am lost. But they had no answers for him, would not take the burden from his shoulders. But they stood at his side, holding up his tired from, for in the end they were the Choir of Mercy and though they could not save him they would at least share in his suffering. Tariq thought of the city of his birth, suddenly, of that summer so long ago when the plague had choked it with death.

In those days where it had all been so simple, when healing could be the sum of him. When he'd not been charged with clawing Creation back out of the darkness' hands, just to bring a little light into it. Tariq, who had last felt true warmth before the final breath of the woman who'd used to smile as she called him of no import, looked up at the sky and watched the star that shone there. Somewhere along the way, he thought, he had gone from bringing small lights into this world to bringing great ones.

Sometimes he wondered if Creation was truly better for it.

"Do you really," he murmured, "trust me to make that choice?"

The Ophanim thrummed. Agreement, absolute in that way only angels could be. The Grey Pilgrim turned to the Black Queen's messenger.

"Tell the Queen of Callow I accept her surrender," he said.

"This," the Kairos Theodosian mused, "appears to be a goat."

Hakram kept a calm look on his face, remaining as dignified as an orc could be while hanging upside down tied by the feet. The Tyrant's outriders had clapped him in chains and dragged him back to the League's army in them regardless of his claim to be an envoy from the Queen of Callow, though it wasn't until the Tyrant himself arrived that Adjutant was forced to watch a procession of gargoyles drag in a tall tripod and trip over each other assembling it for what had to be at least half an hour. He'd then been hung upside down from the centrepiece, and only now had his gag been removed.

"Greetings, Lord Tyrant," he serenely said. "I am the Adjutant, here as envoy from your ally the Queen of Callow."

"She wrote some very unkind things about me, Hakram," the Tyrant accusingly said.

He tapped at the parchment his soldiers had taken from the orc's affairs along with the goat, the same missive he'd both penned in Catherine's name and been charged with bringing to the League when given the signal. The process had been more tedious than difficult: the barren plain this corner of Arcadia had been turned into meant he'd been able to see their columns arriving from miles off, though that hadn't quickened his journey in the slightest.

"I am sure," Hakram lied, "that they were meant in a spirit of friendship."

The goat he'd had confiscated looked at him and bleated, which the orc had to admit was fair. It'd been a hard sell. No one seemed to have thought to leash the creature, so it was ambling around this formal war council of the League of Free Cities at will and tracking cheap white paint over the furniture.

"What kind of things?" a tanned woman in dark robes asked, leaning forward with interest.

"Magister Zoe," the Tyrant gasped. "That is most inappropriate to ask. That man is a known spy, he could be peddling all sorts of calumnies."

The formal war council of the League of Free Cities, Hakram thought, was about as much as flaming wreck as he'd expected given the fractious nature of that alliance and the general reputation of the Tyrant heading it. The orcs jaw tightened when his suspicion was confirmed and the woman who'd spoken was revealed as a magister of Stygia – what a dignified word for a slaver – thought at least it made placing the others easier. The gangly old man at the very right of the long table who was putting the proceedings to ink was likely to be the representative from Delos, a member of its Secretariat. The young ruler of Nicae, Basileus Leo Trakas, was recognizable as much from the formal apparel as the drawings the Jacks had obtained. The two richly-dressed men glaring daggers at each other should be the rival Exarchs of Penthes, the last two survivors of the shambles the Carrion Lord had made of that city's ruling class. A middle-aged man in ill-fitting armour was looking rather confused and kept looking over his shoulder like he expected someone to be standing there. The representative from Bellerophon, Hakram suspected. That left only one city without a seat at the table, though someone had nailed what looked like a tome of the Book of All Things to the back of a chair just to the left of the Delosi scribe. Interestingly, the Hierarch himself did not seem to be in attendance.

"Lord Deadhand, it is most uncouth of you to be staring so at the honourable delegate from Atalante," the Tyrant suddenly chided him.

He was, Hakram realized with horrified fascination, talking about the book.

"I apologize," Adjutant said. "I have never seen anyone from Atalante before."

Kairos Theodosian grinned, like he was mischievous boy, and leaned forward before lowering his voice to a conspiratorial pitch.

"It's actually the Book of All Things nailed to a chair," the Tyrant of Helike confessed. "I just have a gargoyle read a verse once in a while, I don't think anyone's noticed the difference."

Before a heartbeat had passed, Hakram had decided how to tailor his approach. Like dealing with a drunk Catherine, if the jokes about hanging people who irritated her were actually deadly serious.

"Have you considered having a puppet made?" Adjutant replied in the same tone.

The Tyrant snorted out a giggle, his bad arm trembling under his robes. Hakram kept his distaste off his face: the villain smelled like sickness and crazy, both of the dangerous kind.

"I like you," Kairos Theodosian smilingly said, but then the smile vanished like mist in morning sun. "Is what I imagine she thought I'd say, anyway."

Hakram remained calm. The boy was unstable, but not without cunning, and Catherine had already taken the measure of him. She would not have sent him here, at the Tyrant's mercy, if she thought it would get him killed.

"She does seem to enjoy taking up broken toys, your mistress," the Tyrant of Helike mused. "A filthy habit that, if you'll forgive my language."

The villain cocked his head to the side, his sanguine red eye unblinking.

"But by the looks of you, Hakram, you were debris long before she got her hands on you," he idly continued. "Magister Zoe, what do you call it again when they just look like a person but lack every other meaningful characteristic of one?"

"Foreigners," the Stygian drily replied.

The Tyrant of Helike shot Adjutant a friendly, complicit look with a grin that good as whispered see what I have to deal with, like moments earlier the villain hadn't been feeling for a weakness with his words like water poured on glass in search of fault. This was, Hakram thought, a man as dangerous as he was mad. He smiled back, keeping his fangs hidden by his lips.

"You really are a piece of work," the Tyrant of Helike admiringly said.

"Pieces, by now," Hakram replied without missing a beat.

The madman cackled loudly, and even a few of the others smiled.

"So tell me about this goat," Kairos Theodosian said, "and why it looks like it was half-heartedly painted just before it was brought here."

"And in wickedness does Evil sow the seeds of its own defeat," a gargoyle mewled, staring up at a page of the Book of All Things.

Everyone ignored it.

"Your ignorance is understandable, my lord Tyrant, given the recent isolation of Callow," Hakram said. "This is not a goat: he is, in fact, a purebred Liessen charger."

Stares moved to the goat, which bleated fearfully at the sudden spurt of attention and ran under the table – she smeared white paint all over the robes of the Stygian magister before being chased away with a kick, which Adjutant silently approved of.

"She has udders," Basileus Leo patiently said. "Goat udders. Because she is a goat."

"Leo, you'll cause a diplomatic incident at this rate," the Tyrant replied, sounding appalled. "Besides, my dear ally the Queen of Callow has personally sent me a mount. How could it not be a splendid destrier of Callowan stock?"

Interesting, Hakram thought once more. It had been one thing for him to call the Tyrant of Helike an ally, another for the king to admit it. The orc had been under the impression that while there was an elected Hierarch, foreign diplomacy was their strict prerogative and to go against that would be treason. Yet none of the others seemed bothered by the implicit admission in the slightest – which meant either the Tyrant's plot were known and permitted, or the Hierarch's authority was a sham and Kairos Theodosian was the true ruler of the League. Something many had suspected, including Hakram himself, but did not align with Catherine's own impression of their relationship.

"I wash my hands of this," the Basileus sighed. "Do as you will, Tyrant."

"So, Catherine wants us to take a crack at the Grand Alliance," Lord Kairos said, completely ignoring the other ruler in favour of Hakram. "Interesting offer."

There was a pause.

"I refuse," he added nonchalantly. "So, now that that's done with, tell me true: if you had to be drowned, would you prefer it was in wine or in oil?"

"We were afraid you would hesitate to act, given the circumstances," Hakram amicably said. "No grudge will be held, I assure you."

"Circumstances," Lord Kairos mildly repeated. "Such as?"

"The battle ought to be over by now," Adjutant said. "The Grey Pilgrim will have woven a miraculous star and broken the strength of the Firstborn, forcing my queen's unconditional surrender."

A pregnant pause.

"She doesn't have that much give in her," the Tyrant said, red eye narrowing.

"My lord," Hakram grinned, baring his teeth, "I penned the letter for her."

The villain peered at him closely, as if looking into his soul, and the orc had to refrain from flinching. There was something... discomfoting about the intensity of that mismatched gaze.

"It appears someone will have to saddle my goat," Kairos Theodosian mused, "for we now must ride out in glorious battle."

pagesbe

Is that character development for Taric I'm seeing? Sniff, he's growing up, I'm so proud.

And Tyrant remains an absolute delight.

Oshi

Not really, he's been consistently the same throughout. This is Catherine reading him perfectly and apparently using the idiot Hierarch/Tyrant to keep them from really winning.

pagesbe

Wait, are you arguing that this isn't development for Taric? The guy just compromised when there was still a chance he could have come out completely on top, giving up on something he really really wanted. This has never happened in previous chapters, where he gave up something he really wanted that he strictly speaking didn't have to give up.

It'd be one thing if he figured she was basically waiting for him to refuse, like he did at first. But then he realized (or decided, not positive if he's right yet) that she wasn't around to take advantage of that kind of mistake, so there was a chance he could get away with it. But he decided not to make the gamble. I'm kind of proud of him for it, honestly.

Rook

Tariq has always had the greater good as his top priority, whether or not he personally wins is barely even secondary. I don't know where people keep getting this idea of him a character that puts his own wants or victory first.

The reason he escalates so hard to win is because he genuinely, down to his very core with no pretence, believes his role is to try saving as much of creation from suffering as possible by working with the Ophanim. It's not a pretentious excuse, the dude literally believes it. Whether he makes mistakes in hindsight or not trying to do that is another story, and he's as much as outright admitted that he can and has made mistakes there in the past, during the battle of the camps arc. But for the same reason Catherine couldn't stop even though she spent the first three volumes doing nothing but leaving smoking craters behind her of everything she was trying to save, he keeps trying anyway because he genuinely believes what he's doing will eventually create a Better World(TM), just like Catherine.

Accepting the compromise is exactly in line with the previous character that he's had before. Above everything, his personal priority is what means the least suffering at the end of it all, and that's exactly the apple that Catherine dangled in front of him.

It's not the pilgrim 'growing up' or changing character, the dude has been and still is a genuine selfless Hero since before Catherine & co were even born.

It's result of Catherine growing up so much, to the point where she accurately read one of the most dangerous Heroes on the continent, and gave him bait he couldn't refuse at the cost of her own personal victory.

Kissaten

The type of self-righteousness Pilgrim has is personal wants in every way that matters. Hanno doesn't make a choice therefore he is just through Choir making choice for him, William got his edgy antiheroics and redemption and pushed his personal agenda every step of the way, and Pilgrim is just the same, he views bites of his conscience as a proof enough that he is fundamentally right. Cat once said "unrepentant villainy", all heroes are guilty of "unrepentant heroics". Pilgrim actually believes that just because Ophanim and Gods Above may forgive him he is except from judgement of mortals; he is not bound to ANY treaties made with mortals if they are inconvenient. That's as unrepentant as you can get.

>The reason he escalates so hard to win is because he genuinely, down to his very core with no pretence, believes his role is to try saving as much of creation from suffering as possible by working with the Ophanim. It's not a pretentious excuse, the dude literally believes it.

It IS a pretentious excuse even if he believes that. He tried to pass his own judgement once, got burned and decided to surrender his freedom of mind completely and utterly. That's the thing about heroes, they don't have agency.

RanVor

Careful, expressing such views here is dangerous.

Novice

I genuinely wonder what's the point of writing such edgy comments.

RanVor

To get annoyed replies, of course.

erraticerrata

That's heading into trolling territory. Don't. I haven't had to moderate the comment section in about year, I'll get irritated if I have to start doing it again.

RanVor

It's a joke. Although I'm probably gonna leave soon anyway, so it matters little.

erraticerrata

There's literally an instance of you making a borderline comment two notches up. Claiming it's a joke doesn't really hold up to your behaviour for the last few chapters, which I find a shame because dissenting voices are what make discussions interesting. That said you're not being persecuted, you're having debates with others readers. If those debates get heated on either side that's fine, I've no intention of being involved so long as people remain broadly civil. To make it clear, if you feel like you're being harassed then say as much and I'll step in. But so far you've been the one making indirect references to other commenters even when they're not involved in the conversation, not the other way around, so casting yourself as a victim being chased out isn't earning much sympathy on my end. People are just as allowed to disagree with you as you are with them.

RanVor

What? No, I meant no such thing. This community is starting to tire me, that's all. I need to distance myself from the comments. I'm sick of spending hours on clearing up misunderstandings. It's not fault of anybody in particular, I've just decided it will be better for everyone if I disappear for a time. I will not be missed; that's fine. I don't come here for approval anyway.

Root

So tell me exactly what his personal agenda is then, exactly? Because we know for a fact that his personal agenda involves horrid acts of selfishness such as letting his sisters killer go even if he believes it isn't justice, and murdering the he loves like his own because he believed preventing the war he'd bring would be a net good on creation.

It's not perfect, he admits it. He makes mistakes, he admits it. But we know for a fact – by a literal window into his thoughts by omniscient author-vision – that his real motives always come around to “how will this affect the continent as a whole”. Sorry, where's the pretence here?

The fact of the matter is, the Pilgrim gets a lot of flak for the sole purpose of being the antagonist to a popular protagonist. There's almost nothing you can accuse him of that doesn't apply in equal measure to Catherine, which is hilarious because the same people that call the Pilgrim a hypocritical ass will bend over backwards to come to the opposite conclusion about Catherine when she does almost the same shit for almost the same reasons.

Honestly the opinions on the characters are whatever, who cares if you like the pilgrim or hate him. But most of the hypocrisy is in the comments section, not the writing.

Kissaten

>Because we know for a fact that his personal agenda involves horrid acts of selfishness

That's exactly that – selfishness. I don't know how it's properly called, but it's a false equation of feeling pain and feeling right about what you have done. Kind of a more narrow argument of "i'm arguing against myself here therefore my position's stronger" type. Also, people do get joy from being in pain. Like, people in depression do dread sinking deeper and go there anyway, it's the same mechanism, but for religious folks those feelings get confused with religious feelings.

Reading the comments it kind of proves Cat's idea that Pilgrim is Black who was brainwashed by a Choir – where Black would say he is the most selfish person in the world because it's his personal rebellion against the Creation, half the world being a prop for the other half's victory, Pilgrim would ask Choir to support him morally, would claim he made sacrifices to prevent tragedies et cetera. Pilgrim would seek justification from the Heavens while Black would shrug and say that he isn't just to begin with.

That's why people in the comments call heroes hypocrites: not because they are antagonists but rather because they are just the same as villains but they get to narratively, but not factually, be proven right. You'd think that wouldn't be the case when there exist monsters like Dead King, but for every ancient horror there are tens and hundreds Saints of Swords born over horror's lifespan who are willing to sacrifice entire countries to kill The Enemy.

>his real motives always come around to "how will this affect the continent as a whole". Sorry, where's the pretence here?

Does he actually consider well-being of, say, orcs and goblins? Regardless of treaties forced on him by Cat. He is protecting the entire continent, after all.

Cicero

So religious people are masochists?

Religion is nothing but a pretense for masochists to self-flagellate themselves?

That's the argument you are going with?

Kissaten

No, i said was that moral high ground bought with suffering is a very common thing, more common for religious people (christians, or orthodox at least, have a cult of martyrdom), and it's oftentimes a desirable position to hold. It's kind of like a hero wishing that villain would break the truce because that would give him, hero, stronger position.

luminiousblu

You're applying an atheistic worldview to a world where that genuinely doesn't apply. The Grey Pilgrim is a Gandalf expy, he actually does have the moral license to do things that would be pretty dubious because he has the equivalent of Jesus whispering in his ear.

RanVor

I can't see how it "doesn't apply". There's no such thing as moral license. There is, however, plenty of hypocrisy

luminiousblu

Read up on some philosophy. It's impossible for me to discuss this with you when you've made up your mind that Tariq is a bad person and don't even pretend to care to take his point of view.

Given that the Ophanim want Greatest Good for the Greatest Number and given that they have a ridiculously massive point of view that no human can match, it makes perfect sense for Tariq to delegate his choice. That IS a choice. Knowing when to acknowledge that someone else knows better is humility and also practicality.

>he is except from judgement of mortals; he is not bound to ANY treaties made with mortals if they are inconvenient.

That's not what he says. The judgement of mortals is only ever relevant insofar as you care about them. This is true of all people. Catherine is being judged by people in the Empire and in Procer right this second. Cordelia knows that her uncle will never forgive her for her choices. Both of them still did what they thought was right, because treaties are treated as the scraps of paper they are if their costs outweigh their benefits in this world and in our own.

Hanno isn't a blind fuck puppet, he's a person who has realised that he doesn't know the answer, that perhaps humans are incapable of finding a perfect answer, but that there are beings which can see the answers. Hanno didn't know that fighting some snot-nosed kid would lead to him becoming an abusive father and even when told he didn't know what he should've done. But the Seraphim showed him what he lacked in knowledge and showed him that they knew what he didn't, so Hanno thinks, "alright, clearly I don't know enough – I should listen to people who demonstrably know way fucking more than me". He has made a choice, chosen to give up his choice. Is this the right choice? It doesn't matter, the fact that he consciously chooses to not judge and consciously chose to go to the Seraphim for guidance is enough to make him anything but a puppet. Their agency is to understand that maybe, for once, they don't know best. Maybe someone else does.

RanVor

I know Tariq's point of view and I consciously choose not to care. He believes he's right, so what? Everybody does. That doesn't mean anything. Only results matter.

I don't need anybody to tell me what to think. I can manage on my own, and I don't trust Ophanim to understand good as I do. They think in extremes. It takes one good look at history to see that nothing good ever comes from that.

luminiousblu

Nobody was asking if you personally agreed with Tariq and I could not care less whether or not you believe you can manage on your own, it's just staggering how hypocritical and biased people are when it comes down to it. Tariq is fighting for what he believes in, and believes that angels afforded a wider point of view see more than he does. You might think that the angels don't actually see more. That's great, but that has no bearing on how Tariq sees things and therefore no bearing on his morality or on his personality or development or lack thereof.'

>it takes one good look at history to see that nothing good ever comes from that,.
Let's make it count, who're you talking about?
Don't fall for the bait and take the easy out; I'm already giving charity by not nitpicking about your usage of the word 'good'.

>only results matter

Correct, and the results aren't in. The point of the angels is that they see more of the results than you. That's why Tariq aligns himself with the Ophanim, because they genuinely do see more and can detect suffering when a normal man might not.

RanVor

Explain to me then, what is the basis you think I should judge Tariq on? Or maybe I should love him unconditionally?

luminiousblu

You should judge a character's personality without trying to suss out some sort of superior or inferior nature.

You should judge a character's competence on whether or not his actions make internal sense according to his personality as well as according to in-world facts.

If you want to judge morality there's not much to it, judge them based on what they want for the world and what their ultimate goals are.

If you want to judge a character's development you should compare their personality to former versions of themselves as presented.

Maybe stop thinking of things in terms of 'extremes' and simply look at the character as they are, without trying to pass judgement on every little thing according to the logic of our world instead of their world. You're the one presenting a false dichotomy here, between judging Tariq according to hypersubjective, illogical standards and simply 'loving him unconditionally'.

RanVor

"judge them based on what they want for the world" Here's where you're wrong. I refuse to see evil as good because it's done with good intentions. Intentions don't matter, results do, and the tally of the dead speaks for itself.

luminiousblu

If the results are all that matter then I'm pretty sure that Catherine is the one directly responsible for more deaths than Tariq, at least in the course of the story, considering she started and enabled the entire rebellion arc, by extension Akua, by extension the Crusade, and by extension the Dead King. You'll object to this. I'll completely disregard it.

If the results that will come to be matter, and so Catherine gets Liesse across, then Tariq arguably stopped Catherine from turning into Winter Queen and also set into motion the Akua Redemption Arc. You need to stop trying to think you see more than the things that canonically, within the story, are shown to see very, very far.

Also hold the fuck up, are you actually talking good and evil as in real life? We're not playing D&D, drop the pretence. You already bailed on giving historical examples, I'll have you bail on your moral high horse too. Stop being 14.

RanVor

I stopped being 14 a long time ago, thank you very much.

Catherine is responsible for many deaths and for those she must pay in the end. She shouldn't, however, be forced to pay for the deaths she is not responsible for. Also, she didn't cause the rebellion, she merely hastened it.

"Tariq arguably stopped Catherine"
VERY arguably.

Yes, I'm talking good and evil as in real life because that's the only good and evil there is. Everything else is just bells and whistles.

Finally, I'm under no obligation to explain myself to you and frankly, I don't give a single fuck about your opinion.

luminiousblu

You're defending yourself quite vehemently and seem to care quite a bit about expressing your own intellectual superiority, though. Grow up a little. Being an old man on the outside doesn't make you mature on the inside.

RanVor

You say that, but you're the one insulting me here.

Kissaten

To keep it short, you think that voluntary slavery isn't slavery at all. But the thing is, voluntary slavery leaves a man without free will, being considered a tool, leaves him disposable in a way things are and he is going to be exploited for master's profit. Voluntary slavery is still slavery..

luminousblu

Voluntary slavery isn't slavery literally by definition, you cannot be owned by someone else if at any point you can decide to take ownership back. You're leasing yourself to them because you believe in their abilities. By your fucking logic anyone who believes in any cause at all that someone else came up with or who follows a leader they trust is a slave. Hanno trusts that the Seraphim will not make him do things that are wrong. Hakram does whatever the fuck Catherine says because he trusts Catherine to make the right calls at the right time. You can't just invalidate most of humanity because they're not the point of view character who the story has made you sympathise with.

Kissaten

>Voluntary slavery isn't slavery literally by definition, you cannot be owned by someone else if at any point you can decide to take ownership back.

There is no slavery called "voluntary" which allows a slave to freely take ownership back at any point in time. On that note, changing masters doesn't stop you from being a slave. In any case, "voluntary slavery" was an example, a somewhat or well-known topic of discussion. "Voluntary submission is still submission" doesn't sound as good.

Mental Mouse

luminousblu: That would be true if the slave's free will was sacrosanct and inviolable. That's not even true in our real world, let alone a High Fantasy world featuring Speaking, telepathy, magical bomb implants, glamours, story-fu, and of course mind-rotting angels and demons.

Once you've established control over someone, you can take measures to make sure they don't just decide to get up and leave. In the Guideverse, the simplest is weaving your own power through their body and soul. Doing that with Corruption may be obvious, but consider that Apathy is less so. Mercy and Judgement may not do such obvious damage, but if someone is permeated with such power, that will affect their personality and their choices.

I don't exempt Catherine here, but now she's found a patron whose moral background and character is similar to her own – like Catherine, Sve Noc grasped for dark power specifically because of an overwhelming opponent trying to dominate them. For the Foundling, that started with the Conquest – remember how despite Black's best efforts, by the time he got there the Occupation was already backing her into a corner?

Liliet

Voluntary slavery is an oxymoron.

Tariq, Hanno and William weren't and aren't slaves. All of them can stop doing what they're doing any minute. We have WoG that giving up on the "liberating Callow" goal would have broken William mentally – note that there's nothing in there about angels, it's the goal he's inherited from his sister in his anger against Praes and what it drove him to. Hanno literally does whatever the fuck he wants, he doesn't get any input from the angels even if he wants some – other than yes/no answers to 'do I kill this person'.

As for Tariq, we know several things for a fact about him:

- when he deviates from the desires of the Choir of Mercy, they stop talking to him. Simple as that. And he went for ten years like that, when rearing his nephew;
- he's not dependent on the angels for anything, he has his powers, his reputations and his sanity all on his own. Yes, he's grown reliant on their support, but that's like accusing a person of being a 'voluntary slave' to their dog;

– speaking of dogs and other non-verbal animals, we've seen who makes the strategic calls in this partnership, and it's not the Ophanim. Even if Tariq would have preferred otherwise, the responsibility is ultimately on him for everything he does. They're the pit crew, not the bosses.

luminiousblu

Kissaten:

>There is no slavery called "voluntary" which allows a slave to freely take ownership back at any point in time.

This is a lot like saying "There is no star named Chuck Norris' Penis which is square and looks like a gay pride flag". Yes, there's no voluntary slavery which allows a slave to take back ownership at any point in time. That's because there's no such thing as voluntary slavery.

>Voluntary submission is still submission doesn't sound as good

Yes, because slavery is a loaded and emotionally charged word that is presumed to be evil by the word's existence, while submission isn't because the fact of the matter is that everyone submits to something. Even a Nietzschean ubermensch, an Camusian Absurdist or a Randian objectivist – even an Egoist – isn't free of submission, and most people can't even begin to approach the level of independence those guys have. Either most of humanity is 'voluntarily enslaved', or the point is moot.

Mental Mouse:

Free will being sacrosanct and inviolable is something that you can debate but generally speaking, just because you're influenced by outside factors doesn't mean you don't have free will. You either get to say that the world is deterministic and there is, has never been, and never will be free will, or that barring mind control you can't really rob someone of free will. You can restrict his choices, but each person and all people have their choices restricted from the day they're born, that's just how the world is. Human interaction is about restricting the choices of others and making attractive to them the choices you want them to take – even if that choice is as simple as 'keep talking to this stranger next to me instead of going for another pint and leaving'.

Personality being affected by power freely taken and power freely used is still a result of that person's free will. Someone who decides to march to war and is broken by the experience isn't somehow without his free will. Someone who's raised in a culture which controls their personality – let's use a real life example and go for broke, North Korea (really any country in the world but let's use that one) – isn't without free will. Catherine using Winter voluntarily doesn't mean she has no free will. Free will is, if you simplify it down so we don't write theses on the question, the exercise of your personality, whatever that might be. Personality is always changing and shaped by outside events, you can't escape being moulded by your surroundings and the people or things you interact with.

The one exception, really, is Speaking. But Speaking is clearly something else entirely, we've seen Catherine get Spoke to, it's not what's happening with Hanno or even similar. It seems closest to me to having a religious experience or a super moving moment in real life, which, well, I wouldn't call that removing Hanno's free will. We can see his thought process. It's clear. It's clean. As far as I can tell it's even perfectly logical once you account for his personal values. He simply thinks the Seraphim really do know best, and follows them for that reason.

werafdsaew

The Ophanims are paperclip maximizers. Just because their reward function is a bit less dangerous than making paperclips, doesn't make them not dangerous.

Liliet

All angels are paperclip maximizers, which is why it's a great relief that they delegate actual decision making to heroes. Who might really wish angels were not paperclip maximizers but wiser mortals instead, like Tariq does here, but are stuck with their own and only their own ability to evaluate when to maximize paperclips and when not to.

Liliet

The tragedy of all this is that the angels still aren't helping.

Like, I mean, they are, a little. Tariq gets intel, Hanno gets yes/no answers to a very specific kind of yes/no question.

But we don't get well-intentioned agents with the ability to look at the whole board at once evaluating all the factors present and giving explicit directions to their representatives on it.

The heroes wish there were some. But there aren't.

caoimhinh

That has been explained many times before, Above can't intervene so directly because that would escalate the conflict and let Below intervene in the same manner.

Angels make plans and watch a lot of things that are happening, though they don't know everything (it has been stated many times that not even the Gods are omniscient even if they are vastly more knowledgeable). The thing is, they don't lay the entire plans to the Heroes and mortals to follow; instead, the Choirs nudge them into action and give specific guidance to a certain part of the plan while moving the rest in the dark or with different pieces of the board. But they never show all the plan to a single person, that would be too much direct intervention.

Of course, all of this happens while ultimately giving the final choice and duty of carrying it out to the Named. Heroes are technically still able to refuse, but they have been trained into obedience (like Tariq) or outright brainwashed (like William and Hanno) so in practice it's almost a certainty they will obey.

Liliet

You think angels are Bard.

I'm not seeing outcomes turning out in their favor, so I doubt it.

SINISTAR

I would argue that the presence of god entities does not necessarily mean they are right. It just means they have more power. Both "Good" and "Evil" have positive sides, we've seen this. As such, a moral license cannot exist in an absolute state. I don't hate Grey Pilgrim, but he does not have an absolute moral license, he's merely been given a check by one side(when both sides are flawed).

Andrew Mitchell

THIS ^^

caoimhinh

He doesn't have a moral license, actually. While it is understandable that he may see the Angels' presence as confirmation that his choice is correct, that does not make it in fact correct or morally right.

"The Angels told me to do it", "It is God's will", "The Heavens command it", and other such phrases are just excuses for morally wrong actions committed by fanatics in search of a justification.

It's not applying an atheistic worldview, it's applying the truth of morals and principles: They don't change according to who says it. Raping is wrong, no matter if it's a human, satan or god who orders it. Murdering innocents is wrong, even if the Heavens give you permission to do it.

It could very well be one of the reasons why Narrative is working against this Crusade and it's representatives: this Crusade isn't actually righteous and it's morally wrong. It started due to earthly matters, it was aimed against the wrong targets due to ambition, and was later refused the chance of peace due to politics, spinning out of control due to fanaticism. So Catherine, as the one actually looking for peace without screwing everyone else, is the one with an arguably higher moral ground and is the Hero of this whole mess.

Now, Pilgrim does the things he does because he genuinely believes them to be for the greater good of alleviating suffering, always trying to look at the long run, that makes him a well-intentioned extremist. The problem with his conflict against Catherine is that he sees the potential threat she represents, so he moves to end it before it's too late. While we know that Cat has good intentions and we are willing to bet on her as she is the protagonist, from Pilgrim's POV she is an unstable child who is one misstep from going full Evil Overlord mode, and despite that being likely a death sentence for her the amount of death she would cause would be tremendous. When he last met her she was struggling against Winter's influence and now she sold her soul to two goddesses of darkness and murder.

It is UNDERSTANDABLE why he wants to end Catherine and what he is doing, but that doesn't make it CORRECT. And he definitely doesn't have the moral high ground here, the Angels whispering at his shoulders change nothing.

Tek

"That's the thing about heroes, they don't have agency."

"Agency, boy," the abomination said, sounding amused.
"You have discarded yours like a petty bauble and never once considered the cost. Blind faith is such tempting notion, isn't it? Being able to believe in an answer, in a force, without ever questioning it. Certainty and blindness. I have always wondered at the difference."

"Old friends, he thought, help me. Help me see, for once more I am lost. But they had no answers for him, would not take the burden from his shoulders. But they stood at his side

"Do you really," he murmured, "trust me to make that choice?"

The Ophanim thrummed. Agreement, absolute in that way only angels could be"

Dude, you are basically spouting Black Knight instead of thinking for yourself and actually reading what is written. The irony is so thick.

Kissaten

Ophanim are trusting him as long as he is aligned with them. Before they retracted their support once, and since then he, as he admits himself, can wake at dawn only because they push him up. He is their creature soul and body, how would they not trust him? Compare it to trust Sve Noc has in Cat or Black had in Malicia.

>you are basically spouting Black Knight instead of thinking for yourself Was he wrong then?

luminiousblu

The Black Knight is almost always wrong, though. Even ignoring his ludicrously broken view of the world that revolves around 'winning' at life without having a clear definition of what it means to win at all, the Black Knight is wrong in that particular case. It has nothing to do with agency. Hanno has trusted the 'golden luck of heroes', a tool which hasn't failed him before, but the Black Knight has found a way to game the system. Hanno is caught horribly off guard and pays for it. This has nothing to do with agency.

Accusing Hanno of lacking agency because he's decided to rely on a tool which hasn't failed him before but in doing so made a fatal mistake is a lot like accusing Hardrada of lacking agency for setting up camp instead of fortifying his position even though he had no way of knowing Godwinson was three days ahead of schedule and bearing down on his position. That entire segment was, as far as I could tell, just mockery of Black Knight. It read like him bending over backwards to try and justify his feeble position and make every single action reinforce his nonsensical (as in, internally inconsistent) worldview.

>trust Sve Noc has in Cat

The 'trust' Sve Noc has in Cat is utilitarian in nature, don't delude yourself otherwise. Catherine needs Sve Noc, and Sve Noc can't work without Cat.

>or Black had in Malicia

The trust that was ultimately misplaced and arguably should never have been there at all.

Andrew Mitchell

100% genuine question here because I'm curious. What judgement are you making about utilitarianism here?

"The 'trust' Sve Noc has in Cat is utilitarian in nature, don't delude yourself otherwise. Catherine needs Sve Noc, and Sve Noc can't work without Cat."

luminiousblu

I'm not sure I understand your question. I'm using the word 'Utilitarian' in the sense of 'necessarily useful as opposed to necessarily attractive or ideal', not as it relates to the philosophy of utilitarianism, which I'm pretty sure Sve Noc doesn't adhere to in the slightest. So you could reword it as

"Sve Noc 'trusts' Catherine because she knows Catherine needs Sve Noc, and Sve Noc follows Catherine because she needs Catherine. It has nothing to do with inherent trust, merely knowledge that she's irreplaceable."

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, thanks for clarifying your working definition.

"It has nothing to do with inherent trust, merely knowledge that she's irreplaceable."

I think it's more than the fact that Catherine's irreplaceable, although that's part of it. Sve Noc also trusts Catherine because she has thoroughly examined Cat's memories and motivations. And Cat has shown that she (mostly) understand's Sve Noc as well. And their interests align sufficiently for them to work together well.

This doesn't add up to the same sort of trust that Hakram has for Cat but it's still a significant level of mutual trust IMO.

Liliet

He might not have been wrong in his actual beliefs, but what he said at its face was absolutely factually inaccurate, much like the Madman speech. Seraphim had 0 input in Hanno's strategy or decision making here. Their only participation, beyond having armed him with the Name and the purpose in the first place, was confirming his judgement to kill Amadeus during the Nicae battle. Like, that's the ONLY input they had.

Everything else was Hanno having to think for himself and make his own decisions. He literally had no other channel through which to get divine guidance, and we see him figuring out how to do things from his POV in the song interludes.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said.

Mental Mouse

Actually, they do have agency, but it's well-crafted agency. Even if the choirs don't command, they still choose the big-name Heroes carefully, and groom them to service.

As Cat has said, she can predict him because he will always do "the right thing" for his goals, given the information he has. And she has made sure Pilgrim doesn't know she's mortal again, possibly because she doesn't know how he'd react to that. So him thinking and acting as though she was still Winter is part of her scheme.

Liliet

Yes, William “racist terrorist” von Angelsword was definitely a well-crafted big-name hero.

Alternative theory: angels pick up on potential heroes with a mindset aligned with their assigned virtue, automatically home in on them and form a cheerleading squad / support group / pit crew around them, their values and opinions, mysteriously affirming all the exact things they’re already thinking.

And then it either works out, or not, depending on how good at their job the chosen hero turns out to be.

Mental Mouse

That’s basically what I’m saying. Equipping someone with ongoing angelic voices in their head is the equivalent of how cults surround newbies (and each other, for that matter) with established members, to teach the new guy how they should act, speak, think. For more established members, that keeps people from “drifting” – that is, developing in other directions, or starting to doubt the cult tenets. And it tries to displace any connections to outside the cult, fending off reality checks.

William is a classic case: The angels could make sure he never got the idea that he could ever be forgiven, or that he could ever feel worthy of a normal life. So eventually he came up with (or was subtly fed) this scheme to make everyone within 49 miles, including a major city, feel just as horrible as he did...

Liliet

William did not get angels in his head, that’s only Mercy that does that. William never had any communication with angels past that first revelation.

luminiousblu

People equate Tariq with the Black Knight even though they’re basically polar opposites. The way they operate seems to be similar – extremely practical, no-nonsense, capable of both incredible charity and incredible ruthlessness – but Tariq does it because he believes in the cause, the Black Knight does it almost literally to prove he can.

Liliet

Really?

Did Amadeus of the Green Stretch really give you this impression?

Because that's not the impression he gave to literally anyone else who knows him.

luminiousblu

Which impression?

When I say 'to prove he can', I am accusing him of being Chaotic Evil. I'm not, however, accusing him of being Chaotic Retarded or Stupid Evil. Black doesn't really have a goal in mind, as far as I can tell, or at least not one that's been expressed or shown in story. He acts preemptively on the tactical and strategic level but on a metaphysical level he's almost reactive in nature. Catherine wants to keep Callow safe and to maintain some sort of independent nature, and to that end she's willing to do a ton of other stuff. Tariq wants to minimise human suffering. Laurence wants to destroy Evil, being in essence a Paladin of the 'stick up the arse and a smite-happy greatsword' variety. What does Black want? Does anyone know? Does even Black know? Because I'm not convinced he cares too much about Praes, his actions don't work for that as best I can tell post-Crusade.

Liliet

>Black doesn't really have a goal in mind, as far as I can tell, or at least not one that's been expressed or shown in story

Inaccurate.

Remember when Cat asked him that and he gave her a book of Praesi fairy tales and a journal with the numbers on population/land/reign?

And then she informed him that she didn't believe that his goals were Good or that he was a patriot, and so he went on a bullshit "victory for Evil" speech that convinced her like the angry teenager she was.

Moving on to what the actual accurate answer he gave her first was, though,

>The point isn't to make Callow a pack of plundered provinces, it has never been that. It's to ensure we never again destroy ourselves invading that country. Are we so enamoured with that kingdom's crown we cannot allow anyone else to wear it? We win by slipping the noose, not moving the border. By breaking the pattern that has whipped us ever since Maleficent made an empire out of Praes. It is irrelevant who actually rules Callow so long as we no longer need to invade to avoid starving. From that moment on, we start to grow. To change. To be anything but a snake cursed to eat its own tail and choke. Anything less than that is defeat. Anything more than that is expendable.

(Epilogue III, Amadeus yelling at Alaya)

>"Legionaries," he called, a bone-deep shiver giving answer. "Look atop those walls and know you face a millennium of blood and arrogance staring down at you. You know that banner. Your fathers and mothers fought under it, against it. Under that standard Callow was bled a hundred times. Under that standard, Praes tore itself apart at the whims of the mad and the vicious. Are you not tired? I am."

>He laughed, a thing of dark and bitter anger.

>"I have fought this war since I was a boy," he said. "And so have you, in every shop and field and pit there is to be found in this empire. There is no peace with this foe, only struggle from dawn to dusk."

>His voice rose.

>"Legionaries," he called. "You of Praes and Callow, of Steppes and Eyries, you have fought this war before and won it. Forty years ago, we broke the spine of the High Lords. Yet here they stand before us, fangs bared. Will you let this challenge go unanswered?"

(Book 3 Chapter 59: Anakrasis, the pre-Liesse speech)

Amadeus is a farmer's son who rebelled against the inane and abusive ruling class of his country, uniting the oppressed underclass around him. He would have slaughtered all of them if he'd had his way, but was convinced by his best friend to act otherwise, and instead spent 40 years undermining their power and excising their influence. When it turned out this was insufficient to prevent them from harming those he made himself responsible for, he switched his plan back to physically exterminating them.

He wants a better world. He wants justice and fairness, and he hates Evil.

>“It is worse than inconvenient,” Black said. “It is flawed. The Wasteland has made a religion out of mutilating itself. We speak of it with pride. Gods, iron sharpens iron? We have grown so enamoured with bleeding our own we have sayings about it. Centuries ago, field sacrifices were a way to fend off starvation. Now they are a staple of our way of life, so deeply ingrained we cling to them given alternative. Alaya, we consistently blunder so badly we need to rely on demons to stay off destruction. We would rather irreparably damage the fabric of Creation than admit we can be wrong. There is nothing holy about our culture, it needs to be ripped out root and stem as matter of bare survival. Forty years I have been trying to prove success can be achieved without utter raving madness, and what comes at the end?”

(also Epilogue III)

>“The arithmetic holds,” Ranker sighed. “It always does with you. But there’s more to this than the numbers, old friend. We made an order of things, and now it’s crumbling.”

>“And now you wonder what will replace it,” Amadeus said. “And if in that new order, we will still have a place.”

>“Some might say it’s too early to start thinking about after the war,” she said. “You and I know better. No point in even seeking a victory if when achieved it leads nowhere.”

>“A better world,” the Black Knight murmured, looking up at stars that were not those he’d been born under. “Oh, I have wondered. What it might mean, what it would look like.”

>“We made one,” Ranker said. “It’s on fire now.”

>“And who set the flames?” he smiled. “Cordelia Hasenbach. Catherine Foundling. Kairos Theodosian. Children, in our eyes. Yet is it not the right of the younger generation to look at the work of that which came before it and judge it insufficient?"

(Queen's Gambit: Declined)

Amadeus cares, hilariously enough, about greater good and doing the right thing. No, seriously. That's his objective. He's a utilitarian; a patriotic utilitarian who wants to make the world better by making his country better because he loves it and cares about it most.

His country also sucks and he can't make a difference without making himself into that which he hates most.

So he ends up with big, bright and blatant suicidal ideation, considering himself a bad person, a selfish person and also a crutch that needs to be discarded for Empire to move on.

(Source for the above three: Book 3 Chapter Curtains, Book 2 Chapter Council, and Book 3 Chapter Reunion)

Laurence is a smite-happy overzealous paladin.

Amadeus is a revolutionary.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for compiling all that evidence. It's compelling and correct IMO.

You said "... and he hates Evil." and I agree. I think he hates Good too. 'Stupid' Evil and Good both keep the cycle of violence going and, as such, hamper his efforts towards the greater good.

Liliet

I honestly actually think he doesn't.

Here's the worst of what he has to say about Good:

> A band of Named had come after him, girded with Light and wearing the grim rictuses of individuals carrying out a necessary evil – always without the capital, of course, and preferably phrased as the 'greater good' instead.

(hypocrisy and refusing to properly name what they are doing)

(Epilogue IV)

>“There’s nothing righteous about martyrdom,” Black spoke, tone thick with distaste. “How gloriously they die on their pyres, those blessed few who think themselves above all of... this. And yet what do they really accomplish? Refusing to accept reality for what it is instead of what you think it should be is not being high-minded, it is cowardice. I take no guidance from someone whose crowning achievement is their own death. Sacrifice solves nothing on its own. It is no substitute for the labour needed to change things, just an easy way out.”

(inefficiency and going for morality good feeling points instead of actual results)

(Book 2 Chapter 15 Council) and my favorite crowning jewel:

>“It doesn’t matter how flawless the scheme was, how impregnable the fortress or powerful the magical weapon,” he said. “It always ends with a band of adolescents shouting utter platitudes as they tear it all down. The game is rigged so that we lose, every single time.”

(Book 2 Chapter 36 Madman)

Why is it my favorite, you ask? Why, I’ll answer with another quote:

>“The things Heiress knows, you can learn. You will learn. But that indignation you’ve got boiling under your skin? That’s not something that can be taught. And it’s exactly why you’ll beat her, when the time comes.”

(Book 1 Chapter 10 Menace)

Hates Good? He has a detailed argument for why he doesn’t take guidance from it (and that one clearly imho relates to the kid heroes he’s been killing for 20 years). Its most defining characteristic, one that he had a whole speech about hating, he at another time expressed as the reason he wants Catherine as his student and not Akua.

And don’t get it wrong, he’s not doing it out of coldly calculated “I don’t like it but it works”.

>“I chose you,” he mused, “because I remember what it’s like, that feeling in your stomach when you look at the world around you and you know you could do better. That if you had the authority and the power, you wouldn’t make the mistakes you see the people who have it make.”

He chose Catherine and bet on her because that’s how he himself is.

Oh, he’s a couple of steps removed from Good per se, himself. He still identifies with Below as his side, and he’s been sliding down the slippery slope of necessary evil out of sheer sloppiness and exhaustion: he hasn’t been minimizing harm as much as he possibly could and going for easier (but worse) solutions instead.

But.

(No, I really don’t think he hates the kids he’s been killing. I think they weigh on him, and I think he’s been deliberately learning things about them and getting to know them so they won’t stop doing so. He told Catherine about himself and Scribe debating their guesses at her intentions on the way to Laure, and he did not have the idea to make her his student until he’s already met her, as described in Epilogue I. These deaths weigh even on Sabah, and she’s grateful to Amadeus that he’s taken the darkest parts on himself)

Kissaten

Big thanks to Liliet to compiling all of those quotes.

It doesn’t seem so to me that he hates Evil, well, not any more than he hates Good. The very word “villain” is a repurposed word originally meant for those of lower class, peasants who rented land from lords (and we for a fact know that etymology for english words actually works in Guideverse, “inflammable”). It kind of fits with his Duni heritage, i think, with them being colonists or maybe legionaries who wrestled land from natives coming from Miezans stock, who were both slavers and quite possibly on the Good side since Duni worship Above IIRC. They brought chains and branded those of lower classes villainous, and Miezans were notoriously good at making brands stick, what’s that with orcs having only one Name in over a millenia. It may be just that for Praesi as a whole – Good guys coming and forcing them into villainous roles, maybe just because they were pricks, maybe because it made putting down rebellions easier given how heroes are promised victories over villains. It is narratively quite easy to put suicidal and crazy villains such as those into position of ones who were abused.

Come to think of it, nazi elves must have come with Miezans as allies or advisors or the guys who gave them means to cross the ocean. What's that with land stealing, genocides and their cousins on other continent.

caoimhinh

Amadeus hates the self-mutilating stupidity of Evil and the self-righteous hypocrisy of Good, and he also detests the arrogance of both.

Andrew Mitchell

Once again Lilliet, thanks for your amazing effort to bring so much good evidence to our discussions. I truly appreciate it.

I think we're all (@Lilliet @Kissaten @caoimhinh) __largely__ in agreement here. My point was not that he hates the heroes as Good individuals. He hates their stupidity (and yes, hypocrisy) that means they don't actually make progress towards the greater good.

Liliet

@caoimnh I am seeing a rather different degree of "hate" there.

Amadeus aches for the self-righteous hypocrisy of Good and really wishes people who embody it would know better and do better. He'd wholeheartedly cheer for any hero who managed to be more effective in fulfilling their objectives, even if said hero was also going against him in the process.

Amadeus would set the Wasteland nobles on fire and cackle to their screams as they burn.

Very good point re: origin of "villain" @Kissaten, but that meaning has mutated to the exact opposite in the context of Praes. Praesi villainy is specifically the ruling class, and while they're making something of a point of being egalitarian, the part that truly keeps the Evil going, the part that Amadeus hates, is specifically nobles with their game of thrones and their field sacrifices and their pride in "iron sharpens iron". He's not looking at origins here, he's looking at what is right in front of him.

He dismissed Akua as her mother's messenger and nothing more, even though Akua was a mutilated child hating her mother and ready to rebel against her. Amadeus is not seeing as deeply as you are / as we are into this.

Liliet

@Andrew Mitchell yep he hates the reasons that heroes lose, he has compassion for them as individuals.

He has 0 compassion for villains as individuals. Including himself.

For all his empathy Amadeus is a damn harsh person, much more so than Catherine, and much more radical in his idealism.

luminiousblu

That is literally Tariq. Tariq isn't someone who stays the course when there's nothing for him. His logic is that he has very little to gain by refusing and a lot to lose. On the other hand, by accepting, he plays into Catherine's hands, but at the very least he does obtain a victory and most of his goals. He's extraordinarily clear-minded.

IDKWhoitis

It's good to see Hakrams inner workings again. That absolute faith in Catherine's decisions.

Also, are we to find only Catherine alone in Arcadia to make the surrender? Because I'm beginning to suspect that while Cat and Tariq exchange curses and discussions of great importance, I don't actually think the battle will stop meanwhile.

And then the league arrives.

It's like inviting your archenemy into your home, offering them a seat and a glass of wine, and waiting until your frenemy throws a molotov cocktail through the window. In the ensuing chaos, no one wins, but more importantly, they lost more.

Liliet

I think Cat is better at this than that.

Morgenstern

If no one wins, wouldn't that be a draw?
Unless "everyone loses" counts as losing that still shatters that thread of three...

Andrew Mitchell

The pattern of three stopped when Tariq accepted Cat's unconditional surrender.

certainlight

I'm wondering what Tariq's potential interaction with the Tyrant might be. His past smothering of a young king would hold parallels with the Tyrant's state. While a new Pattern of Three seems unlikely given the Tyrant's entrance to this battle as a molotov cocktail (well put), the result may not be so chaotic as is typical for Catherine's plans. Especially given that Hakram was uniquely placed as having known of both plots (Catherine's surrender and the notice to the Tyrant), meaning not only that the Tyrant will now unexpectedly engage, but that it is intentionally due to the surrender. This forces a new story thread more than chaos. But whether that is due to Catherine's maturity as a character to rely less on chaos, or the current circumstances with the dead King, remains to be seen. Perhaps both are the same.

Mental Mouse

What if the surrender was actually a masterful winning strike that ruined everyone else's plans and didn't even really cost her that much?

Argentorum

Tyrant and Cat are really perfect for each other. Like, if he'd been the first arc villain instead of Akua, it would have been a drag because Cat was too serious back then.

But now she and her main nemesis both know how to have a little fun. And really, what is a horse, anyway? Is it a place or a state of mind?

It is obviously another name for a goat painted white.

"Saddle my goat."

I swear that is one of the most beautiful lines ever written.

certainlight

There has got to be bombs in that goat. Bombs that Hakram doesn't seem to know about (or does, but the Tyrant doesn't care and will ride them anyway). Or Robber is somehow involved in putting bombs in this goat. While it's still alive.

Okay, there's probably not bombs in this goat. But there could be.

Note that disturbing gaze... I suspect Kairos used his Wish aspect to read Hakram's desires. Hakram of course is utterly loyal to Cat... and, purposely, only has partial knowledge of what's going on. Heh heh heh...

I think he does that to everyone. The aspect has both a passive 'see peoples true desire' and an active, 'make a wish' component.

Well Cat had arranged this beforehand.

"I want prisoners well treated, even Praesi and greenskins," I said. "Neither beaten, tortured nor otherwise harmed. I'll extend the same treatment to anyone I capture. I'm also willing to arrange regular prisoner exchanges when the campaign allows."

"There are evils I have been forced to make peace with," the Pilgrim said with iron in his voice. "Torture is not one of them. You may be certain I will allow no such thing so long as I draw breath.

"No killing of anyone offering surrender," I proposed.

"So long as that surrender is genuine, and no attempt at treachery is made,"

Someguy

Treachery will come from Kairos and thus Grey Boi's hands will be tied threefold & Cat will be beyond his reach forever.

Liliet

Of course, if Cat doesn't intend to support Pilgrim against Kairos this scheme would constitute treachery on her part as well.

Of course, Cat has 0 motivation to not turn on Kairos here 😊

Javvies

No, Cat doesn't need to lift a finger to help Tariq.

She's surrendered, and it's been accepted.

She's Tariq's prisoner, not claiming to be his ally right now.

Andrew Mitchell

IIRC she surrendered "her armies and all she commands" or something to that effect. She did not surrender herself and I think Tariq noted that during his consideration of her offer.

Javvies

Either way, Cat doesn't need to help Tariq deal with Kairos.

Admittedly, she'll probably do something, most likely try to arrange for negotiations to take place.

Liliet

She's the one who's bringing Kairos there, though. It's treachery unless it's unambiguously not.

Mental Mouse

For reference:

> "in the spirit of our close and cordial alliance, I offer my support for the demand that will be made by the League of Free Cities in exchange for its acquiescence to a peace conference. That support will have the full weight of my force and influence behind it."

"Naturally, this is contingent on your own support in extricating the Army of Callow and its allies from their current difficulties," I said. "Should you refuse, I will be forced to withdraw from Procer entirely and begin preparing the east for the wars that will come in the wake of the Principate's destruction."

That said... how is it treachery? It's sneaky, but calling for help from an ally before you surrender isn't actually breaking an oath, nor even disloyalty. Offering Kairos an open favor is risky, but remember, Kairos' chaotic style fits well with Cat's own tactics of exploiting chaos. Odds are good that the demand will be something Cat can work with, and if not, well "the full weight of my force and influence" is somewhat diminished since she's abdicated and surrendered her forces.

mmmmmaybe

I still get an iffy vibe off it but we shall see

Mental Mouse

BTW, I missed this on first read, so others might also have: It looks to me like the Tyrant and his troops are currently in the Arcadia fragment, where Hakram could easily see the troops across the barren plain. So Mageso's still doing something, but there's room in there for other stuff to wander past.

Don'tcha just hate it when you create your own pocket universe and people keep wandering in?

Liliet

Yeah ♥

apperatus27

Oh my goodness, that's masterful! Good catch, Antonin!

Dainpdf

I don't think she was exactly planning for that... though she did certainly take advantage of it.

Mental Mouse

That's the thing – naifs and fools make exact plans for the long range. Real schemers make specific plans for the short range, and general plans for the long range... and in between those, they prepare the ground and set up contingency plans.

Dainpdf

I think she just wanted ground rules to diminish casualties because her people had suffered enough. And because she couldn't afford the manpower loss.

Mental Mouse

While he wanted to write out the rest of her story from there. Cat got what she wanted, Pilgrim didn't – because she was being more realistic.

Dainpdf

She took a gamble, and it paid off. That's sort of a theme with her.

I would hardly say Pilgrim was the least realistic of the two. He has been operating in his way for decades. She wants to do something that most people consider inconceivable.

Mental Mouse

Tariq may have been been operating for decades, but Amadeus and Cat had already been changing the rules on him. Even by Liesse, he was acutely aware that he'd seriously underestimated Amadeus. But even as he decided "I'd better make sure of this one", he failed to consider the hazards of trying a full confrontation and losing.

So now she's back badder (and smarter) than ever. But instead of brooding uselessly over past defeats like a proper villain :), she's lost some character flaws, and picked up a whole new powerset, complete with deadly allies. Got even better at story-fu, for sauce. And Pilgrim still tries for full confrontation, the dumbass. Cat learned and improved herself, Pilgrim didn't.

Dainpdf

They've been changing the rules on him? You seem to forget Pilgrim straight up outplayed Amadeus. And what do you mean "by Liesse"? I don't recall the Pilgrim being involved in either of the debacles by that name.

And yeah, Cat has improved. Which is why the Pilgrim just changed tacks.

Mental Mouse

"by Liesse", I mean by the time he was discussing the Liesse Accords with her.

And Pilgrim didn't "outplay" Amadeus, he took a plague to a sword fight, with angelic assistance and raw power. And Amadeus was already on a downslide – stranded on the wrong side of a mountain range, rampaging through Procer with no obvious end point, stretching his Name's power to breaking point. And then as soon as Cat's out of the Everdark, here she is trying to get him back (more effectively than the Legions were), and I'll bet burgers to steaks she ends up back in power and even stronger.

Dainpdf

That sounds like trying to talk around the sin of defeat. If it were Cat doing the same maneuver it would be an outplay. In the hands of the Pilgrim it's cheating.

Oh, and Amadeus wasn't on the downslide, exactly. He'd chosen to be on the other side, and he'd been running laps around the Procerans. Felt pretty confident, too, right up until people started dropping dead around him.

Liliet

@Daindpf I agree re: Tariq outplaying him, but the downslide bit is also correct. Amadeus has himself admitted that their “invasion” of Procer is a glorified raid, and that they’re stranded there with no way back and no endgame other than “piss in Hasenbach’s porridge as much as they can, then gloriously perish”. There’s a reason his reply to Tariq telling him that fighting won’t end well for him was “that was always rather the point” 😡

Liliet

^^^

Catherine did the right thing. It paid off for her in the long term.

That’s how it works 😊

Dainpdf

Well, sometimes. Other times it gets you killed.

Liliet

Often both 😊

ahd

Oh, another solemn promise made by Tariq.

Now does the Sword of Saints believe in torture?

And can Tariq take Laurence in a no-holds-barred duel to enforce his word?

konstantinvoncarstein

Story-wise, he would be the hero trying to be honorable, and the Saint a bloodthirsty brute. Tariq would probably win this one.

Fayhem

Not to mention, he would be acting honorably in defense of others which has been shown is the single biggest key to unlocking his full powers. Laurence is an asshole, a fanatic, and a long-term idiot, but she isn’t a short-term idiot. She might threaten but if Tariq made it clear it would be a fight between them over this I think she’d back down – she might take a swing at the prisoners just to test his will (see: she’s an asshole), but she wouldn’t push it past the point of no return I don’t think.

Novice

I mean the Saint (and the Pilgrim since it's most probably his plan) already practices pseudo-necromancy what with severing Black's soul. Torture is probably only a half-step away.

We've already seen what happened with the Saint when she outright disrespected the sanctity of a truce so I assume Pilgrim can hold her leash if he really wants to.

ahd

Does Black not having actually surrendered affect this, I wonder?

Liliet

Definitely yes. Black never surrendered, never agreed to stay in custody and never stopped being aggressive in the way he could i.e. verbally. Remember how he plotted to either run or take a sharp rock and try to kill one of the heroes with it while he had a chance? It was his prerogative, but it was in return their prerogative to do with him as they saw necessary. Cutting out his soul was wrong only in the sense of "can you do that to anyone under any circumstances" because if it's permissible under any, these are those.

Mental Mouse

I've said before that the soul-separation thing was likely the only way they could actually contain and restrain him.

Liliet

Yep.

I mean we've seen all their containment effort fail. The only thing that stopped him from escaping / killing one of them then and there was Bard's fuckery.

Mental Mouse

The Saint of Swords doesn't have the patience for torture. 😏

certainlight

Possibly, but Tariq does exactly this: he evaluates the genuine nature of the surrender before accepting. I'm not sure Cat would expect that of him, given how much he's turned on previous agreements. I think the stronger case is the simpler one: a true truce works better for both of them, even if it leaves Tariq no longer able to kill Cat.

Liliet

Yep.

SpeckofStardust

To second Liliet here, Yep.

Further more he seemed to reject the idea that she could fully counter him if he said no, I mean that would end the pattern of 3 as well in that case. The fact that accepting was his gut reaction and final decision reminds me why he's in the top 3 favorite Good characters.

(not counting the badasses that die in a single chapter mind you)

Stormblessed

Gods Below and Above! Cat's playing them all so well. So predicted the Pilgrim's move, then penned the letter to break the pattern of three, only to use the Tyrant as a way to wiggle out of actually following through on the surrender. Especially because if she is no longer of the material plan than she cannot actually follow through with her surrender until after the Tyrant will have turned back the tide, making the surrender unnecessary and placing her on better grounds in the peace talks to come with all sides.

Except for the fact that everyone will be cross with her after her schemes of course.

Insanenoodlyguy

She's the arch-vile of the west. There was no version of this where she wasn't sitting down at a table of people very cross with her. And Tyrant is ready to betray her even though she's his best friend, so also really no change. The cost here in personal credit/trust is very low.

Rook

Realistically the tyrant is going to betray someone, the only variable is who. What Catherine just did is the equivalent of losing the lead in Mario Kart to make someone else eat the blue shell.

Dainpdf

I see it more as forcing Kairos to tip his hand and commit, while also making him the Pilgrim's problem.

Kissaten

Kairos is honour-bound to stab the would be winner in the back. The beauty of it is that Levantines and Procerans don't even want to win, and that is literally and figuratively what will stab them in the back in form of a League who doesn't want a win either. Pilgrim will get his draw. Against entirely different opponent, but still.

Dainpdf

Kairos? Honor? Sorry, that does not parse.

But yeah, his scheme requires fighting and stalemates, which Cat just doused. So he must commit his own forces to that objective.

Fuodiachloris

How dare you! Slander! Liable! Calumny! cough

Kairos actually has a brand of honour to him: to be the Biggest Bad he can be, he'll do the dirtiest deed available while maniacally mugging at the rafters. You can take that to the bank... after properly screening it, checking it for malware and dipping it in peroxide.

Insanenoodlyguy

Exactly. Kairos is Dirk Dastardly with a crown, and like that man, proud of it. He doesn't even want a clean victory if one were obtainable, they could offer him everything he wants at the peace table and he'd still have to stab somebody's back or the whole day's been a failure.

Mental Mouse

Except he doesn't have a direct loss against Kairos – I don't think he was even with the troops that got chased through the gate. The big risk here is that Kairos gets Amadeus's soul, which he probably just learned about through his Wish aspect.

Insanenoodlyguy

Unless she was counting on that to. Him showing up with something like that is a highly likely story for him and her. Which also means that he can find that soul far, far easier than she can.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but Kairos would probably put it into the goat, just for yuks.

Liliet

I think Cat's already got Amadeus's soul, given that Rogue Sorcerer is around and Cat has been suspiciously M.I.A.

Liliet

I'm not sure the surrender isn't going to be followed up on. As Tariq has pointed out, if it's just a petty scheme it dunks her narratively, while a legitimate surrender not only gives her moral high ground – which she badly badly needs to keep her head above the water in this clusterfuck – but also doesn't actually go against any of her objectives. It's not like she wanted to fight the Grand Alliance.

If the surrender is real, what she loses is some of the bargaining power.

If the surrender is fake, what she loses is trust and narrative momentum.

I think she's setting up Kairos for a backstab from her own armies / the Wild Hunt. He's not a friend to her and she's not going to treat him like one.

Mental Mouse

"Oh, you seem to have some League troops attacking you. Too bad all my guys are prisoners... but hey, maybe we can work something out here."

Liliet

Mhm!

Sylwoos

I might be starting to get where Cat is going.

With her baiting the Tyrant in action and abandoning the crown to Vivienne, The League, The Alliance and The Legions are about to take a swing at each other in a tri-way battle. Meanwhile, the Drows and her will pull out of the conflict as agreed by her surrender and become a fourth, uninvolved party to the current conflict.

Then, when Arcadia is ripped apart and all hell are let loose (because of course it will), who'll be in the perfect position to mediate between the three side, force them to the negotiation table and form a new alliance under her neutral guidance to handle the new threat? Catherine Fucking Foundling.

Once again, she's playing everybody and keep switching hat to stop others from pinning her down. Taric is trying to trap the Black Queen in a story, but she have already traded the warlord role for a priest one, First Under the Night. Now she's a perfect position to be the representative of the Evil side, while Taric is already the representative of Good and there's a threat looming that will force Good and Evil to join hand.

Deal will be struck and a new alliance to preserve Calernia will be born, with Cat and Taric co-leading it.

danh3107

This is some Creed levels of tactical genius...

CAAT!!

Ekmo

I was wondering why the screen on my phone could scroll so far right.

Super long words in the comment section breaks spacing boundaries!

Kissaten

Wonder if Book of all Things (and a gargoyle) playing a role of Atalante's general counts in the same vein as a honorary citizenship of Below in the Bellerophon

Agent J

Depends on the conviction, I suppose.

konstantinvoncarstein

Probably 🤔 If not, there would be no more Bellerophon

Insanenoodlyguy

So that's it, it is? Tyrant literally just can't help sticking his hand in this cookie jar now that he knows there's some kind of unexpected scheme going on. He's not even sure if he wants to help or disrupt it yet, but he knows he's gotta be part of it.

Dainpdf

Catherine surrendering kind of put a kibosh on his previous schemes. Now he needs to salvage what he can... and Cat just forced his hand, narratively.

Liliet

Nope, it's more specific and straightforward than that. Cat has figured out what he is trying to do and hit directly at that.

He wants a standoff between her and the Grand Alliance; if the two sides miraculously mold into one, he loses. It's a bad move for him to interfere here, but if he doesn't, he's already lost.

Shequi

Kairos is actually going to ride that goat into battle now, isn't he?

Oshi

Oh fuck yes he will.

The mad king rides upon his war-goat.

Dainpdf

If that goat does not explode or at least zombify I will be seriously cross.

Mental Mouse

Kairos himself may mutate it into an abomination or suchlike.

Euodiachloris

Who knows what he could do, given his aspects... Continually renewing and dazzling white whitewash, growing to the size of an average horse, double-speed and the ability to camel spit? Adhesive saddle (prepare to use that jumping ability, why not?)?

However he boosts that goat, he'll probably take care to retain the goatiest nanny goat whoever goated.

And if that doesn't scare people, they've never faced an angry goat with a list of opinions about your continued upright existence.

Liliet

I mean I doubt he's physically capable of riding on horseback/goatback. Now having the goat pull a chariot for him...

Mental Mouse

He may have been sickly originally, but his Name lends him "an unnatural strength". I'm sure he's capable of riding.

Liliet

Does it?

Mental Mouse

Well, it does for all the other Named we've seen.... The description varies by theme, of course.

Liliet

It depends on whether the Name is martial. I don't think Scribe or Augur have any physical feats baked into their Roles, and I suspect for Tyrant it would vary person by person – and for Kairos, it's really not a part of who he is. Evil Roles sharpen strengths, not cover weaknesses.

ahd

Heiress?

Liliet

I think Heiress gets a little bit of everything? This is all speculation, we never saw Akua in a proper fight as Heiress IIRC, other than at First Liesse end, and that was a very special kind of story clusterfuck

Mental Mouse

"Evil Roles sharpen strengths, not cover weaknesses." Up to a point, but infirm or physically helpless villains don't make very good stories! Catherine certainly used her power to cover for her injuries even as Squire, notably that leg.

IIRC, we haven't had POV from Scribe or Augur, but I'll note that those are traditionally non martial roles – who ever heard of a scribe or soothsayer going into combat? In contrast, Tyrant is a very flexible role, and Kairos has demonstrated that he's leaning into it and well able to exploit any technicalities he comes across; not to mention that if he can set whole fortresses flying, he should certainly be able to do something about his physical infirmities. And the sickly and/or deformed villain who's not actually limited much by their condition, is a trope in itself, from Gollum to Emperor Palpatine.

Liliet

Catherine had an entirely different Role. Physical disability is actually bog standard for mastermind-type villains.

And tbh I think physical disability that does not actually disallow anything specific is straight up bad writing. There have to be tangible limitations, like Catherine's relief when she sits down and absolute disinclination to walk any longer than she has to.

Someguy

"It appears someone will have to saddle my goat," Kairos Theodosian mused, "for we now must ride out in glorious battle."

...Someone has to illustrate THIS scene of GLORY!

ruduen

I'm mostly curious as to if it will still be a normal goat by the time he's riding it into combat.

Kissaten

It is secretly a dog.

Agent J

I wish, but more straight laced characters have noted it has udders. Goat udders. Because it is a goat.

I was partial to the dog with horns as well. It'd have been a nice parallel to her staffswordprayer.

The dog that is not a dog, but a goat which is not a goat, but a purebred Liessen charger.

Dainpdf

It must be an explosive goat. Surely Kairos will have heard of the technique and approved.

Jarthon

Oh it has to be. The audience would never forgive anything else. Unfortunately I don't think that an exploding goat has enough narrative weight to kill Kairos (since that would be a pretty big anticlimax), but it would be greatly amusing.

Mental Mouse

An exploding goat would just annoy Kairos, and a regular goat is annoying enough. 😊 Besides, the goat is there to carry him into an exploding situation.

Dainpdf

I didn't mean that Cat made the goat explosive to kill Kairos.

I meant Kairos should make the goat explosive as homage to Cat and because it's hilarious.

Nocturne

I may :P.

Liliet

P L E A S E

apperatus27

Yesss, yessss! I felt like Mace Windu this chapter because I got to feel some Shatterpoints, yo!

Mike E.

I actually get that reference!

JJR

I wonder, what's the odds that there's goblin munitions in that goat?

It's just such a random thing to include in a package to a madman. Playing into the randomness does seem to be the best way to approach Kairos, so it makes sense in that regard. But then you figure there's a good chance he'll reciprocate and ride the thing, so why not trap it. Plus putting munitions inside animals is one of Cat's signature moves, along with getting blamed for fires and dying upwards.

Amoonymous

At first I was going to say no way, it's not worth the risks.

Then I remembered she gave the goat to Kairos, and he would probably find the goat attempting to blow him up endearing, and might be disappointed if Cat didn't even try something.

fbt

that would be hilarious, I have to admit.

Cat: "what? you didn't see this coming? c'mon, I do this to everyone. It might as well have had a warning label. Like hot coffee. "

Kairos has an anyerusim in response.

Much rejoicing occurs.

Dainpdf

That'd be great, but the goat is alive.

John

The army of callow has tens of thousands of people, including a supply train and Praesi mages. Is it really so hard to believe they'd be able to find a veterinary surgeon capable of implanting munitions, without killing the goat in question or leaving any scars which all that whitewash couldn't conceal?

RanVor

It's more about it being too cruel for Catherine.

Liliet

^^^ ;u;

I love the realization that this is legit the only reason I think she hasn't done it.

Dainpdf

Yes, especially given how munitions can react to power.

kgyl21

She's gotten practice since the first time when she killed them trying to get the munitions in.

Javvies

No. The first time they were already dead. She reanimated them and only then had the munitions put inside at the end.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, she didn't handle the goat herself, she told Hakram to see to it. Potentially he could have stuck something in there himself, but there's no hint he's even experimented with the shadow energies that Squire and Black Knight used to trigger munitions (among other things).

Oh, hey, imagine if Hakram replaced his "other" hand with one of pure shadow....

Oshi

It's nice to have confirmation that it's Hierophant behind the mess in Arcadia. I hope Cat or Archer can save him.

Mental Mouse

Well, we were pretty sure from what Cat saw. The question is still exactly what he's doing... and whether he'll intervene in the current fight. IIRC, Masego hasn't actually met Kairos, but I doubt he'd appreciate the Tyrant's style.

Insanenoodlyguy

I wonder what actually happened to the original delegate from Atalante?

JJR

Got turned into a book I suspect.

Agent J

Atalante is hard core Light-side. It's just as likely that they simply refused to ride against the crusaders. Hell, some of their priests might even have participated in the conclave, but don't quote.

RanVor

IIRC, they were not allowed to participate because the Hierarch is a villain.

Isaac Martinez

At least the goat is still alive.

Nairne .01

Thank you.

taovkool

You know that someone is getting really gud when they could fuck up their opponent's day by surrendering.

GG Catherine

Liliet

Hmmm.

Actually I think it's a fairly standard outcome for surrender to fuck over the people who are being surrendered to. It's the same category of thing as Malicia sending refugees over to Cat's border: here, have stuff I've got! What, it's more of a resource drain than a resource gain? Well that's not my problem any longer 😊

Remember how Cat was wondering what to do with the Helikean cataphracts because her army could not manage that many prisoners? The same dilemma.

Surrender is always lose-lose, both sides suffering a blow. It's just that most of the time it fucks over the surrendering side more than the side receiving the surrender. So the key to making surrender an effective ploy is not sharpening the blow to the other side, it's cushioning the blow to yours.

Although Catherine has certainly sharpened the blow here, too

Liliet

Like putting into game theory terms... war is a negative sum game a standard situation that forces surrender for one of the sides is like battle: -5/-10 (aka certain defeat) surrender: -1/-5 (aka you're still defeated but at least you lose less)

(and the difference goes from -5 in favor of the other side to -4 in favor of the other side, at that)

(and the other side accepts this tradeoff because The Ethical Rules Governing Warfare dictate that you look at the total sum too / because it's an iterated prisoner's dilemma kind of thing / because they care about the losses to their side more than the losses to the enemy's side)

(or it doesn't and the surrender doesn't work, alas) or even battle: -5/-10

surrender: -1/-2

...if you have a good solid guarantee that your forces will be treated well and don't lose on any objectives other than prestige/convenience, which is our situation here...

...and Catherine's situation is like at face value:

battle: -5/-5 (a bloody draw) surrender: -1/-2 (Catherine's loss, but a much smaller total loss) or including the narrative part it's more like battle: -5/-15 (a draw with a promise of certain loss down the line)

surrender: -1/-2

...the difference going from -10 to -1 in an overwhelming meta-victory for Catherine

Mental Mouse

Note that the "iterated" part of the game is the original way to include prior behavior and (with tournaments) reputation; game theory has in fact turned out to be the mathematical model applying to ethics and morality; the key concept for the situations represented by the IPD is trust). In the Guideverse, ethics and morality are also baked into the world rules, with direct penalties for certain offenses.

Liliet

Yep.

Mental Mouse

In the longer term, there's also the classic trick of absorbing a conquering people over time. In our own world, China has done that repeatedly, most spectacularly with the Mongols (They came in, took over... and a few generations later, you couldn't tell the difference.) In the Guideverse, that's one interpretation of what Callow is doing.

Liliet

Oh yes that is definitely what's happening.

And I would argue that this is what Amadeus was deliberately going for, because Callow is much closer to what he wants Praes to be than actual Praes is, in all their non-blood-sacrificing glory. He wanted Catherine to eventually climb the Tower. It's not Praes assimilating Callow that he wanted

Javvies

Freaking took you long enough to get to the point of realizing you were getting tunnel vision on what Cat could become instead of what she is currently and what she's offering. Fuck's sake, you knew (or could/should have known through your Behold Aspect/the Ophanim looking at her) that she was genuinely willing to help you kick over the Tower and join the Alliance and help against the Dead King. Instead you had to reject her offers of helping and signing onboard, blowing up your redemption play (that she was offering to cooperate with), leading her between a hostile Grand Alliance and a hostile Praes. How did you not expect things to turn against you? How did you expect her to do anything but become more dangerous and take greater risks for power to protect and defend Callow(and herself)?

I'm not sure what's going on with the League and Kairos's plans. But his arrival should be interesting. Even more interesting will be the Alliance reaction to the League's arrival.

I wonder how Alliance armies (and Heros) are going to react to Cat's surrender and Tariq's acceptance of it. And how he's going to stop the fighting.

Also interesting will be the reaction to the letter to Viv.

Dainpdf

Bit of a Pascal's Wager there. In that he had to prevent the small-probability case that was infinitely bad. And in that it's not exactly sound logic anymore... we hope.

Javvies

Thing is, that's not exactly true.

The story possibility was there, yes, but he has an Aspect – Behold – that lets him see the inner truth of people.

He knew that Cat genuinely wanted peace. He knew what her offer was, and Behold would have let him know it was made in good faith.

He even had her willing to cooperate with a redemption play.

Dainpdf

He saw there was possibility she would fall to alienation or to the shapes of the stories around her. There still is.

The possibility was small, but it was there. Cat has always played with corrupting influences for power. I mean, she took Black's dagger, she forced an aspect in the presence of a demon...

And that's all fine and dandy when the one at risk is her, but when it's all of Calernia? And she was risking falling on that path.

She's at that risk anymore, really, but now Pilgrim can't Behold her. So he was working on old, faulty info. Which has been a component in him repeatedly getting played.

werafdsaew

Except that his very action is accentuating that risk. And when Cat offered to abdicate and redeem herself, and thus vastly reducing the risk, he refused! If she really was that much of a risk then when an opportunity to vastly reduce that risk is offered, you take it.

Dainpdf

Did that offer really reduce the risk, especially with the conditions she had outlined?

She'd still be immortal, with the alienation and power of an entire court behind her, and she'd still be something of an avatar of Callowan spite. She'd still be there as a cultural influence, and ready to take over the moment she thought Callow was being mistreated.

Javvies

He had her lined up for a redemption play.

And she was willing to go along with it.

Dainpdf

That was way later, after the Battle of Camps, and he had to maneuver her into it.

Javvies

If he'd taken the deal she was offering before the Battle of the Camps, she'd have voluntarily flipped sides, and skipped over the need for a redemption play.

Javvies

Urgh.

The only thing gained by holding out for the forced redemption play instead of a voluntary flip is that a Narratively enforced redemption play usually delivers redemption through death/sacrifice.

luminiousblu

Her dying completely removes the threat, which is Tariq's goal. A chance, however minuscule, that Catherine might go full Queen of Winter on Callow was too much to contemplate.

Liliet

She was not offering him a deal before the Battle of Camps. He offered her one, and she asked if he could control the Procerans into not cutting Callow up. He admitted he couldn't, and that was that.

Catherine wasn't offering shit at the time.

Mental Mouse

Comments like “her dying completely removes the threat” sound funny given how often she has died.

werafdsaew

Once she abdicates, she no longer has access to Callow’s resources, making her a lot less dangerous. And without the duties of a Queen, she has a lot less reason to draw on Winter. And then there’s the redemption angle.

Dainpdf

A redemption angle which would lose a lot of momentum with her abdication, while still leaving her immortal, with great influence over Callow, and alienated.

Oh, and which would require the Pilgrim to break the Grand Alliance in half.

werafdsaew

In other words, he judged that handling Cat is less important than the Grand Alliance. Well he made his bed and must now lie in it.

Dainpdf

No. He judged that handling Cat was more important than all the people who would die in that conflict. Back then.

Right now, he chose the opposite. Partly because of the dead king, and partly because Cat has changed. She’s mortal again.

Javvies

You’re missing my point.

Sure, the story/Narrative possibilities were there for Cat to go really bad.

On the other hand, Tariq knows that she genuinely wants peace and can see her attempting actions and making offers to help your side, even to join your side. And Tariq has the ability to find out that she’s making those offers genuinely and on good faith.

Dainpdf

Her intent mattered little when the possibility is considered – at least in the utilitarian ethics Tariq seems to operate. Cat presented a risk of utter destruction, so that risk must be ended.

Javvies

He had her lined up for a redemption play.

And she was willing to go along with it.

Dainpdf

You mean after the Battle of Camps? He maneuvered her into that one, and soon after went to see the dead king, who (due to Malicia, but Cat would have done a similar deal) forced the Pilgrim's hand into binning that plot. Also Black.

Javvies

She went to Pilgrim and got rejected (again!) before going to Keter.

And if he had kept his word and stayed in Callow, he'd still have the redemption play on Cat, and by extension, at least the possibility of one on Sve Noc.

Liliet

He couldn't possibly have known that Cat would still be open to a redemption play after she came back. She more or less gave him an ultimatum of "either you help me here or fuck your redemption".

Cat fucked up this game as much as he did, in pretending to be more dangerous / unstable / hostile than she really was.

Javvies

No, there fuckup isn't Cat's it's basically all on Tariq (and Cordelia).

He had Cat willing to cooperate with his redemption play if he were willing to give even a tiny bit on Cat's desires for protecting Callow from his supposed allies.

He refused on purely worldly concerns – the consequences to Procer if Callow suddenly wasn't an enemy to be conquered and divided up in the aftermath.

It's part of why Cat is so pissed at him – it wasn't the Ophanim exercising veto power to reject her offer, it was all Tariq and he said as much to her face.

If he was so worried about what Below could do with the leverage of Cat's desires to protect Callow (from everybody), he should have thought a bit more about what happens next when he refuses to help her on that front.

If he, with his redemption story on her, refuses to help her protect her people/country when she asks him to ... where else does she have to turn to for help?

I mean, I get why Cordelia was worried about possible negative side effects to Procer and her own position, but (a) she's not a Hero, and (b) that's kind of in her job description. It would have been nice if she'd been willing to try a smaller ask when Cat nixed her first counteroffer. But at least Cordelia wasn't self-righteous about it.

Liliet

Oh I am not saying Tariq made the choice that led to the best possible outcome here.

I am saying that Catherine fucked up as well.

Javvies

What the hell do you think Cat could have done differently there?
Seriously.

Tariq refusing her offers is all on him, not on Cat.

Liliet

– Catherine could have had a frank conversation with him about the effects of Winter on her and what she was doing to mitigate that (refusing to go deeper into it, oaths, specifically Vivienne's killswitch)

– Catherine could have briefed him fully on the situation in Praes and Callow, including Black's plan and her own

– Catherine could have discussed the Accords with him in detail, bringing him in on the plan and requesting/accepting his input

To sum up, Catherine could and should have treated him as a mentor/advisor, not as a captured enemy / liaison. Tariq would have been obligated to help, to go along with the redemption narrative; Catherine should have leaned into that to guide it along the lines she wanted it to go, not treat it as enemy action. She could have explained to him why she wanted to keep the Evil Name/affiliation, for that matter. It's not like he didn't fully share all her ultimate goals; the only thing that differed were the specific priorities wrt Callow vs Grand Alliance, and they both wanted peace there anyway. She should have brought him in on her talks with Cordelia, at that; alone, neither of them could give her what she wanted, but together? It's entirely possible that if Cordelia knew she'd have Pilgrim's full support in backing Cat's offer, she could have chanced it.

It was the lack of trust that fucked them over there, and Cat could have extended it first.

Javvies

...

Cat was literally and figuratively in a fight for survival for both herself and for Callow.

Remember, he made it very clear that he was more concerned about protecting the internal status quo of Procer and the Grand Alliance than protecting Callow from Procer if Cat+Callow flipped sides.

And he was in the middle of trying to kill her. Giving information on your abilities, weaknesses and contingencies to an enemy that's trying to kill you is a dubious plan at the best of times.

Maybe Cat should have thrown in a "if I can get Cordelia/Pilgrim to agree are you willing to agree" to Pilgrim/Cordelia, but she honestly shouldn't have needed to with Tariq. Plus, it's not like negotiations have ever really been one of her strengths.

Liliet

Diplomacy has always been Cat's biggest strength actually.

And yes, I get why she didn't do these things, much like how I get why Tariq acted the way he did. It's just that, again much like him, if she'd acted otherwise she would have gotten a better outcome.

Well, relatively better. It's hard to beat Everdark ;u;

werafdsaew

Would that have even worked? You're assuming that the reason Tariq couldn't help her is because he lacked relevant details, but I see their differences as more fundamental.

Javvies

It's not that he couldn't help her, it's that he chose not to help her protect Callow from Procer in a peace deal and alliance, because Procer was more important than Callow to him.

And it's since predictably gone south on him.

I'm still firmly of the opinion that if the Alliance is so fragile that it is incapable of surviving someone they thought was an enemy wanting to be and being allowed to be ally instead of an enemy to be conquered and divided as the spoils of war, the Alliance doesn't deserve to survive.

For that matter, such an Alliance not only doesn't deserve to survive, it will inevitably create its own enemies and downfall. And the delayed yet inevitable collapse will be far worse than if it goes down now over letting someone become an ally instead of conquering and looting them.

Mental Mouse

Re your last reply at the edge: It's significant that Good here is the blinkered, paranoid nationalist, while Evil is the "humanist", except she supports the non-human races as well. (I wonder if she'll get around to restoring the Ratling civilization? Maybe in book VI.)

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, we need a more inclusive word than "humanist". Maybe sapientist? Peopleist?

Liliet

@werafdsaev what fundamental differences are you thinking about? They understand each other perfectly, pursue the exact same goals and have the same view on means – Catherine has compared Tariq to Amadeus for a reason.

Liliet

@Javvies that is an existing point of view in-universe – Saint thinks exactly that.

I, however, follow Tariq's/Cat's/Amadeus's logic in looking less at what is "inevitable" and "deserved" and more at minimizing splash damage. Tariq has been trying to minimize splash damage the entire time, starting with first going to negotiate with the Black Queen (a complete mystery to him, at that point). The situation kept changing on him, but the worst case scenarios he's been after preventing / not causing still haven't happened.

Well, an entirely different kind of catastrophe happened, but I very much understand how&why he did not see the "and then the Dead King attacked" option in the field of possibilities. From the point of view of Good, that was rather out of left field; even Amadeus was surprised.

luminiousblu

Nobody cares what her intention was. Intent has no bearing on what actually happens. Scipio didn't intend for Carthage to get burned to the ground and Martin Luther never wanted to split the Catholic world in half. It happened anyway.

RanVor

You know it goes both ways, right?

Javvies

Yes and no.

Intent doesn't have much impact when it comes to past actions. Well, depends on the actions and their results, to be honest.

On the other hand, if somebody (a) genuinely wants peace, (b) is willing to ally with you and join your alliance of Good guys, and (c) was willing to do that before you invaded their country and is still willing to do so after kicking your invasion force back out of their country ... their intentions and desires kinda do matter.

At least, if you're willing to let them stop being an enemy.

Honestly, the only thing that Tariq could gain by pushing for his Narratively enforced redemption play over accepting Cat's initial offer (probably after some more negotiations on the practical details) is that if it's Cat's idea first, she doesn't get Narratively locked into probably dying to achieve redemption.

Seriously.

The initial offer would've cut out a lot of fighting and dying, plus, with the Grand Alliance and Callow invading Praes, Malicia probably wouldn't have been able to spend the time necessary to make a deal with the Dead King – she'd be too busy dealing with the invasion and would risk a coup (or the conquest of Ater and the Tower) if she wasn't playing close enough attention.

By rejecting it, Tariq guaranteed bloodshed (a lot of it) and either wins on the battlefield or loses on the battlefield; if he loses on the battlefield that results in either a hardening of Cat's position as a Villain or significantly worsens the Alliance position in negotiations for her assistance (and maybe there's a chance for him to set Cat up for a redemption play).

He definitively gained nothing of value by rejecting Cat's offers. He ultimately rejected Cat's offer over purely political(worldly) grounds.

Cordelia at least had a decent reason for worrying about the political ramifications.

Insanenoodlyguy

The problem, as he stated, is what cat is going to be.

He did believe Cat was willing to abdicate and go for a voluntary redemption story NOW.

But what does she look like 50 years from now? When narrative forces inevitably put her down that path anyway? He was scared of that cat not having something to stop her.

Javvies

She'd be on the side of Good/Above, so anything pushing her out of retirement would be the actions of someone Evil.

Also, there'd have been plenty of time for Above to grow themselves a Hero designed to take her down.

Cat's apotheosis would not result in another wasteland like Keter – she already has the power, its simply a matter of figuring out how to use it. Besides, the only threats likely to push her into needing more power than she already had would be a particularly powerful Dread Emperor/Black Knight/Warlock of Praes or the Dead King coming out and Callow being called upon to help resist his invasion. And if Amadeus got put in charge of Praes, even with supervision, he'd take Praes off the table as a potential threat.

Again, think about what Good/Above could do with Cat's potential voluntarily turned to its ends.

Insanenoodlyguy

You misunderstood me. If she indeed kept on the redemption path, he'd love to keep her alive, yes. But since that story line is kaput, he is not willing to assume that just because she was willing to go down redemption at that moment, that this is still the outcome she's headed towards. By his own actions she's off that path, admittedly, but now that she's off it, he does not believe she'll get back on it any other way. So he assumes that 50 years from now events will have made her a nightmare.

Javvies

Sure, his redemption play is shot now. It wasn't when they were in Callow and he was refusing her.

Hell, he shot down Cat's attempt to voluntarily flip sides, and then when he had her lined up in a Narratively enforced redemption play, and she was offering to go along with it and not try to dodge it, he refused her offer again.

Agent J

You're giving Pilgrim too much credit. I know he's well liked, but you're still forgetting a key component. The Princes. Catherine offered up nigh everything the Pilgrim wanted, up to and including her own abdication and to aid him against the Dread Empire.

Tariq didn't refuse "because she still posed a danger he needed to eliminate", he hadn't even come to that conclusion yet. He refused because there were "other considerations" in play. He refused because the one thing Cat asked for in exchange for literally everything he wants was to respect and preserve Callowan sovereignty. But that would be in direct contention with what the Princes wanted and would cause problems for the Crusade.

This is why people don't give two shits about him when he whines about how dangerous Cat has become. Because he had the opportunity to reduce or eliminate that danger and he chose carving up Callow instead. Not to reduce suffering, not to further the agenda of Gods, but to give the princelings a bone and a pat on the head for their good work. Politics not piety led him to this situation and so he gets no sympathy from me.

In short, he fucked up.

Dainpdf

Uh...

Cat being a danger was the other consideration. That and the dangers posed by Malicia.

You talk about the Pilgrim like he wanted to give Procer a payout, when he's Levantine. That country was Proceran colony same as Callow, and he has personal reason to hate their nobles.

The Pilgrim just couldn't accept the compromise because, while it took Cat's queenship, it did nothing to avert her from the path of becoming a Callowan evil deity.

Agent J

The fear of Cat's deification did not begin until after the Battle of Camps. Before it, everyone thought she was a pushover. It's why they were all so dismissive of her in their initial interactions. They knew she was a dangerous villain sure, but one that'll be steamrolled in the face of a full crusade on it's way to Praes.

The fear at the time Cat offered her abdication was that her rule of Callow was pushing it further and further away from the Light. This was Pilgrim's issue in the their first meeting together. That Procer, already tasked with holding back the Chain of Hunger and the Dead King, would crumble under the strain if an Evil Callow was added to the list.

It was Catherine's influence on Callow, not Catherine herself, that was unacceptable. Or as he said,

"All of this rests on the fact that it is you who rules," the old man said.

"And if I abdicate, can you guarantee that Callow will be left untouched?" I asked. "Will you swear on your Gods that if Procer tries to annex it, you will turn your sword on whoever is trying? Or even that you'll stay out of my way and let me take care of them?"

"I do not rule Procer," the Grey Pilgrim softly said. "And if I take the field against them, too many would follow. It would birth a war as dangerous as this one, in many ways."

Yes, Levant has been on the wrong end of the warmongering Procerans boundless avarice, but he still considers them vital to Calernia's wellbeing and is not willing to start a war with them for something he gives almost no fucks about, like ensuring Callowan sovereignty.

Because, again, this was before Catherine proved herself as a force to be reckoned with. Pilgrim was under the impression that he could simply conquer Callow outright. Negotiated peace against the interests of the prinelings would have made for a far more complicated affair. Better to simply break her at the Camps.

He didn't break her. Black ravaged Procer, indirectly killing way more people than his marauding army ever could have. Oh, and Ol' King Nessie's back out in force. The North is in apocalypse mode, Procer is teetering on collapse, and the fate of the entire continent hangs in the balance.

In short, he fucked up.

Dainpdf

He was appalled by what Cat had become from the get-go.

And yes, there was also the situation with Procer. Can you imagine what would have happened if Procer and Levante were at war when Malicia released the Dead King (as she had already planned to, from months earlier)?

Agent J

Yes. Appalled, but did not consider her a continent ending threat as he does now. That came after she dropped a lake, slapped around a half dozen heroes, and danced around arguably the strongest hero alive.

As for Procer and Levant warring during a Dead Invasion, that wouldn't happen until after the war with Malicia. Y'know, since the point of contention is the fate of Callow after the war. And Cat would also be helping them during the war as she'd pledged to, so even if Malicia still got Nessie involved, they would have the full might of Procer, Levant, and Callow to throw against him without any of this "slaughtering our way to peace" bullshit we're engaged in now.

Dainpdf

You think Procer and Levant would have stayed together until Praes was dealt with and then air their grievances? The moment the Pilgrim got Levant to up and decide to leave Callow alone there would have been war.

As for Cat's danger level... I am unsure.

Liliet

>Not to reduce suffering, not to further the agenda of Gods, but to give the princelings a bone and a pat on the head for their good work.

Nope. That's not what the situation was like.

The option he had there was not "help Catherine and upset the Princes by doing so", it was "forcibly seize power in Levant, possibly provoking a civil war, and openly break it away from the Grand Alliance, possibly provoking a war between Procer and Levant. And help Catherine by doing that".

Javvies

No, Tariq refused over the worldly consequences to Procer, not Levant. He wouldn't need seize power in Levant to pull them with him in any deal he supported.

His word in support and verifying her sincerity and good faith is all that Levant would require.

And again, if the Grand Alliance is truly so fragile that someone they originally thought was an enemy turned out to want to, and was allowed to, be an ally instead of an enemy to be conquered and divided in the aftermath is to tear it apart, it doesn't deserve to survive.

Liliet

Catherine really should have talked to Cordelia and Tariq at the same time. The result could have been very different 0.0

Liliet

Anyway, Tariq has said as much in the pre-Camps negotiation: "if I were to take the field against them, too many would follow". You're correct that he would not need to forcibly seize power in Levant to get them to support him; that's the problem, because Levant at war with Procer is among the worst case scenarios from where he's standing.

Yes, the Grand Alliance is fragile. That's WHY it's precious to him: Cordelia is trying to make something new and necessary, something that will hopefully grow strong and stay for generations, ensuring peace in the future.

Javvies

If the Alliance is truly so fragile that someone they thought was an enemy actually turned out to want to be, and was allowed to be, an ally instead of an enemy to be conquered, looted, and divided in the aftermath, would break it, not only does it not deserve to survive, but it will also evolve into something far worse, spawning more enemies and its own downfall, and in so rotting and collapsing will have far worse consequences than the Alliance falling apart now over not being allowed to conquer, loot, and partition Callow.

Liliet

"Will evolve into something far worse" is the only part of this that's relevant to Pilgrim's POV on what's going on.

So, would you elaborate on this hypothesis?

Javvies

I'd argue that delaying the fall but worsening the fall is also relevant.

Or is Pilgrim just about delaying bad things from happening now, even if it causes worse things to happen later?

Look at what we know about what happened the last time Procer occupied Callow.

And Procer's imperial ambitions and tendencies – it's domestically safer to push for expansion and conquest, and giving Procer a successful taste of conquest will tempt them into seeking more.

This, of course, ignores the practical realities that if Procer (or Levant) seeks to occupy Callow, they're going to need a heavy investment of military force to maintain any semblance of control on top of the forces needed to deter Praesi incursion. And it's a good bet that the Alliance occupation forces would be less restrained than the Legions under Black. Black wanted to slowly convert Callow, the Alliance will have a lot of people looking to punish and exploit Callow, and they'll have less holding them back than the Praesi Imperial Governors.

As for my position that if allowed to continue, it'll grow into something terrible ... Cordelia Hasenbach is an anomaly, and her successor will most likely be a return to past Proceran norms. Just think about it – if the leaders of the Alliance refuse to allow someone who they thought was an enemy to become the ally it actually wants to be instead of being conquered, looted, and partitioned, for the low price of not conquering, looting, partitioning it, what happens when the leadership is less united, less focused on the actual big Evils that exist? And the precedent has already been set – and endorsed by Heroes during a Crusade – that conquering, looting, and partitioning those who want to be allies and Alliance member is okay to do.

Liliet

As far as I'm reading, Cordelia's plan was as follows:

- lead the Crusade to a smashing victory under her brilliant guidance;
- low key grind the expansionist faction into pulp

in the process;

- divide Callow into several kingdoms ruled by native Callowan nobility

- establish good relationships with them / bring them into the Grand Alliance, officially outlawing war against them on any of its other parts;

- strengthen the ties between the countries of the Grand Alliance and ramp up incentives for staying in it;

- have Grand Alliance stand as a whole bulwark of Good against ineffectual divided Evil.

She failed step 1, but Pilgrim was hoping to hold up the rest of them (save step 3 if he managed to bring Catherine around) anyway.

Liliet

>Cordelia Hasenbach is an anomaly, and her successor will most likely be a return to past Proceran norms.

Only if she fails to secure her succession / strengthen her legacy to the degree that her successor will be best served following the plan she outlined.

Andrew Mitchell

@Liliet – that’s a solid outline of Cordelia’s plans IMO and it reminds me that Catherine and Cordelia have similar aims in some significant respects. Maybe even enough that they’ll be able to find common ground in the next book.

Your point that Cordelia wants to “– divide Callow into several kingdoms ruled by native Callowan nobility” is new to me. Is that supported by the text somewhere?

Regarding “Only if she fails to secure her succession / strengthen her legacy to the degree that her successor will be best served following the plan she outlined.” That’s a really huge IF in my opinion because an outcome like that would be contrary to the entire history of Procer.

Liliet

@Andrew Mitchell – yes, it is. I don’t remember where exactly but Cordelia states that much explicitly – let me look, fuck, it’s a big and important point I’m going off here.

...

GOD THIS TOOK ME LIKE AN HOUR

Extra Chapter Fatalism I

>Setting aside that any occupation of Callowan land would turn into a brutal grind of constant banditry and rebellions – they were, for the Heavens' sake, a people that prided themselves on inheriting grudges from generation to generation – Cordelia had absolutely no intention of annexing any part of Callow. Would she split it into several kingdoms? Absolutely. It was necessary to ensure that the Black Queen's surviving partisans would not be able to mount any significant bid for power until her memory had faded among the populace and could no longer serve as an effective rallying cry. There were already separatist currents within the region, anyway. The northern baronies were near a kingdom of their own, the Duchy of Daoine was independent even when it bothered to pretend otherwise, and most the south had remained under aristocratic rule until mere years ago: the people there, unlike those who'd lived for decades under Imperial governors, had never entirely abandoned the old Callowan way of life.

That's my source.

As for the fragility of the idea of changing the entire mode of operations of Procer – it's no more or less ambitious than what Black and Malicia have been trying in Praes. It is, now that I'm looking at it, actually more or less the same thing. Cordelia's a pissed-off Lycaonese taking power, the representative of the part of the Principate that had been holding the wall this entire time out to bring the whole rest of it back in on the effort. Drag them towards Good and away from petty rivalries and territorial ambitions, in a mirror of Amadeus dragging Praes away from Evil and towards civil prosperity and a stable foreign policy.

And honestly I'd been expecting Cordelia and Catherine to get along since the start of Book 4. They never quite managed to, to my ongoing disappointment, but at least Cordelia has something of Catherine's measure and a foundation for trust in the future. HERE'S FUCKING HOPING, Cordelia doesn't want to annex Callow. Most of the rest of Procer's Princes(ses) do.

Javvies

Cordelia is an anomaly amongst Procerans. Once that is unlikely to make lasting changes in the patterns of behavior of the Princes and Princesses of Procer.

Her grip on power is not so strong that she would be able to ignore and override a more or less united Assembly that wanted to claim Callow.

Liliet

"Once that is unlikely to make lasting changes in the patterns of behavior of the Princes and Princesses of Procer.

Her grip on power is not so strong that she would be able to ignore and override a more or less united Assembly that wanted to claim Callow."

It was before Cat&Amadeus wrecked her advance on Callow.

It's a whole subplot about how Cordelia had Procer in hand and was well-positioned to change the way things are done there... until she ran into Callow and its defenders.

And even after Amadeus's atrocious raid, she is still the First Prince and still has enough power behind the title to order Rozala around. If Catherine and Pilgrim lend her strength, it's fully possible for her to recover yet and repair the Grand Alliance into what she wanted it to be in the first place – with the Liesse Accords attached, as I'm pretty sure she's going to approve of those.

Andrew Mitchell

@Liliet – thank you. I'm sorry that it took you an hour to find it but I really do appreciate your effort. I'm now fully on-board with your understanding of Cordelia's plans. I think she's going to have to modify them to actually get along with Catherine. But your views have helped cement my view that Cordelia and Catherine are going to be working together on their aligned interests, in the final book.

Andrew Mitchell

@javvies

I think there's still certainly a risk that Cordelia won't be able to reshape Procer as much as she wants to... But I have some level of confidence based on the skill she's shown in politics and intrigue so far.

Insanenoodlyguy

He wouldn't need to do shit in Levant to start that civil war. If he did agree to her oath (I abdicate, you fight for Callow if it comes to that), and Procer did anything, the second Levant heard the Grey Pilgrim was honor-bound to fight Procer, everybody would be jumping to say "And we'll help him!" and start targeting procer in general in his name. He wouldn't have to seize power, in fact this is exactly what he wouldn't want, but it's not like Levant would need that much prompting to fight procer in these circumstances. And a few heroes would jump in as well, to fight the "Empire that lost their way.", again, not so much by Grey's influence as in his name. Taking that stance would almost certainly mean the war would happen, he wasn't wrong about that.

Dresden 67

Ah but remember Behold doesn't work on Catherine anymore with Sve Noc blocking it.

He still knows about the desire for peace he saw in her before she went to the Everdark, but she's since bound herself to horrific deities whose power is rooted on murder and betrayal. He doesn't know if that has changed her goals, but the risk is certainly there.

Javvies

Behold doesn't work on Cat now, sure. But that doesn't matter to my point.

Behold was damned well still working on Cat back when the two of them were still in Callow and she was offering to join the Grand Alliance and help them and got nothing but refusals and rejections. And was cooperating with Tariq's redemption play against her.

Rook

Agreed, complete utilitarianism is basically the core of both the choirs Mercy and the Pilgrim.

This is the same guy who smothered the kid he loved like a son because the war he'd bring by surviving would be even worse as far as the continent is concerned.

Mercy basically doesn't give a shit whether a verdict is just, whether someone is genuine, or even whether the action is necessarily good or evil in itself, as long as you get the Greatest Good in the long run.

The Pilgrim is obviously not at the level of the ophanim, but his decisionmaking is essentially along those lines.

Rook

Lol god damn it, I replied to the wrong post.

Novice

Yep, Mercy is not Justice. That's what makes that specific Choir especially terrifying imo.

Liliet

We had a whole chapter about it.

>The thought that the man could have conceived of me as a nascent Dead King was ludicrous, he'd been able to see into my fucking soul. I wasn't... Gods, I'd done some dark things and not always for reasons as good as I would have wished but there were lines I'd always refused to cross. That I would have kept to. This can't be personal, I told myself, and put aside the horrifying thought that a truth teller might have genuinely believed I had the potential to become the likes of Neshamah.

> What mattered was that I'd come into a Name as the manifestation of what Tariq had called the sin of our indolence returned to haunt us, the first time we'd ever spoken. That was important, that informed what I considered the Black Queen to be. She was a form of retribution by Creation, by the story, for a failure on the side of Good. Catherine Foundling, as an entity, was inherently dangerous to the Heavens.

> [...]

> I make the reasonable offer of this very dangerous person abdicating the crown and allowing others settle the kingdom she's slowly turning to Evil by simple virtue of ruling it, but mortal considerations prevent her from accepting. This is a good sign, because it means she still has good intentions. This is a bad sign, because her attachment to Callow is the kind of narrative leverage Below will use in a heartbeat to make a full monster of her.

> [...]

> Then the backlash makes her fall into some sort of state – Diabolist taking the reins of the body, though I might not know that – and she faces down the entire heroic contingent simultaneously before snapping out of the fugue state and forcing a truce on the battlefield. Catherine Foundling has now proved dangerous, exceedingly hard to kill and mentally unstable. Given that she's running around with an entire fairy court's worth of power, good intentions or not she needs to be removed.

And there you have it. Behold isn't omiscience.

Catherine saw the same risks he did and was in a much better position to handle them than he was. If she'd been open with him about it, they might have cooperated and forged better solutions together: just Tariq knowing about Vivienne's killswitch might have put his worries to rest. But she wasn't and he had no better way of knowing than just vague "good intentions" feeling off her. He reads hearts and feelings, not competence and plans.

Mental Mouse

> should have known through your Behold Aspect/the Ophanim looking at her...

Except that Sri Noc shut them out, precisely to keep him from shortcutting Cat's plans. As she herself has noted, Pilgrim will always do "the right thing", based on the information he has at the moment. But that makes him predictable, and leaves him vulnerable when he doesn't have correct (and current) information.

Also, regarding Mercy's refusal to make the choice to him, EE's clearly still reading the comments. 😊

Javvies

Again. Behold and the Ophanim are blocked now.

They weren't blocked back when both of them were back in Callow and Cat was offering a deal then.

SpeckofStardust

Which is enterally irrelevant because the deal Cat was offering back then would have broken the grand alliance.

Cat is not worth an mult-national alliance between all the definitive Good nations on the continent.

Javvies

If the Grand Alliance is/was really so fragile that it would break apart because someone they originally thought was an enemy wanted to be their ally and was allowed to become their ally and they weren't going to get to partition Callow up in the aftermath or exterminate the greenskins ... the Alliance is already doomed to failure and doesn't deserve to continue.

And Cat and Callow being on board with the Alliance would lessen the damage when it ultimately falls apart anyways.

At worst, I think Cordelia would be at risk of losing the position of First Prince and Procer has a succession crisis. On the other hand, Cordelia has Augur on her pocket, and even if Procer has a succession crisis, they do (or should) know how to pull together against a clear and obvious outside enemy (the League). Plus, there would be Heroes available to expedite the succession process. Besides, depending on the terms, other Grand Alliance members might be required to help Cordelia maintain control of Procer, which Cat would have been able to make a whole lot easier.

Cat doesn't get backed into a corner where all her options are terrible (for the side of Good/Above).

Malicia, maybe she gets backed into a corner where she still tries to make a deal with the Dead King, but in that scenario, the Alliance is probably still intact with Cordelia in charge of Procer, plus Cat has joined the Alliance, and can get everybody back to Procer in a hurry, and at worst Praes (or at least the High Lords) are significantly wrecked that they're not an immediate threat, or more likely, the Alliance has taken Ater, even if they haven't destroyed the Tower, and if you're lucky, you can go with Cat's idea to have Black impose his "fixes" on Praes and abdicate in a few years (or not, because he isn't interested in conquest for conquest's sake and can probably keep a lid on Praes for long enough.

The potential worldly consequences for Cordelia Hasenbach's control of Procer are, or should be, unimportant in the larger long term scheme of things between Above and Below.

They matter, quite reasonably, to Cordelia's reaction to Cat's offer ... but they shouldn't matter to Tariq.

Besides ... if Tariq is right about Cat's long term threat potential and apotheosis ... just think about what Good could do with that potential on its side.

Kissaten

It's all good and sound, but the Good side doesn't need any justification for invading supposedly Evil nations because, you know, they are Evil. Even when Black Queen ascended to the throne and actually made life better for callowans without screwing praesi (common folk, at least) heroes continued to attack her, ignoring any kind of diplomatic solution.

ciara

"But if she wasn't here, how did she expect to bring down dawn should he refuse her surrender? There might be other drow with power enough, but none with the requisite weight to carry it out. If the Hierophant had still been at her side then Tariq would not have considered the matter further, but the boy currently was in the depths of Arcadia making a ruinous altar of his grief. The Wild Hunt could not wield miracles of darkness, and who did that leave?"

Surely some no-name like Advisor Kivule wouldn't have the magical expertise or the dramatic weight to pull it off, had the Pilgrim turned down the surrender. What a play by the Black Queen!

I argued before that Pilgrim's dialogue with Akua back on the third day of the battle of Camps was a thinly disguised negotiation for resurrection, but it looks I've been proven wrong.

Dainpdf

Yeah, was going to comment on that. It would have been funny to have Tariq's bad decision be punished by the Ghost of Bad Decisions herself...

Liliet

I mean he doesn't even know who Advisor Kivule is, the Crusade doesn't have a spy network in Cat's army ;u;

Cap'n Smurfy

The Leaders of the League of Free Cities never fail to entertain. I keep thinking "Okay they can't get any more ridiculous" but they just keep one upping themselves. It's like watching a nation being lead by a Monty Python sketch.

(Looking back at the previous chapters, it does seem that the differences between the Guideverse's Bible nailed to a chair and the delegate of Atlante are largely superficial.)

luminiousblu

Arguably that's part of the plan
You can't just kill the comic relief. The comic relief always lives.

That said, letting the comic relief run free is one of the classic Overlord Fallacies.

nick012000

So, the Pilgrim sang about the Peregrine, saying "His stride rebellion and stirring ember."

Now he's going to meet the Hierarch in battle, who actually is what he sang of. I think that's going to be an interesting meeting.

Dainpdf

Different kinds of rebellion, though. The Pilgrim arose to match the people's rebellion.

The Hierarch drags people into rebellion with him.

caoimhinh

The first Pilgrim arose to rebel against foreign invasion.
This new Hierarch arose to rebel against the bourgeoisie XD

Dainpdf

Except there isn't bourgeoisie, in modern terms, in Calernia, is there? I guess maybe in Mercantis?

This is more of a Russian/French revolution deal, where it's a revolt against the ancien régime in the name of equality but then it's Oops! All Tyranny!

Kissaten

Hierarch was infuriated by Hanno claiming that he, Hanno, brings justice, that angels on his shoulders can judge. This claim was sooo against the laws of Most Glorious Republic that Hierarch finally chose a side. I assume Hierarch wants all heroes on the trial by people, kings and princes (and maybe even gods) are just collateral in this particular case.

And nah, traders are not bourgeoisie, bourgeoisie owns and produces stuff, merchants are not that.

Mental Mouse

Checking WP, merchants do indeed count as bourgeoisie. Apparently Marx did distinguish between "administrators of the means of production" and "rentiers", but the general term basically marks urban property-owners and capitalists, as opposed to laborers. They're also explicitly commoners (Third Estate), rather than nobles (First Estate) or priests (Second Estate).

konstantinvoncarstein

If Tariq could blow up the Hierarch, I would be very happy. Or he could have a redemption story and die doing so.

RanVor

I agree, Tariq could use a redemption story.

Agent J

Not now. He hasn't even pulled off the first step of his plan yet. I'm still waiting to see the trial for Gods and angels. That's definitely gonna be a show.

konstantinvoncarstein

Angels are not citizens of Bellerophon, and therefore are not subject to its laws, unlike the Gods Below. I would like to see the reaction of the later at the trial.

Agent J

Memory is hazy on what the Dead King said of the matter, but I was under the impression they have something planned for the... what are Judgement Angels called? Contrition Anged are Hashmallim and Mercy Anges are Ophanim. Whatever. They got something in store of Judgement Douches is the point I'm driving at.

caoimhinh

Seraphim are the Angels of the Choir of Judgement

Just imagine what is being written down in that Delosi's scrolls. Basileus and magister are so tired of dealing with bs Tyrant LMAO Irritant, at least be subtle when directing an opponent. Though, I suppose being so blatant makes it oddly effective. "A blunt but potent approach" as Tariq would put it, hahaha.

"The Ophanim murmured uncertainly in his ear, even they unknowing" Wow, that's unexpected, the Angels actually admitted they didn't know. I would have expected them to just remain silent (which would imply it) but such honest admission is interesting.

And now Kairos and the League ride to battle to ensure the Army of Callow's safe retreat while Cat goes to save Masego, who the Grey Pilgrim just confirmed was indeed the one messing up that corner of Arcadia.

It will be interesting to see the reaction of the different forces in the armies.

Mental Mouse

Regarding typos, That "hereL" is surely a fat-finger for "here:" (at least on an American keyboard).

And the angels couldn't remain silent, because they've established silence is its own message ('you done screwed up'). It seems that the rules of the game require the mortals gamepieces to make their own decisions, albeit after Above and Below place the pieces.

Liliet

>Wow, that's unexpected, the Angels actually admitted they didn't know. I would have expected them to just remain silent (which would imply it) but such honest admission is interesting.

I am not surprised 😊

I continue to be incredibly unsurprised by anything to do with Tariq and his angels here; it's so lovely of Erratic to actually deign to explicitly provide the information that could previously only be indirectly inferred 😊

Mental Mouse

Alas, his gods don't do blessings.

Agent J

Sure she does, if you bring a bottle of Vale Summer Wine and your birthday suit.

Mental Mouse

Au contraire... even when Cat was in fact a goddess, one thing Hakram didn't do was actually worship her. (Of course, she never really explored the implications of divinity.) IIRC, orcs call the Gods Below collectively the Gobbler (while the goblins call them the Hungry Gods, or maybe that's the other way around). I suppose "may you be eaten last" qualifies as a Dark blessing. 😊

caoimhinh

The Gobbler is the Goblins' patron deity, while Hungry Gods, Merciless Gods, Ashen Gods, Burning Gods, and other such names are used by all the cultures in Calernia. The Orcs seemed to have some minor gods with them back in the day (Captain killed one of them, the one that helped the Orcs gain control over the Red Rage).

crysjal

Calling it now. Kairos is going to return the Goat to Cat at some point and it's going to go boom.

Mental Mouse

At which point Catherine goes "hee hee" and tells Akua to serve the wine.]:->

Tom

"I, Catherine Foundling, first anointed Queen of Callow of my name," I said, "formally offer the unconditional surrender of all forces under my command to the Grey Pilgrim, Tariq of Levant, also known as the Peregrine. Let there be no further bloodshed between your armies and mine, and through that surrender peace be obtained for us all."

Cat then goes out of her way to specifically avoid offering any sort of command to Vivienne and by proxy Juniper, and those two command the Pro-Callow forces in the battle while Cat rides into Arcadia with the Wild Hunt. Do the forces under Cat's command technically consist of anything more than the Wild Hunt at the time her surrender is delivered?

Liliet

I think that depends on what she ends up needing.

This could be plausibly interpreted in either direction – either it matters that she could command if she tried, and making their own decisions was at her command in the first place. This is what matters narratively – Catherine’s armies are Catherine’s armies, if she’s to play out the story of genuine surrender she needs to hold to the spirit of the agreement above the letter of it.

Or the story of genuine surrender might not work out, in which case she’s got the technicality contingency that will salvage the situation on the formal level. This would require a pretty big narrative fuckup by Tariq and Co though, to make this not as narratively bad for Catherine as Tariq points out it would be on its face.

Catherine is keeping the reins of the situation, not making a leap of faith so much as a controlled rope swing of faith – if it doesn’t work out, she’ll just swing back 😊

Mental Mouse

Also, Viv, Juniper, etc have been holding their own reins since the beginning of the engagement, so Cat’s abdication won’t leave them wailing “wait, now what are we supposed to do next?” Well, maybe Viv a little, but she’ll get over it.

Liliet

And then it turns out Vivienne is exactly the one with the best handle on the situation 😊

Looking up to Catherine doesn’t make her less capable; in fact, it signifies good judgement on her part! 😊

Mental Mouse

Careful about spoilers... But yeah, Vivienne had it half-figured out before Cat even left! And the Theodosius story revealed in the next chapter is pretty blatant.

Also, I do love the goat. I sure hope she get’s a special place of honor somewhere, after she finishes her duties. I wonder how small Kairos is or how big the goat since he plans to ride her into battle ...

Jarthon

Well, we are talking about Kairos here. If he can't successfully ride a goat into battle that is physically smaller than he should be able to ride then he'll either aspect it up and Rule that it is possible or just do the thing where you walk above something small and pretend that you're riding it. Either way, you can be sure that her will be 100% committed to the bit.

IIRC Kairos is stunted and (was) sickly. Goats can be fairly large; no idea how big this one is.

Komplode

I hope Cat gets to tell Grey that she is playing against opponents far beyond him now, ie Dead King and Intercessor.

superkeaton

As usual, Catherine remains the top scorer of her favorite game "Give Everyone Knives and Liquor and Turn Off the Lights Until One is Standing".

Mental Mouse

Well, Abigail's ingenuity at that (replace the knives with more booze) was half of why Cat originally promoted her. "'She gave alcohol to rioters?' ... 'Fuck it..., it worked. Promote her.'"

Tohron

Alright, so we were told that Catherine's three messages were a "knife", a "bet", and a "lie". I now have a guess as to which was which.

The "knife": I'm thinking this is her message to Pilgrim – as we saw here, it forces him to abandon his original plan and choose between two less-desirable options. This make the message a way to harm Tariq's position.

The "bet": It seems to me that the bet was that Kairos couldn't let the other sides make peace without him, so the message to him was a bet that he would accept the offer it contained.

The "lie": Here I'm going out on more of a limb. The message to the Callowan leadership was to read up on Theodosius' dilemma, which I'm assuming pertains to how Isabella fed all her leaders different battle plans on the eve of the Maddened Fields. Given how Catherine is deliberately keeping her subordinates in the dark, it seems to me that the "lie" is the impression she's giving that she has some sort of complicated scheme based on getting everyone else to engage in specific behavior based on information she feeds them, an intricate Xanatos Gambit.

The thing is, she learned in Keter about all the problems with intricate, interlocking schemes, so instead, I think she's just using the incomplete information to give the impression of an intricate scheme to anyone mind-reading her subordinates, thus ensuring they'll have to limit the complexity of their own plans on account of the complicated gambit that doesn't actually exist.

Oshi

This is the closest thing to what feels correct that I have seen from all the theories.

Mental Mouse

Except that as she pointed out to her own people, the three parts don't actually depend on each other – any one of them can play out by itself. On the other hand, if two, or all three, of them do work, they combine and Cat can win really big..

Kissaten

Kairos letter appears to me to be the thing that brings surest result, while Pilgrim may do anything (in the realm of probability) as a result. Surrender may be a lie even, given that all other letters kind of violate Pilgrim's letter's unconditional surrender. Also, Cat hasn't yet showed Pilgrim what would happen for daring to take a swing at her, and surrender can't be the that, even thousands dead to drow onslaught aren't enough to dissuade Pilgrim from attempting something again.

Liliet

The surrender can't be a lie, as Tariq has pointed out – it's too bad/stupid a move in itself. Tariq doesn't need to know what kind of scheme Catherine could use to work around it, he looks at the meta situation and concludes that she has to mean it, in order to not come out the loser.

* she has to mean it in the event that it is genuinely accepted at face value and with no intent of treachery on Pilgrim's side, which is something she can't quite count on from her side, hence the contingencies allowing her to back out of it if it ends up biting her in the ass

It's a Prisoner's Dilemma where sides can change their decision after seeing that of the other person 😊

Kissaten

All three letters are contingency plans in to nudge events into needed direction. Letter to Pilgrim in conjunction with letter to Kairos always make Kairos to attack. Cat commits meta-narrative suicide – Kairos attacks, Cat actually surrenders – Kairos attacks, Pilgrim commits meta-narrative suicide – Kairos still attacks, maybe he will attack Cat in this case, though. Letter to Pilgrim doesn't need to bet on anything, it can be a total lie and still do it's job, that's what i meant.

Liliet

If the job you think it needs to do is getting Kairos to attack, sure.

But the more important job it's doing is shifting the meta-narrative in Catherine's favor. And it needs to be in good faith for that to work.

Andrew Mitchell

IMO there’s nothing wrong (in fact, there’s everything right) with five interludes in a row when they’ve done so much to advance the plot, add significantly to our understanding of important characters, and see some more great fight scenes.

Liliet

Yep.

Saint? Or do you mean Pilgrim?

But seriously, I really want to see Saint's reaction to Cat's surrender and Pilgrim's acceptance.

Mental Mouse

Names aside, the Saint of Swords is not a saint of humans. Pilgrim, in contrast, is pretty much in the traditional mold, if you ignore his black ops work and SWAT/WMD role.

JJR

Swords are weapons to be wielded and therefore so is Laurence de Montfort. I think she'll follow Tariq's lead in the end, even if there is some push back. Some swords need to draw blood before they are sheathed again, even if it's the weilder's.

Of course taking this sword talk to it's logical conclusion. Swords are stored in scabbards, and so is Laurence de Montfort. Robber will let her out later, maybe.

Interlude: When Iron Rests

"What poison is to medicine, war is to empire: apportionment is the balance of life and death."

– Extract from 'The Ruin of Empire, or, a Call to Reform of the Highest Assembly', by Princess Eliza of Salamans

Word of the surrender had rippled through the ranks, drawing out cries of dismay and anger before they both turned to disbelief.

There'd been tension between the Legions and the Army of Callow, when some loudmouths in the former had started to say this was just an elaborate way to sell out the Legions of Terror to the Grand Alliance, but Vivienne had been ready to quell such stupidity. Plants in the ranks had done as instructed, gone on the offensive and accused the complainers of being traitors in Grand Alliance employ. Enough of those arguments had turned to brawl that sergeants got involved, so now the most volatile of the rank and file were cooling their heels under arrest until this could be played out to the end. On the side of the Army of Callow there'd been mostly outrage and laying blame, which to Vivienne's mix of grief and amusement had been laid along predictable lines. Callowan recruits blamed the Hellhound, or more frequently Marshal Grem One-Eye – whose role in the Conquest still had him closely associated to national wounded pride. Most of the eastern recruits, though, both the fresh and those brought in from gutted legions after the Doom, tended to point the finger at Vivienne Dartwick.

Hardly unexpected: she the most visible civilian authority over the Army of Callow, a known former noble and former heroine. And for the greenskins, most damnably of all she had no famous feat of violence to her name. It was something to look into remedying, in the long term, though it was hardly a priority at the moment. The amusing part of all this, of course, was that while it'd been Catherine who'd pulled the rug out under everyone's feet with that sudden turn no one seemed to be blaming her in the slightest. Vivienne had absolutely no intention of changing that, since there were only a few things keeping the Kingdom of Callow together and one of them was the myth of the Black Queen undefeated, the kingdom's own crowned villain whose uninterrupted string of victories had become the backbone of a nation. It would have to be maintained, Vivienne thought, in the years to come – marshals and generals and even the Woe could lose, but the Black Queen could not. But that was beyond the horizon, and Vivienne Dartwick's troubles were current.

The solution she'd found had been to let the current of older faith guide the rumours she sowed. This was not a defeat, it was a trick being played by Queen Catherine on her enemies. And Gods be merciful, Vivienne thought, but she couldn't even be sure that was a lie. The drow had been laid low by that sudden star in the sky, all but the most powerful of them battered into slumber for at least a few moments, and even the highest of these 'Mighty' had been forced to flee in the face of the enemy's swiftly resuming advance. Legionaries had moved to hold the walls in good order, but within moments of that Marshal Juniper had been informed that surrender had been offered to the Grey Pilgrim and then accepted, bringing this battle to a close. Vivienne had spent the following hour putting out fires, but now the situation was stable enough she'd finally been able to head the general staff's pavilion. Truthfully she could have done more, and would have preferred keeping her finger on the Army of Callow's pulse, but Juniper's last messenger had mentioned a message from Catherine with the royal seal. Those summons she could not deny, and so she had come.

"Adjutant's still missing?"

Marshal Juniper looked vaguely irked at her immediate question, though not enough to chide her for it. What Vivienne had expected to be a formal war council in how to deal with the fact that the Grand Alliance had fully surrounded the camp and was now ordering disarmament and the bringing down of the palisade turned out to be rather less crowded. Marshal Juniper, with her perennial accessory Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara, Grandmaster Brandon Talbot for the Order of Broken Bells and Marshal Grem for what some had begun to call the Legions-in-Exile.

"Whatever duty Her Majesty sent him out on, Lord Adjutant is still discharging it," Tribune Bishara said.

Vivienne kept herself from grimacing. Hakram had been a useful interpreter of Catherine's occasionally seemingly outlandish decisions even before the Everdark, but nowadays the orc's talent for understanding the thoughts of their leader had become a priceless asset. The journey into that dark place had changed Cat in deep ways, and much could be argued of whether all these changes had been for the best, but regardless of debate it was undeniable Catherine kept her cards a lot closer to the chest than she'd used to. Adjutant's presence would have been a boon, Vivienne already suspected, for what was to come. None of the others were seated, so she remained standing as well and simply joined them at the table.

"Now that everyone's in attendance," the Hellhound said, flicking a displeased glance at Vivienne that was met with a raised brow. "This was handed to me by a rider of the Wild Hunt, along with knowledge of the surrender and instruction to abide by it."

The orc tossed out a leather sheath bearing the royal seal of Callow, which Tribune Bishara daintily picked up afterwards.

"Unless there is an objection?" the Taghreb politely asked.

A round of shaking heads. Talbot might have objected, Vivienne thought, it if it'd been another officer but he'd always been a little sweet on the Hellhound's helper. The wax seal was broken, parchment taken from the sheath and carefully unfurled. The dark-haired Callowan caught a glimpse of the curved, eye-pleasing calligraphy and repressed a snort. Hakram's hand, that, not their queen's. Which might be for the best, considering most of the time Catherine's handwriting only skirted the edge legibility. She'd actually been taught properly at the orphanage, Vivienne knew, but Cat had always written like her thoughts were trying to crawl out through a hand too slow to keep up.

"I, Catherine Foundling, anointed queen of Callow by the grace of the Heavens and first of my name-" Tribune Bishara began.

Marshal Juniper cleared her throat.

"The meat, Aisha," she growled.

The Taghreb's head dipped in acknowledgement and she shifted halfway through the sentence.

"So, there's an old story about the Ol' Unconquered," Aisha Bishara said, "that they call Theodosius' Dilemma."

The Taghreb's tone was cultured and elegant, if so very eastern, but the words she spoke reeked of Catherine's slow, almost lazy drawl. Vivienne knew it to be at least in part an affectation, as their queen was perfectly capable of formal address in her crisp Laure accent. She liked to use the casualness, the thuggish country bumpkin swagger, to prey on people's expectations. Noble expectations, mostly, Vivienne privately admitted. Their queen had spent most her life carrying a sharp contempt for the aristocracy that becoming the foremost aristocrat in Callow didn't seem to have changed in the slightest. Something wordless fluttered through the pavilion at the tribune's words, though, sparing only Grem One-Eye. Backs straightening, shoulders loosening, even half a vicious smirk tugging at Grandmaster Talbot's lips. They had not been left behind, that was what their stance said.

The Black Queen had a plan in the works, and someone else was about to have a very bad night.

"So in the First League War – which is a horribly inaccurate name, actually, because the League of Free Cities proper hadn't even been founded yet and, wait, Hakram, scratch that whole part out, they don't need the history lesson," Tribune Bishara said.

She added, in a carefully unamused undertone, that the Lord Adjutant had not in fact scratched out anything.

"So in the First League War, Theodosius kept slapping around southern Procer like it was his deeply unloved goblin stepchild until it'd lost so many battles it'd gotten physically impossible for the princes to deny they were losing the war," the Taghreb read. "At that point, the First Prince was getting worried about losing a third of Procer without war even having formally been declared, so you all know what happens: the Highest Assembly votes to 'defend the south from foreign invasion', everyone sends armies to reinforce and the First Prince makes a pointed suggestion that someone be appointed to run this mess that Theodosius hasn't already cheerfully brutalized."

Vivienne's eyes swept the tent, and found most were raptly listening even though most should already know of this bit of history. It was certainly... colourfully narrated, but otherwise common knowledge in those who had some learning of history. And even beyond that. The life and deeds of Theodosius the Unconquered were a favourite of young boys and girls with dreams of military glory even in cities where no Helikean had visited in living memory.

"That gets us Isabella the Mad, and sets up Theodosius' Dilemma," Tribune Bishara spoke. "Because Isabella, she doesn't offer a pitched battle or take back principalities: she just tosses one wave of soldiers after another at any forces that splits from Theodosius' main army. And Hells, his people win most of those skirmishes and Ol' Theo gets a few ambushes in himself. But every time he wins, he loses soldiers and Isabella loses nothing much. He's winning so much it's destroying his army, and so he has to make a choice."

Vivienne's mind raced ahead, for while she was not great student of military affairs she could see the shape of the dilemma outlined. It was not as important, she reflected, as the fact that instead of instructions Catherine had chosen to repeat a lesson that most of the people in this pavilion already knew. Would Marshal Grem? Maybe, as odds were that the Hellhound and Tribune Bishara had learned of this at the War College and the older orc was said to have been influential on the lay of the lessons taught there. Which meant the story was most likely meant for her or Brandon Talbot.

"Theodosius could fight a battle that couldn't be won against nearly five times his number," Aisha Bishara said, "to force a decisive outcome to the war. Or he could keep tearing through Isabella's detachments for months and months, hoping for a better chance as his own numbers dwindled with every victory. We all know, famously, the choice he made."

The Maddened Fields, to this day considered the only defeat ever inflicted on the first Tyrant of Helike.

"Theodosius bet on his legend, on being able to beat the odds and forge a miracle," Tribune Bishara continued. "Isabella bet that she could ride attrition to a symbolic victory, and it was a brutal wager but she got what she wanted. They say that when Theodosius' army retreated in good order, there were more than a hundred thousand corpses on the field."

The tribune's brow rose in surprise.

"Less than twenty years later, Jehan the Wise hung seven princes and one," Bishara said.

Before the implications of that could properly sink in, the Taghreb repeated a stroke of madness.

"I grant to Vivienne Dartwick the title of Lady Dartwick, with all assorted honours and privileges; in addition I name Lady Dartwick the heiress-designate to the crown of Callow."

Vivienne closed her eyes, ignoring the stir from the others in the tent. Why? No, that could be picked at later. Why now? The granted titled was clearly just a way to legally allow the second part without making her a member of the ironically-named House of Foundling. So what, as heiress-designate of Callow, could Vivienne do that she hadn't been able to do a moment ago?

"Lady Dartwick," Grandmaster Talbot quietly said. "The Royal Guard no longer exists, nor any knightly order save mine, yet-"

Yet I am, theoretically, equal in status to a princess of Callow and first the line of succession, Vivienne thought, opening her eyes. The Shining Prince, in all but name, and those were the Marshals of Callow before such a title existed.

"- yet the laws never excluded the Army of Callow nor any other addition to our forces," she finished softly. "Which means I am, in the queen's absence, the supreme commander of all armies sworn to Queen Catherine."

"You can revoke the surrender," Juniper said.

In the moment that followed, Vivienne almost did. It might just be Catherine's plan, a surrender to check some advantage of the Pilgrim's while she schemed some way that allowed her to both surrender in good faith yet keep her armies fighting. Diabolist could still use the wretched ritual that would bring back the drow to the field, and now the enemy's armies would be surprised and in disarray. Less than twenty years later, Vivienne thought, Jehan the Wise hung seven princes and one. That was a warning. About winning wars at any price, about what came after. About Callow further humbling a weakened Procer and-

"Oh," Vivienne Dartwick breathed out. "Oh."

"Lady Dartwick?" Marshal Grem asked, brow cocked.

"I'll need a horse and an escort," she said. "I'll need to talk with the Grey Pilgrim and Lord Marave besides."

"Why?" Juniper asked.

"Delay disarming as long as possible," Vivienne instructed the Hellhound absent-mindedly, "and keep the soldiers ready for fighting."

"Dartwick," the Marshal of Callow growled, "what are you doing?"

"If I'm right," Vivienne said, "then I'm about to trade the full release of our armies for our help against the League of Free Cities."

"Now, Hakram, I want to be perfectly clear," the Tyrant of Helike announced.

Adjutant was still hung upside down by his feet, though given that the tripod was now being carried forward at a brisk pace by a swarm of chittering gargoyles the motion had set him to rotating. He patiently waited until the turn brought him face to face with Kairos Theodosian before solemnly nodding.

"Your mistress, I fear, intends to betray me most immediately," the Tyrant said, not entirely succeeding at hiding his tone of deep approval.

"That does not seem like her at all," Hakram lied.

The boy gestured dismissively, though with a trembling hand.

"It was a delightful bit of pettiness from her to send me someone whose fingers I cannot meaningfully break, after that little affair with my kataphraktoi," Lord Kairos idly continued, "but that is that and this is this. Should the Black Queen turn on me – and she will – I will brutally murder you, if you'll forgive my language"

"You are forgiven," Hakram calmly said. "Though this seems absurd. Catherine Foundling has ever been a close and trusted ally to you, my lord."

"You're not even afraid," the odd-eyed king complained. "I really should have listened to what my father said about Callowan spite, this is most unreasonable of her."

"Your father had words on the subject of Callowan spite?" Adjutant asked, cocking his head curiously.

"I wouldn't know," the Tyrant cheerfully said. "After I cut his throat all he could manage was wet gurgling noises."

Hakram made a mental note of the admission. It would go into the growing archive the Jacks kept on the Tyrant of Helike, though whether what the boy had said was true or not remained debatable. The orc found him exceedingly hard to read even for a human. Silence lingered between them, though in the distance the hum of raging storms served as canvas for it.

"I cannot help but notice, Lord Tyrant, that we are not heading out into Creation," the orc ventured after a moment.

Unlike the rest of the League's armies, he left unsaid. The last of the armies, a ramshackle mob moving in old infantry formations Hakram was fairly sure hadn't seen use since the Humbling of Titans, had marched through a well-illuminated breach almost half an hour past. Of the hosts of the Free Cities, all that seemed to be left was the Tyrant's own personal guard of a thousand. And gargoyles, admittedly, too many and too similar in appearance for the orc to be able to count. Kairos Theodosian looked amused, his red eye suddenly twitching shut and remaining that way.

"I have sent all I need to send," the Tyrant of Helike said. "General Basilis is more than a match for the Pilgrim's pet countrymen and the unpleasant surprise your mistress is still sitting on."

"Might I inquire as to our purpose, then?" Hakram politely asked.

"It would be a terrible blunder to feed a spy my most secret schemes," Lord Kairos chided him. "Do you expect me, Deadhand, to immediately unveil my every furtive advance merely because you showed a modicum of polite interest?"

A moment passed.

"Yes," Adjutant replied.

"Is this what love feels like?" the Tyrant mused, then raised a hand. "Don't answer, Hakram, it's not like you'd know."

The orc cocked his head to the side. The insult did not particularly sting. Perhaps if it'd been slung in the early days of the Fifteenth, when he'd still wondered if the wariness in Juniper's eyes when she looked at him was not uncalled for, but now? Those doubts were long buried, and it would take more than a madman's jeering to unearth them. It was not, however, the first time the Tyrant of Helike jibed of Hakram's leanings towards detachment. That he would keep prodding from an angle that would yield nothing was interesting, and suggested two things: first, that Catherine had been right on the subject of Kairos Theodosian having some skill related to perception of others. Second, that what the Tyrant was seeing in Adjutant unsettled him enough to keep picking at it like a scab.

"Soon, I do think," the Tyrant of Helike said, looking up at the ruinous sky.

"Soon what?" Hakram dutifully asked.

"You see, Adjutant, the histories will speak of tonight as a triumvirate of treachery," Kairos Theodosian airily explained, "but that will be most inaccurate. Your mistress and I are having the most delightful match of shatranj while the Pilgrim and his kingdoms of the blind stumble around waving swords and miracles."

"But, Lord Tyrant, is the Grey Pilgrim not the Named currently closest to victory?" Hakram asked, purposefully keeping his tone as dull and unenthusiased as possible.

He was, the orc guilty admitted to himself, beginning to enjoy this a little too much.

"You would be most wrong, Adjutant, most wrong," the Tyrant said. "Tariq Isbili's mistake is that he believes because he set the initial terms of this fight he still knows all of them. And so he putters around down in the snow and mud, while the real prize of the night is around us. He could get everything he desires, Hakram – and indeed I suspect your mistress is inclined to grant most his wishes, save those that inconvenience her – and still be made of fool of."

Adjutant kept his face calm, though for the first time that night his heartbeat had quickened.

"Oh yes, my dear green friend," Kairos Theodosian grinned. "I know what your mistress is up to. Seven crowns and one, yes? She has the recipe for the making of a Court, and the Hierophant provided the final ingredient of that heady brew by cutting an unclaimed realm from the fabric of Arcadia and casting it down towards Creation."

Hakram stayed silent, unwilling to risk revealing too much through the lie he chose to speak.

"Here's a secret for you, Adjutant," the Tyrant of Helike whispered, leaning closer. "The thing that waits for you in the depths of Liesse stolen isn't just your friend. I would be a great deal more wary of what it intends, were I you. For if this night does not go to the Black Queen or to myself, well, it is another friend of mine that will get his due."

The boy retreated, loudly cackling.

"Ah, but I digress," he said. "I did say that your mistress and I were playing shatranj while poor old Tariq was stumbling, did I not? Allow me to elaborate. The Pilgrim anticipated there would be trouble in Creation, Hakram, and so tossed a ball up and out of sight so that providence might allow it to land when it was needed, should it be needed."

"You are saying," Adjutant said, "that he sent a force through Arcadia."

"Exactly," Lord Kairos agreed. "And, old hand that he is at turning tides, he kept a heroic charge up his sleeve in case matters were truly dire."

The orc's jaw tightened. In the distance, coming out of the storms with tall banners, a glittering tide of horsemen advanced. Proceran banners, Levantine banners, the full horse of the Grand Alliance's armies. Including, Hakram thought, every prince and princess in the hosts.

"What is that delightful Callowan saying again?" the Tyrant of Helike mused. "Ah, yes, I remember now."

The boy's eye shone wet crimson, when he turned to grin at Adjutant, as if it had already partaken of the blood about to be spilled.

"Finders keepers," Kairos Theodosian said.

I honestly wasn't expecting /another/ interlude. To be honest this one doesn't set up much we were unaware of besides Kairos' triple ultra deluxe scheming. I think we need to get back to cat now.

Rook

Well, the fact that it's an interlude means it sets up a denial, rather than an expectation. It's a good sign that for once, everything is going to go wrong for everyone else.

Generally in a free for all, the details that aren't shown are the scariest ones, regardless whether it's on the Heroic side or the Villainous. The pattern is usually a ton of exposition shown to the readers about the schemes of the known factions before said unknown variable(s) show up to betray all obvious expectations and fuck up everyone's day.

Generally this means that any plan that's detailed in the interludes is one that's likely to be fourth-wall countered by Catherine whenever she finally shows her face.

It's also kind of pleasant to have the protagonist be the other shoe waiting to drop, rather than being victim to it. More anticipation and less dread.

Oshi

This right here. The very reversal of how EE usually does things is an indication that the payoff will be epic.

caoimhinh

Just imagine: reading the Princes' Graveyard... from the Princes' perspective.
That would be epic, in my opinion.

Liliet

^^^

This is why I still believe that Hakram's going to be okay, despite the obvious.

Mental Mouse

Eh, Tyrant knows that if he breaks Hakram, Catherine will stop playing with him. And he likes Cat's game, a lot. I would not be surprised if Kairos comes out with a proposal of marriage at their next F2F meeting.

Liliet

I feel like Kairos is torn between being rationally aware that Cat is beating him and leading him around by the nose and it's bad for his plans and also offensive and he should put a stop to it and stop going along with, and absolutely adoring that she's doing so.

Mental Mouse

"She understands me! She really understands me! (uh-oh)"

Liliet

yes ;u;

caoimhinh

Well, this Interlude served to show us just where were the Proceran hosts, what the reactions of the Army of Callow were to Cat's surrender, a bit of what Kairos is planning, and showed us the forces gathering in Arcadia for the battle with lots of prizes for the winner (Masego and Liesse, Amadeus' soul, the seven crowns and one, etc). It's a good way to close the string of Interludes before returning to Cat's POV. In fact, there could still be missing one or two Interludes since there's the negotiation between Vivienne and Pilgrim, the battle against the League's armies in Iserre and the fight between Kairos personal soldiers vs Procer's soldiers in Arcadia, since all those scenes are important and Cat is not there to see so the only way to see them is through interludes.

Personally, I think these interludes have been exquisitely made, they are important events that don't involve Cat personally and she isn't witnessing them, so they are necessary. Besides, they have provided great insight about a lot of things and answered many questions the readers had. There will be as many as needed, I trust EE to make the right decision in his story.

Andrew Mitchell

With you 100% on this. Especially your final sentence. 😊

Liliet

Yes!

Honestly I'm expecting interludes to continue until everything's finally in position for Cat to ride out of nowhere with the Wild Hunt and save everyone's asses / seize the day ♥ and there's certainly a lot of moving parts here!

Vivienne's perspective was an utter delight and I love seeing her perspective on Catherine's bullshit.

Hakram's interesting as shit, and we're going back to neurodivergence themes which always delights me personally to no end.

And of course Kairos continues to be a gift and a treasure.

Best of all, we're seeing specific outcomes where previously we only had guesses, and we're gaining the ability to predict what happens next with any degree of certainty 😊

sengachi

I adore the neurodivergence themes, and I'm especially always a sucker for well-done sociopathy.

Liliet

And then there's Indrani and Masego ♥ ♥ ♥

caoimhinh

Yeah, that type of characters with a "flaw" that makes it hard for them to connect with others make for great character development.

Though Indrani isn't so much neurodivergent as traumatized by the things she had to live + an obsession to gain acceptance and recognition from her mother-figure Ranger.

I actually liked the Masego before EE decided to make him autistic, to be honest.

Masego used to joke a lot, use sarcasm constantly and was more expressive in his face and mannerism, he was also more outgoing on his interactions (read Book 2 chapter 17, for an example, or pretty much everything of Masego in Book 2), then in the middle of Book 3 EE started to depict him as socially awkward and Extra Chapter: Prodigy outright depicted him as an autistic child that didn't understand much of emotions nor social interactions, and incapable of even detecting sarcasm. From that point on Masego kept being depicted in that light. He was also thinner, like a scholar, in his first introduction but described as very fat in later chapters.

Not that I don't like the current Masego, mind you, he has had fantastic development, it's just that the first one was very funny and interesting in his own way, maybe I just liked his sarcastic expressions and jokes.

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting, thanks. I'll reread that chapter today.

caoimhinh

Check out chapter 19 Flames too, for Masego making sarcastic comments and even make a joke about Cat's sex life.

As I recall, Masego kept that characteristic and being perfectly capable of not only detecting but also using sarcasm and making jokes up until somewhere in the middle of Book 3, then he was steadily toned down to the socially awkward Masego we know and love today.

Stormblessed

I reread chapter 17 and can definitely see what you mean. Somewhere along the way Masego lost interest in anything non magical and stopped using extremely sarcastic jokes.

That being said, it is definitely right for him to be the way he is now. When I was reading book 2 chapter 17 I found myself struck that Masego just seemed like a slightly tamer version of Archer.

Furthermore, I think the early stuff could be reconciled with the later stuff with either an extra chapter or a Masego section where he can explain he didn't really understand any of the stuff he was saying when they first met. Those were all learned behaviors to camouflage his social weaknesses. As they got to know him he felt more comfortable in his ability to be his true self and possibly actually learn those social behaviors in his own way rather than a mimicry of them.

Make it so his reversion to form is a part of his character growth.

caoimhinh

Perhaps you find it striking now because the image we have from Masego in the recent chapters is different to the way he initially was, but his attitude in that chapter is consistent with the way he is in the entirety of Book 2. You can see it since his first appearance in Book 2 chapter 5 all the way until Book 3,

For example, there's this fragment from Book 3 Chapter 18 Crack, right after Cat ordered the founding of the Knight Order of Broken Bells:

"I can initiate the connection at any time," he said.

"Before you do that, we need a little chat," I said. "I don't want to keep you in the dark, so I'll just state it outright: I might have dabbled a bit in treason."

"Dabbled?" he said, frowning over his glasses.

"You know, dipped a toe in the treason pool," I said.

"I wish you would have told me beforehand," he replied. "Now I'll need to rework Marchford's ward pattern to be able to face advanced scrying rituals."

I cocked my head to the side.

"That's it?"

"Oh no, treason," he said in a mockingly high-pitched voice. "No villain has ever done such a thing before. All my extensive interest in Imperial politics is now put in danger."

I snorted.

"What's that voice supposed to even represent?" I asked.

"How little I care about any of this," he replied frankly. "I'm sure you'll find some compromise with Uncle Amadeus, and the Empress probably knew you were going to do this before the thought ever crossed your mind."

The bespectacled mage pressed his hand against the mirror-wall, spoke a word in the arcane tongue and idly made for the door.

"Now, if you'll excuse me," he said. "I think one of the tapirs got loose."

"Stuff like this is why you don't get to have giant fire-breathing lizards," I called out.

"You have no standards, Squire," he complained one last time before closing the door behind him.

So yeah, since his first appearance in Book 2 Chapter 5 and all the way up to the latter part of Book 3 he was sarcastic, detected nuances, was able to take hints and knew how to hint at things (for example he made subtle insinuations that he would not mind joining Cat's group after their first encounter in Summerholm), he had a great sense of humor too. Masego was then gradually toned down, one awkward moment at a time, and our image of the sarcastic and humorous mage was replaced the more serious, somewhat childish and socially awkward Masego. In Book 4 we saw Masego struggling to understand physical contact, the nuances of social interaction, finding it hard to know when someone was sarcastic and even was awkward in his body language (like being too stiff when hugging or leaning his head on another's shoulder).

Basically the only things that remained from his initial personality were his love for discussing and explaining things (later mixed with an obsession for accuracy) and his disdain for lesser or inefficient workings of magic.

Liliet

I mean about the first thing Cat ever thinks about Masego is that he's not great socially and the second thing he does is infodump all over her only to have his father interrupt him (although Cat was interested and asking more questions).

Masego has been autistic since his very first introduction, he just discarded the allistic-passing disguise kit after moving out from his parents' place

I kind of miss his sarcasm-filled facade, I admit, but autistic he was from the very beginning. And ofc he's still full of sarcasm: I assure you, not every time he "misunderstands because he thinks too literally" is genuine. He is autistic, not stupid.

And ofc Indrani is, on top of shit Ranger left her with, very ADHD ♥

(and there are no "flaws" in it. Masego's greatest social problem is his lack of ethical understanding, not social, he's actually interpersonally apt af and exactly where he wants to be that-wise. Better at it than Hakram. And Indrani hanging upside down from a tree and tuning out war councils that have more than 3 people talking is what we all love about her <3)

caoimhinh

Emm, no. Her impression of "It was becoming apparent that social skills were not one of Masego's no doubt plentiful talents" was said because he seemed uncaring about Hakram getting killed (this was an error on her part, as we saw immediately that he was very interested in the nascent Name of Adjutant and the fact that it was the first Name for an orc in two thousand years).

His sarcasm and sense of humor were not a facade, that was his real personality, it flowed naturally for him. The jokes, snappy comments, he was quick to pick up hints and undertood both sarcasm and irony. This was for the entirety of Book 2 and large part of Book 3.

However, there was a change in him afterwards, and it was too great to think it was "Masego dropping his disguise".

Consider this: when was the last time you remember Masego laughing?

In Book 2, we saw him laugh mockingly at the death of the Exiled Prince, laugh like a madman when he burned the Demon that possessed the Silver Spears with a torrent of sorcerous flames, He even grinned in battle thrill when facing strong opponents, even made clever comments aimed at his opponents when he was fighting (like against the Bumbling Conjuror when he was still Apprentice or against the 3 Demons at the gates of Liesse, when he had already become Hierphant)

He made snappy replies and funny comments all the time, and showed understanding of subtlety. He also smiled a lot more back then.

No, that wasn't a facade, it was natural. but those parts of his personality are gone now.

Liliet

Catherine assumed social skills were not Masego's strong suit because he blurted out "don't worry, you might die soon enough it never becomes a problem!" in an attempt to be comforting.

And then Wekesa interrupted him talking to Cat with "she's not a practitioner she doesn't understand what you're saying" which obviously (to me) suggests a habit of infodumps.

And all of Masego's sense of humor was Autistic Humor as fuck. We're great at sarcasm when we try

And expressing emotions is a skill we often have to deliberately invoke, alongside reading them. We just don't express them naturally in the same way. When I was a kid I legit practiced facial expressions in front of a mirror – I found it fun, but it was also borne out of understanding that I... uh... needed the practice.

I cannot remember when Masego last laughed, but I also didn't remember the instances you mentioned (other than him fucking dying @ dorian's death), so that's not much indicative. Still, don't forget he also grew from like 16 to 21 in the time we've known him – his personality had time and space to change...

...and it's entirely possible that his manner of expressing his emotions simply changed.

I certainly recall an instance of him being funny in Extra Chapter: Background 😊 and there was the part where he and Indrani teamed up to mock Cat during the Winter Court arc... I cannot remember more but I bet there are more.

And understanding of subtlety, too, is something an autistic person has to focus on to maintain. It's an artificial skill, like standing on your tiptoes to see over a fence – you get fucking tired of doing that all the time, and if you can drop it without negative consequences – which for Masego there would be none once he left his parents' nagging presence – there's great temptation to.

Lena27

The thing is Pilgrim thinks Cat isn't in Creation. If he's right, then that can only mean Cat is here. Which means we can expect her to show up in the next chapter. I'm not saying it won't be an interlude and i'll be fine w/ either. However, I think our Black Queen will be arriving sooner rather than later.

NerfContessa

Couldn't agree more.

These interludes are building up to. Something beyond epic.

matrixm

Are you kidding? We just found out that the tyrant foresaw one the pilgrims clutch Trump cards and is using it to screw over Cat, HARD!

Liliet

Or at least that's what he thinks 😊

Sitter

I don't really care. The pairing of Hakram and the Tyrant is delightful.

Gunslinger

Thanks for a chapter even on Easter weekend!!

Can't say I understood much from this chapter, but boy will I enjoy seeing the Tyrant being put in his place by Cat. The dude is way too sure of himself.

RoflCat

All 3 letters are now used, and Vivienne seem to have seen what Cath is planning

Which is get Kairos to attack Procer forces, that way they can negotiate Callow out of having to suffer any reparation from the surrender by helping Procer against Kairos

This means that the surrender is genuine, coming from Cat
Vivi is the one who'll get them out of surrender status, by negotiating to help against the League.
And unlike with Cat, Vivi is a former Heroine, so they don't have the excuse of her being Evil to deny cooperation either.

Kairos, on the other hand, think Cat is planning to form a new Court of Acadia by using Masego, and seem to be planning based on that.

So at least for now it seems things are going as Cat planned.
Pilgrim's pattern of three ruined, Vivi instated as heiress, Kairos sent to fight Procer.
I think if anything is to go wrong, it'll be from either Hierarch interference or Tyrant outplaying Cat

Andrew Mitchell

"... so they don't have the excuse of her being Evil to deny cooperation either." Great point!

"... Cat is planning to form a new Court of Acadia" or is this Masego and/or Larat's plan?

"... if anything is to go wrong, it'll be from either Hierarch interference or Tyrant outplaying Cat." IMO Masego and Larat are also possible/probable sources of problems. Plus, something HAS to go wrong for Cat, this has all gone too smoothly for there not to be a catastrophe coming.

Liliet

Nope. This is as Unspoken Plan Guarantee as it gets, with us not having heard from Catherine's perspective for like five chapters by now and her plan being entirely unclear when we last saw her.

Well, I do agree that something is going to go wrong, but I expect it to be a long-term ball tossed in the air, not spoiling the immediate broth. This victory is going to be clean and unambiguous is what I'm calling 😊

Immediate points of where Kairos seems to be missing things:
– he says Basilea is a match for Pilgrim's armies and Cat's surprise, but what about the Marshals? 😊
– Catherine sure did not seem intent on actually giving Larat what he wanted, so this appears to be her pulling the wool over Kairos's eyes 😊
– I did NOT get the impression that Catherine considers the Masego situation to be anything other than a flaming clusterfuck of uncertainty. "He can't possibly be in his right mind" is a denial of the best case possibility, not the worst case one. Whatever's going on there, I don't expect Cat to be discounting it

I believe Kairos was hinting about Dead King possessing Masego as his fathers thought was possible if he would follow the apotheosis ritual trap

mavant

Oh, that makes more sense. I thought he was implying Hierarch was the other friend and I didn't understand how this could be to the benefit of the People, aside from slaying some Foreign Oligarchs.

Mental Mouse

A disturbing thought. Another possibility would be that he did retrieve the spirit of his diabolic father, muffed his handling of it for "personal reasons", and is now possessed by it.

Another question is just who will be in charge of that new court (perhaps after a round of usurpation and/or assassination). Can't be Larat, because nobody wants him with that kind of power, and by himself he's not strong enough to hold it. If Catherine (or Masego) takes it.. she basically has gone Dead King, but she's also taken herself out of Creation. Too bad the realms' access area in Creation seems to be big chunk of Procer. Sve Noc (or Cat, or an ex-Mighty) taking the throne would provide a new homeland for the Drow, at the cost of exiling them from Creation.

Insanenoodlyguy

based on the fact that Kairos made that "Seven and one" reference, I'm guessing Larat in fact would be strong enough. The Summer Princess seemed very alarmed when Cat told her his service conditions, remember? Namely, that whatever prophecy or gaes or fae rule he's tied up in, if seven and one creation crowns are laid at his feet, he's King. Or Has the power he seeks, has the rule he wants, etc. At some point he was told something to the effect of "You lust for power, great Larat, but you shall never have it. Not till seven and one mortal crowns are laid at your feet." One of those things that will never happen that because stories is totally going to happen one day. Larat has been riding the wild hunt into creation to make the path to that story. And, if he gets it how he wants it without interference, whatever he becomes, he will have the mojo to "hold" it. Since he seems to want an in with creation, perhaps it's to have a New Court of Creation that he rules? He'll have all his fae powers as if he was in arcadia, something like that. And the descending overlap of the two dimensions just makes it easier to happen or some-such. It's a story that, manipulated right, Cat could well use to her advantage, and a more classic villain sort of story where you make a big bad in exchange for your own power. That one has notoriously bad odds for you surviving once the new big bad is in existence, but I could see where Kairos and his classical villains mind could predict such a gambit, especially if he thinks Cat has one of those "but I can still control you to an extent" leashes that usually come with the stories where the villain partner survives this, he knows Cat is smart like that.

maresther23

Apotheosis vs Democracy!

Morgenstern

I really like how Cat has finally found a way to the Alliance table, after all – and Kairos sees straight through it...

... and a) either still goes along with it anyway or b) will totally ruin that idea, if he gets the chance. But he might be too focused on the crowns thingy and everything else in Arcadia to have found a way for b) – after all, the threat of the League alone is already enough to get Viv what she wants for the armies under her command (getting free and kind of being at the table in exchange for help against the League), as that's a negotiation taking place BEFORE battle is joined, and it doesn't really matter if the League then refuses to give them that, as long as they are THERE. And they obviously still are going to be there. ^^

I wonder where the Hierarch is, though...

Liliet

"Kairos sees straight through it" I strongly doubt that.

Immediately where I'm seeing him be wrong:

- he assumes Cat's going to actually go for a fae court under her control. It has been established pretty damn firmly that this is a terrible idea for Cat's long-term objectives and goes against all methodology she's managed to salvage from the trainwreck that her ascension to power has been. Kairos preventing Larat from seizing the crowns is a "don't throw me into the briar patch" kind of move on Catherine's part;

- I'm getting the impression Kairos actually thinks Cat wants him to liberate her forces? That she'll only betray him in the aftermath and immediately her armies are going to be either standing down or helping him? Because he did not mention Marshals, Legions and Callowan Knights as forces his general will have to contend with, and they're not something you can afford to so blithely discount as to not even mention.

I think Kairos is falling into a good old "Evil Cannot Understand Good" trap, reading Cat as more similar to himself than she actually is. Catherine HAS been creating an impression of more villainy than she actually has in her, and it's about to backfire on him real bad, as he assumes she wants to fuck over the Grand Alliance and Procer, as opposed to help them out of their troubles.

Catherine is willing to bleed her army to protect them, and as she has commented in the planning chapter, that's not something other players can predict from her behavior so far.

Kissaten

>I think Kairos is falling into a good old "Evil Cannot Understand Good" trap, reading Cat as more similar to himself than she actually is.

I think he saw Hakram's memories/read his mind and have seen all three letters, reading the "Theodosius Dilemma" as an extension of his letter. Something like "Theodosius will bloody the Grand Alliance, that's the only way to save callowans from surrender, and then callowans will humble the Alliance further. And get 7 and 1 crowns, too, because we love our prices long and twice!" From his point of view, Vivienne isn't an actor, this letter is a move of a pawn. Kairos certainly wants to throw a wrench at this plan.

Liliet

I don't think he gets the full on memory reading thing, more the same kind of truth-telling / intention reading as Tariq. So he'd know what Hakram thinks of the situation, but he wouldn't get to actually know word by word the actual content of the letters – he'd only get secondhand understanding of them.

And Hakram did not think about it deeply like Vivienne did.

So Kairos is vaguely aware there's some kind of confusing instruction given to Catherine's forces, but if Hakram didn't guess the connotations, he won't have any way to, either 😊

Farroc Tokla

It is also interesting to note the 7 and 1 situation. Kairos just brought Cat's right hand man within stabbing distance of a double handful of Proceran princes...

Andrew Mitchell

I really hope not all the princes/princesses die. In particular, Roseala (sorry for butchering the spelling) because leaders like her will be useful against the Dead King.

Javvies

Yup, Tyrant is going for Amadeus's soul and the crowns Cat owes Larat.

I wonder whether or not Cat saw Pilgrim's contingency here coming. Probably, hopefully.

Oh. If I'm reading this right, Kairos just implied that the seven crowns and one would allow Larat to forge a new Fae Court. Might be a way for Cat to recover some of her own Fae power if Larat reforges Winter or forges a new Fae Court.

Novice

But Cat already has a source of power in the Night. Wouldn't creating another come back to bite her ass, narratively speaking, since that would have the shape of a villain lusting for more power?

Also, I have a feeling that the third party wanting the broken piece of Arcadia Tyrant is talking about is the Dead King.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is someone in the ruine of Liesse, it is probably Masego.

Doesn't need to be two different people.

caoimhinh

"The thing that waits for you in the depths of Liesse stolen isn't just your friend. I would be a great deal more wary of what it intends, were I you. For if this night does not go to the Black Queen or to myself, well, it is another friend of mine that will get his due"

That sounds like Masego being possessed. Wekesa and Tikoloshe seemed certain that the knowledge from Neshamah could corrupt and even control the person who learned it, although that doesn't make sense to me since Masego extracted it directly from Neshamah's echo and not from an enchanted book of spells, but we have already seen Masego isn't on his right mind and if EE actually goes for that route then Masego is under Neshamah's control now.

Personally, I hope there's something else happening there because that story from Tikoloshe and Wekesa seemed like their own ignorance talking (their speculations about Catherine were proved wrong and Masego was perfectly fine until Warlock blew up Thalassina). I would prefer it just be Masego desperately trying something to get his father back (which would explain the multiple hellgates).

Liliet

I'm expecting it to be Masego trying to get Amadeus back

caoimhinh

But why would he do all that to get Amadeus back? I could believe it if it's trying to get Tikoloshe or even Wekesa back.

On another note, Masego might still be in his right mind, sort of, just in a kind of trance that keeps him focused on a task until he gets it done, like when he tried to extract the echo from his father or his internal trance making experiments within his mind after Pilgrim broke the Gate during the Battle of the Camps.

Remember when Cat first entered and the Gate shattered and then slithered in Masego's direction? If Cat meets him and he claims that was an invitation that would be hilarious.

Agent J

But why would he do all that to get Amadeus back?

... because that's his uncle and he loves him dearly?

caoimhinh

Well, I didn't mean it that way.

Not in "why would he want Amadeus back?" but rather "why would doing this help in getting Amadeus back?" Especially since he seems to be doing something there involving hells and High Arcana, that doesn't seem to be something relating to rescuing Amadeus.

Liliet

Do note that Amadeus is currently in two pieces, one of them protected by sorcery from scrying.

I think Masego's doing some kind of off-the-rails Praesi mage equivalent of building a flamethrower to light a candle.

medailyfun

One of the rules of the dark lord – never leave the source of your power uncontrolled. DK had lot of time to find that echo and tinker with it on purpose

Decius

I wouldn't put it past The Bard to have set up Neshamah to have been corrupted in a manner that would corrupt people in general; it's possible that Masego has now been possessed not by the Dead King, but by the thing which became the Dead King when it possessed Neshamah.

mavant

That's a pretty interesting possibility, but I'm not sure how we would distinguish the two – it doesn't seem like the previous instances described by Wekesa and Tikka end with Neshamah becoming dispossessed.

caoimhinh

That's an interesting theory, perhaps it's not an entity per se, but a kind of 'drive' that makes him pursue an objective?

Although as far as we have seen, Neshamah developed his workings by himself, to the point that even Bard was questioning him about it that someone must have taught him for him to be able to advance so much on his craft, but Neshamah simply laughed it off.

Mental Mouse

I would also not assume that the Tyrant was necessarily telling the truth.

caoimhinh

That's an important consideration, Kairos can, at any moment, lie blatantly and without trouble.

Although so far we have seen him tell the truth when he is "gossiping" or telling secrets, there's no reason to trust his words nor assume he can't lie about this subject.

Skaddix

I doubt if Larat and Cat Deal will be complete when Larat gets the Seven Crowns and One. So anything he does is not liable to aid Cat at all. Not to mention Cat just started learning about Magic and the Fae and the like so the likelihood she can outmaneuver Larat on this front is pretty low.

Still the Tyrant seems well prepared.

Novice

To be fair, Cat (via Sve Noc) has complete and utter control of the Wild Hunt. It might be a tad too difficult for Larat to scheme his way out of that control, especially because of his rigid thinking owing to his fae nature.

Rook

It isn't really about control from how interpreted it, so much as anchor in Creation proper. By swearing to Cat until the paths were fulfilled, the intent of the Fae was to gain their foothold into creation regardless of the outcome. If Catherine doesn't fulfill the oaths they're forever part of a court rooted in Creation, and if she does fulfill the oaths, the seven crowns and one will give them permanent foothold onto creation anyway by way of earthly empire.

The key here is not about control over the hunt so much as finding a way to deny their foothold so that they don't run rampant through creation proper after Catherine is dust.

One way to do this would be to bind the seven crowns and one to masego's little piece of Arcadia instead of creation, then fulfill the oath. The tyrant's play currently looks to be taking those crowns himself, so he has leverage over Catherine.

Someguy

Still, whatever happens to Larat, Ranger is going to get a share as well since she still has his eye right?

Ignore this copy. For some reason, my comment in this thread didn't go through the first time. But then it appeared when I sent the second one. It's infuriating.

Morgenstern

I wonder if the Tyrant is working on outdated info when it comes to that formation of a new Fae court. It truly might have been only possible when Winter was still alive... but it no longer is. The last conversation between Cat and Larat seemed to state quite clearly that the Hunt now only has powers due to Night – and they cannot take over that. All the old oaths broke, too, barring from the side of the Fae themselves, who seem to still be bound to keeping it, but only due to their rigid nature.

On the other hand, this just might be were Cat is mistaken after all...

Morgenstern

Where... -.-

Also, what binds the Hunt might, of course, just be the way they'd be instantly powerless once they no longer follow Cat (if their power source truly IS only the Night now).

Gods, how I miss an edit function here.

Novice

I know right. Even the ability to delete a post would be a god-sent. Goddamnit, WordPress.

caoimhinh

"Prince no longer," the fae smiled. "I have abdicated my title, as have all with me. The Hunt claims no lord amongst its hunters."

So Larat and the rest of the Fae in the Wild Hunt don't have their titles, they renounced their ties to the new Arcadian Court for the bet of having a foothold on Creation thanks to Catherine.

"We swear to your service, Queen of the Hunt," the fae said. "Queen of Air and Darkness, Sovereign of Moonless Nights. We swear 'til the day of last ruin, 'til all debts are paid. We would ride beneath your banner, in this world and every other."

"What clever foxes you are," she said. "Your oaths I accept, in the spirit they were given."

I think that's what screwed Larat, He swore eternal service to Cat, binding himself to her Court (Winter that only she held) as a source of power, but now that Winter was devoured by Night his power is dependant on Sve Noc, and due to his oath of service to Catherine perhaps even if he becomes a King of a newly made Court he would still be her subordinate. He probably didn't expect that his holding would be a hellscape made from a fragment of Arcadia instead of an actual terrain in Creation.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

The seven crowns and one was a price put on his help in ambushing the Summer Court in Arcadia, an event which has already come to pass. Our first hints of the significance of that particular price comes from the same battle.

It is an entirely separate matter to the oaths of fealty sworn to Catherine in her capacity as Queen of Callow.

Cicero

But wasn't Larat's oath sworn to continue only until "all debts are paid" meaning until Cat gives him the 7 crowns and one?

That links the two.

Mental Mouse

There's also "the day of last ruin", which who knows what it means.

Andrew Mitchell

Sounds like that may be a good description of what's happening in Masego's piece of Arcadia.

Someguy

Eh? I thought Tyrant was after whatever's in Liesse or Pilgrim's Calvary?

Doesn't mean Tyrant's not going for a honourable obligatory backstab in his most trusted ally's back. Gods i hope he is going to push Grey Pilgrim into attacking callowans and giving the Shining Princess a chance, well, to Shine.

Javvies

The "finder's keepers" bit.

If he gets to Amadeus's soul before Cat does, she'll have to deal with him to get it.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure he was talking about the troops themselves, which he presumably has or intends to co-opt for his own purposes – anything from attacking on his own behalf to convenient sacrifices. Either way, I wouldn't be surprised if he throws them a party first 😊.

But yeah, odds are the Rogue Sorcerer and Amadeus's soul are in there, unless Cat (who's surely in Arcadia) got there first. Anyway, off to the next installment to see what's to be seen!

Liliet

If I'm reading this right, Cat has no intention of actually going through with Larat's deal. Maybe she'll act like she's going to, set up the pieces that would allow it... and then let Kairos push them over.

She does not intend on letting Larat forge a new Fae Court any more than she intended to make Winter Court out of Callow, is my estimation.

Morgenstern

I wonder if that is still possible no matter what, after all, Winter got eaten and Summer also isn't available anymore since the Courts merged in Arcadia. So what the hell does that make the Wild Hunt? Is Cat right that the Night is now the only source of power for them? I wonder... I personally would find it interesting to have a little twist here. But then again.. they're just minor characters. That arc might simply end here, with the Princes' Graveyard and someone finding out that those crowns would not have helped the Hunt fae in any way anymore anyway.

Andrew Mitchell

"That arc might simply end here, with the Princes' Graveyard and someone finding out that those crowns would not have helped the Hunt fae in any way anymore anyway."

Highly unlikely IMO because it would be highly unsatisfying to us, the readers.

Insanenoodlyguy

Pilgrims contingency is useless, at least against her. Yeah, if she played this straight, Pilgrim probably could have forced round 3 and ended this. But what good is a heroic charge now? She surrendered. This is a new unrelated battle with the forces of Levant now, so it has much less mojo, as a "the heroes took the dangerous path and had a random encounter/ambush" battle. On the other hand, and Pilgrim and Vivienne know this, that can be turned into a “Just as the battle was concluded, a third party stepped in! Now the former foes can only survive if they WORK TOGETHER.” which gives great momentum into the “Having fought on the same side, now hand in hand they go to fight the real enemy!”

Javvies

Or, if she runs into the detachment in Arcadia, they might go after her anyways, believing that she’s lying to them about surrendering to Pilgrim ... or just because they saw her first. She’d probably have some leeway to work with there – they aren’t Pilgrim and she’s under no obligation not to defend herself against (another) attempt to murder her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Narrative themes makes that unlikely. This sort of story flows more like this: Procer is fighting the Legion, and it’s all “Oh damn this is bad, oh god now Callow is riding in now it’s WORSE and – wait a minute... they are attacking the Legion’s rear. They are helping us! Back them up and push in, we can win this!”

Javvies

I thought that things would be fairly predictable after Cat’s surrender. For some reason, I have it in my head that Kairos should be with his army at all times. I didn’t expect this detour and certainly not Pilgrim’s cavalry contingency when I was already convinced chapters ago that Pilgrim and Black are foils of each other. Should have expected back-up plans.

I should probably do another reread.

devildragon777

I'm guessing this is another of those situations where nobody's figured out that Cat isn't playing the same game they are...

...Also, did Kairos just get a whole army delivered to him on a platter? That seems bad.

JJR

Every Prince and Princess?

I'm thinking that we're f=going to be seeing the Prince's Graveyard very soon.

Kissaten

Furthermore there are exactly 7 princes and princesses of Procer mentioned in the Trust is the Wager chapter.

caoimhinh

Add to that Kairos and we got seven crowns and one.

sengachi

OH! Ohhhhhohohohoho, that's a good catch!

RoflCat

Random thought: What if, instead of "Seven crowns and one, laid at your feet," referring to their heads off their shoulders, it means the 7 crowns and 1 basically lay down to Larat, i.e. submitting to him?

And instead of any conceptual ideas, the new Court is Court of Law/Order gavel smack sound

Where the idea is for Larat and his faes to become basically eternal judges that'll ensure that these Procer regions + League will follow the law created, so no more nobles getting away with doing whatever they pleased, or royals spinning the truth to their own benefits.

There's some groundwork for it already in Procer too, the Mavian prayers' sites can basically be the anchor (read:

office entrance) to the Court, we know a certain Accord that Cat would like to set it up very much and now we have the ones who'll enforce it, being neither from Above nor Below faction.

caoimhinh

Ooohhhh!! Now that's a fascinating hypothesis.

Relyt

I think Cat would love having some neutral third party Court of Order, especially if it could help her implement and enforce the Liesse Accords. But letting Larat run something that important? Hell no. If Larat wins any power from those seven crowns and one, then Cat will definitely make sure he's still beholden to her, or Sve Noc, or just booted out of Creation entirely.

Plus, I just don't see enough of a story behind the Wild Hunt becoming judge and jury. No connection there.

Mental Mouse

Larat and the hunt as unholy judges? Putting those in Procer would flatly require conquering it in the name (or at least banners) of Evil. On the other hand, Saint was planning to see Procer razed anyway....

Do we have the slightest clue where the leader of the league is again?

Novice

You're saying Kairos will use Hierarch to turn the cavalry into his? If so, that's clever. I just assumed something more mundane like lies or blackmail or traitors within the ranks.

Oshi

Kairos is old style villian. When would he ever resort to mundane means.

Cicero

He seemed to suggest that his other friend was in the ruins of Lesse with the Heirophant, so maybe that's where the Hierarch is?

Anyway, I assumed that there was a reference here also to Black's soul, which is with the Rouge Sorcerer, who is likely to be the Heroic force guiding this Procer force through Arcadia.

JJR

The use of the phrase "get his due." Suggests the Dead King to me, as a reference to the concept of Keter's Due. As for being a friend, Tyrant sent envoys to pledge eternal friendship to almost all Calernian powers a while ago. I don't think he tried with the elves or dwarves, but he did send someone to the Dead King and even the Ratlings. So calling the person a friend doesn't narrow it down that much.

As to how the Dead King gets involved. Masego was warned by his devil father back before Warlock blew up a city/fleet about learning too much about the Dead King. The information itself was somehow a trap and an infection. When Masego revealed how he had harvested the information from an echo in Arcadia the result was a mild freakout and a demand to purge the information from his brain.

Liliet

Oof, I momentarily forgot about that one =x
MASEGO PLEASE BE OKAY

caoimhinh

And the Keter's Due for a ritual for Apotheosis or whatever it is that Masego is attempting to do, would be massive, which is one of the reasons to do this kind of insane thing in a separate shard of Arcadia, and maybe the use of the wards Diabolist created that enabled to repurpose the Due to a secondary array and spell. But it's still a huge catastrophe in the making.

Kissaten

How do you even intercept a providence-sanctioned heroic charge as a villain? Black fortified the only avenue to attack back when he fought in the Vales, what's Kairos' excuse? I think Rogue Sorcerer went rogue, that's how Kairos knows. And if that's the case, Rogue Sorcerer will get his due by dying horribly. As to why he would do so, back in the epilogue chapter when Black was hostage to Pilgrim and Saint of Swords Black tried to say something about helping Rogue Sorcerer's parents.

Liliet

That was after the silence spell took hold. The guy never heard what Black was trying to say.

Kissaten

Yeah, but the possibility to tempt Rogue Sorcerer with that info still stands.

Liliet

1) The entire point of that episode is that it doesn't because the heroes were dead set on not allowing Amadeus any opportunity for communication/sabotage.

2) I'm about 90% sure it was a baseless bluff said just for the sake of getting his goat. Amadeus was kind of going off the rails hard at that point, "moral victory" and all (no I'm not getting over that any time soon, please stop hitting yourself please stop hitting yourself please stop hitting yourself)

These interludes feel like chapters with a different name.

Not short interludes.

And now for another god.

Autumn?

Kissaten

I think initially there were two Courts of fae, Summer and Winter as no other Courts were mentioned back when fae were introduced. After Arcadia been reformed Spring and Autumn courts were mentioned, as well as Cat flying over unknown banners of fae in Arcadia.

So to take a wild guess, it's going to be SUMMER, of all things, Winter is no more and Spring and Autumn already claimed. There's a STAR hanging in the skies, 7 crowns and 1 waiting to be taken, and unclaimed part of Arcadia.

caoimhinh

It's not that.

There are only two Courts of Fae in Arcadia during each cycle, the pairs are Summer-Winter and Spring-Autumn. However, when the King of Winter and Queen of Summer married they unified Arcadia into one brand new Court, which is why Winter was no more except for Catherine since she was not bound to Arcadia thus making her the only owner of the entirety of a Court, as Sve Noc said: "You stole half their Garden".

Now Larat wants to make another brand new Court with him as King/Leader, which would interestingly make it back into two Courts of Fae. It wouldn't be Summer and does not even be associated with the seasons. If anything, it would be the Hunt since every member of this new Court would be from the Wild Hunt.

nick012000

Perhaps they'd be Faerie Courts of Night and Day.

caoimhinh

Oh, that's also a possibility. Nice.

Someguy

I thought the Courts of Spring & Autumn is on the other side of Arcadia where the Yan Tei Empire (Guide'Verse equivalent of Feudal China) connects?

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Spring_and_Autumn_period

caoimhinh

Well, Masego said that Arcadia is different outside of Calernia, because perspective changes so that world changes, so the Yan Tei (who are likely China, I agree with you on that, they even have a Hero and Villain as rulers, Ying-Yang balance FTW).

Check out this Masego quote from Book 4 chapter 27:

“Consider Arcadia as a single object being looked upon by an infinity of perspectives. To every one, it is a different realm. Across the Tyrian Sea, it likely has completely different name and seems inhabited by completely different entities. Even the marriage of Winter and Summer is contained within the span of our gaze only, unlikely to have tremors beyond. It is so with this echo as well. Something that was momentous on our understanding of the world is not necessarily so elsewhere.”

As for the Spring and Autumn Courts, Cat vision when she became Duchess of Moonless Nights showed that they are part of the eternal cycle of that realm and are formed once the war between Winter and Summer ends.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for finding and sharing that quote. Very relevant. 😊

boballab

No, all four courts were there when the Fae courts were introduced. Summer always beats Winter and when its victory comes the Elves and the Courts they make up disappear and are replaced by the Spring and Autumn Courts and a completely different set of Elves. This is how and why Ranger keeps going back every time the Winter Court reforms/reappears and plucks out Larat's eye (I really wish to know what he did to piss her off that much). We have just never been told what the process is that ends the Spring and Autumn Courts. Kilian explains the courts in Book 3 Interlude: Gate “There's supposedly four Courts of Arcadia – one for each season – but the delineation between them isn't clear. They don't all exist at the same time, either.”

Andrew Mitchell

“comes the Elves and the Courts”... not Elves, but Fae.

Liliet

Come on, you have to be doing the elf/fae thing on purpose by now 0.0

Darkening

Summer doesn't always beat Winter, sometimes Winter manages to assassinate enough people and sow enough discord between different Summer powers that they're weak and feeble when outright war comes and Winter murders them all.

caoimhinh

=> There's a STAR hanging in the skies, 7 crowns and 1 waiting to be taken, and unclaimed part of Arcadia.

That reminded me of the Big Dipper asterism formed by the seven brightest stars of the Ursa Major constellation. Here's a fun fact: they are actually seven stars and one, because Alcor is also there right next to Mizar (the second star in from the end of the handle) but it's outshined by its companion, so not counted in the forming of the asterism.

What if this new Court of Fae is a STAR Court? Like, you know, Stars shining in the Night. Would be interesting.

Mental Mouse

"These interludes feel like chapters with a different name. Not short interludes."

Basically, EE set a routine of calling chapters that weren't from Catherine POV "Interludes". Which works fine, but it starts to sound funny when Cat dodges out of sight for a significant period, and we're following everyone else for this many chapters.

That's basically why the other day I was teasing about EE channeling Robert Jordan. Jordan's Wheel of Time starts with at least half-a-dozen "primary" characters, then progressively doubles and triples the number, and that's just on the protagonists' side. And he does POV for all of them plus most of the antagonists and a few bystanders, which is how he wound up with 12 thick volumes of the series, and why Sanderson needed 3 more volumes to wrap up the story.

Aston Whiteman

Interlude or Chapter Wednesday it's still good story!

caoimhinh

And so the Princes' Graveyard is to be in Arcadia, I imagine the Princes of Procer are very angry from being marching through that storm. I don't think they will all die, since Catherine only needs to lay their crowns at Larat's feet, not their heads, but to be called a Graveyard many of them will die.

Will the Rogue Sorcerer also be marching with that host? He should be, since he is someone skilled, needed for treading safely through Arcadia and also the only Hero left in that army (Saint and Pilgrim are in Creation right now) unless there's another Hero yet unrevealed. And that would also mean that Black's soul is there for the taking, unless he gave it back to Pilgrim, but Cat mentioned that being part of Below's due so I'm guessing Black's soul is with Rogue Sorcerer and he is in Arcadia. Time for Cat to rescue her father (and for the love of the Gods, the Old and the New, Above and Below, call him father to his face).

So seven crowns and one are to create a brand new Court of the Fae, that's interesting and given that this Court would only be the surviving members of the Wild Hunt that would make them very powerful. This generation of Winter Fae was born with a strong impetus of change it seems, with a King willing to take hard measures to change everything and a Prince willing to bet everything on an irregularity as is Catherine. It seems Larat wishes to be free from service once he collects his due, but he still has his connection to Cat (or to the Night now that it devoured Winter), so it'd be interesting to how things play out then and whether Cat will just kill him and be done with it or keeps an ambiguously treacherous lieutenant with great power and a thing for dramatic speech.

In case anyone is wondering, I checked and made a list of the princes that were shown to be in Iserre marching with the host: Rozala Malanza of Aequitan, Louis Rohanon of Creusens, Arnaud Brogloise of Cantal, Bertille of Lange, Sophie of Lyonis, Rodrigo of Orense, Leonor of Valencis. That makes it seven, we would be missing one crown for Larat's due. Would that one be Kairos' crown?

Dramatic music sounds

P.S: It's hilarious how everyone is unsettled trying to figure out just what the hells Adjutant wants, the list just grows up and is made funnier as characters that are proficient at reading people get stupified when trying to read Hakram (Empress Malicia's empty parchment on what the Orc is after is a good example).

konstantinvoncarstein

So the last letter is definitely the bet, Catherine hoped Vivienne would understand her intention to ally with the Alliance against the League.

I really hate Kairos, but during a long time I didn't understand why. And then I realized he is basically a villainous hero, he has all the Good cheat codes with villainous intents, and is completely overpowered.

In his first battle, he destroyed alone the entire opposing army. He manage to build a complex magical trap for Sabah without a known good mage, and he lead his army in Broceliand without it being destroyed.

He also has information sources inaccessible to no one who give him an absolutely ridiculous amount of knowledge and his "Wish" aspect permits him to know the desire of people even before he encountered them. And he managed to create the Hierarch, who I think is the most dangerous villain on Calernia, except maybe the Dead King.

ninegardens

Ah, but he doesn't just have the hero cheat code. He cheats using the VILLIAN cheat codes, more intelligently.

Early on, when smiting other Free city armies, he wasn't against heroes. By the story rules he has to rise up and be a threat before the heroes can smite him down.

Vs White knight etc, he invoked the old "The first part of the plan always succeeds" – a villain trope, not a hero one.

Sabah's death was really bard's making, not his.

I agree he is OP, but I don't think he has hero cheat codes.

konstantinvoncarstein

Concerning Sabah, I didn't mean her death. I mean the spell fueled by the people she killed, and that the Warlock redirect to kill the Ashen Priestess.

erebus42

He's only as powerful as he is because he leans into his role and the cliches. Black even says how he was weaker than his predecessors because he refused to do that as it leads to a villain's inevitable downfall.

Liliet

Nah, he's not a hero. He's a villain.

Amadeus's insistence that heroes are the ones who get cheat codes while villains don't was laughable. Villains don't get cheat codes towards greater good, that much is true – that's because villains get cheat codes towards scheming and seizing power while wrecking everything around them. Kairos is using those to great effect.

konstantinvoncarstein

By cheat codes, I mean that Fate make sure the heroes always win against the villains, by giving them access to resources that no villain could ever hope to receive. As said in my comment and another below, Kairos has access to such resources.

Liliet

Again, my point is that your inaccuracy is in assuming there is an inequality in resources heroes and villains receive.

Or that Fate makes sure heroes always win against villains – that one's straight up inaccurate.

Amadeus discarded most of the toolbox his side afforded him, then complained his opponents had a full one while he was left with a rusty knife and a screwdriver. That's on no-one other than him.

There's plenty of resources villains have access to that heroes don't.

konstantinvoncarstein

Like what?

Fate does not favor heroes? From the beginning, everyone from Amadeus to Catherine and Saint to Kairos, agree that Good always win. It is indeed not always the case, but heroes have a lot of advantage comparing to villains. Sure, "first step always works", but the end goal is hardly ever attained.

Heroes have Angels whispering in their ears, Aspects which are most of the time specially adapted to resolve the problem at hand, lots and lots of coincidence to help them, true resurrection, etc etc etc. Evil has nothing like this.

Liliet

Good might always win in the end, but Evil always wins the first step.

>The villains in the stories always had a trigger, a first spark to set the blaze. They'd been wronged, laughed at. They had a grudge to settle against Creation, and they were going to do it by toppling all those righteous kingdoms like a house of cards. They flew the banners of empires they'd crafted out of cold rage and egomania, sent their Legions of Terror to conquer everything from the sacred forests of the Golden Bloom to the burnt wastelands of the Lesser Hells. It didn't matter what they took, I was beginning to grasp, so much as the fact that they took it. What did the Tyrants care if the heroes freed their monsters or destroyed their ancient magical weapon, if they brought down the Dark Tower on their head or sunk the ancient city they'd raised from the depths? At the end of it all, even if you lost you'd already won. I finally got it, then. You'd won because in a hundred years someone was going to look at the ruins of your madness and their blood was going to run cold. Like a child screaming at the night, you filled the silence so that someone would hear.

Evil has resources to achieve the "archetypical Evil" goal – make a mark. Sure, separate Evil people might not be satisfied with that, but it's not like heroes are super happy about winning in the end after taking heavy losses either, yeah?

Evil has resources that Good doesn't. Good might get the peasant with the sword, but Evil got to have the dragon first.

Insanenoodlyguy

Order of the stick has a character who, other than the bits in here about having a hero son, probably gives the best representation of general competent evil mentality in this world (note, not Black's practicality, think more Akua and Kairos, the types who know how the game is played but are OKAY with it)

<http://www.giantitp.com/comics/oots0763.html>

The comic is fun, unless you hate stick figures, but this page is worth reading even if you never take another glance.

TL;DR anyway: The competent villain knows he will lose someday, but that's AFTER he wins and got to win and enjoy being the big evil, usually for a decent amount of time. Yeah, the very last part's gonna suck, but it's gonna be a hell of a ride till then.

konstantinvoncarstein

I like it, the cartoon is cool 😊 You are right, both heroes and villains are backed by Fate, only not toward the same goal nor at the same time.

But I still hate Kairos 😊 if only because he created the Hierarchy.

Liliet

Yeah how dare he hurt Anaxares so)=)=)=

konstantinvoncarstein

More like "how dare he unleash such horror on the world" 🔥

Liliet

Andrew Mitchell

+1 on your recommendation to read those two pages. I'd forgotten most of that OOTS scene so thank you so much for posting it.

beleester

Amadeus has filled entire graveyards with heroes who "always win." Catherine followed in his footsteps by stomping the Stalwart Paladin's band and half the heroes in the Crusade. Praes as a whole has survived ten Crusades, and every other Evil nation in Calernia seems to have a similar track record.

Villains do get convincing, long-lasting victories sometimes, because that's what establishes them as a threat. And from an in-story perspective, you have no way of knowing whether any given hero's role is "The chosen one who finally brings down the evil empire" or "The chump who looks like the chosen one for about five minutes before getting killed off to establish the villain's threat."

The only reason people say "Heroes always win" is because no matter how many times the villains win, we don't consider the story over until a hero has won. We assume that, since the story isn't a tragedy, eventually one of the heroes will succeed. But that's equally true for the villains – once the story is over, someone else will climb the tower and start the whole business over again. The heroes don't "win," only restore the status quo.

Indeed, Catherine's whole reason for backing the villains is that she thinks the constant battles cause more damage to Callow than a decisive win by the villains would.

Liliet

^^^

I like the way you phrase it with "we don't consider the story over until a hero has won".

konstantinvoncarstein

Black win by going around the story, it is the only reason. And he discarded all lot of Evil tools because they were mor liabilities than assets. Praes managed to win against Callow only 2 time in more than one thousand years, how do you explain this without Fate backing the heroes?

Liliet

They're more liabilities than assets because they're tailored to goals he does not have. Villain tools are for terrifying Creation and leaving a mark on it, not for achieving long-term peace. Amadeus uses Good tools for Good goals because those are the ones he has and therefore those are the ones that work for him.

Kairos isn't going to manage to conquer Procer or better the lot of Helikeans long-term. His inexplicable prophetic knowledge wouldn't help him with that any more than Still Water would help Amadeus cement his vision of better Praes.

Amadeus is pissy about not a single Dread Emperor managing to stave off starvation, even the few that tried. There is a reason it's few that tried.

Mental Mouse

I note that Amadeus and Cat, each in their own way, have indeed terrified Creation and made their mark. Cat's not finished, and Amadeus looks to be getting a second act. (Maybe. I wouldn't put it past EE to yank that brass ring away.)

Liliet

Well, they're standing on the side that grants that as part of basic package after all 😊

Mental Mouse

Basic goal, anyway. Presumably a lot of villains get thwarted before they get big.

erebus42

It's about work and quality though. What resources the villains get are never handed to them like the Heroes and even then the universe is skewed so the villains have a harder if not impossible time carving out meaningful victories.

Liliet

Villains do tend to suffer before they get to their position first, but Heroes need to earn their stripes too. Nothing is 'just handed' to anyone, Amadeus was being as facetious as it gets, either that or simply wrong. Either way, heroes and villains both go through crucibles to get what their Roles have to offer.

caoimhinh

I half-agree with you on this, but Amadeus wasn't wrong. The tools of Villains are the work of a lifetime, and more often than not are the fruit of the effort and sacrifice both by them and others, willing and unwilling.

Praes is built of centuries upon centuries of sorceries perfected by the madness and genius of countless warlocks working their entire lives pursuing their arts, so the one who climbs the Tower inherits a grand amalgamation of things they can use to forge their legend.

Compare to a Hero who is a teenager receiving a weapon straight up from Heaven, plus blessed with Good Luck by Providence, and you can see the difference very clearly.

You can't say they are the same, the hordes of the Tyrants took generations to form, while the Hero got handed a Holy Weapon out of nowhere.

That's why Amadeus complains that the Heroes are handed their victories, Angels will provide guidance and sometimes even descend to directly help the Heroes (William, Iason, Hanno, Tariq). A villain doesn't get that kind of help, they would need to risk their lives and souls to use a Demon and earn through a lifetime of service to Below for a dark miracle (like Wekesa or Hanno's mother).

They each go through the crucibles of their Roles, that's true. But the difference in support is very glaring. Villains save up for their equipment while Heroes would be rich kids with Pay-to-Win Premium equipment, sure the proficiency of the players will make a huge difference, but that doesn't mean there isn't a huge bias towards one team.

Liliet

Here's the thing: villains are 99% of the time the ones with privilege.

We can debate details and exceptions (Good Kings are a legit counterexample; Amadeus is fucking not lmao), but when we're comparing William von Angelsword, who had said angel's feather, the clothes on his back and absolutely nothing else, to Kairos who was literally a prince,

Mental Mouse

IIRC, Amadeus started out as a peasant along with Malicia, and Cat of course was an orphan. Of course, Amadeus and especially Cat do have a heroic "taint" to their goals and behavior.

We don't have too many heroic origin stories, but White Knight was also an orphan, while Thief was both a noble (of a conquered land) and half an orphan. William was self-outcast (but he did get armor and equipment from somewhere).

I'd stay that both humble and privileged beginnings can produce heroes or villains.

Liliet

Amadeus is a farmer's son rising in rebellion against the oppressive nobility of his country, uniting the oppressed underclass around him.

Catherine is actually a better example of villain privilege because Amadeus picked her up and catapulted her right to the top without giving her a moment to catch her breath. We do not kneel, eh?

But yeah, you're not wrong. There's all kinds of possible stories; Kairos, however, is a classic example of a "villain born to privilege" one. No need to toil to earn resources, his job is just to properly abuse them.

Liliet

Villains get a lot of victories of the villainous kind: a tower in the sand that falls right afterwards but boy was everyone impressed.

Amadeus's definition of 'meaningful' is 'improves lives of common people long-term' which is like. Not Evil's point lmao

erebus42

We could probably fill a pretty large thread on what the "point" of Good or "Evil" is or could be. However, Meaningful in this case is a lasting victory at the end of a story. Which is what Black, Catherine, and the others are striving for. Your "villainous victories" are not equivalent to the ones that the "heroes" get, and logically in a fair world characters from either side would have a relatively equal chance of getting one or the other. And yet in the Guideverse that is not the case as fate is skewed one way.

Liliet

Yes, and my point is fate is skewed that way because villains aren't interested in long term consequences, splash damage or anything that happens after they die. That's what MAKES them villains. It's unfair as fuck to be stuck with when you're actually a hero at heart is the problem 😊

caoimhinh

But if he hadn't discarded that toolbox then he would have been dead long ago. The only reason Amadeus, Alaya, and the Calamities survived so long (over 40 years as successful villains) was because they avoided falling into the traps of stories and Amadeus learned to read the patterns in order to transcend them.

Notice how everything went to hell when Malicia (in her stupid paranoia fearing Amadeus had too much influence) decided she wanted to try using one of the old tools (flying fortress + hell gates and hordes of bound devils) via letting Akua building it so she could have a weapon of her own without depending on the Legions of Terror. What's the result?

Praes is burning, they are facing a new Goblin Rebellion, they lost Callow (the victory they hadn't achieved since the time of Triumphant), the Legions of Terror divided, most of the Calamities are dead, they are the target of a Crusade with most of the Heroes of Calernia on it, the Dead King unleashed, Amadeus prisoner and Malicia at risk of being overthrown and killed.

There's a VERY good reason why Amadeus kicked away that toolbox, it was full of Acme Products and those may look impressive but can only blow up on the face of the user. History and Results prove that Amadeus was right.

Liliet

He was, absolutely so. For what he wanted, that toolbox was useless and horribly counterproductive. To say that Alaya fucked up is to say nothing.

That doesn't mean it's objectively useless and there's nothing it's good for.

Take Akua, take Kairos – offended children who don't count on their lifetimes being long and fully intend to burn the candle from both ends just to have as much fun as possible in the process...

caoimhinh

Yep, Kairos is a cheat character, too OP to be justified, he is basically a Hero but on the Evil side:

- Comes from a lineage of kings and conquerors.
- He came to his Name upon hearing a prophecy of his imminent death, which he has overcome already.
- He has knowledge about a lot of things, both secret and ancient that he should have no way of knowing.
- He employs a lot of sorceries for someone who doesn't have the Gift and has performed great workings for someone who doesn't have any prominent practitioner of magic under his service (He has the Magisterium of Stygia now, but he didn't have that by the time he was crafting extremely complex rituals with multiple layers, one of such layers drew a 3D middle finger, the other made a curse that killed Ashen Priestess)
- He made the Bard play correctly her lute. Not the tortured sounds she usually makes when she plays her lute, but actual melodious music with proper effect.
- He can manipulate Narrative in dubious ways (his "always one step" strategy worked, despite it being multiple attacks on a siege situation, simply because they were different plans they effectively were overwhelming the Heroes and taking the city of Delos)
- He knows secrets of the Bard, at least part of her origins and nature, which can't be explained simply on his Wish Aspect letting him know her desires.
- He knows about the origins of Keter and the Intercessor's role on it.

-He managed to handpick and create a Named (turning Anaxares into a Hierarch), when the coming into a Name should be something extremely personal and unpredictable, except perhaps in those of the successor type (like a Knight choosing their Squire).

-Crossed the forest that everyone fears with his army without it being ripped to pieces (although it might have suffered heavy casualties and we simply hadn't seen, but as it was shown that he can harass the Army of Callow and Procer's troops in Iserre while forcing the 60 thousand troops of Levant to run away through the hellscape that Masego made, he has a huge and strong army)

-Even Providence seems to be on his side.

So yeah, he is a cheat character.

He is so far undefeated and has made a lot of deeds that shouldn't be possible for him, his success doesn't come as much of a surprise nor a bother because he is a very interesting character; but the things he has done without any justifiable explanation, like the ample use of High Arcana and knowledge of ancient matters, are a bit of a bother and could even be a plot hole.

konstantinvoncarstein

I completely agree with you 😊

Liliet

This is a villain kind of 'ridiculously and weirdly OP'. Heroes don't get libraries of ancient knowledge and competent underlings for free as starting funds.

Morgenstern

Somehow your comment suddenly made me wonder if Kairos HAS already died after all... and what we're seeing is just another meat puppet of the Dead King XD

I mean, all those pieces would seem to fit that one perfectly...

Mental Mouse

Mayyybe. I think he still could just be a classic "with great madness comes great power" villain, where his essential weakness is to the plot.

erebus42

I think it mainly comes with him leaning into his role which gives him that extra potency. He's walking the path (at least seemingly) of the Big Bad who dominates his adversaries until the very end where his own arrogance/madness leads to his own undoing. That combined with the fact that he probably knows how entertaining he is in a meta sense and is using it to his advantage (like the bard did with the Bumbling Conjurer waaay back) and that he is the unofficial ruler of the major factions of the setting with vast spies and resources all contribute to the position he's in chawpi_tuta

So Jehan the Wise hung 7 princes and one because they bankrupt the procer. Ha remind me of soviet union

caoimhinh

Not that, Jehan the Wise was King of Callow and marched against Procer probably in retaliation for some action the Principate had done in the past. He managed to kill so many princes of Procer because Procer was weakened and lacking in military strength, here it is implied that one of the reasons for that is that they were worn down after the brutal war against Theodosius, though 20 years should be enough for the country to recover so there must have been other factors.

Unorginal

20 years is certainly not enough, this isn't a perfect comparison but France after World War 1 felt the demographic squeeze of losing over 5% of its population right up until World War 2. It's very well could be that the war was more or less destructive it's not very clear but ironically the fact that Calnerna is more egalitarian works against it. A village can survive losing half its young men, it finds itself in a much worse spot if it loses half its woman. Furthermore, we get outright told that 1/3 of the principate was on fire and was due to be lost to Theodosius.

Compounded by economic recovery in the late medieval ages to early renaissance conditions at best it means that it very well could have badly damaged the principate horrifically for generations.

100,000 dead in a single battle of attrition that's a large city, Paris was the largest city in Europe during the Renaissance and at its peak, it only had 350,000 people in it.

Then the fact that the Principate is a quarreling bunch of noble houses waging constant Italian style brushfire border war with each other.

superkeaton

Well shit, Cat needs these people Not Dead, and Kairos is about to smear them across the field of battle like so much tomato sauce. I wonder, if he's talking about our favorite Gutter Lawyer when he mentions his friend.

ninegardens

Pretty sure he meant his buddy up in Keter: "Keter's due"

Andrew Mitchell

"... our favorite Gutter Lawyer" do you mean Heirarch? Yes, he's a strong candidate, IMO the strongest. Other candidates are Larat, Masego or the Dead King.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Hierarch is the only one of them he calls "friend", and the most logical choice. By the way, I hope he will die quickly.

matrixm

He calls the dead king friend too

konstantinvoncarstein

Have you the chapter where it happens? 😊 I don't recall

Liliet

Kairos thinks Cat actually intends to go through with her bargain with Larat and let him have the power he's after.

This naive boy.

caoimhinh

Going through with her bargain with Larat, yes.
Letting him have the power he's after, probably no.

Though Cat might not want to establish a Fae Court with a hold or anchor in Creation, she still needs to pay her debt to Larat, what she does afterward would depend on what exactly happens when he receives the seven crowns from Procer's princes and one from Helike's Tyrant.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Princess of High Noon was terrified when she heard the term of the bargain. But because neither Winter nor Summer exist anymore, maybe it is a red herring and will have no consequences?

caoimhinh

Maybe, but it's unlikely that nothing will happen. Larat bet on it when he made the Wild Hunt entirely dependant on Catherine's Winter (which was recently devoured by Night) and Kairos just said that the seven crowns and one plus the unclaimed realm from a part of Arcadia are necessary for the making of a new Fae Court. Something will happen.

What we need to figure out now is how this could play out and in what ways Larat may be screwed. Perhaps he wanted to make his new Court in Creation, but will be forced to have this fragment of Arcadia as his Court holdings, and maybe when this hellscape gets destroyed his Court will lose its power?

Mental Mouse

One point to consider is that the realm may not count as "unclaimed", given how Masego has been manipulating it.

Liliet

She needs to not openly break her bargain with Larat. There's 0 gain to her in actually paying the debt :3

caoimhinh

The direct gain is being freed from the debt. We haven't seen it bothering Cat at all so far, but there's supposed to be a weight to that and she needs to pay her part of the bargain to Larat. Both because of Narrative and because of Fae Power shenanigans, something bad is bound to happen if she goes back on her word to Larat.

So she must pay and present the seven crowns and one, but there's nothing saying that she must actually let Larat live afterwards.

There's also a gain in having more powerful subordinates who can fight for her and gate her armies through Arcadia, but she might not care much about that now that she has Sve Noc.

My point is, Cat will pay off her debt, but then screw up Larat in one way or another.

Liliet

I'm expecting her to use Kairos as a way to wiggle out of consequences here 😊

Liliet

she is pulling an 'oh please dont throw me into the briar patch' on him

Liliet

oh and btw: being freed of the debt is actually against her interests here explicitly, because the Wild Hunt is a useful resource and is only sworn to her until the debt is paid.

caoimhinh

True, but that's not what I'm arguing here. Paying the debt is troublesome and likely to be a bad thing in general for giving that kind of power to Larat, we knew that since Book 3.

Nevertheless, Cat still has to pay Larat his due. Failing to do so would have consequences, that has been implied to be the case with vows and oaths, too. A contract with a Fae should have strong force behind it, especially since the two parties involved are such significant people as the Black Queen and the former Prince of Nightfall.

Liliet

Again, she can't break it explicitly, but weaseling her way around it on technicalities is how fae oaths WORK.

Insanenoodlyguy

A heroic charge when all seems bleak is the sort of thing that turns a battle around, as Kairos just talked about.

Say, where is Cat with her overpowered calvary squad again?

If the narrative wants to keep this as classicial as possible, we are going to find out she's in Aracadia just after a scene transition where Vive successfully pulls of her "You let us go, we help" dealings.

Liliet

This is absolutely what I'm expecting to happen, and fuck Kairos over in the best "Evil Cannot Comprehend Good" ploy ever written.

Andrew Mitchell

1. Good to see Vivienne is quick to understand what's going on and what she needs to do.

2. I was not expecting another Alliance force in Arcadia. I knew the Proceran horse hadn't been participating, but I hadn't made the connection.

3. Has Larat been working with the Tyrant to establish a new Court?

4. Is this all a surprise to Catherine, or did she anticipate the shape of things in Arcadia?

5. What role will her staffswordprayer play in the coming confrontation in Arcadia?

IMO we'll get a Catherine chapter next.

Liliet

Vivienne's POV was the best ♥

And I think Larat's thing is just blatantly obvious to someone as knowledgeable in arcane matters as Kairos is.

And I think Catherine's playing Kairos like a fiddle, still 😊

caoimhinh

True.

But your second paragraph is exactly what konstantinvoncarstein is complaining about a few comments above, Kairos doesn't have the Gift and he can't use High Arcana so he is, in fact, not knowledgeable in arcane matters. Besides that, there should be no way for Kairos to know about Catherine's deal with Larat and it's exact terms, and yet he knows.

It's the kind of cheat Kairos has, getting information with absolutely no explanation of how he got it and that by all means should be impossible for him to have. This can't even be justified by Wish, unless he can extend that Aspect and use it on anyone in Creation and beyond so he used it on Larat (who he hasn't met as far as we know) to know what the former Prince of Nightfall is after.

Liliet

There's much much more to arcane matters than High Arcana.

Intercessor is not High Arcana. Rituals are not High Arcana. Whispering Woods are not High Arcana.

I don't think Kairos knows about the exact terms of the deal there. I think what Kairos knows is general lore that the deal was made of – fae are predictable on a very basic level, that's how Cat beat them through horrifying disadvantage.

Kairos knows lore, he knows the underpinnings of everything. You don't need to know the exact programs and OS of your opponent's computer if you know how computers work and what OSs exist and what programs can and cannot do. He gets that from having the Helikean royal library / upbringing, and then the resources of the entire League. That is the kind of advantage villains get – resources and privilege.

Euodiachloris

Not to mention whoever/ whatever was/is locked in the basement.

Because I suspect pacts and bonds.

Liliet

Yep.

Kairos does NOT lack resources.

Liliet

The exact mechanism is honestly irrelevant here. Villains inexplicably having a leg up on heroes in intel is a narrative freebie. Villains observing heroes' every step but being unable to counter them vs heroes struggling to figure out where to actually go and what to do but winning every actual confrontation is bog standard.

(Incidentally, it's characteristic of Cat, and we all know what role she is actually playing in the metanarrative despite the allegiance...)

You know the trope where heroes go on an epic vision quest in pursuit of wisdom, to finally after much toil and virtuousness miraculously get the location of a mcguffin... just in time to get in a fight with the villains' mooks/ officers there!

caoimhinh

Hmm, not exactly. Villains don't inexplicably have a leg up on heroes intel, they have a network that they have spend years to make and a lot of experience that enables them to read and predict the Heroes' personality and movements.

This is because traditionally the Villain is a veteran, older than the heroes by at least a decade and has been working and scheming on whatever his objective is for many years, it's not unjustified in the narrative. It's part of the reason for Amadeus' hatred for the Heroes' Cheats, because one year of a Heroic teenager's efforts is enough to overthrow the sum work of a Villain's lifetime.

But Kairos doesn't have that, he has Wish as an Aspect which lets him read people, that's fine, but the sheer amount of information Kairos is in possession of is absurd.

Liliet

Kairos is a ruler by right of inheritance of a stable&ancient nation currently ideologically united around him.

caoimhinh

1) That Helike isn't that ancient, just a few hundred years.

2) That's still not enough for the info Kairos has on the Intercessor, Neshamah nor the deal Cat has with Larat.

3) Helike wasn't supposed to have the kind of sorceries Kairos has been constantly using since his fight against Hanno (Giant drills, flying towers, necromantic constructs, multiple enchanted items and an apparently endless supply of gargoyles). These are the signature of old Praes warfare and can only be done by the work of multiple skilled practitioners of magic and Named sorcerers. That Kairos has used all this so far could be justified if Kairos had a Named sorcerer with him, but he doesn't.

Andrew Mitchell

Your comment made me wonder if it was the thing under the crypt in Helike that gave Kairos these advantages but my searching has revealed nothing in the Guide that supports the crypt being a factor. There's just two mentions I've been able to find:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/04/05/usurpation/>

"That was what he'd learned today, going down to the crypt even though he had been forbidden to by the king. The... thing in the tomb had spoken its prophecy in a croaky whisper, that he would not make it to his thirteenth nameday."

Kairos eyed his hand, which was shaking like a leaf. Not, though, out of fear. How strange. When he'd woken this morning, he had been already flinching at the thought of his father's displeasure. Now, looking at the fury painted over the king's face, he could think of only one thing: what are you going to do, Father? Kill me before I die?

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/02/08/prologue-3/>

"Treachery is pleasing to the Gods Below," he said. "There's a crypt in Helike, under the palace, where the first foundations of the city were laid. There's a creature there, lying under a tomb of stone sculpted to look like someone holding a sword. There is a crack in the side just large enough that you can hear the thing inside whisper, if you press your ear to it."

"I don't know what it is. My father said it's the first king of Helike, still straddling the line between life and death," the Tyrant said. "The king, though, once said it is the god who once owned the ground the city was built on – tricked into the tomb and forever bound to give us advice."

"Advice?" the diplomat repeated.

"Prophecies," the boy said. "All of royal blood can ask one question if it, in our lifetime."

"And it told you you would rule?" Anaxares guessed.

The Tyrant laughed. "It told me," he said, "that I would die when I turned thirteen. That there was nothing I could do to change this." The boy smiled. "It was," he said, "a great gift."

Liliet

I have said this already: fae lore is not that complicated. When you see the materials you can guess what will be built of them even if you don't have the blueprint.

And where's the source on "Helike is not supposed to have that"? I distinctly recall commentary that because Helike is not Praes their rituals were inefficient and took more blood sacrifice than they would have needed...

I mean, seriously, please find the quote you're referring to? I don't think erratic leaves plot holes, I want to see that one.

caoimhinh

That's the thing, Liliet, there isn't anything even mentioning in passing anything about Helike's being capable of the things Kairos has made them do. My argument is not quotes of it, it's the LACK of quotes of it.

By the way, the comment about their inefficiency was made by Hedge Wizard when the Tyrant killed 666 people on each of the 6 towers that he made float (she tried to distract herself from the slaughter by commenting that Praesi would have used only half as many sacrifices).

Every mention of Helike talks about their military might due to their fine soldiers and that they are almost unstoppable when a Tyrant is leading them. There's nothing about them being proficient at magic (they had an influential House of Light, priests that attended the court of Kairos' father, however) and yet Kairos has people using blood magic, grand rituals and High Arcana without any explanation for it.

He (or rather his mages) disrupted Wekesa's scrying network, laid spell patters with advanced understanding of spellcrafting mechanics, constantly used rituals to move gigantic machines, and also constantly present Kairos with new enchanted equipment (a flying throne, gargoyles, fire rubies that throw lasers, souls bound to skulls and lamps, an enchanted crown, etc)

There's A LOT of deeds done by Kairos that would require extremely talented mages and numerous at that. Most notably the fact that they could disrupt the workings of an experienced and talented Warlock like Wekesa, yet there's nothing that explain all that. Amadeus is surprised about it in Interlude Cadenza, and if Helike had mages capable of matching Wekesa they would be famous for it.

There's no mention of Helike ever having the level of mages needed for the things Kairos has pulled, that's the point I'm addressing. This would all make sense if Tyrant had a sorcerous Named under his command, (which I expected to appear in the previous books but never appeared), but he doesn't have one and making such character appear now out of nowhere saying "all these things were done by this previously unIntroduced Named" would be cheap so it's unlikely to happen. The magisterium of Stygia are all mages so that can explain some of the things Kairos does now, but not the ones he did before having the League obeying him. The current implication due to not providing any proper explanation is simply that Kairos gathered all the mages of Helike and maybe from other countries and had them work like crazy to pull off all these deeds, yet that wouldn't be enough to match a Warlock like Wekesa.

It's "an unexplained advantage of a villain" as you called it, a Cheat Character like konstantinvoncarstein called Kairos.

Liliet

Wait, are we actually disagreeing on anything here?

My point is that the way Guide's basic worldbuilding is set up, there are things that don't need to be set up explicitly every time, like heroic backstories... or origin of villainous advantages. As long as it's something that is predicted by Saturday morning cartoon tropes, it can be reasonably expected to happen unless contradicted by strong evidence to the contrary; and in presence of such evidence, it should be expected to happen anyway, with twice as much bang due to greater dramatic effect.

My point is that it is not only heroes that benefit from this unspoken trope guarantee, but villains as well; and that Kairos Theodosian is in no way outside of this framework.

All that said, I remember a quote about Theodosius the Unconquered consulting his "soothsayers" before battles to find out if he's going to win or lose; before Maddened Fields they ended up saying "yes". So there is at least one known kind of mage / prophetic tradition in Helike, and no reason to assume Kairos doesn't have access to it.

caoimhinh

Our disagreement is that you consider "He's a villain" as enough justification and explanation for Kairos pulling off the things he has done, while I don't.

I'm looking for a way to justify this situation so that it wouldn't be a plot hole but you just shrug it off as "He's a villain, he can do it".

Most, if not all, of the things done by other characters has been explained or given proper background to build upon and justify their capability to do these things they do, the exception is Kairos. It can't be brushed off as him simply being the young Hero of Villains, capable of inexplicably doing things. The main problem is that this isn't just Kairos doing inexplicable things, it's his followers doing them, because unless they are Named they shouldn't be capable of that.

Soothsayers are diviners by the way, and not very effective given the answer they gave Theodosius lol.

Anyways, Helike can have mages, diviners and warlocks (we know they have strong priests capable of strong miracles, even priest-warriors like the Spear Saints), that's not a problem, although the utter lack of mention of them if Helike actually had such is glaring; the problem is the things those mages are doing, like being capable of disrupting the works of a Named Warlock, Wekesa. That's simply not possible unless there's massive talent or power, like a Named with them, and if their country had that kind of things they would be famous for it, Kairos is matching the workings of the old Praesi Dread Emperors without having the culture and talented mages that enable them. A possible explanation could be that the Name of Tyrant gave Kairos capabilities in magic, so he is practitioner, but that would still be lacking.

Liliet

Quantity beats quality, sometimes. I think Tyrant was only able to disrupt Warlock's communications once Masego already broke into them, also? What was the other time when he bested him?

caoimhinh

I think it also happened when during the battle where Sabah was killed but I'm not sure. Still, the only other times that Wekesa's workings were disrupted were by the hand of powerful priests or other sorcerous Named. Random people, even if numerous, can't hope to match his level of skill and power.

Mental Mouse

Heroes can inherit or otherwise benefit from intelligence networks too. If nothing else, consider Thief's earlier roles; but I'm quite sure at least some temples or priests will have spy networks, not to mention national leaders. And most of the time, Heroes will have at least some access to those. (Though I suspect Cordelia may lately be an exception. 😊)

That said, magical scrying was basically a Praesi monopoly until quite recently, and it took a war or two to jump-start the Good side's magical explorations. However, we've seen heroes as well as villains with aspects that draw information out of individual opponents, or provide visions from distant places.

Insanenoodlyguy

When Cat mentioned the "Seven Crowns and One" thing to Summer Princess, she reacted in horror and was all "You can NOT let him get that." I'm guessing that whatever scheme this facilitates, it's very old and very well known. The Fae act out stories, so Larat has tried to be the character in a story he finds favorable, but it sounds like both Cat and Kairos have figured out what that story really is. He doesn't need superpowered insight, he just needs to have read the right book.

caoimhinh

Sulia was a Princess of Summer, of course she knew what that meant. That doesn't tell us anything about how well known that thing is. And the things of Fae aren't actually that well known, every single instance of any magic practitioner looking at a Fae so far had them going "oh, interesting, I didn't know that. I wonder what would happen if X, I want to make tests" Masego stated there were centuries of research on Fae and even then what they knew was minimal, and that's from professional, well-trained, dedicated, and likely genius mages working on the subjects for generations. The rest of Calernia knows nearly nothing about the Fae, Killian is the granddaughter of one and doesn't know much, even the thing about stories was only recently known and to find that they had to go to the Capital of Winter. Kairos shouldn't know about this process for creating a new Fae Court nor the content of Cat's bargain to Larat.

~So no, this isn't something Kairos could know by reading a story book~

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, it's a puzzle. I hope we get an explanation of the source of Kairos' knowledge and power.

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't put it past Larat to have visited Kairos on the sly.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, I suspect that too.

Re: 2.

We were told about the Proceran and Dominion cavalry being in Arcadia with Rogue Sorcerer at the end of Interlude: Graves We Have Yet To Fill. Yannu had planned to send them (with Saint) to attack inside the palisade while the infantry was attacking the outside, but he calls off the whole plan when Grey Pilgrim confirms that it won't get Cat to take the field.

Re: next chapter...

I'd put my money on one more interlude – Vivienne's negotiation with Pilgrim is important enough that we should see it on screen, and there's at least one more shoe to drop, not even counting Masego. I'm expecting to see one more Tariq PoV, where he sees the results of all three of Cat's letters and makes one last attempt to shift the Narrative in his favor, before realizing how badly he's been outmaneuvered. I don't think we'll see Cat's PoV again until she needs to ride in and play her last card – which would be bad, with Pilgrim and Saint still both in play – or until the peace talks, if she manages to get there without taking the field herself.

Liliet

I want Grem's POV...

Serena Halut

So, don't know if anyone's noticed but the Interlude titles are connected.

West, Ever Pursuing
Graves We Have Yet To Fill
Trust is the Wager
Death They Cannot Steal
And Pay Your Toll
When Iron Rests

It forms an actual poem called a ballad rhyme, notice the scheme abcb defe. It's unfinished with the second stanza only half-done. So it seems we have just 2 interludes left until we see Cat again.

Mental Mouse

I think you're seeing an artifact of the titles coming from song lyrics. I note that in my own dialect, "fill" does not rhyme with "steal", also the meter of the composite poem is a mess.

Nairne .01

"He was, the orc guilty admitted to himself, beginning to enjoy this a little too much."

I laughed through most of this chapter.

Thank you very much EE.

Morgenstern

Hmm... Now, does the Tyrant just want to take the crowns for himself, thinking he'll ruin Cat's day by preventing the fae getting them? Or does he mean to be the one to hand them out to the fae, because he sees through the deception, that Cat actually does NOT want the fae to ever get those...

Insanenoodlyguy

Hmmm, that would work as a classical villain usurpation. "I know you had a deal to get these crowns, but I got the crowns. Now you deal/work with me if you want your due!" And could even turn around into Cat dodging the "Now that I'm a god, I kill you, former master!" sort of bad end for the helpers in those stories if she hands it over to Kairos.

Mental Mouse

Where are these last couple of titles coming from?

Insanenoodlyguy

They are all lyrics to songs sung by the Legion/Callow armies.

Mental Mouse

What songs? When I looked they weren't in the Wiki. (They certainly sound right, though.)

caoimhinh

They are, the only one I couldn't find was the origin of "And Pay Your Toll"

West, Ever Pursuing is from the "Tyranny of the Sun"

Graves We Have Yet To Fill is from "In Dread Crowned"

Trust Is The Wager is from "The Girl Who Climbed The Tower"

Death They Cannot Steal comes from "Here They Come Again"

When Iron Rests is from "Dead the Hand", the song about Hakram.

matrixm

Girl who climbed the tower isn't a Callowan song btw. It's a secret song that only seems to appear to people involved with the tower, like a prophecy of sorts

caoimhinh

The others aren't either, only "Here they come again" is a Callowan song.

"Tyranny of the Sun" is an old Praesi song, while "In Dread Crowned" and "Dead the Hand" are songs written by the members of the Fifteenth Legion back when they were still part of the Legion of Terror serving Praes.

Mental Mouse

OK, that's one of the two missing titles. If nobody can find the last one, it might show up as a future song. It certainly has the right feel.

Insanenoodlyguy

There's a "Pay your price" lyric, but that's not quite right, unless EE made an error.

caoimhinh

The closest I found was in "The Lord of the Silver Spears" that has a lyric near the end saying "and you will pay!"

Rustndusty

This one was from chapter 25 of book three, sung as Hakram slaughters a minor fae noble. The last one doesn't seem to be from a song we've seen yet.

caoimhinh

cookiehunter

considering that cat cant play shatranj worth a damn it wis quite ironic

Kissaten

In the end she explodes the board. With Night power. In Kairos face.

Aotrs Commander

Silly Legions. You should know by now Cat's always up to something.

Bahahahahahaha!

Oh Kairos. Never change.

(Now was that "is this was love feels like" directed towards Cat or do we have a second ship on the table, Hakram...?)

...

For that matter, what was being implied by Hakram recalling the way Juniper looked at him with distrust in the early days? I know Hakram's stated as being a bit of a lady's orc (and Juniper always seems about half-a-step from disproving the thing about orcs and humans), so it would seem odd to be implyng Hakram and Juniper have a thing, so...?

Insanenoodlyguy

I think it's also the thing he said way back when he became Adjutant. He's not a great "Orc" in the classical sense. Juniper has the blood lust, she just has it on a higher, more intellectual level, moving armies against each other rather than a personal desire to put her sword in somebody's guts. But by his own admission Hakram never really had it period. He's "Off" and that's probably more obvious to other Orc's than Humans. Early Fifteenth was before his named moment where he said "And so, at last, I am an orc." His sleeping around, was a symptom but not the whole of his overall "I don't really feel much of anything. I'm not much of anything" so it's not hard to see that a man with that self perception would see the doubting eyes of a superior and say "Hmm, she might have a point."

Liliet

Juniper has talked to Cat about this in Book 3 Chapter Host, the one where In Dread Crowned was revealed. Basically orcs have some violent ableism baked into their culture against a negative stereotype of the kind of neurodivergent Hakram is, and Juniper "suspected he was a coldblood". The point being that he is, but it doesn't stop him from being the wonderful guy that he is, so nobody cares.

Juniper has... quite a bit of cultural bigotry in her actually, between this and her attitude towards Vivi. She's an interesting character indeed.

caoimhinh

Yeah, Juniper has that bit of bigotry that most people obsessed with rules has, like the disdain she showed when Nauk was mourning Nilin's death. But in the case of Juniper's attitude towards Vivienne, that is Vivi's fault since she actively and purposefully did things to make others get a bad impression of her, at least when she was still the Thief. Besides, neither Juniper nor Vivienne have likable personalities so to get them to get along they would need to directly save each other lives (in a violent fashion, brutalizing the opponent or killing many at once in Vivienne case, to earn Orc respect from Juniper).

Liliet

...I find them both likable, but then I have very low standards lmao

I love everything else you say here ♥

caoimhinh

Oh, they are likable characters, don't get me wrong. I meant it as they as people living in their world, they aren't likeable people, as evidenced by their lack of friends outside a very, very small circle. Although they are fiercely loyal and dedicated to those they accept, their friends would first have to pass through the barriers Juniper and Vivienne rose:
-Juniper's obsession with rules, judgmental attitude, temperament, constant demand for discipline, not to mention Orc standards of proficiency at violence.

-Vivienne's distrust to others, layers of lies, paranoia, constant tests to figure out the loyalties, intentions and true natures of others, her kleptomaniac nature, not to mention her constant self-doubt that almost made her abandon the Woe if Hakram hadn't cut off his own hand to show her just how invaluable she actually is.

It's kinda like Robber is an amazing and interesting character to read, but is as far as we have seen a crappy friend with a deadly sense of humor. Hahaha.

Liliet

Well I certainly like both of them as people more than I like Robber lmao

Vivienne is loyal and fiercely dedicated to the cause of good, smart and quick-witted and observant; she was a good friend to William the minute he pulled his head out of his ass for a moment.

Juniper is a great mom friend, the kind of person you want in your corner and taking care of you and yours, always ready to call you out on your bullshit without any hard feelings lingering behind.

IDK I just like specifically the way they are

erebus42

Wait, so is this confirming that Hakram is a high functioning psychopath (or the Orc equivalent at least, like Juniper suspected)? Also, can you imagine how terrifying a low functioning psychopathic orc would be?

Mental Mouse

If anything, he's the opposite of a psychopath-equivalent. When we humans hear "coldblood", we think of a sociopath's "cold-blooded" machinations etc, lacking the warmth of human empathy, affection, compassion, etc.

To an orc, the word would have very different implications, because for an orc, their normal response to various situations is bloodlust. Lacking that bloodlust response would be abnormal – perhaps even considered "acting more human than orc".

Mental Mouse

Here, Hakram's halting words and the start of Catherine's meditation on him:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/01/15/chapter-59-anacrusis/>

> I called you Warlord then, and I don't regret it. I don't keep to the old ways, not like Nauk, but it is no empty word. I haven't used it since because it-" / He scowled, unsure of himself for once. / "It's not the right title, not for the two of us," he finally said. "Too shallow in the wrong places. We are more than war."

> It was times like these I understood how peculiar Hakram truly was, compared to others of his kind. It wasn't his temperament, or his way with people. There was an underlying threat to the way orcs like Nauk and Juniper and every other orc I'd met saw the world, and in Adjutant it was absent. I thought much of the Hellhound, but never would I imagine her saying we are more than war. It would go against her nature.

This turned up while searching for the last couple of chapter titles, which I did not find. And apropos of nothing, I just realized that Nauk and the men who died with him didn't get any secrets for the Underworld. 😞 who says they didn't? Cat showed up for the final bit after the bodies were gathered. The soldiers had a whole afternoon to give out secrets.

Insanenoodlyguy

Liliet

That's how I'm reading this yeah :3

Alivaril

So, I don't see any reason why "laying the crowns at [Larat's] feet" couldn't refer to a tribute at his grave or something done after the crowns have been "used."

Insanenoodlyguy

I do. because remember, this is a Fae story with a fae character, not a regular mortal. Death is very different for these guys. Odds are reasonable that if it was done the way you say, our winter crowboy pops out of his grave, fully restored and stronger than ever, laughing and screaming something classical like "At lasssstttttttt!"

Mental Mouse

If you try to dodge the traditional script that such a phrase refers to, you may find that your results are likewise literally correct, but lacking their expected meaning.

Ancusohm

Um, I've somehow managed to miss all the neurodivergent themes. Well, I know Masego is heavily implied to be on the autism spectrum, and there's that ogre general who has low empathy. Is that what people mean?

Could someone please explain for a reader who is awful at picking up on subtext?

Mental Mouse

Well, Hune's low empathy may be an ogre feature, or just the hostility of an oppressed band of refugees.

Aside from that, Amadeus is believed to be demisexual with other divergences possible, and Hakram is nonstandard for an orc. Akua and Indrani may or may not be technically neurodivergent, but their respective psychologies are distinctly odd by our IRL standards.

Daniel E

Any thoughts as to what battle will officially be dubbed "Prince's Graveyard" from Juniper's memoirs? At a glance, I'd wager Kairos vs. all the Principate Knights in Arcadia, but that seems too easy.

Andrew Mitchell

It seems to me that it's all coming to a head and that the Princes Graveyard will be resolved soon. Certainly in this fragment of Arcadia but perhaps it will happen as, or soon after, the fragment has entered Creation.

I agree that it's not going to be as simple as "Karios vs. the Principate". There's Cat, Masego, Hakram, Larat and the rest of the Wild Hunt involved as well, plus the potential for the Dead King to get involved as well (as others have already discussed).

Mental Mouse

At this point, I'm guessing that the resolution will come when we get back to Cat.

Alegio

I'm mad cause we didn't get to see if the tyrant is actually riding the goat 😏

Max Scherer

I think(and really really hope) that Cat excepted that both partys will be their and i know i will be salty that she will again loose somehow and not really get her way(yes her plan will probabaly somehow work, but only with workarounds and whatnot), but this time I get a warning that her plan will get fucked up.... But hey the tyrant still thinks that they are playing a game and Cat never plays the game 😊

Interlude: So We Shot Him

"One hundred and twenty one: it can be wise to make a truce with a villain to deal with greater threat. Never forget, however, that fear does not make someone trustworthy. Merely afraid."
– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

Captain Elvera could not have drawn her sword even if there was a need, for oaths still bound her and so uncertainty was staying her hand. It had been a very fine line she'd walked these last few weeks, one finer than she was truly comfortable with. Elvera had sworn not to make war on the Black Queen nor her allies for the span of three months, and that span had not yet ended, though Lady Aquiline had made use of her regardless. The letter of the oath had been observed: the prisoners released under oath had never left the reserve or bared blade. Elvera herself did not formally hold command, for that might be impugning her word, though her 'advice' was obeyed so faithfully this was mere pretence. The old woman would not pretend the spirit of the oath had not been broken, regardless, or that service of her lady excused the act. Even if the Black Queen had likely expected no better of them, it did not lessen the shame of being so feckless. Yet when duty and honour pulled different ways, which one was to be heeded? Elvera had no answer, and her lady was understanding, so here she was straddling a charade instead of declaring for either.

"Those are the Spears of Stygia, we have confirmed it," Captain Onaedo grimaced. "Ashen Gods, just when the night was turning around."

Onaedo, second only to her in years of service to Tartessos, held command of the host in the absence of Lady Aquiline – who was, at the moment, still having her wounds seen to. Along with Razin Tanja, who she'd insisted would be healed at her side. That'd raised more than a few eyebrows, and likely would again in days to come. If they survived that long, Elvera thought. Which given the way reputable armies had taken to appearing out of thin air at their rear was seeming less certain by the moment.

"And they are facing the Procerans," Elvera slowly said.

The League of Free Cities had struck... oddly. Perhaps in part to obscure its numbers, which were still very much in doubt, but their array was unusual. The Spears of Stygia, perhaps the finest infantry that region had to offer, had appeared and formed up for advance at the back of Lady Aquiline's command. Not facing the Alavan heavy infantry of Lord Malave to the north, which might be understandable if a swift rout was what was meant to be achieved. Yet it was a hardened army of twenty thousand Procerans, an army who'd already fought that same slave-phalanx in the past, that they'd formed up in front of. There'd been much easier meat to prey on, if the Stygians had wished: the famously lightly-armoured warriors of Vaccei, or perhaps the hodgepodge mixture of fantassins and levies that was the northern Proceran contingent. Elvera had seen to it that even while moving to encircle the Black Queen's camp her lady's army had not overextended, so theirs was not a weak position to assault. Why, of all places, had the Spears of Stygia been put in front of the largest knot of veteran Proceran soldiery on the field? A rider approached, breaking up her musings, and conferred quietly with Captain Onaedo. She glanced at him, brow raised.

"The Black Queen's surrender seems to be holding," he told her.

The Grand Alliance would have folded like parchment if it hadn't, Elvera grimly admitted to herself. Even now, in the distance, she could see the buckling lines of her lady's host when it was fighting on a single front – two would have ended them in an hour. The Stygian phalanx was pushing through the Procerans inch by inch, unflinchingly, and with few losses. On the left flank the Bellerophans were being hacked into by eager Tartessos captains, though the enemy's formations were so dense it was like wrestling with a boulder. Elvera would have spared a moment to be impressed by the way conscripts with only spears and old armour were holding up so well in front of proper warriors if the Bellerophan stubbornness wasn't in the course of losing her this battle. Delosi forces held the other flank, facing Malagan warbands, and though the scribes themselves were nothing to worry of the mercenaries they'd hired had stiffer spines and sharper blades. The Malagan captains were only barely holding on, and if they broke it would turn into a massacre. The Procerans at the centre would be encircled and choked by the Stygian phalanx while Elvera's left flank remained stuck and unable to help. Until the centre collapsed as well, anyway, and it was swept through as well.

"We won't be winning this battle," Captain Elvera bluntly said. "All we can do is hold and hope for Lord Marave to beat back the rest of the League."

"What would you advise, then?" Captain Onaeodo asked.

"I'd throw everything we have in reserve at our right flank," she said. "And pray it'll hold long enough."

It wasn't an order, oath forbade it, but it was treated like one.

"I expect," Yannu Marave calmly said, "that you come bearing a threat."

Had they been dealing with a lesser villain, Tariq thought, then the Lord of Alava would have been correct. If there'd ever been a time for the armies of the East to turn on the Grand Alliance, it was now. Debacle was unfolding down south, while a mere mile outside this tent a hard battle was being fought. Helike's army had swept out of Arcadia like a tide, hammering at the right flank unexpectedly, and even as Lord Yannu redeployed to meet the threat two more blows had come in quick succession: the soldiers of Penthes smashing into the left flank while those of Nicae poured out in the centre. The first half hour had been one sided butchery, for the Alliance's army had been taken utterly by surprise, but now that it'd had time to form up a brutal stalemate of shield walls had formed. Yet all it would take was for the Army of Callow to resume firing its siege engines at the army, and the battle would be over. Odds were that Catherin Foundling would never again get advantage so heavy and undeniable over the hosts of the Grand Alliance, and if she were a fool then she would have instructed her followers to take advantage of it. The Grey Pilgrim saw no such thing within Vivienne Dartwick, and that brought forth just as much fear as it did relief.

"Queen Catherine offered the surrender in good faith," the young woman replied just as calmly. "It stands, regardless of circumstance. I have come to discuss terms of ransoming."

Tariq almost laughed at the audacity of that. Lady Dartwick had ridden into her enemy's camp with nothing but a cursory escort, unarmed, and sat herself at the table across one of the most powerful men in the west without batting an eye. Like she did not doubt for a moment that she belonged there, though the Pilgrim's eye told him she was not without doubts. They were not, however, woven into every part of her as they had been the previous year. Instead now there was a pulsing sentiment that split the difference of ambition and yearning, and it had nestled deep at the heart Vivienne Dartwick. The dark-haired woman, Tariq thought, had quite clearly lost her Bestowal. She was the Thief no longer, both his eyes and the whispers of the Ophanim had so ascertained. And yet, in the bargain of that loss, she had gained something altogether more dangerous: belief.

Am I, the Pilgrim thought, looking at your successor, Catherine Foundling?

"Ransoming," Lord Marave said, tone flat. "You wish to have some of your forces released?"

"I have come to bargain," Lady Vivienne pleasantly smiled, "for the ransoming of every force that surrendered to the Peregrine."

Whispers, sharp and urgent. Not because of the woman's words, for those were no surprise, but for something unfolding. There was, the Ophanim conveyed, to be another great breach between Creation and Arcadia. Soon, and it would be calamitous in some way. The Peregrine closed his eyes, feeling out the miracle he had woven over the sky. It was on the edge of passing, though it would be a natural death: Creation's true dawn was about to begin, and it would chase away his own conceited mimicry.

"That is not an offer mine to accept," Yannu Marave said. "But the terms must be interesting, for what you offer to be worth so many soldiers."

"The aid of said soldiers," Vivienne Dartwick replied. "Against the League of Free Cities."

Left to it, Tariq thought, they would keep fencing for some time. Careful and wary both, even as death bloomed out on the fields. Not without reason, but the situation was on the edge of taking a grim turn. The Tyrant of Helike might have been called here by the Black Queen's ploy, but he suspected even she did not truly understand what she'd unleashed. She'd let the fox into the henhouse, as reckless as ever.

"Lord Yannu," the Pilgrim quietly asked. "Can this battle be won without their assistance?"

The other man's lips thinned.

"If our last hand is played," he said.

"It is, I think, about to be snapped over the Tyrant's knee," Tariq said.

"Then it is not impossible, yet the path is narrow," the Lord of Alava said.

"Then we have an accord, Vivienne Dartwick," the Pilgrim said.

There was a flicker of surprise on her face, though she mastered it swiftly.

"There is a mage among my escort," she said. "If I might be allowed to send a signal?"

"Do so," Tariq said. "And hurry, for-"

Creation shivered, to a sound like glass breaking had the glass been screamed by a hundred thousand voices. The Grey Pilgrim was on his feet in a heartbeat, leaving his words unfinished even as he raced out of the tent. The Ophanim's voices rose in a chorus of anger at the thoughtlessness of what had been done, and he could only agree. A breach fractured the plain between the armies fighting, shaped like a thick pane of glass shattered by blow – spinning out in cracks. Through it fell thousands and thousands of horsemen, the very same he had sent into Arcadia. Lady Dartwick came to stand at his side, face gone pale.

"Send your signal," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Before it is too late."

Cursing his weary bones, the Peregrine straightened his back. First he would need to enlist Laurence, but after that? There was a villain among the rain of soldiers that was being carried down by a swarm of gargoyles. The Rogue Sorcerer should be able to hold him until the two old hands arrived.

Kairos Theodosian had been allowed to run rampant for too long, and an end brought to his scheming was long overdue.

It wasn't even much of a drop, Hakram thought, but then it hadn't needed to be.

Ten, twelve feet the orc estimated. He'd seen horses jump half that without hurting themselves, though admittedly not horses in armour and bearing armoured riders. Still, he suspected it'd been the angle of it more than anything else: like the floor dropping off under an entire army. Their return to Creation had been accompanied by a horrifying song. Horses by the thousands screaming for their broken limbs, falling to the side and rolling over soldiers crushed by their weight. Horns and trumpets as the Procerans and Levantines who'd remained unharmed tried and failed to assert order, and all the while Kairos Theodosian laughed convulsively. Rend, the red-eyed boy had ordered Arcadia, and beneath the hooves of the west's cavalry the earth had been rent asunder. At least the Tyrant seemed half-dead for it, Adjutant thought. The orc had seen higher sorceries of this calibre before, but only once before an aspect destructive on such a scale: the Carrion Lord's own, when he had wrecked the doomsday fortress made from Liesse. Lord Black had been near killed by the overreach, however, where Kairos Theodosian remained conscious. Feverish, yes, exhausted and drenched in sweat. Yet still very much awake.

"It appears," Adjutant said, "that you've repelled the enemy."

The Tyrant did not reply, slumped and breathing laboriously. The villain was seated on his throne still, a gaudy thing bejewelled and set on a platform almost as luxurious. The platform itself had been carried down by a swarm of gargoyles, along with the wooden frame holding up Hakram himself. And more, too: Lord Kairos' personal guard had been held up by pairs of the constructs, slowing their fall by enough the descent did not wound them. It'd allowed Adjutant a read on the amount of gargoyles that existed in whole, which to his eyes was somewhere between three and five thousand – mostly likely on the lower end of that span. It was still a colossal investment of resources to have made so many of the creatures, especially for a city-state, and should they ever be broken Hakram suspected it would be a crippling blow for the villain. Something to pass along, when he returned to Catherine. Lord Kairos did not reply to his comment, instead sending out further swarms of gargoyles with an anemic twitch of the arm. Adjutant's eyes narrowed. The thousand-strong retinue of Helikean soldiers was making a slaughter of the horsemen in disarray, methodically scything through the wounded and the frightened, but it was not them the constructs had gone after.

"Better than repelled," Kairos Theodosian rasped out. "Captured."

Fascinated, Hakram peered at the swarms that were causing such a racket further down the shattered enemy column. There were seven of them, spiriting away seven prisoners. Seven crowned princes and princesses of Procer, he thought, snatched by the gargoyles in the midst of the howling chaos that'd been crashing down onto Creation.

"And now-" Lord Kairos began, but a wet cough tore out of his throat.

The boy's lips, Hakram saw, were flecked with blood.

"And now," the Tyrant croaked, "dawn."

The orc looked up, in time to see the shining star that held back the night wane, and the truth of Creation replace it. The drow were struck down anew, before they could even properly stir.

Akua Sahelian watched dawn rise, a crow on one side and a well on the other.

They had watched it all unfold from the highest point in the camp of the Army of Callow, the graceful dance that'd spanned a night and brought them to this very moment. The shade who'd once been the heiress to Wolof had been taught the arts of treachery since the cradle, and taken to them like few others, so perhaps she was the only person in all of Iserre who could suitably appreciate what Catherine had done. The seamless sequence, born of an understanding of her foes that had been like an astronomer's prediction of spheres in their orbit. Akua had glimpsed but a fraction of the preparations that arranging the stretch of a single night – no, not even that, barely even a bell in duration – had taken and so what she saw was not the luck of meddler but instead a net whose weaving had begun weeks ago, if not months.

"O Goddess of Night," the shade said. "You walk along her thoughts, do you not? How much of it did she truly anticipate?"

"Enough," the Eldest Night said.

Though the urge to press the matter burned on her tongue, she did not purse. Akua was not Catherine, to chastise and wheedle entities far beyond her ken with that fearlessness that was sister to folly. Even without moving a finger the shade could feel the towering weight of the goddess who had been born to the name of Andronike, the millennia of blood and screams she had woven into apotheosis. It felt like even just an irritated glance from the half of Sve Noc would be enough to make dust in the wind of Akua, for one's presence was mountain and the other feathers.

"And now I am called on to do my part, leal servant that I am," the shade murmured.

In the sky a streak of coloured light stretched, the signal from Lady Dartwick that surrender had been turned into effective – if still temporary – alliance.

"No servant of mine," the goddess said. "You wield, but do not make covenant."

"Alas, O Goddess, my heart has already been taken," Akua smiled.

"This is humorous, for you imply romantic feeling when in truth referencing grievous bodily harm," Andronike said, tone smug. "I have mastered your ways, shade."

"I am helpless before your guile, Sve Noc," she replied, tone the slightest hint of dry.

The crow cawed in high-handed agreement.

"There will be need of a word, to bring it forth," the goddess said. "Have you chosen?"

"I have," Akua said, lips quirked. "I believe she would approve."

"Then we begin," Andronike said.

Her work was not as crude and unpolished as to require physical contact to be wielded: proximity and binding were sufficient. She who had once been the Diabolist allowed herself to sink into the sea of Night, the receptacle she had filled with the might of the Mighty night after night. Akua had known men and women, in Praes, who would have sold half the world to have such power at their fingertips. And it'd been entrusted to her almost as an afterthought, like it was a chore instead of the kind of privilege children would murder their progenitors for without hesitation. No oath stayed her hand, now, and no chain held her so closely that with this in her grasp she could not sever it. She could turn on the woman who'd slain and bound her. She could even bring this entire beautiful house of cards tumbling down on her head simply by doing nothing. Instead, Akua Sahelian opened black-rimmed eyes and bared a smile like a blade of ivory.

"Fall," she said.

A torrent of darkness shot up in the sky, and from dawn wove an eclipse.

Princess Rozala Malanza woke disoriented, her leg throbbing with pain. She groaned and almost panicked when she realized she could not move her arms or legs — she was bound by rope — but mastered herself before she could scream. She would not give the Enemy the pleasure of her fear before it took her life and sent her back to... No, this was not Cleves. It was Iserre, it was dark, and for reasons unknown she was hanging upside down from a rope.

"Ah," a familiar voice gravelled. "I thought the prince from Cantal would be first to wake, on account of the thicker skull."

"Deadhand?" Rozala croaked, her mouth cottony and vision swimming. "You've captured me?"

She forced herself to concentrate, and after squinting for a moment saw through the gloom.

"Not exactly," the Adjutant ruefully replied, just as she realized the orc was hanging upside down a mere foot to the left.

Gods, her throat was parched. Wiggling in her bindings, Rozala saw she was in hallowed company indeed: to her right was Prince Arnaud, and from there a procession of royalty continued. Every prince and princess of Procer in her host was strung up there in a neat row from a raised beam, like venison left to dry.

"Who—" she began, turning to the orc, but then she remembered. "Merciful Gods, the Tyrant. We were thousands and..."

"Shhhh," a young man called out. "The gallery doesn't get to talk, Rosalie."

"Rozala," the Adjutant said.

"Oh, who cares," the Tyrant of Helike dismissed. "Proceran royals, eh? There's so many of them, why even bother? She can complain to Cordovan Hallenban if she feels insulted."

The Damned, she saw, hadn't even bothered to turn to address them. He was sprawled on a lumpy throne set atop a platform. Likely for some eldritch reason a goat was standing at his side, allowing herself to be petted while he fed her grass from his palm.

"Cordelia Hasenbach," Princess Rozala coolly corrected. "First Prince of Procer and Warden of the West."

Hasenbach was not and never would be bosom friend of hers, but she would not let the elected ruler of the Principate be mocked by a twisted little shit like Tyrant of Helike.

"If Rosalie talks again, my lovelies, eat one of her eyes," Kairos Theodosian absent-mindedly ordered. "You can choose which."

Rozala's blood ran cold when she saw a gargoyle's animalistic visage peer out over the edge of the beam from which she had, chittering eagerly. There was a bleat from the goat and the Tyrant snorted.

"No, not you," the boy said. "You're a terrible horse."

Rozala eyed the Adjutant, wondering whether a whispered question was worth the risk of losing an eye, but the orc suddenly stiffened. A heartbeat later, there was a burst of light as a cut was made through thin air and in a gust of stormy wind three silhouettes emerged in front of the Tyrant's throne. Rozala knew them well, had fought at the side of most.

"Tyrant," the Grey Pilgrim greeted the villain. "This has gone on for long enough."

The Damned idly flipped the jeweled scepter in his hand, catching it by the handle.

"Give me a moment," the Tyrant of Helike said, cocking his head to the side. "I'm trying to think of an answer that involves a goat pun. Just kidding? No, that's sloppy. I hold myself to higher standards than that."

"It will be a mercy to put an end to you, lunatic," the Saint of Swords said.

"I bet you didn't even make that one on purpose," the Damned laughed.

"There's sorcery being used," the Rogue Sorcerer told the other two. "Still distant, but..."

"Cutting the head of the snake will serve, for a start," the Peregrine said.

The old man raised his staff, and as the air thickened with the weight of Chosen preparing to battle a small sound ripped through the tension. It was, Rozala realized, a match being struck. Off the ornate helmet Prince Arnaud still wore even unconscious. Nonchalantly lighting her pipe, the Black Queen flicked the spent match down and offered up a sharp-toothed smile.

"So," Catherine Foundling said, "we've got about an hour before everybody here ends up enlisting in the Dead King's army the hard way."

She shrugged, and leaned against the Adjutant's tied form.

"But hey, by all means don't let me interrupt."

I dislike commenting again so soon, but I have to say: I find it absolutely adorable that Sve Noc is legit proud of having mastered double entendre, and is then completely oblivious to sarcasm.

onedollargum

She doesn't have Catherine to lean on. ;D

Liliet

I've been worried that Sve Noc at Catherine's side did not make for a very good heroic story.

I was so wrong.

"Sociopathic yet amusing animal companion" is as a matter of fact an amazing heroic trope and I am the most here for this

> "Sociopathic yet amusing animal companion" is as a matter of fact an amazing heroic trope and I am the most here for this

True, I mean just look at Belkar.

Andrew Mitchell

Perfect example. ♥

Veyros

Ooh. Might I introduce you to Badgelor then? (Noobtown series)

AVR

Losing the ability to recognise sarcasm is a professional hazard of being in charge. Seen it happen more than once in RL. Cat's got her friends to remind her but evidently Andronike can't say the same.

Javvies

This reminds me of a line from Forging Hephaestus by Drew Hayes:

"The council of villains does not recognize sarcasm, Balaam; you were told that on your first day here. It's the only way we manage to get anything done."

Ekmo

Eyyyyyy, where's the shooting? All I see here is a standoff. What a place to cut to commercial!

samshadar

"So we shoot him" isn't that Fionas line in the intro of "Burn Notice"?

Liliet

So we shot him // right through the throat

Ooh, poor Lord of the Silver Spears!

Barthumphries

Just waiting for Cat to bargain to get Hakram back and Kairos agrees then tells her he named the goat Hakram.

Rup

..damn..that madman could do this..totally..😏

goliath1303

Except it was just confirmed in this chapter that the first is named Cordelia Hasenbach.

NerfContessa

That would be fun.

But if deadhand is added it won't work.

So, the setup is done. Let's see what cat does with it. Can hardly wait for tonight...

Wyvern

I mean, if you can name the goat Hakram and pass it off, what's to stop you from naming the goat Hakram Deadhand?

Mental Mouse

What odds Indrani joins the party next episode too?

Andrew Mitchell

Later, I think. IMO she'll come in and save Cat & Masego at the last minute.

Draconic

Isn't it the Rogue Sorcerer that has Amadeus' soul? The person who went into hiding, and the Pilgrim has no idea where he is...? Good job Tariq, you managed to become even less trustworthy...

Mental Mouse

>"It will be a mercy to put an end to you, lunatic," the Saint of Swords said.

>"I bet you didn't even make that one on purpose," the Damned laughed.

I don't get the pun here, unless it's a convoluted reference to the scapegoat.

Ekmo

He's assuming the Choir of Mercy telling the heroes to end the Tyrant.

Mental Mouse

I still don't see a goat pun, and Kairos is clearly implying that SoS made one by accident.

Javvies

Flip it around. What Laurence said applies equally as well to her as it does to Kairos.

BargleNawdleZouss

The goat pun is “just kidding”, as a kid is a baby goat.

Chapter 32: Woven; Weaver

“And so Triumphant laughed, saying: ‘You spellsingers, wisdom of stars and weavers of fate, know now despair. I will break you so utterly even the remembrance of your wholeness will suffocate, and where rose your tall spires there be only the barren sea I made of your defiance.’”

– Extract from the Scroll of Dominion, twenty-fourth of the Secret Histories of Praes Gods, but it’d been close.

More than once we’d tread the edge of the cliff, and every time it’d been all I could do not to pull the trigger on all of my most horrifying contingencies. If the Pilgrim had refused the surrender, proved himself someone it was hopeless to work with under any circumstances. If the Tyrant had refused to send forward his armies, proved willing to sacrifice even his own plans to prevent truce being made in the west. If Vivienne had fallen even slightly short of the kind of woman I believed she could be, and chosen the early gain over the slow triumph. Every time I’d sat with Komena on my shoulder, watching them face the crossroads and knowing if the wrong choice was made all that was left would be the hardest of measures. And yet, even as I pulled at my pipe and let trails of wakeleaf escape my nostrils, I saw them all turn towards me like sunflowers to the sun and understood bone-deep why someone like Dread Emperor Traitorous could exist.

I’d tasted heights in my life, more than most ever got to experience. Nights of pleasure with men or women who knew their way around a good time, and subtler pleasures of luxury too: a cup good wine and a crisp pipe, meals exotic and exquisitely prepared. Different sorts of satisfactions as well. Evenings by the fire with people I would love until death took me, but also sharper edges – victory in battle, death and terror inflicted on enemies I despised. Enjoyments that soothed the soul but others that had your teeth clenching in harsh, spiteful vindication. And while I knew it was passing, that like a spasm of pleasure or the ephemeral bliss of a drug it would die out and leave the body strained for it, there was a moment where I saw it in their eyes. The knowledge that to get here, in this moment, I had played them for fools and done it remaining one step ahead of them the entire time. The blend of hatred and fear and respect, but most of all of something that was kin to awe, it was like nothing else I'd ever felt.

If someone had distilled and bottled victory, I thought, it would taste something like this.

What a dangerous thing this sensation was, and how careful I must be to avoid falling in love with it. Else I would become another Traitorous, another Irritant, another mad murderer who cared more for victory as an end instead of a methods. For the triumph of cleverness at the expense of all else, like it was enough to simply beat the others.

"Black Queen," the Peregrine greeted me tiredly. "That is a considerable claim you have made."

I pulled at my pipe once more and discretely glanced at Hakram. Prince among men that he was, he understood what I needed from him without a word.

"Atalante," he whispered. "Hierarch. Knows about Zeze."

The forces at the Tyrant's fingertips that were still missing, along with something he should have no way of knowing: the final pieces to the sharp-edged jigsaw puzzle that we'd all made of this night. My instincts had been right, then. Kairos was making a play for the shard of Arcadia, using another madman and the most powerful priests in his armies. He still thought he was playing me, I thought, smiling at the villain on question. But he'd actually given me the last puzzle pieces I needed to be able to run a spit through his guts and hold him over the fire like a wildly treacherous goose.

"Kairos can vouch for me on that," I drawled, pushing myself off Hakram. "After all, he's been talking with the Dead King throughout this entire campaign."

The Tyrant gasped theatrically as everyone's eyes turned towards him. Leaning on my staff, I limped forward and left behind the hanging royals as well as Adjutant. It'd not escaped my notice that Kairos had seven crowns and my closest friend in the world hanging from that wooden beam. I might have been amused by that, if not for the implicit threat to the gesture: that he'd kill Hakram the moment I made a play for the shard, that I could only snatch that prize from him if I was willing to make Adjutant my one. A heartbeat passed and the odd-eyed villain started tittering, putting his trembling hand over his heart in an expression of repentance.

"You got me," the Tyrant of Helike snickered. "I tried to sell you all out to the Dead King... and for that, I sincerely apologize."

The sincerity, I thought, was cast somewhat into doubt by his broad shit-eating grin.

"Though, in my defence," Kairos continued, "it's the Black Queen's own court warlock who decided to read the entire Kabbalis Book of Darkness and got himself... inconvenienced."

Huh. I wondered if he genuinely didn't know that Masego had actually gotten his hands on much, much worse than that – Neshamah's actual memories, harvested from an echo in Arcadia – or if he was simply keeping that under wraps for later use.

"By inconvenienced," the Tyrant added in stage whisper, "I mean he went crazy and ate a city's worth of souls and now the Dead King is riding him like a mule, if you'll forgive my language."

I could have tried to cut him off before he got all of that out, but I didn't bother. For one, the longer he kept talking the least likely he was to notice I'd ordered my Lord of Silent Steps to take care of a few loose ends. And, most importantly, I wanted him to out the facts that it was Masego who was, uh, getting slightly rough with the fabric of Creation. Nobody here trusted the Tyrant the slightest fucking bit, and this would be taken as an attack on his part – which meant that might my reply, which admittedly stretched the truth a little, would be granted a lot more good faith than anything coming out of my mouth usually would get.

"The Hierophant attempted to find a way to kill the Dead King, at great personal risk to himself," I said, carefully avoiding mentioning that Masego would have taken a bite out of his own liver for that knowledge regardless of all other considerations, "but whatever it was the Ashurans used at Thalassina, it wounded him. The Hidden Horror seems to have taken advantage of that."

But it wouldn't have happened if the lot of you hadn't gone a'crusading and started a battle that wiped a major city off the face of Creation, I left unsaid.

"That is unfortunate," the Grey Pilgrim said, "yet-"

"If the next sentence that comes out of your mouth is we might have to kill him," I mildly said, "we're going to have a problem."

That didn't win me any favour with the heroes, from the way their backs straightened. I wasn't feeling all that threatened by that, to be honest. The Saint had tussled with Rumena, so she was far from fresh, and like the Tyrant for all his fronting the Pilgrim was dead tired. The only hero that was in fighting fit was the Rogue Sorcerer, and if it came to that I could bury him in a swarm of Mighty. I didn't intend on outright dictating terms here, but I had no qualms with disabusing them from the illusion that they were in a position to dictate a single fucking thing to me. Including the death of one of my friends, no matter his current state.

"Shut your mouth, child," the Saint of Swords said. "You-"

I glanced at the Peregrine.

"Tariq," I calmly said. "Do muzzle your hound, before I decide to take offence."

The old man's face tightened, but he laid a hand on his attack dog's shoulder and spoke to her in a whisper. I turned to the Tyrant, who was watching all of this happen with a kind of pure malicious glee I'd only ever seen in goblins before.

"Now would be a good time to order your armies to retreat," I told him.

"I'm no general," the odd-eyed boy said, "but we do appear to be winning."

I could have pointed out that the drow had been strengthened by the eclipse Akua had brought at precisely the right time, and that now that bargain had been struck my armies would back those of the Grand Alliance against his. But that'd be missing the point, because none of this really mattered to him.

"Kairos," I patiently said, "I understand you think that by standing here and mouthing off you're serving as a distraction for the Hierarch claiming the shard unhindered, but you've been had. So call off your damn armies, and let's have all of us a civilized conversation."

The Tyrant of Helike gazed at me in disappointment, one eye shining red and the other teary from tiredness.

"Now, if I did have such a scheme," Kairos Theodosian said, "and I do not, for I assure you I am most defeated and at your common mercy, but if I did... then the most elementary of steps would have been ensuring that the Dead King could not in fact see such a blow coming. That, in this most theoretical of worlds, though I am such a villain's inferior in many ways distance and the nature of our bargain would blind him to the knife until the very last moment."

His leg twitched restlessly.

"Now, Catherine, in this abstract, are you still suggesting that I was seen through?" the Tyrant asked.

"No," I said. "I'm not clear on what exact measures you took, honestly, but I'm fairly sure they worked. Which is why I'm telling you that, while you launched your attacks here, I pre-emptively sold you out to Hidden Horror."

His face went blank at my words, and I enjoyed the sight a lot more than I'd thought I would. It hadn't even been all that complicated, to be honest. Not once I'd figured out that Neshamah had his finger in this pie anyway. Masego was the only angle he could feasibly have used other than myself, and that meant all it'd taken to pass a warning about what I suspected the Hierarchy of being capable of was putting it to parchment and having one of the Wild Hunt carry it as far into the Arcadian wasteland as she could without getting killed or captured. Something like a shiver went through the Tyrant of Helike's sickly frame at my words, though I could not be certain whether it was fear or excitement. Or, for that matter, something as mundane as exhaustion.

"Well," Kairos Theodosian mused, "it seems we truly do have about an hour to live."

He spared a look for some of the throng of gargoyles ever surrounding him, some of which flew away with urgent chittering.

"Queen Catherine," the Pilgrim said, tone sharp.

"I'll give you the broad strokes," I said. "Kairos can fill in the parts I'm uncertain about. Won't you, Kairos?"

Most of the time it was a damned pain to deal with intelligent opponents, but once in a while it had its uses. The Tyrant looked at the heroes, face twisting into a thoughtful frown as he asked himself what use I had for the heroes. It could not be to kill him, since he had to know just the same as I did that he'd slip away like an eel if we tried. He had symbolic hostages, had just finished making a broad splash in the story pond with a plan and so he was very much due a beating at heroic hands – followed by him scampering away to fight another day. So no, I wasn't trying to use the heroes as a borrowed knife. I was even, tacitly, inviting him to be part of this as something other than an enemy. Which meant...

"There are six of us," Kairos noted, eyeing me as he wagged a finger chidingly.

"Adjutant will stay behind," I replied.

"Not even one of them," he laughed. "Ever bold, Catherine. Put this way, how can I refuse?"

My gaze returned to the Pilgrim, whose face had grown cold as the back and forth continued. The light tone of the exchange must have grated on him, considering people were dying as we spoke. You can't act like that with the Tyrant, Tariq, I thought. He'll pounce on that kind of weakness every time.

"The block on scrying is what gave it away," I told the Pilgrim. "I'd been given details before that allowed me to catch on, troubles at the Observatory and my mages theorizing that the sky was already in use and that was why the rituals didn't work. I thought it was a side-effect, at first, of whatever Hierophant is being tricked into doing, but it was just too convenient."

The Rogue Sorcerer stirred.

"The scrying troubles are a consequence of the Keter's Due of some great working," he said. "That much I have confirmed."

"Figured it might be that," I said, "because Hierophant picked up the ruins of Liesse on the way here, and I'm no scholar of sorcery but I do know there's one thing about that weapon that makes Akua Sahelian a legend: it made use of the Due."

Instead of the turning Liesse and its surroundings into a blighted wasteland, Diabolist had used the wild release of wasted energy that accompanied every spell to power the city's flight. That did not mean, however, that the artefact could not be shaped anew until the release served other purpose.

"You're implying the Dead King, through the Hierophant, intervened to prevent scrying from being possible in Iserre," the Pilgrim said.

He flicked a glance at the Rogue Sorcerer, who nodded a concession it was possible for that to have been the case. I didn't need to tell the Peregrine much more than that: he might not have been in the middle of anything like this before, but given how long he'd been kicking around he would have been in the middle of a lot of things that were a little like this.

"We were meant to bloody each other," the old man quietly said. "The Grand Alliance, the Legions of Terror, your Army of Callow. By cutting off the rituals, negotiation was made difficult and you-"

A coldly burning gaze turned to the Tyrant of Helike. I sympathized with the sentiment. The Pilgrim and I had both known we were doing the Dead King's work for him, by fighting here in Iserre, but neither of us had grasped quite how literally that was the case until tonight.

"Me," Kairos grinned. "I've had eyes in the sky this entire time, in a manner of speaking. And on occasion, I spoke with a dear friend of mine about... common interests."

Which explained why the armies of the League and of Helike in particular had been able to dance around Iserre flawlessly, never encountering any true setback until I'd arrived on the surface with Sve Noc at my back: perhaps the only entity in the principality that could veil itself from the ritual Neshamah was using. And to make it even worse, with that knowledge Kairos had undertaken the collection of even more. Since he'd known where every army was, he'd been able to make deals with them for even more secrets until he was the only person in all of Iserre who truly knew what was going on. Which had made him, in turn, even more useful to the Dead King who needed an agent in the region to keep stirring the chaos and escalate the mess. I suspected he'd used that need as a chip to learn quite a few things he shouldn't. Likely the information about the Bard he'd traded me initially came from Neshamah, and for him to know of the specific price to my bargain with Larat – as he quite obviously did – meant the chances were good most of what Masego knew had been spilled and passed on. It did smack of the Dead King's ironic touch, to be selling my secrets instead of his.

"Of course, they are villains," I said. "Which means the Dead King always intended to kill him, and Kairos always intended on stealing the Dead King's victory at the very last moment."

I cast a curious glance at the Tyrant, since I was still unaware of the full details of what Neshamah was up to. I'd figured out that if no one ended up claiming the shard it would have no anchor and so just keep falling – you know, until it crashed on us – but I doubted the Dead King was just going to let that lying around afterwards. Though after making corpses out of the core armies of the Grand Alliance, the East and the League he should definitely have some further means to meddle.

"He planned on turning this lovely little ruin-realm into a fresh Hell, I do believe," Kairos mused. "After binding our souls, raising us from the grave and unleashing us against all he opposed anyway. He's got classic tastes, our friend up north."

"Neat," I flatly said. "So, Kairos here wanted to snatch the shard from the Dead King using the Hierarch and Atalante's priesthood."

"It was going to be beautiful," the Tyrant sighed. "Terrible for all of you, of course, but absolutely glorious for everyone that matters. I'd even been looking into the practicalities of crashing it into the Serenity."

He'd what? No, now was not the time to let him distract me.

"Won't work now," I said. "The Dead King's been warned. But, as it happens, there's still a way to prevent this from killing us all."

The Tyrant leaned back into his throne with a vicious grin.

"Now, this is the part I've been looking forward to," Kairos Theodosian cheerfully said. "Go on, Catherine, I want to see how you'll be selling the birth of a fae court sworn to Below to the Peregrine."

The Pilgrim's hackles went right back up, not that they'd ever gone down all that much. Might be more accurate to say the crux of his indignation had been pointed at another villain, for once. He didn't accuse me, at least, though at his side Laurence looked both triumphant and remarkably eager to run me through. I rolled my shoulder to loosen it, the same way I'd used to do before fights – in a way, this was one. Without blades having been bared, but it counted all the same. All my plans meant nothing, if I couldn't convince the Peregrine that backing me was the right choice. The Saint was a lost cause, and I knew next to nothing about the Sorcerer, but they'd both fall in line if Tariq gave his word. Leaning against my staff, I gestured upwards at the darkened firmament.

"Now, a realm has been carved out of Arcadia and sent careening down into Creation," I said. "There's no changing that, there's not sending it back and destroying it would be worse: it's close enough to us by now that if we broke it the aftershocks would likely kill everyone in Iserre. Which means that realm needs to be seen to, anchored, and there's only three stories for us to craft that fate from."

I raised a single finger, then jammed it towards the north.

"The Dead King's story is a kingdom of death, made for the reigning king of the same," I said. "Its herald was the folly and blindness of mortals, who willingly sacrificed themselves at an unseen altar to allow the blooming of calamity."

I paused.

"It also involves everyone here dying and returning as a Revenant in his service, leading his armies in the conquest of Calernia," I added. "Not, I feel same in assuming, anyone's first choice."

I shrugged.

"Now, there was a second story," I said. "Woven by the hand of our very own Tyrant."

Kairos nonchalantly waved, which had the Saint's lips thinning in anger and her hand visibly reaching for her sword. It was almost unsettling to see that directed at someone else.

"His was the madness-"

"-visionary wisdom," the Tyrant corrected.

"- of the Hierarch woven into the very fabric of a realm," I continued. "A vessel of revolt, an instrument for the sowing of strife uncivil. That story, however, was broken."

"She sold me out to the Dead King," Kairos complained to the heroes. "You really can't trust anyone these days."

"The last story is mine," I said. "It is made of crowns and debts, the desperate trick of a fox chewing through its own foot for fear of the night."

"Then it is true," the Grey Pilgrim grimly said. "You want to make a Court of Night."

"Oh no, this is where you have me wrong," I smiled. "What I want, Peregrine, is for us to make a god."

My smile turned sharp, almost blade-like.

"Then to murder that god and make of his bones a highway for our armies."

Vote for A Practical Guide to Evil! We are barely ahead of Ward.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

Ambitious, Cat.

And Larat is definitely not getting what he wanted the way he wanted it.

The situation with Masego is problematic.

Javvies

That wasn't supposed to be a reply. Dammit, wordpress.

Dainpdf

I definitely empathize with your pain.

medailyfun

can anyone remind me if Larat had done anything evil enough it warranted such a grim destiny?

nipi

Not in story. However hes a winter fae that has existed since before creation. I imagine he has done quite a few things in that time.

medailyfun

Sounds like prejudice 😊 If Akua got her chance, Cat should offer the same to Larat

Andrew Mitchell

While I'd tend to agree with you for any thinking being, there's an issue here. It's been repeatedly stated that the Fae are inflexible and their nature cannot change (not like people born in Creation). And my view of Larat's 'arc' is that he's exactly the same viscous killer that he was when we first saw him; the only thing that has kept him in check is his oath to Cat. Cat knows that and she knows he's going to be a problem once the oath is finished. Cat also knows that it's her responsibility to fix this. IMO there is no other way.

onedollargum

He's a traitorous Lieutenant who (if ai recall) was involved in using Catherine as a catspaw against the court. I'm not too surprised he's ended up this way.

Mental Mouse

Well, aside from his using her against the Winter court, his showing up on Cat's doorstep unasked, was meant to get himself a foothold in Creation. Over the various battles, he hasn't exactly been a team player, sitting out fights when he could, and not keeping the Hunt in line.

Decius

He wanted the story to involve treachery and deceit and technically fulfilling the terms of a bargain made.

A human would want more, but Larat is fae and will be fully satisfied by the story.

SINISTAR

Well, Cat, not doing things by halves here, are we?

antoninjohn

"Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation."

Hitogami

I love this crazy woman!

Cat! You ambitious, conniving, magnificent beast!

Caerulea

Well, Catherine is murdering gods again. It is probably Larat who ends up on the chopping block. Also, well done EE.

konstantinvoncarstein

Anyone have their favorite hobbies. For some it is collecting postage stamps, others killing gods.

Dainpdf

Well, Cat is either 0 or 2 for 4 in god killing, depending on whether you count the king and queen or Arcadia as dead. Maybe +1 if the Duke of Violent Squalls counts.

konstantinvoncarstein

They were "undone", their nature change so much they are no more of Winter nor Summer. For the sake of coolness, I chose to see that as dying 😊

Dainpdf

I find the fact that it was the King of Winter's plan all along complicated my feelings somewhat.

konstantinvoncarstein

Was it his plan? He was planning that Cat had to do something to end Summer, but the practical steps were Catherine's ideas, no?

Dainpdf

I am pretty sure he wanted to end the winter-summer cycle, to escape it. "A fox gnawing its own leg to escape a trap", as Cat mentioned. Seems to be a thing with these Winter types.

Agent J

She killed one god and stole it's mantle, unmade another two and struck a deal, created a fourth to befriend and is about to create a fifth to murder in the name of infrastructure spending.

One need not sacrifice accuracy for coolness' sake. Cat's consistent chicanery involving divine dieties is impressive enough as it is.

xland44

unmade two and struck a deal with them? more like the two unmade her and decided to strike a deal with her instead of ending her

Javvies

She unmade two a made a deal with them refers to the King of Winter and Queen of Summer. She made a deal to marry them and in so doing unmade Summer and Winter.

Sve Noc (the Sisters Komena and Andronike) is referred to as the divinity that Cat made to befriend, mentioned as the fourth.

Liliet

Yes.

Euodiachloris

Or, should that weasel manage to get out of the god trap, there're two other options to splice in there: Masego and Heirphant.

Unless Liesse can be condensed into a mad entity of its own.

Euodiachloris

Dammit, meant Heirarch. Thanks, brain fog. 😊

flame7926

Well that was intense! Great chapter. How is Cat going to make a god out of a shard of Arcadia?

Andrew Mitchell

She gives the "seven crowns and one" to Larat. Larat uses those to establish a new Fae Court of the shard of Arcadia. The new heroic-band (GP, SoS, Rogue Sorcerer, Cat and Karios) kill Larat and take his stuff.

rangerscience

Ah yes, the glorious Goblin battle cry. I certainly hope the Lesser Footrest gets to play at least some role in that.

NerfContessa

Heroic band.... Pffwahahahaha....

Oh man, a band of 5 with hese guys and gals?

Also, murder away. Cat, larats name is already. Fitting for your cause.

Naeddyr

It's crazy, but it might just work.

Naeddyr

Now, if I only knew what "it" was.

Liliet

A band of Named heading the Crusade against the Evil from the North of course 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

"There are six of us."

Cat notes Adjutant isn't coming because that means it's a band of FIVE. Three heroes, two villains, all working together for a common cause to head off the inevitable doom coming at them. In these stories the villains never die unless they are pushing for redemption (and Cat is already immune to that in this particular band), and until the threat is extinguished, they are pretty much unstoppable.

ATRDCl

Plus Kairos being in the group means Cat can't be the traitorous "bad guy" of the group. At worst Cat is the gritty anti-hero with methods other members of the party don't like.

(Plus of course Archer appearing as the 6th Ranger to save her virgin Damsel in Distress from the clutches of the monster. Saving Masego from possession with True Love's First Kiss)

Liliet

This. This is the best part.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yep, and it has the extra bonus of galling Saint. She said a book back she knew she was going to be part of a Five, along with Pilgrim, and she was right. But these two were definitely not in the plans for partners.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, and SoS was talking about going up against the tower in that conversation. Now they're headed to Keter.

antoninjohn

If the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods are not part of the five won't that mean they don't get plot armor

Mental Mouse

Which "they"? WK and WW don't get plot armor sure, but the Band of Five does.

Liliet

Best irony 15/10

SITB

I don't think that Indrani is going to kiss Masego, he doesn't care for it and IIRC he mentioned that he dislikes being pawed at.

I think it's more likely that he will be saved by Indrani throwing True Love's Badly Carved Wooden Duck at him when he monologues.

nostoneuntuned11

Yup, Cat becomes the Lancer to the Pilgrim as the leader. And honestly she isn't even that gritty considering SoS is in the party, or what the Pilgrim gets up to. Not to mention technically she is the cleric of the party.

Mental Mouse

I note also that even Kairos automatically counts Hakram, despite the fact that the latter is still tied and hanging upside down.

Cap'n Smurfy

"Then to murder that god and make of his bones a highway for our armies."

Goddamn Cat stop trying to murder Gods. You have literally died twice trying to do exactly that, most people would take that as a hint to stop. But noooo, you just have to keep trying. When it gets to the point that you're making new God's for the express purpose of murdering them, because you've run out of God's to try and murder, it's time to admit you have a problem.

Novice

Cat really needs that intervention from her friends right about now. Remember kids, Evil is bad m'kay.

Someguy

Well, Cat has already played Matchmaker of the gods with Summer & Winter. This is simply a sacrifice of divine proportions.

Dainpdf

At least this time she's making it a team effort...

caoimhinh

In the future

Robber: Boss, what did I tell you about murdering gods?

Cat: That... I should stop doing it and getting myself killed and resurrected?

Robber: What? No! That you had to take me with you next time!

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahhahahahaah!

Hardric62

... She aims for a Rule of Three victory in godslaying?

Mental Mouse

That would be problematic on several counts. Even if we accept "the gods" as a single opponent, she's got a win and a loss behind her, and is looking for another win. So, the Rule of Three isn't going to help her much. Versus Neshamah, she doesn't have a prior fight unless we count taking down a few guards to fight Malicia (and the fight against Malicia may count as a draw rather than a loss).

Speaking of whom, we don't seem to have a representative from the Dread Empress here (at least we don't see one yet). I imagine she'll be miffed if nobody invited her to this party.

Andrew Mitchell

I've got no doubt that she will make an appearance in Book 6 but I don't think she'll play any role in the remainder of this book. She hasn't got any narrative weight in this story.

John

To be fair, her K/D spread against gods has been pretty impressive so far, so it's not like she's got no reason to be confident.

Cap'n Smurfy

The last time she tried to murder a God and steal it's power said Goddesses murdered her and stole her power. Most would consider this a sign that you should try something else.

erebus42

Why do we fall? So we can learn to pick ourselves back up!

Mental Mouse

I beg to differ: This morning, it was to blot out the sun in the sky!

Agent J

True, but the first time she tried to murder a God and steal its power, she murdered a God and stole its power. Cat's one for one in God murdering/power stealing. It's time for a tiebreaker!

Barack Obama

Sure she died, but she got better.

konstantinvoncarstein

Cartherine must be the first one to ever surprise Kairos so much 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Honestly, I think Kairos is loving this top-tier scheming even if he's being out-played. He loves novelty and intrigue and can admire it in others.

Andrew Mitchell

Plus, he'll jump at the opportunity to help kill a god.

Forum Explorer

I think Kairos might legitimately fall in love with Cat by the end of this.

erebus42

My thoughts exactly. At this point he probably doesn't know if he'd prefer stabbing her or having sex with her more. Knowing him, he'd probably try for both

RoflCat

"Can you show me that self-necromancy thing I heard about?"

Liliet

Cat does that to villains 😊

danh3107

Press F for Larat, poor bloke

Javvies

Ambitious, Cat.

And Larat is definitely not getting what he wanted the way he wanted it.

The situation with Masego is problematic.

Billy

Whew, what an ending. Catherine is pulling no punches here.

caoimhinh

She's living Amadeus' dream here XD

WuseMajor

Speaking of, she still needs to see a Sorcerer about a Soul.

Someguy

That's when Grey Boi, Sword Bitch & Rogue One need to curse Cat for her sudden but inevitable betrayal. That or extort Black's soul from them further down the line.

rangerscience

Noooooooo maybe it's better than that!

Cat's role in this is not as a member of a heroic band – she's in the running as the Below's Intercessor. Think about it. The Bard acts to keep stories on the rails – aka, under the guidance of the Gods (Above) – and Cat acts to break those stories, aka, returning that guidance to mortals, as the Gods Below desire. Which is the entire fight between the gods in the first place.

Instead, the Black Night restored is the fifth member of the heroic band.

taovkool

Not sure what's going on anymore, but that part about killing a God and making his bones into a toll road of some sort was all kinds of awesome.

And a crazy pile of nutsacks, of course, but that one's kinda obvious. It's Cat, after all.

Clint

I think she means making a kinder, gentler Arcadia – one with all the shortcuts and none of the watchdogs.

Poor Larat. He never got the chance to treacherously betray her. Kairos was far kinder to his treacherous lieutenant – even if he had to kidnap one.

caoimhinh

They are all going to take an Express Train through that new shard of Arcadia to the northern Principalities to fight against the Dead King.

It's so much good and will bring such fast relieve to the armies there that the Pilgrim will have to swallow all protest and agree. Because Cat's plan is the most efficient way to end the suffering fast.

Allafterme

That leaves one inconvenient fact that the Grand Alliance have to fight alongside Callow, which happens to be at war with it...

caoimhinh

Yep, but that's where the Foundling Style of unparalleled diplomacy will come into play. 😊

Jeffrey T Ma

Is that the same same one as light it on fire, and if all else fails drop a lake on it?

ninegardens

It's the one with "Bring cheap booze and a sword".
The Wine is terrible, but it still beats being stabbed.

caoimhinh

The Foundling Style of Unparalleled Diplomacy is an ever-evolving style encompassing a wide variety of techniques.

Andrew Mitchell

I think the Grand Alliance troops will be heading to the front line with the "East" troops. And no front-line leader is going to turn down help wherever they can get it.

Liliet

If you squint the right way they defeated Callow and strong-armed their surrendered army into joining the war effort.

TeK

Exactly, it's a great victory for Grand Alliance, defeating the Army of Callow and the Black Queen so thoroughly, without losing many soldiers even! Maybe those Callowans are not as strong as everyone seemed to think...

Mental Mouse

It's amazing what you can sneak under the radar if you can work the publicity right.

Liliet

ain't that what the entire series is about? 😊

magesbe

Holy shit, talk about amazing. Catherine tells us just what's been going on behind the scenes, and we see that her genius was nevertheless precarious and the entire situation was balanced on a knife edge above a chasm of lava. And she still pulled it off. That's more amazing than if she had been the effortless puppetmaster she came across as.

Masego is possessed to some degree. That'll be fun to deal with, especially as Catherine won't tolerate his death unless she literally has no other option (I think she would be capable of sacrificing him if it was the only way, but she may never forgive herself for it). I have a feeling Archer will come to play here, probably as the trump card to free Masego, but a small part of me also sees she could be a player in a tragedy where she defends Masego from the party even though Masego (may) need to die.

She's going to make a god. How? We have no real idea, but I have a feeling she's setting Larat up to be the King of this Arcadia and then kill him.

Yay

Archer swings in to give him True Love's Groping and breaks the Dead King's hold. It basically writes itself.

Mental Mouse

Oh, no, sex as such would totally not work on Masego. I'm betting Cat (and perhaps Indrani) goes into Masego's mind, like she did the last time he was shocked into withdrawal. Indrani might well be in there already, captured in his idealized image of her. But this time Cat's got Night at her back, which is one of the few powers around that might be able to stand up to Masego+DK. Cue Pilgrim's sacrifice while defending her vulnerable body from undead attack (while Hakram fends off Kairos.).

Insanenoodlyguy

Hakram is staying behind though, she already said. And usually it just takes a kiss in these sorts of situations.

Mental Mouse

Oh right, maybe they'll need to squelch Kairos first. Or one of the others can deal with Kairos – perhaps Pilgrim, if he's got Saint in line. (Or heck, maybe Hakram will come in as the cavalry.)

Dainpdf

She's going to pay the price Larat asked of her way back, seems to be the going theory. Ofc, with all the help she's recruited there may be easier ways.

Aotrs Commander

But that's the secret, isn't it? It's ALWAYS a knife edge over lava. The secret of being the mastermind is convincing everyone that everything went Just As Planned and that was no invisible frantic scrabble in the background. Anyone who says they are an effortless puppetmaster is just more than capable of lying to you convincingly so you believe it. The true puppetmaster is really just the Master of Plan B and knowing how to adapt circumstances to your advantage and then neatly playing everything off like that was the plan all along.

It's basically exactly the same as dungeonmastering, just writ larger, really; and the one plays into the other and vice-versa...

This time, we just actually got to see behind the mask and the process that went into that, as WELL as the view from outside.

Mental Mouse

Yes. "Making it look easy" is a function of both skill and style. Doesn't mean it is easy.

Liliet

^^^^^ this

Catherine is everything I thought she was, when reading those chapters, and I bet she's everything Akua thought she was. She talks how precarious this was because this is the BEST CASE scenario.

Liliet

Oh Cat IS the "effortless puppetmaster" she came across as. She HAD all the contingencies, after all. She's just on the edge about it.

A sign of being at a higher level of skill is noticing more flaws in your work than anyone else could :3

Morgenstern

So... is the Prince's Graveyard the battle against the Wild Hunt made New Fae Court? ^^
There would be only one King/Queen (Larat), but there might just be a lot of Princes/Princesses...

Morgenstern

Princes' *gargh

damn you no-edit-function-wordpress.

Andrew Mitchell

I think that's still quite unclear. There's an argument that the battle that's just been completed could be called that if (as I suspect) the Princes & Princesses never return.

fbt pagesbe's comment on 26 april at 4:26A is an good summary of why this was excellent writing, imho. Exciting, clever, nuanced, w/o being phrased in an opaque/confusing way (although lots of the situation is not yet clear, as it's not revealed yet, that's drama folks!). this was nicely done. Capturing the edge she walked, the plans, the joy and fear and purpose...very nice.

Clint

"For one, the longer he kept talking the least likely he was to notice I'd ordered my Lord of Silent Steps to take care of a few loose ends."

Loose ends? Black's soul? Hakram's bonds? Disarming the goblinfire-explosives in the goat?

IDKWhoitis

Why the hell would she disarm the explosives? She might still need that trump card in the event that Grey refuses...

Mental Mouse

Yes. And probably collecting crowns while he's at it.

IDKWhoitis

Oh Cat, tricking Heroes and Villians alike to make her wet work. This battle will be remembered for Cat making, breaking, then using a God to smash the Dead King.

She might just become an entity more feared than the Dead King at this rate, as the Dead King was never allowed this much meddling without costly battles.

Kissaten

Cat doesn't break stories and also avoids gigantic scale apotheosis for herself. She is in the gray area for the gods, and so Bard can't angle a justifiable strike at her.

Mental Mouse

All true, but not quite what IDKW is saying. Once she comes out as a power strong enough to stand off or co-opt "everybody" including the Dead King, it's not clear how many stories are left to her besides Black Queen vs. The World.

Liliet

Queen Under The Mountain.

The great queen who set up the nation and then left, but is sure to return in its hour of need.

Power level doesn't need to be low for this one to go well.

Mental Mouse

Hmm, that could work, and her priestly role gives her reason to depart.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure she could just leave like 'ive done my job here' and the story would accept that much as a perfect explanation.

I do wonder if Cat's allowed to leave Sve Noc's service or if this one's a lifetime appointment...

Mental Mouse

I suspect it's a "lifetime appointment" in the sense that she can retire "when she feels she's lived quite long enough". (As per Pratchett's Vetinari, but consider also his second job offer to Lipwig.).

Of course, that's pending further developments, and the plans at hand could provide several of those.

Mental Mouse

... plans at hand. (sigh)

Liliet

Of course, lifetime appointments and Cat have something of an odd relationship, considering Winter was meant to be one too ;u;

But yeah what I'm thinking is that she might be able to freely leave if Sve Noc agrees.

Mental Mouse

Also, notice how that would be an exact mirror-image of "may she never return"...

Liliet

♥

caoimhinh

Yeah, you shouldn't leave gods' corpses just lying around, they tend to do nasty lovecraftian things. Better put them to good use, I agree.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Holy Fuck.

maresther23

Wow! I can't wait for the second part of the plan to unfold, I wonder what Black's message was and how will the secret alliance with Kairos will work. Will we finally find out if Cat is the Bards tool or her end?

Andrew Mitchell

"Black's message"??? Please explain... I must have missed something.

Good point about the Bard. She's been absent from all this and that's a worry.

maresther23

So, the Big Bad of the setting is Bard (and the Dead King). We know that in the last conversation with Bard Amadeus realized something. Yet, instead of escaping he reappears as a soulless body. This is specially jarring if you consider that he had a very good chance to escape (story, plus claimant, plus friends in need, plus being Amadeus). So whatever Mistake the Bard committed, Amadeus considers that the best option was not to play. This is further reinforced by the fact that GP and SoS never mention that he tried to escape. However, Black is not someone to be passive, he has a scheme in the works. Now, with Warlock dead the two persons that will help him are Cat and Malicia, if he puts himself I the right position it is just a matter of time that they find his body, specially if he nudges the story the right way. And there is no way that Amadeus is not going to make use of that to ruin someone's day.

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting theory. There's certainly something going on there with Black saying "Mistake" about the Bards visit. Let's see how much of your ideas come to be true. Whatever happens I can't wait to see Black and Cat back together again.

Mental Mouse

Except this "scheme" amounts to expecting someone to rescue him. I seriously doubt he has any agency as a disembodied soul! (Unless Rogue Sorcerer was fool enough to follow Cat's example with Akua....)

Liliet

There is no guarantee that "mistake" refers to Bard.

My impression was that Amadeus decided that whatever he could do would be what Bard predicted, and the path of smallest fuckup was to let himself get dissected.

Mental Mouse

My guess is that it was indeed referring to Bard, and that her “mistake” was simply letting Amadeus know that he actually could continue with another story.

Liliet

See it would be very very of him to think it was a mistake and not all part of the plan – she’s proved plenty of indirect cunning already. You can’t foil an enemy plan if you can’t tell what the enemy is actually trying to do.

Kairos has surrendered initiative to Catherine by being active and achieving visible results that tied together into a whole.

Bard... nobody knows what the fuck she wants anything she’s done for.

Dainpdf

You can just see Kairos’s eyes lighting up when he notices Cat is inviting him to a heroic band of five.

Dainpdf

Also: Cat, I totally support becoming another Traitorous. Do it!

Andrew Mitchell

No... Just, no. 😞

Gunslinger

Her enemies would already be considering her to be an Irritant

erebus42

At this point, I think they’re probably thinking more Triumphant (May she never return).

Actually, I kinda want this to end with her making a brief cameo where she visits from her Hellpire to acknowledge Cat as her successor.

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't bet on a cameo, but there's already a callback to Triumphant. Which interestingly implies that the Tower itself may be a domain. (Partly explaining how it could be rebuilt so "easily" after being toppled!)

Andrew Mitchell

Nice catch!

Euodiachloris

Kairos wrote himself a bucket list years ago, even before he started talking to dark powers in basements under throne rooms. I'm going to bet "ride in a band of five" was in the wishful thinking part of the list. 😊

Enjou

You also just know that "murder a god" has to be in there somewhere.

Dainpdf

Now I'm just imagining:
Pilgrim! Riding on a pure white horse of Mercy!
Cat! Riding on a skeleton horse of ice!
Tyrant! Riding on a goat!

Perfect Axis of Awesome reference.

liate7

Tyrant! Riding on a ~~goat~~ purebred Liessan charger!

FTFY

Dainpdf

It doesn't fit as well with the song like that tho

liate7

...I probably should have checked what the Axis of Awesome was before posting that...

Dainpdf

Eh, it was still a worthy addition!

Andrew Mitchell

Fantastic chapter IMO. What a joy to see Cat at work again and witness her nuanced understanding of the current situation and the characters. Kairos is still a fascinating character but I do hope Cat gets to roast him as she imagined doing. I also hope Peregrine gets on board with this quickly, just like he did with Vivienne's negotiation.

What a great set up for the closing arc of book 5!! You have outdone yourself EE. 😊 😊 😊

SNAKE EATEEER

Cat snorting some coke off of Hellhound's tits. "I WILL MAKE A WEAPON TO SURPASS METAL GEAR!"

Takes another hit. "I WILL MAKE A GOD AND THEN KILL IT!"

Takes another giant hit. With eyes bloodshot and hair in disarray. "I WILL USE THE GODS CORPSE AS A HIGHWAY"

sutortyrannus

... Why. Just... why?

I was having a great Friday, you know.

caoimhinh

Hahahahahahaha.

Insanenoodlyguy

Juniper would not put up with that shit. She'd wholeheartedly refuse to be a titty table!

So Cat orders Aisha to do it and suddenly Juniper is surprisingly excited about snorting coke.

SNAKE EATEEER

I honestly can't tell if Juniper wants to eat Aisha or eat Aisha out.

Mental Mouse

Neither can she. "Lick or bite? Temptation, get thee behind me!"

Mental Mouse

Do orcs even have tits? Given their general habits, I would be unsurprised if their young simply ate meat from birth. At first it might get pre-chewed by a parent (as is common among multiple species including humans) but I'd suspect that's not actually necessary given the story potential. Remember, just because something's humanoid, doesn't mean it's "like a human, except...".

Speaking of which, Cat might be headed for some awkward moments – this is not the first time she’s commented on Hakram to the effect of “good man”. In some ways he might be a better man than an orc, but he’s still an orc. And Juniper’s POV has hinted at the hazards of interspecies desire...

Mental Mouse

(That said, Hakram would probably be safer than Kairos. 😊)

Liliet

The whole sex thing has actually come up between Hakram and Catherine in Book 2, to his awkwardness and her amusement, as he ended up seeing her naked a lot / she found amusement in not being bothered by being naked in front of him. Catherine apparently has very little body shyness, while Hakram is a prude.

Anyway, she’s not interested in him like that, nor he in her. The jokes were completely subtext-free, other than ‘oh my god he is adorable’.

konstantinvoncarstein

“Oh no, this is where you have me wrong,” I smiled. “What I want, Peregrine, is for us to make a god.”[...]
“Then to murder that god and make of his bones a highway for our armies.”

It is probably the most wtf-yet-awesome sentences in the whole serie. And some of the most emblematic. When I will speak to other people about APGTE, I will definitely mention it! 😊

Andrew Mitchell

You need to be careful, that would be a huge spoiler.

konstantinvoncarstein

Not without the context 😊 You just have to say that without explaining more. It does not say when, what or anything.

Morgenstern

You should probably erase the “Peregrine” in there, though. It would make for some kind of spoiler during the course of reading (even though not before reaching a certain point in the read).

Snowfire1224

Imagine Cat an evil anonymous group.

"Hi, my name is Cathtine (hi cathrine) and I've bullied angels, sold myself to the fae, became the head of the drow religion, and made god so I could kill it."

Snowfire1224

This was suppose to be in reply to the comment about how Cat need an intervention for god killing.

Mental Mouse

"You are a Bad Guy, but you are not bad guy." Come to think of it, Ralph's group could use some female members.

Soronel Haetir

Well now, unless someone has a more palettable story on offer I do believe we are in for a bit of Deicide.

Kissaten

She is going full Empress Crowned in Dread. There was an epigraph already with one Empress making a tower out of god's bones.

Dresden 67

"And so Maleficent said: 'Though you be god I am Empress, crowned of dread, and by my hand comes your doom. Rage in vain, for from your bones will rise a great tower whose shadow will be cast upon all the world.'"

—Extract from the Scroll of Chains, first of the Secret Histories of Praes

NerfContessa

Thought of that as well.

It's T00 awesome (in its literal meaning, a thing of too much awe) for guys like pilgrim to go along with it without trouble, not to even mention Saint...

burdi

and cat own larat's soul and body so if larat became a god and he get killed, cat will inherit the shard truly Dread Empress Traitorous

Andrew Mitchell

That would be really exciting if it happens but I don't think she wants that power. She likes being mortal and doesn't want to be shaped by a Role, especially not a Villainous one.

sengachi

I feel like this is a sentiment that would have Alucard from Hellsing Abridged screaming out his approval, and that really, really says something about where all this shit is going.

fbt

the chapter was amazeballs! but the comments..even more awesome! I laughed sooooo hard at so many of these. Great stuff folks! 😊 very very amused.

Silverking

Pilgrim: ...Catherine, I'm willing to entertain the idea that what you just said makes any degree of sense, let alone having any chance of working. There is even a small chance that I may be willing to go along with this plan, as it may be the least offensive option. But Gods Above, could you please stop SMILING at the thought of deicide?

Mental Mouse

"She's smiling... Mommy I'm scared!"

Liliet

I WILL HONESTLY ADMIT I DID NOT SEE THIS COMING

There were other people who did, though, and while I don't remember who said what, I would like to officially credit:

- the person who pointed out there were 5 Named present;
- the people who've been arguing it's the trap Tikoloshe and Wekesa were worried about (y'all were right and I was wrong)
- the people who were like but HOW does Kairos know about the fae bargain (caoimnh, this one goes to you);
- the people (person?) who'd asked where Ivah was;
- the people who said it was Hierarch: both you AND the people who said it was Dead King were right!

YALL ARE AWESOME AND I BOW BEFORE YOUR SUPERIOR MIGHT

(one bit of credit I'm stealing for myself: Evil Cannot Understand Good in Catherine proposing to kill Larat instead of claiming his power; though the more basic ploy was Catherine out-vicious-ing Kairos in a more classically villainous play, by selling him out to Neshamah. I love that she managed both)

Hear hear! (Or should that be "Hear here"?) Anyway, well said Liliet! 😊 ♥

Gunslinger

Great chapter, really like how all the twists came together. Also in retrospect I can't believe I missed the Dead King as a likely suspect of the scrying block. I keep thinking of his only weapons being the undead but he's The Original Sorcerer.

Not going to ignore Cat defending Akua The Legend's honor here. Best buds

SpeckofStardust

I know everyone else loved the whole "make a God and then use his bones as a highway" but this is the best part for me.

"I'm not clear on what exact measures you took, honestly, but I'm fairly sure they worked. Which is why I'm telling you that, while you launched your attacks here, I pre-emptively sold you out to Hidden Horror."

This followed by this.

{His face went blank at my words}

She effectively screwed him over better than everything else that happened this past 24 Hours and it was the easiest thing she did.

Liliet

I love that he actually didn't see that coming.

Catherine managed to be more Good and more vicious than he expected within a single scheme ♥

Euodiachloris

The place where pragmatic heroism and pragmatic villainy meet and share a pizza: screwing the other guys viciously over to help others... while getting what you want out of it, too. Also known as "saving the world using every dirty or clean trick that could work, because it's got my stuff in it and the look on your faces is just precious".

Liliet

Catherine is the Haley to Tariq's Roy in this party 😊

Kairos's the Belkar, he's even got an animal companion...

Euodiachloris

Hmmm... Cat's more like an unholy combination of Elan and V. With shoulder Blackwings/ puppet-gods, that slight tendency to cause incidental mass murder, unexpected plays and the genre savviness. While being the Heart.

Liliet

The dynamic is Roy/Haley. The uptight hero who knows what to do best, and the somewhat immoral/sociopathic antihero with heart of gold and knowledge/abilities that complement the leader's. Like the shell game thing.

Draconic

So... The Rogue Sorcerer is here. Where is Amadeus' soul? I doubt they would just drop it somewhere. And props to Tariq for lying about not knowing where he is. If he continues like this, he will reach his lifelong goal, and become a true villain. Not a great one, but at least a villain.

Insanenoodlyguy

I don't know that he was lying. He probably very intentionally had no idea where Rouge was at that moment. He probably even said "you go someplace random" to the man since he knew Cat was tricky. but, the thing with heroes is, they always return by the time they are really needed. He didn't know where RS was, but RS knew where he was, and then Arcadia started to crash and they needed to ride through it and oh look the Sorcerer is back, how convenient.

Liliet

I don't think he was lying. The Rogue Sorcerer popped up with the southern army which was random / providence guided. It's an oddly complicated proposition that Tariq set that up as opposed to it just arising organically.

Draconic

Oh yes he was. Well, it might not have been lying exactly, but what he said had nothing to do with the truth.

In ch 26 he claims that he sent the Rogue Sorcerer into hiding and doesn't know where he is. Princess Rozala was right there next to the Pilgrim. In this chapter (and earlier in When Iron Rests) we learn, that he sent a force to Arcadia. A force that includes both the Rogue Sorcerer and Princess Rozala.

If he sent the Sorcerer into hiding, there was absolutely no chance of him reappearing so soon. Especially since he was supposed to be hiding so that Amadeus' body can be executed safely. Unless his instructions about the length of that hiding were very specific. "Go hide somewhere for a day" specific. If he could call him back afterwards, then he knew where he was.

Let's not forget, Tariq set up both this fight against Catherine, and the last. And a long time ago at that. Since the Sorcerer is his contingency for this battle, he was not sending him anywhere without being certain that he would be back when needed.

Liliet

You uhhhh

appear to have missed

the part where Rogue Sorcerer joined the situation when the southern Levantine army came out of Arcadia? the previous morning?

Draconic

Might have missed that part. Doesn't change the fact, that what he did cannot be called going into hiding.

Liliet

I mean he had the entire province to wander without Pilgrim knowing where he was. Staying in one place was no more 'hiding' than walking around, and walking around made him less useless.

This is the hero version of staying in hiding: you can only be idle for so long before the story gets bored and drags you into some shit whether you like it or not.

Liliet

And Catherine specifically commented on "him appearing so soon": he came to the aid of the army when he was needed by ""wild coincidence"" which was also the same ""coincidence"" that led all the armies into meeting here.

Tariq did not set up a story that would keep Rogue Sorcerer and Black's soul out of Cat's grasp.

Goi

Like Cat said the force that came through Arcadia needed a magical guide so the Rogue Sorcerer showed up as the "povidence" of Above and it was also insured it would be said Sorcerer because he has something Cat wants aka Below always gets its due

Liliet

Tariq did NOT plan this fight. He had contingencies that he managed to employ, but this was not his design.

Mental Mouse

And half his contingencies were evaded or blocked by Cat, who has changed her powers drastically and her methods significantly, while Pilgrim kept up with the same old fight.

Andrew Mitchell

> If he sent the Sorcerer into hiding, there was absolutely no chance of him reappearing so soon.

I'm not sure how long had elapsed between the scene with the Bard and Black and the present day. IMO it's probably weeks, if not months. That's plenty of time for the RS to go into hiding with the soul and to later reappear when & where providence requires it.

Liliet

Mhm!

benthelynx

Again with the excellence. I was cackling.

Aotrs Commander

Ahahahahahaha!

Cat, welcome, truly, to the Evil side. That moment is a real rush, isn't it?

If I was Above and Below, I'd be pre-emptively using my pants and a latrine about now. She's done it before, she'll do it again, and you're on her hit list...

I'm amazing Kairos hasn't just swooned away.

(Maybe he just did after that last line. Hell, I nearly did...!)

beleester

Of all the ways that a "Princes' Graveyard" might happen, I wasn't expecting "killed to fuel a sorcerous ritual that creates a god." That isn't really Cat's usual style.

And she's made it seem like a clever turnabout on the Dead King rather than a villainous plot. She's good.

Andrew Mitchell

> I wasn't expecting "killed to fuel a sorcerous ritual that creates a god." That isn't really Cat's usual style.

Cat's just supplying the "seven crowns and one"; Larat's the one doing the creation of the new Fae court (and becoming a god in the process).

Fayhem

At this point I'm very close to 100% that the "graveyard" part of "Princes' Graveyard" is metaphorical rather than literal. Remember, the terms of her deal with Larat were that she lay seven crowns and one at his feet. No mention was made of actually killing their former owners, and if there's one consistent element to stories of fae bargains it's that precise wording matters.

Granted, just swiping the physical crowns off their heads almost certainly wouldn't carry enough metaphysical/story weight to work, otherwise it would be way too easy and there'd be like 15 Courts of Arcadia as every Prince or Duke of Arcadia with light fingers went shopping. But if the princes in question have formally relinquished ownership of said crowns, especially if it were of their own volition? Yeah, that could do it. I think Cat's pitch is "all y'all princes abdicate and willingly gift your crowns to make this happen", and given the percentage of those princes who are veterans of the war against the dead in the north (notably including Rozala, the new effective leader both militarily of the Proceran forces here and politically of what used to be Amadis' faction) I think they'll go for it in order to get back to that fight, with unexpected and demonstratedly powerful reinforcements no less.

Andrew Mitchell

I like your thinking. Just one remaining issue, I think. There has to be a good reason for the people talking about it afterwards, to call it a "graveyard". Why would they use that particular word in your scenario?

Snowfire1224

A metaphorical graveyard? I'm not myself convinced either way how things will go down, but Im eager to see

Fayhem

That's sort of what I meant by calling it a metaphorical graveyard. As I understand it, there's a tradition with those kind of feudal titles where the title is considered as an entity distinct from the person holding it. When Akua was talking about that kind of thing it wasn't really something distinct to Praesi so much as something that's semi-standard in feudal/hereditary titles that the Praesi just took to sociopathic extremes, as is their way (Cat wouldn't necessarily have recognized that, though – she was anything but raised among the nobility).

In other words: what I'm suggesting is that it's possible that even if, say, Rozala Malanza survives the night, if the title is lost then you could say that the Princess of Aquitan (sp?) has died, or that Rozala has died as the Princess but survived in her own person. Which is a rather metaphorical take on death used to give the battle a dramatic title (as all battles should have), which was what I was thinking of when I said I thought it might be a metaphorical graveyard. I can see where that wouldn't have been obvious to someone looking at it from outside of my head, though!

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for the more detailed explanation, I can see what you mean.

Liliet

Makes sense to me!

Draconic

"I feel same in assuming" -> feel safe

erebus42

So Cat is making herself a party. Kairos (chaotic evil Sorcerer? Warlock?), The Rogue Sorcer (Neutral Good wizard), The Saint of Swords (Insane/stupid good Paladan or Fighter), The Grey Pilgrim (Neutral Good Cleric), and herself; The Black Queen (Chaotic neutral/Neutral evilish Cleric). I'm sure this will all go swimmingly.

Fayhem

I think that to accurately represent this party we really need a z-axis on the alignment chart, labeled Practicality. So Saint of Swords is Wildly Impractical Chaotic Good ("burn it all for the greater good!"), Pilgrim is Practical Neutral Good ("I use the means that work to accomplish the ends that matter, not the means that make me happy"), and Cat is Ultra-Practical True Neutral ("hey, if it works it works"). We know hardly anything about Rogue Sorcerer so I'm not going to try to categorize him except he's presumably some flavor or another of Good, and Kairos is 1000% Chaotic Evil but really difficult to categorize on my new z-axis because he's Wildly Impractical but he's weaponized it so hard that it works for him, which is Practical...?

Snowfire1224

Maybe Kairos is neutral on the practical scale? So that'd be neutral chaotic evil.

Mental Mouse

Based on the original alignment definitions, SoS is neutral good in serious danger of an alignment failure. Pilgrim is Lawful Good (goes for control before any other goal, any evil that can't be controlled must be killed). Cat is Chaotic Evil in the proper sense, supporting individual freedom every chance she gets, but with the Evil aspect being a flag and toolchest rather than personal sadism. (She was recruited from Chaotic Neutral over the first couple of books or so.)

AIUI, the new versions of D&D fold the original grid onto its diagonal, making "chaotic evil" an extension of "evil", and "lawful good" an extension of "good". Of course, that kind of thinking is part of what the Practical Guide is meant to expose and send up.

Liliet

afaik 5e goes back to the 3x3 grid also, I've classified early Cat as Lawful Neutral...

Mental Mouse

How do you get Lawful? From the beginning she was building her own resources rather than depending on others (including fighting in those illegal pits), and not depending on nor liking the local hierarchy/legal system much. And her basic plan was to get into "the system" and covertly subvert it to her ends. Looks like Chaotic to me.

Liliet

Consider:

- when faced with a choice of rebelling against the system (hero) or working within the system, Catherine chose the latter. Oh she had logic backing it up, but there would have been logic backing up the first choice too if that was more to her liking;
- Catherine took to army discipline so immediately, she'd been able to identify Robber giving her an improper salute during their first meeting;
- when she first met Black, she got terrified, and her first thought was to go through what she's done to check if there was a reason for him to be after her, and she concluded she'd done nothing wrong. Other than the pits, but it's not like he'd care. She treated the system as one that actually works, in her logic, and one that she can rely on to protect her if she's innocent, at least tentatively. When faced with actual villains and Mazus-grade bullshit, that ain't a Chaotic's response;

- this came later but is honestly my favorite: when faced with the Winter problem, Catherine's solution was to impose inflexible rules on herself in the form of oaths. No Chaotic has ever considered imposing deliberately inflexible unbreakable rules on themselves a good precaution;
- right now, Catherine's long-term goal is literally regulation. She looked at the world around her, burning and bleeding, and said "you know how I can see fixing this? With more rules!" Again, this makes sense, but there are many possible solutions and it definitely takes a mindset predisposed towards Lawful already to stumble upon this one before any other you like enough to stick with.

Catherine has strong Chaotic tendencies, only growing moreso in Amadeus's tutelage, but her Lawful tendencies are stronger still. She's nearly Vimes-level Lawful.

Like... the solution to the world's problems she believed in at fifteen was making herself into police! How is this not the most Lawful teenager you ever heard of?

Liliet

As for your arguments more specifically:

- from the beginning she was relying on the idea of being accepted into War College and rising through the ranks from there, entirely relying on an existing system;
- what she wanted with the system was not "subverting" it but making it work more properly for its declared purpose, and of course not for "her own" goals but for a more well-oiled machine of the society;
- and as I've said, she was not choosing between "working with the system as is" and "changing the system", she was choosing between "smashing the system by force" and "trying to fix the system. The reason Catherine was not okay with the situation as it was, was not Chaotic – it was Good, and if anything Lawful – she considered Mazus to be horrifically incompetent before anything else.

Baby Catherine is fucking amazing, and rereading Chapter 1 and 2 is a trip. I highly recommend it!

Mental Mouse

I'll indeed need to reread those first two chapters, if only to check details. I will note that if she had taken the heroic route, Amadeus would have squashed her like all the others. The War College was her only choice, for precisely the same reason the American armed forces get so many recruits from the underclass(es) here – paths to advancement had been purposely limited, this was one of the few left to her.

Liliet

>I will note that if she had taken the heroic route, Amadeus would have squashed her like all the others

That's the likely prediction, yes, but note how it didn't stop other heroes. There's never a guarantee, and risk can be worth the payoff. It's not like Cat is not brave enough or not selfless enough – no, she just didn't consider it necessary enough. She thought the system as it was was fixable enough.

And yeah, please reread them, they're great ;u;

Mental Mouse

Except if Cat had been squashed there would have been no Guide...

Liliet

not sure how this is relevant to our discussion of whether she's Chaotic or Lawful 🤪

ninegardens

So... everyone's crowing about how clever Cat is (she is), but Cat, did you just screw over someone's entirely legit plan for messing up the dead king... so as to implement your own... except now, by the time you show up the Mayor of Keter is going to be EXPECTING you.

Seriously, he ain't stupid enough to believe you would WARN him about Kairos unless you already had a plan of screwing him over some other way.

Which means he's preparing for you, which means... this is going to be a very hard fight, that you may not win... and you just screwed over one of the few OTHER legit plans in the region.

... I get why she needed to do this, but it does seem a bit... bad.

matrixm

if you're talking about kairos' plan his one involved a large number of people in Iserre dying too.

Liliet

Kairos's plan included killing everyone else in Iserre.

And that's just the part Cat knew about / could guess.

Given her gambit inevitably maneuvered him into having to help with HER plan, I think all the heroes are standing there in silent approval.

"Normally we wouldn't advocate releasing anything to the Dead King... but those are some damn special circumstances"

Kissaten

If that was the case, why did he intervene after Cat surrendered her armies? I think he aimed for mindcontrol/ everyone (except League) having revolted victory here, as in mostly everyone is alive but rioting and the leaders are forced to the peace table. Hundreds of thousands of corpses will give Dead King too much control.

Liliet

He intervened to keep the clusterfuck going / keep people's attention away from the Hierarch scheme. Cat has said that explicitly.

Mental Mouse

Aside from the collateral damage of Kairos' plan, there's no real reason to think it would have killed the Dead King. It might well have "defeated" him. in frustrating his plan for the fragment, but you don't live a few thousand years and then get killed off by a couple of insane villains running a scheme by themselves. And of course, then you'd have Kairos and/or Heirarch running around with a RevoltWorld to Overthrow All The Rulers.

Jworks

It's probably been mentioned already, but is Cat trying to make a heroic band of 5? I remember at some point in the story Saint was talking to Pilgrim about how they would be "2 of the 5" and Tyrant makes a point to say "there are 6 of us" to which cat says "Hakram will stay behind". Could a heroic band work with 2 villains, or can any named create a band of 5?

C_B

The 5 man band thing definitely isn't just for Heroes – look at the Calamities and the Woe. I suspect a mixed band of Heroes and Villains is unusual, but Cat's whole thing is trying to convince people that the important struggle isn't "Good vs. Evil," it's "Apocalyptic Wars that Kill Lots of People vs. Not Doing That," so it makes sense that she's unusually willing to cross party lines, so to speak.

Liliet

Well, normally a heroic band only works with 1 Token Evil Member... which of course necessitates that Cat be merely a darker shade of antihero, ruthless but ultimately as aligned with greater good as the more straightforward heroes are.

This happens to be the actual truth, so it shouldn't be too hard to bend the story there 😊

edrey

i was thinking in two fae courts, there are crowns for that but let see what happens now also. where is archer? the extra chapter should be, right?

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting question. You may be right, or it may be another scene of what's happening in the main battle with the Dead King's forces, or something else entirely... We'll see soon enough.

Euodiachloris

Crickets don't get stabbed: they get flash-fried. Then served as a snack.

Mental Mouse

Hmph, that was supposed to be a reply to Daniel E.

Mental Mouse

It occurs to me that all sorts of things could go wrong with this plan, starting with god!Larat's objections to being murdered. Also that if previous trends(*) hold, we aren't even halfway through book V, so there's room for a lot of stuff to go wrong before the story wraps.

(*) Counting unnumbered chapters like interludes: Book I had 30 chapters, Book II had 62, Book III had 97, and Book IV had 108. So far, Book V has 45. Of course, this does not consider word counts, which I have no obvious way to get.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm actually expecting this next arc (crowns & one, new Fae court, Larat murdered, highway of bones) to be the last for Book V. Remember EE made a decision to split Book IV to create an extra book, which is what we are reading now.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but like I said it might not be so easy. Remember, the whole Everdark was fundamentally one arc.

I didn't know that about book IV, but I can easily believe that EE did the same math as me and decided that things were getting out of hand. 😊

They have roads.

They even have what are the local equivalent of Imperial Roman highways, probably at least some of them with a helping of magic used in their creation.

Sure, there are also a lot of relatively poor quality roads, but after Akua's Folly, Cat made a point of having the crucifixions placed every mile on the nearest paved roadway.

You know, it's been said too many times that teleportation is impossible to have been accident.

This whole story has been leading up to this, really, a world with no fast travel, then the main character gaining a form of it for a price, then the price becoming steeper, now they're going to make it free, leading to a future where teleportation happens a lot.

I mean, she pondered upon stealing lakes and mountains and selling them, imagine if she had that power at her disposal again, she could unite the continent and maybe make a deal with the gnomes to transport them anywhere they wanted faster than jet fuel can take them.

Personal pocket highway is useful.

Chapter 33: Concord

"Ambition without principle is greed, principle without ambition is mediocrity."

– Clodomir Merovins, ninth First Prince of Procer

"An empty throne, raised over a land of crossroads," the Grey Pilgrim said, voice wary.

As it should be, I thought. It was not trouble for the faint-hearted that I was proposing to seek. Larat, now huntsman but once a prince of the Winter Court, had in those days schemed to slip the leash holding the fae to Arcadia by binding himself to Creation instead. Seven and one, a pattern that'd echoed around Calernia long enough for it to have the proper form of binding, and behind it the weight of earthly crowns laid at his feet. It'd been a clever enough scheme but also a risky one, not that he'd had much of a choice. As the King of Winter and the Queen of Summer wed and their war abruptly ended, with it changed the landscape of Arcadia: a single court, and with it different stories that meant Larat was running out of time if he ever wanted to wiggle his way out. Desperate measures had seen him lead a ramshackle Wild Hunt – born of nothing, for Spring and Autumn had not come and might never again – to swear itself to my service, and so avoid entanglements in Arcadia. Doubly clever he had been, the once-prince, for it was to a court contained within my frame he had sworn himself and his fellows. Like fish in the sea, the fae had been content to keep swimming in that familiar power until I gathered the crowns I owed and completed Larat's scheme for him.

Then the Everdark happened and the power running through the veins of the fae had been ripped out, the reborn Night injected instead, and it had all begun to go awry.

At the moment, my Wild Hunt was not fundamentally all that different from Mighty. Oh their tricks and bodies were different – though I suspected that with time and the full settling of Winter within the Night, the Firstborn would begin taking one fae-like traits – but that was just the shape of their mould, so to speak. The material in those moulds was the same for Hunt and Mighty both, namely Night, which meant that Sve Noc could snuff them out at will. As the Sovereign of Moonless Night, I'd leaned on the oaths to get obedience from the fae because I did not have the know-how to use their connection to Winter as a leash. Given a few decades or a century I might have learned, but Larat would have been long rid of my service by then and so of this trouble as well. Sve Noc, though? They had built their apotheosis from scratch, and though the manner and nature of it had been nothing less than horror they had built it nonetheless. They could end the Hunt with a thought, and the fae had suspected that much from the moment they'd felt my surrender to the Sisters. And so they'd kept their oaths to myself and my subjects, even though they were no longer bound by them, for if they became an enemy I might be troubled to look into the practicalities of ending them. A shame for them, and for Larat, that I'd found out anyway.

"Gates, for the proper toll," I agreed. "Paths through a realm without the... risks of Arcadia, but similar peculiarities. The armies on this field could turn a march of months into weeks instead, and intervene north before the fronts collapse."

"And you would beget this through the murder of one in your service," Tariq said, not bothering to hide his distaste. "Could accord not be reached instead?"

There was a sound like someone choking down laughter, which served to inform me Kairos apparently knew a thing or two about the fae.

"That is not in his nature," I said. "And fae do not change. It is inevitable. Larat who was once the Prince of Nightfall will rise once more, ruler of a court of dusk, and turn on those that raised him. And when that happens-"

"- inevitability," the Grey Pilgrim echoed. "A band of five, like few this world had seen, to smother that infant god in the cradle."

The last words had his face going ashen, for some reason. I supposed the scope of what I'd suggested was beginning to sink in. In the interests of diplomacy, I refrained from mentioning I figured if any Choir was going to be in favour of infant-smothering it'd be Mercy. You didn't get to make a greater good without laying a foundation of lesser evils, and the greater the scale of that good so with the evils that were its bedrock.

"Tariq," the Saint hoarsely said. "You can't seriously be considering this."

She looked, I thought, like someone had upended her world.

"It sees to our every need," the Peregrine said, and turned rueful eye on me. "How neatly you have tied us with the strings of necessity."

I met his gaze unblinking.

"Should I apologize," I said, "for making this a victory for others than myself?"

He turned away at that. Both at what I'd said, and at what was implied: that'd he been so set on being my enemy I'd had to work against him to help him. Silence stretched for a tense moment.

"Black Queen," the Rogue Sorcerer said, politely inclining his head. "I have questions, if I may?"

Funny how they got all polite when they no longer had the upper hand. No, that was unfair of me. I was in no position to cast stones on the subject of civility. Beneath the swaying leather coat and the practical chain mail beneath, I could not help but notice that the Sorcerer was rather short. Still taller than me, I was forced to admit, but not by much. I'd had a glimpse of what he could do with the intricate casting rod he kept, and it'd been a notch in power and skill above what I'd seen out of any but the most powerful of Praesi warlocks. Fire-based, I'd vaguely remembered, but there must have been more to it than that: his unremarkable brown pupils were discreetly rimmed with colour, one scarlet red and the other verdant green. Akua had fought him while wearing me the once, but like me she'd failed to tease much out of him. Which meant most his tricks were still unknown, and all his aspects. Both Tariq and Kairos would shoot up as threats the moment they became members of our band of five instead of my spent opponents, Creation itself conspiring to make sure they were fit to participate in what followed, but like the Saint they were mostly known quantities.

I knew nothing of the Rogue Sorcerer, save that he'd repeatedly scrapped with adversaries seemingly his superior without ever taking a wound or revealing any of the dangerous tricks mages tended to hoard like magpies. That alone was enough to make him dangerous.

"Ask," I replied.

"You will need seven crowns, as the price," the hero said, his Lower Miezian smooth and accentless. "This I understand the logistics of."

The gaze he flicked at the seven Proceran royals and Adjutant visibly hanging behind us made his point clear.

"It is the one, however that interests me," he said. "Seven for weight, but the last to shape. It will be, in a sense, the most important aspect of what you propose."

"The one we'll bring with us into the deeps," I said. "To be bestowed only at the heart of it."

The Rogue Sorcerer's lips thinned, obviously not considering that to be much of an answer, but in a sense it'd not been him I was speaking to. Tariq and Kairos both cast glances at me: one wary, the other gleeful. Yeah, there were three of us who could still qualify for the 'one'. Kairos Theodosian was Tyrant of Helike by Name, but king of the same by title. Tariq was, in the eyes of many of his countrymen, the rightful ruler of Levant. And I had more than a few titles to throw around, these days, but the one that mattered most was Queen of Callow.

"As you say," the hero murmured. "On the subject of roads and tolls-"

"It won't be like Arcadia," I admitted. "That is beyond my remit. It'll take more than a powerful caster with the right tools to access it. We'll have to raise gates in Creation, and bind them to the realm. After that, though, journey, should be seamless when the tolls are paid."

"And the nature of said tolls?" the Sorcerer pressed.

"Blood," the Pilgrim quietly said. "Isn't it?"

It was Akua's best guess, yes, and the Sisters were being ambiguous in their answers but implying that might be the case.

"Freely given," I clarified. "One cut to enter, the other to leave. A sliver of life to sustain the crossroads realm."

"And anybody could pass the gate," the Rogue Sorcerer. "But very few would know how to build one."

I smiled, and did not answer. The Sorcerer might be able to figure it out, I knew, especially if he was at hand when the realm was born. But aside from him? Maybe five people would have the know-how in all of Calernia, and most of them answered to me to some degree.

"We should kill her now," the Saint of Swords calmly said.

My fingers tightened around my staff, but beyond that I gave no visible reaction. I glanced at Tariq and raised an eyebrow, silently letting him know that Laurence of Montfort was his fucking problem at the moment but that if she became mine he wouldn't like what followed.

"I understand your worries, Saint-" the Rogue Sorcerer began.

"No, you don't," she bluntly said. "Because you're barely even thirty, and you still think because she compromises once or twice it changes what she is. It doesn't."

"I would not swear truce with her beyond the Dead King's end," the Rogue Sorcerer replied, tone touched with strained patience, "but to refuse an arrangement right now would be worse than a sin, it would be a mistake."

"Do you know who the most dangerous villain I've ever faces was, boy?" Laurence de Montfort casually said. "There's a few people would consider the obvious contenders. I fought the first Horned Lord to wake in five centuries to a draw. I crawled in my own blood after a bout with the Lady of the Lake and put down the Drake Knight after his mind went. All of those would have butchered their way through half a legion of soldiers without batting an eye, all were monsters at the peak of their mastery. But the most dangerous villain I ever faced was my first: an alchemist so sickly he could barely hold a sword."

She was arguing for my death, I was well aware, but this was still rather interesting so she had my full attention for more than one reason. The Jacks hadn't put together nearly as much as I would have liked on the Saint, which only made sense if she'd spent most of her years wandering around Calernia as a cantankerous armed vagrant.

"I caught him early," the Saint idly said. "People were going missing, and I looked into it – bandits and criminals, as it turned out, but he was still keeping them in cells and using them for bloody research. Yet it was for antidotes, for ways to end plagues and heal the worst of injuries. He was just the Salutory Alchemist, I thought, and so young. Not some hard-eyed vulture, and his Damnation looked like it was half an accident. Bad methods, but good ends. So I slapped him around some, made him pass his prisoners to the closest city's gaol and told him he could use animals but not people. Then I let him off with a warning."

Slowly, the Saint of Swords unsheathed her blade. She tapped it against her shoulder, striding around the Sorcerer but her eyes remaining on the Pilgrim the whole time.

"Gods, but the boy was brilliant," she said. "Five years later and keeping to the rules, he distilled an essence of life – a potion that kept people alive past their time. When the secant pox hit Valencis he moved there to cure it, and stayed after. I thought, maybe it didn't have to be a war all the time. That in some places, sometimes, we could have peace. Make exceptions."

"Salutary," the Rogue Sorcerer slowly said. "The word can mean beneficial, but the older meaning is health-giving."

"Aye," Laurence de Montfort grinned, old yellow teeth bared. "And give them health he did. Let them live past their time. Except he was the only one with the recipe. And it only bought them a few months at a time."

I almost let out an impressed whistle, seeing where she was headed with this.

"The prince was old, and so he was owned," the Saint derisively said. "And with every passing year someone else was in his debt that was old but also rich and powerful. Or sick in a way priests can't see to, or wanting to look young or a hundred other paltry fucking things that could be fixed with the right brew. I heard nothing about the people who'd started to go missing again, in Valencis, until I ran into one getting grabbed by the fucking city guard. And when I asked questions they all covered for him, all closed ranks, because he'd gotten his claws in them and what were a few dead nobodies for his research when that research was so useful?"

In Procer, I remembered, they knew the Saint of Swords as the Regicide. For her very public slaying of the Prince of Valencis, many years ago.

"He was a helpful lad, the Salutary Alchemist," Laurence de Montfort softly said. "Helped with his tonics and philters, when the going got rough for Chosen, never swung at blade at anybody in his life. And if I'd left him to it another decade, he would have owned half of Procer without anyone being the wiser."

The Saint of Swords pointed her blade at me.

"There can be," she slowly enunciated, "no truce with the Enemy. Not even when they are reasonable, helpful – especially then, because if you let the rot take even a moment then you will always have to amputate the limb."

The Tyrant of Helike, never one to let an occasion to be a shit pass him by, enthusiastically clapped at the end of her tirade and called for an encore. I glanced at the other heroes. The Rogue Sorcerer's face had gone blank, which to me reeked of hesitation. It made sense, didn't it? Because to me Laurence was a zealous old biddy who regularly tried to kill me and my friends, but to the heroes she was the prickly, unpleasant grandmother they didn't want but always stepped in when they were in trouble. And sure, she thought with her sword, but most of the time that kind of simplicity paid off for heroes. It lent them strength, got them through the worst villains brought to bear against them and if the Light was anything like the Night then conviction had a lot to do with how well you could use it. The Grey Pilgrim was the one that mattered, though, because where the Saint was respected the Peregrine was trusted. And even when he wasn't, well, if he made a decision then the rest of the Grand Alliance couldn't really break it without breaking itself given his pull in the Dominion. And I wasn't sure Laurence would give a damn about that, given who she was, but I suspected the Rogue Sorcerer was a different story entirely.

And the Pilgrim slowly shook his head.

"I will not break the world that is to spare the world that could be," the Peregrine said.

"Tariq, how many of these 'turnabouts' have you seen over the years?" the Saint hissed. "How many Damned made their apologies, swore they'd never meant to hurt anyone, said that they would help you keep the peace instead."

"Dozens," the Pilgrim said.

"And how many kept their word?"

"None," the old man tiredly said.

"And still you want to make bargain with her? The battle's not done, Tariq. It'll get ugly, true enough, and thousands will die. Likely one of us too. But we can still win, and though we'll be a ruin after we'll be a ruin that can recover," the Saint harshly asked. "But if we compromise, here and now? There'll never be any recovering from that. The taint will be in the cause until it runs its course. So why?"

"Because we are not animals," Tariq softly replied. "Because we do not shy from compromise simply because it has burned us before. Because if we are willing to break armies for a point of theological purity, then that it is us that deserves the breaking. But most of all, Laurence?"

His eyes were bright as he turned to her, but there was no warmth to them. Only a cold, patient light like the distant radiance of a star.

"Because I will not brook unnecessary suffering," the Grey Pilgrim said.

The two heroes stared each other down, tension mounting with the silence. The Saint had not sheathed her blade, and though the Peregrine bore no weapon to unsheathe in turn that hardly meant he was unarmed.

"Boo," the Tyrant called out. "Booo. Just terrible. Bring back the other act."

"If we bend, we will break," Laurence de Montfort said.

I breathed out slowly, and though I did not begin to call on Night – that would have drawn attention to me, painted me as the aggressor – I shaped the working in my mind. It would have worked better in Arcadia, but if the Saint turned on me here there'd be no choice but to resort to it in Creation.

"If you still believe that, by morning light, then we will put it to judgement," Tariq said.

The old woman's jaw tightened in displeasure, but after a moment she gave a tight nod. She eyed me, spat down in the snow, but then sheathed her blade.

"Lovely," I drawled. "What a treat you are, Laurence. Shall I take that as agreement on your end, Pilgrim?"

The Rogue Sorcerer glanced at Tariq, who nodded. The other man sighed but did not argue.

"Bargain is struck, Black Queen," the Grey Pilgrim said.

"Bargain is struck," I acknowledged, dipping my head.

"That's nice," Kairos said. "But here's something none of you have considered."

The Tyrant of Helike caught the scepter he'd idly been flipping all this time, and blindly pointed it over his shoulder. Gems incrustated in it began glowing, and an intense beam of fire shot out – before I could so much as move, it burned a hole straight through Rozala Malanza's forehead.

"Should have sold the villain on the deicide first," the Tyrant chided me.

I didn't reply, simply raising an eyebrow, and only then did Kairos's red eye narrow and he turned to look back over his throne. Where 'Rozala Malanza' had dissolved into shadows.

"Ah, the drow," Kairos mused. "Is there even a single one of them left?"

"What kind of a second-rater do you take me for?" I asked.

Adjutant should be in the my army's camp right about now, safely escorted there by the Losara Sigil after my Lord of Silent Steps spirited him away and left behind illusion. As for the royals, though, I had other intentions.

"I suppose we should discuss terms, then," the Tyrant cheerfully said.

"Pilgrim?" I asked.

"I will listen," the old man said, promising nothing.

"Best you're going to get," I told the odd-eyed king.

"It's all I need," Kairos Theodosian grinned. "Now, as you all know, I am an ardent proponent of peace."

I was reluctantly impressed by how confidently he stated what everyone else here knew to be an outright lie.

"This entire little tiff has been nothing but a misunderstanding, I'm certain," the Tyrant idly continued. "As such, a peace conference would be in all our best interests."

That part I'd known he wanted for months now. But now he'd lay out what it was he wanted along with the rest of us at the same table, and that I remained deeply worried about.

"But," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Speak up, Theodosian."

"It seems that an agent currently in the employ of the First Prince of Procer has committed heavy crimes while in the lands of the League of Free Cities," Kairos smiled. "A complaint was lodged with the Hierarch, who now requires that criminal to stand trial before peace can be discussed."

My eyes narrowed. No mention of whatever it was Cordelia was dredging out of Lake Artoise? Had that been a red herring, or was this?

"A name," the Peregrine said.

"I believe he goes by Hanno of Arwad," Kairos said.

"The White Knight," the Rogue Sorcerer said in disbelief. "You want to put to trial the chosen of the-"

The Grey Pilgrim raised his hand.

"And if this request is granted, the League of Free Cities will observe a truce until both the trial and the peace conference are at an end?" he asked.

"Of course," Kairos said. "I am, after all, a man of timid and tender disposition. If not for our beloved Hierarch's indignation at such brazen offences, this war would never have-"

"For an objection to be lodged with the Hierarch himself, the ruler or representative of one of the member-cities of the League has to do it," I interrupted. "In this case, who did it?"

"I believe it might have been the representative from Helike," the Tyrant mused. "What an unlikely coincidence."

So, Kairos' play was centered around using the Hierarch against the White Knight then. That gave me something to work with when it came to thwarting him, though I couldn't do it from here or tonight.

"I am willing to accept that condition," the Grey Pilgrim said, "on behalf of the Grand Alliance."

"Oh?" the Tyrant said. "Yet the head of this crusade is Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach. Can you truly speak on her behalf?"

"In this instance I will," Tariq said. "He would come regardless, Theodosian."

"That's reassuring to hear," Kairos affably replied. "Yet it has been brought to my attention you've this nasty habit of breaking oaths, Pilgrim. I will require a guarantor. Now, Catherine, I do remember you promising me in writing that-"

"I lied," I told him without missing a beat. "You know, while positioning you to overextend in battle and selling you out to the Dead King."

"That was most unkind of you," he agreed. "Yet we are, I believe, allies."

"Of course," I lied.

"Then I will require you to be guarantor of our greying friend's oath," the Tyrant of Helike said, odd-eyed gaze grown cool. "And to kill him personally, should he break it."

"That's all?" I frowned.

I didn't like making empty promises, but this little bastard had been puppeteering half the armies of Calernia into killing each other while the damned Dead King was invading up north for the better part of a year. When we had shared interests, as in against the Wandering Bard, I did not mind working together. Otherwise he was at best a potential threat and more likely an outright enemy. Hells, the Peregrine had tried to kill me a few time and I still considered him to be more of an ally.

"That oath, and yours as guarantor, will have to be taken before every one of importance in all three armies on this field," the Tyrant casually added. "Proper ceremony and all that."

Ah, and there we were. Like I'd turned the screws on Razin Tanja a while back, he wanted me to give my word in front of enough people it'd seriously damage my reputation if I broke it afterwards. Of course, killing the Grey Pilgrim regardless of circumstances would sunder the Grand Alliance and most likely sink the Liesse Accords. But if I made and broke an oath before the same people I'd then need to convince to sign those same Accords, I was taking a torch to the worth of my word for those I most needed to believe in it. He truly was a vicious little prick, wasn't he? I glanced at Tariq, who met my gaze and slowly nodded. He'd realize the trouble inherent to breaking his own word, I thought, but would that stop him if he thought it was necessary to do it? Probably not. But this needs a foundation of trust to work, I thought. And he'd extended it first, even if I had to twist his arm to get there.

"Agreed," I said.

"Then we are all friends once more," the Tyrant of Helike said. "And I believe there was some talk of crowns. Shall you have them sent for, Catherine?"

"There's no need," I said. "Ivah?"

The illusory curtain of shadows went down, and seven princes and princesses of Procer were revealed to be standing wide-eyed a mere twenty feet to our side. They had, after all, heard the entire conversation from start to finish.

Danus

Wow, I wonder how the royalty will take Saint's shit-talking.

Liliet

I mean she has the nickname Regicide. I think they'll be pleasantly surprised that she actually had a reason for doing what she did.

antoninjohn

Well it looks like Cat is going to end up killing the Pilgrim after all

konstantinvoncarstein

Why? He at last acknowledge that she was willing to help him. And if she killed the Pilgrim, Levant would never accept the Liesse Accords.

erebus42

I think they mean that Kairos is gonna manipulate things so that Cat has no choice but to kill him or risk forswearing herself

badluckcat

"Alas, though I gave oath to kill the Grey Pilgrim if he broke his own oath I am, instead, going to betray the Tyrant, whose plan could very well have seen the Gods(capital G) blow half of Calernia to smithereens. Truly I am a paragon of deceitful betrayal."

byzantine279

Yep. She needs to go Traitorous on that one. Most people will understand.

erebus42

The only problem with that is she needs her word to mean something if she wants the Accords to get off the ground.

Liliet

It would be less of a problem if everyone present for the oath-giving is willing to trust her intentions over her word, and is therefore willing to assure everyone else that no, we were there, we witnessed, she's trustworthy!

Catherine's building up a potent story here, even if she hasn't noticed it herself yet.

TheZorginator1

We just went through a chapter explaining that breaking an oath means the other person has an edge when fighting you.

Fayhem

Kairos is quite possibly going to try. But given how thoroughly Catherine played him tonight I'm comfortable putting the emphasis on the last word in that sentence. And it's also quite possible that he really does want the Hierarch to put Hanno on trial; I'm guessing he may be intending to establish in said trial that Hanno delegates all his judgments to the Choir of said, and use that as his opening to indict the Choir itself. Pretty sure Kairos would value that more highly than merely killing the Peregrine or fucking with Catherine; any asshole can kill a hero or dick around their allies, but how many villains get to put an entire angelic Choir on trial?

Mental Mouse

And Catherine might well be onboard with that plan. (Though she might wish it was an angel of Contrition instead. 😊)

antoninjohn

Pilgrim keeping an oath, like that is ever going to happen

Decius

No, Levant will never accept the Liesse Accords if the Pilgrim is dead. Plus the trial will take a very long time to complete, and being a hero Hanno will find some way to subvert it and be found innocent.

Or else Pilgrim will sell out a hero to avoid unnecessary suffering.

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't think Kairos would have asked to judge Hanno if it was so easy for him to escape. Hierarch is an outside context problem, capable of scarring goddesses. Said goddesses in the same league as an Angelic Choir.

Cicero

True, but I suspect that the heroes will underestimate the Hierarch.

Really only Cat, Kairos, and the Bard have seen him up close enough to understand his power.

So the only way Hanno fails to appear for his trial is if the Bard convinces him that the Hierarch is too powerful.

sengachi

Yeah. I suspect this whole thing would be a Trial, capital T, for Hanno, but ultimately a guaranteed win for him. If this were a classic villain gambit. Which to the Pilgrim is what I'm sure this must look like. But what we know, and what Kairos knows, is that the Heirarch is no mere villain. He's something else, something made of an unwavering mad faith that might even eclipse the White Knight's. And that, I think, might actually threaten the White Knight and his Choir.

Rook

I don't think the verdict, or Hanno for that matter, is actually going to be important as far as the trial goes. He's all about mortal judgements being flawed and unworthy, so realistically it's going to be a metaphysical brawl between the choir of Judgment and the Hierarch. The key there at the end of the day will be which of those two supercedes the other in making the judgement, rather than whatever actually happens to Hanno as a result.

medailyfun

I believe Tariq decided the White Knight would need to visit the League anyway to deal some Justice

Faiir

Yea!
It's time for Justice, League!

Liliet

I love you.

NerfContessa

Perfect pun.

Nough said.

Sethur

Well, either Cat or Kairos or Tariq will become the one in "seven crowns and one" laid at Larat's feet. Whoever will get the short end of the stick is likely to die and each death would somehow or other void the oath that was Just taken.

konstantinvoncarstein

Tariq would be the less bad outcome. The “and one” crown will shape the new highway. We have the choice between Catherine (the protagonist), Kairos (an old-school/mad/“playful” villain) or Tariq (a well-intentioned extremist hero).

Liliet

Where is Tariq an extremist? He is, if anything, the most conservative moderate you get around here. Amadeus is a Well-Intentioned Extremist, Tariq is the natural enemy of such. (Including his own nephew)

konstantinvoncarstein

He would do anything to stop evil, from breaking his word to wiping out an entire village full of civilians.

Liliet

Gasp! BREAKING HIS WORD! What a horrifying crime that is... Truly, he is an extremist!

As for the village, that was horrifying, but nothing beyond the kind of decision military leaders make routinely. It was the hands-on nature of it that made it look differently, but... Is Cordelia an extremist for ordering Iserre (a big city, not a village!) put to torch in order to trap Amadeus in it? Because if everyone's an extremist, I'm questioning your definitions.

erebus42

Murdering civilians for the greater good is an extremist action. I'm not claiming I would or wouldn't have done the same but it's still a monstrous act. Oathbreaking may seem like a relative misdemeanor but it shows that one is not dependable and can't be trusted enough to work with as at any moment they may decide to turn on you. Tariq has always been arrogant and a touch sanctimonious-thinking he knows better than everyone else. He has of course gotten better as he at least is willing to compromise and work with Cat but only after she left no other option open. While he is obviously better than the saint (who sometimes feels like she's just there to make Tariq look better in comparison) he still suffers from the same blinders as her- namely that as a “Hero” his crimes are somehow lesser or not as relevant as those around him. Even if you are trying to help in the long run you don't get to commit heinous acts and still claim to be a hero afterward. The Pilgrim while admittedly partly the product of his skewed universe is still is very much the extremist.

Liliet

>Even if you are trying to help in the long run you don't get to commit heinous acts and still claim to be a hero afterward.

So how do you think he should have acted against Amadeus?

erebus42

I don't know, there may have been a better way but that's always easier to say when you're not the one who has to find it. Like I said, I don't know if I would have done much differently from the Pilgrim in his situation. I just would have the good grace not to act so self righteous about it. Really I mainly just have a problem with anyone thinking of themselves as the "good guy" and using that to justify their actions.

Liliet

Where does Tariq do that?

He only ever justifies his actions with their foreseeable consequences.

NerfGlastigUaine

Agree with everything except that the Pilgrim has "gotten better". As someone from a previous chapter pointed out, Pilgrim's character hasn't changed – he's still the same old ruthless extremist, it's just that this time, as you put it, Cat didn't leave any other choice. Pilgrim always works for the greater good, it's only his options that change. Similar to how Amadeus never changed, but his options changed at Liesse and broke his relationship with Cat.

Also to note here is that extremist doesn't always mean bad or wrong, just going further than most would. Cat for instance, had been diving down that extremist slope until the end of Book 4, tho she seems to have come back up now. She does however admit that she'd go full extremist, Triumphant 2.0 even, if she felt she needed to save Callow.

Basically, no hero or villain worth their salt will stop at half measures.

Mental Mouse

The one option that Pilgrim never seems to consider until it's forced on him, is to back down. Cat, like Amadeus before her, does reject plans outright for excessive collateral damage.

Liliet

The difference is that limiting collateral damage is what Tariq's plans BOIL DOWN TO, always. And he did reject the redeem-Cat plan when it appeared to be no longer functional)=

Mental Mouse

Hmm. I'm told that other countries have a saying about America: "America will do the right thing, when all other options have been exhausted". That's what Pilgrim reminds me of.

Basically, he gets no points from me for bowing to the inevitable, after it's rubbed in his face that He and Saint are not actually in charge here, and that Cat in particular has leveled up again, and is now running rings around him.

KageLupus

The lying thing is actually a pretty big deal. He didn't just lie, he broke the terms of an international agreement. Doing so proves that the Grey Pilgrim will not abide by mortal contracts if he feels there is a need to break them, which essentially makes it impossible to trust him.

He also speaks for an entire country, and that country is a member of the Grand Alliance. So making a deal with the Grand Alliance is shaky because you can't guarantee that one of it's member states won't break terms because the unofficial leader decided it was necessary.

None of that actually makes Tariq an extremist, but it also shouldn't be downplayed as just a lie. His words and actions caused international strife and could be said to have lead to thousands dying in a pointless battle later, because the two sides couldn't trust each other.

Liliet

He does not FORMALLY speak for an entire country. They just listen to every word he says, but technically he doesn't speak for them :3

That makes a large difference specifically where international agreements like that are concerned. He broke his word, not Levant's.

And Tariq having broken his word there msot definitely saved more people than it killed, considering what Amadeus had been busy with.

konstantinvoncarstein

Extremist was maybe a little too strong, but he nonetheless did pretty horrible things

Liliet

War is hell.

caoimhinh

Nah, Extremist is the correct term. Tariq is undoubtedly and undeniably a well-intentioned extremist. Every single one of his "lesser evils for the greater good" confirms it.

Liliet

I can sort of see it from a certain point of view... he IS a mirror to Amadeus

luminiousblu

Breaking your word given freely was considered essentially the single highest crime you could actually do for the longest time across most societies on the planet for a reason. Even crimes like patricide, regicide, infidelity, and refusing hospitality were really variants on this because the concept was that these crimes broke implicit oaths.

You couldn't refuse someone hospitality because the idea was that literally every single traveller and man who owned a house had an implicit agreement that when one is in need of a safe night to rest, he will be provided one and that in turn he will be ready to provide one when requested and also not overstay his welcome.

Patricide and regicide both broke implicit bonds of loyalty. You can't kill your king because in theory you are sworn to your king, even if you never explicit took the oath. Your father raised you and if you kill him you break the implicit oath that his goodwill will be returned.

Infidelity is breaking the oath of marriage. Depending on the actual customs of the culture, it might not be a big deal or it might be totally unforgivable if it comes to light.

Oathbreaking is a betrayal of trust on the highest order. There is literally nothing worse. This is why Thorin has to die when he goes back on his word given freely and why Kriemhild was considered a villain by the end of the Nibelungen even though it was she who got wronged. Swearing by oath was a big fucking deal back in the day, and it's a big deal today although in a different form. After all, trust is the single most valuable commodity a company can have.

Someguy

Kinslaying?

Liliet

Makes sense.

Still not what I understand the word "extremist" to mean 0.0

Mental Mouse

As I've said before, Tariq is also primed for a Heroic Sacrifice: (1) old, with hints that his next Shine might well kill him, and (2) in bad odor with the Narrative, thanks to broken oaths.

The question is whether that can be worked into the Fae Crowning. BTW, Saint is in a similar situation, but she doesn't have a crown for the "and one". She might have already paid for her trucebreaking by getting smacked around by the Drow, or might still have some pain coming. She also has a possible throw-down with Pilgrim in her future, but might avoid that.

Liliet

Randomly rereading this chapter's comments is DELICIOUS, and that's all I'll say here to avoid Spoilers From The Future for comment-reading archive readers.

Just, dang. So much fun.

Mental Mouse

This is why I was leaving all those “heh heh heh” comments on my recent reread.

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

Liliet

I think the point of the whole arrangement is that giving over the crown \neq dying.

And Catherine was already planning to abdicate...

Decius

Catherine could also annex the fae realm into Callow and make Larat the prince of it; that would certainly count as ‘and one (crown)’ and would also have the effect of making it sworn to Callow.

Liliet

I think you’re getting confused on cause-effect here. Larat needs to get the seven crowns and one in order to claim the realm.

Cicero

Unless Cat plans to abdicate.

She’s the only one that might value the product above her crown.

Liliet

Frankly she’s already attaching the negative value to her crown. She WANTS to abdicate, it’s only a question of timing.

Morgenstern

As if anyone in the Grand Alliance would truly fault her for not killing the Pilgrim and NOT making him uphold an oath to a villain that would damn another Chosen to die a stupid death. Remember, such oaths to Villains need not be upheld. Why the hell should Cat as the guarantor of the fucking Pilgrim uphold the same? Imho, that’s just bullshit “logic” conjuring up a fear that has no basis, not even with all the bullshit Heroes and Alliance did so far, because circumstances. This time, I really don’t see why Cat thinks it would damage her reputation to no uphold an “oath” to a Villain – and AID the Pilgrim...

Liliet

Kairos might not be as aware as he thinks he is of Callow's internal politics 😊

Mental Mouse

Because there are narrative consequences to oathbreaking even if it's just among Evils. Cat is walking a knife-edge of "officially-a-villain but not really", and this is part of the oaths binding the party together for their mission. If she breaks this, she goes back to "just another villain, and this one's dangerous". Notice how Kairos exploited Pilgrim's broken oaths to rope in Cat here?

And this oath isn't just between two villains (like the letter which was a lie), it involves several Heroes and it is specifically to be publicized to all four powers (League, Levant, Procer, Callow), including the specific people Catherine will need to deal with in future (or with their heirs). Fortunately, Pilgrim seems amenable to the White Knight facing Heirarch – not quite "bring it on", but perhaps not as concerned as he should be. That last bit said, if the party finds itself confronting Hierarch. this oath might provide a plot-path for WK to show up as "the cavalry".

Liliet

I think the key detail here is that Catherine looks to Tariq for confirmation there. She is not acting as an independent agent here, she's with him, and any oathbreaking she does will be the same as his oathbreaking. And I don't think he'd break an oath unless there was a sufficient heroic reason to do so, nor ask Cat to break hers.

Catherine is making a leap of faith – that Tariq won't screw her on this. I AM SURE HOPING FOR THAT

Mental Mouse

Well, it's not completely a leap of faith, so much as "knowing that he knows" he's on thin ice, and it's his own damned fault. The most treacherous villain around not only called out the Pilgrim as untrustworthy, but made it stick! That's gotta hurt, but the worst part is, it can still get worse. That's what's holding him to his word.

Liliet

Pilgrim can screw Cat over on this and put her in a very bad position, or he can take her situation into account and situate everything so that whatever choice he makes it won't backfire on her.

Narratively being his guarantor means she trusts him and it's his responsibility to manage that.

Cicero

It also means that Cat has trusted Tariq once again, and now has to choose if he will betray her again or not.

Liliet

y e s

Mental Mouse

Except that if he screws Cat over, he puts her in a bad position in-story, but his own narrative position becomes disastrous. And frankly, I suspect everyone wants to see this fight. The heroes are confident that their guy will win, the villains are hoping that a hero and/or an angel gets called to judgement for once.

Liliet

Mhm! That's pretty much why Catherine can trust him on this 😊

erebus42

One as has been said there's the narrative consequences of the betrayal. Two, they already don't trust Cat and that would give them a precedent to point to for why they can't trust her—"she's a villainous oathbreaker why should we trust her! What happens when she gets a better offer?!". For several of them—especially the Levantines—honor is way more important for them than it is for us modern readers. She needs her word to mean something if she wants to get the Accords off the ground.

danh3107

Hah, making sure the princes all hear the terms of the agreement leaves less wiggle room for everyone. Maybe not Tyrant but hey, no play is really perfect.

Oshi

Tyrant has no wiggle room at all. No one believes him so his word means nothing. he can do anything but it also means no one will give a shit about anything done to him, Nicely played Cat.

Heirarch judgy powers versus the Choir of Judgement? That's something I'd like to see. From a safe distance.

I realized something the other day when I was starting a reread, Cordelia was told by Augur the "the Tyrant seeks to end Procer". She, not unreasonably, assumed that meant Malicia ... but what if it's actually supposed to be warning about Kairos?

Also, something else occurred to me recently – if Tariq really believes that Cat is a story of retribution against Calernia for what Callow had been forced to go through ... at what point does doubling down on throwing Callow under the bus/wagon for the benefit of others (aka, the actions drawing retribution) possibly become a good idea?

taovkool

Was there even a safe distance when those two absolute types of judgements gets involved?

konstantinvoncarstein

Another continent, hopefully 😊

Javvies

At least 50 miles, probably.

Given there's the precedent of the Hashmallin mindfucking everyone within 49 miles of their appearance.

And behind cover.

Assuming this doesn't draw enough attention that Above and/or Below get directly involved. Then, I'd like to be the next universe over.

Mental Mouse

I thought that was kind of the point, kinda. The question is, are the angels actually equivalent to Above? Because the demons don't act much like Gods Below. They act more like the expression of individual power, rather than beings intent on encouraging it in others. And they don't seem smart enough to be actively manipulating events. I think it's likely that both angels and demons/devils are themselves intermediary agents of the true Gods, representing investments by the "teams": Above goes for sponsoring miracles and guidance, while Below provides powerful but hazardous minions/weapons for those who dare grasp them. Both grant powers to Named, though.

Mental Mouse

Or rather, Above and Below set up a common framework for Named to get powers. It's worth considering whether Above or Below actually can withdraw powers once given, or if only offenses against the Narrative can damage Name powers (per Cat's early difficulties).

Liliet

That's very much the impression I'm getting.

Mental Mouse

Well, DK will probably be watching from a nearby universe, over in Keter.

Luminant Azurefyre

That last part is a good point I hadn't really noticed. Then again, we all know Tariq's a hypocrite. It's practically his defining feature at this point. He's smart, but often fails to see how what he's doing is completely unreasonable from perspectives other than his own and take that into account. That trend has repeatedly shot him in the foot over the course of his conflict with Cat.

taovkool

Better a hypocrite like Tariq than a fundamentalist like Laurence.

I mean, everyone in this series – and real life, let's be honest – has a shred of hypocrisy in their views but the kind of absolutist thought like what Laurence has is the same kind that burned down Liesse, and she chose Procer as a pyre, so fuck that bitch.

Evgeny Permyakov

Tariq is no less of a fundamentalist than Laurence. He is simply more flexible in his methods, but not in his goals.

konstantinvoncarstein

His goals are to minimize suffering and protect the innocents, of course he is inflexible.

Liliet

This.

Morality is not that relative, people.

Javvies

Not exactly.

His goal is to minimize what he perceives to be unnecessary suffering and what he perceives to be unnecessary harm to those he considers innocents or otherwise worthy of his protection. But if he thinks it's necessary? He'll burn down the orphanage after crucifying half of them to outside of the doors, so the ones inside can't get the doors open. And then call you a Villain for trying to put out the fire and save the orphans inside. And do his best to stop you.

The problem is ... while Cat called him a long term perspective type hero ... Tariq really doesn't think about or take into consideration how other people view and react to his actions and the consequences of those actions.

He, mostly, has been shown to look only one or two moves ahead of the one right on front of him. To be fair, that's further ahead than the average person, or even the average Named (Hero or Villain).

konstantinvoncarstein

He does not want to limit unnecessary suffering, he want to limit suffering in general. He committed atrocities, but it was to stop other horrible things to happen.

Javvies

No, he's all about stopping what he believes is unnecessary suffering. If he thinks your suffering is necessary for whatever reason and/or to whatever ends he seeks, then you're screwed. So incredibly screwed.

He himself said – on the very chapter – “I will not brook unnecessary suffering.”

He's

Liliet

He wants to stop all suffering, but he's aware that it's not physically possible. So he separates the suffering he can stop and defines that as 'unnecessary'.

NerfGlastigUaine

This. People are so caught up by the "unnecessary" part of Tariq's goal, that they fail to realize everyone in this verse believes that some suffering is necessary or unavoidable so that others won't suffer. I had an entire rant about it in his first extra chapter.

shieldredblog

People keep viewing the Pilgrims morals through the lens of someone in our world. No, sorry.

He has no respect for human life or what it means to be human. While he hates suffering, he assigns no value to human life itself. He even mused that one time about how the Lantern philosophy that life not in service to Above has no meaning or value is true.

Perfect Gods that literally created you live in the sky and when they tell you to murder a village or commit genocide like some Levantines wanted, you follow that command because you are a dirty worthless mortal whose life is meaningless anyway. You will never have a fraction of their wisdom or power so obedience is the only virtue. The day that Good wins and ends the worlds is the only thing that matters.

This is shown when he saves the lives of useful soldiers by murdering civilians. The children didn't suffer so its alright. The fact that those soldiers he was saving would have wanted to fight to save that village and died defending it don't matter, just more worthless human emotion. They died for Above, which is all people can hope for anyway.

Its no coincidence that the Alchemists great sin was prolonging life, something Above detests because mortality is something humanity was designed to have. A limiter to keep them controllable.

Liliet

>Perfect Gods that literally created you live in the sky and when they tell you to murder a village or commit genocide like some Levantines wanted, you follow that command because you are a dirty worthless mortal whose life is meaningless anyway.

What?

Ok so... Gods did not order Pilgrim anything. Gods don't ever order anyone anything, or we wouldn't have had the strictly-reminiscent-of-real-world church schism. Angels don't order him around either, we've seen him attempt to get useful input from them recently...

>This is shown when he saves the lives of useful soldiers by murdering civilians.

What? Where?

If you're talking about Saudant and the plague, Amadeus's rampage was causing civilian deaths. He was burning fields and granaries!

>Its no coincidence that the Alchemists great sin was prolonging life

No, it was... human experimentation? Everyone liked him for prolonging life, Chosen considered him an ally, and Laurence thought nothing was wrong until she stumbled upon the city guard kidnapping a person off the street?

Mental Mouse

" that they fail to realize everyone in this verse believes that some suffering is necessary or unavoidable so that others won't suffer. "

Push that argument too far, and you get "Those Who Walk Away From Omelas". Which is far more ambivalent than most readers think. How much suffering are you "allowed" to shunt onto some people so that others won't suffer at all... as opposed to everybody suffering at least a little, like in our own world?

Liliet

Suffering is not shunted out in equal amount onto a sacrifice as in Omelas, it's just that some of it is not preventable.

Javvies

Have you forgotten that he dropped a plague on a few thousand civilians that were on his side? And then instead of healing them, sealed them in to die in agony.

He's the sort of person who, if he deems it necessary, will burn the orphanage with all the orphans in it.

If you told him fifteen years ago that one of the girls in the orphanage Cat was in would over day become the Squire and be called the Black Queen of Callow, but didn't know which girl it would be, he would kill all of them.

Liliet

>Have you forgotten that he dropped a plague on a few thousand civilians that were on his side?
>And then instead of healing them, sealed them in to die in agony.

It's a good question why he didn't heal them, I'm guessing making the plague unhealable was part of making it effective, so he couldn't. And he didn't 'seal them to die in agony', he specifically went through the town killing them so they won't suffer in agony.

And while I don't remember the exact size of the town, the point is that Amadeus was condemning many, many, many such towns to deaths from starvation and banditry, the total casualties being much bigger – even before you account for the war against the Dead King and the fact that without a solid back it would collapse and doom the entire country to deaths.

What do you think Tariq should have done in that situation?

Javvies

Bioweapons are straight up wrong. There are only a handful of times when bioweapons are potentially acceptable, and none of them involve allied civilians. Using a bioweapon against an enemy such as tyranids or zerg, that's fine. Against almost any lesser grade of threat? No.

Black and the Legions are nowhere near the threshold where bioweapons are on the table to even be considered, much less used.

What Tariq should have done? Arrange to have Black cut off or intercepted, either at the village Black was boarding his troops at, or at his destination, with an actual army.
Or, actually no. What Tariq truly should have done was kept his word and stayed in Laure. And/or taken Cat up on one of her offers.

Remember – Black decided to turn around. He doesn't want the Dead King winning any more than any of the Heroes do. He knows full well that the Dead King is not a neighbor you want to have. Admittedly, Black wouldn't mind the 10th Crusade redirecting itself away from Callow and Praes and expending itself on the Dead King.

Liliet

>Bioweapons are straight up wrong. There are only a handful of times when bioweapons are potentially acceptable, and none of them involve allied civilians.

Why?

>What Tariq should have done? Arrange to have Black cut off or intercepted, either at the village Black was boarding his troops at, or at his destination, with an actual army.

That was impossible because of his mobility advantage. Armies move much slower than parties of Named.

>Remember – Black decided to turn around.

As a fan of Amadeus who considers him a hero and dearly wishes he HAD decided to do the right thing here...

No.

No, that did not happen.

>"Then the entire north is about to be hip-deep in dead men," Grem bluntly said. "I can't think of another reason for Hasenbach to pull out.

> [...]
>“That is my assessment as well,” Amadeus said.
“And it means our horizons have just expanded a great deal.”
>[...]

>“Have you decided where we’ll be headed, after?” Ranker asked.

>“Still a matter of debate,” Amadeus admitted.
“Segovia would allow us to finalize our savaging of the First Prince’s opposition, properly damaging her position.”

>“But you’re thinking of Salia,” the goblin said knowingly.

>“We can’t take the capital,” he said, stating the obvious. “Even arming a third of that hive would allow her to drown us in numbers. But if we torch our way through its outlying territories, the sheer loss of prestige might see her unseated.”

Amadeus’s reaction to “oh the Dead King is attacking” was “sweet, that gives us an opportunity to plunder more”.

Had Tariq decided to stay in Laure... well, Catherine’s side of the conflict would have changed significantly, but Procer would be pretty much unsalvageable.

Liliet

P.S. By “Why?” I don’t mean “I disagree”, but “enumerate reasons”

Clint

Sure. His goals have never been a bad thing – it’s his willingness to do really, really bad things right now in the uncertain hope of a future greater good that makes him a horror.

In a world where perfect rationality made it possible to accurately calculate the expected future suffering resulting from each possible choice, his fundamentalist Utilitarianism would be good.

In his actual world, even with a Choir and his Behold aspect, he keeps choosing to create actual suffering right now in the belief that it might create much less suffering down the road – and guessing wrong.

Like the thousands he sent to die to power up his miracle to break the drow and create a Draw, giving him the Pattern of Three he needed to kill Catherine. Those thousands died for nothing, because the future good never came – the Pattern of Three was broken.

Heck, he's going to be forced to return Black to Cat soon – and then all the innocent civilians who died of plague at Pilgrim's hand will also have died for nothing. (He sacrificed them to gain a hostage he could use to maneuver Cat into that same Pattern of Three.)

>"I will not break the world that is to spare the world that could be," the Peregrine said.

This is a huge, huge change from the Peregrine who turned Cat down after Camps.

It will be interesting to see whether the Choir of Mercy is willing to go along with a version of Utilitarianism that weights suffering/happiness by proximity and certainty of the prediction.

konstantinvoncarstein

He did horrible things, and many mistakes, it is true. But some of them were perfectly reasonable. He stopped by himself (and help if the Ophanim) a war which would have killed thousands.

If he managed to survive this long and be so respected, he must have be quite good at anticipating correctly the consequences of his decisions. Everyone makes mistakes (ok, his are pretty big, but my point still stand).

Liliet

>Those thousands died for nothing, because the future good never came – the Pattern of Three was broken.

Inaccurate.

It's the pattern of three taking shape that forced Catherine into making the deal as sweet as it is – a surrender, a formal victory for the Grand Alliance. She "twisted Tariq's arm into agreeing" by making the deal too good for him to refuse.

That's not dying for nothing.

>Heck, he's going to be forced to return Black to Cat soon – and then all the innocent civilians who died of plague at Pilgrim's hand will also have died for nothing. (He sacrificed them to gain a hostage he could use to maneuver Cat into that same Pattern of Three.)

Inaccurate.

He sacrificed them in order to stop Amadeus's rampage through Proceran provinces, burning farmland and granaries, spreading impending starvation and banditry. That goal was achieved regardless of secondary gamble on what he can do with Amadeus once he captured him. Hell, when he made the plague decision, he couldn't even know for certain Amadeus could be captured alive. The real goal was just stopping him, and that was successfully achieved.

>>"I will not break the world that is to spare the world that could be," the Peregrine said.

>This is a huge, huge change from the Peregrine who turned Cat down after Camps.

This is literally the exact same logic he used to turn down Cat. He will not break the world that is [the Grand Alliance] to spare the world that could be [Catherine's plans].

shieldredblog

Catherine never had to be forced into that deal though. The only issue was that the Grand Alliance refused her deals or wasn't trustworthy. Really, she was the one that forced the Pilgrim into peace.

Liliet

Catherine did have to be forced into surrendering. When she was talkign with Rozala earlier, her logic was that she couldn't allow herself to be beaten in the field because half of her authority rested on that never happening. She ended up deciding to give up that advantage, because the Pilgrim was too cunning an opponent to not have to give up something in order to get what she wanted.

Someguy

A hypocrite like Tariq can be manipulated via their hypocrisy once you grasp the core of what they desire as Cat shown last chapter.

Sword Bitch just needs to be slapped around every time she acts up...Someone call Rumena!

Raiseth

Oooh. I see, I think. If I am correct, the one additional crown she will sacrifice is the crown of Callow.

That's the reason she already named a heir apparent. One of them, I mean.

And I think this is also a scheme to completely break the Naming pattern of the Good Kings of Callow. I dunno how many of them were the Good Kings, but I'd guess a lot, considering the Praesi across the river.

Well, let's see if I'm right.

Nathan

I believe the Accords are meant to stipulate that no Named may hold a position of mortal authority.

luminiousblu

That's not really hypocrisy. Hypocrisy asking others to do as he says but not as he does, which isn't really what's happening. Tariq does exactly what he says and says exactly what he does. Just because others find it unreasonable doesn't make him a hypocrite.

Morgenstern

"...if Tariq really believes that Cat is a story of retribution against Calernia for what Callow had been forced to go through ... at what point does doubling down on throwing Callow under the bus/wagon for the benefit of others (aka, the actions drawing retribution) possibly become a good idea?"

At the point where you still think you can stop the retribution story in its tracks and kill the infant (story) in the cradle, because it seems necessary to hold the rest of the continent together against a MUCH larger threat. It's sad but has to be done to avoid unnecessary suffering that would be larger than the continuing unnecessary suffering of Callow, just as it has in the past. Greater good trumps lesser evils blahblah. 😊

Javvies

And since when does attempting that kind of forestalling/delaying retribution/consequences ever work out well for somebody?

"Kill all the male infants less than a year old in this area" Fifteen- twenty years later you find out you missed the one baby you actually needed to kill. And guess what? Said former baby opens a can of whup-ass on you and destroys all you hold dear.

Insanenoodlyguy

Different kind of infant. This is the "We have to stop the evil now while he's still vulnerable or he'll become a full fledged god" kind of infant killing. A race against the clock to destroy the ascending bad while it's still destroyable. That story tends to succeed one of three ways A: They do it in the nick of time before he gets full invincibility. or B. The god is created but he has a vulnerability that leaves him killable after all. There's also C. Can't kill it? Fine, but you can seal/trap/contain it! Obviously they are aiming for B.

Javvies

That isn't a story of retribution/consequences for past actions/inaction coming home to roost.

That ascension story you're talking about is Akua's old story as Heiress/Diabolist ... not Cat's story as being the embodiment of retribution for the shit Callow's been through.

Cat's story as being embodied retribution? That's easily framed as the child that's destined/propheesied to bring down your kingdom for your bullshit. And trying to head that off by killing the child never works.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's not. It's a shift to an entirely new story. Which is exactly what Cat wants. This story is entirely circumvented by the new emergent "We must stop the new Fae King" story. She's making a new infant to kill. Because that greater good thing is fine for a villian for whom you regret things didn't go differently with, but somebody you fought with for the greater good? That kind of betrayl might work for Saint, but it doesn't work so well for Tariq. Not when he's already made that whole "Won't sacrifice the world that is" speech. Cat is acting in good faith and he has no reason to believe she'll go back on her word. Fucking her over now in the name of killing the infant is what he's already been trying to do. He doesn't get to go back to it now unless she gives him damn good reason to change his mind. And he's already said it: She's not that stupid.

Mental Mouse

As per the Pesach tale that some in our own world celebrated just last week: "Pharoah, let my people go..."

Notice that in this sort of story, the kid gets just enough exposure to abuse to pick up a grudge without being actually broken by it, but also learns local ways well enough to hide among the populace until their awakening. In the Guide, Amadeus was clearly on the watch for this sort of tale, and in Cat he turned the story from rebellion into (the next generation of) revolution.

Javvies

Coopting a potential Chosen One is still an entirely different kind of story from murdering them in their sleep.

And, if we go with the Moses analogy, Black was more or less planning to release them when Cat was ready, albeit with some (honestly not that onerous) conditions. And it mostly would have worked.

Except Malicia and Akua fucked things up.

And that's still a massively different approach to forestalling consequences, vengeance, and/or retribution from the one that Tariq is using ... which is more or less the standard "kill everyone who fits the details we have" method, that never, ever works.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, Black was manipulating this story, and in this case he actually switched roles. At first he was killing heroes in the crib and otherwise maintaining the Rule of Praes, but even he could see that was unsustainable, and that Praesi rule was not in fact gaining any legitimacy. So he essentially stepped in to play "Pharoah's daughter" himself, leaving the Pharoah role to Malicia.

Also, when has Tariq tried that sort of broad cull? His situation is indeed different; as he himself eventually realized, not just Praes but also Procer and Levant are owed retribution for the way they've fought over Callow. (q.v. the Long Price). And Tariq started the Guide very much in the position of "Yet Another" agent of foreign powers, squabbling over Callow as a prize without even considering them as a stakeholder. Only now has he begun to grasp his mistake in dismissing his opponents with "they must be wrong, because they're not obeying me".

Javvies

That's kind of my point.

Black was killing Heroes off for long enough to get to the point where he could pull off finding a suitable candidate to coopt. It took him a while – Cat was born after the Conquest and grew up during the Occupation. On the other hand, Black was actually doing far more than just kill off Heroes/potential Heroes, he was actually treating the average Callowan reasonably well and giving decent governance and enforcing the laws more or less equally. The only thing drawing those Heroes was the fact that Black's a Villain who had managed to conquer Callow – his behavior and treatment of Callow during the Occupation very much was not a driving factor in Hero-spawning. Honestly? I think Black ultimately intended to bring in Callow and use an integrated Callow to help him complete the purge of the Praesi High Lords.

Tariq is/was trying to forestall consequences/vengeance/retribution by killing those he believed would be most responsible for delivering it/the one he believed was the embodiment of that retribution, without doing a thing about changing the conditions that inspired the consequences/vengeance/retribution in the first place. Trying to kill the one chosen/destined/prophesized/etc to embody/be the instrument/deliverer of consequences/vengeance/retribution, and doubling down on the kind of behavior that inspired those consequences/vengeance/retribution the way Tariq is/was ... that's not something that ends well.

Tariq murdered thousands of (allied) civilians in cold blood just to get a chance of having a shot at Black. He straight up murdered his brother (admittedly for murdering their sister), and then murdered his beloved nephew in cold blood.

He is the sort of person that if he considers your suffering necessary, he will do whatever it takes to ensure that you cannot avoid it.

If one went back in time fifteen years and told Tariq that one of the girls from the orphanage Cat was in would grow up to be the Black Knight's chosen Squire, leader of a Named Band of Five, nicknamed the Black Queen of Callow, by Callowans, he would absolutely burn the orphanage down with all the orphans inside of it. Or, well, to be fair, maybe he wouldn't actually use fire, maybe he'd drop some sort of plague on the place. But all those orphan girls would be dead. Except Cat, because when you massacre an orphanage to kill someone when you don't know exactly who your target is supposed to be, your actual target always survives.

Mental Mouse

That second paragraph, did Saint get at it? So many slashes... 😊

Yes, Black intended to permanently incorporate Callow, which would have given him and Malicia the time and slack to finish reforming the Praesi nobility. His treatment of the country was the first layer of hero-proofing, cutting their numbers to where he could deal with the rest individually.

But he also knows that old song “you can’t always get what you want... but if you try some times, you’ll get what you need.” Cat in turn picked up on his basic goals, but jumped the tracks on his original plan. Since she was doing better for Callow than Amadeus had been, he left her to that and turned to other projects, like trying to convince Procer they had better things to do with their armies than going after Callow.

He didn’t really win that last one though, because instead of redeploying armies they sent a Named to take him down. I suspect that once Cat has Amadeus’ body and soul recombined, the very first thing she’ll do is slap him upside the head for running a “buddy movie” story, the sort where the protagonists inevitably die at the end.

And It didn’t help the big picture that in Cat’s absence, his own capture drew Callow’s Legions to Procer, where they were stranded by ongoing developments. and enmired by Kairos and DK’s plotting.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, he’d actually probably pull a black and go pick her out. And so in 15 years the White Squire would have emerged, the woman chosen for destiny by her Uncle Tariq (He’d be smart enough to avoid raising or training her directly but would enough of her life to be foully regarded) to go and reclaim her homeland.

Javvies

Based on what, exactly?
Everything we know about him and what he’s previously done indicates that he’d kill all the orphans and let the Gods sort them out.

He might pay for a nice memorial service and say he feels bad about it afterwards, but the orphans would all be dead.

Liliet

How so?

Kissaten

It'd only a Choir. IIRC one of Dread Emperors waged war and conquered one of them? Also Dead King stole a He'll and is fine, I don't think choirs are so fundamentally different, it'll at most lose it's blessing from Above and stop doing anything.

devildragon777

Kairos needs to be dead, and soon. Whatever he's playing at, it ain't good.

(Also, he's absolutely going to try and do something that makes the Pergrine break his oath)

Javvies

Well, yes. He absolutely does.

And, yeah, he's definitely going to try that, just for kicks, even if he doesn't really think he can succeed.

konstantinvoncarstein

Followed by Hierarch. He is trying to judge a Choir trough its heroe. If I want to know what will happen if it is found guilty, I don't want to see the consequences for the world. Even if presently it is unsavory, Mercy had do much good throughout the centuries.

The only good things with that would be that it is a suicide move. Absolutely all heroes on the continent, or even on the world, would come to kill Hierarch, and Bard would story-fu him to death.

IDKWhoitis

I would imagine the beginning of the trial would be establishing the "Heavens told me to do it". Then a trial and judgement would follow that would either clip the Angels wings or exile them from Creation.

There's little the Gods can do, outside of appealing or just trying to ignore the verdict, but I imagine meta-schenaigs ensue.

caoimhinh

They need to find a way to stop the oath-making to happen at all. For example: going through this business of making Larat a god and killing him to make the Highway to Keter before sweating the oaths.

However, Kairos is mad but not an idiot, so I doubt he would go through with this so easily, he likely will want the oaths done as soon as possible.

Then again, they only have about an hour to carry out the plan, so they might still bullshit him to wait and then going back to their words. Pilgrim already has done that, after all.

caoimhinh

swearing* the oaths. LOL

Mental Mouse

The problem is, if the party feeds Kairos to the nascent god, then their “highway” world will be crazed, treacherous and rude. Possibly Peregrine could be the “plus one” as part of his Heroic Sacrifice.

Well, that is a nasty little trap; plenty of ways to screw over everyone. Definitely a very Kairos move.

Also, awesome as always to see Ivah get out there and get shit done. I posted in a previous chapter about the distinct lack of Trickster named running around, and while Ivah certainly lacks the mischievous nature and overall wildcardness of the archetype, its illusion skills are coming along quite nicely. I could definitely see it developing into this role for Catherine in the future if not an outright name.

Like how the fuck do you plot against such a monster? How do you fight it? Can it even be killed?

The strongest, brightest, and wisest heroes just effectively gave up. The twisted Tyrant couldn't shake her. The monster has been smoking and not surprised once.

Malz will remember this for the foreseeable future. And boy do I wish she replaces Cordelia in the long run. She's the one that has stared all the true horrors in the face, and has proven very competent.

Sugar Roll

She's one of the seven crowns. Not sure what's going to happen to them but if I understand it correctly, it involves their deaths. So if Rosalie is going to be afraid of the Black Queen, she'll do it as a ghost.

byzantine279

Nah, if it involved their deaths it would be pointless for Cat to have them watch.

Sugar Roll

I don't know man. You'll have a villain story playing out to give birth to a god. It feels like human sacrifice is exactly what's required for this.

Liliet

I don't think Catherine would have gone with this, nor the heroes she's pitching it to.

Andrew Mitchell

Agreed. But is it just the crowns? Or the crowns + abdication? Or the crowns + dissolution of those principates? Or something else???

Liliet

INDEED 😊

Clint

Where do the seven principates fall on the map? Do they form a contiguous territory that could end up as a new country?

Dresden 67

Not even close.

Most of them are Arlesites, but they're not contiguous.

There of them are Alamans, and they're all over the place.

Good suggestion though, it would have been an interesting outcome.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's the second one even if that's not needed, though it surely increases the weight of the act in the way stories like. They had a royal order that was very clear. If they stop fighting the Black Queen and work with her instead, their crowns are forfeit. Effectively going along with this plan means they lose their thrones. Might get them back later, but this will definitely be the prince's graveyard.

Agent J

If it involved their deaths the Heroes would never have gone for it. That wouldn't get written off as casualties of war. That would be nothing short of blood sacrifice which is capital 'E' Evil.

Liliet

Cordelia is damn great too, let's not forget her play against Malicia to end the civil war.

And I'm hoping for Malanza actually coming around on Cat like "wait, she can do THIS, and what she chooses to do with it is help us? I'll take ten please and thank you"

Clint

Cordelia has certainly been given a huge lesson in "Heroes aren't your friends."

Cat's Lesser Evil probably looks a lot more palatable than Saint's Greater Good.

erebus42

Yeah, most people seem reasonable compared to Miss "Let's kill everyone but don't worry it will all work out because Good always wins".

Mental Mouse

Sounds like other people could gain some empathy for Cat's struggles with the Bard.

Machofish

Oohlala. White Knight vs. Hierarch is going to be a brutal, splendid business to behold, I'm sure.

konstantinvoncarstein

behold or Behold? 😊

ruduen

"The one we'll bring with us into the deeps," I said. "To be bestowed only at the heart of it."

Hm. It's the "bring" part that throws me off. Otherwise, my money would be on Cat attempting to kill the bit of the Dead King in Masago to qualify.

I wonder if there's an appropriate loophole available, or if Cat would bother lying about that bit?

Dhael

I think she going to sacrifice Saint. Cat's wording through this has been pushing Saint into a role as the Blind Extremist. She gave nearly everyone a chance, to chime in on the deal; while constantly picking at Saint, forcing her into a more and more extreme stance. And these kind of world ending scenarios the Extremist is always the one to die near the end.

Liliet

Saint is explicitly not one of the options.

Speculation about the plot

Saint is not one of the obvious options to the Rogue Sorcerer, but she does hold Dominion. It could be that the foundation of Dominion is very privately held knowledge that only Cat and Saint actually know. I think Cat was spelling out his thought process rather than indicating that Saint was really off the table for this. It would neatly tie up so many loose ends and even fits with needing a cut to open the Gate. Saint would be making a very useful artifact. Saint's Dominion stands distinct from earthly Creation, but is invokable in Creation and was heavily referenced in her last POV. Saint has indicated if she lives until the morning she will kill Catherine. Saint was groomed by the Bard to accelerate the war that released the Dead King. Saint has had visions of being in a Band of Five one last time. Saint is old / two days away from retirement. Saint has been racking up negative story karma like gangbusters. Saint has no clear value story-wise at this point since she's just the brawn working under Pilgrim. I predict Pilgrim will be the one to deliver her to Larat as a way to protect Cat and the future she envisions. I think Ivah is the actual fifth member of the Band for Story purposes after Saint's sacrifice, and the events are how he comes into a Name.

Liliet

Catherine commented that she was pretty much talking past him to Kairos and Tariq.

And I'm pretty sure Cat plans to abdicate, here and now, as the last crown. She's just not saying it in advance because that's not how the story is properly told (and she needs this story to be properly told to milk it for all it's worth).

Mental Mouse

> Saint has indicated if she lives until the morning she will kill Catherine.

Not quite:

> "If you still believe that, by morning light, then we will put it to judgement," Tariq said.

For starters, that's presumably next morning, as it is currently just past dawn (though eclipsed). At any rate, it will be after the whole 7+1 thing. We don't actually know what he means by "judgement", but I can easily believe these two old companions have worked up a routine to handle disagreements between them. It may or may not involve angels.

Decius

Saint is going to die in battle against the Dead King's Dragon, or against the Dead King directly, in a manner that redeems her brand of extremism.

Possibly it will be as a result of the Dead King paralyzing everyone with tales of their compromises; because Saint never compromised her position even for advantage, she will be immune to such talk.

LaNuup

Well, it's a rather wild guess, since I do not know what will happen to the „plus one“ but maybe she means the soul of Amadeus that the Sorcerer carries. He is after all a Emperor that could have been but never was. That carries it's own weight in a story about a god and court that will never rise.

caoimhinh

And he was King of Callow in all but name for over 20 years, a major reason Catherine managed to ascend to the throne is that she was his successor.

Besides, we have already seen this "Amadeus is king of callow" excuse to be used successfully before, when Cat used it to claim the sword in the stone at Liesse in her last fight against William.

Javvies

There's no way Cat plans to, or signs off on, sacrificing Amadeus. She wants her father back, not dead.

The "and one" is more likely to be Kairos or Laurence. Unless she pulls the trigger on knocking off Akua, but I don't see that happening yet.

medailyfun

WTF? Why do you think it should involve a life sacrifice? After all, they are not going to actually kill the princes for the crowns, so it means the one crown should be just given/taken with the narrative weight behind, and the most obvious candidate is Cat herself with her long-planned and long-prepared abdication.

konstantinvoncarstein

But if she gives (figuratively) her crown, Vivienne cannot become Queen. My bet is on Pilgrim

Liliet

Eh, Vivi's already her successor. I think it'll work out fine.

Fayhem

I don't think she could give her crown to Viv and have it count as such, but technically she declared Vivienne her successor before going to do the sacrifice of crowns or however precisely this is going to work. If Cat sacrifices her crown without explicitly saying she's just giving it to somebody else then the government of Callow will still go to it's default "hey we don't have a ruler" protocol of "let's check our line of succession, oh hey look it just got clarified and we have a heir apparent, isn't that handy". It's very technicality-based rules lawyering, but finding a loophole and driving a freight train through it is kind of 90% of Cat's MO (the rest is stabbing and goblinfire).

Fayhem

Oh, and another 50% of Cat's MO is sass. Yes, that's more than 100%. That's because that's how much sass she has. Her sass is so concentrated it violates the laws of logic and reality. A sassgularity, if you will.

Liliet

Yep!

This is a fae bargain. Technicality-based rules lawyering is what those are MADE OF

Kissaten

Well, there's a Black who is a claimant to something. Maybe they can bestow him with the proper title, he was very White Knight'y when it all started, with the girl abducted by evil Emperor and making a band of Calamities, it's not entirely above him to be a rightful heir to something.

Euodiachloris

He might give up on his potential to gain a new name, the crowns he chose to never hold and the Creation he has always tried to save...

And become the curator of the Shard; guarantor of the Accords, a Courtless not-King among the Fae.

While laughing at the irony the whole way.

Euodiachloris

Also, if the not-Queen of Refuge should ever wish to visit the not-Refuge of vaguely-Arcadia, well... It's not like Ranger is shy about blood prices. 😊

Liliet

I don't think that's how it's going to go but I love your logic anyway

Morgenstern

I'd wish we'd see that story instead of the Larat one we'll probably get. But oh well, this is not a fairy story, is it... 😊

edrey

maybe is amadeus, he is there and has been forgotten so the most unexpected is the most likely, right

Fahri Agam

Excuse my ignorance, but of the seven princes and "one", who is the "one?". And if Larat is the "one", why would he ever agree to work with Cat?

Amazing chapter as usual – Absolutely loved it.

Liliet

Seven and one have to all be mortal rulers.

The question of who's the one is still open 😊

Decius

Everything is mortal to the Saint of Swords.

Liliet

...well, you're not wrong

etheric sentinel

No, it's "seven mortal rulers and one." The one is not included in the "mortal rulers." Implicitly a ruler, though, especially

etheric sentinel

Yuck, double post. How do I remove this one?

etheric sentinel

No, it's "seven mortal rulers and one." The one is not included in the "mortal rulers." Implicitly a ruler, though, especially since s/he is giving up a crown!

Liliet

I mean I read it as just a word order reversal -\/(0.-)\/- but now that you say it, I see how it could be read the other way too

caoimhinh

That's also a heroic tool, you know? Having the conversation with the enemy-villain transmitted live to other people (especially those of importance) while the enemy is unaware of this and thus reveals their true nature.

Catherine has with this shown herself as the most level-minded person in the field, the one who has a plan and also the one who is looking for peace.

Exposing the murderous nature and total disregard for lives that the Saint has, showing the Pilgrim bending in acceptance to her plan (and passing over the authority of Cordelia) due to his unshakeable desire to keep suffering at minimum, and also proving once more that Kairos is a crazy bastard who can't be trusted. Right in front of seven of the Princes of Procer, including a couple of the most influential and a representative of the First Prince herself.

All of this, as part of her plan, all of this while being in control of the situation the whole time and even predicting the seemingly unpredictable actions of the Tyrant of Helike.

They will fear her for this.

A lot.

konstantinvoncarstein

Nice move, indeed 😊

Valkyria

Of course they will. And I agree fully with you. But how will word get out if the princes all get a little headless?

Liliet

Crownless, not headless.

Liliet

On the other hand, "villain revealing an unpleasant truth at an inconvenient time to sow discord among the forces of Good" is also a trope.

Catherine needs to be very, very careful with this.

Aston W

Crab. Bucket.

sengachi

Well. This will change the shape of Calernia for all time. Introducing a whole second landscape on which armies can maneuver and deploy and a network of quick-travel portals through which trade can flow is going to alter everything. So much of these nations' positioning depends on geography. A century from now, not a single mainland border will remain unchanged.

Furthermore, aside from Catherine personally being especially well suited to build these portals, this new realm seems much easier for villains to exploit than heroes. The "villain gets the first move" trope synergizes very well with these travel gates, and in particular Praesi villains are going to have a much easier time figuring out how to make and break gates.

Yet the Pilgrim is willing to back this idea with almost no arguing (they decided to go for a plan with centuries-spanning consequences in under an hour, that counts as almost no arguing), to shave off a month or two of the travel time necessary to get a hundred thousand and change soldiers and a handful of heavyweight names to the Dead King's battlefield (the Pilgrim's still not fully aware of just how much power the drow promise to bring to that fight, nor that this force is merely their vanguard).

Holy fuck. I think my threat estimate for the Dead King just ticked up another notch.

Javvies

It's not just to get everybody up north to face the Dead King.

It's also because the alternatives for what's going on with Masego and this chunk of Acradia are so much worse – option one is to let Masego (currently possessed by or otherwise under the influence of the Dead King) proceed unhindered, option two is to let Heirarch and Tyrant's plan proceed (the one that Cat warned the Dead King about), or option three which is Cat's plan.

Sometimes there are no good choices, only varying degrees of bad to pick from.

konstantinvoncarstein

I totally agree with you, but it will also make the Cavalry much faster.

medailyfun

I believe in this world the anchored realm can be unanchored and disposed of with the right Name and story.

milieu

I can't recall Kairos ever breaking his word, but everyone thinking that he is up to no good.

Could someone jog my memory if he ever has?

Liliet

I'm assuming killing rulers at that league meetup qualifies. I doubt they DIDN'T swear oaths / give their words formally to NOT kill each other.

Clint

His whole play in Iserre has been to swear alliance and friendship with each and every side while betraying all of them in spectacular fashion.

You could argue that it's not really a betrayal since no one believed his promises, but it's definitely reason to think they were all correct in not trusting his word.

Kissaten

All his alliances always were secret. The only legal dealings he has are within the league and are curated by Hierarch. Same goes for his enemies, not a single one of them dealt with him in good faith. I don't think it counts as an oath if neither side was willing to see it through

konstantinvoncarstein

What would have happened if Catherine had not stolen the princes? There would have been 2 plans left for this shard of Arcadia, Neshama's and Kairos, but the former is aware of and can stop the latter. It would have been a bad thing for everyone.

Liliet

Kairos loves those, as villains do. Better everyone lose than everyone win.

Mental Mouse

"As villains do?" Not our Cat!

Liliet

Nor Amadeus 😊

edrey

so those seven are death right? it is the graveyard of princes after all

Euodiachloris

Well, their titles are dead. Their administrative personas within the body politic have just acquired headstones.

And, they have witnessed Pilgrim helping to dig the graves without consulting any of Procer's checks and balances within their Ebb and Flow. Because they have just had underscored what many of them have been noticing for weeks: the Alliance cares nothing for the sovereignty or cultural identities of people or countries.

And, thus, they witness what they did to Callow.

Stevedave

Calling it now; the Rogue Sorcerer is the dead king in disguise. He doesn't fit into the weight class as the rest of the party. In addition, Larat never uses his Name, only calling him "a sorcerer of roguish inclinations". He might have gotten himself taken over by reading the dead kings naughty book. I reckon Masego will be the real 5th in the party, taking the place of the sorcerer archetype.

Jason Ipswich

That would be so darkly awesome. It would also let Saint go down swinging, "in combat with the Dead King", but still leave him as a villain.

Mental Mouse

We haven't seen much of him, but Cat noted that he does fight with the big guys, and never gets hurt or pulls out a nuke. He's in the right weight class all right, but with a different mode than Warlock, Heiropant, WoW, etc. Probably he has a Luck aspect of some sort.

Liliet

FUCKING BLESS
THE BEST

medailyfun

btw, why the Bard does not watch this interesting conversation?

Clint

My theory is that Cat and Tyrant have both managed to counter Bard's aspect that makes her a witness to every significant story event.

Tyrant managed this when Hierarch accused her – in what I think was the birth of his third aspect. If she shows up anywhere where Hierarch's law holds, then she's subject to being put on trial for her crimes. She is preemptively banished by the mortal danger of an aspect-driven mob trial.

More speculatively, I think Cat has used Sve Noc to manage keep her aspect from detecting those pivotal events – the same way they countered Pilgrim's Behold aspect. It's certainly the case that Sve Noc know, fear, and hate the bard, so it seems likely that they've worked out a counter.

Fayhem

Interesting theories, and both are plausible. Let me suggest a third: when Kairos broke down the Bard for Catherine, he mentioned that one of her rules was that she was always bound to flee/run from what she most desired. When she ran from Hierarch it was specifically when he was talking about putting the Gods themselves on trial. Now, isn't that interesting, in light of her being compelled to run from what she most wants? And in light of how it was alluded to/intimated that Bard got locked into her not-actually-that-fun Role seemingly for all eternity as a punishment, with the implication (IIRC) that it was a punishment for mucking with some of the Gods' designs?

Maybe Bard can't show up because she's afraid of Hierarch. Or maybe it's because when the Gods created her Name they got a little too clever for their own good, and now she can't show up to interfere with what Cat is doing on behalf of the Gods because Bard knows this could lead towards (in some way, not sure precisely how yet but I suspect it ties into Cat's plans to subvert the very nature of the Good v. Evil conflict on Calernia) what she most wants and the Gods bound the necessity to run from the presence of that into the very fabric of her Name?

There's not enough evidence to confirm that so I'm very much not sure yet, but if that turns out to be true I might literally die laughing.

Andrew Mitchell

I like this a lot. I'd find it extremely satisfying if the Bard turned out to actually be on Cat's side.

Liliet

"I was always trying to help you, Catherine!" "Right... so what about Liesse?" "Err... well..."

Gunslinger

Maybe cause too many people know her game already that it's easier to move the stories in shadows. Or this is what she wanted already so she doesn't have to appear

Liliet

She's forbidden direct touch. Even just appearing before these people would explode the entire situation right off the rails as they'd probably talk about her instead of what they were already going to talk about. Ergo, she can't be here.

Mental Mouse

Not to mention there's at least two Named with "mind-reading" aspects, who might leand more than she wants. (Be cool for us, though.) Not to mention Sve Noc (IIRC the crows aren't currently present, but Mighty and Cat are), who might be able to do worse: Not only read her, but maybe even pin her in place. Or at least provide a god's analysis of her disappearing trick.

werafdsaew

Komena might be present:

Mhm!

"`There would be a time, after the war turned here and the Red Flower Vales broke, where the Heavens would assemble their sharpest blade. The ancient forms would be observed. Five heroes, sent into the breach to quell the howling dark.`" from Book 4, Kaleidoscope II

"`- inevitability," the Grey Pilgrim echoed. "A band of five, like few this world had seen, to smother that infant god in the cradle."

The last words had his face going ashen, for some reason.""

Tariq just understood that the promised "heroic band" might not be all that heroic.

Jason Ipswich

Isn't that how he murdered his nephew?

Mental Mouse

Looking back there, his lineup included himself and Saint, but he didn't even get the Rogue Sorcerer (he thought Witch of the Woods), and of course the other heroes (WK and Champion) are replaced by villains. I have to conclude that he was calculating rather than foreseeing, unless Cat's Everdark adventures actually voided prophecy!

An aside: From that chapter, I also see:

> All the others had warmed to Tariq, after Laurence acted as offensively in councils as she could. Offered him trust, treated him as the man of reason holding back the reckless Saint of Swords. All of them save Prince Arnaud of Cantal.

In other words, at least sometimes they're purposely playing "good cop/bad cop"! (Also, look for trouble from Arnaud.)

Liliet

Yeah, that was just calculating/guessing.

And yeah, they do that :3

ninegardens

So... I just gotta put it out there:

Pilgrim is my favourite character in these whole stories.

Okay, maybe also Tyrant and Anarexes.

But lets talk about Pilgrim, and why he is great for the story.

The arrival of Pilgrim on stage basically heralded that start of Cat playing diplomacy. I know this was cats choice, but just by existing, by being both reasonable and desperate enough, Pilgrim makes the story so much more interesting.

Books one and two were Vs Akua and William, and both those were enemies which... pretty much just had to be beaten. Even in a 3 way game, the goal was winning.

But Pilgrim makes things interesting, and even though people might give him crap as a hypocrit etc etc etc... basically he seems like a desperate fearful dude trying to make the best of a bad situation, with incomplete information, a history of every villain betraying them (as mentioned this chapt), and a lot of blood on his hands no matter what decision he makes. Not a fun job.

And the part that really gets me is... if this oath gets somehow broken, and Cat is forced to kill him, it is very very easy to imagine him giving the order that the Dominion must forgive her...

because she is only holding up her end of an oath, an oath required to end a war.

Liliet

Mhm

Mental Mouse

I think if the oath is broken during this mission, that would pretty much require Pilgrim's Heroic Sacrifice to fix.

Aotrs Commander

Well, at least Pilgrim and Kairos are smart enough to know when they've been outplayed.

If left to Saint's methods, one imagines the continent would be entirely under the Dead King's control inside five minutes on the basis that there would be no-one left you actually, y'know, fight him.

onedollargum

I guess this means that "everyone of importance" has already heard the oaths, and that most of them are likely to bite it. Good deal, Cat.

Liliet

They aren't going to die.

SMHF

The only thing that'll make Cat's plan more perfect, is if she pushes the Heroic Sacrifice role of their Band of Five onto her dear friend Kairos!

Tom

Cat has had a lot of things go her way lately... which can only be cause for suspicion! The longer things go her way without major setbacks, the bigger the eventual cost will be for her. Maybe giving up her own crown as the +1 would be enough, but I'm suspicious that the Pilgrim will sacrifice himself heroically, probably in the process of killing Divine Baby Larat, because Cat giving up her crown could still be "things going according to plan", whereas she keeps saying it would be impossible to get the Liesse Accords signed if he dies. And what is a more appropriate obstacle for Cat than something "impossible"? 😊

Plus the Pilgrim's change of stance smells like a redemption story:

> "It sees to our every need," the Peregrine said, and turned rueful eye on me. "How neatly you have tied us with the strings of necessity."

> I met his gaze unblinking.

> "Should I apologize," I said, "for making this a victory for others than myself?"

> He turned away at that. Both at what I'd said, and at what was implied: that'd he been so set on being my enemy I'd had to work against him to help him. Silence stretched for a tense moment.

To fit with Cat's tagline ("and then it got worse"): Pilgrim sacrifices himself, Saint gets red in the face and starts screaming "I told you so!" while flailing at Cat, Cat puts her down with her staff-sword-story, the Rogue Sorcerer vanishes to go tell Grand Alliance people of Cat's "betrayal", Kairos cackles and finally unveils a scheme that Cat hadn't predicted. 😊

Catherine does tend to have things go her way at major victory points 😊

JRogue

Question. Grey Pilgrim stated that it would be; "A band of five, like few this world had seen, to smother that infant god in the cradle."

How can Cat be part of this "band of five" if she does not have a Name? I would think that it would be a requirement for this "band of five" to have narrative weight.

Kissaten

Gods give Names to Roles, Names aren't a requirement for anything by themselves alone. While playing a Role people get everything required to see the story done, sometimes it requires a Name.

JRogue

That is kind of my point. She herself does not have a Name and she has not found that "rut" in creation for a Role either. I believe she is actively avoiding that. She has the ability to manipulate (masterfully) those with Names and Roles to get the ends she wants, which being outside of the Name and Role narrative helps her, and once again something I believe she is avoiding on purpose. The thing is if she is included in a Band of Five wouldn't that lack of Name and Role be a detriment? Something that works against the idea? A Band of Five are people with Names and Roles needed to fix a bad situation, she has all the know-how, with none of the narrative weight. I mean, that lack of Name did not prevent GP from pulling her into a Rule of Three situation, but that has been happening for a long time. I don't know. Just pondering.

Mental Mouse

Cat is carving a Role into Creation, and perhaps other worlds as well. Heck, one of her followers inaugurated a new Name! As Priestess of Night, leading three Heroes and a Villain, she has indeed formed a band "like few this world had seen" (if any, ever). She may not have taken a Name, but I'd bet that upon her death the Name of Black Queen will be taking applicants in her mold. With an orc adjutant included in the package.

Liliet

I think it's a bit the other way round: Names are something you can get as a reward for fitting into this kind of story. So you fit the story first and get a Name on top of it, not the other way round. It's not more contradictory than Evil Squire Catherine pulling a Sword out of the Stone and getting an angelic resurrection.

Agent J

Are you suggesting that Catherine does not have narrative weight?

Agent J

"-she has all the know-how, with none of the narrative weight."

Oh. Evidently, you are. Dude, we're literally reading her story right now. There isn't a single other person in-universe with half as much narrative weight as Catherine Fucking Foundling.

Besides, you mentioned it yourself, if she can be roped into a Rule of Three, she can be part of a Five Man Band.

Besides, she's got many Names. Black Queen and First Under the Night chief among them. They may not be aspect granting Names, but they have weight and the latter has power backed by Goddesses.

... honestly, I think people are too married to the concept of Names and Aspects. They are related to, but not requirements for story weight.

Barrendur

I like Larat a great deal; he's the classical archetype of the Fae. He amuses and intrigues me... plus, I have to admit, I have rather a crush on him. I really resent Cat's high-handed dismissal of him as anything more than an "ingredient" for her planned Gate network.

"Oh no," says Cat, Black Queen and Mistress of the Double-Standard; "Larat is Fae and cannot change, so I have to break the oath I made to him as his sovereign and murder him. Shucks; sucks to be him."

I would very much enjoy seeing a typically Fae response from Larat to Cat's proposed 'disposing' of him; something vicious, clever and completely unanticipated. I think Cat has it coming, and Larat has a narrative bonus against her. Cat hasn't given sufficient consideration to Larat and his nature; she's received his oath of fealty but broken her oath to him as his sovereign, and this was all conducted within Creation, not Arcadia... where Larat is subject to the limitations and benefits of NARRATIVE.

So sing, O Muse, of a Fae lord betrayed by an oath-breaking sovereign, who means to murder him in a ritual of darkest magic... and tell me which one of them has more narrative weight.

Mental Mouse

On the contrary – she is keeping her oath, which releases him from service. At which point he's an unbound fae and she owes him nothing.

As far as narrative weight, Larat has been shirking his duties and staying out of sight, and acting only under direct orders... rather than doing stuff that would give him narrative weight. He is strictly a side character, who has (by SOP) been scheming to increase his power, but has not properly considered his role under the terms of Creation.

Adrian V

You missed a point there, she is only going to kill him when he inevitably backstabs her, and apparently he has already tried or placed the pieces to do it but was thwarted.

Liliet

As Catherine has pointed out to Tariq, in the timeline she's constructing, assembling a band of five against Larat comes after his sudden yet inevitable betrayal. Just because she considers it an inevitability doesn't mean the cause-effect link is going to be broken: if he doesn't betray her, he'll be fine!

Mind mage

So did anyone else notice the Rogue Sorcerer use the former Black knights signature phrase?
(Im on my phone and can't spell his name).
It's even said the same way and I can't think of anyone else whom has said it.

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting. It's not said the same way. IIRC Amadeus always seemed to say it as a sentence "Mistake."

But it IS said with emphasis; so perhaps it is signalling something important. Maybe the Rogue Sorcerer has been talking with Amadeus? Maybe they have made a deal? Maybe Amadeus is possessing him in some manner?

All this is unlikely IMO and the last idea is almost certainly wrong. But it's always fun to speculate!

Mental Mouse

That last idea – maybe RS was foolish enough to imitate Cat's example!

Mental Mouse

And that gives me another idea, even nastier. Suppose Pilgrim ends up on the Mantle of Woe? Cat would effectively have a shoulder angel to go with her shoulder demon. 😊 But poor Pilgrim, gone from Light to Night!

Andrew Mitchell

And thus her ultimate aim is achieved:

To bring balance to the Force. (cue Star Wars theme)

Letouriste

So Malanza just seen Tyrant kill her...interesting

Chapter 34: Seven

"Never once have I betrayed, for such an act first requires the extension of trust."

– Dread Empress Foul II, the Forthright

Now, far be it from me to even remotely imply Kairos Theodosian was not at best the worst ally anyone would ever have and at worst essentially a malignant disease inflicted on Creation. That said when it came to, uh, the sheer number of crowned heads gathering in the Principate at any given time then he almost had a point. I'd had Hakram drill me on the names and attendant principalities, and still I was pretty sure I had at least two of them confused. Both Princess Bertille of Lange and Princess Leonor of Valencis were women in their late forties with dark hair and tan skin, which considering I'd never spoken a word to either did not make differentiating them at a glance easy. Still, it wasn't them that'd matter in that throng of royalty. The keystones here were two, princesses both. One of them familiar by now: Princess Rozala Malanza of Aequitan, who was still glaring at the Tyrant of Helike for his casual murder of her illusory form. Kairos seemed genuinely delighted at the prospect of having made yet another powerful enemy. The other I'd met only once before, when we'd had that pleasant chat under afternoon sun where I'd politely asked her and a few thousand riders to turn back. Princess Sophie Louvroy of Lyonis, one of Hasenbach's staunchest partisans in Procer and I suspected the check sent on Rozala in case her command of a large army so close to Salia prompted... ambitions.

Where Princess Rozala was dark-haired and dark-eyed, tall yet curvy in the way that classical Arlesite beauties tended to be, Princess Sophie was a pale blonder with blue eyes and a narrow face. The Princess of Lyonis was a few years older, I knew from the reports of the Jacks, but it was hard to tell at a glance. They were not the oldest of the seven royals standing revealed in the eclipse's gloom, nor those ruling the wealthiest or most influential principalities, yet there were no denying it was they who shared the reins of authority. Princess Sophie did so as the First Prince's eyes and ear in the south, while if Vivienne's spies had it right then Princess Rozala was considered the informal heiress to the coalition of crowns that Prince Amadis Milenan had laboriously assembled. Since the Battle of the Camps said Prince of Iserre had been cooling his heels in the hands of the Kingdom of Callow as a prisoner, so given the ever-fluid nature of Proceran politics it was only natural a successor had emerged. They could do worse, silently conceded. Malanza was a skilled commander, and though no great diplomat she was not without allure. It would be easy enough to contrast her solid military record to Cordelia Hasenbach's own lack of anything similar and reliance on her uncle the Iron Prince for all things warfare.

I doubted they'd ever have the votes to seriously threaten Cordelia in the Highest Assembly, but as a bloc of opposition headed by Princess Rozala they could be a force to reckon with.

"This is rank madness," a dark-haired woman said.

That accent was Alamans, not Arlesite, which should mean I was looking at Princess Bertille of Lange.

"It is certainly dubious," Princess Sophie of Lyonis agreed, watching me warily.

That sounded like a refusal in the making, and from one of the two people I would much prefer to be in agreement instead of opposition. It would establish whether what followed would be known as a grave diplomatic incident or a heroic bargain struck in the face of despair.

"The exact meaning of giving away a crown are still unclear," Prince Louis of Creusens calmly said.

The Prince of Creusens was one of Amadis' – now Rozala's perhaps – and somehow managed to make a suit of armour quite obviously fitted to him look too large for his frame. He had a scholarly look about him, and his russet eyes were calm even if half his face was a swelling bruise and he was being careful not to put weight on one of his legs. Too delicate-looking a man for me to find him attractive, I thought, but he was not unpleasant to look at.

"Would it mean abdication, Your Majesty?" he asked me outright. "The surrender of our sovereign lands to one of the fae, or even yourself? An offer so imprecise cannot truly be entertained."

"A trinket will have to be offered," I said. "But what you will be surrendering, in truth, is rather more abstract: it is you 'right to rule'."

"To clarify," Prince Louis calmly said, "such a gesture will not in and of itself mean abdication?"

"It most definitely does not," the Tyrant grinned. "And don't let anyone tell you otherwise."

"It will, save if you are fools," the Grey Pilgrim said.

For once, the sight of every prince and princess there unconsciously shifting to face him more fully did not bring out irritation. The respect that Tariq commanded and one of the oldest and perhaps the most famous living hero on Calernia was, for once, aiding me.

"Chosen," Princess Rozala said, "I would request your guidance in understanding this. I cannot and will not condemn the people of Aquitan to a grisly fate, not even for victory this day."

"Hardly a victory, that we dance one and all to the Black Queen's tune," the Prince of Orense scoffed.

Early fifties, this one, and the long brown hair that went down to his shoulders was also bound in a bun behind his head. Prince Rodrigo of Orense, of who I knew very little save that his open scorning of the First Prince in a formal vote had been the talk of the Principate in my absence – and not in a manner that was flattering for him, considering it was Cordelia Hasenbach who'd put an end to the Levantine raids that'd ravaged the south of his principality.

"You never were much of dancer, Rodrigo," Prince Arnaud of Cantal disdainfully said. "Leave this to your betters, would you?"

Ah, that fucker. Though not one of the royals here with true authority, Prince Arnaud Brogloise had raised my hackles more than once in the past. He was, at the very least, a prodigiously skilled actor. After the Battle of the Camps, when I'd still had the benefit of fae senses, I'd noted that his heartbeat never rose even when he was seemingly furious or busy shouting.

"Arnaud," Princess Rozala sharply bit out. "Chosen, I apologize for the interruption."

The Prince of Cantal look appropriately chided, though a mite resentful, and once more I wondered how much of it was an act if not the whole cloth. Rodrigo of Orense's lips quirked a tad smugly, but seemingly content with that intervening victory he pursued the conversation no further.

"You are forgiven," the Tyrant magnanimously allowed.

"Though the earthly crown will not be taken from your brow, save if you yourself do so, you will have lost the authority of a ruler in the eyes of the Heavens," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Lingering in that role after discarding it before Gods and men can only bring calamity."

"I figure it'd be subtle at first," I said. "Small nudges. Crops get a little worse, people listen a little less. If you keep holding, though, then it's a different story."

"Disease and strife," the Peregrine said, "and they will only grow, so long as authority is kept."

"To clarify," Prince Louis spoke once more, echoing his own words, "abdication in favour of kin would ward off this... curse?"

"It would," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Though ever bearing another crown would birth it anew."

The Prince of Creusens then, to my surprise, turned to me as if seeking confirmation. I nodded, as to the best of my knowledge it was true. His lips thinned, and I caught his muscles twitching as he stopped himself from looking at someone for guidance. By the looks of it, I mused as I gauged the angle, it would have been Princess Rozala. One of hers, then. Said Princess of Aequitan was standing tall, fingers clenched, and met my gaze eye to eye.

"Foundling," she said.

"Rozala," I replied.

"This... lunacy of a land you speak of making," the Princess of Aequitan said. "Will you allow passage through it to any who would use it to fight the Dead King?"

"That will not be mine to decide," I said, "but I will bare sword to enforce such a term, should it come to that."

"The Kingdom of Callow and its allies will refrain from making war on the Grand Alliance, until the peace conference is ended?" Princess Rozala pressed.

"Safe in Callow's defence, or that of its allies," I agreed.

The other woman's jaw grew tight, eyes burning with something that was half fear and half fury.

"There is horror to the north, Catherine Foundling, the likes of which you cannot yet grasp," Princess Rozala Malanza said. "We war now against the Crown of the Dead not for pride or right or faith, but for the ugly prize of scant survival. In that struggle, Black Queen, do you claim to be friend or foe?"

"If your Grand Alliance makes accord with me, Princess of Aequitan," I softly said, "oh, what howling ruin I will visit upon the King of Death. I have dooms in my arsenal that the world will shake of them."

She breathed out shakily and straightened her back.

"Your word, Foundling," Rozala Malanza asked, eyes on mine.

"On my oath," I quietly replied.

Fingers steady, she unmade the claps of her helmet and ripped it off her head. Tossed, it flew and landed at my feet in a sprawl a snow.

"That's one," the Princess of Aequitan. "Ram it down his fucking throat, Black Queen. Hard enough that even in Keter they will hear the sound of our coming wrath."

"Malanza," Princess Sophie hissed, "you cannot simply-"

"It would be," Rozala said, "cheap at twice the price."

In the heartbeat that followed, I saw the lay of the royalty around them clear as day. Those whose gaze held admiration, but also misgivings: Louis of Creusens, Leonor of Valencis. Those who were moved to contempt instead, Bertille of Lange and Rodrigo of Orense. Arnaud of Cantal's face was befuddlement incarnate, though the sudden turn had surprised him enough the confusion for once did not reach his eyes. As for Sophie of Lyonis, she was a battlefield of fear and shame. This, I thought, is why you are followers. Why even though the First Prince fears and dislikes her, it Rozala Malanza who was given the command. And I would not let bravery, let sacrifice, pass unremarked. Not when I had the means of doing otherwise. Leaning on my staff, I limped forward and bent the knee long enough to catch the edge of Malanza's helmet. Catching her eye with mine, I tossed it back. She caught it, I thought, out of reflex.

"Foundling-" she began.

"Ivah," I simply said.

My Lord of Silent Steps without a word, and stepped out of my shadow as if it'd been laying within it. In its hands was held a crown of ivory and gold, the front set with a heavy topaz upon which a heraldic griffin had been carved. Behind me, Kairos began softly laughing. I held out my hand, and the drow placed the crown on it before offering a bow and vanishing behind a fresh veil of illusions.

"The crown of Iserre, offered by Amadis Milenan," I said. "Rozala Malanza alone of seven did not flinch, when sacrifice was asked. For that, she keeps her crown."

I could have waited until the others had been talked or coerced into giving their own crowns, but I'd felt in my gut I should not. I was not certain, though, whether this was one of the instincts that'd served me so well when navigating stories or simply because it would have been beneath all involved to give Rozala Malanza the honour her due as a trick instead of a forthright display.

"Connerie," Princess Bertille sneered. "You do not dictate to sitters of the Highest Assembly, Damned. Let Malanza waste her rights as she so desired, for I will not give mine."

"You presume much, Bertille," Prince Rodrigo snorted. "Not even ally to her cause, and you are to be exempt? I think not. At least I-"

"Enough," Princess Sophie snarled. "I will not have such disorder. The Princess of Lange is correct in that a foreigner may not speak to the affairs of the Principate. We will, among ourselves, discuss who should be exempt."

I looked at the Princess of Aquitan, then and what I saw on her face grieved me. Nothing in the loss of a crown moved me to sorrow, for I had little taste for mine and no reverence for those who'd earned their own by mere happenstance of birth. It was the raw, bleak disappointment I saw in a respected adversary as she stared the truth of her home in the eye. That, even as the sky was falling down on their heads, there were princes and princesses of Procer who would rather squabble than look up.

"It could be put to a vote," Princess Leonor of Valencis hesitantly said. "As is our way."

Something in Rozala Malanza's eye dimmed a little as the fourth voice of seven gave weight to the dispute. From the corner of my eye I saw the Tyrant of Helike writhing as if having a harsh episode of the shakes, but it was only barely held in laughter that had him convulsing. He silently mouthed thanks at me.

"Shame on you all," the Grey Pilgrim quietly said.

For a moment, the old man's resounding disappointment gave them pause. But only for a moment, because even a hero's chiding weighed short of a crown kept on the scales of the powerful.

"Chosen do not rule, in the Principate," the Prince of Orense said. "Much less those born in Levant. With all due respect, Grey Pilgrim, you have already overstepped tonight in presuming to speak for the First Prince of Procer. Let us not further--"

A bundle fell at my feet with dull thump. A straight-edge cavalry sword, wrapped in a cloak.

"I had," Louis Rohanon pensively said, "genuinely believed myself to be a decent man, until tonight."

The silence in the wake of his words was loud.

"And still I hesitated," the man who'd been the Prince of Creusens ruefully said. "If this is the truth of us, my friends, then we have no business wearing crowns."

"A delicate heart ever bleeds," Princess Bertille snorted. "Bled all the way out, it seems. Keep your empty sentimentalities to yourself, Rohanon--"

"Shame on you all," the Grey Pilgrim said, and the light in his eyes as he spoke was the coldest manner of mercy.

The old man took one step forward, the butt of his staff leaving the ground.

"Raise your hand to a sitter of the Highest Assembly and there will be war, Levantine," Prince Rodrigo warned.

"He's right," the Saint of Swords casually said, laying a hand on his shoulder. "Go for a walk, Tariq."

"Laurence-"

"You, Sorcerer," the Princess of Lange barked, face gone pale with fright. "Are you not a chosen of the Heavens? Will you simply allow this lunatic thug to murder-"

The knife sliced her throat open without much of a spill, for Prince Arnaud Brogloise of Cantal had a steady hand.

"Arnaud?" the Prince of Orense gulped out.

The Prince of Cantal waited until the Princess of Lange had fallen to the ground before kneeling at her side, ignoring her dying gasps in favour of opening the clasp of her sheathed sword and taking it off her belt. He tossed it at my feet.

"Will this suffice?" he calmly asked, wiping his bloody knife on his forearm.

"It will," I agreed.

"You'll get the Regal Kindness for this, Brogloise," Princess Sophie darkly said. "I'll ask the First Prince the right to force it down your throat myself."

"Unlikely," the Prince of Cantal noted, pawing at his armour and producing a small scroll stamped with a seal. "By the decree of Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer and Warden of the West, I have been granted prior and absolute amnesty for all actions taken in the preservation of the Principate, as well as plenipotentiary power to treat with foreign powers in her name."

"You were one of hers," Princess Rozala faintly said. "Gods, Arnaud, for how long?"

"Hers, yours, Milenan's," the Prince of Cantal bitingly said. "What childish way of thinking. My only concern, Rozala Malanza, is the preservation of the Principate of Procer. What could possibly matter even remotely as much?"

Cool eyes turned to the other royals who had been bickering, until moments ago.

"Must I murder every last one of you, or will a blade at your throat prompt a sudden swell of heroism?" Prince Arnaud mildly asked.

"I like him," Kairos mused. "He's got that, what do you call it?"

"Cold-blooded ruthlessness," I said.

"No, that's not it. Ah, a knife," the Tyrant of Helike said.
"He's got a knife."

Princess Leonor of Valencis had taken off her gauntlets, and her fingers were working on her ornate silver-enamelled helm. What I had taken for a decorative circlet soldered onto it turned out to be a silver tiara cleverly set into furrows. The Arlesite princess tossed it onto the pile at my feet, smile mirthless.

"What a slaughter of thrones you have made of this night, Black Queen," she bitterly said. "A princes' graveyard, shallow dug at your behest."

I looked at her then, truly looked at her. She had been among those who had admired Malanza's character even as she balked at emulating it, and for that she had earned more than simply my contempt. No layabout royal, this one, for closer survey revealed hands calloused from the arts of war and scars on her skin that had the make of blades. Her eyes were not cowed, even in loss, and even in her earlier quibblings she had not been spineless. And yet. I looked at Leonor of Valencis and what I saw was good blood, old blood, conqueror's blood – gilded history, ancient triumphs erected into throne. I saw a woman who'd been taught of rights alongside right, privilege perhaps not unkindly borne but never once questioned. I thought of the High Lords, then, and of something Hakram had once told me under a moonlit sky. And they expected to win, too, he'd said, speaking of our enemy. Don't they always? Sooner or later, better blood wins out.

And I couldn't mend that, I knew, because it was not in my hands to shape this world like clay – and it was, perhaps, for the best that it was not. It belonged to more than me, that sprawl of terror and wonderment, of pettiness and valour. It would take more than an orphan girl from Laure to make something new of it, no matter what powers I came to wield. But now and then, I thought, now and then I could wield the knife my father had pressed into my hand all those years ago. And if it was not always given to me to bring something beautiful into Creation, then at least I could expunge some unseemly piece of it. You are part of this, Leonor of Valencis, I thought. Of this land of robber princes and hungry wars, of a tapestry of rapacious ambition so despised it took Akua's Folly for you to be trusted again. It might be that among your kind you are one of the better ones, but even should you not be guilty you would remain complicit.

Let them be thankful I had only taken crowns, for I could have taken a great deal more and lost not sleep over it. The only inheritance I'd ever cared to claim was steady hand and an indignant rage that had cowed kingdoms, and within it there was not a speck of mercy for the likes of Leonor of Valencis.

"Tremble then, o ye mighty," I coldly replied, "for a new age is upon you."

Rodrigo Trastanes wrapped his sword in a banner, before adding it to the pile. Sophie Louvroy ripped twin ornate silver wings off her gorget and shot me a burning glare after dropping them. Arnaud Brogloise, face betraying not a flicker of amusement, offered the knife still freshly touched by the lifeblood of the Princess of Lange. And with that, seven crowns had been laid at my feet – they were, now, mine to pass on if I so wished. I went looking through my cloak, producing a bundle of wakeleaf that ended up nestled nicely in my pipe. I passed a palm over it, added a flicker of Night shaped into flame and inhaled with a little sigh of pleasure. Expectant gazes had been turned on me, now that my scheme had borne first fruit. Pilgrim, Saint, Sorcerer, Tyrant. And myself, nameless but high priestess of unruly goddesses. I blew out a stream of smoke.

"Now," I said, "shall we go on an adventure?"

Behind me a breach into Arcadia tore opened.

So it began.

erraticerrata

First update of the month, which means extra chapter. As usual it's up in the Extra Chapter tab. This one is titled "Peers" and it's from Black's POV, set in between the books IV and V.

Mental Mouse

Yay! And we finally get an explanation of the crowns! Also a nice display of the Problem With Named that Cat has paradoxically been struggling with; on the battlefield, power trumps authority.

That said, I want to call out a textual problem: The first two sentences of this chapter are an ugly tone break. Cat's narrative tone is casual, almost conversational, but "Far be it from me" is downright chatty, something that should be in her italicized thoughts, not narrative voice (and especially not a chapter opening!). Likewise "when it came to, uh, the sheer number": That "uh" simply should not be outside dialogue quotes, and even in dialog, it's a bit "affected".

Normally I don't pick on tone (in part because you're pretty good at it), but those were glaring enough to poke me, even over my morning coffee.

Now off to the extra chapter!

Liliet

That's normal deep first person POV. Putting thoughts in quotes like that is imho an ugly narrative habit that sounds incredibly artificial.

Mental Mouse

It's a common convention, and one which EE uses routinely. In this chapter, consider the bit starting with You are part of this, Leonor of Valencis.... It's not aloud, so quotes are right out, but neither is it exactly part of the narrative. It's essentially internal dialogue, which many authors, including EE, show with italics.

Be glad this milieu doesn't include telepathic conversations or the like. I've occasionally seen books where authors had to distinguish 6 or more different speech contexts, from internal thoughts to radio messages to telepathy, cyber-implant messages, and shouting across the room. In the same scene. 😊

Liliet

Lmao.

Yeah I'm glad erratic doesn't go too fancy ♥

Belac93

Wholly disagree here. Sometimes you need to focus more on making a story sound good than proper grammar, and those fit very well for a first person POV

Mental Mouse

The problem is that both, and especially the "uh", make sense for speech, but in a written account they appear "affected" (and would probably be edited out in-world 😊). Compare to, say, Steven Brust's voice for Vlad Taltos – he is supposed to be dictating his memoirs, but somewhere the text has been cleaned up for publication or archive; his narration is downright chatty, and he has plenty of interjections in dialog, but AFAIR they don't appear in narrative voice.

Also, "focus more on making a story sound good than proper grammar" is equivalent to "oh, it's just a beta version".

Which it is, but quibbles like mine (and the typo threads) are meant for the next round of (copy)editing, which is very much about cleaning up such issues. If you tell a programmer "oh, I didn't report the bug because it's just a beta version", they will hate you. 😊

Seven Crowns laid at the feet of darkness, seven symbols of power. Seven Crowns required to pay the toll, to approach damnation.

ThatOneGuy

But who was that one?

Ben Serreau-Raskin

At this point I have expected it to be Cat's. If she makes a sacrifice to make the road happen along with the other princes, it solidifies her narrative as a heroic figure making ugly choices out of necessity instead of a villain scheming to topple the kingdoms of her former opponents. There may also be additional mystical or narrative benefits, considering the 'one' crown has been referred to as somehow setting the tone for the sacrifice.

At this point Cat has a successor whose faith in her is considered by a mind reader to be almost more dangerous than a Name and two of her armies are already following her purely on the strength of her reputation and power rather than any feudal oaths. Putting the crown of Callow into hands loyal to her removes a significant plank of the Crusade's cassus belli against her without significantly affecting her ability to steer the Kingdom's destiny. This whole section has been her proving that she can get what she wants off of raw scheming.

Argentorum

I'd agree, but remember there's the Summerholm girl who still hasn't reached the end of her story. And Vivienne has only been named Heiress apparent, Cat has yet to abdicate in her favor before this.

So I don't think Cat can give up her crown yet, until Abigail of Summerholm and Vivian Dartwick reach the end of their respective stories and one of them is ready to be crowned Queen of Callow.

In short, the timing doesn't feel right. I won't be super upset if I'm wrong though.

Vhostym

I also wouldn't be terribly upset, but the one I really want to see be "the one" is Black, with only Masego reverse possessing Neshamah into surrendering his crown as a bigger win. After all, in some sense Black is still the King of Callow, or at least still has the "Right to Rule", so there is, maybe, something to be used there. And he is the only one for whom this surrender of his authority would be truly negligible. After all, even though Catherine wants to abdicate, she can't afford to do so yet. Also, I really want one of the loose ends Ivah was dealing with to be reclaiming his soul from the Rogue Sorcerer.

pagesbe

No, he once was effectively "King of Callow" but has not been such for years. If there is one ruler, and a second ruler replaces him, he no longer has a "right-to-rule" to give up.

caoimhinh

I would argue that even after passing the throne to another, 'the right to rule' is kept. Take for example Tariq, as Grey Pilgrim born from the Pilgrim's Blood, he is the one with the undisputable right to rule Levant, but he has refused that right for decades and constantly knelt in front of the different Seljuns to consolidate their rule. Yet he still has the right to rule.

Even if it's not valid once the throne is passed to another, Amadeus was the ruler of Callow, is the father of the current Queen of Callow, which makes him a mortal ruler. And even if THAT is also invalid, He is one of the few people with the recognized capability to make a claim for the Tower of Ater, making him someone with a right to rule Praes.

caoimhinh

I don't think Abigail is going to be Queen of Callow. She is following Catherine's groove on Fate (with an Orc adjutant by her side too) but she isn't walking the path of the girl who claims the throne, she is walking the path of the girl who fights to protect her home. That's what makes Abigail the spiritual successor of Catherine, her passing on the torch is not the inheritance of the crown.

Remember Catherine Foundling's Heraldry: Scales comparing the weights of a crown and a sword, and the crown was found lacking. For Cat, the sword will always weight more than the crown, that's what she values more.

That's why while Vivienne may be the heiress to the Crown of Callow, Abigail is the real successor of Catherine's story, she is the next Sword of Callow.

Liliet

NICE

Oshi

Not yet she isn't. She needs a forging moment. Something to clear the cobwebs and make her bear down with her will.

Liliet

I agree. The intertwined narrative+political benefit for Cat here is too tremendous to ignore, though it's still possible something else will happen instead, forcing her to keep her crown yet.

Decius

Has Cat had a chance to contact Ranger yet?

Because the crown doesn't need to be voluntarily given, and the one that would have the biggest impact would be the Dead King's. And Ranger has a habit of annoying the Dead King.

Too bad there isn't a Thief anymore, that would be more narrative-appropriate.

Mental Mouse

Again, they have to be mortal crowns. DK is nothing of the sort.

NZPIEFACE

>"Now," I said, "shall we go on an adventure?"

Adventure Time!

caoimhinh

Come on, grab your friends!

John

We'll go to very distant lands.

And when The Lich gets involved, things become a lot less funny.

Liliet

Cat the villain and Tariq the hero~

Mental Mouse

... and together, none can stand against them!

medailyfun

Catherine is Fionna and ... who's the Cake?

caoimhinh

Either Hakram or Robber, hahaha.

antoninjohn

I wonder how bad Levant well end up under that curse once the Pilgrim gives up his crown

matesbe

I suspect that will be Catherine's excuse to stop being the Queen of Callow actually. She's even set up Viv as her successor. That doesn't mean she'll stop being associate with Callow of course, but she might spend more time with the Drow and be an adviser/high general instead of literal ruler.

byzantine279

It would also help appease Pilgrim, I think. For her to cast aside her crown in such a way she can never truly take it back up.

Dainpdf

That, or she casts down the Tyrant. She has mentioned multiple times how he is a problem.

Although... third time at Liesse, even figuratively, third time with a queen Name... it's that pattern of three.

Dainpdf

Added comment: abdicating her right to rule would not help with commanding the Drow, I expect. Which might put a kibosh on her attempt to lead them against the Dead King. Maybe Priestess or First in the Night doesn't count?

matesbe

Tyrant is not going to give up his crown. He'd probably rather let the entire group die, and that's not worth it for Cat, not when Pilgrim would probably be perfectly happy to give up a crown he never really wanted and Catherine has practically been looking for an excuse to step down.

She doesn't rule the Drow, she's a representative of Sve Noc. She won't give that right up anymore than, say, Hakram could fill the position because of how much running the kingdom he does (regardless of that, he's not the ruler, and she's not the ruler of the Drow).

Plus, and this is more shaky, I'm not sure if giving up right to rule in one place means you have to give it up in all places.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, ruling any place would be impossible.

"It would," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Though ever bearing another crown would birth it anew."

Dainpdf

The Pilgrim himself said that taking up another crown wouldn't work. One of the Princes was considering abdication of one of them to another.

Tyrant is not going to give up his crown... who said anything about it being voluntary!? As for the Pilgrim, I rather doubt he'd give up an important tool for Good when he could just maneuver it onto Kairos instead.

On Cat, I argued farther below about the pattern of three, and there is the potential issue I raised above.

Or maybe with her Rozala maneuver Cat was preparing a precedent for her, being the one willing to give up, to be the one saved. We'll see.

Kissaten

Rozala faegates would be too vulnerable to Dead King's digging tactics

Liliet

Fist of the Night definitely doesn't count, because she doesn't rule them. Sve Noc does. Catherine is second in command and an intermediary, she's a trusted advisor and a guide, not actually in charge.

And trying to use this to cast down the Tyrant isn't going to lead to anything good. Best case scenario you're still fucking up Helike as collateral damage.

Dainpdf

Maybe. He's likely to lose his Name (or some of its potency) if it happens.

He's also likely to be overthrown or killed by a band of heroes in short order if he clings to the throne.

Liliet

Hmm, yeah.

esryok

Strange things would likely befall the Losara Sigil, though. I expect it'll have to become the Ivah Sigil.

Liliet

Ehhh. I don't think being a commanding officer is ruled out by this.

caoimhinh

Maybe, that seems the most likely option between the 3 (Catherine, Kairos, Tariq), but that's too straightforward. My own suspicion is that she will use Amadeus. He has, after all, the possibility to make a claim for the Tower, but more importantly, he is a 'king/ruler' Narratively (with enough weight to it that Catherine could use that to get The Penitent's Blade out of the stone in Liesse). He ruled Callow for 20 years too. So he definitely qualifies.

"The one we'll bring with us into the deeps, to be bestowed only at the heart of it."

It is very likely that Rogue Sorcerer is carrying Amadeus' soul sealed into an object with him right now (It would be ironic if they put his soul into a crown of some sort). It might even give her the chance she is waiting for, to recover him from the Heroes' hands.

By the time they are in the deeps, they won't be able to refuse Cat's plan.

Liliet

Catherine wants Amadeus to rule Praes down the line.

Herself, she doesn't want to rule anything.

Oshi

the hint with Benevolent the First from the beginning of the book comes to mind. Black is out of the game for this one.

What hint with Benevolent the First?????

I am still of the opinion that this is a historical Dread Emperor, whom we haven't heard of in the narrative proper like we haven't heard of Dread Empress Massacre – because there's a lot of epigraphs and a lot of Dreads, and nobody has time to talk about them all.

So, they don't need to be alive for their crown to count. They should be grateful Catherine didn't literally take it off their corpses the ingrates.

Wow that was cold. The point was, there's a bigger picture, and literally only three of them realized that (or if more did, their self-superiority/greed overruled it). I mean, these people do realize that if this doesn't work they're all going to die, right? And here I thought Saint was the loony. Well, she is, but apparently she's not the only one.

I expect that there would be another option beyond abdication to avoid the curse on their lands for giving up their "right to rule": the seizure of a villainous Name, because the only right that Below recognises is that might makes right.

byzantine279

No. It isn't just Above. Both sets of gods turn their backs on you. Because while Below accepts might makes right you "lost" when you gave up your crown, and so can never be worthy of holding such a crown again.

nick012000

Meant to post this as a top-level post:

Mental Mouse

I agree with byzantyne279: A villainous Name wouldn't help, even if they could somehow get a ruling Name, they'd just become a King/Queen of Misrule. With heroes lined up for the story of their overthrow.

To be use an old tried and true saying, absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Fayhem

Not to be That Guy (I'm kind of going to be That Guy), but umtechnically Lord Acton's maxim was that power tends to corrupt, and absolute power tends to corrupt absolutely. I realize that sounds very similar, but to me it's an important distinction not just because I'm kind of pedantic about quotes but because including the qualification also speaks to a deep truth of human nature. Namely, that in fact there are no absolute truths regarding human nature. You can establish broad and potentially very strong trends or tendencies, but no matter what the rule it will always be possible for there to be an exception.

And yes I can see that I just stated that there are no absolute truths as an absolute truth so PARADOX AMIRITE, but I really do feel that an absolute denial of absolutes is meaningfully distinct enough not to count as an example of what it's denying, in much the same way that I feel that intolerance of intolerance in fact should not itself be considered a form of intolerance. YMMV of course.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, there's a more recent saying in reply to Lord Acton: "Nothing corrupts so much as a little power". This article discusses a study demonstrating that in the real world (but doesn't source the quote 🙄): <https://io9.gizmodo.com/a-little-power-corrupts-way-more-than-absolute-control-5842587>

Briefly, when an otherwise low-status person gets a small amount of power over others, they are prone to both defend it, and abuse the hell out of it. This is the classic scenario for petty bureaucrats making life hell for their supposed clients, or just extorting bribes and favors. Or low-level managers taking out their frustrations on their workers, or anyone who (thinks) they've got the upper hand working the hell out of it. Or for that matter, schoolyard bullies, with no formal power, but they're a little stronger than their victims. It's also a major driver of misogyny and sexism, when men who can't kick back against their bosses/officers/etc get to take it out on their wives, girlfriends, daughters, or other women.

Anyway, just look at customerssuck.com or notalwaysright.com (turn the commas into periods). The central theme of the latter site especially is customers trying to abuse store workers, and/or punish ("I'm gonna get you fired!") the workers for not submitting to their abuse, and often getting away with it because of spineless managers or corporate dictum that “the customer is always right”. But on both sites, you’ll also see endless stories of managers/supervisors jerking around workers; cashiers jerking around customers; teachers bullying or otherwise abusing students; doctors refusing to believe or treat (usually female) patients....

Fayhem

I... okay? I don’t particularly disagree with or dispute any of that (other than a general epistemological hesitancy to commit to accepting broad conclusions on the basis of a single data point/study), but I’m not quite following how it’s a response to what I said.

Also, just as an aside the article does actually source the quote, though unfortunately neither link actually pulls up the study in question (that’s the problem with eight year old links I’m afraid). Look in the italicized bit under the annoying video thing.

Mental Mouse

And a lengthy aside – I’ve pulled this into a separate comment to limit the distraction, but it’s very much relevant to privilege:

One of the most “fantastic” aspects of the Guide in general is that nobody ever pulls “just a girl” on Cat, or on any other woman we’ve seen, Named or otherwise. Not in any of the cultures we’ve seen, and there’s no reason given, why none of these human cultures show the sexism that was endemic to nearly all of the historical cultures they hint at. (And the non-human cultures we see are all equally egalitarian, or actually matriarchal.)

I haven’t reread the early books yet, but: It’s supposed to be a big deal that Black and Cat don’t tolerate rape in his ranks, but I don’t recall any example of someone actually getting punished for it. IIRC the only appearance of prostitution in the Guide is a nice brothel patronized by the soldiers, where we’re assured that the girls are well-protected, and Our Heroes wait for their soldiers to finish up before collecting them. None of those orphanage girls (or boys for that matter) were making “easy money” where the matron can’t see? Really? Even the Evil Praesi nobles seem to confine their lusts to their peers.

For that matter, there’s actually a gaping hole in the Guide’s world: Where are the camp followers for the armies, and the servants, seamstresses, laundresses, cooks, maids, etc for those palaces? Cat’s bar has barmaids, because of course it does, but (per my last paragraph) if any customer gets fresh with them, out comes the club. Later we see a few other barmaids, one of whom flirts with Cat. A few servants are mentioned at the Praesi parties, but they're strictly wallpaper. (And servants are at least relevant to security issues, especially with mind-readers and mind-controllers in play!) Oh yeah, Marchford is surrendered by a noble, whose charge of housekeeping (or sanitation?) is a passing joke, but IIRC we don't deal seriously with any of his workers.

Javvies

Barring some sort of secret gender disparity in magical potential or Name potential, which we more or less have firm indications/implications that they're isn't one ...

Magical abilities are a huge equalizer – marginally superior physical ability is rendered irrelevant by being set on fire by the mind of one less physically adept.

Likewise, I'm pretty sure that somewhere Cat muses about one or more female Named enforcing gender equality. It may have happened somewhere else too, but I'm pretty sure it was mentioned at least once in connection with the War College ... something about an early Dread Empress firing someone opposed to female cadets from a catapult or something along those lines.

Plus, let's not forget that the Wandering Bard is a female. Or at least appears to be a female.

luminousblu

Not him but:

It seems that mages and Named are all supremely rare. It would be more like extraordinary talents being harnessed than anything else, not inherent equality. This is not mentioning the physiological and biological facts on the ground that caused 'patriarchal' societies to dominate in real life – namely, that men are just straight up massively stronger than women on an individual basis and that men are – unless you lose enough to destroy crop yields – ultimately replaceable, while each and every woman is precious insofar as there's a limit on how many kids they can actually have, among other factors. In real life, exceptional women still often became a big deal, but you always have to remember that there is no prejudice that began without reason.

The reason these things aren't gamechangers in our own world is because we've moved past the point where childrearing and childbirthing are essentially full time jobs for women and past the point where the physical strength of arms is the decisive factor in battles (although I do believe men still perform better, which biologically makes a lot of sense), as well as past the point where farmhands were in eternally short supply.

Lastly, the concept of female Named automatically supporting women's rights is...dubious, at best, when we look at actual evidence from history. A few of them, I'm sure, would've been big on it. This doesn't in and of itself make an overall trend strongly opposed to biology and the agrarian society we see feasible, especially when you consider that most of them likely absorbed a culture that – for all its moral ills from our perspective – actually worked, as well as their followers who most likely didn't share their views on equality. Remember that some of the most famous 'female Named' in our own world – Jeanne d'Arc, Qin Liangyu, Ching I Sao, Isabella I of Spain, etc. were pretty strongly opposed to the advancement of women and Jeanne rather famously told an admirer the equivalent of 'get back in the kitchen'.

The only real explanation is that the biology from our world doesn't apply to the Guideverse, which, while reasonable, is also generally not to be assumed without explicit notice otherwise.

Mental Mouse

One quibble: Biology does not make men "massively" larger and stronger than women. It makes them average, slightly larger and stronger. But cultural factors (often based on that "a little power" thing) can drastically exaggerate that, when women get discouraged from "overexertion" or "unwomanly" activities, told to starve themselves to be slender, excluded from "manly" sports that would build their strength (and confidence), etc.. As in, say, much of America before "Title IX" was passed in 1972. And professional women's sports teams still get treated as unwanted stepchildren at best. (Unless they're competing in revealing outfits, of course! 😊)

But individual variation and training can easily overwhelm that statistical difference. Consider me and my little sister. I'm 10 inches taller and at least 65 pounds heavier than her... but if it came to a fight, she'd kick my ass, because she's a lifetime athlete who's ranged from gymnastics to triathlons (with a bit of martial arts tucked in), while I'm a paunchy chair jockey who... walks a lot, when I'm not sitting in front of a computer. For that matter, as a average-height and not-athletic guy, I meet a lot of women who are bigger and/or stronger than I am.

luminiousblu

Human males are massively larger and stronger than females. The height of women is significantly lower in every country than the height of men. This is an indisputable biological fact, no reputable scientific journal or encyclopedia-style website will tell you otherwise. Men gain muscle mass incredibly easily compared to women. Remember this is an agrarian society where people do work considered backbreaking by today's standards on a daily basis from childhood as well. Humans didn't suddenly decide that men were going to do all the work and women were going to sit at home having kids for no reason – even beyond the fact that a late-pregnant woman or a woman nursing a child can't really do any heavy labour, they simply don't gain muscle as quickly. They DO do a few other things better than men – their super-long-distance running is generally better and they are a lot more efficient at utilising energy in times of need, but for most purposes pertaining to the needs of the preindustrial military they're physically inferior specimens.

>professional women's sports teams

Because they're worse. Flat out, straight up worse. It's excuses and honestly insulting that you'd dismiss the training regimes that women's sports teams go through, developed through research, experience, and genuine desire to be the best they can, because of culture. Compare the average times and world records for men and women in a hundred yard dash, weight lift, or any other 'pure' metric (it's much harder to compare tennis or whatever since it's so heavily composite). The biology simply does not work in the favour of females and no amount of quibbling is going to change the facts on the ground.

>me and my little sister

Totally irrelevant. This is anecdotal evidence, coming from someone whose older sister could destroy me with a single hand if she so felt like it. A man who's trained WILL destroy a woman of the same level of training and comparable physique, this is simply how our bodies are built – barring a highly unusual woman, men are simply more suited to physical work. Your special example is taking the best woman and the average man, or the average woman and the crippled man, and saying therefore it's not a big deal. The army can't be comprised solely of the best of the best – and even if it were, the best that males have to offer is simply better than the best women have to offer, which is often inferior to even the fairly decent that men have to offer. And that's sensible from a biological point of view once you consider the interests and reproductive strategies that male and female members of the human race take.

And to make this clear I'm not making an 'ought' statement, nor am I commenting on the morality of feminism or the patriarchy or anything else. I have no personal quibbles with strong women (although as I pointed out it doesn't tend to make a whole lot of sense in the mass that we see for purely biological reasons) I'm making an 'is' statement. It IS fact that women are significantly weaker than men. Whether or not this means they OUGHT to stay in the kitchen is up to you, but historically, that IS often what's been concluded.

You may find the essay "We Have Always Fought" to be interesting, if you haven't seen it yet: <http://aidanmoher.com/blog/featured-article/2013/05/we-have-always-fought-challenging-the-women-cattle-and-slaves-narrative-by-kameron-hurley/>

I could go through point by point to refute this. I could point out that just because women have 'always fought' doesn't mean they tended to fight long-term. I could point out that the author, who has a rather poor grasp of language, opens with a page and a half of text that essentially attempts to discredit any counterarguments before they're presented by projecting his own, possibly made-up, failings on other people with that llama rant. I could point out that the text clearly is not interested in an actual examination of details but instead is attempting to present a narrative. I could even go and say the tone is incredibly self-assured, considering the dude while in university didn't know about female fighters and calls himself a 'self-aware misogynist', being totally unaware of how smug this makes him sound. I could say that his professor was mightily short on details, even though even someone like me could start giving examples of female fighters and the situations in which they were common. I could point out that he makes a big deal of women 'doing things' but doesn't mention how often it's done, thereby skewing the wording – right after he notes that the words used can affect how we view things. I could point out that he's retroactively assigning labels, motivations, and values that simply were not prevalent at the time, which is a rather common theme among people trying to find historical justification for their values.

I won't, though. Because the article, despite having a sidebar proclaiming they're interested in "truth", isn't interested in truth. It's interested in a narrative, and in challenging a narrative, because what is doesn't fit his idea of what should be. If every single source tells you that women didn't do this or that, his idea is that surely it was a fucking conspiracy and we're being fed lies, and it's up to his noble soul to take a stand and say what nobody else is willing to. Because he thinks he's far more intelligent than he actually fucking is.

And before you point out that it's a woman, if it indeed is one, I'm unsure of and not particularly interested in the gender – it doesn't affect the contents of the blog, because I refuse to call this pile of garbage an essay. No writing which puts in scare quotes the words "proof" and "history" deserves to be called an essay.

You'll probably note that I'm super angry about this. I am. But that's because I've seen quite enough of these sorts of rants for an entire lifetime, and that these sorts of low-quality arguments drag down any honest efforts at revealing truth, advancing society, or whatever you may want to do. Unless you just want to advance your own values and feel good about yourself, choosing your words so very carefully because even though truth is what it is, nobody needs to know the truth. In which case, yes, carry on.

I had seen it before, but quite a while ago, and it was good to re-read it. Thanks for linking.

> Humans didn't suddenly decide that men were going to do all the work and women were going to sit at home having kids for no reason – even beyond the fact that a late-pregnant woman or a woman nursing a child can't really do any heavy labour, they simply don't gain muscle as quickly.

They didn't "decide that", period. At the farming level, women have always done serious work, including physical labor such as housecleaning (try it, without appliances, if you don't think it's physical work), carrying water, churning milk, pounding grain/cassava/etc, cooking for the rest of the family (ditto, again without appliances or pre-packaged food), taking care of domestic animals (and often butchering them too), and for that matter often joining the men in the fields. Plus skilled work such as spinning, weaving, making and repairing clothes and household equipment, making such medicines as were available, etc. And no, they didn't get to take it easy when they were pregnant – the chores still needed doing and the food needed cooking regardless. If they were lucky, they might have relatives or neighbors to help out when they were pregnant or sick.

Women "sitting at home having kids" and otherwise idle, was for families who are rich enough to support non-workers, which in the Guide (and most historical) context means nobility and some of the merchants. Except that historically, even most noblewomen typically did at least the fabric arts, because few nobles were cash-rich enough to simply buy clothes for their entire household. (Remember, hand-made all the way from fiber to wearable items.) Also note various fairy tales featuring princesses spinning, weaving, etc. "Hawthorn Rose" aka Sleeping Beauty is the most famous, though Rumpelstiltskin and the weaver Arachne also come to mind offhand.

The rest of your message amounts to "men are big and strong and women are weak little things", at volume. In fact, you're providing an excellent example of a man trying to enforce male dominance and suppress any suggestion that male superiority isn't absolute and eternal.

Except: 1) There's not many Named running around compared to the masses of society in general – indeed, some cultures have very few of them. 2) Bluntly, a single Named, even an Empress, hunting down chauvinists (or more likely, killing the ones they personally encountered) would not do much to affect their society in general. To say nothing of the backlash after they got killed. 3) Every society on the continent, including the Praesi who are explicitly dedicated to doing whatever their individual power allows them to?

As I said, this is a fantastical element of the milieu, so I don't intend to continue making a point of it. But I figured it was worth one good callout in a discussion of privilege; as I noted above, in our world privilege and its associated power imbalances are deeply intertwined with sexism and misogyny.

That said, there is one factor visible which would work strongly against sexism: The wide availability of magical and priestly healing. If a barmaid/pit fighter can afford to get a black eye healed, that strongly suggests that such healing is also available to childbearing mothers, and to children. Looking across the societies of our world, the single strongest correlate for women's rights, is the wide availability of medical care for children and pregnant women. That's specifically because such medical care means women don't have to keep popping kids out (often dying in childbirth) in hopes enough of them survive to work the farm/shop/etc and take care of their aged parents.

werafdsaew

You're forgetting that the Names are the main characters in story books, and what gets written about in history books. They're huge celebrities, trend setters, and whom children look at to emulate. Bluntly, an Empress hunting down chauvinists she encounters would inevitably lead to other people doing the same to avenge for a slight, or simply as an excuse to get rid of an opponent.

Javvies

Maybe, maybe not.

Sure, an individual can have only limited direct impact ... but indirectly? And a Named? Those can, and often will, be much larger in impact.

A Dread Empress opening the Imperial War College to female cadets? And then making examples out of everyone who opposed her decision?
That's huge.

Plus, let's not forget – the enemies of pre-Dead King Keter were led by a Witch-Queen.
The Wandering Bard/Intercessor has the physical appearance of a female.

(And the non-human cultures we see are all equally egalitarian, or actually matriarchal.)

To start from the bottom, IIRC every non-human culture we've seen is based on a non-human species that doesn't appear to have appreciable sexual dimorphism, which is the premise usually employed to argue why we should totally expect sexism against women to be the default. With regards to da humies, I think it's worth stipulating explicitly that while the cultures we've seen appear to clearly draw from real-world cultures in some ways, they are not those cultures. “Historical accuracy” doesn't really apply when you're not talking about history.

Internal consistency is still a thing, mind – that's why I don't have much patience for the argument that I keep seeing people make that goes something like “but dragons aren't real so y u mad that a fantasy army can march three times as fast as an army of the specified type should be able to lol". Because unless the fantasy world specified also has an explanation for why logistics/transport/whatever are meaningfully different then it should still legitimately be held to the standard of how things work in reality. If you were talking about a fantasy setting that's historical France but with dragons or whatever, then if you're not going to have any references to sexism it would make sense to have an explanation of why the heck not since historical French culture had plenty of that kind of shit. But (to bring it back towards the Guide) Alamans culture isn't French culture. It's Alamans culture. The simple fact that historical French culture was sexist doesn't suffice as an indication of why Alamans culture should by default be presumed sexist unless explained otherwise. You would have to argue for why a culture at that tech level should inherently be sexist, which I guess is what luminiousblu has been doing in his own comments.

Personally I don't buy it, though. Arguments in that regard seem to tend to boil down to "but preindustrial warfare tho", but there are plenty of instances of women leading armies and engaging in combat in various preindustrial eras. It's true that in our history those have been more the exception than the rule but again, this is not our history and it does suffice to demonstrate that it is in fact a plausible phenomenon at that tech level. Kameron Hurley (a largely pretty well-regarded fantasy/spec fic author, though I haven't read any of her stuff personally as of yet) had a good essay about it that I think actually won a Hugo for best related work or some such. You can find it reproduced here if you're interested and you haven't already read it: <http://aidanmoher.com/blog/featured-article/2013/05/we-have-always-fought-challenging-the-women-cattle-and-slaves-narrative-by-kameron-hurley/>

>You would have to argue for why a culture at that tech level should inherently be sexist, which I guess is what luminiousblu has been doing in his own comments. Most societies were, to some degree, sexist. It is the exception that they were not. Unless you believe there to be a global conspiracy to paint them as sexist when they are not (which is what that blog seems to be insinuating), or that they had somehow been brought together by aliens to be sexist, clearly there is a fundamental reason why they tended in that direction. This is much like how in most large societies, the first 'kings' were often religious leaders as well, or how almost every settled society that fought regular wars gravitated towards spear formations, or why basically every early civilisation centre and even ones today are either coastal or near rivers. This isn't some sort of accident, the point isn't to somehow pretend it doesn't count, it's to either look into what might've caused this or to somehow show there is no pattern. The problem is that, barring new and widespread evidence, as far as we know there IS a pattern.

>It's true that in our history those have been more the exception than the rule but again, this is not our history and it does suffice to demonstrate that it is in fact a plausible phenomenon at that tech level. This is highly arguable. What we'll notice is that firstly almost every large, settled society – ones that resembled states as we would see them – was to some extent sexist. Secondly, we'll notice that it IS an exception, and most of those societies that were an exception were wiped out by ones that weren't. So clearly, something is happening. Now, yes, obviously this is not our world. Is it possible that women just aren't weaker? Course. I'm pretty sure that's what's happening – otherwise the concept of tons and tons of women in the army is retarded. Is it possible that childcare is unusually advanced, such that you can have three kids and be confident that they'll live to see adulthood? Yeah. That works. Could it be that EE simply doesn't want to address the problem of sexism? Sure, if I were to write a story I wouldn't bother with that because I like the idea of overpowered girls or female high officials. But I would not say that it's actually plausible, if none of those hold, for almost every single society to basically not give a damn.

>leading armies

The problem here is that this is the exception, not the rule. Barring cases where the lady of the house lead defences or the occasional female warlord (or, in the case of certain steppe peoples, the rather common female warlord) lead, we don't really have any records of this happening on a large scale.

>in armies

Yes, this happened at times. Jeanne was not the only woman in the French army, she was merely one of the youngest and certainly the most important. But at the same time Joan never actually struck a blow, was arguably not actually very good at leading men (her tactics were not extraordinarily sound, just extremely unusual). But again, most of the army was still comprised of men, and most women did not simply march off to war. There's sound reasons for this.

All in all I do feel like a lot of people think that the peoples of old simply decided one day to be jerks for no reason at all. Every value they held was meaningful at one point or another. Superstitions, cultural values, or legends don't just spontaneously appear out of nowhere, especially not one so widespread. They can overstay their welcome, but at some point it had to have made sense.

Fayhem

I don't think I've ever even once had a good time from trying to engage deeply with someone on the internet who self-identifies as "super angry" about something, so I'm going to limit my reply to your two comments to the single point below; you're welcome to comment again yourself of course, but this will be my last reply. You stated:

> Superstitions, cultural values, or legends don't just spontaneously appear out of nowhere, especially not one so widespread. They can overstay their welcome, but at some point it had to have made sense.

No, it really doesn't. To pick one example (there are plenty), it was the overwhelming medical consensus in the whole Western world for literally centuries that bleeding patients was a beneficial treatment instead of something that almost always, as in 99%+ of the time, either accelerated or outright caused the death of patients. But that has never been true, even for a single second, at any point in history. Bleeding patients is not only bad right now, it literally always has been.

You say that "I do feel like a lot of people think that the peoples of old simply decided one day to be jerks for no reason at all", and that's actually pretty true as far as that being a popular misconception. But you find the salience of pointing out that it's a misconception in entirely the wrong place. You take it as meaning that actually, the peoples of old must have really had a point underlying the stuff they believed in and practiced. But as I've stated, that is not inherently true by any measure. The salience of people in the past not inherently being any worse/dumber than people in the present is that people in the present are not inherently any better/smarter. It's not an argument for why people in the past were actually pretty correct/at least had a point for all the stuff they did, it's a caution that we today possess no inherent quality protecting us from believing in things just as fucked up and stupid as anything we might condemn in the past (see the flat earth/antivax people for reference).

Anyway, like I said, that's the last thing I had to say here. See you in future posts!

Liliet

>One of the most "fantastic" aspects of the Guide in general is that nobody ever pulls "just a girl" on Cat, or on any other woman we've seen, Named or otherwise.

Actually, the theme was present very early on in the first several chapters when Cat was non-Named. She mentioned 'a girl' multiple times as a reason for her to be underestimated, and of course it was the orphanage's policy to make 'proper ladies' out of its charges that stood in her way so much.

The impression I got is that there's still low key sexism/misogyny surviving in the culture, but by now it's only targeted at low status women. Cordelia bears the remnants of old sexist tradition with pride as a symbol of her homeland, she hadn't been hurt by it. All we've seen of armies and commanding structures shows that in nobility, and in at least Praesi legions, this mentality has been excised so thoroughly as to not even leave a scar beyond the 'no rape' regulation needing to linger in the latter.

And Named, of course, are the Word of God-explained source of this scourge against sexism. One of the early Dread Empresses was mentioned to have used the War College headmaster who had refused to teach women as catapult fodder; can you imagine someone telling Laurence what she can and cannot do, even were she to live in a time where that was commonplace?

So what lingers of sexism – and we do see the shades of it in the corners still – survives by utterly excluding anyone who can actually wield power from it.

As for the gaping hole, I think it's more a matter of focus. These people are known to exist and there are no actual plot holes of them not being there while they should have been that I can think of; but they do not get narrative attention. That... feels fair enough to me. The story can't cover everything.

Also the widely available healing is a point I somewhat skipped over here, but – yes, that would change a great deal of dynamics, alongside magic.

Dainpdf

The thing about privilege is it tends to seem natural unless one cares to (or is forced to) look it in the face. Not always an easy feat, if one doesn't even know it's there, but something every ruler should do.

Mental Mouse

To steal a line from the social-justice movement: Losing an unearned privilege feels exactly the same as losing a natural right. The difference lies in how it affects other people.

sengachi

Ohhh. I'm pretty sure I've heard that line before but I'd forgotten it. Thank you for the reminder, it's a fantastic phrase.

Andrew Mitchell

Rozala's awesome. IMO she's got potential to carve herself out a Name now that she doesn't have to worry about ruling and politics. There's plenty of scope for new (or old) names to emerge in this fight with the Dead King. I just hope we get to see what she does next.

caoimhinh

She kept her crown and right to rule, so she still has to worry about such things.
Besides, she has been building up all this time as a challenger/successor for Cordelia as First Prince of Procer. And she wants to kill Cordelia because she is responsible for the death of Rozala's mother.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, thanks. Of course you're right. I remembered that she kept her crown AFTER I posted.

I had totally forgotten that she wanted to kill Cordelia though. Thanks for the reminder.

Liliet

Hmm, I'm seeing the narrative buildup there quite differently.

Admittedly I've been a great fan of Cordelia since her first introduction and that colors my perspective; then again, I've been a fan for a reason.

What I see is buildup towards Rozala getting over herself and despite never forgiving her mother's death, working with Cordelia regardless, because personal is not the same as important and few things are as important as political unity right now. Rozala actually going for revenge there would undermine a lot of guide's themes and her entire arc of seeing what the true horrors are. Cordelia has known the true horrors all along, that was part of her motivation for intervening in the civil war: that they could not afford to fight it with the external enemies that they have. Rozala's mother died for a reason; ignoring that reason is not how I expect this narrative to unfold.

Catherine has been blithely ignoring the fact she was on the kill list of kid heroes, because she has deemed it entirely irrelevant to the situation. That is what I'm seeing as a basic direction here: it's possible to go too far down that slope, and the narrative has been steadily building up that counterpoint too, but Rozala pursuing a personal grudge and seizing power for herself would be very far towards the other end.

>I looked at the Princess of Aquitan, then and what I saw on her face grieved me. Nothing in the loss of a crown moved me to sorrow, for I had little taste for mine and no reverence for those who'd earned their own by mere happenstance of birth. It was the raw, bleak disappointment I saw in a respected adversary as she stared the truth of her home in the eye. That, even as the sky was falling down on their heads, there were princes and princesses of Procer who would rather squabble than look up.

That's "working with Cordelia" buildup, not "being the next First Prince" buildup.

Dainpdf

Oh my, the Arnaud reveal was great. The Rozala acknowledgement, too. Very nice.

Really liked the note about unquestioned privilege.

But, most important of all: Adventure Time!

Adventure Time

Come on grab your friends

We'll go to very distant lands

With Kairos the Villain and Tariq the Hero

The fun will never end, Adventure Time!

Adventure time, lets knife, lie and bet. We'll go with rogue who we don't know yet
With Cat the Queen and Kai the Tyrant, the fun never ends it's Adventure time!

Black Queen Cat is a great villian, but she'll play the hero if it helps her win.
She keeps dying then still kicks butt, and she will stay mortal no matter what.

Tyrant Karois has a messed up eye he's your very best friend who will make you die.
Done well for a sickly boy
Betraying you all is his greatest joy.

Adventure Time come on lose your throne, we'll build a high-way with God bones, with Saint the Sword and Grey the Pilgrim the fun will never end it's adventure time!

Of all the heroes cross the land
Tariq always lends a hand
When hero stories' in a funk
He surprises you with brutal junk

Laurence Montfort is a cut machine
Shes a thousand years old and really mean
She kills evil across the board

Mental Mouse

I loved Arnaud's sudden turn to "enough of playing stupid, it's showtime"!

Andrew Mitchell

And exactly the right timing to fulfill the trust Cordelia placed in him.

I hope we get to see more of him.

IDKWhoitis

I called it, obstacles became "casualties".

Also, I love the Prince of Cantal, a true patriot to the bitter end.

konstantinvoncarstein

It seems that not every prince was smart enough to divine it.

IDKWhoitis

At least the ones that mattered did.

Morgenstern

Yeah, a true patriot... and, unless I am at fault for a mixup of something, they spoke of him being a rapist, too... much to love there...

konstantinvoncarstein

I think this is a mixup 😊

Yes, he is a patriot. He made sure his country could be saved by eliminating a danger to it.

caoimhinh

That's an act. Mostly everything they knew about Arnaud was a lie that he built so they would despise and underestimate him. So he could position himself to have influence without being considered a threat.

Rozala's spies informed her that he was a rapist and someone who spent time in debauchery, yet Pilgrim's analysis of Arnaud didn't show anything like that, no strong impulses, lust nor desire for dominance, all Arnaud has is cold and calculative patience (kinda like Amadeus)

Amadis thought that Arnaud wrote to his bastard son, yet those letters were for Cordelia, one of such letters was what warned her of what the motion that her enemies would push through the Highest Assembly would be. Who knows if that bastard son even exists in reality.

Every single one of them considered him an idiot who was arrogant and emotional, yet every one of them was wrong, they were all fooled by him. Considering that everything else they have said about him turned out to be a lie, I wouldn't be surprised that the rapist part is also a lie.

Liliet

I wouldn't be surprised, and I would be very glad, but I wouldn't presume it.

If Prince Arnaud Brogloise of Cantal had decided that "I'm a rapist" was a useful addition to his image, I can also easily see him as not seeing a major problem with backing it up by actually doing it – the easiest way to get a reputation as a gambler is to gamble, and the easiest way to get a reputation as a drunk is to drink. If he had the inherent horrified revulsion towards the idea that Amadeus has, I expect he'd have gone without it in his reputation, either – it was somewhat contributive, but far from necessary.

It's far less contrived an assumption that Arnaud is a patriot and a rapist than that Rozala's spy network had been thoroughly faked out on the issue.

Mental Mouse

It certainly is nice when the secret agent turns out to be on your side!

Dainpdf

Wait, wait, wait.

This is the third time Cat goes to Liesse.

All this crown business.

It's the third queen name offering. First time she refused, second time she was kept from it... third time she accepts? Or maybe people are right and she'll abdicate. Who knows.

NZPIEFACE

I wonder if she can use this to bullshit her way into Black Queen, then just get rid of the Queen bit.

Dainpdf

Get just "Black" as a name? That seems odd. And it would be very confusing given Amadeus's moniker.

NZPIEFACE

Why not, he can be Green, Tariq can be White, Vivi can be Pink, Hanno could be blue.

Someguy

"Shame on you all," the Grey Pilgrim quietly said.

sengachi

God damn I like Rozala. "It would be cheap at twice the price", gods, yes. I hope she lives a long and happy life in which she can go to sleep every night warmed by the remembered hellfire that she bought from the Black Queen to burn the Dead King's legions.

Liliet

It's an echo of Cat's "One life for a hundred thousand? That's a steal, by any account" :3

Mental Mouse

Calling back to a prior discussion, I'll note that's also essentially the argument for Omelas: No city in history has had only a single person condemned to misery.

Liliet

I would say that the notion of informed, meaningful consent plays a great role here too 😊

Not that anybody cared about the princes' consent here, but then, Catherine makes a rather great point of how it was not a loss of anything they actually were inherently ethically entitled to.

Andrew Mitchell

I really hope we get to see what happens next. I predict she could get a Name during the final book.

AdrianGrey

Oh boy. There's the Princes' Graveyard that we've been waiting so long for. This is a big moment, guys.

1224

Grey Pilgrim really reminded me of Gandalf in this. When he said "shame on you" I could hear Ian McKellen's voice. Yeah, I know his name is a gandalf reference, so that shouldn't be too surprising, but before this point I hadn't really been reminded of gandalf other than they have similar roles.

Javvies

Not what anybody expected when we first knew that there was something called the Prince's Graveyard.

But I like it.

Also, props to Malanza. She started out on the wrong side of things, but she's willing to, and has, learned. Damn, but that was cold Arnaud. Slick, though.

Heh. Cat's got a point about Procerans and it taking Akua's Folly to give non-Proceran's cause to trust/collaborate with them.

Oshi

Rozala is exactly who she has always been shown to be. She hasn't suddenly grown to like anyone. She is just the only one with real perspective which is why she is where she is now.

Javvies

Not exactly.

Malanza originally didn't realize the very real stakes at the table. Her perspective was narrow and shaped by her Proceran biases.

And she has since learned both just how high and how real the stakes are, with how thin a margin of error there is to work with, and she's had her perspective forcibly widened and had to take a long hard look at Procer, and the customs and practices of Proceran Princes.

It's not that she was ever unwilling to learn, it's that she didn't realize her ignorance.

The Malanza we first met was more interested in how she could benefit from the 10th Crusade and her part in it. Now? Now her primary concern is what is necessary to stopping the Dead King.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, indeed. Thanks for the reminder about her growth curve. Her character arc stands in stark contrast to most other nobles in Procer. She can learn.

Even more reason for her to get a good supporting role (and maybe Name) in the next book.

He was the best of them

Arnaud without a crown makes me a sad person.

Euodiachloris

He'll find some other way to serve Procer from the shadows. He's played at being the fluff-headed prince long enough. Time for his real calling; spy master and/or parliamentary whip.

Dresden 67

He would be pretty great at keeping the Highest Assembly in line.

sengachi

"Your attention please. I would like to open this meeting with the reminder that I have killed nobility before."

pause for emphasis "Carry on."

Dresden 67

"Yes, it is a nice dagger isn't it? Now, what's this about you putting regional interests above the Principate as a whole?"

I wonder if swords being laid at Cat's feet instead of actual crowns will be of any significance. My guesses so far are the old stupid "Queen of Blades" theory, some extension of Saint's domain, or Cat giving up her staff at the end.

Alternatively, they can just stab Larat and all the future royals will have to earn their right to rule in a bizarre reversed version of Pop-up Prince. Bonus points if he ends up petrified.

SpeckofStardust

I mean there isn't really a reason why Larat's head can't be laid at his own feet, I mean he was dragged into the darkness and his head isn't going to remain on his shoulders, and he is a prince that is meant to be king, so he counts as a crown too.

Liliet

'mortal rulers'

SpeckofStardust

I mean.

"It'd not escaped my notice that Kairos had seven crowns and my closest friend in the world hanging from that wooden beam. I might have been amused by that, if not for the implicit threat to the gesture: that he'd kill Hakram the moment I made a play for the shard, that I could only snatch that prize from him if I was willing to make Adjutant my one."

I don't think the 'And one' counts under the same conditions as the seven otherwise the Adjutant wouldn't be at risk here.

Liliet

I think it might have been turn of phrase, but either way it'd have to be mortals

Clint

Technicality: If he's killed in a way that won't reset with the turning of the seasons, wouldn't that make him a "mortal" ruler? Killing someone is a pretty good demonstration that they were killable.

I doubt this theory, but it's not completely nuts – the story weight of laying his own head at his feet might be enough to power through the strange technicality.

And think of the Chuck Norris level story about Cat – most people regret making deals with the Faerie, because they will keep to the letter of the deal, not the spirit; Faerie Kings regret making deals with the Black Queen, even while she keeps to the letter of the deal.

Morgenstern

Ah, but in most stories at least, if not being a common misconception over all (not sure about the history of the word there), "mortal" does not mean what you imply.

"Immortal" usually does NOT mean you cannot be killed. It only means you cannot not die of old age (and often also not fall victim to normal illnesses/diseases).

Vice versa, being "mortal" usually only means that you age and will, at some point, die of old age (and, usually, also be susceptible to illnesses/diseases).

Morgenstern

In short: Even if you can kill someone (once and for all) that does not automatically make them "mortal".

Mental Mouse

Well, Named villains in general don't age past a certain point, and seem resistant to diseases (note that Pilgrim's plague did not kill Amadeus). Did Cat actually "grow up" past 16 or whatever, before becoming fae and then getting resurrected as a mortal again?

But DK strongly implied that true immortality was more than that, essentially escaping the human condition entirely. Being able to reconstitute your body after it's been chopped up seems to qualify; Malicia's (and Bard's) body-hopping suggests another way of surviving "confirmed kills", though it didn't work for Akua.

Liliet

>Did Cat actually "grow up" past 16 or whatever

She at least grew in height: she is now a whole inch taller than Amadeus!

>Malicia's (and Bard's) body-hopping

Malicia doesn't body hop, those were remote-controlled puppets. Her actual body would have her die if killed.

And villains do seem to be somewhere on the edge between mortal and not; escaping the confines of it in theory but usually not in practice, not living more than a regular lifetime because of being killed before it runs out.

All that, and I think 'mortal rulers' might refer less to [ruler who is mortal] and more to [ruler of mortals]. It's the weight of that that Larat wants, in giving him anchor to Creation. So I think Neshamah actually would qualify: mortal himself or not, he has that "right of rule" over mortals along with the actual nation of Serenity, not to mention the old crown of Sephiroth that he never strictly speaking lost. (And I suspect the latter might count for more, here)

Larat himself does not have a right of rule or right of anything in Creation, which is exactly the problem he has. The deal was not for a symbolic action, but for an actual transference of a metaphysical property, one that humans inherently have (even if it's not actualized most of the time) and fae inherently don't.

Mental Mouse

> She at least grew in height: she is now a whole inch taller than Amadeus!

Oh, good spot! So I guess a young villain isn't necessarily trapped in childhood/adolescence.

> Malicia doesn't body hop, those were remote-controlled puppets. Her actual body would have her die if killed.

Counterarguments: 1) If she can see and act through them, that's functionally body hopping, even if the bodies are “drones” that might not have all the amenities of a natural body. 2) We know the Praesi can transfer souls around. Remember Akua’s strategem: if Cat hadn’t spotted the fakeout phylactery, killing Akua’s “actual body” wouldn’t have killed her for real. (That trick might well be Below’s answer to resurrection.) 3) A supporting argument: If Malicia was operating by remote control in Keter, she was presumably doing so from Creation, given her other body in Keter wasn’t her own either. It’s traditional for souls to pass easily between realms, but remote-controlling a body in another realm seems like more of a stretch (and a security hole for DK).

> All that, and I think ‘mortal rulers’ might refer less to [ruler who is mortal] and more to [ruler of mortals].

Sorry, I can’t buy that. “Ruler who is mortal” is the plain reading of “mortal rulers”; in our own world, the latter phrase is normally a direct comparison to God/the gods as immortals.

Liliet

>Oh, good spot! So I guess a young villain isn’t necessarily trapped in childhood/adolescence.

I mean..... Sabah had been born to her Name, and Masego had been like eight. Yet she was not a newborn and he is not a preteen.

They aren’t friggin vampires.

> If Malicia was operating by remote control in Keter, she was presumably doing so from Creation, given her other body in Keter wasn’t her own either. It’s traditional for souls to pass easily between realms, but remote-controlling a body in another realm seems like more of a stretch (and a security hole for DK).

Keter is in Creation.

And I don’t believe there is a single reason to believe that the body puppets allow one to slip the noose of death of the actual body. Otherwise, Amadeus would have certainly kept one in reserve and been in no danger at all from losing to Tariq in the first place, no?

>Sorry, I can’t buy that. “Ruler who is mortal” is the plain reading of “mortal rulers”; in our own world, the latter phrase is normally a direct comparison to God/the gods as immortals.

Fae bargains do funny things with wording.

And 'ruler of mortals' is what is relevant here: Larat wants a right to rule mortals.

Mental Mouse

Good point about Masego and those born to their names.

For the body puppets... Amadeus wasn't nearly the sorcerer Akua was; perhaps Malicia is in-between. That said, it occurs to me that Akua didn't try to send her soul to a created adult body, she sent it to an infant. So you might be right... or the puppets may be very inferior, perhaps with awful lifespans.

In any case, the puppet certainly allowed Malicia to survive having the puppet die. If she made a bunch of puppets with her own appearance, she could use them for general appearances in vulnerable situations. I forget whether she used any of her own aspects from the puppet – if that doesn't work, that would be another good reason not to lean on them too much.

Regarding the fae bargain, I still say the distinction made in the wording is pretty telling.

Liliet

Amadeus isn't a sorcerer at all, and I think Alaya isn't either.

Body puppets are an entirely different concept than ripping your soul out of your body and storing it separately, which is what Akua did. And yes, Akua used an actual infant, rather than a necromantic construct.

>In any case, the puppet certainly allowed Malicia to survive having the puppet die. If she made a bunch of puppets with her own appearance, she could use them for general appearances in vulnerable situations. I forget whether she used any of her own aspects from the puppet – if that doesn't work, that would be another good reason not to lean on them too much.

This much is true – the puppets allow you to avoid exposing your real body to vulnerability. Of course, the puppets are made from real people with different appearances than yours, so everyone's going to be able to easily tell that it's not you, especially when your appearance is as distinctive as Alaya's is. So it's a trick of limited usefulness.

Body hopping is what Bard does – when one body dies, she moves on to the next. It might or might not be what Assassin does, too, though it's possible he's got ridiculous regeneration powers instead, or also utilizes remote-controlled puppets.

Akua couldn't freely body-hop either, for that matter – it was a one time use trick, that didn't even end up working.

Liliet

Catherine surrendering her own crown here honestly brings her greater benefit.

Mental Mouse

Oh yeah, Cat is totally going to be a “memetic badass” in her world. Without the previous incumbent's “may she never return”, even.

Liliet

“May she return at the hour of greatest need” 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The exact phrasing places the “mortal” stipulation between the “seven” and the “one” IIRC. I've suspected that the “one” would be the crown of a non-mortal ever since the bargain was first struck, albeit I'm not especially vocal and probably never brought it up.

Liliet

Ah, interesting.

Weyrwoman

“Queen of Blades” to me sounds an awful lot like the Queen of Swords Tarot card. And what we know of Catherine right now fits really well with the Rider-Waite interpretation – independent, quick-tongued, honest, intelligent. Transformation with hints of spirituality, someone who gains loyalty easily.

Mental Mouse

From Cat:

> "A trinket will have to be offered," I said. "But what you will be surrendering, in truth, is rather more abstract: it is you 'right to rule'."

SpeckofStardust

sinker

"I like him," Kairos mused. "He's got that, what do you call it?"

"Cold-blooded ruthlessness," I said.

"No, that's not it. Ah, a knife," the Tyrant of Helike said.

"He's got a knife."

This is the most blatant means of hitting on Cathrine isn't it.

After all who else has a knife?

Liliet

y e s

Poring

Gods, I hope that Kairos never meet Robber. Can you imagine the bloodbath?

Mental Mouse

I'm imagining the collateral damage... That said, Kairos might understand the jar of eyeballs.

NZPIEFACE

Not Cat? Far as I know, she uses fists to pummel people nowadays.

Aotrs Commander

For me, it was Kairos that stole the show this time.

"No, a knife."

I laughed so hard. Kairos is just brilliant. You can't really help but enjoy a man who just loves what he's doing can you?

When you get down to it, really, Kairos has already won on one level, on the basis that it doesn't matter what happens to him in the end, he's had more fun doing it than most people do in their entire lives, and that's what really matters, isn't it? (And he knows he won't even have to clean up all the mess he made, either! Probably. Unless he, like, marries Cat or somethng, and probably not even then...)

erebus42

That would be fucking amazing. She'd probably end up killing him, but-as I'm sure he'd agree- it would be worth it for the level of hilarity alone.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe the first PGtE fan-fiction?

Mental Mouse

> When you get down to it, really, Kairos has already won on one level, on the basis that it doesn't matter what happens to him in the end, he's had more fun...

Yup, that's how villains win.

Catherine has gone on an inner monologue once about how that is villain logic; and it fits Kairos to a T indeed 😊

erebus42

Damn, Rozala and Arnaud for the win! The Tyrant is delightful as always. Also come on Tariq! Did you really think you could just shame a bunch of Procerans into doing the right thing?

konstantinvoncarstein

He is probably used to the Levantine honor. It can apparently be useful sometimes...

konstantinvoncarstein

Btw, what could by the little surprises Catherine has in her arsenal? The Mighties and Sve Noc are one of them, and probably Masego as well. What could be the rest?

sengachi

I mean, 3,000+ years of concentrated power + a dark god or two makes for a lot of pretty apocalyptic weapons all on their own.

Andrew Mitchell

She has her staffswordprayer as well.

BTW I think "the Mighty" can be considered plural in this context.

Tom

I like how Cat is checking out the royalty at the start of the chapter. "Ooo that tall and curvy Malanza..." "Louis ain't my type but he's still nice to look at..."

This is a wonderfully dissonant band of five; I can't wait to see how it implodes 😊

Fayhem

IIRC Vivienne called her out on that when she didn't realize Cat was listening instead of sleeping. Something to the effect of "whenever we meet someone hot Cat makes time to ogle them even if they're actively trying to kill us". Never change, Cat.

Liliet

Yes ;u;

Daniel E

I was really hoping that Adjutant as "A prince among men" would become literal 😊 Cat certainly says it often enough.

NerfContessa

While I agree he is one, if more among orcs as well, I am glad I'd didn't count. I want him to remain in said role 😊

Anony

Tbh if she wasn't wearing a gorget, she was basically asking to be murdered.

Useful abilities – A lot of fire abilities, powerful-yet-unrevealed-skills, safekeeping-souls

Poetically Psychotic

Well, who's the final crown to be?

If only there were someone nearby. Someone powerful, but who had been corrupted by a kingship not his own. Someone Cat would dearly love to see restored to his prior, not-possessed-by-the-King-of-the-Dead state.

Calling it now, the 8th crown is the Dead King's, taken from Hierophant's head. Probably won't actually affect old Neshamah himself that much, beyond setting the will of the gods against him whenever he tried to control Masego.

On that note, Archer has been sent to track down and confront the mad-with-grief Hierophant, whom she secretly loves, and who may have feelings for her he hasn't fully explored. That has 'dramatic love confession to break mind-control/cause epiphany' written all over it.

Chapter 35: Colloquy

"Forty-three: if your band is split during a harrowing test set by a villain or ambiguous entity, you may safely assume you will next be reunited in some sort of cell or unfolding sacrificial ritual."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

It was a funny thing, perspective. What Hierophant had stolen from Arcadia was a drop in the ocean, a piece of eternity that became something less by being removed from the whole. Looking at it with my own eyes, though, the scale of what he'd wrought was worthy of awe. A kingdom's worth of badlands, consumed by howling squalls and the aftermaths of sorcery until the very grounds were made barren. I'd walked only the very edge of this land, but it'd been enough to tell me that it would take weeks if not months to go from one end to another. And it would fall on Creation, a cataclysmic doom on Iserre, if anchor was not fashioned before the tipping point. To accomplish that most important of tasks, an army would have been too much but a single person too little. And so, in a pattern nearly as old as the First Dawn, a band of five had been called. Of those chosen few I would not speak of myself, but the others? It was not small names – or Names – that had been assembled to turn back doom.

The Tyrant of Helike, an odd-eyed madman who'd pulled at the strings of nations and tricked an entity older than the city that'd birthed him. Weak of constitution, sickly and feeble, he did not walk with the others but instead leisurely sat a throne held up by a throng of eerily-intelligent animated stone gargoyles. The ornate scepter in his hand was the least of the artifacts at his disposal, though the only visible, for the villain had inherited a veritable trove of lunacy and wealth from the Theodosians of centuries past. And yet, for all that, I suspected the deadliest things remained his tongue and the mind that but purpose to it. As if making of mockery of this entire war, the Tyrant wore not armour but instead kingly brocaded robes in gold and scarlet, match for the ornate ruby-set crown on his brow and his misformed eye even deeper red.

The Grey Pilgrim needed no introduction, I supposed. The oldest living Calernian hero and favourite agent of the Choir of Mercy. There was a terrifying amount of power in that wizened frame, and the crooked staff of ashwood he bore, but it was the Peregrine himself that was the true terror. He was a weaver of stories in dusty grey robes with second sight and a choir's worth of angels whispering secrets in his ear. He was incorruptible, implacable and while in body he might just be an exhausted old man his deep knowledge of miracles and deeper well of power allowed him a mystifying breadth of capabilities that only strengthened when exercised to save another. Though near a king in the eyes of his people, his shoes were worn leather and he wore not a single adornment save white locks atop his head.

What more need be said of Saint of Swords, after saying she had once cut the fabric of Winter itself? Oh, like the Pilgrim her years were slowing her down but the vitality of her prime had been replaced by the kind of unbroken certainty that in a Named was a hundredfold more dangerous than muscle. I would never like her, but the Saint was a heroine who has faced sword in hand and slain things whose mere sight would put lesser souls to flight. She was one of the finest blades alive, capable of cutting through sorcery and steel and the fabric of Creation with the plain longsword at her hip, and she had tempered her soul and body into a domain whose existence made her halfway unkillable – and explained why she disdained armour in favour of a plain pale tabard over a darker collared tunic.

The last one, the Rogue Sorcerer, was taciturn mystery who'd faced two of the most infamous villains of our age – in all humility, Akua Sahelian and myself – without taking a wound, revealing an aspect or ever being in danger of death. He'd been able to fend off Diabolist's ritual attempts to find my father, proved capable of guiding armies through a dying shard of Arcadia and was, to my knowledge, the only person not complicit or in my service to have figured out it was a Keter's Due that filled the sky. That someone so plainly competent was almost unheard of meant the man was being purposefully discreet, and given my teachers I knew how lethal Named who went out of their way to keep their abilities quiet tended to be. The long coat of leather over practical chain mail and less practical silks of many colours was kept close to his frame, though there were shapes to be discerned beneath. Over his shoulder was hung a heavy bag bearing seven mortal crowns, carried on my behalf.

It should have been a formal affair, this journey, something solemn and dignified.

"So is it true you used to knock boots with the Iron Prince?" Kairos cheerfully asked. "I'm not usually one to bring up salacious rumours, but–"

I ignored the bald lie he'd spoken and instead kept a wary eye on the Saint's sword hand. Which was, unsurprisingly, on the pommel of said sword. That tended to happen whenever the Tyrant talked, though to be fair we'd only just entered this realm and already I was tempted to let her. I glanced at her face, though, and found it wrinkled as usual but also irritated this time. I bet it's true, I thought. All those late evenings killing ratlings under moonlight? Hasenbach honestly wasn't much of a looker – though she wasn't exactly plain either – but her uncle might wear those broad shoulders a little better.

"Black Queen," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "Am I correct in presuming that the broken tower is our destination?"

He was speaking a little too loudly for this to be entirely about him asking me a question. Still, he was pointing in the right direction so I actually followed his finger and nodded after a confirmatory look. The wasteland here was not entirely plains with a few distant mountains, there were other inclines. It was simply hard to see them, sometimes, buried as they were in ash and dust and smoke. Even far out from the great storms as we were, the winds would be slapping great heaps of those at our sides if not for the small glow dangling from the tip of the Pilgrim's staff like an amulet of solid Light. Unlike the protection Sve Noc had taught me to make, his did not impose a bubble of stillness around us. It... eased the winds into slowing, so that when they reached us they were little more than a warm breeze carrying nothing at all. It was a more elegant solution, though when we'd get to breaching the great storms I suspected my method would be more effective.

"It is," I said. "I'm impressed you can recognize it as a tower, to be honest."

If I hadn't been there earlier with my Hunt in attendance, I would not have. All that was visible of the tower now under a hill's worth of ash and dust was a square house of stone with a broken tile roof jutting out from the grey. There'd been glass windows on the sides once, but they had not survived the first catastrophe to hit them years ago and even the last sticking bits were like ground-down teeth in an open maw through which the wasteland's winds poured through.

"The slate tiles and sandstone are not unfamiliar to me," the hero said. "They were a noticeable feature of Liesse."

The nicer parts of it, anyway, I mentally corrected.

"You've been there before," I said.

"Once, years ago," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "I had heard that the secret tomes of the Wizard of the West had been found, and were to be auctioned by a Liessen guild."

Not one of the legal ones, I thought with a snort. Books written on the subject of magic had been heavily restricted under Black and confiscated whenever found, though there'd been monetary compensation so Callowans hadn't really cared unless they were wizards. In which case they already had greater reasons to be afraid of the Carrion Lord than books, no matter their subject. This, though, a hero's ancient tomes put up for auction in largest southern Callowan city but also the only one under an Imperial governor? Knowing my teacher like I did, that story could only be headed one way.

"It was a trap," I said.

"It was a trap," the Sorcerer sighed. "I nearly died twice fleeing the 'auction' and lost a fortune's worth of..."

He paused.

"No matter," he said. "Still, the city was a memorable enough sight."

I glanced at him.

"Did you get one of the books?" I asked.

"I did," the hero disgruntledly said. "It was only a transcript of some Praesi trial involving tapirs, and to add insult to injury the Warlock wove a tracking enchantment into it."

I very carefully hid my smile. I had some suspicions as to who had chosen the contents of the book, at least. Regardless, we had arrived. We'd also pulled slightly ahead of the others as we talked, though they caught up quick enough.

"- in a way wouldn't that make you Cordelia's aunt?" Kairos enthusiastically said. "You're practically royalty yourself, Laurence."

The Saint's fingers twitched, but sadly I still needed the Tyrant and he was bound to have some contingencies that'd cripple us if he was actually attacked – I doubted he would have agreed to come otherwise, or kept taunting the old zealot so insistently. Gritting my teeth I prepared to step in, but before I could the Grey Pilgrim quietly laughed. The sound had the Saint's shoulders loosening, though the Sorcerer's tightened instead.

"I knew your father, Kairos," the Peregrine quietly said. "Were you aware?"

"You've not exactly been chaste in the array of stories you'll get involved in, Tariq," the Tyrant amusedly said, flopping a wrist dismissively. "Though I'll assume that was before the two of us had our pleasant chat on the matter of succession."

"You remind me of him," the Pilgrim said. "He, too, felt the need to fill silences at any cost."

The Tyrant of Helike went still for less than a heartbeat, and was smiling after as if he'd never ceased, but he'd not been quite quick enough to hide the glint of frozen rage that passed through his eyes at the Pilgrim's words.

"Already a little less bored," Kairos Theodosian grinned. "Not so kindly after all are we, my kindly stranger?"

"If a child pricks his hand picking a rose, it is not maltreatment," the Grey Pilgrim mildly said. "It is a lesson."

Considering that unlike the Tyrant I hadn't just had an old wound prodded at and the wise old man tone was still tiresome to me, that was a sign I needed to step in. I didn't have much sympathy for Kairos, but it would be preferable if every member of this band at least made it to the antechamber of the peril ahead. It'd just be poor form otherwise.

"We've arrived," I called out.

The old man and the young king kept their gaze on each other for a long moment even after I spoke, and I cleared my throat progressively more loudly until they both looked because it sort of sounded like I was choking.

"Now that I have your attention," I rasped out.

I raised a finger, then breathed out a little. Though I was high priestess of Night, unlike the rest of these people I didn't have the ancillary benefits of Name easing my way through this journey. When ash got into my lungs and mouth, I still choked like a mortal. Still didn't regret that transition in the slightest, mind you. You just couldn't put a price on enjoying a good cup of wine, and not occasionally going mad with Winter.

"When the Hierophant brought Liesse into this place, it was roughly done," I said. "Roughly enough that pieces of the city were sown all over this wasteland."

The Rogue Sorcerer inhaled sharply as he realized where I was headed before the rest. The benefits of having an education in matters magical, I thought, and made note that while the Tyrant's eyes had narrowed he didn't seem have figured it out. I was honestly uncertain whether or not the villain was a mage or not, since I'd never actually seen him use sorcery except through artefacts. At the very least, though he was gifted in his understanding I was now fairly sure even if he was a mage he had not reached High Arcana.

"In Creation that wouldn't mean much, but this place is adrift," I said. "I won't get into too much detail, since it's all very technical-" and even after speaking with Akua twice I still only barley understood what she'd said, "- but given the fluidity of laws this place, and the strength of the story we're riding, the law of sympathy can be leaned on pretty heavily to provide a shortcut."

"That is... inspired," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "We came through Creation, but to emerge elsewhere in this realm we would be walking the boundary between it and Arcadia instead."

I smiled and kept my fingers from clenching. It was a good thing I was intending on remaining on good terms with the Grand Alliance, because if it came down to a fight this one might be too dangerous to keep alive. It'd taken Akua Sahelian, a sorceress that even a one-in-a-century kind of talent like Masego considered brilliant, a direct look at my Lord of Silent Steps using something similar in nature to figure this method out. Ivah had begun something close, that it called 'skittering', back in the Everdark and had refined the trick since into a very dangerous tool. The Rogue Sorcerer had figured out from a bastard description in a matter of moments, and though that didn't mean he'd be able to reproduce the feat that was still a rather nasty knack for comprehending my side's bag of tricks. I'd wanted the Tyrant in this band of five because of the Sorcerer, but now I was wondering if that was going to be as affective a scheme as I'd believed it would be. Not that this was ever going to be anything but a risky roll of the dice, considering there was no one among my fellows I could truly rely on if things went south. Still there'd been no way but leaving Adjutant behind: I needed both the Tyrant and the Sorcerer among the five, since it both gave me the shape of the former's inevitable betrayal and allowed me to get around the diplomatic debacle that would be robbing people I needed to be allies with. No matter how badly they deserved to be robbed.

"Foundling," the Saint of Swords said. "You admitted earlier that your Praesi warlock is possessed by the Hidden Horror, yes?"

"Influenced," I corrected.

"Bit of downplay, that," the Tyrant snorted.

"As far as my people have been able to tell, the Dead King isn't in control most of the time," I said. "Though there seem to be small bursts where he is, it's true, but always for less than a quarter hour. Though for simplicity's sake, it would be best to consider the Hierophant as bewitched."

"And how do you intend to break that bewitchment?" the Saint bluntly asked.

"I can't answer that without crippling the chances it'll actually work," I replied. "But rest assured, I do have a method."

"If he's half as powerful as all," the Saint gestured at the wasteland around us, "this seems to imply, he needs to die. If the Dead King has a way in, he'll remain a risk after even if--"

"Laurence," I interrupted, tone eerily calm, "allow me to be perfectly frank with you: if you so much as scuff his robes, I'll put you down without batting an eye. It's not diplomatic, or all that practical, but I do not tolerate rabid animals snapping their jaws at the people I care about."

She glared at me, eyes burning. I stared back, unblinking. The Saint was exactly the kind of heroine to nip what she saw as a looming threat in the bud by the edge of her sword. The same traits that made her capable of accomplishing that also made her a lot more likely to try it, in my eyes, which was rather the issue with Saint in essence wasn't it? The moment there was no longer a hand on her leash, the truce went up in smoke.

"Queen Catherine," the Pilgrim intervened. "The question was not meant as an attack. It needs to be asked: if there is no other way, if your own method has failed, a decision will have to be made."

My fingers clenched, but I forced them to loosen.

"In that very narrow situation you've mentioned, then I'll take action," I said. "But let's be perfectly clear: if any of you use what I just said as a pretext to kill the Hierophant, I will take it as an act of war."

Gods, it was a heavy-handed approach and I might as well be painting a weakness in bright red for the wolves among this flock but it needed to be said nonetheless. I wasn't sure either the Saint or the Tyrant would actually have their hand stayed by the threat I'd just made, but the sword I'd just hung above the head of this truce should be enough to have cooler heads intervene instead of stand back and watch if either acted. The Grey Pilgrim, anyway, I grimly thought. I didn't have a good grasp of the Rogue Sorcerer yet.

"As I was saying," I began anew after a few beats of silence. "We will be taking an unusual path, whose nature is kin to a threshold. There are advantages to that. Through Hierophant, the Hidden Horror would attempt to strike at us if we approached the city openly. But in that more fluid place we will travel through, I suspect it will lurk as well. Waiting."

"The first crucible," the Pilgrim calmly said. "Not one, I think, of arms."

"When assault the stronghold of a villain," I said, "watch out for three things: a monster, a trial and a pivot."

"And you believe this to be the trial," the old man said.

"I believe that everyone here has a few bodies buried somewhere in their past," I said, eyes sweeping across the heroes and villain. "And something they want badly enough to listen to the devil when he'll come calling. And make no mistake, I have encountered the Dead King before. It isn't with threats and screams he'll approach. It will be with a pleasant offer for a most reasonable bargain."

Gods, much as I hated to admit it the Saint of Swords was the one I had most faith in to blow straight through. Even Neshamah would have a hard time cracking open that protective shell of hatred and arrogance. The Pilgrim shouldn't be an issue, either, but there were a lot more levers to move him than I was comfortable with, especially considering the Dead King was bound to know a thing or two about angels. The Tyrant was going to sell us out, that was a given, but that was fine. I'd planned with the inevitability in mind. Once more, it was the Rogue Sorcerer that was the unknown. I glanced at Tariq and caught his eye, then subtly dipped my head towards the youngest hero. Just as subtly, the Pilgrim nodded. He was either reliable, then, or good enough to fool whatever means of second sight the Peregrine used. Either way, it was too late in the span to do anything about it.

"It was a beautiful speech, Catherine," Kairos called out. "It greatly raised my spirits."

I rolled my eyes and limped up the hill of ash and dust until I stood by the side of one of the broken windows. Running a hand across the warm stone by the windowsill, I breathed out and let the Night flow through my veins. The shivering line between realms was no domain of Sve Noc's, but the darkness within the broken house was a threshold I could use. Night poured out of me like a flood, until I breathed out and withdrew my palm. I turned to them, straightening my back.

"Into the deeps," I said. "We will meet again on the other side."

Big Brother

The First Among the Night, leading the Band of Five into the Darkness. This is very much a Story

Cicero

As the only non-named she fits into the story by being the Guide.

That probably gives her protection until the final confrontation, but also might make her vulnerable afterwards.

Rook

Guides do have an unfortunate tendency to make it to the end before making a necessary sacrifice to complete the task, if not necessarily a Heroic one.

Said sacrifice also tends to happen just when things seem the most bleak, a last minute turnaround at the edge of what looks like inevitable defeat.

In this case if she's assuming that role, it's a double edged knife. She can use that story to cull the herd beforehand to meet the conditions of said sacrifice before feeding the "Black Queen" to Larat. It'd be tricky, but designating someone as critical to the mission (at least on the surface) would actually be a way to mark them for death, considering that the one of the defining marks of a truly desperate situation is one where you've lost the most important piece.

The most Noble Souls tragically perishing for the sake of the mission isn't exactly rare either. Theoretically she could murder the Saint by kissing her ass until it sounds like she really is a saint.

RoflCat

You could say

She's a Practical person who's acting as the Guide inTo this domain of Evil

The Brave Little Muffin

I'm honestly surprised she didn't end up with a Name like Dark Priestess. That's bound to be storyworthy, and the apotheosis of the everdark is probably an event worth getting a name over.

Navi-Hank

I wanted The Herald of Night, to be honest

goliath1303

See my reply to this same comment for why I don't think that would work. "First Under the Night", "Dark Priestess", or "Priestess of Night"/"Night Priestess" are all viable names, especially the first because people actually call her that. Your idea just sounds cool but had no reason to become a Name. Now, based on what little info we have on Dwarves, "Herald of the Night" would 100% be a possibility if Cat were a Dwarf.

Clint

She's taken steps to avoid that – she snarks at Sve Noc like a rebellious teenager, never like a worshipper and she never preaches their teachings.

Now, if she starts telling people that All is Night and speaking respectfully to the crows...

Mental Mouse

Hmm, I hadn't thought of her snarking at Sve Noc that way; good thing that attitude comes naturally to her. The Everdark certainly doesn't have the traditions to support such a Name, but then she's not in the Everdark anymore, any more than Hakram was among the similarly denuded (de-nominated?) orc tribes when he gained his Name.

But if she's the Guide, she doesn't need to be killed to leave the rest of the group bereft... just separated from them.

Sethur

Remember how undefined aspects in heroes tend to emerge at the most crucial of moments? Cat might be able to transition into a Name at such a moment. She has a lot of weight behind her as First under the Night and Black Queen of Callow. Also she is leading a band of five of which she is arguably the weakest in raw strength (Night is only granted to her) like her teacher once did. And the Black Knight always had a plan and a hidden trump card. Also, Cat plans to lay down her crown at the end of this anyway, getting another Name would not even be a problem for her under the Liesse Accords.

Liliet

This is kind of what I'm thinking of this currently.

Dragrath

To be honest since her goal is to end named rulers through the accords it wouldn't make much sense for her to gain a name as others have said her greatest advantage is her lack of a name.

Which too honest it is interesting that no one has noticed she is unnamed while I suspect it is fully on purpose its interesting that even Pilgrim's angels haven't noticed something is wrong those sisters really know their stuff

You have to think of Names more as roles to be filled, or grooves in the world to fall into.

Something like Rumena could maybe become a Dark Priest because it actually cares about the religion. But Cat clearly doesn't and treats it like a partnership. Lopsided as hell, true, but still different from a normal religious relationship.

The fact that she is also the Black Queen is probably holding her back from a Name right now as well. Basically Cat doesn't readily fit into any normal story so there's no good Name for her to have. Which is also something that makes her dangerous.

She has more power than a typical non-Named, all of the experience with stories that let's her manipulate them, and enough weight as First under Night to affect the story without quite being as locked in as your typical hero or villain.

Tai

Exactly this. People think of having a Name as being a good thing, but the truth is that having a Name, while bestowing you power that you wouldn't ordinarily have, also forces you to lock into patterns. The patterns themselves aren't dangerous for the majority of heroes, especially when they're just starting out, but for veterans of Cat's level who're playing games against the Pilgrim, not having a name is actually an advantage, not a weakness.

Sir Pantsalot

Personally I'm not super clear on the conditions that distinguish Named from titles, but I didn't get that feeling myself. We've already seen her avoid a new Name in Black Queen, and that one had something of a buildup before it came to the pivot. First Under Night kinda came out of nowhere and didn't have any cultural momentum to support it—it's almost the other way around, with her trying to reshape the drow into something less self-destructive.

goliath1303

Either in operating under a severe misconception, or so many other people have missed a fundamental aspect of Names...

The way I understand it, Names don't come from nowhere. There needs to be Story behind them which defines a Role and lens them narrative Weight. This means no matter how cool, edgy, or badass any names people come up with are they won't ever be Names unless they become a common character in stories told in a specific culture. People think up these cool sounding names that sometimes are sound like a 14yr old playing their first RPG. Here's a link to a previous comment about this phenomenon where I listed off a few of the ridiculous names I could find in the comments of various chapters:

Warlord Catherine the Squire, Queen of Callow, Duchess of Moonlit Night

It's like 4 names crammed into one overly wordy and edgy bundle. WoG is that Warlord ain't happen as she's not an orc(It was stated outright in the story that Grem was the closest any orc he's come to gaining that name since the Miezan occupation, but joining up with Black squashed it.), Names don't include your actual name because they're not a one off, they're a Role that different people fill through time, and none of them except "Queen" have anything to do with Callow and that's too general. "Good Queen" or "Black Queen" could become Names though. Because at their roots Names are archetypes. If that character, type of character, or Role isn't a common part of your culture's history, stories, religion, etc then it won't happen. The closest exception to that is if you embody some idea or personality type to stick an extent that people start telling stories about you and you enter into the zeitgeist of that culture. That's where "Black Queen" came from I believe. We had never heard mention of it before and even after it came up nobody mentioned or compared Cat to any previous incarnations of the Name. She had accomplished so much, done so many legendary things, and been such an important part of what was happening in and how things would go in the furore of Callow and Calernia as a whole that she forged a new Name. Same with Heirophant as far as we know. He scrapped with little g gods, handled the far, and dealt with demons to such an extent that he became an usherer of miracles and vivisector of gods.

So to sum this up, if you haven't done things like; smack around a creature whose very presence permanently scars Creation like it owes you money, bind a fae princess in her own domain while standing on the ashes of untold armies that had been obliterated there since before time began, snatch your dying society from the clutches of a Dread Empire ruled by the most successful villains in memory while absolutely destroying everybody who decided you couldn't do that or, that now that you had, they were the ones that deserved to step in and claim the victory and shape the future of your people, and for the final example, defeat a god so thoroughly that not only are they dead for real despite being older than the First Dawn, being among the most powerful brings around, and having died and been remade countless times, not only did you steal their mantle thus beginning the journey of your own apotheosis, but you became his freaking daughter... It doesn't matter that you're human and he's fae or that it's an obvious lie, you beat him so badly and were such a BAMF that creation was like "Yep, you've always had this signet ring that until a second ago totally wasn't on the Duke's finger.", or if the Name is not already an existing archetype then nope, you're not getting this made up Name.

Names are archetypes or the result of somebody leaving an almost impossible mark on Creation. And new names aren't the coolest or edgiest thing you can come up with. The new Name will be what the people telling your story start calling you!

I know this is an old post but please, EE or anyone who sees this and thinks I'm totally wrong, please correct me/ tell me your theory.

therealgridlock

As someone who is frankly and honestly explaining the practicalities of their trip, and guiding them to an evil they mean to deal with, yes, i would go so far as to even describe her as

A Practical Guide to Evil.

stevenneiman

The darkness holds dominion, black as death.

Javvies

This sounds like she's planning to use Kairos as the "and one" after his inevitable betrayal.

Intriguing.

The Rogue Sorcerer is a conundrum.

I look forward to Kairos and Laurence dying. They're both just too annoying as characters, and Kairos has long since burned through the leeway being entertaining bought.

JJR

But then it turns out he knows this and his betrayal is to NOT betray the party like everyone expected. And then they have to scramble around fixing the plans that he just ruined with his friendship.

Hitogami

If I was him that's exactly what I'd do, but as much as I'd appreciate the plot twist I don't think he can fight his nature enough to do that

RoflCat

No no no, that would only betray their expectations.

First he betray the party, as it is proper

Then he betray the one he betrayed the party to, because Reformed Villain hijinks

THEN he betray the party once more by stealing the prize

Because it ain't Traitorous if there's only one betrayal in store.

IDKWhoitis

Unfortunately, you don't kill the Comic relief first. I suspect that's why Kairos is being a little shit, he is essentially wearing plot armor while he is making fun of or hounding something. I would guess Saint or Grey take the first shot, maybe surviving it.

I heavily suspect the Rogue Sorcerer to be a Dead King simulacrum or other tool of betrayal, he is just too unknown. Kairos will probably surprise us by not being the first to betray, but almost certainly will do so after someone else has started the shitshow.

JJR

Rogue Sorcerer is interesting to say the least. One eye rimmed in red the other in green, and when they were setting up this concord back in the chapter Concord he said an interesting thing. That refusing an arrangement would be, "would be worse than a sin, it would be a mistake." The emphasis he put on mistake, it made me wonder if he was maybe keeping Black soul very close to his own to better keep track of it. The saying does tell us to, "Keep your friends close, and your enemies closer". And you can't get much closer than tying your souls together.

Would not explain why the other eye is rimmed red though.

Dainpdf

Might be the original rim, might be a side effect. But yes, very good catch.

SITB

The Rogue Sorcerer shoulders also stiffen when the Grey Pilgrim laughed (while Laurence relaxed).

Something funky is going on, even if it will turn out to be a misdirection at the end.

Liliet

Yeah, I noticed that too...

Clint

Kairos has a red eye...

The Dead King's are yellow...

Mental Mouse

Yeah, even before holding Amadeus's soul, he looked like a discreet Power In Waiting. But that comment might well have been a signal from Amadeus that he's not being quite as passive as you'd expect from a disembodied soul. If RS is actually conversing with Amadeus, then he potentially has his own significant powers, joined to Amadeus's strategic and tactical genius.

Did he have those eyes when he was fighting Cat &co. before? If so, it's probably just a feature or indicator of his Name.

Dainpdf

So you're saying Kairos will betray all expectations? XD

konstantinvoncarstein

When did he do something else? 😊

Liliet

When he got played by Catherine like a fiddle about an hour ago 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

It only prove my point 😊

Rook

I think there's chance that Amadeus might seize control of him at some point, whether by his own machinations or outside influence. One potential landmine we know of already is that his soul is in the Rogue Sorcerer's hands, and we just had strong foreshadowing about how much rage Amadeus has towards the Pilgrim.

It would also be quite a good way to tie up that old loose end in terms of Catherine and Amadeus' relationship. If he ever gets an opportunity to get back at the Pilgrim, it'd put him at odds with Catherine's own goals. At that point Catherine's ultimatum to him from their last face-to-face meeting since second Liesse would come to fruition; "make yourself into a man that deserves to live in that (better) world, or you're just another corpse I step over on my way there"

Decius

Amadeus would not let his rage, however great, cause him to make a mistake on the level of attacking the Pilgrim without first guaranteeing a draw.

Dasketzer

Dying to have their souls bound to the cloak and manifest again under our dear ubua as her minions in service of her Black Queen?

antoninjohn

I wonder if they will see each others trials, that would be pretty bad for the Pilgrim to have the Tyrant know that he is a blood traitor who killed his own son in his sleep to keep hold of his power in Levant

magesbe

Are you saying that this is how Tyrant would spin it, or do you actually think this is how it happened?

Javvies

Tariq killed his brother openly and killed his nephew (sister's son) in his sleep, because said nephew wanted to wage a war of vengeance over his mother's murder by a Proceran Prince and Tariq hasn't changed his mind.

I dislike Tariq but he didn't kill his nephew for personal power.

Clint

Tariq had a belief about what policy the Dominion should follow.

The lawful ruler of the Dominion disagreed – and was winning the political game of persuading the rest of the Lords of the Dominion.

So Tariq killed the lawful ruler of the Dominion.

Now, every Lord of the Dominion looks to Tariq, rather than to their lawful ruler, when big-picture decisions are to be made.

It's true that Tariq didn't kill his nephew to take a crown and open power, but he did do it to see his will imposed on the Dominion and to increase his own influence over future decisions. That's personal power.

Neel

I feel that there's an ENORMOUS difference between making a decision to impose your own will because you think you're right, and making a decision to impose your will because you're on a power trip.

Rook

That's stretching the truth so far that it puts dental floss to shame.

Tariq killed his nephew because the limited foresight of his choir showed him exactly how much human suffering would come as a result of the war that the boy was preparing to wage.

Tariq wouldn't give a shit if the entirety of the dominion were to forget that he exists, or if the dominion pursued a policy revolving around spaghetti and candycanes. Him and his choir only really care about minimizing suffering as much as possible, and whatever power he wields – physical, magical, or political – are all just disposable tools to that end.

It's like claiming that people buy bread because they want to chew things. Well it's not like they'd be against chewing things, it's kind of a necessity, but that's not the actual goal.

Decius

Still familicide, and he did it to cause policy changes.

But just like the practical Villains don't have a problem performing good acts in the name of Greater Evil like (almost) fully funding orphanages, the practical Heroes don't have a problem performing evil acts (like murder) in the pursuit of the Greater Good.

Liliet

yeah, being after specific policy changes is very much ethically distinct from being after personal power

also, Amadeus + Greater Evil = LMAO

(this is a man who justifies all his decisions internally in terms of greater good he expects them to eventually lead to, and is trying to smother all sources of actual evil – racism, inequality, starvation, war, power abuse, diabolism, blood sacrifice – in his country)

(I mean if you squint just the right way you can totally justify how this is what should be called Greater Evil, and Amadeus would undoubtedly do just that if asked...)

luminiousblu

I'd argue that it's pretty debatable that any of those things are 'sources of actual Evil', besides starvation since we're canonically told that one is a problem. All of the rest are fundamentally just things that you or I find evil (and I don't find all of them evil).

Liliet

>racism >fundamentally just wut

Andrew Mitchell

I interpreted that differently:

"All of the rest are, fundamentally, just things that you or I find evil..."

Liliet

OH THAT'S BETTER THANK YOU

anyway we well know that Amadeus disapproves of those things also; he would have banned diabolism if it were feasible [source: Book 1 chapters Rise/Fall], and he had a whole rant @ Malicia about how blood sacrifices were supposed to be a necessary evil, not a staple of their culture viewed positively [source: Epilogue III], and he has indicated many times that he views war as a necessary evil as well, one that he would rather have the least amount of that he can manage [I don't even how how to point to a source for this one, he is rather consistent in this view?...]; also not sure how to even point to his dislike of racism given how diffused it is throughout the text... remember Chapter Aspect in Book 1 when Catherine was surprised at the idea of learning the orc language and he lectured her about it? Amadeus is a greenskin rights activist, that's one of the basic points that like everyone in Praes knows about him nd judges him on.

luminiousblu

Andrew's got it.

Good nations canonically were once upon a time slave states which means inequality (not necessarily racism, no, Americans, slavery is older than and not inherently tied to racism), so it's clearly not fundamentally Evil.

Liliet

Depends on how you read "fundamentally". See my discussion with Daindpf on chapter Peers.

Fundamentally or not, once you dig deep enough, you discover that they are bad; and Amadeus agrees with that and acts on that. See my reply to Andrew.

luminiousblu

It...doesn't really work that way? "Bad", by definition, is subjective. If it's subjective then it can't be fundamental, unless you accord that there are values that are objective and built-into the world.

Amadeus acts on his own values. He doesn't particularly strike me as someone who believes them to be objectively true, or if he does he's just a hypocrite

Liliet

Values aren't objective, but cause-effect relationships are. Given that you want X, then you can pretty damn objectively derive what's "good" and "bad" for achieving that goal.

There are X's that mortals universally want: food, security, companionship, etc. That part is hard-wired into their brains, and while there can be exceptions, it's an objective fact that statistically speaking, the majority does want these things.

Given these X's, it's a matter of studying objectively existent cause-effect relationships to find out what serves these goals and what doesn't (which we label "good" and "bad"). Eating a rock doesn't make you full. Killing everyone you meet doesn't fulfill your companionship need. Summoning a demon that blights the land isn't good for your prospects of finding food down the line. Racism gets in the way of building a society that maximizes its gains out of the resources it has available.

It's not fundamental because it's more complex than that. There are no ethical rules written on a tablet in the middle of the universe, humans have to actually figure those out – much like they have to figure out math and agricultural calendar and how to make computers.

Amadeus acts on the basic values of "dying of hunger is bad", "dying in war is bad", "actually just dying period kind of sucks" and extends those to other people – he wants to ensure the prosperity of the entire population of Praes, not just his own.

He boldly assumes that the entire population of Praes would rather have food than starve, would rather win a war than lose it, would rather have dignity than be treated as cattle, would rather have opportunities for social rising than be eternally under the boot of High Lords.

He, yes, believes those facts to be objectively true. Mighty hypocritical of him?

All of the above aren't ethical values. Ethical values are when you want those things not just for yourself but also for other people. Ethical values are caring for other people, period, and ethical rules are heuristics for how to achieve your objectives in that while not being either omniscient or omnipotent.

Amadeus believes it to be ethically bad that he moves other people as pawns on a chessboard in order to achieve his objectives. He does it anyway because he believes the loss to be balanced out by the future gains, but he cares about the loss, too. Because he believes that objectively it's a fact that other people subjectively value free will, making their own decisions, and so on.

It's not contradictory.

Dainpdf

His own son? Are we reading the same story?

Big Brother

Tariq viewed his nephew as his illegitimate son, much like Cat views Amadeus as her Father.

Dainpdf

That necessitates qualification, when talking about blood. And considering, as has been stated by others, that the rest of the statement is false.

pagesbe

Not a lot happened, but some necessary setup and a better introduction into the Rogue Sorcerer. So he's apparently not a mid-tier scrub like I had initially assumed. Maybe only two levels below the Pilgrim then, I'm guessing. One level below I'd put the White Knight.

Dainpdf

Each of them is a tool for a different job. But I agree with the classification. Where would you put Saint, by the way?

Euodiachloris

Depends: she's a stereotypical Fighter. Awesome damage-dealer in encounters... awful at haggling with the merchant and/or employer later. And, whatever you do, don't ask the Fighter to abuse that Cha score by trying to talk the Silver Dragon down. Nothing but Bad Things™.

Dainpdf

That was what I meant with different tools... but there seemed to be some sort of linear ordering going on.

Oshi

In terms of power lets set a baseline. Compare the power levels directly and exclude all factors of indirect power. (The Scribes a nightmare because she will smother you before you can even hurt her but not a direct power)

Saint

Pilgrim

Sorcerer

Tyrant

and way down last is Catherine at the moment.

Liliet

And I believe Catherine was counting on it being Tyrant>Sorcerer, because of the sheer power ruler Names get at their disposal, but has discovered she might be wrong...

Lucas

I think the White Knight would have had to use a few tricks to fight Cat. He had to use a lot to fight the black Knight and he isn't all that strong.

Rook

I think the role of the sorcerer here is to be an unexpected variable rather than a powerhouse though. Although the former might mean he affects the story like the latter anyway. There's just SO much emphasis on how mysterious he is and how much of an unknown quantity that he is.

Realistically he's currently a convenient trap card that EE has the option to flip over whenever he wants to defy reader expectations, which makes him exceedingly dangerous regardless what his actual power level really is.

Liliet

Yep.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. So the important question becomes "what does RS actually care about?" If we knew that, we'd have a shot at guessing where he's going to stand in what's coming. But we just don't know yet.

Mental Mouse

Or he might not even be “below” the Pilgrim, at least in mystical power. He’s certainly someone that Pilgrim and Saint consider a peer, but as with Cat’s crew and Masego, even they might not know his limits.

konstantinvoncarstein

He has stilluch less experience.

superkeaton

Aw, I was hoping for a little bit more. Still, I’m curious what Cat intends to work for this.

Dainpdf

TBF there wasn’t much substance here. Mostly prolonged the cliffhanger from last chapter. I mean, we spent an entire extended sequence with Cat reintroducing the already well established characters.

The necessities of serial fiction...

Rook

I feel like the introduction may not have been useless. It honestly could be part of in-story preparations to kill someone, not just an author tool to hype up the party.

For example, notice she emphasized the Saint being ‘near unkillable’ and disdaining heavier armors as a result. That kind of absolute quality being attributed to a major character is, ironically enough, often a death flag. Unkillable, indestructible, undefeated. Breaking that myth of invincibility is often used as a tool to emphasize something else – severity of a situation, hype for a protagonist or antagonist, etc..., and we know for a fact that this trend isn’t unknown in the guide verse either. It was brought up between Black and Malicia during one of their squabbles, how dangerous Black’s own successful track record could be to himself.

Emphasizing that kind of quality whenever possible – and preferably without the rest of the band noticing, which would be the hard part – can open doors to them being ironically slain instead. The fact that the first trial can be taken individually might also be an important point to note. It’s an opportunity to start rigging the story in your favor (especially considering that flashbacks to defining moments of a character’s life are such a strong story mechanism), and the narrative itself would allow the moves made there to be sworn to secrecy.

Dainpdf

I don't think Creation takes internal monologues into account – if this first person narration is even diagetic.

And I didn't say it was useless. Just majorly unnecessary if we were dealing with a single-tome work, albeit understandable given the demands of serial fiction.

Mental Mouse

Creation doesn't need to consider the internal monologue, just Saint's reputation – Cat is reminding us of that.

Dainpdf

Sure, but then we're back to "this whole extended monologue is basically reintroducing characters we are very familiar with."

I'm not saying it's bad, necessarily, but it likely wouldn't be present if this were a single tome published and I thought it interesting to note that.

The medium shaping the text is a very interesting phenomenon, to me.

luminiousblu

Problem is that the concept of invincible, therefore worfbait isn't actually that common a theme; if anything, it's her advanced age that poses the danger. Sometimes invincible is actually just invincible, especially since the Saint hasn't boasted of being invincible. If she outright said 'nothing you do can scratch me' then yeah she's killing herself there, but she isn't, and the reputation she has of being 'invincible' is merely a direct result of her actually being mostly invincible.

danh3107

Time to delve too greedily and too deep.

Cicero

I'd be more worried about the Saint, Cat.

Sure, she's likely to be unaffected by temptation, but that immunity suggest to me that her trail will be different from everyone else. Instead of a temptation she will be faced with a trick. In which that which appears evil will actually be good.

stevenneiman

Good point. I'm now expecting that her trial will either be fighting one of the others cloaked in illusion, or one of the others being tricked into saying something that sounds incriminating enough that she'll attack them.

Dainpdf

Could be the Name swamp again. Who else misses the Name swamp?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Everyone misses the Name swamp.

Novice

Except Cat of course.

medailyfun

Except Swamp itself

Mental Mouse

IIRC, the Name swamp was internal to Cat. If everybody's wandering around inside Cat's mind instead of Masego's, Cat has a problem.

Dainpdf

Trials can involve illusions and such. Plus, if my theory is correct Cat is getting a Queen Name by the end of this debacle.

Dainpdf

I suspect she'd cut through that, too. She's bullshit like that. Saint is a simple woman. She sees evil, she cuts.

Euodiachloris

Except this Evil has spent millennia taking the tools people give him and turning them into his.

I think he knows what to do with swords by now. Saint is not Ranger. Neshamah rather... likes... Ranger; Saint is a bastard copy he could practice on.

Dainpdf

I would not put Ranger and Saint on the same category. Ranger is a sport hunter; Saint is a bloodhound.

And that's the thing with both of them: they're too simple to really fool.

Rook

She'll pass the trial without a doubt, but the real trap is likely how it affects her actions afterwards. I highly doubt Neshamah is unaware that a first trial is going to stop absolutely no one, so the game should be about how to extract some benefit even as the band passes the trial anyway.

She's already inclined to try killing Cat or Masego to nip a potential threat in the bud, and she herself is very aware that she's a member of the old guard whose story should be close to ending. She doesn't have much to lose.

I suspect it'll be just a little push, to incentivize her to stab the Villainous members of the party in the back at a critical moment. Maybe a memory of a time when she got burned by working with a villain. Maybe the memory of whichever straw it was that broke the camel's back, when she became as jaded as she is now. Just a very slight helping hand for a bias that she already has – "Catherine Foundling and the Woe are too dangerous to be left alive".

Dainpdf

It comes from the Enemy. Saint will give zero shits. As Cat herself said, she'll be hard to influence due to her stubbornness and hatred of all Evil.

Rook

The problem is that doesn't make her omniscient and infallible, just stubborn and strong.

Those types are near impossible to influence in terms of conversion or changing their mind, but they sure as hell can be lead by the nose if someone is crafty enough. A crafty someone like, say, a major Villain who predates every kingdom on the surface of the continent and has knowledge and intelligence to play the game on the level of the Intercessor.

Generally if someone will fight against you no matter what out of principle, one of the easiest ways to get what you want is to hide a larger lie by revealing a smaller one and lead them push 'back' in a direction that suits you.

Dainpdf

Right. That's what Cat did, earlier. But while you can bait Saint into attacking you, getting her to attack her sorta-allies-for-now is unlikely. She does have decades of experience, on one side, and on the other...

you try to argue the sword falling towards your head into attacking someone else. I don't think it will work.

Liliet

^ this.

Baiting Saint is relatively easy, but redirecting her is exactly what she has a +999 to resisting.

WuseMajor

I dunno. Saint... I think Saint might be playing a more Subtle game here than anyone suspects. Granted, she's still a thug, but she was working with the Bard to have the Dead King destroy this nation, possibly this entire pathetic little continent, just to "purify" it by getting rid of the unworthy elements because Good Always Triumphs in the End and a Shining Kingdom would rise from the ashes.

I had thought the Pilgrim was part of that plan, but, from everything we've been learning about him, I honestly don't think he'd go for it. I suspect he might agree that, in theory, removing the jerk ass nobility might be a good thing for everyone, but he'd do it surgically with a minimum of pain. Destroying an entire end of the continent in a war for survival... there's no way he could see that amount of suffering as "a necessary evil." Whereas that's exactly the kind of thing I'd expect the Saint, with her Old Testament values, to jump on.

So... I dunno. I think the Saint might be the one who stabs the Pilgrim in the back here.

Oshi

I've been seeing this brought up a lot. We don't know what Saint's plan with the Bard is. I'd rather hold off on ascribing that much scope. It might just have been as much as a Crusade has been called and the fucking mortal rulers are messing about. The Bard tells her Cut them down Saint and I'll give you a shot at the Dead king. It really wouldn't take much for her to take the bait.

Liliet

I think Bard doesn't even make that kind of bargains, not unless she's acting as an emissary directly. She just affirms what people already believe, and Saint already believed that nobility is corrupt and in the way.

I'm betting her so-called "plan" is just a certainty that destruction will happen regardless and so the best they can do is make sure to take as much of the Enemy as they can down with them.

caoimhinh

Recent chapters have made start to wonder if Pilgrim will be the one to kill Saint once he realizes that she is going too far (causing too much suffering) in her pursuit of purifying Calernia.

Mental Mouse

Or as WuseMajor suggested, she might turn on him. That said, they've been working together for a long time, and that comment about "putting it to judgement" by morning's light indicates that they do have a routine for conflict resolution. But then, they'd have to; they're two of the strongest Names and personalities on the continent, if they didn't have some way to settle arguments between themselves, they wouldn't still be working together, they'd have gone to war long ago. Note that the specific method hardly matters, though arm-wrestling or such seems unlikely: They could play 7 rounds of poker, seek a House of Light and ask the priests for a counseling session, or whatever. Heck, with Pilgrim's phrasing it's entirely possible that their method is "go talk to Hanno".

Liliet

Yeah, I too noticed that it sounded oddly reminiscent of the eponymous Choir 😊

Dainpdf

That is not exactly what she was doing. She was destroying the possibility of compromise, so that the Crusade would fight all Evil at once, and accepting Procer as a casualty of that process. That's very different from planning its destruction.

konstantinvoncarstein

She was sure Procer would be destroyed, so in a sense she planned its destruction

Dainpdf

That mistakes a fate accepted as the cost and the actual objective.

Saint wanted no compromise with evil. As Cat said, the moment Tariq is out of the picture she'll likely turn on them. She did not have an elaborate scheme for the destruction and substitution of Procer des the Good hegemon.

Liliet

This. This as shit.

Liliet

>and she herself is very aware that she's a member of the old guard whose story should be close to ending. She doesn't have much to lose.

This is the kind of logic that applies to someone who fights for themselves. Saint is a heroine; being close to death herself does not affect her decision making process on a strategic scale.

RandomFan

Not entirely true? If you're acting as a perfectly rational pursuer of some higher goal, doing things that will make meaningful progress for your goal but will kill you increase in "expected profit" as you get closer to death, since the expected value of "staying alive to continue doing good" decreases with time.

Liliet

Hmm, that particular thing, yes.

"Has little to lose" just doesn't sound right to me – has little to lose in dying earlier, true, but has still a lot of other things to lose in the world outside herself.

Hierus

man i really love some adventuring with this heroic band of ours

Stable

"In that very narrow situation you've mentioned..."
Oh Cat... did you just make it inevitable?

IDKWhoitis

If she can bait out an attack by Saint first, then it is a perfect shot to kill Saint.

Dainpdf

At least she didn't say it was "impossible" or "one in a million".

Duke

With all the narrativium around it'd be sure to happen... I mean, we all know that such "one in a million" things happen nine out of ten times... XD

Novice

Ah, a Discworld reader I see.

Liliet

No, I think 'very narrow situation' is actually the exact right phrasing that doesn't make it inevitable. She's not questioning the likelihood, merely the ability of everyone else present to identify it with certainty, making a claim that it might look like she's lost while she actually hasn't.

caoimhinh

I think she meant it more as "that specific scenario" rather than "that unlikely scenario". She's very careful with her actions and words right now, I doubt she would make that blunder now.

Someguy

I wonder if Kairos has a crossbow prepared if the Exile Price appears in his Trial?

Dainpdf

Or an explosive goat.

tithin

I'm trying to figure out what sort of name and aspects the rogue sorcerer would carry, it doesn't seem like the sort of name that would lend itself well to a band of 5.

Seems more like William's, a strong name for solo levelling.

Dainpdf

It's pretty normal for a band of five to have the one loner. Although, to be honest, the only people here who know how to work in a group are Tariq and Cat. Outside that we have the Loose Cannon (Saint) and Starscream (Tyrant), neither of which is a team player.

Mental Mouse

I don't think Kairos qualifies as a Starscream; irritating as he is, he really is a top dog in his own right.

Dainpdf

Sure, but in the context of this band of five, Cat is the leader, and Kairos has Chronic Backstabbing Disorder.

Mental Mouse

After reviewing the TVTropes article: What you say is true enough, but (1) Kairos is isn't actually Cat's underling to begin with (just an ally of convenience and arm-twisting), and (2) taking control of the party is simply not an option, and he knows it. Cat is the only thing standing between Kairos and a 3-on-1 beatdown from some of the most powerful heroes on the continent. (3) He's not really an underling of DK either, nor in the league to take him on (especially since DK can out-backstab him any day of the week).

So, not a Starscream. His CBD could certainly screw over the party and/or the mission, just not under that particular trope.

Dainpdf

You're right. I just didn't have a better trope for "treacherous underling" (which I'd argue he kind of is for the moment, since she is the de facto leader) and the idea of Kairos speaking like Starscream amuses me.

Someguy

It's in his Name, he's a [Rogue] + [Sorcerer] hybrid class. so he's either:-

an Eldritch Scoundrel (<https://www.d20pfsrd.com/classes/core-classes/rogue/archetypes/paizo-rogue-archetypes/eldritch-scoundrel-rogue/>) or an Arcane Trickster (<https://www.d20pfsrd.com/classes/prestige-classes/core-rulebook/arcane-trickster/>)

konstantinvoncarstein

He seems more specialised in magic than in rogue things. The idea had merit 😊, but I think that "rogue" means "independent", or "not used to work in group".

Andrew Mitchell

Exactly.

IDKWhoitis

I imagine we might see Black or John or Nauk again, something that's going to be really hurtful for Cat.

Or alternatively, the Dead King will sit down and have another "chat" with Cat. Most likely making fun of her for losing her Apoptosis.

Dainpdf

Could be Killian or Masego himself, as well.

Fayhem

I guess I'm blanking, but John? Who's that now?

Ultimate_procrastinator

I think he was the head of Catherine's bodyguard, back around book 2 or so. Could be wrong though.

Fayhem

Oh shit that's right I think, John Farrier – he was captain of the Gallowborne. Thanks for the reminder!

Andrew Mitchell

I needed that reminder too, so thanks for asking.

IDKWhoitis

Captain of the Gallowborne, Cat cared about his death.

Fayhem

Somebody already jogged my memory on that, but ty anyhow! Always nice to see fans helping out fans. 😊

Liliet

John Farrier, of the Gallowborne

Mental Mouse

> making fun of her for losing her Apoptosis

To which she can snark "easy come, easy go", or just mock him in turn for being a pawn of the Bard.

Or, she can point out that Sve Noc was able not only to absorb Winter entirely, but to resurrect Cat as a mortal human, which is a traditional "Below can't do that!". And hint that he himself might not be as safe or as independent as he'd thought.

Dainpdf

"It was a trap."
I strongly suspect everyone called that.

Also, Rogue Sorceror hype!

Mental Mouse

And hints, in that there was some expensive resource that RS lost in his debacle, but which he doesn't want to talk about...

Aston Whiteman

Yay. Black's Soul is hiding in plain sight. Or rather in use.

That's going to be fun.

caoimhinh

And to the deeps they go, it will be quite a plot twist if Kairos actually DOESN'T betray them.
Hopefully we will get to see more of the Rogue Sorcerer's abilities later.

So they have to beat Masego possessed by Dead King before they give the crowns to Larat and only then can they go to kill god-mode King Larat?

Interesting, that's gonna be a long journey.

Oh woe is us, the Tyrant has betrayed us. Now we are facing three villains! I totally had a plan for this unfortunately it involved having a band of five and we are only four. Were could we possibly find a fifth member while we are in the middle of enemy territory? Oh well I guess the world will end and everyone we love will die. If only we a had another person. It wouldn't even have to be a live person, since I have this nifty cloak that can grant disembodied souls pseudo-life. Where could we find a extra soul? Oh wait, Rogue Sorcerer, don't you have a extra one of those lying around?

Andrew Mitchell

Oooooo, nice thought! 😊

Jason Ipswich

No, no, no. It's more like, oh no, Tyrant has betrayed us. Where o where, between here and our goal of murdering a newborn god to save the world from evil, could we find a fifth member of our band? If only there were some old friend at hand who could join us...

What's that, you say, my dear friend the Heirophant is right here, but not in his right mind? If only there was a holy man, wise and skilled in healing who could return him to himself that he might make our band of Heroes Five again...

Mental Mouse

Hmm, the problem is that that would mean Pilgrim adding another powerful villain to the scene. Pilgrim would likely prefer a redemption arc for Masego, and might not be up to a direct conflict with DK anyway.

Soma

I'll admit, I'm not a huge fan of the idea it's Catherine who loses her 'right to rule' though it seems kinda likely. Barring something from left field where cat has an extra crown up her sleeve somewhere, between her, Tariq and Kairos she's the most likely to give something up, in part because Tariq would like to force her to.

Part of the reason I don't like it is that it feels like Catherine abdication feels too sudden right now. She's just now started speculating that Vivi can replace her, and her abdication felt like a major part of the leverage that she'd use to get the Liesse Accords through, but if she's forced out on this, poof. That leverage is gone. And it kinda feels like the big thing that could make the Liesse Accords happen is Cat being able to say 'It's the accords or Triumphant 2.0 reigning forever, your choice,' a la classic bad wine and a blade diplomacy.

It fits for this particular story in book 5 that Cat is the one who gives up her right to rule forever, but for the story of the guide as a whole it feels a little off? I guess it just feels off because the accords are such a large thing and the only leverage Cat has on that scale is how dangerous she is, and if she gives up the most massive leverage she has by neutering herself a bit. I know if that happens she'll gain new leverage, but for like 2 books now her rulership has been built up as her leverage in negotiations, so it would feel kind of weird to just have it go poof here.

If it happens that way, I do look forward to EE changing my mind, as they are wont to do, with the rest of the story though.

WuseMajor

Yeah, but EE has been pretty good about pulling twists out of left field. I mean, I agree with you that Cat's crown is important and it kinda has to be lost in one of the two situations you've said, but she's not the only one here with a "right to rule."

Thinking on it, she might try to leverage the One against the Rogue Sorcerer, by forcing him to restore Amadeus so that he can give up his "right to rule" against Callow and Praes.

Alternately, maybe the Black Queen gives up her right to rule Callow....but not her status as First Under Night, High Priestess of the Dark. Which is arguably a much more dangerous title. Accepting the Accords might be the only way to keep the High Priestess in check.

Mental Mouse

Well certainly she'd keep the her priestly status, that's just not on the negotiating table unless Sve Noc themselves is actually at the table. Which would probably be enough to clear the room immediately. 😊 So Cat losing her crown wouldn't get rid of her, just establish her as an independent power beholden to none. At which point the other big Names and surviving crowns start buying their preferred stomach remedies in bulk.

Another possibility is that the Rogue Sorcerer is himself a secret King or Prince, which would fit his "hidden power" teases.

Liliet

Catherine doesn't actually need that much leverage for the Accords. She just needs to convince everyone else that they're a good idea; if anything, not having leverage to push them through / not using leverage she has, might make it more convincing.

And of course her biggest leverage remain the drow 😊

soma

Maybe? Just thematically Catherine's thing is leverage to force the powerful to act as they should. That's her whole 'people in power won't be fair unless you make them' lesson thing from Laure under Mazus. And yeah, there have been adjustments to that, but thematically leverage is still Catherine's deal, so, to me, it feels weird for her to give up her biggest lever for an intermediate step. And I say it's her biggest lever because that's what the heroes care about. They don't care so much that the Drow are powerful, or their evil enemies are powerful, what gets their hackles up is that there is a villain ruling a previously Good nation and successfully holding onto it. They reeeeeeeeeaaaally want that previously good nation to not be below aligned. I don't think they'd care so much if Cat ruled just over the Drow since they were below aligned already.

I'm open to the idea I'm being unreasonable here, but I think taking away the threat of Catherine's ability to rule is her largest lever. She becomes much less scary for the heroes if she can't be a ruler, and yeah, maybe that'd make them easier to convince if they were normal people, but they're heroes. They are unreasonable. That was what the whole ' "Should I apologize," I said, "for making this a victory for others than myself," ' thing was about. I just see the rulership ability thing as being something Cat would probably take lightning quick directly for the Liesse Accords, but for a very very far out intermediate step, it's a little weird. Like I would expect a little more directly getting vivi ready to rule on screen and dealing with all attending issues on screen if Cat's abdication was imminent. It's what makes me think maybe, maaaaaybe there is something come out of left field, but I don't know.

Having read the Peers chapter, I could see that as building up Tariq for something that might otherwise be out of character. Giving Evil a sort of win by giving up his ability to rule and helping Catherine out, leaving Callow ruled by a villain for now, while they fight the dead king. That way the balance is tilted a little more away from evil because the last evil polity isn't in an immediate threat to its existence and there are two 'evil' polities. Callow nominally evil, and Praes capital EVIL. From what black said we might think this would make the fight against the dead king easier sparing massive suffering and making this something Tariq would do. Versus normally turning the screws on Cat.

The above is some pretty serious wild mass guessing, based on the assumption that someone other than Cat gives up the crown though.

Liliet

Do note that Catherine is currently non-Named, so Liesse Accords would not actually preclude her ability to rule.

The draw are a much more immediate kind of leverage: do you want help against Dead King, or do you want another threat on your territory? Hm? Hmmm???

Catherine's as good as given up on that approach with the surrender manoeuvre, though.

What I'm thinking wrt her rule and Accords is that her abdicating might be a prerequisite for anyone being willing to listen to her, not leverage.

"Still there'd been no way but leaving Adjutant behind: I needed both the Tyrant and the Sorcerer among the five, since it both gave me the shape of the former's inevitable betrayal and allowed me to get around the diplomatic debacle that would be robbing people I needed to be allies with. No matter how badly they deserved to be robbed."

How has no one noted that Cat's plan is out for us to see. She's stealing something. Any bets on what?

I'm gonna guess it's not the obvious thing. She just spent a couple of chapters noting how good a schemer she is. What the eff is she gonna steal now 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

When Catherine speaks of robbing an ally, does she speak of her father's soul?

Liliet

Rogue Sorcerer has Black's soul.

She doesn't want the diplomatic unpleasantness of robbing him herself, so she's setting up Kairos to do it for her 😊

Euodiachloris

The "concerned daughter removing her ailing father from an extremely dodgy, uncertified and downright murderous caregiver" card is a weighty one, no? Try messing with that, Above.

Kairos is a very giving man. At least, he says he is while taking something he might mean to transfer elsewhere (maybe); the Micheal, an army, a McGuffin, a life, a custard tart...

Rogue Sorcerer = Bard ??

Andrew Mitchell

IMO, no. We've never seen anyone who holds two Names.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I'm pretty sure we've never seen the Bard possess a man, only a series of women. If she's gender-locked then he's... well, not "safe," but not WB in disguise.

Andrew Mitchell

Not relevant to the last chapter but I need yes, NEED to share Richard Gallivan comment from the last chapter. It's only got for likes and it deserves many, many more.

Galvador

So she wants to steal her daddy back during this adventure. Worst case scenario seems to be the dead king corrupting the soul when the rogue sorcerer is by himself and placing black as a sleeper agent. A lich king style Black wouldn't be that shabby tbf.

Draconic

I wouldn't be so certain about the Saint. Sure if the Dead King wants to tempt her with something, it won't go anywhere, but in a way, she is the easiest to manipulate here. Put a villain in front of her, and she will kill them, no what the circumstances are.

Just imagine having her walk in on the Tyrant making a deal with the Dead King...

Andrew Mitchell

The Rogue Sorcerer is a very interesting character but quite opaque so far. He doesn't strike me as Good in the same obsessed way that Tariq and the Grey Pilgrim are. That gives me hope that he'll turn out to be a true ally of Cat because he's working towards the good of the common people.

Mental Mouse

Well, he's a Hero, but clearly not one of the direct Angelic agents. I suspect his Name would be one of the possible paths for the Apprentice name. Come to think of it... I don't think we've ever found out his personal name, only his Name.

konstantinvoncarstein

It would be refreshing to see a truly reasonable and moderate hero.

Liliet

Tariq and the Grey Pilgrim? XD

Andrew Mitchell

D'oh!!

I meant GP and SoS, of course.

Liliet

I assumed so, but the mental imagery was too hilarious to pass up XD

This chapter seemed to me like the sort of chapter I've seen in some fantasy book series where the opening chapter of the latest book summaries the situation and characters.

Did anyone else get that feeling?

Is there a chance that EE is planning for the final book to start here? (When the Guide is published, not for this WordPress version.)

Mental Mouse

Not the start of a book, it's not providing enough background for that. Probably the start of a new section within that book. The start of our Book V is about right for the print book too: Immediately after Cat emerges from the Everdark, so there's no need to describe or flesh out the Everdark, and then the various battles give opportunity to re-introduce the places and players of surface Calernia before we get... here.

But this is the start of a major arc, and warrants a brief recap of the personae dramatis.

theothin

Is it? Looks to me like we're right in the middle of one.

Guide books traditionally have three main arcs, of increasing intensity. We seem to be in the middle of Book 5's second arc.

The way I'd classify it is:

Book 1: Laure, Summerholm I, War College
Book 2: Summerholm II, Marchford, Liesse I
Book 3: Winter, Summer, Liesse II
Book 4: Stairway, Keter, Everdark
Book 5: Sarcella, Liesse III, ???

There can be divisions within the arcs, of course. For example, the Summer arc had a split between the Arcadia and Dormer parts, marked by the series of Free Cities interludes where Captain died. There's been a definite shift in the current arc from "Callow, Grand Alliance, and League fight each other" to "all three sides team up to go deal with the Arcadia shard", but I'd say that better fits the point where we moved from the recent interlude series back to Cat's POV. (Interludes are often useful in determining this sort of thing.) So I wouldn't even call this a new sub-arc so much as a new scene within the sub-arc?

Mental Mouse

We're only four numbered chapters into the Liesse III arc, and only just reached the building which will (with some magical work) let the party get to Liesse proper. I'd consider that pretty near the beginning. I like your breakdown, though.

theothin

We are 18 numbered chapters into the Liesse III arc. Although “Prince’s Graveyard” is probably a better name for it than “Liesse III”. Whatever we call it, we’re still in the arc that started with “Chapter 18: Fable”.

The Liesse II arc started with “Chapter 47: Offers”, and took quite a while to actually get to Liesse. Although that one did have more overall focus on Liesse. It’ll be easier to name this arc once we actually finish it, I’m sure.

Mental Mouse

See, there’s where we differ. I’d consider the first arc to include all the battles, at least up to Cat’s surrender and Viv’s ransom of their troops. After that our POV rapidly switches to “negotiation” in small rooms, and thence to the current mission.

theothin

The negotiation isn’t downtime, though. Things aren’t calming down like they did after Sarcella, just changing direction. A pivot, you could say. That’s why there was room for a not-in-the-same-place-as-Cat interlude after Sarcella, but it wouldn’t have made sense to have one here.

Mental Mouse

Right, that’s what I’m saying. The surrender and ransom wraps up the battle arc, and the physical fighting. Then the new arc begins, say, with Hakram hanging around in Kairos’s camp. From this point on, the POV stays there as the other characters gather, and there’s a change of tone: Threats and staredowns aside, the physical fighting is almost over: Kairos’ shot at Rozela gets summarily noped, and when Arnaud kills Princess Bertille, it’s almost a shock to us, let alone the royals.

Liliet

I would say Sarcella did not have enough of a peak to end the arc. I’d separate “The Iserre Clusterfuck” and “The Adventure”, myself, making this indeed the beginning of a second arc.

(I also separate Book I differently: Laure as something of a pre-arc that’s technically an arc but doesn’t really have enough of a climax for one; but War College as consisting of two arcs for two major victories Catherine got there)

theothin

I really don't think The Adventure will go on long enough to constitute a full arc, but I could be wrong. I see it as like Cat and Black's foray into Liesse at the end of Book 3: a quest within a larger arc.

"Doesn't have enough of a climax to be a full arc" isn't unusual for first arcs. I'd say Sarcella fits in fine compared to Laure and Summerholm II, while only Battle of the Camps really feels like a "normal" arc. (Winter is somewhere between the categories.)

I still say War College is best considered one arc with two sub-arcs. There's two battles, but they're basically back-to-back with no real downtime, two parts of "Cat leads Rat Company in mock battles against Juniper". I think that's like splitting Five Armies and One from Dornier.

Liliet

Summerholm II was a major milestone in Catherine showing that she can keep up with other Named – figure out the heroes' trick, delay them long enough for Warlock to recover, then actually save Breagach's life by convincing the Warlock to do the bloodline ritual Black had asked for. It changed who she was based on what she proved capable of, and that's my criterion.

Laure was not Catherine proving her capability of anything, only willingness. Meanwhile the two mock battles in War College were radically different in what they were about. The first one changed Cat's status from a loner to someone who fit in with the War College kids, to a capable commander who could actually surprise Amadeus with her achievements. The second one was barely about commanding at all – it was about diplomacy and intrigue from start to end, and established Catherine's skill at gathering followers. Her relationship with the Rat Company progressed towards "do what I say and don't complain and you won't be disappointed", and she successfully recruited the person she knew she could not outsmart. Both of those were radically new.

Sarcella, here, was not Catherine proving her capabilities, just showing off her powers. Sure, there was cleverness and leadership in there, but those had already been established before. It was setting the stage, somewhat like Laure, with Catherine staying fairly static through it. There was not a major change in her role, in how other players & the audience both perceived her, between pre-Sarcella and post-Sarcella.

The Weaver; Woven bookend climax has already established Catherine as something else altogether: a player capable of stepping back and calmly moving armies around like pieces on a board, her own and others' both. I expected, pre-Sarcella, that Catherine would be able to swing a battle around like she did; while I would not have called specific details, not a single thing she did surprised me.

I was damn fucking surprised by this.

And this accomplishment is already established. Even if this quest ends in disaster/queef a la Keter (which I strongly do not think it will, but regardless), the knot in Iserre is already cut, her army is already allied with the Grand Alliance, the Dead King's and Kairos's plan for making everybody else fight each other is already made visible to everyone.

This was a large leap in establishing Catherine's large-scale strategic/diplomatic/political capability. Now we're back to small-scale tactical Named shenanigans, with specific tropes not just serving as the players' motivations but actually actively allowing prediction. It will be a new milestone when Catherine gets through this, as distinct from the knot in Iserre as Winter was from Summer in Book 3 (which by the way had a similar scope shift: from a small group of Named at Winter Court to managing the whole country against Summer).

Liesse, by contrast, was two halves of a whole, the same game played simultaneously on two chessboards. It was answering one question: how well has Catherine prepared for this? Are her resources and capabilities sufficient for beating her nemesis who broadly knew both and prepared to meet her head to head? It was sequential only in the sense that first Catherine prepared the pieces and then moved them forward; she did not first obtain a victory on the battlefield and then in the fortress, or vice versa. Only one question was being answered, there.

This? This is going to be answering two rather distinct ones. As did the mock battles.

Mental Mouse

Laure was an arc: The Call To Adventure. It ended with her getting what she'd been seeking since she opened the story: Entry to the War College. As the larger story progresses, the stakes for each arc mostly get higher.

Also, “queef”? I just checked my prior understanding of that term with the Urban Dictionary, and I have to ask, was that really what you were trying to say? 😊

Mental Mouse

Which raises a point: IIRC, Cat hasn’t actually been to any of the Hells, has she? As understand it, a traditional Epic Journey may or may not pass through Heaven (which she has more-or-less done), but it always includes a visit to Hell. What with the Dead King as antagonist and world-hopping already in play, that may be coming in this arc.

Liliet

I think Book 4 solidly counted, with Keter and Everdark both – particularly Keter. While Catherine hasn’t visited the physical location classified as ‘a hell’, thematically Keter fit to a T, including the King Under The Mountain there. The belly of the whale was definitely Book 4 latter two arcs.

Mental Mouse

Meh. Both were hostile and of dubious relation to Creation, but so was Arcadia, and that’s clearly not a hell. I’d grant them “belly of the beast” status (“belly of the whale” is a distinctly different reference), but I’d say they were at best trial runs for a real Hell-passage.

More importantly, when the milieu includes places that are not only called Hells, but inhabited by demons and devils (and explicitly can be traveled to and from), I’m inclined to accept no substitutes. 😊 Especially given that at the other extreme, she has actually confronted angels in their own realm.

Liliet

Ehh. I still think Keter counts, but you have a point too. I’d be curious to see that.

Kairos, setting the tone for this adventure right away, there...

The image of Cat coughing ever more loudly and debilerately to interrupt Kairos and Pilgrim was just adorable.

There's always that one player...

i just gotta ask this question, the pieces are in motion, but i cant see one thing,; the gallowborne. Where are the gallowborne? Are they with Archer?

You mean those people who got slaughtered in Dormer with only like 6 survivors?

Observations and Predictions

Every time Saint has come up in the past several chapters there has been an explicit and extended reference to her Dominion, to her immediate mortality, and to a situation (e.g., hurting Masego) in which Cat has a pretext to slay her with a SwordStaffPrayer. This, plus the earlier, prophetic taunt "You will make useful artifacts" spoken by a fae, makes me think Saint is on track to make an artifact in Arcadia, that to use requires a voluntary cut.

I think Masego will be the 5th in the Band, and that Saint will be the Plus One. Her sword and the other knives/swords and armor/helmets are going to give King Larat a majorly violent resource base. I think it is possible he will kill Tariq easily and immediately, that Cat is going to be immobilized by some clever use of Night by Larat since she does not own it but only wields it, and that it will be the Rogue Sorcerer who puts him down. Masego will be tangling with Kairos, Heirarch, and the priests.

Kairos is a bit too clever to betray Cat superficially in a handout to the Dead King when he can destroy his ally more thoroughly simply by not betraying her, but rather betraying her low expectations for him. The meta-betrayal is not only only a more refined meal of ally-sabotage, but sets up more plot armor for him. He won't die in this arc, there is no real closure-granting narrative benefit to him dying now, and we haven't seen several of his plans materialize. He's the safest in the party after Cat.

But, I think Kairos has set up things so that Hierarch and the priests will arrive at an inconvenient moment regarding King Larat, and will attack both him and Heirophant as the two evil tyrants of this realm. This functions enough like a betrayal for narrative to check that box for Kairos's expectations, but since the ball was thrown blindly in the air earlier, Kairos will not have to pay. Heirophant will have been weakened by the Dead King but will Witness something important in the battle.

I do not see Amadeus's soul being brought into play in a major way until after the battle. Neshamah might try something with it, but he is the only character who might. Cat has learned to be patient, and there are two gods and a Saint to kill. Black is ever calculating, and will not kill Pilgrim when he would be dooming the world to the Dead King and old conventional stories by doing so. Instead, I see Hierarch learning a bit about Resurrection and Forgiving Black, from the lips of a dying Pilgrim or from some Arcadian echo thereof.

If Pilgrim dies when he goes into a battle featuring the Black Queen, she gets blamed for it. If Saint and Pilgrim are dead, then the Rogue Sorcerer is the highest ranking Hero in the south, and Levant just declared permanent war on Callow, making their joint war against the Dead King infeasible. The Rogue Sorcerer is being heavy-handedly introduced as a potential next Big Bad and events here might set things up for a two-front rather than united-front war. And, maybe the battle with Masego here is enough to cork the Dead King and the battle to the North is unnecessary. Arcadia is magically sympathetic.

And, if the Rogue Sorcerer has the key to the gate, and the only wars are to the East not the North, I can easily imagine him using it to attack Callow and/or Praes.

I predict the Rogue Sorcerer eventually will break both Akua and Masego. I strongly suspect he will transition into the next Wizard of the West. That ghost of a Name is far too often referenced to never materialize in-story. It also makes sense for that name to materialize after he takes the Wizard's materials being stored in the Tower. I think it is pretty obvious Malicia is no longer the Big Bad and will get a shot at redeeming herself in Amadeus's eyes. Bringing down the Tower to prevent the next Wizard, and failing, is one tonally consistent possible narrative.

Amadeus, Vivian and Cat will get new Names that will be neutral in the way Adjutant and Hierophant. Cat's current role is a learning experience and sets her up to match Tariq, but that relationship to Sve Noc is on loan and the drow are due to Keter. Cat's going to obtain a final boon from them, but her final arc's source of power will be based on her own conviction and fit a groove she cut for herself in Creation, not the handmaiden of eldritch evils introduced halfway through the story whose main value was teaching The Power of Friendship.

I wonder what Amadeus's future Role will be, but am 100% sure it is something that can end the Bard.

medailyfun

I think this chapter was preparing us for the following dialog:

Tariq: "Kairos, actually I'm your grandfather"

Kairos: "Nooooooo"

konstantinvoncarstein

I doubt it, but if it is the case I will die laughing 😂

Liliet

I'm just imagining this kind of whiny / petulant kid 'noooooooo'. Kairos is not even surprised, he's just protesting on principle 😊

Barrendur

Cat's turned very pompous recently, hasn't she? Never say something succinctly if you can draw it out into a melodramatic PRONOUNCEMENT instead? Of course, that might just be the narrative influence of Being In A Story... but I doubt it. Cat's always had a tendency to grandstand, and to be smug when she thinks she's been clever....

konstantinvoncarstein

In this case, she is 😊 And concerning the melodrama, she is probably making fun of the fact that she (an Evil character) have an heroic band with another villain and 2 heroes who wanted her dead not a day ago.

Mental Mouse

Cat has been far more than "clever" here; as Liliet points out, she's gone from measuring her power against various other combatants, to being recognized as a full peer to the most powerful Named on the continent, and more: Not just one of the players shaping her world, but a leader among those players – and currently in the driver's seat. I'd say she's earned the right to a bit of smugness, especially as she knows better than to revel in it for too long. And if she's pompous, well, she's been dealing with a lot of pompous people, so she's just fitting in. Arnaud was smart enough to recognize that if Procer tried to stand athwart the flood, they would simply be swept away... so he re-positioned the royals as a group to respect Cat &co. not as interfering busybodies or even saviors, but as a force of nature.

Daniel E

I suddenly have a sinking feeling that Cat is going to bite the big one at the end of all this, and in so doing will shift the land out of the grooves in Creation, effectively side-lining both Above & Below. As Apprentice said way back; 'everyone is focused on the other prisoners, when you should be looking at the bars of the prison itself'.

Mental Mouse

Well, (if she stays dead this time) that would make book VI a little difficult.

Daniel E

I was referring to the end of the Guide, not this particular chapter. I know we thankfully have at least 1 left.

Qwormuli

Ionsword, huh? We sci-fi now, bitches.

Okay, I know, that it's a typo, but I physically couldn't let that one go...

Mental Mouse

It occurs to me that everyone so far has focused on either Cat's trial or Saint's. The thing is, if temptation is DK's game, there's another party member who might be far more vulnerable.

Suppose DK gives Pilgrim a tour of the Serenity? A whole world of people who are safely protected from the vicissitudes of Creation, with devils reduced to beasts of burden, all willingly obedient to their god...

Liliet

Given that Levant was founded on the ideal of freedom from obedience to occupants...

Mental Mouse

But Pilgrim was founded on opposition to suffering, and even if the Serenity has nasty "back rooms", DK doesn't have to show those to Pilgrim.

Liliet

I think Tariq is smart enough to assume their existence. Utilitarians aren't idiots, even if the simplified version of utilitarianism that is commonly proclaimed is in itself fairly idiotic.

Dizzy Rabbit

I think it's funny that all the jousting for control of the "meta-narrative", weaponization of tropes has turned us all into "contenders" co-creating the story alongside the characters. It's our interest or disinterest and desire for a good story that impacts the characters in the story. It's symbiotic: our interest in one character or another gives them the "narrative weight" to survive and thrive, and in turn, the story affects us emotionally and compels us to invest in the story.

Mental Mouse

Not to mention that the author is clearly reading the comments.

Chapter 36: Bid

"Peace is the killer of empire, for when strength is not spent outwards it is instead spent within."

– Ghislaine of Creusens, twelfth First Princess of Procer

I couldn't ever remember being afraid of the dark, even as a child. Of what might be lurking in it, sure, but the dark itself? No. Long before I'd acquired patrons whose dominion was night, I'd liked a little shade. The fights at the Pit had often taken place late – even after lining the pockets of the city guard, Booker had been warned to keep her business out of sight – and summer after sundown was where the coin had been best at the Rat's Nest. Legionary leave did not change no matter the season, but come summer a lot of dockworkers earned a little more coin by fishing in the Silver Lake and a lot of that coin ended up spent on cheap ale. Which was, to my remembrance, the only kind the Rat's Nest ever stocked. I wondered what Harrion now... I frowned at the drift of thoughts, unsure how it'd started or where it was headed. Did it even matter? Oh, I was standing surrounded by thick and cloying darkness. And it was soothing, serene. It would have been so pleasant to just... float away, leaning into dreamlike thought. Snow, tears and barren laughter, I suddenly remembered. I'd laid down to die, once and the world had refused to take me.

There would be no takebacks.

"More fruitful than a direct assault would have been," I acknowledged out loud.

I struck at the ground with my staff, and the dark rippled out. Like a stone tossed into a pond, my will wrinkled the fabric of this half-world outwards in a wave. The span of what surrounded me was endless, I thought, and my act had been little more than a shout echoing in a gargantuan cavern.

"Is that to be your trick?" I asked the dark. "Obscuring the path? It won't work."

I cocked my head to the side and pricked my ear. The utter silence of this place was broken only by my own breath, which in this strange stillness seemed almost crassly loud. I was afraid, for a moment, that it would drown out what I was waiting for – but it was an empty worry, more born out of nerves at the calibre of my opponent than grounded thinking. My deliverance came in call harsh and hoarse, a distant cawing. I followed Komena's echoing caw, and limped forward into the dark. The Youngest Night left as swiftly as she'd appeared, for we'd agreed that she should avoid the Dead King as much as we could afford to. Neshamah would not be as dangerous working through Masego as he would be in person, but Hierophant was plenty dangerous enough on his own – and not without experience in the matter of disciplining lesser gods. My hobbling steps forward felt purposeless, without a destination to behold, but I forced myself to keep moving. If I could not trust the Sisters to guide me in the dark, then who could I trust? And, after what could have been either half an hour or an agonizingly long day, the trust bore fruit. The darkness rippled, and not through my will: I'd made enough progress, it seemed, to warrant refinement of the trap.

I almost stumbled when I my good foot came across a step, but I caught myself on my staff. I felt around cautiously and found out it was the first of what seemed like sprawling stairs going up. If this realm had been the Tyrant's to shape I would have taken this turn as a petty slight to make my life more difficult on account of my bad leg, but somehow I suspected the Dead King believed himself above that. I made my way up the stairs, observing from careful groping by foot and staff that at least they were broad and lightly sloped, and only halted after a long flight up when I felt this place grow... shallower. Frowning, I slowly raked my fingers through the air and let the fabric of this half-world thinner on my fingers. I exerted a pinprick of will and the small ripples that ensued had less to ripple through – and, more interestingly, they revealed some sort of veil in front of me. The way, as always, had to be forward. I stretched up my arm and tore down the veil, flinching at the wave of sound and light and colour that washed over me. I had, it seemed, exposed a doorway. I took a moment to compose myself, to let my eyes grow accustomed to the change in light, and only then tread through the threshold. Immediately, looking down I felt shaky for the height. I had come to tread over what looked like a gargantuan pane of glass, like a skylight put up through the sky.

Above me the sky was darkened by eclipse, a blinding ring of light with a hollow of night at the heart of it, and the clouds around us were a hazy penumbra of light and shadow. Below, though, thousands of feet below, three great armies were warily observing a truce. The League of Free Cities was milling uncertainly without a camp of its own, its large baggage train spread over the plans and guarded by knots of soldiers from half a dozen different city-states. The Army of Callow and the Legions-in-Exile had retreated back into their camp, though leaning down with a wince – Gods, the ground beneath me felt too slippery for this height – I noted that Juniper had ordered the siege engines to be turned on the League and the drow to be recalled behind the palisades. It was the armies of the Grand Alliance, though, that found their situation most uncomfortable. Split in two by my own host and the forces of the Free Cities, even after the night's losses they remained the largest of the armies on the field but also the worst-positioned. The calibre of officers on either side had told, I thought. Many of my commanders were young and fresh to their ranks, but they'd also been trained to lead a professional army. The Dominion's war leaders were clever and brave, but also clearly outmatched.

"This has been most entertaining."

My eyes flicked up, and I found I was no longer alone on this expanse of glass. I had expected to be looking upon the King of Death, but what I found instead was Neshamah. In the flesh, as he had been in the long ago days of the Kingdom of Sephirah he'd ruled and ruined. His appearance was from late in his reign, I thought, perhaps as late as that dark day where Keter's Due had gotten its name. Scholar pale and thin, he was closely-shaved but his dark hair was messy. Full red lips quirked as I met his gaze. Just like I remembered this eyes were a shade of light brown that the glow of the eclipse made into molten amber. On his brow, the copper circlet that was the crown of a kingdom long dead sat high over one of those strange Sephiran tunics: one sleeve long and broad but the other short and tight, the patterned bronze and red cloth sweeping down to his ankles with a broad sash belting it around the waist. He had, I suddenly realized, spoken in Ashkaran – that dead tongue Masego and I had stolen learning of from Arcadian echoes, along with most of what I knew of the Hidden Horror.

"You know I don't speak that," I said. "Dead King, we meet again."

"My apologies," Neshamah replied in Lower Miezán, lips twitching. "We meet again, Black Queen."

Staff rapping against the glass-like ground as I moved, I limped in a half-circle around him. I would not be allowed, I suspected, to leave this place before conversation was had. But that hardly meant I had to remain his captive audience, rapt and unmoving.

"Your manoeuvres below were worth the watching," the Hidden Horror idly told me. "It was an inspired skein of treachery, and a victory deserved."

"Night's not over yet," I said. "Though I have to say, you're being a great deal more civil than I expected."

Neshamah idly traipsed across the glass sky, the clouds above him making his eyes shift from gold to bronze like passing seasons set in an ageless face.

"I am a mannerly man, Catherine," he lightly said. "And you have given me no reason to act otherwise."

It almost felt like I was back in the Pit, for a moment, an opponent and I slowly circling as we took each other's measure. Waiting for an opening, for a weakness. I remained painfully aware that I had a lot more of either than the Hidden Horror.

"No?" I mused. "Yet you called an immortal, when we first met, and well..."

I shrugged, raising an arm in a nonchalant display.

"I'm hardly that, these days," I said.

The old monster's face was like a mirror, I thought as I watched him for a reaction. There would be nothing there to see I had not placed there myself.

"Are you not?" he smiled. "High priestess and herald of an apotheosis you ushered into this world by your own hand – would something as base as age or disease take you, Catherine Foundling?"

"The years will kill me, one of these days," I said. "If nothing else gets around to it first."

"Ah," the Dead King smiled. "But how many years would it take?"

I didn't answer that, for the truth was that I wasn't sure. My body now was no stronger than it'd been before I came into my Name, not without Night being woven into it anyway. Pain and exhaustion and so many things that'd felt... distant while I was Sovereign of Moonless Nights had been returned to me in full, but I had not taken sick since being proclaimed First Under the Night. As for age, though? It hadn't been long enough for me to be sure of whether or not my aging had resumed in earnest. It didn't feel the same way as it had under my Name, when I'd still grown but there had been something contrived about it – like I was matching a vision, not following nature's writ. And it was absolutely nothing like it'd been after Second Liesse, where I had been frozen and fixed unto myself. My blood was still red, and had not become gray nor dark, so it might be that I did not share the stretched lifespan of the Mighty who partook in Night. On the other hand, I had come into the priesthood of the Sisters after the devouring of Winter: it was unprecedented grounds we were treading.

"Priesthood is not godhood," I said. "That path you claimed I would walk, I set aside. You are not all-knowing, Dead King."

"Do you believe the Intercessor's strength lies in martial might?" he amusedly asked. "Or mine? You traded a power that shackled you for one whose burden and perils others will bear in your stead, while binding them to you in purpose. Winter's theft earned you regard, however accidental its execution, but it is your work in the Everdark that suggests you could in time be a peer."

He chuckled.

"Making peace with the dwarves and wheedling an army out of those unruly sisters in the bargain," he said, tone approving. "You traded that ill-fitting mantle for more than fair price. One of these days we will have to trade secrets, Black Queen. I rather wonder what you traded the Kingdom Under for a stay of invasion."

My heart skipped a beat. Was he implying I'd made actual peace between the dwarves and the drow? Or rather, was he implying that the Firstborn still held the old Everdark? I hadn't, though, the overwhelming majority of the drow was marching in exodus towards his own northern borders. Did he not know? It could be a trick, I thought. I only have the smallest slivers of Sve Noc with me, I thought. The rest is with their people. That would allow them to move unseen to most sorcerous means, and it was true that with his armies investing the Principate the Hidden Horror's attentions might currently be elsewhere. Unless he was lying to me, I thought. But if he wasn't...

"Agree to disagree," I warily said.

Anything more elaborate than trite vagueness might get me seen through, given who I was dealing with. I'd rather seem a little slow than tip my hand if he truly didn't know about the exodus.

"In at least one instance we do agree," the Hidden Horror said, "The night isn't over yet, Black Queen."

Looking into those patient golden eyes I almost shivered. He was speaking of more than the dawn Akua had held back for a few hours. Night was coming for Calernia, the kind that would be followed by no morning if it ever fell.

"Patience has never been my strong suit," I spoke with false calm. "Even less so when it pertains to my Woe – one of which you've gotten your skeletal hands on."

"It was not I who sought him," Neshamah demurred. "And what could do I but answer, when my presence was so earnestly petitioned?"

"You've had your laugh," I said. "And while you came close to breaking the armies below, the scheme was outed. There is no point in you lingering, Dead King. Leave him. Leave here. This is not the field where you want this contest to take place."

"You demand of me what was willingly given," the Dead King chided. "And offer nothing in return. What reason do I have to grant your wish, save that you wish it?"

"I have forged," I said, "a band of five."

"You have botched a band of five," he replied, amused. "How many do you believe will still serve your purpose, when choices are to be made?"

"Enough," I said. "I chose them knowingly. I demand nothing from you, and if it was a threat I'd offered I am not known for my subtlety in their speaking. I am stating that you have nothing left to find in this place save defeat, and not even the useful kind."

"I suppose," Neshamah mused, "that I should simply snap the Hierophant's neck and retire, then."

My fingers tightened around the ebony staff. I'd known going in that he would try that angle. Whether or not he could actually do that was in doubt, but I had a parry anyway. So long as the Grey Pilgrim lived to the end of this, so would Masego. I'd not forgotten the sight of the Peregrine wielding resurrection with but a word at the Battle of the Camps, unmaking the death I'd snatched from my clash against the other heroes. I almost forced a smile, but that would have been a mistake. No, let him see how the prospect of my friend being snuffed out like a candle grieved me. Let him believe I was willing to fight him anyway.

"If that is what it takes," I roughly said. "Gods forgive me, if that's what it takes. Too many lives are on the line."

"Ah," he smiled. "There we are. One more mooring, snapping for the tide. How many would be needed, before you truly took the plunge?"

Nonchalantly, he waved a hand.

"A conversation for another day," he said. "We have nothing but time. Let us speak, instead, of lives."

"Your plan has been outed," I said.

"One plan," he said. "One winter. One year. And how many deaths will it have cost you, even should prove the victor here?"

"You speak as if you were the invaded and not the invader," I said.

"You speak as one who sought to bargain with me," he mildly said. "For one such invasion."

I'd fully intended to betray him when offering that pact, though he'd known that from the start. Still, I almost winced. It was an incomplete truth, but still a damning one. I wish I could say that I'd not understood the scope of what I threatened to unleash then, and I supposed I hadn't. But I'd suspected, even back then, that it would be a horror unlike any other. I'd been willing to bargain with the King of Death to keep the Grand Alliance at bay, and that I'd been outmanoeuvred by Malicia in the attempt was the sole reason I wasn't my signature on the treaty that let's the monster out of its lair. And the truth was, looking down at the fragile truce below me, that I still felt I'd been right. Now that there was a greater threat for all to behold, all the petty games of power and story that'd condemned my home to be either a ruin or pack of tributaries had gone by the wayside. Oh, there were still other considerations but it was telling that while I was just as much the Arch-heretic of the East as last year suddenly everyone was willing to cut compromises and deals with me. It was the breathing room I'd needed, an opportunity I would never have had otherwise. If I'd known before leaving Keter that it would all work, even with these horrid costs, would I still have done it?

It was more damning than anything I'd done that I wasn't sure what the answer was.

"No such bargain was made," I said. "I understood what would come of it, if too late, and slew the one who made it. At least one time too few, but how many people can claim to have killed Dread Empress Malicia twice?"

I was not a fool, so I would not admit to such an ugly truth when the Dead King might be displaying this conversation for anyone to see and hear. With the way a grin flickered across his face, gone in the heartbeat it took for his eyes to pass from gold to bronze, I suspected I'd just neatly sidestepped exactly such a trap.

"We were speaking of lives, I believe," Neshamah said, circling me as I circled him.

His footsteps were a whisper on glass, a contrast to my trudging boots and sharply tapping staff.

"So we were," I agreed.

"Rhenia has fallen, did you know?" he asked. "Hannoven months ago, but the Lycaonese hold nothing but the last fortress of Twilight's Pass. After it the heartlands of Bremen will fall, and with them the armies that would defend Neustria. It will be the end of them."

"They've held you back in Cleves and Hainaut," I said.

"For now," the Dead King said. "How long can that last? No, the simple truth is that the Principate was not prepared. And then that delightful Theodosian child struck at its allies and its back. Even if you bring Callow to their aid, you but delay the inevitable."

"Would you say," I cheerfully replied, "that you are invincible, and your victory is assured?"

"A bold attempt," the Hidden Horror commented. "Though it makes a poor evasion. Do you disagree with my words, Black Queen?"

"That the Grand Alliance spent a horrendous amount of soldiers etching a bitter stalemate in Callow?" I said. "No. That its loss is written in the stars? Hardly."

"Imagine what you might do with ten years," Neshamah idly said. "If my armies withdrew, and truce was observed unfailingly. If you were allowed to truly muster this continent for war, instead of piecing together foes and friends in a broken coalition of mistrust."

And there it was, I thought. The bargain to be made. And it was quite the prize, wasn't it? Gods, what I could do with ten years and the promise of a war with Keter at the end. The League could be brought to heel and then into the fold, the Tower brought down on Malicia's head and the Liesse Accords made to bind even her successor. A decade of recovery for my bruised kingdom who'd known constant war for years now, and once the recalcitrant to the east and the south of the continent were brought into line we'd have a solid, lasting peace – the First Prince would not countenance war where a single soldier might be lost that could instead be sent to hold back the Kingdom of the Dead when it returned. It got me everything I wanted and saved what had to be hundreds of thousands of lives. I'd warned the others that the Hidden Horror would approach us with tantalizing bargains, all the while thinking myself beyond that temptation. And I couldn't, wouldn't, shouldn't make a pact with him. But Gods, what a prize it would be.

"Ten years," he mused. "No, perhaps a decade is too little to move you. Would you like, Catherine Foundling, to purchase a century of truce?"

I flinched. That was a different prize, and perhaps even more tempting.

"If you are truly as a mortal as you insist, then the dead will not trouble Calernia in your lifetime," Neshamah idly continued.

"And what would you want in exchange, Dead King?" I asked.

"A paltry concession," he smiled. "I would require the keeping of what lands I have already seized."

Which would be what? Rhenia, Hannover, parts of Bremen and Hainaut. The Principate would be losing more than half the Lycaonese principalities, which was a chunk of territory, but to be blunt it was mostly mountains and fortresses assaulted by the ratling warband every spring. Hainaut was more of an issue, since it was a foothold for Keter on the southern shore of the Tomb, but what little word I'd had of that front implied the principality was on the verge of collapse anyway. I'd offered him rights to more than that when I first sought to make a bargain, though admittedly it'd been under false pretences. If the Dead King kept his word, though, the Principate would have a hundred years of peaceful northern border to prepare. If the First Prince agreed, and if it spared her own people annihilation in addition to all the rest I genuinely thought she might accept. And I'd back her, in the aftermath, to the fucking hilt. To expand the Grand Alliance, and then every step of the way.

The two of us, and the Pilgrim if he could be talked into it, we could get Calernia on proper war footing. With ten decades instead of one, the situation with Praes and the Free Cities could be properly seen to instead of hurried. The drow would need a home, but Masego had helpfully ripped a chunk out of Arcadia that could be put to use. This could work, I thought. Of course, it was possible Neshamah would just let the ratlings pass straight through the northern principalities he'd occupy and disrupt the peace without breaking his word. And there'd be benefits for him as well, I thought, or he would never have made the offer in the first place. I was about to bring up the Chain of Hunger when I realized what I was doing and closed my mouth. I'd been considering the practicalities, working out the details. About to try finding his angle. I had, in essence, already accepted the deal he'd offered.

Gods. I'd known what he was doing from the start, and still here we were.

"We will speak of it again, Black Queen," the King of Death said. "At this peace conference you hve schemed."

There was a deafening crack, and the glass floor beneath our feet began to splinter.

"You did not test me," I said.

The Hidden Horror met my eyes, and for the first time there a flash of irritation in the golden gaze.

"Am I chattel, Black Queen, to be led to the altar with blinders on my eyes?" he said. "Am I to willingly embrace the ways of defeat simply because we are at odds? I think not."

He leaned forward, face cast harshly.

"This game, as all games, I will play on my terms and only that," the Dead King said. "I have learned what I wanted from this communion, and when I have taken what I wish from this ruin I will forsake it as well. Not a moment before, Catherine, and petty tricks will not force my hand."

Neshamah flicked a wrist dismissively.

"Remember that, when we speak again. Youth only earns so many allowances."

In rain of glass I fell through the floor and passed through air and darkness until I landed in another place. Light was peeking through cracks in a door before me, and I opened it. Above me dark clouds pulsed with rings of sorcery, but beneath my boots were the still-paved streets of the ruins of Liesse. My hands were trembling, I saw. I grit my teeth, and put the inarticulate dread that'd sunk in my guts aside. I still needed to find the others wherever they'd come out in the city.

The night was not yet over, even the monster of monsters agreed.

crowlute

3 years later and wow, "first" comments have so little value.

danh3107

Fuck me rough and bloody, his test was exactly what she wanted. She failed it the minute she contemplated taking the truce deal. I'm not saying be a zealot like Saint and refuse all offers, but surely any deal with the dead king is poison.

Rough waters ahead if my forecast is correct.

Liliet

I don't think she failed it.

I think it would have been much worse if she'd just gone the 'lalala I'm not listening' route. That just opens you to getting fucked over by the thought you cannot think later. It's better to think it through, and reject while understanding fully what it is that you're rejecting.

Catherine would have passed, which is exactly why Neshamah did not wait for her answer – delaying it gives him another opportunity for a strike later, as this one has already failed.

Any deal with the Dead King is poison. Knowing that, it's better to know what exactly he's offering and how it works.

Catherine did not win this confrontation, as Neshamah does not give openings, but she did not lose, and she did not put herself in a worse position for later. Not worse than it would otherwise have been.

Oh, she might be thinking otherwise, at the moment, herself – if you go too meta, you lose automatically, after all. It's object level that heroes ride out on, and Catherine needs to hold on to that above anything else, here.

God, I love this chapter.

Javvies

Damn, he's good. Of course, he'd have to be.

Besides, a century would be, in fact, too long a peace – it would be out of living memory for basically all non-Named humans, and they'd turn against each other for personal gain. For that matter, even most current Named would be dead too – Heroes still age, only Villains get to avoid aging.

Not that this would be allowed to happen anyways – Saint would absolutely kill anyone who went for it. Though I could maybe see where Pilgrim could perhaps be convinced to go along with it, but I'd expect that the Ophanim would exercise their influence against it.

Skaddix

That is the biggest issue right there the Villains get 100 Free Years. Heroes die maybe the Witch has enough magic to extend her life but the rest dead and replaced. And without Pilgrim around the hold on Levant is weak.

I am glad she noticed that the Ratlings would get some free attacks.

Anony

Named don't age to, if only evil named for perpetuity, how does Ranger make sense?

They could still die, sure, but with a story like this in the making I highly doubt any important characters would bite it before the war even starts.

Javvies

Heroes age, Villains don't.

Ranger is explained by being a Villain (technically), and also by being a Half-Elf, and so likely incredibly long-lived even without the Name giving her immunity to aging.

MatrixM

Ranger is assumed to be a Villain and is also a half elf
Only Villains among named are immune from aging.

konstantinvoncarstein

That is exactly what the opening quote says, that a long peace would shattered the Alliance.

Decius

By offering a century, he revealed his gambit: He won't attack after ten years, or a hundred. He's going to wait until the army arrayed against him disbands, turns to another purpose, or grows fat and lazy, even if that takes two centuries.

Liliet

That's... a fantastic point indeed.

If Catherine took this deal, the correct action for her would be to break it immediately afterwards, as soon as she managed to line up everyone on roughly the same side.

Dainpdf

Sure, but who would really side with her, go for an invasion of the Kingdom of the Dead, when they have a guaranteed truce for decades to come? Plus, starting a war by breaking a truce is not a story you want to be in...

shieldredblog

A Villain fighting another Villain could get away with it. The Heroes would be in trouble though.

Dainpdf

I think even villains are behold to the "broke agreement with the godlike entity" trope.

Liliet

Arguably, the entire Crusade. It's kind of their thing, and Procer does need to get its territory back.

Dainpdf

That is some serious if. Cordelia would certainly take a hit to her position having lost her main support base, and Malicia is bound to start harassing everyone...

Would the Grand Assembly really vote to go fight for Cordelia's homeland like that?

I am not sure Levant would move if the Pilgrim were no longer around, and Ashur is also doubtful if Magon Hadast is no longer alive.

Liliet

True.

Not taking the deal is definitely a better answer, and Catherine knows that.

But he's apparently going to come to the peace conference with it...

Javvies

If the Dead King has a place at the peace conference Cat intends to call and leverage the Liesse Accords into existence at ...

I'm fairly certain that he won't have a seat at the table. For one thing, such a conference can only happen after he's no longer invading, which means that the drow are camping the gate to Serenity. Probably in conjunction with Alliance/other forces, because of their issues with sunlight and sunrise.

However, let's be realistic.

Laurence would murder the hell out of anybody who tried to accept a deal with the Dead King.

Even Tariq likely wouldn't approve (plus the Ophanim almost certainly veto) – Tariq is sometimes wearing blinders about what could be, but there's no outcome from making a deal with the Dead King that truly reduces unnecessary suffering – sure, stopping the fighting stops immediate suffering, but I'm pretty sure Tariq would consider the suffering involved in fighting the Dead King to be necessary suffering. And, to be honest, he's probably right about that. Or at least, not wrong.

Cordelia wouldn't accept it, and probably the same goes for anyone with experience fighting the Dead King and familiar with politics.

Liliet

Mhm.

Here's hope.

Dainpdf

And will he have "video" of Cat considering it? 😊

Liliet

I mean honestly this getting broadcast is if anything in Catherine's favor.

Her temptation being peace, and the argument between the two of them being lives, speaks volumes on whose side she's on in this war.

Dainpdf

Most would just look and see her considering making a deal with Neshamah where she gives away part of Procer in exchange for a truce until she's no longer around to fight.

Liliet

'most' out of who?

Keep in mind how fucking low expectations are, here. Like most Procerans probably expect her to not be fighting DK on their behalf at all, yeah?

Dainpdf

Most people in the Alliance.

daegone823

Th crusade is a holy war launched against a terrible evil with magical wmds. It was a almost just war in the eyes of the heaven a defensive offensive maneuver.

The crusades power is uniting multiple heroic names along with regular troops to face said evil. While narratives are weakened for heroes they are still offered moments of triumph against forces of greater power. Queen of winter or dead king with the possibility of success.

Launching a truce under a truce with the purpose to just reclaim land would be a mistake. While that type of war could be launched against humans. It is not heroic or even villainous to fight for land. It just selfish it has no purpose and nearly impossible to frame it as such.

Worst case scenario dead king is embraced as a hero defending his peaceful lands from foreign invaders. Which has a lot of ramifications.

Dainpdf

Small note to remind that technically the Crusade was launched on Praes, not the Queen of Winter. She just happen to be in the way, a villain, and her lands very appealing to Procer.

Liliet

Yeah.

Catherine's human, and tempted just by the idea of not having to deal with the eventual aftermath – but that doesn't make it a good idea.

daegone823

She already said she was impatient and that is all the dead king needed. Her impatience.

A being who can match wits with the wandering bard, a being who literally breeds humans like livestock, hordes heroes like playing cards, controls a gate to hell, puppets the greatest mage in all of Praes like a car rental. He is playing games beyond games, and all you want is 100 years, disappointing. He understands that humans/orcs/goblins do not have the fortitude of will that he has, a force of will that has persisted for thousands of years.

I think that is why he was so impressed with her trip to the under dark, she was able to create a peaceful situation where all parties benefited from a society that breathes murder and another that committed whole sale genocide because of a threat. She pacified the dwarves.

His conversation where he complimented Cathrine on her godhood is an example of how she is still thinking small. She does not understand her own powers still and it appears he is getting tired already of holding her hand. I bet it was almost hysterical looking at Catherine having to juggle the grand alliance while he was simultaneously slaughtering the Prinicpate. Whereas he is just above this mess, similar to the bard. Time for humans is precious because they have a limit(Pilgrim, Black, first Prince) they mus achieve as much as they can in there time frame or risk it all crumbling over time.

The only thing that limits beings who have reached apotheosis (Cat, Sve Noc, Dead King, Bard) is there imagination and force of will. Catherine did not/or worse could not comprehend what game they were playing. How the dead king would have no problem giving her 12 or even 100 years if he was given "divine permission" to eat the baby once again, by the priestess of night no less. Her debating such a meaningless favor is a sign that she is still not ready for the big games yet, he knows her measure.

Love how he was like "Oh cool you made a god that's a neat trick tell em about it some time, maybe I will tell you about the day I took control of a hell gate over hot chocolate".

Mental Mouse

She understood just fine, it just took her a moment. First Sight and Third Thoughts for the win, or at least the standoff.

Also, I'll note that "I called it" on her dubious mortality, at least according to DK (and assuming he wouldn't bother lying here). That raises a question of whether her crown is still valid... but it also occurs to me now that the original price was "seven mortal crowns and one", setting the last apart from the mortal crowns So if Cat's crown can be the one, so could Dead King's.

Mental Mouse

Addendum: Browsing recent comments, I note that Isi Arnott-Campbell beat me to my last point above, by two chapters: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/05/01/chapter-34-seven/comment-page-1/#comment-40988>

Liliet

I don't think the word "apotheosis" is applicable here, or if it is, Catherine isn't there yet.

But yes, it's a great deal for Neshamah that he'd offered and in truth a terrible deal for what Catherine has to protect.

And yeah lmao re: your last paragraph

luminiousblu

Catherine doesn't particularly want to understand since she has a weird attachment to being human, while also missing the fact that if you're 'just' human then you can't really face an inhuman foe. Neshamah has reached the point where he's not an enemy so much as a boogeyman, he might be a villain but the setting is going to protect him because he's an inherent part of the setting. He's been in the background for so long that he's the inherent demon that nobody wants to touch, even as other villains rise and fall and millions of character arcs are concluded. It's like Satan really, you can't 'beat' Satan because that's the end of the story.

Which I suppose is Catherine's goal, but then, Satan isn't defeated by mortal means, Ragnorak kills everyone except for a few gods and a pair of humans hiding in a tree, the Aztec cycles destroy absolutely everything and start it all over again. The only real way you can 'safely' remove Neshamah is if you decide to not be human.

Also I refuse to believe that Akua couldn't have added taste to Cat's fae senses, it's ultimately an illusion. Catherine herself probably could've added the sense of taste by duping reality if she wanted.

Liliet

Not how this setting works.

A peasant with a sword has a much better shot against a dragon than another, smaller dragon.

Dainpdf

That, plus the fact that Neshamah can play the long game. Any war that ends with permanent territory acquisition, and at a low price, is a good one.

Also? "Lands he's laid claim to" just might include a little piece of Arcadia...

Mental Mouse

Yeah, a century is pocket change for him.

naturalnuke

There's the poison, but even then it's a sweet one.

WuseMajor

If he always exchanges Peace (from him) for a specified interval, however long, for "minor" territory concessions, and everyone always takes him up on it, because he's impossible to destroy, he'll wind up owning the continent in the end. Which is all that really matters to him, I think.

No human nation can stay on a war footing indefinitely. And, even if you had a giant clock that counted down until doomsday, the nations of the world would probably just treat it as another excuse to party, instead of an imminent threat.

Levi Kalden

Yeah, I think the 10 years would be the better bargain actually as everyone now alive can expect to be still alive and that would still their hand from foolish mistakes

Skaddix

He took Cat to school.

Interesting does Pilgrim's Resurrection work on Villains I am not sure.

And Cat might not be aging.

onedollargum

Given how Cat mugged an angel for one I'm pretty sure she'd have an easier time with Pilgrim.

Liliet

I understand it as aging slower, and I'm guessing it'd get slower and slower with time – with her being a wizened old crone for centuries upon centuries upon centuries without noticeable change. That's the trope / mixture of tropes I'm seeing here 😊

And Pilgrim works by Forgiving. There's no restriction on who he can Forgive, I'm pretty sure, as long as he's genuinely willing himself – and I do imagine he'd have no justification for refusing, here.

Dainpdf

One could technically stretch out a finite amount of aging over an infinite period of time. Something like an arctangent function.

Mental Mouse

<pedant>

The generic term for such curves (and the inverse, reaching infinity within a finite span) is “asymptotic”. Arctangent is indeed an classic example of such function.

</pedant>

Dainpdf

I'd rather not use a technical term less people would understand, or one which would get others to ask “asymptotic to what?”

After all, a function can be asymptotic to another, non-constant one. Now, calling it a “bound, strictly increasing function” would also work, but does nothing to avoid unnecessary jargon.

Liliet

I honestly think ‘asymptote’ is less technical than arctangent. I did not in fact remember for sure that arctangent was an asymptote before you said it -_-

Dainpdf

Anyone can look at the graph of the arctangent and see what it looks like. Understanding limits at infinity seems harder.

Liliet

I remember what an asymptote is because it's a very great and useful concept applicable to many things outside of geometry – like this here.

And if you don't understand a limit at infinity, looking at a graph for archtangent isn't going to help you.

Dainpdf

You can see it's a curve that always increases (something an asymptote does not guarantee), that it is bound from above (something an asymptote also does not guarantee), and that it seems to approach a finite value (something an asymptote does not guarantee either).

So saying "arctangent" explains what kind of curve I am talking about and provides a picture, while the term "asymptotic (to a constant)" is weaker than what I need while also making it harder to understand.

Liliet

Mhm! An asymptote 😊

Dainpdf

Just answered a similar comment. Please refer to that.

shieldredblog

Not so sure about the Pilgrim. It's stated that he is taking souls directly from Heaven when he resurrects people. If Villain souls go anywhere, it would be the Hells. He might not be able to reach down there.

Also Resurrection has consequences. It mentally scars people, changing their personality. I imagine it would be worse for a Villain too. Lastly he might not want to resurrect the Hierophant, as that seems like a good way to empower him with his own resurrection powers.

Liliet

Catherine has been resurrected by Above's powers already, and she's fine. Do you think this would be the worst thing to happen to Masego's mental state in the last couple of months? 😊 I'm not sure it'd make the top three, all in all.

Good point about potentially not wanting to resurrect the Hierophant, but:

1) does he actually have the information about how Masego gets miracle powers from observation? It's not exactly stamped on his forehead and it never came up directly during the Northern Crusade. It's worth remembering that Catherine wasn't even sure he was backed by a Choir until the first attempt at a peace conference – characters have a lot less of a bird's eye view on each other than we the readers do;

2) Narratively, it would be bad as hell for Pilgrim to fuck over Catherine here by refusing to resurrect her friend. She is not technically wrong when she says Masego had been put in danger by trying to find out a way to kill the Dead King, and technically correct is a very potent kind of correct when it comes to this kind of thing. Masego dying here would be a victory for Neshamah in his idle side-quest of 'unmooring' Catherine (which she might just tell Tariq about to secure his cooperation in avoiding that), and it would be a loss for the side of the Grander Alliance here – he's a powerful mage who is going to fight on their side as long as Catherine is on their side, too.

shieldredblog

Her soul was bound to an object though. They set that up beforehand.

Liliet

True enough!

luminiousblu

Age doesn't actually kill anyone, or at least if it does we don't know how it actually works.

If Catherine is totally immune to disease or accidents but still aging then she's going to end up with the eternity without youth curse.

Liliet

Mhm.

Stormblessed

Yeah I agree with the other commentators. The ten year deal is WAY better than the hundred year deal, but the Dead King sidestepped the worse deal only to suggest the better one as if he was doing Cat a favor by offering a superior deal for nothing in return. Ten years is just long enough to hold the coalition together in the name of the greater evil. In 100 years the deal will be forgotten.

konstantinvoncarstein

He truly is a magnificent bastard.

erebus42

It was a good attempt on Cat's part. Impressively, this promises to be even more of a shit show than previously suggested. Possibly even a clusterfuck if it goes sufficiently more south.

Andrew Mitchell

My estimation of the Dead King just went up a couple of notches.

He knows that Cat knows Ashkaran and how she learnt it because Masego knows and DK is in Masego. He knows that Cat can be tempted.

I wonder what ELSE he learned from this encounter?

He knew the former back in Keter (because he invited the Woe to pass through the reflections in Arcadia, as it happens), and the latter isn't exactly hard to guess.

Someguy

Damn. Cat failed the test. Contemplating taking the deal was enough.

Also Neshamah really moves like Black.

wirelessgrapes

But, the loss is first

Liliet

I think she passed, to the degree that Neshamah was willing to make this a test at all. That's why he didn't wait to hear the result – she fully thought the offered bargain through, not offering him obvious openings in bringing it up later on, and weighing the potential benefits against the fact that it's him offering, came to the conclusion not in his favor – and so he retreated, not allowing her to seize the advantage that actually saying “no” would give her both psychologically and story-wise.

Liliet

And yes, the main difference between the two – Neshamah and Black, that is – is goals, not methods 😊

werafdsaew

There was no trial. She failed because the DK learned some information from this exchange, not because she failed the trial.

Andrew Mitchell

What did he learn?

konstantinvoncarstein

We will probably learn it at the same time as Cat, and it will not be pretty.

Andrew Mitchell

Mmmmm.... good point.

Mental Mouse

Actually, we have a pretty good guess: Assuming that his perceptions beats her poker face, he now knows that the Drow aren't just sitting around in the Everdark, and given that he can figure out they're coming after him.

Andrew Mitchell

Ooooo, that's bad.

Mental Mouse

Oh, it was a trial, which Cat did pass because she did in fact refuse the temptation. But DK (like Cat herself) was perfectly willing and able to pick up some information in the process.

Liliet

This, i think.

Sylwoos

She was about to pass, but the DK preemptively cut the conversation short to not give her a win story-wise. That's why she complained about not being tested. DK wield story like Cat and Black, but have century of experience behind him.

Liliet

Mhm!

She got as close to winning as she could against this opponent, and then he messed with her head as a parting move, because he could.

antoninjohn

If they turn on each other once they have a temporary truce with the Dead King then the Dead King wins if they don't then they when, Cat will just have to have trust and it will all work out fine

Relyt

Trust it all works out fine? Perhaps Cordelia, Pilgrem, and Cat could bring Malicia to heel, deal with the Tyrant (because there's no way he'd stick to this truce), and muster Calernia to war in ten years. Maybe. That's assuming that nothing goes wrong, and very few stories let you sit back and eco for a decade.

If it's 100 years? No amount of trust would make it work. In a few decades, Procer gets a new generation of princes, princes whose ambition isn't tempered by memories of the Dead King. Heroes only live so long. The Ophanim have granted Pilgrim a longer life, but I doubt he'd get another full century, so now Levant's ties to the cause are in question. 100 years is long enough that half a dozen Praesi are going to pull some Stupid Evil shenanigans. Hell, unless Cat either remains queen or keeps her successors on a tight leash, then even Callow might go AWOL. A hundred year truce sounds great in theory, but falls to pieces in practice.

All of that is ignoring the most important thing – the Dead King is immortal. What does he care about 100 years? He'd trade that for a single fort, let alone entire principalities. Because a hundred years later, he can just make this deal again. And again and again, until he's annexed all of Calernia. There's no reason to believe that they'd be any more successful than past crusades in killing the Dead King, so one must assume they won't and plan accordingly. Any permanent concessions are too high a price, let alone for something as fragile as hundred years for the Grand Alliance to turn on itself.

One last note – signing a truce with the Dead King with the expectation that he'll invade at the end could be, if you squint at it, an legitimization of his efforts. Almost like they agreed to a showdown. "Crusade vs abominable invasion" is a much better story for the heroes than "Pistols at dawn, 10 years from now."

Decius

The expectation that he will invade after 10 years is worse than legitimizing his efforts. It's wasting your own.

Because in ten years the new border will be just as unassailable as the old border was, and there will be no invading army to fight.

You wake up early, clean and ready your pistol, and march to the dueling ground, where you die of old age waiting for the showdown.

Liliet

Yep.

Qwormuli

This is probably the most well put variation of this thought in this comment section.

daegone823

I believe the same almost makes you wonder how many heroes has he made this deal with. If this current invasion isn't going according to plan. I mean he literally had a monk and former white knight guarding his throne room. He probably agreed to stop attacking there troops/ allowing troops to retreat in return for there lives along with 25 year peace treaty.

The Bard tries to balance creation the dead king seeks to unbalance it. They chat they laugh then use heroes like pawns. The means and man power really do not matter, especially since the dead king has made his own empire with humans who can also assume names. If he takes enough territory can he affect the alignment of the whole continent. Will heroes become villains since they are seeking retribution against the heavenly dead king.

With enough time the dead king can poison the well of creation.

Mental Mouse

> "Crusade vs abominable invasion" is a much better story for the heroes than "Pistols at dawn, 10 years from now."

Yeah. It's important to realize that "on the face of things", DK is flatly unbeatable: An immortal, with overwhelming power both military and magical, and his own private realm to draw on or retreat to as needed. Even if the mortals come up with a weapon that destroys all undead within 99 miles, he also has a human population to make armies out of, and who can tell how large that population is by now. Or what resources they can extract from their converted Hell, e.g.: "I'll see your goblin steel and match it with spell-wrought demon bone and scale. As for your goblinfire, I have the original: genuine hellfire."

The only thing that can contain him, much less drive him back, is Story.

Aston

Just. As. Planned.

For...Black?

superkeaton

Old Monsters are old for a reason Cat, and The Dead King is about as old as they get without being straight from Below. He's played this game with the Bard for a very long time and they are very good at it. You'll have to do better if you want to score a meaningful win.

Liliet

Neshamah doesn't allow openings for victories against him, only not-losses. I would say Cat did not lose here, as much as was physically possible against someone like him.

Good job on her part :3

daegone823

It like in poker it does not really matter what cards she is playing with but the mindset behind the card player. It is why the Black Knight is the oldest villain not his power but his mind. I think that is what she understands the dead king was no probing for information about petty fights between humans about heroic stuff. He does not care about that. He was looking at an individual who he had regarded as a peer. He was looking at her state of mind.

She clearly has her head in the clouds and is so focused on petty squabbles, in his view she has let herself get dragged down by these lesser beings. In effect she is still at the table, but clearly an amateur.

Liliet

I'm not so sure that's how he thinks. Sounds... a bit too far removed from reality for someone as savvy as he is.

Heathen

A truce would be a terrible deal for the living, because Keter doesn't have to attack at the end of it. Right now, the living are in the position of being invaded by an endless horde of undead – which is a story that really only goes one way.

But if they sign a truce, and build their armies and alliances for ten, twenty, a hundred years... at the end of it, Neshameh can still just sit inside Keter and wait. His invitation outside the Kingdom will still be good (because it was a truce, not a peace), and eventually one of two things will happen. Either the armies of the living invade Keter (which is a guaranteed defeat), or he simply waits until they turn back to petty squabbling and infighting before invading again. It puts the narrative on his side, which is essential if he's actually going to win, here.

He can wait an eternity, if he has to. He's immortal.

luminiousblu

>Right now, the living are in the position of being invaded by an endless horde of undead – which is a story that really only goes one way.

I mean

Depends on the story. There's a lot of stories where the dead just end up winning. They generally won't wipe out humanity wholesale, no, but obliterating a single kingdom? No, that's actually standard fare. It's totally reasonable for Neshamah to eat the baby. That's what marks the invasion of the dead as a legitimate threat for the rest of the story, and therefore heroes are rallied and called to arms to stop the tide of death.

Unless obviously Neshamah just doesn't keep invading and doesn't even keep the land. If I were him I'd just kill everyone there as soon as I took it and have them stripmine/stripchop the place, salt the earth, then leave at the last minute. Procer is the most populous state and likely one of the biggest producers of food, so whatever refugees make it to Callow are just going to obliterate the economy there for lack of shit to eat. Recolonizing an area the size of Procer just doesn't happen if it's super infertile, not short-term, and if the Dead King waits two centuries before trying again Procer won't put up a fight.

The shape of THAT story is the one where kings wave their hands and go 'eh, it was a weak state, we're in no danger'. Then Neshamah gets to eat another baby.

edrey

he looked in her soul right? to gain information, even with sve noc protection, he should have a way to do it.

well masego should be saved by archer, no other way here, it's her story to snap her fear.

for the hundred years of peace, the heroes and the kingdom under would kill her before the decade is over, if a villain loses momentum it's dead for sure.

sengachi

Who needs soul-vision to manipulate someone when you have thousands of years of practice, a completely unknown spy network spread across the land, the greatest sorcery the continent has ever known, and a direct line to their friend's brain?

Liliet

What sengachi said. Soul-vision is a crutch for those incapable of accounting for other people's moves without it. Catherine doesn't have it, and look how she plays the game :3

daegone823

I have always wondered how some aspects reveal the crutches of the name. Sort of like indicators of where they are most weak. Reliance on your aspect rather than working on yourself individually so you are not as dependent on it can only end up in failure later down the line.

Liliet

I'd say less of the Name and more of the individual. Heroes get Aspects to prop them up where they would fail on their own, making them less hyperspecialized glass cannons the way villains are and more sturdy jacks-of-all-trades. See also: Laurence's Listen, William's Triumph, Hanno's Recall, the Mirror Knight's Dawn,

Tyckspoon

I've always been kind of impressed at Ranger's aspects for this reason. Learn, Perfect, Transcend. It speaks of somebody who will not tolerate having weaknesses, and if you think you've identified a weakness you had better kill her with it – the next time you meet her she'll probably kill you with the new talent she forged out of that weakness.

wirelessgrapes

The loss is always the first

caoimhinh

It's interesting how Cat kept trying to bait the Dead King into falling to the tropes of classical villainy and he kept saying to her 'Am I a joke to you? I am not an idiot to fall for that'.

Also, this particular exchange seemed very important:

"You did not test me."

"...Am I to willingly embrace the ways of defeat simply because we are at odds? I think not."

That sounds like implying that if they actually entered a confrontation, they would trigger a Pattern of Three, and given how in this particular situation the Dead King was pretty much bound to lose (since Cat would definitely pass the test), Neshamah decided to avoid it at all.

That has interesting implications, but also means that he could cut his losses when it came to this fight for Masego and make a victim out of him.

I hope Masego can be back home soon.

P.S: this came to my mind when Dead King said to Cat that she was just delaying the inevitable, sorry I couldn't help it :v

Neshamah: I am the King of Death, I am inevitable.

Catherine: And I am the Black Queen.

Typos found:

when I my good foot / when my good foot spread over the plans / spread over the plains Juniper hard ordered / Juniper had ordered you called an immortal / you called me an immortal
I wasn't my signature / it wasn't my signature you hve schemed / you have schemed there a flash / there was a flash

caoimhinh

Something to add:

I know that losing first in a Pattern of Three means a victory in the end, but the point is that entering into a Pattern of Three at all means that he would need to get actually invested, right? That would leave him vulnerable to the others, even if he was guaranteed a Win against Cat in the end, Heroes would still be able to get him if he overreaches, so Neshamah is avoiding ever getting really involving too deep in anything. At least that's what I think, he is too careful and wary to take risks to get petty victories. In fact, he might not even want to win, but merely live. Everything else would be either a step taken in that direction or an expendable thing for that goal.

Relyt

I read that "you did not test me exchange" more as the Dead King saying "Do you really think I'll just lean into the tropes that make villains lose?"

That would, however, mean that he's probably going for some different setup than "stronghold of a villain". Any idea what?

Liliet

I think "stronghold of a villain" is something of an inevitable thing here, or it wouldn't be such a staple. It's genuinely the best universal basic setup for a villain to make, it's just that you can refine it beyond that by countering the opponents you know more directly – like how Akua baited Catherine into retreating to Arcadia where she could be bound. Neshamah offers, I imagine, the test to all others, but he can wriggle out of settling into a losing pattern by doing so by not offering the test to one of them, which is enough of a deviation to throw off the story without compromising the basic integrity of the winning scheme.

Villains do things that way because when they do things any other way they lose even more definitely and easily.

Qwormuli

He is what he has always been: a stage hazard. He isn't the BBEG to be taken down at the end of the story(at least, until now), he's the passive thing or area that the story's heroes should stay well away from, lest it turn into a cautionary tale.

(to op)The pattern of three is also not a thing that would work here, even if it's somehow suspected as the motivation for everything ranging from the resolution of the story to a broken sole in Cat's shoe. First: there's really no precedent of dualistic rivalry here. Second: If that proposed loss clause would begin with bony boi here, it would end in Neshamah's victory at the end, which would make him jump for it in less time, than a description about his eye colour flashing would take(really, it was pretty much half of this chapter). Except even he(it?) would know it to be wobbly at best and expose him to the said loss at worst. Third: He has little losses to cut, as he hasn't exerted himself yet in any meaningful manner. He just throws his bait to the pond every few decades and watches for a bite. A few worms won't hurt, if he has a whole hell as a backyard to dig them from.

luminiousblu

If Neshamah doesn't actively fight the party and just kills Masego or even just lets him go, the fact is that the only person who legitimately cares is Catherine. Unfortunately for Catherine's revenge, she's

1. Weaker than Neshamah
2. This would fit the Evil turns on Evil story, which obliterates the Liesse Accords
3. The fact that Neshamah refused to test her means that he actually hasn't done anything to make him entangled with her.

Neshamah isn't really an enemy to be beaten, as Qworm said. He's someone to be avoided because you'll lose if you tangle with him.

Wolpertinger

A pattern of three starts with a loss on the side of the eventual victor – Cat 'losing' here hasn't necessarily broken that, though it was a loss of a battle wits, so it might only end up being usable to win a battle of wits.

Cat winning here could have made a pattern of three against her, but I think the 'ways of defeat' he's avoiding is something else entirely. What I think he's avoiding here is the actions of a villain in the story of the band of five that slays the dark lord, where invading their lair involves a test – by making a weak test or avoiding one at all (depending on how the narrative views what just happened) he's weakening the story of the band of five by not having the story follow such a well-worn (and doomed) groove. The moment he starts doing what he's supposed to as a villain in his fortress, the more he sets up his own defeat.

By trying to redirect the story into something else where the heroes are much more likely to lose, he can destroy them much more easily.

luminiousblu

Depending on how you look at it, Neshamah talking so openly with the members of the party could easily force the story where one member of the party was conspiring with the villain all along. Assuming Catherine promised to talk with him later about it, for example, Neshamah would've been all but guaranteed to survive.

Liliet

Yeah, he definitely wanted to force her into this kind of story – the one where she's the traitor of the party.

He failed, but that doesn't mean he didn't get anything out of messing with her anyway 😊

Liliet

I agree with Relyt, I don't think a Pattern of Three would even be possible here, Cat's too small a fish for that. Her role is that of a fly irritating him, not that of a fully fledged rival.

And for her to be less successful as a fly, he has to not commit indeed.

Mental Mouse

Not exactly a typo, but: "Full red lips quirked as I met his gaze. Just like I remembered they were a shade of light brown that the glow of the eclipse made into molten amber. "

EE should have kept "eyes" instead of "gaze"; since the latter is singular, the referent for "they" is lost.

SpeckofStardust

That was a fail.

Liliet

Oh, I don't think so. That was the opening move, and considering the caliber of the opponent – Catherine did not win, but she did not lose either. It'll take far more buildup before she can truly make a dent, and this went about as well as it could have.

Walter

I'd definitely have liked to see his conversation with the others. Maybe not the Saint, but I bet him and the Rogue Sorcerer might have exchanged some pointers, and certainly the Tyrant would be a hoot, as always.

caoimhinh

Yeah, a single Interlude showing us the conversations of the Dead King with the others would have been great and fitting here.

Saint's would likely be a short test or perhaps displaying Catherine and Kairos' conversation with Neshamah, the conversation with Tyrant would definitely be hilarious, and the meeting between Pilgrim and Dead King would be very interesting, with Rogue Sorcerer's test or conversation granting insight about him.

Liliet

I think it would be far too much of a digression, both tone-wise and narrative-wise. It would need to assume buildup that wasn't actually shown, the past history of the heroes that we're not privy to and just know exists. We do know enough about the Tyrant for it to make at least a good extra chapter, but the heroes? Maybe, again, as an extra chapter showing both the conversation itself and, before it, the history leading up to it. Which is to say, a full extra chapter for each hero, to fit sufficient buildup.

caoimhinh

We don't need to know their backstories and background to have their POV, and it's not necessary to have a build up to show their conversations with the Dead King either. In fact, from the Heroes, the only one we know next to nothing about is the Rogue Sorcerer. See for example that we even saw things from the Saint's POV during her fight against Rumena, it doesn't require a built up and backstory to show someone's POV and their reactions to a particular event.

Mental Mouse

That might well be the next chapter, as an interlude. Or maybe not, as the Rogue Sorcerer's POV might be too revealing of a carefully opaque character.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, IMO also, Rogue Sorcerer's POV would be too revealing. Hopefully we'll get it later as an extra chapter.

Ein

Cat did not do well here. But by trying to avoid the tropes, the dead king has fallen into another. He sees peace between the drow and dwarf, he does not understand the depth of the forces against him. Every nation on the continent (save the elves, but who knows with them) above and below (literally and figuratively) is aligned against him. It's the Triumphant Trap in which he is only beatable when everyone gets together to kick his arse.

He also doesn't know that by taking peace, Cat betrays her word to the twin goddesses and her now-mobile army of over half a million. I will bookmark the chapter when the gates open on the undead army and the drow come through in totality.

That and the gobsmacked face of everyone when she clarifies that she brought ALL the drow to the surface. That's the next milestone after the prince's graveyard for me.

Liliet

I think they both did well here. They're both limited in their moves, and out of all available, I think they both chose the best ones.

This is a draw, and that's I think the best result Catherine could have hoped for here.

Qwormuli

Well, he could have irritated his skeletal uncle a tad less with the almost sorry baits and expectations, but that's small potatoes.

Liliet

he/his? who?

Named don't age m8.

They could still die, sure, but with a story like this in the making I highly doubt any important characters would bite it before the war even starts.

Javvies

Only Villain Named don't age.

Heroes still age, and don't benefit from a beyond-human lifespan.

Admittedly, Heroes who die of natural causes (and not evil-Name-swamp-Cat's sword called natural causes) tend to have natural lifespans at the upper bounds of human normal, and tend towards high quality of life as well, getting to ignore most diseases and likely age more gracefully than a regular human.

Mental Mouse

Heh, I'd forgotten that joke. I'm just starting a new Minecraft game, I think I'll name my first ubersword Natural Causes.

I think ten years is a better offer than a hundred. After all, what better way to prepare for the worst other than when it's still fresh in their mind?

notQ

To take his deal is to unleash him fully. His bargain to Malisia unmade he would have no shackles to hold him back and he gets to have his continent wide war. A hundred years or a thousand it doesn't matter to him. If he makes this deal he gets exactly what he wants.

nipi

Hmm... Wonder who the One in the "Seven Crowns and One" will be? Akua or the Tyrant?

Liliet

Catherine 😊

The best heroic sacrifice is one of something you never intended to keep in the first place – Cat can get quite a bit of bang for her buck in choosing this place&time to abdicate.

Sure it will cost her in immediate logistical issues, but here and now it will have a proportional gain in the heroes' trust/respect and narrative credit.

Mental Mouse

Wait, Akua? She was never a queen. Admittedly Night could probably get her here, but I wouldn't even bet on her as a replacement party member; one of the defining features of this party is that no two of them are completely at ease with each other. Rogue Sorcerer and Pilgrim are a possible exception, but RS has that hidden-depths thing going, and we saw hints at the concord that they're not necessarily on the same page.

Mental Mouse

That said, there would be a certain symmetry in Akua returning to Liesse, and either ending or being redeemed there.

Smoloney

You know I'll be honest I was worried when the dead king was brought into this story as an actual character and not just a menacing future enemy I was worried he wouldn't live up to the hype but every single time he's been on screen has been awesome it's fantastic

Liliet

Yeah.

"Living up to hype" is something Guide is very, very, very good at.

"A paltry concession," he smiled. "I would require the keeping of what lands I have already seized."

Including the chunk of Arcadia. Which could be used to do all sorts of nasty things that didn't count as an end to the truce.

Chapter 37: Accessory

"To keep a friend, avoid sharing these three: coin, cup and crown."

– Nicaean saying

Three times now I'd come to Liesse bearing a sword.

Once to take it with the Fifteenth at my back, to smother the last embers of rebellion in my time and bury the Lone Swordsman. Again with my father for only company, sneaking in through darkness and death to quell the terrible madness of Akua Sahelian. The city that had once been the thriving heart of southern Callow had been ravaged and ruined years before today, and being ripped from Creation then cast down atop tall peaks had done nothing to mend that state. The sight of the crown jewel of the south reduced to this still had my blood boiling even now. When the Fifteenth had taken Liesse it'd been a sprawl of broad avenues covered in flowers and trees, a beauty in stone pale and tan that seemed at times like it was half churches half mansions. There was nothing of that left now. The third of the city that'd been outside the old walls, mostly tanners and dyers and the poor, had fallen right off when Diabolist raised the city into the sky. The blood and sorcery that'd followed still resonated in this place, the trees were long dead and the slender towers of the basilicas petulantly snapped. Liesse still thrummed with death: it was like a cloying scent in the air, a strange heartbeat coursing through its broken streets. And at the end of the road, in what had once been the Ducal Palace, some fresh madness was blooming. Masego awaited in the ancient hall of the Dukes of Liesse, turned fortress and ritual heart by the Diabolist.

I did not have to look far to see the first touches of his work. In the eldritch sky above us sorcery had been shaped in a great working, like colossal panes of bronze glass. It brought to my mind a telescope, for it was like a collection of increasingly larger glass lenses pointed outwards. Whatever sight they were meant for I was not certain, but on the surface of the panes I saw the barren storm-wracked wasteland of below. Compelling as the sorcery was to watch, I had no time to spare for contemplation of it. I was, it was becoming increasingly clear, far from alone in the streets of Liesse. From the moment I'd stepped out of the dark there'd been the weight of eyes on my back, and the tension had only thickened in the moments that followed. What had once been known as the City of Swans was now the City of Ash and Dust, and it was through the stuff of it that my boots scuffed as I began limping forward. Linger here would serve no purpose: none of the others would emerge where I had. There would be need to stitch back together our little band before it was wielded against our common foe. Passing through the wreck of what had once been a guild hall, its walls broken so thoroughly that all that remained upright was low ornate pillars of plastered marble, I heard the whispers of an ambush about to be sprung. I caught sight of them, I thought, too easily. A scuttling creature of red-brown fur with long iron claws had been revealed in the shade where it hid, a ray of light playing off a cloud above us laying it bare.

It was devil. I'd even fought this kind before, at the Battle of Marchford and even the ambush that preceded it. At least as clever as a child, and capable of speech in the Dark Tongue as well as some of Creation's languages. My discussions with the foremost diabolist of our age had since made it plain to me that these were lesser servants, as far as the Praesi saw it, but still commonly used for their wits and ease of binding. And their numbers: the bonsam, as their kind was called, were thrown at enemies not as lone individuals but in packs. My advance slowed by a pillar, and I caught a glint of iron in the carpet of ash that filled this gutted guildhall.

"This doesn't end well for you," I called out in Mthethwa. "Flee now and I will not pursue."

In bursts they came out of the thick layers of ash where they'd lain waiting, and others leapt down from the nearby rooftops where they'd been watching me. In the heartbeat that followed, I counted seven. Four on the ground, dark-eyed and wild and coming at me split evenly from the sides. Three above, two who'd been huddling in mangled bell tower and the one I'd caught first pressing down its body in the hollow of a parapet. It came laughably easy to me. My hand, by happenstance, was already near where I wanted it to be – all I needed to do was let the Night pour through and flick my wrist. By happenstance still, all I would need to elude half my attackers was slip around the pillar I'd reached, and my foot was already halfway there. It was like Creation wanted me to slaughter them, and do so almost effortlessly.

"I gave fair warning," I said, wrist already moving.

Two of those leaping were, as I pivoted around the pillar, for a moment perfectly lined up. The fine needle of Night I'd sent burst through the flesh and fur of the first like it'd been filled with munitions, and the last of the impact ate halfway through the head of the devil behind it. Two of the bonsam on the ground were now on the wrong side of the pillar to strike at me, and began to turn, while the other pair found I'd smoothly flanked them. They had long enough for their eyes to widen in surprise before with a flick of the wrist in the opposite direction I let loose a second sliver of Night: slight tendrils of smoke that slipped through their nostrils, and they dropped in the instant that followed. It'd turned acid inside their bodies, and melted what there was to melt. The sequence continued, almost dreamlike, with the third leaper landing atop the pillar to my side, two-sided claws scraping at the stone. My hand fell on the side of my staff, as if carried by my last flick, and at the very moment where its weight was drawing back from the landing the tip of my staff struck its chest. It toppled, I knew without even looking, on top of the other two who'd been trying to go around the pillar. With another languid step I finished my way around the pillar, arriving to the sight of two devils snarling at the third as they tried to push it off their side. It was the one who'd fallen that looked at me, letting out a shriek when it saw I'd raised my hand.

I snapped my fingers.

A droplet of Night formed in the middle of the three, and from it a razor-thin pulse emanated. It cut through the heads of the two bonsam on the ground, and through the waist of the one I'd nudged down. They were all three dead before I could bring my staff down to lean on, and I breathed out slowly. The whole scuffle had taken the span of perhaps five breaths, and required me to call on so little Night I'd not even noticed any strain.

"So this is what it's like," I murmured. "Having a story like wind in your sail."

It was even more insultingly leisurely than I'd assumed it would be. How could any hero lose a fight, when Creation conspired a hundred coincidences to give them an edge? I mastered that burgeoning irritation, for it was one of the uglier parts of my inheritance, and set it aside. There was no point in whining about the opposition's arsenal when instead I could be figuring out ways to use their tools more frequently. There'd be time for that later, though. For now I needed to find the others, which ought not to be too difficult if providence was willing to lend a hand for once. I resumed my advance into the deeper city, treading different shades of ruin as I did. Some the work of devils, some of wights, some of the soldiers who'd once taken Liesse in my name. I did not encounter any more of the bonsam, though once or twice I caught shadows looming on rooftops or watching through the cracks of walls. None approached, though it seemed that courtesy was not being extended to others: I heard a great crack in the distance, and watched with a wince one of the seven basilicas of Liesse toppled inwards. Well, that was as much of a sign I was going to get I supposed. I put some spring to my step and headed towards the collapse. It couldn't have been more than two alleys of walking until I ran into where my waiting companion had emerged from the aborted crucible: there was a neat line of dead jackal-headed devils, all nine of them cut cleanly through at the waist by the same blow. I glanced at the way the corpses had fallen, and let out a reluctantly impressed whistle when I realized they must have been walking in a file when the Saint of Swords had struck and she'd killed the lot of them before they could even turn. That this was Laurence de Montfort's work there could be no doubt.

She'd cut off enough my limbs I'd acquired an eye for the look of it.

Though not particularly enthused by who it was that I'd found first, I quickened my limp a little more still. If nothing else, the Saint's company should make getting around this devil-infested city significantly easier. Not safer, of course, because there was no guarantee that she wouldn't decide now was the time to clean up a loose end like me, but certainly easier. It wasn't all difficult to follow the path she'd walked, since she'd sown corpses seemingly ever step of the damned way. It was like there was something about her that attracted the devils like flies, because by the third time I turned a corner only to find a pile of at least twenty dead or dismembered devils – the limbs everywhere made it harder to count – I was forced to concede this couldn't possibly just be a string of bad luck. By the fifth mess of corpses I ran into it wasn't just ironhooks and jackalheads I was looking at, but higher breeds that Wasteland diabolists had used for war in years past. Walin-falme, the leather-winged devils that had been a favourite of binding-inclined Dread Emperors and Akua's own choice of troops for the Folly, and akalibsa. The latter had been prized by Taghreb tribes, Aisha has once told me, for their raids on their Soninke neighbours to the north. Given that the fanged devils bore rough armour of stone and iron weapons, I could see why. Not that it'd stopped the Saint from slaughtering them.

I would be more or less true to say I saw the fighting before I heard it: further into the city, I saw swarms of walin-falme and smaller gargoyle-like hairy creatures swarming down towards the same plaza. When I got closer the baying of the hound-like akalibsa told me that the Saint was very much under siege, and I grit my teeth as I picked up the pace. Hurrying through a house that looked like some whimsical giant had slapped it down before leaving, I came upon the collapsed basilica and saw that I'd strained my bad leg for no reason at all. There must have been, I thought, easily two hundred devils in the city square I could see past the fallen basilica. The Saint of Swords was alone, and nonchalantly tearing through a the force like it was made of paper.

Pale tabard spinning around her like she was a dancer, the old woman moved among her opponents like the wind. On the ground the scythed through the bondam and the akalibsa like it was sport, smoothly using them as shields against each other as she carved through necks and limbs with unerring precision. The Saint of Swords only put weight behind her blows when the winged devils came for her, the wind left by explosive strength of her strikes sucking them like birds in a storm. I saw her, with my own eyes, cut the air and leap up onto that mark only to kick up and catch a walin-falme in the face, use it as pedestal to twist and carve through the skull of another devil and catch a third one by the throat – she tossed it, casually, against the cut she'd made in the air and it was severed in two halves by the impact. In the heartbeat that followed that insanity she ripped free her longsword and leapt back down into the swarm below, never once having hesitated or broken stride. Merciless Gods, I thought. She might as well be a meat grinder. As I walked through the rubble of the basilica, a shadow was cast ahead of me by the walin-falme who'd thought to take me by surprise and I flicked a wrist backwards without turning. The slithering rope of Night caught it by the neck and tightened before turning to black flame. A charred head and corpse landed behind me a moment later, but I would not be so easily distracted. I suspected that the Saint could keep at this all day without tiring – I'd yet to feel from her more than the occasional flicker of Name power – but devils kept pouring in and there was no end in sight.

We needed to move this along before we got bogged down, and I might as well get two birds with one stone. I supposed I could have reached deep into the Night and unleashed a large working that would have slain many and scattered the rest, but I was disinclined to waste power so early in the fight. Especially when there were more... creative solutions to be had. I left the Saint to her slaughter and crouched against the ground with a pained wince, leg throbbing. Holding onto my staff with tight lips, I ran a hand through the ash and black dust that covered the stone. I closed my eyes, let out a slow breath and let the Night fill my veins. As I'd thought, as I'd felt, there was still power in this place. Deaths by the thousands, as the alchemies of Still Water sunk into innocents and a spark of magic set that corruption ablaze. Other great sorceries as well, Akua's own works of grand hubris and what Masego had made of this place since snatching it from its Callowan cradle. There were echoes here, and they were not gentle ones. Eyes fluttering open, I swept aside enough of the filth that I could lay my naked palm against what had once been the stone floor of the basilica.

"I saw the birth of you," I murmured. "Heard the reverb, even then, though I did not yet have ways to heed it. I do now, though."

I let the Night bridge the gap, felt the wailing held within swell with anger, and gasped as my chest tightened.

"Sing for me," I whispered.

And though I had failed them I was still their queen, anointed in the halls of the Fairfaxes and the fields of war, so sang for me they did. To my ears it felt like a muted buzzing, at first, something so large and deafening my ears could not truly fathom it. But as the first heartbeat passed, a wave of something eldritch filled me and I tasted of the nature of it. Rage, unbridled and strident and blind: wights killed and killing. But the echo went deeper, to what I had sought. The terror of the inevitable, the helplessness of doom already sown and coming. The shivering moment where the greatest evil of our age had been committed by a woman now in my service. I partook of it, and let the city sing that chorus. It would not last long, I thought as I withdrew my palm and wearily rose to my feet. Maybe thirty heartbeats, and the further away the less keenly it would be felt. But here, now? Even as Laurence de Montfort stood unmoved among a whirlwind of devils, the flock of bound creatures scattered. Fled to the winds, taken by panic and rage that they were not truly able to understand. I'd spared the Saint as much of this as I could, but in truth I'd doubted she would be affected. And, I saw as she calmly turned to watch me, I'd been right. There was no waver in her eyes, no weight on her shoulders. Like water off a duck's back the tumultuous rage and fear of over a hundred thousand souls rolled over her and found nothing to hold on to.

"Black Queen," the Saint of Swords greeted me. "Finally. Where are the others?"

"Heading this way, I'd wager," I said, limping up to her.

I kept some distance. Enough that, if she chose to strike, I'd have long enough to be aware of the blow. That ought to be enough, given my preparations, though in matters like this nothing was ever certain. Much less when it came to a heroine as old and ridiculously lethal as the Saint.

"After that trick you just pulled, there'll be more than blade fodder headed our way," the old woman said, then spat to the side. "Might as well have raised a banner for everyone to see."

"It'll get the Grey Pilgrim here, at least," I said. "Perhaps the others as well."

Laurence's eyes narrowed.

"Whatever sharpest killer the Enemy's got as well," she said. "But you did that on purpose, didn't you?"

I did not deny it, since it was true.

"I've had to assault that palace once before," I said, gesturing at the looming structure in the distance. "And that was when it was just the Diabolist that put up wards and traps. We don't want to have to fight whatever monster's waiting while in there, you can trust me on that."

"I don't even trust you to breathe," the Saint curtly said. "But the decision's not entirely senseless."

"You sweet talker, Laurence," I deadpanned. "Stop, you'll make me blush."

She eyed me up and down, though there was nothing suggestive about the assessment taking place. That was the gaze, I thought, of someone deciding how it'd be easiest to kill me when the time came and was rather looking forward to getting around to it.

"What did he offer you, in there?" the old woman brusquely asked.

My jaw clenched. Did I want to have that conversation with Laurence de Montfort, of all people? No, I did not. On the other hand, there were risks to dismissing her question. I studied her carefully. If I refused, would she take that as me confession to collusion with the Dead King and strike? I honestly wasn't sure. And unless I wanted to risk a fight anyway, I couldn't hesitate much longer than this.

"A hundred year truce," I finally said. "For the lands he's already taken. You?"

If I was going to answer, so was she. The Saint smiled unpleasantly.

"Never even showed up," she said. "It got dark, I got impatient and cut my way out. So much for your test, Foundling. Didn't figure it all out, it looks like. I wonder what else you're wrong about."

I hummed, cocking my head as I listened to the last echoes of the song I'd asked for. I could follow the... tide of it, with a little effort, and it was telling me interesting things. For one, it parted around the Ducal Palace like a tide around rocks. The end of our journey most definitely awaited there. There was, however, another hole in the city. Much smaller, but unlike the palace instead of being exempt it was violently repelling the song. And that small presence was not far ahead of us, coming in our direction.

"Not about the monster, I'll tell you that for certain," I said. "We're about to have a guest, Saint."

Her gaze sharpened.

"Then move ahead," she said. "I will not have you at my back, Black Queen."

"Why?" I frowned. "I'm not the one who's a walking domain. I can't – wait, are you implying I'd stab you in the back?"

She sneered, which was answer enough.

"Seriously?" I said. "Are you incapable of being halfway reasonable without someone holding your hand? I've had more cordial conversations with godsdamned angels, Laurence. Angels. Let that sink in."

I did not see it until it was too late. My mistake, growing irritated enough most my attention had been on the Saint instead of where it should be. My heart quickened and I felt goosebumps crawl along my skin as I saw a single-edge blade of bronze swinging for my eyes. It had been a mistake, I realized, to assume that the song would allow me to accurately keep track of the enemy. Then there was a flash of radiant Light, and the creature that'd been about to take my life was shot out by the impact like a ballista bolt. I blinked out the blindness, absent-mindedly noting that the enemy had been thrown straight through two houses and a sculpture of Jehan the Wise before stopping.

"We appear to have flushed out the enemy," Tariq said, lowering his crooked staff.

"Thanks for that," I croaked out.

He dipped his head in acknowledgement. My heart was beating wildly and my fingers felt faint. Gods, but it'd been a while since I'd come that close to dying – without anything like Winter to get me through it. I'd almost forgotten what it felt like. I fell in with the Pilgrim, the two of us advancing to join the Saint. Her eyes were on the plume of dust and ash where the enemy had been thrown, and together the three of us looked upon the silhouette that emerged. Utterly pristine even after being thrown, its bare feet padded across the ashen ground. It wore nothing but a loose long-sleeved shirt of white satin, with trousers of the same, and its extended arm held out the bronze blade at a horizontal angle. It was not human, I thought, and I knew that without needing to study it in greater detail because I'd encountered it before.

"Well now, as I live and breathe," the Saint said. "That looks to me like an elf."

"Bestowed, too," the Pilgrim added.

"It's called the Spellblade," I calmly said. "And it's one of the Dead King's own Revenants."

I felt the weight of the other two's attention, though neither looked away from our enemy, and the unspoken question that went with it.

"In Keter I tried to destroy it, with Hierophant and Thief," I said.

"And?" Tariq calmly asked.

"I landed about one good hit that whole fight, for which it vaporized half my body," I replied. "We ran as soon as we could. It's nasty in the elf way, and it can make blades out of spells as well. This is going to be a ride, I can tell you that much.."

"Good," Laurence de Montfort said, smiling a wolf's smile as she began advancing. "Then this ought to be decent practice for Dead King."

Valkyria

Is it just me or are the typos showing up more frequently than ever in the last few chapters... ?

I remember times when there were less at least.

Ciopo

I have noticed that too, but it might be a matter of perception, archive binging chapter that have in the meantime been corrected vs readign the newest chapter soon after its release

Liliet

Only maybe sporadically? There's always LOADS of typos, it's just a toss-up whether you notice them -_-

Mental Mouse

I haven't checked (still waiting for my coffee to kick in, and proofreading is hard), but I suspect "reversion to the mean". That is, some days he does better than others, but then when it goes back to an "average" level you notice it again. Reversion to the mean is much of how quack cures get their claws into people: A chronically ill person have a bad day/week, get desperate, and go buy some quantum-infused eye of newt. Then the bad patch ends (like they do), they think the QIEON made it better... and then they tell all their friends "oooh this stuff works". (Argghh.)

What I'd really hope for is that he (or an assistant, many of us would volunteer) is going through the older chapters and incorporating the fixes from the comments. I certainly don't expect perfection on the first pass (that's not how humans work), but there should be second and third passes eventually.

Mental Mouse

Which last is why the lack of an edit button is so annoying...

JJR

Perhaps we're getting closer to the part of the story with the demon that causes typos?

Kidding of course, but I still wonder what flavor of demon would end up doing that. Corruption seems obvious, if we hadn't already had one prominent enough in the story without putting it's chapters through a blender. Must be a kind we haven't seen yet.

Mental Mouse

That would be Titivillus, known since the Middle Ages as the bane of scribes.

Mental Mouse

Another thought: most of the "typo" issues we've been seeing wouldn't be caught by a spellchecker, so he'd need something smarter. Perhaps something like Grammarly might help? (I haven't tried it myself, despite being peppered with their ads on youtube.) On the other hand, it seems to be targeted as business communications, and might well stumble (or pratfall) over chapters of a fantasy novel.

Andrew Mitchell

I had been using Grammarly for years and it is quite useful. Recently, however, I uninstalled it and deleted my account.

The decision to do so took a bit of effort to come to. It was originally triggered by some Reddit comments questioning their privacy policy and terms of use. I then took a deep dive into those documents and carefully thought through the details and the interaction between the agreements. Eventually I came to the conclusion that, contrary to what you'll see with a superficial reading, the agreements actually give them the right to record everything you type on every web page and then provide that data to third parties.

Mental Mouse

Damn. Unfortunately, that sort of thing isn't unheard of, but it's still upsetting to see a new example. Especially one that's being pushed so widely.

And while they don't have to use all the powers granted by the terms of use, it's never wise to bet on the self-restraint or goodwill of a sociopathic non-human, such as a corporation.

M0och

"...it's never wise to bet on the self-restraint or goodwill of a sociopathic non-human, such as a corporation."

Probably one of the best pithy comments I have ever seen and no I am not being demeaning or sarcastic when I say this. This one made me spit out an entire mouthful of water!

BartHumphries

> It's nasty in the elf way, and it can makes blades out spells as well.

In not certain what is supposed to be here but I'm certain it's a typo.

Morgenstern

Might be "... can make blades out of nothing and spells as well."

Feels like a good chunk of the sentence is missing, anyway.

Morgenstern

Or just "blades out of spells"..?

M0och

Pretty sure its the "makes".

Should be make, without the 's'.

Well Creation is on your side Cat so you are going to win

Stormblessed

Oh dear the Spellblade is back. They couldn't handle it last time, but this time Cat is no longer full of Winter. Not having Masego is worse, but overall trading Zeze and Vivi for two Heroic powerhouses is a trade up.

Plus this time the story and providence is 100% in her favor as another major plus.

Mental Mouse

Also she has Night – not much of it, but even so, we know Night can eat elfstuff.

Fayhem

This isn't the first time I've seen someone say Cat doesn't have much Night, and honestly I have no idea where that's coming from. She used Night to crack a river open under the noonday sun when the Mighty can't call on Night then at all. She's far from the most practiced in working with Night but I suspect nobody short of the Sisters has more of it.

Mental Mouse

Clarifying: She doesn't have much Night here, unless Sve Noc goes all in on backing her, and she's already said that they're moving very warily in DK's vicinity, precisely because their power may be overwhelming by mortal standards, but they don't much like the odds against DK.

Fayhem

Hmm, interesting take. I'm not sure if the Sisters allowing a major draw on their domain's power is equivalent to bringing themselves in close, but I'm not sure it isn't either.

Fayhem

Also, we know that Night can eat elfstuff? How? When was that shown/referred to? It wouldn't be the first time I've blanked on something from past chapters but I don't recall that ever coming up – heck, the last time the drow were on the surface in force was before the Night and before the elves arrived on Calernia and murder colonized the Golden Bloom.

Mental Mouse

IIRC, that's how Sve Noc beat Cat – by taking bites out of Winter until there was nothing left but a mind. And that was before they had actually absorbed the entire Court and leveled up.

Kissaten

Nah, Cat let Sve Noc into her Winter domain via Fall-esque move, and Sve Noc went all “my trap card has activated” on poor Cat

Mental Mouse

AIRI, Even before pulling Sve Noc into her domain, Cat was getting hit with “acid” attacks that were nibbling away at her, and the greater Mighty were starting to absorb her own attacks.

Liliet

Oh, you’re confusing elves and fae again.

Mental Mouse

Oh, right.

Liliet

The relevant difference in this situation is that elves are much, much scarier, because fae aren’t even fully sentient.

Fayhem

> fae aren’t even fully sentient.

*sapient

Also, say wha? They aren’t fully self-determined, that’s canon, but where are you getting what you’re saying from?

Liliet

Sapient, yes.

Specifically I’m thinking of the part where Catherine goes through a market at Winter Court and realizes the fae are acting oddly.

My point is that they cannot actually act flexibly according to the situation, their flexibility has limits and once you hit these limits you can dance circles around them. And that’s what I mean by sentient. A monkey can’t understand a computer. A fae can’t act to maximize their own well-being.

Fayhem

Except Winter King tho. His whole thing was taking action to maximize his own well-being (as he defined the term) and Cat did the absolute opposite of dance circles around him.

You're not wrong that the fae lack flexibility, but I think it's more in terms of they cannot alter their nature or change who they are over time. They are fully capable of assessing their situation and responding in a tactically appropriate manner, with some possible story-related exceptions tbh. E.g., when Cat fucked up the deadwood soldier in Marchford by tossing heroic tropes at it until it bolted – though even then, note that it did bolt, or try to, because it recognized what was happening and responded appropriately to it.

But Named are quite story-bound as well, and I wouldn't say that Cat was less sapient when she was the Squire than she is now. For that matter, I'd say she wasn't less sapient when she was Sovereign of Moonless Nights either – much less adaptive which was costing her the greatest strength she has in addition to, y'know, her humanity – but not less sapient, I don't think. Fixed \neq non-sapient, in other words.

Liliet

Winter King had an opening to do what he did; this was the only cycle where he could do so.

I think the higher level a fae the closer to fully sapient they are; lower level fae appeared to basically be NPC level scripts.

Fayhem

We've never seen anyone have an actual conversation with a lower-level fae, or try to. Unless I'm missing something, the sum total of data on lower-level fae is 1) Cat interacting briefly and in a primarily stab-based manner with the deadwood soldier around Marchford, 2) the Countess of Cold Hands exchanging maybe around two sentences with a footsoldier outside Skade before murdering him because yawn, bored now, and 3) Cat briefly observing some fae acting out stories in a marketplace without actually trying to interact with any of them or even observing them for very long. No offense intended, but I think you're drawing strong conclusions from a dataset that isn't nearly robust enough to support them.

Liliet

True.

I still think the limitations on the fae make them significantly less terrifying a threat than elves.

Fayhem

Certainly could be, yeah. We have pretty scant data on elves too as of now though, I'm pretty sure a Named son of the Forever King isn't exactly a representative sample and he's the only one we've actually seen fight. It's also worth noting that fae reform with every cycle (or however that's working these days since Cat's merger of the Courts) whereas it's established that Calernian elves are categorically incapable of reproducing. Given that the elves on Calernia literally can't replace even a single lost soldier literally ever they would be EXTREMELY reluctant to commit to any fight where they'd risk even relatively light losses, much less the kind of heavy losses Cat routinely inflicts even on OP fae armies. As far as threat level goes "won't fight" is almost as good of a limiter as "can't fight" – the only difference is "won't fight" can still potentially tear you a new asshole if you back them into a corner where they don't have a choice.

Liliet

Good point.

Javvies

There's also Archer and Masego's efforts to point the Summer Fae at Akua. They tried to give the Fae info on the warding scheme around Liesse, but they wound up needing to grab a noble in order for there to be enough "room" for Masego to shove the info into them. And that was with Masego cutting parts of them out.

Fayhem

Lili beat me to pointing out that elves \neq fae already, but let me expand a bit on what (I think) the relevant differences are here. Night and Winter are both semiexternalized domain or domain-related powersources – meaning, given individuals can have more or less of either, but ultimately the power comes from Night/Winter itself rather than actually being intrinsic to the individual. Further, even beyond both powersources being similar, they are both specifically founded in greater or lesser part on the principle of the internal validity of employing usurpation to gain power.

In other words, it's not just that both are geared towards eating things, it's that it is a principle within Night/Winter itself that you can gain in Night/Winter by killing someone who has more and taking their stuff. So when someone from Winter uses violence to claim some of the Night, or vice-versa, they are in a sense following the same metaphysical principle that is already intrinsic to what they're claiming rather than imposing a new ruleset/principle from outside what they're trying to claim. As I understand it at least, that is specifically why one eating the other was so viable. I don't know if it necessarily would have been/would be outright impossible to usurp power from a source not internally predicated on allowing that, but I would expect it to be at minimum a much steeper climb.

By contrast, elfstuff isn't externally-sourced at all. It's the product of a racial attribute of the elves and is entirely intrinsic to each individual elf. IIRC as it was explained elfstuff is possible because as elves age their souls gain greater and greater weight within Creation, which from what we've seen seems to start with Watch-like physical ability boosts and in older elves levels up to where they can essentially opt out of Creational laws, albeit "only" one at a time. I would expect that to make it markedly harder to do anything to elfstuff, much less eat it. Because technically in a sense they're not actually doing anything, they're opting out of stuff applying to them by sort of sidestepping physics rather than actively producing an effect. In other words, if an elf jumps impossibly high it's not because they're producing an antigravity effect it's because they're just deciding that gravity isn't really for them. So there's not a flow or output of energy to potentially disrupt/appropriate as might be possible with magic. Meaning that in order to disrupt an elf being able to do elfstuff, you'd pretty much have to disrupt their soul itself which would presumably be at least an order of magnitude harder for most people given that IIRC it's been mentioned that even Warlock needed specialized equipment and a willing/helpless subject in order to mess with souls.

Though, it is interesting that it's been established through what happened to Amadeus that Saint can cut/sever souls themselves...

Javvies

Heh. Saint is good for something, anyways.

That really is cheating powers that Heroes get with story on their side.

Darkening

To be fair, if Tyrant is any indication, villains can get that too, but leaning into the story that hard has long term consequences for them.

Mental Mouse

Hey, right now even Cat's getting "... a story like wind in your sail." The question is when the wind will shift.

mavant

This is the shift. Tyrant's trick is "you can't thwart stage one"; the Deaf King has already successfully achieved stage one or this plan. Evil always wins in the middle!

Rook

I'm very much looking forward to watching an antagonist having to deal with the hemorrhoidally large pain in the ass that the Saint is in a brawl.

Someguy

The good news here is that this looks like the start of a Revenge Feud Story with Saint as the meatgrinder MC (Vagrant Swordsman). IIRC the Elf King was desperate for his son's corpse back right?

caoimhinh

I'm not sure if the Elf King was desperate for it, but it was implied that killing his son and turning him into a Revenant was what made him not mess with Dead King ever again.

konstantinvoncarstein

Nor the Wandering Bard, it was she who organized it.

caoimhinh

Yep.

If I recall correctly, she made the Elves go after Neshamah because he was trying to seize a second Hell, right?

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't the chapter anymore, I am not sure.

caoimhinh

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/24/interlude-empires/>

"It was oddly nostalgic," the Intercessor mused. "You know, watching you meddle with forces beyond your comprehension. You haven't been that reckless since... your fourth century, I'd say? That delightful scuffle with the rats."

"I was young," Neshamah fondly remembered. "And still believed plagues to be valid method. You were quite severe in chiding me, I recall."

"Lines had to be drawn, we were still establishing the rules," the Intercessor smiled. "Both of us played rougher back then."

"You certainly were not shy in setting the elves after me," Neshamah said. "That was rather unwarranted."

"You were being greedy," the Intercessor said, wagging a finger. "Two Hells? I don't think so. Besides, that was as much about that old mule in the Bloom as it was about you. He needed a sharp lesson about who not to trifle with, and your taking his only son got the point across."

"The Spellblade has been a delightful diversion, admittedly," Neshamah conceded.

"You even set him on dear Cat," she said. "Thoughtful of you."

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for finding and sharing that. Very good to read that again. 😊

Euodiachloris

I think Saint didn't get an offer; she got given a distraction/ bribe (and doesn't quite realise it). Our revenant Spellblade prince? He's the ploy.

Damned if I know quite how.

Mental Mouse

Or Saint got something to encourage her paranoia against Cat.

Liliet

^^^

my bet

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, I'm pretty sure he did show up and just talked about how cat was going to pull off a fusion of good and evil with her accords that he would never do. Then he made her an offer he knew shed never take, but it wasn't an actual trial. He wants her to say something like "no deal, I am killing her and killing you." Since what he really wants us to reinforce her current predictable behavior.

Insanenoodlyguy

Kissaten

Saint would cut him too deep for his comfort. He didn't show up because she is precisely the type of hero to inexplicably stab a villain right into the soul

Vortex

I don't think it is just heroes that get crazy power. Villains get insane power too, if Triumphant and the Dead Long and some of the other ones are any indication. It just requires you to lean into the story, which is really why Cat and Black and the rest aren't big fans of it.

medailyfun

I don't think in Triumphant times there was proper story supporting her advance, it was first time

Liliet

Not for the whole thing she did, no, but she was hardly the first conqueror in history?

Liliet

They don't like the stories of their metaphysical side 😊

Henry Eccleston

This'll be a hell of a ride... I might have to write a poem to tell it in brief.

Mental Mouse

Go for it! Yay poetry!

AtrumChalybs

Figured I should mention this. Chapter 36 doesn't show up in the menu. Only 35 and 37. Might be confusing for people. Thanks for the chapter!

Qwormuli

Not even 37, for me. Had to dredge it up the old way.

Mental Mouse

I've noticed before that the TOC doesn't always keep up with the chapters.

David Lynch

And is occasionally wrong, which can be disconcerting. The bit where Book 3's "Chapter 10: Entrance" links to chapter 11 instead has left me very confused twice now, having just recently done a reread. 😅

NZPIEFACE

Spell to Blades vs Existence to Blades.

Hmmm

apperatus27

Oh goodness, a fated enemy for the saint of swords, come at last. Either she's about to have a nemesis for the next three fights with her eventual loss, or this encounter is purely to have her do the heroic "Go on, I'll take care of this." thing to separate martial force from the band of five early.

Dainpdf

Seems more to me like the spellblade is about to get worked to show off the power of the band of five.

Liliet

I think this 😊

sengachi

This could also very easily be a “oh we thought we understood why the Dead King was bad news” moment for the Heroes. I mean they’re a Band of Five, they’ll inevitably kill it or drive it off (or kill it impermanently), but I could see this being the opening salvo of a Story meant to show heroes the true meaning of “darkest before the dawn”.

Mental Mouse

And we don’t know which of these three paths (or a fourth) EE will take, until he shows us...

Dainpdf

Problem is the Spellblade has already been that. The first defeat before they faced the Ratling seer. Having him be that again will be hard to pull off convincingly.

Plus, it’s too early. That dark before dawn moment needs to come at the end of the second act.

Cicero

Couldn’t it be that the first loss to Cat will still count, and this will be the draw, followed by a later victory?

Cicero

Sorry, meant the first loss by Cat.

Dainpdf

Perhaps. Seems like both conflicts lack weight for that, though, considering they’re both happening in the context of Cat vs more important villains (Malicia, Neshamah).

Liliet

On the other hand, it could be a “you thought you knew what horrors Catherine Foundling has faced but you were very wrong” moment.

The part where they realize she'd been holding back against them.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes! I want to see the heroes realise that.

Mental Mouse

Except he's on the other side facing a band that we already know can kick ass. It seems more likely that Saint will get worked, and hopefully learn that yes, she actually does need the rest of the party to get through this.

Dainpdf

The word effect is useful to show how strong the new character is. The spellblade is not new. The band of five, as one, is. And I'm not sure any of them alone could defeat the spellblade, let alone easily. Winter Queen Cat was pretty damn powerful and she got stomped with two other Named supporting (even if one was Thief).

JJR

But doing that is the last thing that the Dead King wants. Trial, Monster, Pivot. First he avoided giving Cat a real trial when he didn't let her heroically reject his offer (I think?). Next comes a monster, expected to force this unusual band to learn how to work together to overcome it. Unless the Dead King has it sandbag against the Saint. This will of course further convince her that the two villains are quite unnecessary for the fight, or even make her think she doesn't need the group at all.

And without the normal trials to forge these individuals into a functional group, winning the pivot gets much harder. And maybe the Dead King just gives them a fake pivot too.

Liliet

I don't think Laurence can fall to a ploy quite THAT basic, even beyond her experience in this world it's universal Named knowledge that bands of five are stronger than the constituent parts as a law of nature.

And she's not going to think she doesn't need Tariq.

But doing something to stir up paranoia against Cat can be unpleasantly effective.

M0och

"Are you incapable of being halfway reasonable without someone holding your hand? I've more cordial conversations with godsdamned angels, Laurence. Angels. Let that sink in."

AHHHH such a good line!!!

M0och

"Never even showed up," she said. "It got dark, I got impatient and cut my way out. "

This is why I find the SOS tolerable, as mentioned in the last chapter, she treats all evil like bugs to be squished. Not just our beloved Cat...

konstantinvoncarstein

I find hard to believe Neshama just let her alone. It is highly suspicious.

Dainpdf

Cat herself said it. No sense in trying to tempt or dissuade her. She would just cut her way out.

Decius

Cat is not on the same tier as the Dead King at offering temptation to heroes. She was unprepared for an offer of truce; how much more unprepared was she for the offer made to the Saint of Swords?

How unprepared was she for the offer made to the Grey Pilgrim?

The Saint, at least, can simply refuse to make a deal with the Greater Evil. The Pilgrim has no such higher principles to stand on or cut with; if made an offer that would reduce suffering, he must take it.

Andrew Mitchell

1. My reading of the chapter was that the SoS didn't get and offer because she just cut her way out.

2. It's not "reduce suffering" that drive's Pilgrim. His aim is to "reduce unnecessary suffering" and IMO he can take the long view on that and realise that total suffering will be reduced if they fight the Dead King now, because it will be so much worse in 10 or 100 years.

Javvies

No, Tariq is about reducing what he considers to be unnecessary suffering.

Fighting the Dead King is necessary, as is any and all suffering that would result from doing so.

As bad as Callow being ruled by a Villain (Cat) could/would be, any sort of permanent gains made by the Dead King would be even worse.

40k analogy here – Tariq and the Alliance are, in this instance, the Imperium, Cat is the Tau, and the Dead King is the Tyranids. Sure, the Imperium wants to exterminate the Tau with extreme prejudice, and considers human collaborators in Tau space heretics, but when you get right down to it, it's objectively better to have the Tau as neighbors and work with them against the Tyranids than to focus major efforts on fighting the Tau when a Hive Fleet shows up.

For that matter, let's not forget that Tariq's got the Ophanim riding shotgun in his brain – there's no way they sign off on making a deal with the Dead King.

konstantinvoncarstein

I like the Warhammer 40k reference. 😊 The major difference is that Catherine is a genuine treat to Tariq 😊

Javvies

To Tariq as an individual, maybe, to the nations of Good as a whole? Not so much. Cat doesn't care about expanding into Procer or Levant, she's not the conquering sort ... and she knows that even if she wanted to (and she doesn't), she couldn't make such an expansion stick (even Good-aligned Callow couldn't maintain hold of the parts of Procer they took), and that there would be hordes of Heroes getting spawned to kill her, and she'd end up like Triumphant.

The analogy doesn't have to map perfectly.

Still though, call Cat and Villain-ruled Callow the Eldar (Craftworld, most likely).

For that matter, the Dead King could be the forces of Chaos or the Necrons instead of the Tyranids.

The primary point holds true – sure, you'd rather not deal with Cat, but she's a way better neighbor than the alternative. Much like her approach to negotiating – you might not like cheap wine, but it sure beats getting stabbed.

In the 40k analogy, any worlds her side holds can ultimately be (re)taken as useable worlds, anything lost to the mutual greater threat/enemy probably won't be if it isn't retaken fast enough. It's a pretty fundamental part of why whenever the Imperium and Tau are fighting and the 'Nids show up, pretty much everybody agrees to put the fighting on hold to deal with the 'Nids first. Which has had the side effect of making the 'Nids the saviors of the Tau, after a fashion. Not sure the Tau would approve if they realized that, to be honest. Or how they'd react to that realization in general ... probably poorly.

konstantinvoncarstein

Of course the analogy cannot be perfect, I was just trying to joke 😊 But you are completely right, it is way better to ally with Catherine/the Tau than everyone being killed by DK/tyranids.

The Etherals are probably aware of it.

Fayhem

> Which has had the side effect of making the 'Nids the saviors of the Tau, after a fashion. Not sure the Tau would approve if they realized that, to be honest. Or how they'd react to that realization in general ... probably poorly.

Which makes it a good analogy, since the DK is the savior of Callow, after a fashion. And not to completely sidetrack this comments section into 40K discussion, but yeah I'm pretty sure that the Tau still haven't really grasped the scale of what they're fucking with in the form of the Imperium. Even after all their expansion spheres they're barely a blip on the galactic map, while the Imperium practically is the galactic map.

I figure that Konstantin (in the comment below) is prob right that the Ethereals at least have gotten access to intel that would allow them to know what the situation is there at least in general terms (they've taken imperial worlds so they must have gotten some records/intelligence assets out of that). But who knows how seriously they've taken that intel – politicians everywhere have a real tendency to go into denial when they encounter facts they'd rather not be true. And “our entire civilization is, after centuries of expansion, still just barely a blip on the radar to a galaxy-spanning civilization where the fanatical state religion is based on xenocide” is a fact that very few people would be keen on being true. And it's the politicians who decide what info gets released and to who.

Fayhem

Ayy lmao, did I say the comment below? I meant the comment above. Thanks for not having an edit feature, WordPress!

Dainpdf

But can he reason that any deal with the DK will create suffering simply for being with the DK? Pilgrim is more vulnerable than Saint, but he has resisted temptation multiple times.

Liliet

Pilgrim is the long view hero, Catherine has said that. He knows full well the difference between kindness and idiocy.

Liliet

>The Pilgrim has no such higher principles to stand on or cut with; if made an offer that would reduce suffering, he must take it.

Amadeus thought that too 😊

Mental Mouse

Skipping the trial like that may come back to haunt her later.

Dainpdf

Except there was no trial for anyone. Cat told Neshamah he didn't test her, which led to a short scolding.

Mental Mouse

Well, we haven't heard from the other three...

Dainpdf

Yeah, but Neshamah straight up told Cat that placing a trial would be disadvantageous to him, so he wasn't going to. He's not going to just fall into the role of villain whose fortress is being stormed. He's not a rookie XD

Mental Mouse

Come to think of it, skipping the trial might backfire on Neshamah! With the story this strong, they might well find their own trial. Or make one out of the party's internal conflicts.

Dainpdf

Sure, but then he's not positioning himself as their antagonist... so he can't lose.

Morgenstern

How hilarious would it be, if the Saint simply lied when being asked what she was tempted with...

Dainpdf

It wouldn't be very in keeping with my interpretation of the character, but who knows.

Liliet

It's the best move he had. He couldn't get anything out of fucking with her, just putting himself in a weaker narrative position for no real gain.

It's like Catherine refusing to melee the Mighty at Great Strycht: would be stupid to tangle in a way that doesn't favor her when she has much better tricks at her disposal!

Edgar Ve

Personally, I think Saint is a parody of a murderhobo or any character with the dump stat as charisma. think about it a god on the battlefield, a liability off of it. Of course, how damaging she is is up to perspective of course

Dainpdf

She's more of a minmaxer than a murderhobo. She doesn't kill random people for loot.

Vortex

She is a murder hobo paladin. Adheres rigidly to her oaths but will kill anything not in her narrow line of Good and damn the consequences.

Remember Saint of Swords was one of the core forces pushing Procer into an unwinnable war.

Dainpdf

The term “murderhobo” is a derogatory term for a specific style of DnD play where the players kill and destroy everything they encounter in search of loot and xp.

Actually talking to the church and getting them to support a war for ideological reasons is not a murderhobo thing to do.

Saint is a Knight Templar, at worst, and just a DnD Paladin in my opinion. Honestly, she’s less than that – their vows forbid them from knowingly working alongside Evil people.

Someguy

I thought she’s a parody of sword wielding MCs in eastern webnovels, no different from murderhobos.

Darkening

The line from the Grey Pilgrim about her sword having touched the heavens does seem like it’d be right at home in a wuxia novel.

caoimhinh

Oh, this is gonna be a good fight. The Spellblade and those Named Elves seemed pretty awesome with their abilities to ignore Laws of Creation, even if only one at a time. Kairos and Rogue Sorcerer still missing, the two unstable and unknown variables respectively. This seems like a plot twist in the making (well, it always did, to be honest).

Typos found:

- avoid these sharing these three / avoid those sharing these three
- was not the City of Ash / was now the City of Ash
- ever step / every step
- forced to conceded / forced to concede
- I would be more or less true to say / It would be more or less true to say
- the scythed through / she scythed through
- I wore nothing/ It wore nothing
- it can makes blades out spells / it can make blades out of spells

Andrew Mitchell

It’s only the opening chapter of Liesse III; I expect Kairos and RS will appear quite soon.

Plot twist? For sure. And probably more than one.

Jesse Coombs

Ignoring a rule of creation is going to be especially relevant against the Saint, as she uses Decree to set the rule that "She is a Sword". If the elves can ignore this rule, she may find herself in for a VERY nasty surprise.

IDKWhoitis

Alright, on the traitorous ally list, Saint just hit the top. I don't trust that she just conveniently cut her way out.

So in order of possible traitorous outcomes:

1. Saint, 2.Sorcerer, 3.Grey, 4.Cat, 5.Kairos.

I can see Cat compromising on something in the face of potentially losing Masego.

Dainpdf

Cat did say she was likely going to have it easiest. Saint is too simple to fool.

Not-Kairos

I'm so glad that somebody finally recognizes the sincerity of Kairos's vows of eternal friendship. Wretched blackguards insist that he is a traitorous wretch horn of the foulest compost, but this is nothing more than the most base of slander! He would never betray his eternal friend, Chess-cheating Catherine, for even the grandest of rewards.

Death Knight

Laurence is a sword.

Swords cut things.

Therefore, Laurence can cut anything if her blade connects.

Note I said cut, not kill. It really is as simple as that. In Named, certainty of purpose/belief is power.

sengachi

I mean, Saint also turned down a freaking domain ability called Decree (seriously holy shit my skin shivers just thinking about that power) because she valued the purity of being a single-purpose instrument. While Saint can be suckered into making bad choices with respect to greater and lesser evils, she is (like, literally is, she has a min-maxed domain about it and everything) an entity which does not contain the capacity for succumbing to temptation. I believe Saint when she says the Dead King didn't even bother putting in the effort to trial her.

Liliet

I bet her actual trial is going to end up being an opportunity to backstab Catherine, generously offered by DK in a non-obvious-that-it's-him manner 😊

sengachi

Mmm, frankly I'd be shocked if she turned traitor before dealing with Masego. Breaking faith with the devil is one thing, as is refusing covenant with the devil even in your hour of need. Doing anything to break party unity while actively contesting the Dead King though, that is just begging for you and everyone you love (scratch that, I meant just 'everyone') to die choking on their own blood. And Saint knows that. She might not trust Catherine not to betray her and she might be itching to kill Catherine the hot second this is done on account of not having the mental flexibility to understand Cat's motives, but that's a very different kind of stupid than infighting vs. the Dead King.

Liliet

Well she's already announced that she expects Catherine to backstab her any moment now. All DK would need to do is make it seem like Catherine is, in fact, about to.

A trial of trust... harder than it seems, given Laurence has announced she "doesn't trust Catherine to breathe" 😊

ATRDCI

To be fair to Saint, Cat only started to need to breathe again fairly recently.

Liliet

GOOD POINT

Morgenstern

And yet, she seemingly succumbed to the temptation of the Wandering Bard offering her a vision of a much, much better nation of Calernia if only Procer burns first... Seems you just have to play into her kind of extremism and she very well CAN be tempted, after all, imho.

sengachi

That's a good point, but I think the source of the offer matters. She took that particular devil's bargain because she believes without reserve in the Heavens Above. To use that lever on her personality the Dead King would have to make her think her shot at Catherine was the Heavens' intent, and she seems too paranoid to me to not be all of the skeptical about any given opportunity to backstab Catherine.

The Saint of Swords we've seen so far is extremist as all hell and has a particular avenue of cognition utterly firewalled, but she's not gullible, which is how I think most people have been treating her.

Liliet

^^^

She's simple enough that she would be gullible, had she not gotten burned on it enough she now just doesn't trust period. She had been gullible once and forged her life out of "never again". Cat isn't super special unlucky for getting the stonewall treatment – Neshamah's caliber of opponent is what it had been forged for.

Mental Mouse

? She didn't turn Decree down, that's her ultimate defensive fallback. She used it against a would-have-been-deadly Night attack.

sengachi

She turned the broader version of the ability down in exchange for a hyper-focused statement of 'self as a weapon', is what I was referring to.

Mental Mouse

The "broader version" would have been that much less powerful for being extended. More importantly, it would have become an external power that others could defend against. Compare Hanno's Recall and Ride powers to his "coin-flip": For the former two, he gets glowing equipment of Light that can be broken, and skills that can be defended against. But the coin-flip is internal, and when Black tried to mess with that, he got smacked down hard.

Likewise, an external Decree would have been a magical attack that could be countered, like Pilgrim's Shine. With an internal power, Saint gets to say "I'm alright Jack, screw you" (she likes that 😊) and dismiss any intrusion of her self, including other domains, Other powers can enclose her but she can cut her way out, while her own power is indivisible.

Liliet

Cutting her way out of situations is what she DOES. It's not 'convenient', it's the only realistic outcome.

I do agree with some of the other commenters' suspicions that she might have witnessed Catherine's conversation with Neshamah, or only select parts of it...

Dainpdf

Cool. Can't wait to see spellblade round two.

Also, dammit Cat, you're mortal again. Hands on the wheel! Don't let Saint get to you.

Kakavorin

My guess is that her attention was drawn away by the story so that Gray could make his entrance. Being guided by the story goes both ways.

Dainpdf

Sure, but stories don't puppet you completely. Not falling into the story when it's disadvantageous is a skill. Which Neshamah actually did just recently, by not testing Cat.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I think this is less the story "guiding" her and more an example of the drawbacks of her chosen power setup. She can match a Name in power and weight, but she explicitly lacks a lock of the unconscious defenses they get for free. She gets tired, she chokes on dust, and her senses/reflexes are now much more actively controlled.

If she's not consciously using her skills and powers then she's just a very fit young woman with good instincts and a limp.

Basically it just means she always has to be paying attention and now she just got a pointed reminder of that.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

*lot, not lock.
Stupid phone.

edrey

well, what is the worst possible situation? my bet is that the spell-blade and skein share vision for the fight and the thief of stars will take the crowns and amadeus soul from the wizard

Andrew Mitchell

... And things have been going too well for Cat recently so she's due for a reversal.

Liliet

Skein was destroyed, DK did lose that asset.

sengachi

Permanently destroyed?

Liliet

I think so yeah.

konstantinvoncarstein

No, he was wounded but "survived".

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/13/chapter-43-masegos-plan/>

Liliet

Oh huh, you're right. I forgot!

caoimhinh

No, it wasn't.

The last we saw from the Skein was that it fell along with Cat and Masego into the black space between spaces that when the chamber where they fought Skein chattered. But Masego and Cat were capable of leaving it relatively easily. Dead King could easily have retrieved the Skein from there too.

Liliet

Yeah, I forgot 😬

Mental Mouse

Well, I don't think DK will strip Keter's defenses for this side battle. We might see some new Named, and perhaps that former King of Callow will show up again to mess with morale.

edrey

i wouldnt said he striped his defenses, he has about fifty or more revenants, and the number of devils and deads should be in the millions, so i wouldnt said he striped his defenses, no really

Fayhem

Yeah, this. And he definitely had more, he showed Cat exactly fifty when she was in Keter and since even with a vitrified Winter brain Cat's not dumb she specifically went "hmm what a neat tidy number, he's definitely keeping some more out of sight so that he can be impressive without showing off all his cards". IIRC it's been mentioned that the White Knight and company scotched a couple-few Revenants during their Heroic Defense of the lakeshore of Procer, but given that DK absolutely started with more than fifty he probably still has at least fifty to play with and maybe still more.

Also, I suspect he's put the Spellblade here specifically because Cat has fought it before. He wants to assess her new abilities/power level in combat and everyone knows that when you run an experiment you should control for extraneous variables as much as possible. He may also be planning instead to create a false parallel of "look it's another fight against definitely just the Spellblade by himself" and then try to sideswipe them with another Revenant or two, just to see if he can drop a couple of Cat's band as part of their Heroic Journey by forcing a Heroic Sacrifice story or something (more likely the "or something" there since heroic sacrifices have a real tendency to get conveniently negated and/or blow back on a villain). Maybe both, DK's a bastard like that.

werafdsaew

Skein can do all the bullshit he could because they were inside that palace. Outside of that and he's just a undead hungry rat monster that eats everything.

edrey

the only power limited to the palace was "spool" back time, he still can see the future

werafdsaew

He doesn't have future sight.

Fayhem

What? He's an oracle, that was the whole point of that tangle of plans they made in Keter. I don't know if he can do long-range forecasting like the Augur or not, but tactical-level assessments of near-future possibilities are 100% within his capabilities.

Fayhem

Ehh that's an exaggeration, even aside from the fact that "just" is no way to describe a Horned Lord. Skein could specifically only use the Spool aspect as an "undo" button the way he did because of pocket dimension bullshit, but outside the pocket dimension he's still a Named oracle in addition to being a Horned Lord. Somebody who has the absurd toughness/special abilities of a Horned Lord and can see or even just get glimpses of the possible attacks you'll make before you make them is a special kind of handful in a fight even without their OP undo button.

agumentic

I must say, Saint does a pretty sick Dante impression. Those moves were straight out of DMC.

superkeaton

Oh hey, Spellblade, come to be a good little gish and be a wretched pain in the ass?
Also, wow there are a lot of typos in this chapter. Like, a lot.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

My favorite part about this chapter is the implication that Tariq's Name recognizes Cat as occupying a heroic role in at least this narrow circumstance. He showed up to save her in the nick of time which is necessary for him to really pull out the stops but is also explicitly a mechanism to protect younger heroes in the early phases of their journey. Whatever Tariq's actual opinion of Cat (which we haven't gotten to see since she pulled off her scheme to form a five man band), metaphysically he's now interacting with her as an ally.

Mental Mouse

Since nobody else has picked up on that:

> "Good," Laurence de Montfort said, smiling a wolf's smile as she began advancing. "Then this ought to be decent practice for Dead King."

Saint thinks they're going to be fighting Dead King directly? Riight.

caoimhinh

She expects to fight him up North. Remember that she considers this 'the Crusade that will end it all'.

Pokekid01

Saint saying she didn't get an offer is 100% suspicious. It seems completely out of character for Saint to deal with the Enemy, but to be fair we don't know all that much about her. There may well be something from her past that she wants enough to cooperate with DK.

Also, calling it here: Cat will die in this battle. And the Pilgrim will bring her back. This is her third time visiting Liesse and she died in both previous attempts (I consider her apotheosis into Sovereign of Moonless Nights a death. She lost her mortality and couldn't fairly be called mortal after). Things come in threes. That's the pattern.

Mental Mouse

Which would also use up Pilgrim's Forgive aspect for the day, before they get to Masego.

Mental Mouse

But she herself said that she'd died three times already.

Chapter 38: Pinnacle

"For the left hand is strife and the right hand is ruin, and only one may be clasped. The worthy take, the worthy rise; all else is dust."

– Extract from the Tenets of Night

The Saint of Swords wasted no time and no words: forward she went, an arrow shot. There was not a motion wasted to the way she moved, a sort of flowing gait that was neither run nor walk. The Spellblade simply walked barefoot through the ruins to meet her, utterly indifferent to the sight of one of the most dangerous heroes alive with her blood up.

"A known weakness?" the Grey Pilgrim conversationally asked.

His eyes had never left the Revenant, and neither had mine.

"Not ice, I'll tell you that much," I muttered. "Or stabbing. To this day I'm not even sure if I baited an aspect out of it or if it's just that ridiculously powerful."

"He, I suspect, not it," the Peregrine noted.

There'd been nothing particularly male about the dead elf to my eyes, either now or then, so he probably knew something I didn't.

"Suspect?" I repeated.

"There is an old story," the hero said, "about Death taking the Forever King's only son."

I'd never heard anything like that, and unlike Tariq I'd been born in a kingdom that bordered the Golden Bloom. On the other hand, he had decades of going around Calernia nudging villains to their deaths and unearthing secrets as well as the Choir of Mercy whispering in his ear. So, the Spellblade had been a prince once. Assuming elves saw kingship as we did, which was anybody's guess: what went on in the depths of that forest was a mystery to anyone but the elves.

"Doubt the dangling parts are going to affect this any," I shrugged. "But good to know."

"Knowledge is always of use," the Peregrine agreed. "No particular weakness, then. Unfortunate. That will prolong the matter some."

I almost told him he had a gift for understatement before I caught sight of the look on his face and realized he was deadly serious. That, to him, a millennia-old elven Revenant was simply a vexing delay on our way to the end of this journey. The serenity on his tanned, creased face was not forced or posturing or an attempt to reassure. It was simple certainty that he would be the victor, regardless of the odds. I was surprised, still, by how utterly infuriating I found the sight. Because if a hero that old, that seasoned, could feel that way? Then there was some truth to the attitude. And though that strength on my side tonight, there was still something at the heart of me revolted by the nature of it. No wonder it's impossible to bargain with you, when you have a mandated from Above to always get your way. I was, I supposed, my father's daughter in the regrettable ways as well as the rest. I took my hand off my staff and it stayed still and standing as I rolled my shoulders to limber them.

"Let's get this going, then," I said.

A moment later, two of Calernia's finest swordsmen had their first clash. If I'd not woven a sliver of Night into my eyes, I would have missed half of it. It was not that they moved that quickly, I thought, though while the Saint was drawing on her Name and the Spellblade made a mockery of mortal means simply by being who he was. I'd faced fae quicker than them, and likely some with more strength behind their swings as well. It was, for lack of a better term, the timing of their movements that was at their craft's pinnacle. The Saint feinted high and right, the Revenant stepped to the side and somehow that led him to be behind her and swinging at her neck: then, even as the Saint pivoted on herself and aimed a cutting blow at the side of his own neck, the both withdrew a step. I took me a heartbeat longer than them to understand why. It would have been a double kill, I realized, if they'd both finished the arc of their swing. So instead they'd withdrawn, and gone for a second pass. I almost let out a whistle. I doubted I'd ever like Laurence de Montfort even if I didn't end up killing her but I could certainly admire her skill.

Black was the one of the few people I'd ever seen move like that – it was how he'd beat Captain when they sparred, even though she'd been massively stronger and quicker on the swing – though on occasion Archer got close to it as well. She still relied on an aspect to get there, though, her Flow. Ranger would be more than match for either of these, I thought, but though rather skilled with a blade I'd never been even remotely in their league. Impressive as the spectacle of the two of them trading not-blows like dancers was, I'd not come here to be a spectator. The tricky part would be, I knew, intervening without getting in the Saint's way.

"All is Night," I murmured in Crepuscular, wrist flicking outwards. "The left hand is strife and the right hand is ruin, only one can be clasped: I call on you, Komena, war-bringer and red of deed, breaker of spears and devourer of hope. In your name I curse my foe."

A brush like feathers of my cheek, the flap of wings, and distant cawing laughter. She approved, it seemed, as she was want to do when I spoke words from her Tenets. Night flowed through my veins, like a cool shadow cast on a spring morning, and I released the working on the two fighting in the distance. Tariq stiffened, for the barest moment, though the tension ebbed when he saw that the Saint had not been hurt by what I'd done. It was a subtle touch, at first. The shadows of the ruins where they were duelling lengthened a little, and the air began to swell unspeakably in that way it did before a storm. Neither of the combatants took notice, for after four bouts they'd now taken each other's measure and were now going for blood. I waited patiently, and only struck when I found my opportunity: the Revenant's bronze blade had been cut through by the Saint's longsword, and when it burst in a flash of flame that blinded Laurence she drew back. The elf's hand extended and the air began shuddering as rust-like flecks were attracted to its open palm and began to form a fresh blade.

"No," I replied.

And the flecks went grey, the shivering air went still and the Revenant's eyes snapped straight to me from across the field. That's right, I thought. Look at me. I just swung decay and entropy at you look a bludgeon, look at how irritating I am. The burst of flame hadn't even finished dying when tip of the Saint's blade went straight through, going half an inch into the Spellblade's throat before he could react. Laurence's footing shifted, she began to pivot on herself, and even as the elf took a fluid step back she finished tearing her sword out through the right side of his throat. Too shallow to have caught the spine, I saw with disappointment. Eyes flashing with fury, the Revenant's left hand shot out and with an open palm he struck at the Saint's arm – there was a thundering sound of iron being bent and she flew back a dozen feet from the strength of it, the angle of her upper arm making it clear the bones must have been broken badly enough it tore up through skin and muscle. The Revenant's other arm rose horizontally and moonlight clustered around his fist.

"Still no," I replied.

The Night clustered around his fist smothered the gathering glow before it grew strong enough to contest that ending. Visibly irritated, the Revenant shook its fingers free of the power and took a step forward that brought it in front of the Saint – just as her arm snapped back in place, wisps of Light swirling around it as the Pilgrim's work bore fruit. The heroine was ready when the blow came, nudging aside the elf's forearm with the pommel of her sword and then angling her wrist. Her foot circled back, her body twisted, and the Saint of Swords swung her blade halfway through the neck she'd already cut before a familiar shiver of power began. I knew that feeling. Last time I'd felt it my entire face and the forward half of my body had ended up vaporized because I'd been too close, and whatever this was the Revenant had been able to use it again on the massive pile of blocks Hierophant had tried to bury it under. Come on, I thought, and gathered the Night to pit it against the shiver. There was maybe a tenth of a heartbeat where the forces were even, and then to my horror the Revenant's working plowed right through. All the Night I'd sunk into the area went into smoke, fully and instantly and harshly enough it felt like someone had ripped off a chunk of my skin.

"Shine," the Grey Pilgrim hoarsely said.

I forced Night into my eyes even though the sensation was unpleasant and it felt like they were boiling, as I was wary of being blinded even for a moment and the radiant shine of the star the Peregrine had just unleashed would have robbed me of sight without it. It almost did anyway, for even though Tariq had unleashed only the palest shadow of the morning star he'd hung in the sky in Creation even that shred was terrible to behold. A ghostlike shimmering globe had appeared between the Saint and the Spellblade, for an instant, and some sort of massive pressure had swatted the Revenant through the paved ground. I still caught a glimpse of the heroine's face and saw that all the way to the bridge of her nose the flesh of her face looked like a blanket of acid had been laid over it. It was the same with the entire flank of her body that'd been facing the Revenant most fully, though strangely her clothes were untouched. In the moment where the Night had fought the shiver I'd learned one thing for certain, that it was in fact an aspect, and taste of the nature of that power. Looking at the Saint's tabard and tunic I frowned: they were, I thought, looking too pristine. And with the harsh taste of the power I'd fought still resounding, I suspected I'd put my finger on the face of that aspect: it related, one way or another, to 'purification'.

Gods, elves were such assholes. It looked like Ranger had come by it honestly.

Body unmarred by any of the wounds that'd been inflicted on it, the Spellblade leapt out of the wreckage it'd been smacked into, a half-formed blade of light green scales in hand. My working had been scattered, so there'd be no shutting that shutting the door on that quick enough. Time to go on the offensive, then, I grimly thought. A panting Tariq strung healing Light around the Saint once more, and as he did I snatched up my staff. Or would have, were it still there. For a surreal moment I looked to see if I'd simply missed it while reaching but no, the alarm welling up in my stomach was quite warranted and it was nowhere to be seen. Shit. With the amount of power I'd sunk into that, over the months, this was not the kind of artefact I would want in anybody else's hands even if it wasn't also my contingency for the Saint. I tapped a foot on the ground, sending out a pulse of Night. If it was close I should get something out of that.

"Pilgrim, there's another-"

I had gotten something out of the Night pulse, though by the time I did it was pointless because my eyes had done the work already. I'd glanced at Tariq, when beginning to speak, and so caught sight of the Revenant standing behind him. It was hard to even tell she was dead, truth be told, for her tanned leathery skin and the single blond tress going down her back were strikingly lifelike. This one too was an old friend: the Thief of Stars looked no worse for the few hours she'd spent as one of my own Thief's possessions. Though, if the harsh look she flicked at me was any indication, she hadn't forgotten that bad turn either. More interesting was the way she was holding my staff, pointing it directly at the Grey Pilgrim's back. Strange, since in her hands it might as well be a walking stick: she wouldn't be able to do anything with it. Well, unless she had – and there it was, the shiver of an aspect being used. Something to facilitate using what she'd stolen maybe? It didn't matter. I raised my hand as the Thief of Star roused the Night in my staff-that-was-not-a-staff, baring my teeth savagely.

"Mistake," I said in Crepuscular, and snapped my fingers.

Night lashed out viciously and the sound of talons rending flesh rang across the plaza. The Thief of Stars' upper half splattered the ground, entrails trailing like grim garlands, but there was no hiding that a gaping chest wound had split her in two. As if some great bird's talons had snapped out of the sea of Night awaiting within the staff, where they had been waiting. They must have thought I was a fucking idiot, making something that dangerous without putting in contingencies – like the attention of the angrier half of the goddesses that artefact was linked to. She might have managed to flee with it, though certainly not remain hidden. Using it, though? That was opening a door for Komena to express her displeasure. It'd had absolutely nothing to do with my fingers being snapped, but given such a beautiful opportunity to pretend otherwise why would I not? Posturing aside, I sent out a simmering coil of Night to catch the staff before it fell and dragged it back to me. I'd just slapped into my palm when I slammed onto the ground, biting down on a scream as my bad leg gave and rolling fruitlessly to the side. A vivid green sword seemingly made of scales was swung down at my head, though with a grunt the Saint carved through the damned thing. Foul-smelling droplets flew everywhere and I wove a spinning top of Night above me that proved to be the right reflex: wherever the liquid fell, it smoked and ate at whatever it'd touched.

"Move, Foundling," the Saint of Swords snarled, slapping aside a blow with the side of her sword.

I almost did, but then I paused. This slugging match with an effectively indestructible and inexhaustible demigod wasn't going anywhere, and it was a losing fight for us. Sure we were pulling slightly ahead right now but both the heroes would tire eventually and the Peregrine had already dropped an aspect once. Engaging the Revenant like we were storming a bloody wall was just going to get us killed. What did I know about my allies? Tariq I had a read on, could play off of, but the Saint... Sever, I realized. She had that brutal little aspect still. If she was given an opening, she could use I to remove the source of our troubles. I just needed to... Halfway into rising to my feet, I theatrically groaned and flopped back to the ground. The Spellblade saw that as the opening it was and struck again, so it'd just made a tactical mistake. I was prone and crippled, the Saint was having an increasingly harder time fending off its blows and I pointedly did not get up. I stayed there on the ground, hilariously unarmored and basically just asking to get killed. The Saint, though it must be said she did so with considerable ill-grace, heroically defended her fallen ally in a doomed venture. I suspected she was going to cut her losses soon, but that was fine. I'd gotten what we needed.

"What are you-" Laurence started, but she was interrupted by the Grey Pilgrim nailing our opponent.

It was easy to forget that, for all his power, Tariq was not meant to be the tip of the spear in a band or even the healer. He was, by Role, a helping hand. He was at his strongest and ablest when serving as that hand, as demonstrated by the fact he'd been able to once more use an aspect that he should have thoroughly exhausted earlier to save the Saint's life earlier. Now, the radiant beams of Light bit into the side of the Revenant harshly and as the better part of his left shoulder and kneecap were incinerated, it called on its favourite trick. The air shivered as it drew on its aspect, and the Saint of Swords' own blade fell on the floor with a clang. Breathing out sharply, the old woman swung nothing at all and the Spellblade screamed. That aspect had cut Winter, elf or not he wasn't getting through that with a shrug. And, while we were at it, I killed the pain in my bad leg with a sliver of Night and pushed myself up with my staff. The Revenant was staggering back in apparent pain – and disbelief at the fact that it could feel pain, I suspected – while the Saint looked like she was about to keel over. She'd be out of it for at least a bit, so best to tip the scales a little further. The Spellblade's eyes fell on me just as I leaned forward and rammed my hand through his chest.

"What," he croaked. "What are you-"

"Restocking," I replied with a feral grin.

I'd had a knack for taking from my foes even before I'd become the herald of goddesses who'd made theft of might the central tenet of their culture. Now? I'd had tutors in the art, patrons who'd touched the godhead and a Wastelander of the old blood. My fingers, coated in Night, dug through its soul and skimmed over the raw ruin the Saint had made of the first bundle. Another two were there for the taking, one still faintly vital and the other necrotized for centuries if not millennia. I could only get a vague idea of what it was I was taking until I'd taken it, but there was no room for hesitation. The aspect still in use felt like some sort of wheel, or maybe a kaleidoscope. The dead one felt like... nothing. Absence, maybe. Denial or gamble? Double down, I decided. A little too late to start playing it safe. Letting out a hissing breath, I withdrew my fingers from the Spellblade's chest and found they were holding a slim branding iron. Ban, I knew sure as my own breath, and cackled. I called on the Night, and began pushing it into the iron.

"Hold him," I yelled.

The Pilgrim wove shackles of Light around the Revenant's limbs but we were the winning side, now – it tore through them effortlessly. But where Role and story failed, Laurence de Montfort instead scathingly said something in Tolesian and carved straight through the elf's right knee with the longsword he'd already picked up. But already it'd formed a blade out of some eerie pulsing red haze, and instead of attacking one of us he stabbed himself – only the blade broke, and fresh flesh began to sprout where the Saint had cut him before the severed limb even began to fall. But I'd been sinking Night into the brand this whole time, and though the symbol it depicted hurt my eyes to try to discern I could still see smoke was wafting from it. It should suffice. Even as the Revenant dipped forward from the sudden loss of limb, I shoved the branding iron against its chest. The moment it touched the satin shirt it went straight through, and though I saw the Revenant's skin blacken around where the brand touched the flesh it did not react. It would not feel pain from this, I thought. Or, indeed, anything else. The red pulse shattered, the flesh ceased growing and the elf flinched back once more. I supposed it was rather in shock at the way I'd used his dead aspect to kill the other one. I stepped back and smiled.

"All yours," I told the Saint.

She was a fearsome one, but he was still an elf and an old one.

It took her seven blows, before his head rolled on the ground and the Dead King lost his second Revenant of the night.

Just imagine how much worse the Pilgrim would be if he always had an ally who knew when to be 'vulnerable'.

It really goes to show how much damage this band is capable of, especially since they only have three of the five around right now.

That's what child sidekicks are for.

Gunslinger

I suspect that's something one cannot overuse. Rely on it too long for the Pilgrim to fail once and you're dead

onedollargum

I imagine it only works if the Pilgrim actually believes she's in trouble.

origamiflame

So then maybe something like "person you'd give your life to protect" and then have them join your band?

Kakavorin

It helps that she actually was in trouble, even if it was trouble of her own making. Spellblade would have gotten her if he hadn't intervened.

Liliet

I imagine it only works if she honestly is. Catherine genuinely was risking her life by not moving out of the way there.

Javvies

Elves are fucking hax.

Well done, Cat.

Manipulate the story into unleashing Pilgrim on the Spellblade. And, yeah, Laurence definitely would have left you to die.

Stealing power from your foes is an interesting and useful trick, Cat ... but can't be relied on too much, since you know that stolen power is ultimately unreliable in the end.

Liliet

It can't be relied on strategically, but it's fair game tactically in the very encounter where it was taken.

It's using it more than once that's hubris which gets punished.

Qwormuli

Also, using it isn't often the bad part. Now __relying__ on it on the other hand, that's what gets you killed.

Qwormuli

Oh, yeah, no formatting or editing found here. Thanks, wordpress.

Liliet

Formating works thru HTML tags.

No editing though -_-

therealgridlock

What're you talking about? There's always been editing, there's a button right there!

Edit: No there isn't, i was wrong.

Mental Mouse

OK, one more comment: I differ on the "only once" constraint. I'm betting she gets to use it at least one more time against a different opponent; the third use may be weaker and will probably consume it entirely. Yes, I think it's basically the same power as Take.

Liliet

Hm, that also makes sense.

Mental Mouse

Another thought in this vein: If she gets even one more use out of it, well that's an very powerful one-shot weapon. Every DM knows that if you ever give a player even one "arrow of slay anything", they will use it against the boss you spent a week designing.

Suppose she uses it to Ban the Dead King from Masego?

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, that would be sweet.

NerfContessa

Indeed. But unlikely.

Second great chapter in a row. Excellent tactics from cat, abusing stories seems like fun 😊

SilentWatcher

Finally a possible path of growth for Cat. Stealing power of her foes. If stolen power is unreliable is not Night always unreliable? Can Cat also harvest Night? Would be nice to get the experiences of an Elf.

Andrew Mitchell

> If stolen power is unreliable is not Night always unreliable?

Cat's Night is freely given to her by Sve Noc.

werafdsaew

The Night IS unreliable, since it doesn't work well when the sun is out, and the priests have counters. For example the Mighty had to flee once the Pilgrim used Shine. The point is if you rely on the Night, and there's no backup plan, then you're screwed once it gets countered inevitably.

Insanenoodlyguy

if her power was to steal it long term, it'd not work well. You'll note Rise got less and less effective. But now she's learned to mold them into strong one time uses. The former-name inspired power to take is her own, so it's fine to use it. In fact, as Lilliet points out, using it in the very encounter it was given is the safest way to use this sort of power.

Done this way, it's not a weapon that fails when yo need it most, it's a versatile trick that can be used creatively enough to keep from getting too repetitive.

vamair

It's also a way for the mighty to fall, hoisted by their own petard, as the punishment for their arrogance. Which is a very story-like way to go.

Liliet

Mhm! A story judo flip.

Stormblessed

Well that certainly went better the second time. Cat with her power up. The saint is absurd and having Heros and Providence on your side will do that for you hun?

Either way, I wonder if the Dead King is going to be pleased or miffed about this. I expect pleased for he wouldn't put those peace's there if he wasn't afraid to lose them.

Basically I think he is trying to goad Cat into putting the Heros in a position not to dissimilar to her situation with Night. Basically she binds her purpose to them and can then use their powers for her own ends.

thearpox23

The Dead King is successively getting rid of the Revenants Cat met when she visited Keter. For every story he's involved in, he's got a certain allowance of Revenants he needs and is limited to to use effectively. And he also needs to selectively use up those Revenants over the course of the story, as any that survive into the next cycle would become a narrative liability.

I suspect that he wouldn't have minded the Thief of Stars surviving this engagement to be thrown away in another gambit, but the Spellblade absolutely needed to die here, of that I am certain. His survival here would have locked him into the role of a Dragon, and that isn't a path favorable for the Dead King, especially not with such a comparatively weak Dragon.

Oshi

Agreed. The Dead King is systemically destroying the usual advantages by removing any use prior knowledge would give them on a side gambit.

Miles

Does he have to do this every time Ranger visits? No wonder he's always cranky with her.

RoflCat

He probably doesn't have to, but Ranger isn't the type to let her prey go easily so eh.

thearpox23

Short answer; No.

He has to do that every story cycle, such as a crusade or an invasion. Interludes, like a small-time massacre of a party of green heroes, or Ranger's visits are not subject to such laws.

What happens with her visits is more of him giving her a sacrificial offering than anything else.

"A person or monster The Hero has to get past to get at the Big Bad. Much of the time, but not necessarily, the Big Bad's top enforcer. He, she or it embodies a narrative trope: the penultimate challenge that the hero must face before confronting the Big Bad. This challenge will test their worthiness in some fundamental way.

Nice to see another fight scene with the action kicked up a notch. Clever work from Cat there:

- putting contingencies on the staffswordprayer
- feigning injury to give her an opportunity, and to boost Tariq
- using her powers of theft to get Lawerence the opening she needed

I wonder if Cat gets to keep Ban.

JJR

Probably not. The artifacts she made from aspects before with Winter were one use only. This was made with Night, but the idea of making them one shot so as to not become reliant on them still holds.

Mental Mouse

What such tools did she actually make? I only remember the whistle to call Larat.

Liliet

Yeah, it's probably one use... and it's most definitely narratively better for them to be one use, because otherwise they're an immediate narrative liability.

Also, that was some sweet fucking providence with her leg buckling just in time to save her life.

Kissaten

Drow get to keep stuff they manage to steal. It's not Cat's style, though

SilentWatcher

Cat used Willies stolen Aspect a long time, her stolen Mantle of Winter was kept for a while and her resurrection from the Choir of Contrition was kept permanently. If she's not keeping the stolen Aspect how about harvesting the Night of the Elf? Would be Idiocy of High Priestess of Night not to use the greatest Advantage Night has to offer.

Fayhem

The resurrection was a one-time effect, it's not a continuously ongoing effect keeping her alive. She was dead, the resurrection made her alive again, and that was it.

Also, to all the people urging Cat to harvest the Spellblade: literally he belonged body and soul to the Dead King. You do not willingly take the essence of that creature into yourself when the entity he belonged to is the one who coined the phrase "the essence of sorcery is usurpation" (IIRC, it was either him or one of the extra-magicky Dread Emperors but since IIRC DK literally invented the school of magic that Praes uses it's still relevant).

In Bk. IV Ch. 43 (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/13/chapter-43-masegos-plan/>) when Cat is fighting Skein she comments "the Revenant was not of my own raising, but there was an... affinity there, now that I knew to look for it. Not a door into usurpation – in those eldritch struggles knowledge was always paramount, and compared to the likes of the Dead King I was a babe in the woods". Taking an aspect from a Revenant is one thing bc at least there's a degree of separation there in that the Revenant was the DK's creature but the aspect was the Revenant's power and not the DK's directly at least; usurpation of a Revenant any more directly than that is playing with soul-eating mind-controlling fire. I would still urge Cat to at least be cautious about even keeping an aspect from one of them long-term as well (well you know, if I was capable of speaking to fictional people I would urge her but you know what I mean).

Yavandir

Lolz you still don't realize that you are in coma and everyone you interact with is a fictional person

Mental Mouse

Adding to other comments, the Mantle of Woe was by no means stolen, that was earned. Based on a cloak given her by her patron Amadeus, and augmented with trophies of her early kills. The question is whether she'll take a stripe for Spellblade, since he was a group kill. Admittedly, she is the leader of the group, but it might not be politic to be too blatant about that.

Mental Mouse

Also note that nobody really got worfed – in fact, Pilgrim called the fight up front. If Saint had been alone, she would have been toast – but she wasn't alone, she not only had her usual healer backing her, but also Cat throwing debuffs and spoiling his spells. And then all three of them used their signature “ultimate powers” near-simultaneously to break him. (The Thief of Stars had basically walked into the wrong fight, RIP at last. 😊)

That said, remember that Spellblade was just a miniboss here, and DK got exactly what he wanted out of this fight: A good look at all three of them in action, using both their “ordinary” abilities and their respective haymakers. The question is where Kairos and RS are, and whether they got their own independent fight. If so, we can guess it was against something particularly magic-resistant with strong physical attacks, likely set to capture, separate, and/or disable them (perhaps with help from Kairos' CBD).

Ein

Wait... Did she just drop the “Ban”hammer on the spellblade?

Andrew Mitchell

Well spotted! 😊

liate7

Typo:

s/want/wont/
 (“Wont” is certainly a good word.)

The chapter is very good, as always. Nice to see what new tricks Cat now has other than better skill in storycraft.

Andrew Mitchell

That's grammatically correct but extremely uncommon in modern English. It was a much more popular phrase in England in the 1800s.

Andrew Mitchell

It could be re-written as "She approved, as she usually did, when I spoke words from her Tenets."

Liliet

That's stylistically different. Erratic knows what he's doing in Cat's relationship with her goddesses. None of the tone shifts are accidental ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Agreed.

Fyi I wasn't suggesting EE do a re-write. I'd never suggest anything of the sort... I was trying to communicate to Iilate7 what the sentence meant.

Admittedly, that was when I was under the mistaken impression that they did not understand the sentence as written. But still, my intent was sound. 😊

Iilate7

Yes, it is grammatically correct. As the wont, not as want. They're often pronounced the same, but I checked before putting it as a typo. (I even said it was a good word, because I know that word, and use it sometimes.)

Andrew Mitchell

Ah yes, of course you're right. My fault for misunderstanding.

Miles

It's common enough in literature. One of those phrases that sticks around in modern times because it's in all the classics

Euodiachloris

Modern British English still trots it out on a regular basis, as we are wont to do with anachronisms. Usually when one wishes to sound either pompous or to underscore an observed trait.

Also, it's "wont", not "want" – strong verb, convoluted conventions surrounding verb-nouning, yada-yada...

JJR

Losing two of his revenants like this is gonna seriously inconvenience the Dead King. Hell the elf that was the Forever King's only son was basically a holographic first edition revenant. Even after he get himself another elf, it just won't be the same.

That being said, the aspect was ban, but the artifact wasn't a tiny hammer? How could you erraticerrata?

Andrew Mitchell

The elf was certainly a one-of-a-kind asset and they both were important assets for the Dead King, but I suspect he's got hundreds of revenants, maybe more. An inconvenience for sure, but probably not too serious IMO.

A branding iron and not a hammer... Yes, such a wasted opportunity.

Mental Mouse

See thearpox23's comment above for a reasonable counterargument: Basically, the revenants Cat has faced before are "used goods", he's using them up as a probe before he pulls out a fresh batch. Skein might still show up, if it wasn't actually destroyed (I'm not completely convinced), which would match the number of fighters here.

In any case, DK has a lot more Revenants on call. Once the band has come together, I'm guessing there will be five new opponents for them: some combination of Revenants, demons/devils, and perhaps possessed!Masego himself (or Masego might be matched against the band's Sixth Ranger, if they have one by then).

I find it interesting to see how drastically Cat's powers have changed, and her methods with them. No more brawling, and she's gotten much better at "playing with others", not to mention defending herself properly instead of regen-tanking through everything.

In fact... her magical techniques have advanced much the same way as her military methods: She's gone from agile bruiser to Meta Master, manipulating the fight itself – including her opponent's powers. And while she's no longer jumping around platforms and generating swords, she has regained the ability formerly known as Take... because that was and is a meta-power, and so doesn't really depend on its substrate.

More musing: Her necromancy as Squire I was already anomalous, which was explained when she retroactively claimed a Winter sigil. I'm wondering how much of her current power is based on her continuing destiny. Below may not grant power directly, but that doesn't mean it doesn't scheme and meddle. Heck, the whole Everdark might have been waiting until she came along to wield it! ("Simmer a few thousand years, then add Winter to clarify. Decant onto surface...". 😊)

Liliet

Her necromancy as a Squire was not anomalous, it's a Black Knight power that she got as a declared successor to one. Her Role was tied to Black's from the start.

Mental Mouse

Yes, but her constructs were more "lively" than his from the beginning. We found out why when she got Winter and started using that directly.

Liliet

How so? She puppeteered them in the same way. The "liveliness" was ONLY in Winter constructs.

Liliet

The only unique thing was self-necromancy, and that was just along the lines of "why would you do that"

IDKWhoitis

That mental image of Cat tearing out an aspect and effectively cripple a Named is going to scar Tariq.

Cat has always had a tendency to mutilate her own soul, but now she is able to turn that sadism onto others...

Also, let's just acknowledge the fact that Cat is able to keep up with two old Heroic Named, just by moving the story around and manipulating fate into doing the leverage for her.

Oshi

She is the living hand of Two Goddesses. It was always going to be like this.

Rook

It probably feels worse for the Pilgrim than any of the other Heroes. By virtue of limited Ophanim omniscience, he knows beyond a shred of doubt that Catherine was born under such a strong Heroic star that she still had Heroic intentions even as one of the most notorious Villains of her generation. He also knows that the reason she's a Villain now is because he, and the rest of the big-league Heroes of the west, essentially abandoned Callow in their time of need until it was far too late.

Every time she pulls a horrifyingly competent new trick out of her hat, it's a fresh reminder for him that she could've been the greatest Hero of her generation instead, if he hadn't let an entire Good nation down so badly.

Xinci

Interesting, I do wonder now at the connection of the wheel to the Elves ability to negate rules. The pattern of Creation is noted as a wheel, perhaps similar to winter the Elves essence is always connected? The perspective on the wheel shifts but it remains connected regardless. SpellBlade actually seemed more versatile in the number of blades it could wield here, presumably as it has access to more assets in Creation proper. I am quite glad that Cat has taken to taking once again. The old pattern of taking what she can mould and breaking what she cannot still holds true.

"Wheel" was one of the other two Aspects she didn't take, probably what allowed him to choose the element for the next sword.

Cap'n Smurfy

Huh. So the Spellblade's swords were aspect driven. Bit disappointed to be honest, I'd thought it was more sorcery in nature. I'd always thought of Masego's feelings toward someone using potent magic to make what are essentially fancy sharp sticks, absolutely hilarious

Also arguably Calernia's best swordswomen with a buffing and a debuffing master? Yeah elf boy didn't stand a chance.

Oshi

You mean Calernia's best swordswoman with two fo the best cheaters on the continent. Yah no way anyone was gonna win.

Liliet

Buffing and debuffing are best cheater powers.

Aotrs Commander

TeK

A little dissapointed that we got epigraph basically repeated later in the chapter.

Elfs really are Nazi's. A Cleanse that kills humans? You just know someone is onto some racialcleamsing. And they are also Good, for some godforsaken reason. Does that mean being prejudiced fuck is the same as doing Above's will in Guideverse? That explains too much.

Also I suspect there's ought to be bad Nazi, like Soninke for example. They also would like to cleanse the world from those pesky humans.

Oshi

Elves as a race are good. The Elves from the bloom are a tiny subset of the main race banished for being asshole racists.

TeK

>elves as a race are good

That, somehow, does not sound good. Are they good in the sence that they have inherent goodness in them, or in that their actions are the definition of good is? In other words, are they good, because they do good, or because what they do IS good? The first almost requires that there will be races that are inherently evil in a sence that they can't help but do evil. The second is simple double standarts that are a sample of human behaviour.

Andrew Mitchell

> And they are also Good, for some godforsaken reason. Does that mean being prejudiced fuck is the same as doing Above's will in Guideverse? That explains too much.

LMAO.... But still, it's a very good question and I hope we get some more insight into why the elves are classed as Good.

Sanctus-obscurum

Good is following the commandments of Above. Good is acting in accord with the will of the choirs. Evil is acting against Above. The only democracy on Calernia is Evil because it is a state where the will of humans is used to lead entirely rather than the will of a human who is devoted to, or following, Above. Below wants to see what mortals will do with power and no guidance, Above grants power to better follow their commands.

Fayhem

> The only democracy on Calernia is Evil because it is a state where the will of humans is used to lead entirely

I actually had a different take on that, which I can't remember if I already posted somewhere. In brief, basically my take on why the only democracy on Calernia is Evil/crazy Bellerophon is because Below are sneaky fucks and they deliberately created an example of democracy that embodies all the worst possible traits of it in order to discredit it as a mode of government. I mean, we've seen more than ample evidence of how hard Princes/High Lords/nobles in general fuck shit up for their own people right? Think about it, when Cat was contemplating the government of Callow back in chapter whatever it was (sorry, I don't have the patience to try to find it right now), she explicitly went "sure I dislike nobles and inherited power in general, but no way do I want Callow to be like Bellerophon so democracy's not an option". You really think that dynamic is an accident? That dynamic is the point of Bellerophon, beyond just it being "a maddened altar of a city" in itself.

Novice

The Elves of the Golden Bloom were exiled from the greater elven empire for being huge assholes IIRC. But the fact that they still were on the Good side is something really uncomfortable tbh.

SITB

They probably still worship Above and disdain Below.

Possibly a remnant of the culture they left.

(And to preempt the discourse, Above is pretty hands off with their interventions, which is why both the Grand Alliance and Callow's armies have priests in them)

Liliet

This.

Elves are mortals and Gods Above are very generous with giving mortals opportunity to fuck up.

The elven story said this guy was a hero, so powers he got.

Mental Mouse

One of Simon R. Green's characters was described as something like "...a deeply disturbing agent of Good. And no, Good didn't get any say in that."

Rey d`Tutto

Eddie, Punk God of the Straight Razor?

Mental Mouse

Yup. One of my favorite characters in the series.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I've never heard of him (nor the author) before now, but with a name like that he's already my favorite.

Javvies

Razor Eddie is a recurring character in SRG's Nightside/John Taylor series. Shows up a couple times in the Secret Histories series, too.

Razor Eddie would probably like Cat, though.

Mental Mouse

Potted summary: Simon R. Green has at least three mostly-separate (and lengthy) series under his "Secret Histories" umbrella. (A couple of characters have visited between series.) The two series I've read fall under "campy horror"; I assume the third is similar.

I've read and liked the entire "Nightside" series (where this guy comes from), which wrapped up in satisfying fashion, and 8 or so books of the "Eddie Drood" series, but the latter eventually (6-8 books in) went downhill IMHO, and I got bored; I never got around to picking up the "Ghost Hunters" series. There's also a standalone novel in a distant corner of his 'verse, "Shadows Fall".

The Nightside is a secret city beneath London, where all the monsters and gods go to let their hair/spines/ichor down, anything can be bought and sold (especially your soul), and it's always 3-o'clock in the morning.

The Punk God of the Straight Razor is a supporting character; the protagonist is John Taylor, a private eye with a background even he doesn't understand (until late in the series). When John Taylor walks the streets, some folks make the sign of the cross, while others make the sign of the extremely cross....

And Cat shows just what she's capable of now that she's reclassified into Cleric. Pretty awesome. I suspect she would also be capable of causing a fair amount of devastation, but this wasn't the opponent for that kind of blow.

Liliet

And once again Cat proves that she's actually a bard who took levels in cleric to augment her favored strategy. Let's be real, buffs/debuffs are totally a bard thing.

As is, of course, her other major contribution to the battle ♥
♥ ♥

grzecho2222

Nah, she's more of Tarnum, changing classes every part, being killed and coming back

Liliet

except for the bard levels that she just keeps gaining :3

Mental Mouse

Excuse me, but have we even seen her pick up an instrument? Or sing for that matter? Admittedly, music doesn't seem to be a big thing in the Guide (battle-songs excepted); I would venture to guess it's not a big thing for the author..

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. To me, Bard = Music & Story Telling. Cat's got the second but not the first. But, as you suggest, the guideverse could well have a different definition.

Mental Mouse

Maybe. Bard doesn't play well, but she always has the instrument, so it's apparently an attribute of her name.

But many other characters have fearsome story-fu without music, so in this world, I don't think story-fu is particularly a "bardic" attribute.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point.

Liliet

I'm talking about a more meta 'dnd archetypes' approach, in which music is actually incidental to everything else that makes a bard.

Substract music, and you get what Catherine is.

Mental Mouse

A more jaundiced view of the FRP "bard archetype" showed up the other day:
<https://www.somethingpositive.net/sp05092019.shtml>

(Something Positive in general is... a twisted sort of heartwarming.)

Liliet

heheh ♥

Liliet

As if music&singing are the only possible bard specialities?

Cat specializes in Perfomance(Storytelling) 😊

Mental Mouse

Mmm, I think that's a reach. She doesn't perform, she enacts.

Liliet

I think saying that bard as a dnd archetype is defined by perfomance is missing the point like you're not wrong but is that the most interesting way to view it?

Mental Mouse

Also, if you start taking about "bard, but with no music", you're not only abusing the archetype (*), you're getting an unnecessary terminology collision, especially since this world already has a Wandering Bard.

(*) The use of music (or at least poetry, in some cultures) is certainly more central to bard-ness than the magical strategies that one FRPG assigned to them. E.g., long before the newer editions started layering magic onto Bard characters, it was already a cliché that “piss off a bard, and embarrassing songs about you start showing up in taverns”. That one goes back to the Society for Creative Anachronism, which AIUI has occasionally done it for real.

Liliet

I mean yah obviously bard irl means the music person, but the bard archetype in TTRPG is the topic of discussion here.

And ‘unnecessary collision with Wandering Bard’ define ‘unnecessary’ 😊

Mental Mouse

The thing is, the Guide isn’t TTRPG, this is actual fantasy literature. The relevant “archetype” isn’t gaming rulesets, it’s the real-world archetype stretching back to mythology (which gaming drew on for its own purposes).

Liliet

If you think Guide isn’t heavily TTRPG-based...

Liliet

...to be clear, all the times I say “Catherine is a bard” are my answer to the question which has been repeatedly discussed “what DnD class is Catherine”. I’m not saying she is somehow parallel to actual historical bards (who probably also didn’t go down into dungeons to hunt dragons)

Mental Mouse

Okay, fair enough... but imho Cat is sending up the D&D-style classes, as much as the alignment system. The right player can bust a scenario with any class!

Liliet

I mean yeah but that doesn’t make it any less fun to go “what class is she most similar to” / “if this was a DnD campaign what class would she most likely be playing” :3

The Gentlemen

Ah, the glory of counterspell.

Wait... fancy clothing with symbolism and trinkets from her enemies, priestess of the goddess of deceit and night, and placing a firm emphasis on outsmarting and stealing her opponent's wins...

She's taken a level in bard.

Liliet

Most of her levels are in bard, really ♥ ♥ ♥

Counterspell is the fucking best annoying bard thing to do (and I don't care if any particular game system allows it, it's the spirit of the thing)

Aotrs Commander

As the poor DM that at one point had to suffer through a party of eight with a cleric, a druid and TWO bards (and some NPCs – all of whom relied on multiple attack stuff (rapid-fire, TWF) because the module was being silly), I can safely say, no, that honour has to go to “work with the other bard, so that everyone gets bonus to attack and damage AND +3D6 fire damage.”

'S me own fault, I 'spose, I shouldn't have insisted that one of the bards had Dragonfire Inspiration so that they didn't step on each other's toes...

Liliet

BLESS.

Also, that sounds like what's going to happen when Cat gets Amadeus back 😊

Xinci

I do also realize that Komena is the aspect of Strife while Andraste is the aspect of Ruin. Quite fitting given their characteristics, Komena being the more...spritely of the two while her sister focuses more on the magical aspects. Though it may be been referring to Below or Above for a bit but given the context of Cat speaking the exert its probably about them as a pair instead.

Liliet

Andronike, not Andraste. That's from Elder Scrolls, right?

But yeah, I agree. Strife and ruin, Komena and Andronike taking on these aspects/domains (in the dnd deity sense) respectively.

Nairne .01

Andronike not Andraste.

The latter is from Dragon Age....

Liliet

Annnnd I confused Elder Scrolls with Dragon Age. Nice.

konstantinvoncarstein

How did Neshamah managed to kill him in the first place? This thing could have win against the 2 most powerful heroes of the continent! Maybe burying him under thousands of deads? It seems too simple, and he was probably not the only elf send by the Forever King.

Liliet

Probably tricked him somehow. He didn't have Laurence's immunity to the Enemy's guile ♥

KageLupus

I feel like Elves have the same kind of problem that the Fae do, where they are much more tightly coupled with the current story they are in. Cat has gotten slightly better at acting in a way that triggers a narrative benefit (compared to blatantly tricking a Fae into monologuing at her before running away) but I doubt playing helpless would have worked against a human opponent.

If the Elves are more susceptible to narrative shenanigans than Neshamah would not have had all that much trouble getting the Spellblade killed and raised. The man has actual millennia of experience weaving stories like that. Experience helps with the setup, having all of the time in the world helps with the preparation, and vast hordes of undead monstrosities help with the execution.

Caerulea

Also, he turned an entire kingdom into undead and created a permanent portal to hell. And his power has only increased. I think he has the raw power to kill an elf, even a named one. (Granted, he probably also rigged the battle with story.)

Liliet

Catherine did not play helpless, she actually deliberately put herself in danger, which is normally a bad gambit but no when it gives your ally a huge power-up.

It wasn't Spellblade that the story part worked on there 😊

Mental Mouse

> I doubt playing helpless would have worked against a human opponent.

The thing is, if the opponent had hung back and tried to ignore her, she could have woven some new viciousness out of Night.

Mental Mouse

How about Thief of Worlds?

Mental Mouse

I don't know about Names, she's so far had two major power bases that aren't based on them. But yeah. she's definitely screwing with the boundary between Good and Evil. Aside from her general good intentions, remember that she actually redeemed an entire species from their doom.

Eh Just going back to what the dead king said a good while ago to Cat that everything that he has on the field is to him expendable. Makes me wonder if he has a way to remake any of the Reverent's and simply wont use them again anytime soon due to story reasons. After all the idea that he's waited this long to use the Elf Prince seems, off.

Liliet

Hmm, good point.

Euodiachloris

The Elf Prince will have had some use in many, many stories. Generally the survival/slasher horror kind where most of the characters don't make it out alive and the ending for the sole survivor is, at best, bittersweet, knowing that That Horrible Thing™ is not eliminated.

If you have a hax character, use 'em for haxxor stories. Eventually, you'll get the one where The Tragic Monster Is Put Out Of Its Brainwashed Misery, but... until then, you have Freddy Krueger on the payroll. 😊

SilentWatcher

Kairos said DKs plan was to bind their souls, so he should have bound the cheat Elf as well somewhere?

Mental Mouse

Given prior discussion regarding meat-puppets, I doubt that a soul without a matching body is all that useful by DK's standards. Consider that Akua apparently doesn't have her original Aspects anymore, at least she hasn't used them. It may well be that Apects are tied to the body and/or life-force.

NZPIEFACE

C'mon, there's bound to be a Name somewhere all about body-hopping.

Mental Mouse

We've heard of the Face-thief, but they preyed on an unnamed princess. We've seen Aspects that can affect or steal one Aspect from another Named, but I'd be really surprised if any mortal Named could go much further than that. And even DK's revenants apparently can't keep all their original power. ISTR Skein had three aspects, but one of those (Spool) might well have been a localized replacement power provided by DK.

konstantinvoncarstein

Or he cannot remake them, but he has a lot of them and can catch others easily.

Or he could said that as long as his survival is assured he don't care what happens to them.

Andrew Mitchell

> After all the idea that he's waited this long to use the Elf Prince seems, off.

OTOH, the arrival of a player of Cat's caliber on the scene may have been exactly the right time for the DK to pull the Elf Prince out of storage. I think that's actually the case because, during the first conversation between the DK and Cat, the DK was talking about Cat's potential for immortality and Apotheosis and how rare that was (with only the DK and the Bard achieving it).

Meh

Cat is kinda making a mockery of names. If all it took to be this powerful was a contract with pseudo gods, half of the old aristocrats in wasteland would be demigods. We are sadly hitting dragon balls levels of power bullshittery.

konstantinvoncarstein

The problem is that there are not many gods around. Furthermore, not a lot of them have access to a power easily usable by mortals.

And the Wastelanders use contracts with powerful devils.

Meh

Or maybe they should ask the Warlocks for help? We know that they apparently go around dissecting gods.

konstantinvoncarstein

I doubt the Warlocks would make that kind of power available to anyone but them. And Sve Noc seems to be a particularly powerful goddess, and the Night is particularly well suited to the gifting of power.

The other problem is that Catherine does not really own this power, she borrows it from Sve Noc, who can revoke it as she pleases. No highborn would let himself be at the mercy of someone.

^^^

This this this. Cat's power is 100% contingent on her goals continuing to align with those of her goddesses'. And given how her goddesses dealt with the Longstride Cabal when they started getting uppity it's not out of the question that they could snuff her very life out at any time just by thinking about it. God-tier power like Sve Noc's isn't just lying around all over the place, and even when Cat had the power of all Winter (theoretically) at her disposal she didn't actually conquer/claim Sve Noc's power, or even strike a bargain as equals. She literally threw what was left of her power (and basically her life) at Sve Noc's feet and said "please help me", and in return Sve Noc decided on a 100% discretionary basis to grant her 100% revocable power. Does any of that sound like something a Praesi highborn would go for literally ever?

Meh

And how does that stop the wasteland highlords from enslaving and forcing gods to give them the same kind of power cat has? "I doubt warlocks would share the gods" is such a weak argument -.-

Dont be blind to bs in a story just because you enjoy it.

Liliet

Three reasons:

- 1) it's really fucking hard to do;
- 2) story shenanigans: faith gives a powerup of its own no matter the power;

3) that said, IT'S NOT THAT GOOD. Like... Masego would smear Komana and Andronike across the floor even post-Winter powerup if properly prepared. Wastelanders had access to more efficient ways to destroy shit than binding gods – they could bind many demons instead of one god, for instance :3

Fayhem

> Masego would smear Komana and Andronike across the floor even post-Winter powerup if properly prepared.

Strongly doubt that. Even with days of “proper preparation” Masego couldn't manage more than brief containment/stalling of the Summer Queen, and the Sisters were arguably more powerful than a fae monarch (difficult to say for sure since while Cat certainly had that power in the Everdark she never really mastered actually using it) even before eating the power of an entire fae Court.

Otherwise, good points! Though given the above I'd change/clarify “Wastelanders had access to more efficient ways to destroy shit than binding gods” to “Wastelanders had access to less insanely dangerous and difficult ways to destroy shit than binding gods”.

Liliet

Okay, that's fair. Masego has massively leveled up since Dormer, but then his power is also utter bullshit.

Liliet

And to be more specific: are you asking why Praesi didn't mount expeditions to the Everdark to fish out Sve Noc from there, or are you asserting there's plenty of entities of their power level around on the surface?

Meh

Lol not asking why Wastelanders didnt go to Everdark. Just asking if pseudo gods could grant power like what Cat has why wouldnt the wastelanders abuse it. Just enslave some psudo gods to your bloodline and force them to grant powers arguably better and more flexible than names. Doesn't even have to be as powerful as Sve Nocs, they would settle for far less i imagine. And we already know there are people like the late warlock who goes around dissecting gods for fun. How believable is it that the only example of this kind of power is Cat and not the Wastelenders this method seems to be tailored for? I dunno bois, this is some obvious bullshittery if i have ever seen one.

Liliet

Yeah, so

- the power is not that great in the first place,
Cat's just really good at tactical use of it;
- there's probably not that many 'pseudo gods' and most would probably be far weaker than Sve Noc with Winter;
- why exactly do you think Wastelenders HAVEN'T been doing that?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Enslaving gods? With what power of their own? The Warlock wasn't just any Praesi sorcerer, he was Named;
such mages don't grow on trees even in the Empire, whose human constituents seem to have spec'd pretty heavily into sorcery on a cultural level.

I understand your position, but gods are rare, elusive, well-protected beings whom only the most powerful of mortals can survive against long enough to outsmart them—and a lot of mortals aren't fit to outsmart them anyway—, which is presumably how Warlock used to do it.

Also, Warlock did stuff like that in the backstory, sure, but onscreen all ever comes of that history is that he and his son have relevant skills. The implication to that, to my mind, is twofold: it didn't happen often and/or he did, in fact, refuse to share his kidnapped divinities with his friends.

At any rate, dissent can be valuable in any community;
thanks for your thoughts despite my disagreement with them.

Fayhem

Did you mean to reply to Konstantin? Because no offense, but it seems like you literally didn't even read my comment. Since:

> And how does that stops the wasteland highlords from enslaving and forcing gods to give them the same kind of power cat has?

Is very much directly addressed by “even when Cat had the power of all Winter (theoretically) at her disposal she didn’t actually conquer/claim Sve Noc’s power, or even strike a bargain as equals.” A semi-professional god-murderer with the power of an entire fae Court at her fingertips couldn’t successfully take down those gods; you think some High Lord rando could do it just like snapping their fingers? Press X to doubt, mon frère.

Mental Mouse

On the flip side, DK had a point in his latest appearance: At least three times now, Cat has died and came back more powerful than she was before.

The first time was when she was operating as an apparently-normal Named – but even so, she survived not only getting killed, but then having her Name stolen, then went on to mug an angel for her resurrection.. Then she got her heart ripped out by the King of Winter, and went on to become the incarnation of Winter. Then she got the Winter ripped out of her by Sve Noc, and went on to become the priestess and “front man” for the goddesses of Night.

And they say a cat has nine lives...

Barthumphries

Well they had an entire nation sacrifice its future, then fight and condense itself for millennia while under pressure from both the dwarves and the Dead King, then Cat willingly sacrificed herself and her two Goddesses now keep her around because they like her.

I think the Praesi would want to own that power but the problem is once you start that chain rolling once how do you get someone else to bring you all of Winter?

Andrew Mitchell

> and her two Goddesses now keep her around because they like her

Plus, she’s the best possible guide to help Sve Noc navigate the surface world and successfully carve out a new home.

frolamizFrolamiz

Am I the only one disappointed that the Thief of Stars didn’t steal the Grey Pilgrim’s star? I was expecting this one ever since it was confirmed that one of his aspects was to summon one. Maybe it was too obvious, or she survived and it will come later...

Mental Mouse

> disappointed that the Thief of Stars didn't steal the Grey Pilgrim's star?

The Dark-empowered staff was the more obvious threat, compared to the astral orb that was weakened outside Creation (and possibly because he'd used it recently). On the other hand... it occurs to me that she only showed up when he summoned the star, and it did only last a moment. The "interesting" part (maybe Story-pushed?) was that Cat first noped ToS's attempted theft, then immediately turned around and successfully did the same thing to Spellblade!

I guess I was wrong about the next Shine killing Pilgrim – he was not only still going, but still using his powers. Maybe last time it only took so much out of him because then he was doing a full wind-up instead of an fast strike. She may also be wrong about just how he healed Saint – I could easily believe he has priest-like healing powers and also an aspect extending them. Compare to aspects like Rampage and Swing (or for that matter, Sever), all of which boost(ed) the wielder's already-considerable fighting ability.

Mental Mouse

Hmph, I'm still muffing tags. Hazards of hasty commenting, I guess. Off to properly do Morning and get off to work.

Andrew Mitchell

> I guess I was wrong about the next Shine killing Pilgrim – he was not only still going, but still using his powers. Maybe last time it only took so much out of him because then he was doing a full wind-up instead of an fast strike.

I agree with your reasoning. After the first Shine he did weaken considerably, and yet he's still able to act quickly and to good effect. I think that may be partly because of story support provided by the new party of five that's been formed to do away with the big bad.

Mental Mouse

It also occurs to me that for the prior Shine, he was badly on the wrong side of the story, and knew it. That might be part of why he went for a full charge-up despite the cost.

Darkening

We know all of Pilgrim's aspects. They're Shine, Behold, and Forgive. He's also capable of doing everything priests can at a much higher level though, so healing magic miracles are pretty well in his wheelhouse. Cat explicitly said a few chapters ago that him becoming part of her Band of Five instead of her defeated opponent would result in creation accelerating his and Tyrant's recovery so that they can contribute properly to the story, so I'm not surprised to see him able to fight still. Dunno if he'll be able to pull Shine out again after this point though.

Mental Mouse

Right – Forgive shouldn't be the only way he can heal, but rather the culmination of his healing miracles.

Re: Shine, I don't think it's been explicitly stated, but I'd expect it to be either once-per-day or thrice-per-day. The previous Shine ended with Creation's true dawn... which may well have recharged it, but also wasn't that long ago and he's been doing other stuff too..

I mean, they were fighting a battle since an hour or two before dawn, then came the surrender, and the "conclave", which argument ended with Cat opening a gate for them. Even with various sorts of magic/miracle supporting their stamina, they've gotta be getting tired.

erebus42

As has been mentioned being both an Elf and Named is total hax. However, now I wanna see a deathmatch between a Drow and an Elf.

Mental Mouse

That probably will come eventually.

erebus42

One can only hope. I just really wanna see some arrogant ass of an elf talk some good shit and then precede to get their ass handed to them by Ivah or someone.

Fayhem

> I just really wanna see some arrogant ass of an elf talk some good shit and then precede to get their ass handed to them

"Children are disciplined by hand."

konstantinvoncarstein

Older elves can ignore one Law of Creation at the time. If it exists a Law "can be affected by Night", the Drow is screwed.

Fayhem

At least as I understand it laws of creation roughly correspond to laws of physics. "Can be affected by Night" is more of a metaphysical concept than a physical law. Elves might be able to affect whether they can be harmed by the effects of a particular application of Night (maybe they could do something with "can't be dissolved by acid" or something like that, for instance), but since they can only do that with one law at a time a drow with a versatile repertoire would still definitely be in with a chance.

Mental Mouse

If nothing else: "Oh, you're immune to direct attack by Night? Too bad the ground under you isn't. And I'm still PD fast and strong, and let's see if you're also immune to obsidian blades."

Fayhem

Yeah, exactly. Not to mention that IIRC only one of the aspects of Night that Rumena was using against Saint was one that affected her directly (I think it was an acid one as it happens). Rumena's crazy strength and speed, Rumena's magical healing, Rumena's illusory doubles... all Night-powered stuff of immense use in a fight that doesn't have shit to do with directly targeting anyone else.

Lithrandil2

It might actually work. Back in their first fight against Pilgrim Masego used something he learned from an Order Demon (Which has a strikingly similar effect to the elves: The Demon changes one law of Creation the Elves ignore) and basically made everyone in the area ignore light (Exact part is: "Masego had fought demons at Second Liesse. One of them had been a demon of Order, what Praesi called a Beast of Hierarchy. Their essence, as I understood it, was a perversion of laws. Hierophant had learned to mimic that, to a a very limited extent. Inside my killing grounds one law had been established: Light had no effect" <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/21/chapter-16-pirouette/>). Assuming Light and Night are somewhat similar (which is reasonable as both seem to act pretty similar basically beeing stuff to weave miracle with). It might work but as was already said Rumenas most powerful tricks isn't really direct damage stuff. And with that much experience he would probably easily find out that he cant hurt him directly that way. If the fight would take more time he would (assuming he didnt already know as he was already alive when the elves came to Calernia) find out he can just ignore one thing and basically bait the elf to choose the lesser evil but still be damaged by one of his tricks.

The more we see of Cat’s Night powers, the more I wonder how she’s going to end up on top when all is set and done, because there is no way the story concludes with ‘First Priestess of Night saves Callow’. However, the snippets of the Drow holy book indicate that both they & Sve Noc are alive and well in the future.

Mental Mouse

Some musings about the Spellblade as he once was: An Named elven prince (hmm, yet another crown? And Cat did get a token), proud and powerful enough to think he (and perhaps his warband) could take on the Dead King. Three aspects:

1) The “shiver”, an external aspect linked to “purification”. It seems to be able to destroy any of many different things, but perhaps only one thing at a time. But there is some limit – both Cat and Saint were badly hurt, but not disintegrated outright, and back in Keter!Arcadia it had to chew through stone progressively. This was the one that Saint Severed.

2) “... some sort of wheel, or maybe a kaleidoscope”. Apparently the one that produced the swords. Probably can turn any given “element” into a sword: metal, fire, acid, healing (or whatever would heal a revenant). Cat took it out with a stolen...

3) Ban. This one was described as “dead”, presumably killed by the Dead King. Would that have been too powerful for DK to allow in his retinue? Or... perhaps it would have allowed the Spellblade to commit suicide before being converted to a revenant. And maybe even afterwards, which would be why DK never restored it... so maybe Cat did “put it out of its misery”.

Three very powerful aspects, at least one of them “meta”... It’s perhaps understandable why it once thought it had a chance against the Dead King.

Fayhem

Nice breakdown! Destroying only one thing at a time feels like it has some symmetry with elves in general (given their racial powerset ties into ignoring one creational law at a time) so also tying that into purification (given their frothing racism) feels very appropriate for an elven Name.

Regarding your speculation re: Ban being a dead aspect, it’s been repeatedly mentioned regarding Revenants that they are undead with a portion of their former Named power. I think that losing an aspect when making a Revenant is more likely a limitation than a choice per se (DK prob has some influence over which aspect gets lost tho). Keep in mind, given that DK is essentially pulling not just a person but a Name itself into undeath, being able to preserve even 2 out of 3 aspects is still an incredible feat of necromancy.

Darkening

Y’know, that makes me curious about the time Cat came back from William cutting off her head. She had her name intact, (or as intact as it already was, anyways) so I’m not sure why the dead king, with so much more necromantic expertise, would be getting worse results than Masego. I suppose the soul stone to catch her soul, her willingness to be brought back, and the comment about creation wanting her not to be dead because of her remaining pattern of three probably contributed, but still.

Liliet

I think the difference is in the control that DK exerts over his Revenants – he reforms them into something different, something pliable to his will. Meanwhile Catherine just got a puppet body that either her or Masego could pull the strings of while staying essentially herself.

Mental Mouse

Also, we haven't had this close an examination of many Revenants – offhand, I can only think of Skein, who was anomalous in other ways.. (I don't actually remember Thief "stealing" the Thief of Stars, though – when did that happen?)

Liliet

Let me find...

>"That was all the questions," Adjutant told us. "It seems unwise to simply leave her here, if we are to act now."

>"That one's mine to solve," Thief noted. "No card, mind you, but it's the obvious solution."

>She got up and laid a hand on the Revenant's arm. Nothing happened. Vivienne sighed.

>"Hold," she said.

>While the sight of the undead vanishing was interesting in its own way, it was Hakram's body-wide twitch that took my attention.

Mental Mouse

> as intact as it already was, anyways

Specifically, she was down to two Aspects already....

Fayhem

Lili and Mental Mouse already said both the things I would have, so I'm just going to say that while I think their counterpoints are valid that's still a really interesting point you brought up and I wanted to say I appreciate that.

Liliet

Destroy one thing at a time? Where'd you get that? It scoured Saint – but did not kill her bc Pilgrim and Cat shielded her – and destroyed Night in the same go.

Mental Mouse

Hmm, good point,

Mental Mouse

Coming back to this, I was thinking “one thing at a time” because it damaged Saints flesh but not her armor/clothing – indeed, from Cat’s comment it might have cleaned blood off the armor.

Power-versus-power conflict at the same time as a physical effect doesn’t seem too unreasonable – it might be that it cleaned Night out of the whole area because it had already been fighting Cat’s attempt to contain it with Night.

Liliet

I think the idea is that the power has a set definition of what is ‘clean’ and ‘unclean’. Clothing was something to be cleaned, human flesh was something to clean everything else of.

That’s what made Cat think elves are assholes.

Mental Mouse

Except this same power was chewing through rock back in Keter!Arcadia.

Liliet

Was it just random rock lying around, or was it created?

Mental Mouse

Well, it had been part of the environment, but even before Masego picked it up and threw it, it wasn’t exactly “lying around”. 😊

Barthumphries

Dirt is dirt. If your power is to clean things, to make dirt disappear, and you continually keep using your power, you can chew through a dirt wall by continually cleaning it. And what is rock but a whole bunch of dirt?

Liliet

Oh man.

A power that, if scaled up infinitely, would destroy the planet and most of its inhabitants but leave a particular kind of mortal-made stuff floating around in perfect emptiness.

I could see elves being like that.

Mental Mouse

Also, Cat may be mistaken here:

> just as her arm snapped back in place, wisps of Light swirling around it as the Pilgrim's work bore fruit.

The Pilgrim was working on a Shine; I suspect this was Saint's own Decree.

Liliet

No, I think Shine was spontaneous – it comes up when an ally needs help. He doesn't need to work on it unless it's something bullshit like forcing dawn to come early over the entire battlefield.

Mental Mouse

Hmm... meh.

Chapter 39: Looting

"Thirty-four: it is not graverobbing if it was your destiny to have that artefact, just proactive inheritance."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

The Spellblade had taken an awful lot of killing, but he was finished. With the Thief of Stars having tried her hand at stealing something a goddess had her hand on and gotten about what one would expect for the trouble, that left the three of us masters of the field.

And so I was worried.

I had a finer nose for trouble than most, given the amount of times I'd come a hair's breadth away from death, but it wasn't a physical threat that had me growing unsettled. I knew for a fact that the Dead King had more than few Revenants to throw into the breach, so why was it two I'd encountered before that were guarding Hierophant? And that wasn't even getting into the way that I'd bet rubies to piglets we were going to run into the damned Skein skulking somewhere around here before this was over. No, setting that aside for now why was the King of Death putting up dead Named I had some knowledge of instead of any other from his millennial treasure trove of undead heroes? The Spellblade hadn't been an easy mark, by any means, and it's cost us heavy use of exhausting aspects from two aging heroes to put him down, but I didn't buy that Neshamah didn't have some Revenant around that wasn't about as much as a heavy hitter and completely unknown to me. Are you tying off loose ends, Dead King?

Sacrificing servants I was familiar with so that knowledge couldn't be used against him down the line? It seemed wasteful, given the calibre of Revenants used. The elf could probably have torn through a Lycaonese border fortress by himself, and if the Thief of Stars was even half as handy as Vivienne had been when wielding a cousin Name she could easily have wreaked havoc on supply lines.

It was true that the Dead King's method was, in essence, never to leave an opening that could be exploited no matter what it cost to play it safe. On the other hand, it didn't feel like a coincidence that I could feasibly make use of both the Revenants we'd encountered today. The Thief of Stars had, back in Keter, wielded an aspect that lit up a constellation above her head that was known in Callow as the King's Crown. It'd been suppressed by my domain, as Winter could snuff out anything given long enough, but if I went digging in our little friend's split halves I might be able to seize whatever that'd been. The Spellblade, if Tariq was right, had once been a prince of the Golden Bloom and presumably heir to its throne. Of seven crowns and one, it was perhaps viable to seize the last from either the broken Revenants at our feet. If the Dead King was in Masego's head – and he had to be, to an extent, to have been able to pass on so many of my secrets to the Tyrant – then he would know of my recipe to make Larat into something greater. Could I assume that, since he'd since had opportunity to speak with Kairos, he knew of everything I'd revealed so far? Yes, it'll be safer to, I decided. So he knew I needed one last crown, presumably, and... No, that was the wrong way to think about this. Both the Revenants couldn't feasibly recent additions to this mess, they must have been here for some time.

So why would the Dead King send a pair of possible crowns into the mess, of all his possible guards to post around Hierophant?

"Black Queen," the Peregrine interrupted me. "We should not linger."

"It's a trap," I pensively said.

"What is?" the Saint flatly asked.

"I don't know yet," I muttered. "But he laid a trap for us."

The last crown, the 'one' of the 'seven and one', it was the most important of the eight. As the Rogue Sorcerer had said: seven for weight but the last to shape. Was this the nature of the snare the Dead King had laid? That if we took a shortcut, attempted to bring a crown from outside our little circle rather than surrender one of our own, we'd be giving him a foothold into this place? The Revenants, after all, were of his make now regardless of what they had been while living. It was tenuous thread, to be sure, but given that my opponent was perhaps the finest sorcerer to ever grace Calernia and had more than ten centuries of experience on me in Namelore even that fine thread might be enough. Given the largely unprecedented nature of what I sought to accomplish tonight, there was still much that I did not and perhaps could not know about it. Or is that your trick within the trick, Neshamah? I suddenly thought While I go in circles pondering of stories and deep schemes, you use it as shell to strike a more precise blow. Was he offering me a pair of crowns so I would sour on the use of them out of fear, and so force a loss? The right to rule of one of three would be gone, if so: Tyrant, Pilgrim or Queen. Any of them would result in an opponent of the Dead King losing a measure of earthly influence.

"We cannot withdraw," the Grey Pilgrim bluntly said. "It would mean the death of three great hosts, and possibly of Iserre itself."

"Getting afraid, Foundling?" Laurence nastily grinned.

Her, I ignored. We were no longer fighting, which meant she'd gone from massively useful to at least something of a pest and possibly a liability. The Peregrine I needed to keep his eyes on the prize, though, so to him I replied.

"I'm not suggesting withdrawal," I said. "But the Hidden Horror has a game afoot, let's all take a moment to acknowledge that. There's too many coincidences beginning to pile up."

Tariq was no youngblood, but that had advantages as well as the opposite. His eyes sharpened.

"The Revenant you fought before," he said, and it was not a question.

"Revenants," I corrected, flicking a glance at the other mangled corpse.

The old man's face went stiff. Though not, I understood when he began speaking again, for the reasons I'd expected.

"He must hold you in high esteem," the Grey Pilgrim blandly said, "for having assumed from inception that it would be your arrangements that would win out and lead us here."

Yeah, now was not even remotely the time for that. The oddly cordial relationship I had with the foremost monster in Calernian history was not a matter I intended on discussing here – with Tariq, ever – so I put down my foot as firmly as I could on this before it could lead anywhere.

"Or, more likely, he planned for every eventuality and we're simply seeing the contingencies related to my intentions," I said. "You'll remember that the Tyrant has been feeding him everyone's secrets for months now – the Dead King's not the kind of creature to have only one string to his bow."

"And how are we to be sure, Damned, that you're not one of those strings?" the Saint said.

"You sure you didn't speak with him?" I mused, forcing my lips to stretch into a friendly smile. "Because starting a fight within the band seems like exactly the kind of thing a villain would manipulate someone like you into."

The old woman's face blanked, the tightening of her features pressing the creases together in a way that made them look like some surreal mask of flesh for a moment. The loathing she glared at me with was bright and burning. I cared little for it, though, since the reminder that by turning on me she might just be advancing the Dead King's schemes was enough to have her fingers leaving the pommel of her now-sheathed sword. A little heavy-handed, as far as handlings went, but I suspected anything too subtle would be lost on the likes of Laurence de Montfort.

"What is it that you suggest, then?" the Pilgrim calmly asked.

"I'm going to be taking those," I said, flicking a hand at the two broke Revenants. "In case they might be of use. But the identity of the third Revenant we encounter will tell us how we need to approach the end of our journey."

"You have met others, then," Tariq said.

I had. Two more, to be exact. The nightmare that was a Horned Lord with oracular insights, the creature known as the Skein. And one I had not fought at all, and would rather not: a man who'd once been the Good King of Callow, Edward Fairfax the Seventh. If it was the former that was waiting on our path to the Ducal Palace, then Neshamah's game remained opaque to me. If it was the latter, though? It'd make three crowns that had been set in my way, increasingly obvious ones. It was an almost insultingly blatant bait, which while shedding no light on what decision should be taken at least would make it clear what the crux of the snare was. Assuming, of course, that this was not all governed by whim and the third Revenant wouldn't either be one I'd never before encountered. Or that there would be no third at all.

"It should be either a rat or a king," I said. "The rat means we're in trouble. The king means dice might need to be rolled."

"A rat," the Saint slowly said. "Do you mean..."

"Yes," I interrupted. "Like that one you fought."

"You've fought one of their kind before?" the old woman said, eyes considering.

"I survived it, with the help of others," I retorted. "Still on the fence as to if whether where we are right now will make it more or less dangerous."

There was no Threefold Reflection to spin us around with here, but the Skein wouldn't be confined to a single room either. It'd had a lot more room to manoeuvre, and freedom in choosing when and where to strike. Given that oracles were agonizingly difficult to deal with even when they weren't also massive more or less indestructible murder rats, it was not promising grounds either way. I was rather hoping for King Edward even if that path involved the dice having another go. Shit, if it was the Skein then had we been anticipated every step of the way? No, I decided. I knew for a fact that Choirs could affect those sorts of things, and the Pilgrim was sworn to one. Sve Noc would obscure me to most things unless they wished it otherwise, including possibly the Skein's weakened remnants of a Name, and there was also the very madman that Kairos had been using as a shield this entire campaign: the Hierarch. No, it shouldn't be possible for the Skein to have followed the entire thread flawlessly given that much interference. It should still have been able to glimpse possibilities, though, which would be dangerous enough on its own.

"The rat has something in common with Cordelia's cousin," I delicately said, glancing at Tariq.

The old man's lips tightened, and he offered me a nod.

"I suspect the both of us will hinder that," he said. "Though not half as much as Laurence does simply by being who she is."

I raised a skeptical eyebrow.

"What does she do?" I said. "Cut the future?"

Gods, I immediately thought, please don't let her cut the future. She was already ridiculously difficult to handle.

"Winter was predictable," the Peregrine said, "but never, I believe, predicted."

My brow rose further up, and I glanced at the Saint – who seemed displeased we were trading information to her. I couldn't honestly blame her for that, since a handful of secrets was often the difference between Named beating all odds or being buried. The Peregrine seemed to be implying that since Laurence had made herself into a domain, more or less, then trying to predict her was the equivalent of having tried to predict my own domain back in the day. So, the Saint would muddle predictions simply by being involved in them. Useful, that, and it went some way in explaining why no one had been able to spring an ambush on her over the years. The Heavens really had shaped a fine executioner, hadn't they? No one would see the Saint of Swords coming until she was there and by then it would be much, much too late.

"Understood," I said. "If the two of you would keep an eye out, I'll clean up these loose ends."

I dipped my head at the Revenant remains. The Pilgrim's face flickered with hesitation until he spoke up.

"Your Majesty," he cautiously said, "you do not intend to eat them, do you?"

I choked.

"Do I –"

What?

"No, I'm not going to eat the fucking corpses," I hissed. "Why would you even ask that?"

"Drow are known to take from the dead in some manner," the old man said. "And you are closely allied with orcs and goblins, whose habits are well-documented."

"Corpse-eating isn't how the Firstborn do it," I grunted. "And for the Clans it's actually a pretty complicated issue that's been shaped by generations of – you know what, now's not the time."

"The goblins?" Laurence de Montfort asked.

She seemed honestly curious, though that didn't mean she wasn't also being kind of a prick.

"Goblins will eat anything, Saint," I tiredly said. "It's not like corpses are miraculously excluded from that just because it's distasteful to think about."

'Distasteful' was never a word you wanted to speak when discussing that particular subject, as it happened, if Robber was around. He would be very swift to inform anyone fool enough to do so that human corpses were actually very savory even without being cooked first. And that in Ater you could get that sort of meat rather on the cheap if you knew where to look, from grave-peddlers whose corpses had not been bought by necromancer and were starting to ripen. There was a reason that Black had told me never to buy grilled meat off a stall in the streets of Ater if you hadn't seen the animal it came from killed and cooked, and it wasn't just because it was a possible avenue for assassination. Unwilling to participate in that wreck of a conversation any longer, I hobbled my way to the nearest corpse – the Spellblade's – and knelt. Its flesh felt strange to my touch, not like a human's at all. Rougher, almost like bark, though I had no notion of whether that was a consequence of elvishness or of being made a Revenant. Regardless, even a glancing touch was enough to tell me there was nothing salvageable in there: none of the three aspects there'd been were in a state to be taken. The one Saint had severed was a ruin, and when I'd used Ban on the undead's own third it had shattered the former and faded the latter beyond use. Fair enough, I thought. Given that I'd already taken from him once, I wouldn't have been able to anyway.

The head and leg that'd been cut off I put back in place, though mending those wounds was beyond me save in the most gruesome of ways. I wove Night in a pall over the elf's still form, and as the veil of darkness thinned and dispersed so the sight of the body disappeared was revealed. I leaned on my staff to rise, feeling the Pilgrim's patient gaze and the Saint's belligerent one. The heroine idly strolled up to me as I headed towards the remains of the Thief of Stars.

"Melted it, did you?" she said. "Useful knack."

It was difficult for her to seem as casual as she clearly thought she was being when she was clearly itching to get at me. I almost looked at Tariq – was this some misguided attempt to insert a little cordiality into this relationship? Go on, Laurence, go up to the Black Queen and say something nice about her wicked and blasphemous powers.

"I'm keeping them in the Night," I said. "Matters of burial can be addressed when this is all over."

"So it's a pocket trick, like a sorcerer," the Saint unpleasantly smiled. "Like I thought. So why, Foundling, did you make the Rogue Sorcerer carry your crowns?"

Because I needed bait for Kairos, juicy enough to ensure it was the Sorcerer he struck at, I thought. Because the only way I'm getting my father's soul back from you people without a fight is if I do not, in fact, get it back from you people. So I let out a little noise of surprise, and smiled all regretful and dim at the Saint of Swords. Eyes a little wide, like I was a touch slow but all harmless.

"Oh Hells," I ruefully said. "It completely slipped my mind."

"You're up to something, Foundling," Laurence de Montfort quietly said. "And I won't let you get away with it."

"Right now," I said, coming by the mangled halves of the second Revenant, "what I'm up to is having my time wasted. Walk it off, Saint."

I flicked a dismissive hand at her, which from the way she went red in the cheeks was more insult than anyone had tossed her way in a long time. Gods, if they'd had Black around her for weeks or months they must have kept him gagged the whole time: given the ease of her temper and how viciously he could spin a sentence, if they hadn't the body I'd claimed would have fewer limbs. Another painful crouch and ah, it seemed that the feel of the other one's skin had been on account of elvishness after all. The Thief of Stars's flesh was like a fresh corpse's, which was rather uncomfortable to think about so I did not linger over it. Her I could still take from, I found. One of the aspects tasted like... flight, cold and in the dark. The starlit one? Hard to tell, my senses in this were hardly exact. The second I studied tasted familiar, and I immediately judged it to be what she'd called on in her attempt to use my staff. It felt like the last piece of a jigsaw puzzle clicking together, though there was something else. Rarity? Some sort of limit, I thought, though given the way I made of aspects artefacts with a single use that didn't particularly matter to me. Still, if it was like I suspected and this was a trick that allowed one to use most anything then it didn't particularly appeal to me. Boots scuffed the ground at my side, but I bit my tongue at the last moment when I caught a glimpse of them and saw it was not the Saint who'd returned but the Pilgrim.

"She wasn't always like that," the old man quietly said.

Oh, were we going to have that talk now, under cover my seeing to the body of a fallen foe? I wasn't interested in being sympathetic to the Saint of Swords, so he was barking up the wrong tree. What Laurence de Montfort might once have been weighed less on the scales than what she now was, and that was trouble. The third aspect, I found, had been ripped out. And the... fabric around it had been almost burned, for lack of better term, perhaps to ensure that not even a speck of what had been there before remained. Interesting, I thought. Neshamah's work? That implied a much greater degree of control over how Revenants became what they were than I'd assumed he had. And, more intriguingly, that whatever that aspect of the Thief's had been he'd judged it trouble enough he'd cut it out before making her into one of his undead. That aside, my remaining choice was being the aspect that tasted of running away and the one that felt like well-placed hands. You can never have too many ways to leg it, I decided, and took the first. I leaned forward, allowing my cloak to drape over me and hide the sight of the small carved wishbone the aspect had taken the shape of from the Pilgrim even as I palmed it. My other hand moved to distract him, pulling down a veil of Night over the broken body.

"If you insist on having this conversation," I said, "let's have it on the move. I'm done here."

Stormblessed

Booooo! I want that conversation! What a chapter end tease! To me, this is more of a cliffhanger than almost every other chapter this book.

Big Brother

If this is a reference to something, I'm missing it.

SilentWatcher

Why not harvest their experiences? 1000 Year old Elf Revenant fighting experience would have been great. Cant she harvest them or did she chose not to?

werafdsaew

This is not an RPG. If she didn't harvest something, then she probably can't, especially since the text never made it clear what can or cannot be harvested.

erebus42

They did mention that the Drow can harvest knowledge from non-Drow corpses and "grow" the night.

werafdsaew

That's just one way to interpret the text; there are others.

Qwormuli

But that is because, IIRC, the actual knowledge is already tied into the night, so it comes with partaking in it. That is a corpse without a massacre ritual carved into it.

Rook

I'd bet the text is intentionally vague for things like that. This is, at the end of the day, a genre-savvy web serial where one of the main selling points is subverting many worn-out fantasy tropes or at least using them in unexpected ways.

The tricks she can use are allowed to be flexible enough that the story can concentrate on its major premises, but for that same reason it'll never allow for any story-breaking powerups.

Dragrath

To take into the night that which is owned by the Hidden Horror is to invite the hidden horror inside. I doubt any amount of experience and power able to be gained from those revenants could be worth that risk...

Mental Mouse

A wishbone is also the fulcrum for a pair of wings.

danh3107

Thanks for the birthday present erratic, it's not as good as an aspect wishbone, but it's pretty great.

Hierus

So perhaps the dead king can create artefacts too?

byzantine279

Possibly. But I suspect that aspect was related to Freedom in some way. Something that would allow the Revenant to escape his control, which he cannot ever allow.

stevenneiman

It could also have been something to assess a mark, which he was worried Cat would be able to use to see through whatever his scheme is. It might also have been something which would allow her to successfully steal the staff. It was pretty obvious that the revenants he threw at them were going to die, so he would be easily willing to reduce the effectiveness of one of them in exchange for removing a confounding variable from this specific scheme.

nick012000

The Dead King took the Aspect from her before he turned her into a Revenant. That would have been years before the story started; probably before Cat was even born. There's no way he did it just to spite Cat.

I'm guessing the "aspect was probably related to Freedom" guess was the correct one, myself.

Decius

Liberate seems like a good bet.

Liliet

That's my guess too.

Escape, or Slip Away, or something like that 😊

stevenneiman

Cat seems to think that it was removed before, but I wouldn't trust her to be able to tell if Neshamah had removed the Aspect earlier and didn't want to let her tell.

Andrew Mitchell

That makes a lot of sense.

Someguy

I think Dead Dude makes sure to rot the 3rd Aspects to break any possibility of a Cycle of 3 that can be pointed his way.

Qwormuli

Three aspects shouldn't have any direct correlation to a cycle of three, nor do the amount of limbs in a body, that are not the left leg.

Okay, this might be too snarky(no direct offence, Someguy) and I might even be wrong, but goddamnit I'm getting tired of the cycle of three being invented as the reason and motive to every, single, thing, that could or would happen.

antoninjohn

I wonder have pissed the Saint is going to be when the Good King is all great job Queen Catherine against those Procens despite being a Hero

naturalnuke

Heheheh

Someguy

That'd be perfect.

stevenneiman

The Saint seems like someone who's very effective at what she's good for but is increasingly the wrong tool for the job in the world as it is now. She only has any real idea how to deal with one sort of villain, the sort who can pretend to be decent people convincingly enough but do so as a pure ruse. She doesn't understand the clever and shameless modern Wastelanders or a genuinely benevolent villain like Cat, and the price of getting so good at dealing with one kind of villain was that she had to make her mind to rigid to adapt to new realities.

Rook

Honestly have to disagree about the wastelander villains. Akua wasn't exactly small beans, and Malicia wasn't exactly an innocent little angel in enabling her. We also know for a fact that Warlock is pretty much an old school Villain that was kept in check by his own desires as well as being tied to Black.

The Saint, nasty piece of work that she is, would've done a hell of a lot of good (capital or lowercase g) if she'd been around the east in the earlier volumes. Second Liesse probably would've been three chapters long, with Liesse not becoming a giant graveyard and the Saint unceremoniously beheading Akua & co.

talenel

But she wasn't there, was she? That's the kind of machinations that Praesi villains are good at. Controlling what is happening. Malicia and the Calamities have been around for quite a long time for villains, yet Pilgrim and Saint never got over to Callow/Praes for a reason.

Rook

If by "Praesi Villains" you mean only Malicia and Black, who are a once-in-several-centuries exception from the norm, sure?

As for literally every other Praesi villain that has existed since the dawn of the empire in Triumphant's time, they've all managed to control the situation into abject ruin. They're the exact kind of blight that headsman like the Saint were made to put down.

It makes very little sense to act like Black and Malicia are the norm for eastern villainy, any more than it makes sense to act like the Pilgrim is the norm for western heroics. We all know that the majority of Villains are Akua-esque pests the same way that the majority of Heroes are William-esque idiots.

talenel

I include Akua as well. Akua was the main villain of Liesse. While you can certainly say that Malicia helped enable her, she also did quite a bit of work to get her schemes to succeed and stay hidden.

Furthermore, in regards to Malicia, while she has been influenced by Black, I wouldn't say she's the most paradigm-shifting Praesi. A lot of her behavior and plans seem much closer to traditional Prasi villainy. I would even argue that without Black that's exactly who she would be. Taken to it utmost in terms of treachery and skillful manipulation, and without some of the crazed quirks of other Dread Emperors, but very much a Praesi villain. Remember, when it came down to it, she believed that a flying super fortress of doom is what Praes needed.

While I don't disagree that certain archetypes of Praesi villainy would probably be easy prey for Saint (Wekesa comes to my mind), Saint doesn't do well with the sort of subtlety of other Praesi archetypes.

Rook

I don't know, I feel like the subtle or politically clever type of villains are the perfect prey for the Saint. She's the kind of bulldozer that will cut a straight line through every machination and turn a deaf ear to attempts to sway her. She exists to essentially ignore all their strengths and strike at their weaknesses.

I think kind that the Saint is ill-equipped for are rather the metagaming type (Catherine, Black, Tyrant, etc...), or Villains that are outright powerful enough to outmatch her (Ranger, the Forever King)

It's probably why the Saint and the Pilgrim have a history in the first place. The Pilgrim is lacking in brute force but is narratively savvy and has the role of a helper to boot. The Saint is nearly unstoppable in a brawl but doesn't appear to have the same awareness for stories that the Pilgrim does.

Caerulea

"The pilgrim is lacking in brute force..."

What? No he is not. He is one of the most powerful named on the continent. Beating the aspect of a dead elf after he turned night into day?

Rook

He's quite weak in brute force for a Hero of his weight class, he's a helper that occasionally becomes more effective when there's someone to help.

It pretty much exhausted him to throw out a single spell that the Warlock and Witch both threw around like common pebbles in their fight. A REAL brawler like the Saint can cut through wards strong enough to contain demons without even bothering to use an aspect.

If all he had were his light shows he'd barely be a second rate Hero. He's 'powerful' because he's well suited to craft narratives that will cause creation to tip the scales or pile on coincidences to make him the victor.

Liliet

" the same way that the majority of Heroes are William-esque idiots."

Erratic has actually specifically pointed out that William is a major exception to the rule in his own way, which is why Catherine wasn't able to properly predict him.

If you want an average hero, imho you should look to Hanno and his band. I suspect that's half the reason they were given so much focus: to show us what typical looks like.

Agent J

Do we? Do we know that? What was Terribilis II, but a liberator for his people, choking under the tyranny of Western Crusader States?

And Triumphant herself was certainly no 'pest'. She dominated the continent splendidly and skillfully.

And if I had to bet on Akua or Laurence, I'd bet Akua. Akua and Pilgrim? Probably Pilgrim. But Laurence is too dumb by half.

Rook

Yeah we do know it for a fact. On account of even the Below side of the line agreeing that they're godsdamned awful. Black and the Calamities made a career out of exterminating pests like Terriblis. Praes follows mention of even Triumphant's name with "May she never return". She's literally famous for irreparably damaging the fabric of Creation.

Praes.

PRAES. The nation whose core cultural values all revolve around murdering each other.

If you're so intent on trying to win an argument that you try to twist the dread emperors and empresses as 'not so bad', and then fail at it as the best you can come up with to justify them is saying they were "splendid and skillful", that really says everything that needs to be said.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, Diabolist was exactly the kind of enemy she is designed to kill 😊

Liliet

Agreed.

Shveiran

Akua, sure. But the others...

Malicia may have crossed the boundary between “necessary evil” and “existential threat” in her quest for a nuclear deterrent, but the fact remains she was a juggler balancing three dozens pots on the verge of the boiling point. I see her early treaties as a sign she was determined to establish sustainable relationship with foreign powers, and that it was the refusal of the good nations, precisely on the grounds of “Evil is Evil” that pushed her to seek out more extreme measures.

Sure, Malicia is evil, but she is not a tyrant of the old breed. She may have tries to destroy Procer, but messing with a foreign state for the gains of their own country is not something any ruler of the Guideverse, good or otherwise, is refraining from doing.

Though they are different characters, there are strong similarities between her arc and Cat: she would not have gone to such extremes if all other directions had not been crossed off by her enemies.

I feel like Saint’s M0 is not a solution, but a cause. If you leave someone no option but total war and extermination of the loser, that someone is going to escalate as much as needed to win the conflict. And sure, we can condemn the extremes someone reaches and say they should have just surrendered and met their fate rather than risk endangering the fabric of creation, but that is an harsh choice to face. When you are faced with extinction, a lot of things begin to sound reasonable.

As for Warlock, all he wanted was to study and enjoy his pleasures.

We know that was not common for Warlocks of old; Akua mentions in Book 3 that the name is meant to reach ever deeper, to build wanders, to craft miracles just to prove you can. Warlock was evil, disturbing and cruel. But he was not a scourge on creation. When not in a war, I doubt he caused more loss of lives than your average corrupt noble whose ineptitude leaves poor families to starve. And if you focus on his war crimes, we come back to the point I made above: slay the monster is a fine rallying cry, but you should factor in that if the monster feel threatened, he is going to lash out. And maybe you should be spending that energy fixing smaller problems that cause more damage, rather than risk an escalation that is not really warranted by the current damage.

Saint was a perfect match for Emperors or warlocks of old, and still is for someone like the Tyrant. They are a source of grief that will keep getting worse if you let them off the hook.

Warlock and the Empress though? I am not convinced.

Rook

You can't just wave away or excuse the awful things Malicia did because she was having a hard time negotiating. That's not a justification. Catherine had quite a bit of trouble with Cordelia and the crusade too, but even while young and inexperienced she quite easily avoided the "minor" slippery slope of intentionally creating a weapon that could end all life on the continent.

As for the Heroes and 'good' nations not being cooperative? Even Malicia wasn't stubborn enough to blame them for it. She herself laid the blame for that squarely on the previous madmen in the tower, having burned all bridges so thoroughly over hundreds of years that even her level of political acumen couldn't provide a short term solution. Praes has been a source of Stupid Evil villainy for tens of generations; you can't blame everyone else for not sticking their hand into that dumpster fire just because someone assures you that this particular one isn't hot, even though all the fires in the past – without exception – have been.

Warlock? Still waters was Warlock's own creation. And the fact that he didn't have a particular vendetta against anyone doesn't change the fact that he had an utter disregard for human life, his experiments were often horrific, and often provided results that could permanently scar the face of the continent.

As interesting as their characters are, at the end of the day most of the Calamities are definitely evil, in both the capital and lowercase E sense. The things they do on a routine basis would cause a common criminal to be instantly hanged with no sympathy, they shouldn't get a pass just because they're witty and have more power.

The Saint IS fully justified in wanting to behead them all, although it would make for a very poor story to read if she were allowed to do so. The fact that neither she nor the Pilgrim are perfect doesn't change the moralistic grounds, and the fact that the Heroes are the antagonists in the story doesn't automatically make every action and intention on their end foolish nonsense.

Shveiran

You argue that Malicia and the Calamities are evil, capitalization or no. I agree. Full stop.

You argue that the Saint is justified in her attitude. And you know, for a certain degree of "justified", I can agree with you there too.

What I am saying is simply that as soon as one side chooses "no compromise with the other side ever, only extermination", you create the monsters you wish to vanquish.

This has nothing to do with the fact that they are likable as characters.

If peace is not an option, no matter the compromise put on the table, can you expect the other side not to be willing to step ever lower, especially if your threat grow more dire? Military escalation or captulation are the only possibilities.

Cat went to Keter willing to let out the DK, for all her contingencies and the fact that in the end it was Malicia that got the deal; and she was willing to take that step, fully aware of how likely she was to be tricked by the Uber Villain, because she had no other choice.

My point is not that Cordelia or Pilgrim were soulless idiots to have that stance; my point is that as soon as you leave the other guy no option but to be a monster or die, you share the blame for what that person feels pushed to do because of that.

Rook

The point is fair, but the premise behind it I still disagree with. The implication with your argument is that even Villains like Malicia or Warlock are only "villain" or "evil" because they were pushed into it by Good. For many villains, including Malicia and Warlock, that's not remotely true. Even if it were, it doesn't resolve them of responsibility for their actions, it just makes them half a tragedy instead of fully a horror show.

There often are other choices than "be a monster or die". They're just harder, and it's easier to pretend they don't exist if you didn't take that road to push responsibility away. Now, that doesn't change the fact that their circumstances aren't fair. They're not. It doesn't change the fact that not being extraordinary enough to take the harder road is fully understandable, most anyone would turn out similar. But it doesn't absolve them of responsibility for or consequences of their actions.

The Heroes don't shoulder ANY of the blame for the Villains actions either, any more than a cop shoulders the blame for the crimes of someone they arrest. Not helping them more when they were young was a failing of the Heroes that makes them imperfect, but it's not as if the Pilgrim or the Saint created the circumstances that birthed Villains like the Warlock or Malicia, and it's not as if they can just turn a blind eye to everything they do because it's understandable or possible to empathize with.

Understandable is not the same thing as innocent.

Agent J

Catherine had quite a bit of trouble with Cordelia and the crusade too, but even while young and inexperienced she quite easily avoided the "minor" slippery slope of intentionally creating a weapon that could end all life on the continent.

False. Catherine accepted the Doomsday Device by Malicia's reasoning and also battled her for the right to make treaty with the Hidden Horror, thereby ushering in the Zombie Apocalypse.

Someguy

Saint is at her core the blade of a Guillotine no matter how she Decree herself a sword. I think Kairos is setting her up to become Heirach's attack dog.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is impossible. Saint is a hero, and stubbornly on the side of Good. Hierarch is a Villain, willing to put a Choir on trial. She will more likely try to kill him.

And I don't think a sword can be influenced by the Aspect of the Hierarch based on revolting. Furthermore, he will not be able to see her come.

She seems to be perfectly adapted to kill him, what a coincidence...

Mental Mouse

> I don't think a sword can be influenced by the Aspect of the Hierarch based on revolting.

A sword does not act on its own; it is wielded by someone else. Saint does describe having adventures on her own long ago, but as Pilgrim comments, "she wasn't always like this". In the Guide, she's been way too easy to manipulate even allowing for Cat's skill.

konstantinvoncarstein

That she can be manipulated by classical means is a given. But I speak only of the "revolting field" of the Hierarch.

1224

I hope we get more of Kind Edward. The skien is cool for a fight, but the former King of Callow seems to have a bit more character to him.

1224

*king

Rook

Part of the trap might actually be the idea that it has to be either or, rather than both. As scary as the Skein is, Edward is the one with enough weight in Cats story to potentially do serious damage to her.

I'm thinking the Skein will be sent out just to provide an opening before Edward is used as the real dagger, to narratively wound Catherine right after (or during) that harrowing ordeal, when they're exhausted and weak.

naturalnuke

Ooo, perhaps taking her right to rule before she can do whatever wizardry-nonsense makes a god?

talenel

This is kinda what I'm thinking. Something like what Akua tried with the name of Squire, except with the role of Ruler of Callow.

KageLupus

Or, and hear me out here, the next fight is going to be King Edward riding around on the Skein.

"Onwards, my mighty rat-steed!"

Liliet

Yes.

Mental Mouse

Skein: "Rat-steed?! Ride my antlers, monkey-boy!"

Soma

I'm looking to more cross cultural fun time with the heroes. The halfway civil conversations are always the best ones. Moments like 'you gonna eat that corpse?' are so precious.

Liliet

I love how Catheirne explained the goblins: "they eat everything and corpses aren't an exception"

Rook

I want to see it as harmless curiosity but can't help but wonder if it's the Pilgrim setting up a narrative on his end.

Has Tariq ever addressed Catherine as 'your majesty ' before? Who the one crown will be is still up in the air, and that kind of ridiculous question would be a pretty good way to distract from a narrative prompt.

carrier

Since when / how does cat make artifacts from corpse aspects?

Tibstrike

Since she became the Night Pope. It's the Secret Harvesting part of Night.

Her ability to harvest aspects is a blend of Take, Winter crystalization, Night Harvesting, and soul knowledge from Akua.

Rook

Sve Noc is very convenient as a setting device that way. You could technically give Cat the ability to do, well, anything; and explain it away with millenniums of expertise in murder magic from the crows.

Liliet

Yep, Cat's basically got a bottomless bag of tricks, she just has a limited mana pool to power them with...

...by day.

Morgenstern

Since having had Winter. She first started making trinkets out of aspects of fallen foes (or rather her being able to do so was revealed) in one of the chapters about how she had to stop a lot of heroes coming into and trying to make a mess in Callow since her takeover as ruler there.

caoimhinh

Last chapter she said that this is a use of the Night.

However, she used Winter for doing the same with Akua's Diabolist Aspect 'Call' in Book 3. It turned into a whistle and Cat used it to summon the Wild Hunt in Keter to save Vivienne in Book 4.

Mental Mouse

I still think that this is fundamentally Cat's own power, expressed through whatever power base she's using at the moment.

Micke

She took Rise from the Lone Swordsman as the Squire.

Mental Mouse

Indeed.

It may well be that when she claimed her resurrection from the angels, she also set a pattern deeper than any Name or lesser god.

caoimhinh

Above: She took from the Angels! Well, our team can't be seen as a lesser thing, so from now on, she can take from any creature of that level of power and below!

Below: Watches their new piece getting OP Alright, and she will do it even if she needs to borrow external powers.

Above: But to do it, she has to feel pain or otherwise feel uncomfortable!

Below: Shrugs Whatever, dude. No pain, no gain.

Above: And she has to give monologues!

Below: Don't you fucking dare.

Above: Meh, worth the shot. So we got a deal?
Below: Deal.

And thus the groove on Fate was made and Cat story as a Taker from Creation and beyond was settled. 😊

Liliet

I'd say it's Cat's favorite trick that she then manages to recreate from whatever power base she has at the moment.

Note that the tactical power-stealing level is a pale reflection of what she does strategically. "One always loses more in a bargain with fae than they gain" "then it's a good thing I stole so much of their shit"; "hmmm there's a brilliant tactician who is definitely 100% better than me... how do I recruit her?"; the fucking angel corpse being used for resurrecting herself; drawing both Ranker and Kegan into her own campaign as a means of deescalating matters between them; recruiting an ex-hero into her own band...

"She will use what she cannot break and break what she cannot use" (c) don't remember who

Mental Mouse

> "One always loses more in a bargain with fae than they gain" "then it's a good thing I stole so much of their shit"

LOL!

Liliet

Catherine's friendship with Juniper is precious and important 😊😊😊

Darkening

She could do it as Winter Cat too, she used one of Diabolist's aspects to summon the wild hunt to Keter. Still wondering what the hell happened to the ones she took from all the heroes during the time skip, but maybe sve noc ate all those with winter or something.

Liliet

Maybe she didn't take those, or used them up immediately? They were all single use.

Morgenstern

Hmm... or he just cut the third one out recently, because it would've been too much trouble if Cat got her hands on it, not when he first made a revenant out of the Thief of Stars.

carrier

Thought about that, but does he know that she can make artifacts out of aspects?

Andrew Mitchell

Almost certainly. If Masego knows, then so does the Dead King.

sengachi

If nothing else, he's familiar with the Drow's Night and knows it can be used to take power from the defeated, and knows Cat now uses Night.

Morgenstern

The "Next" link to this chapter here is missing at the last chapter before this one, EE. (Thankfully, the link was there in the border chapter list, though.)

Morgenstern

Scrap that about "Next" missing – seems to have been some individual browser trouble. When I skipped back to add it in that chapter where it's missing, too, it now was there after all.

IDKWhoitis

I'm betting on Skein then King, with meeting Kairos and/or Sorcerer at the end of battle with Skein.

Mental Mouse

I'd guess that the missing party members were captured by Skein.

Javvies

Huh.

Interesting. Also, Saint is very inflexible.

On the one hand, I want to see more of King Edward. On the other, I don't want Cat to have to kill him.

On the flip side, Skein would be a hell of a fight. And they just had one and are definitely going to have at least one more, not counting betrayals/ infighting.

Traitorous

Speaking of betrayals and and infighting, where is Kairos?

caoimhinh

Cat implied that Kairos might be aiming at Rogue Sorcerer, so Cat could steal the crowns and Amadeus' soul from Kairos and avoid a diplomatic issue if she stole it from the Heroes.

Kissaten

Maybe revenantization requires butchered Name. How easily, remember, Cat managed to get zombified after William killed her. Apart from somehow being connected to zombies in her Name Vision she is also called lucky by Neshamah. Maybe she just almost heroically stumbled upon the truth of making revenants, and she is being herded towards being eighth crown herself

Taelel

I can't help but feel that Traitorous wrote the 200 heroic axioms...

erebus42

That would be hilarious. Almost as hilarious as if he had disguised himself as a Hero and joined a Heroic band bent on bringing him down all Ainz Ooal Gown/Momon style

Liliet

Let's be real, he did that at least once.

Digitize27

It seems improbable that Neshamah knows of her ability to re-forge aspects into artifacts, but aside from the suggestion that the Thief of Stars' third aspect was removed because it may have given her a chance of escaping his necromancy, it also seems possible that Neshamah wants Cat to take an aspect, but thought the Thief's third would have been an advantage, rather than a trap.

Liliet

It seems EXTREMELY probable to me that Neshamah knows that.

– one of her Aspects having been Take is common knowledge, or if not quite common Malicia would definitely know and I'm fairly certain she fed Neshamah info on her;

– Catherine literally used the Call whistle – one she'd made out of Akua's Aspect – IN KETER. What point do you think Neshamah had for organizing that whole showdown if not getting a good read on her capabilities?

– Night is ABOUT stealing power. Even without the above Catherine was extremely likely to end up with tricks relating to it.

So... even in the absence of hard knowledge, even if he can't plumb Masego's mind for all the info it has, it makes no sense that he wouldn't GUESS.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

If Masego knew, then Neshamah knows.

Darkening

Well, that's two revenants with only 2 living aspects. If we get a third, I'm prepared to declare that a rule of making revenants. Should be interesting to see who we get, the skein was a fun fight, and Saint's history with the rats would probably come up a bit which could be interesting, but seeing the King sounds like it'd be a great scene. I mean, his name by definition is his right to rule, hard to get more obvious a crown than that. I doubt Cat will be willing to use any revenant's crown for this, but the temptation should be interesting.

Dimensional

So. Musing on the natures of the various Stories and patterns that seem to be converging here.

1. Seven crowns and One. obviously Important and the 'One' Crown is the Pivot that swings the whole thing – All parties seem to be trying to influence this one.
2. Heroic band confronts a new/old Evil – Cat, Pilgrim, Saint and co. theoretically aimed at Larat post seven crowns, but also at Dead King/Masego? who is betraying who and who they end up in 'Final' Showdown also affect pretty much everything.
3. Hero allies with their enemies to bargain for her father/mentor's soul. Cat's end game involves getting Black's Soul back – Depending on how Cat manages to frame this may protect her from retaliation.
4. – This is Cat's third trip to This city, each time previously she lost, then managed to turn that to victory and 'gain' some sort of apotheosis (Died/ resurrected, Bound/ Winter unfettered). Is this a pattern? and if so can it be manipulated?
5. The other band of 5. Cat's Here, Archer is looking for Masego (and thus i'm assuming is here somehow and somewhere, If Adjutant and Vivienne sneak in somehow – you have a second band of 5 – and a story where 4 come together to restore their friend who has been captured.

Any others?

konstantinvoncarstein

Vivienne is no more the Thief. Personally, I want to know where Hierarch is, and what he is up to.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, I can't wait to see what happens when the Hierarch reappears.

Also, why haven't we seen or heard from the Wandering Bard for so long? Her absence troubles me.

Mental Mouse

The Wandering Bard already poked DK, and Cat's band would just chase her off.

raimn

Well the Hierarch fed her over pretty good when he went to court with her so she probably can't or won't come close to him as it might endanger her name. I think she had her hands or a finger in the Saint pushing Cordelia during the conclave thing and Cordelia going fishing for whatever is in that lake kind of has her fingerprints all over it. At least that what it feels like to me as she should be able to influence Cordelias cousin in her current role as "messenger" from Above.

Mental Mouse

Indeed, Vivienne is no more the Thief. Now she's the heir-designate to Callow. Wouldn't it annoy Pilgrim if she supplies the eighth crown? Cat would still have Abigail as backup heir, and Viv could still be Abigail's (lower-case) chancellor.

konstantinvoncarstein

I think Catherine will provide the eighth crown. Vivienne is her best possible successor. Abigail is not suited to reign, even if she could make a good general.

Mental Mouse

Probably, I just liked imagining Pilgrim's response. And Cat is justifiably wary of shortcuts for the last crown – as per the text for this chapter, she knows that the core story is "one of these three shall lose their crown", and if she twists that, DK gets to respond in kind.

Liliet

Not to mention all the political/narrative PR value Cat can get out of a willing sacrifice on that scale.

And the part where Callow is suddenly no longer led by a villain and the Grand Alliance has no valid reasons left to aggress it.

And the part where she breaks the story Tariq is worried about her representing, the “revenge on Good for failing her country” once and for all.

Even beyond all the tactical reasons to do it, strategic benefits Catherine would get out of an abdication are immense.

Of course, then there’s the tactical setback of the army going “excuse me what” and Vivienne having a new problem to handle in that, and the strategic setback if she doesn’t quite manage to.

Mental Mouse

> the army going “excuse me what”

A real concern, but if Cat does physically return, she can directly support Viv to the army.

Also, she could potentially serve as Marshal for a transition period (risky business, but Cat’s used to that). She already set up the Iserre adventure as a pretext for demoting Juniper, and given Cat would be taking a demotion herself, Juniper might not be too unhappy. Or once Black gets reassembled, he could be Marshall, while Cat goes off to take care of the Drow, and “prepare a place” for Sve Noc.

I’ll respond to your other comment once I’m properly caffeinated. 😊

Liliet

Or a new position, like official advisor or hero of the realm or something XD she doesn’t even need a formal capacity as long as she stays around ♥ and happy coffeing!

Mental Mouse

> The other band of 5.

On the flip side, Archer by herself could be a 6th Ranger for the current band. If they pull in the rest of the original band, Viv has really poor survival value in this environment.

diaknia

Woo finally caught up! Friend hooked me on PGtE in mid-April, and what a ride!

I too am hoping she meets Good King Edward the Revenant.

Mental Mouse

> ... that left the three of us masters of the field. And so I was worried.

That's how Cat's story goes. I note that these three are (belatedly) watching their words as if DK might be listening.

Speaking of listening, looks like EE's still reading the comments. 😊

Liliet

Are you, too, falling prey to the "narrative questions heavily built up to have been addressed right after the comment section started discussing them; clearly this means the writer used the comment section as a source, and not built up to it because they intended to write it like this all along" weird reasoning trap?

Mental Mouse

It's a fair question whether he's reading us, or we're "reading" him. ;-), But there have been a lot of chapters where he addresses the specific issues we brought up, usually early in the chapter. That said, in some of those cases, we've basically been covering all the possibilities we could see, and in this one (and some previous chapters), EE also tosses out a few points we hadn't considered.

He's clearly too smart (and/or busy) to actually negotiate the plot with us in the comment section, but I see no problem with the idea of him reading our analyses and taking advantage of them, without being bound thereby.

TeK

I'd put my money on busy. The rate of his typos suggest that he is getting tired. Also bear in mind that this is a beta version, not an actual book, when it comes down to it (EE already mentioned that he prefer no ebook made, since there's planned to be an actual publication). That also explains that, on my memory, he edited only first two books (which coincided with him making more frequent updates) according to the typos found in comments. He also mentioned that he tries to read almost all comments, though answers arguably much rarer and more about some lore and worldbuilding questions, not plot ones.

Liliet

I just keep seeing characters bring up the obvious points they were inevitably supposed to consider, and then everyone goes OOH HE'S REACTING TO US. I don't think Guide sans comment section would lack those musings, and I find myself kind of annoyed with the repeated suggestions it would =x

Shveiran

Agreed.

I find it much more likely that it merely seems EE is reacting to the comments because we comment about the topics each update brings up or build up to. A good writer will try to guess what kind of questions a certain chapter would instill in the reader, and either answer them in the following chapter or "hang a lantern" on it to promise an answer will come in a satisfying spot.

We discuss those points, but my guess is EE has already decided whether or not he'll include a certain item in the following chapter whenever he posts.

Liliet

>A good writer will try to guess what kind of questions a certain chapter would instill in the reader

Not even this.

A good writer MANIPULATES the questions a story raises in the reader, deliberately. A good writer RAISES the questions through their story, BECAUSE they want to answer them later.

It's kind of how foreshadowing actually properly works -

So, like... yeah.

Mental Mouse

Maybe, maybe not. I've done a fair bit of work on various wikis over the years, and I've sometimes been deeply impressed at the power of such collaboration. Even where there's a "primary" editor for a given page, others can bring in key points or fill in neglected details. I've also seen several webcomics where the cartoonist(s) were an active part of their own commenting community, and occasionally did take suggestions or ideas from the comments. I know that the SF author Larry Niven has at least twice responded to fans pointing out issues, by fixing them in later volumes. (The orbital stability of the Ringworld, and the anatomy of his Moties.)

This serial isn't openly interactive, but still, it doesn't emerge from a vacuum. ErraticErrata is an actual person, who shares my own given name. As I write this, he might be working at a day job, sitting at the computer, having a snack, working out at the gym, or anything else people do. He's entirely capable of seeing a comment and thinking "didn't I cover that? Maybe not", or even "hey good idea". Or for that matter "Where is that guy coming from, did they actually read what I wrote?" 😊 By reading the comments, he has the option to pick among the fruits of our creativity and insight, and maybe add some of them to his own.

The fun part about being the author, is that he gets to decide whether and how to respond. Personally, I think he's being smart to keep any in-story responses "deniable", rather than going back and-forth with us in the comments. Because that does leave it open for us to get a sense of collaboration. Whether or not it's actually all in our heads, it's still fun! (And either way, he doesn't have to engage with pestering.)

Liliet

It's just really not fun for me to imagine a world where the questions raised by the narrative that we discuss in the comment were raised by ACCIDENT and not deliberately. It doesn't make sense with how tight erratic's plotting is 0.0

Collaborations in the sense of him fixing what he gets wrong are great and productive, but this is just... 0.0

Mental Mouse

The thing is, "at this level of play" it gets increasingly difficult for one person to really keep track of everything. Steven Brust has said that he's depended on a fan chronology to help keep his world straight, and I doubt he's the only one.

All this gets even trickier when the world mechanics go meta, as with the Guide's "story" as an in-world mechanic; story tradition simply isn't the work of a single person Even the Grimm brothers and Hans Christian Anderson had forebears, and they didn't capture the whole of their mileus either. Looking at how the readers respond to the Story So Far, and what stories they recognize, is just sensible research.

Liliet

Yes, but not in answering the questions that the previous chapter asked.

erebus42

"You do not intend to eat them, do you?"

That one had me laughing. Given what he said about what they know or think they know about her allies and subordinates it wasn't that crazy of a question but it just came out of left field and got me.

Mental Mouse

Also the image of Pilgrim hesitating before "Um...". 😊

Maybe she'll take them home to Robber. World's grossest doggie bag.

TeK

Well, Cat's mrvelously optimistic here. Rat or king? Why not both, and throw some un6known Revenant just to spice things up! And since Hierophant is nearby, why not him too?

Speacking of elves. I do like me some foreshadowing, but anyone else is a little exited/scared for Forever King? I do like me some foreshadowing, but his name was in the summmary from the very beginning, and he is yet to do anything meaningful. I wonder what our Chekhov's elf will do, but from the sheer amount of unexpected twists, I bet we will ally with DK to fight the the army of crazy murderous elves, after they usurp Arcadia or something equally disturbing. I mean I was rereading Keter Ark, and this Liesse/Arcadia was foreshadowed way back when they traveled echo of tge making of Kingdom of dead in Arcadia, and it was mentioned in passing that Liesse will leave the same mark on Arcadia.EE doesn't leave any gun unfired.

So, had DK already captured Archer anyway, or will she come at the last moment, saving the day? Will it finally resolve their ark with Masego? Will Cat finally taste human flesh? Stay tuned and learn all that – and more.

konstantinvoncarstein

I had forgotten the presence of the Forever King in the intro. I think he will see the Dead King weakened, and try his luck. But it will cause problems with the Deoraithe.

TeK

Everyone did. Ain't that suspicious? He is mentioned in a brief number of chapters, and his actual presence in the story amounts to sending two elves to kill Aqua, and later NOPEing out of Creation.

Mental Mouse

The Forever King might be Book VI.

Andrew Mitchell

Now that would be a massive twist.

medailyfun

It's odd Cat needed that clumsy explanation for the crowns carried by Sourcerer when it looked like the obvious show of trust

TeK

Second that. Although it just may be that since Saint would not beleive her a way, she didn't bothered presenting a plausible lie.

TeK

By the way, how many crowns we no have, that are kimda sorta qualofied to be the One?

Cat and Callow; Tariq and Levant; Kairos and Helike; Thief and her constellation; Spellsword and Golden Bloom; would not be suprised if Rogue Sorcerer is some princeling in disguise; Saint is most certainly a nobility, and if she is indeed a reference to Simon de Montfort (older one, not the one who rebelled and installed a constitutional monarchy and reformed the Parlament – now there's the horrifying thought – though both crusaded) she might even be somewhat royal, but taking the name of her not royal parent for example, or being bastard child; there is still a Hierophant nearby – a ruler of League, I wonder who he will react tot he act of reaping of crowns; King Edward the Seventh – Callow; Skein can techincally be considered a figure of influence among Ratlings – insofar as he is to tough to be food and possesses a modicum of intelligence; Balck is here too, both a (former) king of Callow and a claimant to Tower; don't forg6et the Dead King; oh and I think that's about it. Would agree with Hierophant – too much crowns flying around.

Cat giving her own crow will be predictable and expected – too predictable, so I expect EE to pull through again, and give us yet another twist. Doubt it would be anyone from the band either, and it would not be a Black nor a DK, Thief is extremely improbable, elf wouldn't cut it, as wouldn't Skein. Probably it is someone I didn't see coming, like Cat – because I did not expect her since she is to expectable.

Mental Mouse

Well, Cat has commented that going outside the band would be problematic story-wise. As I wrote above:

> she knows that the core story is “one of these three shall lose their crown”, and if she twists that, DK gets to respond in kind.

She really doesn't want to give the Dead King an entry to this story, and any hijinks with the last crown would do so.

Also, some of your options are almost certainly invalid, in two groups:

Saint of Swords, Rogue Sorcerer, Skein, and Thief Of Stars would each require an authorial ass-pull, because they have not previously been cited as royal – and in the first two cases they should have been, at the conclave. (Thankfully, EE isn't prone to pulling stuff out of his ass.)

Black and King Edward VII share a different disqualification: Neither has a right to rule anymore, because each has been replaced by a valid successor! (Come to think of it, the late Spellblade probably would have had a similar problem.) Cat owns that crown now... and she's actually willing to give it up. Her abdication has been teased since before she was officially Queen, she's made appropriate preparations so as not to leave Callow in the lurch, and this is a perfectly good occasion. (It would also be a nice thumb in the eye to Pilgrim, but that's just candy. 😊) About the only drawback is that it would probably scotch Liliet's Queen Under The Mountain idea.

If somebody else pops up to donate a crown, that would actually be an attack on Cat's plans. The Hierophant is the primary contender to pull that stunt, but as I've noted previously, that could be trouble: If the realm is shaped by that final crown, Heirophant's influence would presumably make it hostile to rulers and even commanders. That would be a problem when trying to take armies through it! On the other hand, DK would be fine with that, as it would shut out his enemies, while he's probably strong enough to take whatever the realm throws at him.

Shveiran

Yeah, I think the One will be one of the 3+1 candidates (Cat, Tariq and Kairos, plus possibly Black if the possessed Rogue Sorcerer theory becomes canon).

EE is great with twists, but there has to be some foreshadowing for a twist to feel awesome, and introducing a new option at this point may feel forced. There has been some foreshadowing that RS may be Black-influenced, and we know he is a claimant to the title of Emperor... but him giving up that makes for a very ugly pot in Praes. I don't see anyone but him and possibly Cat dragging Praes away from a return to the Golden Age of Villainy.

Mental Mouse

Remember, Black's consent isn't actually required – whether or not he's influencing RS, he's currently a disembodied soul.

The thing is, if it's Black, he can't take the Tower... but Cat can, which would be the culmination of his plans. Any Drow that stick with her (as opposed to joining the Keter guard) would fit right in, and even help keep the nobles in line.

Liliet

Actually, I'd say you have to pick one: if Cat giving up her crown would scratch the "Queen Under The Mountain" story (note that a story does not need to match up well in all the specific details: Black was never crowned King of Callow, yet the Sword in the Stone story worked), then King Edward, to fulfill this same role through still being thought of as "a king", if one who no longer rules, would still be holding his "crown".

I would say in fact it's possible for both to be true: it's possible that King Edward's claim to 'a crown' is still strong enough to actualize his 'right to rule' into something usable here, AND that Catherine giving up the actual 'right to rule' would not scratch out her narrative role as 'a queen of yore' if she abdicates immediately and at no point rules without having a right to do so (which would overwrite the narrative with a very bad story, for her).

I'm not saying that I'm certain in either of these, much less in both at once... actually scratch that. Catherine has SAID it would be possible to use King Edward's crown. I'm damn well certain she knows what she says.

As far as I understand the metaphysical concept of "crown" that is at issue here, the "right to rule" is something all mortals have by default, per se: the Heavens don't metaphysically protest against anyone seizing the throne no matter by what means they do so. If you're not fae, you have this right until/unless you give it up specifically, like here. It's a... slot. It's a slot of "I have a claim to the crown of X", where X is empty by default, and can be filled/emptied/overwritten any number of times as long as the slot is still there.

For Thief of Stars, this slot is in fact actually filled with the constellation: she's not an earthly ruler per se, but a crown she has, and the power in it is enough to give substance to Larat's claim (which is what the bargain is for in the first place: cobble together seven and one mortal 'slots' to make one for him where he would not normally have one). For the Spellblade, this claim is filled with his status as the Forever King's successor – Catherine is only presuming it works like that for elves, but given he's a Forever King and not a Forever President, I think it's a fair guess. And just because he died doesn't mean his role in the story changed from "a prince" – if he were to be suddenly resurrected and the Forever King to suddenly die, he'd have the crown. And when Catherine says that's a sufficient claim, I believe her. After all, Princes and Princesses of Procer only have claims to individual principalities, too, which I would say is inherently weaker than a crown of a whole independent polity. For King Edward, the claim is no longer substantiate-able: I doubt that if he were resurrected and came back to Callow he'd miraculously be in the line of succession... although, come to think of it, it's probably a fair guess that he'd be next after Vivienne: not overriding the current rulers, but a non-zero advantage over 'pick any random noble'. So it's a very real claim in potentia, not to mention the part where it has been substantiated enough that he gets referred to as King, right now.

The question of "would Catherine be able to fulfill a Queen story role that did not require her to be actually currently ruling after giving up her right to rule" is open, I'd say. Neither a certain yes nor a certain no.

It would suck if these two predictions of mine ended up being mutually exclusive, but that's life -_-

Tek

Let's narrow candidates down, shall we? Cat, Tariq, Tyrant, Hierarch, DK, Revenants. DK is out, Hierarch is not palatable, Revenants will probably give DK a thread to resurrect Larat after he's killed, Tyrant won't give his title up without screwing everyone even worse (there is a chance the crown will affect whom Larat will become after ascending), so there are two real unwilling candidates, Tariq and Cat. Both don't want to rule, though one does out of necessity. I would argue that Tariq WANTS to give up his crown for this, as it will give the realm into the hands of the Above somewhat, and more importantly, estrange big Black Queen from the story (by the way, I just realised you can call Catherine "Cat the BBQ").

Also I wonder, can Cat give up only her Winter title and keep earthly ones (one a grounds that Catherin from Laure and Sovereign of Moonless Nights are two separate entities, given one tended to corrupt the other and that Sovereign was arguably immortal replica of Cat, rather than Cat herself (as per Warlock)) so that not she gives up her right to rule, but the Sovereign of Moonless Nights? Also, she can give up her right to rule, die, get resurrected (tx Pilly) and pretend the Cat that gave her "right" is not her. I mean there are many ways to flip the story if you get creative enough.

Can you make Archer Queen of Callow (after adapting her as an ugly but still beloved daughter) and make her give up her right to rule, abdicating in favor of Cat again? Possibilities are endless.

Mental Mouse

Addressing your last few paragraphs: (1) Per the conclave, Cat giving up her Winter title would leave her mortal title cursed. (2) The problem with shoving the bill onto Archer like you suggest is that there's no way to notify Callow's people of her abrupt abdication (in favor of someone other than the designated heir that she did give proper notice for). (3) Given that Cat was the Black Queen before, during, and after Winter, a quick death and resurrection isn't going to change anything.

Expanding on that last: As I've commented before, in a world where this sort of thing is possible, the definition of "real identity" becomes a political question: Will this person maintain all the obligations, roles, and relationships they had before they were killed+revived, transmuted, ensorcelled, etc.? If so, they count as the same person. (And that trick would specifically violate that rule!)

However, I can easily believe that Cat and Pilgrim might end up "fighting for the bill". 😊 It would be a "nice" twist if Kairos grabs it, but I doubt that will happen, for all the obvious reasons.

Liliet

>I would argue that Tariq WANTS to give up his crown for this, as it will give the realm into the hands of the Above somewhat, and more importantly, estrange big Black Queen from the story not to spoiler from the future, but 😊

>(by the way, I just realised you can call Catherine "Cat the BBQ").

ilu

>Also I wonder, can Cat give up only her Winter title and keep earthly ones

She already did: she laid down her crown as Sovereign of Moonless Nights at Sve Noc's feet.

Also in my understanding of how the crowns work here it wouldn't have satisfied the bargain anyway: Larat needed MORTAL crowns.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. Looking back, Catherine does indeed consider the Thief of Stars and King Edward as options as well as Spellblade... but note that even she wasn't really sure. She does note that DK is presenting three potential crowns to match her three solid ones (Pilgrim is least certain, but the conclave seemed to agree that he counts.)

Interestingly, if King Edward counts, then so does Amadeus, as the Sword In The Stone incident implied and confirmed that he counts as a king of Callow. (World rules seem to be that if you get away with something once, it sets a precedent.) And Amadeus has fewer liabilities... not a creature of DK, sane (scarily so 😊) and he'd be happy to defer to Cat.

Mental Mouse

Which also raises an interesting question: Does the Dead King know that Amadeus's soul is on the table?

- 1) The soul was taken in a camp full of Heroes, who might well have been able to hide the business.
- 2) It was then carried by the weirdly-powerful and mysterious Rogue Sorcerer.
- 3) It was discussed briefly between Pilgrim and Cat, both of whom have some ability to fend off DK's scrying...
- 4) ... and then conspicuously not mentioned at the conclave, nor (iirc) since.
- 5) Masego wouldn't know, because he was gone before Cat emerged from the Everdark.
- 6) Even Archer, if she's been captured, likewise left before Cat found out. So he couldn't learn it from them.
- 7) Black's soul has also been carried with the party from the beginning, by the same guy who's carrying the "mortal" seven crowns. 😊

+1) So, there's a very real possibility that Cat will have access to a valid crown that the Dead King doesn't know about. Amadeus, Lord of the Crossroads?

Shveiran

I see what you did there. Nice.

TeK

I'm pretty sure Amadeus will be a non-Named ruler of Praes though.

Mental Mouse

Not if he donates his crown... OK, a lot of folks wouldn't mind Praes being cursed, at least until they realize that leads to him being replaced by some other Dread Emperor/Empress who might not be as... restrained.

Liliet

I think it could have worked WHILE Amadeus was "king in all but name", but since he no longer is AND in name he never was, the train has sailed & it'd be too much of a stretch. Now, if Tariq's potential claim to the throne of Levant counts, Amadeus's potential claim to Dread Emperor might count. Though, Tariq's claim is founded BOTH on Levant's willingness to accept him as a ruler AND a lawful claim through inheritnace, while Amadeus only has the former, so it might not be enough... but if it did count, Amadeus and Cat might potentially end up having an amusing conversation where Cat wants him as a ruler of Praes while he doesn't want to be one ;u;

Liliet

Doesn't "de Montfort" just mean "from Montfort"? It's not even a last name, just the analogue of "Amadeus of the Green Stretch"

TeK

Simon de Montfort is one of leaders of Crusade that is most infamous for saying (actually not saying) "Kill them all, let God sort them out" also infamlus for being brutal crusader who didn't really spare anyone. I mean, there is literally a province named Brabant here (among others), EE is not one for subtle historical references.

Liliet

Yes, I know, that's not the point I'm addressing here. I'm addressing the idea that Saint has a 'crown' somehow.

Mental Mouse

> given the way I made of aspects artefacts with a single use

So, no Banning DK from Masego. 😞

Aston

I'm still waiting for Cat to pull out higher level tech to resolve the issue.

Like a railgun.

Borrowed from the Gnomes.

Good chapter but aren't we due for a series of Interludes..?

Mental Mouse

> aren't we due for a series of Interludes..?

Not like the last one please. We already have enough cliffhangers.

Shveiran

While I'd not look forward to a series of them, an interlude showing the coming conversation from Pilgrim's POV may be interesting. I'd enjoy seeing the recent developments framed through his perspective.

Mental Mouse

Also, exactly what issue here would a railgun solve? Especially since the possessed guy Cat's trying to rescue is the same guy who's already got the magical equivalent! Cat has learned better than to answer big guns by reaching for a bigger gun.

Aston

What would be really funny is the Dead King actually has an advanced technology society hidden in his personal Hells and thus undetectable by the Dwarves and Gnomes.

Using time acceleration or some such.

At least beyond bows and swords.

Let me just equip a few hundred dead with rifles etc.

Whatever he's hiding in his Hells is the trump card.

Above Driven society?

Captive Choirs?

Mental Mouse

And this is one of the few places he could possibly pull them out without facing immediate war from the gnomes. That said, there's been no hint whatsoever that he's playing in that territory, while DK has been established as being supreme in other, more familiar modes.

TeK

Nah, dear Neshi plays it safe. Having Red Letter tier technology is NOT safe. Why not wait a few thousand years instead and see if gnomes collapse into nothingness instead?

Tab

Excited for the next chapter

Why does no one believe me

Saint's domain has literally been mentioned like 500 times, along with her death flags. In what sense is she NOT a perfect "plot twist" (foreshadowed as hell) And One candidate???

Mental Mouse

Her death is foreshadowed, but lots of people have personal domains. I don't think that counts as a crown.

Berder

I guarantee you that the aspect Cat just took is a trap. If she uses it, it's going to send her to Keter or something equally awful. The Dead King is no fool, to just give Cat an easily defeated foe from which she can take something useful. I bet the Thief of Stars' third aspect was excised recently specifically so that Cat would be guided to take the escape aspect.

Berder

Or it may be a more subtle story trap: the Dead King anticipates a situation from which it will be very tempting for Cat to escape, but, if she does, it will turn the story against her.

nipi

Anyone wonder how many lesser artifacts Cat already owns. I mean she took care of quite a few heroic bands before the Crusade got going.

Mental Mouse

None have been mentioned (even as a “bag of tricks” in her luggage), so I wouldn’t expect she’s got any right now.

Chapter 40: Entreaty

“The priests lie, my friend. A bargain with a devil does not pervert your meanings, or seek to twist your nature. Why would it need to, when the honest desires of men are already so wicked?”

– Kayode Owusu, Warlock under Dread Emperors Vindictive I and Nihilis

When I’d told Tariq that if he wanted to talk about the Saint we’d have to do it while walking, I’d meant it as a way to put him off. Considering we were in a broken ruin of a realm infested with devils, undead and whatever else had might have been summoned and bound, it seemed foolish to have such a conversation when we should be keeping our eyes out on our surroundings instead. How silly of me not to realize that I was dealing with the Grey Pilgrim: he was more than willing to take my words at face value if it got him his way, and I couldn’t even recant. Not without seeming like I was the one out to get the heroine, anyway, which would win me no favours with the heroic three fifths of our party as well as quite possibly turn into a liability down the line. It was one thing if I killed the Saint of Sword in my own defence or that of Masego’s, another if just like when I’d snatched back Black’s body I was baiting her to better take a swing. One would be a tragedy that could be mended, in time, but the other would eat away at the foundation of the alliances I wanted to make. So, when after a few traded whispers with the Peregrine the Saint went on ahead to scout the way through, I sighed but did not object when he fell in at my side. Quite a pair we made, the winded old man and the dusty cripple.

“I had a conversation with your teacher, before his soul was cut out and sealed,” Tariq Fleet-foot suddenly said.

He’d meant to catch me by surprise, which made the way I was just a little too slow in keeping that surprise off my face all the more irritating. My limp faltered, and the way I turned it into a painful longer stride wouldn’t have fooled me – much less an old hand like the Pilgrim.

“Did you?” I blandly replied. “Interesting.”

Like a horse about to bolt, there was now no telling where this was headed. If he'd wanted my undivided attention, well, he godsdamned had it.

"He is," the Pilgrim agreed. "The qualities that steer him could be considered virtues, in a certain light. Had he chosen to serve the cause of Above instead of Below he would have made a great champion."

My lips quirked, though it was mockery and not amusement that moved them. All I could think of was green eyes burning with something mad, in a little room in Marchford, and that implacable anger that was at the heart of him. Amadeus of the Green Stretch, carrying the banner of the Heavens? No, it would go against every grain of who he was – he was capable of doing great good, he truly was, in that Tariq had grasped him exact. But his disdain for Good was set in the marrow of his bones, and there would be no changing that without changing every other part of him.

"I expect if you told him as much it was not well-received," I said.

"I believe he made his finest effort to wound me with words alone," the old man said, sounding unmoved.

I threw an assessing glance at the Grey Pilgrim, finding his tone just a little too blithe. His face was the same, so tranquil I could not help but wonder if it was forced. I'd known Black to twist or break people with but a few calculated sentences, and though the Peregrine would be made of sterner stuff than these he would also have a graveyard's worth of skeletons in his closet. On the other hand, Black had cultivated his reputation – his legends – into as much of a weapon as the rest of him. It was always hard to discern what he could and could not do, which had always been the way the man liked it.

"Yet his insights, though harshly delivered, have allowed me to shed different light on things I once believed myself to fully understand," the Pilgrim continued. "In the east, I believe a distinction is drawn between Name and Role."

"The Book of All Things does to begin with, if you read into certain parts," I pointed out.

For a beat I sought the exact passage, one of the few I'd actually learned by rote.

"To every soul, great and small, purpose will be tendered," I quoted. "Through crucible of choice are lives shaped, and one's mark on Creation defined."

The passage went on to say some pointed things about villainy being a twisting of that tendered purpose, and so Evil as well as evil, but I'd always taken the Book with a grain of salt. It was a beloved and well-worn story in Callow that some ancient Count of Denier had used that very passage to argue that it was in fact impious not pay taxes promptly and in full. Once words were put to ink, anybody could put them to use and those particular words were so old none could say who'd first written them – more than simply the purposes, I suspected that the words themselves had shifted over the centuries. They couldn't not have, after all, considering no one in those days had spoken Lower Miezian before said empire came to Calernia and the Callowan manuscripts of the Book were in that language. No translation could be perfect, my expanding repertoire of spoke and written languages had made painfully clear. The Grey Pilgrim's glance at me was openly amused, which was when I was forced to acknowledge I'd just quoted scripture at a man who rubbed elbows with angels. Ah. Awkward.

"As you say, Queen Catherine," he said. "I must commend whoever it was that saw to your religious education."

I wondered how he'd take if I told him I'd drifted through most sermons at the House and only begun studying the Book with any seriousness at the prompting of the wicked servant of the Hellgods better known as the Black Knight. Or, for all that matter, that the only person I'd comprehensively discussed theology with in the last few years was Masego, a man whose main interest in the matter was the practicalities of decide. In all fairness, I thought, that's turned out surprisingly pertinent to our lives.

"In Levant, we speak of it simply as Bestowal," Tariq said. "A gift from Above or a curse from Below. What is done with these is our choice, and the strength of the mark left on Creation is but the illustration of the character of they who were bestowed. One who cultivated customs leading to greatness will leave great legacy behind, deeds worthy of recording. One who allowed mortal failings to remain paramount will be but a line in the ledgers of the Blood, soon forgot."

"I'd noticed," I slowly said, "that your nobles – your Blood – seem particularly set in their ways."

"We seek to emulate admirable people, Queen Catherine, but those people are long gone," the Pilgrim sadly said. "And their wars, their foes, their disasters are no longer our own. In being inflexible of virtue we have made virtue of inflexibility, often to our detriment. It is a way of thinking, you see, that exalts great deeds done in the name of the Heavens without giving thought to their aftermath. Their consequences. At our finest – and make no mistake, for all its flaws the Dominion has rendered great and righteous service for no rewards at all – my people are an assembly of heroes, Bestowed or not. At our worst, we seek glory heedlessly and recklessly kill over matters of honour."

Which, while a fascinating look into the Dominion from a man who knew it like few others could and likely ever would, had little bearing on the Saint of Swords or even Black that I could see.

"I had thought myself, through the nature events that shaped me, freed of these fetters so common to my people," the Grey Pilgrim quietly said. "I was, it has become clear, terribly wrong in this."

After the first surprise he'd sprung on me I'd grown careful to mask my thoughts, but hearing the old man that was arguably the most accomplished hero of our age – and likely a century or two before that – bluntly admit he'd made a grave mistake almost put another stutter to my steps. There was regret in the way the Peregrine had spoken, but mostly it was an honest admission of error. And that was, I thought, why even when he sought to end me it was difficult to hate the man. Because even when he dipped into hypocrisy, even when he dug in his heels long past the point he should, the Grey Pilgrim was trying to do good. And when he failed in that, he looked the truth of it in the eye and owned it.

"I do not regret for a moment my service of the Heavens, Black Queen," the old man honestly said, "but my blindness to the consequences of it is on my head. In doing merciful work I have sown the seeds of reprisal far and wide and though never once will I bend my head to Evil for fear of contest, more should have been done to prepare Calernia for the storm."

It sounded, I thought, like he was blaming himself for the Dead King's stirring. Which seemed backward to me, considering I was fairly sure it was Malicia who'd first opened the gates for his intervention in Creation. Oh, I'd sought to make a bargain as well after receiving envoy from Neshamah but she'd been wearing a body in Keter long before I arrived. If my suspicions were correct and the Dead King avoided intervention save at the invitation of another Evil – to place, in a way, the burden of opposition to Good on another – then it was the Tower's hand and not any hero's that was at work. On the other hand, would he have moved if he'd not seen opportunity? I wondered. I doubted an invitation was all it took to secure the aid of the Dead King. Perhaps the Grey Pilgrim was right, and in some eldritch way his works had paved the grounds for the King of Death's coming. But even so, fuck the idea that the old man was responsible for the slaughter that ensued. I'd stood on the opposite end of the field from the Pilgrim more than once, but I could only praise the vast majority of what he'd done over his many decades of holding a Name.

"You've been a helping hand," I replied. "Sometimes I question the soundness of the causes you've helped, but not your intent."

"That is kind of you," Tariq said, bowing his head. "And you are not wrong to say I was hand, and mayhaps on occasion a finger on the scale. I was offered chances, you see, to intervene when there was still contest to be had. When the balance had yet to swing."

He paused.

"Laurence de Montfort was sent forth, for near as many years as I, when there was absolutely nothing left to save," he gravely said.

And there we were at last, I thought. The song and dance to convince me to stay my hand if a moment came where she turned on me. That the Pilgrim had pressed so hard for this conversation to happen in the first place told me everything I needed to know about the odds of it happening.

"So she's seen the deep end," I said, unimpressed.

"No, Queen Catherine, she has swum in it," the old man sadly said. "When we first spoke in Callow, years ago, you told me you were tired of killing children because they were on the wrong side. Asked me if I was. And I am, Black Queen, Heavens forgive me but I am. Yet mine was still the lighter of the burdens, for even Laurence's victories have only ever come in the wake of disaster."

My brows furrowed. If I was following his meaning correctly, he was implying that while his role had been snuffing out disasters before they could fully form while the Saint of Swords had been... well, cutting of limbs when the rot took.

"You see her now, after a life of holding back the darkness, and find only bitterness and distrust," Tariq said. "I do not expect these to endear her to you, Your Majesty, or even for cordiality to be attained. But I ask that you see her bared fangs for what they are: the scars left behind by a lifetime spent facing down the horrors of Calernia so no one else would have to."

His voice wasn't pleading, not exactly, though knowing what I knew about the Peregrine if he thought that tossing aside his pride would save the Saint's life he would discard it without a second thought. In that sense he was remarkably similar to my own teacher, seeing little worth in personal dignity when it stood in the way of results. But though shy of a plea, there was no denying that a suit was being made.

"I know better than most what it costs someone to tread through ruin," I acknowledged. "And many of mine were of my own making."

But that must be owned, Pilgrim. It does not abnegate responsibility – especially not in the powerful.”

“Those ties got both ways,” the old man said. “There is not a soul on Calernia, Black Queen, that has not benefitted from the toil that clouded Laurence de Montfort. Sword in hand, she has danced with death for the sake of others a hundred times. From the windswept plains of the Chain of Hunger to the silent deeps of the Brocelian Forest: she has drowned plagues that would have killed dozens of thousands in the blood of hundreds, slain beloved heroes who sunk into madness and slaughter, sent scuttling back into the dark all manners of old gods whose hungers grew wicked – though not before they had their taste.”

His blue eyes grew hard as steel, when he met mine.

“All this she has endured, and endured for so long that Creation itself tempered her into something beyond breaking,” the old man said. “I have known souls sworn to Endurance that would weep at having lived half her life – and for this she has asked no reward, no riches nor titles nor honours. Not a single thing, for above all things Laurence de Montfort believes that strength must be put to righteous purpose.”

The Grey Pilgrim let out a long breath.

“She is not kind,” he admitted, “for Creation has burned kindness out of her. She is not forgiving, for there are graves sown across many lands that taught her to cast forgiveness aside. She is not witty or brilliant or fascinating, those traits that so often make the worst of us seem forgivable. She is rough and brusque, mistrusting, and there will never be a day where she does not see you as a seed of the Enemy.”

The Peregrine, old and bent as he was, held himself with the presence of ruler when he so wished. This was not one of those times, for he did not try to tower over me or browbeat into acquiescence. He was asking, as an equal or something close to it.

“And still,” he said, voice growing rough with feeling, “I ask you to see you for what she is: a woman who saw evil preying on the world and took up the sword in its defence. Selflessly, without once grudging what such service would wreak upon her soul.”

And I could see, through the grief in his voice, that there truly was a tragedy there. Because he might be a decent actor, I thought, and perhaps a liar of some skill if there was cause for it, but he had not taken to it the way some of the people I knew had. The tremor in his voice was genuine, coming from someone who’d never learned to fake it so perfectly they’d blurred even to themselves the difference between truth and lies.

"It may be," the Grey Pilgrim said, "that for the harrowing life she has led Laurence will be given place of honour at the feet of the Gods when death finally takes her. That for greater service greater accolade will be rendered unto her. But that is the debt of the Gods Above, Black Queen, and that realm known only to the just is beyond our mortal understanding."

His fingers twisted into a symbol I did not recognize, though he did not even seem to notice their movement.

"Those are not the Gods to which you keep, regardless, and so I do not ask you to keep to their ways or their dues," Tariq said. "I speak to you instead as one of the living. We who still tread Creation, who have benefited from her shattering labours. We who owe better than a shallow grave to this woman. Not for what she might still do, though few are better suited for war on the Hidden Horror, or for the expedience of earthly alliances. We owe it for what she has already done."

It was, I thought, a touching speech. Well spoken and from the heart. It might just be, too, that every word he had spoken was true. That for all that I'd thrown my castigations in the face of these heroes when the Tenth Crusade came baying at my door for their temerity in coming to offer their salvation more than two decades too late, I'd still lived in the shadow of their protection. That these two old killers had borne the weight of half this continent on their back and these days had nothing but scars and bared swords to show for it. It would have felt right, to follow the course of that thread to the conclusion that what had shaped Laurence de Montfort excused who she'd become. And yet.

"You ask me, in essence," I said, "to extend the courtesy of a stayed hand because what has sharpened her to a fault was beyond her control."

"No," the Pilgrim said, "you mistake me. She made the choice to--"

"I understand you perfectly," I said. "Just the same as your Blood, her character has led her to this place and this strife. That character is good, and so you ask me to excuse her."

"How carelessly you reduce a life of doing good to a single sentence," he said.

"It does weigh on the scales, what you say she did," I admitted. "But I have to ask, Pilgrim: this courtesy you ask of me, will you extend it in turn?"

The old man blinked in surprise.

"I too have my bevy of broken souls," I said. "And oh, they're a vicious lot. No denying that. Savage from their days in the wild, but they're learning. One step at a time."

I thought of the Doom, of the same woman who'd let her madness drench the world in blood whispering of the sacrifice she'd made and the woman it'd made her into.

"Some are beyond redemption," I admitted. "Others..."

Half the world, turned into a prop for the glory of the other half, spoken in a burning whisper. A sardonic smile beneath pale green eyes. And a knife into his ribs, after the Folly, that I could not regret.

"Have declared their own war on despair, and mutilated themselves in pursuit of victory," I continued. "I've gathered them to me, by fate or happenstance, and they're my responsibility. Even the one high up in the palace, whose grief has sent into a dark not even his eyes can see through. So I ask you again: when the time comes, and they are to be judged, will you return the courtesy you ask of me?"

Blue eyes in a tanned face assessed me, wondering. He did not reply.

"I thought so," I replied. "Then were are allies in convenience, Pilgrim, and you earn no courtesy from me. If she bares her blade at Hierophant or myself, I will snuff her out."

"I had thought," the old man said, "that agreement could be reached."

"You didn't offer an agreement," I calmly replied. "You asked for a concession."

"Then a barter," Tariq said, "though we are both lessened for it."

And it shamed me just a little when he said. That it'd come to this, but also the entire span – every intrigue I'd woven through and around the Tyrant, every trick I had yet to ply. And this man, I reminded myself, had mere hours been trying to leash me with the threat of death through a pattern of three. Not even a day had passed since we'd been at war, and still the disappointment in his gaze stung just a bit. I've disappointed people I love, I thought, meeting his gaze. And that did not stay my hand. Neither will this.

"You are in need of an eight crown," the Pilgrim said. "To cast down yours now would endanger your efforts, for war is ill-time for succession. Kairos Theodosian will fight you over his to his dying breath, for there is nothing he loves half as much in this world as the legacy he embodies and stripping him of right to rule would rob him of this."

I inclined my head to the side in silent concession.

"I was once Tariq Isbili, of the Grey Pilgrim's Blood, Honoured Son under the Seljun of Levant," the old man said, and his voice rang with quiet authority. "Though stricken from the ledgers I have raised rulers of Levant and I have cast them down. My word has been taken for law, and my honour for the honour of the Dominion. If I took the Tattered Throne, the bloodlines would rally to my banner and acclaim me Seljun by right. That crown I promise you, for the life of Laurence de Montfort."

My fingers clenched, then unclenched.

"If she kills Masego, I will murder her without hesitation," I told him, meaning every word.

He grimaced, but he must have understood that there was no concession in his power that would possibly make me effectively concede the right to the Saint to kill one of my dearest friends without consequence.

"If she does not kill the Hierophant," he said.

"Then we have a bargain," I said.

We shook on it, amongst the ruins of what had once been a great city. It was not long after that the Saint returned, the Rogue Sorcerer looking harried and bloody as he leant against her. The Tyrant of Helike, he announced, had betrayed us.

Finally, I thought.

Will Discord email me comments? Will Discord hook everything into nice comment chains for me or if it's been a day and people have moved on would it be weird to suddenly respond to an old comment? Not to put too fine a point in it but Discord kind of sucks. I honestly don't see why people would want to use it.

As Liliet said, it's a different conversational option. The lack of threaded comments on there bugs me, but what it does (text and voice chat, with individuals or groups) it does very well.

Heh.

Tariq, stop trying to get something for nothing out of Cat. It's not going to work ... and will weigh against you in the Narrative's evaluation of you.

As expected, Kairos has betrayed them. I wonder just how much he got away with from the Rogue Sorcerer.

JJR

Betrayal!? Who could have foreseen such a thing?

Snark aside I doubt he's actually pulling for the Dead King. Probably going to betray that one next somehow.

Sparsebeard

He would probably try to do exactly what Cat wanted to do himself. Raise Larat as a god with the crowns and Black's soul then somehow co-opt the power, possibly with Hierach's help. Yes, the plan helpfully supplied by Cat, no way this might backfire, he he.

Rook

Crazy theory, but I wonder if the Sorcerer really lost to the Tyrant.

Considering that no one actually saw the nature of the 'betrayal', even if the Sorcerer bested the Tyrant or was even working with him, who's really going to question it if he pretends otherwise, as if he got beaten black and blue before narrowly escaping? After all, Tariq's lie detector wouldn't go off either, all he said was that the Tyrant betrayed them.

It'd be a brutal twist if it turned out that he was a double agent the whole time, or if he was much more than he initially let on.

There are two other possibilities: that Laurence is baiting Cat, and that it's the Dead King that got the crowns. I'm more inclined for the latter to be the case, since Tyrant couldn't have possibly missed the bait, and that's the best way for Neshamah's to turn the tables during the period the gang was split.

Mental Mouse

I don't think DK can safely take the crowns yet – it's too early in the story.

If he takes the crowns now, the party not only gets a fresh new story of "get the crowns back from DK", but they unify against DK. With the possible exception of Kairos, but if he turns on them then, he becomes a speedbump on the way to DK, and gets replaced posthaste. 😊

More to the point, Cat just won't summon Larat until she's got the crowns back.

Liliet

Tariq doesn't have a lie detector per se, he sees in the hearts of people – their emotions and intentions. Trickery won't work anymore than it did for Vivienne at Camps.

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't think that the Sorcerer is a traitor. Tariq knows him for some months and saw nothing. Furthermore, Behold is not a simple lie detector. It can also show emotions and culpability, as seen when Tariq spoke with the man who kill his sister.

NerfContessa

The ROGUE Sorcerer, don't forget. :p

antoninjohn

Oh no who would have expected such a betrayal

Kissaten

Does it count as a full-blown betrayal if Kairos doesn't betray someone when he was expected to?

naturalnuke

What do you mean betrayal?! This was all part of the plan!

Peter D

First!?

Great chapter, looking forward to the confrontation.

Someguy

Tariq is a narcissistic bitch for his own martyrdom. "Oh how noble & selfless he is for not taking the Tattered Throne!", "How sad that he has to kill his surviving nephew to save the lives of others!", "People have to wash and bare their necks to be killed when he asks it of them because he is 0 SO HOLY & Right because he is a HERO!". Bull Shit.

Rook

Nah. Catherine has the right of it when she holds him in high regard despite every conflict they've had and still do have. It's actually a pretty mature/objective position that she manages to hold there, especially considering that her personal feelings toward the Heroes are anything but positive.

At the end of the day he's not great to Villains. But to all the normal people that can't cut the sky or have goddesses on their shoulder? The same kind of people that Catherine has been trying to hard to help in her own way? He's the one who watches out for them, more than nearly anyone. He's not fair or good to Catherine & her Villainous co (or to any Villain, really), and sure he makes major blunders like anyone else. But to hundreds of thousands, even millions of other people? He's more than fair. He's gives more than they could possibly repay, not that he asks them to anyway.

That's the thing, the Major Heroic Antagonists in this story aren't one dimensional and they can't be judged solely by the experience that our favorite protagonists have had with them. Not any more than Catherine can be judged solely her interactions with any one person.

Being a Hero doesn't absolve him or the Saint of the mistakes they make or the actions they take, but that cuts both ways. Being a Villain shouldn't excuse Catherine when she does similar things for similar reasons, as if by virtue of being a Villain a character gets a free pass to be held to no standard at all while everyone else is crucified for not meeting an extremely high standard.

This whole comment is fantastic, but this especially YES YES YES.

shveiran

I mean... the problem with this is that the setting does have a double standard. Earned by a long time of madmen on the villanous side of things, but still.

We know that both Saint and Pilgrim take extreme measures on a regular basis and embrace a lesser evil approach because in the thick of it there is no other choice. If there was any doubt about Saint, we had confirmation in this post. Pilgrim killed his nephew, Saint slays the sick, but Cat gets frowned upon by the world because she crucified mass-murderers to discourage a Third Liesse.

As Cat said to Pilgrim in book 4 "when I make this kind of choices, I get called a monster. So why do you get a pass?"

The point is not to absolve Cat or to condemn Pilgrim and Saint. It's about acknowledging that they both take the hard choices for the greater good, within their limited abilities to understand what the greater good is. But within the setting, two are revered and one despised solely based on the color of their shirt.

Fayhem

"Color of their shirt" rather minimizes the historical significance of those particular allegiances. I mean, take another look at the exchange between Saint and Pilgrim before they agreed to work with Cat here. Cat is very far from the first villain to make the right noises about how really they just want to help, so can't you just give them a chance? But if that's actually what happens then Cat will be the first in the very extensive experience of Calernia's two most senior heroes to not take the opportunity afforded by a reprieve to commit an atrocity/betrayal.

I don't agree with this assessment of Cat; I think she genuinely is poised to be someone who breaks the mold and actually changes how things work on Calernia even beyond just being different herself. But when you're basing your differing assessments of the people on different sides on decades of personal experience and literally millenia of history, I'm not sure you call that a "double standard" so much as "being aware of context".

konstantinvoncarstein

He is more than a little hypocritical, but I don't think it goes to narcissism.

Wry Warudo

I was betting on later, but oh well, I guess the game is afoot. Maybe the sorcerer Isn't The Sorcerer? Or Kairos figured he would get it out of the way first...

Nah, Kairos went full Traitorous here, it's just the goat in a robe with a pair of cantaloupes. XD

Justin

Caerulea

Ratface mentioned, when Catherine asked, that a Dread Emperor Traitorous betrayed a villain called the Betrayer. One of the quotes in the chapter headings is Traitorous speaking to Betrayer. Therefore, he is in the past.

Moeadeeb

Huh, early

erebus42

Damn it Tariq! You were so fucking close! But nooooo, you can't come at things as an equal and deal reciprocally can you? I guess that will always be one of your fatal flaws. Oh well, let's get this shit show started!

Liliet

I do wonder @ his thought process here. Doesn't seem to me like Cat asked for much =x

Andrew Mitchell

I disagree. My impression was that what Cat wanted wasn't an even trade. She said:

> "I too have my bevy of broken souls," I said. "And oh, they're a vicious lot. No denying that. Savage from their days in the wild, but they're learning. One step at a time."

and later

> "I've gathered them to me, by fate or happenstance, and they're my responsibility. Even the one high up in the palace, whose grief has sent into a dark not even his eyes can see through. So I ask you again: when the time comes, and they are to be judged, will you return the courtesy you ask of me?"

It seemed to me like Cat wanted the safety of her whole party in exchange for the life of Laurence.

Liliet

"Safety" is a vague thing here. Tariq conceded to Catherine still planning on killing Laurence IF she kills Masego. "When the time comes and they are to be judged" what the fuck does that even mean? How likely are the Woe + Amadeus to be in Tariq's power WITH him having a reason to do bad things to him in the first place?

If Tariq wants an alliance with Catherine, which he SHOULD, agreeing he doesn't have ill intent towards her&hers seems like a rather basic step.

Javvies

I see it more as Tariq was asking Cat not to judge Laurence too harshly and to take into account the circumstances that shaped her in the judging of her and when deciding what to do with her.

Cat asked if he'd be willing to reciprocate when it came to the folks following her ... and he declined.

Rynjin

I think his thought process is that he has no control over Laurence. She's not his dog on a leash, however many times the story likens her to a hound she's still her own person. A very stubborn and single-minded person at that.

Tariq couldn't stop her from killing Masego any more than Cat could force Archer to do anything she really didn't want to.

erebus42

Force her? No. But Cat might be able to "persuade" her.

Calling it now

Observations: Tariq doesn't keep his oaths. Saint has death flags and Dominion references galore.

Predictions: Saint will murder Masego and Catherine will kill Saint (seems directly stated in chapter here). Pilgrim will Forgive Masego for the Greater Good. Catherine will collect Saint's Crown. Masego will learn Forgive and level up.

Liliet

Saint doesn't HAVE a crown. Jeez.

Javvies

I think the thinking is that Domains/Domain powers are a form of rulership.

Liliet

Ah, interesting.

I, huh, do think this is a good interpretation. They still wouldn't count for this though IMHO, because Larat specifically wants "mortal crowns", "crowns of mortal rulers", because he wants a foothold in Creation. Domains are explicitly NOT Creation, and are a common thing among fae already.

Euodiachloris

Doesn't matter what Larat thinks he needs to get what he wants. Seven-and-one makes eight in total... with one nit quite like the others. Saint's claim to a domain is rulership – by a Hero who is still mortal enough to grow old and die.

Rook

If you want to look at it that way, every goat on the continent has just as much of a claim to rulership. They rule over their own hooves and horns after all.

What the Pilgrim, Tyrant, and Catherine's right to rule provide as the one is a foundation in creation that precedes and outlasts the person. The position of rulership in helike, callow, or levant all have existed before and can exist and after the people that hold the title are long dead and gone. Winter too in a way, but Winter had no basis in Creation and had Catherine as the creational anchor, not the other way around, making it useless for that purpose since Larat wanted a foothold in Creation rather than in Arcadia.

Saint's personal domain doesn't give them the foothold they need. There's no foundation behind it. It didn't exist before the Saint and it'll die when she does, it will pass to no one and no one will acknowledge the authority of it even if it does.

Euodiachloris

As Cat has proved a few times... domains, aspects, Names and Roles can be passed down, stolen or taken. Much as crowns and kingdoms can be.

What makes Saint's domain different from a goat's hooves is 1) what it has done in narrative terms, 2) what it has touched and affected with its power and/or symbolic resonance and 3) how established in #s 1 & 2 it is. Crowns aren't just crowns; swords are important heirlooms denoting rule, too.

Rook

You know what else can be important heirlooms denoting rule? Literally anything. Like a carved goats horn, for example.

A particular sword can be a symbol rule, not all swords are. Saints isn't. It has nothing to do with rule and there's no precedent for it being passed down or holding authority.

Saint's domain is just an extreme hardening of who she is after going through horribly rough shit ten thousand times. It's nothing at all like Catherine's old domain, which before her forefathers ever drew breath was a symbol of rule over half of creation beta.

lauatagan

The oath was "The crowns of seven mortal rulers and one" the one can be interpreted as not necessarily from a "mortal ruler"

Liliet

Yeah, I don't think this one relies on literal interpretation, or Cat could just ask for her nobles to cut out some cardboard crowns for her.

Mental Mouse

The original wording clearly suggests that the "and one" crown doesn't necessarily have to be mortal. But I don't think personal domains count, they don't imply ruling anything but that domain itself. Otherwise half the wizards of Calernia would qualify, not to mention fae and whatnot.

Quibbler

1. Bullocks. Laurence is the ONLY person in story referenced to have Dominion other than Cat. It is repeatedly signposted as unique and important.
2. The features of the land of crossroads (e.g., requires a blood cut to open the door to allow armies to travel faster to the Dead King) are Saintly.
3. Per Amadeus, Saint is a major part of the reason Dead King can walk. And he didn't even know her role in the Crusade. She has karmic responsibility that this would repay.
4. Cat doesn't need Saint to willingly give up the crown. If her soul is her Dominion, Can can pilfer it post-mortem.

Liliet

Fayhem

IIRC the original wording was "the crowns of seven mortal rulers and one". If you're suggesting that the "and one" doesn't have to be mortal because it comes after the specification of "seven mortal rulers" I would very strongly disagree with that. The sentence construction follows an archaic syntax (because it sounds more portentous and that's fae for you), but the "and one" is in fact necessarily still in reference to the earlier "crowns of mortal rulers". You can tell because otherwise you could just as easily claim "aha, the 'and one' doesn't specify what it has to be one of just like it doesn't specify it has to be mortal! ergo, it can be the crowns of seven mortal rulers and one apple." Which I think is pretty blatantly not plausible once you look at it like that.

Yavandir

It could also be seven mortal crowns and one mortal

Fayhem

Also no.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. Still not sure, but I'll grant that all the candidates mentioned in story, are either mortals or ex-mortals (that is revenants)

Andrew Mitchell

Agreed. Saint isn't an option.

sengachi

I mean, she has a domain called Decree. Regardless of what she uses it for, that's divine right of rulership right there. In fact, I'm being there's no way she didn't get an Aspect like that without being offered mortal rulership of some form or another.

Shveiran

True, but that is my only issue with the prediction. I think the One crown will result from Kairos actions (possibly he'll be put down and his crown claimed, or maybe something weird will pop up after his next betrayal), but the climax between Cat, Tariq, Saint and Masego could go down along those lines. Especially if the sword-that-is-a-prayer somehow makes it impossible to Forgive Saint.

Mental Mouse

Also, Saint might find murdering Masego to be... not so easy.

>Masego, a man whose main interest in the matter was the practicalities of deicide. In all fairness, I thought, that's turned out surprisingly pertinent to our lives.

I also rather liked someone's idea (DDG has failed me) of Masego responding to her with "a sword does not think. a sword has no arms or legs" snap.

BTW, I've become fairly sure that DK himself won't kill Masego himself no matter what. Because he knows that as a young immortal, Cat's story is still forming its core, to be solidified and built upon over time. And he really doesn't want "nemesis to the Dead King" to be part of Cat's core identity.

Fayhem

> BTW, I've become fairly sure that DK himself won't kill Masego himself no matter what. [and etc., I don't want to quote the whole paragraph]

That's a really interesting take. I mean he certainly seemed sincere enough when he was threatening that, but then he would wouldn't he? After all Neshamah is blatantly both highly capable and quite willing to run a bluff when it suits him, and merely threatening to kill someone's loved ones is less an unforgivable provocation than it is practically a form of teasing when it's between villains. I think you're probably right: he won't try (at least not seriously) to kill any of Cat's loved ones until/unless he's at a point where he both intends and considers himself imminently capable of snuffing Cat herself out at the same time. And these circumstances don't really favor that degree of success for him, I'd say.

Mental Mouse

Well... I could be wrong. If DK figures Cat can't take him out, he may figure "eh, she'll get over it in a hundred years or so". He might even be right... but on the other hand, he is known for playing it safe, even if it costs him resources and/or time. And Cat did just stare down Pilgrim on the point, not to mention having a specific countermeasure handy for Saint. I note that Cat didn't seem all that worried – she didn't even bother to return the threat.

Fayhem

> I note that Cat didn't seem all that worried – she didn't even bother to return the threat.

I mean, who tries to escalate against the Dead King?

Liliet

...You have a really good point there wrt DK not wanting to kill Masego here.

Cat ain't vulnerable to hostage tactics, they're just a great way to drive her berserk.

Decius

Well, that went from Tariq demanding a concession to granting one.

Cat wasn't going to kill her without provocation anyway: The Saint of Swords is just too valuable an ally against the Dead King and Empress, and if turned against those foes will either win or die.

Cat doesn't care who kills her enemies, even if she does care who kills her friends.

pagesbe

It's a bit of a concession on Taylor's part. What this means is, unless Saint actually kills Masego, she's not going to go for the kill. Rather than just putting Saint down the moment she turns on one of them.

Rook

Taylor? I see someone's been re-reading Worm

I think it's really just a fair barter, although the Pilgrim did start off by begging for a concession instead. Catherine planned to kill the Saint anyway, since she's such a liability to her, and the Pilgrim had no reason to particularly be against the Saint trying to kill Masego.

Now Catherine has to leave the liability hanging and stay her hand if the Saint honestly cooperates + doesn't hurt Masego, and the Pilgrim has to do his utmost to hold back the Saint and work in Catherine's interests.

Honestly I think it's a big step forward, even if it isn't quite where they ideally want to get to. The foremost Hero of his generation and the foremost Villain of her generation just came to rational, mutually agreeable terms without even requiring ten chapters of Named pissing matches to set it up.

Javvies

From a rational, objective standpoint, sure, it's a step forward.

But don't forget what Pilgrim just said "Then a barter, though we are both lessened for it."

That was in response to Cat pointing out and declining that he was just asking her for a unilateral concession on her part. And her refusal to give him something fairly large for nothing.

Rook

I mean, it's a little shameless but I don't know how much you can hold it against the guy for asking. He rolled over pretty much immediately when Catherine refused anyway.

The gall of it is irritating but that's about the extent of it. Literally one chapter ago Catherine blatantly lied to the Saints face about why she had the Sorcerer carry the seven crowns, which is about equally shameless considering that (hilariously enough) the Saint was completely correct when she suspected Catherine was up to something.

Javvies

You're missing the key point.

Tariq said "Then a barter, though we are both lessened for it."

In other words, he considers negotiations distasteful, demeaning to all involved, and otherwise bad/ungood.

Plus, he can't be relied upon to keep his end of any deal reached. Based on both past behavior/actions and his own statements to that effect.

Rook

You're the one missing the key point. The fact that they're acquiescing to negotiations despite finding it distasteful should be considered respectable, if anything, because it's even more clear proof that the actual good of everyone is taking precedence over personal feelings. On both sides.

Seems like some pretty petty grasping at straws to try taking away from the progress being made, just because they weren't overjoyed by it. "Yeah they're breaking new grounds and trying to set aside Good vs Evil conflicts that have lasted so long that they've worn permanent grooves into the fabric of reality... but they're not entirely happy about it!". Oh woe, how unbearably awful.

Sure, he's an oath breaker. That's fair. There's also centuries of precedent, several of them that the Pilgrim has personally lived through, where making deals with Villains almost always results in betrayal. Asking for negotiations to be made with a Villain of Catherine's caliber is asking for a leap of faith in the first place, considering the context.

You do remember how this band was forged in the first place, right? The Saint didn't want to work together due to (if her words are to be believed) having tried it countless times with countless villains before and having been burned for it every time without a single exception. The pilgrim decided to try again anyway, with Catherine. Don't see why Catherine can't take a small leap as well, after having been burned what, Once? Twice? Instead of dozens of times?

Source: Chapter 33, Concord

" ... Tariq, how many of these 'turnabouts' have you seen over the years?" the Saint hissed. "How many Damned made their apologies, swore they'd never meant to hurt anyone, said that they would help you keep the peace instead."

"Dozens," the Pilgrim said.

"And how many kept their word?"

"None," the old man tiredly said. ..."

Javvies

You're ignoring the point that I'm trying to make. It's not as much a step forward as one would like it to be.

Tariq is being forced by circumstances to negotiate with Cat – he is negotiating with Cat only because it is currently his best option to get what he wants while acting in accordance with his values. But his first choice is demanding unilateral concessions from Cat, not making a deal.

Part of being a Hero (at least, most varieties thereof) includes being willing to give someone a chance to prove you wrong about them. Certainly the kind of Hero Tariq alleges himself to be includes the offering of a second chance. He's more or less required by being the kind of Hero he is to give Cat a chance ... especially now that she's leveraged him into not being able to kill her easily after he aborted his attempt to redeem her.

Just because other Villains have lied about things before doesn't give Tariq (or any Hero) a free pass on breaking his word to someone who kept their word to him. Nor does it give Laurence a pass for attacking someone while under a truce banner.

Rook

See, that kind of mentality reeks of hypocrisy and double standards.

Tariq isn't the only one forced to negotiate by circumstances. The main reason Catherine is resorting to negotiating first instead of attempting to kill him is because the reaction from Levant by killing him is crippling to her plans. That one is outright stated by her, by the way. It's not because she's a very nice girl.

And what, Heroic opposition gets held to the highest standard and Villains get a free pass to be held to no standard? Tariq continuing to try playing ball after being burned dozens of times is expected of him, but Catherine playing ball after being burned once is going unthinkably above and beyond?

Poppycock. If you're going to hold the Heroes to that much higher of a standard than the Villains, then I guess the Heroes do indeed have innate moral superiority. They're certainly being judged as if they actually do.

The wall between Heroes and Villains was built up over millennia. There's also centuries of personal experiences that make trust a near impossibility and circumstance that makes stakes high enough that the trust is even harder to put forward. This is absolutely, objectively a huge step, and quibbling about the enthusiasm of either party for it is just worthless pride talking.

Shveiran

Yes, the Heroes are held to a higher standard, at least by me.

They claim to be better than Villains.

They claim to be just, virtuous and GOOD.

The world acts like this is truth. It's the reason no one trusts villains and most trust heroes.

If they are NOT held to a higher standard, then those assumptions are "poppycock": either Above's mandate demands you to be better than a murderhobo with radiant powers, or William is no longer an exception to the Hero standard and Heroes have no place being regarded as anything more than superpowered individual.

Javvies

...

Again, you're missing my point.

Tariq views bartering, aka negotiating, as a "lessening".

That doesn't bode well for sustained major negotiations not held under the threat of overwhelming force ... such as will likely be required to get the Liesse Accords up and running.

Have you forgotten that Cat's first interaction with Crusade forces, and the Pilgrim specifically, was to negotiate? That she offered to gate the Crusaders to the Tower, that she tried to join the Alliance? That she did all of that from a position of relative strength over the Crusaders and every time she reached out with an offer, it's been refused, with the sole exception of the "no mistreating prisoners and no angels/demons/devils" deal?

Cat's trying to negotiate, has been trying to negotiate. Killing Tariq was never actually something that Cat wanted to do, just something that she would have done on an active battlefield if necessary. However, Tariq's position as regards Levant, makes him one of those critical mission objectives – like when in strategy games you sometimes have special/unique units that if killed result in autofailing the mission. Tariq's one of those. And everybody hates escort missions. Plus, he's basically the biggest Hero around, and probably the most likely to be able to swing undecided Heroes and Good-aligned non-Named into supporting the Accords.

Heroes, by virtue of being Heroes, are expected and supposed to keep their word when they give it. Everybody expects a Villain to be potentially untrustworthy ... but Heroes are supposed to be absolutely trustworthy when they give their word on something.

It's a built in Narrative expectation -Villains don't lose by being trustworthy and honorable, but Heroes lose by being untrustworthy and dishonorable ... because those are Villainous Narrative attributes, not Heroic ones.

Mental Mouse

How many Damned have put their butts on the line for their citizens? Or offered up front to ban demon summoning? Or redeemed (okay, half-redeemed) an entire species? Or given up immortality? Cat has acted very differently from pretty much any villain before her, following Black's trail and taking it further than he did. She's not given to empty promises (Kairos excepted, and that's part of dealing with him) or shallow apologies, either.

Cat has earned her bona fides, and Pilgrim has been slow to recognize that.

Rook

But that's the thing, Cat has earned her bona fides and the Pilgrim IS recognizing that now, albeit slowly. On his reluctance we agree there, it definitely exists, although I don't think it's wholly unjustified or beyond understanding.

That's why he decided not to gamble and refuse her surrender. That's why he decided to go against the Saints judgement and work with her in the band of five. That's why the agreement they just came to happened very simply after a brief, mostly civil, discussion.

There is such a large gulf there that reconciling between Villains and Heroes is nearly impossible. Even Malicia herself failed at it, and she's touted as the greatest political mover and shaker of her generation bar no one.

The fact that Catherine has managed to get even this far with a Hero – and not even a minor one, but one of the oldest and the scariest – speaks volumes about how much effort she's put in and how all that work is finally bearing fruit.

Liliet

This.

Liliet

It's not about negotiations being distasteful in principle, it's about this particular kind of negotiation.

Both of the things they've "exchanged" in this barter are something that should have been true by default. If they'd been an actually coherent party, there wouldn't be a need to negotiate for this, and I actually think higher of Tariq for recognizing that.

His crown is the one that's of no immediate worth, either tactical or strategic, he never intended to cash in his claim in the first place. If he and Catherine were genuine allies, there wouldn't be a question of which crown gets given up – the one they don't need, obviously.

And Catherine... well I actually think she didn't give anything up here that she wanted in the first place -- She JUST remarked how she could not afford leaving a narrative impression of being after Saint – what Pilgrim asks her not to do is something she never intended in the first place. Oh sure, in the extremely narrow scenario that Saint turns on Catherine/Masego and Catherine has the opportunity to either disable her nonlethally or kill her Catherine is now obligated to go for the first option, but Catherine's still going to act in defense of herself and her friend, and she did not even sell away her right to revenge if she fails.

The real thing lost here is the opportunity for Catherine to rack up narrative points by not killing Saint for turning on her down the line without a specific bargain made for it. I mourn that a little, and as I said, I respect Tariq all the more for having had the same hope there as I did in the first place.

It's like saying "let's make a bargain: you don't spit in my food and I don't spit in yours". BOTH LESSENER FOR IT INDEED

Shveiran

I think Cat is making a concession here: that she will try to put Saint down without killing her if she goes for her or Masego. She is not exactly tying her hands, that much I'll grant, but there is a concession.

I disagree with the "both lessened for it" argument, however.

Or rather, I find it distasteful that it was voiced by the party that first made an impassionate speech to ask for a favor, and flat out admitted he wouldn't return it toward Cat.

Granted, Saint's actions may be more easily justified than some of the folks on Cat's side, but the fact remain that this is the same attitude Tariq defaulted to back in their first meeting, when discussing angel and demonic interventions in the coming battles.

Cat's words were something like "this doesn't work if your bargaining position is that we fold when yours don't".

We are still there.

Pilgrim is asking for a concession. Which, you know, if FINE. Nothing wrong with that.

But it's not like he has ever done anything for her that she didn't have to extort from him kicking and screaming, and it's not like he doesn't know a list of things that would make her life a lot easier.

I feel if you are trying to move past "allies of convenience", you may want to open with a concession, a no-string-attached gift, not ask for the other person to spare someone out for their blood and fully capable of taking it. Especially not without any inclination to either extend the same courtesy to the other's loved ones or in any way even the scale without being prompted.

Or, you know, if you did AT LEAST not act like the other's refusal is distasteful.

It's not a mortal sin nor anything, but jeez, in my opinion he really doesn't have the moral high ground making that request.

Liliet

I don't think "we are both lessened for it" is meant as "and you suck".

I think it's meant as "dammit I wish we had a better opportunity here".

Shveiran

It's more the "A banter, then", for me. I read it as "Ok, sure, if you have to be that way, I guess we can do this distasteful thing instead. Since you can't step up to the right one."

Liliet

I think better of Tariq than that.

Mental Mouse

> Literally one chapter ago Catherine blatantly lied to the Saints face about why she had the Sorcerer carry the seven crowns, Saint was probing for tactical information. A "lie" of that blatancy isn't an attempt at deception, it's a flat "none of your business".

Rook

Uh, the fact that she deliberately chose to set the sorcerer up as a target by making him carry the crowns is a deception to start with, and every action taken to hide that intent is just as much of a deception.

I mean I enjoy her antics as much as anyone else but it seems a bit extreme to try turning black into white just because she's a very likeable character. Being shameless and being delusional are two very different things.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, the divisions within the party aren't simple. In particular, Kairos and Saint are both loose cannons, with Cat and Pilgrim respectively as their "keepers". That leaves RS – he's a hero, but there was that little hint at the conclave, of Black's soul (and mind) being still in play, and so Cat's willing to accept him as a fulcrum. Yeah she can't be sure of Black's influence, but what else is new? And the heroes don't seem to know as much as they'd like about RS either.

Cat couldn't keep the crowns because even if it was her plan to begin with, the heroes wouldn't have trusted her with them. Similarly, the villains wouldn't have trusted Pilgrim (and AFAICT he doesn't have a domain anyway). Nobody would have trusted Kairos or Saint with them, except on a basis of "I can take those back when I need to". So: Rogue Sorcerer, possibly (hopefully) paired with Black.

Which all comes down to that Saint's accusation was basically shit-stirring, and Cat's response was entirely justified. Yes, Cat's being tricky. But so is Pilgrim, he's just more used to getting a pass on it.

Jim

It could be a setup for a pattern of three, Saint loses to Cat but is spared similar to the story with William

Xinci

A beautiful thing this. To see the sides and their interactions. To hear the scraping of Good as it toils along becoming more set in its purpose the longer it goes, even as it is ripped and rent into a more efficient tool. It's nice to understand more of what made Saint a blade. It puts more connections up to see why she views the death of systems like she does. Truly a beautifully made tragedy but Creation is a wheel greased with blood, so it goes.

Also good to hear Catherine's side...or Evils I suppose. To hear her speak of her disparate responsibility over the savage few gave a nice feeling of dichotomy. I wonder if it's often like that, the Villains shepherding the outcast and the disparate, moulding them to their system. Gave a heavy feeling of regulation and responsibility which is I suppose part of why no clause could be gotten. Villains doing so at Cat's scale of doing so seems rare but I wonder if she could make it more common with regulation. Losing the royalness might hurt Pilgrim's role and influence as a helper but I do suppose such a tragic sacrifice is necessary if Cat is to succeed.

medailyfun

Cat does not rule much and Pilgrim rules even less, I don't see why dropping his crown has any weight at all

Jim

It was stated earlier that dropping a crown and continuing to hold power would cause a sort of blight over the kingdom of that ruler... Tariq is basically agreeing to stop being the Grey Pilgrim with storyline consequences if he doesn't... Set up for heroic sacrifice is likely

Liliet

I don't think it applies to any power you might hold, only to the actual crown. His crown is not his Bestowal, his crown is his status as a potential Seljun.

Jim

"Though the earthly crown will not be taken from your brow, save if you yourself do so, you will have lost the authority of a ruler in the eyes of the Heavens," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Lingering in that role after discarding it before Gods and men can only bring calamity."

"I figure it'd be subtle at first," I said. "Small nudges. Crops get a little worse, people listen a little less. If you keep holding, though, then it's a different story."

"Disease and strife," the Peregrine said, "and they will only grow, so long as authority is kept."

Liliet

"as a ruler", yes, exactly.

Soma

This is my attempt at the most pompous 'called it' I could make. Forgive me. Or not.

Tek

Truly, that is a greatest achievement of your life. All your efforts and struggles were not pointless – for they led you to that point, a true summary of your toils. How does it feel, to reach a summit of your existence, knowing it all will go downhill from there? I, too, called it, btw, after some deliberation. Though I cited more selfish reasons for him giving up his crown, namely wrestling any connection to newly build highway from the side of Evil and also Cat. A Hero from Above sacrificed his own right to rule for our sake, it only follows that the ones with control over a new realm will be those who are also Heroes from Above. RIGHT?

Soma

Solid call. I suspect the Pilgrim always has more to his game so I'm waiting for multiple hammers on this deal to come. And it's been on the downhill for a while now, why else would I be in the comments?

TeK

Too waste time and energy in pointless speculations about the made up world instead of going out and doing something in the real one. Well this is my reason for comments, anyhow.

Liliet

YO YOU CALLED IT

YOU WERE RIGHT AND I WAS WRONG

GOOD THEORY-ING!!!

Soma

Ayyyyy, hey, you could still be right, honestly. There is time for a last minute twist, so I might be premature in 'calling it', but I think things will go along these lines.

Liliet

True, we might both be right in both possibilities being A Thing in the narrative!

But at the very least I was wrong about Cat potentially blindsiding the Pilgrim by giving up her crown, because he pretty much pointed that out as her alternative to the bargain with him.

Author Unknown

I'm curious if the Rouge Sorcer is carrying around Black's soul. Because everything Tariq said about his crown applies to Black and his claim to the tower. Meaning, Black could pop out and give up his crown, becoming the one that shapes the whole mess. There are all kinds of things he could do with that kind of opportunity.

Mental Mouse

Well, I dunno that he could "pop out", but Cat could presumably give his soul a form made of Night.

Fayhem

> Because everything Tariq said about his crown applies to Black and his claim to the tower.

Sorta? I mean, it's not that you're wrong as such exactly, it's that Praes \neq Levant. Tariq seems to be leveraging the legitimacy of his claim as much as his practical power to effect such a claim. Both ingredients are in there, that's why he both touches on "I could claim power" and touches on "I'm an Isbili". Amadeus has just as much practical power to take rulership of Praes as Tariq does to take rulership of Levant – meaningful power brokers would rally to him, etc. – but he can't be said to have a legitimate claim to rulership of Praes precisely because Praes doesn't recognize the concept of an illegitimate claim to rulership. If you can take it, then you have the right to. But if you haven't taken it yet, then you haven't proven that you can.

Also, on a more meta/strategic level Cat really doesn't want Amadeus to give up his right to rule Praes since that's pretty much the sum total of her long-term strategy for dealing with Praes. She doesn't want to conquer and rule Praes (much to Akua's chagrin/disbelief), leaving Malicia in power is unacceptable, and pretty much every non-Amadeus non-Malicia Praesi with a viable chance at claiming power is a High Lord/Lady with all of Malicia's vices and none of her virtues. She needs Amadeus to take over Praes and turn it into a country Callow can prosperously coexist with.

gyndroid

All fair points, but Catherine bullied a Resurrection from an angel in part because Black was the defacto "Ruler" of Callow, at the time, and she his chosen heir. If that defacto was crownly enough for angels, it might be crownly enough here.

Fayhem

That's now was the defacto "Ruler" of Callow though, as in the past tense form of that. Cat is no longer his heir, she's his successor. You can't still claim a right to rule somewhere after you've already handed over your right to rule to someone else. Either way though Cat would still want him to not since ruling Praes herself is next to the last thing she wants to do and there's no other acceptable internal candidate for rule within Praes.

gyndroid

Hey if Edward Not-Actually-Fairfax still counts, in Catherine's mind, so does Black.

Fayhem

Hmm, interesting counterpoint, I honestly hadn't contrasted it on that basis. I think I would still disagree on the grounds that the Fairfaxes were the last "legitimate" dynasty to rule Callow and Cat has explicitly acknowledged that the legitimacy of her own regime is the "legitimacy" of a successful warlord which is to say thin at best, so in theory a Fairfax who never properly died could still be said to have a legitimate claim to rule – probably not while currently a puppet of the Dead King but it's been established that resurrections are A Thing so King Ed could be said to have a legitimately possible potential right to rule that could be meaningfully surrendered.

Whereas Amadeus' right to rule was always based on Praes ruling Callow and him being the designated Praesi overlord-in-chief; Praes explicitly no longer rules Callow, which means Amadeus has the legitimacy to claim rule of Callow of a successfully expelled warlord, which is to say none at all. It's true that in theory Amadeus/Praes might be able to conquer Callow again, but if that was all it took then literally anybody with an army could claim a "right to rule" literally anywhere in Creation, which clearly isn't the standard being followed.

So tl;dr I still disagree but that's a legitimate point to raise, so thank you for bringing that up!

gyndroid

But I feel like there's enough commonalities Black shares with all the confirmed or textually suspected crowns that it can't be easily written off. Black was basically the ruler of Callow, as functionally confirmed by Angels. He could potentially be the ruler of the Empire, as Tariq could potentially be the ruler of Levant. That he has a claim to ruling Callow only as a warlord is exactly Catherine's claim. He was once ruler, but no longer—just like Edward. And he never, technically, actually "abdicated" Callow to Catherine. Arguably, then, he still has a claim—if a broadly unsupported one.

To be clear, I'm not fully behind the idea that Black's Maybe-Extant crown will come into play at all, but I'm not convinced it doesn't exist, narratively speaking. If nothing else, we don't know what Name Black might be claimant of, right? IF he followed the Bard's prodding (huge if), that name could well be "Dread Emperor".

Fayhem

WordPress appears to have shat itself and is no longer offering the option to reply to stuff this far down the comment chain. So, this is actually a reply to the comment containing the quoted bit.

> That he has a claim to ruling Callow only as a warlord is exactly Catherine's claim.

Yes, exactly. And it has been explicitly noted, by Catherine herself, that a warlord only has a legitimate claim to power so long as they are undefeated. Amadeus' claim on Callow was that he conquered Callow for Praes, and now he's ruling it as the designated Praesi overlord. In other words, his legitimacy was always based on the Praesi Conquest. Amadeus may not have been personally defeated, but Praes is demonstrably no longer ruling Callow. To reuse a line I employed elsewhere, a king in exile is still a king, but a warlord who's been defeated is just a loser. Amadeus may not have been personally defeated, but Praes is demonstrably no longer ruling Callow, which means the premise of his claim to legitimacy has been invalidated. There was no abdication per se involved in that transfer of power, but when you're kicking out a conqueror there's really none required.

As far as Praes goes, honestly I feel like we're re-treading the same ground there. Amadeus may have the ability to claim power in Praes, but he has no special claim to a legitimate right to do so. Tariq has both the ability to claim power in Levant and a special claim to legitimacy, so Amadeus would need both to be equivalent. And regardless, Cat very badly wants him to not give up that right since the only other acceptable resolution to Praes is her taking over and she REALLY does not want to have to be a Dread Empress. If it comes up at all, I think it'll be in the form of Amadeus bringing it up and Cat talking him down from it.

Also btw, given the Liesse Accords' stated stipulation that Named not rule countries my personal theory is that Amadeus will reject the Bard's prodding but still take power to become the first un-Named Dread Emperor of Praes.

Mental Mouse

> he can't be said to have a legitimate claim to rulership of Praes precisely because Praes doesn't recognize the concept of an illegitimate claim to rulership. If you can take it, then you have the right to. But if you haven't taken it yet, then you haven't proven that you can.

That is a good point. Black still does have status as a prior ruler of Callow, though. Regarding your last paragraph: even without Black, Cat could still be "drafted" into taking the Tower, especially if Malicia can't back off and leave Callow alone.

Fayhem

> Black still does have status as a prior ruler of Callow, though.

True, but I think I pointed out elsewhere that it's a fundamentally different type of status from (for instance) King Ed. A king in exile is still a king. A warlord who's been defeated is just a loser. Amadeus' claim on Callow was always that he/Praes conquered it and now he's in charge as the designated Praesi overlord-in-chief. Amadeus personally wasn't defeated as such, but Praes is demonstrably no longer ruling Callow.

Mental Mouse

But what I'm saying is that Cat legitimized him with the Sword-in-the-Stone move, and that probably sticks.

Fayhem

Not following you there tbh. As I read it the angel-mugging was predicated off of cleverly framing the facts on the ground – I don't think the fact of doing so actually altered any of them (aside from, y'know, Cat and William swapping sides on the corpse spectrum). Cat's own legitimacy has been explicitly and repeatedly noted to be no more than the legitimacy of a warlord – if she didn't legitimize herself by that maneuver it's hard to see how it would have done that for Amadeus.

Mental Mouse

She might have started out as a warlord, but at this point, she is very much a Queen, with soldiers, citizenry, and other polities recognizing her crown. If she's illegitimate solely because she's not descended from the last dynasty, how can anyone be a legitimate ruler of Callow? Remember, Black wiped out the royal line!

Pulling the Sword in the Stone may have been initially based on "pulling a fast one", but succeeding (and surviving) that amounted to recognition by the Heavens. And thus she was established as the heir to the (then-)reigning king (by "right of conquest") of Callow, namely Black.

Fayhem

Replying here because WordPress won't let me reply below.

> She might have started out as a warlord, but at this point, she is very much a Queen, with soldiers, citizenry, and other polities recognizing her crown.

No other polities have recognized her right to rule IIRC. There was a whole thing about it back during the negotiations around the Battle of the Camps, and I don't think anyone's official stance on that has changed. Soldiers supporting your rule is included in the definition of a warlord, so there's definitely no distinction to be drawn there. You have a better case when referring to popular support from a modern perspective, but on Calernia the only example of governmental legitimacy being based on popular support is Bellerophon. Callow has always operated on feudal rules, and Cat is still just a commoner with an army under typical rules of feudal legitimacy since those are pretty heavily based on blood right.

Also, I'm pretty skeptical that Cat could claim to have been recognized by the Heavens as a legitimate ruler of Callow given they've been throwing heroes at her to try to murder her back off that throne from day 1.

It is all a somewhat moot point since Cat's long-term plan involves sidestepping issues of whether she's legitimately Queen by just abdicating so it no longer matters, but it does have present implications as far as how she's viewed by other parties. Cat has repeatedly explicitly assessed herself as someone who's viewed as a warlord; it's not impossible she's wrong about that, but the evidence of how she's treated/regarded by others seems to support it so far.

Mental Mouse

Even if she's a legitimate ruler, she's still a Villain ruler, which is why heroes come after her, just as villains try to overthrow Good rulers. And as Amadeus noted, both sides have gotten dangerously good at suppressing those would be rebels.

Other polities may be trying to conquer Callow (again), but she's the one they negotiate with regarding Callow.

Fayhem

> Other polities may be trying to conquer Callow (again), but she's the one they negotiate with regarding Callow.

Because they have to, but they're pointedly refused to acknowledge her as actually legitimate while doing so. Again, see the whole "Queen of Callow" vs. "Queen in Callow" thing during the negotiations around the Battle of the Camps. Here, I'll pull up a relevant quote from Bk IV Ch 20 (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/06/13/chapter-20-onset/>):

"negotiations were now being held between the Queen in Callow and the mandated expeditionary force of the First Prince. Aisha had tried for Queen of Callow, but they'd gotten out of that by pointing out that unless the Highest Assembly passed a motion or Hasenbach recognized it by decree, they couldn't legally recognize Callow as a sovereign state with me as its ruler."

Neither of those two things has happened.

Mental Mouse

OK Fayhem, you've convinced me that she's basically a warlord... but she and the others clearly think that's enough to count here: Pilgrim was explicit that he was offering his crown in lieu of hers, specifically to avoid her abdication.

Also, re:

> I hope this doesn't come off as rude...

I will never take offense at simple disagreement, and you've been entirely civil in this interchange, even when (as you pointed out) I was well off-base from the text. It's been a pleasure debating such points with you (and that goes also for Liliet and the others who've similarly engaged me).

> you've convinced me that she's basically a warlord... but she and the others clearly think that's enough to count here: Pilgrim was explicit that he was offering his crown in lieu of hers, specifically to avoid her abdication.

And I don't disagree that Cat herself does qualify! My point was that the legitimacy of a warlord differs on a qualitative basis from the legitimacy of a, eh, let's say more "conventionally acceptable" King/Queen. And if Cat doesn't have a higher degree of legitimacy than "warlord" despite being actually Callowan, having the backing of Callowan nobility, and at least carrying the title of Queen even if it isn't properly recognized outside Callow itself, then Amadeus certainly doesn't and never has. Which means that for any claim that Amadeus currently has legitimacy you have to consider that a warlord essentially has legitimacy to rule for exactly as long as nobody is successfully disputing that right. Praes has for all intents and purposes been successfully expelled from the rule of Callow, so my argument is that the legitimacy of a Praesi warlord is at this point effectively null and void for these purposes.

> I will never take offense at simple disagreement, and you've been entirely civil in this interchange, even when (as you pointed out) I was well off-base from the text. It's been a pleasure debating such points with you (and that goes also for Liliet and the others who've similarly engaged me).

Aww. Please, consider the sentiment reciprocated!

Fayhem

Ayyy lmao, clearly I should have read the current chapter before continuing to argue that Amadeus wouldn't qualify and the sword-in-the-stone trick didn't count for that. You called it!

Mental Mouse

For our exchange that's pinned against the reply limit, I think I accidentally replied to myself, so please scan the thread for my latest. 😊

Fayhem

> Regarding your last paragraph: even without Black, Cat could still be "drafted" into taking the Tower, especially if Malicia can't back off and leave Callow alone.

Augh, I meant to put this in the same reply. D'oh. Anyway, my point wasn't that she couldn't be dragged into taking the Tower it's that she really really really doesn't want to be effectively cornered into ruling Praes. And Amadeus taking over instead is the only feasible/realistic alternative to her having to do that: Malicia staying in power is a non-option and a High Lord/Lady being the one to take over for her instead of Amadeus or Cat would be even worse.

Mental Mouse

That's what I mean by "drafted". If Amadeus is off the table (for any reason), Cat needs to deal with Malicia herself. And "Praesi rules" mean the only way to do that is to take the Tower.

Fayhem

Right. And Cat doesn't want to have to do that. That's always been my point. I hope this doesn't come off as rude because that's not what I mean, but I feel like either my original point must not have been clear or I must not be understanding what you're getting at now. Because it looks like you're just re-stating the premise of my original point and I'm not sure what the point of doing that is.

Mental Mouse

I'm not sure where you get the idea that Cat doesn't want to abdicate!

Her abdication has been teased since (iirc) before she was officially Queen, she made preparations for it before the surrender, she's taken up a competing commitment in her priesthood, and she'd get a major payoff for doing it now.

Fayhem

I... what? Cat very much wants to abdicate, yes. Cat very much does not want to go be Dread Empress of Praes. The second one was my point.

Liliet

eyyyyy

Briskly

The Grey Pilgrim is super deep into the groove of his role this chapter. I wonder how much of this was him consciously acting as if cat was a Hero instead of a Villain.

Liliet

This is a fucking great question and I suspect "all of it". He's spotted her groove being that already, he and Laurence discussed it at Battle of Camps. She dismissed it as not evidence of anything, he's GOING FOR IT 😊

Dainpdf

"The Tyrant of Helike, he announced, had betrayed us."
You don't say.

Liliet

Everyone was VERY SHOCKED 😬

Dainpdf

Typical Hero prejudice, btw. I am sure the Tyrant is innocent. He's promised Cat eternal friendship!

Liliet

The joke is that that's exactly how he's acting actually.

caoimhinh

So there's an ancient Warlock with Owu in their name, eh?
The evilness of UwU is confirmed hahaha.

Nice chapter.

Tariq is still hypocritically thinking that only Evil has to make concessions in a bargain and that Good has every right to it while calling Cat a bad person for not asking his side to also make concessions.

Good to see he is staying in character.

So now Kairos betrayed them and robbed Rogue Sorcerer from the Seven Crowns and probably Amadeus' soul too. That means Catherine gets to beat him and steal that from him. Cool.

Now, their band of 5 is broken, but there's a certain disciple of the Lady of the Lake that was sent to search for Masego months ago and has a knack for appearing dramatically when they need her. Hopefully we'll get to see her here and save Masego.

Or it could be that the Band of Five against Larat will be with Masego in it. There are plenty of possibilities.

P.S: Amadeus' words really hurt Tariq, eh?

Typos found:

-giving though to their aftermath / giving thought to their aftermath

-the most accomplish hero / the most accomplished hero

-ties got both ways / ties go both ways

-I ask you to see you for what she is / I ask you to see her for what she is

-had mere hours been trying / had mere hours ago been trying

TeK

While it may be misinterpreted by less bright that Tyrant is betraying them, he really just maneuvering himself to be in the position to better help the rest of the band (whom all are his most treasured, not friends, but brothers and sisters, and it is well known how he cherishes his family, a true example of loyalty and trustworthiness. He will later sacrifice himself for his comrades and redeem himself, and become a Hero Calernia deserves, just you see!

vamair

A hero it deserves, huh? Seems legit.

werafdsaew

I actually think that there might be some truth to this, in that Kairos is maneuvering himself to betray the Dead King, because he's not getting another chance. He has to betray EVERYBODY, and that includes the Dead King.

Andrew Mitchell

^^^THIS.

Mental Mouse

Gotta ~~catch~~betray them all! 😊

Liliet

I mean he's literally going along with Cat's plan, and she didn't even explicitly ask him to!

medailyfun

Tariq actually thinks Villains have relative standings towards the good not absolute, thus Villains making concessions would bring both parties closer to goodness, while making a bargain would be a step away for both as well

Liliet

>while calling Cat a bad person for not asking his side to also make concessions

I don't see him calling Cat a bad person there. He says "we are both lessened for this", and I don't think he means it in the sense of "I am upset and you're a bad person". I think he means "an opportunity lost for a connection forged". I am not seeing him be judgy @ Cat here at all, if anything he's giving her a lot of credit in addressing her as someone who values all the same things he does.

>P.S: Amadeus' words really hurt Tariq, eh?

I love Catherine going "???" @ the suggestion Tariq's to blame for the Dead King there ♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

Yes, Amadeus made a real impression there, and Tariq might actually be growing personally. Cat couldn't completely reproduce his reasoning, but I'm sure he'll explain it later.

As far as "we are both lessened"... you don't always get an easy cooperation, where both sides get their stake back with interest. Sometimes you need to instead share a loss, just to keep the relationship going. By Cat's standards this one is small potatoes, but Tariq isn't used to negotiations where he actually has to concede an opponent's goals. He's fine with working together for common benefit, or trading tactical position, but he always had a fallback to “if you will not renounce your evil purposes, then we must do battle!”. Actually letting the other party achieve their own goals that he’d been opposing – that’s new to him.

That said, he’s still not very good at it. As we’ve been noting, he wasn’t using that crown anyway – in fact, it arguably handicapped him in his early negotiations with Cat. For the flip side, he’s asking that Cat refrain from killing someone who has repeatedly insulted, threatened, and otherwise menaced her, recently. Not that she as a Villain hasn’t stayed her hand on enemies before... but Pilgrim wanted it unconditional, even at the cost of Cat’s original purpose for taking this mission. He simply wasn’t going to get that.

Rook

To be fair, ‘the other party’s own goals’ when dealing with Villains is typically the horrific kind, not continental peace. Catherine is the exception, not the rule.

I mean consider it, how many Villains have there been in this story that are halfway decent enough that even Catherine would feel comfortable letting them get their way (at least, among the ones outside her own band). The Tyrant? Malicia? Akua? The Calamities? The closest would be either Ranger, who even Black doesn’t view as a true Villain, or Black himself, who she ended up stabbing and issuing an ultimatum to, declaring that he needs to change or become a corpse.

He’s not used to the consequence of the other party getting their way resulting in the Liesse Accords. He’s used to the consequence being Second Liesse.

Mental Mouse

At this point, Cat has demonstrated pretty thoroughly that she really is an exception.

Liliet

It’s a process :3

Mental Mouse

On consideration, I’m going to walk back the bit about “Pilgrim wasn’t using his crown” – that is after all why he’s not just another big hero like Hanno. It was still a handicap in his early dealings with Cat, precisely because of that.

Liliet

On the other hand, he was taking a step in inviting Catherine to explicitly stand on his side in this. He was inviting her to stand even closer to him than Laurence, in having this conversation behind her back – “well you know how she is, but you and I are reasonable people and we can forgive that, right?”

Imagine the story of it: Laurence attacking Catherine, and Catherine defending herself yet sparing her life, for no other reason than that Tariq had pled for it.

“Because I’m asking” is a damn heavy reason, story-wise.

And Catherine’s reply was that she will only take that step if she gets to take her whole party with her, giving Tariq an obligation to defend them even if they make “mistakes” of that caliber in turn.

And they’re not quite there yet.

Mental Mouse

I’m guessing Kairos got the seven crowns, but not Amadeus’ soul. (I’ll admit, seeing Black trying to manipulate Kairos would be fun.) And yeah, if Kairos has shown his cards, there’s a slot open for a replacement. Archer would be really fun – she’s something of a loose cannon herself, and generally a better counterpart to Saint. Downside: For the heroes, she’d be coming clear out of left field. That’s kind of the point of a “brick joke”, but it would be awkward at the moment. She would be more plausible showing up in the endgame with the Power of Love card.

The other question is, do the heroes have their own brick in flight? Hanno hasn’t been seen in a while, and he makes a good brick. :-p Probably not a worldhopper on his own, though. The Witch Of The Woods would be a more plausible arrival.

Valkyria

I hope the Sorcerer isn’t that badly wounded and still able to fight.

We know almost nothing about him and in the last chapters Cat herself thought him the biggest uncertainty in her plans and trickery. That seemed like some sort of foreshadowing. Would be kind of anticlimatic for him to be mostly out of the picture already.

onedollargum

I’m glad the sorcerer is wounded. He’d been practically untouched before and Cat was really worried about his potential. Now that Sorcerer and Tyrant have blunted each other a bit they might actually stand a chance against the Dead King.

Mental Mouse

Agreed, that "never took a wound" thing was a bit too uncanny to stand. And yeah, he'll be able to fight. I assume more details will be forthcoming tomorrow; my wild guess is that they met Skein and Kairos booked it with the seven crowns and probably Black's soul (if RS still has that last, Cat's plans have gone seriously awry). This is nothing to panic over, remember Cat doesn't have to summon Larat until our party reclaims the crowns.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, he'll still have an important role in what's to come. That's certain IMO. EE always delivers on events he's foreshadowed.

WarDaft

Why, you might even say that it is...

... an Irritant!

Ein

I've got a theory I've been throwing around in my head for a while. IIRC the current "meta" of Heroes vs Villains is based on stories. Who is the teller of stories? The Bard. We don't know much, but she is older than dirt, and has had her hand on the scales for millennia. I think there is an assumption that she is a pawn in the great game. What if this chicken came before the egg?

Most stories of gods irl have an ancient war in which gods slug it out for dominance. The Greeks/Romans had the Titan War, Judeo Christians had the War of Heavens and the Fall of Lucifer, etc. These are often described as cataclysmic wars in which the very fabric of reality was changed.

Now enters a storyteller. Maybe a primitive tribe's shaman, elder, etc. The people of the land are stuck in the middle of an apocalyptic war in which the gods are throwing haymakers at each other. She comes up with a treaty: The war will forever be fought in story and allegory. Heroes and villains can fight for dominance, but will always be balanced out by the flow of the narrative. There will never be total victory on either side, but creation will not get wiped out in the process.

This woman is the arbitrator of this narrative balance. The storyteller. The Bard.

Millennia later, another lady, an orphan by birth, loyal to a polity beset by above and below, and trained in the art of the narrative, sees her current world as an unknowing microcosm of the previous god war and wants to de-escalate the situation further and thus we got the PGtE. I think at the end of things, Cat will usurp the bards role via a new treaty in the vein of the liess accords while breaking the old pact (which could cause some awesome god battles in the last book).

My 2 cents. Had to get it off my chest.

Ein

Another theory:

The rogue sorcerer IS the dead.king, or an avatar thereof. Now in control of Black's soul, he will be raised as a revenant and she will have to make the classic choice of whom to save: her father or her dearest friend.

I expect her to take the third route, but she has been doing too well not to have the pendulum swing back at her.

Mental Mouse

To make a Revenant out of Black, DK would first have to get hold of his body. (That said, he might be able to manage a spectre or suchlike.) But Cat could certainly take his soul and make him a Night-shade like Akua.

Liliet

I do want to note that Bard strikes me as a de-escalator rather than escalator, here, too.

And I, too, like the idea of Catherine taking over her role as an enforcer of HER order, now – a better one than the previous version.

Andrew Mitchell

> I do want to note that Bard strikes me as a de-escalator rather than escalator, here, too.

How so? My impression was that the Bard gave the Dead King permission to "eat the baby". That's a massive escalation.

Javvies

Plus, I'm pretty sure that we're pretty sure that Bard was helping Saint organize the Conclave that got Cat declared Arch-heretic of the East.

I don't see how that can possibly be construed as anything other than an escalation.

Liliet

My impression was that she doesn't get to give people permission or not.

She invited him to do something he was already going to do, and what exactly the marginal effects of her also saying that were, we don't know yet.

Do distinguish short-term from long-term, and do keep in mind that the more the Dead King overextends, the more harshly he gets to be slapped down.

Mental Mouse

I think Bard is supposed to be keeping a balance, but may well be either going off the reservation, or losing her grip on the situation. If not both!

Liliet

So, to tally up the ways this chapter fucked with me personally:

– Kairos did, in fact, follow up on Catherine's expectations of him – thank god, thank god and thank god. This is the one pessimistic expectation of mine that got dashed -_- – aaaaaaaaaaugh. Of course Catherine doesn't get the easy 'dash heroic expectations and prove yourself good' story. Like they're all not wrong that abdicating here would be kind of a bad idea, but meta speaking the narrative would have had nowhere to go but up from there >x> I wanted the simple...

– at the same time, part of the reason she didn't get to dash heroic expectations here is that the heroic expectations aren't that low already. Another reminder for everyone that to say Tariq and Laurence don't see eye to eye on this is like saying Catherine has a mild dislike of Akua's actions. She doesn't get to convince Laurence the way I hoped she might (fat chance @ me), but she doesn't need to convince Tariq – he knows, or at least, he hopes and is betting on it;

– I see you erratic, I see you reassuring everyone that Amadeus definitely totally under no circumstances could be a Hero – or at least, that Catherine thinks so 😊 Everyone who thought so already will pat themselves on the head and can feel free to do so – at the very least, we do learn that Catherine is certain of it. I'm just over here like... my theory rests on dashing expectations in the first place, that's the joke 😊 it remains exactly as crack as it ever was, this could be build up for it or against it with equal grace;

– I genuinely did not see how Tariq’s “crown” could come into play here. Should have known better after Catherine brought it up, it wouldn’t have been left dangling with no payoff. Nice;

– this is not exactly the ‘fucking with my predictions’ kind of reaction, but: I like Tariq’s description of Kairos. This is the kind of empathetic shit a person with Behold SHOULD get to dish out;

– aww @ the entirety of Cat’s reactions here. God fucking bless her everything;

– the fucking Book of All Things quote and everything about it ;u;

Mental Mouse

I’m still half-expecting Cat and Pilgrim to at least squabble over the check before this is done. With a definite chance for Kairos to grab it, even if that ends up with the League being cursed. Kairos might even survive awhile as a true King of Misrule.

Cold Cyberia

As cliché as it sounds, I’m expecting Indrani to come in at the crucial moment and save Masego with the Power of Love. Imo, this is all a big distraction from Cat and the main purpose is to deal with Larat and fulfill the crown bargain.

Mental Mouse

Well, she’s certainly a “brick” that hasn’t reappeared yet.

tkjarrah

->“When we first spoke in Callow, years ago, you told me you were tired of killing children because they were on the wrong side.”
wait how long has it been since the beginning of book 4? i thought it’d only been about a year, not multiple

darkening

The trip to Keter was very long to get there, and didn’t instantly start after the battle of camps, and ever dark was many months, but yeah, I would’ve put it about a year more than multiple

tkjarrah

yeah, the pilgrim refers to it as 'years ago', which caught me off guard

Fayhem

I actually had an estimate pretty close to yours, but now that we've gotten an in-universe statement to the contrary I do see a few time-increasing factors that aren't included in your tally. One, IIRC it was stated that the trip/march from Laure up to the Battle of the Camps was at least a month or maybe two even with the fae gates, so the trip back would have been at least as long and quite likely longer even if they used the fae gates to get back, given all the wounded they had at that point. And I don't remember either way on this point, but if it wasn't specified it would at least be plausible that they wouldn't use the fae gates at all given all the aforementioned wounded – yes they're faster, but even with safe passage from the Monarchs of Arcadia if you parade your wounded around there's no guarantee you won't attract the attention of something nasty that doesn't answer to them so why risk losses when there's no longer a rush (Cat might not have wanted to give Pilgrim any more of an up-close look at her gates than necessary either). If so, then since the fae gates are a multiplier for movement rate it would be at least 3-4 months coming back down.

Two, the trip to Keter was indeed quite quite long, but the trip to the Everdark wasn't short either.

Three, Cat's adventures in the Everdark did indeed take quite a while, but IIRC it was at least a few months of off-camera shaking things out and getting plans set before she led the expeditionary force out of the Everdark – and again, marching halfway across the continent takes an amount of time measured in months even with gates. And then it was I think at least a month or so of marching around Procer trying to find where the fuck everybody is before the action started kicking off.

I would honestly still be dubious of it being anything more than a couple of years since that still feels like an outside estimate to me, but technically two is enough to use the plural.

Liliet

there definitely wasn't another winter I agree with you 0.0

SpeckofStardust

The whole this bargain lessens both of us, as other people has mention is that the fact that this agreement needs to be made at all instead of it being a thing that would end up being true anyway. Like really this is a its just sad that we have to agree not to punch each other in the face instead of simply not doing so anyway.

Berder

That was a good speech by Tariq, but I'm confused as to the outcome. What promise did Tariq actually secure? The only circumstances under which Cat was likely to kill the Saint, was if the Saint attacked Heirophant or Cat. And it is acknowledged that Cat will kill the Saint to defend Heirophant. Is Cat promising that she will not defend herself if the Saint decides to try to kill her?

It would be quite a tall order for Cat to defend herself non-lethally against a thing like the Saint. Did Cat just agree to be murdered?

Shveiran

I think the promise is that she will make a good faith attempt at sparing her unless she kills Masego. That includes trying to stop her non-lethally if she attacks her or Masego (and it is possible) rather than using the chance to take care of a liability she wants removed. It's not a "I swear I'll never kill her even if it kills me", but a "I'll really try not to, rather than go out of my way to find a clean way to get rid of her".

Though when I think about it, I wonder if Cat will end up letting Saint kill her could be how this ends. You know, showing she can keep to her word and rely on Tariw to Forgive her back on her feet. I could see that happening.

Liliet

that would be fucking amazing

Tariq can only Forgive at dawn tho so that would take Cat out of the fight)=

Mental Mouse

Actually, I'd say that between story-fu and OP powers, Cat is probably one of the few people who could conceivably manage to take Saint down without killing her. Even Rumena could hold his own against Saint, and Cat could potentially "Take" Saint's domain! (I imagine Pilgrim could help with putting it back afterwards.)

shveiran

She could, I agree. But it would be both harder AND not what she wants, especially because the understanding is that Saint won't stop trying.

Which is why it's a big concession, I'd wager.

Mental Mouse

Precisely. Cat has been remarkably restrained, mostly for the sake of not offending Pilgrim (and keeping Saint's firepower). And we're not just talking about "Praesi honor" (heh) here.

If Saint wasn't literally a holy terror, even the stuff she's said to Cat's face, would have "normal folks" (in any of the party's various nations) assuming they needed to kill her before she killed them.

Aotrs Commander

Sorry, I'll just be over here snorting with incredulous laughter that Saint is getting praised for massecring sick people. THAT'S Above's solutions to plague?

Not to beat a zombie horse here, but isn't "burn the infected" usually the resort of the crazy military angaonists? Or the sort of thing made a joke about completely murder-hobo players of RPGs?

Talk about "where you're a hammer, everything looks like a nail."

I mean, it's not EVEN like we know magic can't work on disease, since we literally saw Pilgrim straight-up murder and entire settlement of his own side via biological warfare, so yeah, I'm totally convinced Above can't use minions to magically cure plagues, in the same way that i'm completely shocked Kairos betrayed everyone.

So I can only gape in astonishment at both that and Pilgrim's "look, she murdered hundreds of people because they got sick (which would obviously include children and the elderly), so like, don't hurt her when she goes out and kills all your friends and probably you, yo?"

I am honestly kind of gobsmacked at that level of... Just... WOW.

Mental Mouse

Magic and miracle can certainly deal with natural disease because there it's unopposed. Even there, it might well need to be cured on a case-by-case basis, which is a bit tough when the numbers go up. Magical plagues would be a different story.

Fayhem

Yeah, what Mental Mouse said. Literally Pilgrim's origin story starts with his home city being ravaged by a plague that was incredibly difficult to stop once it got started. Also, why is the example used of how easy it supposedly would be to stop a plague an example of creating a plague that then couldn't be stopped except by, oh what was it, oh yeah by killing everyone who had been exposed? Plagues spread themselves, that's kind of a defining feature. Cures don't. If you're suggesting some sort of "fight fire with fire" scenario instead, trying to fight a plague with a plague is how you wind up with two plagues.

Mental Mouse

Even the Dead King apparently got some rough lessons that plagues are not acceptable.

Pilgrim might have gotten away with his, solely because he completely contained it.

shveiran

True enough, but I think what he's coming from is "how can these Heroes be both this used to extreme measures, hard choices and lesser evils and STILL have these white-and-black worldview?

parahacker

I half expected Kairos to betray Catherine by not betraying her. He had to know she was counting on it.

Morgenstern

Really? Giving The Saint free right to murder anyone but Masego? If that's not idiocy coming to bite Cat in the ass, I don't know what is...

Mental Mouse

I think she figures she can take Saint, Archer can at least dodge her long enough for Cat or Pilgrim to restrain her, and Kairos deserves her. 😊

TeK

So, Pilly gives up his tattered crown to Tattered Throne in exchange to, what, Cat not killing Saint without a solid reason? Seems like exactly the type of a deal you will do with a Villain. Both the heroic sacrifice for a comrade, and underlying expectation that Cat is really just another murderous lunatic. Nice to see, that even when Pilgrim TRYES to act towards Cat as though she is a human being, he's just, like, can't.

I am also a little uncertain whether she should take that bargain. Killing Saint aside, it seems that the narrative here is "A former Villain allies herself with Heroes against a Big Bad".

In that narrative, regardless of what Cat wants or considers fair, she has to prove herself to be actually trustworthy. And for that she has to give up something, very implicitly. GP giving her a way out of proving herself to be Good, does not work well for her, narratively. Because if she doesn't need that crown as much as she claims, it is a very neat pattern, for her to give up her crown here, it gives her various upsides, with probable backsides only being unrest in Callow, but then, she is not going in there, next one on the menu is DK, and when she will return, she can make it official. She got the time frame for it, not like she is forbidden from leading, so she can still be in the position of power. I don't see a reason NOT to abdicate, frankly.

I am officially dissatisfied with Tyrant. He is expected by Cat to betray them – pretty blatantly, I might add, so best betrayal for him would be not to betray her at all. I still hope this is just a huge misunderstanding, and he is not, ya know, actually willing to betray them.

Liliet

Actually on reread I realize that what Pilgrim is asking is for Catherine to spare Laurence if she attacks her. Like, the scenario he's asking is one in which Cat tries her best to avoid killing her in self-defense.

Which also puts in stark relief why he refused Cat asking for the same for her entire party lmao

Eric Steel

'She is not witty or brilliant or fascinating, those traits that so often make the worst of us seem forgivable.'

Pretty much sums up most comments disliking the Saint. Why doesn't the Saint like the main character, who is the high priestess of two twin gods of bloodshed and strife, who keeps in her service psychopaths and murderers, when she's so witty and funny?

Just look at her willingness to use the shade and keep a cordial relationship with her, a person who killed droves of her own people. Why? Because the shade is funny.

Masego just seems like a dangerous character to enable and give power to when he's shows so little empathy for other people. Who also appears to have gone crazy cause people he actually cared about dies, so now he's off to try and kill who knows how many.

But nah, the life of a hero who dedicated her life to destroy evil is worth the same as a psychopath's/sociopath's or whatever would be the right term for Masego.

On another note; great novel! I look forward to seeing more.

Mental Mouse

Mmm, you're mixing at least three different viewpoints there. Pilgrim is explicitly defending Saint. Your first paragraph is Saint's perspective, your second probably would be if Saint actually knew about Akua, which she probably doesn't. Likewise, for your third: Saint doesn't know Masego at all, to her he's just the successor to Warlock as the top Evil mage.

We commenters more or less reached consensus that Masego seems to be what we'd call a high-functioning autistic. (He does lack the usual sensory-overload vulnerability, but that seems a natural candidate for compensating with magic – with extra magical senses, even normal mages would probably need something in that vein) He's also Praesi born and bred, with their usual disdain for human life. That said, autistic folks famously tend not to completely absorb the mores and customs of their society, and Masego doesn't seem to have any actual viciousness in him. (Admittedly, combined with what he does have of Praesi attitudes, that arguably makes him scarier!)

Even with this "breakdown", note that he hasn't been laying waste to the vicinity; the shard would have done so without intervention, if he didn't do anything to stop it... but we have no idea what he was planning, and Iserre seems an odd target for vengeance. It seems quite likely to me that he was thinking in terms of making his own world and pulling it in around him, using Liesse largely to attain apotheosis (by Neshamah's method) and perhaps for cosmic engineering.

One point I don't think we've brought up, is that by now, or at least by the time the party reaches him, he probably has achieved immortality, at least on the level of Emperor Nefarious. Cat's example might well inspire him to reconsider that, and if so, Pilgrim might be able to do something about it. We also don't know how much of the original looming shard situation represents the Dead King's meddling with Masego's original plan.

This gives me a thought on the story arc: Given that the Forever King was foreshadowed from the beginning but has not yet appeared, Book VI might well be his book. Given that... this book may well culminate with the final end of the Dead King!

Consider the sheer power in play: The freshly-immortal Masego, Son Of The Red Skies, at the helm of Liesse. An almost as newly-risen pair of Dark Goddesses, with the Black Queen herself as their priestess and channel. Joined by three of the most powerful Heroes on the continent. Plus two more exceptionally crazed and powerful Villains. And for salt, the former Black Knight, the most sophisticated schemer of his generation, is, um, "present in spirit". Just maybe, they could pull it off...

Kissaten

So, two villains having false secret alliance with each other is the one true way to defeat all heroes. As long as two villains are enemies to each other and can take turns playing lesser evil to the heroic side they are basically invincible. All their plot power will be destroyed the moment they are revealed to have a secret alliance, however, so they actually have to be enemies to each other, otherwise it wouldn't work.

Kind of surprising only Kairos and Cat used something like that in Guideverse consciously. There were villains who acted like that, but they weren't conscious of the narrative side of this thing, Black with Malicia and possibly Dead King with Triumphant.

Mental Mouse

> As long as two villains are enemies to each other and can take turns playing lesser evil to the heroic side

Yeah, but that part went by the wayside at the conclave. Nobody thought Kairos was the lesser evil, he's lucky they even let him play.

Liliet

This.

gyndroid

Wait. How many "and one" crowns are in play, now?

Tariq, Catherine, Tyrant, that's three definite ones. Maybe Thief of Stars. Maybe Spellsword. Maybe, soon enough, Edward Not-Fairfax. 3 more, suspected by Catherine. Maybe Black, depending on whether his position as basically successor to Malicia, and former ruler of Callow count (and if former ruler counts for Edward, as Catherine suspects it might, then I don't see why it wouldn't really count for Black either. He was enough of a ruler in Callow that Catherine, being his successor, got to use it to claim a sword and bully a Resurrection). And we know she can store bodies in Night so there's no reason she can't have stored Black, too.

Maybe Skein, depending on how literal the lord part of "Horned Lords" are. Probably not though. I can't remember though. If Catherine ignored it, I'm not inclined to count it. Maybe Dead King. That technically counts, though it's...hard to imagine a circumstance in which he gives up his crown.

That's...7(or 8) possible "and one" crowns. Maybe not all of mortal realms, but...
Huh.
It's probably just a coincidence though.

gyndroid

00oh, and Hierarch. Can't forget about him.

Mental Mouse

I'd say forget Skein (and Saint!).

That leaves:

- 1) Three living crowns from Cat's party.
- 2) If Eddie-7 shows up, that would make three undead crowns from DK, otherwise two.
- 3) Black's soul is Cat's joker.
- 4) The Hierarch might turn out to be another joker, but per the text, he's currently shielding Kairos from scrying/precog.
- 5) DK himself is presumably eligible, but I'm pretty sure that ain't gonna happen. 😊

Of course, Cat's immediate response to the undead crowns was literally "it's a trap", and she's probably right. "Get thee behind me tempter... no on second thought, stay right where I can see you". 😊

I suspect that the Dead King might snaffle Hierarch somehow; as I've noted before, using Hierarch might make the travel realm unusable for mortal armies, but DK could probably make at least some use of it anyway.

Mental Mouse

Oh, just thought of another wrinkle, not crown-related: Kairos is the designated traitor for Cat's side. Suppose Eddie-7 manages to betray the Dead King?

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. I've got this vision of King Edward somehow managing to escape from the Dead King's control through some amazing heroic effort (and maybe some help from Cat).

A M A Z I N G

Mental Mouse

It's clear from their prior encounter that he retains at least most of his original memories and personality; it's not clear just how DK exerts control over him.

Jernik

Oh no, I finally caught up!

Mental Mouse

My condolences! At least it's only an hour or so until the next chapter posts, after that you get to wait and debate with the rest of us.

shveiran

Hello, could someone please help me out?

I've only recently started to join the discussion, and when I do a tag always shows saying my comment is "awaiting moderation". But I think I left 3-4 comments here yesterday, and now they have disappeared.

Is there some requisite to comment freely I'm unaware of?

Mental Mouse

I think it's basically a matter of EE dealing with his queue to enable you; he might do that over the weekend.

shveiran

Ah, so that's how it works! Thank you very much

Captain Amazing

The Dead King is trying to create his own 7 and 1.

1-4 The four princes/princesses that carried Catherine's palanquin to Keter with their crowns nailed to their heads.

5 the Rat King known as the Skein

6 the Crown of Stars taken from the Thief of Stars

7 the Forever Kong's son, likely crowned in his own right

8 Good King Edward Fairfax 7th

Whichever crown she used as the "one" likely has a corresponding shape he could counter with. He made a point of showing them to her to make the resulting story stronger. The Crown of Stars probably covers any fae or supernatural crown she could lead with.

I think the Hierarch's crown also counts as 7 and 1 for the seven cities of the League and one for himself. He's going to throw his hat in, muddy up the waters, save the day, and somehow transform the League into a democracy with him still in charge.

Mental Mouse

Eh. As noted before, Skein is dubious. More to the point, Cat almost certainly won't summon Larat until she has all her pieces ready. (And probably, after Masego has been sorted out.)

Once Larat has ascended, the crown business is over and done with, then the task is to kill the new god. Which just has to be “easier said than done”, especially given how smoothly things have been going so far. Hmm, it occurs to me that if this scheme doesn't have any wheels come off it, that would practically be proof that Cat really is playing by Heroic rules now.

Liliet

lmao yeah

milieu

Could someone enlighten me who Doom is? I don't recall reading about her at all in this series...

milieu

Never mind the Doom of Liesse – duh

Andrew Mitchell

TBH that one took me a good few minutes to figure out too. 😊

Delphos

“if she does not kill the Heiophant”, not “if she does not kill Masego.”

Uh oh.

shveiran

True, but I don't think that will be an issue: context matters.

This isn't the Fae, but two prospective allies striking a deal in good faith: the meaning behind their words is clear, if Tariq tried to slip out of his obligations that way he'd be hearing bad karma story-wise AND earn Cat's enmity for good, with no real gain. I mean, he probably would like getting rid of Masego as he is a dangerous liability, but with all that is happening? Trying to rules-lawyer the deal this way really feels both out of character and short-sighted.

Liliet

yeah

and I mean their deal is basically “if Saint is still alive at the end of this you get a crown for it” “cool but be aware I have a line that if she steps over I'm going to say fuck your crown”

this ain't an obligation on Cat's part this is a condition she's unilaterally informing him of

Andrew Mitchell

Well spotted. I wonder if it will be significant.

Chapter 41: Ante

"It is the nature of gambling that the scope of one's victory is proportionate to the scope of all others' defeat. So is it with empire, and near as subordinate to chance."

– Dread Emperor Venal

I studied the Rogue Sorcerer closely as he hobbled forward, not out of any great affection for the man but because the state of him was a piece of information that'd allow me to discern the nature of Kairos Theodosian's game. When the Tyrant had turned on us, had he gone for the kill or for a more amicable form of betrayal? The Sorcerer's face was a canvas of bruises and scratches and he looked like he'd been sent tumbling down through a thicket of brambles, but aside from that and a wounded knee I could see no great damage inflicted. While the Pilgrim saw to the other hero's pain, I considered the private conversation that Kairos Theodosian and myself were having through the particulars of the Rogue Sorcerer's escape and return. If he'd wanted to break with me permanently the Tyrant would have killed the man – or at least made a serious attempt to do so, which did not seem to have been the case – to lure out the Pilgrim's lone aspect-resurrection. He'd taken the crowns, that much was obvious, and likely whatever artefacts the Sorcerer had been carrying on him. That appeared to include the casting rod, and likely Black's soul as well. Kairos had deigned to use the opening I'd left for him and done it without burning bridges with myself or with the heroes in a way that could not be overcome down the line. Which meant he was still open to turning on the Dead King in our favour, if we seemed the horse to back at the latest hour. Assuming he didn't turn on both us and the Hidden Horror in favour of some still-inscrutable aim, which given who we were dealing with was very much possible.

"- he had me thrown off a balcony by gargoyles after declaring that was the last we'd see of me," the Rogue Sorcerer said, snatching back my attention.

Really, Kairos? That's a little on the nose even for you, I thought. If the Tyrant was going around throwing heroes off of cliffs then he definitely wasn't trying to kill anyone. I paused for half a beat and looked the absurdity of what I'd just thought in the eye, though being absurd made it no less true. I tapped the bottom of my staff against a broken pavement, claiming the attention of the returning hero.

"He took the crowns," I said.

"He did," the Sorcerer agreed. "And-"

The man flicked a hesitant glance at the Pilgrim, who nodded in allowance.

"- my teacher's soul," I finished instead. "That cat's been out of the bag for some time, wizardling."

He watched me warily at that, as if the revelation that he'd been going around with my father in a bottle would be enough to have me strike at him out of nowhere. While even these days I relied on being underestimated to get away with gambits, on occasion it was irritating to be taken as this kind of second-stringer. I wasn't some cackling Dread Emperor from the Age of Wonders, Sisters bless, and even if I'd actually intended on betraying these people I wouldn't have been an amateur about it.

"He intends to coerce you with it, I suspect," the Grey Pilgrim solemnly said.

There was sympathy in his gaze I did not particularly deserve or want. Not from the man who'd ordered Black's soul cut out and bottled for his own manner of coercion. I might hold Tariq in higher esteem than Kairos, but I'd say this for the Tyrant of Helike: when he slid the knife, he did not pretend it was anything but that.

"He'll try," I simply said. "Sorcerer, did he speak anything else before throwing you off the cliff?"

"Balcony," the man corrected.

"She's right," the Saint grunted, almost amusedly. "If a villain tossed you down, it's a cliff in every way that matters."

I suspected the old killer had been thrown off, or leapt down, more than a few in her time. The dark-haired man cocked a brow but did not argue.

"He loudly lamented your lack of foresight," he told me. "In some detail."

So, Kairos had left a message for me. Kind of him.

"In what way specifically?" I asked.

The Grey Pilgrim grimly smiled.

"You think he revealed his plan by monologue," the old man said.

I think that if he took the bait I offered, it was for a reason, I thought. He just gave me a way to get everything I want the way I want it. He won't have done that without a reason, and if we're to continue negotiating through you then he needs to have his counterstroke made known. If the Pilgrim wanted to take that as Kairos making a Name-induced mistake instead of moving through something that had the shape of one, then that was his miscalculation to make. I dipped my head the slightest bit, then silently invited the Sorcerer to keep talking.

"He castigated your ignorance of precedent, Black Queen," the hero almost apologetically said. "And insisted there are reasons people don't 'go around pulling swords from stones, if you'll forgive my language'."

It took me an embarrassing four heartbeats before I put the pieces together. Shit. Shit, that heinous little bastard. There was no way he should be able to know about – no, Hells, he'd been talking with Neshamah for months now hadn't he? And Neshamah could pick Masego's brains whenever he wanted. It was quite possible that the Tyrant knew when I'd pulled the sword from the stone at First Liesse I'd done so while presenting myself as the heiress to the tacit king of Callow of two decades: Amadeus of the Green Stretch. That was a crown, one I'd not considered until now and one I could not afford to lose. If my teacher was inflicted the curse that was losing that 'right to rule', who was going to unfuck Praes into a halfway reasonable nation for me? I'd come to trust Akua to an extent I would have thought inconceivable a few years ago, but I couldn't trust her anywhere near the Tower: it'd be like locking a drunk who'd just begun weaning into a wine cellar. And Malicia, well, regardless of the political considerations that prevented allowing her to remain in that seat if the Empress had wanted this to end in any way but one of our heads on a pike then she shouldn't have started assassinating my friends. I needed Black as, if not Dread Emperor, then someone in a position to resolve the mess in the Wasteland before the cauldron tipped over and fucked us all over while we were stuck looking north.

"He's threatening to have Black as the one, to cut the grass under our feet and give Larat his due," I said. "Possibly in my name, possibly on his own – hard to tell at this point. I shouldn't need to tell you that'll be a disaster."

"You mean the most desirable way for this to end, save you chucking down your own crown," the Saint of Swords bluntly countered.

"Laurence," the Pilgrim chided.

He did not, I noted, disagree. Of course he wouldn't. Tariq had considered Black enough of a threat that he'd been willing to unleash a plague to corner him, even if I was right and he'd gone after my teacher with the deeper intent of baiting a pattern of three between us. The Pilgrim wasn't the kind of man to resort to those means unless he thought the enemy dangerous enough to require it. The heroes knew my teacher as the Dread Empire's red right hand, the monster who'd torched the heartlands of Procer to starve an empire into collapse when he'd judged he could not defeat its armies on the field. And he was that, it must be said. But he was also a great deal more: the architect of the Reforms, the lid that'd been put on the worst impulses of the Wasteland for nigh forty years and a stubborn madman who'd fought a bitter, thankless struggle to end the cycle of death that'd bound Callow and Praes for millennia.

If I was to have peace in the east in my lifetime, and the kind of peace that would last beyond my lifetime, then Black was one of the keystones for it. As Warlock had once told me, for all that the man saw himself as a replaceable cog in a great machinery he was in truth the beating heart of the dream for a different Empire. If I lost him, there simply wasn't anyone else who'd do his work anywhere as well, as comprehensively or as reliably – more than just personal ability, there were his personal relationships to consider. Who else had his pull on the Legions, on the Clans and the Tribes? Had Kairos glimpsed that, I wondered? If so, he was even more dangerous than I'd suspected for he was perhaps the first of my foes to truly understand the world I wanted to make. Or it might be simpler, I thought, a scheme as plain as it was effective: I would want to preserve my father, the heroes would want to cripple him. Conflict would ensue, sure as dawn rising.

"Theodosian can't be allowed to get his way," the Rogue Sorcerer spoke up. "Especially if what the Black Queen suggests is true."

"You walked through the same empty towns as us, boy," the Saint harshly said. "The further the man who wrought that is from a crown-"

"We do not want the man who schemed that to shape this realm," the Sorcerer hissed back. "That is the last crown's purpose, Gods be merciful, and we'd trade what – a petty blow at a woman trying to be our ally for what could be bloody disaster?"

Huh. I'd genuinely not seen that coming.

"Roland," the Pilgrim intervened, tone calming. "No such decision was made. There is no need for backbiting among us."

"There is, Peregrine," the hero furiously said. "I've kept my tongue through low ebbs – and there have been a great many of those, since this wretched crusade began – but what sort of black madness is it that the only one here who has attempted to save lives over the last months is the damned Black Queen?"

I wondered what it said about me, that instead of being touched by that I was immediately suspicious. If you sat in a high seat long enough, I thought, trust sickened and died until all that was left was the strange kin to it that Malicia has famously coined: trusting people to act according to their nature. And I did not know enough of the nature of the Rogue Sorcerer – Roland, to hear Tariq put a name to him– to trust anything coming from his lips. Gods, though, even if he might be playing me it was nice to hear someone say it.

"She's playing you, Sorcerer," the Saint told him.

The echo, I thought, was ironic in all the worst ways. My father would have laughed of it until tears came and muscles ached.

"I don't care, Saint," the hero said. "This is... this is beneath us. All of us. That even in the face of doom we take each other as foes instead of a having a single forthright conversation to protect the hundreds of thousands of soldiers who put their lives in our hands."

"There is a conversation to be had," the Pilgrim tiredly conceded. "Yet now is not the time for it."

"Respectfully, Peregrine, I disagree," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

Though his knee had been healed by the Pilgrim along his bruises, it must still have been tender by the way he was careful when turning towards me.

"You have a plan," the dark-haired man said. "This has been evident since you cowed two armies into truce and stripped rule from a third of the Highest Assembly. What is it that you need done, Queen Catherine, and how can I help?"

And it might be, I thought, that he was honest. That the was speaking from a place of genuine disgust for the way cloak and dagger struggles were still being had even when, as he had said, hundreds of thousands of lives hung in the balance. If that was true, if the Rogue Sorcerer really was as appalled by it as the glimmer in his eyes said he was, then this was the first breath of the newborn Liesse Accords. An agreement, however implicit, that there were some monstrosities that even foes should and would band against. That a form of restraint could be enforced, by the fear of utter opposition from all others if nothing else. It was something I longed to hear, more than any praised or recognition of my bitter efforts to avoid bloodshed, and so damned as I was I distrusted it immediately. Because I'd seen him hobble back to us, leaning against the Saint in quit conversation. Because I knew near nothing of the man under that sweep of dark curls, and if I was trying to trick Catherine Foundling I would have done it just like this. Splitting with the others on root of principle, not for sympathy of the villain but contempt at the actions of my own side. That he'd been a little too castigating, a little too bitter, only made it all the more believable: I'd learned from High Lords that anything too smooth was likely to be false. It might be, I thought, that this was all play by the heroes to get a better glimpse the lay of my intentions.

Does it matter? I thought, taking a cold-eyed look at the practicalities of it. I was, in the end, surrendering little I would not have to reveal down the line. And if I was wrong, if this was an earnest tirade, then that early surrender was well worth the price of encouragement. I breathed out, slowly, and then slipped two fingers to my lip to whistle. The shrill cry sounded loud and far, followed by silence and veiled gazes.

"I need a company to tear through the Ducal Palace's front door, loud and hard and drawing attention from the dagger," I said. "Which will slip in through a hidden path, to get at the Hierophant directly and pry him awake from the Dead King's influence."

"I tread close to the palace," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "It's a fortress of wards and enchantments. Brute force will flounder, but I have ways to finesse the locks."

"Good," I said, inclining my head. "I'll be there, as the moment we're in we'll need to move on the Tyrant and I've some notion of how to deal with him."

"This dagger you speak of," the Grey Pilgrim said, "if you do not guide it through the hidden path, how will it know of it?"

"Who do you think told her about that to begin with?"

Saint's blade had cleared the scabbard before the end of the first word and even the Peregrine shifted his footing to have an easier time slinging Light if it came to a fight – which seemed, if anything, to amuse Indrani all the more. To have come so soon after I whistled, she must have been shadowing us from even closer than I'd thought. Archer's long leather coat whispered against the ground as she moved to lean against a half-broken pillar, hazelnut eyes bright in the gloom of this city she'd seen both breaking and broken. The way her fingers rested on the handle of her long knives was too casual to be a threat, but there was not a hint of fear in her bearing at the thought of tangling with any of the heroes.

"Archer," the Pilgrim said, inclining his head in greeting. "How long have you been trailing us, I wonder?"

Indrani grinned, sharp and unpleasant.

"I'm just here to guide you poor lost souls through this nightmare of a city," she said. "Nothing to read into."

"Should I be appalled that even after all this you had yet another card up your sleeve?" the old man said, glancing at me. "How many more are left, Your Majesty?"

"One more, Tariq," I said, lips quirking. "That's the trick: always one more."

"Spare me," the Saint of Swords said. "Fine, if you need warm bodies for a dagger crew then I'll bite."

"You'll be a lot more useful in the assault crew," I politely replied. "The Pilgrim would be a better fit."

"We don't trust you not to cut our boy's throat at first occasion, 'cause you're vicious old bat," Indrani cheerfully translated. "You're not going anywhere near him without Cat to keep an eye on you, get me?"

I glanced at the Pilgrim. We had, after all, struck a bargain. The reason for which he might hesitate to leave the Saint alone with me – she'd try to end me and run headlong into grounds I'd prepared to kill her – should be seen to now.

"I am sure young Archer will prove sufficient muscle for the pair of us," Tariq agreeably said. "We both know, Laurence, that your talents are best suited to less subtle tasks."

"Getting your way in all of it, are you?" the Saint darkly said, matching gaze.

"Wouldn't have to, if your way wasn't so godsawful," I replied.

"You might be the single worst ally we've ever had," Indrani told her, sounding kind of impressed. "And I'm counting secret Malicia in there, since at least she had panache when batting us around."

"Secret Malicia doesn't count, she was just impersonating an ally," I said without missing a beat.

"So that's the Woe," the Saint said, eyes flicking between us and her lips quirked into a hard and unimpressed smile. "Murderers and sowers of ruin, but that's all right because you're clever and you're droll. Like that's not just a fig leaf on the obscenity of what you are."

"Gods Above, Regicide," the Sorcerer said, "how much time must we lose to incivility in the face of cataclysm?"

"You want civil tongue, boy?" she snorted. "Fine. Foundling, what has you so convinced that the dusty vagrant you just revealed can do a single damned thing to 'wake' the Hierophant? What is she going to do, put an arrow in him in a friendly way?"

Hardly that. There was a story between the two of them that was old and worn and could be put to purpose, but it would have been stripping bare something of Indrani in front of strangers that were still half foes. I saw no need to sate the curiosity of Laurence de Montfort at the expense of one of mine.

"There's a method," I flatly said. "You don't need to-"

"There's two people close enough to Masego to pull him back from the brink," Archer interrupted me without hesitation, "and of the two I'm the one in love with him."

Ah. Well. I kept a wary eye on the Saint, for if she laughed now I thought that Indrani might very well try to kill her. She was proud, my friend, and to have something so fragile mocked would sting all the more. Instead the old woman silently nodded, face shuttering closed.

"For the dagger to have chance at making it into the deeps without running into entrenched resistance, the assault crew will have to wreak the kind of havoc that simply can't be ignored," I said, passing over the discomfort with forced composure. "Sorcerer, you said you have a method to pass through wards?"

"I can bring them down," the hero agreed.

"Then, given who it is that's going to be making up this crew, I'd say the time for subtle has passed," I frankly said. "Let's smash through the front door and pick every fight there is to be picked."

It would, as an additional boon, attract the Tyrant the way honey would flies. He'd never be able to let pass an opportunity to meddle in that kind of a brawl, not even if it was to his advantage, and he and I still had a conversation to conclude. I'd put out the crowns and the soul though the Sorcerer, and he'd claimed that. That was the seed of a story, Kairos betraying us and my recovering crown and father from his grasp when we fought. He'd offered the mordant rejoinder of taking them but making it clear he was ready to spend them all before I could reclaim anything. If he'd genuinely meant to go through with that, though, I wouldn't have received a warning. Which meant he was, in his own way, inviting me to make a counteroffer when we next met. Which gave me until then to figure out what it was that the Dead King had offered him – besides the pleasure of betraying us – and beating that with an offer of my own.

“Now you’re talking my language, Black Queen,” the Saint of Swords said, crooked teeth bared. “Into the breach we go, blade high and let the dark cower at the coming it.”

Dammit all, though. I really want Rogue to genuinely be feeling positive towards Catherine, but her instincts are so on the money about trusting people telling her what she wants to hear. Still, it'd be awesome if she managed to seduce another sneaky type to her side, though Viv would feel a bit threatened.

stevenneiman

Nice. It would appear that you totally called it. Kind of makes me sad there's no way to make that one Malicia's. Not only would someone willing to make whatever allies are necessary, it would also mean that Malicia would be forced to step down or guarantee that her ultimate goal of a sustainable Praes fails. I personally suspect that the Rogue Sorcerer is genuine. He's old and smart enough to recognize that Cat is trying to shape a story where she keeps things from going to shit for all involved, but between being younger and more of a loner he hasn't been burned nearly as hard as the big two have been on trusting villains. Experienced enough to see the truth but not so jaded as to dismiss it as trickery.

Orpheus

I think that may be a bad idea anyway, because the final crown shapes the realm. If Pilgrim's crown creates a realm of necessary sacrifices in the name of the greater good, I don't know if Malicia's crown would create a very useful realm. It would kinda waste the whole ritual at best, and at worst would be focused around treachery and a complete lack of scruples, possibly even being usable by the Dead King.

Someguy

Does it have to be a crown? The vow was for 7 crowns & One right? No specifics as to that One is? Could be 7 crowns and a dirty sock would still work?

Mental Mouse

We went through that in last chapter's comments. Also, the Dirty Sock Crossroads would probably stink.

Liliet

Don't confuse Malicia with Akua. She fucked up at the end, but she still was Black's effective co-ruler for 40 years.

Rook

I'm honestly hoping against hope that he actually is genuine and that he actually does help push the plan along success.

What I can't help expecting, is some other shoe to drop, whether he's genuine or not. The way that his help is suspiciously convenient but too good to pass up on almost parallels the way Catherine baited the Pilgrim with her surrender. A deal too good to refuse.

Maybe his method of bypassing the wards is already known to the Dead King and it'll just be used to set off a trap. Maybe the path that Archer found was one that was intentionally created, in order to bait Catherine into Splitting The Party, and he was just used as a catalyst to push it along. Who knows.

After all, an well-meaning support character accidentally carrying the seed of disaster isn't exactly a rare trope.

konstantinvoncarstein

I agree, all is happening according to plan, which means that nothing is going according to plan. They are trying a classical heroic story against Neshamah, who is bound to have several counters for it.

The attitude of the Sorcerer is too convenient, but if it is genuine he will become my favorite hero so far.

Liliet

I think it's important to not overthink this.

They aren't going to be able to blindside Neshamah with this, but who tf needs a hidden dagger when they have a tank? Like, on an object level that's a dagger but on narrative level that's a tank Cat's got there and Neshamah just has to get out of the way as gracefully as he can. And he knows this, and is just trying to milk the situation for all he can before the inevitable 'curse you, heroes! this is not the last you've seen of me!' retreat

Justin

Could Rogue Sorcerer be Neshamah or an agent of his? He was near when Cat got her first message from the Dead King and he's the one who just baited out her plan

Liliet

Tariq is right there.

Mental Mouse

Aside from Liliet's points, they are mixing up heroic with villainous stories, which falls under Cat's usual pattern of creating chaos in order to exploit it. Neshamah will surely get some objectives (not necessarily known to us at this time), but he probably won't get to lay waste to Iserre (at least not this way), and I doubt he'll get to keep (or kill) Masego. However, the crossroads scheme is surely up for grabs!

Liliet

SAME on all accounts ♥ ♥ ♥

shveiran

It is a possibilities, and I'd love for him to be genuine, but I'm afraid the RS has too little narrative weight to begin the building of bridges between sides. Which I am with dk and bet on him actually being Black-possessed. Blacksed?

Mental Mouse

RS isn't building bridges, he's a fulcrum. He doesn't need narrative weight as such for that.

And yeah, he's either still carrying Black or has been thoroughly subverted by him.

shveiran

You can call it a fulcrum if you prefer, but I still don't see him being the pebble that starts a landslide. Still, could be he's just the last drop in the bucket... but I'm not convinced, not yet.

onedollargum

Maddie changed a bit after his visit from Intercessor. I've been wondering whether we were going to see a new name or how that would fall narratively. Possession seems out of his wheelhouse but the way Rogue came around is a bit suspicious.

Liliet

Did Tariq not notice or is he onboard?

Shveiran

I doubt Tariq had such a change of mind that he is now ok with allying with Amadeus, especially off screen. Though he may be bidding his time.

Liliet

OK I love this idea. Like I consider it super unlikely but this would be fucking beautiful.

Cicero

He might be lying while at the same time partially believing it. A half truth is always easier to make a lie out of.

In that case, Cat might still have a chance with him.

dk

I think that she's misreading the person who'd been "a little too castigating, a little too bitter". I think that she's misreading him as a hero when in fact he is Black.

I predict that Rogue had a magic item that held somebody else's soul, but Amadeus was trapped in his eyeball (or otherwise secured). Kairos stole a decoy phylactery, and now Black is getting to speak directly to Cat.

Since Cat hasn't seen through Black's disguise, she doesn't recognize the genuine offer of support because it's coming from the body of the Rogue Sorcerer.

naturalnuke

That would be as big a twist as Black actually being Assassin.

Someguy

Or that the Original Black died in Heir's hands back during the Praesi Civil War and Assassin has taken over his identity & playing his Role ever since.

Javvies

No. Black has been using his Aspects since then, so unless you're also going to argue that Assassin can somehow emulate Black's Aspects (plus his character and decision making) so perfectly as to fool those who knew Black since before the Conquest on a long term basis ...

Also... the rest of the Calamities and Scribe would have known instantly. And they would have been pissed that Malicia's scheming with Akua got Black killed at Akua's hands.

Also, while Assassin could disguise himself as Black well enough to fool Akua, I doubt he could do the same with Tariq.

Plus we've had PoVs from Amadeus. Recently even.

Amadeus is not dead.

RandomFan

While you're not wrong, this theory is talking about the Heir before Akua killing Black; I.E. "Assassin was Black for each and every scene of canon", excluding, possibly, some name dreams and some bonus chapters. "Since before Book 1's prologue", not "Since book 3" Just wanted to clear that up!

Mental Mouse

That founders on my rule for continued identity, that is, at that point, Assassin would be Black's secret identity and vice versa.

Tek

It was Squire, whom tangled with Heir, not the Black Knight. So that would mean, that there never was a black Knight, only the Assassin, which kinda kills the point. I mean, if you have an Assassin sitha Name Black Knight, being able to use all aspects of Black Knight, he is not an Assassin.

Mental Mouse

Not really, we've got already had hints that RS is under Black's influence. And a decoy phylactery is just good tactics.

Liliet

It would need to be really minor influence for Tariq to not notice.

Like, "they had conversations and Rogue Sorcerer ended up with thoughts to chew on and new speech quirks", not "RS has entirely new motivations now"

Mental Mouse

Yes, and the former would be much more Black's style. NTM that even Akua could only take Cat over when she was otherwise comatose.

Liliet

and that scenario COULD actually be fun, unlike the 'nah no heroes were involved' one -_-

Decius

Suggesting that Kairos has the Roland's soul, meaning that when Cat gets it back she will have saved a hero, albeit an incompetent one that allowed Black to posses him when the entire soul removal was precisely to avoid allowing him to influence anyone in any manner.

That would improve Saint and Regicide's attitude by one step, to 'murderous' and 'obstructionist' respectively.

Liliet

are Saint and Regicide two people in this comment

Liliet

Are you supposing that RS/Black is somehow fooling Tariq's Behold, or that Tariq is onboard with this?

Insanenoodlyguy

I think Viv wouldn't feel threatened in fact. Not after Hakram and the hand incident. She's no longer part of a band of five named, she's the heir apparent of Callow. She's got a whole new deal that doesn't require her in the same place anymore.

The problem here is Rouge Sorcerer is the magic. Hierophant is the Magic. I'm worried that at the very least in order to keep Rogue he's going to at least remain out of commission for a while.

Also, I now ship Roland and Cat. Also since he's still acting this way even without Black's soul in there, I also now throw out the semi-crack theory: Roland is Amadeus' son. He's the story Cat guessed at way back at the beginning: He did in fact have a kid he intentionally had nothing to do with in order to keep him out of all this, and that failed utterly because stories. That "It's not too late to save your family" line that he wasn't able to get out wasn't a mere bluff, it was an ironic truth.

Mental Mouse

Like father like son? Oh, that would be... EEvil. ;-). Especially if RS doesn't even know it himself. But I'd still bet on Black's spirit instead.

Shveiran

A new father/son relationship for Maddie, this late in the game? I don't think that's where we're headed, it would muddy the waters between the protagonist and her mentor

Mental Mouse

Yeah, probably not, but it would set up some classic dialogue. 😊

JRogue

I hear what you are saying about RS and Hierophant being the 'Magic', but Viv is no longer the 'Sneaky' of the Woe and Rogue Sorcerer sounds like a 'Sneaky' name that uses magic to achieve those ends. He even talks about having a way to get through those wards around the Ducal Palace. While I think he can fill a combat wizard Role when needed, I think he is more of Rogue trope. His story of trying to get books that used to belong to The Wizard of the West and barely getting away kinda leads me to think he was trying to steal them, not buy them.

Viv becomes what Malicia was to the Calamities and Rogue Sorceror takes on the 'Sneaky' Role that Viv used to fill.

That's all based on him siding with Cat, and his offer being legit, which, if PGtE has taught us anything, its don't trust them... any of them.

Liliet

Cat's going to end up with a party full of casters... and Archer.

Liliet

so does that make Roland a quarter elf or are you saying Amadeus deliberately slept with someone he wasn't attracted to just to have a kid or

I need to know more details of this scenario

Insanenoodlyguy

Probably one of those stupid things, where he got drunk at one of his more melancholy moments, and there was some girl at the bar, and the next day it was clearly a mistake but thanks to narrative fuckery the damage was already done. Kids even a hero because of course he is.

Javvies

You really think Black would have gotten drunk and slept with a stranger?

No, I don't buy that. It'd be wildly out of character for him.

Besides ... Black would most likely have been near constantly accompanied by one or more of his friends/allies/associates. I don't see any of them letting Black drunkenly wander off with anyone other than Ranger (they all like living too much).

Insanenoodlyguy

In my admittedly still crack speculation here, this happened just after Callow. The love of his life left him, he's kinda miserable, and his friends just hoped a night with somebody would do something for him. It didn't of course, and it likely never happened again.

As for Ranger, I really doubt she's the monogamous type. At least in the sense of caring what he does when she's not around and has specifically even said she's out. Though I imagine her number of partners has been fairly small to non-existent over the same period of time, this is less because of any faithfulness and more because there would have literally been nobody who impressed her enough to bother.

Liliet

Amadeus is demi. He's on the ace spectrum. He has literally never found anyone attractive other than Ranger. He's, like... not interested.

Insanenoodlyguy

And when she turned him down, he was out there, miserable, drunk, she was interested, he said "fuck it" and there you go. I mean, gay guys have had children. It's no less possible for a demi. I don't disagree with you about him, if this crack theory somehow turns out to be true, it certainly wasn't love (unless we find out he's a quarter elf, and SHE's the one who gave him up etc. etc.), but you don't need love to have a kid.

Liliet

Gay guys have had kids, but I somehow doubt it was commonly a one night stand scenario 0.0

not to mention the part where Amadeus doesn't drink on campaign and doesn't swear, he's like an adorable middle school teacher

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm pulling this out of my ass liliet, what do you want from me? 🤔

Liliet

proper respect for YO WE HAVE A CHARACTER ON THE ACE SPECTRUM LETS ADJUST THE STORIES WE EXPECT 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Okay fine. He's not the father of the Rouge Sorcerer.

puts on his Irritant hat

He's the mother of the Rogue Sorcerer.

Liliet

Amadeus was secretly Loki all along?

I'd read that.

Liliet

EY YOU CALLED IT

And my call here? My call here is that this is it and this is true. That this is the real pivot of Catherine's effort breaking through, and that the test she's facing is not flinching from success. We've had a whole treatise on the topic of trust, last book.

And the key that makes me think this is real is what Catherine concludes at the end: that it doesn't matter whether she can trust this, because she stands to lose little and stands to gain much, and so the gamble is worth it.

That whole internal monologue was mirror at least in part to Tariq's inner monologue during the recent set of interludes. Does it matter if the Black Queen truly has a hidden dagger or is just bluffing? Is it still the right thing to accept her surrender, regardless?

Honestly, I've been expecting SOME dissenting opinions among western heroes since mid book 4. About time that gun fired :3

shveiran

I agree, but... I don't know, I don't see RS filling that role. Too little screen time, too little knowledge over his thought process. I expected an overture from Melanza which started an avalanche.

But hey, EE surprises me often and I love them for it. So maybe he is genuine and I don't yet realize that makes for the best story.

Liliet

Malanza is already on Catherine's side.

Honestly the avalanche kind of started with Cordelia realizing that the best way to bait Cat is to appeal to her non-mass-murdering sensibilities, and has been going, real slow, ever since.

Rozala Malanza trying to actually ask Catherine to lose to them so they can resolve the situation, and then giving up her crown willingly for Cat's plan.

Tariq deciding that he cannot conscience continuing to oppose Catherine even if she IS bluffing and has no hidden dagger if he refuses to accept the surrender.

And now a random hero we know nothing about just saying it the way he sees it, which is in Catherine's favor because yooooo THAT IS IN FACT WHAT IS GOING ON.

shveiran

It is a way to see it, but a lot of that wasn't really about Cat.

Last time they talked, I got the feeling Melanza didn't much change her opinion on Cat and still considered her a monster; she simply got to meet Tyrant and DK (sort of) and realized there are worse things out there. It isn't really about changing idea on the Black Queen, but on the rest of the world.

As for the crown, I felt that was more about how she changed perspective on her responsibilities and priorities than about any trust in Cat. I thought she was simply willing to believe that Cat was the DK's enemy too, but... I mean, she's a living being, that isn't too much of a concession.

Still, it could be that's how it starts and I'm simply looking at it wrong. After all, it doesn't matter why they band together if they do it for a while; it is still a proof of concept, and that is a step forward by itself.

KageLupus

I think that you are right, and it is exactly what Cat is going for. You can have a disagreement with another person/nation for whatever reason, just as long as you both accept that there are cases where you have to set that aside and work together against a real monster.

Malanza doesn't have to like Cat or any of the stuff that she has done. She just has to agree that the Dead King is a serious enough threat that their history is less important than stopping him. This whole volume, especially lately, has been various reflections on that same theme.

Leaders get mad because their soldiers fought and died, but that doesn't mean that they should keep fighting when the Dead King comes knocking. Named can be on opposite teams but can still work together to take down the big threat. I think the fact that the Rogue Sorcerer is so on board with Cat's plan right now proves that not all Named are so jaded or fanatical that they can't see the benefit of working together when necessary. Cat has spent so long trying to act reasonably, eventually someone was bound to notice and admit it.

Liliet

Yeah, it not being about Cat IS the point. She doesn't want it to be about her, she wants to change the base of the system.

Liliet

Yeah, but her idea of the Black Queen was "someone I can go to with this". It didn't change, Malanza just had relatively (as compared to say Laurence) high standards for what she assumed of her to begin with.

>Still, it could be that's how it starts and I'm simply looking at it wrong. After all, it doesn't matter why they band together if they do it for a while; it is still a proof of concept, and that is a step forward by itself.

That's what I think basically yeah

Shveiran

The catch is the transition, though.
You can go from "we banded together to repel the big bad" to "let's agree we'll do it again and decide how we can make that work" (AKA the Accords, whatever the name and shape).

But... you could also go "well, that was fun, but you are still Evil, so... SLASH SLASH SLASH (Miko Myazaki style).

The transition is going to be tricky no matter what, but for the purpose of what happens next the ground they band together on does make a difference.
No matter what, banding together creates a new story that can be called upon in the future. But the extent to which it would change the world depends on the aftermath.

Mental Mouse

> But... you could also go "well, that was fun, but you are still Evil, so... SLASH SLASH SLASH

Well, consider Kairos with his Compulsive Backstabbing Disorder. Cat's task is to convince people she is different... despite the fact that she actually knows how to handle Kairos well enough to make use of him!

Liliet

I'm talking about Rozala Malanza. She's got nothing in common with Miko Miyazaki?

shveiran

Pretty much nothing but gender, yeah, but I was referring to the general "side of Good", not just her. My bet is she'll end up First Prince, but even if she does she won't control most of the moving pieces.

A Saint faction (not necessarily led by her, but gathering those that share her views about compromise with Evil) may very well survive the war.

Liliet

Rozala ending up First Prince would go against the grain of her story of realizing Procer needs unity, not ancestral squabbles (which is what her feud with Hasenbach basically is, even if it's a very close ancestry).

Not sure Saint has a faction that consists of more than just her.

Rook

Personally I think the sorcerer might be true, but the real Pivot is yet to come. I'd say it'll likely be getting through to Saint rather than the Sorcerer, and it'll be through an act of faith/goodwill by Catherine that's neither risk-free nor necessarily required of her. Something that can finally get through that impossible door of trust that's too heavy to move with simple words or small gestures.

I'm expecting that eventually Catherine will be offered a sweet deal like the one the dead king offered in the first trial, and the pivot will be whether Catherine takes that deal or stays true to her course. A moment where Catherine gets to decide to take the road that's easier and is no skin off her own back; or the unpalatable road that brooks 'no truce with the Enemy', a choice that would finally prove even to the Heroes that Catherine's 'Enemy' was never Good in itself or it's Heroes, and that her motives aren't some Evil hidden away beneath the surface.

Liliet

I don't think DK qualifies, even Kairos planned on turning on him.

Mental Mouse

What “even” Kairos? Kairos turns on everybody – indeed, he’s consistent enough about it that Cat can actually work with him, by simply planning for his betrayal.

Shveiran

It is also very hard to persuade Laurence with either acts or words. “Evil is treacherous and can’t be trusted for any evidence of the contrary is a scheme” it’s a tricky position to change.

Liliet

I think “story of true love wordlessly confirmed by Pilgrim” is one of those things that at least weigh in 😊

Javvies

Huh.

Archer arrives, as expected. We missed you.

I wonder what Kairos is up to here.

Heh. Saint is going to get to do what she does best. Again. So ... which team is the Rogue Sorcerer going with, Cat and Saint or Archer and Pilgrim?

Secret Malicia is whatshisname, the attendant or whatever while they were in Keter, right?
That was indeed a terrible ally.

AdrianGrey

Rogue is going with Cat and Saint. Remember how he said he was going to bring down the wards for them?

TeK

I’m pretty sure that Secret Malicia is really a Wrath of Bad Decisions.

Dainpdf

Nah, they meant the Attenndant in Keter.

TeK

It never was mentioned that they suspected him though.

werafdsaew

Things don’t have to happen on screen for them to have happened.

TeK

If things didn't neither happened, nor been mentioned, it lives hellawulot grounds for baseless speculations. Ya know, the best kind.

werafdsaew

It's been mentioned; this chapter.

Dainpdf

I imagine they didn't, until some point after the adventure. And now EE throws this at us, showing they realized at some point.

...yeah, I'd have liked to see that scene. It was probably epic.

Allafterme

I think EE is preparing grounds for an extra chapter revolving around this...

Mental Mouse

When they walked into Keter, they thought he was DK:

>"So," I said, "before we get into it. What are the odds that Athal is our good friend the Hidden Horror wearing someone's face?"

It's a pretty short jump from there to realizing Athal (or somebody) was actually Malicia.

Dainpdf

When you're this good at what you do, you find things to do with it. Plus that quote from some chapters ago about a sword always finding use...

caoimhinh

It's weird because they never actually found out about Athal being Malicia's flesh simulacrum. Masego went away to Thalassina immediately after and Cat and Indrani went to the Everdark, so they can't actually know Athal was Malicia.

naturalnuke

It have been a thing they learned later. Or just a lampshade/nod to the audience

shveiran

True, but the terms of the Malicia-DK deal were leaked by the Tower to the ruling council. Perhaps there was a mention of it there, or perhaps they just realized it from there because a detail made Malicia impersonating someone close to them the most likely scenario.

Liliet

oooo I forgot this yeah it makes sense for them to figure it out in retrospect

caoimhinh

Perhaps, but still unlikely. Besides, even if the leaked terms state that Athal was Malicia (which I highly doubt because that has no place in a contract), Archer wouldn't know about it since she left the armies early, after only spending one night after regrouping with Hakram's army. Though Cat could have sent her a message via the Wild Hunt with that info afterwards (I suspect Wild Hunt Fae were their method of contact to summon Archer to Liesse now, since it's obvious they were coordinating). Still, it's very loose and weak justification.

Mental Mouse

They don't need to know it was Athal, they know she was there.

caoimhinh

Cat stated that Secret Malicia was disguised as an ally in Keter. They know it was Athal. The problem is that they have no way to know that.

Liliet

It's decently guessable.

ATRDCI

Cat's making sure RS is with her, to take down the wards for her. Also, because Tyrant said that the balcony throw is the last RS would see of Tyrant, it's guaranteed Tyrant will appear at the battle where ever RS is. So keep RS with her keeps Kairos away from the real rescue attempt.

Liliet

no, he said it's the last Tyrant would see of RS

...which is functionally the same ♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't put it past Tyrant to show up in a blindfold.

Liliet

omfg yes

ATRDCI

This is Tyrant we are talking about. He'd be wearing Zeze's blindfold.

AdrianGrey

Whew, that was a good chapter. I'm loving the character development all over the place here. The Rogue Sorcerer turning out to be (hopefully) pretty reasonable, and Indrani finally admitting her feelings for Masego (she never actually used the word "love" until now). Plus, Catherine's story-scheming is always a pleasure to watch. Hopefully next chapter will be action-packed, it's been too long since we last saw Cat really cut loose.

hmmmm

What's more likely?

A) Someone on team Good is reasonable, isn't selfish, is prepared to stand up to Pilgrim and Saint over their inflexibility and failures, and is willing to extend trust to Cat.

B) The Rogue Sorcerer is secretly the Dead King, is secretly in service to the Dead King, or has secretly been filled with explosives by the Dead King.

TeK

It was previously mentioned in comments, that he is a goat, cleverly disguised. An underrated comment, if anything.

ATRDCI

I'm sorry, do you mean a purebred Liessen Charger?

Thor

I vote A while also being filled with explosives by the Dead King. Best of both worlds really.

Liliet

The joke is, we've seen in Book 2 that all of the above – of 1, that is – is actually pretty damn likely for Team Good.

William got A LOT of pushback from his own side.

Andrew Mitchell

Both.

Liliet

I strongly suspect Indrani had a personal epiphany here, in seeing Cat pussyfoot around what's actually going until she realized "oh my god this is stupid just say it" ;u;

Oshi

This right here. It's also the best indicator that Archer is in real recovery from the shit that went down in the Underdark. She is back to who she chooses to be. A give no fucks baller.

Liliet

Mhm!

Now new and improved: even more fucks not given!

ATRDCI

She's saving them all to give to Zeze.

Liliet

Zeze: ewww. Catherine, can you take this off my hands?

Mental Mouse

Cat: Well, you are pretty cute...

Zeze: AUUUGHH!

Cicero

I think the Saint just wanted confirmation that they were going to play out a Hero's story this time. The mind controlled hero saved by his love is one of the oldest heroic stories there is.

Sure, Cat might be able to twist it a little, but there will be limits to the villainy that can come directly from this story.

Perhaps later, Masego and Cat will write a new story of villainy. But at least this story today will be a heroic one. Saint would prefer to just kill them all, but I think she can live with this one.

Dainpdf

She might also be treating Cat as an enemy for the principle of the thing... or as part of a good cop, bad cop routine with the sorcerer.

Rook

I'm chalking a large part of it up to genuine major trust issues from the Saint, rather than any kind of stubbornness. As in she's legitimately psychotic in a few ways.

Is she overall a good person, as well as a Good Hero? Probably. Almost definitely, I'd wager. But no one stays completely whole after living a few centuries fighting things that would make even the Pilgrim recoil in horror.

Even Catherine is already showing signs of similar tendencies, immediately jumping to doubting the Sorcerer because things were NOT completely going to shit for once. And that's with only twenty-odd years under her belt.

In comparison, the Saint likely has a couple hundred years of accumulated emotional trauma and PTSD.

Javvies

Saint isn't that old. At most, she's in the same generation as Tariq.

They're both under a century. And she's probably younger than he is, since hers is a more physical Role.

Heroes don't have immunity to aging like Villains. Heroes (who don't get killed first) have a lifespan roughly on par with that of a normal example of their species, though they are more likely to reach to upper bounds of the life expectancy for their species, given the health advantages of being Named, and the resistance to poisons and diseases, plus probably regular exposure to Above's energies. They're more likely to age well, but they do age more or less normally.

Caster types may be able to use magic to extend their lifespan, but many of the options would be ruled out because ritual blood sacrifice to extend your lifespan isn't exactly a Good/Heroic act.

Dainpdf

Decades. Heroes age normally. But yes, I like your thesis. I'd add that she's probably had many opportunities like the one with the story she told of the alchemist, to see cooperation with or even mercy towards evil, on her part and others', end terribly.

Liliet

Mental Mouse

> Even Catherine is already showing signs of similar tendencies, immediately jumping to doubting the Sorcerer because things were NOT completely going to shit for once.

I don't think that's from the same book as Saint's. Cat is used to “villain's luck” – when things are going too well, she gets suspicious. (I'm well into a reread, and in her first trip to Arcadia, she actually “weaponized” that to find a squad boss!)

Liliet

It's from the same book as Saint's in that they both learn from experience like rational people. If it happened the same the last 99 times, the odds of it happening the same way now are 99:1 😊

Dainpdf

This chapter was great. I don't have much more to say about it, for now.

caoimhinh

Yay, Archer is back.

I wonder if the Rogue Sorcerer's words are genuine. He seems like a practical man, so I wouldn't put it beyond him to use his true feelings as a tool to get his objective of finding out Catherine's plan.

edrey

so how they know about secret malicia, she wouldnt be so smug to sent them a letter, explaining evreything, right?

caoimhinh

Yeah, that's a bit of plot hole.
They should have no way to know that.

Kissaten

Dead King refused the only offer he had left for him, so there certainly was an additional Malicia in Keter. Solving riddles off the scene is still solving riddles, if reader is informed of answer or of parts of the riddle.

Hellspirit

We didnt get in on the Dead King's and Cat's conversation at the end, so he could very well have told her why she lost.

caoimhinh

Unlikely given Neshamah's personality displayed towards Cat so far. He doesn't gloat about other's defeats. Besides, Catherine spoke to Athal right before leaving Keter and had no hostility towards him; she was later on shown still wondering about the loss, simply saying that Malicia must have had another flesh simulacrum in there. She had no suspicions towards Athal

TeK

Well, EE wants to hammer it down that Affably Evil is not Good. Looks like hatred on Saint may have annoyed him, but he writes villains so well and likable, so who's really at fault? Second chapter in a row he explicitly says that being funny and charming is not actually good traits, for all that they make us like certain people. But alas, the world is unfair, Aqua is witty and charming, and beautiful and smart and useful, so what if she single handedly slaughtered hundred thousand civilians? It's the Saint who is real Baddy the Bad here, RIGHT GUYS? I mean, the protagonist hates her, ain't that enough evidence?

Interesting, didn't see coming Tyrant using Black as crown. I had theorised that he is unpalatable for Cat as a sacrifice exactly because she planned for him to be an unnamed Praes handler, so nice to see myself right. But he is as adorable as ever, harmlessly throwing people off of balcony, shame nobody recognised ot for a friendly gesture of affection it was.

Returning to the theme of disliking Saint, whom you would choose between Saint and Tyrant to be left alive? What does it say about Catherine, that she likes how Tyrant is open about his intentions to screw anyone and wreak havoc and destruction, but dislikes Saint who is just as open about her intentions? Yeah, I grew more acceptant of Tyrant as well, damn EE for writing so well. Literally every Villain in this story is affable and likable enough, we forgot about the monster underneath. Black killed tens of thousands? Well he is main characters father figure, so he's not bad, but Pilgrim is godawful monster, I hate him! How dare he not willingly cripple himself protecting hundreds of thousands civilians from a rampant mass murderer? Aqua produced probably single spot of mass murdering in recent history, wreaking a third of a moderately sized country, unleashing Demon [b] as a distraction [/b], and much more? Well so what, she got big tits, that gives her pass in my book! But William, oh he is so bad for trying to prevent Callow from being used by the likes of Aqua and Malicia to trade a small spot of genocide to a magic fortress, for trying to spare Callow being Crusaded on (I don't put it past Saint and GP to stand in front of Proceran armies trying to invade a Good Callow, and saying "ya shall not pass"), I mean who could've seen all of that coming?

And still we will defend the monsters and belittle the Heroes – yeah, they may not be as good as we'd like to imagine, and they certainly are not heroic enough, [i]clean[/i] enough for as to recognise them as ones. So what if they give everything to throw themselves into the breach, to keep darkness at bay? That's what they [i]supposed to do anyway[/i], they don't deserve recognition or acknowledging, they are Heroes, so doing all of that is granted and expected, only they also do all those not so pretty things, so they are actually worse than Villains. No, they are not worse. Being honest about being atrocious is a kind of screwed up logic, I grown used to in this novel, but if we stop and think for a second, it is not an absolution, not even a sweetener. It's, if anything, much worse.

werafdsaew

Saint is bad because she's willing to burn down Procer and sacrifice every single life in Iserre for religious purity. There are worse Villains out there doesn't excuse the Heroes of their excesses.

Chris

That does her an injustice. The Saint of Swords has learned, painfully, that there is no acceptable amount of evil. Evil always creates more of itself: therefore anything that is even the slightest bit evil has to be destroyed. That's the thing: yes, she wants to make Calernia "pure". But her reasoning for that is not blind prejudice. It's the learned experience that evil is like rotting flesh – you have to cut it out for the body to heal, and to make sure you get all of it the surgeon cuts into the healthy part. I'm not convinced that she is right, but I get how she arrived at where she is.

werafdsaew

The Saint having good reason for her beliefs just makes her a good character; it does not excuse her when she is just plain wrong. What she wants to do now is more akin to amputating the entire limb when the patient an injury that will heal by itself.

Rook

The patient does not, in fact, have an injury that will heal itself.

I think I need to start quoting the Amadeus in these arguments, to put into perspective how ridiculous it is that the commenters are more extreme than the gods-damned Black Knight in stubbornly defending witty/likeable Villains.

The emotionless killing machine that terrorized half the continent for most of his life disagrees with you, not even out of moral principle but out of concern for their bare minimum survival. The Saint's perspective isn't wrong, Catherine is just an extreme exception to the rule.

Volume 3 chapter 68, Coda
(Speaking to Akua)

>'“You,” Black said, “are the incarnation of waste. Of every destructive instinct that must be carved out or repurposed lest we ever reach old ends through old means. Your accolades are as worthless as every single thing you've ever said and done. They will pass, and be forgotten. We will all be better for it.”'

Volume 3 epilogue:
(Speaking to Malicia)

>'Alaya, we consistently blunder so badly we need to rely on demons to stay off destruction. We would rather irreparably damage the fabric of Creation than admit we can be wrong. There is nothing holy about our culture, it needs to be ripped out root and stem as matter of bare survival. Forty years I have been trying to prove success can be achieved without utter raving madness ...'

Shveiran

Saint has a lot of bad villains to use as precedent; she is also ignoring any death and mayhem dispensed by her side as a cause, if not justification, of the death and mayhem the other side dishes out.

She's also at the point where she sees races as intrinsically Evil rather than having an Evil culture (which, honestly, debatable. Warmongering and scavengers, sure, but it's not like Procer and Levant seem to value PEACE all that much, so I don't see how eating the dead is enough to say some are innocents and the others despicable) and doesn't consider them people, which is pretty much down the nazi road.

Regardless, Saint has built her philosophy around the assumption that the Good-Evil war CAN be won.

Amadeus and Cat suspect that assumption is wrong.

If this was true (admittedly unconfirmed at the moment) any attempt to eradicate Evil achieves nothing; the only sustainable option is finding Evil you can live with and nurture it at the expense of the unsustainable Evils.

Andrew Mitchell

> If this was true (admittedly unconfirmed at the moment) any attempt to eradicate Evil achieves nothing; the only sustainable option is finding Evil you can live with and nurture it at the expense of the unsustainable Evils.

Good point.

Liliet

>She's also at the point where she sees races as intrinsically Evil source?

Like, are you confusing her with William?

The only people she's been confirmed as viewing as intristically Evil are people who have Evil Names.

Which is rather like saying "I expect everyone wearing a nazi swastika on their sleeve to be racist".

>(which, honestly, debatable. Warmongering and scavengers, sure, but it's not like Procer and Levant seem to value PEACE all that much, so I don't see how eating the dead is enough to say some are innocents and the others despicable)

WHERE ARE YOU GETTING THIS

>Regardless, Saint has built her philosophy around the assumption that the Good-Evil war CAN be won. Amadeus and Cat suspect that assumption is wrong. If this was true (admittedly unconfirmed at the moment) any attempt to eradicate Evil achieves nothing; the only sustainable option is finding Evil you can live with and nurture it at the expense of the unsustainable Evils.

Yeah, this is interesting as fuck.

shveiran

Regarding racism, I'm pretty sure she talked along those lines during the war. I may be wrong on this account.

Even so, it is a fact she saw starting a war against other people as a perfectly good tactics, which is pretty much equal to consider lives expendable.

As to where I'm getting Procer and Levant don't value peace... The novel?

I mean, I don't want to sound flippant, but I really don't see what doubt there is in this regard.

One is a warrior-based culture where one brings honor to one's name through killing (whether the target is two-legged or not), confirmed by a number of chapters from Levant POV. We have been told most of the Bloodlines are at war with one of the others. So much so that Tariq says he can't sit on the throne or it will be total war with Procer.

As for the Principate... all of their neighbour have a history of being invaded? Callow, the League, OTHER PRINCIPATES...

Liliet

>Even so, it is a fact she saw starting a war against other people as a perfectly good tactics

That's your criterion now? Really?

>As to where I'm getting Procer and Levant don't value peace... The novel?

>I mean, I don't want to sound flippant, but I really don't see what doubt there is in this regard.

No, I was asking you where you got that Saint considers goblin despicable for cannibalism. She sounded fairly neutral-curious to me when asking Catherine about it, even if it was morbid curiosity.

shieldredblog

She's also bad because a lifetime of victories as the Heavens' personal executioner have made her so arrogant and cynical she's basically just a Villain with angels holding her leash.

Without the providence and gifts granted to her, I don't think she'd even be that good of a sword-master. Her domain is just an Aspect.

I'm pretty sure shes trying to die at this point, looking for an end that justifies her lifetime of murder and mad decision making. If she takes the continent down with her, all the better.

TeK

Arrogant because she believes that Good is better than Evil? Yeah, not like it is obvious for someone without decades of experience on the frontlines holding that very same Evil at bay. She saw Below at it's worst, and she knows that no cost is too high to stop that. How many tens of millions DK had slaughtered over the millenia? You can't properly comprehend the number regardless.

Cynical? Because she does not trust our main hero to whose most private thoughts we are privy to? The thoughts in which, she casually betrayed Rogue Sorcerer (the very one who spoke in her defence) after all the posturing about being good?

"If he'd wanted to break with me permanently the Tyrant would have killed the man"

She used the mans life as a bait, with regards to it's safety as a second thought at best.

"I wasn't some cackling Dread Emperor from the Age of Wonders, Sisters bless, and even if I'd actually intended on betraying these people I wouldn't have been an amateur about it."

Read this, now really, READ IT. She sounds downright [i]condencending[/i]. And if those are her true thoughts, than how many villains did even more Good, pretend to be even more amicable, and were underneath even worse? Her mistrust is not unfounded, not in the least. It's a woman who wanted to shackled an entire race in the chains of ice, because "we gotta have someone to share casulties with". A woman whowanted to make pact with Hidden Horror himself. I do not condemn her. I always found myself to be closest to Black in my worldview and moral position, but it is not arrogance, nor cynicism, to mistrust the Priestess of Night. It is a rationality backed up by decades of experience.

"Without the providence and gifts granted to her, I don't think she'd even be that good of a sword-master. Her domain is just an Aspect."

She forged it by keeping the worst of the darkest at bay on a third of a continent for decades. Just what? Seriously? She endured more than Heroes sworn to Endurance, for crying out loud. Undeserving? I am hearing someone parroting Black, but in this case, it is [i]uninspired[/i]. Domain is thing incredibly rare in and of itself, and she is not a god, but a mortal – but holds domain still, what is wrong with that? By that point you just throwing things to see what sticks. How is that an argument?

"I'm pretty sure she's trying to die at this point, looking for an end that justifies her lifetime of murder and mad decision making. If she takes the continent down with her, all the better."

This is a misunderstanding of some terrifying proportions. The core part of Hero philosophy is thus: "To leave shelter yourself, so that you may shelter others". She does not looing to die. She knows someone has to, and better her, than anybody else. She does not seek a glorious death, or indeed, any glory at all. She does not need an end to justify herself, for nigh half a century, Procer did not suffer a true Evil. That is justification. Hundreds of thousands, happily killing each other over some mortal squabblings in peace – instead of dying to a cackling madmen. The former, incidentally, is a reason she is so meddlesome. For while she stood waist deep in darkness, [b]holding the line[/b] the gaggle of princes cheerfully took to murdering their own people on the funds from the one of the monsters of the era. She does not come from nowhere, saying that Procer does not deserve to exist as it is. The Princes' Graveyard truly showed their ugly faces to the world.

As for the last sentence, it's just, just wrong man.

Shveiran

Personally, the problem is not her mistrust. That can be justified.

The problem is she sees total, eternal war as the only option. Which I don't think is ever winnable: Evil can be defeated, but it will return; Evil can triumph, but only for so long as anyone thinks is undefeatable.

Which means her attitude only creates more death.

Fayhem

IIRC one of the roles Pilgrim mentioned for the Saint was taking down good heroes gone bad. So it's canon that a Hero going bad is a thing, and becoming the thing you've fought against is a narrative trope if there ever was one. And Pilgrim actively would not want to see it coming since Saint is basically the only actual peer he has and he's trusted her for so long; you can have all the wisdom and all the ability to see through others' deceptions in the world, and still be able to deceive yourself.

In other words I consider this at minimum a highly plausible take on what Saint is/has become. Well, except for:

> Without the providence and gifts granted to her, I don't think she'd even be that good of a sword-master.

Strongly disagree. Her internalized Domain is a huge power boost and no mistake, but if there's one thing that Black (and others, but him most of all) has hammered home over and over it's that power is no substitute for skill. Even with the Heavens' favor Saint wouldn't have lived this long or accomplished this much without being genuinely extremely good at what she does. Honestly, if the rest of your take on her is correct then that's actually strong supporting evidence for that being true. Because if you're right, then Saint's story is a tragedy. And the best of us (in her own supremely crotchety way) falling is so much more tragic than an overpowered poser doing the same.

TeK

And had there never been systems or empires, so corrupt, they had to be torn down? And I think you misunderstand something. There is no such thing as religious purity, much less in our world's sense, when Evil and its corrupting influence (which is to say, the side where Black and Malicia are the best they have to offer, never mind systems like Praes, Bellerophon or Everdark, that need to be torn down the same as Procer. Some may argue that Procer needs to be rebuilt so that it did not turn into the likes of previously mentioned) is a REAL THING. Paraphrasing EE, faith is irrelevant if morality is a physical reality. And for many similarities and parallels, the Above is just that – a real thing. You can argue, that Good at its worst is better than Evil – Cat certainly thinks so, and wouldn't she be an expert? I mean, none of them is [i]blameless[/i], I would not deny that, but for all their harsh measures and lesser evils, Heroes at their lowest still beat Villains at their best. Like, I understand why you would subject Heroes to hate or contempt, but if you will not subject Villains to the same, the judgement rings hollow, and reeks of the exactly the same hypocrisy that seemed to be thrown at the Heroes feet.

To summarise: if the Heroes are bad, there is no one that is good, for they are better than the rest.

werafdsaew

You're saying a bunch of words that has nothing to do with my post. Saint is wrong here; Cat IS trying to bring peace. The Saint having good reasons for her beliefs doesn't change the fact that she is wrong, and if she had gotten her way would have gotten tons of people killed. Like I said, excesses by past Villains doesn't excuse anybody.

Liliet

Excuse Saint for not having full information?

Rook

Saint is probably the least religious person on the Heroic side of the line, let alone a Puritan. She's not pleasant AT ALL, but outright lying about her motives doesn't do the argument any favours.

Saint joined the crusade despite outright disdaining or threatening all the Proceran princes involved because every experience she's had in her life with Villains ended in the exact kind of wasteful/horrific disaster that caused Black to make a career out of stamping out even as someone on the Below side of the lie. I mean for fucks sakes she's literally called the Regicide, she doesn't buy into political propaganda.

You'll also note that the Crusade was when they first had contact with Catherine at all. There was absolutely no precedent back then for them to think she was a different breed from the dozens of others, since they'd never had any personal experience with her before.

Tldr the Saint is good and Good. Period. She's also paranoid and more than a little psychotic, but the net sum of her actions over her lifetime are likely far more lowercase-g good than Catherine's own.

Fayhem

There is a significant amount of accuracy here too, even though as I said elsewhere I think shieldredblog has a very good point (well, on some of it). Essentially I think that what we saw with the Conclave where Saint basically tagged herself as desiring the outright destruction of Procer was a fulcrum; if you assessed Saint's life overall I think you're much more correct than shieldredblog, but I think things are changing as far as Saint's story goes. Pilgrim mentioned just last chapter that one of Saint's roles was putting down heroes who have gone bad. Becoming what you fought against is very much a narrative trope. Saint going Villain will happen maybe a few centuries after Hell freezes over; Saint becoming a Hero Gone Bad essentially by becoming so burned out she loses perspective would be a classic tragedy, and that's a story with some real weight to it.

Fayhem

Though, it occurs to me I should add something to my first comment. My analysis there does depend on reading Saint's speech to Cordelia as sincere. IIRC it was strongly indicated that Saint did that for/with the Bard. If Bard has some deeper game afoot and just drafted Saint into it then that throws honestly basically everything into question, and we really can't rule it out yet.

Liliet

t h a n k y o u

>Saint is probably the least religious person on the Heroic side of the line, let alone a Puritan.

SERIOUSLY

shveiran

There is no need to pick sides this firmly.
I may like Akua, Malicia or Black as CHARACTERS, but that doesn't mean I think they are good (fictional) people.

Akua is a mass murderer with no real further motive than "notice me!", cultural blinders notwithstanding.
Malicia tried to escalate the war with nuclear deterrent. Not something I can forgive, let alone when you build the bomb out of corpses.
Kairos is a dangerous madman and should be put down.
The Hierarch is a dangerous madman and should be put down.

But there is something to be said for "breaches" not being born equal.

Saint, for all that I dislike her as a character, certainly did a lot of good battling rattlings. Ain't nobody arguing that. That doesn't mean she is absolved for the fact that at some point she and a dozen more heroes decided to spearhead the invasion of a country because crusade, and slaughtered folks defending their homes on the battlefield as an invading force.

Willy doesn't get a pass for trying to psychich-nuke Liesse before Akua made it mainstream.

The six heroic parties that tried to slay the Black Queen without spending a moment to think of the consequences of destabilizing a broken country do not get a pass.

That doesn't erase the good they did. But there are black spots, and they aren't owning up to them.

Good heroes tend to see in black and white, but even in the guideverse that's not how the world works. The world is complicated, and still they spend a lot of time swinging at what they see as evil. They are often right, but whenever they are not they commit evil acts. I'd like to see them admit it, and I think we're getting there with Tariq pondering his conversation with Black.

You are right though: I do hold heroes to a higher standard. That's because the heroes are assumed to be better by the world, and if they DON'T hold to a higher standard that is just hypocrisy.

shieldredblog

Is Kairos mad? He is empowering himself through his act, but until he know his actual goal, it could all be theater. The Hierarchic is definitely mad, but his madness is believing that mortals can hold the Gods accountable. That Good and Evil are less important than people and freedom from tyranny.

And yes, if you go around calling yourself a Hero and believing the Gods gave you the right to kill whoever you want and enforce religious law, expect to held to high standards.

Shveiran

Lacking empathy for fellow human beings is a form of madness. Like, an official one. That is enough to mark Kairos as mad no matter the rest we may find out about him.

Liliet

I mean if you're using "mad" to mean "non-neurotypical" here, to the degree that includes that kind of abuse-induced C-PTSD Kairos clearly has, then you gotta count Rozala Malanza, Louis Rohanon, Arnaud Brogloise, Catherine Foundling circa book 4, Amadeus of the Green Stretch, Alaya of the Green Stretch, Akua Sahelian, Masego, Indrani, Hakram, me, do I need to continue or are you getting the point that this is not a helpful way of using words

Liliet

(Rozala: PTSD, Louis: PTSD, Arnaud: PTSD + ? APD?, Catherine: anxiety + depression, Amadeus: suicidal depression, Alaya: PTSD, Akua: C-PTSD, Masego: autism, Indrani: ADHD, Hakram: ?APD?)

shveiran

I'm sorry, are you arguing that lacking empathy is not a form of madness?

Liliet

First of all, Kairos does not lack empathy, he lacks compassion. He's perfectly capable of reading other people's emotions, he just doesn't give a shit.

Second, I'm arguing against your usage of "mad" to mean "non-neurotypical". That's a really weird stretch that does basically nothing useful other than tap into "mentally ill / non-neurotypical people are dangerous and scary" stereotype. Can we try to use other terminology to convey our points?

Rook

The thing with holding them to a higher standard is that only makes sense if you actually do believe they are better like the world does. Otherwise that's hypocrisy from the person judging them.

Regard and responsibility goes hand in hand. It doesn't make sense to act like they're no better than anyone else when they get into an argument with Catherine, but suddenly turn around and act like they're supposed to be better than everyone else when criticizing their mistakes.

Either they should be judged as just people – the same standard applied to Villains and Heroes for both virtues and mistakes; or they should be judged as morally superior – innately respected much more than Catherine & co/any other villain by default, but also criticized much more harshly if they don't meet the higher standard that they claim to uphold.

Anything else is a double standard

werafdsaew

There is a good reason for the double standard though; they get a helping hand from providence just for being Heroes, while Villains and ordinary people do not. They're privileged in a way, and so is held to a higher standard.

Rook

Someone having an advantage doesn't justify hypocrisy from others.

By that logic, Catherine has insane privilege compared to any ordinary person, including the Princes of Procer. You could use the same argument to say that all the hypocritical double standards that the Tenth Crusade judged the Black Queen by are entirely justified.

werafdsaew

You're forgetting that Heroes gets the benefit of the doubt BECAUSE they're held to a higher standard.

Shveiran

Mhmm... no. No, I can't agree with that, sorry.

Them living up to a higher standard is a requisite for me treating them differently.

As a category, they do not, so I do treat them the same as any other character and judge them by what they appear to be doing in the novel. That is very much NOT a double standard. It is in fact a resolution NOT to have a double standard and hold them in the same (starting) esteemed.

You disagree with my opinion on the single characters? That's cool. We are all biased, maybe I'm more biased than you. But I stand by the fact that I don't treat Heroes differently, I simply refuse to grant them any points for that capital H.

denimcurtain

The heroes get rightfully criticized for being unreasonable and usually less clever than the villains. They are Good but in this story Good is not always good even though Evil is almost always evil. Good often supports stagnation and the status quo since the gods rely on a balance between Good and Evil while Evil allows for people to seek their own goals. It's not clear that you can be successful in seeking your own goals in the long term while working with Evil but that's what the story is about.

The Good heroes deserve and do get rewarded for their service with power, luck, and it sounds like an afterlife. That is likely why they tend to have flaws towards entitlement and lack of clever thinking. Those are unlikeable flaws to have. Villains have evolved through their constant failures to be likeable even if only to counteract their monstrosity. No one denies that Tyrant or Akua are and we're monsters. That doesn't make Saint's willingness to sacrifice lives to defeat an opponent less terrible or the Grey Pilgrim's blindness to hypocrisy more palatable. They're very flawed people whose actions have helped shape this flawed world. They've kept things from getting worse but their flaws could keep things from getting better. If Good had its way then crusades would have rocked Callow and it's unlikely that Saint and Pilgrim would step in to help when they could be focusing on fighting Evil.

Good doesn't mean you're right in this world but it'll be interesting to see if there's an alternative because Good hasn't created a very good world.

Rook

The Heroes get unreasonably criticized for being kind to many and unkind to a deserving few.

Good often supports stability and fundamental principles that benefit everyone, Good or Evil or ordinary. Evil allows for people to seek any goal, including ones that cause insane amounts of pain, death, misery, and horror on a massive scale.

Evil often gets rewarded with earthly power, riches, pleasures, or all of the above, and usually at the expense of others. That is why they tend to have flaws toward an absolute disregard for consequences and an outright refusal to be held accountable for any of their actions. Those are unacceptably terrible flaws that cannot be allowed to exist.

No one denies that the saint and pilgrim make blunders like anyone else. That doesn't justify Akua's genocide, Malicia's assassinations, Warlock's experiments, or any other horror unleashed by the dread emperors of the world. They're awful people whose cleverness and wit do do a single thing to excuse or justify the harm they inflicted on others.

If Evil had its way, everyone would be dead or worse than dead. Even reasonable Villains like Amadeus agree, even though he has ZERO moral compass other than practicality and an absolute disdain for Above; notably calling Villains like Akua the incarnation of waste, and adamantly claiming that kind of Villainy needs to be ripped out root and stem.

Evil doesn't mean you're necessarily a plague upon the world but it'll be interesting to see if Catherine can create an alternative, because Evil has done nothing but run the continent headfirst into ruin.

Liliet

>even though he has ZERO moral compass other than practicality and an absolute disdain for Above

that's not what he said in Peers :3

Shveiran

Ok, first off: please stop bring up Akua, or Malicia's nuke, or the DK.

No one is arguing with you. No one is defending them. We are in agreement.

Let's move on.

Second: please list lower-g good acts displayed by the Heroes. Because, for the life of me, I have a very hard time coming up with more than a few once you cross off "killing enemies".

You are operating under the assumption Good is good for everyone or at least most.

I refute that claim, so prove me wrong. Maybe I misremember.

Liliet

Healing? All heroes who have healing abilities use them as much as they can.

You do have a point for "killing enemies", that's mostly what we've been seeing onscreen.

shveiran

Healing is a good POWER, but I don't see their use by the heroes as being particularly good.

We saw their healer accompany an army and healing soldiers so that they may get back to killing, and that is not good, that's just sound tactics.

I don't mean it's an evil act, but at the end of the day you are just making your killer machine more effective via a different mean. You are just ensuring there will be more enemy bodies than allied ones going stiff in the end.

It's not really different from making portals, or blasting your enemies.

That's why I'm saddened we heard from Cat that in the post-coronation, pre-crusade-in-Callow phase, no hero tried to go help with the rebuilding. They just kept trying to kill her.

If all you do is murder, does it matter if your tool is steel, mind blasts or divine light? The dead don't care.

Liliet

I mean Tariq's career consisted almost more of handling natural disasters/plagues than any sentient enemies...

denimcurtain

Evil is not good. Evil is often evil. Good tends to be good but mostly because they oppose Evil. Good doesn't always seem to be good because it reinforces a status quo when societal improvements are needed. I'm not denying that the opposition of Evil shouldn't be counted in your favor since I agree that Evil is often evil. I'm arguing that it doesn't make you above reproach.

Black's reforms have led to less racism and more equality in Praes. That doesn't mean that he's Good or good but it means he has achieved some measure of progress and it hasn't been through mere opposition of Good even if it's debatably in service to that end. Interestingly, it seems there aren't many clear examples of that on either side or in this world in general. Isn't it natural to side with those who seem to have a meaningful chance for such change? The fact that Catherine is the main perspective certainly helps but we've seen other perspectives, even Good ones. I think we're not swayed by them because, while maintenance is required to prevent the world from descending into evil, the world begs for meaningful change for the better. Those who push for it and look for ways to accomplish that are currently lined up around Cat who was created by Black. Those who stand against it are Good.

If EE wants to drive home the goodness of Good then two things need to happen. He first needs more examples of good involving more than the opposition of Evil. Bonus points if that isn't driven by someone Evil or unaligned such when Cat would give heroes the ultimatum of helping the needy in her kingdom instead of jumping right to murder. He then needs to demonstrate that the Heavens offers a path towards innovation and progress.

The world needs more than war and Good hasn't provided what the world needs, Evil seems to be sabotaged and has a less than dubious track record of pursuing those needs, and it remains to be seen if Cat can provide meaningful change.

It's possible Evil can't achieve lasting good and that Cat's wrong about Good's seeming inability to as well. That still means that seeming inability justifies the criticism of Good heroes until proven otherwise while providing a normal incentive for people to root for someone to succeed in making progress in the face of this damning balance.

Liliet

You do realize both sides can be right here, right?

Like, Tariq and Laurence are doing their part for making the world safer as best they could, and Catherine and Amadeus are doing theirs.

They aren't in conflict because either side disagrees with the other's objectives, or even means per se, but because insufficient information produces lack of trust.

Heroes have no fucking idea what's going on in Praes with Reforms. Nobody told them.

shveiran

The political leaders have a spy network, and Tariq has an angel whispering in his ear.

I'm sure Malicia and Black have ways to keep secrets, but I don't think citizen's quality of life falls among those.

If they don't know, it is because they didn't care to find out.

Liliet

How the fuck were they supposed to know where to look? And how the fuck do you think anyone would measure "citizens' quality of life"? Go house to house asking them to fill a questionnaire?

Catherine learned these things from talking to her classmates in War College. She did not expect to hear it, it just came up because she was a part of that society. The heroes aren't.

denimcurtain

I think we largely agree unless you truly believe that all actions taken by Tariq and Saint have been above reproach. We could quibble over how much they could reasonably know and how much that lack of knowledge is due to stubbornness or other character flaws but the basic point is that they're not perfect and, while the Good they do is and was necessary, they don't exactly have any reliable plan towards a permanent positive change in the status quo.

That, not just Cat having the majority perspective, is a completely fair reason to criticize them and to root for our protagonist. It doesn't make them globally wrong or evil. It just means that they aren't always right or likeable. In my view, that's okay.

Liliet

I absolutely root for our protagonist. I root for her to bring them around to her point of view – right now even Laurence seems to be thawing, though I'm not holding my breath too much for that one.

denimcurtain

Then we're pretty much on the same page. Just didn't like the implication that it was somehow wrong to criticize heroes because they'd done a lot of Good and that it's unfair that Cat has the audiences backing. I like all the characters in one way or another.

Liliet

I am glad to hear that ^^ There exists however a section of the fandom that violently hates the heroes, so I have a bit of a knee-jerk reaction -_-

denimcurtain

I sympathize with Cat's frustration with them at times but I also appreciate how crazy difficult it would be to overcome a dichotomy informed by the existence active involvement of Good and Evil gods. When Evil seems to explicitly endorse evil acts, it'd be pretty tough to even be neutral.

Liliet

SERIOUSLY

Ranger pulls off being actually Neutral by... being a fucking awful asshole I personally categorize as Chaotic Evil in dnd terms, you know the kind of muderhobo that insists they're Chaotic Neutral and gives actual Chaotic Neutrals a bad name? "Oh I train both heroes and villains, no I don't give a shit they then proceed to kill each other"

denimcurtain

Yeah. Don't really get the neutral alignment. Archer and Tolltaker count, right?

Liliet

Archer counted until she actually picked a side and decided to stick with Cat. Ironically what was in context undoubtedly personal growth made her go from Neutral to Villain.

Tolltaker wasn't a Name, I think, but yeah, in principle she should lmao

Liliet

Ey Amadeus has more going for him than that, and Akua's story is at its core that of an abused child. There's more reasons for those of us who sympathize with them to do so than the surface wittiness.

Then again, I say that as a person who for approximately this entire last book has been on a one-woman crusade of "HEROES ARE GOOD" and "TARIQ WAS RIGHT TO DO WHAT HE DID TO AMADEUS" and as of the last several chapters "LAURENCE HAS GOOD REASONS FOR HER SUSPICIONS".

Every inch of slack we give villains is deserved by heroes thousandfold.

shveiran

I can sympathize with Akua's upbringing brainwashing her, but there is a point where the atrocities you lived don't absolve you of the gallons of blood you spilled. Or small sea, as it may be the case here.

Especially when you are not even lashing out at those who hurt you, but at the world in general.

Liliet

"Absolve" is a funny word, there.

I can sympathize with someone without absolving them.

denimcurtain

I don't think that people are generally claiming that any of the villains have attained or deserve absolution. They're rooting for the main protagonist and her allies to achieve progress for the world. The group surrounding Cat can be beyond absolution, likeable, and working towards a greater good. Just as the heroes can be deserving of rewards for their service, unlikeable, and real obstacles towards meaningful good.

It certainly looks like there's only one group with a plan to make meaningful positive changes in the world. They may commit atrocities and fail which would obviously be evil and deserving of condemnation. That doesn't make me feel like the heroes deserve praise at the exact moment they're refusing to consider progress or offer an alternative path to a better world. They'll get their rewards if the Gods Above are truly any form of just. This should not preclude noting that if they offered a plan for a free Callow as well as a Praes with filled bellies then they'd likely have allies and praise both. Instead they fight wars while rejecting reasonable discussion on the topics. That has to be worthy of criticism unless you condemn the common man to never experience better lives in peace.

Evil (both Evil and evil) does not seem possible to be cut from creation purely through the sword due to the games of the gods. A better way must be found and I'll root for the people trying something new if the alternative is something established as not working.

>at the exact moment they're refusing to consider progress or offer an alternative path to a better world that was what the Grand Alliance was for, remember? Pilgrim refused to work with Cat for the sake of Cordelia's dream – the dream to end wars between Good nations and form a lasting peace. It was a smaller ambition than Catherine's own, sure, but let's not forget that SHE HASN'T SHARED THAT INFORMATION WITH THE HEROES.

Either Praesi internal politics or the very existence of Liesse Accords. Nobody knows what she's actually after, she's just projecting a vague 'well intentioned' impression at best.

Heroes cannot be condemned for not being aboard with the plan THEY HAVE NO CLUE OF EXISTENCE OF.

Like... they don't know about the Reforms. They only heard about Akua's Folly as it was experienced by common people AFTER THE BATTLE OF CAMP. This is an insufficient information issue

denimcurtain

I'm not condemning them but I think it makes perfect sense to criticize someone who isn't willing to compromise or even fully hear out the other side because they're sure in their perspective and I fully doubt knowing about the reforms would move the needle for Saint, for instance. Also, the Grand Alliance wasn't much different than the usual plan to crusade away Evil from Calernia. The best interpretation on that plan is that they might be able to finagle a win against an ancient Evil before corruption and rebellion managed to break apart the empire they would form. Not saying that's not worth it but it's definitely uninspired and flawed. The Grey Pilgrim is even confronted with those flaws when Cat asks for reassurances for her homeland. The negotiations fail because he had dubbed the only thing Cat was fighting for expendable.

I don't think it's a purely a lack of information. There's a difference in ideology and perspective as well that may or may not be possible to overcome in the long term. Tariq is closer than Saint but it's likely they never fully agree with Cat even if they can come to an agreement someday. Luckily they and Cat just need to come close enough to listen for a bit.

Liliet

The Grand Alliance wasn't meant as an empire, it was meant as something like the European Union. Cordelia gathered for the Crusade, yes, but with an eye towards extending the treaties at the core of it for more long-term cooperation and guarantees: they were specifically made so this would work.

And yes, it was flawed, but Catherine was willing to summon the fuckign Dead King to attack Procer for her war. Not to mention what Amadeus did. "The ends justify the means" is a philosophy both sides are touting, here.

I don't think there's much of a difference in ideology between Catherine and the heroes, unless you're talking about silly things like her distaste for heroic providence.

denimcurtain

The grand alliance planned on parcelling up Callow and conquering Praes. The initial member states might've been EU-like but it was pretty telling that when Cat brought up how Callow would be treated there wasn't a good answer.

Comparisons to how Cat and Amadeus operate aren't really in conflict with my views. I think it's self-evident if you put any stock in Cat's view that there's plenty to criticize there. I don't know if you can be a fan of hers without acknowledging that since a huge part of her view is based on her perception on what her mistakes have been. I'm just saying that there's room to criticize the heroes despite their years of service.

I think it depends on which heroes you're talking about when it comes to ideology. Cat is pretty far from a zealot like Saint, for instance. The main difference between Cat and Heroic named is that she doesn't believe that Good has a monopoly on good. Heroes tend to believe the Heavens do to differing amounts that would dictate how far they are ideologically.

Liliet

The specific situation with Cat and Callow was that Cordelia had a long term plan for putting a nuzzle on her royals' ambitions. She never planned on dividing Callow, but she couldn't just say that before her position got stronger or her people would refuse to participate in the Crusade. She was basically leading them on.

(And then instead of getting a stronger position she got a much weaker one, and she really did want to ally with Cat but would have been deposed within a year)

And yeah of course there's room to criticize. Heroes aren't much better than Cat here, if there's any difference it's marginal and might even be in Cat's favor.

My point is just that they aren't noticably worse, either.

And note that Laurence has very good reasons based on experience to think what she thinks. She didn't get her ideas from the Book of All Things.

denimcurtain

A mistake informed by experience will still be a mistake. It's understandable that Saint would be stubborn but she's still pretty problematic. Maybe not unrecoverably so but she had a pretty callous view on what lives were worth spending to get a leg up for heroes too. She would definitely need to grow a bit as a character to be less of a problem.

I'm not sure I bought Hasenbach's reasoning there. Historically there's no reason to believe she would be able to keep that promise even if she had felt free to make it. Hindsight kinda suggests that it was unlikely as well. Throw in that there wasn't any room for even private assurances and it sounds more like a fanciful lie to justify the invasion to herself. Not doubting that she'd do that if possible but it sounds a lot like that if any push came to shove then Callow would pay a fairly clearly unacceptable price.

Liliet

it wasn't a promise, she didn't promise it to anyone, it was the plan she was going by, because she thought the alternative was fucking stupid and you're not wrong wrt Saint

I personally love her, she's like a mixture of Cat and Juniper with a dash of pure concentrated awesome from like japanese manga, but 'problematic' is a great word for her lmao

denimcurtain

I meant hypothetically if she made a promise to Cat that she wouldn't be able to keep it. I think that everybody knew that if Procer took Callow that it wouldn't be good for Callow and that they viewed it as a necessary cost. To be fair to them, there's a good argument for that if there's no alternative. It just means you're at a particular disadvantage when debating or negotiating with someone like Cat. She wanted one thing and it's the one thing you don't think you can honestly offer.

Liliet

mm

Javvies

Cat was only in a position where she felt that the Dead King was her only option after getting repeatedly and explicitly shot down by both Cordelia and Tariq.

Remember, this was when Tariq had her lined for a (probably fatal) redemption play, she was offering to cooperate with it and help the Alliance take out Malicia, Cat had already declared her intentions to join the Alliance, Tariq's Behold was working on Cat and informing him that her greatest desire was peace, and all she was asking for was a commitment to not let Procer carve up Callow for itself (and presumably fair treatment of her people).

It's not like Cat wanted to unleash the Dead King – she didn't, but she didn't see any other remotely viable options for her to take. She thought she was out of acceptable and workable options – the Dead King might not be exactly acceptable, but it might have been workable. Ish. And she was planning on betraying the Dead King to the Grand Alliance anyways.

Fayhem

> Then again, I say that as a person who for approximately this entire last book has been on a one-woman crusade

> one-woman

Hey now. I did a whole essay about how I think Tariq is way more sympathetic than he was getting credit for. Don't go hogging all the credit for contrarianism on this. 😊

Liliet

TRUE SORRY

Aotrs Commander

(Leaving aside the fact that it is nice to have some protagonists I personally identify with, i.e. Lawful/Affably Evil...)

If there are neither X-Men nor Avengers (nor the Fellowship of the Ring), I'm going to root for Doctor Doom over less-than-the-Punisher.

Saint's worse than the characture RPG murder-hobo adventurer.

Barrendur

@TeK:

I don't seem to be able to use the 'Like' button, but I'm impressed by your argument and willingness to present a point many posters on this site wilfully ignore, so here:

LIKE!

Soma

Saint might seem to have a soft spot for love, the ol' softie. Look atchu Laurence, you'll win the audience's heart yet. It'll be that much worse when something happens to her after she wins us all over.

Kissaten

I'm surprised heroes are surprised that Kairos betrayed them. Like, what?

Liliet

I'm really surprised no-one has accused Catherine of being in league with him yet.

Oshi

There is prejudiced and then abjectly stupid. Catherine spent a lot of time face palming and pretty much showing nothing but contempt for Kairos in public. Saint and Pilgrim are old hands who get at least that much. They might not know Kairos but they know what he is trying to be in the story.

Liliet

Yeah but Laurence has already questioned why Cat gave Rogue Sorcerer the crowns. This is a very obvious answer: so Kairos could take them and so Cat could have plausible deniability for getting her father's soul back.

I admit it seems more obvious from our perspective knowing her logic, but Laurence has already smelled crow there.

WuseMajor

Even if it might just be a ploy, it's nice to see someone call out the Pilgrim and the Saint on their hypocrisy.

As far as "celebrating villains and castigating heroes" goes, the main place I'm standing is that "Tariq does the Necessary Evil thing and gets lauded for it, Cat does the Necessary Evil thing and gets vilified for it." I grant that there are degrees. Pilgrim sacrificed a town to save a nation and part of an army to prevent another Triumphant, may she never return, or worse.

Cat's current allies include a literal Goddess of Murder and the Doom of Lisse, so one can argue about the "Necessary" part of her Evil, but ...Well, if the Dwarves had just turned the entire Drow homeland into lava, I kinda doubt that the Sisters didn't have enough in them for one last "screw you" on their way out which might have caused problems for everyone on the continent.

And Akua's mind is like a corkscrew. Sharp, twisted, hard to deal with, but very useful for certain tasks. She's also a product of her upbringing which was more twisted than many. She's also trying to turn over a new leaf, late though it might be.

So... I dunno. Cat's trying for a really complicated omelette, given all the eggs she's broken, but I cannot in good conscience say that she's broken more eggs than the alternative.

Liliet

Sometimes... both sides are right.

Sometimes... it's not good guys vs bad guys.

Sometimes... it's the strife that's the enemy.

AND SOMETIMES IT GETS EXPLICITLY SPELLED OUT ABOUT A DOZEN TIMES IN DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE NARRATIVE AND PEOPLE STILL AREN'T WILLING TO RELINQUISH THEIR BELOVED "OUR BRAVE SCOUTS, ENEMY'S DESPICABLE SPIES" NARRATIVE

Oshi

That right there is why I don't bother commenting on the morality threads. They miss the forest for the trees every time.

shveiran

For all that I dislike Saint, credit where credit is due: she was more willing to be persuaded and talk it through than I would have expected. If this keeps up, it is possible she'll come around somewhat.

Also, great chapter period.

Talks like these are why I may very well start a third re-read just because I want more Guide.

Nicely done, plain and simple.

Rook

I suspect that she isn't beyond persuading, but it's more than likely going to be something similar to how Akua earned Catherine's trust, how Catherine earned Sve Noc's trust, and how Hakram earned Vivienne's trust. Because there's too much paranoia and too much at stake for any words or small gestures to really convince anyone.

It'll have to be a concession or an act of faith, made such that the goodwill is beyond doubt, with nothing asked for in return. Not a Barter, but a Gift. Either when Catherine holds the upper hand but lets it go for no benefit, or stands by the saint when it's clear that she could walk away without any skin off her own back.

Which is good, because Catherine is already holding enough cards for that situation to feasibly become a reality and lately she's grown a lot in terms of mentality, in bending her own pride or putting the first foot forward when others aren't too stubborn to. If nothing else, persuading even the headsman of Above would be ironclad proof that the Liesse accords aren't just a dream but an achievable reality.

Liliet

Mhm.

That's why Tariq's deal with Cat actually moderately upset me last chapter, now it'll take something more than sparing Laurence when she attacks her / working to keep her alive to prove actual full on good faith.

Unless Tariq's deal with Cat also doesn't fit Laurence's worldview and will be enough to blow her mind, but somehow I doubt that.

I actually suspect the story Cat's making with Indrani here served to shift her position, because it's blatantly heroic in a way you can't really fake.

Raved Thrad

I wonder just how serious Catherine is when she uses the expression "Sisters bless." Komana would probably just laugh, while it's entirely possible Andronike would just be confused by it.

Andrew Mitchell

> I wasn't some cackling Dread Emperor from the Age of Wonders, Sisters bless, and even if I'd actually intended on betraying these people I wouldn't have been an amateur about it.

At one level it's at least partly serious; she knows her gods personally. But on another she's sassing her gods, again.

I loved that part. ♥

Liliet

Fucking best.

Mental Mouse

I'm current rereading the first couple of books, and noted how she was like, "well, I guess the Heavens aren't on either of our sides, I should probably stop swearing by them". Now she has someone to swear by...

Aotrs Commander

Roland may if he's actually genuine, which sadly isn't a given, be the first possibly genuine hero we've come across.

Colour my a little sceptical, though.

Liliet

You're missing Dorian, his Page (spoke up against William's racism), Hunter (died for Marchford), Vivienne (argued with William about his methods)...

...the entire Free Cities gang never did anything wrong...
(obviously not counting Bard here)

...heroes are OVERWHELMINGLY genuine

David

Odd that Kat doesn't recognize the Tyrant in disguise as Ronald. She's seen him change faces before.
Oh well, it will just make the betrayal more surprising.

Andrew Mitchell

> She's seen him change faces before.

I'm drawing a mental blank on that. Could you remind me of that scene?

Liliet

Behold

Mental Mouse

So, Rogue Sorcerer is at least vulnerable to comedic damage... A most entertaining chapter, with even Saint getting the "thrown off a cliff" thing, and Cat smoothly translating Kairos' "opposite day" talk while picking out the real threats.

Mental Mouse

Also, apparently Cat didn't realize Black was a potential crown, but Kairos did? I'm not sure I trust this narrator! 😊

Liliet

Cat has been balancing A LOT in the last few days, a single brain fart is not only excusable but arguably inevitable :3

Odd

So Black's "crown" is definitely gonna end up being the One. A crossroads realm of tectonic gears.

Will be interesting to see him retired.

erebus42

Much like Cat I find the Sorcerer's behavior extremely suspicious and am having trouble taking it at face value. However if he is indeed being genuine then its incredibly refreshing to see a Hero without his head up his own ass and i must commend him for that.

Kissaten

What about Vivienne? "Rogue" Sorceror, Thief, maybe various bandit Names are naturally drawn to a Black Queen.

Liliet

Don't forget what it is that Cat suspects, specifically: that Laurence put him up to this.

How likely do you judge that outcome

Stormblessed

I like that the only thing that's ever convinced the Saint that our Villains might not be evil is the Power of Love. Nothing else has ever moved the Saint to be anything less than outright hostile.

Liliet

^^^

♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

There was also that bit of byplay where Cat was trying to preserve Archer's privacy...

Liliet

Yeah that was adorable.

On reread it was fucking beautiful to see Laurence go "so this is Woe" with distaste and then they immediately demonstrate their adorable side and she just. has nothing to say

(and noticably warms up, if marginally)

JJR

I just realized, a couple of chapters ago Cat mentioned that this was the third time she had come to Liesse bearing a sword.

The first was when she ended William's rebellion by stealing a resurrection from his planned angel and killed him (while also stopping Akua from getting her way); a victory in every sense of the word.

The second was Akua's folly. Cat avenged, but could not save, the population of the city. She also captured Akua but could not kill her because she was just too damn useful to keep as a tool. She also gained some power but lost her humanity. This one comes up as a draw.

And now she is here a third time, and it seems like she is destined for a loss somehow. At least it seems that way to me. It's not the standard Pattern of Three that puts two Named characters against each other. But in stories patterns of three exist all over the place, do maybe it's a thing that can happen while also being rare enough that Cat doesn't realize it.

Liliet

in stories patterns of three exist all the time but they aren't necessarily win-draw-loss

Catherine absolutely won at Second Liesse, her goal was to stop Akua which was successfully achieved win-win-BIGGEST WIN is a pattern of three too

Javvies

You really think Black would have gotten drunk and slept with a stranger?

No, I don't buy that. It'd be wildly out of character for him.

Besides ... Black would most likely have been near constantly accompanied by one or more of his friends/allies/associates. I don't see any of them letting Black drunkenly wander off with anyone other than Ranger (they all like living too much).

Javvies

Dammit wordpress.

That was supposed to be a reply to the claim that Black got drunk and knocked up some stranger in a one night stand.

Liliet

I think Ranger wouldn't actually care. Indrani got her "this is this and that is that" outlook from somewhere, after all.

But Amadeus is just... about as likely to have that happen to him as Masego is -_-

Javvies

Whether or not Ranger would actually care if Amadeus had an affair with someone else doesn't much matter. What matters is if anyone around Black thinks that there's the slightest possibility that Ranger might not be completely happy about it.

And let's be honest ... would you be willing to bet your life on Ranger not caring in the slightest if her lover has sex with some random stranger? Or even that she doesn't feel that she needs to make a point that it's not something she endorses? Or that she doesn't feel even the slightest bit possessive about Amadeus?
Or, depending on how you feel/how much you care about Amadeus – how having a one-night stand with a stranger might affect his ongoing and already complicated relationship with Ranger?

Sure ... Hye might or might not care that much ... but I'd call it unrealistic to think that everyone around Black would be entirely confident that it wouldn't matter, when the potential consequences of it mattering are so devastatingly bad.
Plus, for anyone around Black to override any concerns about Ranger's potential reaction, Amadeus would have needed to end up in this potential one-night stand situation in the first place. Which is improbable enough by itself.

As far as Indrani goes ... while she loves Masego, she also loves Cat, and is fully aware that Masego is both not sexually involved with or interested in anyone. There's also a massive difference between Indrani having an friends with benefits type thing with Cat (who loves Masego like family), and Black having a one night stand with a stranger. I'm pretty sure Indrani would not be happy if Masego had hooked up with some random person, even if she didn't show it.
Also ... potentially some room for hypocrisy here. "It's okay when I do it with someone we both care about and cares about us, but not when you do it with some random stranger."
... though, honestly there is a distinct qualitative difference between the two.

Liliet

I think people around Black would know Hye and what she does/does not care about well enough to know.

I doubt she was faithful to him, for that matter.

But like I said that's fully irrelevant to the point of "Amadeus is demisexual demiromantic and is not. fucking. interested"

> I'm pretty sure Indrani would not be happy if Masego had hooked up with some random person, even if she didn't show it.

I mean no shit she'd be upset and confused, his reason for ignoring her own advances is that he's asexual, who's this person and what have they done with Masego?

Yea it's true there's a difference between a polycule and a one night stand. I just don't think either Hye or Indrani give a fuck either way. But, again, FAR FROM THE POINT

JJR

While a fair point, I'm not as sure. Part of the narrative force is how well you sell it after all. So, it might not end up being a thing, or maybe it turns into a meta narrative fight between Cat and the Dead King, with him trying to convince her/the narrative that Second Liesse was in fact a draw and Cat trying to re-affirm herself/the narrative that it wasn't.

It seems the kind of thing he would do since even if he fails it doesn't really leave an opening to strike back at him. Whether he knows enough to try it is another story. And of course it might just not be a thing at all.

Dotraj
